E, the fecond vowel, and fifth letter in the alphabet, receives its origin from the Hebrew ה, to which it answers in alphabetical order, and from which alfo it takes its figure: for by turning it to the right, to comply with our way of writing, it ftands thus η; and by taking the feperate perpending line, and joining it tranfverfe to the foot, that it may answer the top line, we eafily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. ε, which our Saxon anceftors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and fhort in the old Greek, as it is ftill in moft languages, who pronounce εγω, and εγω, though of a quite different fenfe, and innumerable fuch words, after the fame manner; from which ambiguity often arifeth. To obviate this, and perhaps fome other inconveniencies, they invented Η to exprefs the long found, or, to fpeak more properly, they robbed their alphabet of one of its letters, which were but fixteen, and fupplied the want of it by a mark of afpiration, writing εχως for ΗΕΘΜΟΕ. But this only could fupply the want of their banifhed Η in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themfelves under a neceffity of inventing three letters more to exprefs it in the middle, namely, Θ, Χ, Φ. But of this fee more in the letter Η.

To proceed, this letter E in old Geek was pronounced like ε, as o was founded like ε. In Latin, it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercource with, all its fiftor vowels, and they likewise with it; e. g. into a, as from fero comes fatus, from rear, ratus; fo alfo in like manner a is changed into e, as from tracto comes detracto; e into i, as from emo comes eximo and perimo; and in like manner i into e, as for infance eligans, which was written by the ancients for elegans, as Gellius informs us, 11, 2; and in fome words thefe vowels are ufed indifcriminately, as heri or here. Auguftus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Inftit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writing other words, as fibe and quafe for fibi and quafi. Thus alfo upon a fuppoftion that this way of writing came neareft to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; whence the Romans in the three like cafes of the plural number of the third declenfion, writ many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the acufative and ablative fing. of the fame declenfion, in many words thefe terminations are indifferently ufed, as might be fhown by innumerable examples. That e and o alfo are thus interchangeable ufed, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in the Greek words εγω, εγω, τειπω, τειπω; and fo alfo o into e, as from vos comes vefter; to omit that voftrum and voftrum, advorfum and advorfum are read in pure writers. Laftly, the fame is likewise to be obferved with refpect to e and u, u and e, as for infance, in percello, perculi, perculfum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the compofition of diphthongs, e is a prepoftive only in two words, namely, hei in heu; but is fubjunctive after innumerable words in a, as aedes, arger, &c. It is fubjunctive alfo after o in words derived from the Greek diphthong ο, as for infance in οίγω, which makes œftras, Οιδίπυς, Oedipus. A.

F Roman, and now in common use, F Ital. which also is in modern use, f in old English, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern use, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the sixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may seem to have lost its place, and figure in the Greek alphabet now used; but however its place is supplied in the numerals by ς, which is called Βαδ ἐπιταυσι, and its power of being a vowel, consonant, and quiescent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is still otherwise made up. This sixth Cadmean letter answering to γ was first turned to the left, as its original, thus, γ, and afterwards to the right F. The Eolians used the former way, and turned it upside down, thus, γ. These people used it before soft vowels, writing αβγδ for αβδγ; for an aspirate, as, αβγδ for αβδγ; also in the middle of words to stop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their collision, as, οαδς for οαδς. The old Latins also received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and setting it upright as we now use it. They, as well as the Eolians, used it for b, both in the beginning and middle of words, writing fordeum for bordeum, vesfo for veho; and sometimes turned it into v, instead of oac, writing ovis, thereby showing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the supineness, or ignorance, of Grammarians, was, and so continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, that there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into disuse among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they clapped upon words which anciently had begun with the letter b, or its substitute a, and the other half upon such as began with a soft vowel. The Latins also, both in the beginning and middle of words aspirated, resumed the old letter b, instead of fohis writing bohis, and instead of trafo, trabo. But though its place and analogous use, favour its descent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be said for its pedigree from the Hebrew D, and so make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure, it may be as well formed from γ, turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declining line, as above; or from the final η by turning it, and joining to the middle a small line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Γ, by taking its short leg and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the sound and power of this letter, we cannot but observe that it comes nearer to the sound of D phe, and phi, than ve and vi, as our Western people sound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, D is more generally changed into f than v. Thus from the Hebrew פרה comes the Greek φη, and the Latin fera; from פור, fors; from פרו, fucus, &c. But since from what hath been said may be gathered its relation to γ in place, and primitive use, and perhaps in its figure, but that in found at least it seems more nearly related to the Hebrew D or the Greek Phi, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reason may be given for such a conclusion, why the ancient Greeks so early dismissed this letter: namely, because having otherwise supplied the uses it had from the primitive γ, finding its sound nearly related to their Phi, they concluded they had no further occasion for it, and so left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever some great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the first rank also. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, or (for so by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this custom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itself, nor in the Hebrew or Greek tongues, who say not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticism, perverseness, ignorance, or inadvertency, of Grammarians. And indeed, if this custom would prove it a semivowel, we must also adopt s into the family of the liquids; and what is still more absurd, make a semivowel of two consonants, whereof at least they confess one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex, just with as much reason as they call f, ef. Besides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the same syllable, as in flor, fraus, &c. and surely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a syllable. A.

(Neque enim alibi apud bonæ notæ auctorem cum adj. vel masc. vel feminineo jurctum reperiri putò) sed de lectione parum constat, ut neque de interpretatione, vid. Vallari, 1, 4. Non enim reprehenditur Poëta de genere sed de declinatione, idcirco ficus tuas reponi debere aliqui sentent, quod sanè quidem existimaverim, quoniam constat marifca esse adjectivum, ejus etiam m. marifcus & n. marifcum legantur. Sic intellecto substantivo Juvencalis, Cæduntur tumida, medico ridente, marifca, fi. fci, Sat. 2, 13, & Caro. Ficos, marifcas loco cretoso sereno, expressit dixit, c. 8. quin & Seneca Ficos non affit nisi marifcas, Suavor. 12. Et profectò non est Latini moris, moratâ figuratè vocis signifi. mutare genus; præsertim in illis, quæ decuntur à similitudine: Lupus sive bestia, sive piscis, sive tremum; lingua sive ærebrum, sive promontorium, sive herba significatur, non mutat genus, quod & in plurimis aliis observare licet. Esto tamen scriptis Martialem tuas, non necesse habemus referre ad ficos, sed potius ad filios, sanulo, &c. quomodo alibi non semel ficus pro firofus posuit, vid. d. 4. A.

G Latin, G in the old black English letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ γ, in both which tongues it is the third letter, was not in use amongst the Romans till about the second Punick war, being first introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admit it into its third place, invaded by the usurper c, and now settled by prescription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and b, which, upon occasion, mutually serve each other. But though c may justly be called an usurper with respect to its order in the alphabet, we may allow it a kind of right, by having been invested with the power and sound of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who writ pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwise, after the admission of g, they would still have retained the pristine c in these and the like words. If any should ask how the ancient Romans could know before this letter g came into use, where and in what words to pronounce either sound? it must be answered, by use alone: For that this might be known so, may be exemplified by a hundred instances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loss how to sound that and thatch, the and thyme, this and thistle, thou and thousand, thus and thumb; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed must be owned, that to give several sounds to one and the same letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above instance, more difficult to be learned, and especially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans seem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverse; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more easy; we have laid aside p and ð which we had, to make ours more difficult; which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, because of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately also from the same letter; others from the cognate γ, which, when turned to the right, C much resembles G. I should think it more probably received its form immediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, since, as I before observed, the letter c originally had the power and sound of the after-invented g, as well as its own; and so when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reason differ no more from c in figure, than in sound. For indeed these letters differ only thus, c is a softer g, as g is a harder c. Hence it comes to pass, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a consonant changed into the softer c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legium, agium, which would be too hard. For this reason jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenses, are read before the formative s, jungsi, regsi, tectsi, not jungsi, regsi, tectsi; for so, if we may believe Isidore, before the age of Augustus such words were usually written, not by x; which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian say, Instit. 1, 6. that the Romans might have been without it; as they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as in rees, appec. The letter g sometimes also seems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is so close, that in some words either of them may be used; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigesimus, or vicefimus, from viginti; and they are often changed into each other: For as from viginti comes vicefimus; so from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the second rank of the mutes, is changed not only into x, but into χ also, as in the second conjugation, which consists of this order of the mutes, may plainly be observed; for example lego, f. lecs, p. lelecha; instead of legfo, lelegha, the harder sound. I cannot forbear to observe here, that both the Greeks and Romans always, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, founding γίνω and genus, γίγας and gigas, as we do in get and give, never as we do in generation and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great discouragement to those who desire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different sound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almost as unintelligible as our English. Hh, English black letter H h; English Saxon þ, which seems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ח. The Phœnicians, most ancient Greeks, and Romans, used the same figure with our English H, which in the series of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The less ancient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E should denote both the short and long sounds, as their ancestors were, witness the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately discovered Sigean monument, having consulted to express the long sound of E, invested it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to supply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aspiration over the head of its vowel, writing ἄμα, ἄδδς, &c. instead of the old Ionic HAMA and HOAOE; endeavouring, I say, for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writing Ἐοδία and Ταῶς; for ENHOΔΙΑ and ΤΑΗΩΣ; and where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it somewhat preposterously, for PHAMNOS, PHTΩP, ΠΥPΦΟΣ, &c. writing Ῥάμνος, Ῥήτωρ, Πυῖφος, where the mark of aspiration is put before, but founded after the consonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very ancient, was probably the reason why some of the ancient grammarians, and among the rest our great Master Priscian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument against it, is, that it is only a pure aspiration, having nothing to assert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if sufficient, would also recommend the numeral notes to the same honour. But with due reverence to so great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name also in the original, and other the most ancient dialects thereof, is very evident. Besides, if its being an aspiration proves it to be no letter, the original softer κ and π, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher γ and π the parent of H, must be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and surely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a syllable, the latter the characteristick of a whole word, two quite different things. But he insists, "If it be a letter, it must either be a vowel or a consonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a constant retainer to that family, may be easily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as some have, from its near approach to the nature of a semivowel. But sure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aspirated mutes φ, θ, χ, which were not anciently in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than a hard aspirate, vested with the power of its mother π, and plainly the same as χ, that is, no other than a hard aspiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly substituted for it, as χάρις, halo, χάρις, bio, χάρις, humi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mibi, nihil; which also may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the second order of the mutes, which constitute their second conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the same termination; for as πλέω, λέγω, πρέχω, move into ξ in the future tense; so dico, lego, vebo, move into xi in the perfect tense. But others think it no letter, because the Latin poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves so much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpose: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much disregarded by the Latin poets; and especially the final s, which even before a consonant, was anciently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aspiration is frequently expressed in Latin by s, as ἡμι, semi, ἡξ, sex; and are these therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aspirate is set before all the vowels, as habeo, bebo, bio, honoro, humeo; but after no consonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philosophus, chorus, Theodorus. Serwius indeed tells us, the same use had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. sepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; the two first whereof seem to have been so pronounced by some before, and in Cicero's time, as he expressly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and subjoining h to consonants and vowels was indeed used in pronunciation, but condemned by the best judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witnesseth, laughing Arrius to scorn, Ep. 82. for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinfidias. Cicero truly soon after, knowing very well that the ancients used not this aspirate insertion, for some time used to say pulchrior, Cætegus, and Kartago, yet seems afterwards to have espoused the aspirate way, at least in some words, as judging the sound more masculine and sprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himself, but more expressly from A. Gellius N. A. 2, 3. this custom was introduced. However, this way, though sparingly, and in few words used at first, grew into such a ridiculous excess, that some said chenturia, chorona, præcho, vid. Quint. Inst. Orat. 1, 5. Concerning the intercourse which h hath with the Æolic digamma, see the letter F. H. S. corruptly for L. L. S. a sesterce, being the fourth part of their denarius, viz. two pounds denoted by the L. L. and S. semis, a half; which in the first times of the Empire was worth two pence in our money. A.

Ii, and in the black English letter Ii, in the Latin Ii, in Greek with little variation Ii, all from the Hebrew, I. This vowel having the smallest sound as well as figure, is most fitly suited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epist. 1, 109.

Nec mihi sunt vires inimicos pellere lectis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel seven times, and the next smaller found e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the subject riseth, as in the sublime, the frequent use of it is to be avoided. For this reason Virgil has in the Æneid writ illi for ibi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgicks. Hence also comes the frequent change into u by the ancients, to strengthen the sound, as Jupiter Optumus Maximus, and many other instances, which might be given out of the old manuscripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly show. This vowel in Latin compounds is also substituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tingo, ficio. The sound of this to the next small vowel e is so near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expressed them both by one character, before the invention of points. And the changes of i into e, and vice versa, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be observed; as in μύθη, mentha, τύψω, tingo. - Add also, that in many words which are purely Latin these vowels are indifferently written, as magis and magis, heri and heri; Magis pellens aer, Lucr. 4, 344. Res bodie minor est heri quam fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea, many words in the accusative and ablative cases sing. of the third declension end in em or im, e or i. Also in our English tongue we write indifferently employ, ingage, incourage, indavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the same kind. In making the Latin diphthongs, as in Greek, this vowel is subjunctive to the rest, as aio, bei, boi, bui, Ilybia. In numerals this; as being the smallest letter, is put for the smallest number, I, one, II, two, III, and, set before the note of a larger number, subtracts itself, as IV, four, IX, nine.

J English and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew, is properly, as well as the rest of their letters, a consonant, and hath a name as such, though in favour of pronunciation they sometimes use it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its consonant use, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the consonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and English, and by some in Hebrew words, like a soft g; but very faultily, except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεύς, where it may be allowed that harder sound; its true pronunciation being softer; and approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jahr and our year being sounded alike. The true sound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the same syllable, and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we say bé, cé, &c. A.

K k Roman, K k Italick, both which are used in the English and several European languages; K k black letter English and German, pronounced alone kâ, but ought by analogy to be called kē, as bē, cē, dē, and the rest of the mute sisters; K κ Κάμμα Greek, from the Chaldee כפף חך Kaph, signifying the hollow of the hand, which כ in its figure resembles, the lower part whereof being elongated, makes the final ך, and from this inverted is formed the Greek K, and by immutation, and bowing the right side, the small κ. The power of this letter is invaded by qu and c; as, κενός, querqueda, dim. querquedula; κωνός, cœnum: and in like manner the Latin C is expressed by the Greek K; as, Claudius Cæsar, Κλαύδιος Καῖσαρ. And indeed the Latin C not only answers in sound to K, but also takes its figure from the same Hebrew letter: For as the figure of K is formed from the final ך, as before shown; so C is nothing but כ turned to the right, in compliance with the Western way of writing. Notwithstanding it appears that anciently K held its own place in many (especially Greek) words, and derivatives from thence, as κάλαρα, kalabra, κομισμός, kœnismus, κερκιδών, Karthago, κἀλάριος kalendæ; yet these also are equally written by c, vid. Quint. Instit. 1, 7. K has likewise been continued in some words of Hebrew extraction; as, in Karissimus, which occurs in ancient monuments, from כרס; and in Kalumnia, from כלמוה; K k, anciently a mark on the foreheads of those who were convicted of calumny. In our English tongue indeed, though disused in Latin, it is not only a frequent letter, but used even after c, to harden its sound; as in tick, and tchik: but in words of Latin and Greek derivation may be spared; as in public, critic, hellic, &c. These words however coming to us in all probability through the medium of the French, it seemeth better to admit K. (A.)

L l Roman, L l Italick, L l old English and German, which when pronounced alone we call el, prefixing e, to it, in like manner as we also pronounce the other sister liquids el, em, en, er (corruptly ar) to distinguish them from the family of the mutes, whose sound we render articulate by postponing e, as bē, cē, dē, &c. In Hebrew this letter is called ל Lamedh, and among other significations denoteth a goad, or spit, which its figure resembles. In the Chaldee language it is stiled לָמְדָה Lamda, from whence comes the Greek Lambda, by inserting b; and by removing m from it, labda. The Latin L is formed from the Greek Λ, by straightening one of the acute legs, and turning the other into the basis. It possesseth the first place in the order of liquids, and is, as Plato in his Cratyl. has observed, the sweetest of them all, being suited to soft and easy descriptions; as, Melle necum levibus cor est insolabile telis. It was usually sounded by the old Britons with a kind of aspiration, and was written in many words with ll, as it was afterwards with lh, as in llân, or lhân, a temple; llâu, or lhâu, a hand; which sound is made, by hissing l obliquely through the teeth, and aspirating it, though indeed it is best caught by the ear. Thus the most ancient Greeks sounded its sister P when initial, PH; as in PHOME, Roma; which in later times, after H was exterminated, being supplied by a note of aspiration prefixed, though pronounced after it, was written as it is now, Ρώμη; and this aspiration is still preserved in some Latin words of Greek extraction, as in Rhamnus, Rhetor, &c. This liquid is subjoined to the mutes b, f, g, p, in the beginning of syllables in Latin words, as in blatta, eblanditor; flo, confugo; gloria, conglobo; plango, complo: and also to t, and th, in derivatives from the Greek, as in Atlas, athleta; but never before q and v. All the liquids by the grammarians are called the immutables; as in fact they are in respect to the mutes, but not in regard to themselves, which is evident from Νύμφη, nymphæ; ager, agellus; λίκιον, lilium, πάυλος, paulus. The change indeed of the final letter in the prepositions con, in, per, and inter, into the liquid, when compounding some simple word beginning therewith, seems arbitrary; and we may write either colligo, or colligo; inlido, or illido; perluo, or pelluo; interlego, or intellego, &c. the former way of writing having obtained by ancient use; and as in the other letters, so even in these particularly; the latter method having only been introduced to soften the sound; as we see also in prepositions ending with mutes, prefixed to words and beginning with mutes or liquids, which for the same reason suffer the same, or greater, variations; as, for instance, absero, aufero; adnuo, annuo; adfero, offero; obfero, offero; transno, trano, &c. In some few words indeed the liquid l may seem substituted for d; as in lacryma for δάκρυμα, in alacris for ἀλακρῆ; but both these derivations may justly be suspected, unless confirmed by more unexceptionable instances. In numeral notes, L is put for fifty, the half of C, or, as it was anciently written by the Saxons, ƿ, making the curve angular, and analogical to V, five, as being half an X, that is, ten. A.

M Latin, Μ μ Greek, called Mō, either from its sound, the Greek Μυκάω and the Latin mugio being formed from hence, or rather from μύω, claudio, because it opens and shuts the lips; מ Hebrew in the beginning and middle of words; מ, or, if the vacant space in the end of a line require it, מ: it is perhaps called מם mem from its double form, open and shut, which is represented in writing its name; or it may be from מום a blot, which the Arabians use for its figure; מן in English and German black letter. Its sound is inarticulate, being formed by the mouth through the lips. This letter, though a liquid, suffers no mute in Latin to stand before it in the same syllable, except g, and that only in one pure classical word, viz. agmen; although among the Greeks, who perhaps gave it a softer sound, it followed ð, σ, and τ, as in δμῶν, ἄσθμα, τμήσεις; but in different syllables it doth not refuse to usher in its sister labials b and p, as in ambulo, and amplus; also itself and n, in mamma, and damnum, but in no other: For in order to avoid the company of the rest, it prevails with its neighbour n to be its substitute, as in anceps, anfractus, anbelo, anquiro, anfanctus (but this is likewise written amfanctus) which are all compounded of the inseparable preposition am: but the preposition circum for the most part keeps its m before all letters, though in some few words n is sometimes used indifferently for it, as in circundo, or circumdo; and sometimes loseth it, as in circueo, circuitio, which however it may equally retain. Before it its sister semivowels l and r, its cognates, soften the sound. But m is not behindhand in office with its neighbour n, willingly taking its place before the labials b, p, and m, as in imbellis, impius, immodestus; combibo, compleo, commendo; and also in the Greek tongue, as in μβόλλω, ἰμίνω, ἰμπίπω, and anciently likewise in divers words, as where we see in the Sigean Psephism written in honour of Antiochus, τῆμ βασιδέϊα, τῆμ παραμήτωρ, τῆμ μὲν ἱέρεια. Also before t, d, and q, as in tantum for tam tant, quendam for quemdam, quenquam for quemquam. M too in Latin words is put for the Greek ς, as in mystam for μέσων, organum for ὄργανον, &c. But in Latin accusatives of the third declension, which answers to the fifth of the Greek, m is often a formative only, as in patrem, and matrem, from πατήρ, μητέρα. It is likewise fervile in forming tenfes of Latin verbs, as in notabam, notarem, from notare: Though this fervility perhaps might be the reason why the ancients pronounced this letter very obscurely, especially before a vowel, as in optimus, and factus. Cato writ die hanc for diem hanc; and probably when not cut off by the poets, who then used it short, as for example in Cujus non hederæ circumière caput, Propert. this letter was not fully pronounced. M in numerals denotes one thousand, from the first letter of mille according to Priscian, but with more probability from its ancient mark CIO, which by the negligence or ignorance of transcribers being drawn together and made M, the half of which, D, from hence stands for five hundred.
