STATE (Lat. stare, to place, establish). A body politic, or society of men, united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage, by the joint efforts of their combined strength. Cooley, Const. Lim. 1. A self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defence of their rights and to do right and justice to foreigners. In this sense, the state means the whole people united into one body politic; and the state, and the people of the state, are equivalent expressions. 2 Dall. 425; 3 id. 93; 2 Wilson, Lect. 120; 1 Story, Const., 5th ed. §§ 208, 209. So, frequently, are state and nation; 7 Wall. 720. See Morse, Citizenship; Wheat. Int. L. 17; but it is said that "a state is distinguished from a nation or a people, since the former may be composed of different races of men all subject to the same supreme authority. . . . The same nation or people may be subject to, or compose, several distinct and separate states. . . The terms nation and people are frequently used by writers on international law as synonymous terms for state." 1 Halleck, Int. L. 66.

Another writer commenting on the definition of Cicero which is substantially that first above given, says: "This definition is not complete without some additions and restrictions. A state must be an organization of people for political ends; it must permanently occupy a fixed territory; it must possess an organized government capable of making and enforcing law within the community; and, finally, to be a sovereign state it must not be subject to any external control. Thus a company of men united for commercial purposes cannot be a state in the sense held in international law; neither can a tribe of wandering people, nor a community, be so considered if their government is permanently incapable of enforcing its own laws or its obligations toward other states.

So long as a state possesses the requisite attributes mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, international law does not concern itself with the form of its government; it may be an absolute monarchy, a limited monarchy, or a republic; it may be a centralized state or a federal union; or it may change from one to another of these forms at will, without in the least affecting its position in the view of international law; Snow, Int. L. 19.

A state neither loses any of its rights nor is discharged from any of its duties, by a change in the form of its civil government. The body politic is still the same, though it may have a different organ of communication. So if a state should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, those rights are to be enjoyed, and those obligations fulfilled, by all the parts in common; Snow, Cas. Int. L. 21. The same writer also thus states the distinctions between a state and a nation: "Though the terms are frequently used interchangeably, strictly speaking, a nation is composed of people of the same race, whereas a state may be composed of several nations. The Jews are considered to be a nation, while Austria-Hungary, as a state, is composed of three distinct races: Germanic, Slavic, and Magyar. This distinction has in recent years become of importance from the fact of the movements towards the unity of races, each under one state. Thus we have the Pan-Slavic movement, the Irridentist party in Italy, and various other minor cases." Snow, Int. L. 20. This distinction, however, cannot be said to be at present recognized to the extent here suggested.

The actual organization of governmental powers: thus, the actual government of the state is designated by the name of the state; hence the expression, the state has passed such a law or prohibited such an act.

The section of territory occupied by a state: as, the state of Pennsylvania.

A union of two or more states under a common sovereign is called a personal union where there is no incorporation, but the component parts are united with equality of rights, as in the case, by way of illustration, when Great Britain and Ireland and Hanover were under one prince but without any interdependence. On the other hand, a real union of different states is where there is a merging of the separate sovereignties in a new and general one, at least as to all international relations; as, in the case of the union of Hungary, Bohemia, and other states prior to 1849. An incorporate union is where there is one sovereign government, though there may be a separate subordinate administration; Halleck, Int. L. §§ 11, 12, 13.

One of the commonwealths which form the United States of America.

As to the relation between the state and the United States, see UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The District of Columbia and the territorial districts of the United States are not states within the meaning of the constitution and of the Judiciary Act, so as to enable a citizen thereof to sue a citizen of one of the states in the federal courts: 2 Cra. 445; 1 Wheat. 91; 15 C. L. J. 308. But the District of Columbia is a "State of the Union," within the meaning of the treaty of 1853 between the United States and France, relieving Frenchmen from the disability of alienage in disposing of and inheriting property; 133 U. S. 258.

The several states composing the United States are sovereign and independent in all things not surrendered to the national government by the constitution, and are considered, on general principles, by each other as foreign states: yet their mutual relations are rather those of domestic independence than of foreign alienation; Miller, Const. 103; 7 Cra. 481; 3 Wheat. 324.

A state can be sued only by its own consent; 82 Va. 721; 134 U. S. 1. See 40 La. Ann. 856. But under the constitution of the United States the supreme court has original jurisdiction of suits by one state against another, and this jurisdiction has been frequently exercised, particularly in cases involving boundary disputes between the states.

A suit by a non-resident insurance company which seeks an injunction to restrain the state superintendent of insurance from revoking its license to do business in the state, is a suit against the state, and a federal court has no jurisdiction; 81 Fed. Rep. 888. So it was held that an effort to enjoin state officers charged with the collection of taxes, and seeking to establish exemption from taxation under the state laws and the repayment of amounts previously collected, was, to all intents and purposes, a suit against the state, and in part for the recovery of money, and that the state court had no jurisdiction; 35 Fla. 625. Suits to enjoin state officers either from assessing or enforcing taxes, without authority or warrant under the state laws, is not a suit against the state within the prohibition of the eleventh amendment to the constitution of the United States; 58 Fed. Rep. 620: neither is a suit against the railroad commissioners of the state to restrain the enforcement of their regulations as unjust and unreasonable, at least if the state has no pecuniary interest in the railroad; 154 U. S. 362; 57 Fed. Rep. 436; nor a suit in equity against state land commissioners to restrain them from acts alleged to be in violation of the plaintiff's contract of purchase of the lands from the state; 140 U. S. 1; 43 Fed. Rep. 196, 338. An injunction may be granted against a state board of officers to restrain them from proceeding against a corporation engaged in interstate commerce, for failure to comply with state and statutory regulations, and this is held not to be against the state; 60 Fed. Rep. 186. Nor is a proceeding for contempt in the federal courts against a state officer who has seized property in the hands of a receiver in attempting to collect a tax alleged to be illegal and attacked by proceeding in the federal court, in any sense a suit against the state; 149 U. S. 164.

A state cannot be sued to recover the amount due to the holders of its bonds; 134 U. S. 1; nor will a suit be maintained against a state auditor to compel the levying of a special tax for the benefit of holders of its bonds, since that is in effect a suit against the state; id. 22. Actions held to be properly suits against the state and therefore not maintainable, are, against the state board of agriculture to recover money alleged to be wrongfully collected by it as a license tax; 111 N. C. 135; a suit by a private citizen to enjoin the erection of a public building at a place other than that prescribed by law; 24 Ore. 553; a suit to determine the rights of conflicting claimants to a fund granted by congress to the states for agricultural colleges; 56 Fed. Rep. 55.

The rights and immunities of a foreign state belong to her only within her own jurisdiction and territory, and, when she becomes a suitor in the courts of a foreign state, she is treated as a foreign private corporation; 29 W. Va. 326. See SOVEREIGN.

When a state brings a suit against citizens, she thereby voluntarily accepts all the conditions which affect ordinary suitors, except that no affirmative judgment, as for the payment of costs, can be rendered against her; and if the cause is removed to a federal court it will proceed in the same manner as a suit between individuals; 56 Fed. Rep. 329. So where the state has brought a suit in equity and the cause has been removed to a federal court, the defendant may there file a cross bill against the state; 60 Fed. Rep. 552; but if the cross bill seeks any affirmative relief against the state, it cannot be filed, under a constitutional provision that the state shall not be made a defendant in any court of law or equity; 100 Ala. 80; nor can a cross demand be maintained against a state; 46 La. Ann. 431; id. 55; 37 id. 623.

While a state cannot be compelled by suit to perform its contracts, any attempt on its part to violate property or rights acquired under its contracts may be judicially resisted; and any law impairing the obligation of contracts under which such property or rights are held is void; 134 U. S. 1.

As to whether states can be compelled to pay their debts, see 12 Am. L. Rev. 625; 15 id. 519.

In Society. That quality which belongs to a person in society, and which secures to and imposes upon him different rights and duties in consequence of the difference of that quality.

In Practice. To make known specifically; to explain particularly: as, to state an account or to show the different items in an account; to state the cause of action in a declaration.

STATEMENT. The act of stating, reciting, or presenting verbally or on paper. 91 Tenn. 168. See PARTICULAR STATEMENT.

STATEMENT OF AFFAIRS. In English bankruptcy practice, the giving by the debtor of a list of creditors, secured and unsecured with the value of the securities, a list of bills discounted, and a statement of his property. Bank. Act 1869, § 19.

STATEMENT OF CLAIM. The specification of the plaintiff's cause of action. See DECLARATION. The term is now used in Pennsylvania under the Practice Act of 1887.

It is not a legitimate function of a statement of claim to reply to an anticipated affirmative defence; 84 Fed. Rep. 102.

STATE'S EVIDENCE. See KING'S EVIDENCE; PROVER.

STATING-PART OF A BILL. See BILL.

STATION. In Civil Law. A place where ships may ride in safety. Dig. 49. 12. 1. 13; 50. 15. 59.

A place where railroad trains regularly come to a stand, for the convenience of passengers, taking in fuel, discharging freight, or the like. Webst.

A railroad company may exclude from its stations all persons except those using or desirous of using the railway, and may impose upon the rest of the public any terms it may deem proper as the condition of admittance; [1897] A. C. 479; to the same effect, 18 C. B. 46.

Discrimination between competing omnibus lines at a railroad depot, by giving one of them a more favorable stand than is allowed to the other, where both are given access to the grounds, is insufficient to constitute any legal ground of complaint against the railroad company; 37 L. R. A. (Ind.) 376. See RAILROAD.

STATIONERS' HALL. The hall of the Stationers' Company at which every person claiming copyright must register his title, and without such registration no action shall be commenced against persons infringing it.

STATIST. A statesman; a politician; one skilled in government.

STATU LIBERI (Lat.). In Louisiana. Slaves for a time, who had acquired the right of being free at a time to come, or on a condition which was not fulfilled, or in a certain event which had not happened, but who in the meantime remained in a state of slavery. La. Civ. Code, art. 37. See 3 La. 176; 6 id. 571; 4 Mart. La. 102; 8 id. 219. This is substantially the definition of the civil law. Hist. de la Jur. l. 40; Dig. 40. 7. 1; Code 7. 2. 13.

STATUS (Lat.). The condition of persons. The movement of progressive societies has been from status to contract; Maine, Anc. Law 170. It also means estate, because it signifies the condition or circumstances in which the owner stands with regard to his property.

STATUS QUO. The existing state of things at any given date.

STATUS QUO ANTE BELLUM. A phrase used in international law to indicate the condition of the territory of a belligerent and the ownership of the property of the subjects of such belligerent, as they existed prior to the breaking out of war, which, under the stipulations of some treaties of peace are restored to their former ownership. In other treaties, a belligerent who has possession of an enemy's territory or property at the end of the war retains it. See TREATY OF PEACE; UTI POSSIDETIS.

STATUTE. A law established by the act of the legislative power. An act of the legislature. The written will of the legislature, solemnly expressed according to the forms necessary to constitute it the law of the state.

This word is used to designate the written law in contradistinction to the unwritten law. See COMMON LAW.

Among the civilians, the term statute is generally applied to laws and regulations of every sort; every provision of law which ordains, permits, or prohibits anything is designated a statute, without considering from what source it arises. Sometimes the word is used in contradistinction to the imperial Roman law, which, by way of eminence, civilians call the common law. Wharton.

A negative statute is one expressed in negative terms, and so controls the common law that it has no force in opposition to the statute. Bac. Abr. Statute (G).

An affirmative statute is one which is enacted in affirmative terms.

Such a statute does not necessarily take away the common law; Co. 2d Inst. 200; if, for example, a statute without negative words declares that when certain requisites shall have been complied with, deeds shall have a certain effect as evidence, this does not prevent their being used in evidence, though the requisites have not been complied with, in the same manner they might have been before the statute was passed; 2 Caines 169; or a custom; 6 Cl. & F. 41. Nor does such an affirmative statute repeal a precedent statute if the two can both be given effect; Dwarris, Statute 474. The distinction between negative and affirmative statutes has been considered inaccurate; 13 Q. B. 33.

A declaratory statute is one which is passed in order to put an end to a doubt as to what is the common law or the meaning of another statute, and which declares what it is and ever has been.

Penal statutes are those which command or prohibit a thing under a certain penalty. Bac. Abr. A statute affixing a penalty to an act, though it does not in words prohibit it, thereby makes it illegal; 14 Johns. 273; 1 Binn. 110; 37 E. L. & E. 475; 14 N. H. 294; 4 Ia. 490; 7 Ind. 77. See, as to the construction of penal statutes, 2 Cr. L. Mag. Jan. 81; 49 Fed. Rep. 360; 120 U. S. 678; 134 id. 624; Bish. Stat. Cr. 226; PENAL STATUTES.

A perpetual statute is one for the continuance of which there is no limited time, although it be not expressly declared to be so.

If a statute which did not itself contain any limitation is to be governed by another which is temporary only, the former will also be temporary and dependent upon the existence of the latter. Bac. Abr. Statute (D).

Private statutes or acts are those of which the judges will not take notice without pleading; such as concern only a particular species or person. See 1 Bla. Com. 86. Special or private acts are regarded as "rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operated on particular persons and private concerns" (cited with approval in 104 U. S. 447, where it was held that where an act amends a general act it is a public act).

Private statutes may be rendered public by being so declared by the legislature; 1 Bla. Com. 85; 4 Co. 76. And see 1 Kent 459. In England private statutes are said not to bind strangers; though they should contain any saving of their rights. A general saving clause used to be inserted in all private bills; but it is settled that, even if such saving clause be omitted, the act will bind none but the parties. But this doctrine does not seem to be applicable to this country.

Public statutes are those of which the courts will take judicial notice without pleading or proof.

They are either general or local,—that is, have operation throughout the state at large, or within a particular locality. It is not easy to say what degree of limitation will render an act local. Thus, it has been held that a public act relating to one county only is not local within the meaning of a constitutional provision which forbids enactments of local bills embracing more than one subject; 5 N. Y. 285; 2 Sandf. 355.

A remedial statute is one made to supply such defects or abridge such superfluities in the common law as may have been discovered. 1 Bla. Com. 86.

These remedial statutes are themselves divided into enlarging statutes, by which the common law is made more comprehensive and extended than it was before, and into restraining statutes, by which it is narrowed down to that which is just and proper. The term remedial statute is also applied to those acts which give the party injured a remedy; and in some cases such statutes are penal; Esp. Pen. Acts 1.

A temporary statute is one which is limited in its duration at the time of its enactment.

It continues in force until the time of its limitation has expired, unless sooner repealed. A statute which by reason of its nature has only a single and temporary operation—e. g. an appropriation bill—is also called a temporary statute.

There is also a distinction in England between general and special statutes. The former affect the whole community, or large and important sections, the interest of which may be identical with those of the whole body. Special statutes relate to private interests, and deal with the affairs of persons, places, classes, etc., which are not of a public character. Wilb. Stat. 218. See 104 U. S. 447.

Local statute is used by Lord Mansfield as opposed to personal statute, which relates to personal transitory contracts; whereas a local statute refers to things in a certain jurisdiction alone; e. g. the statute of frauds relates only to things in England; 1 W. Bla. 246.

As to mandatory and directory statutes, it is said that when the provision of a statute is the essence of the thing required to be done, it is mandatory; otherwise, when it relates to form and manner; and where an act is incident, or after jurisdiction acquired, it is directory merely; 58 N. H. 17. See, also, 2 Ky. L. Rep. 166.

Expository statutes. Acts passed for the purpose of affecting the construction to be placed upon prior acts. They are often expressed thus: "The true intent and meaning of an act passed . . . be and is hereby declared to be;" "the provisions of the act shall not hereafter extend"; or "are hereby declared and enacted not to apply," and the like. This is a common mode of legislation. "It is always competent to change an existing law by a declaratory statute; and where the statute is only to operate on future cases it is no objection to its validity that it assumes the law to have been in the past what it is now declared that it shall be in the future." Cooley, Const. Lim. 94; such acts are binding upon the courts, although the latter, without such a direction, would have understood the language to have meant something different. They have the same effect upon the construction of former acts, in the absence of intervening rights, as if they had been embodied in the former act at the time of its passage; Endlich, Interpr. Stat. 365. See Pomeroy's Sedgw. Constr. Stat. Law 214; Sutherl. Stat. Constr. sec. 402.

A statute declaring the meaning of a prior act, etc., will not be construed to be an invasion of the judicial function, but will be treated as a direct enactment controlling the meaning of the prior act; 24 Fed. Rep. 667. But it has been held that the legislature cannot pass an act so as to compel the courts in the future to adopt a particular construction of an earlier statute; 172 Pa. 140, Mitchell, J., dissenting: but see 122 id. 627; 68 id. 45, where the doctrine seems to have been confined to retrospective legislation.

See an article in 35 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 25, by William M. Meigs.

It is a general rule that when the provision of a statute is general, everything which is necessary to make such provision effectual is supplied by the common law; Co. Litt. 235; Co. 2d Inst. 222; and when a power is given by statute, everything necessary for making it effectual is given by implication: quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest; 12 Co. 130.

The provisions of a statute cannot be evaded by any shift or contrivance; 2 B. & C. 655. Whatever is prohibited by law to be done directly cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance; 7 Cl. & F. 540.

The mode of enacting laws in the United States is regulated by the constitution of the Union and of the several states respectively. The advantage of having a law officer, or board of officers, to revise bills and amendments of bills during their progress through the legislature, has been somewhat discussed. See Reports of Eng. Stat. Law Com. 1856, 1857; Street, Council of Revision; 5 Rep. Am. Bar Assn.

Enacting legislation. As to formalities required it has been held that a statute which the legislative journals showed was never passed, was valid because signed by the presiding officers of the legislature; 22 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 16, 120; and that it is not admissible to prove that an act signed by the governor was in fact passed by the legislature and sent to him within two days next preceding the final adjournment of the legislature in violation of the constitution; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1050.

The signing by the speaker of the United States house of representatives, and by the president of the senate, in open session, of an enrolled bill, is an official attestation by the two houses that such bill has passed congress, and when the bill thus attested, receives the approval of the president, and is deposited in the department of state its authentication as a bill that has passed congress is complete and unimpeachable; 143 U. S. 649.

See JOURNALS, where this subject is treated.

Evidence that individual members were mistaken as to facts is inadmissible to effect legislative action; 36 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 1019.

As to whether the president has the power to sign bills after the adjournment of congress, Attorney-General Wirt was of the opinion that he had not, and President Monroe acted on his opinion. President Lincoln signed the act of March 12, 1863, after the adjournment of congress. A house committee subsequently reported that in their opinion the act was not in force, but the house never acted upon their report. The court of claims holds that this act has been recognized by the supreme court, and was therefore valid; see 32 Amer. Law Rev. 211; 29 Ct. Cl. 549.

Attorney-General Garland advised President Cleveland that he was without authority to sign a bill after adjournment.

In 29 Ct. Cl. 523, it was held that the president had the power to sign bills after the adjournment of congress. In cases arising under state constitutions, it was held in 2 Cal. 165; 50 Miss. 802, that the power to sign a bill ceased with the adjournment, but under the language of the Illinois constitution, a signature after adjournment was held valid; 103 U. S. 423.

In 21 N. Y. 517, it was held, under a constitutional provision almost identical with that of the constitution of the United States, that a signature after adjournment was valid. And this was followed in 22 La. Ann. 545.

Much interesting discussion has arisen on the question whether a statute which appears to be contrary to the laws of God and nature, and to right reason, is void. Earlier dicta in the affirmative (see 8 Co. *118 a; 12 Mod. 687) are not now considered to be law; L. R. 6 C. P. 582. See Dwarris, Stat. 482. The question as applicable to this country is treated under CONSTITUTIONAL. It being historically true that the American people are a religious people, as shown by the religious objects expressed by the original grants and charters of the colonies, and the recognition of religion in the most solemn acts of their history, as well as in the constitutions of the states and the nation, the courts, in construing statutes, should not impute to any legislature a purpose of action against religion; 143 U. S. 457.

In the United States, a statute which contravenes a provision of the constitution of the state by whose legislature it was enacted, or of the constitution of the United States, is in so far void. See CONSTITUTIONAL. The presumption, however, is that every state statute the object and provision of which are among the acknowledged powers of legislation is valid and constitutional: and such presumption is not to be overcome unless the contrary is clearly demonstrated; 6 Cra. 87; 1 Cow. 564; 7 N. Y. 109. Where a part only of a statute is unconstitutional, the rest is not void, if it can stand by itself; 1 Gray 1; Bish. Writ. Law 84.

By the common law, statutes took effect by relation back to the first day of the session at which they were enacted; 4 Term 660. The injustice which this rule often worked led to the statute of 33 Geo. III. c. 13, which declared that, except when otherwise provided, statutes should take effect from the day of obtaining the royal assent, unless otherwise ordered therein. This rule, however, does not obviate the hardship of holding men responsible under a law before its promulgation. By the Code Napoléon, a law takes effect in each department of the empire as many days after its promulgation in that department as there are distances of twenty leagues between the seat of government and the place of promulgation. The general rule in America is, that an act takes effect from the time when the formalities of enactment are actually complete, unless it is ordered otherwise or there is some constitutional or statutory rule on the subject; Cooley, Const. Lim. 187; 7 Wheat. 164.

The constitutions of many states contain provisions that acts shall not take effect till a certain time after their passage, or after adjournment of the legislature, but such constitutions usually contain also a provision that the legislature may, in a case of emergency, provide that an act shall take effect immediately, and it has become a common practice so to provide even in ordinary acts. Where an act was passed May 16, which declared that it should take effect May 14, it went into effect on its passage; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J. Sup.) 543.

The Tariff Act of 1897 took effect at the moment it was approved by the president, which was six minutes past 4 o'clock P. M., Washington time, on July 24, 1897, and goods imported and entered for consumption on that day, but prior to such approval, were dutiable under prior legislation; 87 Fed. Rep. 194. So held, also, by Colt, J., in U. S. C. C., 1st Circ. (Boston Herald, Oct. 12, 1898).

An act increasing taxes and denouncing penalties, falls within the first article of the constitution prohibiting ex post facto laws, and giving effect to statutes only from the time of their receiving the president's signature; 1 Hughes 356. "The law is an entirety. If, as to its penal features, it cannot be held to have gone into effect until 9 P. M. of the day of its enactment, neither can it be held to have gone into effect before that hour as to its other provisions." Id. See, also, 159 U. S. 78, as to the tariff act of 1894.

Local and special legislation. In all but a few states constitutional provisions are found forbidding the passage of local or private or special laws. While these provisions were not unknown at an earlier date, the principle was fully developed in the Illinois constitution of 1870, and has become more fixed as a part of American constitutional law since then. In some states, such prohibited legislation is specified as "local or special," and in some "special or private," and in some "private, local, or special." The act of congress of July 30, 1886, prohibited local and special legislation in the territories. See Binney, Restrict. upon Loc. and Spec. Legisl. 130. The subject-matter of legislation to which this prohibition applies varies in different states. Mr. Binney has grouped them in a general way. See id. 132. Among the subject-matters most usually found are: changing names of persons; legitimation and adoption of children; divorce; granting charters; changing laws of descent; providing for the sale or conveyance of real estate of persons under disability; granting the right of eminent domain; regulating legal procedure; incorporating municipalities; creating offices; or regulating the fees of officers; laying out highways; providing for the management of public schools; taxation. In some states special laws are permitted only when a general law cannot be made applicable.

A general law is defined as "neither for one or more particular persons, nor to operate exclusively in any particular part or parts of the state"; Binney, Restr. etc. 22. Such an act is not necessarily universal and need not be one which operates on all persons or all things; a law which effects a class of persons or things may be a general law; 37 Cal. 375; 40 N. J. L. 1. A law is to be regarded as such when its provisions apply to all objects of legislation, distinguished alike by quality and attribute which necessitate the enactment as manifest relation. Such laws must embrace all and exclude none whose condition and wants render such legislation equally necessary or appropriate to them as a class; 49 N. J. L. 88. See GENERAL LAWS.

A special law is one which relates either to particular persons, places, or things, or to persons, places, or things which, though not particularized, are separated by any method of selection from the whole class to which the law might, but for such legislation, be applicable. Binney, Restr. etc. 26.

A local law is one whose operation is confined within territorial limits, other than those of the whole state or any properly constituted class or locality therein.

The features of local and special legislation overlap, but they are not conterminous. The matter to which a local law relates may be either general or special, but in either case the law itself is not in force outside of the locality for which it is passed.

The following are held special acts and invalid: An act for holding primary elections made applicable only to counties casting a certain number of votes at the last election, which makes it applicable only to two counties; 43 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 975; an act, though general in form, regulating the re-location of county seats which was in fact applicable to but a single county; 143 Ind. 306; an act for the extension of corporate limits of cities having a certain population which can be applicable only to one city; 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 818; an act relating to the collection of taxes, cities of the first, second, and fourth class being excepted, and it not being confined to municipal matters; 171 Pa. 157.

The following are not within the constitutional prohibition: An act amending a city charter granted previously to the adoption of the constitution; 45 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 356; an act relating to a subject as to which there was already a local law; 96 Ga. 403; an act providing a per diem pay for jurors although it only applied to a single county in which there was already a special law, it being at the time of the passage of the act the existing rate in the remaining counties; 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 813; an act making it a misdemeanor to work as a barber on Sunday, exempting from its operation New York and Saratoga; 13 Misc. 587; an act providing a different and better system of education for cities of ten thousand or more inhabitants than is enjoyed by the rest of the state; 13 Wash. 696.

A territorial act classifying counties according to the equalized assessed valuation of property and graduating salaries of county officers in reference to population is not a local special law under the act of congress; 162 U. S. 547.

The proviso of a general act that it shall not apply to suits pending at its passage does not render it special; 169 Pa. 359.

An act offering a reward for the first to obtain in each county an artesian well is void; 44 Pac. Rep. (Ari.) 299. At least two individuals, actual or potential, are necessary to constitute a class which may be the subject of an act on the subject concerning which special acts are forbidden; such a class cannot be created by statute, however general, which takes as a class characteristic, to designate the members of a class, peculiarities of a single individual; 42 W. Va. 587. An act forbidding a sale of stocks of bonds and provisions, cotton, etc., on margin without delivering the property is not a special act; 134 Mo. 512; but an act prohibiting bookmaking and pool-selling excepting on a race course is a special act; 136 Mo. 400; and so is an act permitting a limited divorce instead of an absolute divorce when asked by a person holding conscientious scruples against absolute divorce; 36 L. R. A. (N. J.) 221.

When there is a general act for the incorporation of companies with the right of amendment reserved to the state, any amendment thereto must affect all corporations incorporated under the act; 82 Fed. Rep. 1; and where it is limited to cities of a certain size whereby it can be applicable only to a certain city, it is special legislation and void; id.

Classification. Under modern constitutions which prohibit special legislation, it has been found necessary to permit of the classification of certain subjects of legislation, chiefly in relation to municipalities or what may be termed home rule.

Mr. Binney, in the work quoted, gives five rules as, in his opinion, supported by judicial decisions.

1. All classification must be based upon substantial distinctions which make one class really different from another.

2. The classification adopted in any law must be germane to the purpose of the law.

3. Classification must not be based upon existing circumstances only, or those of limited duration, except where the object of the law is itself a temporary one.

4. To whatever class a law may apply, it must apply equally to each member thereof, except only where its application is affected by the existence of prior unrepealed local or special laws.

5. If the classification be valid, the number of members in a class is wholly immaterial.

While the classification of municipalities is permitted, it is held that not more than three classes can lawfully be made in cities in Pennsylvania; 122 Pa. 266; and that a classification, which is in effect legislation for certain cities to the exclusion of others which are really of the same class, is invalid; 96 Pa. 422.

A classification act may furnish a precedent for the legislature in future cases, but cannot control its action. The constitutionality of each law which establishes or adopts a classification must be judged of separately, and the mere fact that a classification has constitutionally been employed in one case does not bind the legislature to employ it again, even in a similar case; 25 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 269.

Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338 (1875), is an early and leading case on classification. It holds that a statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special; that the necessity for classification is recognized in the constitution by the creation of courts on a basis of population and that classification is incident to legislation and necessary to the promotion of the public welfare; that the question is not whether it is authorized but whether it is expressly prohibited in the constitution. It further holds that, for the purpose of taxation, real estate may be classified; as into timber lands, mineral lands, farm lands, etc., and that the act of 1874, which classifies cities according to their population, is constitutional.

Where a federal statute has been taken from a state statute the settled construction of the latter before the enactment of the former must be considered as having been adopted by congress; 171 U. S.—not reported. So also of the Interstate Commerce Act, so far as it is based on English acts; 145 U. S. 263.

In a statute the words "it shall be lawful" are usually only permissive; they confer a faculty or power; but there may be something in the act imposing a duty to exercise such power, in which case the words become obligatory; 5 App Cas. 222.

See 3 Binney for a list of British statutes in force in Pennsylvania. See Sanderson, Validity of Statutes in Pennsylvania; Endlich, Interp. of Statutes.

STATUTE MERCHANT. A security entered before the Mayor of London, or some chief warden of a city, in pursuance of 13 Ed. I. stat. 3, c. 1, whereby the lands of the debtor are conveyed to the creditor till out of the rents and profits of them his debt may be satisfied. 2 Bla. Com. 160.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS. See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

The statute of frauds "is a weapon of defence, not of offence," and "does not make any signed instrument a valid contract by reason of the signature, if it is not such according to the good faith and real intentions of the parties" Lord Selborne, C., in L. R. 8 Ch. 351.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. See LIMITATIONS.

STATUTE STAPLE. The statute of the staple, 27 Ed. III. stat. 2, confined the sale of all commodities to be exported to certain towns in England, called estaple or staple, where foreigners might resort. It authorized a security for money, commonly called statute staple, to be taken by traders for the benefit of commerce; the mayor of the place is entitled to take recognizance of a debt in proper form, which had the effect to convey the lands of the debtor to the creditor till out of the rents and profits of them he should be satisfied. 2 Bla. Com. 160; 2 Rolle, Abr. 446; Bac. Abr. Execution (B. 1); Co. 4th Inst. 238.

STATUTES AT LARGE. Statutes in full or at length as originally enacted, in distinction from abridgments, compilations, and revisions. In particular, the title of the publication containing, chiefly, the acts of congress—the United States, Statutes at Large. Anderson, L. Dict.

If there is any variance between an act of congress, as found in the printed volume of statutes, and the original, as enrolled and deposited with the secretary of state, the latter will prevail; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 978.

STATUTI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Those advocates whose names were inscribed in the registers of matriculation, and formed a part of the college of advocates. The number of advocates of this class was limited. They were distinguished from the supernumeraries, from the time of Constantine to Justinian. See Calvinus, Lex.

STATUTORY OBLIGATION. An obligation arising under a statute. See OBLIGATION.

STATUTORY STAPLE. An ancient writ that lay to take the body of a person and seize the lands and goods of one who had forfeited a bond called statute staple. Reg. Orig. 151.

STATUTUM DE MERCATORIBUS. The statute of Acton Burnell (q. v.).

STATUTUM HIBERNIÆ DE COHÆREDIBUS. The third public act in the statute book. It appears to be an instruction given by the king to his justices in Ireland, directing them how to proceed in a certain point where they entertained doubt. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. L. 259.

STATUTUM SESSIONUM. The Statute Sessions. A meeting in every hundred of constables and householders, by custom, for the ordering of servants, and debating of differences between masters and servants, rating of wages, etc., 5 Eliz. c. 4.

STAY AND TRADE. Within the meaning of an insurance policy, covering a ship during her stay and trade at a place these words were held to mean during her stay there for the purpose of trade; a stay for a purpose unconnected with trade is a deviation. 42 L. J. Ex. 60. See DEVIATION.

STAY LAWS. Acts of the legislature prescribing a stay in certain cases, or a stay of foreclosure of mortgages, or closing the courts for a limited period, or otherwise suspending legal remedies. See STAY OF EXECUTION.

STAY OF EXECUTION. In Practice. A term during which no execution can issue on a judgment.

It is either conventional, when the parties agree that no execution shall issue for a certain period, or it is granted by law, usually on condition of entering bail or security for the money.

An execution issued before the expiration of the stay is irregular and will be set aside; and the plaintiff in such case may be liable to an action for damages. What is said above refers to civil cases.

In criminal cases, when a woman is capitally convicted and she is proved to be enceinte there shall be a stay of execution till after her delivery. See PREGNANCY; JURY OF WOMEN.

A statute which authorizes stay of execution for an unreasonable and indefinite period, on judgments rendered on pre-existing contracts, is void; 41 Pa. 441; 31 Mo. 205; a law permitting a year's stay upon judgments where security is given has been held invalid; 6 Heisk. 98; S. C. 19 Am. Rep. 593. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 354, n.

STAYING PROCEEDINGS. The suspension of an action.

Proceedings are stayed absolutely or conditionally.

They are peremptorily stayed when the plaintiff is wholly incapacitated from suing: as, for example, when the plaintiff is not the holder, nor beneficially interested in a bill on which he has brought his action; 2 Cr. & M. 416; 3 Chitty, Pr. 628; or when the plaintiff admits in writing that he has no cause of action; 3 Chitty, Pr. 870, 630; or when an action is brought contrary to good faith; Tidd, Pr. 515, 529, 1134; 3 Chitty, Pr. 633.

Proceedings are sometimes stayed until some order of the court shall have been complied with; as, when the plaintiff resides in a foreign country or in another state, or is insolvent, and he has been ruled to give security for costs, the proceedings are stayed until such security shall be given; 3 Chitty, Pr. 633, 635; or until the payment of costs in a former action; 1 Chitty, Bail. 195.

STEALING. This term imports, ex vi termini, nearly the same as larceny; but in common parlance it does not always import a felony. 3 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 183.

In slander cases, it seems that the term stealing takes its complexion from the subject-matter to which it is applied, and will be considered as intended of a felonious stealing, if a felony could have been committed of such subject-matter; 12 Johns. 239; 3 Binn. 546. The word steal is held synonymous with theft. 9 Tex. App. 463. See 12 Tex. 450.

STEAMSHIP. A vessel, the principal motive power of which is steam and not sails. L. R. 7 Q. B. 569. See 32 Pa. 352. The owner of a steamboat is not an innkeeper so as to be liable for personal property stolen from a passenger. 118 Mass. 275. See SLEEPING-CAR; SHIP; VESSEL.

STEELBOW GOODS. Instruments of husbandry, cattle, corn, etc., delivered by a landlord to his tenant on condition that the like number of goods of like quality should be returned on expiration of the lease. Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 285, § 81; Ersk. Inst. 2. 4. 2.

STELLIONATE. In Civil Law. A name given generally to all species of frauds committed in making contracts.

This word is said to be derived from the Latin stellio, a kind of lizard remarkable for its cunning and the change of its color, because those guilty of frauds used every art and cunning to conceal them. But more particularly it was the crime of a person who fraudulently assigned, sold, or engaged the thing which he had before assigned, sold, or engaged to another, unknown to the person with whom he was dealing. Dig. 47. 20. 3; Code 9. 34. 1; Merlin, Répert.; La. Civ. Code, art. 2069; 1 Brown, Civ. Law 426. As a punishment those persons who granted double conveyances were declared infamous and their lives and goods were at the mercy of the king. Ersk. Prin. 441.

STENOGRAPHER. One who writes in short-hand, by using abbreviations or characters for words.

He does not come within the common-law definition of the word "clerk." 25 Neb. 662.

The depositions of witnesses taken in short-hand, and transcribed, will be suppressed, if not read to and signed by the witness, though the witness's subsequent attendance for the purpose could not be procured; 9 Fed. Rep. 754: but see contra, 79 Ill. 576, where it is held that the transcript of evidence taken in short-hand is admissible, where the stenographer testifies that he transcribed the testimony, and that the transcript is correct; that the witnesses were sworn and testified as therein stated. See also 43 Mich. 257. Where it is sought to impeach a witness's testimony by proving his testimony at a former trial, the stenographer is not the only witness who may be called, but any one who heard the testimony may be; 65 Me. 466; 35 S. C. 537.

A stenographic report of the testimony of an absent witness, at a former trial, may be admitted if complete and correct; 80 Fed. Rep. 361; or a copy of testimony compared with a stenographic report thereof, by a person who was present at the trial and remembers the testimony as given; 21 So. Rep. (Ala.) 328.

In Pennsylvania, where a stenographer is appointed under the provisions of an act of legislature authorizing the appointment of stenographers in the several courts of the commonwealth, the stenographer who actually takes the testimony must certify to the correctness of the transcript which he files, and the trial judge should order the transcript filed and certify to its correctness; 180 Pa. 161.

The charges of a stenographer are not taxable for costs in a suit in equity; 7 Fed. Rep. 42; but the agreement of the parties may make them taxable costs, though not so by statute; 1 Bingh. 345. See 10 Wash. L. Rep. 7; 61 Ill. 271; 44 Mich. 438.

Compensation for testimony taken before a referee is the subject of contract, as a stenographer is not then an officer of the court; 41 N. Y. S. 583; and the expense of a transcript of a stenographer's notes, for convenience, instead of use on the trial, is not taxable as costs; 8 U. S. App. 129.

An association of stenographers, whose leading object is to control the prices charged by its members, is an illegal combination, and its rules will not be enforced; 140 Ill. 69.

STEP-DAUGHTER. The daughter of one's wife by a former husband, or of one's husband by a former wife.

STEP-FATHER. The husband of one's mother by virtue of a marriage subsequent to that of which the person spoken of is the offspring.

STEP-MOTHER. The wife of one's father by virtue of a marriage subsequent to that of which the person spoken of is the offspring.

STEP-SON. The son of one's wife by a former husband, or of one's husband by a former wife.

STERE. A French measure of solidity, used in measuring wood. It is a cubic metre. See MEASURE.

STERILITY. Barrenness; incapacity to produce a child. It is curable and incurable; when of the latter kind at the time of the marriage, and arising from impotency, it is a good cause for dissolving a marriage. 1 Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 254. See IMPOTENCY.

STERLING. Current money of Great Britain, but anciently a small coin worth about one penny, and so called, as some suppose, because it was stamped with the figure of a small star, or, as others suppose, because it was first stamped in England in the reign of king John by merchants from Germany called Esterlings. Pounds sterling originally signified so many pounds in weight of these coins. Thus, we find in Matthew Paris, A. D. 1242, the expression Accepit a rege pro stipendio tredecim libras esterlingorum. The secondary or derived sense is a certain value in current money, whether in coins or other currency. Lowndes 14; Watts, Gloss. Sterling.

STET PROCESSUS (Lat.). In Practice. An order made, upon proper cause shown, that the process remain stationary. As, where a defendant having become insolvent would, by moving judgment in the case of nonsuit, compel a plaintiff to proceed, the court will, on an affidavit of the fact of insolvency, award a stet processus. See 7 Taunt. 180; 1 Chitty, Bail. 738; 10 Wentw. Pl. 43.

STEVEDORE. A person employed in loading and unloading vessels. Dunlap, Adm. Pract. 98. See LIENS.

STEWARD. Formerly an officer of disputes, namely, a keeper of the courts. Co. Litt. 61. See COURT OF MARSHALSEA.

STEWARD OF A MANOR. An officer who transacts all the legal and other business connected with the estate, and takes care of the court rolls. In royal manors he is appointed by patent. See 10 George IV. c. 40, § 14.

STEWARD OF ALL ENGLAND. In Old English Law. An officer who was invested with various powers: among others, to preside on the trial of peers.

STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD. See MARSHALSEA.

STEWS. Places formerly permitted in England to women of professed lewdness, who for hire would prostitute their bodies to all comers.

These places were so called because the dissolute persons who visited them prepared themselves by bathing,—the word stews being derived from the old French estuves, stove, or hot bath. Co. 3d Inst. 205.

STILLICIDIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The rain-water that falls from the roof or eaves of a house by scattered drops. When it is gathered into a spout, it is is called flumen. See SERVITUS; Inst. 3. 2. 1; Dig. 8. 2. 2.

STINT. The proportionable part of a man's cattle which he may keep upon the common. The general rule is that the commoner shall not turn more cattle upon the common than are sufficient to manure and stock the land to which his right of common is annexed. There may be such a thing as common without stint or number; but this is seldom granted, and a grantee cannot grant it over. 8 Bla. Com. 239; 1 Ld. Raym. 407.

STIPEND. A provision made for the support of the clergy. Salary; settled pay. In a bequest of £100 for masses for the repose of the testator's soul, at a stipend of five shillings each, it was held to mean price and not to involve any attempt to create a perpetuity; 19 L. R. Q. B. 177.

STIPENDIARY ESTATES. Estates granted in return for services, generally of a military kind. 1 Steph. Comm. 174.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES. Paid magistrates, appointed in London and some other municipal boroughs with the authority and jurisdiction of justices of the peace. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 73.

STIPULATED DAMAGE. See LIQUIDATED DAMAGE.

STIPULATIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. A contract made in the following manner: the person to whom the promise was to be made proposed a question to him from whom it was to proceed, fully expressing the nature and extent of the engagement; and, the question so proposed being answered in the affirmative, the obligation was complete. No consideration was required.

STIPULATIO AQUILIANA. In Civil Law. A particular application of the stipulatio, which was used to collect together into one verbal contract all the liabilities of every kind and quality of the debtor, with a view to their being released or discharged by an acceptilatio, that mode of discharge being applicable only to the verbal contract. Brown.

STIPULATION. A material article in an agreement.

The term appears to have derived its meaning from the use of stipulatio above given; though it is applied more correctly and more conformably to its original meaning to denote the insisting upon and requiring any particular engagement. 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 19.

In Practice. An agreement between counsel respecting business before a court. Anderson, L. Dict.

A case may be reversed on stipulation; 131 U. S. 428; 123 id. 619; 124 id. 369.

In Admiralty Practice. A recognizance of certain persons (called in the old law fidejussores) in the nature of bail for the appearance of a defendant. 3 Bla. Com. 108.

These stipulations are of three sorts: namely, judicatum solvi, by which the party is absolutely bound to pay such sum as may be adjudged by the court; de judicio sisti, by which he is bound to appear from time to time during the pendency of the suit, and to abide the sentence; de ratio, or de rato, by which he engages to ratify the acts of his proctor: this stipulation is not usual in the admiralty courts of the United States.

The securities are taken in the following manner: namely, cautio fide jussoria, by sureties; pignoratitia, by deposit; juratoria, by oath: this security is given when the party is too poor to find sureties, at the discretion of the court; nuda promissoria, by bare promise: this security is unknown in the admiralty courts of the United States. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 150.

STIRPES (Lat.). Descents. The root-stem, or stock of a tree. Figuratively, it signifies in law that person from whom a family is descended, and also the kindred or family.

STOCK. In Mercantile Law. The capital of a merchant, tradesman, or other person, including his merchandise, money, and credits. The goods and wares he has for sale and traffic.

In Corporation Law. A right to partake, according to the amount of the party's subscription, of the surplus profits obtained from the use and disposal of the capital stock of the company. Ang. & A. Corp. § 557.

The capital stock of a corporation is that money or property which is put into a fund by those who, by subscription therefor, become members of the corporate body. 75 N. Y. 211. The phrase capital stock has been objected to, as the two words have separate meanings, capital being the sum subscribed and paid into the company, and stock being the thing which the subscriber receives for what he pays in; Dos Passos, St. Brokers 579. See 23 N. Y. 192. The interest which each person has in the corporation is termed a share, which is the right to participate in the profits of the corporation, and, upon its dissolution, in the division of its assets. See 75 N. Y. 211. "Capital stock" has been held to mean the amount contributed by the shareholders, and not the property of the company; 23 N. J. L. 195.

Capital stock is the sum fixed by the corporate charter as the amount paid in or to be paid in by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation and for the benefit of corporate creditors. Cook, St. & Stockh. § 9. It is to be clearly distinguished from the amount of property possessed by the corporation; id.

The property or means contributed by the stockholders as the fund or basis for the business or enterprise for which the corporation or association was formed. 21 Wall. 284. See definitions in 126 N. Y. 433; 30 Ark. 693; 10 Mo. App. 146. Capital stock is a different thing from shares of stock; the latter are evidences of ownership; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 111. Stock is commonly used to mean shares of stock, and it has been so held in a tax statute; 23 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 9.

The capital stock of a corporation differs widely in legal import from the aggregate shares into which it is divided by its charter (95 U. S. 686; 126 N. Y. 437); while the former includes only the fund of money or other property derived by it from the sale or exchange of its shares of stock, the latter represents the totality of the corporate assets and property; 84 Fed. Rep. 396.

A share of stock is a right which its owner has in the management, profits, and ultimate assets of the corporation. Cook, St. & Stockh. § 12. So, also, 92 N. Y. 592; 3 Wall. 585. It is the right to participate in stockholders' meetings, and in the profits of the business, and to require that the corporate property shall not be diverted from the original purposes; 2 Woods 331.

The number of shares depends upon the statutory regulations, or in their absence the agreement of the parties forming the corporation; 45 Me. 524. Shares may be arranged in classes, one class being preferred to another in the distribution of profits; 78 N. Y. 159. Voting may be restricted to a certain class.

The ownership of shares is usually attested by a certificate issued under the corporate seal; and when a new transfer is effected, such certificate is surrendered and cancelled, and a new one is issued to the transferee. A certificate need not be under seal; 103 U. S. 409. But a person may be the owner of shares in a corporation without holding such certificate; 102 Mass. 261; see 64 Cal. 117; 46 Mo. 248; and, strictly speaking, a company need not issue any certificates or muniments of title, if not required to do so by law or its charter; 24 Me. 256. The presence of a party's name on the stock books of the company is evidence of his ownership of shares; 73 Pa. 59. The possession of a corporate certificate of stock, duly issued, is a continuing affirmation of ownership of the stock by the person named therein; 11 Wall. 369; which generally creates an estoppel against the company in favor of the holder; 57 N. Y. 616; though in England it is said to be merely a solemn affirmation that the specified amount of stock stands on the stock books in the name of the person specified in the certificate; L. R. 7 H. L. 496. Every stockholder is entitled to a certificate of his shares; 105 U. S. 217.

The stock of a national bank is said to be a species of chose in action, or an equitable interest which the shareholder possesses, and which he can enforce against the corporation. See 53 N. Y. 161, 237. "If a share in a bank is not a chose in action, it is in the nature of a chose in action, and is personal property;" per Shaw, C. J., in 12 Metc. 421. Shares are not, strictly speaking, chattels; they bear a greater resemblance to choses in action; or, in other words, they are merely evidence of property; Ang. & A. Corp. § 560. They are now universally considered to be personal property; Ang. & A. Corp. § 557; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 119, 200; though in some earlier cases it was held otherwise. See Cook, St. & Stockh. § 12, n. They are not a debt; Dos Passos, St. Brokers 590. Shares in a corporation are said to be incorporeal personal property; 16 Ia. 173, per Dillon, J. In Louisiana, stock is property and not a credit; 10 Fed. Rep. 330.

It is settled in England that shares in a joint-stock company are not goods, wares and merchandise within the statute of frauds; 11 A. & E. 205; it has been otherwise decided in Massachusetts; 20 Pick. 9, uniformly followed in this country; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 339.

Stock is issued for money, in payment for property or labor, or as a stock dividend. It is established in England that stock may be issued for property, and such was the common law; 106 Ill. 43. See 91 U. S. 60. The subject is usually regulated by statute in this country. Stock can be issued by way of a stock dividend, which "is lawful when an amount of money or property equal in value to the stock distributed as a dividend has been accumulated and is permanently added to the capital stock of the corporation." Cook, St. & Stockh. § 536.

It is generally held that stock cannot be issued at a discount, and made full paid; 139 U. S. 429; [1897] A. C. 299; 38 Ch. Div. 415; 2 De G. F. & J. 295; 11 Manitoba 629; but it has been held that an agreement with the company that the holders should never be called upon to pay any further assessment upon stock is valid as between the parties; 105 U. S. 143. See 86 N. Y. 384; L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 394.

Directors issued stock at a discount; its market price went above par. It was held that the issue was unlawful and that the directors were liable, but only for the difference between the price at which they issued it and its par value; [1894] A. C. 654.

Where stock is issued for property which is overvalued, the transaction may be set aside for fraud; 3 Dill. 45; 59 Md. 1; 14 Fed. Rep. 12. The corporation, after issuing its stock as full paid cannot complain; 105 U. S. 143; unless the entire transaction is such that equity will rescind it for actual fraud. See, as to overvaluing property, 7 Am. & E. Corp. Cas. 652; 92 Ala. 407.

It has been held that a railroad company in need of funds may settle with a contractor by issuing stock to him as full-paid at twenty cents on the dollar, and that creditors of the company could not afterwards collect the difference between that and par; 139 U. S. 96. This decision has been much criticised. The same court said subsequently, in 144 U. S. 104, that "the trust arising in favor of creditors by subscription to the stock of a corporation cannot be defeated by a stipulated payment of such a subscription nor by any device short of actual payment in good faith." While any settlement might be good between the corporation and the stockholders it is unavailing against creditors. As against creditors, a corporation cannot give away its stock or distribute it among shareholders, without receiving a fair equivalent therefor; 139 U. S. 417.

A contract by which directors of a street-railway company, acting in the name of a third person, are to construct the road, and divide between them the stock and bonds not required therefor, is fraudulent, and bonds issued pursuant thereto are void; 83 Fed. Rep. 355.

A corporation has no power, in the absence of statutory authority, to increase or diminish its capital stock; 105 U. S. 148; 6 Pick. 23; 73 Ala. 325; 37 Fed. Rep. 508.

As to overissue of corporation shares, see 36 Cent. Law J. 52; OVERISSUE.

Transfer. A certificate of stock is transferable on the books of the company by the owner in person or by his attorney under written authority, which is commonly executed in blank and which may be filled up by the transferee; Ang. & A. Corp. § 564; Beach, Priv. Corp. 648; 34 N. Y. 30; 50 Pa. 67. A transfer in blank is deemed sufficient in some jurisdictions to pass the legal title to the stock subject to the claims of the company upon the registered stockholders; 2 Ames, B. & N. 784; 76 N. Y. 365; 10 Ala. 82; in other cases such a transfer has been held to give the holder merely an equitable interest; 3 How. 483; 5 Biss. 181. Prof. Ames is of opinion that the true view is that such a transfer does not pass the legal title, but that it passes the equitable interest, coupled with an irrevocable power of attorney to acquire the legal title; 2 Ames, B. & N. 784. This irrevocable power may, in some cases, by the doctrine of estoppel, be acquired by the delivery of the certificate from one who has no such power himself; 48 Cal. 99; 14 Nev. 362; 86 Pa. 80; 46 N. Y. 325. A seal is not necessary; 10 Mass. 476; though usually employed.

Shares of stock are non-negotiable instruments, but through the doctrine of estoppel, stock certificates, with a power to transfer them, can be dealt in with nearly the same immunity as bills and notes; Dos Passos, Stock Brokers 596; and the same writer is of opinion that the time has come for the court to receive evidence of the general usage of the business world, so as to raise stock certificates to the dignity of negotiable instruments; id. 597; but see 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 322, where evidence of such a usage was rejected; see, also, 38 Pa. 98. Professor Ames says (2 Bills & Notes 784): "Whether the custom of merchants will ever lead the courts to give those instruments (certificates of stock) the quality of negotiability may be an open question; but that they have not done so is clear." See 28 N. Y. 600; 86 Pa. 83; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 168, n. In 11 Wall. 369, the court said that certificates, "although neither in form or character negotiable paper, approximate it as nearly as practicable."

In case of the sale of the stock this power of attorney becomes irrevocable; 14 Md. 299; but if such a power of attorney is forged or is made by a person not competent to make it, the corporation is liable for allowing the transfer; 14 Md. 299. See 86 Pa. 80; 123 Mass. 110. A company may refuse to allow a transfer until satisfied of the party's right to make it; L. R. 9 Eq. 181; 52 Pa. 232; 5 S. C. 379.

A company is bound to require the surrender of the old certificate before allowing a transfer, and may refuse to act till it is surrendered; 21 Ohio St. 221; where a certificate cannot be found the company may refuse a new one or to make a transfer without proper indemnity, unless it be a clear case of loss; 56 Tex. 269.

In a joint stock corporation, each stockholder, whether by purchase or original subscription, has the right, unless restrained by the charter or articles of association, to sell and transfer his shares, and, by transferring them, to introduce others in his stead; 131 U. S. 246.

In a wrongful refusal to transfer the party may apply for a mandamus to make the transfer, or sue in equity for a decree of transfer, or for damages if a transfer is impossible, or bring an action at law for damages.

It is said that the rules for the protection of bona fide purchasers are based on estoppel, which extends not only as against previous owners, but against the corporation itself. It is said that the doctrine is being extended and that it may in time render certificates of stock more negotiable than negotiable instruments themselves; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 416; but it is also held that, as a certificate of stock is not negotiable either in form or character, whoever takes it, does so subject to its equities and burdens like every non-negotiable paper; and though ignorant of such equities and burdens, his ignorance does not enable him to hold it discharged therefrom; 134 U. S. 401.

English courts will not follow the American rule as to the negotiability of certificates transferred in blank, and a purchaser is not protected till the transfer is made on the books of the company; L. R. 23 Ch. D. 880; even after deposit of the certificate with the company for transfer, and its acceptance by the company the owner may reclaim the stock; 64 L. T. Rep. 456.

Where the registered owner of shares delivered his certificate to a broker with a blank transfer signed by him, and the broker improperly deposited the certificate and blank transfer with a third party as security for his debt; and the third party filled up the blank transfer and had the stock transferred on the books of the company, which latter had no notice of any irregularity, it was held that such third party had acquired no title to the shares as against the owner; 64 L. J. Ch. 473.

A business corporation cannot make it a condition of transferring stock that the holder shall first have offered it to the directors, and shall have paid all his indebtedness to the corporation; 118 Mo. 447.

The unregistered pledgee of stock has priority over a subsequent attaching creditor; 43 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 896; the same rule obtains in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, South Carolina, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, and most other states except Connecticut; and in the federal courts, see Cook, St. & Stockh. § 487; 5 Fed. Rep. 369; 15 id. 494; but see 5 Blatch. 59.

Stock certificates may be attached in a state other than the home state of the company; 79 Fed. Rep. 228.

Preferred stock entitles the holder to a priority in the dividends or earnings, over common stock. Guaranteed stock is the same thing; 8 R. I. 310.

A corporation may issue preferred stock, in the absence of any prohibition; 86 Fed. Rep. 930; [1897] 1 Ch. 361; 31 Mich. 76; 78 N. Y. 159; provision therefore is often contained in the by-laws. If there is no provision in the charter or the law, unanimous consent of stockholders is required; Lind. Comp. 396; 31 Mich. 76. After a company has been organized, and all or a part of the stock issued, preferred stock cannot be issued against the objection of minority holders of common stock; 4 De G. J. & S. 672; 78 N. Y. 159; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 268; its issue will be enjoined in such case; 32 L. J. Ch. 711. But see 2 De G. & S., where an injunction was refused at the suit of five dissenting stockholders, the court declining, however, to declare the issue legal. An objecting stockholder must seek relief promptly; 78 N. Y. 159; 13 Fed. Rep. 152. Legislative power to issue preferred stock may be granted subsequently to the organization of the corporation; 10 Bush 69; 35 Vt. 536. The terms or provision under which preferred stock is issued are matters of contract, to be gathered from the charter, by-laws, votes of stockholders, or directors, etc.; 17 Wall. 96; L. R. 20 Eq. 556; 134 N. Y. 197; 78 Va. 501.

There is no condition implied in a memorandum of association of a company that all shareholders are to be on an equality and a company whose memorandum and original articles do not authorize the issue of preference shares, can alter its articles so as to do so; [1897] 1 Ch. 361.

The holder of preferred stock is not a creditor of the corporation; 22 Wall. 136; 78 Fed. Rep. 624; 77 Me. 445; 24 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 496; 61 L. J. Rep. 621; creditors have a priority over preferred stockholders; 108 U. S. 389; 55 Vt. 110. Preferred stock cannot be given a lien on the property; 1 Ohio 321. But it seems to have been held that a mortgage to secure preferred stock is valid. See 78 Va. 501; 24 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 486.

Preferred stockholders are entitled to dividends only from net earnings; 31 Mich. 76; 108 U. S. 389; Moraw. Pr. Corp. 457; an engagement to pay dividends when not earned, or out of capital, is void; L. R. 22 Ch. D. 349; 63 Pa. 136; though they may be paid out of gross earnings, if the statute so directs; 78 Va. 501.

But dividends may be paid though the company have a floating debt; 79 Me. 461; but see 55 Vt. 110. The directors may ordinarily exercise a reasonable discretion as to declaring dividends, even though there be net earnings applicable thereto; 119 U. S. 296; but if they act oppressively, equity will interfere; 79 Me. 411.

Undeclared dividends (arrears of net earnings) pass with the transfer of preferred stock to the transferee; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 275; 24 Hun 360.

In the absence of anything to the contrary, preferred stock shares equally with common, upon a dissolution of the corporation; L. R. 5 Eq. 510; otherwise, if provided by the charter, a statute, or by the contract; L. R. 20 Eq. 59. See 33 N. J. Eq. 181, where a preference was given by statute.

Where the memorandum of association provided that preference shares should receive "out of the net profits of each year" a dividend of ten per cent., it was held that they were not entitled to cumulative dividends; [1896] 2 Ch. 203.

In the absence of anything to the contrary, dividends will be taken to be cumulative; 77 Pa. 321; 84 N. Y. 157; L. R. 8 Eq. 356; 1 De G. & J. 606.

As to a peculiar issue of deferred stock, see 39 Leg. Int. 98 (S. C. Pa.). The term is sometimes used in contra-distinction to preferred stock to indicate stock which receives a dividend only after the payment of a dividend on preferred stock.

"Special stock" is issued by corporations in Massachusetts. It is limited to two-fifths of the actual capital; it is subject to redemption at a fixed time; the holder is entitled to a half-yearly dividend, as upon a debt; the holders are not liable for the debts of the company, and the general stockholders are liable for all the debts until the special stock is redeemed. See Cook, St. & Stockh. §§ 13, 276.

Interest bearing stock has been recognized by the courts. The contract to pay interest is lawful only when interest is to be paid out of net earnings; 40 Pa. 237; 89 Mass. 572; and in this view is merely a species of preferred stock.

English Law. In reference to the investment of money, the term "stock" implies those sums of money contributed towards raising a fund whereby certain objects, as of trade and commerce, may be effected. It is also employed to denote the moneys advanced to government, which constitute a part of the national debt, whereupon a certain amount of interest is payable. Since the introduction of the system of borrowing upon interminable annuities, the meaning of the word "stock" has become gradually changed; and, instead of signifying the security upon which loans are advanced, it has for a long time signified the principal of the loans themselves. In this latter sense we speak of the sale, purchase, and transfer of stock; Moz. & W. See Cavanaugh, Money Securities.

Stock, in England, signifies a number of paid-up shares, so united that the owner may subdivide it and transfer it in large or small quantities, irrespective of the number and par value of the shares; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 12. Stock can only exist in the paid-up state; L. R. 7 H. L. 717.

Debenture stock "is merely borrowed capital consolidated into one mass for the sake of convenience. Instead of each lender having a separate bond or mortgage, he has a certificate entitling him to a certain sum, being part of one large loan." Lindl. Companies 195. It has no connection with stock as commonly used in this country. See Simonson, Deb. & Deb. St.

Descents. A metaphorical expression which designates in the genealogy of a family the person from whom others are descended: those persons who have so descended are called branches. See 1 Roper, Leg. 103; 2 Belt. Suppl. Ves. 307; BRANCH; DESCENT; LINE; STIRPES.

Farm Stock. See FENCES; RUNNING AT LARGE.

STOCK ASSOCIATION. A joint stock company (q. v.).

STOCK-BROKER. See BROKER.

STOCK CERTIFICATE. See STOCK.

STOCK EXCHANGE. A building or room in which stock-brokers meet to transact their business of purchasing or selling stocks.

A voluntary association (usually unincorporated) of persons who, for convenience in the transaction of business with each other, have associated themselves to provide a common place for the transaction of their business. See Dos Passos, St. Brok. 14; Biddle, St. Brok. 40, 43; 2 Brewst. 571; 2 Daly 329. It is usually not a corporation, and in such case it is not a partnership. In the absence of a statute its real estate is held by all the members in the same way as partnership real estate. At common law, all the members had to be joined in a suit; Dicey, Parties, 2d Am. ed. 148, 266; 44 Conn. 259; though actions have been sustained against the exchange as a body; 2 Brewst. 571; 9 W. N. C. (Pa.) 441.

The members may make such reasonable regulations for the government of the body as they may think best; see 24 Barb. 570; such rules bind the members assenting to them; 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 162; but their personal assent must appear; 16 N. Y. 112; it may be inferred from circumstances, as from their admissions and acting as members; L. R. 5 Eq. 63; 25 Mo. 593; and a member is bound by a by-law passed during his membership, whether he votes for it or not; 8 W. N. C. (Pa.) 464. It is said that the courts will prevent the interference with a member's rights in an unincorporated association where the latter is acting under a by-law which is unreasonable or contrary to public policy: Dos Passos, St. Brok. 36; 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 162; 47 Wisc. 670; but see 80 Ill. 134.

Stock Exchange, seat in. Members of a stock exchange are entitled to what is known as a seat. Seats are held subject to the rules of the exchange. They are a species of incorporeal property—a personal, individual right to exercise a certain calling in a certain place, but without the attributes of descendibility or assignability, which are characteristic of other species of property; Dos Passos, St. Brok. 87; Biddle, St. Brok. 50. There has been much controversy as to whether a seat can be reached by an execution. A late writer considers the following as settled: "1. In the disposition of a seat or the proceeds thereof, the members of the exchange will be preferred to outside creditors. 2. The seat is not the subject of seizure and sale on attachment and execution. 3. The proceeds of the seat, in the hands of the exchange, are capable of being reached, after members' claims have been satisfied, to the same extent and in the same manner as any other money or property of a debtor. 4. A person owning a seat in the exchange can be compelled, by proceedings subsequent to execution, or under the direction of a receiver, to sell his seat to a person acceptable to the exchange, and devote the proceeds to the satisfaction of his judgment debts." Dos Passos, St. Brok. 96. See 5 W. N. C. (Pa.) 36; 94 U. S. 525; 20 Alb. L. J. 414; 9 Reporter 305; 78 Cal. 351. In 142 U. S. 1, it was held that a seat in a stock exchange is property, and passes to assignees in bankruptcy subject to the rules of the stock board. See 105 U. S. 126; 89 N. Y. 328; 109 id. 593; 110 Ill. 146.

Stock exchange rules usually provide that seats are liable first to pay the members' debts to a fellow-member, or a firm of which the latter is a member; and also for arbitration committees to settle differences between members; 180 Pa. 289.

A regular register of all the transactions is kept by an officer of the association, and questions arising between the members are generally decided by an arbitration committee. The official record of sales is the best evidence of the price of any stock on any particular day. The stocks dealt in at the sessions of the board are those which are placed on the list by a regular vote of the association; and when it is proposed to add a stock to the list, a committee is appointed to examine into the matter, and the board is generally guided by the report of such committee. See Brodhurst, Law & Pr. of Stock Exchange (London).

STOCK-JOBBER. A dealer in stock; one who buys and sells stock on his own account on speculation.

STOCKHOLDER. One who has property interests in the assets of a corporation and who is entitled to take part in its control and receive its dividends. 67 Fed. Rep. 816. The word includes all members having a direct financial interest in the business of the corporation with power to participate in the profits and in the conduct of its affairs, though they hold no shares; 52 Mo. App. 194. The government may be a stockholder, and when it assumes this relation, it divests itself to that extent of its sovereign character; the same is true of a state; Field, Corp. § 52; and of a municipal corporation, if it has legislative power; id. At common law the members of a corporation are not liable for the debts of a corporation; 10 Wall. 575; 24 Cal. 540; Thomp. Liab. of Stockh. § 4; nor liable on their subscriptions, it is said, until the full capital stock is subscribed; 6 Wash. 134. After shares are legally full paid, no further payments can be required; 63 Mass. 192; 24 Cal. 540; unless provided by statute, as is done to a certain extent in some states. The holders of full-paid stock in an insolvent national bank are liable to creditors for a further assessment to the extent of the par value of the stock.

The legislature cannot, after the purchase of stock, impose any additional liability unless it has reserved the power to alter the charter. Statutes have been passed in many states by which stockholders are liable under certain circumstances. The statutes are too various to be treated here. They may be liable in equity when they have assets of the corporation which they ought not to retain. So they may be liable when they have subscribed to the capital stock of the corporation which they have not paid in. The capital stock in such cases is usually said to be a trust fund for the benefit of creditors; 91 U. S. 56. The cases in which this doctrine has most frequently been applied have arisen out of suits brought to compel stockholders to pay the amounts unpaid upon their stock subscriptions.

The original holder of stock in a corporation is liable for unpaid instalments of stock without an express promise to pay, and a contract between him and the corporation or its agent limiting his liability is void as to creditors for the assignee in bankruptcy of the corporation. Representations made to the stockholder by an agent of the corporation as the non-assessability of stock beyond a certain per cent. of its par value, constitute no defence to an action against the stockholder to enforce payment of the amount subscribed. The legal effect of the word "non-assessable" in the certificate is at most a stipulation against further assessments after the face value of the stock is paid; 91 U. S. 45. The transferee of stock, when the transfer was duly registered, is liable in the same way upon his implied promise; 91 U. S. 65. So where the holder of shares had procured a transfer to his name, he was held liable for unpaid instalments, though he held the stock only as collateral security for debts due him by the transferror of the stock; 96 U. S. 328. Where certificates of stock had on their face a condition that the residue of eighty per cent. unpaid to the stock was to be paid on the call of the directors, when ordered by a vote of a majority of the stockholders, it was held that the absence of a call was no defence to an action for the residue by an assignee of the corporation in bankruptcy; 3 Biss. 417. Agreements of members among themselves that stock shall be considered as "fully paid" are invalid; L. R. 15 Eq. 407. A corporation may, however, take in payment of its shares any property which it may lawfully purchase; Thomps. Liab. of Stockh. § 134; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 425; and stock issued therefor as full paid will be so considered; 7 Cent. L. J. 430 (C. C. U. S.).

A call by the proper authorities is ordinarily held to be necessary to fix the liability of a stockholder for unpaid instalments; 43 N. J. L. 442; 21 Ill. 276; L. R. 1 Ch. App. 535; but it is held that a suit may be brought without a call; 67 N. Y. 300; and when a receiver has been appointed the call is made by a decree of the court; 105 U. S. 143.

"Ever since the case of Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, it has been the settled doctrine of this court that the capital stock of an insolvent corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts; that the law implies a promise by the original subscribers of stock, who did not pay for it in money or other property, to pay for the same when called upon by creditors; and that a contract between themselves and the corporation that the stock shall be treated as fully paid and non-assessable, or otherwise limiting their liability therefor, is void as against creditors." 139 U. S. 417. Cases to the same effect are 99 N. C. 501; 76 Ga. 360; 139 U. S. 118; 144 id. 104; 146 id. 618; 148 id. 603; but in 139 id. 96 it was said, quoting from Sawyer v. Hoag, that the capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund only sub modo. In 150 U. S. 371, the expression "trust fund" was qualified by a statement that it had not been intended "to convey the idea that there was any direct and express trust attached to the property." In 154 Ill. 44, it was called a quasi-trust fund, and Pomeroy [Eq. Jur. 1046] says that such assets do not in any true sense constitute a trust and are called so only through analogy or metaphor.

In an able article in 34 Am. L. Reg. 448 [1895], George Wharton Pepper strongly objects to the expression "trust fund" and considers that the trust theory is untenable. He quotes Mr. Justice Bradley in 102 U. S. 148, where he says that the conception is at war with notions which we derive from English law with regard to the nature of corporate bodies.

The same writer is of the opinion that the expression "trust fund" is one which is applied by American courts to the judicial recognition of the demand of the commercial world, which is in substance that the liability of a stockholder shall be unlimited up to the par value of his shares and he shall not be entitled to any legal principle which would entitle him to advantage against corporate creditors.

The trust fund doctrine as to the assets of an insolvent corporation appears to have been first announced by Judge Story in 3 Mas. 306. Judge Thompson considers it "the only doctrine worthy of respect"; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 5115. It was repudiated in 14 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 810; 21 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 951; 17 S. E. Rep. (Ala) 525.

A holder of stock in trust is subject to assessment; 44 Conn. 582; L. R. 9 Eq. 175, 363 (but the cestui que trust is not: id.; even if he is a trustee of the corporation itself; 18 N. Y. 226; 46 Pa. 48); but it is otherwise as to the holder of national bank stock; R. S. § 5152; if his name appears on the books as trustee; 36 Fed. Rep. 868. It is held that a cestui que trust is bound to indemnify his trustee; L. R. 18 Eq. 16; but this cannot be generally true.

A pledgee who has transferred the stock to his own name is liable to assessment; 96 U. S. 328; but not, it is held, when he has placed it in the name of an irresponsible third party; 111 U. S. 479.

A pledgee of national bank stock is not liable for assessments, except by estoppel; 86 Fed. Rep. 1006; 58 id. 666.

Where stock stands in the name of an agent, either the principal or the agent may be assessed; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 249.

Where one has been induced by fraud to buy national bank stock, takes a transfer, and, upon discovering the fraud, takes steps, at once, to rescind the transaction, he is not liable to assessment except as to one who extended credit to the bank without notice of the fraud; 88 Fed. Rep. 449.

A corporate creditor cannot proceed directly against stockholders to recover unpaid suscriptions till he shall have obtained a judgment against the corporation and an execution thereon shall have been returned unsatisfied; 95 U. S. 638; 35 N. J. Eq. 501; 55 Wis. 598. The remedy may be in some states by garnishment under the judgment against the company; but more commonly it is by bill in equity and a receiver. It is held that the remedy of a creditor against a stockholder is in equity alone; 53 Ala. 191; 101 U. S. 216. In equity the court decrees a call and the receiver collects the amount. The court may decree payment in full, leaving the stockholders to seek contribution among themselves; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 211.

In an action to enforce the payment of an assessment on unpaid stock, on behalf of creditors, a stockholder cannot set off a claim against the corporation; 139 U. S. 417; L. R. 1 Ch. 528; 110 Ill. 316; otherwise, if the corporation itself sues; L. R. 19 Eq. 449. In New York there is a right of set-off at law against a corporation creditor, but not in equity; 43 Hun 362.

A subscriber cannot set up against an action for calls that the corporation was not lawfully organized, if he is a director and was one of the original incorporators; 18 N. Y. L. J. (Dec. 9, 1897); s. c. 22 N. Y. App. Div. 1.

The better opinion is said to be that the statute of limitation begins to run only when a call has been made and payment thereunder is due; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 195; or from the order of court making the assessment; 145 U. S. 507. It is held to run from the date of an assignment for creditors by the company; 7 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 611; and in 50 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 891, when the subscription is made; so also 41 Hun 545; though where a creditor sues it does not run till he secures judgment; 36 Hun 334.

Statutes in various states provide for a forfeiture of stock for non-payment of subscriptions, and a sale. This right does not exist without a statute; nor can it be created by a mere by-law; but it may be by the consent of the stockholder if expressed on the face of his certificate; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 122; the remedy by forfeiture, when given, is in addition to the ordinary common-law remedies; id. § 124. See Thomp. Liab. of Stockh.; 31 Am. Rep. 88; 15 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 648.

In order to constitute one a shareholder, it is not necessary that a certificate should have been issued to him; 32 Ind. 393; 46 Mo. 248.

A married woman, under the common-law disabilities, cannot be a competent party to an original subscription for shares of a corporation, or to a transfer to her of such shares, so as to make her a shareholder; 38 Fed. Rep. 700.

Where a director is required to be the holder of a certain number of shares as a qualification, he is presumed, on winding up, to have been the holder of that number of shares; [1892] 2 Ch. 158.

A railroad corporation purchasing the stock of a competing corporation cannot obtain control of its affairs, divert the income of its business, refuse business which would enable it to pay its interest, and then institute proceedings in equity to enforce the interest-bearing obligations for the avowed purpose of obtaining control of its property to the injury of the minority stockholders. The controlling company will become, for all practical purposes, the corporation which it controls, and bears the same trust relations to the minority stockholders of the latter that usually exists between stockholders of a corporation and the corporation itself; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. N. Y. & No. R. Co., 54 Alb. L. J. 311 (Ct. of App. N. Y.).

The holders of a majority of the stock of a corporation may legally control the company's business, prescribe its general policy, make themselves its agents, and take reasonable compensation for their services. But, in thus assuming the control, they also take upon themselves the correlative duty of diligence and good faith. They cannot lawfully manipulate the company's business in their own interests to the injury of other stockholders. They cannot by their votes in a stockholders' meeting lawfully authorize its officers to lease its property to themselves, or to another corporation formed for the purpose and exclusively owned by them, unless such lease is made in good faith and is supported by an adequate consideration; and, in a suit properly prosecuted to set aside such a contract, the burden of proof, showing fairness and adequacy, is upon the parties claiming thereunder. All doubts will be resolved in favor of the corporation for whom such stockholders assumed to act; 17 Fed. Rep. 48, and note by Dr. Francis Wharton.

It is said that a stockholder may deal with his company at arm's length as a stranger might; 184 Pa. 102. See PREFERENCE.

The rights of a stockholder are to attend stockholders' meetings, to participate in the profits of the business, and to require that the corporate property and funds shall not be diverted from their original purposes, and if the company becomes insolvent, to have its property applied to the payment of its debts. For the invasion of these rights by the officers of a company, a stockholder may sue at law or in equity, according to the nature of the case. All remedies for injury to the property or rights of such a corporate body must be prosecuted in the name of the company; all demands against the company must be prosecuted against it by name. But where the officers and managers of a company, by fraud and collusion with third persons, are sacrificing, or are about to betray or sacrifice, the interests of the corporation, a stockholder may, for such breaches of trust and conspiracy, call the guilty parties to an account in a court of equity; 2 Woods 323, per Bradley, J.

A shareholder may interpose and set the machinery of law in motion for the protection of corporate rights or the redress of corporate wrongs, when the corporate management, after proper demand, fails to act in the matter; 36 Fed. Rep. 627; but equity will not entertain a bill by stockholders to remedy wrongs committed by the officers of the corporation, where such stockholders have not applied to the corporate authorities to remedy such wrongs; 87 Tenn. 771; 31 W. Va. 798; 127 U. S. 489; 54 Fed. Rep. 985. A stockholder may maintain an action to restrain the corporation from acts in excess of its corporate authority: 75 Ia. 722; but he cannot maintain a bill to enjoin the wasting of corporate property unless the corporation itself refuses to bring the action, in which case it must be made a party defendant; 54 Fed. Rep. 216. A corporation is a necessary party to a suit by stockholders for the enforcement of its rights; 149 U. S. 473.

It has been held that if a corporation has power to reduce its capital stock, it may do so by purchasing a portion of its own shares; 48 Vt. 266; 17 N. Y. 507; contra, 56 N. H. 262; but it is held to be ultra vires for a corporation to dispose of any part of its property other than its surplus or net profits, in the purchase of shares of its own stock; 84 Fed. Rep. 393, per Bradford, J. A corporation cannot buy its own stock if the rights of creditors are thereby prejudiced; 104 Ill. 26; 8 Bradw. 554; but apart from the rights of creditors, it is held in some states that such a transaction is lawful; 14 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 501; 89 Fed. Rep. 89; 84 Ill. 145; 104 Mass. 37. Accepting its own stock in payment of land sold by it is not necessarily invalid; 20 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 854; where the company is perfectly solvent; 8 Bradw. 554. In England it is held that a corporation cannot purchase its own shares; 12 App. Cas. 409; and a stockholder may enjoin such purchase; L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 337.

The books of a corporation are said to be "the common property of all the stockholders;" 105 Pa. 111; and are subject to their inspection for proper purposes and at proper times; 51 Fed. Rep. 61; 40 N. J. Eq. 392; the right may be enforced by mandamus; 105 Pa. 111. Mandamus will be granted, at the discretion of the court, which "will be exercised with great discrimination and care;" 70 N. Y. 220; and will not be granted where the applicant seeks to "accomplish personal or speculative ends;" 70 N. Y. 220; or to "gratify idle curiosity;" 9 Mich. 328; or at the "caprice of the curious or suspicious;" 105 Pa. 111. The petition should aver a demand for inspection and a refusal by the corporation; 6 D. R. (Pa.) 266. The stockholder may take off a list of stockholders; id. The statutory right of a creditor or a member of a company to inspect the register of its mortgages carries with it the right to take copies; [1897] 1 Ch. 130. See RECORDS; PRODUCTION OF BOOKS.

A stockholder has no right, by the inherent powers of a court of equity, to bring suit to wind up the business of a corporation; 60 How. 280.

A suit in equity may be maintained by a creditor of a corporation against a stockholder only in the courts of the state in which the corporation is created, and the corporation is a necessary party defendant; 86 Fed. Rep. 45.

STOCK NOTES. This term has no technical meaning and may as well apply to a note given on the sale of stock which the bank had purchased or taken in the payment of doubtful debts as to a note given on account of an original subscription to stock. 12 Ill. 402.

STOCK ORDER. The order in chancery to prevent drawing out a fund in court to the prejudice of an assignee or lienholder.

STOCKS. In Criminal Law. A machine, commonly made of wood, with holes in it, in which to confine persons accused of or guilty of crime.

It was used either to confine unruly offenders by way of security, or convicted criminals for punishment. This barbarous punishment had been generally abandoned in the United States.

STOLEN GOODS. See RECENT POSSESSION of STOLEN GOODS; RECEIVER OF STOLEN GOODS.

STOP, LOOK, AND LISTEN. One crossing a railroad or street railway track in Pennsylvania is guilty of contributory negligence in law if he does not first stop, look, and listen. It is an absolute and unbending rule of public policy. 172 Pa. 388. See GRADE CROSSING.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU. A resumption by the seller of the possession of goods not paid for, while on their way to the vendee and before he has acquired actual possession of them. 15 Me. 314.

Chancellor Kent has defined the right of stoppage in transitu to be that which the vendor has, when he sells goods on credit to another, of resuming the possession of the goods while they are in the possession of a carrier or middleman, in the transit to the consignee or vendee, and before they arrive into his actual possession, or the designation he has appointed for them, on his becoming bankrupt and insolvent; 2 Kent 702.

The right of stoppage in transitu is an equitable extension recognized by the courts of common law, of the seller's lien for the price of goods of which the buyer has acquired the property, but not the possession. This right is paramount to any lien created by usage or by agreement between the carrier and the consignee, for a general balance of account, but not to the lien of the carrier for freight; 131 Mass. 457.

For most purposes, the possession of the carrier is considered to be that of the buyer; but by virtue of this right, which is an extension of the right of lien, the vendor may reclaim the possession before they reach the vendee, in case of the insolvency of the latter; 4 Gray 336; 2 Caines 98; 8 M. & W. 341, which gives a history of the law.

The vendor, or a consignor to whom the vendee is liable for the price; 3 East 93;

6 id. 17; 13 Me. 103; 1 Binn. 106; or a general or special agent acting for him; 9 M. & W. 518; 5 Whart. 189; 13 Me. 93; 43 N. H. 589; 105 Mass. 275; see 4 Gray 367; 1 Hill N. Y. 302; 5 Mass. 157; 123 id. 12; may exercise the right.

The vendor can bring suit for the price of the goods after he has caused them to be stopped in transitu, and while they are yet in his possession, provided he be ready to deliver them upon payment of the price; 1 Camp. 109; but the right of the vendor after stoppage exceeds a mere lien; for he may resell the goods; 6 Mod. 152.

There need not be a manual seizure: it is sufficient if a claim adverse to the buyer be made during their passage; 2 B. & P. 457; 9 M. & W. 518; 13 Me. 93; 5 Denio 333.

The goods sold must be unpaid for, either wholly or partially; 15 Me. 314; 2 Exch. 702. As to the rule where a note has been given, see 2 M. & W. 375; 7 Mass. 453; 4 Cush. 33; 7 Pa. 301; where there has been a pre-existing debt, 4 Camp. 31; 16 Pick. 475; 3 Paige, Ch. 373; 1 Binn. 106; 1 B. & P. 563; where there are mutual credits, 7 Dowl. & R. 126; 16 Pick. 467; where the vendee gives a draft, 62 Hun 376. The vendee must be insolvent; 4 Ad. & E. 332; 20 Conn. 54; 8 Pick. 198; 14 Pa. 51. 102 N. C. 390; 63 Ala. 243; 84 Mich. 612. A seller cannot stop goods in transit simply because the buyer absconded before they reached him, where the buyer's insolvency is not shown; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 340.

The goods must be in transit; 3 Term 466; 15 B. Monr. 270; 16 Pick. 474; 20 N. H. 154. Where goods sold are shipped by rail and a transfer company, under a previous general order of the buyer, receives the goods at the depot to convey them to the buyer's place of business, the goods are still in transit and the seller may still exercise his right of stoppage; 48 Mo. App. 521. In order to preclude the right the goods must have come actually into the hands of the vendee or some person acting for him; 2 M. & W. 632; 1 Pet. 386; 3 Mas. 107; 23 Wend. 611; 54 Fed. Rep. 306; or constructively, as, by reaching the place of destination: 9 B. & C. 422; 3 B. & P. 320, 469; 7 Mass. 457; 20 N. H. 154; 2 Curt. C. C. 259; 3 Vt. 49; 102 N. C. 390; or by coming into an agent's possession; 4 Camp. 181; 7 Mass. 453; 4 Dana 7; 38 Pa. 254; see 22 Conn. 473; 17 N. Y. 249; 7 Cal. 213; 53 Mo. App. 139; or by being deposited for the vendee in a public store or warehouse; 5 Denio 631; 7 Pa. 301; 4 Camp. 251; 113 N. C. 36; or by delivery of part for the whole; 14 M. & W. 28; 14 B. Monr. 324.

The right can be defeated, where there is no special legislation on the subject, only by a transfer of the bill of lading; 37 U. S. App. 266; but the assignment, unindorsed, of a bill of lading will not defeat the right, if the goods are still in transit; 7 U. S. App. 544. The right expires when the goods have been delivered; id.

Where goods are in the hands of a carrier, they may be stopped, although the purchaser has handed to the shipping agent the bills of lading received by him from the vendor and received a bill of lading for them, and the purchaser is himself a passenger on the vessel on which they are shipped; L. R. 15 App. Cas. 391.

The delivery of goods at the buyer's store which was at the time in the possession of the sheriff under an attachment, is not a delivery to the consignee; 85 Tex. 254. See 160 Pa. 527.

Where there is no contract to the contrary, express or implied, the employment of a carrier by a vendor of goods on credit constitutes all middlemen into whose custody they pass for transportation and delivery, agents of the vendor; and until the complete delivery of the goods, they are deemed in transitu; 21 Ohio St. 281. The right cannot be superseded by an attachment at the suit of a general creditor, levied while the goods are in transitu; 50 Miss. 500, 590. If the vendor attach the goods while in transit, his right of stoppage will be destroyed; 15 Conn. 335. Where goods are to be delivered a part at a time, and various deliveries are so made, the right to stop the remaining portion is not lost; nor will the fact that the entire lot of goods was transferred on the books of the warehouse affect the right; 106 Mass. 76; 17 Wend. 504. The right of stoppage in transitu is looked upon with favor by the courts; 2 Eden 77; 21 Ohio St. 281.

The effect of the exercise of this right is to repossess the parties of the same rights which they had before the vendor resigned his possession of the goods sold; 1 Q. B. 389; 10 B. & C. 99; 14 Me. 314; 5 Ohio 98; 20 Conn. 53; 10 Tex. 2; 19 Am. Rep. 87.

STORE. To keep for safe custody. 3 N. Y. 122; 16 Barb. 119. A place where goods are sold at a profit. 15 So. Rep. (Miss.) 37.

STORE-HOUSE. A building for the storage of goods, grain, food-stuffs, etc. A livery-stable has been held a store-house. 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1028.

STORE ORDERS. In some states the maintaining of general supply stores by companies or individual employers is forbidden. Thus, in New Jersey and Tennessee it is unlawful for any manufacturer, firm, or corporation, who owns or controls a store for the sale of general goods or merchandise in connection with their business, to attempt to control their employes in the purchase of goods at such stores, by withholding the payment of wages longer than the usual time. In Maryland, the statute applies to railways and mines only; in Pennsylvania only to mining and manufacturing corporations. In some other states (Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, and Washington), the company may have such stores, but it is made a penal offence to compel or coerce an employe to deal at such company stores or with any particular person or corporation.

In some states (Ohio, Virginia, and Indiana) the prohibition is only against selling goods to employes at a higher profit than to others, or than to cash customers, or at prices higher than their market value; and debts thus incurred are made not collectible, or (in Ohio) the employe may recover back double such excess in price.

But in Illinois and West Virginia, statutes forbidding certain corporations to maintain company stores have been held invalid; 33 W. Va. 179; 10 S. E. Rep. 285; 31 N. E. Rep. 395; but see 48 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 512, where it was held that the legislature might prohibit the issuance of store orders in payment of wages. See Stimson, Lab. Laws § 24; LIBERTY OF CONTRACT; POLICE POWER.

STORES. The supplies for the subsistence and accommodation of a ship's crew and passengers. Under the words stores, tackle, apparel, etc., will not pass. 2 Stark. 105.

STOUTHRIEFF. In Scotch Law. Formerly this word included in its signification every species of theft accompanied with violence to the person; but of late years it has become the cox signata for forcible and masterful depredation within or near the dwelling-house; while robbery has been more particularly applied to violent depredation on the highway, or accompanied by house-breaking. Alison, Prin. Scotch Law 227.

STOWAGE. In Maritime Law. The proper arrangement in a ship of the different articles of which a cargo consists, so that they may not injure each other by friction, or be damaged by the leakage of the ship.

The master of the ship is bound to attend to the stowage, unless by custom or agreement this business is to be performed by persons employed by the merchant; Abb. Shipp. 13th ed. 391; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 721.

Merchandise and other property must be stored under deck, unless a special agreement or established custom and usage authorizes their carriage on deck. See SEAWORTHY.

STRADDLE. See OPTION.

STRAND. The shore or bank of a sea or river. Cowel. That portion of the land lying between ordinary high and low water mark. 47 N. Y. Supp. 280.

STRANDING. In Maritime Law. The running of a ship or other vessel on shore; it is either accidental or voluntary.

Accidental stranding takes place where the ship is driven on shore by the winds and waves and remains stationary for some time.

Voluntary stranding takes place where the ship is run on shore either to preserve her from a worse fate or for some fraudulent purpose. Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 12, s. 1.

It is of great consequence to define accurately what shall be deemed a stranding; but this is no easy matter. In one case, a ship having run on some wooden piles, four feet under water, erected in Wisbeach river, about nine yards from shore, which were placed there to keep up the banks of the river, and having remained on these piles until they were cut away, was considered by Lord Kenyon to have been stranded; Marsh. Ins. b. 7, s. 3. In another case, a ship arrived in the river Thames, and upon coming up to the pool, which was full of vessels, one brig ran foul of her bow and another vessel of her stern, in consequence of which she was driven aground, and continued in that situation an hour, during which period several other vessels ran foul of her. As to this, Lord Kenyon told the jury that, unskilled as he was in nautical affairs, he thought he could safely pronounce to be no stranding; 1 Camp. 131; 3 id. 431; 4 Maule & S. 508; 5 B. & Ald. 225; 4 B. & C. 736; 7 id. 224. See PERILS OF THE SEA.

When a vessel takes the ground in the ordinary course of navigation, from a natural deficiency of water, or from the ebb of the tide, it is not a stranding; 11 C. B. 876; 73 E. C. L. 875; 2 Sumn. 197. But where a ship was fastened at the pier of a dock basin against the advice of the master, and when the tide ebbed, took the ground and fell over on her side, in consequence of which, when the tide rose, she filled with water, it was held to be a stranding; 4 M. & S. 77. See, also, 5 B. & A. 225; 72 E. C. L. 455; 1 E. & B. 456.

It may be said, in general terms, that in order to constitute a stranding, the ship must be in the course of prosecuting her voyage when the loss occurs; there must be a settling down on the obstructing object; and the vessel must take the ground by reason of extraordinary casualty, and not from one of the ordinary incidents of a voyage. Arn. Ins. §§ 297, 318. And see Phill. Ins.; 31 N. Y. 106; 88 Am. Dec. 242; 42 id. 188; 13 Ohio 66.

STRANGER. A person born out of the United States; but in this sense the term alien is more properly applied until he becomes naturalized.

A person who is not privy to an act or contract: example, he who is a stranger to the issue shall not take advantage of the verdict; Brooke, Abr. Record, pl. 3; Viner, Abr. 1. And see Com. Dig. Abatement (H 54). See 118 N. Y. 156.

When a man undertakes to do a thing, and a stranger interrupts him, this is no excuse; Com. Dig. Condition (L 14). When a party undertakes that a stranger shall do a certain thing, he becomes liable as soon as the stranger refuses to perform it; Bac. Abr. Conditions (Q 4).

STRATAGEM. A deception either by words or actions, in times of war, in order to obtain an advantage over an enemy.

Stratagems, though contrary to morality, have been justified unless they have been accompanied by perfidy, injurious to the rights of humanity, as in the example given by Vattel of an English frigate, which during a war between France and England appeared off Calais and made signals of distress in order to allure some vessel to come to its relief, and seized a shallop and its crew who had generously gone out to render it assistance. Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, c. 9, § 178.

STRATOCRACY. A military government; government by military chiefs of an army.

STREAM. A current of water. A body of water having a continuous flow in one direction. 34 L. R. Sc. 174. The right to a water-course is not a right in the fluid itself, so much as a right in the current of the stream. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1612. The owner of the land on both sides of a navigable stream, above the ebb and flow of the tide, is the owner of the bed of the stream, and entitled to all the ice that forms within the extent of his lands; 14 Chi. L. News 83. See RIVER; WATER-COURSE; ICE.

STREET. A public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village. It differs from a country highway; 21 Alb. L. J. 45; 4 S. & R. 106; 11 Barb. 399. It means the whole surface and so much of the depth as is or can be used, not unfairly, for the ordinary purposes of a street. L. R. 4 Q. B. D. 121. A street is not an easement, but a dedication to the public of the occupation of the surface for passing and repassing; L. R. 3 Ch. 306; 1 Q. B. D. 703. See HIGHWAY.

A street, besides its use as a highway for travel, may be used for the accommodation of drains, sewers, aqueducts, water, and gas-pipes, lines of telegraph, and for other purposes conducive to the general police, sanitary, and business interests of a city; 17 Barb. 435; 2 R. I. 15; 106 Ill. 337; 29 Hun 245; 79 Ind. 491. Its use belongs, from side to side and end to end, to the public; 73 Ind. 193. A street may be used by individuals for the lading and unlading of carriages, for the temporary deposit of movables or of materials and scaffoldings for building or repairing, provided such use shall not unreasonably abridge or incommode its primary use for travel; 6 East 427; 3 Camp. 230; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 76, s. 49; 4 Ad. & E. 405; 4 Ia. 199; 1 Den. 524; 1 S. & R. 219; 107 N. Y. 360; 59 Ia. 65; 58 Me. 56; 36 L. R. A. 805. As to playing organs on a street, see [1897] 1 Q. B. 84. The mere fact that a person is engaged in what is known as play on a public street does not necessarily make him a trespasser; 10 U. S. App. 546. A sidewalk which is part of a street may be excavated for a cellar, pierced by an aperture for the admission of light, or overhung by an awning. But if the highway becomes more unsafe and a passenger is injured by reason thereof, the individual so using the street will be responsible for the damages; 18 N. Y. 79; 3 C. & P. 262; 23 Wend. 446; 6 Cush. 524. See 107 Mass. 234; 66 Ia. 219; 104 N. Y. 268. But an individual has no right to have an auction in a street; 13 S. & R. 403; or to keep a crowd of carriages standing therein; 3 Camp. 230; or to attract a disorderly crowd of people to witness a caricature in a shop-window; 6 C. & P. 636. Such an act constitutes a nuisance; Ang. High. c. 6. An encroachment upon a street, the dedication and acceptance of which is established, is nothing more or less than a nuisance, which cannot be aided by lapse of time; 84 Va. 337. In a suit by abutting owners to enjoin obstruction, no other parties defendant are necessary than the alleged trespasser; 54 Fed. Rep. 925.

The owners of lands adjoining a street are not entitled to compensation for damages occasioned by a change of grade or other lawful alteration of the street; 2 B. & A. 403; 1 Pick. 417; 4 N. Y. 195; 33 Atl. Rep. 756; 14 Mo. 20; 2 R. I. 154; 6 Wheat. 593; 20 How. 135; 75 Mo. 213; 75 Wis. 9; 100 Ind. 545; unless such damages result from a want of due skill and care or an abuse of authority; 5 B. & Ald. 837; 16 N. Y. 158. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

Under the statutes of several of the states, assessments are levied upon the owners of lots specially benefited by opening, widening, or improving streets, to defray the expense thereof; and such assessments have been adjudged to be a constitutional exercise of the taxing power; 4 N. Y. 419; 8 Wend. 85; 18 Pa. 26; 21 id. 147; 3 Watts 293; 23 Conn. 189; 5 Gill 383; 27 Mo. 209; 4 R. I. 230; Ang. High. c. 4. See Dill. Mun. Corp. STRICT CONSTRUCTION. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

STRICT SETTLEMENT. A settlement of lands to the parent for life, and after his death to his first and other sons in tail, with an interposition of trustees to preserve the contingent remainders.

STRICTISSIMI JURIS (Lat. the most strict right or law). In general, when a person receives an advantage, as the grant of a license, he is bound to conform strictly to the exercise of the rights given him by it, and in case of a dispute it will be strictly construed. See 3 Stor. C. C. 159.

STRICTUM JUS (Lat.). Mere law, in contradistinction to equity.

STRIKE. A combined effort by workmen to obtain higher wages or other concessions from their employers, by stopping work at a preconcerted time. Where this is peaceably effected without positive breach of contract, it is not unlawful, but it sometimes amounts to conspiracy. Most of the decisions bear upon questions arising more or less indirectly from the strike.

A conspiracy to obtain from a master mechanic money which he is under no legal obligation to pay, by inducing his workmen to leave him and by deterring others from entering his employment, or by threatening to do this, so that he is induced to pay the money demanded, is an illegal conspiracy; 106 Mass. 1. See 9 Neb. 390.

It is no answer to a suit against a common carrier for failure to deliver goods with reasonable promptness, that a strike among their employes prevented; 20 N. Y. 48; 18 Ill. 488. But otherwise if the employes are discharged and afterwards interfere unlawfully with the business of the road; 15 Alb. L. J. 39; Cooley, Torts 640, n. Where a railroad company receives freight for shipment, it is not liable for delay in its delivery which is caused by a strike of its employes, accompanied by violence and intimidation of such a character as cannot be overcome by the company or controlled by the civil authorities when called upon; 81 Ga. 792; 74 Tex. 8; 84 Ill. 36.

In L. R. 6 Eq 555, the president and secretary of a trades-union, and a printer employed by them, were restrained by injunction from posting placards and publishing advertisements, urging workmen to keep away from plaintiff's factory, where a strike against the reduction of wages was in progress; but in L. R. 10 Ch. 142, this case was overruled.

An attempt has been made to derive some of the authority for the use of an injunction in such cases to an extent not before recognized in the settled principles of equity jurisprudence from the English Judicature Act of 1873 as a consequence of the union of law and equity procedure. In 20 Ch. Div. 501, it is said that "the courts have interpreted this act as giving them power to restrain one man from persuading another to break his contract with a third person, when the object of such persuasion is the malicious injury to the third person."

Where a trades-union ordered a strike and posted pickets to persuade workmen from entering the employ of the plaintiff, such conduct was held to come within the terms of the act prescribing a penalty against every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing, or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority . . . watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place." [1896] 1 Ch. 811.

The circuit court of the United States had jurisdiction to restrain the unlawful acts of persons engaged in a strike where they interfere with the operations of interstate commerce or with the transmission of the mails, and may enforce its injunction by proceedings in contempt which are not open to review on habeas corpus in the supreme court or any other court; 158 U. S. 564.

A "boycott" by the members of trades-unions or assemblies is unlawful, and may be enjoined; but in such suits a federal court has no jurisdiction over defendants who are citizens of the same state with the complainant, nor can the association be used as a body or its members who are not parties to the record be enjoined; 72 Fed. Rep. 695.

There is no authority for issuing an injunction to prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another; "equity will not compel the actual affirmative performance by an employe of merely personal services, any more than it will compel an employer to retain in his personal service one who, no matter for what cause, is not acceptable to him for service in that character." 63 Fed. Rep. 310 (Harlan, J).

A display of force by strikers against laborers who wish to work, such as surrounding them in large numbers, applying opprobrious epithets to them, and urging them in a hostile manner not to go to work, though no force be actually used, is as much intimidation as violence itself. Such conduct will be restrained by injunction, and the actors will be liable in damages to the employer of the laborers. Where new men employed to take the place of strikers are on their way to work, their time cannot be lawfully taken up and their progress interfered with by the strikers on any pretence or under any claim of right to argue or persuade them to break their contracts. Where a bill has been filed against strikers for an injunction and for damages for injuries caused by their illegal conduct, the plaintiff has a right to proceed with the case after the strike is over, for the purpose of recovering damages, and it is improper for a judge to express from the bench an opinion that the case should have been dropped; 183 Pa. 236. See BOYCOTT; COMBINATION; CONSPIRACY; INJUNCTION; LABOR UNION; MALICE; RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

STRIKING A DOCKET. In English Practice. Entering the creditor's affidavit and bond in bankruptcy. 1 Deac. Bank. 106.

STRIKING A JURY. In English Practice. Where, for nicety of the matter in dispute, or other cause, a special jury is necessary, upon motion and rule granted thereon, the sheriff is to attend the prothonotary or proper officer with the book of freeholders, and to take indifferently forty-eight of the principal freeholders, when the attorneys on each side, being present, are to strike off twelve respectively, and the remaining twenty-four are returned. 3 Bla. Com. 357. Essentially the same practice prevails in New York, Pennsylvania, and other states; Tr. & H. Pr. § 636. See JURY; Graham, Pr. 377. In some of the states a special or struck jury is granted as of course upon the application of either party; but more generally it must appear to the court that a fair trial cannot be otherwise had, or that the intricacy and importance of the case require it. One of the parties being a citizen of color, the judge cannot properly direct a special jury to be impanelled, one-half of whom are of African descent; 3 Baxt. 373; 100 U. S. 313. The statutory method of striking is held to be mandatory; 26 Wis. 423; 78 Pa. 308. See Abb. N. Y. Dig. tit. Trial §§ 196-208; Thomp. & Merr. Jur. § 14.

STRUCK. In Pleading. A word essential in an indictment for murder, when the death arises from any wounding, beating, or bruising. 1 Bulstr. 184; 5 Co. 122; Cro. Jac. 655; 6 Binn. 179.

STRUCK JURY. See STRIKING A JURY.

STRUCK OFF. A term applied to a case which the court, having no jurisdiction over, and not being able to give judgment, order to be taken off the record. This is done by an entry to that effect.

As to the meaning of the words as used at an auction sale, see KNOCKED DOWN.

STRUCTURE. That which is built or constructed;—an edifice or building of any kind. Poles connected by wires for the transmission of electricity; 19 Ore. 61; a mine or pit; 66 Cal. 271; a railroad track; 46 Conn. 313; see 42 Fed. Rep. 470 (contra, 35 Ohio St. 559); are structures. Swings or seats are not; 55 Cal. 159. See MECHANICS' LIEN.

STRUMPET. A harlot, or courtesan. Jacob, Law Dict.

STUDENTS. Students living in a place merely for the purpose of attending college have not such residence as will entitle them to vote there. 71 Pa. 302; 40 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 769, Affg. 31 N. Y. Supp. 1043; contra, 10 Mass. 488. See McCr. Elect. § 34; CHANCELLOR'S COURTS IN THE TWO UNIVERSITIES; DOMICIL.

STUFF GOWN. The professional robe worn by barristers of the outer bar; viz. those who are not queen's counsel. Brown.

STULTIFY (Lat. stultus, stupid). To make one out mentally incapacitated for the performance of an act.

It has been laid down by old authorities; Littleton § 405; 4 Co. 123; Cro. Eliz. 398; that no man should be allowed to stultify himself, i. e. plead disability through mental unsoundness. This maxim was soon doubted as law; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 414; 2 Bla. Com. 292; and has been completely overturned; 2 Kent 451.

STUMPAGE. The sum agreed to be paid to an owner of land for trees standing upon his land, the purchaser being permitted to enter upon the land and to cut down and remove the trees; in other words it is the price paid for a license to cut. 67 Mo. 478.

STUPRUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The criminal sexual intercourse which took place between a man and a single woman, maid, or widow, who before lived honestly. Inst. 4. 18. 4; Dig. 48. 5. 6; 50. 16. 101.

STURGEON. See ROYAL FISH.

SUABLE. Capable of being, or liable to be, sued. A suable cause of action is the matured cause of action. 82 N. Y. 218.

SUB-AGENT. A person appointed by an agent to perform some duty, or the whole of the business relating to his agency.

A sub-agent is generally invested with the same rights, and incurs the same liabilities in regard to his immediate employers, as if the latter were the real principal. To this general rule there are some exceptions: for example, where, by the general usage of trade or the agreement of the parties, sub-agents are ordinarily or necessarily employed to accomplish the ends of the agency, there, if the agency is avowed and the credit is exclusively given to the principal, the intermediate agent may be entirely exempted from all liability to the sub-agent. The agent, however, will be liable to the sub-agent unless such exclusive credit has been given, although the real principal or superior may also be liable; Story, Ag. § 386. When the agent employs a sub-agent to do the whole or any part of the business of the agency, without the knowledge or consent of his principal, either express or implied, the latter will only be entitled to recover from his immediate employer, and his sole responsibility is also to him. In this case the superior or real principal is not responsible to the sub-agent, because there is no privity between them; Story, Ag. §§ 13, 217, 387.

Where, by an express or implied agreement of the parties, or by the usages of trade, a sub-agent is to be employed, a privity exists between the principal and the sub-agent, and the latter may justly maintain his claim for compensation both against the principal and his immediate employer, unless exclusive credit is given to one of them; and in that case his remedy is limited to that party; 1 Livermore, Ag. 64; Mich. Ag. 690; 6 Taunt. 147. See AGENT.

SUB CONDITIONEM. Upon condition.

SUB-CONTRACT. A contract by one who has contracted for the performance of labor or service with a third party for the whole or part performance of that labor or service. 9 M. & W. 710; 3 Gray 362; 17 Wend. 550. See INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

SUB-CONTRACTOR. One who has entered into a contract, express or implied, for the performance of an act with the person who has already contracted for its performance. Phill. Mech. Liens § 44; 101 N. C. 611. See 127 Ind. 257.

SUB PEDE SIGILI (Lat.). Under the foot of the seal; under seal. This expression is used when it is required that a record should be certified under the seal of the court.

SUB SUO PERICULO. At his own risk.

SUB-TENANT. An under-tenant.

SUBALTERN. An officer who exercises his authority under the superintendence and control of a superior.

SUBDITUS. A vassal; a dependent; one under the power of another. Spelman.

SUBDIVIDE. To divide a part of a thing which has already been divided. For example, when a person dies leaving children, and grandchildren, the children of one of his own who is dead, his property is divided into as many shares as he had children, including the deceased, and the share of the deceased is subdivided into as many shares as he had children.

SUBINFEUDATION. The act of an inferior lord by which he carved out a part of an estate which he held of a superior, and granted it to an inferior tenant to be held of himself.

It was an indirect mode of transferring the fief, and resorted to as an artifice to elude the feudal restraint upon alienation. This was forbidden by the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Ed. I.; 2 Bla. Com. 91; 3 Kent 406. See Cadw. Gr. Rents § 7; Chal. R. P. 18; QUIA EMPTORES; FEUDAL LAW; TENURE.

SUBJECT. An individual member of a nation, who is subject to the laws. This term is used in contradistinction to citizen, which is applied to the same individual when considering his political rights.

In monarchical governments, by subject is meant one who owes permanent allegiance to the monarch. See Greenl. Ev. § 286; Phill. Ev. 732; Morse, Citizenship; ALLEGIANCE; CITIZENSHIP; NATURALIZATION.

SUBJECT-MATTER. The cause; the object; the thing in dispute.

It is a fatal objection to the jurisdiction of the court when it has not cognizance of the subject-matter of the action: as, if a cause exclusively of admiralty jurisdiction were brought in a court of common law, or a criminal proceeding in a court having jurisdiction of civil cases only; 10 Co. 68, 76; 8 Mass. 87. In such case, neither a plea to the jurisdiction nor any other plea would be required to oust the court of jurisdiction. The cause would be dismissed by the court.

SUBJECT TO INSURANCE. A provision in a charter-party, that the freight should be payable, subject to insurance, does not make the insurance by the ship-owner a condition precedent to his right to recover the freight, but means that the insurance premium is to be deducted from the freight. 27 L. J. Ex. 392.

SUBJECTION (Lat. sub, under, jacio, to put, throw). The obligation of one or more persons to act at the discretion or according to the judgment and will of others. Private subjection is subjection to the authority of private persons. Public subjection is subjection to the authority of public persons.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPHS. See TELEGRAPH.

SUBMISSION (Lat. submissio,—sub, under, mittere, to put,—a putting under). Used of persons or things. A putting one's person or property under the control of another. 10 Barb. 218. A yielding to authority. A citizen is bound to submit to the laws, a child to his parents, a guardian to his ward. A victor may enforce the submission of his enemy.

Every consent involves a submission, but it does not follow that a mere submission involves a consent. 9 C. & P. 722.

In Maritime Law. Submission on the part of the vanquished, and complete possession on the part of the victor, transfer property as between belligerents; 1 Gall. 532.

In Practice. An agreement, parol (oral or written) or sealed, by which parties agree to submit their differences to the decision of a referee or arbitrators. It is sometimes termed a reference; Kyd, Arb. 11; 3 M. & W. 816; 6 Watts 359; 16 Vt. 663; 4 N. Y. 157.

It is the authority given by the parties to the arbitrators, empowering them to inquire into and determine the matters in dispute.

It may be in pais, or by rule of court, or under the various statutes; 1 Dev. 82.

It may be oral, but this is inconvenient, because open to disputes; by written agreement not under seal (in Louisiana and California the submission must be in writing; 5 La. 133; 2 Cal. 92); by indenture, with mutual covenants to abide by the decision of the arbitrator; by deed-poll, or by bond, each party executing an obligation to the other conditioned to be void respectively upon the performance of the award; Caldw. Arb. 16; 6 Watts 357. A parol submission followed by a valid award, though not in writing, may be binding and conclusive upon the parties, if the arbitrators act fairly, but before a party is so bound, the agreement to arbitrate must be duly established; 97 Ala. 52.

An offer to arbitrate not accepted by the other party cannot affect his right to sue; 67 Mo. App. 559; where a submission was provided for in a lease, and by failure of the parties to agree upon arbitrators, nothing had been done and suit was brought, the action could be defeated by an offer at the trial to proceed with the arbitration; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 421. A statutory provision for arbitration has been held not to be exclusive of the common-law right to arbitrate; 50 Neb. 858. See also, as to the effect of statutory provisions upon common-law arbitration, 119 N. Y. 475; 80 Ala. 118.

When to be made. A submission may be made at any time of causes not in court, and at common law, where a cause was depending, submission might be made by rule of court before the trial, or by order of nisi prius after it had commenced, which was afterwards made a rule of court; 2 B. & Ald. 395; 3 S. & R. 262; 4 Halst. 198.

Who may make. Any one capable of making a disposition of his property or release of his right, or capable of suing or being sued, may make a binding submission to arbitration; but one under civil or natural incapacity cannot be bound by his submission; Russ. Arb. 20; 2 P. Wms. 45; 9 Ves. 350; 8 Me. 315; 2 N. H. 484; 8 Vt. 472; 16 Mass. 396; 5 Conn. 367; 1 Barb. 584; 2 Rob. Va. 761; 6 Munf. 458; Paine 646; 5 How. 83.

In general, in cases of incapacity of the real owner of property, as well as in many cases of agency, the person who has the legal control of the property may make submission, including a husband for his wife; 5 Ves. 846; a parent or guardian for an infant; Freem. 62, 139; 11 Me. 326; 12 Conn. 376; 3 Caines 253 (but not a guardian ad litem; 9 Humphr. 129); a trustee for his cestui que trust; 3 Esp. 101; an attorney for his client; 1 Ld. Raym. 246; 12 Ala. 252; 9 Pa. 101; 2 Hill, N. Y. 271; 4 T. B. Monr. 375; 7 Cra. 436 (but see 6 Weekl. Rep. 10); an agent duly authorized for his principal; 8 B. & C. 16; 8 Vt. 472; 11 Mass. 449; 5 Green N. J. 38; 29 N. H. 405; 8 N. Y. 160; an executor or administrator at his own peril, but not thereby necessarily admitting assets; 20 Pick. 584; 6 Leigh 62; 5 T. B. Monr. 240; 5 Conn. 621; 1 Barb. 419; 3 Harr. N. J. 442; assignees under bankruptcy and insolvency laws, under the statutory restrictions, stat. 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, and state statutes; the right being limited in all cases to that which the person acting can control and legally dispose of; 6 Mass. 78; 6 Munf. 453; 4 T. B. Monr. 240; 21 Miss. 133; but not including a partner, for a partnership; 1 Cr. M. & R. 681; 1 Pet. 221; 19 Johns. 137; 2 N. H. 284; 5 Gill & J. 412; 12 S. & R. 243; Lind. Partn. 129, 272; 3 Kent 49; the administratrix of a public contractor may join in a submission to arbitration of a controversy arising out of the contract; 9 App. D. C. 360.

What may be included in a submission. Generally, any matter which the parties might adjust by agreement, or which may be the subject of an action or suit at law, except perhaps actions (qui tam) on penal statutes by common informers; for crimes cannot be made the subject of adjustment and composition by arbitration, this being against the most obvious policy of the law; 5 Wend. 111; 2 Rawle 341; 7 Conn. 345; 6 N. H. 177; 16 Miss. 298; 16 Vt. 450; 10 Gill & J. 192; 5 Munf. 10; 120 Mass. 403; 59 Me. 121; 70 Mo. 417; including a debt certain on a specialty, any question of law, the construction of a will or other instrument, any personal injury on which a suit will lie for damages, although it may be also indictable; 9 Ves. 367; 8 Me. 119, 288; 6 Pick. 148. All controversies of a civil nature, including disputes concerning real estate, may be the subject of a submission for arbitration; 35 Kan. 668.

An agreement to refer future disputes will not be enforced by a decree of specific performance, nor will an action lie for refusing to appoint an arbitrator in accordance with such an agreement; 2 B. & P. 135; 2 Stor. 800; 15 Ga. 473. It is considered against public policy to exclude from the tribunals of the state disputes the nature of which cannot be foreseen; 4 Bro. C. C. 312, 315. See 31 Pa. 306.

Effect of. A submission of a case in court works a discontinuance and a waiver of defects in the process; 18 Johns. 22; 10 Yerg. 439; 2 Humphr. 516; 5 Gray 492; 4 Hen. & M. 363; 5 Wisc. 421; 4 N. J. 647; 41 Me. 355; 30 Vt. 610; 2 Curt. C. C. 28; and the bail or sureties on a replevin bond are discharged; 1 Pick. 192; 4 Green N. J. 277; 1 Ired. 9; 3 Ark. 214; 2 B. & Ad. 774. But see 6 Taunt. 379; 10 Bingh. 118. But this rule has been modified in England by stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, § 11; 8 Exch. 327.

The submission which defines and limits, as well as confers and imposes, the duty of the arbitrator must be followed by him in his conduct and award; but a fair and liberal construction is allowed in its interpretation; 1 Wms. Saund. 65; 11 Ark. 477; 3 Pa. 144; 13 Johns. 187; 2 N. H. 126; 2 Pick. 534; 3 Halst. 195; 1 Pet. 222. If general, it submits both law and fact; 7 Ind. 49; if limited, the arbitrator cannot exceed his authority; 11 Cush. 37.

The statutes of many of the states of the United States provide for submissions by the parties before a justice of the peace, in which case the award will be enforced as if it had been made under rule of court; and statutes also regulate submissions made under rule of court.

Revocation of a submission may take place at any time previous to the award, though it be expressed in the agreement to be irrevocable. The remedy of the injured party is by an action for breach of the agreement; Morse, Arb. & Aw. 230; 8 Co. 81; 4 B. & C. 103; 12 Wend. 578; 12 Mass. 49; 20 Vt. 198; 26 Me. 251, 459; 3 Day 118; 23 Pa. 393; 4 Sneed 462; 6 Dana 307; 126 Ill. 72; 35 Fed. Rep. 22. See also 36 id. 408; 111 N. Y. 310; 82 Cal. 42; 59 Minn. 290. A submission by deed must be revoked by deed; 8 Co. 72, and cases above.

A submission under rule of court is generally irrevocable, by force of statutory provisions, both in England and the United States; 5 Burr. 497; 12 Mass. 47; 4 Me. 459; 1 Binn. 42; 6 N. H. 36; 4 Conn. 498; 5 Paige 575; 3 Halst. 116; 3 Ired. 333; 19 Ohio 245. Where there is a contract of agreement, upon sufficient consideration, and rights have accrued to either party so that the status quo cannot be restored, the submission is not revocable; 6 D. R. Pa. 131, where it was held that a submission under the Pennsylvania compulsory arbitration act could not be revoked although some proceedings were waived. A right of revocation must be exercised before the publication of the award; 49 Neb. 280; but where the arbitration agreement provides for a written award, it may be revoked after the arbitrators have communicated to strangers their views, but before they have signed an award; id. 280.

A submission at common law is generally revoked by the death of either party (unless it be stipulated otherwise), or of the arbitrator, or his refusal to act; 2 B. & Ald. 394; 40 N. H. 130; but see 15 Pick. 79; 3 Halst. 116; 2 Gill & J. 479; 3 Swan 90; 15 Ga. 473; by marriage of a feme sole, and the husband and wife may then be sued on her arbitration bond; 5 East 266. It is not revoked by the bankruptcy of the party or by the death of the arbitrator after publication of the award; 4 B. & Ald. 250; 9 B. & C. 629; 21 Ga. 1. A submission in a pending action at law falls where the award fails for misconduct of the arbitrators; 74 Miss. 305.

As to arbitration as a condition precedent, see 11 Harv. L. Rev. 234; JURISDICTION; ARBITRATOR.

SUBMISSION BOND. The bond by which the parties agree to submit the matter in controversy to arbitration, and to abide by the award of the arbitrator. See SUBMISSION.

SUBNOTATIONS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The answers of the prince to questions which had been put to him respecting some obscure or doubtful point of law. See RESCRIPT.

SUBORNATION OF PERJURY. In Criminal Law. The procuring another to commit legal perjury, who in consequence of the persuasion takes the oath to which he has been incited. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 10.

To complete the offence, the false oath must be actually taken, and no abortive attempt to solicit will complete the crime; 2 Show. 1; 5 Metc. Mass. 241; Clark, Cr. L. 330.

But the criminal solicitation to commit perjury, though unsucessful, is a misdemeanor at common law; 2 East 17; 6 id. 464; 1 Hawk. Pl. C. 435; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1197; 26 U. C. Q. B. 297. In fact it has been said: "There appears to have been a period in our law when the unsuccessful solicitation was deemed to constitute, without more, the full subornation of perjury; for as such it and other indictable attempts corruptly to influence a witness are treated of in some of the old books." 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1197. In order to constitute the crime the false swearing procured must be itself perjury; 40 La. Ann. 460. As to what constitutes perjury, see that title. An attempt at subornation of perjury may be shown in evidence at the trial of the cause to which the attempt relates against the guilty party. So also concealment of facts or documents such as a will, accounts, etc., which were in the power of the party to produce and which presumably he would produce; 186 Pa. 197; L. R. 5 Q. B. 314, approved in 130 Mass. 76. See also 103 Ill. 485; 56 Wis. 156; 82 Pa. 537.

For a form of an indictment for an attempt to suborn a person to commit perjury, see 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 480. There must be knowledge that the testimony is false on the part of both, he who solicits and he who is solicited; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1197 a; 10 Sawy. 135; 124 Ill. 17; 19 Fed. Rep. 912.

Provision is made for the punishment of this crime when committed against the administration of justice by the federal government; R. S. §§ 5392, 5393.

SUBPŒNA (Lat. sub, under, pœna, penalty). In Practice. A process to cause a witness to appear and give testimony, commanding him to lay aside all pretences and excuses, and appear before a court or magistrate therein named, at a time therein mentioned, to testify for the party named, under a penalty therein mentioned. This is called distinctively a subpœna ad testificandum.

On proof of service of a subpœna upon the witness, and that he is material, an attachment may be issued against him for a contempt, if he neglect to attend, as commanded.

In Chancery Practice. A mandatory writ or process directed to and requiring one or more persons to appear at a time to come and answer the matters charged against him or them. The writ of subpœna was originally a process in the courts of common law, to enforce the attendance of a witness to give evidence; but this writ was used in the court of chancery for the same purpose as a citation in the courts of civil and canon law, to compel the appearance of a defendant, and to oblige him to answer upon oath the allegations of the plaintiff.

It was invented by John Waltham, bishop of Salisbury, and chancellor to Rich. II., under the authority of the statutes of Westminster II. and 13 Edw. I. c. 34, which enabled him to devise new writs; Cruise, Dig. t. 11, c. 1, § 12. See Vin. Abr. Subpœna; 1 Swanst. 209; Spence, Eq. Jur.

SUBPŒNA AD TESTIFICANDUM. See SUBPŒNA.

SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM. In Practice. A writ or process of the same kind as the subpœna ad testificandum, including a clause requiring the witness to bring with him and produce to the court books, papers, etc., in his hands, tending to elucidate the matter in issue. 2 Bla. Com. 382.

This is the only method in most cases, of obtaining the production of a document in the hands of a person not a party to the action. The use of such processes seems to be, as suggested by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "essential to the very existence and constitution of a court of common law"; 9 East 483, where he states that such writs cannot be traced earlier than the time of Charles II., but it is impossible to conceive that the courts should not have immemorially acted upon written as well as oral evidence, and if so, there must have been some method of requiring the production of the former other than the voluntary favor of those in whose custody it might be.

It can only be used to compel the production of books, papers, accounts, and the like which are comprehended under the term documentary evidence, and not to bring in court such things as stove patterns, for example; 3 Fed. Rep. 12; 48 id. 191.

The writ may issue to a party to the action where he is competent as a witness notwithstanding a statute providing for an order for production to enable an inspection by the adverse party; 8 How. Pr. 24; id. 222; contra, 7 id. 261; 23 N. J. Eq. 212.

The writ is compulsory and must be obeyed by the party to whom it is addressed; 4 Dowl. 273; 7 id. 693; 15 Fed. Rep. 712; and it is a question for the court whether there is any valid reason why the paper shall not be produced and upon what conditions; id.; 2 Jones & Sp. 28; 5 Sm. & M. 198. That the papers are private is not of itself ground for refusal; 9 Mo. App. 261; 14 Gray 240. He must bring them into court for its inspection, though he need not permit them to be given in evidence, if this would prejudice his rights; 10 Pick. 9.

"No witness, however, who is not a party to a suit, can be compelled to produce his title-deeds to any property, or any document the production of which might tend to criminate him, or expose him to any penalty or forfeiture; 2 Taunt. 115; 21 How. Pr. 50; but a witness is not entitled to refuse to produce a document in his possession only because its production may expose him to a civil action (3 Q. B. D. 618), or because he has a lien upon it." Steph. Dig. Ev. art. 118.

This is stated as the English rule, but in this country it is said that the weight of authority confines the excuse for not producing the document to the exposure to penalty or forfeiture or criminal prosecution; 10 Pick. 9.

A custodian of public documents will not be required to bring them into court under a subpœna duces tecum where official copies can be had; 1 Yeates 430; 2 id. 260; or where their production would result in injury to the public; 2 S. & R. 23; 7 Dowl. 693. Papers which are confidential communications are protected as oral statements of the same character would be, as, for example, papers of a client in the hands of his attorney; 4 Vt. 612; 9 M. & W. 609. "Although a paper should be in the legal custody of one man, yet if a subpœna duces tecum is served on another who has the means to produce it, he is bound to do so;" Lord Ellenborough in 1 Campb. 17.

Telegrams are not privileged, and the officers of a telegraph company must produce them under a subpœna duces tecum without respect to rules of the company to the contrary; 3 Dill. 566; 15 Fed. Rep. 712; 72 Mo. 83; or notwithstanding statutes forbidding the disclosure of such messages; 72 Mo. 83; 2 Pars. Sel. Cas. 74. Corporations generally may be required to produce their books and papers which are essential to the rights of litigants; L. R. 9 C. P. 27; 15 Fed. Rep. 718. See an extended note on this subject in 15 Fed. Rep. 718. See DISCOVERY; PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS.

SUBREPTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Obtaining gifts of escheat, etc., from the king by concealing the truth. Bell, Dict.; Calv. Lex. Subripere.

SUBREPTION. In French Law. The fraud committed to obtain a pardon, title, or grant, by alleging facts contrary to truth.

SUBROGATION. The substitution of another person in the place of the creditor, to whose rights he succeeds in relation to the debt. That change which puts another person in the place of the creditor, and which makes the right, the mortgage, or the security which the creditor has pass to the person who is subrogated to him,—that is to say, who enters into his right. Domat, Civ. Law, pt. i. l. iii. t. i. § vi.

It is the substitution of another person in place of the creditor, so that the person substituted will succeed to all the rights of the creditor, having reference to a debt due him. It is independent of any mere contractual relations between the parties to be affected by it, and is broad enough to cover every instance in which one party is required to pay a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and conscience ought to be discharged by the latter; 117 Ind. 551.

It is a legal fiction by force of which an obligation extinguished by payment made by a third party is considered as continuing to subsist for the benefit of this third person, who makes but one and the same person with the creditor in the view of the law.

Subrogation gives to the substitute all the rights of the party for whom he is substituted; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 253. Among the earlier civil-law writers, the term seems to have been used synonymously with substitution; or, rather, substitution included subrogation as well as its present limited signification. See Domat, Civ. Law, passim; Pothier. Obl. passim. The term substitution is now almost altogether confined to the law of devises and chancery practice. See SUBSTITUTION.

The word subrogation is originally found only in the civil law, and has been adopted, with the doctrine itself, thence into equity; but in the law as distinguished from equity it hardly appears as a term, except perhaps in those states where, as in Pennsylvania, equity is administered through the forms of law. The doctrine of marshalling assets is plainly derived from the Roman law of subrogation or substitution; and although the word is, or, rather, has been used sparingly in the common law, many of the doctrines of subrogation are familar to the courts of common law.

It is one thing to decide that a surety is entitled, on payment, to have an assignment of the debt, and quite another to decide that he is entitled to be subrogated or substituted as to the equities and securities to the place of the creditor, as against the debtor and his co-sureties: Story, Eq. Jur. § 493; 2 McLean 451; 1 Dev. Ch. 187.

Convention subrogation results, as its name indicates, from the agreement of the parties, and can take effect only by agreement. This agreement is, of course, with the party to be subrogated, and may be either by the debtor or creditor. La. Civ. Code 1249.

"The doctrine of subrogation is derived from the civil law (43 Pa. 518). In this country, under the initial guidance of Chancellor Kent, its principles have been more widely developed than in England (44 Mo. 338). It is treated as the creature of equity, and is so administered as to secure real and essential justice without regard to form (id.), and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties to be effected by it (6 Neb. 219). It is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter (33 Gratt. 527; 43 Conn. 244." See 117 Ind. 551). Sheld. Subr. § 1; Har. Subr. 1, 22.

Subrogation does not take place until the payment of the whole debt; 22 U. S. App. 54.

A principle which lies at the bottom of the doctrine is that the person seeking it must have paid the debt under grave necessity to save himself a loss. The right is never accorded to a volunteer; 124 U. S. 534; Sheld. Subr. § 240; 14 N. J. Eq. 234; 52 Pa. 522; Spears, Eq. 37; in which is a statement of the doctrine by Johnson, Ch., of which Miller, J., said in 124 U. S. 549: "This is perhaps as clear a statement of the doctrine on this subject as is to be found anywhere."

But under the Louisiana code the payment of a mortgage debt by an ordinary creditor subrogates him to the rights of the mortgagee; 49 La. Ann. 1046; so also of a grantee of the premises who has paid the mortgage in good faith relying on representations that there were no junior liens; 14 Utah 482; but a mortgagee, who, for his own convenience, with knowledge of the facts, accepts several mortgages in discharge of the original one, is not entitled to subrogation; 50 Neb. 601.

Where a bank lent money to a contractor to be used in carrying out his contract and some of it was used by him for paying laborers and material men, the bank was not entitled to subrogation to the claims of the latter; 71 Fed. Rep. 228. As to subrogation to rights of labor, etc., claims, see 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 53; RECEIVER.

Persons are not entitled to the right of subrogation where such alleged right arises from tortious conduct of their own. A person who invokes the doctrine of subrogation must come into court with clean hands; 148 U. S. 573.

Legal subrogation takes place to its full extent—

First, for the benefit of one who being himself a creditor pays the claim of another who has a preference over him by reason of his liens and securities. For in this case, it is said, it is to be presumed that he pays for the purpose of securing his own debt; and this distinguishes his case from that of a mere stranger. Domat, Civ. Law. And so, at common law, if a junior mortgagor pays off the prior mortgage, he is entitled to demand an assignment thereof; 56 Pa. 76; 36 Me. 577.

Second, for the benefit of the purchasers of an immovable, who uses the price which he paid in paying the creditors to whom the inheritance was mortgaged.

Third, for the benefit of him who, being held with others or for others for the payment of the debt, has an interest in discharging it.

Subrogation takes place for the benefit of co-promisors or co-guarantors, as between themselves, and for the benefit of sureties against their principals. But between co-guarantors and co-promisors subrogation benefits him who pays the debt only to the extent of enabling him to recover from each separately his portion of the debt. As against his co-sureties, the surety increasing the value of their joint security is entitled to subrogation only to the amount actually paid; 6 Ind. 857; 12 Gratt. 642. Any arrangement by one co-surety with the principal enures to the benefit of all the co-sureties; 26 Ala. N. S. 280, 728.

If one tenant pays a mortgage, tax lien, or other incumbrance upon the property, he may be subrogated to such lien to secure contribution from his co-tenants. A person who has lent money to a debtor for the purpose of discharging a debt may be subrogated by the debtor to the creditor's rights, and if the party who has agreed to advance the money for the purpose employs it himself in paying the debt and discharging the incumbrance on land given for its security, he is not to be regarded as a volunteer. After such an agreement with the debtor, he is not a stranger in relation to the debt, but he may in equity be entitled to the benefit of the security which he has satisfied with the expectation of receiving a new mortgage or lien upon the land for the money paid; 180 Pa. 522.

When a mortgage is taken upon land with the understanding that it shall be a first lien thereon, and that the money lent is to be applied by the mortgagee to the payment of a prior lien, and it is so applied, the mortgagee is subrogated to the rights of the prior incumbrancer when it is equitable to do so, although there was an antecedent second mortgage of which the subsequent mortgagee had no actual knowledge or notice; 3 Kan. App. 636.

Most of the cases of subrogation so called in the common law arise from transactions of principals and sureties. Courts of equity have held sureties entitled, upon payment of the debt due by their principal to the creditor, to have the full benefit of all the collateral securities, both of a legal and equitable nature, which the creditor has taken as an additional pledge for his debt; Story, Eq. Jur. § 499; Har. Subr. 221.

"A surety who completes a contract with the United States on the contractor's default is subrogated to the rights which the United States might assert against a fund created by the retention of 10 per cent. of the sums estimated from time to time as the value of the work done, in order to insure its completion; and this right relates back to the making of the contract, and is superior to any equitable lien asserted by a bank for moneys advanced to the contractor without the surety's knowledge before he began to complete the work." 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 142.

Where the creditor's right to subrogation depends on the existence in the surety of the rights to which subrogation is sought, after the surety has parted with the thing given him for his protection, the creditor can have no subrogation; 156 U. S. 400.

It is a settled rule that in all cases where a party only secondarily liable on an obligation is compelled to discharge it, he has a right in a court of equity to stand in the place of the creditor, and be subrogated to all his rights against the party previously liable; 4 Johns. Ch. 123; 4 Pick. 505; 3 Stor. 392; 1 Gill & J. 346; 10 Yerg. 310. This is clearly the case where the surety takes an assignment of the security; 2 Me. 341.

If a surety on a debt secured by mortgage pays the debt, he is entitled to the mortgage as security; 2 Sim. 155. In all cases, the payment must have been made by a party liable, and not by a mere volunteer; 3 Paige, Ch. 117; 2 Brock. 252; 4 Bush 471; 124 U. S. 534; see 87 Ky. 667; but it will be applied whenever the person claiming its benefits has paid a debt for which another was primarily answerable, and which he was compelled to pay in order to protect his own rights or save his own property; 29 W. Va. 480; 124 U. S. 534. The creditor must have had his claim fully satisfied; 1 Gill & J. 347; and the surety claiming subrogation must have paid it; 6 Watts 221; 3 Barb. Ch. 625; 11 Ired. 118; 13 Ill. 68; and is subrogated, where he has paid to redeem a security, only to the amount he has paid, whatever be the value of the security; 19 Miss. 632; 11 Gratt. 522. But giving a note is payment within this rule; 8 Tex. 66. One who advances money to the mortgage creditor of his debtor, in the payment of interest accumulations on the mortgage debt, becomes legally subrogated, pro tanto to the mortgage creditor's right; 44 La. Ann. 537. When a mortgagor fails to protect junior incumbrancers against a prior lien when it is his duty to do so, they may pay it and be subrogated to the rights of the holder thereto; 120 U. S. 287. The surety after paying the debt is entitled to enforce every security which the creditor has against the principal; 82 Va. 65.

To prevent a satisfaction when a surety pays the money to the creditor, to preserve the security for the benefit of the surety so paying, it must be assigned to a trustee, and in no other way can it be kept alive; 101 N. C. 589.

Judgment obtained against the principal and surety does not destroy the relation as between themselves; 2 Ga. 239; 11 Barb. 159. If a judgment is recovered against a debtor and surety separately for the same amount, the surety can enforce the judgment against his principal when assigned to him after he paid the amount of the judgment; 10 Johns. 524; 3 Rich. Eq. 139.

A surety in a judgment to obtain a stay o fexecution is not entitled to be substituted on paying the judgment, as against subsequent creditors; 5 W. & S. 352. Nor can the surety be subrogated, although he has paid a judgment, if he has sued his principal and failed to recover; 8 Watts 384.

If a judgment is recovered and the sureties pay, they are entitled to be subrogated; 1 W. & S. 155; 14 Ga. 674; 5 B. Monr. 393; 3 Sandf. Ch. 431; even where a mortgage had been given them, but which turned out to be invalid; 4 Hen. & M. 436. This seems to be contradicted in 3 Gratt. 343.

Entry of satisfaction on a judgment does not destroy subrogation, if the entry was not made at the instance of the surety; 20 Pa. 41.

Where the surety has become liable on the contract of his principal, when the principal fails to perform the contract, the surety may pay and be subrogated; 3 Gill & J. 243; 15 N. H. 119; thus, where the surety was held on a bond which he was obliged to pay; 1 Ired. Eq. 340; 22 Vt. 274; and this even where the bond was given to the United States to pay duties on goods belonging to a third person; 4 Rand. 438. And where the bond was given for the payment of the price of land, he was allowed to sell the land; 2 D. & B. 390; 2 B. Monr. 50.

But it is said the mere payment does not ipso facto subrogate him; 6 W. & S. 190.

If the surety be also a debtor, there will be no substitution, unless expressly made; 2 Pa. 296; and the person who claims a right of subrogation must have superior equities to those opposing him; 3 Pa. 200.

Sureties of a surety, and his assignee, are entitled to all the rights of the surety, and to be substituted to his place as to all remedies against the principal or his estate; 5 Barb. 398; 22 Vt. 274.

A surety cannot compel the creditor to exhaust his security before coming on the surety; 37 N. J. L. 370.

The debt of the acceptor of a bill is not extinguished by the payment of the bill by the indorser or drawer; for the same rights will remain against him, in their favor, which the holder had himself, unless he is a mere accommodation acceptor; Story, Bills § 422. See a limitation in 19 Barb. 562.

But if payment is made by an indorser who had not received due notice, it is at his own risk, and he can ordinarily have no recourse over to third persons; Chitty, Bills, c. 9; Har. Subr. 174.

An accommodation acceptor is not entitled on payment to a security given to an accommodation indorser; 1 Dev. Eq. 205.

An accommodation indorser who is obliged to pay the note is subrogated to the collateral securities; 12 La. Ann. 783. This subrogation in the civil law operates for the benefit of a holder by intervention (i. e. who pays for the honor of the drawer).

Payment of a note by an indorser actually bound, produces the legal effect of subrogating him to the rights of the last holder; 40 La. Ann. 351.

This species of subrogation (by indorsement) is to be distinguished from that which a surety on a note has when he is compelled to pay. Such surety is entitled to the benefit of all the securities which the holder has; 4 Ired. Eq. 22; 22 Pa. 68; 7 N. H. 286.

In the civil law, an agent who buys goods for his principal with his own money is so far subrogated to the principal's rights that if he fails the agent may sell his goods as if they were his own; Cour. de Cass. Nov. 14, 1810.

An insurer of real property is subrogated to the rights of the insured against third parties who are responsible for the loss at common law; 2 B. & C. 254; 13 Metc. 99; 73 N. Y. 399; 39 Me. 253; 25 Conn. 265. And it is well settled in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and Illinois, that the mortgagee cannot, after payment of his debt by the underwriter, enforce his claim against the mortgagor, but that the underwriter is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee; 17 Pa. 253; 70 N. Y. 19; 52 Ill. 442; 2 Dutch. 541; 45 Me. 354. So in Canada; 1 Low. Can. 222. The contrary view, however, has been consistently maintained in Massachusetts; 7 Cush. 1; 10 Allen 283.

But an insurance company is not subrogated to the rights of a mortgagee who has paid the premiums himself, so as to demand an assignment of the mortgage before paying his claim when the buildings were burned; 2 Gray 216; 8 Hare 216.

The insurer upon paying to the assured the amount of the loss, total or partial, of the goods insured, becomes, without any formal assignment or any express stipulation to that effect in the policy, subrogated in a corresponding amount to the assured's right of action against the carrier or other person responsible for the loss, and in a court of admiralty may assert in his own name that right of the shipper; 129 U. S. 397. As between a common carrier of goods and an under-writer upon them, the liability to the owner for their loss is primarily upon the carrier, while the liability of the insurer is only secondary; 150 U. S. 99.

Ordinarily as between the insurer, claiming subrogation, and the insured, the amount of the recovery against the person whose tort caused the loss represents the entire loss suffered by the insured; 165 Pa. 428.

Under a statute directing, through its standard form of insurance policy, the subrogation of the insurer to the rights of the insured against the party primarily responsible for the loss, such subrogation is a legal right, which must prevail unless a stronger equity be shown against it; and, where the insured recovers a judgment against such party, the insurer is subrogated to his rights therein; 165 Pa. St. 423; 35 W. N. C. 519.

"An insurance company which has paid a loss upon partnership goods is not prevented, by the subsequent death of one of the partners and the resulting dissolution of the firm, from maintaining a suit in admiralty in the partnership name to recover the amount of the loss from the carrier." 78 Fed. Rep. 155.

An insurer upon paying a loss to the assured can take nothing by subrogation but the rights of the assured, and if the assured has no right of action, none passes to the insurer; 139 U. S. 223; 150 id. 99.

The doctrine of subrogation does not apply to life insurance; 25 Conn. 265; 79 N. Y. 72. But see 3 Dill. 1; 43 Vt. 536.

An executor who is liable for the default of another is entitled to be subrogated to whatever compensation he has a right to; 93 Ky. 695.

An original stockholder compelled to pay calls on stock after its assignment, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the corporation against the delinquent assignee only upon clear proof of acceptance of the transfer by the latter; 35 Fed. Rep. 19.

In the civil law, whoever paid privileged debts, such, for example, as the funeral expenses, had by subrogation the prior claim: Eorum ratio prior est creditorum quorum pecunia ad creditoris privilegios pervenit. Dig. de reb. anc. jud. pos. l. 24, § 3.

So, if during the community of goods arising from the relation of husband and wife an annuity which was due from one of them only was redeemed by the money belonging to both, the other was subrogated pleno jure as to that part of the claim; Pothier, Obl. pt. 3, c. 1, art 6, § 2.

In the civil law, the consignee of goods who pays freight is said to be subrogated to the rights of the carrier and forwarder; Cour. de Cass., 7th Dec. 1826. The common law does not recognize this right as a subrogation. But see LIEN.

In marshalling assets, where a mortgagee has a lien on two funds, if he satisfy himself out of one which is mortgaged to a junior mortgagee so as to extinguish the fund, the junior mortgagee is subrogated to the other fund; 4 Sandf. Ch. 510.

This right of subrogation is a personal right, but may be assigned; 3 Pa. 300; and the creditors of the surety may claim the benefit of the right; 8 Pa. 347; 22 Miss. 87. As to which of two parties liable for the debt shall be subrogated, see 23 Vt. 169.

Where one is subrogated to a mortgage, it is not necessary that it be assigned to him; 45 Vt. 525; though such assignment would only strengthen his position; 10 Minn. 376. The right of subrogation to a prior incumbrance is sometimes enforced by a court of equity by compelling the holder of it to assign it to the party entitled to subrogation; 51 N. Y. 333; 61 Pa. 16. One who is liable to contribute to the payment of a prior lien on property on which he holds security, who is obliged to pay the whole of such claim to protect his own interest, may be subrogated thereto for the purpose of compelling contribution from the other persons liable for a part thereof; 61 Vt. 516.

The creditor need not be made a party to a bill to obtain subrogation; 10 Yerg. 310. See LIEN; MARSHALLING ASSETS.

SUBSCRIBE. To write underneath; 45 Ind. 218; to affix a signature; 16 N. Y. S. 104; see 45 N. H. 481. It may sometimes be construed to mean to give consent to or to attest. 24 L. J. Q. B. 171.

SUBSCRIBING WITNESS. One who subscribes his name to a writing in order to be able at a future time to prove its due execution. An attesting witness.

In order to make a good subscribing witness, it is requisite he should sign his name to the instrument himself, at the time of its execution, and at the request or with the assent of the party; 6 Hill 303; 11 M. & W. 168; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 569 a; 5 Watts 399.

SUBSCRIPTIO. That kind of imperial constitution which was granted in answer to the prayer of a petitioner who was present. Calvinus.

SUBSCRIPTION (Lat. sub, under, scribo, to write). The placing a signature at the bottom of a written or printed engagement; or it is the attestation of a witness by so writing his name; but it has been holden that the attestation of an illiterate witness by making his mark is a sufficient subscription. 2 Ves. Sen. 454; 3 P. Wms. 253.

The act by which a person makes an agreement over his signature in writing, to furnish a sum of money for a particular purpose; as, a subscription to a charitable institution, a subscription for a book, for a newspaper, and the like.

One who subscribes, agreeably to the statute and by-laws of a chartered company, acquires a right to his shares, which is a sufficient consideration to make the subscription obligatory on him; but otherwise where the organization was not yet effected; 87 Pa. 332; 90 id. 169. A subscription for the payment of certain sums of money to a contemplated corporation, to be formed for a purpose for which the subscribers were to derive benefits, may be enforced by the corporation when formed; and no formal acceptance of the subscription or notice of such acceptance is necessary to make it binding; 140 Ill. 248. The question, how far voluntary subscriptions for charitable objects are binding, is not thoroughly settled.

A subscription of a certain sum towards paying off a church debt made long after the debt was contracted and the church built, is without consideration and cannot be enforced; 17 C. C. R. (Pa.) 614. A mere subscription for a charitable object cannot be enforced; 112 N. Y. 517; 117 id. 601; 11 Mass. 118; 121 id. 528; 93 Ill. 475; 57 Ia. 307. A gratuitous subscription to promote the object for which a corporation is established, cannot be enforced unless the promisee has, in reliance on the promise sued on, done something or incurred or assumed some liability or obligation; it is not sufficient that others were led to subscribe by the subscription sought to be enforced; 121 Mass. 528; 117 N. Y. 601; 57 Ia. 307. The consideration which supports the promise of a subscriber to an enterprise is expenditure by the promisee on the faith of the subscription and not advantage to be gained by the promisor; 41 Ill. App. 259; 57 Ia. 307; 69 id. 134. See 41 Ohio St. 527. Until liability has been incurred or acts have been done on the strength of the subscription, it may be withdrawn, and it is revoked by the insanity or death of the subscriber; 96 Ill. 177; 93 id. 475; 77 Pa. 328.

It has been held that the subscription, to be binding, should be a promise to some particular person or committee; and there should be an agreement on the part of such person or committee to do something on their part: as, to provide materials or erect a building; 11 Mass. 114; 24 Vt. 189; 9 Barb. 202; 9 Gratt. 633; 4 Me. 382; 1 N. Y. 581.

If advances were fairly authorized, and have been made on the strength of the subscriptions, it will be deemed sufficient to make them obligatory; 12 Mass. 190; 14 id. 172; 1 Metc. Mass. 570; 5 Pick. 228; 19 id. 73; 4 Ill. 198; 2 Humph. 335; 2 Vt. 48; 5 Ohio 58; they form a consideration for each other; 37 Pa. 210.

The subscriptions to a common object are not usually mutual or really concurrent, and can only be held binding on grounds of public policy. See 4 N. H. 533; 6 id. 164; 7 id. 435; 5 Pick. 506; 2 Vt. 48; 9 id. 289; 5 Ohio 58.

Payment by a subscriber of a part of his subscription which was not legally enforcible does not make the residue of the subscription valid; 112 N. Y. 517.

SUBSCRIPTION LIST. A list of subscribers to some agreement with each other or a third person.

The subscription list of a newspaper is an incident to the newspaper, and passes with the sale of the printing materials; 2 Watts 111.

SUBSELLIA. Lower seats or benches occupied by the judices and by inferior magistrates when they sat in judgment, as distinguished from the tribunal of the prætor. Calvin.

SUBSEQUENT ACTION. A second action commenced after the issue of a writ, but before judgment obtained in a first action, is held to be a subsequent action. 51 L. J. Q. B. 279.

SUBSEQUENT CONDITION. See CONDITION.

SUBSIDY. In English Law. An aid, tax, or tribute granted by parliament to the king for the urgent occasions of the kingdom, to be levied on every subject of ability, according to the value of his lands or goods. Jacob, Law Dict.

In International Law. The assistance given in money by one nation to another to enable it the better to carry on a war, when such nation does not join directly in the war. Vattel, liv. 3, § 82. See NEUTRALITY.

Aid given by the government to some commercial enterprise, as to a steamship line. See SUGAR BOUNTY.

SUBSOIL. The word includes, prima facie, all that is below the actual surface, down to the centre of the earth. 17 L. J. C. P. 162. It is a wider term than mines, quarries, or minerals; 2 L. R. Ir. 339.

SUBSTANCE (Lat. sub, under, stare, to stand). That which is essential: it is used in opposition to form.

It is a general rule that on any issue it is sufficient to prove the substance of the issue. For example, in a case where the defendant pleaded payment of the principal sum and all interest due, and it appeared in evidence that a gross sum was paid, not amounting to the full interest, but accepted by the plaintiff as full payment, the proof was held to be sufficient; 2 Stra. 699; 1 Phil. Ev. 161.

SUBSTANTIAL DAMAGES. Damages, assessed by the verdict of a jury, which are worth having, as opposed to nominal damages (q. v.).

SUBSTANTIVE. Dependent upon itself. 29 Me. 89.

SUBSTITUTE. One placed under another to transact business for him. In letters of attorney, power is generally given to the attorney to nominate and appoint a substitute.

Without such power, the authority given to one person cannot, in general, be delegated to another, because it is a personal trust and confidence, and is not, therefore, transmissible. The authority is given to him to exercise his judgment and discretion, and it cannot be said that the trust and confidence reposed in him shall be exercised at the discretion of another; 2 Ves. 645. But an authority may be delegated to another when the attorney has express power to do so; T. Jones 110. See Story, Ag. § 13.

SUBSTITUTED EXECUTOR. One appointed to act in the place of another executor, upon the happening of a certain event.

SUBSTITUTED SERVICE. Service of process upon another than the person upon whom it should be made, where the latter is impossible. Hunt, Eq. pt. i. ch. 2, § 1; Lush. Pr. 867. But an order must be obtained from the court to allow of substituted service, the application for which must be supported by affidavit; Moz. & W.

It is usually applied to cases where property is within the jurisdiction (q. v.) of the court and process of some sort or notice of the proceeding is required to be given out of the jurisdiction; and so in divorce proceedings where service on the respondent outside of the jurisdiction is necessary or permitted by the rules.

SUBSTITUTES. In Scotch Law. Where an estate is settled on a long series of heirs, substituted one after another, in tailzie, the person first called in the tailzies is the institute; the rest, the heirs of tailzie, or the substitutes. Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 8. See TAILZIE.

SUBSTITUTIO HÆREDIS. See HÆRES.

SUBSTITUTION (Lat. substitutio). In Civil Law. The putting of one person in the place of another, so that he may, in default of ability in the former, or after him, have the benefit of a devise or legacy. Direct substitution is merely the institution of a second legatee in case the first should be either incapable or unwilling to accept the legacy. Fidei commissary substitution is that which takes place when the person substituted is not to receive the legacy after the first legatee, and, consequently, must receive the thing bequeathed from the hands of the latter. Merlin, Répert. See SUBROGATION.

SUBTERRANEAN WATERS. Subterranean streams, as distinguished from subterranean percolations, are governed by the same rules, and give rise to the same rights and obligations, as flowing surface streams; 25 Pa. 528; 2 H. & N. 186. But see 12 M. & W. 374. The owner of the land under which a stream flows can, therefore, maintain an action for the diversion of it, if such diversion took place under the same circumstances as would have enabled him to recover, if the stream had been wholly above ground; 25 Pa. 528; 45 id. 518; 5 H. & N. 982; 1 Sawy. 270. But in order to bring subterranean streams within the rules governing surface streams, their existence and their course must be, to some extent, known or notorious; 20 Conn. 533; 45 Pa. 518; and it must be proved that there was a well defined and discerned stream, and not merely a percolation; 161 Pa. 283. Where there is nothing to show that the waters of a spring are supplied by any defined flowing stream, the presumption will be that they have their source in the ordinary percolations of water through the soil; 42 Cal. 303. As these percolations spread themselves in every direction through the earth, it is impossible to avoid disturbing them without relinquishing the necessary enjoyment of the land; the law does not therefore forbid their disturbance; 79 Pa. 81.

The question has arisen how far one has the right to gather in his well or reservoir water which otherwise would have percolated through the soil of his property. It is suggested by Judge Cooley as a satisfactory principle, that it may lawfully be done for the actual use of the proprietor inasmuch as the waters belong to no one until they are collected and they may be appropriated by the one who collects and puts them to use; but one will not be permitted to dig a hole to injure his neighbor; 14 Alb. L. J. 68. The writer just cited considers it impracticable to apply to subterranean waters percolating through the soil the same rules which are used to regulate the rights of the proprietor in a running stream. "Such a rule," he adds, "would raise questions of unreasonable use and cause difficulties both of evidence and application that would make the right of such waters more troublesome than valuable." Id. This precise question was considered in an English case, Acton v. Blundell, 12 M. & W. 324, by Tindal, C. J., who drew a distinction between such cases and those which concerned surface streams, and held the defendant liable in damage for drawing off a supply of water from a well used to run a mill, by a coal-pit three quarters of a mile from the well. This case was afterward referred to as making for the first time a distinction between underground and surface waters; 7 Exch. 282, 300; it is recognized as settling the rule in England, and is followed in many of the American courts; 7 H. L. Cas. 349; 2 El. & El. 445; 12 Q. B. 753; 4 Comst. 195; 12 Ohio St. 310; 62 Me. 175; 38 Vt. 473; 25 Conn. 593. See Ang. Waters § 114, where the cases are collected.

But it is held that subterranean waters, flowing in known, definite channels, are subject to the same rule as surface waters; 161 Pa. 283; 17 L. R. Ir. 459; otherwise they may be drained; 7 H. L. C. 349; 50 Barb. 316; 62 Me. 175 (though done with malice; 72 N. Y. 39; [1895] A. C. 557; but see 50 N. H. 439); but not, it is held, if the supply of water in surface streams on the land of adjoining owners is thereby diminished; L. R. 6 Ch. 483. See 141 N. Y. 521; 8 Wash. 144; 65 N. W. Rep. (N. D.) 911. As between two corporations pumping water from their respective premises for sale, one cannot complain of the diversion of percolating water by the other; 58 N. Y. S. 10.

See Ang. Waterc. § 109; Gould, Waters 280; Bainbr. Mines 85; LAND. As to a prescriptive claim to direct such waters, see 20 Conn. 533; 32 Vt. 724.

SUBTRACTION (Lat. sub, away, traho, to draw). The act of withholding or detaining anything unlawfully.

The principal descriptions of this offence are: (1) Subtraction of suit, and service, consisting of a withdrawal of fealty, suit of court, rent, or customary services, from the lord or landlord; 2 B. & C. 827. (2) Of titles. (3) Of conjugal rights. (4) Of legacies, which is the withholding of legacies by an executor. (5) Of church rates, a familiar class of cases in England, consisting in the refusal to pay the amount of rate at which any individual parishioner has been assessed for the necessary repairs of the parish church. Brown, Dict.

SUBTRACTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS. See RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS.

SUBVENTION. A subsidy; a grant, usually from the government. See SUBSIDY.

SUCCESSION. In Louisiana. The right and transmission of the rights and obligations of the deceased to his heirs. The estate, rights, and charges which a person leaves after his death, whether the property exceed the charges or the charges exceed the property, or whether he has left only charges without property. The succession not only includes the rights and obligations of the deceased as they exist at the time of his death, but all that has accrued thereto since the opening of the succession, as also of the new charges to which it becomes subject. That right by which the heir can take possession of the estate of the deceased, such as it may be.

Irregular succession is that which is established by law in favor of certain persons or of the state in default of heirs either legal or instituted by testament.

Legal succession is that which is established in favor of the nearest relations of the deceased.

Testamentary succession is that which results from the constitution of the heir, contained in a testament executed in the form prescribed by law. See HEIR; DESCENT; Pothier, des Successions; Toullier, l. 3, tit. 1.

In Common Law. The mode by which one set of persons, members of a corporation aggregate, acquire the rights of another set which preceded them. This term in strictness is to be applied only to such corporations; 2 Bla. Com. 430.

In Scotch Law. "Heritable rights descend by succession to the heir properly so called; movable rights to the executors, who are sometimes said to be heirs in movables. Succession is either by special destination, which descends to those named by the proprietor himself, or legal, which devolves upon the persons whom the laws mark out for successors, from the presumption that the proprietor would have named them had he made a destination. The first is in all cases preferred to the other, as presumption must yield to truth." Ersk. Prin. III. 8. 1.

SUCCESSION DUTY. A duty payable, in England, under the Succession Duties Act of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, amended by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, upon succession to property. An excise or duty upon the right of a person to receive property by devise or inheritance from another under the regulations of the state. 45 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 245. It is of the nature of the collateral inheritance tax of Pennsylvania, and like the English legacy duty, which is levied on a sliding scale, according as the successor is more or less nearly related to the decedent. See Brown, Dict. See LEGACY DUTY; TAX.

SUCCESSOR. One who follows or comes into the place of another.

This term is applied more particularly to a sole corporation, or to any corporation. The word heir is more correctly applicable to a common person who takes an estate by descent. 12 Pick. 322; Co. Litt. 8 b.

A person who has been appointed or elected to some office after another person.

Where electrotype plates belonged to two firms and "their heirs and successors," and they passed to one of the firms, and thence to one of its members, who sold them to a third firm, the latter was held not a "successor." 164 Mass. 457.

SUCCINCT. Brief, compressed, terse; hence, compressed in narrow shape; concise. 2 Ind. App. 549.

SUCKEN, SUCHEN. In Scotch Law. The whole of the lands restricted to a mill,—that is, whose tenants are bound to grind there. The possessors of these lands are called suckeners. Bell, Dict.

SUDDER. In Hindu Law. The chief seat of government contra-distinguished from mofussil, or interior of the country. Whart.

SUE. To commence or to continue legal proceedings for the recovery of a right. See 11 Fed. Rep. 251; ACTION; SUIT.

SUED OUT. A summons is not sued out till it passes from the clerk to a proper officer with a bona fide intention to have it served. 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 333.

SUERTE. In Spanish Law. A small lot of ground. 5 Tex. 83.

SUFFER. To approve; to consent to; to permit and not to hinder. 19 Conn. 505; 17 Blatchf. 330. See PERMIT.

SUFFERANCE. Consent given one from a failure to object; negative permission; toleration; allowance.

See ESTATE BY SUFFERANCE.

SUFFICIENTLY. In a statute requiring the carrier to sufficiently water and feed live stock in transit the word is not too indefinite to carry a penalty. 24 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 837.

SUFFRAGAN (L. Lat. suffraganeus). A titular bishop ordained to assist the bishop of the diocese in his spiritual functions, or to take his place. The number was limited to two to each bishop by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 14. So called because by his suffrage ecclesiastical causes were to be judged. T. L.

SUFFRAGE. Vote; the act of voting.

Participation in the suffrage is not of right, but is granted by the state on a consideration of what is most for the interest of the state; Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 752; 1 MacArth. 169; 11 Blatch. 200. The grant of suffrage makes it a legal right until it is recalled, and it is protected by the law as property is. The states establish rules of suffrage except as shown below. Suffrage is never a necessary accompaniment of state citizenship, and the great majority of citizens are always excluded from it. On the other hand, suffrage is sometimes given to those who are not citizens; as has been done by no less than twelve of the states, in admitting persons to vote, who, being aliens, have merely declared their intentions to become citizens.

By the constitution of the United States the qualifications for electors of members of the house of representatives are to be the same as those for the most numerous branch of the state legislature. The fifteenth amendment provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The fourteenth amendment was intended mainly to effect the same object by a voluntary action on the part of the state, but was practically superseded by the fifteenth amendment.

It has been said that the constitution of the United States confers the right to vote upon no one. That right comes to the citizens of the United States when they possess it at all, under state laws. But the fifteenth amendment confers upon them a new exemption; from discrimination in elections on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; 92 U. S. 214, 542. See Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 14; Hare, Am. Const. L. 524; ELECTION; VOTER; CIVIL RIGHTS.

SUGAR BOUNTY. The appropriation of money by the act of March 2, 1895, to be paid to certain manufacturers and producers of sugar is within the power of congress. 163 U. S. 427.

SUGGESTIO FALSI (Lat.). A statement of a falsehood. This amounts to a fraud whenever the party making it was bound to disclose the truth.

The following is an example of a case where chancery will interfere and set aside a contract as fraudulent, on account of the suggestio falsi; a purchaser applied to the seller to purchase a lot of wild land, and represented to him it was worth nothing, except for a sheep pasture, when he knew there was a valuable mine on the lot, of which the seller was ignorant. The sale was set aside; 2 Paige, Ch. 390. See CONCEALMENT; MISREPRESENTATION; REPRESENTATION; SUPPRESSIO VERI.

SUGGESTION. In Practice. Information. It is applied to those cases where, during the pendency of a suit, some matter of fact occurs which puts a stop to the suit in its existing form, such as death or insolvency of a party; the counsel of the other party announces the fact in court or enters it upon the record: the fact is usually admitted, if true, and the court issues the proper order thereupon. See 2 Sell. Pr. 191.

In wills, when suggestions are made to a testator for the purpose of procuring a devise of his property in a particular way, and such suggestions are false, they generally amount to a fraud; Bac. Abr. Wills (G 3).

SUGGESTIVE INTERROGATION. A phrase which has been used by some writers to signify the same thing as leading question. 2 Bentham, Ev. b. 3, c. 3. It is used in the French law.

SUI GENERIS. Of its own kind or class.

SUI HÆREDES. In Civil Law. One's own heirs; proper heirs. Inst. 2, 19, 2.

SUI JURIS (Lat. of his own right). Possessing all the rights to which a freeman is entitled; not being under the power of another, as a slave, a minor, and the like.

To make a valid contract, a person must, in general, be sui juris. Every one of full age is presumed to be sui juris. Story, Ag. 10.

SUICIDE (Lat. suus. himself, cædere, to kill). Self-destruction.

This was once regarded by the common law as exclusively a felonious act; of late, however, it has been often treated as the result of insanity, to be followed by all the legal consequences of that disease, so far as it is practicable. That suicide may be committed by a person in the full enjoyment of his reason, there can be no doubt; nor can there be any doubt that it is often the result of unquestionable insanity. Between the two kinds of suicide here indicated, the medical jurist is obliged to discriminate, and in performing this duty the facts on the subject should be carefully considered.

The instinct of self-preservation is not so strong as to prevent men entirely from being tired of life and seeking their own destruction. They may have exhausted all their sources of enjoyment, their plans of business or of honor may have been frustrated, poverty or dishonor may be staring them in the face, the difficulties before them may seem utterly insurmountable, and, for some reason like these, they calmly and deliberately resolve to avoid the evil by ending their lives. The act may be unwise and presumptuous, but there is in it no element of disease. On the other hand, it is well known that suicidal desires are a very common trait of insanity,—that a large proportion of the insane attempt or meditate self-destruction. It may be prompted by a particular delusion, or by a sense of irresistible necessity. It may be manifested in the shape of a well-considered, persistent intention to seize upon the first opportunity to terminate life, or of a blind, automatic impulse acting without much regard to means or circumstances. As the disease gives way and reason is restored, this propensity disappears, and the love of life returns.

Besides these two forms of the suicidal propensity, there are other phases which cannot be referred with any degree of certainty to either of them. Persons, for instance, in the enjoyment of everything calculated to make life happy, and exhibiting no sign of mental disease, deliberately end their days. Another class, on approaching a precipice or a body of water, are seized with a desire, which may be irresistible, to take the fatal plunge. Many are the cases of children who, after some mild reproof, or slight contradiction, or trivial disappointment, have gone at once to some retired place and taken their lives. Now, we are as little prepared to refer all such cases to mental disease as we are to free voluntary choice. Every case, therefore, must be judged by the circumstances accompanying it, always allowing the benefit of the doubt to be given to the side of humanity and justice.

By the common law, suicide was treated as a crime, and the person forfeited all chattels real or personal, and various other property; 4 Bla. Com. 190. This result can be avoided by establishing the insanity of the party; and in England, of late years, courts have favored this course whenever the legal effect of suicide would operate as a punishment. On the other hand, where the rights and interests of other parties are involved, the question of insanity is more closely scrutinized; and ample proof is required of the party on whom the burden of proof lies.

To be guilty of this offence, the deceased must have had the will and intention of committing it, or else he committed no crime; but he also has been so considered who occasions his own death whilst maliciously attempting to kill another; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 27, s. 4. As he is beyond the reach of human laws, he cannot be punished. The English law, indeed, attempted to inflict a punishment by a barbarous burial of his body, and by forfeiting to the king the property which he owned which would belong to his relations; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 9; 4 Bla. Com. 189; but forfeiture in this species of felony, as in other kinds, has been wholly abolished by the Felony Act of 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23; 4 Steph. Com. 62; one who kills another at his request incurs the same guilt as if not requested; 8 C. & P. 418; so of killing one in a duel; 3 East 581; 31 Ga. 411; in Massachusetts, an attempt to commit suicide is not punishable, but one who, in attempting it, kills another, commits an indictable homicide; 123 Mass. 422; one who counsels a suicide which is committed in his presence is guilty as principal; 8 C. & P. 418; 70 Mo. 412; 13 Mass. 359; Russ. & R. 528.

Evidence of an intention to commit suicide is material in a murder case, where deceased was found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide; 157 Mass. 180.

See FELO DE SE; SELF-DESTRUCTION; INSURANCE; PERSUADE.

In regard to wills made just before committing suicide, the prevalent doctrine on this point, both in the United States and in England, is that the act of self-destruction may not necessarily imply insanity, and that if the will is a rational act, rationally done, the sanity of the testator is established; 7 Pick. 94; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 109; 2 Harring. 583; 2 Eccl. 415; 46 La. Ann. 773.

It has been held that when the owner of a deposit receipt gives it to another, the gift to take effect at the death of the donor, under such circumstances that the jury find it to have been done in contemplation of suicide, it is not a good donatio mortis causa; [1896] 2 I. R. 204.

In regard to life insurance, it is the law of England, at present, that in every case of intentional suicide, whatever may have been the mental condition, the policy becomes void; 3 Mann. & G. 437; 38 L. J. N. S. Ch. 53. In 1 F. & F. 22, the court told the jury the question was, did the assured know he was throwing himself out of the window. If he did, no recovery could be had under the policy. Otherwise, if he did not. Such appears to be the rule in Ohio, Maryland, and Massachusetts; 4 Ins. L. J. 159; 42 Md. 414; 102 Mass. 227; and, it is said, in Germany, Holland, and France; 6 Ins. L. J. 719; May, Ins. § 312. But, although it has been a much vexed question, the American cases generally construe the phrases "die by his own hand," "commit suicide," or "die by suicide," as including only criminal acts of self-destruction, and not acts not done under the control of the will; Biddle, Ins. 831; 54 Me. 224; 4 Seld. 299; 15 Wall. 580; 7 Heiks. 567; Law of Suicide in Life Ins., by William Shrady, 1869. But the supreme court has decided that a condition in the policy that it shall be void if the insured should die by suicide, "sane or insane," avoids the policy, notwithstanding he was of unsound mind and wholly unconscious of the act; 98 U. S. 284; 64 Vt. 78; and the same has been held with reference to a provision in a policy against suicide, "felonious or otherwise, sane or insane;" 84 Wis. 389; 75 Ia. 346; by his "own act or intention, whether sane or insane;" 70 Mo. 27; or "die by his own hand, sane or insane;" 65 Mich. 199; or "shall die by his own hand or act, sane or insane;" 65 N. Y. 233; but death by the suicide of the insured, although insane, is not "death by his own hand," whereby the policy is to be void in that event; 38 U. S. App. 37; and the provision in a policy that if the insured shall "die by his own hand while insane," the insurer shall pay the amount of the premiums and interest, applies only in case the self-destruction is intentional; but where the insured killed himself while incapable of knowing the effect of his act, the whole amount of the policy can be recovered; 87 Ky. 541; or if death is accidental; 29 Fed. Rep. 198; and the same is held with respect to the death of the "insured by his own hand, sane or insane;" 7 Chi. L. N. 421.

The words "felonious or otherwise," used in a policy, are held equivalent to "sane or insane;" 25 Fed. Rep. 315; but not the words, "die by his own hand or act, voluntary or otherwise;" 1 McArth. 632; or the words, "under any circumstances die by his own hand;" 40 Ohio St. 217.

A by-law of an insurance company making a certificate void if a member, "sane or insane," should take his life, is valid as to a prior certificate which provided that any violation of "the requirements of the laws now in force or hereafter to be enacted," should render the certificate null and void; 71 Ala. 436.

The full amount of the policy is recoverable under a statute which provides that suicide shall be no defence to an action on an insurance policy, unless it was contemplated at the time of obtaining the policy that the suicide, whether sane or insane, shall only be entitled to recover the amount of the premiums paid; 50 Fed. Rep. 511. Where a statute provides that "all companies, after having received three annual premiums, are estopped from defending on any other ground than fraud," . . . the defendant may set up the defence of suicide; 134 Pa. 45.

Where the insured, while insane and unable to realize the consequences of his act, and without intending thereby to take his life, cuts his throat, his death comes within the terms in the policy providing that death shall be by "external, violent, and accidental means;" 74 Mich. 592.

Where one secured a policy of life insurance, and, being financially embarrassed, killed himself in order to secure money for the payment of his debts, the policy was held void, although it was silent as to suicide; 169 U. S. 139; but if a policy is made payable to the wife of the insured, she may recover on it although her husband committed suicide; 39 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 52. Where suicide was the defence to an action on an insurance policy, it was not error to charge that "the law does not presume murder; it must be proved;" and, if the evidence is equal as between murder and suicide, the jury must find for the defendant; 84 Fed. Rep. 411; and in an action on such a policy where the evidence is conflicting and quite evenly balanced as to whether death was caused by the intentional or accidental act of the deceased, it will be presumed that death resulted from accident; 47 Fed. Rep. 272. It has been said that the question is not precisely whether a party is insane or not, but whether he understood the physical nature and consequences of his act, and had sufficient will to make the act voluntary; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 101, 679. See 150 U. S. 468; Wharton, Mental Unsoundness; Phill. Ins.

The burden of showing a suicide rests with the company; 46 Ill. App. 307; 71 Hun 146; 46 La. Ann. 1189. In making the proof necessary to establish the liability of an insurer, the plaintiff is entitled to the presumption that a sane man would not commit suicide, as well as of other rules of law established for the guidance of courts and juries in the investigation and determination of facts; 150 U. S. 468; and while proofs of loss, stating suicide as the cause of death, are admissible, they are not conclusive; 24 L. R. A. 589; and, where the defence is fraud, suicide may be shown to be the agency by which the fraud was accomplished, although by the policy suicide was no defence; 123 N. Y. 85.

SUIT (L. Lat. secta; from Lat. sequi, to follow. French, suite). In Practice. An action.

It is more general than "action," which is almost exclusively applied to law, and denotes any legal proceeding of a civil kind brought by one person against another. 84 Me. 72; 83 Ia. 471.

Suit is a generic term. of comprehensive signification, and applies to any proceeding in a court of justice in which the plaintiff pursues, in such court, the remedy which the law affords him for the redress of an injury or the recovery of a right. 10 Ill. App. 333.

The word suit in the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 applies to any proceeding in a court of justice in which the plaintiff pursues in such court the remedy which the law affords him. An application for a prohibition is, therefore, a suit; 2 Pet. 449. According to the Code of Practice of Louisiana, art. 96, a suit is a real, personal, or mixed demand made before a competent judge, by which the parties pray to obtain their rights and a decision of their disputes. In that acceptation, the words suit, process, and cause are in that state almost synonymous. See SECTA; Steph. Pl. 427; 3 Bla. Com. 395; 1 Chitty, Pl. 399; Wood, Civ. Law, b. 4, p. 315; 4 Mass. 263; 18 Johns. 14; 4 Watts 154; 3 Story, Const. § 1719. In its most extended sense, the word suit includes not only a civil action, but also a criminal prosecution, as, indictment, information, and a conviction by a magistrate; Hamm. N. P. 270. Suit is applied to proceedings in chancery as well as in law; 1 Sm. Ch. Dec. 26; and is, therefore, more general than action, which is almost exclusively applied to matters of law; 10 Paige, Ch. 516.

The witnesses or followers of the plaintiff. 3 Bla Com. 295. See SECTA.

Suit of court, an attendance which a tenant owes to his lord's court. Cowel.

Suit covenant, where one has covenanted to do suit and service in his lord's court.

Suit custom, where service is owed time out of mind.

Suithold, a tenure in consideration of certain services to the superior lord.

The following one in chase; as, fresh suit.

A petition to a king, or a great person, or a court.

SUIT SILVER. A small sum of money paid in lieu of attendance at the court barons. Cowel.

SUITE (French). Those persons who by his authority follow or attend an ambassador or other public minister.

In general, the suite of a minister are protected from arrest, and the inviolability of his person is communicated to those who form his suite; Vattel, lib. 4, c. 9, § 120. See 1 Dall. 177; Baldw. 240; AMBASSADOR.

SUITOR. One who is a party to a suit or action in court. One who is a party to an action. In its ancient sense, suitor meant one who was bound to attend the county court; also one who formed part of the secta.

SUITORS' FUND IN CHANCERY. In England. A fund consisting of moneys which, having been paid into the court of chancery, are placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors, including interest from the same. By stat. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 91, sec. 4, the principal of this fund, amounting to over £3,000,000, was transferred to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. Moz. & W.

SUM. The sense in which it is most commonly used is "money"; a quantity of money or currency; any amount indefinitely, a sum of money, a small sum, or a large sum. 96 U. S. 368.

SUMMARY ACTIONS. In Scotch Law. Those which are brought into court not by summons, but by petition, corresponding to summary proceedings in English courts. Bell; Brown.

SUMMARY CONVICTION. A phrase applied to proceedings which result in the sentence of an accused person without jury trial. At common law it was applied only in cases of contempt. Such proceedings are now frequently provided for by statute, either for trial by a court without a jury, or a final disposition of criminal cases by the committing magistrate. Such statutes are, in derogation of the right of trial by jury, secured by the state and federal constitutions and therefore must provide a right of appeal to a court having a jury. They usually apply only to lesser offences and to hardened offenders.

Summary proceedings as enumerated by Blackstone comprehend: 1. All trials of offences and frauds contrary to the laws of the excise and other branches of revenue which are to be determined by the commissioners of the respective departments and justices of the peace in the country; such convictions are absolutely necessary for due collection of the public money. 2. Convictions before justices of the peace in order to inflict divers petty, pecuniary mulcts and corporal penalties for such disorderly offences as common swearing, drunkenness, vagrancy, idleness, etc. 3. Attachments for contempt and the subsequent proceedings thereon. 4 Bla. Com. 280. See SUMMARY PROCEEDING; CONVICTION.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION. The jurisdiction of a court to give a judgment or make an order itself forthwith. See CONTEMPT.

SUMMARY PROCEEDING. A form of trial in which the ancient established course of legal proceedings is disregarded, especially in the matter of trial by jury, and, in the case of the heavier crimes, presentment by a grand jury. See 8 Gray 329.

In no case can the party be tried summarily unless when such proceedings are authorized by legislative authority, except perhaps in cases of contempts; for the common law is a stranger to such a mode of trial; 4 Bla. Com. 280. See 2 Kent 73; 2 Conn. 819; 37 Me. 172; 4 Hill 145; 8 Gray 329; 4 Dev. 15; 10 Yerg. 59. See Gill & Doug. Sum. Jur.

The term summary proceedings is applied to proceedings under statute for enabling landlords promptly to dispossess tenants who hold over after default in payment of rent, or after expiration of the term. See PROCEEDING.

SUMMING UP. In Practice. The act of making a speech before a court and jury, after all the evidence has been heard, in favor of one of the parties in the cause, is called summing up. When the judge delivers his charge to the jury, he usually sums up the evidence in the case. See CHARGE; OPENING AND CLOSING.

SUMMON. In Practice. To notify the defendant that an action has been instituted against him, and he is required to answer to it at a time and place named. This is done by a proper officer either giving the defendant a copy of the summons, or leaving it at his house, or by reading the summons to him.

SUMMONEAS. In Old Practice. A writ by which a party was summoned to appear in court.

SUMMONERS. Petty officers who cite men to appear in any court.

SUMMONS. In Practice. The name of a writ commanding the sheriff, or other authorized officer, to notify a party to appear in court to answer a complaint made against him and in the said writ specified, on a day therein mentioned. 3 Bla. Com. 279.

SUMMONS AND ORDER. In English Practice. In this phrase the summons is the application to a common-law judge at chambers in reference to a pending action, and upon it the judge or master makes the order. Moz. & W.

SUMMONS AND SEVERANCE. See SEVERANCE.

SUMMUM JUS (Lat.). Extreme right, strict right. See MAXIMS, Summum jus, etc.

SUMPTUARY LAWS. Laws relating to the expenses of the people, and made to restrain excess in apparel, food, furniture, etc.

They originated in the view that luxury is, in some of its degrees, opposed to public policy, and that the state is bound to interfere against it. Montesquieu, Esprit des Lois, b. 7, c. 2, 4, and Tacitus, Ann. b. 2, ch. 33, b. 3, ch. 52.

In England, in 1336, it was enacted, 10 Edw. III. c. 3, that inasmuch as many mischiefs had happened to the people of the realm by excessive and costly meats, by which, among other things, many who aspired in this respect beyond their means were impoverished and unable to aid themselves or their liege lord in time of need, all men were forbidden to have served more than two courses at a meal, each of but two sorts of victual, except on the principal feasts of the year, and then only three courses were allowed. 4 Com. 170. Subsequent statutes, 1363, 1463, 1482, regulated the dress, and to some extent the diet, of the people, with careful regard to their rank. The substance of these statutes will be found in Knight's History of Eng. p. 272. They were repealed by 1 Jac. I. c. 25. An act of 30 Car. II. c. 3, which ordered the dead to be buried in woollen shrouds; was not repealed until 53 Geo. III. c. 108.

In modern times legislation is not resorted to in respect to this object; but the subject is frequently discussed in connection with the laws for the prevention or punishment of intemperance. See POLICE POWERS.

SUNDAY. The first day of the week. In some of the New England states it begins at sunset on Saturday, and ends at the same time the next day. But in other parts of the United States it generally commences at twelve o'clock on the night between Saturday and Sunday, and ends in twenty-four hours thereafter; 6 Gill & J. 268. See 4 Strobh. 493 (a very learned case); 37 Mo. 466; 39 Me. 193; 3 Cush. 137. The Sabbath, the Lord's day, and Sunday, all mean the same thing; 6 Gill & J. 268; 89 Ga. 341.

The stat. 5 & 6 Edw. V. c. 3, enacted that Sunday should be strictly observed as a holy day, provided that in case of necessity it should be lawful to labor, ride, fish, or work at any kind of work. The Book of Sports (1618) declared that, after divine service, the people should not be disturbed from any lawful recreation. The stat. 29 Car. II. c. 7, provided that no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever, should exercise any worldly business, etc., upon the Lord's day, works of necessity and charity alone excepted. It also forbade the execution of legal process on that day. This has been followed substantially in America, with a tendency to greater strictness. This includes all business, public or private, done in the ordinary calling of the person; 5 B. & C. 406; ordinary calling means that which the ordinary duties of the calling bring into continued action; 7 B. & C. 596; 55 Ga. 245. Many statutes except those who observe the seventh day; others do not; and such legislation is constitutional; 52 Pa. 126; 69 N. Y. 557; 122 Mass. 40; the fact that an individual believes the seventh day is the Sabbath, but does not observe it as such, does not bring him within the exception; 26 Neb. 464. Jews are bound to observe the civil regulations for keeping Sunday; 52 Pa. 125. In New York writs against Jews cannot be made returnable on Saturday; 39 N. Y. S. 254. Cases of necessity are determined by the moral fitness of the work; 34 Pa. 409. Charity includes everything which proceeds from a sense of moral duty, or a feeling of kindness and humanity, and is intended wholly for the comfort and relief of another, and not for one's own pleasure and benefit; 118 Mass. 197. Necessity may arise out of particular occupations; 23 How. 219; 14 Wall. 494; 25 Tex. App. 597; but not when it is a work of mere convenience or profit; 97 Mass. 404; 30 Ind. 476. Shaving a man is not a work of necessity; 54 Mo. App. 310; 23 Wkly. Law Bul. 450; 140 Pa. 89; 143 Mass. 28. See infra. Reaping a field of oats on Sunday in order to prevent the loss thereof is a work of necessity; 42 Ill. App. 594. Running street railways on Sunday is illegal; 54 Pa. 401; contra, 72 N. Y. 196; 14 Reptr. 364 (Ky. Ct. of App.); and see 55 Ga. 126. When statutes forbid travelling on Sunday, there can be no recovery for injuries from defective streets; 117 Mass. 64; 51 Me. 423; 47 Vt. 32; but see 39 Wisc. 21; unless the party was travelling from motives of necessity or charity; 121 Mass. 301; 84 Me. 433; as riding to a funeral or for health; 36 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 1048; or walking for exercise; 65 Me. 34. But in actions for torts against individuals by common carriers, it is no defence that the injury occurred upon Sunday; 26 Pa. 342; 48 Ia. 652; 116 Ind. 566; contra, 124 Mass. 387. Most of the cases are otherwise; Big. L. C. Torts 711; see 125 U. S. 555, and the law in Massachusetts was altered in 1877.

Except as to judicial acts, which are void when done on Sunday; 1 W. Bl. 526; 140 U. S. 118; 41 Kan. 336; see DIES NON; the common law makes no distinction between Sunday and any other day. The English cases decided after the act of Charles II., supra, merely avoided contracts made in pursuance of one's ordinary calling; see 1 Cr. & J. 180; 31 Barb. 41; 4 M. & W. 270; but in most of the states contracts made on Sunday are invalid; see 35 Me. 143; 19 Vt. 358; 6 Watts 231; 3 Wisc. 343; and if not executed, cannot be enforced; 87 Ga. 482; 84 Me. 11; 97 Ala. 700; 98 Mich. 117. In New York any business but judicial may be done on Sunday; 44 Barb. 618. Generally speaking executory contracts made on Sunday will not be enforced, while executed contracts will not be disturbed; 78 Pa. 473; 105 Mass. 399; 57 Ga. 179; 47 N. J. Eq. 201; but see 2 Ohio St. 388; 13 Kans. 529, as to executory contracts. Delivery on Sunday passes title against the vendor; 26 Cal. 514; 13 Ind. 208; but see 12 Mich. 378; a church subscription on Sunday is valid in Pennsylvania; 12 Reptr. 665; and Michigan; 21 Alb. L. J. 293. See 62 Ind. 365. A contract of sale made on Sunday is not saved from being a Sunday contract by the fact that the purchase-money was not paid until Monday; 56 Conn. 383. A contract dated on Sunday may be shown to be erroneously dated; 97 Mass. 166; and it may be shown that a contract bearing a secular date was actually dated on Sunday; 48 Me. 198; but not against a bona fide holder without notice; 48 Ia. 228. When a contract takes effect on delivery, the date is not material; 6 Bush 185; 43 Ia. 297; and a note executed on Sunday but delivered on another day is valid; 24 Vt. 189; 35 Me. 143; a contract made on Sunday may be ratified; 7 Gray 164; 24 Vt. 317; 79 Ia. 101; see 87 Ga. 482; but see 11 Ala. 885; but only by an express agreement and not by mere acquiescence; 79 Fed. Rep. 826; a will executed on Sunday is valid; 9 Allen 118; 1 Am. L. Rev. 750 (N. H.); 124 Ind. 36. A contract for an advertisement in a Sunday paper is invalid; 24 N. Y. 353; contra, 52 Mo. 474. A verdict in a homicide case submitted to the jury on Saturday may be received and the jury discharged on Sunday; 163 U. S. 662. Laws requiring all persons to refrain from their ordinary callings on Sunday have been held not to encroach on the religious liberty of the people; Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 584, 725; they may be sustained as police regulations; 8 Pa. 312; 33 Mich. 279; 40 Ala. 725.

Under an act making it unlawful to open a shop on Sunday, for the sale of goods, etc., a barber cannot be convicted; 38 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 1001.

A statute forbidding barbers to carry on their trade on Sunday is constitutional, under the police power; 149 N. Y. 195; s. c. 31 L. R. A. 689; notwithstanding the act allows barbers in the cities of New York and Saratoga to work till one o'clock; but in Illinois (43 N. E. Rep. 1108), it is held that an act forbidding barbers to work at their trade on Sunday is a taking of property without due process of law; and that it is not a proper exercise of the police power. See, also, 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 843.

Any act forbidding railroad trains to run on Sunday does not constitute a regulation of, and an obstruction to, interstate commerce, and is valid; 88 Va. 95; 163 U. S. 299; 24 W. Va. 783; 90 Ga. 396; but an act forbidding all manner of servile labor on Sundays, etc., is held to be void, so far as it affects interstate traffic; 65 How. Pr. 72. The running of trains is within the prohibition of a statute which punishes any person who labors in his calling on Sunday, or employs his servants in so doing, except in works of necessity or charity; 24 W. Va. 783; but it has been held that running an excursion train on Sunday is a work of necessity; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 878; so is delivery of milk to customers; 49 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 87.

Acts have been passed forbidding baseball playing on Sunday. The cases differ as to their constitutionality. See 56 Alb. L. J. 202; 57 id. 258.

No one is bound to do work in performance of his contract on Sunday, unless the work by its very nature or by express agreement is to be done on that day and can be then done without a breach of law; 18 Conn. 181; 6 Johns. 326; 10 Ohio 426; 7 Blackf. 479.

Sundays are computed in the time allowed for the performance of an act; 10 M. & W. 331; but if the last day happen to be a Sunday, it is to be excluded, and the act must, in general, be performed on Monday; 3 Pa. R. 201; 3 Chitty, Pr. 110; 133 U. S. 299; 147 id. 47. Notes and bills, when they fall due on Sunday, are payable on Saturday, unless a statute provides otherwise. The indorsement of a note creates a new contract, and is an act within the statute prohibiting secular business on Sunday; 84 Me. 111. See, as to the origin of keeping Sunday as a holiday, Story, Pr. Notes § 220; Story, Bills § 222. See, generally, 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 285; 3 Rep. Am. Bar Association (1880); 2 Am. L. Rev. 226; 21 Alb. L. J. 424 (Sabbath-breaking); 28 Am. L. Reg. 137, 209, 273; 32 Am. Rep. 557; 30 id. 417; 17 id. 122 (legality of labor on Sunday); 3 id. 371, n.; 54 Pa. 401; 3 Cr. L. Mag. 632 (Sabbath-breaking; works of necessity). The Massachusetts law on this subject depends more on its peculiar legislation and customs than any general principles of justice or law; 23 How. 209.

As to execution of legal process on Sunday, see DIES NON.

See HOLIDAY; POLICE POWER.

SUNKEN WRECK. Where part of the frame of a ship was sunk beneath the surface of the sea and partially imbedded in the ground, as was also a quantity of iron ore that formed a part of the cargo of the ship, it was held to be a sunken wreck within the meaning of the collision clause of a policy of insurance; [1898] Prob. 248.

SUPER ALTUM MARE (Lat.). Upon the high sea. See HIGH SEAS.

SUPER-JURARE. A term anciently used, when a criminal, who tried to excuse himself by his own oath or that of one or two witnesses, was convicted by the oaths of many more witnesses. Moz. & W.

SUPER PRÆROGATIVA REGIS. A writ which formerly lay against the king's tenant's widow for marrying without the royal license. Fitzh. N. B. 174.

SUPER STATUTO. A writ that lay against the king's tenant, holding in chief, who aliened the king's land without his license.

SUPER STATUTO FACTO POUR SENESCHAL ET MARSHAL DE ROY. A writ which lay against a steward or marshal for holding plea in his court, or for trespass or contracts not made or arising within the king's household. Whart.

SUPER STATUTO VERSUS SERVANTES ET LABORATORES. A writ which lay against him who kept any servants who had left the service of another contrary to law.

SUPER VISUM CORPORIS (Lat.). Upon view of the body. When an inquest is held over a body found dead, it must be super visum corporis. See CORONER; INQUEST.

SUPERCARGO. In Maritime Law. A person specially employed by the owner of a cargo to take charge of and sell to the best advantage merchandise which has been shipped, and to purchase returning cargoes and to receive freight, as he may be authorized.

Supercargoes have complete control over the cargo and everything which immediately concerns it, unless their authority is either expressly or impliedly restrained; 12 East 381. Under certain circumstances they are responsible for the cargo; 4 Mass. 115; see 1 Gill & J. 1; but the supercargo has no power to interfere with the government of the ship; 3 Pardessus, n. 646.

SUPERFICIARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. He who has built upon the soil of another, which he has hired for a number of years or forever, yielding a yearly rent. This is not very different from the owner of a lot on ground-rent in Pennsylvania. Dig. 43. 18. 1.

SUPERFICIES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Whatever has been erected on the soil.

SUPERFLUOUS LANDS. Lands acquired by a railroad company under its statutory powers and not required for the purpose of the undertaking. See 10 Jur. Rev. 281.

Slips of land above and below a tunnel; 51 L. J. Q. B. 172; land under arches which carry a railway; 48 L. J. Ch. 358; mines under a surface required or which may be required for the undertaking; 46 L. J. Q. B. 509; are not superfluous lands; but the whole of the land beyond the boundary wall of a railway is superfluous, even though that wall be also a retaining wall thicker at the base than at the surface, and though part of such land would be within a line drawn on the surface vertically above the line of the footings of the wall; 52 L. J. Ch. 198.

SUPERFŒTATION. The conception of a second embryo during the gestation of the first, or the conception of a child by a woman already pregnant with another, during the time of such pregnancy.

This doctrine, though doubted, seems to be established by numerous cases; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 193; Cassan, Superfœtation; New York Medical Repository; 1 Briand, Méd. Lég. prem. partie, c. 8, art. 4; 1 Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 299; Buffon, Hist. Nat. de l'Homme, Puberté.

SUPERINDUCTIO (Lat.). In the Civil Law. A species of obliteration. Dig. 28. 4. 1. 1.

SUPERINSTITUTION. The institution of one upon another, as where two persons are admitted and are instituted to the same benefice, under adverse titles. Cowel.

SUPERINTENDENT. One who has the power of direction and control over the acts or labor of others. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

SUPERINTENDENT REGISTRAR. An officer who superintends the registration of births, deaths, and marriages in England and Wales. Whart.

SUPERIOR. One who has a right to command; one who holds a superior rank: as, a soldier is bound to obey his superior.

In estates, some are superior to others: an estate entitled to a servitude or easement over another estate is called the superior or dominant, and the other the inferior or servient estate. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1612.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. In Scotch Law. A feudal relation corresponding with the English lord and tenant.

SUPERIOR COURT. A term applied collectively to the three courts of common law at Westminster: namely, the king's bench, the common pleas, the exchequer; and so in Ireland.

It denotes a court of intermediate jurisdiction between the courts of inferior or limited jurisdiction and the courts of last resort.

In American Law. A court of intermediate jurisdiction between the inferior courts and those of last resort. See the several states.

SUPERNUMERARII (Lat.). In Roman Law. Those advocates who were not statuti, which title see.

The statuti were inscribed in the matriculation books, and formed a part of the college of advocates in each jurisdiction.

The supernumeraries were not attached to any bar in particular, and could reside where they pleased: they took the place of advocates by title as vacancies occurred in that body.

SUPERONERATIO (L. Lat. superonerare). Surcharging a common: i. e. putting in beasts of a number or kind other than the right of common allows. It can only be of a common appendant or appurtenant. Bracton 229. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 28, § 4, gives two remedies, novel disseisin and writ of admeasurement, by which latter remedy no damages are recovered till the second offence. Now, distraining, trespass, and case are used as remedies. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 238.

SUPERONERATIONE PASTURA. A writ that formerly lay against him who was impleaded in the county court for the surcharge of a common for his cattle and the cause was removed into one of the superior courts.

SUPERSEDEAS (Lat. that you set aside). In Practice. The name of a writ containing a command to stay the proceedings at law.

An auxiliary process designed to supersede the enforcement of the judgment of the court below, brought up by writ of error for review. 102 U. S. 249. Originally it was a writ directed to an officer, commanding him to desist from enforcing the execution of another writ which he was about to execute, or which might come in his hands. In modern times the term is often used synonymously with a "stay of proceedings," and is employed to designate the effect of an act or proceeding which of itself suspends the enforcement of a judgment; 98 Cal. 306.

It is granted on good cause shown that the party ought not to proceed; Fitzh. N. B. 236. There are some writs which, though they do not bear this name, have the effect to supersede the proceedings: namely, a writ of error when bail is entered operates as a supersedeas; and a writ of certiorari to remove the proceeding of an inferior into a superior court has, in general, the same effect; 8 Mod. 373; 6 Binn. 461. But under special circumstances, the certiorari has not the effect to stay the proceeding, particularly where summary proceedings, as to obtain possession under the landlord and tenant law, are given by statute; 6 Binn. 460. See Bacon, Abr.; Comyns, Dig. Yelv. 6, n.

SUPERSTITIOUS USE. In English Law. When lands, tenements, rents, goods, or chattels are given, secured, or appointed for and toward the maintenance of a priest or chaplain to say mass; for the maintenance of a priest or other man to pray for the soul of any dead man in such a church or elsewhere; to have and maintain perpetual obits, lamps, torches, etc., to be used at certain times to help to save the souls of men out of purgatory; in such cases the king, by force of several statutes, is authorized to direct and appoint all such uses to such purposes as are truly charitable; Bac. Abr. Charitable Uses and Mortmain (D); Duke, Char. Uses 105; 6 Ves. 567; 4 Co. 104.

The doctrine has no recognition in this country; 18 W. N. C. (Pa.) 276; 108 N. Y. 30; and a bequest to support a Catholic priest, and perhaps certain other uses in England, would not be considered as superstitious uses; 1 Pa. 49; 8 id. 327; 17 S. & R. 378; 1 Wash. C. C. 224. Yet many of the superstitious uses of the English law would fail to be considered as charities, and would undoubtedly come under the prohibition against perpetuities. See CHARITIES; CHARITABLE USES; 1 Jar. Wills, ch. ix. In England there are three classes of persons who have been held obnoxious to the law against superstitious uses: 1. Roman Catholics. 2. Protestant dissenters. 3. Jews. Their various disabilities have been almost wholly removed, and Catholics and Jews have been put on the same footing as Protestant dissenters in reference to their schools and places of religious worship; Lew. Tr., 9th ed. 110. See MASSES.

SUPERVISOR. An overseer; a surveyor.

An officer whose duty it is to take care of the highways.

The chief officer of a town or organized township in the states of Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa. He has various duties assigned him by the statutes as a town officer, and likewise represents his town in the general assembly, or county board of supervisors. See BOARD OF SUPERVISORS.

SUPERVISORS OF ELECTION. Persons appointed and commissioned by the United States circuit judge to supervise the registration of voters and the holding of elections for representatives in congress under Rev. Stat. §§ 2011-2031. The law for the appointment of supervisors was repealed by the act of Feb. 8, 1894, 28 Stat. L. 36. As to what was the registration of voters under this act, see REGISTRATION. While this legislation was in force it was held that in case of a question as to what political organization should be recognized by the court in appointing supervisors, the body which was recognized by the last state convention of the party should be considered as its representative organization; subject, however, to modification by change of circumstances; 9 Fed. Rep. 14.

The legislation of congress in vesting the appointment of supervisors in the courts was constitutional, and in the exercise of its supervisory power over elections for senators and representatives, new duties may be imposed by congress on the officers of election and new penalties for breach of duty; 100 U. S. 371, 399. See ELECTION.

SUPPLEMENTAL. That which is added to a thing to complete it.

SUPPLEMENTAL ANSWER. One filed in chancery for the purpose of correcting, adding to, and explaining an answer already filed. Sm. Ch. Pr. 334. In New York and states having similar practice it is an additional answer to the complaint. It may be to allege a release after issue joined; 3 Misc. Rep. 54; or to set up facts excusing non-payment where the defence of payment was relied on, until the time of trial; 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 708.

SUPPLEMENTAL BILL. In Equity Practice. A bill brought as an addition to an original bill to supply some defect in its original frame or structure which cannot be supplied by amendment. See 1 Paige, Ch. 200; 15 Miss. 456; 22 Barb. 161; 14 Ala. N. S. 147. It may be brought by a plaintiff or defendant; 2 Ball & B. 140; 1 Sto. 218; and as well after, as before, a decree; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 306; 1 Macn. & G. 405; Story, Eq. Pl. § 338; 41 Fed. Rep. 725; but must be within a reasonable time; 2 Halst. Ch. 465.

If there has been a change of interest in a pending equity suit, the proper method to introduce another party or to substitute one party for another, is by a supplemental bill or by an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill; 24 U. S. App. 113.

A supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review cannot be entertained where no new facts pertinent to the litigation are discussed except such as were known to the complainants at the date of the original decree; 27 U. S. App. 204.

It may be filed when a necessary party has been omitted; 6 Madd. 369; 4 Johns. Ch. 605; 85 Tenn. 171; to introduce a party who has acquired rights subsequent to the filing of the original bill; 3 Ia. 472; when, after the parties are at issue and witnesses have been examined, some point not already made seems to be necessary, or some additional discovery is found requisite; 1 Paige 200; when new events referring to and supporting the rights and interests already mentioned have occurred subsequently to the filing of the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. 336; 5 Beav. 253; for the statement only of facts and circumstances material and beneficial to the merits, and not merely matters of evidence; 3 Sto. 299; when, after a decision has been made on the original bill, it becomes necessary to bring other matter before the court to get the full effect of it; Story, Eq. Pl. § 336; when a material fact, which existed before the filing of the bill, has been omitted, and it can no longer be introduced by way of amendment; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 303; Mitf. Ch. Pl. 55, 61. 325; but only by special leave of court, when it seeks to change the original structure of the bill and introduce a new and different case; 4 Sim. 76, 628; 4 Paige, Ch. 259. Where, after a final decree, a person who has succeeded to the interest of the complainant in such manner as to entitle him to the full benefit of the decree, finds it necessary to invoke further action to obtain such benefit, he may file a supplemental bill in the original suit; 41 Fed. Rep. 725; but when an executor is substituted as a party in place of his decedent, he need not file a supplemental pleading; 83 Fed. Rep. 85. After a decree disposing of the issues, the filing of a new bill by other parties, involving other issues, although connected with the subject-matter of the original litigation, is to be considered a new litigation, although styled a "supplemental bill" and permitted to be filed in the original cause, and the complainant in the original cause is entitled to notice, and will not be bound without it; 162 U. S. 329. And a supplemental bill filed upon leave granted and notice, which makes an essentially different case from that contemplated in the order granting leave to file it, will be ordered to be taken from the files; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 261.

The bill must be in respect to the same title, in the same person as the original bill; Story, Eq. Pl. 339; and no relief can be had under it upon a cause of action, which did not exist when the original bill was filed; 57 Ill. App. 339; 19 So. Rep. (Fla.) 625. If the original bill shows no title to relief, a supplemental bill cannot be filed based on facts afterwards occurring; but if the original bill is well founded, a supplemental bill may be filed showing a further title to relief; 74 Fed. Rep. 67; 66 id. 385. After a decree has been directed for complainant, a stranger will not be permitted to file a supplemental bill based on his purchase of the cause of action, until a decree is actually entered in the original cause; 72 id. 325. A bill by a surviving partner, to settle the partnership affairs, is separate, and distinct from a bill to subject real estate of the deceased partner to firm debts, and the statute of limitations cannot be avoided by styling the second suit a supplemental bill; 158 U. S, 128. When a patent was assigned to a stranger pending a suit for infringement, the assignee cannot obtain the benefit of the suit brought by the assignor, by a supplemental bill, but he may do it by an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill; 58 Fed. Rep. 404. In a suit to remove a cloud from a title, a decree establishing such title in the complainant, which carries a right to possession, a supplemental bill may be filed to enforce that right; 150 U. S. 401.

It must state the original bill, and the proceedings thereon; and, when it is occasioned by an event which has occurred subsequently to the original bill, it must state that event and the consequent alteration with regard to the parties. In general, the supplemental bill must pray that all defendants appear and answer the charges it contains; Story, Eq. Pl. § 343. In the English supreme court of judicature, amendments of the pleadings may now be allowed at any stage of the proceedings in an action.

SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS. Proceedings supplementary to an execution, directed to the discovery of the debtor's property and its application to the debt for which the execution is issued. They are purely statutory, and the statute limits the power of the courts to existing rights and things in esse at the time of their institution; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1517. The New York statute entitles the judgment creditor to an order of examination "upon proof . . . that the judgment debtor has property which he unjustly refuses to apply towards the satisfaction of the judgment, etc." And where it appears from the examination "that the judgment debtor has, in his possession or under his control, money or other personal property belonging to him," the judge may order such money to be paid over and such other personal property to be delivered up; such proceedings are directed against property which, at the time of the order for his examination, the judgment debtor has in his possession or under his control, or which is actually due to him. No property subsequently acquired, no future earnings of any kind, and no earnings for personal services rendered within sixty days preceding such order, if necessary for the use of his family, can be reached; id.; 2 Abb. N. C. 357; 16 How. Pr. 549. They do not affect money coming to the debtor, unless it is actually due when the order is obtained; id.; 11 Abb. N. S. 384; 1 Hilt. 505; 3 N. Y. St. 287; or earnings due after the service of the order; 3 Abb. N. S. 264; or the salary of a public officer, while in the hands of a disbursing officer in common with other money; 57 How. Pr. 215, 217; 3 N. Y. St. 287. Proof as to the possession or control by the judgment debtor must be clear; 22 How. Pr. 3; and doubts whether the money was earned before or after the order should be resolved in favor of the debtor; 16 How. Pr. 549. If the debtor have a family dependent upon him, he may, if necessary, have sixty days' back earnings exempt; Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. § 2463; and this is held to be a humane provision which should be construed liberally in favor of the debtor; 19 Hun 394. But this does not include money received by a saloon-keeper in his business; 21 App. Div. N. Y. 190.

The return of an execution unsatisfied is sufficient to authorize a resort to supplementary proceedings; 51 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 352; 42 Misc. Rep. 87.

The appointment of a receiver in such proceedings dissolves a partnership of which the judgment debtor is a member; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 959.

Where the judgment is against a married woman she may be examined as to her separate estate; [1892] 2 Q. B. 626.

The enforcement of orders in such proceedings is by treating the defendant as in contempt, and a debtor is liable thereto for collecting rent; 13 App. Div. N. Y. 312; or drawing out a savings bank deposit held in trust for another; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1520.

An act (1879) which enables the plaintiff to examine the defendant on oath as to his property, fraudulently concealed, is unconstitutional, because no one is obliged to give evidence which may incriminate himself; 97 Pa. 147.

SUPPLETORY OATH. In Ecclesiastical Law. An oath given by the judge to the plaintiff or defendant upon half proof, as by one witness, already made. The oath added to the half proof enables the judge to decide. It is discretionary with the judge; Stra. 80; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 370*.

SUPPLICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A petition for pardon of a first offence; also, a petition for reversal of judgment; also, equivalent to duplicatio, which is our rejoinder. Calvinus, Lex.

SUPPLICAVIT (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ issuing out of the king's bench or chancery for taking sureties of the peace: it is commonly directed to the justices of the peace, when they are averse to acting in the affair in their judicial capacity. 4 Bla. Com. 233.

SUPPLICIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A corporal punishment ordained by law; the punishment of death: so called because it was customary to accompany the guilty man to the place of execution and there offer supplications for him.

SUPPLIES. In English Law. Extraordinary grants to the king by parliament to supply the exigencies of the state. Jacob.

Means of provision or relief; stores.

SUPPLY CLAIMS. See MORTGAGE; RECEIVERS.

SUPPORT. The right of support is an easement which one man, either by contract or prescription, enjoys, to rest the joists or timbers of his house upon the wall of an adjoining building owned by another person. 3 Kent 435. See Washb. Easem.

A right to the support of one's land so as to prevent its falling into an excavation made by the owner of adjacent lands.

This support is of two kinds, lateral and subjacent. Lateral support is the right of land to be supported by the land which lies next to it. Subjacent support is the right of land to be supported by the land which lies under it. See LATERAL SUPPORT; MINES AND MINING.

Support is also generally used to mean articles for the sustenance of the family, as food, etc. 19 Kan. 389. See FAMILY.

SUPPRESS. To put a stop to when actually existing. The word does not extend to preventing by suppressing what may lead to a thing. 34 L. J. M. C. 9.

SUPPRESSIO VERI (Lat.). Concealment of truth.

In general, a suppression of the truth when a party is bound to disclose it vitiates a contract. In the contract of insurance, a knowledge of the facts is required to en able the underwriter to calculate the chances and form a due estimate of the risk; and, in this contract perhaps more than any other, the parties are required to represent everything with fairness; 1 W. Bla. 594.

Suppressio veri, as well as suggestio falsi, is a ground to rescind an agreement, or at least not to carry it into execution; 1 Ball & B. 241; 3 Munf. 232; 1 Pet. 383; 2 Paige, Ch. 390; 1 Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 204. See CONCEALMENT; MISREPRESENTATION; REPRESENTATION; SUGGESTIO FALSI.

SUPPRESSION OF EVIDENCE. Where evidence in an equity case on letters patent is taken out of order, the court will usually entertain a motion to suppress it, though where no harm can result, it is sometimes allowed to stand till the hearing. If no such motion be made, the testimony will stand; Rob. Pat. § 1128; when the evidence is filed that which is inadmissible will sometimes be stricken out on motion; id.; but more commonly it stands over for final hearing. Where, in equity, in a patent case, a witness not named in the answer, testified to prior use, it will be considered at the hearing unless a motion be made to suppress it, even though it was taken under objection; 6 Fish. 452.

SUPRA PROTEST. Under protest. See ACCEPTANCE; ACCEPTOR; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; PROTEST; PAYMENT UNDER.

SUPREMACY. Sovereign dominion, authority, and pre-eminence; the highest state. In the United States the supremacy resides in the people, and is exercised by their constitutional representatives, the president and congress. See SOVEREIGNTY.

SUPREME. That which is superior to all other things.

SUPREME COURT. A court of superior jurisdiction in many of the states of the United States.

The name is properly applied to the court of last resort, and is so used in most of the states. In nearly all the states there is a supreme court, but in one or two there is a court of appellate jurisdiction from the supreme court.

See the articles on the respective states; UNITED STATES COURTS.

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS. An appellate tribunal, and the court of last resort, in the state of Connecticut. See CONNECTICUT.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT. An appellate tribunal, and the court of last resort, in the states of Maine, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. See those titles.

SUPREME POWER. The highest authority in the state. Ruth. Nat. L. b. 2, c. 4, p. 67.

SURCHARGE. To put more cattle upon a common than the herbage will sustain or than the party hath a right to do. 3 Bla. Com. 237. In case of common without stint it could only happen when insufficient herbage was left for the lord's own cattle; 1 Rolle, Abr. 399. The remedy was by distraining the beasts beyond the proper number; an action of trespass which must have been brought by the lord of the manor; an action on the case, or a writ of admeasurement of pasture. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 238, n.

In Equity Practice. To prove the omission of an item from an account which is before the court as complete, which should be inserted to the credit of the party surcharging; Story, Eq. Jur. § 525; 2 Ves. 565; 11 Wheat. 237. It is opposed to falsify, which see. Leave to surcharge and falsify is granted in preference to opening an account, in case of an account stated by the parties or reported by an auditor, where the party obtaining the liberty would be concluded by the account were it not granted. See ACCOUNT; AUDITOR.

SURETY. A person who binds himself for the payment of a sum of money, or for the performance of something else, for another. See SURETYSHIP.

SURETY COMPANIES. See INSURANCE; TRUST COMPANIES.

SURETY OF THE PEACE. See PEACE.

SURETYSHIP. An undertaking to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, by which the surety becomes bound as the principal or original debtor is bound.

It is an accessory promise by which a person binds himself for another already bound, and agrees with the creditor to satisfy the obligation, if the debtor does not. 43 La. Ann. 738. It differs from guaranty in this, that suretyship is a primary obligation to see that the debt is paid, while guaranty is a collateral undertaking, essentially in the alternative, to pay the debt if the debtor does not pay it; 24 Pick. 252. And accordingly a surety may be sued as a promisor to pay the debt, while a guarantor must be sued specially on his contract; 8 Pick. 423. The subjects are, however, nearly related, and many of the principles are common to both. See GUARANTY. There must be a principal debtor liable, otherwise the promise becomes an original contract; and, the promise being collateral, the surety must be bound to no greater extent than the principal. Suretyship is one of the contracts included in the statute of frauds; 29 Car. II. c. 3.

The contract must be supported by a consideration, like every other promise. Without that, it is void, apart from the statute of frauds, and whether in writing or not; 4 Taunt. 117; 17 Pa. 469; 43 Ill. App. 584; 36 Kans. 205.

Kent, C. J., divides secondary undertakings into three classes: 1. Cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal or direct debtor. Here there is not, and need not be, any other consideration than that moving between the creditor and original debtor. 2. Cases in which the collateral undertaking is subsequent to the creation of the debt, and was not the inducement to it, though the subsisting liability is the ground of the promise without any distinct and unconnected inducement. Here there must be some further consideration shown, having an immediate respect to such liability; for the consideration for the original debt will not attach to this subsequent promise. 3. When the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the newly contracting parties. The two first classes of cases are within the statute of frauds; the last is not; 8 Johns. 29. This classification has been reviewed and affirmed in numerous cases; 21 N. Y. 415; 15 Pick. 159.

The rule that the statute does not apply to class third has, however, been doubted; and it appears to be admitted that the principle is there inaccurately stated. The true test is the nature of the promise, not of the consideration; 50 Pa. 39; 94 E. C. L. R. 885. But see infra.

A simpler division is into two classes. Where the principal obligation exists before the collateral undertaking is made. Where there is no principal obligation prior in time to the collateral undertaking. In the last class the principal obligation may be contemporaneous with or after the collateral undertaking. The first class includes Kent's second and third, the second includes Kent's first, to which must be added cases where the guaranty referring to a present or future principal obligation does not share the consideration thereof, but proceeds on a distinct consideration. Moreover, there are other original undertakings out of the statute of frauds and valid though by parol, besides his third class. These are where the credit is given exclusively to the promisor though the goods or consideration pass to another. Under this division, undertakings of the first class are original: 1. When the principal obligation is thereby abrogated. 2. When without such abrogation the promisor for his own advantage apparent on the bargain undertakes for some new consideration moving to him from the promisee. 3. Where the promise is in consideration of some loss or disadvantage to the promisee. 4. Where the promise is made to the principal debtor on a consideration moving from the debtor to the promisor; Theob. Sur. 37, 49. The cases under these heads will be considered separately.

First, where the principal obligation is pre-existent, there must be a new consideration to support the promise; and where this consideration is the discharge of the principal debtor, the promise is original and not collateral, as the first requisite of a collateral promise is the existence of a principal obligation. This has been held in numerous cases. The discharge may be by agreement, by novation or substitution, by discharge on final process, or by forbearance under certain circumstances; 4 B. & P. 124; 21 N. Y. 412; 8 Gray 233.

But the converse of this proposition, that where the principal obligation remains, the promise is collateral, cannot be sustained, though there have been repeated dicta to that effect; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 193; 12 Johns. 291; denied in 21 N. Y. 415; 7 Ala. N. S. 54; 33 Vt. 132.

The main question arising in cases under this head is whether the debtor is discharged; and this is to a great extent a question for the jury. But if in fact the principal debt is discharged by agreement and the new promise is made upon this consideration, then the promise is original, and not collateral; 1 Allen 405.

But where there is an existing debt, for which a third party is liable to the promisee, and the promisor undertakes to be responsible for it, still the contract need not be in writing if its terms are such that it effects an extinguishment of the original liability; 160 Mass. 225.

A discharge of the debtor from custody, or surrender of property taken on an execution, is a good discharge of the debt: 11 M. & W. 857; 9 Vt. 137; 4 Dev. 261; 21 N. Y. 415; 34 Barb. 97.

Where the transaction amounts to a sale of the principal debt in consideration of the new promise, the debtor is discharged, and the promise is original; 3 B. & C. 855. So where a purchaser of goods transfers them to another, who promises the vendor to pay for them, this is a substitution and an original promise; 5 Taunt. 450; 9 Cow. 266; 11 Ired. 298; 21 Me. 545.

A mere forbearance to press the principal debt is not such a discharge of the debtor as will make the promise original; 1 Sm. L. C. 387; 21 N. Y. 412; 13 B. Monr. 356; but where the forbearance is so protracted as to discharge the debtor, it may be questioned whether the promise does not become original; 33 Vt. 132.

Second, the promise will be original if made in consideration of some new benefit moving from the promisee to the promisor; 3 Dutch. 371; 4 Cow. 432; Bull. N. P. 281.

Third, the promise is original where the consideration is some loss to the promisee or principal creditor; but it is held in many such cases that the loss must also work some benefit to the promisor; 6 Ad. & E. 564; 3 Strobh. Eq. 177; 20 N. Y. 268. As to merely refraining from giving an execution to the sheriff, see 14 Me. 140.

There have been decisions which hold that the mere relinquishment of a lien by the plaintiff takes the case out of the statute; 7 Johns. 464; 1 McCord 575. It would seem that a surrender of a lien merely is not sufficient consideration; 3 Metc. 396; but it must appear that the surrender is in some way beneficial to the promisor, as when he has an interest in the property released; 77 N. Y. 91; 45 Ind. 180; 5 Cush. 488.

The rule is well settled that when the leading object of a promisor is to induce a promisee to forego some lien, interest, or advantage, and thereby to confer on the promisor a privilege or benefit which he would not otherwise possess or enjoy, an agreement made under such circumstances and upon such a consideration is a new, original, and binding contract, although the effect of it may be to assume the debt and discharge the liability of another; 6 Maule & S. 204; 1 Gray 391. The advantage relinquished by the promisee must directly enure to the benefit of the promisor, so as in effect to make it purchase by the promisor; 5 Cush. 488; 12 Johns. 291. It is stated in many cases (under classes third and fourth, above) that the promise is original where the consideration moves to the promisor. The true test, however, must be found not in the consideration, but in the nature of the promise. Wherever the new promisor undertakes for his own default; where his promise is virtually to pay his own debt in a peculiar way, or if, by paying the debt, he is really discharging a liability of his own, his promise is original. The only case in which consideration can affect the terms of the promise is where the consideration of the promise is the extinguishment of the original liability; 17 Mass. 229; 18 Tex. 446; 22 How. 28.

Fourth, the promise is original if made on a consideration moving from the debtor to the promisor; 10 Johns. 412; 9 Cal. 92; 30 Ala. N. S. 599; 5 Me. 31; 1 Gray 391; 22 How. U. S. 28; 32 Neb. 269.

For the rule in a class of cases quite analogous, see 9 Ill. 40; 3 Conn. 272.

Where the guaranty relates to a contemporaneous or future obligation, the promise is original, and not suretyship, (a) if credit is given exclusively to the promisor, (b) if the promise is merely to indemnify.

In the first of these cases the question to whom credit was given must be ultimately for the jury in each case. If there is any primary liability, and the creditor resorts to the principal debtor first, the promise is collateral. Thus, if the promisor says, "Deliver goods to A, and I will pay you," there is no primary obligation on the part of A, and the promise is original; 3 Metc. 396. But if he says, "I will see you paid," or, "I promise you that he will pay," the promise would be collateral; 1 H. Bla. 120; 7 Fed. Rep. 477; 3 Col. 176; 13 Gray 613; 148 Pa. 220 (where it was left to the jury to decide whether it was an original undertaking).

A promise to indemnify merely against contingent loss from another's default is original; 15 Johns. 425. A doubt is expressed by Browne. Stat. of Frauds § 158, whether the fact that mere indemnity is intended, makes the promise original, because in many cases—those where the indemnity is against the default of a third person—there is an implied liability of that person, and the promise is collateral thereto. Now, there are three classes of cases. First, it is clear that where the indemnity is against the promisor's default or debt he is already liable without his promise; and to use this as a defence and make the promise collateral thereto would be using the law as a cover to a fraud; 1 Conn. 519; 46 Me. 41; 6 Bingh. 506; 10 Johns. 42; 17 Pick. 538. Second, so where the only debt against which indemnity is promised is the promisee's, this, being not the debt of another, but of the promisee, is clearly not within the statute, but the promise is original. And even if the execution of such a promise would discharge incidentally some other liability, this fact does not make the promise collateral; 18 M. & W. 561; 1 Gray 391; 25 Wend. 243; 10 Gill & J. 404; 31 Vt. 142. Third, but where there is a liability implied in another person, and the promise refers to his liability or default, and if executed will discharge such liability or default, the promise would seem on reason to be collateral and binding like a suretyship for future advances—that is, when accepted; 9 Ired. 10; 1 Ala. 1; 1 Gill & J. 424; 10 Ad. & E. 453; 4 Barb. 131. But in many cases the rule is broadly stated that a promise to indemnify merely is original; 8 B. & C. 728 (overruled, 10 Ad. & E. 453); 1 Gray 391; 10 Johns. 242 (overruled, 4 Barb. 131); 1 Ga. 294; 10 N. H. 175; 1 Conn. 519; 5 Me. 504. In other cases the distinction is made to rest on the fact that the engagement is made to the debtor; 9 Gray 76; 11 Ad. & E. 438; and in other cases, on the futurity of the risk or liability; 12 Mass. 297.

The last ground is untenable; future guarantees binding when accepted or acted upon, and those against torts are expressly to the contrary. The first ground is too broad, as shown above; and the second seems to ignore the clear primary liability of the principal debtor.

It is said that "a mere promise of indemnity which is not collateral to any liability on the part of another, either express or implied, is not within the statute, and such a case illustrates the rule that when there is no principal, the promise need not be in writing. On the other hand, when the promise to indemnify is in fact a promise to pay the debt of another, then clearly such promise is within the statute, and the fact that it is in form a promise to indemnify will make no difference." Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 59. See 4 B. & S. 414.

When the principal obligation is void, voidable, not enforceable, or unascertained, the promise is original, there being in this case no principal obligation to sustain the promise as collateral; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 156. It may be questionable, however, whether the promise will in such case be original unless the promisor knows the principal liability to be void or voidable; Burge, Surety 6; but this question may be settled by the principle that where credit is given to the principal, notwithstanding his obligation is void or voidable, the promise of the surety is collateral; 4 Bingh. 470; 7 N. H. 368; but if no such credit is given or implied, the promise is collateral. See 15 N. Y. 576; 33 Ala. N. S. 106; 6 Gray 90. Such would be the guaranty of an infant's promise; 7 N. H. 368; and this is accordingly so held; 20 Pick. 467 (but see 11 Allen 365, contra, as to the promise of a father to pay the debt of a minor son); 4 Me. 521; though a distinction has been made in the case of a married woman; 4 Bingh. 470; 84 Pa. 135; 48 Ind. 103; but the promise is collateral where the married woman has separate property which she can charge with the payment of her debts, and the credit is given exclusively to her; 6 Ga. 14.

Where the liability is unascertained at the time of the promise, the promise is original; as the liabilities must concur at the time of the undertaking to make a guaranty; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 196; 1 Salk. 27; contra, Ambl. 330. Under this head would come a promise to pay damages for a tort, there being no principal liability until judgment; 1 Wils. 305; or where the liability rests upon a future award; 2 Allen 417; and liability upon indefinite executory contracts in general. It is, however, said that the liability may be prospective at the time the promise is made. See Huffcut's Ans. Contr. 72.

The promise is clearly original where the promisor undertakes for his own debt. The rule is, unless the promisor himself or his property is ultimately to be made liable in default of the principal debtor, the statute does not apply; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 177. Thus, an engagement by one who owes the principal debtor to retain the principal debt, so that it may be attached by trustee or garnishee process, is not a collateral promise; 9 Pick. 306; 63 Barb. 321; 50 Ia. 310.

So an agreement by a purchaser to pay part of the purchase-money to a creditor of the vendor is an agreement to pay his own debt; 55 Miss. 365; 2 Lea 543; 49 Ia. 574; 58 Ill. 232; or to pay a debt due a promisee by a third person out of moneys owing by a promisor to such third person; 32 Ohio 415; 9 Cow. 266; 58 Ill. 233; or for the application of a fund due a promisor by a third party; 86 Pa. 147; 18 How. 31. Such an agreement is a trust, or an original promise.

Under the statute of frauds. At common law, a contract of guaranty or suretyship could be made by parol; but by the statute of frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, "no action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, . . . unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some person thereunto lawfully authorized:" so that under the statute all contracts of guaranty and suretyship must be in writing and signed. The words debt and default in the statute refer to contracts; 2 East 325; and debt includes only pre-existing liability; 12 Mass. 297; miscarriage refers to torts; 2 B. & Ald. 613. Torts are accordingly within the statute, and may be guaranteed against; 2 B. & Ald. 613; 3 Day 457; though this has been doubted in regard to future torts; 1 Wils. 305. Perhaps a guaranty against future torts might be open to objections on the ground of public policy. But the unchallenged contracts of modern indemnity companies would seem to show that such an objection would not prevail.

A guaranty of indemnity to a surety is within the statute of frauds; 45 Ill. App. 155.

The doctrine that a future contingent liability on the part of the principal is not within the statute; 1 Salk. 27; 12 Mass. 297; is not tenable; and it is clear, both by analogy and on authority, that such a liability may support a guaranty, although such cases must be confined within very narrow limits, and the mere fact of the contingency is a very strong presumption that the promise is original; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 196; 6 Vt. 668; 88 Ill. 561.

Where the promise is made to the debtor, it is not within the statute; Reed, Stat. Fr. 76; 7 Halst. 188; 2 Den. 162. "We are of opinion that the statute applies only to promises made to the person to whom another is answerable;" 11 Ad. & E. 446; 1 Gray 391. The word another in the statute must be understood as referring to a third person, and not to a debt due from either of the contracting parties; 6 Cush. 552. False and deceitful representations of the credit or solvency of third persons are not within the statute; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 181; 4 Camp. 1.

The English rule required the consideration to be expressed; 5 East 10. It could not be proved by parol; 4 B. & Ald. 595. But by 19 & 20 Vict. no such promise shall be deemed invalid by reason only that the consideration does not appear in writing or by necessary inference from a written instrument; 7 C. B. N. S. 361. The rule varies in different states, and in some states is settled by statute. See Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 82. In some states there are statutes similar to the English statutes. In other states the consideration is required by statutes to be expressed. Of states where statutes are silent, some have accepted and some rejected the English construction of statutes of frauds in Wain v. Walters, 5 East 10, supra.

The courts lay hold of any language which implies a consideration; 21 N. Y. 31. So where the guaranty and the matter guaranteed are one simultaneous transaction, both will be construed in connection, and the consideration expressed in the latter applied to the support of the former.

if these are words of reference in the guaranty ; 36 N. H. 73.

Formation of the obligation. In construing the language of the contract to decide whether it constitutes an original promise or a guaranty, it is difficult to lay down a general rule : the circumstances of particular cases vary widely. See GUARANTY ; [1894] 1 Q. B. 288. One test is if the promisor is totally unconnected with the transaction except by means of his promise to pay the loss, the contract is a guarantee ; if he is to derive some benefit from it, his contract is an indemnity." Id. The word guaranty or surety may or may not indicate correctly the contract, and the circumstances of the case may make an indorser liable as a guarantor or surety, without any words to indicate the obligation ; 24 Wend. 456.

In general, if a promissory note is signed or indorsed when made by a stranger to the note he becomes a joint promisor and liable on the note ; 44 Me. 488 ; 9 Cush. 104 ; 14 Tex. 275 ; 20 Mo. 571 ; and this will be true if indorsed after delivery to the payee in pursuance of an agreement made before the delivery ; 7 Gray 284 ; but parol evidence may be introduced to show that he is a surety or guarantor ; 23 Ga. 368 ; 89 Ill. 550. If the third party indorses after delivery to the payee without any previous agreement, he is merely a second indorser ; 11 Pa. 466 ; 82 N. C. 313 ; and he is liable as a maker to an innocent holder ; 20 Mo. 591. But it was held otherwise where the signature was on the face of the note ; 19 N. H. 572 ; and the same is held where he signs at inception of the note, in pursuance of a custom, leaving a blank for the payee's signature above his name ; 12 La. Ann. 517. In Connecticut, such an indorser is held to guaranty that the note shall be collectible when due ; 46 Conn. 410. The time of signing may be shown by parol evidence ; 9 Ohio 139.

A payee or subsequent party who executes a guarantee upon a bill or note is not liable as indorser ; 3 Stew. 319 ; 19 Me. 359 ; 2 Const. 225 ; contra, 31 Ga. 210 ; 20 Vt. 499.

It has been held that a third person indorsing a blank at the making of the note may show his intention by parol ; 11 Mass. 436 ; but not if he describes himself as guarantor, or if the law fixes a precise liability to indorsements in blank ; 2 Hill, N. Y. 80. But this has been doubted ; 33 E. L. & E. 282. In New York the cases seem to take the broad ground that an indorser in blank, under all circumstances, is an indorser merely, and cannot be made a guarantor or surety ; 1 N. Y. 324. See 95 U. S. 90.

The consideration to support a parol promise to pay the debt of another must be such as would be good relating to the payment of that particular debt or of any other of equal amount ; 33 Md. 373. It need not be necessarily a consideration distinct from that of the principal contract. An executed or past consideration to the principal is not sufficient ; 121 Mass. 116 ; 51 Miss. 482.

The giving of new credit where a debt already exists has been held a sufficient consideration to support a guaranty of the old and new debt ; 15 Pick. 159 ; 15 Ga. 321 ; but the weight of authority would seem to require that there should be some further consideration ; Reed, Stat. Fr. 70 ; 1 Pet. 476 ; 8 Johns. 211 ; 7 Harr. & J. 457. A consideration that will take a case out of the statute of frauds must be such a consideration as will make the collateral debt, agreed to be paid, the debt of the promisor. It must be an original undertaking ; 45 Ill. App. 155.

Forbearance to sue the debtor is a good consideration, if definite in time ; 92 Ind. 337 ; 45 Wis. 466 ; 1 Kebl. 114 ; or even if of considerable ; Cro. Jac. 683 ; or reasonable time ; 8 Bulstr. 206 ; 4 Wash. 148. But there must be an actual forbearance, and the creditor must have had a power of enforcement ; 4 East 465. But the fact that it is doubtful whether such a power exists, does not injure the consideration ; 5 B. & Ad. 123. Forbearance has been held sufficient consideration even where there was no well-grounded claim ; 18 L. J. C. P. 222 ; 34 Pa. 60 ; contra, 3 Pick. 88. A short forbearance, or the deferment of a remedy, as postponement of a trial, or postponement of arrest, may be a good consideration ; and perhaps an agreement to defer indefinitely may support a guaranty ; 4 Johns. 257 ; 6 Conn. 81. A mere agreement not to push an execution is too vague to be a consideration ; 4 McCord 409 ; and a postponement of a remedy must be made by agreement as well as in fact ; 3 Cush. 85 ; 6 Conn. 81 ; 11 C. B. 172.

The contract of suretyship may be entered into absolutely and without conditions, or its formation may be made to depend on certain conditions precedent. But there are some conditions implied in every contract of this kind, however absolute on its face. In the case of bonds, as in other contracts of suretyship, it is essential that there should be a principal, and a bond executed by the surety is not valid until executed by the principal also. One case, 10 Co. 100 b, sometimes cited to the contrary, is not clear to the point. The argument that the surety is bound by his recital under seal fails, especially in all statute bonds, where one important requisite of the statute, that the bond should be executed by the principal, fails ; 2 Pick. 24 ; 4 Beav. 383.

Where the surety's undertaking is conditional on others joining, and this condition is known to the creditor, he is not ordinarily liable until they do so ; 4 B. & Ad. 440 ; 53 Ind. 321 ; 4 Biss. 283 ; 35 Miss. 518 ; 124 Ill. 200 ; contra, if the obligee is ignorant of the condition ; 2 Metc. Ky. 608 ; 16 Wall. 1 ; 61 Me. 505. So the surety is not bound if the signatures of his co-sureties are forged, although he has not made his signature expressly conditional on theirs : 2 Am. L. Reg. 349 ; but see 8 id. N. S. 665. Where a bond to a sheriff ; 1 La. 41 ; and an administration bond; 119 Ind. 503; were signed in expectation by the party signing that other sureties would sign, and the bond was delivered without such other signatures, the surety was held liable. If a condition upon which a surety signs be known to the creditor and be not complied with, the surety is not liable; 30 Ga. 93.

The acceptance of the contract by the promisee by words or by acts under it is often made a condition precedent to the attaching of the liability of the surety. The general rule is that where a future guaranty is given, absolute and definite in amount, no notice of acceptance is necessary; but if it is contingent and indefinite in amount, notice must be given; 4 Me. 521; 8 Conn. 438; 16 Johns. 67; but the promisee has a reasonable time to give such notice; 8 Gray 211.

A distinction is to be made between a guaranty and an offer to guaranty. No notice of acceptance is requisite when a guaranty is absolute; 3 N. Y. 212; 2 Mich. 511; but an offer to guaranty must have notice of acceptance; and till accepted it is revocable; 12 C. B. N. S. 784; 6 Dow. H. L. C. 239; 32 Pa. 10; and where acceptance is required, it may be as well implied by acts as by words; as, by receiving the written guaranty from the promisor; 8 Gray 211; or by actual knowledge of the amount of sales under a guaranty of the purchase-money; 28 Vt. 160.

The rule requiring notice is said to be based upon "the nature and definition of a contract, which requires the assent of a party to whom a proposal is made, to be signified to the party making it, in order to constitute a binding promise. . . . The rule proceeds upon the ground that the case in which it applies is an offer or proposal on the part of the guarantor, which does not become binding as an obligation until accepted by the party to whom it is made; that, until then, it is inchoate and incomplete and may be withdrawn by the proposer." 104 U. S. 159. When the guaranty is contemporaneous with the principal contract, notice is unnecessary; 121 Ind. 465; 26 S. W. Rep. Tex. 941; so, where there has been a precedent request; 27 N. E. Rep. Ind. 318; contra, 9 Pa. 320. See 34 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 257. Notice must be given of an offer to guarantee advances to be made by another to a third party, in order to bind the guarantor; 1 M. & S. 557. Knowledge that a guaranty is being acted upon is sufficient in the case of guaranties of existing debts, or of contemporaneous debts; 104 U. S. 159. But in case of guaranties of the repayment of future advances, the cases are in conflict as to whether notice is necessary. That notice is necessary, see 104 U. S. 159; that it is generally unnecessary, see 3 N. Y. 203; 46 Mich. 70; that it is necessary where the amount of the proposed advance is uncertain, but unnecessary where it is certain, see 112 Ind. 293. See, generally, Huffcut's Ans. Contr. 27. One who, as surety, executes a bond with another, conditioned for the payment of the moneys advanced the other, is not entitled to notice of the acceptance of the bond by the obligee; 34 Fed. Rep. 104.

Where a contract of guaranty is signed by the guarantor without any previous request of the other party, and in his absence and for no other consideration between them, except future advances to be made to the principal debtor, there must be an acceptance of the guaranty by the other party in order to complete the contract; 115 U. S. 527; 84 Fed. Rep. 605; 110 Pa. 285, 366.

Construction and extent of obligation. The liability of a surety cannot exceed, in any event, that of the principal, though it may be less. The same rule does not apply to the remedies, which may be greater against the surety. But, whatever may be the liability imposed upon the surety, it is clear that it cannot be extended by implication beyond the terms of the contract. His obligation is strictissimi juris, and cannot be extended beyond the precise terms of the contract; 10 Johns. 180; 2 Pa. 27; 9 Utah 260. Sureties are never held responsible beyond the clear and absolute terms and meaning of their undertakings, and presumptions and equities are never allowed to enlarge, or in any degree to change, their legal obligations; 21 How. 66. And this rule has been repeatedly reaffirmed; 11 N. Y. 598; 29 Pa. 460; 2 Wall. 235. "It is quite true, that in one sense, the contract of a surety is strictissimi juris, and it is not to be extended beyond the express terms in which it is expressed. The rule, however, is not a rule of construction of a contract, but a rule of application of the contract after the construction of it has been ascertained. Where the question is as to the meaning of the language of the contract, there is no difference between the contract of the surety and that of anybody else; 47 N. Y. Supp. 48.

The remedies against the surety may be more extensive than those against the principal, and there may be defences open to the principal, but not to the surety,—as, infancy or coverture of the principal,—which must be regarded as a part of the risks of the surety; 30 Vt. 122.

The liability of the surety extends to and includes all securities given to him by the principal debtor, the converse of the rule stated below in the case of collateral security given to the creditor; 26 Vt. 308. Thus a creditor is entitled in equity to the benefit of all securities given by the principal debtor for the indemnity of his surety; 18 Mo. 136. If the surety receives money from the principal to discharge the debt, he holds it as trustee of the creditor; 6 Ohio 80.

A payment made by the principal before the claim is barred by the statute of limitations, keeps the debt alive as to the surety; otherwise, if made after the statute has run; 114 U. S. 528.

In the common case of bonds given for the faithful discharge of the duties of an office, it is of course the rule that the bond covers only the particular term of office for which it is given, and it is not necessary that this should be expressly stated; nor will the time be extended by a condition to be bound "during all the time A (the principal) continues," if after the expiration of the time A holds over merely as an acting officer, without a valid appointment; 3 Sandf. 408. The circumstances of particular cases may extend the strict rule stated above, as in the case of officers annually appointed. Here, although the bond recites the appointment, if it is conditioned upon his faithful accounting for money received before his appointment, the surety may be held; 9 B. & C. 35; 9 Mass. 267. But the intention to extend the time, either by including past or future liabilities, must clearly appear; 4 B. & P. 175. See 101 Cal. 483; 76 Md. 136. Generally the recital cannot be enlarged and extended by the condition; Theob. Surety 66. And where the recital sets forth an employment for twelve months, this time is not controlled by a condition, "from time to time annually, and at all times thereafter during the continuance of this employment," although the employment is actually continued beyond the year; 2 B. & Ald. 431; 7 Gray 1.

So the obligation may cease by a change in the character of the office or employment; 3 Wils. 530; but an alteration in the character of the obligees, by taking in new partners, does not necessarily terminate the obligation; 10 B. & C. 122. But where an essential change takes place, as the death of the obligee, the obligation, is terminated, although the business is carried on by the executors; 1 Term 18. Where one becomes surety for two or either of them, the obligation is terminated by the death of one of the principals; 1 Bingh. 452; but this is where the obligation is essentially personal; and where a bond for costs was given by two as "defendants," the surety was not discharged by the death of one; 5 B. & Ald. 261. So a surety for a lessee is not liable for rent after the term, although the lessee holds over; 1 Pick. 332.

If the law provides that a public officer shall hold over until a successor is appointed, the sureties on the official bond are liable during such holding over; 37 Miss. 518; 2 Metc. Mass. 522; contra, in the case of officers of corporations; 7 Gray 1; but the liability of such surety extends only for such reasonable time as would enable the successor to be appointed; 40 La. Ann. 241. And this provision is not controlled by an alteration of the law extending the term but leaving the provision intact; 15 Gratt. 1. But when the term of an office created by statute or charter is not limited, but merely directory for an annual election, it seems the surety will be liable, though after the year, until his successor is qualified; 3 Del. Ch. 225.

In bonds, the penalty is the extreme amount of liability of the surety; but various circumstances may reduce the liability below this; 3 Cow. 151; 6 Term 303. If the engagement of the surety is general, the surety is understood to be obligated to the same extent as his principal, and his liability extends to all the accessories of the principal obligation; 14 La. Ann. 183.

A surety on a cashier's bond is not liable for money collected by the cashier as an attorney-at-law, and not accounted for to the bank; 4 Pick. 314. So also where one was surety, and the bond was conditioned on the accounting by the principal for money received by him in virtue of his office as parish overseer, the surety was held not liable for money borrowed by the principal for parochial purposes; 7 B. & C. 491. But a surety on a collector's bond is liable for his principal's neglect to collect, as well as failure to pay over; 6 C. & P. 106.

As the surety is only liable to the obligations fairly intended at the execution of the bond, he cannot be held for a breach of new duties attached to his principal's office; 4 Pick 314; or if any material change is made in the duties; 2 Pick. 223. A surety on an official bond is said to be liable generally for the faithful performance of duties imposed upon the officer, whether by laws enacted before or after the execution of the bond, where such duties are properly within the scope of the office; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 548.

If one guarantees payment for services, and the promisee partly performs the services, but fails of completing them from no fault of his own, the guarantor is liable to the amount of the part-performance; 12 Gray 445.

A bond for faithful performance of duties renders the sureties responsible for ordinary skill and diligence, as well as for integrity; 12 Pick. 303.

A continuing guaranty up to a certain amount covers a constant liability of that amount; but if the guaranty is not continuing, the liability ceases after the execution of the contract to the amount limited; 3 B. & Ald. 593.

A guaranty may be continuing or may be exhausted by one act. It is said that there is no general rule for determining the question; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 156. The general principle may be thus stated: When by the terms of the undertaking, by the recitals in the instrument, or by a reference to the custom and course of dealing between the parties, it appears that the guaranty looked to a future course of dealing for an indefinite time, or a succession of credits to be given, it is to be deemed a continuing guaranty, and the amount expressed is to limit the amount for which the guarantor is to be responsible, and not the amount to which the dealing or whole credit given is to extend; 7 Pet. 113; 3 B. & Ald. 593. Thus, a guaranty for any goods to one hundred pounds is continuous; 12 East 227; or for "any debts not exceeding," etc.; 2 Camp. 413; or, "I will undertake to be answerable for any tallow not exceeding," etc., but "without the word any it might perhaps have been confined to one dealing;" 3 Camp. 220. The words, "I do hereby agree to guaranty the payment of goods according to the custom of their trading with you, in the sum of £200," are held to constitute a continuing guaranty; 6 Bingh. 244; so of the words, "I agree to be responsible for the price of goods purchased at any time, to the amount of," etc.; 1 Metc. Mass. 24. The words "answerable for the amount of five sacks of flour" are clearly not continuous; 6 Bingh. 276. The court will look at the surrounding circumstances, in order to determine; L. R. 4 C. P. 595.

The contracts of guaranty and suretyship are not negotiable or assignable, and in general can be taken advantage of only by those who were included as obligees at the formation of the contract; 3 McLean 279. See GUARANTY. Accordingly, the contract is terminated by the death of one of several obligees; 4 Taunt. 673; or by material change, as incorporation; 3 B. & P. 34. But where a bond is given to trustees in that capacity, their successors can take advantage of it; 12 East 399. The fact that a stranger has acted on a guaranty does not entitle him to the benefits of the contract; 20 Vt. 499; and this has been held in the case of one of two guarantees who acted on the guaranty; 3 Tex. 199. A guaranty is not negotiable, whether made by a payee or subsequent party to a bill or note; 8 Watts 361.

It is held that a guaranty addressed to no one in particular may be acted on by any one; 22 Vt. 160; but the true rule would seem to be that in such cases a party who had acted on the contract might show, as in other contracts, that he was a party to it within the intention at the making; the mere fact that no obligee is mentioned does not open it to everybody.

In an action against sureties for violation of a bond by the principals, it is not necessary to allege any violation on the part of the sureties; 31 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 158.

The rule of construction applied to ordinary sureties is not applicable to the bonds of fidelity and casualty companies; any doubtful language should be construed most strongly against the surety and in favor of the indemnity which the insured had reasonable ground to expect; 22 U. S. App. 439.

Enforcement of the obligation. As the surety cannot be bound to any greater extent than the principal, it follows that the creditor cannot pursue the surety until he has acquired a full right of action against the principal debtor. A surety for the performance of any future or executory contract cannot be called upon until there is an actual breach by the principal. A surety on a promissory note cannot be sued until the note has matured, as there is no debt until that time. All conditions precedent to a right of action against the principal must be complied with. Where money is payable on demand, there must have been a demand and refusal. But it is not necessary that the creditor should have exhausted all the means of obtaining his debt. In some cases it may be requisite to notify the surety of the default of the debtor, or to sue the debtor; but this depends upon the particular conditions and circumstances of each case, and cannot be considered a condition precedent in all cases. Even where the creditor has a fund or other security to resort to, he is not obliged to exhaust this before resorting to the surety; he may elect either remedy, and pursue the surety first. But if the surety pay the debt, he is entitled to claim that the creditor should proceed against such fund or other security for his benefit; 4 Jones, Eq. 212; 33 Ala. N. S. 261. And if the creditor having received such collateral security, avail himself of it, he is bound to preserve the original debt; for in equity the surety will be entitled to subrogation; 38 Pa. 98. A judgment against the principal may be assigned to the surety upon payment of the debt; 1 Metc. 489; 4 Jones, Eq. 262; 77 Hun 580. But an assignment of the debt must be for the whole; the surety cannot pay a part and claim an assignment pro tanto; 39 N. H. 150.

In general, it is not requisite that notice of the default of the principal should be given to the surety, especially when the engagement is absolute and for a definite amount; 14 East 514. The guarantor on a note is not entitled to notice as an indorser; 33 Ia. 293; 74 Pa. 351, 445; 56 Mo. 272. Laches in giving notice to the surety upon a draft of the default of the principal can only be set up as a defence in an action against the surety, in cases where he has suffered damage thereby, and then only to the extent of that damage; 3 N. Y. 203: it is no defence to an action against a surety on a bond that the plaintiff knew of the default of the principal, and delayed for a long time to notify the surety or to prosecute the bond; 1 Zabr. 100. Mere passive delay in prosecuting a remedy against a principal does not release a surety; 37 Minn. 431; 30 S. C. 177; 99 N. C. 531: not even if prolonged until the statute of limitations has run; 69 Fed. Rep. 798. Sureties on a supersedeas bond are not entitled to have a suit thereon stayed till attached lands of the principal are sold and the security exhausted; 57 Fed. Rep. 909.

A judgment against a principal is at least prima facie evidence against the surety, though he was not notified of the action; 66 Fed. Rep. 265.

Discharge of obligation. The obligation may be discharged by acts of the principal, or by acts of the creditor. Payment, or tender of payment, by the one, and any act which would deprive the creditor of remedies which in case of default would enure to the benefit of the surety, are instances of discharge. In the first place, a payment by the debtor would of course operate to discharge the liability. The only questions which can arise upon this point are, whether the payment is applicable to the payment in question, and as to the amount. Upon the first of these, this contract is governed by the general rule that the debtor can apply his payment to any debt he chooses. The surety has no power to modify or direct the application, but is bound by the election of the principal; 2 Bingh. N. C. 7. If no such election is made by the debtor, the creditor may apply the payment to whichever debt he sees fit; 7 Wheat. 20; 1 Pick. 386. This power, however, only applies to voluntary payments, and not to payments made by process of law; 10 Pick. 129. A surety on a promissory note is discharged by its payment, and the note cannot be again put in circulation; 12 Cush. 163; so also, extension of time by the holder of a note at the request of one maker without the knowledge of the other who signed as a surety, releases the latter though the holder did not know of the relation between the two makers at the time the note was given; 23 U. S. App. 280.

Where one of two sureties to a contract assented to a change which altered his liability to his prejudice, it was held that the other surety was released but the former was bound for the whole liability; 17 U. S. App. 442, 463. Whatever will discharge the surety in equity will be a defence at law; 7 Johns. 337; 2 Pick. 223.

A release of the principal debtor operates as a discharge of the surety; [1898] A. C. 313; though the converse is not true; 17 Tex. 128; [1898] App. Cas. 313; 63 Ill. 272; unless the obligation is such that the liability is joint only, and cannot be severed. But if the creditor, when releasing the principal, reserves his remedies against the surety, the latter is not discharged; L. R. 7 C. P. 9; 4 Ch. App. Cas. 204; and "a creditor who is fully indemnified is not discharged by the release of the principal." Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 147. The release of one of several sureties is said to release the others only so far as the one released would have been liable for contribution to the co-sureties; 47 Ala. 390; but see 32 Ind. 438. Other cases hold such a release to be a discharge of the co-sureties; 40 Ind. 225; 2 Ala. 694. When the discharge of one surety varies the contract; 2 Head 613; or increases the risk of the co-sureties, they are released also.

Fraud or alteration avoids a contract of suretyship. Fraud may be by the creditor's misrepresentation or concealment of facts. Unless, however, the contract between the debtor and creditor is unusual, the surety must ask for information; 12 Cl. & F. 109; 15 W. Va. 21. The creditor has been held bound to inform a surety of debtor's previous default; 33 Pa. 358; L. R. 7 Q. B. 666; contra, 21 W. R. 439; 91 Ill. 518; though not of his mere indebtedness; 17 C. B. N. S. 482. But to accept a surety relying on the belief that there are no unusual circumstances increasing his risk, knowing that there are such, and neglecting to communicate them, is fraud; 36 Me. 179; 81 N. Y. 518. The fraud must be practised on the surety; 9 Ala. 42. The forgery of the signature of a surety on a constable's bond will release another surety, signing the same upon the representation that such signature is genuine; 37 Ill. App. 490.

Any material alteration in the contract without the assent of the surety, or change in the circumstances, will discharge the surety; even though trivial, or to the advantage of the surety; 164 U. S. 238; 3 B. & C. 605. Such are the cases where the sureties on a bond for faithful performance are released by a change in the employment or office of the principal; 6 C. B. N. S. 550. But it seems that an alteration by the legislature in an official's duties will not discharge surety as long as they are appropriate to his office; 86 N. Y. 459. If the principal and obligee change the terms of the obligation without the consent of the surety, the latter is discharged; 4 Wash. C. C. 26. A change in the amounts of payments to be made under the principal contract releases the surety who had no knowledge of the change and did not consent; 61 Fed. Rep. 77.

If the creditor, without the assent of the surety, gives time to the principal, the surety is discharged; 3 Y. & C. 187; 2 B. & P. 61; 8 Bingh. 156. So where he agrees with the principal to give time to the surety; L. R. 7 Ch. App. 142. But not if without consideration; 46 Ill. App. 418; 144 U. S. 97; nor does the reducing the rate of interest on a debt and allowing it to run along after maturity on payment of interest, without any binding contract for an extension for a definite time; 148 Ill. 654. And not where a creditor reserves his rights against the surety; 16 M. & W. 128; 4 H. L. C. 997. The rule applies where a state is a creditor; 75 N. C. 515.

The contract must be effectual, binding the creditor as well as the debtor; and it is not enough that the creditor merely forbears to press the debtor; 5 Gray 457; 15 Ind. 45. See, also, 17 Johns. 176; 9 Tex. 615; 9 Cl. & F. 45; 37 S. C. 463; 98 N. C. 111; 84 Va. 772; 71 Tex. 241; 140 U. S. 220. Mere forbearance or delay of a creditor in enforcing his rights against the principal does not release the surety, who may, if he chooses, pay the debt, and, becoming subrogated to the creditor's rights, control the claim to his own satisfaction; 45 La. Ann. 814.

The receipt of interest on a promissory note, after the note is overdue, is not sufficient to discharge the surety; 6 Gray 319; nor is taking another bond, as collateral security to the original, having a longer time to run: 41 N. Y. 474.

As a requisite to the binding nature of the agreement, it is necessary that there should be some consideration: 2 Dutch. 191; 30 Miss. 424; a part payment by the principal is held not to be such a consideration; 31 id. 664. Prepayment of interest is a good consideration; 30 id. 432; but not an agreement to pay usurious interest, where the whole sum paid can be recovered back; 10 Md. 227; though it would seem to be otherwise if the contract is executed, and the statutes of usury only provide for a recovery of the excess; 2 Patt. & H. 504.

It has been questioned how far the receipt of interest in advance shows an agreement to extend the time: it may undoubtedly be a good consideration for such an agreement, but does not of itself constitute it. At the most it may be said to be prima facie evidence of the agreement; 30 Vt. 711; 1 Y. & C. 620.

The surety is not discharged if he has given his assent to the extension of the time; 6 Bosw. 600; 16 Pa. 112. Such assent by one surety does not bind his co-surety; 10 N. H. 318; and subsequent assent given by the surety without new consideration, after he has been discharged by a valid agreement for delay, will not bind him; 12 N. H. 320. He need not show notice to the creditor of his dissent; 12 Ga. 271.

Where one surety consents to a change in the original contract and the other does not, the former is bound and the latter is not; 61 Fed. Rep. 77.

The burden of showing a surety's consent to an alteration in the contract is on the plaintiff, when set up by him; 61 Fed. Rep. 77.

Where an execution against a principal is not levied, or a levy is postponed without the consent of the surety, he is discharged from his liability as surety, unless he has property of the principal in his hands at the time; if he has property in his hands liable for the principal's debts, the creditors of the principal may insist on an application of the property to the payment of their debts; 9 B. Monr. 235. A creditor must not only fail, but negligently fail, to enforce a lien, in order to exonerate sureties; 87 Ia. 56. Marriage of the principal and creditor discharges the surety, destroying the right of action; 30 Ark. 667.

If the creditor releases any security which he holds against the debtor, the surety will be discharged; 8 S. & R. 452; 23 Fed. Rep. 573; 80 Ill. 122; 84 Ind. 594; but if the security only covers a part of the debt, it would seem that the surety will be released only pro tanto; 9 W. & S. 36; 127 Mass. 386; so of an execution levied and afterwards relinquished; the surety is discharged to the extent to which he has been injured; 50 Ala. 340; 23 Cal. 94; but the surety is not discharged unless he is injured by the release of the levy; 2 G. & J. 243; 88 Pa. 157. Nor will it matter if the security is received after the contract is made; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 426; contra, 1 Drewry 333. A creditor who has the personal contract of his debtor, with a surety, and has also or takes afterwards property from the principal as a pledge or security for his debt, is to hold the property fairly and impartially for the benefit of the surety as well as himself, and if he parts with it without the knowledge or against the will of the surety he shall lose his claim against the surety to the amount of the property so surrendered, in equity; 43 Me. 381; 8 Pick. 121; 4 Johns. Ch. 129; 5 N. H. 353; or at law; 8 S. & R. 457. The fact that other security, as good as, or better than, that surrendered, was substituted for it, will not preclude the surety from availing himself of the discharge; 15 N. H. 119; 80 Ill. 122.

A creditor who has given up a lien on the debtor's property must prove that the surety was not injured thereby; 23 Fed. Rep. 573. If the relinquishment of the lien materially alters the contract, the surety is wholly discharged; 1 Q. B. Div. 669; when the creditor has, by way of compromise, given up a lien of doubtful validity, and applied the money received, as far as it would go, in payment of the principal debt, the creditor must show that an attempt to realize on the property against which the lien existed would have been successful; 67 Ia. 44. But a creditor is not under any obligation to take active steps to obtain a lien by execution. Generally, where a creditor has, by negligence, lost security held by him for the debt or undertaking, the surety is discharged. In some cases he has been held to diligence in realizing on such security; in other cases his inaction has been held not to discharge the surety; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 440.

But a surety is not discharged by the fact that the creditor has released or compounded with his co-surety; much less if his co-surety has been released by process of law. The only effect of such a release or composition is that the surety is then not liable for the proportion which would properly fall on his co-surety; 6 Ves. 605. This at least is the doctrine in equity; although it may be questioned whether it would apply at law where the obligation is joint; 4 Ad. & E. 675.

But if the obligation is joint and several, a surety is not released from his proportion by such discharge of his co-surety; 31 Pa. 460.

The death of a surety on a bond conditioned for the repayment of advances to the principal does not terminate the liability, and his estate is liable for advances made after his death; 34 Fed. Rep. 111.

Rights of surety against principal. Until default, the surety has, in general, no rights against the principal, except the passive right to be discharged from the obligation on the conditions stated before. But after default on the part of the principal, and before the surety is called upon to pay, the latter has a remedy against the further continuance of the obligation, and he cannot in all cases compel the creditor to proceed against the debtor; but the English courts of equity allow him to bring a bill against the debtor, requiring the latter to exonerate him; 2 Bro C. C. 579. So a surety for a debt which the creditor neglects or refuses to enforce by proper proceedings for that purpose, may, by bill in equity, bring both debtor and creditor before the court, and have a decree to compel the debtor to make payment and discharge the surety; 3 E. D. Smith 432; and in courts having full equity powers there can be no doubt of the right of a surety, after a debt has become due, to file a bill to compel the principal debtor to pay, whether the surety has himself been sued or not; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 442; 4 Johns. Ch. 128; 107 Ill. 241; 41 N. J. Eq. 519. Where there is an accrued debt and the surety's liability is admitted, he has a right to compel the principal to relieve him, by paying off his debt. In sustaining such an action he need not prove that the creditor has refused to sue the principal debtor; 31 L. R. Ir. 181.

The surety, after payment of the debt, may recover the amount so paid of the principal, the process varying according to the practice of different courts; 2 Term 104; 4 Me. 200; 1 Pick. 121; 13 Ill. 68. A promise to pay the surety is implied, where there is no express promise; 70 Ala. 326; and assumpsit will lie; 6 M. & W. 153. But before a surety can recover of his principal because of his suretyship, he must have first paid the debt of his principal or some part of it; 41 Neb. 516. But he may pay the debt before it is due, without the request of the principal, and, after it is due, sue the principal; 47 Ind. 85; 125 id. 432.

And such payment refers back to the original undertaking, and overrides all intermediate equities, as of the assignee of a claim against the surety assigned by the principal before payment; 28 Vt. 391.

The payment must not be voluntary, or made in such a manner as to constitute a purchase; for the surety, by purchasing the claim, would take the title of the creditor, and must claim under that. By an involuntary payment is intended only a payment of a claim against which the surety cannot defend. It is not necessary that a suit should be brought. But a surety who pays money on a claim which is absolutely barred has no remedy against the principal; 3 Rand. 490.

A surety, having in his hands funds or securities of the principal, may apply them to the discharge of the debt; 10 Rich. Eq. 557; but where the fund is held by one surety he must share the benefit of it with his co-surety; 3 Jones, Eq. 170; 28 Vt. 65. But a surety who has security for his liability may sue the principal on his implied promise, unless it was agreed that he should look to the security only; 4 Pick. 444. A surety need not account to his co-surety for the simple indebtedness by himself to the principal; 77 N. Y. 280.

Payment of a note by a surety by giving a new note is sufficient payment, even if the new note has not been paid when the suit is commenced; 14 Pick. 286; 3 N. H. 366; contra, where judgment had been rendered against the surety; 3 Md. 47; or by conveyance of land; 9 Cush. 213.

If the surety pays too much by mistake, he can recover only the correct amount of the principal; 1 Dane, Abr. 197. If a surety discharges his obligation for a less sum than its full amount, he can only claim against the principal the actual sum paid; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 526; with interest; 82 Mo. 660; and costs; 12 W. Va. 611.

Extraordinary expenses of the surety, which might have been avoided by payment of the money, or remote and unexpected consequences, are never considered as coming within the contract; 17 Mass. 169; 5 Rawle 106. Costs incurred and paid by the surety in litigating in good faith the claim of the creditor can be recovered of the principal; 30 Vt. 467; 5 Barb. 398; 12 W. Va. 611; but not so if the litigation is in bad faith; 24 Barb. 546; 26 W. Va. 412; or where the surety, being indemnified for his liability, incurred expenses in defending a suit contrary to the expressed wishes of the principal, and after being notified by him that there was no defence to such action; 22 Conn. 299. A surety cannot recover indirect or consequential damages from the principal; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 213; or damages for the sacrifice of his property; 1 Hayw. 130; or for his failure in business due to his incurring the liability in question; 17 Mass. 169.

Joint sureties who pay the debt of the principal may sue jointly for reimbursement; 3 Metc. Mass. 169; 63 Vt. 609; and if each surety has paid a moiety of the debt, they have several rights of action against the principal; 20 N. H. 418.

Bail. "When bail is given, the principal is regarded as delivered to the custody of his sureties. Their dominion is a continuance of the original imprisonment. Whenever they choose to do so, they may seize him and deliver him up in their discharge, and if that cannot be done at once they may imprison him until it can be done. They may exercise their rights in person or by an agent. They may pursue him into another state, arrest him on the Sabbath, and, if necessary, may break and enter his house for that purpose." 16 Wall. 371; 85 Fed. Rep. 959.

Rights of surety against creditor. It is not quite clear whether a surety can enforce any remedies on the part of the creditor before actual payment by the surety; and, of course, as connected with this, what is the effect of a request by the surety to the creditor to proceed against the debtor, and neglect or refusal to comply by the creditor. The objection to discharging the surety on account of such neglect is the fact that the surety may pay the debt and at once become subrogated to all the rights of the creditor; 6 Md. 210. But where there are courts in the exercise of full equity powers, the surety may insure a prompt prosecution either by discharging the obligation and becoming by substitution entitled to all the remedies possessed by the creditor, or he may coerce the creditor to proceed (by an application to a court of equity); 2 Johns. Ch. 554; 3 Sto. 393; though in the latter case he would probably be required to indemnify the creditor against the consequences of risk, delay, and expense; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 442. The same indemnity would in general be required where a request is made; but it has been held that a simple request to sue the principal debtor, without a tender of expenses, or a stipulation to pay them, or an offer to take the obligation and bring suit, is sufficient to discharge the surety, unless the creditor at the time of the notice expressly puts his refusal to sue on the ground of the trouble and expense, and offers to proceed if that objection be removed; 18 Pa. 460. A creditor is not bound to make use of active diligence against a principal debtor on the mere request of a surety; 13 Ill. 376. There must be an express declaration by the surety that he would otherwise hold himself discharged; 29 Ohio St. 668; 90 Pa. 368.

There is a line of cases which hold that if the surety, after the principal debt is due, calls upon the creditor to bring suit against the principal who is then solvent, and the creditor fails to do so, and the principal becomes insolvent, the surety is discharged; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 289; 17 Johns. 386; 8 S. & R. 110; 2 Col. 614. So where the creditor has sufficient mortgage security, and, after request to sue and refusal, the property depreciates in value; 25 N. Y. 552. The request to sue must be clear and distinct; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 240; and must be made after the debt matures; 44 Pa. 105. That such request must be in writing, see 76 Mo. 70. The great majority of cases hold that the surety cannot be discharged by a request to the creditor to sue, etc.; Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 242; 79 Ill. 62; 25 Neb. 448; 2 McLean 451.

In an able opinion in 4 Del. Ch. 258, Bates, Ch., reviews the cases and sustains this view. He points out that the contrary decision in 17 Johns. 386 was made by the casting vote of a lay senator, against the opinion of Kent, C. J., and that, while followed in New York, it has not been favorably regarded even there.

The surety who pays the debt of the principal in full is entitled to have every advantage which the creditor has in pursuing the debtor, and for this purpose may have assignment of the debt, or be subrogated either in law or equity; 39 N. H. 150. Whether the remedy will be by subrogation, or whether the suit must be in the name of the creditor, will depend upon the rules of practice in the different states; 38 Pa. 98. The right of subrogation does not depend upon any contract or request by the principal debtor, but rests upon principles of equity; 1 N. Y. 595; 4 Ga. 343; and, though originating in courts of equity, is now fully recognized as a legal right; 11 Barb. 159. In equity, payment of a debt by a surety does not extinguish it, but operates as an assignment to the surety, with all the creditor's rights; 100 Mo. 250. A surety may apply to the court by motion to compel the assignment of a judgment against him and his principal on his offer to pay the judgment; 77 Hun 580.

A surety of a defaulting government contractor who completes the work may sue to recover a balance due his principal in his own name. 27 Ct. Cls. 185.

Rights of surety against co-surety. The co-sureties are bound to contribute equally to the debt they become liable to pay when their undertaking is joint, or joint and several, not separate and successive; 3 Pet. 470; but the creditor may recover the whole amount of one surety; 1 Dana 355. To support the right of contribution, it is not necessary that the sureties should be bound by the same instrument; 30 Minn. 503; 14 Ves. 160. But where two sureties are bound by separate and distinct agreements for distinct amounts, although for equal portions of the same debt, there is no right of contribution between them; 3 Pet. 470. The right of contribution rests only on the principle of equity, which courts of law will enforce, that where two persons are subject to a common burden it shall be borne equally between them: 66 N. Y. 225; in such cases the law raises an implied promise from the mutual relation of the parties; 3 Allen 566. If contribution would, as between co-sureties, be inequitable, it will not be awarded; 24 Miss. 581. The right of a surety to seek contribution arises on making payment which discharges the sureties from action; 71 Miss. 426. Where a surety pays the debt of his principal, he cannot enforce contribution from one who signed simply as his surety; 62 Conn. 459.

It is not necessary that the co-sureties should know of the agreements of each other, as the principle of contribution rests only on the equality of the burden, and not on any privity; 2 B. & P. 270; 23 Pa. 294; 61 Ala. 440; but a volunteer is not entitled to contribution; there must be a contract of suretyship; 56 Pa. 80. See 22 Am. L. Reg. 529 (a full article).

A surety may compel contribution for the costs and expenses of defending a suit, if the defence were made under such circumstances as to be regarded as prudent; 23 Vt. 581; see 83 N. C. 183; 7 Ill. App. 192; this has been held to include attorney fees; 87 Tenn. 226 (see 68 Tex. 423); whether the attorney employed was successful or not: 45 Mich. 584. And where the suit is defended at the instance or request of the co-surety, costs would be a subject of contribution, both on equitable grounds and on the implied promise; 1 Mood. & M. 406.

A claim for contribution extends to all securities given to one surety; 30 Barb. 403. If one of several sureties takes collaterals from the principal, they will enure to the benefit of all; 3 Dutch. 503. Where one of several sureties is secured by mortgage, he is not bound to enforce his mortgage before he pays the debt or has reason to apprehend that he must pay it, unless the mortgagor is wasting the estate: and if the mortgagor be squandering the mortgaged property, and the surety secured by the mortgage fails to enforce his rights, he is chargeable between himself and his co-sureties with the fair vendible value of the mortgaged property at a coercive sale ; 11 B. Monr. 399. The surety in a suit for contribution can recover only the amount which he has actually paid. Any reduction which he has obtained must be regarded as for the benefit of all the co-sureties ; 12 Gratt. 642. And see 11 B. Monr. 297. But he is not obliged to account for a debt due by him to the principal ; 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 225.

The right of contribution may be controlled by particular circumstances ; thus, where one becomes surety at the request of another, he cannot be called on to contribute by the person at whose request he entered into the security ; 37 N. H. 567.

One of several co-sureties cannot obtain contribution against the others until he has actually paid more than his own share, but he is entitled to a declaration of his right to contribution, and to a prospective order that on paying his own share he shall be indemnified against further liability ; [1893] 2 Ch. 514.

The relation between co-sureties may be shown by parol evidence ; 12 N. Y. 462 ; 43 Ind. 126 ; 62 Ga. 73.

A surety who is fully indemnified by his principal cannot recover contribution from his co-surety for money paid by him, but must indemnify himself out of the means placed in his hands ; 21 Ala. N. S. 779, n. A co-surety has the same responsibility for keeping alive securities in favor of his co-surety, from whom he claims contribution, as a creditor has on behalf of sureties ; 8 J. & Sp. 424. Ordinarily any indemnity, by way of a lien on property, obtained by one surety, after he became such, enures to the benefit of all, and if he lose it by his neglect, it bars contribution. See Brandt, Sur. & Guar. § 271.

The remedy for contribution may be either in equity or at law. The result reached either in law or in equity is the same, with one important exception : in the case of the insolvency of one of the sureties. In such cases the law takes no notice of the insolvency, but awards the paying surety his due proportion as if all were solvent. But equity does not regard the insolvent surety, but awards contribution as if he had never existed ; 68 Tex. 423 ; 7 Dana 307 ; 6 B. & C. 689. One surety cannot by injunction arrest the proceedings at law of his co-surety against him for contribution unless he tenders the principal and interest due such co-surety, who has paid the principal, or alleges that he is ready and willing to bring the same into court to be paid to him as a condition of the court's interference ; 4 Gill 225. Where surety has been compelled to pay the debt of his principal, and one of his co-sureties is out of the jurisdiction of the court, and others are within it, the surety who has paid is at liberty to proceed in a suit in equity for contribution against those co-sureties only who are within the jurisdiction, by stating the fact in his bill, and the defendants will be required to make contribution without regard to the share of the absent co-surety ; 59 Vt. 365 ; 6 Ired. Eq. 115. See, generally, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. *100. A bill in equity will lie, by one surety against a co-surety, before the principal debt is paid, to compel him to contribute. A surety who consents to the creditor's giving time to the principal loses his right of contribution as against one who does not consent ; 8 Yerg. 158. In equity, in proceeding for contribution, it must be shown that the principal was insolvent ; 2 Dana 296 ; but not at law ; 34 Ala. 529 ; 50 Ind. 158 ; contra, 7 Dana 307 ; 99 N. C. 559.

The statute of limitations does not run as against a surety claiming contribution until his own liability is ascertained ; [1893] 2 Ch. 514. It runs against partial payments on the debt, from the time he pays the creditor more than his proportion of the debt ; 77 Wis. 435.

Conflict of laws. The contract of suretyship, like other contracts, is governed by the lex loci contractus ; but the locus is not necessarily the same as that of the principal contract. Thus, the contract made by the indorser of a note is, not to pay the note where it is payable, but that if not paid there he will pay it at the place where the indorsement is made ; 12 Johns. 142 ; 13 Mass. 20. The lex loci applies as well to the interest as to the principal amount. A question has been made in the case of bonds for faithful performance given by public officers ; and in these it has been held that the place of performance is to be regarded as the place of making the contract, and sureties are bound as if they made the contract at the seat of the government to which the bonds are given. And under this rule the obligation of all on the bond is governed by the same law, although the principal and sureties may sign in different states ; 6 Pet. 172. A letter of guaranty written in the United States and addressed to a person in England must be construed according to the laws of England ; 1 How. 161. See BOND ; GUARANTY ; OFFER ; PROMISSORY NOTES.

SURFACE WATERS. Waters of a casual and vagrant character, which ooze through the soil or diffuse or squander themselves over the surface, following no definite course ; 34 Minn. 489. They are waters which, though customarily and naturally flowing in a known direction and course, have nevertheless no banks or channel in the soil ; and include waters which are diffused over the surface of the ground and are derived from rains and melting snows, occasional outbursts of water which in time of freshet or melting of snows descended from the mountains and inundate the country, and the moisture of wet, spongy, springy, or boggy ground. See 44 Ohio St. 282 ; 62 Wis. 114 ; 108 Mass. 221 ; 86 N. Y. 147.

Where water, whether coming from springs or rains or melting snows, has flowed over lands of the complainant, in a well-defined channel, fer a period of time so long that the memory of men runneth not to the contrary, to and upon lands of an adjoining proprietor, the court will, by its mandatory injunction, require such adjoining proprietor to remove any obstruction placed upon his lands to prevent such water from flowing to and over his lands; 48 N. J. Eq. 409. The natural flowage of water from an upper estate to a lower one is a servitude which the owner of the latter must bear, though the flowage be not in a natural water course with well defined banks; 95 Mich. 586. See 97 Mich. 282.

Overflow from a river in time of high water is surface water; 9 Ind. App. 56; but the superabundant waters of a river at times of ordinary floods, spreading beyond its banks, but forming one body and flowing within their accustomed boundaries in such floods, are not surface waters which a riparian owner may turn off as he will; 62 Fed. Rep. 129. In agricultural land the natural flow of water from lands of a higher upon those of a lower level cannot be made the subject of an action of damages; but a different rules applies in towns and cities; 8 W. & S. 40; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 502.

SURGEON. One who applies the principles of the healing art to external diseases or injuries, or to internal injuries or malformations, requiring manual or instrumental intervention. One who practises surgery.

This definition is imperfect, it being impossible to define the term surgeon or surgery. The term surgery, or chirurgery, comes from two Greek words signifying the hand and work, meaning a manual procedure by means of instruments, or otherwise, in the healing of injuries and the cure of disease. The practice of medicine, in contradistinction to the practice of surgery, denotes the treatment of disease by the administration of drugs or other sanative substances. There cannot be a complete separation between the practice of medicine and surgery as they are developed by modern science, and understood by the most learned in the profession of medicine: the principles of both are the same throughout, and no one is qualified to practise either who does not completely understand the fundamental principles of both.

The general principles of law defining the civil responsibilities of physicians and surgeons are the same as those that apply to and govern the conduct of lawyers, shipbuilders, and other classes of men whose employment requires them to transact business demanding special skill and knowledge; 27 N. H. 468; Whart. & Stille, Med. Jur. 750. The surgeon does not warrant or insure as to the result, ordinarily; 7 C. & P. 81. The surgeon or physician may bind himself by an express contract to cure; 27 N. H. 468; 2 Ld. Raym. 909.

Every person who enters into a learned profession undertakes to bring to the exercise of it a reasonable, fair, and competent degree of skill; 8 C. & P. 475. This degree of skill is what is usually termed ordinary and reasonable; Story, Bailm. 433. In addition to the application of ordinary skill in the treatment of disease and injuries, the physician and surgeon undertake to give to their cases ordinary care and diligence, and the exercise of their best judgment; McClel. Malp. 18, 32; 5 B. & Ald. 820; 15 Greenl. 97. See PHYSICIAN.

SURMISE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An allegation in a libel. Phill. Ecc. Law 1445. Formerly where a defendant pleaded a local custom it was necessary for him to surmise, that is to suggest, that such custom should be certified to the court by the mouth of the reporter. Without such a surmise the issue was to be tried by the country as other issues of fact. 1 Burr. 251.

SURNAME. A name which is added to the Christian name. In modern times these have become family names. They are called surnames, because originally they were written over the name in judicial writings and contracts. See NAME.

SURPLUS. That which is left from a fund which has been appropriated for a particular purpose; the remainder of a thing; the overplus; the residue. See 18 Ves. 466. It has an appropriate application to personal property or money, but, when used in a will, may include real estate; 86 N. Y. 210; 131 id. 227. See SAVINGS BANKS; RESERVE.

SURPLUSAGE. In Accounts. A greater disbursement than the charges amount to. A balance over. 1 Lew. 219.

In Pleading. Allegations of matter wholly foreign and impertinent to the cause. All matter beyond the circumstances necessary to constitute the action is surplusage; 5 East 275; 2 Johns. Cas. 52; 16 Tex. 656. Generally, matter of surplusage will be rejected and will not be allowed to vitiate the pleading; Co. Litt. 303 b; 2 Saund. 306, n. 14; 7 Johns. 462; 1 Root 456; 21 N. H. 535; as new and needless matter stated in an innuendo; 7 Johns. 272; even if repugnant to what precedes; 10 East 142; but if it shows that the plaintiff has no cause of action, demurrer will lie; 2 East 451; 2 W. Bla. 842; 3 Cra. 193. Where the whole of an allegation is immaterial to the plaintiff's right of action, it may be struck out as surplusage; 1 Mas. 57. Matter laid under a videlicet, inconsistent with what precedes, may be rejected as surplusage; 4 Johns. 450; and when the unnecessary matter is so connected with what is material that it cannot be separated, the whole matter may be included in the traverse; Dy. 365; 2 Saund. 206 a, n. 21; and the whole must be proved as laid; 1 Ohio 488; Steph. Plead. 422.

SURPRISE. In Equity Practice. The act by which a party who is entering into a contract is taken unawares, by which sudden confusion or perplexity is created, which renders it proper that a court of equity should relieve the party so surprised. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 120, n.

The situation in which a party is placed without any default of his own, which will be injurious to his interests. 8 Mart. La. N. S. 407.

Mr. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 366, 383, note, seems to think that the word surprise is a technical expression, and nearly synonymous with fraud. It is sometimes used in this sense when it is deemed presumptive of, or approaching to, fraud. 1 Fonbl. Eq. 123; 3 Ch. Cas. 56, 74, 103, 114.

In Law. The general rule is that when a party or his counsel is taken by surprise, in a material point or circumstance which could not have been anticipated, and when want of skill, care, or attention cannot be justly imputed, and injustice has been done, a new trial should be granted; Hill, New Tri. 521. Surprise may be good ground for a new trial in criminal as in civil cases; 10 E. L. & E. 105; but in neither case is surprise arising after verdict sufficient to warrant an application to the discretion of the court; 2 Parker 673. Nor will a new trial be granted where the ground of the surprise is evidence which was clearly within the issues presented by the pleadings; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 343; or unless one made application for a postponement of the trial in order that he might repair the injury done him by the unexpected testimony; 57 Ark. 60. See NEW TRIAL; PLEADING.

SURREBUTTER. In Pleading. The plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rebutter. It is governed by the same rules as the replication. See 6 Com. Dig. 185; 7 id. 389.

SURREJOINDER. In Pleading. The plaintiff's answer to the defendant's rejoinder. It is governed in every respect by the same rules as the replication. Steph. Pl. 77; 7 Com. Dig. 389. See PLEADING.

SURRENDER. A yielding up of an estate for life or years to him who has an immediate estate in reversion or remainder, by which the lesser estate is merged in the greater by mutual agreement. Co. Litt. 337 b. See 90 Cal. 507.

The deed by which the surrender is made.

A surrender is of a nature directly opposite to a release; for, as the latter operates by the greater estate descending upon the less, the former is the falling of a less estate into a greater, by deed. A surrender immediately divests the estate of the surrenderor, and vests it in the surrenderee, even without the assent of the latter; Shepp. Touchst. 300.

The technical and proper words of this conveyance are, surrender and yield up; but any form of words by which the intention of the parties are sufficiently manifested will operate as a surrender; 1 Term 441; Com. Dig. Surrender (A).

The surrender may be express or implied. The latter is when an estate incompatible with the existing estate is accepted, or the lessee takes a new lease of the same lands; 16 Johns. 28; 1 B. & Ald. 50. See 94 U. S. 389; 52 Ia. 347; LANDLORD AND TENANT.

To yield; render up. 48 Minn. 13.

SURRENDER OF A PREFERENCE. The surrender by a preferred creditor, to the assignee in bankruptcy, of all that he has received under such preference, as a necessary step, under the bankrupt law, to obtaining a dividend of the estate. 1 Dill. 544.

SURRENDER OF CRIMINALS. The act by which the public authorities deliver a person accused of a crime, and who is found in their jurisdiction, to the authorities within whose jurisdiction it is alleged the crime has been committed. In England the crown has the option of either surrendering or refusing to surrender a British subject accused of an extradition offence in a foreign country; [1896] 1 Q. B. 280. See EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

SURRENDER TO USES OF WILL. Formerly a copyhold interest would not pass by will unless it had been surrendered to the use of the will. By 55 Geo. III. this is no longer necessary; 1 Steph. Com. 689.

SURRENDEREE. One to whom a surrender has been made.

SURRENDEROR. One who makes a surrender; as, when the tenant gives up the estate and cancels his lease before the expiration of the term. One who yields up a freehold estate for the purpose of conveying it.

SURROGATE (Lat. surrogatus, from subrogare, or surrogare, to substitute). In English Law. A deputy or substitute of the chancellor, bishop, ecclesiastical or admiralty judge, appointed by him. He can grant licenses, hold courts, and adjudicate cases, to the same extent and with the same authority as his principal, provided his grant of powers has been coextensive with those possessed by his principal. The office has arisen by usage, but is sanctioned by canon 128, and recognized by statute.

In American Law. A term used in some states to denote the judge to whom jurisdiction of the probate of wills, the grant of administration and of guardianship is confided. In some states he is called surrogate, in others, judge of probate, register, judge of the orphans' court, etc. He is ordinarily a county officer, with a local jurisdiction limited to his county.

SURROGATE'S COURT. In the United States, a state tribunal, with similar jurisdiction to the court of ordinary, court of probate, etc., relating to matters of probate, etc. See 2 Kent 409; NEW YORK.

SURVEY. The act by which the quantity of a piece of land is ascertained; the paper containing a statement of the courses, distances, and quantity of land is also called a survey.

A survey made by authority of law, and duly returned into the land office, is a matter of record, and of equal dignity with the patent; 8 A. K. Marsh. 226. See 3 Me. 126; 14 Mass. 149; 1 Harr. & J. 201; 39 Fed. Rep. 66; 1 Dev. & B. 76; and is not open to any collateral attack in the courts; 158 U. S. 253. Where a survey was made in good faith and has been unchallenged for over fifteen years, whatever doubts may exist as to its correctness must be resolved in favor of the title as patented; 133 U. S. 193.

In construing maps of official surveys, courts give effect to the meaning expressed by their outlines, as well as by their language; 114 Mo. 13.

By survey is also understood an examination; and in this sense it is constantly employed in insurance and in admiralty law.

SURVEY OF A VESSEL. A public document looked to both by underwriters and owners as affording the means of ascertaining at the time and place the state and condition of the ship and other property at hazard.

SURVEYOR OF THE PORT. A revenue officer appointed for each of the principal points of entry, whose duties chiefly concern the importations at his station and the determination of their amount and valuation. U. S. R. S. § 2627.

SURVIVOR. The longest liver of two or more persons.

There is no presumption as to survivorship in England; 8 H. L. C. 183; see [1892] P. 142; or Scotland; Ersk. III. 8. 1; a child, who, when last heard of six years before, had consumption, is presumed to have died before his father; 95 Ia. 611. See DEATH.

In cases of partnership, the surviving partner is entitled to have all the effects of the partnership, and is bound to pay all the debts owing by the firm; Gow, Partn. 157. He is, however, bound to account for the surplus to the representatives of his deceased partners, agreeably to their respective rights. See PARTNERSHIP.

A surviving trustee is generally vested with all the powers of all the trustees, and the surviving administrator is authorized to act for the estate as if he had been sole administrator.

The right of survivorship among joint-tenants has been abolished, except as to estates held in trust in many states. For the statutes and the present condition of the law in the United States, see Demb. Land Tit. 27. See ESTATES OF JOINT-TENANCY. In Connecticut it never existed; 1 Swift, Dig. 102; Washb. R. P.; nor has it ever been recognized in Ohio, Kansas, Nebraska, or Idaho; Demb. Land Tit. 198. As to survivorship among legatees, see 1 Turn & R. 413; 3 Russ. 217.

SUS' PER COLL'. In English Law. In the English practice, a calendar is made out of attainted criminals, and the judge signs the calendar with their separate judgments in the margin. In the case of a capital felony it is written opposite the prisoner's name, "let him be hanged by the neck," which, when the proceedings were in Latin, was "suspendatur per collum," or, in the abbreviated form, "sus' per coll'." 4 Bla. Com. 403.

SUSPENDER. In Scotch Law. He in whose favor a suspension is made. In general, a suspender is required to give caution to pay the debt in the event it shall be found due. Where the suspender cannot, from his circumstances, procure unquestionable security, the lords admit juratory caution; but the reasons of suspension are in that case to be considered with particular accuracy at passing the bill. Ersk. Inst. 4. 3. 6.

SUSPENSE. When a rent, profit à prendre, and the like, are, in consequence of the unity of possession of the rent, etc., of the land out of which they issue, not in esse for a time, they are said to be in suspense, tunc dormiunt; but they may be revived or awakened. Co. Litt. 313 a.

SUSPENSION. A temporary stop of a right, of a law, and the like.

In times of war the right of habeas corpus may be suspended by lawful authority.

There may be a suspension of an officer's duties or powers when he is charged with crimes; Wood, Inst. 510. As to an attorney or solicitor, see DISBAR. The Stock Exchange and many corporations provide for the suspension as well as expulsion of members under certain circumstance; 47 Wisc. 670; 2 Brews. 571. See Dos Passos, St. Brok.; EXPULSION; AMOTION; STOCK EXCHANGE.

Suspension of a right in an estate is a partial extinguishment, or an extinguishment for a time. It differs from an extinguishment in this: a suspended right may be revived; one extinguished is absolutely dead; Bac. Abr. Extinguishment (A).

The suspension of a statute for a limited time operates so as to prevent its operation for the time; but it has not the effect of a repeal; 3 Dall. 365. For plea in suspension, see PLEA; ABATEMENT. Pleas in suspension are not specifically abolished in England by the Judicature Acts, though Ord. xix. rule 13, directs that no plea or defence shall be pleaded in abatement. Mos. & W.

In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical censure, by which a spiritual person is either interdicted the exercise of his ecclesiastical function or hindered from receiving the profits of his benefice. It may be partial or total; for a limited time, or forever, when it is called deprivation or amotion. Ayliffe, Parerg. 501.

SUSPENSION, PLEAS IN. See PLEAS; SUSPENSION.

SUSPENSION OF A RIGHT. The act by which a party is deprived of the exercise of his right for a time.

When a right is suspended by operation of law, the right is revived the moment the bar is removed; but when the right is suspended by the act of the party, it is gone forever. See 1 Rolle, Abr. Extinguishment (L, M).

SUSPENSION OF ARMS. An agreement between belligerents, made for a short time or for a particular place, to cease hostilities between them. See ARMISTICE; TRUCE.

SUSPENSIVE CONDITION. One which prevents a contract from going into operation until it has been fulfilled.

SUSPENSORY CONDITIONS. Conditions precedent in a contract which merely suspend the operation of a promise till they are fulfilled. They differ from those conditions precedent the non-fulfilment of which works a breach of the contract. Tiff. Sales 153. See 171 U. S. 312.

SUSPICION. The act of suspecting, or the state of being suspected; imagination, generally of something ill; distrust, mistrust, doubt. 66 Ga. 348.

SUTLER. A man whose employment is to sell provisions and liquor to a camp.

By the articles of war no sutler is permitted to sell any kind of liquor or victuals, or to keep his house or shop open for the entertainment of soldiers, after nine at night, or before the beating of the reveille, or upon Sundays during divine service or sermon, on penalty of being dismissed all future sutling; all sutlers are subject to orders according to the rules and discipline of war.

SUUS HÆRES. See HÆRES.

SUZERAIN (Norman Fr. suz, under, and re or rey, king). A lord who possesses a fief whence other fiefs issue. A tenant in capite or immediately under the king. Note 77 of Butler & Hargrave's notes, Co. Litt. l. 3.

In International Law. The word has no clear or precise signification. It has been extended to the Mussulman world, and to the control of European Powers through their colonies over imperfectly civilized people; 12 L. Quart Rev. 223; [1896] P. 122.

SWAIN-GEMOTE. See COURT OF SWEINMOTE.

SWEAR. To take an oath administered by some officer duly empowered.

One may swear who is not duly sworn; and in such case the oath is not administered, but self-imposed, and the swearer incurs no legal liability thereabout; 33 Fed. Rep. 168. See JURY; OATH.

To use such profane language as is forbidden by law. This is generally punished by statutory provisions in the several states. See 7 Lea 410; 85 N. C. 528. See BLASPHEMY.

SWEDEN. A country of northern Europe. The government is a limited monarchy, hereditary in the male line. The king is the sole executive, but he is required to consult with the council of state.

The legislative power is vested in a legislature called the Diet, divided into an upper and lower chamber. The members in the former are elected every nine years and their numbers are apportioned to the population. The latter are elected for three years. It represents towns and rural districts by apportionment based on population. The Diet assembles every year. The king has a veto power. There are a supreme court, three royal courts of justice, a court of military justice, an admiralty court, and a minor judiciary. The king is required to be a member of the Lutheran church.

SWEEPSTAKES. The sum of the stakes for which the subscribers agree to pay for each horse nominated. 61 Fed. Rep. 889. A free handicap sweepstake is not a stake race; id. See HORSE-RACE.

SWINDLER. A cheat; one guilty of defrauding divers persons. 1 Term 748.

Swindling is usually applied to a transaction where the guilty party procures the delivery to him, under a pretended contract, of the personal property of another, with the felonious design of appropriating it to his own use; 2 Russ. Cr. 130; 2 Mass. 406; as where a purchaser tendered a twenty-dollar gold-piece in payment for goods, supposing it was a silver dollar and the seller knowing his mistake returned him change for a dollar, the offence was held to be swindling; 25 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 318.

The terms cheat and swindler are not actionable unless spoken of the plaintiff in relation to his business; Odg. Lib. & Sl. 61; 6 Cush. 185; 10 How. Pr. 128. The words "you are living by imposture," spoken of a person with the intention of imputing that he is a swindler, are not actionable per se; 8 C. B. 142. See LIBEL.

SWITZERLAND. A republic of Europe. The legislative and executive functions are vested in a federal assembly of two chambers, a state council of forty-four members chosen by the cantons, two for each, and the national council of one hundred and forty-seven deputies chosen by representation for three years. The chief executive authority is deputed to a federal council of seven members chosen by the federal assembly. The president and vice-president of the federal council, who are elected for the term of one year, are the first magistrates of the republic.

The Bundesgericht consists of nine members elected for six years by the federal assembly; it adjudicates in the last instance all points in dispute between the federal governments and the individual cantons, and is a high court of appeal. It is divided into a civil and criminal court.

SWORN BROTHERS. In Old English Law. Persons who, by mutual oaths, covenanted to share in each other's fortunes.

The head note of a reported case is a thing upon which much skill and thought is required to express in clear, concise language the principle of law to be deduced, or the decision to which it is prefixed, or the facts and circumstances which bring the case in hand within the same principle or rule of law or of practice. 17 C. B. 459. See COPYRIGHT; INFRINGEMENT; PARAGRAPH.

SYLVA CÆVUA. In Ecclesiastical Law. Wood of any kind which was kept on purpose to be cut, and which being cut grew again from the stem or root. 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. L. 90.

Where an actual delivery of goods cannot be made, a symbolical delivery of some particular thing, as standing for the whole, will vest the property equally with an actual delivery; 1 Pet. 445; 8 How. 399; 6 Md. 10; 19 N. H. 419; 39 Me. 496; 11 Cush. 282; 3 Cal. 140. See 1 Sm. L. C. 33.

SYNDICATE. A university committee. A combination of persons or firms united for the purpose of enterprises too large for individuals to undertake; or a group of financiers who buy up the shares of a company in order to sell them at a profit by creating a scarcity. Moz. & W.

SYNGRAPH (Gr. σύν, with, γράφω, to write). A deed, bond, or other instrument of writing, under the hand and seal of all the parties. It was so called because the parties wrote together.

Formerly such writings were attested by the subscription and crosses of the witnesses; afterwards, to prevent frauds and concealments, they made deeds of mutual covenant in a script and rescript, or in a part and counterpart, and in the middle between the two copies they wrote the word syngraphus in large letters, which, being cut through the parchment and one being delivered to each party, on being afterwards put together proved their authenticity.

Deeds thus made were denominated syngraphs by the canonists, and by the common-lawyers chirographs. 2 Bla. Com. 296.

SYNOD. An ecclesiastical assembly, which may be general, national, provincial, or diocesan.

TABELLA (Lat.). In Civil Law. A small table on which votes were often written. Cicero, in Rull. 2. 2. Three tables were given to the judges, one with the letter A for Absolutio, one with C for Condemnatio, and one with N. L. for Non Liquet, not proven. Calvinus, Lex.

TABELLIO. In Roman Law. An officer among the Romans, who reduced to writing, and into proper form, agreements, contracts, wills, and other instruments, and witnessed their execution.

The term tabellio is derived from the Latin tabula, seu tabella, which, in this sense, signified those tables or plates covered with wax which were then used instead of paper. 8 Toullier, n. 53.

Tabelliones differed from notaries in many respects: they had judicial jurisdiction in some cases, and from their judgments there were no appeals. Notaries were then the clerks or aiders of the tabelliones; they received the agreements of the parties, which they reduced to short notes; and these contracts were not binding until they were written in extenso, which was done by the tabelliones. Jacob, Law Dict. Tabellion.

TABLE-RENTS. Rents paid to bishops and other ecclesiastics, appropriated to their table or housekeeping. Jacob.

TABLEAU OF DISTRIBUTION. In Louisiana. A list of creditors of an insolvent estate, stating what each is entitled to. 4 Mart. La. N. S. 535.

Ch. 573; Beach, Eq. Jur. 383; TACKING.

TABULÆ. In Civil Law. Contracts and written instruments of all kinds, especially wills. So called because originally written on tablets and with wax. Calvinus.

TACIT TACK. See TACIT RELOCATION.

TACITURNITY. In Scotland this signifies laches in not prosecuting a legal claim, or in acquiescing in an adverse one. Moz. & W.

TACK. In Scotch Law. A contract of location by which the use of land or any other immovable subject is set to the lessee or tacksman for a certain yearly rent, either in money, the fruits of the ground, or services. Ersk. Inst. 2. 6. 8. This word is nearly synonymous with lease.

TACKING. In English Law. The union of securities given at different times, so as to prevent any intermediate purchaser's claiming title to redeem or otherwise discharge one lien which is prior, without redeeming or discharging other liens also which are subsequent, to his own title. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 188–191; 1 Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 412.

It is an established doctrine in the English chancery that a bona fide purchaser without any notice of a defect in his title at the time of the purchase may lawfully buy any statute, mortgage, or incumbrance, and if he can defend by those at law his adversary shall have no help in equity to set those incumbrances aside, for equity will not disarm such a purchaser. And as mortgagees are considered in equity as purchasers pro tanto, the same doctrine has extended to them, and a mortgagee who has advanced his money without notice of any prior incumbrance may, by getting an assignment of a statute, judgment, or recognizance, protect himself from any incumbrance subsequent to such statute, judgment, or recognizance, though prior to his mortgage; that is, he will be allowed to tack or unite his mortgage to such old security, and will by that means be entitled to recover all moneys for which such security was given, together with the money due on his mortgage, before the prior mortgagees are entitled to recover anything; 2 Cruise, Dig. t. 15, c. 5, s. 27; 1 Vern. 188. The source and origin of the English doctrine is the case of Marsh v. Lee, 2 Ventr. 337; 1 Ch. Cas. 162; 1 Wh. & T. L. C. Eq. 611, notes. This case and the doctrine founded upon it has been the subject of severe criticism; Langd. Eq. Pl. 191. Lord Ch. J. Holt is said to have been one of the first to benefit by the right of tacking; see Holt v. Mill, 2 Vern. 279.

Tacking was abolished by sec. 7 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, stat. 37 & 38 Vict. c. 78, but that section is repealed by sec. 129 of the Land Title and Transfer Act of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87; Moz. & W. See 1 Pingr. Mortg. § 477.

In England a mortgagee who holds several distinct mortgages under the same mortgagor, redeemable, not by express contract, but only by virtue of the equity of redemption, may, within certain limits and against certain persons, consolidate them, that is, treat them as one, and decline to be redeemed as to any, unless he is redeemed as to all; 6 App. Cas. 698. See Brett's L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 216. It is there termed consolidation of mortgages, and the principle is laid down that the courts lean against any extension of the doctrine; 6 App. Cas. 698, which is cited as the leading case, and as practically overruling L. R. 4 Eq. 537, which was overruled in 14 Ch. D. 699.

The high-water mark of the doctrine is said to be at the present day represented by Vint v. Padget, where it was held that if mortgages of different lands to secure different debts are made to, or come into the hands of, the same person, the mortgagee cannot redeem either without redeeming both, or he may enforce the payment of the amount of both debts out of the land covered by either; and this is true though he bought the mortgages with notice of an outstanding second mortgage; 2 De G. & J. 611. This case is said to have been cited but not approved in [1896] App. Cas. 187, affirming [1895] 1 Ch. 51, which affirmed [1894] 2 Ch. 328, where it was held that when the owner of different properties mortgages them to different persons, and the mortgages afterward become united under one title, the holder of the mortgages has a right to refuse to be redeemed as to one without payment of all, not only as against the mortgagor, but also as against a person in whom the equities of redemption of all the properties have been vested by one deed, whether from the mortgagor or mesne assignee, although the assignment is made before the mortgages become united in title.

This doctrine is inconsistent with the laws of the several states, which require the recording of mortgages; and does not exist to any extent in the United States; 1 Caines, Cas. 112; 2 Pick. 517; 12 Conn. 195; 14 Ohio 318; 11 S. & R. 208; Walk. Mich. 175; 37 Vt. 375; 1 Johns. Ch. 399; Bisph. Eq. § 159. A rule apparently analogous may, however, be found in those cases where a mortgage is given to secure future advances, and where the mortgagee is allowed to recover sums subsequently advanced, as against a mesne mortgage; Bisph. Eq. § 159, where the cases are collected; but the future advances to be protected must be without notice of the intervening incumbrance; id.; 7 Cra. 45; 5 Johns. Ch. 320; unless the advances are made under a binding agreement; 7 Conn. 387; 24 Pa. 372; 21 N. J. Eq. 87; and the recording of the latter is a sufficient notice; 17 Ohio 371; 7 Cra. 45.

To tack different adverse possessions to make up the period of bar, the persons holding such possessions must be connected by priority of title or claim; 36 W. Va. 445; and where several persons enter upon land in succession, the several possessions cannot be tacked together so as to make a continuity of possession under the law of adverse title, unless there is priority of estate, or the several titles are connected; 24 Or. 239.

TAIL. See ESTATE TAIL.

TAILAGE. See TALLAGE.

TAILZIE. A term chiefly used in the case of a land estate, which is settled on a long series of heirs substituted one after another; whereas heirs pointed out in contracts of marriage, or in bonds containing clauses of substitution, are more commonly called heirs of provision. Ersk. Prin. III. 8. 8.

TAINT. A conviction of felony, or, the person so convicted. Cowel. See ATTAINT.

TAKE. A technical expression which signifies to be entitled to: as, a devisee will take under the will.

To seize: as, to take and carry away, either lawfully or unlawfully.

In an indictment for larceny, a charge that defendant did feloniously take implies a trespass; 47 Minn. 449. Under a statute making it an offence to take up and use a horse without the consent of the owner, the taking a horse bridled, saddled, and hitched to a tree will not constitute the offence. 7 Tex. Cr. Rep. 115.

The word may be synonymous with arrest; 9 Gray 267; but take and steal were held not to be synonymous; 12 Conn. 229. It has been held equivalent to require. 29 Ala. 542. A devisee takes under a will only when the possession and control of the devisor has ceased. 41 N. J. L. 70. In its usual signification the word taken implies a transfer of dominion, possession, or control. Id.

To choose: e. g. ad capiendas assisas, to choose a jury.

To obtain: e. g. to take a verdict in court, to get a verdict.

TAKE UP. An indorser or acceptor is said to take up, or retire, a bill when he discharges the liability upon it. In such a case, the indorser would hold the instrument with all his remedies intact: while the acceptor would extinguish all the remedies on it. One who accepts a lease is also said to take it up.

TAKING. The act of laying hold upon an article, with or without removing the same. See LARCENY; ROBBERY.

It implies a transfer of possession, dominion, or control. A thing is not taken unless such a change of status is effected. In trespass, trover, or replevin the taking is not accomplished until the goods are within the power or control of the defendant. See CONVERSION; TRESPASS; TROVER; REPLEVIN.

See EMINENT DOMAIN.

TALE. In English Law. The ancient name of the declaration or count. 3 Bla. Com. 293.

TALES DE CIRCUMSTANTIBUS (Lat. a like number of the bystanders)

A sufficient number of jurors selected from the bystanders to supply a deficiency in the panel.

The order of the judge for taking such bystanders as jurors.

Whenever from any cause the panel of jurors is insufficient, the judge may issue the above order, and the officer immediately executes it; see 2 Hill S. C. 381; Coxe N. J. 283; 1 Blackf. 65. See JURY.

TALITER PROCESSUM EST. "So it has proceeded;" words formerly used in pleading, by which a defendant, in justifying his conduct by the process of an inferior court, alleged the proceedings in such inferior court. Steph. Pl., 5th ed. p. 369; Moz. & W.

TALLAGE, or TALLIAGE (Fr. tailler, to cut). In English Law. A term used to denote subsidies, taxes, customs, and, indeed, any imposition whatever by the government for the purpose of raising a revenue. Bacon, Abr. Smuggling, etc. (B); Fort. De Laud. 26; Madd. Exch. c. 17; Co. 2d Inst. 531.

TALLAGIUM (perhaps from Fr. taille, cut off). A term including all taxes. Co. 2d Inst. 532; Stat. de tal. non concedendo, temp. Edw. I.; Stow, Annals 445; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 311*. Chaucer has talaigiers for "tax-gatherers."

TALLY (Fr. tailler; It. tagliare, i. e. scindere, to cut off). A stick cut into two parts on each whereof is marked, with notches or otherwise, what is due between debtor and creditor. Hence the tallier of the exchequer is now called the teller. Lex. Constit. 205; Cowel. One party must have one part, and the other the other, and they must match. Tallies in the exchequer were abolished by 23 Geo. III. c. 82, and were ordered to be destroyed in 1834. They were thereupon used in such quantities to heat the stoves in the house of lords that it is supposed they were the cause of the fire which destroyed both houses of parliament.

There was the same usage in France. Dict. de l'Acad. Franc.; Pothier, Obl. pt. 4, c. 1, art. 2, § 8; 2 Reeves, c. 11, p. 253.

TALMUD. A work which embodies the civil and canonical law of the Jewish people. A new edition of this work is now (1898) in course of publication in English, in which the original text is edited, formulated, and punctuated by Rodkinson.

TALZIE. See TAILZIE.

TAME. Domesticated; reclaimed from a natural state of wildness. See ANIMAL.

TANGIBLE PROPERTY. That which may be felt or touched: it must necessarily be corporeal, but it may be real or personal.

TANISTRY (a thanis). In Irish Law. A species of tenure founded on immemorial usage, by which lands, etc., descended, seniori et dignissimo viro sanguinis et cognominis, i. e. to the oldest and worthiest man of the blood and name. Jacob, Law Dict.

TANTEO. In Spanish Law. Pre-emption. White, N. Recop. b. 2, t. 2, c. 3.

TANTO. In Mexican Law. The right enjoyed by an usufructuary of the property, of buying property at the same price at which the owner offers it to any other person, or is willing to take from another. Civil Code, Mex. art. 992.

TARDE VENIT (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a return made by the sheriff to a writ, when it came into his hands too late to be executed before the return day.

The sheriff is required to show that he has yielded obedience to the writ, or give a good excuse for his omission; and he may say, quod breve adeo tarde venit quod exequi non potuit. It is usual to return the writ with an indorsement of tarde venit. Com. Dig. Return (D 1).

TARIFF. Customs, duties, toll, or tribute payable upon merchandise to the general government is called tariff; the rate of customs, etc., also bears this name, and the list of articles liable to duties is also called the tariff. As to the meaning of terms, see 79 Fed. Rep. 313. See also COURT OF APPRAISERS OF THE UNITED STATES; RECIPROCITY; TAX.

As to the present act and when it went into effect, see STATUTE.

TAVERN. A place of entertainment; a house kept up for the accommodation of strangers. Webster. Originally, a house for the retailing of liquors to be drunk on the spot. Webster. A house licensed to sell liquors in small quantities. 11 Ore. 288.

In almost all the states the word has come to mean the same as inn, with no particular reference to the sale of liquors. See 2 Kent 597*, note a; 84 Ala. 451. Tavern has been held to include "hotel"; 46 Mo. 598; contra, 7 Ga. 296.

For the liability of tavern-keepers, see Story, Bailm. § 7. See Wandell, Inns 91; INN.

TAX. A pecuniary burden imposed for the support of the government. 17 Wall. 322. The enforced proportional contribution of persons and property, levied by the authority of the state for the support of government, and for all public needs. 58 Me. 591; Cooley, Tax. 1. Burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power of a state upon persons or property, to raise money for public purposes. 20 Cal. 318. A sum or rate imposed by governmental authority for a public object or purpose. 150 Pa. 118; 107 Mo. 464. A tax is a demand of sovereignty; a toll is a demand of proprietorship; 15 Wall. 278. Taxes are not "debts"; 20 Cal. 318; 23 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 799; 34 S. C. 541; nor do they embrace local assessments; 92 Ky. 89; 60 Conn. 112; 2 Wash. 667; nor are fees required by a statute for filing articles of incorporation a tax; 49 Ohio St. 504.

Taxes differ from subsidies, in being certain and orderly, and from forced contributions, etc., in that they are levied by authority of law, and by some rule of proportion which is intended to insure uniformity of contribution, and a just apportionment of the burdens of government; Cooley, Tax. 2. See 51 Pa. 9. No matter how equitable a tax may be, it is void unless legally assessed; 3 Cush. 567; and, on the other hand, the injustice of a particular tax cannot defeat it when it is demanded under general rules prescribed by the legislature for the general good; Cooley, Tax. 3.

Taxes are classified as direct, which includes "those which are assessed upon the property, person, business, income, etc., of those who pay them; and indirect, or those which are levied on commodities before they reach the consumer, and are paid by those upon whom they ultimately fall, not as taxes, but as part of the market price of the commodity." Cooley, Tax. 61. The latter includes duties upon imports and stamp duties levied upon manufactures; ibid. The term "direct taxes" in the federal constitution is used in a peculiar sense, and such taxes are perhaps limited to capitation and land taxes; 3 Dall. 171; 7 Wall. 433; 8 id. 533.

Direct taxes within the meaning of the constitution are only capitation taxes and taxes on real estate; 102 U. S. 586.

It was suggested by Oliver Ellsworth and Roger Sherman in a letter to the governor of Connecticut, and afterwards by Madison, that a state might collect and pay its quota of any federal direct tax and so prevent a federal collection. The same view appears as a dictum in the opinion of the supreme court of the United States by Fuller, C. J., in the Income Tax Case. See 34 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 733.

By a majority of one, after a re-argument, it was held that the income tax law of 1894 was a direct tax and unconstitutional. The first decision left the constitutional question in doubt, the court being equally divided; 157 U. S. 429. On re-argument before a full court the decision was by a majority of one only. The points settled by the opinion of the court were, substantially, these: Direct taxes must be apportioned among the several states in accordance with numbers. Taxes on real estate are direct taxes, and taxes on the rent or income of real estate are the same. Taxes on personal property or on the income of personal property are likewise direct taxes. The act of 1894, so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property, is a direct tax on the property and therefore void, because not apportioned according to representation; 158 U. S. 601.

States may tax circulating notes of national banks and United States legal tender notes and other notes used as currency; gold, silver, or other coin are subject to taxation as money; U. S. R. S. § 3836. See 4 Wheat. 316; 9 id. 739; 2 Black. 620; 2 Wall. 200; 6 id. 594; 7 id. 16; the provisions of this act do not change existing laws.

Where an act directs a corporation to retain a percentage of interest due on its indebtedness and to pay it to the state, it is a tax on the bondholder; 134 U. S. 232; an act which directs employers of aliens to retain a certain sum from their daily wages and pay it to the state is a tax on the alien and void; 82 Fed. Rep. 257.

The state may undoubtedly require the payment of taxes in kind, that is, in products, or in gold or silver bullion, etc.; Cooley, Tax. 12 See 20 Cal. 318; 7 Wall. 71.

Legacy and inheritance taxes are constitutional, and are not arbitrary; they are not prohibited by the equal protection of the laws given by the federal constitution; they are taxes not on property, but on the succession, which is not a natural right but a privilege, and may be conferred subject to conditions; 170 U. S. 283. But an act taxing only estates over $20,000 was held unequal and therefore void; 53 Ohio St. 314. See an article by Luther E. Hewitt in 34 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 179.

The power to tax is vested entirely in the legislative department. No matter how oppressive taxation may be, the judiciary cannot interfere on that account; 8 Wall. 533; 18 id. 206; 47 Miss. 367. See 83 Ala. 608. It can only check excess of authority. The right to lay taxes cannot be delegated by the legislature to any other department of the government; 53 Mo. 133; 47 Cal. 456; 4 Bush 464; except that municipal corporations may be authorized to levy local taxes; Cooley, Tax. 62; 49 Mo. 559, 574; 73 Pa. 448.

The constitutional guaranty which declares that no person shall be deprived of property, etc., except by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land does not necessarily apply to the collection of taxes; 23 Ga. 566; Cooley, Tax. 37; Miller, Const. 105; taxes have been said to be recoverable, not only without a jury, but without a judge; 6 T. B. Monr. 641. Though differing from procedure in courts of justice, the general system of procedure for the levy and collection of taxes established in this country is due process of law; 104 U. S. 78; 96 id. 97.

Taxes become a lien on property only by statute; 55 N. J. L. 58; 18 Fed. Rep. 344; 19 Wall. 659. There are many taxes which may be levied without notice to the taxpayer; 111 U. S. 701.

A sovereign power has the unlimited power to tax all persons or property within its jurisdiction; 20 Wall. 46; 66 N. C. 361. But its power is limited to such as is within its jurisdiction; 153 U. S. 628; but when a person is resident within a state, his personal property may be taxed wherever it is; 16 Pick. 572; 3 Ore. 13; personal property may be separated from its owner and he may be taxed on its account, at the place where it is, although not the place of his own domicil; 141 U. S. 18; and the stock of a foreign corporation may be taxed to the resident owner, 82 N. C. 480; a franchise tax on a foreign corporation covering all contracts made in a state, does not apply to a contract of a corporation signed by its local agent and by the other party within the state and stipulating that the contract is not valid unless countersigned by its manager in the state and approved at its home office in another state, even if it is to be performed within the state; 169 U. S. 81. See 2 App. Div. N. Y. 590. The mere right of a foreign creditor to receive from his debtor within the state the payment of his demand cannot be subjected to taxation within the state; 15 Wall. 300. See supra. Shares in a corporation are the shares of the stockholder wherever he may have his domicil, and can only be taxed by the jurisdiction to which his person is subject; 16 Pick. 572; 49 Pa. 526; subject to the qualification that a foreign corporation must always accept the privilege of doing business in a state on such terms as the state may see fit to exact; Cooley, Tax. 16. Under a statute providing for taxation of all personal property within the state owned by non-residents, a tax cannot be imposed on choses in action, owned by a non-resident and left with an attorney in the state for collection, nor on municipal bonds so owned and temporarily on deposit in a bank in the state for safekeeping; 59 Ind. 472. Where the legal title to choses in action is in a trustee, they are subject to taxation at his domicil; 17 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 61.

Tangible personal property situate within a state may be taxed there without regard to the residence of the owner; 48 N. Y. 390; 52 Pa. 140; and the real estate of a non-resident may be taxed where it is situated; 4 Wall. 210; 16 Mass. 208.

It is the general rule to assess personalty to the owner where he has his domicil; 17 Nev. 383; and sometimes, wherever it may be located in the state, either to the owner, his agent, or person having charge of it, whether the owner is a resident or not; 66 Pa. 446; 85 N. Y. 359; and this rule is sometimes applicable to choses in action; 69 Mo. 454; vessels are usually assessed at the port where registered; 58 N. Y. 242; 17 How. 713; ferryboats, where owned; 57 Ala. 62; property in a partnership, usually where the business is carried on; 24 Vt. 9; and where one carries on a business at a place other than his domicil, it is held to be proper to assess the property to one in charge of the business; 88 Ill. 170. Personalty in the hands of a trustee is assessed to him at his domicil; 10 Ohio St. 431; but sometimes to the beneficiary, if a resident of the state; 124 Mass. 193; and if the fund is in charge of a court, in the jurisdiction in which it is controlled; 39 N. J. 653. The personalty of a decedent is sometimes assessed to the estate at the place of situs, if the decedent was a non-resident, or at his last domicil, if a resident; 24 Ia. 436; and sometimes to the personal representative at his domicil; 39 N. J. 650; and continues to be so assessed until distributed; 53 Mich. 554. The personalty of persons under guardianship is sometimes assessed where the ward has his domicil; 38 Pa. 157; or to the guardian; 80 Ky. 71; and this would probably be the rule if the guardian, living in the state, had possession of the property, and the ward were a non-resident; 38 Pa. 157. The place for the assessment of the personalty of a corporation is its principal office, unless otherwise directed by statute; 60 Me. 196. It is customary for the states to tax so much of the property of foreign corporations as lies within the state limits.

Shares in a corporation are properly assessed as the owner's personal estate in the jurisdiction to which his person is subject, whether the corporation be foreign or domestic; 49 Pa. 526; 16 Pick. 572; but the state may give stock, held by individuals, any situs for the purpose of taxation; 59 Md. 185; and it may provide that the shares of stockholders shall be assessed at the place of corporate business and the tax paid by the corporation for its members; 57 Md. 31. A tax laid in California upon corporate stock, owned exclusively by a non-resident, and with all its property in another state, was held void; 22 Fed. Rep. 602.

A tax imposed by a state upon tangible property within its limits, the owner of which is a non-resident, is not a personal charge against the owner, but must be enforced against the property; 11 N. Y. 563; 5 Met. 73; and such personalty cannot be taxed unless it has an actual situs within the state so as to be under the protection of its laws; 50 Ga. 387. See ROLLING STOCK.

The rule or fiction of law that personal property, more especially choses in action, has no situs away from the domicil of the owner at which it is deemed to be present, originated, according to Savigny, in Rome, and acquired the designation of mobilia personam sequuntur; but its applicability to property was never held to extend beyond Roman territory. Subsequently it became a device of international comity which, it is declared in 12 Vt. 152, was subsequently "adopted from considerations of general convenience and policy and for the benefit of commerce." It was never invented with a view to its being used as a rule to govern and define the application and scope of taxation, nor was it intended to have any other meaning than that, for the purpose of the sale and distribution of property, any act, agreement, or authority which is sufficient in law where the owner resides, shall pass the property in the place where the property is, more especially to facilitate the distribution of decedents' estates by enabling owners to dispose of their property without embarrassment from their ignorance of the laws of the country where it is; David A. Wells in 52 Pop. Sci. Monthly 356.

Two states cannot tax at the same time the same property, nor can a state tax property and interests lying outside of its jurisdiction; 7 Wall. 262.

As to foreign-held bonds, "the power of taxation of a state is limited to persons, property, and business within her jurisdiction; all taxation must relate to one of these subjects." 15 Wall. 300.

"Bonds issued by a railroad company are property in the hands of the holders, and when held by non-residents of the state in which the company was incorporated, they are property beyond the jurisdiction of the state." 15 Wall. 300.

As to the situs of choses in action, see 11 Harv. Law Rev. 95.

It has been held in Indiana that life insurance policies are not taxable as personal property, such tax being against public policy; 55 Alb. L. J. 294. Patent rights are not taxable; 29 L. R. A. (Ky.) 786; so in New York court of appeal in a case yet unreported (Oct. 15, 1898); and in Pennsylvania; 151 Pa. 265; and Tennessee.

A poll or capitation tax is so called because it is a tax on the poll or person merely, without regard to property or other circumstances; 18 Fed. Rep. 135; 61 N. C. 21. It is used in some states, as Pennsylvania, to establish a qualification for voting. It was abolished in Massachusetts and in Delaware (by the constitution of 1898) and a registration fee adopted in its stead. See REGISTRATION. It is a direct tax within the meaning of the federal constitution; 7 Wall. 433; 8 id. 533; and cannot be laid by the United States except in proportion to population; 102 U. S. 587. The domicil of the taxable is the place of the imposition of the poll tax; 23 N. J. L. 517. One person cannot have two domicils for the purpose of taxation; 4 Mass. 534; nor can one be abandoned until another is acquired; 132 id. 89. See DOMICIL.

A state may bind itself by a contract, based upon a consideration, to refrain from exercising the right of taxation in a particular case; 15 Wall. 460; 16 id. 244; 6 Conn. 223; s. c. 16 Am. Dec. 46, n.

The agencies selected by the federal government for the exercise of its functions cannot be taxed by the states: for instance, a bank chartered by congress as the fiscal agent of the government; 4 Wheat. 316; the loans of the United States; 2 Wall. 220; 7 id. 16, 26; see 134 U. S. 594; the bonds or obligations of the United States for the payment of money; 134 U. S. 594; 133 id. 660; on United States revenue stamps; 101 Mass. 329; the salary of a federal officer; 16 Pet. 435; the property of the United States; 133 U. S. 496. But government agencies are only exempt from state taxation so far as it interferes with their efficiency in performing the functions by which they serve the government; 125 U. S. 530. On the other hand, the federal government cannot tax the corresponding agencies of the states; 12 Wall. 418; 105 Mass. 49; including the salary of a state officer; 11 Wall. 113; and a state municipal corporation; 17 Wall. 322; but railroad corporations are not included in this exemption; 9 Wall. 579. For a letter from Taney, C. J., to Secretary Chase protesting against a tax on the salaries of judges, see 157 U. S. 701. The states have no power to tax the operations of the Union Pacific R. R. Company, which was chartered by congress, but may tax its property; 18 Wall. 5; nor have they power to tax franchises conferred by congress, without its permission; 127 U. S. 1.

A state tax on telegraphic messages sent out of the state is unconstitutional as a regulation of interstate commerce, and so taxes on government messages are void, as burdens upon the agencies of the federal government; 4 Morr. Transcr. 447; see 127 U. S. 640; a state tax on freights transported from state to state is a regulation of commerce, and therefore void; 15 Wall. 282. A statute taxing a telegraph company upon its property within the state, at such a proportion of the whole value of its capital stock as the length of its lines within the state bears to the length of all its lines everywhere, deducting the value of its real estate and machinery subject to local taxation within the state, is constitutional; 163 U. S. 1.

A state has power to tax all property having a situs within its limits, whether employed in interstate commerce or not; 145 U. S. 1; 141 U. S. 18.

A state tax upon the gross receipts of a railroad company is not repugnant to the federal constitution, although they are made up in part from articles transported from state to state; there is a distinction between a tax upon freights carried between states and a tax upon the fruits of such transportation after they have become mingled with the other property of the carrier; 15 Wall. 284; nor is such a tax a tax upon exports or imports or upon interstate transportation; id.

The federal constitution provides that no state shall, without consent of congress, (1) lay any imposts or duties on exports or imports, except what may be necessary for executing its inspection laws. See 8 Wall. 123; (2) lay any duties of tonnage. Under this clause a tax on vessels at a certain sum per ton is forbidden; 20 Wall. 577. The states cannot tax the commerce which is regulated by congress; 4 Wheat. 316: but a tax may be laid upon merchandise in the original packages that has been the subject of commerce and has been sold by the importer; 5 Wall. 475; 8 id. 110. See TONNAGE; COMMERCE; ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

The constitution of the United States does not profess in all cases to protect property from unjust and oppressive taxation by the states. That is left to the state constitutions and state laws; 143 U. S. 192.

No tax is valid which is not laid for a public purpose; Miller, Const. 104, n.; 20 Wall. 655; 58 Me. 590; 2 Dill. 353; such are (according to Cooley, Tax. 81); to preserve the public order; to make compensation to public officers, etc.; to erect, etc., public buildings; to pay the expenses of legislation, and of administering the laws, etc.; also, to provide secular instruction; Cooley, Tax., 2d ed. 119–124; 104 U. S. 81; but not in a school founded by a charitable bequest, though a majority of the trustees were to be chosen (but from certain religious societies) by the inhabitants of the town; 103 Mass. 94. A town may tax itself for the erection of a state educational institution within its limits; 12 Allen 500. The support of public charities is a public purpose, and money raised by taxation may be applied to private charitable institutions. Taxation for the purpose of giving or loaning money to private business enterprises is illegal; 111 Mass. 454; 60 Me. 124. In some cases, governments have applied public funds to pay equitable claims (upon which no legal right exists), such as for the destruction of private property in war, or for loss incurred in a contract for the construction of a public work; Cooley, Tax. 91. Taxes may be levied for the construction and repair of canals, railroads, highways, roads, etc.; Cooley, Tax. 94; and the construction of a free bridge in a city; 58 Pa. 320; and for the payment of the public debt, if lawfully incurred; and for protection against fire; 104 U. S. 81. Taxation to provide municipal gas and water works is lawful; 43 Ga. 67; 27 Vt. 70; and for the preservation of the public health; 31 Pa. 175; Cooley, Tax. 101. Municipalities may pay money by way of bounties to those who volunteer as soldiers in time of actual or threatened hostility; 50 Pa. 150; 52 Me. 590; but not to provide amusements for the people, or to celebrate the declaration of independence, etc.; 1 Allen 103; 2 Den. 110; though the purchase and support of public parks is lawful; Cooley, Tax. 61, 129, 615.

The power of taxation is limited to public purposes; 69 Pa. 352; 92 Cal. 324. A railroad is a public purpose; 16 Wall. 667. See 168 U. S. 651. A statute providing for a special tax on corporations to establish free scholarships in a state university is unconstitutional; 45 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 245, where the cases as to what is a public purpose are collected. So of loans to aid in rebuilding parts of a city destroyed by fire; 111 Mass. 454; 23 S. C. 57; a city water plant; 38 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 826; loans by cities in aid of private manufacturing enterprises; 60 Me. 124; 20 Wall. 655; aid of private educational enterprises; 24 Wis. 350; 103 Mass 94; though no tuition fee is charged; 6 Sup. Ct. Pa. 1; a bounty for growing forest trees; 107 Mo. 464. Public purpose in this connection "has no relation to the urgency of the public mind, or to the extent of the public benefit to follow." 20 Mich. 452.

It is an essential rule of taxation that the purpose for which a tax is levied "should be one which in an especial manner pertains to the district within which it is proposed that the contribution shall be collected. . . . A state purpose must be accomplished by a state taxation, a county purpose by a county taxation, etc." Cooley, Tax. 104.

Apportionment, which is a necessary element of taxation, is a matter of legislation; Cooley, Tax. 175. Judge Cooley classifies the taxes as specific, ad valorem, and those apportioned by special benefit. He suggests as general principles, that while the districts are discretionary, the basis of apportionment must be applied throughout the district and cannot embrace persons or property outside of it. There may be a diversity in methods of collection; the tax does not fail because the rule of apportionment cannot in all cases be enforced, and exemptions, though permissible, must not be in the nature of special and invidious discriminations against individuals.

While perfect equality is unattainable, only statutes based upon false and unjust principles or producing gross inequality will justify the interposition of the courts; 5 Allen 426. See 57 Pa. 433; 73 id. 370; 3 Bland, Ch. 186; 85 Ky. 413. The 14th amendment of the constitution of the United States was not intended to compel the states to adopt an iron rule of equality or prevent classification; it is enough that there is no discrimination in favor of one as against another of the same class; 148 U. S. 657. The scope of the 14th amendment is treated in 113 U. S. 27 and 118 id. 56. It is carried into effect by R. S. §§ 1977, 1979.

A tax is uniform when it operates with the same effect in all places where the subject of it is found, and is not wanting in such uniformity because the thing is not equally distributed in all parts of the United States; 112 U. S. 580. Accordingly a different rule of taxation may be prescribed for railroad companies from that for individuals; 92 U. S. 575.

"The whole argument of a right under the federal constitution to challenge a tax law on the ground of inequality in the burdens resulting from the operation of the law is put at rest by the decision in Bell's Gap R. R. Co. v. Pa. (134 U. S. 232)." 167 U. S. 461.

There may be a tax upon occupations even if it duplicates taxes; Cooley, Tax. 385. They are usually by way of license, as distinguished from a tax upon the business authorized by the license to be carried on; 50 Ga. 530.

Such taxes have been laid on bankers, auctioneers, lawyers; 12 Mo. 268; 23 Gratt. 464; clergymen; 29 Pa. 226; peddlers, etc. See 5 Wall. 462 as to federal license taxes.

Tax on a bicycle under a municipal ordinance of Chicago was held to be void as a license, because it was not an occupation tax under the charter. As a tax, it was not imposed according to assessed valuation, not being uniform in its operation, but was objectionable as double taxation because all pleasure vehicles were already taxed; 56 Alb. L. J. 129.

There is a wide difference between a tax or assessment prescribed by a legislative body, and one imposed by a municipal corporation, and a still wider difference where the assessment is the act of mere functionaries with authority derived from municipal ordinances; 170 U. S. 45.

It is generally agreed that the authority to require property specially benefited to bear the expense of local improvements is a branch of the taxing power. Whether it shall be paid out of the general treasury, or assessed upon abutting property or other property especially benefited, and, if in the latter mode, whether the assessment shall be upon all property found to be benefited, or only upon abutters, according to frontage or area, are considered to be questions of legislative expediency; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 752, quoted in 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525.

The distinction between taxes and municipal assessments frequently arises in cases involving the construction of agreements by tenants to pay taxes. In such a case it was held in Illinois that an assessment for sidewalk and street improvements was not a tax within such agreement; 167 Ill. 215; but it was held that the term tax may be so used in legal instruments as to render it a debatable question whether it includes local assessments or not; 18 App. Div. N. Y. 140.

A legislature can authorize a city or town to tax its inhabitants only for public purposes; 150 Mass. 592; 113 U. S. 1; 37 Wis. 400; 114 Ill. 659.

Municipal assessments made for local improvements, though resting for their foundation upon the taxing power, are distinguishable in many ways from taxes levied for general state or municipal purposes. A local assessment upon the property benefited by a local improvement may be authorized by the legislature, but such an assessment must be based upon benefits received by the property owner over and above those received by the community at large. The legislature may make provision for ascertaining what property will be specially benefited and how the benefits shall be apportioned. The assessments may be made upon all the property specially benefited according to the exceptional benefit which each parcel of property actually and separately receives. Where the property is urban and plotted into blocks with lots of equal depth, the frontage rule of assessment is generally, but not always, a competent one for the legislature to provide. This rule is, in the long run, a just one, especially as to sidewalks, sewers, grading, and paving. See 30 Mich. 24; but see contra, 82 Pa. 360. The legislature may, under some circumstances, authorize the assessment of the lots benefited, in proportion to their area (but see 35 Mich. 155). Whether it is competent for the legislature to declare that the whole of an improvement of a public nature shall be assessed upon the abutting property, and other property in the vicinity, is in doubt. The earlier cases so held: but since many state constitutions have made provision for equality of taxation, several courts have held that the cost of a local improvement can be assessed upon particular property only to the extent that it is especially and particularly benefited, and that as to the excess, it must be borne by the public. See 82 Pa. 360; 69 id. 352; 18 N. J. Eq. 519.

As to exemptions from taxation: In the absence of any constitutional provision, the right to make exemptions is included in the right to apportion taxes; 73 Pa. 449; 24 Ind. 391; and when made on grounds of public policy they may be recalled; 13 Wall. 373; 47 Cal. 222; and all exemptions are strictly construed; 18 Wall. 225; 127 Pa. 435; being in derogation of the sovereign and common right; 132 U. S. 174, 190; they are not favored by the courts: 76 N. Y. 64; property exempted from taxation must be of a public nature and for a public purpose. Where the general use is of a public nature the right to exemption is not impaired by the fact that part of the property is used for producing revenue, as in the case of a public library, and statutory exemption is not impaired by the fact that part of a library building is a theatre or hall occasionally let to outside parties; 23 Misc. Rep. 1.

An exemption of "institutes of purely public charity" was held to include private institutions of purely public charity not administered for private gain; 86 Pa. 306; essential features of a public use are that it is not confined to privileged individuals but open to the indefinite public; 86 Pa. 306. The residence of a clergyman is not exempt as a "building for religious worship," because it contains one room set apart as a religious chapel; 12 R. I. 19. See 34 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 169.

Immunity from taxation is not in itself transferable. It must be considered as a personal privilege not extending beyond the immediate grantee, unless otherwise expressly declared; 130 U. S. 637.

It has been held that the legislature of a state may grant to a corporation a perpetual exemption from taxation; 13 Vt. 525; 11 Conn. 251; 24 Miss. 886; but privileges which may exempt a corporation from the burdens common to individuals do not necessarily flow from their charter, but must be expressed in it or they do not exist; Marshall, C. J., in 4 Pet. 514. As to exemption from taxation by charter grant, see 35 Cent. Law J. 172.

Equity will restrain the collection of taxes illegally imposed, but there must be some equitable ground for relief besides the illegality of the tax; 139 U. S. 658. Such ground may be liability to irreparable injury or to vexatious litigation; 113 id. 525. Where there is a statutory remedy, it is exclusive; but if the statute leaves open to judicial inquiry all jurisdictional questions, the decision of an administrative board does not preclude a resort to judicial remedies; 168 id. 289. If a remedy is provided, as by a board of equalization, redress there must first be sought; 86 Fed. Rep. 200.

Federal courts may issue a mandamus against counties or municipal corporations, to compel the levy of a tax to pay their judgments; 86 Fed. Rep. 264.

Rolling stock continuously used in a state acquires a situs therein for taxation, and even though it is used exclusively in interstate commerce, it may be subjected in the state to an equal property tax; 29 Fed. Rep. 658; 18 Wall. 5. It is within the legislative power to establish a situs for personal property elsewhere than at the place in which it is found, and rolling stock used continuously in two states may have a situs in each, but can be taxed in each only upon a fair proportion of the value; 29 Fed. Rep. 658. The continuous use in one state necessary for taxation is not prevented by frequent change of cars from one road to another and the fact that the identical cars are not continuously used in one state; id. For the purpose of taxation the situs of rolling stock is where it is habitually used; 39 Am. & Eng. Ry. Cas. (Ariz.) 543. It has also been held that its situs for the purpose of taxation is the place where the manager or agent would be taxed in contemplation of law; 39 Ia. 56. In Maryland rolling stock is taxable only at the home office of the company; 50 Md. 274.

The valuation of rolling stock may be apportioned by the court for taxation among the counties through which the road runs, with an assignment to each county of a share proportionate to the length of the road therein; 84 N. C. 504. Rolling stock held under a car trust company is taxable where the car trust association has its place of business; 24 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 626.

See PROPERTY; SURPLUS; MERGER.

TAX DEED. An instrument whereby the officer of the law undertakes to convey the title of the rightful proprietor to the purchaser at a tax sale, or sale of the land for non-payment of taxes.

This deed, according to the principles of the common law, is simply a link in the chain of the grantee's title. It does not ipso facto transfer the title of the owner, as in grants from the government or deeds between man and man. The operative character of it depends upon the regularity of the anterior proceedings. The deed is not the title itself, nor even evidence of it. Its recitals bind no one. It creates no estoppel upon the former owner. No presumption arises upon the mere production of the deed that the facts upon which it is based had any existence. When it is shown, however, that the ministerial officers of the law have performed every duty which the law imposed upon them, every condition essential in its character, then the deed becomes conclusive evidence of the title in the grantee, according to its extent and purport. See Blackw. Tax Titles 430.

The legislature may make a tax deed prima facie evidence of title in the purchaser, but cannot make it conclusive evidence of his title to the land; 148 U. S. 172.

TAX LEVY. The total sum to be raised by a tax. Also the bill, enactment, or measure of legislation by which an annual or general tax is imposed.

TAX LIEN. A statutory lien in favor of the state or municipality, upon the lands of a person charged with taxes, binding the same either for the taxes assessed upon the specific tract of land, or for all the taxes due from the individual, and which may be foreclosed for non-payment, by judgment of a court or sale of the land.

TAX SALE. A sale of lands for the non-payment of taxes assessed thereon.

The power of sale does not attach until every prerequisite of the law has been complied with; 9 Miss. 627. The regularity of the anterior proceedings is the basis upon which it rests.

There are important details connected with the auction itself and the duties of the officer intrusted with the conducting thereof. The sale must be a public, and not a private, one. The sale must take place at the precise time and place fixed by the law or notice.

A tax sale is vitiated by a failure to give the notice required by law of the place where the sale will occur; 69 Tex. 103.

The sale must be made to the highest bidder. This is the rule in Pennsylvania; but in most of the states the highest bidder is he who will pay the taxes, interest, and costs due upon the tract offered for sale for the least quantity of it. The sale must be for cash and must be according to the parcels and descriptions contained in the list and the other proceedings.

When a tract of land is assessed against tenants in common, and one of them pays the tax on his share, the interest of the other may be sold to satisfy the residue of the assessment.

Where several parcels of land belonging to the same person are separately assessed, each parcel is liable for its own specific tax and no more.

A tax sale is void if any portion of the tax for which it was made was illegal; 96 Mich. 144; 33 Fla. 356. See 127 U. S. 326.

TAX TITLE. The title by which one holds land which he purchased at a tax sale. That species of title which is inaugurated by a successful bid for land at a collector's sale of the same for the non-payment of taxes, completed by the failure of those entitled to redeem within the specified time, and evidenced by the deed executed to the tax purchaser, or his assignee, by the proper officer. Black's L. Dict.

It is not a derivative title. If valid, it is a breaking up of all other titles, and is antagonistic to all other claims to the land; 85 Ia. 247; but in Pennsylvania tax sales do not always cut out existing liens.

The owner of land can acquire a tax title by purchasing it at a tax sale; 75 Ia. 250.

To make out a valid tax title there must be a substantial compliance with the provisions of the law authorizing the sale; 148 U. S. 172.

TAXABLE. That may be taxed.

TAXATION. The process of taxing or imposing a tax. Webster, Dict.

In Practice. Adjustment. Fixing the amount: e. g. taxation of costs. 3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 602.

TAXATION OF COSTS. In Practice. Fixing the amount of costs to which a party is entitled.

It is a rule that the jury must assess the damages and costs separately, so that it may appear to the court that the costs were not considered in the damages; and when the jury give costs in an amount insufficient to answer the costs of the suit, the plaintiff may pray that the officer may tax the costs, and such taxation is inserted in the judgment. This is said to be done ex assensu of the plaintiff, because at his prayer. Bac. Abr. Costs (K). The costs are taxed in the first instance by the prothonotary or clerk of the court. See 2 Wend. 244; 1 Pick. 211. A bill of costs, having been once submitted to such an officer for taxation, cannot be withdrawn from him and referred to another; 2 Wend. 252. See COSTS.

TAXING OFFICER. An officer in each house of parliament, whose duty it is to tax the costs incurred by the promoters or opponents of private bills. May, Parl. Pr. 843.

TAXT-WARD. An annual payment formerly made to a superior in Scotland, instead of the duties due him under the tenure of ward-holding. Whart.

TEACHER. See SCHOOLS.

TEAM. Two or more horses, oxen, or other beasts harnessed together for drawing; 60 Ia. 462; with the vehicle to which they are customarily attached; 32 Barb. 291; 31 N. Y. 655, where the word was construed in reference to an exemption law. It may mean a vehicle with animals drawing it and used for loads instead of persons. 41 Conn. 477. A horse driven with other horses unharnessed; 57 N.H. 29; and a single horse; 15 Barb. 568; are held teams.

TEAM WORK. Work done by a team as a substantial part of a man's business. 49 Vt. 375. It has been held to extend to other than agricultural work, as hauling coals; 9 Q. B. D. 636, overruling 8 Q. B. D. 1. A covenant to provide team work does not oblige a lessee to find the instruments necessary for its performance; id.

TEAMSTER. One who drives horses in a wagon for the purpose of carrying goods for hire. 16 Nev. 416; 34 Cal. 306. He is liable as a common carrier. Story, Bailm. § 496. A teamster is a laborer; 25 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 272. See CARRIER.

TECHNICAL. That which properly belongs to an art.

In the construction of contracts it is a general rule that technical words are to be taken according to their approved and known use in the trade in which the contract is entered into or to which it relates, unless they have manifestly been understood in another sense by the parties; 2 B. & P. 164. See CONSTRUCTION.

TEDDING. Spreading. Tedding grass is spreading it out after it is cut in the swath. 10 East 5.

TEDING-PENNY. A small tax to the sheriff from each tithing toward the charge of keeping courts, etc. Cowel.

TEEP. A promissory note given by a native banker or money lender to zemindars to enable them to furnish government with security for the payment of their rents. Whart.

TEIND COURT. In Scotch Law. A court which has jurisdiction of matters relating to teinds (q. v.).

TEINDS. In Scotch Law. Tithes.

TELEGRAPH. An apparatus, or a process for communicating rapidly between distant points, especially by means of preconcerted visible signals representing words or ideas, or by means of words and signs transmitted by electro-magnetism. Webster, Dict. The term, as generally used, applies distinctively to the electro-magnetic telegraph.

In the United States all telegraph lines are operated by companies, either under the authority of general laws, or by express charter; Scott & J. Telegr. § 3. The telegraph is an instrument of commerce; 127 U. S. 411; 122 id. 347; and telegraphic communication between states is interstate commerce; 127 U. S. 640. Telegraph companies are quasi-public agencies, and their rights, duties, and obligations are matters arising under the general law. Questions arising in connection with them are not controlled in the federal courts by state decisions; 156 id. 210; 148 id. 92. An indictment of a telegraph operator in Connecticut who transmitted a message to New Jersey directing a bet on a horse-race, was upheld under a statute prohibiting betting on horse races, and the statute was held not to be in violation of the commerce clause in the constitution; 40 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 179. Exclusive franchises may be granted, but will not be implied; 11 Pet. 420; 11 Leigh 42. By a federal statute, companies are authorized to construct their lines upon any public road or highway, and across navigable streams, but so as not to interfere with their public use or navigation; 46 Me. 483. The telegraph is a public use authorizing the exercise of the right of eminent domain; 43 N. J. L. 381. Under the general police power, municipal corporations may regulate the manner in which the lines are to be constructed in cities, so as not to interfere with the comfort and safety of the inhabitants; Scott & J. Telegr. § 54. But the power of the municipality is to regulate, not to prohibit; 42 U. S. App. 686; and in the absence of evidence that a proposed method of laying the wires by a company will impede or endanger the use of the streets by the public, a court of equity will enjoin the town from interfering with the wires; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 325. Unless under the sanction of legislative enactment the erection of telegraph posts or the laying of tubes in any highway is a nuisance at common law; 9 Cox, C. C. 174; 30 Beav. 287. See POLES; WIRES.

It has been generally held that the obligations of telegraph companies are not the same as those of common carriers of goods; 41 N. Y. 544; 45 Barb. 274; 18 Md. 341; 15 Mich. 525; see Laws. Carr. 3; but this language has been thought to be too broad, and it has been said that these companies are common carriers of messages, subject to all the rules which are in their nature applicable to all classes of common carriers; Shearm. & R. Negl. § 554. The better opinion would seem to be that since these companies perform a quasi-public employment, under obligations analogous to those of common carriers, the rules governing the latter should be applied to them, but modified to meet the changed conditions of the case; 1 Daly 547; 35 Pa. 298; 13 Allen 226; 58 Ga. 433. They were held to be common carriers in 17 C. B. 3; 13 Cal. 422; 3 U. S. App. 30. They resemble common carriers in that they are instruments of commerce and exercise a public employment, and must serve all customers alike, but they are not common carriers in that their duties are different and are performed in different ways, and they are not subject to the same liabilities; 154 U. S. 14, citing 21 Wall. 264; 105 U. S. 460. They are not bailees. They cannot contract with their employers against their own negligence, although they can make reasonable rules limiting the measure of their responsibility. What is reasonable must be determined with reference to public policy; 21 Wall. 264.

Due and reasonable care is required of telegraph companies in the performance of their duties; 13 Allen 226; 78 Pa. 238; 48 N. Y. 132; 15 Mich. 525; and the necessity for such care is made the greater by the delicacy of the instrument and the skill required to manage it; 15 Mich. 525; 60 Ill. 421.

Telegraph companies may limit their liability by notice to the sender of the message; 35 Ind. 429; 74 Ill. 168; 30 How. Pr. 413; 113 Mass. 299; 17 C. B. 3. A company may make reasonable rules relative to its business, and thereby limit its liability. A rule that the company will not be responsible for the correct transmission of despatches, beyond the amount received therefrom, unless repeated at an additional expense, is reasonable; 11 Neb. 87; 154 U. S. 1; 17 C. B. 3; 17 U. C. Q. B. 470; 15 Mich. 525; whether the sender read the contract or not; 78 Pa. 238; 137 Mass. 463; but such regulations were held void in 60 Ill. 421; 74 id. 168; 79 Me. 493; 37 Ohio St. 301; 38 Kan. 679, 685; which cases are cited but not approved in 154 U. S. 1; but no regulations or device will avail to avoid liability in case of negligence or fraud; 34 Wis. 471; 37 Mo. 472; nor from injury which the repetition would not have prevented; 70 Ill. App. 275; nor is the company relieved from liability for delay in delivery not referable to any mistake in the tenor of the telegram; 50 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 438; nor where the company failed to put the message on its transit; 18 Md. 341; and failure to transmit and deliver a message correctly is prima facie evidence of negligence; 53 Ark. 434. Such regulations have been held not to apply to the receiver of the message; 35 Pa. 298; 169 Ill. 610; but the cases on this point are very conflicting; they may be found collected in 61 Am. St. Rep. 214.

The current of authority favors the rule that the usual conditions in the blanks of telegraph companies exempt them only from the consequences of errors arising from causes beyond their control, whether the message be repeated or unrepeated; 78 Pa. 238; 27 Ia. 433; 1 Col. 230; 5 S. C. 358; 95 U. S. 655; 2 Am. L. Rev. 615. See 107 N. C. 449. Notice of regulations must be brought home to the sender of the despatch, if they are to be regarded as incorporated in his contract; 1 Daly 547. His signature to the printed conditions is sufficient evidence of knowledge, and he will not be heard to say that he did not read them; 113 Mass. 299; 15 Mich. 525; see 85 Tenn. 529; 97 N. C. 57; they are part of the contract; 154 U. S. 1.

Telegraph companies are not allowed to show any preference in the transmission of despatches, except as regulated by statute; 23 Ind. 377; 56 Barb. 46. They may refuse to send obscene messages, but they cannot judge of the good or bad faith of the senders in the use of language not in itself immoral; 57 Ind. 495. They may refuse to communicate a message which is to furnish the means of carrying on an illegal business; and this, regardless of the motive by which they are actuated in refusing to communicate the message; 84 Ky. 664; they need not supply reports to bucket shops; id.; nor supply market or stock reports; Crosw. Electr. § 291.

In England, it is held that the receiver of a message, not being party to the contract for despatching it, can claim no rights under it; L. R. 4 Q. B. 706; 3 C. P. Div. 1, 62; Poll. Torts 522; so in Canada; 23 U. C. C. P. 150; but in the United States the right of action in such cases has been conceded; 1 Am. L. Reg. 685; Crosw. Electr. § 462; and this right has been based upon the "misfeasance" of the company upon which the receiver acted to his injury; 35 Pa. 298; 52 Ind. 1. There is no liability in tort to the sender where there is an express contract; Crosw. Electr. § 458; except perhaps in cases where the stipulations on the telegraph blanks are considered rather as regulations of the business than as contracts; id. If the sender of the message is the agent of the addressee, either disclosed or undisclosed, the latter may maintain an action against the company; 110 Ill. 408; whether the company had knowledge of the fact or not; Crosw. Electr. § 454.

Telegraph companies are bound to receive and transmit messages from other companies, but are not held responsible for their defaults; 45 N. Y. 744. But a recent text writer is of opinion that they are not, at common law, bound to receive messages for points not on their own lines; Crosw. Electr. § 445. In many states statutes provide otherwise; see id. § 385; but if a company accepts a message for transmission over a connecting line, it is liable to the same extent as over its own lines; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 429; 1 Daly 554; but it is held that its only obligation in such case is to deliver the message correctly to the connecting line; 16 U. C. Q. B. 530; 18 id. 60.

They may not unjustly discriminate in their rates, although they may make different rates to different customers if the conditions of the business require it; 62 N. W. Rep. 506.

A railroad company cannot grant a telegraph company the exclusive right to establish telegraph lines along its way, such contracts being void as in restraint of trade; 11 Fed. Rep. 1.

Employes of telegraph companies cannot refuse to answer questions as to messages transmitted by them; and they must, if called upon, produce such messages; 20 L. T. N. S. 421; 15 Fed. Rep. 712; 3 Dill. 567; 72 Mo. 83; 70 Cal. 683; an operator may be required to testify to the contents of a telegram addressed and delivered to a defendant on trial under indictment; 58 Me. 267; 7 W. Va. 544; 3 Dill. 567. And even when a statute forbids the divulging of the contents of a telegram, it has been held not to apply when the testimony of an operator is required in a court of justice; 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. 274. See Allen, Tel. Cas. 496, n. The power of the court to compel the local manager of a company to search for and produce private telegrams has been enforced in Missouri by subpœna duces tecum, notwithstanding a statute similar to that referred to above; 72 Mo. 83; 58 Me. 267; 15 Fed. Rep. 712; 70 Cal. 683; 55 Ia. 168. The doctrine of these decisions has been severely criticised, but they have not been overruled; Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 371, note; 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65. See 5 So. L. Rev. 473.

The Home Secretary of England has the power to order telegrams to be detained and opened for reasons of state or public justice, which power is exercised by express warrant under his signature, by statute.

In estimating the measure of damages for the failure to transmit a message properly, the general rules upon the subject of damages ex contractu are applied; Gray, Com. by Tel. 80; 98 Mass. 232; 18 U. C. Q. B. 60; 15 Gratt. 122. Where a telegraph company is sued for negligence in transmitting a message, the measure of damages, unless special damages are alleged and proved, is the sum paid for transmission; 71 Wis. 46. Speculative damages are not recoverable for error in transmitting a message; 39 Kan. 580. Unless the despatch shows on its face the importance of the matter to which it relates, or information on this point is communicated to the company's agents, only nominal damages can be recovered for the default of the company; 9 Bradw. 283; 29 Md. 232; 21 Minn. 155; 45 N. Y. 744; 16 Nev. 222. If the sender of a cipher message does not inform the company of the nature of the transaction to which it relates, or what might happen if it were not correctly transmitted, he can recover only the sum paid for sending it, in case of a mistake in its transmission or delivery; 154 U. S. 1; 131 Ill. 575; 34 Wis. 471; 16 Nev. 222; 32 Fl. 527; either nominal damages or the cost of sending it, at most; 178 Pa. 377. Abbreviations in a telegram may render it unintelligible; but if they represent well-known trade abbreviations which the operator may be presumed to understand, the company will be put on information and become liable for negligence in its transmission; 33 Ill. 400; 68 Ga. 299; if the abbreviations are understood by the company, it is not a cipher despatch, and the company is liable for negligent alteration in transmission; 87 Tenn. 554; 75 Tex. 535. Orders to agents to buy and sell stocks, though briefly expressed, have been held to impart information sufficiently as to their importance; 55 Pa. 262; 60 Ill. 421; 44 N. Y. 263; contra, 29 Md. 232. And the company is liable for the losses sustained, the fluctuations in the market being the measure of damages; supra. See, also, 41 Ia. 458; 27 La. Ann. 49. If the default of the company arises from the dishonesty of some third person, the company will not be held liable for such remote damages; 30 Ohio St. 555; 60 N. Y. 198. As to mental suffering as an element of damages, see MENTAL SUFFERING.

It is for the jury to decide whether the failure of a telegraph company to transmit a message whereby a physician was prevented from early attendance, was the proximate cause of an injury resulting from a surgical operation, there being evidence to show that the operation might have been avoided had the surgeon reached the patient earlier; 88 Fed. Rep. 902.

A company is bound to use reasonable efforts to ascertain where the persons are to whom a message is sent and to deliver the same; 9 Bradw. 283.

The leading principle as to delivery is that the message is to be delivered to the person primarily and not to the place, and if the person cannot be found at the specified place it may be negligence for the company to leave the telegram at the place without making further efforts to find the person; Crosw. Electr. § 412; 82 Tex. 561; 39 Fed. Rep. 181. And the message should not be left at the office till called for; 62 Ind. 371. Delivery at a hotel is sufficient. If the addressee is absent from his residence or place of business the company must use reasonable efforts to find him; 9 Ill. App. 283.

It has been held that the delivery of a message to a telegraph company for transmission raises an inference that it was received by the addressee; 7 Allen 556.

Where a telegraph message, sent from a place outside of the state, is to be delivered in a state, the contract between the sender and the telegraph company is to be performed there, and will be construed in accordance with the laws of the state of delivery; 70 Ill. App. 275.

Where a telegraph operator accepts a telegram for transmission, the fact that there is no office at the place to which it is to be sent does not relieve the company from its liability for failure to transmit and deliver; 69 Miss. 658. If a telegram is addressed to X, "in care of Y," the company may deliver it to Y, without being guilty of any negligence even if it fails to reach X; 77 Tex. 245; 30 S. W. Rep. 70.

A telegraph company has the right to choose its own agencies for the delivery of its messages, and may refuse to deliver telegrams by telephone and to receive telephone messages to be telegraphed; 46 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 731. But where the company permits its employes to receive, by telephone, messages for transmission, it consents to send a message so received; 49 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 138.

A telegraph company was not negligent in not delivering a warning message before the person to whom it was addressed was killed by his pursuers, where it could have delivered the message only by sending out messengers to watch for his arrival; 81 Fed. Rep. 676.

A contract may be made and proved in court by telegraphic despatches; 20 Mo. 254; 41 N. Y. 544; 103 Mass. 327; L. R. 6 Ex. 7; and the same rules apply in determining whether a contract has been made by telegrams as in cases of a contract made by letter; 36 N. Y. 307; 31 U. C. Q. B. 18; 4 Dill. 431; 20 Q. B. D. 640. Real estate may be leased or sold by telegram if the despatch was duly signed; 4 Bush 261. Contracts by telegraph satisfy the statute of frauds in England; Chit. Contr., 13th ed. 15. Messages are instruments of evidence, and are governed by the same rules as other writings; Scott & J. Telegr. § 340; the original message is said to be the best evidence; if this cannot be produced, then a copy should be produced; id. § 341; see 40 Wisc. 440; 127 Ill. 652. As to which is the original, is said to "depend upon which party is responsible for its transmission across the line, or, in other words, whose agent the telegraph company is. The first communication in a transaction, if it is all negotiated across the wires, will only be effective in the form in which it reaches its destination." 29 Vt. 140. See 36 N. Y. 307; 40 Wisc. 440. See on this subject, an article in 14 Cent. L. J. 262. See CIPHER.

The signature of a clerk of a telegraph company to a despatch was held to be sufficient, under the statute of frauds, where the original instructions had been signed by the party; Gray, Com. by Tel. 138; 54 Md. 138; 11 Col. 103; L. R. 5 C. P. 295. See 6 U. C. C. P. 221.

Statutes in Oregon, Washington, and Nevada provide that when any notice, information, or intelligence, written or otherwise, is required to be given, it may be given by telegraph, and powers of attorney or other instruments in writing duly proved or acknowledged for record may, with the proper certificate, be sent by telegraph and the telegraph copy recorded; and so of checks, due bills, promissory notes, and bills of exchange. And in the same states writs and processes in legal proceedings can be transmitted by telegraph.

Notice of issue of an injunction may be transmitted by telegraph; 13 Ch. D. 110; 59 Ill. 58; 35 N. J. Eq. 422.

By act of congress of July 24, 1866, any telegraph company organized under the laws of any state is granted the right, under certain restrictions, to construct and operate lines through and over any portion of the public domain, and along any of the military or post roads of the United States, and under or across navigable streams or waters, provided that they do not obstruct their navigation, or interfere with ordinary travel; R. S. § 5263.

A telegraph company acquires no right, under this act, to occupy the public streets of a city without compensation; 148 U. S. 92; 156 U. S. 210. See 71 Wis. 560. This act, so far as it declares that the erection of telegraph lines shall, as against state interference, be free to all who accept its terms and conditions, and that a telegraph company of one state shall not, after accepting them, be excluded by another state from prosecuting its business within her jurisdiction, is a legitimate regulation of commerce and is appropriate legislation to execute the powers of commerce over the postal service; 96 U. S. 1. It applies equally to telephone companies. The privileges granted must be exercised subject to the police power of the state, provided regulations are not oppressive and such as show an intent to control and perhaps defeat the company's existence; 85 Fed. Rep. 19. Since this act a railroad company, operating a post road over which interstate commerce is carried, cannot grant to a telegraph company the sole right to construct a line over its right of way so as to exclude other companies which have accepted the provisions of the said act, the lines of which would not obstruct the business of the first company; 160 U. S. 1.

Cables laid across navigable streams or waters must not obstruct navigation; 20 U. S. App. 247.

Submarine telegraph lines are subordinate to navigation and must be so laid and maintained as not to interfere therewith, and the company is liable in damages to vessels injured by them; 59 Fed. Rep. 365; 43 id. 85; 60 N. Y. 510; but in England injury resulting from submarine telegraph lines is held to be a question of negligence; 15 C. B. N. S. 759. See 15 Am. L. Rev. 211.

An opinion of the attorney-general given at the request of the secretary of state in January, 1898, holds that, in the absence of legislation, the president may control the landing of foreign submarine cables, either preventing it, if necessary, or permitting it on conditions demanded by the public interest.

TELEPHONE. An instrument for transmitting spoken words. See 105 Ind. 261.

In law the owners and operators of telephones are in much the same position as telegraph companies. There appears to be no distinction between telephonic and telegraphic communication; 6 Q. B. Div. 244, approved in 62 Wis. 32; 66 Md. 410; 58 N. J. L. 341; 42 Fed. Rep. 278. They have been called "common carriers of articulate speech," that is to say, even though their liabilities do not in all respects resemble the liabilities of ordinary common carriers, yet, like common carriers, they are engaged in a semi-public occupation, and have duties and privileges accordingly; 24 Alb. L. J. 283; 22 id. 363. They are subject to the rules governing common carriers; 2 C. C. A. 1; 50 Fed. Rep. 677, affirming 47 id. 633; and are bound to furnish equal facilities to all persons or corporations belonging to the classes which they undertake to serve; 50 Fed. Rep. 677. See 61 Vt. 241; 76 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 171; even to a rival company; 3 U. S. App. 30.

Statutes in some states provide that telephone companies shall serve all who apply as subscribers. Prior to the passage of such acts there was much litigation as to whether they could refuse their service under any circumstances. It was held that telephone companies are bound to furnish equal facilities to all telegraph companies; 66 Md. 399; see, also, 47 Fed. Rep. 633; 23 id. 539; 36 Ohio St. 296; but in 49 Conn. 352, the court held otherwise, upon the ground that the telephone company, a local company, was restricted under its license on the patents used by it and must be considered as doing business only within the lines of such restriction. Telephone companies are bound to furnish telephones to private individuals under ordinary circumstances; 105 Ind. 250. See 114 Pa. 593.

It has been held that the remedy against a subscriber for refusal to pay is to bring suit for the amount due; 17 Neb. 126.

It has been held that a telephone company must transmit despatches impartially for all who choose to send them; and may make no discriminations in favor of or against particular individuals. So a contract between a telephone company and the owner of patented telephone instruments, that in the use of such instruments by the telephone company discriminations should be made against certain telegraph companies was declared void; 36 Ohio St. 296.

In England, a message sent by telephone has been held to come within a statute placing the transmission of telegraphic messages and telegrams under the control of the postmaster-general, though the telephone was not invented or contemplated in 1869; 6 Q. B. Div. 244. Where the lessees of a tramway discharged electricity into the ground by uninsulated wires and the current interfered with the instruments of a telephone company; the tramway company was held liable; 68 L. T. 283. But an injunction will not lie at the suit of a telephone company to restrain an electric railway company from permitting the escape of electricity from its wires, where it appears that the former could obviate the trouble by the use of a return wire, and at a less expense than any the railway company could adopt; 42 Fed. Rep. 278.

A telephone company may enjoin the proprietor of a hotel from permitting his boarders to use an instrument in the hotel, for their private business, though they may use it to call for a carriage and such like; 32 Am. L. Rev. 736 (S. C. of D. C.).

A telephone company maintaining a line between different cities and towns with public stations therein is required to maintain a messenger service to notify persons at a reasonable distance when they are wanted, and is liable for the negligence of its messengers and a regulation to the contrary is void; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1085. Such a company is also liable in damages to a traveller, who, during an electric storm, comes in contact with one of its wires, charged with electricity from the atmosphere, and is injured thereby; 2 U. S. App. 205.

An affidavit taken over the telephone has been made the basis of an attachment, but the question how far a telephone may be used for such purpose is at this date (1898) by no means settled. So far as indicated by litigation on the subject, the matter seems to turn upon the thorough identification of the voice; 56 Alb. L. J. 283.

A statute fixing the maximum rates which telephone companies may charge is constitutional; 105 Ind. 250. The power to determine what compensation it may exact is a legislative not a judicial function; 76 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 171; and the power of state control is not lost by reason of the fact that the company's lines extend into another state; 118 Ind. 194. As to admissibility of telephone communications as evidence, see 24 Wkly. Law Bul. 245.

See, generally, 35 Am. & E. Corp. Cas. 1-94; 42 U. S. App. 686. See RATES.

TELLER (tallier, one who keeps a tally). An officer in a bank or other institution. A person appointed to receive votes. A name given to certain officers in the English exchequer.

The duties of tellers in banks consist of the receiving of all sums of money paid into the bank, and the paying of all sums drawn out. The position ranks next in importance to that of cashier. The authority of a teller to certify that a cheque is "good," so as to bind the bank, has been denied; 9 Metc. 306; but is supported by the weight of decisions; 39 Pa. 92; 52 N. Y. 96; Morse, Bk. 201. See OFFICERS.

TEMPERANCE. It has no fixed legal meaning as contradistinguished from its usual import. It is habitual moderation in regard to the indulgence of the natural appetites and passions; restrained or moderate indulgence; moderation; as temperance in eating and drinking; temperance in the indulgence of joy or mirth. Web. Dict. in 84 Cal. 128. See LIQUOR LAWS.

TEMPEST. A violent or furious storm; a current of wind rushing with extreme violence, and usually accompanied with rain or snow. 29 U. C. C. B. 84. See ACT OF GOD; LIGHTNING.

TEMPLE. See INNS OF COURT.

TEMPORAL LORDS. See PEERS; PARLIAMENT.

TEMPORALITIES. Revenues, lands, tenements, and lay fees which bishops have from livery of the king, and in virtue of which they sit in parliament. 1 Rolle, Abr. 881.

TEMPORALITY. The laity.

TEMPORARY. That which is to last for a limited time. Approved in 70 Ill. 399. See PERMANENT.

TEMPORIS EXCEPTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A plea of lapse of time in bar of an action, like our statute of limitations.

TEMPUS (Lat.). Time in general. A time limited; a season: e. g. tempus pessonis, mast time in the forest.

TEMPUS SEMESTRE. In Old English Law. The period of six months or half a year consisting of one hundred and eighty-two days. Cro. Jac. 166.

TEMPUS UTILE (Lat.). In Civil Law. A period of time which runs beneficially: i. e. feast-days are not included, nor does it run against one absent in a foreign country, or on business of the republic, or detained by stress of weather. But one detained by sickness is not protected from its running; for it runs where there is power to act by an agent as well as where there is power to act personally; and the sick man might have deputed his agent. Calvinus.

TENANCY. The state or condition of a tenant; the estate held by a tenant.

TENANT. (Lat. tenere, to hold). One who holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will. In a popular sense, he is one who has the temporary use and occupation of lands or tenements which belong to another, the duration and other terms of whose occupations are usually defined by an agreement called a lease, while the parties thereto are placed in the relation of landlord and tenant. See LANDLORD AND TENANT; 5 M. & G. 54.

The term is applied generally in connection with the names of the various estates in land to indicate the person entitled to a particular estate, as tenant in common, by the curtesy, in dower, in fee, for life, in severalty, at sufferance, in tail, at will, for years, from year to year, and joint tenants. See the several titles relating to these estates. Tenant of the demesne is one who is tenant of a mesne lord; Hamm. N. P. 392. Tenant by the manner is one who has a less estate than the fee in the land which remains in the deversion. He is so called because in avowries and pleadings it is specially shown in what manner he is tenant in contradistinction to veray tenant, who is called simple tenant. See Hamm. N. P. 393; VERAY. As to tenant paravail, see PARAVAIL. See ESTATE; LEASE; NOTICE TO QUIT.

TENANT RIGHT. In leases from the crown, corporations, or the church, it is usual to grant a further term to the old tenants in preference to strangers; and as this expectation is seldom disappointed, such tenants are considered as having an ulterior interest beyond their subsisting term; and this interest is called the tenant right. Bacon, Abr. Leases and Terms for Years (U).

TENANT TO THE PRÆCIPE. See RECOVERY.

TENDER. (Lat. tendere, to offer). An offer to deliver something, made in pursuance of some contract or obligation, under such circumstances as to require no further act from the party making it to complete the transfer.

Legal tender, money of a character which by law a debtor may require his creditor to receive in payment, in the absence of any agreement in the contract or obligation itself. See LEGAL TENDER.

In Contracts. It may be either of money or of specific articles.

Tender of money must be made by some person authorized by the debtor; 2 Maule & S. 86; to the creditor, or to some person properly authorized, and who must have capacity to receive it; 1 Camp. 477; 14 S.

& R. 307; 11 Me. 475; 1 Gray 600 (but necessity will sometimes create exceptions to this rule; thus any one may make a tender for an idiot; 1 Inst. 206 b; an uncle, although not appointed guardian, has been permitted to make a tender on behalf of an infant whose father was dead; 1 Rawle 408); in lawful coin of the country; 5 Co. 114; 13 Mass. 235; 4 N. H. 296; or paper money which has been legalized for this purpose; 2 Mas. 1; as, U. S. treasury notes or "greenbacks;" 12 Wall. 457; 27 Ind. 426; or foreign coin made current by law; 2 Nev. & M. 519; but a tender in bank notes will be good if not objected to on that account; 2 B. & P. 526; 9 Pick. 539; 1 Johns. 476; 1 Rawle 408; 6 Harr. & J. 53. He who tenders must be ready to pay or have within his reach the means to pay and actually offer to pay; 10 East 101; 5 Esp. 48; 5 N. H. 440. The money need not always be brought forward as well as offered, especially if the party to whom the offer is made refuses to receive it; 2 M. & S. 86; 6 Pick. 356. The person making the tender need not have the money in his possession; 2 C. & P. 77; 12 E. C. L. 35. A refusal to accept a check for the sole reason that it was insufficient in amount, is a waiver of all objection to the form of the tender; 12 Colo. 480. A corporation is not bound to tender a certificate before it can maintain an action on a subscription for its stock; 46 Minn. 463. As to what has been held objection, see 2 Caines 116; 13 Mass. 235; 5 N. H. 296; 10 Wheat. 333. The exact amount due must be tendered; 5 Mass. 365; 41 Vt. 66; 29 Ia. 480; though more may be tendered, if the excess is not to be handed back; 5 Co. 114; 4 B. & Ad. 546; and asking change does not vitiate unless objection is made on that account; 1 Camp. 70; 5 Dowl. & R. 289; see 140 Ill. 123; and the offer must be unqualified; 1 M. & W. 310; 9 Metc. 162; 20 Wend. 47; 18 Vt. 224; 1 Wisc. 141. A tender accompanied with conditions which the party has no right to impose is of no avail; 94 Ala. 488. Though a conditional tender is not good, a tender under a protest, reserving the right of the debtor to dispute the amount due, is a good tender, if it does not impose any conditions on the creditor; [1892] 1 Ch. 1. Where a decree directed complainant to pay defendant, or into court, a certain sum, and defendant thereupon to deliver to the complainant, or into court, certain stock, held that the tender of the same with interest coupled with a demand for the surrender of the stock and a settlement of the pending appeal was bad as a conditional tender and did not stop the running of the interest; 86 Fed. Rep. 16. One who makes a tender in order to stop the running of the interest must show that he has kept on hand, so as to be constantly ready and able to pay, the amount of the tender in lawful money at any time the creditor should elect to take it; id. See 74 Fed. Rep. 52.

When a larger sum than is due is tendered, it is not necessary that the debtor pay or keep good the whole amount; for, although the tender of money is supposed to be an admission by the debtor that the entire sum tendered is due and payable, yet it is not conclusive evidence to that effect; 24 Ind. 250. But where tender was made after suit brought, and the amount supposed by defendant to be due was paid into court, it was decided that the full amount must be paid over to the plaintiff, notwithstanding a much less sum was found by arbitrators to be due; 82 Pa. 64.

It is said that the amount must be stated in making the offer; 30 Vt. 577. It must be made at the time agreed upon; 1 Saund. 33 a, n.; 5 Pick. 187, 240; but may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages, if made subsequently, before suit brought; 1 Saund. 33 a, n.; statutes have been passed in many of the states, permitting the debtor to make a tender at any time before trial, of the amount he admits to be due, together with all costs accrued up to date of tender, and compelling plaintiff, in case he do not recover more than the sum tendered, to pay all costs subsequently incurred. See 53 Fed. Rep. 153; 45 Ill. App. 151. In Pennsylvania, by statute of 1705, in case of a tender made before suit, the amount tendered must in the event of a suit be paid into court; 10 S. & R. 14; otherwise, the plea of tender is a nullity. If so paid, tender is a good plea in bar, and if followed up, protects the defendant; 66 Pa. 158. Tender may be made after suit brought by paying the amount tendered into court with the costs up to the time of payment; 1 T. & H. Pr. 744. At common law the tender of a mortgage debt on the day it falls due and at the appointed place discharges the mortgage; but if made after the maturity of the debt, it must be kept good, in order to have that effect; 86 Ill. 431; 27 Me. 237; 50 Cal. 650; but in New York and Michigan mere tender is sufficient to discharge the mortgage; 21 N. Y. 343; 12 Mich. 270. It must be at a suitable hour of the day, during daylight; 7 Me. 31; at the place agreed upon, or, if no place has been agreed upon, wherever the person authorized to receive payment may be found; 2 M. & W. 223; and, in general, all the conditions of the obligation must be fulfilled. Where a chattel mortgage runs to several mortgagees jointly, to secure a joint debt, a tender to either mortgagee is good; 53 Minn. 23. The money must have been actually produced and offered, unless the circumstances of the refusal amount to a waiver; 3 C. & P. 342; 15 Wend. 637; 6 Pick. 356; 1 Wisc. 141; or at least be in the debtor's possession ready for delivery; 5 N. H. 440; 3 Pa. 381. As to what circumstances may constitute a waiver, see 2 Maule & S. 86; 1 A. K. Marsh. 321; 57 Conn. 105. An actual tender is dispensed with if the party is ready and willing to pay it, but is prevented by the other's declaring that he will not receive it; 94 Ala. 488. Presence of the debtor with the money ready for delivery is enough, if the creditor be absent from the appointed place at the appointed time of payment; 4 Pick. 258; or if the tender is refused; 18 Conn. 18.

A tender may be made in the case of unliquidated damages, but it must be kept good, especially where there is a dispute as to the amount due; 44 Ill. App. 615.

Tender of specific articles must be made to a proper person, by a proper person, at a proper time; 2 Pars. Contr. 158. The place of delivery is to be determined by the contract, or, in the absence of specific agreement, by the situation of the parties and circumstances of the case; 7 Barb. 472; for example, at the manufactory or store of the seller on demand; 2 Den. 145; at the place where the goods are at the time of sale; 7 Me. 91; 3 W. & S. 295; 6 Ala. N. S. 326; 1 Wash. C. C. 328; the creditor's place of abode, when the articles are portable, like cattle, and the time fixed; 4 Wend. 377; 2 Pa. 63; 1 Me. 120. When the goods are cumbrous, it is presumed that the creditor was to appoint a place; 5 Me. 192; 3 Dev. 78; or, if he fails to do so upon request, the debtor may appoint a place, giving notice to the creditor, if possible; 13 Wend. 95; 1 Me. 120. Whether a request is necessary if the creditor be without the state, see 5 Me. 192; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 611. The articles must be set apart and distinguished so as to admit of identification by the creditor; 4 Cow. 452; 7 Conn. 110; 1 Miss. 401. It must be made during daylight, and the articles must be at the place till the last hour of the day; 19 Vt. 587; 5 T. B Monr. 372; unless waived by the parties.

In Pleading. If made before action brought; 5 Pick. 106; 55 N. J. L. 41; tender may be pleaded in excuse; 2 B. & P. 550; 5 Pick. 291; it must be on the exact day of performance; 1 Saund. 33 a, n.; and if a tender is relied on as a defence, it must be pleaded; 7 D. C. 66. It cannot be made to an action for general damages when the amount is not liquidated; 2 Burr. 1120; as, upon a contract; 2 B. & P. 234; covenant other than for the payment of money; 1 Ld. Raym. 566; tort; 2 Stra. 787; or trespass; 2 Wils. 115. It may be pleaded, however, to a quantum meruit; 1 Stra. 576; accidental or involuntary trespass, in the United States; 13 Wend. 390; 2 Conn. 659; 36 Me. 407; covenant to pay money; 7 Taunt. 486.

The effect of a tender is to put a stop to accruing damages and interest, and to entitle the defendant to judgment for his costs; 3 Bingh. 290; 3 Johns. Cas. 243; 17 Mass. 389; 10 S. & R. 14; 9 Mo. 697; and it may be of effect to prevent interest accruing, though not a technical tender; 5 Pick. 106.

It admits the plaintiff's right of action as to the amount tendered; 1 Bibb 272; 14 Wend. 221; 2 Dall. 190; 28 Neb. 587; at the date of the suit; 48 Mo. App. 185; but nothing more, and does not prevent the making of any defence inconsistent with the admissions of the original contract or cause of action, as to any claim beyond that of the sum tendered; 110 N. Y. 101; 74 Ia. 436. The benefit may be lost by a subsequent demand and refusal of the amount due; 5 B. & Ad. 630; 24 Pick. 168; but not by a demand for more than the sum tendered; 22 Vt. 440; or due; 3 Q. B. 915.

See LEGAL TENDER; PAYMENT INTO COURT.

A plea of tender, if defective, should be demurred to, and plaintiff cannot question its sufficiency after accepting the money paid into court under such plea; 98 Ala. 638.

TENDER OF AMENDS. See AMENDS.

TENEMENT (from Lat. teneo, to hold). Everything of a permanent nature which may be holden.

House, or homestead. Jacob. Rooms let in houses.

Property held by a tenant. 37 W. Va. 778.

In its most extensive signification, tenement comprehends everything which may be holden, provided it to be of a permanent nature; and not only lands and inheritances which are holden, but also rents and profits à prendre of which a man has any frank tenement, and of which he may be seised ut libero tenemento, are included under this term; Co. Litt. 6 a; 2 Bla. Com. 17; 1 Washb. R. P. 10. In its technical sense it will include an advowson; 3 Atk. 460; 4 Bing. 290; tithes; 1 Stra. 100; 6 Ad. & El. 388; a dignity; 30 Ch. Div. 136; 2 Salk. 509. It includes a wharf; 14 Abb. Pr. 372. The word tenements simply, without other circumstances has never been construed to pass a fee; 10 Wheat. 204. See 1 B. & Ad. 161; Com. Dig. Grant (E 2), Trespass (A 2).

TENEMENTAL LAND. Land distributed by a lord among his tenants, as opposed to the demesnes which were occupied by himself and his servants. 2 Bla. Com. 90.

TENENDAS (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The name of a clause in charters of heritable rights, which derives its name from its first words, tenendas prædictas terras, and expresses the particular tenure by which the lands are to be holden. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, t. 3, n. 10.

TENENDUM (Lat.). That part of a deed which was formerly used in expressing the tenure by which the estate granted was holden; but since all freehold tenures were converted into socage, the tenendum is of no further use even in England, and is, therefore, joined to the habendum in this manner,—to have and to hold. The words "to hold" have now no meaning in our deeds. 2 Bla. Com. 298. See HABENDUM.

TENERI (Lat.). That part of a bond where the obligor declares himself to be held and firmly bound to the obligee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, is called the teneri. 3 Call 350.

TENET (Lat. he holds). In Pleading. A term used in stating the tenure in an action for waste done during the tenancy.

When the averment is in the tenet, the plaintiff on obtaining a verdict will recover the place wasted, namely, that part of the premises in which the waste was exclusively done, if it were done in a part only, together with treble damages. But when the averment is in the tenuit, the tenancy being at an end, he will have judgment for his damages only. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 652.

TENNESSEE. The name of one of the United States of America.

It was originally a part of North Carolina. In April, 1784, North Carolina passed an act ceding to the United States, upon certain conditions, all her territory west of the Appalachian or Alleghany Mountains. Before the cession was accepted by congress, it was repealed by another act passed in October, 1784. In December, 1789, the legislature again ceded the territory to the United States; and the cession was accepted by congress by act, April 2, 1790. A convention was called, and a constitution established on February 6, 1796. Tennessee was admitted by an act approved June 1, 1796. Prior to this time a legislature had been elected, the state government organized, and many important laws enacted.

The constitution of 1796 was not submitted to the people for ratification. The authority of the convention established it as the constitution of the state. A new constitution went into effect in 1835. Amendments were ratified in 1853 and 1866. The present constitution was framed, submitted to the people, and ratified in 1870, and went into effect May 5, 1870.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Legislature is styled "the General Assembly." It consists of a senate and house of representatives. The number of senators is not to exceed one-third the number of representatives. The number of representatives is not to exceed seventy-five, until the population of the state is a million and a half, and never to exceed ninety-nine.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor must be thirty years of age, a citizen of the United States, and a citizen of the state seven years next before his election. The supreme executive power is vested in him. He is not eligible more than six years in any term of eight. He has the ordinary powers of the chief executive magistrate of the American states, including the veto power and the power to grant reprieves and pardons, after conviction, except in cases of impeachment.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power is vested in one supreme court, in such inferior courts as the legislature may establish, and in the judges thereof, and in justices of the peace, and corporation courts. The Supreme Court is composed of five judges. Its jurisdiction is appellate only. The judges are elected for eight years.

A Court of Chancery Appeals has been created by act of the General Assembly of 1895, having jurisdiction of appeals from the chancery courts, etc. It consists of three judges. Appeals lie to it only as to points of law, and its jurisdiction is appellate only.

The court of general original jurisdiction is the Circuit Court; it also has general appellate jurisdiction. The state is divided into nineteen judicial circuits. The people of each circuit elect the judge thereof, for the term of eight years.

The Chancery Court has general original jurisdiction of all cases of an equitable nature where the demand exceeds fifty dollars. There are some cases of an equitable nature in which the circuit and county courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the chancery courts. The state is divided into twelve chancery districts, in each of which a chancellor is elected by the people, for eight years. An appeal lies to the supreme court from all its decisions.

The County Court is divided into a Quarterly Court and a Monthly Court. The quarterly court is held each quarter in each county in the state by one-half of the justices of the county, and has a police jurisdiction. The monthly county court is held on the first Monday in each month in each county. The county court has jurisdiction of the probate of wills, the granting of administrations, the partition of estates, the appointment of guardians, and the general administration of decedents' estates. There are some cases in which its jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the circuit and chancery courts.

TENOR. A term used in pleading to denote that an exact copy is set out. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 235; 1 Mass. 203; 1 East 180.

The tenor of an instrument signifies the true meaning of the matter therein contained. Cowel. In Scotland an action for proving the purport of a lost deed is called the action of proving the tenor.

In Chancery Pleading. A certified copy of records of other courts removed into chancery by certiorari. Gresl. Ev. 309.

TENORE INDICTAMENTI MITTENDO. A writ whereby the record of an indictment and the process thereupon was called out of another court into the Queen's bench. Reg. Orig. 69; Whart.

TENSE. A term used in grammar to denote the distinction of time.

The acts of a court of justice ought to be in the present tense; but the acts of the party may be in the perfect tense; and the continuances are in the perfect tense; 1 Mod. 81. The contract of marriage should be made in language of the present tense; 6 Binn. 405. See 1 Saund. 393, n. 1.

TENT. A pavilion; or canvas house enclosed with walls of cloth and covered with the same material. 2 Tex. App. 222.

TENTERDEN'S ACT, LORD. The statute of George IV. c. 14, § 6, which provides that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any representation given concerning the character, credit, etc., of another, or to the intent that another person may obtain credit, unless such representation be made in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith. See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

TENUIT (Lat. he held). A term used in stating the tenure in an action for waste done after the termination of the tenancy. See TENET.

TENURE (from Lat. tenere, to hold). The mode by which a man holds an estate in lands.

Such a holding as is coupled with some service, which the holder is bound to perform so long as he continues to hold.

The thing held is called a tenement; the occupant, a tenant; and the manner of his holding constitutes the tenure. Upon common-law principles, all lands within the state are held directly or indirectly from the king, as lord paramount or supreme proprietor. To him every occupant of land owes fidelity and service of some kind, as the necessary condition of his occupation. If he fails in either respect, or dies without heirs upon whom this duty may devolve, his land reverts to the sovereign as ultimate proprietor. In this country, the people in their corporate capacity represent the state sovereignty; and every man must bear true allegiance to the state, and pay his share of the taxes required for her support, as the condition upon which alone he may hold land within her boundaries; Co. Litt. 65 a; 2 Bla. Com. 105; 3 Kent 467.

In the earlier ages of the world the condition of land was probably allodial, that is, without subjection to any superior,—every man occupying as much land found unappropriated as his necessities required. Over this he exercised an unqualified dominion; and when he parted with his ownership the possession of his successor was equally free and absolute. An estate of this character necessarily excludes the idea of any tenure, since the occupant owes no service or allegiance to any superior as the condition of his occupation. But when the existence of an organized society became desirable to secure certain blessings only by its means to be acquired, there followed the establishment of governments, and a new relation arose between each government and its citizens,—that of protection on the one hand and dependence on the other,—necessarily involving the idea of service to the state as a condition to the use and enjoyment of lands within its boundaries. This relation was of course modified according to the circumstances of particular states; but throughout Europe it early took the form of the feudal system. See ALLODIUM.

The principal species of tenure which grew out of the feudal system was the tenure by knight's service (q. v.). Many arbitrary and tyrannical incidents or lordly privileges were attached to this tenure, which was abolished by statute 12 Charles II. c. 24, which declared that all such lands should thenceforth be held in free and common socage.

Tenure in socage is where a tenant holds his tenement by any certain service, in lieu of all other services, so that they be not services of chivalry or knight's service: as, to hold by fealty and twenty shillings rent, or by homage, fealty, and twenty shillings rent, or by homage and fealty without any rents, or by fealty and a certain specified service, as, to plough the lord's land for three days. Littleton 117; 2 Bla. Com. 79. See SOCAGE.

Other tenures have grown out of the two last mentioned species of tenure, and are still extant in England, although some of them are fast becoming obsolete,

Among these are tenures by copyhold and in frankalmoigne, in burgage and gavelkind, and grand and petit serjeanty; but their nature, origin, and history are explained in the several articles appropriated to those terms.

Tenures were distinguished, according to the quality of the service, into frees or base; the former were such as were not unbecoming a soldier or a freeman to perform, as, to serve the lord in the wars; while the latter were only considered fit for a peasant, as to plough the land, and the like. They were further distinguished with reference to the person from whom the land was held, as a tenure in capite, where the holding was of the person of the king, and tenure in gross, where the holding was of a subject. By the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. I., it was provided that if any tenant should alien any part of his land in fee, the alienee should hold immediately of the lord of the fee, and should be charged with a proportional part of the service due in respect of the quantity of land held by him. The consequence of which was that upon every such alienation the services upon which the estate was originally granted became due to the superior lord, and not to the immediate grantee; 4 Term 443; 4 East 271; Crabb, R. P. § 735.

In the United States every estate in fee-simple is held as absolutely and unconditionally as is compatible with the state's right of eminent domain. Many grants of land made by the British government prior to the revolution created socage tenures, which were subsequently abolished or modified by the legislatures of the different states. Thus, by the charter of Pennsylvania, the proprietary held his estate of the crown in free and common socage, his grantees being thereby also authorized to hold of him directly, notwithstanding the statute of Quia Emptores. The act of Pennsylvania of November 27, 1779, substituted the commonwealth in place of the proprietaries as the ultimate proprietor of whom lands were held. Pennsylvania titles are allodial not feudal; 44 Pa. 492. In New York there was supposed to have been some species of military tenure introduced by the Dutch previously to their surrender to the English, in 1664; but the legislature of that state in 1787 turned them all into a tenure in free and common socage, and finally, in 1830, abolished this latter tenure entirely, and declared that all lands in that state should thenceforth be held upon a uniform allodial tenure.

See Parliamentary Report (1870) on Tenures in the countries of Europe.

TENURE OF OFFICE. By R. S. § 1765, etc., it was provided that federal officers appointed with the consent of the senate should only be removed during their terms with like consent or by a new appointment made by the consent of the senate; but it did not apply to certain suspensions during a recess of the senate. The law was repealed by act of March 3, 1887. See, as to the effect of the repeal, 167 U. S. 324; OFFICE.

TERCE. In Scotch Law. A life-rent competent by law to widows who have not accepted of special provisions in the third part of the heritable subjects in which the husband died infeft. It thus corresponds to dower.

TERM. In Estates. The limitation of an estate: as a term for years, and the like. The word term does not merely signify the term specified in the lease, but the estate, also, and interest that passes by that lease: and therefore the term may expire during the continuance of the time: as by surrender, forfeiture, and the like. 2 Bla. Com. 145; 8 Pick. 339.

In Practice. The space of time during which a court holds a session. Sometimes the term is a monthly, at others it is a quarterly period, according to the constitution of the court.

The whole term is considered as but one day: so that the judges may at any time during the term revise their judgments. In the computation of the term, all adjournments are to be included; 9 Watts 200. Courts are presumed to know judicially when their terms are required to be held by public law; 4 Dev. 427. A term of the circuit court may extend from the beginning of one term to the opening of the succeeding statutory term, and the beginning of another term in another district of the same circuit does not necessarily end the term of the first court; 37 U. S. App. 129. A court has power to extend the term until a trial can be concluded; 21 Pa. 109. In England Hilary term began January 3d, and ended February 12th; Easter term began the Wednesday fortnight after Easter Sunday and ended the Monday next after Ascension Day; Trinity term began the Friday next after Trinity Sunday and ended the Wednesday fortnight after; Michaelmas term began October 9th and ended November 28th. The long vacation was formerly from August 10th to October 24th, and to October 28th, in chancery; now it is from August 13th to October 23d. By the Judicature

Acts (q. v.), the division of the legal year into the four terms of Hilary, Easter, Trinity, and Michaelmas has been abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice.

TERM FEE. In English Practice. A certain sum which a solicitor is entitled to charge to his client, and the client to recover, if successful, from the unsuccessful party; payable for every term in which any proceedings subsequent to the summons shall take place. Whart. Lex.

TERM FOR YEARS. An estate for years and the time during which such estate is to be held are each called a term: hence the term may expire before the time, as, by a surrender.

See ESTATE FOR YEARS.

TERM IN GROSS. An estate for years which is not held in trust for the party entitled to the land on the expiration of the term.

TERM PROBATORY. In an ecclesiastical suit, the time during which evidence may be taken. Cootes' Eccl. Pr. 240.

TERMINUS (Lat.). A boundary or limit, either of space or time. A bound, goal, or borders parting one man's land from another's. It is used also for an estate for a term of years: e. g. "interesse termini." 2 Bla. Com. 143. See TERM.

Terminus a quo. The starting-point of a private way is so called. Hamm. N. P. 196.

Terminus ad quem. The point of termination of a private way is so called. In common parlance, the point of starting and that of termination of a line of railway are each called the terminus.

TERMOR. One who holds lands and tenements for a term of years, or life. Littleton § 100; 4 Tyrwh. 561.

TERMS, TO BE UNDER. A party is said to be under terms, when an indulgence is granted to him by the court in its discretion, on certain conditions. Thus, when an injunction is granted ex parte, the party obtaining it is put under terms to abide by such order as to damages as the court may make at the hearing. Moz. & W.

TERRA EXTENDENDA. A writ addressed to an escheator, that he inquire and find out the true yearly value of any land, etc., by the oath of twelve men, and to certify the extent into the chancery. Reg. Orig. 293; Whart.

TERRA HYDATA. Land subject to the payment of hydage. Seld.

TERRA LUCRABILIS. Land gained from the sea or enclosed out of a waste. Cowel.

TERRA NOVA. Land newly converted from wood ground or arable. Cowel.

TERRA PUTURA. Land in forests, held by the tenure of furnishing food to the keepers therein. 4 Inst. 307.

TERRA TESTAMENTALIS. Gavelkind land, being disposable by will. Spelm.

TERRÆ DOMINICALES REGIS. The demesne lands of the crown.

TERRAGES. An exemption from all uncertain services. Cowel.

TERRE-TENANT. One who has the actual possession of land; but, in a more technical sense, he who is seised of the land; and in the latter sense the owner of the land, or the person seised, is the terre-tenant, and not the lessee. 4 W. & S. 256; Bac. Abr. Uses and Trusts. It has been holden that mere occupiers of the land are not terre-tenants. See 16 S. & R. 432; 2 Bla. Com. 91, 328; 114 Pa. 146.

Contribution among Terre-tenants. The question whether purchasers, at different times, of land bound by an incumbrance created by the grantor, stand in equal equity as regards this incumbrance, and if so, must each contribute proportionately to its discharge, has been settled in England in the affirmative, following the rule laid down in the Year Books and repeated in Coke's Reports: 2 Wms. Saund. p. 10, n.; 3 Rep. 14 b. In this country, the opposite view has been taken; 1 Johns. Ch. 467; 5 id. 235; 10 S. & R. 450; 20 Pa. 222. See Lecture before Phila. Law Acad. 1863, by G. W. Biddle, LL.D.

TERRIER. In English Law. A roll, catalogue, or survey of lands, belonging either to a single person or a town, in which are stated the quantity of acres, the names of the tenants, and the like.

One of the old records in the office of the recorder of deeds of Philadelphia County is still called the Germantown Terrier. In it will be found the Latin Dedication of Pastorius, quoted by Whittier, in the Pennsylvania Pilgrim.

By the ecclesiastical law, an inquiry is directed to be made from time to time of the temporal rights of the clergymen of every parish, and to be returned into the registry of the bishop: this return is denominated a terrier. 1 Phill. Ev. 602.

TERRITORIAL COURTS. The courts established in the territories of the United States. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

TERRITORIAL PROPERTY. The land and water over which the state has jurisdiction and control whether the legal title be in the state itself or in private individuals. Lakes and waters wholly within the state are its property and also the marginal sea within the three-mile limit, but bays and gulfs are not always recognized as state property.

TERRITORIAL WATERS. It is difficult to draw any precise conclusion as to the distance to which a state may lawfully extend its exclusive dominion over the sea adjoining its territories, and beyond those portions of the sea which are embraced by harbors, etc., over which it has unquestioned jurisdiction. All that can reasonably be asserted is that it extends as far as may be requisite for its safety, and for some lawful end. According to the current of modern authority, it extends as far as a cannon shot will reach —i. e. a marine league; 1 Kent 29; this limit was fixed when that was the range of a cannon; 41 Ohio St. 81; it is said that it can be extended as the range of cannon increases; Hall. Int. L. 157. It may be extended for protection in time of war, or for revenue purposes; 139 U. S. 240; 41 Fed. Rep. 109. It has been said that the United States can attach to its coast an extent into the sea beyond the reach of cannon shot; 1 Kent 29; and congress has recognized this limit by legislation as to captures made within a marine league of the shore; id.

State legislation in Massachusetts which extends the territorial limit of a state three miles seaward from the shore is valid; 139 U. S. 240; i. e. it may extend its territorial limits and the boundaries of its counties to the extent of the limits of the United States. So of a California act relating to a crime committed within the same limit; 60 Fed. Rep. 42. Parliament "may extend the realm how far soever it may please;" 2 Ex. D. 152. Under the Behring Sea Arbitration, it was decided that the United States cannot protect seals in the open sea beyond the three-mile limit.

It would not be unreasonable for the United States to assume control of the waters on the coast included within distant headlands, as from Cape Ann to Cape Cod, Nantucket to Montauk Point, and from the latter to the Capes of the Delaware; 1 Kent 30.

"As between nations, the minimum limit of the territorial jurisdiction of a nation over tide waters is a marine league from the coast, and bays wholly within its territory which do not exceed two marine leagues at the mouth are within this limit." 139 U. S. 240. The Gulf of Mexico is part of the Atlantic Ocean; 121 U. S. 67; but, on the other hand, the exclusive right of the British crown to the Bristol Channel, to the channel between Ireland and Great Britain, and between Scotland and Ireland, is uncontested; 1 Phill. Int. L. § 189; and Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay are not a part of the high sea; 1 Whart. Int. L. § 28; Narragansett Bay is claimed, by usage, to be within the jurisdiction of Rhode Island; 16 Wall. 522; 9 R. I. 419; and Conception Bay in Newfoundland, though more than 20 miles wide at its mouth and nearly 50 miles long, is British territory; 2 App. Cas. 394. It is probable that the Delaware and Chesapeake bays are the property of the United States, and England claims complete jurisdiction over the bays of Chaleur, Fortune, and Conception, and some other bays of Newfoundland, as closed seas; Snow, Int. Law 27. The Zuyder Zee and Hudson's Bay are probably parts of the territory of the nations which surround them; while the bays of Fundy and Chaleur are public; 3 Whart. Int. L. 28, 304, 305 a. The claim of Russia to sovereignty over the Pacific Ocean north of the 51st degree of latitude has been considered by the United States as against the rights of other nations; 1 Kent 29. See 1895 Rep. Society for Reform and Codif. of the Laws, 17th meeting; 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 946; PILOT; JURISDICTION.

TERRITORY. A part of a country separated from the rest and subject to a particular jurisdiction.

A portion of the country subject to and belonging to the United States which is not within the boundary of any state or the District of Columbia.

The constitution of the United States, art. 4, s. 3, provides that the congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be construed so as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any state.

The United States has supreme sovereignty over a territory, and congress has full and complete legislative authority over its people and government; 136 U. S. 1.

Congress possesses the power to erect territorial governments within the territory of the United States: the power of congress over such territory is exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, unless in the case of ceded territory, as far as it may be affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled; Story, Const. § 1322; Rawle, Const. 237; 1 Kent 243, 359; 1 Pet. 511. Congress has plenary legislative power over the territories of the United States, and upon the admission of a territory into the Union, may, if it so desires, effect a collective naturalization of its foreign-born inhabitants as citizens of the United States; 143 U. S. 135.

The power of the United States to acquire territory by any means known to international law would seem to be beyond question. An interesting historical reference to the subject was made by Henry Hitchcock in an address before the University of Michigan in 1889.

"It is a matter of history that when Mr. Jefferson, in 1803, purchased the Louisiana territory from France, his own belief was that he had (in his own words) 'done an act beyond the constitution,' and he was not only anxious that the acquisition of Louisiana should be sanctioned and the future annexation of Florida authorized by an amendment to the constitution, but privately submitted to his party friends the draft of such an amendment, though in his message to congress submitting the treaty for ratification he did not mention the constitutional difficulty. But the popularity of the measure secured the ratification of the treaty and all necessary legislation to enforce it without further question. Twenty-five years later, the question was presented in the supreme court in the American Insurance Company v. Canter, with reference to the validity and effect of the treaty of 1819, by which Spain had ceded Florida to the United States. Marshall answered it in these brief words: 'The constitution confers absolutely on the government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently that government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or by treaty;' 1 Peters 511, 542."

In the case of the Alaska liquor laws the question was recently (1898) before the circuit court of appeals in the ninth circuit, and it was held as a "well-established doctrine" that "the territories of the United States are entirely subject to the legislative authority of congress. They are not organized under the constitution, nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creation, exclusively, of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control.... It [congress] may legislate in accordance with the special needs of each locality, and vary its regulations to meet the conditions and circumstances of the people.... In a territory all the functions of government are within the legislative jurisdiction of congress, and may be exercised though a local government or directly;" 86 Fed. Rep. 456, citing 16 How. 164; 101 U. S. 129; 114 id. 15; 136 id. 1; 141 id. 174; 152 id. 1.

When New Mexico was conquered by the United States it was only the allegiance of the people that was changed, their relation to each other and their property rights remained unchanged. The executive of the United States properly established a provincial government which ordained laws and instituted a judicial system, which continued in force until modified by the direct action of congress or by the territorial government established by it; 20 How. 176. See the articles on the various territories; 12 Harv. L. Rev. 205; STATE; SOVEREIGNTY.

TERROR. The state of the mind which arises from an event or phenomenon that may serve as a prognostic of some catastrophe; affright from apparent danger.

See RIOT; ROBBERY; PUTTING IN FEAR.

TERTIUS INTERVENIENS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who, claiming an interest to the subject or thing in dispute in action between other parties, asserts his right to act with the plaintiff, to be joined with him, and to recover the matter in dispute, because he has an interest in it; or to join the defendant, and with him oppose the interest of the plaintiff, which it is his interest to defeat. He differs from the intervenor, or him who interpleads in equity. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3819, note.

TEST. Something by which to ascertain the truth respecting another thing. 7 Pa. 428.

TEST ACT. The act of 25 Car. II. c. 2, by which it was enacted that all persons holding any office, civil or military (excepting some very inferior ones), or receiving pay from the crown, or holding a place of trust under it, should take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and receive the sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, under a penalty of £500 and disability to the office. 4 Bla. Com. 59. Abolished 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, so far as taking the sacrament is concerned, and a new form of declaration substituted. Mozl. & W.

TESTA DE NEVIL. An ancient and authentic record in two volumes, in the custody of the queen's remembrancer in the exchequer, said to be compiled by John de Nevil, a justice itinerant, in the eighteenth and twenty-fourth years of Henry III. Cowel.

TESTACY. The state or condition of leaving a will at one's death, as opposed to intestacy.

TESTAMENT. In Civil Law. The appointment of an executor or testamentary heir, according to the formalities prescribed by law. Domat, liv. 1, tit. 1, s. 1.

At first there were only two sorts of testaments among the Romans,—that called calatis comitiis, and another called in procinctu. (See below.) In the course of time, these two sorts of testament having become obsolete, a third form was introduced, called per æs et libram, which was a fictitious sale of the inheritance to the heir apparent. The inconveniences which were experienced from these fictitious sales again changed the form of testament: and the prætor introduced another, which required the seal of seven witnesses. The emperors having increased the solemnity of these testaments, they were called written or solemn testaments, to distinguish them from nuncupative testaments, which could be made without writing. Afterwards military testaments were introduced, in favor of soldiers actually engaged in military service.

A testament calatis comitiis, or made in the comitia,—that is, the assembly of the Roman people,—was an ancient manner of making wills used in times of peace among the Romans. The comitia met twice a year for this purpose. Those who wished to make such testaments caused to be convoked the assembly of the people by these words, calatis comitiis. None could make such wills that were not entitled to be at the assemblies of the people. This form of testament was repealed by the law of the Twelve Tables.

A civil testament is one made according to all the forms prescribed by law, in contradistinction to a military testament, in making which some of the forms may be dispensed with. Civil testaments are more ancient than military ones; the former were in use during the time of Romulus, the latter were introduced during the time of Coriolanus. See Hist. de la Jurisp. Rom. de M. Terrasson, p. 119

A common testament is one which is made jointly by several persons. Such testaments are forbidden in Louisiana, Civ. Code of La. art. 1565, and by the laws of France, Code Civ. 968, in the same words, namely: "A testament cannot be made by the same act, by two or more persons, either for the benefit of a third person, or under the title of a reciprocal or mutual disposition."

A testament ab irato is one made in a gust of passion or hatred against the presumptive heir, rather than from a desire to benefit the devisee. When the facts of unreasonable anger are proved, the will is annulled as unjust and as not having been freely made. See AB IRATO.

A mystic testament (called a solemn testament, because it requires more formality than a nuncupative testament) is a form of making a will which consists principally in enclosing it in an envelope and sealing it in the presence of witnesses.

A nuncupative testament was one made verbally. See NUNCUPATIVE WILL.

An olographic testament is one which is written wholly by the testator himself. In order to be valid, it must be entirely written, dated and signed by the hand of the testator. It is subject to no other form. See La. Civ. Code, art. 1581.

TESTAMENTARY. Belonging to a testament; as, a testamentary gift; a testamentary guardian.

TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY. Mental capacity sufficient for making a valid will. As to what constitutes, see WILLS; UNDUE INFLUENCE; 12 Am. L. Reg. 385.

TESTAMENTARY CAUSES. Causes relating to probate of testaments and administration and accounts upon the same. They are enumerated among ecclesiastical causes by Lord Coke. 5 Co. 1. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

TESTAMENTARY GUARDIAN. A guardian appointed by last will of a father to have custody of his child and his real and personal estate till he attains the age of twenty-one. In England, the power to appoint such guardian was given by 12 Car. II. c. 34. The principles of this statute have been generally adopted in the United States.

TESTAMENTARY PAPER. An instrument in the nature of a will; an unprobated will.

TESTAMENTARY POWER. The power to make a will is neither a natural nor a constitutional right, but depends wholly upon statute. 100 Mass. 284. Such power has been expressly conferred by statute in most of the states, in some cases unrestricted, in others with various restrictions by reason of dower and homestead rights, and for other reasons; 3 Jarm. Wills 721, 731.

TESTAMENTI FACTIO (Lat.). In the Civil Law. The ceremony of making a testament, either as testator, heir, or witness.

TESTATE. The condition of one who leaves a valid will at his death.

TESTATOR. One who has made a testament or will.

See DEVISOR; DURESS; FEME COVERT; IDIOT; WILL.

TESTATRIX. A woman who has made a will or testament.

TESTATUM (Lat.). The name of a writ which is issued by the court of one county to the sheriff of another county in the same state, when the defendant cannot be found in the county where the court is located: for example, after a judgment has been obtained, and a ca. sa. has been issued, which has been returned non est inventus, a testatum ca. sa. may be issued to the sheriff of the county where the defendant is. See Viner, Abr. Testatum 259.

In Conveyancing. That part of a deed which commences with the words "This indenture witnesseth."

TESTE MEIPSO. (Lat.). In Old English Law and Practice. A solemn formula of attestation by the sovereign, used at the conclusion of charters, and other public instruments, and also of original writs, out of chancery. Spelm.

TESTE OF A WRIT. In Practice. The concluding clause, commencing with the word witness, etc. A signature in attestation of the fact that a writ is issued by authority. A writ which bears the teste is sometimes said to be tested.

The act of congress of May 8, 1792, directs that all writs and process issuing from the supreme or a circuit court shall bear teste of the chief justice of the supreme court, or, if that office be vacant, of the associate justice next in precedence; and that all writs of process issuing from a district court shall bear teste of the judge of such court, or, if the said office be vacant, of the clerk thereof. See R. S. §§ 911, 912.

TESTES. Witnesses.

TESTIFY. To give evidence according to law. A witness testifying in regard to conversations had with a party must state either the language used, or the substance of it. The impression left upon his mind by the conversation is not evidence. 33 Md. 135.

TESTIMONIAL PROOF. In Civil Law. A term used in the same sense as parol evidence is used at common law and in contradistinction to literal proof, which is written evidence.

TESTIMONIUM CLAUSE. That clause of a deed or instrument with which it concludes.

TESTIMONY. The statement made by a witness under oath or affirmation.

The statement of a witness under oath; yet it need not necessarily be made to a judicial tribunal. Thus, a deposition may contain testimony, although never used in the cause pending; 134 Ind. 35. It is a species of evidence by means of witnesses; 43 La. Ann. 1078, 1194.

Testimony and evidence are synonymous, but evidence includes testimony, as well as all other kinds of proof. It seems settled, both in England and this country, that a prisoner may be convicted on the testimony of an accomplice alone, though the court may, at its discretion, advise an acquittal unless such testimony is corroborated on material points; Tay. Ev. 830–832. See 11 Harv. L. Rev. 169; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 441. See EVIDENCE; EXPERTS.

TESTIS. A witness. Testari: to be a witness, bear witness to; to be witnessed, shown, certified. Anderson, L. Dict.

TESTMOIGNE. This is an old and barbarous French word, signifying, in the old books, evidence. Comyns, Dig. Testmoigne.

TEXAS. The name of one of the states of the American Union.

It was a province of Mexico until 1836, when the inhabitants established a separate republic. On March, 1845, the congress of the United States, by a joint resolution, submitted to the new republic a proposition providing for the erection of the territory of Texas into a new state, and for its annexation under the name of the state of Texas. This proposition was accepted by the existing government of Texas on the 23d of June, 1845, and was ratified by the people in convention on the 6th of July. On the 29th of December following, by a joint resolution of congress, the new state was formally admitted into the Union. The present constitution of the state was adopted by a convention, on November 24, 1875, and was voted upon and accepted by the people on February 17, 1876.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative power of the state is vested in a senate and house of representatives. The senate consists of thirty-one members, and cannot be increased above this number. The house of representatives, at the adoption of the constitution, consisted of ninety-three members, but may be increased after any apportionment upon the ratio of not more than one representative for every fifteen thousand inhabitants; provided, the number never exceeds one hundred and fifty.

The regular sessions of the legislature take place biennially. Extra sessions may be called by the governor at any time.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The executive department of the state consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, comptroller, treasurer, commissioner of general land office, and attorney-general.

The Governor is elected at the time and places of elections for members of the legislature, for two years.

A Lieutenant-Governor is chosen at every election for governor, who succeeds the governor in case of vacancy.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power is vested in one supreme court, in courts of civil appeals, in courts of criminal appeals, in district courts, in county courts, in commissioners' courts, in courts of justices of the peace, and in such other courts as may be established by law.

The Supreme Court consists of a chief justice and two associate justices, any two of whom form a quorum, and the concurrence of two judges is necessary to the decision of a case.

The supreme court has appellate jurisdiction only, co-extensive with the limits of the state; it only extends to questions of law arising in civil cases of which the courts of civil appeals have appellate but not final jurisdiction. It and the judges thereof have the power to issue writs of mandamus, and all other writs necessary to enforce its jurisdiction.

The Courts of Civil Appeals are composed of a chief justice and two associate justices, elected for six years. The state is divided into five supreme judicial districts, in each of which is held a court of civil appeals. The appellate jurisdiction of these courts extends to civil cases within the respective districts where the district court has original or appellate jurisdiction; where the county court has original jurisdiction, and where it has appellate jurisdiction when the amount in controversy exceeds one hundred dollars.

The Court of Criminal Appeals consists of three judges, who have the same qualifications as judges of the supreme court; they are elected for six years. This court has appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases to enforce its own jurisdiction.

District Courts.—The state is divided into fifty-five judicial districts, each having one judge. It has original jurisdiction in criminal cases of the grade of felony; of all suits in behalf of the state to recover penalties, forfeitures, and escheats; of all cases of divorce; in cases of misdemeanor involving official misconduct; of all suits to recover damages for slander or defamation of character; of all suits for the trial of title to land, and for the enforcement of liens thereon; of all suits for trial to right of property levied on by virtue of any writ of execution, sequestration, or attachment, when the property levied on shall be equal to or exceed in value five hundred dollars; and of all suits, complaints, or pleas whatsoever, without regard to any distinction between law and equity, when the matter in controversy shall be valued at or amount to five hundred dollars exclusive of interest; of contested elections. It has appellate jurisdiction and general control in probate matters over the county courts, and original jurisdiction and general control, over executors, administrators, guardians, and minors, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislature.

The County Courts have exclusive original jurisdiction in civil cases when the matter in controversy is between two hundred and five hundred dollars in value, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district court when the amount exceeds five hundred dollars and is less than one thousand dollars; it also has certain appellate jurisdiction over justices' courts. The judges of these courts are elected in each county by the qualified voters for a term of two years.

TEXTUS ROFFENSIS. An ancient manuscript containing many of the Saxon laws, and the rights, customs, tenures, etc., of the church of Rochester, drawn up by Ernulph, bishop of that see from 1114 to 1124. Cowel.

THAINLAND. In Old English Law. The land which was granted by the Saxon kings to their thains or thanes was so called.

THANE. In Saxon Law. A word which sometimes signifies a nobleman, at others a freeman, a magistrate, an officer, or minister. A tenant of the part of the king's lands called the king's "thaneage." Termes de la Ley.

THAVIES INN. See INNS OF COURT.

THE. An article which particularizes the subject spoken of. "Grammatical niceties should not be resorted to without necessity; but it would be extending liberality to an unwarrantable length to confound the articles 'a' and 'the.' The most unlettered persons understand that 'a' is indefinite but 'the' refers to a certain object." 2 Binn. 516, per Tilghman, C. J. It will not be construed as equivalent to "this"; 24 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 290.

THEATRE. A house for the exhibition of dramatic performances. 121 Pa. 225. See 4 St. L. 126.

An edifice used for the purpose of dramatic, operatic, or other representations, plays, or performances for admission to which entrance money is received. The word does not import necessarily anything but the stage on which the actors play and the room in which the acting is done and seen. 56 Ga. 477. Although the term has an extended signification and comprehends a variety of performances, yet it is conceived that all which it does legitimately comprehend partake more or less of the character of the drama. 22 Ala. 73. A music hall is not a theatre: 21 Q. B. D. 569. Theatrical performances may include negro minstrel performances; 4 Lea 312; but not tumbling or fencing; 6 T. R. 286. Where a statute prohibits the obstruction of passage-ways in a theatre, it should be literally construed, and does not give the proprietor any discretion to allow persons to stand in the passage-ways, even though the number be not so great as to prevent free exit in case of danger; 14 Daly 125. That a number of seats for a performance were sold after knowledge that the seats were filled is sufficient proof to sustain a judgment, in the absence of evidence that such sale was in opposition to defendant's wishes; id. A theatre ticket is a mere license to enter the house and witness the performance and may be revoked at the pleasure of the manager; 12 Gray 221; 51 N. Y. 246; 13 M. & W. 838; but see 93 Pa. 234, where it was held that the purchaser of a particular seat in a theatre acquired more than a mere license; that his right was more in the nature of a lease, entitling him to peaceful ingress and egress and exclusive possession of the designated seats during the performance.

Spectators may express their feelings by applause or hissing, but if any number of persons come to a theatre with a preconcerted design of making a disturbance, though no personal violence is offered, they are guilty of a riot; Wandell, Theatres 238.

A visitor is entitled to a seat. This right depends on the nature of his ticket. If it is for a reserved seat, he has a right to that particular seat; if not reserved, then to any one which he may find unoccupied and which has not been previously sold to another; 10 Phila. 180. A return check given to one after the performance commences may be transferred by the spectator to some other person; 12 Cent. L. J. 359; but the holder of a return check cannot transfer the same if the original ticket of admission was non-transferable; Wandell, Theatres 246. The proprietor has the right to annex to tickets of admission the condition that they shall not be transferable, and if transferred, that they shall be worthless; 19 Abb. N. C. 301; for a license is personal to the licensee and is not salable nor transferable; 51 N. Y. 250. It has been held that the proprietor is not liable to a patron for property left in his private box which was stolen; 39 N. Y. Supp. 1039.

THEFT. A popular term for larceny. Acts constituting embezzlement or swindling may be properly so called. 21 Tex. App. 133. See 1 id. 68.

In Scotch Law. The secret and felonious abstraction of the property of another for sake of lucre, without his consent. Alison, Cr. Law 250.

THEFT-BOTE. The act of receiving a man's goods from the thief, after they had been stolen by him, with the intent that he shall escape punishment. This is an offence punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment. Hale, Pl. Cr. 130.

THELONMANNUS. The toll-man or officer who receives toll. Cowel.

THELUSSON ACT. The stat. 39 & 40 Geo. III., passed in consequence of objections to a Mr. Thelusson's will for the purpose of preventing the creation of perpetuities. See PERPETUITY; 4 Ves. 221.

THEME. The power of jurisdiction over naifs or villeins and their suits, offspring, lands, goods, and chattels. Co. Litt. 116 a.

THEMMAGIUM. A duty or acknowledgment paid by inferior tenant in respect of theme or team. Cowel.

THEN. As an adverb, means "at that time," referring to a time specified, either past or future. 16 S. C. 329. See 128 Mass. 40. It may also denote a contingency and be equivalent to "in that event." 20 N. J. L. 505; it may sometimes mean "soon after"; 8 Hun 43; or "further". 2 Jarm. 595. In a will it has been held to import the time at which the class described is to be ascertained; 3 Ves. 486; but see 17 Beav. 417.

THEN AND THERE. Words of reference, and when the time and place have once been named with certainty, it is sufficient to refer to them afterwards by these words. 24 N. H. 146. Where an averment merely declares a legal conclusion, the words "then and there" need not be repeated to it. 78 Me. 74.

THENCE. In surveying, and in description of land by courses and distances, this word preceding each course given, imports that the following course is continuous with the one before it. 141 Mass. 66; 6 N. E. Rep. 702.

THEOCRACY. A species of government which claims to be immediately directed by God.

THEOWES, THEOWMEN, THEWS. Slaves, captives, or bondmen. Spelm. Feuds.

THEREUPON. Without delay or lapse of time. 133 Mass. 205. See 47 Kan. 340. Immediately. 9 L. J. Ex. 272; 6 M. & W. 492. See 3 Q. B. 79, where the terms thereupon and thereby are distinguished.

THEREWITH. As used in the reform act; 2 W. IV. c. 45; referring to house, etc., the clause that any land occupied therewith, has reference to time and not to locality. 22 L. J. C. P. 38; 50 id. 117.

THESAURUS, THESARIUM. A treasure.

THESAURUS INVENTUS. Treasure-trove (q. v.).

THESMOTHETE. A law-maker; a law-giver.

THIEF. One who has been guilty of larceny or theft. The term covers both compound and simple larceny. 1 Hill 25.

THINGS. By this word is understood every object, except man, which may become an active subject of right. Code du Canton de Berne, art. 332. In this sense it is opposed, in the language of the law, to the word persons. See CHOSE; PROPERTY; RES.

THINGUS. In Saxon Law. A thane or nobleman; knight or freeman. Cowel.

THINK. To believe, to consider, to esteem. 59 Ia. 414.

THIRD-BOROW. In Old English Law. A constable. Lombard, Duty of Const. 6; 28 Hen. VIII. c. 10.

THIRD-NIGHT-AWN-HINDE. By the laws of St. Edward the Confessor, if any man lay a third night in an inn, he was called a "third-night-awn-hinde," and his host was answerable for him if he committed any offence. The first night he was reckoned a stranger; the second night a guest; and the third night an awn-hinde. Bract. l. 3; Whart.

THIRD PARTIES. A term used to include all persons who are not parties to the contract, agreement, or instrument of writing by which their interest in the thing conveyed is sought to be affected. 1 Mart. La. N. S. 384.

But it is difficult to give a very definite idea of third persons; for sometimes those who are not parties to the contract, but who represent the rights of the original parties, as executors, are not to be considered third persons. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1335.

THIRD PENNY. Of the fines and other profits of the county courts (originally, when those courts had superior jurisdiction, before other courts were created) two parts were reserved to the king, and a third part or penny to the earl of the county. See Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 418.

THIRLAGE. In Scotch Law. A servitude by which lands are astricted or thirled to a particular mill and the possessors bound to grind their grain there, for the payment of certain multures and sequels as the agreed price of grinding. Erskine, Inst. 2. 9. 18.

THIS. When referring to different things before expressed, "this" refers to the thing last mentioned, and "that" to the thing first mentioned. 66 Pa. 251. It is a simple word of relation and its ordinary grammatical meaning will not be extended so as to include something else than that to which it relates. 14 Q. B. D. 720.

THOLED AN ASSIZE. A plea in bar in Scotland in a criminal case to the effect that the accused has once been tried for the offence charged. 35 Am. L. Reg. 629.

THOROUGHFARE. A street or way opening at both ends into another street or public highway, so that one can go through and get out of it without returning. It differs from a cul de sac, which is open only at one end.

Whether a street which is not a thoroughfare is a highway seems not fully settled; 1 Ventr. 189. In a case tried in 1790 where the locus in quo had been used as a common street for fifty years, but was no thoroughfare, Lord Kenyon held that it would make no difference; for otherwise the street would be a trap to make people trespassers; 11 East 375. This decision in several subsequent cases was much criticised, though not directly overruled; 5 Taunt. 126; 5 B. & Ald. 456; 3 Bingh. 447; 1 Camp. 260; 4 Ad. & E. 698. But in a recent English case the decision of Lord Kenyon was affirmed by the unanimous opinion of the court of queen's bench. The doctrine established in the latter case is that it is a question for the jury on the evidence, whether a place which is not a thoroughfare is a highway or not; 14 E. L. & E. 69. And see 28 id. 30. The United States authorities seem to follow the English; 8 Allen 242; 24 N. Y. 559 (overruling 23 Barb. 103); 87 Ill. 189; s. c. 29 Am. Rep. 49 and note; contra, 2 R. I. 172. See HIGHWAY; STREET.

THOUSAND. This word may by custom or usage of trade acquire a peculiar meaning, as when applied to rabbits it has been held to denote one hundred dozen; 3 B. & Ad. 728.

THREAD. A figurative expression used to signify the central line of a stream or watercourse. See FILUM AQUÆ; WATERCOURSE; RIVER.

THREAT. A menace of destruction or injury to the lives, character, or property of those against whom it is made. To extort money under threat of charging the prosecutor with an unnatural crime has been held to be robbery; 1 Park. Cr. R. 199; but to extort money or other valuable thing by threat of prosecution for passing counterfeit money, or any prosecution except that for an unnatural crime, is not robbery; 7 Humph. 45; though it is a criminal offence; 11 Mod. 137; 2 Dall. 399, n. It must be under such circumstances as to operate, to some extent at least, on the mind of the one whom it is expected to influence. The meaning of the word implies that it is a menace of some kind, which in some manner comes to the knowledge of the one sought to be affected; 84 Ia. 473. See THREATENING LETTER.

In Evidence. Menace. See CONFESSION.

THREATENING LETTER. Sending threatening letters to persons for the purpose of extorting money is said to be a misdemeanor at common law. 4 Bla. Com. 126. The threat must be of a nature calculated to overcome a firm and prudent man; but this rule has reference to the general nature of the evil threatened, and not to the probable effect of the threat on the mind of the particular party addressed; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 512. The party who makes a threat may be held to bail for his good behavior. See Com. Dig. Battery (D).

By act of congress of Sept. 26, 1888, the sending of any postal card or mail matter with threatening language on the outside thereof is forbidden and made punishable by fine and imprisonment; R. S. 1 Supp. 621. Postal cards held within the act were: One from a creditor threatening to "place the claim with our law agency for collection;" 40 Fed. Rep. 664: demanding payment and threatening to place it in the hands of a lawyer for collection; id. Held not within the act: notice that a debt is past due and that a collector has called several times; id.; and notice that rent was due and if not paid would be placed in the hands of an officer; 51 id. 817. Extraneous evidence is not admissible to show that the language of a postal card on its face threatening or abusive, was not so intended by the sender, and not so understood by the recipient; 2 Mo. App. Repr. 980.

Statutes exist in many of the United States, though they vary somewhat in their provisions, some of them requiring the threatening to have been done "maliciously," others "knowingly." The indictment for this offence need not specify the crime threatened to be charged, for the specific nature of the crime which the prisoner intended to charge might intentionally be left in doubt; 3 Heisk. 262; 8 Barb. 547. The threat need not be to accuse before a judicial tribunal; 2 M. & R. 14; 30 Mich. 460. A person whose property has been stolen has himself no power to punish the thief without process of law, and cannot claim the right to obtain compensation for the loss of his property by maliciously threatening to accuse him of the offence, or to do an injury to his person or property, with intent to extort property from him; 24 Me. 71; 128 Mass. 55. A mere threat that the prosecutor would be indicted or complained of has been held to be within the statute, even though no distinct crime was spoken of in the letter, because of the likelihood of threatening letters being written with as much disguise and artifice as possible, but still being sufficient to accomplish the purpose intended; 68 Me. 473; 68 Mo. 66. See 3 Cr. L. Mag. 720; WHIPPING.

THREE-DOLLAR PIECE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of three dollars.

The three-dollar piece was authorized by the seventh section of the act of Feb. 21, 1853. 10 Stat. at L. It is of the same fineness as the other gold coins of the United States. The weight of the coin is 77.4 grains.

The three-dollar piece is a legal tender in payment of any amount; R. S. § 3511.

THREE-MILE LIMIT. See SEAL FISHERIES; TERRITORIAL WATERS.

THRESHING MACHINE. The term includes the horse power by means of which the separator is propelled. 15 Neb. 428.

THROAT. In Medical Jurisprudence. The anterior part of the neck. Dunglison, Med. Dict.; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 97, n.

The word throat, in an indictment which charged the defendant with murder by cutting the throat of the deceased, does not mean, and is not to be confined to, that part of the neck which is scientifically called the throat, but signifies that which is commonly called the throat. 6 C. & P. 401.

THRITHING. The third part of a county consisting of three or more hundreds. Cowel. Corrupted to the modern "riding," which is still used in Yorkshire. 1 Bla. Com. 116.

THROUGH. It has been held to be equivalent to "over" in a statute providing for laying out the road through certain grounds; 119 Ill. 147; and it may mean within; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788.

THURINGIAN CODE. See CODE.

TICK. Credit: as, if a servant usually buy for the master upon tick, and the servant buy something without the master's order, yet if the master were trusted by the trader he is liable; 3 Kebl. 625; 10 Mod. 111.

TICKET. A railroad ticket may be a receipt or voucher, rather than a contract; 5 L. R. A. 818; 77 Mo. 663; 41 Ohio St. 560; it is the evidence of a contract, but does not constitute the whole contract; 34 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 219; Wheeler, Carriers 263; 15 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 899; it may contain some condition or limitation which becomes a part of the contract; 13 Hun 359; 118 Pa. 519; 1 Harv. Law Rev. 17. The actual contract may be shown by parol testimony; 143 U. S. 60; 80 Ia. 92. The purchaser of a railroad ticket has a right to rely upon the statements of the agent; 21 Oreg. 121; 52 Fed. Rep. 197; 106 Mass. 153. Agents at intermediate stations and gatekeepers cannot vary the terms of the contract; 137 Mass. 293; 63 Md. 106.

A ticket good between two designated stations, upon trains which stop at such points, entitles the holder thereof to ride from intermediate stations to either of said stations, or from such stations to intermediate stations, regardless of conditions in the ticket to the contrary; 26 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 358. But where a ticket provided that it should be forfeited if used for any other station than the one named, it was held that a passenger who rode on it to a point beyond the station named, paying his fare for the additional distance, was liable for the fare for the entire distance travelled; [1895] 1 Q. B. 863. One who takes the wrong train by mistake can leave it at the first stopping-place, without payment of fare; this rule does not apply to one who has a season ticket and takes a train believing that it is good on that train; 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 20. Where a mileage book purchased by one person is sold to another who presents it, the conductor cannot take it up, but may collect full fare; 55 Alb. L. J. 164. As between a conductor and a passenger, a ticket is conclusive as to the right of the latter to travel; 15 Ill. App. 100; 50 Fed. Rep. 496;

15 Ind. App. 366. As a rule a passenger has a right to presume that a ticket agent will perform his whole duty and is not bound to examine his ticket to see that it is correct, unless put upon his inquiry; 70 Fed. Rep. 585; 166 Pa. 4; 77 Ga. 673. When a carrier has notified a connecting carrier that it will not recognize the tickets of the latter, it may refuse to accept such tickets; 157 U. S. 225.

A ticket defaced by a passenger so as to be unintelligible, may be refused; 76 Md. 207. A carrier may specify upon what trains a ticket is good; 61 Vt. 378; or charge fare for the actual distance travelled, if a passenger takes a wrong train; 40 Ind. 37; it must stop at a station for which it has sold a ticket; 79 Va. 130. A purchaser for value and without notice, of a ticket fraudulently obtained from a carrier, acquires no title thereto; 36 Ohio St. 647. A passenger who accepts a ticket and signs it is bound by the conditions expressed in it; 133 U. S. 146; 47 Ind. 79; if such conditions are reasonable; 100 U. S. 24; but not if he is unable to read, and no explanation is made by the agent who sells it; 23 Fed. Rep. 765; or if he is misled by the carrier; 30 N. W. Rep. (Ind.) 424. There is no presumption that the passenger has read a notice on his ticket; 12 Gray 388; 48 N. Y. 212. See 60 Fed. Rep. 624; but see 46 L. J. C. P. 768.

Where the conditions of a ticket are such that an innocent holder thereof may use it, it is the subject of embezzlement; 43 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 499.

A passenger having lost his ticket cannot show by others that he purchased it; 14 Lea 128. The rule which requires the production of a ticket is reasonable; 97 Mich. 439; 15 N. Y. 455; 31 Ill. App. 435; [1896] 1 Q. B. 253; reasonable time to produce one should be given; 31 Ill. App. 435; a conductor is not bound to search the pockets of a passenger to find his ticket; 14 Lea 128. A passenger may be required to exhibit his ticket before entering a train; 1 Ill. App. 472, 449; 2 Tex. App. 206; and if he exhibits his ticket and demands a seat he has a right to a seat before he surrenders it; 53 Mo. 317.

A passenger cannot stop over at an intermediate station unless such right is conferred by his contract; 51 Cal. 425; 24 N. J. L. 435; 13 Hun 359; 34 Md. 532. A purchaser of a limited ticket over connecting lines is only bound to make a continuous trip over the part of the route covered by each coupon of the ticket, but must complete the trip within the time limited in the ticket; 43 Ark. 529; 67 Ill. 393; 18 L. R. A. 55.

When a carrier furnishes facilities, it may require a passenger to purchase a ticket before entering a train; 75 Ill. 125; 53 Me. 279; 17 Mo. App. 158; 46 Ind. 293; 132 Mass. 116. It must keep a ticket office open for a reasonable time before the departure of trains; 90 Ia. 562; 67 Ill. 316; 15 Minn. 496.

A statute regulating the issuance and taking up of tickets by carriers is an exercise of the police power; 63 Ind. 552; and does not impair the obligation of contracts nor interfere with commerce between the states; id.

A statute limiting the sale of passage tickets and tickets for sleeping accommodations on vessels and railway trains to authorized agents is not in violation of the provisions of the constitution of the United States prohibiting the depriving of citizens of the rights of liberty, property, or the equal protection of the law, nor does it confer a special privilege upon any class of persons; 145 U. S. 263; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1541; 149 Ill. 600; 57 Minn. 345; 63 Ind. 552; 14 Phila. 384; nor does it create a monopoly; 50 N. Y. S. 56; but see Tiedm. Lim. Pol. Pow. 293.

The Michigan supreme court holds that a railroad company cannot be compelled to sell mileage books at a flat two-cent rate; the company's right to fix its tolls is a vested right which the state must pay for if it takes it away; Asso. Press Despatch, Oct. 3, 1898.

A ticket sold at a reduced rate on condition that it is not transferable is not valid in the hands of a transferee; 43 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 901.

The holder of a ticket from Trenton to Elmira was injured in Pennsylvania through defendant's negligence; it was held that his right to recover was governed by the law of Pennsylvania; 176 Pa. 45.

See BAGGAGE; PASSENGER; COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS; INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; RATES.

TICKETS OF LEAVE. Licenses to be at large, granted to convicts for good conduct, but recallable upon subsequent misconduct. Whart. Dict. See PRISONER. As to a similiar practice in the United States, see PAROLE.

TIDE LANDS. Lands covered and uncovered by the flow and ebb of the tide. The United States may grant, for appropriate purposes, titles or rights in the soil below high-water mark of tide waters. But they have never done so by general laws, and, unless in some case of international duty or public exigency, have acted upon the policy of leaving the administration and disposition of the sovereign rights in navigable waters, and in the soil under them, to the control of the states, respectively, when organized and admitted into the Union; 153 U. S. 273.

The words "public lands," as used in legislation, mean such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws, and not tide lands; 92 U. S. 761; 125 U. S. 618. Tide lands are not subject to the location of land scrip under the act of 1872; 153 U. S. 273, 287.

TIDE-WATER. Water which flows and reflows with the tide. All arms of the sea, bays, creeks, coves, or rivers, in which the tide ebbs and flows, are properly denominated tide-waters.

The term tide-water is not limited to water which is salt, but embraces, also, so much of the water of fresh rivers as is propelled backwards by the ingress and pressure of the tide; 5 Co. 107; 108 Mass. 436; which might be said to be within the ebb and flow; 7 Pet. 324. The flowing, however, of the waters of a lake into a river do not constitute such a river a tidal or, technically, navigable river; 20 Johns. 98.

The bed or soil of all tide-waters belongs, in England, to the crown, and in this country to the state in which they lie; and the waters themselves are public; so that all persons may use the same for the purpose of navigation and fishery, unless restrained by law; 5 B. & A. 304; 1 Macq. Hou. L. 49; 152 U. S. 1. See 22 Or. 410; id. 438. In England, the power of parliament to restrain or improve these rights is held to be absolute; 4 B. &. C. 598. In this country, such a power is subject to the limitations of the federal constitution; and while both the general and state governments may adopt measures for the improvement of navigation; 4 Rawle 9; 9 Conn. 436; and the states may grant private rights in tide-waters, provided they do not conflict with the public right of navigation; 21 Pick. 344; yet neither the general nor the state governments have the power to destroy or materially impair the right of navigation. See BRIDGE; FISHERY; RIVER; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; TERRITORIAL WATERS; WHARF.

TIE. When two persons receive an equal number of votes at an election, there is said to be a tie. Neither is elected. When the votes are given on any question to be decided by a deliberative assembly, and there is a tie, the question is lost. See MAJORITY.

TIEL. An old manner of spelling tel: such as, nul tiel record, no such record.

TIEMPO INHABIL. In Louisiana. A time when a man is not able to pay his debts.

TIERCE. A liquid measure, containing the third part of a pipe, or forty-two gallons.

TIGNI IMMITTENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. A servitude which confers the right of inserting a beam or timber from the wall of one house into that of a neighboring house, in order that it may rest on the latter and that the wall of the latter may bear this weight. Dig. 8. 2. 36; 8. 5. 14.

TIMBER. The body, stem, or trunk of a tree, or the larger pieces or sticks of wood which enter the frame-work of a building or other structure, excluding the plank, boards, shingles, or lath which may be used to complete the structure. 47 Wis. 192. The term now seems to include all sorts of wood from which any useful articles can be made or which may be used to advantage in any class of manufacture or construction; 14 Fed. Rep. 824. Railroad ties are held to be timber; 52 Wis. 393; fence rails are not; 43 Tex. 374; nor are trees, when suitable only for firewood; 51 Me. 417.

A federal act of 1897 makes it a penal offence to set fire to timber on the public domain.

TIMBER TREES. Oak, ash, elm, in all places, and, by local custom, such other trees as are used in building; 2 Bla. Com. 281; also beech, chestnut, walnut, cedar, fir, aspen, lime, sycamore, and birch trees; 6 George III. ch. 48; and also such as are used in the mechanical arts; Lewis, Cr. L. 506. Timber-trees, both standing, fallen, and severed and lying upon the soil, constitute a portion of the realty, and are embraced in a mortgage of the land; 1 Washb. R. P. 13; 19 Me. 53; and pass, by a judicial sale under such mortgage, to the purchaser; 1 Wall. 53; 54 Me. 313; 1 Den. 554; 61 Pa. 294. Some contracts for the sale of timber trees are contracts for the sale of an interest in lands; 10 N. Y. 117; 53 Pa. 206; 119 Ind. 7; and, as such, within the statute of frauds; 33 Pa. 266; 50 Ohio St. 57. The better action for damages for cutting and carrying away timber trees seems to be that of trespass quare clausum fregit et de bonis asportatis (unless otherwise designated by statute); 2 Greenl. 173, 387. See WASTE; SALE; TREE.

TIME. The measure of duration. Lapse of time often furnishes a presumption, stronger or weaker according to the length of time which has passed, of the truth of certain facts, such as the legal title to rights, payment of or release from debts.

Time in Great Britain, in any statute or legal instrument, means, by statute, Greenwich mean time, and in Ireland, Dublin time. The only standard of time recognized by the courts is the meridian of the sun; not any arbitrary standard; 84 Ga. 159; 3 H. & N. 866.

The general rule of law is that the performance of a contract must be completed at or within the time fixed by the contract; Leake, Contr., 3d ed. 772. Wherever, in cases not governed by particular customs of trade, the parties bind themselves to the performance of duties within a certain number of days, they have to the last minute of the last day to perform their obligations; 6 M. & G. 593. See PERFORMANCE.

Generally, in computing time, the first day is excluded and the last included; 4 T. B. Monr. 464; 26 Ala. N. S. 547; see 2 Harr. Del. 461; 5 Blackf. 319; 16 Ohio 408; 10 Rich. 395; 12 Colo. 285; excluding the day on which an act is done, when the computation is to be made from such an act; 15 Ves. Ch. 248; 16 Cow. 659; 1 Pick. 485; 19 Mo. 60; including it, according to Dougl. 463; 417; 15 Mass. 193; 18 How. 151; except where the exclusion will prevent forfeiture; 2 Camp. 294; 4 Me. 298. The rule which excludes the terminus a quo is not absolute, it may be included when necessary to give effect to the obvious intention; 147 U. S. 640. Time from and after a given day excludes that day; 1 Pick. 485; 1 N. & M'C. 565; 158 Pa. 465. But see 94 U. S. 560. A policy of insurance includes the last day of the term for which it is issued; L. R. 5 Exch. 296. Particular words, e. g. at, on, or upon a certain time, will be construed according to a reasonable interpretation of the contract; 10 A. & E. 370. The use of the word until generally implies an intention to exclude the day to which it refers, except it appears otherwise from the context; 10 Neb. 524; 120 Mass. 94; 37 Am. Dec. 692; till is held to include the day referred to; 16 Barb. 352.

Sunday is a dies non, and a power that maybe exercised up to and including a given day of the month may generally, when that day happens to be Sunday, be exercised on the succeeding day; 133 U. S. 299; 147 id. 47. Sunday is said to be included in the computation when the time exceeds days and excluded when less than seven; 2 Mich. N. P. 108. See SUNDAY; DIES NON.

Deeds, bills of exchange, letters, and other written instruments are generally construed to have been made and issued at the time of their date, but the execution of a deed may be averred and proved according to the fact; 10 Exch. 40. Courts will always adopt that construction in the computation of time which will uphold and enforce, rather than destroy, bona fide transactions and titles, and whenever it is necessary to prevent a forfeiture or to effectuate the clear intention of the parties, the dies a quo will be included; otherwise it will be excluded; 5 Dak. 325.

The construction of contracts with regard to the time of performance is the same in equity as at law; but in case of mere delay in performance, a court of equity will in general relieve against the legal consequences and decree specific performance upon equitable terms notwithstanding the delay, if the matter of the contract admits of that form of remedy. In such cases it is said that in equity time is not considered to be of the essence of the contracts; L. R. 3 Ch. 67. Ordinarily time is not of the essence of the contract, but it may be made so by express stipulation of the parties; see 128 U. S. 403; or it may be so by implication, because of the nature of the property involved; 144 U. S. 394; or because of the avowed object of the seller or purchaser; 134 U. S. 68; 144 id. 394; or from the nature of the contract itself; or by one party giving the other notice that performance must be made within a certain reasonable time fixed in the notice; 2 Ohio St. 326; 5 C. E. Green 367; time is always of the essence of unilateral contracts; 51 N. Y. 629; 35 Md. 352; 50 Ill. 298. Completion of a contract within a reasonable time is sufficient, if no time is stipulated; 122 U. S. 300.

In determining whether stipulations as to the time of performance of a contract of sale are conditions precedent, the court will seek to discover the real intention of the parties in deciding whether time is of the essence of the contract; Benj. Sales § 593. If a thing sold is of greater or less value according to the lapse of time, stipulations with regard to it must be literally complied with both at law and in equity; 42 Barb. 320; 10 Allen 239. As to whether in English bicycle law requiring the use of a lamp "during the period between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise," has led to a controversy as to whether this is local or Greenwich time; see 58 Alb. L. J. 103. See YEAR.

In Pleading. A point in or space of duration at or during which some fact is alleged to have been committed.

In criminal actions, both the day and the year of the commission of the offence must appear; but there need not be an express averment, if they can be collected from the whole statement; 5 S. & R. 315. The prosecutor may give evidence of an offence committed on any day which is previous to the finding of the indictment; 5 S. & R. 316; but a day subsequent to the trial must not be laid; Add. Pa. 86.

In mixed and real actions, no particular day need be alleged in the declaration; 3 Chitty, Pl. 620; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 99.

In personal actions, all traversable affirmative facts should be laid as occurring on some day; Steph. Pl. 292; but no day need be alleged for the occurrence of negative matter; Com. Dig. Pleader (C 19); and a failure in this respect is, in general, aided after verdict; 13 East 407. Where the cause of action is a trespass of a permanent nature or constantly repeated, it should be laid with a continuando, which title see. The day need not, in general, be the actual day of commission of the fact; 12 Johns. 287; 3 N. H. 299; if the actual day is not stated, it should be laid under a videlicet; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 63. The exact time may become material, and must then be correctly laid; 10 B. & C. 215; 4 S. & R. 576; 1 Stor. 528; as, the time of execution of an executory written document; Gould, Pl. § 67. The defence must follow the time laid in the declaration, if time is not material; 1 Chitty, Pl. 509; 1 Saund. 14, 82; need not when it becomes material; 2 Saund. 5 a, b (n. 3); or in pleading matter of discharge; 2 Burr. 944; 2 Str. 944; or a record; Gould, Pl. § 83.

TIME BARGAIN. An agreement to buy or sell stock at a future time or within a fixed time at a certain price. See FUTURES; OPTION; MARGIN.

TIME IMMEMORIAL. Time beyond legal memory

See 14 L. R. A. 120, n.; OLD STYLE; REGNAL YEARS; PRESCRIPTION; MEMORY; LIMITATIONS; MONTH; DAY; STATUTE.

TIME-TABLES. See PUNCTUALITY.

TIPPLING-HOUSE. A place where spirituous liquors are sold and drunk in violation of law. Sometimes the mere selling is considered as evidence of keeping a tippling-house. 47 Ill. 370.

A public drinking-place, where liquor or other intoxicating drink is sold, to be drunk on the premises. 1 Colo. App. 289.

TIPSTAFF. An officer appointed by the marshal of the court of king's bench, to attend upon the judges with a kind of rod or staff tipped with silver.

In the United States, the courts sometimes appoint an officer who is known by this name, whose duty it is to attend on the court. Similar officers employed in the courts of Pennsylvania are so called.

TITHES. In English Law. A right to the tenth part of the produce of lands, the stock upon lands, and the personal industry of the inhabitants. These tithes are raised for the support of the clergy. Almost all the tithes of England and Wales are now commuted into rent charges, under 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 71, and the various statutes since passed; 3 Steph. Com. 731. In the United States there are no tithes.

TITHING. In English Law. Formerly, a district containing ten men, with their families. In each tithing there was a tithingman, whose duty it was to keep the peace, as a constable now is bound to do.

TITHINGMAN. In Saxon Law. The head or chief of a decennary of ten families; he was to decide all lesser causes between neighbors. Now tithingmen and constables are the same thing. Jacob, Law Dict.

In New England, a parish officer to keep good order in church. Webster, Dict.

TITLE. Estates. The means whereby the owner of lands hath the just possession of his property. Co. Litt. 345; 2 Bla. Com. 195. See 1 Ohio 349. This is the definition of title to lands only.

A bad title is one which conveys no property to the purchaser of an estate.

A doubtful title is one which the court does not consider to be so clear that it will enforce its acceptance by a purchaser, nor so defective as to declare it a bad title, but only subject to so much doubt that a purchaser ought not to be compelled to accept it; 1 J. & W. 568; 9 Cow. 344.

A good title is that which entitles a man by right to a property or estate, and to the lawful possession of the same.

A marketable title is one which a court of equity considers to be so clear that it will enforce its acceptance by a purchaser.

The doctrine of marketable titles is purely equitable and of modern origin; Atk. Tit. 26. At law every title not bad is marketable; 5 Taunt. 625; 6 id. 263; 1 Marsh. 258. See 2 Pa. L. J. 17.

There are several stages or degrees requisite to form a complete title to lands and tenements. The lowest and most imperfect degree of title is a presumptive title or the mere possession, or actual occupation of the estate, without any apparent right to hold or continue such possession: this happens when one man disseises another. The next step to a good and perfect title is the right of possession, which may reside in one man while the actual possession is not in himself, but in another. This right of possession is of two sorts: an apparent right of possession, which may be defeated by proving a better, and an actual right of possession, which will stand the test against all opponents. The mere right of property, the jus proprietatis, without either possession or the right of possession. 2 Bla. Com. 195.

Title to real estate is acquired by two methods, namely, by descent and by purchase. See these words.

Title to personal property may accrue in three different ways: by original acquisition; by transfer by act of law; by transfer by act of the parties.

Title by original acquisition is acquired by occupancy, see OCCUPANCY; by accession, see ACCESSION; by intellectual labor. See PATENT; COPYRIGHT; TRADE-MARK.

The title to personal property is acquired and lost by transfer by act of law, in various ways: by forfeiture; succession; marriage; judgment; insolvency; intestacy. See those titles.

Title is acquired and lost by transfer by the act of the party, by gift, by contract or sale. See those titles.

In general, possession constitutes the criterion of title of personal property (q. v.), because no other means exist by which a knowledge of the fact to whom it belongs can be attained. A seller of a chattel is not, therefore, required to show the origin of his title, nor, in general, is a purchaser, without notice of the claim of the owner, compellable to make restitution; but it seems that a purchaser from a tenant for life of personal chattels will not be secure against the claims of those entitled in remainder; Cowp. 432; 1 Bro. C. C. 274.

As an exception to the rule that possession is the criterion of title of property may be mentioned the case of ships, the title of which can be ascertained by the register; 15 Ves. Ch. 60; 17 id. 251; 8 Price 256.

To convey a title, the seller must himself have a title to the property which is the subject of the transfer. But to this general rule there are exceptions. See SALE.

In Legislation. That part of an act of the legislature by which it is known and distinguished from other acts; the name of the act. While the title of a statute cannot be used to add to or take from the body thereof, yet in cases of doubt, it may be referred to as a help to the interpretation; 143 U. S. 457. See CONSTRUCTION.

Formerly the title was held to be no part of a bill, though it could be looked to when the statute was ambiguous; 3 Wheat. 610; 31 Wisc. 431; see 144 U. S. 550; 143 id. 447; 9 Q. B. D. 104; but it could not enlarge or restrain the provisions of the act itself; 5 Wall. 107. In later years constitutional provisions have required that the title of every legislative act shall correctly indicate the subject-matter of the act; Cooley, Const. Lim. 172. The object of this was mainly to prevent surprise in legislation. An act must have but one general object, which is fairly indicated by the title; a title may be general if it does not cover incongruous legislation; Endl. Interp. Stat. 59; 7 Ind. 681; 50 N. Y. 553; the use of the words "other purposes" have no effect; 22 Barb. 642; 8 Colo. App. 223. It is said that the courts will construe these provisions liberally rather than embarrass legislation by a construction, the strictness of which is unnecessary to the attainment of the beneficial purposes for which they were adopted; Cooley, Const. Lim. 178. In construing an act, the court will strike from it all that relates to the object not indicated by the title, and sustain the rest if it is complete in itself; id. 181; 92 Ala. 94. These provisions are usually considered mandatory, though they were held to be directory in 4 Cal. 388; 6 Ohio N. S. 187. In Pennsylvania, where an act of assembly is entitled a supplement to a former act, and the subject thereof is germane to that of the original act, its subject is sufficiently expressed; 77 Pa. 429; 88 id. 42.

See a paper in Rep. Am. Bar Association (1882) by U. M. Rose.

Personal Relations. A distinctive appellation denoting the rank to which the individual belongs in society. See RANK; NOBILITY.

Titles are assumed by foreign princes, and among their subjects they may exact these marks of honor; but in their intercourse with foreign nations they are not entitled to them as a matter of right; Wheat. Int. Law, 3d Eng. ed. § 159.

In Pleading. The right of action which the plaintiff has. The declaration must show the plaintiff's title, and if such title be not shown in that instrument the defect cannot be cured by any of the future pleadings. Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (B 1).

In Rights. The name of a newspaper, a book, and the like. See TRADE-MARK.

TITLE, COVENANTS FOR. See COVENANT.

TITLE DEEDS. Those deeds which are evidences of the title of the owner of an estate. The person who is entitled to the inheritance has a right to the possession of the title-deeds; 1 Carr. & M. 653. As to a lien created by deposit of title-deeds, see LIEN.

TITLE INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

TITLE OF A CAUSE. The peculiar designation of a suit, consisting usually of the name of the court, the venue, and the parties. The method of arranging the names of the parties is not everywhere uniform. The English way, and that formerly in vogue in this country, and still retained in many of the states, is for the actor in each step of the cause to place his name first, as if he were plaintiff in that particular proceeding, and his adversary's afterwards. Thus the case of Upton v. White would, if taken from a county court to the supreme court on a writ of error by defendant, be entitled White v. Upton. In New York and many other states which have enacted codes of procedure, the rule now is that the original order of names of parties is retained throughout. See AD SECTAM.

TITLE OF ENTRY. The right to enter upon lands. Cowel. See ENTRY.

TITULARS OF ERECTION. Persons who in Scotland, after the Reformation, obtained grants from the crown of the monasteries and priories then erected into temporal lordships. These grants were called "lords of erection" (q. v.) and "titulars of the teinds." Bell.

TITULUS. In the Civil Law. Title; the source or ground of possession.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A temple or church.

TO. A term of exclusion, unless by necessary implication it is manifestly used in a different sense; 18 Me. 201; 69 id. 514; 84 id. 460.

An order extending the time for signing a bill of exceptions to a certain day, is inclusive of such day; 75 Md. 126; but "from" an object "to" an object excludes the terminus referred to; 84 Me. 459; 52 id. 252. See FROM.

TO WIT. That is to say; namely; scilicet; videlicet.

TOBACCO. In Iowa, Tennessee, Nebraska, and North Dakota the manufacture or sale of cigarettes and cigarette paper is absolutely prohibited. In Indiana, Minnesota, Maine, and Wisconsin the sale or gift of cigarettes, or any substitute therefor, to any minor is forbidden. In West Virginia, Nevada, and Maryland the method adopted is to impose a special license fee for selling cigarettes or cigarette paper at retail. In Washington a license is required and the sale is prohibited to minors under eighteen years of age. In Missouri any city or village is authorized to prohibit the sale to minors. In Iowa an act prohibiting the sale of cigarettes within the state by all persons save jobbers doing an interstate business, was held unconstitutional, so far as it amounts to a regulation of interstate commerce; 73 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1014. See ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

TOBACCONIST. Any person, firm, or corporation whose business it is to manufacture cigars, snuff, or tobacco in any form. Act of Congress, July 13, 1866, § 9.

TOFT. A place or piece of ground on which a house formerly stood, which has been destroyed by accident or decay. 2 Broom & H. Com. 17.

TOGATI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Under the empire, when the toga had ceased to be the usual costume of the Romans, advocates were nevertheless obliged to wear it whenever they pleaded a cause. Hence they were called togati.

TOKEN. A document or sign of the existence of a fact.

Tokens are either public or general, or privy tokens. They are either true or false. When a token is false and indicates a general intent to defraud, and is used for that purpose, it will render the offender guilty of the crime of cheating; 12 Johns. 292; but if it is a mere privy token, as, counterfeiting a letter in another man's name, in order to cheat but one individual, it would not be indictable; 9 Wend. 182; 1 Dall. 47. In England, this name is given to pieces of metal, made in the shape of money, passing among private persons by consent at a certain value. 2 Chitty, Com. Law 182. They are no longer permitted to pass as money.

TOKEN-MONEY. See TOKEN.

TOLERATE. To allow so as not to hinder; to permit as something not wholly approved of; to suffer; to endure. 17 Blatchf. 330.

TOLERATION. In some countries, where religion is established by law, certain sects who do not agree with the established religion are nevertheless permitted to exist; and this permission is called toleration. They are permitted and allowed to remain rather as a matter of favor than a matter of right. By the Toleration Act of 1 W. & M. c. 18, and subsequent statutes down to the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 26, enabling any person to take any degree (other than a divinity degree) in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, or Durham, the disabilities of the Roman Catholics, Jews, and Dissenters have been almost wholly removed; 2 Steph. Com. 707. See CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION ACT.

In the United States there is no such thing as toleration; all men have an equal right to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences. See CHRISTIANITY; RELIGION: RELIGIOUS TEST.

TOLERATION ACT. The statute 1 W. & M. exempting Protestant dissenters from the penalties of certain laws. Brown.

TOLL. A sum of money for the use of something, generally applied to the consideration which is paid for the use of a road, bridge, or the like, of a public nature.

The compensation paid to a miller for grinding another person's grain. Cited 93 U. S. 458.

The rate of taking toll for grinding is regulated by statute in most of the states. See 2 Washb. R. P.; 6 Q. B. 31. See RATES.

A state has no power to regulate tolls upon a bridge connecting it with another state without the assent of congress and without the concurrence of such other state in the proposed tariff; 125 U. S. 1.

To bar, defeat, or take away: as, to toll an entry into lands is to deny or take away the right of entry.

To toll the statute of limitation is to show facts which remove its bar of the action.

TOLL-TRAVERSE. A toll for passing over a private man's ground; a toll for passing over the soil of another or over soil which though now a public highway was once private and which was dedicated subject to a toll. It can be claimed by prescription. 37 L. J. Q. B. 209; 8 Q. B. 521.

TOLLBOOTH. A prison; a custom-house; an exchange; also the place where goods are weighed; a place where merchants met; a local tribunal for small civil cases held at the Guild Hall, Bristol. Whart.

TOLLS. In a general sense, tolls signify any manner of customs, subsidy, prestation, imposition, or sum of money demanded for exporting or importing of any wares or merchandise, to be taken of the buyer. Co. 2d Inst. 58.

TOLT. A writ whereby a cause depending in a court baron was taken and removed into a county court. O. N. B. 4.

TOMBSTONE. A gift or bequest to keep perpetually, a tombstone in repair offends against a rule as to perpetuities and is void, but such a condition to that effect attached to a bequest to a charity in case of failure to comply with condition is good. L. R. 3 Ch. 252. See MONUMENT.

TON. Twenty hundredweight, each hundredweight being one hundred and twelve pounds avoirdupois. See MEASURE.

TONNAGE. The capacity of a ship or vessel.

This term is most usually applied to the capacity of a vessel in tons as determined by the legal mode of measurement; in England reckoned according to the number of tons burden a ship will carry, but here to her internal cubic capacity; and, as a general rule, in the United States the official tonnage of a vessel is considerably below the actual capacity of the vessel to carry freight. 40 N. Y. 259.

The duties paid on the tonnage of a ship or vessel.

For the rule for determining tonnage in the United States, see R. S. § 4150 et seq.

A foreign built vessel purchased by a citizen of the United States and brought into the waters thereof is not so taxable; 166 U. S. 110.

The constitution of the United States provides art. 1, s. 10, n. 2, that no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty on tonnage; 12 Wall 204; 94 U. S. 238. But a municipal corporation situated on a navigable river can, consistently with the constitution of the United States, charge and collect from the owner of licensed steamboats, which moor at a wharf constructed by it, wharfage proportioned to their tonnage; 95 U. S. 80; 45 Ia. 196. See COMMERCE.

The duty of tonnage prohibited by the constitution is a charge upon a vessel according to its tonnage as the instrument of commerce, for the privilege of entering or leaving a port or navigating public waters. 119 U. S. 543.

TONNAGE-RENT. Rent reserved by a mining lease consisting of a royalty on every ton of minerals.

TONNAGE TAX. See TONNAGE; OYSTERS.

TONNAGIUM. A custom or impost upon wines and other merchandise exported or imported. Cowel.

TONNETIGHT. The quantity of a ton in a ship's freight or bulk. Cowel.

TONTINE INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

TOOK AND CARRIED AWAY. Technical words necessary in an indictment for simple larceny. Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1). See CEPIT ET ASPORTAVIT; LARCENY.

TOOLS. The implements which are commonly used by the hand of one man in some manual labor, necessary for his subsistence. 18 S. Car. 241. It includes patterns used in manufacturing; 51 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1149; a mill-saw; 1 Fairf. 135; an instrument called a billy and jennie; 2 Vt. 402; a gin and grist mill; 66 Tex. 494; a threshing machine; 23 Ia. 359. As used in exemption laws, it includes any instrument necessary for the prosecution of trade, including a lathe; 99 Cal. 202; sewing machines; 50 Minn. 327; a piano; 69 Ill. 337; a violin; 2 Allen 395; a cornet; 123 Mass. 95; a gun; 18 Tex. 581; a net and boat; 1 Th. & C. 444; cheese vats, presses, and knives; 27 Kan. 270; the surgical instruments of a physician; 3 Abb. Pr. 416; and the office furniture of a lawyer; 73 Ia. 111; an iron safe used by an insurance agent; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 71; 87 Colo. 292. It does not include the apparatus of a printing office; 10 Pick. 428. See TRADE; EXEMPTION.

TORRENS SYSTEM. A name commonly applied to the system of government registration of titles to land, so called from Sir Robert Torrens. The subject is treated under LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER. A Massachusetts act passed since that title was written is referred to under REGISTRATION. See 36 L. R. A. 105.

TORT (Fr. tort, from Lat. torquere, to twist, tortus, twisted, wrested aside). A private or civil wrong or injury. A wrong independent of contract. 1 Hill. Torts 1. The breach of a legal duty. Big. Torts 3. In admiralty it includes wrong suffered in consequence of the negligence or malfeasance of others, where the remedy at common law is by an action on the case; 46 Fed. Rep. 738; 10 App. Dec. 469.

The right of action is very broad in France. Thus:

"Tout fait quelconque de l'homme, qui cause à autrui un dommage, oblige celui par la faute duquel il est arrivé à le reparer.

"Chacun est responsable du domnage qu'il à causé non seulement par son fait, mais encore par sa négligence ou par son imprudence." Civil Code of France, secs. 1382, 1383.

The law recognizes certain rights as belonging to every individual, such as the right to personal security, to liberty, to property, to reputation, to the services of a daughter or servant, to the companionship of a wife, etc. Any violation of one of these rights is a tort. In the like manner the law recognizes certain duties as attached to every individual, as the duty of not deceiving by false representations, of not persecuting another maliciously, of not using your own property so as to injure another, etc. The breach of any of these duties coupled with consequent damages to any one is also a tort. Underhill, Torts 4.

The performance of an act forbidden by a statute or the omission or failure to perform any act specifically imposed by law, is generally equivalent to an act done with intent to cause wrongful injury; Poll. Torts 23. No action will lie for doing that which the legislature has authorized, if it be done without negligence: id. 121.

The word torts is used to describe that branch of the law which treats of the redress of injuries which are neither crimes nor arise from the breach of contracts. All acts or omissions of which the law takes cognizance may in general be classed under the three heads of contracts, torts, and crimes. Contracts include agreements and the injuries resulting from their breach. Torts include injuries to individuals, and crimes injurious to the public or state. 1 Hill. Torts 1.

This division of the redress of injuries by civil suit into actions of tort and actions of contract is not thoroughly accurate. For often the party injured has his election whether he will proceed by tort or by contract, as in the case of a fraudulent sale or the fraudulent recommendation of a third person; 10 C. B. 83; 24 Conn. 392. But for general usage this division has been found sufficient, and is universally adopted; Cooley, Torts 2.

As the same act may sometimes constitute the breach of a contract as well as a tort, so the same act may often constitute a tort and also a crime. For a tort may amount to, or may be likely to lead to, a breach of the peace, and thus become a matter of public concern. The torts which are usually at the same time crimes are assault, libel, and nuisance. In such cases it is the general rule of law that a public prosecution and a private action for damages can both be maintained either at the same or at different times; 1 B. & P. 191; 3 Bla. Com. 122. See 28 Fla. 90.

As to the doctrine of the merger of a tort in a crime, see MERGER.

The infringement of a right of the violation of a duty are necessary ingredients of a tort. If neither of these is present the act is not a tort, although damage may have resulted. Hence the maxim: Ex damno sine injuria non oritur actio.

A street railway company not having the right of eminent domain, is liable for special injury to another's property by the lawful operation of its works on its own land; the case of the negligent operation of a powerhouse; 183 Pa. 475. Where a corporation has no right of eminent domain, the operation of its works, causing special physical injury to another's property, is held an actionable nuisance; in the case of a gas company; 89 Pa. 257; and the case of a natural oil pipe company; 153 Pa. 366.

A wrongful or malicious intent is an essential element in some torts. As, for example, deceit, slander, and libel, malicious prosecution, and conspiracy. In general, however, it may be stated as a prominent distinction between torts and crimes, that in the former the party's intent is immaterial, while in prosecutions for the latter a criminal purpose must always be alleged and proved; Cooley, Torts 686. Thus one may be made liable in damages for what is usually called a mere accident. So insane persons and minors, under the age of discernment, are in general liable for torts. See MALICE.

A tort sounding in exemplary damages is one when there is an evasion of some right of person or property, maliciously, violently, wantonly, or with reckless disregard of social or civil obligations; 35 S. C. 493.

In general, it may be said that whenever the law creates a right, the violation of such right will be a tort, and wherever the law creates a duty, the breach of such duty coupled with consequent damage will be a tort also. This applies not only to the common law, but also to such rights and duties as may be created by statute; Cooley, Torts 650.

Torts may also arise in the performance of the duties of a ministerial officer, when such duties are due to individuals and not to the state; Cooley, Torts 376; but the act of a British officer in excess of his authority (burning certain barracoons in Africa and releasing slaves therefrom), when approved by the government, becomes an "act of state" and is not a ground of action against him; 2 Ex. 167.

As to torts committed against property or in the relations of master and servant, husband and wife, parent and child, bailor and bailee, landlord and tenant, mortgagor and mortgagee, see these several titles.

In order to maintain an action of tort the relation of cause and effect between the act and the injury must be clearly shown. The damage must not be remote or indirect. See CAUSA PROXIMA, etc.

All who aid, advise, command, or countenance the commission of a tort, or approve of it after it is done, are liable, if done for their benefit, in the same manner as if done with their hands; 61 Vt. 399; but where two or more are acting lawfully together to make an arrest, one is not liable for the unlawful act of another done in furtherance of the common purpose, without his concurrence; 76 Ia. 612.

A child injured before birth has no right of action for the tort; 138 Mass. 14; 28 L. R. (Ir.) 69; 30 Chic. Leg. N. 333. Where there are several wrongdoers, each is liable for the entire damage; all are equal. But where the injured party has elected to sue one or more and obtains judgment, he cannot sue the others, even though his judgment remains unsatisfied; L. R. 7 C. P. 547; but it is held generally in this country that a judgment without satisfaction is not a bar; Cooley, Torts 138; 11 Harv. L. Rev. So a recovery by a husband for injuries sustained to himself is not a bar to a subsequent action for injuries to his wife sustained at the same time, as a result of the same negligence; 29 S. W. Rep. 78; but judgment is held to be a bar if satisfaction has been tendered; 39 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 502; contra, 12 Lea 598; 1 Barb. 379. But the recovery of damages for the killing of one horse is a bar to the recovery of damages for another, killed at the same time and place; 9 Tex. Civ. App. 6.

A party injured cannot generally maintain an action for the injury if caused in any degree by his own contributory negligence. See NEGLIGENCE.

When a workman employed by a shipowner is injured by the combined negligence of himself and those in charge of the ship, he may recover half damages; 87 Fed. Rep. 349.

Where a tort is committed partly on land and partly on water, the question whether admiralty has jurisdiction over it is determined by the locus of the damage and not that of the origin of the tort; as where the plaintiff working in the hold of a vessel was injured by a piece of lumber negligently sent down through a chute by a person working on the pier, it was held to be a case of admiralty jurisdiction; 69 Fed. Rep. 646.

TORTFEASOR. A wrong-doer; one who commits or is guilty of a tort. See JOINT TORTFEASOR.

TORTURE. The rack, or question, or other mode of examination by violence to the person, to extort a confession from supposed criminals, and a revelation of their associates. It is to be distinguished from punishment, which usually succeeds a conviction for offences; as it was inflicted in limine, and as part of the introductory process leading to trial and judgment. It was wholly unknown to the common and statute law of England, and was forbidden by Magna Charta, ch. 29; 4 Bla. Com. 326.

It prevailed in Scotland, where the civil law which allowed it obtained: Dig. 48. 18. It was, however, declared contrary to the claim of right, and was expressly prohibited; 7 Anne, c. 21, § 5, A. D. 1708. Several instances of its infliction may be found in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials of Scotland.

Although torture was confessedly contrary to the common law of England, it was, nevertheless, often employed as an instrument of state to wring confessions from prominent criminals,—especially in charges of treason. It was usually inflicted by warrant from the privy council. Jardine, Torture 7, 15, 42.

Mr. Jardine proves from the records of the privy council that the practice was not infrequent during the time of Elizabeth, and continued to the close of the reign of the first two Stuarts. There is positive evidence that Guy Fawkes was directed to be tortured in regard to the Gunpowder Plot, in the warrant in the king's handwriting authorizing the commissioners, of whom Coke was one, to examine him upon the rack, "using the gentler tortures first, et sic per gradus ad ima tenditur;" 1 Jardine, Cr. Tr. Int. 17; 2 id. 106.

An attempt to torture a person to extort a confession of crime is a criminal offence. 2 Tyl. 380. See QUESTION; PEINE FORTE ET DURE; MUTE.

This absurd and cruel practice has never obtained in the United States, except in a few instances in New York under the Dutch rule.

TOTAL LOSS. See LOSS; and also a recent English case where it was held by the house of lords that a ship is totally lost when she goes to the bottom, no matter whether she is brought up again or not; [1898] A. C. 593. See 12 Harv. L. Rev. 213.

Under a policy insuring against "absolute total loss only," a partial loss cannot be converted into a constructive total loss, and evidence of abandonment is immaterial; 5 U. S. App. 179.

TOTIDEM VERBIS. In so many words.

TOTIES QUOTIES (Lat.). As often as the thing shall happen.

TOTTED. A good debt to the crown, i. e. a debt paid to the sheriff, to be by him paid over to the king. Cowel; Moz. & W. See FOREIGN APPOSER.

TOUCH AND STAY. Words frequently introduced in policies of insurance, giving the party insured the right to stop and stay at certain designated points in the course of the voyage. A vessel which has the power to touch and stay at a place in the course of the voyage must confine herself strictly to the terms of the liberty so given; for any attempt to trade at such a port during such a stay, as, by shipping or landing goods, will amount to a species of deviation which will discharge the underwriters, unless the ship have also liberty to trade as well as to touch and stay at such a place; 1 Marsh. Ins. 275.

TOUJOURS ET UNCORE PRIST (L. Fr.). Always and still ready. This is the name of a plea of tender: as, where a man is indebted to another, and he tenders the amount due, and afterwards the creditor brings a suit, the defendant may plead the tender, and add that he has always been and is still ready to pay what he owes, which may be done by the formula toujours et uncore prist. He must then pay the money into court; and if the issue be found for him the defendant will be exonerated from costs, and the plaintiff made liable for them: 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2923. See TOUT TEMPS PRIST; TENDER.

TOUR D'ECHELLE. In French Law. A right which the owner of an estate has of placing ladders on his neighbor's property to facilitate the reparation of a party-wall or of buildings which are supported by that wall. It is a species of servitude. Lois des Bât. part 1, c. 3, sect. 2, art. 9, § 1.

The space of ground left unoccupied around a building for the purpose of enabling the owner to repair it with convenience: this is not a servitude, but an actual corporeal property.

TOURN. See SHERIFF'S TOURN.

TOUT TEMPS PRIST (L. Fr. always ready). A plea by which the defendant signifies that he has always been ready to perform what is required of him. The object of the plea is to save costs: as, for example, where there has been a tender and refusal. 3 Bla. Com. 303. So, in a writ of dower, where the plea is detinue of charters, the demandant might reply, always ready; Rast. Entr. 229 b. See TOUJOURS ET UNCORE PRIST.

TOW-BOATS. According to the weight of authority, the owners of steamboats engaged in the business of towing are not common carriers; Lawson, Carriers 3. So held in 2 N. Y. 204; 18 Pa. 40; 14 Bush 698; 12 Fed. Rep. 446; 94 U. S. 494; 95 id. 297. See TOWAGE; contra, 5 Jones N. C. 174; 11 La. 46.

TOWAGE. The act of towing or drawing ships and vessels, usually by means of a small steamer called a tug.

Towage service is confined to vessels who have received no injury or damage; 9 Fed. Rep. 53.

Where towage is rendered in the rescue or relief of a vessel from imminent peril, it becomes salvage service, entitled to be compensated as such; 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 223. A tug sometimes called towing or tow-boat, while not held to the responsibility of a common carrier, is bound to exercise reasonable care and skill in everything pertaining to its employment; 9 Fed. Rep. 614; 57 id. 667; 84 Fed. Rep. 500; 14 U. S. App. 39; id. 508; 94 U. S. App. 40. Proof of a loss suffered by tow does not raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the tug; 14 Wall. 406; 57 Fed. Rep. 667. See TOW-BOATS; TUGS; SALVAGE.

Where two vessels, each in charge of a tug, came in collision from the faulty navigation of the tugs, whose masters gave directions to the vessels which were obeyed, the tugs alone were held liable; 11 U. S. App. 129. In every contract of towage there is an implied engagement that each party will use proper skill and diligence. Tugs cannot abandon their tows for slight causes; 13 id. 489; 14 id. 410. See TUG.

That which is given for towing ships in rivers. Guidon de la Mer, c. 16; Pothier, Des Avaries, n. 147; 2 Chitty, Com. Law. 16.

The burden of proving that a contract of towage was at the owner's risk, is on the tug; 54 Fed. Rep. 1010; 18 id. 178; 24 id. 292.

TOWARD. The word has been held to mean not simply "to" but to include "about." 6 Tex. App. 565. See TO.

TOWN. A term of somewhat varying signification, but denoting a division of a country next smaller in extent than a county.

It is generic, and includes cities; 182 Ind. 54; 117 Cal. 451.

In Pennsylvania and some other of the Middle states, it denotes a village or city. In the New England states, it is to be considered for many purposes as the unit of civil organization,—the counties being composed of a number of towns. Towns are regarded as corporations or quasi-corporations; 13 Mass. 193. In New York and Wisconsin, towns are subdivisions of counties; and the same is true of the townships of most of the Western states. In Ohio, Michigan, and Iowa, they are called townships. In Illinois it is synonymous with village; 119 U. S. 680. In England, the term town or vill comprehends under it the several species of cities, boroughs, and common towns. 1 Bla. Com. 114.

TOWN CAUSE. In English Practice. A cause tried at the sittings for London and Middlesex. 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 556.

TOWN-CLERK. A principal officer who keeps the records, issues calls for town meetings, and performs generally the duties of a secretary to the political organization.

TOWN-MEETING. A legal assembly of the qualified voters of the town held at stated intervals or on call.

TOWN-PLAT. The acknowledgment and recording of a town-plat vests the legal title to the ground embraced in the streets and alleys in the corporation of the town; therefore it is held that the proprietor who has thus dedicated the streets and alleys to the public cannot maintain trespass for an injury to the soil or freehold. The corporation alone can seek redress for such injury; 11 Ill. 554; 18 id. 54, 308. This is not so, however, with a highway; the original owner of the fee must bring his action for an injury to the soil; 18 Ill. 54. See HIGHWAY. If the streets or alleys of a town are dedicated by a different mode from that pointed out by the statute, the fee remains in the proprietor, burdened with the public easement; 18 Ill. 312. See DEDICATION.

TOWNSHIP. The public lands of the United States are surveyed first into tracts called townships, being in extent six miles square. The subdivisions of a township are called sections, each a mile square and containing six hundred and forty acres; these are subdivided into quarter-sections, and from that into lots of forty acres each. This plan of subdividing the public lands was adopted by act of congress of May 18, 1796.

TOXICOLOGY. The science of poisons (q. v.).

TRACING. A tracing is a mechanical copy or fac simile of an original, produced by following its lines, with a pen or pencil, through a transparent medium, called tracing paper. 18 Fed. Rep. 540.

TRACT. A lot, piece, or parcel of land, of greater or less size, the term not importing in itself any precise dimensions. 28 N. J. L. 45.

TRADAS IN BALLIUM. You deliver to bail. The name of a writ which might be issued in behalf of a party who upon the writ de odio et atia had been found to have been maliciously accused of a crime. 1 Reeve, Eng. L. 252.

TRADE. Any sort of dealings by way of sale or exchange; commerce, traffic. 101 U. S. 231; 47 Kan. 89. The dealings in a particular business: as, the Indian trade; the business of a particular mechanic; hence boys are said to be put apprentices to learn a trade: as, the trade of a carpenter, shoemaker, and the like. Bac. Abr. Master and Servant (D 1). Trade differs from art.

In exemption laws it is usually confined to the occupation of a mechanic; 44 Conn. 93; but in its broader sense it is generally construed as equivalent to any occupation, employment, handicraft, or business; 101 U. S. 231; 47 Kan. 89. One cannot by multiplying his pursuits claim cumulatively several exemptions, but the fact that he carries on two or more pursuits concurrently does not deprive him of all exemptions, but the article exempted must belong to his principal business; 27 Kan. 532.

The term is also construed in cases arising under the "anti-trust" act forbidding trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, and it is held in that connection to have the broader sense; 47 Kan. 89, where the definition of the word is much discussed. The word is held to apply to the business of insurance; id.; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 710; of a telegraph company; 3 Exch. Div. 108; transportation of merchandise for hire; 2 Gall. 4; 7 Cra. 113; a blacksmith, who also builds wagons; 32 Mich. 59; a harness-maker, painter, and carriage-builder; 9 Allen 156; a dealer in ice who was also a farmer; 7 Gray 67; a tinner who owned and partly supported himself by playing a cornet; 123 Mass. 194; a saddle and harness-maker; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 859; keeping a home for working girls even though it appeared that no profits were made; 25 Ch. Div. 206; but maintaining a private lunatic asylum is held not a trade; 2 Ad. & El. 161. See TOOLS; EXEMPTION; RESTRAINT OF TRADE; TRADER; TRADESMAN.

TRADE, RESTRAINT OF. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

TRADE DOLLAR. See DOLLAR.

TRADE-MARK. A symbol, emblem, or mark, which a tradesman puts upon or attaches in some way to the goods he manufactures or has caused to be manufactured, so that they may be identified and known in the market. Brown, Trade-Marks, 2d ed. § 87.

"A particular mark or symbol used by a person for the purpose of indicating that the article to which it is affixed is sold or manufactured by him or his authority, or that he carries on business at a particular place." 35 L. J. Ch. 61.

Broadly defined, a trade-mark is a mark by which the wares of the owner are known in trade. 12 Fed. Rep. 707.

The office of a trade-mark is to point out distinctly the origin or ownership of the article to which it is affixed; or, in other words, to give notice who was the producer; 138 U. S. 537; 128 id. 598; 139 id. 540.

It may consist of a name, a device, or a peculiar arrangement of words, lines, or figures, or any peculiar mark or symbol not theretofore in use, adopted and used by a manufacturer, or a merchant for whom goods may be manufactured, to designate them as those which he has manufactured or sells. It may be put either upon the article itself or its case, covering, or wrapper, and is assignable with the business; 86 Ky. 331.

It may be in any form of letters, words, vignettes, or ornamental design. Newly-coined words may form a trade-mark; Brown, Trade-Marks 151.

The exclusive right to a trade-mark or device rests not on invention, but on such use as makes it point out the origin of the claimant's goods and must be early enough for that, but absolute priority of invention is not required; 85 Fed. Rep. 774.

Property in a trade-mark is acquired by the original application to some species of merchandise manufactured of a symbol or device not in actual use, designating articles of the same kind or class; 13 Wall. 222.

The ownership of trade-marks is considered as a right of property; Upton, Trade-Marks 10. It is on this ground that equity protects by injunction against their infringement. Proof of fraud is not necessary, the mere fact of violating a right of property being sufficient; 1 De G. J. & S. 185.

Trade names should be distinguished from trade-marks. A trade-mark owes its existence to the fact that it is affixed to a commodity; a trade name is more properly allied to the good will of a business; Browne, Tr. Marks § 91. The same author divides the latter into classes: 1. of men, their business or their pseudonyms; 2. places famed for manufactures, etc.; 3. coaches and other vehicles for the transportation of passengers or merchandise.

The trade name of a firm, a corporate name, and the name of a publication, though not strictly trade-marks, are nevertheless a species of property of the same nature as trade-marks, and will be protected in like manner; 38 Am. Rep. 835; 9 id. 331. See NAME.

So a tradesman may adopt a fictitious name, and sell his goods under it as a trade-mark, and the property right he thus acquires in the fanciful name will be protected; 6 Thomp. & C. 133.

Equity will protect a corporation in the exclusive possession of its name. State authorities will ordinarily not grant a charter to a new corporation under the name of an existing corporation. But equity will not restrain a corporation of the state of the forum from the use of its corporate name at the suit of a foreign corporation; Thomp. Corp. §§ 296, 7903; 142 Ill. 494. See 10 L. R. A. 758.

In a bill by the "Sun Life Assurance Company," long established in London, to enjoin the "Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada" from doing business under that name in London, it was held that the defendant's use of its full name was lawful, but that the use of the "Sun Life" alone could be enjoined; [1894] 1 Ch. 537.

The names of hotels and stores are protected; 21 Cal. 448; L. R. 13 Ch. D. 512; 3 Sandf. 725: as, the "Mechanic's Store," against "Mechanical Store"; 42 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 142.

In the following the titles of newspapers and periodicals have been protected (the name in italics being held to infringe): Hagerstown Almanac—Hagerstown Town and Country Almanac; 50 Md. 591; The Real John Bull—The Old Real John Bull; Cox, Man. 38; Minnie—Minnie Dale and Minnie Dear Minnie; 2 K. & J. 123; 8 De G. The names of springs are protected, even against those who are rightfully selling the genuine product under the true name ; 24 Am. Rep. 395 ; 45 N. Y. 291 ; 95 Ky. 502 ; 78 Fed. Rep. 469 ; but there are other cases in which an injunction against the honest use of a geographical name has been refused ; 13 Wall. 311 ; 54 Ill. 439 ; 75 Pa. 467 ; 128 id. 1. While a geographical name is not a good trade-mark, technically speaking, yet where one has been used to indicate the goods of a particular maker, no one else may employ such name even truthfully in a geographical sense, in connection with the sale of the same class of goods ; L. A manufacturer will be protected in the use of a geographical name as against one who does not carry on business in the district ; 85 Fed. Rep. 896 ; 86 Ky. 331 ; 31 N. Y. S. 102 ; so of "Chicago Waists" as against one who makes similar waists in a different state ; 83 Fed. Rep. 213.

See a note on geographical names in 17 C. C. A. 657.

A number of competing millers in Minneapolis can maintain a joint bill on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated, to enjoin a grocer from selling flour made in Wisconsin, and marked with his own name and the word "Best Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn." ; 86 Fed. Rep. 608, reversing 82 id. 816.

Generic names, or names merely descriptive of an article, are not valid trade-marks; Browne, Trade-Marks § 34. Thus : Clubhouse Gin ; 7 Bos. 222 ; Desiccated Codfish ; 3 Daly 53 ; Liebig's Extract of Meat ; 28 How. Pr. 206 ; Cough Remedy ; 122 Mass. 139 ; Rock and Rye ; 82 N. Y. 630.

Nor can the name of the party be a valid trade-mark, as others may, under some circumstances, use the same name ; but see infra.

No property can be acquired in words, marks, or devices which denote the mere nature, kind, and quality of articles ; 101 U. S. 51 ; L. R. 17 Eq. 29 ; see 85 Fed. Rep. 150 ; 128 U. S. 598 ; 138 id. 537 ; and where a device, mark, or symbol is adopted for any purpose other than a reference to, or indication of its ownership, it cannot be sustained as a valid trade-mark ; 150 U. S. 460.

Numerals can be used as trade-marks ; 12 Fed. Rep. 717 ; contra, 81 Ky. 73 ; but not if they indicate quality or grade ; 138 U. S. 537 ; and the same is true of letters when used as trade-marks. See 138 U. S. 587.

Marks that simply indicate the quality of articles do not constitute a valid trade-mark ; so of words, etc., which indicate the peculiar excellence of goods, for instance "Ne Plus Ultra" for needles ; 13 L. T. N. S. 746 ; "Nourishing" Stout ; L. R. 17 Eq. 59. Words which indicate the purpose and character of medicines or articles cannot be exclusive property for a trade-mark, thus : "Cramp" Cure ; 46 Fed. Rep. 625 ; "Microbe Killer ;" 77 Tex. 530. Words which are simply descriptive of the quality or appearance of an article or the place where it was manufactured cannot be monopolized as a trade-mark ; 139 U. S. 540. Thus, "Acid Phosphate ;" 85 Fed. Rep. 524 ; "Cherry Pectoral ;" 7 Daly 9.

The color of a label or package does not constitute a valid trade-mark. See 149 U. S. 562 ; 37 Ch. Div. 112 ; nor can a form of package be a trade-mark ; 138 N. Y. 245 ; 4 Hughes 449.

The following are instances of valid trade-marks : "Celluloid ;" 47 Fed. Rep. 712 ; "Kaiser," beer ; 74 id. 222 ; "Royal Baking Powder ;" 70 id. 876 ; "Bromo-Caffeine ;" 142 N. Y. 467 ; "La Favorita," flour ; 128 U. S. 514 ; "Star," shirts ; 51 Fed. Rep. 829 ; "Saponifier," soap ; 79 id. 87 ; "Vulcan," matches ; 139 N. Y. 364 ; "Ideal," pens ; 130 id. 301 ; "Elk." cigars ; 37 Fed. Rep. 359 ; "Bromidia ;" 50 id. 106 ; "Swans Down," complexion powder : 85 id. 774 ; "Moxie," nerve food ; 33 Fed. Rep. 138 ; "Charter Oak," for a stove ; 16 Blatchf. 376 ; "Nickle In," cigars : 63 Hun 330 ; "Valvoline," lubricating oil ; 38 Fed. Rep. 922 ; "Tin Tag," tobacco ; 28 Fed. Rep. 434 ; "Sapolio," soap ; 55 How. Pr. 37 ; "Syrup of Figs," of a medicinal preparation ; 7 U. S. App. 588.

The following have been held invalid : "Instantaneous," tapioca ; 65 Fed. Rep. 505 ; "Black Package Tea ;" 138 N. Y. 244 ; "International Banking Company ;" 122 N. Y. 65 ; "Sarsaparilla and Iron ;" 100 Cal. 672 ; "Taffy Tolu," chewing gum ; 35 Fed. Rep. 150 ; "Imperial," beer ; 20 C. C. A. 405 ; acid phosphate ; 35 Fed. Rep. 524 ; "Goodyear Rubber Company ;" 128 U. S. 598 ; "Snowflake," as applied to bread ; 67 Ga. 561.

A few instances may be given of the use of words which have been held to infringe existing trade-marks :

Shrimpton & Hoover is infringed by Shrimpton Turvey ; 18 Beav. 164 ; Julicks by Josephs ; L. J., Notes of Cases (1867), 134 ; Stephens' by Steelpen's for ink ; 16 L. T. N. S. 145 ; Cocoaine by Cocoine ; 3 Keyes 594 ; The Hero by The Heroine ; 7 Phila. 39 ; Bovilene by Bovina ; 2 Daly 521 ; Hostetter & Smith by Holsteter & Smyte ; 1 Dill. 329 ; Cuticura soap by Curative (the package being also imitated) ; 75 Fed. Rep. 676 ; but "No-to-bac" is not infringed by "Baco-Curo ;" 82 Fed. Rep. 105.

In technical trade-mark cases, if the plaintiff proves that the defendant has used his trade-mark or a colorable imitation of it, he has established his right to relief.

Numerous cases have arisen where a party, by imitating the labels and packages used in connection with an article already on the market, has attempted to "pass off" his spurious goods on the public as the real article. In this country this is usually called unfair competition; in England, passing off, and in France, concurrence déloyale. The doctrine has been thus stated: The grounds on which unfair competition in trade will be enjoined are either that the means used are dishonest, or that, by false representation or imitation of a name or device, there is a tendency to create confusion in the trade, and work a fraud upon the public, by inducing it to accept a spurious article; 83 Fed. Rep. 30.

The only difference between such cases and technical trade-mark cases lies in the proof required to make out a case. Where a technical trade-mark is imitated there is a presumption of an intent to deceive the public. Where a label or style of package is imitated, it is necessary to show by evidence an intent to deceive the public and to steal the plaintiff's market. This intent may be shown by proof of actual deception, but it may be inferred from an examination of the real and spurious labels, etc.

Under this doctrine will come most of the cases referred to above where geographical names were used. In this class of cases it is held that it is not necessary to show actual deception. That the defendant's method of doing business tends to deceive the public, or that there is a probability of deception, is sufficient; 52 Mo. App. 10; 56 Fed. Rep. 830; 76 id. 959; 96 U. S. 245.

A fraudulent intent is presumed whenever a false statement is used in order to approximate the mark of the competitor; 77 Fed. Rep. 180; 74 id. 225; and also when a word identical with or resembling an important word is placed in the same position on a label or wrapper of the same shape; 26 Fed. Rep. 410; 41 N. W. Rep. 56; or catch words are printed in conspicuous type; L. R. 5 H. L. 508.

If the intent to deceive is established, it will be inferred that the mark is calculated to deceive; 52 Mo. App. 10; L. R. 18 Eq. 138.

The placing of spurious goods upon the market is prima facie evidence of damage to the plaintiff; 5 D. G. & S. 126; 6 Hare 325.

It is not necessary to prove that any customer or plaintiff had been deceived; it is sufficient to show that defendant knowingly put it in the power of retail dealers to deceive their customers; 70 Mo. App. 424. The fact that the defendants, who formerly used a label not imitative of complainant's, adopted a new one much resembling his, shortly after a former infringer of complainant's trade-mark came into their employ, is most suggestive of an intentional imitation; 74 Fed. Rep. 225. The similarity must be such as to mislead the ordinary purchaser; 150 U. S. 460. The test of infringement is whether the alleged infringing article is so dressed up as to be likely to deceive persons of ordinary intelligence, exercising the slight care ordinarily used, into purchasing one man's goods for the goods of another; 80 Fed. Rep. 105.

Cases of passing off frequently involve the use of a person's own name on his goods.

It is generally said that every man has an inherent, natural right to the free employment of his own name in his business; 78 Fed. Rep. 472; 64 id. 841; 76 id. 959; 77 id. 181; 70 id. 1017; 22 id. 41; 13 Beav. 209; 7 id. 84; 63 How. Pr. 453; 147 Ill. 462; 39 N. Y. S. 903; 80 Fed. Rep. 889; 6 L. R. A. 823. But the doctrine has its limitations. Where one uses his own name to identify the origin of his goods which are made at a particular place, no other person by the same name will be permitted to use his name on his own goods if he does it in such a way as to injure the trade and business of another, or so as to represent his goods as the goods of another; 6 L. R. A. (Fla.) 823; 122 Mass. 139. And one who uses his name in competition with an established business carried on by another of the same name, must avoid putting up his goods in such a way as to resemble the goods of the other; 80 Fed. Rep. 889. And one is not entitled to use his name as part of the name of a corporation in order to compete with another of the same name; 70 Fed. Rep. 1017; 78 Fed. Rep. 473; 37 N. Y. S. 203; 66 Fed. Rep. 56. One who uses his name will be protected against the use of that name, even by a person bearing it, in such form as to constitute a false representation of the origin of the goods; 22 Fed. Rep. 41. One cannot use his own name to deceive the public; 64 Fed. Rep. 841; 1 Ch. App. 192. One may trade honestly in his own name, but he must be careful not to trade under his own name in such a manner as to take away that which lawfully belongs to another; he must be careful not to deceive; 4 R. P. C. 215.

One should not, it is submitted, be allowed to lend his name to a firm for the purpose of competing with another of the same name, for, it being settled that he cannot lend it to a corporation (which is merely an association with limited liability), there is no reason why he should associate himself with others under a partnership and lend his name to the concern.

Where the long and successful use of a trade-mark or name is clearly established, the fact that the owner has recognised and permitted the limited use thereof by another which does not appear to have misled anybody, is not sufficient to defeat the owner's right to prevent others from using it; 85 Fed. Rep. 774.

A party may affect his right to a trade-mark by non-use, by a forbearance in suing protectively, and by adopting a new one. But the question of abandonment is always a question of intention; Brown, Trade-Marks 536; equity, however, will not in general refuse an injunction on account of delay in seeking relief where the proof of infringement is clear, even though the delay may be such as to preclude the party from any right to an account for past profits; 31 L. T. 285; 45 L. Jour. 505.

An injunction against the use of terms which cannot be protected as trade-marks, will not be granted, where the defendant has persistently warned the public that it has no connection with the plaintiff; 128 U. S. 598. But it is obvious that such a "warning" might be a more efficient cause of injury to the plaintiff.

A foreigner selling medicinal preparations in his own country, under a registered trade-mark, has no common-law right to such trade-mark here, as against a domestic firm which had an established business under a similar trade-mark, adopted in good faith, before the other had sold any goods in this country; 52 Fed. Rep. 455.

Where a patent was obtained for a medical preparation called "Castoria," under which it had attained a large sale, upon the expiration of the patent, the word "Castoria" became the property of the public; 84 Fed. Rep. 953 (C. C. A.).

So of a patented article of manufacture to which the name "Linoleum" had been given; 7 Ch. Div. 834; and of a patented article known as "Granite"; 33 N. Y. Suppl. 443. See PATENT.

Trade-mark treaties with various countries will be found in the official gazette of the patent office.

An act of March 3, 1881, provides for the registration of trade-marks, if the article is used in commerce with foreign nations or Indian tribes. It reserves to the owner all common-law rights; R. S. § 4946. The general trade-mark act of congress was declared unconstitutional in 100 U. S. 82.

In England all trade-marks must be registered, and after five years the registration is conclusive evidence of the title.

The members of a voluntary union of cigar-makers are entitled to protection in the exclusive use of a label to designate the exclusive product of their labor, though they are only employed for wages; 43 S. W. Rep. 180; contra, 144 Pa. 235; and so in a recent decision by the Vice-Chancellor in New Jersey, holding an act unconstitutional.

The courts will not grant relief where there is a false representation, calculated to deceive the public, as to the manufacture of an article, and the place where it is manufactured; 96 Cal. 518. See supra. Where a complainant uses a geographical name to represent untruthfully the place of his manufacture he cannot obtain relief; 108 U. S. 218; 128 Mass. 477; 8 Fed. Rep. 29; 70 id. 376; [1891] 2 Ch. 166.

A trade-mark is not subject to execution, unless under authority of statute; 20 N. Y. Sup. 462.

See Brown, Trade Marks; as to unfair competition, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 321, by Grafton D. Cushing.

TRADE NAME. See TRADE-MARK.

TRADE SECRETS. An employe who, in consideration of an increase in his wages, agrees not to reveal the secrets of his master's trade which are revealed to him, has no right to reveal the secrets so obtained, for his own private use, or reveal them to others. In such case equity will interfere to protect the master; 165 Pa. 24. See PRIVACY; INJUNCTION.

TRADER. One who makes it his business to buy merchandise, or goods and chattels, and to sell the same for the purpose of making a profit. See 80 N. C. 481; 76 Me. 500. The quantum of dealing is immaterial, when an intention to deal generally exists; 2 C. & P. 135; 1 Term 572. The principal question is whether the person has the intention of getting a living by his trading; if this is proved, the extent or duration of the trading is not material; 3 Camp. 238.

Questions as to who is a trader most frequently arise under the bankrupt laws; and the most difficult among them are those cases where the party follows a business which is not that of buying and selling principally, but in which he is occasionally engaged in purchases and sales.

A farmer who, in addition to his usual business, occasionally buys a horse not calculated for his usual occupation, and sells him again to make a profit, and who in the course of two years had so bought and sold five or six horses, two of which had been sold, after he had bought them, for the sake of a guinea profit, was held to be a trader; 1 Term 537, n.; 1 Price 20. Another farmer, who bought a large quantity of potatoes, not to be used on his farm, but merely to sell again for a profit, was also declared to be a trader; 1 Stra. 513. See 5 B. & P. 78; 11 East 274. A butcher who kills only such cattle as he has reared himself is not a trader, but if he buy them and kill and sell them with a view to profit, he is a trader; 4 Burr. 21, 47. A brickmaker who follows the business for the purpose of enjoying the profits of his real estate merely is not a trader; but when he buys the earth by the load or otherwise, and manufactures it into bricks, and sells them with a view to profit, he is a trader; 7 East 442; 3 C. & P. 500; so is a brewer; 47 Minn. 71; and one who is engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber is a trader; 1 B. R. 281: so is one engaged in buying and selling goods for the purpose of gain, though but occasionally; 2 id. 15; but the keeper of a livery stable is not; 3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 282; nor is one who buys and sells shares; 2 Ch. App. 466.

TRADES UNIONS. See LABOR UNION.

TRADESMAN. In England, a shopkeeper; in the United States, a mechanic or artificer of any kind, whose livelihood depends on the labor of his hands; 4 Pa. 472; a farmer is not a tradesman; 33 L. J. M. C. 80; a laundryman is not; 5 D. R. (Pa.) 43.

TRADING PARTNERSHIP. See PARTNERSHIP.

TRADING STAMPS. The current name for a scheme which consists of "an agreement between a number of merchants and a corporation that the latter shall print the names of the former in its subscribers' dictionary and circulate a number of copies of the book, and that the merchants shall purchase of the corporation a number of so-called trading stamps, to be given to purchasers with their purchases, and by them preserved and pasted in the books aforesaid until a certain number have been secured, when they shall be presented to the corporation in exchange for the choice of certain articles kept in stock by the corporation." 56 Alb. L. J. 488. In a case brought upon an act of congress of February 17, 1873, which forbids the sale of real estate or any article of merchandise or taking of payment with a promise to give any article or thing, in consideration of the purchase by any person of any other article or thing, etc., it was held that the business was nothing more nor less than a gaming device; id.

TRADITIO BREVIS MANUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The delivery of a thing by the mere consent of the parties.

TRADITIO LONGA MANU. A species of delivery which takes place where the transferor places the article in the hands of the transferee. Mackeld. Rom. L. § 284.

TRADITION (Lat. trans, over, do, dare, to give). The act by which a thing is delivered by one or more persons to one or more others.

The delivery of possession by the proprietor with an intention to transfer the property to the receiver. Two things are, therefore, requisite in order to transmit property in this way: the intention or consent of the former owner to transfer it, and the actual delivery in pursuance of that intention.

Tradition is either real or symbolical. Real tradition takes place where the ipsa corpora of movables are put into the hands of the receiver. Symbolical tradition is used where the thing is incapable of real delivery, as, in immovable subjects, such as lands and houses, or such as consist in jure (things incorporeal), as, things of fishing, and the like. The property of certain movables, though they are capable of real delivery, may be transferred by symbol. See DELIVERY; SYMBOLICAL DELIVERY.

TRADITOR. A traitor; one guilty of treason. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 21, 8.

TRAFFIC. Commerce; trade; sale or exchange of merchandise, bills, money, and the like. The passing of goods or commodities from one person to another for an equivalent in goods or money; and a trafficker is one who traffics or a trader, a merchant. 44 Ohio St. 673.

TRAFFIC RATES. See RATES.

TRAHENS. The drawer of a bill. Story, Bills § 12.

TRAIL-BASTON. See JUSTICE OF TRAIL-BASTON.

TRAIN. A number of cars coupled together and moving from point to point, under an impetus imparted by a locomotive which had been detached, is a train. 164 Mass. 28.

TRAIN-WRECKING. A conviction is not justified, where no actual wrecking occurred, unless the intention of the defendant to do so is shown; 21 S. E. Rep. 591. The indictment need not specify the passengers who were endangered; 13 S. W. Rep. 788. See CRIMES.

TRAITOR. One guilty of treason. See TREASON.

TRAITOROUSLY. In Pleading. A technical word, which is essential in an indictment for treason in order to charge the crime, and which cannot be supplied by any other word or any kind of circumlocution. Having been well laid in the statement of the treason itself, it is not necessary to state every overt act to have been traitorously committed.

TRAMP. One who roams about from place to place, begging or living without labor or visible means of support; a vagrant. Many of the states have recently adopted suitable legislation upon the subject, corresponding to the English vagrant acts. The object of these statutes is accomplished by arresting offenders and setting them to work on municipal improvements, or hiring them out to private employers, for a limited time, in Delaware for a month, for which they receive food, lodging, and reasonable wages. In some states the punishment is by imprisonment. It is doubtful if mere vagrancy was indictable at common law; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 515. Where there is no statutory definition of vagrancy, it will depend upon the common-law meaning; 90 Mich. 3.

TRANSACT. In common parlance, equivalent to carry on, when used with reference to business. 8 Mont. 140.

TRANSACTIO (Lat.). In the Civil Law. The settlement of a suit or matter in controversy, by the litigating parties between themselves without referring it to arbitration. Halifax, Civil Law b. 3, c. 8, no. 14.

TRANSACTION (from Lat. trans, and ago, to carry on). The doing or performing of any business; the management of an affair. 91 Tenn. 173. The term transaction is a broader one than contract; 70 Cal. 118.

In Civil Law. An agreement between two or more persons, who, for the purpose of preventing or putting an end to a lawsuit, adjust their difference, by mutual consent, in the manner which they agree on. In Louisiana this contract must be reduced to writing. La. Civ. Code, art. 3038.

To transact, a man must have the capacity to dispose of the things included in the transaction. In the common law this is called a compromise. See COMPROMISE.

TRANSCRIPT. A copy of an original writing or deed.

TRANSCRIPT OF RECORD. The printed record as made up in each case for the supreme court of the United States is so called.

TRANSFER (Lat. trans, over, fero, to bear or carry). The act by which the owner of a thing delivers it to another person, with the intent of passing the rights which he has in it to the latter. See 16 Neb. 238; 1 Ala. 669; STOCK.

TRANSFERABLE. The word includes every means by which property may be passed from one person to another. 17 Ch. Div. 9.

TRANSFEREE. He to whom a transfer is made.

TRANSFEROR. One who makes a transfer.

TRANSGRESSION (Lat. trans, over, gressus, a stepping). The violation of a law.

TRANSGRESSIONE. In Old English Law. A writ or action of trespas.

TRANSHIPMENT. The act of taking the cargo out of one ship and loading it in another.

When this is done from necessity, it does not affect the liability of an insurer on the goods; Abbott, Shipp. 240. But when the master transhipps goods without necessity, he is answerable for the loss of them by capture by public enemies; 1 Gall. 443.

TRANSIENT. Within the meaning of a poor-law a "transient person" is not exactly a person on a journey from one place to another, but rather a wanderer ever on the tramp. 51 Vt. 423. A transient foreigner is one who visits the country, without the intention of remaining; 10 Tex. 170. A doctor's office is not merely "transient," where he rents it by the year, and there keeps regular hours on three certain days per week; 7 D. R. Pa. 413.

TRANSIRE. A warrant for the custom-house to let goods pass; a permit. See for a form of a transire, Hargr. L. Tr. 104.

TRANSITIVE COVENANT. An obligation which binds not only the covenantor, but also his representatives.

TRANSITORY ACTION. An action the cause of which might have arisen in one place or county as well as another.

In general, all personal actions, whether ex contractu; 5 Taunt. 25; 2 Johns. Cas. 335; 3 S. & R. 500; or ex delicto; 1 Chitty, Pl. 243; are transitory; and may be maintained in a state other than the one in which the injuries were inflicted, where the cause of action is grounded on the principles of the common law, recognized in both states; 68 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 664.

Such an action may at common law be brought in any county which the plaintiff elects. See JURISDICTION; LOCAL ACTIONS.

TRANSITUS (Lat.). A transit. See STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

TRANSLATION. The reproduction in one language of what has been written or spoken in another.

In pleading, when a libel or an agreement written in a foreign language must be averred, it is necessary that a translation of it should also be given.

"Making a translation [of a contract in a foreign language] is not a mere question of trying to find out in a dictionary the words which are given as the equivalent of the words of the document; a true translation is the putting into English that which is the exact effect of the words used under the circumstances. To get at this in the present case you must get the words in English which in business have the equivalent meaning of the words in Brazilian, as used in Brazil, under the circumstances. Therefore you want a competent translator, competent to translate in that way, and if the words in Brazil had in business a particular meaning different from their ordinary meaning, you would want an expert to say what was that meaning. Amongst those experts you might want a Brazilian lawyer—and a Brazilian lawyer for that purpose would be an expert." [1891] 1 Q. B. 82, per Lord Esher, M. R.

In evidence, when a witness is unable to speak the English language so as to convey his ideas, a translation of his testimony must be made. In that case an interpreter should be sworn to translate to him, on oath, the questions propounded to him, and to translate to the court and jury.

See INTERPRETER.

The bestowing of a legacy which had been given to one, on another: this is a species of ademption; but it differs from it in this, that there may be an ademption without a translation, but there can be no translation without an ademption. Bacon, Abr. Legacies (C).

The transfer of property; but in this sense it is seldom used. 2 Bla. Com. 294.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The removal from one place to another; as, the bishop was translated from the diocese of A to that of B.

In the Civil Law, translation signifies the transfer of property. Clef des Lois Rom.

See COPYRIGHT.

TRANSMISSION (Lat. trans, over, mitto, to send). In Civil Law. The right which heirs or legatees may have of passing to their successors the inheritance or legacy to which they were entitled, if they happen to die without having exercised their rights. Domat, liv. 3, t. 1, s. 10; 4 Toullier, n. 186.

TRANSPORTATION (Lat. trans, over, beyond, porto, to carry). In English Law. A punishment inflicted by virtue of sundry statutes; it was unknown to the common law. 2 H. Blackst. 223.

TRANSVAAL. A Republic of South Africa. The president is elected for five years, and has a council of four members. The legislature is in a dual chamber, the first Volksraad and second Volksraad. The Dutch Reformed Church is the dominant religion.

TRAVAIL. The act of child-bearing. A woman is said to be in her travail from the time the pains of child-bearing commence until her delivery. 5 Pick. 63.

TRAVELLER. One who passes from place to place, whether for pleasure, instruction, business, or health; 47 Ala. 45; 5 C. B. N. S. 442; 10 id. 429. The term is used to designate those who patronize inns; the distance which they travel is not material; 35 Conn. 185.

The question whether one is or is not a bona fide traveller is one of fact; [1893] 1 Q. B. 522. One would be a traveller if he came abroad from any legitimate motive and needed refreshment, but not if he came abroad merely to go to a public house and obtain a drink; 17 C. B. N. S. 539. Walking for exercise is not travelling; 14 Allen 475. Within the meaning of a policy of insurance, one who has been carried by a steamboat and walked eight miles from the landing to his home is not, whilst walking, a traveller by public or private conveyance; 16 Wall. 336. Within the meaning of a law allowing a person travelling to carry concealed weapons, the travelling must be on a journey beyond the ordinary habit, business, or duties of a person, and beyond the circle of his friends and acquaintances; 53 Ala. 520; 42 Tex. 464. See SUNDAY.

TRAVERSE (L. Fr. traverser, to turn over, to deny). To deny; to put off.

In Civil Pleading. To deny or controvert anything which is alleged in the previous pleading. Lawes, Pl. 116. A denial. Willes 224. A direct denial in formal words: "Without this, that, etc." (absque hoc). 1 Chitty, Pl. 523, n. a. A traverse may deny all the facts alleged; 1 Chitty, Pl. 525; or any particular material fact; 20 Johns. 406.

A common traverse is a direct denial, in common language, of the adverse allegations, without the absque hoc, and concluding to the country. It is not preceded by an inducement, and hence cannot be used where an inducement is requisite: 1 Saund. 103 b.

A general traverse is one preceded by a general inducement and denying all that is last before alleged on the opposite side, in general terms, instead of pursuing the words of the allegation which it denies; Pepper, Pl. 17. Of this sort of traverse the replication de injuria sua propria absque tali causa, in answer to a justification, is a familiar example; Steph. Pl. 171.

A special traverse is one which commences with the words absque hoc, and pursues the material portion of the words of the allegation which it denies; Lawes, Pl. 116. It is regularly preceded by an inducement consisting of new matter; Steph. Pl. 188. A special traverse does not complete an issue, as does a common traverse; 20 Viner, Abr. 389.

A traverse upon a traverse is one growing out of the same point or subject-matter as is embraced in a preceding traverse on the other side; Gould, Pl. c. 7, § 42, n. It is a general rule that a traverse well intended on one side must be accepted on the other. And hence it follows, as a general rule, that there cannot be a traverse upon a traverse if the first traverse is material. The meaning of the rule is that when one party has tendered a material traverse the other cannot leave it and tender another of his own to the same point upon the inducement of the first traverse, but must join in that first tendered; otherwise the parties might alternately tender traverses to each other in unlimited succession, without coming to an issue; Gould, Pl. c. 7, § 42. The rule, however, does not apply where the first traverse is immaterial, nor where it is material if the plaintiff would thereby be ousted of some right or liberty which the law allows; Cro. Eliz. 99, 418; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (H 4).

In Criminal Practice. To put off or delay the trial of an indictment till a succeeding term. More properly, to deny or take issue upon an indictment. 4 Bla. Com. 351.

TRAVERSE JURY. See JURY.

TREASON. In Criminal Law. This word imports a betraying, treachery, or breach of allegiance. 4 Bla. Com. 75. In England, treason was divided into high and petit treason. The latter, originally, was of several forms, which, by 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, were reduced to three: the killing by a wife, of her husband; by a servant, of his master; and the killing of a prelate by an ecclesiastic owing obedience to him. These kinds of treason were abolished in 1828. In America they were unknown; here treason means high treason.

"Treason it has been said is not felony but a grade of crime by itself." 29 N. J. L. 453, 464.

The constitution of the United States, art. 3, s. 3, defines treason against the United States to consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. By the same article of the constitution, no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

It is "the only crime defined by the constitution. . . . The clause was borrowed from an ancient English statute, enacted in the year 1352. Previous to the passage of that statute there was great uncertainty as to what constituted treason. Numerous offences were raised to its grade by arbitrary construction of the law. The statute was passed to remove this uncertainty and to restrain the power of the crown to oppress the subject by constructions of this character. It comprehends all treason under seven distinct branches. The framers of our constitution selected one of these branches, and declared that treason against the United States should be restricted to the acts which it designates. 'Treason against the United States,' is the language adopted, 'shall consist only in levying war against them, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.'" No other acts can be declared to constitute the offence. Congress can neither extend, nor restrict, nor define the crime. Its power over the subject is limited to prescribing the punishment. Field, J., in 4 Sawy. 465.

By the same article of the constitution, no "attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood except during the life of the person attainted." Every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them, or adheres to their enemies giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason; R. S. § 5331. The penalty is death, or, at the discretion of the court, imprisonment at hard labor for not less than five years and a fine of not less than ten thousand dollars; and every person convicted of treason is rendered incapable of holding any office under the United States; R. S. § 5332.

The term enemies, as used in the constitution, applies only to subjects of a foreign power in a state of open hostility with us. To constitute a "levying of war" there must be an assemblage of persons with force and arms to overthrow the government or resist the laws. All who aid in the furtherance of the common object of levying war against the United States, in however minute a degree, or however remote from the scene of action, are guilty of treason; 4 Sawy. 457.

Treason may be committed against a state; 1 Story 614; 11 Johns. 549.

TREASURE. A thing hidden or buried in the earth which no one can prove as his property, and which is discovered by chance. La. Civ. C. art. 3423, par. 2.

TREASURE TROVE. Found treasure.

This name is given to such money or coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion, which, having been hidden or concealed in the earth, or other private place, so long that its owner is unknown, has been discovered by accident. Should the owner be found, it must be restored to him; and in case of not finding him, the property, according to the English law, belongs to the king. In the latter case, by the civil law, when the treasure was found by the owner of the soil he was considered as entitled to it by the double title of owner and finder; when found on another's property, one-half belonged to the owner of the estate and the other to the finder; when found on public property, it belonged one-half to the public treasury and the other to the finder. Lecons du Dr. Rom. §§ 350–352. This includes not only gold and silver, but whatever may constitute riches: as vases, urns, statues, etc.

If the owner is known it is not technically treasure-trove; 74 Me. 456. The crown is prima facie entitled to treasure trove and there need not be an inquest to inform the crown of its rights; 41 W. R. 294.

TREASURER. An officer intrusted with the treasures or money either of a private individual, a corporatiou, a company, or a state. See OFFICER; SURETYSHIP.

TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES. An officer is appointed by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate. He is required to give bond, with sufficient sureties, approved by the secretary of the treasury and the first comptroller, in the sum of $150,000, payable to the United States, for the faithful performance of the duties of his office and for the fidelity of the persons by him employed.

His principal duties are—to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the secretary of the treasury, countersigned by either comptroller and recorded by the register; to take receipts for all moneys paid by him; to render his account to the first comptroller quarterly, or oftener if required, and transmit a copy thereof, when settled, to the secretary of the treasury; to lay before each house, on the third day of every session of congress, fair and accurate copies of all accounts by him from time to time rendered to and settled with the first comptroller, and a true and perfect account of the state of the treasury; to submit at all times to the secretary of the treasury and the comptroller, or either of them, the inspection of the moneys in his hands. R. S. §§ 301–311. See DEPARTMENT.

TREASURER'S REMEMBRANCER. He whose charge was to put the lord treasurer and the rest of the judges of the exchequer in remembrance of such things as were called on and dealt in for the sovereign's behoof. There is still one in Scotland. Whart.

TREASURY. The place where treasure is kept; the office of a treasurer. The term is more usually applied to the public than to a private treasury. The word is held not to be understood in the sense of locality as descriptive of a particular building, but whenever andwhe ever moneys are in the official custody of the treasurer or subject to his direction they are to be considered as in the state treasury. 10 Mich. 86. See DEPARTMENT.

TREASURY CHEST FUND. A fund in England originating in the unusual balances of certain grants of public money, and which is used for the purpose of banking and loan companies by the commissioners of the treasury. Whart.

TREASURY NOTES. The treasury notes of the United States payable to holder or to bearer at a definite future time are negotiable commercial paper, and their transferability is subject to the commercial law of other paper of that character. Where such a paper is overdue a purchaser takes subject to the rights of antecedent holders to the same extent as in other paper bought after its maturity; 21 Wall. 188. See LEGAL TENDER.

TREATY. A compact made between two or more independent nations with a view to the public welfare. Treaties are for a perpetuity, or for a considerable time. Those matters which are accomplished by a single act and are at once perfected in their execution are called agreements, conventions, and pactions.

Personal treaties relate exclusively to the persons of the contracting parties, such as family alliances, and treaties guaranteeing the throne to a particular sovereign and his family. As they relate to the persons, they expire of course on the death of the sovereign or the extinction of his family.

Real treaties relate solely to the subject-matters of the convention, independently of the persons of the contracting parties, and continue to bind the state, although there may be changes in its constitution or in the persons of its rulers. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law § 29.

On the part of the United States, treaties are made by the president, by and with the consent of the senate, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur. Const. art. 2, s. 2, n. 2.

No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; Const. art. 1, s. 10, n. 1; nor shall any state, without the consent of congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power; id. art. 1, sec. 10, n. 2.

A treaty is declared to be the supreme law of the land, and is, therefore, obligatory on courts; 1 Cra. 103; 1 Paine 55; 124 U. S. 190; 119 id. 407; whenever it operates of itself without the aid of a legislative provision; but when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, and either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not to the judicial, department, and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule of the court; 2 Pet. 314. A treaty is a law of the land whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined; 148 U. S. 472. So an award by arbitrators under a treaty between the United States and another nation, by which the contracting nations agree that the decision of the tribunal of arbitration shall be a final settlement of all questions submitted, becomes the supreme law of the land and is as binding on the courts as an act of congress; 75 Fed. Rep. 513, reversing 45 id. 575.

It need hardly be said that a treaty cannot change the constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. A treaty may supersede a prior act of congress, and an act of congress may supersede a prior treaty; and this is true both of treaties with Indians and foreign nations; 11 Wall. 620; 8 Op. Atty-Gen. 354; 43 Fed. Rep. 17; 55 id. 80; 148 U. S. 427; 149 id. 698; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340.

A treaty providing that aliens may inherit lands is controlling, though in conflict with the laws of a state; 71 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 204.

The question whether the United States is justified in disregarding its engagements with another nation is not one for the determination of the courts; 130 U. S. 581.

Treaties should be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intention of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them; 188 U. S. 258.

So far as a treaty can be made the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal; 124 U. S. 190; 130 id. 238, 581, 143 id. 570.

Treaties are agreements between nations of a general nature bearing upon political or commercial questions, and are distinguished from conventions which are agreements relating to minor or specific subjects, such as consular conventions and postal conventions. The right to negotiate treaties is one of the tests of sovereignty. The king is usually the treaty-making power in a monarchy, though in modern times more or less restricted, and in a republic, the chief executive or some part of the legislature. After treaties have been negotiated and signed they must be ratified by the proper authorities of each state. Treaties usually provide for their own termination, but independently of that it has been held that when a treaty becomes dangerous to the life or incompatible with the independence of a state or a permanent obstacle to the development of its constitution or the rights of its people, it can be abdicated, and also when the condition of affairs which formed the basis of the treaty has become so modified by time that its execution has become contrary to the nature of things and the original intention of the parties; 22 Ct. Cls. 408. When war is declared between two states all treaties of specific relations between them cease. Snow, Int. L. 72. A treaty with a state is considered by the United States as abrogated when such state is conquered by or incorporated into another state. But England has taken an opposite position. War may affect existing treaties in various ways, but only those binding upon one or both belligerents; where they expressly provide for matters that relate only to a condition of war, they are not affected. Such was the Geneva Convention, 1864, as to the treatment of the wounded. Similarly those which create some permanent state affairs by an act done once for all; e. g. the settlements made by the Treaty of Vienna, 1815. So of a treaty ceding territory. But treaties which regulate commercial and social relations between the belligerents are at least suspended and possibly annulled by a war between them. That which relates to a continuous course of conduct, binding upon one or more belligerents and one or more third powers, will be continued, suspended, or annulled, according to the provisions. Risley, Law of War 85. But the practice has been so various and inconsistent that there is no basis for any general rule as to the effect of war on treaties; id. On breach of a treaty by one party to it, the other may declare a breach, or waive the breach and let the treaty remain in force; 1 Kent 175. Unless otherwise stipulated the breach of any one article of a treaty is a violation of the whole; id. Private rights may be sacrificed by treaty, for the public safety, but the government should compensate the individuals whose rights are affected; 1 Kent 167; 3 Dall. 199.

As affecting the rights of contracting governments, a treaty is binding from the date of its signature, and the exchange of signatures has a retroactive effect, confirming the treaty from its date; but a different rule prevails when the treaty operates on individual rights; 9 Wall. 33.

The law of the interpretation of treaties is substantially the same as in the case of other contracts; Wools. Int. L. 185. See 22 Ct. Cls. 1.

See Herstlet, collection of Commercial Treaties; PRECEDENCE; SIGNATORY.

TREATY OF PEACE. A treaty of peace is an agreement or contract made by belligerent powers, in which they agree to lay down their arms, and by which they stipulate the conditions of peace and regulate the manner in which it is to be restored and supported. Vattel, b. 4, c. 2, § 9.

Peace may be restored between belligerents by the cessation of hostilities; by the submission of one belligerent to another; and by a treaty of peace between the belligerents; 3 Phill. Int. L. 772; a formal declaration that war has ceased is not necessary; id. The belligerents may agree that possession shall be restored as it was before the war, that is, according to the status quo ante bellum; or that they shall remain as they were at the end of the war, which is expressed by the formula, uti possidetis (q. v.).

Overtures of peace may be made by either belligerent; or by a neutral; or by a state acting as a passive ally of either belligerent; or a neutral power may act as a mediator or interpose its good offices; 3 Phill. Int. L. 775.

Peace renders unlawful every act of force or violence between the states, and a capture, though made by a person ignorant of the completion, must be restored; 3 Phill. Int. L. 777; but it is said not to bind the subjects of the belligerent states until it is notified to them; Vattel 24. Where a period has been fixed by the treaty of peace for the cessation of hostilities, there is a difference of opinion as to whether a capture made before that period, but with knowledge of the peace, is lawful; that it is, see 1 Kent *172; 3 Phill. Int. L. 779. Where a capture was made before the period fixed for a cessation of hostilities, and in ignorance of the peace, and after the period, but in ignorance of the peace, there was a recapture, the recapture was held unlawful; the intervention of peace barred the title of the owner; 1 Kent 173; 6 C. Rob. 188.

TREBLE COSTS. In English Practice. The taxed costs and three-fourths the same added thereto. It is computed by adding one-half for double costs, and in addition one-half of one-half for treble costs. 1 Chitty, Pr. 27.

In American Law. In Pennsylvania the rule is different: when an act of assembly gives treble costs, the party is allowed three times the usual costs, with the exception that the fees of the officers are not to be trebled when they are not regularly or usually payable by the defendant; 2 Rawle 201.

And in New York the directions of the statute are to be strictly pursued, and the costs are to be trebled; 2 Dunl. Pr. 731.

TREBLE DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

TREBUCKET. The name of an engine of punishment, said to be synonymous with tumbrel.

TREE. A woody plant, which in respect of thickness and height grows greater than any other plant.

A woody plant, the branches of which spring from, and are supported upon, a trunk or body. It may be young or old, small or great; 70 Miss. 411.

Trees are part of the real estate while growing and before they are severed from the freehold; but as soon as they are cut down they are personal property. Some trees are timber trees, while others do not bear that denomination. See TIMBER.

Trees belong to the owner of the land where they grow; but if the roots go out of one man's land into that of another, or the branches spread over the adjoining estates, such roots or branches may be cut off by the owner of the land into which they thus grow; Rolle 394; 6 Ves. Ch. 109; 78 Cal. 611. See 107 Mass. 234; Wood, Nuis. § 112.

When the roots grow into the adjoining land, the owner of such land may lawfully claim a right to hold the tree in common with the owner of the land where it was planted; but if the branches only overshadow the adjoining land, and the roots do not enter it, the tree wholly belongs to the owner of the estate where the roots grow; 1 Ld. Raym. 737. See 1 Pick. 224; 6 N. H. 430. When the tree grows directly on the boundary-line, so that the line passes through it, it is the property of both owners, whether it be marked as a boundary or not; 12 N. H. 454; 88 Ia. 301; 84 Barb. 547; 38 Vt. 115. As to sales of standing timber, see 8 Harv. L. Rev. 367; SALE. See TIMBER TREES; NUISANCE.

An electric company may, in the observance of a statute, trim trees, if necessary, but not so as to do unnecessary damage; Crosw. Electr. 209; 39 La. Ann. 996. The subject is regulated by statute in Connecticut, Maryland, Michigan, New Hampshire, and Vermont.

Where the branches of a tree growing upon the land of one person overhang that of his neighbor, one may, without notice, cut off so much of a tree as overhangs his land, if he can do so without going upon the land of the owner, and such owner cannot acquire, either by prescription or the statute of limitations, the right to overhang his neighbor's land; [1895] App. Cas. 1, affg. [1894] 3 Ch. 1; and where a tree stands on the dividing line between adjoining lots, either owner may cut off branches or roots extending over his own land; 65 Conn. 365, distinguishing 11 id. 177; but it has been held that an injunction will lie to restrain an adjoining owner of a rural lot from destroying a tree growing on the division line; 35 W. N. C. Pa. 364. The owner of land on which a partially decayed tree is permitted to stand in such position that by falling it would damage the house of another, is liable for damages caused by its falling after he has been notified that it was dangerous; 4 App. Div. N. Y. 198.

TRESAILE, or TRESAYLE. The grandfather's grandfather. 1 Bla. Com. 186.

TRESPASS. Any misfeasance or act of one man whereby another is injuriously treated or damnified. 7 Conn. 125.

Any unlawful act committed with violence, actual or implied, to the person, property, or rights of another.

Any unauthorized entry upon the realty of another to the damage thereof.

The word is used oftener in the last two somewhat restricted significations than in the first sense here given. In determining the nature of the act, neither the amount of violence or the intent with which it is offered, nor the extent of the damage accomplished or the purpose for which the act was committed, are of any importance: since a person who enters upon the land of another without leave, to lead off his own runaway horse, and who breaks a blade of grass in so doing, commits a trespass; 2 Humphr. 325; 6 Johns. 5.

It is said that some damage must be committed to make an act a trespass. It is undoubtedly true that damage is required to constitute a trespass for which an action will lie; but, so far as the tort itself is concerned, it seems more than doubtful if the mere commission of an act affecting another, without legal authority, does not constitute trespass, though until damage is done the law will not regard it, inasmuch as the law does not regard trifles.

The distinction between the different classes of trespass is of importance in determining the nature of the remedy.

A trespass committed with force is said to be done vi et armis; one committed by entry upon the realty, by breaking the close.

In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover damages for the injury sustained by the plaintiff, as the immediate consequence of some wrong done forcibly to his person or property, against the person committing the same.

The action lies for injuries to the person of the plaintiff, as, by assault and battery, wounding, imprisonment, and the like; 9 Vt. 352; 6 Blackf. 375.

It lies, also, for forcible injuries to the person of another, whereby a direct injury is done to the plaintiff in regard to his rights as parent, master, etc.; 2 Caines 292; 8 S. & R. 36. It does not lie for mere non-feasance, nor where the matter affected was not tangible.

An action of trespass at common law will lie in a state court by the owner of one vessel against the owner of another for damages by fire at a wharf; 128 U. S. 132.

The action lies for injuries to personal property, which may be committed by the several acts of unlawfully striking, chasing if alive, and carrying away to the damage of the plaintiff, a personal chattel; 1 Wms. Saund. 84; Cro. Jac. 362; of which another is the owner and in possession; 5 Vt. 97; and for the removal or injury of inanimate personal property; 13 Pick. 139; 5 Johns. 348; of which another has the possession, actual or constructive; 21 Pick. 369; 13 Johns. 141; 6 W. & S. 323; without the owner's assent. A naked possession or right to immediate possession is sufficient to support this action; 7 Johns. 535; 17 S. & R. 251; 11 Mass. 70; 10 Vt. 165.

An action lies for an unintentional act of trespass, even if there is no malice; 19 Johns. 38; but a man who accidentally shoots another, without negligence, is not liable in an action of trespass; [1891] 1 Q. B. 86. See 153 U. S. 39; TRESPASSER.

The action lies also for injuries to the realty consequent upon entering without right upon another man's land (breaking his close). The inclosure may be purely imaginary; 1 D. & B. 371; but reaches to the sky and to the centre of the earth; 19 Johns. 381.

In an action of trespass, or trespass on the case, on land, the courts cannot try the title to the land; 86 Fed. Rep. 269. An action for trespass on land is a local action and can be brought only within the state in which the land lies; 158 U. S. 105.

An injunction will lie to restrain a trespass when the injury is irreparable, or when the trespass is a continuing one, as by cutting trees on forest land; 84 Fed. Rep. 546; Pom. Eq. Jur. 165, § 1357. See INJUNCTION.

The plaintiff must be in possession with some title; 5 East 485; 9 Johns. 61; 4 Watts 377; 4 Pick. 305; 31 Pa. 304; 5 Harring. 330; 11 Ired. 417; see 45 Mo. App. 270; though mere title is sufficient where no one is in possession; 1 Wend. 466; 1 Vt. 485; as in case of an owner to the centre of a highway; 4 N. H. 36; and mere possession is sufficient against a wrong-doer; 9 Ala. 82; or a stranger; 38 Minn. 122; 71 Wis. 276; and the possession may be by an agent; 3 M'Cord 422; but not by a tenant; 8 Pick. 235; other than a tenant at will; 15 Pick. 102. But a person holding lands under a contract of sale without any possessory rights before payment, cannot maintain an action; 95 Mich. 140.

An action will not lie unless some damage is committed; but slight damage only is required; 2 Johns. 357; 65 Vt. 673. Some damage must have been done to sustain the action; 2 Bay 421; though it may have been very slight: as, breaking glass; 4 Mass. 140; 50 Ark. 65; 11 Colo. 228.

The action will not lie where the defendant has a justification sufficient to excuse the act committed, though he acted without authority from the owner or the person affected; 8 Law Rep. 77. See JUSTIFICATION; TRESPASSER. Accident may in some cases excuse a trespass; 7 Vt. 62; 4 M'Cord 61; 12 Me. 67.

The declaration must contain a concise statement of the injury complained of, whether to the person, personal or real property, and it must allege that the injury was committed vi et armis and contra pacem. See CONTINUANDO.

The plea of not guilty raises the general issue, and under it the defendant may give in evidence any facts which show that the property was not in possession of the plaintiff rightfully as against the defendant at the time of the injury, or that the injury was not committed by the defendant with force.

Other matters must, in general, be pleaded specially. See TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM. Matters in justification, as, authority by law; 4 Mo. 1; defence of the defendant's person or property, taking a distress on premises other than those demised, etc.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 439; custom to enter; 4 Pick. 145; right of way; 7 Mass. 385; etc., must be specially pleaded. In trespass at common law the declaration need not describe the close on which the trespass was committed; 48 Ill. App. 180.

Judgment is for the damages assessed by the jury when for the plaintiff, and for costs when for the defendant.

See JUSTIFICATION.

TRESPASS DE BONIS ASPORTATIS (Lat. de bonis asportatis, for goods which have been carried away).

A form of action brought by the owner of goods to recover damages for unlawfully taking and carrying them away. 1 Me. 117. It is no answer to the action that the defendant has returned the goods; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 36 (H).

TRESPASS FOR MESNE PROFITS. A form of action supplemental to an action of ejectment, brought against the tenant in possession to recover the profits which he has unlawfully received during the time of his occupation. 3 Bla. Com. 205; 4 Burr. 1668. See MESNE PROFITS.

TRESPASS ON THE CASE. The form of action by which a person seeks to recover damages caused by an injury unaccompanied with force or which results indirectly from the act of the defendant. It is more generally called, simply, case. See CASE.

TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT (Lat. quare clausum fregit, because he had broken the close). The form of action which lies to recover damages for injuries to the realty consequent upon entry without right upon the plaintiff's land.

Close means the interest a person has in any piece of ground, whether enclosed or not; when the plaintiff had not an interest in the soil, but an interest in the profits only, trespass may be maintained; 2 Wheat. Selw. [1840].

Mere possession is sufficient to enable one having it to maintain the action; 12 Wend. 488; 22 Me. 350; 138 Ind. 147; 61 Vt. 119; except as against one claiming under the rightful owner; 6 N. H. 9; 2 Ill. 181; 7 Mo. 333; 8 Utah 406; and no one but the tenant can have the action; 19 Wend. 507; except in case of tenancies at will or by a less secure holding; 8 Pick. 333. It cannot be maintained if defendant was in possession of the locus in quo at the time of the alleged trespass, and for some years before; 148 Pa. 65. See CLOSE.

The action lies where an animal of the defendant breaks the plaintiff's close, to his injury; 7 W. & S. 367; 31 Pa. 328.

TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE. The name of the action used in South Carolina for the recovery of the possession of real property and damages for any trespass committed upon the same by the defendant.

TRESPASS VI ET ARMIS (Lat. vi et armis, with force and arms). The form of action which lies to recover damages for an injury which is the immediate consequence of a forcible wrongful act done to the person or personal property; 2 Const. 294. It is distinguished from case in this, that the injury in case is the indirect result of the act done. See CASE.

TRESPASSER. One who does an unlawful act, or a lawful act in an unlawful manner, to the injury of the person or property of another. Any act which is injurious to the property of another renders the doer a trespasser, unless he has authority to do it from the owner or custodian; 14 Me. 44; or by law; 2 Conn. 700; 10 Johns. 138; 13 Me. 250; 6 Ill. 401; and in this latter case any defect in his authority, as, want of jurisdiction by the court; 11

Conn. 95; 3 Cow. 206; defective or void proceedings; 16 Me. 33; 2 Dev. 370; misapplication of process; 6 Monr. 296; 14 Me. 312; renders him liable as a trespasser.

So, too, the commission of a legal act in an illegal manner, as, the execution of legal process illegally; 2 Johns. Cas. 27; abuse of legal process; 16 Ala. 67; exceeding the authority conferred by the owner; 13 Me. 115; or by law; 13 Mass. 520; 10 S. & R. 399; renders a man a trespasser. A ministerial officer, where it is his duty to act, cannot be made a trespasser; 137 U. S. 43; and acting in obedience to process regular on its face, and issued by a tribunal having jurisdiction and power to issue the process, is not liable for its regular enforcement, although errors may have been committed by the tribunal which issued it; 142 U. S. 293. See FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

In all these cases where a man begins an act which is legal by reason of some authority given him, and then becomes a trespasser by subsequent acts, he is held to be a trespasser ab initio (from the beginning), q. v.

A person may be a trespasser by ordering such an act done as makes the doer a trespasser; 14 Johns. 406; or by subsequently assenting, in some cases; 1 Rawle 121; or assisting, though not present; 2 Litt. 240.

It seems that a verdict for the plaintiff in quare clausum fregit does not operate as an estoppel in a subsequent action of ejectment; 31 Pa. 381.

TRESPASSER AB INITIO. A term applied to denote that one who has commenced a lawful act in a proper manner, has performed some unlawful act, or some lawful act in an unlawful manner, so connected with the previous act that he is to be regarded as having acted unlawfully from the beginning. See 6 Carpenters' Case, 8 Co. 146; s. c. 1 Sm. L. C. *216; Webb's Poll. Torts. See AB INITIO.

TRIAL. In Practice. The examination before a competent tribunal, according to the laws of the land, of the facts put in issue in a cause, for the purpose of determining such issue. 4 Mas. 282.

The examination of the matter of fact in issue in a cause. The decision of the issue of fact; Steph. Pl. 77; 22 Or. 167.

"Trial," as used in the acts of congress of July 27, 1866, and March 2, 1867, appropriately designates a trial by the jury of an issue which will determine the facts in an action at law; and "final hearing," in contradistinction to hearings upon interlocutory matters, the hearing of a cause upon its merits by a judge sitting in equity; 119 Mass. 362; 19 Wall. 214.

Trial by certificate is a mode of trial allowed by the English law in those cases where the evidence of the person certifying is the only proper criterion of the point in dispute.

Trial by grand assize is a peculiar mode of trial allowed in writs of right. See ASSIZE; GRAND ASSIZE.

Trial by inspection or examination is a form of trial in which the judges of the court upon the testimony of their own senses decide the point in dispute.

This trial takes place when, for the greater expedition of a cause, in some point or issue being either the principle question or arising collaterally out of it, being evidently the object of sense, the judges of the court, upon the testimony of their own senses, shall decide the point in dispute. For where the affirmative or negative of a question is matter of such obvious determination, it is not thought necessary to summon a jury to decide it,—who are properly called in to inform the conscience of the court in respect of dubious facts; and, therefore, when the fact from its nature must be evident in the court either from ocular demonstration or other irrefragable proof, there the law departs from its usual resort, the verdict of twelve men, and relies on its judgment alone.

Judges of courts of equity frequently decide facts upon mere inspection. The most familiar examples are those of cases where the plaintiff prays an injunction on an allegation of piracy or infringement of a patent or copyright; 5 Ves. Ch. 709, and the cases there cited.

To insure fairness, this mode of trial must be in public; the parties to the suit, or, in a criminal trial, the prisoner, must be present; but the continuance of the trial and the taking of testimony during the brief absence of the prisoner from the court-room on business connected with the trial, has been held not to be error; 25 Alb. L. J. 303; 43 N. Y. 1; but the absence of the trial judge from the court-room for any considerable time during the trial of a cause or the arguments to the jury without the consent of the parties is a material error for which the judgment will be reversed and a new trial ordered; 95 Wis. 558. Suggestions by the trial judge to the jury that in default of agreement they be kept to the end of the term, to save expense to the county, are ground for reversal; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1080. There ought to be no communication between a judge and a jury after the latter have retired unless in open court and if practicable, in the presence of counsel. 4 U. S. App. 290. See PRESENCE.

It is within the discretion of the trial court to allow the introduction of evidence out of the usual order, and in the absence of gross abuse its exercise of this discretion is not reviewable; 160 U. S. 70. It is also discretionary with the court to admit evidence to prove a point after the testimony is closed; 10 U. S. App. 98; and to refuse to allow the examination of witnesses for the purpose of elaborating previous testimony; 16 U. S. App. 30.

Where objection is made in a criminal trial to comments on facts not in evidence or exaggerated expressions of the prosecuting officer, the court should interfere and put a stop to them if they are likely to be prejudicial to the accused; 150 U. S. 118.

An objection of disorderly conduct of a trial is within the sound discretion of the trial court; and it is only when such discretion has been abused to the prejudice of the complaining party that the appellate court will interfere; 27 U. S. App. 663.

It is generally held that the prosecuting attorney has the power to enter a nolle prosequi in a criminal case without the consent of the court; 23 Colo. 466. It is properly said, however, that "the power is not unlimited."

The stages in a criminal prosecution: (1) The inauguration or preliminary stage, when the indictment is absolutely under the control of the prosecuting officer; (2) The trial of the cause and its incidents, during which the court has control, and the power of the prosecuting officer is suspended; and (3) The period between the verdict of the jury and sentence by the court; when the pardoning power of the governor attaches. State v. Moise (La.), 18 So. Rep. 948, 1895. Accordingly, the power of the district attorney to enter a nolle prosequi is subject to the following limitations: (1) After the jury has been impanelled and the charge read, he cannot discontinue if the defendant insists upon a verdict; and (2) After verdict and refusal to grant a new trial, he cannot dismiss the prosecution without the leave of the court. 18 So. Rep. (La.) 942; 34 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 7.

Trial at nisi prius. Originally, a trial before a justice in eyre. Afterwards, by Westm. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 30, before a justice of assize; 3 Bla. Com. 353. See NISI PRIUS.

Trial by the record. This trial applies to cases where an issue of nul tiel record is joined in any action.

The trial by record is not only in use when an issue of this kind happens to arise for decision, but it is the only legitimate mode of trying such issue; and the parties cannot put themselves upon the country; Steph. Pl., And. ed. 171; 2 Bla. Com. 330.

Trial by wager of battel. See WAGER OF BATTEL.

Trial by wager of law. See OATH DECISORY; WAGER OF LAW.

Trial by witnesses is a species of trial by witnesses, or per testes, without the intervention of a jury. This is the only method of trial known to the civil law.

In England, when a widow brings a writ of dower and the tenant pleads that the husband is not dead, this, being looked upon as a dilatory plea, is in favor of the widow, and, for greater expedition, allowed to be tried by witnesses examined before the judges; and so, says Finch, shall no other case in our law; Finch, Law 423. But Coke mentions others: as, to try whether the tenant in a real action was duly summoned; or, the validity of a challenge to a juror: so that Finch's observation must be confined to the trial of direct and not collateral issues.

Trial at bar. A species of trial now seldom resorted to, and, as to civil causes, abolished by the Judicature Act, 1875, was one held before all the judges of one of the supreme courts of Westminster, or before a quorum representing the full court. The celebrated case of Reg. v. Castro, otherwise Tichborne v. Orton, L. R. 9 Q. B. 350, was a trial at bar; Brown, Dict. See POSTULATION; OPEN COURT; PUBLIC TRIAL; WITNESS.

See, for an elaborate article on the conduct of counsel at trial, 45 Cent. L. J. 293.

TRIAL LIST. A list of cases marked down for trial for any one term.

TRIBUNAL. The seat of a judge; the place where he administers justice. The whole body of judges who compose a jurisdiction. The jurisdiction which the judges exercise.

The term is Latin, and derives its origin from the elevated seat where the tribunes administered justice.

Any court, forum, or judicial body. Anderson's L. Dict.

TRIBUNAUX DE COMMERCE. In French Law. Certain courts composed of a president, judges, and substitutes, which take cognizance of all cases between merchants, and of disagreements among partners. Appeals lie from them to the courts of justice. Brown, Dict.

TRIBUTARY. All streams flowing directly or indirectly into a river. [1895] 1 Q. B. 237.

TRIBUTE. A contribution which is sometimes raised by the sovereign from his subjects to sustain the expenses of the state. It is also a sum of money paid by one nation to another under some pretended right. Wolff § 1145.

TRIENNIAL ACT. An act limiting the duration of every parliament, unless sooner dissolved, TRIGAMUS. In Old English Law. One who has been thrice married; one who, at different times and successively, has had three wives.

TRIGILD. In Saxon Law. A triple payment, three times the value of a thing paid as compensation or satisfaction.

TRINEPOS (Lat.). In Roman Law. Great-grandson of a grandchild.

TRINEPTIS (Lat.). Great-granddaughter of a grandchild.

TRINITY HOUSE. See ELDER BRETHREN.

TRINITY SITTINGS. See LONDON AND MIDDLESEX SITTINGS.

TRINITY TERM. See TERM.

TRINIUMGELDUM. An extraordinary offence, consisting of three times nine, or twenty-seven times the single geld or payment. Spelm.

TRINKETS. Small articles of personal adornment or use when the object is essentially ornamental. 28 L. J. C. P. 626. See JEWELRY.

TRINODA NECESSITAS (Lat.). The threefold necessary public duties to which all lands were liable by Saxon law,—viz. for repairing bridges, for maintaining castles or garrisons, and for expeditions to repel invasions. 1 Bla. Com. 263.

TRIORS. In Practice. Persons appointed according to law to try whether a person challenged to the favor is or is not qualified to serve on the jury. They do not exceed two in number, without the consent of the prosecutor and defendant, or unless some special case is alleged by one of them, or when only one juror has been sworn and two triors are appointed with him. Co. Litt. 158 a; Bacon, Abr. Juries (E 12).

The method of selecting triors is thus explained. Where the challenge is made to the first juror, the court will appoint two indifferent persons to be triors; if they find him indifferent, he shall be sworn and join the triors in determining the next challenge. But when two jurors have been found impartial and have been sworn, then the office of the triors will cease, and every subsequent challenge will be decided upon by the jurymen. If more than two jurymen have been sworn, the court may assign any two of them to determine the challenges. To the triors thus chosen no challenges can be admitted.

The triors examine the juryman challenged, and decide upon his fitness; 3 Park. Cr. Cas. 467. Their decision is final. They are liable to punishment for misbehavior in office; 4 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 353; 15 S. & R. 156; 21 Wend. 509. The office is abolished in many of the states, the judge acting in their place; 23 Ga. 57; 43 Me. 11; 98 U. S. 157.

The lords also chosen to try a peer, when indicted for felony, in the court of the Lord High Steward, q. v., are called triors. Moz. & W.

TRIPARTITE. Consisting of three parts: as, a deed tripartite, between A of the first part, B of the second part, and C of the third part.

TRIPLICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The reply of the plaintiff (actor) to the rejoinder (duplicatio) of the defendant (reus). It corresponds to the surrejoinder of common law. Inst. 4. 14; Bracton, G. l. 5, t. 5, c. 1.

TRIPLICATION. A pleading in admiralty, second in order after a replication; now obsolete. See PLEADING.

TRISTIS SUCCESSIO. See HÆREDITAS LUCTUOSA.

TRITAVUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. The male ascendant in the sixth degree. For the female ascendant in the same degree the term is tritavia. In forming genealogical tables this convenient term is still used.

TRITHING (Sax. trithinga). The third part of a county, consisting of three or four hundreds.

A court within the circuit of the trithing, in the nature of a court-leet, but inferior to the county court. Camd. 102. The ridings of Yorkshire are only a corruption of trythings. 1 Bla. Com. 116; Spelm. Gloss. 52.

TRIUMVIRI CAPITALES, or TRE-VIRI, or TRESVIRI. In Roman Law. Officers who had charge of the prison, through whose intervention punishments were inflicted. Sallust, in Catilin.

TRIVIAL. Of small importance. It is a rule in equity that a demurrer will lie to a bill on the ground of the triviality of the matter in dispute, as being below the dignity of the court. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4237. See MAXIMS, De minimis, etc.

TRONAGE. A customary duty or toll for weighing wool: so called because it was weighed by a common trona, or beam. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 12.

TROVER (Fr. trouver, to find). In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover damages against one who has, without right, converted to his own use goods or personal chattels in which the plaintiff has a general or special property.

A generic name, applied to those torts, arising from the unlawful conversion of any particular piece of personal property owned by another; 35 S. C. 475.

In form it is a fiction: in substance, a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use. 1 Burr. 31.

The action was originally an action of trespass on the case where goods were found by the defendant and retained against the plaintiff's rightful claim. The manner of gaining possession soon came to be disregarded, as the substantial part of the action is the conversion to the defendant's use; so that the action lies whether the goods came into the defendant's possession by finding or otherwise, if he fails to deliver them upon the rightful claim of the plaintiff. It differs from detinue and replevin in this, that it is brought for damages and not for the specific articles; and from trespass in this, that the injury is not necessarily a forcible one, as trover may be brought in any case where trespass for injury to personal property will lie; but the converse is not true. In case possession was gained by a trespass, the plaintiff by bringing his action in this form waives his right to damages for the taking, and is confined to the injury resulting from the conversion; 17 Pick. 1; 17 Me. 494.

The action lies for one who has a general or absolute property; Bull. N. P. 33; 25 Me. 220; 23 Ga. 484; together with a right to immediate possession; 1 Ry. & M. 99; 22 Pick. 585; 19 N. H. 419; 6 Houst. 344; see 82 Ill. 409; 97 Mass. 87; 105 Ind. 81; as, for example, a vendor of property sold upon condition not fulfilled; 1 Meigs 76; or a special property, including actual possession as against a stranger; 2 Saund. 47; 6 Johns. 195; 15 Mass. 243; 4 Blackf. 395; as, for example, a sheriff holding under rightful process; 7 Johns. 33; 2 Murph. 19; a mortgagee in possession; 5 Cow. 233; a simple bailee; 15 Mass. 253; Wright, Ohio 744; see 76 N. C. 402; 95 Pa. 345; 61 Ga.

147; or even a finder merely; 9 Cow. 670; 2 Ala. 320; and including lawful custody and a right of detention as against the general owner of the goods or chattels; 8 Wend. 445; 3 Blackf. 419. An executor or administrator is held an absolute owner by relation from the death of the decedent; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 641; 7 Metc. 503; and he may maintain an action for a conversion in the lifetime of the decedent; T. U. P. Charlt. 261; 6 Mass. 394; and is liable for a conversion by the decedent; 1 Hayw. 21, 308, 362.

Trustees having title to chattels with an immediate right of possession may sue in trover for the chattels, although they may never have taken actual possession, but have allowed the goods to remain in the occupation of their cestui que trust; [1891] 2 Ch. 173.

The property affected must be some personal chattel; 3 S. & R. 513; specifically set off as the plaintiff's; 4 B. & C. 948; 3 Pick. 38; including title deeds; 2 Yeates 537; a copy of a record; 11 Pick. 492; money, though not tied up; 4 E. D. Smith 162; negotiable securities; 3 B. & C. 45; 3 Johns. 432; 1 Root 125, 221; 3 Vt. 99; 27 Ala. N. S. 228; animals ferœ naturæ, but reclaimed; 10 Johns. 102; trees and crops severed from the inheritance; 3 Mo. 137, 393; 15 Mass. 204; 4 Cal. 184. It will lie by a surviving partner to recover possession of the firm assets as against the representatives of the deceased partners; 17 R. I. 679. It will not lie for property in custody of the law; 9 Johns. 381; if rightfully held; see 2 Ala. 576; or to which the title must be determined by a court of peculiar jurisdiction only; 1 Cam. & N. 115; or where the bailee has lost the property, or had it stolen, or it has been destroyed by want of due care; 2 Ired. 98. Unless an actual conversion by bailee be shown, an action of trover against him will not lie without a previous demand for the goods; 79 Ga. 134. See CONVERSION.

There must have been a conversion of the property by the defendant; 8 Ark. 204. And a waiver of such conversion will defeat the action; 20 Pick. 90. Non-delivery of goods by a vessel is not a conversion of the goods; 35 U. S. App. 369. See CONVERSION; 15 Am. L. Rev. 363; 6 So. L. Rev. 822.

The declaration must state a rightful possession of the goods by the plaintiff; Hempst. 160; but need not show the nature or evidence of plaintiff's title; 91 Mich. 414; it must describe the goods with convenient certainty, though not so accurately as in detinue; Bull. N. P. 32; 5 Gray 12; must formally allege a finding by the defendant, and must aver a conversion; 12 N. Y. 313. It is not indispensable to state the price or value of the thing converted; 2 Wash. Va. 192; and where there is an actual conversion of property, demand before action is not necessary; 155 Mass. 376; 107 Mo. 665.

The plea of not guilty raises the general issue.

Judgment, when for the plaintiff, is that he recover his damages and costs, or, in some states, in the alternative, that the defendant restore the goods or pay, etc.; 19 Ga. 579; when for the defendant, that he recover his costs. The measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest; 26 Ala. N. S. 213; 30 Vt. 307; 19 Mo. 467. 133 Mass. 158, 278; see 6 Houst. 344; 64 Vt. 286.

TROY WEIGHT. See MEASURES; WEIGHT.

TRUCE. In International Law. An agreement between belligerent parties by which they mutually engage to forbear all acts of hostility against each other for some time, the war still continuing. Burlamaqui, N. & P. Law 1.

There is said to be no authoritative distinction between a truce and an armistice; perhaps the latter is generally considered a truce of a restricted character, limited as to the forces and the local area to which it applies. It may be entered into by a general or an admiral in command of an army or fleet; while a general truce can be entered into only by a commander-in-chief and requires the ratification of the state for its validity; Risley, Law of War 153.

Truces are of several kinds: general, extending to all the territories and dominions of both parties; and particular, restricted to particular places: as, for example, by sea, and not by land, etc. Id. They are also absolute, indeterminate, and general; or limited and determined to certain things: for example, to bury the dead. Id. See 1 Kent 159; Halleck, Int. Law 654.

A particular or partial truce may be made by a subordinate commander; a general truce only by the sovereign power or by its authority; 1 Kent *159.

During the continuance of a truce, either party may do within his own territory or the limits prescribed by the armistice, whatever he could do in time of peace, e. g. levy and march troops, collect provisions, receive reinforcements from his allies, or repair the fortifications of a place not actually besieged; but neither party can do what the continuance of hostilities would have prevented him from doing, e. g. repair fortifications of a besieged place; and all things, the possession of which was especially contested when the truce was made, must remain in their antecedent places; Hall, Int. Law 500; Vattel, Dr. des Gens §§ 245, 251; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law § 408.

TRUCE OF GOD (Law L. treuga Dei; Sax. treuge or trewa, from Germ. treu; Fr. trêve de Dieu). In the middle ages, a limitation of the right of private warfare introduced by the church. This truce provided that hostilities should cease on holidays, from Thursday evening to Sunday evening of each week, the whole season of Advent and Lent, and the octaves of great festivals. The penalty for breach of the truce was excommunication. The protection of this truce was also extended constantly to certain places, as, churches, convents, hospitals, etc., and certain persons, as, clergymen, peasants in the field, crusaders, and, in general, all defenceless persons. It was first introduced into Acquitaine in 1041, and into England under Edward the Confessor. 1 Rob. Charles V. App. n. xxi.

TRUCK ACTS. See LIBERTY OF CONTRACT; POLICE POWER.

TRUE. That only is true which is conformable to the actual state of things. In that sense, a statement is untrue which does not express things exactly as they are. But in another and broader sense, the word "true" is often used as a synonym of honest, sincere, not fraudulent. 111 U. S. 345.

TRUE BILL. In Practice. Words indorsed on a bill of indictment when a grand jury, after having heard the witnesses for the government, are of opinion that there is sufficient cause to put the defendant on his trial. Formerly the indorsement was Billa vera when legal proceedings were in Latin; it is still the practice to write on the back of the bill Ignoramus when the jury do not find it to be a true bill; the better opinion is that the omission of the words a true bill does not vitiate an indictment; 11 Cush. 473; 13 N. H. 488. See GRAND JURY.

TRUE COPY. A true copy, does not mean an absolutely exact copy but means that the copy shall be so true that anybody can understand it. 51 L. J. Ch. 905.

TRUE, PUBLIC, AND NOTORIOUS. These three qualities used to be formally predicted in the libel in the ecclesiastical courts, of the charges which it contained, at the end of each article, severally. Whart.

TRUST. A right of property, real or personal, held by one party for the benefit of another.

A trust is merely what a use was before the statute of uses. It is an interest resting in conscience and equity, and the same rules apply to trusts in chancery now which were formerly applied to uses; 10 Johns. 506. A trust is a use not executed under the statute of Hen. VIII.; 3 Md. 505. The words use and trust are frequently used indifferently. See 3 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *1139-1140.

Trust implies two estates or interests,—one equitable and one legal; one person as trustee holding the legal title, while another as the cestui que trust has the beneficial interest. 48 Minn. 174.

Sometimes the equitable title of the beneficiary, sometimes the obligation of the trustee, and, again, the right held, is called the trust.

But the right of the beneficiary is in the trust; the obligation of the trustee results from the trust; and the right held is the subject-matter of the trust. Neither of them is the trust itself. All together they constitute the trust.

An equitable right, title, or interest in property, real or personal, distinct from its legal ownership.

A personal obligation for paying, delivering, or performing anything where the person trusting has no real right or security, for by that act he confides altogether to the faithfulness of those intrusted.

An obligation upon a person, arising out of a confidence reposed in him, to apply property faithfully and according to such confidence. Tiedm. Eq. Jur. § 253; 4 Kent 295; 1 Saunders, Uses & Tr. 6; 3 Bla. Com. 431.

A late writer shows clearly the distinction between the fidei commissa and a trust, that in the former there was no separation of the equitable and legal title, but there was simply a request, which afterwards became a duty imposed upon the gravatus to convey the inheritance to another person, either immediately or after a certain event; whereas, in the trust, the perfect ownership is decomposed into its constituent elements of legal title and beneficial interest, which are vested in different persons at the same time. Besides the fidei commissa arose out of testamentary dispositions; whereas English trusts, until the statute of wills, were created only by conveyances inter vivos: Bisph. Eq. 895, § 50. See 15 How. 357.

Active or special trusts are those in which the trustee has some duty to perform, so that the legal estate must remain in him or the trust be defeated.

Express trusts are those which are created in express terms in the deed, writing, or will. The terms to create an express trust will be sufficient if it can be fairly collected upon the face of the instrument that a trust was intended. Express trusts are usually found in preliminary sealed agreements, such as marriage articles, or articles for the purchase of land; in formal conveyances, such as marriage settlements, terms for years, mortgages, assignments for the payment of debts, raising portions, or other purposes; and in wills and testaments, when the bequests involve fiduciary interests for private benefit or public charity. They may be created even by parol: 6 W. & S. 97; except so far as forbidden by the statute of frauds.

A written instrument though inefficacious as a will, from a want of compliance with statutory requisitions, may yet operate as a declaration of a trust; 149 U. S. 608.

Implied trusts are those which, without being expressed, are deducible from the nature of the transaction as matters of intent, or which are superinduced upon the transaction by operation of law, as matters of equity, independently of the particular intention of the parties. The term is used in this general sense, including constructive and resulting trusts (q. v.), and also in a more restricted sense, excluding those classes.

Implied trusts do not come within the statute of frauds; 66 Pa. 237.

Constructive trusts are those which arise purely by construction of equity, and are entirely independent of any actual or presumed intention of the parties. Such trusts have not, technically, any element of fraud in them; Bisp. Eq. § 91. Under this branch of trusts it has been said that "wherever one person is placed in such relation to another, by the act or consent of that other, or the act of a third person, or the law, that he becomes interested for him, or interested with him in any subject of property or business; he is prohibited from acquiring rights in that subject antagonistic to the person with whose interest he has become associated." 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 62. The rule as to such trusts applies not only to persons standing in a direct fiduciary position towards others, such as trustees, attorneys, etc., but also to those who occupy any position out of which a similar duty ought in equity and good morals to arise: as against partners; 4 Seld. 236; tenants in common, 72 Pa. 442; mortgagees; 48 Mo. 231; as against agent, buying goods with the principal's money; 6 Mackey 421; Bisp. Eq. § 93.

If one obtains a title to land by artifice or concealment, equity will enforce a trust in favor of the party justly entitled thereto; 145 U. S. 317. Whoever comes into possession of trust property, with notice of the trust, is bound to the execution of the trust; 25 Ill. 73.

A trustee who buys at his own sale, even if public, will still be considered, at the option of the cestui que trust, a trustee. See 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 248. This is not upon the ground of fraud, but of public policy. See 18 Allen 419. So if a person obtains from a trustee trust property without paying value for it, although without notice of the trust, he will in such case be held a trustee by construction; Bisp. Eq. § 95; Tiedm. Eq. Jur. § 312. And in case of a contract for the sale of land, equity considers the vendor as a trustee of the legal title for the purchaser; ibid.

A passive or dry or simple trust is one which requires the performance of no duty by the trustee to carry out the trust, but by force of which the mere legal title rests in the trustee.

As to executory and executed trusts, see those titles.

An executed trust is one explicitly declared in writing, duly signed, stating the conditions upon which the legal title is held, and the final intention of the creditor, so that the trustee can carry that intention into effect. 115 Ind. 423.

Trusts may also be distinguished as public and private trusts. The former are constituted for the benefit either of the public at large or some particular portion of it answering to a particular description; while the latter are those wherein the beneficial interest is vested absolutely in one or more individuals who are, or may be within a certain time, definitely ascertained. Bisp. Eq. § 59.

A trust arises when property has been conferred upon one person and accepted by him for the benefit of another. The former is a trustee, and holds the legal title, and the latter is called the cestui que trust, or beneficiary. In order to originate a trust, two things are essential,—first, that the ownership conferred be connected with a right, or interest, or duty for the benefit of another; and, second, that the property be accepted on these conditions.

The modern trust includes not only those technical uses which were not executed by the statute of uses, but also equitable interests which never were considered uses, and did not, therefore, fall within the provisions of this statute. These equitable interests, in common with the unexecuted uses, received the name of trusts; Bisp. Eq. § 52. The statute of uses provided that where one was seized to the use of another, the cestui que use should be deemed to be in lawful seizin and possession of the same estate in the land itself as he had in the use.

A trust which at the time of its creation is a passive trust will be executed by this statute, although the word trust instead of use is employed. But where a trust which has once been active becomes passive, such a trust is not necessarily executed by the statute. If the mere fact that the trustee had active duties to perform was the only circumstance that prevented the statute from operating, the trust will be executed when the active duties have ceased. But if the non-execution of the trust by the statute did not originally and solely depend upon the activity of the trust, the fact that the trust has ceased to be active will not of itself cause the statute to apply; but the trustee is then bound to convey the legal estate at the request of the cestui que trust; and after a great lapse of time, and in support of long-continued possession on the part of the person holding the beneficial interest, such a conveyance will be presumed; Bisp. Eq. § 55. A bequest of personalty to a trustee for the use and benefit of another, without words of restriction, vests the absolute property of the fund in the beneficiary; 83 Fed. Rep. 19.

When active duties are to be performed by the trustee, it will, generally, not be executed; Bisp. Eq. § 56; 5 Wall. 119, 168; though where there was a separate use for a feme sole not in contemplation of marriage, it was held that as this separate use was void, the trust fell, although the trustee had active duties to perform; 70 Pa. 201. Where an estate is given in trust to pay one-half the income to each of two persons, it is not a gift of one-half the principal to be held for each, but of all to be held jointly for both, and it should remain intact until the period of distribution arises; 119 Pa. 52; 105 id. 121.

Before the statute of frauds, a trust, either in regard to real or personal estate, might have been created by parol as well as by writing. The statute required all trusts as to real estate to be in writing; 4 Kent 305; Adams, Eq., 8th ed. 27.

Trusts as to partnership interests in real estate are not within the statute of uses and trusts. See 111 N. Y. 423.

No particular form of words is requisite to create a trust. The court will determine the intent from the general scope of the language; Beach, Eq. Jur. § 161; 10 Johns. 496; 4 Kent 305; 127 U. S. 300.

The facts, however, to warrant the inference of a trust, must be more than loose and general declarations; but, on the other hand, parol declarations will not be received to contradict the inference of a trust in land fairly deducible from written declarations; 5 Johns. Ch. 2.

A party who acquires title to property wrongfully may be adjudged a trustee ex maleficio in respect to that property; 151 U. S. 1.

A trust, as to personal property, may be proved by parol evidence; 1 Hare 158; 3 Bla. Com. 431; 148 Mass. 289; and parol evidence is admissible against the face of a deed itself to show all the facts out of which a resulting trust arises; 37 W. Va. 507. A cestui que trust cannot, generally, hold the beneficial enjoyment of property free from the rights of his creditors; 1 Sm. L. C. 119; though a limitation over to another in case of the insolvency of the cestui que trust is valid; Bisp. Eq. 61; 5 Wall. 441. See SPENDTHRIFT.

Equity will follow trust moneys as far as they can be identified; 19 U. S. App. 256; but the right fails when the means of ascertainment fail; 22 Pa. 16. See EARMARK.

Trust funds held for a charitable object are not liable for the torts of a trustee; 120 Pa. 624.

If a trustee dies, or fails or refuses to execute or accept the trust, or no trustee is named, the trust does not for that reason fail. It is a settled rule that the court of chancery will provide a trustee or attend to the execution of the trust; 10 Sim. 256; Adams, Eq. 36.

Trusts are interpreted by the ordinary rules of law, unless the contrary is expressed in the language of the trust; 15 Ind. 269; 8 Des. 256.

The rules for the devolution of equitable estates are the same as those for the descent of legal titles, and fall under the operation of the various intestate acts: Bisp. Eq. § 60. If the legal title to real estate cannot be taken by an alien, the beneficial ownership cannot be enjoyed by him; 5 How. 270. In some states, as New York, Michigan, and Louisiana, the operation of trusts has been much narrowed; Bisp. Eq. § 56.

An assignment in trust for the benefit of creditors is valid without assent on the part of the creditors; 25 Wash. L. Rep. 822; contra, in England, [1897] 2 Q. B. 19; and in Massachusetts; 8 Mass. 144. In [1897] 2 Q. B. 19, it was held that an assignment in trust for particular persons is irrevocable, while one for creditors in general is revocable. See TRUSTEE.

As to those combinations of capital now known as "Trusts," see RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Since the title RESTRAINT OF TRADE was in print the supreme court has handed down a decision in United States v. Joint Traffic Association. The court was of opinion that the contract in suit was substantially the same as that involved in the Trans-Missouri Case, 166 U. S. 200; and also that the latter case had decided that the contract involved was in restraint of trade. It further held that the anti-trust act is valid and a proper exercise of the powers of congress.

TRUST COMPANY. The business of such companies consists largely in the administration of trusts of various kinds, and particularly those arising under corporate mortgages. It is a common practice for them to become surety on bonds in legal proceedings and in various other ways, and they usually also transact a safe deposit business. See SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANIES. As to the administration of trusts by such companies in England, see 5 L. Quart. Rev. 395. It has been held in the orphans' court of Philadelphia that an act was unconstitutional which permits an accountant to pay a trust company for becoming surety on his official bond, and charges the cost to the estate.

TRUST DEED. A deed given to a trustee for the purpose of securing a numerous class of creditors, as the bondholders of a railroad corporation, with power to sell on failure of the payment of their bonds, notes, or other claims.

It is the practice in many states to secure loans by a trust deed instead of a mortgage.

TRUST FUND DOCTRINE. See STOCKHOLDER.

TRUSTEE. A person in whom some estate, interest, or power in or affecting property of any description is vested for the benefit of another.

One to whom property has been conveyed to be held or managed for another.

To a certain extent, executors, administrators, guardians, and assignees are trustees, and the law of trusts so far is applicable to them in their capacity of trustees; Hill, Trust. 49.

Trusts are not strictly cognizable at common law, but solely in equity; 16 Pet. 25.

Any reasonable being may be a trustee. The United States or a state may be a trustee; 15 How. 367; 15 Fla. 455, 600; 37 Fed. Rep. 743. So may a corporation; 7 Wall. 1; Perry, Trusts § 42.

"Whoever is capable of taking the legal title or beneficial interest in property may take the same trust for others." Perry, Trusts § 39. Non-resident natural persons are not disqualified from acting as trustee; 4 Am. Ry. Rep. 291; an act which declares such person disqualified is in conflict with the federal constitution; 27 Fed. Rep. 146, arguendo; 3 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1093; 52 Fed. Rep. 857; but this constitutional provision does not extend to foreign corporations.

A foreign corporation may be a trustee; Cook, Stock, etc. § 513.

A foreign corporation must comply with local statutes; 68 Ill. App. 666; contra, 49 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 1068; 37 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 948. See 150 Mass. 271; 147 id. 224. In 68 Fed. Rep. 412, where a statute of Illinois declared any trust unlawful when vested in a foreign trust company unless it had complied with certain requirements of the statute, it was held that a trust under a railroad mortgage vested in such a company merely a naked legal title, while the beneficial title was in the bondholders; and that the court would enforce the security by a judicial sale. But a non-resident trust company was removed as trustee under an Illinois railroad mortgage; 173 Ill. 489.

A mortgage upon railroad property in Illinois executed to a foreign trust corporation as trustee, to secure bonds made payable outside of the state, is not prohibited by the laws or public policy of that state; 28 Fed. Rep. 169.

The legislature of a state alone has the power to accept a bequest to the state in trust; 69 Conn. 64.

The trustee of a railroad mortgage represents the bondholders who are bound by his assent; 65 Fed. Rep. 351. See MORTGAGE; INTERVENTION.

A trustee after having accepted a trust cannot discharge himself of his trust or responsibility by resignation or a refusal to perform the duties of the trust; but he must procure his discharge either by virtue of the provisions of the instrument of his appointment, or by the consent of all interested, or by an order of a competent court; 4 Kent 311.

Trustees are not allowed to speculate with the trust property, or to retain any profits made by the use of the same, or to become the purchasers upon its sale. See TRUST. If beneficial to the parties in interest, the purchase by the trustee may be retained or confirmed by the court. And the trustee may be compelled to account for and pay over to the cestui que trust all profits made by any use of the trust property; 4 Kent 438. A trustee cannot become a purchaser at his own sale, without special permission; 127 U. S. 589. A purchase by a trustee of trust property for his own benefit is not absolutely void, but voidable; and may be confirmed by the parties interested either directly or by long acquiescence; 143 U. S. 224.

A court of equity never allows a trust to fail for want of a trustee; 5 Paige, Ch. 46; 6 Whart. 571; 5 B. Monr. 113; 2 How. 188; 75 Ia. 429. See 116 Ind. 139.

Whenever it becomes necessary, the court will appoint a new trustee, and this though the instrument creating the trust contain no power for making such appointment. The power is inherent in the court; 7 Ves. Ch. 480; 2 Sandf. Ch. 336; 1 Beav. 467; 85 Me. 79. See 44 N. J. Eq. 349. So the court may create a new trustee on the resignation of the former trustee; 11 Paige, Ch. 314; 3 Barb. Ch. 76; Hill, Trust. 190. A court will not allow a trust to fail or to be defeated by the refusal or neglect of the trustee to execute a power, if such a power is so given that it is reasonably certain that the donor intended it to be exercised; 85 Va. 966.

The power of equity to remove a trustee and to substitute another in his place is incidental to its paramount duty to see that trusts are properly executed, and may properly be exercised whenever his continuance in office would be detrimental to the trust, and even if for no other reason than that human infirmity would prevent the co-trustees or their beneficiaries from working in harmony, and although charges against him are either not made out or are greatly exaggerated; 167 U. S. 310. A trustee is entitled to all reasonable expenses in carrying out the trust and all expenses reasonably necessary for the security, protection, and preservation of the property as well as for the prevention of a failure of the trust; 142 id. 326.

The mere naming a person trustee does not constitute him such. There must be an acceptance, express or implied; see 14 Wall. 139; as the acceptance is essential to the vesting of title in the trustee; 119 Mo. 572. But if the person named trustee does not wish to be held responsible as such, he should, before meddling with the duties of a trustee, formally disclaim the trust; 7 Gill & J. 157; 1 Pick. 370.

Ordinarily, no writing is necessary to constitute the acceptance of a trust in writing; 12 N. H. 432.

The duties of trustees have been said, in general terms, to be: "to protect and preserve the trust property, and to see that it is employed solely for the benefit of the cestui que trust." Bisp. Eq. § 138.

He must take possession of the trust property, and call in debts, and convert such securities as are not legal investments. Personal securities are not legal investments although the investment was made by the testator himself; 40 N. Y. 76; 18 Pa. 303; unless, by the terms of the trust, they are allowed; Bisp. Eq., 5th ed. (1893) § 139.

He will not be liable for the failure of a bank in which he has deposited trust funds, unless he has permitted them to be there for an unreasonable length of time; 29 Beav. 211; or has deposited them in his own name; 119 Ind. 593; as he must not mix them with his own funds; 8 Pa. 431; 41 Ala. 709. The addition of the word "trustee" to the signature of the drawer of a check constitutes such notice of a trust as to put the payee upon inquiry; 26 App. Div. N. Y. 615.

Investments by executors contrary to the requirements of the will, upon mere personal security, are at their risk; 48 N. J. Eq. 559. A trustee is personally liable for trust funds invested in personal securities; 2 Con. Sur. 458, and if invested in his own business, or for his own benefit, he becomes an insurer of the fund; 85 Me. 129; and is guilty of neglect if he loans money on an unsecured note; 36 S. C. 822. See 9 L. R. A. 279.

A trustee should not invest trust funds in trade or speculation; nor in bank stock, or stock of public companies; 4 Barb. 626; 18 Pa. 308; but see 9 Pick. 446; or in personal securities; 2 Con. Sur. (N. Y.) 458; he may invest in mortgages.

A trustee, though remunerated for his services, is not liable to the trust estate for loss caused by the thefts of a servant employed by him, where he has exercised due care in the selection of the servant; [1898] 1 Ch. 71.

Ordinarily the law will not permit a trustee to contract with his cestui que trust for a pecuniary advantage; to do so, he must first dissolve the fiduciary relation; 128 Ill. 480; and every such contract is open to suspicion; 70 Ind. 508.

A writer has deduced the following rules as to investments by trustees (18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 210): Where there is no express power of sale in the instrument creating a trust, and none is necessarily implied, and the discretion of the trustee is the sole restriction upon investments, he will generally be protected where he has acted bona fide and with reasonable diligence and prudence. But in a state where the trustee is protected from loss which may arise from certain specified and so-called legal investments, the rule is much more stringent, and extraordinary care and diligence are required of the trustee as well as bona fides, and it is dangerous to invest trust funds in any other securities than those thus indicated.

But where there is no express power of sale given, and where none such can necessarily be implied from the nature of the trustee's duties, the only safe means of changing an insecure investment, left so by the creator of the trust, is to make the change under the direction of the proper court, and if done without such authority, the trustee will be liable to the cestui que trust for breach of trust.

Where there is no such power of sale and the trustee leaves unchanged an investment made by the testator and loss ensues, he will generally be protected if acting with bona fides, even in cases where, if there had been a power of sale and he had neglected to sell, he would have been liable under the first rule laid down above.

A trustee will not be surcharged for a loss which has occurred to the estate if he has exercised common skill, prudence, and caution, but he will be held responsible for supine negligence or wilful default; 182 Pa. 407. Where a trustee held on to mortgages on agricultural land in hopes that an apparently temporary depression would pass away, it was held that he had committed only an error of judgment and was not liable for loss; [1896] 1 Ch. 323.

An act of 1896 in England provides that if a trustee acts honestly and reasonably, he may be relieved wholly or partly from personal liability for loss through investments; [1897] 1 Ch. 586.

The office and duties of trustees being matters of personal confidence, they are not allowed to delegate these powers unless such a power is expressly given by the authority by which they were created; and where one of several trustees dies, the trust, as a general rule, in the United States, will devolve on the survivor, and not on the heirs of the deceased; 3 Mer. 412; 11 Paige, Ch. 314; but a trustee may appoint an agent where it is usual to do so in the ordinary course of business; 10 Pa. 285; 8 Cow. 543. Where a trustee has delegated his trust, there is no question of primary and secondary liability in respect of a breach of trust, but all are equally liable; 68 Law T. 18.

While the law allows any person named as trustee to disclaim or renounce, he cannot, if he has by any means accepted and entered upon the trust, rid himself of the duties and responsibilites after such acceptance, except by a legal discharge by competent authority; 4 Johns. Ch. 136; 1 My. & K. 195. Disclaimer of a trust may be established by acts, or by non-action long continued; 119 Mo. 573. Where trustees who hold church property have seceded from the church, and also been expelled, they have divested themselves of all control of the church property and cannot maintain a bill to enjoin any one from doing anything which affects the property; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 475.

The trustee is in law generally regarded as the owner of the property, whether the same be real or personal; Hill, Trust. 229. Yet this rule is subject to material qualifications when taken in connection with the doctrines of powers and uses, and the legislation of the several states; 1 How. 134; 4 Kent 321.

The quality and continuance of the estate of a trustee will be determined by the purpose and exigency of the trust, rather than by the phraseology employed in the description of the estate conveyed; and, therefore, if the language be that the estate goes to the trustee and his heirs, it may be limited to a shorter period, if thereby the purposes of the creation of the trust are satisfied; 8 Hare 156; 4 Den. 385.

Where there are several trustees, they are considered to hold as joint-tenants, and on the death of any one the property remains vested in the survivor or survivors; and on the death of the last, the property, if personal (at common law), went to the heir or personal representative of the last-deceased trustee. But the rule as to trust property going to heirs and executors is changed in most of the states, so that in theory the court of chancery assumes the control, and it appoints a new trustee on the decease of former trustees. If power be committed to two or more trustees, it is regarded as coupled with an interest, and will still exist in the surviving trustee on the death of any or all of the co-trustees. 2 Prob. Rep. Ann. (Ind.). 33.

If the power is confided to several trustees, nominatim, it imports a personal discretion or confidence of a personal nature, and on the death of one of these donees the power dies with him and cannot he exercised by the survivors; id.; 13 Sim. 91; 4 Kent 311; Beach, Eq. Jur. § 240.

Each trustee has equal interest in and control over the trust estate; and hence, as a general rule, they cannot (as executors may) act or bind the trust separately, but must act jointly; 4 Ves. Ch. 97; 3 Ark. 384; 8 Cow. 544; 20 Me. 504; 11 Barb. 527.

Unlike joint executors, joint trustees cannot act separately, but must join both in conveyances and receipts; for one cannot sell without the others, or receive more of the consideration-money or be more a trustee than his partner. The trust having been given to the whole, it requires their joint act to do anything under it. They are not responsible for money received by their co-trustees, if the receipt be given for the mere purposes of form. But if receipts be given under circumstances purporting that the money, though not received by both, was under the control of both, such a receipt shall charge, and the consent that the other shall misapply the money, particularly where he has it in his power to secure it, renders him responsible; 11 S. & R. 71.

A trustee is, generally, not responsible for the conduct of his co-trustee; see 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 858; where several trustees join in a receipt, prima facie, all will be considered to have received the money, but one of them may show that he did not in fact receive the money, but joined in the receipt for conformity; Bisp. Eq. § 146. A trustee who stands by and sees a fraud on the trust committed by his co-trustee will be held responsible for it; 17 Pa. 268. But trustees are not liable for the conversion of money collected by their co-trustee, in course of administration of the trust, without their knowledge or consent; 72 Hun 272.

Where there are several trustees, all must concur in any business of the trust; otherwise if it be a public trust, where the acts of a majority are binding; Bisp. Eq. § 147.

A trustee may come into equity to obtain advice and assistance in the execution of his trust; Hill, Trust. 298.

One trustee may be held responsible for losses which he has enabled a co-trustee to cause, though there was no actual participation by him; 18 Ohio 509; 5 How. 233. It is the duty of each trustee to carry out the trust, and a trustee cannot relieve himself of the duty by agreement with his co-trustees to look after only certain parts of the trust property; 147 U. S. 557.

Where the legal estate is vested in trustees, all actions at law relative to the trust property must be brought in their name, but the trustee must not exercise his legal powers to the prejudice of a cestui que trust, and third persons must take notice of this limitation of the legal rights of a trustee; 2 Vern. 197.

The trustee (and also his personal representatives to the extent of any property received from the trustee) is responsible in suit for any breach of trust, and will be compelled to compensate what his negligence has lost of the trust estate. He is not only chargeable with the principal and income of the trust property he has received, but is liable for an amount equal to what, with good management, he might have received; and this includes interest on a sum he has needlessly allowed to remain where it earned no interest; 2 Beav. 430; 4 Russ. 195.

A court of equity has power to remove a trustee, independently of any statutory provisions or of directions contained in the instrument of appointment; 8 Ind. App. 27. The rule as to the right of a trustee to contribution from his co-trustee for loss by a breach of trust for which both are equally to blame, does not apply where one of the trustees is also a cestui que trust and has received an exclusive benefit by the breach of trust; in that case the rule to be applied is that under which the share or interest of a cestui que trust who has assented to, and profited by a breach of trust has to bear the whole loss; and the trustee who is a cestui que trust must, therefore, indemnify his co-trustee to the extent of his share or interest in the trust estate, and not merely to the extent of the benefit he has received; [1896] 1 Ch. D. 685.

On the death of a trustee, the legal title passes to his heirs, and it becomes their duty to care for trust property, or have a new trustee appointed; 113 Mo. 188.

Commissions upon the corpus of a trust estate are never allowed except when the fund is in course of distribution; 161 Pa. 457; except under extraordinary circumstances; id.

TRUSTEE PROCESS. A legal process used in the New England states, and similar to the garnishee process of others.

All goods, effects, and credits so intrusted or deposited in the hands of others that the same cannot be attached by ordinary process of law, may, by an original writ or process, the form of which is given by the statute, be attached in whose hands or possession soever they may be found, and they shall, from the service of the writ, stand bound and be held to satisfy such judgment as the plaintiff may recover against the principal defendant; Cushing, Trustee Pr. 2. It is issued as part of the original writ.

TUB. A measure containing sixty pounds of tea, and from fifty-six to eighty-six pounds of camphor. Jacob.

TUB-MAN. In Old English Law. A barrister who has a pre-audience in the exchequer, and also one who has a particular place in court, is so called.

TUCKER ACT. The act of March 3, 1887, relating to the jurisdiction of the court of claims. Garl. & Ralston, Fed. Pr. 413. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

TUG. A steam vessel built for towing; practically synonymous with towboat.

Tugs are subject to the ordinary rules of navigation touching collisions. Where a schooner was being towed by a tug lashed to her port side, the fact that the schooner had a pilot on board did not make the tug the mere servant of the schooner, so as to exempt the tug from responsibility; 11 Fed. Rep. 319; 93 U. S. 302.

A tug is not a common carrier or insurer, and is bound only to reasonable care and skill; 80 Fed. Rep. 153; 63 Pa. 51; 94 U. S. 494. See TOWBOAT.

A tug and tow while being slowly navigated are held not to blame in a collision with a steam ship in a fog, although they do not stop where there are indications of danger. It is not subject to the same rule as two steam ships approaching each other under like circumstances; [1897] P. 28. A contribution in general average cannot be had against a steam tug for casting off the tow of barges in order to save the tug; the tug and barges do not constitute a single maritime adventure; 167 U. S. 599. Towage contracts are within admiralty jurisdiction; 5 Bened. 720. See TOWAGE.

TUMBREL. An instrument of punishment made use of by the Saxons, chiefly for the correction of scolding women by ducking them in water, consisting of a stool or chair fixed to the end of a long pole.

TUMULTUOUS PETITIONING. Under stat. 13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 5, this was a misdemeanor, and consisted in more than twenty persons signing any petition to the crown or either house of parliament for the alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the contents thereof had been approved by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at assizes or quarter sessions. No petition could be delivered by more than ten persons. 4 Bla. Com. 147; Moz. & W.

TUN. A measure of wine or oil, containing four hogsheads.

TUNGREVE. A reeve or bailiff. Spelman, Gloss.

TUNNEL. A municipal corporation, authorized by law to improve a street by building on the line thereof a tunnel under a navigable river, incurs no liability for damages unavoidably caused to adjoining property by obstructing the street or river, unless such liability be imposed by statute. 99 U. S. 635.

TURBARY. In English Law. A right to dig turf; an easement. It cannot be dug for sale; Noy 145.

TURKEY. An empire of Europe and Asia. The supreme legislative and executive power is exercised by the Sultan through a Grand Vizier and the Sheikhu 'l-Islam, who presides over the 'ulema, a corporate body comprising the chief judges, theologians, and jurists. The Grand Vizier is President of the Mejliss-i-Khass or Privy Council of thirteen members. The laws are based on the precepts of the Koran interpreted by the Mufti. Next in importance to the Koran is the Multeka or code formed of the supposed opinions of Mahomet and the sentences of his immediate successors. Another code of laws is the Cannon-nameh, drawn up by Solyman the Magnificent. Foreigners residing in Turkey are, in matters of landed property, subject to Ottoman law, otherwise they are under the laws of their respective countries and are tried by a tribunal presided over by their consul. Cases between persons of different nationalities are tried in the court of the defendant. Cases between foreigners and Turkish subjects are tried in Ottoman courts, a Dragoman of the foreign consulate being present and a sentence against a foreigner being carried out through his consulate.

TURN, or TOURN. See SHERIFF'S TOURN.

TURNKEY. A person under the superintendence of a jailor, whose employment is to open and fasten the prison-doors and to prevent the prisoners from escaping.

It is his duty to use due diligence; and he may be punished for gross neglect or wilful misconduct in permitting prisoners to escape.

TURNOUT. A short side-track on a railroad which may be occupied by one train while another is passing on the main track; a siding. 19 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 356. See RAILROAD.

TURNPIKE. See TURNPIKE ROAD.

TURNPIKE-ROAD. A road or highway over which the public have the right to travel upon payment of toll, and on which the parties entitled to such toll have the right to erect gates and bars to insure its payment. 6 M. & W. 428; 85 Ky. 244.

Turnpike-roads are usually made by corporations under legislative authority; and, the roads being deemed a public use, such corporations are usually armed with the power to take private property for their construction. The title to the soil remains in the owners of the adjoining land; 27 N. J. L. 76; and, after the franchise for the construction of the turnpike has expired, the road reverts to the public; 104 Pa. 583; 10 Nev. 155. The legislature may authorize the conversion of an existing highway into a turnpike-road; 18 Conn. 82; 3 Barb. 159; without any pecuniary equivalent to the owner of the fee, such road still remaining a public highway; 2 Ohio St. 419; but no matter how bad the condition of a public road, its condition is no justification to a turnpike company for taking it as the line of a turnpike; 128 Pa. 621. A turnpike-road being a highway, any obstruction placed thereon renders the author of it liable as for a public nuisance; 16 Pick. 175; 8 Wend. 555.

A turnpike company cannot be deprived of its road or its franchise by the extension of the limits of a municipal corporation to include the road; 132 Ind. 80. It is held that municipal authorities may require the grade of a turnpike within its limits to be changed to conform to that of a street; 39 N. J. L. 500; and the municipality may require the turnpike to be kept in repair, but the city is not liable for a failure to do so; 32 N. J. L. 548; and a municipality may, by legislative authority, tax itself in aid of a turnpike company; 1 Wall. 175; 20 Gratt. 661; 41 Conn. 211.

A statute attempting to authorize a court, without a jury, to declare a turnpike-road abandoned and its franchise forfeited because the road has been out of repair for six months, violates the constitution guaranty of trial by jury and against the deprivation of property without due process of law; 50 Ohio St. 568.

Turnpike companies, so long as they continue to take toll, are bound to use ordinary care in keeping their roads in suitable repair, and for any neglect of this duty are liable to action on the case for the damages to any person specially injured thereby; 6 Johns. 90; 10 Pick. 35; see 29 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 721; and to an indictment on the part of the public; 4 Ired. 16; 10 Humphr. 97; 26 Ala. N. S. 88; 1 Harr. N. J. 222; 9 Barb. 161; 2 Gray 58.

Travellers are liable for toll though they avoid the gates; 2 Root 524; 10 Vt. 197; but not for travel between the gates without passing the same; Elliot, Roads 70; 2 B. Monr. 30; 10 Ired. 30; 11 Vt. 381. In an action by a company to enforce the statutory penalty for illegally passing its tollgate, it is no defence that the road was not in good condition; 95 Mich. 372. Exemptions from toll are construed most liberally in favor of the community; Ang. High. § 359; and are usually created by special statute in relation to different kinds of vehicles; 24 N. Y. 658; going to or from mills; 15 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 510; in favor of husbandry; 24 N. J. L. 205; going to church; 2 B. & Ald. 206; ordinary domestic business of family concerns; 12 Vt. 212. Mail coaches are subject to toll, but may not be delayed for non-payment; 2 W. & S. 168.

A turnpike company authorized to collect toll from designated carriages, etc., may collect toll from bicycles, although the amount of toll cannot be exactly determined by the method designated for other vehicles; 167 Pa. 582; a contrary result has recently been reached in New Jersey in a case noted in the public press.

A "shunpike" is a road or turnpike laid out by an individual or by the selectmen of the town to facilitate the evasion of toll by travellers upon a turnpike road and will entitle the turnpike company to an action on the case for the damages, or to an injunction ordering the same to be closed; Elliot, Roads, p. 74; 10 N. H. 133; 18 Conn. 451; 1 Johns. Ch. 315; 36 S. W. Rep. 979; unless made necessary by the lay of the land and the wants of the community; 11 Pet. 420. And such company has been held entitled to compensation for the injury to their franchise by a highway which intersects their road at two distinct points and thereby enables travellers to evade the payment of tolls, though such highway be regularly established by the proper authorities to meet the necessities of public travel; 1 Barb. 286.

TURPIS CAUSA (Lat.). A base or vile consideration, forbidden by law, which makes the contract void: as, a contract the consideration of which is the future illegal cohabitation of the obligee with the obligor.

TURPITUDE (Lat. turpitudo, from turpis, base). Everything done contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals, is said to be done with turpitude.

TUTELA (Lat.). A power given by the civil law over a free person to defend him when by reason of his age he is unable to defend himself. Women by the civil law could only be tutors of their own children. A child under the power of his father was not subject to tutelage, because not a free person, caput liberum.

Legitima tutela was where the tutor was appointed by the magistrate.

TUTELAGE. See TUTELA.

TUTEUR OFFICIEUX. In French Law. TUTOR. In Civil Law. One who has been lawfully appointed to the care of the person and property of a minor.

By the laws of Louisiana, minors under the age of fourteen years, if males, and under the age of twelve years, if females, are, both as to their persons and their estates, placed under the authority of a tutor. Above that age, and until their majority or emancipation, they are placed under the authority of a curator.

TUTOR ALIENUS (Lat.) In English Law. The name given to a stranger who enters upon the lands of an infant within the age of fourteen, and takes the profits.

He may be called to an account by the infant and be charged as guardian in socage; Littleton, s. 124; Co. Litt. 89 b, 90 a.

TUTOR PROPRIUS (Lat.). The name given to one who is rightly a guardian in socage, in contradistinction to a tutor alienus.

TUTORSHIP. The power which an individual, sui juris, has to take care of the person of one who is unable to take care of himself. Tutorship differs from curatorship. See PROCURATOR; PROTUTOR.

TUTRIX (Lat.). A woman who is appointed to the office of a tutor.

TWELVEMONTH, in the singular, includes the whole year, but in the plural, twelve months of twenty-eight days each. 6 Co. 62; Bish. Writt. Laws 97. See MONTH.

TWICE IN JEOPARDY. See JEOPARDY.

TWYHINDI. The lower order of Saxons, valued at 200*s*. Cowel. See TWELFHINDI.

TYBURN TICKET. In English Law. A certificate given to the prosecutor of a felon to conviction. By the 10 & 11 Will. III. c. 23, the original proprietor or first assignee of such certificate is exempted from all and all manner of parish and ward offices within the parish or ward where the felony shall have been committed; Bacon, Abr. Constable (C).

TYPEWRITING. In the administration of the post-office department typewriting is treated as writing, and letter postage is charged therefor. So in some states where wills are required to be "in writing" a typewritten paper is treated as sufficient. Such is a constant practice in Delaware. A typewritten memorial presented to the house of commons (1897) was refused, and it is not to be received in British courts or in some British offices. Typewriting is not used between the state department and foreign legations, nor in the important original documents of the department. It is expressly legalized by statute in New York, by all state and municipal officers in all records (March 23, 1894); in Connecticut, for taking evidence in courts of common pleas in the same way as stenographers (May 7, 1895); in Oregon for wills (April 17, 1896); while in Pennsylvania it is more comprehensively declared to be of equal force with writing except for signatures (June 18, 1895). The implication from these few statutes and the instances given, where as mere matter of conservative custom, uncontrolled by law, its use is not permitted, are entirely insufficient to countervail the fact of its general, it may be said universal, use without question as a substitute for and equivalent of writing, indicated by the fact that a diligent search of digests, law dictionaries, and encyclopedias and annotated cases fails to disclose any judicial rejection of it.

TYRANNY. The violation of those laws which regulate the division and the exercises of the sovereign power of the state. It is a violation of its constitution. See DESPOTISM.

U.

UBERRIMA FIDES (Lat. most perfect good faith). A phrase used to express the perfect good faith, concealing nothing with which a contract must be made; for example, in the case of insurance, the insured must observe the most perfect good faith towards the insurer. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 317. See GOOD FAITH.

UBI JUS, IBI REMEDIUM. See MAXIM; REMEDY.

UDAL. Allodial. See ALLODIUM.

The word also means the result of a negotiation, and it comprises the final determination of the parties concerned in the object in dispute.

ULTIMUM SUPPLICIUM (Lat.). The last or extreme punishment; the penalty of death.

ULTIMUS HÆRES (Lat.). The last or remote heir; the lord. So called in contradistinction to the hæres proximus and the hæres remotior. Dalr. Feud. Pr. 110.

ULTRA MARE. Beyond seas (q. v.).

ULTRA VIRES. The modern technical designation, in the law of corporations, of acts beyond the scope of their powers, as defined by their charters or acts of incorporation.

A term used to express the action of a corporation which is beyond the powers conferred upon it by its charter, or the statutes under which it was instituted. 13 Am. L. Rev. 632.

This doctrine is of modern growth; its appearance dates from about the year 1845, being first prominently mentioned in 10 Beav. 1 and 11 C. B. 775. See Green's Brice, Ultra Vires v 729.

The general rule is that a contract by which a railroad company renders itself incapable of performing its duties to the public or attempts to absolve itself from those obligations without the consent of the state, or a contract made by a corporation beyond the scope of its powers, express or implied, on a proper construction of its charter, cannot be enforced, or rendered enforcible by the application of the doctrine of estoppel; but where the subject-matter of the contract is not foreign to the purposes for which the corporation is created, a contract embracing whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to, or consequential upon, these things which the legislature has authorized, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held, by judicial construction, to be ultra vires; 163 U. S. 564.

When acts of corporations are spoken of as ultra vires, it is not intended that they are unlawful, or even such as the corporation cannot perform, but merely those which are not within the powers conferred upon the corporation by the act of its creation, etc.; 63 N. Y. 68. A corporate act is said to be ultra vires when it is not within the scope of the powers of the corporation to perform it under any circumstances, or for any purpose; or, with reference to the rights of certain parties, when the corporation is not authorized to perform it without their consent; or, with reference to some specific purpose, when it is not authorized to perform it for that purpose, though fully within the scope of the general powers of the corporation, with the consent of the parties interested, or for some other purpose; 43 Ia. 48. See 35 L. J. Ch. 156; 125 Mass. 333; 37 Cal. 543.

As a general rule, such acts are void, and impose no obligation upon the corporation although they assume the form of contracts; inasmuch as all persons dealing with a corporation, especially in the state or country in which and under whose laws it was created, are chargeable with notice of the extent of its chartered powers. It is otherwise as to laws imposing restraints upon it not contained in its charter where the contract is made or the transaction takes place without the limits of the state or country under whose laws the corporation exists; 8 Barb. 233.

Perhaps the most general statement of the doctrine of ultra vires is that a contract of a corporation which is unauthorized by, or in violation of, its charter or other governing statute, or entirely outside of the scope of the purpose of its creation, is void in the sense of being no contract at all, because of a total want of power to enter into it; such a contract will not be enforced by any species of action in a court of justice; being void ab initio, it cannot be made good by ratification, or by any succession of renewals; and no performance on either side can give validity to the unlawful contract, or form the foundation of any right of action upon it; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 5968.

The artificial body—the corporation—is liable to be proceeded against by quo warranto for the usurpation of powers in its name by its officers and agents, and its charter may be taken away as a penalty for permitting such acts—the defence of a want of power to bind the corporation not being available in such cases, since it would lead to entire corporate irresponsibility; Moraw. Pri. Corp. § 649.

A corporation has all the capacities for engaging in transactions and for management which are given it expressly by its charter, etc., or impliedly given it by reasonable implication from the language thereof. Capacities or powers for management may be given by wide general language. Beyond these powers, they have no capacities or powers, and cannot legally engage in other transactions.

In the United States the defence of ultra vires interposed against a contract wholly or in part executed has very generally been looked upon with disfavor. The result has been that in some cases a liberal construction has been applied so as to destroy the foundation of the defence; in others the courts have allowed the recovery of the money paid, not upon the contract, but because of the money received and the benefits enjoyed; while in still another class of cases, the doctrine of estoppel in pais has been applied to exclude the defence. The courts may be said, generally, to be tending towards the doctrine—certainly so far as business corporations are concerned—that corporations are to be held liable upon executed contracts, where the contracts involved are not expressly or by necessary implication prohibited by their charters or the general law; Brice, Ultra Vires 729.

There is said to be a tendency of the courts, based upon the strongest principles of justice, to enforce contracts against corporations, although in entering into them they have exceeded their chartered powers, where they have received the consideration and the benefit of the contract; 7 Wall. 392; 98 U. S. 621; see 51 Fed. Rep. 1; 46 Kan. 524; and the rule that the charter of a corporation is to be construed strictly against the grantee does not apply to a case where the corporation seeks to repudiate contracts whereof it has enjoyed the benefits, or where such contracts are attacked by creditors after the corporation became insolvent; 57 Fed. Rep. 47; 47 id. 22. The doctrine of ultra vires, when invoked for or against a corporation, should not be allowed to prevail where it would defeat the ends of justice or work a legal wrong; 96 U. S. 258. The executed dealings of corporations should be allowed to stand for and against both parties, when good faith so requires; 22 N. Y. 258, 494; 63 N. Y. 62. Where a corporation has entered into a contract which has been fully executed on the other part, and nothing remains but the payment by the corporation of the consideration, it will not be allowed to set up that the contract was ultra vires; 83 Pa. 160. Corporations should be restricted so far as courts can, in the exercise of their powers, limit them; but the plea is not a gracious one, that a contract which they have deliberately made, and of which they have received the full benefit, is void for want of power in them to make it.

A contract of a corporation which is ultra vires is not voidable only, but wholly void; 160 U. S. 514, citing 139 id. 24. The ultra vires contracts of corporations when malum in se or malum prohibitum will not be enforced,—but as to contracts not thus objectionable justice requires that the doctrine of ultra vires should be limited, and when a corporation, ultra vires, leases its property and the lessee has occupied the same, the lessee is liable for the rent for the time of his occupation; though, as to the public, such lease would be void; N. Y. Ct. of App., in 54 Alb. L. J. 389. It is a much disputed question whether unauthorized contracts neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum, or where the restriction is implied from the grant of specified powers, are absolutely void and non-enforcible, even where the other party has received the consideration for his promise. It is held in special English cases that ultra vires contracts are under no circumstances enforcible; 11 C. B. 775; L. R. 18 Q. B. 618; 7 Eng. & Ir. App. 652. It has also been held that where leases of railroads were made without legislative sanction they were void as between the parties, and no action could be maintained to recover the rent even during the occupation by the lessee under the lease; 101 U. S. 71; 118 U. S 290.

A corporation may not avail itself of the defence of ultra vires where a contract which it has entered into has been in good faith, fully performed by the other party, and the corporation has had the full benefit of the performance of the contract; 182 Pa. 206. As where a bank caused property owned by it to be conveyed by a deed, regular in form, to a worthless corporation organized by its own directors and then lent money to such corporation and took its notes and discounted them with strangers, by representing them as prime paper and on the strength of such corporation's apparent ownership of such property, it was held to be thereafter estopped as against the holders of the notes to assert that the conveyance was ultra vires; 73 Fed. Rep. 946.

In no way and through no channels, directly or indirectly, will courts allow an action to be maintained for the recovery of property delivered under an illegal contract, where, in order to maintain such recovery, it is necessary to have recourse to the contract; recovery must rest upon a disaffirmance of the contract and the recovery of what in justice should be recovered, but without breaking this rule. Where a sleeping-car company made a void lease of its property and business to another sleeping-car company, it was held that the value of the property transferred to the lessee when the lease took effect, with interest, could be recovered by the lessor, as that had substantially disappeared and could not now be returned. But that the value of contracts with railroad companies transferred by the lease and the value of the expired patents formed no part of the sum which the lessor was entitled to recover for the breaking up of its business by reason of the contract being adjudged illegal; 171 U. S. 138. See 8 Harv. L. Rev. 15.

It has been held ultra vires for a railway company to guarantee to the shareholders of a steam packet company a dividend upon capital; 10 Beav. 1; to engage in the coal trade; 6 Jur. N. S. 1006: for a company to assume the debt of another: 34 Vt. 144; or to make or indorse accommodation paper; 11 Ind. 104; or to engage as surety for another in a business in which it has no interest; 26 Barb. 568, or to guaranty, for accommodation, the obligations of another corporation; 57 Fed. Rep. 47; for one railroad company to unite with another like company, and both conduct their business under one management; 21 How. 441; or to run a line of steamboats in connection with its road; 39 Mo. 451; or for a mutual benefit society to undertake to pay the death losses of another insurance company; 70 Ia. 542; 87 id. 733; but a railway company may contract to carry beyond its own lines: Wood, Railr. 619; 54 Pa. 77; 96 U. S. 258; but see 22 Conn. 502. Where a corporation is incompetent to take real estate, a conveyance to it is only voidable; Morawetz, Corp., 2d ed. 678. A railroad company has implied authority to erect a refreshment room; L. R. 7 Eq. 116; a corporation authorized to erect a market has authority to purchase land for that purpose; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 447; where a corporation had authority to keep steam vessels for the purposes of a ferry, they could use these vessels, when otherwise unemployed, for excursion trips; 30 Beav. 40; 11 Allen 336. Corporations generally have authority to borrow money to carry out the objects for which they were created, and to execute their obligations therefor; Field, Corp. §

249; including irredeemable bonds; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 713; they may, generally, by virtue of implied powers, make promissory notes: 13 Am. L. Rev. 641; 15 Wall. 566; 35 N. Y. 505. Where a railroad company, without legislative authority, leased its road to three persons, for twenty years, this was held ultra vires; 101 U. S. 71. See LEASE. A railroad company cannot guarantee the expense of a musical festival; 131 Mass. 258; the same ruling applies to a company organized to manufacture and sell organs; ibid.

It is said to be now well settled that a power granted to a corporation to engage in certain business carries with it the authority to act precisely as an individual would act in carrying on such business, and that it would possess for this purpose the usual and ordinary means to accomplish the objects of its creation, in the same manner as though it were a natural person; Field, Corp. § 271. A manufacturing corporation may purchase a large tract of land for the purpose of erecting thereon its factories and residences for its employes, and contribute toward the establishment there of a church, a school, a free library, and a free bath for its employes; 17 Misc. Rep. 43. The contrary has just been decided in the Pullman's Company case in Illinois.

The doctrine of ultra vires ought to be reasonably understood and applied; and whatever may be fairly regarded as incidental to and consequential upon those things which are authorized by the charter of the company, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held by judicial construction, to be ultra vires; 49 N. J. Eq. 217.

The result of the English authorities is, that corporations—certainly those for commercial purposes, and probably all corporations to which the doctrine applies—have by implication all capacities and powers which, being reasonably incidental to their enterprise or operations, are not forbidden, either expressly by their constating instruments or by necessary inference therefrom; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 40. The American decisions seem to be tending towards this doctrine; id. note a. Prima facie, all the contracts of a corporation are valid, and it lies on those who impeach any contract to make out that it is void; 96 U. S. 267; 3 Macq. 382; 49 N. J. Eq. 217.

A court of equity, at the suit of the stockholders of the corporation, will restrain the commission of acts beyond the corporate power, by injunction operating upon the individual officers and directors as well as the corporation. This is now an acknowledged head of equity jurisdiction; Wood, R. R. 633; Redf. Railw. 400; 18 Wall. 626; 10 Beav. 1; creditors are said to have the same right in this respect as stockholders; 13 Am. L. Rev. 659.

Acquiescence for any considerable time in the exercise of excessive powers, after they come to the knowledge of the stockholders, would, however, be a decisive objection to such a remedy; 19 E. L. & E. 7.

In regard to municipal corporations, the rule is stricter against the validity of ultra vires contracts. See Dill. Mun. Corp. § 381.

It has been said that a corporation is liable for the negligence and other torts of its agents and servants, even when related to and connected with the acts of the corporation that are ultra vires; even if done in the execution of usurped powers and of purposes clearly ultra vires; Beach, Pr. Corp. § 444; but as to whether a corporation is liable for such wrongs by its agents as are beyond the scope of corporate authority, see L. R. 2 Q. B. 534; 7 H. & N. 172; 47 N. Y. 122.

ULTRONEUS WITNESS. A witness who offers his testimony without being regularly cited. Bell, Dict. Evidence.

UMPIRAGE. The decision of an umpire. 4 Lea 288.

UMPIRE. A third person appointed to decide between two other judges or referees who differ in opinion. 1 Harr. Del. 260. The jurisdiction of the umpire and arbitrators cannot be concurrent; Morse, Arb. & Aw. 241; if the arbitrators make an award, it is binding; if not, the award of the umpire is binding; T. Jones 167. If the umpire sign the award of the arbitrators, it is still their award, and vice versa; 6 Harr. & J. 408. He determines the issue submitted to the arbitrators on which they have failed to agree, which is his sole award; and neither of the original arbitrators is required to join in the award; 11 Allen 384; 75 Ill. 30. Arbitrators may appoint an umpire after their term of service has expired, if the time is not gone within which the umpire was to make his award; 2 Johns. 57. Subsequent dissent of the parties, without just cause, will have no effect upon the appointment; but they should have notice; 12 Metc. 298. If an umpire refuse to act, another may be appointed toties quoties; 11 East 367.

UNA VOCE (Lat.). With one voice; unanimously.

UNADJUSTED. Uncertain; not agreed upon. 43 Me. 214.

UNALIENABLE. Incapable of being transferred.

Things which are not in commerce, as, public roads, are in their nature unalienable. Some things are unalienable in consequence of particular provisions in the law forbidding their sale or transfer; as, pensions granted by the government. The natural rights of life and liberty are unalienable.

UNANIMITY (Lat. unus, one, animus, mind). The agreement of all the persons concerned in a thing, in design and opinion. See JURY; MAJORITY.

UNASCERTAINED DUTIES. Payment in gross on an estimate as to amount. 5 Blatchf. 274.

If by any care, prudence, or foresight a thing could have been guarded against, it is not unavoidable; 50 Ga. 509. An unavoidable accident is synonymous with inevitable accident. See INEVITABLE ACCIDENT; ACT OF GOD; FORTUITOUS EVENT.

UNCIARIUS HÆRES. In Civil Law. An heir to one-twelfth of an estate or inheritance. Calv. Lex.

UNCLE. The brother of a father or mother. See AVUNCULUS; PATRUUS.

UNCONSCIONABLE BARGAIN. A contract which no man in his senses, not under delusion, would make, on the one hand, and which no fair and honest man would accept, on the other. 2 Ves. 125; 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3848. See USURY; EXPECTANCY; POST OBIT.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL. See CONSTITUTIONAL; STATUTE.

UNCORE PRIST (L. Fr. still ready). A plea or replication that the party pleading is still ready to do what is required. Used in connection with the words tout temps prist, the whole denotes that the party always has been and still is ready to do what is required, thus saving costs where the whole cause is admitted, or preventing delay where it is a replication, if the allegation is made out. 3 Bla. Com. 303.

UNDE NIHIL HABET. See DOWER.

UNDEFENDED. A term sometimes applied to one who is obliged to make his own defence when on trial, or in a civil cause. A cause is said to be undefended when the defendant makes default, in not putting in an appearance to the plaintiff's action; in not putting in his statement of defence; or, in not appearing at the trial either personally or by counsel, after having received due notice. Lush's Prac. 548.

UNDER. The term is sometimes used in its literal sense of "below in position," but more frequently in its secondary meaning of "inferior" or "subordinate." 8 How. 356.

UNDER AND SUBJECT. Words frequently used in conveyances of land which is subject to a mortgage, to show that the grantee takes subject to such mortgage. See MORTGAGE; 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 387, 401.

An alienation by a tenant of a part of his lease, reserving to himself a reversion; it differs from an assignment, which is a transfer of all the tenant's interest in the lease. 3 Wils. 234; W. Blackst. 766. And even a conveyance of the whole estate by the lessee, reserving to himself the rent, with a power of reentry for non-payment, was held to be not an assignment, but an underlease; 1 Stra. 405; Woodf. L. & T. 731. The transfer of a part only of the lands, though for the whole term, is an underlease; 2 Ohio 216; contra, 4 Bibb 538. See LEASE; ASSIGNMENT.

UNDERLIE THE LAW. In Scotch criminal procedure, an accused person, in appearing to take his trial, is said "to compear and underlie the law." Mos. & W.

UNDERSTANDING. It may denote an informal agreement or a concurrence as to its terms. 47 Wis. 507. A valid contract engagement of a somewhat informal character. 32 Minn. 238. In the law of contracts it is a loose and ambiguous term, unless accompanied by some expression to show that it constituted a meeting of the minds of the parties upon something respecting which they intended to be bound. 25 Conn. 529.

UNDERSTOOD. Agreed. 14 Gray 165. It falls short of alleging a distinct express contract; 19 S. C. 419.

UNDERTAKING. An engagement by one of the parties to a contract to the other, and not the mutual engagement of the parties to each other: a promise. 5 East 17; 2 Leon. 224; 4 B. & Ald. 595, followed in 28 Tex. App. 186. It does not necessarily imply a consideration; 3 N. Y. 335.

UNDERTOOK. Assumed; promised. This is a technical word which ought to be inserted in every declaration of assumpsit charging that the defendant undertook to perform the promise which is the foundation of the suit; and this though the promise be founded on a legal liability or would be implied in evidence. Bacon, Abr. Assumpsit (F); 1 Chitty, Pl. 88, note p.

UNDERWRITER. The party who agrees to insure another on life or property, in a policy of insurance. He is also called the insurer.

The title is almost exclusively confined to insurers of marine risks, and is derived from the method of obtaining such insurance formerly in vogue, usually as follows: A premium having been agreed upon between the insured and an insurance broker, a statement of such premium and of the ship or cargo, and the voyage or time, was written at the head of a sheet which was laid on the broker's table. Then such merchants as were willing to insure such property on such terms subscribed their names to the statement above mentioned, stating the amount they were willing to insure; and so on until the desired amount of insurance was obtained. 1 Pars. Mar. Ins. 14.

UNDERWRITING. An agreement made in forming a company and offering its stocks or bonds to the public, that if they are not all taken up, the underwriter will take what remains. An underwriter is held liable in England on the stock subscribed for by him. See 42 Ch. D. 1.

Underwriting contract. An agreement to take shares in a company forming, so far as the same are not subscribed to by the public. Palmer, Company Precedents 107.

UNDIVIDED. Held by the same title by two or more persons, whether their rights are equal as to value or quantity, or unequal. See 16 Pick. 98.

UNDUE INFLUENCE. The use by one, in whom a confidence is reposed by another who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage of his weakness of mind, or of his necessities or distress. 94 Cal. 642; or to constrain him to do that which he would not have done without the exercise of such control. 50 N. J. Eq. 439.

That influence which compels one to do that which is against his will from fear, the desire of peace, or some feeling which is tantamount to force or fear. 95 Ala. 495; 86 Md. 494.

Influence gained by kindness and affection will not be regarded as undue, if no imposition or fraud be practised, even though it induce one to make an unequal and unjust distribution of his property, if such disposition is voluntarily made; 135 U. S. 167; 88 N. Y. 357; but the question of the boundary of legitimate influence must be determined by the consideration of the relation between the parties, the character, strength, and condition of each of them, and the application of sound sense to each given case; 44 N. J. Eq. 154; 82 Va. 225; the mental and physical condition of the testator, the provisions of the will itself; 98 Mo. 433; 117 Ill. 14; 28 App. Div. 411; 88 Fed. Rep. 33; and the conduct of the testator after its execution; 66 Pa. 283. The questions of capacity and undue influence are closely connected and must be considered together; 29 Ark. 151.

On principles of public policy, there is a presumption of undue influence in voluntary settlements between parent and child; 1 Ves. 401; 34 Beav. 457; 15 id. 278; guardian and ward; 10 L. R. Eq. 405; trustee and cestui que trust; 30 Beav. 39; legal adviser and client; 2 Atk. 25; or between one and his spiritual adviser; 2 L. C. Eq. 597, n.; s. c. 14 Ves. 273; and so there is said to be a presumption of undue influence in case of wills made where these relations exist between the parties; 14 Fed. Rep. 905; 88 N. Y. 371; but see 71 Hun 27, where it was held that undue influence could not be presumed from the fact that the beneficiary stood in a confidential relation to the testator. See 5 Misc. Rep. 68; 114 Mo. 35; 98 Ala. 267.

Undue influence will not invalidate a will if, at the time of making it, the testator's freedom of will was not overcome; 118 Pa. 259; 134 U. S. 47; but it is held that where it is exercised by any one, even if not a beneficiary, undue influence is ground for setting the will aside; 74 Cal. 52. See DURESS; FRAUD.

UNFAIR COMPETITION. See TRADE-MARK.

UNGELD. An outlaw. Toml.

UNICA TAXATIO (Lat.). The ancient language of a special award of venire, where of several defendants one pleads, and one lets judgment go by default, whereby the jury who are to try and assess damages on the issue are also to assess damages against the defendant suffering judgment by default. Lee, Dict.

UNIFORM. See GENERAL LAW.

UNIFORMITY OF LAWS. Commissions have been appointed by the legislatures of thirty-two states and territories who hold annual conferences in connection with the American Bar Association, chiefly on uniformity of law of negotiable instruments, divorce, and acknowledgments. See the recent reports of the American Bar Association. See ROLLING STOCK, as to an instance of uniform laws in almost all the states.

UNIFORMITY OF PROCESS ACT. An act providing for uniformity of process in personal actions in the courts of law at Westminster, 23d May, 1832. The improved system thus established was more fully amended by the Procedure Acts of 1852, 1854, and 1860, and by the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875.

UNILATERAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. When the party to whom an engagement is made makes no express agreement on his part, the contract is called unilateral, even in cases where the law attaches certain obligations to his acceptance. La. Civ. Code, art. 1758. A loan of money and a loan for use are of this kind. Pothier, Obl. part 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 2; Lec. Elémen. § 781.

In the Common Law. According to Professor Langdell, every binding promise not in consideration of another promise is a unilateral contract. For example, simple contract debts, bonds, promissory notes, and policies of insurance. A bilateral contract, which consists of two promises to give in exchange for and consideration of each other, becomes a unilateral contract when one of the promises is fully performed; Langdell, Sum. Cont. § 183.

UNINTELLIGIBLE. That which cannot be understood. See CONSTRUCTION.

UNIO PROLIUM (Lat. union of offspring). A species of adoption used among the Germans, which takes place when a widower having children marries a widow who also has children. These parents then agree that the children of both marriages shall have the same rights to their succession as those which may be the fruits of their marriage. Lec. Elém. § 187.

UNION. A popular term for the United States of America.

In English Poor Law. Two or more parishes that have been consolidated for the better administration of the poor law therein.

UNION LABEL LAWS. See TRADE-MARK.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND. The official title of the kingdom composed of England, Scotland, and Ireland. At the time of the union between England and Scotland, in 1707, Great Britain became the official name of the kingdom, and continued to be such until the union with Ireland, in 1801. In the act of union of January 1, 1801, the above title is made the official name of the kingdom.

The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, and the sovereign, with a ministry responsible to parliament, constitutes the executive. See EXECUTIVE POWER. The legislative power is vested in a parliament composed of a house of lords and a house of commons. The judicial power is vested in the house of lords, a court of appeal, and a high court of justice, together with various county courts and inferior courts, as to which more detailed statements will be found in the respective titles relating to them.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS. Each circuit court of the United States may appoint, in different parts of the district for which it is held, as many discreet persons as it may deem necessary, who shall be called "commissioners of the circuit court," and shall exercise the powers which are or may be conferred upon them; R. S. § 627.

These officers are authorized to hold to security of the peace and for good behavior in cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States; R. S. § 727. They have power to carry into effect, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, the award or arbitration, or decree of any consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent, to sit as judges or arbitrators in such differences as may arise between the captains and crews of vessels, application for the exercise of such power being first made by petition of such consul, etc.; R. S. § 728.

They have also power to take bail and affidavits when required or allowed in any circuit or district court of the United States; R. S. § 945. They may imprison or bail offenders; R. S. § 1010; may discharge poor convicts imprisoned; R. S. § 1042; may administer oaths and take acknowledgments; R. S. § 1778; may institute proceedings under the civil rights laws; R. S. 1 Supp. 68; may issue warrants for the arrest of foreign seamen, in case of dispute or desertion; R. S. § 4079; may summon the master of a vessel in cases of seamen's wages; may apprehend fugitives from justice; R. S. § 5270.

The district court of the United States may appoint commissioners before whom appraisers of vessels or goods and merchandise seized for breaches of any law of the United States may be sworn; and such oaths so taken are as effectual as if taken before the judge in open court; R. S. § 570.

The court of claims has power to appoint commissioners, before whom examinations may be made upon oath of witnesses touching all matters pertaining to claims; R. S. §§ 1071, 1080.

UNITED STATES COURTS. Except in the case of impeachments the judicial power of the United States is vested by the constitution in a supreme court and such other inferior courts as may be from time to time established by congress. All the judges are appointed by the president, with the advice of the senate, to hold office during good behavior, and their compensation cannot be diminished during their terms of office. The judges, other than those of the supreme court, are circuit judges and district judges, by whom are held the inferior courts of law and equity. For a detailed statement of the territorial boundaries of the several districts and divisions of districts, see Garland & Ralston, Fed. Prac. ch. ii. Except in a few cases especially provided for, there is a district judge for each district, of which he must be a resident. The districts are grouped into nine circuits as follows: 1. Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island. 2. Vermont, Connecticut, New York. 3. Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware. 4. Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina. 5. Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas. 6. Kentucky, Ohio, Michigan, Tennessee. 7. Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin. 8. Colorado, Nebraska, Minnesota, Kansas, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Utah, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas. 9. California, Oregon, Nevada, Idaho, Montana, Washington. Alaska and Arizona are assigned to the ninth circuit, and New Mexico and Oklahoma to the eighth, to which also the Indian Territory is assigned for the purpose of appeals. There are three circuit judges in the second, seventh, eighth, and ninth circuits, and two in each of the other circuits. They must reside in the circuit. One supreme court justice is allotted to each circuit by order of the supreme court; he is known as the circuit justice, and is a judge of the circuit court and circuit court of appeals of that circuit. He has no distinct commission as circuit judge and none is required; 1 Cra. 308.

All the courts appoint their own clerks; by act of August 13, 1888, no person may be appointed who is related to the judge by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin; R. S. 1 Supp. 614. Deputy clerks may also be appointed by the court, on the application of the clerk, removable at the pleasure of the appointing judges. Such deputies may do any act which the clerk may lawfully do; 20 Wall. 92; 1 Woods 209. Any federal judge who shall have served ten years may retire, at any time after reaching the age of seventy years, and receive his salary for life; R. S. § 714.

The judicial power under the constitution shall extend to:—1. Cases arising under the federal constitution, laws, or treaties. 2. Those affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls. 3. Admiralty and maritime cases. 4. Controversies to which the United States is a party. 5. Those between two or more states. 6. Or between a state and a citizen of another state. (By the 11th amendment this grant of power was so limited as not to permit a state to be sued by citizens of another state, but a state may sue citizens of another state; 10 Wall. 553; 91 U. S. 667.) 7. Or between citizens of different states. 8. Or between a state or its citizens and foreign states, citizens, or subjects. This is construed to be an absolute grant of power; 1 Wheat. 308.

The nature of the federal government which distributes the functions of government between two powers, each being sovereign within its sphere, but operating within the same territorial jurisdiction and upon the same persons and property, makes necessary the adjustment of two classes of independent tribunals with great care, both in legislation and the administration of justice, to avoid conflicts of jurisdiction. That such have occurred is true, but their rare occurrence in more than a century bears testimony as well to the tact and discretion of the judiciary, federal and state, as to the perfection of the system which they administer under the constitution.

As respects criminal proceedings, the courts of each jurisdiction generally confine themselves to the administration of the laws of the government which created them. In civil cases, however, as the constitution has conferred jurisdiction upon the federal courts in cases, for example, where a citizen of one state sues a citizen of another state, it is manifest that the court which tries such a case must administer the laws of the state in which the action is brought, subject to the constitution of the United States in cases which conflict with its provisions.

In the organization of the federal system of courts, there were two objects to be accomplished. The first was to prevent a clashing between the state and United States courts, by imposing restrictions upon the United States courts. The second was to carry out the mandates of the constitution, by clothing the latter with all the powers necessary to execute its provisions. This organization was commenced by the act of 1789, familiarly known as the Judiciary Act; 1 Stat. at Large 921.

To accomplish the first object, the right to issue writs of habeas corpus was by the fourteenth section limited to cases arising under the federal constitution and laws; R. S. § 753. See HABEAS CORPUS.

This important restriction was intended to leave to the state authorities the absolute and exclusive administration of the state laws in all cases of imprisonment; and no instance has ever occurred in which this act has been disregarded. On the contrary, its observance has been emphatically enjoined and enforced; 21 How. 523. See 4 Dill. 323; 24 Am. L. Reg. 522. See infra.

By the thirty-fourth section of the same act (R. S. § 721), it was enacted that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States should otherwise require or provide, were to be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they applied. This provision has received examination and interpretation in the following, among the many cases: 7 How. 40; 8 id. 169; 14 id. 504; 17 id. 476; 18 id. 502, 507; 20 id. 393, 584; 18 Wall. 71; 17 id. 44; 98 U. S. 176, 242, 470; 3 Wash. C. C. 313; 17 Fed. Rep. 721. In all cases depending upon the construction of a state statute, federal courts will follow the construction of the court of last resort of the state, when that construction is well settled, without respect to its original soundness; 9 Cra. 87; 100 U. S. 47; 60 Fed. Rep. 718; 22 id. 26; even when, in ignorance of a decision by the state court, the supreme court had construed the statute differently; 100 U. S. 47; or when, if it were an original question, the federal court would be of a different opinion; 154 id. 177.

And while the United States courts follow the interpretation given to the laws of the state by their highest tribunals, yet in case of conflicting decisions, or in the absence of decisions at the time of consideration by the United States courts, the rule is, of course, modified; 5 How. 139; 18 id. 599. In the leading case of Burgess v. Seligman the limitations of the doctrine were thus stated by Bradley, J.: "The federal courts have an independent jurisdiction in the administration of state laws, co-ordinate with, and not subordinate to, that of the state courts, and are bound to exercise their own judgment as to the meaning and effect of those laws. The existence of two co-ordinate jurisdictions in the same territory is peculiar, and the results would be anomalous and inconvenient but for the exercise of mutual respect and deference. Since the ordinary administration of the law is carried on by the state courts, it necessarily happens that by the course of their decisions certain rules are established which become rules of property and action in the state, and have all the effect of law, and which it would be wrong to disturb. This is especially true with regard to the law of real estate and the construction of state constitutions and statutes. Such established rules are always regarded by the federal courts, no less than by the state courts themselves, as authoritative declarations of what the law is. But where the law has not been thus settled, it is the right and duty of the federal courts to exercise their own judgment, as they also always do in reference to the doctrines of commercial law and general jurisprudence. So when contracts and transactions have been entered into, and rights have accrued thereon under a particular state of the decisions, or when there has been no decision of the state tribunals, the federal courts properly claim the right to adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, although a different interpretation may be adopted by the state courts after such rights have accrued. But even in such cases, for the sake of harmony and to avoid confusion, the federal courts will lean toward an agreement of views with the state courts if the question seems to them balanced with doubt. Acting on these principles, founded as they are on comity and good sense, the courts of the United States, without sacrificing their own dignity as independent tribunals, endeavor to avoid, and in most cases do avoid, any unseemly conflict with the well-considered decisions of the state courts. As, however, the very object of giving to the national courts jurisdiction to administer the laws of the states in controversies between citizens of different states was to institute independent tribunals, which, it might be supposed, would be unaffected by local prejudices and sectional views, it would be a dereliction of their duty not to exercise an independent judgment in cases not foreclosed by previous adjudication." 107 U. S. 20, approved id. 541. See, also, for a good statement of the doctrine, 184 id. 348. Ordinarily, they will follow the latest settled decisions; 1 Dill. 555; 6 Pet. 291; 2 Black 599. But a change of decision by a state court in regard to the construction of a statute will not be allowed to affect rights acquired under the former decision; 101 U. S. 677; 128 id. 538; otherwise, when no rights have been acquired under the former decision; 100 U. S. 47; 107 id. 20; 147 id. 91; or where the decision of the state court was made long after the rights in question accrued; 120 U. S. 759; 119 id. 680; 148 id. 393. The federal courts will not follow the decision of an inferior court; 2 Woods 395.

In controversies concerning the title to real property, the federal court always administers the law as if it were sitting as a local court; 17 Wall. 44; 98 U. S. 244; 89 Fed. Rep. 719; 153 U. S. 17. So also of statutes of limitation; 157 U. S. 177.

Questions of international law must be decided as matters of general law, uncontrolled by local decisions; 146 U. S. 657. Decisions of the state court on questions of local law, affecting solely the internal police of the state or the construction of a municipal ordinance, must control; 145 U. S. 421.

Local law or custom, established by repeated decisions of the highest courts of the state, becomes also the law governing courts of the United States sitting in that state; 125 U. S. 555; 135 id. 492. This is particularly true as to decisions which establish a rule of property, and the rule is observed even as to points upon which the states are at variance among themselves; 133 U. S. 670; 135 id. 457; 136 id. 223; 148 id. 60; and where the same statute receives a different interpretation in different states, each will be followed by the federal courts as the true interpretation for the particular state in question; 62 Fed. Rep. 368. The supreme court will follow the construction given by the state court to a state statute of limitations, even in a case decided the other way by the circuit court before the decision of the state court; 147 U. S. 647; and the lower federal courts will reverse their decision holding a state statute unconstitutional, when the state subsequently decides that it is constitutional, if a final decree had not been entered in the federal court; 64 Fed. Rep. 9. In 71 Fed. Rep. 443, however, the circuit court of appeals declined to follow the supreme court of Indiana where the decision of the latter was rendered after argument and before decision in the federal court. As to the organization or composition of a tribunal established by the fundamental law of the state, the settled course of decisions in its highest court is at least entitled to great weight; 120 U. S. 354.

The provision of § 721 making the state law the rule of decision embraces state rules of evidence in civil cases at common law; 1 Black 427; 18 Wall. 496; 98 U. S. 1; 16 Fed. Rep. 435; but not in equity cases; 3 Blatch. 11; it does not apply to questions of general jurisprudence; 147 U. S. 101; or of general commercial law; 18 How 520; 16 Pet. 1; 2 Fed. Rep. 285, 843; 4 Biss. 473; 100 U. S. 239; see COMMERCIAL LAW (but they should have due weight given to them; 52 Fed. Rep. 191); or to the general principles of equity; 13 How. 271; 12 id. 361; or to criminal cases; id.; or questions of a general nature, not based upon a local statute; 100 U. S. 213; 107 id. 109. It is sometimes said, somewhat vaguely, that questions of general law are to be uncontrolled by decisions of the state courts, except to give them such weight as may be deemed proper, with due respect to their character as co-ordinate tribunals. It is difficult to deduce from the cases any general rule or principle, but among cases thus held to be questions of general law are:—what is or is not a navigable stream; 67 Fed. Rep. 285; whether a carrier may stipulate for exemption from liability for its own negligence; 52 id. 903; whether two employes of the same master are fellow-servants; 149 U. S. 368. In the section last referred to, the word "laws" does not include the decisions of the local tribunals, for these are only evidence of what the laws are; 16 Pet. 1.

If a contract when made is valid under the laws of the state as then interpreted by the courts of the state, subsequent decisions putting a different interpretation upon such laws are not binding on the federal courts as to that contract; 1 Wall. 175; 16 id. 678. And where contracts are based upon laws then believed to be constitutional, there being at the time no adjudication on such laws in the state courts declaring them invalid, the federal courts will not follow subsequent decisions of state courts thereon, but will construe such statute for themselves; 19 Wall. 66.

In clothing the United States courts with sufficient authority to carry out the mandates of the constitution, their powers are made in certain cases to transcend those of the state courts; various provisions exist for the removal of causes from the state to the federal courts. See REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

And while the rule is thoroughly settled that remedies in the courts of the United States are, at common law or in equity, according to the essential nature of the case, uncontrolled in that particular by the practice of the state courts; 129 U. S. 45, 46; yet an enlargement of equitable rights by the state statute may be administered by federal courts as well as by the courts of the state; and when the case is one of a remedial proceeding, essentially of an equitable character, there can be no objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction; 21 Wall. 503, 520; 110 U. S. 15, 25; 121 id. 552, 557.

The original jurisdiction of the circuit court in certain cases, and the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court to review the decisions of state courts, depend upon the existence in the case of what is termed a federal question. This is a question arising in a litigated case, and necessary to its decision, involving the construction of the constitution, or a law or treaty of the United States.

If, from the questions involved in a case, it appears that some title, right, privilege, or immunity, on which the recovery depends, will be defeated by one construction of the constitution, or of a law or treaty of the United States, or sustained by the opposite construction, the case will be one arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, and involves a federal question; 115 U. S. 257; 114 id. 641; 112 id. 416; 111 id. 462.

The supreme court has no jurisdiction of a writ of error to review the judgment of a state court unless a real, and not a fictitious, federal question is involved; 142 U. S. 79; 147 id. 581; 6 Wall. 258; and where it does not appear from the record that a federal question was actually presented or in any way relied on before final judgment below, the supreme court is without jurisdiction; 116 U. S. 54; as it must appear on the record that it was raised and decided, or that its decision was necessary to the judgment or decree rendered; 114 U. S. 133; 91 id. 578; 111 id. 200; 171 id. 38. See 142 id. 254. If another question, not federal, has also been raised and decided against the same party, and the decision of the latter question is sufficient to sustain the judgment, the supreme court will not review it; 171 id. 38; 150 id. 633. It has been held that federal questions are involved in suits brought by corporations created by acts of congress; 115 U. S. 2; to determine the validity of a railroad consolidation authorized by act of congress; 111 U. S. 449; to enjoin the erection of a bridge across a navigable river authorized by act of congress; 18 Blatch. 479; whether full faith and credit were given to a judgment in another state; 146 U. S. 157; where the supreme court of a state failed to give proper effect to a decree of the circuit court of the United States; 152 id. 327; where a federal officer is sued in trespass to real estate which he claims to have possession for and under authority of the United States; 147 id. 508. So, of course, are suits for infringement of patents and copyrights, cases in which it is claimed that a state law is invalid because in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, or as depriving one of some right, privilege, or immunity thereby guaranteed, and criminal prosecutions for violations of federal laws.

The judicial power of the federal government is administered under existing laws, by four courts. The supreme court, which is created by the constitution, from which it derives its original jurisdiction; the circuit court of appeals; the circuit court; and the district court.

There are also various administrative tribunals, such as the court of claims; see infra; the interstate commerce commission; and the private land claims court; which titles see. There are also separate judicial systems provided by congress for the territories and the District of Columbia. The system of appeals, as at present organized, provides for the review of decisions on questions of law in most, if not all, of the federal tribunals either by the supreme court or the circuit court of appeals, as the case may be.

As to the Senate as a court of impeachment, see IMPEACHMENT.

The Supreme Court now consists of the chief justice and eight associates, of whom six constitute a quorum. They have precedence according to date of appointment, or, of two appointed at the same time, then according to their ages. In the absence of the chief justice, the associate first in precedence performs his duties. There is a single term which begins on the second Monday of October. In the absence of a quorum, any of the judges may adjourn from day to day for twenty days, but if at the expiration of that period no quorum attends, the business shall be set aside until the next appointed session. The clerk, marshal, and reporter are appointed by the court.

The jurisdiction is original and appellate, civil and criminal, defined by the constitution, which establishes the court; 11 Wheat. 467.

By the act of September 24, 1789, sect. 13, the supreme court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens, or between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens, in which latter cases it shall have original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction. It shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors or other public ministers, or their domestics or domestic servants, as a court of law can have consistently with the law of nations; and original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors or other public ministers, or in which a consul or vice-consul is a party; R. S. § 687. The court has no jurisdiction except that given it by the constitution or law; 4 Cra. 93.

Many cases have occurred of controversies between states, amongst which may be mentioned that of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 4 How. 591, in which the attorney-general of the United States was authorized by act of congress, 11 Stat. at Large 382, to intervene; Missouri v. Iowa, 7 How. 660, and 10 How. 1; Alabama v. Georgia, 23 How. 505; Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. 478; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Company, 18 How. 421. See 136 U. S. 479; s. c. 163 id. 520; 147 id. 1; 148 id. 503; 165 id. 118; 12 Pet. 167. In a pending case the state of New Jersey on bill filed obtained a preliminary injunction against the enforcement by the state of Delaware of certain laws regulating fisheries in the river Delaware, the question involved being one of boundary.

To give jurisdiction a state must be a party on the record; 9 Wheat. 904; or substantially a party; 3 Dall. 411; it must have a direct interest in the controversy; 18 How. 518. A state may bring an original action against a citizen of another state, but not against one of its own; 10 Wall. 553. A question of boundary between states is within its original jurisdiction; 7 How. 660; 17 id. 478; 23 id. 505; 15 Pet. 233; 1 Kent 323, 350.

The court has no jurisdiction over questions of a political and not judicial nature; 6 Wall. 50; a state cannot maintain a bill to enjoin the president in his official duties; 4 Wall. 475. It has no original jurisdiction over suits brought by any other political communities than states; 7 Wall. 700. An Indian tribe cannot institute original proceedings in it; 5 Pet. 1. Service on the governor and attorney-general of a state is sufficient; 3 Dall. 320. The bill should be filed by the governor on behalf of the state; 24 How. 66. When a state is a party the practice in chancery is adopted; 17 How. 478. In cases of boundary a bill and cross-bill is the appropriate mode of procedure; 7 How. 660. Leave of the court to file a bill must first be obtained; 4 Wall. 497; Phil. Pr. 21; 17 How. 478.

In consequence of the decision in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia, where it was held that assumpsit might be maintained against a state by a citizen of another state, the eleventh article of the amendments of the constitution was adopted; 3 Dall. 378.

The supreme court has power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts as courts of admiralty; and writs of mandamus to any inferior federal courts, or to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, where a state, or an ambassador or other public minister, or a consul, or vice-consul is a party; R. S. § 688. This does not apply to bankruptcy; 3 How. 292.

The supreme court has also the power to issue writs of habeas corpus; R. S. § 751; scire facias, and all other writs not especially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction and agreeable to the principles and usages of law; R. S. § 716; and the justices have, individually, the power to grant writs of habeas corpus, of ne exeat, and of injunction; R. S. §§ 717, 719, 752.

As to whether the grant of original jurisdiction to this court precludes a grant of jurisdiction over like cases to other courts, is a mooted question, not yet fully decided. See 2 Dall. 297; 1 Cra. 137; 11 Wheat. 467. In 111 U. S. 449, the court said: "We are unable to say that it is not within the power of congress" to grant such jurisdiction to the inferior courts; and in 123 id. 32, it is said that it is competent for congress to authorize suits by a state to be brought in the inferior federal courts. See 1 Garland & Ralston, Fed. Pr. 9.

Congress cannot vest in the supreme court original jurisdiction in a case in which the constitution has clearly not given that court original jurisdiction; 1 Cra. 137. See 5 Pet. 1, 284; 12 id. 657; 6 Wheat. 264; 9 id. 738.

The appellate jurisdiction was first regulated by the act of Sept. 24, 1789, but radical changes were effected in it by the act of March 3, 1891, which created the circuit court of appeals. See infra. The appellate jurisdiction now includes:

1. (1) "The final judgment" or decree in any suit in the highest court of a state in which a decision could be had where the validity of the treaty, or statute of, or authority exercised under, the United States is in question and the decision is against their validity. (2) Where the validity of a statute of, or authority exercised under, a state is in question on the ground of being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States and the decision of the state court is in favor of its validity. (3) Where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the constitution under any treaty or statute of, or commission held or authority exercised under, the United States and the decision of the state court is against such claim. The act of March 3, 1891, expressly provides that nothing contained in it shall affect this jurisdiction of the supreme court for the review of decisions of state courts.

2. The review on appeal or writ of error of decisions of the district and circuit courts of the United States in the following cases: (1) Cases in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue; in such cases the question of jurisdiction alone shall be certified to the supreme court for decision. (2) Final sentences and decrees in prize causes. (3) Cases of conviction of a capital crime. (See 2 Supp. 541.) (4) Cases which involve the construction or application of the constitution of the United States. (5) Cases in which the constitutionality of any law of the United States, or the validity or construction of any treaty made under its authority, is drawn in question. (6) Cases in which the constitution or law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the constitution of the United States.

In all cases in which the decision of the circuit court of appeals is not made final there is a writ of error or appeal to the supreme court, if taken within one year, and the matter in dispute exceeds one thousand dollars.

To give the supreme court jurisdiction in cases determined by the state court, the jurisdiction must appear from the record itself in the court below and the appellate court, and the point which gives jurisdiction must have been decided or necessary to the decision; 7 How. 744; 91 U. S. 578; 96 id. 432; the question need not have been raised in the subordinate court; 99 U. S. 291; the federal question must have been controlling in the cause; 98 U. S. 140. It need not appear that the state court erred in its judgment; it is enough if a federal question was in the case, as the ground of decision, and that the decision was adverse to the party claiming under the statute, etc.; 8 Wall. 44. No writ of error lies where the decision is in favor of the right, privilege, etc.; 4 Wall. 603; nor where a case is decided on general principles of commercial law; 98 U. S. 332. An allowance of the writ by a judge of the state or supreme court must first be obtained; 9 Wall. 779.

It is no objection to this appellate jurisdiction that one party is a state and the other a citizen of that state; 6 Wheat. 264. A writ of error is the foundation of this jurisdiction; 9 Wall. 779; no appeal can be taken from the state court; 23 How. 192; it applies as well to criminal as to civil suits; 7 Wall. 321; the judgment must be final; 91 U. S. 1, 487; 94 id. 514; 93 id. 320, 108. The writ of error issues to the highest court in which a decision of the cause can be had, though it be not the highest court of the state; 9 Wall. 659; 93 U. S. 274; 94 Mass. 201; if the record remains in the inferior court, the writ of error will issue to that court instead of to the appellate court; if the first writ of error does not succeed in reaching the record, a second will issue; 91 U. S. 143. The criminal jurisdiction of the supreme court is derived from the constitution and the act of September 24, 1789, sect. 13, which gives the supreme court exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics or domestic servants, as a court of law can have consistently with the law of nations. But the act of April 30, 1790, sections 25 and 26, declares void any writ or process whereby the person of any ambassador, or other public minister, their domestics or domestic servants, may be arrested or imprisoned; R. S. § 4063.

The Circuit Court of Appeals. This court was created by act of March 3, 1891, R. S. 1 Supp. 901. Its jurisdiction is appellate merely, and includes the right of review by appeal or writ of error of final decisions in the district courts and the existing circuit courts in all cases other than those in which the same act provides an appeal or writ of error direct to the supreme court. See supra. It may also of its own motion certify to the supreme court questions or propositions of law arising in a pending case "concerning which it desires the instruction of the supreme court for its proper decision;" and the decision thereon is binding on it. The supreme court may also in its discretion issue certiorari to the circuit court of appeals to secure the review and determination of any case pending before the latter court in which its decision would be final. This power may be exercised in cases of habeas corpus; 144 U. S. 47. These two provisions were designed to secure uniformity in the final decision of questions of law in the federal courts, and to avoid the disadvantage which would otherwise result from the existence of nine coördinate courts of last resort.

In each circuit the supreme court justice assigned thereto, and the circuit judges, are competent to sit in the circuit court of appeals, three of them being required to compose the court and two to constitute a quorum. In case it is necessary to make up a full court, one or more of the district judges of the circuit may be designated by the court to sit for the purpose of making a quorum, but no judge before whom a cause or question has been tried or heard in the district or circuit court can sit on the hearing thereof on error or appeal.

Among the subjects of jurisdiction which authorize an appeal or writ of error directly to the supreme court are all cases involving the construction or application of the constitution or the question whether any statute, state or federal, is contrary to the federal constitution; 68 Fed. Rep. 726; and in such cases the circuit court of appeals has no jurisdiction; 19 U. S. App. 233. In such case an appeal or writ of error can only be taken from a final judgment on the merits, and then the defeated party may elect to take the question of jurisdiction alone to the supreme court or the whole case on the merits to the circuit court of appeals; 141 U. S. 661; but if the case has been taken to the circuit court of appeals and the only question is that of jurisdiction of the court below, it will be dismissed for want of jurisdiction; 24 U. S. App. 571. A writ of error or appeal to the circuit court of appeals must be taken within six months, but one to the supreme court may be taken within two years after final judgment or decree; 78 Fed. Rep. 907.

In 155 U. S. 109, the court summarized the effect of the act of March 3, 1891, to establish circuit courts of appeals, thus:

(1) That if the jurisdiction of the circuit court is in issue and decided in favor of the defendant, as that disposes of the case, the plaintiff should have the question certified and take his appeal or writ of error directly to this court.

(2) That if the question of jurisdiction is in issue, and the jurisdiction sustained, and then judgment or decree is rendered in favor of the defendant on the merits, the plaintiff who has maintained the jurisdiction must appeal to the circuit court of appeals, where, if the question of jurisdiction arises, the circuit court of appeals may certify it.

(3) That if the question of jurisdiction is in issue, and the jurisdiction sustained, and judgment on the merits is rendered in favor of the plaintiff, then the defendant can elect either to have the question certified and come directly to this court, or to carry the whole case to the circuit court of appeals, and the question of jurisdiction can be certified by that court.

(4) That if in the case last supposed the plaintiff has ground of complaint in respect of the judgment he has recovered, he may also carry the case to the circuit court of appeals on the merits, and this he may do by way of cross-appeal or writ of error if the defendant has taken the case there, or independently, if the defendant has carried the case to this court on the question of jurisdiction alone, and in this instance the circuit court of appeals will suspend a decision upon the merits until the question of jurisdiction has been determined.

(5) That the same observations are applicable where a plaintiff objects to the jurisdiction, and is, or both parties are, dissatisfied with the judgment on the merits.

By act of February 18, 1895, jurisdiction is given to the circuit court of appeals to review, by appeal taken within thirty days, interlocutory orders "granting, continuing, refusing, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve an injunction" in all cases appealable to the circuit court of appeals on final decision; 28 Stat. L. 666. By act of January 20, 1897, jurisdiction of criminal cases, not capital, is withdrawn from the supreme court and conferred on the circuit court of appeals; 29 Stat. L. 492.

Under the act creating the court, it is required that a term of the circuit court of appeals be held annually in the several judicial circuits at the following places: In the first circuit, in Boston; in the second circuit, in New York; in the third circuit, in Philadelphia; in the fourth circuit, in Richmond; in the fifth circuit, in New Orleans; in the sixth circuit, in Cincinnati; in the seventh circuit, in Chicago; in the eighth circuit, in St. Louis; in the ninth circuit, in San Francisco; and in such other places in each of the circuits as the court may from time to time designate. In the eighth circuit a session is held at St. Paul.

The Circuit Courts. The circuit justice, circuit judge, and the district judge of the district compose the circuit court, which may be held by any one or two of them. Cases may be tried by each of the judges holding a circuit court, sitting apart. The circuit justice is required to attend at least one term of the circuit court in the district during every two years. When the district judge holds a circuit court with either of the other judges, the judgment, etc., shall be rendered in conformity with the opinion of the presiding judge.

In case all the judges are disqualified by interest, etc., from hearing any case, the papers are to be certified to the most convenient circuit. Whenever a circuit justice deems it advisable on account of disability, absence, interest, or the accumulation of business, or other cause, the judge of any other circuit court may be requested to hold the court. The power thus conferred is permissive and discretionary; the judge so requested may refuse the request; 7 Wall. 175. Each circuit court may appoint so many discreet persons as it may deem necessary to be commissioners of the circuit court. These officers are not officers of the court; 3 Blatch. 166. No marshal or deputy marshal may be appointed a commissioner.

The civil jurisdiction of the circuit court was originally conferred by the act of Sept. 24, 1789, which conferred jurisdiction concurrent with that of the state courts in all suits at law or in equity where the matter in dispute exceeded the sum or value of $500, where the United States were plaintiffs, an alien was a party, or the parties were citizens of different states. By the act of March 3, 1875, the jurisdiction was very much enlarged and the result was an over-crowding of the dockets of the federal courts, which continued to such an extent as to lead to the passage of the act of March 3, 1887, which increased the amount necessary to confer jurisdiction from $500 to $2,000, exclusive of both interest and costs, and provided also that in order to give jurisdiction, the defendant must be an inhabitant of the district in which the suit was brought. (See infra.) Under this act the jurisdiction covers: (1) Cases arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. (2) Those in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners. (3) In which there is a controversy between citizens of different states. (4) Those between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states. (5) Cases between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects. (6) Cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law; and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offences cognizable by them.

In the first of these classes the jurisdiction is dependent primarily on the nature of the controversy; in the fourth upon subject-matter; and in the second, third, and fifth on the character of the parties. The jurisdiction in the second and fourth classes is irrespective of amount; 160 U. S. 498; in the first, third, and fifth classes it is confined to cases in which the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000. They also have jurisdiction, irrespective of the amount in controversy, of cases arising under the patent and copyright laws, penalties and forfeitures under the laws of the United States, including violation of laws respecting copyrights, carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, the alien contract labor law, and some other special acts. The circuit courts also have jurisdiction, concurrent with the district courts, of cases arising under the civil rights and elective franchise laws, under R. S. §§ 1786, 1977, 1979, 1981, 2010.

Under the laws for the collection of duties on imports the circuit court has jurisdiction to review the decisions of the boards of general appraisers as to the rate of duty to be imposed on the imports; 26 Stat. L. 131.

By act of March 3, 1897, in a patent suit the defendant may be sued in any district where he has committed infringement and in which he has a "regular and established place of business."

The circuit court has no jurisdiction except such as the statutes confer; 19 How. 393; 1 Deady 300; 2 Dill. 406. The jurisdiction of the circuit courts in equity is coextensive with that of English courts of equity; it is not controlled by the jurisprudence of the state in which the circuit court is held; 2 Story 555; 13 How. 518; 7 Wall. 425. The circuit court has no jurisdiction over a suit between aliens; one party must be a citizen of the state; 5 Cra. 303; 3 Blatch. 244. Under this section the division of a state into two or more districts does not affect the jurisdiction of the circuit court on account of citizenship. The residence of a party in a different district of a state from that in which the suit is brought does not exempt him from the jurisdiction of the court; if he is found in the district where he is sued, he is not within the prohibition of this section; 11 Pet. 25; 1 Kent 350. A citizen of the United States who resides permanently in a state is a citizen of that state; 1 Pet. 476. A citizen of the District of Columbia (6 Wall. 280), or of a territory (1 Wheat. 91), cannot sue in the circuit court in cases where the jurisdiction depends upon citizenship. Nor can a suit be maintained when neither party is a citizen of the state where the suit is brought; 2 Pet. 556; 5 Blatch. 502. A corporation created by a state and doing business in the state is deemed to be a citizen of that state; 18 How. 404; 2 Woods 479; 13 Wall. 270; but see 14 Pet. 60; 6 Wheat. 450. If there are several plaintiffs or several defendants, each must be competent to sue or be sued, in order to maintain the jurisdiction; 11 Wall. 172; a colorable assignment for the purpose of bringing suit will not confer jurisdiction; 6 Wall. 280. The pleadings must show the facts, as to citizenship, necessary to maintain the jurisdiction; 13 Wall. 602.

Where persons constituting a Virginia corporation desired to bring certain litigation against Virginia parties in the federal court and organized a Pennsylvania corporation and conveyed certain property in Virginia to the latter without consideration, it was held to be a mere device to give jurisdiction to the federal court and that it was a fraud upon the court and would not confer jurisdiction; 160 U.S. 327.

The matter in dispute. In actions to recover damages for torts, the sum laid in the declaration is the criterion as to the matter in dispute; 3 Dall. 358. The jurisdiction is not affected by a demand in the declaration of more than the jurisdictional amount; 1 Wash. C. C. 1. In ejectment, the value of the land should appear in the declaration; 4 Wash. C. C. 624; 8 Cra. 220; 1 Pet. C. C. 73; but though the jury do not find the value of the land in dispute, yet if evidence be given on the trial that the value exceeds the jurisdictional amount, it is sufficient to fix the jurisdiction; or the court may ascertain its value by affidavits; 1 Pet. C. C. 78. The amount stated in the declaration and not the amount stated in the prayer for judgment at its close is the test; 4 Dill. 239; where there are separate counts for separate causes of action, the "matter in dispute" is the aggregate of the sums claimed in all the counts; 2 Dill. 213. Jurisdiction cannot be conferred by joining in one bill against distinct defendants, claims, none of which reaches the jurisdictional amount; 164 U. S. 319. In the case of an insolvent building association it was held that the amount in controversy is the total fund, not the plaintiff's share of it; 60 Fed. Rep. 134.

If the matter in dispute arise out of a local injury, for which a local action must be brought, in order to give the circuit court jurisdiction it must be brought in the district where the lands lie; 15 How. 233; 2 Black 485.

By act of February 16, 1875, ch. 77, 18 Stat. L. 315, it is provided that the circuit courts, in deciding admiralty causes, shall find the facts and the conclusions of law and state them separately. In finding the facts the court may by consent impanel a jury of not less than five and not more than twelve persons, to whom shall be submitted the issue of fact in the cause, as in cases of common law. The finding of the jury unless set aside shall stand as the finding of the court. The review of the judgment, etc., in the supreme court, upon appeal, is limited to the questions of law arising upon the record, and to such rulings of the circuit court, excepted to at the time, as may be presented by a bill of exceptions, prepared as in actions at law. The court in patent causes in equity may, under general rules of the supreme court, submit to a similar jury such questions of fact as the court may deem expedient, the finding of the jury to be treated as in cases of issues sent from chancery to a court of law. See 98 U. S. 440; 102 id. 218; 101 id. 6, 247.

The Appellate Jurisdiction formerly exercised by the circuit courts was abolished by the act of March 3, 1891.

When any cause, civil or criminal, of whatever nature, is removed into a circuit court, from a district court, on account of the disability of the judge of such district court, or by reason of his being concerned in interest therein, or having been of counsel for either party, or being so related to or concerned with either party to such cause, as to render it improper, in his opinion, for him to sit on the trial thereof, such circuit court shall have the same cognizance of such cause, and in like manner, as the said district court might have, or as said circuit court might have if the same had been originally and lawfully commenced therein; and shall proceed to hear and determine the same accordingly; R. S. § 637.

The circuit courts, as courts of equity, shall be deemed always open for the purpose of filing any pleading, or issuing and returning mesne and final process, and of making and directing all interlocutory motions, orders, rules, and other proceedings, preparatory to the hearing, upon their merits, of all causes pending therein. And any judge of a circuit court may upon reasonable notice to the parties make and direct and award at chambers or in the clerk's office, and in vacation as well as in term, all such process, commissions, orders, rules, and other proceedings whenever the same are not grantable of course, according to the rules and practice of the court; R. S. § 638.

The trial of issues of fact in the circuit courts shall be by jury, except in cases of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and except as otherwise provided in proceedings in bankruptcy, and by the next section; R. S. § 648. See, also, R. S. 1 Suppl. 175; 100 U. S. 208.

A reference cannot be made to a referee without the consent of both parties; 15 Blatch. 402; 2 Paine 578. A circuit court cannot order a peremptory nonsuit; 14 How. 218; 23 id. 172. See NONSUIT.

Issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court may be tried and determined by the court, without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorney of record, file a stipulation in writing waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury; R. S. § 649.

In the absence of an agreement, the court cannot try an issue of fact without a jury; 19 Wall. 81; in order to obtain a review of the case in the supreme court, the parties must file their written stipulation under this section; 12 Wall. 275. The finding is conclusive as to the facts as found; 101 U. S. 569.

Whenever in any civil suit or proceeding in a circuit court held by a circuit justice and a circuit judge or a district judge, or by a circuit judge and a district judge, there occurs any difference of opinion between the judges as to any matter or thing to be decided, ruled, or ordered by the court, the opinion of the presiding justice or judge shall prevail, and be considered the opinion of the court for the time being; R. S. § 650. See DIVISION OF OPINION.

When a final judgment or decree is entered in any civil suit or proceeding before any circuit court held by a circuit justice and a circuit judge or a district judge, or by a circuit judge and a district judge, in the trial or hearing whereof any question has occurred upon which the opinions of the judges were opposed, the point upon which they so disagreed shall, during the same term, be stated under the direction of the judges, and certified, and such certificate shall be entered of record; R. S. § 652.

If neither of the judges of a circuit court is present to open any session, the marshal may adjourn the court from day to day until a judge is present: Provided, that if neither of them attends before the close of the fourth day after the time appointed for the commencement of the session, the marshal may adjourn the court to the next regular term; R. S. § 671.

If neither of the judges of a circuit court be present to open and adjourn any regular or adjourned or special session, either of them may, by a written order, directed alternatively to the marshal, and, in his absence, to the clerk, adjourn the court from time to time, as the case may require, to any time before the next regular term; R. S. § 672.

The District Courts have jurisdiction as follows:—

1. Of all crimes cognizable under the authority of the United States, committed within their respective districts, or upon the high seas, the punishment of which is not capital.

2. Of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under any law of the United States.

3. Of all suits at common law brought by the United States, or by any officer thereof, authorized by law to sue.

4. Of all causes of action arising under the postal laws of the United States.

5. Of all suits in equity to enforce the lien of the United States upon any real estate for any internal revenue tax, or to subject to the payment of any such tax any real estate owned by the delinquent, or in which he has any right, title, or interest.

6. Of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and of all seizures on land and on waters not within admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and of all prizes brought into the United States.

7. Of all suits brought by any lien for a tort "only" in violation of the law of nations, or of a treaty of the United States.

8. The district courts are constituted courts of bankruptcy, and shall have in their respective districts original jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy. See INFRA.

Enumerating the seven classes first above stated prior to the passing of the present bankrupt act, Judge Thayer said that they were "substantially descriptive of the jurisdiction now exercised by the district courts; they have some other jurisdiction under laws to secure civil rights, and relating to the elective franchise; also certain special jurisdiction under other statutes not necessary to be now mentioned." Thayer, Jur. Fed. Courts § 6.

The district court has no other jurisdiction than that conferred upon it by congress, but it is not an inferior court, though of limited jurisdiction; 1 Hempst. 304: 55 Ind. 52; it is a court of record; 3 W. & S. 166.

The district court of a district has no jurisdiction to try a prisoner for a crime committed in another district; 4 Cra. 75.

Under the third head are embraced suits by all officers holding office under an act of congress, and appointed as required by the constitution; 2 Ben. 303; including the postmaster-general; 12 Wheat. 136; and a receiver of a national bank; 8 Ben. 357; 41 Fed. Rep. 401; 44 id. 642.

As to the extent of the admiralty jurisdiction, see ADMIRALTY.

Jurisdiction in rem is exclusive in the district courts, but the suit may be instituted in the district where the res is found, irrespective of where the injury for which satisfaction is sought occurred; 3 Cliff. 456. Where a lien exists by the maritime law of a foreign nation, our admiralty has jurisdiction to enforce it here, by comity, even though all the parties are foreigners; 9 Wall. 435.

An alien may sue the consul of his own nation in the district court to recover illegal fees; 1 Low. 77.

The district court has no powers as a bankrupt court, except those conferred upon it by statute; 88 How. Pr. 341. It has jurisdiction of two kinds: first, jurisdiction as a court of bankruptcy over the proceedings in bankruptcy, initiated by the petition and ending in the distribution of the assets and the discharge or refusal to discharge the bankrupt; secondly, jurisdiction as an ordinary court, of suits at law or in equity, brought by or against the assignee in reference to alleged property of the bankrupt, or to claims alleged to be due from or to him; 91 U. S. 516. An assignee in bankruptcy may sue in any district; 94 U. S. 558.

Proceedings on seizure for forfeiture of any vessel or cargo entering any port of entry which has been closed, or of goods and chattels coming from a state or section declared by proclamation of the president to be in insurrection, may be prosecuted in any district court into which the property so seized may be taken, and proceedings instituted; and the district court thereof shall have as full jurisdiction over such proceedings as if the seizure was made in that district; R. S. § 564.

Any district court may, notwithstanding an appeal to the supreme court, in any prize cause, make and execute all necessary orders for the custody and disposal of the prize property, and, in case of an appeal from a decree of condemnation, may proceed to make a decree of distribution, so far as to determine what share of the prize shall go to the captors, and what vessels are entitled to participate therein; R. S. § 565.

The trial of issues of fact in district courts, in all causes except in equity, admiralty, and bankruptcy, shall be by jury. In admiralty, in any matter of contract or tort arising upon or concerning any vessel of twenty tons burden or upwards, enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and at the time employed in the business of commerce and navigation between places in different states and territories upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting the lakes, the trial of issues of fact shall be by jury when either party requires it; R. S. § 566.

When any territory is admitted as a state, and a district court is established therein, all the records of the proceedings in the several cases pending in the court of appeal of said territory at the time of such admission, and all records of the proceedings in the several cases in which judgments or decrees had been rendered in said territorial court before that time, and from which writs of error could have been sued out or appeals could have been taken, or from which writs of error had been sued out or appeals had been taken and prosecuted to the supreme court, shall be transferred to and deposited in the district court for the said state; R. S. § 567.

Upon the admission of a state, all cases of a federal character pending in the supreme court, etc., of the territory, are to be transferred into the federal courts; 8 Wall. 342. The United States has power to punish a crime committed against it in one of the territories, although such territory is admitted as a state pending the prosecution and before conviction; 74 Fed. Rep. 43.

The court may compel the delivery of the records by attachment; § 568. When any territory is admitted as a state, the district court has cognizance of all cases pending and undetermined in the superior court of such territory, from the judgments or decrees to be rendered in which writs of error or appeals lie to the supreme court; § 569. If the case pending was not of a federal character, this section does not cover it; 10 How. 72.

By § 572, the times of holding the sessions of the various district courts is provided for; and by § 573 it is provided that no action, etc., shall abate by reason of any act changing the time of holding any district court, but the action shall be deemed returnable to, pending in, and triable at the terms established next after the return day thereof.

The district courts, as courts of admiralty and as courts of equity, so far as equity jurisdiction has been conferred upon them, shall be deemed always open, for the purpose of filing any pleading, of issuing and returning mesne and final process, and of making and directing all interlocutory motions, orders, rules, and all other proceedings, preparatory to the hearing, upon their merits, of all causes pending therein. And any district judge may, upon reasonable notice to the parties, make, and direct, and award, at chambers, or in the clerk's office, and in vacation as well as in term, all such process, commissions, orders, rules, and other proceedings, whenever the same are not grantable of course, according to the rules and practice of the court; R. S. § 574.

By law, the district judge alone composes the court. He is a court wherever and whenever he pleases. No notice to parties is required; no previous order is necessary. The various ex parte orders which admiralty proceedings require, renders this informal mode of acting essential to justice and expedition. The judge will take care that neither party be injured by the orders which he makes ex parte, and where they are of course, it is convenient that they should be made without the formality of summoning the parties to attend. It does not seem to be a violent construction of such an act to consider the judge as constituting a court whenever he proceeds on judicial business; such seems to have been the practice in this and in other districts of the United States; 1 Brock. 382.

By § 578, it is provided that district courts shall hold monthly adjournments of their regular terms, for the trial of criminal cases, when their business requires it to be done.

A special term of any district court may be held at the same place where any regular term is held, or at such other place in the district as the nature of the business may require, and at such time and upon such notice as may be ordered by the district judge, and any business may be transacted at such special term which might be transacted at a regular term; R. S. § 581.

If the judge of any district court is unable to attend at the commencement of any term, the court may be adjourned by the marshal, by virtue of a written order directed to him by the judge, to the next regular term, or to any earlier day, as the order may direct; R. S. § 583.

Provision is made by § 567, in case of the disability of the district judge, for an order of the circuit judge or justice to the clerk, upon the request of the district attorney or marshal, to certify into the next circuit court to be held in the district, all suits and processes, civil and criminal; such order is to be duly published in one newspaper, published in the district, for thirty days, before the commencement of the session. This provision looks to the disability of the district judge, not to a vacancy by death; 1 Gall. 388. Pending the disability, all causes are to be certified in the same way; and, upon the removal of the disability, the causes are to be remanded; § 588. So if the district judge dies, undetermined cases are to be remanded; 1 Gall. 388.

During the disability, the circuit judge, and, in his absence, the circuit justice, exercises all the powers of a district judge; § 589. See 97 U. S. 146.

In case of the disability of a district judge to hold any stated or appointed term of the district court or the circuit court, the circuit judge or, in his absence, the circuit justice may designate the judge of some other district in the circuit to hold such district court; § 591.

Provision is made, in case of the accumulation of business in any district court, for the holding of a district court in such district by the district judge of some other district in the circuit, upon the designation of the circuit judge or, in his absence, the circuit justice, or in some cases of the chief justice; §§ 592, 593, 594, 595. Any circuit judge, whenever the public interests so require, may designate any district judge in his circuit to hold a district or circuit court, in the place or in the aid of any other district judge in the circuit; such district judge to act without additional salary; § 596; except in the cases of district judges holding court in the southern district of New York; § 597.

Whenever a district judge is interested in any suit, or has been of counsel therein, or is related to the parties, etc., he shall, upon the application of either party, order the proceedings to be certified to the next circuit court for the district; and if there be no circuit court therein, to the next circuit court for the state; and if there be no circuit court in the state, to the next convenient circuit court in an adjoining state; § 601.

In cases of vacancy all processes, etc., are to be continued to the next stated term after the qualification of a successor; § 602; except that in states having two or more districts, the judge of the other or either of the other districts may hold the district court, or the circuit in case of the absence or sickness of the other judges thereof; § 603.

Provisions common to more than one court or judge. The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States, in the cases and proceedings hereinafter mentioned, shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states.

First. Of all crimes and offences cognisable under the authority of the United States.

Second. Of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States.

Third. Of all civil causes of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction; saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it.

Fourth. Of all seizures under the laws of the United States, on land or on waters not within admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

Fifth. Of all cases arising under the patent right or copyright laws of the United States.

Sixth. Of all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy.

Seventh. Of all controversies of a civil nature, where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens, or between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens; R. S. § 711.

There is no common-law jurisdiction of crimes in the federal courts. See COMMON LAW, where the cases are cited.

State courts have concurrent jurisdiction by and against national banks; 7 Biss. 449; 49 Vt. 1; a citizen of the United States may sue in a state court a citizen of another state; 27 La. Ann. 229; so in the case of an action by an alien against a citizen of a state; 29 Ark. 637.

A state court has no jurisdiction in cases of offences against the laws of the United States; see 53 Pa. 112; 4 Blackf. 146; including perjury committed before a U. S. commissioner; 55 Ga. 192; 2 Woods 428. The federal courts have no jurisdiction over crimes except that conferred by acts of congress; 4 Sawy. 629; 2 Dall. 384.

The exclusive federal jurisdiction of suits for penalties, etc., contemplates those penalties of a public nature which may be sued for by the United States; 47 Md. 217. Suit may be brought in a state court by a party aggrieved to recover a penalty, although imposed by an act of congress; ibid.; but see contra, 74 Ill. 217.

A collector is liable in a state court at the suit of an informer entitled to a share in the proceeds of the condemnation of a vessel for smuggling, where the proceeds have been paid to the collector; 95 Mass. 301.

A state court has no jurisdiction over proceedings for an infringement of letters patent; 7 Johns. 144; nor in an action of assumpsit upon a quantum valebat to recover for the use of a patented device; 66 N. Y. 459; but a state court has jurisdiction to recover damages for fraud in the sale of letters patent, even though the question of the validity of the patent be involved incidentally; 103 Mass. 501; 24 Ia. 231; 15 Mich. 265; but see 40 Me. 430.

State courts have jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the common-law rights of authors in their literary productions; 47 N. Y. 532.

An assignee in bankruptcy may sue in a state court to collect the assets of the bankrupt; 119 Mass. 429; 3 Neb. 437; 72 N. Y. 159; 3 Fed. Rep. 83; but this must be done under the direction of the district court; 8 N. Y. 254. He can be sued in a state court; 69 N. C. 464. A state may sue a citizen of another state in a state court; 2 Hill, N. Y. 159, per Bronson, J.

By the act of March 1, 1875, § 3, it is provided: "That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several states, cognizance of all crimes and offences against and violations of the provisions of this act [an act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights]; and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the territorial, district, or circuit courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party."

The supreme court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to issue writs of scire facias. They shall also have power to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law; R. S. § 716. By this section, congress only intended the power to issue such other writs in cases where jurisdiction already existed, and not where the jurisdiction was to be acquired by means of the writ to be issued; 3 Cliff. 28. This power embraces writs sanctioned by the usages of the common law, and also writs of execution in use in the state courts other than such as were conformable to the usage of common law; 10 Wheat. 51.

A mandamus cannot be granted when not necessary to the exercise of jurisdiction; 15 Wall. 427. A writ of certiorari is included in this provision; 5 Blatch. 303; but only when it can be issued in aid of a jurisdiction obtained over the subject of the suit in which it is issued; 3 Blatch. 166.

A writ of supersedeas comes within the meaning of the section; 94 U. S. 672; also, a writ of injunction, of subpœna, and attachments for witnesses; 4 Cra. C. C. 372; also, a writ of assistance; 21 Wall, 289; a writ of inhibition; 3 Dall. 54. A writ of error coram nobis does not lie in the circuit court in a criminal case, either from its own judgment or the judgment of the district court; 3 Cliff. 28.

Writs of ne exeat may be granted by any justice of the supreme court in cases where they might be granted by the supreme court, and by any circuit justice or circuit judge in cases where they might be granted by the circuit court of which he is a judge. But no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless a suit in equity is commenced, and satisfactory proof is made to the court or judge granting the same that the defendant designs quickly to depart from the United States; R. S. § 717.

Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction, the court may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion, and such order may be granted with or without security in the discretion of the court or judge; R. S. § 718.

The national courts cannot order temporary injunctions except on reasonable notice; 4 Biss. 78; 4 Dall. 1.

By § 719, a single supreme or a circuit court judge may grant an injunction; but a supreme court judge can hear cases only in his circuit, except by written consent of parties, and when it cannot be heard by the appropriate circuit or district judge. No district judge may issue an injunction in any case where a party has had reasonable time to apply to the circuit court for the writ; and the injunction so issued shall continue no longer than to the circuit court next ensuing.

The writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a state, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy; R. S. § 720. This section is a positive inhibition against issuing any writ or any process whatever intended to stay proceedings in a state court; 6 Blatch. 362. An injunction cannot issue from a federal to a state court, except in bankruptcy; 91 U. S. 254; it may issue in cases of bankruptcy; 98 U. S. 240.

The jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters conferred on the district and circuit courts by the provisions of this title and of title "Civil Rights," and of title "Crimes," for the protection of all persons in the United States in their civil rights, shall be exercised in conformity with the laws of the United States, so far as such laws are suitable to carry the same into effect; but in all cases where they are not adapted to the object or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, the common law as modified and changed by the constitution and statutes of the state wherein the court having jurisdiction of such civil or criminal cause is held, so far as the same is not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, shall govern the said courts, and, if it is of a criminal nature, in the infliction of punishment on the party found guilty; R. S. § 722.

Suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States in any case where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law; R. S. § 723. This section makes no change in the rule of equity which refuses a remedy when an adequate remedy exists at law; 2 Black 545.

By § 724, in the trial of actions at law, the courts may, on motion and due notice, require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issues, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of chancery. If a plaintiff fails to comply with such order, the court may, on motion, give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit, and if a defendant fails to comply with such order the court may, on motion, give judgment against him by default. See PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS.

An order to produce will be granted only in cases where a relief would be granted in equity by a bill of discovery; 2 Blatch. 301. A preliminary motion and notice are required; 20 How. 194; an ex parte affidavit in support of the motion is sufficient; Gilp. 306. The order may be made with leave to show cause at the trial; 3 Cliff. 201; but see 2 Cra. C. C. 427. See 2 Blatch. 23. The rule does not apply to a subpœna duces tecum to compel a witness to produce papers in his possession; 3 Dill. 566.

The said courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish by fine or imprisonment at the discretion of the court contempt of their authority: Provided, that such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts; R. S. § 725.

Whether this section can limit the powers of the supreme court may be doubtful, as that court derives its powers from the constitution; 19 Wall. 506.

All of the said courts shall have power to grant new trials, in cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law; R. S. § 726. See 1 W. & M. 368.

The district and circuit courts, and the commissioners of the circuit courts, shall have power to carry into effect the award, or arbitration, or decree of any consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of any foreign nation, on petition of such consul, etc.; R. S. § 728.

The trial of offences punishable with death shall be had in the county where the offence was committed, where that can be done without great inconvenience; R. S. § 729. As to whether this section applies to crimes committed in a place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, see 2 Mas. 91.

The final judgment of a court of the United States in cases of capital or otherwise infamous crime is not reviewable except on a writ of error; 159 U. S. 680.

The trial of all offences committed upon the high seas or elsewhere, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state or district, shall be in the district where the offender is found, or into which he is first brought; R. S. § 730. These are offences belonging naturally and properly to the maritime jurisdiction of the Union; Hemp. 446; a person is triable in the southern district of New York, who on a vessel owned by citizens of the United States has committed the offence on the high seas specified, has, on the arrival of the vessel at the quarantine in the eastern district, been delivered to the state authorities, and by them carried into the southern district and there delivered to the United States authorities, to whom a warrant to apprehend him was first issued; 19 Wall. 486.

Where any offence against the United States is begun in one judicial district and completed in another, it shall be deemed to have been committed in either, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either district, in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly committed therein; R. S. § 731. The phrase "judicial circuit" is used in the Rev. Stat. of 1878. See a discussion of this section in relation to United States v. Guiteau in the Amer. Law Review. The section does not permit the indictment in the District of Columbia of one who wrote a libel in Washington and sent it to Michigan for publication; 3 Dill. 116.

All pecuniary penalties and forfeitures may be recovered in the district where they accrue or where the offender may be found; R. S. § 732; and internal revenue taxes may be recovered in the district where the liability occurs or where the delinquent resides; § 733.

Proceedings on seizures made on the high seas may be prosecuted in any district into which the property is brought; § 734; 1 Mas. 360; 9 Cra. 289; 2 Wall. 383.

Proceedings for the condemnation of any property captured whether on the high seas or elsewhere may be prosecuted in any district where the same may be seized, or into which it may be taken and proceedings first instituted; R. S. § 735.

When there are several defendants in any suit in law or in equity, and one or more of them are neither inhabitants of nor found within the district in which the suit was brought and do not voluntarily appear, the court may entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the trial and adjudication of the suit between the parties who are properly before it; but the judgment or decree rendered therein shall not conclude or prejudice other parties not regularly served with process nor voluntarily appearing to answer; and non-joinder of parties who are not inhabitants of nor found within the district, as aforesaid, shall not constitute matter of abatement or objection to the suit; R. S. § 737.

Where four persons made a contract with a citizen of Ohio, and three of the four were citizens of Indiana, and suit was brought in the circuit court in Indiana, the non-joinder of the fourth was not ground for abatement; 21 How. 489.

If a party is a necessary party in equity, no decree can be made in his absence; 2 Woods 1.

By § 738 provision is made for service on absent defendants in suits in equity to enforce liens or claims against property within the district, by service of an order to appear, etc., if practicable, if not by advertising.

Proceedings under the act are proper, although suit was begun before it was passed; 99 U. S. 567. Personal service under this act should be secured whenever practicable, and resort had to constructive service by publication, only when the better mode is not practicable within a reasonable time and by the exercise of reasonable diligence; 2 Dill. 498. Shares of stock of a corporation of the district in which suit is brought, owned by a non-resident, are not "personal property within the district," and, therefore, service cannot be made in such a case by publication; 2 Woods 145.

In all courts of the United States the parties may plead and manage their own causes personally, or by the assistance of such counsel or attorneys at law as, by the rules of the said courts, respectively, are permitted to manage and conduct causes therein; R. S. § 747. The attorney, when retained, has the exclusive control of the management and conduct of the cause; 2 Sawy. 341.

The supreme, circuit, and district courts have power to issue writs of habeas corpus; R. S. § 751. The term used in the act is a generic term, and includes every species of the writ of habeas corpus; per Marshall, C. J., in 4 Cra. 95; and the extent of the jurisdiction is only such as is conferred by statute; ibid.

As to the use of this writ by the federal courts, see HABEAS CORPUS; also, 169 U. S. 284; 81 Fed. Rep. 359; 82 id. 422; 80 id. 99.

From the final decision of such circuit court, on writs of habeas corpus under R. S. § 763, an appeal may be taken to the supreme court, on such terms, and under such regulations and orders, as well for the custody and appearance of the person alleged to be in prison or confined or restrained of his liberty, as for sending up to the appellate tribunal a transcript of the petition, writ of habeas corpus, return thereto, and other proceedings as may be subscribed by the supreme court, or, in default thereof, by the court or judge hearing the cause; R. S. §§ 764, 765. See 3 Cliff. 440.

The Territorial Courts. In the territories, the judicial power is vested in a supreme court, consisting of a chief justice and associate justices, who hold their offices for a term of four years, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. In Arizona, the judicial power was vested in a supreme court and such inferior courts as the legislative council may by law provide, and under this power district and probate courts and justices of the peace were provided for; and by act of Feb. 11, 1891, congress provided for district courts to be held by a justice of the supreme court. These territorial courts are not constitutional courts, that is, courts upon which judicial power is conferred by the constitution of the United States; but their powers and duties are conferred upon them by the acts of congress which created them. It is not necessary to specify these. For a detailed statement of the legislation on the subject, see 1 Garl. & Ralst. Fed. Pr. § 444. See, also, the titles on the several territories.

District of Columbia. The supreme court of the District of Columbia was established by act of March 3, 1863. The same act abolished the former circuit court, district court, and criminal court of the district. The supreme court consists of six justices (one of whom is designated the chief justice), appointed by the president of the United States, etc., who hold their offices during good behavior.

It has the same jurisdiction as circuit and district courts, and any judge may exercise the jurisdiction of a circuit or district court. It has jurisdiction of patent, copyright, divorce, and bankruptcy cases. Actions can be brought only against inhabitants of the district, or persons found therein. It has common law and chancery jurisdiction, according to the laws of Maryland on May 3, 1802. In cases within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, it has original jurisdiction only over cases involving more than fifty dollars. It has appellate jurisdiction from justices of the peace.

Any one of the justices may hold a criminal court for the trial of all crimes and offences arising within the district; R. S. 1 Supp. 279; 102 U. S. 378.

By act of Feb. 9, 1893, 27 Stat. L. 434, amended by act of July 30, 1894, 28 Stat. L. 160, there was established a court of appeals of the District of Columbia, consisting of a chief justice and two associates. It has jurisdiction of appeals from the supreme court of the district, including interlocutory orders, and from the commissioner of patents; but it has no power to review a judgment of the supreme court of the district on an appeal from a justice of the peace; 3 App. D. C. 317; except upon the question of the jurisdiction of that court; 4 id. 289. In cases where the matter in dispute is above five thousand dollars, the decisions of the court of appeals may be re-examined and affirmed, reversed, or modified by the supreme court of the United States.

Court of Claims. This court, as originally created by act of February 24, 1855, 10 Stat. L. 12, consisted of three judges; it now consists of a chief justice and four judges, who are appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and hold office during good behavior; its sessions are held annually at Washington, beginning on the first Monday in December. Members of either house of congress are forbidden to practise in this court; R. S. §§ 1049–1058. A quorum consists of three judges, but the concurrence of three judges is necessary to any judgment; Act of June 23, 1874. Its jurisdiction extends throughout the United States; 1 Ct. Cl. 388.

"Before the establishment of the court of claims, claimants could only be heard by congress. That court was established in 1855 for the triple purpose of relieving congress, and of protecting the government by regular investigation, and of benefiting the claimants by affording them a certain mode of examining and adjudicating upon their claims. It was required to hear and determine upon claims founded upon any law of congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States. Originally it was a court merely in name, for its power extended only to the preparation of bills to be submitted to congress.

"In 1863 the number of judges was increased from three to five, its jurisdiction was enlarged, and, instead of being required to prepare bills for congress, it was authorized to render final judgment, subject to appeal to this court, and to an estimate of the secretary of the treasury of the amount required to pay each claimant. This court being of opinion that the provision for an estimate was inconsistent with the finality essential to judicial decisions, congress repealed that provision. Since then the court of claims has exercised all the functions of a court, and this court has taken full jurisdiction on appeal.

"The court of claims is thus constituted one of those inferior courts which congress authorizes, and has jurisdiction of contracts between the government and the citizens, from which appeal regularly lies to this court." Per Chase, C. J., 13 Wall. 196.

Its jurisdiction, by R. S. § 1059, extends to:—

First. All claims founded upon any law of congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the government of the United States, and all claims which may be referred to it by either house of congress.

Second. All set-offs counter-claims claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever, on the part of the United States against any person making claim against the government in said court.

Third. The claim of any paymaster, quartermaster, commissary of subsistence, or other disbursing officer of the United States, or of his administrators or executors, for relief from responsibility on account of capture or otherwise, while in the line of his duty, of government funds, vouchers, records, or papers in his charge, and for which such officer was and is held responsible.

Fourth. Of all claims for the proceeds of captured or abandoned property, as provided by the act of March 12, 1863, or by the act of July 2, 1864. The remedy given under the said acts was exclusive, and it was provided that its jurisdiction shall not extend to any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of or damage to property by the army or navy engaged in the suppression of the rebellion.

By the act of March 3, 1883, usually called the Bowman Act, it was provided that claims pending before committees of congress or executive departments might be referred to the court of claims for examination, and that the facts found, without judgment being entered should be reported to the committee or department respectively; 1 Supp. R. S. 403.

By act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, additional jurisdiction was conferred upon the court of claims, which was thereby authorized to hear and determine all claims founded upon the constitution of the United States or any law of congress, except for pensions, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or any contract, express or implied, or for damages liquidated or unliquidated in cases not sounding in tort, in respect to which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States if suable. The reference of such claims to the court by the departments or by committees of congress was authorized. By that act concurrent jurisdiction was given to the district courts where the claim did not exceed $1,000, and to the circuit courts where it did exceed $1,000, but did not exceed $10,000.

Prior to the passage of these acts, by R. S. § 1063, claims exceeding $3,000, or the decision of which would affect a class or furnish a precedent, might be referred to the court by the head of an executive department to be proceeded with as if begun by the claimant. See 12 Ct. Cl. 319, 470; 8 id. 326.

Under the act of Jan. 20, 1885, the court of claims was authorized to examine the French Spoliation claims, upon petition of the claimants, and to report their finding without binding either the claimant or congress; 1 Supp. R. S. 471; and the act of March 3, 1891, provided that the awards should not be paid until the court should certify that the personal representatives on whose behalf the award was made represent the next of kin, and excludes from benefit the creditors of bankrupt claimants; id. 925.

By act of March 3, 1891, the court was authorized to adjudicate claims for Indian depredations accruing since July 1, 1865; id. 913. Other claims of minor importance are placed within the jurisdiction of the court by special acts of which a list may be found in 1 Garl. & Ralst. Fed. Pr. § 376, n.

In the court of claims the government is liable for refusing to receive and pay for what it has agreed to receive and purchase; it is not liable on implied assumpsit for the torts of its officers, committed while in the service, and apparently for its benefit; 8 Wall. 269. The United States cannot be sued there upon equitable considerations only; the holder of a military bounty land warrant cannot recover compensation for the wrongful appropriation to others of the land ceded for his benefit; 9 Wall. 156.

To constitute an implied contract with the United States for the payment of money upon which an action will lie in the court of claims, there must have been some consideration moving to the United States, or they must have received the money charged with a duty to pay it over; or the claimant must have had a lawful right to it when it was received, as in the case of money paid by mistake. No such implied contract with the United States arises with respect to moneys received into the treasury as the proceeds of property forfeited and sold under that act; 95 U. S. 149.

The court has no jurisdiction of suits founded upon torts; 155 U. S. 163; 1 Garl. & Ralst. Fed. Pr. § 377; as a case of collision; 2 Ct. Cl. 210; an action to recover damages for illegal arrest and imprisonment; or destruction of property by a bombardment or the wrongful act of an officer of the United States; 8 Wall. 269; 12 id. 315; 1 Ct. Cl. 316.

This court has no jurisdiction of matters in equity; 9 Wall. 156; 27 Ct. Cl. 74; or of claims for damages for infringement of a patent right; 155 U. S. 163; or of suits to recover a military land warrant; 6 Wall. 578. The only judgment it can render is for money found due from the government; id.; 1 Ct. Cl. 233. The principle underlying this entire jurisdiction is that the United States cannot be sued in their own courts without their consent, and congress has absolute discretion to specify the cases, and contingencies in which the liability of the government is submitted to the courts, and they may not go beyond the letter of such consent; 155 U. S. 168.

Every specific assignment of a claim against the United States under a statute or treaty, whether presented to an executive department or prosecuted in the court of claims, is void unless assented to by it; 161 U. S. 72. Where the proceeds of land taken under such condemnation proceedings by the government were deposited in court and distributed by its order, the government, is not liable if they were paid to the wrong person; courts of the United States are not agencies of the federal government and the latter is not liable for their mistakes; 146 U. S. 338; nor is it liable where the register of the treasury cancels registered bonds without authority, nor for the nonfeasance or misfeasance or neglect of any of its officers; 148 U. S. 573.

No suit can be maintained against the United States under the Abandoned and Captured Property Act, if the property was neither captured, seized, nor sold, and the proceeds not paid into the treasury; 91 U. S. 577. Under this act, a pardoned rebel could recover, in the court of claims, if he brought suit within two years; 13 Wall. 144; but a person who did give aid and comfort to the rebellion, and who has not been pardoned until two years after the suppression of the rebellion, cannot obtain the benefit of the act; 22 Wall. 81.

Where a trust fund has been perverted by the fraud of an agent of the government, and gone into the hands of the United States, the owner of the fund may follow it and recover in the court of claims; in such a case, its sovereignty is in no wise involved; 96 U. S. 30.

It is said by Nott, J., in 6 Ct. Cl. 192, that it is a fact judicially established that the government of the United States holds itself, of nearly all governments, the least amenable to the law. See that case for a full discussion of the rights of aliens of various nationalities to sue in the court of claims.

Suits in this court are not suits at common law, and the provision in the constitution which preserves the right of trial by jury does not extend to such suits; the right to sue the government is a grant, and one of the conditions of the grant is that the government may set up and recover on counter-claims against the suitor; 12 Ct. Cl. 312.

All petitions and bills praying or providing for the payment of private claims against the government are, unless otherwise ordered, to be transmitted to the court of claims; § 1060.

By § 1061, in case of a set-off on behalf of the United States, the court shall determine the whole case and may enter a judgment on the set-off against the claimant. See 12 Ct. Cl. 312.

A demand by the United States of the proceeds of Indian trust bonds unlawfully converted to their own use by persons who had illegally procured and sold them, and become insolvent, is a proper subject of set-off: 16 Wall. 207. An alien who is a citizen or subject of a government which accords to citizens of the United States the right to prosecute claims against such government, in its courts, has the right to sue the United States, if his claim is otherwise within its ordinary jurisdiction; R. S. § 1068. This privilege is accorded to citizens of the United States by Great Britain; 11 Wall. 178; 16 id. 147; France; 6 Ct. Cl. 204, 221; Spain; id. 269; Belgium; 7 id. 517; Italy; 9 id. 254; Prussia; 5 id. 571; Switzerland; id. 687.

The limitation of suits is six years after the claim accrues, with an allowance for the ordinary disabilities; R. S. § 1069. No claimant, nor person through whom he claims title, is a competent witness; id. § 1079; but a complainant may be compelled to testify at the instance of a solicitor for the government; id. § 1080. One who claims as an officer without personal interests may testify; 96 U. S. 37.

As to war claims, see 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 265.

See UNITED STATES OF AMERICA; FEDERAL GOVERNMENT; JUDICIAL POWER; JURISDICTION

A bankruptcy act was passed by congress and approved by the president July 1st, 1898. It extends not only to corporations ordinarily speaking, but to limited or other partnership associations whose capital alone is responsible for the debts of the association.

A person shall be deemed insolvent within the act "whenever the aggregate of his property, exclusive of any property which he may have conveyed, transferred, concealed, or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, with intent to defraud, hinder, or delay his creditors, shall not, at a fair valuation, be sufficient in amount to pay his debts." Wage-earner shall include any person who works for wages, salary, or hire, at a rate of compensation not exceeding one thousand five hundred dollars per year.

The courts of bankruptcy are the district courts of the United States and of the territories, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of the Indian Territory and of Alaska. They are invested with such jurisdiction in law and at equity as will enable them to exercise original jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings, in vacation in chambers and during their respective terms; to adjudge persons bankrupt who have had their principal place of business, resided, or had their domicil for the preceding six months, or the greater portion thereof, within their respective territorial jurisdictions, or who do not have their principal place of business, reside, or have their domicil within the United States, but have property within the jurisdiction of the court or have been adjudged bankrupts by competent courts of jurisdiction without the United States, and have property within their jurisdictions.

Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having (1) conveyed, transferred, concealed, or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, any part of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them; or (2) transferred, while insolvent, any portion of his property to one or more of his creditors with intent to prefer such creditors over his other creditors; or (3) suffered or permitted, while insolvent, any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, and not having at least five days before a sale or final disposition of any property affected by such preference, vacated or discharged such preference; or (4) made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors; or (5) admitted in writing his inability to pay his debts and his willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground.

A petition may be filed against a person who is insolvent and who has committed an act of bankruptcy within four months after the commission of such act. Such time shall not expire until four months after (1) the date of the recording of the transfer, when the act consists in having made a transfer of any of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or for the purpose of giving a preference as in the act provided, or a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, if by law such recording is required or permitted; or, if it is not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive, or continuous possession of the property, unless the petitioning creditor have received actual notice of such transfer or assignment.

It would be a defence to prove that the party was not insolvent as defined in the act at the time the petition was filed against him, and upon such proof the proceedings shall be dismissed. The burden of proof is on the alleged bankrupt. He must appear in court with books and accounts, and submit to an examination in respect to his insolvency.

The petitioner in involuntary proceedings is required to give bond with two good and sufficient sureties who shall reside in the jurisdiction to be proved by the court, in such sums as the court shall direct, conditioned on the payment of damages and costs in case the petition is dismissed. If the petition is dismissed the respondent is allowed all costs, counsel fees, expenses, and damages, to be fixed by the court and covered by the bond.

The following classes except corporations are entitled to the benefits of the act as voluntary bankrupts:—

"Any natural person, except a wage-earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company and any corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, or mercantile pursuits, owing debts to the amount of one thousand dollars or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. Private bankers, but not national banks or banks incorporated under state or territorial laws, may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts."

A partnership during its continuance or after its dissolution and before its final settlement may be adjudged a bankrupt. The court which has jurisdiction of one of the partners may have jurisdiction of all the partnership assets, but separate accounts of the partnership and individual property should be kept and expenses divided between them as the court shall determine. The net proceeds of partnership property goes to partnership debts, and those of the individual estates to individual debts. Any surplus in either case to the other class of debts. Proof of claims of partnership debts may be allowed against individual estates and vice versa, and the court may marshal the assets of both estates so as to prevent preferences and secure an equitable distribution.

If one or more but not all of the partners are adjudged bankrupt the partnership property shall not be administered in bankruptcy unless by consent of the partners not adjudged bankrupts. The latter shall settle the partnership business as expeditiously as possible and account for the interest of the bankrupt partners. Any exemptions in force when the petition was filed in the state where the bankrupt had his domicil for six months or the greater portion thereof immediately preceding the filing of the petition are preserved.

Provision is made for a composition with creditors, but not until the bankrupt has been examined in open court or at a meeting of creditors and has filed his schedule of assets and list of creditors. If the application therefor has been accepted in writing by a majority in number and amount of proved creditors, and the consideration thereof and money to pay all prior debts and costs have been deposited subject to the order of the court, it may be presented to the court, which, after notice and a hearing, may confirm it.

A discharge may be applied for, but not until one month after, and within the ensuing twelve months from the adjudication of bankruptcy (with a further extension, by order of court for cause, of six months). No discharge shall be granted if the bankrupt has committed an offence punishable by imprisonment under the act; or, with fraudulent intent to conceal his condition, etc., has destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep proper books of account.

A discharge releases all debts except taxes due the United States or the state, county, district, or municipality in which the bankrupt resides; judgments on claims for fraud or for obtaining property by false pretences and wilful injuries to the person or property of another; and debts not scheduled (unless the creditor was unknown to the bankrupt or the creditor had knowledge of the proceedings); or created by fraud, embezzlement, etc., as an officer or trustee.

The right to a trial by jury is given in respect of the fact of insolvency and of the commission of an act of bankruptcy, upon the application of the respondent.

The circuit court has jurisdiction of all controversies, as distinguished from proceedings in bankruptcy, between the trustee and any adverse claimant of his property. Suits by the trustee must be brought in the court where the bankrupt might have brought them, unless by consent of the proposed defendant. The circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction with the bankruptcy court of offences enumerated in the act.

The supreme court, the circuit court of appeals, and the supreme courts of the territories have appellate jurisdiction of controversies arising from which they have appellate jurisdiction in other like cases. The circuit courts of appeal have jurisdiction in equity to revise in matters of law the proceedings of the bankruptcy courts.

Appeals (but not to the supreme court) may be taken (1) from a judgment adjudging or refusing to adjudge the defendant a bankrupt; (2) granting or denying a discharge; (3) allowing or rejecting a claim of $500 or over. Such appeal must be taken within ten days.

An appeal may be taken thence to the supreme court (1) where the amount in controversy exceeds $2000, and the question is one which might have been taken from the highest court of the state to the supreme court; (2) where a justice of the supreme court shall certify that the question involved in the allowance or rejection of such claim is essential to a uniform construction of the act.

Controversies may be certified to the supreme court from other courts under existing laws.

In the computation of time the first day is excluded and the last included. The act provides for the appointment for two years of a reasonable number of referees, to whom all matters may be referred.

The creditors appoint one or three trustees at their first meeting, failing which the court shall do so. Their duties are, in substance, the same as those of assignees under the earlier bankrupt act.

The first meeting of creditors shall be held not less than ten nor more than thirty days after the adjudication. Subsequent meetings may be held when all creditors whose claims are allowed sign a written consent thereto. The court shall call a meeting whenever one-fourth of those who have proved their claims apply in writing. A final meeting shall be held when the estate is ready to be closed.

Any qualified person may file a petition in voluntary bankruptcy. Three or more creditors whose provable claims aggregate, above any securities, $500, or if all the creditors are less than twelve in number, then one whose claim exceeds such amount may petition in involuntary bankruptcy.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. The republic whose organic law is the constitution adopted by the people of the thirteen states which declared their independence of the government of Great Britain on the fourth day of July, 1776.

When they are said to constitute one nation, this must be understood with proper qualifications. Our motto, E pluribus unum, expresses the true nature of that composite body which foreign nations regard and treat with in all their communications with our people. No state can enter into a treaty, nor make a compact with any foreign nation. To foreigners we present a compact unity, an undivided sovereignty. No state can do a national act nor legally commit the faith of the Union.

In our interstate and domestic relations we are for some purposes one. We are, so far as our constitution makes us, one, and no further; and under this we are so far a unity that one state is not foreign to another. Art. 4, § 2. A constitution, according to the original meaning of the word, is an organic law. It includes the organization of the government, the grant of powers, the distribution of these powers into legislative, executive, and judicial, and the names of the officers by whom these are exercised. And with these provisions a constitution, properly so-called, terminates. But ours goes further. It contains restrictions on the powers of the government which it organizes.

The writ of habeas corpus, the great instrument in defence of personal liberty against the encroachment of the government, shall not be suspended but in case of rebellion or invasion, and when the public safety requires it. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; no money shall be drawn from the treasury where there is not a regular appropriation; no title of nobility shall be granted; and no person holding office shall receive a present from any foreign government. Art. 1, § 9. To these, which are in the original constitution, may be added the eleven first amendments. These, as their character clearly shows, had their origin in a jealousy of the powers of the general government. All are designed more effectually to guard the rights of the people, and would properly, together with the restrictions in the original constitution, have a place in a bill of rights. Any act or law of the United States in violation of these, with whatever formality enacted, would be null and void, as an excess of power.

The restrictions on state sovereignty, besides those which relate to foreign nations, are that no state shall coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts, pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility. These prohibitions are absolute. In addition to these restrictions, the results of the rebellion of 1861-1865 caused the adoption of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments, which lay still further restrictions upon the power of the states, so far as relates to slavery and the regulation of the right of suffrage. The 13th amendment provides that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction, and confers power upon congress to enforce this article by appropriate legislation: the 14th amendment provides that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and defines who shall be so considered; the 15th amendment specifically provides that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Without the consent of congress no state shall lay any duties on imports or exports, or any duty on tonnage, or keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, or enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or engage in war unless actually invaded, or in imminent danger of being so.

What constitutes a duty on exports or imports has been a matter of frequent litigation in the supreme court. It has been finally decided that the term "import" as used in the constitution does not refer to articles imported from one state to another, but only to articles imported from foreign states; 6 Wall. 128: but the prohibition contained in those provisions of the constitution which ordain that congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states; that no state shall levy any imposts or duties on imports or exports; that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the immunities and privileges of citizens of the several states, have been construed together by the supreme court; and various statutes of the different states have been declared unconstitutional because they violated them. Thus a statute allowing an additional fee to port-wardens for every vessel entering a port; 6 Wall. 31; a tax on passengers introduced from foreign countries; 7 How. 286; a tax on passengers going out of a state; 6 Wall. 35; a tax levied upon freight brought into or through one state into another; 15 Wall. 232; a tonnage tax on vessels entering the harbors of a state, either from foreign or domestic ports; 12 Wall. 204; 19 id. 561; 20 id. 577; 100 U. S. 434; have all been so decided. It is said that wherever subjects, in regard to which a power to regulate commerce is asserted, are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they are exclusively within the regulating control of congress. But the mere grant of the commercial power to congress does not forbid the states from passing laws to regulate pilotage. The power to regulate commerce includes various subjects, upon which there should be some uniform rule, and upon others different rules in different localities. The power is exclusive in congress in the former, but not so in the latter class; 12 How. 297. See COMMERCE.

Whatever these restrictions are, they operate on all states alike, and if any state laws violate them, the laws are void; and without any legislation of congress the supreme court has declared them so; 6 Cra. 100; 4 Wheat. 122, 518; 16 How. 304; cases supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 729.

The United States have certain powers, the principal of which are enumerated in art. 1, § 8, running into seventeen specific powers. Others are granted to particular branches of the government: as, the treaty-making power to the president and senate. These have an equal effect in all the states, and so far as an authority is vested in the government of the Union or in any department of it, and so far as the states are prohibited from the exercise of certain powers, so far in our domestic affairs we are a unity.

The United States is a sovereign and independent nation vested with the entire control of international relations, and with all the powers of government necessary to maintain that control and make it effective; 149 U. S. 698; and see 130 id. 606.

Within these granted powers the sovereignty of the United States is supreme. The constitution, and the laws made in pursuance of it, and all treaties, are the supreme law of the land. Art. 6. And they not only govern in their words, but in their meaning. If the sense is ambiguous or doubtful, the United States, through their courts, in all cases where the rights of an individual are concerned, are the rightful expositors. For without the authority of explaining this meaning, the United States would not be sovereign.

In these matters, particularly in the limitation put on the sovereignty of the states, it has been sometimes said that the constitution executes itself. This expression may be allowed; but with as much propriety these may be said to be laws which the people have enacted themselves, and no laws of congress can either take from, add to, or confirm them. They are rights, privileges, or immunities which are granted by the people, and are beyond the power of congress or state legislatures; and they require no law to give them force or efficiency. The members of congress are exempted from arrest, except for treason, felony, and breach of the peace, in going to and returning from the seat of government. Art. 1, § 6. It is obvious that no law can effect this immunity. On these subjects all laws are purely nugatory, because if they go beyond or fall short of the provisions of the constitution, that may always be appealed to. An individual has just what that gives him,—no less and no more. It may be laid down as a universal rule, admitting of no exception, that when the constitution has established a disability or immunity, a privilege or a right, these are precisely as that instrument has fixed them, and can be neither augmented nor curtailed by any act or law either of congress or a state legislature. We are more particular in stating this principle because it has sometimes been forgotten both by legislatures and theoretical expositors of the constitution.

It has been justly thought a matter of importance to determine from what source the United States derive their authority. 4 Wheat. 402. When the constitution was framed, the people of this country were not an unformed mass of individuals. They were united into regular communities under state governments, and to these had confided the whole mass of sovereign power which they chose to intrust out of their own hands. The question here proposed is whether our bond of union is a compact entered into by the states, or the constitution is an organic law established by the people. To this question the preamble gives a decisive answer: We, the people, ordain and establish this constitution. The members of the convention which formed it were indeed appointed by the states. But the government of the states had only a delegated power, and, if they had an inclination, had no authority to transfer the allegiance of the people from one sovereign to another. The great men who formed the constitution were sensible of this want of power, and recommended it to the people themselves. They assembled in their own conventions and adopted it, acting in their original capacity as individuals, and not as representing states. The state governments are passed by in silence. They had no part in making it, and, though they have certain duties to perform, as, the appointment of senators, are properly not parties to it. The people in their capacity as sovereign made and adopted it; and it binds the state governments without their consent. The United States as a whole, therefore, emanates from the people, and not from the states, and the constitution and laws of the states, whether made before or since the adoption of that of the United States, are subordinate to it and the laws made in pursuance of it. See Fisher, Evolution of Const.

It has very truly been said that out of the mass of sovereignty intrusted to the states was carved a part and deposited with the United States. But this was taken by the people, and not by the states as organized communities. The people are the fountain of sovereignty. The whole was originally with them as their own. The state governments were but trustees acting under a derived authority, and had no power to delegate what was delegated to them. But the people, as the original fountain, might take away what they had lent and intrust it to whom they pleased. They had the whole title, and, as absolute proprietors, had the right of using or abusing,—jus utendi et abutendi.

A consequence of great importance flows from this fact. The laws of the United States act directly on individuals, and they are directly responsible and not mediately through the state governments. This is the most important improvement made by our constitution over all previous confederacies. As a corollary from this, if not more properly a part of it, the laws act only on states through individuals. They are supreme over persons and cases, but do not touch the state: they act through them; 1 Wheat. 368. If a state passes an ex post facto law, or passes a law impairing the obligation of contracts, or makes anything but gold or silver a tender in payment of debts, congress passes no law which touches the state: it is sufficient that these laws are void, and when a case is brought before the court, it, without any law of congress, will declare them void. They give no person an immunity, nor deprive any of a right. Again: should a state pass a law declaring war against a foreign nation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, arm troops or keep ships of war in time of peace, individuals acting under such laws would be responsible to the United States. They might be treated and punished as traitors or pirates. But congress would and could pass no law against the state; and for this simple reason, because the state is sovereign. And it is a maxim consecrated in public law as well as common sense and the necessity of the case, that a sovereign is answerable for his acts only to his God and to his own conscience.

The constitution and laws made in pursuance of it,—that is, laws within their granted powers,—and all treaties, are the supreme law of the land, art. 6; and the judicial power, art. 3, § 1, gives to the supreme court the right of interpreting them. But this court is but another name for th. United States, and this power necessarily results from their sovereignty; for the United States would not be truly sovereign unless their interpretation as well as the letter of the law governed. But this power of the court is confined to cases brought before them, and does not embrace principles independent of these cases. They have no power analogous to that of the Roman prætor of declaring the meaning of the constitution by edicts. Any opinion, however strongly expressed, has no authority beyond the reasoning by which it is supported, and binds no one. But the point embraced in the case is as much a part of the law as though embraced in the letter of the law or constitution, and it binds public functionaries, whether of the states or United States, as well as private persons; and this of necessity, as there is no authority above a sovereign to which an appeal can be made.

Another question of great practical importance arose at an early period of our government. The natural tendency of all concentrated power is to augment itself. Limitations of authority are not to be expected from those to whom power is intrusted; and such is the infirmity of human nature that those who are most jealous when out of power and seeking office are quite as ready practically to usurp it as any other. A general abrogation commonly precedes a real usurpation, to lull suspicion if for no other purpose. When the constitution was new, and before it had been fully considered, this diversity of opinion was not unnatural, and was the subject of earnest argument, but is, we think, now settled, and rightly, both on technical reasoning and on that of expediency. The question is between incidental and constructive or implied powers. The government of the United States is one of delegated power. No general words are used from which a general power can be inferred. Incidental and implied are sometimes used as synonymous; but in accurate reasoning there is a plain distinction between them, and the latter, in common use, comes nearer to constructive than to incidental.

The interpretation of powers is familiar to courts of justice, as a great part of landed property in England and much in this country is held under powers. A more frequent example is that of common agency, as every agent is created by a power. Courts whose professed object is to carry into effect the intentions of parties have, on this subject, established general rules. Among these no one is more immovably fixed than this, that the interpretation is strict and not liberal. 2 Kent 617; 4 id. 330. But this strictness does not exclude incidental powers. These are included in a general and express power, both in the common and technical use of language. To take a familiar example. A merchant of Philadelphia or Boston has a cargo of tea arrive at New York, and by letter authorizes his correspondent to sell it. This is the whole extent of the power. But it necessarily and properly includes that of advertising, of removing and exhibiting the goods, etc. But it would not authorize the sale of sugar, a horse, and much less a store or real estate. These powers are not incidental to the general power, nor included in it. Or we may take an example directly from the constitution itself. The United States has power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." This includes the power to create and appoint all inferior officers and to do all subordinate acts necessary and proper to execute the general power: as, to appoint assessors, collectors, keepers, and disbursers of the public treasures. Without these subordinate powers the general power could not be executed. And when there is more than one mode by which this general power may be executed, it includes all. The agent is not confined to any one, unless a particular mode is pointed out. 4 Wheat. 410. All that the constitution requires is that it should be necessary and proper. One consequence of this doctrine is that there must be a power expressly granted as a stock to bear this incidental power, or otherwise it would be ingrafted on nothing.

A constructive power is one that is inferred, not from an express power, but from the general objects to be obtained from the grant, and, perhaps, in private powers sometimes from the general language in which they are granted. The broad distinction between them may be illustrated by two cases that came before the United States Court. The first is one we have already quoted, 4 Wheat. 317. The question in that case was whether the act incorporating the Bank of the United States was constitutional, or whether it lay beyond the limits of the delegated powers and was, therefore, merely void as usurped or an excess of power. The authority to create a corporation is nowhere expressly given, and if it exists it must be sought as incidental to some power that is specifically granted. The court decided that it was incidental to that of laying taxes as a keeper and disburser of the public treasure. This power could be executed only by the appointment of agents; and the United States might as well create an agent for receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue, as a natural person or an artificial one already created. In the case of Osborn v. The United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 859, the general question was presented again, and reargued, and the court reaffirmed their former decision, but, more distinctly than before, adding an important qualification. They might not only create an artificial person, but clothe it with such powers and qualities as would enable it with reasonable convenience to perform its specific duties. The taxes are collected at one end of the country and paid out at another, and the bank instead of removing the specie might pay it where collected, and repay themselves by purchasing a bill of exchange in another place, and this could be conveniently and economically done only by a power of dealing in exchange generally, which when reduced to its last analysis is merely buying specie at one place and paying for it at another. It is in this way, and this only, that the bank got its general power of dealing in exchange,—that it is essential and proper to enable it to perform its principal duty, that of transferring the funds of the United States. Thus, the authority to create a bank is incidental to that of receiving, keeping, and paying out the taxes, and is comprehended under the specific power. The argument is principally derived from Hamilton's report on a bank, which proved satisfactory to Washington, as that of Chief-Justice Marshall has to the public at large.

This is very different from a constructive power which is inferred not as included in any special grant, but from the general tenor of the power and the general objects to be obtained. The objects of the constitution are stated in the preamble, and they are to promote the common weal. But this is followed by the grant of specific powers. And it is the dictate of common sense as well as technical reasoning that this object is to be obtained by the due exercise of these powers. Where these fall short, none are granted; and if they are inadequate, the same consequence follows. No one would infer from a power to sell a ship one to sell a store, though the interest of the principal would thereby be promoted. The general power to regulate commerce is useful, and it is given, and it may be carried to its whole extent by having incidental powers ingrafted upon it. A general power to regulate the descent and distribution of intestate estates and the execution and proof of wills would be on many accounts useful, but it is not granted. The utility of a power is never a question. It must be expressly granted, or incidental o an express power,—that is necessary and proper to carry into execution one expressly granted,—or it does not exist.

The other illustrative case is that of 16 Pet. 539. It will be found on a careful examination that in this a constructive power only is claimed. The only point involved in the case was the constitutionality of the statute of Pennsylvania under which Prigg was indicted as a kidnapper. The court decided this to be unconstitutional; and here its judicial functions properly terminated. But to arrive at this conclusion it was deemed necessary to determine that the general power of arresting and returning fugitives from labor and service was intrusted to the United States. It was not pretended that this power was expressly given, nor that it was incidental to any that was expressly given,—that is, conducive or proper to the execution of such a power. The court say that "in the exposition of this part of the constitution we shall limit ourselves to the considerations which appropriately and exclusively belong to it, without laying down any rules of interpretation of a more general nature." 16 Pet. 610. They do not, as in McCulloch's case, quote the express authority to which this is incidental; but a general argument is offered to prove that this power is most safely lodged with the United States, and that, therefore, it has been placed there exclusively. If the canon of criticism which we have endeavored to establish, and which is generally admitted, is correct, the existence of such a power cannot be inferred from its utility.

It will be seen, also, that this case stands in strong contrast with that of Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, in which the opinion was delivered by the same judge. This was on the validity of the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, authorizing an appeal from a final judgement of a state court to the supreme court of the United States; and perhaps in no case has the extent of the powers granted by the constitution been more fully and profoundly examined. In this case the court say that "the government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted by the constitution; and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication;"—that is to say, as the reasoning of the court in the whole opinion proves, such as are included in the express powers, and are necessary and proper to carry them into execution. Such was the uniform language of the court whenever the question was presented previously to the rebellion. The doctrine as now held, however, is somewhat broader, finding its exposition in the decision of the supreme court in the Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457. It is there said that it is not indispensable to the existence of any power claimed for the federal government that it can be found specified in the words of the constitution, or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantial powers expressly defined, or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred. Before any act of congress can be held to be unconstitutional, the court must be convinced that the means adopted were not appropriate or conducive to the execution of any or all of the powers of congress, or of the government,—not appropriate in any degree; and of the degree, the court is not to judge, but congress.

We have seen that the constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance of it are the supreme law of the land, and that of the true meaning of these the supreme court, which is nothing else than the United States, is the rightful expositor. This necessarily results from their sovereignty. But the United States government is one of delegated powers; and nothing is better established, both by technical reasoning and common sense, than this,—that a delegate can exercise only that power which is delegated to him. All acts beyond are simply void, and create no obligation. It is a maxim also of constitutional law that the powers of sovereignty not delegated to the United States are reserved to the states. But in so complex an affair as that of government, controversies will arise as to what is given and what is reserved,—doubts as to the dividing line. When this is the case, who is to decide? This is a difficulty which the convention did not undertake to settle.

To avoid all controversy as far as possible, the plainest words in granting powers to the United States were used which the language affords. Still further to preclude doubts, the convention added, at the close of the seventeen powers expressly given, this clause: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." Art. 1, § 8. This clause contains no grant of power. But in the Articles of Confederation, which was a compact between the states as independent sovereignties, the word EXPRESSLY was used; and a doubt troubled congress how far incidental powers were included. Articles of Confederation, art. 2. This clause was introduced to remove that doubt. It covered incidental, but not constructive, powers.

Strange as it may appear, both those who wished larger powers granted to the United States, and, in the language of that day, thought that things must be worse before they could be better, and those who honestly feared that too much power was granted, fixed their eyes on this clause; and perhaps no part of the constitution gave greater warmth to the controversy than this. To disarm the designing and counteract the fears of the timid, the tenth amendment was offered by the friends of the constitution. But so jealous were parties of each other that it was offered in the convention of Massachusetts by Governor Hancock, who favored and had the confidence of the opposition, though it was in the handwriting of Mr. Parsons, afterwards chief-justice. Life of Chief-Justice Parsons. That amendment is in these words: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or the people." Were the words of the original constitution and the amendment both stricken out, it would leave the true construction unaltered. Story, Const. § 1839. Both are equally nugatory as fact; but they have an important popular use. The amendment formally admits that certain rights are reserved to states, and these rights must be sovereign.

We have seen that, within their limited powers, the United States are the natural expositors of the constitution and laws; that when a case affecting individual rights arises, the supreme court stands for the United States, and that they have the sole right to explain and enforce the laws and constitution. But their power is confined to the facts before them, and they have no power to explain them in the form of an edict to affect other rights and cases. Beyond these powers the states are sovereign, and their acts are equally unexaminable. Of the separating line between the powers granted and the powers withheld, the constitution provides no judge. Between sovereigns there can be no common judge, but an arbiter mutually agreed upon. If that power is given to one party, that may draw all power to itself, and it establishes a relation not of equal sovereignties, but of sovereign and subject. On this subject the constitution is silent. The great men who formed it did not undertake to solve a question that in its own nature could not be solved. Between equals it made neither superior, but trusted to the mutual forebearance of both parties. A larger confidence was placed in an enlightened public opinion as the final umpire; and not until the war of the rebellion was this conflict between the two sovereignties finally settled by the ultima ratio regum. The status of the states and their political rights under the constitution have been considered at large by the supreme court in the case of Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700. It is there held that authority to suppress rebellion is found in the constitutional power to suppress insurrection, and carry on war; authority to provide for the restoration of state governments under the constitution when suspended and overthrown is derived from the obligation of the United States to guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government. The unity of the states never was a purely artificial and arbitrary relation. It began among the colonies, and grew out of common origin, mutual sympathies, kindred principles, similar interests, and geographical relations. It was confirmed and strengthened by the necessities of war, and received definite form and character and sanction from the Articles of Confederation. By these the Union was solemnly declared to be perpetual; and when these articles were found to be inadequate to the exigencies of the country, the constitution was ordained "to form a more perfect union." But the perpetuity and indissolubility of the Union by no means imply the loss of distinct and individual existence, or of the right of self-government by the states. On the contrary, it may, not unnecessarily, be said that the preservation of the states and the maintenance of their government are as much within the design and care of the constitution as the preservation of the union and the maintenance of the national government. The constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible states.

The United States is not a corporation under the New York statutes, in the sense that it will be exempted from an inheritance tax on personal property bequeathed to it by will; 163 U. S. 625.

If the nation comes down from its position of sovereignty and enters the domain of commerce, it submits itself to the same laws that govern individuals therein. It assumes the position of an ordinary citizen and it cannot recede from the fulfilment of its obligations; 74 Fed. Rep. 145, following 91 U. S. 398.

CONSTITUTIONAL; titles of the several states; Fisher, Evol. of the Const.

UNITY. An agreement or coincidence of certain qualities in the title of a joint-estate or an estate in common.

In a joint-estate there must exist four unities: that of interest, that of title, and, therefore, their estates must be created by one and the same act; that of time, for their estates must be vested at one and the same period; and, lastly, the unity of possession: hence joint-tenants are seised per my et per tout, or by the half or moiety and by all: that is, each of them has an entire possession as well of every parcel as of the whole; 2 Bla. Com. 170. Coparceners must have the unities of interest, title, and possession. In tenancies in common, the unity of possession is alone required; 2 Bla. Com. 192. See ESTATE IN COMMON; ESTATE IN COPARCENARY; ESTATE OF JOINT-TENANCY; TENANT.

UNITY OF POSSESSION. This term is used to designate the possession by one person of several estates or rights. For example, a right to an estate to which an easement is attached, or the dominant estate, and to an estate which an easement incumbers, or the servient estate, in such case the easement is extinguished; 3 Mas. 172; see Cro. Jac. 121. But a distinction has been made between a thing that has its being by prescription, and one that has its being ex jure naturæ: in the former case unity of possession will extinguish the easement; in the latter, for example, the case of a watercourse, the unity will not extinguish it; Pothier, Contr. 166.

UNIVERSAL AGENT. One appointed to do all the acts which the principal can personally do, and which he may lawfully delegate the power to another to do. Such an agency may potentially exist; but it is difficult to conceive of its practical existence, since it puts the agent completely in the place of the principal; Story, Ag. § 21.

UNIVERSAL LEGACY. In Civil Law. A testamentary disposition by which the testator gives to one or several persons the whole of the property which he leaves at his decease. La. Civ. Code, art. 1606.

UNIVERSAL PARTNERSHIP. The name of a species of partnership by which all the partners agree to put in common all their property, universorum bonorum, not only what they then have, but also what they shall acquire. Pothier, Du Contr. de Société, n. 29. See PARTNERSHIP.

UNIVERSAL REPRESENTATION. In Scotch Law. The heir universally represents his ancestor, i. e. is responsible for his debts. Originally, this responsibility extended only to the amount of the property to which he succeeded; but afterwards certain acts on the part of the heir were held sufficient to make him liable for all the debts of the ancestor. Bell, Dict. Passive Titles.

UNIVERSITAS JURIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A quantity of things of various kinds, corporeal and incorporeal, taken together as a whole, e. g. an estate. It is used in contradistinction to universitas facti, which is a whole made up of corporeal units. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 149.

UNIVERSITAS RERUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Several things not mechanically united, but which, taken together, in some legal respects are regarded as one whole. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 149.

UNIVERSITY. The name given to certain societies or corporations which are seminaries of learning where youth are sent to finish their education. Among the civilians, by this term is understood a corporation. See CHANCELLOR'S COURTS IN THE TWO UNIVERSITIES; STUDENTS.

UNJUST. That which is done against the perfect rights of another; that which is against the established law; that which is opposed to a law which is the test of right and wrong. Hein. Lec. El. § 1080.

UNKNOWN. When goods have been stolen from some person unknown, they may be so described in the indictment; but if the owner be really known, an indictment alleging the property to belong to some person unknown is improper. 8 C. & P. 778; 12 Pick. 174.

In an indictment, where the name of the defendant is unknown, and he refuses to disclose it, he may be described as a person whose name is to the jurors unknown, but who is personally brought before them by the keeper of the prison; 7 Ired. 27; but an indictment against him as a person to the jurors unknown, without something to ascertain whom the grand jury meant to designate, will be insufficient; R. & R. 469. The practice is to indict the defendant by a specific name, as, John No-name, and if he pleads in abatement, to send in a new bill, inserting the real name, which he then discloses, by which he is bound. This course is in some states prescribed by statute; 5 Ia. 484.

UNLAGE (Sax.). An unjust law. Cowel.

UNLAW. In Scotch Law. A witness was formerly inadmissible who was not worth the king's unlaw,—i. e. the sum of £10 Scots, then the common fine for absence from court and for small delinquencies. Bell, Dict.

UNLAWFUL. That which is contrary to law.

See CONDITION; VOID.

UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY. A disturbance of the public peace by three or more persons who meet together with an intent mutually to assist each other in the execution of some unlawful enterprise of a private nature, with force and violence.

An assembly of three or more persons:—1. With intent to commit a crime by open force. 2. With intent to carry out a common purpose, lawful or unlawful, in such a manner as to give firm and courageous persons in the neighborhood of such assembly reasonable grounds to apprehend a breach of the peace in consequence of it. Steph. Dig. Cr. Law, art. 75. If they move forward towards its execution, it is then a rout; and if they actually execute their design, it amounts to a riot; 4 Bla. Com. 140.

In England public meetings held for political purposes are not unlawful as such, but may, by their conduct when assembled, become unlawful, and will be so from the outset if held for purposes of sedition. In such cases all those who use seditious words or openly applaud those who use them will be participators in the unlawful assembly, but not those who attend a meeting which they suppose to be lawful and who take no part in the unlawful conduct. Magistrates and the police may use whatever force is necessary to disperse an unlawful assembly. The degree of force to be exercised will depend on the circumstances of each case; 9 C. & P. 431.

See RIOT; ROUT; PUBLIC MEETING.

UNLAWFULLY. Illegally; wrongfully. 92 N. Y. 584. See 97 N. C. 465. This word is frequently used in indictments in the description of the offence: it is necessary when the crime did not exist at common law, and when a statute, in describing an offence which it creates, uses the word; 1 Mood. C. C. 339; but is unnecessary whenever the crime existed at common law and is manifestly illegal; 1 Chit. Cr. L. *241.

UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES. Such damages as are unascertained. In general, such damages cannot be set off. No interest will be allowed on unliquidated damages. See LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

UNMARRIED. Its primary meaning is "never having been married;" 9 H. L. Cas. 601; 57 L. J. Ch. 576; but the term is a word of flexible meaning and it may be construed as not having a husband or wife at the time in question. 9 H. L. Cas. 601; 22 Beav. 328.

UNQUES (L. Fr.). Still; yet. This barbarous word is frequently used in pleas; as, Ne unques executor, Ne unques guardian, Ne unques accouple, and the like.

UNSEATED LAND. A phrase used in Pennsylvania to designate uncultivated land subject to taxation. A tract of land ceases to be unseated as soon as it is actually occupied with a view to permanent residence; 7 W. & S. 248; 5 Watts 382.

UNSEAWORTHY SHIP. See SEAWORTHINESS.

UNSHIPMENT. Throwing goods overboard protected in such manner that they may be recovered, may constitute unshipment. 1 Heisk. 146.

UNSOLEMN WAR. That war which is not carried on by the highest power in the states between which it exists, and which lacks the formality of a declaration. Grotius, de Jure Bel. ac Pac. l. 1, c. 3, § 4. A formal declaration to the enemy is now disused, but there must be a formal public act proceeding from a competent source; with us, it must be an act of congress; 1 Kent 55. See WAR.

UNSOUND MIND, UNSOUND MEMORY. See INSANITY.

UNSOUNDNESS. See SOUNDNESS.

UNTIL. When a charter continues the incorporation of a company until a day named, until is exclusive in its meaning, unless the context show that the contrary is intended; 17 N. Y. 502; 120 Mass. 94. It is inclusive of the date; 18 N. J. Eq. 315; 70 Ga. 717; contra, 118 Mass. 502; 91 N. Y. 631; 87 Ind. 189.

UNTRUE. Prima facie inaccurate, but not necessarily wilfully false. 3 B. & S. 929.

UNWHOLESOME FOOD. Food not fit to be eaten; food which if eaten would be injurious. See ADULTERATION; HEALTH; POLICE POWER.

UNWRITTEN LAW. See LEX NON SCRIPTA.

UPLIFTED HAND. When a man accused of a crime is arraigned, he is required to raise his hand, probably in order to identify the person who pleads. Perhaps for the same reason when a witness adopts a particular mode of taking an oath, as when he does not swear upon the gospel, but by Almighty God, he is to hold up his hand.

UPPER BENCH. The king's bench was so called during Cromwell's protectorate, when Rolle was chief-justice. 3 Bla. Com. 202.

UPSET PRICE. The price at which any subject, as lands or goods, is exposed to sale by auction, below which it is not to be sold. In a final decree in foreclosure, the decree should name an upset price large enough to cover costs and all allowances made by the court, receiver's certificates and interest, liens prior to the bonds, amounts diverted from the earnings, and all undetermined claims which will be settled before the confirmation and sale; 25 Fed. Rep. 232.

URBAN SERVITUDES. All servitudes are established either for the use of houses or for the use of lands. Those of the first kind are called urban servitudes, whether the buildings to which they are due be situated in the city or in the country. Those of the second kind are called rural servitudes.

The principal kinds of urban servitudes are the following: the right of support; that of drip; that of drain, or of preventing the drain; that of view or of lights, or of preventing the view or lights from being obstructed; that of raising buildings or walls, or of preventing them from being raised; that of passage; and that of drawing water. See 3 Toullier 441.

URBS (Lat.). A walled city. Often used for civitas. Ainsworth, Dict. It is the same as oppidum, only larger. Urbs, or urbs aurea, meant Rome. Du Cange. In the case of Rome, urbs included the suburbs. Dig. 50. 16. 2. pr. It is derived from urbum, a part of the plough by which the walls of a city are first marked out. Ainsworth, Dict.

URUGUAY. A republic of South America. The president is elected for four years, and is assisted by a council of ministers. The senate has nineteen members, elected for six years. The chamber of representatives of sixty-nine members is elected for three years. There is a high court of justice at Montevideo, a judge of commerce, etc.

USAGE. Uniform practice.

This term and custom are now used interchangeably, though custom seems to have been originally confined to local usages immemorially existing; Browne, Us. & Cust. 13.

A usage must be established; that is, it must be known, certain, uniform, reasonable, and not contrary to law; but it may be of very recent origin; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 251; 9 Pick. 426; 4 B. & Ald. 210; 69 Pa. 374; 80 Ill. 493; 49 N. Y. 464; 3 N. Dak. 107; 100 Ala. 355; and no usage is good which conflicts with an established principle of law; 85 Ala. 565; 159 Mass. 522. Parties who contract on a subject-matter concerning which known usages prevail incorporate such usages by implication into their agreements, if nothing is said to the contrary; 137 U. S. 30.

The usages of trade afford ground upon which a proper construction may be given to contracts. By their aid the indeterminate intention of parties and the nature and extent of their contracts arising from mere implications or presumptions, and acts of an equivocal character may be ascertained; and the meaning of words and doubtful expressions may become known; 13 Pick. 182; 5 Wheat. 326; 2 C. & P. 525; 1 N. & M'C. 519; 5 Ohio 436; 15 Ala. 123; 126 Ind. 176; 48 Fed. Rep. 921. Among commercial and business men in a locality, it need not be so ancient "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," nor that it should contain all the other elements of a common-law custom, as defined in the books; 3 Ind. App. 299. One seeking to avoid the effect of a notorious and uniform usage of trade must show that he was ignorant of it; 139 N. Y. 416.

A local usage must be one known to both contracting parties; 144 U. S. 476. See 75 Ala. 596; 54 Mich. 609; 65 Me. 105; 51 Wis. 224; 16 Mo. App. 383.

Modern English cases incline to extend the functions of usages, but in America the authorities vary greatly; Lawson, Us. & Cust. 25; 7 E. & B. 266; 32 Vt. 616; 10 W. N. C. (Pa.) 347.

See CUSTOM; Lawson; Browne, Us. & Cust.

USAGE OF TRADE. A course of dealing; a mode of conducting transactions of a particular kind. 115 Mass. 585.

USANCE. In Commercial Law. The time which, by usage or custom, is allowed in certain countries for the payment of a bill of exchange. Pothier, Contr. du Change, n. 15.

The time of one, two, or three months after the date of the bill, according to the custom of the places between which the exchanges run.

Double or treble is double or treble the usual time, and half usance is half the time. Where it is necessary to divide a month upon a half usance (which is the case when the usance is for one month or three), the division, notwithstanding the difference in the length of the months, contains fifteen days. Byles, Bills *80, *205.

USE. A confidence reposed in another, who was made tenant of the land, or terre-tenant, that he would dispose of the land according to the intention of the cestui que use, or him to whose use it was granted, and suffer him to take the profits. Plowd. 352; Gilb. Uses 1; Saund. Uses 2; 2 Bla. Com. 328.

A right in one person, called the cestui que use, to take the profits of land of which another has the legal title and possession, together with the duty of defending the same and of making estates thereof according to the direction of the cestui que use.

Uses have been said to have been derived from the fidei commissa of the Roman law; but see TRUST. It was the duty of a Roman magistrate, the prætor fidei commissarius, whom Bacon terms the particular chancellor for uses, to enforce the observance of this confidence. Inst. 2. 23. 2. They were introduced into England by the ecclesiastics in the reign of Edward III., before 1377, for the purpose of avoiding the statutes of mortmain; and the clerical chancellors of those times held them to be fidei commissa, and binding in conscience. To obviate many inconveniences and difficulties which had arisen out of the doctrine and introduction of uses, the Statute of 27 Henry VIII. c. 10, commonly called the Statute of Uses, or, in conveyances and pleadings, the statute for transferring uses into possession, was passed. It enacts that "when any person shall be seised of lands, etc., to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or body politic, the person or corporation entitled to the use in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life, or years, or otherwise, shall from thenceforth stand and be seised or possessed of the land, etc., of and in the like estate as they have in the use, trust, or confidence; and that the estates of the persons so seised to the uses shall be deemed to be in him or them that have the use, in such quality, manner, form, and condition as they had before in the use." The statute thus executes the use,—that is, it conveys the possession to the use, and transfers the use to the possession, and, in this manner, making the cestui que use complete owner of the lands and tenements, as well at law as in equity; 2 Bla. Com. 333.

A modern use is an estate of right which is acquired through the operation of the statute of 27 Henry VIII. c. 10; and which, when it may take effect according to the rules of the common law, is called the legal estate, and when it may not is denominated a use, with a term descriptive of its modification; Cornish, Uses 85.

The common-law judges decided, in the construction of this statute, that a use could not be raised upon a use; Dy. 155 (A); and that on a feoffment to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs in trust for C and his heirs, the statute executed only the first use, and that the second was a mere nullity. The judges also held that as the statute mentioned only such persons as were seised to the use of others, it did not extend to a terms of years, or other chattel interests, of which a termer is not seised but only possessed; 2 Bla. Com. 336. Tiedm. Eq. Jur. § 209. The rigid literal construction of the statute by the courts of law again opened the doors of the chancery courts; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 448.

Uses and trusts are often spoken of together by the older and some modern writers, the distinction being those trusts which were of a permanent nature and required no active duty of the trustee being called uses; those in which the trustee had an active duty to perform, as, the payment of debts, raising portions, and the like, being called special or active trusts, or simply trusts; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 448.

For the creation of a use, a consideration either valuable, as, money, or good, as relationship in certain degrees, was necessary; 3 Swanst. 591; 7 Co. 40; 17 Mass. 257; 14 Johns. 210. See RESULTING USE. The property must have been in esse, and such that seisin could be given; Cro. Eliz. 401. Uses were alienable, although in many respects resembling choses in action, which were not assignable at common law; 2 Bla. Com. 331; when once raised, it might be granted or devised in fee, in tail, for life, or for years; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 455.

The effect of the statutes of uses was much restricted by the construction adopted by the courts: it practically resulted, it has been said, in the addition of these words, to the use, to every conveyance; Will. R. P. 133. The intention of the statute was to destroy the estate of the feoffee to use, and to transfer it by the very act which created it to the cestui que use, as if the seisin or estate of the feoffee, together with the use, had, uno flatu, passed from the feoffor to the cestui que use. A very full and clear account of the history and present condition of the law of uses is given in 2 Wash. R. P. 91, 156. See, as to a use upon a use, Tud. L. Cas. R. Pr. 335. Consult Spence, Eq. Jur.; Bisph. Eq. See CHARITABLE USES; TRUSTS.

It is said that the word used is not derived from the Latin usus but comes from the Latin opus; 3 L. Quart. Rev. 115.

In its untechnical sense, the word use has been variously constructed; 20 Ind. 398; 59 Me. 582; 107 Mass. 290, 324; 11 Rich. 621; thus, "to use a port" means to enter it, so as to derive advantage from its protection; 48 N. Y. 624.

In Civil Law. A right of receiving so much of the natural profits of a thing as is necessary to daily sustenance. It differs from usufruct, which is a right not only to use, but to enjoy. 1 Bro. Civ. Law 184.

USE AND OCCUPATION. When a contract has been made, either by express or implied agreement, for the use of a house or other real estate, where there was no amount of rent fixed and ascertained, the landlord can recover a reasonable rent in an action of assumpsit for use and occupation; 2 Aik. 252; 4 Day 228; 13 Johns. 240, 297; 15 Mass. 270; 10 S. & R. 251. This is under the Stat. of Westm. 2. See 2 Harv. L. Rev. 377.

The action for use and occupation is founded not on a privity of estate, but on a privity of contract; Wood, L. & T. 1382; 3 S. & R. 500; therefore it will not lie where the possession is tortious; 2 N. & M'C. 156; 3 S. & R. 500; 6 Ohio 371; 149 U. S. 593; or where the party is in possession by the license of the owner; 48 Minn. 397. It will lie for the occupation of land in another state; 3 S. & R. 502.

USEFUL. That which may be put into beneficial practice. See PATENT.

USEFULNESS. Capabilities for use. The word pertains to the future as well as to the past. 11 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 943.

USER. The enjoyment of a thing.

USES, STATUTE OF. See TRUSTS; USE.

USHER. This word is said to be derived from huissier, and is the name of an inferior officer in some English courts of law. Archb. Pr. 25. The office of usher of the court of chancery was abolished in 1852.

USQUE AD MEDIUM FILUM VIÆ (Lat.). To the middle thread of the way. See AD MEDIUM FILUM; 7 Gray 22.

USUAL TERMS. A phrase in the common-law practice, which meant pleading issuably, rejoining gratis, and taking short notice of trial. When a defendant obtained further time to plead, these were the terms usually imposed. Wharton.

USUCAPION, or USUCAPTION. In Civil Law. The manner of acquiring property in things by the lapse of time required by law.

It differs from prescription, which has the same sense, and means, in addition, the manner of acquiring and losing, by the effect of time regulated by law, all sorts of rights and actions. Merlin, Répert. Prescription. See PRESCRIPTION.

USUFRUCT. In Civil Law. The right of enjoying a thing the property of which is vested in another, and to draw from the same all the profit, utility, and advantage which it may produce, provided it be without altering the substance of the thing. 18 Tex. 28; 79 Cal. 6.

Perfect usufruct is of things which the usufructuary can enjoy without altering their substance, though their substance may be diminished or deteriorated naturally by time or by the use to which they are applied; as, a house, a piece of land, animals, furniture, and other movable effects.

Imperfect or quasi usufruct is of things which would be useless to the usufructuary if he did not consume and expend them or change the substance of them; as, money, grain, liquors. In this case the alteration may take place; Pothier, Tr. du Douaire, n. 194.

USUFRUCTUARY. In Civil Law. One who has the right and enjoyment of a usufruct.

Domat points out the duties of the usu-fructuary, which are—to make an inventory of the things subject to the usufruct, in the presence of those having an interest in them; to give security for their restitution when the usufruct shall be at an end; to take good care of the things subject to the usufruct; to pay all taxes and claims which arise while the thing is in his possession as a ground rent; and to keep the thing in repair at his own expense.

USURA MARITIMA. See FŒNUS NAUTICUM.

USURIOUS CONTRACT. See USURY.

USURPATION. The unlawful assumption of the use of property which belongs to another; an interruption or the disturbing a man in his right and possession. Toml.

According to Lord Coke, there are two kinds of usurpation: first, when a stranger, without right, presents to a church and his clerk is admitted; and, second, when a subject uses a franchise of the king without lawful authority. Co. Litt. 277 b.

In Governmental Law. The tyrannical assumption of the government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country.

USURPED POWER. In Insurance. An invasion from abroad, or an internal rebellion, where armies are drawn up against each other, when the laws are silent, and when the firing of towns becomes unavoidable. These words cannot mean the power of a common mob; 2 Marsh. Ins. 390. By an article of the printed proposals which are considered as making a part of the contract of insurance, it is provided that "no loss of damage by fire, happening by any invasion, foreign enemy, or any military or usurped power whatsoever, will be made good by this company."

USURPER. One who assumes the right of government by force, contrary to and in violation of the constitution of the country. Toul. Droit. Civ, n. 32.

One who intrudes himself into an office which is vacant, and ousts the incumbent without any color of title whatever; his acts are void in every respect; 33 Gratt. 513; 48 Me. 80.

USURY. The excess over the legal rate charged to a borrower for the use of money. Originally, the word was applied to all interest reserved for the use of money; and in the early ages taking such interest was not allowed. In the later Roman law, usury was sanctioned; and it is said that taking usury was not an offence at common law; Tyler, Usury 64; but see Ord. Usury 17.

Unless there is a law limiting the rate of interest that can be charged for money, there can be no usury; 31 Ark. 484; 91 Ga. 609; 148 Mass. 231. The enactment of a usury law cannot affect prior contracts; 76 Ga. 322; 34 Neb. 181. If a contract is usurious, no custom can legalise it; 85 Ala. 379. A note void for usury in its inception cannot be enforced by an innocent purchaser for value; 19 U. S. App. 455.

"The shifts and devices of usurers to evade the statutes against usury have taken every shape and form that the wit of man could devise, but none have been allowed to prevail. Courts have been astute in getting at the true intent of the parties and giving effect to the statute." 62 N. Y. 346.

There must be a loan in contemplation of the parties; 7 Pet. 109; 14 N. Y. 93; 6 Ind. 232; and if there be a loan, however disguised, the contract will be usurious, if it be so in other respects. Where a loan was made of depreciated bank-notes, to be repaid in sound funds, to enable the borrower to pay a debt he owed, dollar for dollar, it was considered as not being usurious; 1 Meigs 585. The bona fide sale of a note, bond, or other security at a greater discount than would amount to legal interest is not per se a loan, although the note may be indorsed by the seller and he remains responsible; 1 Ia. 30; 6 Ohio St. 19; 29 Miss. 212. But if a note, bond, or other security be made with a view to evade the laws of usury, and afterwards sold for a less amount than the interest, the transaction will be considered a loan; 15 Johns. 44; 12 S. & R. 46; 6 Ohio St. 19; and a sale of a man's own note indorsed by himself will be considered a loan. Usury cannot arise from the purchase from brokers of a note at a discount; 72 Hun 373. Nor is there usury in a transaction for the sale and repurchase of securities, where there is no loan; 122 U. S. 487. It is a general rule that a contract which in its inception is unaffected by usury can never be invalidated by any subsequent usurious transaction; 7 Pet. 109; 10 Md. 57. On the other hand, when the contract was originally usurious, and there is a substitution by a new contract, the latter will generally be considered usurious; 15 Mass. 96; but a note or other contract for the payment of money is not usurious and void for providing for the payment of more than the statutory interest after maturity; 22 Misc. Rep. 279.

There must be a contract for the return of the money at all events; for if the return of the principal with interest, or the principal only, depend upon a contingency, there can be no usury; 1 Wall. 604; but if the contingency extend only to interest, and the principal be beyond the reach of hazard, the lender will be guilty of usury if he receive interest beyond the amount allowed by law. Where the principal is put to hazard in insurances, annuities, and bottomry, the parties may charge and receive greater interest than is allowed by law in common cases, and the transaction will not be usurious; 2 Pet. 537. See 18 Wall. 373.

To constitute usury, the borrower must not only be obliged to return the principal at all events, but more than lawful interest: this part of the agreement must be made with full consent and knowledge of the contracting parties; 3 B. & P. 154. The fact that the usurious interest is paid in notes of another party, instead of money, is immaterial; 98 N. C. 244; 99 Ga. 291.

When the contract is made in a foreign country, the rate of interest allowed by the laws of that country may be charged, and it will not be usurious, although greater than the amount fixed by law in this; Story, Confl. of Laws § 292. Parties may contract for interest according to the place of the contract or the place of performance; 1 Wall. 298; 64 N. C. 33. Where there is no agreement made, the law of the place of the contract governs, in the absence of any intent to evade the usury laws; 72 N. Y. 472; 32 Ind. 16. A note made, dated, and payable in New York, without intent of maker that it should be elsewhere discounted, if negotiated in another state at a rate of interest lawful there, but excessive in New York, is usurious; Rorer, Int. St. Law 112; 77 N. Y. 573. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

To constitute usury, both parties must be cognizant of the facts which make the transaction usurious; 44 Barb. 521; see 30 S. C. 61; but a mistake in law will not protect the parties; 9 Mass. 49; though a miscalculation will, it seems; 2 Cow. 770. If a contract be usurious in itself it must be taken to have been so intended: 100 N. C. 389. An agreement by a mortgagor to pay taxes on the mortgage debt is not necessarily usurious; 24 Md. 62; nor is a clause in a bill of exchange, providing attorney fees for collection; 34 Ind. 149; and so of a mortgage; 30 Ia. 131; and so of a note; 142 Ill. 589. See 80 Ga. 55. In some states the usurious excess above the lawful rate, alone, is void; 8 Phila. 84; Bisph. Eq. § 222.

A bona fide sale by one person of a bond of another, at an exorbitant rate of discount, is not illegal; 3 Stockt. 362. A sale of a note or mortgage for less than its face, with a guarantee of payment in full, is not usurious; 35 Barb. 484; nor is a contract to pay a bushel and a half of corn within a year, for the loan of a bushel; 12 Fla. 552. An agreement to pay interest on accrued interest is not invalid; 10 Allen 32; 55 N. Y. 621; but it has been held that compounding interest on a note is usurious; 76 N. C. 314; but see 46 Ill. App. 139.

Interest may be collected on coupons; 34 Neb. 181. See 36 id. 148; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 167.

The ordinary commissions allowed by the usages of trade may be charged without tainting a contract with usury; but it must plainly appear that the commissions are charged for other services, and are not merely a device to evade the law; 2 Pat. & H. 110. A bonus paid to an agent in addition to legal interest renders the loan usurious, when it enures to the benefit of the principal under the agent's contract; 153 U. S. 318. Commission may be charged by a merchant for accepting a bill; 18 Ark. 456; but a commission charged in addition to interest for advancing money is usurious; 12 La. Ann. 660. Where a banker discounts a bill payable in a distant place, he may charge the usual rate of exchange on that place; but if such charge be an excess of the usual rate it will be considered a device to cover usurious interest; 8 Ind. 58. See 93 U. S. 344. Where a gratuity is given to influence the making of a loan, it will be considered usurious; 7 Ohio St. 387. The fact that an agent, authorized to lend money for lawful interest, exacts for his own benefit, and without his principal's knowledge, more than the lawful rate, does not render the loan usurious; 53 Fed. Rep. 410; 116 U. S. 98. The burden of proof is on the person pleading usury; 22 Ga. 193; 57 Ark. 251; and where the contract is valid on its face, affirmative proof must be made that the agreement was corruptly made to evade the law; 97 U. S. 13. Where parties exchange their notes for mutual accomodation, and both or either are sold at a higher than the legal rate, they are usurious; Hill & D. 65.

The common practice of reserving the interest on negotiable paper at the time of making the loan is very ancient, and is sanctioned by law; Sewell, Banking. An agreement to pay annually in advance is not usurious; 36 Neb. 148; 49 Ill. App. 564.

The offence of taking usury is not condoned by the absence of intent to violate the statute; 50 N. Y. 437; but see 20 Wisc. 407.

The one who has contracted to pay usury may set up the defence; 55 Ind. 341; 17 Kans. 355; and so may his privies; 49 N. Y. 636; 47 Ala. 362; and his legal representatives; 100 Ala. 465; and his surety; 39 Ind. 106 (but see 50 Vt. 105; 35 N. J. L. 285); or a guarantor; 20 Me. 28; but one who buys an equity of redemption cannot set up the defence against the mortgage; 24 N. J. Eq. 120; nor can a second mortgagee set up usury as a defence to a prior mortgage; 17 Kans. 355 (but see 26 Ind. 94; 59 Barb. 239).

The defence of usury must be supported by clear proof; Perl. Int. 282; 57 Ill. 138; 36 Wisc. 390; 138 N. Y. 623; which may be extrinsic to the contract; 9 Pet. 418; an express agreement for usury need not be proved; 2 Pick. 145.

Usurious interest does not render a mortgage void; 92 Ga. 675; 81 id. 276; and where a loan is originally usurious, the defence of usury applies to all renewals; and when action is brought on any renewal note, no matter how remote, all payments of interest on such usurious loan may be applied on the principal; 39 Neb. 485; 24 id. 630; 37 Minn. 441; id. 182; and a second note renewing a former one, but including an additional sum, is usurious; 101 N. C. 99. National banks may charge interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state, territory, or district where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, they may charge such rate. When no rate is fixed by the laws of the state, territory, or district, the bank may charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance. And the purchase, discount, or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as usurious; R. S. § 5197.

The charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed when knowingly done shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest. In case the greater rate of interest has been paid, the person by whom it has been paid, or his legal representatives, may recover back, in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid, provided such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious action occurred; R. S. § 5198.

It is now conclusively settled that the penalty declared in R. S. § 5198 is superior to and exclusive of any state penalty; 91 U. S. 29; 72 Pa. 209; 44 Ind. 298; 115 Mass. 539; contra, 57 N. Y. 100. A national bank is not justified in charging a usurious rate of interest because the statutes of the state permit usurious interest to be taken only by certain specified banks; 11 Bank. Mag. 787. See also 141 U. S. 384; 3 U. S. App. 7; 18 Sup. Ct. R. 390.

See INTEREST. 9 L. R. A. 292.

UTAH. One of the states of the United States, to which it was admitted July 4, 1896, under the act of January 16, 1896.

The LEGISLATIVE POWER is vested in a Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senate consists of eighteen members chosen for four years. The House of Representatives consists of forty-five members chosen biennially.

Senators and representatives must be citizens of the United States, not under twenty-five years of age, residents of the state for three years, and of the district for one year.

The EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT consists of a governor, secretary of state, state auditor, state treasurer, attorney-general, and superintendent of public instruction. The governor is elected for four years. The governor, justices of the supreme court, and attorney-general constitute a board of pardons. The governor has power to grant respites or reprieves except in cases of treason or impeachment.

The JUDICIAL POWER is vested in the senate as a court of impeachment, a supreme court, district courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts as may be established by law.

The Supreme Court consists of three judges, but after 1906 the legislature may increase the number to five. The term of office is six years. It has original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto, and habeas corpus. Otherwise it has appellate jurisdiction only.

District Courts.—The state is divided into seven judicial districts, for each of which at least one, and not exceeding three judges, are chosen. These courts have original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, not prohibited by law, and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts.

UTERINE (Lat. uterus). Born of the same mother.

UTFANGENETHEF, UTFANGTHEF. The right of a lord to punish a thief dwelling out of his liberty, and committing theft without the same, if taken within the jurisdiction of the manor. Cowel. See INFANGENETHEF.

UTI POSSIDETIS (Lat. as you possess). A phrase used to signify that the parties to a treaty are to retain possession of what they have acquired by force during the war. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law § 545.

A treaty which terminates a war may adopt this principle or that of the status quo ante bellum (q. v.), or a combination of the two. In default of any treaty stipulation, the former doctrine prevails. See TREATY OF PEACE.

UTILITY. See PATENT.

UTRUBI. In Scotch Law. An interdict as to movables, by which the colorable possession of a bona fide holder is continued until the final settlement of a contested right: corresponding to uti possidetis as to heritable property. Bell, Dict.

UTTER. In Criminal Law. To offer; to publish.

To utter and publish a counterfeit note is to assert and declare, directly or indirectly, by words or actions, that the note offered is good. It is not necessary that it should be passed in order to complete the offence of uttering; 2 Binn. 338; Cl. Cr. L. 301. It seems that reading out a document, although the party refuses to show it, is a sufficient uttering; Jebb, Cr. Cas. 282. The merely showing a false instrument with intent to gain a credit, when there was no intention or attempt made to pass it, it seems, would not amount to an uttering; Russ. & R. 200. Using a forged instrument in some way, in order to get money or credit upon it, or by means of it, is sufficient to constitute an uttering; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 475.

The word uttering, used of notes, does not necessarily import that they are transferred as genuine; it includes any delivery of a note for value (as by a sale of the notes as spurious) with the intent that they should be passed upon the public as genuine; 1 Abb. U. S. 185.

The offence is complete when a forged instrument is offered; it need not be accepted; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 605. Recording a forged deed is uttering it; 27 Mich. 386; so is bringing suit on a forged paper; 20 Gratt. 733. The legal meaning of the word utter is in substance to offer; Bish. Cr. L. § 607.

UTTER BARRISTER. In English Law. Those barristers who plead without the bar, and are distinguished from benchers, or those who have been readers and who are allowed to plead within the bar, as the king's council are. See BARRISTER.

UXOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. A woman lawfully married.

UXORCIDE. The killing of a wife by her husband; one who murders his wife. It is not a technical term of the law. Black, L. Dict.

V.

VACANCY. A place which is empty. The term is principally applied to cases where the office is not filled. As applied to an office, it has no technical meaning; 93 Cal. 153; 96 Ind. 374.

By the constitution of the United States, the president has the power to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate. See TENURE OF OFFICE; OFFICER; RESIGNATION; 1 So. L. Rev. N. S. 184.

VACANT. See OFFICER.

VACANT POSSESSION. A term applied to an estate which has been abandoned by the tenant: the abandonment must be complete in order to make the possession vacant, and, therefore, if the tenant have goods on the premises it will not be so considered. 2 Chitty, Bail. 177; 2 Stra. 1064.

A dwelling-house furnished throughout, from which the owner has removed for a season, intending to return and resume possession, was held not vacant, within the meaning of a policy of insurance; 81 N. Y. 184.

VACANT SUCCESSION. An inheritance for which the heirs are unknown.

VACANTIA BONA. In Civil Law. Goods without an owner. Such goods escheat.

VACATE. To annul; to render an act void: as, to vacate an entry which has been made on a record when the court has been imposed upon by fraud or taken by surprise.

VACATION BARRISTER. See BARRISTER.

VACCARIA (Lat. vacca, a cow). A dairy-house. Co. Litt. 5 b.

VACCINATION. The Vaccination Act of 1898 requires that every child born in England shall be vaccinated within six months of its birth. But if a parent within four months from the birth of the child satisfies two justices that he conscientiously believes that vaccination would be prejudicial to the health of the child, and delivers within seven days thereafter a certificate from such justices to the vaccination officer, he is exempted from the penalties provided in the act for noncompliance therewith. See 42 Sol. Jour. 815.

It is within the police power of the state to compel the vaccination of children attending the public schools; 167 Ill. 67; and an act requiring compulsory vaccination is not in conflict with the provisions of the federal constitution; 32 Atl. Rep. 348. Pupils may be excluded for refusing to be vaccinated during a smallpox scare; 162 Pa. 476; they may be denied admission to the schools; 32 N. Y. Suppl. 322; but it has been held that a rule of the board of health excluding a pupil who is not vaccinated is void in the absence of a statute authorizing it; 37 L. R. A. (Wis.) 157; 167 Ill. 67. See 25 L. R. A. 152; 28 id. 820; 47 Am. St. Rep. 546; POLICE POWER.

VADIUM MORTUUM (Lat.). A mortgage or dead pledge; it is a security given by the borrower of a sum of money, by which he grants to the lender an estate in fee, on condition that if the money be not repaid at the time appointed, the estate so put in pledge shall continue to the lender as dead or gone from the mortgagor. 2 Bla. Com. 257.

VADIUM PONERE. To take bail for the appearance of a person in a court of justice. Toml.

VADIUM VIVUM (Lat.). A species of security by which the borrower of a sum of money made over his estate to the lender until he had received that sum out of the issues and profits of the land; it was so called because neither the money nor the lands were lost, and were not left in dead pledge, but this was a living pledge, for the profits of the land were constantly paying off the debt. Littleton § 206; 1 Powell, Mortg. 3.

VAGABOND. One who wanders about idly, who has no certain dwelling. It is not synonymous with vagrant. 28 Tex. App. 562.

VAGRANCY. When not defined by a statute, it must be considered such a vagabondage as fairly comes within the common-law meaning of the word. 41 Mich. 299; 90 id. 3.

VAGRANT. A person who lives idly, without any settled home. A person who refuses to work, or goes about begging. This latter meaning is the common one in statutes punishing vagrancy. See 1 Wils. 331; 8 Term 26; 90 Mich. 3. See TRAMP.

VAGRANT ACT. In English Law. The statute 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, which is an act for the punishment of idle and disorderly persons. 2 Chit. Stat. 145.

VAGUENESS. Uncertainty.

Certainty is required in contracts, wills, pleadings, judgments, and, indeed, in all the acts on which courts have to give a judgment, and if they be vague so as not to be understood, they are, in general, invalid; 5 B. & C. 583. A charge of frequent intemperance and habitual indolence is vague and too general; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 530. See 36 Ch. Div. 348; CERTAINTY; NONSENSE; UNCERTAINTY.

VALESHERIA. See ENGLESHIRE.

VALID. Having force, of binding force; legally sufficient or efficacious; authorized by law. Anderson, L. Dict.

VALIDITY. Legal sufficiency in contradistinction to mere regularity. An official sale, an order, judgment, or decree may be regular; the whole practice in reference to its entry may be correct, but still invalid for reasons going behind the regularity of its forms. 1 Flipp. 487.

VALOR BENEFICIORUM (Lat.). The value of every ecclesiastical benefice and preferment, according to which the first-fruits and tenths are collected and paid. The valuation by which the clergy are at present rated was made 26 Hen. VIII., and is commonly called The King's Books. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. *284.

VALOR MARITAGII (Lat.). The amount forfeited under the ancient tenures by a ward to a guardian who had offered her a marriage without disparagement, which she refused. It was so much as a jury would assess, or as any one would give bona fide, for the value of the marriage. Littleton 110. A writ which lay against the ward, on coming of full age, for that he was not married by his guardian, for the value of the marriage, and this though no convenient marriage had been offered. Termes de la Ley.

VALUABLE CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

VALUABLE SECURITY. Every valuable security is a valuable thing, but many valuable things are not valuable securities. The words "other valuable things" include everything of value; 35 N. J. L. 452; as a promissory note; 29 id. 18. Ice has been held a valuable article; 33 Ind. 402. Valuable papers are not papers having a money value, but only such as are kept and considered worthy of being taken care of by the particular person; 2 Head (Tenn.) 306. They have been defined to be such as are regarded by a testator as worthy of preservation: in his estimation, of some value. The term is not confined to deeds for lands or slaves, obligations for money or certificates of stock: 5 Coldw. 129.

VALUATION. The act of ascertaining the worth of a thing. The estimated worth of a thing. 7 Nev. 99. See VALUE.

VALUATION LIST. In English Law. A list of all the ratable hereditaments in a parish.

VALUE. The utility of an object. The worth of an object in purchasing other goods. The first may be called value in use; the latter, value in exchange.

When applied without qualification to property of any description, necessarily means the price which it will command in the market; 17 Wend. 399. See 20 W. Va. 102. In an indictment, it has been held to be a synonym of "effect" or "import." 25 Ohio St. 488.

Value differs from price, q. v. The latter is applied to live cattle and animals; in a declaration, therefore, for taking cattle, they ought to be said to be of such a price: and in a declaration for taking dead chattels, or those which never had life, it ought to lay them to be of such a value; 2 Lilly, Abr. 639. See 119 Mass. 126.

It is also distinguished from income when applied to property; 45 Barb. 247. As used in reference to lands taken under eminent domain, it is a relative term, depending on the circumstances. Salable value, actual value, and cash value all mean the same thing and are designed to effect the same purpose; Burr. Tax. 227. See 101 U. S. 162. See INTRINSIC VALUE. Upon the question of the value of an article evidence of its original cost is relevant: 88 Fed. Rep. 95.

VALUE RECEIVED. A phrase usually employed in a bill of exchange or promissory note, to denote that a consideration has been given for it. These words are not necessary; 11 A. & E. 703; 21 Wisc. 607; though it is otherwise in some states if the bill or note be not negotiable: 19 Conn. 7; 29 Ill. 104; extrinsic evidence is admissible between immediate parties to prove absence, failure, or illegality of consideration; 5 Allen 589; 9 id. 45, 253.

The expression value received, when put in a bill of exchange, will bear two interpretations; the drawer of the bill may be presumed to acknowledge the fact that he has received value of the payee; 3 Maule & S. 351; 2 McLean 213; or when the bill has been made payable to the order of the drawer and accepted, it implies that value has been received by the acceptor; 5 Maule & S. 65; 19 Barb. 409. In a promissory note, the expression imports value received from the payee; 5 B. & C. 360; and sufficiently expresses a consideration; 149 U. S. 298; although not necessarily in money; 32 Ia. 265.

VALUED POLICY. See POLICY.

VARA. A measure used in Mexican land grants equal to 33.9927 inches. 161 U. S. 219.

VARIANCE. A disagreement or difference between two parts of the same legal proceeding which ought to agree together. Variances are between the writ and the declaration, and between the declaration, or bill in equity, and the evidence.

Variance in matter of substance is fatal to the action; 4 Ala. 319; 10 Johns. 141; and is ground for demurrer or arrest of judgment; 3 Den. 356; 7 T. B. Monr. 290; but if in matter of form merely, must be pleaded in abatement; 1 Ill. 298; 1 McLean 319; or special demurrer; 2 Hill S. C. 585; and a variance between the allegations and evidence upon some material points only is as fatal as if upon all; 7 Taunt. 385; but, if it be merely formal or immaterial matter, will be disregarded; 7 Cra. 408; 11 Ala. 542. The court may allow a technical variance between the pleadings and proofs to be cured by an amendment not introducing any other cause of action or affecting the merits of the case between the parties; 138 U. S. 623. Slight variance from the terms of a written instrument which is professedly set out in the words themselves is fatal; Hampst. 294.

It is too late after plea to take advantage of a variance between the description in the writ and the declaration of property replevied; 95 Mich. 594.

Where, in an action on contracts, the pleader did not set out the exact words of the contract, and a different contract expressed in different words was proved, there is no real variance, as the difference between the declaration and the proofs must be real and tangible to constitute a variance; 25 U. S. App. 58. Where the plaintiff declared that his cattle died of "Texas cattle fever," and that it was contagious, and the court found that the cattle died of "Texas fever," and it was infectious, held that the variance was immaterial; 163 U. S. 468. So where in an indictment the name of the "National State Bank," "carrying on a national banking business at the City of Exeter," was used instead of "The National Granite State Bank of Exeter;" 162 U. S. 87.

VASSAL. In Feudal Law. The name given to the holder of a fief bound to perform feudal service: this word was then always correlative to that of lord, entitled to such service.

The vassal himself might be lord of some other vassal.

In after-times, this word was used to signify a species of slave who owed servitude and was in a state of dependency on a superior lord. 2 Bla. Com. 53.

VAVASOUR (diminutive from vasalus, or, according to Bracton, from vas sortitus ad valitudinem). One who was in dignity next to a baron. Britton 109; Bracton, lib. 1, c. 8. One who held of a baron. Encyc. Brit.

VECTIGALIA. In Roman Law. Duties which were paid to the prince for the importation and exportation of certain merchandise. They differed from tribute, which was a tax paid by each individual. Code 4. 61. 5. 13.

VEHICLE. The word includes every description of carriage or other artificial contrivance used or capable of being used as a means of transportation on land; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4; a street sprinkler is a vehicle; 71 Mo. 92; but not a street car; 14 Pa. 484; or a ferry boat; 25 Ind. 286. See BICYCLE; TEAM.

VEIN. See LODE.

VEJOURS. An obsolete word, which signified viewers or experts.

VENAL. Something that is bought. The term is generally applied in a bad sense; as, a venal office is an office which has been purchased.

VENDEE. A purchaser; a buyer.

VENDITION. A sale; the act of selling.

VENDITIONI EXPONAS (Lat.). That you expose to sale.

In Practice. The name of a writ of execution, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to sell goods or chattels, and in some states, lands, which he has taken in execution by virtue of a fieri facias, and which remain unsold.

Under this writ the sheriff is bound to sell the property in his hands, and he cannot return a second time that he can get no buyers; Cowp. 406.

VENDITOR REGIS (Lat.). The king's salesman, or person who exposes to sale goods or chattels seized or distrained to answer any debt due to the king. Cowel. This office was granted by Edw. I. to Philip de Lordiner, but was seized into the king's hands for abuse thereof. 2 Edw. II.

VENDOR. The seller; one who disposes of a thing in consideration of money.

VENDOR'S LIEN. An equitable lien allowed the vendor of land sold for the unpaid purchase-money. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1260. See LIEN.

VENEZUELA. A republic of South America. The president is elected by the federal council for four years and is assisted by six ministers and a federal council of sixteen members appointed by congress. The senate is selected for four years and consists of three members for each of the eight states. The house of representatives, elected for four years, is chosen on a basis of representation by the people. Each state has its own executive and legislature.

VENIRE FACIAS (Lat.). That you cause to come. According to the English law, the proper process to be issued on an indictment for any petit misdemeanor, on a penal statute, is a writ called venire facias.

It is in the nature of a summons to cause the party to appear; 4 Bla. Com. 18, 351. See Thomp. & M. Juries 62.

VENIRE FACIAS JURATORES (Lat.). (Frequently called venire simply.)

The name of a writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to cause to come from the body of the county, before the court from which it issued, on some day certain and therein specified, a certain number of qualified citizens who are to act as jurors in the said court. Steph. Pl. 104. See 6 S. & R. 414; 3 Chitty, Pr. 797; JURY.

VENIRE FACIAS DE NOVO (Lat.). The name of a new writ of venire facias; this is awarded when, by reason of some irregularity or defect in the proceeding on the first venire, or the trial, the proper effect of the venire has been frustrated, or the verdict become void in law; as, for example, when the jury has been improperly chosen, or an uncertain, ambiguous, or defective verdict has been rendered. Steph. Pl. 120; or when a judgment is reversed on a writ of error.

A motion for a venire de novo is properly denied, where there is no defect, ambiguity, or uncertainty in the verdict; 6 Ind. App. 268; 8 id. 590; and upon reversal of a judgment, the awarding the writ is controlled by the character of the case and the sound discretion of the appellate court; 98 Pa. 142. See RES JUDICATA.

VENTE A REMERE. In French Law. A sale made, reserving a right to the seller to repurchase the property sold by returning the price paid for it.

The term is used in Canada and Louisiana. The time during which a repurchase may be made cannot exceed ten years, and, if by the agreement it so exceed, it shall be reduced to ten years.

VENTER, VENTRE (Lat. the belly). The wife; for example, a man has three children by the first and one by the second venter. A child is said to be en ventre sa mere before it is born; while it is a fœtus. See UNBORN CHILD.

VENTRE INSPICIENDO. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO; JURY OF WOMEN; PHYSICAL EXAMINATION.

VENUE (L. Lat. visnetum, neighborhood. The word was formerly spelled visne. Co. Litt. 125 a).

The county in which the facts are alleged to have occurred, and from which the jury are to come to try the issue. Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 102; 1 How. 241. Some certain place must be alleged as the place of occurrence for each traversable fact; Com. Dig. Pleader (C. 20). Generally, in modern pleading, in civil practice, no special allegation is needed in the body of the declaration, the venue in the margin being understood to be the place of occurrence till the contrary is shown; Hempst. 236.

In local actions the true venue must be laid; that is, the action must be brought in the county where the cause of action arose, where the property is situated, in actions affecting real property; 2 Zabr. 204; and there can be no change of venue in such cases; 3 N. Y. 204. Thus, in actions on a lease at common law, founded on privity of contract, as debt or covenant by lessor or lessee; 1 Saund. 241 b; 3 S. & R. 500; venue is transitory, but when founded in privity of estate, as in case of assignment, the venue is local; 1 Saund. 257. By various early statutes, however, actions on leases have become generally transitory. In such action, some particular place, as, a town, village, or parish, must formerly have been designated; Co. Litt. 125. But it is said to be no longer necessary except in replevin; 2 East 503; 1 Chitty, Pl. 251. As to where the venue is to be laid in case of a change of county lines, see 18 Ga. 690; 16 Pa. 3; 102 Cal. 501.

In transitory actions the venue may be laid in any county the plaintiff chooses; that is, he may bring suit wherever he may find the defendant, and lay his cause of action to have arisen there, even though the cause of action arose in a foreign jurisdiction; Steph. Pl. 306; 18 Ga. 690; 1 How. 241. In case the cause was to be tried in a different county from that in which the matter actually arose, the venue was anciently laid by giving the place of occurrence, with a scilicet giving the place of trial; 1 How. 241; 3 Zabr. 279. In some cases, however, by statutes, the venue in transitory actions must be laid in the county where the matter occurred or where certain parties reside; 3 Bla. Com. 294. And generally, by statute, it must be in the county where one of the parties resides, when between citizens of the same state.

In criminal proceedings the venue must be laid in the county where the occurrence actually took place; 4 C. & P. 368; and the act must be proved to have occurred in that jurisdiction; 26 Pa. 513; 4 Tex. 450; 6 Cal. 202. Where the offence is committed by letter, the sender may be tried at the place where the letter is received by the person to whom it is addressed; 136 U. S. 256. See 49 Fed. Rep. 843. An indictment for murder charging that an offence was committed on board of an American vessel on the high seas within the jurisdiction of the court and within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, sufficiently avers the locality of the offence; 154 U. S. 134. One who obtains goods from a salesman under false pretences may be tried in the county from which the goods were shipped; 167 Pa. 225.

Statement of venue in the margin and reference thereto in the body of an indictment is a sufficient statement of venue; 39 Me. 78; 8 Mo. 283; and the venue need not be stated in the margin if it appears from the indictment; 5 Gray 478; 25 Conn. 48; 2 McLean 580.

Want of any venue is a cause for demurrer; 5 Mass. 94; or abatement: Archb. Civ. Pl. 78; or arrest of judgment; 4 Tex. 450. So defendant may plead or demur to a wrong venue; 13 Me. 130. Change of venue may be made by the court to prevent, and not to cause a defeat of justice; 3 Bla. Com. 294; 2 Wisc. 397; 20 Ill. 259, both in civil; 7 Ind. 110; 31 Miss. 490; and criminal cases; 7 Ind. 160; 28 Ala. N. s. 28; 5 Harring. 513; and such change is a matter of right on compliance with the requirements of the law; 9 Tex. 358; 2 Wisc. 419.

15 Ill. 511; 8 Mo. 606. That such change is a matter of discretion with the court below, see 28 Ala. N. s. 28; 31 Miss. 490; 3 Cal. 410; 8 Ind. 489; 50 Kan. 773; 75 Ia. 50; 91 Tenn. 617; 131 U. S. 22.

See JURISDICTION.

VERAY. An ancient manner of spelling vrai, true. In the English law there are three kinds of tenants: veray, or true tenant, who is one who holds in fee-simple; tenant by the manner (see TENANT); and veray tenant by the manner, who is the same as tenant by the manner, with this difference only, that the fee-simple, instead of remaining in the lord, is given by him or by the law to another. Hamm. N. P. 394.

VERBAL. Parol; by word of mouth: as verbal agreement; verbal evidence. Sometimes incorrectly used for oral.

VERBAL NOTE. In diplomatic language, a memorandum or note, not signed, sent when an affair has continued a long time, without any reply, in order to avoid the appearance of an urgency which perhaps the affair does not require, and, on the other hand, not to afford any ground for supposing that it is forgotten, or that there is no intention of prosecuting it any further, is called a verbal note.

VERBAL PROCESS. In Louisiana. A written account of any proceeding or operation required by law, signed by the person commissioned to perform the duty, and attested by the signature of witnesses. See PROCÈS VERBAL.

VERDEROR (fr. French verdeur, fr. vert or verd, green; Law L. viridarius). An officer in king's forest, whose office is properly to look after the vert, for food and shelter for the deer. He is also sworn to keep the assizes of the forest, and receive and enrol the attachments and presentments of trespasses within the forest, and certify them to the swanimote or justice-seat; Cowel; Manwood, For. Law 332.

VERDICT. The unanimous decision made by a jury and reported to the court on the matters lawfully submitted to them in the course of a trial of a cause.

A general verdict is one by which the jury pronounce at the same time on the fact and the law, either in favor of the plaintiff or defendant. Co. Litt. 228; 4 Bla. Com. 461.

A general verdict is a finding by the jury in the terms of the issue referred to them. 8 Ga. 208; Tidd, Pr. 798.

A general verdict must be regarded as affirming the truth of every fact necessary to support the general conclusion arrived at, and every reasonable presumption arises in its favor, while nothing will be presumed in aid of the special findings as against the general verdict; 118 Ind. 5. If there is any reasonable hypothesis whereby a general verdict and the special finding can be reconciled, judgment must follow the general verdict; 117 id. 234; 119 id. 218; and a general verdict on an indictment is sufficient if supported by any one of the counts; 101 N. C. 680; 85 Ala. 14; 34 Fed. Rep. 873.

The jury may find such a verdict whenever they think fit to do so.

A partial verdict in a criminal case is one by which the jury acquit the defendant of a part of the accusation against him, and find him guilty of the residue.

A privy verdict is one delivered privily to a judge out of court. A verdict of this kind is delivered to the judge after the jury have agreed, for the convenience of the jury, who, after having given it, separate. This verdict is of no force whatever; and this practice, being exceedingly liable to abuse, is seldom, if ever, allowed in the United States. The jury, however, are allowed in some states, in certain cases, to seal their verdict and return it into court, as, for example, where a verdict is agreed upon during the adjournment of the court for the day. When this is done in criminal cases it is usually the right of the defendant to have the jury present in court when the verdict is opened; 10 Fed. Rep. 269. See PRESENCE; SEALING A VERDICT.

A private verdict must afterwards be given publicly in order to give it any effect.

A public verdict is one delivered in open court.

A special verdict is one by which the facts are found, and the law is submitted to the judges. 4 Rand. 504; 1 Wash. C. C. 499; 2 Mas. 31. The jury may find a special verdict in criminal cases, but they are not obliged in any case to do so; Cooley, Const. Lim. 393. The special verdict or findings of a jury in order to sustain a judgment, must pass upon all the material issues made in the pleadings so as to enable the court to say upon the pleadings and verdict, without looking at the evidence, which party is entitled to judgment; 40 Minn. 375; 48 id. 397; 88 id. 260; 150 U. S. 597. A special verdict need only find such facts as are alleged in the pleadings upon one side and denied upon the other; 69 Tex. 124.

The jury have an option, instead of finding the negative or affirmative of the issue, as in a general verdict, to find all the facts of the case as disclosed by the evidence before them, and, after so setting them forth, to conclude to the following effect: That they are ignorant, in point of law, on which side they ought upon those facts to find the issue; that if upon the whole matter the court shall be of opinion that the issue is proved for the plaintiff, they find for the plaintiff accordingly, and assess the damages at such a sum, etc.; but if the court are of an opposite opinion, they find for defendant. This form of finding is called a special verdict. In practice they have nothing to do with the formal preparation of the special verdict. When it is agreed that a verdict of that kind is to be given, the jury merely declare their opinion as to any fact remaining in doubt, and then the verdict is adjusted without their further interference. It is settled under the correction of the judge, by the counsel on either side, according to the state of the facts as found by the jury, with respect to all particulars on which they have delivered an opinion, and, with respect to other particulars, according to the state of facts which it is agreed that they ought to find upon the evidence before them. The special verdict, when its form is thus settled, is, together with the whole proceedings on the trial, then entered on record; and the question of law, arising on the facts found, is argued before the court in banc; 3 Bla. Com. 377.

There is another method of finding a special verdict: this is when the jury find a verdict generally for the plaintiff, but subject nevertheless to the opinion of the judges or the court above on a special case, stated by the counsel on both sides, with regard to a matter of law; 3 Bla. Com. 378. See 10 Mass. 64; 11 id. 358.

A juror may dissent at any time from a verdict to which he had before agreed until the same is recorded; 15 Am. L. Rev. 493. A mistake in the verdict may be corrected before it is recorded and the jury discharged; 98 N. C. 678.

Where a jury being equally divided in opinion come to an agreement by lot, it was formerly held that its verdict was legitimate; 1 Keble 811; but such verdicts are now held to be illegal, and will be set aside. The "quotient" verdict is so called from the fact that the jurors, having agreed to find for the plaintiff, further agree that their verdict shall be in such sum as is ascertained by each juror privately marking down the sum of money to which he thinks the plaintiff entitled, the total of these sums being divided by twelve. This method is almost universally condemned, the ground of the objection being that such an agreement cuts off all deliberation on the part of the jurors, and places it in the power of one of their number by naming a sum extravagantly high or ridiculously low to make the quotient unreasonably large or small; 6 Sm. & M. 35; 1 Wash. Ty. 329; 134 Ind. 166; so of a verdict in a criminal case fixing the term of imprisonment; 30 Tex. Cr. Rep. 156; contra, in the case of a fine in a criminal case for libel; 95 Ky. 332. But where the calculation is purely informal, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the jury, the objection is obviated, and the verdict will stand; 1 Humph. 399; 98 Ill. 410; 74 Ia. 659; 23 Neb. 668; 77 Cal. 568; 40 Kan. 568; 3 Misc. Rep. 332. A verdict obtained by taking one-twelfth of the aggregate amount of the several estimates of the jurors is not objectionable when there was no antecedent agreement to be bound by the result, and when each juror deliberately accepted the amount thus ascertained; 57 Fed. Rep. 898; 37 Neb. 742; but if in pursuance of an agreement to be bound by the result, the verdict must be set aside; 1 Col. App. 350; 35 Tenn. 246; 25 Cal. 399; 112 Ill. 656; 17 R. I. 240. So where two of the jurors agree that if one places a coin and the other guesses heads or tails, and the guess is right, they will agree with the majority; 23 Cal. 47; or where a verdict is reached by drawing lots it will be set aside; 39 Cal. 489; 68 Ga. 182; 90 Ia. 195; 160 Mass. 395. See JURY.

A verdict allowing a larger sum than is claimed in the petition must be set aside; 78 Ia. 300. Where a verdict in an action for breach of covenant is larger than the plaintiff's claim a remittitur is properly allowed; 60 Vt. 486; and a remission of a part of the verdict, followed by a judgment for the remaining sum, as a condition of the denial of a new trial, does not deprive the defendant of his constitutional right to have the question of damages tried by a jury, or constitute a re-examination of the facts tried by the jury in violation of the 7th amendment of the U. S. constitution; 190 U. S. 69.

A verdict received on Sunday is valid; 99 U. S. App. 32; a third successive verdict was set aside in 164 U. S. 228.

See NEW TRIAL; TRIAL; AFFORCE THE ASSIZE.

VERGE. An uncertain quantity of land, from fifteen to thirty acres. Toml. See COURT OF THE MARSHALSEA; VIRGA.

VERIFICATION (Lat. verum, true, facio, to make). An averment by the party making a pleading that he is prepared to establish the truth of the facts which he has pleaded.

Whenever new matter is introduced on either side, the plea must conclude with the verification or averment, in order that the other party may have an opportunity of answering it; 1 Saund. 103, n. 1. This applies only to pleas.

In one instance, however, new matter need not conclude with a verification, and then the pleader may pray judgment without it: for example, when the matter pleaded is merely negative; Lawes, Pl. 145. The reason of it is evident: a negative requires no proof; and it would, therefore, be impertinent or nugatory for the pleader, who pleads a negative matter, to declare his readiness to prove it.

The usual form of verification of a plea containing matter of fact is, "And this he is ready to verify," etc. See 3 Bla. Com. 309.

See BILL; INJUNCTION.

In Practice. The examination of the truth of a writing; the certificate that the writing is true. See AUTHENTICATION.

VERIFY. Sometimes to confirm and substantiate by oath, and sometimes by argument. 3 How. Pr. 284.

VERMONT. One of the United States.

At the outbreak of the Revolution the people of Vermont joined their brethren in the contest, though independent of the federal government. In 1777 they declared their territory to be "a free independent jurisdiction," and adopted a constitution which with subsequent amendments is still the constitution of the state. Under this constitution the state maintained its government and its independence for fourteen years, until its admission to the Union in 1791. The institutions of Vermont were modelled in large part from those of Connecticut (Art. 25).

Every man of the age of twenty-one years, born in the United States or naturalised, who has resided one year in the state, is of quiet and peaceable behavior, and takes the oath of allegiance, becomes a freeman of the state.

The constitution was amended in 1786, 1793, 1828, 1836, 1850, and 1870.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER of the state is vested in the governor, lieutenant-governor, and treasurer, who are elected bi-ennially. The governor has no power of appointment to office except of his own secretary, unless in case of vacancies occurring during the recess of the legislature. He has power to grant pardons except in cases of impeachment and of treason and murder in which he may reprieve, but not pardon, until after the next session of the legislature, and cannot commute.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER is exercised by a senate of thirty members, elected by the counties in proportion to the population, each county electing at least one; and by a house of representatives of about two hundred and thirty members, of whom each town in the state elects one and no more.

THE JUDICIARY POWER is vested in a supreme court, courts of chancery, county courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. The supreme court consists of a chief justice and six assistant justices, who are elected by the legislature biennially. It has original jurisdiction in cases of mandamus, quo warranto, and petitions for new trials, and appellate jurisdiction from all final decrees in the courts of chancery, and by writ of error on exceptions upon questions of law in all cases of the county courts.

The courts of chancery are holden twice a year in each county by a justice of the supreme court, and have the general powers of the English courts of chancery.

The county courts are holden by a justice of the supreme court and two assistant judges elected by the people for the county biennially. They have general original jurisdiction in all actions for recovery of lands or involving the title thereto: in actions for divorce, audita querela, and upon money demands above the sum of two hundred dollars, and in certain cases below that sum: and in proceedings for establishing or discontinuing roads and bridges, removal of paupers, etc.: and they have appellate jurisdiction from the probate courts, and from the judgments of justices of the peace in all criminal cases, and in all civil cases where the demand exceeds ten dollars, or if upon note, twenty dollars.

The probate courts are holden by judges of probate, elected by the freemen biennially for the probate districts, each of which is either a county or a division of a county. The probate courts have exclusive original jurisdiction of the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, of guardianship, and of proceedings in insolvency.

VERSUS. Against; as, A B versus C D. This is usually abbreviated v. or vs.

Vs. and versus have become ingrafted upon the English language; their meaning is as well understood and their use quite as appropriate as the word against could be; 25 N. H. 523. See TITLE.

VERT. Everything bearing green leaves in a forest. Manwood, For. Law 146.

VERY LORD AND VERY TENANT. They that are immediate lord and tenant one to another. Cowel.

VESSEL. In Maritime Law. A ship, brig, sloop, or other craft used in navigation. 1 Boulay-Paty, tit. 1, p. 100. The term is rarely applied to any water craft without a deck; 3 Mas. 137; but has been used to include everything capable of being used as a means of transportation by water; 27 La. Ann. 607.

By R. S. § 3, "the word 'vessel' includes every description of water craft or other artificial contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water. See 48 Fed. Rep. 703.

A floating elevator towed from place to place, and used to transfer grain, has the characteristics of a vessel; 8 Bened. 506. Rep. 411; so of canal boats; id.; so of a scow built for carrying a steam shovel worked by the steam engine of the scow; 30 Fed. Rep. 206; and a barge having no sails, masts, or rudders and used only for the transportation of bricks, suitable only to be towed by a tug; 36 id. 607; so of a floating scow fitted with steam appliances for deepening channels; 40 id. 353; a steam dredge; 53 id. 607; 30 id. 206; 83 id. 840; a barge and scow; 61 id. 502; 77 id. 476. The means of propulsion makes no difference; 8 Sawy. 211. An open boat is not a vessel; 5 Mas. 120; nor a raft; 14 Fed. Rep. 286; nor a canal boat; 5 Wend. 564.

Vessels navigated to a port are subject to distinct duties and obligations, and are not dutiable as imported merchandise; 166 U. S. 110.

Vessels must have their names marked on them; 2 Supp. R. S. 541.

An estate by which a present interest passes to the party, though to be enjoyed in futuro, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate has been spent. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1831. It imports, ex vi termini, a present title in the remainderman; 112 N. C. 1. See REMAINDER; Tudor, L. Cas. R. P. 820.

VESTIGIAL WORDS. Those contained in a statute which by reason of a succession of statutes on the same subject-matter, amending or modifying previous provisions of the same, are rendered useless or meaningless by such amendments. 164 U. S. 70.

VESTING ORDER. An order which may be granted by the chancery division of the high court of justice (and formerly by chancery) passing the legal estate in lieu of a conveyance.

VESTRY. The place in a church where the priest's vestments are deposited. Also, an assembly of the minister, church wardens, and parishioners, held in the vestry of the church. In America, a body elected by a church congregation to administer the affairs of the church. See Baum, Church Law.

VESTURE OF LAND. A phrase including all things, trees excepted, which grow upon the surface of the land and clothe it externally.

He who has the vesture of land has a right, generally, to exclude others from entering upon the superficies of the soil. Co. Litt. 4 b; Hamm. N. P. 151. See 7 East 200.

VETERA STATUTA (Lat.). The name of vetera statuta—ancient statutes—has been given to the statutes commencing with Magna Charta and ending with those of Edward II. Crabb, Eng. Law 222.

VETERINARY SURGEON. One who treats domestic animals for injuries or diseases. The same rules are applicable to the case of a veterinary surgeon bringing an action to recover for the value of his services as are applicable to other surgeons; 69 Hun 428. He must possess and exercise a reasonable degree of learning and skill, and use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in the exercise of his skill and the application of his knowledge; 69 Hun 428; 10 id. 358; 29 Neb. 352; 48 Vt. 557. See PHYSICIAN.

VETITUM NAMIUM (Law Lat. vetitum, forbidden, namium, taking). Where the bailiff of a lord distrains beasts or goods of another, and the lord forbids the bailiff to deliver them when the sheriff comes to make replevin, the owner of the cattle may demand satisfaction in placitum de vetito namio. Co. 2d Inst. 140; 2 Bla. Com. 148. See WITHERNAM; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 575.

VETO (Lat. I forbid). A term including the refusal of the executive officer whose assent is necessary to perfect a law which has been passed by the legislative body, and the message which is usually sent, stating such refusal and the reasons therefor. See EXECUTIVE POWER.

By the constitution of the United States government, the president has a power to prevent the enactment of any law, by refusing to sign the same after its passage, unless it be subsequently enacted by a vote of two-thirds of each house. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 7. When a bill is engrossed, and has received the sanction of both houses, it is transmitted to the president for his approbation. If he approves of it, he signs it. If he does not, he sends it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, and that house enters the objections on the journal and proceeds to reconsider the bill. See Story, Const. § 878; 1 Kent, Comm. 239. Similar powers are possessed by the governors of many of the states. See STATUTE.

The veto power of the British sovereign has not been exercised for more than a century. It was exercised once during the reign of Queen Anne. 10 Edinburgh Rev. 411; Parks, Lect. 126. But anciently the king frequently replied, Le roi s'avisera, which was in effect withholding his assent. In France the king had the initiative of all laws, but not the veto. See 1 Toullier, nn. 39, 42, 52, note 3.

VEXATION. The injury or damage which is suffered in consequence of the tricks of another.

VEXATIOUS ACTIONS ACT. An act of parliament of 1896, authorizing the high court to order, on the application of the attorney-general, that a person shown to be habitually and vexatiously litigious, without reasonable ground, shall not institute legal proceedings in that or any other court, without leave of that court or a judge thereof, upon satisfactory proof that such legal proceedings are not an abuse of the process of the court and that there is a prima facie ground therefor. The order when made is published in the Gazette. See 76 L. T. 351.

VEXATIOUS SUIT. Torts. A suit which has been instituted maliciously, and without probable cause, whereby a damage has ensued to the defendant.

The suit is either a criminal prosecution, a conviction before a magistrate, or a civil action. The suit need not be altogether without foundation: if the part which is groundless has subjected the party to an inconvenience to which he would not have been exposed had the valid cause of complaint alone been insisted on, it is injurious; 4 Co. 14; 1 Pet. C. C. 210; 4 S. & R. 19, 23.

To make it vexatious the suit must have been instituted maliciously. See MALICIOUS PROSECUTION; FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

VEXED QUESTION. A question or point of law often discussed or agitated, but not determined or settled.

VI ET ARMIS (Lat.). With force and arms. See TRESPASS.

VIA (Lat.). A cart-way,—which also includes a foot-way and a horse-way. See WAY.

VIABILITY (from the French vie). Capability of living. A term used to denote the power a new-born child possesses of continuing its independent existence.

That a child may be viable, it is necessary that not only the organs should be in a normal state, but likewise all the physiological and pathological causes which are capable of opposing the establishment or prolongation of its life be absent.

Although a child may be born with every appearance of health, yet, from some malformation, it may not possess the physical power to maintain life, but which must cease from necessity. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said to exist but temporarily,—no longer, indeed, than is necessary to prove that a continued existence is impossible.

It is important to make a distinction between a viable and a non-viable child, although the latter may outlive the former. The viable child may die of some disease on the day of its birth, while a non-viable child may live a fortnight. The former possesses the organs essential to life, in their integrity; while the latter has some imperfection which prevents the complete establishment of life.

As it is no evidence of non-viability that a child dies within a few hours of its birth, neither is it a proof of viability if a child appears to be well and the function of respiration be fully established.

There are many affections which a child may have at birth, that are not necessarily mortal: such as transposition of some of the organs, and other malformations. There are also many diseases which, without being necessarily mortal, are an impediment to the establishment of independent life, affecting different parts of the system: such as inflammation, in addition to many malformations. There is a third class, in which are many affections that are necessarily mortal: such as a general softening of the mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines, developed before birth, or the absence of the stomach, and a number of other malformations. These distinctions are of great importance; for children affected by peculiarities of the first order must be considered as viable; affections of the second may constitute extenuating circumstances in questions of infanticide; while those of the third admit of no discussion on the subject of their viability.

The question of viability presents itself to the medical jurist under two aspects: first, with respect to infanticide, and second, with respect to testamentary grants and inheritances. Billard on Infants, translation by James Stewart, M. D., Appendix; Briand, Méd. Lég. 1ère partie, c. 6, art. 2. See 2 Savigny, Dr. Rom. Append. III., for a learned discussion of this subject.

VIABLE. See VIABILITY.

VICARAGE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The living or benefice of a vicar: usually consisting of the small tithes. 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 75, 79.

VICARIUS APOSTOLICUS. An officer through whom the Pope exercises authority in parts remote, and who is sometimes sent with episcopal functions into provinces where there is no bishop resident or there has been a long vacancy in the see, or into infidel or heretical countries. 2 Phill. Int. L. 529.

VICE. A term used in the civil law and in Louisiana, by which is meant a defect in a thing; an imperfection. For example, epilepsy in a slave, roaring and crib-biting in a horse. Redhibitory vices are those for which the seller will be compelled to annul a sale and take back the thing sold. Pothier, Vente 208; La. Civ. Code, art. 2498.

VICE-ADMIRAL. The title of a naval officer next in rank after an admiral.

Under R. S. § 1368 it was provided that the grades of admiral and vice-admiral in the United States navy should not be filled and that when a vacancy occured the grades should cease to exist.

VICE-ADMIRAL OF THE COAST. A county officer in England appointed by the admiral "to be answerable to the high admiral for all the coasts of the sea, when need and occasion shall be." He also had power to arrest ships, when found within a certain district, for the use of the king. His office was judicial as well as ministerial. The appointment to the office is still made for a few countries of England. For a detailed account of this office and its functions, see "The Office of Vice-Admiral of the Coast," by Sir G. Sherston Baker.

VICE-CHANCELLOR. A judge, assistant to the chancellor.

He held a separate court, and his decrees were liable to be reversed by the chancellor. He was first appointed 53 Geo. III. In 1841 two additional vice-chancellors were appointed; and there were then three vice-chancellors' courts. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 54, n.

There is also a vice-chancellor of the county palatine of Lancaster; 3 Steph. Com. 331. By the Judicature Act of 1873, the vice-chancellors were transferred to the high court of justice and appointed judges of the chancery division, and on their death or retirement their successors were styled judges of her majesty's high court of justice. There is one vice-chancellor in Ireland. The office exists in New Jersey. See CHANCELLOR; CHANCELLOR'S COURTS IN THE TWO UNIVERSITIES.

VICE-CONSUL. An officer who performs the duties of a consul within a part of the district of a consul, or who acts in the place of a consul. He is not a deputy, but an acting consul; 33 Fed. Rep. 165. See 1 Phil. Ev. 306; CONSUL.

VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. The title of the second officer, in point of rank, in the government of the United States.

As to his election, see PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. His office in point of duration is coextensive with that of the president. The constitution of the United States, art. I. s. 3, clause 4, directs that "the vice-president of the United States shall be president of the senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided." And by article 2, s. 1, clause 6, it is provided that "in case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice-president."

When the vice-president exercises the office of president, he is called the President of the United States.

VICE-PRINCIPAL. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

VICE VERSA (Lat.). On the contrary; on opposite sides.

VICECOMES. The sheriff.

VICECOMES NON MISIT BREVE (Lat. the sheriff did not send the writ). An entry made on the record when nothing has been done by virtue of a writ which has been directed to the sheriff.

VICINAGE. The neighborhood; the venue. See 36 W. Va. 84; JURY.

VICINETUM (Lat.). The neighborhood; vicinage; the venue. Co. Litt. 158 b.

VICINITY. Etymologically, by common understanding, it admits of a wider latitude than proximity or contiguity, and may embrace a more extended space than that lying contiguous to the place in question; and, as applied to towns and other territorial divisions, may embrace those not adjacent; 12 Gray 545; 63 N. H. 246. In a statute authorizing the extension of the street and an appointment of benefits upon lots in the vicinity the term is a relative one and does not denote any particular definite distance from the extension of the street but must be construed according to the circumstances of each case; 18 Pa. 26. The meaning of vicinity of a city must depend upon the size of the city, etc., and its particular surroundings; 52 Mich. 36. See NEIGHBORHOOD.

VICIOUS INTROMISSION. In Scotch Law. A meddling with the movables of a deceased, without confirmation or probate of his will or other title. Whart. Lex.

VICONTIEL. Belonging to the sheriff.

VICTORIA. A British colony in Australia. It became a distinct colony in 1851. It has a governor appointed by the crown and a parliament of two houses, one of ninety-five members and one of forty-eight, both elected by the people. It has a supreme court presided over by a chief justice and five puisne judges, a court of insolvency, courts of assize and general sessions, county courts, and courts of mines. See AUSTRALIA.

VIDELICET (Lat.). A Latin adverb, signifying to wit, that is to say, namely; scilicet. This word is usually abbreviated viz.

The office of the videlicet is to mark that the party does not undertake to prove the precise circumstances alleged; and in such cases he is not required to prove them; Steph. Pl. 309; 7 Cow. 42; 8 Taunt. 107; Greenl. Ev. § 60; 1 Litt. Ky. 209. See Yelv. 94; 3 Saund. 291 a, note; 4 B. & P. 465; 2 Pick. 214; 47 Ill. 175.

VIDUITY. Widowhood.

VIEW. Inspection; a prospect.

See ANCIENT LIGHTS; NUISANCE; VIEWERS; 16 Am. L. Rev. 628; 63 Me. 385.

VIEW, DEMAND OF. In most real and mixed actions, in order to ascertain the identity of land claimed with that in the tenant's possession, the tenant is allowed, after the demandant has counted, to demand a view of the land in question, or, if the subject of claim be rent, or the like, a view of the land out of which it issues. Com. Dig. View; 2 Saund. 45 b.

This right, however, is confined to real or mixed actions; for in personal actions the view does not lie. In the action of dower unde nihil habet, it has been much questioned whether the view be demandable or not; 2 Saund. 44, n. 4; and there are other real and mixed actions in which it is not allowed. The view being granted, the course of proceeding was to issue a writ commanding the sheriff to cause the defendant to have a view of the land. The duty of suing out the writ lies upon the demandant; and when the sheriff causes view to be made, the demandant is to show to the tenant in all ways possible, the thing in demand, with its metes and bounds. On the return of the writ into court, the demandant must count de novo—that is, declare again; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 Y 3); and the pleadings proceed to issue. This proceeding of demanding view is, in the present rarity of real actions, unknown in practice. It is said in 141 U. S. 251, that there are only two cases in the books [1 Arn. 244; 8 Dowl. Pr. c. 201] where orders to inspect a building were requested. Both were refused.

The right to grant an application for the jury to view the premises during the trial of a case rests in the discretion of the trial judge; 82 Wis. 81; 17 Colo. 448; 110 N. C. 438; 95 Mich. 586; 41 Ill. App. 584; 4 Wash. 436. Where the facts are such that they can be accurately described to the jury the court may properly deny a request to view the premises; 4 Ind. App. 100; also where a motion is made to have the jury view the scene of an accident several years after it happened, and where the condition of the premises had changed in the meanwhile; 89 Mich. 815. In Pennsylvania (act of 1895), in proceedings under eminent domain, either party may require a view of the premises.

Where, on a trial for murder, the jury viewed the locus of the crime, but the accused, at his special request, did not accompany them, the court held that the view was not a part of the trial, and the conviction was affirmed. Authority and reason are said to be the other way; 12 Harv. L. Rev. 212, citing 43 Hun 401; 68 Cal. 623.

See PHYSICAL EXAMINATION.

VIEW OF FRANKPLEDGE. An examination to see if every freeman within the district had taken the oath of allegiance, and found nine freemen pledges for his peaceable demeanor. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 7. It took place, originally, once in each year, after Michaelmas, and subsequently twice, after Easter and Michaelmas, at the sheriff's tourn or court-leet at that season held. See COURT-LEET; SHERIFF'S TOURN.

VIEWERS. Persons appointed by the courts to see and examine certain matters and make a report of the facts, together with their opinion, to the court. In practice, they are usually appointed to lay out roads, and the like.

VIFGAGE. See VADIUM VIVUM.

VIGILANCE. Proper attention in proper time.

The law requires a man who has a claim to enforce it in proper time, while the adverse party has it in his power to defend himself: and if by his neglect to do so he cannot afterwards establish such claim, the maxim vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt acquires full force in such case. See LACHES.

VILL. In England this word was used to signify the parts into which a hundred or wapentake was divided. Fortescue, de Laud. c. 24. See Co. Litt. 115 b. It also signifies a town or city. Barrington, Stat. 133.

VILLAGE. Any small assemblage of houses for dwellings or business, or both, in the country, whether they are situated upon regularly laid out streets and alleys, or not. 27 Ill. 48, approved in 71 id. 569. See 80 Mich. 410; 35 L. R. A. 896, n.; TOWN.

VILLAIN. An epithet used to cast contempt and contumely on the person to whom it is applied. To call a man a villain in a letter written to a third person will entitle him to an action without proof of special damages. 1 B. & P. 331.

VILLEIN (vilis, base or villa, estate). A person attached to a manor, who was substantially in the condition of a slave, who performed the base and menial work upon the manor for the lord, and was, generally, a subject of property and belonging to him. 1 Washb. R. P. 26.

The feudal villein of the lowest order was unprotected as to property, and subject to the most ignoble services. But his circumstances were very different from the slave of the Southern states, for no person was in the eye of the law a villein except as to his master; in relation to all other persons he was a freeman. Littleton, Ten. ss. 189, 190.

VILLEIN IN GROSS. A villein annexed to the person of the lord, and transferable by deed from one person to another. Littleton § 181.

VILLEIN REGARDANT. A villein annexed to the manor or land; a serf.

VILLEIN SOCAGE (Sax. soc, free, or Lat. soca, a plough). The villeins, from living on one piece of land, came at last to be allowed to hold it by tenure of villeinage, e. g. uncertain menial services. These services at last became fixed; the tenure was then called villein socage. 1 Washb. R. P. 26.

VILLEINAGE. See VILLEIN SOCAGE.

VILLENOUS JUDGMENT. In Old English Law. A judgment given by the common law in attaint, or in cases of conspiracy. Its effects were to make the object of it lose his liberam legem and become infamous. He forfeited his goods and chattels, and his lands during life; and this barbarous judgment further required that his lands should be wasted, his houses razed, his trees rooted up, and that his body should be cast into prison. He could not be a juror or witness. 4 Bla. Com. 136.

VINCULO MATRIMONII. See A VINCULO MATRIMONII; DIVORCE.

VINDICTIVE DAMAGES. See DAMAGES; EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

VINTNER. One who sells wine. A covenant prohibiting the trade of a vintner includes a person selling wines not to be drunk on the premises. 25 L. T. N. S. 312.

VIOLATION. An act done unlawfully and with force. In the English statute of 25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 2, it is declared to be high treason in any person who shall violate the king's companion; and it is equally high treason in her to suffer willingly such violation. This word has been construed under this statute to mean carnal knowledge. 3 Inst. 9; Bacon, Abr Treason (E).

VIOLENCE. The abuse of force. That force which is employed against common right, against the laws, and against public liberty. Merl. Répert.

Violence is synonymous with physical force, and the two are used interchangeably, in relation to assaults, by elementary writers on criminal law. 31 Conn. 212. See ASSAULT; ROBBERY.

VIOLENT. Not natural or spontaneous, not intentional, voluntary, expected or usual. 44 Hun 606.

VIOLENT PROFITS. In Scotch Law. The gains made by a tenant holding over are so called. Erskine, Inst. 2. 6. 54.

VIOLENTLY. In Pleading. This word was formerly supposed to be necessary in an indictment, in order to charge a robbery from the person; but it has been holden unnecessary; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law *244. The words "feloniously and against the will," usually introduced in such indictments, seem to be sufficient. It is usual, also, to aver a putting in fear; though this does not seem to be requisite.

VIRGA. An obsolete word, which signifies a rod or staff, such as sheriffs, bailiffs, and constables carry as a badge or ensign of their office. More commonly, spelled verge, q. v. Hence verger, one who carried a white wand before the judges. Toml. A verger now commonly signifies an inferior officer in a cathedral or parish church. Moz. & W.

The stick or wand with which persons are in England admitted as tenants.

VIRGINIA. One of the thirteen original United States.

The name was given to the colony in honor of Queen Elizabeth. In 1606, James I. granted letters patent for planting colonies in Virginia. The government prescribed was that each should have a council, consisting of thirteen persons, appointed by the king, to govern and order all matters according to laws and instructions given them by the king. There was also a council in England, of thirteen persons, appointed by the crown to have the supervising, managing, and direction of all matters that should concern the government of the colonies. This charter was followed by royal instructions dated the 20th November, 1606. See 1 Hening, Va. Stat. 76, 571. Under this charter a settlement was made at Jamestown in 1607, by the first colony. Upon the petition of the company, a new charter was granted by king James, on the 23d May, 1609, to the treasurer and company of the first (or southern) colony for the further enlargement and explanation of the privileges of that company. 1 Hening, Stat. 80.

This charter granted to the company in absolute property the lands extending from Cape or Point Comfort (at the mouth of James River) along the sea-coast two hundred miles to the northward, and from the same point along the sea-coast two hundred miles to the southward, and up into the land throughout, from sea to sea, west and northwest, and, also, all islands lying within one hundred miles of the coast of both seas of the precinct aforesaid. A new council in England was established, with power to the company, to fill all vacancies therein by election.

On the 12th of March, 16$\frac{11}{12}$, king James granted a third charter to the first company, enlarging its domain so as to include all islands within three hundred leagues from its borders on the coast of either sea. In 1612, a considerable proportion of lands previously held and cultivated in common was divided into three-acre lots and a lot appropriated in absolute right to each individual. Not long afterwards, fifty acres were surveyed and delivered to each of the colonists. In 1618, by a change of the constitution of the colony, burgesses elected by the people were made a branch of the legislature. Up to this time the settlement had been gradually increasing in number, and in 1624, upon a writ of quo warranto, a judgment was obtained dissolving the company and revesting its power in the crown. In 1651 the plantation of Virginia came, by formal act, under the obedience and government of the commonwealth of England, the colony, however, still retaining its former constitution. A new charter was to be granted, and many important privileges were secured. In 1680 a change was made in the colonial government, divesting the burgesses of the exercise of judicial power in the last resort, as had before that time been practised by that body and allowing appeals from judgments of the general courts, composed of the governor and council, to the king in council, where the matter in controversy exceeded the value of £300 sterling. Marshall, Col. 168; 1 Campb. 337.

By the treaty of 1763, all the conquests made by the French in North America, including the territory east of the Mississippi, were ceded to Great Britain.

The constitution of the colonial government of Virginia seems never to have been precisely fixed and accurately adjusted in any written memorials that are now accessible. The powers exercised by the burgesses varied at different periods. The periods of their election and the length of time they continued in office it is difficult to ascertain from the records of colonial history, and the qualifications of voters to elect them varied much at different periods. See Rev. Code 38, Leigh's note; 2 Burk, App. 1. On the 12th of June, 1776, a declaration of rights pertaining to the people, as a basis and foundation of government, was adopted by the convention. This declaration still remains a part of the Virginia Code. On the 29th of June, 1776, Virginia adopted a constitution by a unanimous vote of the convention. The Articles of Confederation were not finally adopted by congress until the 15th of November, 1777, and were adopted, subject to the ratification of the states. These articles were laid before the Virginia Assembly on the 9th of December, 1777, and on the 15th unanimously assented to. In compliance with the recommendation of congress, by a resolution of September 6, 1780, Virginia, by an act passed the 2d of January, 1781, proffered a cession of her western lands. The cession was finally completed and accepted in 1784. Virginia as early as 1785 prepared to erect Kentucky into a state, and this was finally affected in June, 1792.

The state constitution framed and adopted by Virginia in 1776 gave way to a second that was framed in convention, adopted by the people, and went into operation in 1830. This second constitution was superseded by a third, which was framed in convention of 1851, and, being adopted by the people, took effect in 1852.

A convention assembled at Alexandria February 13, 1864, composed of delegates from such portions of Virginia as were then within the lines of the Union army and had not been included in the recently formed state of West Virginia. This convention adopted a constitution April 11, 1864, but it was not submitted to the people for ratification. The present constitution of the state was framed by a convention called under the reconstruction act of congress which met at Richmond and completed its labors in 1868. Under the authority of an act of congress approved April 10, 1869, the instrument was submitted to the vote of the people and adopted.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.—The legislative power of the commonwealth is vested in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of delegates. The house of delegates is elected biennially by the voters of the several cities and counties, on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November. Under the terms of the constitution it consists of not more than one hundred nor less than ninety members.

The senators are elected for the term of four years, for the election of whom the counties, cities, and towns shall be divided into not more than forty districts. Under the constitution not less than thirty-three nor more than forty senators are elected.

The general assembly meets, unless oftener convened by the governor, annually, but no session shall continue longer than ninety days without the concurrence of three-fifths of the members.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.—The chief executive power of the commonwealth is vested in a governor. He holds his office for the term of four years, to commence on the first day of January next succeeding his election, and is ineligible to the same office for the term next succeeding that for which he was elected, and to any other office during his term of service.

He has power to remit fines and penalties in such cases and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law; and except when the prosecution has been carried on by the house of delegates, or the law shall otherwise particularly direct, to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction; to remove political disabilities consequent upon conviction for offences committed prior or subsequently to the adoption of this constitution; and to commute capital punishment.

A Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, and for the same term, as the governor; and his qualifications and the manner of his election in all respects are the same.

The lieutenant-governor is president of the senate, but has no vote.

A secretary of the commonwealth, treasurer, and auditor of public accounts are elected by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly, and continue in office for the term of two years unless sooner relieved.

JUDICIARY DEPARTMENT.—The judiciary department consists of a supreme court of appeals, circuit courts, and county courts.

The Supreme Court of Appeals consists of five judges, any three of whom may hold a court. It has appellate jurisdiction only, except in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition. It has no jurisdiction in civil cases where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is less in value or amount than five hundred dollars, except in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land, the bequests of a will, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator, or concerning a mill, roadway, ferry, or landing; or the right of a corporation or of a county to levy tolls or taxes, and except in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition, or the constitutionality of a law. Provided, that the assent of a majority of the judges elected to the bench shall be required to declare any law null and void by reason of its repugnance to the federal constitution or to the constitution of this state. The judges are chosen by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly, and hold their office for twelve years.

Special courts of appeals, to consist of not less than three nor more than five judges, may be formed of the judges of the supreme court of appeals, and of the circuit courts, or any of them, to try any cases remaining on the dockets of the present court of appeals when the judges thereof cease to hold their offices; or to try any cases which may be on the dockets of the supreme court of appeals established by this constitution, in respect to which a majority of the judges of said court may be so situated as to make it improper for them to sit on the hearing thereof; and also to try any cases on the said dockets which cannot be otherwise disposed of with convenient despatch.

When a judgment or decree is reversed or affirmed by the supreme court of appeals, the reasons therefor must be stated in writing, and preserved with the record of the case.

Circuit Courts.—The state is divided into eighteen judicial circuits, which may be increased or diminished by the general assembly. For each circuit a judge is chosen by the joint vote of the two houses of the general assembly, who holds office for a term of eight years. He must possess the same qualifications as a judge of the supreme court of appeals, and reside in the circuit of which he is judge. A circuit court is held at least twice a year by the judges of each circuit.

County Courts.—In each county of the commonwealth there is a county court, held monthly. Counties having less than eight thousand inhabitants are attached to adjoining counties for the formation of districts. These judges are chosen in the same manner as circuit court judges. They hold their office for the term of six years, and during their continuance in office must reside in their district. The county courts have exclusive original jurisdiction of all criminal cases. They have jurisdiction of the probate of wills, appointment of guardians, etc.

VIRILIA (Lat.). The privy members of a man, to cut off which was felony at common law, though the party consented to it. Bract. lib. 3, p. 144.

VIRTUTE OFFICII (Lat.). By virtue of his office. A sheriff, a constable, and some other officers may virtute officii apprehend a man who has been guilty of a crime in their presence.

VIS (Lat. force). Any kind of force, violence, or disturbance relating to a man's person or his property.

VIS IMPRESSA (Lat.). Immediate force; original force. This phrase is applied to cases of trespass when a question arises whether an injury has been caused by a direct force or one which is indirect. When the original force, or vis impressa, had ceased to act before the injury commenced, then there is no force, the effect is mediate, and the proper remedy is trespass on the case.

When the injury is immediate consequence of the force, or vis proxima, trespass vi et armis lies; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3483.

VIS MAJOR (Lat.). A superior force. In law it signifies inevitable accident.

This term is used in the civil law in nearly the same way that the words act of God (q. v.) are used in the common law, but for some purposes it is a wider phrase; 1 C. P. Div. 429. Generally, no one is responsible for an accident which arises from the vis major; but a man may be so where he has stipulated that he would, and when he has been guilty of a fraud or deceit; 2 Kent 448.

A loss by vis major is one that results immediately from a natural cause without the intervention of man, and could not have been prevented by the exercise of prudence, diligence, and care. 17 U. S. App. 526. See UNFORESEEN EVENT; ACT OF GOD; PERIL OF THE SEA.

VISA. In Civil Law. The formula put upon an act; a register; a commercial book, in order to approve of it and authenticate it.

VISCOUNT (Lat. vice-comes). This name was made use of as an arbitrary title of honor, without any office pertaining to it, by Henry VI. for the first time. The sheriff or earl's deputy holds the office of vice-comes, of which viscount is a translation, but used, as we have just seen, in a different sense. The dignity of a viscount is next to an earl. 1 Bla. Com. 397.

VISIT, RIGHT OF. In International Law. A term used on the continent of Europe as synonymous with the right of search (q. v.). See 11 Wheat. 42.

VISITATION. The act of examining into the affairs of a corporation.

The power of visitation is applicable only to ecclesiastical and eleemosynary corporations. 1 Bla. Com. 480. The visitation of civil corporations is by the government itself, through the medium of the courts of justice. See 2 Kent 240. In the United States, the legislature is the visitor of all corporations founded by it for public purposes; 4 Wheat. 518. See SEARCH.

VISITATION BOOKS. Compilations made out or collected by the heralds in the circuits which their commissions authorized them to make, for the purpose of inquiring into the state of families and registering marriages and descents which were verified to them by oath. They are good evidence of pedigree. 3 Bla. Com. 105.

VISITER, or VISITOR. An inspector of the government, of corporations, or bodies politic. 1 Bla. Com. 482.

VISNE. The neighborhood; a neighboring place; a place near at hand; the venue.

The district from which juries were drawn at common law. 36 W. Va. 84.

Formerly the visne was confined to the immediate neighborhood where the cause of action arose, and many verdicts were disturbed because the visne was too large, which becoming a great grievance, several statutes were passed to remedy the evil. The 21 James I. c. 13, gives aid after verdict, where the visne is partly wrong,—that is, where it is warded out of too many or too few places in the county named. The 16 & 17 Charles II. c. 8, goes further, and cures defects of the visne wholly, so that the cause is tried by a jury of the proper county. See VENUE.

VIVA VOCE (Lat. with living voice). Verbally. It is said a witness delivers his evidence viva voce when he does so in open court: the term is opposed to deposition. It is sometimes opposed to ballot: as, the people vote by ballot, but their representatives in the legislature vote viva voce.

VIVARY. A place where living things are kept: as, a park on land; or, in the water, as a pond.

VIVISECTION. No person employed in any school, except medical or dental schools in the State of Washington, shall practise vivisection upon any vertebrate animal in the presence of any pupil, or any child or minor, nor, in such presence, exhibit any vertebrate animal upon which vivisection has been practised. And the dissection of dead animals shall be confined to the class-room and the presence of these pupils engaged in the study to be illustrated thereby, the penalty is by fine of not less than fifty nor more than one hundred dollars. Act, February 17, 1897.

In Massachusetts, by the act of March 22, 1894, vivisection in the public schools is prohibited, and dissection is confined to certain classes, under penalty of a fine.

In England, by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 77, public exhibitions of vivisection are forbidden, and stringent rules are given under which it may be done for the benefit of science if the subject is under the influence of some anæsthetic.

VIVUM VADIUM. See VADIUM VIVUM.

VOCATIO IN JUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. According to the practice in the legis actiones of the Roman law, a person having a demand against another verbally cited him to go with him to the prætor: in jus eamus; in jus te voco. This was denominated vocatio in jus. If a person thus summoned refused to go, he could be compelled by force to do so, unless he found a vindex,—that is, procurator, or a person to undertake his cause. When the parties appeared before the prætor, they went through the particular formalities required by the action applicable to the cause. If the cause was not ended the same day, the parties promised to appear again at another day, which was called vadimonium.

VOCIFEROUS. In a statute forbidding the use of loud and vociferous language, making a loud outcry; clamorous; noisy. Webst.; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 859.

VOID. That which has no force or effect. This word is often used as in effect meaning "voidable" only; 110 Ind. 202; and is seldom, unless in a very clear case, to be regarded as implying a complete nullity, but is to be taken in a legal sense, subject to a large qualification in view of all the circumstances calling for its application and the rights and interest to be affected in a given case; 50 N. H. 552. See 50 Mo. 287. In formal instruments it has been held to mean voidable; 4 B. & Ald. 401; 4 Bing. N.C. 395; and in contracts of infants; 14 Ir. C. L. 61. The distinction between void and voidable transactions is a fundamental one, though it is often obscured by carelessness of language. An act or agreement void from the beginning has no legal effect at all except so far as any party to it incurs penal consequences. A voidable act on the contrary takes its full and proper legal effect unless, and until it is disputed, and set aside by some tribunal entitled so to do; Poll. Contr. 8. A voidable contract has been defined to be such an agreement as that one of the parties is entitled at his option to treat as never having been binding on him; id. 9. As applied to contracts the distinction between the terms void and voidable is often one of great practical importance, and wherever technical accuracy is required, the term void can only be properly applied to such contracts as are a mere nullity and incapable of ratification or confirmation; 6 Metc. 417. Agreements to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors are not void but merely voidable against the creditors, while valid between the parties; Pom. Contr. § 282.

The distinction between contracts which are illegal and those which are void has never been precisely worked out, but where a contract is merely void, its defect in this respect cannot affect collateral transactions otherwise in themselves valid, while an unlawful purpose taints collateral and innocent transactions; 7 L. Quart. Rev. 339. The general rule of law is that a contract made in violation of a statute is void; 145 U. S. 426, and cases cited. Contracts which are void at common law, because they are against public policy, like contracts prohibited by statute, are illegal as well as void; 150 Mass. 1. An illegal contract is as a rule not merely voidable but void, and can be the basis of no judicial proceeding. See ULTRA VIRES.

Among the contracts made illegal by statute are: those relating to usury; 5 Johns. Ch. 122; gaming contracts (see GAMING); wager contracts (see WAGER); those which tend to promote champerty and maintenance (q. v.), or those compounding felonies or suppressing public prosecution of criminals; 3 P. Wms. 276. See 31 Am. L. Rev. 19, as to the validity of contracts of foreign corporations, where by statute they are prohibited from doing business in the state.

A contract binding the maker to do something opposed to the public policy of the state or nation, or which conflicts with the wants, interest, or prevailing sentiment of the people, or our obligations to the world, or is repugnant to the morals of the times, is void, however solemnly the same may be made; Greenh. Pub. Pol. Rule II., citing 30 Maine 402; 17 Vt. 105; and though made in another country where its validity is undoubted; L. R. 14 Ch. D. 351 (see LEX LOCI). The assignor of a contract has no better rights therein than the party to it, even if he had no notice of its illegality; 127 Mass. 123.

Among those contrary to public policy and illegal at common law are contracts in restraint of marriage or of trade, or of bidding at public auctions, or relating to marriage brokerage, to hinder legislation, whether public or private (see LOBBYING), or to promote the appointment of a party to an office, to influence public elections to office, or to remunerate officers in addition to their lawful fees for acts which they are bound to do by virtue of their office or to assign fees and profits of official positions requiring personal supervision (see OFFICER); or any contract involving the sale of personal influence; 103 U. S. 276; 66 Fed. Rep. 427; a contract by a mother surrendering her child to a charitable institution; 6 Dist. Rep. Pa. 256; contracts where the consideration is the commission of some crime or some flagrantly immoral act (see CONSIDERATION); Pom. Contr. § 283. See the various subjects enumerated for cases. As to the effect of war upon contracts, see WAR.

As to particular cases, see the several titles upon the subjects involved.

VOIDABLE. See VOID.

VOIR DIRE. A preliminary examination of a witness to ascertain whether he is competent.

When a witness is supposed to have an interest in the cause, the party against whom he is called has the choice to prove such interest by calling another witness to that fact, or he may require the witness produced to be sworn in his voir dire as to whether he has an interest in the cause or not; but the party against whom he is called will not be allowed to have recourse to both methods to prove the witness's interest. If the witness answers he has no interest, he is competent, his oath being conclusive; if he swears he has an interest, he will be rejected.

Though this is the rule established beyond the power of the courts to change, it seems not very satisfactory. The witness is sworn on his voir dire to ascertain whether he has an interest which would disqualify him, because he would be tempted to perjure himself if he testified when interested. But when he is asked whether he has such an interest, if he is dishonest and anxious to be sworn in the case, he will swear falsely he has none, and, his answer being conclusive, he will be admitted as competent; if, on the contrary, he swears truly he has an interest, when he knows that will exclude him, he is told that for being thus honest he must be rejected. A suitable inquiry is permissible in order to ascertain whether a juror has any bias and this must be conducted under the supervision of the court and be largely left to its sound discretion. There is no objection in not allowing a juror to be asked as to his political affiliations and whether they would bias his judgment, in the absence of any statement tending to show a special reason for asking; 158 U. S. 408; a juror may be asked whether he is a member of certain secret societies; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1110; or has ever belonged to "the committee of 100"; 158 U. S. 408. The court may assume an exclusive examination of jurors, though it is the better practice to allow counsel to examine; 17 So. Rep. (Fla.) 284.

See 1 Dall. 375; INTEREST; JURY.

VOLUNTARY. Willingly; done with one's consent; negligently. Wolff § 5.

To render an act criminal or tortious, it must be voluntary. If a man, therefore, kill another without a will on his part while engaged in the performance of a lawful act, and having taken proper care to prevent it, he is not guilty of any crime. And if he commit an injury to the person or property of another, he is not liable for damages, unless the act has been voluntary or through negligence; as, when a collision takes place between two ships without any fault in either. 2 Dods. Adm. 83; 3 Hagg. Adm. 320, 414.

When the crime or injury happens in the performance of an unlawful act, the party will be considered as having acted voluntarily.

VOLUNTARY ASSIGNMENT. See VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE; 22 Neb. 514.

VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE. A conveyance without any valuable consideration.

Voluntary conveyances are discussed most frequently with reference to the statutes 13 Eliz. c. 5 (for the protection of creditors) and 27 Eliz. c. 4 (for the protection of subsequent purchasers). A voluntary conveyance, however, is not within these statutes unless it is fraudulent; Cowp. 434. And as between the parties a voluntary conveyance is generally good.

In determining whether a voluntary conveyance is fraudulent and within the stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5, a distinction is made between existing (or previous) and subsequent creditors. An existing creditor, so called, is one who is a creditor at the time of the conveyance; and it was at one time held that, as against him, every voluntary conveyance by the debtor is fraudulent; 8 Wheat. 229; without regard to the amount of the debts, the extent of the property in settlement, or the circumstances of the debtor; 3 Johns. Ch. 500; but this rule is now subject to great modifications both in England and in the United States; see 1 Am. L. Cas. 37–40; and the conclusion to be drawn from the more recent cases is that the whole question depends in great measure on the ratio of the debts, not so much to the property the debtor parts with, as to that which he retains; 24 Pa. 511; 2 Beav. 344; 4 Drew. 632. A subsequent creditor is one who becomes a creditor after the conveyance, and, as against him, a voluntary conveyance is not void unless actually fraudulent; 1 Am. L. Cas. 40; but there is great diversity in the definition of the fraud of which he may avail himself; see 3 De G. J. & S. 293; L. R. 5 Ch. Ap. 518; 3 Johns. Ch. 501; 39 Pa. 499; 9 W. N. C. (Pa.) 353.

Whenever a voluntary conveyance is made, a presumption of fraud properly arises upon the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 4, which presumption may be repelled by showing that the transaction on which the conveyance was founded virtually contained some conventional stipulations, some compromise of interests, or reciprocity of benefits, that point out an object and motive beyond the indulgence of affection or claims of kindred, and not reconcilable with the supposition of intent to deceive a purchaser. But, unless so repelled, such a conveyance, coupled with a subsequent negotiation for sale, is conclusive evidence of statutory fraud.

The principles of these statutes, though they may not have been substantially reenacted, prevail throughout the United States. General reference may be made to Hunt, Fraud. Conv.; May, Stats. of Eliz.; Bump, Fraud. Conv.; Note to Twyne's Case, 1 Sm. L. Cas. (cases to 1879 discussed in 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 137); Note to Sexton v. Wheaton, 1 Am. L. Cas.; Story, Eq. Jurisp. §§ 350–436.

VOLUNTARY DEPOSIT. See DEPOSIT.

VOLUNTARY ESCAPE. See ESCAPE.

VOLUNTARY EXPOSURE TO UNNECESSARY DANGER. Where the insured was shot when unarmed, in the course of an altercation, it was held that there could be recovery, though the insured may have been the aggressor, if he had no reason to believe that his opponent was armed. The court held that the test was whether the assured "had voluntarily or intentionally done some act which reasonable prudence would have pronounced dangerous and in which death had followed as a consequence;" 40 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 1080. Where a party going home at night voluntarily left other and safe paths of travel and used a dangerous railway trestle; 80 Ga. 541; and where the assured sat down on a railway track when an engine moving toward him was only 25 feet away; 133 N. Y. 366; and where the assured jumped in the dark from a freight train in rapid motion; 94 Wis. 180; the exception in the policy was held to apply. But it must be shown that there is on the part of the insured some degree of consciousness of the danger which results in the accidental death of the insured; 92 Tenn. 167; 58 Wis. 13; 84 id. 389; 126 Mo. 104; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 485. See also 102 Pa. 262.

A voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger implies a conscious, intentional exposure, something of which one is conscious but willing to take the risk. By taking a policy against accident one naturally understands that he is to be protected against accident resulting in whole or in part from his own inadvertence. The phrase means something more than contributory negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of the assured: 62 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 807. The phrase is not the entire equivalent of ordinary negligence; a degree of consciousness of danger is necessary; 92 Tenn. 167. See INSURANCE.

VOLUNTARY JURISDICTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. That kind of jurisdiction which requires no judicial proceedings: as, the granting letters of administration and receiving the probate of wills.

VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER. See MURDER; MANSLAUGHTER; HOMICIDE.

VOLUNTARY NONSUIT. In Practice. The abandonment of his cause by a plaintiff, and an agreement that a judgment for costs be entered against him. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3306.

VOLUNTARY SALE. See SALE.

VOLUNTARY WASTE. See WASTE.

VOLUNTEERS. Persons who receive a voluntary conveyance.

It is a general rule of the courts of equity that they will not assist a mere volunteer who has a defective conveyance. Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 5, s. 2; and see the note there for some exceptions to this rule. See, generally, 1 Madd. 271; 1 Supp. to Ves. Ch. 320; 2 id. 321; Powell, Mortg.

In Military Law. Persons who, in time of war, offer their services to their country and march in its defence.

One who freely enlists in the place of another, and becomes his substitute of his own free will and accord, is a volunteer within the spirit and intent of the statutes; 43 Barb. 239. See MILITIA.

VOTE. Suffrage; the voice of an individual in making a choice by many. The total number of voices given at an election; as, the presidential vote.

In a viva voce election for a public officer, a voter cannot change his vote, once made, after subsequent votes have been made and recorded; 37 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 155.

In cumulative voting the voter must put opposite the name of the candidate on whom he intends to cumulate something to indicate the number of votes he intends to cast for him, in default of which he will be taken to have cast but a single vote for the candidate against whom he has made a mark, although he has marked but a few names or only one; [1897] 1 Q. B. 449.

See ELECTION; BALLOT; SUFFRAGE; VOTER.

VOTER. One entitled to a vote; an elector. The right to fix the qualifications of voters is in the states, except so far as it is limited by the 15th amendment to the constitution of the United States, which provides that the right of the citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The qualifications of voters are similar in all the states, but not uniform. They have been summarized as follows: 1. Citizenship, either by birth or naturalization; 2. Residence for a given period of time in the state, county, and voting precinct; 3. Age, the limit is twenty-one years in all the states; 4. The payment of taxes, in some states, and in many states, registration; 5. Freedom from infamy, of having committed an infamous crime; 6. Freedom from idiocy or lunacy; McCrary, Elect. § 4. Residence means actual settlement within the state; 23 Colo. 99. See also 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 780. The legislature cannot require a longer residence for voters at primary elections than the constitution prescribes for voters at elections "authorized by law," which term includes primary elections; 41 L. R. A. (Cal.) 196. A person who is capable of transacting the ordinary business of life, even though laboring under some hallucination or delusion, unless it be shown to extend to political matters, cannot be denied the privilege of voting on the ground of want of mental capacity; 88 Ill. 499.

VOTING MACHINE. In Rhode Island, upon the application of the governor, the justices gave an opinion that a statute authorizing the use of a voting machine would be constitutional. 19 R. I. 729. Rogers, J., dissenting. The New York constitution does not interfere with the existing legislation authorizing the use of voting machines. See 150 N. Y. 242.

VOTING TRUST. A term applied to the accumulation in a single hand or in a few hands of shares of corporate stock belonging to several or many owners in order, thereby, to control the business of the company. In some instances the certificates are placed in the hands of a single holder or of a committee, accompanied by irrevocable proxies to vote on them. In other instances the stock is placed in the name of such committee. Certificates are usually issued to the beneficial owners of the stock, and these certificates are bought and sold in the market. It has been held that all agreements to tie up stocks by irrevocable proxies or by placing them in the hands of trustees are illegal, and any beneficial owner may withdraw his stock from them at pleasure; 35 Hun 641; 43 N. Y. Sup. 506; 84 Ala. 608; whether he be a party to the agreement or an assignee of the stock of such party; 60 Conn. 553; 65 Hun 606; 52 N. J. Eq. 178; 6 Co. Ct. R. Pa. 193.

An agreement not to sell stock except by consent of all parties to the agreement is held to be in restraint of trade and void; 35 Hun 461. It has, however, been held that an agreement among the stockholders to hold the stock together and to sell it together is valid; 11 Jones & Sp. 507.

A by-law which provides that if any stockholder shall desire to dispose of his stock, he shall give written notice to the president, and that the stockholders shall then have the option to purchase it at the price named, with an option to the corporation to purchase if the other stockholders decline, is a restraint on the power of alienation and void; 34 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 1127.

Where stock is transferred to a trustee under a contract by which he agrees to hold and vote it for the benefit of two other persons and himself jointly, to dispose of it when and as agreed upon by himself and one of the other parties, the other parties have no such title or right of possession thereof as would give either of them a right of action against the trustee for conversion upon his refusal to transfer to such party one-third of the stock; 75 Fed. Rep. 62.

Where a statute forbade a consolidation of competing lines, the purchase by a railroad company of the stock of a competing line which was then vested in a third party as trustee, was held void and the trustee was enjoined from voting thereon; 50 Fed. Rep. 388.

Where stock was vested in a trustee under an agreement that it was to remain with such trustee for four years, certain stockholders agreeing not to sell their holdings without first offering them to the remaining parties to the agreement, and the trustee holding an irrevocable power of attorney to vote the stock, it was held that the trust agreement was not void per se, and that as long as the beneficial owners did not make any effort to withdraw from the trust there was no reason why the trustee should not vote upon it; 5 Blatch. 525.

The holders of a majority of the stock of a railroad company agreed that it should be vested in the name of the president of another railroad company, who should deliver to an appointee of the directors of the company in question an irrevocable proxy to vote upon such stock; certificates were issued to the stockholders who were parties to the agreement. Certain parties purchased a minority of the trust certificates and requested the return of the stock, which was refused. The court enjoined the trustee from voting on the stock and compelled a transfer to the beneficial owners thereof, holding that the right was vested in the latter and the trustee could not lawfully refuse it to them; 14 Wkly. L. Bull. (Ohio) 68. See 15 id. 419, 423. See also 30 Fed. Rep. 91, substantially to the same effect.

In the Reading railroad trust, reported in 47 Leg. Int. (Phila. C. P.) 26, on the reorganization of the company, certain securities and stock were vested in a reconstruction board under a voting trust, by which certificates of beneficial interest were issued. On a bill by a stockholder to restrain the trustees from voting upon the stock held by them at an election soon to occur, an injunction was refused because the interests were too complicated to permit of interference upon such short notice. The court (Hare, P. J.) was of opinion that the voting trust was necessary to sustain and carry out the provisions of the reorganization and that the voting trustees represented not only the stock but the other securities and liens on the property, under the reorganization.

In 12 So. Rep. 723, the court was of opinion that the cases in which voting trusts were considered illegal were based rather upon the ground of the unlawful purpose for which they were created than upon their intrinsic illegality, and it reached substantially the same result as the Reading railroad case cited above.

Where certain stock was deposited by various stockholders with a firm of bankers for the purpose of arranging differences between preferred and common stockholders and to aid in the adjustment of the affairs of the company generally, it was held that such depositary was entitled to vote on such stock; 49 Ohio St. 669.

See 44 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 413, where a form of certificate is given and the cases are collected by Charles H. Burr, Jr., who finds a definite formulation of conclusions to be impossible.

VOUCHEE. In common recoveries, the person who is called to warrant or defend the title is called the vouchee. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2093.

VOUCHER. In Accounts. An account-book in which are entered the acquittances or warrants for the accountant's discharge. Any acquittance or receipt which is evidence of payment or of the debtor's being discharged. See 3 Halst. 299; 8 N. J. L. 299; 1 Metc. Mass. 218. A merchant's books are the vouchers of the correctness of his accounts and a receipt is voucher of payment, but neither is conclusive. 12 Abb. Pro. 202.

When used in connection with the disbursement of money, voucher means a written or printed instrument in the nature of a bill of particulars, account, etc., which shows on what account and by what authority a particular payment has been made. 54 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 866; 107 Ill. 495.

In Old Conveyancing. The person on whom the tenant to the præcipe calls to defend the title to the land, because he is supposed to have warranted the title to him at the time of the original purchase.

The person usually employed for this purpose is the crier of the court, who is therefore called the common voucher. See Cruise, Dig. tit. 36, c. 3, s. 1; 22 Viner, Abr. 26; RECOVERY.

VOUCHER TO WARRANTY. The calling one who has warranted lands, by the party warranted, to come and defend the suit for him. Co. Litt. 101 b.

VOYAGE. In Maritime Law. The passage of a ship upon the seas from one port to another, or to several ports. The term includes the enterprise entered upon and not merely the route. 113 Mass. 326. Where a loss was occasioned whilst loading the cargo, it was held to be during the voyage; L. R. 15 P. D. 203.

Every voyage must have a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem. When the insurance is for a limited time, the two extremes of that time are the termini of the voyage insured. When a ship is insured both outward and homeward, for one entire premium, this, with reference to the insurance, is considered but one voyage, and the terminus a quo is also the terminus ad quem; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 7, s. 1–5. As to the commencement and ending of the voyage, see RISK.

The voyage, with reference to the legality of it, is sometimes confounded with the traffic in which the ship is engaged, and is frequently said to be illegal only because the trade is so; but a voyage may be lawful, and yet the transport of certain goods on board the ship may be prohibited; or the voyage may be illegal, though the transport of the goods be lawful; Marsh. Ins. b. 1, c. 6, s. 1. See DEVIATION.

In the French Law, the voyage de conserve is the name given to designate an agreement made between two or more sea-captains that they will not separate in their voyage, will lend aid to each other, and will defend themselves against a common enemy or the enemy of one of them in case of attack. This agreement is said to be a partnership. 3 Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 656; 4 id. 984; 20 Toullier, n. 17.

VULGO CONCEPTI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Bastards whose father was unknown. Leg. 53, ff. de statu hominum. Those, also, whose fathers, though known, could not lawfully be recognized as such: viz., the offspring of incest and adultery. Code Civ. 3. 7. 1.

W.

WADSET. In Scotch Law. The old term for a mortgage. A right by which lands or other heritable subjects are impignorated by the proprietor to his creditor in security of his debt. Like other heritable rights, it is protected by seisin.

Wadsets are commonly made out in the form of mutual contracts, in which one party sells the land and the other grants the right of reversion. Erskine, Inst. 2. 8. 1. 2.

Wadsets are proper, where the use of the land shall go for the use of the money; improper, where the reversor agrees to make up the deficiency; and where it amounts to more, the surplus profit of the land is applied to the extinction of the principal. Erskine, Inst. 2. 8. 12. 18.

WAGE. To give a pledge or security for the performance of anything: as, to wage or gage deliverance, to wage law, etc. Co. Litt. 294. This word is but little used.

WAGER. A bet; a contract by which two parties or more agree that a certain sum of money, or other thing, shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening or not happening of an uncertain event. See 85 Tenn. 572; 75 Ill. 560.

A contract upon a contingency by which one may lose but cannot gain, or the other can gain but cannot lose, is a wager; 15 Gratt. 653; but there must be a risk by both parties; 5 Humph. 561. In 1 Bosw. 207, it was said: "A wager is something hazarded on the issue of some uncertain event; a bet is a wager, though a wager is not necessarily a bet."

At common law, wagers were not, per se, void; 2 Term 610; 37 Cal. 670; 3 McLean 100; 25 Tex. 586. By an English statute passed in 1845, wagers were prohibited, and similar statutes have been passed in many of the states. See Dos Passos, St. Br. 409; MARGINS.

Where a contract is a mere device to avoid the statute, it is illegal, but the burden of proving its illegality is upon the defendant; 70 N. Y. 202; and the intention of the parties is for the jury; 20 E. L. & E. 290; 72 Pa. 155. See 48 Ill. App. 89; 89 Pa. 250.

The principle which determines whether the sale of stocks is a wagering contract, is that a bona fide contract to buy and sell will be sustained, but where there is no actual sale and the transaction is to be settled by the payment of differences it will be set aside; 79 Ill. 338; Dos Passos, St. Br. 410: even where the principals may not be able to enforce the contract and the broker through whom the transaction is made is ignorant of their intention, he may recover for money paid out in commissions: id. 410; contra, 119 Mo. 126; the same principle applies to contracts for the sale and delivery of grain; 52 Wis. 593; and indeed to any contract for the sale or purchase of any personal property to be delivered at a future date, which is intended by both parties as a wager on the rise and fall of prices and to be settled by payment of differences; 85 Tenn. 572, 581; 38 Fed. Rep. 635; 46 Ohio St. 951; 85 Ky. 280; 131 U. S. 336; 38 Mo. App. 383; see 82 Fed. Rep. 833; but an agrement to sell grain for future delivery is not necessarily a gambling transaction; 37 Neb. 766.

A purchase, with an option to the seller to deliver on a certain day, is not a wager; 79 Ill. 351; 47 Minn. 228; and the usage allowing merchants to settle such contracts by "differences" does not necessarily render such contracts void: Gresham, J., in 12 Chic. L. N. 241. See 41 Fed. Rep. 174. Margins advanced to brokers on contracts made to be settled on differences may be recovered; 43 Ill. App. 439. Contracts of sales for future delivery are subject to the same principle; they are valid if there is a bona fide intention to deliver, even if the seller is not the owner of the property sold, at the time of the contract; 74 La. 468; 34 Mo. App. 302; otherwise they are void; 11 Fed. Rep. 193; 54 Mo. App. 606; 47 Minn. 228; see 77 Md. 504; 36 Ill. App. 179; but where purchases and sales are actually completed by delivery to the holder, who obtained the money to pay advances by hypothecating the stock, the transactions are valid; [1895] A. C. 318. See a note in 33 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 436. A case varying from the general rule that where accounts are to be settled by differences, the transaction is a gambling one, confines it to cases where neither party expects any delivery at any time and holds the transaction valid if the final balance is to be by delivery, though intermediate balances were otherwise settled; 88 Me. 230. The law looks at the intention of the parties, which is a fact for the jury, and oral evidence may be given of the circumstances, without respect to the form of the transaction; 47 Fed. Rep. 574; but a transaction which on its face is legitimate cannot be held void as a wagering contract by showing that one party only so understood and meant it to be. The proof must go further and show that this understanding was mutual; 149 U. S. 481. See Dos Passos, St. Br. 477. See also OPTION; FUTURES; MARGIN.

It has been held that contracts between the purchaser of futures and a broker, made without the state, though valid where made, could not be enforced in the state where it was invalid by statute; 71 Miss. 514; the same principle applies to notes given in settlement of gambling transactions; 155 Ill. 617. Where a note which was delivered to a broker to secure him against loss in stock transactions was transferred to an innocent purchaser without notice, equity would not compel its return, because given for a gambling debt; 173 Pa. 525; and a mortgage securing advances for margins on a contract for future delivery was held valid where the advances were made in good faith to save loss; 32 Fed. Rep. 833; but the original payee cannot recover on a note, for money advanced upon or in execution of a contract of wager, to which he is a party or direct participant in the name of or on behalf of the parties; 131 U. S. 336. See 25 App. Div. N. Y. 228.

The English statute prohibiting the recovery of money, etc., deposited to abide the event of a wager, applies only to a deposit as the stake to abide the event of a wager and not to deposits as security for the observance by the loser, of the terms of the wagering contract, and the authority to return the latter may be revoked and the securities recovered at any time before their appropriation; [1891] 2 Q. B. 329.

If all options were prohibited, all conditional contracts would have to be prohibited. See Dr. Wharton's note to 11 Fed. Rep. 193; also 70 N. Y. 202.

When one loses a wager and gets another to pay the money for him, an action lies for the recovery of the money; 15 C. B. N. S. 316; but see 97 Pa. 202, 298. So it is said that where an agent advances money to his principal to pay losses incurred in an illegal transaction, the contract between them, made after the illegal contract is closed, is binding; 2 Woods 554. See 98 Mass. 161. Where a broker sued his principal for advances and commissions on the purchase of property, it was held that the fact that persons from whom the broker bought the property for his principal had not the goods on hand when the contract was made, and that they had no reasonable expectation of acquiring them except by purchase, did not defeat the broker's right to recover; 14 Bush 727. See, also, 5 M. & W. 462.

See Biddle, Stock Brokers; Lewis, Stocks; article by Dr. Wharton in 3 Cr. L. Mag. 1, on Political Economy and Criminal Law.

Wagers on the event of an election laid before the poll is open; 1 Term 56; 4 Johns. 426; 4 H. & McH. 284; or after it is closed; 8 Johns. 147, 454; are unlawful. See McCreary, Elect. § 149. And wagers are against public policy if they are in restraint of marriage; 10 East 29; if made as to the mode of playing an illegal game; 2 H. Bla. 43; 1 N. & M'C. 180; or on an abstract speculative question of law or judicial practice, not arising out of circumstances in which the parties have a real interest; 12 East 247. But see 1 Cowp. 37.

Wagers, though on indifferent subjects, are inconsistent with good morals, and as such, are void, as against public policy; 23 Or. 419.

Wagers as to the sex of an individual; Cowp. 729; or whether an unmarried woman had borne or would have a child; 4 Camp. 152; are illegal, as necessarily leading to painful and indecent considerations. Every bet about the age, or height, or weight, or wealth, or circumstances, or situation of any person, is illegal; and this, whether the subject of the bet be man, woman, or child, married or single, native or foreigner, in this country or abroad; 1 Rawle 42. And it seems that a wager between two coach-proprietors, whether or not a particular person would go by one of their coaches, is illegal, as exposing that person to inconvenience; 1 B. & Ald. 683.

In the case even of a legal wager, the authority of a stakeholder, like that of an arbitrator, may be rescinded by either party before the event happens. And if, after his authority has been countermanded and the stake has been demanded, he refuse to deliver it, trover or assumpsit for money had and received is maintainable; 1 B. & Ald. 683. And where the wager is in its nature illegal, the stake may be recovered, even after the event, on demand made before it has been paid over; 4 Taunt. 474. But see 12 Johns. 1; 29 Neb. 812; 9 Colo. 212. Where the stakeholder of a wager void as between the parties is notified by one of them not to pay over the money to his adversary, even after the result of the event has become known, but before payment has been made, he cannot defeat an action by such party for its recovery; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 293; 48 Mo. App. 319. See STAKEHOLDER; MARGIN; HORSE RACE.

WAGER OF BATTLE. A superstitious mode of trial, at one time common throughout Christendom, introduced into England by William the Conqueror.

It was resorted to in three cases only: in the court martial or court of chivalry; in appeals of felony and upon approvements; and upon issue joined in a writ of right. Co. Litt. § 294. On appeals parties fought in their own proper persons, on a writ of right by their champions. But if the appellant or approval were a woman, a priest, an infant, or of the age of sixty, or lame or blind, or a peer of the realm, or a citizen of London; or if the crime were notorious; in such cases wager of battel might be declined by the appellant or approver. But where the wager of battel was allowed, the appellee pleaded not guilty, and threw down his glove, declaring he would defend the same with his body. The appellant took up the glove, replying that he was ready to make good his appeal, body for body. Thereupon the appellee, taking the Bible in his right hand, and in his left the right hand of his antagonist, swore to this effect: "Hear this, O man, whom I hold by the hand, who callest thyself John by the name of baptism, that I, who call myself Thomas by the name of baptism, did not feloniously murder thy father, William by name, nor am anywise guilty of the said felony; so help me God and the saints; and this I will defend against thee by my body, as this court shall award." The appellant replied with a like oath, declaring also that the appellee had perjured himself. Then followed oaths by both parties against amulets and sorcery as follows: "Hear this, ye justices, that I have this day neither eat, drank, nor have upon me neither bones, stones, nor grass, nor any enchantment, sorcery, or witchcraft, whereby the law of God may be abased, or the law of the devil exalted; so help me God and his saints." The battle was then begun; and if the appellee were so far vanquished as not to be able or willing to fight any longer, he was adjudged to be hanged immediately; but if he killed the appellant, or could maintain the fight from sunrising till the stars appeared in the evening, he was acquitted. Also if the appellant became recreant, and pronounced the word craven, he lost his liberam legem, and became infamous (see CRAVEN), and the appellee recovered his damages, and was forever quit of any further proceedings for the same offence. The proceedings in wager of battel in a writ of right were similar to the above except that the battle was by champions. It was the only mode of determining a writ of right until Henry II. introduced the grand assize, q. v. The prevalence of judicial combats in the Middle Ages is attributed by Mr. Hallam to systematic perjury in witnesses, and want of legal discrimination on the parts of judges. Mos. & W. It was not abolished in England till the enactment of stat. 59 Geo. III. c. 46. See 1 B. & Ald. 405; 3 Bla. Com. 339; 4 id. 347; APPEAL. This mode of trial was not peculiar in England. The emperor Otho, 983, held a diet at Verona, at which several sovereigns and great lords of Italy, Germany, and France were present. In order to put a stop to the frequent perjuries in judicial trials, this diet substituted in all cases, even in those which followed the course of the Roman law, proof by combat for proof by oath. Henrion de Pansey, Auth. Judic. Introd. c. 3. And for a detailed account of this mode of trial see Herbert, Inns of Court 119. The last case in which the right was asserted was Ashton vs. Thornton, 1 B. & Ald. 405, where Lord Ellenborough declared that it was part of the general law of the realm and must be enforced, no matter how much disapproved. See Wills, Circ. Ev. 290, for a detailed statement of the facts. At the next session of the British parliament an act was passed to abolish appeals of murder, treason, felony, or other offences, and wager of battel, or joining issue or trial by battel, in writs of right. 59 Geo. III. c. 46. In the Statutes of South Carolina, Edition of 1857, it is said to be in existence in that state. For the history of this species of trial, see 3 Bla. Com. 337; 4 id. 347; Encyclopédie, Gage de Bataille; Steph. Pl. 122, and App. note 35. The Laws Lumber Room, by Francis Watt.

WAGER OF LAW. In Old Practice. An oath taken by a defendant in an action of debt that he does not owe the claim, supported by the oaths of eleven neighbors.

When an action of debt is brought against a man upon a simple contract, and the defendant pleads nil debet, and concludes his plea with this plea, with this formula, "And this he is ready to defend against him the said A B and his suit, as the court of our lord the king here shall consider," etc., he is then put in sureties (vadios) to wage his law on a day appointed by the judge. The wager of law consists in an oath taken by the defendant on the appointed day, and confirmed by the oaths of eleven neighbors or compurgators. This oath had the effect of a verdict in favor of the defendant, and was only allowed in the actions of debt on simple contract, and detinue; nor was it allowed to any one not of good character. In consequence of this privilege of the defendant, assumpsit displaces debt as a form of action on simple contracts, and instead of detinue, trover was used. But in England wager of law was abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 13. And even before its abolition it had fallen into disuse. It was last used as a method of defence in 2 B. & C. 538, where the defendant offered to wage his law, but the plaintiff abandoned the case. This was in 1824. If it ever had any existence in the United States, it is now completely abolished; 8 Wheat. 642.

The name (in law Latin, vadiatio legis) comes from the defendant's being put in pledges (vadios) to make his oath on the appointed day. There was a similar oath in the Roman law, and in the laws of most of the nations that conquered Rome. It was very early in use in England, as Glanville distinctly describes it. Glanville, lib. 1. c. 9, 12. See Steph. Pl. 124, 250; Co. 2d Inst. 119; 3 Chitty, Pl. 497; 12 Viner, Abr. 58; Bac. Abr. For the origin of this form of trial, see Steph. Plead. notes XXXIX.; Co. Litt. 294, 295; 3 Bla. Com. 341.

See OATH DECISORY.

WAGER POLICY. One made when the insured has no insurable interest. See INSURABLE INTEREST; POLICY.

WAGES. A compensation given to a hired person for his or her services. See MASTER AND SERVANT; SEAMEN; STORE ORDERS.

WAGON. A common vehicle for the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise of all descriptions. The term does not include a hackney coach; 5 Cal. 418; but a "buggy" is a wagon; 7 Kan. 325; contra, 27 Mo. 507; as is a hearse, within the meaning of an exemption law; 65 Wis. 431.

WAIFS. Stolen goods waived or scattered by a thief in his flight in order to effect his escape.

Such goods, by the English common law, belong to the king; 1 Bla. Com. 296; 5 Co. 109; Cro. Eliz. 694. This prerogative has never been adopted here against the true owner, and never put in practice against the finder, though against him there would be better reason for adopting it; 2 Kent 292.

WAINAGIUM (Sax. woeg, Lat. regina). That which is necessary to the farmer for the cultivation of his land. Barrington, Stat. 12; Magna Charta, c. 14. According to Selden and Lord Bacon, it is not the same as contenementum, used in the same chapter of Magna Charta, meaning the power of entertaining guests or, countenance, as common people say.

WAITING CLERKS IN CHANCERY. It was the duty of these officers to wait in attendance on the court of chancery. The office was abolished in 1842.

WAIVE. A term applied to a woman as outlaw is applied to a man. A man is an outlaw; a woman is a waive. Crabb, Tech. Dict.

To abandon or forsake a right.

To abandon without right: as, "if the felon waives, that is, leaves any goods in his flight from those who either pursue him, or are apprehended by him so to do,—he forfeits them, whether they be his own goods, or goods stolen by him." Bac. Abr. Forfeiture (B).

WAIVER. The relinquishment or refusal to accept of a right. Cited 4 Misc. Rep. 58.

The intentional relinquishment of a known right with both knowledge of its existence and an intention to relinquish it. 32 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 689. See 32 Conn. 40; 143 Mass. 374; 76 Va. 314; 105 U. S. 359.

In practice, it is required of every one to take advantage of his rights at a proper time; and neglecting to do so will be considered as a waiver. If, for example, a defendant who has been misnamed in the writ and declaration pleads over, he cannot afterwards take advantage of the error by pleading in abatement; for his plea amounts to a waiver. Failure of counsel, either in brief or oral argument, to allude to an assignment of error, is a waiver thereof; 72 Fed. Rep. 508.

In seeking for a remedy, the party injured may, in some instances, waive a part of his right and sue for another: for example, when the defendant has committed a trespass on the property of the plaintiff by taking it away, and afterwards he sells it, the injured party may waive the trespass and bring an action of assumpsit for the recovery of the money thus received by the defendant; 1 Chitty, Pl. 90. A delay of two years in bringing an action in rem on a maritime lien, the vessel meantime having passed into other hands, is a waiver of the lien; 84 Fed. Rep. 830; but when objections are seasonably and appropriately made there can be no waiver; 116 Ind. 578; and mere indulgence or silent acquiescence in the failure to perform is never construed into a waiver, unless some element of estoppel can be invoked; id.

In contracts, if, after knowledge of a supposed fraud, surprise, or mistake, a party performs the agreement in part, he will be considered as having waived the objection; 1 Bro. P. C. 289.

When a constitutional provision is designed for the protection solely of the property rights of the citizen, it is competent for him to waive the protection, and to consent to such action as would be invalid if taken against his will; Cooley, Const. Lim. 219. See 3 N. Y. 511; 6 Hill 147. In criminal cases this doctrine must be true only to a very limited extent; Cooley, Const. Lim. 220. See JURY.

As to what will amount to a waiver of a forfeiture, see 1 Conn. 79; 7 id. 45; 1 Johns. Cas. 125; 14 Wend. 419; 8 Pick. 292; 2 N. H. 120, 163; 1 Ohio 21; CONDITION.

WAKENING. In Scotch Law. The revival of an action.

An action is said to sleep when it lies over, not insisted on for a year, in which case it is suspended. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 33. With us a revival is by scire facias.

WAND OF PEACE. In Scotch Law. The wand which the messenger carries along with his blazon, in executing a caption, and with which he touches the prisoner. A sliding along this staff of a movable ring, or the breaking of the staff, is a protest that the officer has been resisted or deforced. Bell, Dict. Imprisonment.

WANTED. In a statute for condemning land, "wanted" for the construction of a railroad, does not mean desired, but is synonymous with necessary. 80 Ky. 267. The term is frequently used to mean need or require. 34 Conn. 403.

WANTON AND FURIOUS DRIVING. An offence against public health, which under the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 56, is punishable as a misdemeanor by fine or imprisonment. In this country the offence is usually provided for by state, county, or municipal legislation.

WANTONLY. Done in a licentious spirit, perversely, recklessly, without regard to propriety or the rights of others; careless of consequences, and yet without settled malice. 98 N. C. 641; 97 id. 465; 35 Fed. Rep. 282.

WANTONNESS. A licentious act by one man towards the person of another, without regard to his rights: as, for example, if a man should attempt to pull off another's hat against his will, in order to expose him to ridicule, the offence would be an assault, and if he touched him it would amount to a battery. See 94 N. C. 888.

WAPENTAKE (from Sax. wapen, i. e. armatura, and tac. i. e. tactus). A Saxon court held monthly by the alderman for the benefit of the hundred.

It was called a wapentake from wapon, arms, and tac, to touch; because when the chief of the hundred entered upon his office he appeared in the field on a certain day, on horseback, with a pike in his hand, and all the principal men met him with lances. Upon this he alighted, and they all touched his pike with their lances, in token of their submission to his authority. In this court causes of great moment were heard and determined, as Mr. Dugdale has shown from several records. Besides which it took cognizance of theft, trials by ordeal, view of frankpledge, and the like; whence after the conquest it was called the sheriff's tourn, and, as regarded the examination of the pledges, the court of the view of frankpledge. These pledges were no other than the freemen within the liberty, who, according to an institution of King Alfred, were mutually pledged for the good behavior of each other. Fortescue, de Laud. c. 24; Dugdale, Orig. Jur. 27; 4 Bla. Com. 273. Sir Thomas Smith derives it from the custom of taking away the arms at the muster of each hundred, from those who could not find sureties for good behavior. Rep. Angl. lib. 2, c. 16.

WAR. An armed contest between nations. Grotius, de Jur. Bell. l. 1, c. 1. The state of nations among whom there is an interruption of all pacific relations, and a general contention by force, authorized by the sovereign. Mann. Comm. 98; 1 Kent *61, n. (h.).

An armed contest to maintain the rights of a nation or to bring about a settlement of its disputes with other nations. It is also defined as a hostile contest with armies between two or more states claiming sufficient rights. Snow, Lect. Int. L. 82.

A civil war is one confined to a single nation. It is public on the part of the established government, and private on the part of the people resisting its authority, but both the parties are entitled to all the rights of war as against each other, and even as respects neutral nations; Wheat. Int. L. § 296.

The right of making war belongs in every civilized nation to the supreme power of the state. The exercise of this right is regulated by the fundamental laws in each country, and may be delegated to its inferior authorities in remote possessions, or even to a commercial corporation. A contest by force between independent sovereign states is called a public war. If it is declared in form, or duly commenced, it entitles both the belligerent parties to all the rights of war against each other. A formal declaration of war to the enemy was once considered necessary to legalize hostilities between nations. The Romans declared war with religious ceremony; and an invasion without a declaration was unlawful; 1 Kent *53. The present usage is to publish a manifesto within the territory of the state declaring war, announcing the existence of hostilities and the motives for commencing them, usually to warn neutral states; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 82. A civil war is never declared; Boyd's Wheat. Int. L. § 294. It dates from the time the insurgents are declared belligerents; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 82. Even where there is a formal declaration of war, there is said to be strong tendency to date the war from the first act of hostility; id. That the recent tendency is to consider a declaration of war desirable and necessary, see 28 Am. L. Rev. 754. Since the time of Bynkershoek it has been the settled practice in Europe that war may lawfully exist by a declaration which is unilateral, or without a declaration on either side; it may begin by mutual hostilities; 1 Kent 54; at least as to subjects of a belligerent state; L. R. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 390; but some public act should be done to announce to the people a state of war, and to apprise neutrals of its existence; 1 Halleck, Int. Law, Baker's ed. 542. A state of war may exist without any formal declaration of it by either party, and this is true of both civil and foreign war; 2 Black 635. A state of civil war exists whenever the regular course of justice is interrupted by insurrection; id.

The war between Great Britain and the United States was a civil war until the declaration of independence, when it became a public war between independent governments; 3 Dall. 199, 224. So the late war of secession in this country was a civil war after the president's proclamation of August 16, 1861. See 37 Ga. 482; 28 Am. L. Reg. 129; SECESSION. The general doctrines applicable to the subjects of belligerent natives have been held to be applicable to the hostile parties in that war; 2 Black 635. In a civil war the sovereign has belligerent as well as sovereign rights against his rebel subjects, and may exercise either at his discretion; 2 Wall. 419; 100 Mass. 576.

The constitution of the United States (art. 1, sec. 8) provides that congress shall have power to declare war. See 2 Wall. 404; 11 id. 268, 331. An act of congress is necessary to the commencement of a foreign war and is in itself a declaration; 1 Kent 55. It fixes the date of the war; Thayer, Const. Cas. 2352. After congress has acted, it is not necessary to communicate the action to the enemy; 1 Kent 55; but an Indian war may exist without act of congress; 28 Ct. of Cl. 147. Actual hostilities may determine the date of the commencement of a war; a formal proclamation is unnecessary; 87 Fed. Rep. 927.

Belligerent states not infrequently adopt the rule of reciprocity in the conduct of war, but this usage has not yet assumed the character of a positive law. Frequently an opposing belligerent applies the rule of reciprocity and metes out to his adversary the same measure of justice that he receives from him. But it is said that where one belligerent exceeds his extreme rights and becomes barbarous and cruel in his conduct, the other should not, as a general thing, follow and retort upon its subjects by treating them in like manner; 2 Halleck, Int. Law 35.

Under the regulations of the United States, the army is not allowed to use the enemy's flag or uniform for purposes of deceit, but the navy may use a foreign flag to deceive the enemy if it is hauled down before a gun is fired; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 82. See WEAPONS; FLAG.

When war exists between two nations, every individual of the one is at war with every individual of the other; though it is said that modern international law has attempted, with some success, to confine the contest to the armies of the contesting powers and relieve non-combatants from loss and suffering as much as possible; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 82.

War gives this government full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found in the United States, and while the humane policy of modern times may have mitigated this rigid rule, it cannot impair the right itself; 8 Cra. 110. The right to take enemy's property found in the United States requires an act of congress; id., Story, J., diss. This rule applies to the property of a neutral within the enemy's lines; 97 U. S. 60; but it was held in 3

Wall. 419, that the right to take the property of an enemy on land is substantially restricted "to special cases dictated by the necessary operations of the war;" "the seizure of private property of pacific persons for the sake of gain is excluded." See 143 U. S. 356.

A belligerent may, by express law or edict, confiscate the property or even the land of an alien enemy, within its territory or occupation; 6 Wall. 759; 100 Mass. 574.

The right of a belligerent to confiscate debts due by its subjects to enemy's subjects is usually recognized, but seldom exercised; 1 Kent *62; and this is more especially true in relation to the public debt of a belligerent state to an enemy's subject; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 535. The seizure by the United States of enemy's property on land cannot be authorized by the law of nations; it can be upheld only by an act of congress; 5 Blatch. 231. Vessels and cargo belonging to trading concerns in the enemy's country, or corporations organized under its laws, are subject to capture, regardless of the domicil of the partners or stockholders; 87 Fed. Rep. 927.

A belligerent has a right to seize and retain as prisoners of war all subjects of an enemy state found within its territory; but this right has usually been modified by treaty, usage, or municipal regulations, and is seldom enforced; 1 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 530.

Territory conquered during a war is part of the domain of the conqueror for all commercial and belligerent purposes, so long as he continues in possession; 9 Cra. 191; but it is not incorporated into the domain of the conqueror except by a treaty of peace under which the former owner renounces it, or by long possession; 2 Gall. 485.

It is a general practice to permit alien residents to remain in the country during a war and to protect their property from seizure, or, if they return to their own state, to allow them to take it with them. Even property of the enemy found afloat in ports at the breaking out of the war is usually allowed safe conduct to a home port with time to finish loading cargo. The president's proclamation of April 26, 1898, fixed April 21 as the beginning of the Spanish war, and gave Spanish merchant vessels found in United States ports till May 21, inclusive, to load and depart with safe conduct to their destination, except vessels carrying military or naval officers, or coal in excess of their own needs, or contraband, or despatches; and permitted any such vessels which, prior to April 21, had sailed from any foreign port to any United States port, to reach their destination, unload, and return to any port not blockaded.

Congress declared on April 25, 1898, that a state of war had existed from and after April 21, 1898, and this fixed the latter date as the beginning of that war: 87 Fed. Rep. 925.

War suspends all commercial intercourse between the citizens of belligerent states, except so far as may be allowed by the sovereign authority. The only exceptions are contracts for ransom and other matters of absolute necessity and the payment of debts to an agent of an alien enemy where such agent resides in the same state with the debtor; but even such payments to an agent of an alien enemy must not be done with a view of transmitting the funds to the principal during the continuance of war; 95 U. S. 429.

The doctrine of the renewal of contracts suspended by a war is based on considerations of equity and justice and cannot be invoked to revive a contract which it would be inequitable to revive, as where time is of the essence of the contract or the parties cannot be made equal; 93 U. S. 24. In a learned opinion by Gray, J., in 100 Mass. 57 (quoted with approval in 95 U. S. 429, and 169 U. S. 72), it was said:—

"The result is, that the law of nations, as judicially declared, prohibits all intercourse between citizens of the two belligerents which is inconsistent with the state of war between their countries, and that this includes any act of voluntary submission to the enemy, or receiving his protection; as well as any act or contract which tends to increase his resources: and every kind of trading or commercial dealing or intercourse, whether by transmission of money or goods, or orders for the delivery of either, between the two countries, directly or indirectly, or through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form looking to or involving such transmission, or by insurances upon trade with or by the enemy. Beyond the principle of these cases the prohibition has not been carried by judicial decision. The more sweeping statements in the text-books are taken from the dicta which we have already examined, and in none of them is any other example given than those just mentioned. At this age of the world, when all the tendencies of the law of nations are to exempt individuals and private contracts from injury or restraint in consequence of war between their governments, we are not disposed to declare such contracts unlawful as have not been heretofore adjudged to be inconsistent with a state of war."

The trading or transmission of property or money which is prohibited by international law during war, is from or to one of the countries at war. An alien enemy residing in this country may contract and sue as a citizen can; 100 Mass. 573. Where a creditor, though the subject of the enemy, remains in the country of the debtor, or has an agent there, payment to the creditor or his agent is not a violation of the duties imposed by a state of war upon the debtor; id.

The breaking out of a war does not necessarily and as a matter of law revoke every agency: it depends upon the circumstances and the nature of the agency; 169 U. S. 73. A contract of agency of an insurance company is revoked; 95 id. 425, citing 93 id. 24. In order to the subsistence of an agency during the war, it must have the assent of the parties; 95 id. 429.

Contracts between parties within the Confederacy made during the civil war were valid; 143 id. 346.

War suspends the capacity of an alien enemy to sue in our courts; 7 Cra. 603; 2 Paine 639. But see 4 Am. L. T. 68. An assignee of an alien enemy cannot sustain a claim in a prize court; 1 Gall. 563; but an alien enemy may come into admiralty and defend his property seized as prize on the high seas; 5 Blatch. 231. The right to proceed in an action begun before the war is only suspended; Woolw. 102. Neither interest nor the statute of limitations run during a war.

As to the effect of war on life insurance contracts, the authorities vary; that the failure to pay premiums avoids the policy, see 93 U. S. 24; 95 id. 425; that the contract is not annulled by war, but only suspended, see 7 Bush 179; 37 N. J. L. 444; 20 Gratt. 614; 9 Blatch. 234; 45 Miss. 581. In most of the latter cases either the insured had made a tender of the premiums or the company's agent had removed during the war; 1 Biddle, Ins. § 489. There seems to be authority that a fire insurance policy is not annulled by war; see 9 Heisk. 399; as to a marine policy, see 50 N. Y. 619. And see, generally, 23 Am. L. Reg. 129; 25 id. 651; 11 Am. L. Rev. 221; 1 Biddle, Ins. § 489.

No civil liability attached to officers or soldiers for an act done in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare, in the late rebellion under and by military authority of either party; 131 U. S. 405. The legal condition of a Confederate soldier was that of a soldier serving against the United States under a hostile power. His legal condition subsequent to May, 1865, was that of a prisoner of war upon parole; 23 Ct. Cls. 326.

The following has recently been adjudicated in cases arising out of the Spanish-American war:

Vessels of war have the right, in the absence of any declaration of exemption by the political power, to capture enemy's property wherever found afloat, and the burden is on the claimant to show that it comes within the exemption of any such proclamation; 87 Fed. Rep. 927.

Cargo shipped from this country in an enemy's vessel to residents of a neutral country is presumably neutral cargo; but if so shipped to the enemy's country it is presumptively enemy's property, but the latter presumption may be overcome; id.

WAR CLAIMS. As to federal legislation on this subject, see 163 U. S. 344. The act of 1875, Feb. 18, provided that the court of claims should have no jurisdiction over claims growing out of the destruction of property during the civil war; and the act of March 3, 1887, excludes such claims from the jurisdiction of the said court and of the district and circuit courts. Decisions under the act of 1864 will be found in 163 U. S. 253, which holds that the court of claims has no jurisdiction over a claim for railroad iron appropriated by the army "while suppressing the rebellion." The United States is not responsible for the destruction of private property by their military operations during the civil war, committed by either army; nor, where they rebuilt the property (a railroad bridge), can it recover from the owner for the cost; 120 U. S. 227. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

WAR OFFICE. In England. A department of state from which the sovereign issues orders to his forces. Whart. Lex.

WARD. An infant placed by authority of law under the care of a guardian.

While under the care of a guardian, a ward can make no contract whatever binding upon him, except for necessaries. When the relation of guardian and ward ceases, the latter is entitled to have an account of the administration of his estate from the former. During the existence of this relation the ward is under the subjection of his guardian, who stands in loco parentis. See GUARDIAN.

The English Judicature Act of 1873 assigns the wardship of infants and the care of infants' estates to the chancery division of the high court of justice. Whart. Lex.

A subdivision of a city to watch in the daytime, for the purpose of preventing violations of the law. It is the duty of all police officers and constables to keep ward in their respective districts. It now indicates a subdivision of a city.

WARD IN CHANCERY. An infant who is under the superintendence of the chancellor. See WARD; COURT OF CHANCERY.

WARD-HOLDING. In Old Scotch Law. Military tenure by which lands were held. It was so called from the yearly tax in commutation of the right to hold vassals' lands during minority. It was abolished in 1747. Bell, Dict.

WARDEN. A guardian; a keeper. This is the name given to various officers: as, the warden of the prison, the wardens of the port of Philadelphia, church-wardens. As to the latter, see Baum, Church Law.

WARDEN OF THE CINQUE PORTS. See CINQUE PORTS.

WARDMOTE (from ward, and Sax. mote, or gemote, a meeting).

In English Law. A court held in every ward in London, with power to inquire into and present all defaults concerning the watch and police doing their duty, that engines, etc., are provided against fire, that persons selling ale and beer be honest and suffer no disorders, nor permit gaming, etc., that they sell in lawful measures, and searches are to be made for beggars, vagrants, and idle persons, etc., who shall be punished. Chart. Hen. II.; Cunningham; Wharton.

WARDSHIP. In English Law. The right of the lord over the person and estate of the tenant, when the latter was under a certain age.

Wardship was incident to a tenure by knight's service (see FEUDAL LAW), and to a tenure in socage; by the latter the nearest relation to whom the inheritance could not descend was entitled to the custody of the person and estate of the heir till he attained the age of fourteen years; at which period the wardship ceased, and the guardian was bound to account. Wardship in copyhold estates partook of that in chivalry and that in socage. Like the former, the lord was the guardian; like the latter, he was required to account. 2 Bla. Com. 67, 87, 97; Glanville, lib. 7, c. 9; Grand Cout. c. 33; Reg. Maj. c. 42.

WAREHOUSE. A place adapted to the reception and storage of goods and merchandise. 22 Me. 47.

A radical change was made in the revenue laws of the United States by the establishment, under the act of congress of Aug. 6, 1846, of the warehousing system. This statute is commonly called the Warehousing Act. Its evident object is to facilitate and encourage commerce by exempting the importer from the payment of duties until he is ready to bring his goods into market; 13 How. 295. Previous to the passage of that act, no goods chargeable with cash duties could be landed at the port of delivery until the duties were paid at the port of entry. The importer had no right to land them anywhere until they had passed through the custom-house. Before that act, the only provisions existing in relation to the warehousing of goods were merely applicable to special cases, such as where the vessel in which the goods were imported was subject to quarantine regulations, or where the entry might have been incomplete, or the goods had received damage, or where a landing was compelled at a port other than the one to which the vessel was destined, on account of distress of weather or other necessity, or in case of the importation of wines, etc.

The warehousing system was extended by the establishment of private bonded warehouses. Act of Mar. 28, 1854, R. S. §§ 2964, 2965.

Merchandise arriving at certain ports, destined for certain other ports, may be shipped to destination in bond without appraisement and liquidation of duties. See 2 Supp. R. S. 3, note.

Where warehouses are situated in a state, and their business carried on therein exclusively, a state statute prescribing regulations for their governance is not unconstitutional, it being a matter of purely domestic concern, and even where their business affects interstate as well as state commerce, such a statute can be enforced until congress acts in reference to their interstate relations; 94 U. S. 113.

Goods stored in a United States bonded warehouse on which duties remain unpaid are in possession of the United States, and an order directing a warehouseman to deliver them to a vendee, even though accepted by the warehouseman, does not constitute a constructive or symbolical delivery, or a receipt or an acceptance of the goods sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds; 2 Sawy. 428.

Every distiller of spirits shall provide a warehouse on his distillery premises to be used only for storage of distilled spirits of his own manufacture under an internal revenue storekeeper and to be considered a bonded warehouse of the United States; R. S. § 3271 et seq.

The word "warehouse," when used alone, means a bonded warehouse; 154 U. S. 51, 87.

See POLICE POWER; RATES; WAREHOUSEMAN.

WAREHOUSEMAN. A person who receives goods and merchandise to be stored in his warehouse for hire. He is not a guarantor of the title of property placed in his custody, although his receipts therefor are by statute negotiable; 103 U. S. 352.

He is bound to use ordinary care in preserving such goods and merchandise, and his neglect to do so will render him liable to the owner; 1 Esp. 315; Story, Bailm. § 444; 12 Johns. 232; 2 Wend. 593; 2 Ala. 284; 13 Fed. Rep. 69; 115 Mass. 332; 20 Hun 438; 70 Ill. 121; 85 Ind. 201. The warehouseman's liability commences as soon as the goods arrive and the crane of the warehouse is applied to raise them into the warehouse: 4 Esp. 262. See 102 N. C. 390; 51 Barb. 148. He cannot have possession of another man's property, with its accompanying duties and responsibilities forced upon him against his will; 45 N. J. Eq. 50.

Warehousemen have a lien on property left in their custody, for their hire, labor, and services; 1 Esp. 109; 7 W. & S. 466; Jones, Liens § 967; being due on all goods stored under a single contract; 53 Fed. Rep. 401; though in some cases this lien has been looked upon only as specific, and not general; 13 Ark. 446. See Story, Bailm. 452; 3 Kent § 635; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 465. A warehouseman cannot recover storage for property stored for a certain time for a definite sum, where it is destroyed within the time, without his negligence; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 635; 36 Hun 194; but under a custom to collect charges when the goods are ordered out, their accidentally burning will not release the owner from paying storage; 15 S. Rep. (Ala.) 143. Grain delivered to a warehouseman upon the agreement that it may be mixed with other of like grade, and held for the owner is a bailment not a sale; 38 Ill. App. 98.

A statute requiring warehousemen operating public elevators to insure grain at their own expense is valid; 158 U. S. 391. See WHARFINGER; RATES.

Warehouse Receipts. Receipts given by a warehouseman for chattels placed in his possession for storage purposes. 40 Ill. 320. They are not in a technical sense negotiable instruments, but have been made so in many of the states by special statute; 2 Ames, Bills & N. 782. It has been held, that, even where no statute has been enacted on this subject, inasmuch as these instruments have come to be considered the representatives of property, and an assignment is equivalent to the delivery of property, the warehouseman is estopped, as against an assignee for value without notice, to set up facts or agreements contradictory to their terms; 14 Cent. L. J. 432 (Tenn.). In order that receipts should be construed as warehouse receipts the special statutes on the subject must be strictly complied with; 9 Biss. 396; 101 U. S. 557. The holder of such receipts takes the same title to the goods as if the goods themselves had been delivered to him; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 303 (Ky.). See 43 Wisc. 267; 78 Ga. 574; 6 Colo. 356; 11 Or. 277.

See LIEN; BILL OF LADING; RATES; IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

WARRANDICE. In Scotch Law. A clause in a charter of heritable rights, by which the grantor obliges himself that the right conveyed shall be effectual to the receiver. It is either personal or real. A warranty. Erskine, Inst. 2. 3. 11.

WARRANT. A writ issued by a justice of the peace or other authorized officer, directed to a constable or other proper person, requiring him to arrest a person therein named, charged with committing some offence, and to bring him before that or some other justice of the peace.

Warrant and commission, outside of naval technicality, are synonymous words. There is no difference in force between a commission and a warrant as used in the navy, except that one recites that the appointment is made by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and the other does not. Both are signed by the president; 18 Ct. Cls. 543.

A bench-warrant is a process granted by a court, authorizing a proper officer to apprehend and bring before it some one charged with some contempt, crime, or misdemeanor. See BENCH-WARRANT.

A search-warrant is a process issued by a competent court or officer authorizing an officer therein named or described to examine a house or other place for the purpose of finding goods which it is alleged have been stolen. See SEARCH-WARRANT.

Under the English Extradition Act of 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 52, § 26, a warrant is defined as "any judicial document authorizing the arrest of a person accused or convicted of crime." 51 L. J. Q. B. 419; 9 Q. B. D. 93.

A warrant should regularly bear the hand and seal of the justice, and be dated. It should contain a command to the officer to make a return thereof and of his doings thereon. But the want of such a command does not excuse him from the obligation of making a proper return; 3 Cush. 438. And it is no ground for discharging a defendant that the warrant does not contain such a command; 2 Gray 74. No warrant ought to be issued except upon the oath or affirmation of the witness charging the defendant with the offence; 3 Binn. 88. A warrant will not justify the arrest of one not named therein, by reason of the fact that the name used was supposed to be his; 153 U. S. 78. It is competent to show that the affidavit was not filed until after the arrest; 136 Ind. 105. Under a statute authorizing a habeas corpus to determine the identity of the person arrested, the inquiry may embrace the sufficiency of the papers; 15 Misc. Rep. 303. In England a person riding a bicycle without a light at night cannot be arrested or even stopped to ascertain his name and address, without a warrant; [1897] 2 Q. B. 452.

The reprehensible practice of issuing blank warrants, which once prevailed in England, was never adopted here. 2 Russ. Cr. 512; Ld. Raym. 546; 1 H. Bla. 13. See SEARCH-WARRANT; ARREST.

WARRANT OF ATTORNEY. An instrument in writing, addressed to one or more attorneys therein named, authorizing them, generally, to appear in any court, or in some specified court, on behalf of the person giving it, and to confess judgment in favor of some particular person therein named, in an action of debt, and usually containing a stipulation not to bring any writ of error, or file a bill in equity, so as to delay him.

This general authority is usually qualified by reciting a bond which commonly accompanies it, together with the condition annexed to it, or by a written defeasance stating the terms upon which it was given and restraining the creditor from making immediate use of it. In form, it is, generally, by deed; but it seems it need not necessarily be so; 5 Taunt. 264. This instrument is given to the creditor as a security. Possessing it, he may sign judgment, without its being necessary to wait the termination of an action. See 14 East 576; 2 Term 100.

A warrant of attorney given to confess a judgment is not revocable, and notwithstanding a revocation, judgment may be entered upon it; 2 Ld. Raym. 766. 860. The death of the debtor is, however, generally speaking, a revocation; Co. Litt. 52 b.

In Pennsylvania, judgment may be entered by the prothonotary on such a warrant without the intervention of an attorney; 4 Sm. L. 278; the instrument must show on its face the amount due, unless it can be rendered certain by mere calculation; 73 Pa. 354. The general power ceases with the entry of judgment; 8 Johns. 361; 9 Minn. 55; contra, 1 Me. 257; 18 Wis. 575.

The virtue of a warrant of attorney is spent by the entry of one judgment, and a second judgment entered on the same warrant is irregular; 6 S. & R. 296; 3 Wash. C. C. 558. See POWER OF ATTORNEY.

WARRANTEE. One to whom a warranty is made. Sheppard, Touchst. 181.

WARRANTIA CHARTÆ. An ancient and now obsolete writ which was issued when a man was enfeoffed of land with warranty and then he was sued or impleaded in assize or other action, in which he could not vouch or call to warranty.

It was brought by the feoffor pending the first suit against him, and had this valuable incident, that when the warrantor was vouched, and judgment passed against the tenant, the latter obtained judgment simultaneously against the warrantor, to recover other lands of equal value. 2 Rand. 141, 156; 11 S. & R. 115.

WARRANTOR. One who makes a warranty. Shepp. Touchst. 181.

WARRANTY. In Insurance. A stipulation or agreement on the part of the insured party, in the nature of a condition.

An express warranty is a particular stipulation introduced into the written contract by the agreement of the parties.

An implied warranty is an agreement which necessarily results from the nature of the contract: as, that the ship shall be seaworthy when she sails on the voyage insured.

An express warranty usually appears in the form of a condition, expressed or directly implied in the phraseology of the policy, stipulating that certain facts are or shall be true, or certain acts are or shall be done by the assured, who by accepting the insurance ratifies the stipulation.

Where the stipulation relates wholly to the future, it is a promissory condition or warranty; 1 Phill. Ins. § 754.

An express warranty must be strictly complied with; and the assured is not permitted to allege, in excuse for non-compliance, that the risk was not thereby affected, since the parties have agreed that the stipulated fact or act shall be the basis of the contract; 1 Phill. Ins. § 755; unless compliance is rendered illegal by a subsequent statute; id. § 769. All reasonable doubts as to whether statements inserted in or referred to in an insurance policy are warranties or representations should be resolved in favor of the assured; 58 Ark. 528; 51 N. J. L. 175.

A breach of warranty vitiates the insurance, though the insured made the warranty without knowledge of its falsity; 131 N. Y. 485; 48 Mo. App. 1; 20 U. S. App. 337; 9 L. R. Q. B. 328.

The doctrine of the divers warranties and conditions in the different species of insurance has been the subject of a great mass of jurisprudence: viz.—

In fire policies, with reference to assignments of the insured property, or the policy; 17 N. Y. 424, 509; 6 Gray 160; 30 Pa. 311; 26 Conn. 165; 25 Ala. 355; 78 Ia. 216; 64 Miss. 1; conformity to charter; 32 N. Where an application for life insurance is to be treated as a warranty it is to that extent a part of the policy; 75 Fed. Rep. 637. A warranty that the insured will not die by his own hand is valid; id. 637.

In marine policies, with reference to assignments; 33 La. 338; contraband trade; 43 Me. 460; other insurance; 17 N. Y. 401; seaworthiness; 3 Ind. 23; 1 Wheat. 399; 1 Binn. 592; 1 Johns. 241; 7 Pick. 259; 4 Mas. 439; 1 Camp. 1; 2 B. & Ald. 320; 5 M. & W. 414; Roccus, n. 22; 85 Me. 215; 124 U. S. 405; 136 id. 408; suspension of risk; 3 Gray 415; title; 19 N. Y. 179.

Waiver of the right to insist upon the performance of a condition may occur under a policy of this description; as, of the condition relative to assignment; 32 N. H. 95; or answers to questions; 7 Gray 261; or distance of buildings; 6 Gray 175; going out of limits; 33 Conn. 244; additional insurance; 1 Ind. App. 411; limitation of action; 14 N. Y. 253; 142 Pa. 332; offer of arbitration; 6 Gray 192; payment of premium or assessment; 25 Conn. 442; 38 Me. 439; 31 Pa. 488; proof of loss; 21 Mo. 81; seaworthiness; 37 Me. 137; title; 35 N. H. 328; 33 Me. 362. An insurance company cannot set up a forfeiture for a condition broken, against one whom its conduct has induced to believe that such provision would not be insisted upon; 134 Ill. 588; so an insurer is estopped to set up a breach of a warranty written by its agent for an illiterate person; 117 N. Y. 310; or made by the error of the agent; 79 Fed. Rep. 245.

A clause in a policy of insurance against fire, that nothing but a distinct specific agreement clearly expressed and indorsed on the policy shall operate as a waiver of any printed or written condition, warranty, or restriction thereon, is construed to refer to those conditions which enter into and form a part of the contract of insurance, and not to these stipulations which are to be performed after a loss has occurred, such as giving notice and furnishing preliminary proof of loss; 36 Ind. 102; May, Ins. 626.

See DEVIATION; POLICY; REPRESENTATION; SEAWORTHINESS.

In Sales of Personal Property. A warranty is an express or implied statement of something which a party undertakes shall be part of a contract, and, though part of the contract, collateral to the express object of it. Benj. Sales § 600. See 60 N. Y. 450.

An express warranty is one by which the warrantor covenants or undertakes to insure that the thing which is the subject of the contract is or is not as there mentioned: as, that a horse is sound; that he is not five years old.

Where there is an express warranty on the sale of goods to be delivered, the buyer is not estopped by accepting the goods; but he can retain the same, stand on his warranty, and recover for the breach. See 81 Wis. 399.

To create an express warranty, the word "warrant" need not be used, nor are any particular words necessary; 75 Cal. 556.

An implied warranty is one which, not being expressly made, the law implies by the facts of the sale. Cro. Jac. 197.

In general, there is no implied warranty of the quality of the goods sold; 2 Kent 374; Co. Litt. 102 a; 1 Pet. 317; 1 Johns. 274; 4 Conn. 428; 18 Pick. 59; 72 Pa. 229; 4 Hayw. 227; especially in cases of a specific chattel already existing which the buyer has inspected; 4 M. & W. 64; 42 N. H. 165.

But where a chattel is to be made or supplied to the order of the purchaser, there is an implied warranty that it is fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used, or for which it has been specially made; Benj. Sales § 645; 53 N. Y. 515; 37 Neb. 68; 50 Mo. App. 121; 21 Or. 289. Thus where a party conveyed a ship to another by deed, but at the time of the conveyance the ship was ashore in a wrecked and ruinous condition, it was held that there was an implied warranty that the article conveyed should be a ship, and not a mere "bundle of timber"; 3 M. & W. 390. Another exception is in the sale of goods by sample. There is a warranty that their quality is equal to the sample; 13 Mass. 139; 3 Rawle 37; 44 N. Y. 289; 64 Hun 634; 73 Ia. 712; but a sale of goods by sample only binds the vendor to supply goods equal to sample, and not goods fit for a particular purpose; 37 S. C. 7. See SAMPLE. An implied warranty may also result from the usage of a particular trade; 2 Disney 482; 4 Taunt. 847. In a sale by description of goods not inspected by the buyer, there is an implied warranty that the goods are salable or merchantable; 24 Wisc. 508; 21 Ia. 508; 53 N. Y. 518; 4 Camp. 144; 76 Ga. 629; 16 Or. 381: but see 28 Me. 212: and an express warranty of quality excludes any implied warranty that the articles sold are merchantable or fit for their intended use; 134 U. S. 306. It has been held that words of description constitute a warranty that the articles sold are of the quality and description so described; 11 Pick. 99; 3 Rawle 28; but the better opinion has been said to be that the words of description constitute not a warranty of the description, but a condition precedent to the seller's right of action, that the thing which he offers to deliver, or has delivered, should answer the description; 4 M. & W. 39. Where the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment to supply him an article, there is an implied warranty that the article will suit the desired purpose; 2 M. & G. 279; Benj. Sales § 661. Finally, it is said that that there is always an implied warranty in sales of provisions for household use; 18 Pick. 57; 18 Mich. 51; 50 Barb. 116. But see Benj. Sales § 670.

In the sale of commercial paper without indorsement or express assumption of liability on the paper itself, the contract of sale and the obligations which arise from it as between vendor and vendee are governed by the common law relating to the sale of goods and chattels; and the undoubted rule is that in such a sale the obligation of the vendor is not restricted to the mere question of forgery vel non, but depends on whether he has delivered that which he contracted to sell, this rule being designated in England as a condition of the principal contract, and in this country being generally termed an implied warranty of identity of the thing sold; 163 U. S. 385.

The rule of the civil law was that a fair price implied a warranty of quality; Dig. 21. 2. 1. This rule has been adopted in Louisiana; 1 La. Ann. 27; and in South Carolina; 1 Bay 324. There may be an implied warranty as to character; 13 Mass. 139; 2 Harr. & G. 495; 20 Johns. 304; 4 B. & C. 108; and even as to quality, from statements of the seller; 40 Me. 9; 24 Barb. 549. See 2 Misc. Rep. 295.

A purchaser may examine an article and exercise his judgment upon it, and at the same time protect himself by a warranty; 158 Mass. 178; but if he elects not to accept the property as not answering the warranty, there is no duty imposed upon either party thereafter to make further tests or experiments to see whether the property complies with the warranty; 9 U. S. App. 550.

It is settled that in an executory agreement the vendor warrants, by implication, his title to the goods which he promises to sell, and that in the sale of an ascertained specific chattel, an affirmation by the vendor that the chattel is his is equivalent to a warranty of title, and that this affirmation may be implied from his conduct as well as his words. It is further said that the present rule in England is, in the absence of such implication or affirmation, that the sale of a personal chattel implies an affirmation by the vendor that the chattel is his, and, therefore, he warrants the title, unless it be shown by the facts and circumstances of the sale that the vendor did not intend to assert ownership, but only to transfer such interest as he might have in the chattel sold; Benj. Sales §§ 627, 639.

As to the goods in the possession of the vendor, there is an implied warranty of title; but where the goods sold are in possession of a third party at the time of the sale, then there is no such warranty; 36 Me. 501; 28 Miss. 772; 2 Kent 478; 8 Mont. 380; 25 Neb. 360; 39 Kan. 365; 47 Minn. 500; 122 Pa. 7; contra, 3 Term 58; 17 C. B. N. s. 708.

An implied warranty of quality exists in cases of the sale of food provisions on grounds of public policy, but the exception is limited to sales for immediate consumption; 78 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 163; 145 Mass. 439; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 210. See 18 N. Y. L. J. (Feb. 18, 1898).

A vendor knowing he has no title, and concealing the fact from the vendee, is liable on the ground of fraud; Benj. Sales § 627.

Antecedent representations, made as an inducement to the buyer, but not forming part of the contract when concluded, are not warranties; it is not, however, necessary that the representation should be made simultaneously with the bargain, but only that it should enter into it; 15 C. B. 130; Benj. Sales § 610. No special form of words is necessary to constitute a warranty; 45 Cal. 573; 75 id. 358; 75 Ill. 81; 4 Daly 277; 3 Mod. 261. The question is for the jury, to be inferred from the sale and the circumstances of the particular case; 8 Cow. 25; 9 N. H. 111; 149 Pa. 458; 63 Hun 636; 75 Cal. 558; even if the contract is written; Benj. Sales § 614; but see 10 Allen 242. The rule is simplex commendatio non obligat. See 2 Esp. 572. A warranty made after a sale requires a new consideration; 3 Q. B. 234; 100 Mass. 532. See 148 Mass. 608; representations made after a sale is complete and after delivery, and not entering into the consideration, cannot amount to a warranty; 62 Mich. 157.

Where one orders a specific article, there is only an implied warranty that the article supplied shall correspond with the designation and no implied agreement that it shall be fit for the purpose for which the buyer designed it; 28 U. S. App. 87.

Where a known, described, and definite article is ordered of a manufacturer, though he has notice that it is required for a particular purpose, there is no implied warranty that it shall answer that purpose; 141 U. S. 510. Affirmations of the essential qualities of goods made by the vendor and relied upon by the vendee, constitute an express warranty; 15 U. S. App. 218.

Proposals made by an equipment company to a street railway company to furnish electric equipment which should comply with certain conditions of performances, are affirmations of quality amounting to a warranty; 27 U. S. App. 364. Where there is a complete contract of sale in writing, there can be no implied warranty as to the subject-matter; 43 Ill. App. 175; 38 Cent. L. J. 70. As to implied warranty in a manufacturer's executory contract of sale, see 36 Cent. L. J. 192. In the sale of a patent there is an implied warranty of title, without regard to the form of the instrument of transfer; 3 Fed. Rep. 898. In Louisiana a warranty, while not of the essence, is of the nature of a contract of sale, and is implied in every such contract; 163 U. S. 386.

In Sales of Real Property. A real covenant, whereby the grantor of an estate of freehold and his heirs were bound to warrant the title, and, either upon voucher or by judgment in a writ of warrantia chartæ, to yield other lands to the value of those from which there has been an eviction by a paramount title. Co. Litt. 365 a.

Collateral warranty existed when the heir's title was not derived from the warranting ancestor, and yet it barred the heir from claiming the land by any collateral title, upon the presumption that he might thereafter have assets by descent from or through the ancestor; and it imposed upon him the obligation of giving the warrantee other lands in case of eviction, provided he had assets. 2 Bla. Com. 301.

Lineal warranty existed when the heir derived title to the land warranted, either from or through the ancestor who made the warranty.

The statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, annulled these collateral warranties, which had become a great grievance. Warranty in its original form has never, it is presumed, been known in the United States. The more plain and pliable form of a covenant has been adopted in its place; and this covenant, like all other covenants, has always been held to sound in damages, which, after judgment, may be recovered out of the personal or real estate, as in other cases. And in England the matter has become one of curious learning and of little or no practical importance. See 4 Kent 469; 3 Rawle 67, n.; 2 Wheat. 45; 1

Sumn. 358; 17 Pick. 14; 1 Ired. 509; 2 Saund. 38, n. 5.

Mr. Rawle, in his work on Covenants for Title 205, says there is no evidence that the covenants of warranty as employed in the United States ever had a place in English conveyancing. In the earlier conveyances which remain on record in the colonies are to be found some or all of the covenants which were coming into use in the mother country, together with a clause of warranty, sometimes with and sometimes without the addition of words of covenant. Later the words of covenant became more general, and at the present day their use is almost universal. As to the extent and scope of the American covenant of warranty, the sounder view is that it is merely a covenant for quiet enjoyment, the only difference being that under the latter, a recovery may sometimes be had where it would be denied under the former. See COVENANT.

WARRANTY, VOUCHER TO. In Old Practice. The calling a warrantor into court by the party warranted (when tenant in a real action brought for recovery of such lands), to defend the suit for him; Co. Litt. 101 b; 2 Saund. 32, n. 1; and the time of such voucher is after the demandant has counted.

It lies in most real and mixed actions, but not in personal. Where the voucher has been made and allowed by the court, the vouchee either voluntarily appears, or there issues a judicial writ (called a summons ad warrantizandum), commanding the sheriff to summon him. Where he, either voluntarily or in obedience to this writ, appears and offers to warrant the land to the tenant, it is called entering into the warranty; after which he is considered as tenant in the action, in the place of the original tenant. The demandant then counts against him de novo, the vouchee pleads to the new count, and the cause proceeds to issue.

WARREN (Germ. wahren, French garenne). A place privileged by prescription or grant of the king for the preservation of hares, conies, partridges, and pheasants, or any of them. An action lies for killing beasts of warren inside the warren; but they may be killed damage feasant on another's land; 5 Co. 104. It need not be inclosed; Co. 4th Inst. 318.

WASHINGTON. One of the states of the United States of America.

By the act February 22, 1889, the people of Washington were enabled to form a constitution and state government, and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states. Accordingly, after all the requirements had been complied with on November 11, 1889, the president by proclamation announced the admission of Washington into the Union.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER is vested in a senate and a house of representatives.

The house of representatives is composed of not less than sixty-three nor more than ninety-nine members. They are elected biennially for a term of two years.

The senate consists of members chosen for a term of four years. The number of senators shall not be more than one-half nor less than one-third of the number of members of the house of representatives.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, treasurer, auditor, attorney-general, superintendent of public instruction, and a commissioner of public lands.

The supreme executive power is vested in a governor who holds office for four years. He has the usual powers and duties of the executive. He has pardoning power subject to statutory regulations. In case of the removal, death, or disability of the governor the duties of the office devolve upon the lieutenant-governor.

THE JUDICIAL POWER is vested in a supreme court, superior courts, justices of the peace, and such inferior courts as may be established by the legislature.

The supreme court consists of five judges. It is always open for the transaction of business except on non-judicial days. The number of the judges may be increased by the legislature. It has original jurisdiction in habeas corpus, quo warranto, and mandamus as to all state officers, and appellate jurisdiction in all actions and proceedings except in civil actions at law for the recovery of money or personal property when the original amount in controversy, or the value of the property, does not exceed the sum of two hundred dollars, unless the action involves the legality of a tax, impost, assessment, toll, municipal fine, or the validity of a statute. It has power to issue writs of mandamus, etc., and all writs necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction.

Superior courts are held in each county. They have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity and in all cases at law which involve the title to real property, or the legality of any tax, impost, etc., and in all other cases in which the demand or the value of property in controversy amounts to one hundred dollars, and in all criminal cases amounting to felony, of all cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for, of actions of forcible entry and detainer, of proceedings in insolvency, of actions to prevent or abate nuisances, and of all matters of probate and divorce. The superior court also has original jurisdiction in all cases in which jurisdiction is not vested exclusively in some other court, and has the power of naturalization. It has appellate jurisdiction from justices' and other inferior courts.

WASTE. Spoil or destruction, done or permitted, to lands, houses, or other corporeal hereditaments, by the tenant thereof to the prejudice of the heir or of him in reversion or remainder.

"Any unauthorized act of a tenant for a freehold estate not of inheritance, or for any lesser interest, which tends to the destruction of the tenement, or otherwise to the injury of the inheritance." Pull. Torts 327.

Permissive waste consists in the mere neglect or omission to do what will prevent injury: as, to suffer a house to go to decay for the want of repair. And it may be incurred in respect to the soil, as well as to the buildings, trees, fences, or live stock on the premises. See infra.

Voluntary waste consists in the commission of some destructive act: as, in pulling down a house or ploughing up a flower-garden. 1 Paige, Ch. 578.

Equitable waste may be defined as such acts as at law would not be esteemed to be waste under the circumstances of the case, but which in the view of a court of equity are so esteemed from their manifest injury to the inheritance, although they are not inconsistent with the legal rights of the party committing them. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 915.

Voluntary waste is committed upon cultivated fields, orchards, gardens, meadows, and the like, whenever a tenant uses them contrary to the usual course of husbandry or in such a manner as to exhaust the soil by negligent or improper tillage; 6 Ves. Ch. 328; 2 Hill 157; 2 B. & P. 86. It is, therefore, waste to convert arable into wood land, or the contrary; Co. Litt. 53 b. Cutting down fruit-trees, although planted by the tenant himself, is waste; 2 Rolle, Abr. 817; and it was held to be waste for an outgoing tenant of garden-ground to plough up strawberry-beds which he had bought of a former tenant when he entered; 1 Camp. 227. When lands are leased on which there are open mines of metal or coal, or pits of gravel, lime, clay, brick, earth, stone, and the like, the tenant may dig out of such mines or pits; but he cannot open any new mines or pits without being guilty of waste; Co. Litt. 53 b; 110 Pa. 478. See 64 Cal. 134; MINES; OIL. Any carrying away of the soil is also waste; Comyns, Dig. Waste (D 4); 6 Barb. 18; Co. Litt. 53 b; 1 Sch. & L. 8. And so is the taking of clay from the soil and manufacturing it into bricks and selling the same; 31 W. Va. 621; 13 Q. B. 591. A tenant in common who quarries stone from the common property is guilty of waste; 117 Mo. 414; and a life tenant who unlawfully removes petroleum; 39 W. Va. 231.

Waste need not consist in loss of market value; it may be an injury in the sense of destroying identity; L. R. 20 Eq. 539.

It is committed in houses by removing things once fixed to the freehold, although they may have been erected by the lessee himself, unless they are mere fixtures. See FIXTURES. It may take place not only in pulling down houses or parts of them, but also in changing their forms; as, if the tenant pull down a house and erect a new one in its place, whether it be larger or smaller than the first; 2 Rolle, Abr. 815; 4 Utah 107; 13 Q. B. 588; or convert a parlor into a stable, or a grist-mill into a fulling-mill; ibid.; or turn two rooms into one; ibid. See 13 Q. B. 572; 14 Ves. 526. The placing of an excessive weight in a building, by reason of which it falls, is waste; 152 Mass. 567. The building of a house where there was none before was, by the strict rules of the common law, said to be waste; Co. Litt. 53 a; and taking it down after it was built was waste also; 1 B. & Ad. 161; 4 Pick. 310; 19 N. Y. 234; 16 Conn. 322; 2 McCord 329; 1 Harr. & J. 289; 1 Watts 378.

Voluntary waste may also be committed upon timber. The law of waste accommodates itself to the varying wants and conditions of different countries: that will not, for instance, be waste in an entire woodland country which would be so in cleared one. The clearing up of land for the purpose of tillage in a new country where trees abound is no injury to the inheritance, but, on the contrary, is a benefit to the remainderman, so long as there is sufficient timber left and the land cleared bears a proper relative proportion to the whole tract; 4 Kent 316; 5 Watts 463; 6 T. B. Monr. 342; 26 Wend. 122; see 99 N. C. 583; 81 Mich. 332; where timber is grown for sale, cutting timber would be a "mode of cultivation." See L. R. 18 Eq. 309; [1891] 3 Ch. 206.

The extent to which wood and timber on such land may be cut without waste is a question of fact for a jury; 7 Johns. 227. A tenant may always cut trees for the repair of the houses, fences, hedges, stiles, gates, and the like; Co. Litt. 53 b; 100 N. C. 41; 91 Ky. 533; and for making and repairing all instruments of husbandry; Wood, Inst. 344. See ESTOVERS. He may fell dead or dying timber; 110 Pa. 473; 11 Vt. 296. And he may, when unrestrained by the terms of the lease, cut timber for firewood, if there be not enough dead timber for such purposes; Com. Dig. Waste (D 5). But not ornamental trees or those planted for shelter; 6 Ves. Ch. 419; or to exclude objects from sight; 16 Ves. Ch. 375; 7 Ired. Eq. 197; 6 Barb. 9. He cannot promiscuously cut trees to make staves to be sold; 71 Wis. 336; nor railroad ties; 40 Mo. App. 515.

It is waste for a tenant for life to neglect to pay the interest on a mortgage whereby the land was sold to the prejudice of the remainderman; 16 Hun 226; and so of a failure to pay taxes; 51 Me. 434; 59 Miss. 289; 59 Wis. 557; 25 id. 679.

Windfalls are the property of the landlord; for whatever is severed by inevitable necessity, as, by a tempest, or by a trespasser, and by wrong, belongs to him who has the inheritance; 3 P. Wms. 268; 11 Co. 81.

In general, a tenant is answerable for waste although it is committed by a stranger; for he is the custodian of the property, and must take his remedy over; 2 Dougl. 745; 1 Taunt. 198; 1 Denio 104.

Permissive waste to buildings consists in omitting to keep them in tenantable repair; suffering the timbers to become rotten by neglecting to cover the house; or suffering the walls to fall into decay for want of plastering, or the foundation to be injured by neglecting to turn off a stream of water, and the like; Co. Litt. 53 a. See 41 N. J. Eq. 130; 59 Miss. 289; LANDLORD AND TENANT. Permissive waste in houses, however, as a general rule, is now only punishable when a tenant is bound to repair, either expressly or by implication; 4 B. & P. 298; 10 B. & C. 312. See 107 N. C. 690.

The redress for this injury is of two kinds, preventive and corrective. A reversioner or remainderman, in fee, for life, or for years, may now recover, by an ordinary action at law, all damages he has sustained by an act of voluntary waste committed by either his tenant or a stranger, provided the injury affects his reversion. But as against a tenant for years, or from year to year, he can only sustain an action for damages for permissive waste if his lease obliges the tenant to repair; 2 Saund. 252 d, note; 10 B. & C. 312; 41 Ch. D. 352. Where a particular course of user has been carried on for a considerable course of time, with the apparent knowledge and consent of the owner of the inheritance, all lawful presumptions will be made in favor of the lawfulness of the acts complained of; Poll. Torts 328; 4 App. Cas. 465. The statutes of the several states also provide special relief against waste in a great variety of cases, following, in general, the Statute of Gloucester, which not only forfeits the premises, but gives exemplary damages for all the injury done. The rules as to waste are less stringent in the western states than in the east.

These legal remedies, however, are still so inadequate, as well to prevent future waste as to give redress for waste already committed, that they have in a great measure given way to the remedy by bill in equity, by which not only future waste, whether voluntary or permissive, will be prevented, but an account may be decreed and compensation given for past waste in the same proceeding; 2 Mer. 408; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 179. Complainant in an action for waste must either have actual possession, or must show in himself an actual, valid, subsisting title; 85 Tenn. 154.

A contingent remainderman may maintain an injunction to restrain waste by the life tenant; 31 W. Va. 621.

An action on the case in the nature of waste, will lie by the holder of a mortgage on lands, against a purchaser from the mortgagor of the equity of redemption, for acts of waste committed with a knowledge that the value of the security will be injured thereby. This was a case of new impression (so stated in both courts) and was decided on general principles; 4 N. Y. 110. affirming 4 Barb. 347.

The reversioner need not wait until waste has actually been committed before filing his bill; for if he ascertains that the tenant is about to commit any act which would operate as a permanent injury to the estate, or if he threatens or shows any intention to commit waste, the court will at once interfere and restrain him by injunction from doing so; 18 Ves. Ch. 355; 1 Johns. Ch. 435; 1 Jac. & W. 653.

Sometimes a tenant, whether for life or for years, by the instrument creating his estate, holds his lands without impeachment of waste. This expression is equivalent to a general permission to commit waste, and at common law would authorize him to cut timber, or open new mines and convert the produce to his own use; Co. Litt. 220; 11 Co. 81 b; 15 Ves. 425. But equity puts a limited construction upon this clause, and only allows a tenant those powers under it which a prudent tenant in fee would exercise, and will, therefore, restrain him from pulling down or dilapidating houses, destroying pleasure-houses, or prostrating trees planted for ornament or shelter; 2 Vern. 739; 6 Ves. 110.

As to remedy by writ of estrepement to prevent waste, see ESTREPEMENT; 2 Yeates 281; 3 Bla. Com. 226.

As to remedies in cases of fraud in committing waste, see Hov. Frauds 226–238.

WASTE-BOOK. A book used among merchants. All the dealings of the merchants are recorded in this book in chronological order as they occur.

WATCH. To stand sentry and attend guard during the night-time. Certain officers called watchmen are appointed in most of the United States, whose duty it is to arrest all persons who are violating the law or breaking the peace. See 1 Bla. Com. 356; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 14, 20.

WATCH AND WARD. A phrase used in the English law to denote the superintendence and care of certain officers whose duties are to protect the public from harm.

WATCHMAN. An officer in many cities and towns, whose duty it is to watch during the night and take care of the property of the inhabitants. He possesses, generally, the common-law authority of a constable to make arrests, where there is reasonable ground to suspect a felony, though there is no proof of a felony having been committed; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 24; 1 B. & Ald. 227. See ARREST.

WATER. That liquid substance of which the sea, the rivers, and creeks are composed.

A pool of water, or a stream or watercourse, is considered as part of the land; hence a pool of twenty acres would pass by the grant of twenty acres of land, without mentioning the water; 2 Bla. Com. 18; 2 N. H. 255, 391; 1 Wend. 255; 5 Conn. 497; 8 Pa. 13. A mere grant of water passes only a fishery; Co. Litt. 4 b; 5 Cow. 216. But the owner of land over which water flows may grant the land, reserving the use of all the water to himself, or may grant the use of all or a portion of the water, reserving the fee of the land to himself; 26 Vt. 64; 3 Hill N. Y. 418; 6 Metc. 131.

WATER BAILIFF. In English Law. An officer appointed to search ships in ports. 10 Hen. VII. 30.

WATER COMPANY. A municipality has no implied power, from the mere fact of its creation, to engage in the business of supplying its citizens water for pay. It cannot do so except by virtue of express legislative authority. A municipality having such legislative authority, which has entered into a contract with an existing water company to supply the citizens with water, has thereby exhausted its power and cannot subsequently erect its own water works for the same purpose; 177 Pa. 643; 180 id. 509. See 186 Pa. 74; contra, in Rhode Island; 80 Fed. Rep. 611.

In Pennsylvania a water company under a statute which provides that water companies shall furnish pure water, will be enjoined from collecting water rents when it has supplied water utterly unfit for domestic use or for steam purposes. The courts cannot decree that the company must obtain a supply of pure water. They can only enjoin it from collecting water rents for impure water; 172 Pa. 489.

A water company which has a contract with a city to furnish water to extinguish fires is not liable to the owners of private property destroyed by fire through its failure to furnish water according to the contract; 88 Tex. 283; there is no privity of contract between the parties to the action; 46 Conn. 24; 83 Ga. 219; 139 Ind. 214; 54 Ia. 59; 37 Neb. 546; 78 Hun 146; 11 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 300; 3 Lea (Tenn.) 42; 81 Wis. 48; nor does the fact that the ordinance granting the franchise requires the company to supply the city and its inhabitants with sufficient water to put out fires, or to maintain the water at a certain pressure, create the necessary privity of contract; 83 Ga. 219; 37 Neb. 546; 81 Wis. 48; not even a statute, requiring the pipes to be kept charged at a certain pressure, will give the right of action; 2 Exch. Div. 441, reversing 6 L. R. Exch. 404. Such owner cannot maintain an action, even though the city has raised by taxation a special fund, to which the plaintiff contributed, to pay for a sufficient supply of water for use in case of fire; 79 Ia. 419; or though the citizens pay a special tax to the company, under its contract with the city; 119 Mo. 304. Nor has a municipality such an interest in the property destroyed as to give it a right of action, and the owner of the property destroyed cannot maintain an action as assignee of the right of action of the municipality; 16 Nev. 44. An action of tort will not lie; 83 Ga. 219. But it has been held that when the contract of a water company with the city declares that it is made, inter alia, for the protection of private property against destruction by fire, the owner of property which is taxed for water rent, and is destroyed by fire through the failure of the company to supply a sufficient quantity of water, may, in his own name, sue the company on its contract with the city; 89 Ky. 340.

A company for furnishing water to the public is subject to the visitatorial power of the state; 172 Pa. 506.

An existing system of water supply in a municipality which is the property of private individuals and is operated under a contract with the municipal corporation, is private property which may be acquired by eminent domain, on the payment of a just compensation, including compensation for the termination of the contract; 166 U. S. 685.

The right which a water company acquires by a lease from a riparian owner and not by the exercise of eminent domain is no greater than the right of the riparian owner; 182 Pa. 418.

A regulation by which the company refuses to turn on the water for a building until unpaid rates of previous owners are paid is unreasonable and void unless authorized by statute; 40 L. R. A. (Mass.) 657.

See WATER RENTS; RATES.

WATER-COURSE. This term is applied to the flow or movement of the water in rivers, creeks, and other streams.

It is a more comprehensive word than "river." In its most general sense, it means a course or channel in which water flows. In its legal sense, it consists of bed, banks, and water; a living stream confined in a channel, but not necessarily flowing all the time; 7 Ind. App. 309.

A water-course is a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, in a definite channel, and discharging into some other stream or body of water; and the term does not include surface-water conveyed from a higher to a lower level for limited periods during the melting of snow, or during or soon after the fall of rain, through hollows or ravines, which at other times are dry; 27 Wisc. 656. See 100 Mich. 424.

It must be a stream in fact, as distinguished from mere surface drainage rendered necessary by freshets or other extraordinary causes, though the flow of water need not be constant; 38 Neb. 406. See 118 Ind. 125; 21 Or. 35. A stream does not cease to be a water course and become mere surface water, because at certain points it spreads over a level meadow several rods in width, and flows for a distance without defined banks before flowing again into a definite channel; 16 Or. 165.

In a legal sense, property in a water-course is comprehended under the general name of land: so that a grant of land conveys to the grantees not only fields, meadows, and the like, but also all the rivers and streams which naturally pass over the surface of the land; 1 Co. Litt. 4; 2 N. H. 255; 5 Wend. 423. See WATER.

The right of a riparian proprietor to the flow of a stream over his land, may be severed from the land by grant, and where such right has been conveyed without reservation, the grantor cannot maintain an action to enjoin a diversion of water; 91 Cal. 146; 85 id. 219. See 16 Colo. 16.

Those who own land bounding upon a water-course are denominated by the civilians riparian proprietors; and this convenient term has been adopted in the common law; Ang. Wat.-Courses 3; 3 Kent 354; 55 Fed. Rep. 854.

In the United States all navigable water-courses are a species of highway, and come under the control of the states, except when they are used in foreign or interstate commerce, and then congress has authority over them; Cooley, Const. Lim. 589. See NAVIGABLE WATERS. States within which lands bordering on a river are situated have the right, not only to control and levee its banks, to prevent the adjoining country from overflow, but to compel riparian owners to maintain such levees at their own expense; 73 Cal. 125. See RIVER.

The public cannot, in the United States, gain any proprietary right in streams of inland water too small to be used for the transportation of property; Ang. Water-C. § 2; 11 Me. 278. In the case of navigable waters used as a highway of commerce between the states or with foreign nations, no state can grant a monopoly for the navigation of any portion of such waters; 9 Wheat. 1; 146 U. S. 387; 85 Wis. 445; 144 N. Y. 88; 64 Fed. Rep. 486. A state has the same power to improve such waters as it has in the case of any highway; Cooley, Const. Lim. 738; 29 Fla. 1; 148 U. S. 312; 152 U. S. 1; 87 Wis. 151; and, having expended money for such improvement, it may impose tolls upon the commerce which has the benefit of the improvement; 8 McLean 226; 8 Bush 447. See 119 U. S. 543. The states may authorize the construction of bridges over such waters, for railroads and other species of highways, notwithstanding they may to some extent interfere with navigation. See Hare, Am. Const. L. 457, 487, 497; 4 Pick. 460; 38 Ill. 467; 50 Fed. Rep. 16; 83 Me. 419; 125 U. S. 1; 53 Fed. Rep. 549; BRIDGE. A state may establish ferries over such waters; 1 Black 603; 41 Miss. 27; and authorize the construction of dams; Cooley, Const. Lim. 740. A state may also regulate the speed and general conduct of ships and other vessels navigating its water highways, provided its regulations do not conflict with any regulations made by congress; 1 Hill N. Y. 469. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 737, 741.

The riparian proprietor owns to high-water mark on all navigable rivers; 21 Am. Dec. 707; and that mark is limited by the outflow of the medium high tide, between the spring and neap tides; 44 N. J. Eq. 398. See NAVIGABLE WATERS. The beds of navigable rivers between the lines of ordinary low water on their opposite sides belong to the state, to be held and controlled by and for the public; 122 Pa. 191. Water-courses above the flow of the tide are private, but, if sufficiently large to be of public use in transporting property, are highways over which the public have a common right in subservience to which the private ownership of the soil is to be enjoyed; 26 Am. Dec. 525.

By the rules of the common law, all proprietors of lands have precisely the same rights to waters flowing through their domains, and one can never be permitted so to use the stream as to injure or annoy those situated on the course of it, either above or below him. They have no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct; aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat, is the language of the law. Accordingly, while each successive riparian proprietor is entitled to the reasonable use of the water for the supply of his natural wants and for the operation of mills and machinery; 86 Ala. 587; 86 Ky. 44; 50 Me. 602; 44 N. H. 580; L. R. 2 Ex. 1; 24 Pa. 302; he has no right to flow the water back upon the proprietor above; Cro. Jac. 556; 20 Pa. 85; 1 B. & Ald. 674; 3 Green N. J. 116; 4 Ill. 452; 38 Me. 243; 62 Ala. 369; 50 Conn. 346; nor to discharge it so as to flood the proprietor below; 17 Johns. 306; 5 Vt. 371; 3 Harr. & J. 231; nor to divert the water; 17 Conn. 288; 18 Johns. 212; 24 Ala. N. S. 130; 28 Vt. 670; 22 Am. Dec. 745; 2 Dan. 400; 93 Cal. 407; 66 Hun 632; 29 N. Y. Sup. 729; 79 Wis. 334; 133 U. S. 541; 40 N. Y. 191; 31 Vt. 358; 182 Pa. 418; even for the purpose of irrigation, unless it be returned without essential diminution; 5 Pick. 175; 8 Me. 253; 12 Wend. 330; 4 Ill. 496; 75 Cal. 426; 24 Pa. 298; 3 Kent 440; nor to obstruct or detain it, except for some reasonable purpose, such as to obtain a head of water for a mill and to be again discharged, so as to allow all on the same stream a fair participation; 10 Cush. 367; 6 Ind. 324; 28 Vt. 459; 4 Mas. 401; 17 Johns. 306; 18 Conn. 303; 155 Pa. 523; 112 Mo. 6; 69 Tex. 617; 10 Ch. Div. 707; see DAM; nor to pollute the quality of the water by unwholesome or discoloring impurities; 23 Barb. 297; 3 Rawle 397; 8 E. L. & E. 217; 4 Ohio 833; 62 Hun 306; 57 Fed. Rep. 1000; [1893] App. Cas. 691; 77 Ia. 460; 83 Ga. 187; but see, where the pollution results from a reasonable use, 73 Me. 297; 44 N. H. 580; 135 Ind. 547; 77 Ia. 576; as to turning surface-water off one's own land on to a neighbor's, see 31 Am. Rep. 216; 35 id. 431; 44 Ark. 360; 134 Ill. 96; 142 Mass. 110; 92 N. Y. 10; 133 Pa. 226. But, while such are the rights of the riparian proprietors when unaffected by contract, these rights are subject to endless modifications on the part of those entitled to their enjoyment either by grant; 3 Conn. 373; 13 Johns. 525; 17 Me. 281; 6 Metc. 131; 7 Pa. 348; 18 E. L. & E. 164; 9 N. H. 282; 3 N. Y. 253; or by reservation; 6 N. Y. 33; 20 Vt. 250; or by a license; 2 Gill 221; 13 Conn. 303; 14 S. & R. 267; or by agreement; 19 Pick. 449; Ang. Water-C. § 141; 3 Harr. & J. 282; 17 Wend. 136; see 110 Pa. 45; or by twenty years' adverse enjoyment from which a grant or contract will be implied; 1 Camp. 463; 4 Mas. 397; 6 Scott 167; 9 Pick. 251; Ang. Water-C. § 200; 47 Hun 333; 62 N. H. 233; 72 Ala. 277; in such a way as to adapt the uses of the water to the complex and multiplying demands and improvements of modern civilization. But there can be no prescriptive right to maintain an obstruction to the navigation of a public stream; 86 Ala. 88. It is not appurtenant to the land or taxable as part thereof or in itself, but only indirectly in connection with the value of the mill with which it is used; 37 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 331; contra, 64 N. H. 337.

Wherever a water-course divides two estates, each estate extends to the thread or central line of the stream; but the riparian owner of neither can lawfully carry off any part of the water without the consent of the other opposite, each riparian proprietor being entitled not to half or other proportion of the water, but to the whole bulk of the stream, undivided and undivisible, or per my et per tout; 8 Me. 253; 3 Sumn. 189; 13 Mass. 507; 1 Paige, Ch. 447; 2 Am. Dec. 574; 16 id. 342. If the bed of a water-course is suddenly changed, former boundaries and possessions are ot altered; but if the stream gradually gain on a person's land, the loser of the soil has no remedy; 2 Bla. Com. 262; 17 Vt. 387; Ang. Water-C. § 57; see 35 Fed. Rep. 188; [1896] 1 Ch. 73. A grant bounded by a navigable water-course extends only to high-water mark; but one bounded by a non-navigable stream extends to the middle thereof; 16 Am. Dec. 447; 30 id. 278, 286. See 140 U. S. 371; 152 id. 1; 4 Ia. 199; 94 U. S. 324; 11 Fed. Rep. 394. When an island is on the side of a river, so as to give the riparian owner of that side only one-fourth of the water, he has no right to place obstructions at the head of the island to cause [illegible] half of the stream to descend [illegible] the river, but the owner op[illegible] to the flow of the remain[illegible]s; 10 Wend. 260.

The ap[illegible]ation of the water of an unnavigable [illegible]m by a riparian owner in such quan[illegible] to diminish unreasonably the suppl[illegible] other riparian owners is a private n[illegible]e, for which an injunction will lie; [illegible]l. Rep. 133; 2 Johns. Ch. 162.

Artific[illegible]ter-courses, canals, sewers, water-wor[illegible], etc., are wholly the creatures of statute, except when a man has a drain across another's land, and there it is generally a question of grant or easement. See 31 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 291.

As to under-ground flow of water, see SUBTERRANEAN WATER; and see, also, 111 Cal. 639; 92 Ia. 297; 46 N. Y. Supp. 141; 161 Pa. 283; [1895] App. Cas. 587; 40 Pac. Rep. 709; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. WATER MARK. See HIGH WATER MARK; TIDE.

WATER ORDEAL. See ORDEAL.

WATER RENTS. Water rents in a borough which owns the water-works and licenses those who desire to use its water to do so at rates fixed by its ordinance, are not in the nature of taxes, but are licenses, and not, therefore, collectible by the borough tax collector as such, but their collection may be delegated to the appointee of the borough council. 19 C. C. R. (Pa.) 414. As to legislative control of, see RATES.

Under a covenant by a lessor to pay "all water rents imposed or assessed upon the premises or on the lessor or lessees in respect thereof," the lessor is not bound to pay for water supplied by a water company to the lessees for trade purposes; (C. A.) [1897] 1 Ch. 683.

WATERGANG (Law Lat. watergangium). A Saxon word for a trench or course to carry a stream of water, such as are commonly made to drain water out of marshes. Ordin. Marisc. de Romn. Chart. Hen. III.

WATERGAVEL. A rent paid for fishing in, or other benefit from, some river. Chart. 15 Hen. III.

WAVESON. Such goods as appear upon the waves after shipwreck. Jacob, Law Dict.

WAY. A passage, street, or road.

A right of way is the privilege which an individual, or a particular description of individuals, as, the inhabitants of a village or the owners or occupiers of certain farms, have of going over another's ground. It is an incorporeal hereditament of a real nature, entirely different from a common highway. Cruise, Dig. tit. xxiv. s. 1.

A right to pass over another's land more or less frequently according to the nature of the use to be made of the easement, and how frequently is immaterial, provided it occurred as often as the claimant had occasion or chose to pass. 105 Mass. 319.

A right of way may arise: By prescription and immemorial usage, or by an uninterrupted enjoyment for twenty years under a claim of right; Co. Litt. 113; 4 Gray 177, 547; 20 Pa. 331, 458; 4 Mas. 402; 24 N. H. 440; 130 Ind. 31; 75 Fed. Rep. 520; 86 Hun 384; 93 Ga. 300. By grant; as, where the owner grants to another the liberty of passing over his land; 1 Ld. Raym. 75; 19 Pick. 250; 7 B. & C. 257. (See 98 Mich. 599.) If the grant be of a freehold right it must be by deed; 5 B. & C. 221; 4 R. I. 47. By necessity; as, where a man purchases land accessible only over land of the vendor, or sells, reserving land accessible only over land of the vendee, he shall have a way of necessity over the land which gives access to his purchase or reservation; 5 Taunt. 311; 23 Pa. 333; 2 Mass. 203; 11 Mo. 513; 29 Me. 499; 27 N. H. 448; 19 Wend. 507; 15 Conn. 39; 126 Mass. 445; 55 Cal. 350; 102 Cal. 362; 40 Kan. 203; 85 Cal. 131; and this may exist even after the vendor has conveyed his land to a third person; 123 Ind. 372; but a way of necessity is not created by the fact that a road over grantor's land would be of less distance to a highway than a road already established; 116 Mo. 379. The necessity must be absolute, not a mere convenience; 2 M'Cord 445; 24 Pick. 102; 69 Me. 323; 91 id. 227; 107 N. C. 63; 98 Mass. 50; 126, id. 445; 11 Ch. Div. 968; 2 Allen 543; L. R. 9 Ch. 111; contra, 7 Barb. 309; and when it ceases the way ceases with it; 18 Conn. 321; 1 Barb. Ch. 353. By implication; 90 Tenn. 556. By reservation expressly made in the grant of the land over which it is claimed; 10 Mass. 183; 25 Conn. 331. By custom; as where navigators have a right of this nature to tow along the banks of navigable rivers with horses; 3 Term 253. By acts of legislature; though a private way cannot be so laid out without the consent of the owner of the land over which is to pass; 15 Conn. 39, 83; 4 Hill 47, 140; 4 B. Monr. 57.

A right of way may be either a right in gross, which is a purely personal right incommunicable to another, or a right appendant or annexed to an estate, and which may pass by assignment with the estate to which it is appurtenant; 3 Kent 420; 1 Watts 35; 19 Pick 250. A right of way appurtenant to land is appurtenant to all and every part of the land, and if such land be divided and conveyed in separate parcels, a right of way thereby passes to each of the grantees; 1 Cush. 285; 1 S. & R. 229. A way is never presumed to be in gross when it can be construed to be appurtenant to land; 82 Va. 462; 1 Wood, Ry. Law 697. Where a way appurtenant to land granted is not located by the grant, the parties may locate it by parol agreement at any point on the premises over which the right is granted; 65 Vt. 333.

Ways may be abandoned by agreement, by evident intention, or by long non-user. Twenty years' occupation of land adverse to a right of way and inconsistent therewith bars the right; 2 Whart. 123; 16 Barb. 184; 5 Gray 409. Where a way of necessity once existed it will be presumed to exist until some fact is shown establishing non-existence; 102 Cal. 362.

Ways may be assigned, except when they are in gross, which is a mere personal right, and cannot be granted to another; 19 Ill. 558.

A person cannot acquire a prescriptive right of way over his own lands, or the lands of another which he occupies as tenant; 116 Mo. 379; and where one has uninterruptedly used a way over another's land for the necessary length of time to establish an easement by adverse user, it will be presumed that the user was adverse, and under claim of title, and the burden is on one claiming that it was by virtue of a license to prove that fact; 68 Hun 269.

The owner of a right of way may disturb the soil to pave and repair it. But a way granted for one purpose cannot be used for another; 10 Gray 61; 11 id. 150.

A person having a right of way which is obstructed by a house erected upon the way may, after notice and request to remove it, pull it down, although it is actually inhabited; [1891] 3 Ch. 411.

Lord Coke, adopting the civil law, says there are three kinds of ways: a footway, called iter; a footway and horseway, called actus; a cartway, which contains the other two, called via; Co. Litt. 56 a. To which may be added a driftway, a road over which cattle are driven; 1 Taunt. 279.

See 3 Kent 419; Washb.; Jones, Easem.; Crabb, R. P.; Cruise, Dig.; HIGHWAY; STREET; EASEMENT; THOROUGHFARE.

WAY-BILL. A writing in which are set down the names of passengers who are carried in a public conveyance, or the description of goods sent with a common carrier by land.

WAY-GOING CROP. In Pennsylvania. By the custom of the country, a tenant for a term certain is entitled, after the expiration of his lease, to enter and take away the crop of grain which he had put into the ground the preceding fall. This is called the way-going crop; 5 Binn. 289; 2 S. & R. 14; 1 Pa. 224. See AWAY-GOING CROP; EMBLEMENTS.

WAYS AND MEANS. In legislative assemblies, there is usually appointed a committee whose duties are to inquire into and propose to the house the ways and means to be adopted to raise funds for the use of the government. This body is called the committee of ways and means.

WEAPON. An instrument of offensive or defensive combat. Statutes have been passed in many of the states prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons. They are merely police regulations; La. Ann. 399. To constitute the offence [illegible]comotion is not necessary, the possession sufficient; 31 Ala. 387; even if the weapon is not in perfect order and ready for use; 53 id. 508; 6 Blackf. 31; 45 Miss 6[illegible] Persons on their own premises; 45 Ar[illegible]6; or on a journey (see TRAVELLER); [illegible]ying good reasons to fear bodily harm; [illegible] Ala. 61; are exempted from the operation of such statutes; as are officers of the law; 18 Tex. App. 57. See ARMS; CONCEALED WEAPONS.

The ordinary implements of war are lawful: swords, fire-arms, and cannon, and even those which are secret or concealed, such as pits and mines. But this does not include poisoned weapons of any kind. Great Britain, France, Prussia, Russia, and other nations united in a declaration at St. Petersburg in 1868, by which they agreed to renounce, in case of war among themselves, the employment of any projectile of a weight less than 400 grammes, charged with fulminating or inflammable substances. 1 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 563.

WEAR, WEIR. A dam made across a river accommodated for the taking of fish or to convey a stream to a mill. Jacob. See DAM.

WEAR AND TEAR. Destruction to some extent, e. g. destruction of surface by ordinary friction, but the words do not include total destruction by a catastrophe which was never contemplated by either party. 5 C. P. Div. 507.

Natural and reasonable wear and tear covers only such decay or depreciation in value of the property as may arise from ordinary and reasonable use; and injury by a freshet is not within the exception; 20 N. J. L. 547.

WEARING APPAREL. As generally used in statutes, refers not merely to a person's outer clothing, but covers all articles usually worn, and includes underclothing. 147 U. S. 494. It may include a gold watch; 2 Flipp. 325; 12 Or. 431; but see 16 Ga. 479; 38 Me. 535; but not a travelling trunk or a breastpin; 33 N. H. 345; and under the revenue laws shoes are not included; 37 Fed. Rep. 782. See BAGGAGE.

WED. A covenant or agreement: thus, a wedded husband.

WEEK. Seven days of time.

The week commences immediately after twelve o'clock on the night between Saturday and Sunday, and ends at twelve o'clock, seven days of twenty-four hours each, thereafter. See 4 Pet. 361; 24 L. J. Ch. 368; or it may mean a period of time of seven days duration without reference to when that period commences; 5 Nev. 430.

The first publication of a notice of a sale, under a power contained in a mortgage, which requires the notice to be published "once each week for three successive weeks," need not be made three weeks before the time appointed for the sale; 117 Mass. 480. See 4 Pet. 361; TIME.

WEEKLY PAYMENT LAWS. See LIBERTY OF CONTRACT.

WEIGHAGE. In English Law. A duty or toll paid for weighing merchandise: it is called tronage for weighing wool at the king's beam, or pesage for weighing other avoirdupois goods. 2 Chitty, Com. Law 16.

WEIGHT. A quality in natural bodies by which they tend towards the centre of the earth.

Under the police power, weights and measures may be established and dealers compelled to conform to the fixed standards under a penalty; Cooley, Const. Lim. 749.

Under the article Measure, it is said that by the constitution congress possesses the power "to fix the standard of weights and measures," and that this power has not been exercised.

The weights now generally used in the United States are the same as those of England; they are of two kinds.

AVOIRDUPOIS WEIGHT.

First, used in almost all commercial transactions, and in the common dealings of life.

60 grains = 1 dram.
8 drams = 1 ounce.
16 ounces = 1 pound (lb.).
25 or 28 pounds = 1 quarter (qr.).
4 quarters = 1 hundredweight (cwt.).
20 hundredweight = 1 ton.

Second, used for meat and fish.

8 pounds = 1 stone.

Third, used in the wood-trade.

		Cwt.	qr.	lb.
7 pounds = 1 clove.
14 pounds = 1 stone.	=	0	0	14
2 stones = 1 tod.	=	0	1	0
6½ tods = 1 wey.	=	1	2	14
2 weys = 1 sack.	=	3	1	0
12 sacks = 1 last.	=	39	0	0

Fourth, used for butter and cheese.

8 pounds = 1 clove.
56 pounds = 1 firkin.

TROY WEIGHT.

24 grains = 1 pennyweight.
20 pennyweights = 1 ounce.
12 ounces = 1 pound.

These are the denominations of troy weight when used for weighing gold, silver, and precious stones, except diamonds. Troy weight is also used by apothecaries in compounding medicines; but by them the ounce is divided into eight drams, and the dram into three scruples, so that the latter is equal to twenty grains. For scientific purposes (when the metric system is not employed, as it now usually is), the grain only is used, and sets of weights are used constructed in decimal progression from 10,000 grains downward to one-hundredth of a grain. The carat used for weighing diamonds is three and one-sixth grains. See GRAMME.

A short account of the French weights and measures is given under the article MEASURE.

WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE. This phrase is used to signify that the proof on one side of a cause is greater than on the other.

When a verdict has been rendered against the weight of the evidence, the court may, on this ground, grant a new trial; but the court will exercise this power not merely with a cautious but a strict and sure judgment, before they send the case to a second jury.

The general rule, under such circumstances, is that the verdict once found shall stand: the setting aside is the exception, and ought to be an exception of rare and almost singular occurrence. A new trial will be granted on this ground for either party: the evidence, however, is not to be weighed in golden scales: 2 Bingh. N. C. 109; 3 Me. 276; 8 Pick. 122; 5 Wend. 595. See NEW TRIAL.

WELL. A hole dug in the earth in order to obtain water.

In a deed, well designates the portion of land under and occupied by the excavation, and its surrounding retaining walls, and by any structures or appliances built upon the land to facilitate its use, and also the water actually at any time in the excavation; 157 Mass. 431.

The owner of the estate has a right to dig in his own ground at such a distance as is permitted by law from his neighbor's land; he is not restricted as to the size or depth, and is not liable to any action for rendering the well of his neighbor useless by so doing. See 74 Me. 170; 62 Ga. 296; SUBTERRANEAN WATERS.

WELL KNOWING. In Pleading. Words used in a declaration when the plaintiff sues for an injury which is not immediate and with force, and the act or nonfeasance complained of was not prima facie actionable. Not only the injury, but the circumstances under which it was committed, ought to be stated: as, where the injury was done by an animal. In such case the plaintiff, after stating the injury, continues, the defendant, well knowing the mischievous propensity of his dog, permitted him to go at large. See SCIENTER.

WELSH MORTGAGE. In English Law. A species of security which partakes of the nature of a mortgage, as there is a debt due, and an estate is given as security for the repayment, but differs from it in the circumstances that the rents and profits are to be received without account till the principal money is paid off, and there is no remedy to enforce payment, while the mortgagor has a perpetual power of redemption. It is now rarely used.

It is a species of vivum vadium. Strictly, however, there is this distinction between a Welsh mortgage and a vivum vadium: in the latter the rents and profits of the estate are applied to the discharge of the principal after paying the interest; while in the former the rents and profits are received in satisfaction of his interest only; 1 Powell, Mortg. 378 a; Jones, Mtg. 1153. See MORTGAGE.

WELSHING. One who receives a sum of money or valuable thing, undertaking to return the same or the value thereof together with other money, if an event (for example, the result of a horse-race) shall be determined in a certain manner and at the time of receiving the deposit intends to cheat and defraud the depositor. Coldr. & Hawks. Gambling 303. The crime is larceny at common law.

WERE. The name of a fine among the Saxons imposed upon a murderer.

The life of every man, not excepting that of the king himself, was estimated at a certain price, which was called the were or æstimatio capitis. The amount varied according to the dignity of the person murdered. The price of wounds was also varied according to the nature of the wound, or the member injured.

WERGILD, WEREGILD. In Old English Law. The price which, in a barbarous age, a person guilty of homicide or other enormous offence was required to pay, instead of receiving other punishment. 4 Bla. Com. 188.

See, for the etymology of this word, and a tariff which was paid for the murder of the different classes of men, Guizot, Essais sur l'Histoire de France, Essai 4ème, c. 2, § 2.

WEST SAXON LAGE. The law of the West Saxons, which was observed in the counties in the south and west of England, from Kent to Devonshire, in the beginning of the eleventh century; supposed by Blackstone to have been much the same as the laws of Alfred. 1 Bla. Com. 65.

WEST VIRGINIA. The name of one of the United States of America.

This state was formed in 1861 of the western counties of Virginia, owing to their non-concurrence in the ordinance of secession passed by the legislature of that state. A constitution was framed by a convention which met at Wheeling on November 26, 1861. This was submitted to the people on April 3, 1862, and ratified almost unanimously. The consent of the body, recognized by the federal government as the legislature of Virginia, was given, and congress then passed an act approved December 31, 1862, providing for the admission of the new state into the Union upon condition of the adoption of an amendment to the constitution providing for emancipation of slaves. This was done, and the state was admitted to the Union. The first constitution remained in force until 1872, when the present constitution was framed by a convention which met on January 16, 1872, and completed its labors on April 9 of that year. It was submitted to the people and ratified by them on August 22, 1872.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative power is vested in a senate and house of delegates, their official designation being "the legislature of West Virginia." The senate is composed of twenty-four members elected for four years. The first house of delegates consisted of sixty-five members, provision being made for an increased number in proportion to the increase of population. Members of the house of delegates are elected for two years.

The legislature assembles biennially, and not oftener, unless convened by the governor.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The executive power is vested in a Governor, Secretary of State, State Superintendent of Free Schools, Auditor, Treasurer, and Attorney-General, who is ex-officio Reporter of the court of appeals. Their terms of office are respectively for four years, and commence on the fourth day of March next after the election.

The chief executive power is vested in the governor. He is ineligible for re-election to the succeeding term of his office.

He has the power to commute capital punishment, and to reprieve or pardon offenders after conviction, excepting where the prosecution has been carried on by the house of delegates. In case of the governor's death, resignation, or inability to serve, the president of the senate shall assume his office until the vacancy is filled, or the disability removed.

THE JUDICIARY DEPARTMENT.—The Judiciary power is vested in a supreme court of appeals, in circuit courts and the judges thereof, in county and corporation courts, and in justices of the peace.

The supreme court of appeals consists of four judges, any three of whom constitute a quorum. They are elected by the people and hold office for twelve years. This court has original jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition; and appellate jurisdiction in civil cases, where the matter in controversy exclusive of costs is of greater value than one hundred dollars; in controversies concerning the title or boundaries of land, the probate of wills, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator; or concerning a mill, roadway, ferry, or landing; or the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls or taxes; and, also, in cases of quo warranto, habeas corpus, mandamus, and prohibition, and in cases involving freedom, or the constitutionality of a law; also in criminal cases where there has been a conviction of felony, or misdemeanor in a circuit court, and where a conviction has been had in any inferior court and affirmed in a circuit court.

Circuit Courts.—The state is divided into thirteen circuits, and for each circuit a judge is elected by the voters thereof, who holds his office for eight years. The circuit courts have the supervision of all proceedings before the county courts, and other inferior tribunals, by mandamus, prohibition, or certiorari. They have, except in cases confined by the constitution exclusively to some other tribunal, original and general jurisdiction of all matters of law where the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest, exceeds fifty dollars; in cases of quo warranto, habeas corpus, mandamus, or prohibition; in all cases in equity, and of all felonies and misdemeanors. They have appellate jurisdiction, upon petition, and assignment of error, in all cases of judgments, decrees, and final orders rendered by the county court, and such other inferior courts as may be appointed by law, where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, is of greater value than twenty dollars; in controversies respecting the title or boundaries of land, the probate of wills, the appointment or qualification of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator, or concerning a mill, roadway, ferry, or landing, or the right of a corporation or county to levy tolls or taxes, and also in cases of habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari, and in cases involving freedom, or the constitutionality of a law; and in all cases of conviction under criminal prosecutions in said court. It has such original jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law.

County Courts.—There is in each county of the state a county court, composed of a president and two justices of the peace; the president of the court is elected by the voters of the county, and holds his office for four years.

The county court has original jurisdiction in all actions at law where the amount in controversy exceeds twenty dollars; and also in all cases of habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, prohibition, and certiorari, and in all suits in equity, in all matters of probate, the appointment and qualification of personal representatives, guardians, committees, and curators, and the settlement of their accounts, and in all matters relating to apprentices, and of all criminal cases, under the grade of felony, except as above provided. It has the custody, through its clerks, of all writs, deeds, and other papers presented for probate or record in the county. It has also the superintendence and administration of the internal police and fiscal affairs of the county. It has jurisdiction of all appeals from the judgment of the justices, and its decision is final upon such appeals, except such as involve the title, right of possession, or boundaries of lands, the freedom of a person, the validity of a law, or an ordinance of any corporation, or the right of a corporation, to levy tolls or taxes.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA. A colony of Great Britain in Australia. See AUSTRALIA.

WESTERN RESERVE. See OHIO.

WESTMINSTER 2nd, STATUTE OF. A statute of 13 Edw. I. c. 24 (1285), under which it was provided that where in one case a writ was found and in a like case no writ was to be found, the clerks of the chancery should agree in making a writ, or adjourn the complaint until the next parliament and refer to it the cases in which they could not agree; Steph. Pl. *7. See CONSIMILI CASU.

WETHER. A castrated ram, at least one year old: in an indictment it may be called a sheep. 4 C. & P. 216.

WHALER. A vessel employed in the whale fishery.

It is usual for the owner of the vessel, the captain, and crew, to divide the profits in just proportions, under an agreement similar to the contract Di Colona, which see.

WHARF. A space of ground artificially prepared for the reception of merchandise from a ship or vessel, so as to promote the convenient loading and discharge of such vessel.

A wharf occupied by a ferry company, to which access can only be had through a gate controlled by the ferry company, or over private property of another, is a private wharf; 78 Hun 166; but a public quay in a city, dedicated to public use, does not cease to be locus publicus and become private property because it is leased by the public authorities for a purpose subservient to the public use; 140 U. S. 654.

At common law, the soil of all tide-waters below high-water mark being vested in the crown, the erection of a wharf thereon without the consent of the crown is an encroachment upon the royal domain of that kind which has been denominated a purpresture, and, as such, may be either abated, or, if more beneficial to the crown, the party arrested, unless it be a public nuisance; 10 Price 350, 378; 18 Ves. 214; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 920. But if it obstruct navigation to such a degree as to be a public nuisance, neither the crown nor its grantee has authority to erect or maintain it without the sanction of an act of parliament; 8 Ad. & E. 336; 5 M. & W. 327; Phear, Rights of Water 54. It is not every wharf erected in navigable water which is a nuisance, for it may be a benefit rather than an injury to the navigation: and it is for the jury to determine, in each particular case, whether such a wharf is a nuisance or not; 1 C. & M. 496; 4 Ad. & E. 384; 6 id. 143; 15 Q. B. 276.

A riparian owner has, at common law, a qualified interest in the water frontage belonging by nature to his land, and the right to construct thereon wharves, piers, or landings; 107 N. C. 139. But this certainly can only be by consent of the authorities, and so as not to interrupt navigation unduly.

In this country, the several states, being the owners of the soil of the tide waters within their respective territories, may by law authorize and regulate the erection of wharves thereon, at least until the general government shall have legislated upon the subject; 4 Ga. 26; 7 Cush. 53; 2 H. & M'H. 244; 11 Gill & J. 351; and may grant to a municipal corporation the exclusive right to make and control wharves on the banks of a navigable river; 95 U. S. 80. The riparian proprietor is entitled to make a landing, wharf, or pier for his own use or for the use of the public, subject to such general rules and regulations as the legislature may prescribe; 146 U. S. 445; 10 Wall. 504. In Massachusetts and Maine, by a colonial ordinance, the provisions of which are still recognized as the law of those states, the property of the shores and flats between high and low water mark, for one hundred rods, subject to the rights of the public, was transferred to the owners of the upland, who may, therefore, wharf out to that distance, if by so doing they do not unreasonably interrupt navigation; 1 Cush. 313, 395; 36 Me. 16; 42 id. 9. If without legislative sanction they extend a wharf beyond that distance, such extension is prima facie a nuisance, and will be abated as such, unless it can be shown that it is no material detriment to navigation; 20 Pick. 186; 10 R. I. 477. In Connecticut, and probably in other states, by the law of the state founded upon immemorial usage, the proprietor of the upland has the right to wharf out to the channel,—subject to the rights of the public; 9 Conn. 38; 25 id. 345; 16 Pet. 369; 1 Dutch. 525; 6 Ind. 223; 62 Conn. 132; 23 Minn. 18; 55 Fed. Rep. 854. In Pennsylvania, the riparian proprietor is held to be the owner of the soil between high and low water mark, and to be entitled to erect wharves thereon; 1 Whart. 131; 2 id. 589; but not without express authority from the state; 61 Pa. 21. In the same state it has been held that wharves are not the private property of him who erects them, and persons who go upon and fasten vessels to them are not trespassers; 39 Leg. Int. 32; and that in an action for the use and occupation of a wharf, a contract express or implied must be proved; 28 Am. L. Reg. 145.

The owner of a wharf is liable for damages caused to a vessel by concealed obstructions which he might have ascertained by reasonable diligence; 87 Fed. Rep. 160; see 36 id. 927; and such claims are within the jurisdiction of admiralty; and a libel in personam will lie; 45 Fed. Rep. 588. The wharfinger was also held liable for damages to vessels caused by the insufficiency of the wharf; 79 Fed. Rep. 113.

Owners of land abutting on a lake, the title to which is in the state, have the right to build wharves in aid of navigation, but not obstructing it, far enough to reach water navigable for such boats as are in use; 40 L. R. A. (Wis.) 635. See an extended note to this case on the right of the riparian owner to erect wharves, where the English and American cases are collected and classified.

See, generally, 2 Sandf. 258; 3 How. 212; 1 Gill & J. 249; 11 id. 351; 8 Term 606; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; WATER-COURSE; RIVERS.

WHARFAGE. The money paid for landing goods upon, or loading them from, a wharf. Dane, Abr. Index; 4 Cal. 41.

Wharfingers in London are not entitled to wharfage for goods unloaded into lighters out of barges fastened to their wharves; 3 Burr. 1409; 1 W. Bla. 243. And see 5 Sandf. 48. It has been held that, owing to the interest which the public have in the matter, rates of wharfage may be regulated by statute; 11 Ala. N. s. 586. And see 5 Hill 71; 2 Rich. 370; 8 B. & C. 42; 2 Mann. & R. 107.

Claims for wharfage are cognizable in admiralty, and, if the vessel is a foreign one or from another state, the claim of the wharfinger is a maritime lien against the vessel, which may be enforced by a proceeding in rem, or by a libel in personam against the owner of such vessel; 95 U. S. 18; 56 Fed. Rep. 609. A state statute conferring a remedy for such claims by proceedings in rem is void; 43 N. Y. 554. But as to domestic vessels, the lien of the wharfinger is only enforceable as a common-law lien; 1 Newb. 553; 9 Phila. 364. See 60 Fed. Rep. 766. In the absence of any agreement between the parties, reasonable wharfage will be allowed; 95 U. S. 68. A lease giving the lessee "the sole and exclusive right to use the public wharf for his ferry boat," does not authorize the collection of toll for wharfage; 1 Newb. 541. A municipal corporation cannot exact a charge upon vessels for entering or leaving a port or remaining therein and using the wharves or landings, for the general revenue of such corporation; 20 Wall. 577; 95 U. S. 80; but it may collect from parties using its wharves, such reasonable fee as will fairly remunerate it for the use of its property; 100 U. S. 423; id. 430; 95 id. 80; 40 Fed. Rep. 392. That such fees are regulated by the tonnage of the vessel will not constitute them a tonnage tax under the constitution, art. 1, paragraph 3, § 10; 20 Gratt. 419. See 9 Fed. Rep. 679; 25 Alb. L. J. 254. A ship compelled by stress of weather to moor to a wharf for safety, is not liable to a charge for wharfage, where the wharf is a private one, and no fixed rate of charge is in use; 42 Fed. Rep. 173. Vessels which have made use of a wharf, whether under express or implied contract, are not entitled to refuse payment of wharfage on the ground that the wharfinger is not the legal owner of the property; 59 Fed. Rep. 628.

WHARFINGER. One who owns or keeps a wharf for the purpose of receiving and shipping merchandise to or from it for hire.

A wharfinger stands in the situation of an ordinary bailee for hire, and therefore, like a warehouseman, he is responsible for ordinary neglect, and is required to take ordinary care of the goods intrusted to him as such; 2 Barb. 328; 4 Ind. 368; 10 Vt. 56; 4 Term 581. The wharfinger is not an insurer of the safety of his dock, but he must use reasonable care to keep it in safe condition, for vessels which he invites to enter it; 127 Mass. 236; 7 Blatch. 290; 15 Wall. 649; Poll. Torts 488; [1891] A. C. 11. He is not, like an innkeeper or carrier, to be considered an insurer unless he superadd the character of carrier to that of wharfinger; 5 Burr. 2825; 12 Johns. 232; 7 Cow. 497; 5 Mo. 97. The responsibility of a wharfinger begins when he acquires and ends when he ceases to have the custody of the goods in that capacity.

When he begins and ceases to have such custody depends, generally, upon the usages of trade and of the business. When goods are delivered at a wharf, and the wharfinger has agreed, expressly or by implication, to take the custody of them, his responsibility commences; but a mere delivery at the wharf, without such assent, does not make him liable; 3 Camp. 414; 6 Cow. 757; 10 Vt. 56; 14 M. & W. 98. When goods are in the wharfinger's possession to be sent on board of a vessel for a voyage, as soon as he delivers the posse-sion and the care of them to the proper officers of the vessel, although they are not actually removed, he is, by the usages of trade, deemed exonerated from any further responsibility; 1 M. & W. 174; 1 Gale 420; 99 Mass. 220. The wharfinger does not, however, discharge his duty by delivering them to one of the crew, but should deliver them to the captain of the vessel, or some other person in authority on board of it; 1 C. & P. 638. And see 2 C. & M. 531; 7 Scott 876; 4 Q. B. 511.

A wharfinger has a general lien upon all goods in his possession for the balance of his account; 4 B. & Ald. 50; 12 Ad. & E. 639; 7 B. & C. 212; 95 U. S. 68; and in respect to the right of lien there is no distinction between the wharfinger and the warehouseman; 23 Am. L. R. Eq. 465, 468. A wharfinger has equally a lien on a vessel for wharfage; Ware 354; Gilp. 101. See WHARFAGE.

WHEEL. The punishment of the wheel was formerly to put a criminal on a wheel, and then to break his bones until he expired. This barbarous punishment was never used in the United States; and it has been abolished in every civilized country.

WHELPS. The young of certain animals of a base nature or ferœ naturæ.

It is a rule that when no larceny can be committed of any creatures of a base nature which are ferœ naturæ, though tame and reclaimed, it cannot be committed of the young of such creatures in the nest, kennel, or den; Co. 3d Inst. 109; 1 Russ. Cr. 153.

The owner of the land is, however, considered to have a qualified property in such animals, ratione impotentiæ; 2 Bla. Com. 394.

WHEN. At which time. At that time. 90 Mo. 646.

In wills, standing by itself unqualified and unexplained, this is a word of condition denoting the time at which the gift is to commence; 6 Ves. Jr. 243; 10 Co. 50; 16 C. B. 59.

The context of a will may show that the word is to be applied to the possession only, not to the vesting of a legacy; but to justify this construction there must be circumstances, or other expressions in the will, showing such to have been the testator's intent; 7 Ves. 422; 3 Bro. C. C. 471. See 2 Jar. Wills 417. See DEVISE; TIME.

WHEN AND WHERE. Technical words in pleading, formerly necessary in making full defence to certain actions. See 1 Chit. Pl. *445; DEFENCE.

WHENEVER. Though often used as equivalent to "as soon as," is also often used where the time intended by it is, and will be, until its arrival, or for some uncertain period at least, indeterminate. 14 R. I. 188.

WHEREAS. This word implies a recital, and, in general, cannot be used in the direct and positive averment of a fact in a declaration or plea. Those facts which are directly denied by the terms of the general issue, or which may, by the established usage of pleading, be specially traversed, must be averred in positive and direct terms; but facts, however material, which are not directly denied by the terms of the general issue, though liable to be contested under it, and which, according to the usage of pleading, cannot be specially traversed, may be alleged in the declaration by way of recital, under a whereas; 2 Chitty, Pl. 151, 178, 191.

WHEREUPON. Sequence; succession; order of action; relation. A thing done with reference to something previously done. It is interchangeable with the words upon which, and after which. 1 Wyo. 419.

WHIPPING. The infliction of stripes.

This mode of punishment, which is still practised in several states, has yielded in most of the states to the penitentiary system. It is still used in Maryland for wife-beating, and in Delaware for all felonies (but not for women).

Whipping has been held to be punishment worse than death; 7 Tex. 69; but see 2 Rich. 418. It is not a "cruel or unusual punishment"; 59 Md. 264.

The punishment of whipping, so far as the same was provided by the laws of the United States, was abolished by the act of congress of February 28, 1839, s. 5. See CORRECTION; SEAMEN.

This punishment has never been altogether abolished in England. At common law it was inflicted on inferior persons for petty larceny, etc.; but by the usage of the star chamber, never on a gentleman. By 1 Geo. IV. c. 57, it was abolished as to women. By 5 & 6 Vict. striking or firing at the queen is punishable with whipping thrice or fewer times. The Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 authorize the whipping of males below 16 who have been convicted of sending letters threatening to kill; placing explosives near a house, ship, etc.; defiling a girl under 13 years of age; robbing with violence (not over twenty-five stripes); but it must be done in private and only once, and the court must specify the number of strokes and the instrument. By 25 Vict. c. 18, for boys under 14, the number of stripes shall not exceed twelve with a birch rod. For the offences of robbery accompanied with personal violence, and of attempting by any means to strangle or to render insensible any one with intent to enable himself or others to commit an indictable offence, in addition to imprisonment, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 96, direct that the offender, if a man, be once, twice, or thrice privately whipped. See Whart. Lex.

It is forbidden by the constitution of South Carolina and Georgia, except that in Georgia convicts can be so punished. It is in use in some penal institutions as a means of discipline. The latter subject has of late years been examined by a commission in connection with the Elmira Reformatory.

WHISKEY. See LIQUOR LAWS.

WHITE BONNET. In Scotch Law. A fictitious bidder at an auction. Where there is no upset price, and the auction is not stated to be without reserve, there is no authority for saying that employment of such person is illegal. Burton, Law of Scotl. 869.

WHITE PERSON. As used in the naturalization laws, a person of the Caucasian race. 5 Sawy. 155. It does not include a Mongolian; id.; it includes a person nearer white than black or red; 11 Ohio 375. In the legislation of the slave period it referred to a person without admixture of colored blood, whatever the actual complexion might be; 39 Ark. 192. The words white and colored as used in the statutes providing for the maintenance of schools are held to be used in the ordinary acceptation; 9 Ohio St. 407.

WHITE RENTS. In English Law. Rents paid in silver, and called white rents, or *reddit*us albi, to distinguish them from other rents which were not paid in money. Co. 2d Inst. 19. See ALBA FIRMA.

WHOLE BLOOD. Being related by both the father and mother's side; this phrase is used in contradistinction to half blood, which is relation only on one side. See BLOOD.

WHOLESALE. To sell by wholesale is to sell by large parcels, generally in original packages, and not by retail.

WHOLESALE PRICE. The price fixed on merchandise by one who buys in large quantities of the producer or manufacturer, and who sells the same to jobbers or to retail dealers therein. 88 Ia. 169.

WIDOW. An unmarried woman whose husband is dead.

In legal writings, widow is an addition given to a woman who is unmarried and whose husband is dead. A widow who has married again cannot be a widow; 20 Q. B. D. 103. A woman surviving a man to whom she has been married, but with regard to whom she had obtained a declaration of nullity of marriage, is not a widow; 52 L. J. Ch. 239. The addition of spinster is given to a woman who never was married. Lovelace, Wills 269. See ADDITION. As to the rights of a widow, see DOWER; QUARANTINE.

WIDOW'S BENCH. The share of her husband's estate which a widow is allowed besides her jointure. Whart. Lex.

WIDOW'S CHAMBER. In London, the apparel of a widow and the furniture of her chamber, left by her deceased husband, is so called, and the widow is entitled to it. 2 Bla. Com. 518.

WIDOWER. A man whose wife is dead. A widower has a right to administer to his wife's separate estate, and, as her administrator, to collect debts due to her, generally, at common law, for his own use.

WIDOWHOOD. The state of a man whose wife is dead, or of a woman whose husband is dead. In general, there is no law to regulate the time during which a man must remain a widower, or a woman a widow, before they marry a second time. The term widowhood is mostly applied to the state or condition of a widow.

WIFE. A woman united to a man by marriage. See MARRIED WOMAN.

WIFE'S EQUITY. The equitable right of a wife to have settled upon her and her children a suitable provision out of her estate whenever the husband cannot obtain it without the aid of a court of equity. Shelf. Marr. & D. 605.

By the marriage the husband acquires an interest in the property of his wife, in consideration of the obligation which he contracts by the marriage of maintaining her and their children. The common law enforces this duty thus voluntarily assumed by him, by an action, and, therefore, allows him to alien the property to which he is thus entitled jure mariti, or in case of his bankruptcy or insolvency it would vest in his assignee for the benefit of his creditors, and the wife would be left, with her children, entirely destitute, notwithstanding her fortune may have been great. To remedy this evil, courts of equity, in certain cases, give a provision to the wife, which is called the wife's equity.

The principle upon which courts of equity act is, that he who seeks the aid of equity must do equity; and that will be withheld until an adequate settlement has been made; 1 P. Wms. 459. See 5 My. & C. 105.

Where the property is equitable and not recoverable at law, it cannot be obtained without making a settlement upon a wife and children, if one be required by her; 2 P. Wms. 639; and where, though the property be legal in its nature, it becomes from collateral circumstances the subject of a suit in equity, the wife's right to a settlement will attach; 5 My. & C. 97. See 5 Madd. 149; 18 Me. 124; 9 Watts 90; 5 Johns. Ch. 464; 2 Bland, Ch. 545.

The wife's equity to a settlement is binding not only upon the husband, but upon his assignee, under the bankrupt or insolvent laws; 3 Ves. 607; 6 Johns. Ch. 25; 4 Metc. 486; 4 Gill & J. 283; 5 T. B. Mour. 338; 10 Ala. N. S. 401; 1 Ga. 637. And even where the husband assigned the wife's equitable right for a valuable consideration, the assignee was considered liable; 4 Ves. 19. When the property of the husband is settled upon his wife and children, the settlement will be valid against subsequent creditors if at the time of the settlement being made he was not indebted; 8 Wheat. 229; 4 Mas. 443; 21 N. H. 34; 26

Miss. 717; 25 Conn. 154; but if he was then indebted it will be void as to the creditors existing at the time of the settlement; 3 Johns. Ch. 481; 5 Md. 68; 13 B. Monr. 496; 8 Wheat. 229; unless in cases where the husband received a fair consideration in value for the thing settled, so as to repel the presumption of fraud; 10 Ves. 139; 6 Ind. 121; 28 Ala. N. S. 432; 7 Pick. 533.

As to the amount of the rights of the wife, the general rule is that one-half of the wife's property shall be settled upon her; 2 Atk. 423; 3 Ves. Ch. 166. But it is in the discretion of the court to give her an adequate settlement for herself and children; 5 Johns. Ch. 464; 6 id. 25; 3 Cow. 591; 1 Des. Eq. 268; 2 Bland, Ch. 546; 1 Cox N. J. 158; 5 B. Monr. 31; 3 Ga. 193; 9 S. & S. 597.

Whenever the wife insists upon her equity, the right will be extended to her children; but the right is strictly personal to the wife, and her children cannot insist upon it after her death; 2 Ed. Ch. 337; 1 J. & W. 472; 1 Madd. 467; 11 Bligh N. S. 104; 2 Johns. Ch. 206; 3 Cow. 591; 10 Ala. N. S. 401.

The wife's equity will be barred by an adequate settlement having been made upon her; 2 Ves. Ch. 675; by living in adultery apart from her husband; 4 Ves. Ch. 146; but a female ward of court, married without its consent, will not be barred although she should be living in adultery; 1 Ves. & B. Ch. 302.

See White & T. L. C. Eq.

WILD ANIMALS. Animals in a state of nature; animals feræ naturæ. See WHELP; ANIMALS; FERÆ NATURÆ.

WILFULLY. Intentionally.

In charging certain offences, it is required that they should be stated to be wilfully done. Archb. Cr. Pl. 51, 58; Leach 556. In an indictment charging a wilful killing, it means intentionally and not by accident; 116 Mo. 96.

It is distinguished from maliciously in not implying an evil mind; L. R. 2 Cr. Cas. Res. 161.

It implies that the act is done knowingly and of stubborn purpose, but not with malice; 97 N. C. 465; and in penal statutes, it means with evil intent, or with legal malice; 98 Cal. 268; or with a bad purpose; 20 Mass. 220, quoted in 155 U. S. 446. It is frequently understood as signifying an evil intent without justifiable excuse; 1 Bish. Cr. Law 428.

In Pennsylvania it has been decided that the word maliciously was an equivalent for the word wilfully, in an indictment for arson. 5 Whart. 427. See MENS REA.

WILL. The disposition of one's property, to take effect after death. Swinb. Wills pt. 1, § 2; Godolphin pt. 1, c. 1, s. 2.

The term will, as an expression of the final disposition of one's property, is confined to the English laws and those countries which derive their jurisprudence from that source. The term testamentum, or testament, is exclusively used in the Roman civil law and by the continental writers upon that subject. Some controversy seems to exist whether the word testamentum is strictly derived from testatum or from that in combination with mentis. There does not seem to be much point in this controversy, for in either view the result is the same. It is the final declaration of the person in regard to the disposition of his property. It is his testimony upon that subject, and that is the expression of his mind and will in relation to it.

The practice of allowing the owner of property to direct its destination after his death is of very ancient date. Genesis, xlviii. 28; Gal. iii. 15; Plutarch's Life of Solon; Roman Laws of the Twelve Tables. But wills are not like succession, a law of nature. A stage where they are not recognised always, in every society, precedes the time when they are allowed. In their early growth they were not regarded as a method of distributing a dead man's goods, but as a means of transferring the power and authority of a family to a new chief. It is not until the latter portion of the middle ages that they become a mode of diverting property from the family or of distributing it according to the fancy of the owner. Maine, Anc. Law 171-217. Nor is the power to dispose of property by will a constitutional right. It depends almost wholly upon statute; 100 Mass. 234. See TAX.

The right of disposing of property by will did not exist in early times among the ancient Germans, or with the Spartans under the laws of Lycurgus, or the Athenians before the time of Solon. 4 Kent 502, and note.

And in England, until comparatively a recent period, this right was to be exercised under considerable restrictions, even as to personal estate. 2 Bla. Com. 492.

Until the statute of 32 & 34 Henry VIII., called the statute of wills, the wife and children were each entitled to claim of the executor their reasonable portion of the testator's goods, i. e. each one-third part. So that if one had both a wife and children, he could only dispose of one-third of his personal estate, and if he had either a wife or child, but not both, he could dispose of one-half; Fitzh. N. B. 122 H (b), 9th ed.; 2 Saund. 66, n. (9); 2 Bla. Com. 492. All restrictions are now removed from the disposition of property by will, in England, whether real or personal, by the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 731. As to the history of the rise of the English will, see 11 Harv. L. Rev. 69. And in the Roman civil law the children were always entitled to their share, or legitime, being one-fourth part of the estate, of which they could not be deprived by the will of their father. The legitime was by the emperor Justinian increased to one-third part of the estate where there were four or a less number of children, and if more than four then they might claim one-half the estate, notwithstanding the will. Novell. 18, c. 1; 2 Domat, Civil Law 15. See LEGITIME.

And by the existing law of the state of Louisiana, one is restrained of disposing of his whole estate if he have children. One child may claim one-third of the estate, two may claim half, and three two-thirds, as their legitime, or reasonable part of the estate. See Louisiana Code.

According to the civil law the naming of an executor was of the essence of a will; and that constituted the essential difference between a will and a codicil; the latter, not making any such appointment (absque executoris constitutione), was, on that account, called an unsolemn last will. Swinb. Wills 29. The executor under a Roman will succeeded to the entire legal position of the deceased. He continued the legal personality of the testator, taking all the property as his own, and becoming liable for all the obligations. Maine, Anc. Law 196.

In the United States the homestead laws in some states affect the validity of wills by making void a husband's devise of homestead land; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 740. See same citation for regulations in various states as to devises to corporations, or for charitable purposes.

A testator, by his will, may make any disposition of his property not inconsistent with the laws or contrary to the policy of the state; 77 Ga. 636; 84 Ala. 48.

An instrument testamentary in form, which contains no disposition of property, is no will and should not be admitted to probate. So held of a writing merely making a declaration of legitimacy of two children, and revoking all previous testamentary dispositions; 5 Ohio Leg. News 505; and a letter to an undertaker authorizing the cremation of the writer's body, and saying, "My brother will be sole administrator and take charge of the estate," was held not to appoint an executor, or make a devise, or be entitled to probate; 118 Cal. 428.

Wills are unwritten or nuncupative, and written. See NUNCUPATIVE WILL.

A will may be written in pencil. But it is a strong indication that the will so written was not a final act, but merely a deliberative one. This indication may, however, be overcome by proof; 84 Pa. 510; 1 Hagg. 219; 3 Moo. P. C. 223; 23 Beav. 195. It was held in Pennsylvania that writing on a slate is insufficient; 11 Phila. 541; but in a note to the citation of this case a quære is suggested whether a slate and pencil might not be used in an extreme case; Schoul. Wills § 258, note.

One may bind himself to dispose of his property in a certain way, and such contract will, in a proper case, be specifically enforced; but if it respects realty it must be in writing under the statute of frauds; 90 Va. 728. Where a will was executed by the testator in extremis upon the assurance of one of three residuary legatees that a bequest intended by the testator to be made, but omitted from the will, should be executed as if made; it was held that the share of the legatee making the promise should contribute its ratable proportion of the omitted bequest, and the question whether such a promise by one of a class of legatees or devisees was binding on the others was left undecided; 37 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 735.

THE TESTATOR'S CAPACITY. He must be of the age of discretion, which, by the common law of England, was fixed at twelve in females, and fourteen in males; Swinburne, pt. 2, § 2, pl. 6; Godolphin, pt. 1, c. 8, § 1; 1 Will. Ex. 13; 1 Jarm. Wills 29.

This is now regulated by statute, both in England and most of the United States. The period of competency to execute a will, in England, is fixed at twenty-one years, and the same rule is adopted in many of the United States, and the disposition is strongly manifested in that direction throughout the states; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 748, note.

"Sound mind and memory," which constitute testamentary capacity, may be properly described as that condition which would render the testator capable of transacting the ordinary business of life; 126 Ill. 507.

Though a will be dictated by testator when entirely competent, it is none the less invalid if executed by him at a time when he was not of sound and disposing mind; 19 D. C. 495.

Aliens. By the common law in England, an alien could not devise or take by devise, real estate; and an alien enemy could not devise personalty until 33 Vict. c. 14. § 2. This rule is now, in the United States, much altered by statute; 1 Redf. Wills 8–14; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 743, note. Indians, in the absence of statute on the subject, are governed by the same law as resident aliens: p. 745 of last citation. See same citation as to convicts, for whom the regulations are mostly statutory. Coverture was a disability in the execution of a will, unless by the consent of the husband; 2 Bla. Com. 498; 4 Kent 505; 1 Will. Ex. 42. But a married woman could not, even with her husband's consent, devise land, because she would thereby exclude her heir; otherwise with chattels; 12 Mass. 525; 16 N. H. 194; 10 S. & R. 445; 15 N. J. Eq. 384. In the United States the disability as to coverture has been largely changed by statute; 1 Redf. Wills 22–29; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 752, note. Blindness is so far an incapacity that it requires express and satisfactory proof that the testator understood the contents of the will, in addition to what is required in other cases; 1 Rob. Eccl. 278; 3 Strobh. 297; 1 Jarm. Wills 49. Deaf and dumb persons will labor under a similar inconvenience, and especially in communicating with the witnesses, unless they have been educated so as to be able to write; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 13. But the witnesses must, to be present with the testator, be within the possible cognizance of his remaining senses; Richardson, J., in 1 Spears 256. Persons deaf, dumb, and blind were formerly esteemed wholly incapable of making a will; but that class of persons are now placed upon the same basis as the two former, with only the additional embarrassment attending the defect of another sense; 1 Will. Ex. 17, 18; 1 Redf. Wills 53. A speechless paralytic, who retained his interest in and knowledge of the details of his business, and whose mind was unimpaired up to the time of his death, was held capable of making a will where his wishes as to the disposition of his property were communicated by negative and affirmative replies to questions asked him, and, after it had been written, it was read to him item by item, and his assent given by nods of his head; 22 Ore. 551.

Idiots are wholly incapable of executing a will, whether the defect of the understanding is congenital or accidental. Lunatics are incapable of executing a last will and testament, except during such a lucid interval as allows the exercise of memory and judgment. It must be an absolute, but not necessarily a perfect, restoration, to reason and reflection, and not a mere temporary remission; Tayl. Med. Jur. 642; 3 Bro. C. C. 441; 3 Add. Eccl. 79; Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. Atl. 579; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 255; Rush, Mind 162; Ray, Med. Jur. § 279; Combe, Ment. Der.

241; 9 Ves. Ch. 611; 18 id. 87; 12 Am. L. Reg. 385; 1 Phila. 90; 31 N. J. Eq. 633; 94 Ill. 560; 26 Wend. 255; 1 Redfield on Wills 107, 120. But mere weakness of understanding is not sufficient to invalidate a will, if the testator is capable of comprehending the object in view; 17 Ark. 292; 2 Bradf. 42; 2 J. J. Marsh. 340; 10 S. & R. 84. Nor as a matter of law is a testator of unsound mind, if he mistakenly believed that his relatives had mistreated him, and therefore made no provision for them in his will; 94 Cal. 406. See 67 Hun 408; 37 W. Va. 38.

When a testator has the legal capacity to make a will he has the legal right to make an unequal, unjust, or unreasonable will; 29 W. Va. 784; 32 id. 119; 84 Ala. 58. The fact that a will is unreasonable is not enough to render it invalid; 96 Cal. 448; but it tends to prove invalidity; 68 Conn. 365.

A belief in spiritualism does not constitute incapacity to make a will; 53 Md. 376; 96 Cal. 448; 161 Ill. 114; see 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 569; especially if the views held thereon had nothing to do with making the will; id.; nor moral insanity; 25 N. Y. S. 109; nor delusions, except so far as they concern the person to whom they relate; 62 Wis. 216; 20 Oreg. 239; see 121 N. Y. 406 (unless they are insane delusions; 53 Md. 376); nor partial unsoundness; L. R. 5 Q. B. 549; 62 Barb. 250; nor does incapacity to manage one's ordinary affairs; 136 Mass. 145; nor advanced age, nor enfeebled condition; 72 N. Y. 269; nor failure of memory alone; unless it be total or extend to the members of his family or property; 4 Kent 510; if the testator comprehends the nature and extent of his property and the nature of the claims of those he is excluding, he is competent; 71 Mo. 553; L. R. 5 Q. B. 549; 5 N. Y. Surr. 204; 3 Redf. 384; 75 Ill. 260; L. R. 3 P. & D. 64; 21 Vt. 168; 37 W. Va. 38; 85 Va. 546; 50 N. J. Eq. 428, 439; 88 Mich. 567; 162 Pa. 567; 114 Mo. 35; 134 Ind. 437; 94 Cal. 406. The nature and character of the will are generally irrelevant; 28 Barb. 653; 39 N. Y. 153; though unreasonable or unnatural provisions are evidence of mental defect; 104 Pa. 199; 105 Ind. 456; 126 N. Y. 423.

A finding that a testator was insane at any time prior to the making of the will does not support a presumption that the insanity continued to the making of the will, unless it is also found that the insanity is habitual and fixed; 97 Ala. 731; 65 Vt. 370. When it appears that the will is the direct offspring of monomania it should be held invalid, notwithstanding the general soundness of the testator; 6 Ga. 324; 7 Gill 10; 8 Watts 70. See, also, 6 Moore, P. C. 341, 349; 12 Jurist 947, where Lord Brougham contends for the extreme notion that every person laboring under any form of partial insanity or monomania is incompetent to execute a valid will, because the mind being one and entire, if unsound in any part it is an unsound mind. This extreme view will scarcely gain final acceptance in the courts; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 18, contra.

As to the burden of proof in contests of wills, on the ground of mental incapacity of the testator, see 36 Cent. Law J. 408; 93 Mich. 284; 129 Ill. 392; 146 id. 337; 110 Mo. 456; 95 Ala. 486.

Delirium from disease or stimulus. This, while the paroxysm continues to such an extent as to deprive a person of the right exercise of reason, is a sufficient impediment to the execution of a will; Ray, Ins. §§ 253, 254, 390; Tayl. Med. Jur. 626; Rush, Mind 282; 18 Ves. Ch. 12; 17 Jur. 1045; 1 Ves. Sen. 19. See, also, 2 Aik. Vt. 167; 1 Bibb 168. But there is not the same presumption of the continuance of this species of mental perversion, whether it proceed from the intoxication of stimulus or the delirium of fever, as in ordinary insanity; 3 Hill, So. C. 68; 4 Metc. Mass. 545. See DELIRIUM FEBRILE; DELIRIUM TREMENS; DRUNKENNESS; DEMENTIA; IDIOT. Fraud. If a person is induced by fraud or undue influence to make a will or legacy, such will or legacy is void; 4 Ves. 802; 6 H. L. Cas. 2; 35 N. Y. 559; 50 Md. 466, 480; 1 Jarm. Wills (5th ed.) 35; 1 Redf. Wills 507–537. See UNDUE INFLUENCE.

THE MODE OF EXECUTION. This depends upon the particular form of the statutory requirements; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 763, note, et seq.

In New York an attorney may be a witness to the preparation and execution of the will in case he is one of the subscribing witnesses thereto; Laws, 1892, ch. 514.

Under the English statute of frauds, 29 Car. II., as "signing" only was required, it was held that a mark was sufficient; 3 Nev. & P. 228; 8 Ad. & E. 94; 10 Paige, Ch. N. Y. 85. And under the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26, the same form of execution is required so far as signing is concerned. But sealing seems not to be sufficient where signing is required; 1 Wils. 313; 1 Jarm. Wills 69, 70, and cases cited. So, it was immaterial in what part of the will the testator signed. It was sufficient if the instrument began, I, A B, etc., and was in the handwriting of the testator, and he treated that as signing or did not regard the instrument as incomplete, as it evidently would be so long as he intended to do some further act to authenticate it; 3 Lev. 1; Freem. 538; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 403, pl. 9; Prec. in Chanc. 184; 21 Vt. 256. But, if it appear from the form of attestation at the close, or in any other way, that the testator did not regard the instrument as complete, the introduction of the testator's name at the beginning, in his own handwriting, is not a sufficient signing; Dougl. 241; 1 Gratt. 454; 13 id. 664; 10 Paige, Ch. 85. See 7 Q. B. 450. Where the whole of the disposing portion of a will was written on the first side of a sheet of foolscap, the second and third sides being blank, while the attestation clause, with the signatures of the testator and the witnesses, was on the fourth side, the will was held to be duly executed; [1892] Prob. 377. It was not held necessary under the statute of frauds of Charles II. that the witnesses should subscribe in the presence of each other. They might attest the execution at different times; Prec. in Chanc. 184; 1 Ves. Ch. 12; 1 Will. Ex. 79. But the statute 1 Vict. requires both the witnesses to be present when the testator signs the will or acknowledges his signature; and they must afterwards attest in the presence of the testator, although not of each other; 3 Curt. Eccl. 659; 1 Will. Ex. 79, and note; 84 Ala. 53; 64 Md. 138.

In Wisconsin by act of April 3, 1895, it is provided that the signature of the testator made by another shall be attested and subscribed by witnesses in the presence of each other; Laws, 1895, c. 120.

The term "presence" in a statute requiring the subscription of witnesses to a will, to be made in the presence of a testator, means "conscious presence"; 85 Va. 546.

A joint will, executed by two brothers, revocable at the will of either, is valid; 92 Ky. 76.

Olograph wills in general require no attestation; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 767, note.

The statutes in the different states differ to some extent, but agree substantially with the English statute of Charles II. In Pennsylvania no subscribing witnesses are required except to a will containing a gift to charity. In Louisiana upon the probate of an olographic will the judge is required to interrogate witnesses and make sure that they know the handwriting; Laws, 1896, c. 119. Olographic wills are valid in Nevada; Laws, 1895, c. 111.

The testator must sign before the witnesses subscribe; L. R. 2 P. & D. 97; 89 N. Y. 158. But if the testator acknowledge his signature, so that the witnesses can see it at the time, it is enough; 7 P. D. 102. A will may be signed by another, if done in the testator's presence and at his request, when he cannot write; 58 N. H. 7; or is physically incapacitated; 46 S. C. 299; but see 94 Tenn. 538.

The competency of witnesses and the validity of devises to witnesses, or to the husband or wife of a witness, are questions usually controlled by statute; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 775, note, et seq.

PUBLICATION. The best-considered cases, under statutes similar to that of Charles II., only require the production of the instrument by the testator for the purpose of being attested by the witnesses, if it bear his signature; 11 Cush. 532; 1 Burr. 421; 3 id. 1775; 4 Burn, Eccl. Law 102; 6 Bingh. 310; 7 id. 457; 7 Taunt. 361; 1 Cr. & M. 140; 3 Curt. Eccl. 181; 30 Ga. 808; 2 Barb. 385; 46 Ill. 61; 34 Me. 162; 3 Redf. 74; 44 Wisc. 392; 50 N. J. Eq. 742. Where a will or codicil refers to an existing unattested will or other paper, it thereby becomes a part of the will; 2 Ves. Ch. 298; 1 Ad. & E. 423; 1 Will. Ex. 86, and note; 1 Rob. Eccl. 81; but a document referred to in a will, which is not in existence at the time of its execution, does not constitute a part of the will, and is not entitled to probate as such; 74 Cal. 144. Witnesses may attest by a mark; 8 Ves. Ch. 185, 504; 5 Johns. 144; 4 Kent 514, n.; 51 Ark. 48.

REVOCATION. The mode of revocation of a will provided in the statute of frauds, Car. II., is by "burning, cancelling, tearing, or obliterating the same." See 47 Minn. 171. In the present English statute of wills, the terms used are "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying." If the testator has torn off or effaced his seal and signature at the end of a will, it will be presumed to have been done animo revocandi; 1 Add. Eccl. 78: 25 N. J. Eq. 501. So, too, where lines were drawn over the name of the testator; 64 Hun 635; 83 Ala. 432. So, also, where the instrument had been cut out from its marginal frame, although not otherwise defaced, except that the attestation clause was cut through, it was held to amount to a revocation; 1 Phill. Eccl. 375, 406.

It is not requisite in order to effect the revocation that the testator should effect the destruction of the instrument. It is sufficient if he threw it upon the fire with the intention of destroying it, although some one snatch it off after it is slightly burned, and preserve it without his knowledge; 2 W. Blackst. 1043. But it would seem that it must be an actual burning or tearing to some extent,—an intention merely to do the acts not coming within the statute; 6 Ad. & E. 209; 2 Nev. & P. 615. See 47 Minn. 171. But, aside from the statute, a mere intention to revoke evidenced by any other act, will be effectual to revoke: as, burning or tearing, etc.; 8 Ad. & E. 1. How much the will must be burned or torn to constitute a revocation under the statute of frauds was left by the remarks of the different judges in Doe v. Harris, 6 Ad. & E. 209, in perplexing uncertainty; 1 Williams, Ex. 121.

If the testator is arrested in his purpose of revocation before he regards it as complete, it will be no revocation, although he tore the will to some extent; 3 B. & Ald. 489.

It is held in England that a letter, duly signed and attested, requesting a third person to destroy the testator's will, is sufficient to revoke it; 2 P. & D. 406.

A will may be revoked in part; 2 Rob. Eccl. 562, 572. But partial revocations which were made in anticipation of making a new will, and intended to be conditional upon that, are not regarded as complete until the new will is executed; 1 Add. Eccl. 409; 2 id. 316. See 8 Sim. 73. Thus a "memorandum of my intended will" was upheld as a will, and held not to be revoked by the drawing up of a new will which was not signed; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 236; 14 C. L. J. 248.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a testator wanted his will to be revoked in the event of a certain contingency happening before his death; 13 Rept. (Md.) 526; but see, contra, 3 Sw. & Tr. 282.

By the present English statute, every obliteration or interlineation or alteration of a will is required to be complete so that the words obliterated or their effect are not apparent, and they must be authenticated in the same mode that the execution of the will is required to be. Hence, unless such alterations are signed by the testator, and attested by two witnesses, they are not to be regarded as made, however obvious the intention of the testator may be. But if the words are so obliterated as to be no longer legible, they are treated as blanks in the will; 3 Curt. Eccl. 761.

The mere act of defacing a will by accident and without the intention to revoke, or under the misapprehension that a later will is good, will not operate as a revocation; 1 P. Wms. 345; Cowp. 52; 1 Saund. 279 b, c; 1 Add. Eccl. 53. The revocation of a will is prima facie a revocation of the codicils; 4 Hagg. Eccl. 361. But it is competent to show that such was not the testator's intention; 2 Add. Eccl. 230; 1 Curt. Eccl. 269; 1 Will. Ex. 134. The same capacity is requisite to revoke as to make a will; 7 Dana 94; 11 Wend. 227; 9 Gill 169; 7 Humphr. 92. A testator who is insane cannot revoke an existing will; 65 Cal. 19; [1893] P. 282; 73 Mo. 595; and tearing a will while suffering from delirium tremens is not a revocation; L. R. 3 P. & D. 37.

Revocation induced by fraud or undue influence is not effectual; 73 Me. 595; 68 Md. 203.

The making of a new will purporting on its face to be the testator's last will, and containing no reference to any other paper, and being a disposition of all the testator's property, and so executed as to be operative, will be a revocation of all former wills, notwithstanding it contain no express words of revocation; 2 Curt. Eccl. 468; 18 Jur. 560; 4 Moore, P. C. 29; 2 Dall. 266. So the appointment of an executor is a circumstance indicating the exclusiveness of the instrument; 1 Macq. Hou. L. 163, 173. And the revocation will become operative, notwithstanding the second will becomes inoperative from the incapacity of the devisee; 1 Pick. 535, 543.

It is regarded as the prima facie presumption from the revocation of a later will, a former one being still in existence and uncancelled, that the testator did intend its restoration without any formal republication; 4 Burr. 2512; Cowp. 92; 3 Phill. Eccl. 554; 2 Dall. 266. But it is still regarded as mainly a question of intention to be decided by all the facts and circumstances of the case; 1 How. Miss. 336; 2 Add. Eccl. 125; 3 Curt. Eccl. 770; 1 Moore, P. C. 299, 301; 1 Will. Ex. 155, 156; 2 Dall. 266; 86 Tenn. 173. The revocation of a will by intentionally destroying it will not revive a former will which was expressly revoked by the later one: 72 Tex. 281; and revocation by the mere execution of a subsequent will without a clause of revocation is denied, but it is held that the destruction of the later will revives the former one; 37 L. R. A. (Mich.) 561; 142 Mass. 515, in which case the testator had made three successive wills, intending to choose one of them and then cancelled the first and third; but it will not where the testator intended to make a new one; 86 Tenn. 173. The probability of there having been a revocation can be shown by proving the testator's verbal statements concerning his will; 11 Biss. 256; but a declaration of an intent to make a will at a future time, even when made as a formal recital in a deed, is not a revocation of an earlier will; 110 Pa. 232. Where there has been an act sufficient to constitute a revocation, it would seem that a verbal statement as to the intent of such act would be evidence. See 63 N. H. 485. An express revocation must be made in conformity with the statute, and proved by the same force of evidence requisite to establish the will in the first instance; 8 Bingh. 479; 1 Will. Ex. 160. If one republish a prior will, it amounts to a revocation of all later wills or codicils; 1 Add. Eccl. 38; 7 Term 138. A subsequent will containing a clause revoking former wills is not evidence of revocation until it is admitted to probate; 139 Mass. 164; 138 id. 116.

When a will, once known to exist, and to have been in the custody of the testator, cannot be found after his decease, the legal presumption is that it was destroyed by the testator with the intention of revoking it; 47 Ohio St. 323; where a will was executed in duplicate and the one retained by testatrix was not forthcoming at her decease, it was held that she was presumed to have destroyed it, animo revocandi; 58 L. T. R. 60.

Implied revocations were very common before the statute of frauds. But since the new statute of 1 Vict. c. 26, § 19, as to all estates real and personal, it is provided that no will shall be revoked on the ground of a presumed intention resulting from change of circumstances. Before that, it was held under the statute of frauds, by a succession of decisions, that, even as to lands, the marriage of the testator and the birth of children who were unprovided for was such a change of circumstances as to work an implied revocation of the will; 2 Show. 242; 4 Burr. 2171, 2182, in note; and, finally, by all the judges in England in the exchequer chamber; 8 Ad. & E. 14; 2 Nev. & P. 504. This latter case seems finally to have prevailed in England until the new statute; 2 Moore, P. C. 51, 63, 64; 2 Curt. Eccl. 854; 1 Rob. Eccl. 680. And the subsequent death of the child or children will not revive the will without republication; 1 Phill. Eccl. 342; 2 id. 266. See 63 Ia. 124.

The marriage alone or the birth of a child alone is not always sufficient to operate a revocation; 4 Burr. 2171; Ambl. 487, 557, 721; 5 Term 52, and note. The marriage alone of a woman will work a revocation; 4 Rep. 61. See 131 N. Y. 620; 90 Va. 728; 88 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 427. Not so the marriage alone of a man. See statutes providing for revocation of will on the marriage of the testator; Mass. Laws, 1892, ch. 118; Arizona Laws, 1891, ch. 92. But the birth of a child, with circumstances favoring such a result, may amount to an implied revocation; 5 Term 52, and note; 1 Phil. Eccl. 147. See 50 Fed. Rep. 310; 63 Ia. 124. A will not made in contemplation of matrimony is revoked by the marriage of the testator and the birth of a posthumous child; 31 Fla. 139; 70 Ga. 464. For the history of the common law on this subject, see 4 Johns. Ch. 510 et seq. In the absence of statute this rule of the common law may be considered abrogated in those states which give a married woman unrestricted testamentary powers. This matter is controlled in most of the American states, more or less, by statute; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's ed.) 783, note. In many of them a posthumous child unprovided for in the will of the father inherits the same as if no will had been made; 160 Pa. 433. In others, all children born after the execution of the will, and in some states all children not provided for in the will, are placed on the same ground as if no will existed; 1 Will. Ex. 170, n. 1, 171, n. 1.

By the express provisions of the act of 1 Vict. the marriage of the testator, whether man or woman, amounts to a revocation; 1 Jarm. Wills 106–173. See 89 Law T. 20. Subsequent marriage revokes the antenuptial will made by a wife; 141 Mass. 75; contra, 60 N. H. 439. The adoption of a child does not revoke an antecedent will of the adopting parent; 124 Ind. 1.

Where a will is executed in duplicate, only one part of which the testator retains, if he destroys that one, an intention to revoke is presumed; 84 Ala. 53.

REPUBLICATION. This, under the statute of frauds, could only be done in the same manner a will of lands was required to be first executed. And the same rule obtains under the statute of 1 Vict., and in many, perhaps most, of the American states. The general rule may be said to be, that a will can be republished only by an instrument of as high a nature as that which revoked it. Thus a will once revoked by written declaration cannot be republished by parol; 2 Conn. 67; 9 Johns. 312; 12 Ired. L. 355; 7 Jones (N. C.) L. 134. In Pennsylvania, a parol republication is allowed. But the intention of the testator to republish must be clearly proved; 1 Grant, Cas. 75; 2 Whart. 108. It is doubtful, however, if parol evidence alone is sufficient; 10 Ired. L. 459. A codicil ratifying and confirming a will, in whole or in part, will amount to a republication of the will, as of the date of the codicil; 30 Neb. 149.

Constructive republication is effected by means of a codicil, unless neutralized by internal evidence of a contrary intention; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 406, D, pl. 5; 1 Ves. Sen. 437; 1 Jarm. Wills 175, and notes; 3 Pick. 213.

PROBATE OF WILLS. The proof of a will of personal property must always be made in the probate court. But in England the probate of the will is not evidence in regard to real estate. In most of the American states the same rule obtains in regard to real as to personal estate—as the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction, in most of the states, in all matters pertaining to the settlement of estates; 9 Co. 36, 38 a; 4 Term 260; 1 Jarm. Wills 118; 8 N. H. 124; 12 Metc. 421; 8 Ohio 5. An executor who offers a will for probate in Maryland is required to be examined on oath whether or not he knows of any other will or codicil; Laws, 1890, ch. 416.

In New York on petition for probate of will the surrogate must cite all persons in being who would take an interest in any portion of the property, executors, and trustees; Laws, 1891, ch. 174.

In Vermont there is a provision by statute for notice to legatees on the admission to probate of a will containing bequests to associations: Laws, 1892, ch. 47.

In Oregon wills must be recorded in all counties in which the testator left real property; Laws 1891, p. 3. A will refused probate for want of testamentary capacity in the state of testator's domicil has been admitted to probate in another state where lands passed under it; 4 Call 89; and see 45 La. Ann. 1237. See PROBATE OF WILLS.

The probate of a will has no effect out of the jurisdiction of the court before which probate is made, either as to persons or property in a foreign jurisdiction: 8 Ves. Ch. 44; 1 Johns. Ch. 153; 12 Vt. 589; Story, Confl. Laws §§ 512–517. In regard to the probate of wills passing realty, the lex rei sitæ governs; personalty is controlled by the lex domicilii; Whart. Confl. Laws §§ 570, 587, 592; 3 Bradf. 379; Story, Confl. Laws §§ 69, 431; 10 Moore, P. C. 306. But the indorsement of negotiable paper by the executor or administrator in the place of his appointment will enable the indorsee to maintain an action in a foreign state upon the paper in his own name; 9 Wend. 425. But see 5 Me. 261; 2 N. H. 291, where the rule is held otherwise. The executor may dispose of bank-shares in a foreign state without proving the will there: 12 Metc. 421.

Any person interested in the will may compel probate of it by application to the probate court, who will summon the executor or party having the custody of it; 4 Pick. 33; 3 Bacon, Abr. 34, Executors. The judge of probate may cite the executor to prove the will at the instance of any one claiming an interest; 4 Pick. 33; 1 Will. Ex. 201; 1 Jarm. Wills 224. The attesting witnesses are indispensable, if the contestants so insist, as proof of the execution and authenticity of the will and the competency of the testator, when they can be had; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 691; 1 Jarm. Wills 226, and note. But if all or part of the subscribing witnesses are absent from the state, deceased, or disqualified, then their handwriting must be proved; 9 Ves. Ch. 381; 19 Johns. 186; 1 Jarm. Wills 226, and notes. And see 17 Ga. 364; 9 Pick. 350; 6 Rand. 33. It will be presumed that the requisite formalities were complied with when the attestation is formal, unless the contrary appear; 8 Md. 15; 11 N. Y. 220; 30 Pa. 218; 1 Jarm. Wills 228, and notes; 36 S. C. 428. But it has sometimes been held that no such presumption will be made in the absence of a subscribing witness who might be called; 19 Johns. 386. While the probate of a will settles the question of due execution, it does not establish validity, or determine its force and effect upon titles to real estate claimed under it; 50 Fed. Rep. 310. Wills over thirty years old, and appearing regular and perfect, and coming from the proper custody, are said to prove themselves; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 21, 570. See LOST INSTRUMENT.

In most of the United States statutory provision has been made for proving foreign wills by exemplified copy; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's edition) 725, note.

GIFTS VOID FOR UNCERTAINTY. Where the subject-matter of the gifts is not so defined in the will as to be ascertained with reasonable certainty; 25 Pa. 460; 12 Gratt. 196; 1 Jarm. Will 317; 1 Swanst. 201; the person intended to be benefited may not be so described or named that he can be identified. But, in general, by rejecting obvious mistakes, this kind of uncertainty is overcome; 1 Jarm. Wills 330–348, and notes. Determinate meanings have now been assigned to numerous doubtful words and phrases, and rules of construction adopted by the courts, which render devises void for uncertainty less frequent than formerly; 1 Jarm. Wills 356–383. A will otherwise effective, should not be refused probate because certain bequests contained therein are void for uncertainty; 74 Cal. 144; 27 Abb. N. C. 429; 4 Misc. Rep. 282; 76 Hun 469; 89 Tenn. 219. By statute in California when the validity of a gift, devise, or trust under a will is involved in an action, the will is admissible as evidence, and the validity of the gift, devise, or trust shall be determined; Laws, 1895, p. 77.

The testator's body cannot be disposed of by his will, because the law recognizes no property in a dead body, and it is the duty of the executor to bury it; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 508.

PAROL EVIDENCE, HOW FAR ADMISSIBLE. The rule in regard to the admissibility of parol evidence to vary, control, or to render intelligible the words of a will, is not essentially different from that which obtains in regard to contracts. It may be received to show the state of the testator, the nature and condition of his property, his relation to the contestants, and all the surrounding circumstances. But this is done to place the court in the condition of the testator, in order as far as practicable to enable them the more fully to understand the sense in which he probably used the language found in his will; 1 Nev. & M. 524; 15 Pick. 400; 1 Phill. Ev. 532–547; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 287–289; 1 Jarm. Wills 349, and notes; 2 Ired. 192. To ascertain the intention of testator, circumstances existing at the date of the execution of a will, but not those subsequent thereto, are admissible in evidence; 133 N. Y. 456; 154 Pa. 523; 92 Ga. 216. Letters and oral declarations of the testator are not admissible to show the intention of the testator; 2 Vern. 625; 14 Johns. 1; 2 W. & S. 455. But see 22 Wend. 148. Parol evidence is not admissible to supply any word or defect in the will; 7 Gill & J. 127; 8 Conn. 254; 23 Barb. 285; 27 Ala. N. S. 489. Parol declarations of the testator about the time of making the will are often admitted to show the state of mind, capacity, and understanding of the testator; but they are not to be used to show his intention; that must be learned from the language used; 8 Conn. 254; 156 Mass. 379; id. 265. Parol evidence is inadmissible to prove that a gift to a nephew was really intended for the wife's nephew of the same name; 187 Pa. 118; but see 12 Harv. L. Rev. 210. See, generally, Tud. Lead. Cas. R. P. 918; Wigram, Wills.

Foreign Wills. Where a German testator specially appointed a person in England to realize on his English estate and transmit the proceeds to the German executor, the court declined to grant probate to these persons as executors according to the tenor of the will; [1894] 2 Q. B. 260.

Where property was settled upon English trustees with power of appointment, the owner of the power exercised the power it gave by will made in English form but invalid by French law. It was held that the appointment was valid; L. R. 1 P. D. 90.

There may be independent wills in different jurisdictions; [1894] P. 9; [1896] P. 65.

Where a testator made two separate wills dealing separately with English and Scotch assets, the court being satisfied that no creditor would be prejudiced, granted letters under the English will without requiring the Scotch will to be incorporated, upon condition that a copy thereof should be filed and a note to that effect made on the probate; [1891] P. 285.

Where an executor was absent and expected to be absent for two years and had given X a power of attorney to act for him, administration with the will annexed was granted to X for the benefit of the executor; [1891] P. 251.

In Georgia no more witnesses are required to prove a foreign will of personalty than for its execution; Laws, 1892, p. 112. A New York statute of May 14, 1892, Laws, c. 591, provides how the validity of a will may be tested in court, and a South Carolina act of Dec. 24, 1891, Laws, c. 722, prescribes the proceedings where a person producing a will is a non-resident.

In Criminal Law. The power of the mind which directs the action of a man.

In criminal jurisprudence, the necessity of the concurrence of the will is deemed so far indispensable that, in general, those persons are held not amenable as offenders against the law who have merely done the act prohibited, without the concurrence of the will. This has reference to different classes of persons who are regarded as laboring under defect of will, and are, therefore, incapable of committing crime.

Infants, who, from want of age, are excused from punishment. The age of discretion, or capacity for crime, is fixed, by the common law of England, at fourteen years; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29; 1 Russ. Cr. 2; and between males and females, no distinction is made in regard to capacity for crime; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29.

Below the age of seven years, infants are presumed so incapable of any malicious design as not to incur the guilt of felony or of any other crime; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. supra.

Between the ages of seven and fourteen years, an infant, although presumed, prima facie, incapable of incurring the guilt of crime, is, nevertheless, liable to trial and to be proved guilty upon the facts of the particular case evincing guilty consciousness. The reports abound with cases where clear evidence of criminal consciousness was shown, and of very marked atrocity, from the age of nine years and upward; 1 Russ. Cr. 2–6; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29. See INFANT; DISCRETION.

Persons laboring under mental imbecility are not amenable for crime. See INSANITY; LUCID INTERVALS.

Persons subject to the power of others. This exemption from crime, in the English common law, extends to the wife while in the immediate presence and under the power of the husband, but not to a child or servant. And in respect of the enormity of the offences of treason and murder, the wife even is not excused by the command of the husband; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 44, 516; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 1, s. 14. The wife is liable, too, for all offences committed not in the presence of the husband, and also where she is the principal party concerned; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 1, § 14; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 44, 516. The distinction between the wife and the child and especially the servant, where the relation of master and servant is of a permanent character, or where the law gives the master unlimited control over the acts of the servant, seems not to rest upon any well-founded basis in present social relations. The English law does not regard one in the power of robbers or of an armed force of rebels as responsible, criminaliter, for his acts. No more should one be who is wholly under the power of another, as a child or servant may be; 1 Russ. Cr. 14. See Ch. J. Howe, 18 St. Trials 393. These questions should, in strictness, be referred to the jury as matters of fact. See DURESS; COERCION.

Ignorance of law will not excuse any one. But ignorance of fact sometimes renders that innocent which would otherwise be a crime: as, where one kills an innocent person, mistaking him for an assassin or robber; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. c. 6; 1 Russ. Cr. 19, 20. See IGNORANCE.

WILL, ESTATES AT. See ESTATES AT WILL.

WINCHESTER, STATUTE OF. An English statute, 13 Edw. I. relating to the internal police of the kingdom. It required every man to provide himself with armor to aid in keeping the peace; and if it did not create the offices of high and petty constables, it recognized and regulated them, and charged them with duties answering somewhat to those of our militia officers. The statute took its name from the ancient capital of the kingdom. It was repealed by the statute of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

WINDFALL. See TIMBER; WOODS.

WINDING UP. The process of liquidating the assets of a partnership or corporation, for purposes of distribution. In England a number of statutes, known as the Winding-up Acts, have been passed to facilitate the settlement of partnership affairs; Lind. Part. book iv. c. 3.

WINDOW. An opening made in the wall of a house to admit light and air, and to enable those who are in to look out. Cited in 46 Mo. App. 506.

The owner has a right to make as many windows in his house, when not built on the line of his property, as he may deem proper, although by so doing he may destroy the privacy of his neighbors; Bacon, Abr. Actions in General (B).

In cities and towns it is evident that the owner of a house cannot open windows in the party wall, q. v., without the consent of the owner of the adjoining property, unless he possesses the right of having ancient lights, which see. The opening of such windows and destroying the privacy of the adjoining property is not, however, actionable; the remedy against such encroachment is by obstructing them, without encroaching upon the rights of the party who opened them, so as to prevent a right from being acquired by twenty years' use. 3 Camp. 89; 4 Misc. Rep. 48. A bay or bow-window that projects over the land of another is a nuisance, and actionable as though it was an actual invasion of the soil; 107 Mass. 234; 16 S. & R. 390; Wood,

Nuisance 118. Where it projects beyond the street line, it has been held in Pennsylvania a purpresture, and the erection of it may be restrained by injunction, although authorized by a special city ordinance; 10 W. N. C. Pa. 10; see 100 Pa. 182; whether the window reached to the ground; id.; or was built out of the second story; 39 Leg. Int. Pa. 108. See AIR; ANCIENT LIGHTS; HIGHWAY; BAY WINDOW; LIGHT.

WINE. The unfermented juice of the grape. 5 Blackf. 118. See LIQUOR LAWS.

WIRES. By the provisions of the Revised Statutes § 5263, electrical companies must so construct and maintain their lines as not to obstruct ordinary travel or navigation. This act grants to the companies which accept its provisions a species of easement or right of way; 38 Fed. Rep. 552. It does not prevent state legislatures from enacting statutes requiring telegraph wires to be placed underground; 125 N. Y. 641; 145 U. S. 175; and when declared a nuisance, they may be forcibly removed, although the subways are not in a condition to receive them; 125 N. Y. 641.

The attachment of wires to the roof of a building may be prohibited by municipal ordinance in the exercise of the police power; 45 Fed. Rep. 498; and the company is liable to the owner of the premises for making such attachment without permission; 114 Mass. 149.

Although not an insurer of safety to travellers all reasonable precautions must be taken in stringing wires; 2 Col. 148; 91 U. S. 495; and in investigating promptly detached or grounded wires; 161 Mass. 583; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 66; and in removing dead wires in the case of fire or accident; 33 Minn. 340; but the mere fact that one was killed by a hanging wire does not prove negligence; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 1069; contra, 114 N. C. 203.

In many of the states the insulation of the wire is made the subject of statutory provision, and even in the absence of such provision, it has been held that non-insulation is negligence; 161 Mass. 583.

The company will be liable for damages if a dead wire, coming into contact with a live wire of another company, becomes charged and causes injury or death; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 66.

One whose occupation requires his proximity to an electric wire may presume it to be insulated; 44 La. Ann. 692; and he is not required to make an examination in order to ascertain if such be the case; 107 Cal. 120. A traveller may pick up a wire from the street and throw it outside the regular line of travel without being guilty of contributory negligence; 156 Mass. 393; 114 N. C. 203; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 66. For injuries so received damages may be recovered either from the city; 156 Mass. 393; or from the company; 27 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 66. But in order to sustain an action for damages, it must be clearly shown that there was no contributory negligence; 9 So. Rep. (La.) 433. It has been considered contributory negligence to step on a live wire after a warning; 9 Houst. 306.

The wires of electric light and electric railway companies, unlike those of telegraph and telephone companies, carry a strong and dangerous current, and such companies are bound to the highest degree of care in the pursuit of their business; 114 N. C. 203.

If a telephone wire has been negligently allowed to drop across a trolley wire, the owner of the latter is jointly liable with the owner of the telephone wire for injuries to a third person caused by electricity conveyed through it from the trolley wire; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 426. See 31 L. R. A. 566; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 505; Keasbey, Electric Wires; Croswell, Electricity; ELECTRIC LIGHT; TELEGRAPH; TELEPHONE; NEGLIGENCE; MASTER AND SERVANT.

WIRTA. A measure of land among the Saxons, containing sixty acres.

WISBUY, LAWS OF. See CODE.

WISCONSIN. One of the states of the United States.

It was originally part of the Northwest Territory. See OHIO. It was made a separate territory, with the name of Wisconsin, by act of April 20, 1836. The territory was afterwards divided, and the territory of Iowa set off, June 12, 1838. It was admitted into the Union May 29, 1848.

The constitution was adopted by a convention at Madison, on February 1, 1848. This constitution, as modified by amendments, is still in force.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER is vested in a senate and assembly.

The Senate is composed of not more than one-third nor less than one-fourth the number of the representatives. They are elected by the people for four years.

The Assembly is composed of not less than fifty-four and not more than one hundred members, elected biennially. No person is eligible to the legislature who has not resided one year within the state.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for the term of two years. He has the power to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons after conviction for all offences except treason and in cases of impeachment, upon such conditions and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper, subject to such regulations as may be provided by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons. Upon conviction for treason he has the power to suspend the execution of the sentence until the case is reported to the legislature at its next meeting, when the legislature may either pardon or commute the sentence, direct the execution of the sentence, or grant a further reprieve.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time as the governor, for the same term, and must possess the same qualifications as the governor. He is president of the senate, but has only a casting vote. In case of the impeachment of the governor, or of his removal from office, death, inability from mental or physical disease, resignation, or absence from the state, the powers and duties of the office devolve upon him for the residue of the term, or until the disability, etc., is removed.

THE JUDICIAL POWER is vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, courts of probate, and in justices of the peace. The Supreme Court consists of one chief and four associate justices, elected for ten years. It is a court of appellate jurisdiction only, but may issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus, quo warranto, procedendo, and supersedeas.

The Circuit Court is composed of judges elected one from each judicial district for six years. The state is divided into seventeen judicial circuits. A judge must be at least twenty-five years old, a citizen of the United States, and a qualified elector. It has original jurisdiction of all civil and criminal matters, and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals and a supervisory power over the same.

County Courts are held in each county. Their jurisdiction extends to the probate of wills, and granting letters testamentary and of administration on the estates of all persons deceased; to all matters relating to the settlement of estates of deceased persons and of minors and others under guardianship; and to all cases of trusts created by will admitted to probate in such court; and such other jurisdiction as may be conferred by law.

WITCHCRAFT. Under 33 Hen. VIII. c. 8 and 1 Jac. I. c. 12, the offence of witchcraft, or supposed intercourse with evil spirits, was punishable with death. These acts were not repealed till 1736. 4 Bla. Com. 60.

WITENA-GEMOTE (spelled, also, wittena-gemot, gewitena-gemote; from the Saxon wita, a wise man, gemote, assembly,—the assembly of wise men).

An assembly of the great men of the kingdom in the time of the Saxons, to advise and assist in the government of the realm.

It was the grand council of the kingdom, and was held, generally, in the open air, by public notice or particular summons, in or near some city or populous town. These notices or summonses were issued upon determination by the king's select council, or the body met without notice, when the throne was vacant, to elect a new king. Subsequently to the Norman conquest it was called commune concilium regni, curiam agna, and finally parliament; but its character had become considerably changed. It was a court of last resort, more especially for determining disputes between the king and his thanes, and, ultimately, from all inferior tribunals. Great offenders, particularly those who were members of or might be summoned to the king's court, were here tried. The casual loss of title-deeds was supplied, and a very extensive equity jurisdiction exercised. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 73; 1 Bla. Com. 147; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 7; 9 Co. Pref.

The principal duties of the witena-gemote, besides acting as high court of judicature, was to elect the sovereign, assist at his coronation, and co-operate in the enactment and administration of the laws. It made treaties jointly with the king, and aided him in directing the military affairs of the kingdom. Examination into the state of churches, monasteries, their possessions, discipline, and morals, were made before this tribunal. It appointed magistrates, and regulated the coin of the kingdom. It also provided for levying upon the people all such sums as the public necessities required; and no property of a freeman was, in fact, taxable without the consent of the gemote. Bede, lib. 2, c. 5; 3 Turner, Angl. Sax. 209; 1 Dugdale, Mon. 20; Sax. Chron. 126, 140.

The deliberations of their body had great weight; all important actions, such as law-making, were done by their advice: but they could not and did not pretend to do without the consent of the freeholders when a capital decision—such as the voting of a tax, the election of a king, the passing of a law—was in question. At first the king of the English would go around with his proposed laws to the several folk-mote, getting the separate consent of each, but in the tenth century the kings bethought them of summoning the moots of the various shires to meet them at some convenient central spot, as Oxford or London, and what this collective moot or Mycel-gemot agreed to need not be confirmed again, since men from every shire were present. The Mycel-gemot was the Magnum Concilium of the Normans and developed into the High Courts and Parliaments of the thirteenth century. 1 Social England 136. See Stevens, Sources of the Constitution 62.

WITH STRONG HAND. In Pleading. A technical phrase indispensable in describing a forcible entry in an indictment. No other word or circumlocution will answer the same purpose. 8 Term 357.

WITHDRAW. To take away what has been enjoyed; to take from. 54 Ga. 409.

WITHDRAWING A JUROR. An agreement made between the parties in a suit to require one of the twelve jurors impanelled to try a cause to leave the jury-box; the act of leaving the box by such a juror is also called the withdrawing a juror.

This arrangement usually takes place at the recommendation of the judge, when it is obviously improper the case should proceed any further. And it seems now settled that in civil cases the court has power to do this, in the exercise of a sound discretion, without the consent of the parties, instead of nonsuiting the plaintiff; 8 Cow. 127.

The effect of withdrawing a juror puts an end to that particular trial, and each party must pay his own costs; 3 Term 657; 2 Dowl. 721; 1 Cr. M. & R. 64. In Pennsylvania, the costs abide the event of the suit; Tr. & H. Pr. § 689.

But the plaintiff may bring a new suit for the same cause of action; Ry. & M. 402; 3 B. & Ad. 349. See 3 Chitty, Pr. 917.

In American practice, however, the same cause goes over, or is continued, without impairing the rights of either party, until the next term.

Where the plaintiff, at the suggestion of the judge, withdraws a juror, with the understanding of bringing the matter to a final conclusion, it amounts to an undertaking not to bring an action for the same cause; and if a second action be commenced, the court will stay the proceedings as against good faith; 1 Chit. Arch. Pr. 285. If, after a prisoner has pleaded to an indictment, and after the jury have been sworn and evidence offered, the public prosecutor, without the consent of the prisoner, withdraw a juror merely because he is unprepared with his evidence, the prisoner cannot afterwards be tried on the same indictment; 2 Cai. Cas. 304; Arch. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 347.

WITHDRAWING RECORD. The withdrawing by plaintiff's attorney of the nisi prius record filed in a cause, before a jury is sworn, has the same effect as a motion to postpone. 2 C. & P. 185; 3 Camp. 333.

WITHERNAM. The name of a writ which issues on the return of elongata to an alias or pluries writ of replevin, by which the sheriff is commanded to take the defendant's own goods which may be found in his bailiwick, and keep them safely, not to deliver them to the plaintiff until such time as the defendant chooses to submit himself and allow the distress, and the whole of it to be replevied; and he is thereby further commanded that he do return to the court in what manner he shall have executed the writ. Hamm. N. P. 453; Co. 2d Inst. 140; Fitzh. N. B. 68, 69.

WITHHOLD. Withholding property is not equivalent to concealing property. To withhold commissions implies a temporary suspension rather than a total and final denial or rejection of the same. 149 U. S. 278.

WITHIN. In the limits or compass of. 54 Ala. 581. In may be used in the sense of in or at the end of. 4 Cush. 420.

WITHOUT. Outside; beyond. 91 U. S. 277; 9 Mass. 456.

WITHOUT DAY. This signifies that the cause or thing to which it relates is indefinitely adjourned: as, when a case is adjourned without day it is not again to be inquired into. When the legislature adjourn without day, they are not to meet again. This is usually expressed in Latin, sine die.

WITHOUT IMPEACHMENT OF WASTE. When a tenant for life holds the land without impeachment of waste, he is, of course, dispunishable for waste, whether wilful or otherwise. But still this right must not be wantonly abused so as to destroy the estate; and he will be enjoined from committing malicious waste; Bac. Abr. Waste (N); 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. Waste (A, pl. 8). See IMPEACHMENT OF WASTE; WASTE.

WITHOUT PREJUDICE. See COMPROMISE.

WITHOUT RECOURSE. See SANS RECOURS; INDORSEMENT.

WITHOUT RESERVE. These words are frequently used in conditions of sale at public auction, that the property offered, or to be offered, for sale, will be sold without reserve. When a property is advertised to be sold without reserve, if a puffer be employed to bid, and actually bid at the sale, the courts will not enforce a contract against a purchaser, into which he may have been drawn by the vendor's want of faith; 5 Madd. 34. See PUFFER; AUCTION.

WITHOUT THIS, THAT. In Pleading. These are technical words used in a traverse (q. v.) for the purpose of denying a material fact in the preceding pleadings, whether declaration, plea, replication, etc. The Latin term is absque hoc (q. v.). Com. Dig. Pleader (G 1); 1 Chitty, Pl. 576, note a.

WITNESS (Anglo-Saxon witan, to know). One who testifies to what he knows. One who testifies under oath to something which he knows at first hand. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 98, 328.

One who is called upon to be present at a transaction, as, a wedding, or the making of a will. When a person signs his name to a written instrument to signify that the same was executed in his presence, he is called an attesting witness.

The principal rules relating to witnesses are the same in civil and in criminal cases, and the same in all the courts, as well in those various courts whose forms of proceeding are borrowed from the civil law, as in those of the common law; 3 Greenl. Ev. §§ 249, 402; 2 Ves. Ch. 41; 17 Mass. 303.

AS TO THE COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES. The question of the competency of a witness is for the court, and not for the jury; 37 W. Va. 565; 107 Mo. 37; and an objection to competency is not necessarily waived if not taken before his examination in chief; 17 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 946.

All persons, of whatever nation, may be witnesses; Bacon, Abr. Evidence (A). But in saying this we must, of course, except such as are excluded by the very definition of the term; and we have seen it to be essential that a witness should qualify himself by taking an oath. Therefore, all who cannot understand the nature and obligation of an oath, or whose religious belief is so defective as to nullify and render it nugatory, or whose crimes have been such as to indicate an extreme insensibility to its sanctions, are excluded. And, accordingly, the following classes of persons have been pronounced by the common law to be incompetent. See OATH.

Infants so young as to be unable to appreciate the nature and binding quality of an oath. A child under the age of fourteen is presumed incapable until capacity be shown, but the law fixes no limit of age which will of itself exclude. Whenever a child displays sufficient intelligence to observe and to narrate, it can be admitted to testify; 7 C. & P. 320; 2 Brewst. 404; 44 Mich. 486; 88 Ala. 151; 88 Wis. 180; 158 U. S. 523. A child five years old has been admitted to testify; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 367; 3 C. & P. 598; 1 Mood. 86; 10 Mass. 225; 8 Johns. 98; 88 Wis. 180; 159 U. S. 523. But if the child is not sufficiently instructed on this "point," the trial may be put off, in order to give the necessary instruction; 2 Leach, C. C. 86; but only in the discretion of the court; 2

C. & K. 246. The law presumes that all witnesses tendered in a court of justice are not only competent but credible. If a witness is incompetent, this must be shown by the party objecting to him; if he is not credible, this must be shown either from his examination, or by impeaching evidence aliunde; 1 Whart. Ev. § 392. See DISCRETION.

Idiots, lunatics, intoxicated persons, and, generally, those who labor under such privation or imbecility of mind that they cannot understand the nature and obligation of an oath. The competency of such is restored with the recovery or acquisition of this power; 10 Johns. 362; 28 Conn. 177; 16 Vt. 474; 7 Wheat. 458; but the question of their credibility should be left to the jury; 97 Ala. 85. And so a lunatic in a lucid interval may testify; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 365; even though an inmate of an insane asylum; 36 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 458; 82 Fed. Rep. 720; or one who has been adjudged insane; 80 id. 85. Persons deaf and dumb from their birth are presumed to come within this principle of exclusion until their competency is shown; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 366; but such a person is not deemed to be an idiot; 118 Mo. 127. A witness unable to speak or hear is not incompetent, but may give his evidence by writing or by signs, or in any other manner in which he can make it intelligible; Steph. Ev. art. 107. See 11 Cush. 417. A person in a state of intoxication cannot be admitted as a witness; 15 S. & R. 235. See Ray, Med. Jur. c. 22, § 300; 16 Johns. 143. Deficiency in perception must go to the incapacity of perceiving the matter in dispute, in order to operate as an exclusion, hence a blind man can testify to what he has heard, and a deaf man to what he has seen; 1 Whart. Ev. § 401.

Such as are insensible to the obligation of an oath, from defect of religious sentiment or belief. Atheists, and persons disbelieving in any system of divine rewards and punishments, are of this class. It is reckoned sufficient qualification in this particular if one believe in a God and that he will reward and punish us according to our deserts. It is enough to believe that such punishment visits us in this world only; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 369; 5 Mass. 18; 14 Mass. 184; 26 Pa. 274; 16 Ohio 121; 7 Conn. 66; 22 So. Rep. (La.) 841.

It matters not, so far as mere competency is concerned, that a witness should believe in one God, or in one God rather than another, or should hold any particular form of religious belief, provided only that he brings himself within the rule above laid down. And, therefore, the oath may be administered in any form whatever, and with any ceremonies whatever, that will bind the conscience of the witness; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 371; 1 Sm. L. Cas. 739. By statute in England and in most of the United States, religious disbelief no longer disqualifies, provision being made for an affirmation instead, and the witness, if testifying falsely, being subject to the penalties of perjury; Whart. Ev. § 395, n. See ATHEIST.

Persons infamous, i. e. those who have committed and been legally convicted of crimes the nature and magnitude of which show them to be insensible to the obligation of an oath. See INFAMY. Such crimes are enumerated under the heads of treason, felony, and the crimen falsi; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373; 2 Dods. Adm. 191. See CRIMEN FALSI.

The only method of establishing infamy is by producing the record of conviction. It is not even sufficient to show an admission of guilt by the witness himself; 9 Cow. 707; 2 Mass. 108; 97 id. 587; but in England a witness may be asked whether he has been convicted, etc.; Steph. Ev. art. 130. Pardon or the reversal of a sentence restores the competency of an infamous person, except where this disability is annexed to an offence by a statute; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 378; 2 Salk. 513; 2 Hargr. Jurid. Arg. 221. See 53 Fed. Rep. 352; 144 U. S. 263; 21 Tex. App. 1; even if granted for the reason, among others, that his testimony was desired by the government in a cause then pending; 142 U. S. 450. See PARDON.

This exclusion on account of infamy or defect in religious belief applies only where a person is offered as a witness; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 374; 2 Q. B. 721. But wherever one is a party to the suit, wishing to make affidavit in the usual course of proceeding, and, in general, wherever the law requires an oath as the condition of its protection or its aid, it presumes conclusively and absolutely that all persons are capable of an oath; Stark. Ev. 393; 1 Ashm. 57. There is a conflict of authority as to how far a foreign judgment of an infamous offence disqualifies a witness. In New York, he is not disqualified; 77 N. Y. 400. In Pennsylvania, he is held not to be disqualified unless the record of conviction be produced, and not then if he has served out his term of imprisonment; 3 Brewst. 461. In Massachusetts, the record is admitted merely to affect his credibility; 17 Mass. 575. In New Hampshire, the witness will be disqualified if the laws of his own state make him so, and the crime, if committed in New Hampshire, would have had the same effect; 10 N. H. 22. In Alabama; 23 Ala. 44; and Virginia; 6 Gratt. 706; the record is rejected altogether; but not so in North Carolina; 3 Hawks 393. He is disqualified in Nevada; 15 Nev. 64. See Whart. Confl. Laws §§ 107, 769. A conviction and sentence can have no such effect beyond the limits of the state in which the judgment is rendered unless the statute of another state give such effect to them; 144 U. S. 263. If a statute permits a defendant in a criminal case to testify on his own behalf, he may do so, though infamous, but not against a co-defendant; 35 S. C. 279.

Slaves were generally held incompetent to testify, by statutory provisions, in the slave states, in suits between white persons; 7 T. B. Monr. 91; 4 Ohio 353; 5 Litt. 171.

When it is said that all persons may be witnesses, it is not meant that all persons may testify in all cases. The testimony of such as are generally qualified and competent under other circumstances or as to other matters is sometimes excluded out of regard to their special relations to the cause in issue or the parties, or from some other circumstances not working a general disqualification.

Parties to the record were not competent witnesses, at common law, for themselves or their co-suitors. Nor were they compellable to testify for the adverse party; 7 Bingh. 395; 20 Johns. 142; 21 Pick. 57; 11 Conn. 342; but they were competent to do so; although one of several co-suitors could not thus become a witness for the adversaries without the consent of his associates; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 354; 5 How. 91; 6 Humph. 405. Regard was had not merely to the nominal party to the record, but also to the real party in interest; and the former was not allowed to testify for the adverse side without the consent of the latter; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 329; 16 Pick. 501; 20 Johns. 142. Persons who have no interest in the matter in controversy are not incompetent merely because parties to the action; 118 Ind. 227; 134 U. S. 650.

In some jurisdictions a party had the right of compelling his adversary to answer interrogatories under oath, as also to appear and testify. And, in equity, parties could require and use each other's testimony; and the answer of a defendant as to any matters stated in the bill was evidence in his own favor; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 329; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 1528.

There were other exceptions to this rule. Cases where the adverse party had been guilty of some fraud or other tortious and unwarrantable act of intermeddling with the complainant's goods, and no other evidence than that of the complainant himself could be had of the amount of damage,—cases, also, where evidence of the parties was deemed essential to the purposes of public justice, no other evidence being attainable,—were exceptions; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 348; 1 Me. 27.

On this same principle, persons directly interested in the result of the suit (see INTEREST), or in the record as an instrument of evidence, were excluded; and where the event of the cause turned upon a question which if decided one way would have rendered the party offered as a witness liable, while a contrary decision would have protected him, he was excluded; Stark. Ev. 1730. But to this rule, also, there were exceptions: Stark. Ev. 1731; of which the case of agents testifying as to matters to which their agency extended, forms one: 1 Greenl. Ev. § 386; so also an employe of a charitable institution; 105 Pa. 155; or a taxpayer of a town to which a library was given by will; 160 Mass. 140; were not incompetent for interest.

In both England and the United States, the rules of exclusion on the ground of interest have been abrogated. The object of the statutes has been to remove all artificial restraints to competency so as to put the parties upon a footing of equality with other witnesses, both in their admissibility to testify for themselves, and in their being compellable to testify for others; 21 Wall. 488. In most of the statutes, however, cases are excepted where a suit is brought by or against executors or administrators. In these cases where one of the parties to a contract is dead, the survivor is not permitted to testify; 66 Pa. 297; but this exception does not exclude directors or stockholders of a corporation which is a party, when the other party is dead; 32 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 654; 24 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 409. But the exception does not make the surviving party incompetent, it only precludes him from testifying to communications with the deceased; 59 Me. 259; 64 Ill. 121. The test is the nature of the communications. The witness cannot testify to personal communications with the deceased party; 64 Barb. 189; 12 Gray 459; 76 Ia. 101; 100 N. C. 150; but it has been held that if documents can be proved by independent evidence, the case is not within the exception; 21 Mich. 364. A husband may testify to conversation between his wife and the decedent, in which he took no part: 38 S. C. 158; but one who is interested in the contest of a will cannot testify as to conversations between testator and another in which the witness took no part; 78 Hun 43. If the suit is brought against co-defendants, of whom only one is dead, when the contract was made either with the living co-defendants, or with the living and dead concurrently, the case is not within the exception; 9 Allen 144; 22 Ohio St. 208. But where an action was brought against three partners, one of whom subsequently died, and his executors were substituted, the plaintiff is not a competent witness as to anything which occurred during the lifetime of the deceased partner although the latter may have taken no part in the contract on which the action was brought; 87 Pa. 111. In an action by a surviving partner on a book account, the defendant is competent to testify to payments by him to the deceased partner; 9 Ind. App. 321.

Under these statutes, which confine the exception to suits against executors and administrators, the death of an agent of one party, through whom the contract was made, does not prevent the surviving party from testifying to the contract; 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 665; but under statutes which exclude the surviving party to a contract, the death of a contracting agent excludes the surviving party who contracted with him; 26 Wisc. 500. See 113 N. C. 551. An agent who makes a sale of goods for his principal is not incompetent to testify to the circumstances of the transaction because of the death of the buyer: 50 Ohio St. 648. Unless the exception expressly covers all suits against executors and administrators, it does not exclude the plaintiff from proving matters occurring since the death of the party of whom the defendant is executor; 48 N. H. 90. The exception in statutes where the exclusion relates only to the surviving party in contracts does not include torts; 60 Mo. 214. When the deposition of a deceased party afterwards is put in evidence, the other party being still living, such other party should be admitted as a witness in reply; 52 Ga. 385; 114 Mo. 66. See, generally, 12 L. R. A. 836. As to exclusion of testimony against a decedent on the ground of interest, see 12 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 886.

Husband and wife were excluded at common law from giving testimony for or against each other when either was a party to the suit or interested. And neither was competent to prove a fact directly tending to criminate the other. This rule was founded partly on their identity of interest, and partly, perhaps chiefly, on the policy of the law which aims to protect the confidence between man and wife that is essential to the comfort of the married relation, and, through that, to the good order of society. Whether or not the disability of husband or wife may be removed by consent of the other is matter of dispute; 3 C. & P. 551; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 340. In England, by stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, consent removes the disability; Whart. Ev. § 428. But it is not removed by death, nor by the dissolution of the marriage relation, so far as respects information derived confidentially during marital intercourse; 47 N. H. 100. She may, however, testify as to matters which transpired subsequently to a divorce; 86 Ala. 86.

The wife of a member of a partnership is not competent as a witness in a suit against the partnership; 64 Vt. 583.

The rule is not ordinarily affected by statutes permitting husband or wife to testify for or against each other; 60 Barb. 527; nor does the statute as to the evidence of parties in interest generally affect their common-law incapacity to testify; 18 Wall. 452.

Some exceptions to this rule; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 343; are admitted out of necessity for the protection of husband and wife against each other, and for the sake of public justice, as in prosecutions for violence committed by either of them upon the other. See Bac. Abr. Evidence (A); 1 Greenl. Ev. § 334; 1 Ves. Ch. 49; Ry. & M. 253; 137 U. S. 496. It is not error to receive the testimony of the wife of a person on trial for murder by consent of his counsel if she is advised by the court that she need not testify unless she desires to do so; 146 U. S. 325.

Parties to negotiable instruments are, in some jurisdictions, held incompetent to invalidate these instruments to which they have given currency by their signature. Such seems to be the prevailing, but not universal, rule in the United States; while in England such testimony is admitted, the objection going only to its credibility; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 383; 1 Term 296; 9 Metc. 471; 3 How. 73; 5 N. H. 147; 20 Pa. 469; 24 Vt. 459; 18 Ohio 579; 1 Miss. 541; 1 Conn. 260; 4 Tex. 371; 3 Harr. & J. 173.

And, finally, there are certain confidential communications; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 236; to which the recipient of them, from general considerations of policy, is not allowed to testify. But the privilege may be waived by the party entitled to claim the benefit of it, as when two physicians were in consultation, a party by calling one waives the right to object to the testimony of the other against her; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 410. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Judges are not compellable to testify to what occurred in their consultations; but they may be examined as to what took place before them on the trial in order to identify the case, or prove the testimony of a witness; 1 Whart. Ev. § 600; see 4 Sandf. 120; but in England there is a doubt as to the latter proposition; Steph. Ev. art. 111; and it is said that in England a barrister cannot be compelled to testify as to what he said in court in his character of barrister; id.

The fact that one is counsel in the case does not disqualify him from testifying: 32 Tex. Cr. R. 102.

Persons in possession of secrets of state or matters the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interests, are not allowed to testify thereto; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 250.

Grand jurors and persons present before a grand jury; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 252; are not permitted to testify to the proceedings had before that body; 1 Phill. Ev. 177. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE MEANS OF SECURING THE ATTENDANCE AND TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES. In general, all persons who are competent may be compelled to attend and testify. As to compelling expert witnesses to attend, see EXPERTS.

Provision has been made by statute, in most if not in all of the states, for the case of persons living at an inconvenient distance from the place of trial, as well as for the case of such as are sick or about to leave the state, or otherwise likely to be put to great inconvenience by a compulsory attendance, and also for such as are already in a foreign jurisdiction, by allowing the taking of their deposition in writing before some magistrate or officer near at hand, to be read at the trial; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 321.

In criminal cases, all persons are compellable to appear and testify without any previous tender of their fees; and any bystander in court may be compelled to testify without a previous summons or tender of fees; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 311; 4 Cow. 49; 13 Mass. 501; 4 Cush. 249.

But in civil suits which are between man and man, a party is allowed to compel the attendance and testimony of a witness only on condition of a prepayment or tender of his fees for travel to the place of trial, and for one day's attendance there. This seems, as a general rule, to be the least that can be tendered; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310; 4 Johns. 311; 1 Metc. Mass. 298; 8 Mo. 288; 41 N. H. 121. See 40 Ill. App. 628; and a witness who attends without the payment or tender of his fees, waives their tender or payment in advance; 87 Wis. 525. In the courts of the United States, as well as in England, a witness may require his fees for travel both ways; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310; 6 Taunt. 88. And in civil cases a person cannot be compelled to testify, although he chance to be present in court, unless regularly summoned and tendered his fees; 1 Phill. Ev. 388. Being in attendance in obedience to a summons, he may, nevertheless, refuse to testify from day to day, unless his daily fees are paid or tendered; 2 Phill. Ev. § 376. Whether or not he may refuse to attend from day to day without the prepayment or tender of his daily fees, is a matter about which there are different decisions; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 310; 10 Vt. 493; 14 East 15. A witness may maintain an action against the party summoning him for his fees; Stark. Ev. 1727. Federal courts allow mileage and per diem fees, although no subpœna was issued; 54 Fed. Rep. 464; 36 id. 113; 37 id. 844. As to additional compensation to experts, see EXPERTS, and also 48 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 108, and comments thereon in 18 N. Y. L. J. (Dec. 3, 1897).

Witnesses are also compellable to produce papers in their custody to which either party has a right as evidence, on the same principle that they are required to testify what they know; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 558. See DISCOVERY; SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM.

This rule as to title-deeds appears to be peculiar to England. In this country, it is said that a witness, not a party, may be compelled to produce any of his private papers. Whether the court, on inspection, will require them to be put in evidence may be a matter of discretion; Steph. Ev. art. 118, n. See 14 Gray 226.

The attendance of witnesses is ordinarily procured by means of a writ of subpœna; sometimes, when they are in custody, by a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum; and sometimes, in criminal cases, by their own recognizance, either with or without sureties; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 309, 312; 2 Phill. Ev. 370, 374. If a witness disobey the summons, process of attachment for contempt will issue to enforce his attendance and an action also lies against him at common law; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 319; 1 Stark. Ev. 1727.

Nor can any third party intervene to prevent the attendance of a witness. Neither can he take advantage of a witness's attendance at the place of trial, to arrest him on civil process. See PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST.

Where a non-resident is in attendance on a trial in a circuit court of the United States as a witness in a case therein pending, he is privileged from service of summons in a civil action issued from a state court of such state, and the privilege extends to a reasonable time after the disposition of the cause to enable him to return to his own state; 11 Fed. Rep. 582. See 25 Alb. L. J. 424; 53 Vt. 694; and this is the general rule.

AS TO THE EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES. In the common-law courts, examinations are had viva voce, in open court, by questions and answers. The same course is now adopted to a great extent in equity and admiralty courts, and other proceedings according to the forms of the civil law. But the regular method of examining in these last-named courts, as also in the court of claims, is by deposition taken in writing out of court; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1527; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 251.

A trial court may ask a witness such questions as it deems necessary for its own information and that of the jury; 122 Mo. 607.

On motion, in civil and criminal cases, witnesses will generally be excluded from the court-room while others are undergoing examination in the same case; this, however, is not matter of right, but within the discretion of the court; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 432; 4 C. & P. 585; 2 Swan 237; 3 Wisc. 214.

Witnesses are required to testify from their own knowledge and recollection. Yet they are permitted to refresh their memory by reference, while on the stand, to papers written at or very near the time of the transaction in question. See MEMORANDUM.

Being once in attendance, a witness may, in general, be compelled to answer all questions that may legally be put to him. See EVIDENCE.

Yet there are exceptions to this rule. He is not compellable where the answer would have a tendency to expose him to a penal liability or any kind of punishment, or to a criminal charge or a forfeiture of his estate; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 451. See PRIVILEGE.

The court, it is said, decides as to the tendency of the answer, and will instruct the witness as to his privilege; 2 Phill. Ev. 417; 4 Cush. 594; 1 Den. 319. It has been held that the question whether an answer would have this tendency is to be determined by the oath of the witness; 17 Jur. 393. And in point of fact, out of the necessity of the case, it is a matter which the witness may be said practically to decide for himself. The witness may answer if he chooses; and if he do answer after having been advised of his privileges, he must answer in full; and his answer may be used in evidence against him for all purposes; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 451, 453; 4 Wend. 252; 11 Cush. 437; 12 Vt. 491; 20 N. H. 540. It is held that a defendant who voluntarily offers himself as a witness on his own behalf waives this privilege of refusing to answer a question because it may tend to criminate him; 98 N. C. 599. The objection that the answer may tend to criminate can only be made by the witness himself; 16 Colo. 250. See 28 Fla. 90.

Whether a witness be compellable to answer to his own degradation or infamy is a point as to which some distinctions are to be taken: a witness cannot refuse to testify simply because his answer would tend to disgrace him; it must be seen to have that effect certainly and directly; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 456. He cannot, it would seem, refuse to give testimony which is material and relevant to the issue, for the reason that it would disgrace him, or expose him to civil liability. A witness is not the sole judge whether a question put to him, if answered, may tend to criminate him. The court must see from the circumstances of the case that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer, in order to excuse him, But if the fact once appear that the witness is in danger, great latitude will be allowed him in judging for himself the effect of any particular question; 26 Ch. Div. 294; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 454; 1 Mood. & M. 108; 4 Wend. 250; 2 Ired. 346. See 8 Misc. Rep. 159. A witness may, however, be compelled to testify concerning his criminal acts, when prosecution therefor is barred; 66 Vt. 302; but only after it is shown affirmatively that no prosecution is pending against him; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 781.

But it would appear that he may refuse where the question (being one put on cross-examination) is not relevant and material, aud does not in any way affect the credit of the witness; 3 Camp. 519; 18 N. H. 92; 1 Gray 108. Whether a witness, when a question is put on the cross-examination which is not relevant and material to the issue, yet goes to affect his credit, will be protected in refusing to answer, simply on the ground that his answer would have a direct and certain effect to disgrace him, is a matter not clearly agreed upon. There is good reason to hold that a witness should be compelled to answer in such a case; 1 Stark. Ev. 144; 1 C. & P. 85; 2 Swanst. 216; 2 Camp. 637; 3 Yeates 429. But the whole matter is one that is largely subject to the discretion of the courts; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 431, 449.

There seems no doubt that a witness is in no case competent to allege his own turpitude, or to give evidence which involves his own infamy or impeaches his most solemn acts, if he be otherwise qualified to testify; Stark. Ev. 1737. See 15 Cent. L. J. 343.

The privilege given by the 5th amendment to the constitution, that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, extends to a proceeding before a grand jury; 142 U. S. 547. The provision of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act, compelling parties to testify even though the evidence may tend to criminate them, is not in conflict with the fifth amendment, since the statute itself protects them from punishment; 161 U. S. 591, affirming 70 Fed. Rep. 46; Field, Gray, Shiras, and White, JJ., dissenting. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The course of examination is, first, a direct examination by the party producing the witness; then, if desired, a cross-examination by the adverse party, and a re-examination by the party producing; 1 Starkie, Ev. 128, 129. As to the direct examination, the general rule is that leading questions, i. e. such as suggest the answer expected or desired, cannot be put to a witness by the party producing him. But this rule has some reasonable exceptions; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 434. See 85 Neb. 351; 97 Ala. 681; as, where a witness is hostile, leading questions are proper; 48 Ill. App. 180; 62 Mich. 451; also when the answers of a witness have taken by surprise the party calling him; 154 U. S. 134. A court of error will not reverse because a leading question was allowed; 87 Pa. 124; 22 N. J. 372; 8 Allen 466; 139 Ill. 644; 1 Misc. Rep. 354; contra, 99 Ill. 368. As the allowance of leading questions is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, the appellate court will reverse for such cause only where there has been an abuse of discretion; 91 Mich. 611. See 75 Hun 17; 85 Wis. 615; 91 Ga. 319; 154 U. S. 134; 52 Mo. App. 102; 75 Ia. 742. See LEADING QUESTION.

Leading questions, however, are allowed upon cross-examination. See, generally, CROSS-EXAMINATION.

The right of re-examination extends to all topics upon which a witness has been cross-examined; but the witness cannot at this stage, without permission of the court, be questioned as to any new facts unconnected with the subject of the cross-examination and not tending to explain it; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 467.

But the court may in all cases permit a witness to be called either for further examination in chief, or for further cross-examination; Steph. Ev. art. 126; and may itself recall a witness at any stage of the proceedings, and examine or cross-examine, at its discretion; 6 C. & P. 658. If new matter is introduced on the re-examination, by permission of the court, the adverse party may further cross-examine upon that matter; Steph. Ev. art. 127.

A party cannot impeach the credit of his own witness. But he is sometimes, in cases of hardship, permitted to contradict him by other testimony; 1 Stark. Ev. 147; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 442. And a party bona fide surprised at the unexpected testimony of his witness may be permitted to interrogate him, as to previous declarations alleged to have been made by him inconsistent with his testimony, the object being to prove the witness's recollection, and to lead him, if mistaken, to review what he has said; 1 Whart. Ev. § 549. See infra.

The credit of an adversary's witness may be impeached by cross-examination, or by general evidence affecting his reputation for veracity (but not by evidence of particular facts which otherwise are irrelevant and immaterial), and by evidence of his having said or done something before which is inconsistent with his evidence at the trial. Also, of course, he may be contradicted by other testimony; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 401. But he cannot be contradicted as to collateral and irrelevant matter on which he was cross-examined; 66 Miss. 196; 75 Cal. 108; 76 Ia. 67; 39 Kan. 115; 97 N. C. 443; 58 Ark. 125. In some states evidence may be given of a witness's general reputation (q. v.); 4 Wend. 257; 2 Dev. 209; 115 Mo. 419. See 29 Mich. 173; 97 id. 484. But the testimony of a witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular crimes; 98 Ala. 45; nor can a woman be impeached by evidence of the lack of chastity; 94 Mich. 630. See IMPEACHMENT.

In order to test a witness's accuracy, veracity, or credibility, he may be cross-examined as to "his relations to either of the parties or the subject-matter in dispute; his interest, his motives, his way of life, his associations, his habits, his prejudices, his physicial defects and infirmities, his mental idiosyncrasies, if they affect his capacity; his means of knowledge and powers of discernment, memory, and description—may all be revelant." May's Steph. Ev. art. 129. But it has been said that questions otherwise irrelevant cannot be asked for the purpose of testing his moral sense; 4 Cush. 593. He cannot be discredited by asking him if he has not been impeached as a witness upon the trial of another action; 76 Cal. 192.

Generally, where proof is to be offered that a witness has said or done something inconsistent with his evidence, a foundation must first be laid and an opportunity for explanation offered, by asking the witness himself whether he has not said or done what it is proposed to prove, specifying particulars of time, place, and person; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 462; 2 Br. & B. 313; 16 How. 38; 76 Pa. 83; 132 U. S. 394; 98 N. C. 708; 97 Mo. 165; 77 Ga. 781; 28 Neb. 683; 74 Ia. 623; 86 Ala. 110; 137 U. S. 507; but in other cases it has been held that no foundation need first be laid; 17 Mass. 160; 58 Mo. 35; 22 Conn. 622; 31 Vt. 442. Such statements made on other occasions must be material to the cause; 32 W. Va. 177. Statements introduced for contradictions must be those of the witness; 160 U. S. 70. The failure to lay a proper foundation cannot avail on appeal, where it was apparent that the witness understood the occasion referred to and had full opportunity to explain deficiencies; 33 Fed. Rep. 147.

In England and Massachusetts, by statute, the same course may be taken with a witness on his examination in chief, if the judge is of opinion that he is hostile to the party by whom he was called, and permits the question. Apart from statute such evidence has not generally been considered as admissible; May's Steph. Ev. art. 131; 56 N. Y. 585; 49 Cal. 384; if the sole effect is to discredit; but if the purpose be to show the witness he is in error, it is admissible; 15 Ad. & E. 878; 58 N. Y. 230.

Proof of declarations made by a witness out of court in corroboration of the testimony given by him at the trial is, as a general rule, inadmissible. See 83 Ala. 5; 27 Tex. App. 347. But when a witness is charged with having been actuated by some motive prompting him to a false statement, or that the story is a recent fabrication, it may be shown that he made similar statements before any such motive existed; 68 Ill. 514; 48 Cal. 85; 11 How. 480; 74 Cal. 1. See 98 N. C. 629; 103 id. 419.

Evidence of general good reputation may be offered to support a witness, whenever his credit is impeached, either by general evidence affecting his reputation, or on cross-examination; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 469; 77 Ga. 563.

A party cannot attack the credibility of his own witness in the case, even after he has become the witness of his adversary; 5 So. Rep. (Ala.) 829; except where the witness does not testify as he did on the preparatory examination and his testimony is unfavorable; 42 Ill. App. 178; 151 U. S. 303; the contradiction of such witness may be allowed; 79 Ga. 605; 111 N. C. 314.

MODIFICATIONS OF THE COMMON LAW. There have been various important modifications of the common law as to witnesses, in respect of their competency and otherwise, as well in England as in this country. A general and strong tendency is manifest to do away with the old objections to the competency of witnesses, and to admit all persons to testify that can furnish any relevant and material evidence,—leaving these to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. Such is the law and practice in most English and American jurisdictions. The statutes vary in their terms, and the decisions should be read in connection with them.

WITTINGLY. Knowingly; designedly. 54 Miss. 498; 44 Conn. 359.

WOLF'S HEAD. In Old English Law. See CAPUT LUPINUM.

WOMEN. All the females of the human species. All such females who have arrived at the age of puberty. Mulieris appellatione etiam virgo viri potens continetur. Dig. 50. 16. 13.

A woman by the fact of marriage invests herself with the nationality of her husband; 13 Op. Att. Gen. 128; 14 id. 402; contra, 2 Knapp, P. C. 364. See DOMICIL.

Single or unmarried women have all the civil rights of men; they may, therefore, enter into contracts or engagements; sue and be sued; be trustees or guardians; they may be witnesses, and may for that purpose attest all papers; but they are, generally, not possessed of any political power; and are not as citizens eligible to public office or entitled to vote; 16 How.

287; 21 Wall. 162; but in many of the states they may vote at school elections as in Colorado, Montana, The Dakotas, Idaho, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, Washington, and Wyoming.

As to the right of a woman to practise law, see ATTORNEY.

If the constitution of a state prevents a woman from being a member of a school committee, it must be by force of some express provision thereof or else by necessary implication arising from the nature of the office itself; 115 Mass. 602; and where an office is created and regulated by statute and the constitution confers upon the general court authority to name and settle all civil officers within the commonwealth, the election and constitution of whom are not otherwise provided for in the constitution, a woman may fill a local office of an administrative character; id.; but see 83 Ky. 464, where it was held that when a woman is excluded from the right to vote for any particular office, she is also excluded from the right to hold the office voted for. In California they may pursue any lawful business or profession; Cons. of Cal. art. 20, § 18. In Illinois, a woman may be a master in chancery; 99 Ill. 501; and in Iowa, a county recorder; Laws of 1880, c. 40. See 25 Alb. L. J. 104. In Colorado, a deputy clerk; 11 Colo. 191; a policeman; 19 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 657.

It has been held that a woman may not be a justice of the peace; 107 Mass. 604; 62 Me. 596; or a jailer; 83 Ky. 457; or a superintendent of a medical hospital for the insane; 29 Ohio St. 347; or a member of a board of workhouse directors; 4 Ohio C. C. 329 (contra, 136 Mass. 578); or county superintendent of schools; 29 Ore. 464 (contra, 13 Wash. 360; 115 Mass. 602; 16 Kan. 601; 33 Minn. 345); or school director; 39 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 81; or a notary public; 51 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 135; 150 Mass. 586. In England a woman may be elected to the office of sexton; 7 Mod. 263; or governor of a workhouse; 2 Ld. Raym. 1014; or overseer; 2 Term 395; or a commissioner of sewers; 13 Vin. Abr. 159; but a woman is not entitled to vote at elections for members of parliament; 38 L. J. C. P. 25; Whart. Lex.; Morse on Citizenship; she may act as postmistress in the United States. See MARRIED WOMAN; NATURALIZATION; 38 L. R. A. 208.

WOODGELD. In Old English Law. To be free from the payment of money for taking of wood in any forest. Co. Litt. 233 a. The same as PUDZELD.

WOODMOTE. The court of attachment. Cowel.

WOODS. A piece of land on which forest-trees in great number naturally grow. According to Lord Coke, a grant to another of omnes boscos suos, all his woods, will pass not only all his trees, but the land on which they grow. Co. Litt. 4 b. See 72 Me. 459. A field grown up in wire-grass surrounded by a fence and used for pasturing is not a woods. 84 N. Car. 264; but see 5 Jones 4. See TIMBER; SALE.

WOOLSACK. The seat of the lord chancellor in the house of lords, being a large square bag of wool, without back or arms, covered with red cloth. The judges, king's counsel-at-law, and masters in chancery sit also on woolsacks. The custom arose from wool being a staple of Great Britain from early times. Encyc. Amer.

WORDS. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; LIBEL; SLANDER.

WORK AND LABOR. In actions of assumpsit it is usual to put in a count, commonly called a common count, for work and labor done and material furnished by the plaintiff for the defendant; and when the work was not done under a special contract the plaintiff will be entitled to recover on the common count for work, labor, and materials. 4 Tyrwh. 43; 2 Carr. & M. 214. See ASSUMPSIT; QUANTUM MERUIT.

WORKHOUSE. A prison where prisoners are kept in employment; a penitentiary. A house where the poor are taken care of and kept in employment.

WORKING DAYS. Working days include all days except Sundays and legal holidays and do not include days on which, by the custom of the port, baymen stop work on the day of the funeral of one of their deceased members; 84 Fed. Rep. 688. In settling laydays, or days of demurrage, sometimes the contract specifies "working days"; in the computation, Sundays and custom-house holidays are excluded; 1 Bell, Com. 577. See DEMURRAGE; LAY-DAYS.

Running or calendar days on which the law permits work to be done. The term excludes Sundays and legal holidays, but not stormy days; 2 U. S. App. 297; 14 Fed. Rep. 422; 20 id. 144; 19 id. 459.

Working or lay-days, by the general rule, do not commence until the vessel has arrived at the usual place for unloading; 1 H. & C. 388. But where such place is a dock, it has been held that they begin when she enters the dock, and not when she reaches her place of discharge in the dock; 1 Bing. N. C. 283. The parties may, however, stipulate as they please as to the time when they shall commence; 5 Bing. N. C. 71. And it sometimes depends on the usage of the port; 24 E. L. & Eq. 305. Usage, however, cannot be admitted to vary the express terms of the contract; Pars. Ship. & Adm. 313. See DEMURRAGE; LAY-DAYS.

WORKMAN. One who labors; one who is employed to do business for another. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

WORSHIP. Honor and homage rendered to God. 59 N. H. 536. See CHRISTIANITY; DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP; RELIGION.

In English Law. A title or addition given to certain persons. Co. 2d Inst. 666; Bacon, Abr. Mismomer (A 2).

WORTHIEST OF BLOOD. An expression used to designate that in descent the sons are to be preferred to daughters, which is the law of England. See some singular reasons given for this, in Plowd. 305.

WOUND. Any lesion of the body.

In this it differs from the meaning of the word when used in surgery. The latter only refers to a solution of continuity; while the former comprises not only these, but also every other kind of accident, such as bruises, contusions, fractures, dislocations, and the like. Cooper, Surg. Dict.; Dunglison, Med. Dict.

Under the statute 9 Geo. IV. c. 21, s. 12, it has been held in England that to make a wound, in criminal cases, there must be an injury to the person by which the skin is broken; 6 C. & P. 684. See DEATH.

WRECK (called in law Latin wreccum maris, and in law French wrec de mer).

Such goods as after a shipwreck are cast upon the land by the sea, and left there within some country so as not to belong to the jurisdiction of the admiralty, but to the common law. Co. 2d Inst. 167; 1 Bla. Com. 290. A ship becomes a wreck when, in consequence of injuries received, she is rendered absolutely unnavigable, or unable to pursue her voyage, without repairs exceeding the half of her value; 6 Mass. 479. A sunken vessel is not a wreck, but derelict; wreck applies to property cast upon land by the sea; 7 N. Y. 555; 38 Fed. Rep. 503. See SUNKEN WRECK.

Goods found at low water, between high and low water mark, and goods between the same limits partly resting on the ground, but still moved by the water, are wreck; 3 Hagg. Adm. 257, 294. Wreck, by the common law, belongs to the king or his grantee; but if claimed by the true owner within a year and a day the goods, or their proceeds, must be restored to him, by virtue of stat. Westm. I., 3 Edw. I. c. 4. Ships and goods found derelict or abandoned at sea belonged until lately to the office of the lord high admiral, by a grant from the crown, but now belong to the national exchequer, subject, however, to be claimed by the true owner within a year and a day; 1 Hagg. 383.

But in America the king's right in the sea-shore was transferred to the colonies, and therefore wreck cast on the sea-shore belongs to the owner of the shore, as against a mere stranger, if not reclaimed; 13 Pick. 255. See, also, 113 Mass. 377.

In this country, the several states bordering on the sea have enacted laws providing for the safekeeping and disposition of property wrecked on the coast. In one case, it was held that the United States succeeded to the prerogative of the British crown, and are entitled to derelict ships or goods found at sea and unclaimed by the true owner; but in the southern district of Florida it is held that such derelicts, in the absence of any act of congress on the subject, belong to the finder or salvor, subject to the claim of the true owner for a year and a day. Marv. Wreck. Stealing from a wrecked or distressed ship, etc., wilfully obstructing the escape of any person endeavoring to save his life therefrom, showing false lights, or extinguishing any true one, with intention to bring any vessel, etc., into danger, distress, or shipwreck, are made felony, punishable by fine and imprisonment, by act of congress of March 3, 1825; R. S. § 5358; 12 Pet. 72. Wrecked goods upon a sale or other act of voluntary importation become liable to duties; 9 Cra. 387. See SALVAGE; TOTAL LOSS.

WRIT. A mandatory precept, issued by the authority and in the name of the sovereign or the state, for the purpose of compelling the defendant to do something therein mentioned.

It is issued by a court or other competent jurisdiction, and is returnable to the same. It is to be under seal and tested by the proper officer, and is directed to the sheriff or other officer lawfully authorized to execute the same. Writs are divided into—original, of mesne process, of execution. See 3 Bla. Com. 273; Gould, Pl. c. 2, s. 1.

The list of original writs was not the reasoned scheme of a provident legislator, calmly devising apt remedies for all conceivable wrongs, rather it was the outcome of the long and complicated struggle whereby the king drew into his court all the litigation of the realm. The statute of Westminster 2d (1285) allowed the chancery to vary the old forms so as to suit new cases, but only new cases which fall under old law.

This gave in time one new form of action—trespass upon the special case—and this again threw out branches which came to be considered distinct forms of action, namely, assumpsit and trover. Equity, again, met some of the new wants, but others had to be met by a stretching and twisting of the old forms which were made to serve many purposes for which they were not originally intended; Poll. Torts, 5th ed. 535, note by F. W. Maitland; and see 3 Harv. L. Rev. 217. As to the history of assumpsit, see 2 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 53, by Prof. J. B. Ames. See WESTMINSTER 2D, STATUTE OF.

WRIT DE RATIONABILI PARTE BONORUM. A writ which was sued out by a widow when the executors of her deceased husband refused to let her have a third part of her late husband's goods, after the debts were paid. Fitzh. N. B. 284.

WRIT OF ASSISTANCE. A writ issuing out of chancery in pursuance of an order, commanding the sheriff to eject the defendant from certain lands and to put the plaintiff in possession. Cowel; 3 Steph. Com. 602; 18 Ill. 67. An ancient writ issuing out of the exchequer. Moz. & W.

A writ issuing from the court of exchequer to the sheriff commanding him to be in aid of the king's tenants by knight's service, or the king's collectors, debtors, or accountants, to enforce payment of their own dues, in order to enable them to pay their own dues to the king. 1 Madox, Hist. Exch. 675.

A writ commanding the sheriff to assist a receiver, sequestrator, or other party in chancery to get possession of land withheld from him by another party to the suit. Quincy, Mass. Appx.; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1062.

These writs which issue from the equity side of the court of exchequer or from any court of chancery are at least as old as the reign of James I., and were formerly in common use in England, Ireland, and some of the United States; 1 Ves. 454; 3 Swanst. 299, n.; but whether from the odium attached to the name in Massachusetts or from the practice in that state to conform processes in equity to those at law, no instance is known of such a writ having been issued in that commonwealth. Quincy, Mass. Appx. 369.

A writ of assistance is founded on the general principle that a court of equity will, when it can do so justly, carry its own decrees into full execution without relying on the co-operation of any other tribunal; 27 N. J. Eq. 482, where it was remarked that it was of comparatively recent use in that state, the first instance being in 1853. It can issue only against parties affected by the decree; 101 U. S. 849: the right to it may be lost by laches; 69 Ala. 484. The order granting this writ is not appealable; 3 MacArthur 402.

It will not issue in favor of a purchaser at an execution sale, where there is a bona fide contest as to the right of possession; 71 Wis. 585.

Writs of assistance to seize uncustomed goods were introduced by statute 12 Charles II., c. 19, and were perhaps copied from the sheriff's patent of assistance; 4 Doug. 347; these writs authorized the person to whom they were issued, with the assistance of the sheriff, justice of the peace, or constable, to enter into any house where the goods were suspected to be concealed. One acting under this writ and finding nothing was not justified; 4 Dougl. 347. See Quincy, Mass. Rep. Appx.; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L.; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1062.

WRIT OF ASSOCIATION. In English Practice. A writ whereby certain persons (usually the clerk of assize and his subordinate officers) are directed to associate themselves with the justices and sergeants; and they are required to admit the said persons into their society in order to take the assizes. 3 Bla. Com. 59. See ASSIZE.

WRIT OF CONSPIRACY. The name of an ancient writ now superseded by the more convenient remedy of an action on the case, which might have been sued against parties guilty of a conspiracy. Fitzh. N. B. 260.

It did not lie at common law, in any case, except when the conspiracy was to indict the party either of treason or felony; all the other cases of conspiracy in the books were but actions on the case; 7 Hill N. Y. 104

WRIT OF COVENANT. A writ which lies where a party claims damages for breach of covenant, i. e. of a promise under seal.

WRIT OF DEBT. A writ which lies where the party claims the recovery of a debt, i. e. a liquidated or certain sum of money alleged to be due to him.

This is debt in the debet, which is the principal and only common form. There is another species mentioned in the books, called the debt in the detinet, which lies for the specific recovery of goods under a contract to deliver them. 1 Chitty, Pl. 101.

WRIT OF DECEIT. The name of a writ which lies where one man has done anything in the name of another, by which the latter is damnified and deceived. Fitzh. N. B. 217.

The modern practice is to sue a writ of trespass on the case to remedy the injury. See DECEIT.

WRIT OF DETINUE. See DETINUE.

WRIT OF DOWER. A writ which lies for a widow claiming the specific recovery of her dower, no part having been yet assigned to her. It is usually called a writ of dower unde nihil habet. 3 Chitty, Pl. 393. There is another species, called a writ of right of dower, which applies to the particular case where the widow has received a part of her dower from the tenant himself; and of land lying in the same town in which she claims the residue. This latter writ is seldom used in practice. See DOWER.

WRIT OF EJECTMENT. See EJECTMENT.

WRIT OF ENTRY. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

WRIT OF ERROR. A writ issued out of a court of competent jurisdiction, directed to the judges of a court of record in which final judgment has been given, and commanding them, in some cases, themselves to examine the record, in others to send it to another court of appellate jurisdiction, therein named, to be examined, in order that some alleged error in the proceedings may be corrected. Steph. Pl. 138; 2 Saund. 100, n. 1; Bac. Abr. Error.

The first is called a writ of error coram nobis or vobis. When an issue in fact has been decided, there is not, in general, any appeal except by motion for a new trial; and although a matter of fact should exist which was not brought into the issue, as, for example, if the defendant neglected to plead a release, which he might have pleaded, this is no error in the proceedings, though a mistake of the defendant; Steph. Pl. *118. But there are some facts which affect the validity and regularity of the proceeding itself; and to remedy these errors the party in interest may sue out the writ of error coram vobis. The death of one of the parties at the commencement of the suit, the appearance of an infant in a personal action by an attorney and not by guardian, the coverture of either party at the commencement of the suit, when her husband is not joined with her, are instances of this kind; 1 Saund. 101; Steph. Pl. *119; 1 Browne, Pa. 75. The writ of error coram vobis is used to correct errors of fact and not of law; 37 Ill. App. 311.

The second species is called, generally, writ of error, and is the more common. Its object is to review and correct an error of the law committed in the proceedings, which is not amendable or cured at common law or by some of the statutes of amendment or jeofail. See, generally, 1 Vern. 169; 1 Salk. 322; 2 Saund. 46, 101; 3 Bla. Com. 405.

It lies only to remove causes from a court of record. It is in the nature of a suit or action when it is to restore the party who obtains it to the possession of anything which is withheld from him, not when its operation is entirely defensive; 3 Story, Const. § 1721. And it is considered, generally, as a new action; 15 Ala. 9.

If a writ of error can ever be issued nunc pro tunc, after the lapse of the time allowed by law for bringing suits in error, the default must be attributable solely to official delinquency; 32 Fla. 273.

A party cannot pursue the remedies of appeal and writ of error simultaneously. He is not entitled to his writ of error at least until the appeal is dismissed; 30 Mo. App. 503.

A writ of error does not vacate the judgment of the court below; that continues in force until reversed; 100 U. S. 81. See APPEAL; BILL OF EXCEPTION.

WRIT OF EXECUTION. A writ to put in force the sentence that the law has given. See EXECUTION.

WRIT OF EXIGI FACIAS. See EXIGENT; EXIGI FACIAS; OUTLAWRY.

WRIT OF FORMEDON. This writ lies where a party claims the specific recovery of lands and tenements as issue in tail, or as remainder-man or reversioner, upon the determination of an estate in tail. Co. Litt. 236 b. See FORMEDON.

WRIT OF INQUIRY. See INQUISITION; INQUEST.

WRIT OF MAINPRISE. A writ directed to the sheriff (either generally, when any man is imprisoned for a bailable offence and bail has been refused, or specially, when the offence or cause of commitment is not properly bailable below), commanding him to take sureties for the prisoner's appearance, commonly called mainpernors, and to set him at large. 3 Bla. Com. 128. See MAINPRISE.

WRIT OF MESNE. In Old English Law. A writ which was so called by reason of the words used in the writ, namely, Unde idem A qui medius est inter C et præfatum B; that is, A, who is mesne between C, the lord paramount, and B, the tenant paravail. Co. Litt. 100 a.

WRIT OF PRÆCIPE. This writ is also called a writ of covenant, and is sued out by the party to whom lands are to be conveyed by fine,—the foundation of which is a supposed agreement or covenant that the one shall convey the land to the other. 2 Bla. Com. 349.

WRIT OF PREVENTION. This name is given to certain writs which may be issued in anticipation of suits which may arise. Co. Litt. 100. See QUIA TIMET.

WRIT OF PROCESS. See PROCESS; ACTION.

WRIT OF PROCLAMATION. A writ which issues at the same time with the exigi facias, by virtue of stat. 31 Eliz. c. 3, s. 1, by which the sheriff is commanded to make proclamations in the statute prescribed.

When it is not directed to the same sheriff as the writ of exigi facias is, it is called a foreign writ of proclamation. 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 261.

WRIT OF PROHIBITION. See PROHIBITION.

WRIT OF QUARE IMPEDIT. See QUARE IMPEDIT.

WRIT OF RECAPTION. A writ which lies where, pending an action of replevin, the same distrainer takes, for the same supposed cause, the cattle or goods of the same distrainee. See Fitzh. N. B. 169.

This writ is nearly obsolete, as trespass, which is found to be a preferable remedy, lies for the second taking; and, as the defendant cannot justify, the plaintiff must necessarily recover damages proportioned to the injury.

WRIT OF REPLEVIN. See REPLEVIN.

WRIT OF RESTITUTION. A writ which is issued on the reversal of a judgment commanding the sheriff to restore to the defendant below the thing levied upon, if it has not been sold, and, if it has been sold, the proceeds. See RESTITUTION.

WRIT OF RIGHT. The remedy appropriate to the case where a party claims the specific recovery of corporeal hereditaments in fee-simple, founding his title on the right of property, or mere right, arising either from his own seisin or the seisin of his ancestor or predecessor. Fitzh. N. B. 1 (B); 3 Bla. Com. 391.

At common law, a writ of right lies only against the tenant of the freehold demanded; 8 Cra. 239.

This writ brings into controversy only the rights of the parties in the suit; and a defence that a third person has better title will not avail; 7 Wheat. 27; 3 Pet. 133; 3 Bingh. N. S. 434; 6 Ad. & E. 103.

WRIT OF SUMMONS. See SUMMONS.

WRIT OF TOLL. In English Law. The name of a writ to remove proceedings on a writ of right patent from the court-baron into the county court. 3 Bla. Com. App. No. 1, § 2.

WRIT OF TRIAL. In English Law. A writ directing an action brought in a superior court to be tried in an inferior court or before the under-sheriff, under stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42. It is now superseded by the County Courts Act of 1867, c. 142, s. 6, by which a defendant in certain cases is enabled to obtain an order that the action be tried in a county court; 3 Steph. Com. 515, n.

WRIT OF WASTE. The name of a writ to be issued against a tenant who has committed waste of the premises. See WASTE.

WRIT PRO RETORNO HABENDO. In Practice. The name of a writ which recites that the defendant was summoned to appear to answer the plaintiff in a plea whereof he took the cattle of the said plaintiff (specifying them), and that the said plaintiff afterwards made default, wherefore it was then considered that the said plaintiff and his pledges of prosecuting should be in mercy, and that the said defendant should go without day, and that he should have return of the cattle aforesaid. It then commands the sheriff that he should cause to be returned the cattle aforesaid to the said defendant without delay, etc. 2 Sell. Pr. 168.

WRITER OF THE TALLIES. In England. An officer of the exchequer whose duty it was to write upon the tallies the letters of tellers' bills. The office has long been abolished. See TALLY.

WRITERS TO THE SIGNET. In Scotch Law. Anciently, clerks in the office of the secretary of state, by whom writs passing the king's signet were prepared. Their duty now is to prepare the warrants of all lands flowing from the crown, and to sign almost all diligencies of the law affecting the person or estate of a debtor, or for compelling implement of decree of superior court. They may act as attorneys or agents before the court of sessions and have various privileges. Bell, Dict. Clerk to Signet.

WRITING. The act of forming by the hand letters or characters of a particular kind, on paper or other suitable substance, and artfully putting them together so as to convey ideas.

The word "writing," when not used in connection with analogous words of more special meaning, is an extensive term, and may be construed to denote a letter from one person to another. But such is not its ordinary and usual acceptation. Neither in legislative enactments nor in common intercourse are the two terms "letter" and "writing" equivalent expressions. In law the term "writing" is much more frequently used to denote legal instruments, such as deeds, agreements, memoranda, bonds, and notes, etc. In the statute of frauds the word occurs in that sense in nearly every section. But in its most frequent and most familiar sense the term "writing" is applied to books, pamphlets, and the literary and scientific productions of authors; 135 U. S. 258.

It differs from printing, which is the formation of words on paper or other proper substance by means of a stamp. Sometimes by writing is understood printing, and sometimes printing and writing mixed. See 9 Pick. 312. A theatre ticket is the subject of forgery. "Printing" is "writing" in the legal sense of the term, and an instrument, the words of which are printed either wholly or in part, is equally valid with an instrument written by a pen; 34 Fed. Rep. 652; 127 U. S. 467.

Many contracts are required to be in writing; all deeds for real estate must be in writing, for it cannot be conveyed by a contract not in writing, yet it is the constant practice to make deeds partly in printing and partly in writing. Wills, except nuncupative wills, must be in writing, and signed by the testator; and nuncupative wills must be reduced to writing by the witnesses within a limited time after the testator's death.

Records, bonds, bills of exchange, and many other engagements must, from their nature, be made in writing.

The notes of a stenographer, taken when the witness gives his oral testimony in court, is a "taking in writing," as required by a statute; 32 La. Ann. 648.

As to a writing being in lead pencil, see, generally, 45 La. Ann. 651; 133 Pa. 245; 84 id. 510; 12 Johns. 102: WILL.

See ALTERATION; FORGERY; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; LANGUAGE; SALE; TYPEWRITING; STENOGRAPHER.

WRITING OBLIGATORY. A bond; an agreement reduced to writing, by which the party becomes bound to perform something, or suffer it to be done.

WRITTEN INSTRUMENT. A judgment and a tax duplicate have been held not to be written instruments, within the meaning of a statute requiring a copy to be filed with the pleadings; 38 Ind. 48; 39 id. 172.

WRONG. An injury; a tort; a violation of right.

In its broad sense, it includes every injury to another, independent of the motive causing the injury; 36 Kan. 570.

A wrong is an invasion of right to the damage of the party who suffers it. It consists in the injury done, and not commonly in the purpose or mental or physical capacity of the person or agent doing it. It may or may not have been done with bad motive; the question of motive is usually a question of aggravation only; 143 N. Y. 447.

In its most usual sense, wrong signifies an injury committed to the person or property of another, or to his relative rights unconnected with contract; and these wrongs are committed with or without force. But in a more extended signification, wrong includes the violation of a contract; a failure by a man to perform his undertaking or promise is a wrong or injury to him to whom it was made; 3 Bla. Com. 158.

A public wrong is an act which is injurious to the public generally, commonly known by the name of crime, misdemeanor, or offence; and it is punishable in various ways, such as indictments, summary proceedings, and, upon conviction, by death, imprisonment, fine, etc.

Private wrongs, which are injuries to individuals, unaffecting the public; these are redressed by actions for damages, etc. See REMEDIES; TORT.

WRONG-DOER. One who commits an injury; a tort-feasor. See Dane, Abr.

WRONGFULLY. In a wrong manner; unjustly; in a manner contrary to the moral law, or to justice. Webster, cited 91 Ind. 536.

WRONGFULLY INTENDING. In Pleading. Words used in a declaration when in an action for an injury the motive of the defendant in committing it can be proved; for then his malicious intent ought to be averred. This is sufficiently done if it be substantially alleged, in general terms, as wrongfully intending. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2875.

WYOMING. One of the states of the United States.

Wyoming became one of the states of the Union by virtue of the act of congress of July 10, 1890.

By act of congress, approved July 25, 1868, the territory of Wyoming was constituted. See MONTANA; NEW MEXICO.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER is vested in a senate and house of representatives.

The Senate consists of members elected for four years. At least one is selected from each county.

The House of Representatives consists of members elected for two years. Their number shall never be greater than three times nor less than twice the number of senators.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER is vested in a governor elected for a term of four years. He has the power to remit fines, to grant reprieves and pardons after conviction for all offences except treason in cases of impeachment. During the absence or disability of the governor the secretary of state acts as governor.

THE JUDICIAL POWER is vested in the senate as a court of impeachment, in a supreme court, district courts, courts of arbitration, and other inferior courts established by legislature. The Supreme Court consists of three judges elected by the people for a term of eight years. It has appellate jurisdiction in both civil and criminal causes and original jurisdiction in quo warranto and mandamus as to state officers, and in habeas corpus, and has power to issue writs of mandamus, review, prohibition, habeas corpus, certiorari, and other writs necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction.

The District Courts have original jurisdiction of all cases both at law and in equity and in all criminal cases, and of all matters of probate and insolvency. It has appellate jurisdiction from justices, and other inferior courts. They have power to issue writs of mandamus, etc., in their respective districts. The state is divided into four districts.

Y.

YACHT. A light sea-going vessel for the purpose of pleasure, racing, and the like. See VESSEL. A steam pleasure yacht is an "ocean going vessel" and not a coasting vessel; 150 U. S. 674.

By the act of January 25, 1897, foreign-built yachts thereafter purchased by American citizens are subject to tonnage duties; 166 U. S. 110. See 142 U. S. 479; [1897] A. C. 59; VESSEL; SHIP; NAVIGATION RULES.

YARD. A measure of length, containing three feet, or thirty-six inches.

A piece of land inclosed for the use and accommodation of the inhabitants of a house. In England it is nearly synonymous with backside. 1 Chitty, Pr. 176; 1 Term 701.

YARDLAND. In Old English Law. A quantity of land containing twenty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a.

YEAR. The period in which the revolution of the earth round the sun, and the accompanying changes in the order of nature, are completed.

The civil year differs from the astronomical, the latter being composed of three hundred and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-eight seconds and a fraction, while the former consists sometimes of three hundred and sixty-five days, and at others, in leap-years, of three hundred and sixty-six days.

The year is divided into half-year, which consists, according to Co. Litt. 135 b, of one hundred and eighty-two days; and quarter of a year, which consists of ninety-one days. Id.; 2 Rolle, Abr. 521, l. 40. It is further divided into twelve months.

The civil year commences immediately after twelve o'clock at night of the thirty-first day of December, that is, the first moment of the first day of January, and ends at midnight of the thirty-first day of December twelve months thereafter. See Com. Dig. Annus; 2 Chitty, Bla. Com. 140. Before the alteration of the calendar from old to new style in England (see BISSEXTILE) and the colonies of that country in America, the year in chronological reckoning was supposed to commence with the first day of January, although the legal year did not commence until March 25, the intermediate time being doubly indicated; thus February 15, 172⅘, and so on. This mode of reckoning was altered by the statute 24 Geo. II. c. 23, which gave rise to an act of assembly of Pennsylvania, passed March 11, 1752, 1 Smith, Laws, 217, conforming thereto, and also to the repeal of the act of 1710.

In New York it is enacted that whenever the term "year" or "years" is or shall be used in any statute, deed, verbal or written contract, or any public or private instrument whatever, the year intended shall be taken to consist of three hundred and sixty-five days; half a year, of a hundred and eighty-two days; and a quarter of a year, of ninety-two days; and the day of a leap year, and the day immediately preceding, if they shall occur in any period so to be computed, shall be reckoned together as one day. Rev. Stat. vol. 2; c. 19, t. 1, § 3. The meaning of the term "year," as used in a contract, is to be determined from the connection in which it is used and the subject-matter of the contract; 77 Cal. 236; 73 Ind. 54. See AGE; ALLOWANCE; TIME; REGNAL YEARS; OLD STYLE.

The omission of the word "year" in an indictment is not important, provided the proper numerals are written after the month and day of the month; 22 Minn. 67. An indictment which states the year of the commission of the offence in figures only, without prefixing "A. D.," is insufficient; 5 Gray 91; but it has been held otherwise in Maine under a statute; 47 Me. 388. See YEAR OF OUR LORD.

YEAR AND DAY A period of time much recognized in law.

It is not in all cases limited to a precise calendar year. In Scotland, in computing the term, the year and day is to be reckoned, not by the number of days which go to make up a year, but by the return of the day of the next year that bears the same denomination; 1 Bell, Com. 721. See Bac. Abr. Descent (I 3). In the law of all the Gothic nations, it meant a year and six weeks.

It is a term frequently occurring; for example, in case of an estray, if the owner challenged it not within a year and a day, it belonged to the lord; 5 Co. 108. So of a wreck; Co. 2d Inst. 168. This time is given to prosecute appeals and for actions in a writ of right, and, after entry or claim, to avoid a fine; Plowd. 357 a. And if a person wounded die in that time, it is murder; Co. 3d Inst. 53; 6 Co. 107. So, when a judgment is reversed, a party, notwithstanding the lapse of time mentioned in the statute of limitations pending that action, may commence a fresh action within a year and a day of such reversal; 3 Chitty, Pr. 107. Again, after a year and a day have elapsed from the day of signing a judgment no execution can be issued till the judgment be revived by scire facias; Bac. Abr. Execution (H).

Protection lasted a year and a day; and if a villein remain from his master a year and a day in an ancient demesne, he is free; Cunningham, Dict. If a person is afraid to enter on his land, he may make claim as near as possible,—which is in force for a year and a day; 3 Bla. Com. 175. In case of prize, if no claim is made within a year and a day, the condemnation is to captors as of course; 2 Gall. 388. So, in case of goods saved, the court retains them till claim, if made within a year and a day, but not after that time; 8 Pet. 4.

Coke gives various rules as to the proposition that the common law has often limited year and day as a convenient time. See Co. Litt. 254 b; 5 Rep. 218.

See Possession for Year and Day, by F. W. Maitland, in 5 L. Q. Rev. 253, containing much learning.

The same period occurs in the Civil Law, in the Book of Feuds, the Laws of the Lombards, etc.

YEAR-BOOKS. Books of reports of cases in a regular series (the first one being written in 1292; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 195), from the reign of the English King Edward II., 1292, inclusive, to the time of Henry VIII., which were taken by the prothonotaries or chief scribes of the courts, at the expense of the crown, and published annually—whence their name Year-Books. They consist of eleven parts, namely:—Part 1. Maynard's Reports temp. Edw. II.; also divers Memoranda of the Exchequer temp. Edward I. Part 2. Reports in the first ten years of Edw. III. Part 3. Reports from 17 to 39 Edward III. Part 4. Reports from 40 to 50 Edward III. Part 5. Liber Assisarum; or, Pleas of the Crown temp. Edw. III. Part 6. Reports temp. Hen. IV. & Hen. V. Parts 7 and 8. Annals; or, Reports of Hen. VI. during his reign, in 2 vols. Part 9. Annals of Edward IV. Part 10. Long Quinto; or, Reports in 5 Edward IV. Part 11. Cases in the reigns of Edward V., Richard III., Henry VII. and Henry VIII. A reference to them by a learned judge as mere "lumber garrets of obsolete feudal law," indicates their practical value in modern times. Wallace, Reporters; 2 Wall. Jr. 309. See REPORTS.

Their usefulness is now, however, considered rather greater than that. Professor Wambaugh (Study of Cases § 98) says they "are the work of skilled lawyers; and the reports of cases, when complete, present an adequate view of the pleadings." They were Court Rolls, intended for the preservation of the results in order to fix the rights of the parties, but not adapted for use as precedents. Id. See 1 Dougl. v; 1 Co. XXVI.

YEAR, DAY, AND WASTE (Lat. annus, dies, et vastum) is a part of king's prerogative, whereby he takes the profits of the lands and tenements of those attainted of petty treason or felony, for a year and a day, but, in the end, may waste the tenements, destroy the houses, root up the woods, gardens, and pasture, and plough up the meadows (except the lord of the fee agree with him for redemption of such waste); after which the lands are to be restored to the lord of the fee. Staundford, Prerog. c. 16, fol. 44. By Magna Charta, it would appear that the profits for a year and a day were given in lieu of the waste. 9 Hen. III. c. 22. But 17 Edw. II. declares the king's right to both.

YEAR OF OUR LORD. In England the time of an offence may be alleged as that of the sovereign's reign, or as that of the year of our Lord. The former is the usual mode. Hence there "year" alone might not indicate the time intended, but as we have no other era, therefore, any particular year must mean that year in our era. 14 Gray 38. The abbreviation A. D. may be omitted; and the word year is not fatal; 47 Me. 393; 22 Mo. 71; contra, 5 Gray 92. See REGNAL YEARS.

YEARS, ESTATE FOR. See ESTATE FOR YEARS.

YEAS AND NAYS. The list of members of a legislative body voting in the affirmative and negative of a proposition.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, directs that "the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." See 2 Story, Const. 301.

Constitutional provisions in some states require the yeas and nays to be entered on the journal on the final passage of every bill. See 68 Ill. 160; 22 Mich. 104; 54 N. Y. 276. These directions are clearly imperative; Cooley, Const. Lim. 171.

The power of calling the yeas and nays is given by all the constitutions of the several states; and it is not, in general, restricted to the request of one-fifth of the members present, but may be demanded by a less number; and, in some, one member alone has the right to require the call of the yeas and nays.

YEOMAN. In the United States this word does not appear to have any very exact meaning. It is usually put as an addition to the names of parties in declarations and indictments. In England it signifies a free man who has land of the value of forty shillings a year. Co. 2d Inst. 668; 2 Dall. 92. The local volunteer militia raised by individuals with the approbation of the queen are also called yeomen. The term yeomanry is applied to the small freeholders and farmers in general. Hallam, Cons. Hist. c. 1.

YIELDING AND PAYING. These words, when used in a lease, constitute a covenant on the part of the lessee to pay the rent; Platt, Cov. 50; 3 Pa. 464; 2 Lev. 206; 3 Term 402; 1 B. & C. 416; 2 Dowl. & R. 670; but whether it be an express covenant or not seems not to be settled; 2 Lev. 206; T. Jones 102; 3 Term 402.

In Pennsylvania, it has been decided to be a covenant running with the land; 3 Pa. 464. See 1 Saund. 233, n. 1; 9 Vt. 191.

YORK-ANTWERP RULES. Certain rules relating to uniform bills of lading formulated by the Association for the Reform and Codification of the Laws of Nations, now the International Law Association.

YORK, CUSTOM OF, is recognized by 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10, and 1 Jac. II. c. 17. By this custom, the effects of an intestate are divided according to the anciently universal rule of pars rationabilis. 4 Burn, Eccl. Law 342.

YORK, STATUTE OF. The name of an English statute, passed at York, 12 Edw. II. 1318. It contains many wise provisions and explanations of former statutes. Barrington, Stat. 174. There were other statutes made at York in the reign of Edward III., but they do not bear this name.

YOUNG ANIMALS. It is a rule that the young of domestic or tame animals belong to the owner of the dam or mother, according to the maxim, Partus sequitur ventrem. Dig. 6. 1. 5. 2; Inst. 2. 1. 9. See WHELP.

YOUNGER CHILDREN. When used with reference to settlements of land in England, this phrase signifies all such children as are not entitled to the rights of an eldest son, including daughters who are older than the eldest son. Moz. & W.

YOUTH. This word may include children and youth of both sexes. 2 Cush. 519, 528.
