S The Latin capital is taken with very little, or no, variation from the ancient Greek alphabet, and is at least of as great antiquity, as that of the Scythian bow (Σ;) and from this drawn into a smaller form is made s, which is used only as a final both in Greek and Latin, except in the compendiary note ς for στ. The Greeks have another, but less, ancient figure of this letter, viz. C, from which the smaller initial and medial C is sometimes used. The Scythian bow is taken from the Phœnician alphabet without variation; as that is from the Hebrew שׁ sin, by drawing it in a jacent, instead of an erect, form. Hence the Dorians, who perhaps immediately received it from the Hebrews, as Herodotus and Pindar acquaint us, called this letter σὰν san, though the Ionians called it σίγμα sigma, from the Chaldee סכח sincha, by transposing the second and third letters: which opinion is made more probable by the small form of the Greek sigma σ, it being no other than the Hebrew ס turned to the right hand in compliance to the western way of writing. But there are strong reasons to think Δ samech only a secondary letter, substituted for שׁ sin, the better to distinguish it from שׁ schin; wherein they had done wisely, provided they had exterminated שׁ sin, which now seems supernumerary, because both these letters Ψ and Δ, have one and the same sound, as appeareth from the Ephraimitish pronunciation of Sibboleth. And hence we may account for the different Greek names of this letter, san being so called from sin, before samech was introduced; and sigma from samech, after such introduction. But to proceed: the Greeks admit this letter into no class in the distribution of their alphabet, whether in honour to it, as being invested with a despotick power peculiar to itself, or in dishonour, looking upon it only as a substitute and attendant on the rest, is uncertain; but I should think the latter, since its servile offices are so very many in declining their nouns, and their verbs more especially in conjugating. For in all future tenses of verbs baryton, and all the tenses derived from thence, with their participles in every conjugation, voice, and mode, this letter is servile; being explicit, implicit, or potential, in them all. And this servile use probably may have been the reason why some among the Greeks have accounted it only an aspiration, in which number was Plato the philosopher, who calls it the breathing letter. And indeed we find both the Greek spirits changed into this letter: the lenis, as in ἔσμι sum, ἐπίς succus; the aspirate more frequently, as in ἄρ sal, ἰξ sex, ἐπὶς septem. This may likewise have occasioned the neglect of it by the Romans in taking words from the Greeks, as in tego, fallo, from τείγω, σφάλλω, and sometimes in derivatives of their own, as in pumex from spuma. Certain it is, that some learned men among the Greeks avoided a frequent use of it. Plato and Eubulus, two comick poets, made sport in the theatre with this verse of Euripides, Ἔσσοσ σ' ὡς ἱερασι Ἑλλήνων ὄσοι. Yea Pindar was so unjustly severe, that he writ several odes without it: and the whole Spartan nation preferred the canine snarl of Ρ to the serpentine hiss of ς. The Romans also melted it so much, especially in the end of words, as scarcely to be heard; infomuch that even in writing before the interrogative ne, the comick poets neglect it, as in audin'? credin'? dabin'? for audisine, &c. and Virgil avoided ending a word with this letter, and beginning the following word with the same, as, Despectus tibi sum, nec qui sum, quaris, Alexi; orators also forbid this in their compositions. Yea the ancient poets, in imitation of the Greeks, when they pleased, cut it off in the end of a word before a short, and sometimes even before a long, syllable in the following word, as is manifest in that of Ennius, Egregiè cordatus homo catu' Aelius Sextus. And not only Ennius, Nævius, and Pacuvius do this, but Catullus; and even Cicero hath not altogether denied himself the liberty. But though in general this sound may seem to have been unpleasant to both nations, it has without doubt in its proper place its particular graces, and the most that is said against it regards chiefly its too frequent, or improper, use. The Latins, in making some Greek words denizens of Rome, prefix this letter, as in scribo, smaragdus, stella, from ἰσάφω, μάραθθ, τέλλω; and even si anciently, as in siliem, slocum, and that too in words of their own tongue: sometimes they interpose it, as in discus, musca, from δίσκος, μύσκα. The Greeks also in Latin names of men ending in a add this letter, as Nemæas, Philopizus, for Numa, Fimbria. In Tully's time, and a while after, this letter was doubled, as in caussa, causus, for causa, causus, vid. Quint. 1, 7. In conjugating Latin verbs, it is substituted for almost all the consonants, as in arsi from ardeo, tersi from tergeo, vexi from veco, vulsi from vello, pressi from premo, posui from pono, ressi from repo, torxi from torqueo, ussi from uro, versum from verti, as grammarians observe; but this to me seems not so much a substitution, as a servile formative power given it in Latin, as, I have observed before, it had in the Greek tongue. This semivowel, for so the Latins seem to acknowledge it, by prefixing e as they do before the other liquids, admireth after it of the mutes c, p, q, t, as in scapha, spes, squalor, stadium, but none of the liquids, except m, and that chiefly, if not only, in words derived from the Greek tongue. Concerning the intercourse between this, and its neighbour R, see that letter. A.

Tt Latin and English, whereof the former took its figure without any variation from the Greek capital, the latter, with a very small difference, from the lesser Greek character of most common use. They have indeed another small t, but rejected by the Latins, in this form t̄, which seems rather ornamental than necessary.

being chiefly used in conjunction with the other small τ. And as the Latins from the Greeks, so the Greeks borrowed theirs from the ancient Hebrew, namely the Samaritan character of the same form; save that the transverse plank lay not quite on the top of the erect stulp, but across it a little lower, thus, †: which very form is retained still in the smaller form of the Latin, and other cognate languages; in which figure also it was worn on the foreheads of the primitive Christians. This letter is called by the Hebrews טת tau, which signifieth an extremity or bound, because it is the last in their alphabet, as also the last consonant in the Cadmean, and indeed properly the last in the more modern Greek; for φ and χ, which follow, are not properly letters, but notes expressive of two letters, and of no use in the times of the first alphabet, the former being then written by ΠΗ or ΒΗ, the latter by ΚΗ or ΓΗ; which may also be said of ψ, the compendiary note of ΠΣ, ΒΣ, and ΦΣ. In the Latin alphabet only x and z stand after it, the former of which is an abbreviature of ΚΣ, ΓΣ, or ΧΣ; the latter of ΤΣ, ΔΣ, or ΘΣ, as will be showed more fully in the dissertation upon those two letters. To proceed: this letter hath the first place in the third rank of the mutes, which admit of changes into, and perform mutual offices for, one another. These changes are indeed most frequent in the same rank, because nearest in sound to each other. Ex. gr. in the first rank p is only a softer b, and b a harder p, as in scribo, scripsi, scriptum; nubo, nupsi, nuptum: in the second order c a softer g, and g a harder c, as in tego, tecti, tectum; jungo, juncti, junctum: which changes are plainly made only for the better sound, the harder mute before a vowel passing into the softer before a consonant; as is likewise done in the first and second conjugation of the Greeks, as in λέγω, λέπω, λέγω, λέσω. In this third order, indeed, these changes in forming tenses are not frequent in either of these languages, but in derivations of Latin words from Greek such a reciprocation is very common; thus, as from βατῶ and κάτω are derived vado and cado, so vice versa from ἔνδον and ῥόδος are made intus and minus. The same is observed in Latin derivatives from primitives of the same: thus, as from mado and video are made matula and vitrum; and as in composition, for the more easy sound, d before t is constantly changed into t, as in attendo, attenuo, and their derivatives; so also from mentior and quatuor come mendax and quadra: and we may add, that our English tongue sometimes softens the Latin d into this letter, as in at, it, what, from ad, id, quid. But as all the orders have a mutual commerce with one another, this letter, though less frequently, and her sisters of the first and second order, correspond: for as cerebra comes from τέρερον, so tussis is from βήσσω; as proceres from πρότερον, so bestia from βέσσημα. Nor do these mutual offices between this mute and the sisterhood, hinder her good correspondence with two of the liquids, l and n. For as mitis is from μείλιχος, so volo, are, is from πέλω, πετώ, as clitelle from κλίω, so pinus from πίνω. And there is the same agreement between this letter and the solitary s in Latin words of Greek extraction, where their civilities are only mutual; for as nausea comes from ναυσία, so myrtus from μυρσίω; but in words purely Greek, t so far intruded into the property of her neighbour s, that the latter was forced to bring her writ of ejectment before the tribunal of the vowels, with a design to hang T on her own gibbet, as Lucian jocosely says; but being non-suited by the prevailing power of the Athenian eloquence, meditated revenge, and made reprisals by the help of a barbarous nation, who, though they left t in possession, gave her power away to s, in more instances, both in her own and the conquered Roman dominions, than she could pretend her neighbour had invaded her right in, viz. that wherever t came before the third vowel, another vowel following, s, under a very few restrictions, should take her power. And the grammarians, who ought to have opposed this usurpation, confirmed it; and well it was for the Greek tongue, that the Goths understood nothing of it, and the grammarians at that time very little; for how absurd would it have been to have read aicra, acra, for aria, aris, &c. which would seem equally absurd in Latin, if we did not submit to a barbarous prescription. But to proceed; this mute admits after it in the beginning of pure Latin words of the liquids very seldom any other but r. The ancients indeed in a few words beginning with l, prefixed β, as in βlites, βlocum, βlitter, βlocum, &c. which is now obsolete. But in Greek words, not only l, but m follow t, as in Tlepolemus, tmesis. In the beginning it takes before it in Greek words c and p, as in Cicissippus, Ptelon; as also in the middle of Latin words in different syllables, as in factus, captus, as not only the dividing such words requires, but reason, for fac and cap are radical, but tus servile terminations. words as we do now, otherwise no change of the figure had been made in after times. But though they give this letter no place in their alphabet, they admitted it among their numerals; herein imitating the Greeks, who had made it a numeral only, calling it Βαδ̄ ἑπίσημον. To begin with the consonant: As to the figure, it is by some thought to be made from the Greek Ϝ, by cutting off the shank; though the great Scaliger supposed this was rather made from that, by adding the stem: but it seems plain, the reason for this supposition, was his ascribing to the Farnesian monument a higher antiquity than he ought. As to his proof from ΑΥΤΥΚΤΟC being found on a Greek coin, it is very weak; because all antiquaries know, that it was not unusual for the Greeks, after they came under the Roman power, to mix Latin letters among their own in coins and inscriptions, especially in Latin words. Marius Victorinus also is against him, and Aufonius expressly saith, Cecropiis ignota viris ferale jonans V. But though it be true that the Greeks had not the letter, yet it is plain that they, at least the Æolians, had the Name, and gave it the same place as a numeral in their units, viz. 6, as it held in the mother alphabet, calling it Βαδ̄ ἑπίσημον, as likewise Κόππα (90) in their tens, and Σάδ̄ ωδ̄ or (900) in their hundreds; being the only three Hebrew letters, ז, פ, י, which they had no occasion for in their alphabet. Nor had they the name only, but the form also from the Hebrew י, turning it to the right, and bowing its body, so that its appearance was somewhat like the contracted mark Ϝ, which therefore is now used for it. To proceed, from the name and figure, which are only accidents, to its power, which is the essence of a letter: As it is now pronounced, I think corruptly, it is a mute of the first rank, being of a middle sound between b and f, harder than the former, and softer than the latter, aspiring Β, as φ doth Π; and according to Priscian and Donatus, is no other than the Æolian digamma. But if the digamma be the Latin F, as they will have it, and a different power make a different letter, as surely it doth, F and V are two different sounds, and consequently different letters. This is plain from our own tongue, for we neither sound nor write knifes, or lives, though we do knife and life. I mean, as now pronounced; for it is very likely that before a vowel in the same syllable, both in the primitive and derivative tongues, it had the sound of our w in the same position, as in wall, wen, wine, worm, from vallum, vena, vinum, vermis, Vid. Scal. Not. ad Euseb. & Lips. de L. L. pronunciatione. Yea, in Latin words, after g, q, and f, we give it the sound of w; as in lingua, sequor, svadeo, where v is melted indeed into the vowel following, but strengthening the sound. That it is not purely a vowel, its resolution into a vowel, frequently made by the poets, seems to evince; as in solvit, Catull. sylva, Hor. This consonant precedes any vowel in the beginning, middle, or end, of words. It is easily changed into its sister mutes, p and b: for as from ovis comes opilio, from dubius, duvius; so from verpus is made vervex, and from γίβω, gilvius. Thus much may suffice for the name, figure, and sound of the consonant, in the ancient Latin. We next proceed to the sound of the vowel, as now distinct from the consonant, both in figure and power. The inconvenience of expressing two different sounds by the same letter, was observed by Claudius Caesar, who endeavoured to remove it, by introducing F the Æolian digamma instead of it; which in publick records obtained a while. But a very useful, though late, invention has applied an effectual remedy, by taking from the former the vocal, and from the latter the consonant, power; so that now U is a vowel when it maketh a syllable alone, or cometh before a consonant in the same syllable: and as such hath a mutual intercourse with all the vowels. For as from κάλξ cometh calix, from μδάω mado; so from κάπαλω proceeds capulus, from κραπάλη crapula: as from ἰβωξ ibex, from ἰβριξ iber; so from ἰβριξ iber, from κόπιλω scopulus. As from φῶσ sis, from σῦψω stipio; so from γλά gluten, from χάρη carus; as from ἀγκυρα anchora, from νῆξ nox; so from φῦρ fur, from ἀμοργή amurca. As solvit dissolved is solvit, silva silva; so nervus is made from νῆρον. Nor is it only related to the vowels, but to the diphthongs also. Thus from φαιδς comes fuscus, from γάγω curro, from λάγω lagana, from δλ sextarius. By this letter also sometimes the Greek υ is expressed in Latin, as duplus from δπλῆς, Uranium from Οὐρανίω, u being equipollent in sound to that diphthong, as Terentianus Maurus has observed, saying, Od literis nostris vacat, quod hunc V compleat satis fornum; which seems rather adapted to the vowel, than the consonant sound of this letter, according to the modern pronunciation. But if we admit, as we before hinted, that V in Latin was sounded as our W, the difference in sound is not so great. In gerunds and participles, this vowel was by the ancients substituted for e; as ad faciundum; nos gerundus est; also in many adjectives of the superlative degree, this custom generally obtained till C. Caesar's time, when they first began to write by the middle vowel, optimus, maximus, for optumus, maximus, as we learn from Fabius, l. 1, 7. A.

X Latin, ξ Greek. This letter, though both in the alphabetical series and as a numeral, it answers to the Hebrew D, denoting sixty in that tongue, as this doth in Greek, yet undoubtedly in power comes nearer the harder sound of w, schin, which probably stood most anciently in this place, till it was usurped by the introduction of the secondary D. Neither hath it only the power, but the form of w also; being made by erecting the plane or flat, and turning it to the right, to comply with the western way of writing. The Hebrews call it schin, i. e. a tooth, from its dental figure; and if you prostrate ξ thus w, you will perfectly see the teeth of a saw. The name ξ, also, as well as the power and sound, is taken from schin, by removing the last consonant, analogically to what the Greeks did in adopting other letters, or rather by anastrophe, as for se. For as from mem and nun, are made my, ny, so from schin is made xi. The Latin letter takes its power, and name indeed, from the Greek; but its form is the same with the capital Greek X Chi, and is sometimes resolved into it, as in ἀκρόνυχος, qu. ἀκρὸν νύξ; and from future tenses in ξω, and præter tenses formed in χα, as πλένω πείληχα, λέγω λέληχα: and that into this; the Atticks saying διχα and τριχα, for δίχα and τρίχα. It is a double consonant, compounded of the second order of the mutes κ, γ, χ, and the formative σ; as in πλέκω, πλέξω; λέγω, λέξω; ἔχω, ἔξω. The ancient Atticks long used the single letters, writing πλέκω, λέγω, ἔχω: and the ancient Æolians never used this conjunction, as neither did the Romans univerfally: for Nigidius Figulus, who, next to Varro, was in greatest reputation for his learning, refused to use it at all, as Vistorinus acquainteth us. And Fabius Insi. Or. l. 4. faith, they might have been without it. For all words might have been written as we find apex, gregis. And Cicero telleth us, it was left out in many words, to give them an easier sound; as in ala, velum, &c. for axilla, vexillum, &c. The later Athenians, on the other hand, used ξ instead of σ, especially in the beginning of words, as tempering the serpentine hiss of σ, which grated upon their ears, as we have shewn in our dissertation on that letter. And the Dorians also imitated them in the end of words; as in ἔρηξ for ἔρις, κλάξ for κλίς. The same also they did in the futures, and first aorits of verbs baryton of the fourth conjugation; as in καθίξω, ἐκάθιξα, for καθίσω, ἐκάθισα, &c. On the other hand, the Latins sometimes substituted this letter for the Greek final σ, writing pistrix and Ajax for πίστρις and Αἴας. This double letter in declining nouns, often loseth its s; as in fax, facis; rex, regis; crux, crucis. In numerals it expresseth ten, whence in old Roman manuscripts it is used for denarius, and as such seems to be made of V, and Δ joined, i. e. twice five. X. P. Decem pondo, or decem pedes; XV. Decemviri. A.

V, a Greek vowel, the figure whereof Palamedes is said to have taken from the flight of cranes, according to Philestratus; but surely this must be a mistake as to Palamedes, because we find it in the Sigean monument still in being, graven when the Greeks had only the sixteen letters which Cadmus brought into Greece. The two horns, as the old epigram calleth them, or branches, as Perseus, were chosen by Pythagoras to demonstrate the easy descent to vice on the left, and the difficult ascent to virtue on the right; from whence it is called his letter. The ancient figure plainly shows, that the Latin V was taken from it, being exactly the same with it in figure. And perhaps V was anciently by the Latins substituted for it, as we see in many words; as in cubus, duo, mus, fur, rudo, &c. from υ, δύο, &c. and this they did anciently in words which were afterwards written by the y, as in Musia, Suria, for Mysia, Syria: but instances in these words are fewer. It is certain the Latin V had in many words a deeper sound than the Greek V, and therefore was not the same letter, but nearer to their υ; forasmuch as Βρυττω, Ιουνω, were written by the Greeks for Brutus, Junius: yea the ancient Latins writ cu for u long, as in lumen, joure, for lumen, jure. The Latins have no capital of this letter, because they do not want it: for the Greeks aspirate all words beginning with υ; but the Romans owning an aspiration for a letter, as indeed it is, and always was, with them, prefix b before such words as they take, or borrow, from them, and therefore are all marshalled under it, But the smaller y they have from the Greek τ, by obliquating its stem, and use it in the middle and end of words, as in Gayster, corymbus; or end, as onyx, martyr. Our mother tongue, in the beginning of words and syllables, admits it as a consonant, as in yearn, yest, yoke, unyoked, but otherwise as a vowel. Vid. Ind.

Z ζ Greek; Ζ z when borrowed by the Latins to express Greek words; י Hebrew. This letter is called a double consonant, whereof the Greeks have three, ζ, ψ, and z: the two former were of later invention, but this stood in the ancient alphabet, as appears by the citation of Pliny, Lib. VII. c. 56, out of Aristotle, notwithstanding the corrupt reading even in the best edition of Pliny, where ζ is put for z, and z for ζ, as the learned Sabotius observed, and after him the great Spanhemius. This mistake seems purely to have been occasioned by the Roman librarians, who mistook the one for the other. The ancient figure of this letter was ζ, and by obliquating the perpendicular hath its present form. Its sound, now unknown, was between the Phœnician zain and the Latin G; which, though late, took its original from thence. Hence G is sometimes changed into it, as in δλζιον, which the Ionians used for δλζιον; and φλζω for φλζω. So the Dorians writ ζετω for γετω. The Latins also used indifferently zingiber or gingiber, for the Arabian word written by the Greeks ζιγγιβερι. That this letter had a very sweet sound, is certain from the authority of Dion. Halicarnassius, Περί Συνδεδωτων διαματων. And Fabius supposed that the Roman could never arrive at the sweetness of the Greek elocution, because it wanted y and z, which he calls the sweetest of all their letters, Inst. Or. XII. c. 10. For the same reason, one would think it could not have the sound of a double consonant. For if it were pronounced as the Æolians and Dorians writ δζ, or σδ, as in δουζος for δουζος, δουζω, or σδωζω for δουζω, δουζω, δουζω, δουζω, &c. it must be very hard, especially when a consonant followed, as ζυμπεδος, ζυμπεδος. Its Hebrew mother י, is certainly a single consonant, as z is also in our English tongue, where we sometimes join two of them together, as muzzle, puzzle, &c. The Latins likewise often put d or g for this letter, as in nider, from νιζα; harpago, from αρηζω. The Greeks change it also into σ, as in the first future tense of the fourth conjugation; or rather exclude it before the formative σ, as in αδζω, αδζω. The Latins indeed often put ss for it, as in patrisso, pitisso, from παριζω, πειριζω: and sometimes also substituted j, as being near in sound to g, as in jugum, from ζυγος. In Greek numerals it denoteth VII, though it be only the sixth letter, because ε is interposed in the numerical alphabet.

OF THE ROMAN COINS, WEIGHTS, and MEASURES.

THE Romans reckoned their money by æs, asses, sestertii or nummi, denarii, solidi or aurei, pondo or libra.

Æs, as it denoted a particular coin, was at first libralis, or of a pound weight, and even when it was diminished retained the name of libella. The first impress of this coin was a Janus, and on the reverse the rostrum of a ship.

Æs was divided into twelve parts, the names of whose divisions were these following: uncia, sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, sextunx, bes, drans, dextans, dejunx.

Quadrans and Teruncius are used to signify the smallest brass coin after the reduction of the æs, as the sestertius was the least of the silver coins.

The æs was first reduced to two ounces, then to one ounce, and at last to half an ounce.

The sestertius was a silver coin, equal to the fourth part of a denarius.

Nummus, when mentioned as a piece of money, was the same with the sestertius. So mille nummi, mille sestertii, and mille sestertii nummi signify the same; as do likewise mille nummum, mille sestertiūm, and mille sestertiūm nummum.

Sestertium in the neutral gender signifies mille sestertiūm nummorum.

The marks of the sestertius nummus are IIS. LLS. HS. HS. which characters denote $2\frac{1}{2}$ asses.

In speaking of sums above a thousand, there is often a twofold eclipsis, sometimes of the word sestertiūm, or its mark; sometimes of the word mille; as in Martial, vi. 10. Pauca Joveni nupèr cūm millia (sestertia) fortè rogarem; and vii. 9. Septingenta (millia) Tito debet Lupus. There is another double eclipsis to be observed when they use the numeral Adverbs; as HS bis & tricies in annos singulos Verri decernebatur, quod aratoribus solveret, Cic. Verr. iii. 70. where centena millia is understood, scil. 3,200,000 nummi sestertii, or 3,200 sestertia. If the sum is to be reduced to nummi sestertii then centum and mille both are understood, and that decies or 10 must be multiplied by 100,000. If you would reduce the sum to sestertia, the word centum being then understood, it must be multiplied only by 100. Thus decies HS. is 1,000,000 nummi sestertii, or 1000 sestertia.

Mille sestertii is or by 1000 nummi sestertii, in English money 8 l. 1 s. $5\frac{1}{2}$ d. which makes a sestertium.

Mille sestertia is 1000 times that sum, viz. 8072 l. 18 s. 4 d.

Millies HS. is 100,000 times that sum, or 807,291 l. 13 s. 4 d.

When the numbers have a line over them, centena millia is understood, as in the case of the numeral Adverbs; thus HS. MC. signifies the same with millies centies HS. that is 110,000,000 nummi, or 888,020 l. 16 s. 8 d. whereas HS. MC. without the cross lines denote only 1100 nummi, or 8 l. 17 s. $7\frac{1}{4}$ d.

When the numbers are distinguished by points in two or three different orders, the first towards the right hand signifies units, the second thousands, and the third hundred thousands; for instance, III. XII. DC. HS. denotes 300,000, 12,000, and 600 HS. in all making 312,600 nummi, in English money 5047 l. 3 s. 9 d.

Denarius was the chief silver coin among the Romans; in weight, at first, the seventh part of a Roman ounce, which, according to Dr. Arbuthnot, consisted of 438 grains, and was equal to our Avoirdupois ounce; upon which calculation an ounce of silver of that number of grains would be in value 4 s. $6\frac{1}{4}$ d.

The subdivisions of the denarius were the quinarius, or half, so called from its value of five asses; and likewise viroviatus, from the image of Victory sometimes impressed upon it; and the sestertius, which has been mentioned already.

The pondo argenti amongst the Romans, is a sort of numeral expression of sums of money, and is different from the common libra, which consisted only of 84 denarii, or 96 drachms. The pondo, according to Budæus's valuation, amounts to the value of an Attick Mina, or 3 l. 4 s. 7 d. according to Agricola, to 3 l. 2 s.

The Roman ounce is the English avoirdupois ounce, which they divided into 7 denarii, as well as 8 drachms; and since they reckoned their denarius equal to the Attick drachm, this will make the Attick weights $\frac{1}{8}$ heavier than the correspondent Roman weights.

Note 1. Quadrantal is the same with the amphora; cadus, congiarus; and delium, denote no certain measure.

Note 2. The Romans divided the sextarius, as well as the libra, into twelve equal parts, called cyathi, and therefore they denominated their calices, sextantes, quadrantes, trientes, according to the number of cyathi which they contained.

Note, Those who do not understand decimal fractions, may observe that the denominator of every such decimal is an unit with as many cyphers as there are places of numbers in the fraction; that the decimal parts are separated from the integer by a comma, and that the first figure, or two first figures, in the decimal parts, are chiefly to be regarded, without considering the number of places; 5 is half, 25 a quarter; as in pes 11,604 which is 11 inches, and 604 decimal parts of an inch, and very little more than half an inch; had it been 500, it had been just half, or if 250, just a quarter of an inch.
