PAUL ST. formerly named Saul, was of the tribe of Benjamin, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, a Pharisee by profession; first a persecutor of the church, and afterwards a disciple of Jesus Christ, and apostle of the Gentiles. He was a Roman citizen, because Augustus had given the freedom of Rome to all the freemen of Tarsus, in consideration of their firm adherence to his interests. His parents sent him early to Jerusalem, where he studied the law under Gamaliel, a famous doctor. As to the manner of his conversion, and his indefatigable labours afterwards in propagating the gospel, we must refer the reader to the account given of him in the Acts of the Apostles and his own epistles. After St. Paul was delivered from his imprisonment at Rome, he proceeded in his travels, but to what part of the world is not certain: some say he went into Spain; and others, that he passed over to Britain. But however this be, he went a second time to Rome. Here he is made close prisoner, and tried for his life by Helius Caesareanus, whom he calls the lion. This man, Nero, at his departure into Greece, had left invested with exorbitant powers, which he exercised after in as exorbitant a manner. At this trial he complains of Alexander the copper-smith's malice, and of being deserted by his friends; and presently after it, the second epistle to Timothy was written; in which there are several prefaces of his approaching martyrdom. This crown he obtained the year following, together with St. Peter, though not by the same kind of death. For St. Paul, as a Roman citizen, could not be crucified, and therefore was beheaded with a sword. His body was buried in the Via Ollienis near Rome; where a stately church was built to the honour of his memory, by Constantine the Great; which was afterwards enlarged and beautified by order of the succeeding emperors.

PER'SIA, a large kingdom of Asia, consisting of several provinces, which, at different times, have had their particular kings; the inhabitants call it Iran, for the word Persia is derived from that part of it called Pars or Fars, of which Schiras is the capital. It is bounded on the N. by Little Tartary, the Caspian Sea, Carasm, or Corasm, and Great Bokaria; on the S. by the Persian Gulph and Sea; on the W. by Turkey in Asia; and on the E. by Great Bokaria and the empire of the Great Mogul. It is about 1224 miles in length from E. to W. and 900 in breadth from N. to S. No country in the world bears a more different character than this; for in the N. and E. parts it is mountainous and cold, in the middle and S. E. parts sandy and desert, in the S. and W. level and extremely fertile, though for several months very hot. The soil produces all sorts of pulse and corn, except oats and rye. They have cotton in great abundance, and, among other domestick animals, camels and buffaloes, and their horses are are very numerous. In several places naphtha, a sort of bitumen, rises out of the ground; and they have mines of gold, silver, iron, Turkey-stones, and salt; but the two first of these are not worked, on account of the scarcity of wood. They have a great deal of cotton cloth, some pearls, and a large quantity of silk, besides manufactures of silk, and very fine carpets. They have also all sorts of fruits, excellent wine, and a great number of mulberry trees, with the leaves of which they feed the silk-worms. Likewise dates, pistachia nuts, and trees which produce manna. They have large flocks of sheep and goats; the tails of the former are of a monstrous size. With regard to religion, they are generally Mahometans. Ispahan is the capital town.

P E R U, f. a large country of S. America, bounded on the N. by Popayan, on the W. by the S. Sea, on the S. b. Chili, and on the E. by a ridge of prodigious high mountains, called the Cordilleras-de-los-Andes, being about 1500 miles in length from N. to S. and 125 in breadth from E. to W. between the Andes and the S. Sea; but in other places it is much broader, and according to some, 300 miles. It never rains in this country, and they hardly know what lightning and thunder are, unless towards the tops of the above mountains: all the tops of these mountains are covered with snow to a very great height, and there are several volcanoes, which burn continually. The best houses in this country are made of a sort of reeds like bamboc-canes, and covered with thatch, or palm-leaves. Peru is inhabited by the Spaniards, who conquered it, and the native Americans. These last that live among the forests, form as it were so many small republics, which are directed by a Spanish priest, and by their governor, assisted by other original natives, that serve as officers. They have no distrust, for they leave the doors of their huts always open, though they have cotton, calabashes, and a sort of aloe, of which they make thread, and several other small matters which they trade with, and which might be easily stolen. They go naked, and paint their bodies with a red drug, called rocu. Their skins are of a red copper colour; and they have no beards nor hair on any part of their bodies, except their heads, where it is black, long, and coarse. Those that are not much exposed to the weather, are of a lighter colour than the rest. They have a great number of fruits, plants, and trees, not known in Europe; however, some of their physical drugs are brought over, which which are of excellent use, and are well known in druggists shops, particularly the Jesuits bark, and Peruvian balsam. This country is divided into five great audiences. I believe we hardly need take notice of the mines of gold and silver, and the prodigious riches that are brought from thence, because they are so generally known.

PET'ER ST. As it is not necessary to recite, we therefore omit, so much of the history of this great apostle, as is related in the Gospels and the Acts, and shall only mention what is said of him by profane authors. The particulars of St. Peter's life are little known, from the 51st year of the vulgar æra. in which the council of Jerusalem was held, till his last journey to Rome. which was some time before his death. Being soon thrown into prison, it is said he continued there nine months; at last he was crucified at Rome, in the Via Ostia; with his head downwards, as he himself had desired of his executioners; this he did out of humility, as thinking it too great an honour to suffer in the same manner his master Christ had done. His festival is celebrated with that of St. Paul on the 29th of June. St. Peter died in the 66th year of the vulgar æra, after having been bishop of Rome (as some writers affirm) 24 or 25 years. His age might be about 74 or 75 years.

PET'ERBOROUGH, [Peterbörö] a town or city of Northamptonshire, with a bishop's see, and a market on Saturdays. PETERSBURG, a large handsome city of Russia, and in Ingria, built by Peter the Great czar of Muscovy, in 1703, and is the capital town of the whole empire. It is of prodigious extent, and contained not long ago 60,000 houses, great and small. There are built here many palaces, a college, a military school, and an exchange. Trade flourishes greatly here, because it is the seat of the emperors, and because foreigners have the same privileges as the natives of the place. All religions are tolerated, and there are packet-boats, by which intelligence is conveyed to different places. The inhabitants also carry on a trade with the Chinese and Persians. They have woollen and linen manufactures here, paper mills, powder-mills, places for preparing saltpetre, brimstone, and laboratories for fireworks. Here are also yards for making ropes, cables, and tackling for ships; a foundery, where cannon and mortars are cast; as also a printing-house. Some streets of this city are regular and well built; and among the most elegant structures may be reckoned the great chancellor's house, that of the vice-chancellor, and some others. They are mostly brick, plastered over; and though the climate is so very cold, yet they have more windows than they generally have in England. There are 20 Russian churches, and four Lutheran, besides those of the Calvinists, Dutch,

English,

English, and Roman Catholics; and the number of inhabitants are now reckoned at 100,000, most of whom came to settle here from other countries, there being not many original Russians among them. It is 355 miles N. W. of Moscow, 550 N. E. of Vienna, 585 N. E. of Copenhagen, 300 N. E. of Stockholm, and 1250 N. E. of Paris. Lat. 59 deg. 56 min. N. 30 deg. 24 min. E. long.

POPE, the territories of, in Italy. It is commonly called the territory of the church, and depends upon the holy see, the Pope being lord both in spirituals and temporals. It is about 400 miles in length on the coast of the Adriatick Sea, from the kingdom of Naples, to the territory of Venice. It is more narrow from N. to S. being not above 80 miles in breadth from the gulph of Venice to the Tuscan Sea. The Pope's territories are divided into 14 provinces, which are separated by the Appennine Mountains, some being to the E. and some to the W. of them; their names are as follow: the Campagna di Roma, the provincia del Patrimonio, the duchy of Castro, the province of Orvieto, the Perugia, the duchy of Spoleto, the province of Sabina, the marche of Ancona, the duchy of Urbino, Romagna or Romandiola, the Bolognese, and the Ferrarese. The Pope is a sovereign prince, but not content with that, pretends to be the vicar of Jesus Christ upon earth. His ministers of state in church affairs are 70 cardinals, being the number of the 70 disciples of our Saviour. These cardinals elect the Pope, which election is determined by the plurality of voices; but then he that is chosen must have two thirds of the votes, for fear of a schism. Formerly when the Pope died, the cardinals were liable to be solicited to follow the views of particular persons, which caused the election to be put off for a long time; but they have now remedied this inconvenience, and have built a palace for that purpose, called the Conclave. Therefore, as soon as the Pope is dead, the cardinals are obliged to repair thither immediately, and to continue shut up till they have chosen another. The election of the new Pope is immediately followed by his coronation; and this ceremony is performed in the Lateran church, where they put a triple crown on his head. The provinces which depend on the holy see are governed by legates; but, besides the 12 abovementioned, there is one at Avignon in France, and another at Benevento in the kingdom of Naples. There are few countries where the Pope has not ambassadors, who are called Nuncios; there is generally one at Vienna, Paris, Lisbon, Madrid, Warsaw, Switzerland, Venice, Brussels, and Cologne; and these nuncios are cardinals. They have the title of Legates a Latere. The title given to the Pope is His Holiness, and the cardinals have that of Eminence. All the ecclesiastics, and all the religious orders who profess the Roman catholic religion, are under the Pope; and every one of these orders has its general at Rome, by whom the Pope is acquainted with every thing that passes in the world. As there is scarce a religious house that has not a greater revenue than they spend, and as they are all desirous of supporting the Pope's authority, we may readily judge that he never wants money. It has been computed, that the common revenue which the Pope receives, amounts to above twenty millions sterling. However, it is difficult to know what he receives besides this, from the benefices which he confers, the dignities, to which he nominates, the first fruits, the dispensations, the indulgencies, the beatifications, and many other things of this kind. The Roman Catholic religion is the only one allowed throughout the Pope's dominions. The Pope's guards consist of Swiss, who are all tall and robust. The soldiers who patrol through the city every night are called Barrabes, and the chief of Barrigello. The Pope's relations are called his Nephews, and the custom of ennobling them is called Nepotism.

PORTSMOUTH, a sea-port town of Hampshire, with two markets, on Thursdays and Saturdays. It is one of the most secure and capacious harbours in England, being defended by a numerous artillery, both on the sea and land side, and has very good fortifications. A great part of the royal navy is built here; here are some of the finest docks, yards, and magazines of naval stores, in Europe. It is governed by a mayor, 12 aldermen, and burgeses, and sends two members to parliament. It is 72 miles S. W. of London.

PORTUGAL, the most western country of Europe, about 350 miles in length, and 150 in breadth. It is bounded on the W. and S. by the ocean, and on the E. and N. by Spain. Though Spain and Portugal are in the same climate, yet the air of the latter is much more temperate than that of the former, on account of the neighbourhood of the sea. Corn is not very plentiful in this country, because the inhabitants are not much addicted to husbandry; for this reason they import Indian corn from Africa, which is made use of by the peasants instead of wheat. There are a great number of barren mountains, and yet they have plenty of olives, vineyards, oranges, and lemons, as also nuts, almonds, figs, and raisins. They have some horned cattle, whose flesh is generally lean and dry. The principal rivers are, the Tagus, the Duero or Douro, the Guadiana, the Minho, and the Mouda or Mondego. Portugal is divided into six provinces, namely, two in the middle, called Estramadura and Beira; two on the N. which are Entre Minho é Douro and Tralos-Montes; also two on the S. called Alentejo and Algarve. The principal business of the Portuguese is trade. The government is monarchical; but the authority of the king is bounded by the fundamental laws of the kingdom, for he cannot raise any more taxes than were settled in 1674, nor can he appoint a successor when there is any failure in the royal line. No other religion is allowed here but the Roman Catholic. In 1580, there was a failure in the royal line, and Philip II. of Spain, got possession of the throne; in 1640 there was a revolution, and John duke of Braganza obtained the crown, whose descendants have enjoyed it since. Lisbon is the capital.

government of the Church appointed by the New Testament, was by presbyteries; that is,
by presbyters and ruling elders, associated for its government and discipline. The Presby- terians affirm, that there is no order in the Church, as established by Christ and his apostles, superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers being ambassadors, are equal by their commission; and the elder or presbyter, and bishop, are the same in name and office; for which they allege Act xx. 28, &c. The only difference between them and the church of England, relates to disciplines and church government. Their highest assembly is a synod, which may be provincial, national, or oecumenical; and they allow of appeals from inferior to superior assemblies; according

ing to Acts xv. 2, 6, 22, 23. The next assembly is composed of a number of ministers and elders of a congregation, associated for governing the churches within certain bounds. This authority they found upon Acts xi. 30, and xv. 4, 6, &c. The lowest of their assemblies or presbyteries, consists of the ministers and elders of a congregation, who have power to cite before them any member, and to admonish, instruct, rebuke, and suspend him from the eucharist. They have also a deacon, whose office is to take care of the poor. Their ordination is by prayer, fasting, and imposition of the hands of the presbytery. RICHARD I. (surnamed Cœur-de-Lion.) Richard staid above a month in France, after his father Henry II's death, so well was he assured of the disposition of the people of England, and that nothing would be attempted there to his prejudice; though in his father's life-time he had, or pretended to have, some fears and jealousies on account of his brother prince John. The first thing he did was to have an interview with Philip, when he thanked him for his late protection, and did homage to him for his French provinces. On the 30th of July he received the ducal crown of Normandy at Roan, and was girt with the ducal sword, according to the custom of investiture. The first order he sent to England, where he was obeyed as if he had been already crowned, was to set his mother queen Eleanor at liberty, who had been 16 years in confinement. He also intrusted her with the administration during his absence, and empowered her to release what prisoners she pleased; who was too sensibly affected with her long confinement, not to exercise with pleasure this power given her by her son; who having settled his affairs in France, came to London, and was crowned by Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, on Sep. 3, 1189. The ceremony was disturbed by the massacre of some Jews, who pressing to see the solemnity, the people fell furiously upon them, and killed several of them. But the king having caused a strict inquiry to be made, some of the ring-leaders in this barbarous action were deservedly put to death. It must be observed, that ever since the taking of Jerusalem by the Saracens, the people breathed nothing but revenge against the enemies of Christ; and this made them take this opportunity of falling upon the poor Jews, though they had no hand in that revolution in Palestine. Their not being Christians was enough; and the cruel example of the Londoners was followed by several other great towns, especially at York, where 500 Jews, besides women and children, having fled into the castle to avoid the fury of the rabble, the high-sheriff required them to deliver it up; and upon their refusal the people drew up in a body, and attacked the castle. The Jews offered a great sum of money to go off with their lives, but notwithstanding the people would give them no quarter. And so, rather than fall into the hands of the uncircumcised Christians, every master of a family cut his wife's and children's throats first, then dispatched his servants, and ended ended with the slaughter of himself. A new crusade, for the recovery of Jerusalem from the Infidels, had been resolved on between Philip of France and king Henry, in which Richard was to bear a part; but their private quarrels had put a stop to the undertaking. And now Philip and Richard being in perfect amity, they resumed the design according to both their vows. King Richard's thoughts were wholly taken up with this affair from his very accession, whether for the sake of glory or religion, let the reader judge. As he designed to make as great a figure as possible in this expedition, it was necessary he should carry with him a numerous army; to maintain which he stuck at no methods to raise money. Besides the late king's treasure, amounting to above 100,000 marks, which he wholly applied this way, he sold almost all the crown lands, of which the bishops and abbots were the chief purchasers. For 10,000 marks he delivered up Berwick and Roxborough to the king of Scotland, and discharged him and his successors from the homage his father had imposed. When complaints were made to him for these measures, he said, he would sell London itself, could he find a chapman able to purchase it. He got a power from the pope to dispense with those who repented of their vow, as having too hastily engaged in the crusade; and as there were many of this sort, he raised great sums by this means. He also extorted money from the richest of his subjects, by borrowing of those against whom he could have no handle, and laying such as had any ways made themselves obnoxious, under a necessity of saving themselves harmless, by making him presents. Whilst he was by these and other methods heaping up money, the clergy did all they could to procure him soldiers, and the army soon became very numerous. Having made these extraordinary preparations for his voyage, he gave the regency, during his absence, to Longchamp, his high chancellor, who was also bishop of Ely, and the pope's legate, joining with him the bishop of Durham. As to his brother prince John, he would not let him have any share in the government, for fear of giving him an opportunity to act against him: but, to make him easy, he invested him with the earldoms of Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaster, and gave him in marriage Avisa, heiress of the house of Gloucester, his second cousin. All things being settled, king Richard passed over into France about the beginning of the year 1190, and the two armies of France and England, making together above 100,000 men, joined at Vezelai, towards the end of June, according to agreement. The two monarchs marched together as far as Lyons, where parting, Philip proceeded for Genoa, and Richard for Marseilles, to meet his fleet; both being to join again at Messina, in Sicily, the general rendezvous of the Croises. Philip soon arrived there; but Richard, whose fleet had been separated by a storm, and were some time before they joined again, not till towards the end of September. Here a quarrel soon arose between Richard and Tancred, king of Sicily, who having detained the queen dowager, Richard's sister, in prison, set her at liberty at his arrival, and sent her to him. But Richard not satisfied with this, demanded the dowager assigned her by William II. her husband. Tancred being very backward to comply with this demand, Richard seized on a castle and monastery near Messina, and Tancred in return ordered matters so, that the inhabitants of Messina, taking the advantage of some disorder there, expelled the English out of their city. Richard enraged at this, attacked the city with such fury, that he became master of it the first assault. Upon this Tancred thought fit to satisfy all Richard's demands, and a treaty was concluded between them. But as nothing but force had brought Tancred to comply, he now endeavoured to sow dissension between Richard and Philip. The latter had already looked with a jealous eye on Richard's visible superiority, and was of himself but too much disposed to fall out with him. Both sides being exasperated, Philip peremptorily demanded of Richard to consummate his marriage with the princess Alice, his sister; and Richard as peremptorily refused it, saying he could not marry a princess, by whom the king his father had had a son, offering to prove it by witnesses; and though this point, being of so tender a nature, was dropped; yet this and some other disputes had so exasperated their minds, that they were never more frank. However, this did not hinder them from pursuing their voyage. Philip set sail first about the end of March, 1191, Richard staying till the arrival of Eleanor, his mother, who was bringing along with her Berenguela of Navarre, whom he had espoused. They soon arrived, and Eleanor returning home, leaving Berenguela with the queen dowager of Sicily, king Richard put to sea with a gallant fleet, about a fortnight after Philip's departure, taking the two princesses along with him. This fleet met with a violent storm between Cyprus and Rhodes, which drove part of them on the coast of Cyprus, where Isaac, king of the island, a prince of a very bad character, imprisoned the English that had escaped the shipwreck, and seized their effects. King Richard presented at this barbarity, as soon as the scattered fleet was joined, landed his men, and attacked Isaac so furiously, that he was forced to abandon the shore. The king of England pursuing this advantage, with ease made himself master of the city of Limisso; and soon after Isaac and his only daughter were made prisoners. He treated king Richard not to put him in iron, who granted his request so far that instead of iron, he ordered him to be bound with silver fetters. The conquest of the whole island soon followed, which Richard gave soon after to Guy of Lusignan, the last king of Jerusalem, whose family enjoyed it near 200 years. Before Richard left Cyprus, he consummated his marriage with the princess Alice.

enguella. Whilst the king was making himself famous by these great actions abroad, Longchamp, the regent, abused his power at home, to such a degree, that his colleague, the bishop of Durham, and the six counsellors the king had appointed to assist them, complained to prince John, and got him to join with them in order to depose him; which they effected, and conferred the regency on the archbishop of Loan, till the king's pleasure should be known. John was glad of this opportunity of having a share in the administration, and improved it to make a strong party for the crown, in case his brother died during his expedition, in prejudice of his nephew Arthur, duke of Bretagne, son to his elder brother Geoffrey. To return to the affairs of Palestine, Acon, or Ptolemais, had been besieged by some Christian princes a whole year. When Philip of France arrived, he continued the siege, but with little success. King Richard arriving afterwards, carried it on so vigorously, that in spite of all the attempts of the sultan Saladin to raise it, the city at length surrendered upon articles, July 2, 1191. And now the Christian army expected to march towards Jerusalem; but the dissension between the two kings, which broke out afresh, occasioned chiefly by Philip's envying Richard's glory, and the superiority he had obtained by the number and good condition of his troops, and his personal valour, proved an obstacle to the design. Philip finding himself very weak after a violent fit of sickness, and being impatient to go and take possession of Artois, which was fallen to him by the death of the earl of Flanders, quitted Palestine, and returned home, leaving 10,000 of his men under the command of the duke of Burgundy. Soon after his departure, Richard and Saladin exhibited a spectacle of horror, by putting the prisoners to death, each had in his power, which were some thousands. This was occasioned by Saladin's refusing to perform the articles of the surrender of Acon, upon which Richard is thought to have begun with heading the Turkish prisoners, and Saladin, by way of reprisal, did the same by his Christian captives. After this Richard resolved to besiege Ascalon; and as he was marching towards it with that design, Saladin posted himself advantageously in the way, with an army of 300,000 men. Here a great battle ensued, which was fought on Sept. 7, 1191. Richard attacked the Saracens, so much superior to him in number, with such undaunted valour and resolution, that he in the end entirely defeated them, having 40,000 dead on the field of battle. After which he repaired the maritime cities of Ascalon, Joppa, and Cesarea, which Saladin had abandoned, after having demolished their walls. Then he marched towards Jerusalem, and in his way took the great Babylon caravan, consisting of 3000 loaded camels, and 4000 asses or mules, and guarded by 10,000 horse. By this capture he made himself master of an inestimable booty. After which he continued his march towards Jerusalem, and from a hill had a prospect of the city: but want of forage obliged him to put off the siege. In the mean time, the duke of Austria with the Germans, and the duke of Burgundy with the French, deserted him, and the Italian troops under the marquis of Montferrat refused to serve any longer. These things, together with the diminishing of his own troops by sickness and battles, the fear of Philip's attacking his dominions in his absence, and the news of what his brother John was doing in England, made Richard resolve to return home. But before his departure, he caused Henry, earl of Champagne, to be elected general of the forces that were to be left behind in Palestine, and concluded a treaty with Saladin for three years. Thus ended this famous crusade, which drained England and France of men and money, and after all proved of but very little advantage to the eastern Christians. Richard embarked for England towards the end of the year 1192, and meeting with a storm, was forced on the coast of Istria, and from thence between Aquileia and Venice. Whether by mistake, or otherwise, he entered the territories of the duke of Austria, whom he had affronted at the siege of Acon, and took the road to Vienna. Though he travelled in the disguise of a pilgrim, as did also his attendants, he was however at last accidentally discovered to the duke of Austria, and seized at a village near Vienna. The emperor Henry VI. demanded this royal prisoner of the duke, who delivered him up, upon assurance given him that he should have a good share in his ransom. The news of the king's imprisonment quickly reached England, and caused the greatest consternation among his friends, whilst prince John took this opportunity to endeavour to wrest the crown from his brother, but was prevented by the diligence of the queen his mother, and the barons, who preserved their fidelity to their imprisoned sovereign. Finding he could not make a sufficient party in England, he went over to Normandy, and sailing also in his attempts there, he applied to the king of France, and made a treaty with him. Philip, glad of any pretence to embroil Richard's affairs, resolved to seize on the provinces he held in France. He made himself master of Gisors, Eureux, and the country of the Vexin, and laid siege to Roan; but he failed in this last attempt, being repulsed with great loss, and forced to abandon the siege. In the mean time queen Eleanor left no stone unturned to procure the liberty of the king her son, whilst Philip and John did all they could to prevail with the emperor to keep him still a prisoner. Eleanor at last had her desire, chiefly by means of the German princes, who vigorously espoused the cause of the unfortunate king before the emperor; and so Richard was set at liberty upon paying down 100,000 marks of pure silver, which the queen his mother raised in England for that purpose, and giving hostages for the payment of 50,000 more. The king was no sooner released, but he set out with all speed for the Low Countries, and

and embarking at Antwerp, arrived at Sandwich on the 20th of March 1194, after having been absent from England four years, of which he had been fifteen months a prisoner. Richard was received with great demonstrations of joy by his subjects, but he did not make any long stay in England. For having reduced the few castles that were still in the hands of John's adherents, and caused himself to be crowned a second time, he passed over into France with a considerable army, to be revenged on Philip for his late insults, and for encouraging the rebellion of his brother John. At the instance of his mother, he was reconciled to prince John, at Roan, upon his making his submission; but a war commenced between the two kings, the particulars of which are but of small moment, neither of them gaining much advantage over the other. Whilst Richard was in France, a great sedition was raised in London, by one William Fitz-Osburn, commonly called Long-ward, on account of a tax, which he alledged would fall wholly on the poor, with whom he had gained great credit by affecting always to appear an advocate for them. The tumult could not be appeased without the citizens taking to arms. In the end Longbeard was taken and hanged, with nine of his accomplices. About this time lived the famous Robin Hood, with his associate Little John, who with their gang are said to have infested Yorkshire with their robberies. Some say he was of noble descent, and was reduced to these courses by his riot and extravagance. He never hurt any person, robbed only the rich, and spared the poor. A proclamation being issued against him, he fell sick at the nunnery of Berkely, and desiring to be let blood, was betrayed, and bled to death. Richard, after the truce he had made with France, might have enjoyed some repose after his many fatigues, if his avarice had not put him upon an action which occasioned his death. A gentleman of Limosin, which was held of the duchy of Guienne, having found a treasure that had been hid for some ages in his grounds, Richard pretended it belonged to him as sovereign of the country. The gentleman would have given him a part; but finding the king was resolved to have the whole, he applied for protection to Vidomer, viscount of Limoges, who sheltered him in the castle of Chalus. Richard marched into the Limosin, to lay siege to the castle. But as he was taking a turn round it in order to view it, one Bertram, an archer, let fly an arrow at him from the walls, which shot him in the shoulder close to his neck. The wound, under the management of an unskilful surgeon, gangrened, so that he died of it eleven days after he received it, viz. on the 6th of April, 1199. The cattle being taken before he died, and the person who shot him brought before him, he asked why he did it. The man boldly replied, it was to revenge the death of his father and brother, whom the king had slain, and that he was glad he had rid the world of one who had done so much mischief. The dying king forgave him, and ordered him his liberty with a present of 100 shillings. But as soon as the king was dead, Marshal, general of the Fleecings, caused the miserable man to be slayed alive. Thus fell king Richard in the 10th year of his reign, and 43d of his age. Before he died he made his will, leaving his kingdom and his other dominions to his brother John, and ordering his body to be buried at Fosseward, at the feet of the king his father, to testify his grief for his undutiful behaviour towards him. He left only a natural son, whose name was Philip, to whom he gave the lordship of Cognac in the duchy of Guienne. He was certainly a prince of an intrepid and dauntless spirit, of unquestionable valour and courage, whence he was surnamed Cœur-de-Lion, or Lion's Heart. If those who have written his life, have not misrepresented him, pride, avarice, and lust, were his reigning vices. It is said, that a certain priest once took the freedom to admonish him to put off these ill qualities, which were usually called his three daughters. The king told him he had been thinking to do so, and would give the first to the Templars, the second to the Monks, and the third to the Bishops. He imposed exorbitant taxes on his subjects, and extorted large sums from them by unjustifiable methods. During his whole reign, he never was above eight months in England, which doubtless was unhappy under his government. Richard was the first king of England who bore three lions passant in his arms. He ordered that weights and measures should be the same all over the kingdom. In his reign the city of London began to assume a new form, with respect to its government, to have a mayor, and to be divided into several corporations or societies, now termed companies. Henry Fitz-Alwin was the first mayor, who continued in that office 24 years.

RICHARD II. Upon the death of Edward III. his grandson Richard, son of the Black Prince, succeeded to the crown. He was born at Bourdeaux, and was now about 11 years old. He had three uncles, who might upon specious pretences have disputed the succession with him; but they were so far from endeavouring to supplant him, that they were the first to do him homage. Accordingly, on the 16th of July, 24 days after Edward's death, young Richard was crowned without any opposition. The truce with France was expired about three months before Edward's death. The king of France was making vast preparations to complete the expulsion of the English out of all the places they held in France; whilst at the end of the last reign, and at the beginning of this, the English seemed wholly unconcerned about the war. And so, whilst five armies were employed in different places to finish the work in France, the French made several descents upon England, burnt Hastings, Portsmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and plundered the Isle of Wight. For this the people blamed the king's uncles, who took upon them the Administration of affairs till the parliament could meet; not considering, that they had either money nor forces, nor any lawful authority to raise them. The parliament met in October, and gave the regency of the kingdom to the three uncles, joining with them some bishops and lay lords. This mortified the duke of Lancaster, the eldest of the uncles, a prince of a haughty temper, who had altered himself with the hopes of being sole regent. Whilst preparations were making to guard the coasts, and to oppose France, the king of Navarre put Cherbourg into the hands of the English, as the duke of Bretagne soon after delivered up Breist to them. These places, together with Calais and Bourdeaux, might have been of great advantage to the English, as by means of these four towns they might have invaded France four several ways; but they made not a proper use of this advantage; and Richard, towards the end of his reign, gave up Breist and Cherbourg, for a very inconsiderable sum. When measures were taken in England to assist the duke of Bretagne, the French court, in order to direct the storm from their own country (according to their usual artifice), encouraged the king of Scotland to make a diversion on his side. He accordingly broke the truce, and took Berwick by surprize; but the earl of Northumberland drew together a body of troops, and retook it by storm. In this siege, his son Henry Percy signalized himself with such bravery and resolution, that he gained the surname of Hotspur. In the mean time, hostilities continued to be carried on in several places, between the French and English, without any general action, or decisive battle. Whilst the nation was involved abroad, and sose about the king had more regard to their own private interest than that of the public, surprising insurrection broke out, which threatened the whole kingdom with destruction. The parliament had imposed a poll-tax, whereby all persons above 15 years old were obliged to pay 12d. a head, the monks and nuns not excepted. This tax was levied with great moderation at first; but at length, being opposed by divers persons, who having advanced such a sum to the king, were to have what they could raise by it, these farmers and their collectors levied the tax, with great rigour, in order to enrich themselves. One of the collectors, having demanded of a tyler at Leptford, whose name was Walter, from whence called Wat Tyler, 12d. for one of his daughters, the father refused to pay it, alleging that she was under the age mentioned in the act. The insolent collector attempting in any way not very modest to satisfy himself of the truth of this, Wat took up a hammer, and knocked out his brains. The people took his art, and promised to stand by him. Immediately the populace rose in Kent, and chose Wat Tyler for their leader; and they were soon followed by those of Essex, under the conduct of Jack Straw. To the poll-tax were added other grievances; the little care taken by those at the helm to guard the coasts against the French, notwithstanding the large sums that had been raised for that purpose, the extortion of the judges and lawyers, the oppression of the nobles, &c. These grievances being inflamed by seditious spirits, and, as some say, by the Monks, who thought themselves aggrieved by the poll-tax, the people rose in great numbers, and Wat soon found himself at the head of 100,000 men. With these he marched directly for London, freeing all the prisoners as he went along. This formidable mob proceeded to the utmost extravagances; they cut off the heads of those lords, gentlemen, judges and lawyers they could lay hands on; and bound themselves by oath never to own for king, any whose name should be John; which was occasioned by their hatred to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who at this time was gone to the borders to negotiate a truce with the Scots. Being come to Blackheath, Wat Tyler reviewed his army, and continuing his march towards London, took and plundered Southwark. Shortly after, he entered London, the city mob opening the bridge gates to him, in spite of the magistrates. Here this enraged rabble committed the most horrid ravages, burning and plundering the houses of the judges, lords and principal citizens. Then they seized the Tower, and finding there the archbishop of Canterbury and the high-treasurer, they without any ceremony cut off their heads. The king and council were exceedingly alarmed at these furious proceedings, and in great perplexity what course to take to put a stop to them. At last it was resolved to offer the rebels a charter confirming the people's liberties, and a general pardon; which those of Essex accepting, returned to their homes. Wat Tyler still continued at the head of 30 or 40,000 men; and the king coming to Smithfield, sent to desire him to come and confer with him. Wat returned a haughty answer, that he would come when he thought fit. He however set forward at the head of his troops, and meeting the king in Smithfield, they had a conference together, both on horseback. He made such extravagant demands, that Richard knew not how to answer him; and now and then he would lift up his sword, as if he threatened the king. This insolence so enraged Walworth, mayor of London, who was by the king, that he struck the rebel on a sudden such a furious blow on the head with his sword, as instantly killed him. The rebels seeing their leader fall, were just upon the point of revenging his death, when the young king, with a courage and presence of mind that could hardly be expected from his years, cried out aloud to them, 'My friends, will you kill your king? What, though you have lost your leader! I will be your captain, follow me.' With that, turning his horse about, he put himself at their head, and marched to St. George's-Fields. The rebels, imagining he had declared for them, them, readily followed him. When they were come thither, they presently saw a great number of citizens well armed, whom the mayor had raised, marching towards them. And thinking the whole city was coming out against them, they immediately threw down their arms and the whole multitude was soon dispersed, without the loss of one life but that of Wat Tyler their leader. There were much the same kind of insurrections in Norfolk and Suffolk; but the bishop of Norwich, putting himself at the head of some troops, quickly suppressed them. Those in Essex began also to stir again; but the king marched against them and defeated them. Great numbers were slain, and others were taken and executed; among whom was Jack Straw, their leader. He confessed, if they had succeeded, their intention was to kill the king, to extirpate the nobility, and the clergy, except the Mendicant Friars, to divide England into several kingdoms, to make Wat Tyler king of Kent, to abolish all the old laws, and make new ones. This formidable insurrection was in the year 1381, and did not last above a month from the beginning to the end. A marriage having been concluded between king Richard and Anne of Luxemburg, sister of the emperor Wenceslaus, she arrived in England, and was received with great pomp and magnificence, soon after the troubles were appeased. The same year the king granted a power to the bishops to imprison heretics; but the house of commons soon got it revoked. In 1385, the Scots, by the assistance of France, as well as the French themselves, were preparing again to invade England. This alarmed the court, and made them so exert themselves, that in a little time, Richard was at the head of a very numerous army, some even say, 300,000 men. Tho' with this army he might have subdued Scotland, he made little or no use of it. Instead of pushing the Scots vigorously, who would not have been able to stand before him, he employed himself in ravaging the country about Edinburgh, whilst they slipped by him into Cumberland, and committed terrible devastations. And though he might have intercepted them in their return, he omitted to do it, and returned ingloriously into England. It must be owned indeed, that marching with the greatest part of this army first towards the Southern parts of this island, he, by the intelligence which the French had of the great number of his forces, prevented the invasion from France, which was at the same time intended. Richard's chief favourites now were, Nevil, archbishop of York, Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, whom he created marquis of Dublin, (the first who bore the title of marquis in England) the duke of Ireland; Michael de la Pole, son to a merchant in London, whom he made earl of Suffolk and high-chancellor; and judge Tresilian. These, by humouring his passions, got an absolute ascendancy over him. That they might ingross him to themselves, they inspired him with a jealousy of his three uncles, especially the duke of Lancaster, persuading him, that he aspired to the crown; whilst these could not without indignation see persons of obscure birth or inferior rank ingross all the king's favour and confidence. These jealousies and animosities proved fatal to the king himself, who always loved those best that flattered him most, and were for justifying whatever was agreeable to his inclination. These favourites were become so odious, that when the king demanded a subsidy from the parliament, on account of another French invasion that was threatened, instead of answering his desire, they presented an address for the removal of his favourites. Richard was exceedingly enraged at this proceeding and said, 'That to please the parliament he would not turn out the meanest scullion in his kitchen.' A few days after, he sent to the chancellor in an imperious manner to renew his demand of the supply. But the two houses united on this occasion, peremptorily refused it, unless he would first remove the favourites. Things were even upon the point of coming to a rupture, when the king, thinking better of the matter, complied. After which, the duke of Ireland's estate was confiscated by order of parliament, and the chancellor was obliged to restore all the grants the king had made him; which done, the parliament appointed fourteen commissioners to manage affairs jointly with the king. But so fickle and imprudent was Richard, that, as soon as the parliament broke up, he recalled his old ministers, and cared them more than ever, who now made use of all their arts to be revenged on their enemies. The duke of Gloucester, the youngest of the king's uncles, who had acted vigorously against them, was the chief object of their resentment; whom they endeavoured to get poisoned, but he escaped for that time. The remaining part of this reign was nothing but confusion, and a series of arbitrary measures. The ministers formed a design to make the king absolute, which Richard was very well pleased with. 'Twas agreed, that he should raise an army, to terrify the duke of Gloucester, and the other lords his associates; as the earls of Arundel, Warwick, Nottingham, and Derby, which last was eldest son to the duke of Lancaster. Then a parliament was to be called which was to be wholly at the king's devotion, and none to be returned but such as were set down in his list. For this purpose, he sent for all the sheriffs and judges to Nottingham, and communicated to them his design. The sheriffs refused to comply; but the judges were not so scrupulous as to what was referred to them. Being asked, whether the king might not turn out the 14 commissioners appointed by parliament, and annul what other acts he pleased, they replied, That the king was above the laws. And some through servile flattery, others compelled by menaces, signed this opinion. The king, then issued out commissions for levying an army; but so few were willing

illig to serve him, that he was forced to éfit. And all he gained by this was, at by discovering his designs, he increas'd ore and more the hatred of the people. The duke of Gloucester and the other lords, alarmed t these proceedings, and knowing that the chief aim of the court was their destruction, éolved to take arms; and, as they were in reat credit with the people, soon raised an rmy of 40,000 men. This threw the king to great perplexity, but he thought the best ay was to amuse them by fair promises, whilst the duke of Ireland went and raised an rmy in Wales; which he soon did, but beg met by the earl of Derby, in Oxfordshire, as defeated, and forced to fly into Holland.
 rom thence he went into Louvain, where he ied about 3 years after. In his baggage, hich was taken, was found a letter from the ing, ordering him to march with all speed London, and promising to live and die ith him. It was also discovered, that he éfign'd to make up matters with France at y rate, in order to have the assistance of that own to reduce his subjects to obedience. ichard's measures being thus defeated, he ok shelter in the Tower, and the lords immediately marched their army to London.
 hey demanded a conference with the king, hich, in the circumstances he was in, he urst not refuse. They upbraided him with e Nottingham plot, and all his other measures to destroy them, and to make himself ébsolute. He seem'd much affected, and shed ars at this remonstrance; and it was agreed, hat he should meet them the next day at Vestminster, in order to settle with him the overnment. But they were no sooner gone om the Tower, than he alter'd his mind, ad sent them word he would not meet them.
 hereupon they let him know, that if he did ot come, they would chuse another king. righten'd at this declaration, he not only unc, but consented to the banishment of his ourites. As to the judges, they were taken f the bench, and sent to the Tower. The rliament meeting in Feb. 1380, several per-ns were impeach'd of high-treason. Some ere banish'd, and had their estates confiscad.
 The chief justices, Sir Robert Tresilian, ad some others, were hanged at Tyburn. Afr this, a general pardon was pass'd for both rties; the king renew'd his coronation oath, ad all the lords repeated their oaths of allegice to him. During these transactions, the ke of Lancaster was in Spain, endeavouring possess himself of the crown of Castile, hich he claimed in right of his wife, eldest ughter of Peter the Cruel. At his return, e king invest'd him with the duchy of Guinera, not out of any affection for him, but ith a view of having him at a distance. hough matters had been thus made up, the unhappy temper of the king soon threw all in confusion again. Being now come of age, he as resolv'd to take the government into his va hands; when it soon appear'd, that he was not at all dispos'd to rule with moderation according to the laws, but that he was fully resolv'd to follow the opinions and maxims of his late favourites. His queen being dead, he married Isabella, daughter of Charles VI. of France, and made a dishonourable truce with that crown for 28 years. The dukes of Lancaster and York, seeing how matters went, quitted the court; and the duke of Gloucester, who had taken the freedom to upbraid the king, his nephew, on several occasions, was treacherously seized, hurried over to Calais, and there smothered between two featherbeds.

 The earls of Warwick and Arundel were apprehended and sent to the Tower. The king now took more timely and effectual methods to have a parliament at his devotion. He chang'd all the sheriffs, and the magistrates of cities and boroughs, and suffer'd none to continue in place, but such as would be subservient to his will. A pack'd parliament being by such means obtained, they stuck not at sacrificing to the king's and his ministers resentment, the first lords in the kingdom. Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, was ban-ish'd, and his estate confiscated: the earl of Warwick sentenced to perpetual exile in the Isle of Man. This parliament, so agreeable to Richard's mind, was adjourn'd to Shrewsbury, though in those days the parliament usually sat but one session. Here they establish'd such maxims as were destructive to liberty and the constitution. They approv'd the opinion for which Tresilian and other judges had been condemn'd. Accordingly the judges, who attend'd during the session, decid'd, " That when the king propos'd any affair in parliament, it was high treason to go upon any other business before the king's was dispatch'd." Thus this scandalous parliament, by humouring the king in every thing, was only hastening his ruin.
 So many great men being either dead or ban-ish'd, and the parliament having given their sanction to his arbitrary power, Richard now thought himself above all restraint, and mind'd nothing but his ease and pleasure; whilst his ministers, wholly intent upon their own private advantage, let the affairs of the nation go to wreck. To shew what lengths the king and his ministers went to raise money, 17 counties were condemn'd of treason for taking arms under the late duke of Gloucester, notwithstanding the general pardon, and to save their estates, were forced to give blank bonds to be fill'd up with what sum the king pleas'd; and every one bound himself under great penalties, by what was insert'd in these bonds, to stand by the statutes of the Shrewsbury parliament. Such tyrannical proceedings could not fail of making the nation very uneasy.
 And in the midst of the general discontent, a rebellion happening in Ireland, the infatuated king went over in person with his troops to quell it. He was no sooner gone, but a conspiracy began to be form'd in England, to deprive him of his crown. The malecontents, after several consultations, resolv'd to call in the duke of Hereford, or Lancaster, who was now in France; and to that end wrote to the archbishop of Canterbury, who was also there, to communicate their design to him, promising to assist him to the utmost of their power. The duke laying hold of this opportunity to try his fortune, got a few ships of the duke of Bretagne, and embarking with the archbishop of Canterbury, and a small number of men, set sail, and hovered some time about the coast of England, to see if the people would declare for him. As soon as it was known that he was on the coast, they began to take arms in several places. Upon this the duke landed in July, 1399, near Ravenspur in Yorkshire, where he was presently joined by the earl of Northumberland, and Henry Percy his son, with some troops; and the people flocked to him so from all parts, that in a few days he saw himself at the head of 60,000 men. The duke of York, whom the king had left regent, a man not much disposed for action, and the rest of the council hereupon left London, and repaired to St. Alban, which they had no sooner done, but the city declared for the duke. Soon after, the earl of Wiltshire, and the rest of Richard's ministers, thinking themselves not safe where they were, left the duke of York, and retired to Bristol-Castle; and the duke finding it impossible to stem the torrent, withdrew to his own house. The duke of Lancaster first marched to London, where the citizens received him with the greatest demonstrations of joy and affection, as their saviour and deliverer. He then proceeded directly for Bristol, and laying siege to the castle, where the ministers were retired, became master of it in four days; when he caused the earl of Wiltshire, and some others of Richard's counsellors, to be beheaded, to satisfy the multitude, who were exceedingly enraged against them. And soon after the duke of York, his uncle, came in to him. Whilst these things were doing, the contrary winds hindered the king for some weeks from having any news from England. At last, when he was informed of the duke his cousin's descent, instead of coming over himself with his forces, he sent the earl of Salisbury before him to levy troops; which he did in Wales and Cheshire, to the number of 40,000. But having continued in arms for some time, and the king not appearing, they dispersed, and returned home. Soon after the king arrived, and when he found how matters stood, and that all the nobility and people had declared against him, he was in the utmost consternation, and knew not which way to turn himself. At last he withdrew privately from his army, and went and shut himself up in Conway-Castle, in Wales. The duke of Lancaster being marched to Chester, Richard, in the extremity he was in, thought it best to throw himself upon his enemy's generosity, and even offered to resign his crown, provided he would spare his life, and allow him an honourable pension; and then went and conferred with the duke at Flint. From hence they set out both for London, where Richard was presently conducted to the Tower; and the duke having caused him to call a parliament, the day before it met, he repaired to the Tower, with a great many lords, and there Richard delivered up the crown and scepter, and signed an instrument, confessing himself unworthy and unfit to govern the kingdom any longer; which instrument of resignation was the next day approved of in parliament. They then drew up several articles of accusation against him, upon which he was solemnly deposed, much in the same manner as Edward II. had been. The throne being thus vacant, the duke of Lancaster, as had been agreed, rose up, and claimed the crown; and it was unanimously resolved, Sept. 30, 1399, that he should be proclaimed king of England and France, and lord of Ireland; which was done accordingly the same day. Thus ended the unhappy reign of Richard, in its 29d year. He seemed to be a prince of generous inclinations in his younger years, but afterwards being corrupted by flattery, grew excessively full of himself; most profusely expensive in pomp, and diversions; assuming, arbitrary, cruel, and inflexible; which losing him the affection of his subjects, in the end, by a sudden and surprizing revolution, lost him his crown. He had no issue by either of his two marriages. See HENRY IV. for the account of his death.

RICHARD III. (surnamed Crook-back, duke of Gloucester) was proclaimed king on the 20th of June, 1483, by the name of Richard III. and was solemnly crowned, together with his queen, on the 6th of the following month. In the mean time, he appointed the lord John Howard earl marshal, and created him duke of Norfolk; his son Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, William Berkley, earl of Nottingham, and the lord Lovel, one of his chief confidants, viz. Lovel, on whom he likewise conferred the office of chamberlain. He also released from confinement, the archbishop of York, and the lord Stanley; and taking doctor More, bishop of Ely, out of the Tower, committed him to the custody of the duke of Buckingham, who sent him to Brecknock-castle in Wales. Richard enjoyed the crown, which he had obtained by such unjust and cruel methods, but two years and two months; which whole time was spent by him in contriving methods to support himself on the throne, and by his enemies, in plots and conspiracies to pull him down; in which they at last succeeded, and at the same time deprived him both of his crown and life. As he could not think himself safe whilst his two nephews, the young king, and his brother the duke of York, were yet living, he resolved on the wicked expedient of dispatching them out of the way; which was accordingly done soon after his coronation. The two innocent children were still in the Tower, the government of which he had given to sir Robert Brakenbury, one of his creatures. He chose a be absent from London whilst the hellish design was executed, that he might be the less suspected; and so set out with the duke of Buckingham to visit several counties. Being come to Gloucester, he sent express orders to Brackenbury, to put the two young princes to death. Brackenbury, more conscientious than Richard imagined, humbly desired to be excused. Upon which he sent him a written order, by sir James Tyrrel, requiring him to deliver up to the said Tyrrel, the keys and government of the Tower for one night only. Brackenbury obeyed; and Tyrrel brought in two ruffians, Miles Forest, and John Dighton, whom he had hired to perpetrate the horrid fact. In the dead of the night, when the princes were asleep, they entered the chamber, and rushing upon them, stifled them both in their bed, and then buried them under a little stair-case. This Tyrrel confessed, who was executed in the next reign. In 1674, some bones were found there, supposed to be theirs, which Charles II. caused to be put in a marble urn, and removed to Westminster-Abbey. From Gloucester king Richard set out for the north, to quell some disorders in those parts; and coming to York, was crowned there a second time, in the beginning of Sept. At the same time, he created Edward his son, prince of Wales, who was then ten years old. Having got rid of his nephews, and taken measures for renewing the foreign alliances, and endeavoured to make those his friends whom he most suspected, by giving them considerable posts and employments, particularly the office of lord steward of the household to the lord Stanley (who had married Margaret, countess of Richmond, mother of the earl, who was still in Bretagne). Richard now thought himself very secure: but at this very time a conspiracy was forming, which, tho' it proved unsuccessful at first, in the end completed his ruin. The duke of Buckingham, who had been the chief instrument in placing Richard on the throne, was at the head of this conspiracy. He thought himself neglected by Richard, or, at least, not rewarded in proportion to the service he had done him. It is said, the king had broke his sword with him, with regard to some lands he had promised to give him. However, he retired from court, exceedingly disgusted, meditating nothing but revenge, and soon began to concert measures with Morton, bishop of Ely, his prisoner in Wales, how to dethrone the usurper, whom he had lately set up. After several conferences, and thoroughly understanding one another, the scheme they fixed upon was to set Henry earl of Richmond on the throne. In this project they were sure of having all the friends of the house of Lancaster on their side, Henry being the only relic of that family. And in order to engage the Yorkists, it was thought necessary, that Henry should promise to marry the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV. Matters being thus concerted, the first step that was taken, by a trusty messenger, to acquaint the countess of Richmond with their design; who came heartily into it, and found means privately to impart it to the queen dowager, in her sanctuary, who readily gave her consent, that Henry should marry her daughter. This done, they each of them engaged their most faithful friends in the plot, and these drew in others; which indeed was no hard matter, as the usurper was universally hated by the nation. The countess then sent two trusty persons into Bretagne, to inform the earl her son of what was doing in his favour, and to invite him over. His condition there seemed not very promising for such an undertaking. But upon the duke of Bretagne's promising to assist him, he sent word to the countess his mother, that he should be ready to come over in October. Though the conspirators took all imaginable care to conceal themselves, yet Richard had some confused intimations of a plot; and beginning to suspect the duke of Buckingham, ordered him to court; but he peremptorily refused to come, declared against the king, and took up arms, drawing together the forces, he and his adherents had privately lifted in Wales, and marched towards the western counties, in order to join his friends who were ready to rise there, and where the earl of Richmond designed to land. But the duke being stopped in his passage by a dreadful inundation of the Severn, which lasted six days, his whole army dispersed, and he being left with only one servant, went and concealed himself in the house of one Banister, to whom both he and his father had been great benefactors. Nevertheless, upon Richard's publishing a proclamation, offering a very great reward for apprehending him, he was basely betrayed by Banister to the high sheriff of Shropshire, and soon after lost his head. About the same time the earl of Richmond appeared on the coast of England, and was like to have fallen into the hands of his enemies; but he luckily escaped, and sailed back to Normandy, and from thence to Bretagne, to wait for a more favourable opportunity. In the mean time, Richard proceeded with severity against the conspirators, putting many of them to death, and gave an extraordinary commission to Sir Ralph Ashton for that purpose. Among others, Sir William Collingburn, a Wiltshire gentleman, was hanged, drawn and quartered, for abetting the earl of Richmond's project, and for writing the following satirical rhyme on Richard, and three of his favourites:

The cat, the rat, and Lovel the dog,
Rule all England under a hog.

Alluding to Careaby, Ratcliff, and Lovel, who bore a dog for his arms, as one of Richard's supporters was a wild boar. But many, to escape the king's severity, fled into Bretagne, to the earl of Richmond; among whom was Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorset, son to king Edward's queen. The storm being thus in appearance blown over, king Richard thought fit to call a parliament; which meeting on January 23, 1484, and being wholly devoted to the king, made no scruple to declare the issue of Edward IV. illegitimate, to confirm Richard's irregular election, and recognize his pretended right to the crown. Then they passed an act of attainder against the earl of Richmond, and all his adherents. But it was very happy for his mother, the countess, that nobody discovered her having any hand in the plot. The earl of Richmond had many English lords now with him, who had escaped to Bretagne, after the late disappointment, and assured him, that the nation in general were his friends; and the duke of Bretagne promised to continue his assistance. But here he was soon in great danger. For the duke being grown old and infirm, his prime minister, Landais, one of a very mean extraction, now governed all in his name; and made himself so odious to the nobility, and all the people of Bretagne, that to support himself against them, he sought foreign assistance, and believed he had a good opportunity of receiving it from king Richard, on condition of delivering the earl of Richmond into his hands. Nothing could be more agreeable to Richard, and a negotiation was actually carried on between this hated king, and equally hated minister, for this purpose. In the mean time, the earl knew nothing of all this; but the bishop of Ely, who had made his escape, and though abroad, had good spies about Richard, advertised him of the danger he was in. Upon which, with great difficulty, he escaped in disguise from Bretagne, and repaired to the court of Charles VIII. king of France, who had succeeded his father, Lewis XI. The generous duke of Bretagne was angry with his minister for giving the earl any cause of uneasiness, and permitted all the English to follow him; and not long after, Landais, for all his insolent proceedings, met with his deserved reward on a gibbet. The earl was very civilly treated at the court of Charles VIII. who at length promised him some assistance, not so much out of regard to him, as to cause new troubles in England. Here also he had the satisfaction to see the earl of Oxford come to him, who had been imprisoned by Edward IV. in the castle of Hammes, in Picardy, but had now prevailed on the governor and garrison to declare for the earl of Richmond. Richard had intelligence, that something was also contriving against him in England, but could not discover by whom. After some time, he found out, that what was carrying on in favour of the earl, was chiefly grounded on his having promised to marry the princess Elizabeth. To prevent him therefore, he resolved to marry her himself. In order to this, by various plausible pretences, particularly by promising to secure the crown to the princess after his death, as the prince of Wales was now dead, and he had no other child, he so wrought on the queen dowager, that she delivered her five daughters into his hands. Then he took care to get rid of Anne, his queen, daughter of the great earl of Warwick, either by causing her to die with grief and vexation by his ill treatment, or by actually poisoning her. She would have been more pitied, if she had not married the murderer of her former husband, who was Edward, prince of Wales, son to Henry VI. Richard now made his address to the princess, his niece, but found her asolutely inflexible. In the mean time as he grew every day more odious, many lords and gentlemen went over to the earl of Richmond, and offered him their services; others did the same, to avoid being sacrificed to his insinuations; and those who staid at home, voted only for an opportunity to declare against him. All circumstances now concurring, the earl set sail from Harfleur on the 31st of July, with only 2000 men, which France had sent him, together with the ships to transport them. On the 6th of August he landed at Milford-Haven, and marching towards North-Wales, was joined by Rice ap Thomas, with a considerable body of Welch troops. As the earl was of Welch extraction, that country in general readily favoured his design. In a few days he arrived at Shrewsbury, where the noblemen presently received him, and Sir George Throth brought him an aid of 2000 men. The lord Stanley, and his brother, Sir William, raised forces, as it had been for the king, but had given private assurance to the earl that they would join him at a proper opportunity; which they did, after the two parties were engaged, and were by that means the chief cause of the earl's success. King Richard having heard of the earl's landing, ordered all his forces to be drawn together at Nottingham, resolving to go in person and fight him. And the earl being no less desirous to decide the quarrel with one blow, resolved to go and meet Richard. In his march he was joined by Sir William Hungerford, Sir Thomas Bouchier, and several others, who deserted the king. The two armies met near Bosworth in Leicestershire, and the battle was fought on the 22d of August. The earl of Richmond was at first in danger of being worsted, when the lord Stanley joining him with 5000 men, and he together with 2000, the king's army was entirely routed, after a fight of two hours, in which he gave signal proofs of his valour and courage. In the heat of the battle, espying the earl, he rode furiously to attack him, and killed Sir William Braddon, the earl's standard-bearer, who stood in his way, and threw Sir John Cheney to the ground, who had taken the banner's place. When he saw the day was lost, he rushed into the midst of his enemies, and was slain. It is very likely he was betrayed, and that some great men, who staid with him, held secret intelligence with the earl of Richmond. It is said, that on the very morning of the battle, before it began, the following lines were found fixed on the duke of Norfolk's tent door, who was slain fighting for Richard:

Jocky of Norfolk, be not fo bold;
For Dickon thy maſter is bought and fold.

Sir Richard Ratcliff was alſo ſlain; and the perfidious Cateby, being taken priſoner, was executed at Leiſceſter. Thus fell king Richard, aged about 34 years, who, exceſſing his unjuſtifiable methods to get and keep the crown, may be reckoned no bad king. He took care to ſuppreſs vice, and promote ſobriety and virtue, and had a great regard to the due adminiſtration of juſtice, except where his crown was concerned. Lord Verulaſh ſays, he was in military virtue approved, and a good law-maker. He founded the college of Heraldſ, and made them a corporation. He was certainly endowed with great parts and abilities, which would have made him a truly great man, if they had been rightly applied. His boundleſs ambition made him aſpire to the crown, and it was for the ſake of that only, that he was guilty of all that treachery, diſſimulation and cruelty, which juſtly renders his memory deteſted. His body was found ſtript naked, covered with blood and dirt, and in that condition was thrown croſs a horſe, with the head hanging on one ſide, and the legs on the other, and carried to Leiſceſter; where it was interred. He was the laſt king of the Plantagenet race, who had ſwayed the ſceptre ever ſince Henry II.

ROME, a famous city of Europe, founded 50 years before the birth of Christ. It was formerly three times as large as it is at present, and is now one of the largest and handsomest cities in Europe. It has 28 gates, 300 towers, 28 many churches, six bridges over the Tiber, and about 150,000 inhabitants. There are a great many monuments of the ancients; such as baths, obelisks, amphitheatres, cirques, columns, mausoleums, aqueducts, fountains, catacombs, pagan temples, and triumphal arches; besides a prodigious number of fine statues. The Pope has three superb palaces, namely, that of the Vatican; a summer-house on Mount Cavallo; and the third is the palace of the Lateran, near the church of St. John, where they crown the Popes. St. Peter's church is the largest in all Christendom; and is incrustated within and without with marble. It is 840 feet in length, 725 in breadth, 300 in height, and 2465 in circumference; 23 Popes have died since its foundation; and it has cost twenty-three millions of crowns. In the great square before this church is an obelisk of granite, 80 feet in height without the pedestal, which is 82 feet high. The library of the Vatican is the largest and most complete in the world. Rome is divided into fourteen wards called Rione; and the Castle of St. Angelo is sufficient to keep the whole city in awe. It is built near the river Tiber, is flanked with five bastions, and defended by a great number of cannon. There are a great number of magnificent palaces, the most remarkable of which are those of Farnese and Borghese. Rome is very well supplied with water by their magnificent aqueducts and fountains; and there is plenty of all sorts of provisions; with a great variety of wines; but a price is set upon every thing by the magistrates. It is seated on the river Tiber, which runs through a part of it, and it is 670 miles S. E. of Paris, 450 S. W. of Vienna, 900 S. RU'SSIA, [Russia] the empire of, is a large country, partly in Asia, and partly in Europe, bounded on the N. by the Frozen Sea; on the S. by Great Tartary, the Caspian Sea, and Persia; on the E. by the Sea of Japan, and on the W. by Poland and Sweden. This empire taken all together, that is, with the conquests lately made in Asia, may be likened to a square, whose sides are 2000 miles each. The seas of Russia are the Baltic, the White Sea, the Frozen Ocean, the Black Sea, and the Frontiers of Turkey, and the Caspian Sea. There are also five large rivers, namely, the Nieper, or Boristhenes, which runs between Lithuania and Poland; the Wolga, which runs through the middle of the country, and falls into the Caspian Sea; the Don, which after several turnings runs into little Tartary, and falls into the sea of Asof; the Dune, which running northward falls into the White Sea; and the Oby, which running N. falls into the Frozen Ocean. It may easily be conceived that a country of such vast extent must lie in different climates, and that the soil must be very different. The most fertile part is near the frontiers of Poland; inasmuch that the inhabitants are able to supply their neighbours with corn; the N. part is not only more cold, but more marshy, and over-run with forests, inhabited chiefly by wild beasts. Besides domestic animals, there are wild bees, rein deer, martens, white and black foxes, weasels, ermines, and sables, whose skins make the best furs in the world. In Russia there are also large quantities of cotton and silk, with which they make all sorts of stuffs; the other merchandizes are, skins, furs, Russia-leather, talc, tallow, hemp, Russia-cloth, honey, wax, and almost all the merchandizes of China, India, Persia, Turkey, and some European countries. The inhabitants in general are robust, well shaped, and of pretty good complexions; they are great eaters, and very fond of brandy. They were formerly the most ignorant, brutish people in the world; but they are making a rapid progress in every social and elegant improvement and refinement. Their religion is that of the Greeks, and they depended formerly on the Greek patriarch, who resided at Constantinople. The church is governed by a patriarch, and under him there are four metropolitans, and eight archbishops. The emperor or empress is an absolute and despotic prince, and all the subjects are reckoned slaves. The ordinary revenue of this vast empire is 20,000,000 of rubles, which is partly drawn from contributions, partly from duties on merchandizes, and partly from farms. The orders of knighthood are, that of St. Andrew, St. Catharine, and St. Alexander Newski, which are all of late institution. The punishment of their criminals is very barbarous, nor have they always the privilege of a fair trial, for they extort confessions by racks and tortures.

S Is the eighteenth letter, and fourteenth consonant of our alphabet. In the beginning of a word, s has invariably its natural and genuine sound; in the middle of it, it is sometimes uttered with a stronger impulse of the tongue to the palate, like z; as, rose, prose, rosy, easier, miser, nihil, residem, busy, busy, &c. In the end of monosyllables it sometimes sounds like s; as in this, thus, &c. and sometimes like z, as in as, bas, is, bis, &c. and generally where es stands in verbs for et, as gives. In some words it is silent, as in isle, wiscount, &c. At the end of words it is often doubled, whereby they become hard and harsh; as in brass, kiss, loss, mass, trepass, &c. In Writing or Printing, the long f is used at the beginning and middle of words, and the short s at the end. In Abbreviations, S stands for societas, or facius; as, R. R. S. for regiæ societatis facius, i. e. fellow of the royal society. In Medicinal Prescriptions, S. A. signifies secundum artem, i. e. according to the rules of art. Used as a numeral, S antiently denoted seven. In Books of Navigation, S stands for south; S. E. for south east; S. W. for south west, &c.

SA'DDUCEES, an heretical sect among the Jews, opposite both in principles and every thing else to the Pharisees. They were so called, say some, from SA'DOCK, the supposed founder of their sect, or, according to others, from Sadeck, a word signifying Justice. They held the most impious tenets in religion. They denied the resurrection of the dead, and even, like the Epicureans, a future state; affirming, as the others did, that the human soul perished with the body. They utterly denied the existence of angels, and of all spirits except of God. This dangerous and wicked heresy, as many learned men think, was occasioned by their wilfully mistaking the doctrine of their master Sochæus, who used to press upon his disciples the disinterested love of virtue, insisted, that men ought to serve God not, as mercenary slaves do their master, through fear, and for their own advantage, but for his own sake, and for pure love of virtue, without any expectation of reward. This doctrine, harmless in itself, led them to conclude, though falsely, that their master had absolutely denied any state of future rewards. In consequence of their other principles, they denied likewise the Providence of God, or that he concerned himself in any sense with the affairs of men. These atheistical principles rendered them justly odious to the people. How they could deny a divine providence is very unaccountable, since they received as inspired writings the Pentateuch or five books of Moses, which are one continued history of the exercise of such a divine interposition in the affairs of the world.

SCOTLAND, the kingdom of, is the N.
part of the island of Great Britain, which is now united to England, and both together make but one nation. It is bounded on all sides by the ocean, except the S. where it is separated from England by the river Tweed, towards the E. by Cheviot hills, and the river Esk, and Solway Frith towards the W.
It is generally reckoned 280 miles in length, from Aldermouth-head, near the life of Mull, to Buchanan's, and 190 in breadth, where it is broadest. Besides the main land, there are 300 islands belonging to Scotland, some of which are very considerable. These are called the Western islands, the Orkneys, and the Schetland isles. The air is generally wholesome, though colder than that of England; but it is purified by the winds, which are pretty strong and frequent. In the northern parts the days in summer are very long. The soil is different in different parts, there being many rich and fruitful plains, though what is called the Highlands is full of mountains and heaths. They do not want wheat, but the grain mostly cultivated is oats, as it will grow in the mountainous parts. The productions of Scotland are much the same as in England, though not in so great plenty. They have mines of several sorts, particularly of lead, with quarries of free-stone for building; so that the principal towns are constructed with nothing else. They have mines of very good coal, great quantities of which are brought to London, and is known by the name of Scotch coal. The established religion in Scotland is the Presbyterian; however, all others are tolerated, or at least connived at.

SOUTHAMPTON, a sea-port town of Hampshire, with three markets, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. It is commodiously seated on an arm of the sea; is a place of good trade and well inhabited by merchants and shopkeepers. It is a corporation and county of itself, with the title of an earldom, and sends two members to parliament. It is 75 miles W. S. W. of London.

SOUTHMOULTON, a town of Devonshire, with a market on Saturdays. It is a corporation, containing several inns, and manufactures of white serges and felts. It is 179½ miles W. by S. from London.

SOUTHPERTHINGTON, a town of Somersetshire, with a market on Tuesdays. It is 131½ miles from London.

SOUTHWARK, a town of Surry, part of which now belongs to the city of London, and the whole is reckoned a suburb thereto, though it sends two members to Parliament on its own account. The principal street runs from London-bridge to St. George's church; besides which there are three others, and two famous hospitals, namely, St. Thomas's and Guy's, which are seated in that part called the Borough. There are also two prisons for debt, the King's Bench and the Marshalsea, and one for criminals, called the New-Goal. The famous bridge which joins Southwark to London, is now greatly altered, the houses being taken down, which rendered the passage over it very precarious.

SOUTHWELL, a town in Nottinghamshire, with a market on Saturdays. It is an ancient place, and has a collegiate church, but is not very large. It is 136 miles N. W. by N. of London.

SOUTHWOULD, a sea-port town of Suffolk, with a market on Thursdays. It is commonly called Sowld, is a pretty well built place, is a corporation, has a handsome church with a high steeple, and some trade with small vessels. It is 103½ miles E. of London.

SPADE, f. [spad, Sax.] a broad shovel used in digging. A deer three years old. In Cards, wherein the four suits represent four states in a kingdom, the nobility were represented by the ends of lances or spikes. The Spaniards, however, represent them by the espadas, i. e. swords instead of spikes, and our ignorance of the design of the inventor, as well as of the Spanish language, has occasioned our representing the points of this suit broader, and calling them by the name of spades.

SPAD'LLÉ, f. [Fr.] at ombre and quadrille, the ace of spades.

SPA'GYRIST, f. [coined by Paracelsus, from spaber, Teut. a searcher] a chymist.

SPAIN, a considerable kingdom of Europe; bounded by the sea on the S. and N. on the W. by Portugal and the ocean; and on the N. E. by the Pyrenean mountains, which separate it from France. The air is generally hot, which obliges the inhabitants to lie down after dinner, and sit up late at night. It rains but very seldom, and sometimes there is no cloud to be seen for months together. There are a great number of mountains, which are distinguished in the maps by the name of Sierra, several of which are very high, and covered with snow; and yet the valleys are seldom rendered very cold thereby. No travellers can ride any great way without passing one of these mountains, and therefore the inhabitants make use of mules, as being surer footed. Some parts will not bear wheat, and in others, the inhabitants are too idle to till the ground; for which reason it is not very plentiful. The wines of Spain are generally very good, but they are mostly drank in other countries, for the Spaniards are not fond of tipling. The fruits are very fine; they have apples, pears, chestnuts, hazel-nuts, olives, figs, pomegranates, oranges, citrons, lemons, capers, and the like. They have salt enough for their own use, a few sugar canes, and some saffron. In some of the mountains are precious stones, marble, allum, sulphur, and other minerals; in Biscay particularly, the iron mines are inexhaustible. There are few wild beasts in the forests, except bears. They have great numbers of sheep, which yield the finest wool in Europe, and greatly valued in other countries. However, the Spaniards have not many woollen manufactures. The Spanish horses are very good, particularly those of Andalusia and Asturias. Also in Andalusia, there is a race of wild bulls. In Biscay, there are little hogs, which the ladies are so fond of, that they carry them about like lap-dogs. The principal rivers are the Tajo, the Douro, or Duero, the Guadiana, the Guadalquivir, and the Ebro; over which there are 700 bridges. The Spaniards are very moderate in their eating, and can make a meal of olives, a salad, a little garlick, or a few roots. They seldom invite their friends to dinner, and the women in general are very bad cooks. The men dine by themselves, and their wives and children eat together. The general vice of the nation is pride and haughtiness, and the very peasants keep genealogies of their families, like the Welsh; for this reason, they have gravity in their looks, and when they walk. This disposition renders them very indolent. The women are generally very clean, and very amorous; they have black eyes, flat bosoms, little feet, and wear long garments. When they make visits, they sit on carpets, in the manner of taylors, as well as at home; which custom they have derived from the Moors. They are greatly addicted to painting, and are kept very much at home, through the jealousy of their husbands. Neither men nor women often change the fashion of their garments, and the men generally wear their own hair, without powder, and long swords by their sides. With regard to their religion, they are the strictest Papists in the world, and yet their morals are not better than those of other nations. Spain is an absolute monarchy, and in Madrid there are several courts of justice, which determine all affairs that come before them; but they have each their distinct province, being eight in all. There is also a privy council, called the Junto, composed of the king's favourites. There are four viceroys in Spain; namely, those of Arragon, Navarre, Valencia, and Catalonia; for the other provinces have only governors. The king has also five viceroys, and 55 governors in America, who are changed every five years. The revenue of the king is almost immense, but there is no knowing exactly what it amounts to. With regard to the church, there are eight archbishoprics, and 44 bishoprics, who have all large revenues, and the king disposes of all ecclesiastical offices. The Inquisition was established in 1477, and there are now 14 tribunals, in as many different places. This Inquisition was first designed against the Moors; but is now extended to Jews and Heretics; though it is said there are still many of the former in high offices about the court, notwithstanding all their vigilance. Besides the king's territories in Europe, he possesses the best part of America, and is master of many rich islands in the S. Seas; and particularly the Philippines, from whence they import the rich merchandizes of the East Indies. He also possesses several places in Africa, particularly Ceuta and Oran. The present king of Spain is Charles IV. who is of the Bourbon family. The heir to the crown is always called Prince of Asturias.

 Amsterdam. The chief articles in his system are such as these; That there is but one substance in nature, and that this only substance is endued with an infinite variety of attributes, amongst which are extension and cogita-tion: that all the bodies in the universe are modifications of this substance, considered as extended; and that all the souls of men are modifications of the same substance, considered as cogitative; that God is a necessary and infinitely perfect Being, and is the cause of all things that exist, but not a different Being from them: that there is but one Being and one Nature, and that this Nature produces within itself, by an immanent act, all those which we call creatures; and that this Being is at the same time both agent and patient, efficient cause and subject, but that he produces nothing but modifications of himself.
 Thus is the Deity made the sole agent as well as patient in all evil, both physical and mor-

STEP, in Composition, signifies one related to another only by marriage; as from step, Sax. [stepan, Sax. to deprive, or make an orphan; hence we meet with the words step-daughter, or step-son, as well as step-mother; that is, a daughter or son that are orphans, or have lost their own mother; and a person who by marriage is the mother of another that was an orphan, or had lost a mother by death.

STEPHEN, earl of Bulloign, son to the earl of Blois, by Adela, the Conqueror's fourth daughter, though he had taken the oath of allegiance to Maud, daughter of Henry I. in case he died without issue male, found means to supplant her, and to get the crown placed upon his own head. As he lived with the king his uncle in England, his good qualities gained him his affection to a high degree; so that he took pleasure in heaping favours on him, never imagining, that he would attempt to set himself up in prejudice of his daughter. However, after prince William's death, Stephen, by the assistance of his brother Henry, bishop of Winchester, began to take measures to secure the crown to himself, but so secretly, that the king his uncle suspected nothing of the design. Being in Normandy with king Henry in his last illness, as soon as the king was dead, he came over himself to forward his project by his presence. The bishop of Winchester had already gained over the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of Salisbury; and these three prelates had influence enough over all the rest of the clergy to bring them to declare for Stephen. This did the business, and so much the easier, as Maud was out of the kingdom; and such of the barons as were not of Stephen's party, seeing the bent of the clergy, durst not oppose the design. And so Stephen was declared king, and crowned 24 days after Henry's death, being 31 years old, 1135; and the bishops and nobles did not stick to break the oath they had thrice taken to Maud. In order to gain this important point, Stephen had been obliged to promise great things to the clergy and people, and that he would grant them more privileges than ever they enjoyed under the Norman kings. And as he was not without his fears from Maud and Geoffrey her husband, to secure the affections of his subjects, he, soon after his coronation, convened a general assembly at Oxford, in which he signed a charter, acknowledging his being elected king by the clergy and people; confirming all the liberties, privileges, and immunities of the church, and consenting that all ecclesiastical causes and persons should be tried by the clergy; promising not to meddle in any manner with the temporalities of vacant bishoprics, or estates belonging to ecclesiastics; abolishing all the game laws enacted since the Conquest, and all the forest laws; and reviving the ancient Saxon laws. He moreover abolished Dane-gelt, which had been taken away by Edward the Confessor, but restored by the Norman kings. The king, to humour the barons, and thinking thereby to be the better secured from any attempts of the empress Maud, or any foreign invaders, permitted them to fortify their castles, and to build others upon their estates; so that in a little time there were above 1000. fortified castles in the kingdom. Stephen began his reign in peace; but the fair scene was soon changed to a most furious and bloody civil war, which overspread all parts of the nation, and continued almost through his whole reign. In 1137, the Welsh made an irruption on the frontiers, and carried off a considerable booty; and in a battle near Cardigan, the king's troops were beaten, and above 3000 slain on the spot. At the same time David, king of Scotland, invaded the northern counties of England, took Carlisle and Newcastle, and advanced as far as Durham. Stephen marched against him with a very numerous army; but this war was soon ended in a treaty of peace. It broke out again, indeed, more than once, the Scotch king taking advantage of the confusion in England to renew his incursion; but being defeated in a great battle by Thurstan, archbishop of York, and king Stephen, after having reduced his rebellious barons, marching into the North to chastise that monarch for his late insult, David, not caring to run the hazard of another battle, sued for peace; and Stephen thought fit to agree to it. Robert, earl of Gloucester, natural brother to the empress, was at the head of the discontented barons who revolted, because the king had not rewarded them as they thought they deserved for placing him on the throne. The earl thinking matters ripe, went over to acquaint the empress, and wrote an abusive letter to Stephen, upbraiding him for the breach of his oath to Maud, and for drawing him into the same crime. To this he added a manifesto, wherein he treated the king as an usurper, and declared war against him. Stephen, without returning him any answer, confiscated his estate. The empress's party gaining ground exceedingly, the earl of Gloucester came over, and got possession of Bristol, and the revolt of the barons was like to have been general; so that Maud was invited over, whom they promised to own as their sovereign. But Stephen supported himself with such undaunted courage and resolution, that he crushed this dangerous insurrection, for the present, and the earl of Gloucester had no other way to take but to go and press the empress to come over, in order to put new life into her party. The bishops knowing how much the king was obliged to them for his crown, extended their power to such a degree, amassed such immense wealth, and became so excessively proud and haughty, that the king grew jealous of them, and resolved, but impolitically considering his situation, to humble them, and took vigorous methods for that purpose, seizing the castles and treasure of several who had rendered themselves most obnoxious. This brought almost the whole clergy upon his back, and even his brother the bishop of Winchester turned against him, under pretence of standing up for the rights of the church. By this means a storm was raised, which with some intermission continued for several years. For the clergy's faction became so strong, that most of the lay lords came over to them, and the people generally every where deserted the king, and declared for the empress: so that none stuck to him but only a few of the barons, his foreign favourites, and his army of Flemings, Bretons, &c. which served him faithfully, though they were but ill paid. At this favourable juncture the empress Maud, with her brother the earl of Gloucester, came over in the year 1139, from which time a cruel civil war ensued. King Stephen, in the midst of all, behaved with the greatest resolution, intrepidity, firmness and constancy of mind, by which means he at last weathered the raging storm; but not without being first brought as low as it is possible to conceive a sovereign prince to be. For after several other sieges, in 1140, the earl of Gloucester came so suddenly upon him, as he was besieging Lincoln, that a battle could not be avoided. Both sides fought with equal bravery for some time, but at last the royal army was totally routed and put to flight. The king was left almost alone, and on foot, in the field of battle, and defended himself with amazing valour even to the last extremity. His battle-ax was broke by the force of his blows, and afterwards his sword, scarce any thing but the hilt remaining in his hand; when he was knocked down on his knees with a stone, and a knight ran in, seized him by the helmet, and presented his sword to his throat, threatening to kill him, if he would not surrender; which he still refused to do to any but the earl of Gloucester, who conducting him to the empress, he ordered him to be confined in Bristol castle, where, after he had been some time, he was even lain in irons. Never did any one bid fairer for the crown than the empress Maud did at this time. All England deserted the imprisoned king, except London and the county of Kent, where he had still some friends, by the means of the queen his spouse, Eustace his son, and William d'Ypres his favourite. The earl of Anjou at the same time got Normandy to acknowledge Maud for their sovereign. Thus Stephen's affairs seemed every where desperate; and the more so as the empress, by promising the bishop of Winchester, then legate, the disposal of all church preferments, had gained him over to her party, who a little before had turned against her, and espoused the interest of the king his brother. But now this treacherous prelate having called a council at Winchester, by his private intrigues with the clergy, got them to chuse Maud for their queen, and proceeded so far as to excommunicate all who adhered to the king. The Londoners at last giving way to the times, thought it expedient to declare for the empress, and preparations were even making for her coronation. But her haughty, imperious and disobliging temper, with which she treated persons of all ranks, soon undid all again. She refused the doners the only thing they petitioned for, which her father had promised, viz. to ve the laws of king Edward; which imic conduct drew upon her the ill-will of citizens. She even dishonoured the bishop Winchester, by haughtily denying his re- to confirm to his nephew Eustace the of earl of Mortague and Boulogne. The equence was, that he became her utter ny, and as he had set her up, resolved, to use his utmost efforts to pull her down. First by his emissaries got the Londoners to are against her, and even brought them a plot to seize her person, which she narly escaped, and leaving the city in a great ut, put herself at the head of her troops, led by the earl of Gloucester, and march- o Winchester, in order to seize the legate, in vain. He slept out at a gate on the r side of the town, and went and drew his ds together. The Kentish men having ed the Londoners, Stephen's queen, prince ace, and William d'Ypres headed them, marched with all expedition to Winte- r, where the empress had scarce time to into the castle. Here she was besieged, found means to march out with her troops, ch were closely pursued by the king's, list the rest of the army was advancing to ound them. In the pursuit, the earl of ucester, intent on saving the empress, himself taken prisoner, and conducted to hester. This procured king Stephen his ty; for Maud, who had a great affection the earl her brother, and could not well do out him, was obliged to exchange him for king. Soon after the legate called a coun- t Westminster, where he excommunicated Maud's adherents, as before he had those he king his brother. Thus Stephen re- ed his liberty, 1141. But the war be- n him and Maud continued for several s, during which the king's affairs visibly ed ground, and the empress's continually ed; till at last the brave earl of Glou- r being dead, she despairing of standing ground much longer, about the year 7 retired to Normandy, and left Stephen : more master of the whole kingdom. then endeavoured to secure the crown after death to his son Eustace, and even to get crowned before-hand, but did not suc- in the attempt. After the departure of d, king Stephen was contriving how to ir the mischiefs the kingdom had suffered so long a war. But he soon found his quality was not yet firmly established. For he was threatened with a new rival in ce Henry, the eldest son of Maud, who 16 years old, and of an active and enter- ing genius. Having prepared matters, he ed in England with a considerable body of es, in 1152, and was immediately joined several barons, who put into his hands go- sified castles. And now a second civil war, rious as the first, was like to break out, the two armies were just upon the point of engaging; when by the good offices of some of the nobility on each side in a conference between the king and Henry on the opposite banks of the river Thames, near Walling- ford, a truce was agreed upon; which being several times renewed, at last ended in a treaty of peace (which was facilitated by prince Eu- stace's death) by which Stephen was to enjoy the crown during life, and after his death Henry was to succeed him as his lawful heir. Soon after Stephen performed the ceremony of adopting the young prince. Thus peace was restored, to the universal joy of the nation, and Stephen again applied himself to repair the miseries the war had occasioned: but death put a stop to his generous designs, which took him out of the world eleven months after the treaty with Henry, viz. on Oct. 25, 1154, in the 50th year of his age, and 19th of his reign. He was buried in the abbey of Fever- sham, which he had founded, near Queen Maud his wife, only daughter and heir to the earl of Boulogne, and Eustace his son, who both died 1153. Stephen was a prince of great courage, fortitude, and activity; and might have reigned with the approbation of his people, had not he been harrassed by the efforts of a powerful competitor, which obliged him to take such measures for his safety as were in- consistent with the dictates of honour, which indeed his ambition prompted him to forego in his first endeavours to ascend the throne. His necessities afterwards compelled him to infringe the charter of privileges he granted at his accession; and he was intigated by his jealousy and resentment, to commit the most flagrant outrages against gratitude and sound policy. His vices as a king seem to have been the effects of the troubles in which he was in- volved; for, as a man, he was brave, open, and liberal, and, during the short calm that succeeded the tempests of his reign, he made a progress through the kingdom, published an edict to restrain all rapine and violence, and disbanded the foreign mercenaries who had preyed so long upon his people. But his character has been roughly handled, on ac- count of the little regard he expressed for the clergy, and his usurpation of the throne from the immediate heir of blood.

STUART, (ANNE.) See ANNE. Anne Stuart, Queen of Great Britain, was in her person of the middle size, well proportioned. Her hair was of a dark brown colour, her complexion ruddy, her features were regular, her countenance was rather round than oval, and her aspect more comely than majestic. Her voice was clear and melodious, and her reference engaging. Her capacity was naturally good, but not much cultivated by learning; nor did she exhibit any marks of extraordinary genius, or personal ambition. She was a pattern of conjugal affection and fidelity, a tender mother, a warm friend, an indulgent mistress, a munificent patron, a mild and merciful princess, during whose reign no subject's blood was shed for treason. She was zealously attached to the church of England, from conviction rather than from prepossession, unaffectedly pious, just, charitable, and compassionate. She felt a mother's fondness for her people, by whom she was universally beloved with a warmth of affection, which even the prejudice of party could not abate. In a word, if she were not the greatest, she was certainly one of the best and most unblemished sovereigns that ever sat upon the throne of England.

SWE'DEN, a large kingdom in the N. part of Europe; bounded on the N. by Danish Lapland, and the ocean; on the S. by the Baltic sea, and the Gulph of Finland; and on the W. by Norway, the Sound, and the Catagat; being about 800 miles in length, from N. to S. and 350 in breadth from E. to W. It is divided into Proper Sweden, Gothland, Northland, Finland, and Lapland. It was anciently called Scandinavia, or at least it is part of the country of that name. We may easily conceive that the climate is not every where the same; for on the side of Muscovy, the longest day is 18 hours, 30 minutes; but farther towards the N. and near the Pole, there is but one day and one night throughout the year. In the province in which Stockholm is seated, the spring and autumn is scarce to be perceived, for the winter continues 9 months, and the summer during the remaining three. In winter the cold is excessive, and in summer the heat is almost insupportable, the air being serene all that time. Notwithstanding this, the Swedes live a long while; and it is not uncommon to see ten people at the same table, whose ages make up 1000 years. Those places that are fit for cultivation have scarce a foot of good earth, for below it is all gravel; for which reason they till the ground with a single ox, and one servant may readily manage the plough. All their rocks are quite covered with flowers in the summer time, and their gardens have plenty of fruits. The trees are early in blossoming, because the soil is fat and sulphureous, which contributes greatly to the vegetation of plants; but yet the apples, pears, cherries, apricots, melons, and grapes, have not so good a taste as in the more southern countries. Their domestic animals are horses, cows, hogs, goats, and sheep. With regard to the wild beasts, there are bears, wolves, foxes, wild cats, and squirrels. There are also elks and rein deer. They have several sorts of fowls; and partridges, woodcocks, and falcons in great plenty. The silver mines are 200 yards in depth; and though they are rich, yet the people who work them have scarce wherewith to subsist, when the king's duties are paid. The mines of copper are exceeding good, and they get large quantities out of them every year, though not so much as formerly. Likewise the iron mines yield a great deal of iron, and they usually exchange them for the commodities of foreign countries. The merchandizes which the Swedes supply foreigners with are boards, gun-powder, leather, iron, copper, tallow, skins, pitch, rosin, masts, and all sorts of wooden utensils; and on the contrary, they are obliged to purchase salt, brandy, wine, linen-cloth, stuffs, tobacco, sugar, spice, and paper. The inhabitants are of a robust constitution, and able to sustain the hardest labour. They are much more polished than what they were; and have several public schools and colleges, where arts and sciences are taught. Their houses are generally of wood, and very little art in their construction. The roofs are covered with turf, on which their goats often feed. There is no country in the world where the women do so much work; for they till the ground, thrash the corn, and row the boats on the sea. The government of Sweden was always monarchical, and was formerly elective, but afterwards became hereditary; and by a most extraordinary revolution on Aug. 21, 1772, the present monarch, Gustavus III. who is descended from the house of Holstein Eutin, has rendered himself absolute. The Swedes profess the Evangelical religion, and will not tolerate any other in their kingdom. They have one archbishop, and seven bishops, besides six superintendants, and they must be all, as well as the inferior clergy, natives of the country.

SWITZERLAND, or SWISSERLAND, a large country of Europe; bounded on the E. by the Tyrol; on the W. by the Franche Comté; on the N. by Suintgaw, the Black Forest, and a part of Swabia; and on the S. by Savoy, the Milanese, and the provinces of Bergamasco and Bresciano. It is about 225 miles in length, and 83 in breadth, and separated from the adjacent countries by high mountains, most of which are covered with snow. There are a great number of lakes and rivers, and some very fertile plains, which plentifully afford the necessaries of life. Switzerland is divided into 13 cantons, without comprehending their allies, namely, Lucern, Uri, Switz, Underwald, Zug, Friburg, Soleure, which are Catholics. The Protestant cantons are Zurich, Bern, Basle, and Schaffhausen. Glaris and Appenzell contain both religions. All these cantons are so many republics; and it was the cantons of Switz, Uri, and Underwald, which begun to throw off the Austrian yoke in 1308. The mountains of Switzerland, commonly called the Alps, are a long chain of mountains, which begin at the Mediterranean Sea, and extend to the Adriatick; and if it were possible for a man to travel from one to the other, his journey would be about 500 miles. The principal lakes are those of Constance, Geneva, Lucern, Zurich, and Neuf Chatel. The most considerable rivers are the Rhine, the Rhonc, the Aar, the Rues, and the Inn. The principal riches of Switzerland consist of excellent pastures, in which they breed and fatten their cattle. The inhabitants are all strong robust men, for which reason they are generally chosen by several nations for the military service, and even the Pope has his Swiss guards. The women are tolerably terably handsome, have many good qualities, and are in general very industrious. The peasants retain their old manner of dress, and are content to live upon milk, butter, and beefe.

T Is the nineteenth letter and fifteenth consonant of our alphabet, the sound whereof is formed by a strong expulsion of the breath through the mouth, upon a sudden drawing back of the tongue from the forepart of the palate, with the lips at the same time open. Its proper sound is that in tin, tell, rot, put. When it comes before i, followed by a vowel, it is sounded like t, as in nation, mention, &c. except when preceded by s, as in Christian, question, &c. When b comes after it, it gives a two-fold sound; one clear and acute, as in thin, thief, &c. the other more obtuse and obscure, as in then, those, there, &c. Among the Antients, T. as a numeral stood for 160; and with a dash over it, thus, \overline{T} for 160,000. In Music, T stands for tutti, all together.

TA'KEN, participle passive of TAKE.

TALKING, f. seizure or distress.

TALC, f. [a pron. broad] in Natural History, is a class of fossil bodies, composed of broad, flat, and smooth laminæ or plates, laid evenly and regularly on one another; easily fissile, according to the size of these plates, but not at all so in any other direction; flexible and elastic; bright, shining, and transparent; not giving fire with steel, nor fermenting with acid menstrua, and sustaining the force of a violent fire without calcining.

TALE, f. [tale, Sax.] a story, generally applied to a short narrative of some trifling and fabulous circumstances; a narrative delivered by words; a number reckoned; a reckoning; an information or disclosure of any thing secret. SYNON. Tale, novel, romance, story, each imply a small history, or an entertaining relation of adventures. The first three are supposed to be fabulous, and made public; whereas the last may be either true, or feigned, and told either in print, or by word of mouth; but as they carry ideas peculiar to themselves, it is my business to point them out. By the word tale, then, is meant a short, but dressed-up narrative of some single adventure; novel signifies an amusing history, made up of many adventures, and carried on through one or more volumes. By romance is understood a collection of wild adventures, in love and war. Tales ought to be well related; novels, well invented; romances, well carried on; stories, well told.

TA'LE-BEARER, f. one who gives intelligence through officiousness or maliciousness.

TA'LENT, f. [talentum, Lat.] a weight, or sum of money differing in different nations and ages; a faculty, power, or gift of nature; quality or nature. SYNON. Talent and genius are both born with us, and are a happy disposition of nature by which we are qualified for some peculiar employment; but genius seems to be more internal, and possessed of the powers of invention; talent, more external, and capable of execution. Thus we have a genius for poetry and painting; but a talent for speaking and writing. Talents, considered as synonymous with qualities, differ from them in this; that qualities form the character of persons; talents are their ornaments. The former may be used either in a good or bad sense; but we cannot apply the latter in any other than a good one. Our qualities render us either beloved or despised. Our talents make our company coveted.

TALES, f. in Law, is a word used for a supply of men impanelled on a jury; or, upon appearance, being challenged for the plaintiff or defendant as not sufficient; in which case the judge grants a supply to be made, by the sheriff, of some persons present.

TRANSMUTABLE, a. [trans and mutatio, Lat.] capable of being changed from one name or substance to another.

TRANSMUTATION, [transmutatio] f. the act of changing one nature or substance to another. Nature, Sir Isaac Newton observes, seems delighted with transmutation. Gross bodies and light, he suspects, may be actually transmuted into each other; and that all bodies receive their active force from the particles of light which enter their composition. Earth, by heat, becomes fire; ice, by cold, is converted into earth again; wine bodies, by fermentation, are raised into various kinds of air; and that air, by fermentation, also, reverts into gross bodies. All bees, beasts, fishes, insects, plants, &c. with their various parts, grow and increase out of water, and aqueous and saline tinctures, and by putrefaction all of them return into water, or any aqueous liquor again. Farther, water exposed a while to the open air, puts on a tincture, which in process of time, has a sediment and a spirit, and, before putrefaction, yields nourishment both for animals and vegetables. In Alchemy, it denotes the art of changing or exalting imperfect metals into gold or silver.

The N. part comprehends Wallachia, Moldavia, Bessarabia, Croatia, Bosnia, Dalmatia, Servia, Bulgaria, and Romania, or Rumelia. The S. part contains ancient Greece, in which are seven large provinces, called Albania, Epirus, Macedonia, Janna, Livadia, the Morea, and the islands of the Archipelago. Turkey in Asia comprehends five large parts, namely, Anatolia, Georgia, Turcomania, Diarbeck, Arifstan, and Syria; some reckon Arabia and Armenia, but these parts have little dependence on the Grand Signior. In Africa they possess Egypt, and a small part of Abyssinia in Barbary; there are also other countries in Asia and Europe, which they are not masters of alone, but conjunctly with other princes, and Constantinople is the capital of all Turkey. The Grand Signior is absolute master of all the goods and possessions of his subjects, inasmuch as they are no better than slaves; but he seldom extends this power to those that live a private life. The Turks have always very numerous armies on foot, the chief of which are the Janissaries. The religion of the Turks has great affinity to that of the Jews; for they believe in one God, and that his great prophet is Mahomet, as the Jews affirmed Moses to be.

U Is the twentieth letter of the English Alphabet. The sound is short in burſt, cuſt, fun, run, cub. In some words, it is rather acute than long; as in brute, flute, acute, &c. It is generally long in polysyllables; as in union, usage, secure, curious, &c. but in some words it is obscure; as in nature, venture, &c.

V, the consonant, has its sound uniform, and is never acute. It is placed before all the vowels; as in vary, vernal, vice, vow, venture. Though the letters v and w had always two sounds, they had only the form of v till the beginning of the fourth century, when the other form was introduced, it being inconvenient to express two sounds by the same letter. The letters u and v seem to have a similar sound, but are widely different; as may be observed in the words knife and knives, life and lives, belief and believe, &c. In Numerals, V stands for five, and with a dash thus, V̄, for 5000.

VENICE, the republic of, a country of Italy, which comprehends fourteen provinces, namely, the Dogado, the Paduano, the Vicentine, the Veronese, the Bressiano, the Bergamasco, the Cremasco, the Polesinodi-Rovigo, the Marca-Trevigiana, the Feltrino, the Bellunese, the Cadorino, Friuli, and Istria. The government of the republic of Venice is aristocratick, for none can have any share in it but the nobles. It generally consists of 2500; and they are accounted great politicians, good negotiators, and secret even to a scruple. They also make a magnificent appearance, suitable to the dignity of their employment. The Doge is elected by a plurality of voices, and keeps his dignity for life, and they make use of gold and silver balls, which are put in a vessel, essel, and serve for balloting. The office of the Doge is to give audience to all ambassadors; to marry the Adriatic sea in the name of the republic; on Holy-Thurs'day; to preside in all assemblies of the state; to have an eye over all the members of the magistracy; and to nominate to all the benefices annexed to the church of St. Mark. On the other hand, he is to determine nothing without the consent of the council; he is not to open any letter addressed to the republic, or that comes from the republic; he is not to receive any present; he is not to leave the city without permission of the states; he is not to chuse an assistant; and he is never to resign his dignity. In short, he is a prisoner in the city, and out of it he is no more than a private person. As to religion, the Venetians are Roman Catholics, and yet they tolerate the Greeks, Turks, and Persians. The Protestants are not allowed the free exercise of their religion; but they are neither hated nor persecuted, as in other Popish countries. The head of the clergy is the Patriarch of Venice, who must be a noble Venetian, and is elected by the senate. In times of peace, the Venetians generally keep an army of 16,000 regular troops, and 10,000 militia. On the sea they have always a small fleet, composed of a few men of war, frigates, and galleys, which convoy the ships designed for the Levant, and cover the harbour of Corfu. There are also six galleys, with a few galliots or brigantines, to oppose the corsairs which cruise on their coasts. In the time of war they raise as many troops as they have occasion for, and are fond of taking Germans into their pay.

VENICE, a city of Italy, and one of the most rich, celebrated, and considerable places in the world, and the capital of a republic of the same name, in the Dogado, with a patriarchate, and an university. It stands on 72 little islands in the sea, according to common account. The houses are built upon piles, and properly speaking, there is no street in the city, for the houses are all erected on the sides of canals. There are above 500 bridges over these canals, the most famous of which is that called the Rialto. It is built about the middle of the great canal, which divides Venice into two parts. It is of white marble, and has but one arch, in which its principal beauty consists; and is 90 feet from one extremity to the other. There are in Venice 53 public squares, small and great; the principal of which is called St. Mark's place, and is the greatest ornament to the city. There are 150 palaces, the finest of which is that of the Doge, fronting St. Mark's place. Besides these large buildings, there are 115 towers, of surpassing height and structure; 64 marble statues, and 23 of bronze, all master-pieces of workmanship. The arsenal of Venice is the finest, and best furnished in Europe. In this city are 70 churches, 39 monasteries, 28 nunneries, and 17 hospitals. The cathedral church is that of St. Mark, in which they pretend to keep the body of St. Mark the Evangelist. It is gloomy within, but its walls are of marble, and the pillars of the front encrusted with jasper and porphyry. There is also a library, in which are a number of Greek manuscripts, but none of them above 500 years old. The number of the inhabitants are above 160,000; and they have a flourishing trade in silk manufactures, bone lace, all sorts of glasses and mirrors, which make their principal employments. The sons are generally of the same business as the father. It is 72 miles E. by N. of Mantua, 115 N. E. of Florence, 140 E. of Milan, 225 N. of Rome, and 300 N. by W. of Naples. Lon. 12. 25. E. lat. 45. 25. N.

UNITED PROVINCES OF THE NETHERLANDS, are seven in all; namely, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Guelderland, Friesland, Groningen, and Friesland. They no more than 150 miles in length, and 100 in breadth, and their situation is very indifferent; for the soil is marshy, and a great part covered with water and ice in the winter; in such, that in the spring they are forced to dig out the water to dry the land. The air is cold and unhealthy, on account of the exhalations. The water is generally bad, and fires are commonly made of peat, which is dug out of the spongy land. The numerous canals which are cut to drain the land, are very commodious for travelling from one place to another in boats; and in the winter they slide from one place to another with incredible swiftness, by means of skates, in which exercise the women are as skilful as the men.

The thickness of the air which is prejudicial to health, seems to contribute to fatten their cattle; and their milk, butter, and cheese, are excellent. The inhabitants are robust, laborious, patient, free, open, affable, and pleasant in conversation. They are all politicians, not excepting the women and servants: however, the boers, and especially the sailors, are very rude, clownish, and nasty. A Dutchman is naturally phlegmatic, and slow to anger; but when heated, is not easily appeased. The women are well made, handy, neat, even to an excess, but imperious, and jealous of their rights with regard to the management of affairs, inasmuch, that when a husband abuses his wife, they can easily bring him to reason by shutting him up in a house of correction.

The principal virtue of this nation is frugality; and they are contented with moderate meals at all times, and never make extravagant feasts.

Very often a biscuit, with a bit of butter, cheese, or a herring, and a glass of beer or brandy, suffices them for a repast. The United Provinces are an allied body, the foundation of whose union was laid in 1579. It is a free republic, that acknowledges no other sovereign but God. This independence was acknowledged by other nations at the treaty of Westphalia in 1648. Each of these seven provinces is a separate republic, who govern themselves by their own laws and customs, and the supreme government belongs to the seven provinces conjointly, and is administered by different councils. The chief of these is composed of their high mightinesses the States General, who are the deputies of each of these seven provinces, and who generally assemble at the Hague. It is lawful for each province to send one or more deputies, though they can give but one voice. This council does not always sit, and yet they change the president every week. The other councils are, the council of state, the board of accounts, the council of the grand admiralty, the council of Brabant, which assemble at the Hague, and the council of Flanders, which meet at Middleburg in Zealand. The highest office in this country is the stadtholder; for he is at the same time governor-general of the Seven United Provinces, captain-general, and grand-admiral. This high office has been made hereditary in the family of Nassau. The forces of the United Provinces, in times of peace, are about 35,000 men, for guards and garrisons, and for their men of war. In time of war they may be about 50,000; but if occasion requires, they can raise 80,000. With regard to sea affairs, they have very good mariners of their own.

In times of peace they usually had 30 men of war to serve as convoys, which were ready to raise their anchors at the first signal; but of late their naval force has been greatly neglected, and they have suffered their principal vessels almost to rot in their harbours. With regard regard to their merchant-ships, they have always great numbers, and are generally said to have had 25,000 large vessels, and 300,000 small ones of different kinds. The revenues of this republic are raised by taxes, duties, and excises, paid by all the inhabitants in general, inasmuch that there is not a dish of meat brought to the table, but what is said to be taxed ten times over. The duties upon merchandises bring in considerable sums; but these must be always in proportion to their trade. From these, and other resources, the Dutch are said to raise annually between two and 3,000,000. sterling in time of peace; and in the time of war they have generally a poll-tax, a land-tax, and hearth-money, which considerably increase the revenue. With regard to their religion, there is no sect in the world but what is tolerated, inasmuch that there are said to be 72 in all; however none but those of the established religion, which is the reformed, are permitted to be concerned in state affairs.

W.

W Is the twenty-first letter of our Alphabet, and is compounded, as its name implies, of two V's. The Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans had it not; it is peculiar to the northern nations, the Teutons, Saxons, Britons, &c. It is not used by the Italians, French, Spaniards, nor Portuguese, except in proper names, and other terms borrowed from languages in which it is originally used, and even then it is founded like single v. This letter is of an ambiguous nature, being a consonant at the beginning of words, and a vowel at the end. It may stand before all the vowels except u, as in wager, well, wife, worship; and follows the vowels a, e, o, and unites with them into a kind of double vowel, or diphthong, as in law, crew, cow, &c. It also goes before r, and follows f, and th, as in wrong, swift, thwart; it likewise goes before h, tho' in reality it is founded after it, as in nuby, wbere, wben, wbat, &c. In some words it is obscure, as in fl-w, shadow, widow; and in others it is silent, as in wrong, write, &c.

This country is for the most part mountainous, and yet its produce is sufficient for the maintenance of the inhabitants. It is the country where the ancient Britons fled, when the island was invaded by the victorious Saxons, who are now called Welch, and continue to preserve their own language. The western part is bounded by St. George's channel, and the Irish sea; on the S. by Bristol channel; on the N. by the Irish sea; and on the E. by the counties of Chester, Salop, Hereford, and Monmouth. It contains 751 parishes, and 58 market towns. The air is clear and sharp, but the cattle are small, and provisions in general good and cheap. Wales is particularly remarkable for guests, which naturally delight in hilly countries; and for fuel, they use wood, coals, and turf. They have several creeks and harbours for ships, but the most remarkable is Milford-Haven; because 1000 vessels may safely ride in it at a time. It is watered with many rivers, of which the principal are the Dee, Wye, Ust, Conway, Clwyde, and Towy. The principal towns must be sought for under the names of the counties.

WILL

WILL, f. [willā, Sax.] that active power which the mind has to order the consideration of any idea, or forbearing to consider it, determining it to do or forbear any action, or refer one before another; choice; command; inclination; desire; determination; discretion; disposition. An instrument by which a person disposes of his property after death. Compounded with good, it signifies favour, kindness, or right intention; but compounded with ill, malice.

WILL with a whip, or JACK with a antborn, a fiery meteor, or exhalation of a round gure, in bigness like the flame of a candle; sometimes broader, and like a bundle of twigs it on fire. They generally appear in summer, and at the beginning of autumn.

To WILL, v. a. [willan, Sax.] to bend our souls to the having or doing what appears to be good; to command in a positive manner; to direct; to order. It is commonly used as an auxiliary verb to express the future tense, and is distinguished from shall, which generally implies a command in the second or third persons, but will only foretells or hints that something is about to happen which depends on a person's free choice. Again, shall in the first person, simply expresses a future action or event, but will promises or threatens.

WILLI, and VI'LLI, in the composition of names, signifies many, and is borrowed from the Saxons. Thus, Willimus, William, from willi, many, and vubelm, a helmet, or defence for the head, signifies a protector, or defender of many.

WILLIAM I. (surnamed the Bastard, or the Conqueror) was the seventh duke of Normandy from Rollo the first duke, who made an attempt upon England in the reign of king Alfred. His father duke Robert, brother to duke Richard the third, was never married; but being charmed with the graceful mien of a young woman, named Arctota (whence it is said came the word barlot) skinner's daughter, as he saw her dancing with other country girls, he took her for his mistress, and by her had this William. Duke Robert, about seven years after, taking it in his head to go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, before his departure caused the states of Normandy to acknowledge his young son as his successor; and, dying in his journey, William accordingly succeeded him in 1035, being then about nine years of age. He met with a great deal of trouble during his minority, from several pretenders to the dukedom, as well as from the king of France, who wanted to get it into his own hands; but by his vigour and conduct, and the wisdom of those in the administration, he got the better of all his enemies, and established himself firmly in the possession of the sovereign authority. And, in all probability, he might have passed the rest of his days in peace, if his ambition had not put him upon making new acquisitions. His having taken the crown of England, it is very likely, was what brought him over hither to make a visit to king Edward, his cousin, who had no children, and who then, 'tis generally thought, promised him to make a will in his favour. However, from this time he began to look upon himself as having a claim, such as it was, to be Edward's successor; and seemed resolved, if all other methods failed, to accomplish his design by force of arms. How he did this, see the life of HAROLD, and his success in the memorable battle of Hastings, by which he in a manner did his business at once. The first thing he did after the battle of Hastings, was to lay siege to Dover, in order to secure his retreat in case of necessity, and to have a place from whence he might easily send for supplies from Normandy. The consternation it was in made it soon surrender; which having ordered to be more strongly fortified, and spent some days there to forward the work, he marched with his victorious army for London. In the mean time, the city of London was in the utmost confusion, some being for one thing, and some for another; nor could they by any means agree in their opinions. Among other projects, some were for placing Edgar Atheling on the throne, and the earls Edwin and Morcar, who had retired to London after the battle of Hastings, were at the head of this party. But all they could do, was to prevail on the citizens to shut up their gates against William, till they could fix on some resolution. The duke by this time was come to Southwark, and there encamped, and lay some days, expecting the voluntary submission of London; but, on the contrary, Edwin and Morcar took this opportunity to spirit up the citizens to make a sally upon the Normans; which they did, but it was easily repulsed. This made the duke sensible, it was necessary to take more rigorous methods; and, as a siege, which might have lasted a great while, would have been very inconvenient in his present circumstances, he resolved to lay hold of the consternation the city was then in to subdue them by terror rather than by force. To this end he posted himself at Wallingford, and sent out detachments to plunder the counties near London, to frighten the citizens, and to cut them off from provisions; and, at the same time, burnt Southwark to the ground. The two earls above-mentioned still laboured hard for Edgar, and the majority of the people were on their side; but their measures were broken by the clergy then in London, and the two archbishops at their head, who were for submitting to the duke, and had formed a strong party among the citizens for that purpose: so that Edwin and Morcar, finding they could not prevail, retired into the North; and immediately after, the two arch-bishops, with the bishop of Winchester, and Edgar himself, went over to the duke, who was then at Berkhamstead; and their example was soon followed by a great many persons persons of distinction. But the Londoners being still unresolved, the duke drew nearer the city, as if with a design to besiege it: upon which the magistrates, despairing of being able to defend it in the midst of the present confusion, went out and met him, and presented him with the keys of the gates. And then, after holding a consultation with the prelates and nobles, who had before submitted, they waited on him in a body, and made him an offer of the crown. After an affected hesitation he accepted the crown as their gift. William was crowned at London on Christmas-day, having first caused a fort to be built, which he garrisoned with Normans, because he still suspected the citizens. He then solemnly swore, "To protect the church and its ministers, to govern the nation with equity, to enact just laws, and cause them to be duly observed, and to forbid all rapines and unjust judgments." What was most surprizing, and saved William much trouble, which in all appearance he had still to go through, was, that as soon as it was known that he had been crowned at London, he was immediately, without any opposition, acknowledged king throughout the whole nation. William, a few days after his coronation, returned from London to Barking, where multitudes came and submitted to him, and among the rest Edwin and Morcar. He received them in the most favourable manner, assured them of his protection, and in their presence gave prince Edgar large possessions, who was so beloved by the English, that he was generally called England's Darling. Soon after he laid the foundation of a church and monastery in the place where Harold was slain, and ordered that the monastery, when finished, should be called Battle-abbey. In the beginning of his government, he used great moderation towards the English, and expressed a tender regard for them; and the three first months of his reign passed to their great satisfaction. But this short time of tranquillity and mutual confidence was followed by jealousy, mistrust, and severity on the king's side, and frequent revolts and commotions on the people's; in which, whether the king was most to blame or the people, cannot easily be determined, by reason of the partiality of writers on each side, according as they stood affected. This, however, is certain, that the English were ill treated by this king, that he shewed great partiality to the Normans, and ruled the natives with a despotic sway, exercising many acts of severity upon them, and treating them, to all intents and purposes, as a conquered people. It is certain also, that there were many revolts, and attempts to shake off the Norman yoke; but they all proved ineffectual, and served only for a handle to yet greater acts of severity. The beginning of the year-1067 king William, without any other visible reason than to display his new grandeur among his old subjects, went over to Normandy, taking with him such English lords as he most suspected, to prevent any thing being done to his prejudice in his absence; he which reason also he placed strong garrisons of Normans in all the castles. His brother Odo, bishop of Bayeux, and William Fitz-Osborn, were intrusted with the government of the kingdom; and these sticking at no methods to enrich themselves, exceedingly oppressed the English. The Kentish men at this time attempted to recover their liberty, and called to their assistance Eustace earl of Bologna, who failing in his project of surprizing Dover Castle, retired to his ships, and left the Kentish men to the mercy of the regents. Edric Forester, an English lord, also took up arms in Herefordshire, and cruelly treated all the Normans that fell into his hands. This hindered the king's return to England, who, instead of punishing the regents, approved of their conduct, to the no small discontent and mortification of the English. In 1068, he renewed the tax formerly called Danegeld, which was levied upon the poor English with all imaginable rigour. And now insurrections and revolts followed in abundance. The inhabitants of Exeter refusing to take the oath to the king, and to admit a Norman garrison, William was preparing to besiege it in person; and the citizens had no other course to take but to implure his mercy. At the earnest intreatie of the clergy he pardoned them, how much severer in his own mind he was against it: and to keep them in order for the future, he caused a castle to be built in the city, and garrisoned with Normans. The king sent commissioners in all parts, to enquire who had sided with Harold, and to confiscate their estates. Edwin and Morcar, provoked at this treatment of the English, revolted, and having raised an army, were reinforced by Blethwin, king of Wales, with a good number of troops. But the king marching with all expedition against them, with a great superiority of forces, broke their measures; upon which the two first submitted, and were pardoned. But the third of seeming clemency to the leaders in the rebellion lost all its effect, by his severely punishing others who were less guilty: nay, he caused several who had no hand in the revolt to be shut up in prison; which spread a terror through the nation; as did also his building castles in divers places, which, it was easy to perceive, were designed to over-awe the English. There were, indeed, as may be well supposed, great animosities between them and the Normans; the latter behaving towards the English much as the Danes formerly did, and being countenanced in their insults by the king, whilst the complaints of the English were not at all regarded. The consequence was, that many murders were committed on both sides, and an edict was published purely in favour of the Normans. Morcar and several other, mistrusting the sincerity of the king's behaviour towards them, retired into Scotland, and prevailed upon prince Edgar to go along with them, with his mother and sisters. Thus of Scotland received them with all due respect, and married Margaret, Edgar's eldest sister, from whom descended Matilda, grandmother of king Henry II. in whom the royal families of the Saxons and Normans were united. Though king William was pleased at these lands leaving the kingdom, where they had so great an influence, yet perceiving hereby how the English stood affected, he proceeded to greater acts of severity, resolving by humbling them to secure himself from their resentment. With this view, it is said, he forbade them to have any lights in their houses after eight o'clock at night, ordering a bell to be rung at that hour, which was called the Curfew, from couvre feu, i. e. cover fire; at the sound of which they were obliged, under severe penalties, to put out their fires and candles. It must be owned indeed, that this affair of the Curfew is not supported by any competent authority. But this is certain, that after the Northumberland malecontents had called in the Danes, whose general, Osborn, the king of Denmark's brother, king William bribed by large presents to go off, he shewed no mercy towards the English; but after having, for a terror to the rest, ravaged the whole country between York and Durham, so as not to leave a house standing, he removed all the English from their posts, took away their estates, seized upon all the fiefs of the crown, and gave them to the Normans, from whom are descended many of the great families at this day in England. The clergy expected great things from the king, and therefore were the most forward to submit to him, after the battle of Hastings; but they were disappointed; for William now put the church-lands upon the same footing with the rest, obliging them to furnish a certain number of men for his wars, though by the charters of the Saxons they were exempted from all military service. He quartered his troops upon the monasteries, and obliged the monks to supply them with necessaries. He moreover seized upon the money and plate in the religious houses, under pretence that the rebels had concealed their valuable effects there; and deposed several bishops and abbots that he did not like, putting Normans or other foreigners in their room. In 1071, a great number of malecontents betook themselves to the isle of Ely, strongly fortified it, and chose Hereward, one of the bravest soldiers in the kingdom, for their leader. The king was very much alarmed at this proceeding, and marching in all haste, blocked the rebels up in the isle. They were so well fortified that he could not come at them, and had to good a store of provisions, that a long time would be required to starve them out. And so having continued the siege, or blockade, for a great while to no purpose, he bethought himself of an expedient, which did his business effectually; which was to seize on the manors belonging to the monastery, which were without the limits of the isle. Upon this the abbot and monks, in order to recover their possessions, delivered up the isle, and all that were in it, into the hands of the king. Hereward alone escaped; as to the rest, some had their eyes put out, or their hands cut off, and others were thrown into different prisons; among the rest Egelrick, bishop of Durham, who had been so bold as to excommunicate the king, was starved to death in prison. The king of Scotland had taken the opportunity of the troubles in England, to invade the northern counties, which he ravaged in a cruel manner. But as soon as the affair of Ely was over, king William marched against him. The Scotch king hereupon retired into Scotland, but William followed him thither. He not being willing to hazard a battle in his own country, offered to accommodate matters by a treaty; which William agreed to, and obliged the Scotch king to do him homage. In 1073, Philip king of France being jealous of the greatness of king William, on a sudden invaded Normandy without any declaration of war; upon which William went over with a great army, with which he retook Mans and the whole province of Maine; and Philip soon growing weary of the war, concluded a peace with king William. Prince Edgar, about this time, came to the king out of Scotland, implored his pardon, and submitted. The king received him very graciously, and gave him an allowance of a pound of silver a day. From this time he continued in obedience, and gave the king no farther disturbance. During the king's absence, some disgusted Norman lords formed a conspiracy to depose him, and prevent his return, and drew earl Waltheof, the only English lord the king retained in his favour, into the plot. But he soon repenting, went over and discovered it to the king before it came to any head, imploring at the same time his pardon, which the king readily granted. Notwithstanding which, soon after his return, the earl was apprehended, beheaded, and buried under the scaffold. And many of the innocent English, who were not at all concerned in the conspiracy, were severely punished, as well as the guilty Normans. King William now enjoyed some tranquillity, but in the year 1077 more work was cut out for him abroad. For his eldest son Robert, instigated by the king of France, rebelled against him in Normandy, and endeavoured to make himself master of that duchy. William went over, and his son persisted in his opposition, and in the heat of an engagement wounded him in the arm without knowing him, and dismounted him. But when he knew it was his father, he alighted, set him upon his own horse, and submitted entirely to his mercy. William brought him with him into England, and in the year 1080, sent him against the Scots, who had renewed their incursions. But this war also ended in a treaty between the two nations, and there was nothing remarkable in this expedition but Robert's founding the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; about which time

also king William built the famous Tower of London, to be a check upon the citizens, whom he all along suspected. Let us now see, in few words, how William managed his domestic affairs in time of peace. He did all he could to introduce the Norman language into England, caused the Saxon laws to be translated into Norman, and published his own laws in that tongue, and commanded it to be taught in all schools. The effect was, that in common use, a third language was by degrees introduced, which was neither English nor Norman, but a mixture of both. He erected new courts of justice, before unknown to the English, and very incommodious to them, and ordered all law proceedings there to be in the Norman tongue. He had an immense revenue; and that he might know what every man was to pay him out of his estate and effects, he ordered a general survey to be made, not only of his own lands, but of all the lands in England; as also what every man was worth in money, stock of cattle, &c. all which were set down in a book called Doom's-day Book, which to this day is preserved in the Exchequer. As he was very fond of hunting, he despoiled the country in Hampshire for above thirty miles in compass, demolishing both churches and houses, to make a forest for his diversion, which was called New-Forest. In short, all his actions favoured of a most arbitrary and absolute prince. William having enjoyed a tranquility of several years, every one thought he would have ended his days in peace. But all on a sudden he makes vast preparations, goes over to Normandy, and enters upon a fierce war against France. A truce soon ensued, which was broke by an unlucky jest of king Philip. William being grown very fat and unwieldy; was passing through a course of physic, when one coming to Philip from Roan, he asked him, "Whether the king of England was delivered yet of his great belly?" William being told of this, was so enraged, that he sent him word, that as soon as he was up, he would offer in the church of Notre Dame at Paris, ten thousand lances by way of wax-lights. Accordingly he renewed the war with the utmost fury, but it occasioned his death. For having made great ravages, and besieged and took Mantes, he ordered it to be burnt to the ground; and in his return to Roan, having bruised the rim of his belly against his saddle, he fell into a fever, which carried him off on the 9th of September, 1087, in the sixty-first year of his age, after having reigned in Normandy fifty-two years, and twenty-one in England. He was buried in the Abbey Church at Caen, which he himself had founded. It is remarkable, that his death was no sooner known, than his son Henry snatched his legacy out of the Treasury; the noblemen returned to their castles; and the domestics having robbed the household, run away. William's courage and policy, are not to be questioned, and it is certain, he was indefatigable in executing whatever he designed. When he lay on his death-bed, he seemed to reflect seriously on his past actions, and to view them in a different light from what he had done in the time of his health and vigour. He ordered great sums of money to be given to the poor, and to the churches, particularly for rebuilding those he had burnt at Mantes. Then ordering his chief officers to stand about his bed, he made a long harangue to them, weak as he was, wherein he talked much of the reputation he had acquired by his military achievements. Yet he could not help owning, he had unjustly usurped the crown of England, and was guilty of all the blood spilt on that occasion. And though he said he durst not bequeath a crown which of right was none of his, but left it to the disposal of God; yet he recommended William, his second surviving son, for his successor, and did all in his power to secure the crown to him. He had three other sons besides William, by his wife Matilda, daughter to the earl of Flanders. To Robert the eldest he gave the duchy of Normandy. Richard was killed by a stag in New Forest. To his youngest son Henry he bequeathed an annuity of 5000 marks. He had also six daughters by the same Matilda; Cecily, abbess of Caen; Constance, married to the duke of Brittain; Adeliza, promised to Harold when he was in Normandy, died young; Adela, married to the earl of Blois; Gundred, to William Warren, earl of Surry; and Agatha, espoused to Alphonso, King of Galicia. From the transactions of William's reign, he appears to have been a prince of great courage, capacity, and ambition; politic, cruel, vindictive, and rapacious; stern and haughty in his deportment; reserved and jealous in his disposition. He was fond of glory, and though parsimonious in his household, delighted in pomp and ostentation. Though sudden and impetuous in his enterprises, he was cool, deliberate, and indefatigable in times of danger and difficulty. His aspect was nobly severe and imperious, his stature tall and portly, his constitution robust, and the composition of his bones and muscles so strong, there was hardly a man of that age, who could bend his bow, or handle his arms.

WILLIAM II. surnamed Rufus, during his father's last illness in Normandy, was concerting measures in England to secure his succession to the crown. Though it was the Conqueror's desire that he should succeed him, yet there was great danger of a party being formed against him in favour of his elder brother Robert. But as Robert was out of the kingdom, William with the more ease accomplished his designs; and by the management of Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, who had great interest among the people, both English and Normans, and had gained over the leading lords of both nations, and by the favour of Eudo the high treasurer, he ascended the throne, and was crowned 18 days after his father's death, Sept.

pt. 27, 1087. He was surnamed Rufus, on his being red haired, and was now thirty years old. He was remarkable for no good quality but his courage, which, however, for the most part, was more like the fierceness of a wild beast than the bravery of a hero. He was very ill-natured, and a perfect brute in his behaviour; was wholly indifferent as to religion, and had no regard for honour or honesty. He was greedy of money, but it was as to squander it a way upon idle expences. To a fine, he had all his father's vices without its virtues, and historians agree in representing him as bad a prince as ever sat on the English throne. These historians were indeed monks and ecclesiastics, who might be prejudiced against him for his seizing the revenues of the church. However, as scarcely any action of his life deserves commendation, their representations seem to be but too well founded. In 1088, a formidable conspiracy was set up against him by his uncle Odo, bishop of Bayeux. The design was to depose William, and set Robert on the throne. Several Norman lords and bishops joining in the plot, and many of the English also being prevailed on to favour it, when they thought matters were ripe, they invited Robert to come over, who promised soon to be with them. The conspirators then fortified themselves in several places, and William seemed to be in a most dangerous situation. But Robert's insolence and dilatory temper, who did not come over with his forces as was expected, gave him time to extricate himself out of this danger. He first gained over the English, then he fitted out a fleet, and marched against Odo and the other rebels with an army of Englishmen, took Pevensey, Rochester, and Durham, and the other places where they had shut themselves up, broke all their measures, and entirely dispelled the threatening storm. Though William was indebted to the English for having by their means crushed the conspiracy, and though he had made them many fair promises, yet it was no sooner over, but he began to oppress them even worse than his father had done. William seized upon the vacant benefices, and after he had stripped them of every thing he could turn into money, he sold them to the highest bidder. He seized upon the temporalities of the see of Canterbury, and kept them in his hands four years, and did the same by all the other bishoprics that became vacant in his reign. Soon after, William, to be revenged on his brother Robert for the late conspiracy, and perhaps from a desire of enjoying all his father's dominions, invaded Normandy, and made himself master of several places. Robert implored aid of the king of France, who came to his assistance; but William having found means to bribe him, he retired without doing any thing, and William proceeded to take more places, and bribed some of the burghers of Roan to undertake the delivering it into his hands. But prince Henry joining his brother Robert, saved it; for entering the city on a sudden, he seized the chief of the conspirators, and threw him headlong from a tower; which bold stroke not only preserved the capital, but in effect all Normandy. William soon after, in 1091, was obliged to strike up a peace with duke Robert on this condition, among others, That upon either of the brothers dying without heirs, the survivor should succeed to all his dominions: Whilst William was in Normandy, Malcolm, king of Scotland, made an incursion into Northumberland, and William at his return resolved to revenge this insult. He artfully induced his brother Robert to come over and accompany him in this expedition, fearing he should in his absence seize on those castles in Normandy, that he held by the late treaty: His army suffered greatly by several disasters in Scotland; but Malcolm fearing the ill consequences of a war in his own country, sent William proposals for an accommodation, which were readily accepted, and the Scotch king obliged himself to pay the same homage to the king of England he had formerly done. But Robert, perceiving he was only amused by his brother, to draw him into this expedition, returned home greatly disgusted. The king continued his arbitrary proceedings, and oppressed his subjects, Normans as well as English, more and more every day, which made them all wish for his death, as the only remedy to the evils they groaned under. And now they thought their wishes were going to be accomplished; for in 1093, a dangerous distemper seized him at Gloucester, so that he himself thought his end approaching; and the fear of death made him resolve, if he ever recovered, to reform all that had been amiss in his government; being recovered of his illness, he presently forgot all his good resolutions, returned to his courses, retracted, as far as was in his power, the good orders he had given in his sickness, and even increased abuses of government, instead of correcting them. In 1094, we again find king William at war with his brother Robert in Normandy, who, as William had not performed his part of the late treaty, seemed resolved to take from him the places he held there. Being assisted by the king of France, he gained several advantages over William, who at last had recourse to his old artifice, and bribed the French king once more to draw off his forces. In order to raise money, he sent orders into England for levying 20,000 men, and to impress such as were of some substance, and did not care to leave their families. When they were just going to embark, they were discharged, upon paying ten shillings a man, which they readily did, and by this artifice William raised 20,000l. Robert now, in all likelihood, would have lost all his dominions, if the king had not been obliged to return on a sudden to repress the Welsh, who were ravaging Shropshire and Cheshire. At his approach,

they retired among the mountains and inaccessible places, and William pursuing them too far, lost more of his men than he destroyed of the enemy's, and all he could do was, to build the castle of Montgomery, which had been demolished. In 1096, the project of the holy war was set on foot by pope Urban II. in which so many princes of Christendom engaged. The design of it was to recover the Holy Land out of the hands of the Saracens. The badge of those who went to it was a red cross wrought in their garments, whence they were termed Croisera, and the expedition the Crusade. Robert duke of Normandy was one of the princes who engaged in it; and to defray the expences of his undertaking, he mortgaged his duchy to his brother the king of England, for a sum of money, which William raised on his subjects by the most oppressive methods imaginable. In 1098, William rebuilt London Bridge, raised a new wall round the Tower, and erected the famous Hall at Westminster, which, though so large, he found fault with, and said it was scarce big enough for a king's bed-chamber. The raising money for these works was a great oppression on the subjects. Being hunting one day in New Forest, he was accidentally, or otherwise, shot with an arrow into the heart, by Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, as he was, seemingly at least, shooting at a deer; and dropt down dead immediately. Thus fell William, surnamed Rufus, from his red hair, and florid complexion, after he had lived four and forty years, and reigned near thirteen, during which he oppressed his people in every form of tyranny and insult. He was equally void of learning, principle, and humanity; haughty, passionate, brutal, profligate, and ungrateful; a scoffer at religion; a scourge to the clergy; vain-glorious, talkative, rapacious, lavish, and dissolute, and an inveterate enemy to the English, though he owed his crown to their valour and fidelity, when the Norman lords intended to expel him from the throne. In return for this instance of their loyalty, he took all opportunities to fleece and enslave them; and at one time imprisoned fifty of the best families in the kingdom, on pretence of killing his deer: so that they were compelled to purchase their liberty at the expence of all their wealth; though not before they had undergone the fiery ordeal. He lived in a scandalous commerce with prostitutes, professing his contempt for marriage; and having no legitimate issue, the crown devolved to his brother Henry. He was buried at Winchester, where his tomb, somewhat raised from the ground, remains to this day. In his reign a great inundation of the sea overflowed the coast of Kent, and covered the lands formerly belonging to earl Goodwin. These are now called the Goodwin Sands, so dangerous to ships.

WILLIAM III. of England, and prince of Orange and Nassau, born Nov. 14. 1650, had for his godfathers the States of Holland and of Zealand, the cities of Delf, Leyden, and Amsterdam. The states finding themselves at liberty, by the death of William II. resolved to remedy the inconveniencies which might happen from a single governor. They appointed a general assembly to meet, in which it was resolved, That since the country was now without a governor by the death of the prince, the choice of all officers and magistrates, for the time to come, should be in the disposal of the cities; and that not only the ordinary soldiers, but even the guards of the deceased prince, should take an oath of fidelity to the states of Holland; this was unanimously carried. The conduct of Melin de Wit being very much disapproved, the prince was in 1673 declared general of the army of the states. At that time they were in a most distressed condition. The French carrying all before them, he immediately repaired to the army. The frontier towns and garrisons in the province of Holland fell every day into the hands of the enemy, which caused insurrections. Dort first led the way, and was followed by other cities. The consequence was, that the prince was declared in a full assembly of the states, stadtholder, captain, and admiral-general of all their forces, as well by sea as by land; and they gave him all the power, dignity, and authority, which his ancestors of glorious memory had ever enjoyed, and things took then a more prosperous turn: not long after the two de Wits, the great enemies of the house of Orange, were torn to pieces by the people. In 1673 he took the strong town of Naerden, and by his courage and conduct obliged the French to quit Utrecht, and several considerable places where they had garrisons. As an acknowledgment of his services, the states confirmed him in the office of stadtholder, and entailed this dignity upon the heirs of his body born in lawful wedlock, in an instrument, dated February 3. 1674. The same day the states of Zealand conferred the same administration upon his highness, and declared him chief nobleman of their province. Soon after he went to Utrecht, and made some regulations in the government of that province; and the following proposition being made, 'Whether it were advisable to confer the charge of governor-general, captain, and admiral-general of the province, upon his highness, and his heirs male, lawfully begotten;' they all, unanimis et contradictorie, approved the motion, and conferred that dignity upon his highness. Soon after he engaged the French at Senef, where he gained great honour by his courage and conduct, and obtained a victory, after a most bloody engagement. In 1675, as an acknowledgment of his great services, the burghers of the duchy of Guelders conferred on him the honour of being hereditary governor of that province; and he reformed several abuses which had got footing during the enemy's usurpation there. On October 17, 1677, the prince embarked for England, and arrived at Norwich the 19th.

On November 4, which was his highness's birth-day, he was married to the princess Mary, eldest daughter of the duke of York. On August, 1678, he attacked and defeated the duke of Luxemburg in his quarters, near the abbey of St. Dennis. In the heat of the action, the prince advanced so far, that he was in great anger of being lost, had not Mons. Puwerkerk come seasonably to his relief, and killed an officer that was just going to fire a pistol at him. On June 29th, 1684, a treaty was signed at the Hague, which put an end to military operations. In 1688 king James II. of England having conducted his affairs in such a manner, as apparently threatened the civil and religious liberties of the nation, a great many persons of eminence and interest in the kingdom, both clergy and laity, deemed it expedient to invite over the prince of Orange. Several of them waited on him at the Hague for that purpose; and the States General having resolved to assist him, great preparations were made for his expedition. On October 16th, he took his leave of the states, and on the 19th sailed with 50 men of war, 15 frigates, as many fireships, near 400 vice-alleys and transports, having about 14,000 men and forces, accompanied by many of the English nobility and gentry, but was forced back by storm. He put to sea again, November 1, and landed the 5th at Torbay, and was soon joined by many of the nobility. He advanced towards London, and king James quitting the kingdom, he was invited to London. In the mean time, the lords took upon them the government of the kingdom, and agreed to address the prince of Orange to take upon him the administration of all public affairs till a convention should meet. The convention of lords and commons met, January 22, 1688-9, and after some warm debates, voted, that the prince and princess of Orange should be king and queen. The princess arrived February 2, and the next day both houses waited on her, and made a solemn offer of the crown, which was accepted by the prince in the name of himself and his wife, and the same day they were proclaimed king and queen by the names of William and Mary; such was the necessity of the times. The first thing king William did, after he had settled his privy-council, was giving the royal assent, on February 23, to a bill that had passed both houses, 'to remove and prevent all questions and disputes concerning the assembling and settling of this present parliament.' By which act the convention, which had placed the crown on the prince and princess of Orange, was changed into a parliament. From the beginning of the reign of king William and queen Mary, there was a party in the nation who disliked the new settlement, and were in continual plots to overturn it, and to restore the late king James. The king, by the advice of the commons, and being strongly solicited to it by his allies, declared war against France. The king and queen were solemnly crowned by the bishop of London, on April 11, 1689. The parliament, at the king's desire, had passed an act, 'for taking away the tax called hearth-money,' which received the royal assent on April 24. On July 24, the princess Anne of Denmark was delivered of a prince, named William, whom his majesty created duke of Gloucester. The king passed the bill of rights and accession, on December 16, agreeable to the declaration of rights, when their majesties accepted the crown, with the addition of a remarkable clause, for excluding papists and persons marrying papists, for ever, from inheriting the crown of England. The revolution in Scotland quickly followed that in England. And an act was presently passed for settling the crown upon the king and queen of England; pursuant to which, their majesties were proclaimed king and queen of Scotland, on April 11, the day of their coronation in England. Then the earl of Argyle and other commissioners were sent to make a solemn tender of the crown to their majesties, in the name of the estates and kingdom of Scotland; which was done on May 11. In the mean time, the duke of Gordon, a papist, still held the castle of Edinburgh for the late king; but a vigorous siege obliged him to surrender it on June 13, upon condition that he and the garrison should have their lives, liberties, and fortunes secured. And the earl of Dundee being slain in battle, and the forces he had raised in the Highlands dwindling away by degrees, and being at length entirely suppressed, their majesties remained afterwards in the peaceable possession of the crown of Scotland. In Ireland, Tyrconnel had secured the most important places of that kingdom, and used such violence against the protestants, that they were forced to retire to their brethren in the north; who seizing on Kilmore, Coleraine, Inniskilling, and Londonderry, declared for king William and queen Mary. The late insatiable king James now sailed from Breit with some French troops, and landed at Kinsale on the 12th of March, 1688-9. Having taken Coleraine and Kilmore, after a stout resistance, he laid siege to Londonderry, on April 20; from whence, a few days after, he departed to meet his parliament at Dublin, where he passed an act to attain between 2 and 3000 protestant lords, ladies, clergymen, and gentlemen, of high-treason. In the mean time, the siege of Londonderry was carried on with the utmost efforts, and the garrison under Mr. George Walker a clergyman, and major Baker, held out with the most surprising resolution, though reduced to the necessity of feeding upon horse-flesh, dogs, cats, rats and mice, tallow, starch, dried and salted hides, and all kinds of offal; till major-general Kirk arriving with some ships laden with provisions, which, after a long delay, he at last found means, with difficulty, to convey into the town, the besiegers, on July 31, thought fit to raise the siege. The garrison of Inniskilling, at the same time, did wonders; particularly, the day before the siege of Derry was raised, they advanced near 20 miles to meet about 6000 Irish, and defeated them, killing and drowning near 3000, though themselves were not above 2000, and had but about 20 killed and 50 wounded. King William having passed an act for putting the administration into the hands of the queen whenever he should be out of the kingdom, in June 1690, landed with a gallant army in Ireland, and on July 1. fought the ever memorable battle of the Boyne, wherein, though he had the misfortune to lose the brave duke Schomberg, then 82 years old, yet he gained a complete victory over the French and Irish army, and obliged king James to retire to Dublin, and make all the haste he could back to France. King William, the following Sunday, entered Dublin in triumph, and went to St. Patrick's church to return thanks to God for his victory: and arriving in England the beginning of September, he sent the earl of Marlborough to carry on the reduction of Ireland; who took Cork and Kinfale with such expedition, that he was again at Kensington on October 28. The next year, 1691, the intrepid English under the brave general Ginckle, and other valiant commanders, made themselves masters of Ballimore, with incredible bravery passed the Shannon amidst the fire of the enemy, and took Athlone, and fought the glorious battle of Aghrim on July 12, wherein 4000 Irish and their general St. Ruth were slain; which was soon followed by the surrender of Galloway, and lastly, that of Limerick in October (where Tyrconnel died, as it were of grief, on August 14), by which an end was put to the Irish war, and all Ireland was reduced to the obedience of king William and queen Mary. In England, the king dissolved the convention-parliament, on February 6, 1689-90, and a new parliament met on March 20. In the mean time, the French king was pushing his conquests in the Netherlands and other parts, which made it necessary for king William to go over to the famous congress at the Hague, in the beginning of the year 1691, in order to animate the confederate princes and states. The French were so far before-hand with the allies, that they took the strong city of Mons this year, and Namur in the year following; after which was fought the battle of Steenkirk (king William commanding the confederate army himself, as he did every year during the war) in which, though the French remained masters of the field of battle, yet king William so bravely disputed the victory, that they had scarce any thing else to boast of, the loss being nearly equal on both sides. The king was no sooner gone abroad in 1691, but the Jacobites resumed their favourite scheme, in concert with France, for restoring the late king James. But the vigilance of queen Mary and the government again disconcerted their measures. The parliament meeting towards the end of the year, passed a bill for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments, commonly called the Triennial Bill; but the king, by the advice of his ministers, refused his assent: as he did also the next year a bill touching free and impartial practice in parliament, being in the nature of what is now called a Place-bill: which he displeased the commons, that they refused, that whoever advised the king not to give the royal assent to that act, was as enemies to their majesties and the kingdom. However the parliament insisting upon the Triennial Bill, he thought fit to pass it in 1695, which gave a general satisfaction. Our fleet at sea was this year very considerable. In the whole British fleet, on June 16, fell upon Sir George Rooke's Squadron, which had a fleet of near 100 merchant-ships, bound to the Straits, under its convoy, which it was separated from the main fleet, which should have conveyed it out of danger, and was burnt, or sunk four of the greatest Spanish ships, three Dutch men of war, and 17 English, and near 80 other merchant-ships. Our honour at sea was in a great measure retrieved this year. The king reigned on November 9. On December 28, queen Mary died of the small-pox, to the inexpressible grief of the nation. She was king James's eldest daughter, and died in the 33d year of her age, having reigned near 61 years jointly with the king her husband. On March 3, he was most solemnly and magnificently interred in Henry VIIIth's chapel. In the beginning of the year 1695, the parliament made a strict enquiry into several abuses and corruptions. In this session also, the badness of the silver-coin was first taken into consideration, which by clipping and adulterating had been reduced near half in value, to the great detriment of trade and embarrassment of the public revenue. The remedying of this grievance was not perfected till the next parliament, when all the silver-money was ordered to be called in and recoined, and the loss to be borne by the public. This gave rise to the Exchequer-bills, or paper-money, which were no sooner in use, but the scandalous practice of interest-dorment began, for which Mr. Charles Duncomb and Mr. Knight were expelled the house, and committed to the Tower, and Mr. Burton to Newgate. Bills were ordered to be brought in to punish them, which passed the commons, but were thrown out by the lords, who being equally divided upon Duncomb's bill, the duke of Leeds gave the casting vote for rejecting it. In 1695, the English fleet, under lord Berkeley, found terror along the coasts of France, bombarded St. Maloes, and some other towns: and to return, Villeroy, by the French king's order, bombarded Brussels. (On the 25th of January a double plot was about that time discovered to assassinate the king, and invade the kingdom. Many of the late king James's satellites came over from France, and held consultations with papists and Jacobites.)

how to murder king William; and after several debates on the time, place and manner of putting their horrid design in execution, they at last agreed to assassinate his majesty in his coach, on some day in February, 1695-6. in a lane between Brentford and Turnham-Green, as he returned from hunting. But happily the whole plot was discovered, by Mr. Peadegrass, the very night before it was to be executed, which was confirmed by Mr. de la Rue, another of the plotters, and afterwards by captain Porter, and others of them, who came in upon the proclamation for apprehending the conspirators. At the same time there was to be an invasion from France, for which purpose king James was come to Calais, and the troops, artillery and stores were immediately ordered to be embarked; but by the news of the assassination plot having miscarried, and the speedy sending of a formidable fleet under admiral Ruffel, this other part of the design was frustrated; and Calais was not long after bombarded by the English. When the parliament met, December 3, 1696, the king told them in his speech, that considering the circumstances of affairs abroad, it was his opinion, that England could not be safe without a land force; which clause the commons did not like, as if it were designed to recommend a standing army in time of peace. And so after long debates they resolved, That all the land forces, raised since September 29, 1680, should be paid and disbanded. Yet, to shew their affection to his majesty, they resolved, on December 20, That 700,000l. per annum be granted to him for the support of the civil list. The parliament continued sitting till July 5, 1698, and then was prorogued, and two days afterwards dissolved. In this session the new East-India company was established, the merchants having agreed to advance 2,000,000l. to government, at 8 per cent. The old company offered to raise 700,000l. at 4 per cent. but this was rejected; though they were afterwards constituted a corporation, and the two companies united. On December 6, 1698, the new parliament met, in which, though the king expressed his desire of having a good body of land forces kept up, yet the commons resolved, That all the land forces, exceeding 7000 for England, and 12,000 for Ireland, (all his majesty's natural-born subjects) should be forthwith paid and disbanded. This made the king very uneasy; but when he saw the parliament in earnest, he complied with a good grace. He would fain have kept his Dutch guards that came over with him at first; but not being able to move the parliament, he with compliance submitted, and sent them away; which gave great satisfaction to his people. In June, 1699, the king went over to Holland, and returned in October. The parliament met Nov. 26, and in this session were great debates about the Irish forfeited estates, refusing the grants which the king had made of several of them to his ministers and favourites, and applying all to the use of the public. The commons, in April, 1700, to carry their point, tacked the bill of resumption to the land-tax bill; which occasioned great heats between the two houses, the lords making amendments, which the commons would not agree to; when the king fearing the consequences, sent a private message to the lords to pass the bill without any amendments, and on April 11 prorogued the parliament. The king went over again to Holland in July, this year; and on the 29th, unhappily for England, died that hopeful young prince the duke of Gloucester, son to their royal highnesses the prince and princess of Denmark, being about ten years old. The king of Spain dying towards the end of this year, the duke of Anjou was declared king of Spain by the French king his grandfather. And the French, at the same time, over-running the Spanish Netherlands, both king William and the states were obliged to own the duke of Anjou's title, in order to gain time. His majesty, soon after his return, dissolved the parliament, and at the same time, to please those now distinguished by the name of the Church-party, made some alterations in his ministry. The new parliament meeting in February, 1700-1, the Commons chose Robert Harley, Esq; their speaker. The king in his speech, on the death of the duke of Gloucester, having recommended to them a further provision for the succession of the protestant line, after him and the princess, both houses came into it; and on June 12, 1701, his majesty passed the famous act for the further limitation of the crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subjects; whereby the crown was further limited to the princess Sophia, electress dowager of Hanover, and her protestant heirs. She was grand-daughter to king James I. by his daughter Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, and grandmother to his late majesty king George II. His majesty went again to Holland in July, where he made a speech in the assembly of the states, on the posture of affairs in Europe, which had a good effect. The English nation was now divided into parties, for and against a war; the old and new ministry, and the House of Commons (which had occasioned the famous Keattish petition, and Legion letter, in which the last Commons were treated with great scurrility, and even menaces). But the death of the late king James, on Sept. 5, at St. Germain, and the French king's declaring thereupon the pretended prince of Wales king of these realms, gave a new turn to people's minds, and made them all unite in a firm adherence to his majesty, and the utmost abhorrence of the indignity put upon him and the nation by the French king. His majesty returned about the end of October, and having dissolved the parliament, called another to meet December 30. The commons again chose Mr. Harley their speaker,

Speaker, and the king made a most excellent speech to both houses on the present posture of affairs, the late insolent step of the French king, the dangers that threatened Europe, by his placing his grandson on the throne of Spain, and the alliances he had made for obviating those dangers: to which both houses returned the most satisfactory addresses. And soon after, the commons addressed his majesty, that it might be an article in the several treaties of alliance, That no peace should be made with France, till his majesty and the nation have reparation for the indignity offered by the French king, in declaring the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. They then voted 40,000 land-forces, and as many for the sea-service. In the midst of these vigorous resolutions, the king, who had been declining in his health for some time, on February 21, 1702-2, fell from his horse, as he was hunting, and broke his right collar-bone; which, joined with his former indisposition, held him in a languishing state till the 8th of March, when, with great composedness and resignation, he expired. During his illness, the royal assent was given by commission to an act for attainting the pretended prince of Wales of high treason; and another for the further security of his majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, &c. Thus died the heroic king William III. in the 52d year of his age, having reigned thirteen years, three weeks, and two days. William III. was in his person of the middle stature, a thin body and delicate constitution, subject to an asthma and continual cough from his infancy. He had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave solemn aspect. He was very sparing of speech: his conversation was dry, and his manner disgusting, except in battle, when his deportment was free, spirited, and animating. In courage, fortitude, and equanimity, he rivalled the most eminent warriors of antiquity; and his natural sagacity made amends for the defects in his education, which had not been properly superintended. He was religious, temperate, generally just and sincere, a stranger to violent transports of passion, and might have passed for one of the best princes of the age in which he lived, had he never ascended the throne of Great-Britain. But, the distinguishing criterion of his character was ambition. To this he sacrificed the punctilios of honour and decorum, in deposing his own father-in-law and uncle; and this he gratified at the expence of the nation that raised him to sovereign authority. He aspired to the honour of acting as umpire in all the contests of Europe; and the second object of his attention was, the prosperity of that country to which he owed his birth and extraction. Whether he really thought the interests of the continent and Great-Britain were inseparable, or sought only to drag England into the confederacy as a convenient ally, certain it is, he involved these kingdoms in foreign connexions, which in all probability, will be productive of their ruin. In order to establish this favourite point, he scrupled not to employ all the engines of corruption, by which the morals of the nation were totally debauched. He procured a parliamentary sanction for a standing army, which now seems to be interwoven in the constitution. He introduced the pernicious practice of borrowing upon remote funds; an expedient that necessarily hatched a brood of usurers, brokers, and stock-jobbers, to prey upon the vitals of their country. He carried upon the nation a growing debt, and a system of politics big with misery, despair, and destruction. To sum up his character in a few words: William was a fatalist in religion, indefatigable in war, enterprising in politics, dead to all the warm and generous emotions of the human heart, a cold relation, an indifferent husband, a disagreeable man, an ungracious prince, and an imperious sovereign.

WILLING, a. inclined, or not wroth to do a thing; consenting, desirous; favourable; pleased; ready or condescending; chosen.

WILLITON, a village in Somersetshire, 8 miles E. of Minehead.

WILLOW, f. a tree worn by sailors lovers.

WILMINGTON, a village in Suffex, 6 miles N. W. of East-Bourn.

WILTON, a town in Wiltshire, with a market on Wednesdays. It is seated near the river Willey, is an ancient place, and was formerly the chief town of the county. It is now but a mean town, though it sends 100 members to parliament, and is the place where the knights of the shire are chosen. It has a manufactory of carpets. It is 85 miles W. of S. of London.

WILTSHIRE, an English county, 31 miles in length, and 34 in breadth; bounded on the W. by Somersetshire; on the N. by Gloucestershire; on the E. by Berkshire and Hampshire; and on the S. by Dorsetshire and Hampshire; being 54 miles in length, and 31 in breadth. It contains 304 parishes, 21 market towns, and sends 34 members to parliament. The principal rivers are the Wilts, the Ader, the two Avons, the Tems, Kennet, the Duril, the Nadder, and the Were. The air is generally good, though sharp upon the hills and downs in winter, milder in the vales and bottoms. The N. part is hilly, the S. level, and the middle full of downs, intermixed with bottoms, where are rich meadows and corn-fields. There are several towns in it noted for the woollen manufacture. Here is a famous trench which runs from E. to W. and is visible for 20 miles. The common people will have it was the work of the devil, but it was probably the boundary of the W. Saxon monarchy. Salisbury is the principal town.

WILY, [wily] a. full of stratagem; cunning; artful; tricking.

WIMBLE, f. [wimpel, Belg.] an instrument with which holes are bored.

WIMONDS

WIMONDHAM, or WINDHAM, a town of Norfolk, with a market on Fridays. It is seated on a dirty bottom, and has been noted for stockings, wooden spoons, taps, and pindles made here. The steeple of the church is very high, and on it was hung Ket's banner, in 1549. It is 99½ miles N. E. by N. of London.

WIMPLE, f. [guimple, Fr.] a hood or veil. WIN, used in the compound names of men, signifies war in strength; from wîn, Sax. Sometimes it implies popularity, from wiinna, Sax. dear, or beloved. And in the names of places, denotes a battle fought there.

To WIN, v. a. [preter. and pass. won, winna, Sax.] to conquer, or gain by conquest; to gain the victory in a contest or game; to gain something withheld; to obtain or overpower by superior charms, or persuasions. Neuterly, to gain the victory or advantage. Used with upon, to influence, gain ground or favour, or to overpower.

WINBORN, or WINBOURNE, a town of Dorsetshire, with a market on Fridays. It is seated between two brooks, on the river Stour; is a pretty large well inhabited place, and has a handsome church called the Minster, and was formerly noted for its nunnery. It is 102½ miles S. W. of London.

WINCAUTON, or WINCAUNTON, a town in Somersetshire, with a market on Wednesdays. It is seated on the side of a hill on the London road, 24 miles S. of Bath, and 208½ W. by S. of London.

To WINOE, v. n. [guingo, Brit.] to kick with pain. To kick in order to throw off a rider, applied to beasts of carriage.

WINCH, f. [quincher, Fr.] an instrument held in the hand, by which a wheel is turned round; a windlass.

To WINCH, v. a. See WINCK.

WINCHCOMBE, a town in Gloucestershire, with a market on Saturdays. It is 93 miles W. N. W. of London.

WINCHELSEA, a town in Suffex, with a market on Saturdays. It is an ancient place, at least the old town, which was swallowed up by the ocean in 1250. Tho' now dwindled to a mean place, it retains its privileges, and sends two members to parliament. It is seated on a rocky cliff, on an inlet of the sea, and had a haven, now choaked up. It had 18 parish churches, now reduced to one. It is 67 miles S. E. of London, and is governed by a mayor and jurats.

WINCHESTER, a city of Hampshire, with two markets, on Wednesdays and Saturdays. It has five parish churches, besides the cathedral, which is a large and beautiful structure, and in which are interred several Saxon kings and queens. The other remarkable buildings are, the bishop's palace, the hall where the assizes are kept, and the college or school, which last is without the walls. King Charles II. appointed Sir Christopher Wren to build a royal palace here, but he never lived to see it finished; nor has it been hitherto according to the original plan. It is 21 miles N. W. of Chichester, and 69½ W. by N. of London. The city is governed by a mayor, a recorder, several aldermen, six of whom are always justices, with a sheriff, two bailiffs, and four constables.

WIND, [wînd], f. [wînd, Sax.] a sensible motion of the air; the direction of the air to any point; breath; any thing insignificant, particularly applied to threats. X.

X is the twenty-second letter of our alphabet, and a double consonant. Neither the Hebrews nor ancient Greeks used it, but expressed it by its component parts cs. Neither have the Italians this letter, but express it by ff. X begins no word in the English language, but such as are of Greek original, and we find it in few words but what are of Latin derivation, as perplex, reflexion, defluxion, axle, &c. We often express this sound by single letters, as in backs, cracks, necks, &c. by ks, in brooks, breaks, rocks; by cc, in access, accident; by B, in action, union, &c. The English and French pronounce it cs or ks. In Numerals, it expresses 10, and such seems to be made of two V's placed one over the other. When a dash is over it thus \bar{X} , it signifies 10,000.

XE'RIFF, a title given to a prince, or chief governor of Barbary.

Y is the twenty-third letter of our alphabet; its sound is formed by expressing the breath with a sudden expansion of the lips, from that configuration by which we express the vowel u. It is one of the ambigenous letters, being a consonant in the beginning of words, and placed before all vowels, as in yard, year, York, &c. but before no consonant. At the end of words it is a vowel, and is substituted for the sound of i, as in try, cry, fry, &c. In the middle of words it is not used so frequently as i, unless in those derived from the Greek, as chyle, empyreal, type, &c. though it is admitted into some pure English words, as in dying, crying, prying, &c. Y was much used by the Saxons, whence it is found for i in our old English writers. Y is also a numeral, signifying 150, and with a dash over it thus, \bar{Y} , 150,000.

YACHT, YATCH, or YACHT, [yax] a small ship, generally used in conveying the passengers

YORK, a city of Yorkshire, of which it is capital, with an archbishop's see, and three markets, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. It is seated on the river Ouse, and is generally counted the second city in England; though Bristol now pretends to that honour, on account of its extensive trade. It is certainly a very ancient place, and

and has undergone various revolutions; but is still a large, beautiful place, adorned with many fine buildings, both public and private; is very populous, and inhabited by gentry and wealthy tradesmen. It contains 30 parish churches and chapels, besides its cathedral, or minster, which is a most magnificent structure. It is divided by the river into two parts, which are united by a stately stone bridge of five arches. The eastern part is most populous, the houses standing thicker, and the streets being narrower. It is surrounded by a strong wall, on which are many turrets, or watch-houses; and there are four gates, and five posterns. It is a city and county of itself, enjoys large privileges, sends two members to parliament, and has the title of a duchy. It is governed by a lord mayor, 12 aldermen, and other officers; and its county contains 36 villages and hamlets. It is 6½ miles S. by E. of Durham, 8½ E. of Lancaster, and 197 N. by W. of London.

YORKSHIRE, an English county, bounded on the E. by the German Ocean; on the N. by the county of Durham; on the W. by Westmoreland and Lancashire; and on the S. by Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, and Lincolnshire. It is the largest county in England, being 90 miles in length, from E. to W. and 75 in breadth from N. to S. It contains 563 parishes, 57 market towns, and sends 30 members to parliament. The principal rivers are the Teefe, that divides this county from Durham; the Swale, the Youre, the Nid, the Ouse, the Warf, the Aire, the Calder, the Derwent, the Dun, and the Hull; besides the great river Humber, which is made up of many rivers. The air is in general temperate, but pretty cold on the tops of the hills, and on the borders of Durham. The soil in some places is very fruitful, in some barren, gravelly and stony, and in others moorish, miry, and fenny. It is divided into three ridings, the North, West, and East; besides which, there is a fourth division, called Richmondshire, as also Cleveland, Craven, and Holderness, which are all included in the three ridings. In so extensive a county the productions must be various, as well as the manufactures; and there are mines of iron, lead, and coal York is the principal place.

YORK, NEW, one of the United Provinces of North America. It is bounded on the E. by Massachusetts-Bay; on the N. by Canada; on the S. by New Jersey; and on the W. by Delaware river. It produces corn, abounds in cattle, and has a good breed of horses; but the inhabitants are chiefly employed in fisheries. They export a great deal of dried and salted fish to Europe; as also logwood, train-oil, and whalebone. The principal town is of the same name.

YOU, [yü] pron. [you, the accusative plural of thou, Sax. thou] this word is used when we speak to more than one; but by custom has been applied by way of ceremony, even when we address a single person. It is sometimes used indefinitely for any person, in the same sense as eo, Fr.

YOUNG, [yung] a. [yung, Sax.] not born many years; in the first part of life. Figuratively, ignorant, unexperienced. Applied to vegetables, newly grown.

YOUNG, [yung] f. the offspring of animals collectively.

YOUNGSTER, or YOUNKER, [yunker] f. a young person: a word of contempt.

YOUR, [pron. yur] pron. [er, wer, Sax.] belonging to you. It seems to be rather the genitive plural of you, from ge, Sax. you; and on that account is seldom used but when we speak to more than one, unless when we compliment a person; and in that sense it is that we add the s final, a sign of the genitive singular, more particularly so when the substantive goes before, or is understood. "Thou managed by an abler hand than your's." Dryd. "It is your's to transmit." Pope.

YOURSELF, [yürself] pron. [from you and self] you, exclusive of any other.

YOUTH, [yüth] f. [yuguth, Sax.] that part of life which is between childhood and manhood, generally reckoned from 14 to 28; adolescence; a young man. Young men, used collectively.

YULE, f. [yrol, Sax.] the time of Christmas, or Christmas-tide.

TO YUX, v. a. [year, Sax.] to sob or sigh.

Z.

Z Is the twenty-fourth letter, and nineteenth consonant of our alphabet; the sound of which is formed by a motion of the tongue from the palate downwards and upwards to it again, with a shutting and opening of the teeth at the same time. This letter sounds like the hard s, though some reckon it a double consonant, having the sound of ss; but to this others object, since we often double it, as in parade, marzale, grazale, &c. Among the Antients, Z was a numeral, signifying 2000, and with a dash over it thus, Z̄, it signified 2000 times 2000, or four millions. It is placed before all vowels, as in zary, zink, zodiac, Zurich; but before none of the consonants, except l, as in zelle, zelle, &c.

ZACHARIAH, or ZECHARIAH, is a canonical book of the Old Testament, containing the predictions of Zachariah, the son of Barachia, and grandson of Iddo. He is the eleventh of the twelve lesser prophets. He entered upon the prophetic office at the same time with Haggai, and was sent to the Jews upon the same message, to reprove them for their backwardness in erecting the temple, and restoring divine worship; but especially for the disorder of their lives and manners, which could not but derive a curse upon them. The prophet is the longest and most obscure of all the lesser prophets, his style being interrupted, and without connection.

ZAFFER, or ZAFFRE, f. in Chemistry, is the name of a blue substance, of the hardness of a stone, and generally supposed to be a native fossil; but really is a preparation of Cobalt; i. e. the calx of that mineral mixed with powdered flint, and wetted with water.

ZANY, f. a person who endeavours by odd gestures and expressions to excite laughter; a merry-andrew, or buffoon.

ZARNICH, f. a solid substance in which opiment is found, of a green or yellow colour.

ZEAL, [pron. zel.] f. [ζῆλος, Gr.] a passionate ardour or affection for any thing, person, or cause.

ZEALOT, [zelot] f. [ζηλωτής, Gr.] one that espouses any cause with a great ardour or passion; a bigot; generally used in dispraise.

ZEALAND, one of the seven United Provinces of the Netherlands, separated by the sea on the N. from the isles of Holland; by the Scheld on the E. from Brabant; by the Hout from Flanders; and on the W. it is bounded by the ocean. It comprehends eight islands, whereof three are pretty large. The names of which are, Walcherin, Schowen, S. Beveland, N. Beveland, Tolken, Duveland, Wolfersdyck, and St. Philip. There are likewise 6 or 7 others, of very little importance. The inhabitants are at a great deal of trouble, to defend themselves from the encroachments of the sea, and in keeping up their dykes or banks, in which they expend great sums of money. They in general are extremely hardy, and even rash, and very good soldiers, especially for the sea-service. It is governed in the same manner as Holland, and the assemblies of states are composed of deputies of the nobility, and those of the two principal towns.

ZEALOUS, [pron. zelous] a. espousing any cause with passion.

ZE'BRA, f. the wild ass, an extremely beautiful animal, transversely striated, or party-coloured, and about the size of a common ass: it is a native of many parts of the east.

ZE'CHIN, [zchin] f. from ΖΕΧΙΑ, in Venice, where the mint is settled] a gold coin worth about nine shillings sterling.

ZED, f. the name of the letter z. Figuratively, a crooked person, formed like the letter Z. A worthless insignificant person.

ZEND, f. a book containing the religion of the Magians, or worshippers of fire, who were disciples of the famous Zoroaster. This book was composed by Zoroaster during his retirement in a cave, and contained all the pretended revelations of that impostor. The first part contains the liturgy of the Magi, which is used among them in all their oratories and fire temples to this day. They reverence it as the Christians do the Bible, and the Mahometans the Koran. There are found many things in the Zend taken out of the scriptures of the Old Testament, which Dr. Prideaux thinks is an argument that Zoroaster was originally a Jew. Great part of the psalms of David are inserted: he makes Adam and Eve to have been the first parents of mankind, and gives the same history of the creation and deluge as Moses does, and commands the same observance about clean and unclean beasts, the same law for paying tithes to the sacerdotal order, with many other institutions of Jewish extraction. The rest of its contents are an historical account of the life, actions, and prophecies of its author, with rules and exhortations for moral living. The Mahometans have a sect which they call Zendikites, who are said to be the sadduces of Mahometanism, denying providence and the resurrection, believing the transmigration of souls, and following the Zend of the Magi.

ZENITH, f. [Arab.] the point in the heavens directly over one's head, and opposite to the Nadir.

ZEPHANI'A, a canonical book of the Old Testament, containing the predictions of Zephaniah, the son of Cushi, and grandson of Gedaliah; being the ninth of the twelve lesser prophets. He prophesied in the time of king Josiah, a little after the captivity of the ten tribes, and before that of Judah; so that he was not cotemporary with Jeremiah.

ZEPHYR, or ZEPHYRUS, f. [zephyrus, Lat.] the west wind; poetically applied to any calm, soft, or gentle wind.

ZEST, f. the peel of an orange squeezed into wine; a relish or taste superadded to any thing. The woody thick skin quartering the kernel of a walnut.

ZETE'TIC METHOD, f. [from ζήτησις Gr.] in Mathematics, is the method made use of to investigate or solve a problem.

ZEUGMA, f. [ζεύγμα, Gr.] a figure in Rhetoric, wherein an adjective or verb, which agrees with the next word, is likewise applied to one or many more remote.

ZINGIBER, or ZINZIBER, f. ginger.

ZINK, or ZINC, f. is a very remarkable fossile substance, resembling bismuth, but of a blue colour, and is really the lapis calaminaris, and has the same effects on copper, by turning it into brass.

ZODIAC, f. [ζῳδιακὸν, Gr.] in Astronomy, is a broad circle, whose middle is the ecliptic, and its extremes two circles parallel thereto, at such a distance from it, as to bound or comprehend the excursions of the sun and planets. It is divided into twelve portions, called signs, and those divisions or signs are denominated from the constellations which antiently possessed each part; but the Zodiac being immoveable, and the stars having a motion from west to east, those constellations no longer correspond to their proper signs, whence arises what we call the procession of the equinoxes.

ZONE, f. [ζώνη, Gr.] in Geography and Astronomy, is a division of the terraqueous globe, with respect to the different degrees of heat found in the different parts thereof. A zone is the fifth part of the surface of the earth, contained between two parallels. There are three zones, the torrid, frigid, and temperate. The torrid zone is a bend surrounding the torrensuous globe, and terminated by the two tropics. Its breadth is 46° 58'. The equator running through the middle of it, divides it into equal parts, each containing 93° 59'. The frigid zones are segments of the circle of the earth, terminated, one by the Antarctic, and the other by the Arctic circle; the breadth of each is 46° 38'. The temperate zones are two bands, environing the globe, and contained between the tropics and the polar circles; the breadth of each is 43° 21'.

ZOO'GRAPHER, [zōōgrāfer] f. [zōō and γράφω, Gr.] one who describes the nature, properties, and forms of animals.

ZOO'GRAPHY, [zōōgrāfy] f. [zōō and γράφω, Gr.] a description of the forms, nature, and properties of animals. "We are thereby conducted into zoography." Crœv.

ZOO'LOGY, [zōōlōgy] f. [zōō and λόγος, Gr.] is the science of animals. Artedi observes, that this makes one of the three kingdoms, as they are called, of natural history; the vegetable and mineral being the two others: in these, however, there is this difference made by writers, that while vegetables and minerals are treated of together, as all of a piece in each, the subjects of Zoology are divided; and it is made to compose, as it were several kingdoms. The subjects of it are accordingly divided into six several families. 1. The hairy quadrupeds. 2. The birds. 3. The amphibious animals, such as serpents, lizards, frogs, and tortoises. 4. The fishes. 5. The insects. And 6. Those lowest order of animated beings, the zoophites.

ZOO'PHYTE, [zōōfytē] f. [ζωόφυτον, Gr.] a vegetable or plant which partakes both of the nature of plants and animals.

ZOO'PHORIC, [zōōfōrik] s. [ζωόφορος, Gr.] bearing an animal. A zoophoric column, in Architecture, is that which bears or supports the form of an animal.

ZOO'PHORUS, [zōōfōrus] f. [See ZOO'PHORIC] the frieze of a column, or that part which is between the architrave and cornice; so called from the ornaments, resembling animals, carved upon it.

ZOO'TOMIST, f. [from ζωοτομία, Gr.] a person who dissects animals.

ZOO'TOMY, f. [ζωοτομία, Gr.] the dissection of the body of beasts; called likewise comparative anatomy.

ZUG, one of the cantons of Switzerland; bounded on the E. and N. by that of Zurich; on the W. by that of Lucern, and the free provinces; and on the S. by that of Schwitz.

The inhabitants are Roman Catholic, and it is divided into three parts, one of which is the town of Zug, and the others the villages about it, which comprehends three assemblies, namely, Bar, Mentric, and Val Egrie. The government of this canton is democratic, and the sovereignty belongs to the town of Zug, and to the communities without it, though this place has a particular magistrat.

ZU'INGLIANS, a branch of the ancient Christian reformers, or Protestants, so called from their author Huldric Zuinglius, a divine of Switzerland, who soon after Luther had declared against the church of Rome, and being then minister of the church of Zurich, fell in with him, and preached openly against idolgences, the mass, the celibacy of the clergy, &c. but differed from Luther about the Eucharist.

ZU'RICH, the canton of, is one of the 13 cantons of Switzerland, and the first in rank, being about 50 miles in length, and 30 in breadth. It is bounded on the N. by the Rhine, which separates it from the canton of Schaffhausen; on the S. by that of Schwiz; on the E. by Thurgaw, and the county of Tekenburg; and on the W. by the canton of Zug, and the free provinces. The soil is fertile in corn, produces all sorts of fruits, and there are some vineyards, as well as rich pastures. This canton is well peopled, the inhabitants are very laborious, and have a famous manufactory in crapes. They were the first that embraced the reformation, and the famous reformer Zuinglius was born here.

ZYGOMA, f. [ζυγόμα, Gr.] in Anatomy, is a bone of the head, otherwise called a yugale, being no single bone, but an union or assemblage of two processes, or eminences of bones; the one from the os temporis, the other from the os male; these processes are hence termed the zygomatic processes, and the suture that joins them together, is denominated the zygomatic suture.

ZYGOMATIC, a. [See ZYGOMA.]

ZYMO'MA, f. any thing which promotes or causes fermentation.

ZYMO'SI'METER, f. [See ZYMO'MA] an instrument proposed by the ingenious naturalist Swammerdam, to measure the degree of fermentation, occasioned by the mixture of different matters, and the degree of heat which those matters acquire in fermenting; as also, the heat or temperature of the blood of animals.

ZYTHOGALA, f. [ζυθε; and γάλαξ, Gr.] a beer posset, a drink recommended by Sydenham to be taken after a vomit.

Z. Z. A character made use of by the ancient physicians to signify myrrh, and by the moderns to signify ginger.
