¶ Pamphylius, adj. Of Pamphylia, Cic. de Divin.

Divin. 1. 15. Mare Pamphylium, Plin. 5. 26.
 * Pan, Pānis, m. The god of shepherds, hunters, and all other country exercises. Mythologists thought the universal nature of things to be signified by him, as his name seemeth to import. Whole for he was, is not agreed among them. Homer maketh him the son of Mercury, and faith he was called Pan from Πᾶν, omne, because he charmed all the gods with his flute: others say, that he was the son of Demogorgon, and first invented the organ, of seven unequal reeds joined together, the manner thus: Having on a time fought with Cupid, that god in spite made him fall in love with the coy nymph Syrinx, who fleeing from him to the banks of Ladon, a river of Arcadia, at the instant prayers of the nymphs was turned into a reed, as her name in Greek signifieth, which the god grasping instead of her, made a pipe of it, and for his music was adored by the Arcadians. The most common opinion was, that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope. But Nat. Comes, out of Doris Samius, maketh his birth scandalous, saying he was called Πᾶν, because begot by all Penelope's suitors. He was painted half man, half goat, having large goats horns, a chaplet of pine on his red face, a pleasant laughter, with the feet and tail of a goat, a motley skin covering his body, with a crooked stick in one hand, and his pipe in the other; see him nicely described by Sil. Ital. 13. 326. & seqq. a sight enough to fright women and children, yea, armed men too. For when Brennus the Gaul was about to pillage the temple of Apollo at Delphos, he by night struck such a terror into his army, that he quitted his sacrilegious design; hence Panici terrores. Yet, as homely as he was, he pleased the goddess Luna, turning himself easily into a white ram, Virg. Georg. 3. 392. & deinceps; and the nymph Dryope also, almost putting off his divinity, and turning shepherd for her sake. Neither was he displeasing to other nymphs, who are generally made dancing round about him, to hear the charms of his pipe. The usual offerings made him were milk and honey, in shepherds wooden bowls; also they sacrificed to him a dog, the wolf's enemy, whence his usual epithet is λυκαῖος, and whence also his priests were called Lupeici. His festival was celebrated Feb. 15th by the Romans, brought into Italy by Evander the Arcadian, and revived afterwards by Romulus, in memory of his preserver. He was also called by the Romans Junus, ab ineundo. Vid. Liv. 1. 5. Macrob. Sat. 1. 22. & Serv. in Virg. Æn. 6. 775. The ancients, by giving so many adjuncts and attributes to this idol, as before hinted, seem to have designed him for the symbol of the universe; his upper parts being human, because the upper part of the world is fair, beautiful, and smiling, like his face; his horns symbolize the rays of the sun, and of the moon; his red face the splendor of the sky; the spotted skin, whetewith he is clothed, the stars, which bespangle the firmament; the roughness of his lower parts, beasts, and vegetables; his goats feet, the solidity of the earth; his pipe, compact of seven reeds, the seven planets, which they say make the harmony of the spheres; his crook, bending round at the top, the years circling in one another. Serv. interpr.

Here the Poets make him to have decided the contest of beauty between Juno, Pallas, and Venus, in favour of the last; whereby he made the two former his enemies. After this he was owned by his parents, and within a few years sent on an embassy to Meoclaus king of Lacedæmon, where he fell in love with his queen Helen, and by his interest in Venus won her heart, and taking the opportunity of her husband's absence, carried her to Troy; which occasioned the war between the Greeks and Trojans, and the burning of Troy, as was foretold.* (2) Also a mimic actor, in high favour with Domitian. (1) *Vid.  Pröteus, eos. m. [Πρωτεύς, Gr.] The son of Neptune and Phoenice, or of Oceanus and Typhis, one of the gods of the sea, foretelling future events. He could transform himself into any shape. According to Homer, he was an Egyptian. Diodorus Siculus saith he was a king of Aegypt, and that after the manner of their kings, he sometimes used a lion, sometimes a bull, for his crest. Plato and Lucian agree that he was an Egyptian, but the former maketh him a sophist, the latter a stage player; each of them endeavouring to assign the moral of his fabulous mutability. Virgil dissenteth from them all, with regard to his country, which he saith was Poliene, a peninsula of Macedon; and that his chariot was drawn by sea horses. Lege Virg. He married Ops, or Rhea, his own sister. His elder brother Titan was prevailed upon to assign over his right to him, which he did on this condition, that Saturn should destroy all his male children, that so the kingdom might return to Titan's posterity; which Saturn performed, devouring the males as soon as born. But when Jupiter and Juno were born, Ops gave him a stone wrapped up like a child to devour, which he did; and by some such device saved Neptune, and Pluto also. Titan hearing of this, made war upon his brother, subdued him, and threw him into Tartarus; whence he was delivered by his son Jupiter. But, notwithstanding, having learned by the oracle that his son should dethrone him, he laid wait to kill him. But Jupiter, having notice of it, was beforehand with him, surprised him, made him drunk, bound, and gelded him, as he with his sith had served his father Cælus, vid. Apoll. Arg. 974. * Socrætes, is, m. [Σωκράτης, Gr.] (1) The son of Sophroniscus, a stone-cutter of mean fortune, and Parorete a midwife; an Arabian philosopher, the wisest man living in his time, in the judgment of the oracle of Apollo. Quintilian calleth him, the fountain, as Tully, before him, the prince of philosophers. He was master to Xenophon and Plato, from whom we have an account of him; for he left nothing in writing. He taught his scholars gratis. He was chiefly studious in Ethics, the most useful branch of philosophy. In his advanced age he was ridiculed by Aristophanes, accused by Anytus, a rich man, Melites, a poet, and Lycon, an orator, of contemning the gods, and endeavouring to introduce a new religion, because he said he had a genius, with whom he advised in all his affairs. Whereupon he was condemned to die, and with a serene countenance drank up his cold poison, giving precepts of virtue during all the time of his operation. But after his death the Athenians showed their repentance, by putting to death his accusers; so true is that of the poet, Virtutem incolumem odimus, Sublatam ex oculis quærimus invidi. (2) A painter who drew the Graces at Athens; also Ormus revivifying his rope, and the ass standing by to devour it. (3) An historian of Rhodes. (4) An historian of Constantinople, who wrote the history of the church in Greece, from the time of Constantine to that of Arcadius. (1) Vid. Xenoph. in Oecon. Cic. de Orat. 3. 16. Plin. 7. 3. * Solœ, & Solæ, es, f. vel Soli, orum, m. pl. [Σόλοι, Gr. à Solone conditore] A city of Cilicia, the birth place of Aratus, who is thence called Solensis; also of Chrypsippus the philosopher, and Philemon the comic poet. Solon is said to have built it, and placed a colony of Athenians there; but these soon forgetting the purity of their language, gave occasion to the Greeks to call every corruption in speech σολοκισμος, i. e. a solæism, Plin. 2. 27. & 31.

* Solon, ònis, m. [Σόλων, Gr.] One of the wisest men of Greece, the lawgiver of the Athenians. He lived in the time of Cræsus, who, to his cost, found his maxim true: for being asked, who was the most happy man; his answer was, that could not be judged of till a man's death. To avoid the tyranny of Pisistratus he travelled into Egypt, and returning visited several countries, built Solœ, or Solæ in Cilicia, and died at Cyprus in the 63d year of his age, Juv. 10. 174. He was very learned, eloquent, polite, ambitious, and valiant; and withal so successful, that Sallust doubteth whether his valour or fortune were superior, whereby he gained the surname of Felix. He conquered Jugurtha king of Numidia, and put him in chains. He subdued the Cimbrians and Teutones, destroying great numbers of them. In his consulate, having Asia for his province, he defeated Mithridates at Orchomenus and Chersonæ, and his lieutenant Archilæus at Athens, possessing himself of the city and fort Piræum. When afterwards his army was given to Marius, he returned into Italy, and defeated the son of Marius, who was slain at Præneste, Patere. 2. 26. He was a very cruel man, and first set up public tables of proscription, or outlawry, putting some thousands of Romans to death, though laying down their arms, and desiring quarter, and so filled Rome with blood. He was the most eloquent, politic, and wise commander of all the Greeks, who went to the siege of Troy, vid. Cic. Tusc. 5. 3. & Hor. Ep. 1. 217. & seqq. He feigned madness, that he might not be forced to go to the siege of Troy, preferring the many sufferings he should undergo there, vid. Cæc. Off. 3. 26. conf. Tib. 4. 1. 52. & seqq. & Prop. 3. 12. & demerps. His wisdom and policy were judged to have contributed more to the taking of Troy, than the valour of any commander; for which reason, the armour of Achilles was judicially given to him, rather than to Ajax, Ovi. * Zoroastres, is. m. [Ζωροάστρης, Gr.] He is said to have been king of the Bactrians, and cotemporary with Minus king of Assyria. He was the first that studied magic, Plin. 30. as also astronomy and the Chaldean arts, Justin. 1. 1. 9. Some have taken him for Cham the son, or Mistrain, the grandson of Noah. Several other magicians of this name are mentioned by writers, but there is no certainty of any except him, who was a friend of Cyrus the Great, and attended him in his expeditions, mentioned by Arnoobius. [Val. Disserta ionem super Zoroastre, Johan. Petr. Ursini.]

* Zōsimus, i. m. [Ζωζίμος, Gr.] (1) Tōs freedman of the younger Pliny. (2) || A Greek bishopian, who wrote of Constantine and the following emperors, but was very severe against the Christians, being an obstinate heathen. (1) Plin. Ep. 5. 19. (2) Opus extat.

* Zoster, ēris. m. [Ζόστρη, Gr.] A promontory of Attica, between the Piræan haven, and the isle of Cea. Meminit Cic. ad Attic. 5. 12.

Z ante Y.

* Zygia, æ. f. [à Ζύγιοις, jungo, quæd fit dea connubii] A name of Juno the goddess of marriages. Lat. Pronubia.

Zygonpolis, A city of Cappadocia, L.

Zyrtas, æ. m. A river of Lower Æthia, which disembargeth itself into the Euxine Sea, Plin. 4. 11.
