Nn Roman, Nn Italick; both which, as all the other letters, are frequently used in most of the modern languages of Europe; especially in such as descend from the Latin. The English indeed, besides these, have a black character somewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expressed, N n; but of no great antiquity, and seldom used but in printing statutes and proclamations; for our Saxon ancestors used a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue hath a double form of this letter, the one initial and medial נ, the other final ן, which might be the cause of calling it ןן, which is expressive of both forms; in analogy to ןן, which probably was so called from the same cause. Indeed there is a great show of reason why it should be called ןן from the signification of the word, which is a child, as being the undoubted daughter of the mother ן. The Greeks, in taking these two letters from them, seem to have had regard to both these reasons, discarding the finals in both, as having no occasion for them in their tongue; and yet, to show their near relation, gave them an articulation, calling the latter Nū, as they did the former Mū. Nor are these two liquids nearer in name, than they are in their figure, sound, and mutual offices, in Greek and Latin. With respect to their figure, they differ just so much and no more, both in the capital and small form, as they do in their sound; M m being a fuller sound, and having one line more than N n in the smaller sound, without any other difference. Their nearness in sound is more remarkable because made by distinct organs, the former being a labial, the latter a dental; which is caused by their equally touching the palate. Nor is their reciprocal use in languages less obvious: the plural termination ן in Hebrew, in the Chaldee dialect is ן; as on the contrary, the terminations on and on in Greek, are um in Latin; as ων, ovum; ωνον, cœnum; βραχιον, brachium: ων and ον, the terminations of the accus. sing. of the second declension of the Greeks, are in the first declension of the Latins: as μύσαν, Cœdon, musam, scholam. In Latin derivatives from the Greek, as ν is sometimes changed into m, as in νω, meo; so on the contrary μ into n, as in μυδιω, nideo: and as before the first rank of the mutes, and their sister labial m, n is changed into m for the better sound, as in imbellis, impius, immodicus; so on the contrary, in the second and third order, m is converted into n before c, q, d, t; as in anceps, nunquis, quendam, tantum: which also is done before f and h, as in anfractus, anhelus. The change of this letter into her other sister liquids l and r, before another l and r, as in illudo, irrideo, is common, as being only made for the better sound in pure Latin words; but the same is also done in Latin derivatives from the Greek tongue, as in ne from μν, lympha from λύμη (whence our Master Priscian accounts for the use of the Latin numeral L, instead of N the Greek numeral for 50. The most ancient Greeks, saith he, used L for N, which we still herein retain) in mora, from μων, in crisso, from κρίζω. As γ, before ν, γ, χ, is in Greek sounded like n, so in Latin words derived from such, n is substituted for γ; as ancora, angelus, Anchises, for ἀγκυρα, ἀγγελος, Ἀχιλλος, though the more ancient Latins, in particular Accius, as Varro acquaints us, retained g, writing aggulus, aggens, agguilla, iggerunt; and this not only in derivatives from Greek, but perhaps in some of their own words. In many Latin words from Greek families, n is inserted, especially before mutes of the second and third order, as in mingo, lingo, jungo, scando, frango, from μυγω, λυγω, ζυγω, κρυγω, ηρωγω, the second future tense of μυγιω, λυγιω, ζυγοι, κρυγω, ηρωσω, which epenthetical custom is worthy to be noted, as by means thereof from verbs barytones the Latins naturalized many Greek words. But this inserted n disappears often in their derivatives, as in miſturio, ligurio, jugum, conjux, fragor, fragilis; as also before gn, as ignarus, ignavus, cognosco, and others. Besides the letters already mentioned, n admits after ts, ſ and x (a compound of s and the second order of the mutes) as annus, ansa, anxius; and in composition j and v, as conjicio, convoco. In writing some Latin proper names, where ns concur either in the middle or end of words, the Greeks, to soften the sound, leave out n, as Ὠρτηνος, Κλήμης, Πέδης, for Hortensius, Clemens, Pudens. This letter is often omitted by the Latins, when they enfranchise Greek words ending in on; as Leo, Draco, for Λέων, Δράκων: but contrariwise, to Latin words ending in o, the Greeks add n, writing Κάτω, Νέρων, for Cato, Nero. In some inscriptions of the middle age, and transcripts of that time from elder originals, we find this letter inserted in the long syllables of many words; as Atlans, gigans, elaphans: which perhaps may have happened through the ignorance of the transcribers, mistaking a mark set over such syllables by some of the ancient writers only to show their quantity, for the letter n. I should have thought they might have affected to put this letter in the direct case of such words, because they found it in the oblique cases, had not such words as formosus and ibensaurus checked that opinion. O, immediately derived from the original Greek of the same form, in which form it continues in most of the languages of Europe, at least in all which confess a Greek, or Latin, descent, is the fourth vowel, and fourteenth letter in the Latin and English alphabets, and had a double sound, both short and long, which, if we had not been told so by Quint. Inst. 1, 13, is evident in itself. For it could not be otherwise before the invention of u, several ages after the days of Cadmus; which indeed is not a different letter from o, but the same, with the connotation of a different quantity, or double time, and that also often not observed by the Greek poets; or perhaps, doubled, as its small figure o seems to evince; and its sound, which differs very little from that of ou, which most anciently was sometimes expressed by a simple o, as Fabius tells us, and we are further assured from the Βυτταρφηδὸν and Delian inscriptions: in the former whereof we meet ΦΑΝΟΑΙΚΟ ΕΙΜΙ ΤΟ ΗΕΡΜΟΚΡΑΤΟΣ, &c. for Φανοδικου ηίμι τῷ Ἐρμωκράτους, and in the latter, latter, TO AΠΥΤΟ ΛΙΘΟ ΑΝΑΡΙΑΣ, for Τῆ ἀετῆ λίθου. And the name of o itself was originally ou, as Quintilian intimates. What I have said of this fourth vowel may be likewise affirmed of the second i, which had also two sounds before the invention of n; at which time, as o had both the sound and name of ou, i seems to have had the sound, and sometimes the name of ii, for anciently they write and read ΤΕΙ ΑΤΑΘΕΙ ΤΥΧΕΙ for τῆ ἀγαθῆ τυχῆ, as the more modern Greeks write: wherein, and in the like words, they however subscribed the exterminated i. Indeed this increase of the number of vowels seems rather introduced from an affectation of novelty, than any real necessity; seeing the Latins, who took a great part of their language from them, never imitated, and indeed never found any occasion for such an innovation. But the Greeks rested not here, for they invented also six supernumerary consonants ζ, ξ, ψ, and φ, χ, θ, all which are rather nexus literarum than real letters; the three former being only a connecting of the three orders of the mutes and the letter σ; the three latter a connecting the same orders and the letter Η. Thus ζ connects the third order with σ, ξ the second order; and ψ the first. In like manner, θ includes Η in the sifter mutes of the third order; χ includes the same in the mutes of the second; and φ doth the same in the first order: and all these were writ in the first Greek alphabet with two distinct letters. For the letter b held the same place in the Greek alphabet as it doth now in the Latin and ours, at the time when these letters, or, more properly, compendious ways of writing, were invented. And here we may observe, that of all these eight new letters, as the Greeks pleased to call them, the Latins only espoused two κ and χ, the former whereof they seldom used, as indeed having no occasion for it, the latter chiefly in Greek words, and servile uses; so unnecessary they accounted these innovations. This I judged proper in this place to observe once for all, to show the perfection of the Cadmean alphabet; and now proceed to a further dissertation on the letter O. The Greeks, as they framed theirs wholly from the Hebrew alphabet, so undoubtedly had this letter from the Hebrew y, to which it answers both in the order of the letters and numerals, which in both is seventy. How o by the Greeks came to be adopted for this Hebrew guttural, was sagaciously found out, and judiciously accounted for, by the learned Dr. Littleton; who observes, that the Greeks took their three doubtful vowels α, ι, υ, from the Hebrew י, י, י, to which three consonants they assigned the parts of vowels, by the help whereof they read before the invention of points; for י reading a; for י, e and i; for י, o and u. Now the Greeks observing that the Hebrews had given their first guttural י a vocal power, not knowing how better to transplant them, gave the same power to the three remaining gutturals, making ε from י be; η from י beth, Chald. betba; and ο from י, which, as we said above, was first founded ou, but afterwards, that o might be upon a level with i, to which as having a double sound they had given a double character, to the long sound of o they assigned likewise a double figure Ω, which from its largeness in respect to the o they called Ω μείζον, or the great o, and consequently the primitive o began to be called ο μικρόν, or the little o. As to the form of o, this account may be given: its mother γ signifies either an eye or a fountain, which this figure in some sort represents; the former with its corner, the latter with its stream. The Greeks neglecting the adjuncts, drew the eye or fountain orbicular, to express the round form of the mouth in making the sound. This vowel is changed into every other vowel, and every vowel into it; as from ἀράδον aratrum, so from spartum sporta: as from γόνυ genu, so from pando pandus; as from κόμης cinis, so from omnis post; as from αλό αλumnus, so from idē nox. This vowel was not in use among some nations of Italy, as Pliny informs us, namely the Tuscan, and more ancient Umbrians, and therefore u was substituted for it. And indeed the ancient Roman writers sometimes do the same, as Acherunte, lucus, frundeferre, &c. Luc. On the contrary, others used o more frequently for u, writing advorsus, quom, servom, voltis, vobnus, &c. for adversus, quum, &c. O is also used by the ancients for au, as codex, celix, plodo, plastrum, for caudex, caulis, &c. A.

P, Roman, P, ρ, Italick, P, p, English black letter, but of no great antiquity, nor in fact use, the Roman and Italick character having prevailed not only with us, but generally through Europe. The figure of this, as of all the Roman letters, was originally the same with the Grecian, as Pliny informs us, wherein he is confirmed by ancient monuments. And indeed it is still but very little different, which may be seen, as in the rest, but more particularly in this letter, P being only Π with the transverse and depending line drawn semicircular. The Greek Π indeed itself differs no more, scarcely so much, from its original the Hebrew final פ when turned towards the right. The name of this letter is the same in English, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; פה pe, signifying in that tongue a mouth, which the figure somewhat represents. Its place is the fiftēenth letter in the English and Roman alphabets, and the first in the fifth order of the mutes, wherein is a frequent permutation because of their nearness in sound and use; for p is only a softer b, as b is a harder p. The ancient Latins writ Burrhus for the Greek Πυρρὸς, and in their own language sometimes were at a stand whether to write b or p; as for instance in Fabius; whether obstineo, or optineo; since more of this than that was heard in pronunciation. This is also proportionably demonstrated in their very figure, P being a half B. Yea, that they have actually changed b into p in many words for this reason only, will be evident in declining verbs ending in bo and bor, of the third conjugation, as in nubo, seribo, labor, wherein the harder sound b, when a consonant is to follow, is changed into the softer p; and this not only in declining such words, but the p from b remains also in their participles, verbal nouns, and derivatives; as from scribo comes scriptus, scriptura, scriptio, scriptito, &c. Their near affinity, in the learned languages especially, leads us into the derivation of words wherein they are found. Thus we deduce the etymology of pario, and precor, from the Hebrew פרה and פרך; thus the Latin took palpebra and pubes, from the Greek βλεφαρον and βεβῶν, and vice versâ; and ab and sub from ἀπό and ὑπό. This their proximity in nature, sound, and use, is excellently denoted in the Greek and Latin figures, Π and P, representing one half of B. Nor is p changed only into b its middle sound, but also into its aspirate φ, especially in declining verbs and nouns, as is plain in λέγω, λέπω, λέμεφα, where we find β before a vowel changed into π before a consonant (as was before observed in Latin verbs of the same termination) and π again into φ. So in κατάλυσις, φος, φη, &c. gryps, gryphis, i, &c. and on the contrary φ in etymologies is converted into p, as Περσεφόνη, Proserpina. To this first order of the mutes belong f and v, into which p is also changed, as πάγω, figo; πείνω, fido; πῖλος, filum; and as from λησις comes levis, so on the contrary from οἰσις is derived opilio. Nor doth p refuse the intercourse of her sisters of the second order. Hence lepus makes λαγώς, lupus, λέπας; nor of q, which belongs to the same order. For from ἵππος, Æol. ἰωσ, comes equus: πότις, Ion. κῆτις, quoties; πῆ, Ion. κῆ, qua. The correspondence of this mute with the sisterhood of the third rank is visible in Πυθῆ, studium; πῆραν, trans; as on the contrary in appeto, applico, &c. for adepto, adplico. Some kindred between p and the liquids is also averted by etymologists, but, in my opinion, is precarious, as being too far removed to be depended upon. In pure Latin words this mute only precedes l and r, as in plaga, promo: but in Greek words, or of Greek extraction, it goes before b, n, s, t, as in phasma, philus, phanaticus; δυσπασα; ῥεφβίσιμα, ῥσίλα; Ptolemæus, and diptoton. Here also it may be proper to note, that when the Latins enfranchise a Greek word in which p begins a syllable, they leave out either the former or the latter, writing cubo, perna, tuffis, for κῦβω, πῆρνα, πῆσις. In the middle of words, p admits before it three of the liquids, namely, l, m, r; as in culpa, campus, carpo. It likewise admits n, but always by her proxy m, as in compleo, compono, for compleo, compono. In derivatives from the Greek the intial p is sometimes omitted, as in latus from πλάτις, in uro from οὐρά; which seems however to appear again in comburo for compuero. This letter appears also sometimes to be inserted in certain Latin words derived from the Greek, to hinder the collision of two vowels, as in lapis from λαῖς, in dapes from δαῖς.

est, nihil ultra quàm ingenuos, Liv. 10, 8. Sed sepe in originibus lusere veteres; simpliciter à pater, patricius, ut à faber, fabricius] A patrician, one of the race of those who were created senators in the time of Romulus, who were only a hundred, to whom after the Sabine war another century was added; these were called patres, and patricii majorum gentium. Another century was added by Tarquinius Priscus, in order to settle his new government; but these, as well as those afterwards added by Brutus, were distinguished from the former by being called, patres minorum gentium; though Tacitus seemeth to say only the last were so called. Under the emperors many of the old patrician families being extinct, were made up 'out of the plebeians, whence neither were all patricians senators, as under the kings, nor all senators patricians, Vid. Sigon. de Jura Civ. Rom. c. 7. Pitæum, Advers. 2, 7. Parvum, Fest. 1, 42, & seq. Casaub. in Suet. Aug. 2. But later emperors raised to this dignity such as they made of their council, as is plain from Cassiodorus, Procopius, Zosimus, and others. Patricii minorum gentium, the descendants of those senators created by Tarquinius Priscus and Brutus, in opposition to the race of the first hundred made by Romulus. In the time of the emperors, such of the senators were added to the number of the patricians as they pleased.

Q, Latin, Q, q, Ital. Q, q, black English. Concerning the origin, power, and use of this letter, the ancient Latin writers have delivered various opinions to the modern critics. Some of them took it to be superfluous, and therefore probably were unconcerned about it, how, or whence, it came into their alphabet. Of this number were Nigidius Figulus and Licinius Calvus, who refused to use it at all. Some used c for it indifferently, and writ pegunia, loquuntur, obliquum, and at other times pecunia, locuntur, oblicum, Vid. Silburg de Vet. Rom. Script. Hence some learned moderns finding many words of this kind; and others again judging it to be no letter, but only a combined note of cu, must consequently have supposed vulgar custom, and a shorter way of writing, to have introduced it into the alphabet. Of this number was Pompeius Festus, and long before him Ennius, who writ sometimes quando, and sometimes quando. Indeed custom at this day allows us to write cocus, hircus, cum, cur, cotidie, and many others, or coquus, birquus, coquum, &c. promiscuously. From such examples, and the frequent changes of each of these into the other, as in coquo, coctum, liqui, licium, &c. which is no more than an ordinary permutation in letters of the same organ, especially in mutes of the same rank, some have not only affirmed Q to be CV combined as aforesaid, but showed us the separate parts in this figure C <. These writ sometimes, qis, qæ, qid, or cuis, cue, cuid, which Vossius approved. Quintilian on the contrary takes the figure of this letter, as well as the power, from K, and seems to think both letters superfluous. As to the figure, it is just as probable as the former; and as to its power, nothing can be proved from that known pun of Tully, Ego quoque tibi jure saxebo; because Donatus having informed us that in Cicero's time quoque was written, it is more probable that he pronounced that word quoque than koke. My arguments for this conjecture are chiefly from Fabius himself, who tells us (Lib. XII. 10.) this letter made syllables harsh; which surely cannot well agree with the sound of k. Besides, he saith in the same place, that Q had a sound unknown to the Greeks (which it certainly had, and for that reason was not adopted into their alphabet, of which more below) and this evidently proves the Romans founded it not as a k, but very probably as we do. But what neither the ancient writers nor the moderns were aware of, hath not escaped the sagacity of the learned Dr. Littleton, who has deduced the figure, name, and power of this letter from ϰ. For as from the Hebrew Caph, the Greeks made Kappa, so from kaph they formed koppa; but finding they had no occasion for it in their alphabet, gave it a place among their numerals, calling it κοππι επίσημον. For the same reason also, Vau, not being admitted as a letter, found place as a numeral, by the name of εὐδ επίσημον. On the very same account, zade, or zade, or as we call it zad, was denied the favour of being a letter, but assigned a proper place in their numbers. This proceeding may plainly be accounted for from the genius of both languages. The Hebrew being harsher, made use of four letters in each rank of the mutes, namely, of two medials in each order; the sound of the one so differing from its neighbour, as the first from the last: the two medials in the first order were z and y, or B and V; in the second z and p, or G and Q. In the third z and y, or D and Z. But the smoother tongue of the Greeks refusing the latter in each order, made them amend suitable to their rank, by placing the first in their units, the second in their tens, and the third in their hundreds. But to proceed, the old Romans, whose language was not perhaps much softer than the Hebrew, though they framed their alphabet from the Greeks, found themselves obliged to restore these numeral marks to the dignity they had enjoyed in the mother alphabet. And thus from βαδ, or, which is the same, the Eolian digamma β made their F, that people alone of all the Greeks having learned that sound; and from the Greek κόππα their Q. This letter, I observe, the Latins must have founded quoppa, if the opinion of several ancient and modern critics may be allowed, who affirm this letter to be taken in purely for the sake of its V, to give it a broader sound, as it is very probable the original ϰ had in the Hebrew to distinguish it from z, whence the Greeks had their κόππα, and mediately the Latins their K. From the third επίσημον ζάνπι, which, as before noted, was the Hebrew zade, or as we call it, zad, their z was taken, not from the Greek ζήτα; for here I am forced to recede from the learned doctor, because the Latin z hath a very hard sound, as the dental z hath, whereas the Greek ζήτα was so soft, that Fabius tells us, the Roman orators were obliged to borrow it sometimes from them, to avoid using their own barbarous z, that is the Hebrew y, which the Greeks had not, Lib. XII. 10. and in the same place will scarce allow z, that is, F, to have a human sound; which surely is softer than y; and the opinion he had of our Q, I have shown before. Hence it is evident, that the Latin z is not the Greek ζ; and that the orator dislikes as letters all the three επίσημα; and the doctor confesses the figure of z comes nearer y, and the small z nearer to the final y, than to the Greek ζ. But to return to our Q. The figure of Q is easily made from C, by shutting the semicircle, and obliquating the perpendicular line; and C quoppa, differs not at all from the Hebrew ϰ, when, in compliance with the western way of writing, it is turned to the right. Thus at length the figure, name, and power of this letter are settled. But whereas the learned doctor roundly affirms the Greeks had formerly this letter: I cannot here but avow my dissent, since it neither appears among the Cadmean letters, nor those since invented, whether necessary or compendiary: besides, he owns the Greeks did not want it. Yea Quintilian further observes, that they could not pronounce it, and is angry that so broad and harsh a sound should be taken into the Latin alphabet, which so embafed the Roman, when compared with the Greek, elocution. I should next show its mutual intercourse with its sister mutes; but I have already made the longest preface to one of the shortest letters, and therefore shall only observe, that the resemblance and sound of this mute is nearer to that of her medial sister G, than to C or K her other sisters. For G takes V after her before a vowel, and that sometimes in the same syllable, as in lingua, extinguo, &c. as Q always doth: which v, whether it be a vowel or a consonant, or neither, as Donatus and others have thought, is better fought in that letter than here. Quum. adv. tempo. quo tempore. ¶ Scrib. & cum usitatis. When. Conj. sine, quereas, forasmuch as, seeing, Plaut. Capt. 5, 1, 2.

Rr, Greek Ρ, ρ, Hebr. ר Resch, from שר a head, which its figure in some sort represents, in Syriack אר, Roë, from which comes the Greek ρ, Rhō. From this letter the learned Littleton is of opinion that the Latins, whether by mistake, or design, took the figure of their R, as also the smaller r, by curtailing the larger; and that after they had inserted the Hebrew Q, and considered that the figure of the Greek ρhō was the very same with their P, for distinction, an appendage, or tail, was added by them to it. But undoubtedly he is mistaken in this part of his conjecture. For we are certain from their monuments still remaining, that the most ancient Greeks had both P and R in their alphabet: witness the Baudelotian monument, and the pillars of Herodes Atticus, that famous critick and antiquary, vid. Grut. Inscript. p. 27. where we find this form R at least seven times; to omit what both Pliny and Tacitus acquaint us with, that the figure of the Latin letters was almost the same with that of the ancient Greeks. It seems more probable to me, that the Latins observing the Greeks to have two characters for one sound, which they had not in the rest, viz. P and R, took the former of them into their alphabet for their P, judging this figure most expressive of the power of half the B, as P really is. This easy conjecture if none have made before, must have happened by not observing the ancient Greeks had R as well as P to characterize their ρhō. This letter, R, is in the alphabet put last of all her sister liquids, though undeservedly, being in fact, τῶν ὑμφοῦνων ὑπαναίσταται, as Dionysius Halicarnass. calleth it; and therefore might pretend to the first place, since, though not fully, yet more of it may be sounded without a vowel than any of the rest. Add to this, that in the Greek tongue it makes a syllable pure, and takes before it an aspiration: both which privileges belong to vowels. But whether the aspiration ought to be sounded before, or after, this letter, is not agreed on; reason, and the custom of the Æolians, who sometimes prefixed γ and sometimes β before it, make for the former opinion; and the use of the Latins, who write rhammus, rhetor, rhinoceros, rhombus, &c. may seem to countenance the latter. But I observe that in words of Greek extraction the Latins often neglected this aspiration, as in radix, rigeo, rasa, and in other words either omitted or inserted it at pleasure, as in raphanus and rhabbanus, remphæa, or rhombphæa. The Hebrews gave this letter the right of a guttural, never doubling it
