was concluded, by the partition of the kingdom; Edmund was to have Wessex, i. e. all south of the Thames, with London, and a part of the ancient kingdom of Essex; and Canute to have Mercia, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. The valiant and generous king Edmund did not enjoy his share quite a year, being murdered by the procurement of the villain Edric, duke of Mercia, and his brother-in-law, who, being conscious what a false traitor he had been, feared the union of the two kings might be destructive to him: he immediately hastened to tell Canute what he had done, who had the greatest abhorrence of so barbarous an action, though he dissembled it for the present, and promised to advance Edric above all the peers of the realm. He was as good as his word; for, not long after, he ordered him to be beheaded, his body to be thrown into the Thames, and his head to be fixed on the highest gate in London. Edmund left two sons, Edmund and Edward, by his wife Alghitha. He was buried at Glastonbury; and with him the Saxon Monarchy in England in a manner ended, having lasted 190 years from Egbert's establishment; 432 from the founding of the heptarchy; and 568 from the arrival of Hengist. This prince, during his short reign, exhibited proofs of the most undaunted courage, invincible fortitude, consummate prudence, and sublime generosity.

EDRED succeeded Edmund I. in 948. The Danes, according to their usual custom upon the accession of a new king, began to revolt, and gained over to their side Malcolm, king of Scotland; but Edred marched into Northumberland, and obliged them to sue for peace: upon which Malcolm struck up a peace with Edred, and paid him the stipulated homage. But the Danes would not yet be quiet; he therefore marched into the north, made a terrible slaughter among the rebels, and laid waste the country for several miles. Edric fled into Scotland, and the Northumbrians threw themselves upon Edred for mercy: he generously replaced Edric on the throne, only imposing a tribute on him, and making him swear allegiance to him. But the perfidious Danes laid an ambush for him, as he was returning towards Wessex, and fell suddenly on his rear. Exasperated to the last degree, he returned, defeated Northumberland of its royalty, and reduced it to a province; making earl Osulf, an Englishman, the first governor. Edred, now absolute lord of all England, governed his kingdom in perfect tranquillity, and turned his thoughts wholly to religion, wherein he was implicitly directed by Dunstan, abbot of Glastonbury, who had in every thing the ascendancy over him: by his advice he rebuilt Glastonbury church and monastery; he also rebuilt Croyland and Abington monasteries. Edred died in the 10th year of his reign in 958.

EDWARD the Elder succeeded Alfred, in the year 900. Ethelward, son to Alfred's elder brother Ethelbert, aimed at the crown; but meeting with no encouragement from the English, he applied himself to the Danes, who immediately proclaimed him king of England, pretending, as they were possessed of half the kingdom, they had as much right to make a king as the West-Saxons. Edward marched directly against them, and they were obliged to abandon their new-made king Ethelward, and banish him out of their country. Ethelward went over to France, and in a short time returned with a large body of Normans, landed them in Essex, and soon made himself master of that province. This encouraged the Danes to take up arms again in his favour. Edward obtained many victories in this war. Ethelward was slain in battle in 905, in which battle (which was very obstinate and bloody on both sides) king Edward lost many of his nobles, and the Danes their king Eolrick. They continued the war two years after, yet they were constrained at last to sue for peace, which they obtained on condition they would own Edward as their sovereign, and the Normans should return to France. In 910 the war broke out again, and Edward soon beat the Danes in two engagements, and at last quite expelled them out of the kingdom of Mercia. This war lasted, with some intervals of respite, 12 years, in which time a great number of battles were fought, and the Danes continually lost ground, till Edward obliged them to lay down their arms, and acknowledge him once more as their sovereign. After the peace was concluded with the Danes, A. D. 922, Edward marched against the Welch, obtained a signal victory over them, and compelled the Welch king Rees ap Madoc, to sue for peace, promising to pay the usual tribute for the future. The Cumberland Britons likewise submitted to Edward. He died in the 25th year of his reign, A. D. 925, and was interred at Winchester.

EDWARD the Younger succeeded Edgar in 975. There were great contentions about the succession. The monks and their party were for Edward, Edgar's eldest son, now about 14 years of age; and the nobles, who were uneasy at the power and great wealth heaped upon the monks, were for Ethelred. In the mean time, Dunstan, fearing to be outvoted,

voted, taking advantage of the favour of the people, who had an high opinion of his sanctity, rises on a sudden, and leads prince Edward by the hand towards the church, and there anoints him king. The nobles murmured at this; but seeing he had the people to back him, they were forced to acquiesce. Dunstan immediately assumed the regency. King Edward, after he had reigned little more than three years, came to a tragical end in 999. As he was one day returning from hunting, and came near Corie-castle, in the Isle of Purbeck, in Dorsetshire, where his step-mother Elfrida and her son Ethelred resided, he rode off from his company to pay her a visit. Elfrida, being informed the king was at the gate, ran to receive him, and pressed him to alight. As he only designed to pay his respects to her as he passed by, he desired a glass of wine to drink her health; which being brought to him as he sat on his horse, the innocent king no sooner lifted the glass to his mouth, but a villain, at the private instigation of the cruel queen, stabbed him in the back with a dagger. He was succeeded by Ethelred, 12 years of age.

EDWARD the Confessor, son of Ethelred and Emma, succeeded Hardicanute, June 8, 1041. He had spent great part of his life in Normandy. Goodwin, who had made him swear that he would marry his daughter, convened a general assembly, and got Edward acknowledged and proclaimed king of England. Edward was a man of weak understanding, which gave Goodwin an opportunity of rising to an exorbitant height of power. He bore a very great hatred against Goodwin and his whole family in his heart, which was the reason of deferring his marriage with his daughter Editha as long as possible; however, after a delay of two years, as he really stood in fear of her father, he espoused her, but never consummated the marriage. He went hastily to Windsor, where his mother's treasures lay, seized them all, and stripped her of every thing, leaving her only a small pension for her life, and had her confined ten years like a prisoner at Winchester, where she died 1052. Several circumstances concurring, the king and Goodwin came at last to an open rupture; but what brought things to a crisis, was the following incident. Eustace, earl of Boloign, having paid a visit to king Edward, was returning to France, and at Dover one of his people picked a quarrel with a townsman, and killed him. This occasioned a great insurrection of the inhabitants, in which 20 of the earl's people lost their lives. Upon this, the king ordered Goodwin to go with some troops and chastise the rioters; but he absolutely refused, saying justly, that it was not the custom of England to punish men unheard. Edward now came to a fixed resolution to punish the earl for this disobedience; Goodwin, having intelligence of it, raised forces to defend himself. However, by the advice of a general assembly convened at Gloucester, a peace was patched up for the present; but it did not last long: Goodwin and his sons, refusing to appear before the general assembly, were banished the realm, and accordingly they passed over sea. They returned in a hostile manner, and entered the Thames with a fleet of ships; but an accommodation was once more agreed on. A little after, William the Bastard, duke of Normandy, arrived in England, to pay a visit to king Edward. In 1051, Edward abolished forever the tax called Danegeld, which amounted to 40,000l. a year, and had been paid for 38 years. In 1053 earl Goodwin died. In 1054 the Welch made an incursion into England, and plundered Hereford; but earl Harold, son of Goodwin, marching against them with an army he had himself raised, put them to the rout, and drove them out of the country, which raised him very much in the esteem of the people, and they began to talk openly that no man was so worthy to succeed to the crown as Harold. The king, to defeat Harold's hopes, sent for his nephew Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, out of Hungary; he accordingly came over to England, with his son Edgar Atheling, and his two daughters, 1057; but died soon after his arrival. In 1063 the Welch again renewed their incursions, and were again repulsed by Harold and his brother Tofton, who obliged them to dethrone Griffin, and become tributary to England. The Northumbrians, being grievously oppressed by Tofton their earl, rose up in arms, and expelled him their country. Harold was sent to chastise them, and restore his brother; but the people made such remonstrances to him of Tofton's ill government, that he obtained their pardon, and procured another governor. This entirely gained him the affections of the whole people, for his equity and justice. Whilst Harold was using all the address he was master of to procure his succession to the crown, king Edward gave himself no trouble about it, but was wholly engaged in building the church and monastery of Westminster. He just lived to see them finished, and the ceremony of their dedication performed; and, dying in the 24th year of his reign, A. D. 1065, was buried in the sepulchre he had provided for himself in Westminster abbey, which he built. He was the last king of Egbert's race, though not the last Saxon king, since Harold was of that nation, though not of the blood royal. The mental qualities of Edward did not at all answer to the dignity of his person. He was weak, indolent, and irresolute, and the attachment to his own ease tended in a great measure to the tranquillity of his reign. He seems to have been void of natural affection, and indeed of every other passion that kindles any warm emotion in the human heart. He was equally free of pride and ostentation, moderate in his appetites, complacent in his deportment, charitable to the poor, and extremely trifely punctual in the performance of all religious duties; so that he acquired among the vulgar the title of Saint and Confessor, by which epithet he was canonized by pope Alexander III. about 200 years after his death. His prophecies and revelations are no other than the dreams of superstition; and, as for his curing scrophulous tumours and ulcers by the touch, the sensible part of mankind is by this time very well convinced, that neither he who exercised this apotolical function, in imitation of the French kings, nor any of his successors, ever contributed to the recovery of one patient, by any inherent personal virtue derived from heaven. The passive humanity, or rather easiness of his life, appears from some private incidents of his life, which are very often more characteristic than those transactions of importance which are the effects of council and deliberation. One day, while he rested himself upon a couch, a page, who little dreamed that he was in the apartment, finding an iron chest open, filled his pockets with the silver it contained; but not satisfied with his booty, he had recourse to it again: when the king, thinking him perhaps too unconscionable, "Boy, (said he very deliberately) you had better be satisfied with what you have got; for, if Hugolin, my chamberlain, should come in, you will lose the whole, and be severely whipt into the bargain." Before the reign of Edward, the countries of Wexsex, Mercia, and Northumberland, were governed by their own peculiar laws; but he reduced them all into one body, and ordained they should be observed in common through the whole kingdom. These were called Edward's laws, in contradistinction to those of the Norman kings, which were introduced in the sequel.

EDWARD I. eldest son of Henry III. who succeeded to the crown of England upon the death of his father, Nov. 16, 1272, was at that time on his return from the Holy Land, and was crowned Aug. 19, 1274, with Eleanor his queen, sister of the king of Castile, who attended him in his expedition: Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Bretagne, and all the lords of the realm, being present at the solemnity, on which occasion 500 horses were let loose about the country for all that could catch them to keep them. The first thing he did after his coronation was to rectify the abuses in the administration of justice, and the parliament enacted some good laws, which were called the statutes of Westminster. Afterwards, he marched with a great army into Wales, and made Llewellyn their prince, who had attempted to throw off the yoke, sue for peace, which was granted on hard terms; but Edward afterwards generously relaxed them, being satisfied with thus mortifying his enemy. In 1279, the earldom of Ponthieu and Montreuil fell to Edward, in right of his queen, upon the death of the queen of Castile her mother. The coin having been very much adulterated, and information having been given that Jews were chiefly concerned in it, the king caused all that were in the nation to be seized in one day, and 280 of them, being convicted of clipping and coining, received sentence of death, and were executed accordingly. About this time the statute of Mortmain passed, to put a stop to the prevailing practice of persons alienating their lands to the church. In 1280 (though some say several years after) the statute of Quo Warranto was passed, occasioned by many persons, during the late troubles, appropriating lands to themselves to which they had no right, by which statute they were obliged to shew their claim; but the king, either through ill advice, or the desire of keeping up money, issued out a proclamation for all that held lands of the crown to lay their title before the judges. The earl of Warren appearing, and being required to shew his title to his lands, drew out an old rusty sword, and said, "It was by this my ancestors gained their estate, and by this I will keep it as long as I live." This brave and bold answer opened the king's eyes, and, thinking better of the matter, he recalled the proclamation. Llewellyn, having revolted at the instigation of his brother David, committed great ravages on the borders, and defeated the king's generals: but Edward, marching with a numerous army into Wales, totally routed Llewellyn's forces in a great battle, in which Llewellyn himself was slain; and the king caused his head, crowned with ivy, to be exposed to view on the walls of the Tower of London. David his brother, the last of his race, was cruelly put to death as a traitor, and his head fixed up by his brother's, and his four quarters sent to York, Bristol, Northampton, and Winchester. After the defeat of Llewellyn, Edward, with ease, became master of the whole country, and Wales was united to the crown of England in the year 1283. The queen lay in at Caernarvon, where she was brought to bed of a prince, named Edward, who, when he was 17 years of age, was invested with the principality of Wales; and from that time the king's eldest son has been always prince of Wales. In 1287, king Edward, leaving the regency to the earl of Pembroke, went over to France, where he stayed three years. Being returned into England in 1289, he set about reforming abuses in the administration of justice, punished several judges, who were found guilty of taking bribes, and obliged them to swear that for the future they would take neither money or presents, but a moderate breakfast. The next year, the Jews were all banished the kingdom. Upon the death of Alexander III. there arose great disputes in Scotland about the succession. The chief of the claimants were John Baliol and Edward Bruce, who in order to prevent a civil war, chose the king of England arbitrator of their differences; but, before he could proceed to a decision, he declared that he acted in this affair as sovereign lord lord of all Scotland, and required the states to own him as such, which though they never expressly did, yet they did not directly oppose his pretensions: however, he was owned as sovereign by all the claimants, and divided in favour of Baliol, whom he declared king of Scotland; upon which he swore fealty, and did homage to king Edward. But Baliol, being afterwards absolved from his oath of fealty by the pope, upon the king of England's treating him in an imperious manner, was determined to throw off the yoke, and took the opportunity of Edward's being at war with France to send a letter to him, renouncing the homage he had paid him; which incensed him, that in 1296 he marched an army designed for France into Scotland, and made himself master of that kingdom, and Baliol came and resigned his crown to him. Edward returned to England, carrying with him the crown and scepter of Scotland, and the rest of the regalia, and the famous stone of Scone, on which the inauguration of kings was performed. Prince Edward, being left regent on the king's going to France, having assembled the parliament, which granted him a large subsidy, confirmed king John's two charters by an authentic act, and the king put the great seal to in France. While the king was abroad the Scots rebelled, and drove the English out of all strong places in Scotland, leaving them the single town of Berwick upon Tweed. Edward, upon this, returned forthwith to Scotland; and met the enemy at Falkirk, where he totally routed them, retook all the strong places he had lost, and returned to England. This was in 1298. The next year the whole kingdom rose, and drove the English once more out of Scotland. Edward, upon this, entered that kingdom a third time in 1300, and entirely routed the Scotch. Edward refusing to accept their offers of submission, the Scots, in despair, offered the sovereignty of their country to Boniface VIII. which he readily accepted of it. But Edward had no regard to the pope's pretensions, that were if he heard any more of them, he would destroy Scotland from sea to sea: however, at the instance of the king of France, he granted the Scots a truce; but, on the expiration of it, he sent an army into Scotland, which being divided into three parts to ravage the country, were all routed in one day. Edward now concluded a peace with France, by which Guienne was restored to Edward. He entered Scotland with so numerous an army, that he met with no resistance, and went to the utmost bounds of the island, and subdued the country on all sides, and took Berwick castle. At his return into England, he publicly imprisoned Prince Edward his son, for having committed some outrage against the bishop of Litchfield. The Scots, who were often subdued, revolted again, and were again subdued. Edward, upon his return, banished Gaveston, as a corrupter of the Prince, and made the Prince swear never to recall him. The Scots again took up arms under Bruce, who attacked the earl of Pembroke, the king's general in Scotland, defeated him, and took the earl prisoner, after which he gained several other advantages. Edward was now so exasperated against the Scots, that he made vast preparations to destroy them; but he was seized with a distemper at Carlisle, and died at Burgh upon the Sands, in Cumberland, on July 7, 1307, aged 68 years, having reigned 34 years, 7 months, and 20 days. When he was near his end, he advised his son to carry his bones to the head of his army, assuring him the rebels could never withstand the sight of them. He ordered him to send his heart to the Holy Land, with 30,000l. for the maintenance of the holy sepulchre, and commanded him never to recall Gaveston. The constitution of parliament, such as it is at this day, was so well established in his reign, that an additional law was made to the great charter, which enacted that no tax should be levied on the people without the consent of the commons; He had, by Eleanor of Carlisle, four sons and nine daughters; but Edward his successor was the only one of his sons who survived him. By Margaret of France, his second wife, he had two sons and a daughter. Eleanor his queen died in 1297, in memory of whom he erected a cross wherever her corpse rested in the way from Lincolnshire to Westminster. Edward was a prince of a very dignified appearance; tall in stature, regular and comely in his features, with keen piercing black eyes, and of an aspect that commanded reverence and esteem. His constitution was robust; his strength and dexterity perhaps unequalled in his kingdom; and his shape was unblemished in all other respects but that of his legs, which are said to have been too long in proportion to his body; whence he derived the epithet of Long Shanks. In the qualities of the head, he equalled the greatest monarchs who have sat on the English throne: he was cool, penetrating, sagacious, and circumspect. The remotest corners of the earth resounded with the fame of his courage; and all over Europe he was considered as the flower of chivalry. Nor was he less consummate in his legislative capacity than eminent for his military prowess. He may be styled the English Justinian: for, besides the excellent statutes that were enacted in his reign, he new-modelled the administration of justice, so as to render it more sure and summary; he fixed proper bounds to the different courts of jurisdiction; settled a new and easy method of collecting the revenue; and established wise and effectual regulations for preserving peace and order among his subjects. Yet, with all these good qualities, he cherished a dangerous ambition, to which he did not scruple to sacrifice the good of his country: witness the ruinous war with Scotland, which drained the kingdom of men and money, and gave rise to that rancorous enmity, which in the sequel proved so prejudicial to both nations. That he was arbitrary in his disposition appears in many instances, particularly that of seizing for his own use the merchandize of his subjects; a stretch of prerogative more suitable to the conduct of an eastern emperor than to that of an English monarch. The cruelty of his nature was manifest in every expedition he undertook, either in Wales or Scotland. His integrity may be questioned from the nature of his transactions with the competitors of the Scottish crown, and the renunciation of the oath he had taken to his subjects. Though he is celebrated for his chastity and regular deportment, there is not, in the whole course of his reign, one instance of liberality or munificence. The title of baron was in this reign confined to such as the king called to parliament, which before was common to all who held lands of the crown.

EDWARD II. king of England, was about 22 years of age, when he succeeded his father Edward I. and began his reign by recalling Gaveston, a native of Gascony, the debaucher of his youth, contrary to his father's last command, and his own oath; on whom he heaped numberless favours. He married Isabella of France, daughter of Philip the Fair, at Boulogne, and appointed Gaveston guardian of the realm during his absence; which so exasperated the barons, that they entered into a league to prevent his coronation upon his return: but, on his promising, in the next parliament, to grant them all they could desire, he was crowned by the bishop of Winchester, February 24, 1308, when he took an oath to preserve the laws, customs, and liberties, granted to the clergy and people by St. Edward. However, Gaveston still governed with an absolute sway, and behaved with great insolence; which so provoked the lords, that they got the parliament to join with them, to demand Gaveston's banishment, which the king finding he could not avoid, made him governor of Ireland. However, he was soon recalled; upon which the barons obliged the king to place the government in the hands of 21 lords (called ordainers) chosen by parliament, who banished Gaveston; but he was soon recalled as before. And now several of the noblemen, entering into a confederacy, raised forces, and marched to York, where the king with his favourite was taking their diversions; but, upon notice of their approach, he left the place. Gaveston was taken some days after in Scarborough castle, and after a hasty trial beheaded; and an accommodation was afterwards effected between the king and the barons, and peace restored in 1313. The same year the queen was delivered of a son, who was named Edward. The Scots, taking advantage of the commotions in England, drove the English out of their country. On June 25, 1314, was fought the battle of Banockbourn, in which the English army was totally routed, with a dreadful slaughter; and the Scots made several incursions into England, and ravaged the borders in a terrible manner, till a truce was made for two years. In 1323, king Edward marched his army into Scotland; but was obliged to retreat for want of provisions, and the Scots pursued him and ravaged the country to the very walls of York: at last a truce was agreed on for thirteen years. Another war was upon the point of breaking out between the king and the barons, when matters were made up in 1318. The lords, jealous of the king, placed a young gentleman, named Hugh Spencer, about him as a spy, and got him made high chamberlain; but he had the art of insinuating himself so much into the king's favour, as to be made a confidant, and possessed the place of Gaveston in his heart; and he and his father, whom he made earl of Winchester, had the whole management of affairs in their hands: upon which the barons entered into a confederacy, levied troops, and then so vigorously petitioned for the removal of the Spencers, that the king durst not refuse their demands, and the parliament passed an act for their banishment, which was accordingly put in execution. But now affairs began to be in a flame again, by means of the queen, who having received some affront from the Governor of Leeds, which belonged to one of the associated barons, she spurred the king to revenge against the whole body, who, having taken the castle of Leeds, hanged the governor, and then turned his army against the barons. He took Warwick castle and some others; and then thinking himself strong enough to stand against all opposers, he recalled the two Spencers. Most of the confederate barons threw themselves upon the king's mercy: as to those who stood out, many of them were put to death, some fled the kingdom, and others were imprisoned, among whom was Mortimer, whom the Spencers confined in the Tower. The earl of Lancaster, with what troops he could raise, retired into the North, in order to join the Scots: he was taken and beheaded at Pontefract, 9 lords of his party were executed at York, and others in other parts of the kingdom. The Spencers now exercised their exorbitant power without controul; and Mortimer, after having been twice condemned, and twice pardoned, by the influence of the queen, made his escape to France, where the queen soon followed, under pretence of bringing about an accommodation between her brother and her husband, but with a full intention to be revenged on the Spencers, who had taken all measures to mortify her; and afterwards got her son over, to do homage for Guienne and Ponthieu, which she had persuaded his father to resign to him. Edward sent letter after letter, commanding the queen to return with her son; but she always made some excuse or other, all the while plotting to dethrone her husband. All the English who had taken refuge in France, or had been banished, came in to her; amongst whom was Roger Mortimer, who became her chief counsellor. On Sept. 23, 1326, she embarked with a body of forces, though trusting more to her friends in the kingdom. Accordingly she was no sooner landed, than several lords joined her with a great number of forces; so that the king being deserted by all, concealed himself in the abbey of Neath. He had left Spencer, the father, in Bristol, which being soon taken, the old man was immediately hung up in his armour, without any formality. The city of London declared for the queen; and the bishop of Exeter, who endeavoured to keep it for the king, was beheaded by the populace. Prince Edward was now declared guardian of the realm; and search being made for the king, he was soon found where he lay concealed, having with him only young Spencer, chancellor Baldock, Simon de Reading, and a few domestics, every body else having deserted him. With these the unhappy king was conducted to Monmouth castle, and the bishop of Hereford was sent to demand the great seal of him; which he delivered up for the queen and prince to make use of it as they thought proper. The queen, having got the great seal, called a parliament in the imprisoned king's name; but before it met, she caused Spencer to be hanged on a gibbet 50 feet high and Simon de Reading on one 10 feet lower. The parliament being met, Jan. 1327, unanimously agreed, That the king should be deposed, and Edward his son made king in his room. The substance of the charge exhibited against him was, that he had not governed according to the laws of the land; in short, that he was found incorrigible, and without hopes of amendment. Prince Edward was immediately proclaimed king in Westminster hall, by the name of Edward III. But the generous young prince being he would not accept of the crown without his father's consent, it was thought necessary to send commissioners to oblige the king to resign the crown to his son. The king came out in a mourning habit, and wept away. On his coming to himself, they presented to him the ill consequence that might attend his refusal, upon which he delivered the crown, scepter, and other ensigns of royalty into their hands, and made a formal resignation of the regal authority; upon which sir Thomas Blount the high constable took his staff, and declared all the king's officers discharged. Thus ended the reign of Edward II. Jan. 20, 1327, in the 20th year, & 43d of his age. Besides Edward, who succeeded him, he had another son, called John of Eltham, and two daughters, Joanna married to David king of Scots, and Eleanor sister to the Duke of Guelder. Edward is said to have resembled his father in the accomplishments of his person, as well as in his countenance; but in other respects he seems to have inherited only the defects of his character; for he was cruel and illiberal, without his valour or capacity. He had levity, indolence, and irresolution, in common with other weak princes; but the distinguishing foible of his character was that unaccountable passion for the reigning favourite, to which he sacrificed every other consideration of policy and convenience, and at last fell a miserable victim. In this reign there was the most terrible earthquake that had ever been felt in England, and a dreadful famine, which lasted three years, and destroyed a vast number of people. During this time, the brewing any sort of beer was prohibited on pain of death, that the corn which used to be consumed that way might be applied to the making of bread. This period is also remarkable for the total suppression of the Knights Templars, not only in England, but all over Christendom; and their estates were assigned to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, now called knights of Malta. This suppression was said to be owing to their enormous vices.

EDWARD III. was proclaimed king on Jan. 20, 1327, and was crowned on the 26th at Westminster, being then in the 14th year of his age. The beginning of his reign gave people room to think they had not changed for the better, which was owing to the bad administration of the queen, who was directed in every thing by Mortimer, who acted more like a sovereign than a subject; and though the parliament had appointed 12 regents during the king's minority, yet Isabella had seized the government into her own hands. King Rob. Bruce, thinking to take the advantage of Edward's minority, broke the truce with the English, and sent an army of 20,000 men to ravage the countries bordering on Scotland. Edward, exasperated at this, marched an army of 60,000 men, including the Hainaulters, lately brought over; but just as the king was going to head them at York, a quarrel arose between the English and Hainaulters, which came to blows, and a great deal of blood was spilt. This occasioned their stay at York longer than was convenient, which gave the Scots opportunity of ravaging the country, and posting themselves so that the king could not come to give them battle. The late king was all this time a close prisoner in Kenilworth castle. His harsh treatment began to raise compassion in the people, and Henry of Lancaster entertained some thoughts of setting him at liberty. To prevent this, Lancaster was discharged, and sir John Maltravers and sir John Gurney, two men of a brutish disposition were appointed in his room. They were ordered to remove him from Kenilworth to Berkley castle, where they received orders to put him to death, which they executed in a barbarous manner: they put a pillow on his face to keep him from crying out, thrust a pipe up his fundament, that no scar might appear, and through it run a red-hot iron into his bowels; in which exquisite torture he expired, after he had been deposed about 8 months. The wretches who perpetrated this horrid murder came to miserable ends; Gurney dying abroad by the hands of the executioner, and Maltravers perishing in exile. His body was buried in a private manner in the abbey-church at Gloucester, and it was given out that he died a natural death. In 1328, the young king's marriage with Philippa of Hainault was solemnized, and the same year a treaty of peace was made with Scotland; king Edward renouncing all pretensions to that kingdom, and the princess Joanna, his sister, being given to prince David, the king of Scotland's son. Charles, the brother of queen Isabella, dying without issue male, Edward, as next heir, sent to demand the crown of France; but Philip de Valois, cousin-german to the late king, caused himself to be crowned. Edward was obliged to let the matter lie dormant for the present, and went over to France in 1329, to pay homage for Guienne and Ponthieu, having privately protested before-hand against the homage he was going to pay. Upon his return to England in 1330, the conduct of the queen and Mortimer were represented to him in such a light, that he caused them both to be seized at Nottingham; then calling a parliament, he told them, that, with the consent of his subjects, he intended to take upon himself the government, though he was not yet at the age prescribed by the law; to which the parliament readily assented. The first thing he did was to seize the extravagant dower of the queen, amounting to two thirds of the revenue of the crown, and then confined her in the castle of Rising, for the remainder of her life, which lasted 28 years; and Mortimer was hanged as a traitor, on the common gallows at Tyburn. The same year the king had a son born to him, who was named Edward. The art of weaving woollen cloth was about this time brought from Flanders into England, by John Kempe, to whom king Edward granted his protection, and invited over fullers, dyers, and other artificers belonging to that manufacture, which has since proved so advantageous to England. Edward now intended to break the dishonourable treaty that queen Isabella and Mortimer had drawn him in to make with Scotland. He set Edward Baliol, son of John Baliol, whom Edward I. had made king of Scotland, upon the throne, and young king David was obliged to fly into France; soon after which Baliol was crowned at Scone, and did the same homage to king Edward for Scotland, as his father had done to Edward I. The king of England marched an army to lay siege to Berwick, which was still in king David's hands. The regent of Scotland advanced with a great army to its relief, but Edward met him at Halydon hill, and in a bloody battle, A. D. 1333, entirely routed him; after which Berwick surrendered, which Edward annexed for ever to the crown of England. However, the Scots drove Baliol out of the kingdom; upon which Edward marched with a numerous army in 1335, and attacked Scotland by sea and land, whereupon they submitted. Edward returned to England, leaving the earl of Athol to command in his absence; who, as he was besieging Kildrummy, was attacked, defeated, and slain, by Dunbar and Douglas, who marched to the relief of the place. This occasioned Edward once more to march into Scotland, where he ravaged the counties that had revolted. Then, leaving a small army under Baliol, he came back to England, being now bent upon putting his project against France into execution. He maintained, that the Salic law, in excluding females, did not exclude their male issue, and he was encouraged in his undertaking by Robert d'Artois, whom Philip had disgusted. In 1337 he called a parliament, chiefly to settle the business of the woollen manufacture. He now created his eldest son duke of Cornwall, who was the first in England who had the title of Duke; and ever since the eldest son of the king of England is by birth duke of Cornwall. The first step Edward took was to order the duke of Brabant to demand the crown of France in his name; at the same time making him his lieutenant-general for that kingdom, and commanding the French, whom he styled his subjects, to obey him. In 1338 he set sail with a considerable fleet, and arrived at Antwerp, where he made a long stay, to settle some matters of importance. The first campaign was not opened till Sept. 1339, which ended without bloodshed. The next year Edward took the title of king of France, using it in all public acts, and quartered the arms of France with his own, adding this motto, Dies et non Domit, God and my right. He soon after obtained a great victory over the French at sea; for with a fleet of 300 sail, attacking the French fleet of 400, he took or sunk almost all of them. However, a truce was agreed on, by the mediation of the pope, for three years. Edward also made a truce with David for two years, who was returned into Scotland with troops from France. Whilst these truces subsisted, Edward called a parliament, in which he solemnly confirmed all the liberties contained in the great charter, and created his son Edward prince of Wales. In 1346, Edward landed in Normandy, with his son the prince of Wales who was now about 16 years of age, and, after ravaging the country, encamped at Cressy; and on Aug. 26, 1346, a very obstinate and bloody battle was fought, which proved fatal to the French. The prince of Wales, young as he was, performed wonders. To him the victory was chiefly owing, the king his father leaving him the honour of it. Philip was wounded in the neck and thigh, and being forced to retire, the victory was soon completed. There were slain in this battle, the king of Bohemia, who was blind; the earl of Ardenon, Philip's brother; the duke of Lorraine; the earls of Flanders and Blois; 1500 other eminent noblemen, and

150 knights, and above 30 French standards taken. It is said that in this famous battle the English first made use of cannon, then unknown to the French. After this, Edward besieged Calais, which held out a year; and he at last reduced it by famine, and then concluded to a year's truce. During the siege of Calais, the king of Scots advanced as far as Durham at the head of a numerous army; but queen Philippa, marching against him, defeated him, and took him prisoner. King David remained a prisoner eleven years, and then was released upon giving 20 hostages to pay 100,000 marks, at 10,000 a year, till all was paid. A ten years truce was at this time concluded between the two kingdoms. David died in 1368, and left his crown to Robert Stuart, his nephew. Not long after the taking of Calais, Edward instituted the most famous order of knighthood in the world, viz. that of the Garter. About the same time, the merchants having complained of the depredations committed by some Spanish ships on the English coast, Edward did not disdain to go in person with some ships, and give chase to those corsairs. He took 26 of their large ships, sunk some, and dispersed the rest. Philip de Valois, dying in 1350, left his son his successor, who prolonged the truce to 1364, and then to the year following; but it was ill observed on both sides. When it was near expiring, Edward invested the prince of Wales with the duchy of Guienne, and sent him thither to prosecute the war; who having advanced to the gates of Bourges, upon his return, was met by the king of France with an army of 60,000 men, near Poitiers: and here a memorable battle was fought, on Sept. 19, 1356, in which the prince of Wales, notwithstanding the vast superiority of the French, gained a complete victory, and took king John prisoner, with Philip, his fourth son. The Duke of Bourbon, the constable of France, the marshal de Sancerre, above 50 other great lords, and 800 gentlemen, were slain. A truce for two years was soon after agreed on, and the prince came over to England, bringing the captive king along with him, who was treated with the utmost respect by all the royal family. King Edward agreed upon a treaty with the king of England, in order to recover his liberty; but the states of France refused to ratify it: upon which, Edward, in 1369, went over to France with an army of 100,000 men, with an intent to subdue that kingdom; but he did not try his point; for, though he ravaged the country to the very gates of Paris, yet he could by no means draw the dauphin and the pope out to an engagement; so that his army moldering away with sickness, and tired with fruitless attempts, he consented to a treaty of peace, which was signed May 8, 1360, where the king of France was to pay three millions of crowns of gold for his ransom, and the king of England was to hold Guienne, Gascon, towns, castles, and territories, and sever-

ral other places; and king John was set at liberty, returned to France, and fulfilled the treaty. In 1363, king John came over to England again, about some matters of importance, and was very honourably received by king Edward. The kings of Scotland and Cyprus being in England at the same time, sir Henry Picard, citizen and wine-merchant of London, entertained the four kings and their retinues with a magnificent feast at his own house. King John died in England, April 8, following. In 1366, pope Urban V. in a haughty manner demanded the tribute which king John of England obliged himself and his successors to pay to the holy see, of which there were 30 years due. But both king and parliament so vigorously opposed this imposition, declaring king John's engagement to be null, as without consent of parliament, and contrary to his coronation oath, that the pope thought fit to drop it; and neither Edward nor his successors had any more trouble on that head. In 1368 Edward lost his second son, Lionel, duke of Clarence. The year following, Charles V. of France broke the treaty of Bretagne, and declared war against Edward; and the English were so unfortunate as to be deprived of all their late acquisitions in France, except Calais. However, a truce was concluded between the two crowns in 1374. At the beginning of this war queen Philippa died. King Edward, now in his old-age, fell in love with Alice Perrers, one of the ladies of the bedchamber to queen Philippa, of whom he was so fond as to squander the public money on her. The parliament obliged him to send her away, but he soon recalled her. On June 8, 1376, died Edward prince of Wales, the delight of the nation, in the 46th year of his age. He was called the Black Prince, from his wearing black armour. The parliament attended his corpse to Canterbury, where he was interred. He had married Joanna, daughter to Edmund earl of Kent, who was beheaded by the intrigues of Isabella and Mortimer, at the beginning of this reign. By her he left one son, Richard, about ten years old, whom the king his grandfather created prince of Wales and earl of Chester, designing him for his successor. King Edward died at Sheen, June 21, 1377, in the 65th year of his age, and 51st of his reign, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. This great prince, when he drew near his end, saw himself deserted by every body. Alice, his favourite, when she saw him dying, seized upon every thing that was valuable, even to the ring on his finger. He had, besides his two sons already mentioned, William, who died an infant; John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; Edmund surnamed of Langley, earl of Cambridge, and duke of York; William of Windsor, who died young; and Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester. He had also five daughters. Edward III. was undoubtedly one of the greatest princes that ever swayed the scepter of England; whether we respect him as a warrior or lawgiver, a monarch or a man. He possessed the courage and romantic spirit of Alexander; the penetration, the fortitude, the polished manners, of Julius; the munificence, the liberality, the wisdom of Augustus Cæsar. He was tall, majestic, finely shaped, with a piercing eye, and aquiline visage. He excelled all his contemporaries in feats of arms and personal address. He was courteous, affable, and eloquent; of a free deportment, and agreeable conversation; and had the art of commanding the affection of his subjects without seeming to solicit popularity. He was a constitutional knight-errant; and his example diffused the spirit of chivalry through the whole nation. In imitation of the youthful monarch, who delighted in tilts and tournaments, every individual betook himself to the exercise of arms, every breast glowed with emulation, every heart panted with the thirst of glory; and when he took the field, there was not a soldier in his army who did not serve from sentiment, and fight for reputation. The love of glory was certainly the predominant passion of Edward, to the gratification of which he did not scruple to sacrifice the feelings of humanity, the lives of his subjects, and the interest of his country; and nothing could have induced or enabled his people to bear the load of taxes with which they were encumbered in this reign, but the love and admiration of his person, the fame of his victories, and the excellent laws and regulations, which the parliament enacted with his advice and concurrence. In this reign lived the famous Dr. John Wickliff, the first celebrated English reformer.

EDWARD IV. earl of March, son of Richard, Duke of York, who was slain in the battle of Wakefield, was about 19 years of age when he was proclaimed king, on March 5, 1461, in the room of Henry VI. by virtue of an extraordinary kind of election; for the earl of Warwick having drawn up his troops in St. John's Fields, and caused the people who came out to see them to form a ring, he stood in the middle, and asked them with a loud voice, first, whether they would have Henry of Lancaster for king? They all cried "No, No." Then he demanded of them, whether they would have Edward, son of the late duke of York, for their king? To which the whole multitude answered with loud acclamations, expressing their assent. This done, he assembled a great council of the nobles and magistrates in and about London, who declared the crown was devolved on Edward; and accordingly made him an offer of it, which, with a great shew of modesty, he accepted. In the beginning of his reign he caused a tradesman of London to be executed, for saying he would make his son heir to the crown; meaning, as he said, his own house, which had that sign. A few days after his proclamation, he put himself at the head of an army of 40,000 men, in order to march against queen Margaret, whose army was increased to 60,000, and gained a complete victory over the queen's army, in a great battle between Caxton and Tewton, in Yorkshire, which was fought on Palm-Sunday, and continued from morning to night, in which it is said near 37,000 lost their lives. He then returned to London, where he arrived on June 8, and was crowned the 29th. Shortly after king Edward called a parliament, which approved of his coronation, confirmed his title, and repealed all the acts which had been made against the house of York. Queen Margaret, having received succours from France, entered Northumberland, with Henry and the prince her son, in 1463; but her army was defeated, and Henry, Margaret, and her son, escaped, and fled into Scotland. Soon after Edward concluded a truce with France, with the duke of Burgundy, and with Scotland. Henry came privately into England, hoping to conceal himself there, till he should have an opportunity of escaping by sea; but, unhappily, being discovered, and seized at Waddington-hall, in Lancashire, whilst he was at dinner, he was, in an ignominious manner, conducted to London, and confined in the Tower. Margaret went over, with the young prince, to René of Anjou, her father. King Edward granted pardon to all Henry's friends, excepting only Ralph Grey and Humphry Nevil. In 1464 the king fell desperately in love with Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Richard Woodville, and widow of Sir John Grey. He made her his wife, and immediately created Sir Richard Woodville, the queen's father, earl of Rivers, who soon after was made treasurer and high-constable of England; and Anthony Woodville, his son, was married to the richest heiress in England. This marriage displeased the nation, particularly the earl of Warwick, who had just concluded a match for the king with the queen of France's sister, and who was resolved to use his utmost efforts to depose him. In 1469 he fomented an insurrection in Yorkshire, and the malecontents met the earl of Pembroke, with the king's forces, near Banbury, in Oxfordshire, where a battle was fought, in which Pembroke was defeated, and being taken, was beheaded by the rebels, with Sir Richard Herbert, his brother. In Northamptonshire the rebels went in a tumultuous manner to a mansion-house of the earl of Rivers, the queen's father, seized him, and beheaded him at Northampton. The king, no way suspecting Warwick, granted him and his brother a commission to raise troops, which they did, and declared for the rebels. The king hereupon marched against them in person, and whilst a negotiation was on foot, in order to an accommodation, the earl of Warwick attacked the king's camp in the night, put them in the utmost confusion, and took the king prisoner, who was conducted to Middleham-castle, in Yorkshire: this was in 1470. Edward found means to make his escape, by bribing his guard, and went to London; and now both sides prepared for war,

Sir

Sir Robert Wells went to raise forces in Lincolnshire, and was met by the king at Stamford, who routed his whole army, and Wells himself was taken and beheaded. Warwick and Clarence retired into France, to concert new measures. Lewis having furnished the earl of Warwick with money and troops, he set sail with the duke of Clarence, landed at Dartmouth, and his army was soon increased to 60,000. He forthwith proclaimed Henry VI. and marched in pursuit of Edward, who fled, and took refuge in Holland; and then, in Oct. 1470, the earl of Warwick released king Henry out of the Tower, after a six years imprisonment, who was solemnly proclaimed on the 14th as again ascending the throne. A parliament was now called, which met on November 20, and voted Edward a traitor and usurper, confiscated all his estates, annulled all the acts made in his reign, and declared all those to be rebels who had borne arms in defence of Edward's pretended right. The duke of Burgundy, to whom Edward had fled for protection, having furnished him with some money, ships, and men, he landed at Ravenspur, in Yorkshire, 1471, and, having gained over the duke of Clarence, marched to London, and entered the city amidst the acclamations of the people. Henry, after a seven months phantom of sovereignty, was sent again to the Tower. On April 14, a fierce battle was fought between the king and the earl of Warwick at Barnet, which began early in the morning, and continued till noon; but Warwick's army, being overpowered, was put to the rout, great numbers being slain upon the spot, with the earl himself, and the marquis of Montague, his brother. Queen Margaret, who, with prince Edward her son, was just arrived from France, was very much shocked with the news; and, abandoning herself to grief and despair, took sanctuary at the abbey of Beaulieu, in Hampshire. But the duke of Somerset, the earl of Pembroke, and the other lords, persuading her to try her fortune once more, by putting the prince of Wales, her son, at the head of an army, she consented, and those lords, in a very short time, got together a good number of troops. The king marched against them; and, coming up with them at Tewksbury, where they entrenched themselves, eight days after the battle of Barnet, entered their camp, and entirely routed them with a terrible slaughter. The queen, the prince of Wales, and the duke of Somerset were taken: the last was beheaded; the prince, then 18 years old, was stabbed to death in cold blood; and queen Margaret was imprisoned in the Tower, where she remained till 1475, and was ransomed by Lewis XI. for 50,000 crowns. As to Henry VI. he was murdered in the Tower, in the 50th year of his age. The king, not content with the severity he had exercised against the Lancastrian party, completed the tragedy in 1478, by the death of his own brother, the duke of Clarence, being instigated thereto by the queen, the duke of Gloucester, and the rest of Clarence's enemies. And now Edward gave himself up to his pleasures, in which he was extravagantly profuse, which put him upon extorting money from his subjects by very cruel methods. He was seized with a violent fever, which carried him off on April 9, 1483, in the 42d year of his age, and 23d of his reign. He had a great many mistresses, among whom was Jane Shore, wife to a citizen of London. By his queen Elizabeth he had Edward, prince of Wales, who succeeded him; and Richard, duke of York; Elizabeth, who was married to king Henry VII; Cicely, married to lord Wells; Anne, married to Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk; Bridget, who was a nun; Mary, who died unmarried; and Catharine, whose husband was William Courtney, lord of Devonshire. Edward was a prince of the most elegant person and insinuating address; endowed with the utmost fortitude and intrepidity; possessed of uncommon sagacity and penetration; but, like all his ancestors, was brutally cruel and vindictive, perfidious, lewd, perjured, and rapacious; without one liberal thought, without one sentiment of humanity.

EDWARD V. then about 12 years old, was proclaimed immediately after the death of his father, though he was never crowned; being deposed by his uncle Richard duke of Gloucester, who got himself to be proclaimed king, June 20, 1483, and afterwards procured the murder of his nephews, Edward V. and Richard duke of York, by two ruffians, who rushing into their chamber in the Tower, stifled them in their bed, and then buried them under the stair-case. This Sir James Tyrrel, whom Richard had made Governor of the Tower for this purpose, confessed at his execution in the next reign. Edward V. reigned two months and 12 days.

EDWARD VI. the only son of Henry VIII. by his queen Jane Seymour, succeeded his father at the age of nine years and three months, and was a prince of excellent qualities. He was proclaimed Jan. 31, 1547, by the name of Edward VI. and crowned Feb. 20. The late king had appointed a regency during his minority, which was fixed to his 18th year. The regency, being met, thought proper to choose a president, with the title of protector of the Realm, and Governor to the King, who was to do nothing without the consent of the majority. The choice fell upon the earl of Hertford, the king's uncle, who was afterwards made duke of Somerset. In this reign many learned reformers took refuge in England, on whom king Edward bestowed pensions. In 1553, the young king fell into a consumption, and died July 6, being in the 16th year of his age, having reigned six years, five months and nine days. He was a prince of fine accomplishments. He kept a journal, which is preserved in the British Museum, in which he regularly entered all the important transactions of his reign. He was remarkably pious, and continued firmly attached to those principles of the reformation, which he had imbibed while young, and which made a great progress in his reign. He confirmed his father's grant of Christ's and St. Bartholomew's hospitals, and founded Bridewell and St. Thomas's hospitals. He also founded several schools, which were mostly endowed out of the church-lands. Edward is celebrated by historians for the beauty of his person, the sweetness of his disposition, and the extent of his knowledge. By the time he had attained his 16th year, he understood the Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish languages; he was versed in the sciences of logic, music, natural philosophy, and master of all the theological disputes; in so much that the famous Hieronymus Cardanus, in his return from Scotland, visiting the English court, was astonished at the progress he had made in learning, and afterwards extolled him in his works as a prodigy of nature. Notwithstanding these encomiums, he seems to have had an ingredient of bigotry in his disposition which would have rendered him very troublesome to those of tender consciences, who might have happened to differ from him in religious principles; nor can we reconcile either to his boasted humanity or penetration, his consenting to the death of his uncle, who had served him faithfully, unless we suppose he wanted resolution to withstand the importunities of his minister, and was deficient in that vigour of mind, which often exists independent of learning and culture.

EDWINSTONE, a village in Nottinghamshire, six miles N. E. of Mansfield.

EDWY succeeded Edred in 958, and was no sooner on the throne, than he commanded Dunstan, who had been treasurer to the late king, to give an account of the money entrusted to him. Dunstan refused to obey, alleging the money had been expended for pious uses. The king's council were not for pushing this affair any farther, for fear of the people, who had a high notion of Dunstan's sanctity, and an extravagant veneration for the monks and their religious houses; so that they branded every one who spoke against them as impious and profane. However, to mortify the abbot, the monks were turned out of the benefices they had invaded, and the secular priests restored. Upon this the monks vented the most bitter invectives imaginable. Dunstan, who was supposed to be the chief author of the clamours, was banished, or, as some say, voluntarily retired to a monastery in Flanders. And now the monks with all their might cried down the government of the young king, and represented him as the most impious of men. This soon occasioned an insurrection in Mercia; and Edgar, the king's brother, headed the revolvers; and, having secured that part of the country, he marched into Northumberland and East Anglia, where the Danes (always glad of any disturbance among the English) joined him. Edwy was unprepared to quell this rebellion, not imagining it was in the power of the monks to do so much mischief, and knowing that neither the people nor his brother had any just cause of complaint. Such however was the event, that he could only keep Wessex, which preserved its fidelity to him, and was forced to deliver up all the rest, of which Edgar was at length chosen the head, with the title of King of Mercia. Edwy did not long survive this partition; for being vexed at his being deprived of his dominions, and that the monks had thus got the better of him, he fell into a deep melancholy, which put an end to his life, after he had reigned a little above four years. He was buried at Winchester.

TO EEK, v. a. [eecon, Sax.] to make bigger by the addition of another piece; to supply any deficiency, sometimes including the idea of bungling, or botching; used with the particle on.

EEL, f. in Natural History, a fish of the serpentine kind.

EFF. See EFF.

TO EFFACE, v. a. [effacer, Fr.] to destroy any painting; to spoil the form of any piece of carving; to blot out; to destroy all marks or traces of a thing from the mind.

EFFE'CT, f. [effectus, Lat.] that which is produced by an operating cause; a consequence; advantage; profit or service. In the plural, goods, furniture, or moveables.

TO EFFE'CT, v. a. [efficio, Lat.] to bring to pass; to attempt with success; to produce as a cause, or by the application of power.

EFFE'CTIBLE, a. that which may be produced, done, or performed.

EFFE'CTIVE, a. having the power to produce an effect. Actively, proper for action.

EFFE'CTIVELY, ad. with power; powerfully; really; entirely.

EFFE'CTLESS, a. without effect; without causing any change or alteration by the application of power; without producing any effect.

EFFE'CTOR, f. [lat.] one who produces any effect; one who is the cause of a thing.

EFFE'CTUAL, a. [effectuel, Fr.] producing the object, end, or design, for which it is intended. SYNON. With respect to these two words, that of efficacious seems not so powerful as that of effectual. The first gets the better of most obstacles; the last, of all. By an efficacious remedy we put an effectual stop.

EFFE'CTUALLY, ad. in such a manner as to produce the end for which it is applied.

TO EFFE'CTUATE, v. a. [effectuer, Fr.] to bring to pass; to accomplish.

EFFE'MINACY, f. the acting like a woman; softness, or want of those qualities which distinguish and become a man.

EFFE'MINATE, a. [effeminatus, Lat.] void of the qualities which distinguish and adorn the male sex; acting or behaving like a woman; voluptuous, or luxurious.

TO EFFE'MINATE, v. a. [effemino, Lat.] to make womanish.

EFFE'MINATION, f. the quality, or cause rust of rendering a person womanish.

To EFFERVE'SCE, [effervescere] v. a. [effervescere, Lat.] to grow warm, or produce heat by fermentation, or the motion of the particles of a body among themselves.

EFFERVESCENCE, f. [from effervescere, Lat.] the production of heat by intestine motion. Among Chemists, it is that intestine motion, excited in various fluids, either by the mixture of fluids with others of a different nature or by dropping salts or powders of various kinds into fluids.

EFFETE, a. [effetus, Lat.] barren; worn out with age.

EFFICACIOUS, [efficacibus] a. [efficax, Lat.] producing the effect or end intended.

EFFICACIOUSLY, [efficaciously] ad. in such a manner as to produce the effect or end intended.

EFFICACY, [efficacy] f. the power of producing the end or effect intended. Applied to speech, persuasion.

EFFICIENCY, or EFFICIENCY, [efficacia, or efficacia] f. [from efficio, Lat.] the power of producing effects or changes in things or persons; agency.

EFFICIENT, [efficient] f. [efficiens, Lat.] one that makes or causes things to be what they are.

EFFICIENT, [efficient] a. [efficiens, Lat.] having the power to produce or cause alteration or change in things, either by altering the qualities, or introducing the new ones.

EFFIGY, f. [effigies, Lat.] the resemblance, or representation of any thing drawn, painted, or carved. An idea, applied to the mind.

EFFLORESCENCE, or EFFLORESCENCE, [effloresco, Lat.] in Botany, a production of flowers. In Natural History, an exuberance in form of flowers. In Medicine, a breaking out of some humours, &c. in the skin.

EFFLORESCENT, a. [efflorescens, Lat.] breaking out in the shape of flowers. In Medicine, appearing in pimples or other eruptions on the skin.

EFFLUENCE, f. [from effluo, Lat.] that which flows from some principle.

EFFLUVIA, or EFFLUVIUM, f. [Lat.] the small particles continually emitted by, or flowing from, a body, which, though they do not sensibly decrease the body from whence they proceed, have perceptible effects on the senses.

EFFLUX, f. [effluxus, Lat.] the act of flowing out; effusion; spreading; or the visible effect of some cause; that which flows from something else; an emanation.

To EFFLUX, v. n. [effluo, Lat.] to flow out; to move in succession.

EFFLUXION, f. [effluxio, Lat.] that which flows out. The action of flowing out.

EFFORMATION, f. the act of giving shape to, or making.

EFFORT, f. [effort, Fr.] a struggle; a labour; or vehement exertion of power.

EFFUSION, f. [effusio, Lat.] the act of digging from the ground.

EFFRONTERY, f. [effronterie, Fr.] an immodest and undaunted boldness, by which a person is capable of undertaking any action, including the idea of impudence and daring.

EFFULGENCE, f. [effulgencia, Lat.] splendor, or a glorious degree of light.

EFFULGENT, a. [effulgens, Lat.] shining with a superlative degree of light or splendor.

To EFFUSE, [effuse] v. a. [effusus, Lat.] to pour out; to spill.

EFFUSION, f. [effusio, Lat.] the act of pouring out; shedding; the act of uttering or pronouncing with fluency; profusion, or generous giving. Figuratively, the thing poured out.

EFFUSIVE, [effusive] a. pouring out.

EFT, f. [eft, Sax. called likewise an vet] a small kind of animal, having four feet and a long tail, resembling the lizard, or crocodile, and to be found in watery places.

E'GBERT, king of Wessex, became monarch of England, by the conquest of the other kingdoms, in the year 827 or 828. Before the reduction of the heptarchy, he subdued the Britons in Cornwall, and also those of Venedosia, which was one of the three kingdoms into which Wales was divided. After he was crowned king of England (being the first) he reigned in peace for some time, enjoying the fruits of his victories. In 833, the Danes arrived at Charmouth, in Dorsetshire, with 35 vessels, and, meeting with no opposition, furiously ravaged the country. Egbert marched against them, and was entirely defeated, after a long and bloody battle; and Egbert himself narrowly escaped, by the favour of a dark night. In 835, another body of Danish pirates landed near Hengton-hill, in Cornwall, over whom Egbert gained an entire victory. Egbert reigned in all 37 years as king of Wessex only; seven years as monarch, or chief, of the seven kingdoms; and 10 years as real monarch, or king of all England. He died in 838, and was buried at Winchester.

E'GER, f. See EAGER.

EGG, f. [æg, Sax.] in Natural History, a part formed in the females of certain animals, which under a shell, more or less spherical, includes the young of the same species.

E'GYPT, a celebrated and considerable country of Africa, about 550 miles in length, and 125 in breadth, where broadest. It is bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean Sea, on the S. by Nubia, on the E. by the Red-Sea and the isthmus of Suez, and on the W. by the kingdom and desert of Barca. Since Egypt has been under the dominion of the Turks, it has been governed by a bashaw, who resides at Cairo. Under him there are inferior governors, in the several parts of this country : those in Upper Egypt are generally Arabs, who pay tribute to the Grand-Seignior, and make presents to the bashaw, living like little tyrants, and are frequently at war with each other. Besides these, there are several Sheiks, who preside over particular places, and are masters of a few villages. The inhabitants are of four sorts, Turks, Moors, Arabs, and Christians, Cophts, or Cophtis, besides Greeks, Jews, and other foreigners. With regard to the complexion of the Egyptians, it is tawny, and the farther S. the more dark, inasmuch that those on the confines of Nubia are almost black. They are most of them very indolent and cowardly, and the richer sort do nothing all day but drink coffee, smoke tobacco, and sleep : besides this, they are extremely ignorant, proud, haughty, and ridiculously vain. It rains very seldom in Egypt ; but that want is happily supplied by the regular inundation of the Nile, as is known to almost every one. The pyramids are taken notice of by all travellers into Egypt, and the largest of them takes up ten acres of ground, and is, as well as the rest, built upon a rock : the external part is chiefly of large square stones of unequal sizes, and the height of it about 700 feet ; but travellers differ in this respect. The caverns out of which they get the embalmed dead bodies is another curiosity much taken notice of : they are found in coffins set upright in the niches of the walls, and have continued there 4000 years, at least. Egypt lies between 29 and 38 degrees of longitude, and between 21 and 31 of latitude.

E'LI'ZABETH, daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Bolen, ascended the throne Nov. 17, 1558, being then 25 years old, pursuant to the order of succession settled by that king's will, authorized by act of parliament, and was crowned Jan. 15, 1559. As there were many troubles then in foreign states, chiefly on account of religion, she assisted the protestants in Scotland, France, and the Low Countries, against against their respective sovereigns, or the governing party, by whom they were cruelly oppressed and persecuted. The queen of Scots, and the dauphin her husband, had, by order of Henry II. of France, taken the arms of England, with the titles of sovereigns of that kingdom: this made Elizabeth look on Mary as a dangerous rival; whereupon she entered, 1560, a treaty with the Scotch malecontents, the assistance of which she sent an army into Scotland to break the measures of her enemies, which had the desired success. Some time after she assisted the Huguenots in France. By these means queen Elizabeth kept both France and Scotland so employed, that they could find no opportunity to put their schemes in execution of dethroning her. The pope was weary of sending a nuncio to England, who remained in Flanders, and demanded permission to continue his journey to England, which he could never obtain it; the queen saying she would do nothing to do with the pope, who had more authority than other bishops: and, for the security against the disturbance the pope would be given from any quarter, she kept a good fleet in readiness against his coming, and secured more and more the affections of her subjects, which she looked on as her only support. The queen of Scots, who was defeated in 1568 by the forces raised by the malecontents in that kingdom, was obliged to fly into England, where the queen kept her prisoner many years. The persecution of the protestants in the Low Countries occasioned several Flemish families to fly for refuge to England, the queen settled them at Colchester, Sandwich, and several other places, which turned greatly to the advantage of the nation, they being the first who discovered the art of making bays and other linnen and woollen cloths of the north. A rebellion broke out in the north, headed by the earl of Westmoreland and Northumberland, and Dacres, a northern gentleman, who demanded to have set Mary queen of Scots on the throne, and to have restored the popish religion. This rebellion queen Elizabeth suppressed, and the earl of Northumberland was executed; as was also the duke of Norfolk in 1572, who had been released out of the Tower, and was engaged again in a conspiracy against the queen. The year 1571 passed chiefly in a negotiation for a marriage between queen Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, second son to the king of France, and brother to Charles IX. of France. Both Charles and Elizabeth set their account in this negotiation, though neither of them intended it should take effect. Elizabeth's design was to amuse the protestants, and particularly the Huguenots, with whom he had made a perfidious peace, till he had drawn them into the snare, in order to destroy them by open force. Queen Elizabeth entered into the negotiation of the match to please her courtiers, who were continually pressing her to marry, in order to cut off all hopes from the queen of Scots, and to dishearten her enemies. However, a defensive alliance was concluded between the two crowns. Charles died, and was succeeded by the duke of Anjou, by the name of Henry III. with whom queen Elizabeth renewed the league between the two crowns, but under-hand supplied the prince of Condé with money for the Huguenots; so that she might justly be called the support of the protestant religion, both abroad and at home, having in the beginning of her reign removed all the zealous catholics from the councils and from all posts of authority, put protestants in their room, and published a proclamation allowing divine service to be performed and the holy Scriptures to be read in the vulgar tongue. Some time after another negotiation was carried on for a marriage between her and the duke of Alençon, now duke of Anjou, Henry's brother, even to the signing of her marriage-articles, and the duke came over in person; but it was all broke off on a sudden. One Stubbs had his right hand cut off on a scaffold for writing against the marriage; when he pulled off his hat with his left, and cried, God save the queen! In 1577 she assisted the people of the Low Countries, who were grievously oppressed by the duke of Alva, the king of Spain's general, and who was endeavouring to extirpate the protestants; she lent them 100,000l. sterling, to enable them to carry on the war. Some years after she sent a good body of forces under the earl of Leicester; but he, not being agreeable to the States, was recalled, and lord Willoughby was appointed general of the English forces in his room. This war at last concluded in the total revolt of seven of these provinces from the dominion of Spain, which now make the most considerable republic in the world. The pope excommunicated the queen; and the king of Spain and the duke of Guise were in a league with the pope to invade England, dethrone Elizabeth, and set up the queen of Scots in her room. In the mean time, several plots were set on foot by the popish emissaries to take away her life; for which several priests, Jesuits, and others, were executed. A general association was also formed in England, to prosecute to death such as should attempt any thing against her person or government. The parliament approved and confirmed this association, and passed a severe act against popish priests and Jesuits, whereby they were required to depart the kingdom, and, if any returned, they were to be guilty of high-treason, and those who harboured them, of felony. A little after the queen made an alliance with the king of Scotland for their mutual defence, and the security of the protestant religion. In 1585, she sent sir Francis Drake to America, who took several places in the Spanish West Indies. This year died the learned and ingenious sir Philip Sidney, of a wound he received in a battle in the Low Countries. In 1586, Babington's conspiracy, in which were engaged several popish priests

from the seminaries abroad, was discovered; and they were, to the number of 14, arraigned, condemned, and executed. It was laid for an invasion, to kill the queen, free the queen of Scots, and set her on the throne. As the queen of Scots appeared by letters and otherwise to have a hand in this conspiracy, it was resolved now to prosecute her on an act of parliament made the preceding year, whereby the person, for whom, or by whom, anything should be attempted against the queen, was liable to death. Commissioners were accordingly sent to try her at Fotheringham castle in Northamptonshire, where she was then in custody, who in the end passed sentence upon her on the 25th of Oct. Four days after it was approved and confirmed by parliament. On December 6th it was proclaimed in London, and then throughout the kingdom; and on February following the sentence was executed upon her in the hall of the said castle, by severing her head from her body, which she suffered with great calmness and resolution. Queen Elizabeth endeavoured by all methods to prevent the odium of this action falling upon her, fining secretary Davyson with whom the warrant was lodged, 10,000*l.* (and he was also imprisoned during her pleasure), and ordering her privy counsellors to be examined in the Star-chamber. In 1588, the king of Spain, encouraged by pope Sixtus V. sent a great fleet, to which they had given the title of the Invincible Armada, to invade England. It consisted of 130 great ships, 20 caravels, and 10 gallees, having above 20,000 soldiers on board, with seamen, ammunition, and provision, in proportion; to oppose which, 20,000 men were dispersed along the southern coasts, an army of 22,000 foot and 1000 horse was encamped at Tilbury, where the queen reviewed them, and made a very engaging speech to them: there was another army of 34,000 foot and 2000 horse, to guard the queen's person. Her subjects shewed the utmost readiness to stand in her defence; and she fitted out a considerable fleet, under the command of lord Howard as admiral, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, vice-admirals; and sent Seymour with 40 English and Dutch ships to the coast of Flanders, to hinder the prince of Parma from joining the Spanish fleet. On the 19th of July, the Spanish fleet, commanded by the duke of Medina Celi, entered the channel, when the English fleet kept close to them, and soon took some of their ships. On July, 24, there was a brisk engagement. On the 27th, the Spanish fleet came to an anchor off Calais, expecting in vain the prince of Parma to put to sea with his army, and make a descent on England, as it had been agreed. The English fleet, now consisting of 140 ships, several of which were fitted out by private persons, followed them; and the English admiral in the night sent 8 fire-ships among them, which so terrified them that they cut their cables and put to sea in the utmost confusion: the English admiral took the Gallees, and the commander of it was slain. In short, the whole fleet was dispersed, and the Spaniards resolved to make the best of their way home. Of this prodigious armament, only 60 ships returned home, and those in a shattered condition. Queen Elizabeth went in state to St. Paul's, to return Almighty God thanks for this great victory. In 1590, sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state, departed this life: he died so poor, that he was buried privately, to save expences. Sir Robert Cecil, son to the lord-treasurer Burleigh, succeeded him as secretary of state. In 1594, Roderigo Lopez, a Jew, who was the queen's physician, two Portuguese, and Patrick Cullen, an Irishman, were bribed by the Spanish governors of the Netherlands to take her away by poison, or otherwise; but the plot being discovered, the conspirators were seized and executed: as were Edmund York and Richard Williams, the next year, for undertaking to commit the same crime, on the promise of 40,000 crowns from the said Spanish governors. In 1596, the queen sent a fleet and army under Howard, the earl of Essex, and Raleigh, to the coasts of Spain, which plundered Cadiz, and burnt the merchant ships at Port Real, and took and destroyed 13 Spanish men of war, and did them other considerable damage. In 1598, Henry IV. of France, having made a separate peace with the king of Spain, queen Elizabeth and the States entered into a new treaty to carry on the war against that monarch by themselves. Lord Burleigh died this year, as did Spenser the poet. On February 25, 1601, Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, was beheaded. Towards the end of the year, complaints having been brought before the commons of certain monopolies authorized by her letters patent, as soon as she understood that the parliament deemed them so many infringements of the people's privileges, without staying to be addressed, she annulled most of them, and left the rest to the laws, upon which the commons waited upon her with an address of thanks. This year the earl of Tyrone, who had raised a rebellion in Ireland, was defeated, and obliged to cast himself upon the queen's mercy. In the beginning of the year 1603, queen Elizabeth falling sick, and her illness increasing every day; when she was near her end, the council sent some of their body to desire her to name her successor, when she named the king of Scots. She died the 24th of March, in the 70th year of her age, after a glorious reign of 44 years, 4 months, and 8 days. She was buried in Westminster-abbey. Elizabeth, in her person, was masculine, tall, straight, and strong limbed, with an high round forehead, brown eyes, fair complexion, fine white teeth, and yellow hair. She danced with great agility; her voice was strong and shrill: she understood music, and played upon several instruments. She possessed an excellent memory, understood the dead and living languages, had made good proficiency proficiency in the sciences, and was well read in history. Her conversation was sprightly and agreeable, her judgment solid, her apprehension acute, her application indefatigable, and her courage invincible. She was the great bulwark of the protestant religion; she was highly commendable for her general regard to the impartial administration of justice, and even for her rigid economy, which saved the public money, and evinced that love for her people which she so warmly professed: yet she deviated from justice in some instances, when her interests or passions were concerned; and, notwithstanding all her great qualities, we cannot deny that she was vain, proud, imperious, and in some cases cruel. Her predominant passions were jealousy and avarice; though she was also subject to such violent gusts of anger as overwhelmed all regard to the dignity of her station, and even hurried her beyond the bounds of common decency. She was wise and steady in her principles of government; and, above all princes, fortunate in a ministry. She established the protestant religion in her dominions, notwithstanding all the endeavours used to prevent it; and caused trade and commerce, which always met with her protection, to flourish. The Royal Exchange was built in her time by sir Thomas Gresham, and the present method of maintaining the poor, and choosing overseers in every parish, was established in this reign.

ENGLAND, [pronounced Ingland; so called from the Angles, who settled in these parts in the year 449, and were situated on the continent between the Saxon and Jutes] a considerable country of Europe, and the principal part of the island of Great Britain, surrounded on all sides by the sea, except, where Scotland lies, to the N. It is 400 measured miles in length, from Berwick upon Tweed to Chichester; and 370 in breadth, from Dover in Kent to Senap in Cornwall. But in other places it varies greatly, particularly in the breadth; for it grows narrower (but not gradually) from the southern coast to the town of Berwick: therefore it would be worth while, for a more particular account of it, to consult a good map. It is happily situated with regard to trade, there being many good towns and harbours on the sea-coast, which are particularly taken notice of in their proper places. The air is generally very good and wholesome, except in the hundreds of Essex and Kent, the fens in Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire, and some other low marshes near the sea. The winters indeed are sometimes rainy and foggy, and the weather is subject to great variations, which, however, does not much impair the health of the inhabitants, who are accustomed thereto; for they generally live as long as in any other countries, and we have frequent instances of people who have lived to a very great age; particularly Henry Jenkins, a Yorkshireman, who was 168 years old when he died; and Thomas Parr, of Shropshire, who was 152, and might have lived longer, if he had not been sent for up to court as a curiosity. The frequent rains, tho' they may sometimes damage the hay and corn, have yet their peculiar advantages; for upon that account they have generally good pastures throughout the year. There are thunder-forms, hurricanes, and earthquakes, as in other countries; but they are, in general, less violent, and do less damage. The principal rivers are the Thames, the Severn, the Trent, and the Ouse; besides a great number of others. England is a level and open country; for what hills there are, of any note, are chiefly towards the north: for this reason, it is extremely proper for the diversion of hunting. There are some remarkable forests; as Windsor Forest, the Forest of Dean, and the New Forest; which last was made by William the Conqueror, who demolished several towns and villages, and thirty-six parish-churches, in order to make it. The soil is different in different parts, but in general very fruitful. There are indeed many heaths, downs, and barren places, which, however, generally produce grass enough to feed flocks of sheep: besides, it is thought that the care and diligence of good husbandmen might turn many of them to great advantage. It produces all sorts of fruits, trees, and herbs which are proper to the climate. It must be acknowledged there are no vines that are so fit to produce good wine as in warmer countries; but then there are variety enough which yield good grapes, that are made use of as other fruits. However, there are great quantities of cyder, perry, mead, and several kinds of made wines; but the principal drink of the generality is beer, or ale. The English wool is famous all over the world, as well as the manufactures made therefrom; particularly broad-cloth, which is not to be equalled in any other country. There might also be excellent linen-manufactures, if it was worth white; but as they are come to a great perfection in all kinds of linen in Scotland and Ireland, where they can be made cheaper, we are now chiefly supplied from thence: what linen we have made amongst us, is generally the coarser sort, known by the name of Dowlas. Here are all sorts of materials for building; and there are excellent stone-quarries in several parts. The firing is pit coal, wood, and turf, which last is used where coals are dear; but in most counties there is plenty of pit-coal. It is generally said that there might be found coal-mines on Black-Heath; but they are not permitted to be opened, because the ships which bring coals from Newcastle to London are a nursery for seamen. No country in the world is better-provided with horses of all sorts, and for every use; and particularly with regard to race-horses, they are seldom equalled by those of other countries. There are dogs of every kind, except wolf-dogs, which, since the wolves were destroyed in England, have been generally neglected; however, the race of these animals is still maintained in Ireland. But there is one sort that is not to be equalled in any part of the world, which is the bull-dog; for these will not only attack the fiercest bull, but any kind of wild beast; nor can any thing, when they have once fastened upon the animal, oblige them to let go their hold. But, what is more strange, when any of them are transported beyond sea, they lose their courage; and the same is said of English cocks. With regard to minerals, there are mines of iron, tin, lead, copper, and in some places silver, besides others of less note. As for the curiosities, they are mentioned in their proper places, when the counties in particular are treated of. As for the manners, customs, and abilities of the inhabitants, nothing need be said, because they fall under every one's own observations; nor yet of the government, religion, and laws, of which very few can be ignorant.

ENGLAND, NEW, a country of N. America, settled by the English. It comprehended four parts, viz. Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantation. At the conclusion of the American war, when the independency of the colonies was acknowledged by Great Britain, New England lost its name, and the four parts, which composed it, were erected into four United and Independent Provinces.

ENO'RMOUSNESS, f. excess of guilt or wickedness.

ENO'UGH, [enuff] a. [genob, Sax.] sufficient; that which will answer any purpose, wish, or design. It should be observed, that though other adjectives are placed in English before their substantives, yet this always follows it. SYNON. The object of the words sufficient and enough is quantity; but with this difference, that enough relates more to the quantity one desires to have, and sufficient to that quantity one really wants to employ. Thus the avaricious man never has enough; let him accumulate ever so much, he still desires more; and the prodigal never has sufficient, he still wanting to expend more than he has.

ENO'UGH, [enuff] f. that which is sufficient to answer a person's expectations or wishes; a quantity answerable to any design, or proportionable to a person's qualities and abilities.

ENO'UGH, [enuff] ad. in such a manner as to give content or satisfaction. When used for an adjective, it denotes a diminution, or that a thing is not perfectly so, and is used to express great indifference or slight. "The song was well enough;" i. e. not so well as it ought to be, or as it might be expected. When repeated, it is used as an interjection; implying that there is already more than a sufficiency, and that a person is desired to desist. "Henceforth I'll bear affliction, till it do cry itself—enough, enough!"

ENO'W, [enew] a. [the plural of enough, according to Johnson] a sufficient number. In this number it is used before its substantive; but in the singular, after it.

ETHELBALD had reigned two years as king of Wessex during his father's life, continued to possess that throne after his decease, and reigned but about two years and a half after his father's death: no remarkable event happened in his reign: he is handed down to us as a luxurious, debauched prince. He died in 860.

ETHELBERT, already in possession of the kingdom of Kent, succeeded to the whole monarchy, according to Ethelwulph's will. His reign of about six years is remarkable for nothing but the incursions of the Danes. He died in 866; and was buried at Sherborn.

ETHELRED I. succeeded Ethelbert in the kingdom of Kent, 866. In this reign the Danes became masters of Northumberland and East-Anglia, and resolved to push their conquests further, hoping in the end to subdue all England. With this view, Ivar king of Denmark, turned his arms against Wessex, and resolved to attack Ethelred: he landed his troops in that county, and advanced as far as Reading. Ethelred marched that way with his army: a war hereupon ensued, and Ethelred, within the space of one year, fought nine pitched battles with the Danes, in some of which he was victorious, in others not, but in all gave signal proofs of his courage and conduct; but unhappily in the last, which was fought near Wittingham, he received a mortal wound, of which he died in 872, in the 6th year of his reign. Ethelred has the character of a good prince.

ETHELRED II. succeeded Edward the Younger in 900: he was then about 12 years of age. In 981 the piratical Danes landed at Southampton, and, in short, for ten years together, with now and then a little intermission, there was nothing to be seen but plunderings, conflagrations, murders, and all the miseries imaginable. During this time the credit of the monks went down apace; the people began to wonder, that they, who could do so many miracles (as they pretended) on their own account, could not by their merits and prayers, prevent the calamities of the nation. Ethelred shewed them no manner of respect. In 990, Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, died. The Danes continually ravaged the kingdom, and Ethelred always bought them off when his forces had been defeated. The last money he paid them was 30,000*l.* which was levied by way of a tax called Dane-geld, and was the first land-tax in England. Upon this the Danes ceased their ravages, and most of them returned home; but as a great many of them, liking the country, staid behind, and England was well stocked with them before, they began now to take upon themselves to domineer over the English, who were perpetually in dread of new invasions. They lived in ease and pleasure, while the English were forced to labour and toil to satisfy their demands. Hence they gave them the name of Lord Danes, and to this day, in some parts of England, a rich, idle, imperious man is called in derision a Lurdane. Ethelred, having married Emma, sister to the duke of Normandy, and depending on his assistance when required, resolved on a general massacre of the Danes. He privately sent orders to all parts of the kingdom for this purpose, which were executed with such fury, that in one day, viz. Nov. 13, 1002, all the Danes were slain; though some think, that by all the Danes are meant only those lately settled in England, and dispersed in Wessex and Mercia. King Sweyn's sister, who was a Christian, and married to a noble Dane, who had been settled some time in England, fell among the rest. Ethelred was so cruel as to have her beheaded, after he had ordered her children to be killed before her face. Sweyn, king of Denmark, no sooner heard of this bloody tragedy, and the cruel murder of his sister, but he swore he would never rest till he had revenged so monstrous an outrage. He therefore equipped a fleet of 300 sail, and came not for plunder as before, but to destroy the country with fire and sword. He landed in Cornwall with a powerful army, marched to Exeter, and, having put the inhabitants to the sword, reduced it to ashes. Ethelred, who was betrayed on all hands, imprudently trusted the command of the army to the duke of Mercia, whom he had formerly banished, and whose son's eyes he had ordered to be put out; and he, in revenge, betrayed it to the Danes, as soon as he came in sight of them. The following spring, Sweyn landed and burnt Norwich and Thetford: soon after he engaged Ulfskete, duke of East-Anglia, the bravest of all Ethelred's subjects, and entirely defeated him. In 1005 there was a famine in England, which obliged the Danes to return home for want of subsistence; but they returned again. In short, the Danes, in 1013, made themselves masters of the whole kingdom, and Ethelred returned into Normandy with his whole family. Sweyn being now proclaimed king of England without any opposition, he laid a most heavy tax on the nation, for paying the Danish troops. He died suddenly in 1014. Upon Sweyn's death, the Danes proclaimed his son Canute king of England; but the English recalled Ethelred, and flock'd to him from all parts, so that he soon found himself at the head of a numerous army. Canute on a sudden embark'd his troops, to assert his right to that crown. In the mean time Ethelred governed as bad as ever. Canute, having settled affairs in Denmark, returned in about a year, and landed with a numerous army at Sandwich. Edmund, the king's eldest son, and his brother-in-law Edric, commanded the army against him; but Edric, in a little time, openly declared for Canute, and carried off with him a considerable body of troops, and 40 ships: after which Canute became master of several counties in Wessex, and Edmund marched into the north to join Uthred, earl of Northumberland. Canute followed him, and upon his coming Uthred submitted to him; but Canute, thinking him not to be trusted who changed sides by compulsion, caused him to be put to death. Ethelred died in 1016, in the 56th year of his age, after a most inglorious reign of 37 years.

ETHELWULPH, Egbert's only surviving son, succeeded his father in 838. In 840 a body of Danes landed on the coast of Wessex. Ethelwulph, notwithstanding he was averse to fighting, marched against them in person, but had the misfortune to be beaten. About this time the nation of the Picts, so formidable heretofore to the southern Britons, were entirely extirpated by their neighbours the Scots, after a long war between them. Ethelwulph, wearied with the repeated incursions of the Danes, delivered up to Athelstan, his natural son, Kent, Essex, and Suffex, with the title of king of Kent, contenting himself with the kingdom of Wessex, and the sovereignty of all England. In 852 the Danes came up the Thames, with a fleet of 300 ships, and pillaged London and other places; but Ethelwulph and Athelstan engaged them, near Okely, in Surry, in which the English gained the day, and made such a terrible slaughter of the Danes that but few escaped. The victory of Okely having delivered him from the fear of the Danes, he now had an opportunity of indulging his natural bent to devotion; and by the advice of Swithin, bishop of Winchester, who had always a great ascendancy over him, he is said to have granted to the church the tithes of all his dominions. In 855 he paid a visit to the pope in person, to receive his benediction, and extended the tax of Peter-pence all over his dominions, till then levied only in Wessex and Mercia. Having staid a year at Rome, he returned home through France, where he married Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, not above 12 years old. Whilst Ethelwulph was at Rome, Ethelbald entered into a conspiracy to dethrone his father, and to seize the kingdom; and made so great a party, that Ethelwulph was obliged to give up to him the kingdom of Wessex, and to rest contented with that of Kent for himself. Ethelwulph lived but about two years after this. He died in 857, after a reign of 20 years, and was buried at Winchester. He left by will his dominions to his second son Ethelbert, after him to his third son Ethelred, and then to Alfred his youngest, who all in their turn succeeded to the crown.

EU'ROPE, called by the people of Asia Frankistan, is one of the three general parts of our continent, and one of the four of the habitable world. It is bounded on the N. by the Frozen or Icy Sea, on the S. by the Mediterranean, on the W. by the Western and Northern Ocean, and on the E. by Asia. It lies between 9. 35. W. 72. 25. E. longitude, and between 35 and 72 degrees of N. latitude, though it does not fill up all that space. From Cape St. Vincent to the mouth of the river Oby, it is near 3600 miles in length; and from Cape Matapatam, in the Morea, to the N. Cape, in Lapland, it is about 2200 miles in breadth. It is much less than either Asia or Africa, but surpasses them in many particulars; and is entirely within the temperate zone, except a small part of Norway and Muscovy; so that there is neither the excessive heat, nor the insupportable cold, of the other parts of the continent. It does not abound in gold and silver mines, much less in precious stones; it produces neither sugar nor spices; nor does it nourish jackals, hyænas, lynxes, leopards, tygers, lions, rhinoceroses, elephants, dromedaries, camels, or crocodiles; but it produces corn, wine, fruit, sheep, oxen, horses, and all other necessaries of life. Besides, it is much more populous, and better cultivated, than either Asia or Africa. It is fuller of villages, towns, and cities; and the buildings are more strong, elegant and commodious, generally speaking, than in the two former. The inhabitants are all whites, and, for the most part, much better made than the African;

eans, or even the Asiatics. With respect to the division of Europe, it contains, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Great-Britain and Ireland, Muscovy, France, Germany, Poland, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Hungary, Switzerland, and Turkey in Europe, besides several small islands in the Mediterranean and elsewhere. There are three Emperors; namely, of Germany, Muscovy, and Turkey, which last is commonly called the Grand Seignior. The Pope is an ecclesiastical prince, and yet has several territories under his dominion. The Kings are those of Great Britain and Ireland, France, Spain, Portugal, Poland, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, Sardinia, Hungary, and the Two Sicilies. Besides, there is an Archduke of Austria, and a Great Duke of Tuscany. There are four considerable republics; namely, Venice, the states of Holland, the Swiss Cantons, and the republic of Genoa. There are four less, viz. of Geneva, Lucca, San-Marino, and Ragusa. The languages are, the Latin, of which the Italian, French, and Spanish, are dialects; the Teutonic, from which proceed those of Germany, Flanders, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and England; the Sclavonian, which reigns (though in disguise) in Poland, Muscovy, Bohemia, and a great part of Turkey in Europe; the Celtic, of which there are dialects in Wales, the Highlands of Scotland, Ireland, Bretagne in France, and Lapland. Besides these, there are the Greek, and several others. The principal rivers are, the Danube and the Rhine, in Germany; the Wolga and Dwina, in the Russian empire; the Loire, in France; and the Severn and Thames, in England. The chief lakes are those of Constance, in Germany; of Geneva and Guarda, in Italy; the Wener, in Sweden; and of Ladoga and Onega, in Russia. The chief mountains are, the Pyrenean, in Spain; the Alps in Italy; the Doffrin hills, in Sweden; the Crapach hills, in Hungary; and some of the mountains in Wales. The religions of Europe are the Jewish; and the Christian, divided into the Greek, Romish, and Protestant churches; as also the Mahometan.

In Commerce, the fixing of the actual momentary value of money between different countries; the thing given or received in lieu of another; the place where merchants meet to negotiate their affairs. A bill of exchange is that which is drawn by a person in one kingdom on one residing in another, for such a sum there as is equivalent to a sum paid or estimated here.

EXCHANGER, f. a person who remits money to foreign parts, or practises exchange.

EXCHEQUER, [exchequer] f. [eschiquier, Norman Fr.] in the British Jurisprudence, is an ancient court of record, in which all causes concerning the revenues and rights of the crown are heard and determined, and where the revenues are received. It took its name from the colour of the cloth which covered the tables of the court, which are party-coloured or chequered. This court is said to have been erected by William the Conqueror, its model being taken from a like court established in Normandy long before that time. Anciently its authority was so great, that it was held in the king's palace, and the acts thereof were not to be examined or controlled in any other of the king's courts; but at present, it is the last of the four courts of Westminster.

EXCISE, [excise] f. [accijs, Belg.] a certain duty or impost charged upon liquors, as beer, ale, cyder, &c. also, on several other commodities, within the kingdom of Great Britain; and is one of the most considerable branches of the king's revenue. In England, the commissioners are nine, each of whom has a salary of 1000*l.* per ann. This duty was first granted to king Charles II. in 1660, for his life, in England and Wales, and has been continued by several parliaments since, and extended to Scotland.

To EXCOMMUNICATE, v. a. [excommunico, low Lat.] to exclude or debar a person from partaking of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

EXCOMMUNICATION, f. an ecclesiastical penalty or censure, whereby persons who are guilty of any notorious crime or offence are separated from the communion of the church, and deprived of all spiritual advantages. In the ancient Christian church, the power of Excommunication was lodged in the hands of the clergy, who distinguished it into the greater and less. The less consisted in excluding persons from the participation of the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful; but they were not expelled the church. The greater Excommunication consisted in absolute and entire exclusion from the church, and the participation of all its rights; notice of which was given by circular letters to the most eminent churches all over the world, that they might all confirm this act of discipline, by refusing to admit the delinquent to their communion. The consequences were very terrible.

The person so excommunicated was avoided in all civil commerce and outward conversation. No one was to receive him into his house, nor eat at the same table with him; and when dead, he was denied the solemn rites of burial. The papal Excommunications have been famous, or rather infamous, throughout the world. In former ages, these fulminations were terrible things; but at present they are formidable to none but a few petty states of Italy.

Italy. Excommunication disables a person from doing any judicial act, as suing in an action at law, being a witness, &c.

F

F the sixth letter of the alphabet, and fourth consonant, is by some reckoned mute, and by others, a semi-vowel; its sound in English is invariable, formed by a compression of the whole lips and a forcible breath: it has much the same sound as the Greek ϕ , or ph , in English words; and therefore, in all words derived from the Greek, it should be written with ph , and in those of a Latin original with an f. Suetonius says, that the Emperor Claudius invented the f, and two other letters; and that it had the force of v consonant, and was written inverted thus ƒ . As a Numeral, F denotes 40, and with a dash over it thus F , 40,000. In Music, it stands for the bass cleff; and frequently for forte, as ff does for forte forte. In Medical Prescriptions, f stands for fiat, let it be done; thus S. F. A. stand for fiat secundum artem, let it be done according to art. As an abbreviation F stands for Fellow, as F. R. S. for Fellow of the Royal Society.

FRANCE, a large country of Europe, bounded on the N. by the Netherland, on the E. by Germany, Swisserland, Savoy, and the Alps, on the S. by the Mediterranean Sea and the Pyrenees, and on the W. by the ocean. It is about 600 miles in length, and 560 in breadth; and the air is pure, healthy, and temperate. It is so happily seated in the middle of the temperate zone, that some make it equal to Italy, with regard to the delightfulness of the landskips, and the fertility of the soil: however, it is certainly more healthful. The soil produces corn, wine, oil, and flax, in great abundance; and they have very large manufactures of linen, woollen, silk, and lace. They have a foreign trade to Spain, Italy, Turkey, and to the E. and W. Indies. They themselves reckon that the number of inhabitants is 20,000,000. This kingdom contains 21 universities, 18 archbishopricks, 12 parliaments, 12 boards of accounts, 12 courts of aids, two courts and 30 mints for coining money, and two supreme councils, besides the grand council, and 31 governors. The king has the title of Most Christian, and was the most absolute monarch in Europe till the month of July, 1789, when, by one of the strangest revolutions that ever took place in the political world, he was divested of all absolute authority, and is now one of the most limited monarchs. By a late decree of the national assembly, who have now the management of all public affairs in their own hands, they have taken from the king the power of making war and peace, have abolished all titles of peerages, it being their opinion, that no distinctions should be known, but such as arise from virtue, genius, and merit. On the 14th of July, 1790, a solemn festival was held at Paris, the day appointed for the French monarch to surrender all the absolute power he had before exercised, and to become the servant of the people. Between eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, the king, with a new and superb diadem on his head, as the first monarch of emancipated France, took his seat in the field of Mars. He then took the oath of Fidelity to the constitution, as prescribed by the decree of the national assembly. Thus finished the grand reformation in France—but, perhaps, all is not settled, nor shall we presume to make any conjectures on what is yet to follow. The principal provinces are, Alsace, Angoumois, Anjou, Armagnac, Artois, Aunis, Auvergne, Beaujolois, Beauce, Berry, Bigorre, Bourbonnois, Bargaundy, the Franche Comté, Bresse, Bretagne, Brie, Bugey, Cambresis, Champagne, Dauphiny, Flanders, Forez, Gascony, Guienne, Hainault, the Isle of France, Languedoc, Limousin, Lionnois, Maine, Marche, Navarre, Nivernois, Normandy, Orleannois, Perche, Picard, Picardy, Poitou, Provence, Quercy, Rouergue, Roussillon, Saintonge, Touraine, Vivarais, and Lorraine: all these provinces are divided into districts, which have their particular names. This kingdom is watered by a great number of rivers, of which the four principal are, the Loire, the Seine, the Rhone, and the Garonne, or Gironde.

G.

G is the seventh letter and fifth consonant of the English alphabet. The letter G is of the mute kind, and cannot be sounded without a vowel. It has two sounds, one of which is called hard, because formed by a hard pressure of the tongue against the upper gums; this sound it always retains before a, o, u, l, r; as game, gal, gori, gun, god, gull, glass, graft. The other sound, which is termed soft, resembles the sound of the j, and is commonly found before e or i, as in gem and gibbet; though not without exception; for in the words get, giddy, gift, give, and many more the reader will see pointed out in order, it retains the hard sound. At the end of words, gb is often sounded like ff, as in the words rough, tough, &c. yet not always, as in the words thorough, borrow, &c. where it has scarce any sound at all. Before n, at the end of a word, it is not sounded, but serves only to lengthen the vowel which comes before it, according to the French, from whence these words are derived; as condign, malign, which are pronounced condin, malin. It is often silent before b in the middle of words, as in might, which is sounded mit. This seems to have been derived to us from the Saxons, who, as Dr. Hickes informs us, pronounced it in the beginning, middle, and ending of words, like a y, as in gate, which some rustics still pronounce yate; in darg, which we pronounce day, and sægl, which we pronounce sail. As a numeral, G was anciently used to denote 400, and with a dash over it thus, \bar{G} , 40000. In Music, it is the character or mark of the treble cleff; and from its being placed at the head, head, or marking the first sound in Guido's scale, the whole scale took the name of Gamut.

GAR'TER, f. [gardus, Brit. gartier, Fr.] a string with which the stockings are tied up. A military order of knighthood, the most noble and ancient of any lay order in the world, instituted by king Edward III. This order consists of twenty-six knights companions, generally princes and peers, whereof the king of England is sovereign or chief. They are a college or corporation, having a great and little seal. Their officers are a prelate, chancellor, register, king at arms, and usher of the black rod. They have also a dean, and twelve canons, petty canons, vergers, and twenty-six pensioners, or poor knights. The prelate is the head. This office is vested in the bishop of Winchester, and has ever been so. Next to the prelate is the chancellor, which office is vested in the bishop of Salisbury, and has ever been so, who keeps the seals, &c. The next is the register, who is always the dean of Windsor, and who, by his oath, is to enter upon the registry, the scrutinies, the elections, penalties, and other acts of the order, with all fidelity. The fourth officer is Garter, and king at arms, being two distinct offices united in one person. Garter carries the rod and sceptre at the feast of St. George, the protector of this order, when the sovereign is present. He notifies the election of new knights, attends the solemnity of their installations, carries the Garter to foreign princes, &c. He is the principal officer within the college of arms, and chief of the heralds. All these officers, except the prelate, have fees and pensions. The habit of the order upon solemn days is the Garter, mantle, surcoat, hood, collar, great George and cap; upon the collar-days they are only obliged to wear the Garter, the collar of the order, and the great George; at the middle of the collar hangs the picture of St. George, sitting on horseback, who, having thrown the dragon upon his back, encounters him with a tilting spear. The Garter, which is blue, was, at the foundation of the order, appointed to be worn a little below the knee of the left leg, which still continues, having this motto wrought on it, Hei sit qui mal' y pense. The origin of this order is somewhat differently related. The common account is, that it was instituted in honour of a garter of the countess of Salisbury, which she dropped when dancing with king Edward, and which he picked up; but our best antiquaries think it was instituted on account of the victory over the French at Cressy, where the king ordered his Garter to be displayed as the signal of battle.

GAR'TER, KING AT ARMS, f. an officer whose business it is to attend the service of the Garter, for which he is allowed a mantle and badge, a house in Windsor-castle, and pensions both from the sovereigns and knights; also fees. See the foregoing article.

GEN'ET, f. [Fr.] a small-sized, well-proportioned, and swift Spanish horse.

GENETHLI'ACAL, a. [γενεθλιακος, Gr.] in Astrology, belonging to, or calculated from, a person's birth or nativity.

GENETHLI'ACS, f. the science of calculating nativities.

GENE'VA, an ancient, large, and populous town, capital of a republick of the same name, near the confines of France and Switzerland. It is very ancient, and was well known in the time of the Romans. It is well built, rich, and strongly fortified. It is divided by the river Rhone into two unequal parts, and which also forms an isle, full of fine houses. In general it is a very agreeable place, and there is nothing omitted to render it delightful. The principal riches of the inhabitants proceed from their manufactures, of which they have a great number; but the most considerable are watches, clocks, and gold and silver lace. The revenues of the republick arise from the duty of merchandizes which are carried out of the city, and from a prodigious quantity of corn which the magistrates buy, and sell to the inhabitants. The sovereignty of this republick is lodged in the assembly of the citizens and burghers; but there are several bodies of the magistracy, and whose heads are chosen by the people. The great council consists of 200 persons, from among whom there are 24 counsellors chosen, of which 4 are syndics, who are heads of the republick, and chosen every year. It is 70 miles N. E. of Lyons, 65 S. of Befanzon, 40 N. E. of Chamberry, and 135 N. by W. of Turin. Lon. 6. 15. E. lat. 46. 13. N.

GENE'VA, f. [genèvre, Fr.] a spirituous liquor distilled from juniper-berries.

GENIAL, a. [genialis, Lat.] that which contributes to propagation. That which cherishes, supports life, or causes cheerfulness. Natural, or native.

GENIALLY, ad. naturally; cheerfully.

GENICULATED, a. [geniculatus, Lat.] in Botany, knotted, or jointed.

GENIO, f. [Lat.] a person of a particular turn of mind; the turn, disposition, or cast of the mind.

GENITALS, f. [not used in the singular, genialis, Lat.] the parts contributing to generation.

GENITING, f. [a corruption of janeton, Fr. signifying Jan.; supposed to be so called in honour of some lady of that name] an early apple gathered in June.

GENITIVE, a. [genitivus, Lat.] in Grammar, one of the six cases by which property or possession is chiefly implied.

GENIUS, f. [Lat.] a supposed protecting or ruling power of men, places, or things; a person endowed with faculties superior to another; a perfection of understanding; a disposition by which any person is by nature qualified or inclined to any particular science or employment; nature or disposition.

GEN'NOA, a town of Italy, and capital of a republick of the same name. It is very ancient and large, being about six miles in circumference, built like an amphitheatre, and is full of magnificent structures, such as churches and palace; and particularly those of the Doge and of Doria, whence it has the name of Genoa the Proud. It is very populous, and one of the most trading places in Italy. The houses are well built, and are 5 or 6 stories high; and here are 57 churches, 17 convents, and two large hospitals. The government is aristocratic, because none but the nobility can have any share in it: these are of two sorts, the old and the new, from whence there are 80 persons chosen, who make the great council, in which their sovereignty resides. Besides these, there is a senate, composed of the Doge and 12 senators, who have the common administration of affairs. The Doge continues in his office but two years. The ordinary revenue of this republick is 200,000*l.* a-year, and there is a bank which is partly supported by publick duties. It is 70 miles S. of Milan, 62 S. E. of Turin, 65 S. W. of Parma, 112 N. W. of Florence, and 225 N. W. of Rome. Lon. 8. 7. E. lat. 44. 25. N.

GENTE'EL, a. [gentil, Fr.] polite, or elegant in behaviour or address; graceful or elegant in mien.

GENTE'ELLY, ad. according to the rules of polite breeding; elegantly; gracefully; handsomely.

GENTIANE'LLA, [gensbiantillo, f.] a kind of blue colour.

GEN'TILE, f. [gentilis, Lat.] one who worships idols, or false gods. A person of rank. This sense is obsolete.

GENTILE'SSE, f. [Fr.] complaisance; the ceremony and address of polite behaviour.

GEN'TILISM, f. [gentilisme, Fr.] the worship of the heathens; idolatry.

GEN'TILITIOUS, [gentilifolius, a.] [gentilitius, Lat.] belonging to, or characteristic of, a particular nation. Hereditary; entailed on a family.

GEN'TILITY, f. [gentilitas, Fr.] good extraction; dignity of birth; the class of those who are well born.

GEN'TLE, a. [gentilis, Lat.] of an ancient and good family; pronounced in conversation gentel in this sense. Mild; tame; not easily provoked, applied to the temper. Soothing or pacifying. SYNON. Gentle animals are naturally so; tame ones are so, partly by the art and industry of man. The dog, the ox, and the horse, are gentle animals; the bear, and the lion, are sometimes tame.

GEN'TLE, f. a person of a good family; a gentleman. A kind of worm somewhat like a maggot, used for a bait in fishing.

GEN'TLEFOLK, f. persons distinguished by their birth from the vulgar.

GEN'TLEMAN, f. [gentilhomme, Fr.] a person person of a noble birth; or descended of a family which has long borne arms. Chamberlain observes, that, in strictness, a gentleman is one whose ancestors have been freemen, and have owed obedience to none but the prince; on which footing no man can be a gentleman but one who is born such. But among us, the term Gentleman is applicable to all above a yeoman; so that noblemen may be properly called gentlemen.

GENTLENESS, f. softness; mildness; sweetness.

GENTLEWOMAN, f. a woman of birth, or one superior to the vulgar, both in wealth and behaviour.

GENTLY, ad. softly; slowly; kindly.

GENTRY, f. [from gentle, whence gentility contracted to gentry] a rank of persons between the nobility and the vulgar.

GENUFLEXION, f. [genuflexio, Lat.] the act of bending the knee; worship, or adoration expressed by bending the knee.

GENUINE, a. [genuinus, Lat.] pure, or without any spurious mixture; natural; true; real.

GENUINELY, ad. without adulteration; naturally.

GENUINENESS, f. freedom from any thing counterfeited, or from any adulteration.

GENUS, f. [Lat.] in Logic, a class of beings, or one common nature agreeing to, and comprehending under it many species, or several other common natures; thus animal is a genus, because it agrees to, and comprehends under it, the several species of men, horses, whales, lions, &c. In Botany, a system or assemblage of several plants agreeing in some one or more common characters, in respect to certain parts, whereby they are distinguished from all other plants.

GEOCENTRIC, a. [geocentrique, Fr.] in Astronomy, having the same centre with the earth.

GEODÆSIA, f. [γεωδαισία, Gr.] that part of practical geometry which teaches to measure surfaces, and to find the contents of all plane figures.

GEOGRAPHER, [γεωγραφερ] f. [γῆ and γράφω, Gr.] one who can describe the earth according to the position of its several parts, and is skilled in making maps, the use of the globes, and the situation and extent of the several countries in the world.

GEOGRAPHICAL, [γεωγραφικαλ] a. belonging to geography.

GEOGRAPHY, [γεωγραφία] f. [γῆ and γράφω, Gr.] in a strict sense, the knowledge of the circles of the earthly globe, and the situation of the various countries on its surface. In a more extensive sense, it takes in a knowledge of the seas also; and, in its largest sense, a knowledge of the various customs, habits, and governments of nations; the figures, magnitude, and the different strata and product of its soil; the various animals of different countries; their climates, seasons, heat, weather, together with the art of laying their various appearances down in maps, charts, &c.

GEOLOGY, f. [γῆ and λόγος, Gr.] the doctrine or knowledge of the nature and state of the earth.

GEO'MANCER, f. one who pretends to tell future events.

GEOMA'NTIC, a. belonging to geomancy, or formed by a geomancer.

GEO'METER, f. [γεωμετρης, Gr.] one skilled in the principles of geometry.

GEO'METRICAL, a. [geometrical, Fr.] pertaining or relating to geometry.

GEOME'TRIC, or GEOME'TRICAL, a. [γεωμετρικος, Gr.] belonging to, prescribed, laid down by, or disposed according to the principles of geometry.

GEOME'TRICALLY, ad. according to the rules of geometry.

GEOMETRICIAN, f. See GEOMETRER.
TO GEO'METRIZE, v. n. [γεωμετρις, Gr.] to perform or act according to the principles of geometry.

GEO'METRY, f. [γεωμετρία, Gr.] the art of measuring the earth, or any distances thereon; at present used for the science of quantity, extension, or magnitude, considered in themselves, and without any regard to matter. It is divided into speculative and practical.

GEORGE, [Γεωργ] f. [Georgius, Lat.] the figure of St. George on horseback, worn by the knights of the garter as an ensign of their order.

GEORGE I. succeeded on the death of queen Anne, to the crown of Great-Britain, Aug. 1, 1714. He was the eldest son of Ernestus Augustus, duke, afterwards elector, of Brunswic-Lupenberg (or Hanover) by princess Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and king of Bohemia, and of Elizabeth, eldest daughter of king James I. He was born on May 28, 1660, and succeeded his father as elector of Brunswic-Lunenburg, 1698. The regency met, and gave orders immediately for his proclamation. On Sept. 18, he landed with the prince his son at Greenwich, and on the 20th they made their public entry through the city to St. James's, attended by above 200 coaches and six of the nobility and gentry. The prince royal was declared prince of Wales; the king was crowned October 20; a new parliament met March 17, 1715. In July the king gave the royal assent to an act for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies, commonly called the riot act, which is still in force. This year a rebellion broke out, which was headed by the earl of Mar in Scotland, who set up the Pretender's standard in September, in the Highlands, and caused him to be proclaimed in several places; when the earl of Derwentwater and others appeared in arms, in the north of England, in October, and proclaimed the Pretender in several places. On November 12, they were attacked by the king's troops, commanded by the generals Wills and Carpenter, in Preston, where, after a smart firing from the windows, finding all the avenues to the town blocked up by the king's troops, on the 13th they desired to capitulate; but at no other terms being allowed them, but granting to the king's mercy, on the 14th, seven in the morning, they submitted. On every day the rebels were subdued at Preston, Sunday, November 13, the duke of Arle defeated the rebel army under the earl of Ar, consisting of about 8 or 9000 men, at the smuir, about 4 miles from Aberdeen; and the earl of Mar retreated to Perth, after an unequal fight, in which both sides claimed the victory, though the earl of Mar being trusted in his design of crossing the Forth, shewed the king's forces had the advantage. On November 22, the Pretender arrived in a Dunkirk privateer in Scotland, where he was privately met and complimented by the earl of Ar, and other of his adherents; but being afterwards pursued by the king's troops, on February the Pretender, with the earl of Mar, and other chiefs, found means to make their escape in a French ship which lay there, soon after the rebels dispersed. Some submitted, some were taken prisoners. Among them their general Forster, as also the earls of Perth, Nithisdale, Carnwath, Winton, and other noblemen. Derwentwater and others were beheaded on Tower-hill, Feb. 1715-16; Nithisdale and Winton made their escape out of the Tower; and, after the execution of some of the rebels, an act of oblivion passed. Robert Walpole, esq. was some time before made first commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; and at the same time, the parliament attained to the Duke of Ormond, of high treason, and confiscated his estate. A few weeks the king gave the royal assent to an act prolonging the time of continuance of parliaments, whereby this and future parliaments continued 7 years, unless sooner dissolved by the crown, instead of 3 years, as by the former act passed in the reign of king William.

The clause in the act of settlement, whereby, after it took place, the sovereign was to go out of the kingdom without consent of parliament, was repealed at the end of the session of his majesty, having constituted the Duke of Wales guardian of the realm in his stead, and set out for his German dominions. There were frequent mobs and riots of all sorts; and July 28, a mug-house kept by Read, where those who were well affected to the Hanover succession assembled, attacked by the Jacobite party, when they proceeded to pulling down the house, and destroying the goods. The sheriffs of London and read the proclamation; but this being, a party of the guards were ordered to march to the place, and as soon as they saw the mob dispersed; but five of the rebels were taken, tried, and found guilty, and executed at the end of Salisbury court in Fleet.

In November, 1717, after the christening of a prince, of which the princess of Wales was brought to bed, his royal highness, in a circumstance or other, fell under his father's displeasure, and was ordered to leave

St. James's, which he did, and went to reside at Leicester-house. After this, whenever the king went abroad, he committed the administration of the government to lords justices; and all in the king's service were forbid to visit the prince's court at Leicester-house. Toward the end of this year, a proclamation was published for lowering the gold-coin; whereby seven guineas, that before went for 11. 1s. 6d. were ordered for the future to go for 11. 1s. On July 31, Sir George Byng entirely defeated the Spanish fleet in the Mediterranean, the Spaniards having attacked the citadel of Messina in Sicily, which was agreed to be given up to the emperor. War was declared against Spain in December following, both by Great Britain and France. On March 10, his majesty acquainted the parliament that he had received intelligence from the French king of an invasion intended from Spain, in favour of the Pretender. The Spanish fleet of about 50 transports, convoyed by four men of war, having on board the late duke of Ormond, about 5000 men, and arms for twice their number, sailed from Cadiz; but was entirely dispersed by a storm which lasted 48 hours. However, the late earls of Seaford and Maréchal, and the marquis of Tullibardine, landed at Kintailine, in Scotland, with about 400 men, mostly Spaniards, and were joined by about 1600 Highlanders; but major-general Wightman dispersed them, the Spaniards surrendering at discretion. Seaford, Maréchal, and Tullibardine, found means to get back to Spain. Lord Cobham took Vigo, and several incurfions were made on the Spanish coast this year. The year 1720, was remarkable for the South-Sea scheme, of which the greatest part of the nation turned stock-jobbers; South-Sea stock arose and fell till it came to above 1000; but it fell faster than it arose, and many families were ruined by it, while a few got vast riches. The directors estates were sold for the benefit of the sufferers; and they were incapacitated from sitting in either house of parliament, or holding any office or place of trust, for ever. Sir Robert Walpole, who had resigned, was again made chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury; which posts he held to the end of this reign, and 15 years after. In April 1720, a reconciliation of the royal family was brought about, and the prince of Wales attended his majesty at St. James's. At his return he was attended by a party of the yeomen of the guard, as also of the horse-guards; and immediately the foot-guards began likewise to mount guard at Leicester-house. April 15, 1721, the princess of Wales was delivered of William Augustus, duke of Cumberland. On June 22, 1722, died the great duke of Marlborough, whose obsequies were performed on Aug. 9, with the utmost solemnity and magnificence. A new parliament met on October 9, 1722, when the king acquainted them with a conspiracy for overturning the established government, and setting up the Pretender.

Under. Christopher Layer, a counsellor of the Temple, was executed at Tyburn, May 17, 1723, and his head fixed upon Temple-bar, for being concerned in it. The parliament passed bills for inflicting pains and penalties on bishop Atterbury, Kelly, and Plunket, on the same account; whereby the first was banished, and the two last imprisoned for life. In 1725, the earl of Macclesfield, lord high chancellor, resigned the seals, and was fined 30,000*l.* and committed to the Tower till he paid it. He was succeeded by Sir Peter King, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. The same session, Henry St. John lord viscount Bolingbroke was restored to his estates, and an act passed for that purpose; though he was not restored to his title. The same year, 1725, the order of the Bath was revived, and 37 new knights were installed; about which time several of the Scotch Highland clans were disarmed by general Wade. Toward the end of this year died, in the castle of Athlen, where she had lived many years, Sophia Dorothy, who was married to his Majesty 1682, and by whom he had issue, his late majesty, born October 30, 1683, and Dorothy Sophia, queen dowager of Prussia, who was born 1687. On September 3, 1725, a treaty was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Prussia; though the last, in effect, soon deserted this alliance; but the States-General afterwards acceded to it. This treaty was designed as a balance to one which had been concluded between the courts of Vienna and Madrid. These counter alliances put Europe again in a flame, and three British squadrons were fitted out; one sent to the West Indies, another to the coast of Spain, and the third to the Baltic. In the beginning of the year 1727, the Spaniards laid siege to Gibraltar; which, though it was suspended upon preliminary articles for a general pacification being signed, was not ratified till some time after the king's death. The parliament, which met on January 17, was prorogued on May 15. On June 3, his majesty embarked on board the Carolina yacht, and landed the 7th at Vaert in Holland, where he lay that night; on the 9th he arrived at Delden, between 11 and 12 at night, seemingly in good health. He set out next morning about 3 o'clock, was taken ill on the road, and died at his brother the duke of York's palace at Osnaburg, June 11, 1727, in the 68th year of his age, and 13th of his reign. George I. was plain and simple in his person and address; grave and composed in his deportment, though easy, familiar, and facetious in his hours of relaxation. Before he ascended the throne of Great Britain, he had acquired the character of a circumspect general, a just and merciful prince, and a wise politician, who perfectly understood, and steadily pursued, his own interest. With these qualities, it cannot be doubted but that he came to England extremely well disposed to govern his new subjects according to the maxims of the British constitution, and the genius of the people; and, if ever he seemed to deviate from these principles, we may take it for granted that he was misled by the venal suggestions of a ministry whose power and influence were founded on corruption. From the death of Charles II. to this period, England made a considerable figure in every branch of literature. Dr. Atterbury and Dr. Clarke distinguished themselves in divinity; Mr. Whiston wrote in defence of arianism: John Locke shone forth the great restorer of human reason: Cudworth traced the whole labyrinth of metaphysical argumentation: the earl of Shaftsbury raised an elegant, though feeble system of moral philosophy: Berkeley, afterwards bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, surpassed all his contemporaries in subtlety and variety of metaphysical arguments, as well as in the art of deduction. lord Bolingbroke's talents as a metaphysician have been questioned since his posthumous works appeared: great progress was made in mathematics and astronomy, by Wallis, Halley, and Flamsteed: the art of medicine owed some valuable improvements to the classical Dr. Freind, and the elegant Dr. Mead. Among the poets of this era we number John Phillips, author of a didactic poem called Cyder, a performance of real merit; he lived and died in obscurity: William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are famous for wit, elegance, and regularity: Vanburgh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with less art and precision: Steele, who in his comedies successfully ingrafted modern characters on the ancient drama: Farquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy, rather than from nature, and whose chief merit consists in the agreeable pertness and vivacity of his dialogue: Addison, whose fame as a poet greatly exceeded his genius, which was cold and enervate; though he yielded to none in the character of an essayist, either for style or matter: Swift, whose muse seems to have been mere misanthropy; he was a cynic rather than a poet; and his natural dryness and sarcastic severity would have been unpleasing, had not he qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar, and amusing: Rowe, solemn, florid, and declamatory: Pope, the prince of lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, ethics, and polished verification; the agreeable Parnel; the wild, the witty, and the whimsical Garth: Gay, whose fables may vie with those of La Fontaine, in native humour, ease, and simplicity; and whose genius for pastoral was truly original. Dr. Bentley stood foremost in the list of critics and commentators. Sir Christopher Wren raised some noble monuments of architecture. The most remarkable political writers were Davenant, Hare, Swift, Steele, Addison, Bolingbroke, and Trenchard.

GEORGE II. (then in the forty-fourth year of his age) was proclaimed king of Great-Britain on the 15th of June, 1727, being the day after the express arrived with the account of the death of his father. All the great officers of state continued in their places: Sir

Robert

Robert Walpole kept possession of the Treasury; and the system of politics established by the late king, underwent no alteration. The parliament meeting on the 27th, both houses elected addresses of condolence and congratulation. The 29th, the commons resolved unanimously to grant to his majesty the same pension, viz. 700,000l. per annum, as had been enjoyed by his father. On the 7th of August this parliament was dissolved, and a new one summoned. On the 11th of October the coronation of the king and queen was performed at Westminster Abbey with the usual solemnity. The 23d of January, 1728, a new parliament met, when warm disputes followed on the increase of the national debts; debates, however, terminated in favour of the ministry. On the 28th of May his majesty put an end to the session. In the beginning of December his majesty's eldest son prince Frederick arrived in England from Hanover, where he had hitherto resided; was introduced to the privy council, and created prince of Wales. The congress opened at Soissons, for settling all disputes among the powers of Europe, proved ineffectual. The Spaniards continued their depredations with impunity on the commerce of Great Britain. The king of Spain, indeed, at this juncture, seemed indifferent with regard to a pacification with England. It had renewed a good understanding with France, and now strengthened his interest by a double alliance of marriage with the royal family of Portugal. The king of this house was betrothed to the archduchess of Austria; while the Spanish infantina, lately affianced to the French king, was matched with the prince of Brazil, eldest of his Portuguese majesty. The parliament meeting according to their prorogation, on the 21st of January, 1729, in consequence of petitions delivered from the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Bristol, complaining of Spanish depredations, the commons addressed his majesty to use his utmost endeavours to check such depredations; in answer to which the king assured them that he would use his best endeavours to answer the desires of his people. An enquiry was made into the state of the public gaols; and it appearing that great cruelties had been practised therein, particularly on Sir William Rich, who was found in the Fleet prison bound with irons, by order of the warden, and James Bambridge, the then warden, and John Huggins, the late, &c. were committed prisoners to Newgate. The 14th of May his majesty put an end to the session; and, having appointed the queen regent, went to Germany in order to settle some differences between the regency of Hanover and the king of Prussia. The parliament assembled on the 19th of January, his majesty congratulated them on his having concluded a peace with Spain. His speech, however, produced no debates in both houses, in which the treaty of Seville did not pass inquiry without severe animadversion. The Emperor was so greatly offended at this treaty, that he prepared for war. Being in want of money, he set on foot a negotiation for a loan in England, of 400,000l. which alarmed the ministry, who imagined that it would be made use of to disturb the repose of Great-Britain; and therefore a bill was brought in, to prevent the subjects of England from lending any money to foreign powers, without the King's licence for that purpose, and was carried into a law. An endeavour was now made to lay open the East-India trade, the charter of that company being then very near expiring. April the 9th, petitions were presented to the house of commons for that purpose; but notwithstanding their being warmly recommended by Sir John Barnard, and other eminent merchants, they were rejected, and the exclusive privilege vested in the company was protracted, by act of parliament, to the year 1766. Various other bills passed this session: the salt-tax was reduced; and a most excellent act passed for the better regulating of juries, which now prevents their being packed. The parliament was then prorogued to the 14th of July following. During this year every part of the kingdom was infested with robbers, assassins, and incendiaries. The sessions of parliament opened on Jan. 21. The Emperor and his ministers still continued to exclaim against the treaty of Seville. The address of thanks for his majesty's speech gave rise to strong debates in the house of commons. About this time a famous periodical paper, entitled the Craftsman, made its appearance. The late lord Bolingbroke assisted in writing it; but the avowed patron was said to be Mr. William Pulteney, who fought a duel in the Green Park with lord Hervey, on occasion of a remarkable political pamphlet. All law proceedings were ordered to be no more in Latin, but in English. The dukes of Parma and Placentia dying in January this year, the imperial troops took possession of those duchies; though by the treaty of Seville they were guaranteed to Don Carlos, son to the king of Spain, and were also bequeathed to that prince by the late duke, in case the child, of which he then supposed his duchess to be pregnant, was still-born, or should die after its birth. Though this step seemed to threaten an immediate war, his Britannic majesty and the States General interposed their mediation so effectually with the Emperor, that he concluded a treaty with them, consenting to withdraw his troops from Parma and Placentia, on condition that the contracting powers concerned in the treaty of Seville should guaranty the Pragmatic Sanction, or succession of the Austrian hereditary dominions to the heirs female of the Emperor, in case he should die without male issue. A new treaty, confirming this, was afterwards signed at Vienna, on July 22, between the Emperor and the kings of Great-Britain and Spain; and the States General, after many difficulties, at last acceded to it, by which the

Offend East-India company was abolished. In consequence, Sir Charles Wager failed with a fleet for Spain; Don Carlos was quietly settled in Italy; and on the duchess of Parma not proving pregnant, Sir Charles returned to 1738 England. The parliament met on the 13th of January, when the dispute for and against a standing army was carried on, on both sides, with equal warmth, and sometimes acrimony. A bill passed both houses for reviving the salt-duties. The affair of the Charitable Corporation being brought in, it appeared that some of its managers had been guilty of the most iniquitous proceedings; upon which Sir Robert Sutton and Sir Archibald Grant were expelled the house. On this occasion, a letter from Belloni, the Pretender's banker at Rome, relative to the Charitable Corporation, was burnt by the common hangman at the Royal Exchange. A most infamous fraud was discovered by lord Gage in the sale of the forfeited estate of the late earl of Derwentwater; for which serjeant Birch and Dennis Bond, esq; were expelled the house. The session was closed the 1st of June. This summer his majesty visited his German dominions; the queen being left as regent. The colony of Georgia was planted now by gen. Oglethorpe. The following remarkable instance of suicide happened in England this year. Richard Smith, a book-binder, and prisoner for debt within the liberties of the King's-bench, persuaded his wife to follow his example, in making away with herself, after they had murdered their little infant. This wretched pair were in the month of April found hanging in their bed-chamber at about a yard's distance from each other; and in a separate apartment the child lay dead in a cradle.

This session of parliament, which opened on Jan. 16, besides the usual debates on the pension bill, standing army, and the Spanish depredations, was distinguished by the famous Excise Scheme, which had almost produced a rebellion among the people, who clamoured so loudly against it, through all parts of the kingdom, that the minister thought proper to drop the design. The commons voted 80,000l. as a marriage-dower for the prince's royal, who was married to the prince of Orange (who came to England in November) on the 14th of March in the following year. They also voted 10,000l. for the purpose of transporting a great number of protestant Saltzburghers (who had fled their native country on account of a persecution raised against them on the score of their religion) to the infant colony of Georgia. The session ended on the 4th of June. On the first of February this year died Augustus II. king of Poland, which gave rise to a dreadful war in Europe. Three parties were formed on this occasion; one in favour of Stanislaus, another for the elector of Saxony, and a third for a native of Poland, exclusive of Stanislaus, who was then in France, and was at last proclaimed king of Poland. Being his most Christian majesty's father-in-law, he was greatly assisted by that monarch, and arrived by land at Warlaw. Immediately the French king's troops under the duke of Berwick marched to the Rhine, and were very successful. Their arms were equally triumphant in Italy. An alliance had been projected between France, Spain, and Sardinia, in order to raise Don Carlos to the thrones of Naples and Sicily. Duke de Villars commanded under the king of Sardinia in Italy; where their arms made a very rapid progress against the imperialists, from whom they took many towns. About this time the earl of Chesterfield resigned his post of lord high steward; the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham were deprived of their regiments; and lord King resigning the office of chancellor, it was conferred on Mr. Talbot, together with the title of a baron. The parliament was opened on the 17th of January. In this session, which was no less fertile in disputes between the ministry and opposition than any of the preceding, a bill to prevent the infamous practice of stock-jobbing was carried through both houses, and passed into a law for three years. On the 16th of April the session ended, soon after which the parliament was dissolved. About this time lord Stair was deprived of his regiment of dragoons for his conduct in parliament. On the continent, king Stanislaus was obliged to fly secretly from Dantzic, and leave the crown of Poland to Augustus elector of Saxony. The French were very successful in Germany. Prince Eugene commanded the imperial army; and the duke of Berwick, who headed that of France, was killed before Philipburgh. There was a very bloody campaign in Italy. Don Carlos took possession of Naples, of which his Catholic Majesty had declared him king. Count de Mercy, who commanded the imperialists, was slain in the battle of Parma. Marshal Broglio, a French general, was routed and lost about 2000 men. The great success of the French was owing chiefly to the bravery and conduct of the king of Sardinia. England, during these transactions, preserved a neutrality; and kept up a great naval force under the command of Sir John Norris, an able, though not a successful commander. Negotiations were entered into at the Hague for peace. Considerable armaments were carrying on in England, in order to preserve its tranquillity. The Pretender's eldest son served with peculiar marks of distinction in the army of Don Carlos. The new parliament was opened on Jan. 14. The election of the 16 Scotch Peers engrossed the attention of the public and the parliament for some time. Great alterations were made in the mutiny-bill; the officers who enlisted men were required to carry every person, who entered, before a magistrate, in order for such person to declare his assent or dissent. His majesty was addressed on the Spanish depredations; but the session breaking up on May 15, nothing was done in that matter. Soon after the king visited his German dominions, leaving the queen regent.

The conferences still continued at the Hague; where, at last, a suspension of arms was agreed on, during which the negotiations for a general peace in Germany and Italy were continued. A quarrel breaking out between the courts of Madrid and Lisbon, the latter applied for assistance to the king of Great-Britain, who sent Sir John Norris with a powerful Squadron to Lisbon. The parliament met on Jan. 15, 1736 and repealed the old statutes of England and Scotland against conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil spirits; and passed an act for restraining the retail of spirituous liquors, the mortmain act, another for the prevention of smuggling, and another for building a bridge at Westminster. The session closed on May 23, soon after which the king paid a visit to his German dominions. On the 27th of April the prince of Wales was married to the princess of Saxe-Gotha. The other remarkable incidents of this year were these: The king erected a new post of honour, entitled field-marshal of the armies of Great-Britain. A great disturbance happened at Edinburgh, occasioned by the execution of one Wilson, a smuggler. Porteous, captain of the city-guard, having commanded the soldiers to fire among the populace, several innocent persons were killed: Porteous, being tried for his life, was found guilty; but, being reprieved by the queen (then regent), the mob forced open the prison doors, dragged forth Porteous, and hung him upon a dyer's pole, at which outrage her majesty and the administration were greatly offended. There now started up a new state phenomenon, Theodore baron Stein, born near Cologne, in Germany. He had landed in Corsica, subject to the Genoese, who had treated the Corsicans with great rigour. The baron, being received with open arms by the insurgents, was elected, and crowned their king; upon which he headed their troops. Failing afterwards in his promises of men, money, &c. the Corsicans grew weary of him; whereupon he left their island. He had the air of a great man, but his parts were not shining, his principal talent being a little cunning; besides which, he was insolent and cruel. By this time all the belligerent powers in Italy had agreed to the preliminaries of peace concluded between the emperor and France. Don Carlos was crowned king of Sicily; Stanislaus abdicated the crown of Poland; and Augustus was universally acknowledged sovereign of that kingdom. The preliminaries were approved and accepted by the diet of the empire; the king of Spain sent orders for his troops to evacuate Tuscany; and the provinces in Italy yielded to the house of Austria. Prince Eugene, who had managed the interests of the emperor on this occasion, did not live to see the happy fruits of his negotiation. He died at Vienna, in April, at the age of seventy-three, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero and consummate politician.

The beginning of this year was distinguished by a rupture in the royal family, occasioned by the prince of Wales carrying away the princess of Wales, then near her time, from Hampton-court, where their majesties resided, to St. James's, where she was that night delivered of the princess Augusta, now princess of Brunswick. This breach was greatly widened by a motion being made in parliament (which was opened by commission Feb. 1) to settle 100,000l. per annum on the prince of Wales, in the same manner his majesty enjoyed it before his accession to the throne. This motion, however, was carried in the negative. The most remarkable bills passed this session were, a bill for punishing the magistrates and city of Edinburgh on account of the murder of captain Porteous; and another for limiting the number of playhouses, and subjecting all dramatic pieces to the inspection of the lord-chamberlain, commonly called the playhouse bill. In February died lord chancellor Talbot, universally lamented, who was succeeded on the bench by lord Hardwicke; and on November 20 died queen Caroline, in the 55th year of her age. The affair of one Jenkins, who was said to have had his ear cut off by the crew of a Spanish guarda costa, and who appeared at the bar of the house of commons, excited great indignation both in that assembly and in the whole nation. Petitions, complaining of the Spanish depredations, were presented to the house from various quarters. An address was presented to his majesty, who soon after sent a strong Squadron to the Mediterranean. The effect of this vigorous disposition was, that in September preliminaries were signed for an accommodation between the courts of England and Spain. On the 24th of May his present majesty was born. On the 14th of January the famous CONVENTION treaty was concluded between the courts of Great-Britain and Madrid, which occasioned very warm debates in both houses of parliament, and against which petitions were presented from all parts of the kingdom. Disputes were carried so high in the house of commons, that many eminent members of the minority retired from parliament, and 40 peers entered their protest against the address for thanking his majesty for laying the Convention before them. Notwithstanding the Convention so recently concluded, the behaviour of the Spaniards was so insolent, that a rupture with them became inevitable. War was accordingly declared against Spain, and admiral Vernon sent in July with a Squadron of ships to annoy their commerce and settlements in America, where in November he took the town of Porto Bello. Mr. Whitefield's followers first appeared under the name of methodists; and the close of this year and the beginning of the next were distinguished by as great a frost as ever was known in England. A strong armament being sent against the Spanish West Indies under Lord Cathcart, occasioned the French to lay aside the neutrality they had before professed, and to declare in favour of the Spaniards, by sending a fleet of 12 large ships to their assistance. On the 8th of May the princess Mary was married by proxy to the prince of Hesse Cassel. In June advice was received from admiral Vernon, that he had bombarded Carthage and taken fort Chagre. On the 30th of October, Charles VI. emperor of Germany, the last prince of the house of Austria, died at Vienna, and was succeeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldest daughter the archduchess Maria Theresa, married to the grand duke of Tuscany. Though she succeeded as queen of Hungary, by virtue of the pragmatic sanction guaranteed by all the powers in Europe, her succession produced such contests as kindled a cruel war in the empire. The young king of Prussia was no sooner informed of the emperor's death, than he entered Silesia at the head of twenty thousand men, seized certain sieges to which his family laid claim, and published a manifesto, declaring that he had no intention to contravene the pragmatic sanction. The elector of Bavaria refused to acknowledge the archduchess as queen of Hungary and Bohemia. His majesty, in his speech to the parliament, declared strongly in this princess's favour; and 300,000. were granted to enable him to support her. Debates ran very high this session against the minister and his measures. A strong protest was entered by 24 peers, warmly reflecting on Sir Robert Walpole's management during the course of the war; and a variety of motions were made in both houses, tending to shew the necessity of removing him from his majesty's presence and councils. The year 1741 was remarkable for general Wentworth and admiral Vernon's unsuccessful expedition against Carthage, in which it is computed 20,000 British subjects lost their lives. The affairs on the continent were now more than ever embroiled. The queen of Hungary refusing to comply with the king of Prussia's demand of part of Silesia, that monarch prosecuted his conquests with great rapidity. France resolved to seize this opportunity of crushing the house of Austria. In order to prevent the queen of Hungary from receiving the promised succours from his Britannic majesty, she poured a numerous army into Westphalia, which produced a neutrality for Hanover; and the king of Great-Britain promised to vote, at the ensuing election of an emperor, for the elector of Bavaria. The design of the French court was to raise this prince to the imperial dignity, and furnish him with such succours as should enable him to deprive the queen of Hungary of her hereditary dominions. With this view she sent two large bodies of troops into Germany; and the elector of Bavaria, seeing himself at the head of 70,000 men, declared war against her Hungarian majesty, and made so rapid a progress, that Vienna itself was threatened. Being joined by the elector of Saxony, he took Prague, and was crowned king of Bohemia. But by turning aside to Bohemia, instead of marching to Vienna, he entirely ruined his affairs. In the new parliament the minister was attacked with such spirit and violence, that he resolved to resign. He still attended the house, till the decision of the Chippen-¹⁷⁴⁰ ham election, which was carried the 2d of February against him, by one vote only. He had been treated with so little ceremony during the course of the debate, that he protested in the lobby he would never enter the house again; and prince Frederic declaring, that he thought Sir Robert Walpole so great a bar between his majesty and his people, that he could agree to no terms of reconciliation till he should be removed, Sir Robert resolved to retire from power, and give up all his places. This he did accordingly the 11th of February, after having been created by his majesty baron of Houghton, viscount Walpole, and earl of Orford. The day after his resignation, the opposition had a grand meeting; the purport of which was, to bring him to justice, and to execute their constitutional points. The heads of the opposition all met at court, when a reconciliation was made between his majesty and the prince of Wales. Sir Robert Walpole's removal did not alter the measures; but there were many changes in the higher employments. Mr. Sandys was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, lord Wilmington first lord of the treasury, lord Harrington lord president, lord Carteret secretary of state, the marquis of Tweedale secretary of state for Scotland, the duke of Argyle master of the ordnance, and Mr. Pulteney was restored to the dignity of a privy-counsellor. A considerable promotion was made of general officers, and great changes in the inferior departments. An inquiry was made into the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole, in the course of which it appeared that he had been guilty of many malpractices; but before the report of the committee, who sat for that purpose, was finished, the parliament was prorogued, and thus the enquiry dropped. On the 12th of February the elector of Bavaria was chosen emperor of Germany. However, the queen of Hungary's affairs had taken a very auspicious turn. A bloody battle was fought at Czaaslau, between the king of Prussia and prince Charles, in which the former had the advantage. By the happy influence of his Britannic majesty, a treaty was concluded between Austria and Prussia, whereby Silesia was given up to the latter; to which treaty Saxony also acceded; and peace was proclaimed at Dresden the seventeenth of September. This obliged the French to retire with great precipitation and loss to Prague, which prince Charles besieged with sixty thousand men; there being twenty-six thousand men in that city. Negotiations were carried on between the generals on the respective sides. During the siege of Prague, the French made many desperate sallies; but being at last pressed by famine, Maillebois marched with 42,000 men to its relief. Count de Saxe then made his appearance at the head of a French army. Prince Charles turned the siege of Prague into a blockade. The Austrians finding themselves too weak to continue the blockade before Prague, raised it; upon which the marshals Belleisle and Broglie marched out of that city, but were afterwards forced to return into it. Maillebois proved himself an able general during all this expedition. At last marshal Belleisle, with great skill and judgment, marched his army out of Prague, and reached Egra in 12 days without losing a man (according to his own account) except by the severity of the weather. In order to make a diversion in favour of the queen of Hungary, 16,000 British troops were embarked for the Netherlands, under the command of the earl of Stair, where they were joined by another body of Hanoverians and Hessians. A body of Austrians had also been before assembled in that country; but all these troops went into winter-quarters without executing any enterprize. Nov. 17, 1743, princess Louisa, his majesty's youngest daughter, was married by proxy to the prince royal of Denmark. The British fleet under Sir Chaloner Ogle was no ways fortunate in America. Commodore Knowles was sent out with a squadron of ships to attack La Guirre and Porto Cavallo, on the coasts of the Carracas; but this attempt miscarried. He afterwards attacked Porto Cavallo, but without success. A revolution in the ministry took place this year, Mr. Pelham being placed at the head of the ministry. In the Netherlands, the English and French armies came to an engagement at the village of Dettingen. The order of battle, as directed by his Britannic majesty, was very masterly. The king advancing to the front of his army, gave fresh spirits to the soldiers. The British troops fired too soon, upon the marching up of the enemy; when the French black musqueteers, detaching themselves from their lines, and galloping between the allied foot, were all cut to pieces. The firing now became general; when the presence of his Britannic majesty, who was in the posts of the greatest danger, and behaved with the noblest intrepidity, fixed the fate of the day. Marshal Noailles shewed great bravery in this battle. The duke of Cumberland, being in the hottest of the engagement, was wounded in the calf of the leg. Hereupon marshal Noailles, after losing the flower of his army, ordered a retreat. In this battle the French lost 6000 men, and a multitude of officers, with some trophies; and the English 2500 men. In 1744 commodore Anson returned from his expedition round the world. In September 1740 he had sailed with a small squadron to the South-Sea, in order to annoy the Spanish settlements of Chili and Peru. Two of his large ships, having been separated from him in a storm before he weathered Cape Horn, had put in at Rio de Janeiro, on the coast of Brazil, from whence they returned to Europe. Mr. Anson having undergone a dreadful tempest, which dispersed his fleet, arrived at the island of Juan Fernandez, where he was joined by the Gloucester, a ship of the line, a sloop, and a pink loaded with provisions. These were the remains of his squadron. He made prize of several vessels; took and burned the little town of Payta; set sail from the coast of Mexico for the Philippine isles; and in this passage the Gloucester was abandoned and sunk: the other vessels had been destroyed, for want of men to navigate them; so that nothing now remained but the commodore's own ship the Centurion, and that but very indifferently manned; for the crews had been horribly thinned by sickness. Incredible were the hardships and misery they sustained from the shattered condition of the ships, and the scorbutic disorder, when they reached the plentiful island of Tinian, where they were supplied with the necessary refreshments. Thence they prosecuted their voyage to the river of Canton in China, where the commodore ordered the ship to be sheathed, and found means to procure a reinforcement of sailors. The chief object of his attention was the rich annual ship that sails between Acapulco in Mexico, and Manila, one of the Philippine islands. In hope of intercepting her, he set sail from Canton, and steered his course back to the straits of Manila, where she actually fell into his hands, after a short but vigorous engagement. The prize was called Nuestra Señora de Cabadonga, mounted with 40 guns, manned with 600 sailors, and loaded with treasure and effects to the value of 313,000 pounds sterling: with this windfall he returned to Canton; from whence he proceeded to the Cape of Good-hope, and prosecuted his voyage to England, where he arrived in safety. Mean while the French went on with vigour in every quarter; they opposed prince Charles of Lorraine; they interrupted his progress in his attempts to pass the Rhine, and gained some successes in Italy; but their chief expectations were placed in a projected invasion of England. An invasion therefore was actually projected. Charles, son of the old Chevalier St. George, departed from Rome in the disguise of a Spanish courier, prosecuting his journey to Paris, and had an audience of the French king. The troops designed for this expedition amounted to 15,000: preparations were made for embarking them at Dunkirk, and some other of the nearest ports to England, under the eye of the young Pretender; and 7000 of the number actually went on board. The duke de Roquefeuille, with 20 ships of the line, was to see them landed safely in England; and count Saxe was to command them, when put ashore. The whole project, however, was disconcerted by the appearance of Sir John Norris, with a superior fleet, making up against them; the French fleet was obliged to put back; a very hard gale of wind damaged their transports beyond redress. All hopes of invasion were now frustrated; and, at length, the French thought fit openly to declare war. But, though fortune seemed to favour England on this occasion, yet, on others, she was not equally propitious. The combined fleets of France and Spain, for some time, fought the British armament under admirals admirals Mathews and Lestock, though with inferior force, and came off nearly upon equal terms. Such a parity of success in England was regarded as a defeat. Both the English admirals were tried by a court-martial; Mathews, who had fought the enemy with intrepidity, was declared incapable of serving for the future in his majesty's navy; Lestock, who had kept aloof, was acquitted with honour, for he had intrenched himself within the punctilios of discipline; he barely did his duty; a man of honour, when his country is at stake, should do more. The proceedings in the Netherlands were still more unfavourable. The French besieged and took Fribourg, before they went into winter-quarters; and early the next campaign invested the city of Tournay. The allies were resolved to prevent the loss of this city by a battle. Their army was inferior, and they were commanded by the duke of Cumberland. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, they marched towards the enemy, and took post in sight of the French, who were encamped on an eminence; the village of Antoine on the right, a wood on their left, and the town of Fontenoy before them. This advantageous situation did not repress the ardour of the English; on the 30th day of April, the duke of Cumberland marched to the attack at two o'clock in the morning. The British infantry pressed forward, bore down all opposition, and for near an hour were victorious. Marshal Saxe was at that time sick of the same disorder of which he afterwards died. He visited all the posts in a litter; and saw, notwithstanding all appearances, that the day was his own. The English column, without command, by a mere mechanical courage, had advanced upon the enemy's lines, which formed an avenue on each side to receive them. The French artillery began to play upon this forlorn body; and though they continued a long time unshaken, they were obliged to retreat about three o'clock in the afternoon. This was one of the most bloody battles that had been fought this age; the allies left upon the field near 12,000 slain; and the French bought their victory with near an equal number. This blow, by which Tournay was taken, gave the French a manifest superiority all the rest of the campaign, which they did not forego during the continuance of the war. The intended French invasion had roused all the attention of the English ministry, and nothing but loyalty breathed throughout the whole kingdom. The admirals Rowley and Warren had retrieved the honour of the British flag, and made several rich captures. Louisbourg, in the island of Cape Breton, in North America, a place of great consequence to the British commerce, surrendered to general Pepperel, while, a short time after, two French East-India ships, and another from Peru laden with treasure, supposing the place still in possession of the French, sailed into the harbour, and their capture added to the English success. It was in this period of universal satisfaction, that the son of the old Pretender resolved to make an effort at gaining the British crown. Being furnished with some money, and still larger promises from France, he embarked for Scotland on board a small frigate, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine, Sir Tho. Sheridan, and a few other desperate adventurers. For the conquest of the whole British empire, he brought with him seven officers, and arms for 2500 men. Fortune, which ever persecuted his family, seemed no way more favourable to him: his convoy, a ship of 60 guns, was so disabled in an engagement with an English man of war, called the Lion, that it returned to Brest, while he was obliged to continue his course to the western parts of Scotland; and, landing on the coast of Lochabar, July 27, was, in a little time, joined by some chiefs of the Highland clans and their vassals. By means of these chiefs, therefore, he soon saw himself at the head of 1500 men; and invited others to join him by his manifestoes, which were dispersed throughout all the Highlands. The ministry was no sooner confirmed of the truth of his arrival, which, at first, they could scarcely be induced to believe, than Sir John Cope was ordered to oppose his progress. In the mean time, the young adventurer marched to Perth, where the unnecessary ceremony was performed of proclaiming the Chevalier de St. George, his father, king of Great-Britain. The rebel army, descending from the mountains, seemed to gather as it went. They advanced towards Edinburgh, which they entered without opposition. Here too the pageantry of proclamation was performed, August 17, in which he promised to dissolve the Union, and redress the grievances of the country. But, though he was master of the capital, yet the citadel, which goes by the name of the Castle, a strong fortress built upon a rock, and commanded by general Guesf, braved all his attempts. In the mean time Sir John Cope, who had pursued them to the Highlands, but declined meeting them in their descent, now reinforced by two regiments of dragoons, resolved to march towards Edinburgh, and give them battle. The young adventurer, unwilling to give him time to retreat, attacked him near Prestonpans, about twelve miles from the capital, and, in a few minutes, put him and his troops totally to the rout. This victory, in which the king lost about 500 men, gave the rebels great influence; and, had the Pretender taken advantage of the general consternation, and marched towards England, the consequence might have been dangerous to the safety of the state; but he spent the time at Edinburgh, seeming to enjoy the useless parade of royalty, pleased at being addressed and treated as a king. By this time he was joined by the earl of Kilmarnock, the lords Elcho, Balmerino, Ogilvy, Pitligo, and the eldest son of the lord Lovat. While the young Pretender thus trifled away the time at Edinburgh, (for all delays in dangerous enterprises are even worse than defeats) the ministry of Great-Britain took every possible

sible measure to defeat his intentions. Six thousand Dutch troops that had come over to the assistance of the crown, were sent northward, under the command of general Wade; but, as it was then said, these could lend no assistance, as they were, properly speaking, prisoners of France, and, upon their parole not to oppose that power for the space of one year. However this be, the duke of Cumberland soon after arrived from Flanders, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry; volunteers in different parts of the kingdom employed themselves in the exercise of arms; and every county exerted a generous spirit of indignation, both against the ambition, the religion, and the allies, of the young adventurer. In the mean time, Charles went forward with vigour, and, resolving to make an irruption into England, he entered it by the western border. On the 6th day of Nov. Carlisle was invested, and, in less than three days, it surrendered. Here he found a considerable quantity of arms, and was declared king of Great-Britain. General Wade, being apprized of his progress, advanced across the country from the opposite shore; but, receiving intelligence that the enemy were two days march before him, he retired to his former station. The young pretender now resolved to proceed, having received assurances from France, that a considerable body of troops would be landed on the southern coast of Britain, to make a diversion in his favour, and flattered with the hopes of being joined by a large body of English malcontents, as soon as he should make his appearance among them. Leaving therefore a small garrison in Carlisle, which he should rather have left defenceless, he advanced to Penrith, marching on foot in an Highland garb, and continued his irruption till he came to Manchester, where he established his head quarters. He was here joined by about 200 Englishmen, who were formed into a regiment, under the command of colonel Townley. From thence he prosecuted his rout to Derby, intending to go by the way of Chester into Wales, where he hoped for a great number of adherents. He was, by this time, advanced within 100 miles of the capital, which was filled with terror and confusion. The king resolved to take the field in person. The volunteers of the city were incorporated into a regiment. The practitioners of the law agreed to take the field, with the judges at their head. Even the managers of the theatres offered to raise a body of their dependents for the service of their country. Yet these combinations only served as instances of the national terror; for the trading part of the city, and those concerned in the money corporations, were overwhelmed with dejection. They could hope for little safety in the courage or discipline of a militia; especially as they every hour dreaded an invasion from France, and an insurrection of the Roman catholics, and other friends to the expelled family. This therefore was the moment for the advancement of the adventurer's enterprize. Had he marched up to the capital, he would undoubtedly have been joined by several secretly attached to his cause. But he determined once more to retreat to Scotland; and thus his scheme was defeated. In fact, he was but nominally the leader of his forces. His generals, the chiefs of Highland clans, were, from their education, ignorant; and, from their independency, obstinate. They each embraced peculiar systems, and began to contend with each other for the pre-eminence; so that after violent disputes, they resolved to march back. They effected their retreat to Carlisle without any loss; and from thence crossed the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland. In this irruption, however, they preserved all the rules of war; they desisted, in a great measure, from rapine; levied contributions; and, in the usual form, left a garrison in Carlisle in their retreat; which, a short time after, to the number of 400, surrendered to the duke of Cumberland prisoners at discretion. The Pretender, being returned to Scotland, proceeded to Glasgow; from which city he exacted severe contributions. Advancing to Stirling, he was joined by lord Lewis Gordon, at the head of some forces which had been assembled in his absence. Other clans, to the number of two thousand, came in likewise; Spain sent him some supplies of money; and, in one or two skirmishes with the royalists, his generals came off with victory; so that his affairs once more seemed to wear an aspect of success. Being joined by lord John Drummond, he invested the castle of Stirling, commanded by general Blakeney; but his forces, being unused to sieges, consumed much time to no purpose. General Hawley, who commanded a considerable body of forces near Edinburgh, undertook to raise the siege. He advanced towards the rebel army, and rendezvoused his whole force at Falkirk, while the rebels lay incamped at no great distance. After two days mutually examining each other's strength, the rebels, on the seventeenth day of January, came on in full spirits to attack the king's army. The Pretender, who stood in the front line, gave the signal to fire; and the first volley served to put Hawley's forces into confusion. The horse retreated with precipitation, and fell in upon their own infantry; the rebels followed their blow; and the greatest part of the royal army fled with the utmost precipitation. They retired in confusion to Edinburgh, leaving the field of battle, with part of their tents and artillery, to the rebels. This was the end of all their triumphs. But a new scene of conduct was now going to open; for the duke of Cumberland, at that time the favourite of the English army, had put himself at the head of the troops at Edinburgh, which consisted of about fourteen thousand men. He resolved therefore to come to a battle as soon as possible; and marched forward, while the young adventurer retired at his approach. The duke advanced to Aberdeen, where he was joined by the duke of Gordon, and some other lords, attached to his family and cause. After having refreshed his troops there for some time, he renewed his march; and, in twelve days, came upon the banks of the deep and rapid river Spey. 1746. This was a place where the rebels might have disputed his passage; but they seemed now totally void of all counsel and subordination, without conduct, and without expectation. The duke still proceeded in his pursuit; and, at length, had advice that the enemy had advanced from Inverness to the plain of Culloden, which was about nine miles distant, and there intended to give him battle. On this plain the Highlanders were drawn up April 5 in order of battle, to the number of eight thousand men, in thirteen divisions, supplied with pieces of artillery. The battle began about one o'clock in the afternoon; the cannon of the king's army did dreadful execution among the enemy, while theirs, being but ill served, was ineffectual. One of the great errors in all the Pretender's warlike measures, was his subjecting undisciplined troops to the forms of artful war, and thus repressing their native ferocity, from which alone he could hope for success. After they had stood the English fire for some time, they at length became impatient for closer engagement; and about five hundred of them attacked the English left wing with their accustomed fierceness. The first line being disordered by this onset, two battalions advanced to support it, and galled the enemy by a terrible and close discharge. At the same time the dragoons under Hawley, and the Argyleshire militia, pulling down a park-wall that guarded the enemy's flank, and which the rebels had left but feebly defended, fell in among them sword in hand, with great slaughter. In less than thirty minutes they were totally routed, and the field covered with their wounded and slain, to the number of about three thousand men. The duke, immediately after the decisive action at Culloden, ordered six-and-thirty deserters to be executed; the conquerors spread terror wherever they came; and, after a short time, the whole country round was one scene of slaughter, desolation, and plunder; justice seemed forgotten, and vengeance assumed the name. In the mean time, the unhappy fugitive adventurer wandered from mountain to mountain, a wretched spectator of all these horrors, the result of his ill-guided ambition. He now underwent a similarity of adventures with Charles II. after the defeat at Worcester. He sometimes found refuge in caves and cottages, without attendants, and exposed to the mercy of peasants who could pity but not support him. Sometimes he lay in forests, with one or two companions of his distress, continually pursued by the troops of the conqueror, as there were thirty thousand pounds bid for his head. Sheridan, an Irish adventurer, was he who kept most faithfully by him, and inspired him with courage to support such incredible hardships. He was obliged to trust his life to the fidelity of above fifty individuals. One day, having walked from morning till night, pressed by hunger, and worn by fatigue, he ventured to enter a house, the owner of which he well knew was attached to the opposite party: "The son of your king," said he, entering, "comes to beg a bit of bread and cloaths. I know your present attachment to my adversaries, but I believe you have sufficient honour not to abuse my confidence, or to take the advantage of my misfortunes. Take these rags that have for some time been my only covering, and keep them. You may, probably, restore them to me one day, when seated on the throne of the kings of Great Britain." His host was touched with his distress, assisted him as far as he was able, and never divulged his secret. In this manner he wandered among the frightful wilds of Glengary, for near six months, often hemmed round by his pursuers, but still finding some expedient to save him from captivity and death. At length, a privateer of St. Malo, hired by his adherents, arrived in Lochnanach, on which he embarked, and arrived at France in safety. While the prince thus led a wandering and solitary life, the scaffolds and the gibbets were bathed with the blood of his adherents; seventeen officers of the rebel army were executed at Kennington common, in the neighbourhood of London, whose constancy in death gained more proselytes to their cause than perhaps their victories could have done. Nine were executed at Carlisle; six at Brumpton; seven at Penrith; and eleven at York. A few obtained pardons; and a considerable number were transported to the plantations. The earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, with the lord Balmerino, were tried by their peers, and found guilty. Cromartie was pardoned; the other two were beheaded on Tower-hill. Kilmarnock, either from conviction, or from the hope of a pardon, owned his crime, and declared his repentance of it. On the other hand, Balmerino, who had, from his youth up, been bred to arms, died in a more daring manner. When his fellow-sufferer, as commanded, bid God bless king George, Balmerino still held fast to his principles, and cried out, God bless king James, and suffered with the utmost intrepidity. Lord Lovat, and Mr. Radcliff, the titular earl of Derwentwater, suffered the same fate with equal resolution. The flames of war still continued to rage upon the continent with their accustomed violence. The French went forward with rapid success, having reduced almost the whole Netherlands to their obedience. In vain the Dutch negotiated, supplicated, and evaded war; they saw themselves stripped of all those strong towns which defended their dominions from invasion; and they now lay almost defenceless, ready to receive terms from their conquerors. The people, in several towns, inflamed almost to tumult and sedition, compelled their magistrates to declare for the prince of Orange as Stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral of the United Provinces. The vigorous consequences of this resolution immediately appeared; all commerce with the French was prohibited; the Dutch army was augmented; and orders were issued to commence hostilities against the French by sea and land. About this time 1746 the English made an unsuccessful expedition into France, in order to attack Port l'Orient, in which they came off without any honour. The French gained a considerable victory at Roucroux, in Flanders, over the allies, although it procured them no real advantage; and it cost them a greater number of lives than those whom they obliged to retire. The Dutch, in this general conflict, seemed the greatest losers. A victory gained over the allies at La Feldt served to reduce them to a still greater degree of distrust of their generals, than they had hitherto shown; but the taking of Bergen op-Zoom, the strongest fortification of Dutch Brabant, and which put the French in possession of the whole navigation of the Schelde, threw them almost into despair. But these victories in favour of France were counterbalanced with almost equal disappointments. In Italy, the French general, marshal Belleisle's brother, at the head of thirty-four thousand men, attempted to penetrate into Piedmont; but his troops were put to the rout, and he himself slain. The French king equipped an unsuccessful armament for the recovery of Cape Breton; and, not discouraged by this failure, fitted out two squadrons, one to make a descent upon the British colonies in America, and the other to assist the operations in the East Indies. These, however, were attacked 1747 by Anson and Warren, and nine of their ships were taken. Soon after this, commodore Fox, with six ships of war, took above forty French ships laden from St. Domingo; and this loss was soon after followed by another defeat, which the French fleet sustained from admiral Hawke, in which seven ships of the line, and several frigates were taken. This variety of success served to make all the powers at war heartily desirous of peace. An accommodation was therefore resolved upon; and the contending powers agreed to come to a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinson assisted as plenipotentiaries from the king of Great Britain. This treaty, which takes its name from that city, was concluded on the 7th day of October, a lasting instance of precipitate counsels and English humility. In 1740 a misunderstanding began to break out afresh between his majesty and the prince of Wales, whose servants, with a few independent country gentlemen, now began to form a new opposition in the house of commons. When the parliament met, they objected to and disputed the address, as well as every other measure proposed by the ministry. The colony of Nova Scotia was now planted; which, however, neither answered the expectations of the public or its projectors, and which in some measure proved the origin of the war that broke out in 1755. There were great party-riots at this time, particularly at Litchfield-races, where the duke of Bedford was grossly assaulted. In 1750, Mr. Pelham planned and executed a scheme for lightening the immense load of the national debt. This year the attention of the public was very much engrossed by the Westminster election, in which lord Trentham and Sir George Vandeput were competitors. The month of February was rendered remarkable by two shocks of an earthquake that were very sensibly felt in the cities of London and Westminster and their environs. The month of May was distinguished by a pestilential fever that arose from a contagion among the prisoners tried at the Old Bailey, and which proved fatal to the lord-mayor of London, one alderman, two judges, several lawyers, and a considerable number of spectators that attended the sessions. Disputes first began to arise this year between the courts of England and France, respecting the limits of Nova Scotia. On the 20th of March, 1751, Frederic prince of Wales died of a pleuritic disorder, in the 45th year of his age. He was possessed of every amiable quality which could engage the affection of the people; a tender and obliging husband, a fond parent, a kind master, liberal, generous, candid, and humane; a munificent patron of the arts; an unwearied friend to merit; well disposed to assert the rights of mankind in general, and warmly attached to the interest of Great Britain. His royal highness left issue, 1. Augusta, born August 11, 1737, married to the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick, January 16, 1764. 2. His present majesty, born May 24, 1738, old style. 3. Edward, duke of York, born March 14, 1739; died on September 17, 1767. 4. Elizabeth Caroline, born in December, 1740; died Sept. 4, 1759. 5. William Henry, duke of Gloucester, born Nov. 25, 1743; married to the countess of Waldegrave, natural daughter of Sir Edw. Walpole, knt. of the Bath. 6. Henry Frederic, duke of Cumberland, born Nov. 7, 1745; married in Nov. 1771, to the widow Horton, a daughter of lord Irnham; died Sept. 1790. 7. Louisa Anne, born March 8, 1749; since dead. 8. Frederic William, born May 13, 1750; and died Dec. 31, 1765. 9. Caroline Matilda, born July 11, 1751, old style; married, Oct. 1, 1766, to Christian VII. king of Denmark, from whom she was repudiated in 1772. The prince of Orange also died in October, in the 41st year of his age. In May an act passed for regulating the commencement of the year, by which the old style was abolished, and the new style established. This was done by sinking eleven days in Sept. 1752, and thereafter beginning the year on the first of January. The scrutiny relative to lord Trentham and Sir Geo. Vandeput had been carried on with infinite acrimony, when, at last, the former took his seat in parliament. Mr. Crowle, one of Sir George's counsel, was forced to ask pardon on his knees, of the house of commons; which Mr. Murray, brother to lord Elibank, refusing to do, was committed clove prisoner to Newgate. This year, miss Blandy, for poisoning her father, and miss Jefferies, with one Swan, for murdering her uncle, were executed. In 1753 passed the two famous bills for naturalizing the Jews, and for preventing clandestine marriages: the former, however, was afterwards repealed. This year too was rendered remarkable by the romantic affair of Elizabeth Canning, a wench who pretended that on New-year's day she had been seized by two men, under Bedlam-Wall, who tore off her cloaths, gagged her and carried her to Enfield-Wash; where ('twas wildly affirmed) she had subsisted almost a month on only a quarter loaf. On this occasion one Mary Squires, a gipsy, was tried and sentenced to die, but afterwards reprieved, to the great joy of all persons of sense and humanity; and Canning being tried for perjury, was transported for life in 1754. The society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, was founded about this time. In 1754, the public of England sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. Pelham, who was succeeded as prime-minister by his brother the duke of Newcastle. On Nov. 1, 1755, a most dreadful earthquake laid the city of Lisbon in ruins, and about 10,000 persons lost their lives. The barefaced encroachments of the French, who had built forts on our back settlements in America, and the dispositions they made for sending over vast bodies of veteran troops to support those encroachments, produced a wonderful spirit in England, especially after Adm. Boscawen was ordered with 11 ships of the line, besides a frigate and two regiments, to sail to the banks of Newfoundland, where he came up with and took two French men of war, the rest of their fleet escaping up the river St. Lawrence, by the straits of Belleisle. No sooner was it known that hostilities were begun, than the public of England poured their money into the government's loan; and orders were issued for making general reprisals in Europe as well as America, and that all the French ships, whether outward or homeward bound, should be stopped and brought into British ports. These orders were so effectual, that, before the end of the year 1755, above 300 of the richest French merchant-ships, and above 8000 of their best sailors, were brought into British ports. This well-timed measure had such an effect, that the French had neither hands to navigate their merchantmen, nor to man their ships of war: for about two years after near 30,000 French seamen were found to be prisoners in England. In July, gen. Braddock, who had been injudiciously sent from England to attack the French and reduce the forts on the Ohio, was defeated and killed by falling into an ambuscade of the French and Indians near Fort du Quesne; but major-general Johnson defeated a body of French near Crown Point, of whom he killed about 1000. On the 4th of May, 1756, Great-Britain declared war solemnly against France. The English at this time could not be said to have any first minister; some great men agreed in nothing but in opposing the measures of the cabinet. The English navy in 1755 consisted of one ship of 110 guns, five of 100 guns each, thirteen of 90, eight of 80, five of 74, twenty-nine of 70, four of 66, one of 64, thirty-three of 60, three of 54, twenty-eight of 50, four of 44, thirty-five of 40, and forty-two of 20; four sloops of war of 18 guns each, two of 16, eleven of 14, thirteen of 12, and one of 10, besides a great number of bomb-ketches, fire-ships, and tenders; a force sufficient to oppose the united maritime strength of all the powers of Europe, whilst that of the French, even at the end of this year, and including the ships then upon the stocks, amounted to no more than six ships of 80 guns, twenty-one of 74, one of 72, four of 70, thirty-one of 64, two of 60, six of 50, and thirty-two frigates. In proportion as the spirits of the public were elevated by those invincible armaments, they were sunk with an account that the French had landed 11,000 men in Minorca, to attack fort St. Philip there; that admiral Byng, who had been sent out with a Squadron at least equal to that of the French, had been baffled if not defeated by their admiral Galissoniere; and that at last Minorca was surrendered by general Blakeney. The English were far more alarmed than they ought to have been at those events. The loss of Minorca was more shameful than detrimental to the kingdom; but the public outcry was such, that the king gave up Byng to public justice, and he was shot to death at Portsmouth for cowardice. It was about this time that Mr. Pitt was placed, as secretary of state, at the head of the administration. He had been long known to be a bold speaker, and he soon proved himself to be as spirited a minister. The miscarriages in the Mediterranean had no consequence but the loss of Fort St. Philip, which was more than repaired by the vast success of the English privateers, both in Europe and America. The successes of the English in the East Indies, under colonel Clive, are almost incredible. He defeated Suraja Dowla, nabob of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixá, and placed Jaffer Ally Cawn in the ancient seat of the new nabobs of those provinces. Suraja Dowla, who was in the French interest, was, a few days after his being defeated, taken by the new nabob Jaffer Ally Cawn's son, and put to death. This event laid the foundation of the present amazing extent of riches and territory which the English now possess in the East-Indies. Mr. Pitt introduced into the cabinet a new system of operations against France, than which nothing could be better calculated to restore the spirits of his countrymen, and to alarm their enemies. Far from dreading an invasion, he planned an expedition for carrying the arms of England into France itself, and the descent was to be made at Rochefort, under general Sir John Mordaunt, who was to command the land troops. Nothing could be more promising than the dispositions for this expedition. It sailed on the 8th of September, 1757, and admiral Hawke brought both the sea and land land forces back on the 6th of October to St. Helen's, without the general making an attempt to land on the coast of France. He was tried and acquitted without the public murmurs, so great an opinion had the people of the minister, who, to do him justice, did not suffer a man or a ship belonging to the English army or navy to lie idle. Jan. 6, 1757, the French king was stabbed in his side, as he was getting into his coach, by one Damien, whose impious attempt was punished with the most cruel and exquisite tortures. The French having attacked the electorate of Hanover with a most powerful army, merely because his Britannic majesty refused to wink at their encroachments in America, the English parliament, in gratitude, voted large supplies of men and money in defence of the electoral dominions. The duke of Cumberland had been sent thither to command an army of observation; but he had been so powerfully pressed by a superior army, that he found himself obliged to lay down his arms; and the French, under the duke of Richelieu, took possession of that electorate, and its capital. At this time a scarcity next to a famine raged in England; and the Hessian troops, who, with the Hanoverians, had been sent to defend the kingdom from an invasion intended by the French, remained still in England. So many difficulties concurring, in 1758 a treaty of mutual defence was agreed to between his Majesty and the king of Prussia; in consequence of which the parliament voted 600,000*l.* to his Prussian majesty; and also voted large sums, amounting in the whole to near two millions a year, for the payment of 50,000 of the troops of Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Saxe-Gotha, Wolfenbuttel, and Buckeburg. This treaty, which proved afterwards so burdensome to England, was intended to unite the protestant interest in Germany. George II. with the consent of his Prussian majesty, pretending that the French had violated the convention concluded between them and the duke of Cumberland at Closterseben, ordered his Hanoverian subjects to resume their arms under Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, a Prussian general, who instantly drove them out of Hanover; and the duke of Marlborough, after the English had repeatedly insulted the French coasts, by destroying their stores and shipping at St. Maloes and Cherbourg, marched into Germany, and joined prince Ferdinand with 12,000 British troops, which were afterwards increased to 25,000. A sharp war ensued. The English every where performed wonders, and, according to the accounts in the London Gazette, they were every where victorious; but nothing decisive followed, and the enemy opened every campaign with advantage. Even the battle of Minden, the most glorious, perhaps, in the English annals, in which about 7000 English defeated 80,000 French regular troops in fair battle, contributed nothing to the conclusion of the war, or towards weakening the French in Germany. The English bore the expence of the war with cheerfulness, and applauded Mr. Pitt's administration, because their glorious successes in every other part of the globe demonstrated that he was in earnest. Adm. Boscawen and gen. Amherst, in Aug. 1758, reduced and demolished Louisbourg, in N. America, which had been restored to the French by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and took 5 or 6 French ships of the line. Frontenac and Fort du Quesne, in the same quarter, fell also into the hands of the English; acquisitions that far overbalanced a check which the English received at Ticonderago, and the loss of about 300 of the English guards at St. Cas, as they were returning under gen. Bligh from the coast of France. The English affairs in the East-Indies this year proved equally fortunate. The lords of the Admiralty received letters from thence, with an account of adm. Pocock engaging the French fleet near Fort St. David's, March 29, in which engagement a French man of war, called the Bien Aimé, of 74 guns, was so much damaged, that they run her on shore; the French had 600 killed and wounded on this occasion, and the English only 29 killed and 89 wounded: that on Aug. 3d following, he engaged the French fleet a second time, near Pondicherry; when, after a brisk firing of ten minutes, the French bore away with all the sail they could make, and got safe into the road of Pondicherry; the loss of the French in this engagement was 540 killed and wounded, and that of the English only 147; and that, on December 14th following, gen. Lally, commander of the French army in those parts, marched to besiege Madras, which was defended by the English colonels Laurence and Draper; and after a brisk cannonade, which lasted till Feb. 16th following, the English having received a reinforcement of 600 men, gen. Lally thought proper to raise the siege, and retire with precipitation, leaving behind him 40 pieces of cannon. The year 1759 was introduced by the taking of the island of Goree, on the coast of Africa, by commodore Keppel. Three capital expeditions had been planned for this year in America, and all of them proved successful. One of them was against the French islands in the West Indies, where Guadaloupe was reduced. The second expedition was against Quebec, the capital of the French Canada. The command was given, by the minister's advice, to general Wolfe, a young officer of a truly military genius. Wolfe was opposed with far superior forces by Montcalm, the best and most successful general the French had. Though the situation of the country which Wolfe was to attack, and the works the French threw up to prevent a descent of the English, were deemed impregnable, yet Montcalm never relaxed in vigilance. Wolfe's courage and perseverance, however, surmounting incredible difficulties, he gained the heights of Abraham, near Quebec, where he fought and defeated the French army, but was himself killed; and general Monckton, who was next in command, being wounded, the completion of the French defeat, and the glory of reducing Quebec, was reserved for brigadier-general (now lord viscount) Townshend.

General

General Amherst, who was the first English general on command in America, conducted the third expedition. His orders were to reduce all Canada, and to join the army under general Wolfe on the banks of the river St. Lawrence. It is to the honour of the minister, that Mr. Amherst in this expedition was so well provided with every thing that could make it successful, that there scarcely appeared any chance for its miscarriage; and thus the French empire in North America became subject to Great-Britain. The affairs of the French being now desperate, and their credit ruined, they resolved upon an attempt to retrieve all by an invasion of Great-Britain; but, on the 18th of August, 1759, admiral Boscawen attacked the Toulon squadron, commanded by M. de la Clue, near the straits of Gibraltar, took Le Centaur of 74, Le Temeraire of 74, and Le Modeste of 74 guns; and burnt L'Océan of 80, and Le Redoubtable of 74 guns. The rest of the fleet, consisting of seven ships of the line, and three frigates, made their escape in the night. And on Nov. 20, Sir Edward Hawke defeated the Brest fleet, commanded by admiral Conflans, off the island of Dumet, in the Bay of Biscay. The Formidable, a French man of war of 80 guns, was taken; the Thésée of 74, and the Superbe of 70 guns, were sunk; and the Soleil Royal of 80, and the Heros of 74 guns were burnt. Seven or eight French men of war of the line got up the river Villaine, by throwing their guns overboard; and the rest of the fleet, consisting of five ships of the line, and three frigates, escaped in the night. The English lost on this occasion, upon the shoals of the coast, the Estex of 64, and the Resolution of 74 guns. After this Engagement the French gave over all thoughts of their intended invasion of Great-Britain. In Feb. 1760, captain Thurot, a French marine adventurer, who had, with three sloops of war, alarmed the coasts of Scotland, and actually made a descent at Carrickfergus in Ireland, was, on his return, met, defeated, and killed by captain Elliot, who was the commodore of three ships, inferior in force to the Frenchman's squadron. Every day's gazette added to the accounts of the successes of the English, and the utter ruin of the French finances, which that government did not blush publicly to avow. In short, Great-Britain now reigned as sole mistress of the main, and had succeeded in every measure that had been projected for her own safety and advantage. The war in Germany, however, continued still as undecided as it was expensive, and many in England began to consider it now as foreign to the internal interests of Great-Britain. The French again and again shewed dispositions for treating, and the charges of the war, which now amounted to little less than 18,000,000 sterling yearly, inclined the British ministry to listen to their proposals. A negotiation was accordingly entered upon, which proved abortive, as did many other projects for accommodation. On May 5, earl

Ferrers was executed at Tyburn for the murder of Mr. Johnson, his steward; and on the 25th of October, 1760, George II. died suddenly, full of years and glory, in the 77th year of his age, and 33d of his reign. George II. was in his person rather lower than the middle size, well shaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high nose, and fair complexion. In his disposition he is said to have been hasty, prone to anger, especially in his youth, yet soon appeased; otherwise mild, moderate, and humane; in his way of living temperate, regular, and so methodical in every branch of private economy, that his attention descended to objects which a great king (perhaps) had better have overlooked. He was fond of military pomp and parade, and personally brave. He loved war as a soldier; he studied it as a science. With respect to his government, it very seldom deviated from the institutions of law; or encroached upon private property; or intertered with the common administration of justice. The circumstances that chiefly mark his public character, were a predilection for his native country, and a close attention to the political interests of the Germanic body. By his consort Withelmina-Caroline (daughter of John-Frederick, marquis of Brandenburg Aufspach), to whom he was married on Sept. 2, 1705, he had the following issue: 1. Frederick-Lewis, prince of Wales, &c. &c. &c. born at Hanover, January 20, 1706-7, and died March 20, 1750-1. 2. Anne late princess of Orange, mother of the present princess of Nassau-Weilburgh, who was married to his most serene highness Charles-William, prince of Orange, March 14, 1734, and died January 12, 1759. 3. Amelia-Sophia-Eleonora, born May 30, 1711, and died Oct. 31, 1786. 4. Elizabeth-Caroline, born May 30, 1713, and died Dec. 18, 1728. 5. William-Augustus, duke of Cumberland, born April 15, 1721, and died Oct. 31, 1765. 6. Mary, born Feb. 22, 1722-3, and May 8, 1740, married to Charles, then prince, but now landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, by whom she had issue William, the hereditary prince, married to his cousin, the princess Sophia Magdalena, princess of Denmark; Charles, and Frederick. She died Jan. 12, 1759. 7. Louisa, born Dec. 27, 1724, and in Nov. 1743 married to the prince royal, late king of Denmark, by whom she was mother of the present king, Christian VII. and the princesses Sophia Magdalena (above mentioned,) Withelmina-Caroline, and Louisa. She died Dec. 8, 1751. The powers of the human mind were freely and fully exercised in this reign. Considerable progress was made in the mathematics and astronomy by Saunderson, Bradley, Maclaurin, Smith, and the two Simpsons. Among the clergy, Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, Conybeare and Warburton, Foster and Leland, were equally distinguished for their genius and erudition. Some curious discoveries in Anatomy were made by the ingenuity and dexterity of Hunter and Monro; and Surgery was brought brought to great perfection under the auspices of Cheselden and Sharpe. Among the literati, Young still survived, a venerable monument of poetical talent. Thomson, the poet of the Seasons, displayed a luxury of genius in describing the beauties of nature. Akenfide and Armitrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the Epopœa did not disdain an English dress, but appeared to advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epigoniad of Wilkie. The public acknowledged a considerable share of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and some other less distinguished authors. The exhibitions of the stage were improved to the most exquisite entertainment, by the talents and management of Garrick, who greatly surpassed all his predecessors of this and perhaps every other nation, in his genius for acting; in the sweetness and variety of his tones; the irresistible magic of his eye; the fire and vivacity of his action; the elegance of attitude; and the whole pathos of expression. That Great Britain was not barren of poets at this period, appears from detached performances of Johnson, Mason, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wartons, besides a great number of other bards, who have sported in lyric poetry, and acquired the applause of their fellow-citizens. Even the female sex distinguished themselves by their taste and ingenuity. Miss Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge; and Mrs. Lennox signalized herself by many successful efforts of genius, both in poetry and prose. Johnson, inferior to none in philosophy, philology, poetry, and classical learning, stands foremost as an essayist, justly admired for the dignity, strength, and variety of his style, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he investigates the human heart, tracing every interesting emotion, and opening all the sources of morality. England was not defective in other arts that embellish and amuse. Music became a fashionable study, and its professors generally cared for by the public. Among the few natives of England who distinguished themselves by their talents in this art, Green, Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the most remarkable. The British soil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced some artists of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the scenes of ordinary life, in humorous historical designs. Hudson, Reynolds, and Ramsay, distinguished themselves by their superior merit in portraits; a branch that was successfully cultivated by many other English painters. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practised by several other masters; and great improvements were made in mezzotint, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of sculpture or statuary were raised by Rysbrack, Roubilliac, and Wilton. Architecture, which had been cherished by the elegant taste of Burlington, soon became a favourite study; and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom.

GEORGE III. eldest son of Frederick, Prince of Wales, was proclaimed King of Great Britain Oct. 26, 1760. The brighter the national glory was at the time of George II.'s death, the more arduous was the province of his successor, George III. Born and bred in England, he had no prepossessions but for his native country, and an excellent education gave him true notions of its interests; therefore he was not to be imposed upon by flattering appearances. He knew that neither the finances, nor the population of England, could furnish men and money for supplying the necessity of the war, successful as it was, and yet he was obliged to continue it, so as to bring it to a happy period. He chose for his first minister the earl of Bute, whom he had known ever since he began to know himself; and among the first acts of his reign was to convince the public that the death of his predecessor should not relax the operations of the war. Accordingly, in 1761, the island of Belleisle, on the coast of France, surrendered to his majesty's ships and forces under commodore Keppel and general Hodgson; as did the important fortress of Pondicherry in the East Indies to colonel Coote and admiral Stevens. The operations against the French West Indies still continued under general Monckton, lord Rollo, and Sir James Douglas; and in 1762, the island of Martinico, hitherto deemed impregnable, with the islands of Grenada, Grenadillas, St. Vincent, and others of less note, were subdued by the British arms, with inconceivable rapidity. By this time the famous family compact among all the branches of the Bourbon family had been concluded, and it was found necessary to declare war against Spain, who, having been hitherto no principals in the quarrel, had scandalously abused their neutrality in favour of the French. A respectable armament was fitted out under admiral Pocock, having the earl of Albemarle on board to command the land-forces; and the vials of the Spanish monarchy were struck at, by the reduction of the Havannah, the strongest and most important fort which his catholic majesty held in the West Indies. The capture of the Hermione, a large Spanish register-ship, bound from Lima to Cadiz, the cargo of which was valued at a million sterling, preceded the birth of the prince of Wales, and the treasure passed in triumph through Westminster to the Bank the very hour he was born. The loss of the Havannah, with the ships and treasures there taken from the Spaniards, was succeeded by the reduction of Manila, in the East Indies, by general Draper and admiral Cornish, with the capture of the Trinidad, reckoned worth three millions of dollars. To counteract those dreadful blows given to the family compact, the French and Spaniards opened their last resource, which was to quarrel with and invade Portugal, which had been always under the peculiar protection of the British arms.

Whether this quarrel was real or pretended is not for me to decide. It certainly embarrassed his Britannic majesty, who was obliged to send thither armaments both by sea and land; but these found no great difficulty in checking the progress of the Spaniards. The negotiations for peace were now resumed, and the necessity of concluding one was acknowledged by all his majesty's ministers and privy counsellors, excepting two. Many difficulties were surmounted, but the equally useless and expensive war in Germany was continued between the French and English with greater fury than ever. The enemy, however, at last granted such terms as the British ministry thought admissible and adequate to the occasion. A cessation of arms took place in Germany, and in all other quarters; and on the 10th of February, 1763, the definitive treaty of peace between his Britannic majesty, the king of France, and the king of Spain, was concluded at Paris, and acceded to by the king of Portugal. March 10, the ratifications were exchanged at Paris. The 22d, the peace was solemnly proclaimed at the usual places in Westminster and London; and the treaty having on the 18th been laid before the parliament, it met with the approbation of a majority of both houses. Never was the fortune of any nation higher than that of the English at this period. Besides our rich possessions in the East or West Indies, or those on the coast of Africa, all enlarged by a series of the most extraordinary successes, and confined by a perpetual treaty, without including Hudson's Bay, Newfoundland, or the other islands of North America, we were masters of all that vast continent, which stretches from the mouth of the river St. Lawrence to that of the Mississippi, and from the Atlantic ocean to the South Sea; the most extensive empire that was ever formed on the face of the earth. During the administration of Mr. Grenville, 1765, bills passed for laying a stamp-duty on the British colonies in America, which first laid the foundation of those quarrels between the colonies and the mother country, which ended in a total separation. This measure was no sooner known in America, than insurrections commenced there, and great murmurings at home. In consequence of which, the ministry retired, and the act was repealed. In the course of this year, the sovereignty of the Isle of Man was annexed to the crown of England; and this year, on account of the seizure of Mr. Wilkes's papers, general warrants, granted by secretaries of state, except in cases of high treason, were declared to be illegal and oppressive. In 1768, Mr. Wilkes, at the time he was an outlaw, having offered himself as a candidate to represent the city of London in parliament, and failing in that attempt, was immediately shofen for Middlesex. He was afterwards sent to the King's Bench prison, fined, and expelled the house of commons, for publishing N^o 45 of the North Briton, &c. Mr. Wilkes's imprisonment expired in 1771, when he was chosen one of the sheriffs for London and Middlesex, made an alderman, had his debts paid, afterwards elected lord-mayor, and lastly chamberlain of London. This year, the house of commons committed the lord-mayor and alderman Oliver to the Tower, for attempting to send one of their messengers to prison. The English parliament having laid new duties on paper, glass, tea, and other articles, in America, the colonies revolted, and flew to arms. On the 19th of April, 1775, Gen. Gage detached a party to seize some military stores at Concord, in New England. Several skirmishes ensued, many were killed on both sides, and the British troops would probably have been all cut off, had not a fresh body arrived to support them. Arms were now taken up in every quarter. The Americans assumed the title of The United and Independent Colonies of North America. Soon after the affair at Concord, the battle at Bunker's Hill took place, in which near 300 of the British officers and soldiers were killed. In 1776, Boston was bombarded and evacuated, when Gen. Washington took possession of it, and Gen. Howe removed his troops to Halifax. In 1778, the French entered into an alliance with the thirteen United Colonies. The year 1780 was remarkable for one of the most dreadful riots that ever happened in the city and suburbs of London. A protestant association of Calvinists and Methodists, with lord George Gordon at their head, while the nation was involved in real danger, alarmed themselves with fancied apprehensions of popery, and presented a petition, signed by 100,000 persons, to repeal an act they had just passed in favour of the Catholics. They proceeded to the house in great order, on the 2d of June, and the president gave in their petition; but, in the course of the day, several lords and commoners were insulted by the mob. In the evening, the mob pulled down the Sardinian, and another Romish chapel. On the evening of the 5th, Lord Mansfield's and several other houses were sacked; and the next day, the King's Bench prison, the New Bridewell, the Fleet prison, some popish chapels, and several papists houses were destroyed. Fires were seen blazing in every part of the capital, and the lawless mob were exacting contributions from the citizens, while the magistrates, and even the ministry, viewed these scenes of desolation with an inactivity that was astonishing. At length, however, their courage seemed roused, troops were called into London from all quarters, and were stationed in every part of the town. This step effectually checked the progress of the rioters, a great number of whom were shot by the military, and others were taken, tried, and executed. Lord George Gordon was also tried, but acquitted. In 1782, our affairs in America began to appear desperate, and every one seemed desirous of bringing it to a conclusion, except those, whose tyranny, ambition, and ignorance, had been the cause of it. In the mean time, admiral Rodney had a partial engagement agement with Count De Grasse, who retired to Guadaloupe to refit; but not long after, the two fleets met, and a general engagement commenced, which lasted twelve hours, when four French ships were taken, and one sunk; a fifth was taken, but blew up. Admiral Hood captured four, and admiral Barrington two ships of war, and ten sail under their convoy. The Count de Grasse was taken and brought to England; but most of the prizes, with some of our own ships, were lost, in their passage to England, in a violent storm. The Spaniards took from us the Bahama Islands, and continued the siege of Gibraltar with vigorous perseverance; but all their efforts were rendered ineffectual by the bravery and conduct of Gen. Elliot. He permitted them almost to complete their works on the land side, when he began such a heavy fire of carcasses, hot shot, and shells, that all their batteries were either damaged or destroyed. Soon after, another attack was made by ten floating batteries, built by the Spaniards at an enormous expence; but, by an incessant fire of red-hot balls from the besieged, most of them were set in flames, and great numbers of the men killed and blown up. However, all parties being now tired of the war, in 1783, the provisional articles between England and America were made public; by which it appeared, that his Britannic majesty acknowledged the independence of the thirteen United States of North America. He also relinquished all claims to the government of them; and consented to treat with these people as free and independent states, who, but a little time before, were despised as unpardonable rebels. From this period to the year 1788, the time passed in political and party contentions, without producing any thing very material: but, towards the close of this year, the political horizon of Great Britain was obscured by a dreadful and unexpected event. His majesty was seized with a violent disorder, which was at first thought to be a fever, from which little hopes were given of his recovery. His physicians, however, at last pronounced him out of danger, but gave the public the melancholy information of his being deranged in his senses, and public prayers were sent up to heaven for his recovery. The year closed with gloomy and desponding prospects, owing to the unhappy state of the king's health, and the rage of party, which seemed ripe to hurl every thing into a state of anarchy and confusion. The year 1789 opened with violent debates in both houses of parliament, on the mode of properly proceeding to business, in order to settle the regency during the unhappy indisposition of the king. This ferment continued till the 3d of February, when certain lords were appointed as commissioners to supply the place of the king, as the third branch of the legislature, till a regent should be appointed. A bill was immediately brought into the house of commons, and afterwards sent to the lords, for appointing the prince of Wales regent under certain restrictions, which met with violent opposition in both houses. The bill, however, was in its last stage, when, on the 10th of March, his majesty sent a message to parliament, acquainting them with his happy recovery. The narrow limits to which we are confined, will not permit us to enter into a detail of the universal joy this happy and unexpected event occasioned. We must content ourselves with observing, that the illuminations at night were such as had never been equalled before in this, or, perhaps, any city in the world. George III. was married Sept. 8, 1761, to the princess Sophia Charlotte, of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, born May 16, 1744, crowned Sept. 22, 1761, and now has issue: 1. George Augustus Frederick, prince of Wales, born Aug. 12, 1762; 2. Frederick, born Aug. 16, 1763, elected bishop of Osnaburg, Feb. 27, 1764; 3. William Henry, born Aug. 21, 1765; 4. Charlotte, born Sept. 29, 1766; 5. Edward, born Nov. 2, 1767; 6. Augusta Sophia, born Nov. 8, 1768; 7. Elizabeth, born May 22, 1770; 8. Ernest Augustus, born June 5, 1771; 9. Augustus Frederick, born Jan. 27, 1773; 10. Adolphus Frederick, born Feb. 24, 1774; 11. Mary, born April 25, 1776; 12. Sophia, born Nov. 3, 1777; 13. Amelia, born Aug. 7, 1783. The Princess Dowager of Wales, his Majesty's mother, died Feb. 8, 1772.

GEORGIA, or GU'RGISTAN, a province of Asia, partly belonging to Persia, and partly to the Turks. It is bounded on the N. by Circassia, on the S. by Turcomania and Erivan, on the E. by Shirvan and the Tartars of Dagestan, and by the Black Sea on the W. The inhabitants are very fair; and the women accounted the most beautiful in the world, and yet they cannot help painting. The inhabitants are a sort of Christians; but their doctrines greatly differ from those which are taught by other sects. Their disposition is pretty mild, but they are extremely ignorant, and addicted to sensual pleasures.

GEOR'GIA, one of the thirteen United Provinces of North America, bounded on the N. by Carolina, from which it is separated by the river Savannah; on the E. by the Ocean; on the S. by St. John's river, which divides it from Florida on the S. and W. on the E. is Louisiana. The tides on this coast generally flow seven feet.

GEOR'GIC, [jörjik] f. [Gr.] some part of the science of husbandry put into a pleasing dress, and set off with all the beauties and embellishments of poetry.

GERMA'IN, St. a town of Cornwall, with a small market on Fridays. It was once the largest town in the county, but is at present a small place, though it sends two members to parliament. It was formerly a bishop's see, had a cathedral, and what is left of it is used as the parish-church; and near it is the priory, yet standing. It is 224 miles W. by S. of London.

GE'RMAN, f. [lat.] a brother; one approaching proaching to a brother in nearness of blood; generally applied to the children of brothers and sisters, who are called cousins germans.

GERMAN, a. [Lat.] related.

GERMANY, a large country, lying in the middle of Europe, bounded on the E. by Hungary and Poland, on the N. by the Baltic Sea and Denmark, on the W. by the Netherlands, France, and Switzerland; and on the S. by the Alps, Italy, and Switzerland; being about 640 miles in length, and 550 in breadth. The air is temperate and wholesome, but more inclinable to cold than heat, especially by the sea side. The soil is very proper for corn and pastures, and in some places, especially along the Rhine, it produces large quantities of wine, known by the name of Rhenish; but, as to the particular productions, they will be taken notice of where the circles are described. As to the disposition of the people in general, they are robust, brave, good soldiers, free, laborious, inured to labour, dexterous in manufactures, and fruitful in inventions. The nobility in Germany is the purest in Europe, and they will sooner chuse the daughter of a nobleman without a fortune, than that of the richest citizen. One reason of this is, that there is no obtaining rich benefices, such as canonicates, abbeys, bishoprics, and archbishoprics, without a full proof of their nobility, as these are almost so many independent sovereignties. Germany is the most singular country in the world; for it contains a great many princes, as well secular as ecclesiastic, who are absolute in their own dominions, and independent of each other. Here are a great number of free towns, or cities, which are so many little republics, governed by their own laws, and only united by a head, who is elective, and has the title of emperor, who, properly speaking, has but little authority, except in the dominions belonging to him before he was chosen. Upon this account they generally chuse one who has territories of his own, and who is able to keep up his dignity. The election of the emperor formerly was made by the German princes, as well ecclesiastic as secular; but, by the famous constitution of the Golden Bull, the electors were restrained to seven; that is, three ecclesiastics, which are, the archbishops of Treves, Cologne, and Mentz, and four seculars, namely, the king of Bohemia, the count palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony, and the marquis of Brandenburg. But in 1648, they were obliged, by the treaty of Munster, to constitute an eighth electorate, in favour of the son of Frederic V. count palatine of the Rhine, who had been deprived of his dominions and titles in 1622, and put to the ban of the empire, because he had been proclaimed king of Bohemia, and his title conferred on the duke of Bavaria. Lastly, in 1692, the emperor Leopold created another electorate in favour of Ernest of Brunswick, duke of Hanover, whose son George became king of England in 1714. Each elector bears the title of one of the principal officers of the empire; the elector of Mentz is high chancellor of Germany, and director of the archives of the empire; that of Treves, or Triers, has the title of chancellor of the Gauls; and that of Cologne, that of Italy; the duke of Bavaria is grand master of Bavaria, and carries the golden apple; the elector of Saxony is grand esquire, and bears the sword; that of Brandenburg is grand chamberlain, and carries the sceptre; the palatine is grand treasurer, &c. When the emperor would be certain of a successor, he endeavours to prevail with the electors to chuse a king of the Romans, and then he will become emperor after the other's death. The emperor assumes the title of August, of Cæsar, and of Sacred Majesty. Although he is chief of the empire, he does not govern alone, but the supreme authority resides in the general assemblies, called Diets, which he only has a right of appointing, and to which he sends commissioners to preside in his room. These assemblies are composed of three bodies, or colleges; the first of which is that of the electors; the second that of the princes; and the third that of the imperial towns. The electors and princes send their deputies, as well as the imperial towns. When that of the electors and that of the princes disagree, that of the towns cannot decide the difference; but they are obliged to give their consent when they are of the same opinion. These assemblies have the power of making peace or war, of settling general impositions, and of regulating all the important affairs of the empire; but their deliberations have not the force of a law till the emperor gives his consent; who also gives the investiture of fiefs, and disposes of those which have devolved to the empire for want of successors, or confiscations. The electors and other sovereigns of Germany have an absolute authority in their own dominions, and they can levy taxes, raise troops, make and dissolve alliances, provided they do not prejudice the empire. They have power over life and death, and determine all civil causes definitively, unless in some particular cases, in which they make an appeal. These appeals are to two courts, called the Imperial Chamber, and the Aulic Council. The three principal religions are, the Roman Catholics, the Lutherans, and the Calvinists; the first prevails in the dominions of the Emperor, in the ecclesiastical electorates, and in that of Bavaria; the second chiefly obtains in the circles of Upper and Lower Saxony, and in a great part of Westphalia, Franconia, Suabia, the Upper Rhine, and in most of the imperial towns; the third is professed in the dominions of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and of some other princes. Vienna is looked upon as the capital city. The principal rivers of Germany are, the Danube, Rhine, Elbe, Weser, and the Oder. Germany is divided into nine circles, which are so many large provinces, each of which comprehends several other states, of which the princes, the prelates, and the counts, with the deputies of the imperial towns, meet together about their common affairs. Every circle has one or two directors, and a colonel; the directors have a power of convocating the assembly of the states of their circle, and the colonel commands the army. Each circle is obliged to furnish a certain number of horse and foot, or a certain sum of money, called Roman Months, when the necessity of public affairs requires it, according to a tax imposed by the register of the states of the empire. The nine circles are those of Austria, Bavaria, Suabia, Franconia, the Upper and Lower Rhine, Westphalia, and the Upper and Lower Saxony. The imperial towns are now only 52, but were formerly 84. There are also Hanseatic towns, which have some allowance on account of trade; and there were formerly some in France, Spain, and Italy, but now they are confined to Germany, and are but 5 or 6 in number. Besides the religions above-mentioned, there are some Independents, Anabaptists, Quakers, and Christians of every other denomination; besides a multitude of Jews in all their great towns. The language of Germany is a dialect of the Teutonic, which succeeded that called the Celtic.

GERME, f. [germen, Lat.] a sprout or shoot; that part which grows and spreads. In Botany, that part of a flower or plant which contains the seed.

GERMEN, f. [Lat.] a young sprout or shoot; a shooting or sprouting seed.

GIBRA'LTAR, a strong town of Spain, in Andalusia, near a mountain of the same name, formerly called Calpe, and supposed to be one of Hercules's pillars, and which he looked upon to be the end of the world. Tarick, a general of the Moors, built a fortress here, which he called Gibel Tarick, that is to say, Mount Tarick. Since that time a town has been built at the foot of this rock, which is very well fortified; it can only be approached by a very narrow passage between the mountain and the sea, across which the Spaniards have drawn a line, and fortified it, to prevent the garrison from having any communication with the country. It was formerly thought to be impregnable; but, in 1704, it was taken by the confederate fleet, commanded by Sir George Rook. The French and Spaniards attempted to retake it the same year, and 4 or 500 of them crept up the rock which covers the town, in the night time, but were drove down headlong the next morning. In 1787 the Spaniards besieged it again, and they attempted to blow up the rock, which they found impracticable, and were at length obliged to raise the siege. In the course of the late American war, the Spaniards again besieged it; but their ever memorable attack, on September 13, 1782, with floating batteries of 212 brass cannon, &c. in ships from 1400 to 600 tons burden, ended in a disappointment, in the destruction of all the ships, and most of the assailants in them. Gen. Elliot at this time commanded the garrison. The garrison here are cooped up in a very narrow compass, and have no provisions but what are brought from Barbary and England. The strait here is 24 miles in length, and 15 in breadth; and there is always a strong current runs through it from the ocean to the Mediterranean. It was ceded to England by the treaties of Utrecht and Seville. It is 25 miles N. of Ceuta, and 45 S. E. of Cadiz. Lon. 4. 15. W. lat. 36. 0. N.

It is bounded on the East by the Crisons, on the South by the same, and the canton of Uri, and that of Switz; and on the North by the river Limath. It is a mountainous country; and their chief trade is in cheese. The government is democratic, and the senate is composed of 62 persons, over which the landaman and pro-consul preside, who are never of the same religion; for the inhabitants are partly Papists and partly Protestants. The capital town is of the same name.

GLASGOW, a large city of Scotland, in the shire of Clydesdale, with an university, and a magnificent bridge. It is a populous place; and there is a large harbour on the river Clyde, on which it stands, a little below it, called New Glasgow, or the New Town, where the largest vessels may enter: for this reason the inhabitants carry on a large trade to foreign parts. The form of this town is nearly square, and is divided into four almost equal parts, by four large streets, which cross each other in the middle. Near this is the town-house, constructed of free-stone, with a high tower, and melodious chimes. It was formerly an archbishoprick; and the cathedral church, which is in the highest part of the town, town, is an old handsome Gothic structure. It is properly two churches, one above another, adorned with stately pillars, and a very high steeple. Glasgow is extremely well seated in a fertile soil, and the houses in general are very well built. The college is separated from the town by a very high wall, and consists of divers courts, each of which is surrounded with buildings. It is 35 miles W. of Edinburgh, and 320 from London.

It is seated on the E. side of the river Severn, where, by two several streams, it makes the isle of Alney. It is a large and well inhabited place, containing 12 churches; of which six only are in use, besides the cathedral of St. Peter, which is a handsome structure, and is remarkable for its large cloisters and whispering gallery. It is a city and county of itself; and governed by a mayor, 12 aldermen, and common council, who are never fewer than 26, nor above 39; a town-clerk, and sword-bearer; the mayor is recorder of the city. The houses amount to some thousands, and the streets are broad and paved. It contains five hospitals and two free-schools, and was fortified with a wall, which king Charles II. after the Restoration, ordered to be demolished. It sends two members to parliament, and has the title of a duchy. The eminent persons that were buried here were, Lucius, the first Christian king; Robert duke of Normandy, eldest son of William the Conqueror; and the unfortunate Edward II. Great quantities of pins are made here. It is 36 miles N. N. E. of Bristol, and 106 W. by N. of London.

GREECE, a country of Turkey, called by them at present Romelia. It is bounded on the N. by Bulgaria, Servia, and Dalmatia; on the W. by the gulph of Venice; on the S. by the Mediterranean; and on the E. by the Archipelago, the sea of Marmora, the Black sea, the straits of the Dardanelles and of Constantinople. It comprehends six parts, namely, Macedonia, Albania, Livadia, the Morea, the island of Candia, and the isles of the Archipelago. It enjoys a temperate air, is healthy, and has a fruitful soil. It was greatly celebrated by ancient historians, and produced a vast number of famous men, who performed very great actions as soldiers, as well well as others, who were eminent for their parts and learning; particularly Alexander the Great and Homer, who were natives of this country. But it now groans under the tyranny of the Turks, and is but the shadow of what it was formerly, being over-run with ignorance and barbarism, and almost all the fine towns quite destroyed. It is inhabited both by Mahometans and Christians.

To GYVE, v. a. to fetter or shackle; to enslave.

H Is the eighth letter, and sixth consonant, in our alphabet. Some Grammarians indeed will have it to be only an aspiration, or breathing; but it is most certainly a distinct sound, and formed in a particular manner by the organs of speech, at least in our language. It is pronounced by a strong expiration of the breath between the lips, closing, as it were, by a gentle motion of the lower jaw to the upper, and the tongue nearly approaching the palate. That it is a distinct letter, appears from the words eat and beat, arm and harm, ear and bear, ell and bell, as pronounced with or without the b. In English, it is scarcely ever mute in the beginning of a word, especially where it precedes a vowel: when it is followed by a consonant, it has no sound, as in fight; when it has c before it, it is sometimes dropped, the c being pronounced hard like a k, as in Christ, which the Saxons wrote Criſt, and in eccho; but this does not hold good always, for it is pronounced in ebavity, church, &c. Whenever it follows p, it is sounded together with it like an f; as Philip, &c. Among the ancients it was a numeral letter, signifying 200; and when with a mark over it thus, \bar{H} , 2000. In abbreviations, it is used for homo, as J. H. S. Jesus hominum Salvator, i. e. Jesus the Saviour of mankind.

HA, interject. an expression of wonder or surprize. When repeated, an expression of laughter or joy.

HA'BAKUK, the prophecy of, is one of the canonical books of the Old Testament. There is no mention made in scripture, either of the time when this prophet lived, or of the parents from whom he descended; but, according to the authors of the lives of the prophets, he was of the tribe of Simeon, and a native of Bethzaiar.

HA'BEAS CORPUS, f. [Lat.] in Law, a writ which a man may have out of the King's-Bench, to remove himself thither at his own expence, to answer at the bar there, when indicted or imprisoned for a crime before justices of the peace, or a franchise court, after having offered sufficient bail, which is refused, though the case be bailable.

HA'GARD, a. [bagard, Fr.] wild, unlocatable, or untamed; lean; ugly; rugged; deformed; formed; wildly disordered.

HAGGAI, the tenth of the small prophets, was born, in all probability, at Babylon, in the year of the world 3457, from whence he returned with Zerubbabel. It was this prophet, who, by command from God, (Ezra v. 1, 2, &c.) exhorted the Jews, after their return from the captivity, to finish the rebuilding of the Temple, which they had intermitted for 14 years. His remonstrances had their effect; and, to encourage them to proceed in the work, he assured them from God, that the glory of this latter house should be greater than the glory of the former house: which was accordingly fulfilled when Christ honoured it with his presence; for, with respect to the building, this latter temple was nothing in comparison of the former.

HAGGARD, f. any thing wild or irremediable; a species of hawk; a hag.

HAGGARDLY, ad. deformedly; ugly; like a hag.

HAGUE, [pronounced Häg] a town of the United Provinces, in Holland, which geographers pretend is but a village, and yet it may compare with the handsomest towns or cities in Europe, with regard to its extent, the number and beauty of its palaces, its streets, its agreeable walks, and its great trade, especially in books. The greatest part of the houses have the appearance of palaces, and there are at least 4000 gardens. It is seated 4 miles from the sea, and there is a pavement across the Downs, with trees on each side, which leads to Scheveling, near the sea-side. The Stadtholder, or governor of the country, generally resides here. It is the place where the States of the United Provinces assemble, and here the foreign ministers are admitted to audience; and here also the supreme courts of justice are held. It is 3 miles N. W. of Delft, 8 S. W. of Leyden, 10 N. W. of Rotterdam, and 30 S. W. of Amsterdam. Lon. 4. 10. E. lat. 52. 4. N.

HAI, an interjection, expressing a sudden surprize.

HAIK, a market-town of Scotland, in the shire of Peebles, seated on the river Tiviot.

HAIL, f. [bagel, Sax.] a concretion of aqueous particles, or drops of rain congealed into ice. This happens, when, in their passage through the inferior air, they meet with nitrous particles which are known to contribute greatly to freezing. Their magnitude is owing to a fresh accession of matter as they pass along. Hence we see the reason why hail is so frequent in summer, because at that time greater quantities of nitre are exhaled from the earth, and float up and down the air.

To HAIL, v. n. to pour down hail.

HAIL, interject. [boel, Sax.] a term of salutation wherein we wish health to a person. It is used at present only in poetry.

To HAIL, v. a. [baletan, Sax.] to salute; to call to, applied to the manner in which ships address each other.

HA'MBLEDON, a village in Hampshire, 7 miles S. W. of Petersfield.

HA'MBURGH, one of the largest towns in Germany, the births and burials amounting to 5000 persons every year. The ancient town itself is pretty large; to which they have added the new town, almost as big as the former. Most of the houses are new, built after the manner of the Dutch, and richly furnished within. The principal streets of the ancient town have long and broad canals, which are filled twice every 24 hours by the tides. These are not only useful for trade, but serve to keep the houses and the streets clean. Hamburg is well fortified, and there is always a sufficient garrison to defend it, with a fine train of artillery. On the ramparts are handsome walks, on which they take the air in fine weather. The burghers mount guard themselves, and are divided into several companies. The streets are well lighted every night, and there is a guard which patrols all over the city. It is a place of great trade; which they carry on with Portugal; Spain, France, England, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Italy, and Russia. The inhabitants are all Lutherans, and none but the English have the liberty of performing divine service in a chapel of their own. Other religions are tolerated at Altena, which is a large town near the harbour of Hamburg; except the Jews, who have no synagogue. It is advantageously situated on the north bank of the Elbe, 45 miles N. W. of Lunenburg, 60 S. of Stewick, and 55 N. E. of Bremen. Lon. 9. 53. E. lat. 53. 43. N.

HA'MPSHIRE, an English county, 40 miles in length, and 35 in breadth; bounded on the N. by Berkshire; on the E. by Sussex and Surry; on the W. by Dorsetshire; and on the S. by the British Channel. It contains 253 parishes, and 20 market-towns. The principal rivers are the Avon, the Stour, the Test, and the Itching. The air is wholesome, and the soil various; and here is the famous New Forest, for the making of which William the Conqueror demolished 36 churches. It has 9 walks, as many keepers, a bow-bearer, and a lord-warden. The commodities are corn, wool, wood, iron, sea-fish, and particularly lobsters and oysters. Here are also some woollen manufactures; but it is most noted for its excellent honey, and the best bacon in the kingdom. It sends 20 members to parliament; that is, 18 for the towns, and 2 for the county. Winchester is the capital.

HA'MPSHIRE NEW, one of the United Provinces of North America, and formerly one of the four divisions of New England; it is bounded on the N. by New Scotland; on the E. by the ocean; on the S. by Massachusetts-Bay; and on the W. by New-York.

HA'MPSTEAD, a pleasant village of Middlesex, 4½ miles N. of London. As the air is exceeding good, it is well furnished with fine seats built in an elegant manner, and much resorted to in the summer-time by all sorts of people: as for the medicinal waters, formerly in request, they are now much neglected.

HA'MPTON, a town in Gloucestershire, with a market on Thursdays. It is seated on the Cotswold-Hills, and had formerly a nunnery. It is 99 miles W. of London.

HA'MPTON-COURT, a town of Middlesex, famous for a royal palace built by cardinal Wolsey, who gave it to Henry VIII. The buildings, gardens, and parks, to which king William made many additions, are about four miles in circumference, and watered on three sides by the Thames, over which there is a bridge to Kingston. It is seated on the N. side of the Thames, 13½ miles S. W. of London.

HANOVER, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and capital of the king of Great-Britain's German dominions. The elector resided here before he ascended the throne of Great-Britain, in a palace which makes no great show outwardly, but within is richly furnished. The regency of this country is administered in the same manner as if the sovereign was present. It is a large well-built town, and pretty well fortified. The established religion is the Lutheran; but the Roman Catholics are tolerated, and have a handsome church. It is agreeably seated in a sandy plain, on the river Leyne, which divides it in two: it is 15 miles E. of Newstadt, and 15 W. of Brunswick. Lon. 10. 5. E. lat. 22. 5. N.

HANOVER, the territory of, comprehended at first nothing but the county of Lwenrood; but now it contains the duchy of Zell, Sax-Lawenburg, Bremen, Lunenburg, the principality of Verden, Grubenhagen, and Oberwald. George I. king of Great-Britain, was the first that gained possession of all these states, which mostly lie between the rivers Weser and Elbe, and extend 200 miles in length from S. W. but the breadth is different, being in some places 150 miles, in others but 50. The produce of them is timber, cattle, hogs, mum, beer, and bacon; a little silver, copper, lead, iron, vitriol, brimstone, quicksilver, and coppers; but the trade is not very great in any of these articles.

HANSE TOWNS, a society of sea-port towns, united together for their common interest, and for the protection of their trade: they are so called from the German word Hanse. There were a great number of these at first; but about the year 1500 they began to be weakened, and now none have the Hanseatic government, except Bremen and Lubeck.

HAN'T, a contraction for have not, or has not: used in common discourse.

HAP, f. [anhap, Brit.] chance; fortune; or that which comes to pass without design or being foreseen.

HARDENER, f. one that renders any thing hard, or not easily penetrated.

HARDFATTOURED, a. having a coarseness or harshness of features.

HARD-HEARTED, [hard-hearted] a. cruel; inexorable; merciless.

HARD-HEARTEDNESS, f. the quality of being insensible to the cries of misery, and unmoved at the sight of wretchedness.

HARDICANUTE was at Bruges with his mother when Harold died, consulting about measures to recover the crown of Wessex; and upon the news of his brother's death, he came over into England with 40 Danish ships, and was unanimously acknowledged king of England. Immediately after he was crowned, he caused the body of his brother to be dug up, and flung into the Thames; which being found by some fishermen, they gave it to the Danes, who deposited it in their burial-place at London, at this day called St. Clement's Danes. Soon after he laid a heavy tax on the nation for paying his fleet, which he sent back to Denmark. This occasioned great murmuring and discontent among the people. At Worcester the tax was opposed with the utmost violence, and two of the persons employed to collect it were killed: this incensed the king, that he sent the dukes of Wessex and Mercia, and the earl of Northumberland, with their forces, against Worcester, who, after plundering the city for four days, burnt it to the ground. Hardicanute, who was infamous for gluttony and drunkenness, as well as for cruelty, died suddenly as he was carousing at the wedding of a Danish lord at Lambeth. He died unlamented by all; and the English, we are told, kept the day of his death, June 8, as a holiday for some centuries after, by the name of Hoc-tide, or Hog's-tide. He died in 1041, and in the 3d year of his reign. With him ended the monarchy of the Danes in England, after it had lasted about 26 years, but after they had harried the kingdom 240 years. In these times we are told, that a Dane would often stab an Englishman as he was drinking, so that at length no one would drink in the presence of a Dane, without having somebody to be his pledge or security; whence, it is said, the custom of pledging one another took its rise.

HARDIMENT, f. [hardiment, Fr.] courage; bravery.

HARDINESS, f. hardihip, or fatigues courage, or a disposition of mind insensible to danger; effrontery; impudence.

threads or filaments.

HARLECH, a town in Merionethshire, in North Wales, with a market on Saturdays. It is seated on a rock, on the sea-shore, and but a poor place, though the shire-town, and sends a member to parliament. It had formerly a strong, handsome castle, which was a garrison for king Charles I. in the civil wars, for which reason it was afterwards demolished by the parliament. It is 223 miles W. N. W. of London.

HARLEQUIN, f. a person dressed in a motley-coloured jacket and trowsers; the hero in pantomime entertainments, who diverts the populace by his activity, artifices to extricate himself from danger, and his seeming power in enchantments and metamorphoses.

HARLESTON, a town of Norfolk, with a large market on Wednesdays. It is seated on the river Wavenay, over which there is a bridge. It is 100 miles N. E. of London.

HARLING, a town in Norfolk, with a market on Tuesdays. It is seated on a rivulet; and the market is chiefly for linen cloth. It is a pretty, neat, genteel town, but has no church, and only a small chapel in the middle of the place, and a presbyterian meeting-house. It has one wide street, and manufactures a little linen cloth. It is 88 miles N. E. of London.

HARLOT, f. [berlodes, Brit.] a female that is unchaste.

HARLOTRY, f. an habitual practice of unchasteness, applied to a woman. Used as a term of contempt for a woman.

HARLOW, a town in Essex, whose market is on Saturdays. Distant 23 miles from London.

HARM, f. [bearm, Sax.] an action by which another person may receive damage in his goods, or hurt in his person; mischief; hurt; or injury. SYNON. Harm particularly relates to any ill done a man's person or character, and is inferior in degree to hurt, which includes a great degree of harm. Mischief implies ill done either to person or property with an evil intent; injury, a degree of hurt without justice, and refers either to character or property. Detriment includes an idea of loss, and is seldom used but when speaking of property.

To HARM, v. a. to damage the goods or fortune of another, or to hurt his person.

HARMFUL, a. hurtful; injurious; detrimental; mischievous.

HARMFULLY, ad. in such a manner as to produce mischief, hurt, or damage.

HARMFULNESS, f. the quality which renders a thing or person detrimental to the interest, hurtful to the person, or injurious to the character of another.

HARMLESS, a. without hurt; without intending or causing any mischief; without being damaged; innocent.

HARMLESSLY, ad. innocently; without malice or crime.

HARMLESSNESS, f. the quality of a thing or person which can affect another with no damage or hurt.

HARMO'NIAC, or HARMO'NICAL, a. [ἀρμονικός, Gr.] proportioned or adapted to each other; musical.

HARMO'NICS, f. is that part of music which considers the differences and proportions of sounds with respect to acute and grave; in contradistinction to rhythmic and metrical.

HARMO'NIOUS, a. adapted to, or having the parts proportioned to each other. In Music, having sounds that are concords to each other; musical, or affecting the ear with an agreeable sensation.

HARMO'NIOUSLY, ad. with a just proportion of parts to each other; in such a manner as to delight the ear.

HARMO'NIOUSNESS, f. that quality which renders sounds agreeable and delightful; proportion of parts.

To HAR'MONIZE, v. a. to agree with respect to proportion. To make musical, or convey delight to the ear, applied to sound.

HAR'MONY, f. [ἀρμονία, Gr.] in Music is the agreeable result or union of several musical sounds heard at one and the same time; or the mixture of divers sounds, which together have an effect agreeable to the ear. Harmony likewise denotes an agreement, suitableness, union, conformity, &c. Thus in music, we sometimes apply it to a single voice, when sonorous, clear, and soft; to a single instrument, when it yields a very agreeable sound. In matters of Literature, we use it for a certain agreement between the several parts of a discourse. In Architecture, it denotes an agreeable relation between the parts of a building. In Painting, they speak of it both in the ordonnance and composition, and in the colours, of a picture: in the Ordonnance, it signifies the union or connection between the figures, with respect to the subject of the piece; in the Colours, it denotes the union or agreeable mixture of different colours.

HAR'NESS, f. [barnois, Fr.] in its primary sense, armour for a horse; the traces by which horses are fastened to carriages of pleasure or state: that of other horses is called geer.

To HAR'NESS, v. a. to dress in armour; to fix horses in their traces; or to put traces on a horse.

HAR'OLD, surnamed Harefoot; the son of Canute, king of England, ascended the throne upon the death of his father, being supported by the Danes, who were resolved to stand by Canute's will, by which he had left the kingdom of England to Harold. He immediately seized upon the treasure, which his father had laid up at Winchester. This enabled him to gain over several of his opposers; and, at a general assembly of the whole nation, held in Mercia, viz. at Oxford, having got a majority of voices, he was proclaimed king of England, Hardicanute being then in Denmark. In the mean time the West-Saxons returning home, dissatisfied with his choice, Hardicanute was, by the management of earl Goodwin, proclaimed claimed king of Wessex, without any further interfering with what had been done in Mercia. By Wessex we are to understand all the country south of the Thames, and by Mercia, all north of it. In Hardicanute's absence, Goodwin managed all in Wessex. Harold, seeing he could not obtain his end by force of arms, endeavoured to bring him over by fair means, and so managed his matters, that Goodwin on a sudden became his friend; and, under pretence that Hardicanute neglected to come into England, got Harold to be acknowledged king of Wessex with all the ease imaginable, and now he was in reality king of all England. He died without issue 1039, in the 4th year of his reign. He laid a tax of 8 marks on every port, toward fitting out 16 ships; and made a law, that, if any Welchman, coming into England without leave, should be taken on this side Offa's ditch, his right hand should be cut off.

HA'ROLD II. son of Earl Goodwin, succeeded Edward the Confessor, 1065, and had all the qualifications requisite to the forming a great prince. He lessened the taxes, and caused justice to be impartially administered. The duke of Normandy, having long entertained thoughts of succeeding to the crown of England upon Edward's death, being moved thereto, either by the verbal promise or will of that prince, but much more by his own ambition, was enraged, that Harold had, contrary to his oath, set himself up for king. But Harold now met with great uneasiness from his brother Toston, who was endeavouring to dethrone him, and, being assisted by the earl of Flanders, greatly infested the English coasts. However, an army being sent against him, he was obliged to return to his ships, and was driven on the coasts of Norway, and there met with what he desired. He persuaded Harfager, king of Norway, to join with him, and they entered the Tyne with 500 ships, landed and ravaged the country, and took York. Harold came up with them at Stamford Bridge on the Derwent. They were posted on the other side of the bridge, so that Harold could not come at them without first making himself master of the bridge, which the Norwegians bravely defended, being encouraged by one man, who alone defended the bridge for no small time against the whole English army; but at last, he being slain, after he had, as it is said, killed 40 men with his own hands, Harold became master of the bridge, and led his army over: and now a very obstinate and bloody battle was fought between two numerous armies, no less than 60,000 of a side, which lasted from seven in the morning to three in the afternoon; and at length Harold gained a complete victory, Harfager and Toston being both slain. But Harold, whether to ease the people of expence, or for whatever reason it was, kept the spoils to himself, which raised such discontents in the army, as proved detrimental to his affairs afterwards. William, duke of Normandy, had, soon after Edward's death, sent ambassadors to Harold, requiring him to deliver up the crown, and, in case of refusal, to charge him with breach of his oath, and to declare war against him. Harold returned for answer, that the duke had no right to the crown, that the oath was extorted from him, was therefore null and void, and that he would defend his own right against all opposers. The duke of Normandy got the pope's approbation of his design, who sent him a consecrated banner, with a golden agnus Dei, and one of St. Peter's hairs. Harold had equipped a large fleet, and raised a numerous army, which, after waiting a great while for the duke, he had given orders for the disbanding, just before he heard of Harfager and Toston's invasion. The duke landed at Pevensey, in Sussex, Sept. 29, 1066, and built a fort there; and then marched along the shore as far as Hastings, where he built another strong fort, and waited for the coming of the enemy. Harold was still in the north, not expecting their coming till the spring; but as soon as he was informed of their arrival, he marched with the utmost expedition to London, where the nobility came in to him, promising their assistance; but he found his army much diminished by the losses at Stamford bridge, and multitudes deserting through discontent. However, having drawn all his forces together, he marched and encamped about seven miles from the Norman army, resolving to give them battle. The English spent the night in singing and carousing, as if sure of the victory; and the Normans, in preparing for the fight, and praying to God for success. On Oct. 14, the two armies engaged; the battle began with great fury and equal bravery on both sides. The English were at first very much annoyed by the long bows of the Normans, a way of fighting they had not been used to, which put them in some disorder; but recovering themselves, they so warmly engaged the Normans, that they were forced to give back a little, who, renewing the attack, met with as vigorous a resistance as before, the English having much the advantage of them with their bills, which were their ancient weapons; nor was it in the power of the Normans to break their ranks, which remained impenetrable, till the duke thought of a stratagem, which was, for his men to retreat as they were fighting, as if they were about to fly. This emboldened the English to press upon their retiring enemy, and in their eagerness they broke their ranks; and then the Normans fell on the disordered English, and made a terrible slaughter of them. However, Harold rallied his troops, and the English killed great numbers of the Normans, and preserved their ranks. The battle had lasted from seven in the morning, and night now drew on, whilst victory yet seemed to remain in suspense. But the duke had a mind to make one push more before it was dark, to drive the English from their station. In this fatal attack Harold was slain, by an arrow shot into his brains; at which the English being quite dismayed, betook themselves to flight, and the Normans obtained a complete victory. Thus fell the brave Harold, in his country's cause, after a turbulent reign of 9 months and 9 days; and with him totally ended the empire of the Anglo-Saxons in England, which had begun, in the person of Hengist, above 600 years before.

HARP, f. [harp, Sax.] a musical instrument strung with wire, and struck with the finger. In Astronomy, the name of a constellation.

To HARP, v. n. [harper, Fr.] to play on the harp. Figuratively, to touch any particular passion; to dwell on a subject.

HARPER, f. a player on the harp.

HARPING-IRON, or HARPOON, f. [harpaga, Lat.] a bearded dart, with a line fastened to the handle, with which whales or other large fish are caught.

HARPOONER, f. [harponeur, Fr.] he that darts or throws the harpoon in whale-fishing.

HENRY I. surnamed Beau-clerc, youngest son of William I. ascended the throne of England while his brother Robert was returning from the Holy Land. William de Breteuil, and other lords, would have seized the crown and sceptre at Winchester, with the royal treasure there deposited, alleging they were obliged by oath to acknowledge Robert for king, in case William died without heirs, according to the treaty between the two brothers. There was quickly a great concourse of people from all parts; and Henry, well knowing how they stood affected, drew his sword, and swore no man should take possession of the crown but whom the people approved. The lords hereupon retired to a room to consult what was proper to be done, whilst the people, with loud acclamations, made the name of Henry resound in their ears; so, fearing that the opposing the inclinations of the people might bring on a civil war, they resolved that Henry should succeed to the crown. Upon this Henry made haste to London, and the next day, August 5. 1100, was crowned by Maurice, bishop of that see, who administered to him the usual oath. To

To secure himself on the throne, he wisely began his reign by reforming abuses, redressing grievances, and doing many popular things, according to his late promise; and granted a charter of liberties, confining the royal authority within its ancient bounds, renouncing the unjust prerogatives the two late kings had usurped, restoring the church to her former rights, and confirming the laws of king Edward. He moreover remitted all arrears of debt to the crown, and appointed a standard for weights and measures throughout the kingdom. In 1101 Henry recalled Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and married Matilda, or Maud, daughter of Malcolm king of Scotland, by Margaret, sister to Edgar Atheling; by which means the royal family of the Saxons was united with that of Normandy. Robert had still a great party in the kingdom for him, and upon his landing at Portsmouth was received without opposition. But Henry managed matters so well by means of Anselm, who was in great credit with the people, that Robert's measures were quite disconcerted, and matters were accommodated between them, upon condition, that, if one of the two brothers died without issue, the survivor should succeed to his dominions; that the king should deliver up to Robert the castles in Normandy that were garrisoned with English, and should pay him 3000 marks a year. In 1103 a contest began between the king and archbishop Anselm, about the right of investiture of bishops and abbots, and their doing homage to the king, which Henry insisted on as a prerogative derived from his ancestors; but a council at Rome decreed, that no bishops should receive investiture from laymen. This contest ran high, and lasted several years; at last it was compromised by Henry's renouncing the right of investiture, and the pope's allowing the bishops and abbots to do homage to the king for their temporalities. And now a contention was called to another affair. Robert de Belesme, to be revenged on the king, who had caused him to be proclaimed a traitor, fell upon such of his subjects as had lands in Normandy. Duke Robert marched against him, but was worsted, and at the end was forced to clap up a peace with him on dishonourable terms; notwithstanding which, Belesme ravaged the country; hereupon some of the chief men in Normandy applied to the king of England for relief. Henry, wanting to get this duchy into his own hands, passed over into Normandy, and had great success in his first campaign; but in his second, Robert, perceiving his design, and having in vain sought for peace, joined with Belesme and the king against him, who led all their forces to his assistance. Robert having a considerable army, gave his brother battle under the walls of Tinchebray, which was besieged by Henry. The battle lasted not long; Robert was beaten, and taken prisoner, as were also Edgar Atheling, the earl of Mortaigne, 400 knights, and 1000 soldiers. Prince Edgar was set at liberty, and passed the remainder of his days in England. The earl of Mortaigne was imprisoned in the Tower of London, and duke Robert in Cardiff castle, in Wales, where he remained to his death, which happened about twenty-six years after. The king, by this battle, which was fought in 1107, was master of all Normandy, and returned in triumph to England, where he behaved with great arrogance, and permitted any abuses which turned to his profit. The king did not enjoy Normandy quietly; for Lewis le Gros, king of France, invaded William Crito, duke Robert's son, which the duchy of Normandy, and a smart war was carried on for some time; at last, in 1120, a peace was concluded between the two kings. But to return back; in 1109 the king's daughter, Maud, was married to the emperor Henry V. which furnished him with a pretence for laying a tax of 3s. on every hide of land, in order to pay her marriage portion, which raised an immense sum. About this time died that haughty prelate Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; the king seized on the revenues of the archbishopric, and kept them five years in his hands. The next year was remarkable for the restoration of learning at Cambridge, where it had for a long time been quite neglected. In 1112 great numbers of Flemings, being obliged to leave their country by the inundation of the sea, came into England, and were settled about Ros and Pembroke. About this time the Welch committed great ravages upon the frontiers; but Henry marching against them, they retired to the mountains. Some years after they committed the like depredations, which occasioned another invasion of Wales, but that soon ended in a peace; however, Henry obliged them to give him hostages, and 1000 head of cattle to make him amends for the charge of the war. In 1115 Henry got the states of Normandy to swear fealty to prince William his son, then 12 years old; and the year following he did the same in England, to secure the crown to his family. In 1118 queen Matilda died. A year or two after prince William his son was unfortunately drowned as he was returning from Normandy, by the ship striking on a rock, and his whole company, amounting to about 150, except a very few who saved themselves by swimming. However, the king desirous of another son, married Adelia, daughter of Geoffrey, earl of Lovain; but she never proved with child. In 1125 cardinal John de Crema, the pope's legate, came over to England, to put the finishing stroke to the celibacy of the clergy. A synod being convened at London, he got some severe canons passed against such ecclesiastics as persisted in keeping their wives. The design of the court of Rome, in thus contending for the single life of the clergy, was to make them independent of the civil power, and to incorporate them into a society apart, to be governed by its own laws, which could not so well be done, whilst the clergy were allowed to marry, and have children. King Henry, by his seeming zeal on this article, politically got from the pope a power to put it in execution; which done, he gave the priests leave to keep their wives, upon paying him a sum of money for a dispensation. The king, having no child by his second wife, after having been married to her six years, in 1127 assembled a great council, and got them to acknowledge his daughter Maud, who was returned to England upon the emperor's death, presumptive heir to the crown. Stephen, earl of Bulloign, who was afterwards king, was the first who took the oath of allegiance to her, in case Henry died without male issue. Soon after he married her to Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou. In 1133, he caused the states of Normandy to take an oath of fealty to her and prince Henry her son. King Henry went over to Normandy the latter end of the summer, and died there on Dec. 1. 1135, in the 68th year of his age, and 36th of his reign. His body was brought over and buried in the abbey of Reading, which he had founded. He built several other abbeys, with the priory of Dunstable, and founded the sees of Ely and Carlisle. Henry was of a middle stature and robust make, with dark brown hair, and blue serene eyes. He was facetious, fluent, and affable to his favourites. His capacity, naturally good, was improved and cultivated in such a manner, that he acquired the surname of Beauclerc by his learning. He was cool, cautious, politic, and penetrating: his courage was unquestioned, and his fortitude invincible. He was vindictive, cruel, and implacable; inexorable to offenders, rigid and severe in the execution of justice, and, though temperate in his diet, a voluptuary in his amours, which produced a numerous family of illegitimate issue. His Norman descent and connections with the continent inspired him with a contempt for the English, whom he oppressed in the most tyrannous manner, not only by increasing the number of the forests, which were too numerous before, but also by his unconscionable exactions; in consequence of which he was enabled to maintain expensive wars upon the continent, and was allowed to be the richest prince in Europe when he died.

HENRY II. was in Normandy when king Stephen died, the empress Maud his mother having delivered up that duchy to him. He arrived in England about six weeks after the late king expired, and was crowned at Westminster, Dec. 19, 1154, being then in the 23d year of his age. He was the first of the race of the Plantagenets, and had been for some time earl of Anjou, &c. by the death of his father Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, &c. He was also possessed of Poitou, Guienne, and Saintonge, by virtue of his marriage with Eleanor, heiress of the house of Poitiers, after Lewis the Young, king of France, had divorced her. In him the Saxon line was restored, he being descended by the mother's side from the

Saxon kings. The first thing he set about was to demolish the great numbers of castles that had been fortified by the bishops and barons in Stephen's reign, to prevent such as might be disposed to sedition from raising new troubles. He also sent away the foreign troops that had been employed by Stephen. He revoked all the grants made by Stephen, resumed all the lands that had been alienated from the crown, and deprived the barons who were created by his predecessor, of their honourable titles, as being conferred by an usurper. He went over to do homage to the king of France, in 1156, for the provinces he held there; but the chief motive of his crossing the sea was to recover Anjou from his brother Geoffrey. In 1157, he marched with a great army into Wales, to revenge their ravages on the frontiers; but they retired to their mountains, as usual, when, having pent them up for some time, and laid waste their country, he granted them a peace, by one of the articles reserving to himself the liberty of cutting large roads through their woods, that he might more easily penetrate into their country. In 1158 prince Richard was born, and a few days after king Henry was crowned a second time in the suburbs of Lincoln. The next year the king had another son born, who was named Geoffrey; and the same year he was crowned again, together with his queen, at Worcester. About this time his brother Geoffrey dying, he went over to France to lay claim to the earldom of Nantes, which he obtained, and concluded a marriage between his eldest son Henry, about five years old, and Margaret, the French king's daughter, who was not above so many months: he also made a treaty with Conan duke of Bretagne, for marrying the duke's daughter Constance to Geoffrey, Henry's third son, then but a few months old; which marriage being celebrated five years after, Geoffrey became duke of Bretagne on his father-in-law's death. Henry revived his queen's title to Toulouse; but the king of France opposed him, upon which, in revenge, Henry ravaged his territories: however, a peace was concluded without making any mention of Toulouse. The war soon after broke out between the two monarchs upon Henry's precipitating the marriage between prince Henry and the daughter of Lewis, when the former was but seven, and the latter but three years old; quickly after she was brought to England to be educated. Henry did this in order to take possession of Gisors for his son, which the princess was to have for her dowry: but this war was soon ended by the mediation of pope Alexander III. to whom both kings paid a most servile submission, each alighting, and taking hold of the rein of his bridle, to conduct him to his lodgings. The affairs above related detained Henry in France four years, and he returned to England in 1163. Peace was settled abroad, but his repose was disturbed by a domestic vexation, which gave him a vast deal of trouble for several years: this this was the famous contest between him and Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury. The pride and ambition of the clergy were got to such an exorbitant height as to be detrimental to the state, and prejudicial to the royal authority: they pretended an exemption from the civil power, and Henry had come to a resolution to redress this grievance, and to reduce them within some tolerable bounds. When a clergyman was accused of a crime, he was tried in the ecclesiastical court, from whence there was no appeal: here the utmost partiality was shewn, and the most heinous crimes were only punished with degradation. The king, being resolved to reform these abuses, thought Becket, who had been his high chancellor, would have been serviceable to him in this good design, and made him archbishop of Canterbury for that very purpose. When the king first mentioned his design to the archbishop, he vehemently opposed it; but resolving to do that in spite of his efforts to the contrary, which he thought to do by his assistance, he convened the chief lords of the kingdom, both spiritual and temporal, and proposed to them a regulation, which tended to make them more subject to the civil power. The temporal lords agreed to these articles without any hesitation, but the bishops and abbots refused to do it without the addition of this saving clause, "saving the rights of the clergy and church," which was doing nothing at all, till the king threatened them, and then they complied; and even Becket, after standing out a great while, consented without the saving clause. Soon after the king got these articles confirmed by an assembly general, or parliament, which he convened at Clarendon; and here also the prelates, through fear, complied, and the archbishop was with great difficulty prevailed on by his brethren to give his consent to these articles. When these articles were sent to pope Alexander III. for his sanction, he presently condemned them, as prejudicial to the church; upon which Becket openly declared, that he repented of having promised to subscribe them, and the pope absolved him, and promised to stand by him. The archbishop became more insolent than ever, and this contest between the king and him continued a considerable time. In 1165 the king's daughter Maud was married to Henry duke of Saxony, from which marriage descended his present majesty king George. In 1166 prince John was born; and a little after the empress Maud, the king's mother, of whom so much is said in Stephen's reign, died in the 67th year of her age, and was buried at Roan, in Normandy. The king, having recovered from a dangerous fit of illness, was desirous of passing the rest of his days in quiet, which the pope threatened more and more to disturb, by thundering out against him the censures of the church, and therefore ordered matters so that he was thoroughly reconciled to Becket, and swore to restore him to his former state, protesting he heartily forgave all that was passed. This reconciliation was sincere enough on the king's side, but not so on Becket's. He no sooner arrived in England, than he suspended the archbishop of York, and excommunicated some other bishops who had taken part with the king against him, and proceeded to the same acts of severity against other great men. The bishops, thus put under the censures, repaired to the king in Normandy, and made heavy complaints against Becket's revengeful spirit. The king was so provoked at his turbulent behaviour, that he spoke aloud to the following purport: "It is my great unhappiness, that, among all my servants, there is not one who dares to revenge the affronts I am receiving from a wretched priest." From this time four of the king's domestics entered into a plot against Becket's life: accordingly, coming to Canterbury, they took an opportunity to follow him into the cathedral, and advanced after him up to the altar; where they fell upon him, and split his skull with their swords, so that his blood and brains flew all over the altar. This happened in 1171. The next year Henry sent over some forces to make a conquest of Ireland; they had great success, and Henry, following with a formidable army, landed at Waterford, upon which the Irish voluntarily submitted, and Henry became master of Ireland. He left Hugh Lacy there to govern in his name, with the title of grand justiciary of Ireland, and set out for England. From England he went over to Normandy, to meet the pope's legates, who were there to examine into Becket's murder; where, after having declared his sorrow for the imprudent words he had dropped, which occasioned that prelate's assassination, he was absolved, upon promising to perform all that was required of him in favour of the pope and church, and to do penance at Becket's tomb, which he did upon his return into England the next year: for, landing at Southampton, he proceeded directly to Canterbury, and, as soon as he came in sight of the town, he alighted, pulled off his boots, and walked barefoot three miles, till he came to the tomb, where he submitted himself to be shamefully scourged by the prior and monks of St. Augustin. In the absence of Henry, a conspiracy was formed against him by his queen Eleanor, and his sons Henry, Richard, and Geoffrey. Queen Eleanor was moved to this by her extreme jealousy, which had put her on dispatching Rosamond Clifford, commonly called Fair Rosamond, daughter of lord Clifford, the king's chief mistress. The sons wanted sovereignty. In short, the king was in danger of losing all his dominions in France, and William king of Scotland invaded the northern part of England: however, Henry got the better of all his enemies, and the king of Scotland was taken prisoner, and obliged to do homage for the kingdom of Scotland in general, and the county of Gallo-way in particular, and a peace was restored, 1171. He now applied himself to the affairs of government, and, about the year 1176, he

he divided England into circuits, appointing itinerant judges to go at certain times of the year, and hold the assizes, or administer justice to the people; which is practised at this day. About the same time London bridge began to be built of stone, by Peter Colenan, a priest. The king, the pope's legate, and the archbishop of Canterbury, contributed toward the work. It was finished in about 33 years, during which time the course of the Thames was turned another way, by a trench cut for that purpose from Batterica to Kotherhithe. Henry, who had been all his life a slave to his lust, fell in love with Alice, the daughter of Lewis of France, who was put into his hands to be educated in England, and who was designed for his son Richard; but he detained the young prince from him: this discontented him. Prince Henry and prince Geoffrey were discontented for want of authority; so that, in 1182, their designs began to break out into action, and young Henry repaired to Guienne to stir up the Gascons to revolt; but he died of a fever, 1183. His brother Geoffrey did not long survive him. The death of the young king put a stop for some time to the troubles that were beginning to distract the royal family. But prince Richard, who was now heir to the crown, began about two years afterwards to raise fresh disturbances in the king's foreign dominions. He got the provinces to revolt, and acknowledge him for their sovereign, and did homage for them to Philip king of France. This occasioned a war between the two monarchs; and Henry, now deserted by his French subjects, was obliged at last, 1189, to make peace with Philip upon dishonourable terms. King Henry died July 6, 1189, in the 57th year of his age, and 35th of his reign. He had five sons by Eleanor his queen, of whom only Richard and John survived him. His daughter Eleanor was married to Alphonso king of Castile, and Joanna to William II. king of Sicily. Henry II. was of the middle stature, and the most exact proportion; his countenance was round, fair, and ruddy; his blue eyes were mild and engaging, except in a transport of passion, when they sparkled like lightning, to the terror of the beholders. He was broad-chested, strong, muscular, and inclined to be corpulent, though he prevented the bad effects of this disposition by hard exercise and continual fatigue: he was temperate in his meals, even to a degree of abstinence, and seldom or never sat down, except at supper: he was eloquent, agreeable, and facetious; remarkably courteous and polite; compassionate to all in distress; so charitable, that he constantly allotted one tenth of his household provisions to the poor; and, in a time of dearth which prevailed in Anjou and Le Maine, he maintained ten thousand indigent persons, from the beginning of spring to the end of autumn. His talents, naturally good, he had cultivated with great assiduity, and delighted in the conversation of learned men, to whom he was a generous benefactor. His memory was so surprisingly tenacious, that he never forgot a face nor a circumstance that was worth remembering. Though superior to all his contemporaries in strength, riches, true courage, and military skill, he never engaged in war without reluctance; and was so averse to bloodshed, that he expressed uncommon grief at the loss of every private soldier. Yet was he not exempted from human frailties: his passions, naturally violent, often hurried him into excess; he was prone to anger, transported with the lust of power, and in particular accused of incontinence. However, on the whole, he was the king, the priest, the father of his country, and one of the most powerful and illustrious monarchs that ever flourished on the English throne.

HE'NRY III. succeeded his father king John; he was then in the 10th year of his age. As soon as John was dead, the earl of Pembroke convened the lords who had constantly adhered to that prince, and, presenting young Henry to them, said, "Behold your king!" and then making a pathetic speech to them, which was applauded by the whole assembly, cried out, "Henry shall be our king!" and he was crowned at Gloucester, Oct. 28. After the coronation, the lords chose the earl of Pembroke guardian to the young king, and regent of the kingdom; and then many of the confederate barons began to think of making their peace with the new king. Prince Lewis being obliged to raise the siege of Dover, and being excommunicated by the pope's legate, contributed very much to their submission. A truce was agreed for four months; in the mean time Lewis went over into France for fresh forces, and in his absence many of the barons made their peace with the king. On May 19, 1217, a great battle was fought, in which the French army was totally routed. After this, Lewis met with such bad success, that he was obliged to sue for peace: and so a treaty was concluded on Sept. 11, whereby it was agreed, that all who had sided with him should be restored to whatever rights and privileges they enjoyed before the troubles, and Lewis renounced all manner of pretensions to England; soon after which he set sail for France, leaving Henry in full possession of the kingdom. Affairs being thus happily settled, the regent, to give a further satisfaction to the minds of the people, sent positive orders to all the sheriffs to see the two charters of king John punctually observed; which not having all the effects he intended, he sent itinerant justices into all the counties, to see to the strict observance of them; but to the great grief of the kingdom, he was taken off by death, 1219. After the death of the earl of Pembroke, the government, during the king's minority, was committed to the bishop of Winchester, who was made regent; and Hubert de Berrg, who had defended Dover, was made judiciary. In 1221, the new building of Westminster abbey was begun, king Henry himself laying the first stone. The same year Joanna, the king's sister, was mar-

sted to Alexander II. king of Scotland, and Hubert de Berrg married to Alexander's eldest sister. Hubert de Berrg got the ascendancy with the king his master over the bishop of Winchester, and so insinuated himself into the royal favour, that he rose to an exorbitant degree of power, which he exercised in a most illegal and arbitrary manner. Though he was in effect prime minister, yet, as the bishop of Winchester, who was appointed regent by the parliament, was, by his office, superior to him, he contrived to get him removed. Lewis VIII. king of France, who succeeded his father Philip, broke the peace with the English, 1224, and confiscated all the territories they held in France. Upon this a parliament was called, and a 15th upon moveables was granted, on condition the charters of king John were strictly observed for the future. The king promised, but took little care to perform. With the money he raised an army, and sent it to Guienne; but we do not find that it made any great progress there. In 1226, the parliament declared the king of age, though he was 21: after which he obliged all those who had charters to renew them, in order to raise money to fill his coffers. Hubert de Berrg wholly governed him, he having got the king to distress the bishop of Winchester, and to send him to his diocese. The king began to lose the affections of his people. What most contributed to it, was his annulling, all of a sudden, the two charters of the king his father, which he had solemnly sworn to observe, pretending he was not bound by what he had promised in his minority: and, having spent the winter in extorting great sums of money from his subjects, the spring following, 1229, went over with his army into France, and returned again to England, having, through his neglect, effected nothing. In 1232, the king demanded a subsidy of the parliament, for the payment of his debts contracted on account of his expeditions against France; but had the mortification to be refused, as so ill a use had been made of the money that had been granted him. A general odium being raised against Hubert de Berrg, the king was prevailed upon to dismiss him. But the bishop of Winchester, who was now prime minister, humouring the passions and inclinations of the king, acquired an exorbitant power, which he made a worse use of than even Hubert de Berrg himself. He represented to the king, that the barons were too powerful, and that they wanted to make themselves independent; and that the only way to repress them, was to send for a number of foreigners, and give them the places the barons held; and accordingly he invited over great numbers of Poitevins, his countrymen. Thisasperated the barons; who, upon the king's summoning them to parliament, instead of meeting according to the summons, sent deputies to him, to acquaint him, that, if he did not remove the bishop of Winchester and the Poitevins, they were resolved to set another prince upon the throne, who should govern according to law. The king endeavoured to reduce them by force of arms; but some of them breaking the confederacy, left the rest to his resentment. The earl of Pembroke retired into Wales, and, being assisted by prince Lewellyn, he routed the royal army, and Henry retired to Gloucester; upon which the bishop of Winchester procured an order to be signed in council, and sent it the governors of Ireland, to plunder the estates of the earl of Pembroke, promising they should have more estates for their pains. This had the desired effect; it drew the earl over thither, where in a battle he was treacherously stabbed in the back. However, by the representations of the archbishop of Canterbury to the king, the bishop was disgraced and sent to his diocese, and his creatures turned out, and ordered to give an account of their actions, and of the money that had passed through their hands; but they took sanctuary in churches. This was in 1234. In 1236 the bishop went to Rome, and died 1238. In 1236, king Henry married Eleanor, second daughter to Raymond earl of Provence. He now gave himself wholly up to the direction of the queen's relations, and other foreigners their adherents, loading them with gifts, pensions, &c. which, together with the grievances occasioned by this measure, was the source of perpetual disputes and misunderstandings between the king and his parliament, for near 30 years, and ended at last in a civil war, called the barons war. In 1239, the queen was delivered of a prince, who was named Edward. The pope had so great an ascendancy, that in 1240 he nominated 300 Italians to the vacant benefices. In 1245, the queen was delivered of another son, who was named Edmund. The court of Rome continuing its exactions, the parliament, 1246, in letters signed by the king, the bishops, and the barons, laid before the pope their grievances; but met with no redress. About this time died Isabella, queen dowager of England, and countess of March; for she married the earl of March after king John's death. In 1248, the king demanded a new subsidy from his parliament, which they refused; and, upon their representing to him their grievances on account of the foreigners, he dissolved them, for fear of their proceeding to more vigorous measures: and to supply his wants, he was forced to sell his plate and jewels, which being quickly purchased by the citizens of London, who always pleaded poverty, when the granting him any aid was in question he, in resentment, set up a fair in Westminster, to last 15 days; during which, the Londoners were commanded to shut up their shops, and all fairs, that used to be kept at that time, were prohibited all over England. Henry, very impolitically, fell out with Simon de Montfort, who had married his sister, and was made earl of Leicester; in a great passion he called the earl traitor; upon which, he, in a great passion, told the king, he lied, and that if he were not a king, he would make him eat his words. However, the king was obliged to conceal that resentment which burned within him. The barons began now to exert themselves, and, in a parliament held at Oxford, 1258, the confederacy was so strong against the king (the barons coming well attended and well armed), that they compelled him in effect to lay down the sovereign authority, and to lodge it in 24 commissioners, 12 to be chosen by the king, and 12 by the barons, Simon de Montfort to be their president; who drew up some articles called The Provisions of Oxford, in favour of the barons, which the king and prince Edward were obliged to swear to the observance of, in consequence of which, the foreigners were obliged to leave the kingdom. Henry got himself absolved from his oath by the pope; and, 1261, declared in parliament he no longer looked upon himself obliged to observe these regulations. In 1263, the war broke out between the two parties, the barons having chosen the earl of Leicester for their general. On May 14, 1264, was fought the famous battle of Lewes, in which the royal army was routed: king Henry, and his brother Richard, king of the Romans, were taken prisoners; as were also prince Edward (who had beaten the Londoners in the first attack), and Henry, son to the king of the Romans. And now the barons drew a new plan of government, which was confirmed by the parliament, which met June 22. Things continued in this situation about a year; but prince Edward, having the good fortune to escape from his confinement, raised a considerable army, and first attacked young Montfort, who was conducting some forces to his father, and then advancing immediately against the earl, in an obstinate and bloody fight, on Aug. 4, 1265, totally routed Leicester's army, and set the king his father at liberty, the earl himself and his son Henry being slain on the spot. King Henry now confiscated the estates of the moderate barons, and severely chastised the city of London. Henry died Nov. 16, 1272, having reigned 56 years and 20 days, aged 66, and was interred in the abbey-church of Westminster, near the shrine of Edward the Confessor, which was removed thither, 1269, just as the church (the most stately then in Europe) was finished. He had nine children, whereof only two sons, Edward and Edmund, and two daughters, Margaret and Beatrix, survived him. Trial by fire and water ordeal was by this king's command laid aside by the judges, and soon after grew quite out of use. Henry was of a middle size and robust make, and his countenance had a peculiar cast from his left eye-lid, which hung down so far as to cover part of his eye. The particulars of his character may be gathered from the detail of his conduct. He was certainly a prince of very mean talents; irresolute, inconstant, and capricious; proud, insolent, and arbitrary; arrogant in prosperity, and abject in adversity; profuse, rapacious, and choleric, though destitute of liberality, economy and courage. Yet his confidence was praise-worthy, as well as his aversion to cruelty; for he contented himself with punishing the rebels in their effects, when he might have glutted his revenge with their blood. He was prodigal to excess; and therefore always in necessity. Notwithstanding the great sums he levied from his subjects, and though his occasions were never so pressing, he could not help squandering away his money upon worthless favourites, without considering the difficulty he always found in obtaining supplies from parliament.

HE'NRY IV. duke of Lancaster and Hereford, surnamed of Bolingbroke, from his being born there, was the eldest son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and ascended the throne upon the forced resignation of king Richard II. and was crowned Oct. 13, 1399. The parliament, meeting the day after the coronation, first passed an act of indemnity in favour of those who had taken arms for the king, whilst only duke of Lancaster. The king also published a general pardon, excepting however the murderers of the duke of Gloucester. The parliament also passed an act settling the succession in the house of Lancaster. This might not have produced any ill consequence, as Mortimer earl of March and his brother died without issue, had not the 2d son of the duke of York married Anne their sister; which at length proved the source of that long and bloody contest between the houses of York and Lancaster. The convocation being sitting at the same time with the parliament, Henry, in order to gain the clergy to his side, sent to assure them, that he would maintain them in all their privileges and immunities, and was ready to join with them in extirpating heresy, and punishing obdurate heretics. And to preserve the esteem of the rest of his subjects, he caused all the bonds which Richard had extorted, as well from the city of London, as from the 17 counties, to be brought into Chancery, and publicly burnt. In the year 1400 a conspiracy broke out against the king, which was suppressed, and the chief conspirators were put to death; and soon after the late king was assassinated. About the time of the late conspiracy, Owen Glendour got the Welch to renounce their subjection to England, and to own him for their sovereign; from which time he styled himself prince of Wales, and maintained his authority there for some years. He made an incursion into Herefordshire, and took Mortimer earl of March prisoner; for which king Henry was not sorry. The king marched against Glendour; but, he always retiring to the mountains of Snowden, it was not possible to come at him. In 1401 the parliament enlarged the statute of premunire, which gave a great blow to the pope's power in England; and yet an act was obtained by the influence of the court, and the intrigues of the clergy, this session, for the burning of heretics, occasioned by the great increase of the Wickliffites, or Lollards. One William Sawtree, a Lollard, par. 118.

parish-priest of St. Ofish, in London, was immediately after that condemned by the ecclesiastical court; and, being delivered over to the secular power, was burnt alive by virtue of the king's writ (called the writ De heretico comburendo), directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London. In 1408, the king married Joan of Navarre, widow of the duke of Bretagne; but he had no issue by her. This year the Scotch invaded England twice, and were both times defeated by the earl of Northumberland, and Henry Hotspur his son. In 1403, a conspiracy broke out, at the head of which was the earl of Northumberland, who was disgusted at the king's refusing to let him have the ransom of the Scotch prisoners of distinction. He engaged Owen Glendour in it; and it was agreed to dethrone Henry, and place the crown on the head of Mortimer. The king marched against them, and a battle was fought near Shrewsbury, where the king gained a complete victory. Another conspiracy broke out, in which was embarked Richard Scroop, archbishop of York, whom Richard II. had raised to that dignity, with several of the nobility; but this was entirely suppressed, 1408. To return to the civil government: in 1406, an act was passed to secure the freedom of elections of members of parliament, which gives room to suppose the king had done something inconsistent with such freedom. However, he gave his assent to this act, for the sake of a subsidy he wanted. When the demand was made, the parliament told him, there was no apparent necessity for it; but in order to obtain it, he kept them so long sitting, that they were obliged to consent to it for their own convenience. He did the same 1410, when he rejected the petition of the commons, for repealing or altering the late barbarous act against the Lollards; and, to shew how averse he was to relax any thing in this point, caused one Thomas Badby to be burnt, who was the second who suffered death on account of Wickliff's opinions. In the mean time, the prince of Wales suffered himself to be so much debauched by evil companions, that he gave himself up to riotous and disorderly practices: one of his companions being arraigned for felony, he resolved to be present at the trial, and while sentence was passing, in a great passion, he struck the judge on the face, who immediately ordered him to be arrested, and committed to the King's Bench. The prince, hereupon relenting, suffered himself to be led quietly to prison. King Henry died March 20, 1413, in the 46th year of his age, and 14th of his reign. His actions had very little worthy or eminent in them; one thing, at least, has fixed an indelible stain on his memory, viz. his being the first burner of heretics. There was, in his reign, a dreadful plague in London, which swept away above 30,000 persons. Henry had by Mary de Bohun, his first wife, daughter of Humphrey, earl of Hereford, four sons, viz. Henry, who succeeded him; Thomas, duke of Clarence; John, duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, duke of Gloucester:

and two daughters; Blanch, married to the elector Palatine; and Philippa, to the king of Denmark. Henry IV. was of the middle stature, well proportioned, and perfect in all the exercises of arms and chivalry; his countenance was severe rather than serene; and his disposition four, fullen, and reserved; he possessed a great share of courage, fortitude, and penetration; was naturally imperious, though he bridled his temper with caution; superstitious, though without the least tincture of virtue and true religion; and meanly parsimonious, though justly censured for want of economy, and ill-judged profusion. He was tame from caution, humble from fear, cruel from policy, and rapacious from indigence. He rose to the throne by perfidy and treason; established his authority in the blood of his subjects; and died a penitent for his sins, because he could no longer enjoy the fruits of his transgression. During this reign, William of Wickham, bishop of Winchester, Sir Robert Knolles, and Richard Whittington, mayor of London, distinguished themselves for their works of charity and public foundation. Geoffrey Chaucer and John Gower rendered themselves famous for their poetry, and are looked upon as the first reformers of the English language.

HENRY V. surnamed Henry of Monmouth, ascended the throne upon the death of his father, Henry IV. and was proclaimed March 20, 1413, and crowned April 9 following; after which, the first thing he did was to send for his old companions, whom he exhorted in a very pathetic manner to forsake their evil courses; and, making them handsome presents, charged them at the same time, on pain of his displeasure, never to come to court. He then chose a council of the greatest and ablest of his subjects, turned out such judges as had abused their authority, continued the deserving, particularly the chief justice Gascoigne, who had committed him for his insult in court, when prince of Wales, and filled up the places of those he had removed with persons of the like honour and integrity. He did also the same with respect to inferior magistrates. The greatest blot in his character was, his persecuting the Wickliffites, or Lollards. But that was more owing to the superstition of the times, than to his own natural temper; he often expressing a dislike of such proceedings. Sir John Oldcastle, baron of Cobham, who was looked upon as the chief protector of the Lollards, was the first of the nobility who suffered on account of religion. Henry, as soon as he mounted the throne, began to think of recovering what the English had lost in France; and there being great dissentions in that kingdom, Henry had laid hold of that opportunity, and sent ambassadors to demand Normandy, &c. and all that had been yielded to Edward III. by the treaty of Bretagne. The negotiations went on without any hopes of an accommodation; and when Henry was just going to embark, a plot was discovered against his person, for which the earl of Cambridge, the lord treasurer Scroop, and Thomas Grey, a privy counsellor, were executed. It is thought they were bribed by French gold to carry on this conspiracy. This affair being over, he embarked with his troops in Aug. 1415, landed the 21st at Havre de Grace, in Normandy, and then besieged and took Harfleur; and, resolving to march to Calais, he crossed the Somme, Oct. 9. where the French army under the constable d'Albert, four times as numerous as the English, were waiting to give him battle, in full confidence of victory. David Gam, a Welch captain, being sent to view their situation, on his return, said, "there were enough to kill, enough to take prisoners, and enough to run away." The king was not a little pleased with his Welchman's report. Henry, after exhorting his men to put their trust in God, the giver of victory, attacked the French. The battle began at ten in the morning, and lasted till five in the afternoon, Oct. 25, 1415, when, by the surprising courage and conduct of the king, and the bravery of his troops, the whole numerous French army, said to consist of more than 100,000 men, was entirely defeated. The constable d'Albert, the duke of Alençon, with several other princes and great men, and 10,000 private men, were slain. Among the prisoners, who were very numerous, were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and many persons of distinction. The English lost only the duke of York, and the earl of Suffolk, a few knights, and 400 private men. The king immediately returned thanks to God for the victory. This was called the battle of Agincourt, from a castle of that name near the field of battle. The civil wars raged more than ever in France: Henry went over in July, 1417, and made great progress; and, in the beginning of the year 1419, Rouen surrendered. And now all Normandy was again fallen under the dominion of the English, except a few castles, 215 years after it had been taken from them in the reign of king John. Henry also surprised and took Pontoise, which opened him a way to the very gates of Paris. At last a treaty was concluded at Troye on May 21, 1420, whereby it was agreed, that Henry should marry the princess Catherine, that he should be regent of the kingdom during king Charles's life (who, being frequently afflicted with fits of lunacy, was incapable of governing), and that, after his death, the crown of France should descend to the king of England and his heirs for ever. Henry hereupon espoused the princess Catherine, and the marriage was solemnized on the 30th of May. In Feb. 1421, Henry arrived in England with his queen, who was crowned a few days after. The parliament, which met in May, granted the king a subsidy for carrying on the war against the dauphin; but at the same time, in a petition they presented, told him, that the conquest of France proved the ruin of England. In June the king returned to France, and forced the dauphin to raise the siege of Chartres, took Dreux, and in October laid siege to Meux, which was not wholly subjected till May following; about which time, queen Catherine arrived from England, and the two courts kept the Whitsun-holidays together at Paris, in a magnificent manner. Afterwards, Henry marched against the dauphin, fell sick by the way, and died at Vincennes, Aug. 31, 1422, in the 31st year of his age, and 10th of his reign. He had by his queen Catherine only one son, Henry, born Dec. 6, 1421, at Windsor. Henry V. was tall and slender, with a long neck, an engaging aspect, and limbs of the most elegant turn. He excelled all the youth of that age in agility, and the exercise of arms; was hardy, patient, laborious, and more capable of enduring cold, hunger, and fatigue, than any individual in his army. His valour was such as no danger could startle, and no difficulty oppose; nor was his policy inferior to his courage. He managed the dissensions among his enemies with such address as spoke him consummate in the arts of the cabinet. He fomented their jealousies, and converted their mutual resentment to his own advantage. Henry possessed a self-taught genius, that blazed out at once without the aid of instruction or experience; and a fund of natural sagacity, that made ample amends for these defects. He was chaste, temperate, modest, and devout, scrupulously just in his administration, and severely exact in the discipline of his army, upon which he knew his glory and success in a great measure depended. In a word, it must be owned, he was without an equal in the art of war, policy, and government.

HENRY VI. was scarce nine months old, when he succeeded his father, Henry V. Dec. 6, 1422. He was immediately proclaimed, not only king of England, but heir of France, pursuant to the treaty of Troye; and, upon the death of Charles V. who died in less than two months after, the duke of Bedford, uncle to the infant king, ordered him to be proclaimed king of France, at Paris, according to the same treaty; and took upon himself the regency of that kingdom, as the late king his brother had desired, when near his end. On the other hand, the dauphin, as soon as he heard of his father's death, caused himself to be proclaimed king of France, and was crowned in November at Poitiers. On Nov. 9, the parliament met (when the queen sat among the lords, with the royal infant in her lap) to settle the government during the king's minority; and John, duke of Bedford, was appointed protector of the kingdom; and Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and Henry, bishop of Winchester, his governors. I shall pass over the transactions of the regency, during the minority of the king, and shall only mention what he was immediately concerned in. The duke of Bedford, thinking it might be of service to have Henry crowned in France, having been first crowned in England, on Nov. 6, 1429, he went over to Paris, and was crowned there at the end of the following year, and returned to England in Jan. 1432, being then 20 years old.

old. In 1437, died Catherine of France, king Henry's mother, and widow of Henry V. After the death of that prince, she married Owen Tudor, a Welch gentleman: from this marriage sprung Henry Earl of Richmond, king of England, under the name of Henry VII. In 1444, a truce was concluded at Towers between England and France, which was prolonged to 1449. Soon after the commencement of the truce, king Henry married Margaret of Anjou, who arrived in England 1445; and she and her favourites managed the king just as they pleased, which caused great uneasiness among the people: which Charles took the advantage of; for, upon the duke of Somerset, then regent, refusing to give the satisfaction he demanded for Tongres being surprised by Surienne, governor of the Lower Normandy, for the English, 1448, whilst the truce subsisted, he fell upon Normandy with 4 armies at once, and reduced it before the end of Aug. 1450. Guienne followed the fate of Normandy, after having been in possession of the English 300 years; and nothing remained to the English in 1453, of all their vast acquisitions in France, but only Calais and Guiennes. England was now in a distracted condition: there were two parties in the court, one the duke of Gloucester's, the other the cardinal of Winchester's; with whom were joined Kemp, archbishop of York, and William de la Pole, earl, and afterwards marquis and duke of Suffolk. The duke of Gloucester was exceedingly beloved by the people; but the cardinal got the better of him in the council, and in the king's confidence, in which the duke of Gloucester lost ground every day. They first removed him from the council-board; and then a parliament being summoned at St. Edmundsbury, which met in 1447, the duke was arrested and closely confined, under colour that he designed to kill the king and seize the crown, though nobody believed a word of the matter. The next morning he was found dead in his bed, people making no doubt but he was murdered. The cardinal died about a month after, and left the world and his immense riches with as much reluctance as ever any one did. And now the queen and Suffolk governed all in the king's name, and none but their creatures were employed in the administration. The universal hatred of the people against them made the duke of York begin to think of asserting his claim to the crown. In 1450, the commons so pursued the duke of Suffolk, that the queen, in order to save him, found herself under a necessity to have him banished; but in his passage to France, being met by an English man of war, the captain, without any ceremony, ordered his head to be cut off. He was succeeded in the queen's confidence by Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerset, almost as odious to the people as Suffolk had been. The duke of York at first proceeded with great caution; and, as an essay how the people stood affected, he instituted one Jack Cade, under the name of John Mortimer, to raise a rebellion in Kent, where he drew together great numbers under pretence of reforming the government; and became so strong, that he cut in pieces a detachment of the king's army, and entered London in triumph, the city opening her gates to him; but, being deserted by his followers, he was taken and slain. At length, the duke of York having concerted measures with his friends, especially Richard Nevil, earl of Salisbury, and the earl of Warwick, the war broke out between the two houses of Lancaster and York, the former having for their device the red rose, and the latter the white rose; and whole torrents of English blood were spilt in this contest. The first battle was fought near St. Albans, May 31, 1455, when the royal army was totally routed, with the loss of 5000 men. The duke of Somerset and several other nobles and great men were slain, and the king himself taken prisoner. York affected to treat him with great respect, and was appointed protector of the realm. He left the king and queen at full liberty; the consequence of which was, he was dismissed from his protectorship, and he and his friends retired from court. After this, there was a reconciliation between the two parties; but, as it was not sincere, the quarrel soon broke out again. In 1459, the earl of Salisbury defeated the king's troops commanded by the lord Audley, and killed 2400, together with Audley himself and his principal officers, at Blore-heath, in Shropshire. On July 9, 1460, the earl of March, eldest son of the duke of York, gained a complete victory at Northampton, killing 10,000 royalists. The king was again taken prisoner, and the queen with the prince of Wales retired into Scotland. And now a parliament was called, which the duke of York expected would offer him the crown. Being disappointed, he sent them a memorial asserting his claim; but all that the parliament did, was to resolve, that Henry should enjoy the crown during his life, after which, it should devolve on the duke of York and his heirs. In the mean time, the duke of York was absolute master of the government, and of the king's person. The queen had drawn together an army of 18,000 men; the duke of York marched against her, with only 5000, expecting to be joined by his son the earl of March; but before he could come up, the duke was attacked by the queen's forces, near Wakefield in Yorkshire, Dec. 31, 1460, his army put to flight, he himself slain, and his head fixed upon the walls of York, where the earl of Salisbury's soon accompanied it, he having been taken and beheaded at Pontefract. The earl of Rutland, the duke's son, about 12 years old, was taken in the fight, and cruelly slain by lord Clifford. Notwithstanding this discouragement, the earl of March marched with his army, and defeated Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, at Mortimer's cross in Herefordshire; and though the queen got the better of the earl of Warwick, at Bern-

ward's-beath, near St. Alban's, and freed the king her husband, yet the earl of March coming up with a great army, and being joined by the remains of the earl of Warwick's, she retired into the North; and the earl entered London, as it were, in triumph, and was, by the management of the earl of Warwick, proclaimed king, by the title of Edward IV. For the conclusion see the life of king Edward IV. Henry VI. without any princely virtue or qualification, was totally free from cruelty and revenge: on the contrary, he could not, without reluctance, consent to the punishment of those malefactors who were sacrificed to the public safety; and frequently sustained personal indignities of the grossest nature, without discovering the least mark of resentment. He was chaste, pious, compassionate, and charitable. In a word, he would have adorned a cloister, though he disgraced a crown; and was rather respectable for those vices he wanted, than for the virtues he possessed. He founded the college of Eton, near Windsor, and King's college, in Cambridge, for the reception of those scholars who had begun their studies at Eton.

HENRY VII. earl of Richmond, was the son of Edmond Tudor, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret, descended from a bastard son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, by Catherine Rowet or Swinford, mistress, afterwards wife, to that prince. Immediately after the victory at Bosworth, the earl caused Te Deum to be sung, and his whole army to fall on their knees, to return God thanks, after which they saluted him with unanimous and repeated shouts of "Long live king Henry!" from which time he took on himself the style and authority of king. An extraordinary kind of distemper raged about this time in England, particularly in London, called the sweating sickness, because it threw persons into a profuse sweat, and carried them off in 24 hours; but those who got over that time usually recovered. It continued from the middle of Sept. to the 8th of October, and swept away great numbers of people. Two mayors and 6 aldermen of London died of it within 8 days. On Oct. 30, 1485, Henry was crowned. At the same time, he appointed a band of 50 men to attend him, called yeomen of the guard. The parliament met on Nov. 7, and passed an act, that the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in the king, and the heirs of his body; and then reversed the attainders of those who had taken part with the king, whilst only earl of Richmond. On January 18, 1486, he married the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV. to the great joy of the people. On Sept. 20, the queen was delivered of a prince, who was named Arthur. Henry behaved with great coldness to his queen, and on all occasions shewed his great aversion to the whole York party, looking upon that house to be his rivals; which partiality bred a great deal of ill blood, and was the source of most of the troubles which afflicted his reign. A rumour being raised, that the duke of York, one of Edward's sons, was yet alive, having by some means or other escaped his uncle's cruel design, the people readily gave into it. And this gave occasion to Richard Simon, a priest at Oxford, to set up one Lambert Simwel, a baker's son, and student under him, and impose him upon the world for the said duke. However, a report being soon spread, that the earl of Warwick had escaped out of the tower, which, though false, caused great joy among the people; Simon now judged it best to instruct his pupil to personate that earl, and Ireland was judged the most proper place to open the first scene in, where he was received with great joy, and proclaimed at Dublin, king of England and lord of Ireland, by the name of Edward VI. King Henry now confined the queen his mother-in-law, widow of Edward IV. to Bermondsey monastery in Southwark, and seized all her estate; and there she remained as long as she lived. Another step the king took, was to shew the true earl of Warwick to the people. The duchess dowager of Burgundy sent over into Ireland, in May, 1487, 2000 German veterans, presently after which the sham king was crowned with great solemnity. Then the new king, and the German and Irish forces, came over into England. King Henry fell upon them, June 16, near Newark upon Trent, and totally routed them. Simwel was taken prisoner, with the priest his master. Henry gave Simwel his life, employed him first about his kitchen, and then made him one of his falconers, in which post he remained till his death. And now Henry filled his coffers by confiscating the estates of divers persons, under pretence of their favouring the late conspiracy. He thought it necessary at last to have the queen crowned, which was performed on Nov. 25, almost two years after the marriage. In June, 1492, prince Henry was born. About this time, the duchess of Burgundy began to play off the second Simwel. This was Peter Perkin, or Perkin Warbeck, son of a converted Jew, of Tournay, who had lived a considerable time in London, who personated the duke of York. He was sent to Portugal, afterwards to Ireland; and the king of France, being told the duke of York was in Ireland, sent for him, lodged him in his palace, and appointed him a guard: but when Charles was upon making peace with England, he sent Perkin away. Several great men in England favoured the plot, which being discovered, some of them suffered death. King Henry sent Sir Edward Poynings to Ireland as his deputy, 1494; who holding a parliament, an act was passed, called Poynings' law, whereby all the statutes of England, relating to the public, were to be of force in Ireland. In 1495 Perkin embarked for England, and landing some of his men on the coast of Kent, to see how the people stood affected, the Kentish men presently took up arms, and cut to pieces those who were landed, except about 150, who, being taken prisoners were all hanged by order of the king. Upon this, Perkin sailed back to Flanders. The king, having a subsidy granted, 1497, to revenge the insult of the king of Scotland, who had twice invaded England the year before with Perkin, it was raised with so much vigour, that it caused an insurrection in Cornwall: the malecontents marched to Blackheath, where the king attacked and totally defeated them, killing 2000 on the spot. L. Audley their general, Flammoock and Joseph, the chiefs of the rebels were taken and executed; the rest were pardoned. A peace was soon after concluded between the two monarchs. King James would not deliver up Perkin Warbeck, but honourably dismissed him and his wife, and by their own desire sent them into Ireland, before the conclusion of the treaty. Charles VIII. king of France, died in April, 1498, and was succeeded by Lewis XII. About this time there was an insurrection in Cornwall, in favour of Perkin Warbeck, who came from Ireland, to head the malecontents there; but his army of about 6000 men, upon the news of the king's advancing, submitted themselves, who pardoned them all, except a few ringleaders. Perkin, after having been exposed in an ignominious manner, was sent to the Tower; where he, together with the earl of Warwick, plotting his escape, was hanged; and the earl, but 24 years old, and who had been prisoner from the beginning of this reign, was beheaded on Tower-hill, Nov. 1499. In 1502, the plague raged in England, particularly in London, where 30,000 died of it. In 1501, Catherine of Spain was married to Arthur prince of Wales. The prince died about 5 months after his marriage, April 2, 1502, in the 17th year of his age: and some time after, the king created Henry his second son prince of Wales, who, upon his father's death succeeded to the crown. In 1503, Elizabeth, Henry's queen, died. At this time, the king grievously oppressed his subjects, by means of two infamous ministers, Empson and Dudley, two lawyers. The avarice of Henry put him on projecting the marriage of Catherine, his son Arthur's widow, with his other son Henry, rather than part with that princess's dowry, which was 200,000 crowns of gold; and a dispensation was obtained from the pope: so Henry married his brother's widow, though the marriage was not consummated till after the king came to the crown. The king's eldest daughter Margaret was about the same time married to James IV. king of Scotland: from her descended our king James I. King Henry, finding he drew near his end, granted a general pardon, and ordered by his will, that his successor should make good what his ministers had unjustly extorted from the people. He died at Richmond, April 22, 1509, in the 52d year of his age, and 24th of his reign. Henry was tall, straight, and well shaped, though slender; of a grave aspect and saturnine complexion; austere in address, and reserved in conversation, except when he had a favourite point to carry; and then he could fawn, flatter, and practise all the arts of insinuation. He inherited a natural fund of sagacity, which was improved by study and experience; nor was he deficient in personal bravery, or political courage. He was cool, close, cunning, dark, distrustful, and designing; and of all the princes who had sat upon the English throne, the most sordid, selfish, and ignoble. The nobility he excluded entirely from the administration of public affairs, and employed clergymen and lawyers, who, as they had no interest in the nation, and depended upon his favour, were more obsequious to his will and ready to concur in all his arbitrary measures. At the same time it must be owned he was a wise legislator, chaste, temperate, assiduous in the exercise of religious duties, decent in his deportment, and exact in the administration of justice, when his own private interest was not concerned; though he frequently used religion and justice as cloaks for perfidy and oppression.

HE'NRY VIII. succeeded his father Henry VII. at the age of 19 years, on April 22, 1509, and in his person united the two houses of Lancaster and York. At the beginning of his reign, he made an example of those two hated ministers, Empson and Dudley; but, as it was difficult to condemn them without straining a point, with so much nicety had they acted their villainy, though they had been condemned and sentenced to die, for conspiring against the king and state, an act of attainder passed at the meeting of the parliament against them, and they were beheaded on Tower-hill. The king's marriage with Catherine of Arragon, relict of his brother Arthur, was solemnized the beginning of June, as was the coronation of both king and queen on the 24th of the same month. About this time, Fox, bishop of Winchester, introduced to court Thomas Wolfey, a clergyman, as a fit person to serve the king. Though Henry had just concluded a new treaty of alliance with Lewis XII. yet he was drawn into a war, under pretence of the recovery of Guienne, by pope Julius II. and Ferdinand the Catholic, king of Arragon, the queen's father; though his mind was chiefly bent on his pleasures, in which he was so extravagant, that he squandered away 1,800,000. which his father had with so much anxiety hoarded up. This war was opposed by some of the council, and one of them expressed himself to this purpose. "Let us leave off our attempts against the terra firma: the natural situation of islands seem not to suit with contests of that kind: England is alone a just empire; or, when we enlarge ourselves, let it be that way we can, and to which, it seems, the eternal Providence has destined us; and that is, by sea." By the treaty concluded 1511, Henry was to send over 6000 men; and Ferdinand, for the same purpose, obliged himself to furnish 500 men at arms, 1500 light horse, and 4000 foot;

foot; tho' they never effected any thing further than giving Ferdinand an opportunity of conquering Navarre, and keeping the French out of Italy. Henry, though he saw how he had been imposed on, yet he suffered himself to be drawn into a second league against France, by the pope, the emperor Maximilian, and king Ferdinand, who all had their separate views, and made use of Henry to bring them about. Having sent the best part of his troops over to Calais before him, he arrived there on June 30, 1513, and returned to England in October, having made a successful campaign. While Henry was abroad, James IV. of Scotland broke through all his alliances with him, and invaded Northumberland with an army of 60,000 men, taking Norham castle, and several other places. The earl of Surry, with 26,000 men, engaged the Scots army at Flodden, September 9, and, after a most bloody and obstinate battle, in which several thousands were killed on both sides, obtained a complete victory. The Scotch king was never seen again after the battle, so that doubtless he fell in it. Among the slain were also one Scotch archbishop, two bishops, four abbots, and 17 barons; whereas the English lost not one person of note. In 1514, Thomas Wolsey, then prime minister, was made archbishop of York, and, some time after, Leo X. sent him a cardinal's hat. In August, 1514, a treaty of peace was concluded between Lewis XII. and king Henry, one article of which was, the marriage of Lewis with the princess Mary, which accordingly was solemnized at Abbeville in October. Lewis dying in less than three months after the marriage, about two months after the queen-dowager took for her second husband Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. On February 11, 1516, queen Catherine was delivered of a princess, named Mary, who was afterwards queen of England. In 1517, the sweating sickness raged again in England, more violently than at the beginning of the last reign. At this time Luther began to write against indulgences. In 1521, Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, was beheaded: he was the last high constable of England. The same year Henry wrote a book against Luther, Of the seven Sacraments, &c. It was presented to pope Leo X. in full consistory, who, for this service done the church, bestowed on Henry and his successors the title of Defender of the Faith. This title being afterwards confirmed by parliament, the kings of England have borne it ever since. The same year was remarkable for the invention of muskets. Henry having entered into an alliance with France, Wolsey (without troubling himself with the parliament) issued out orders in the king's name, for levying a sixth part upon the goods and estates of the laity, and a fourth upon those of the clergy. This threw the whole nation into a ferment, and had like to have raised a rebellion; upon which the king disavowed the orders, and left the whole blame to fall on the cardinal. In 1530, cardinal

Wolsey was arrested by the earl of Northumberland, for high treason, and died as they were conducting him to London. Toward the end of the year 1532, the king privately married Anne Boleyn; and the next year, 1533, an act was passed, forbidding all appeals to Rome, on pain of incurring a premonition. The king's marriage with Anne Boleyn was made public: and Dr. Cramer, having been made archbishop of Canterbury, upon the death of archbishop Warham, the judgment of the convocation of both provinces having been first obtained, pronounced the sentence of divorce between king Henry and Catherine of Arragon, on May 23d, and confirmed his second marriage; which done, the new queen was crowned on June 1. Catherine died in 1536. The pope published a sentence, declaring Henry's marriage with Catherine good and lawful, requiring him to take her again, and denouncing censures, in case of a refusal; in return to which, when the parliament met, the beginning of the year 1534, an act was passed for abolishing the pope's power in England, with Peter-pence, procurations, delegations, expedition of bulls, and dispensations coming from the court of Rome. The same act declared the king's marriage with Catherine null and void, and his marriage with Anne Boleyn valid, settling the succession of the crown upon their issue. In the next session, the parliament confirmed the king's title of supreme Head of the Church, and passed several other acts against the pope. And shortly after, a proclamation was issued out against giving the bishop of Rome the name of pope, and for erasing it out of all books, that, if possible, no remembrance of it might remain. Pope Clement VII. died during this rupture, and was succeeded by Paul III. In 1535, the king ordered a general visitation of the religious houses, and Cromwell was appointed visitor-general; and shocking scenes of debauchery, lewdness, and impiety, were discovered, as well as the frauds made use of in respect to relics and images, to impose on the deluded people, which ended in their suppression. Great quantities of these images, together with the pretended relics of saints, were publicly burnt by the king's order; and, among the rest, the bones of Thomas Becket, whose costly shrine was seized for the king's use. The number of monasteries suppressed from first to last were 643, together with 90 colleges, 2374 chantries, 3 chapels, and 110 hospitals. Their yearly value, as given in before the suppression, when the rents were low, because the fines upon the leases were high, was 152,517l. but their real value was supposed to be above a million. Besides this, the plate, furniture, and other effects, were of a prodigious value, which all fell into the king's hands. King Henry allowed small pensions to several of the abbots, monks, and nuns, sold the abbey-lands to his subjects at easy rates, and applied part of the revenue of these houses towards founding the new bishoprics of Chester, Gloucester, Gloucester, Peterborough, Oxford, Bristol, and Westminster, which last ceased to be a bishopric for its first bishop. The order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem was soon after entirely suppressed. The king had been married to Anne Boleyn but about three years, when he began to be jealous of her, which ended in her ruin. At the same time he was in love with Jane Seymour, which doubtless made him more willing to entertain disadvantageous suggestions of the queen; and the popish party might possibly take advantage of the disposition the king was in, to complete her destruction. However, she was accused of a criminal familiarity with her own brother the earl of Rochford, and four of her domestics, who were all executed, and, after all, the queen was beheaded on the Green within the Tower, on May 19, 1536. The very next day, the king married Jane Seymour, who bore him prince Edward, his successor; but his birth cost the queen his mother her life. Queen Anne's marriage was nullified, on pretence of a pre-contract with the lord Percy; and her daughter Elizabeth, as well as Mary, the daughter of Catherine, were illegitimated by act of parliament. In 1539, by the counsels of Gardiner and others of the popish party, an act passed in parliament, which made it burning or hanging for any one to deny transubstantiation, to maintain the necessity of communion of both kinds, that was lawful for priests to marry, that vows of chastity may be broken, that private masses unprofitable, or that auricular confession is not necessary to salvation. This act was derisively called the bloody act. In January 40, the king married Anne, sister to the duke of Cleves. He disliked her at first sight, caring they had brought him over a Flanish mare; but for political reasons he married her. But his aversion to her continuing, he at last himself divorced from her in about six months after. Cromwell had the chief hand in this match, and the king never forgave him for it, though he afterwards created him earl of Essex. He did not enjoy this new title long; for the popish party, taking advantage of the king's displeasure towards him, found means to work his ruin. He was accused of high treason by the duke of Norfolk, attainted in parliament before the divorce, and lost his head on a scaffold, July 28. On August 8, the king's marriage with Catherine Howard was declared void. She was accused of lewdness and adultery, upon much better evidence than Anne Boleyn, and was condemned by act of parliament, and beheaded on Tower-hill, February 12, 1542. The lady Rochford, one of her accomplices, who had accused her husband, the lord Rochford, of a criminal commerce with his sister Anne Boleyn, was beheaded with her. Derham, Mannock, and Bpenny, who confessed they had lain with the queen, were also executed. The same year, 1542, Ireland was erected into a kingdom; from which time our kings were styled kings of Ireland, whereas before they had only the title of lords of Ireland. In July 1543, the king took to his sixth wife the lady Catherine Parr, relict of Nevil Lord Latimer. She was a great friend to the reformed. King Henry, having entered into a league with the emperor against France, passed over to Calais, and took Bologne, Sept. 14, 1544. This war was continued, without much success on either side, till 1546, when a treaty of peace was concluded June 7. King Henry died Jan. 29, 1547, in the 56th year of his age, and 38th of his reign, and was buried at Windsor. He built St. James's palace in the 28th year of his reign; and some time before instituted the college of physicians. Henry VIII. before he became corpulent, was a prince of a goodly personage, and commanding aspect, rather imperious than dignified. He excelled in all the exercises of youth, and possessed a good understanding, which was not much improved by the nature of his education. Instead of learning that philosophy which opens the mind, and extends the qualities of the heart, he was confined to the study of gloomy and scholastic disquisitions, which served to cramp the ideas, and pervert the faculties of reason, qualifying him for the disputant of a cloister, rather than the lawgiver of a people. In the first years of his reign, his pride and vanity seemed to domineer over all his other passions; though from the beginning he was impetuous, headstrong, impatient of contradiction and advice. He was rash, arrogant, prodigal, vain-glorious, pedantic, and superstitious. He delighted in pomp and pageantry, the baubles of a weak mind. His passions, soothed by adulation, rejected all restraint; and as he was an utter stranger to the finer feelings of the soul, he gratified them at the expence of justice and humanity, without remorse or compunction. He wrested the supremacy from the bishop of Rome, partly on conscientious motives, and partly for reasons of state and convenience. He suppressed the monasteries, in order to supply his extravagance with their spoils; but he would not have made those acquisitions so easily, had they not been productive of advantage to his nobility, and agreeable to the nation in general. He was frequently at war; but the greatest conquest he obtained was over his own parliament and people. Religious disputes had divided them into two factions. He was rapacious, arbitrary, froward, fretful, and so cruel, that he seemed to delight in the blood of his subjects. He never betrayed the least symptoms of any tenderness in his disposition; and seemed to live in defiance of censure, whether ecclesiastical or secular; he died in apprehension of futurity, and was buried at Windsor with idle processions, and childish pageantry, which in those days passed for real taste and magnificence.

HEPATIC, or HEPATICAL, s. [hepaticus, Lat.] belonging to or situated in the liver.

HEPS, or HIPS, s. hawthorn berries.

HEPTAGON, s. [ἑπτά and γωνία, Gr.] a figure with seven sides or angles.

Gr.] a government in which seven persons rule independent of each other.

HERA'CLIDÆ, or the Return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus, f. in Chronology, is a famous epocha, that constitutes the beginning of prophane history; all the time preceding that period being accounted fabulous. This return happened in the year of the world 2862, 100 years after they were expelled, and 80 after the destruction of Troy.

HE'RALD, f. an officer who registers genealogies, adjusts and paints coat armour, and regulates funerals. An officer at arms, whose business it is to declare war, to proclaim peace, to marshal all the solemnity at a coronation, christening, marriage, and funeral of princes, to emblazon and examine coats of arms, &c. Heralds were formerly held in much greater esteem than at present, and were created and christened by the king, who, pouring a gold cup of wine upon their head, gave them the herald-name; but this is now done by the earl-marshal. They could not arrive at the dignity of Herald, without having been seven years purpivant; nor could they quit the office of Herald, but to be made king at arms. The three chief Heralds are called Kings at Arms; the principal of which is Garter; the next is called Clarenceux; and the third Norroy; these two last are called Provincial Heralds. Besides these, there are six other inferior Heralds, viz. York, Lancaster, Somerset, Chester, Richmond, and Windsor; to which, on the coming of King George I. to the crown, a new Herald was added, styled Hanover Herald; and another styled Gloucester King at Arms. The kings at arms, the Heralds, and the four purpivants, are a college or corporation, erected by a charter granted by Richard III. by which they obtained several privileges, as to be free from subsidies, tolls, and all other troublesome offices. Figuratively, a forerunner, omen, or token of something future.

To HE'RALD, v. a. to introduce. Not in use.

HE'RALDRY, f. is the art of armoury and blazoning, which comprehends the knowledge of what relates to solemn cavalcades and ceremonies of coronations, instalments, the creation of peers, nuptials, funerals, &c. Also, whatever relates to the bearing of arms, assigning those that belong to all persons, regulating their right and precedencies in point of honour, and restraining those who have not a just claim from bearing coats of arms that do not belong to them. See BLAZONING, ARMS, SHIELD, BEARING, &c.

HERB, f. [herba, Lat.] in Botany, a plant whose stalks are soft, and have nothing woody in them; as grass or hemlock. In Cookery, a plant whose leaves are chiefly used; as sage, or mint. SYNON. A plant is any vegetable production arising from seed, but seems confined to such as are not very large. Herbs are those plants whose stalks are soft, and have no woody substance.

HERBA'CEOUS, a. belonging to, or having the properties of herbs. Feeding on vegetables.

HE'RBAGE, f. [barbage, Fr.] a collective or general term applied to several sorts of herbs; grass, or pasture. In Law, the tythe and right of pasture.

HE'RBY, a. partaking of the nature of herbs.

HE'RCULEAN, a. a term applied to that which requires much strength, labour, and difficulty to perform.

HE'RCULES, f. the son of Jupiter by Alcmena, born at Thebes, in Bœotia. By the envy of Juno he narrowly escaped death: two serpents being sent to kill him in his cradle, he overcame and killed them, by pulling them to pieces. After having performed many extraordinary things by the command of Eurystheus, he accomplished the twelve following works or exploits, commonly and emphatically called his labours; 1. He overcame the lion of Nemeæ, whose skin he wore continually afterwards, for which reason painters, sculptors, &c. commonly represent him so dressed. 2. He destroyed the hydra, or monster with seven heads. 3. He conquered the Erymanthean boar. 4. He caught a hind with golden horns and brazen hoofs in the forest of Parthenia, after a year's hunting. 5. He destroyed the harpies. 6. He subdued the Amazons, took their queen's girdle, and obliged her to marry his friend Theseus. 7. He cleansed Augea's stable. 8. He overcame the Cretan bull, Pasiphaë's gallant, who vomited fire. 9. He killed Diomed, and his horses, which he fed with men's flesh. 10. He subdued the Spanish Geryon, and carried away his flock. 11. He took away the golden apples from the garden of Hesperides, and killed the dragon that watched them. 12. He brought Cerberus with the three heads from hell. Besides these, he conquered the Centaurs, crushed Antheus to death betwixt his arms, carried the axle-tree of the heavens to relieve Atlas, &c. After his death, he was taken into the number of the gods, and married Hebe, the goddess of Youth. The ancients moralize this fable thus; by Hercules, they say, the strength of reason and philosophy is meant, which subdues and conquers our irregular passions; that his marriage intimates, that great and noble actions are always fresh blooming in the memory of all, being transmitted in the histories of their times to the latest posterity.

HE'RCULES-PILLARS, anciently so called, are thought to be the two mountains which form the straits of Gibraltar; namely, Calpe on the side of Europe, and Avila on the side of Africa.

H'O'LLA, int. rj. [halla, Fr.] a word used in calling to a person at a distance or out of sight. Used substantively by Milton.

To H'O'LLA, v. a. [Johnson says this word is now vitiously written hollo by the best authors; and sometimes balloo] to cry out with a loud voice. "In his ear, I'll ballo Mortimer." Shak. "What holloing and what stir is this?" Shak.

H'O'LLAND, the most considerable of the Seven United Provinces, lying between the Zuider-Zee, the North Sea, Zealand, and Utrecht. It is divided into N. Holland, W. Friesland, and S. Holland; and these together make but one province, whose states take the title of Holland and W. Friesland. The Ye, a small bay, which is an extension of the Zuider-Zee, separates Holland from W. Friesland. The extent is not large, being not above 180 miles in circumference. The land is almost every where lower than the sea. The water is kept out by dams and dykes, which they are particularly careful of keeping in good repair, lest the whole province should be laid under water. It is crossed by the mouth of the Rhine and Maese, by several small rivers, and by a great number of canals, on which they travel day and night at a small expence. Properly speaking, it is nothing but a large meadow, and yet all things are in great plenty, by reason of its trade; and the land serves to feed great numbers of cattle. It is so populous, that no country in the world can match it of so small an extent; the pastures are so rich, that they have plenty of butter and cheese; and the seas and rivers furnish them with fish. There are 400 large towns, and 18 cities, which make up the states of the province, and several others that have not the same privilege. The houses are well built, and extremely neat and clean, as well in the country as in the towns. Learning flourishes here, and they have both linen and woollen manufactures, besides their building a great number of ships. The Dutch surpass all nations in the world with regard to trade, and by their settlements in foreign countries, especially in the East Indies, and on the coast of Guiney. This province has a court of justice, which finally determines in all criminal and civil affairs; and its states, in which the sovereignty resides, are composed of the deputies of the nobility and of the cities, besides the stadtholder. The only established religion is the Protestant, for the rest are only tolerated. But we must not confound Holland, properly so called, with the republic, which comprehends the Seven United Provinces. Amsterdam is the capital city.

H'O'LLAND, the S. E. division of Lincolnshire, probably so called because it is a marshy country. It has the title of an earldom.

H'O'LLOW, [billō] a. [from bole] having the inside or any part scooped out; having a void space within, opposed to solid. Noisy, or like a sound made in some cavity. Figuratively, hypocritical.

H'O'LOCAUST, f. [ἕλος and καύω, Gr.] a burnt sacrifice. In the Jewish Church, it was a sacrifice which was all burnt upon the altar; and of this kind was the daily sacrifice. This was done by way of acknowledgment, that the person offering, and all that belonged to him, were the effect of the divine bounty. The holocaust was to be a bullock without blemish: it was brought to the tabernacle of the congregation, with the hands of him that offered it upon its head; then the Levites killed it, sprinkled the blood of it upon the altar, and, slaying it, cut it in pieces, after which it was laid upon the altar, and burnt by the priest, for a sweet smelling savour unto the Lord.

H'O'LOGRAPH, [billograf] f. [ἕλος and γράφω, Gr.] in the Scottish law, applied to a deed written entirely by the granter's hand.

H'O'LSTEIN, a country of Germany, with the title of a duchy, in the circle of Lower Saxony. It is bounded on the N. by Stefwick; on the E. by the Baltic Sea, and the duchy of Saxlawenburg; on the S. by the duchies of Bremen and Lunenburg; and on the W. by the German Ocean; being about 100 miles in length, and 50 in breadth. It is a pleasant, fruitful country, and is well seated for trade, which however was more considerable formerly than it is at present. But there are still some very considerable harbours, particularly Hamburg and Lubeck. The king of Denmark, and the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, have a joint dominion in a great part of it, and of some towns and territories each of them are sole sovereigns. There are some imperial cities, which are governed by their respective magistrates, but the religion of the whole country is Lutheran. The king of Denmark, as duke of Holstein, is a prince Prince of the empire, as well as the duke of Holstein-Gottorp. It is divided into four cantons, Holstein Proper, Wagria, Stormar, and Ditmarsh.

HOLIDAY, or HOLIDAY, f. [halgan and dag, Sax.] a day set apart by the church for commemoration of some saint, or some remarkable particular in the life of Christ; a day wherein people abstain from work, and entertain themselves with feasts, &c. a day of gaiety and joy.

HOLYHEAD, a town and cape of the isle of Anglesea, in Wales, and in the Irish Channel, where people usually embark for Dublin, there being three packet-boats that sail for that city every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, wind and weather permitting. It is 278 miles from London.

HOLY-ISLAND, a small island lying on the coast of England, 6 miles S. of Berwick, in Northumberland. It is not above two miles and a quarter in length, nor much above a mile in breadth. The soil is rocky and full of stones, for which reason it is thinly peopled; it has but one town, with a church and a castle, under which there is a commodious harbour, defended by a blockhouse.

HOLYWELL, a town of N. Wales, in the county of Flint. It has a market on Friday. It is a place of great note for the well of St. Winifred, who is reputed a virgin martyr; and it is much frequented by people that come to bathe in it, as well as popish pilgrims, out of devotion. The spring gushes forth with such impetuosity, that at a small distance it turns several mills. Over the spring is a chapel built upon pillars, and on the windows are painted the history of St. Winifred's life. There is a mof about the well, which some foolishly imagine to be St. Winifred's hair. It is 212½ miles N. E. of London.

The body of a ship. Though bulk and hull be now used promiscuously, bulk seems, according to Johnson, to have been formerly applied, not only to the body or hull, but likewise to a whole ship or burthen.

To HULL, v. n. to float; to drive to and fro upon the water without sails or rudder. "He looked and saw the ark bulk on the flood." Par. Lost.

HULL, or KINGSTON UPON HULL, a town in the E. Riding of Yorkshire, with two markets, on Tuesdays and Saturdays. It is seated on the N. side of the river Humber, and is a handsome, large town, with two parish-churches. One of the streets resembles Thames-street in London, where pitch, tar, cordage, and sails, are to be sold, and where the ships come to lade and unlade their merchandize, it having a custom-house and a quay. It is very well fortified; is one of the principal places in England for trade, a county of itself, sends two members to parliament, and has the title of duchy. It is 173 miles N. of London.

HULLY, a. husky, or abounding in husks.

To HUM, v. a. [hummelen, Belg.] to make a noise, applied to bees. To make an inarticulate noise, by forcing the breath through the lips when shut. To pause in speaking, and fill up the interval by making a sound with the breath forced through the lips when shut; to sing so low as scarcely to be heard. "To hum a tune." Pope. To applaud. To hum a person, is to render him ridiculous, by exercising some frolic upon him.

HUM, f. the hoarse buzzing noise made by bees. Figuratively, the confused noise made by a crowd of people engaged in discourse; any low, rough noise; a pause filled up by a forcible emission of breath through the lips when shut.

HUM, interj. a low, inarticulate sound, like that of a swarm of bees, made use of to imply doubt and deliberation.

HU'NGARY, a kingdom of Europe, lying along the river Danube, about 600 miles in length, and about 250 in breadth. It is bounded on the N. by Poland, on the W. by Germany, and on the E. and S. by Turkey in Europe. It comprehends three large provinces, namely, Proper Hungary, which is bounded on the N. by Poland, on the W. by the circle of Austria, on the S. by the river Drave, which separates it from Sclavonia, and by the Danube, which parts it from Turkey in Europe; and on the E. by Walachia and Transilvania. The other parts are Transilvania and Sclavonia. The principal rivers are, the Danube, the Save, the Drave, the Tresse, the Maros, the Raab, the Waag, the Gran, and the Zarwiese. They are so full of silt, that they give them to the hogs; but the waters are all unwholesome, except that of the Danube. The air is very unhealthy, occasioned by the lakes and bogs, inasmuch that there is a sort of plague visits them every three or four years, on which account it is called the grave of the Germans. It abounds in all the necessaries of life, and the wine, especially that called Tokay, is excellent. There are mines of gold, silver, copper, and iron, and they have such plenty of game, that hunting is allowed to all. The inhabitants are well-shaped, brave, haughty, and revengeful. Their horsemen are called Hussars, and their foot Heydukes. Almost all the towns of Hungary have two names, the one German and the other Hungarian, and the language is a dialect of the Sclavonian. The government is hereditary in the house of Austria, and the established religion is Popery, though there are a great number of Protestants, who have of late been severely persecuted; but it is now said they have a toleration. No country of the world is better supplied with mineral waters and baths; and those of Buda, when the Turks had it in possession, were reckoned the finest in Europe. Buda is the capital town of Lower Hungary, and Presburg of the Upper.

I is the ninth letter, and third vowel, of the alphabet. Its sound varies: in some words it is long, as in fine, shine, thine, which are usually marked with e final, but not always, as in big, mind, sign, &c. in some short, as in thin, win, fun, bid, bid, &c. In others, it is pronounced like y, as in collier, onion, &c. When prefixed to e, it makes a diphthong of the same sound with the soft i, or ee; thus field, yield, are spoken as feeld, yeeld: it has the same sound in machine, magazine, &c. Subjoined to a or e, it makes them long, as fail, neigh, &c. No English word ends in i, e being either added to it, or else the i turned into a y. I consonant has invariably the same sound with that of g in giant, genius, &c. as jade, jump, perk, &c. I, as a numeral, stands for only one, and so many units as it is repeated times, as I, II, III, is one, two, three; and when put before a higher numeral, subtracts itself, as IV, four, IX, nine &c. but when set after it, so many are added; thus VI, is 5 and 1, or six; VII, 5 and 2, or seven; VIII, 5 and 3, or eight. The ancient Romans likewise used II for 500, DC for 1000, M for 5000, CCXXX for 10,000, MDCCC for 50,000, and CCCLXXX for 100,000. Farther than this they did not go in their notation, but, when necessary, repeated the last number, as CCCXXX, CCCLXXX, for 200,000 and so on.

I, pronoun personal [Sax.] used by a person when speaking of, or describing an action to himself. Sometimes it is used instead of ay, you, or yes; from ia, Sax. "I, Sir, the "took them, and read them in my presence." Shak.

JALAP, f. [jalapium, low Lat.] a firm and solid root of a wrinkled surface, a faintish smell, and acrid taste. It is an excellent purge, in all cases where serous humours are to be evacuated, was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and received its name Jalap, or Jalop, from Xalapa, a town in New Spain, near which it was discovered.

JAM, f. [the etymology unknown] a tart, or conserve of fruits boiled with sugar and water.

JAMAICA, an island of America, discovered by Christopher Columbus, in 1494, being 350 miles N. of the continent of America, 37 S. of the island of Cuba, and 50 W. of Hispaniola, and is about 160 miles in length, and 50 in breadth. It is of an oval figure, and grows narrower from the middle, till it terminates in two points at the extremities of the island. It contains upwards of 4,000,000 of acres, and is divided by a ridge of hills which runs nearly from E. to W. from sea to sea. Here abundance of fine rivers take their rise, and flow from both sides in gentle streams, refreshing the valleys as they glide along, and furnishing the inhabitants with sweet and cool water. They are well stored with fish of various kinds, not known in Europe, but they are exceeding good. However, they have eels and craw-fish in great plenty, not unlike ours. None of these rivers are navigable, but some of them are so large that the sugars are carried upon them, in canoes from the remote plantations to the sea-side. They are so numerous, that it is impossible to describe them all, and some of them run under ground for a considerable space, particularly the Rio-Cobre, and the Rio-Pedra. The mountains, and indeed the greatest part of the island, are covered with woods, which never lose their verdure, but look green at all times of the year, for here is an eternal spring. But to balance this, there are dreadful alligators in the rivers, guanoes, and galli-wafps, in the fens and marshes, and snakes and noxious animals in the mountains. The longest day is about 13 hours, and about nine in the morning it is so intolerably hot, that it would be difficult to live, if the sea-breezes did not arise to cool the air. Sometimes the nights are pretty cool; and there are great dews, which are looked upon as unwholesome, especially to new-comers. There are two springs, or seasons, for planting grain; and the year is distinguished into two seasons, which are the wet and dry; but the rains are not so frequent as they were formerly, which is supposed to be owing to the cutting down the woods. The months of July, August, and September, are called the hurricane months, because then they are most frequent, and there is lightning almost every night. There is not above a third part of the island inhabited, for the plantations are all by the sea-side. The gentlemen's houses are generally built low, being only one story, on account of the hurricanes and earthquakes; and the negroes huts are made of reeds, which will hold only two or three persons. The common drink is Madeira wine, or rum punch. The common bread, or that which serves for it, is plantains, yams, and cassava-roots. The common dress here of the men is, linen drawers and waistcoats, thread stockings, and handkerchiefs tied round the head; but, upon public occasions, the gentlemen wear wigs, silk coats and waistcoats trimmed with silver. The negroes go naked, except a pair of breeches or a petticoat; but many of the women will not agree to wear these last, for they have no sense of shame. The Jadies are richly dressed, and the servant-maids wear linen gowns. The current coin is all Spanish money, for that of the English is kept as a curiosity. The general produce of this island is, sugar, rum, ginger, cotton, indigo, pimento, chocolate, several kinds of woods, and medicinal drugs. They have some tobacco, which is but indifferent, and used only by the negroes, who can scarce live without it. This island was taken by the English in 1656, under the command of Pea and Venables. St. Jago was the capital town, but now Kingston claims that privilege.

JAMB, f. [jambe, Fr.] any supporter, particularly applied to those on each side a door, &c.

IA'MBIC, f. [iambicus, Lat.] verses composed of iambic feet, or a short and long syllable; and being generally used in satyrical compositions, is applied figuratively to signify satire.

JAMES VI. of Scotland, succeeded to the English throne by the name of James I. upon the death of queen Elizabeth, March 24.

1603, being then in the 37th year of his age, and having been king of Scotland ever since he was a year old, on the deposition of queen Mary his mother, who was the daughter of James V. son to James IV. by Margaret eldest daughter of our king Henry VII. He set out from Edinburgh April 5th, and was received with such extravagant expressions of joy as soon as he set foot in England, that an honest Scotchman said bluntly, "This people will spoil a good king;" and the king issued out a proclamation, to restrain the people from flocking to him in such numbers. On the 7th of May he arrived at London, having in his journey made about 300 knights; and soon after his arrival he made many more, and indeed was very liberal in conferring titles of all kinds. On the 19th of March the parliament met, when he recommended to them very strongly the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; but the king's partiality to his Scotch courtiers so raised the jealousy of the English, that it came to nothing. The commons, on June 6, presented an address to the king, complaining of certain grievances, representing their privileges, which they supposed him not thoroughly acquainted with, because he had interfered in the debates about controverted elections, which they claimed the sole privilege of determining. But this address he took so ill, that soon after he prorogued the parliament to February. In the mean time he concluded a peace with Spain. The parliament, which was to have met in February, 1605, was further prorogued to November 5, when a plot was discovered of a design to blow up the parliament-house; 36 barrels of gunpowder being put in a cellar, under the lords-house, which had been hired for that purpose, and covered over with coals, billets, and faggots. Guy Faux, who was to have set fire to the train, was discovered in a cloak and boots, with a dark-lantern, tinder-box, and matches, in his pocket. Himself with his accomplices were executed in January following; as were not long after Oldcorn and Garnet, two Jesuits, for concealing and abetting the plot. In 1607, a new translation of the Bible, viz. that now in use, was begun; and published in 1611. Matters did not go very smooth between the king and parliament in 1610. The commons began to complain of several grievances, such as the king's profuseness in enriching his courtiers, especially the Scots, his regard to the Roman Catholics, the rigorous proceedings of the high commission-court. The king sent for both houses, and endeavoured to vindicate himself in a speech; in which, however, he used such extravagant expressions concerning the kingly power, as were more agreeable to an absolute monarchy than the English constitution. During this session, Henry, the king's eldest son, was created prince of Wales, as prince Charles had a good while before been duke of York. Upon Henry IV. king of France being stabbed by Ravalliac at the instigation of the Jesuits, king James, by a fresh proclamation, banished all

Jesuits and priests out of the kingdom, and forbade all recusants, that is, such as refused to take the new oath of allegiance, to come within 10 miles of the court. Robert Cecil, a man of great abilities, had been prime minister from the beginning of this reign; the other all that while the king had, properly speaking, no particular favourite: but in 1611 he took into his good graces a young Scotch gentleman, of about 20 years of age, whose name was Robert Carr. He was a person of but small parts and no learning, but airy and gay, and of a comely and graceful presence; qualities very taking with king James. The king made him a gentleman of his bed-chamber, and some time after treasurer of Scotland, baron of Branspeth, and viscount Rochester; making him also a privy counsellor and knight of the garter; and nothing was done at court without the advice of the viscount Rochester. The latter end of the year 1612, Frederic V. elector palatine, came into England to marry the princess Elizabeth, the king's only daughter. On November 6 this year died, in the 19th year of his age, Henry prince of Wales, of whom historians give an extraordinary character. Feb. 5, 1613, the marriage between the elector and princess was solemnized, on which occasion there was a continued course of entertainments, balls, masquerades, and other diversions, at court, till April, when the illustrious pair set out for Germany. There having been no parliament these 4 years, the king and his ministers were continually inventing new ways to raise money, as by monopolies, benevolences, loans, and other illegal methods, which occasioned great murmurs and complaints. Among other expedients, he sold titles; made a number of knights of Nova-Scotia, each of which paid him such a sum; and instituted a new order of knights baronets, a sort of middle nobility between barons and knights-bachelors, which was to be hereditary; for which honour each person paid 1095l. But the king still wanting money, a parliament was called, which met on April 16, 1614. The commons, instead of granting money first, as was expected, fell presently upon grievances; such as the ill uses made of the revenue, the increase of papists by the encouragement of the court, monopolies, and levying money without consent of parliament; upon which grievances they resolved to present an address: but the king, not liking such proceedings, dissolved the parliament June 7, without one statute being enacted. In 1615, the king was taken with a new object, George Villiers, which cooled his affection for his old favourite, and his ruin was completed by the discovery of the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. By the disgrace of Somerset, Villiers became sole favourite. The king soon created him lord Wheddon, viscount Villiers, and earl of Buckingham. His mother, though a papist, was created Countess of Buckingham; and she governing her son as he governed the king, the papists met with great encouragement, and began to swarm in the kingdom.

kingdom. He was soon after made marquis of Buckingham, and lord high admiral, tho' he had never been at sea, but between Dover and Calais. The king having the most extravagant notions of his prerogative, and being wholly influenced by this vain, inexperienced, and presumptuous young man, it is no wonder that the rest of this reign, like the former, was one continued scene of mismanagement. By this means two parties were formed in the nation, one for the court, and the other for the people. Prince Charles, now the king's only son, was created prince of Wales in 1616. The king was desirous of marrying him, and a negotiation, which lasted several years, was carried on with the court of Spain, for a marriage between him and the infant, daughter of Philip III. king of Spain, during which time Gondemar, the Spanish ambassador in England, had vast influence at court. The king, being in want of money, delivered up to the states of the United Provinces, the cautionary towns Brill, Rammekins, and Flushing, which were put into queen Elizabeth's hands, as a security for the repayment of the expence she had been at, for 2,728,000 florins, in lieu of a debt of 8,000,000, which they were obliged to pay the late queen or her successors, besides 18 years interest for the same. In 1619, queen Anne, the king's consort, died of a dropsy, in the 46th year of her age. In 1619, the states of Bohemia, who were mostly protestants, refusing to own Ferdinand, who had been elected emperor, as their sovereign, chose Frederic elector palatine, son-in-law to king James, for their king, who was crowned on November 4 following. A war ensuing, king James refused to assist his son-in-law, who, in the battle of Prague, November 7, 1620, was totally routed by the imperial and Bavarian troops, and forced to fly with his queen and children into Holland. The murmurs of the people about the palatinate occasioned the calling of a parliament, which met January 30th, 1621. The king, in order to get money, made as if he would have recourse to arms, if other methods failed; and the commons, that they might not seem to be wanting in their zeal for what they so much desired, granted him two subsidies; but afterwards, when they saw no preparations making for the war, and yet more money was demanded, instead of readily granting it, they drew up a remonstrance about the increase of popery at home, the state of the protestant religion abroad, by the neglect of vigorously interposing in the defence of the palatinate, and against the Spanish match. Upon this the commons drew up a petition, and presented it with the remonstrance. The former he received, but rejected the latter, and sent them a long and angry answer to their petition, charging them with usurping upon his prerogative royal, and meddling with things far above their reach; and, in the end, objects to their calling their privileges their ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, and wishes they had rather acknowledged them as derived from the grace and permission of his ancestors and himself. This the commons would by no means admit; and, therefore, knowing the parliament was going to be dissolved or prorogued, drew up a protestation concerning their privileges, maintaining them to be their undoubted birth-right. The king hereupon sent for the clerk of the house of commons, and commanded him to produce the journal-book; which he having done accordingly, the king with his own hand, in full council, took the said protestation out of the journal, declaring it to be invalid, null, void, and of no effect. Soon after, he dissolved the parliament by proclamation, and committed to prison several of the members who were most active in maintaining their privileges. This open opposition between the king and parliament, produced the two parties, who in after-times came to be distinguished by the names of Tories and Whigs. On February 19, 1629, the parliament met, and the king, apprehending that a war would ensue on the breaking off the Spanish match, made such a speech to them, as the Prince and Buckingham, who now affected the patriot, desired. They unanimously advised him to break off the match, tho' the business had been done before, and gave largely for the war. The king died at Theobald's, March 27, 1625. In the beginning of this king's reign, a new officer, called master of the ceremonies, was instituted for the more solemn reception of ambassadors. James I. was in his stature of the middle size, inclining to corpulency: his forehead was high, his beard scanty, and his aspect mean. His eyes, which were large and languid, he rolled about incessantly, as if in quest of novelties. His tongue was so large, that in speaking or drinking he belaboured the bystanders. His knees were so weak as to bend under the weight of his body. His address was awkward, and his appearance slovenly. There was nothing dignified either in the composition of his mind or person. In the course of his reign he exhibited repeated instances of his ridiculous vanity, prejudices, profusion, folly, and littleness of soul. All that we can add in his favour is, that he was averse to cruelty and injustice, very little addicted to excess, temperate in his meals, kind to his servants, and even desirous of acquiring the love of his subjects, by granting that as a favour which they claimed as a privilege. His reign, though ignoble to himself, was happy to his people. They were enriched by commerce, which no war interrupted. They felt no severe impositions; and the commons made considerable progress in ascertaining the liberties of the nation. In this and the preceding reign, England produced a number of excellent poets, such as Spenser, Sidney, Shakespear, and Jonson; while Bacon excelled in natural philosophy, and Cambden flourished as an antiquary and historian. In the 14th year of this reign, Sir Hugh Middleton, a private citizen of London, supplied part of the city with excellent water, conveyed in an aqueduct from Ware, Ware, in Hertfordshire, now known by the name of the New-River.

JAMES II. succeeded to the throne of England, February 6, 1684-5, on the death of his brother Charles II. There had been endeavours used to exclude him, by an act of parliament, from the crown, on account of his being a Roman-catholic; but the king his brother dissolving the parliament, prevented it passing. On April 23, 1685, the king and queen were crowned. The king would not receive the sacrament, but all the rest was done in the protestant form; his priests doubtless dispensing with him in this as well as in the coronation- oath. The famous Titus Oates was tried the 8th and 9th of May, before lord chief justice Jefferies, for perjury, in relation to two circumstances of his evidence. The witnesses against him were almost all papists, and seminary priests and Jesuits from St. Omer's. He was sentenced to pay 1000 marks on each indictment, to be stripped of his canonical habit, to stand twice in the pillory, and five times a year afterwards as long as he lived; to be imprisoned for life, and to be whipped first from Aldgate to Newgate, and the very next day but one from Newgate to Tyburn; which was executed with the utmost severity, so that he swooned away several times. Thomas Dangerfield was tried soon after, and sentenced to pay 500l. to stand twice in the pillory, and to be whipped in the same manner as Oates; which was executed, though with less severity. In England, the parliament (the only one in this king's reign) met May 19, when his majesty promised to preserve the religious and civil rights of his people. The beginning of king James's reign was disturbed by two invasions (one in Scotland, headed by the duke of Argyll, the other in England, in favour of the duke of Monmouth), the authors of which were both taken and beheaded, the latter in England, and the former in Scotland. Judge Jefferies was sent down into the West to try the prisoners; where he boasted he had hanged more men than all the judges since William the Conqueror. Now every method was taken to establish popery. In Ireland, the privy-council was dissolved, and a new one appointed, with several papists in it, who soon became the majority. Protestant officers were cashiered, and papists put in their room, and the army so modelled by the earl of Tyrconnel, as best to suit the purpose in view. The parliament, after several adjournments, met Nov. 9. The king demanded a supply for keeping up his army, which he had increased to 15,000 men, though the nation was in perfect peace; and bad them not to take exceptions that he had some officers in his army not qualified according to the late tests, declaring his resolution to employ them still. Both houses, and the whole kingdom, were surpris'd at this speech, and the opposers of the late bill of exclusion began now a little to open their eyes. The commons indeed voted him a supply; but could not relish the employing popish officers in the army, contrary to the known law of the land, and address'd the king against it; at which he was so much offended, that he prorogued the parliament, Nov. 20. All the rest of king James's reign, till he met with a providential check from the enterprise of the prince of Orange, was wholly employed in measures to make himself absolute, and establish popery. In April, 1686, he wrote a letter to the parliament of Scotland, desiring them to free his Roman-catholic subjects from the restraints they lay under; and upon their not complying, he dissolved them. In England he got the judges to declare in favour of his dispensing power. This he effected by sending for them one by one, and talking with them privately in his closet (whence the odious name of closeting took its rise) by turning out those whom he found refractory, and filling their places with others he found more pliable. He also new-modelled his council, admitting into it the lord Arundel of Wardour, and the lord Bellasis, who had both been impeached for the popish plot, and other Roman-catholics, among whom was father Peter, his confessor. And now every thing was hurrying on to establish the Roman-catholic religion. The king had an army of 15,000 men encamped on Hounslow-heath, under the earl of Feversham; and in the camp was a public chapel, where mass was said every day. This seem'd plainly to indicate, that he intended to make use of force, if he could not bring his measures to bear without it; which put the Rev. Mr. Johnson upon publishing an address to the protestant officers and soldiers in the army, exhorting them not to be the tools of the court for subverting their religion and liberties. For this, after having been solemnly degraded, he was whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, stood thrice in the pillory, and fined 500 marks; but this writing being dispers'd in the army, made such an impression, that it tend'd not a little to the defection that happen'd in it afterward. The king's zeal also put him upon sending the earl of Castlemain on a solemn embassy to the pope, in order to reconcile the three nations to the holy see. But Innocent XI, happening to be troubled with a periodical cough, which always seiz'd him when the earl was to have an audience, his lordship threaten'd to depart; whereupon his holiness very complaisantly sent him word, "that, if he had a mind to go, he would advise him to set out early in the morning, and rest at noon; because it was dangerous travelling in that country in the heat of the day." In the beginning of the year 1687, the king sent his declaration into Scotland, suspending, by virtue of his sovereign authority, prerogative royal, and absolute power, all laws against the catholics; and, April 4, he published the like declaration for liberty of conscience in England, only not quite in so high a style. He sent mandates to admit Roman-catholics into preferments in the university of Oxford. He did all he could to gain the members of parliament; but not succeeding, he dissolved them on July 2; and sending such a general aver-

son in the nation to popery and arbitrary power, he never durst venture to call another parliament. On July 3, Ferdinand Dada, who had been about the king's person ever since his accession, being invested with the character of the pope's nuncio in England, made his public entry at Windsor, with all the formality of a popish procession. On January 2, 1687-8, a proclamation was published, that the queen was with child, and ordering a thanksgiving on that account. The king now despairing of every method but force, began to augment his army and fleet, and the new commissions were almost all bestowed on popish officers. He afterwards ordered some entire regiments from Ireland. On April 27, 1688, came out a second declaration for liberty of conscience, which the bishops were ordered to see read in all churches and chapels. Some of the bishops obeyed, and it was read in a few churches, when the congregations generally went out. But the archbishop of Canterbury, and six other bishops, resolved not to obey the order, and went and presented a petition to the king against it. They were upon this, June 8, summoned before the council, and, adhering to their petition, were sent to the Tower, privately as it were, by water; but this did not hinder multitudes flocking to the water-side, desiring their blessing, and applauding and encouraging their constancy. Two days after, June 10, the queen was said to be delivered of a prince (the late pretender). On June 15, the seven bishops were tried for a libel against the king and government, and were acquitted; upon which an universal joy run through the nation, and the army shouted for it in the king's hearing. The king was now willing to try how far he could depend upon the army. Beginning with lord Litchfield's regiment, he ordered them to take their arms, and immediately commanded such officers and soldiers, as would not contribute to the repeal of the penal laws and test, to lay them down; which they all did, except two captains and a few popish soldiers; at which he was so astonished, that he stood speechless for some time, and then bad them take up their arms again; adding, with a sullen air, that he would not hereafter do them the honour to ask their advice. And now he began to new-model the army, by cashiering protestants, and putting papists in their room; but this only disgusted the army the more. The fleet was no better disposed to favour the views of the king; for vice-admiral Strickland attempting to have mass said on board his ship, it occasioned such a disturbance among the sailors, that they were with difficulty restrained from throwing the priest over board. Now the nation began in earnest to think of means for preserving their religion and liberties from being utterly destroyed; and several of the nobility and gentry, going abroad, waited on the prince of Orange at the Hague. The prince being invited over, as soon as the king knew it, he appeared in the utmost consternation, abolished the commission for ecclesiastical affairs, took off the bishop of London's suspension, restored the city their charter; but all this came too late; it was evidently the result of necessity, not inclination. When the king heard of the prince's landing, he ordered his army, under the earl of Feversham, to rendezvous on Salisbury plain; but, finding he could not rely on his army, returned to London, and on Dec. 10, at night, left Whitehall in disguise, in order to go to France. At his departure he sent a letter to the earl of Feversham to disband his forces. The king, having embarked on board a small vessel near Feversham, before he could sail, was stopped by a number of fishermen and others, who seized him, and treated him with great indignity, taking him for a popish priest, and chaplain to Sir Edward Hales, who attended him in his flight. A constable coming on board knew him, and behaved in a very respectful manner. The king, finding he was known, was desirous to be gone; but the people brought him, as it were, by force, to an inn in the town, where he sent for the earl of Winchelsea, who prevailed with him, much against his inclination, to go back to London, where on Dec. 16, he arrived at Whitehall. The prince of Orange having issued out a declaration for a free parliament, the king, who was at Rochester, dreading the consequences of it, withdrew himself privately about three in the morning, with only the duke of Berwick, his natural son, and two others: he embarked, and with a favourable wind arrived at Ambleteux, in France; from whence he immediately repaired to St. Germain's, where, after having lost the battle of the Boyne, in Ireland, he passed his days till his death, which happened in 1701. James II. was a prince in whom some good qualities were rendered ineffectual by mistakes notions of the prerogative, excessive bigotry to the religion of Rome, and an insufferable severity of temper. He was brave, steady, resolute, diligent, upright, and sincere, except what warped by religious considerations; yet, even where religion was not concerned, he appears to have been proud, haughty, vindictive, cruel and unrelenting; and though he approved himself an obedient and dutiful subject, he certainly became one of the most intolerable sovereigns that ever reigned over a free people.

JAPA'N, a large country in the most eastern part of Asia, with the title of an empire. It is composed of several islands, the principal of which are Nippon and Sahokkaido.

Isle, or Sacok. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1543, being cast upon shore by a tempest. The whole empire is divided into seven principal countries, which are subdivided into 90 provinces. It is the richest country in the world for gold, and the air and water are very good. It produces a great deal of rice, which they reap in September; millet, wheat, and barley, which they get in in May. Cedars are common, and so large that they are proper for the masts of ships and columns for temples. They have a large quantity of porcelain, silk, and skins; as also red pearls, which are not less in esteem than the white. In short, Japan is accounted one of the best countries in Asia. The inhabitants are naturally ingenious, and have a happy memory; but their manners are diametrically opposite to those of the Europeans. Our common drinks are cold, and theirs are all hot; we uncover the head out of respect, and they the feet; we are hood of white teeth, and they of black; we get on horse-back on the left side, and they on the right; and they have a language so particular that it is understood by no other nation. They value their lives so little, that when a war makes a feast, the domestics dispute who shall have the honour of cutting open their bellies before the guests. The sciences are highly esteemed among them, and they have several schools at different places. Those they study most are arithmetic, rhetoric, poetry, history, and astrology. Some of their schools at Meaco have each 3 or 4000 scholars. They punish adultery with death; yet a man may take as many wives as he pleases. On the other hand, bawdy-houses are very frequent, and they tolerate sins against nature. Those that have too many children make no scruple of destroying some of them. The Japanese are naturally good soldiers, and skilful at shooting with a bow: however, as they inhabit nothing but islands, they are seldom at war with their neighbours. They formerly carried on a trade with the neighbouring countries; but now all communication with others is forbidden, especially with Christians, for they do not look upon the Dutch to be such. The only Europeans that trade with Japan are the Dutch; and whenever their ships arrive, they take away their guns, sails, and helms, and carry them ashore till they are ready to return back. In the absence of the ships, the factors are shut up in a small peninsula, and are not suffered so much as to have a lighted candle in their houses at the night-time. The merchandises which the Dutch carry to Japan are spices, sugar, silks, linen and woollen cloth, elephants teeth, and silver-ware; for which they receive gold, silver, cabinets, and other japanned and recovered ware. The Japanese have neither tables, beds, nor chairs; but they sit and lie on carpets and mats, in the manner of the Turks.

JAPAN, f. [from Japan, in Asia, where but kind of work was originally done] wood grained and raised in figures, painted in gold JA'VA, an island of Asia, in the East-Indies, lying to the S. of the equator. The inhabitants are a barbarous, proud, and fierce people, of a brown complexion, flat faces, short coal-black hair, large eye-brows, and large cheeks, with small eyes, and large eye-lids. The men are very robust and strong-limbed, and very proper for war; but the women are small. The men wear a piece of calico wrapt two or three times round their middles; and the women wear them from their arm-pits down to their knees; but all other parts are bare. The men have two or three wives, and several concubines, according to their abilities. Those living near the sea-side are generally Mahometans; but within land they are Gentooes, abstaining from flesh of all kinds. It is a very fertile island, and has very high mountains, reaching to the clouds, particularly the pepper mountain on the S. side of the island. This island is mostly under the dominion of the Dutch. Lon. from 105, to 116, E. lat. from 6. to 8. S. It is to the S. of the island of Sumatra, from which it is only separated by the straits of Sunda. Batavia is the capital settlement of the Dutch.

ICE-HOUSE, f. a house in which ice is preserved for use in the hot season.

ICELAND, a large island to the north of Europe, about 400 miles in length, and 150 in breadth. For two months together the sun never sets; and in the winter it never rises for the same space, at least, not entirely. The middle of this island is mountainous, stony, and barren; but in some places there are excellent pastures, and the grafs has a fine smell. The ice, which gets loose from the more northern country in May, brings with it a large quantity of wood, and several animals, such as foxes, wolves, and bears. Mount Hecla is the most noted mountain, and is a volcano, which sometimes throws out sulphurous torrents. The inhabitants believe that some of the souls of the damned go to this mountain, and that others are confined to the ice near this island. Their houses are scattered about at a distance from each other, and many of them are deep in the ground; but they are all miserable huts covered with skins. Many of the inhabitants profess Christianity; but those that live at a distance are Pagans. They are mostly clothed with the skins of beasts. The Danes trade with the natives for hides, tallow, train-oil, whale-bone, and sea-horses teeth, which are as good as ivory. They are said to live 100 years, without either physicians or medicines. Lat. from 64. to 67. N.

ICH DI'EN, f. [I serve, from the Teut. or Sax.] the motto of the prince of Wales, formerly that of John king of Bohemia on his shield, to denote that he was subservient to Philip king of France, whose pay he received; but being slain by Edward the Black prince, the son of Edward III. he then assumed the motto, to denote his obedience to his father; since which it has always been borne by the prince of Wales.

ICHNEU'MON, [ikneumon] f. [ixnuvmon, Gr.] a small animal remarkable for its antipathy to the crocodile, whose eggs it breaks. The ichneumon fly is a fly which is bred in the body of caterpillars, and is so called in allusion to the report that the ichneumon gets down the throat of the crocodile, and eats its way out through the crocodile's belly.

JERSEY, an island in the English Channel, 12 miles from the coast of Normandy in France, and 25 from the coast of Brittany, subject to the English. It is about 30 miles in circumference, and difficult of access, on account of the rocks, sands, and forts erected for its defence. It contains 12 parishes; and the chief town is St. Hilary, in the S. part of the island. It lies extremely well for trade in time of peace, and to annoy the French privateers in time of war. It is well watered with rivulets, and is pretty well stocked with fruit-trees. They have a noted manufactory for woollen stockings and caps, and are still governed by the ancient Norman laws, the courts of England having no jurisdiction here.

JERSEY, one of the United Provinces of N. America, bounded on the W. by Pennsylvania, on the S. by Maryland, on the N. by New-York, and on the E. by the ocean; and is about 140 miles in length from N. to S. and 60 in breadth from E. to W. The chief towns are Burlington, Perth-Amboy, and Elizabeth-town. It is divided into E. and W. Jersey; and the produce of both is Indian corn, wheat, pease, beans, barley, oats, horses, black-cattle, furs, and pipe-staves. They send to the Caribbee islands bread, corn, salt, beef, pork, and fish; and, in return, receive rum, sugar, and the other produce of those islands. To England they send furs and skins; for which they have furniture and cloths in return.

JERSEY, f. [from the island of Jersey, which is famous for spinning of yarn, and its stocking manufacture] a fine woollen yarn.

JERUSALEM, anciently Salem and Jebus; among the Greeks and Latins it was known by the name of Solyma and Hierosolyma, the capital of Judæa or Palestine, in Asia. It was a very famous city while the Jews inhabited the country; and in its most flourishing state, it consisted of four parts, each being inclosed within its own walls. 1. The old city, which stood on Mount Zion, where king David built a palace. 2. The lower city, styled also the Daughter of Zion, as being built after it; where king Solomon's palace stood, also Herod's theatre and amphitheatre, the latter capable of containing 80,000 persons. 3. The new city, mostly inhabited by tradesmen and numbers of merchants. And 4. Mount Moriah, where Solomon's magnificent temple stood. But all this glory has long since been laid in the dust, in exact conformity to our Saviour's prophecy, particularly with regard to the latter, "that one stone of it should not be left upon another." It lies thirty-five miles E. of the Levant sea, and ninety-four S. of Damascus; and stands on a high rock, the ascents to which, on all sides, are exceedingly steep, except that on the N. and surrounded with a deep valley encompassed with hills.

JESSAMINE, f. See JASMINE.

To JEST, v. n. [jesticular, Lat.] to make a person merry by pleasant and witty turns in expression, and odd or comical motions of the body; to speak a thing one knows to be false, purely to divert another.

JEST, f. any thing meant only to divert a person, or raise laughter; a witty or pointed turn of words, which diverts or raises laughter; the object of mirth or laughter; game; not earnest.

JESTER, f. one given to witty turns in expression, to sarcasms, to odd and comical pranks; a buffoon, or one formerly kept by great persons to divert them by his witty turns or odd pranks.

JESUITS, or THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, a famous religious order in the Romish church, founded by Ignatius Loyola, a native of Guipuscoa, in Spain, who, in the year 1538, assembled ten of his companions at Rome, principally chosen out of the university of Paris, and made a proposal to them to form a new order: when, after many deliberations, it was agreed to add to the three ordinary vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, a fourth, which was, to go into all countries whither the pope should please to send them, in order to make converts to the Romish church. Two years after, Pope Paul III. gave them a bull, by which he approved this new order, giving them a power to make such statutes as they should judge convenient; on which, Ignatius was created general of the order; which in a short time spread over all countries of the world, to which he sent his companions, while he staid at Rome, from whence he governed the whole society. This society have rendered themselves so obnoxious during the last and present centuries by their arts and intrigues, that they have been suppressed in several kingdoms of Europe; particularly in France and Portugal.

INDIES, a vast country of Asia, which received its name from the river Indus; seated partly in the temperate, and partly in the torrid zone, and consequently the air very different. Towards the N. it is pretty temperate, but towards the S. on the contrary, is very hot; and it rains almost constantly for three months in the year, which renders the heats more supportable, and contributes to fertilize the ground, which produces abundance of rice, millet, cotton, figs, pomegranates, oranges, lemons, citrons, cocoa nuts, and many other fruits, of which there are none in Europe but what have been transplanted from thence. There are mines of gold and silver, and several sorts of precious stones; also borax and salt-petre. They fish for pearls in the seas and in the rivers. This country produces several sorts of animals, as well domestic as wild; such as elephants, rhinoceroses, camels, dromedaries, buffaloes, lions, tygers, leopards, panthers, and a vast number of monkies. The trade is exceeding great, and it chiefly consists of indigo, salt-petre, silk, cotton, and precious stones; but more especially in a prodigious quantity of calicoes, chintz, and other stuffs of various kinds. The Europeans had little or no intercourse with the Indies till the year 1498, when the Portuguese discovered a way by sea, round the Cape of Good Hope. The Indians are generally Gentoos or idolaters, though there are a great number of Mahometans. Many of the idolaters believe in the transmigration of souls, and will not kill or eat any thing that has life, not even the most noxious insects or animals. Their principal priests are brachmans; and there are saquirs, who make their principal devotion consist in the choice of the most troublesome postures, which they never leave till they quit the world. Some pass several years without lying down either night or day, resting only upon a cord which is stretched out; others shut themselves up in a cave several days together, without eating or drinking: some hold their arms lifted up so long that they can never fit them afterwards; and, again, others put burning coals upon their heads, and let them lie there till the fire reaches the very bones. Sometimes these saquirs go in a body, followed by a great number of disciples; and they often make a merit of killing Christians. It was a custom among the Gentoos for the women to burn themselves with their deceased husbands; but it is not so frequent as it was formerly, because the Mahometans will not allow it. The Indies is divided into four large parts, namely, Indostan, the peninsula on this side the Ganges, that beyond it, and the islands of the East Indian seas, the principal of which are, Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, the Celebes, the Maldives, the Moluccas, and the Marians. Some writers make Tonquin and China a part of the East Indies, especially with regard to trade, but very improperly. When the Spaniards first discovered America, they called it the West Indies, on account of its riches; which is the reason why these parts we are speaking of, are called the East Indies. The Indians are generally well made and robust, but they do not love labour, nor do they make good soldiers. They are very fond of women, and in other respects are civil, kind to strangers, and very ingenious. With regard to their complexion, they are of an olive colour in the northern parts, and in the southern quite black. There are many different languages in the East Indies, but the Mahometans generally understand Arabic, because the Alcoran is written in that language.

INDO'STAN, PROPER INDIA, or the Empire of the Great Mogul, is bounded on the W. by Persia, on the S. by the Western peninsula, on the E. by the eastern peninsula, and on the N. by several kingdoms of Independent Tartary. It is a vast country, and is about 1200 miles in length. It is very fertile in all sorts of corn; and all the commodities of the East Indies are to be met with here. The inhabitants are more humane with regard to strangers, and not so great enemies to the Christians, as the Turks; they dress much in the same manner, and take several wives, being much addicted to luxury. The government is despotic, and the Great Mogul master both of the lives and fortunes of his subjects. His revenue is said to amount to near fifty millions sterling a-year, and he has an army of 70,000 men. The provinces are governed by Omars, some of whom are called Nabobs; and he generally bestows upon them lands sufficient to maintain their dignity and their troops. Their revenues are so considerable, that these governors are like so many petty kings. The empire of Mogul contains 20 provinces; namely, Cashmere, Cabul, and Ayoed to the N. Siba and Patna on the east side of the Ganges, and which contain several provinces. Those that lie to the S. are Bengal, Berer, Candish, Baligate, Talinga, Baglana, and Guzurat. The eastern provinces are Tata, or Sinda, or Multan. There are six in the middle, between the river Indus and the Ganges, namely, Pengab or Lahor, Delli, Agra, Afmer, Malva, and Halabas. To these 20 provinces may be joined the kingdoms of Golconda and Carnate, tributary to the Great Mogul.

JOHN succeeded Richard I. his brother, in the throne of England, April, 6, 1199. He was in France when his brother died; where, having been crowned duke of Normandy, he returned to England May 25, and was crowned the 28th, being then 32 years of age. His marriage with Isabella of Anjou before, who had been betrothed to Hugh earl of March, ruined his affairs in France. His passion for her was so great, that, to make her his wife, he divorced Avifa of Gloucester, under pretence of consanguinity; and without scruple broke through the engagement between Isabella and the earl of March. King John had an interview with the king of Scotland at Lincoln, and received his homage. Whilst they were there, the body of Hugh, bishop of Lincoln, reputed a saint, being brought from London to be interred, they both went out to meet it, and taking the coffin on their shoulders, bore it for some time. But notwithstanding this and other marks of respect shewn to the clergy, king John's nomination of a person to the vacant see of Lincoln was rejected with the utmost contempt by the canons of that church; which was owing to Innocent III. the then Pope's resolving by all methods to prevent princes from having any thing to do with the election of bishops and abbots. The king's ill conduct at home and abroad, caused great discontent among his subjects. He usurped such an absolute power, as made them apprehensive that their liberties were in danger. This alarmed the nobility, and put them upon forming schemes to oppose his arbitrary proceedings. The Poitevins having revolted, the king summoned the barons to attend him at Portsmouth, in order to pass over with him into France; but the barons, who assembled at Leicester, refused to go over with him, unless he would first restore them to their privileges, as he had promised before his coronation. The king, instead of giving them any satisfaction, began to take violent measures against them; and they, not being sufficiently prepared for their defence, at last submitted, and came to the king at Portsmouth; but when they were come, he dispensed with their attendance, upon their paying him two marks of silver for every knight's knights' fee. King John went over to Normandy, having sent the earl of Pembroke thither with some troops before him; and what by the arms of Philip king of France, his policy and intrigues, and what by the unaccountable negligence and inactivity of John, the whole province of Normandy was re-united to the crown of France, in the year 1204, after it had been severed from it 320 years, during the government of twelve dukes, of which king John was the last; and nothing was left to John but the duchy of Guienne. The same year died queen Eleanor, widow of Henry II. and mother of John. Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, dying in 1206, John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, was, by the king's recommendation, chosen by the whole fraternity, whom pope Innocent III. refused to confirm, and ordered them to chuse cardinal Stephen Langton, an Englishman then at Rome, threatening them with excommunication unless they complied, which at last they did with great reluctance; and the pope immediately confirmed the election, and consecrated Langton with his own hands. John, imagining this to have been the act of the whole body, expelled all the monks of St. Austin from their monastery, and banished them out of the kingdom. He wrote a sharp letter to the pope, upbraiding him with his unjust proceedings, and threatening to break off all intercourse with Rome, unless he revoked what he had done. But Innocent, bent upon carrying his point, laid the whole kingdom under an interdict; the effect of which was, that divine service ceased in all the churches, and the sacraments ceased to be administered, except to infants, and dying persons: the church-yards shut up, and the dead buried without any priest daring to assist at the funerals. King John, to be even with the pope, confiscated the estates of all the ecclesiastics who obeyed the interdict; he also ordered all the concubines of the priests, of which there were many, to be shut up in prison, and would not let them out without their paying large fines. And as there were some priests, who, in spite of the interdict, administered the sacraments, the king took them under his protection, and ordered the magistrates to hang on the spot all that should molest them; which as soon as the pope was informed of, he excommunicated all such as disobeyed the interdict, or complied with the king's orders. Though John remained still inflexible, he was not without his fears, as the people generally took part with the pope; and therefore, for his better security, he raised an army, under pretence of making war upon Scotland, and caused all his vassals to renew their homage to him. The pope, finding that the interdict, which had been in force above a year, had not produced the effect he designed, proceeded to excommunicate the king, though the sentence was not published till some time after. In the mean time John led his army into Ireland, against the king of Connaught, who had raised some disturbances there. At Dublin he received the homage of above thirty petty princes; after which, having taken the king of Connaught prisoner, an end was put to this commotion, and the whole island remained in obedience to the king, who, before his departure, caused the laws and customs of England to be established in Ireland. The pope absolved John's subjects from their allegiance, solemnly deposed him, and empowered the king of France to put the sentence in execution, promising him remission from all his sins, together with the crown of England, as soon as he should have dethroned the tyrant. Accordingly, Philip made great preparations to invade England. In this crisis, Pandulph came over with the character of legate to England; and so wrought upon the king's fears, that he resigned the kingdom of England and lordship of Ireland to the pope, and acknowledged himself a vassal of the holy see. Philip, notwithstanding the pope's prohibition, still continued his preparations for invading England, which the earl of Flanders opposing, he sent his fleet to his coast; whereupon, John sent a fleet under the earl of Salisbury, which totally destroyed the French fleet; and this put a stop to Philip's designs against England. And now the discontents of the barons having risen to a great height, and cardinal Langton siding with them, he shewed them the charter of king Henry I. advising them to make it the ground of their demands. Hereupon, they entered into a confederacy to stand by one another, till their grievances were redressed, and their ancient privileges were confirmed. Upon the king's return from France, the barons, having prepared themselves for war, in case the king should refuse to comply with their demands in a peaceable way, came in a body to the king about Christmas, and insisted upon the restitution of the laws of St. Edward. The king was afraid to give them a flat denial, but told them they should have an answer at Easter; at which time, in the year 1215, the great men, with above 2000 knights, well mounted and armed, besides other horse and foot, met at Stamford, and advanced to meet the king at Oxford; who, being afraid to trust himself with them in conference, dispatched the earl of Pembroke to know their demands. They immediately sent back a long writing, containing the laws and customs of the kingdom in the time of the Saxons; and declared, if the king would not confirm them, they would compel him to it, by seizing his castles. John, having read over the articles, fell into a violent passion, and swore he would never comply with them; upon which the barons chose a general knight, Fitzwalter, giving him the title of Marshal of the army of God, and of the holy church; and marching to London, were received by the citizens, and besieged the king in the tower. The king sent the earl of Pembroke to let them know he would comply with their demands. Accordingly, both parties meeting on a day appointed, in a meadow called Runnymede, between Staines and Windsor, the king, seemingly with a good will, though compelled to it by force, signed two charters, containing all that the barons desired; and the one called the Charter of Liberties, or the Great Charter (Magna Charta), and the other, the Charter of Forests. They were not only signed by the king, but by all the Lords spiritual and temporal, sealed with the great seal, and confirmed by the king's solemn oath. But the king soon repented of what he had done, and sent over some of his confidants into Germany, France, and Flanders, to enlist men, promising them the confiscated estates of his rebellious barons, as he called them. He also wrote to the pope, who zealously espoused his cause, excommunicated the barons, annulled the charters, and absolved the king from the oath he had taken to observe them. However, the barons made light of the pope's thunderings, and seized upon Rochester, where was a vast quantity of provisions which the king had laid up. But the foreign army being arrived, who were very numerous, all soldiers of fortune, John retook Rochester; and then dividing his army into two bodies, the earl of Salisbury with one ravaged the southern counties, whilst the king with the other did the same by the northern. The barons, finding themselves not strong enough to keep the field, shut themselves up in London. In this distress they had recourse to a dangerous expedient; which was, to invite over Lewis, son to the king of France, promising to place the crown on his head, if he would come with a force sufficient to rescue them from the tyranny of John. Philip sent over his son with a numerous army, notwithstanding the pope's prohibition, and his threatening prince Lewis with excommunication, the moment he set foot on English ground. That prince landed March 21, 1216, and soon made himself master of the whole county of Kent, except Dover castle. He then marched to London, where the barons and citizens took the oaths of allegiance to him. From this time he acted as sovereign. In the mean time, John was in perpetual motion, marching from place to place, by all means avoiding coming to battle. His grief at length threw him into a fever, of which he died at Newark, October 18, 1216, in the 51st year of his age, and 18th of his reign, and was buried in the cathedral of Worcester. John was in his person taller than the middle size, of a good shape and agreeable countenance. With respect to his disposition, we find him slothful, shallow, proud, imperious, sudden, rash, cruel, vindictive, perfidious, cowardly, libidinous, and inconstant; abject in adversity, and overbearing in success; contemned and hated by his subjects, over whom he tyrannized to the utmost of his power; abhorred by the clergy, whom he oppressed with exactions; and despised by all the neighbouring princes of Europe. Nevertheless it must be owned that his reign is not altogether barren of laudable transactions. He regulated the form of the civil government in the city of London, and several other places in the kingdom: he was the first who coined sterling money, introduced the laws of England into Ireland, and granted to the Cinque-ports those privileges of which they are still possessed.

JOHN, SAINT, (the Evangelist) was by birth a Galilean, by trade a fisherman, as was his father Zebedee, and his brother St. James, and from this occupation they were both called to be disciples and apostles of our Blessed Saviour. He is called the disciple whom Jesus in a particular manner loved. He wrote the gospel which goes by his name, in which the divinity and god-head of our Saviour is clearly asserted, against the Gnosticks, who began even in that early age to deny it. He wrote also three Epistles; the 1st, catholic, or general; the other two addressed to different persons, which have always been very highly esteemed in all ages of the church. He is also, by almost all the ancients, acknowledged to be the author of the book of the Revelations, which he wrote while under banishment in the isle of Patmos; whither he was sent by the tyrant Domitian; who, as Tertullian writes, had before this commanded him, for his strict adherence to the christian faith, to be thrown into a cauldron of boiling or burning oil; but from this danger he was miraculously delivered, and lived to return, under the emperor Nerva, to Ephesus, where he died at the age of an hundred years, and was there buried.

IRĒFUL, a. angry; raging.

IRĒFULLY, ad. in a manner which shows great anger.

IRELAND, one of the British islands, lying to the W. of that of Great Britain. It is bounded on the E. by St. George's Channel and the Irish Sea, which separates it from England and Wales; on the N. E. by a channel about 15 miles broad, which separates it from Scotland; and on all other sides by the ocean. It is divided into four large provinces; namely, Ulster to the N. Leinster to the E. Munster to the S. and Connaught to the W. and these again are subdivided into counties and baronies. The air is mild and temperate, being cooler in summer and warmer in winter than in England; though it is not so clear and pure, nor so proper for ripening corn and fruits. In general it is a fruitful, level country, and well watered with lakes and rivers; and the soil, in most parts, is very good and fertile: even in those places, where the bogs and morasses have been drained, there is good meadow ground. It produces corn, pasture, hemp, and flax, in great plenty; and there are so many cattle, that their beef and butter are transported into divers countries; and not only the English, but other ships frequently come to be victualled here. The principal riches and commodities of Ireland are, cattle, hides, tallow, suet, butter, cheese, wood, salt, honey, wax, furs, hemp, and, more especially, fine linen-cloth, which they have brought to great perfection, and their trade in it is vastly increased. The most remarkable thing is, that there are no venomous creatures in this country; and, if they are brought there, they certainly die. Several attempts have been made to introduce frogs; but whether they have succeeded in it, or not, we cannot pretend to say. This country is exceeding well situated for foreign trade, on account of their many secure and commodious harbours. Their laws differ but little from those of England; their established religion is the same; and all their acts of parliament must be approved of by the king in council. The lord-licutenant of Ireland, as well as the council, are appointed from time to time by the king. There is usually a body of 12,000 men kept in pay on the Irish establishment, and are generally all English. They are not quartered in public houses, but lodge in barracks built for that purpose. There are a great number of Roman catholics in this country, whose religion is tolerated; besides a great number of dissenters in the N. of Ireland: Dublin is the only university in the kingdom; and that consists of one college, in which there are about 600 students. The common people are so poor, and it is so hard for them to get a livelihood, that they frequently go into other countries to seek their fortunes; and, particularly, great numbers go over to America. That part of the inhabitants called the Wild Irish were formerly as savage as the native Americans; and, like them, lived in huts, making a fire in the middle of them. It has been common for the nobility and men of fortune to reside in London; but the inhabitants of Dublin, by providing plays and other polite diversions, endeavour to keep them at home as much as possible. Ireland contains 2293 parishes, 260 baronies, and 18 boroughs. It lies between lon. 5. 25. and 10. 40. W. and between lat. 51. 15. and 55. 15. N. being about 278 miles in length, and 155 in breadth.

IRIS, f. [Lat.] the rainbow. In Philosophy, an appearance of light resembling the rainbow. In Botany, the flower-de-luce. In Anatomy, the circle round the pupil of the eye, from whence it receives the appellation of black, blue, &c. according to the colour.

IRKSOME, a. wearisome; affecting with pain or trouble.

IRKSOMELY, ad. in such a manner as to pain, weary, or trouble.

IRON, [iern] f. [iren, Sax.] a well-known metal; though lighter than all others, excepting tin, yet considerably the hardest; when pure, malleable, but in a less degree than gold, silver, lead, or copper. It is more capable of rust than other metals, and requires the strongest fire to melt it. Most other metals are brittle while they are hot; but this is the most malleable the nearer it approaches to fusion. It is the only known substance attracted by the loadstone, is not only soluble in the stronger acids, but even in common water, to which its specific gravity is as 7632 to 1000.

IRON, [iern] a. made of iron; resembling iron in colour. Figuratively, harsh; severe; rigid.

TO IRON, [iern] v. a. to smooth with an iron; to put on shackles or irons.

IRRUPTION, f. [irruptio, Lat.] the act of any thing forcing an entrance; an inroad, or forcible entry of an enemy into any place.

IS, the third person singular of the present tense indicative, from the verb TO BE, borrowed from is, Goth. the second person singular of the present tense indicative of wisan, Goth. Sometimes the i is left out, and expressed by an apostrophe over its place; as, "There's some." Sbak.

ISA'IAH, THE PROPHECY OF, a canonical book of the Old Testament, and the first of the four greater prophecies. He was of the blood royal, his father Amos being brother of Azariah, king of Judah. The style of this prophet is noble, sublime, and florid. Grotius calls him the Demosthenes of the Hebrews. Isaiah prophesied from the end of the reign of Uzziah, till the time of Manasseh, by whose order, according to the Jewish tradition, he was put to death by being sawed asunder.

ISCHIA'DIC, [iskhidik] a. [ισχιαδικος, Gr.] in Anatomy, a name given to two crural veins, called the greater and the lesser ischias. It signifies also a disease or pain of the hip, and is commonly called sciatica.

I'SCHURY, [iskury] f. [ισχυρια, Gr.] in Medicine, is a disorder consisting in an entire suppression of urine.

ISH, [is, Sax.] a termination added to words, expresses diminution or lessening the sense of the word, if joined to an adjective; as, bluisb, tending to blue. When added to a substantive, it implies likeness, or partaking the qualities of the substantive to which it is added; as, foelb, wolfsb, roguisb. When added to the name of a country, it implies something belonging to or living in it; as Swedibb, Danibb.

I'SINGLASS, f. a tough, firm, and light substance of a whitish colour, and somewhat transparent, resembling glue, but in some degree cleaner. It is made from the intestines of a cartilaginous fish, which is a species of sturgeon, grows to eighteen or twenty feet in length, and is frequently found in the Danube, &c. In Medicine, it is prescribed in broths and jellies as an agglutinant and strengthener; and by wine-coopers it is used in clearing wines.

I'SINGLASS-STONE, f. a fossil found in broad masses, composed of a multitude of extremely fine flakes or plates: the ancients made their windows of it, instead of glass.

ISO'SCELES, f. [ισος and κελη, Gr.] applied to a triangle which has two sides equal.

I'SPAHAN, a celebrated city of Asia, and capital of Persia, thought by some to be the finest city in the East. It stands in the middle of a plain, surrounded on all sides with mountains, at eight miles distance, which rise gradually in the form of an amphitheatre. There is no river except a small one, called Senderut, which supplies almost all the houses with water. It is 20 miles in circumference, with well-built houses and flat roofs, on which they walk, eat, and lie, in the summer-time, for the sake of the cool air. Here are a great number of magnificent palaces; and that of the king is two miles and a half in circumference. There are 160 mosques, 1800 large caravansaries, above 260 public baths, a prodigious number of coffee-houses, and very fine bazars and streets, in which are canals planted on each side with trees. The streets are not paved; but always clean, on account of the dryness of the air; for it seldom rains or snows here. It is 265 miles N. E. of Buserah, 300 S. of the Caspian sea, and 1400 S. E. of Constantinople. Lon. 52. 55. E. lat. 32. 25. N.

I'SSUE, f. [issus, Fr.] the act of passing out; passage outwards; an event, or the consequence of any action. In Surgery, a hole made in the flesh by incision, for the discharge of humours. Progeny; offspring. The profits growing from an amercement. The point of matter depending on a suit, wherein the parties join, and put the cause to the trial of a jury. Hence to join issue, is to agree upon some particular point, on which the decision of a cause shall rest.

To I'SSUE, v. t. [issuer, Fr.] to come or pass pass out at any place. To proceed, applied to offspring. To be produced or grained, applied to funds or trade. To run out in lines. Actively, to send out by authority, or judicially, used with out: this sense is most common.

ISSUELESS, a. without offspring or children.

ISTHMUS, [istmus] f. [isthmos, Gr.] in Geography, is a narrow neck of land that joins two continents, or joins a peninsula to the terra firma, and separates two seas. The most celebrated isthmuses are that of Panama, or Darien, which joins North and South America; and that of Suez, which connects Asia and Africa; that of Corinth, of Crim Tartary, &c.

IT, pron. [it, Sax.] the neuter demonstrative, made use of in speaking of things. Sometimes it is used absolutely for the state of a person or affair. "How is it?" Sbak. Sometimes elliptically for the thing, matter, or affair. "It's come to pass." Sbak. After neutral verbs, it is used either ludicrously, or to give an emphasis. "A mole courses it on the ground." Speel.

ITALY, a large peninsula of Europe, having the Alps to the N. which separates it from France and Savoy; and it is surrounded on all other sides by the Mediterranean sea. It is the most celebrated country in Europe, having been formerly the seat of the Roman empire, and at present of the Pope. It is so fine and fruitful a country, that it is commonly called the garden of Europe. The air is temperate and wholesome, except in the territory of the Church, where it is very indifferent. The soil is fertile, and produces wheat, rice, wine, oil, oranges, citrons, pomegranates, all sorts of fruits, flowers, honey, and silk; and in the kingdom of Naples are cotton and sugar. The forests are full of all sorts of game, and on the mountains are fine pastures, which feed a great many cattle. Here are also mines of sulphur, iron, several quarries of alabaster, jasper, and all kinds of marble. Italy is a mountainous country; for besides the Alps, which bound it to the N. there are the Appennines, running quite across it from E. to W. as well as mount Vesuvius, which is a volcano, and vomits flames; besides several others. The principal rivers are, the Po, the Tiber or Tevere, the Arno, the Adda, and the Adige. Some divide the country in this manner, saying, the top of the boot comprehends the republic of Venice, the duchies of Mantua, Ferrara, Parma, and Modena; the calf of the leg includes the Marca or Marche of Ancona, and Abruzzo Ultra; the spur comprehends the Capitanata; the heel, the Terra d'Otranto; the sole, the Basilicata; the buckle, the city of Naples, with the isle Prohita and Ischia; the duchy of Tuscany, and the territories of the Church, represent the fore part of the leg. Besides these, there are other districts; for there is no country in Europe which is so full of principalities, duchies, marquisesates, and counties. The archbishoprics and bishoprics are also very numerous, and there are several famous universities. They have only one language, which is a corruption of the Latin, and is said to be most pure in Tuscany. They have an inquisition, but not so severe as that of Spain; however, there is no religion tolerated but the Jewish, all the rest of the inhabitants being Roman Catholics, except the Vaudois in Piedmont, and a few Protestants in maritime towns who are suffered to live there on account of trade. Rome is said to be the capital city, though some will hardly allow it. The inhabitants have a great many good qualities as well as bad ones; they are polite, active, prudent, ingenious, and politic; but then they are luxurious, effeminate, addicted to the most criminal pleasures, revengeful, and use all sorts of artifices to destroy their enemies; which produce a great number of assassinations. Add to these, that they are extremely jealous, and keep their wives and daughters always shut up, inasmuch that they cannot go to church without somebody to watch them. However, there is no place in the world where impurity abounds so much as in Italy; for there are great numbers of bawdy-houses and courtezans, who are tolerated by the magistrates.

ITCH, f. [gicha, Sax.] in Medicine, a disease which overspreads the body with pustules, attended with an irritating sensation, and communicated by contact; the sensation of uneasiness caused by the itch, or appeased by rubbing. Figuratively, a constant teasing desire.

JU'TLAND, a large peninsula, which makes the principal part of the kingdom of Denmark. It is bounded on the S. E. by the duchy of Holstein, and is surrounded on the other sides by the German Ocean and the Baltick Sea. It is about 180 miles in length, from N. to S. and 40 in breadth, from E. to W. The air is very cold, but wholesome; and the soil is fertile in corn and pastures, which feed a great number of horses and bees, which are sent to Germany, Holland, and elsewhere. This was anciently called Cimbrian Chersonese, and it is supposed to be the country from whence the Saxons came that conquered England. It is divided into two parts, called N. and S. Jutland; the latter is the duchy of Sleswick, and lies between N. Jutland and the duchy of Holstein; and the duke of that name is in possession of part of it, whose capital town is Gottorp, for which reason the sovereign is called the duke of Holstein-Gottorp.

I'VY, f. [ifig, Sax.] a particular plant, of the ever-greens, that twines about trees, sticks to walls, or creeps on the ground. Its qualities in Medicine are drying and astringent; its berries purge upwards and downwards; and a gum, that distils from its trunk, upon being any ways cut, is reckoned a notable caustic, and is said to destroy the nits of the head.

K.

K is the tenth letter, and seventh consonant of our alphabet. Its sound is much the same with that of the hard c, in acre, cure, come, and of qu in question, quack, &c. and has before all the vowels one invariable sound; as in keen, ken, kid, kind. K is silent in the present pronunciation before n; as know, knife, knee, knave. It used formerly to be always joined with c at the end of words, but is at present very properly omitted: thus for public, musick, arithmetic, &c. we write, public, musie, arithmetic, &c. However, in monosyllables, it is still retained; as in mock, slack, back, wreck, stick, &c. The Romans seldom used it, except in proper names, or as a numeral. The French make no use of it, except in foreign names of men and places; yet we meet with risk, burlesk, in good authors, instead of risque, burlesque. As a numeral, K denotes 250, and with a dash over it thus \bar{K} , 250,000.

KA'LENDAR, f. See CALEND, or CALENDAR.

KA'LI, f. [Arab.] a plant growing on the sea coasts, whose ashes are of great use in making glass or soap.

In England, the king has power of making peace and war, and calling, continuing, proroguing, and dissolving of parliaments; of enforcing old laws, determining rewards and punishments, pardoning offenders, laying embargoes on shipping, and of opening and shutting sea-ports. He is the fountain of honour, and has the sole power of conferring dignities and titles of honour; as creating dukes, earls, barons, &c. In Gaming, a card with the picture of a king, in whist, next to an ace. The four kings are, David, Alexander, Cæsar, and Charles, whose names are still printed on the French cards, and are supposed to represent the four monarchies of the Jews, Greeks, Romans, and that of the Franks, under Charlemagne. King at Arms, is a principal officer at arms, that has pre-eminence of the society of heralds: of these there are three, named, Garter, Norroy, and Clarenceux.

KING'S BENCH, f. is a court in which the king was formerly accustomed to sit in person, and on that account was moved with the king's household. This was originally the only court in Westminster-hall, and from this it is thought that the courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer were derived. As the king in person is still presumed in Law to sit in this court, though only represented by his judges, it is said to have supreme authority, and the proceedings in it are supposed to be coram nobis, that is, before the king. This court consists of the lord chief justice and the other justices or judges, who are invested with a sovereign jurisdiction over all matters whether of a criminal or public nature. It frequently proceeds on indictments found before other courts, and removed by certiorari into this. Persons illegally committed to prison, though by the king and council, or either of the houses of parliament, may be bailed in it; and in some cases even upon legal commitment. Writs of mandamus are issued by this court, for the restoring of officers, incorporations, &c. unjustly turned out, and freemen wrongfully disfranchised. This court is now divided into a crown side, and plea side; the one determining criminal, and the other civil causes. The officers of this court, on the crown side, are the clerk and secretary of the crown; and on the side of the pleas there are two chief clerks or prothonotaries, and their secretary and

KNIGHT, [the gh in this word and its compounds and derivatives is mute, and pronounced as if spelt nite] f. [cnibt, Sax.] among the Romans was a person of the second degree of nobility, following immediately that of the senators. At the ceremony of conferring this honour, he had a horse given him, which was kept at the public charge, with which he was to serve in the wars. Knights, in a modern sense, properly signifies a person, who, for his virtue and prowess, is by the king raised above the rank of gentleman, into a higher class of dignity and honour. Knighthood was formerly the first degree of honour in the army, and conferred with much ceremony on those who had distinguished themselves by some notable exploit in arms. The ceremonies at their creation have been various; the principal was a box on the ear, and a stroke with a sword on the shoulder: they put on him a shoulder belt, a gilt sword, spurs, and other military accoutrements; being thus armed as a knight, he was led to the church. Camden describes the manner of making a knight bachelor among us, which is the lowest and most ancient order of knighthood, to be thus: The person kneeling was gently struck on the shoulder by the prince, and accosted in these words; "Rise, and be a knight in the name of God."

Knights is also understood of a person admitted into any order, either purely military, or military and religious; as Knights of the Garter, of Malta, of the Holy Ghost, &c.

L is a semi-vowel, or liquid consonant the eleventh letter of the English alphabet. In the Saxon it was separated, as in blas, Sax. a loaf; as it is at present by the Spaniards, and by the Anglo-Britons, in lan, a temple. The figure of the capital L we borrow from the Saxons, which is the same as that of the Romans, who likewise seem to have taken theirs from the A of the Greeks, with one of its sides placed upon the line thus >. It is pronounced by putting putting the tongue to the palate, and breathing from the throat. At the end of a monosyllable it is always doubled, as in fall, kill, &c. but at the end of a word of two or more syllables it is written single, as in doubtful; as it likewise is when it occurs in the middle of compound words: for though we write skill and fall, when they are alone, with a ll, yet, when they are compounded, we leave out an l in each, as in skillful. When it comes before e at the end of a word, it is pronounced as if the e came before it, as in bible, feeble, title. As a numeral it stands for 50, and, when a line is drawn over it thus \overline{L} , for 50,000. L. also stands for Libra, a Pound; also for Libri, a Book.

LA'PLAND, a large country, in the N. part of Europe, and in Scandinavia, lying between Norway, Sweden, Russia, and the sea. It is divided into Danish, or North Lapland ; Swedish, or South Lapland ; and Russian, or East Lapland. It is extremely cold, and in some places they never see the sun for three months in the year ; and the country is all covered with snow the greatest part of the year.

year. It has, properly speaking, neither spring nor autumn, the seasons change so suddenly. The sky is generally serene, and the air healthy, it being subject almost to continual winds. They sow no corn; but have good pastures, which fatten their cattle speedily. This country is full of rocks and mountains; and the principal animals are foxes, martens, bears, elks, wolves, castors, ermins, and rein-deer. The last is the most useful animal they have; for it serves to draw the sledges over the snow with surprising swiftness; likewise, the skin serves them for cloathing, and their flesh for food. Their huts are made with poles, about 14 feet high, and they fix one end in the earth in a circle about 12 feet broad. These poles meet at the top, and form a sort of cone; and the outides are covered with the skins of rein-deer and rags: they are open at the top, to let out the smook; and here they pass their winter. They are very poorly clad, and often lie upon the snow. When they have a mind to change their habitations, they take away the skins and rags, and leave the poles standing. Their chief merchandizes are dried cod, and other fish, and the skins of rein-deer; they have also some furs. They are of a short stature, with a large head, broad forehead, blue eyes, short flat noses, and short, straight, coarse, black hair. They are a rude, brutal sort of people, though some of them have embraced Christianity, which has not mended their morals. They live a great while without the assistance of physicians, and their hair never turns grey. Instead of bread they make use of dried fish, which they reduce to powder. They are very fond of spirituous liquors, and are never sober when they can purchase them. They seldom stay long in one place, but rove about continually, leaving the poles of their huts standing, as was before observed.

LISBON, the capital of the kingdom of Portugal, lately a large, rich, strong, celebrated city, and one of the principal of Europe, with an archbishop's see, an university, a tribunal of the inquisition, a strong castle, and a harbour 12 miles in length. The squares, the public buildings, the palaces, and every other part, were very magnificent; but it was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake on November 1, 1755, and is not yet entirely entirely rebuilt. The harbour will contain several thousand sail of ships, which ride in the greatest safety; and the city, being viewed from the southern shore of the river, afforded a beautiful prospect, as the buildings rose gradually one above another. There were 30,000 houses, 200,000 inhabitants, 40 parish-churches, beside the cathedral, and 40 convents for both sexes. It is seated on the river Tagus, 10 miles from the mouth of it, 188 W. by N. of Seville, and 265 S. by W. of Madrid. Lon. 8. 5. W. lat. 38. 42. N.

LISLE [pron. Liz] a large, rich, handsome, and strong town of French Flanders, of which it is the capital, with a strong castle, and a citadel built by Vauban, and said to be the finest in Europe as well as the best fortified. The large square and the public buildings are very handsome; and they have manufactures of silks, cambrics, and camblets, as well as other stuffs, which have been brought to great perfection. It is seated on the river Duele, 14 miles W. of Tournay, 32 S. W. of Ghent, 37 N. W. of Mons, and 130 N. of Paris. Lon. 3. 9. E. lat. 50. 38. N.

LISMORE, one of the Western Islands of Scotland, seated at the mouth of the bay of Lochyol, in Argyleshire. It is eight miles long and two broad, and the soil is pretty fertile. It was formerly the residence of the bishops of Argyle.

LITTLE, f. a small space; a small part or portion; a slight affair; not much; scarce any thing. SYNON. The word little sometimes signifies only want of bigness, and at other times want of greatness in every sense; whereas that of small is the opposite only to bigness, and supposes some kind of length.

LITTLE, ad. in a small degree or quantity; not much.

LITTLENESS, f. smallness of bulk or size; meanness; want of grandeur or dignity.

LITURGY, f. [liturgia, Gr.] a form of prayers used in public worship. The English liturgy was first composed, approved, and confirmed in parliament anno 1548, the offices for the morning and evening prayer being then in the same form as they stand at present, excepting that there was no confession and absolution, the office beginning with the Lord's Prayer. In the communion, the ten commandments were omitted; the offertory was made with bread and wine mixed with water; and in the prayer for Christ's church militant, thanks were given to God for his wonderful grace declared in his saints, in the Blessed Virgin, the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs; and the saints departed were commended to God's mercy and peace: to this the consecratory prayer, now used, was joined as a part, only with some words now left out, petitioning that the bread and wine might be to us the body and blood of Jesus, the beloved Son, &c. In baptism, besides the form of the cross made on the child's forehead, another was made on his breast, with an adjuration of the devil to go out of him; after which the child was dipped three times in the font, if well, but otherwise sprinkled. Besides these, some other ceremonies were omitted in the office for the sick, as is supposed, in 1551, when the form was altered at the solicitation of Calvin.

LITUUS, f. [Lat.] in Medals, the staff used by augurs, in shape of a bishop's crozier.

To LIVE, v. a. [pronounced with the i short, as in if or gift] [lyfan, Sax.] to be in a state wherein the soul and body are united, and do operate together; to pass life in any manner with regard to habit, good or ill, happiness or misery; to continue in life. Followed by with, to converse or continue in the same house with another. To be supported; to feed.

To LOLL, v. n. to lean in any idle or lazy manner against any thing. To hang out, applied to the tongue of a beast.

LOLLARDS, a sect of Christians that rose in Germany about the beginning of the 14th century, so called from its author Walter Lollard. They rejected the mass, extreme unction, and penances for sins. Also a name of infamy given to Wickliff and his followers, from an affinity between some of their tenets and those of the Lollards, who in the reigns of Edward III. and Henry V. were accounted heretics.

LONDON, the metropolis of Great Britain, is very ancient, but was neither built by Brute nor king Lud, as some authors pretend; nor yet was it in being in the time of Julius Cæsar, though mentioned by Tacitus as a place of considerable trade in the reign of Nero: hence we may conclude it was founded in the time of Claudius, and the year of Christ 42. It is said, but with no great certainty, to have been surrounded with a wall by Constantine. It had seven gates by land, namely Ludgate, Aldgate, Cripplegate, Newgate, Aldersgate, Moorgate, and Bishopsgate, which are now all taken down. On the side of the water there were Dowgate and Billingsgate, long since demolished, as well as the postern gate near the Tower, and the greatest part of the walls. In the year 1670, there was a gate erected, called Temple-bar, which determines the bounds of the city westward. This city has undergone great calamities of various kinds; but the most remarkable were the plague in 1665, which swept away 68,596 persons, and the fire in 1666, which burnt down 13,200 dwelling-houses: in memory of this last there is an obelisk erected, called the Monument, near the place where it began, one of the most remarkable structures in the city. The Tower of London is very ancient, but the founder uncertain; however, William the Conqueror is said to have built that part of it called the White Tower. It is surrounded by a wall, and partly by a deep ditch, which inclose several streets; besides the Tower properly so called: this contains the great artillery, a magazine of small arms for 60,000 men, and the large horse armoury, among which are 15 figures of kings on horseback. Here are the jewels and ornaments of the crown, as well as the other regalia; the mint for coining of money, and the menagerie for strange birds and beasts. There is one parish-church, and it is under the command of a constable and lieutenant. In Thames-street, near the Tower, is the Custom-house; a large, stately structure, having a delightful prospect of a grove of ships in the river. London bridge is a little farther to the west, which formerly had five houses on each side; but they have some time since been taken down to render the passage more commodious; and the middle arch is now widened, and the whole bridge beautified, Gresham college, in Bishopsgate ward, was built round a court 144 feet square, with bricks, and covered with slate, and near the site of the present Excise-office. There are professors with salaries appointed to read lectures in the different faculties; but now they seldom or never have any auditors, though they always attend in term-time for that purpose, in a room over the Royal Exchange. The Bank of England began to be erected in 1732; and in 1735, about a year after it was finished, a marble statue of William III. was set up in the hall. Great additions have of late years been made to this edifice, which are equally remarkable for their elegance and usefulness. The Royal Exchange in Cornhill is generally allowed to be the finest structure of the kind in the world. It was first built by Sir Thomas Gresham, in the years 1566 and 1567; but being burnt down in 1666, it was rebuilt in a grander manner with Portland-stone: it was finished in 1669, and cost 66,000*l.* The quadrangle within is 144 feet long and 117 broad; and there are piazzas on the outside of the walls, and over them are 24 niches, 19 of which are filled with the statues of the kings and queens of England. In the middle of the area is the statue of Charles II. in a Roman habit. The tower and turret of the lantern is 178 feet high. In the place where Stocks-market was held is the Mansion-house, for the lord-mayor to reside in; the first stone of which was laid in October, 1739. Bow church is admired for the beauty of its steeple; and that of Walbrooke, behind the Mansion-house, for its curious architecture. Guildhall, in Cheapside, is the town house of the city, and the great hall is 153 feet long, 50 broad, and 58 high, and will hold near 7000 people. Besides the two giants, it is embellished with the pictures of Edward the Confessor, king William, queen Mary, queen Anne, George I. queen Caroline, George II. his present majesty, and queen Charlotte; and the monuments of Mr. Beckford, and earl Chatham. Sion-college stands by London-wall, and has a library appropriated to the use of the London clergy. St. Paul's cathedral is allowed to be the finest protestant church in the world, and was built after a model done by Sir Christopher Wren; its length from E. to W. is 463 feet, and, including the portico, 500; and the height, from the ground to the top of the cross, 344 feet. In Wick-lane is the Physician's college, where two of the fellows meet twice in a week to give medicines to the poor gratis: the structure is very fine, but in a manner hid. Surgeons hall is in the Old Bailey, and has been built in the modern taste, since the surgeons separated from the barbers. Christ's hospital was formerly a house of the Grey Friars, and was founded by Edward VI. for the entertainment and education of the poor children of citizens of both sexes: a mathematical school was founded here in 1673, and a writing school in 1604; and the charity has been otherwise increased by a great many noble benefactions. Doctors Commons is not far from St. Paul's, and is a spacious, commodious structure, with several handsome courts, where the judges of admiralty, court of delegates, court of arches, &c. meet. Near it is the heralds college, to which belong three kings at arms, namely, Garter, Clarencieux, and Norroy, with six heralds, four pursuivants, and eight proctors. Near Temple-bar are the Inner and Middle Temple, which are both inns of court for the study of the law. The Temple church was founded at first by the Knights Templars, in 1185, and is now one of the most beautiful Gothic structures in England. There are 12 other inns of court, which it would be too long to dwell upon. Black-Friars bridge, which has been erected within these few years, is at once a proof of the opulence and public spirit of the corporation. The Sessions-house is an elegant new stone building in the Old-Bailey, where they hear and determine criminal causes eight times a year. Adjoining, Newgate prison has been rebuilt; as has also the Fleet-prison in the Fleet market; both of which were set on fire by a riotous mob in June, 1780, but the damage has been since repaired. Bridewell, near Black-Friars bridge, is an hospital and a house of correction. St. Bartholomew's hospital is near W. Smithfield, and contiguous to Christ's hospital, and it is designed for the relief of the sick and lame: the buildings have been greatly enlarged of late. The Lock hospital is near Hyde-park-corner; the Small-pox hospital near Pancras; the Lying-in hospital in Brownlow-street, and another in Aldersgate-street. Besides these, there are St. Thomas's and Guy's hospitals in Southwark, St. George's hospital at Hyde-park-corner, Middlesex-hospital near Oxford-street, the London hospital at Mile-end, Bedlam or Bethlehem hospital, for mad people, in Lower-Moorfields, St. Luke's, for the same purpose, in Old-street, and the magnificent structure in Lamb's-Conduit-fields, called the Foundling hospital. Westminster has long been famous for the palaces of our kings, the seat of our law tribunals, and of the high court of parliament. It is named from its abbey, formerly called a minster, and from its West situation in regard to St. Paul's. The abbey is a truly venerable pile of building, in the Gothic taste, where most of our monarchs have been crowned and buried. It was founded before the year 850; but the present fabric was erected by Henry III. It is 483 feet in length, and 66 in breadth at the W. end, but the cross aisle is 189 feet broad, and the height of the middle roof 92 feet. At the E. end is the chapel of Henry VII. which is so artificially wrought, that Leland calls it the miracle of the world. The screen or fence is entirely brass, and within are the figures of Henry VII. and his queen, of solid brass gilt with gold: but the magnificent monuments in the abbey are so numerous, that it would require a volume to describe them. Westminster hall is near the abbey, and is one of the largest rooms in Europe whose roof is not supported by pillars. Here the law courts are kept, and adjoining are the houses of the lords and commons. Westminster bridge, over the Thames, is universally acknowledged to be a master-piece of art, and superior to any thing of this kind hitherto erected. The new buildings in the liberty of Westminster are increased to a prodigious degree, inasmuch that they reach as far as Marybone to the N. Piccadilly to the S. and Hyde-park wall to the W. Among them are several magnificent squares, as those of Hanover, Grosvenor, Berkeley, Cavendish, Portman, and Bedford. St. James's, Soho, Leicester, Golden, and Bloomsbury, are old squares. To these may be added the magnificent square called Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and several others of less note, both in the city and suburbs. The public schools are, that of St. Paul, merchant-tailors school in Cannon-street, mercers-chapel school in Cheapside, the charter-house, the royal school in Westminster, and St. Martin's school near the King's Mews. The trading part of the city of London is divided into 89 companies; but some can hardly be called so, because they have neither charters, halls, nor liveries. Of these there are 12 principal, of one of which the lord-mayor is usually free; and they are, the mercers, grocers, drapers, fishmongers, goldsmiths, skinners, merchant-tailors, haberdashers, salters, ironmongers, vintners, and cloth-workers. The city magistrates are, the lord-mayor, 26 aldermen, 202 common-councillors, a recorder, 2 sheriffs, a chamberlain, a common serjeant, and a town clerk. The city and liberties of Westminster are governed by a high-steward, an under-steward, a head-bailiff, a high-constable, and 14 burgeses. Places for diversion are, Vauxhall, Ranelagh-gardens, the Pantheon, two play-houses, the opera-house, and the little theatre in the Hay-market. Learned bodies of men, besides the clergy, are the royal society, the college of physicians, and the society of antiquarians. The finest repository of rarities is Sir Hans Sloane's museum, now kept in Great Russel-street. The hackney-coaches are 1000, and the sedan chairs very numerous. There are 22 prisons, 42 markets, 30 squares of all sorts; and the common firing is pit-coal, commonly called sea-coal, of which there are consumed upwards of 700,000 chaldrons every year. This renders the air gross; but then it has a salutary effect, in preventing the city from pestilential distempers; and the same has been observed of some cities in Germany; whereas when wood was the chief fuel, the plague returned every 10 years. London is 400 measured miles S. by E. of Edinburgh, 225 N. W. of Paris, 690 N. by W. of Madrid, 750 N. W. of Rome, 660 W. N. W. of Vienna, 334 S. E. of Dublin, and 190 W. S. W. of Amsterdam. LUKE, St. (one of the four Evangelists) a native, as is generally supposed, of Antioch, the metropolis of Syria, a place renowned for this one peculiar honour, that the disciples of Jesus were here first called Christians. He was, by profession, as appears from the mention made of him by St. Paul, a physician; and some will have him also to have been eminent for painting; but of this we have no accounts that can be depended upon. He became afterwards an inseparable companion and fellow-labourer of the Apostle of the Gentiles in the ministry; attending him in all his travels, accompanying him in his dangerous voyage to Rome, and ministering to him in his necessities. There are different accounts concerning the countries where St. Luke afterwards preached the Gospel: some say, that leaving leaving St. Paul at Rome, he returned back into the East, and travelled through great part of it, preaching the Gospel in Egypt, and the parts of Lybia, where he converted many to christianity; but others think he did not wholly leave St. Paul till the latter had finished his course by martyrdom. Some again say, that he first preached the Gospel in Dalmatia and Galatia, then in Italy and Macedonia, and that with great diligence and success. The ancients are not at all agreed either concerning the time, or place, or manner of his death; of all which such various accounts are given, that it would be tedious here to insert them. He is universally acknowledged to have been the author of the Gospel that goes under his name, and of the book of the Acts of the Apostles, both which he dedicates to Theophilus, whom some writers suppose to have been a person of some eminence, probably at Antioch, converted by St. Luke.

M.

M is the 12th letter, and 9th consonant of the English alphabet: it is pronounced by striking both lips together, whereby the breath is intercepted, and strongly forced through the mouth and nostrils jointly. It is one of those consonants called liquids, or half vowels, and in English words never loses its sound. In the beginning of words it admits no consonant after it, except in some Greek originals; nor does it follow any in that case. In some words, the sound of n after it is lost, as in autumn, sleemn, condemn, &c. as a numeral it stands for 1000, and with a dash over it thus \overline{M} , for a thousand thousand, or a million. In contractions of words we find it thus, M. A. magister artium, master of arts; MSS. manuscripts. In physical prescriptions, it signifies manipulus, a handful; and at the end of a recipe, it means misc, mix or mingle.

MA'DRID, the capital town of Spain, in New Castile, and the place where the king usually reside. It was formerly an inconsiderable place, belonging to the archbishop of Toledo, but the purity of the air engaged the court to remove hither. The streets indeed are very dirty, especially in the morning, for they empty all their nastiness into them; however, the hot rays of the sun soon render them dry. It is very populous, and some pretend that the number of inhabitants amount to 300,000. The houses are all built with bricks, and the streets are long, broad, and straight; being adorned at great distances with handsome fountains. There are above 100 towers or steeples, in different places, which contribute greatly to the embellishment of the city. It is seated in a large plain, surrounded with high mountains, but has no wall, rampart, or ditch. The royal palace is built on an eminence, at the extremity of the city, and, as it is but one story high, does not make any extraordinary appearance. The finest square in Madrid is the Plaza Mayor, which is surrounded with 300 houses 5 stories high, and of an equal height. Every stage is adorned with a handkerchief handsome balcony, and the fronts are supported by columns, which form very fine arches. Here the market is held, and here they have their famous bull-fights. However, it is observable, that the very finest houses have no glass-windows, they being only lattices. Most travellers observe that the streets are generally nasty, and have a very bad smell. When the inhabitants build a house, the first stage belongs to the king, who may either sell, or let it, as he pleases. It is 365 miles N. E. of Lisbon, 690 S. by W. of London, 625 S. S. MARY, daughter of Henry VIII. succeeded to the throne of England, on the death of Edw. VI. which happened July 6, 1553. There were great struggles made at first by the dukes of Northumberland, Suffolk, and others, in favour of lady Jane Grey; but that party being quashed, Mary was crowned October 1: and the parliament, which the court had taken care, by all manner of artifices, and even violence, in managing the elections and returns, to have at their devotion, met on the 10th. As to the lords, though they had most of them professed the Protestant religion, in the reign of Edward, the greatest part of them appeared zealous catholics under queen Mary. This parliament immediately repealed the divorce of the queen's mother, by which they a second time declared the princess Elizabeth illegitimate. Then they made void all the laws concerning religion, restored the mass, and brought all things back to the state they were in at the latter end of Hen. VIII's reign; Gardiner not thinking it advisable as yet to proceed any further. But the queen was impatient to have the pope's full power, and the nation reunited to the holy see. A marriage being in treaty between the emperor's son, Philip of Spain, and queen Mary, the house of commons addressed the queen upon it; at which being offended, she dissolved the parliament. When the parliament was sitting, the convocation decided in favour of transubstantiation, after a sharp disputation between the Protestant and Popish clergy; in which the former, who were but six in the house, were run down with numbers and noise, for want of argument. The treaty of marriage between Philip and Mary was signed Jan. 29, 1554. As soon as it was published, murmurs and complaints were every where heard against it; and an insurrection soon broke out, of which the marriage was either the real or the pretended cause. It was concerted between the duke of Suffolk, Sir Tho. Wyatt, and Sir Peter Carew; but it was soon quelled: On Feb. 12, lady Jane Grey was beheaded, behaving with the utmost resignation and fortitude, after she had seen the headless body of her husband carried along by her from the same execution. And nine days after, the duke of Suffolk, her father, underwent the same fate. In the mean time, Bret, one of Wyatt's captains, was hanged, with 58 of his men; after which, 600 prisoners were brought before the queen, with ropes about their necks, and received their pardon. Wyatt on his trial accused the princess Elizabeth as an accomplice in his conspiracy; but finding he must die, he cleared her of all on his second examination, as also at the place of execution. However, his accusation occasioned the princess to be sent to the Tower, where she endured a long and severe confinement, and was afterward removed a prisoner to Woodstock. A parliament was now to be procured, which should approve of the queen's intended marriage, and restore the pope's authority, both of which the major part of the nation was against, and a great many of those who were for the Roman Catholic religion, thought that the pope's authority was by no means necessary to the church. The parliament, meeting on April 2, approved the treaty of marriage between the queen and Philip, who arrived at Southampton, July 19; and they were married by Gardiner on the 25th, Philip being 29 years old, but Mary 38. The same day they were proclaimed king and queen of England, France, and Naples, with other titles. Care was taken by the articles of marriage, that Philip should have no share in the government of England. The parliament meeting again Nov. 11, Pole was at last left sent for over, in quality of the pope's legate, and arrived the 24th. He opened his legation before the king, queen, and both houses of parliament, telling them the design of it was to bring back the straying sheep to the fold of Christ. On Nov. 29, the grand work of reconciling the kingdom to the pope was effected. Popery being now fully established, the spirit of it soon appeared in the most violent and bloody persecution against the Protestants. Pole was for reducing them by gentle means, without any force or corporal punishments; but Gardiner's violent counsels were most agreeable to the court and the rest of the bishops. It was therefore resolved to leave to him the business of extirpating heresy, which he afterwards transferred to Bonner, bishop of London, who was, if possible, more furious and bloody than himself. The first sacrifice to popish zeal and bigotry was Hooper, who had been bishop of Gloucester; and before the end of the year no less than 67 persons were burnt. The so-much-expected deliverance of the queen, which had elated the Romish party to the highest degree, proved only a false conception, which cast them down as much. And king Philip, now despairing of issue by his queen, whereby he hoped to have united the monarchies of Spain and England, and growing weary of her, as she was neither young, nor handsome, left England on Sept. 4, to the no small mortification of the queen. Soon after, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, died. On March 21, 1556, Cranmer was burnt; and 83 perished in the flames under Bonner's management, who discovered on these occasions more than brutal cruelty. Pole succeeded Cranmer in the archbishopric of Canterbury. The following year, 79 Protestants underwent the same fiery trial; nor could the dead escape the effects of popish malice. The bones of Fajius and Bucer were dug up and burnt at Cambridge, after they had been ridiculously cited before the commissioners to give an account of their faith. Whilst the queen and court were wholly intent upon these violent methods for suppressing heresy, they suffered themselves to be seduced by Spanish counsels to a rupture with France. They gained a great victory over the French at St. Quintin; but at the same time they lost Calais, which this nation had been in possession of ever since the reign of Edward III. the duke of Guise making himself master of it the beginning of the year 1558; as also of Guisnes, and the castle of Hames, which were the only remains of the English conquests in France. The loss of Calais occasioned great uneasiness and murmurings among the people; and the queen herself was so sensibly touched with it, that she told those about her, "That she should die, and if they would know the cause, they must dissect her after her death, and they should find Calais at her heart." She died Nov. 17, 1558, in the forty-third year of her age, when she had reigned five years, four months, and eleven days. In the four years in which the persecution lasted, near 300 persons were put to death, viz. one archbishop, four bishops, 21 divines, eight gentlemen, 84 artificers, 100 husbandmen, servants, and labourers, 26 wives, 20 widows, nine virgins, two boys, and two infants; besides which, several died in prison, and many were whipt, or otherwise cruelly treated. The characteristics of Mary were bigotry and revenge; add to this, she was proud, imperious, froward, avaricious, and wholly destitute of every agreeable qualification.

MUSE, [muze] f. deep thought or study; a close and intense application of the mind to any object. "With admiration and deep muze," Milt. A deity, supposed by the heathens, to preside over works of genius, and to aid the writer in any particular branch of science, when addressed to; from muza, Lat. muza, Gr. The Muses were certain fabulous divinities among the Pagans, supposed to preside over the arts and sciences. Some reckon no more than three of them, viz. Mneme, Aede, and Melete; i. e. memory, singing, and meditation; but Homer and Hesiod reckon nine, viz. Clio, which means glory; Euterpe, pleasing; Thalia, flourishing; Melpomene, attracting; Terpsichore, rejoicing the heart; Erato, the amiable; Polyhymnia, a multitude of songs; Urania, the heavenly; and Calliope, sweetest of voice. To Clio they attributed the invention of history; to Melpomene, tragedy; to Thalia, comedy; to Euterpe, the use of the flute; to Terpsichore, the harp; to Erato, the lyre and lute; to Calliope, heroic verse; to Urania, astrology; and to Polyhymnia, rhetoric.

To MUSE, [muze] v. n. [muza, Lat.] to apply the mind with intention to any subject; to study, or revolve in the mind; to be absent of mind; to wonder.

MUSE'UM, [muzeum] f. [muzeion, Gr.] a name which originally signified a part of the palace of Alexandria, which took up at least one fourth of that city. This quarter was called the Museum, from its being set apart for the Muses and the study of the sciences. Here were lodged and entertained the men of learning, who were divided into many companies or colleges, according to the sciences of which they were the professors; and to each of these houses or colleges was allotted a handsome revenue. The foundation of this establishment is attributed to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who here placed his library. Hence the word Museum is now applied to any place set apart as a repository for things that have an immediate relation to the arts. The Museum at Oxford, called Ashmolean Museum, is a noble pile of building, erected for that purpose. And the Museum of the late Sir Hans Sloane contains a noble and valuable collection of the productions of nature and art, and has been lately purchased by the public, for the benefit of the nation.

N

N Is a liquid consonant, and semi-vowel; the thirteenth letter in the English alphabet, having an invariable sound: after m it is almost lost, as in condemn. In the beginning of words or syllables, it suffers no consonant immediately after it; nor any before it, except g, k, and s, as in gnaw, know, snail, &c. In composition, before an l, b, p, and m, the n is frequently changed into an m, and before an l and r into an l and r, according to the custom of the Romans, as illicit, for illicit; impress, for impress; irreverent, for irreverent. When used for a numeral, N stands for 600, and with a dash over it thus N, for 600,000. In the abbreviations it is likewise used for numero or number; as No. V. i. e. number 5.

NA'PLES, an ancient, large, rich, and trading city of Italy, capital of a kingdom of the same name, with an archbishop's see, an university, and four castles. It is 15 miles in circumference, and has several large suburbs, in which, and the city, they reckon 300 000 inhabitants. The king's palace is extremely large, and magnificently furnished. The convents and churches are surprizingly rich, and it is a doubt whether those at Rome surpass them or not. The finest building of all is the cathedral, and the chapel where the blood of St. Januarius is kept. In this city they make excellent soap, fine cloths, and all sorts of stuffs; and their wine and oil are excellent, and in great plenty. The air is pure, serene, and healthy, and the weather in winter is very mild. In short, it would be a perfect paradise, if they were not liable to frequent earthquakes. The harbour is large enough to contain 500 vessels, where they may ride secure. It is 208 miles S. E. of Rome. Lon. 14. 20. E. lat. 40. 55. N.

NIGH, [the gh in this word and its following derivatives is mute in pronunciation; as, ni, nily, &c.] prep. [nyb, Sax.] not far from. SYNON. I will leave it to the decision of the curious, whether or no the word near is not a corruption of nigber, the comparative of nigb. Be this as it may, near, in my opinion, implies a less distance than nigb. Thus I should say, when we come nigb to such a place, we shall be near home; the nigber the enemy, the nearer the danger. As a further proof of this, speaking of the close ties of kindred, we use the word near, in preference to that of nigb, as implying a less distance, or greater degree of consanguinity between the two persons. Thus, my brother's child is my near relation, or is nearly related to me.

NORTHALLERTON, a town in Yorkshire, which sends two members to parliament, and has a market on Wednesday. Distant 223 miles from London.

NORTHAMPTON, the shire town of Northamptonshire, with a market on Saturdays. It had seven churches, which are now reduced to four; and the great one, called Allhallows, stands in the middle of the town, and is adorned with a handsome portico. It was in a great measure destroyed by a fire in 1765, but was soon rebuilt, with a handsome, spacious market-place; and, in general, is a well-built, handsome town, where the affizes are kept, as well as the quarter-sessions, and sends two members to parliament. It has the title of an earldom, a good free-school, two almshouses, an infirmary, and a gaol. It is 66 miles N. W. by N. of London.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, an inland county bounded on the E. by Huntingdonshire, with part of Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire, on the N. by Leicestershire and Rutlandshire, on the W. by Warwickshire, and on the S. by Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire. It contains 136 parishes, 13 market-towns, and sends 9 members to parliament.

The principal rivers are, the Ouse, the Nen, the Welland, the Cherwell, and the Learn. It is a healthful, sporting country, containing a great number of gentlemen's seats, and the soil is fertile in corn and grass.

It contains 460 parishes, 19 market-towns, and sends six members to parliament. The air is sharp, and very cold in the winter, from the snow lying on the tops of the hills, which are at a distance from the sea. But the land on the sea-coast is plain and fruitful, and the great plenty of coals that this country produces is generally known. Newcastle is the principal town.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a county of N. America, in Virginia, lying at the mouth of the river Potowmac.

NORTHWARD, a. towards the north.

NO'RTHWARD, or NO'RTHWARDS, ad. towards the north.

NORTH-WEST, f. the point, or trunk, in the middle between the north and west.

NORTHWICH a town in Cheshire, with a market on Fridays. Distance from London 172½ miles.

NORTH-WIND, f. the wind that blows from the north.

NO'RWAY, a kingdom of Europe, situated between 4 and 30 degrees east longitude, and between 58 and 72 degrees north latitude, bounded by the Atlantic ocean on the north and west; by Sweden, Lapland, and other provinces of Sweden on the east; and by the sea called Categat and Schagdrac on the south. It is a cold, barren country, subject to Denmark.

NORWICH, the capital of Norfolk, with three markets, on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays. It is a very ancient place, has 18 gates, and 36 parish-churches, besides the cathedral, which is a handsome structure, with a lofty steeple. It is a city and county, and sends two members to parliament, and is also a bishop's see, where the bishop has a palace, as also the duke of Norfolk. It is governed by a mayor, a recorder, 12 aldermen, 3 sheriffs, and 21 common-council; and, besides the above churches, it has five dissenting meeting-meeting-houses, and a Romish chapel: It has a large and flourishing manufactory in the worsted way, as camblets, crapes, &c. for which it has a great trade, both at home and abroad. It is 109 miles N. E. by N. of London.

NOSE, [nōze], f. [nāse, Sax.] that part of a human body which is prominent in the middle of the face, and is the organ of smelling, and the emunctory of the brain. The end of any thing which is perforated or hollow. "The nose of a bellows." Scent, or the power of distinguishing or discovering by the smell. "We are not offended with a dog for a better nose than his master." Collier. To lead by the nose, signifies to drag by force, alluding to the manner of leading a bear, by means of a ring fixed to his nose; to have so much influence over a person as to make him do what you please. To thrust one's nose into the affairs of another, is to concern ourselves with the affairs of others without being invited, or to be officious, or a busy body. To put one's nose out of joint, is to deprive us of the affections of another.

NOSTRUM, f. [Lat. it is our own] a medicine not made public, with respect to its ingredients.

NOT, ad. [ne aubt, Sax.] a particle used in denoting denial and refusal: in a negative proposition it is placed in the first branch, and is answered by nor. SYNON. Not barely expresses the negation: not strengthens, and seems to affirm it. The first often denies the thing in part only, or with limitation: the second denies it always absolutely, wholly, and without reserve. Thus we say, he has not money; he has not patience; meaning he is not overburdened with either: but when we say, he has no money, he has no patience, we would be understood to say he has none at all. It is on account of this limitation that the word not is generally used in company with those words that mark either the degree of quality, or quantity; such as MUCH, VERY, ONE, and the like. There is not, commonly, much money to be found in the possession of men of letters. The major part of those who frequent divine service, are not very devout. It often happens that he, who has not one single penny in his pocket, is much happier than many rich men.

NOTORIOUSLY, ad. in a public, evident, or open manner.

NOTORIOUSNESS, f. the quality of being universally or generally known.

NOTTINGHAM, the county town of Nottinghamshire, with two markets, on Wednesdays and Saturdays. It contains three parish-churches, and four meeting houses. Its chief manufacture is in wove stockings, though they make a great deal of malt and earthen ware. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, six aldermen, two sheriffs, 18 common council, two chamberlains, and two coroners; and sends two members to parliament. It is 123 miles N. by W. of London.

NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the E. by Lincolnshire, on the W. by Derbyshire and Yorkshire, on the S. by Leicestershire, and on the N. by Yorkshire. It contains 168 parishes, and nine market-towns, and sends eight members to parliament. The air is good and healthful, but the soil is different; that to the E. near the rivers being fertile in corn and pastures, and that to the W. more barren, a great part of it being taken in by the forest of Sherwood, famous for Robin Hood and his companions. This has several coal mines, is full of game, and the soil is sandy. Besides these, it produces a soft sort of alabaster, which being burnt, is used for making of floors in the upper rooms.

NOTUS, f. [Lat.] the fourth wind.

NOTWITHSTANDING, conj. without any hindrance or obstruction. "Their gratitude made them, notwithstanding his prohibition, proclaim the wonders." Dec. of Piety. Although. "Notwithstanding it will weaken him." Addison. Nevertheless; however. "They that honour the law, are notwithstanding to know." Hooker.

NOVA-SCOTIA. See ACADIA.

OXFORD, the capital of Oxfordshire, with two markets, on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

It is a city, a bishop's see, and an university, and, besides the cathedral, has 13 parish-churches. It is seated at the confluence of the rivers Isis and Cherwell, on an eminence almost surrounded with meadows, except on the E. side. The whole town, with the suburbs, is of a circular form, three miles in circumference. It consists chiefly of two spacious streets, which cross each other in the middle of the town. The university contains 20 colleges, and five halls, several of which stand in the streets, and give the city an air of magnificence. In short, it is taken altogether, there is not such another group of buildings, nor such another university in the world; which all travellers that have seen it confess. In point of situation, it has much the advantage of Cambridge for health and pleasure. It is governed by a mayor and aldermen, in subjection to the chancellor and vice-chancellor of the university. It sends four members to parliament, two for the university, and two for the city, and is 58 miles W. by N. of London.

P Is the fifteenth letter, and eleventh consonant of our alphabet, and is formed by a slight compression of the anterior part of the lips, as pull, put, pot, and has nearly the sound of b. Where p stands before t or s, its sound is lost; as in psalms, pseudo-prophets, Ptolemy, pijsun, &c. When it stands before b it has the sound of f; as in physic, philosopher, pbesporus, and in most other words; but in pbisic, and some Greek words, the pb is not pronounced. Used as a numeral letter it stood for 400, but with a dash on the top, thus, \overline{P} , for 400,000. Among medical writers it stands for pugil, or the eighth part of a handful. In Italian, music it stands for piano, or soft, and shews that the force of the voice or instrument is to be lessened. PP implies piu piana, more soft, and PPP pianissimo, the softest possible. P.M. in Astronomy, stands for post meridian, or afternoon.

PARIS, the capital of France, and one of the largest and most populous cities in Europe. It is divided into three parts, the town, the city, and the university; and there are 20 cantons, called quarters, wherein are 967 thorough-fare streets, and 85 through which there are no passages; 50,000 houses, of which 500 are very large, and are called hotels; 52 parishes, and 20 churches, besides 20 chapier and collegiate churches; as also 80 churches and chapels which are not parochial; 3 abbeys of men, and 5 of women; 53 convents and communities of monks, and 70 nunneries and communities of women, which makes 131 in all. There are also 3 ecclesiastical jurisdictions, and 31 secular; 57 colleges, of which 10 are made great use of; 15 seminaries, 26 hospitals, 12 prisons, 50 public squares, 66 public fountains, 30 quays, 12 markets, 30 bridges great and small, 8 gardens and public walks, 64 boards of barriers for the law, 22 boards for the finances, farms, commerce, and other affairs; 12,000 coaches, 5800 lamps, 800 officers on horseback and archers on foot, 100 watch for the safety of the city, whose gates are guarded by 177 men; and about 800,000 inhabitants, of which near 200,000 are servants. This enumeration will not be surprising, when it is considered that Paris is surrounded by 7 large suburbs. As soon as day appears, some hundreds of carts, like those of our nightmen in London, carry off the filth from before the doors of the houses. In the day there are a Corps de Gard in every street, to take care of the publick safety; and in the night, horse and foot which patrol through the streets to prevent disorders. Paris is an archbishoprick, and Notre Dame is the metropolitan church; it is a superb structure, supported by 120 columns; the body of the church is 174 feet in length, 60 in breadth, and 100 in height; the towers or steeples are also very fine. The university at Paris is the most ancient in Europe, it having been founded by Charlemagne in 790; it is composed of three colleges, of which that for divinity is called the Sorbonne. The most remarkable buildings are, the Louvre, the palace of the Thuilleries, the royal palace of Luxemburg, the hotel of invalids, the hotel of the city, or town-house, the Bastille, the hall where the courts of justice sit, the Val de Grace, the cathedral, and the church of St. Sulpice. The Chatelet is an old castle, wherein the chief magistrates administer justice. Paris is very pleasantly seated on the river Seine, which runs through the middle of it. The principal bridges are, the Pont-Neuf, whereon is the equestrian statue of Henry IV. and Pont-Royal. It is 70 miles S. of Rouen, 225 S. E. of London, 625 N. W. of Vienna, and 625 N. E. of Madrid. Lon. 2. 25. E. lat. 48. 50. N. We forgot to mention that many of the houses are 7 stories high.
