Under the Judicature Acts, the court of the master of the rolls has been abolished, but he is a judge of the high court, and sits as the head of one of the divisions of the court of appeal. He is no longer, of necessity, a chancery lawyer.

Provision is made for the abolition of this office when it shall become vacant, by order in council, on the recommendation of the council of judges, provided that such order in council be laid before the houses of parliament for thirty days, and during that time neither house address her majesty against it; Stat. 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, §§ 5, 31, 32; Mozl. & W. Law Dict.

MASTERS AT COMMON LAW. In English Law. Officers of the superior courts of common law, whose duty is to tax costs, compute damages, take affidavits and the like. They are five in number in each court. See stat. 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict. c. 30.

MATE. In Maritime Law. The officer next in rank to the master on board a merchant ship or vessel.

In such vessels there is always one mate, and sometimes a second, third, and fourth mate, according to the vessel's size and the trade in which she may be engaged. When the word mate is used without qualification, it always denotes the first mate; and the others are designated as above. On large ships the mate is frequently styled first officer, and the second and third mates, second and third officers. Parish, Sea Off. Man. 83.

The mate, as well as the inferior officers and seamen, is a mariner, and entitled to sue in admiralty for his wages; and he has a lien on the vessel for his security. Even when he acts as master in consequence of the death of the appointed master, he can sue in the admiralty for his proper wages as mate, but not for the increased compensation to which he is entitled as acting master. And he is entitled, when sick, to be cured at the expense of the ship. The mate should possess a sufficient knowledge of navigation to take command of the ship and carry on the voyage in case of the death of the master; and it may well be doubted whether a vessel be seaworthy for a long voyage at sea when only the master is competent to navigate her; Blount, Com. Dig. 32; Dana, Seaman's Friend 146; Curtis, Rights and Duties of Merchant Seamen 96, note. It is the special duty of the mate to keep the log-book. The mate takes charge of the larboard watch at sea, and in port superintends the storage and breaking out of the cargo.

The mate succeeds, of course, to the station, rights, and authorities of the captain or master on the death of the latter, and he also has command, with the authority required by the exigencies of the case, during the temporary absence of the master. See Dana, Seaman's Friend; Parish, Sea-Officer's Manual; Curtis, Rights and Duties of Merchant Seamen; Parsons, Maritime Law; Desty, Shipp. & Adm.; MASTER OF A SHIP.

MATELOTAGE. The hire of a ship or boat.

MATER FAMILIAS. In Civil Law. The mother of a family; the mistress of a family.

A chaste woman, married or single. Calvinus, Lex.

MATERIAL ALTERATION. See ALTERATION.

MATERIAL MEN. Persons who furnish materials to be used in the construction or erection of ships, houses, or buildings.

By the general maritime law, material men have a lien on a foreign ship for supplies or materials furnished for such ship; which may be enforced in the admiralty; Bened. Adm. 266; 9 Wheat. 409; 19 How. 359; 55 Fed. Rep. 523; 56 id. 237; but no such lien exists in the case of domestic ships; 4 Wheat. 438; 20 How. 393; 21 id. 248; except when authorized by statute. See LIEN.

By statutory provisions, material men have a lien on ships and buildings, in some of the states. See LIEN.

The term is now much used in connection with those who furnished supplies to railroad companies, as to which see RECEIVERS.

MATERIALITY. The property of substantial importance or influence, especially as distinguished from formal requirement. Capability of properly influencing the result of the trial.

MATERIALS. Matter which is intended to be used in the creation of a mechanical structure. 71 Pa. 293; 36 Wisc. 29. The physical part of that which has a physical existence.

The general property in materials furnished to a workman remains in the bailor where the contract is merely one for the employment of labor and services; otherwise where it is a sale. See BAILMENT; MANDATE; TROVER; TRESPASS.

MATERNA MATERNIS (Lat. from the mother to the mother's).

In French Law. A term denoting the descent of property of a deceased person derived from his mother to the relations on the mother's side.

MATERNAL. That which belongs to, or comes from, the mother: as, maternal authority, maternal relation, maternal estate, maternal line. See LINE.

MATERNAL PROPERTY. That which comes from the mother of the party, and other ascendants of the maternal stock. Domat, Liv. Prél. t. 3, s. 2., n. 12.

MATERNITY. The state or condition of a mother.

It is either legitimate or natural. The former is the condition of the mother who has given birth to legitimate children; while the latter is the condition of her who has given birth to illegitimate children. Maternity is always certain; while the paternity is only presumed.

MATERTERA. A mother's sister.

MATERTERA MAGNA. A grandmother's sister.

MATERTERA MAJOR. A great-grandmother's sister.

MATERTERA MAXIMA. A great-great grandmother's sister.

MATH. A moving.

MATHEMATICAL EVIDENCE. That evidence which is established by a demonstration. It is used in contradistinction to moral evidence.

MATIMA. A godmother.

MATRICIDE. The murder of one's mother.

MATRICULA. In Civil Law. A register in which are inscribed the names of persons who become members of an association or society. Dig. 50. 3. 1. In the ancient church there was matricula clericorum, which was a catalogue of the officiating clergy, and matricula pauperum, a list of the poor to be relieved: hence, to be entered in a university is to be matriculated.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. In the English ecclesiastical courts there are five kinds of causes which are classed under this head, viz.: causes for a malicious jactitation; suits for nullity of marriage, on account of fraud, incest, or other bar to the marriage; 2 Hagg. Cons. 423; suits for restitution of conjugal rights; suits for divorce on account of cruelty or adultery, or causes which have arisen since the marriage; suits for alimony.

Matrimonial causes were formerly a branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. By the Divorce Act of 1857, they passed under the cognizance of the court for divorce and matrimonial causes created by that act. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACTS. A series of English statutes relating to divorce and matrimonial causes. See Brett, Eng. Com. 958; 4 Chitty, Stat.

MATRIMONIAL DOMICIL. See DOMICIL; ALIEN; and see also 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 330; 2 Brett, Com. 957.

MATRIMONIUM. In Civil Law. A legal marriage. A marriage celebrated in conformity with the rules of the civil law was called justum matrimonium; the husband vir, the wife uxor. It was exclusively confined to Roman citizens, and to those to whom the connubium had been conceded. It alone produced the paternal power over the children, and the marital power—manus—over the wife. The farreum, the coemptio, or the usus, was indispensable for the formation of this marriage. See PATERFAMILIAS.

MATRIMONY. Marriage; the nuptial state. See MARRIAGE.

MATRIX ECCLESIA. The mother church.

MATRON. A married woman.

MATRONS, JURY OF. See JURY OF WOMEN.

MATTER. As used in law, a fact or facts constituting the whole or a part of a ground of action or defence. 18 Ind. 332. See 40 Ala. 148.

MATTER IN CONTROVERSY, or IN DISPUTE. The subject of litigation, in the matter for which a suit is brought and upon which issue is joined. 1 Wall. 337.

To ascertain the matter in dispute we must recur to the foundation of the original controversy; the thing demanded, not the thing found; 3 Dall. 405. An appeal will not lie on a claim insufficient in amount to give jurisdiction when suit was instituted, but which has been brought within the limitation by the after-accrued interest; 2 La. Ann. 793; id. 911; 12 id. 87. See 3 Cra. 159; 1 S. & R. 269.

MATTER IN DEED. Such matter as may be proved or established by a deed or specialty. Matter of fact, in contradistinction to matter of law. Co. Litt. 320; Steph. Pl. 197.

MATTER IN ISSUE. That matter upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action, and which the defendant controverts by his pleadings. 15 N. H. 1. That ultimate fact or state of facts in dispute upon which the verdict or finding is predicated. 4 Fed. Rep. 886.

MATTER IN PAIS (literally, matter in the country). Matter of fact, as distinguished from matter of law or matter of record.

MATTER OF FACT. In Pleading. Matter, the existence or truth of which is determined by the senses or by reasoning based upon their evidence. The decision of such matters is referred to the jury. Hob. 127; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49.

MATTER OF FORM. That which relates merely to the form of an instrument or to its language, arrangement, or technicality, without affecting its substance.

MATTER OF LAW. In Pleading. Matter, the truth or falsity of which is determined by the established rules of law or by reasoning based upon them. The decision of such matters is referred to the court. Where special pleading prevails, it is a rule that matter of law must be pleaded specially. The phrase here means matter which, if established as true, goes to defeat the plaintiff's charges by the effect of some rule of law, as distinguished from that which operates as a direct negative. See 70 N. C. 167.

MATTER OF RECORD. Those facts which may be proved by the production of a record. It differs from matter in deed, which consists of facts which may be proved by specialty.

MATTER OF SUBSISTENCE FOR MAN. All articles or things, whether animal or vegetable, living or dead, which are used for food, and whether they are consumed in the form in which they are bought from the producer or only after undergoing a process of preparation. 19 Gratt. 813.

MATTER OF SUBSTANCE. That which goes to the merits.

MATURITY. The time when a bill or note becomes due. See DAYS OF GRACE.

MAXIM. An established principle or proposition. A principle of law universally admitted as being just and consonant with reason.

Maxims are said to have been of comparatively late origin in the Roman law. There are none in the Twelve Tables, and they appear but rarely in Gaius and the ante-Justinian fragments, or in the older English text-books and reports. The word maximum or maxima does not occur in the Corpus Juris in any meaning resembling that now borne by it; the nearest word in classical Roman law is regula; Fortescue identifies the two terms, and Du Cange defines maxima as recepta sententia, regula vulgo nostris et Anglis maxime. Doctor and Student defines maxims as "the foundations of the Law and the conclusions of reason, and therefore they ought not to be impugned, but always to be admitted." Coke says they are "a sure foundation or ground of art and a conclusion of reason, so sure and uncontrolled that they ought not to be questioned," and that a maxim is so called "quia maxima ejus dignitas et certissima auctoritas, atque quod maxime omnibus probetur." Co. Litt. 11 a. He says in another place: "A maxime is a proposition to be of all men confessed and granted without proofe, argument, or discourse." See 20 L. Quart. & Rev. 288.

Regula appears not to be quite the same thing as maxim. The Digest makes the line between regula, definitio, and sententia a narrow one. Sententia is used in several texts as equivalent to regula. Definitio, in Labeo, is really a rule of law. In Papinius it is more like responsa prudentis. In some editions of the Corpus Juris, maxims are given under the name of Regulæ et Sententiæ Juris. See 20 L. Mag. & Rev. 283.

Maxims in law are said to be somewhat like axioms in geometry. 1 Bla. Com. 68. They are principles and authorities, and part of the general customs or common law of the land, and are of the same strength as acts of parliament, when the judges have determined what is a maxim. This determination belongs to the court and not the jury; Termes de la Ley Doct. & Stud. Dial. 1, c. 8; they prove themselves; id. Maxims of the law are holden for law, and all other cases that may be applied to them shall be taken for granted; Co. Litt. 11, 67. See Plowd. 27 b.

The alteration of any of the maxims of the common law is dangerous; 2 Inst. 210.

See the introduction by W. F. Cooper to Barton's Maxims.

Later writers place less value on maxims; thus: "It seems to me that legal maxims in general are little more than pert headings of chapters. They are rather minims than maxims, for they give not a particularly great, but a particularly small, amount of information. As often as not the exceptions and qualifications to them are more important than the so-called rules." 2 Steph. Hist. of Cr. L. 94.

"We believe that not a single law maxim can be pointed out which is not obnoxious to objection." Towns. Sl. & Lib. § 88.

"Many of the sayings that are dignified by the name of maxims are nothing but the obiter dicta of ancient judges who were fond of sententious phrases, and sometimes sacrificed accuracy of definition to terseness of expression; and some . . . have no definite meaning at all." E. Q. Keasbey, in 3 N. J. L. J. 160.

"Maxims are not all of equal value; some ought to be amended and others discarded altogether; they are neither definitions nor treatises; they require the test of careful analysis; they are in many instances merely guide-posts pointing to the right road, but not the road itself." Prof. Jeremiah Smith, in 9 Harv. L. Rev. 26.

"I need hardly repeat that I detest the attempt to fetter the law by maxims. They are almost invariably misleading; they are for the most part so large and general in their language that they always include something which really is not intended to be included in them." Lord Esher, M. R., in 19 Q. B. D. 653.

Maxims have been divided, as to their origin, into three classes: Roman, Roman modified, and indigenous; 20 L. Mag. & Rev. 283.

The application of the maxim to the case before the court is generally the only difficulty. The true method of making the application is to ascertain how the maxim arose, and to consider whether the case to which it is sought to be applied is of the same character, or whether it is an exception to an apparently general rule. This requires extended discussion, which it has received (so far as the more important maxims are concerned) in the able treatise on Legal Maxims by Broom.

Non ex regula jus sumatur, sed ex jure quod est regula fiat. The law should not be taken from maxims, but maxims from the law; 9 Jurid. Rev. 307.

The earliest work on maxims appears to have been that of Bacon (1630), followed by Noy (1641), Wingate (1658), Heath (Pleading, 1694), Francis (1728), Grounds and Rudiments of Law and Equity (anonymous, 1751, of which Francis was the author), Branch (1753), Lofft (1776, in his Reports). In the present century, Broom (1845), Trayner (1872, 1883), Cotterell (1881, 1894), and Wharton's Dictionary (1848, 1892), Lawson (1883), Bell's Dictionary (Scotch, 1890), Peloubet (New York, 1880), Barton, Stimson, Morgan, Tayler, Hening, Halkerston, Jackson (Law Latin), and Hughes. See the various Law Dictionaries; also 15 West. Jur. 337; 13 Cr. L. Mag. 832; 5 L. Quart. Rev. 444.

The following list comprises, it is believed, all the legal maxims, commonly so called, together with some that are in reality nothing more than legal phrases, accompanied by a translation, and, in most cases, a reference to one or more authorities which are intended to show the origin or application of the rule. It is obvious that many of them are of slight value and that more of them are open to objections, so far as they can be considered to be statements of principles of law.

A communi observantia non est recedendum. There should be no departure from common observance (or usage). Co. Litt. 186; Wing. Max. 208; 2 Co. 74.

A digniori fieri debet denominatio et resolutio. The denomination and explanation ought to be derived from the more worthy. Wing. Max. 265; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 10, § 12.

A justitia (quasi a quodam fonte) omnia jura emanant. From justice, as a fountain, all rights flow. Brac. 2 b.

A l'impossible nul n'est tenu. No one is bound to do what is impossible.

A non posse ad non esse sequitur argumentum necessarie negative, licet non affirmative. From impossibility to non-existence the inference follows necessarily in the negative, though not in the affirmative. Hob. 336.

A piratis aut latronibus capti liberi permanent. Those captured by pirates or robbers remain free. Dig. 49. 15. 198; Grot. lib. 3, c. 3, s. 1.

A piratis et latronibus capta dominium non mutant. Things captured by pirates or robbers do not change their ownership. 1 Kent 108, 184; 2 Woodd. Lect. 258, 259.

A rescriptis valet argumentum. An argument from rescripts [i. e. original writs in the register] is valid. Co. Litt. 11 a.

A summo remedio ad inferiorem actionem non habetur regressus neque auxilium. From the highest remedy to an inferior action there is no return or assistance. Fleta, lib. 6, c. 1; Brac. 104 a, 112 b; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 193, 194.

A verbis legis non est recedendum. From the words of the law there should be no departure. Broom, Max. 622; Wing. Max. 25; 5 Co. 119.

Ab abusu ad usum non valet consequentia. A conclusion as to the use of a thing from its abuse is invalid. Broom, Max. xvii.

Ab assuetis non fit injuria. No injury is done by things long acquiesced in. Jenk. Cent. Introd. vi.

Abbreviationum ille numerus et sensus accipiendus est ut concessio non sit inanis. Such number and sense is to be given to abbreviations that the grant may not fail. 9 Co. 48.

Absentem accipere debemus eum qui non est eo loco in quo petitur. We must consider him absent who is not in that place in which he is sought. Dig. 50. 60. 199.

Absentia ejus qui reipublicæ causa abest, neque ei neque aliis damnosa esse debet. The absence of him who is employed in the service of the state ought not to be prejudicial to him nor to others. Dig. 50. 17. 140.

Absoluta sententia expositore non indiget. A simple proposition needs no expositor. 2 Inst. 533. See 109 Mass. 325.

Abundans cautela non nocet. Abundant caution does no harm. 11 Co. 6; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 28, § 1; 6 Wheat 108.

Accessorium non ducit sed sequitur suum principale. The accessory does not draw, but follows, its principal. Co. Litt. 152 a, 389 a; 5 E. & B. 772; Broom, Max. 491; Lindl. Part. 1036; 21 Misc. Rep. 84.

Accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis. An accessory follows the nature of his principal. 3 Inst. 139; 4 Bla. Com. 36; Broom, Max. 497.

Accipere quid ut justitiam facias, non est tam accipere quam extorquere. To accept anything as a reward for doing justice, is rather extorting than accepting. Lofft 72.

Accusare nemo debet se, nisi coram Deo. No one is obliged to accuse himself, unless before God. Hardr. 139.

Accusator post rationabile tempus non est audiendus, nisi se bene de omissione excusaverit. An accuser is not to be heard after a reasonable time, unless he excuse himself satisfactorily for the omission. F. Moore 817; Bart. Max. 29.

Acta exteriora indicant interiora secreta. Outward acts indicate the inward intent. Broom, Max. 301; 8 Co. 146 b; 1 Sm. L. Cas. 261.

Acta in uno judicio non probant in aliis nisi inter easdem personas. Things done in one action cannot be taken as evidence in another, unless it be between the same parties. Trayner, Max. 11.

Actio non datur non damnificato. An action is not given to one who is not injured. Jenk. Cent. 69.

Actio non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. An action does not make one guilty, unless the intention be bad. Lofft 87. See Actus non, etc.

Actio personalis moritur cum persona. A personal action dies with the person. Noy, Max. 14; Broom, Max. 904; 13 Mass. 455; 1 Pick. 78; 21 Pick. 253; Bart. Max. 30; 38 Fed. Rep. 80; 98 Ky. 700; 34 L. R. A. 788; 93 Va. 396; 25 S. E. Rep. 110; 40 W. N. C. 345; 3 Am. & Eng. Rul. Cas. N. S. 309. See ACTIO PERSONALIS.

Actionum genera maxime sunt servanda. The kinds of actions are especially to be preserved. Lofft 460.

Actor qui contra regulam quid adduxit, non est audiendus. A pleader ought not to be heard who advances a proposition contrary to the rules of law.

Actor sequitur forum rei. The plaintiff must follow the forum of the thing in dispute. Home, Law Tr. 232; Story, Confl. L. § 525 k; 2 Kent 462.

Actore non probante, reus absolvitur. If the plaintiff does not prove his case, the defendant is absolved. Hob. 103.

Actori incumbit onus probandi. The burden of proof lies on the plaintiff. Hob. 103; 100 Mass. 490. See Dig. 22. 3. 2.

Acts indicate the intention. 8 Co. 146 b; Broom, Max. 301.

Actus curiæ neminem gravabit. An act of the court shall prejudice no man. Jenk. Cent. 118; Broom, Max. 122; 1 Str. 426; 1 Sm. L. C., notes to Cumber vs. Wane; 12 C. B. 415.

Actus Dei nemini facit injuriam. The act of God does wrong to no one (that is, no one is responsible in damages for inevitable accidents). 2 Bla. Com. 123; Broom, Max. 230; 1 Co. 97 b; 5 id. 87 a; Co. Litt. 206 a; 4 Taunt. 309; 1 Term 33; 56 Conn. 374. See ACT OF GOD.

Actus inceptus cujus perfectio pendet ex voluntate partium, revocari potest; si autem pendet ex voluntate tertiæ personæ, vel ex contingenti, revocari non potest. An act already begun, whose completion depends upon the will of the parties, may be recalled; but if it depend on consent of a third person, or on a contingency, it cannot be recalled. Bacon, Max. Reg. 20. See Story, Ag. § 424.

Actus judiciarius coram non judice irritus habetur; de ministeriali autem a quocunque provenit ratum esto. A judicial act before one not a judge is void; as to a ministeral act, from whomsoever it proceeds, let it be valid. Lofft 458.

Actus legis nemini est damnosus. An act of the law shall prejudice no man. 2d Inst. 287; Broom, Max. 126; 11 Johns. 380; 3 Co. 87 a; Co. Litt. 264 b; 5 Term 381, 385; 2 H. Bla. 324; 1 Prest. Abs. of Tit. 346; 6 Bacon, Abr. 559.

Actus legis nemini facit injuriam. The act of the law does no one wrong. Broom, Max. 127, 409; 2 Bla. Com. 123.

Actus legitimi non recipiunt modum. Acts required by law admit of no qualification. Hob. 153; Branch, Pr.

Actus me invito factus, non est meus actus. An act done by me against my will is not my act. Brac. 101 b.

Actus non reum facit nisi mens sit rea. An act does not make a person guilty unless his intention be guilty also. (This maxim applies only in criminal cases; in civil matters it is otherwise.) Broom, Max. 306, 367, 807, n.; 7 Term 514; 3 Bingh. N. C. 34, 468; 5 M. & G. 639; 3 C. B. 229; 5 id. 380; 9 Cl. & F. 531; 4 N. Y. 159, 163, 195; L. R. 2 C. C. R. 160 (a very full case). It has been said that this is "the foundation of all criminal justice;" 8 Cox, Cr. Cas. 477, per Cockburn, C. J.; but it has also been said to be "an unfortunate phrase and actually misleading;" L. R. 23 Q. B. D. 185; and to be "somewhat uncouth;" id. 181; also that "the expression (mens rea) is unmeaning;" 2 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 95. See IGNORANCE; INTENTION; MENS REA.

Actus repugnans non potest in esse produci. A repugnant act cannot be brought into being (i. e. cannot be made effectual). Plowd. 355.

Actus servi in iis quibus opera ejus communiter adhibita est, actus domini habetur. The act of a servant in those things in which he is usually employed, is considered the act of his master. Lofft 227.

Ad ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur. The laws are adapted to those cases which occur more frequently. 2 Inst. 137; Wing. Max. 216; Dig. 1. 3. 3; 19 How. St. Tr. 1061; 3 B. & C. 178, 183; 2 C. & J. 108; 7 M. & W. 599, 600; Vaugh. 373; 6 Co. 77 a; 11 Exch. 476; 11 id. 696; 12 How. 312; 7 Allen 227; Broom, Max. 43.

Ad officium justiciariorum spectat, unicuique coram eis placitanti justitiam exhibere. It is the duty of justices to administer justice to every one pleading before them. 2 Inst. 451.

Ad proximum antecedens fiat relatio, nisi impediatur sententia. A relative is to be referred to the next antecedent, unless the sense would be thereby impaired. Broom, Max. 630; Noy, Max., 9th ed. 4; 2 Exch. 479; 17 Q. B. 833; 2 H. & N. 625; 3 Bingh. N. C. 217; 13 How. 142.

Ad quæstiones facti non respondent judices; ad quæstiones legis non respondent juratores. The judges do not answer to questions of fact; the jury do not answer to questions of law. Co. Litt. 295; 8 Co. 155 a; Vaugh. 149; 5 Gray 211, 219, 290; Broom, Max. 102.

Ad quæstiones juris respondent judices; ad quæstionem facti respondent juratores. 116 Cal. 179. See JURY.

Ad quæstiones legis judices, et non juratores, respondent. Judges, and not jurors, respond to questions of law. 7 Mass. 279. See JURY.

Ad recte docendum oportet, primum inquirere nomina, quia rerum cognitio a nominibus rerum dependet. In order rightly to comprehend a thing, inquire first into the names, for a right knowledge of things depends upon their names. Co. Litt. 68.

Ad vim majorem vel ad casus fortuitos non tenetur quis, nisi sua culpa intervenerit. No one is held to answer for the effects of a superior force, or of accidents, unless his own fault has contributed. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 72, § 16.

Additio probat minoritatem. An addition proves inferiority. That is, if it be said that a man has a fee tail, it is less than if he has the fee. 4 Inst. 80; Wing. Max. 211, Max. 60; Littleton § 298; Co Litt. 189 a.

Adjuvari quippe nos, non decipi, beneficio oportet. For we ought to be helped by a benefit, not destroyed by it. Dig. 13. 6, 17. 3; Broom, Max. 392.

Ædificare in tuo proprio solo non licet quod alteri noceat. It is not lawful to build upon one's own land what may be injurious to another. 3 Inst. 201; Broom, Max. 369.

Ædificatum solo, solo cedit. That which is built upon the land goes with the land. Co. Litt. 4 a; Inst. 2. 1. 29; Dig. 47. 3. 1.

Ædificia solo cedunt. Buildings pass by a grant of the land. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 2, § 12.

Æquior est dispositio legis quam hominis. The disposition of the law is more impartial than that of man. 8 Co. 152 a.

Æquitas agit in personam. Equity acts upon the person. 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3733.

Æquitas est correctio legis generaliter latæ qua parte deficit. Equity is the correction of law, when too general, in the part in which it is defective. Plowd. 375; Bart. Max. 135.

Æquitas ignorantiæ opitulatur, oscitantiæ non item. Equity assists ignorance, but not carelessness.

Æquitas non facit jus, sed juri auxiliatur. Equity does not make law, but assists law. Lofft 379.

Æquitas nunquam contravenit legem. Equity never contradicts the law.

Æquitas sequitur legem. Equity follows the law. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64; 3 Woodd. Lect. 479, 482; Branch, Max. 8; 2 Bla. Com. 330; Gilb. 136; 2 Eden 316; 10 Mod. 3; 15 How. 299; 7 Allen 503; 5 Barb. 277, 282; 65 Minn. 156.

Æquitas supervacua odit. Equity abhors superfluous things. Lofft 282.

Æquum et bonum, est lex legum. What is just and right is the law of laws. Hob. 224.

Æstimatio præteriti delicti ex postremo facto nunquam crescit. The estimation of a crime committed never increases from a subsequent fact. Bacon, Max. Reg. 8; Dig. 50, 17. 139.

Affectio tua nomen imponit operi tuo. Your motive gives a name to your act. Bract. 2 b, 101 b.

Affectus punitur licet non sequatur effectus. The intention is punished although the consequence do not follow. 9 Co. 57 a; See ATTEMPT.

Affinis mei affinis non est mihi affinis. A connection (i. e. by marriage) of my connection is not a connection of mine. Shelf. Marr. & D. 174.

Affirmanti, non neganti, incumbit probatio. The proof lies upon him who affirms, not on him who denies. See Phill. Ev. 498.

Affirmantis est probare. He who affirms must prove. 9 Cush. 535; 42 S. W. Rep. (Ind. Terr.) 282.

Agentes et consentientes pari pœna plectentur. Acting and consenting parties are liable to the same punishment. 5 Co. 80 a.

Aliena negotia exacto officio geruntur. The business of another is to be conducted with particular attention. Jon. Bailm. 83; 79 Pa. 118.

Alienatio licet prohibeatur, consensu tamen omnium in quorum favorem prohibita est, potest fieri, et quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. Although alienation be prohibited, yet, by the consent of all in whose favor it is prohibited, it may take place, for it is in the power of any man to renounce a right introduced for his own benefit. Co. Litt. 98; 9 N. Y. 291.

Alienatio rei præfertur juri accrescendi. Alienation is favored by the law rather than accumulation. Co. Litt. 185 a, 381 a, note; Broom, Max. 442, 458; Wright, Ten. 154; 1 Cruise, Dig. 77; 11 Ves. Jr. 112, 149; 10 L. T. N. S. 662.

Alienation pending a suit is void. 2 P. Wms. 482; 2 Atk. 174; 3 id. 392; 11 Ves. 194; 1 Johns. Ch. 566, 580. See LIS PENDENS.

Aliquid conceditur ne injuria remaneat impunita, quod alias non concederetur. Something is conceded lest a wrong should remain unpunished which otherwise would not be conceded. Co. Litt. 197.

Aliquis non debet esse judex in propria causa, quia non potest esse judex et pars. A person ought not to be judge in his own cause, because he cannot act both as judge and party. Co. Litt. 141 a; Broom, Max. 117; Littleton § 212; 18 Q. B. 327; 17 id. 1; 15 C. B. 769; 1 C. B. N. S. 339. See JUDGE; INCOMPETENCY.

Aliud est celare, aliud tacere. To conceal is one thing, to be silent another. 3 Burr. 1910. See 2 Wheat. 176; 9 id. 631; 3 Bingh. 77; 4 Taunt. 851; 2 C. & P. 341; 18 Pick. 430; 22 id. 53; 12 Cush. 495; Broom, Max. 788; [1895] 2 Ch. 205.

Aliud est distinctio, aliud separatio. Distinction is one thing, separation another. Bacon's arg. Case of Postnati of Scotland, Works iv. 351.

Aliud est possidere, aliud esse in possessione. It is one thing to possess, it is another to be in possession. Hob. 163; Bract. 206.

Aliud est vendere, aliud vendenti consentire. To sell is one thing, to give consent to him who sells another. Dig. 50. 17. 160.

Allegans contraria non est audiendus. One making contradictory allegations is not to be heard. Jenk. Cent. 16; Broom, Max. 169, 294; 4 Term 211; 3 Exch. 446, 537, 678; 3 E. & B. 363; 5 C. B. 195, 886; 10 Mass. 163; 70 Pa. 274; 4 Inst. 279; 19 R. I. 510.

Allegans suam turpitudinem non est audiendus. One alleging his own infamy is not to be heard. 4 Inst. 279; 2 Johns. Ch. 339; 118 N. Y. 52; 13 Ch. Div. 696.

Allegari non debuit quod probatum non relevat. That ought not to be alleged which, if proved, would not be relevant. 1 Ch. Cas. 45.

Allegatio contra factum non est admittenda. An allegation contrary to a deed is not admissible. See ESTOPPEL.

Alterius circumventio alii non præbet actionem. Dig. 50. 17. 49. A deception practised upon one person does not give a cause of action to another.

Alternativa petitio non est audienda. An alternative petition is not to be heard. 5 Co. 40, a.

Ambigua responsio contra proferentem est accipienda. An ambiguous answer is to be taken against the party who offers it. 10 Co. 59 a.

Ambiguis casibus semper præsumitur pro rege. In doubtful cases the presumption is always in favor of the king.

Ambiguitas contra stipulatorem est. Doubtful words will be construed most strongly against the party using them. See INSURANCE.

Ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur. A latent ambiguity may be supplied by evidence; for an ambiguity which arises out of a fact may be removed by proof of the fact. Bacon, Max. Reg. 23; 8 Bingh. 247. See 1 Pow. Dev. 477; Bart. Max. 39; 2 Kent 557; Broom, Max. 608; 18 Pet. 97; 1 Gray 138; 100 Mass. 60; 8 Johns. 90; 3 Halst. 71. Said to be "an unprofitable subtlety; "inadequate and uninstructive." Prof. J. B. Thayer in 6 Harv. L. Rev. 417. See LATENT AMBIGUITY.

Ambiguitas verborum patens nulla verificatione excluditur. A patent ambiguity is never holpen by averment. Lofft 249; Bacon, Max. 25; 21 Wend. 651; 23 id. 71; 1 Mas. 11; 1 Tex. 377. See PATENT AMBIGUITY.

Ambiguum placitum interpretari debet contra proferentem. An ambiguous plea ought to be interpreted against the party pleading it. Co. Litt. 303 b; Broom, Max. 601; Bacon, Max. Reg. 8; 2 H. Bla. 531; 2 M. & W. 444.

Ambulatoria est voluntas defuncti usque ad vitæ supremum exitum. A will is ambulatory until the last moment of life. Broom, Max. 508; 2 Bla. Com. 502; Co. Litt. 322 b; 3 E. & B. 572; 1 M. & K. 485.

Anglicæ jura in omni casu libertati dant favorem. The laws of England are favorable in every case to liberty. Halkers, Max. 12.

Animus ad se omne jus ducit. It is to the intention that all law applies.

Animus hominis est anima scripti. The intention of the party is the soul of the instrument. 3 Bulstr. 67; Pitman, Princ. & Sur. 26.

Anniculus trecentesimo sexagesimo-quinto die dicitur, incipiente plane non exacto die, quia annum civiliter non ad momenta temporum sed ad dies numeramus. We call a child a year old on the three hundred and sixty-fifth day, when the day is fairly begun but not ended, because we calculate the civil year not by moments, but by days. Dig. 50. 16. 134; id. 139; Calvinus, Lex. See AGE.

Annua nec debitum judex non separat ipse. Even the judge apportions not annuities or debt. 8 Co. 52. See Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 480, 517; 1 Salk. 36, 65.

Annus est mora motus quo suum planeta pervolvat circulum. A year is the duration of the motion by which a planet revolves through its orbit. Dig. 40. 7. 4. 5; Calvinus, Lex.; Bract. 359 b.

Annus inceptus pro completo habetur. A year begun is held as completed. Said to be of very limited application. Trayner, Max. 45.

Apices juris non sunt jura. Legal niceties are not laws. Co. Litt. 304; 3 Scott 773; 10 Co. 126; Broom, Max. 188. See APEX JURIS.

Applicatio est vita regulæ. The appilcation is the life of a rule. 2 Bulstr. 79.

Aqua cedit solo. The grant of the soil carries the water. Hale, de Jur. Mar. pt. 1, c. 1.

Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat. Water runs and ought to run as it was wont to run. 3 Rawle 84, 88; Bart. Max. 315; 26 Pa. 413; 3 Kent 439; Ang. Wat. Cour. 413; Gale & W. Easem. 182; 20 Nev. 269; 39 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 905.

Arbitrimentum æquum tribuit cuique suum. A just arbitration renders to every one his own. Noy, Max. 248.

Arbitrium est judicium. An award is a judgment. Jenk. Cent. 137; 3 Bulstr. 64.

Arbor, dum crescit; lignum, dum crescere nescit. A tree while it is growing; wood when it cannot grow. Cro. Jac. 166; 12 Johns. 239, 241; 21 Wall. 64.

Argumentum a divisione est fortissimum in jure. An argument based on a subdivision of the subject is most powerful in law. 6 Co. 60 a; Co. Litt. 213 b; 69 Vt. 292.

Argumentum a majori ad minus negative non valet; valet e converso. An argument from the greater to the less is of no force negatively; conversely it is. Jenk. Cent. 281.

Argumentum a simili valet in lege. An argument drawn from a similar case, or analogy, avails in law. Co. Litt. 191.

Argumentum ab auctoritate est fortissimum in lege. An argument drawn from authority is the strongest in law. Co. Litt. 254.

Argumentum ab impossibili plurimum valet in lege. An argument deduced from impossibility greatly avails in law. Co. Litt. 92.

Argumentum ab inconvenienti est validum in lege; quia lex non permittit aliquod inconveniens. An argument drawn from what is inconvenient is good in law, because the law will not permit any inconvenience. Co. Litt. 66 a, 258; 7 Taunt. 527; 3 B. & C. 131; 6 Cl. & F. 671. See Brown, Max. 184; Cooley, Const. Lim. 82–86.

Arma in armatos sumere jura sinunt. The laws permit the taking arms against the armed. 2 Inst. 574.

Assignatus utitur jure auctoris. An assignee is clothed with the rights of his principal. Halkers. Max. 14; Broom, Max. 465, 477; Wing. Max. 56; 1 Exch. 32; 18 Q. B. 878; Perkins § 100.

Auctoritates philosophorum, medicorum et poetarum sunt in causis allegandæ et tenendæ. The opinions of philosophers, physicians, and poets are to be alleged and received in causes. Co. Litt. 264.

Aucupia verborum sunt judice indigna. Catching at words is unworthy of a judge. Hob. 343.

Audi alteram partem. Hear the other side (or no man should be condemned unheard). Broom, Max. 113; 46 N. Y. 119; 1 Cush. 243; 96 Mo. 478.

Authority to execute a deed must be given by deed. Comyn, Dig. Attorney (C 5); 4 Term 313; 7 id. 207; 1 Holt 141; 9 Wend. 68, 75; 5 Mass. 11; 5 Binn. 613.

Baratriam committit qui propter pecuniam justitiam baractat. He is guilty of barratry who for money sells justice. Bell, Dict. (Barratry at common law has a different signification. See BARRATRY.)

Bastardus non potest habere hæredem nisi de corpore suo legitime procreatum. A bastard can have no heir unless it be one lawfully begotten of his own body. Trayner, Max. 51.

Bello parta cedunt reipublicæ. Things acquired in war go to the state. Cited 2 Russ. & M. 56; 1 Kent 101; 5 C. Rob. 155, 163; 1 Gall. 558.

Benedicta est expositio quando res redimitur a destructione. Blessed is the exposition when the thing is saved from destruction. 4 Co. 26 b.

Benigne faciendæ sunt interpretationes chartarum, ut res magis valeat quam pereat; et quælibet concessio fortissime contra donatorem interpretanda est. Liberal interpretations are to be made of deeds, so that more may stand than fall; and every grant is to be taken most strongly against the grantor. 4 Mass. 134; 1 Sandf. Ch. 258, 268; compare id. 275, 277; 78 Pa. 219.

Benigne faciendæ sunt interpretationes propter simplicitatem laicorum, ut res magis valeat quam pereat; et verba intentioni, non e contra, debent inservire. Construction should be liberal on account of the ignorance of the laity, so that the subject-matter may avail rather than perish; and words must be subject to the intention, not the intention to the words. Co. Litt. 36 a; Broom, Max. 540, 565, 645; 11 Q. B. 852, 856, 868, 870; 4 H. L. Cas. 556; 2 Bla. Com. 379; 1 Bulstr. 175; 1 Whart. 315.

Benignior sententia in verbis generalibus seu dubiis est preferanda. The more favorable construction is to be placed on general or doubtful expressions. 4 Co. 15; Dig. 50. 17. 192. 1; 2 Kent 557.

Benignius leges interpretandæ sunt quo voluntas earum conservetur. Laws are to be more favorably interpreted, that their intent may be preserved. Dig. 1. 3. 16.

Between equal equities the law must prevail. See EQUITY. This is hardly of general application.

Bis dat qui cito dat. He pays twice who pays promptly.

Bis idem exigi bona fides non patitur, et in satisfactionibus non permittitur amplius fieri quam semel factum est. Good faith does not suffer the same thing to be exacted twice; and in making satisfaction, it is not permitted that more should be done after satisfaction is once made. 9 Co. 53; Dig. 50. 17. 57.

Bona fide possessor facit fructus consumptos suos. By good faith a possessor makes the fruits consumed his own. Trayner, Max. 57.

Bona fides exigit ut quod convenit fiat. Good faith demands that what is agreed upon shall be done. Dig. 19. 20. 21; id. 19. 1. 50; id. 50. 8. 2. 13.

Bona fides non patitur ut bis idem exigatur. Good faith does not allow us to demand twice the payment of the same thing. Dig. 50. 17. 57; Broom, Max. 338, n.; 4 Johns. Ch. 143.

Bonæ fidei possessor in id tantum quod ad se pervenerit tenetur. A bona fide possessor is bound for that only which has come to him. 2 Inst. 285; Gro. de J. B. lib. 2, c. 10, § 3 et seq.

Boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem (or justitiam). See 1 Burr. 304. It is the part of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction; that is, his remedial authority. Broom, Max. 79, 80, 82; Chanc. Prec. 339; 1 Wils. 284; 9 M. & W. 818; 1 C. B. N. S. 255; 4 Bingh. N. C. 233; 4 Scott N. R. 239; 17 Mass. 310.

Boni judicis est causas litium dirimere. It is the duty of a good judge to remove causes of litigation. 2 Inst. 306.

Boni judicis est judicium sine dilatione mandare executioni. It is the duty of a good judge to cause execution to issue on a judgment without delay. Co. Litt. 289 b.

Boni judicis est lites dirimere, ne lis ex lite oritur, et interest reipublicæ ut sint fines litium. It is the duty of a good judge to prevent litigations, that suit may not grow out of suit, and it concerns the welfare of a state that an end be put to litigation. 4 Co. 15 b; 5 id. 31 a; Bart. Max. 191.

Bonum necessarium extra terminos necessitatis non est bonum. A thing good from necessity is not good beyond the limits of the necessity. Hob. 144.

Bonus judex secundum æquum et bonum judicat, et æquitatem stricto juri præfert. A good judge decides according to justice and right, and prefers equity to strict law. Co. Litt. 24; 4 Term 344; 2 Q. B. 837; Broom, Max. 80.

Both law and equity favor the diligent creditor. 12 Tex. Civ. App. 136.

Breve judiciale debet sequi suum originale, et accessorium suum principale. A judicial writ ought to follow its original, and an accessory its principal. Jenk. Cent. 292.

Breve judiciale non cadit pro defectu formæ. A judicial writ fails not through defect of form. Jenk. Cent. 43.

By an acquittance for the last payment all other arrearages are discharged. Noy 40.

Carcer ad homines custodiendos, non ad puniendos, dari debet. A prison ought to be used for the custody, not the punishment, of persons. Co. Litt. 260. See Dig. 48. 19. 8. 9.

Casus fortuitus non est sperandus, et nemo tenetur divinare. A fortuitous event is not to be foreseen, and no person is held bound to divine it. 4 Co. 66.

Casus fortuitus non est supponendus. A fortuitous event is not to be presumed. Hardr. 82, arg.

Casus omissus et oblivioni datus dispositioni communis juris relinquitur. A case omitted and forgotten is left to the disposal of the common law. 5 Co. 37; Broom, Max. 46; 1 Exch. 476.

Casus omissus pro omisso habendus est. A case omitted is to be held as (intentionally) omitted. Trayner, Max. 67.

Catalla juste possessa amitti non possunt. Chattels rightly possessed cannot be lost. Jenk. Cent. 28.

Catalla reputantur inter minima in lege. Chattels are considered in law among the minor things. Jenk. Cent. 52.

Causa causæ est causa causati. The cause of a cause is the cause of the effect. Freem. 329; 12 Mod. 639.

Causa causantis causa est causati. The cause of the thing causing is the cause of the effect. 4 Campb. 284; 4 Gray 398.

Causa et origo est materia negotii. Cause and origin is the material of business. 1 Co. 99; Wing. Max. 41, Max. 21.

Causa proxima non remota spectatur. The immediate and not the remote cause is to be considered. Bacon, Max. Reg. 1; Broom, Max. 216; Story, Bailm. 515; 3 Kent 374; 2 East 348; 10 Wall. 191; 5 Dak. 444; L. R. 1 C. P. 290; 4 Am. L. Rev. 201; 44 U. S. App. 1; 69 Fed. Rep. 559. See CAUSA PROXIMA.

Causa vaga et incerta non est causa rationabilis. A vague and uncertain cause is not a reasonable cause. 5 Co. 57.

Causæ dotis, vitæ, libertatis, fisci sunt inter favorabilia in lege. Causes of dower, life, liberty, revenue, are among the things favored in law. Co. Litt. 341.

Causæ ecclesiæ publicis causis æquiparantur. The cause of the church is equal to public cause. Co. Litt. 341.

Caveat emptor. Let the purchaser beware. 110 U. S. 116; 70 Fed. Rep. 146; 15 Ind. App. 395; 47 U. S. App. 734; 114 Ala. 74; 21 Misc. Rep. 86; id. 88. See CAVEAT EMPTOR.

Caveat emptor; qui ignorare non debuit quod jus alienum emit. Let a purchaser beware; for he ought not to be ignorant of what they are when he buys the rights of another. Hob. 99; Broom, Max. 768; Co. Litt. 183 a; 3 Taunt. 439; Sugd. V. & P. 328; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. ch. 6. See CAVEAT EMPTOR.

Citatio est de jure naturali. A summons is by natural right. Cases in Banco Regis Will. III. 453.

Citationes non concedantur priusquam exprimatur super qua re fieri debet citatio. Citations should not be granted before it is stated about what matter the citation is to be made. (A maxim of ecclesiastical law.) 12 Co. 44.

Clausula generalis de residuo non ea complectitur quæ non ejusdem sint generis cum iis quæ speciatim dicta fuerant. A general clause of remainder does not embrace those things which are not of the same kind with those which had been specially mentioned. Lofft 419.

Clausula generalis non refertur ad expressa. A general clause does not refer to things expressed. 8 Co. 154.

Clausula quæ abrogationem excludit ab initio non valet. A clause in a law which precludes its abrogation is invalid from the beginning. Bacon, Max. Reg. 19, p. 89; 2 Dwarris Stat. 673; Broom, Max. 27.

Clausula vel dispositio inutilis per præsumptionem remotam vel causam, ex post facto non fulcitur. A useless clause or disposition is not supported by a remote presumption, or by a cause arising afterwards. Bacon, Max. Reg. 21; Broom, Max. 672.

Clausulæ inconsuetæ semper inducunt suspicionem. Unusual clauses always excite suspicion. 3 Co. 81; Broom, Max. 290; 1 Sm. L. Cas. 1.

Cogitationis pœnam nemo meretur. No one is punished for his thoughts.

Cogitationis pœnam nemo patitur. No one is punished for his thoughts. Broom, Max. 311.

Cohæredes una persona censentur, propter unitatem juris quod habent. Coheirs are deemed as one person, on account of the unity of right which they possess. Co. Litt. 163.

Commercium jure gentium commune esse debet, et non in monopolium et privatum paucorum quæstum convertendum. Commerce, by the law of nations, ought to be common, and not to be converted into a monopoly and the private gain of a few. 3 Inst. 181, in marg.

Commodum ex injuria sua non habere debet. A man ought not to derive any benefit from his own wrong. Jenk. Cent. 161; Finch, Law, b. 1, c. 3, n. 62.

Common opinion is good authority in law. Co. Litt. 186 a; 3 Barb. Ch. 528, 577.

Communis error facit jus. A common error makes law. (What was at first illegal, being repeated many times, is presumed to have acquired the force of usage; and then it would be wrong to depart from it.) Broom, Max. 139, 140; 1 Ld. Raym. 42; 6 Cl. & F. 172; 3 M. & S. 396; 4 N. H. 456; 2 Mass. 357; 1 Dall. 13; 49 S. C. 505. The converse of this maxim is communis error non facit jus. A common error does not make law. 4 Inst. 242; 3 Term 735; 6 id. 564.

Comvendia sunt dispendia. Abridgments are hindrances. Co. Litt. 305.

Compromissarii sunt judices. Arbitrators are judges. Jenk. Cent. 128.

Concessio per regem fieri debet de certitudine. A grant by the king ought to be a grant of a certainty. 9 Coke 46.

Concessio versus concedentem latam interpretationem habere debet. A grant ought to have a liberal interpretation against the grantor. Jenk. Cent. 279.

Concordare leges legibus est optimus interpretandi modus. To make laws agree with laws is the best mode of interpreting them. Halkers 70.

Conditio beneficialis, quæ statum construit, benigne secundum verborum intentionem est interpretanda; odiosa autem, quæ statum destruit, stricte, secundum verborum proprietatem, accipienda. A beneficial condition, which creates an estate, ought to be construed favorably according to the intention of the words; but an odious condition, which destroys an estate, ought to be received strictly, according to the letter of the words. 8 Co. 90; Shep. Touch. 134.

Conditio dicitur, cum quid in casum incertum qui potest tendere ad esse aut non esse, confertur. It is called a condition when something is given on an uncertain event, which may or may not come into existence. Co. Litt. 201.

Conditio illicita habetur pro non adjecta. An unlawful condition is deemed as not annexed.

Conditio præcedens adimpleri debet priusquam sequatur effectus. A condition precedent must be fulfilled before the effect can follow. Co. Litt. 201.

Conditiones quælibet odiosæ; maxime autem contra matrimonium et commercium. Any conditions are odious, but especially those against matrimony and commerce. Lofft 644.

Confessio facta in judicio omni probatione major est. A confession made in court is of greater effect than any proof. Jenk. Cent. 102.

Confessus in judicio pro judicato habetur et quodammodo sua sententia damnatur. A person who has confessed in court is deemed as having had judgment passed upon him, and, in a manner, is condemned by his own sentence. 11 Co. 30. See Dig. 42. 2. 1.

Confirmare est id quod prius infirmum fuit simul firmare. To confirm is to make firm what was before infirm. Co. Litt. 295.

Confirmare nemo potest priusquam jus ei acciderit. No one can confirm before the right accrues to him. 10 Co. 48.

Confirmatio est nulla, ubi donum præcedens est invalidum. A confirmation is null where the preceding gift is invalid. Co. Litt. 295; F. Moore 764.

Confirmatio omnes supplet defectus, licet id quod actum est ab initio non valuit. Confirmation supplies all defects, though that which has been done was not valid at the beginning. Co. Litt. 295 b.

Confirmat usum qui tollit abusum. He confirms a use who removes an abuse. F. Moore 764.

Conjunctio mariti et feminæ est de jure naturæ. The union of husband and wife is according to the law of nature.

Consensus facit legem. Consent makes the law. (A contract is law between the parties agreeing to be bound by it.) Branch, Princ.; 8 Mont. 32.

Consensus non concubitus facit matrimonium. Consent, not coition, constitutes marriage. Co. Litt. 33 a; Dig. 50. 17. 30. See 10 Cl. & F. 534; Broom, Max. 505; 75 Cal. 1.

Consensus tollit errorem. Consent removes or obviates a mistake. Co. Litt. 126; 2 Inst. 123; Broom, Max. 135; 1 Bingh. N. C. 68; 6 E. & B. 338; 5 Cush. 55; 9 Gray 386; 11 Allen 138; 7 Johns. 611; 4 Pa. 335; 65 id. 190; 83 Ala. 230.

Consensus voluntas multorum ad quos res pertinet simul juncta. Consent is the united will of several interested in one subject-matter. Dav. 48; Branch, Princ.

Consentientes et agentes pari pœna plectentur. Those consenting and those perpetrating shall receive the same punishment. 5 Co. 80.

Consentire matrimonio non possunt infra annos nubiles. Persons cannot consent to marriage before marriageable years. 5 Co. 60; 6 id. 22.

Consilia multorum requiruntur in magnis. The advice of many persons is requisite in great affairs. 4 Inst. 1.

Constitutum esse eam domum unicuique nostrum debere existimari, ubi quisque sedes et tabulas haberet, quarumque rerum constitutionem fecisset. It is settled that that is to be considered the home of each one of us where he may have his habitation and account-books, and where he may have made an establishment of his business. Dig. 50. 16. 203.

Constructio legis non facit injuriam. The construction of law does not work an injury. Co. Litt. 183; Broom, Max. 603.

Consuetudo contra rationem introducta, potius usurpatio quam consuetudo appellari debet. A custom introduced against reason ought rather to be called an usurpation than a custom. Co. Litt. 113; Bart. Max. 109.

Consuetudo debet esse certa. A custom ought to be certain. Dav. 33.

Consuetudo est altera lex. Custom is another law. 4 Co. 21.

Consuetudo est optimus interpres legum. Custom is the best expounder of the law. 2 Inst. 18; Dig. 1. 3. 37; Jenk. Cent. 273.

Consuetudo debet esse certa, nam incerta pro nullis habetur. Custom ought to be fixed, for if variable it is held as of no account. Trayner, Max. 96.

Consuetudo et communis assuetudo vincit legem non scriptam, si sit specialis; et interpretatur legem scriptam, si lex sit generalis. Custom and common usage overcome the unwritten law, if it be special; and interpret the written law if the law be general. Jenk. Cent. 273.

Consuetudo ex certa causa rationabili usitata privat communem legem. Custom observed by reason of a certain and reasonable cause supersedes the common law. Littleton § 169; Co. Litt. 33 b. See 5 Bingh. 293; Broom, Max. 919.

Consuetudo, licet sit magnæ auctoritatis, nunquam tamen præjudicat manifestæ veritati. A custom, though it be of great authority, shoul never, however, be prejudicial to manifest truth. 4 Co. 18.

Consuetudo loci observanda est. The custom of the place is to be observed. Broom, Max. 918; 4 Co. 26 b; 6 id. 67; 10 id. 139; 4 C. B. 48.

Consuetudo neque injuria oriri, neque tolli potest. A custom can neither arise, nor be abolished, by a wrong. Lofft 340.

Consuetudo non habitur in consequentiam. Custom is not to be drawn into a precedent. 3 Keble 499.

Consuetudo præscripta et legitima vincit legem. A prescriptive and legitimate custom overcomes the law. Co. Litt. 113.

Consuetudo regni Angliæ est lex Angliæ. The custom of the kingdom of England is the law of England. Jenk. Cent. 119.

Consuetudo semel reprobata non potest amplius induci. Custom once disallowed cannot again be produced. Dav. 33; Grounds & Rud. of Law 58.

Consuetudo vincit communem legem. Custom overrules common law. 1 Rop. H. & W. 351; Co. Litt. 33 b.

Consuetudo volentes ducit, lex nolentes trahit. Custom leads the willing, law drags the unwilling. Jenk. Cent. 274.

Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. A contemporaneous exposition is the best and most powerful in the law. 2 Inst. 11; 3 Co. 7; Broom, Max. 682; 116 Ind. 300.

Contestatio litis eget terminos contradictarios. An issue requires terms of contradiction (that is, there can be no issue without an affirmative on one side and a negative on the other). Jenk. Cent. 117.

Contra legem facit qui id facit quod lex prohibit; in fraudem vero qui, salvis verbis legis, sententiam ejus circumvenit. He does contrary to the law who does what the law prohibits; but he acts in fraud of the law who, the letter of the law being inviolate, uses the law contrary to its intention. Dig. 1. 3. 29.

Contra negantem principia non est disputandum. There is no disputing against one who denies principles. Co. Litt. 43; Grounds & Rud. of Law 57.

Contra non valentem agere nulla currit præscriptio. No prescription runs against a person unable to act. Broom, Max. 903; Evans, Pothier 451.

Contra veritatem lex nunquam aliquid permittit. The law never suffers anything contrary to truth. 2 Inst. 252. (But sometimes it allows a conclusive presumption in opposition to truth.)

Contractus ex turpi causa, vel contra bonos mores nullus est. A contract founded on an unlawful consideration or against good morals is null. Hob. 167; Dig. 2. 14. 27. 4.

Contractus legem ex conventione accipiunt. The agreement of the parties makes the law of the contract. Dig. 16. 3. 1. 6.

Contrariorum contraria est ratio. The reason of contrary things is contrary. Hob. 344.

Contrectatio rei alienæ animo furandi, est furtum. The touching or removing of another's property, with an intention of stealing, is theft. Jenk. Cent. 132.

Conventio privatorum non potest publico juri derogare. An agreement of private persons cannot derogate from public right. Wing. Max. 201; Co. Litt. 166 a; Dig. 50. 17. 45. 1.

Conventio vincit legem. The agreement of the parties overcomes the law. Story, Ag. § 368; 6 Taunt. 430; 52 Pa. 96; 18 Pick. 19, 278; 8 Cush. 156; 14 Gray 446. See Dig. 16. 3. 1. 6.

Copulatio verborum indicat acceptationem in eodem sensu. Coupling words together shows that they ought to be understood in the same sense. Bacon, Max. Reg. 3; Broom, Max. 588; 8 Allen 85; 11 id. 470.

Corporalis injuria non recipit æstimationem de futuro. A personal injury does not receive satisfaction from a future course of proceeding. Bacon, Max. Reg. 6; 3 How. St. Tr. 71; Broom, Max. 278.

Corpus humanum non recipit æstimationem. A human body is not susceptible of appraisement. Hob. 59.

Creditorum appellatione non hi tantum accipiuntur qui pecuniam crediderunt, sed omnes quibus ex qualibet causa debetur. Under the head of creditors are included not alone those who have lent money, but all to whom from any cause a debt is owing. Dig. 50. 16. 11.

Crescente malitia crescere debet et pœna. The evil intent increasing, punishment ought also to increase. 2 Inst. 479, n.

Crimen falsi dicitur, cum quis illicitus, cui non fuerit ad hæc data auctoritas, de sigillo regis rapto vel invento brevia cartasve consignaverit. The crimen falsi is when any one illicitly, to whom power has not been given for such purposes, has signed writs or grants with the king's seal, which he has either stolen or found. Fleta, l. 1. c. 23.

Crimen læsæ majestatis omnia alia crimina excedit quoad pœnam. The crime of treason exceeds all other crimes as far as its punishment is concerned. 3 Inst. 210; Bart. Max. 108.

Crimen omnia ex se nata vitiat. Crime vitiates everything which springs from it. 5 Hill 523.

Crimen trahit personam. The crime carries the person (i. e. the commission of a crime gives the courts of the place where it is committed jurisdiction over the person of the offender). 3 Denio 190, 210.

Crimina morte extinguuntur. Crimes are extinguished by death.

Cui jurisdictio data est, ea quoque concessa esse videntur sine quibus jurisdictio explicari non potest. To whom jurisdiction is given, to him those things also are held to be granted without which the jurisdiction cannot be exercised. Dig. 2. 1. 2; 1 Woodd. Lect. Introd. lxxi.; 1 Kent 339.

Cui jus est donandi eidem et vendendi et concedendi jus est. He who has a right to give has also a right to sell and to grant. Dig. 50. 17. 163.

Cui licet quod majus non debet quod minus est non licere. He who has authority to the more important act shall not be debarred from doing that of less importance. 4 Coke 23; Co. Litt. 255 b; 2 Inst. 307; Noy, Max. 26; Finch, Law 22; 3 Mod. 322, 323; Broom, Max. 176; Dig. 50. 70. 21.

Cui pater est populus non habet ille patrem. He to whom the people is father has not a father. Co. Litt. 123.

Cuicunque aliquis quid concedit concedere videtur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit. Whoever grants a thing is supposed also tacitly to grant that without which the grant itself would be of no effect. 11 Co. 52; Broom, Max. 479; Hob. 234; Vaugh. 109; 11 Exch. 775; Shep. Touch. 89; Co. Litt. 56 a; Shortt, Ry. Bonds 180; 18 B. Monr. 431.

Cuicunque aliquid conceditur, conceditur etiam et id sine quo res ipsa non esse potuit. Whenever anything is granted, that also is granted without which the thing itself could not exist. 9 Metc. 556.

Cuilibet in arte sua perito est credendum. Credence should be given to one skilled in his peculiar art. Co. Litt. 125; 1 Bla. Com. 75; Phill. Ev. Cowen & H. notes, 759; 1 Hagg. Ecc. 727; 11 Cl. & F. 85; Broom, Max. 932, 934. See EXPERT; OPINION.

Cuique in sua arte credendum est. Every one is to be believed in his own art. 9 Mass. 237.

Cujus est commodum, ejus est onus. He who has the benefit has also the burden. 3 Mass. 53.

Cujus est dare, ejus est disponere. He who has a right to give has the right to dispose of the gift. Wing. Max. 22; Broom, Max. 459; 2 Co. 71; 5 W. & S. 330.

Cujus est divisio, alterius est electio. Whichever of two parties has the division, the other has the choice. Co. Litt. 166.

Cujus est dominium, ejus est periculum. The risk lies upon the owner of the subject. Trayner, Max. 114.

Cujus est instituere, ejus est abrogare. Whose it is to institute, his it is also to abrogate. Sydney, Gov. 15; Broom, Max. 878, n.

Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum. He who owns the soil owns it up to the sky. Broom, Max. 395; Shep. Touch. 90; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 18; 9 Co. 54; 4 Campb. 219; 11 Exch. 832; 6 E. & B. 76; 2 Metc. 467; 3 Gray 79; 10 Allen 109. See LAND.

Cujus juris (i. e. jurisdictionis) est principale, ejusdem juris erit accessorium. He who has jurisdiction of the principal has also of the accessory. 2 Inst. 493; Bract. 481.

Cujus per errorem dati repetitio est, ejus consulto dati donatio est. That which, when given through mistake can be recovered back, when given with knowledge of the facts, is a gift. Dig. 50. 17. 53.

Cujusque rei potissima pars principium est. The principal part of everything is the beginning. Dig. 1. 2. 1; 10 Co. 49.

Culpa caret, qui scit sed prohibere non potest. He is clear of blame who knows but cannot prevent. Dig. 50. 17. 50.

Culpa est immiscere se rei ad se non pertinenti. It is a fault to meddle with what does not belong to or does not concern you. Dig. 50. 17. 36; 2 Inst. 208.

Culpa lata dolo æquiparatur. Gross neglect is equivalent to fraud. Dig. 11. 6. 1.

Culpa tenet suos auctores. A fault binds its own authors. Erskine, Inst. b. 4, tit. 1, § 14; 6 Bell, App. Cas. 539.

Culpæ pœna par esto. Let the punishment be proportioned to the crime. Branch, Princ.

Cum actio fuerit mere criminalis, instituí poterit ab initio criminaliter vel civiliter. When an action is merely criminal, it can be instituted from the beginning either criminally or civilly. Bract. 103.

Cum aliquis renunciaverit societati solvitur societas. When any partner renounces the partnership, the partnership is dissolved. Trayner, Max. 118.

Cum constitente sponte mitius est agendum. One making a voluntary confession is to be dealt with more mercifully. Bart. Max. 68; 4 Inst. 66; Branch, Princ.

Cum de lucro duorum quæritur melior est causa possidentis. When the question of gain lies between two, the cause of the possessor is the better. Dig. 50. 17. 126.

Cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur in testamento, ultimum ratum est. When two things repugnant to each other are found in a will, the last is to be confirmed. Co. Litt. 112; Shep. Touch. 451; Broom, Max. 568; 2 Jarm. Wills, 5th Am. ed. 44; 16 Johns. 146; 1 Phill. 535.

Cum in corpore dissentitur apparet nullam esse acceptionem. When there is a disagreement in the substance, it appears that there is no acceptance. 12 Allen 44.

Cum in testamento ambigue aut etiam perperam scriptum, est benigne interpretari, et secundum id quod credibile est cogitatum credendum est. When an ambiguous or even an erroneous expression occurs in a will, it should be construed liberally, and in accordance with the testator's probable meaning. Dig. 34. 5. 24; Broom, Max. 568; 3 Pothier, ad Pand. 46.

Cum legitimæ nuptiæ factæ sunt, patrem liberi sequuntur. Children born under a legitimate marriage follow the condition of the father.

Cum par delictum est duorum, semper oneratur petitor, et melior habetur possessoris causa. Where two parties are equally in fault, the claimant always is at a disadvantage, and the party in possession has the better cause. Dig. 50. 17. 154; Broom, Max. 720.

Curia parliamenti suis propriis legibus subsistit. The court of parliament is governed by its own peculiar laws. 4 Inst. 50; Broom, Max. 85; 12 C. B. 413.

Distinguenda sunt tempora; aliud est facere, aliud perficere. Times must be distinguished; it is one thing to do a thing, another to complete it. 3 Leon. 243; Branch, Princ. See 1 Co. 16 a; 2 Pick. 327; 14 N. Y. 380, 393.

Distinguenda sunt tempora; distingue tempora, et concordabis leges. Times are to be distinguished; distinguish time, and you will attune laws. 1 Co. 94.

Divinatio non interpretatio est, quæ omnino recedit a litera. It is a guess, not interpretation, which altogether departs from the letter. Bacon, Max. Reg. 3, p. 47.

Dolosus versatur in generalibus. A deceiver deals in generalities. 2 Co. 34; 2 Bulstr. 226; Lofft 782; 1 Rolle 157; Wing. Max. 636; Broom, Max. 289.

Dolum ex indiciis perspicuis probari convenit. Fraud should be proved by clear proofs. Code 2. 21. 6; 1 Story, Contr. § 625.

Dolus auctoris non nocet successori. The fraud of a predecessor does not prejudice the successor.

Dolus circuitu non purgatur. Fraud is not purged by circuity. Bacon, Max. Reg. 1; Noy, Max. 9, 12; Broom, Max. 228; 6 E. & B. 948.

Dolus et fraus nemini patrocinentur (patrocinari debent). Deceit and fraud shall excuse or benefit no man (they themselves need to be excused). Year B. 14 Hen. VIII. 8; Story, Eq. Jur. § 395; 3 Co. 78; 2 Fonblanque, Eq. b. 2, ch. 6, § 3.

Dolus latet in generalibus. Fraud lurks in generalities. Trayner, Max. 162.

Dolus versatur in generalibus. Fraud deals in generalities. Trayner, Max. 162.

Dominium non potest esse in pendenti. The right of property cannot be in abeyance. Halkers. Max. 89.

Domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium. Every man's house is his castle. 5 Co. 91, 92; 90 Ill. 239; Broom, Max. 432; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 481; Foster, Hom. 320; 8 Q. B. 757; 16 id. 546, 556; 19 How. St. Tr. 1030. See ARREST; SELF-DEFENCE; DEFENCE; Dig. 50. 17. 103.

Domus tutissimum cuique refugium atque receptaculum. The habitation of each one is an inviolable asylum for him. Dig. 2. 4, 18.

Dona clandestina sunt semper suspiciosa. Clandestine gifts are always suspicious. 3 Co. 81; Noy, Max., 9th ed. 152; 4 B. & C. 652; 1 M. & S. 253; Broom, Max. 289, 290.

Donari videtur quod nullo jure cogente conceditur. That is considered to be given which is granted when no law compels. Dig. 50. 17. 82.

Donatio non præsumitur. A gift is not presumed. Jenk. Cent. 109.

Donatio perficitur possessione accipientis. A gift is rendered complete by the possession of the receiver. See 2 Johns. 52; 2 Leigh 837; 2 Kent 438.

Donationum alia perfecta, alia incepta et non perfecta; ut si donatio lecta fuit et concessa, ac traditio nondum fuerit subsecuta. Some gifts are perfect, others incipient and not perfect; as if a gift were read and agreed to, but delivery had not then followed. Co. Litt. 56.

Donator nunquam desinit possidere antequam donatarius incipiat possidere. He that gives never ceases to possess until he that receives begins to possess. Dyer 281; Bract. 41 b.

Dormiunt aliquando leges, nunquam moriuntur. The laws sometimes sleep, but never die. 2 Inst. 161.

Dos de dote peti non debet. Dower ought not to be sought from dower. 4 Co. 122; Co. Litt. 31; 4 Dane, Abr. 671; 1 Washb. R. P. 209; 13 Allen 459.

Doti lex favet; præmium pudoris est, ideo parcatur. The law favors dower; it is the reward of chastity, therefore let it be preserved. Co. Litt. 31; Branch, Princ.

Droit ne done pluis que soit demande. The law gives no more than is demanded. 2 Inst. 286.

Droit ne poet pas morier. Right cannot die. Jenk. Cent. 100.

Duas uxores eodem tempore habere non licet. It is not lawful to have two wives at one time. Inst. 1. 10. 6; 1 Bla. Com. 436.

Duo non possunt in solido unam rem possidere. Two cannot possess one thing each in entirety. Co. Litt. 368; 1 Preston, Abstr. 318; 2 id. 86, 326; 2 Dod. 157; 2 Carth. 76; Broom, Max. 465, n.

Duo sunt instrumenta ad omnes res aut confirmandas aut impugnandas, ratio et auctoritas. There are two instruments for confirming or impugning every thing, reason and authority. 8 Co. 16.

Duorum in solidum dominum vel possessio esse non potest. Ownership or possession in entirety cannot be in two persons of the same thing. Dig. 13. 6. 5. 15; 1 Mackeldey, Civ. Law 245, § 236; Brac. 28 b.

Duplicationem possibilitatis lex non patitur. The law does not allow a duplication of possibility. 1 Rolle 321.

Ea est accipienda interpretatio, quæ vitio caret. That interpretation is to be received which is free from fault. Bacon, Max. Reg 3, b. 47.

Ea quæ commendandi causa in venditionibus dicuntur, si palam appareant venditorem non obligant. Those things which, by way of commendation, are stated at sales, if they are openly apparent, do not bind the seller. Dig. 18. 43. n.; Broom, Max. 783.

Ea quæ dari impossibilia sunt, vel quæ in rerum natura non sunt, pro non adjectis habentur. Those things which cannot be given, or which are not in existence, are held as not expressed. Dig. 50. 17. 135.

Ea quæ in curia nostra rite acta sunt, debitæ executioni demandari debent. Whatever is properly done in a court should be reduced to a judgment. Co. Litt. 289 b.

Ea quæ raro accidunt, non temere in agendis negotiis computantur. Those things which rarely happen are not to be taken into account in the transaction of business without sufficient reason. Dig. 50. 17. 64.

Eadem est ratio, eadem est lex. The same reason, the same law. 7 Pick. 493.

Eadem mens præsumitur regis quæ est juris et quæ esse debet, præsertim in dubiis. The mind of the sovereign is presumed to be coincident with that of the law, and with that which ought to be, especially in ambiguous matters. Hob. 154; Broom, Max. 54.

Ecclesia ecclesiæ decimas solvere non debet. It is not the duty of the church to pay tithes to the church. Cro. Eliz. 479.

Ecclesiæ magis favendum est quam personæ. The church is more to be favored than an individual. Godb. 173.

Effectus sequitur causam. The effect follows the cause. Wing. Max. 226.

Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit, non qui negat. The burden of the proof lies upon him who affirms, not him who denies. Dig. 22. 3. 2; 1 Phill. Ev. 194; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 74; 3 La. 53; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 408.

Ei nihil turpe cui nihil satis. Nothing is base to whom nothing is sufficient. 4 Inst. 53.

Ejus est interpretari cujus est condere. It belongs to him to interpret who enacts. Trayner, Max. 174.

Ejus est non nolle qui potest velle. He may consent tacitly who may consent expressly. Dig. 50. 17. 3.

Ejus est periculum cujus est dominium aut com

modum. He has the risk who has the right of property or advantage. Bart. Max. 33.

Ejus nulla culpa est cui parere necesse sit. No guilt attaches to him who is compelled to obey. Dig. 50. 17. 169; Broom, Max. 12, n.

Electa una via, non datur recursus ad alteram. He who has chosen one way cannot have recourse to another. 10 Toull. n. 170.

Electio est intima [interna], libera, et spontanea separatio unius rei ab alia, sine compulsione, consistens in animo et voluntate. Election is an internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, without compulsion, consisting in intention and will. Dyer 281.

Electio semel facta, et placitum testatum, non patitur regressum. An election once made, and the intent shown, cannot be recalled. Co. Litt. 146. See ELECTION.

Electiones fiant rite et libere sine interruptione aliqua. Election should be made in due form and freely, without any interruption. 2 Inst. 169.

Emptor emit quam minimo potest; venditor vendit quam maximo potest. The buyer buys for as little as possible; the vender sells for as much as possible. 2 Johns. Ch. 256.

En eschange il covient que les estates soient égales. In an exchange it is necessary that the estates be equal. Co. Litt. 50; 2 Hill. R. P. 298.

Enumeratio infirmat regulam in casibus non enumeratis. Enumeration disaffirms the rule in cases not enumerated. Bacon, Aph. 17.

Enumeratio unius est exclusio alterius. Specification of one thing is an exclusion of the rest. 4 Johns. Ch. 106, 113.

Eodem modo quo oritur, eodem modo dissolvitur. It is discharged in the same way in which it arises. Bacon, Abr. Release; Cro. Eliz. 697; 2 Wms. Saund. 48, n. 1; 11 Wend. 23; 5 Watts 155.

Eodem modo quo quid constituitur, eodem modo destruitur. In the same way in which anything is constituted, in that way is it destroyed. 6 Co. 53.

Equality is equity. Francis, Max., Max. 3; 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3726; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64; 165 U. S. 394; 49 Neb. 353; 18 Misc. Rep. 663. See EQUITY.

Equitas sequitur legem. Equity follows the law. 5 Barb. 277, 282. Cas. temp. Talb. 53; 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 64; 17 App. Div. N. Y. 152. Of this maxim it has been said: "Operative only within a very narrow range." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 427. The reverse is quite as sound a maxim; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 18. "The main business of equity is avowedly to correct and supplement the law." Phelps, Jurid. Eq. § 237. The Judicature Act, 1873, provides that when law and equity conflict equity shall prevail.

Equity delights to do justice, and that not by halves. 5 Barb. 277, 280; Story, Eq. Pl. § 72.

Equity follows the law. See Equitas sequitur legem, supra.

Equity looks upon that as done, which ought to be done. 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3729; 1 Fonblanque, Eq. b. 1, ch. 6, s. 9, note; 3 Wheat. 563; 23 Col. 174; 46 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 673; 95 Wis. 456; 48 S. C. 282.

Equity suffers not a right without a remedy. 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3726.

Equity will not require that to be done which if done would be useless. 67 Ill. App. 31.

Error fucatus nuda veritate in multis est probabilior; et sæpenumero rationibus vincit veritatem error. Error artfully colored is in many things more probable than naked truth; and frequently error conquers truth by argumentation. 2 Co. 75.

Error juris nocet. Error of law is injurious. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 139, n.

Error nominis nunquam nocet, si de identitate rei constat. Mistake in the name never injures, if there is no doubt as to the identity of the thing. 1 Duer, Ins. 171.

Error qui non resistitur approbatur. An error not resisted is approved. Doct. & St. c. 70.

Error scribentis nocere non debet. An error made by a clerk ought not to injure. 1 Jenk. Cent. 294.

Errores ad sua principia referre, est refellere. To refer errors to their origin is to refute them. 3 Inst. 15.

Erubescit lex filios castigare parentes. The law blushes when children correct their parents. 8 Co. 116.

Est autem jus publicum et privatum, quod ex naturalibus præceptis aut gentium, aut civilibus est collectum; et quod in jure scripto jus appellatur, id in lege Anglicæ rectum esse dicitur. Public and private law is that which is collected from natural precepts, on the one hand of nations, on the other of citizens; and that which in the civil law is called jus, in the law of England is said to be right. Co. Litt. 558.

Est boni judicis ampliare jurisdictionem. It is the part of a good judge to extend the jurisdiction. Gilb. 14.

Estoveria sunt ardendi, arandi, construendi, et claudendi. Estovers are for burning, ploughing, building, and inclosing. 13 Co. 68.

Eum qui nocentem infamat, non est æquum et bonum ob eam rem condemnari; delicta enim nocentium nota esse oportet et expedit. It is not just and proper that he who speaks ill of a bad man should be condemned on that account; for it is fitting and expedient that the crimes of bad men should be known. Dig. 47. 10. 17; 1 Bla. Com. 125.

Eventus varios res nova semper habet. A new matter always produces various events. Co. Litt. 379.

Every man is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his own voluntary acts. 1 Greenl. Evid. § 18; 9 East 277; 9 B. & C. 643; 3 Maule & S. 11; Webb, Poll. Torts 35.

Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio. The best interpretation is made from antecedents and consequents. 2 Pars. Contr. 12, n. (r); Broom, Max. 577; 2d Inst. 317; 2 Bla. Com. 379; 1 Bulstr. 101; 15 East 541.

Ex diuturnitate temporis omnia præsumuntur solenniter esse acta. From length of time, all things are presumed to have been done in due form. Co. Litt. 6; Broom, Max. 942; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 20; Best, Ev. § 43; 84 Cal. 126.

Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. A right of action cannot arise out of fraud. Broom, Max. 297, 729; Cowp. 343; 2 C. B. 501; 5 Scott N. R. 558; 10 Mass. 276; 107 id. 440; 38 Fed. Rep. 800. See VOID; CONTRACT; VOIDABLE.

Ex facto jus oritur. The law arises out of the fact. 2 Inst. 479; 2 Bla. Com. 329; Broom, Max. 102.

Ex frequenti delicto augetur pœna. Punishment increases with increasing crime. 2 Inst. 479.

Ex maleficio non oritur contractus. A contract cannot arise out of an illegal act. Broom, Max. 734; 1 Term 734; 3 id. 422; 1 H. Bla. 324; 5 E. & B. 999, 1015.

Ex malis moribus bonæ leges natæ sunt. Good laws arise from evil manners. 2 Inst. 161.

Ex multitudine signorum, colligitur identitas vera. From the great number of signs true identity is ascertained. Bacon, Max. Reg. 25; Broom, Max. 638.

Ex nihilo nihil fit. From nothing nothing comes. 13 Wend. 178, 221; 18 id. 257, 301.

Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio. No action arises on a contract without a consideration. Noy, Max. 24; Broom, Max. 745; 3 Burr. 1670; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 445; Chitty, Contr., 11th Am. ed. 24; 1 Story, Contr. § 525. See NUDUM PACTUM. In Paulus, Sent. II. 14. 1, it is ex nudo pacto inter cives Romanos actio non nascitur.

Ex pacto illicito non oritur actio. From an illicit contract no action arises. Broom, Max. 742; 7 Cl. & F. 729.

Ex procedentibus et consequentibus optima fit interpretatio. The best interpretation is made from things proceeding and following (i. e. the context). 1 Rolle 375.

Ex tota materia emergat resolutio. The construction or explanation should arise out of the whole subject-matter. Wing. Max. 288.

Ex turpi causa non oritur actio. No action arises out of an immoral consideration. Broom, Max. 730; Selw. N. P. 63; 2 Pet. 539; 118 Mass. 299; 83 Ala. 142; 38 Fed. Rep. 800; 58 N. J. L. 627.

Ex turpi contractu non oritur actio. No action arises on an immoral contract. Dig. 2 14. 27. 4; 2 Kent 466; 1 Story, Contr. § 593; 22 N. Y. 272; 16 Ohio 129.

Exceptio ejus rei cujus petitur dissolutio nulla est. A plea of that matter the solution of which is the object of the action is of no effect. Jenk. Cent. 37.

Exceptio falsi est omnium ultima. The exception of falsehood is last of all. Trayner, Max. 198.

Exceptio firmat regulam in casibus non exceptis. An exception affirms the rule in cases not excepted. Bacon, Aph. 17.

Exceptio firmat regulam in contrarium. An exception proves an opposite rule. See exceptio probat regulam. Bacon, Aph. 17.

Exceptio nulla est versus actionem quæ exceptionem perimit. There can be no plea against an action which entirely destroys the plea. Jenk. Cent. 106.

Exceptio probat regulam de rebus non exceptis.

An exception proves a rule concerning things not excepted. 11 Co. 41; 1 Pick. 371; 23 id. 112. See exceptio firmat regulam in contrarium.

Exceptio quæ firmat legem exponit legem. An exception which confirms the law, expounds the law. 2 Bulstr. 189.

Exceptio quoque regulam declarat. The exception also declares the rule. Bacon, Aph. 17.

Exceptio semper ultima ponenda est. An exception is always to be put last. 9 Co. 53.

Excessus in jure reprobatur. Excessus in re qualibet jure reprobatur communi. Excess in law is reprehended. Excess in anything is reprehended by common law. 11 Co. 44.

Excusat aut extenuat delictum in capitalibus, quod non operatur idem in civilibus. That excuses or extenuates a wrong in capital causes which does not have effect in civil suits. Bacon, Max. Reg. 7; Broom, Max. 324.

Executio est executio juris secundum judicium. An execution is the execution of the law according to the judgment. 3 Inst 212.

Executio est finis et fructus legis. An execution is the end and the fruit of law. Co. Litt. 289 b.

Executio legis non habet injuriam. An execution cannot work an injury. Co. Litt. 289 b.

Expedit reipublicæ ne sua re quis male utatur. It is for the interest of the state that a man should not use his own property improperly. Inst. 1. 8. 2; Broom, Max. 365-6; 8 Allen 329. This maxim belongs to the law of all countries: 1 Phill. Int. L. 553.

Expedit reipublicæ ut sit finis litium. It is to the advantage of the state that there should be an end of litigation. Co. Litt. 303 b; 5 Johns. Ch. 568. See interest reipublicæ, etc.

Experientia per varios actus legem facit. Experience by various acts makes laws. Co. Litt. 60; Branch, Princ.

Expositio, quæ ex visceribus causæ nascitur, est aptissima et fortissima in lege. That exposition which springs from the vitals of a cause is the fittest and most powerful in law. 10 Co. 24.

Expressa nocent, non expressa non nocent. Things expressed may be prejudicial; things not expressed are not. Calvinus, Lex; Dig. 50. 17. 195.

Expressa non prosunt quæ non expressa prodesse. Things expressed may be prejudicial which not expressed will profit. 4 Co. 73.

Expresso eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur. The expression of those things which are tacitly implied operates nothing. Broom, Max. 609, 753; 2 Pars. Contr. 23; 4 Co. 73; 5 id. 11; Andr. Steph. Pl. 366; Hob. 170; 3 Atk. 138; 11 M. & W. 569; 7 Exch. 28.

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. Co. Litt. 210; Broom, Max. 607, 651; 3 Bingh. N. C. 85; 8 Scott N. R. 1013; 12 M. & W. 761; 16 id. 244; 2 Curt. C. C. 365; 6 Mass. 84; 11 Cush. 288; 23 Mass. 29; 117 id. 448; 3 Johns. Ch. 110; 5 Watts 156; 59 Pa. 178; 84 Ala. 239; 11 Colo. 265; 36 Fed. Rep. 880; 74 id. 535; 104 U. S. 25; 4 Biss. 35.

Expressum facit cessare tacitum. That which is expressed puts an end to (renders ineffective) that which is implied. Broom, Max. 607, 651; 5 Bingh. N. He who will have equity done to him must do equity to the same person. 4 Bouv. Inst. 3723.

Heirs at law shall not be disinherited by conjecture, but only by express words or necessary implication. Schoul. Wills § 479; 28 Colo. 40.

Hoc servabitur quod initio convenit. That shall be preserved which is useful in the beginning. Dig. 50. 17. 23; Bract. 73 b.

Home ne sera puny pur suer des briefes en court le roy, soit il a droit ou a tort. A man shall not be punished for suing out writs in the king's court, whether he be right or wrong. 2 Inst. 238; but see MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

Hominum causa jus constitutum est. Law is established for the benefit of man.

Homo potest esse habilis et inhabilis diversis temporibus. A man may be capable and incapable at divers times. 5 Co. 98.

Homo vocabulum est naturæ; persona juris civilis. Man (homo) is a term of nature; person (persona), of civil law. Calvinus, Lex.

Hora non est multum de substantia negotii, licet in appello de ea aliquando fiat mentio. The hour is not of much consequence as to the substance of business, although in appeal it is sometimes mentioned. 1 Bulstr. 82.

Hostes sunt qui nobis vel quibus nos bellum decernimus; cæteri proditores vel prædones sunt. Enemies are those upon whom we declare war, or who declare it against us; all others are traitors or pirates. 7 Co. 24; Dig. 50. 16. 118; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 257.

Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. That is certain which may be rendered certain. 2 Bla. Com. 143; 4 Kent 462; 24 Pick. 178; 11 Cush. 380; 90 Mass. 548; 99 id. 230; Broom, Max. 624 et seq.; 38 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 588; 67 Ill. App. 381.

Id perfectum est quod ex omnibus suis partibus constat. That is perfect which is complete in all its parts. 9 Co. 9.

Id possumus quod de jure possumus. We are able to do that which we can do lawfully. Lane 116.

Id quod est magis remotum non trahit ad se quod est magis junctum, sed e contrario in omni casu. That which is more remote does not draw to itself that which is nearer, but the contrary in every case. Co. Litt. 164.

Id quod nostrum est sine facto nostro ad alium transferri non potest. What belongs to us cannot be transferred to another without our consent. Dig. 50. 17. 11.

Id solum nostrum quod debitis deductis nostrum est. That only is ours which remains to us after deduction of debts. Trayner, Max. 227.

Id tantum possumus quod de jure possumus. We can do that only which we can lawfully do. Trayner, Max. 237.

Idem agens et patiens esse non potest. To be at once the person acting and the person acted upon is impossible. Jenk. Cent. 40.

Idem est facere et non prohibere cum possis. It is the same thing to do a thing as not to prohibit it when in your power. 3 Inst. 158.

Idem est nihil dicere et insufficienter dicere. It is the same thing to say nothing and not to say enough. 2 Inst. 178.

Idem est non probari et non esse; non deficit jus sed probatio. What is not proved and what does not exist, are the same; it is not a defect of the law, but of proof.

Idem est scire aut scire debere aut potuisse. To be bound to know or to be able to know is the same as to know.

Idem non esse et non apparere. It is the same thing not to exist and not to appear. Broom, Max. 165; Jenk. Cent. 207.

Idem semper antecedenti proximo refertur. Idem always relates to the next antecedent. Co. Litt. 388; 7 Johns. Ch. 248.

Identitas vera colligitur ex multitudine signorum. True identity is collected from a number of signs. Bacon, Max. Reg. 29.

Ignorantia eorum quæ quis scire tenetur non excusat. Ignorance of those things which every one is bound to know excuses not. Hale, P. C. 42. See Tindal, C. J., 10 Cl. & F. 210; Broom, Max. 267; 4 Bla. Com. 27.

Ignorantia excusatur, non juris sed facti. Ignorance of fact may excuse, but not ignorance of law. See IGNORANCE.

Ignorantia facti excusat, ignorantia juris non excusat. Ignorance of fact excuses, ignorance of law does not excuse. 1 Co. 177; Broom, Max. 253, 263; Bart. Max. 100; 2 Gray 412; 1 Fonb. Eq. 119, n. See IGNORANCE.

Impunitas continuum affectum tribuit delinquenti. Impunity offers a continual bait to a delinquent. 4 Co. 45.

Impunitas semper ad deteriora invitat. Impunity always invites to greater crimes. 5 Co. 109.

In æquali jure melior est conditio possidentis. When the parties have equal rights, the condition of the possessor is the better. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 215; Jar. Eq. Jur. 235; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 170; Dig. 50. 17. 128; Broom, Max. 718; Plowd. 293.

In alta proditione nullus potest esse accessorius; sed principalis solum nodo. In high treason, no one can be an accessory; all are principals. 3 Inst. 138; see 4 Cra. 75. 146. See ACCESSORY.

In alternativis electio est debitoris. In alternatives, the debtor has the election.

In ambigua voce legis ea potius accipienda est significatio, quæ vitio careat; præsertim cum etiam voluntas legis ex hoc colligi possit. In an ambiguous law that interpretation shall be preferred which is most consonant to equity, especially where it is in conformity with the general design of the legislature. Dig. 1. 3. 19; Broom, Max. 576; Bacon, Max. Reg. 3; 2 Inst. 173.

In ambiguis orationibus maxime sententia spectanda est ejus qui eas protulisset. When there are ambiguous expressions, the intention of him who uses them is especially to be regarded. (This maxim of Roman law was confined to wills.) Dig. 50. 17. 96; Broom, Max. 557.

In ambiguo sermone non utrumque dicimus sed id duntaxat quod volumus. When the language we use is ambiguous, we do not use it in a double sense, but in the sense in which we mean it. Dig. 34. 5. 3; 2 De G. M. & G. 313.

In Anglia non est interregnum. There can be no interregnum in England. Jenk. Cent. 205.

In atrocioribus delictis punitur affectus licet non sequatur effectus. In more atrocious crimes, the intent is punished though the effect does not follow. 2 Rolle 89. But see ATTEMPT.

In casu extremæ necessitatis omnia sunt communia. In cases of extreme necessity, everything is in common. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 54; Broom, Max. 2, n.

In civilibus ministerium excusat, in criminalibus non item. In civil matters agency (or service) excuses, but not so in criminal matters. Lofft 228; Trayner, Max. 213.

In commodato hæc pactio, ne dolus præstetur, rata non est. If in a contract for a loan there is inserted a clause that fraud should not be accounted of, such clause is void. Dig. 13. 7. 17.

In conjunctivis oportet utramque partem esse veram. In conjunctives each part must be true. Wing. Max. 13.

In consimili casu, consimile debet esse remedium. In similar cases, the remedy should be similar. Hardr. 65.

In consuetudinibus non diuturnitas temporis sed soliditas rationis est consideranda. In customs, not the length of time but the strength of the reason should be considered. Co. Litt. 141.

In contractibus, benigna; in testamentis, benignior; in restitutionibus, benignissima interpretatio facienda est. In contracts, the interpretation or construction should be liberal; in wills, more liberal; in restitutions, most liberal. Co. Litt. 112 a.

In contractibus tacite insunt quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis. In contracts, those things which are of custom and usage are tacitly implied. Broom, Max. 842: 3 Bingh. N. C. 814, 818; Story, Bills § 143; 3 Kent 260.

In contrahenda venditione, ambiguum pactum contra venditorem interpretandum est. In negotiating a sale, an ambiguous agreement is to be interpreted against the seller. Dig. 50. 17. 172; 18. 1. 21.

In conventionibus contrahentium voluntatem potius quam verba spectari placuit. In agreements, the rule is to regard the intention of the contracting parties rather than their words. Dig. 50. 16. 219; 2 Kent 555; Broom, Max. 551; 17 Johns. 150.

In criminalibus, probationes debent esse luce clariores. In criminal cases, the proofs ought to be clearer than the light. 3 Inst. 210.

In criminalibus sufficit generalis malitia intentionis cum facto paris gradus. In criminal cases, a general malice of intention is sufficient, with an act of corresponding degree. Bacon, Max. Reg. 15; Broom, Max. 328.

In criminalibus voluntas reputabitur pro facto. In criminal acts, the will will be taken for the deed. 3 Inst. 106.

In disjunctivis sufficit alteram partem esse veram. In disjunctives, it is sufficient if either part be true. Wing. Max. 13; Broom, Max. 592; Co. Litt. 225 a; 10 Co. 50; Dig. 50. 17. 110.

In dubiis benigniora præferenda sunt. In doubtful matters, the more favorable are to be preferred. Dig. 50. 17. 56; 2 Kent 557.

In dubiis magis dignum est accipiendum. In doubtful cases, the more worthy is to be taken. Branch, Princ.

In dubiis non præsumitur pro testamento. In doubtful cases, there is no presumption in favor of the will. Cro. Car. 51.

In dubio hæc legis constructio quam verba ostendunt. In a doubtful case, that is the construction of the law which the words indicate.

In dubio pars mitior est sequenda. In doubt, the gentler course is to be followed.

In dubio sequendum quod tutius est. In doubt, the safer course is to be adopted.

In eo quod plus sit semper inest et minus. The less is always included in the greater. Dig. 50. 17. 110.

In expositione instrumentorum, mala grammatica, quod fieri potest, vitanda est. In the construction of instruments, bad grammar is to be avoided as much as possible. 6 Co. 39; 2 Pars. Contr. 26.

In facto quod se habet ad bonum et malum magis de bono quam de malo lex intendit. In a deed which may be considered good or bad, the law looks more to the good than to the bad. Co. Litt. 78 b.

In favorabilibus magis attenditur quod prodest quam quod nocet. In things favored, what does good is more regarded than what does harm. Bacon, Max. Reg. 12; Bart. Max. 151.

In favorem vitæ, libertatis, et innocentiæ omnia præsumuntur. In favor of life, liberty, and innocence, all things are to be presumed. Lofft 125.

In fictione juris semper æquitas existit. A legal fiction is always consistent with equity. 11 Co. 51; Broom, Max. 127, 130; 17 Johns. 348; 3 Bla. Com. 43.

In fictione juris semper subsistit æquitas. In a legal fiction equity always exists. 74 Pa. 398; 2 Pick. 495, 627.

In his enim quæ sunt favorabilia animæ, quamvis sunt damnosa rebus, fiat aliquando extentio statuti. In things that are favorable to the spirit, though injurious to property, an extension of the statute should sometimes be made. 10 Co. 101.

In his quæ de jure communi omnibus concedentur, consuetudo alicujus patriæ vel loci non est allegenda. In those things which by common right are conceded to all, the custom of a particular country or place is not to be alleged. 11 Co. 85.

In judiciis minori ætati succurritur. In judicial proceedings infancy is favored. Jenk. Cent. 46.

In judicio non creditur nisi juratis. In law, no one is credited unless he is sworn. Cro. Car. 64.

In jure non remota causa, sed proxima, spectatur

In law, the proximate and not the remote cause is to be looked to. Bacon, Max. Reg. 1; Broom, Max. 216, 228, 853, n.; 12 Mass. 234; 12 Metc. 387; 14 Allen 298. See 3 Pars. Con. 455; CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR.

In majore summa continetur minor. In the greater sum is contained the less. 5 Co. 115.

In maleficiis voluntas spectatur non exitus. In offences, the intention is regarded, not the event. Dig. 48. 8. 14; Bacon, Max. Reg. 7; Broom, Max. 324.

In maleficio ratihabitio mandato comparetur. In a tort, ratification is equivalent to authority. Dig. 50. 17. 152. 2.

In maxima potentia minima licentia. In the greatest power there is the least liberty. Hob. 159.

In mercibus illicitis non sit commercium. There should be no commerce in illicit goods. 3 Kent 262, n.

In novo casu novum remedium apponendum est. In a new state of facts a new legal remedy must be found. 2 Inst. 3.

In obscuris inspici solere quod verisimilius est, aut quod plerumque fieri solet. Where there is obscurity, we usually regard what is probable or what is generally done. Dig. 50. 17. 114.

In obscuris quod minimum est sequimur. In obscure cases, we follow that which is least so. Dig. 50. 17. 9.

In odium spoliatoris omnia præsumuntur. All things are presumed against a wrong-doer. Broom, Max. 989; 1 Vern. 19; 1 P. Wms. 731; 1 Ch. Cas. 292.

In omni actione ubi duæ concurrunt districtiones, videlicet in rem et in personam, illa districtio tenenda est quæ magis timetur et magis ligat. In every action where two distresses concur, that is in rem and in personam, that is to be chosen which is most dreaded, and which binds most firmly. Bract. 372; Fleta, l. 6, c. 14, § 28.

In omni re nascitur res quæ ipsam rem exterminat. In every thing, the thing is born which destroys the thing itself. 2 Inst. 15.

In omnibus contractibus, sive nominatis sive innominatis, permutatio continetur. In every contract, whether nominate or innominate, there is implied an exchange, i. e. a consideration.

In omnibus obligationibus, in quibus dies non ponitur, præsenti die debetur. In all obligations, when no time is fixed for the performance, the thing is due immediately. Dig. 50. 17. 14.

In omnibus pœnalibus judiciis, et ætati et imprudentiæ succurritur. In all trials for penal offences, allowance is made for youth and lack of discretion. Dig. 50. 17. 108; Broom, Max. 314.

In omnibus quidem maxime tamen in jure æquitas spectanda sit. In all affairs indeed, but principally in those which concern the administration of justice, equity should be regarded. Dig. 50. 17. 90.

In pari causa possessor potior haberi debet. When two parties have equal rights, the advantage is always in favor of the possessor. Dig. 50. 17. 128; Broom, Max. 714.

In pari delicto melior est conditio possidentis. When the parties are equally in the wrong, the condition of the possessor is better. 11 Wheat. 258; 3 Cra. 244; Cowp. 341; Broom, Max. 325; 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3734; 83 Ala. 142.

In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis (et possidentis). Where both parties are equally in fault, the condition of the defendant is preferable. L. R. 7 Ch. 473; 11 Mass. 376; 101 Mass. 150, 364; Broom, Max. 290, 721; 38 Fed. Rep. 191; 15 Wash. 490; 166 Ill. 282.

In pœnalibus causis benignius interpretandum est. In penal cases, the more favorable interpretation is to be made. Dig. 50. 17. 155. 2; Plowd. 86 b; 2 Hale, P. C. 365.

In præparatoriis ad judicium favetur actori. In things preparatory before trial, the plaintiff is favored. 2 Inst. 57.

In præsentia majoris potestatis, minor potestas cessat. In the presence of the superior power, the minor power ceases. Jenk. Cent. 214; Hardw. 28; 13 How. 142; 13 Q. B. 740. See Broom, Max. 111, 112.

In pretio emptionis et venditionis naturaliter licet contrahentibus se circumvenire. In the price of buying and selling, it is naturally allowed to the contracting parties to overreach each other. 1 Story, Contr. 606.

In propria causa nemo judex. No one can be judge in his own cause. 12 Co. 13.

In quo quis delinquit, in eo de jure est puniendus. In whatever thing one offends, in that he is rightfully to be punished. Co. Litt. 233 b.

In re communi neminem dominorum jure facere quicquam, invito altero, posse. One co-proprietor can exercise no authority over the common property against the will of the other. Dig. 10. 3. 28.

In re dubia benigniorem interpretationem sequi, non minus justius est, quam tutius. In a doubtful case, to follow the milder interpretation is not less the more just than it is the safer course. Dig. 50. 17. 192. 2; 28. 4. 3.

In re dubia magis inficiatio quam affirmatio intelligenda. In a doubtful matter, the negative is to be understood rather than the affirmative. Godb. 37; Bart. Max. 127.

In re lupanari, testes lupanares admittentur. In a matter concerning a brothel, prostitutes are admitted as witnesses. 6 Barb. 390, 324.

In re pari, potiorem causam esse prohibentis constat. Where a thing is owned in common, it is agreed that the cause of him prohibiting (its use) is the stronger. Dig. 10. 3. 28; 3 Kent 45; Pothier, Traité du Con. de Soc. n. 90; 16 Johns. 488, 491.

In re propria iniquum admodum est alicui licentiam tribuere sententiæ. It is extremely unjust that any one should be judge in his own cause.

In rebus manifestis errat qui auctoritates legum allegat; quia perspicua vera non sunt probanda. He errs who alleges the authorities of law in things manifest; because obvious truths need not be proved. 5 Co. 67.

In republica maxime conservanda sunt jura belli. In the state, the laws of war are to be especially observed. 2 Inst. 58; 8 Allen 484.

In restitutionem, non in pœnam, hæres succedit. The heir succeeds to the restitution, not the penalty. 2 Inst. 198.

In restitutionibus benignissima interpretatio facienda est. The most favorable construction is to be made in restitutions. Co. Litt. 112.

In satisfactionibus non permittitur amplius fieri quam semel factum est. In payments, more must not be received than has been received once for all 9 Co. 53.

In stipulationibus cum quæritur quid actum sit, verba contra stipulatorem interpretanda sunt. In contracts, when the question is what was agreed upon, the terms are to be interpreted against the party offering them. Dig. 41. 1. 38. 18. (Chancellor Kent remarks that the true principle appears to be "to give the contract the sense in which the person making the promise believes the other party to have accepted it, if he in fact did so understand and accept it." 2 Kent 721.) 2 Day 281; 1 Duer, Ins. 159, 160; Broom, Max. 599. See.

In stipulationibus id tempus spectatur quo contrahimus. In agreements, reference is had to the time at which they were made. Dig. 50. 17. 144. 1.

In suo quisque negotio hebetior est quam in alieno. Every one is more dull in his own business than in that of another. Co. Litt. 377.

In testamentis plenius testatoris intentionem scrutamur. In testaments, we should seek diligently the will of the testator. (But, says Doddridge, C. J., "this is to be observed with these two limitations: 1st, his intent ought to be agreeable to the rules of the law; 2d, his intent ought to be collected out of the words of the will." 3 Bulstr. 103.) Broom, Max. 555.

In testamentis plenius voluntates testantium interpretantur. In testaments, the will of the testator should be liberally construed. Dig. 50. 17. 12; Cujac. ad loc. cited 3 Pothier, Pand. 46; Broom, Max. 568.

In toto et pars continetur. A part is included in the whole. Dig. 50. 17. 113.

In traditionibus scriptorum (chartarum) non quod dictum est, sed quod gestum (factum) est, inspicitur. In the delivery of writings (deeds), not what is said but what is done is to be considered. 9 Co. 137; Leake, Contr. 4.

In veram quantitatem fidejussor teneatur, nisi pro certa quantitate accessit. Let the surety be holden for the true quantity unless he agree for a certain quantity. 17 Mass. 597.

In verbis non verba sed res et ratio quærenda est. In words, not the words, but the thing and the meaning is to be inquired into. Jenk. Cent. 132.

In vocibus videndum non a quo sed ad quid sumatur. In discourses, it is to be considered not from what, but to what, it is advanced. Ellesmere, Postn. 62.

Incendium ære alieno non exuit debitorum. A fire does not release a debtor from his debt. Code 4. 2. 11.

Incerta pro nullis habentur. Things uncertain are held for nothing. Dav. 33.

Incerta quantitas vitiat actum. An uncertain quantity vitiates the act. 1 Rolle 465.

Incivile est, nisi tota lege prospecta, una aliqua particula ejus proposita, judicare vel respondere. It is improper, unless the whole law has been examined, to give judgment or advice upon a view of a single clause of it. Dig. 1. 3. 24. See Hob. 171 a.

Incivile est, nisi tota sententia inspecta, de aliqua parte judicare. It is improper to pass an opinion on any part of a passage without examining the whole. Hob. 171 a.

Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius. The inclusion of one is the exclusion of another. 11 Co. 58; 8 Mont. 312.

Incolas domicilium facit. Residence creates domicil. 1 Johns. Cas. 363, 366. See DOMICIL.

Incommodum non solvit argumentum. An inconvenience does not solve an argument.

Incorporalia bello non adquiruntur. Things incorporeal are not acquired by war. 6 Maule & S. 104.

Inde datæ leges ne fortior omnia posset. Laws were made lest the stronger should have unlimited power.

Indefinitum æquipollet universali. The undefined is equivalent to the whole. 1 Ventr. 368.

Indefinitum supplet locum universalis. The undefined supplies the place of the whole. 4 Co. 77.

Independenter se habet assecuratio a viaggio navis. The voyage insured is an independent or distinct thing from the voyage of the ship. 3 Kent 318, n.

Index animi sermo. Speech is the index of the mind. Broom, Max. 622.

Inesse potest donationi, modus, conditio sive causa; ut modus est; si conditio; quia causa. In a gift there may be manner, condition, and cause; as (ut), introduces a manner; if (si), a condition; because (quia), a cause. Dyer 138.

Infans non multum a furioso distat. An infant does not differ much from a lunatic. Bract. l. 3, c. 2, § 8; Dig. 50. 17. 5. 40; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 223, 224, 242.

Infinitum in jure reprobatur. That which is infinite is reprehensible in law. 9 Co. 45.

Iniquissima pax est anteponenda justissimo bello. The most unjust peace is to be preferred to the justest war. 18 Wend. 257, 305.

Iniquum est alios permittere, alios inhibere mercaturam. It is inequitable to permit some to trade and to prohibit others. 3 Inst. 181.

Iniquum est aliquem rei sui esse judicem. It is unjust for any one to be judge in his own cause. 12 Coke 13.

Iniquum est ingenuis hominibus non esse liberam rerum suarum alienationem. It is against equity for freemen not to have the free disposal of their own property. Co. Litt. 223.

Injuria fit ei cui convicium dictum est, vel de eo factum carmen famosum. An injury is done to him of whom a reproachful thing is said, or concerning whom an infamous song is made. 9 Co. 60; Bart. Max. 179.

Injuria non excusat injuriam. A wrong does not excuse a wrong. Broom, Max. 270, 387, 395; 11 Exch. 822; 15 Q. B. 276; 6 E. & B. 76; Branch, Princ.

Injuria non præsumitur. A wrong is not presumed. Co. Litt. 232.

Injuria propria non cadet beneficium facientis. No one shall profit by his own wrong.

Injuria servi dominum pertingit. The master is liable for injury done by his servant. Lofft 229.

Injustum est, nisi tota lege inspecta, de una aliqua ejus particula proposita judicare vel respondere. It is unjust to give judgment or advice concerning any particular clause of a law without having examined the whole law. 8 Co. 117 b.

Insanus est qui, abjecta ratione, omnia cum impetu et furore facit. He is insane who, reason being thrown away, does everything with violence and rage. 4 Co. 128.

Instans est finis unius temporis et principium alterius. An instant is the end of one time and the beginning of another. Co. Litt. 185.

Intentio cæca mala. A hidden intention is bad. 2 Bulstr. 179.

Intentio inservire debet legibus, non leges intentioni. Intentions ought to be subservient to the laws, not the laws to intentions. Co. Litt. 314.

Intentio mea imponit nomen operi meo. My intent gives a name to my act. Hob. 123.

Inter alios res gestas aliis non posse præjudicium facere sæpe constitutum est. It has been often settled that things which took place between other parties cannot prejudice. Code 7. 60. 1. 2.

Interdum venit ut exceptio quæ prima facie justa videtur, tamen inique noceat. It sometimes happens that a plea which seems prima facie just, nevertheless is injurious and unequal. Inst. 4. 14; 4. 14; 1. 2.

Interest reipublicæ ne maleficia remaneant impunita. It concerns the commonwealth that crimes do not remain unpunished. Jenk. Cent. 30, 31.

Interest reipublicæ ne sua quis male utatur. It concerns the commonwealth that no one misuse his property. 6 Co. 36.

Interest reipublicæ quod homines conserventur. It concerns the commonwealth that men be preserved. 12 Co. 63.

Interest reipublicæ res judicatas non rescindi. It concerns the commonwealth that things adjudged be not rescinded. See RES JUDICATA.

Interest reipublicæ suprema hominum testamenta rata haberi. It concerns the commonwealth that men's last wills be sustained. Co. Litt. 236.

Interest reipublicæ ut carceres sint in tuto. It concerns the commonwealth that prisons be secure. 2 Inst. 587.

Interest reipublicæ ut pax in regno conservetur, et quæcunque paci adversentur provide declinentur. It benefits the state to preserve peace in the kingdom, and prudently to decline whatever is adverse to it. 2 Inst. 158.

Interest reipublicæ ut quilibet re sua bene utatur. It concerns the commonwealth that every one use his property properly. 6 Co. 37.

Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium. It concerns the commonwealth that there be a limit to litigation. Broom, Max. 331, 343, 893 n.; Co. Litt. 303; 7 Mass. 432; 16 Gray 27; 99 Mass. 208; 88 Pa. 506; 101 N. C. 78; 59 Fed. Rep. 868; 49 La. Ann. 757.

Interpretare et concordare leges legibus est optimus interpretandi modus. To interpret and reconcile laws so that they harmonize is the best mode of construction. 8 Co. 169.

Interpretatio fienda est ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Such a construction is to be made that the subject may have an effect rather than none. Broom, Max. 543; Jenk. Cent. 198; 78 Pa. 219. See CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

Interpretatio talis in ambiguis semper fienda est, ut evitetur inconveniens et absurdum. In ambiguous things, such a construction should be made, that what is inconvenient and absurd may be avoided. 4 Inst. 328.

Interruptio multiplex non tollit præscriptionem semel obtentam. Repeated interruptions do not defeat a prescription once obtained. 2 Inst. 654.

Intestatus decedit, qui aut omnino testamentum non fecit aut non jure fecit, aut id quod fecerat ruptum irritumve factum est, aut nemo ex eo hæres extitit. He dies intestate who either has made no will at all or has not made it legally, or whose will which he had made has been annulled or become ineffectual, or to whom there is no living heir. Inst. 3. 1. pr.; Dig. 38. 16. 1; 50. 16. 64.

Inutilis labor, et sine fructu, non est effectus legis. Useless labor and without fruit is not the effect of law. Co. Litt. 127; Wing. Max. 38.

Inveniens libellum famosum et non corrumpens punitur. He who finds a libel and does not destroy it, is punished. F. Moore 813.

Invito beneficium non datur. No one is obliged to accept a benefit against his consent. Dig. 50. 17. 69; Broom, Max. 699 n. (But if he does not dissent, he will, in many cases, be considered as assenting. See ASSENT.)

Ipsæ leges cupiunt ut jure regantur. The laws themselves desire that they should be governed by right. Co. Litt. 174 b, quoted from Cato; 2 Co. 25 b.

Ira furor brevis est. Anger is a short insanity. 4 Wend. 336, 355.

Ita lex scripta est. The law is so written. 26 Barb. 374, 380; 18 Pa. 306. See 22 Pick. 389.

Ita semper fiat relatio ut valeat dispositio. Let the relation be so made that the disposition may stand. 6 Co. 76.

Iter est jus eundi, ambulandi hominis; non etiam jumentum agendi vel vehiculum. A way is the right of going or walking, and does not include the right of driving a beast of burden or a carriage. Co. Litt. 56 a; Inst. 2. 3. pr.; 1 Mack. Civ. Law 343, § 314.

Judex æquitatem semper spectare debet. A judge ought always to regard equity. Jenk. Cent. 45.

Judex ante oculos æquitatem semper habere debet. A judge ought always to have equity before his eyes. Jenk. Cent. 58.

Judex bonus nihil ex arbitrio suo faciat, nec propositione domesticæ voluntatis, sed juxta leges et jura pronunciet. A good judge should do nothing from his own arbitrary will, or from the dictates of his private wishes; but he should pronounce according to law and justice. 7 Co. 27 a.

Judex damnatur cum nocens absolvitur. The judge is condemned when the guilty are acquitted.

Judex debet judicare secundum allegata et probata. The judge ought to decide according to the allegations and the proofs.

Judex est lex loquens. The judge is the speaking law. 7 Co. 4 a.

Judex habere debet duos sales, salem sapientiæ, ne sit insipidus, et salem conscientiæ, ne sit diabolus. A judge should have two salts: The salt of wisdom, lest he be foolish; and the salt of conscience, lest he be devilish. 3 Inst. 147; Bart. Max. 189.

Judex non potest esse testis in propria causa. A judge cannot be a witness in his own cause. 4 Inst. 279. See JUDGE.

Judex non potest injuriam sibi datam punire. A judge cannot punish a wrong done to himself. 12 Co. 114.

Judex non reddit plus quam quod petens ipse requirit. The judge does not give more than the plaintiff demands. 2 Inst. 286, case 84.

Judicandum est legibus non exemplis. We are to judge by the laws, not by examples. 4 Co. 33 b; 4 Bla. Com. 405; 19 Johns. 513.

Judices non tenentur exprimere causam sententiæ suæ. Judges are not bound to explain the reason of their judgments. Jenk. Cent. 75.

Judici officium suum excedenti non paretur. To a judge who exceeds his office (or jurisdiction) no obedience is due. Jenk. Cent. 139.

Judici satis pœna est quod Deum habet ultorem. It is punishment enough for a judge that he is responsible to God. 1 Leon. 295.

Judicia in curia regis non adnihilentur, sed stent in robore suo quousque per errorem aut attinctum adnullentur. Judgments in the king's court are not to be annihilated, but to remain in force until annulled by error or attaint. 2 Inst. 539.

Judicia in deliberationibus crebro maturescunt, in accelerato processu nunquam. Judgments frequently become matured by deliberation, never by hurried process. 3 Inst. 210.

Judicia posteriora sunt in lege fortiora. The later decisions are stronger in law. 8 Co. 97.

Judicia sunt tanquam juris dicta, et pro veritate accipiuntur. Judgments are, as it were, the dicta or sayings of the law, and are received as truth. 2 Inst. 537.

Judiciis posterioribus fides est adhibenda. Faith or credit is to be given to the later decisions. 13 Co. 14.

Judicis est in pronuntiando sequi regulam, exceptione non probata. The judge in his decision ought to follow the rule, when the exception is not proved.

Judicis est judicare secundum allegata et probata. A judge ought to decide according to the allegations and proofs. Dyer 12 a; Halkers. Max. 73.

Judicis es jus dicere non dare. It is the duty of a judge to declare the law, not to enact it. Lofft 42.

Judicis officium est opus diei in die suo perficere. It is the duty of a judge to finish the work of each day within that day. Dyer 12.

Judicis officium est ut res ita tempora rerum quærere; quæsito tempore tutus eris. It is the duty of a judge to inquire the times of things, as well as into things; by inquiring into the time you will be safe. Co. Litt. 171.

Judicium a non suo judice datum nullius est momenti. A judgment given by an improper judge is of no moment. 10 Co. 76 b; 2 Q. B. 1014; 13 id. 143; 14 M. & W. 124; 11 Cl. & F. 610; Broom, Max. 93.

Judicium est quasi juris dictum. Judgment is as it were a saying of the law. Co. Litt. 168.

Judicium non debet esse illusorium, suum effectum habere debet. A judgment ought not to be illusory, it ought to have its proper effect. 2 Inst. 341.

Judicium redditur in invitum, in præsumptione legis. In presumption of law, a judgment is given against inclination. Co. Litt. 248 b, 314 b.

Judicium semper pro veritate accipitur. A judgment it always taken for truth. 2 Inst. 380; 17 Mass. 237.

Juncta juvant. Things joined have effect. 11 East 290.

Jura ecclesiastica limitata sunt infra limites separatos. Ecclesiastical laws are limited within separate bounds. 3 Bulstr. 53.

Jura eodem modo destituuntur quo constituuntur. Laws are abrogated or repealed by the same means by which they are made. Broom, Max. 878.

Jura naturæ sunt immutabilia. The laws of nature are unchangeable. Branch, Princ.; Oliver, Forms 56.

Jura publica anteferenda privatis. Public rights are to be preferred to private. Co. Litt. 130.

Jura publica ex privato promiscue decidi non debent. Public rights ought not to be decided promiscuously with private. Co. Litt. 181 b.

Jura regis specialia non concedumtur per generalia verba. The special rights of the king are not granted by general words. Jenk. Cent. 108.

Jura sanguinis nullo jure civili dirimi possunt. The right of blood and kindred cannot be destroyed by any civil law. Dig. 50. 17. 9; Bacon, Max. Reg. 11; Broom, Max. 538; 14 Allen 562.

Juramentum est indivisibile, et non est admittendum in parte verum et in parte falsum. An oath is indivisible; it is not to be held partly true and partly false. 4 Inst. 274.

Jurare est Deum in testum vocare, et est actus divini cultus. To swear is to call God to witness, and is an act of religion. 3 Inst. 165. See Bart. Max. 232; 1 Benth. Ev. 376, 371, note.

Juratur creditur in judicio. He who makes oath is to be believed in judgment. 3 Inst. 79.

Juratores debent esse vicini, sufficientes et minus suspecti. Jurors ought to be neighbors, of sufficient estate, and free from suspicion. Jenk. Cent. 141.

Juratores sunt judices facti. Jurors are the judges of the facts. Jenk. Cent. 68.

Jure naturæ æquum est neminem cum alterius detrimento et injuria fieri locupletiorem. According to the laws of nature, it is just that no one should be enriched with detriment and injury to another (i. e. at another's expense). Dig. 50. 17. 200.

Juri non est consonum quod aliquis accessorius in curia regis convincatur antequam aliquis de facto fuerit attinctus. It is not consonant to justice that any accessory should be convicted in the king's court before any one has been attainted of the fact. 2 Inst. 183.

Juris effectus in executione consistit. The effect of a law consists in the execution. Co. Litt. 289 b.

Juris ignorantia est, cum jus nostrum ignoramus. It is ignorance of the law when we do not know our own rights. 9 Pick. 130.

Juris præcepta sunt hæc, honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere. These are the precepts of the law, to live honorably, to hurt nobody, to render to every one his due. Inst. 1. 1. 3; Sharsw. Bla. Com. Introd. 40.

Juris quidem ignorantiam cuique nocere, facti verum ignorantiam non nocere. Ignorance of fact prejudices no one, ignorance of law does. Dig. 22. 6. 9.

Jurisdictio est potestas de publico introducta, cum necessitate juris dicendi. Jurisdiction is a power introduced for the public good, on account of the necessity of dispensing justice. 10 Co. 73 a.

Jurisprudentia est divinarum atque humanarum rerum notitia; justi atque injusti scientia. Jurisprudence is the knowledge of things divine and human; the science of the just and the unjust. Dig. 1. 1. 10. 2; Inst. 1. 1. 1; Bract. 3; 8 Johns. 290, 295.

Jurisprudentia legis communis Angliæ est scientia socialis et copiosa. The jurisprudence of the common law of England is a science sociable and copious. 7 Co. 28 a.

Jus naturale est quod apud homines eandem habet potentiam. Natural right is that which has the same force among all mankind. 7 Co. 12.

Jus non habenti tuto non paretur. It is safe not to obey him who has no right. Hob. 146.

Jus publicum privatorum pactis mutari non potest. A public right cannot be changed by agreement of private parties. Dig. 2. 14. 38; cited arg. in 3 C. & F. 621; 4 id. 241; 68 Conn. 533; 37 Atl. Rep. 490.

Jus quo universitates utuntur est idem quod habent privati. The law which governs corporations is the same as that which governs individuals. 16 Mass. 44.

Jus respicit æquitatem. Law regards equity. Co. Litt. 24 b; Broom, Max. 151; 17 Q. B. 223.

Jus superveniens auctori accrescit successori. A right growing to a possessor accrues to a successor. Halker. Max. 76.

Jus vendit quod usus approbavit. The law dispenses what use has approved. Ellesmere, Postn. 35.

Jusjurandi forma verbis differt, re convenit; hunc enim sensum habere debet, ut Deus invocetur. The form of taking an oath differs in language, agrees in meaning; for it ought to have this sense, that the Deity is invoked. Grotius, b. 2. c. 13, s. 10.

Jusjurandum inter alios factum nec nocere nec prodesse debet. An oath made between third parties ought neither to hurt nor profit. 4 Inst. 279.

Justitia debet esse LIBERA, quia nihil iniquius venali justitia; PLENA, quia justitia non debet claudicare; et CELERIS, quia dilatio est quædam negatio. Justice ought to be unbought, because nothing is more hateful than venal justice; full, for justice ought not to halt; and quick, for delay is a kind of denial. 2 Inst. 56.

Justitia est constans et perpetua voluntas jus suum cuique tribuendi. Justice is a steady and unceasing disposition to render to every man his due. Inst. 11. pr.; Dig. 1. 1 10.

Justitia est virtus excellens et Altissimo complacens. Justice is an excellent virtue and pleasing to the Most High. 4 Inst. 28.

Justitia firmatur solium. By justice the throne is established. 3 Inst. 140.

Justitia nemini neganda est. Justice is to be denied to none. Jenk. Cent. 178.

Justitia non est neganda, non differenda. Justice is not to be denied nor delayed. Jenk. Cent. 76.

Justitia non novit patrem nec matrem, solum veritatem spectat justitia. Justice knows neither father nor mother, justice looks to truth alone. 1 Bulstr. 199.

Justum non est aliquem antenatum mortuum facere bastardum, qui pro tota vita sua pro legitimo habetur. It is not just to make a bastard after his death one elder born who all his life has been accounted legitimate. 8 Co. 101.

King can do no wrong. See KING CAN DO NO WRONG.

L'obligation sans cause, ou sur une fausse cause, ou sur cause illicite, ne peut avoir aucun effet. An obligation without consideration, or upon a false consideration (which fails), or upon unlawful consideration, cannot have any effect. Code 3. 3. 4; Chitty, Contr. 11th, Am. ed. 25, note.

L'ou le ley done chose, la ceo done remedie a vener a ceo. Where the law gives a right, it gives a remedy to recover. 2 Rolle 17.

La conscience est la plus changeante des régles. Conscience is the most changeable of rules.

La ley favour la vie d'un home. The law favors a man's life. Year B. Hen. VI. 51.

La ley favour l'inheritance d'un home. The law favors a man's inheritance. Year B. Hen. VI. 51.

La ley voit plus tost suffer un mischiefe que un inconvenience. The law will sooner suffer a mischief than an inconvenience. Littleton § 231.

Lata culpa dolo æquiparatur. Gross negligence is equal to fraud.

Law respecteth possibility of things. Wing. Max. 140; Finch, Law, b. 1, c. 3, n. 40.

Law respecteth the bonds of nature. Wing. Max. 78; Finch, Law, b. 1, c. 3, n. 29.

Lawful things are well mixed, unless a form of law oppose. Bacon, Max. Reg. 23. (The law giveth that favor to lawful acts, that although they be executed by several authorities, yet the whole act is good. Ibid.)

Le contrat fait la loi. The contract makes the law.

Le ley de Dieu et ley de terre sont tout un, et l'un et l'autre preferre et favour le common et publique bien del terre. The law of God and the law of the land are all one; and both preserve and favor the common and public good of the land. Keilw. 191.

Le ley est le plus haut inheritance que le roy ad, car par le ley, il mesme et touts ses sujets sont rules, et si le ley ne fuit, nul roy ne nul inheritance serra. The law is the highest inheritance that the king possesses; for by the law both he and all his subjects are ruled; and if there were no law, there would be neither king nor inheritance.

Le salut du peuple est la suprême loi. The safety of the people is the highest law. Montes. Esp. Lois 1. XXVII. ch. 23; Broom, Max. 2, n.

Legatos violare contra jus gentium est. It is contrary to the law of nations to do violence to ambassadors. Branch, Princ.

Legatum morte testatoris tantum confirmatur, sicut donatio inter vivos traditione sola. A legacy is confirmed by the death of the testator, in the same manner as a gift from a living person is by delivery alone. Dyer 143.

Legatus regis vice fungitur a quo destinatur, et honorandus est sicut ille cujus vicem gerit. An ambassador fills the place of the king by whom he is sent, and is to be honored as he is whose place he fills. 12 Co. 17.

Legem enim contractus dat. The contract makes the law. 22 Wend. 215, 233.

Legem terræ amittentes perpetuam infamiæ notam inde merito incurrunt. Those who do not preserve the law of the land, then justly incur the ineffaceable brand of infamy. 3 Inst. 221.

Leges Angliæ sunt tripartitæ: jus commune, consuetudines, ac decreta comitiorum. The laws of England are threefold: common law, customs, and decrees of parliament.

Leges figendi et refigendi consuetudo est periculosissima. The custom of making and unmaking laws is a most dangerous one. 4 Co. pref.

Leges humanæ nascuntur, vivunt, et moriuntur. Human laws are born, live, and die. 7 Co. 25; 2 Atk. 674; 11 C. B. 767; 1 Bla. Com. 89.

Leges naturæ perfectissimæ sunt et immutabiles; humani vero juris conditio semper in infinitum de-currit, et nihil est in eo quod perpetuo stare possit. Leges humanæ nascuntur, vivunt, moriuntur. The laws of nature are most perfect and immutable; but the condition of human law is an unending succession, and there is nothing in it which can continue perpetually. Human laws are born, live, and die. 7 Co. 25.

Leges non verbis sed rebus sunt impositæ. Laws are imposed on things, not words. 10 Co. 101.

Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. Subsequent laws repeal prior conflicting ones. Broom, Max. 27, 29; 2 Rolle 410; 11 Co. 626, 630; 12 Allen 434; 20 Nev. 214.

Leges suum ligent latorem. Laws should bind the proposers of them. Fleta, b. 1, c. 17, § 11.

Leges vigilantibus, non dormientibus subveniunt. The laws aid the vigilant, not the negligent. 5 Johns. Ch. 122, 145; 16 How. Pr. 142, 144.

Legibus sumptis desinentibus, lege naturæ utendum est. When laws imposed by the state fail, we must act by the law of nature. 2 Rolle 298.

Legis constructio non facit injuriam. The construction of law does no wrong. Co. Litt. 183.

Legis figendi et refigendi consuetudo periculosissima est. The custom of fixing and refixing (making and annulling) laws is most dangerous.

Legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet. The construction of law obtains the force of law. Branch, Princ.

Legis minister non tenetur, in executione officii sui, fugere aut retrocedere. The minister of the law is not bound, in the execution of his office, either to fly or retreat. 6 Co. 68.

Legislatorum est viva vox, rebus et non verbis legem imponere. The voice of legislators is a living voice, to impose laws on things and not on words. 10 Co. 101; Bart. Max. 211.

Legitime imperanti parere necesse est. One who commands lawfully must be obeyed. Jenk. Cent. 120.

Les fictions naissent de la loi, et non la loi des fictions. Fictions arise from the law, and not law from fictions.

Les lois ne se chargent de punir que les actions extérieures. Laws do not undertake to punish other than outward actions. Montes. Esp. Lois, b. 12, c. 11; Broom, Max. 311.

Lex æquitate gaudet; appetit perfectum; est norma recti. The law delights in equity: it covets perfection; it is a rule of right. Jenk. Cent. 36.

Lex aliquando sequitur æquitatem. The law sometimes follows equity. 3 Wils. 119.

Lex Angliæ est lex misericordiæ. The law of England is a law of mercy. 2 Inst. 619.

Lex Angliæ non patitur absurdum. The law of England does not suffer an absurdity. 9 Co. 22.

Lex Angliæ nunquam matris sed semper patris conditionem imitari partum judicat. The law of England rules that the offspring shall always follow the condition of the father, never that of the mother. Co. Litt. 123; Bart. Max. 59.

Lex Angliæ nunquam sine parliamento mutari potest. The law of England cannot be changed but by parliament. 2 Inst. 218, 619.

Lex beneficialis rei consimili remedium præstat. A beneficial law affords a remedy in a similar case. 2 Inst. 689.

Lex citius tolerare vult privatum damnum quam publicum malum. The law would rather tolerate a private loss than a public evil. Co. Litt. 152 b.

Lex contra id quod præsumit probationem non recipit. The law admits no proof against that which it presumes. Lofft 573.

Lex de futuro, judex de præterito. The law provides for the future, the judge for the past.

Lex deficere non potest in justitia exhibenda. The law ought not to fail in dispensing justice. Co. Litt. 197.

Lex dilationes semper exhorret. The law always abhors delay. 2 Inst. 240.

Lex est ab æterno. The law is from everlasting. Branch, Princ.

Lex est dictamen rationis. Law is the dictate of reason. Jenk. Cent. 117.

Lex est norma recti. Law is a rule of right.

Lex est ratio summa, quæ jubet quæ sunt utilia et necessaria, et contraria prohibet. Law is the perfection of reason, which commands what is useful and necessary, and forbids the contrary. Co. Litt. 319 b.

Lex est sanctio sancta, jubens honesta, et prohibens contraria. Law is a sacred sanction, commanding what is right and prohibiting the contrary. 2 Inst. 587; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 44, n.

Lex est tutissima cassis; sub clypeo legis nemo decipitur. Law is the safest helmet; under the shield of the law no one is deceived. 2 Inst. 56.

Lex favet doti. The law favors dower. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 105.

Lex fingit ubi subsistit æquitas. Law creates a fiction where equity exists. Branch, Princ.

Lex intendit vicinum vicini facta scire. The law presumes that one neighbor knows the actions of another. Co. Litt. 78 b. See JURY.

Lex necessitatis est lex temporis, i. e. instantis. The law of necessity is the law of time, that is, time present. Hob. 159.

Lex neminem cogit ad vana seu inutilia peragenda. The law forces no one to do vain or useless things. Wing. Max. 600; Broom, Max. 252; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 144; 2 Bingh. N. C. 121; 13 East 420; 15 Pick. 190; 7 Cush. 43, 393; 14 Gray 78; 7 Pa. 206; 3 Johns. 598. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

Lex neminem cogit ostendere quod nescire præsumitur. The law forces no one to make known what he is presumed not to know. Lofft 569.

Lex nemini facit injuriam. The law does wrong to no one. Branch, Princ.; 66 Pa. 157.

Lex nemini operatur iniquum, nemini facit injuriam. The law never works an injury, or does a wrong. Jenk. Cent. 22.

Lex nil facit frustra, nil jubet frustra. The law does nothing and commands nothing in vain. Broom, Max. 252; 3 Bulstr. 279; Jenk. Cent. 17.

Lex non cogit ad impossibilia. The law requires nothing impossible. Broom, Max. 242; Co. Litt. 231 b; Hob. 96; 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 851; 17 N. H. 411; 55 id. 211; 136 Mo. 227.

Lex non curat de minimis. The law does not regard small matters. Hob. 88.

Lex non deficit in justitia exhibenda. The law does not fail in showing justice. Jenk. Cent. 31.

Maxime ita dicta quia maxima est ejus dignitas et certissima auctoritas, atque quod maxime omnibus probetur. A maxim is so called because its dignity is chiefest, and its authority the most certain, and because universally approved by all. Co. Litt. 11.

Maxime paci sunt contraria vis et injuria. The greatest enemies to peace are force and wrong. Co. Litt. 161.

Maximus erroris populus magister. The people is the greatest master of error. Bacon, Max.

Melior est causa possidentis. The cause of the possessor is preferable. Dig. 50. 17. 126. 2.

Melior est conditio defendentis. The cause of the defendant is the better. Broom, Max. 715, 719; Dig. 50. 17, 126. 2; Hob. 199; 1 Mass. 66; 8 id. 307; 4 Cush. 405.

Melior est conditio possidentis et rei quam actoris. Better is the condition of the possessor and that of the defendant than that of the plaintiff. Broom, Max. 714, 719; 4 Inst. 180; Vaugh. 58, 60; Hob. 103; 3 Mass. 189.

Melior est conditio possidentis, ubi neuter jus habet. Better is the condition of the possessor where neither of the two has a right. Jenk. Cent. 118.

Melior est justitia vere præveniens quam severe puniens. That justice which justly prevents a crime is better than that which severely punishes it.

Meliorem conditionem suam facere potest minor, deteriorem nequaquam. A minor can improve or make his condition better, but never worse. Co. Litt. 337 b.

Melius est in tempore occurrere quam post causam vulneratum remedium quærere. It is better to meet a thing in time, than to seek a remedy after a wrong has been inflicted. 2 Inst. 299.

Melius est jus deficiens quam jus incertum. Law that is deficient is better than law that is uncertain. Lofft 395.

Melius est omnia mala pati quam malo consentire. It is better to suffer every wrong or ill, than to consent to it. 3 Inst. 23.

Melius est recurrere quam malo currere. It is better to recede than to proceed wrongly. 4 Inst. 176.

Mens testatoris in testamentis spectanda est. In wills, the intention of the testator is to be regarded. Jenk. Cent. 277.

Mentiri est contra mentem ire. To lie is to go against the mind. 3 Bulstr. 260.

Mercis appellatio ad res mobiles tantum pertinet. The term merchandise belongs to movable things only. Dig. 50. 16. 66.

Mercis appellatione homines non contineri. Under the name of merchandise men are not included. Dig. 50. 16. 207.

Merito beneficium legis amittit, qui legem ipsam subvertere intendit. He justly loses the protection of the law, who attempts to infringe the law. 2 Inst. 258.

Merx est quidquid vendi potest. Merchandise is whatever can be sold. 3 Metc. 367. See MERCHANDISE.

Meum est promittere, non dimittere. It is mine to promise, not to discharge. 2 Rolle 39.

Minatur innocentibus qui parcit nocentibus. He threatens the innocent who spares the guilty. 4 Co. 45.

Minima pœna corporalis est major qualibet pecuniaria. The smallest bodily punishment is greater than any pecuniary one. 2 Inst. 220.

Minime mutanda sunt quæ certam habuerunt interpretationem. Things which have had a certain interpretation are to be altered as little as possible. Co. Litt. 365.

Minimum est nihilo proximum. The least is next to nothing. Bacon, Arg. Low's Case of Tenures.

Minor ante tempus agere non potest in casu proprietatis, nec etiam convenire. A minor before majority cannot act in a case of property, nor even agree. 2 Inst. 291.

Minor jurare non potest. A minor cannot make oath. Co. Litt. 172 b. An infant cannot be sworn on a jury. Littleton 289.

Minor minorem custodire non debet; alios enim præsumitur male regere qui seipsum regere nescit. A minor ought not be guardian of a minor, for he is presumed to govern others ill who does not know how to govern himself. Co. Litt. 88.

Minor non tenetur respondere durante minori ætati; nisi in causa dotis, propter favorem. A minor is not bound to answer during his minority, except as a matter of favor in a cause of dower. 3 Bulstr. 143.

Minor, qui infra ætatem 12 annorum fuerit, utlagari non potest nec extra legem poni, quia ante talem ætatem, non est sub lege aliqua, nec in decenna. A minor who is under twelve years of age cannot be outlawed, nor placed without the laws, because before such age he is not under any laws, nor in a decennary. Co. Litt. 128.

Minor 17 annis non admittitur fore executorem. A minor under seventeen years of age is not admitted to be an executor. 6 Co. 67.

Minus solvit, qui tardius solvit; nam et tempore minus solvitur. He does not pay who pays too late; for; from the delay, he is judged not to pay. Dig. 50. 16. 12. 1.

Misera est servitus, ubi jus est vagum aut incertum. It is a miserable slavery where the law is vague or uncertain. 4 Inst. 246; 9 Johns. 427; 11 Pet. 286; Broom, Max. 150.

Mitius imperanti melius paretur. The more mildly one commands, the better is he obeyed. 3 Inst. 24.

Mobilia non habent situm. Movables have no situs. 4 Johns. Ch. 472.

Mobilia personam sequuntur, immobilia situm. Movable things follow the person; immovable, their locality. Story, Confl. L., 3d ed. 638; 166 U. S. 185; 165 id. 194; 49 La. Ann. 43.

Multa conceduntur per obliquum quæ non conceduntur de directo. Many things are conceded indirectly which are not allowed directly. 6 Co. 47.

Multa fidem promissa levant. Many promises lessen confidence. 11 Cush. 350.

Multa ignoramus quæ nobis non laterent si veterum lectio nobis fuit familiaris. We are ignorant of many things which would not be hidden from us if the reading of old authors were familiar to us. 10 Co. 73.

Multa in jure communi contra rationem disputandi pro communi utilitate introducta sunt. Many things have been introduced into the common law, with a view to the public good, which are inconsistent with sound reason. Co. Litt. 70; Broom, Max. 158; 2 Co. 75. See 3 Term 146; 7 id. 252.

Multa multo exercitatione facilius quam regulis percipies. You will perceive many things much more easily by practice than by rules. 4th Inst. 50.

Multa non vetat lex, quæ tamen tacite damnavit. The law fails to forbid many things which yet it has silently condemned.

Multa transeunt cum universitate quæ non per se transeunt. Many things pass as a whole which would not pass separately. Co. Litt. 12 a.

Multi multa, nemo omnia novit. Many men know many things, no one knows everything. 4 Inst. 348.

Multiplex et indistinctum parit confusionem; et questiones quo simpliciores, eo lucidiores. Multiplicity and indistinctness produce confusion: the more simple questions are, the more lucid they are. Hob. 335; Bart. Max. 70.

Multiplicata transgressione crescat pœnæ inflictio. The infliction of punishment should be in proportion to the increase of crime. 2 Inst. 479.

Multitudinem decem faciunt. Ten make a multitude. Co. Litt. 247.

Multitudo errantium non parit errori patrocinium. The multitude of those who err is no protection for error. 11 Co. 75.

Multitudo imperitorum perdit curiam. A multitude of ignorant practitioners destroys a court. 2 Inst. 219.

Multo utilius est pauca idonea effundere, quam multis inutilibus homines gravari. It is much more useful to pour forth a few useful things than to oppress men with many useless things. 4 Co. 20.

Natura appetit perfectum, ita et lex. Nature aspires to perfection, and so does the law. Hob. 144.

Natura fide jussionis sit strictissimi juris et non durat vel extendatur de re ad rem, de persona ad personam, de tempore ad tempus. The nature of the contract of suretyship is strictissimi juris, and cannot endure nor be extended from thing to thing, from person to person, or from time to time. Burge, Sur. 40.

Natura non facit saltum, ita nec lex. Nature makes no leap, nor does the law. Co. Litt. 238.

Natura non facit vacuum, nec lex supervacuum. Nature makes no vacuum, the law nothing purposeless. Co. Litt. 79.

Naturæ vis maxima; natura bis maxima. The force of nature is greatest; nature is doubly great. 2 Inst. 564.

Naturale est quidlibet dissolvi eo modo quo ligatur. It is natural for a thing to be unbound in the same way in which it was bound. Jenk. Cent. 66; 4 Denio 417; Broom, Max. 877.

Nec curia deficeret in justitia exhibenda. Nor should the court be deficient in showing justice. 4 Inst. 63.

Nec tempus nec locus occurrit regi. Neither time nor place bars the king. Jenk. Cent. 190.

Nec veniam effuso sanguine casus habet. Where blood is spilled, the case is unpardonable. 3 Inst. 57.

Nec veniam, læso numine, casus habet. Where the Divinity is insulted, the case is unpardonable. Jenk. Cent. 167.

Necessarium est quod non potest aliter se habere. That is necessary which cannot be otherwise.

Non differunt quæ concordant re, tametsi non in verbis iisdem. Those things which agree in substance, though not in the same words, do not differ. Jenk. Cent. 70.

Non dubitatur, etsi specialiter venditor evictionem non promiserit, re evicta, ex empto competere actionem. It is certain that although the vendor has not given a special guarantee, an action ex empto lies against him, if the purchaser is evicted. Code, 8. 45. 6. But see Doct. & Stud. b. 2, c. 47; Broom, Max. 768.

Non efficit affectus nisi sequatur effectus. The intention amounts to nothing unless some effect follows. 1 Rolle 236.

Non est arctius vinculum inter homines quam jusjurandum. There is no stronger link among men than an oath. Jenk. Cent. 126.

Non est certandum de regulis juris. There is no disputing about rules of law.

Non est disputandum contra principia negantem. There is no disputing against a man denying principles. Co. Litt. 343.

Non est justum aliquem antenatum post mortem facere bastardum, qui toto tempore vitæ suæ pro legitimo habebatur. It is not just to make an elderborn a bastard after his death, who during his lifetime was accounted legitimate. Bart. Max. 49; 12 Co. 44.

Non est novum ut priores leges ad posteriores trahantur. It is not a new thing that prior statutes shall give place to later ones. Dig. 1. 3. 26; 1. 1. 4; Broom, Max. 28.

Non est recedendum a communi observantia. There should be no departure from a common observance. 2 Co. 74.

Non est regula quin fallat. There is no rule but what may fail. Off. Ex. 212.

Non est reus nisi mens sit rea. One is not guilty unless his intention be guilty. This maxim is much criticised. See actus non reum facit, etc.; MENS REA.

Non ex opinionibus singulorum, sed ex communi usu, nomina exaudiri debent. Names of things ought to be understood according to common usage, not according to the opinions of individuals. Dig. 33. 10. 7. 2.

Non exemplis sed legibus judicandum est. Not by the facts of the case, but by the law must judgment be made. Dig. 7. 45. 13. (called by Albericus Gentilis lex aurea).

Non facias malum ut inde veniat bonum. You are not to do evil that good may come of it. 11 Co. 74 a.

Non impedit clausula derogatoria, quo minus ab eadem potestate res dissolvantur a qua constituuntur. A derogatory clause does not prevent things from being dissolved by the same power by which they were originally made. Bacon, Max. Reg. 19; Broom, Max. 27; 5 Watts 155.

Non in legendo sed in intelligendo leges consistunt. The laws consist, not in being read, but in being understood. 8 Co. 167.

Non jus ex regula, sed regula ex jure. The law does not arise from the rule (or maxim), but the rule from the law. Fleta vi. 14; Trayner, Max. 384.

Non jus, sed seisina facit stipitem. Not right, but seisin, makes a stock (from which the inheritance must descend). Fleta, l. 6, cc. 14, 2, § 2; Noy, Max., 9th ed. 72, n. (b); Broom, Max. 525; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 209; 1 Steph. Com. 365, 368, 394; 4 Kent 388; 4 Scott N. R. 468.

Non licet quod dispendio licet. That which is permitted only at a loss is not permitted to be done. Co. Litt. 127.

Omne actum ab intentione agentis est judicandum. Every act is to be estimated by the intention of the doer. Branch, Princ.

Omne crimen ebrietas et incendit et detegit. Drunkenness inflames and reveals every crime. Co. Litt. 247; Broom, Max. 17; Whart. Cr. L. § 48.

Omne jus aut consensus fecit, aut necessitas constituit, aut firmavit consuetudo. All law has been derived from consent, established by necessity, or confirmed by custom. Dig. 1. 3. 40; Broom, Max. 690, n.

Omne magis dignum trahit ad se minus dignum, quamvis minus dignum sit antiquius. Every worthier thing draws to it the less worthy, though the latter be more ancient. Co. Litt. 365.

Omne magnum exemplum habet aliquid ex iniquo, quod publica utilitate compensatur. Every great example has some portion of evil, which is compensated by its public utility. Hob. 279.

Omne majus continet in se minus. The greater contains in itself the less. 5 Co. 115 a; Wing. Max. 206; Story, Ag. § 172; Broom, Max. 174; 15 Pick. 397; 1 Gray 336.

Omne majus dignum continet in se minus dignum. The more worthy contains in itself the less worthy. Co. Litt. 143.

Omne majus minus in se complectitur. Every greater embraces in itself the minor. Jenk. Cent. 208.

Omne principale trahit ad se accessorium. Every principal thing draws to itself the accessory. 17 Mass. 425; 1 Johns. 580.

Omne quod solo inædificatur solo cedit. Every thing belongs to the soil which is built upon it. Dig. 41. 1. 7. 10; 47. 3. 1; Inst. 2. 1. 29; Broom, Max. 401; Fleta, l. 3, c. 2, § 12.

Omne sacramentum debet esse de certa scientia. Every oath ought to be founded on certain knowledge. 4 Inst. 279.

Omne testamentum morte consummatum est. Every will is consummated by death. 3 Co. 29 b; 4 id. 61 b; 2 Bla. Com. 500; Shep. Touch. 401; Broom, Max. 503.

Omnes actiones in mundo infra certa tempora habent limitationem. All actions in the world are limited within certain periods. Bract. 52.

Omnes licentiam habere his quæ pro se indulta sunt, renunciare. All have liberty to renounce those things which have been established in their favor. Code 2. 3. 29; 1. 3. 51; Broom, Max. 699.

Omnes prudentes illa admittere solent quæ probantur iis qui in arte sua bene versati sunt. All prudent men are accustomed to admit those things which are approved by those who are well versed in the art. 7 Co. 19.

Omnia delicta in aperto leviora sunt. All crimes committed openly are considered lighter. 8 Co. 127.

Omnia præsumuntur contra spoliatorem. All things are presumed against a wrong-doer. Broom, Max. 988; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 37; 5 Allen 172; 34 L. R. A. 561; 45 Pac. Rep. 1073.

Omnia præsumuntur legitime facta donec probetur in contrarium. All things are presumed to be done legitimately until the contrary is proved. Co. Litt. 232; Broom, Max. 948; 59 Pa. 68.

Omnia præsumuntur rite et solenniter esse acta. All things are presumed to have been rightly and regularly done. Co. Litt. 232 b; Broom, Max. 165, 949; 12 C. B. 788; 3 Exch. 191; 6 id. 716.

Omnia præsumuntur rite et solenniter esse acta donec probetur in contrarium. All things are presumed to have been done regularly and with due formality until the contrary is proved. Broom, Max. 944; 3 Bingh. 381; Camph. 44; 1 C. & M. 461; 17 C. B. 183; 5 B. & Ad. 550; 12 M. & W. 251; 12 Wheat. 69; 6 Binn. 447; 61 Vt. 449; 85 Va. 456; 70 Md. 546; 102 N. C. 284; 124 Pa. 280.

Omnia quæ jure contrahuntur, contrario jure pereunt. Obligations contracted under a law are destroyed by a law to the contrary. Dig. 50. 17. 100.

Omnia quæ sunt uxoris sunt ipsius viri. All things which are the wife's belong to the husband. Co. Litt. 112; 2 Kent 130, 143.

Omnia rite esse acta præsumuntur. All things are presumed to have been done in due form. Co. Litt. 6; Broom, Max. 944, n.; 11 Cush. 441; 13 Allen 397; 108 Mass. 425; 2 Ohio St. 246; 6 id. 298; 63 Minn. 170.

Omnis conclusio boni et veri judicii sequitur ex bonis et veris præmissis et dictis juratorum. Every conclusion of a good and true judgment arises from good and true premises, and the verdicts of jurors. Co. Litt. 226.

Omnis consensus tollit errorem. Every consent removes error. 2 Inst. 123.

Omnis definitio in jure civili periculosa est, parum est enim ut non subverti possit. Every definition in the civil law is dangerous, for there is very little that cannot be overthrown. (There is no rule in the civil law which is not liable to some exception; and the least difference in the facts of the case renders its application useless.) Dig. 50. 17. 202; 2 Woodd. Lect. 196.

Omnis exceptio est ipsa quoque regula. An exception is in itself also a rule.

Omnis indemnatus pro innoxis legibus habetur. Every uncondemned person is held by the law as innocent.

Omnis innovatio plus novitate perturbat quam utilitate prodest. Every innovation disturbs more by its novelty than it benefits by its utility. 2 Bulstr. 338; 1 Salk. 20; Broom, Max. 147; 62 Pa. 381.

Omnis interpretatio si fieri potest ita fienda est in instrumentis, ut omnes contrarietates amoveantur. The interpretation of instruments is to be made, if they will admit of it, so that all contradictions may be removed. Jenk. Cent. 96.

Omnis interpretatio vel declarat, vel extendit, vel restringit. Every interpretation either declares, extends, or restrains.

Omnis nova constitutio futuris temporibus formam imponere debet, non præteritis. Every new statute ought to set its stamp upon the future, not the past. Bract. 228; 2 Inst. 95.

Omnis persona est homo, sed non vicissim. Every person is a man, but not every man a person. Calvinus, Lex.

Omnis privatio præsupponit habitum. Every privation presupposes former enjoyment. Co. Litt. 339.

Omnis querela et omnis actio injuriarum limitata est infra certa tempora. Every plaint and every action for injuries is limited within certain times. Co. Litt. 114.

Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur. Every subsequent ratification has a retrospective effect, and is equivalent to a prior command. Co. Litt. 207 a; Story, Ag., 4th. ed. 102; Broom, Max. 757, 867; 8 Wheat. 363; 7 Exch. 726; 9 C. B. 532, 607; 5 Johns. Ch. 256; 57 Pa. 433; 111 N. Y. 295; 67 Fed. Rep. 49; 52 Me. 82; 69 Conn. 86.

Omnis regula suas patitur exceptiones. Every rule of law is liable to its own exceptions.

Omnium contributione sarciatur quod pro omnibus datum est. What is given for all shall be compensated for by the contribution of all. 4 Bingh. 121; 2 Marsh. 309.

Omnium rerum quarum usus est, potest esse abusus, virtute solo excepta. There may be an abuse of everything of which there is a use, virtue only excepted. Dav. 79.

Once a fraud, always a fraud. 13 Vin. Abr. 539.

Once a mortgage, always a mortgage. 1 Hill. R. P. 378; Bisph. Eq. § 153; 7 Watts 375; 67 Pa. 104; 22 Ind. 62. See MORTGAGE.

Once a recompense, always a recompense. 19 Vin. Abr. 277.

Once quit and cleared, ever quit and cleared. Skene de Verb. Sign., iter ad fin.

One may not do an act to himself.

Opinio quæ favet testamento est tenenda. That opinion is to be followed which favors the will.

Oportet quod certa res deducatur in judicium. A thing, to be brought to judgment, must be certain or definite. Jenk. Cent. 84; Bract. 15 b.

Oportet quod certa sit res quæ venditur. A thing, to be sold, must be certain or definite. Bract. 61.

Optima enim est legis interpres consuetudo. Usage is the best interpreter of law. 2 Inst. 18; Broom, Max. 931.

Optima est lex, quæ minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis, optimus judex qui minimum sibi. That is the best law which confides as little as possible to the discretion of the judge; he is the best judge who takes least upon himself. Bacon, Aph. 46; Broom, Max. 84; 76 Ga. 479.

Optima statuti interpretatrix est (omnibus particulis ejusdem inspectis) ipsum statutum. The best interpretress of a statute is (all the separate parts being considered) the statute itself. 8 Co. 117; Wing. Max. 299, max. 68.

Optimam esse legem, quæ minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis; id quod certitudo ejus præstat. That law is the best which leaves the least discretion to the judge; and this is an advantage which results from its certainty. Bacon, Aph. 8.

Optimus interpres rerum usus. Usage is the best interpreter of things. 2 Inst. 282; Broom, Max. 917, 920.

Optimus interpretandi modus est sic leges interpretare ut leges legibus accordant. The best mode of interpreting laws is to make them accord. 8 Co. 169.

Optimus judex, qui minimum sibi. He is the best judge who relies as little as possible on his own discretion. Bacon, Aph. 46; Broom, Max. 84.

Optimus legum interpres consuetudo. Usage is the best interpreter of laws. 4 Inst. 75; 2 Pars. Con., 8th ed. *541; Broom, Max. 685.

Ordine placitandi servato, servatur et jus. The order of pleading being preserved, the law is preserved. Co. Litt. 303; Broom, Max. 188.

Origine propria neminem posse voluntate sua eximi manifestum est. It is manifest that no one by his own will can renounce his origin (put off or discharge his natural allegiance). Code 10. 34. 4. See 1 Bla. Com. c. 10; 20 Johns. 313; 3 Pet. 122, 246; Broom, Max. 77.

Origo rei inspici debet. The origin of a thing ought to be inquired into. 1 Co. 99.

Pacta conventa quæ neque contra leges, neque dolo malo inita sunt, omni modo observanda sunt. Contracts which are not illegal, and do not originate in fraud, must in all respects be observed. Code 2. 3. 29; Broom, Max. 696, 732.

Pacta dant legem contractui. Agreements give the law to the contract. Halkers. Max. 118.

Pacta privata juri publico derogare non possunt. Private contracts cannot derogate from the public law. 7 Co. 23; 111 N. Y. 132.

Pacta quæ contra leges constitutionesque vel contra bonos mores fiunt nullam vim habere, indubitati juris est. It is indubitable law that contracts against the laws, or good morals, have no force. Code 2. 3. 6; Broom, Max. 695.

Pacta quæ turpem causam continent non sunt observanda. Contracts founded upon an immoral consideration are not to be observed. Dig. 2. 14. 27. 4; 2 Pet. 539; Broom, Max. 732.

Pactis privatorum juri publico non derogatur. Private contracts do not derogate from public law. Broom, Max. 695; per Dr. Lushington, Arg. 4 Cl. & F. 241; Arg. 3 id. 621.

Pacto aliquid licitum est, quod sine pacto non admittitur. By a contract something is permitted, which, without it, could not be admitted. Co. Litt. 166.

Par in parem imperium non habet. An equal has no power over an equal. Jenk. Cent. 174. Example: One of two judges of the same court cannot commit the other for contempt.

Parens est nomen generale ad omne genus cognationis. Parent is a general name for every kind of relationship. Co. Litt. 80; Littleton § 108; Mag. Cart. Joh. c. 50.

Parentum est liberos alere etiam nothos. It is the duty of parents to support their children even when illegitimate. Lofft 223.

Paria copulantur paribus. Similar things unite with similar.

Paribus sententiis reus absolvitur. When opinions are equal, a defendant is acquitted. 4 Inst. 64.

Parte quacumque integrante sublata, tollitur totum. An integral part being taken away, the whole is taken away. 8 Co. 41.

Partus ex legitimo thoro non certius noscit matrem quam genitorem suum. The offspring of a legitimate bed knows not his mother more certainly than his father. Fortescue, c. 42.

Partus sequitur ventrem. The offspring follow the condition of the mother. Inst. 2. 1. 19. (This is the law in the case of slaves and animals; but with regard to freemen, children follow the condition of the father.) Broom, Max. 516, n.; 13 Mass. 551; 18 Pick. 222; 85 Ala. 605.

Parum est latam esse sententiam, nisi mandetur executioni. It is not enough that judgment should be given unless it be committed to execution. Co. Litt. 289 b.

Parum proficit scire quid fieri debet si non cognoscas quomodo sit facturum. It avails little to know what ought to be done, if you do not know how it is to be done. 2 Inst. 503.

Pater is est quem nuptiæ demonstrant. The father is he whom the marriage points out. Bart. Leg. Max. 151; 1 Bla. Com. 446; 7 Mart. N. S. 548, 553; Dig. 2. 4. 5; Broom, Max. 516. See ACCESS.

Patria laboribus et expensis non debet fatigari. A jury ought not to be harassed by labors and expenses. Jenk. Cent. 6.

Patria potestas in pietate debet, non in atrocitate consistere. Paternal power should consist in affection, not in atrocity.

Peccata contra naturam sunt gravissima. Offences against nature are the most serious. 3 Inst. 20.

Peccatum peccato addit qui culpæ quam facit patrocinium defensionis adjungit. He adds one offence to another, who, when he commits a crime, joins to it the protection of a defence. 5 Co. 49.

Pendente lite nihil innovetur. During a litigation nothing should be changed. Co. Litt. 344. See 20 How. 106; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 406; 3 Johns. Ch. 441; 6 Barb. 33; 79 Cal. 123; see LIS PENDENS.

Per alluvionem id videtur adjici, quod ita paulatim adjicitur ut intelligere non possumus quantum quoque momento temporis adjiciatur. That is said to be added by alluvion which is so added little by little that we cannot tell how much is added at any one moment of time. Dig. 41. 1. 7. 1; Hale, de Jur. Mar. pars 1, c. 4; Fleta, l. 3, c. 2, § 6.

Per rationes perveniter ad legitimam rationem. By reasoning we come to legal reason. Littleton § 386.

Per rerum naturam, factum negantis nulla probatio est. It is in the nature of things that he who denies a fact is not bound to give proof.

Per varios actus, legem experientia facit. By various acts experience frames the law. 4 Inst. 50.

Perfectum est cui nihil deest secundum suæ perfectionis vel naturæ modum. That is perfect which wants nothing according to the measure of its perfection or nature. Hob. 151.

Periculosum est res novas et inusitatas inducere. It is dangerous to introduce new and unaccustomed things. Co. Litt. 379.

Periculum rei venditæ, nondum traditæ, est emptoris. The purchaser runs the risk of the loss of a thing sold, though not delivered. 2 Kent 498, 499; 4 B. & C. 481, 941.

Perjuri sunt qui servatis verbis juramenti decipiunt aures eorum qui accipiunt. They are perjured who, preserving the words of an oath, deceive the ears of those who receive it. 3 Inst. 166.

Perpetua lex est, nullam legem humanam ac positivam perpetuam esse; et clausula quæ abrogationem excludit ab initio non valet. It is a perpetual law that no human or positive law can be perpetual; and a clause in a law which precludes the power of abrogation is void ab initio. Bacon, Max. Reg. 19; Broom, Max. 27.

Perpetuities are odious in law and equity.

Persona conjuncta æquiparatur interesse proprio. The interest of a personal connection is sometimes regarded in law as that of the individual himself. Bacon, Max. Reg. 18; Broom. Max. 553, 587.

Persona est homo cum statu quodam consideratus. A person is a man considered with reference to a certain status. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. l. 1, tit. 3, § 75.

Personæ vice fungitur municipium et decuria. Towns and boroughs act as if persons. 23 Wend. 103, 144.

Perspicua vera non sunt probanda. Plain truths need not be proved. Co. Litt. 16.

Pirata est hostis humani generis. A pirate is an enemy of the human race. 3 Inst. 113.

Placita negativa duo exitum non faciunt. Two negative pleas do not form an issue. Lofft 415.

Plena et celeris justitia fiat partibus. Let full and speedy justice be done to the parties. 4 Inst. 67.

Pluralis numerus est duobus contentus. The plural number is contained in two. 1 Rolle 476.

Pluralities are odious in law.

Plures cohæredes sunt quasi unum corpus, propter unitatem juris quod habent. Several co-heirs are as one body, by reason of the unity of right which they possess. Co. Litt. 163.

Plures participes sunt quasi unum corpus, in eo quod unum jus habent. Several part-owners are as one body, by reason of the unity of their rights. Co. Litt. 164.

Plus exempla quam peccata nocent. Examples hurt more than offences.

Plus peccat auctor quam actor. The instigator of a crime is worse than he who perpetrates it. 5 Co. 99.

Plus valet unus oculatus testis, quam auriti decem. One eye-witness is better than ten ear-witnesses. 4 Inst. 279.

Plus vident oculi quam oculus. Several eyes see more than one. 4 Inst. 160.

Pœna ad paucos, metus ad omnes. Punishment to few, dread or fear to all.

Pœna ad paucos, metus ad omnes perveniat. If punishment be inflicted on a few, a dread comes to all.

Pœna ex delicto defuncti hæres teneri non debet. The heir ought not to be bound in a penalty inflicted for the crime of the ancestor. 2 Inst. 198.

Pœna non potest, culpa perennis erit. Punishment cannot be, crime will be, perpetual. 21 Vin. Abr. 271.

Pœna tolli potest, culpa perennis erit. The punishment can be removed, but the crime remains. 1 Park. Cr. Rep. 241. See PARDON.

Pœnæ potius molliendæ quam exasperandæ sunt. Punishments should rather be softened than aggravated. 3 Inst. 220.

Pœnæ sint restringendæ. Punishments should be restrained. Jenk. Cent. 29.

Pœnæ suos tenere debet actores et non alios. Punishment ought to be inflicted upon the guilty, and not upon others. Bract. 380 b; Fleta, l. 1, c. 38, § 12; l. 4, c. 17, § 17.

Politæ legibus non leges politiis adaptandæ. Politics are to be adapted to the laws, and not the laws to politics. Hob. 154.

Ponderantur testes, non numerantur. Witnesses are weighed, not counted. 1 Stark. Ev. 554; Best, Ev. 426, § 389; 14 Wend. 105, 109.

Posito uno oppositorum negatur alterum. One of two opposite positions being affirmed, the other is denied. 3 Rolle 422.

Possessio est quasi pedis positio. Possession is, as it were, the position of the foot. 3 Co. 42.

Possessio fratris de feodo simplici facit sororem esse hæredem. Possession of the brother in fee-simple makes the sister to be heir. 3 Co. 42; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 227; Broom, Max. 533.

Possessio pacifica pour anns 60 facit jus. Peaceable possession for sixty years gives a right. Jenk. Cent. 26.

Possession is a good title, where no better title appears. 20 Vin. Abr. 278.

Possession of the termor, possession of the reversioner.

Possessor has right against all men but him who has the very right.

Possibility cannot be on a possibility.

Posteriora derogant prioribus. Posterior things derogate from things prior. 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 90.

Posthumus pro nato habetur. A posthumous child is considered as though born (at the parent's death). 15 Pick. 258.

Postliminium fingit eum qui captus est in civitate semper fuisse. Postliminy feigns that he who has been captured has never left the state. Inst. 1. 12. 5; Dig. 49. 51.

Potentia debet sequi justitiam, non antecedere. Power ought to follow, not to precede, justice. 3 Bulstr. 199.

Potentia inutilis frustra est. Useless power is vain.

Potentia non est nisi ad bonum. Power is not conferred but for the public good.

Potest quis renunciare pro se et suis, jus quod pro se introductum est. A man may relinquish, for himself and those claiming under him, a right which was introduced for his own benefit. See 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 83.

Potestas stricte interpretatur. Power should be strictly interpreted. Jenk. Cent. 17.

Potestas suprema seipsum dissolvere potest, ligare non potest. Supreme power can dissolve, but cannot bind itself. Bacon, Max. Reg. 19.

Potior est conditio defendentis. Better is the condition of the defendant (than that of the plaintiff). Broom, Max. 740; Cowp. 343; 15 Pet. 471; 21 Pick. 289; 22 id. 186, 187; 107 Mass. 440.

Quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se inducto. Any one may renounce a right introduced for his own benefit. To this rule there are some exceptions. See Broom, Max. 699, 705; 3 Curt. C. C. 393; 1 Exch. 657; 31 L. J. Ch. 175; 9 Mass. 482; 3 Pick. 218; 12 Cush. 83; 5 Johns. Ch. 566.

Quisquis est qui velit jurisconsultus haberi, continuet studium, velit a quocunque doceri. Whoever wishes to be held a urisconsult, let him continually study, and desire to be taught by everybody.

Quo ligatur, eo dissolvitur. As a thing is bound, so it is unbound. 2 Rolle 21.

Quocumque modo velit, quocumque modo possit. In any way he wishes, in any way he can. 14 Johns. 484, 492.

Quod a quoque pœnæ nomine exactum est id eidem restituere nemo cogitur. That which has been exacted as a penalty no one is obliged to restore. Dig. 50. 17. 46.

Quod ab initio non valet, in tractu temporis non convalescet. What is not good in the beginning cannot be rendered good by time. Merlin, Rép. verb. Regle de Droit. (This, though true in general, is not universally so.) 4 Co. 26; Broom, Max. 178; 5 Pick. 27.

Quod ad jus naturale attinet, omnes homines æquales sunt. All men are equal as far as the natural law is concerned. Dig. 50. 17. 32.

Quod ædificatur in area legata cedit legato. Whatever is built upon land given by will passes with the gift of the land. Amos & F. Fixtures 246; Broom, Max. 434.

Quod alias bonum et justum est, si per vim vel fraudem petatur, malum et injustum efficitur. What is otherwise good and just, if sought by force or fraud, becomes bad and unjust. 3 Co. 78.

Quod alias non fuit licitum necessitas licitum facit. Necessity makes that lawful which otherwise were unlawful. Fleta, l. 5, c. 23, § 14.

Quod approbo non reprobo. What I approve I do not disapprove. Broom, Max. 712.

Quod attinet ad jus civile, servi pro nullis habentur, non tamen et jure naturali, quia, quod ad jus naturale attinet, omnes homines æquali sunt. So far as the civil law is concerned, slaves are not reckoned as persons, but not so by natural law, for so far as regards natural law all men are equal. Dig. 50. 17. 32.

Quod constat clare, non debet verificari. What is clearly apparent need not be proved. 10 Mod. 150.

Quod constat curiæ opere testium non indiget. What appears to the court needs not the help of witnesses. 2 Inst. 662.

Quod contra juris rationem receptum est, non est producendum ad consequentias. What has been admitted against the reason of the law, ought not to be drawn into precedents. Dig. 50. 17. 141; 12 Co. 75.

Quod contra legem fit, pro infecto habetur. What is done contrary to the law, is considered as not done. 4 Co. 31. (No one can derive any advantage from such an act.)

Quod datum est ecclesiæ, datum est Deo. What is given to the church is given to God. 2 Inst. 590.

Quod demonstrandi causa additur rei satis demonstratæ, frustra fit. What is added to a thing sufficiently palpable, for the purpose of demonstration, is vain. 10 Co. 113.

Quod dubitas, ne feceris. When you doubt about a thing, do not do it. 1 Hale, P. C. 310; Broom, Max. 326, n.

Quod enim semel aut bis existit, præterenut legislatores. That which never happens but once or twice, legislators pass by. Dig. 1. 3. 17.

Quod est ex necessitate nunquam introducitur, nisi quando necessarium. What is introduced of necessity, is never introduced except when necessary. 2 Rolle 512.

Quod est inconveniens, aut contra rationem non permissum est in lege. What is inconvenient or contrary to reason, is not allowed in law. Co. Litt. 178.

Quod est necessarium est licitum. What is necessary is lawful. Jenk. Cent. 76.

Quod fieri debet facile præsumitur. That is easily presumed which ought to be done. Halkers. Max. 153, Broom, Max. 182, 297.

Quod fieri non debet, factum valet. What ought not to be done, when done, is valid. 5 Co. 38; 12 Mod. 438; 6 M. & W. 58; 9 id. 636.

Quod in jure scripto "jus" appellatur, id in lege Angliæ "rectum" esse dicitur. What in the civil law is called "jus," in the law of England is said to be "rectum" (right). Co. Litt 260; Fleta, l. 6, c. 1, § 1.

Quod in minori valet, valebit in majori; et quod in majori non valet, nec valebit in minori. What avails in the less, will avail in the greater; and what will not avail in the greater, will not avail in the less. Co. Litt. 260.

Quod in uno similium valet, valebit in altero. What avails in one of two similar things, will avail in the other. Co. Litt. 191.

Quod inconsulto fecimus, consultius revocemus. What is done without consideration or reflection, upon better consideration we should revoke or undo. Jenk. Cent. 116.

Quod initio non valet, tractu temporis non valet. A thing void in the beginning does not become valid by lapse of time. 1 S. & R. 58.

Quod initio vitiosum est non potest tractu temporis convalescere. Time cannot render valid an act void in its origin. Dig. 50. 17. 29; Broom, Max. 178.

Quod ipsis, qui contraxerunt, obstat, et successoribus eorum obstabit. That which bars those who have contracted will bar their successors also. Dig. 50. 17. 108.

Quod jussu alterius solvitur pro eo est quasi ipsi solutum esset. That which is paid by the order of another is, so far as such person is concerned, as if it had been paid to himself. Dig. 50. 17. 180.

Quod meum est, sine facto sive defectu meo amitti seu in alium transferri non potest. That which is mine cannot be lost or transferred to another without mine own act or default. 8 Co. 98; Broom, Max. 465; 1 Prest. Abstr. 147, 318.

Quod meum est sine me auferri non potest. What is mine cannot be taken away without my consent. Jenk. Cent. 251. But see EMINENT DOMAIN.

Quod minus est in obligationem videtur deductum. That which is the less is held to be imported into the contract (e. g. A offers to hire B's house at six hundred dollars, at the same time B offers to let it for five hundred dollars; the contract is for five hundred dollars). 1 Story, Contr. 481.

Quod naturalis ratio inter omnes homines constituit, vocatur jus gentium. That which natural reason has established among all men, is called the law of nations. Dig. 1. 1. 9; Inst. 1. 2. 1; 1 Bla. Com. 43.

Quod necessarie intelligitur id non deest. What is necessarily understood is not wanting. 1 Bulstr. 71.

Quod necessitas cogit, defendit. What necessity forces, it justifies. Hale, P. C. 54.

Quod non apparet non est, et non apparet judicialiter ante judicium. What appears not does not exist, and nothing appears judicially before judgment. 2 Inst. 479; Broom, Max. 164; Jenk. Cent. 207; arg. 55 Pa. 57.

Quod non capit Christus, capit fiscus. What the church does not take, the treasury takes. Year B. 19 Hen. VI. 1.

Quod non habet principium non habet finem. What has no beginning has no end. Co. Litt. 345; Broom, Max. 180.

Quod non legitur, non creditur. What is not read is not believed. 4 Co. 304.

Quod non valet in principali, in accessorio seu consequenti non valebit; et quod non valet in magis propinquo, non valebit in magis remoto. What is not good as to things principal, will not be good as to accessories or consequences; and what is not of force as regards things near will not be of force as to things remote. 8 Co. 78.

Quod nullius esse potest, id ut alicujus fieret nulla obligatio valet efficere. No agreement can avail to make that the property of any one which cannot be acquired as property. Dig. 50. 17. 182.

Quod nullius est, est domini regis. That which belongs to nobody belongs to our lord the king. Fleta lii. 12; Broom, Max. 354; Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (B); 2 Bla. Com. 260.

Quod nullius est id ratione naturali occupanti conceditur. What belongs to no one, by natural reason belongs to the first occupant. 2 Inst. 2. 1. 12; 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 491; Broom, Max. 353.

Quod nullum est, nullum producit effectum. That which is null produces no effect. Trayner, Max. 519.

Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus debet supportari. That which concerns all ought to be supported by all. 3 How. St. Tr. 818, 1087.

Quod per me non possum, nec per alium. What I cannot do in person, I cannot do through the agency of another. 4 Co. 24 b; 11 id. 87 a.

Quod per recordum probatum, non debet esse negatum. What is proved by the record, ought not to be denied.

Quod populus postremum jussit, id jus ratum esto. What the people have last enacted, let that be the established law. 1 Bla. Com. 89; 12 Allen 434.

Quod principi placuit, legis habet vigorem; ut pote cum lege regia, quæ de imperio ejus lata est, populus ei et in eum omne suum imperium et potestatem conferat. The will of the emperor has the force of law; for, by the royal law which has been made concerning his authority, the people have conferred upon him all its sovereignty and power. Dig. 1. 4. 1; Inst. 1. 2. 1; Fleta, l. 1, c. 17, § 7; Brac. 107; Selden, Diss. ad Flet. c. 3, § 2.

Quod prius est verius est; et quod prius est tempore potius est jure. What is first is truest; and what comes first in time is best in law. Co. Litt. 347.

Quod pro minore licitum est, et pro majore licitum est. What is lawful in the less is lawful in the greater. 8 Co. 43.

Quod pure debetur præsenti die debetur. That which is due unconditionally is due now. Trayner, Max. 519.

Quod quis ex culpa sua damnum sentit, non intelligitur damnum sentire. He who suffers a damage by his own fault is not held to suffer damage. Dig. 50. 17. 203.

Quod quis sciens indebitum dedit hac mente, ut postea repeteret, repetere non potest. What one has paid knowing it not to be due, with the intention of recovering it back, he cannot recover back. Dig. 2. 6. 50.

Quod quisquis norit in hoc se exerceat. Let every one employ himself in what he knows. 11 Co. 10.

Quod remedio destituitur ipsa re valet si culpa absit. What is without a remedy is by that very fact valid if there be no fault. Bacon, Max. Reg. 9; 3 Bla. Com. 20; Broom, Max. 212.

Quod semel aut bis existit præstereunt legislatores. Legislators pass over what happens (only) once or twice. Dig. 1. 3. 6; Broom, Max. 46.

Quod semel meum est amplius meum esse non potest. What is once mine cannot be mine more completely. Co. Litt. 49 b; Shep. Touch. 212; Broom, Max. 465, n.

Quod semel placuit in electione, amplius displicere non potest. That which in making his election a man has once been pleased to choose, he cannot afterwards quarrel with. Co. Litt. 146; Broom, Max. 295.

Quod solo inædificatur solo cedit. Whatever is built on the soil is an accessory of the soil. Inst. 2. 1. 29; 16 Mass. 449; 2 Bouv. Inst. n. 1571.

Quod sub certa forma concessum vel reservatum est, non trahitur ad valorem vel compensationem. That which is granted or reserved under a certain form, is not to be drawn into valuation or compensation. Bacon, Max. Reg. 4; Broom, Max. 464.

Quod subintelligitur non deest. What is understood is not wanting. 2 Ld. Raym. 832.

Quod tacite intelligitur deesse non videtur. What is tacitly understood does not appear to be wanting. 4 Co. 22.

Quod vanum et inutile est, lex non requirit. The law does not require what is vain and useless. Co. Litt. 319.

Quod vero contra rationem juris receptum est, non est producendum ad consequentias. But that which has been admitted contrary to the reason of the law, ought not to be drawn into precedents. Dig. 1. 3. 14; Broom, Max. 158.

Quodcunque aliquis ob tutelam corporis sui fecerit jure id fecisse videtur. Whatever one does in defence of his person, that he is considered to have done legally. 2 Inst. 590.

Quodque dissolvitur eodem modo quo ligatur. In the same manner that a thing is bound, it is unbound. 5 Rolle 39; Broom, Max. 881; 2 M. & G. 729.

Quo modo quid constituitur eodem modo dissolvitur. In whatever mode a thing is constituted, in the same manner is dissolved. Jenk. Cent. 74.

Quorum prætextu nec auget nec minuit sententiam, sed tantum confirmat præmissa. "Quorum prætextu" neither increases nor diminishes the meaning, but only confirms that which went before. Plowd. 52.

Quotiens dubia interpretatio libertatis est, secundum libertatem respondendum erit. Whenever there is a doubt between liberty and slavery, the decision must be in favor of liberty. Dig. 50. 17. 20.

Quotiens idem sermo duas sententias exprimit, ea potissimum accipiatur, quæ rei gerendæ aptior est. Whenever the same words express two meanings, that is to be taken which is the better fitted for carrying out the proposed end. Dig. 50. 17. 67.

Quoties in stipulationibus ambigua oratio est, commodissimum est id accipi quo res de quo agitur in tuto sit. Whenever in stipulations the expression is ambiguous, it is most proper to give it that interpretation by which the subject-matter may be in safety. Dig. 41. 1. 80; 50. 16. 219.

Quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba expressa fienda est. When there is no ambiguity in the words, then no exposition contrary to the words is to be made. Co. Litt. 147; Broom, Max. 619; 8 Mass. 201.

Quum de lucro duorum quæratur, melior est conditio possidentis. When the gain of one or two is in question, the condition of the possessor is the better. Dig. 50. 17. 126. n.

Quum in testamento ambigue aut etiam perperam scriptum est, benigne interpretari et secundum id quod credibile est cogitatum, credendum est. When in a will an ambiguous or even an erroneous expression occurs, it should be construed liberally and in accordance with what is thought the probable meaning of the testator. Dig. 34. 5. 24; Broom, Max. 567. See Brisson, Perperam.

Quum principalis causa non consistit ne ea quidem quæ sequuntur locum habent. When the principal cause does not hold its ground, neither do the accessories find place. Dig. 50. 17. 129. 1; Broom, Max. 496; 1 Pothier, Obl. 418.

Ratihabitio mandato æquiparatur. Ratification is equal to a command. Dig. 46. 3. 12. 4; Broom, Max. 867; 20 Pick. 95.

Ratio est formalis causa consuetudinis. Reason is the source and mould of custom.

Ratio est legis anima, mutata legis ratione mutatur et lex. Reason is the soul of the law; the reason of the law being changed, the law is also changed. 7 Co. 7.

Ratio et auctoritas duo clarissima mundi lumina. Reason and authority are the two brightest lights in the world. 4 Inst. 320.

Ratio in jure æquitas integra. Reason in law is perfect equity.

Ratio legis est anima legis. The reason of the law is the soul of the law. Jenk. Cent. 45.

Ratio non clauditur loco. Reason is not confined to any place.

Ratio postest allegari deficiente lege, sed vera et legalis et non apparens. Reason may be alleged when the law is defective, but it must be true and legal reason, and not merely apparent. Co. Litt. 191.

Re, verbis, scripto, consensu, traditione, junctura vestes sumere pacta solent. Compacts usually take their clothing from the thing itself, from words, from writings, from consent, from delivery. Plowd. 161.

Receditur a placitis juris potius quam injuriæ et delicta maneant impunita. Positive rules of law will be receded from rather than that crimes and wrongs should remain unpunished. Bacon, Max. Reg. 12; Broom, Max. 10. (This applies only to such maxims as are called placita juris; these will be dispensed with rather than crimes should go unpunished, quia salus populi suprema lex, because the public safety is the supreme law.)

Records sunt vestigia vetustatis et veritatis. Records are vestiges of antiquity and truth. 2 Rolle 206.

Recurrendum est ad extraordinarium quando non valet ordinarium. We must have recourse to what is extraordinary when what is ordinary fails.

Reddenda singula singulis. Let each be put in its proper place; that is, that the words should be taken distributively. 2 Johns. Ch. 614; 3 Dist. Rep. Pa. 344; 12 Pick. 291; 18 id. 228.

Regula est, juris quidem ignorantiam cuique nocere, facti vero ignorantiam non nocere. The rule is, that ignorance of the law does not excuse, but that ignorance of a fact may excuse a party from the legal consequences of his conduct. Dig. 22. 6. 9; Broom, Max. 253. See Irvine, Civ. Law 74.

Regula pro lege, si deficit lex. In default of the law, the maxim rules.

Regulariter non valet pactum de re mea non alienanda. Regularly a contract not to alienate my property is not binding. Co. Litt. 223.

Rei turpis nullum mandatum est. A mandate of an illegal thing is void. Dig. 17. 1. 6. 3.

Reipublicæ interest voluntates defunctorum effectum sortiri. It concerns the state that the wills of the dead should have their effect.

Relatio est fictio juris et intenta ad unum. Relation is a fiction of law, and intended for one thing. 3 Co. 28.

Relatio semper fiat ut valeat dispositio. Reference should always be had in such a manner that a disposition in a will may avail. 6 Co. 76.

Relation never defeats collateral acts. 18 Vin. Abr. 292.

Relation shall never make good a void grant or devise of the party. 18 Vin. Abr. 292.

Relative words refer to the next antecedent, unless the sense be thereby impaired. Noy, Max. 4; Wing. Max. 19; Broom, Max. 606; Jenk. Cent. 180.

Relativorum cognito uno, cognoscitur et alterum. Of things relating to each other, one being known, the other is known. Cro. Jac. 539.

Remainder can depend upon no estate but what beginneth at the same time the remainder doth.

Remainder must vest at the same instant that the particular estate determines.

Remainder to a person not of a capacity to take at the time of appointing it, is void. Plowd. 27.

Remedies for rights are ever favorably extended. 18 Vin. Abr. 321.

Remedies ought to be reciprocal.

Remissius imperanti melius paretur. A man commanding not too strictly is better obeyed. 3 Inst. 233.

Remoto impedimento, emergit actio. The impediment being removed, the action arises. 5 Co. 76; Wing. Max. 20.

Rent must be reserved to him from whom the state of the land moveth. Co. Litt. 143.

Repellitur a sacramento infamis. An infamous person is repelled or prevented from taking an oath. Co. Litt. 158; Bract. 185.

Repellitur exceptione cedendarum actionum. He is defeated by the plea that the actions have been assigned. 1 Johns. Ch. 409, 414.

Reprobata pecunia liberat solventem. Money refused releases the debtor. 9 Co. 79. But this must be understood with a qualification. See TENDER.

Reputatio est vulgaris opinio ubi non est veritas. Reputation is a common opinion where there is no certain knowledge. 4 Co. 107. But see CHARACTER.

Rerum ordo confunditur, si unicuique jurisdictio non servatur. The order of things is confounded if every one preserves not his jurisdiction. 4 Inst. Proem.

Rerum progressu ostendunt multa, quæ in initio præcaveri seu prævideri non possunt. In the course of events many mischiefs arise which at the beginning could not be guarded against or foreseen. 6 Co. 40.

Rerum suarum quilibet est moderator et arbiter. Every one is the manager and disposer of his own matters. Co. Litt. 223.

Res accendent lumina rebus. One thing throws light upon others. 4 Johns. Ch. 149.

Res accessoria sequitur rem principalem. An accessory follows its principal. Broom, Max. 491. (For a definition of res accessoria, see Mack. Civ. Law 155.)

Res denominatur a principaliori parte. A thing is named from its principal part. 5 Co. 47.

Res est misera ubi jus est vagum et incertum. It is a miserable state of things where the law is vague and uncertain. 2 Salk. 512.

Res generalem habet significationem, quia tam corporea, quam incorporea, cujuscunque sunt generis, naturæ sive speciei, comprehendit. The word things has a general signification, because it comprehends as well corporeal as incorporeal objects, of whatever sort, nature, or species. 3 Inst. 482; 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 415.

Res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet. Things done between strangers ought not to injure those who are not parties to them. Co. Litt. 132; Broom, Max. 954, 967; 3 Curt. C. C. 403; 11 Q. B. 1023; 57 N. H. 369; Freem. Judg. § 154; 110 Ala. 572.

Res inter alios judicatæ nullum aliis præjudicium faciunt. Matters adjudged in a cause do not prejudice those who were not parties to it. Dig. 44. 2. 1.

Res judicata facit ex albo nigrum, ex nigro album, ex curvo rectum, ex recto curvum. A thing adjudged makes white, black; black, white; the crooked, straight; the straight, crooked. 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 840.

Res judicata pro veritate accipitur. A thing adjudged must be taken for truth. Dig. 50. 17. 207; Co. Litt. 103; Broom, Max. 328, 333, 945; 2 Kent 120; 13 M. & W. 679; 59 Pa. 68. See RES JUDICATA.

Res nullius naturaliter fit primi occupantis. A thing which has no owner naturally belongs to the first finder. See FINDER.

Res per pecuniam æstimatur, et non pecunia per res. The value of a thing is estimated by its worth in money, and the value of money is not estimated by reference to the thing. 9 Co. 76; 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 922.

Res perit domino suo. The destruction of the thing is the loss of its owner. Hare, Contr. 88; Story, Bailm. 426; 2 Kent 591; Broom, Max. 238; 12 Allen 381; 14 id. 269. This maxim is said to be quoted chiefly in cases to which it did not apply in the Roman Law; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 106. See SALE.

Res propria est quæ communis non est. A thing is private which is not common. 8 Paige 261, 270.

Res quæ intra præsidia perductæ nondum sunt, quanquam ab hostibus occupatæ, ideo postliminii non egent, quia dominum nondum maturunt ex gentium jure. Things which have not yet been introduced within the enemy's lines, although held by the enemy, do not need the fiction of postliminy on this account, because their ownership by the law of nations has not yet changed. Grotius, de Jur. Bell. l. 3, c. 9, § 16; l. 3, c. 6, § 3.

Res sacra non recipit æstimationem. A sacred thing does not admit of valuation. Dig. 1. 8. 9. 5.

Res sua nemini servit. No one can have a servitude over his own property. Trayner, Max. 541.

Res transit cum suo onere. The thing passes with its burden. Fleta, l. 3, c. 10, § 3.

Reservatio non debet esse de proficuis ipsis quia ea conceduntur, sed de redditu novo extra proficua. A reservation ought not to be of the annual increase itself, because it is granted, but of new rent apart from the annual increase. Co. Litt. 142.

Resignatio est juris proprii spontanea refutatio. Resignation is the spontaneous relinquishment of one's own right. Godb. 284.

Resoluto jure concedentis, resolvitur jus concessum. The right of the grantor being extinguished, the right granted is extinguished. Mack. Civ. Law 179; Broom, Max. 467.

Respiciendum est judicanti, nequid aut durius aut remissius constituatur quam causa deposcit; nec enim aut severitatis aut clementiæ gloria affectanda est. It is a matter of import to one adjudicating that nothing should be either more severely or more leniently construed than the cause itself demands: for the glory neither of severity nor clemency should be affected. 3 Inst. 220.

Respondeat raptor, qui ignorare non potuit quod pupillum alienum abduxit. Let the ravisher answer, for he could not be ignorant that he has taken away another's ward. Hob. 99.

Respondeat superior. Let the principal answer. Broom, Max. 7, 69, 268, 269, n. 843; 4 Inst. 114; 1 Salk. 408; 1 Bingh. N. C. 418; 4 Maule & S. 259; 19 Exch.

Responsio unius non omnino auditur. The answer of one witness shall not be heard at all. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 260. (This is a maxim of the civil law, where everything must be proved by two witnesses.)

Reus excipiendo fit actor. The defendant by a plea becomes plaintiff. Bannier, Tr. des preuves, §§ 152, 320; Best, Evid. 294, § 252.

Reus læsæ majestatis punitur, ut pereat unus ne pereant omnes. A traitor is punished that one may die lest all perish. 4 Co. 124.

Rex non debet esse sub homine sed sub Deo et lege. The king should not be under the authority of man, but of God and the law. Broom, Max. 47, 117; Bract. 5.

Rex non potest fallere nec falli. The king cannot deceive or be deceived. Grounds & Rud. of Law 438.

Rex non potest peccare. The king can do no wrong. 2 Rolle 304; Jenk. Cent. 9, 308; Broom, Max. 53; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 246.

Rex nunquam moritur. The king never dies. Broom, Max. 50; Branch, Max. 5th ed. 197; 1 Bla. Com. 249.

Rights never die.

Riparum usus publicus est jure gentium, sicut ipsius fluminis. The use of river-banks is by the law of nations public, like that of the stream itself. Dig. 1. 8. 5. pr.; Fleta, l. 3, c. 1, § 5; Loccenius de Jur. Mar. l. 1, c. 6, § 12; 3 Kent 425.

Roy n'est lie per ascun statute, si il ne soit expressement nosme. The king is not bound by any statute, if he is not expressly named. Jenk. Cent. 307; Broom, Max. 72.

Sacramentum habet in se tres comites, veritatem, justitiam et judicium: veritas habenda est in jurato; justitia et judicium in judice. An oath has in it three component parts—truth, justice, and judgment: truth in the party swearing, justice and judgment in the judge administering the oath. 3 Inst. 160.

Sacramentum si fatuum fuerit, licet falsum, tamen non committit perjurium. A foolish oath, though false, makes not perjury. 2 Inst. 167.

Sacrilegus omnium prædonum cupiditatem et scelerem superat. A sacrilegious person transcends the cupidity and wickedness of all other robbers. 4 Co. 106.

Sæpe constitutum est, res inter alios judicatas aliis non præjudicare. It has often been settled that matters adjudged between others ought not to prejudice those who were not parties. Dig. 42. 1. 63.

Sæpe viatorem nova non vetus orbita fallit. Often it is the new track, not the old one, which deceives the traveller. 4 Inst. 84.

Sæpenumero ubi proprietas verborum attenditur, sensus veritatis amittitur. Frequently where the propriety of words is attended to, the meaning of truth is lost. 7 Co. 27.

Salus populi est suprema lex. The safety of the people is the supreme law. Bacon, Max. Reg. 12; Broom, Max. 1, 10, 287, n.; 18 Co. 139; 8 Metc. 465; 12 id. 89; 116 Mass. 260; 97 N. C. 477.

Salus reipublicæ suprema lex. The safety of the state is the supreme law. 4 Cush. 71; 1 Gray 386; Broom, Max. 366.

Salus ubi multi consilia. In many counsellors there is safety. 4 Inst. 1.

Sanguinis conjunctio benevolentia devincit homines et caritate. A tie of blood overcomes men through benevolence and family affection. 5 Johns. Ch. 1, 13.

Sapiens incipit a fine, et quod primum est in intentione, ultimum est in executione. A wise man begins with the last, and what is first in intention is last in execution. 10 Co. 25.

Sapiens omnia agit cum consilio. A wise man does everything advisedly. 4 Inst. 4.

Sapientia legis nummario pretio non est æstimanda. The wisdom of the law cannot be valued by money. Jenk. Cent. 168.

Sapientis judicis est cogitare tantum sibi esse permissum, quantum commissum et creditum. It is the duty of a wise judge to think so much only permitted to him as is committed and intrusted to him. 4 Inst. 163.

Satisfaction should be made to that fund which has sustained the loss. 4 Bouv. Inst. n. 3731.

Satius est petere fontes quam sectari rivulos. It is better to seek the fountain than to follow rivulets. 10 Co. 118.

Scienti et volenti non fit injuria. A wrong is not done to one who knows and assents to it. Bract. 20.

Scientia sciolorum est mixta ignorantia. The knowledge of smatterers is mixed ignorance. 8 Co. 159.

Scientia utrinque par pares contrahentes facit. Equal knowledge on both sides makes the contracting parties equal. 3 Burr. 1910; L. R. 2 Q. B. 589; Broom, Max. 772, 792, n.

Scire debes cum quo contrahis. You ought to know with whom you deal. 11 M. & W. 405, 682; 13 id. 171.

Scire et scire debere æquiparantur in jure. To know a thing, and to be bound to know it, are regarded in law as equivalent. Trayner, Max. 551.

Scire leges, non hoc est verba earum tenere, sed vim et potestatem. To know the laws, is not to observe their mere words, but their force and power. Dig. 1. 3. 17.

Scire proprie est rem ratione et per causam cognoscere. To know properly is to know a thing by its cause and in its reason. Co. Litt. 183.

Scribere est agere. To write is to act. 2 Rolle 89; 4 Bla. Com. 80; Broom, Max. 313, 967.

Scriptæ obligationes scriptis tolluntur, et nudi consensus obligatio, contrario consensu dissolvitur. Written obligations are dissolved by writing, and the obligations of a naked agreement by a naked agreement to the contrary.

Secta est pugna civilis, sicut actores armantur actionibus, et quasi accinguntur gladiis, ita rei (e contra) muniuntur exceptionibus, et defenduntur quasi clypeis. A suit is a civil battle, as the plaintiffs are armed with actions and as it were girt with swords, so on the other hand the defendants are fortified with pleas, and defended as it were by shields. Hob. 30; Bract. 339 b.

Secta quæ scripto nititur a scripto variari non debet. A suit which relies upon a writing ought not to vary from the writing. Jenk. Cent. 65.

Secundum naturam est, commoda cujusque rei eum sequi, quem sequuntur incommoda. It is natural that he who bears the charge of a thing should receive the profits. Dig. 50. 17. 10.

Securius expediuntur negotia commissa pluribus, et plus vident oculi quam oculus. Business intrusted to several speeds best, and several eyes see more than one. 4 Co. 46.

Seisina facit stipitem. Seisin makes the stock. 2 Bla. Com. 209; Broom, Max. 525, 528; 1 Steph. Com. 367; 4 Kent 388, 389; 13 Ga. 238.

Semel civis semper civis. Once a citizen always a citizen. Trayner, Max. 555.

Semel malus semper præsumitur esse malus in eodem genere. Whoever is once bad is presumed to be so always in the same degree. 1 Ro. Car. 317.

Semper in dubiis benigniora præferenda sunt. In dubious cases the more liberal constructions are always to be preferred. Dig. 50. 17. 56.

Semper in dubiis id agendum est, ut quam tutissimo loco res sit bona fide contracta, nisi quum aperte contra leges scriptum est. Always in doubtful cases that is to be done by which a bona fide contract may be in the greatest safety, except when its provisions are clearly contrary to law. Dig. 34. 5. 21.

Semper in obscuris quod minimum est sequimur. In obscure cases we always follow that which is least obscure. Dig. 50. 17. 9; Broom, Max. 687, n.; 3 C. B. 962.

Semper in stipulationibus et in cæteris contractibus id sequimur quod actum est. In stipulations and other contracts we always follow that which was agreed. Dig. 50. 17. 34.

Semper ita fiat relatio ut valeat dispositio. Let the reference always be so made that the disposition may avail. 6 Co. 76.

Semper necessitas probandi incumbit ei qui agit. The claimant is always bound to prove (the burden of proof lies on him).

Semper præsumitur pro legitimatione puerorum, et filiatio non potest probari. The presumption is always in favor of legitimacy, for filiation cannot be proved. Co. Litt. 126. See 5 Co. 98 b.

Semper præsumitur pro negante. The presumption is always in favor of the one who denies. See 10 Cl. & F. 534; 3 E. & B. 723; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 400.

Semper præsumitur pro sententia. Presumption is always in favor of a judgment. 3 Bulstr. 42.

Semper qui non prohibet pro se intervenire, mandare creditur. He who does not prohibit the intervention of another in his behalf is supposed to authorize it. 2 Kent 616; Dig. 14. 6. 16; 43. 3. 12. 4.

Semper sexus masculinus etiam fœmininum con tinet. The male sex always includes the female. Dig. 32, 62; 2 Brev. 9.

Semper specialia generalibus insunt. Special clauses are always comprised in general ones. Dig. 50. 17. 147.

Senatores sunt partes corporis regis. Senators are part of the body of the king. Staunf. 72 E; 4 Inst. 53, in marg.

Sensus verborum est anima legis. The meaning of words is the spirit of the law. 5 Co. 2.

Sensus verborum est duplex, mitis et asper, et verba semper accipienda sunt in mitiore sensu. The meaning of words is twofold, mild and harsh; and words are to be received in their milder sense. 4 Co. 13.

Sensus verborum ex causa dicendi accipiendus est, et sermones semper accipiendi sunt secundum subjectam materiam. The sense of words is to be taken from the occasion of speaking them, and discourses are always to be interpreted according to the subject-matter. 4 Co. 14.

Sententia a non judice lata nemini debet nocere. A judgment pronounced by one who is not a judge should not harm any one. Fleta, l. 6, c. 6, § 7.

Sententia contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatam. A sentence against marriage never passes into a judgment (conclusive upon the parties). 7 Co. 43.

Sententia facit jus, et legis interpretatio legis vim obtinet. The judgment makes the law, and the interpretation has the force of law.

Sententia facit jus, et res judicata pro veritate accipitur. Judgment creates the right, and what is adjudicated is taken for truth. Ellesm. Postn. 55.

Sententia interlocutoria revocari potest, definitiva non potest. An interlocutory order may be revoked, but not a final one. Bacon, Max. Reg. 20.

Sententia non fertur de rebus non liquidis. Judgment is not given upon a thing which is not clear.

Sequi debet potentia justitiam, non præcedere. Power should follow justice, not precede it. 2 Inst. 454.

Sermo index animi. Speech is an index of the mind. 5 Co. 118.

Servanda est consuetudo loci ubi causa agitur. The custom of the place where the action is brought is to be observed. 3 Johns. Ch. 190, 219

Servitia personalia sequuntur personam. Personal services follow the person. 2 Inst. 374; Fleta, l. 3, c. 11, § 1.

Si a jure discedas, vagus eris et erunt omnia omnibus incerta. If you depart from the law, you will wander without a guide, and everything will be in a state of uncertainty to every one. Co Litt. 227.

Si alicujus rei societas sit et finis negotio impositus est, finitur societas. If there is a partnership in any matter, and the business is ended, the partnership ceases. 16 Johns. 438, 489.

Si aliquid ex solemnibus deficiat, cum æquitas poscit subvenicndum est. If anything be wanting from required forms, when equity requires it will be aided 1 Kent 157.

Si assuetis mederi possis nova non sunt tentanda. If you can be relieved by accustomed remedies, new ones should not be tried. 10 Co. 142.

Si duo in testamento pugnantia reperientur, ultimum est ratum. If two conflicting provisions are found in a will, the last is observed. Loffl 251.

Si judicas, cognosce. If you judge, understand.

Si meliores sunt quos ducit amor, plures sunt quos corrigit timor. If those are better who are led by love, those are the greater number corrected by fear. Co. Litt. 392.

Si non appareat quid actum est, erit consequens ut id sequamur quod in regione in qua actum est frequentatur If it does not appear what was agreed upon, the consequence will be that we must follow that which is the usage of the place where the agreement was made. Dig. 50. 17. 34.

Si nulla sit conjectura quæ ducat alio, verba intelligenda sunt ex proprietate, non grammatica sed populari ex usu. If there be no inference which leads to a different result, words are to be understood according to their proper meaning, not in a grammatical, but in a popular and ordinary, sense. 2 Kent 555.

Si plures conditiones ascriptæ fuerunt donationi conjunctim, omnibus est parendum; et ad veritatem copulative requiritur quod utraque pars sit vera, si divisim, cuilibet vel alteri eorum satis est obtemperare; et in disjunctivis, sufficit alteram partem esse veram. If several conditions are conjunctively written in a gift, the whole of them must be complied with; and with respect to their truth, it is necessary that every part be true, taken jointly: if the conditions are separate, it is sufficient to comply with either one or other of them; and being disjunctive, that one or the other be true. Co. Litt. 225.

Si plures sint fidejussores, quotquot erunt numero, singuli in solidum tenentur. If there are more sureties than one, how many soever they shall be, they shall each be held for the whole. Inst. 3. 20. 4.

Si quid universitati debetur singulis non debetur, nec quod debet universitas singuli debent. If any thing is due to a corporation, it is not due to the individual members of it, nor do the members individually owe what the corporation owes. Dig. 3. 4. 7; 1 Bla. Com. 484; Lindl. Part * 5.

Si quidem in nomine, cognomine, prænomine, agnomine legatarii testator erraverit, cum de persona constat, nihilominus valet legatum. If the testator has erred in the name, cognomen, prænomen, or title of the legatee, whenever the person is rendered certain, the legacy is nevertheless valid. Inst. 2. 20. 29; Broom, Max. 645; 2 Domat b. 2, 1, s. 6, §§ 10, 19.

Si quis custos fraudem pupillo fecerit, a tutela removendus est. If a guardian behave fraudulently to his ward, he shall be removed from the guardianship. Jenk. Cent. 39.

Si quis prægnantem uxorem reliquit, non videtur sine liberis decessisse. If a man dies, leaving his wife pregnant, he shall not be considered as having died childless.

Si quis unum percusserit, cum alium percutere vellet, in felonia tenetur. If a man kill one, meaning to kill another, he is held guilty of felony. 3 Inst. 51.

Si suggestio non sit vera, literæ patentes vacuæ sunt. If the suggestion of a patent is false, the patent itself is void. 10 Co. 113.

Sic enim debere quem meliorem agrum suum facere, ne vicini deteriorem faciat. Every one ought so to improve his land as not to injure his neighbors. 3 Kent 441.

Sic interpretandum est ut verba accipiantur cum effectu. Such an interpretation is to be made that the words may have an effect. 3 Inst. 80.

Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. So use your own as not to injure another's property. 1 Bla. Com. 306; Broom, Max 268, 365, Webb, Poll. Torts 153; 2 Bouv. R 2 Q. B. 247. "Utterly useless as a legal maxim;" 9 N. Y. 445. It is a mere begging of the question; it assumes the very point in controversy; 13 Lea 507 See 2 Aust. Jurisp. 795, 829; Expedit reipublicæ ne sua re quis male utatur, supra.

Sicut natura nil facit per saltum, ita nec lex. As nature does nothing by a bound or leap, so neither does the law. Co. Litt. 238.

Sigillum est cera impressa, quia cera sine impressione non est sigillum. A seal is a piece of wax impressed because wax without an impression is no a seal. 3 Inst. 169. But see SEAL.

Silence shows consent. 6 Barb. 26, 35.

Silent leges inter arma. Laws are silent amidst arms. 4 Inst. 70.

Similitudo legalis est casuum diversorum inter se collatorum similis ratio; quod in uno simillium valet, valebit in altero. Dissimilium, dissimilis est ratio. Legal similarity is a similar reason which governs various cases when compared with each other, for what avails in one similar case will avail in the other. Of things dissimilar, the reason is dissimilar. Co. Litt. 191; Benj. Sales 379.

Simplex commendatio non obligat. A simple recommendation does not bind. Dig. 4. 3. 37; 2 Kent 485; Broom, Max. 781; 4 Taunt. 488; 16 Q. B. 282, 283; Cro. Jac. 4; 2 Allen 214; 5 Johns. 354; 4 Barb. 95.

Simplex et pura donatio dici poterit, ubi nulla est adjecta conditio nec modus. A gift is said to be pure and simple when no condition or qualification is annexed. Bract. 1.

Simplicitas est legibus amica, et nimia subtilitas in jure reprobatur. Simplicity is favorable to the law, and too much subtlety is blameworthy in law. 4 Co. 8.

Sine possessione usucapio procedere non potest. There can be no prescription without possession.

Singuli in solidum tenentur. Each is bound for the whole. 6 Johns. Ch. 242, 252.

Sive tota res evincatur, sive pars, habet regressum emptor in venditorem. The purchaser who has been evicted in whole or in part has an action against the vendor. Dig. 21. 2. 1; Broom, Max. 768.

Socii mei socius meus socius non est. The partner of my partner is not my partner. Dig. 50. 17. 47; Lindl. Part. *48; 13 Gray 472.

Sola ac per se senectus donationem, testamentum aut transactionem non vitiat. Old age does not alone and of itself vitiate gift, will or transaction. 5 Johns. Ch. 148, 158.

"Maiheming is when one member of the commonweale shall take from another member of the same, a naturall member of his bodie, or the use and benefit thereof, and thereby disable him to serve the commonweale by his weapons in the time of warre, or by his labour in the time of peace, and also diminisheth the strength of his bodie, and weaken him thereby to get his owne living, and by that means the commonweale is in a sort deprived of the use of one of her members." Pulton, De Pace Regis, 1609, fol. 15, § 58.

One may not innocently maim himself, and where he procures another to maim him, both are guilty; Co. Litt. 127 a; 17 Wend. 351, 352. The cutting or disabling or weakening a man's hand or finger, or striking out his eye or foretooth, or depriving him of those parts the loss of which abates his courage, are held to be mayhems; 7 Humphr. 161; Cl. Cr. L. 183. But cutting off the ear or nose, or the like, are not held to be mayhems at common law; 4 Bla. Com. 205; but see 9 Ala. 928. The injury must be permanent; 8 Port. 472; 30 La. Ann. II. 1329; and if inflicted on an assailant in self-defence, it is not mayhem; 4 Blackf. 546.

These and other severe personal injuries are punished by the Coventry Act, which is common law and also has been re-enacted in most of the states; 1 Hawk. P. C., Curw. ed. 107, § 1; Ryan, Med. Jur., Phil. ed. 191; and by act of congress. See Act of April 30, 1790, s. 13; Act of March 3, 1825, s. 22; Rev. Stat. § 1342, art. 58 (when committed by a soldier in time of war, etc.); 10 Ala. N. S. 928; 5 Ga. 404; 7 Mass. 245; 1 Ired. 121; 6 S. & R. 224; 2 Va. Cas. 198; 4 Wisc. 168; 93 Cal. 564. Mayhem was not an offence at common law in Massachusetts, but only an aggravated trespass; 7 Mass. 248; but at the early common law it was a felony punishable by the loss of member for member, a punishment disused later; see id.; 1 McCl. Cr. L. § 432. Maim as used in the statutes is not equivalent to mayhem but to mutilate; McCl. Cr. L. § 432.

See PHYSICAL EXAMINATION.

MAYHEMAVIT. Maimed.

This is a term of art which cannot be supplied in pleading by any other word, as mutilavit, truncavit, etc.; 3 Thomas Co. Litt. 548; 7 Mass. 247. In indictments for mayhem the words feloniously and did maim are requisite; Whart. Cr. Pr. § 260, n.

MAYOR (Lat. major; Spelman, Gloss. Meyr, miret, maer, one that keeps guard. Cowel; Blount; Webster). The chief governor or executive magistrate of a city.

The old word was portgreve. The word mayor first occurs in 1189, when Rich. I. substituted a mayor for the two bailiffs of London. The word is common in Bracton. Brac. 57. In London, York, and Dublin, he is called lord mayor. Wharton, Lex.

It is generally his duty to cause the laws of the city to be enforced, and to superintend inferior officers, such as constables, watchmen, and the like. But the power and authority which mayors possess, being given to them by local regulations, vary in different places.

MAYOR'S COURT. The name of a court usually established in cities, composed of a mayor, recorder, and aldermen, generally having jurisdiction of offences committed within the city, and of other matters specially given them by the statute.

MAOYRAZGO. In Spanish Law. A species of entail known to Spanish law. 1 New Rec. 119.

MEADOW. A tract of land lying above the shore overflowed only by spring freshets or extraordinary tides, and which yields grass good for hay. 34 Conn. 429.

MEAL RENT. A rent formerly paid in meal.

MEANDER. To wind as a river or stream. Webster.

The winding or bend of a stream.

Meander lines are run in surveying public lands bordering upon navigable rivers, not as boundaries of the tract, but to ascertain the quantity of the land subject to sale; and the watercourse, and not the meander line, as actually run on the land, is the boundary; 134 U. S. 178; 140 id. 376, 406; 7 Wall. 286. See LAKE; 14 Or. 340.

MEANS OF SUPPORT. All those resources from which the necessaries and comforts of life are or may be supplied, such as lands, goods, salaries, wages, or other sources of income. 71 Ill. 242.

MEASE. A messuage or dwelling-house. Whart.

MEASON-DUE. A corruption of Maison de Dieu.

MEASURE. A means or standard for computing amount. A certain quantity of something, taken for a unit, and which expresses a relation with other quantities of the same thing.

The constitution of the United States gives power to congress to "fix the standard of weights and measures." Art. 1, s. 8.

The states, it seems, possess the power to legislate on this subject, or, at least, the existing standards at the adoption of the constitution remain in full force; 3 Story, Const. 21; Rawle, Const. 102; but it has been decided that this constitutional power is exclusive in congress when exercised; 7 How. 282; 29 Pa. 27.

By a resolution of congress, of the 14th of June, 1836, the secretary of the treasury is directed to cause a complete set of all weights and measures adopted as standards, and now either made or in the progress of manufacture, for the use of the several custom-houses and for other purposes, to be delivered to the governor of each state in the Union, or to such person as he may appoint, for the use of the states respectively, to the end that a uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the United States. The act of March 3, 1851, requires the same to be furnished to such agricultural colleges in every state as have received grants of land from the United States. The act of July 28, 1866, authorized the use of the French metric system of weights and measures in this country, and provided that no contract or dealing, or pleading in any court, shall be deemed invalid or liable to objection, because the weights or measures expressed or referred to therein are weights or measures of the metric system; Rev. Stat. § 3569. Annexed to § 3570, q. v., is a schedule which shall be recognized in the construction of contracts, and in all legal proceedings, as establishing, in terms of the weights and measures now in use in the United States, the equivalent of the weights and measures expressed therein in terms of the metric system. See infra; WEIGHT.

METRIC SYSTEM. The fundamental, invariable, and standard measure, by which all weights and measures are formed, is called the mètre, a word derived from the Greek, which signifies measure. It is a lineal measure, and is equal to 3 feet, 0 inches, 11 44-1000th lines, Paris measure, or 3 feet, 3 inches, 370-1000th, English. This unit is divided into ten parts; each tenth, into ten hundredths; each hundredth, into ten thousandths, etc. These divisions, as well as those of all other measures, are infinite. As the standard is to be invariable, something has been sought from which to make it, which is not variable or subject to any change. The fundamental base of the mètre is the quarter of the terrestrial meridian, or the distance from the pole to the equator, which has been divided into ten millions of equal parts, one of which is the length of the mètre. All the other measures are formed from the mètre, as follows:—

CAPACITY. The litre. This is the cubic decimètre, or the cube of one-tenth part of a mètre. This is divided by tenths, as the mètre. The measures which amount to more than a single litre are counted by tens, hundreds, thousands, etc., of litres.

WEIGHT. The gramme. This is the weight of a cubic centimètre of distilled water at the temperature of 4° above zero Centigrade.

SURFACE. The are, use in surveying. This is a square, the sides of which are of the length of ten mètres, or what is equal to one hundred square mètres. Its divisions are the same as in the preceding measures. One hundred ares make a hectare.

SOLIDITY. The stère, used in measuring firewood. It is a cubic mètre. Its subdivisions are similar to the preceding. For the measure of other things, the term cube mètre, or cubic mètre, is used, or the tenth, hundredth, etc., of such a cube.

MONEY. The franc weighs five grammes. It is made out of nine-tenths of silver and one-tenth of copper. Its tenth part is called a decime, and its hundredth part a centime.

As already stated the divisions of these measures are all uniform, namely, by tens, or decimal fractions; they may, therefore, be written as such. Instead of writing,

1 mètre and 1-tenth of a mètre, we may write, 1 m. 1.
2 mètres and 8-tenths,—2 m. 8.
10 mètres and 4-hundredths,—10 m. 04.
7 litres, 1-tenth, and 2-hundredths,—7 lit. 12, etc.

Names have been given to each of these divisions of the principal unit; but these names always indicate the value of the fraction and the unit from which it is derived. To the name of the unit have been prefixed deci, for tenth, centi, for hundredth, and milli, for thousandth. They are thus expressed: a décimètre, a décilitre, a décigramme, a décistère, a déciare, a centimètre, a centilitre, a centigramme, etc. The facility with which the divisions of the unit are reduced to the same expression is very apparent; this cannot be done with any other kind of measures.

As it may sometimes be necessary to express great quantities of units, collections have been made of them in tens, hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, etc., to which prefixes derived from the Greek have been given, namely, deca, for tens; hecto, for hundreds; kilo, for thousands; and myria, for tens of thousands; they are thus expressed: a décamètre, a décalitre, etc.; a hectomètre, a hectogramme, etc.; a kilomètre, a kilogramme, etc.

The above act of congress gives the equivalents thus:—

The Mètre is 39.37 in.
Litre is .908 quarts, dry measure, or 1.0567 quarts, wine measure.
Are is 119.6 square yards.
Gramme is 15.432 grains avoirdupois.
The Stère is 35.317 cubic feet.

As to certain measures under Mexican grants, see 161 U. S. 219.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES. In Practice. A rule or method by which the damage sustained is to be estimated or measured. Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 29.

It is the duty of the judge to explain to the jurors, as a matter of law, the footing upon which they should calculate their damages, if their verdict is for the plaintiff. This footing or scheme is called the "measure of damages;" Poll. Torts 27.

The defendant is to make compensation for all the natural and proximate consequences of his wrong, but not for secondary or remote consequences. There are cases in which this principle of compensation is departed from; as, where exemplary damages are awarded, or double or treble damages are allowed by statute. But, in general, the law seeks to give compensation.

Value is in most cases the real measure of compensation and it is a fundamental principle that market value is resorted to not as a test, but only as an aid in getting at the real value, the latter being the true measure of a recovery, whether it be property, time, labor, or service which were affected by the contract or tort which is the subject matter of the action; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. §§ 242, 243.

The compensation awarded may be based upon, (1) pecuniary loss, direct or indirect; (2) physical pain; (3) mental suffering; to which have been added the value of the time required for the enforcement of the plaintiff's rights and his actual expenses incurred in so doing. There may be also in the case of injuries resulting from design, malice, or fraud, the sense of wrong or injury to one's feelings which is in some cases taken into consideration as a proper subject of compensation. See Hale, Dam. 86; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 37. The injuries for which compensation may be recovered are stated generally to include all those which affect any right protected by the common law where they are the direct result of actionable wrong. They may be to property, family relations, reputation, or the person,—whether affecting the body or mind or personal freedom of action; id. § 39.

Pecuniary compensation includes every kind of damage which can be measured by money value; 71 Md. 135. Such loss is almost always an element to be considered and in most cases the primary one; Hale, Dam. 87. So important is the idea of compensation that it is laid down as the fundamental rule of the measure of damages that the recovery must be "by way of compensation for loss and not to punish the wrong doer;" 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 360. The test is compensation, not restitution, and beyond this it is rarely possible to lay down any general rule; Poll. Torts 180. This idea of compensation which lies at the root of the subject, may be illustrated by cases of the most diverse character. The measure of damages for failing to fulfil a covenant which the other party performs, is what it cost to fulfil it; 123 Pa. 381; in a trespass for an injury to the realty, by the inadvertent removal of part of coal, it is its value as part of the realty, and not as a chattel after its removal; 20 So. Rep. (Ala.) 918; for illegal diversion of water by an upper riparian owner, it is the cost of enough water to take the place of that unlawfully diverted; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 563; for a breach of contract to return borrowed stock it is the price of the stock at the time of the refusal to return it; 184 Pa. 318. In an action of replevin for wrongful detention, the value of its use during detention may be recovered, although ordinarily the damages would be the interest on its value while detained; 38 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 482. Where an attorney undertakes for a client a search of records for liens and overlooks a lien, his client, a mortgagee, who has thereupon loaned money on what was supposed to be a first lien upon real estate, may recover from the attorney the difference in value between a first lien and the lien which the client got; 180 Pa. 532. The amount stolen from a safe, warranted burglar proof, may be recovered in an action for breach of the warranty; 69 Ill. App. 106. Breach of contract to make a loan on a demand note secured by mortgage, to take up an existing lien, renders the lender liable for damages caused by foreclosure of the latter, although ordinarily there is no recovery for breach of contract to make a demand loan; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 375; and where a reasonable sum was stipulated for as liquidated damages for the breach of agreement to loan money, such stipulation will be enforced; 21 id. 94. The compensation is not necessarily for actual loss or expense. In many cases there may be a recovery for the amount of expenditure proper to be made and charged where the service was, in fact, gratuitous, as in the case of services of physicians and nurses which cost the plaintiff nothing, and for which he is held entitled to recover upon the ground that he recovers not for their cost but for their value; 127 Ind. 1; 79 Fed. Rep. 291; contra, 61 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 79, where it was held that the recovery could only be for expense incurred.

The other essential requisite is that the amount is determined, not by the actual loss, but only that which is the natural result of the act complained of, or as its consequence may be presumed to have been in contemplation of the parties. This rule was established by the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, in which the application of the principle was to a suit against a carrier; 9 Exch. 341; 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502; 8 id. 405. Remote, contingent, or speculative damages will not be allowed, but only such as naturally flow from the breach of the contract; 46 Fed. Rep. 40. The principle of Hadley v. Baxendale, however, is held to cover damages resulting from the failure of the plaintiff to comply with other contracts, made upon the faith of his contract with the defendant, for the breach of which he sues, where the fact of his having made such other contracts was known to the defendant; 20 Q. B. D. 86. See CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR, which is particularly to be noted in connection with claims for damages based upon physical pain and inconvenience.

As to mental suffering, see that title.

With regard to the measure of damages, the same principles are, to a great extent, applicable to cases of contract and tort; Poll. Torts 529; 9 P. Div. 113. Where the action is for breach of contract, the damages are limited to what may reasonably be considered to have been contemplated by the parties at the time of making it as likely to arise from a breach; 94 Wis. 44. They may include, however, gains prevented, as well as losses sustained, if certain, and reasonably to be expected; 48 Neb. 910. They are measured by the loss which results from the breach and not the sum of money or property involved in the transaction; [1897] 1 Q. B. 692. As a general rule, the contract itself furnishes the measure of damages.

In an action of tort based upon negligence in the performance of a contractual obligation without malice, the damages would be substantially the same as for breach of contract under the same circumstances; 9 App. D. C. 455.

There are dicta to the effect that a more liberal rule of damages should be applied in cases of tort than of contract; 42 Wis. 23; 11 Mich. 542; but they are contrary to the general current of authority which is in favor of applying the same principles to both classes of cases; 53 N. Y. 211, 216; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 429, note a.

While the rule which affords the measure of damages is to be supplied by the court, the amount is a question for the jury, and unless the damages are so excessive as to lead to the conclusion of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury, the court cannot interfere with their verdict; 52 Fed. Rep. 87.

Damages should not exceed the amount claimed; but cases have been known in which the verdict was in excess of the amount claimed, and the court has amended the statement of claim to enable it to enter judgment on the verdict; Poll. Torts 180; but this is said to be an extreme use of the power of the court; id.; 43 Ch. Div. 327. Where there is uncertainty as to the measure of damages, the rule is to give the lowest sum; 62 Pa. 324.

"Estimates of value made by friendly witnesses, with no practical illustrations to support them, are too unsafe, as a rule, to be made the basis of a judicial award." 166 U. S. 134.

The measure of compensation allowed as damages has been somewhat definitely fixed, as to many classes of cases, by rules of decision, many of which are important and well established.

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT. The right of action in this case is entirely statutory. At common law no civil action could be maintained, but such an action was given in England in 1846 by Lord Campbell's Act, and similar statutes exist in most of the United States. For a collation of statutes see Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act c. 9.

These statutes are held constitutional even where applicable to one class of corporations; 92 Ky. 233; 32 N. H. 215. See 75 Ala. 449; 4 Col. 162; 24 Ga. 356. By some courts they are construed strictly as being remedial; in others strictly as in derogation of common law; Hale, Dam. § 126; Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act c. 2, § 32, where the cases are collected. These statutes are said to operate not by way of exception or repeal of the common law, but to create an action totally new in species, quality, principle; Blackburn, L. J., in 10 App. Cas. 59. This bears upon the measure of damages. It has been said that life is to be regarded as property to be compensated for "without regard to past earnings or capacity to earn at time of death;" 67 Pa. 300; but this case is severely criticised as unsound reasoning; 2 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 572, where it is remarked that at common law life was not property, and no civil action lay for its loss, which "rule has only been modified by this statute, under which juries are allowed to give, in most states, damages for pecuniary injuries only." These pecuniary damages embrace: (1) Present pecuniary loss; (2) prospective pecuniary loss; (3) the interest of one who would presumably derive pecuniary benefit from the services of the deceased. Any case may involve one or all of these elements. Present pecuniary loss is based upon actual compensation for loss to the time of action, and although the action is maintainable only where it might have been brought by the deceased if he survived, the measure of damages rests upon different principles. The deceased might have recovered both for pecuniary loss and his pain and suffering, physical and mental, while his representatives recover only for the injury to his family resulting from his death; 18 Q. B. 93; 23 N. Y. 465; and not for his suffering, medical attendance, funeral expenses, loss of society of husband or wife, and the like; 2 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 573, citing cases. See 83 Fed. Rep. 82. Prospective pecuniary loss is based on a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the life of the deceased; 3 H. & N. 211; 60 Md. 449; 66 N. C. 154; 74 Wis. 562. It is what the deceased would have probably earned during the residue of his life, taking into consideration his age, condition, ability, disposition, habits, and expenditures, without any solatium for distress of mind; Sharswood, J., in 57 Pa. 335, 358; 86 Tenn. 343; 29 Gratt. 431; 88 N. Y. 641; and no account can be taken of income from investments; 47 N. J. L. 28.

In the third class of cases damages are allowed to a husband for the loss of a wife's services, not her society; 11 Can. 422; to a wife for the loss of support; id.; for the same reason to a child during minority; 47 N. Y. 317; 38 Wis. 613; 35 Minn. 84; 129 Ill. 91; 76 Cal. 240; and on the weight of authority, for the expectation of pecuniary benefit after majority; 110 N. Y. 504; 84 Cal. 515; 32 Minn. 518; and if the statute is in favor of the estate of the deceased, the damages are not limited to the minority of a child; 73 Ind. 252; 36 Ia. 458; to a parent for the loss of a child to the extent of the pecuniary value of his services during minority; 71 Md. 573; 97 Mo. 253; 32 W. Va. 370; to the next of kin if dependent on the deceased for support; 43 Ill. 338; but not otherwise for nominal damages; 33 Kan. 543; 7 Ohio St. 336; 71 Md. 573. Exemplary damages cannot generally be given, but in some states they are expressly authorised, either generally or under special circumstances set forth in the act. Hale, Meas. Dam. § 128.

In estimating the damages in these cases.

the expectation of life may be reckoned; 91 Ala. 548; 19 Kan. 83; 85 Ia. 167. See LIFE TABLES.

As to the measure of damages in this action, generally, see 60 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 178, 219; 1 C. C. A. 33; 28 Am. L. Reg. 385, 513, 577; for the death of a child; 29 Cent. L. J. 253; value of human limbs; 27 Can. L. J. 417.

NEGOTIABLE PAPER. In suits on negotiable paper the measure of damages is its face value with interest from the breach; Sedg. Elem. Dam. 240; 6 Cow. 484; 58 Ind. 360; 9 Wis. 503. The value of a note is prima facie the amount secured; 120 N. Y. 134; 69 Me. 484; 23 Mo. 252; 31 Vt. 570. Formerly it was said that interest was only recoverable as damages allowable at the discretion of the jury; 2 B. & Ald. 305; 3 Campb. 296; W. N. (1887) 184. It was early settled that interest, as a matter of law, could not be given without an express or implied contract for its payment; 2 B. & C. 348. The present rule is said to be that in England it is allowed on commercial paper; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 291; and that in the United States the jury should be instructed to give it; 2 id. § 699; id. § 325; 5 Cow. 587, 610; 79 N. C. 122. Where interest is provided for in the paper the recovery is under the contract and not as damages, and there has been much conflict as to whether in case of non-payment at maturity interest thereafter is payable as interest at the contract rate or as damages at the statutory rate. The former view is supported upon the doctrine of an implied contract to pay the stipulated rate after maturity; 74 Ind. 158; 94 id. 178; 144 Mass. 448; 38 Ohio St. 575; 38 Mich. 662. Following the latter view—the statutory rate; 67 Me. 145; 63 Cal. 503; 42 Conn. 570; 23 Minn. 84; 8 Wend. 550; 43 N. Y. 244 (but contra, 4 Johns. Ch. 436; 19 Hun 87); 63 Md. 484; 5 W. & S. 51; L. R. 7 H. L. 27; 14 Ch. D. 49 (contra, 3 C. B. N. S. 144). See 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 325 n., where the authorities are collected and the conclusion stated that the weight of authority is in favor of the latter position, which is also sustained by the supreme court as its own rule when not controlled by local law; 100 U. S. 72. See 96 id. 51.

If there is an intention expressed it prevails, whatever may be the form of words used; 68 Me. 80; 25 Ch. D. 338; 84 N. Y. 471; 79 Mo. 226; 10 R. I. 299; 2 Kan. 83; 18 S. C. 141; id. 600. Where a higher rate after maturity is expressed it is generally allowed; 91 Ill. 609; 33 Ark. 416; 66 Me. 282; L. R. 2 Eq. 221; 15 U. C. C. P. 360; but not by some courts, on the theory that it is a penalty; 11 Mo. 547; 24 Minn. 43. It is said that the question properly rests upon the doctrine of liquidated damages, but that the courts have not generally so held; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 331.

In most of the states there are statutory provisions for damages upon protested paper, ranging as to foreign bills from five to twenty per cent; and on bills payable in another state there are varying rates, some statutes making discriminations between states or groups of states, based, apparently, upon contiguity, or extent of business relations and the like. For a summary of the provisions of these statutes, see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 4753.

CARRIERS. Upon a total failure to deliver goods, the carrier is liable for the value of the goods at their place of destination, with interest from the time they should have been delivered, deducting the freight; 12 S. & R. 186; 24 N. H. 297; 1 Cal. 108; 10 La. An. 412; 9 Rich. So. C. 465; 46 N. Y. 462; 74 Ill. 249; 28 Ohio St. 358; 87 Ill. 195; 64 Mo. 47; 27 Wis. 327; 8 Mo. App. 27; 98 Mass. 550; 41 Miss. 671; 26 Ga. 122; 13 Md. 164; 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 72. Upon a failure to take the goods at all for transportation, he is liable for the difference between the value at the place of shipment and at the place of destination, less his freight; or, if another conveyance can be found, the difference between the freight agreed on with defendant and the sum (if greater) which the shipper would be compelled to pay another carrier; 1 Abb. Adm. 119; 58 Barb. 216; 56 Penn. 231; 34 Mich. 439. Upon a delay to deliver the goods, the plaintiff is entitled to an indemnity for his loss incurred by the delay, taking into account any fall in the market occurring between the time when the property should have been delivered by the carrier and the time when it actually was; 54 Ill. 58; 1 Disn. 23; 64 Ill. 143; 20 Wis. 594; 106 Mass. 468; 48 N. H. 455; 47 N. Y. 29; 14 Mich. 489; 49 Vt. 255; or, in some cases, the additional price paid for goods required by him to take the place of the delayed goods; 90 Me. 193; 147 U. S. 591; Ang. Carr. § 490 a; in case of property for exhibition at a museum, the probable net profits; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 524; or in case of stock injured, the depreciation measured by market value at the place of destination; 63 Ark. 443; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 704. The value of damaged goods may properly be determined by their sale at auction by the owner; 78 Fed. Rep. 155.

The measure of damages for a breach of a contract to transport freight by vessel, is the difference between the contract and the actual price of freight paid; 6 U. S. App. 581.

In modern times, the conditions which led to the adoption of the common law rule making a carrier an insurer having changed, it is very common to limit, by contract, the amount of the shipper's recovery. The effect of such contracts is to fix a valuation on the goods which shall be the measure of damages in case of loss, and to this the shipper is held; 112 U. S. 332; 70 N. Y. 410; 81 Pa. 315; 137 Mass. 33. Some courts, however, hold such contracts invalid; 88 Tenn. 320; this is upon the theory that it is in fact an exemption from liability for negligence which is not permitted; 17 Wall. 357. It is suggested that the true doctrine is that the carrier cannot himself limit the damages, but that a contract to do so, fairly made by both parties to it, should be sustained; 6 Mich. 242. See 9 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 334; 21 id. 125, 142.

LAND CONTRACTS. In actions for the breach of contracts for the sale of land where the vendor fails to convey, the English rule limits the damages to the amount advanced with interest and expenses incurred in examining the title. The rule dates back to Y. B. 30 Edw. III, 14 b.; but the leading case is Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bla. 1078. The rule was qualified by an exception, established in Hopkins v. Grazebrook, when the vendor knew of the defect in title; 6 B. & C. 31; but that case was discredited as authority and the earlier rule adhered to by the house of lords; L. R. 7 H. L. 158, affirming L. R. 6 Excheq. 59, which was followed in 36 Ch. D. 619. In American law there is great lack of harmony in the decisions, and a distinction is taken in many cases growing out of the motive of the party in default. The extreme English rule has been followed in Pennsylvania, and, apparently, even where there is fraud; 80 Pa. 413; see 11 id. 127; 67 id. 126. In other states a failure to convey for want of good title does not involve liability for the value of the bargain, unless there be fraud, bad faith, or other misconduct; 2 Bibb 415; 2 Wend. 399; 57 N. Y. 155; 69 id. 201; 9 Lea 111; 9 Md. 250; 54 id. 187; 29 Kan. 508; 5 Ia. 352; 56 id. 139; 17 Fla. 532; see 39 Minn. 326.

Knowledge of the defendant that the title was in a third person has been considered in some cases sufficient to warrant substantial damages; 40 N. Y. 59; and where the failure to convey was the result of the refusal of the wife to sign the deed, the same rule was applied, upon the theory that the vendor knew that it was doubtful if his wife would sign; 34 N. J. L. 358; 78 Ill. 222. In a case of contract by the defendant to sell the lands of another which he had contracted to purchase, and failed to accomplish his object because the real owner could not make title, the judgment was reversed because the judge had charged in favor of substantial damages, and Cooley, J., held, upon a review of the cases, that Flureau v. Thornhill must be considered as established law, but that where a party acted in bad faith or sold what he did not own, such damages should be allowed; 21 Mich. 374.

In many jurisdictions what is sometimes called the rule of the United States Supreme Court is adhered to and the purchaser is held to be entitled to the difference between the amount he has agreed to pay and the value at the time of breach. This is the opposite extreme from the English rule. 6 Wheat. 109; 113 Mass. 538; 3 R. I. 187; 37 Ia. 134; 65 Me. 87; 29 La. Ann. 286; 35 Neb. 429; 57 Fed. Rep. 973; 145 U. S. 522; 37 Ill. App. 465; 7 Utah 113.

When the purchaser refuses to perform, the measure has been held, in England, to be the difference between the price fixed in the contract and the value of the land at the time fixed for the delivery of the deed; 7 M. & W. 474. But the rule does not appear to be well settled in this country.

The English rule has been followed by some courts; 51 N. H. 167; 101 Mass. 409; 67 Pa. 126; 22 Ohio St. 172; 86 Mich. 328. In some states where a deed has been tendered and refused, it is held that the contract price may be recovered in full; 17 Barb. 260 (the question having been left undecided in 5 Cow. 506); 4 Me. 258; 11 Ia. 161; contra. 1 Pugs. 195; see 21 Wend. 457; 18 Vt. 27. A purchaser in possession on an instalment contract of sale on eviction was held entitled to recover instalments made and cost of improvements; 109 Ala. 261; contra, if buildings were erected without the vendor's request; 59 N. J. L. 160.

One who has contracted for the right to purchase public land is entitled on a breach to the difference between the contract price and the saleable value of such right, and it is the vendor's duty to re-sell the right, or, failing this, to show its market value; 145 U. S. 522; evidence of particular sales of other real estate is not admissible to establish market value; 107 Pa. 460.

EVICTION. The damages recoverable for an eviction, in an action for breach of covenants of seisin and warranty in a deed, are the consideration-money, interest thereon, and the costs, if any, of defending the eviction.

This is not in accordance with the fundamental doctrine of the law of damages, but it is the rule in most of the states, and is sometimes termed the New York rule; 3 Cai. 111; 69 N. Y. 434; 4 Dall. 441; 27 Pa. 288; 2 McCord 413 (earlier decisions were contra; 1 Bay 19, 92, 265); 2 Leigh 451 (also after conflicting decisions, 3 Call 320; 1 Munf. 493); 82 Va. 769; 8 Humph. 647; 2 Bibb 273; 4 Dana 253; 3 Ohio 211; 14 id. 118; 1 Ark. 313, 323; 43 id. 439; 24 Ga. 533; 41 Ill. 413; 58 Ind. 392; 122 id. 272; 5 Ia. 287; 44 id. 249; 33 Cal. 299; 39 Cal. 360; 17 N. J. L. 304; 30 N. H. 531; 65 id. 13; 31 Miss. 433; 23 Mo. 437; 38 Minn. 24; 100 N. C. 75; 44 Tex. 400; 36 Md. 129, 150; 18 Nev. 360; 69 Ala. 502; 33 Kan. 765; 3 Ore. 88; 26 W. Va. 447; 64 Wis. 258; 8 U. C. Q. B. 191 (but see 13 U. C. C. P. 146); 13 La. 143; but the value of improvements may be recovered; 13 La. Ann. 512; and see as to Louisiana, 131 U. S. 191: though excluded by the New York rule; 4 Johns. 1. In Mississippi a vendee who has lost land by reason of a title paramount to his remote vendor may recover the amount which such remote vendor received for the land; 68 Miss. 161.

What is known as the New England rule establishes as the measure of damages the value of the land at the time of eviction, together with the expenses of the suit, etc., and this is followed in all the New England states, Quebec, and Michigan; 119 Mass. 500; 66 Me. 557; 14 Conn. 245; 12 Vt. 381; 30 id. 242; 61 Mich. 625; 6 Can. 425; and it is also recognized as the rule in England; 9 Q. B. D. 128.

Where a paramount title is purchased to prevent actual eviction the measure of damages is the price paid with interest; 59 Ark. 699; 61 Hun 427; 21 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 172; and where the breach alleged was the foreclosure of a mortgage, it is the amount paid to redeem the land and expenses of defending the title; 3 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 260; 17 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1014.

INCUMBRANCES. On a breach of a covenant in a deed against incumbrances, the purchaser is entitled to recover his expenses incurred in extinguishing the incumbrance, if that is practicable; 7 Johns. 358; 34 Me. 422; 4 Ind. 130; 109 Mass. 299; 7 R. I. 538; 51 Ill. 373; 41 Ia. 204; 48 N. Y. 532; 59 Mo. 488.

For a permanent incumbrance the compensation should be measured by the decreased value of the land; 20 N. Y. 191; 108 Mass. 175; 44 Conn. 312; but the amount is limited by the sum recoverable for a total loss of the land; 41 Ia. 204; 79 Ala. 346. If the incumbrance causes a total eviction the damages are the same as in other cases of eviction. See supra.

SALES. Where the seller of chattels fails to perform his agreement, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the article at the time and place fixed for delivery; 5 N. Y. 537; 107 id. 674; 3 Mich. 55; 35 id. 478; 4 Tex. 289; 12 Ill. 184; 3 Wheat. 200; 44 Me. 255; 6 McLean 102; 41 Miss. 368; 24 Wend. 322; 3 Col. 373; 48 Pa. 407; 147 id. 372; 33 Vt. 92; 82 Va. 614; 75 Ia. 550; 46 Mo. App. 539; 38 Ill. App. 91; 87 Ga. 333; 98 Cal. 676; 124 U. S. 64; 8 Q. B. 604; Benj. Sales § 758.

The same rule applies as to the deficiency where there is a part-delivery only; 16 Q. B. 941; 23 How. 149; 41 N. H. 86; 51 Pa. 175; 21 Pick. 378; 12 Wis. 276; 5 Hill 472; 2 Minn. 229. Where, however, the purchaser has paid the price in advance, some of the cases, particularly in England and New York, allow the highest market price up to the time of the trial; 27 Barb. 424; 26 Pa. 143; 13 Tex. 324. Where the purchaser refuses to take and pay for the goods, the seller may sell them fairly, and charge the buyer with the difference between the contract price and the best market price obtainable within a reasonable time after the refusal; 45 Ill. 79; 5 S. & R. 19; 30 N. Y. 549; 3 Metc. Ky. 555; 9 B. Mon. 69; 83 Me. 407; 55 Ark. 401; 67 Hun 38; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 415. See 147 Pa. 184. Where the goods are delivered and received, but do not correspond in quality with a warranty given, the vendee may recover the difference between the value of the goods delivered and the value they would have had if they had corresponded with the contract; 4 Gray 457; 5 Harr. 233; 26 Ga. 704; 21 Ill. 180; 29 Md. 142; 39 Me. 287; 14 N. Y. 597; 29 Ala. 558; 20 Ill. 184; 15 U. S. App. 218. But where the article is one which cannot be bought in the market (a machine), and it was not of the warranted capacity, it appearing that the vendee had contracted to supply the products of the machine, which he was unable to do because of the breach, and the facts were known to the vendor, the measure of damages is the difference between what it would have cost to fulfil his contracts and what the vendee would have received if he had not lost them by reason of the defects in the machine; or if the work was done by others, the difference between what it would have cost him to do the work and what he paid for having it done; 3 U. S. App. 631; 49 id. 438.

The measure of damages for breach of a contract to deliver articles, if they have no market value or cannot be had in the market where the delivery was to be made, is the additional cost and expense of obtaining them at the nearest market, or on the most advantageous terms; 117 Ind. 594.

Many courts allow the highest intermediate value between the breach and the end of the trial; 66 Ia. 116; 1 Nott. & McC. 334; 33 Ind. 127; but it is generally denied; 104 Mass. 259; 47 Wis. 406; 44 Md. 47; 119 Ill. 554; Hale, Dam. 186, 194, where the rule is discussed, with the authorities. This rule was originally adopted in New York as to chattels generally; 26 N. Y. 309. It was modified to exclude stock transactions on the ground that the highest intermediate value was not the natural and proximate result; 53 N. Y. 211. The rule of the last cited case is adopted by the United States supreme court; 129 U. S. 193. In Pennsylvania the rule is rejected in its general application; 5 W. & S. 106; but adopted in case of stocks; 53 Pa. 310; see 69 id. 403. In some cases it is left to the jury to allow any value between the highest value and that at the time of conversion; 69 Ala. 581; and in others, where the transaction is free from bad faith, value is taken at the time of conversion, with interest; 40 Miss. 352.

COLLISION. The general principle followed by the courts of admiralty in cases of collision between vessels is that the damages awarded against the offending vessel must be sufficient to restore the other to the condition she was in at the time of the collision, if restoration is practicable. Both damages to vessel and cargo are to be made good. But hypothetical and consequential damages are excluded. The loss of the use of the injured vessel while undergoing repairs is proper to be included. See 37 Fed. Rep. 148. If the injured vessel is a total loss, her market value at the time is the measure of damages. See Olc. 188, 246, 388, 444, 505; 13 How. 106; 17 id. 170; 2 Wall. Jr. 52; 6 McLean 238; 37 Fed. Rep. 270.

If the fault is equal on the part of both vessels, the loss is to be divided between them; 1 Sprague 128; 6 McLean 221; 14 Wall. 345; 21 Wall. 389; 37 Fed. Rep. 716; 60 id. 296; 59 id. 714; 122 U. S. 97.

For a total loss of cargo, its value at the place of shipment, or its cost, including expenses, charges, insurance, and interest, should be allowed; 11 U. S. App. 612; when part is recovered and sold, after expenses are incurred, the rule is to allow the difference between the market value of the goods, if uninjured, and the value in their damaged condition; d. The allowance of interest and costs in case of collision rests in the discretion of the lower court, and will not be disturbed on appeal; 123 U. S. 349.

CONTINUING TORTS. Ordinarily the damages which may be recovered for a tort include only compensation for the injury suffered to the time of suit, and the theory formerly acted upon was that each continuance of a trespass or a nuisance was a fresh one for which a new action would lie; 3 Bla. Com. 220; 1 Den. 257; 21 N. J. L. 469. The only remedy applied in such cases is that exemplary damages will be given, if, after one verdict against him, any one has the hardihood to continue it; 2 Selw. N. P. 1130. In cases, however, where the injury is of a nature to be permanent, it is held that entire damages may be recovered in one action; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 924: as where the trespass was the insertion of girders into a wall; 105 Pa. 400; or maintaining a brothel next to the plaintiff's dwelling-house; 72 Mo. 129.

The same principle is applied in actions for breach of contract by neglect of a continuing duty imposed by it. Each moment the neglect continues is a separate breach and is often considered and treated as a total breach for which the entire damage, past and prospective, may be recovered in one action, the judgment being a bar to any further suit; Hale, Dam. § 33; but not if the contract be divisible, as was held a contract to issue an annual pass renewable from year to year during the pleasure of the promisee; 51 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 576. Whether a tort is permanent or not is a question of fact to be determined according to circumstances; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 924; the presumption being that a wrong will not continue; 51 Ga. 378.

The question of the right to recover in one action of damage resulting from a continuing trespass, and to be protected by the judgment from further suit, is a very important one in connection with the exercise of the right of eminent domain under those modern constitutions which secure compensation for property damaged as well as for that taken.

As to property taken or injured for public use, see, generally, EMINENT DOMAIN; Sedg. Meas. Dam. ch. xxxvi.; Hale, Dam. 167; Harris, Dam.; 2 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 477; 5 Am. & Eng. Ry. Exemplary Damages. Those allowed as a punishment for torts committed with fraud, actual malice, or deliberate violence or oppression.

In nearly all of the states, in such cases, the jury are not confined to a strict compensation for the plaintiff's loss, but may, in assessing damages, allow an additional sum by way of punishment for the wrong done. This allowance is termed "smart money," or "exemplary," "vindictive," or "punitive" damages.

Some courts, however, have declined to recognize the doctrine; 4 Pick. 148; 21 id. 378 (and see 114 Mass. 518); 7 Col. 541; 11 Neb. 261; 64 Mich. 133; 56 N. H. 456, (overruling earlier cases).

Some other courts refuse punitive damages; but allow exemplary damage as compensatory or "indeterminate damages;" 31 W. Va. 220; 1 Wyo. 27; 11 Nev. 350; 2 L. C. J. 96; 20 id. 141; 4 R. I. 371. In some of these jurisdictions they are really allowed under the guise of compensation for mental suffering and the like.

"Whenever the injury complained of is the result of the fraud, malice or wilful or wanton act of the defendant, and the circumstances of the case are such as call for such damages, vindictive damages may be given. The general rule is that, when the injury has been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, and with circumstances of contumely or indignity, the jury are not restricted to actual damages, but may give such damages in addition thereto as the circumstances of the case seem to warrant, to deter others from like offences." Wood's Mayne, Dam. 58; Webb, Poll. Torts 219.

"All rules of damages are referred by the law to one of two heads, either compensation or punishment. Compensation is to make the injured party whole. Exemplary damages are something beyond this, and inflicted with a view not to compensate the plaintiff, but to punish the defendant." Per Dillon, Circ. J., in summing up before the jury; 1 Dill. 71.

It has been said that the distinction between exemplary damages, and damages given as special or extraordinary compensation, is one of words merely; and the effect of allowing the former is the same as that produced upon the theory of compensation, when this is extended to cover injury beyond the pecuniary loss; Hill. Torts 440; Field. Dam. 70.

The propriety of allowing damages to be given by way of punishment under any circumstances has been strenuously denied in many of the cases, and the question has given rise to extensive discussion; but the weight of authority is decidedly that such allowance, in a suitable case, is proper. In 44 Wis. 289, the court said: "The argument and consideration of this case have gone to confirm the present members of this court in their disapprobation of the rule of exemplary damages which they have inherited; but they . . . do not feel at liberty to change or modify the rule at so late a day against the general current of authority elsewhere . . . if a change should now be made, it lies with the legislature, etc." See, also, 7 So. L. Rev. N. S. 675; 7 Jones, L. 64; 20 Am. Law. Reg. N. S. 573; 11 Nev. 350; 6 Cent. L. J. 74.

See note to Wood's Mayne, Dam. 17; Sedgw.; Field, Damages; Greenl. Evidence.

Actual malice need not be shown if the act complained of was wantonly or recklessly done; 51 Ill. 467; 66 Hun 626; 1 Misc. Rep. 148; 51 Mo. App. 320; see 161 Pa. 553; or conceived in a spirit of mischief, or in evident disregard of the rights of others, or of civil or social obligations; 26 Conn. 416; 42 Miss. 607; Wood's Mayne, Dam. 59, note. In an action for slander, however, exemplary damages cannot be recovered without proof of express malice; 48 Mo. App. 193. Where motive may be ground of aggravation of damages, evidence on this score, as of proof of provocation, or of good faith, is admissible in mitigation of damages; Poll. Torts 184. So exemplary damages cannot be recovered where the defendant acted on advice of counsel; 33 Mich. 511; 81 Ga. 468; 73 Ala. 183; 44 Vt. 441; or in good faith; 76 Me. 216; 35 N. Y. 297; 60 Md. 358; 42 Conn. 318; or with a fixed belief that he was acting in the right; 70 Ill. 28; 35 Ia. 306; 76 Ala. 176.

The ground of the doctrine is said to be that society is protected by this species of punishment, while the party is also compensated at the same time and persons are deterred from like offences; 6 Tex. 266; 2 Hill 40.

Mere negligence on the part of the defendant is not enough; 35 Penn. 60; 27 Mo. 28; 5 Bush 206; but see 2 C. C. App. 354; 5 id. 91; 6 Misc. Rep. 162. Malicious motives alone can never constitute a cause of action but, where the allegations are sufficient to sustain the action, malice may be alleged and proved to enhance the damages; 78 Me. 445; 77 Ill. 562; 69 Mich. 380; 115 Mass. 217; 27 Fla. 157; 75 Pa. 467; 75 Ga. 198. See MALICE; MOTIVE.

Exemplary damages as a rule are recoverable only in tort, except that they are allowed for breach of promise of marriage; L. R. 1 C. P. 331; 125 N. Y. 214; 59 Mich. 33; see PROMISE OF MARRIAGE; and where there was a breach of a statutory bond by such tort as would warrant exemplary damages; 57 Ia. 486; 33 Ala. 235; contra, 20 S. C. 514; 84 Ill. 511.

Exemplary damages have been allowed, where one trespassed and cut timber from another's land; 18 Tex. 228; so where armed men broke into a store, carried off the stock, threatened the plaintiff's life, and injured his trade; 36 Mo. 226; in actions for malicious prosecution, when bad faith was shown; 39 Barb. 253; for throwing vitriol in the plaintiff's eyes; 1 Mo. App. 484; for maliciouly setting fire to a person's woods, etc.; 84 Ill. 70; against an innkeeper for wrongfully turning a guest out of the inn; 22 Minn. 90; where a newspaper was informed of the falsity of a libellous article before publication; 94 Mich. 114; where a libel was recklessly or carelessly published, as well as one prompted by personal ill will; 66 Hun 626; for an assault and false imprisonment, against the liberty of a subject; 2 Wils. 205; for wilful trespass on land with intemperate behavior; 5 Taunt. 422; for seduction; 3 Wils. 18; adultery with the plaintiff's wife; 50 Pa. 359; 39 Ia. 478; 66 Ill. 206; perhaps for gross defamation; Poll. Torts 182; for negligently pulling down buildings, to an adjacent owner's injury, the defendant's conduct showing a contempt of the plaintiff's rights; 6 H. & N. 54; for injuries which are the result of negligence and accompanied with expressions of insolence; id. 58; where a passenger was improperly required to leave a street car in obedience to an order of a policeman called by the conductor to remove him; 166 Pa. 4; but not against a physician for malpractice unless gross negligence is proved; 13 Ia. 128; nor against a railway company, which, by reason of defective equipment, failed to return a passenger, with a return ticket, to his starting point; 115 N. C. 602, disapproving 108 id. 414.

Exemplary damages for personal injuries are recoverable only for negligence of a gross and flagrant character, evincing a reckless disregard of human life and safety; 30 Fla. 1.

It does not prevent a recovery, that the defendant is criminally liable for his wrongful act, and that he has been criminally punished for it; 45 Vt. 289; 64 id. 593; 10 Ohio St. 277; 41 Ia. 686; 151 Pa. 634; contra, 53 N. H. 342; 4 Cush. 273; 20 Ind. 190; 73 Ill. 63; but see 56 N. H. 456.

A master may be liable in exemplary damages for his servant's wanton act within the scope of his business; 114 Mass. 518; 37 S. C. 377. Wherever the servant would be liable in exemplary damages for an act, the master would be so liable for the same act, if done by the servant within the scope of his employment; 57 Me. 202; 36 Miss. 660; the same rule applies to corporations and their servants; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 728; 38 Ind. 116; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 103; 48 N. H. 305. A distinction is made in New York, that the master is liable only when he also has been guilty of misconduct, as by the improper employment or retention of the servant, or by the nature of the orders given him; 56 N. Y. 44. See 6 T. & C. 409. The master would not be liable if the servant acted from an innocent motive and in the supposed discharge of his duty; 1 Misc. Rep. 368.

Exemplary damages must be given as a part of the verdict, and not as a separate finding; 56 N. H. 456; but see 38 Wis. 194; and only in cases where there has been some actual damage; 70 Ill. 28, 496. The jury may consider the defendant's pecuniary condition; 71 Ill. 562; Bull. N. P. 27; Wood's Mayne, Dam. 64; 34 Ia. 348; 48 Mo. 152. See Hale, Dam. ch. 7; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. ch. 11.

Special Damages. The damages recoverable for the actual injury incurred through the peculiar circumstances of the individual case, above and beyond those presumed by law from the general nature of the wrong.

These damages must be specially averred in the declaration, or they cannot be recovered; while damages implied by law are recoverable without any such special averment. Thus, in the case of an action for libel, the law presumes an injury as necessarily involved in the loss of reputation, and will award damages therefor without any distinct averment. But if there was any peculiar loss suffered in the individual case, as the plaintiff's marriage prevented or the plaintiff's business diminished, etc., this must be especially averred; Chit. Pl. 410; 4 Den. 319; 2 Johns. 149. When they are the natural and proximate result of the act or default they are general and are legally imported, otherwise they are special and must be pleaded; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 1262; in equity as well as at law; 69 Ala. 343. A fortiori where the special damage is essential to support the action; 22 Pa. 471; 12 Mass. 398; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 1262, note b, citing many cases.

Double or Treble Damages. In some actions statutes give double or treble damages; and they have been liberally construed to mean actually treble damages. In these cases the jury find such damages as they think proper, and the court enhances them in their judgment; Brooke, Abr. Damages, pl. 70: Co. 2d Inst. 416; 1 Wils. 426; 1 Mass. 155. For example, if the jury give twenty dollars damages for a forcible entry the court will award forty dollars more, so as to make the total amount of damages sixty dollars; 4 B. & C. 154; M'Clel. 567. The statute must be pleaded; 79 Ky. 48. As to the rule in patent cases, see PATENT.

The construction of the words treble damages is different from that which has been put on the words treble costs; in the case of damages they are actually doubled or trebled, while double or treble costs are assessed. See 6 S. & R. 288; 1 Browne, Pa. 9; 1 Cow. 160, 175, 584; 8 id. 115.

Single damages may be recovered if the claim under the statute is not made out; 86 Mich. 246.

MECHANIC. Any skilled worker with tools; a workman who shapes and applies material in the construction of houses; one actually engaged with his own hands in constructive work. 43 La. Ann. 1180. See 11 Lea 517; 18 Pa. 525. It has been held that a painter is not a mechanic; 107 Mich. 270; and that a printer is one; 53 Ia. 474. A dentist is a mechanic in Michigan; 17 Mich. 332; but not in Mississippi; 31 Miss. 567.

MECHANICAL PURSUIT. One closely allied to or incidental to some kind of manufacturing business. 65 Minn. 263. Mining of iron is a mechanical business; id. A mechanic who contracts and shapes materials with his hands is engaged in such a pursuit, in the sense of a statute exempting such from taxation; 43 La. Ann. 1180.

MECHANIC'S LIEN. See LIEN.

MEDALS. The word medals in a bequest will pass curious pieces of current coin kept by the testator with his medals. 3 Atk. 202; Wms. Ex. 1205.

MEDIA ANNATA. In Spanish Law. Profits of land received every six months. 5 Tex. 79.

MEDIATE POWERS. Those incident to primary powers, given by a principal to his agent. For example: the general authority given to collect, receive, and pay debts due by or to the principal is a primary power. In order to accomplish this, it is frequently required to settle amounts, adjust disputed claims, resist those which are unjust, and answer and defend suits; these subordinate powers are sometimes called mediate powers. Story, Ag. § 58. See 1 Campb. 43, note; 4 id. 163; 6 S. & R. 149.

MEDIATION. In International Law. States which are at war may accept an offer from a third power, or extend an offer to a third power, friendly to both, to mediate in their quarrel. But unless acceptable to both sides, any such interference amounts to intervention (q. v.), and possibly an act of war. Risley, Law of War 50.

It differs from intervention in being purely a friendly act. In the Middle Ages and down to the present time the Pope has been a frequent mediator. Mediation must be distinguished from good offices. The demand of good offices or their acceptance does not confer any right of mediation; 8 Encyc. Laws of Eng. 303.

"A mediator is a common friend who counsels both parties with a weight proportionate to their belief in his integrity and their respect for his power, but he is not an arbitrator, to whose decisions they submit their differences and whose award is binding upon them." Id., quoting Sir James Mackintosh.

MEDIATORS OF QUESTIONS. Six persons authorized, under statute in the reign of Edw. III., to certify and settle, before the mayor and officers of the staple, questions arising among merchants, relating to the wool trade. Toml. Staple.

MEDICAL ATTENDANCE. See MEDICINE.

MEDICAL EVIDENCE. Testimony given by physicians or surgeons in their professional capacity as experts, or derived from the statements of writers of medical or surgical works.

This kind of evidence was first recognized by Charles V. of Germany, and incorporated in the "Caroline Code," framed at Ratisbon in 1532, wherein it was ordained that the opinion of medical men—at first surgeons only—should be received in cases of death by violent or unnatural means, when suspicion existed of a criminal agency. The publication of this code encouraged the members of the medical profession to renewed activity, tending greatly to advance their science and the cause of justice generally. Many books soon appeared on the subject of medical jurisprudence, and the importance of medical evidence was more fully understood. Elwell, Malp. & Med. Ev. 285.

The evidence of the medical witness is strictly that of an expert; Elwell, Malp. & Med. Ev. 275; 10 How. Pr. 289; 2 Conn. 514; 1 Chandl. Wis. 178; 2 Ohio 452; 27 N. H. 157; 17 Wend. 136; 7 Cush. 219; 1 Phill. Ev. 780; 1 Whart. Ev. § 441.

In the case of Rogers, 7 Metc. 506, Shaw, C. J., presiding, the court held that the proper question to be put to the professional witness was: "If the symptoms and indications testified to by other witnesses are proved, and if the jury are satisfied of the truth of them, whether in his [the witness's] opinion the party was insane, and what the nature and character of that insanity; and what state did they indicate, and what he would expect would be the conduct of such a person in any supposed circumstance." Under this ruling the medical witness passes upon the condition of the person whose condition is at issue. To do it correctly he must hear all the evidence that the jury hears; he must judge as to the relevance of the evidence of others, and make an application of the facts that legally and properly bear upon the case to it, and reject all others; in short, he is judge and jury in the case. Since the trial of Rogers, a different rule has been adopted by the courts in Massachusetts. In the case of the United States v. McGlue, reported in 1 Curt., Mr. Justice Curtis instructed the jury that medical experts "were not allowed to give opinions in the case."

See Elwell, Malp. & Med. Ev. 311; Tayl. Med. Jur. 61; EXPERTS; HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATION; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION; OPINION; PHYSICIAN.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE. That science which applies the principles and practice of medicine to the elucidation and settlement of doubtful questions which arise in courts of law.

These questions are properly embraced in five different classes:—

The first includes questions arising out of the relations of sex: as, impotence and sterility, hermaphroditism, rape, pregnancy, legitimacy, delivery.

The second, injuries inflicted upon the living organization: as, infanticide, wounds, poisons, persons found dead.

The third, those arising out of disqualifying diseases: as, the different forms of mental alienation.

The fourth, those arising out of deceptive practice; as, feigned diseases.

The fifth is made up of miscellaneous questions: as, age, identity, presumption of seniorship, life assurance, and medical evidence.

See the several titles.

MEDICINE. The practice of medicine includes the application and use of medicines and drugs for the purpose of curing, mitigating, or alleviating bodily diseases, while the practice of surgery is limited to manual operations usually performed by surgical instruments or appliances. 24 Hun 633.

The primary meaning of the terms medical attendance or medical services is the rendering of professional medical services.

See DRUGGIST; DRUGS; PHYSICIAN.

MEDICO-LEGAL. Relating to the law concerning medical questions.

MEDIETAS LINGUÆ (Lat. half tongue). A term denoting that a jury is to be composed of persons one-half of whom speak the English and one-half a foreign language. See JURY.

MEDIO ACQUIETANDO. A judicial writ to distrain a lord for the acquitting of a mesne lord from a rent, which he had acknowledged in court not to belong to him. Reg. Jur. 129.

MEDITATIO FUGÆ. In Scotch Law. If a creditor apprehends that his debtor is about to fly the country, he may appear before a judge and swear that he believes his debtor to be in meditatione fugæ, when a warrant imprisoning him will be granted, which, however, is taken off on the debtor's finding caution, i. e. surety. Bell; Moz. & W.

MEDITERRANEAN PASSPORT. A pass issued by the admiralty of Great Britain under various treaties with the Barbary States in the eighteenth century. They were granted to British built ships and were respected by the Barbary pirates. See 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 100. They were also issued by the United States. The term is still retained in R. S. § 4191 (act of Mar. 2, 1803).

MEDLEY. An affray; a sudden or casual fighting; a hand-to-hand battle; a mêlée.

MEDSCEAT. A bribe; hush money. Anc. Inst. Eug.

MEETING. A number of people having a common duty or function, who have come together for any legal purpose, or the transaction of business of a common interest; an assembly. One person does not constitute a meeting. 2 Q. B. Div. 26.

An assemblage of the creditors of an insolvent or bankrupt duly summoned in accordance with the statute under which the case is proceeding is known as a creditors' meeting, and under such statutes certain powers are usually devolved upon it by law with respect to the management of the estate and the discharge of the debtor.

In the law of corporations the term applies to every duly convened assembly either of stockholders, or of directors, managers, etc.

A distinction is made between general stated meetings of a corporation and special meetings. The former occur at stated times usually fixed by the constitution and by-laws; the latter are called for special purposes or business. Generally speaking, every member of a corporation has a right to be present at every meeting thereof, and to be notified of the meeting, in some way; 22 N. Y. 128; 2 H. L. C. 789. In the absence of a by-law or a custom to the contrary, at least one full day's notice must be given of a directors' meeting of a corporation; 173 Pa. 30. An omission to give the required notice will generally, though it be accidental, invalidate the proceedings; 7 B. & C. 695; see 55 Ark. 473; but it will not, where the action taken thereat is duly ratified at a subsequent meeting; 35 Fed. Rep. 161. When all who are entitled to be present at a meeting are present, whether notice has been given or not, and no objection is made on account of the want of formalities, there is a waiver of the want of notice; 11 Wend. 604; 7 Ind. 647; 53 Minn. 381; but if any one member is absent or refuses to give his consent, the proceedings are invalidated; 14 Gray 440. Notice should be personal; 7 Conn. 214; in writing, and signed by the proper person; 23 N. J. Eq. 216; should state the time and place of meeting, and, if a special meeting, the business to be transacted; 14 Gray 440; L. R. 2 Ch. 191. Ordinarily, notice of stated meetings is not required; 22 N. Y. 128. A general notice, not specifying the business to be transacted, is all that is necessary to authorize the transaction of the ordinary business affairs of the corporation; 138 N. Y. 557.

All proceedings carried on by the members of a corporation, while sitting outside of the state which created it, are void; 45 Ga. 34; 38 Me. 343; 19 So. Rep. (Fla.) 172; 148 Mass. 249; 64 Md. 85; but this rule does not apply to the meetings of the directors of a corporation; Moraw. Priv. Corp. § 533; 27 Ohio St. 343; 63 Barb. 415; and a corporation created by the laws of two states may hold its meetings and transact its business in either state; 31 Ohio St. 317. See Blackwell, Meetings; 2 Weimer, Corp. Law, App., for an interesting paper on corporate meetings, by Hon. George M. Dallas; FAMILY MEETINGS; DIRECTORS; STOCKHOLDERS; INSOLVENCY; PROXY; MAJORITY; QUORUM; MINUTES.

MELANCHOLIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. A name given by the ancients to a species of partial intellectual mania, now more generally known by the name of monomania. It bore this name because it was supposed to be always attended by dejection of mind and gloomy ideas. See MANIA.

MELDFEOH. A recompense given to a person who made discovery of any breach of penal laws committed by another person.

MELIORATIONS. In Scotch Law. Improvements of an estate, other than mere repairs; betterments. 1 Bell, Com. 73.

MELIUS INQUIRENDUM VEL INQUIRENDO. In Old English Practice. A writ which in certain cases issued after an imperfect inquisition returned on a capias utligatum in outlawry. This melius inquirendum commanded the sheriff to summon another inquest in order that the value, etc., of lands, etc., might be better or more correctly ascertained.

MEMBER. A limb of the body useful in self-defence. Membrum est pars corporis habens destinatam operationem in corpore. Co. Litt. 126 a.

An individual who belongs to a firm, partnership, company, or corporation. A statutory provision that all the members of a company shall, in certain cases, be liable, is not confined to such as were members when the debts were contracted; 12 Metc. 3. See CORPORATION; PARTNERSHIP; JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

One who belongs to a legislative body, or other branch of the government; as, a member of the house of representatives; a member of the court.

A child living with the father does not necessarily cease to be a member of his family on reaching his majority; 79 Ill. 584.

MEMBER OF CONGRESS. A member of the senate or house of representatives of the United States.

MEMBERS. In English Law. Places where a custom-house has been kept of old time, with officers or deputies in attendance; and they are lawful places of exportation or importation. 1 Chitty, Com. Law, 726.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT. See HOUSE OF COMMONS; HOUSE OF LORDS; PARLIAMENT.

MEMBRANA (Lat.). In Civil and Old English Law. Parchment; a skin of parchment. Vocab. Jur. Utr.; Du Cange. The English rolls were composed of several skins, sometimes as many as forty-seven. Hale, Hist. Comm. Law 17.

MEMOIRE. In French Law. A document in the form of a petition by which appeals to the court of cassation are initiated.

MEMORANDUM (Lat. from memorare, to remember). An informal instrument recording some fact or agreement: so called from its beginning, when it was made in Latin. It is sometimes commenced with this word though written in English: as, "Memorandum, that it is agreed;" or it is headed with the words, Be it remembered that, etc. The term memorandum is also applied to the cause of an instrument.

A note to help the memory. 33 Conn. 517. A letter may be a memorandum. Id.

The word is also used in England to designate the objects for which a trading corporation is formed. The term prospectus is commonly used in the United States. See PROSPECTUS.

In English Practice. The commencement of a record in king's bench, now written in English, "Be it remembered," and which gives name to the whole clause.

It is only used in proceedings by bill, and not in proceedings by original, and was introduced to call attention to what was considered the bye-business of the court. 2 Tidd, Pract. 775. Memorandum is applied, also, to other forms and documents in English practice: e. g. memorandum in error, a document alleging error in fact and accompanied by an affidavit of such matter of fact. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, § 158. Kerr's Act. Law. Proceedings in error are now abolished in civil cases; Jud. Act, 1875. Also, a memorandum of appearance, etc., in the general sense of an informal instrument, recording some fact or agreement.

A memorandum of association is a document subscribed by seven or more persons for the purpose of forming themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability. 3 Steph. Com. 20.

In Contracts. A writing required by the Statute of Frauds. See NOTE OR MEMORANDUM.

In the Law of Evidence. A witness may refresh his memory by referring to a written instrument, memorandum, or entry in a book, and may be compelled to do so, if the writing is in court; 20 Pick. 441; 11 S. C. 195; see 63 Hun 439; 31 Fla. 196; but the memorandum is not competent evidence to prove the facts stated, in itself; 96 Cal. 462; see 40 Minn. 325; nor is the memorandum admitted in evidence merely because the witness uses it to refresh his recollection; 130 U. S. 611. The writing need not be an original or made by the witness himself, provided, after inspecting it, he can speak from his own recollection, not relying wholly upon the writing; 10 N. H. 544; 14 Cent. L. J. 119; 10 N. C. 167; 39 Mich. 108; 87 Ga. 393; 33 Neb. 150; 53 Minn. 360. And a writing may be referred to by a witness, even if inadmissible as evidence itself; 8 East 273; 45 Ill. App. 368. A witness may refer to a writing which he remembers having seen before, and which he knew at that time to be correct, although he has no recollection of the facts contained therein; so, when he neither recognizes the writing nor remembers anything therein, but yet, knowing it to be genuine, his mind is so convinced, that he is enabled to swear to the fact, as where a banker's clerk is shown a bill of exchange with his own writing upon it; Whart. Ev. § 518; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 436–439. See 1 Houst. Cr. C. 476; 76 N. Y. 604; 18 Hun 443; 39 Mich. 405; 25 Minn. 160; 64 Vt. 511. The admission in evidence of a memorandum made by the witness is error if it does not appear that the witness could not have testified from memory; 47 Minn. 403. See 67 Hun 365.

A memorandum book, out of which some of the entries bearing on the cause of action have been torn after the action was commenced, is not admissible in evidence; 88 Va. 695. Memoranda, if admissible at all as independent evidence, cannot be admitted when it is not shown that they were made at the time of the transactions referred to, or why they were made; 151 U. S. 149.

A witness may refresh his memory by reference to a copy of a memorandum made by him, only where it is first shown that the copy is correct; 96 Ala. 363.

In Insurance. A clause in a policy limiting the liability of the insurer.

Policies of insurance on risks of transportation by water generally contain exceptions of all liability from loss on certain articles other than total, or for contributions for general average; and for liability for particular average on certain other articles supposed to be perishable or specially liable to damage, under specified rates on each, varying from three per cent. to twenty, and for any loss whatever under three or five per cent. Some seventy or eighty articles are subject to these exceptions of particular average in the divers forms of policy in use in different places; 1 Phill. Ins. § 54, n. These exceptions were formerly introduced under a "memorandum," or "N. B.," and hence have been called "memorandum articles," and the body of exceptions the "memorandum." The list of articles and rates of exceptions vary much in different places, and from time to time at the same place; 19 N. Y. 272.

The construction of these exceptions has been a pregnant subject in jurisprudence. 1 Stark. 436; 3 Campb. 429; 4 Maule & S. 503; 5 id. 47; 1 Ball & B. 358; 3 B. & Ad. 20; 5 id. 225; 4 B. & C. 736; 7 id. 219; 8 Bingh. 458; 16 E. L. & Eq. 461; 1 Bingh. N. C. 526; 2 id. 383; 3 id. 266; 3 Pick. 46; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 289; 2 Sumn. 366; 16 Me. 207; 31 id. 455; 1 Wheat. 219; 6 Mass. 465; 15 East 559; 9 Gill & J. 337; 7 Cra. 415; 8 id. 84; 1 Stor. 463; Stevens. Av. p. 214; Benecke, Av. by Phill. 402; 3 Conn. 357; 19 N. Y. 272; [1893] Prob. 209; id. 164.

MEMORANDUM ARTICLES. A term used to designate the articles of merchandise mentioned in the memorandum clause. See MEMORANDUM.

MEMORANDUM CHECK. It is not unusual among merchants, when one makes a temporary loan to another, to give the lender a check on a bank, with the express or implied agreement that it shall be redeemed by the maker himself, and that it shall not be presented at the bank for payment; such understanding being denoted by the word memorandum upon it. If passed to a third person, it will be valid in his hands like any other check; 4 Du. N. Y. 122; 11 Paige, Ch. 612; 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 200. Being given by the maker to the payee rather as a memorandum of indebtedness than as a payment, between these parties it is considered as a due bill, or an I. O. U. It can be sued upon as a promissory note, without presentment to the bank, whereas the holder of a regular check must first demand its payment at bank, and be refused, before he can maintain an action against the drawer; Van Schaack, Bank Checks 184.

The fact that the word "memorandum" or an abbreviation of it is written on a check makes it a memorandum check, but the bank is not bound to pay any attention to these words, and if such a check is presented for payment and the drawer has sufficient funds to meet it the bank must honor it like any ordinary check; Norton, Bills and Notes 383. If the agreement between the maker and payee is that it shall not be presented for payment, any remedy of the drawer for the breach of such agreement is solely against the payee; Morse, Banks 313. Such a check has all the features of a negotiable instrument in the hands of a bona fide holder for value; id. See CHECK.

MEMORANDUM CLAUSE. A clause inserted in a marine insurance policy to prevent the underwriters from being liable for injury to goods of a peculiarly perishable nature, and for minor damages. Maude & P. Shipp. 371. See MEMORANDUM.

MEMORANDUM IN ERROR. A document alleging error in fact, accompanied by an affidavit of such matter of fact. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 158.

MEMORIAL. A petition or representation made by one or more individuals to a legislative or other body. When such instrument is addressed to a court, it is called a petition.

MEMORIZATION. No action will lie for pirating a play by means of memorization alone; 5 Term 245; see 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 207, where the subject is discussed in a note by Mr. J. A. Morgan.

MEMORY. Understanding; a capacity to make contracts, a will, or to commit a crime, so far as intention is necessary.

Memory is sometimes employed to express the capacity of the understanding, and sometimes its power; when we speak of a retentive memory, we use it in the former sense; when of a ready memory, in the latter. Shelford, Lun. Intr. 29, 30.

The reputation, good or bad, which a man leaves at his death.

This memory, when good, is highly prized by the relations of the deceased; and it is therefore libellous to throw a shade over the memory of the dead, when the writing has a tendency to create a breach of the peace, by inciting the friends and relations of the deceased to avenge the insult offered to the family. 4 Term 126; 5 Co. 125; Hawkins, Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 73, s. 1. See LIBEL; PRIVACY.

As to witness refreshing his memory, see MEMORANDUM.

MEMORY, TIME OF. According to the English common law, which has been altered by 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 71, the time of memory commenced from the reign of Richard the First, A. D. 1189. 2 Bla. Com. 31.

But proof of a regular usage for twenty years, not explained or contradicted, is evidence upon which many public and private rights are held, and sufficient for a jury in finding the existence of an immemorial custom or prescription; 2 Saund. 175 a, d; Peake, Ev. 336; 2 Price, Exch. 450; 4 id. 198.

MEN OF STRAW. Men who used in former days to ply about courts of law, so called from their manner of making known their occupation (i. e. by a straw in one of their shoes), recognized by the name of straw-shoes. An advocate or lawyer who wanted a convenient witness, knew by these signs where to find one, and the colloquy between the parties was brief. "Don't you remember?" said the advocate (the party looked at the fee and gave no sign; but the fee increased, and the powers of memory increased with it)—"To be sure I do." "Then come into court and swear it." And straw-shoes went into court and swore it. Athens abounded in straw-shoes. 13 L. Quart. Rev. 344.

MENACE. A threat; a declaration of an intention to cause evil to happen to another. The word menace is not restricted to threats of violence to person and property nor to threats of accusing a person of crime; it includes a threat to accuse one of immoral conduct; [1895] 1 Q. B. 706.

When menaces to do an injury to another have been made, the party making them may, in general, be held to bail to keep the peace; and when followed by any inconvenience or loss, the injured party has a civil action against the wrong-doer. Webb, Poll. Torts 210. Comyns, Dig. Battery (D); Viner, Abr.; Bacon, Abr. Assault; Co. Litt. 161 a, 162 b, 253 b; 2 Lutw. 1428. See THREAT.

MENIAL. Pertaining to servants or domestic service; servile. This term is applied to servants who live under their master's roof. See stat. 2 Hen. IV. c. 21; 1 Bla. Com. 425. It has been held not applicable to a housekeeper in a large hotel; I. R. 10 C. L. 188.

MENS REA. A term meaning a guilty intent and commonly used only in connection with the maxim, actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea.

The use of the term and the maxim has been criticised. "Though the phrase is in common use, I think it most unfortunate . . . and actually misleading. . . . It naturally suggests that, apart from all particular definitions of crimes, such a thing exists as a 'mens rea' or 'guilty mind,' which is always expressly or by implication involved in every definition. This is obviously not the case, for the mental elements of different crimes differ widely. 'Mens rea' means, in the case of murder, malice aforethought; in the case of theft an intention to steal. . . . In some cases it denotes mere inattention. For instance, in the case of manslaughter by negligence it may mean forgetting to notice a signal. It appears confusing to call dissimilar states of mind by one name. . . . To an unlegal mind, it suggests that, by the law of England, no act is a crime which is done from laudable motives; in other words, that immorality is essential to crime." Stephen, J., in L. R. 23 Q. B. D. 186.

The maxim about "mens rea" means no more than that the definition of all, or nearly all, crimes contains not only an outward and visible element, but a mental element, varying according to the different nature of different crimes. To comprehend "mens rea" we must have a detailed examination of the definitions of particular crimes, and therefore the expression is unmeaning. 2 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 95.

In offences against the acts relating to adulterating food, etc., the defence of mens rea is not good unless the acts use the word "wilfully"; [1896] 1 Q. B. 65.

See 13 Cr. L. Mag. 331; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. §§ 287, 288, 303 a; 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 16; IGNORANCE; MOTIVE.

MENSA (Lat.). An obsolete term, comprehending all goods and necessaries for livelihoods.

MENSA ET THORO. See DIVORCE; A MENSA ET THORO.

MENSURA DOMINI REGIS. The measure of our lord the king, being the weights and measures established under King Richard I. in his parliament at Westminster, 1197. 1 Bla. Com. 275; Moz. & W.

MENTAL INCAPACITY. See DELIRIUM; DELUSION; DEMENTIA; IDIOCY; IMBECILITY; INSANITY; MANIA.

MENTAL RESERVATION. A silent exception to the general words of a promise or agreement not expressed, on account of a general understanding on the subject. But the word has been applied to an exception existing in the mind of the one party only, and has been degraded to signify a dishonest excuse for evading or infringing a promise. Wharton.

MENTAL SUFFERING. Where mental suffering is the natural and proximate result of a tort or of a breach of contract it is a proper subject of compensation, but standing alone it will not support an action of which actual damages is the basis; Hale, Dam. §§ 39, 40.

It was the common-law rule that mental suffering unconnected with physical injury or other element of damage to person or property, is not a cause of action for which damages may be recovered; 68 Miss. 748; L. R. 10 Q. B. 122; 9 H. L. Cas. 577; 13 App. Div. N. Y. 253; 116 Mo. 34; 61 Mo. App. 586; 48 La. Ann. 1431; 85 Ill. 331; 27 Kan. 544; 6 Nev. 224; 18 R. I. 791; 3 Dak. 315; 32 Fla. 434.

This continues to be the prevailing rule with respect to all actions upon contracts of which the consideration is something having a specific value in money. In such cases mental suffering is treated as not being within the limitations of the doctrine of proximate cause and natural consequence as settled in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Excheq. 341; 6 Tex. Civ. App. 755; 2 id. 322; 107 N. C. 449. A line of cases contra is based upon a decision in 55 Tex. 308, which has been followed in several states; 89 Ala. 510; 111 id. 135; 86 Tenn. 695; 123 Ind. 294; 97 Tenn. 638; 77 Ia. 54; 71 Mo. 66; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 699; but the doctrine of these cases has been the subject of severe criticism. In 68 Miss. 748, Cooper, J., said:

"The rapid multiplication of cases of this character in the state of Texas, since the case of So Relle, indicates to some extent the field of speculative litigation opened up by that decision . . . Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, and Alabama have but recently established the rule, the dangers and difficulties of which are becoming apparent in Texas, the intolerable litigation invited and appearing in Texas has not yet fairly commenced in those states. It will, however, appear in due time, and the courts will be forced to resort to refined limitations, as Texas has done, to restrict it We prefer the safety afforded by the conservatism of the old law, as we understand it to be, and are of the opinion that no recovery for mental suffering can be had in this case."

The federal courts uniformly deny the right to recover damages in such cases: 44 Fed. Rep. 554; 54 id. 634; 55 id. 603; 59 id. 433; 57 id. 471. In the case last cited Pardee, J., after discussing the authorities, said:

"The general rule that mental anguish and sufferings, unattended by any injury to the person, resulting from simple actionable negligence, cannot be sufficient basis for an action for the recovery of damages, is maintained and supported by an unbroken line of English authorities, by the conceded state of the general law prior to the So Relle Case, 55 Texas, 308 (1881), and by the uniform decisions of the federal courts and decisions of the supreme courts of Nevada, Dakota, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, Georgia, Massachusetts, and by the opinions of several text writers of unquestioned standing as expounders of the law."

In the latest federal case the mental suffering complained of was held on demurrer not to be the proximate cause of the injury, and this was said to render it unnecessary to pass upon the question whether it "is in California under any circumstances, a proper element of damages;" 73 Fed. Rep. 273.

It was early settled that substantial damages might be recovered in a class of actions of tort where the only injury suffered is mental, such as cases:—of assault without physical contact; 3 C. & P. 373; 57 Me. 202; 5 Md. 450; 45 Vt. 476; for false imprisonment, where the plaintiff has not been touched by the defendant; 6 C. & P. 774; 4 Bing. N. C. 212; 33 Ill. 473; for the mutilation of a husband's body by dissection; 47 Minn. 307; for wrongful or wanton removal of a child's body from a burial lot; 99 Mass. 281; for wrongful ejection from a train; 77 Ia. 54; for slander and libel; 17 N. Y. 54; for malicious prosecution; 49 Ind. 341; where a conductor kissed a woman passenger against her will; 36 Wis. 657. So also in cases upon contracts, of which the consideration is not pecuniary in its nature, mental suffering has been treated as a proper basis for damages. Exceptions to the general rule upon this footing are, breach of promise of marriage; 102 Mass. 395; 96 Mo. 424; 47 Cal. 194; 33 Md. 288; breach of an undertaker's contract to keep safely the body of a child; 125 Ind. 536; and so also in case of an action by a wife against a railroad company for negligence in transporting her husband's body; 82 Tex. 33; and by one arrested for failure to appear as a witness by reason of negligence of a policeman in signing in blank a warrant of arrest containing a false recital of service of subpœna on the witness; 68 Conn. 392.

Mental suffering accompanying physical pain is a subject of compensation; 4 Q. B. Div. 406; 20 How. 34; 1 Sawy. 539; 39 Fed. Rep. 315; 63 Ala. 266; 76 Ga. 311; 86 Ky. 565; 73 Ia. 241; 99 Mass. 552; 62 Barb. 364; the two cannot be disassociated; 131 U. S. 22; 92 Ala. 210. So is fright caused by apprehension of physical harm; 79 Ala. 328; or nervous shock produced by a false report of a husband's injury; [1897] 2 Q. B. 57; 73 Ia. 241; but see 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 88; so loss of peace of mind and happiness; 21 Ind. 164; sense of insult or indignity, mortification or wounded pride; 5 Sawy. 107; 9 id. 386; 48 Ark. 396; 79 Ala. 328; 79 Ga. 358; 112 Ill. 295; sense of shame and humiliation; 32 Fed. Rep. 66; 131 Mass. 574; 119 Ind. 13; 72 Mo. 407; 36 Wis. 657.

Fright alone is not, in the absence of personal injury, a ground of recovery; 147 Pa. 40; 6 Nev. 224; 60 Fed. Rep. 557; 86 Tex. 402; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1084; though it produced a miscarriage; 47 Hun 355; 151 N. Y. 107; contra, 60 Miss. 906; 36 Wis. 596; 76 Tex. 210. See, as to fright, 14 L. R. A. 666, n.

A nervous shock resulting in bodily illness, and caused by another's negligence, is too remote to enter into the measure of damages; 13 App. Cas. 222; but this point is said to be generally disapproved in England; Poll. Torts 49. Even in cases where mental suffering properly enters into the computation of damages, they are not allowed for such as result from mere disappointment; 8 U. S. App. 118; or apprehension of danger to one's family; 71 Me. 227; of the result of injury to a child from negligence; 8 Tex. Civ. App. 335; 18 R. I. 79.

See, generally, Sedgw. Dam. §§ 43–52; Hale, Dam. §§ 39, 40; Webb, Poll. Torts 54–57; 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 405–419; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

MENU, LAWS OF. Institutes of Hindu law, dating back probably three thousand years, though the Hindus believe they were promulgated "in the beginning of time, by Menu, son, or grandson, of Brahma, the first of created beings, and not the oldest only, but the holiest of legislators."

"Such rules of the system as relate to man in his social relations will be found singularly wise and just, and not a few of them embodying the substance of important rules, which regulate the complex system of business in our day." Our knowledge of these laws is derived chiefly from the translation of Sir William Jones, and a translation by A. L. Des Longchamps, 1833. See Maine's Anc. L.; 9 Am. Law Reg. o. s. 717; CODE.

MERCANTILE AGENCY. See COMMERCIAL AGENCY; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS; LIBEL.

MERCANTILE LAW. That branch of law which defines and enforces the rights, duties, and liabilities arising out of mercantile transactions and relations. As to the origin of this branch of law, see LAW MERCHANT; and for its various principles, consult the articles upon the various classes of commercial property, relations, and transactions.

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT ACTS. The statutes 19 & 20 Vict. cc. 60 and 97, passed mainly for the purpose of assimilating the mercantile law of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MERCATUM (Lat.). A market. Du Cange. A contract of sale. Id. Supplies for an army (commeatus). Id. See Bracton 56; Fleta, l. 4, c. 28, §§ 13, 14.

MERCEN-LAGE. The law of the Mercians. One of the three principal systems of laws which prevailed in England about the beginning of the eleventh century. It was observed in many of the midland counties, and those bordering on the principality of Wales. 1 Bla. Com. 65.

MERCES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Reward of labor in money or other things. As distinguished from pensio, it means the rent of farms (prædia rustica). Calvinus, Lex.

MERCHANDISE (Lat. merx). A term including all those things which merchants sell, either wholesale or retail: as, dry goods, hardware, groceries, drugs, etc. It is usually applied to personal chattels only, and to those which are not required for food or immediate support, but such as remain after having been used, or which are used only by a slow consumption. See Pardessus, n. 8; Dig. 13, 3, 1; 19, 4, 1; 50, 16, 66; 8 Pet. 277; 6 Wend. 335.

It may be and often is used as the synonym of "goods," "wares" and "commodities." If used in an insurance policy to describe the goods of a merchant it may very properly be limited to goods intended for sale. If used for the same purpose to describe the goods of a painter, it may be held to cover property intended for use, and not for sale; 84 Me. 524.

Mere evidences of value, as bank-bills, are not merchandise. "The fact that a thing is sometimes bought and sold does not make it merchandise." Story, J., 2 Stor. C. C. 10, 53, 54. See 2 Mass. 467; 20 Pick. 9; 3 Metc. Mass. 367; 2 Parsons, Contr. 331, note w.

"Goods, wares, merchandise," has been held to embrace animate, as well as inanimate, property, as oxen; 20 Mich. 353; or horses; 22 Vt. 655. "Merchandise" may include a curricle; Anth. N. P. 157; or shares in a joint-stock company; 60 Me. 430; 2 Mo. App. 51; or horses and trucks; 26 Fed. Rep. 766. See STACK.

MERCHANT (Lat. mercator, merx). A man who traffics or carries on trade with foreign countries, or who exports and imports goods and sells them by wholesale. Webster, Dict.; Lex Mercatoria 23. These are known by the name of shipping-merchants. See Comyns, Dig. Merchant (A); Dy. 279 b; Bacon, Abr. Merchant.

One whose business it is to buy and sell merchandise: this applies to all persons who habitually trade in merchandise. 1 W. & S. 469; 2 Salk. 445.

One who is engaged in the purchase and sale of goods; a trafficker; a trader. 4 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 378.

Merchants, in the statute of limitations, means not merely those trading beyond sea, as formerly held; 1 Chanc. Cas. 152; 1 W. & S. 469; but whether it includes common retail tradesmen, quære; 1 Mod. 238; 4 Scott N. R. 819; 2 Parsons, Contr. 369, 370. See, also, 5 Cra. 15; 6 Pet. 151; 12 id. 300; 5 Mas. 505; 2 Duv. 107; 9 Bush 569.

The term has been held to include: an ice-dealer; 36 Mo. App. 584; a hotel-keeper; 12 Duv. 107; a banker; 84 La. Ann. 576; the keeper of a boarding stable; 17 Bankr. Rep. 73; and a saloon-keeper; id. 102; but not a brewer; L. R. 7 Ex. 127; a commercial traveller or drummer; 58 Miss. 478; 84 Kan. 434; the superintendent and treasurer of a steamboat corporation; 7 Fed. Rep. 853; a theatrical manager; 4 id. 519; or a speculator in stocks; 5 Ben. 315; 8 id. 563; L. R. 2 Ch. 466, 77 Me. 275; a farmer; 3 T. B. Monr. 330; a druggist; 9 Bush 569; or the principal of a boarding school who provides the students with clothes and books; 5 Humph. 394.

According to an old authority, there were four species of merchants: namely, merchant adventurers, merchants dormant, merchant travellers, and merchant residents; 2 Brownl. 99. See, generally, 9 Salk. 445; Bacon, Abr.; Comyns, Dig.; 1 Bla. Com. 75, 260; 1 Pardessus, Droit Comm. n. 78; 2 Show. 326; Bracton 334.

MERCHANT APPRAISERS. Merchants selected, under the revenue laws, to appraise the value of imports, where the importer is dissatisfied with the official appraisement, and there is no appraiser appointed by law. The collector appoints two respectable resident merchants; R. S. § 2609.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS. Certain English statutes, beginning with the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 131, whereby a general superintendence of merchant shipping is vested in the board of trade. Provisions are made for the registration, etc., of merchant ships, the discipline and protection of seamen, the regulation of pilotage, etc.

MERCHANTABLE. This word in a contract means, generally, vendible in market. Merchandise is vendible because of its fitness to serve its proper purpose; 11 Ct. Cl. 680; 34 Barb. 204, 206. See, generally, 74 Me. 475; 24 Wis. 340; 2 Q. B. Div. 102; 51 Vt. 480; 37 Ohio St. 236; 102 Mass. 365.

MERCHANTMAN. A ship or vessel employed in the merchant-service.

MERCHANT VESSELS, IMMUNITIES OF. In international law, a merchant vessel in a foreign port is subject to the jurisdiction of the foreign state. In France, however, it is held that acts and offences connected solely with the discipline of the ship are not subject to the local laws; Snow, Int. Law 36. See VESSEL.

MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS. Accounts between merchant and merchant, which must be current, mutual, and unsettled, consisting of debts and credits for merchandise. 6 How. (Miss.) 328; 4 Cra. C. C. 696; 6 Pet. 151.

The statutes of limitation in most of the states contain an exception in favor of such accounts, following the stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 16, § 3, which, however, was repealed in England by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, § 9, and has not been retained in the latest revised acts of limitation in this country. Whether the exception applied to accounts in which there had been no item for six years, has been the subject of conflicting adjudication, but was settled affirmatively in England, in Robinson v. Alexander, 8 Bligh N. S. 352. See 8 M. & W. 781; 20 Johns. 576; 7 Cra. 350; 61 Ala. 41; 24 Minn. 17; 30 N. J. Eq. 254; Ang. Lim. ch. xv.

MERCHET. A fine or composition paid by inferior tenants to their lord for liberty to dispose of their daughters in marriage. Cow.

MERCIMOMATUS ANGLIÆ. The impost of England upon merchandise.

MERCY (Law Fr. merci; Lat. misericordia).

In Practice. The arbitrament of the king or judge in punishing offences not directly censured by law. 2 Hen. VI. c. 2; Jacob, Law Dict. So, to be in mercy, signifies to be liable to punishment at the discretion of the judge.

In Criminal Law. The total or partial remission of a punishment to which a convict is subject. When the whole punishment is remitted, it is called a pardon; when only a part of the punishment is remitted, it is frequently a conditional pardon; or, before sentence, it is called clemency or mercy. Rutherforth, Inst. 224; 1 Kent 265; 3 Story, Const. § 1488.

As to the construction of "mercy" in the exception to the Sunday laws in favor of deeds of necessity and mercy, see 2 Pars. Contr. 262, notes. See IN MERCY.

MERE (Fr.). Mother. This word is frequently used, as, in ventre sa mère, which signifies a child unborn, or in the womb.

MERE MOTION. See EX MERO MOTU.

MERE RIGHT. A right of property without possession. 2 Bla. Com. 197.

MERE-STONE. A stone for bounding land. Yearb. P. 18 Hen. VI. 5.

MERETRICIOUS. Pertaining to unlawful sexual relations. Anderson, L. Dict.

When persons who are under legal disabilities wed it is called a meretricious union; 1 Bla. Com. 436.

MERGER. The absorption of a thing of lesser importance by a greater, whereby the lesser ceases to exist but the greater is not increased.

The annihilation of one estate and its absorption in another by act of law.

The extinction of a security for a debt by the creditor's acquisition either of a higher security, or of the corpus of the property upon which his debt is a lien or charge.

Merger is distinguished from surrender and extinguishment, though in its effects not unlike both. "Strictly speaking" it has been said that it "should be confined to the sinking of one estate in another, or, at most, it should embrace, in addition, the extinction of an incorporeal hereditament through the union of its ownership with that of the land, in, over, or upon which it is exercisable." Ordinarily, however, the Roman doctrine of confusio, which we call extinguishment of a charge or equity, is also denominated merger, and, being governed by the same rules, it is here, and indeed generally, discussed under that title. See 3 Sharsw. & B. L. Cas. R. P. 228.

Of Estates. When a greater estate and less coincide and meet in one and the same person, without any intermediate estate, the less is immediately merged, that is, sunk or drowned, in the latter; but they must be in one and the same person, at one and the same time, in one and the same right; 2 Bla. Com., Sharsw. ed. 177, and note 16; Latch 153; Poph. 166; 6 Madd. 119; 1 Johns. Ch. 417; 3 id. 53; 3 Mass. 172; 32 Gratt. 305; 6 Conn. 373; 11 Ind. 351; 15 Barb. 14. But see 3 Prest. Conv. 277. See, also, 139 Pa. 309; 5 L. R. A. 721.

The estate in which the merger takes place is not enlarged by the accession of the preceding estate; and the greater or only subsisting estate continues, after the merger, precisely of the same quantity and extent of ownership as it was before the accession of the estate which is merged, and the lesser estate is extinguished; Prest. Conv. 7; Wash. R. P. As a general rule, equal estates will not merge in each other.

The merger is produced either from the meeting of an estate of higher degree with an estate of inferior degree or from the meeting of the particular estate and the immediate reversion in the same person; 4 Kent 98. See Wash. R. P. Index; 3 Prest. Conv.; 15 Viner, Abr. 361; 10 Vt. 298; 8 Watts 146.

A merger takes place only when the whole title, equitable as well as legal, unites in the same person; 74 Me. 362.

Merger is held to have taken place in the following cases: An antecedent life estate purchased by the owner of a consequent life estate limited on the former; 6 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 305; life estate of the husband in the fee of the wife, both bought by the same person; 62 Conn. 143; life estate under a will, in remainder in fee, devolved upon the life-tenant by the death of her child, the tenant in remainder; 64 Conn. 344; where a tenant acquires the interest of the landlord, in which case the former cannot recover for breach of contract of the latter to repair; 105 Ala. 585; where the tenant for life acquires the fee; 6 Ohio Dec. 439; estate by the curtesy released to the owner of the fee; 179 Pa. 117. Where a lease for years and an equity of redemption come into the same hands, the legal estate may merge in the equitable, if the parties so intended; 41 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 450; contra, 3 Cra. C. C. 416.

There has been held to be no merger in the following cases: where the tenant in tail acquires the reversion in fee; 2 Co. 61; 6 Conn. 373; a trust estate for life of testator's daughter, undisposed of after her death, in her fee by inheritance; 79 Hun 426; where the co-tenant for years is also the owner of the reversion, there is no merger so as to prevent a separate partition of the leasehold interest; 106 Cal. 682; where a landlord purchases improvements on property on which the lessee has forfeited his lease, it does not merge so as to entitle the holder of a mechanic's lien against the leasehold to enforce it against the fee; 10 Wash. 528; a conveyance in fee to husband and wife by entirety was held not to merge in an estate for life already vested in one of them; 4 Rich. Eq. 80; Co. Litt. 299 b; Litt. 525; contra, 2 Saund. 386 b. A life estate of the father by a conveyance to a trustee for ninety-nine years to secure payment of charges covenanted to be paid by the son, the succeeding tenant for life; 76 L. T. Rep. 489. Unassigned "dower" of husband in his wife's estate does not merge in the inheritance unless required for the promotion of justice; 6 Ohio Dec. 154.

Under the English judicature act of 1873, a life estate in possession conveyed to the next tenant for life in trust to pay a rent charge, and, subject thereto, to the use of the grantee in fee, does not merge the estate per auter vie, it being apparent that no merger was intended; [1892] 3 Ch. 110. See 30 L. R. A. 313 n.

Merger is not favored in equity and is only allowed to promote the intention of parties or for other special reason; 80 Md. 115; 140 Ind. 321; 113 Pa. 6; 118 Ill. 682; 68 Ia. 512; 4 Kent 102; Boone, Mort. 141–143; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 788; Jones, Mort. 870–873; the intention actual or presumed is the criterion; 18 Ves. 390; 40 W. R. 603; if no intention is expressed, equity will examine the circumstances and presume an intention in accordance with the advantage to the acquirer of the two estates; 32 Beav. 244; 18 Ves. 390; 19 R. I. 4, 268; and wherever the legal and equitable estates are united in one owner, so long as his interest requires severance, he will be regarded as holding the titles separately; Jones, Mort. § 873. See 5 Ch. D. 634. And equity will not permit a merger in the case of an easement as against the interest of a third party, with the interest of a mortgagee; 81 Md. 537.

One equity will not swallow up another, hence several equitable claims may be acquired by one person without merger, which will take place when the legal title is acquired because the reason for their existence is then terminated; 140 Ind. 321.

Merger will not be permitted, and it may be prevented, in equity, where it would operate to assist or accomplish the perpetration of a fraud; 158 Ill. 544; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 794; and a merger brought about by a fraudulent deed is destroyed when the deed is set aside; 1 Wend. 478; 49 N. Y. 111; 84 Ind. 144.

In Louisiana one who has once acquired ownership of a thing by one title cannot afterwards acquire it by another title, unless it be to supply a deficiency in the first title; Civ. Code 495; and in other states there are statutes designed to prevent or modify the effects of merger upon third parties. They are collected in 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1403.

Of Liens. The merger of liens is subject to the rule of intention as well as such other general principles, already stated, as are applicable. And it is also to be noted that while separate reference is here made to some classes of liens, the same rules are in the main applicable to all, though usually, for the sake of brevity, only once mentioned.

Generally where a lien holder acquires the legal title to the land subject to his lien, and there is no contrary intention expressed or implied, or other circumstance requiring it to be kept alive, the latter is merged; 119 Ill. 312; 69 Ia. 755; 110 N. Y. 33; and the merger cannot be prevented by an assignment of the incumbrance directly to the owner or for his benefit; 10 Allen 466; 13 Gray 360; 13 Cal. 526; 12 N. J. Eq. 515; 32 Md. 501.

Where a mortgagee acquires the legal title, merger will not be applied to defeat the priority of the lien; 104 Mich. 120; 141 Ind. 322. And a mortgage will be continued in favor of a mortgagee, although the parties undertook to discharge it, unless it would work injustice; 31 N. J. L. 325; 44 N. H. 619. There is a presumption that the mortgage was extinguished; 3 Johns. Ch. 393, Kent, C. Probably all that can be said is that it is not so as a matter of course; 62 Ia. 661; and that the rule of intent governs; 3 Pick. 475.

There is no merger where the mortgagee acquires an incomplete equitable title, or only to a portion of the land; 140 Ind. 321; or where he purchases the equity of redemption and by consent of the mortgagor retains the mortgage to cut out subsequent liens by foreclosure; 104 Mich. 120. A purchase by a partner of partnership land sold under a mortgage assumed by the firm operates to satisfy the mortgage; 119 Mo. 280.

A conveyance by a mortgagor to a mortgagee creates no merger as against the assignee of the mortgage; 10 Misc. Rep. 341; 152 N. Y. 159. Where municipal bonds in aid of a railway were disputed, sued upon, and a judgment entered pursuant to a written compromise, for less than the face of the bonds, the town's liability on the bonds was merged in the judgment; 69 Ala. 305.

See as to mortgages, Lawson, Rts. & Rem. §§ 3052-3; 3 Sharsw. & B. L. Cas. R. P. 245.

The question of merger is one which arises frequently, especially in England, with respect to charges. There is a presumption that when the ownership of the fee and of the charge meet, the latter is merged; 18 Ves. 390; if it is of no advantage to the owner to have it kept alive; 10 Hare 79; 29 Beav. 203; or unless he is a limited owner; 7 id. 232; if a charge is paid off by a limited owner, with no expression of intention, he retains the benefit of it against the inheritance; 5 Ch. D. 645; a tenant in tail is not excepted because it is in his power to become absolute owner; 2 S. & S. 345. It results from the rule of intention that in case of an infant tenant in tail there is no merger, as a person not sui juris is not presumed to intend it; 24 Beav. 457; 2 Cow. 246. See 32 Sol. Jr. 397, 418. A charge on land of a husband in favor of his wife and her heirs did not merge in the fee which she took by a devise from the husband, recognizing the charge, to her in trust for her son for life; 49 Hun 608; nor did one created by a testatrix in favor of her children on land devised to their father merge on the fee inherited by the children from the father; 19 R. I. 4.

A mechanic's lien is merged in a conveyance of the land to the lien holder; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 419; but not in a judgment for the debt; 5 Col. App. 335; 40 W. Va. 194; nor by purchase of the property under circumstances from which a contrary intention would be presumed; 160 Ill. 115. Such merger discharges a guarantor of the lien which it destroys; 97 Ia. 77; or a surety for its payment; 77 L. T. Rep. 168. A mechanic's lien assigned to one who took a mortgage on the property affected, the consideration of which was used in the purchase of the lien, did not merge, since it did not appear to be the intention of the parties or required by justice; 37 Neb. 207.

If two foreclosure decrees rendered in the same action on different obligations in favor of different persons, become the property of one person, neither will merge; 62 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 662.

Of Contracts. Oral agreements, proposals, or negotiations by letter merge in a subsequent written contract respecting the same subject-matter; 36 U. S. App. 749; s. c. 74 Fed. Rep. 94; 38 id. 116; 97 Tenn. 469; 165 Ill. 95; 10 Wash. 389; 86 Hun 189; 93 Wis. 23; so a written option to sell land is merged in the subsequent contract of sale; 38 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 601; and the seller of chattels is not liable for any breach of warranties not contained in the written contract; 73 Fed. Rep. 994; but this rule does not apply to a collateral agreement upon which the instrument is silent, not affecting its terms; 117 Cal. 96. A bank check is a contract in the sense that it merges all previous transactions leading up to it; 47 Ia. 671; so is a note; 4 Pa. 317; a charter party; 12 N. Y. 561; a bond of one party to a joint contract debt; 7 Mo. 604.

Generally the provisions of a contract of sale are merged in a deed made in execution thereof; 80 Md. 495; but not so as to prevent the enforcement in equity of a clause in the contract not inserted in the deed; 133 Ill. 385; or where the contract is for the sale of two distinct properties and the conveyance only of one; 172 Pa. 331; 6 Ohio Dec. 273; see 74 Mich. 183; 44 id. 15; but the mere absence from the deed of a provision contained in a contract does not necessarily operate to continue the latter; 26 Can. S. C. 181. A covenant in the contract to deliver possession to the purchaser is not merged in the covenants of title of the deed; 84 Hun 430. A parol agreement between father and son that the latter shall have the property after his parents' death, in consideration of help in carrying on the farm, does not merge as to the undivided half part not conveyed by a subsequent conveyance from the father to the son of an undivided half part of the property made in contemplation of the re-marriage of the father; 69 Vt. 535.

A specialty taken for a simple contract debt merges it: 40 W. Va. 194. A new contract with respect to the subject-matter of a former one, and which appears to be supplementary, does not merge the former; 43 Neb. 584. A note is not merged in a judgment note taken as additional security; 91 Va. 446. See 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 320. As to merger of the original cause of action in a judgment recovered upon it, see JUDGMENT.

In Criminal Law. When a greater crime includes a lesser, the latter is merged in the former; 1 East, P. C. 411; 72 N. C. 447; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 786; Cl. Cr. L. 35, 36; 109 Mass. 349; 7 Misc. Rep. 478. Murder, when committed by blows, necessarily includes an assault and battery; a battery, an assault; a burglary, when accompanied with a felonious taking of personal property, a larceny: in all these and similar cases, the lesser crime is merged in the greater.

Merger of crimes exists only when a misdemeanor is an ingredient of a felony; formerly there was a distinct merger and the trial must be for the felony, but this is so no longer, as a general rule; the misdemeanor and the felony must now be a constituent part of the same act in order that acquittal of the latter may be pleaded in bar of prosecution for the former; 1 Whart. Cr. L., 9th ed. §§ 270, 395; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. §§ 804–14; the essential result is thus well expressed: "The same act cannot be punishable both as a felony and as a misdemeanor;" 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 22. In many, probably most, of the states, under an indictment for certain felonies, which include a misdemeanor, there may be conviction of the latter. "When two crimes are of equal grade there can be no technical merger;" as, in the case of a conspiracy to commit a misdemeanor, and the subsequent commission of the misdemeanor in pursuance of the conspiracy; the two crimes being of equal degree, there can be no legal merger; 4 Wend. 265; 26 N. J. L. 313; 29 id. 453; 48 Me. 218; 36 Ind. 280.

The most frequent application of the principle of merger of crimes is in the common law rule which was generally followed in this country (subject to the exception just stated) that a conspiracy to commit a felony is merged in the latter, if it be accomplished; 5 Mass. 106; 5 Am. St. Rep. 900, note; if the felony is not in fact committed, there is no merger, and there may be a conviction of the conspiracy; 28 N. Y. 177; but when the crime is a misdemeanor at common law and a felony by statute, there is still a merger; 4 Park. Cr. Cas. 206. A very late authority considers that "the weight of the more recent cases" is that the conspiracy is not merged even if the crime intended be a felony; 2 McClain, Cr. L. § 979; and this view is strongly supported; 42 Fed. Rep. 829; 64 Mich. 252; 30 Conn. 500; 86 Ia. 216; and is expressly held in England; 11 Q. B. 929; 12 Cox, C. C. 87.

It has been held that where one in an effort to commit a misdemeanor does some act which is itself a felony, he can be punished only for the latter; 2 Moo. & R. 469; 5 C. & P. 553; but in referring to a case which precisely illustrates this point, where one seeking to obtain goods by false pretences, which is a misdemeanor, commits a forgery, which is a felony, Lord Denman considered that an acquittal of the latter ought to be no bar to an indictment for the former; 11 Q. B. 946. See 6 Biss. 259.

Of Rights. Rights are said to be merged when the same person who is bound to pay is also entitled to receive. This is more properly called a confusion of rights, or extinguishment.

When there is a confusion of rights, and the debtor and creditor become the same person, as by marriage, there can be no right to put in execution; but there is an immediate merger; 2 Ves. 264.

In Torts. Where a person in committing a felony also commits a tort against a private person, in this case the wrong is sunk in the felony, at least until after the felon's conviction.

The old rule, that a trespass is merged in a felony, has sometimes been supposed to mean that there is no redress by civil action for an injury which amounts to a felony. But it is now established that the defendant is liable to the party injured either after his conviction; Latch 144; Noy 82; W. Jones 147; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 546; or acquittal; 12 East 409; 2 Hayw. 108. If the civil action be commenced before, the plaintiff will be non-suited; Yelv. 90 a, n. See Ham. N. P. 63; Kel. 48; Cas. temp. Hardw. 350; Lofft 88; 3 Me. 458. Buller, J., says this doctrine is not extended beyond actions of trespass or tort; 4 Term 333. See, also, 1 H. Blackst. 583, 588, 594; 15 Mass. 78, 336; 1 Gray 88, 100.

This doctrine doubtless had its origin in the English system of relying on private prosecutors and forfeiture of felons' goods; but it has been repudiated in this country, and the civil remedy and the criminal prosecution go side by side, and neither has any dependence upon the other; 28 Fla. 96; 19 Ohio St. 462; 1 Gray 83; 30 Miss. 492; 6 N. H. 454; 6 B. Monr. 38; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 409; 67 Hun 579. Even in England it is said that "so much doubt has been thrown upon the supposed rule in recent cases that it seems, if not altogether exploded, to be only awaiting a decisive abrogation." Poll. Torts 235.

See, generally, as to this common law doctrine in the United States; 1 Ala. 8; 35 id. 184; 15 Mass. 336; 22 Wend. 285; 1 Coxe 115; 1 Miles 312; 6 Rand. 223; 1 Const. S. C. 231; 3 Root 90; 3 Hawks, N. C. 251; 16 Ga. 203; 17 Ind. 105; 19 Greenl. 392; 6 Humph. 433; 8 Tex. 6; 10 Wheat. 473, 494; 1 Hill. Torts 61.

In some states, as New York, it is provided that the right of action of any person injured by any felony shall not, in any case, be merged in such felony, or be in any manner affected thereby.

Of Corporations. Actual corporate union is usually called consolidation in America and amalgamation in England. Railroad corporations are more commonly the subject of such consolidation.

Consolidation requires legislative authority or consent; 101 U. S. 71; 30 Pa. 44; 88 Tenn. 138; 16 Ind. 46. Statutes exist in most, if not all, of the states, for this purpose. Many of them are abstracted in 1 Thomp. Corp. § 305. The state has the same power to authorize a consolidation of two existing corporations as it has to authorize individuals to incorporate; 46 Mich. 224.

A permit given in a charter of a railroad company to connect or unite with other roads, refers merely to physical connection of the tracks and does not authorize the purchase or even the lease of such roads or any union of franchises; 161 U. S. 677.

Where the charters of the constituent companies or some statute to which the charters are subject do not provide otherwise, the consent of all stockholders is required; 53 Tex. 96; 4 Biss. 78; 54 Barb. 42; a state legislature cannot ordinarily compel a stockholder to transfer his stock because the majority have voted to consolidate; 1 Wall. 25; but it has been held that the legislature may, when public necessity requires it, grant authority to consolidate existing connected railways, if it provide just compensation for dissenting stockholders; 24 N. J. Eq. 455. Where statutes existed before a consolidating company was chartered, or one is passed which is binding upon it, provisions in such statutes authorizing consolidation by the vote of a certain proportion of stockholders are binding upon a dissenting minority; such statutes commonly provide for the purchase of dissenting stock by a sale or on an appraisement. If there be no such statute or charter provision, a stockholder is not bound to consent to consolidation, nor to surrender his interest in the original corporation; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 343.

Equity will enjoin a consolidation at the suit of a dissenting stockholder, in cases where he is not bound by the action of the majority; 4 Biss. 78; 29 Vt. 45; it has been held that an injunction will be continued only till the dissenting stockholder's interest has been secured; 30 Pa. 42; 16 Ind. 46, a dictum. These two cases are criticised in 4 Biss. 78, and their doctrine disapproved in 1 Thomp. Corp. § 351. A stockholder's subscription in case of such a consolidation is held to be released; 9 Ind. 58; 4 Biss. 78.

After consolidation has been effected and a de facto corporation formed, only the state can attack the charter; 36 Kan. 121; especially if the new company has acted as a corporation for a considerable time; 51 Kan. 617.

The legal effect of consolidation is to extinguish the constituent companies and create a new corporation, with all the property, liabilities, and stockholders of the old companies; 41 Ark. 509; 64 Ala. 603; 16 Ind. 46; 27 S. C. 385; 123 Ill. 467; and all their franchises, ordinarily; id. Consolidation is not sale, and when two companies are authorized to consolidate their roads, it is to be presumed that the franchises and privileges of each continue to exist in respect to the several roads so consolidated; 109 U. S. 106; 92 U. S. 677; the respective roads and properties of two railroad companies which have been consolidated, retain their respective status towards the public and the state; id. Some cases appear to hold that the old companies continue to exist. See 123 Ill. 467; 42 Mo. 63; 151 Mass. 302 (where the statute so required). It is said in a leading case that "consolidation" has not acquired a recognized judicial construction; it may mean a union by which the old companies cease to exist, or the absorption of one by the other, the former thus securing enlarged powers. Where a statute merely authorizes consolidation upon terms to be agreed upon by the companies, the character of the consolidation is determined by the agreement; 64 Ala. 603.

Where a railroad consolidated with a smaller road, it was held that the former preserved its legal, though not its actual, identity, and that the latter and all its members passed into the former and became members thereof; 30 Pa. 45. The old companies are not of necessity dissolved; it depends upon the language of the statute; 92 U. S. 665, 676.

Technically, the consolidated company is a new corporation, but as regards the business of the old companies and their respective creditors, it is a continuation of the old companies under a new name; 39 Mo. App. 574. The new company is bound to perform the duties of the old companies; 68 Ill. 489; it usually has the powers of both of its constituents; 21 Ill. 451. "As a general rule, the new company succeeds to the rights, duties, obligations, and liabilities of each of the precedent companies, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto. The charter powers, privileges, and immunities of the corporations pass to and become vested in the consolidated company," unless otherwise provided by law; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 365. See 61 Mo. 176.

But it has been held that the powers, etc., of the new company are no greater than those of the constituent company having the fewest privileges; 66 Me. 48; a difficult rule to apply.

The new corporation as an incident of consolidation assumes the debts and liabilities of the constituent companies, and is not an innocent purchaser for value of the property of those companies so as to protect it from liability for taxation; 35 Fla. 625.

Where two roads are consolidated, one of them having a right to exemption from taxes, and the old company being extinguished, its right of exemption does not pass to the new company; 152 U. S. 301. The legislature cannot increase the taxes of the exempt company after consolidation, but may tax that of the other precedent company; and where a taxable corporation is merged into an exempt company, the property of the former is taxable; 92 U. S. 665; 117 U. S. 139. It is held that where an exempt company and a taxable company consolidate, the property of each will continue as it was before, in relation to taxation; 99 Mo. 30; 37 N. J. L. 240; 110 N. C. 137. As to betterments on a consolidated company, one of whose constituents was not taxable, see 92 U. S. 682.

Where two companies were exempt except on net earnings above ten per cent dividends and this was based upon conditions which could only be performed by the constituent companies while operating separate lines (keeping accounts and rendering certain reports to the state), and the new company mingled the assets and ran continuous trains over its lines and could not show the net profits of each road, it was held that the new company had no right to the former exemption; 96 U. S. 508.

Consolidation does not abate a suit pending against one of the companies; 106 Mo. 594; 2 Grant (Pa.) 348; 52 Miss. 159; contra, 40 Kan. 192; 40 Ga. 706. The new company may be substituted under the original process without the issue of process against it; 89 Mo. App. 382.

A railroad company is not relieved from liability on the mortgage bonds of a constituent company by consolidation; 21 N. Y. S. 702. A consolidated company may use a patent under which both of the precedent companies were licensed; 1 Low. 338; and may occupy the streets of a city, if the constituent companies had the power; 53 Fed. Rep. 715. It may sue shareholders of either old company for calls; 18 C. B. 14; 18 Ohio St. 223. Non-assenting subscribers to stock are not released; 25 Kan. 261; contra, 10 Ind. 93. A consolidated company is entitled to a donation made by a town to one of the companies; 5 Ill. App. 579; 94 Ind. 1; but see 69 Mo. 150. The title to lands conveyed to a constituent company vests in the consolidated company; 128 Ind. 266; 67 How. Pr. 439; and its mortgage, secured upon its consolidated property is paramount to the unsecured indebtedness of the constituent companies; 15 Fed. Rep. 763.

A consolidated company is liable for the debts of the constituent companies; 29 Ind. 465; and they can be enforced only against it; 56 Tex. 609; see 106 Mo. 594; even in the absence of an express declaration to that effect; 117 Ind. 501. It is held to be liable in equity for such debts at least to the value of property received; 13 Fed. Rep. 522; and the remedy at law is said to be complete; 81 Ill. 429. It is liable on a judgment against a constituent company; 43 Ill. 199. Bonds that had no lien before consolidation do not acquire a lien by consolidation; 114 U. S. 587; but see 45 Ohio St. 592. The liability of the new company extends to damages due by a constituent company to a riparian owner; 75 Ill. 524; and damages due by a constituent company for breaking into a neighbor's mine; 47 L. J. Ch. 20; and for damages caused by its negligence; 49 Ala. 582; 41 Ark. 542; 62 Ga. 682; for the death of an employe; 17 Md. 489. A cause of action on a constituent company's debt is against the consolidated company alone; 62 N. Y. 307. The necessary facts to establish liability should be averred; 32 Mich. 251.

A railroad corporation is a corporation under the laws of its state, although consolidated with a like corporation created under the laws of another state; 94 U. S. 444; and a state can legislate for that part of a consolidated company which is within its limits, just as if no consolidation had taken place; 94 U. S. 164. A consolidated inter-state corporation has, in each state, all the powers which its constituent company had in that state, but not the powers which the constituent company of the other state had in such other state; 123 Ill. 467; it acts as a unit and may transact its corporate business in one state for both; 45 Fed. Rep. 812. So far as each state has control over the charter it grants, the corporations remain different and separate; 19 Fed. Rep. 804; it dwells in both states and is a corporate entity in each; it has a citizenship identical with each; 45 Fed. Rep. 812. A constituent company consolidated with a corporation of another state remains a citizen of its own state for the purposes of federal jurisdiction; 136 U. S. 356. A railroad extending in several states is not a citizen of each for purposes of federal jurisdiction; 167 U. S. 659.

A practical merger of corporations is sometimes effected by the purchase by one company of the shares of another. This likewise requires legislative authority. See 26 N. J. Eq. 398. Or a merger may be by the purchase of all the corporate property under a statute; 20 Ind. 457. The right to consolidate with another railroad corporation includes the right to make a fair and lawful agreement with it for the interchange of traffic and for the joint use of terminal facilities, the right to buy one-half of its stock for the shareholders of the purchaser and to guarantee the payment of its bonds; 73 Fed. Rep. 933.

As to merger by lease of railroads, see LEASE. Many of the cases depend largely upon the language of statutes and of the consolidating agreement, or articles of consolidation, and should be read in connection therewith.

In many states the merger of parallel and competing lines is prohibited by the constitution. The prohibition has been held not to extend to street railways; 136 Pa. 96. It includes a projected road in process of construction; 7 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 368; and may extend to a case where the competition may arise from other lines owned or controlled by the lines proposing to consolidate; 75 Tex. 534. In Missouri the act applies only to roads within the state and to cases where the competition would have an appreciable effect on rates; 46 Fed. Rep. 88.

The constitution prohibits a scheme by which the control of the competing road is to be placed in the hands of persons named by the other road, which agreed to guarantee bonds of the competing road; 7 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 368; and one where the existing road attempted to purchase the control of a competing road; id. All contracts for leasing or controlling competing roads are held to be void; 66 N. H. 100; and so is a pooling and traffic arrangement between two companies having two hundred miles of parallel tracks; 30 Fed. Rep. 2; and one where a company guarantees the bonds of a competing railroad, receiving half its stock in consideration thereof; 161 U. S. 646.

In Georgia any contract tending to defeat or lessen competition is void; 49 Fed. Rep. 412.

Two street railways are parallel when their directions are substantially the same for two and a-half miles, though their termini and general direction are wide apart; 89 Mo. 65.

Parallel lines are not necessarily competing lines as they may command the traffic of different territories; 161 U. S. 698.

Constitutional prohibitions against the merger of competing railways do not interfere with the power of congress over inter-state commerce; 161 U. S. 677, affirming 31 S. W. Rep. 476.

See, as to consolidation generally, 79 Am. Dec. 492; 2 L. R. A. 564; 13 id. 780; 8 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 647; as to the effect of consolidation; 8 id. 572; 3 L. R. A. 435; as to how far a new corporation is created; 15 id. 82; as to effect on taxation; 17 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 436; 41 id. 702; as to aid bonds; 5 L. R. A. 728; as to lands; 44 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; as to inter-state corporations; 16 id. 490; 15 L. R. A. 82, 84; as to liability for rights and obligations of the constituent companies; 5 id. 726; 13 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 138. See REORGANIZATION.

MERITS. The state of facts of deserving; intrinsic ground of consideration or reward. Cent. Dict. The word is used principally in matters of defence.

A defence upon the merits is one that rests upon the justice of the cause, and not upon technical grounds only; there is, therefore, a difference between a good defence, which may be technical or not, and a defence on the merits; 5 B. & Ald. 703; 1 Ashm. 4; 3 Johns. 245, 449; 2 Cow. 281.

In the New York Code of Procedure, it has been held to mean "the strict legal rights of the parties as contra-distinguished from those mere questions of practice which every court regulates for itself, and from all matters which depend upon the discretion or favor of the court." 4 How. Pr. 332.

MERITORIOUS CONSIDERATION. One based upon natural love and affection. 5 Encyc. Laws of Eng. 505. See CONSIDERATION.

MERTON, STATUTE OF. An ancient English ordinance or statute, 20 Hen. III. (1235), which took its name from the place in the county of Surrey where parliament sat when it was enacted. Its provisions related chiefly to dower, usury, legitimacy of children, the right of freeman to make suit by attorney at the lord's or any county court, the inclosure of common lands, wardships. 2 Inst. 79; Barring. Stat. 41, 46; Hale, Hist. Com. Law 9, 10, 18.

MERX. Merchandise.

MESCROYANT. Used in our ancient books. An unbeliever.

MESE. An ancient word used to signify house, probably from the French maison. It is said that by this word the buildings, curtilage, orchards, and gardens will pass; Co. Litt. 56.

MESMERISM. See HYPNOTISM.

MESNALTY or MESNALITY. A manor held under a superior lord. The estate of a mesne. T. L.; Whart. Dict.; 4 Phila. 71; 14 East 234.

MESNE. Intermediate; the middle between two extremes; that part between the commencement and the end, as it relates to time.

Hence the profits which a man receives between disseisin and recovery of lands are called mesne profits. Process which is issued in a suit between the original and final process is called mesne process.

An assignment made between the original grant and a subsequent assignment, is called a mesne assignment.

Mesne incumbrances are intermediate charges, or incumbrances which have attached to property between two given periods; as, between the purchase and the conveyance of land.

In England, the word mesne also applies to a dignity; those persons who hold lordships or manors of some superior who is called lord paramount, and grant the same to inferior persons, are called mesne lords.

MESNE LORD. See MESNE.

MESNE PROCESS. See MESNE.

MESNE PROFITS. The value of the premises recovered in ejectment, during the time that the lessor of the plaintiff has been illegally kept out of the possession of his estate by the defendant: such are properly recovered by an action of trespass, quare clausum fregit, after a recovery in ejectment. 11 S. & R. 55; Bacon, Abr. Ejectment (H); 3 Bla. Com. 205.

As a general rule, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for such time as he can prove the defendant to have been in possession, provided he does not go back beyond six years; for in that case the defendant may plead the statute of limitations; 3 Yeates 13; Bull. N. P. 88. The value of the use of land during the time it was unlawfully detained by a lessee is the proper measure of lessor's damages; 65 Vt. 485. In an action to recover mesne profits, plaintiff may either prove the profits actually received, or the annual rental value of the land; 70 Md.

172. Defendant in ejectment cannot free himself from liability for mesne profits by permitting a third person to remain in actual possession; 68 Miss. 29. Exemplary damages are allowed in trespass for mesne profits, only when the defendant has acted maliciously or in bad faith; 15 R. I. 92.

The value of improvements made by the defendant may be set off against a claim for mesne profits; Wood. L. & T. 1390; but profits before the demise laid should be first deducted from the value of the improvements; 2 Wash. C. C. 165. See, generally, Wash. R. P.; Bacon, Abr. Ejectment (H); 2 Phill. Ev. 208; Adams, Ej. 13.

MESNE, WRIT OF. The name of an ancient and now obsolete writ, which lies when the lord paramount distrains on the tenant paravail: the latter shall have a writ of mesne against the lord who is mesne. Fitzh. N. B. 316.

MESS BRIEF. In Danish Law. A certificate of admeasurement granted by competent authority at the home-port of a vessel. Jacobsen, Sea-Laws 50.

MESSAGE. See TELEGRAPH.

MESSAGE FROM THE CROWN. The method of communicating between the sovereign and the house of parliament. A written message under the royal sign manual is brought by a member of the house, being a minister of the crown, or one of the royal household. Verbal messages are also sometimes delivered; May, Parl. Pr. ch. 17.

MESSAGE, PRESIDENT'S. The annual communication of the President of the United States to congress, pursuant to art. II. sec. 3, of the constitution. It is usually delivered at the commencement of the session, and embodies the president's views and suggestions concerning the general affairs of the nation. Since Jefferson's time, at least, it has been in writing. Special messages are sent to congress from time to time as the president may deem expedient. A public document edited by James D. Richardson containing all messages and state papers of the president is now in course of publication, having reached the close of the administration of Hayes in the 7th volume.

MESSE THANE. One who said mass; a priest.

MESSENGER. A person appointed to perform certain duties, generally of a ministerial character, such as carriers of messages employed by a secretary of state, or officers of a court of justice, called, in Scotland, messengers at arms. Toml.; Paterson.

The officer who takes possession of an insolvent or bankrupt estate for the judge, commissioner, or other such officer.

The messenger of the English court of chancery has the duty of attending on the great seal, either in person or by deputy, and must be ready to execute all such orders as he shall receive from the lord chancellor, lord keeper, or lords commissioners. Brown.

MESSUAGE. A term used in conveyancing, and nearly synonymous with dwelling-house.

A dwelling-house with the adjacent buildings and curtilage. 37 W. Va. 778.

A grant of a messuage with the appurtenances will not only pass a house, but all the buildings attached or belonging to it, as also its curtilage, garden, and orchard, together with the close on which the house is built; Co. Litt. 5 b; 2 Saund. 400; 4 Cruise, Dig. 321; 2 Term 502; 4 Blackf. 331. But see the cases cited in 9 B. & C. 681. This term, it is said, includes a church; 11 Co. 26; 2 Esp. 528; 1 Salk. 256; 8 B. & C. 25. And see 3 Wils. 141: 2 W. Blackst. 726; 4 M. & W. 567; 2 Bingh. N. C. 617; 1 Saund. 6; 2 Washb. R. P.

METAL. The word does not include precious metals. 2 B. & Ad. 597.

METATUS. A dwelling; a seat; a station; quarters; the place where one lives or stays. Spelman.

METAYER SYSTEM. A system under which land was divided into small farms among families, the landlord supplying the stock, and receiving in lieu of rent a fixed proportion of the produce. 1 Mill, Pol. Econ. 296, 363.

METES AND BOUNDS. The boundary-lines of land, with their terminal points and angles. Courses and distances control, unless there is matter of more certain description, e. g. natural monuments; 42 Me. 209. A joint tenant cannot convey by metes and bounds; 1 Hill. R. P. 582. See BOUNDARY.

METHOD. The mode of operating, or the means of attaining an object.

It has been questioned whether the method of making a thing can be patented. But it has been considered that a method or mode may be the subject of a patent, because when the object of two patents or effects to be produced is essentially the same, they may both be valid, if the modes of attaining the desired effect are essentially different. Dav. Pat. Cas. 290; 2 B. & Ald. 350; 2 H. Blackst. 492: 8 Term 106; 4 Burr. 2397; Perpigna, Manuel des Inventeurs, etc., c. 1, sect. 5, § 1, p. 22. See PATENT.

METRE (Greek). A measure. See MEASURE.

METRIC SYSTEM. A system of measures for length, surface, weight, values, and capacity, founded on the metre as a unit. See MEASURE.

METROPOLITAN. One of the titles of an archbishop. In England the word is frequently used to designate statutes relating exclusively to the city of London.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS. A board for the better sewer-ing, draining, lighting, etc., of the metropolis. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. See LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

METTESHEP, or METTENSCHEP. An acknowledgment paid in a certain measure of corn; or a fine or penalty imposed on tenants for default in not doing their customary service in cutting the lord's corn.

MEUBLES. In French Law. Movables. Things are meubles from either of two causes: (1) From their own nature, e. g. tables, chairs; or (2) from the determination of the law, e. g. obligations. Rap. & Law. Dict.

METUS (Lat.). A reasonable fear of an intolerable evil, as of loss of life or limb, such as may fall upon a brave man (virum constantem). 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 131; Calvinus, Lex. And this kind of fear alone will invalidate a contract as entered into through duress. Calvinus, Lex.

In a more general sense, fear.

MEXICO. A federative republic. The president is elected for four years by the people and is assisted by seven secretaries of state. The senate consists of fifty-six members, two for each state, who are elected for two years by the people. Members of the house of representatives are elected by the people.

MICHAELMAS TERM. See TERM.

MICHEL-GEMOT (spelled, also, micel-gemote, mycel-gemot. Sax. great meeting or assembly). One of the names of the general council immemorially held in England. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 147.

One of the great councils of king and noblemen in Saxon times.

These great councils were severally called witena-gemotes, afterwards micel synoths and micel-gemotes. Cowel, edit. 1727; Cunningham, Law Dict. Micel-Gemotes. See WITENAGEMOT.

The Saxon kings usually called a synod, or mixed council, consisting both of ecclesiastics and the nobility, three times a year, which was not properly called a parliament till Henry III.'s time. Cowel, ed. 1727; Cunningham, Law Dict. Synod, Micel-Gemotes.

MICHEL-SYNOTH (Sax. great council). See MICHEL-GEMOT.

MICHERY. Theft; cheating.

MICHIGAN. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

It was admitted into the Union by act of congress of January 26, 1837.

The first constitution of the state was adopted June 24, 1835. This was superseded by the one at present in force, which was adopted August 15, 1850.

Every person above the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the state three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding election, and who is either a male citizen, or a male inhabitant who resided in the state June 24, 1835, or a male inhabitant who resided in the state January 1, 1850, who had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States pursuant to the laws thereof six months preceding an election, or who has resided in this state two years and six months and declared his intention as aforesaid, or who is a civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent, a native of the United States, and not a member of any tribe, is an elector and entitled to vote.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Senate consists of thirty-two members, and the House of Representatives of not less than sixty-four nor more than one hundred members, elected in their respective districts for the term of two years. They must be citizens of the United States and qualified voters, senators of the district and representatives of the counties, respectively.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for the term of two years. He must be thirty years old at least; for five years a citizen of the United States, and for two years next preceding the election of the state; and no member of congress, nor any person holding office under the United States, may be governor. In case of a tie, the legislature must elect one of the candidates. The governor has the usual powers and duties, and may pardon, except for treason, in which case he may suspend execution and report the case to the legislature, which may either commute the sentence, or direct the execution, pardon, or reprieve.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, for the same term, and must possess the same qualifications as the governor. He is, by virtue of his office, president of the senate, and succeeds to the office of governor in case of vacancy. After him the succession is to the president pro tempore of the senate.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Court consists of one chief and four associate justices, chosen by the electors of the state for the term of ten years. These are now all required to reside at the capital. One of the judges goes out of office every two years. Four terms are held annually, and three judges constitute a quorum. It has a general supervisory power over inferior courts, and general appellate jurisdiction of cases brought up by appeal, by certificate of judges of lower courts, or by consent of parties on agreed statements of facts. The court is required by rules of practice to simplify the practice as to the matters following: abolition of the distinction between law and equity; of fictions and unnecessary proceedings; shortening and simplification of pleadings; expediting decisions; regulation of decisions; remedying abuses and imperfections of practice; abolition of unnecessary forms and technicalities; non-abatement of suits through misjoinder or nonjoinder of parties, so far as justice will allow; providing for omitting parties improperly joined, and joining those improperly omitted.

Circuit Courts. The state is divided into thirty-five judicial circuits, each presided over by a circuit judge, elected by the district, and holding office for six years. This is the court of general original jurisdiction, having jurisdiction in all matters civil and criminal not expressly excepted, and appellate jurisdiction from all inferior courts and tribunals, and a supervisory control of the same. Its exclusive original jurisdiction as to amount is of cases involving more than one hundred dollars in tort and three hundred dollars in contract, and it has concurrent jurisdiction with justices of the peace, as stated infra. There is also exclusive jurisdiction of actions involving title to real estate, libel, slander, malicious prosecution, and municipal corporations. It has also power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, and other writs necessary to carry into effect its orders, judgments, and decrees, and give it a general control over inferior courts and tribunals within the respective districts. It sits also as a court of chancery, having powers co-extensive with the powers of the court of chancery in England, with various modifications, however, both constitutional and statutory. Two terms at least are held annually in each county organized for judicial purposes, and four terms in counties containing ten thousand inhabitants. The stated terms are also terms of the court of chancery. There is a superior court of Grand Rapids, which has concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court of the county in cases involving over one hundred dollars, and in which a defendant is served in the city.

A Probate Court is held in each county by a judge elected by the people of the county for the term of four years and till a successor is chosen. It may take probate of wills, and has cognizance of all matters appertaining to the settlement of the estates of decedents and the care of minors, including the appointment and superintendence of guardians of minors, etc.

Justices of the Peace are elected by the people of each township for four years. Not more than four are to be elected in each township, and they are to be classified, and in the cities the number is to be provided by the charters. They have exclusive civil jurisdiction in all cases where the amounts involved are less than one hundred dollars, and concurrent jurisdiction over all sums less than three hundred dollars, except as to actions of which the circuit courts have exclusive jurisdiction. They have a criminal jurisdiction of minor offences arising in their respective counties.

A Circuit Court Commissioner is elected in each county for two years, who has the judicial power of a judge of the circuit court at chambers. He is to perform the duties of a master in chancery, has power to grant injunctions, etc. He must be an attorney and counsellor-at-law.

Municipal Courts exist in the larger cities. They are of two classes, civil and criminal.

The Civil Courts have the same general jurisdiction as the circuit courts as to actions of a transitory nature in which all or some of the parties are residents of the city where the court is situated.

The Criminal Courts have exclusive jurisdiction.

Michigan has no code of practice or procedure. The practice is that of the English common-law courts largely modified by statute and rules of court, by which special pleading is nearly dispensed with.

MIDDLE THREAD. See AD MEDIUM FILUM.

MIDDLEMAN. One who has been employed as an agent by a principal, and who has employed a sub-agent under him by authority of the principal, either express or implied. He is not, in general, liable for the wrongful acts of the sub-agent, the principal being alone responsible; 3 Campb. 4; 6 Term 411; 14 East 605.

A person who is employed both by the seller and purchaser of goods, or by the purchaser alone, to receive them into his possession, for the purpose of doing something in or about them: as, if goods be delivered from a ship by the seller to a wharfinger, to be by him forwarded to the purchaser, who has been appointed by the latter to receive them; or if goods be sent to a packer, for and by orders of the vendee, the packer is to be considered as a middleman.

The goods in both these cases will be considered in transitu, provided the purchaser has not used the wharfinger's or the packer's warehouse as his own, and have an ulterior place of delivery in view; 4 Esp. 82; 2 B. & P. 457; 3 id. 127, 469; 1 Campb. 282; 1 Atk. 245; 1 H. Blackst. 364; 3 East 93.

MIDSHIPMAN. A naval cadet in a ship of war whose business it is to second and transmit the orders of the superior officers and assist in the management of the ship and its armament. Webster. See LONGEVITY PAY.

MIDWIFE. In Medical Jurisprudence. A woman who practises midwifery; a woman who pursues the business of an accoucheuse.

A midwife is required to perform the business she undertakes with proper skill; and if she be guilty of any mala praxis she is liable to an action or an indictment for the misdemeanor. See Viner, Abr. Physician; Comyns, Dig. Physician; 8 East 348; 2 Wils. 259; 4 C. & P. 398, 407 a; 2 Russ. Cri. 388.

MIESES. In Spanish Law. Grain crops.

MILE. A length of a thousand paces, or seventeen hundred and sixty yards, or five thousand two hundred and eighty feet. It contains eight furlongs, every furlong being forty poles, and each pole sixteen feet six inches. 2 Stark. 89.

MILEAGE. A compensation allowed by law to officers for their trouble and expenses in travelling on public business.

It usually signifies an allowance for travelling, as so much by the mile. 7 Mont. 82.

In computing mileage, the distance by the road usually travelled is that which must be allowed, whether in fact the officer travels a more or less distant way to suit his own convenience; 16 Me. 431.

An allowance to a district attorney for mileage in the R. S. § 823, is simply a reimbursement for travelling expenses; 158 U. S. 346; irrespective of the amount of his compensation under the law; id.; he is allowed mileage for travelling from his place of abode to the place of examination, though the latter is his official headquarters, if his abode is elsewhere; 4 U. S. App. 386; it should be computed for the most convenient and practicable route and not by the shortest; id.; and will not be allowed one who goes home every Saturday and returns on Monday during a continuous session of the court; 153 U. S. 88.

See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; TICKET.

MILES. In Civil Law. A soldier, (Vel a "militia" aut a "multitudine," aut a numero "mille hominum." L. 1, § 1, D., de testam. milit.) Vocab. Jur. Utr.

In Old English Law. A knight, because military service was part of the feudal tenure. Also, a tenant by military service, not a knight. 1 Bla. Com. 404; Seld. Tit. Hon. 334.

MILESTONES. Stones set up to mark the miles on a road or railway. The highway rate, etc., act, 1882, constitutes the expense incurred in maintaining replacing, or setting up milestones, a lawful charge upon the highway rate.

MILITARY. Anything pertaining to war or to the army.

MILITARY BOUNTY LAND. Land granted by the United States to soldiers for services rendered in the army.

Claims for bounty land can be valid only on the following conditions: (1) The soldier must have been regularly mustered into the United States service (2) That his services were paid for by the United States; (3) That he served with the armed forces of the United States, subject to the military orders of a United States officer; 5 P. D. o. s. 92.

Title to bounty land is not impaired by the promotion to a commissioned officer of a private who subsequently continued in the service to the end of the war; 1 L. B. P. 115.

Under act March 3, 1850, title to bounty land is acquired, not only by militia or volunteers serving under the general command of the United States and in time of war, but also by those rendering military service, whether in war or not, and whether under the authority of the United States, or of a state or territory, if the United States has paid for the service. Service rendered in removing the Cherokee Indians is embraced by the act and gives title; 7 Op. Atty. Gen. 606.

Under R. S. § 2424, a soldier's widow who has remarried and has a husband living has no status as a claimant for a bounty-land warrant; 4 P. D. 36.

Under act of Sept. 28, 1850, a second marriage deprives a widow of title, unless she was a widow at the dates of the passage of the act and of filing her application; and if she be married or dead, the minor children are entitled; 2 L. B. P. 7.

Issuance of a bounty land warrant to a widow under the belief that her husband was dead, cannot be regarded as a satisfaction of his claim should it be shown that he is alive; 2 P. D. o. s. 482.

MILITARY COURTS. See COURT-MARTIAL.

MILITARY EXPEDITION. See NEUTRALITY.

MILITARY FEUDS. The genuine or original feuds which were in the hands of military men, who performed military duty for their tenures.

MILITARY JURISDICTION. There are under the constitution three kinds of military jurisdiction; one to be exercised both in peace and war; another to be exercised in time of foreign war, without the boundaries of the United States, or in time of rebellion and civil war, within the states or districts occupied by rebels treated as belligerents; and a third to be exercised in time of invasion or insurrection within the limits of the United States, or during rebellion within the limits of states maintaining adhesion to the national government, when the public danger requires its exercise. The first of these may be called jurisdiction under military law, and is found in acts of congress prescribing rules and articles of war, or otherwise providing for the government of the national forces; the second may be distinguished as military government, superseding as far as may be deemed expedient, the local law, and exercised by the military commander under the direction of the president, with the express or implied sanction of congress; while the third may be denominated martial law proper, which title see; 4 Wall. 141.

MILITARY LAW. A system of regulations for the government of an army. 1 Kent 341, n.

That branch of the laws which respects military discipline and the government of persons employed in the military service. De Hart, Courts-Mart. 16.

Military law is to be distinguished from martial law. Martial law extends to all persons; military law to all military persons only, and not to those in a civil capacity. Martial law supersedes and suspends the civil law, but military law is superadded and subordinate to the civil law. Birk. Mil. G. & Mart. L. 1. See 2 Kent 10; 34 Me. 126; MARTIAL LAW; COURT-MARTIAL; MILITARY JURISDICTION.

The body of the military law of the United States is contained in the "act establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States," approved April 30, 1806, and various subsequent acts, some of the more important of which are those of May 29, 1830; August 6, 1846; July 29, 1861; August 3, 1861; August 5, 1861; December 24, 1861; February 13, 1862; March 13, 1862; March 13, 1865; February 18, 1875. See, also, Act of February 28, 1795; 5 Wheat 1; 3 S. & R. 156, 790; the general regulations, and the orders of the president.

The act of 1806 consists of three sections, the first section containing one hundred and one articles, which describe very minutely the various military offences, the punishments which may be inflicted, the manner of summoning and the organization of courts-martial. These articles are called the articles of war. Their provisions extend to the militia mustered into the United States service, and to marines when serving with the army.

The military law of England was contained in the Mutiny Act, which has been passed annually from April 12, 1689, to 1879, when the Mutiny Act was consolidated with the articles of war, and this act was amended in 1881 by the Army Act (see MUTINY ACT), and the additional articles of war made and established by the sovereign. 2 Steph. Com. 589.

In addition, there are in both countries various usages which constitute an unwritten military law, which applies to those cases where there are no express provisions. 12 Wheat. 19; Benêt, Mil. Law 3.

The sovereign, in England, has authority to ordain, by articles of war, with regard to crimes not specified by military law, every punishment not reaching to death or mutilation; the president of the United States cannot ordain any penalty for any military crime not expressly declared by act of congress.

The civil courts have no authority to review, control, or in any manner interfere with the action of the military tribunals, while regularly engaged in the exercise of their appropriate jurisdiction; 30 Fed. Rep. 176.

Consult Benêt; De Hart; Cross; Samuels; Tytler, Military Law; Risley, Law of War; see MILITIA.

MILITARY OCCUPATION. This at most gives the invader certain partial and limited rights of sovereignty. Until conquest, the sovereign rights of the original owner remain intact. Conquest gives the conqueror full rights of sovereignty and, retroactively, legalizes all acts done by him during military occupation. Its only essential is actual and exclusive possession, which must be effective.

The occupant administers the government and may, strictly speaking, change the municipal law, but it is considered the duty of the occupant to make as few changes in the ordinary administration of the laws as possible, though he may proclaim martial law if necessary. He may occupy public land and buildings; he cannot alienate them so as to pass a good title, but a subsequent conquest would probably complete the title. Ships of war, warlike stores and materials, treasure and like movable property belonging to the state vest in the occupant.

State archives and historical records, charitable, etc., institutions, public buildings, museums, monuments, works of art, etc., and public buildings of lesser political subdivisions are safe from seizure; so usually are public vessels engaged in scientific discovery.

Private lands and houses are usually exempt. Private movable property is exempt, though subject to contributions and requisitions. Under the rules of the Brussels conference, the former are payments of money, to be levied only by the Commander-in-Chief. The latter consist in the supply of food or transport, or articles for the immediate use of the troops, and may be exacted by the commander of any detached body of troops, with or without payment. This appears to be a modified species of pillage. Military necessity may require the destruction of private property, and hostile acts of communities or individuals may be punished in the same way. Property may be liable to seizure as booty on the field of battle, or when a town refuses to capitulate and is carried by assault. When military occupation ceases, the state of things which existed previously is restored under the fiction of Postliminium (q. v.) See Risley, Law of War 134; WAR.

MILITARY TENURE. Tenure in chivalry or knight service. See KNIGHT'S SERVICE.

MILITARY TESTAMENT. A nuncupative will, that is, one made by word of mouth, by which a soldier may dispose of his goods, pay, and other personal chattels, without the forms and solemnities which the law requires in other cases. 1 Vict. c. 12.

MILITES. Knights, and in Scotch law freeholders.

MILITIA. A part of the military force of the nation, consisting of citizens called forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion.

The constitution of the United States provides on this subject that congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of it as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by congress.

In accordance with the provisions of the constitution, congress, in 1792, act of May 8, passed an act relating to the militia, which has remained, with modifications, till the present time. Under these provisions the militia can be used for the suppression of rebellion as well as of insurrection; Birk, Mil. Gov. and Mart. L. 365; R. S. § 1642; 7 Wall. 700; 45 Pa. 288. The president of the United States is to judge when the exigency has arisen which requires the militia to be called out; 12 Wheat. 19; 8 Mass. 548. He may make his request directly to the executive of the state, or by an order directed to any subordinate officer of the state militia; 3 S. & R. 169, as provided by R. S. § 1642; and see 12 Wheat. 19; 5 Phila. 259.

When the militia are called into actual service, they are subject to the same rules and articles of war as the regular troops; R. S. § 1644, but a captain of a company of the National Guard of a state cannot summarily punish by imprisonment a member of his company for refusal to obey his orders when the company is not acting as a military force, unless that authority is conferred by statute; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 989. The president may specify their term of service, not exceeding nine months; R. S. § 1648. When in actual service the militia are entitled to the same pay as the regular troops; R. S. § 1650. The militia, until mustered into the United States service, is considered as a state force; 3 S. & R. 169; 5 Wheat. 1. See 1 Kent 262; Story, Const. §§ 1194-1210. See generally 94 Ill. 123; 116 U. S. 267; MILITARY LAW; MARTIAL LAW.

MILK. In England milk means, commercially speaking, skimmed milk. 14 Q. B. Div. 193, where it was held that the sale of milk which had been deprived of sixty per cent of its butter fat was not an offence under § 6, Sale of Food and other Drugs Act, although under § 9 of the same act the sale of skimmed milk as milk is an offence; 24 Q. B. Div. 353; 59 L. J. M. C. 45.

A milk standard may be established by law; 101 N. Y. 634; 64 N. H. 404; 11 Allen 264; and a state may by statute authorize inspectors of milk to enter all carriages used for its conveyance, and wherever they have reason to believe the milk to be adulterated, to take specimens to be analyzed or tested; 132 Mass. 12; and vendors of milk must furnish samples gratuitously; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 502. If upon inspection milk is found to be adulterated, the vendor may be compelled to pour it upon the ground, or return it to the person who supplied it; 45 N. J. L. 469; 10 Hun 435. Such ordinances and statutes do not deprive persons of property without due process of law; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 502; 113 U. S. 31; 113 Mo. 395. See ADULTERATION; POLICE POWER.

MILL. A complicated engine or machine for grinding and reducing to fine particles grain, fruit, or other substance, or for performing other operations by means of wheels and a circular motion.

The house or building that contains the machinery for grinding, etc. Webster, Dict.

Mills are so very different and various, that it is not easy to give a definition of the term. They are used for the purpose of grinding and pulverizing grain and other matters, to extract the juices of vegetables, to make various articles of manufacture. They take their names from the uses to which they are employed; hence we have paper-mills, fulling-mills, iron-mills, oil-mills, saw-mills, etc. In another respect their kinds are various; they are either fixed to the freehold or not. Those which are a part of the freehold are either water-mills, wind-mills, steam-mills, etc.; those which are not so fixed are hand-mills, and are merely personal property. Those which are fixed, and make a part of the freehold, are buildings with machinery calculated to attain the object proposed in their erection.

It has been held that the grant of a mill and its appurtenances, even without the land, carries the whole right of water enjoyed by the grantor, as necessary to its use, and as a necessary incident; Cro. Jac. 121. And a devise of a mill carries the land used with it, and the right to use the water; Washb. Easem, 52. 1 S. & R. 169. And see 5 id. 107; 10 id. 63; 2 Caines, Cas. 87; 3 N. H. 190; 7 Mass. 6; 6 Me. 154, 436; 16 id. 281.

The owner of a mill, whose dam and machinery are suited to the size and capacity of the stream, has a right to the reasonable use of the water to propel his machinery; but he must detain it no longer than is necessary for its profitable enjoyment, and must return it to its natural channel, before it passes upon the land of the proprietor below; 41 Ga. 162; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 526. See 4 Ballard, R. P. § 878; DAM.

A mill means not merely the building in which the business is carried on, but includes the site, the dam, and other things annexed to the freehold, necessary for its beneficial enjoyment; Gould, Waters § 307; 3 Mass. 280; see 6 Me. 436; and a water power also when applied to a mill becomes a part of the mill, and is to be included in the valuation; 37 Vt. 622.

Whether manufacturing machinery will pass under the grant of a mill must depend mainly on the circumstances of each case; 3 Washb. R. P. 415; 1 Brod. & B. 506; Ewell, Fixt. 94. See 30 Conn. 18. As between mortgagor and mortgagee, a saw-mill and its appointments are prima facie part of the realty, if no intent is shown to change their character; 39 Mich. 777. When an estate for years was by a conveyance to the lessee merged in the fee, it was held that machinery by him firmly annexed to the premises, did not, by operation of law and without intent on his part, become a part of the realty; 76 N. Y. 28. See FIXTURES.

MILL. The tenth part of a cent in value.

MILLED MONEY. This term means merely coined money; and it is not necessary that it should be marked or rolled on the edges. Running's case, Leach, Cr. Cas. 708.

MIL-REIS. The name of a coin. The mil-reis of Portugal is taken as money of account, at the custom-house, to be of the value of one hundred and twelve cents. The mil-reis of Azores is deemed of the value of eighty-three and one-third cents. The mil-reis of Madeira is deemed of the value of one hundred cents; 5 Stat. at Large, 625.

MINA. A measure of corn or grain. Cowel.

MINAGE. A toll or duty paid for selling grain by the Mina. Cowel.

MINATOR or MINERATOR. A miner.

MIND. In its legal sense it means only the ability to will, to direct, to permit or assent. 43 N. J. L. 492.

MIND AND MEMORY. A testator must have a sound and disposing mind and memory. In other words, he "ought to be capable of making his will with an understanding of the nature of the business in which he is engaged, a recollection of the property he means to dispose of, the persons who are the object of his bounty, and the manner in which it is to be distributed between them." Washington, J., 3 Wash. C. C. 585, 586; 4 id. 262; 1 Green Ch. 82, 85; 2 id. 563, 604; 26 Wend. 255, 306, 311, 312; 8 Conn. 265; 9 id. 105. Mind and memory are convertible terms; 54 Barb. 274.

MINERALS (L. Lat. minera, a vein of metal). All fossil bodies or matters dug out of mines or quarries, whence anything may be dug; such as beds of stone which may be quarried. 14 M. & W. 859, construing 55 Geo. III. c. 18; Broom, Leg. Max. 175*.

Any natural production, formed by the action of chemical affinities, and organized when becoming solid by the powers of crystallization. Webster, Dict. But see 5 Watts 34; 1 Crabb, R. P. 95; OIL.

The term mineral has been defined as "every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth, for the purpose of profit;" L. R. 7 Ch. App. 699; and in another case it is said that the word does not include anything except that which is part of the natural soil; 33 Ch. D. 566. It has been held to include coal; 73 Mo. 96; paint-stone; 2 Stockt. 136; free-stone; L. R. 1 Ch. 303; and petroleum; 88 Pa. 198. See OIL.

The words minerals and ores have been held to include only minerals obtained by underground working; 147 N. Y. 495.

The term mineral lands, as used in the statutes relating to the public domain, embraces coal lands; 118 U. S. 271; and mineral deposits are not only metals proper but also salt, coal, and the like. 10 N. J. Eq. 128.

Minerals severed from the earth by artificial means are personal property and dealt with by the law as such; Barr. & Ad. Mines 5; being taxable as personalty; 94 U. S. 762; the subject of larceny; 35 Cal. 671; 156 Pa. 400; or recoverable in trover; 53 Pa. 261; or replevin; 62 id. 97. This is not the case, however, where the severance results from natural causes or incidentally from excavation; id.; hence a nugget of gold found upon loose rocks was held to savor of the realty and was not the subject of larceny; 64 N. C. 619. See MINES AND MINING.

MINES AND MINING. A mine is an excavation in the earth for the purpose of obtaining minerals.

Mines of gold and silver belonged, at common law, to the sovereign; 1 Plowd. 310; 3 Kent 378, n.; 17 Wall. 222; and it has been said that, though the king grant lands in which mines are, and all mines in them, yet royal mines (q. v.) will not pass by so general a description; Plowd. 336. In New York the state's right as sovereign was asserted at an early day, and reasserted by the legislature as late as 1828; 3 Kent 378, n. In Pennsylvania the Royal Charter to Penn reserved one-fifth of the precious metal as rent, and the patents granted by Penn usually reserved two-fifths of the gold and silver. An act passed in 1843 declared that all patents granted by the state pass the entire estate of the commonwealth. In California, after much discussion, it seems to be finally settled that minerals belong to the owner of the soil and not to the government as an incident of sovereignty; 17 Cal. 199; 3 Wall. 304; 2 Black 17. In 17 Cal. 199, Field, C. J., upon thorough examination of the subject, rejected the doctrine of sovereign title as an assertion of personal prerogative of the British crown, neither applicable to our institutions nor a necessary incident of sovereignty in the larger sense. The prerogative title of the sovereign was in Oregon treated as conceded; 5 Ore. 104. It was held that in Maryland the mines passed by royal grant to Lord Baltimore, subject to a reservation of one-fifth of gold and silver found and that the entire title passed to the state, the interest of the proprietor by confiscation, and that of the king by conquest; 147 U. S. 282. The same prerogative right was very early asserted in New Jersey; 30 N. J. Eq. 328, note. It is said that the question is not of practical importance since the title to mineral lands generally in the United States is derived from public grants, and the right to minerals therein is regulated by law; Barr. & Ad. Mines 179. As to mineral lands and claims and their location under the United States laws, see LANDS, PUBLIC; Barr. & Ad. Mines ch. 6. See Judge Dallas's note to Bainbr. Mines 37.

Minerals in the beds of navigable waters below low water mark are owned by the state against which an appropriator without a grant is a trespasser, although he has a good title against any one else; Barr. & Ad. Mines 180. See 32 Fla. 82; 38 Pa. 380; 81 id. 156; 144 U. S. 550; 22 S. C. 50. The same rule applies to minerals found under highways; 19 Ga. 89; 23 Minn. 186; 117 Ill. 411; 5 Mas. 195. See 14 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 486.

Where lands are taken under the right of eminent domain, strictly only a right of way passes, but it is sometimes held that the appropriator may use minerals taken therefrom for making or repairing the road-bed; 5 Watts 546; at least those above grade which must be excavated; 29 Mo. 141; but the better opinion is said to be that no such right exists and that minerals remain the property of the owner of the soil; Barr. & Ad. Mines 186; 124 Ind. 329; 53 Pa. 261; 2 Metc. 482. See 24 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 142.

All mineral lands of the general government, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are free and open to exploration and occupation, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and also to local customs or rules of miners when not in conflict with the laws of the United States. R. S. § 2319. See 94 U. S. 763; LANDS, PUBLIC.

It is the policy of the government to favor the development of mines of gold, silver, and other metals, and every facility is afforded for that purpose; but it exacts a faithful compliance with the conditions required; 128 U. S. 673. A mineral lode or vein whose location is perfected under the law is the property of the locators or their assigns, and not subject to disposal by the government; 127 U. S. 348.

Subject to the rights of the public, growing out of its original ownership, or as provided by law in special cases, the right to minerals belongs to the owner of the soil, and passes by a grant thereof, unless separated; 1 N. Y. 564; 82 id. 476; 19 Pick. 314; 53 Vt. 641; 21 W. N. C. Pa. 491; but the owner may convey his mines by a separate and distinct grant, so as to create one freehold in the soil and another in the mines; 1 Pa. 726; 7 Cush. 361; 8 id. 21; 5 M. & W. 50; 84 Ala. 228; 96 Ill. 279; and after such severance of the mines from the soil each is entirely independent of the other, separately inheritable, and capable of conveyance; Barr. & Ad. Mines 3.

In case of a separate ownership, the owner of the mine must support the superincumbent soil; 12 Q. B. 739; 5 M. & W. 60; 12 Exch. 259; and ancient buildings or other erections; 2 H. & N. 828. See 2 Cent. L. J 655; 24 id. 270; 12 Alb. L. J. 182. But in California a miner will not be enjoined against disturbance of crops, unless the appropriation of the land was anterior to the mining location; 23 Cal. 593.

A lessee having the right to mine coal under land over which a railroad is operated, can only mine so much of the coal as can be removed without injury to the surface; 75 Ia. 78. The lessor's measure of damages where there are sinks and depressions in the surface of the land due to lessee's negligence in operating a mine, is the depreciation in the value of the land; 155 Pa. 256.

The estate in the minerals as distinguished from the soil, is created under what are known as mining leases. Where the minerals are undisturbed as a part of the soil they are said to be in place. The severance of the estate in the soil and in the minerals may be by conveyance, by whatever name designated, of all, or a clearly defined part, of the minerals, in which case there passes to the grantee an estate in fee in the minerals, with the privilege of using the land so far as may be necessary for the purpose stated; 7 Fed. Rep. 634. This is the effect of a conveyance even if it be called a lease or limits a term of years within which the minerals are to be taken out; Barr. & Ad. Mines 36. The effect of this is said to be the somewhat paradoxical result of the limitation of a fee-simple estate for a term of years, and the resulting difficulty is sought to be avoided by treating the limitation of the term as not upon the estate but upon the appurtenant rights, without which it would be valueless, and in case of failure to take out the mineral within the specified time it is forfeited to the grantor; 143 Pa. 293; 128 id. 485; 105 id. 469; 21 N. J. Eq. 410, affirming 19 id. 202. A lease for mining purposes, the rent to be a certain part of the ore mined, is forfeited by failure to work the mines for a number of years; 112 N. C. 677. Such instruments, even where the term license is employed, are held to be not a mere license, but to pass a property or to create an estate in the minerals; 93 Mich. 90; 47 Ind. 105; 150 Ill. 344; 86 Va. 815. See Barr. & Ad. Mines 36, where the cases are collected and examined. A true leasehold interest in the land may be created with an appurtenant right to take minerals, in which case the lessee is a tenant for years, and his possession and property of the soil and the minerals are the same; 5 Jones, L. 440; 120 Pa. 590; 89 id 47; 52 Hun 363. Where the permission is to take all the coal and the term is indefinite, the lease expires when the latter is exhausted; 58 Ill. 210. In New York this doctrine is limited, so as to apply only where "the whole body of the coal, considered as of cubical dimensions and capable of descriptive separation from the earth above and around it, and as it lies in its place, is absolutely and presently conveyed. The thing sold must be such that it can be identified as land severed, as land, from the estate of which it forms a part;" 136 N. Y. 593, where Finch, J., citing the Pennsylvania cases, says: "Every case upholding the doctrine, which I have been able to examine, has that marked characteristic." In this case which reversed 122 id. 505, the "lease" of all the coal contained under a described contract designated it as including all the coal that could be economically mined or taken out.

There may be a license to take all of a certain mineral in a designated tract, which is an incorporeal right, of which the distinguishing character is that it does not carry with it a possession exclusive of the owner of the soil; Barr. & Ad. Mines 53. It must be created by deed; 73 Ill. 453; and it is not revocable except after breach of covenant; 66 Mo. 430. It carries the right of property in the minerals only after they are severed; 32 N. J. Eq. 248; it is termed a license irrevocable and the word "all" describes the extent to which it may be exercised, not its exclusiveness; 2 Wall. Jr. 81.

A mere parol license is a personal privilege, unassignable, concurrent with a right of the licensor to mine, revocable at will, and vests no title to the minerals until severed; Barr. & Ad. Mines 67; 32 Fed. Rep. 177; 53 Pa. 206; 123 N. Y. 298.

Opening new mines by a tenant is waste, unless the demise includes them; Co. Litt. 53 b; 2 Bla. Com. 282; 1 Taunt. 410; but if the mines be already open, it is not waste to work them even to exhaustion; 1 Taunt. 410; 19 Pa. 324; 103 id. 307; 6 Munf. 134; 1 Rand. 258; 10 Pick. 460; 1 Cow. 460. See Smith, Landl. & T. 192, 193, n. In a suit for redemption of a mortgage, the mortgagee was allowed for large sums expended in working a mine which he had a right to work; 25 L. J. Ch. 121, but in another case, expenses incurred in opening a mine were disallowed; 16 Sim. 445.

In California, the occupant of public lands, who holds them for agricultural purposes merely, holds them subject to the right of any person to dig for gold; 5 Cal. 36, 97; but the miner must take them as he finds them, subject to prior rights of the same character; 5 Cal. 140, 308; 6 id. 148; a miner cannot take private lands; 44 Cal. 460.

An injunction lies for interference with mines; 6 Ves. 147.

Mineral deposits are usually divided into what are termed lode or vein and placer deposits. The terms lode and vein are generally used interchangeably (see LODE). but they are usually "found together in the statutes and both are intended to indicate the presence of metal in rock; yet a lode may, and often does, contain more than one vein; Field, J., in 128 U. S. 673.

A placer is a superficial deposit occupying the bed of an ancient river. Barr. & Ad. Mines 476. In federal legislation it is defined to include "all forms of deposit excepting veins and quartz or other rock in place." R. S. § 2329. These statutes divide all deposits into two classes, veins or lodes, and placers, and the former being well defined, the latter is made to include all others; Barr. & Ad. Mines 476. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

The dip of a vein is its downward course, and this the locator may follow indefinitely even though it take him beneath the ground of another and outside of his own vertical side lines; Barr. & Ad. Mines 441.

The strike of a vein is "its onward course, its direction or trend across and through the country." id.

The apex of a vein is the highest point where it approaches nearest to the surface of the earth, and where it is broken at its edge so as to appear to be the beginning or end of a vein. 1 McCrary 480. If a vein at its highest point turns over and pursues its course downward, then such point is merely a swell in the mineral matter and not a true apex; id. This is a term used in mining law in what is known as the apex rule, as to which see LANDS, PUBLIC, subt. Mineral Lands.

A miner whose location is on the apex of a lode may follow it to any depth, although in its downward course it may enter the adjoining land; but no location made on the middle of a lode or otherwise than at the top or apex, will enable the locator to go beyond his line; 3 Fed. Rep. 368. The apex is not necessarily a point, but often a line of great length and any portion of it, if found within the limits of a claim, is sufficient to entitle the locator to obtain title. He may follow his vein into the territory of another beyond his side lines, but not further than his own end lines, beyond which it is subject to further discovery and appropriation; 144 U. S. 19; 50 Fed. Rep. 888; but where the apex which intersects an end line passes out of the claim across one of the side lines, the owner may still follow so much of the lode on the dip as lies between the end line, through which the vein passed, and its point of divergence from the claim; 66 Fed. Rep. 212. Where two claims are so located that to follow the dip beyond the side lines would cause a conflict, that having priority of location must prevail; 54 Fed. Rep. 284. See U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2336. See as to locator's property in vein, 13 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 551, 560, 575.

A mining claim is a parcel of land containing precious metal in its soil or rock. A location is the act of appropriating such parcel, according to certain established rules. If the miner has only one location that "location" is identical with "mining claim," and the two designations may be indiscriminately used to denote the same thing. 104 U. S. 649; if he acquires an adjoining location his claim covers both; id. See Lindl. Mines § 327. A transfer of a mining claim must be in writing; 73 Cal. 541.

A mining claim is real estate; 1 Mont. 245; and descends to the heir; 15 Col. 143; it is property; 2 Utah 54; subject to execution; 9 Cal. 137; and taxation; 12 id. 56; and a lien for unpaid taxes; 94 U. S. 762. An owner out of possession may maintain an ejectment or corresponding action; 7 Cal. 317; 4 N. M. 378; 1 Mont. 475; 17 Cal. 271; 34 Fed. Rep. 515; 116 U. S. 687; contra, 24 Ore. 265. See as to claims, 14 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 152.

There is no right of dower in an unpatented mining claim; 163 U. S. 445; but in some cases dower has been allowed in mines; 92 Mich. 186; 73 Ill. 405; 150 id. 560; 13 N. J. Eq. 389; 61 Ind. 473; 1 Cow, 460; 3 Pick, 17. See as to dower, 7 U. S. App. 393; s. c. 52 Fed. Rep. 859.

Of joint owners, either may mine without the consent of the others, using the common property for the purpose intended, and it is no objection that the use is consumption; 64 Cal. 134; it is not waste; but he must account to his co-owners for ore mined; 25 Conn. 137; 178 Pa. 444; and any act for the benefit of the property, as the purchase of a paramount title, inures to the benefit of all; 22 Col. 129. The interest may be the subject of partition; 23 Cal. 502; but the mere fact of joint ownership does not give an equitable right to a division; the question must be fairly considered by a chancellor upon all the circumstances; 28 Fed. Rep. 220.

Joint owners who co-operate in working, constitute a mining partnership without any specific contract or agreement; Barr. & Ad. Mines 753. There may be an ordinary commercial partnership in the working of a mine, but this will arise only from agreement. A mining partnership, properly so called, is a relation springing only by implication from actual co-operation in the work; 102 U. S. 641; 13 Bush 67; 77 Mo. 52; 30 Cal. 290; 42 id. 636; 149 Ill. 575. A mining partnership is not dissolved by the death of a partner, nor by the sale of his interest to a stranger; in the latter case the purchaser becomes a partner; 42 Cal. 367; 52 id. 540; 5 Col. 107.

Mining partnerships are in some states effectually regulated by statute; Cal. C. C. §§ 2511-20; Mont. C. C. §§ 3350-9; Idaho, R. S. §§ 3301-9. In the latter state it has been said that a mining partnership, by virtue of the statute, "in all its essential elements is precisely like a corporation;" 33 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 40, where the substance of the statute is given. See as to Mining partnerships; 28 Am. St. Rep. 488.

In most states where mining is an important industry, there are statutory provisions for securing the safety of those engaged in the employment. For a citation of these statutes see Barr. & Ad. Mines, 780, note 1, where it is said that a discussion of the cases arising under these statutes is impossible because they involve no general principle. Such statutes have been held constitutional; 75 Pa. 26; 4 Sup. Ct. Pa. 362. They are an exercise of the police power, as to the propriety and validity of which there can be little question. In their relation to the law of negligence these statutes enlarge and define the obligation of the mine owner, and fix absolutely his responsibility for injuries resulting from failure to comply with the act, wherever that failure is the proximate cause of the injury. But the violation of the statute does not excuse contributory negligence or authorize the employee to neglect his own safety; Barr. & Ad. Mines 785, where the cases are collected.

MINING COMPANIES. Corporations or joint stock companies formed for the purpose of carrying out a mining project. See 15 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 631.

MINING PARTNERSHIP. See MINES AND MINING.

MINISTER. In Governmental Law. An officer who is placed near the sovereign, and is invested with the administration of the government. Ministers are responsible to the king or other supreme magistrate who has appointed them. 4 Conn. 134.

In Ecclesiastical Law. One ordained by some church to preach the gospel. All clergymen of every denomination and faith. 35 Neb. 375. A person elected by a Methodist society to be one of their local preachers, and ordained as a deacon of that church, is a minister of the gospel, within a statute exempting ministers from taxation. 1 Me. 102. So is a person ordained as a Congregational minister and installed as such over a town. 2 Pick. 403. See L. R. 8 Q. B. 69.

Formerly the word was applied only to deacons, but it is now the most comprehensive ecclesiastical title. In the prayer-book it means the officiating clergyman, whether bishop, priest, or deacon. 14 P. D. 148.

Ministers are authorized in the United States, generally, to solemnize marriages, and are liable to fines and penalties for marrying minors contrary to the local regulations. As to the rights of ministers or parsons, see 3 Am. Jur. 268; Shepp. Touchst. Anthon ed. 564; 2 Mass. 500; 10 id. 97; 14 id. 333; 11 Me. 487. CLERGY; BENEFIT OF CLERGY; PARSON.

In International Law. An officer appointed by the government of one nation, with the consent of two other nations who have a matter in dispute, with a view by his interference and good offices to have such matter settled.

A name given to public functionaries who represent their country with foreign governments, including ambassadors, envoys, and residents.

A custom of recent origin has introduced a new kind of ministers, without any particular determination of character; these are simply called ministers, to indicate that they are invested with the general character of a sovereign's mandatories, without any particular assignment of rank or character.

The minister represents his government in a vague and indeterminate manner, which cannot be equal to the first degree; and he possesses all the rights essential to a public minister.

There are also ministers plenipotentiary, who, as they possess full powers, are of much greater distinction than simple ministers. These, also, are without any particular attribution of rank and character, but by custom are now placed immediately below the ambassador, or on a level with the envoy extraordinary; Vattel, liv. 4, c. 5, § 74; 1 Kent 48; Merlin, Répert.

Formerly no distinction was made in the different classes of public ministers, but the modern usage of Europe introduced some distinctions in this respect, which, on account of a want of precision, had become the source of controversy. To obviate these, the congress of Vienna, and that of Aix-la-Chapelle, put an end to these disputes by classing ministers as follows:— 1. Ambassadors, and papal legates or nuncios. 2. Envoys, ministers, or others accredited to sovereigns (auprès des souverains). 3. Ministers resident, accredited to sovereigns. 4. Chargés d'affaires, accredited to the minister of foreign affairs. Public ministers take rank among themselves, in each class, according to the date of the official notification of the arrival at the court to which they are accredited. Recez, du Congrès de Vienne, du 19 mars, 1815; Protocol du Congrès d'Aix-la-Chapelle, du Novembre, 1818; Wheaton, Int. Law § 211.

Consuls and other commercial agents are not, in general, considered as public ministers. See AMBASSADOR; CONSUL; RECALL.

MINISTERIAL. That which is done under the authority of a superior; opposed to judicial; as, the sheriff is a ministerial officer bound to obey the judicial commands of the court.

A ministerial act may be defined to be one which a person performs in a given state of facts, in a prescribed manner, in obedience to the mandate of legal authority without regard to or the exercise of his own judgment upon the propriety of the acts being done. 12 So. Rep. (La.) 940; 60 Conn. 448; 15 Fed. Rep. 16; 50 Tex. 501. Acts done out of court in bringing parties into court are, as a general proposition, ministerial acts; 54 Ind. 376. See 18 How. 396; 40 Wisc. 175; 49 Ala. 311.

When an officer acts in both a judicial and ministerial capacity, he may be compelled to perform ministerial acts in a particular way; but when he acts in a judicial capacity, he can only be required to proceed; the manner of doing so is left entirely to his judgment. See 10 Me. 377; Bacon, Abr. Justices of the Peace (E); 1 Conn. 295; 3 id. 107; 9 id. 275; 12 id. 464; MANDAMUS; OFFICE.

MINISTERIAL DUTY. One in respect to which nothing is left to discretion. A simple definite duty, arising under conditions admitted or proved to exist, and imposed by law, the performance of which may, in proper cases, be required of the head of a department by judicial process. 4 Wall. 498; 61 Conn. 553.

MINISTERIAL TRUSTS (also called instrumental trusts). Those which demand no further exercise of reason or understanding than every intelligent agent must necessarily employ: as, to convey an estate. They are a species of special trusts, distinguished from discretionary trusts, which necessarily require much exercise of the understanding. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1896.

MINISTRY. The term as used in England is wider than Cabinet and includes all the holders of public office who come in and go out with the Prime Minister. In this respect it may be contrasted with the Permanent Civil Service, whose tenure is independent of public changes. The Prime Minister decides on the number of ministers to be admitted to the Cabinet. The general officers of the Royal Household, such as the Lord Steward, etc., are a part of the ministry.

MINNESOTA. One of the states of the United States of America.

It was created a territory by act of congress, March 3, 1849, and admitted into the Union as a state, May 11, 1858, under a constitution framed and adopted by a convention at St. Paul, on the 29th day of August, 1857, pursuant to an act of congress of February 26, 1857, and submitted to and ratified by the people on the 13th of October, 1857.

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.—The Senate is composed of a number of senators not exceeding one for every five thousand inhabitants, elected for the term of four years. One-half the senate is elected every second year, the district numbered with odd and even numbers electing alternately, excepting that an entire new election shall be had after each new apportionment.

The House of Representatives is composed of a number of representatives not exceeding one for every two thousand inhabitants, elected by the people for the term of two years. A senator or representative must have resided one year in the state and six months next preceding the election in the district, and must be a qualified elector. Legislative sessions are held bi-ennially; session not to exceed sixty days.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected by the people for the term of two years. He must have attained the age of twenty-five, be a citizen of the United States, and have resided in the state for one year next preceding his election. With the usual executive functions he has a pardoning and a veto power, and may appoint state officers to fill vacancies until the next general election.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, for the same term, and must possess the same qualifications as the governor. He presides over the senate, and acts as governor during any vacancy occurring in that office. A president pro tempore of the senate is elected at the close of each session by the senate, who becomes lieutenant-governor in case of vacancy in that office.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—This is vested in a supreme court, district court, courts of probate, and justices of the peace; but the legislature may, by a two-thirds vote, establish other inferior courts, of which the judges must be elected, for a term not longer than seven years, by the electors of the district for which the courts are created.

The Supreme Court consists of one chief and four associate justices, elected by the people of the state at large for the term of seven years. Its original jurisdiction is prescribed by law, and it has appellate jurisdiction in all cases both in law and equity, but holds no jury terms.

The District Court consists of judges, elected by the voters of their respective districts for a term of seven years. The state is divided into sixteen districts, in which the number of judges varies. Each judge sits in his own district, except where convenience or the public interests require otherwise, when the judges may exchange services. One or more terms of the court are held in each county annually. The judges may sit in joint session for the trial and determination of any matter before the court, including the trial of jury cases. This court has original jurisdiction in all civil cases where the amount involved exceeds one hundred dollars, the distinction between suits at law and in equity being abolished, and in all criminal cases where the penalty is three months' imprisonment or more, or where a fine of more than one hundred dollars is imposed, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. It has power, also, to change the names of people, towns, or counties.

A Probate Court is held in each organized county, by a judge elected for two years. He must be a resident of the county at the time of his election, and continue to be during his term. The court has jurisdiction over the estates of decedents, and over persons under guardianship.

Justices of the Peace are elected for each town for two years. They have jurisdiction in civil cases where the amount involved is one hundred dollars or less, and in criminal cases where the criminal is imprisoned for three months or less, or a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars. They have no jurisdiction in any case involving the title to real estate, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious prosecution, crim. con. seduction, or on promise to marry, or against an executor or administrator as such.

MINOR (Lat. less; younger). One not a major, i. e. not twenty-one. Co. 2d Inst. 291; Co. Litt. 88, 128, 172 b; 6 Co. 67; 3 Bulstr. 143; Bracton, 340 b; Fleta, l. 2, c. 60, § 26.

Of less consideration; lower. Calvinus, Lex. Major and minor belong rather to civil law. The common-law terms are adult and infant. See LIMITATIONS.

MINORA REGALIA. The lesser prerogatives of the crown, relating to revenue. 1 Bla. Com. 241.

MINORITY. The state or condition of a minor; infancy. See FULL AGE; INFANT.

The smaller number of votes of a deliberative assembly: opposed to majority, which see.

The minority of a committee to which a corporate power has been delegated, cannot bind the majority, or do any valid act in the absence of any special provision otherwise: 127 U. S. 579.

MINT. The place designated by law where money is coined by authority of the government.

The mint was established by the act of April 2, 1792, 1 Story U. S. Laws, 227, and located at Philadelphia. There are mints of the United States now at Philadelphia, San Francisco, New Orleans, Carson, and Denver. R. S. § 3495. A failure by the director of the mint to observe a rule prescribing that he shall, at the annual settlement, require the weighing and counting of all bullion in the mints, does not relieve a superintendent of a mint of his responsibility for bullion in his custody; 77 Fed. Rep. 944. His receipt for a certain quantity of bullion, and his admissions in reports and accounts that he holds it, are at least prima facie evidence that it came into his possession; id. He and his bondsmen are responsible for the loss of bullion which he has received, and which he cannot produce, though it has been lost or stolen without any negligence or fault on his part; id. When he has, on assuming office, receipted for a certain quantity of bullion, the same is thereafter in his custody, though accepted by him under lock and seal on the faith of a certificate as to its amount; id.

See COIN; FOREIGN COIN; MONEY; ANNUAL ASSAY.

MINT-MARK. The masters and workers of the mint, in the indentures made with them, agree "to make a privy mark in the money they make, of gold and silver, so that they may know which moneys were of their own making; after every trial of the pix, having proved their moneys to be lawful, they are entitled to their quietus under the Great Seal, and to be thereanent discharged from all suits or actions; they then change the privy mark, so that the moneys from which they are not yet discharged may be distinguished from those for which they are; they use the new mark until another trial of the pix. Wharton.

MINTAGE. That which is coined or stamped.

MINUS. Less; less than.

MINUTE. Measures. In divisions of the circle or angular measures, a minute is equal to sixty seconds, or one-sixtieth part of a degree.

In the computation of time, a minute is equal to sixty seconds, or the sixtieth part of an hour. See MEASURE.

In Practice. A memorandum of what takes place in court, made by authority of the court. From these minutes the record is afterwards made up.

Toullier says they are so called because the writing in which they were originally was small: that the word is derived from the Latin minuta (scriptura), in opposition to copies which were delivered to the parties, and which were always written in a larger hand. 8 Toullier, n. 413.

Minutes are not considered as any part of the record; 1 Ohio 268. See 23 Pick. 184. It is not the office of the clerk's minutes to indicate the legal questions raised upon a trial and determined by the court; 94 N. Y. 514; 80 Ky. 377; 34 La. Ann. 369.

OF CORPORATE MEETINGS. It is usual for boards of directors of corporations to keep a regular record in writing of their proceedings. It has been said that such a record is essential either to the proof or validity of their acts and contracts. Such may be the case if the charter makes the keeping of such a record essential to the validity of corporate acts. But in the absence of a provision directing the keeping of such records, there appears to be no reason for any distinction between recording in writing the acts of a board of agents of a corporation, and of the agents of a natural person. Provisions in charters directing that minutes be kept are merely directory; a failure to keep them does not affect the validity of corporate acts; 12 Wheat. 75; Ang. & A. Corp. 291*a*; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 522, n. b. See 96 U. S. 271; 111 Mass. 315; 32 Vt. 633. When such records are kept, they are the best evidence of the proceedings of a meeting; but if no minutes were kept, or if, in a suit against the corporation, and upon notice, the corporation neglects or refuses to produce its books, other evidence is admissible; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. 487; 32 Vt. 633; 111 Mass. 315; Ang. & A. Corp. 291*a*.

MINUTE-BOOK. A book kept by the clerk or prothonotary of a court, in which minutes of its proceedings are entered.

MINUTE TITHES. Small tithes, usually belonging to the vicar; e. g. eggs, honey, wax, etc. 3 Burn, Eccl. Law 680; 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 71, §§ 17, 18, 27.

MIRROR DES JUSTICES. The Mirror of Justices, a legal treatise once supposed to have been written during the reign of Edward II. Andrew Horne is its reputed author. But it has been thought that the germ of it was written before the Conquest and that Horne only made additions to it; Marv. Leg. Bibl. 396. But F. W. Maitland holds to the contrary; and also that the evidence that Horne wrote it is not conclusive. It was first published in 1642, and in 1646 it was translated into English by William Hughes. Some diversity of opinion seems to exist as to its merits. Pref. to 9 & 10 Co. Rep. As to the history of this celebrated book, see St. Armand's Hist. Essays on the Legislative Power of England 58; 2 Reeve, Hist. 358; 4 id. 116 n.

Maitland's opinion of the work may be gathered in a few words from his introduction to the reprint of it in 1893, by the Selden Society: "Is he [its author] lawyer, antiquary, preacher, agitator, pedant, faddist, lunatic, romancer, liar? A little of all, perhaps, but the romancer seems to predominate."

MISADVENTURE. An accident by which an injury occurs to another.

When applied to homicide, misadventure is the act of a man who, in the performance of a lawful act, without any intention to do harm, and after using proper precaution to prevent danger, unfortunately kills another person. The act upon which the death ensues must be neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum. The usual examples under this head are: 1, when the death ensues from innocent recreations; 2, from moderate and lawful correction in foro domestico: 3, from acts lawful and indifferent in themselves, done with proper and ordinary caution; 4 Bla. Com. 182; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 221. It happens in consequence of a lawful act; involuntary manslaughter, in consequence of an unlawful act; 98 Ala.

57. See HOMICIDE; MANSLAUGHTER; CORRECTION.

MISAPPROPRIATION. It is not a technical term of law, but it is sometimes applied to the misdemeanor which is committed by a banker, factor, agent, trustee, etc., who fraudulently deals with money goods, securities, etc., entrusted to him, or by a director or public officer of a corporation or company who fraudulently misapplies any of its property. Sweet. L. Dict. See EMBEZZLEMENT.

MISAPPLICATION. As used in 7 Hen. IV. s. 44, the misapplication of public funds only covers cases of corrupt practices or of showing illegal favor. 30 H. L. 752.

MISBEHAVIOR. Improper or unlawful conduct. See 2 Mart. La. N. S. 683.

A party guilty of misbehavior, as, for example, to threaten to do injury to another, may be bound to his good behavior, and thus restrained. As to misbehavior of juries, see NEW TRIAL.

MISCARRIAGE. In Medical Jurisprudence. The expulsion of the ovum or embryo from the uterus within the first six weeks after conception. Between that time, and before the expiration of the sixth month, when the child may possibly live, it is termed abortion. When the delivery takes place soon after the sixth month, it is denominated premature labor. But the criminal act of destroying the fœtus at any time before birth is termed, in law, procuring miscarriage. Chitty, Med. Jur. 410; 2 Dungl. Hum. Phys. 364. See ABORTION; FŒTUS.

In Practice. A term used in the Statute of Frauds to denote that species of wrongful act for the consequences of which the wrongdoer would be responsible at law in a civil action.

By the English Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, § 4, it is enacted that "no action shall be brought to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, unless the agreement," etc., "shall be in writing," etc.

The wrongful riding the horse of another, without his leave or license, and thereby causing his death, is clearly an act for which the party is responsible in damages, and, therefore, falls within the meaning of the word miscarriage: 2 B. & Ald. 516; Burge, Sur. 21.

MISCASTING. An error in auditing and numbering. It does not include any pretended miscasting or misvaluing. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4128.

MISCEGENATION. (Lat. miscere, to mix, and genere, to beget). A mixture of races. The intermarriage of persons belonging to the white and black races. In many of the states this is prohibited by statute. The constitutionality of such statutes has been repeatedly affirmed; Cl. Cr. L. 321; 80 Mo. 175; McClain Cr. L. § 57; 3 Tex. App. 263; 58 Ala. 190; S. C. 30 Am. Rep. 131; 30 Gratt. 858; 3 Heisk. 287. It has been further held that a statute denouncing a severer penalty on persons of the two races living together in adultery, than that prescribed for a like offence between persons of the same race, is constitutional; 58 Ala. 190; S. C. 29 Am. Rep. 739; S. C. 106 U. S. 583; 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1754. See CIVIL RIGHTS.

MISCHIEF. A term used in the law of statutory construction to designate the evil or danger intended to be cured or avoided by the statute. See MALICIOUS MISCHIEF.

MISCOGNIZANT. Ignorant, or not knowing. Stat. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9. Little used.

MISCONDUCT. Unlawful behavior by a person intrusted in any degree with the administration of justice, by which the rights of the parties and the justice of the case may have been affected.

A verdict will be set aside when any of the jury have been guilty of such misconduct; and a court will set aside an award if it has been obtained by the misconduct of an arbitrator: 2 Atk. 501, 504; 2 Chitt. Bail. 44; 1 Salk. 71; 3 P. Wms. 362; 1 Dick. 66. See 98 Ala. 159; 36 Neb. 708.

Under a statute having reference to a divorce dissolving the marriage contract because of the misconduct of the wife, it relates to adultery; 133 N. Y. 540.

See NEW TRIAL.

MISCONTINUANCE. In Practice. A continuance of a suit by undue process. Its effect is the same as a discontinuance. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 299; Jenk. Cent. Cas. 57.

MISCREANT. An apostate; an unbeliever; one who totally renounces Christianity. 4 Bla. Comm. 44.

MISDELIVERY. The delivery of property by a carrier to a person not authorized by the owner or person to whom the carrier is bound by his contract to deliver it. 133 Mass. 156.

MISDEMEANANT. A person guilty of a misdemeanor. See FIRST-CLASS MISDEMEANANT.

MISDEMEANOR. In Criminal Law. A term used to express every offence inferior to felony, punishable by indictment, or by particular prescribed proceedings. In its usual acceptation, it is applied to all those crimes and offences for which the law has not provided a particular name.

It has a common-law, a parliamentary, and a popular sense. In a parliamentary sense, as applied to officers, it means maladministration or misconduct, not necessarily indictable. Demeanor is conduct, and misdemeanor is misconduct, in the business of one's office. It must be in matters of importance, and be of a character to show a wilful disregard of duty; 6 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 649; 37 Neb. 96.

The test whether or not a certain crime is a crime at common law, is, not whether precedents for so treating it can be found in the books, but whether it injuriously affects the public policy and economy; 97 Pa. 397, followed in 146 id. 88, where it was held that a solicitation to commit murder meets this test.

The word is generally used in contradistinction to felony; misdemeanors comprehending all indictable offences which do not amount to felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, and public nuisances, but not including a multitude of offences over which magistrates have an exclusive summary jurisdiction, for a brief designation of which our legal nomenclature is at fault. Misdemeanors have sometimes been called misprisions. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 624. See FELONY; CRIME; MERGER.

MISDESCRIPTION. An erroneous or false description of a contract which is misleading in a material point.

MISDIRECTION. In Practice. An error made by a judge in charging the jury in a special case.

It is a rule, subject to the qualifications hereafter stated, that when the judge at the trial misdirects the jury on matters of law material to the issue, whatever may be the nature of the case, the verdict will be set aside, and a new trial granted; 6 Mod. 242; 2 Salk. 649; 2 Wils. 269; 4 Conn. 356; 59 Pa. 371; or, if such misdirection appear in the bill of exceptions, or otherwise upon the record, a judgment founded on a verdict thus obtained will be reversed. And although the charge of the court be not positively erroneous, yet, if it have a tendency to mislead the jury, and it be uncertain whether they would have found as they did if the instructions had been entirely correct, a new trial will be granted; 11 Wend. 83; 6 Cow. 682; 9 Humph. 411; 9 Conn. 107. When the issue consists of a mixed question of law and fact, and there is a conceded state of facts, the rest is a question for the court; 2 Wend. 596; and a misdirection in this respect will avoid the verdict. In England, under the Judicature Act of 1875, a new trial will not be granted on the ground of misdirection or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, unless in the opinion of the court, to which the application is made, some substantial wrong has been thereby occasioned; and if it appear that such wrong or miscarriage affects part only of the matter in controversy, the court may give final judgment as to part thereof, and direct a new trial as to the other part only; 1 Sched. Ord. xxxix. v. 3; L. R. 10 Stat. 1875, 817.

Misdirection as to matters of fact will, in some cases, be sufficient to vitiate the proceedings. For example: misapprehension of the judge as to a material circumstance, and a direction to the jury accordingly; 1 Const. So. C. 200; or instructing them upon facts which are purely hypothetical, whereby they are misled; 8 Ga. 114; or an instruction which assumes a material fact to have been proved; 83 Ala. 445; 76 Cal. 242; 11 Colo. 80; 79 Ga. 687; 74 Ia. 154; 71 Md. 9; submitting as a contested point what has been admitted; 9 Conn. 216; giving to the jury a peremptory direction to find in a given way, when there are facts in the case conducive to a different conclusion; 7 J. J. Marsh. 410; 3 Wend. 102; 19 id. 402; 12 Mass. 22; 5 Humphr. 476; 47 Ill. App. 332; or where the evidence is so conflicting or rests so largely upon inference or circumstance, that a court could not rightfully sustain a demurrer to the evidence of the opposite party; 87 Ala. 305. See 73 Ia. 576; 74 id. 457; 35 Fed. Rep. 116. There are, however, many cases in which the court may instruct the jury, upon the whole evidence, to find for one or the other party; and when a verdict formed under such instruction is conformable to the law, the evidence, and the justice of the case, it is rarely disturbed; 3 Dana 566. But to warrant an unqualified direction to the jury in favor of a party, the evidence must either be undisputed or the preponderance so decided that a verdict against it would be set aside; 16 Wend. 663; 8 Misc. Rep. 512; 143 Ill. 242; 5 Wash. St. 371; 5 U. S. App. 179; and where a special verdict is directed, the court is not bound to give any instructions as to the general rules of law governing the case; 116 Ind. 278; 69 Tex. 124. When the court delivers its opinion to the jury on a matter of fact, it should be as opinion, and not as direction; 12 Johns. 513. But it is, in general, allowed a very liberal discretion in this regard; 1 M'Cl. & Y. 286. Where the question is one of mere fact, no expressions of the judge, however strong or erroneous will amount to a misdirection, provided the question is fairly presented to the jury and left with them for their decision; 5 Scott 28; 4 Moore & S. 295; 19 Wend. 186; 10 Pick. 252; 128 U. S. 171; 36 Fed. Rep. 166. The weight of evidence is solely for the jury; and an instruction thereupon is erroneous; 83 Ala. 40; 16 Or. 15, 173; 75 Mich. 127.

Unless the misdirection be excepted to, the party by his silence will be deemed to have waived it; 10 Mo. 515; 2 Pick. 145. But see 4 Wend. 514; 2 Barb. 420; see 8 C. C. App. 341; 97 Mich. 166; 157 Pa. 358; 144 Ill. 370.

As to its effects, the misdirection must be calculated to do injustice; for if it be entirely certain that justice has been done, and that a re-hearing would produce the same result, or if the amount in dispute be very trifling, so that the injury is scarcely appreciable, a new trial will not be granted; Thorn. Juries § 204; 2 Caines 85; 7 Me. 442; 10 Ga. 429; 3 Grah. & W. New Tr. 705; Hill. New. Tr. 96. See 82 Ga. 732; NEW TRIAL; CHARGE.

MISE (Lat. mittere, through the French mettre, to place). In Pleading. The issue in a writ of right. The tenant in a writ of right is said to join the mise on the mere right when he pleads that his title is better than the demandant's; 2 Wms. Saund. 45, h, i. It was equivalent to the general issue; and everything except collateral warranty might be given in evidence under it by the tenant; 3 Wils. 420; 7 Wheat. 31; 3 Pet. 133; 7 Cow. 52; 10 Gratt. 350. The payee in aid, on coming into court, joined in the mise together with the tenant; 2 Wms. Saund. 45 d. It was a more common practice, however, for the demandant to traverse the tenant's plea, when the cause could be tried by a common jury instead of the grand assize.

In Practice. Expenses. It is so commonly used in the entries of judgments, in personal actions: as, when the plaintiff recovers, the judgment is quod recuperet damna sua (that he recover his damages), and pro misis et custagiis (for costs and charges) so much, etc.

MISE MONEY. Money paid by way of contract or composition to purchase any liberty, etc. Blount.

MISERABILE DEPOSITUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an involuntary deposit, made under pressing necessity; as, for instance, shipwreck, fire, or other inevitable calamity. Pothier, Proc. Civ. pt. 5, ch. 1, § 1; La. Code § 2935.

MISERERE. The first word and usual name of one of the penitential psalms, being that which was commonly used to be given by the ordinary to such condemned malefactors as were allowed the benefit of clergy (q. v.); whence it is also called the psalm of mercy. Wharton. See NECK VERSE.

MISERICORDIA (Lat.). An arbitrary or discretionary amercement.

To be in mercy is to be liable to such punishment as the judge may in his discretion inflict. According to Spelman, misericordia is so called because the party is in mercy, and to distinguish this fine from redemptions, or heavy fines. Spelman, Gloss. See Co. Litt. 126 b; Madox 14. See IN MISERICORDIA.

MISFEASANCE. The performance of an act which might lawfully be done, in an improper manner, by which another person receives an injury.

It differs from malfeasance or nonfeasance. Misfeasance is the wrongful and injurious exercise of lawful authority, or the doing of a lawful act in an unlawful manner, while malfeasance is doing an act which is positively unlawful or wrongful. 23 L. Mag. & Rev. 139. See, generally, 2 Viner, Abr. 35; 2 Kent 443; Doctrina Plac. 62; Story, Bailm. § 9.

It seems to be settled that there is a distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance in the case of mandates. In cases of nonfeasance the mandatory is not generally liable, because, his undertaking being gratuitous, there is no consideration to support it; but in cases of misfeasance the common law gives a remedy for the injury done, and to the extent of that injury; 5 Term 143; 4 Johns. 81; 2 Johns. Cas. 92; 1 Esp. 74; 2 Ld. Raym. 909; 33 Conn. 109; Story, Bailm. § 165; Bouvier, Inst. Index.

MISFORTUNE. It is equivalent to some adverse event not immediately dependent on the action or will of him who suffers from it, and of so improbable a character that no prudent man would take it into his calculations in reference to the interest of himself or of others. 20 Q. B. Div. 816.

MISJOINDER. In Pleading. The improper union of parties or causes of action in one suit at law or in equity.

Of Actions. The joining several demands which the law does not permit to be joined, to enforce by one proceeding several distinct, substantive rights of recovery. Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 98; Archb. Civ. Pl. 61; Dane, Abr.

In equity, it is the joinder of different and distinct claims against one defendant; Adams, Eq. 309; 7 Sim. 241; 3 Barb. Ch. 432. The grounds of suit must be wholly distinct, and each ground must be sufficient, as stated, to sustain a bill; 5 Ired. Eq. 313. See 21 Ala. N. S. 252; 9 Ga. 278; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 46; 22 Conn. 171.

It may arise from the joinder of plaintiffs who possess distinct claims; 2 Sim. 331; 6 Madd. 94; 8 Pet. 123; see [1893] 1 Q. B. 771; but see 6 Johns. Ch. 150; 8 Paige, Ch. 605; or the joinder of distinct claims of the plaintiff in one bill; 2 S. & S. 79; 5 Misc. Rep. 43. But it seems that where there is a common liability of the defendants and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims may be united in the same suit; 1 M. & C. 623; 5 How. 127, 12 Metc. 323. And see 7 Sim. 241; 3 Price 164; 2 Y. & C. 389; Story, Eq. Pl. § 536, n.; MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

At law, misjoinder vitiates the entire declaration, whether taken advantage of by general demurrer; 1 Maule & S. 355; motion in arrest of judgment, or writ of error; 2 B. & P. 424; 4 Term 347. It may be aided by verdict in some cases; 2 Lev. 110; 11 Mod. 196; 2 Maule & S. 533; 1 Chitty. Pl. 188. Where a single count of a complaint contains one cause of action in tort and another in contract, and plaintiff is allowed over objections to introduce evidence to sustain both causes, the error is not cured by plaintiff's election after the trial, to recover in contract only, when the judgment rendered does not limit plaintiff's recovery of costs to those incurred in the action in contract; 84 Wis. 209.

Of Parties. The joining, as plaintiffs or defendants, parties who have not a joint interest.

In England, under the Judicature Act, 1875, by order xvi. v. 13, no action is to be defeated by the misjoinder of the parties. Different causes of action which cannot be tried together conveniently may be ordered by the court or a judge to be tried separately. Mozl. & W. Dict.

In equity, the joinder of improper plaintiffs is a fatal defect; 2 Sandf. Ch. 186; 3 Edw. Ch. 48; 2 Ala. N. S. 406. But the court may exercise a discretion whether to dismiss the bill; 1 Barb. Ch. 59; 3 Ohio St. 129. See 5 Fla. 110. It may be dismissed wholly, or only as to a portion of the plaintiffs; 18 Ohio 72. The improper joinder of defendants is no cause of objection by a co-defendant; 2 Barb. Ch. 618; 6 Ired. Eq. 62; 7 Ala. N. S. 362; 12 Ark. 720; 23 Me. 269. See 7 Conn. 387; 86 Wis. 292.

The objection must be taken before the hearing; 15 How. 546; 2 Hill Ch. 566; 4 Paige Ch. 510; not, however, if it be vital; 30 N. H. 433; by demurrer, if apparent on the face of the bill; 9 Paige Ch. 410; 7 Ala. N. S. 362; 112 N. C. 578; but see 5 Ill. 424; by plea and answer; or otherwise; 13 Pet. 359; 1 T. B. Monr. 105; where the defect does not appear upon the face of the petition, objection must be raised by answer; 113 Mo. 623. A defendant who is improperly joined must plead or demur; 1 Mo. 410.

At law, see ABATEMENT; PLEADING.

An answer stating facts showing a misjoinder of plaintiffs, but not objecting to the action on that ground is not sufficient to save such an objection; 49 Mo. App. 273; where no objection is made in the court below to a misjoinder of parties defendant, no advantage can be taken of it on appeal; 2 Colo. App. 436.

MISKENNING (Fr. mis, wrong, and Sax. cennan, summon). A wrongful citation to appear in court. A variance in a plea. 1 Mon. Angl. 237; Chart. Hen. II.; Jacob, Law Dict.; Du Cange.

MISNOMER. The use of a wrong name.

In contracts, a mistake in the name will not avoid the contract, in general, if the party can be ascertained; 11 Co. 20; Ld. Raym. 304; Hob. 125. So of contracts of corporations; 2 Beasl. 427. See NAME. If a deed, note, etc., be made to a corporation under an erroneous name, the proper course is for the corporation to sue in its proper name and allege that the defendant made the deed, etc., to the corporation by the name mentioned in the instrument; 69 Ill. 658. A contract entered into by a corporation under an assumed name may be enforced by either of the parties, and the identity of the company may be established by the ordinary methods of proof; 37 W. Va. 778.

A misnomer of a legatee will not, in general, avoid a legacy, when the context furnishes the means of correction; Schoul. Wills § 583; see 19 Ves. 381; 1 Rop. Leg. 131; LEGACY. A legacy given to a corporation, either by its corporate name, or by description, is good; in the latter case it must be so designated as to be distinguished from every other corporation; 10 N. Y. 84. See 45 Me. 552; 37 Ala. 478.

When a corporation is misnamed in a statute, the statute is not inoperative if there is enough to designate what corporation is meant; 10 Co. 44, 57 b.

Misnomer of one of the parties to a suit must be pleaded in abatement. It has been held that misnomer of one of the partners of a firm in a scire facias sur mortgage is unimportant, if the name of the firm is correct in the mortgage itself; 64 Penn. 63. A slight variation in a corporate name will be disregarded unless the misnomer be taken advantage of by a plea in abatement; 30 Ill. 151; 19 Mich. 196. If a corporation, sued by an erroneous name, appears by that name without objection, the error is cured; Taney 418. See 36 Ark. 499. But a writ of mandamus issued against a corporation under an erroneous name is void; 2 Ld. Raym. 1238; and an error in the corporate name in an execution is fatal; 58 Ga. 280. The same is true when there is an error in the corporate name in a judgment; 1 Ld. Raym. 117; but see 11 Mass. 138.

The names of third persons must be correctly laid; for the error will not be helped by pleading the general issue; but, if a sufficient description be given, it has been held, in a civil case, that the misnomer was immaterial. Example: in an action for medicines alleged to have been furnished to defendant's wife, Mary, and his wife was named Elizabeth, the misnomer was held to be immaterial, the word wife being the material word; 2 Marsh. 159. See 10 U. S. App. 267. In indictments, the names of third persons must be correctly given; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 78. If a person is well known by the name in the indictment, the indictment is good; 7 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 445; the middle name of a defendant, if stated in an indictment, either in full or by the initial letter, must be correctly stated; 1 Am. L. Reg. 380. That a party is known by one name as well as another, is a good replication to a plea of misnomer; 43 Ill. App. 609. Accuracy is especially required in stating the correct name of a corporation in all criminal proceedings in which it may be concerned; 1 Leach 253; but see 35 Cal. 110. See Archbold; Chitty, Pleading; ABATEMENT; CONTRACT; PARTIES; LEGACY; NAME.

MISPLEADING. Pleading incorrectly, or omitting anything in pleading which is essential to the support or defence of an action, is so called.

Pleading not guilty to an action of debt is an example of the first; setting out a defective title is an example of the second. See 3 Salk. 365.

MISPRISION. In Criminal Law. A term used to signify every considerable misdemeanor which has not a certain name given to it by law. Co. 3d Inst. 36.

The concealment of a crime.

Negative misprision consists in the concealment of something which ought to be revealed.

Misprision of felony is the like concealment of felony, without giving any degree of maintenance to the felon; Act of Congress of April 30, 1790, s. 6, R. S. § 5390; for if any aid be given him, the party becomes an accessory after the fact.

Misprision of treason is the concealment of treason by being merely passive. Act of Congress of April 30, 1790, R. S. § 5333; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 139. If any assistance be given to the traitor, it makes the party a principal, as there are no accessories in treason.

Positive misprision consists in the commission of something which ought not to be done. 4 Bla. Com. c. 9.

It is the duty of every good citizen, knowing of a treason or felony having been committed, to inform a magistrate. Silently to observe the commission of a felony, without using any endeavors to apprehend the offender, is a misprision. 1 Russ. Cr. 43; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 720; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 59; s. 6; 4 Bla. Com. 119.

Misprisions which are merely positive are denominated contempts or high misdemeanors: as, for example, dissuading a witness from giving evidence. 4 Bla. Com. 126.

MISREADING. When a deed is read falsely to an illiterate or blind man who is a party to it, such false reading amounts to a fraud, because the contract never had the assent of both parties; 5 Co. 19; 6 East 309; Dane, Abr. c. 86, a. 3, § 7; 2 Johns. 404; 12 id. 469; 3 Cow. 537. See 14 Pa. 496; 82 id. 203; 62 Wis. 480; 55 Mich. 592.

MISRECITAL. The incorrect recital of a matter of fact, either in an agreement or a plea: under the latter term is here understood the declaration and all the subsequent pleadings. See RECITAL.

MISREPRESENTATION. The statement made by a party to a contract that a thing relating to it is in fact in a particular way, when he knows it is not so.

The misrepresentation must be both false and fraudulent in order to make the party making it responsible to the other for damages; 3 Conn. 413; 10 Mass. 197; 1 Const. So. C. 328, 475; Metc. Yelv. 21 a, n. 1; Peake, Cas. 115; 3 Campb. 154; Marshall, Ins. b. 1, c. 10, s. 1. And see 5 Maule & S. 380; 12 East 638; 3 B. & P. 370; 45 Ill. App. 244. Misrepresentation as to a material part of the consideration will avoid an executory contract; 1 Phil. Ins. §§ 630, 675; 83 Va. 397; 147 Mass. 403; 124 Pa. 450; 97 Mich. 5.

A misrepresentation, to constitute fraud, must be contrary to fact; the party making it must know it to be so; 2 Kent 471; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 142; 4 Price 135; 3 Conn. 597; 22 Me. 511; 7 Gratt. 64, 239; 6 Ga. 458; 5 Johns. Ch. 182; 6 Paige, Ch. 197; 1 Stor. 172; 1 W. & M. 342; 85 Tenn. 139; 76 Ia. 11; 5 Ind. App. 474; 51 Kan. 144; 63 Vt. 463; excluding cases of mere mistake; 5 Q. B. 804; 9 id. 197; 10 M. & W. 147; 14 id. 651; 7 Cra. 69; 13 How. 211; 8 Johns. 25; 7 Wend. 10; 1 Metc. Mass. 1; 27 Me. 309; 7 Vt. 67, 79; 6 N. H. 99; and including cases where he falsely asserts a personal knowledge; 18 Pick. 96; 1 Metc. Mass. 193; 6 id. 245; 27 Me. 309; 16 Wend. 646; 16 Ala. 785; 1 Bibb 244; 4 B. Monr. 601; 3 Cra. 281; and one which gave rise to the contracting of the other party; 14 N. H. 331; 1 W. & M. 90, 342; 2 id. 298; 2 Strobh. Eq. 14; 2 Bibb 474; 8 B. Monr. 23; 4 How. Miss. 435; 6 id. 311; 25 Miss. 167; 3 Cra. 282; 3 Yerg. 178; 19 Ga. 448; 5 Blackf. 18. See 12 Me. 262; 13 Pet. 26; 23 Wend. 260; 7 Barb. 65; Poll. Cont. 542.

A contract is bad where a party is induced to enter into it by the innocent misstatement of facts by another; 51 Ia. 364; 39 Ohio 491; 89 Ind. 38; 2 Kent 471; but the misrepresentation must be the proximate and immediate cause of the transaction; 11 Col. 15; and part of the same transaction; 83 Va. 504; and the party seeking relief must have relied upon it; 86 Wis. 427. In an action for misrepresentation of facts, it is not always necessary to prove that it was made with a fraudulent intent and with guilty knowledge; 80 Wis. 540; but an innocent misrepresentation cannot be proved under a plea of fraud; 21 Can. S. C. R. 359.

To be material, the misrepresentation must be in respect to an ascertainable fact, as distinguished from a mere matter of opinion, judgment, probability, or expectation; if it is vague and indefinite in its nature and terms, or is merely a loose, conjectural, or exaggerated statement, it is not a material misrepresentation; 73 Tex. 465; 17 Ore. 347; 149 Mass. 188.

A representation concerning a man's private rights, though it may involve matters of law, is as a whole deemed to be a statement of fact; 13 Q. B. D. 363; as is a representation that one has extraordinary and supernatural power in curing disease; 36 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 1027. See also 15 W. N. C. Pa. 282. And representations from one bank to another that a business corporation is prosperous, well organized, doing a large business, and is a valued customer, and that an investigation has been made of its business and responsibility by a bank officer, are also representations of fact and not of opinion; 59 Fed. Rep. 838. "A suppression of the truth may amount to a suggestion of falsehood;" 128 U. S. 388; 51 Kan. 355; and a false pretence need not be in regard to a fact which does in reality exist, but may be that a fact exists when it does not; 14 Crim. L. Mag. 1.

Mere honest expression of opinion will not, as a rule, be regarded as fraud, either as a basis for an action of deceit, or as ground for setting aside a contract, although the opinion may prove to be erroneous; 141 N. Y. 596; 29 N. J. Eq. 257; 73 Tex. 465; 92 Va. 71; 34 Ill. App. 665; 125 U. S. 247; L. R. 13 Q. B. D. 562. And this rule applies ordinarily to statements of the value of property to be bought or sold; 124 Pa. 450; 90 N. Y. 272; 86 Mo. 293; 106 Cal. 623; but it cannot be laid down as a matter of law that value is never a material fact; 11 Mich. 68; as where the defendant was employed to value real estate for an intended mortgagee, and gave a valuation which was in fact no valuation at all, it was held that the defendant owed a duty to the plaintiff which he had failed to discharge, and had made reckless statements on which plaintiff had acted, and therefore defendant was liable to plaintiff for the loss he had sustained; 39 Ch. D. 39.

So the mere puffing of articles to be sold is held not to amount to such a misrepresentation as will amount to fraud; 72 Ill. 104; but this rule applies only when the purchaser has a full and fair opportunity to inspect the article and judge for himself, and not to things which are not the subject of any visible test or examination; 44 Ark. 216; and a vendor may be held guilty of deceit by reason of material untrue representations in respect to his own business or property, the truth of which representation he is bound and must be presumed to know; 150 U. S. 673. A person who makes representations of material facts, assuming or intending to convey the impression that he has adequate knowledge of the existence of such facts, when he is conscious that he has no such knowledge, is liable if he knew that they were false; id.

Statements as to future events are mere matters of opinion; 17 Abb. N. C. 1; 59 Mo. App. 130; and however contrary to good faith and sound morals, they cannot form the basis of an action at law or in equity; 1 Ark. 31; but see 87 Cal. 557, where although the question was not raised as to whether misrepresentations of prospects of property sold would entitle one to an action, yet as the measure of damages for such representations was decided, the court seem to have admitted that liability would arise therefrom.

One who makes a false statement which he believes to be true, incurs no liability; if the belief is honest, it makes no difference what their grounds are; Poll. Torts 273; contra, 41 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 319; but the grounds of a belief are a "most important test of its reality;" 14 App. Cas. 375. If untrue statements are founded upon a belief destitute of all reasonable grounds, or which the least inquiry would immediately correct, such circumstances would be evidence, but only evidence, that the statement was not really believed to be true; and any liability therefor would be based, not upon the party having stated as true what he had not reasonable grounds to believe to be true, but as having stated as true what he did not believe to be trne; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 162, followed in 14 App. Cas. 337, a decision deemed by a learned writer to be unfortunate; Poll. Torts 275; and see 5 L. Quart. Rev. 410; 6 id. 73.

It is not necessary that the misrepresentation should have been made directly to the plaintiff; Poll. Torts 282; 2 M. & W. 519; they may be published generally with the intention that they may be acted upon by any who choose; 3 B. & Ad. 114; as a time-table of a railway company announcing a train, which is not, in fact, running; 5 E. & B. 860; or a prospectus; L. R. 6 H. L. 377.

Where one states that he knows a thing to exist, when he does not know it to exist, he is guilty of fraud; this rule applies to facts susceptible of actual knowledge, and not matters of opinion, etc.; one who does not know a fact to exist must ordinarily be deemed to know that he does not know; 147 Mass. 403. "If persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant, whether they are true or untrue, they must, in a civil point of view, be held as responsible as if they had asserted that which they knew to be untrue"; L. R. 4 H. L. 79; this ignorance is conscious ignorance; 14 App. Cas. 371. Where one has honestly made a representation and discovers that it is false before it is acted upon, he is deemed, if he has the means of communicating the truth and does not do so, to be making a false representation with knowledge of its untruth; see 1 D. G. M. & G. 660.

There may be a false pretence by conduct, as where one not a member of the university put on a cap and gown at Oxford and thereupon obtained goods on credit; 7 C. & P. 784; so where one having no money goes into a restaurant and orders a good dinner and cannot pay for it, it was held to be incurring a liability by fraud; 42 Sol. Journ. 78.

An action to recover for false representations made by the seller of personal property does not survive as against his estate, under a statute providing that actions "of trespass and trespass on the case for damages done to . . . personal estate shall survive"; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 488.

In the absence of any bad faith, a principal is not affected by a representation made by his agent, which the former knew to be untrue, as he would be by a fraudulent representation made either by himself or his agent; 2 Kent 621, n.; 1 H. L. C. 615; 6 M. & W. 358; contra, 21 Vt. 129; 8 id. 98; 3 Q. B. 58. See Poll. Torts 384; Benj. Sales § 445; Broom, Leg. Max. 707. Where a purchaser has been induced to buy through the fraud of an agent, the vendor being innocent, he may rescind the contract or maintain an action of deceit against the agent personally, but against the principal he can maintain no action unless there was a warranty; Benj. Sales § 467, notes. See 3 Am. L. Rev. 430; Bigel. L. C. Torts 21; 16 Gray 436.

If a principal knows the representation of his agent to be false and authorizes him to make it, the former is liable; if the agent makes the representation without specific authority, but not believing it to be true, the principal is liable (6 M. & W. 373); as to whether, in such case if the agent does believe the representations to be true, the principal is liable, is doubtful in England; Poll. Torts 291. See AGENTS; See, generally, DECEIT; FRAUD.

MISSISSIPPI. The name of one of the states of the United States.

The territory of Mississippi, embracing the present states of Alabama and Mississippi, was authorized to be organized by act of congress, of April 9, 1798, and organized on 22d January, 1799. Georgia, from which the territory was formed, ceded it to the United States on April 24, 1802.

The western part of the Mississippi territory was authorized to form a state government to be known as the state of Mississippi, by act of congress passed March 1, 1817, and the state was admitted into the Union December 10, 1817.

The first constitution of the state was adopted at Washington, August 15, 1817. The second at Jackson, October 26, 1832. This was amended in August, 1865, so as to strike out the word "white," and to abolish and to eliminate everything connected with the institution of slavery. The third, at Jackson, on May 15, 1868, ratified by the people on December 1, 1869, and went into operation in 1870, on the readmission of the state into the Union under the Reconstruction Acts of congress. The fourth was adopted in convention November 1, 1890, to take effect from that date.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER. This is vested in the senate and house of representatives. Their action, except in impeachment trials, is subject to executive veto.

The Senate is composed of members elected for the term of four years, in the several districts as provided by law, the number being forty-five. A senator must have attained to the age of twenty-five years, must be an elector of the state for four years, and an actual resident of the district for two years before his election.

The House of Representatives is composed of members elected every four years in the counties and representative districts, as provided by law, the number being one hundred and thirty-three. They must be twenty-one years of age at least, and resident citizens of the state four years and of the county two years, immediately preceding their election. The seat of a senator or representative is vacated by removal from the district or county. The legislature meets in regular sessions once in four years, commencing on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in January 1892; and in special sessions every four years commencing on the same day in 1894. Special sessions may consider only appropriation and revenue bills and are limited to thirty days unless the governor extends them by proclamation. He may also convene extraordinary sessions, for action only upon subjects designated by him.

EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for four years. He must be at least thirty years of age, twenty years a citizen of the United States, and a resident in the state five years next preceding his election. He has the usual powers and may grant pardons, etc., after advertisement by the applicant of his petition, giving reasons for the application, except that pardon or reprieve for treason, or remission of forfeitures, requires the advice and consent of the senate. When the office of governor becomes vacant the Lieut.-Governor succeeds to the powers and duties of the office, and receives the same compensation as the governor, during the remainder of the term. He also acts in the absence from the state or disability of the governor. In case of disability, absence, or other incapacity of the lieutenant-governor the president of the senate, pro tempore acts in his stead; with succession to the speaker of the house of representatives, or if there be none of these officers to discharge the duties of governor, the secretary of state convenes the senate to elect a president pro tempore. In case of doubt as to the existence of a vacancy the secretary of state may submit the question to the supreme court.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—There are in the state three courts of general jurisdiction: a supreme court, circuit courts and chancery courts. All the chancellors and judges are appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate. Judges of the supreme and the circuit courts and chancellors may, in term time and vacation, severally order the issuance of writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, certiorari, supersedeas, and attachments, and grant injunctions and all other remedial writs in proper cases, returnable to any court. They are also all conservators of the peace.

The Supreme Court consists of three judges, appointed for the term of nine years. The terms are so arranged that one expires every third year. The judge of longest continuous service is Chief Justice. The judges must be at least thirty years of age, and five years practising attorneys and citizens of the state. The terms of the court are held at Jackson, the seat of government, twice in each year, to wit: second Monday in October, and first Monday in March. The state is divided into three districts, and the dockets of the different districts are called at different times, which are fixed during the October term by statute, and during the March term by order of the court. The judges are required to be appointed from the districts, but removal to the state capital during the term of office shall not render them ineligible for election for another term from the district. It has conferred upon it by the constitution "such jurisdiction as properly belongs to a court of appeals."

Circuit Court. The state, by the constitution, is required to be divided into convenient judicial districts, and is now divided into nine. The judges are appointed for the term of four years, and are required to be at least twenty-six years of age; and for five years citizens and practicing lawyers of the state. The judges may alternate and make temporary changes of their circuits whenever the public interests require. At least two terms of the court shall be held each year in each county.

The court has original jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal; but in civil matters only when the principal amount in controversy exceeds two hundred dollars. It has appellate jurisdiction in all cases where appeals are granted by law from inferior tribunals.

Chancery Courts are established in each county in the state, with full jurisdiction in all matters in equity, and of divorce and alimony; in matters testamentary and of administration; in minor's business, also general chancery powers; and in cases of idiocy, lunacy, and persons non compos mentis. It may alter names, legitimate offspring, and decree adoption of children. All appeals are prosecuted directly to the supreme court.

The state is divided into convenient chancery districts, now into seven. Chancellors are appointed for each district in the same manner as circuit judges, and for the term of four years. The qualifications of the chancellors are regulated by statute, and are the same as those prescribed by the constitution for circuit judges. A court is required to be held in each county at least twice in each year.

The clerk of the chancery court is vested with large powers. At any time he may receive and file bills, petitions, motions, accounts, inventories, and reports, issue process and warrants of appraisement, allow and register claims against estates being administered in his court, may appoint administrators ad colligendum, may grant letters of administration to husband, or wife, or next of kin. At monthly rules, required to be held on the first Monday of each month, he may take the probate of wills, and grant letters testamentary, grant letters of administration, appoint guardians for minors, lunatics, and idiots, compel the return of inventories, the presentation of annual or final accounts and approve the same; may refer contested claims to auditors, and receive and act on their report; may do all things necessary to the settlement of insolvent estates; may require executors, or administrators, or guardians to give new sureties; may enter decrees nisi, and make all orders of course, orders of revivors, and orders pro confesso. All such orders are not final, but are subject to approval by the court.

Justices of the Peace. A competent number of justices of the peace are elected in each county for each district for four years, having resided two years in the district. The jurisdiction in civil matters is limited to causes in which the principal of the amount in controversy does not exceed two hundred dollars; and in criminal matters, concurrent with the circuit court, of all cases of offences where the punishment prescribed does not extend beyond a fine and imprisonment in the county jail. They are conservators of the peace. An appeal may be taken to the circuit court in all cases.

MISSOURI. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

It was formed out of part of the territory ceded to the United States by the French Republic by treaty of April 30, 1803, and admitted into the Union by a resolution of congress approved March 2, 1821.

To this resolution there was a condition, which, having been performed, the admission of Missouri as a state was completed by the president's proclamation, dated August 10, 1821.

The convention which formed the constitution of this state met at St. Louis, on Monday, June 12, 1820, and continued by adjournment till July 19, 1820, when the constitution was adopted, establishing "an independent republic, by the name of the 'State of Missouri.'"

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The General Assembly consists of a Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senate consists of thirty-four members, chosen for the term of four years; but one-half are chosen every second year. A senator must be a male citizen of the United States, thirty years old, a qualified voter of the state three years, and an inhabitant of the district which he may be chosen to represent one year, and shall have paid a state and county tax within one year, next before his election.

The House of Representatives consists of members to be chosen every second year by the several counties, the total number being about one hundred and forty, but varying with the apportionments, which are to be made after each decennial census, and are based on a ratio obtained by dividing the whole number of inhabitants of the state by two hundred. Each county is entitled to one representative, at least, and when counties have certain multiples of said ratio, they are entitled to representation proportionate thereto; such counties being divided into representative districts by the county or circuit court.

A representative must be twenty-four years of age at least, must have been a qualified voter of the state two years, and otherwise possess the same qualifications as a senator.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected by the people, and holds his office for four years and until a successor is duly elected and qualified, but he is ineligible to re-election as his own successor. He must be at least thirty-five years old, a male, and must have been a citizen of the United States for ten years, and a resident of this state seven years next before his election. In addition to other usual powers, he may grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons, except in cases of treason and impeachment, and veto bills, which, however, may be passed over his objections by a two-thirds vote of all the members elect in both houses.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, in the same manner, and for the same term, and is to possess the same qualifications as the governor. He is, by virtue of his office, president of the senate, may debate in committee of the whole, and give the casting vote in the senate, and in joint vote of both houses. In case of death, conviction, or impeachment, failure to qualify, resignation, absence from the state, or other disability of the governor, the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office for the residue of the term, or until the disability shall be removed, devolve upon him.

A Secretary of State, State Auditor, State Treasurer, Attorney General, and Superintendent of Public Schools, each of whom must be at least twenty-five years old, a male citizen of the United States, and a resident of this state at least five years next before an election, and who are all elected for four years, complete the executive department.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Court consists of five judges, elected by the people for ten years, one judge being elected every two years; but they may be removed from office, for inefficiency on account of continued sickness or infirmity, by the general assembly, two-thirds of the members concurring, with the approval of the governor. This process does not, however, take the place of impeachment. Judges must be citizens of the United States, not less than thirty years old, and citizens of this state for five years next before their election.

Three of the judges constitute a quorum, and the court is required to sit at the seat of government. It has an appellate and superintending jurisdiction over inferior courts, coextensive with the state (under limitations provided in the constitution), may issue, hear, and determine writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, and other original remedial writs.

Appeals to, and writs of error from, the supreme court, lie in cases involving: 1st, a sum exceeding twenty-five hundred dollars; 2d, the construction of state or national constitution; 3d, a treaty, statute, or authority under the United States; 4th, the state revenue laws, or title to state office; 5th, title to real estate; 6th, cases in which a political subdivision, or an officer, of the state is a party; 7th, all cases of felony.

Appellate Courts. There are two district appellate courts, the St. Louis Court of Appeals and the Kansas City Court of Appeals. The jurisdiction of the former extends over the city of St. Louis and the eastern counties of the state named in the constitutional amendment establishing these courts. The latter embraces all other counties in the state. Each of said courts has within its own territorial district final and appellate jurisdiction from the circuit and other inferior courts in all cases except those which go to the supreme court directly, see supra. Also superintending control over inferior courts of record with power to issue writs of habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, certiorari, and other remedial writs, and to hear and determine them. Each of these courts consists of three judges, two of whom constitute a quorum, to be elected by the qualified voters of the district for the period of twelve years, one judge being elected every four years. Judges must be residents of the district and must otherwise possess the same qualifications as judges of the supreme court.

The Circuit Court has jurisdiction over all criminal, and exclusive original jurisdiction over all civil cases, not otherwise provided for by law; concurrent jurisdiction with, and appellate jurisdiction from, inferior tribunals and justices of the peace, as may be required by law. It exercises superintending control over criminal, probate, county, and municipal corporation courts, justices of the peace, and inferior tribunals. It has full original jurisdiction in equity; and no other chancery court exists.

The state is divided into convenient circuits of contiguous counties, in each of which one judge is elected for six years, who must be thirty years old, a citizen of the United States five years, of this state three years, and a resident of the circuit. Any circuit judge may be removed by the general assembly, or may be impeached, in the same manner as supreme judges. In the city of St. Louis, (which is a distinct political subdivision of the state) there are five circuit judges, of co-ordinate jurisdiction, who sit separately in special term, for the trial of causes, and together in general term, to make rules of court and transact such other business as may be provided by law, but with no power to review proceedings had in special term.

The Probate Court is a court of record in each county, consisting of one judge, who is elected. It has jurisdiction in probate matters, letters testamentary, and of administration, guardians, curators, and all matters relating to apprentices. From its final judgments and orders an appeal lies to the circuit court of the county. Courts of common pleas are established in several cities. They are held by the circuit judge in May and September of each year.

The County Court is a court of record in each county, and has jurisdiction to transact all business relating to the property and financial affairs of the county and to administer the county institutions, and such other business as may be prescribed by law. It consists of one or more judges, not exceeding three, of whom the probate judge may be one.

Justices of the Peace are elected by the people. They have original civil jurisdiction over matters arising from contract and tort, and to recover statutory penalties when the amount involved does not exceed two hundred and fifty dollars (and in cities and counties having over fifty thousand inhabitants, three hundred dollars); in cities having three hundred thousand or more inhabitants they have original jurisdiction of all civil actions where the amount in dispute, exclusive of interest and costs does not exceed five hundred dollars; also in actions against railroad companies for injuries to animals in their townships, without regard to value or number of inhabitants.

They have criminal jurisdiction in breaches of the peace, concurrent original jurisdiction with the circuit court, coextensive with their counties, in misdemeanors, and authority to issue warrants for preliminary hearing, and to take bail, in cases of alleged felony.

In the city of St. Louis there are the Criminal Court, the Court of Criminal Correction, and, as in other cities, Municipal Corporation Courts.

The Criminal Court has the criminal jurisdiction in felony cases of the circuit courts of other counties.

The Court of Criminal Correction has exclusive original jurisdiction of all misdemeanors, committed in St. Louis, except in a few minor offences, where it is concurrent with justices of the peace; and power to hear and commit for indictment, with or without bail, all parties charged with felony. It has also an appellate jurisdiction from justices in criminal cases.

Municipal Corporation Courts exercise functions under the laws and ordinances of the city.

MISSTAICUS. A messenger.

MISSURA. The ceremonies used in a Roman Catholic church to recommend and dismiss a dying person.

MISTAKE. Some unintentional act, omission, or error arising from ignorance, surprise, imposition, or misplaced confidence. Story, Eq. Jur. § 110; 46 Wis. 118.

That result of ignorance of law or fact which has misled a person to commit that which, if he had not been in error, he would not have done. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 358.

A mistake exists when a person, under some erroneous conviction of law or fact does, or omits to do, some act which, but for the erroneous conviction, he would not have done or omitted. It may arise either from unconsciousness, ignorance, forgetfulness, imposition, or misplaced confidence. Bishp. Eq. § 185. The essential element of mistake is a mental condition or conception or deviation of the understanding either in a passive or active state; when passive, it may consist of unconsciousness, ignorance, or forgetfulness, and when active, it may be a belief. The first condition must always concern a fact material to the transaction, while in the second, the belief may be that a matter or thing exists at the present time which really does not exist, or that it existed at some past time when it did not really exist. All particular errors which fall under either condition are mistakes of fact which are a ground of equitable relief. These mistakes may arise from ignorance; 19 Barb. 222; in forgetfulness of a fact past; 7 Johns. 442; of a fact present; 88 Pa. 491; in unconsciousness; 29 Vt. 238; 4 Bosw. 320; in belief of a thing which does not exist; 25 N. Y. 289; 19 id. 502; of things which have not existed; 8 N. Y. 335. See 6 L. R. A. 835.

As a general rule, both at law and in equity, mistakes of law do not furnish an excuse for wrongful acts or a ground of relief from the consequences of acts done in consequence of such a mistake; 94 N. C. 490; 107 Ind. 69; 9 M. & W. 54; 5 Hare 91; 9 How. 55; 7 Paige 99*, 137; 2 Johns. Ch. 60. See 2 M'Cord, Ch. 455; 6 H. & J. 500; 25 Vt. 603; 13 Ark. 129; 6 Ohio 169; 11 id. 480; 21 Ga. 118; Beasl. Ch. 165; 62 Mich. 473; 159 Pa. 531; 46 Ill. App. 387; 108 Ind. 61; 88 Mo. 621. But if a contracting party knows that the other party is proceeding upon a mistake in law, there might arise a consideration of fraud in his taking advantage of the other's mistake; 70 Pa. 425; 51 Ala. 154; 23 Ill. 579; 102 id. 208; 67 Me. 217; 82 N. C. 40; 36 N. J. Eq. 111. When both parties are under a common mistake of law as to the application of their contract, it can be applied only according to their intention and not otherwise; Leake, Contr. 347; 46 L. J. Q. B. 213. And, if parties contract under a common misapprehension as to their relative and respective rights, the contract may be liable to be set aside as inapplicable to the state of rights really existing; L. R. 2 H. L. 170; see 79 Hun 44; 48 Wis. 443; 36 N. J. L. 432. In this connection the word jus in the maxim ignorantia juris haud excusat, denotes general law and not private rights; ibid.; Add. Contr. 119. An agreement made for the purpose of settling rights, with full knowledge of the doubts arising upon them, will be enforced, and parties will not be allowed to state that they were under a misapprehension as to the law; 1 S. & S. 555; 51 Ala. 160; 3 Lead. Cas. Eq. 411; 7 W. & S. 253. This is particularly the case in relation to family settlements; 3 Swanst. 462; 64 Pa. 25. Inadvertence and mistake are, equally with fraud and wrong, grounds for judicial interference to devest a title acquired thereby; 138 U. S. 514.

The power of courts of equity to afford relief from the consequences of the mistakes of parties to written instruments is not strictly limited to mistakes of fact, but extends also to mistakes of law; 37 Minn. 30; 85 Wis. 240; see 141 U. S. 260; it will correct an instrument where it is clearly and fully inconsistent with a prior agreement and with the purpose for which it was designated, or if it fails to express the intention of the parties; 99 N. C. 30. See IGNORANCE.

An act done or a contract made under a mutual mistake or ignorance of a material fact is voidable and relievable in equity; Poll. Contr. 442; Story, Eq. Jur. § 140; 142 U. S. 417. The rule applies to cases where there has been a studied suppression of facts by one side, and to cases of mutual ignorance or mistake; 26 Beav. 454; 12 Sim. 465; 9 Ves. 275; 2 Barb. 475; 11 Pet. 71; 8 B. Monr. 580; 4 Mas. 414; 5 R. I. 130; 85 Ky. 322; 150 Pa. 36; 5 Wash. St. 736; 78 Hun 462; 160 Mass. 438; 64 Conn. 28. See 128 U. S. 315; 132 id. 271; 31 Fla. 73; 148 Ill. 383. But the fact must be material to the contract, i. e. essential to its character, and an efficient cause of its concoction; 11 Gratt. 468; 2 Barb. 37; 2 Sandf. Ch. 298; 13 Pa. 371. See 28 N. J. Eq. 306; 75 N. Y. 55; 93 U. S. 55. And as a ground for reforming an instrument the mistake must be mutual; 71 Tex. 99; 49 Mo. App. 255; 66 Hun 635; 68 id. 399; 131 Mass. 316; 109 Ind. 354; 71 Iowa 446. But equity will not afford relief in cases of mutual mistake of legal rights where it is impossible to restore both parties to the status quo; 178 Pa. 154. A mistake will not be relieved against if it was the result of the party's negligence; 5 Oreg. 169; 12 Cl. & F. 248; 1 W. & M. 138; 5 R. I. 130; 122 Ill. 536; 103 Pa. 594; 70 Ga. 794. See 16 Oreg. 412. If the mistake, as to the expression of an agreement, is only on one side, there will be no relief. But if such a mistake on the part of one party be known to the other at the time, the contract can be avoided at common law, if not reduced to writing; L. R. 6 Q. B. 597. In equity, a mistake of one party known to the other may not only preclude the latter from obtaining specific performance, but may also be a ground for setting aside the contract altogether; Leake, Contr. 318; 30 Beav. 445. When a written contract contains a mistake common to both parties in expressing its terms, equity will give relief by restraining proceedings at law, or by rectifying the writing or setting it aside; Leake, Contr. 319. An act done intentionally and with knowledge, cannot be treated as a mistake; 22 Ct. Cls. 165.

Where an attorney acting under general instructions of his client to compromise a litigation consents to a compromise under a misapprehension, neither the client nor the counsel are bound thereby and the court will set it aside on application; [1895] 2 Ch. 638.

When a mistake in the expression of a written contract is so obvious, without extrinsic evidence, as to leave no doubt of the intention of the parties, the writing may be so construed as to correct the mistake; 5 H. L. C. 40; L. R. 9 Eq. 507. See 50 Ohio St. 394.

An award may be set aside for a mistake of law or fact by the arbitrators apparent on the face of the award; 2 B. & P. 371; 1 Dall. 487; 1 Sneed 321. See 6 Metc. 136; 17 How. 344; 6 Pick. 148; 2 Gall. 61; 4 N. H. 357; 3 Vt. 308; 15 Ill. 461; 2 B. & Ald. 691.

The word which the parties intended to use in an instrument may be substituted for one which was actually used by a clerical error, in equity; Adams, Eq. 169; 13 Gray, 373; 6 Ired. Eq. 462; 17 Ala. N. S. 562; 58 Fed. Rep. 918. Equity will not correct a mistake in a voluntary deed by inserting the word "heirs" omitted by inadvertence of the draughtsman; but otherwise, when the deed is supported by a valuable or meritorious consideration; 98 N. C. 426.

As to the rule for the correction of mistakes in wills, see Story, Eq. Jur. § 179; 2 Ves. 216; 3 id. 321; 1 Bro. Ch. 85; 3 id. 446; 1 Keen 692; 2 K. & J. 740; 1 Jones, Eq. 110: 22 Mo. 518; 2 Stockt. Ch. 582; [1893] Prob. 1; 45 Wis. 357; 56 Ia. 676.

A mistake sometimes prevents a forfeiture, in cases of violation of revenue laws; Paine 129; Gilp. 235; 4 Call 158; breach of embargo acts; 3 Day 296; Paine 16; 7 Cra. 22; 3 Wheat. 59; 11 How. 47; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 697; 1 Mass. 347. See Kerr, Fr. & Mist.; Bispham, Equity; Leake, Contr.; 3 Lead. Cas. Eq. 411. See ERROR.

MISTERY. A trade or calling. Cowel.

MISTRIAL. A trial which is erroneous on account of some defect in the persons trying, as if the jury come from the wrong county, or because there was no issue formed, as if no plea be entered, or some other defect of jurisdiction. 3 Cro. 284; 2 Maule & S. 270.

Where a jury is discharged without a verdict, the proceeding is properly known as a mistrial; 22 Fed. Rep. 427.

Consent of parties cannot help such a trial, when past; Hob. 5.

It is error to go to trial without a plea or an issue, in the absence of counsel and without his consent, although an affidavit of defence be filed in the case, containing the substance of a plea, and the court has ordered the case on the list for trial; 3 Pa. 501.

On an indictment for perjury, an infant under the age of twenty-one years, and not otherwise qualified, not having, in fact, been summoned, personated his father as a juror. Here was a mistrial, because the verdict in the case was the verdict of but eleven jurors. "To support a judgment," observed Justice Holroyd, "it must be founded on a verdict delivered by twelve competent jurors. This man was incompetent, and therefore there has been a mistrial." 7 D. & R. 684. See 4 B. & Ald. 430; 18 N. Y. 128; NEW TRIAL.

MISUSER. An unlawful use of a right. In cases of public offices and franchises, a misuser is sufficient to cause the right to be forfeited. 2 Bla. Com. 153; 5 Pick. 163.

MITIGATION. Reduction; diminution; lessening of the amount of a penalty or punishment.

Circumstances which do not amount to a justification or excuse of the act committed may yet be properly considered in mitigation of the punishment: as, for example, the fact that one who stole a loaf of bread was starving.

In actions for the recovery of damages, matters may often be given in evidence in mitigation of damages which are no answer to the action itself. See DAMAGES; CHARACTER.

MITIOR SENSUS. See IN MITIORI SENSU.

MITTENDO MANUSCRIPTUM PEDIS FINIS. An abolished judicial writ, addressed to the treasurer and chamberlain of the exchequer to search for and transmit the foot of the fine acknowledged before justices in eyre into the common pleas. Reg. Orig. 14.

MITTER (L. Fr.). To put, to send, or to pass: as, mitter avant, to present to a court; mitter l'estate, to pass the estate; mitter le droit, to pass a right. 2 Bla. Com. 324; Bacon, Abr. Release (C); Co. Litt. 193, 273 b. Mitter a large, to put or set at large.

MITTIMUS. In Old English Law. A writ enclosing a record sent to be tried in a county palatine: it derives its name from the Latin word mittimus, "we send." It is the jury process of these counties, and commands the proper officer of the county palatine to command the sheriff to summon the jury for the trial of the cause, and to return the record, etc. 1 Mart. La. 278; 2 id. 88.

In Criminal Practice. A precept in writing, under the hand and seal of a justice of the peace, or other competent officer, directed to the jailer or keeper of a prison, commanding him to receive and safely keep a person charged with an offence therein named, until he shall be delivered by due course of law. Co. Litt. 590.

MIXED ACTION. See ACTION.

MIXED CONTRACT. See CONTRACT.

MIXED GOVERNMENT. A government established with some of the powers of a monarchial, aristocratical, and democratical government. See GOVERNMENT; MONARCHY.

MIXED JURY. A jury composed partly of white men and partly of negroes. See CIVIL RIGHTS.

One consisting partly of citizens and partly of aliens. See MEDIETAS LINGUÆ; JURY.

MIXED LARCENY. Compound larceny, which see.

MIXED MARRIAGE. A marriage between persons of different nationalities or of different races. See CIVIL RIGHTS.

MIXED POLICY. See POLICY.

MIXED PRESUMPTION. See PRESUMPTION.

MIXED PROPERTY. That kind of property which is not altogether real nor personal, but a compound of both. Heirlooms, tombstones, monuments in a church, and title-deeds to an estate, are of this nature. 2 Bla. Com. 428; 3 B. & Ad. 174; 4 Bingh. 106. See CONFUSION OF GOODS.

MIXED QUESTION. A question involving matters of law and of fact, or one arising from the conflict of foreign and domestic laws. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX LOCI; JURY.

MIXED TITHES. In Ecclesiastical Law. "Those which arise not immediately from the ground, but from those things which are nourished by the ground:" e. g., colts, chickens, calves, milk, eggs, etc. 3 Burn, Eccl. Law 380; 2 Bla. Com. 24.

MIXED TRIBUNALS. A name given to an international jurisdiction introduced into Egypt in 1878, after negotiations with the various Christian Powers of Europe. This tribunal made the administration of civil justice quite independent of the government of Egypt. They have jurisdiction over cases between persons of different nationalities, whether native or European, but criminal charges against natives are heard in the native criminal courts and those against Europeans in the proper consular courts. There are three mixed courts of First Instance and a Court of Appeal, whose decisions are final, and which sits at Alexandria. The two divisions of the Appeal Court are each composed of five European and three native judges; the Courts of First Instance are each composed of five judges, three European and two native. The judges are subjects of various European states, and of the United States and Brazil. They are appointed by their respective governments; Milner, England in Egypt. Changes in the organization are now being considered by a commission.

These courts were instituted for a period of five years only, and have been renewed at various times. The current period expires in February, 1899. See 8 Encyc. Laws of Eng. 445.

MIXTION. The putting of different goods or chattels together in such a manner that they can no longer be separated: as, putting the wines of two different persons into the same barrel, the grain of several persons into the same bag, and the like.

The intermixture may be occasioned by the wilful act of the party, or owner of one of the articles, by the wilful act of a stranger, by the negligence of the owner or a stranger, or by accident. See CONFUSION OF GOODS.

MOB (Lat. mobilis, movable). A tumultuous rout or rabble; a crowd excited to some violent or unlawful act. The word in legal use is practically synonymous with riot, but the latter is the more correct term.

At common law a municipal corporation is not liable for damage to property by a mob; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 746; 90 Pa. 397; s. c. 35 Am. Rep. 670; 46 Ala. 118; 25 Md. 107; nor for the failure of its officers to repress a mob; 53 Ala. 527; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 656; 13 Blatch. 289. The legislature may, however, give a right of action against the corporation for damages caused by a mob, and provide the measure of damages; 9 Kan. 350; 24 Hun 562; 47 Cal. 531; 65 Me. 426. Such a right of action has been provided by statute in Pennsylvania against the county in which the damage was caused.

As all the parties in any way concerned with an unlawful killing by a mob are liable in solido, it is proper to join, as a party defendant with the individuals who participated in the killing, the city in which the act was committed, on the ground of its negligence in not preventing the killing; 50 Fed. Rep. 170; and independently of any misconduct on the part of the city or county to which the loss is attributed, a state may constitutionally compel such county or city to indemnify against losses of property from mobs and riots within their limits; 81 Fed. Rep. 317. See LYNCH LAW; RIOT.

MOBBING AND RIOTING. In Scotch Law. A general term, including all those convocations of the lieges for violent and unlawful purposes, which are attended with injury to the persons or property of the lieges, or terror and alarm to the neighborhood in which it takes place. The two phrases are usually placed together; but, nevertheless, they have distinct meanings, and are sometimes used separately in legal language,—the word mobbing being peculiarly applicable to the unlawful assemblage and violence of a number of persons, and that of rioting to the outrageous behavior of a single individual. Alison, Cr. Law 509.

MOBILIA. See MOVABLES.

MOCK. To deride, to laugh at, to ridicule, to treat with scorn and contempt. 34 Conn. 279.

MODE. The manner in which a thing is done; as the mode of proceeding, the mode of process. Anderson's L. Dict.

See, generally, 9 Pet. 360; 10 Wheat. 51; 48 Wis. 385.

MODEL. A machine made on a small scale to show the manner in which it is to be worked or employed.

A copy or imitation of the thing intended to be represented. 25 N. J. L. 602. See PATENT.

MODERAMEN INCULPATÆ TUTELÆ. In Roman Law. The regulation of justifiable defence. The term expresses that degree of force which a person might lawfully use in defence of his person or property, even though it should occasion the death of the agressor. Bell, Dict.

MODERATA MISERICORDIA. A writ founded on Magna Charta, which lies for him who is amerced in a court, not of record, for any transgression beyond the quality or quantity of the offence; it is addressed to the lord of the court, or his bailiff, commanding him to take a moderate amerciament of the parties. New Nat. Brev. 167; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 76.

MODERATE CASTIGAVIT. In Pleading. The name of a plea in trespass by which the defendant justifies an assault and battery, because he moderately corrected the plaintiff, whom he had a right to correct. 2 Chitty, Pl. 576; 2 B. & P. 224. See CORRECTION; ASSAULT; 15 Mass. 347; 2 Phill. Ev. 147; Bacon, Abr. Assault (C).

This plea ought to disclose, in general terms, the cause which rendered the correction expedient; 3 Salk. 47.

MODERATE SPEED. The moderate speed of a steam vessel is such as will permit the steamer reasonably and effectually to avoid a collision by slackening speed, or by stopping and reversing within the distance at which an approaching vessel can be seen. 35 Fed. Rep. 609; 39 id. 490. Five knots is a moderate speed for a sailing vessel; 46 L. T. N. S. 840.

MODERATOR. A person appointed to preside at a popular meeting; sometimes he is called a chairman. The presiding officer of town meetings in New England is so called.

MODIATIO. A certain duty paid for every tierce of wine. Mon. Angl. t. ii. 144.

MODIUS. A measure, usually a bushel.

MODO ET FORMA (Lat. in manner and form). In Pleading. Technical words used to put in issue such concomitants of the principal matters as time, place, etc., where these circumstances were material. Their use when these circumstances were immaterial was purely formal. The words were translated literally, when pleadings began to be made in English, by "in manner and form." See Lawes, Pl. 120; Gould, Pl. c. 6, § 22; Steph. Pl. 213; Dane, Abr. Index; Viner, Abr. Modo et Forma.

MODUS. In Civil Law. Manner; means; way. Ainsworth, Lat. Dict. A rhythmic song. Du Cange.

In Old Conveyancing. Manner: e. g., the manner in which an estate should be held, etc. A qualification, whether in restriction or enlargement of the terms of the instrument; especially with relation to the kind of grant called "donatio,"—the making those quasi heirs who were not in fact heirs according to the ordinary form of such conveyances. And this modus or qualification of the ordinary form became so common as to give rise to the maxim "modus et conventio vincunt legem." Co. Litt. 19 a; Bracton, 17 b; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 293. A consideration. Bracton, 17, 18.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A peculiar manner of tithing, growing out of custom. See MODUS DECIMANDI.

MODUS DECIMANDI. In Ecclesiastical Law. A peculiar manner of tithing, arising from immemorial usage, and differing from the payment of one-tenth of the annual increase.

To be a good modus, the custom must be —first, certain and invariable; second, beneficial to the person; third, a custom to pay something different from the thing compounded for; fourth, of the same species; fifth, the thing substituted must be in its nature as durable as the tithes themselves: sixth, it must not be too large: that would be a rank modus. 2 Bla. Com. 30. See 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 100; 13 M. & W. 822.

MODUS DE NON DECIMANDO. In Ecclesiastical Law. A custom or prescription not to pay tithes, which is not good, except in case of abbey-lands. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 31, n.

MODUS LEVANDI FINES. See FINE.

MOERDA. The secret killing of another; murder. 4 Bla. Com. 194.

MOHAMMEDAN LAW. A system of native law prevailing among the Mohammedans in India, and administered there by the British government. See HINDU LAW.

MOHATRA. In French Law. The name of a fraudulent contract made to cover a usurious loan of money.

It takes place when an individual sells merchandise on credit at a high price and afterward buys it back at a much less price for cash. 16 Toullier, n. 44; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1118.

MOIETY. The half of anything: as, if a testator bequeath one moiety of his estate to A, and the other to B, each shall take an equal part. Joint tenants are said to hold by moieties. Littleton 125; 3 C. B. 274, 283.

MOLESTATION. In Scotch Law. The name of an action competent to the proprietor of a landed estate against those who disturb his possession. It is chiefly used in questions of commonty, or of controverted marches. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 48. See, generally, 12 Q. B. D. 539; 14 id. 792.

MOLITURA. Toll paid for grinding at a mill; multure. Not used.

MOLLITER MANUS IMPOSUIT (Lat.). He laid his hands on gently.

In Pleading. A plea in justification of a trespass to the person. It is a good plea when supported by the evidence; 12 Viner, Abr. 182; Hamm. N. P. 149; where an amount of violence proportioned to the circumstances; 20 Johns. 427; 4 Den. 448; 2 Strobh. 232; 17 Ohio 454; has been done to the person of another in defence of property; 3 Cush. 154; 3 Ohio St. 159; 9 Barb. 652; 23 Pa. 424; see 19 N. H. 562; 25 Ala. N. S. 41; 4 Cush. 597; or the prevention of crime: 2 Chitty, Pl. 574; Bac. Abr. Assault and Battery (C. 8).

MOLMUTIAN LAWS. The laws of Dunvallo Molmutius, sixteenth king of the Britons, who began his reign about 400 B. C. These laws were famous in the land till the conquest; Toml.; Moz. & W.

MONARCHY. That government which is ruled, really or theoretically, by one man, who is wholly set apart from all other members of the state.

According to the etymology of the word, monarchy is that government in which one person rules supreme—alone. In modern times the terms autocracy, autocrat, have come into use to indicate that monarchy of which the ruler desires to be exclusively considered the source of all power and authority. The Russian emperor styles himself Autocrat of all the Russias. Autocrat is the same with despot; but the latter term has fallen somewhat into disrepute. Monarchy is contradistinguished from republic. Although the etymology of the term monarchy is simple and clear, it is by no means easy to give a definition either of monarchy or of republic. The constitution of the United States guarantees a republican government to every state. What is a republic? In this case the meaning of the term must be gathered from the republics which existed at the time of the formation of our government, and which were habitually called republics. Lieber, in a paper on the question, "Shall Utah be admitted into the Union?" (in Putnam's Magazine), declared that the Mormons did not form a republic.

The fact that one man stands at the head of a government does not make it a monarchy. We have a president at the head. Nor is it necessary that the one person have an unlimited amount of power, to make a government a monarchy. The power of the king of England is limited by law and theory, and reduced to a small amount in reality; yet England is called a monarchy. Nor does hereditariness furnish us with a distinction. The pope is elected by the cardinals, yet the States of the Church were a monarchy; and the stadtholder of several states of the Netherlands was hereditary, yet the states were republics. We cannot find any better definition of monarchy than this: a monarchy is that government which is ruled (really or theoretically) by one man, who is wholly set apart from all other members of the state (called his subjects); while we call republic that government in which not only there exists an organism by which the opinion of the people, or of a portion of the people (as in aristocracies), passes over into public will, that is, law, but in which also the supreme power, or the executive power, returns, either periodically or at stated times (where the chief magistracy is for life), to the people, or a portion of the people, to be given anew to another person; or else, that government in which the hereditary portion (if there be any) is not the chief and leading portion of the government, as was the case in the Netherlands.

Monarchy is the prevailing type of government. Whether it will remain so with our Caucasian race is a question not to be discussed in a law dictionary. The two types of monarchy as it exists in Europe are the limited or constitutional monarchy, developed in England, and centralized monarchy—to which was added the modern French type, which consisted in the adoption of Rousseau's idea of sovereignty, and applying it to a transfer of all the sovereign power of the people to one Cæsar, who thus became an unqualified and unmitigated autocrat or despot. It was a relapse into coarse absolutism.

Paley has endeavored to point out the advantages and disadvantages of the different classes of government—not successfully, we think. The great advantages of the monarchical element in a free government are: first, that there remains a stable and firm point in the unavoidable party struggle; and secondly, that supreme power, and it may be said the whole government, being represented by or symbolized in one living person, authority, respect, and, with regard to public money, even public morality, stand a better chance to be preserved.

The great disadvantages of a monarchy are that the personal interests or inclinations of the monarch or his house (of the dynasty) are substituted for the public interest; that to the chance of birth is left what with rational beings certainly ought to be the result of reason and wisdom; and that loyalty to the ruler comes easily to be substituted for real patriotism, and frequently passes over into undignified and pernicious man-worship. Monarchy is assuredly the best government for many nations at the present period, and the only government under which in this period they can obtain security and liberty; yet, unless we believe in a pre-existing divine right of the monarch, monarchy can never be anything but a substitute—acceptable, wise, even desirable, as the case may be—for something more dignified, which, unfortunately, the passions or derelictions of men prevent. The advantages and disadvantages of republics may be said to be the reverse of what has been stated regarding monarchy. A frequent mistake in modern times is this: that a state simply for the time without a king—a kingless government—is called a republic. But a monarchy does not change into a republic simply by expelling the king or the dynasty; as was seen in France in 1848. Few governments are less acceptable than an elective monarchy; for it has the disadvantages of the monarchy without its advantages, and the disadvantages of a republic without its advantages. See GOVERNMENT; ABSOLUTISM.

MONASTERIUM. A monastery; a church. Spel. Gloss.

MONASTICON. A book giving an account of monasteries, convents, and religious houses.

MONETAGIUM. An ancient tribute paid by tenants to their lord every third year, in consideration of the lord's not changing the money he had coined.

Mintage, or the right of coining money. Cowel.

MONETARY UNION. See LATIN MONETARY UNION.

MONEY. Gold and silver coins. The common medium of exchange in a civilized nation.

There is some difference of opinion as to the etymology of the word money; and writers do not agree as to its precise meaning. Some writers define it to be the common medium of exchange among civilized nations; but in the United States constitution there is a provision which has been supposed to make it synonymous with coins: "The congress shall have power to coin money." Art. 1, sect. 8. Again: "No state shall coin money, or make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debt." Art. 1, sect. 10. Hence the money of the United States consists of gold and silver coins. And so well has the congress of the United States maintained this point, that the copper coins heretofore struck, and the nickel cent of recent issues, although authorized to "pass current," are not money in an exact sense, because they are not made a legal tender beyond twenty-five cents. The question has been made whether a paper currency can be constitutionally authorized by congress and constituted a legal tender in the payment of private debts. Such a power has been exercised and adjudged valid by the highest tribunal of several of the states, as well as by congress in the legal-tender acts of 1862 and 1863. See LEGAL TENDER; 1 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 553; 11 id. 618; 12 id. 601; 47 Wisc. 551.

For many purposes, bank-notes; 1 Y. & J. 380; 3 Mass. 405; 4 Pick. 74; 2 N. H. 333; 20 Wisc. 217; 47 id. 557; 7 Cow. 662; Brayt. 24; 71 Ala. 554; 34 Mich. 490; treasury notes and national bank notes; 66 Miss. 298; greenbacks; 27 Fla. 196; a check; 4 Bingh. 179; negotiable notes; 3 Mass. 405; securities; 41 Ill. App. 579; and bonds; 19 C. C. R. 516; will be considered as money. But, ordinarily, standing alone, it means only that which passes current as money, including bank deposits; but in a bequest of money it has been held to include personal property; 65 Hun 159; see 92 N. Y. 234; 34 Ohio St. 352. But a charge that the defendant set up and kept a faro bank, at which money was bet, etc., is not sustained by proof that bank-notes were bet, etc.; 2 Dana 298; see 2 H. & G. 407; or where there is an indictment for the larceny of lawful money of the United States, evidence of the larceny of national bank notes, does not warrant a conviction; 60 Ind. 193. To support a count for money had and received, the receipt by the defendant of bank-notes, promissory notes; 9 Pick. 93; 14 Me. 285; 7 Johns. 132; credit in account in the books of a third person; 3 Campb. 199; or any chattel, is sufficient; 4 Pick. 71; 17 Mass. 560; and will be treated as money. See 7 Wend. 311;

7 S. & R. 246; 3 B. & P. 559; 1 Y. & J. 380; 30 Tex. App. 475; 5 Lea 96. The mutilation of coins is forbidden by law. U. S. R. S. 2 Supp. 579. See LATIN UNION; GOLD; SILVER; COIN.

MONEY BILLS. Bills or projects of laws providing for raising revenue, and for making grants or appropriations of the public money.

A bill for granting supplies to the crown. Such bills commence in the House of Commons and are rarely attempted to be materially altered in the Lords; May, Parl. L. ch. 23.

The first clause of the seventh section of the constitution of the United States declares, "All bills for raising revenuesh all originate in the house of representatives; but the senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills." See Story, Const. §§ 874-877; 58 Ala. 546; 126 Mass. 601; Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 160.

What bills are properly "bills for raising revenue," in the sense of the constitution, has been matter of some discussion. Tuck. Bla. Com. App. 261; Story, Const. § 880. In practice, the power has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue; Story, Const. § 880; 2 Elliott, Deb. 283.

And a privilege conferred by a state constitution, to originate "money bills," has been held to be limited to such as transfer money from the people to the state, and not to include such as appropriate money from the state treasury; 126 Mass. 557. See REVENUE.

MONEY BROKER. A money changer; one who lends to or raises money for others.

MONEY CLAIMS. In English Practice. Under the Judicature Act of 1875, claims for the price of goods sold, for money lent, for arrears of rent, etc., and other claims where money is directly payable on a contract express or implied, as opposed to the cases where money is claimed by way of damages for some independent wrong, whether by breach of contract or otherwise. These "money claims" correspond very nearly to the "money counts" hitherto in use. Moz. & W. 410.

MONEY COUNTS. In Pleading. The common counts in an action of assumpsit.

They are so called because they are founded on express or implied promises to pay money in consideration of a precedent debt. They are of four descriptions; the indebitatus assumpsit; the quantum meruit; the quantum valebant; and the account stated. See these titles.

Although the plaintiff cannot resort to an implied promise when there is a general contract, yet he may, in many cases, recover on the common counts notwithstanding there was a special agreement, provided it has been executed; 12 East 1; 7 Cra. 299; 5 Mass. 391; 7 Johns. 132; 10 id. 136. It is, therefore, advisable to insert the money counts in an action of assumpsit, when suing on a special contract; 1 Chitty, Pl. 333.

MONEY DEMAND. A claim for a mixed amount of money, contradistinguished from damages.

MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED. In Pleading. The technical designation of a form of declaration in assumpsit, wherein the plaintiff declares that the defendant had and received certain money, etc.

An action of assumpsit will lie to recover money to which the plaintiff is entitled, and which in justice and equity, when no rule of policy or strict law prevents it, the defendant ought to refund to the plaintiff, and which he cannot with a good conscience retain, on a count for money had and received; 6 S. & R. 369; 3 J. J. Marsh. 175; 1 Harr. N. J. 447; 1 Harr. & G. 258; 7 Mass. 288; 6 Wend. 290; Add. Contr., 9th ed. 429; see 120 N. Y. 536; 109 id. 363; 66 Hun 627; 45 Ill. App. 276.

When the money has been received by the defendant in consequence of some tortious act to the plaintiff's property, as when he cut down the plaintiff's timber and sold it, the plaintiff may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for money had and received; 1 Dall. 122; 1 Blackf. 181; 4 Pick. 452; 1 J. J. Marsh. 543; 3 Watts 277; 4 Call 451.

In general, the action for money had and received lies only where money has been received by the defendant; 14 S. & R. 179; 1 Pick. 204; 1 J. J. Marsh. 544; 11 Johns. 464; 77 N. Y. 400. But bank-notes or any other property received as money will be considered for this purpose as money; 3 Mass. 405; 17 id. 560; Brayt. 24; 7 Cow. 622; 4 Pick. 74. See 9 S. & R. 11. Money paid under an illegal contract which has been partially carried into effect cannot be recovered back; L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 742.

No privity of contract between the parties is required in order to support this action, except that which results from the fact of one man's having the money of another which he cannot conscientiously retain; 17 Mass. 563, 579. See 2 Dall. 54; 5 Conn. 71; 127 Mass. 22. See QUASI CONTRACTS.

MONEY OF ADIERO. In French Law. Earnest money. See EARNEST.

MONEY IN HAND. There is no real difference between "money in hand" and "ready money." 12 L. J. Ch. 387.

MONEY JUDGMENT. One which adjudges the payment of a sum of money, as distinguished from one directing an act to be done or property to be restored or transferred.

MONEY LAND. A phrase sometimes applied to money held upon trust to be laid out in the purchase of land. See CONVERSION.

MONEY LENT. In Pleading. The technical name of a declaration in an action of assumpsit for that the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff for money lent.

To recover, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant received his money, but it is not indispensable that it should be originally lent. If, for example, money has been advanced upon a special contract, which has been abandoned and rescinded, and which cannot be enforced, the law raises an implied promise from the person who holds the money to pay it back as money lent: 7 Bingh. 266; 8 M. & W. 434; 9 id. 29. See 1 N. Chipm. 214; 3 J. J. Marsh. 377.

MONEY-ORDER. The act of June 8, 1872, c. 335, provided for the establishment of a uniform money-order system, at all suitable post-offices, which shall be called "money-order" offices. The applicant, upon depositing a sum, at one post-office, receives a certificate for that amount, which he mails to the payee, who can then obtain the money at the office designated in the order, upon presenting the latter and mentioning the name of his correspondent. The system is now established with several foreign countries, as well as at home, and is found very convenient for the transmission of small sums; R. S. §§ 4027–4048. Suppl. to R. S. p. 155. Under the law of March 3, 1883, it was provided that money-orders should not be issued for a larger sum than a hundred dollars; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 406; 2 id. 166.

MONEY PAID. In Pleading. The technical name of a declaration in assumpsit, in which the plaintiff declares for money paid for the use of the defendant.

When one advances money for the benefit of another with his consent, or at his express request, although he be not benefited by the transaction, the creditor may recover the money in an action of assumpsit declaring for money paid for the defendant; 5 S. & R. 9. But one cannot by a voluntary payment of another's debt make himself creditor of that other; 1 Const. S. C. 472; 1 Gill & J. 497; 3 Johns. 434; 14 id. 87; 2 Root 84; 2 Stew. Ala. 500; 4 N. H. 138; 1 South. 150; 121 Pa. 641. In order to enable one who has paid money to the use of another, to maintain an action for money paid, two things are essential: a legal liability on the part of the defendant to pay the original demand, and his antecedent request, or subsequent promise to pay; 86 Ala. 202.

Assumpsit for money paid will not lie where property, not money, has been given or received; 7 S. & R. 246; 14 id. 179; 7 J. J. Marsh. 18. But see 7 Cow. 662. Nor will an action lie to recover back money paid voluntarily with a full knowledge of the facts and circumstances; 12 Colo. 208; 69 Tex. 267.

But where money has been paid to the defendant either for a just, legal, or equitable claim, although it could not have been enforced at law, it cannot be recovered as money paid. See MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

The form of declaring is for "money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant and at his request"; 1 M. & W. 511.

MONEYED CAPITAL. In a statute with reference to taxation of national bank stock, it is held to mean money employed in a business whose object is to make profit by investing in securities by way of loan, discount or otherwise, which from time to time are reduced again to money and reinvested. 59 Fed. Rep. 952.

The term has a more limited meaning than the term personal property, and applies to such capital as is readily solvable in money; 28 Fed. Rep. 777.

MONEYED CORPORATION. A corporation having the power to make loans upon pledges or deposits, or authorized by law to make insurance. 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 7th ed. 1371; 3 N. Y. 479; 48 Barb. 464; 6 Paige 497.

MONIERS. Ministers of the mint; also bankers. Cowel.

MONITION. In Practice. A process in the nature of a summons, which is used in the civil law, and in those courts which derive their practice from the civil law. In the English ecclesiastical courts it is used as a warning to a defendant not to repeat an offence of which he had been convicted. See Bened. Adm.; 76 Mo. 470.

A general monition is a citation or summons to all persons interested, or, as is commonly said, to the whole world, to appear and show cause why the libel filed in the case should not be sustained, and the prayer of relief granted. This is adopted in prize cases, admiralty suits for forfeitures, and other suits in rem, when no particular individuals are summoned to answer. In such cases the taking possession of the property libelled, and this general citation or monition served according to law, are considered constructive notice to the world of the pendency of the suit; and the judgment rendered thereupon is conclusive upon the title of the property which may be affected. In form, the monition is substantially a warrant of the court, in an admiralty cause, directed to the marshal or his deputy, commanding him, in the name of the president of the United States, to give public notice, by advertisements in such newspapers as the court may select, and by notifications to be posted in public places, that a libel has been filed in a certain admiralty cause pending, and of the time and place appointed for the trial. A brief statement of the allegations in the libel is usually contained in the monition. The monition is served in the manner directed in the warrant.

A mixed monition is one which contains directions for a general monition to all persons interested, and a special summons to particular persons named in the warrant. This is served by newspaper advertisements, by notifications posted in public places, and by delivery of a copy attested by the officer to each person specially named, or by leaving it at his usual place of residence.

A special monition is a similar warrant, directed to the marshal or his deputy, requiring him to give special notice to certain persons, named in the warrant, of the pendency of the suit, the grounds of it, and the time and place of trial. It is served by delivery of a copy of the warrant, attested by the officer, to each one of the adverse parties, or by leaving the same at his usual place of residence; but the service should be personal, if possible. Clerke, Prax. tit. 21; Dunlap, Adm. Pr. 135. See Conkl. Adm.; Pars. Marit. Law.

MONITORY LETTER. In Ecclesiastical Law. The process of an official, a bishop, or other prelate having jurisdiction, issued to compel, by ecclesiastical censures, those who know of a crime, or other matter which requires to be explained, to come and reveal it. Merlin, Répert.

MONOCRACY. A government by one person only.

MONOCRAT. A monarch who governs alone; an absolute governor.

MONOGAMY. The state of having only one husband or one wife at a time.

A marriage contracted between one man and one woman, in exclusion of all the rest of mankind. The term is used in opposition to bigamy and polygamy. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 857.

MONOGRAM. A character or cipher composed of one or more letters interwoven, being an abbreviation of a name.

A signature made by a monogram would perhaps be binding provided it could be proved to have been made and intended as a signature; 1 Denio 471.

There seems to be no reason why such a signature should not be as binding as one which is altogether illegible.

MONOMANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. Insanity only upon a particular subject, and with a single delusion of the mind.

A perversion of the understanding in regard to a single object, or a small number of objects, with the predominance of mental excitement. 2 Misc. Rep. 333.

See DELUSION; INSANITY; MANIA; and other titles there referred to.

MONOPOLIUM. The sole power, right, or privilege of sale; monopoly; a monopoly. Calvin.

MONOPOLY. In Commercial Law. The abuse of free commerce by which one or more individuals have procured the advantage of selling alone all of a particular kind of merchandise, to the detriment of the public.

Any combination among merchants to raise the price of merchandise to the injury of the public.

An institution or allowance by a grant from the sovereign power of a state, by commission, letters-patent, or otherwise, to any person or corporation, by which the exclusive right of buying, selling, making, working, or using anything is given. Bacon, Abr.; Co. 3d Inst. 181. Whereby any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade; 111 U. S. 754; 11 So. Rep. (La.) 239; 53 Fed. Rep. 452. Monopolies were, by stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 3, declared illegal and void, subject to certain specified exceptions, such as patents in favor of the authors of new inventions; 4 Bla. Com. 159; 2 Steph. Com. 25. See passim For. Cas. and Op. 421; Curtis, Robinson, Merwin, Walker; Patents.

A patent for a useful invention, under the United States laws, is not, in the old sense of the common law, a monopoly.

The constitutions of Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee declare that "monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free government, and ought not to be allowed."

The act of congress (26 St. L. 209) declaring illegal "every contract or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations," applies to combinations of laborers as well as of capitalists; 54 Fed. Rep. 994. To constitute the offence of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize under the above act of July 2, 1890, it is necessary to acquire, or attempt to acquire, an exclusive right in such commerce by means which will prevent others from engaging therein; 52 Fed. Rep. 104.

See COPYRIGHT; PATENT; TRUST; RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

MONROE DOCTRINE. A rule or principle of conduct by which any attempt on the part of any European power to extend its system of government to any part of the Western Hemisphere will be regarded as an act of unfriendliness to the United States.

The doctrine originated in 1823 when the European powers seemed inclined to assist Spain to regain the colonies she had lost in America, and was first stated by President Monroe in his message of December 2d of that year as follows:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

Monroe, it seems, had no thought of the important effect his words would have. He was expressing, however, not his own personal opinion, but a principle which the logic of events and the thought of others had been long evolving, See President Gilman's Life of Monroe. The doctrine is now regarded as the settled policy of the United States. It has been evoked on several occasions, notably by President Lincoln in the civil war when the Emperor of France attempted to establish Maximilian in Mexico, and by President Cleveland in the boundary dispute between Venezuela and Great Britain. See The Nicaragua Question, by Prof. L. M. Keasbey; Reddaway, The Monroe Doctrine. See Whart. Dig. Int. L.

MONSTER. An animal which has a conformation contrary to the order of nature. 2 Dungl. Hum. Phys. 422.

It is said that a monster, although born of a woman in lawful wedlock, cannot inherit. Those who have, however, the essential parts of the human form, and have merely some defect of conformation, are capable of inheriting, if otherwise qualified; 2 Bla. Com. 246; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 366; Co. Litt. 7, 8; Dig. 1. 5. 14; 1 Swift, Syst. 331; Fred. Code, pt. 1, b. 1, t. 4, § 4.

No living human birth, however much it may differ from human shape, can be lawfully destroyed. Traill, Med. Jur. 47. See Briand, Méd. Lég. pt. 1, c. 6, art. 2, § 3; 1 Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 402.

MONSTRANS DE DROIT (Fr. showing of right). A common-law process by which restitution of personal or real property is obtained from the crown by a subject. Chitty, Prerog. of Cr. 345; 3 Bla. Com. 256. By this process, when the facts of the title of the crown are already on record, the facts on which the plaintiff relies, not inconsistent with such record, are shown, and judgment of the court prayed thereon. The judgment, if against the crown, is that of ouster le main, which vests possession in the subject without execution. Bac. Abr. Prerogative (E); 1 And. 181; 5 Leigh 512; 12 Gratt. 564,

Monstrans de droit was preferred either on the common-law side of the court of chancery, or in the exchequer, and will not come before the corresponding divisions in the high court of justice. (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34.)

MONSTRANS DE FAIT (Fr. showing of a deed). A profert. Bac. Abr. Pleas.

MONSTRAVERUNT, WRIT OF. In English Law. A writ which lies for the tenants of an ancient demesne who hold by free charter, and not for those tenants who hold by copy of court-roll, or by the rod, according to the custom of the manor. Fitzh. N. B. 31.

MONTANA. One of the states of the United States.

Congress, by an act approved May 26, 1864 (R. S. § 1903), created the territory and defined its boundaries, providing also that the United States might divide the territory or change its boundaries in such manner as may be deemed expedient; and further, that the rights of person and property pertaining to the Indians in the territory shall not without their consent be included within the territorial limits of jurisdiction.

By act of congress approved March 1, 1872, a tract of land in the territories of Montana and Wyoming, lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River, is reserved and withdrawn from settlement under the laws of the United States and dedicated and set apart as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people; R. S. § 2474; and by act of April 15, 1874, a tract of land at the northern boundary is set apart as a reservation for the Gros Ventre Piegan, Blood, Blackfoot, River Crow, and such other Indians as the President may, from time to time, see fit to locate therein. 18 Stat. at L. 28.

The act providing for the admission of Montana into the Union as one of the states was passed February 22, 1889, and the proclamation announcing its admission was on November 8, 1889.

The constitution was adopted August 17, 1889, and ratified by the people October 1, 1889.

The legislative power is vested in a senate and house of representatives, which is designated the legislative assembly of the state of Montana. Senators are elected for a term of four years and representatives for two years. The senate consists of sixteen members and the house of representatives of fifty-five members. The legislative assembly meets biennially on the first Monday of January.

The executive department consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, attorney-general, state treasurer, state auditor, and superintendent of public instruction, each of whom holds his office for four years.

The judicial power is vested in the senate sitting as a court of impeachment, in a supreme court, district courts, justices of the peace, and such other inferior courts as the legislative assembly may establish in any incorporated city or town.

The supreme court consists of three justices who are elected by the people for a term of six years. It has appellate jurisdiction only, and is co-extensive with the state, and has a general supervisory control over all inferior courts. It has power in its discretion to issue, and to hear and determine writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, prohibition, and injunction, and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary and proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. When a jury is required in the supreme court to determine an issue of fact, the court has power to summon such jury. At least three terms of the supreme court are held each year at the seat of government.

The district court has original jurisdiction in all cases at law and in equity, including all cases which involve the title or right of possession of real property, or the legality of any tax, impost, etc., and in all cases where the amount in controversy exceeds fifty dollars; and in criminal cases amounting to felony, and certain other miscellaneous jurisdictions. It also has appellate jurisdiction in certain cases arising in justices' and other inferior courts. The state is divided into eight judicial districts, in each of which a district judge is elected for four years.

Two justices of the peace are elected in each organized township of each county for a term of two years. Justices' courts have original jurisdiction within their respective counties in matters in which the amount in controversy does not exceed three hundred dollars.

MONTES PIETATIS, MONTS DE PIETE. Institutions established by public authority for lending money upon pledge of goods.

In these establishments a fund is provided, with suitable warehouses and all necessary accommodations. They are managed by directors. When the money for which goods are pledged is not returned in proper time, the goods are sold to reimburse the institutions. They are found principally on the continent of Europe. With us, private persons, called pawnbrokers, perform this office. See Bell, Inst. 5. 2. 2. A late statute in New York authorizes public pawnshops like those on the continent of Europe.

MONTENEGRO. A principality of Europe. The government is absolute and is vested in a prince. It has a state council of eight members, half of them nominated by the prince and half elected. There are district courts in the chief towns. The supreme court has jurisdiction, appellate and concurrent, over the principality. There is a final appeal to the prince.

MONTH. A space of time variously computed, as the term is applied to astronomical, civil or solar, or lunar months.

The astronomical month contains one-twelfth part of the time employed by the sun in going through the zodiac. In law, when a month simply is mentioned, it is never understood to mean an astronomical month.

The civil or solar month is that which agrees with the Gregorian calendar; and these months are known by the names of January, February, March, etc. They are composed of unequal portions of time. There are seven of thirty-one days each, four of thirty, and one which is sometimes composed of twenty-eight days, and in leap-years, of twenty-nine.

The lunar month consists of twenty-eight days.

The Roman names of the months, as settled by Augustus, have been used in all Christian countries except Holland, where a set of characteristic names prevail, the remains of the ancient Gaulish title, which were also used by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors. The French convention, in October, 1793, adopted a set of names similar to that of Holland.

By the law of England, a month means ordinarily, in common contracts, as in leases, a lunar month. A contract, therefore, made for a lease of land for twelve months would mean a lease for forty-eight weeks only; 2 Bla. Com. 141; 6 Co. 62; 1 Maule & S. 111. A distinction has been made between "twelve months" and a "twelve-month;" the latter has been held to mean a year; 6 Co. 61. In a contract for the hire of furniture at a weekly rental for so many months, "months" was held to mean lunar month; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 343.

But in mercantile contracts a month simply signifies a calendar month; 2 Wall. 190; 2 Dall. 402; 3 Cra. C. C. 218; 19 Pick. 532; 28 N. Y. 444; a promissory note to pay money in twelve months would, therefore, mean a promise to pay in one year, or twelve calendar months; 3 B. & B. 187; 1 M. & S. 111; 2 C. & K. 9; Story, Bills, §§ 143, 330; 19 Pick. 332; 6 W. & S. 179; 1 Johns. Cas. 99; 1 Q. B. 250; Benj. Sales § 684.

In general, when a statute speaks of a month, without adding "calendar," or other words showing a clear intention, it shall be intended a lunar month; Com. Dig. Anno (B); 15 Johns. 358; Dud. Ga. 107. See 2 Cow. 518, 605. But it is now otherwise in England by 13 Vic. c. 21, § 4. And by the Judicature Act of 1875, Ord. lvii. r. 1, it is provided that month shall mean calendar month when not otherwise expressed. In all legal proceedings, as in commitments, pleadings, etc., a month means four weeks; 3 Burr. 1455; 1 W. Bla. 540; Dougl. 446, 463; 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 543; 3 Johns. Ch. 74.

In Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Florida, and Maryland, and perhaps some other states, a month mentioned generally in a statute has been construed to mean a calendar month; 2 Dall. 302; 4 id. 143; 4 Mass. 461; 4 Bibb 105; 34 Neb. 376; 27 Fla. 215; 74 Md. 86; 139 U. S. 137. In England in the ecclesiastical law, months are computed by the calendar; 3 Burr. 1455; 1 M. & S. 111; thirty days is not a month; 72 N. C. 146.

In New York, it is enacted that whenever the term "month" or "months" is or shall be used in any statute, act, deed, verbal or written contract, or any public or private instrument whatever, it shall be construed to mean a calendar, and not a lunar, month, unless otherwise expressed. Rev. Stat. pt. 2, c. 19, tit. 1, § 4; 28 N. Y. 444. But this has been modified as to computation of interest, so that a month shall be considered the twelfth part of a year, and as consisting of thirty days, and interest for any number of days less than a month shall be estimated by the proportion which such number of days bears to thirty; R. S. pt. 3, p. 2254, § 9.

MONUMENT. A thing intended to transmit to posterity the memory of some one. A tomb where a dead body has been deposited.

In this sense it differs from a cenotaph, which is an empty tomb. Dig. 11. 7. 2. 6; 11. 7. 2. 42.

Coke says that the erecting of monuments in church, chancel, common chapel, or churchyard in convenient manner is lawful; for it is the last work of charity that can be done for the deceased, who whilst he lived was a lively temple of the Holy Ghost, with a reverend regard and Christian hope of a joyful resurrection.

The defacing of monuments is punishable by the common law; Year B. 9 Edw. IV. c. 14; and trespass may be maintained; 10 F. Moore 494; 1 Cons. S. C. 172; L. R. 3 A. & E. 113; 3 Bingh. 136. An heir may bring an action against one that injures the monument of his ancestor; Co. 3d Inst. 202; Gibs. 453. A gift for the perpetual repair of a tomb, if in a church, will be sustained; [1891] 3 Ch. 252; but see L. R. 4 Eq. 521! CHARITABLE USES. Although the fee of church or churchyard be in another, yet he cannot deface monuments: Co. 3d Inst. 202. The fabric of a church is not to be injured or deformed by the caprice of individuals; 1 Cons. S. C. 145; and a monument may be taken down if placed inconveniently; 1 Lee, Eccl. 640. A monument containing an improper inscription can be removed; 1 Curt. Eccl. 880.

As to inscriptions on monuments and their value as evidence, see INSCRIPTION.

MONUMENTS. Permanent landmarks established for the purpose of indicating boundaries.

Monuments may be either natural or artificial objects: as, rivers, known streams, springs, or marked trees; 6 Wheat. 582; 6 Pet. 498; 1 Pet. C. C. 64; 3 Ohio 284; 5 N. H. 524; 3 Dev. 75; 125 Ind. 226. Even posts set up at the corners; 5 Ohio 534; and a clearing; 7 Cow. 723; are considered as monuments. But see 3 Dev. 75.

When monuments are established, they must govern, although neither courses nor distances nor computed contents correspond; 1 Cow. 605; 3 Pick. 401; 2 Harr. & J. 260; 5 id. 163, 255; 5 Ohio 534; 4 Hen. & M. 125; 1 Call 429; 11 Me. 325; 1 Hayw. 22; 3 Murph. 88; 4 T. B. Monr. 32; 5 J. J. Marsh. 578; 6 Wheat. 582; 4 Wash. C. C. 15; 72 Me. 90; 33 Fla. 261; 147 Ill. 76; 117 Mo. 438; 92 Cal. 623; 49 Minn. 268; 106 Mo. 231; 48 N. J. Eq. 170; 1 Washb. R. P. 406.

A monument established by the government surveyors as the true corner of sections will control courses and distances; 91 Mich. 29; 145 Ill. 98. See 79 Cal. 540; BOUNDARY.

In Mexican grants, while monuments control courses and distances, and courses and distances control quantity, where there is uncertainty in specific description, the quantity named may be of decisive weight and necessarily is so if the intention to convey only so much and no more is plain; 161 U. S. 208; 171 id. 220.

See METES AND BOUNDS.

MOOE. An officer in the Isle of Man similar to the English bailiff.

MOOKTAR. In Hindu Law. An agent or attorney.

MOORAGE. A sum due for fastening ships to a tree or post at the shore or to a wharf. 3 Bland 373.

MOORING. In Maritime Law. The securing of a vessel by a hawser or chain, or otherwise, to the shore, or to the bottom by a cable and anchor. The being "moored in safety," under a policy of insurance, is being moored in port, or at the usual place for landing and taking in cargo free from any immediate impending peril insured against; 1 Phil. Ins. 968; 3 Johns. 88; 2 Stra. 1243; 5 Mart. La. 637; 6 Mass. 313; Code de Comm. 152.

MOOT (from Saxon gemot, meeting together. Anc. Laws and Inst. of England). See FOLC GEMOTE; WITENAGEMOTE.

In English Law. A term used in the inns of court, signifying the exercise of arguing imaginary cases, which young barristers and students used to perform at certain times, the better to be enabled by this practice to defend their clients' cases. Orig. Jur. 212. Mooting was formerly the chief exercise of the students in the inns of court.

To plead a mock cause. (Also spelled meet, from Sax. motain, to meet; the sense of debate being from meeting, encountering. Webster, Dict.) A moot question is one which has not been decided.

MOOT COURT. A court where moot questions are argued. Webster, Dict.

In law schools this is one of the methods of instruction; an undecided point of law is argued by students appointed as counsel on either side of the cause, one or more of the professors sitting judicially in presence of the school. The argument is usually conducted as in cases reserved for hearing before the full bench.

MOOT HILL. Hill of meeting (gemot), on which the Britons used to hold their courts, the judge sitting on the eminence, the parties, etc., on an elevated platform below. Encyc. Lond.

MORA. A moor, barren or unprofitable ground; marsh; a heath; a watery bog or moor. Co. Litt. 5; Fleta, l. 2, c. 71. See IN MORA.

MORAL ACTIONS. Actions only in which men have knowledge to guide them and a will to choose for themselves. Ruth. Inst. Nat. L. lib. 1, c. i.

MORAL CERTAINTY. That degree of certainty which will justify a jury in grounding on it their verdict.

It is only probability; but it is called certainty, because every sane man assents to it necessarily from a habit produced by the necessity of acting. Beccaria on Crimes and Punishments, c. 14. Nothing else but a strong presumption grounded on probable reasons, and which very seldom fails and deceives us. Puffendorff, Law of Nature, b. 1. c. 2, § 11. A reasonable and moral certainty; a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it. A certainty beyond a reasonable doubt. Shaw, C. J., Commonwealth v. Webster. Bemis' Rep. of the trial, 469; 118 Mass. 1. Such a certainty "as convinces beyond all reasonable doubt." Parke, B., Best, Presumpt. 257, note; 6 Rich. Eq. 217.

MORAL CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION; MORAL OBLIGATION.

MORAL INSANITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. A morbid perversion of the moral feelings, affections, inclinations, temper, habits, and moral disposition, without any notable lesion of the intellect or knowing and reasoning faculties, and particularly without any maniacal hallucination. Prichard, art. Insanity, in Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine.

A disorder which affects the feelings and affections, or what are termed the moral powers in contradistinction to those of the understanding or intellect. 3 Witth. & B. 269.

For a discussion on this subject and its legal relations, see INSANITY; MANIA.

MORAL OBLIGATION. A duty which one owes, and which he ought to perform, but which he is not legally bound to fulfil.

These obligations are of two kinds: 1st, those founded on a natural right: as, the obligation to be charitable, which can never be enforced by law. 2d, those which are supported by a good or valuable antecedent consideration: as, where a man owes a debt barred by the act of limitations, or contracted during infancy; this cannot be recovered by law, though it subsists in morality and conscience. A doctrine prevailed for some time in the courts of England and this country that an express promise made in discharge of an antecedent moral obligation created a valid contract, and the contract was then said to be supported by the previous moral obligation; Cowp. 290; 5 Taunt. 36; 4 Wash. C. C. 148; 12 S. & R. 177. This opinion appears to have been entertained by Lord Mansfield; 5 Taunt. 36. In a note to Wennall v. Adney, 3 B. & P. 249, this idea was controverted, and in Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & E. 438 (6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 41), the notion of the validity of a moral consideration was finally overruled. The rule existed, if it does not still exist, in Pennsylvania, as late as 24 Pa. 267, and see 140 id. 63; Hollingsworth, Contr.

Promises by an infant, after coming of age, to pay a debt incurred during infancy, of a bankrupt to pay a debt discharged in bankruptcy, and of a debtor to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations, are sometimes considered as instances of contracts supported by moral considerations. But the promise of the infant is rather a ratification of a contract which was voidable, but not void. The promise of the bankrupt operates as a waiver of the defence given to the bankrupt by statute, the certificate of discharge not having extinguished the debt, but merely having protected the defendant from an action on it, by means of the statutory bar. In both of these cases the action is founded upon the original debt. The case of a promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations is said to stand upon anomalous grounds. The true explanation of the doctrine seems to be that it was an ingenious device for evading the statute adopted at a time when the courts regarded it with disfavor. Here too the action is upon the old debt, and not upon the new promise; 3 Metc. Mass. 439. The subject is learnedly treated by Mr. Langdell (Contr. § 71). Some cases have held a feme bound by a promise after coverture to pay a debt contracted during coverture; 24 Pa. 371; see Ewell, L. C. Cov. 332.

Under the English Bankruptcy Act of 1869, debts discharged cannot be revived by a promise made after adjudication; and under the Infants' Relief Act of 1874, any promise made after full age to pay a debt contracted during infancy is void.

The discharge of a merely moral obligation of another will not create a debt, unless made in pursuance of an express request or actual agreement to that effect; Leake, Contr. 86.

MORATUR or DEMORATUR IN LEGE. He demurs in law. He rests on the pleadings of the case, and abides the judgment of the court.

MORE OR LESS. Words, in a conveyance of lands or contract to convey lands, importing that the quantity is uncertain and not warranted, and that no right of either party under the contract shall be affected by a deficiency or excess in the quantity. 17 Ves. 394; Powell, Pow. 397. So in contracts of sale generally. 2 B. & Ad. 106. These words added to a specification of quantity in a conveyance show it to be a mere estimate, and by necessary inference subordinates the quantity to fixed calls or monuments; 82 Wis. 206.

In case of an executory contract, equity will enforce specific performance without changing the price, if the excess or deficiency is very small; 17 Ves. 394; 24 Miss. 597; 13 Tex. 223; but not if the excess or deficiency is great, even though the price reserved be per acre. In 2 B. & Ad. 106, it was held that an excess of fifty quarters over three hundred quarters of grain was not covered by the words "three hundred more or less," if it was not shown that so large an excess was in contemplation; 1 Esp. 229. See 85 Me. 362; 27 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 140. But a deed adding the words more or less to a description of the property is not a sufficient fulfilment of a contract to convey the described property, when more or less was not in such original contract, if there is an actual deficiency. But after such a conveyance is made and a note given for the purchase-money, the note cannot be defended against on the ground of deficiency; 2 Pa. 533; 9 S. & R. 80; 10 Johns. 297; 4 Mass. 414. These words more or less have been held to cover a deficiency of 10 acres where the deed called for 96 acres; 7 N. Y. 210; a deficiency of 54 acres in a deed calling for 451 acres; 54 Ind. 368; 50 feet from 220, where the true dimension was on record, in a purchase in gross; 99 Mass. 231.

In case of an executed contract, equity will not disturb it, unless there be a great deficiency; 2 Russ. 570; 1 Pet. C. C. 49; or excess; 8 Paige, Ch. 312; 2 Johns. 37; Ow. 133; 1 V. & B. 375; see 106 Ind. 185; or actual misrepresentation without fraud, and there be a material excess or deficiency; 14 N. Y. 143; see 91 Ga. 600; 26 Gratt. 721; 11 Q. B. Div. 255.

Eighty-five feet, more or less, means eighty-five feet, unless the deed or situation of the land in some way controls it; 20 Pick. 62.

The words more or less will not cover a distinct lot; 24 Mo. 574. See CONSTRUCTION; ABOUT.

The purchaser is not precluded by a recital of "more or less" in the deed from showing by parol evidence, under an allegation of fraud or mistake, an agreement contemporaneous with the execution of the deed, making the transaction a sale by the acre; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 600.

MORGANATIC MARRIAGE. A lawful and inseparable conjunction of a single man of noble and illustrious birth with a single woman of an inferior or plebeian station, upon this condition, that neither the wife nor children should partake of the title, arms, or dignity of the husband, nor succeed to his inheritance, but should have a certain allowance assigned to them by the morganatic contract.

This relation was frequently contracted during the Middle Ages; the marriage ceremony was regularly performed, the union was for life and indissoluble, and the children were considered legitimate, though they could not inherit. Fred. Code, b. 2, art. 3; Poth. Du Mar. 1, c. 2, § 2; Shelf. Marr. & D. 10; Pruss. Code, art. 835.

MORMONISM. The system of doctrines, practices (especially polygamy), ceremonies, and church government maintained by the Mormons. Cent. Dict. See MARRIAGE.

MORT D'ANCESTOR. An ancient and now almost obsolete remedy in English law. An assize of mort d'ancestor was a writ which was sued out where, after the decease of a man's ancestor, a stranger abated, and entered into the estate. Co. Litt. 159. The remedy in such case is now to bring ejectment.

MORTGAGE. Scientific legal writers reckon among proprietary rights "jura in re aliena," i. e. rights of dominion over tangible things of which the fundamental property right is in another. Of such rights the most important is Pledge, which, in this sense, covers those legal relations in which a right in rem is conferred by a debtor upon a creditor as security for a right in personam, i. e. for the debt or other personal obligation of the debtor; Holland, Jurispr. ch. xi. Practically we distinguish these securities as Mortgage, when the debtor transfers the title to the res to his creditor, retaining the possession of it, and Pledge, when he retains the title but transfers the possession. See PLEDGE.

Mortgage is the translation of vadium mortuum—dead pledge, so named because the land was turned over to the mortgagee or lender of the money, who received the profits or revenues of it without applying them in satisfaction of his debt, and the land thus became dead to the mortgagor or borrower who derived no benefit from it. This was regarded as in the nature of usury on the part of the lender and was looked upon with disfavor, in modern phrase as contrary to public policy. In contrast to this was vadium vivum, or live pledge, under which the borrower continued in possession of his property, receiving the profits or revenues of it. Another explanation of the words is that in the vadium mortuum the pledge was dead to the borrower if he failed to redeem, but in the other was alive to him until the lender secured possession of it on default; 1 Coote, Mortg., 4th ed. 5; Co. Litt. 205. (In the case of Welsh mortgages, now disused, the mortgagee entered into possession, taking the rents and profits, but applying them on account of the debt.) In attempting to avoid the difficulty lenders devised the plan of taking from the borrower a conveyance of the property to become absolute upon the failure of the borrower to redeem. Later, the plan was adopted of taking an absolute conveyance, with an agreement on the part of the lender to re-convey on payment of the debt, the transaction being in form an absolute sale of land with an option to buy it back by payment of the loan at a fixed time. Another form was to convey the land to a trustee who was to hold to the creditor's use, and on default was to sell it for the payment of the debt. All these devices were intended to protect the lender by enabling him to secure the land on his debtor's default. All of them were modified or softened by the courts refusing to allow the forfeiture or to treat the transaction as other than a method of pledging the land as security for the debt, the debtor retaining what came to be known as the equity of redemption, and being protected against the strict enforcement of his contract; H. W. Chaplin, in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 1. See EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

In modern times although the old forms are still followed, it is everywhere recognized that the real owner of the land is the mortgagor, and the mortgage is a mere security for the debt or obligation, giving the mortgagee a chattel interest which passes to his personal representatives and not to his heirs. Some of the states have abrogated the old rule and declared by statute that the effect of a mortgage shall be merely to give a lien and not to pass an estate to the mortgagee. But in England and in most of the states the old rule remains nominally in force, and in courts of law the mortgage is recognized as conveying an estate, while equity treats it as merely conferring a lien. Originally this was burdensome, since there was an actual distinction between the rules applied in the different jurisdictions, and redress had to be sought in equity against the severities of the law, but the principle adopted in Pennsylvania in the eighteenth century, of administering equity through common law forms has been gradually making its way until it reached its most signal triumph in the adoption of the Judicature Act of 1873 in England providing that where "there is any conflict between the rules of equity and the rules of common law, the rules of equity shall prevail." To day it may be safely said that the equitable doctrine has completely supplanted the legal, but as the form of the transaction is still the same, some confusion exists, and doubtless always will exist, in the definitions given of mortgage. Some of these are as follows:—

The conveyance of an estate by way of pledge for the security of debt, and to become void on payment of it. 4 Kent 136.

An estate created by a conveyance absolute in its form, but intended to secure the performance of some act, such as the payment of money, and the like, by the grantor or some other person, and to become void if the act is performed agreeably to the terms prescribed at the time of making such conveyance. 2 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. *475.

A conditional conveyance of land designed as a security for the payment of money, the fulfilment of some contract, or the performance of some act, and to be void upon such payment, fulfilment or performance. 44 Me. 299.

A contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act without the necessity of a change of possession. 2 S. Dak. 346. It is a mere security for a debt or obligation; 60 Conn. 24; 53 id. 175; 15 Wall. 322.

"A concise definition of mortgage which should embrace both its equitable and its legal character is virtually impossible. . . . These attempted definitions are all erroneous upon any theory of the instrument; they do not go beyond the literal import of the language in which a mortgage is usually expressed, and they utterly ignore all the equitable elements which are as much and as truly constituent parts of the mortgage as the legal elements. Any true definition based upon the original common law and equitable system must embody and express all the double features of the mortgage—that it is both a lien in equity and a conveyance at law." Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 1191.

Both real and personal property may be mortgaged, and in substantially the same manner, except that a mortgage being in its nature a transfer of title, the law respecting the necessity of possession in case of personal property and the nature of the instruments of transfer, require the transfer to be made differently in the two cases.

All kinds of property, real or personal, which are capable of an absolute sale, may be the subject of a mortgage; rights in remainder and reversion, franchises, and choses in action, may, therefore, be mortgaged. But a mere possibility or expectancy, as that of an heir, cannot; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1012; 4 Kent 144; 32 Barb. 328; 13 Cal. 536; 45 Ill. 264; 12 N. J. Eq. 174; 108 Mass. 347: 68 Ill. 98 (see EXPECTANCY). Where real estate is mortgaged, all accessions thereto, subsequent to the mortgage, will be bound by it; 32 N. H. 484; 51 Cal. 620; 52 Ala. 123; 19 Wall. 544; 24 Mich. 416; 64 Pa. 366; and if specifically stated to bind after-acquired property, it will have that effect; 51 Barb. 45; 56 Me. 458; 14 Gray 566; 11 Wall. 481; 19 Md. 472; 29 Conn. 282. A mortgage in terms covering after-acquired property creates a charge on property to which the mortgagor subsequently acquires either the legal or equitable title; 75 Md. 445. See infra. A mortgage of property to be acquired in futuro is constructively fraudulent as to the creditors of the mortgagor other than the mortgagee; 85 Ky. 591.

A mortgage to secure future advances is valid as between the parties; 31 Vt. 122; 23 How. 14; but if a second mortgage be executed of which the holder of the first mortgage have notice before he makes advances the latter will not be protected; 36 Pa. 170; 9 H. L. C. 514; but see, contra, 16 Vt. 300; but he will be where the first mortgagee binds himself to make the advances, though they be made after the execution of the subsequent mortgage; 13 Mich. 380; 31 Conn. 74; and in either case it is said the first mortgagee will be protected if the advances be made without notice of the subsequent mortgage; id.; the record of the second mortgage is constructive notice; 13 Mich. 380. See, generally, 3 Va. L. Reg. 834.

As to the form, a mortgage must be in writing, when it is intended to convey the legal title; 1 Pa. 240. It is either in one single deed which contains the whole contract,—which is the usual form,—or it is two separate instruments, the one containing an absolute conveyance and the other a defeasance; 2 Johns. Ch. 189; 12 Mass. 456; 1 N. H. 39; 5 McLean 281; 55 Pa. 311; 21 Minn. 520; 53 Me. 463; 13 Wis. 264; 38 Mo. 349; 65 N. C. 520; 18 Ia. 376; 17 Ohio 356; and generally, whenever it is proved that a conveyance was made for purpose of security, equity treats it as a mortgage, and attaches thereto its incidents; 9 Wheat. 489; 2 Des. Eq. 564; 38 N. H. 22; 25 Vt. 273; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 536; 1 Murph. 116; 3 J. J. Marsh. 353; 5 Ill. 156; 4 Ind. 101; 2 Pick. 211; 20 Ohio 464; 36 Me. 115; 1 Cal. 203; 1 Wis. 527; 9 S. & R. 434; 100 N. C. 316; 24 Neb. 692; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 391; 71 Hun 349. Whether the intention that it was a security for money appears from the same instrument or from any other, it is always considered, in equity, a mortgage; 86 Ky. 679; 39 Minn. 137; 62 Mich. 414; 69 Tex. 420; 24 Neb. 79; 129 Ill. 72; 76 Ia. 96; 85 Tenn. 363; 75 Cal. 271; 45 N. J. Eq. 208. The true test in determining whether an instrument purporting to convey title in payment of a debt be a mortgage or not, is, was the old debt at that time cancelled and absolutely paid; 71 Tex. 418. In law, the defeasance must be of as high a nature as the conveyance to be defeated; 1 N. H. 39; 2 Johns. Ch. 191; 7 Watts 361; 13 Mass. 433; 53 Me. 963; 14 Pet. 201.

The rule as to the admission of parol evidence to establish the character of a conveyance as a mortgage varies in the different states. It is safe to state that where the equitable principle admitting parol evidence to vary a writing on the ground of fraud, accident, or mistake can be invoked, it would universally be applied. In some states the rule is still more liberal, and the evidence is admitted more upon the principle of making the intention of the parties govern the transaction. If excluded in any state it would probably be for statutory reasons: Thus in New Hampshire no deed shall be defeated, nor any estate encumbered, unless by condition inserted in the conveyance; 57 N. H. 117. In Georgia a deed absolute in form and supported by possession shall not be shown by parol evidence to be a mortgage, unless fraud be the issue; 83 Ga. 303; 88 id. 191. In Pennsylvania no defeasance shall have the effect of reducing a deed absolute to a mortgage unless the defeasance is contemporaneous with the deed and is in writing, signed, sealed, acknowledged, and delivered, and is recorded within sixty days. See 118 Pa. 30; 31 Am. L. Reg. 378. In Colorado, on the other hand, it is provided that parol evidence may be admitted to convert a deed into a mortgage; 12 Col. 491. Where a conveyance is in form absolute, in order to change its character to that of a mortgage, the proof must clearly and satisfactorily show such intent; and evidence which leaves the mind in serious doubt is not sufficient; 126 Ill. 301; 35 Fed. Rep. 445; 83 Ala. 396; 75 Ia. 89; 7 Mont. 585; 20 Can. S. C. R. 548; 98 Cal. 281; 1 App. D. C. 133. See DEFEASANCE.

The mortgagor has, technically speaking, in law, a mere tenancy, subject to the right of the mortgagee to enter immediately, unless restrained by his agreement to the contrary; 34 Me. 187; 9 S. & R. 302; 1 Pick. 87; 19 Johns. 325; 2 Conn. 1; 4 Ired. 122; 5 Bingh. 421. In equity, the mortgage is held a mere security for the debt, and only a chattel interest; and until a decree of foreclosure the mortgagor is regarded as the real owner; 2 J. & W. 190; 4 Johns. 41; 11 id. 534; 4 Conn. 235; 1 Rawle 329; 45 Pa. 463; 5 Harr. & J. 312; 3 Pick. 484; 7 Johns. 273. Both in law and equity a mortgage is held to be only a chattel interest; 12 Ia. 539. It has been held frequently that the legal fee is in the mortgagee until default, and an absolute fee afterwards; 3 Gray 517; 23 Conn. 587; 13 Ohio St. 419; but it may be considered as the general rule, in modern practice, that the mortgagor, before entry, is the legal owner as to third persons and his conveyance is a transfer of the fee, if the mortgage is afterwards paid; 36 N. H. 141; 15 Pick. 82.

The mortgagee, at law, is the owner of the land, subject, however, to a defeat of title by performance of the condition, with a right to enter at any time; 21 N. H. 460; 9 Conn. 216; 19 Me. 53; 2 Den. 170. He is, however, accountable for the profits before foreclosure, if in possession; 31 Me. 104; 5 Paige, Ch. 1; 24 Conn. 1; 1 Halst. Ch. 346; 2 Cal. 387; 6 Fla. 1; 148 Mass. 300; 49 Ark. 508; 42 Ill. App. 202; 48 N. J. Eq. 399; 1 Washb. R. P. *577. The different states fluctuate somewhat between the rules of equity and those of law, or, rather, have engrafted the equitable rules upon the legal to an unequal extent; 31 Pa. 295; 10 Ga. 65; 27 Barb. 503; 3 Mich. 581; 4 Ia., 571; 4 M'Cord 336; 9 Cal. 123, 365; 1 Washb. Case lies by a mortgagor for injuries done the mortgaged premises by a mortgagee not in possession; 64 N. H. 591. A mortgagee cannot maintain trover for fixtures severed from the mortgaged premises prior to the foreclosure; 66 Hun 635; but he may maintain a bill to prevent injury to the mortgaged property; 53 Fed. Rep. 515; 84 id. 369.

Mortgages are to be distinguished from sales with a contract for repurchase. The distinction is important; 2 Call 428; 7 Watts 401; but turns rather upon the evidence in each case than upon any general rule of distinction; 6 Blackf. 113; 12 How. 139; 5 Ala. N. S. 698; 3 Tex. 119; 2 J. J. Marsh. 113; 4 Ind. 101; 3 Tex. 119; 37 Me. 543; 7 Ired. A mortgage differs from a pledge: the general property passes by a mortgage, whilst by a pledge only the possession or, at most, a special property, passes. Possession is inseparable from the nature of a pledge, but is not necessary to a mortgage; 3 Mo. 516; 5 Johns. 258; 2 Pick. 610; 2 N. H. 13; 5 Vt. 532; 26 Me. 499.

Assignment of mortgages must be made in accordance with the requirements of the statute of frauds; 15 Mass. 233; 6 Gray 152; 32 Me. 197; 7 Blackf. 210; 5 Den. 187; 3 Ohio St. 471; 5 Halst. Ch. 156; 21 Ala. n. s. 497; 51 Me. 121; 22 Tex. 464; 31 Pa. 142; 21 Wis. 476; 71 N. C. 492; 56 N. H. 105.

A parol assignment of a mortgage note is an equitable transfer of the mortgage; 85 Ala. 80; and the transfer of the debt carries with it the security, without assignment or delivery thereof; 82 Va. 190; 113 N. C. 532. One to whom an overdue note and mortgage are assigned, takes them subject to all equities existing in favor of the mortgagor or of any other person; 134 N. Y. 514.

Assumption of mortgage by grantee. The question whether the acceptance by a grantee of a deed subject to a specified mortgage as part of the consideration, in the absence of an express promise to pay it, implies such a promise on his part, has been the subject of conflicting decisions. But the more generally accepted view is, that the clause "under and subject" in a deed or conveyance, is a covenant of indemnity only as between grantor and grantee for the protection of the former; 88 Pa. 450; 173 id. 275 (but see 171 id. 328); 154 Ill. 627; 48 Ill. App. 505; 48 N. Y. 556; 4 N. J. Eq. 454; 124 Mass. 254; 49 Conn. 191; 46 Pac. Rep. (Kas.) 58. A different view has been held in New York, based in the later cases on the doctrine that when one makes a promise for the benefit of a third person, the latter may maintain an action upon it: 24 N. Y. 178; 48 id. 253; 71 id. 26. But this doctrine is for the most part confined to New York; see 26 Am. Rep. 660, n.; 115 U. S. 505; 143 id. 187; 14 Wash. 507; 1 Jones, Mort. § 758. In Pennsylvania, by statute, a grantee does not assume a liability for an incumbrance, unless by agreement in writing, and the words "under and subject" in his deed do not impose such liability.

As to the rights of a mortgagee holding more than one mortgage of the same mortgagor, see TACKING.

Where it is sought to give the lien of a junior mortgage precedence over the lien of a senior one, the claim must be based either on an agreement to that effect, or on the superior equity of the junior mortgage; 23 Neb. 703. See MARSHALLING. An agreement between mortgagor and mortgagee extending the time of payment of the mortgage debt, and providing for the compounding of interest, cannot be enforced to the prejudice of junior lienholders whose liens were created prior to such agreement; 84 Ky. 411. The vested priority of a mortgagee is beyond the power of the mortgagor or the legislature thereafter to disturb; 134 U. S. 296. Failure to show that a mortgage was recorded before a judgment, is fatal to the mortgagee's claim of priority; 79 Ga. 111. The re-delivery of a mortgage which has been paid, upon an agreement that it shall secure another debt, does not create a lien; 83 Ky. 311. A mortgage cannot be continued in effect so as to cover a new indebtedness by an oral agreement; 30 Pa. 378; 29 Kan. 124; but where money has been paid thereunder, the party making payments will be protected as against the mortgagor, or his vendee with knowledge of the facts; 10 Allen 74; L. R. 12 Eq. 516.

The remedies upon a mortgage by the mortgagee on default of payment are various. In cases of real estate he may (1) bring ejectment on his legal title; (2) file a bill and obtain a decree of foreclosure, or a sale of the property mortgaged; 4 Kent *180; (3) exercise a power of sale, if such power be in the mortgage; (4) take possession of the land, if he can do so peaceably, his title becoming sure, and the equity of redemption being barred after the lapse of twenty years or a period equal to the lapse of time necessary to bar a writ of entry, or in some states for a less period provided by law; (5) by proceeding in accordance with statutory enactments which vary in the different states. The general rule is that the mortgagor may pursue all his remedies at the same time; 4 Kent *183.

In cases of chattel mortgages, the mortgagee's remedy is either (1) to bring a bill in equity, obtain a decree of foreclosure, and a sale; (2) if he have the thing mortgaged in his possession, to sell it after giving to the mortgagor notice of such sale, and also of the amount of the debt due.

A remedy by foreclosure is barred where the obligation secured by the mortgage is barred; 23 Tex. 561; 41 Ill. 516; contra, 35 Vt. 104; 26 Miss. 599.

In some cases a reconveyance by the mortgagee is necessary when the mortgage has been paid after default; L. R. 5 Ch. 227; 10 Wall. 536; in other cases no reconveyance is necessary; 12 B. Monr. 497.

A tender after default discharges the mortgage lien; 54 N. Y. 599; 13 Mich. 306; contra, 34 N. J. L. 505; 9 Allen 522.

It is held in England that a mortgagee's purchase at a foreclosure sale, under a power of sale, by having another buy for him, does not pass a title free from the interest of the mortgagor unless the right to purchase is conferred by the mortgage; [1894] A. C. 150; 106 Ala. 417; if the power is conferred by the mortgage, the mortgagee may buy at his own sale; 161 Mass. 335; 109 N. C. 520; 127 Ill. 591. A mere power to sell has been held to confer on the mortgagee the right to purchase; 96 Ga. 246. But in scire facias proceedings in Pennsylvania the mortgagee may buy at his own sale; and it is everywhere a familiar practice in the foreclosure of corporate mortgages for the bondholders to unite to buy in the property.

A strict foreclosure is the barring of the equity of redemption of the mortgagor, after default in payment, when such default continues after due notice to redeem; 4 Kent *180. It was by bill in equity, by which the lands became the absolute property of the mortgagee. This is a common English practice and obtains also in certain New England states, with a liberal period, by statute or by practice in equity, for redemption; 4 Kent *181. But it is common to decree a sale of the mortgaged premises and apply the proceeds to the payment of the incumbrances in their order of priority. A more common practice, both in England and here, is for the mortgagee, or a trustee appointed for the purpose, to sell the land under a power of sale inserted in the mortgage. This takes the place of a foreclosure. It is the usual practice in the foreclosure of corporation mortgages, except that the sale by the trustee named in the mortgage is usually made in the course of legal proceedings and under a decree of the court, the fund being distributed to the lienholders according to their respective priorities, and the surplus, if any, paid over to the mortgagor.

A mortgagee may proceed to judgment on his bond secured by the mortgage; and such judgment has a lien as of the date of the mortgage; the purchaser at a sale under the judgment holds the land discharged of the lien of the mortgage; 6 Whart. 210.

The general rule is that the mortgagee may pursue all his rights at the same time; 4 Kent *183; but it is said that there are difficulties attending the sale of the equity of redemption by execution at law, and it has been forbidden by statute in New York; and is disapproved in Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Kentucky; 4 Kent *184.

The satisfaction of a mortgage on the record is only prima facie evidence of its discharge, and the owner may prove that the cancellation was done by fraud, accident, or mistake; and if he does this, his rights will not be affected by the improper cancellation of it; 32 W. Va. 244.

The object of recording a mortgage is to give notice to third persons; as between the parties thereto, a mortgage is just as effectual for all purposes without recording as with; 131 U. S. 258.

The receipt of insurance money by a mortgagee in whose behalf the premises were insured, does not constitute a payment of the mortgage, where such is not the intent of the parties, and the money is delivered to the mortgagor for rebuilding; 64 Vt. 387.

An honest mortgage is not affected by its proximity to an assignment for creditors; 62 Mich. 420; nor is it affected by the fact that it was given for a larger sum than is actually due, or in some particulars misdescribes the note in fact secured; 38 Minn. 443; and because it was given for a larger amount than the actual indebtedness, is not conclusive evidence of fraud; 22 Neb. 82.

An equitable mortgage is one in which the mortgagor does not actually convey the property, but does some act, by which he manifests his determination to bind the same as a security. See EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

A chattel mortgage is a transfer of personal property as security for the obligation of the mortgagor. In form it is usually a bill of sale with a clause of defeasance. In some states its form is prescribed by statute; in the greater number, however, this is not the case, and any form may be adopted. A mortgage is to be distinguished from a pledge, the former being a transfer of title, the latter a transfer of possession (see PLEDGE); also from a conditional sale, the test being that if after the transfer the mere relation of debtor and creditor exists the transaction is a mortgage, if not, a conditional sale. The courts lean toward construing the transaction as a mortgage.

The subject-matter of the transaction being a chattel, the law is in some respects simpler than the law as to mortgages of realty which is complicated by rules of conveyancing. The courts seek, in dealing with chattel mortgages, as in the case of other contracts, to arrive at the intention of the parties, and form is generally of little importance. But on the other hand the subject is complicated by the transitory nature of the subject-matter and the devices resorted to to secure the mortgagee and at the same time protect from fraud the creditors of the mortgagor, in other words by the recording acts. These are the very life of the chattel mortgage, and without them it cannot exist. For example, it was held in Pennsylvania (where chattel mortgages formerly did not exist at all, and are now recognized only to a limited extent) that while such a mortgage between citizens of Maryland would be recognized and enforced, when the question arose between the mortgagee and a citizen of Pennsylvania who had in good faith purchased the mortgaged chattel from the mortgagor, the mortgage could not be regarded because in the absence of statutory provisions the common law rule prevails in Pennsylvania that a sale of personal property unaccompanied by delivery of possession is void as against the intervening rights of creditors and purchasers; 9 Phila. 615; 4 D. R. (Pa.) 270.

The problem is how to restrict a transaction by which the mortgagor, though retaining possession of his goods, gives a valid lien upon them as security for a debt, so that innocent parties shall not be injured by giving credit to the mortgagor on the strength of the apparent ownership of the goods. Manifestly the only way to secure this end is by requiring the transaction to be made a matter of record.

Accordingly, the statutes provide for recording the instrument, usually in the county or town in which the mortgagor resides, or, if he is a non-resident, in the county or town in which the chattels are situated. Commonly this is sufficient record while the mortgaged property remains within the state, but some of the acts require re-recording if the property be removed to another county. In some acts it is provided that the wife of the mortgagor must join. In many states are found provisions to punish any removal or disposition of the property by the mortgagor in prejudice of the rights of the mortgagee. See LEX REI SITÆ; CONFLICT OF LAWS.

The property must be described with such accuracy as the nature of it will admit, and the description should be sufficient to enable third parties to identify the property. As a general rule it may be said that any personal property may be mortgaged, but this with the reservation that in a number of states the right is restricted to classes of articles, more or less numerous. Naturally, a common subject of such a mortgage is a shopkeeper's stock of goods employed by him in regular course of business. As to this, every variety of rule from the absolute prohibition of such mortgages to their freest use will be found. In some cases they bind the stock at the time the mortgage is created, in others they bind the stock at the time of foreclosure, in others they bind what is left of the original stock, but not the accessions; in others they bind the accessions, provided no other specific lien has attached before the mortgagee secures possession of them.

Where animals are mortgaged, the natural increase will be covered by the mortgage, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary. A mortgage on an article in process of manufacture will cover it when completed if still capable of identification. Growing crops are frequently the subject of mortgage, and the mortgage is valid at any stage of their development, and even in anticipation of their planting. See LIENS. As to a mortgage in its terms covering after acquired property see supra, and also corporation mortgages infra.

CORPORATION MORTGAGES OR DEEDS OF TRUST. The power to give a mortgage is said to be inherent, unless prohibited by statute, in all corporations except railway companies. In the case of the latter, the power does not exist unless conferred by charter or statute; Cook, Stock and Stockh. § 780. In practice, however, this power is usually—perhaps universally—possessed by railroad companies; Short, Rwy. Bonds, ch. viii.; 31 U. S. App. 486. See, generally, 7 Rul. Cas. 673.

A corporate mortgage should be executed with the same formalities as a deed. As it is incident to the general business of a corporation, unless restrained by statutory or charter provision, the directors can authorize a mortgage, though it is customary, and perhaps better practice, that authority should be given by the stockholders. In form it may correspond to the mortgage of an individual and be made directly to the holder of the bond which it secures; but as it is usually given to secure an issue of a number of bonds, it is ordinarily in form a deed of trust conveying the mortgaged property to a trustee for the bondholders, and this trustee is usually a corporation.

Corporate mortgages usually contain covenants or provisions which are wanting in a mortgage given by an individual. Provisions commonly found in such mortgages are (1) that until default the mortgagor may remain in possession of the property mortgaged; (2) an express covenant that the mortgagor will pay the principal and interest of the bonds secured, when due; (3) that the mortgagor shall have power to sell, free from lien of the mortgage, worn out or damaged material (usually accompanied by some provision for replacing the same); (4) provisions as to the payment of taxes and assessments upon the mortgaged property (which are usually assumed by the mortgagor) and providing against the suffering of liens to be established against it; (5) provisions as to the maturing of the principal of the mortgage debt in case of default in the covenants for payment of interest, or other covenants, by the mortgagor; (6) exemption of the trustee from liability except for gross negligence; (7) provision for the substitution of a trustee in case the trustee named should decline to act, or, usually, in case a substitution be desired by a majority or some larger number of the bondholders; (8) any other provisions, not illegal, which may be desired, such as provisions for the conversion of bonds into stock, provisions in regard to maintaining a sinking fund, etc. It is customary for the trustee to accept the trust expressly, or to become a party to the deed, and also to certify upon each bond that it is one of the issue secured under the mortgage. Where such certificate is forged the bond is void, though in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value; 83 N. Y. 223. But signature by vice-president is good though the bond calls for signature of the president; 161 Pa. 391. A trustee's certificate is a warranty of the facts recited therein (as that the bond is secured by a first mortgage duly recorded) on which the trustee is liable; 76 Fed. Rep. 919; 79 id. 848; 175 Pa. 318.

The mortgage should be recorded in each county in which real estate covered by it is situated, and if it covers also personal property the provisions of the law in regard to chattel mortgages should ordinarily be complied with and the mortgage recorded as a chattel mortgage, at any rate in the county in which the principal office of the mortgagor is situated. These matters are frequently governed by statutes. See RECORDING.

A railroad mortgage is made with reference to the law of the state in which the subject-matter of the contract is, and in which the contract is made; and the law enters into and becomes a part of the contract as if it were there in express terms; 25 U. S. App. 415.

In the absence of a provision to the contrary, all bonds secured by a mortgage have an equal lien irrespective of the time at which they were negotiated; 55 Ohio St. 23; 122 Pa. 565; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 596. First mortgage bonds are prior to second mortgage bonds, even if subsequently negotiated; 8 Fed. Rep. 118. The invalidity of some of the bonds does not invalidate the mortgage; 118 U. S. 161.

The negotiable character of the bonds extends also to the mortgage securing them, against which the mortgagor cannot defend on grounds which it cannot set up against bona fide holders of bonds; 16 Wall. 271, 452; 136 U. S. 268; 64 Me. 37; 122 Mass. 67; 39 Wis. 146; the rule in Ohio and Illinois is said to be different; 14 Ohio St. 396; 93 Ill. 433; see 79 Ala. 587. In case of default, an individual bondholder may sue the corporation, but after securing judgment cannot have execution on property covered by the mortgage, which is security for all the bondholders alike. As to the effect of recitals in bonds as notice, see RECITALS.

In the surrender of corporate bonds and the substitution of new bonds, the latter will retain the security of the mortgage, unless an extinguishment was intended; 96 N. C. 298; see, also, 98 Ala. 92; 76 Fed. Rep. 43 (where under a reorganization plan the old bonds were deposited and were to be held by a trustee as additional security for the old bonds); but not where the mortgage was satisfied of record; 96 N. C. 298. A mere change in the form of the mortgage debt, such as substituting new bonds for the old, will not affect the lien; novation, especially when against the interest of the bondholders, must be clearly proved; 76 Fed. Rep. 38; and the funding of overdue interest and the issue of new evidence of indebtedness in place of the overdue coupons will not constitute a novation unless there be clear proof of an intention to waive the lien; 3 Hughes 320; 33 Gratt. 586.

A corporate mortgage may cover property acquired by the corporation after the mortgage is given. This has been sustained upon the theory that though ineffective as a conveyance, the mortgage operates as an executory agreement attaching to the property when acquired; 63 Fed. Rep. 891. This rule, though contrary to the common law, has been established from necessity in the case of railroads, public policy requiring that a railroad be preserved intact as quasi-public property. The rule will be applied only where the mortgage expressly covers the subsequently acquired property. A railroad mortgage covers the road, although the route differs from that originally laid out. It covers, also, a right of way acquired subsequently to the mortgage, though here the mortgage would be strictly construed, and while held to apply to property used for railroad purposes, it would be held not to apply if not so used; 122 U. S. 82. It covers terminal facilities upon a line of railroad constructed or to be constructed between the named termini, together with all stations, etc.; 138 U. S. 414. See TERMINAL FACILITIES. It applies not only to legal titles but also to equitable rights and interests subsequently acquired either by or for the company; 149 U. S. 327; 130 id. 413; 164 id. 1; it embraces the lease of a belt line around a city acquired after the execution of the mortgage; 22 U. S. App. 54. It does not cover uncalled capital: [1897] 1 Ch. 406. Where the property acquired is at the time subject to existing liens, these liens are prior in right to the lien of the mortgage; 12 Wall. 362; 81 Fed. Rep. 772. See FUTURE ACQUIRED PROPERTY. And if property was fraudulently acquired, the vendor may rescind as against the mortgagee.

Another rule resting upon the quasi-public character of a railroad is that which prohibits creditors from levying an attachment or execution upon the railroad, or parts of it, even subject to the mortgage. To permit such action would be to permit the disintegration of the railroad and the destruction of the power to discharge the public obligation of the corporation.

Foreclosure. The mortgage or deed of trust contains provisions for enforcing the rights of bondholders in case of default of the mortgagor. It usually provides for (1) Entry by the trustee. This is seldom now resorted to, since by operating the property, the trustee becomes liable as the mortgagor would have been, and as default implies that the property has been operated at a loss, the trustee will seldom consent to exercise this right, and never unless sufficiently indemnified by the bondholders. (2) Trustee's sale of the property after prescribed advertisement, which is seldom resorted to. (3) The usual method of procedure is by a bill of foreclosure, usually accompanied by a prayer for a receiver (see supra; RECEIVERS) and for the establishing of liens or claims against the property. No provision in the mortgage can exclude the right of a trustee to apply to a court of equity for foreclosure. The provision usually found that a majority of the bondholders may by an instrument in writing waive the right to declare that a default has occurred will be sustained by the court, though such provision is not favored, as being inimical to the rights of a minority. Provisions unreasonably limiting the right to foreclose are void. When a provision required the request of one-fourth of the bondholders to compel the trustee to begin foreclosure, the fact that three-fourths of the bonds were held by a company operating the mortgagor company was held to justify action by a single bondholder; 73 Fed. Rep. 320. In case the trustee refuses to act, a bondholder may bring suit for foreclosure on behalf of himself and such others as may join; 74 Fed. Rep. 67; 77 id. 525; in such case the refusal of the trustee must be set out and the trustee should be made a party defendant; 79 Fed. Rep. 25; 80 id. 569. If a single bondholder has the right to institute proceedings he is bound to act for all standing in a similar position; 143 U. S. 42. See PARTIES.

Railroad foreclosure suits are begun generally in the federal courts, thus securing the appointment of the same receiver or receivers for the entire property, and avoiding, to a certain extent, possible prejudice in a state court. For the latter reason, perhaps, the same jurisdiction is sought in many cases of corporations other than railroads. The jurisdiction of the federal courts in such cases depends on the citizenship of the parties. Federal courts sitting in equity cannot be ousted of jurisdiction to enforce a right of an equitable nature by a state statute which prescribes an action at law to enforce such right; 149 U. S., 574. See JURISDICTION.

Where a federal court has jurisdiction and possession of the property of a railroad company, it acquires jurisdiction of a subsequent suit to foreclose a mortgage on the same property, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties thereto; 137 U. S. 171; 52 Fed. Rep. 671.

Demand for payment is not necessary before proceeding for foreclosure, though a corporation could of course show that payment would have been made if demanded; 95 U. S. 10.

The court having acquired jurisdiction takes control of the entire property of the corporation through its receiver, and usually in the case of a railroad, though exceptionally in the case of other corporations, operates the property through such receiver. See RECEIVERS.

After the receiver takes possession, supplies, even though not covered by the mortgage, cannot be taken in execution by creditors. Prior to such taking possession, such assets are ordinarily subject to execution, or can be reached by attachment or bill in equity. Income, such as earnings, or interest or accounts collected subsequently to the appointment of the receiver, are taken by him and administered for the benefit of all the creditors. See RECEIVERS; OPERATING EXPENSES.

Provision is then made for ascertaining the liens, or claims, against the property and determining the liabilities of the corporation and their several priorities. This is preliminary to a sale of the property, in order that parties interested may know what the incumbrances upon, or claims against, the property are, and may bid intelligently, or make provision to redeem the property without a sale; 63 Fed. Rep 891. See Foreclosure decree in 88 id. 843.

Decrees for the sale of mortgaged property usually provide that a part of the bid may be paid in bonds of the issue secured.

On the foreclosure sale of the property of a corporation, bonds should not be received in payment of a bid except for such proportion of the bid as the purchaser, on a distribution of the purchase money, is entitled to receive on account of his bonds, and the right to bid in bonds should be extended to all bondholders on the same terms; 73 Fed. Rep. 956.

The receivership usually terminates in a sale under order of court, either for the purpose of carrying out a plan of reorganization (see REORGANIZATION), or for the purpose of realizing upon the property of the corporation. For the form of a bill of foreclosure and decree, see 3 Hughes 320.

A purchaser of real estate at a foreclosure sale is punishable as for contempt in refusing to obey an order of the court requiring him to complete the sale; see 47 N. Y. Supp. 835, reversing id. 693. Inability to pay the price will not relieve the party; 47 N. Y. Suppl. 835; contra, 92 N. C. 304.

It is to be observed that in a foreclosure it is by no means certain that the lien of the mortgage will be determined to be the first lien upon the corporate property. In many cases it develops that claims subsequent to the mortgage in time are held to be prior liens, and while for many purposes the filing of a bill or appointment of a receiver fixes the liabilities, it may be that claims arising even subsequent to the receivership will be held to precede the claim of the mortgage bondholders.

The first payment out of the fund realized from the property is for the expenses of the litigation, always provided for from a fund under the control of a court. Included under this head are receivers' certificates, since these were issued by order of the court. See OPERATING EXPENSES; RECEIVERS.

Taxes are prior in lien to all other liens except judicial costs; 3 Woods 434; 110 N. Y. 250; 41 N. J. L. 235.

In many states liens are given by statutes to certain favored creditors, who thus acquire priority over mortgage bonds prior to the inception of their claims. The ordinary mechanic's lien statute does not apply to railroads unless expressly declared to do so. The contractor who constructs a railroad has no lien thereon as a matter of right. The fact that he has possession does not give him a lien; 1 Wall. 254; 11 id. 459. The courts construe such statutes strictly. Thus, a statute giving a lien for materials, supplies, and labor does not give a lien for money loaned to pay for them; 39 Fed. Rep. 436. And a lien for materials will be allowed only for such materials as pass into the permanent structure, and not for trucks, scales, etc.; 27 Fed. Rep. 178. A contractor's lien for work done will be limited to the embankments and structures actually made by him, as distinguished from the land and right of way; 83 Fed. Rep. 886. It has been held that a statute giving a lien to persons furnishing supplies necessary to the operation of a manufacturing company prior to the lien of an earlier mortgage is not unconstitutional as special or class legislation; 90 Va. 126. Such "supplies" are only such things as contribute directly to carrying on the work in which the company is engaged and not, e. g., goods supplied to a "company store" maintained by a furnace company; 81 Fed. Rep. 451. But, while the courts construe such statutes strictly in determining the kind of claims to be admitted under their provisions, they construe them liberally as remedial statutes in determining the formalities to be observed under their provisions; 35 Fed. Rep. 442.

A very common statutory lien of this class is the lien for labor, usually limited as to the duration of the labor for which a lien can be filed, and also as to the class of employes entitled to take advantage of the provisions of such a statute; 35 Fed Rep. 436; 81 id. 453.

The "six months' rule," or as it is usually called, from the case in which it was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States (99 U. S. 235), the rule in Fosdick v. Schall, allows parties who have furnished labor or supplies within six months antecedent to the receivership priority, at least so far as income received during the receivership is concerned, over mortgage bondholders. It has been held that the rule applies only to railroads; 128 U. S. 416; not to manufacturing corporations; 35 Fed, Rep. 436; 42 id. 372; nor to steamship lines; 50 id. 312; nor to a hotel company; 106 N. Y. 423. But see, contra, an Alabama case discussing the authorities and extending the rule to private corporations generally; 29 L. R. A. 623. See RECEIVERS.

As to the right of a mortgagee to possession, see 5 Harv. L. Rev. 245.

Mortgages in the civil law are of two kinds, conventional and legal. A conventional mortgage results from the direct act or covenant of the parties. A legal mortgage arises by mere act of law.

A mortgage may be acquired in three ways.

First, with the consent of the debtor, by his agreement.

Second, without the owner's consent, by the quality and bare effect of the engagement, the nature of which is such that the law has annexed to it the security of a mortgage.

Third, where a mortgage is acquired by the authority of justice: as where a creditor who had no mortgage obtains a decree of condemnation in his favor.

When the creditor is put into possession of the thing, movable or immovable, he has a right to keep it until he is paid what is owing him; and the debtor cannot turn the creditor out of possession, nor make use of his own thing without the consent of the creditor.

Effect of a mortgage. First, the creditor has a right to sell the thing pledged, whether the creditor has it in his possession or not. Under the French law, it was a right to have it sold. Cushing's Domat, p. 647.

Second, a right on the part of the creditor to follow the property, into whosesoever hands it has come, whether movable or immovable.

Third, a preference of the first creditor to whom the property is mortgaged, and a right on his part to follow the property into the hands of the other creditors.

Fourth, the mortgage is a security for all the consequences of the original debt, as damages, interest, expenses in preserving, etc.

With respect to mortgages under the modern civil law of France and Louisiana, the distinction between movables and immovables is important. Such a thing as a chattel mortgage is not recognized under either system. "But some things movable in their nature become immovable by destination under certain circumstances," as: animals intended for and used in the cultivation of a plantation and placed on it by the owner for that purpose; though the animal cannot be mortgaged by itself, a mortgage of a plantation will cover the animals so attached to it; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 76; 14 La. Ann. 15. See LIEN; PACT DE NON ALIENANDO.

See, generally, Domat, part i. lib. iii. tit. i.; Guyot, Rep. Univ. tit. Privilegium; Cushing's Domat.

MORTGAGEE. He to whom a mortgage is made. See MORTGAGE.

MORTGAGOR. He who makes a mortgage. See MORTGAGE.

MORTIFICATION. In Scotch Law. A term nearly synonymous with mortmain.

MORTMAIN. A term applied to denote the possession of lands or tenements by any corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal. These purchases having been chiefly made by religious houses, in consequence of which lands became perpetually inherent in one dead hand, this has occasioned the general appellation of mortmain to be applied to such alienations. 2 Bla. Com. 268; Co. Litt. 2 b; Erskine, Inst. 2. 4. 10; Barrington, Stat. 27, 97. See Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 1137 n. (4); Shelf. Mortm. In England the common-law right of every corporation to take and hold lands and tenements has been restrained by the statutes of mortmain, which subject the power to acquire lands to the discretion of the crown or parliament as to the grant of a license; 8 H. L. C. 712; 15 How. 367, 404. These statutes have not been re-enacted or considered in force in this country except in Pennsylvania, where they are judicially recognized to the extent of prohibiting the dedication of property to superstitious uses, and grants to a corporation without a statutory license; 7 S. & R. 313; though the title is good till office found, and may be conveyed subject to the right of the state to defeat it; id. See 101 U. S. 352. The commonwealth only can object; 7 Pa. 233.

Ordinarily, a corporation may take and hold such land as may be within the purposes of the charter, whether it acquires it by deed or devise; Clark, Corp. 129. Statutes sometimes restrict the amount that can be taken. Where a limit of value is specified it is ascertained as of the taking; 4 Sandf. Ch. 633.

In the United States the term mortmain acts is applied to statutes which exist in some states restricting the right of religious corporations to hold land and the power to make conveyances, devises, or bequests to religious societies or charitable uses. Such statutes are aimed at the same mischief which gave rise to the English statutes of mortmain, and either avoid the deed or will, quoad hoc, altogether, or when without valuable consideration, or when the real estate is above a specified valuation, or if made within a specified time before the death of the grantor or testator. See Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 403, 1446, 2618.

In England, by the Mortmain Act of 1736, 9 Geo. II. c. 36, the power of devising land by will to charitable purposes was absolutely destroyed; 6 Ch. D. 214. This act and various amending acts were repealed by the act of 1888, but practically the then existing law was re-enacted; Whitehead, Church Law 174.

The act of 1888 is in effect a codification of the law on the subject; 5 L. Quart. Rev. 387. It is in four distinct parts: I. Assurances in mortmain are void and the land liable to forfeiture, if made otherwise than under authority of a statute or of a license from the queen, who is empowered to grant it. II. Assurances for charitable uses are treated substantially on the basis of the statute 9 Geo. II., and charitable objects are enumerated in the language of the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4; they must take effect immediately, without any power of revocation, reservation, etc., except as to a nominal rent, mines and minerals, or easements, building contract, or the like; or, in case of bona fide sale, of a rent charge or annual payment to the vendor; they can never be made by will, but only by deed made with prescribed formalities. III. Exemptions are made of specified quantities of land for parks, museums, and schoolhouses, which may be made by will; also land for the two universities and other named colleges is excepted from the provisions in the second part of the act. IV. Scotland and Ireland are excluded, and existing charters, etc., are saved.

By the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act of 1891, land may be assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, but such land shall, notwithstanding anything in the will contained to the contrary, be sold within one year from the death of the testator unless the time is extended by the high court, or a judge at chambers, or the charity commissioners, who have power to sanction the retention or acquisition of such land where it is required for actual occupation for purposes of charity. Land under the mortmain acts, 1888 and 1891, is defined to include tenements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, of any tenure, but not any money, secured on land or any personal estate arising from or connected with land; 54 & 55 Vict. c. 73, § 3.

Statutes of mortmain are local in their application and do not affect wills of persons domiciled in British colonies. A bequest by a testator, domiciled in a colony, of money, to his trustees for the purchase of land in England for a charitable object, is valid; 7 H. L. Cas. 124.

See Whitehead, Church Law 174; Tyssen, Char. Beq. 561; 1 Brett, Com. ch. xix.; CHARITABLE USE.

MORTUARY. In Ecclesiastical Law. A burial-place. A kind of ecclesiastical heriot, being a customary gift of the second best living animal belonging to the deceased, claimed by and due to the minister in many parishes, on the death of his parishioners, whether buried in the churchyard or not. These mortuaries, like lay heriots, were originally voluntary bequests to the church in lieu of tithes or ecclesiastical dues neglected in lifetime. See SOUL SCOT. They were reduced to a certain amount by 21 Hen. VIII. c. 6. They were sometimes payable to the lord; Paroch. Antiq. 470. The mortuary seems to have been carried to church with the corpse, and was therefore sometimes called corpse-present. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 563. Anciently, a parishioner could not make a valid will without an assignment of a sufficient mortuary or gift to the church. 2 Bla. Com. 427.

MORTUARY TABLES. See LIFE TABLES.

MORTUUM VADIUM. A mortgage.

MORTUUS (Lat.). Dead. Ainsworth, Lex. So in Sheriff's return mortuus est, he is dead. O. Bridgm. 469; Brooke, Abr. Retorne de Briefe, pl. 125; 19 Viner, Abr. Return, lib. 2, pl. 12.

MOTEER. A customary service or payment at the moot or court of the lord from which some were exempted by charter or privilege. Cowel.

MOTHER. A woman who has borne a child.

It is generally the duty of a mother to support her child when she is left a widow, until he becomes of age or is able to maintain himself; 8 Watts 366; 16 Mass. 135; 3 N. H. 29; 52 N. J. Ch., 92; and even after he becomes of age, if he be chargeable to the public, she may, perhaps in all the states, be compelled, when she has sufficient means, to support him. But when the child has property sufficient for his support, she is not, even during his minority, obliged to maintain him; 1 Bro. Ch. 387; 2 Mass. 415; id. 97; but will be entitled to an allowance out of the income of his estate, and, if need be, out of the principal, for his maintenance; 2 Fla. 36; 2 Atk. 447; 5 Ves. 194; 3 Dutch. 388. During the life of the father she is not bound to support her child, though she have property settled to her separate use and the father be destitute; 4 Cl. & F. 323; 11 Bligh, N. S. 62.

When the father dies without leaving a testamentary guardian at common law, the mother is entitled to be the guardian of the person and estate of the infant until he arrives at fourteen years, when he is able to choose a guardian; Littleton § 123; 3 Co. 38; Co. Litt. 84 b; 2 Atk. 14; Comyns, Dig. Feme; 7 Ves. 348. See 10 Mass. 135, 140; Harp. 9; 1 Root 487; 22 Barb. 178; 2 Green, Ch. 221; 3 Dev. & B. 325; 9 Ala. 197; 29 W. Va. 751. The right of the widowed mother to the earnings and services of her minor child does not appear to have been precisely determined; but it is by no means so absolute as that of the father; 31 Me. 240; 15 N. H. 486; 4 Binn. 487; 3 Hill N. Y. 400; 14 Ala. 123; 15 Mass. 272.

In Pennsylvania, when the father dies without leaving a testamentary guardian, the orphans' court will appoint a guardian until the infant shall attain his fourteenth year. During the joint lives of the parents, the father has the only control and custody of the children, except when in special cases, as when they are of tender years, or when the habits of the father render him an unsuitable guardian, the mother is allowed to have possession of them; 6 Rich. Eq. 344; 2 S. & R. 174; 13 Johns. 418; 2 Phill. 786; 2 Coll. 661.

The right of the father or mother to the custody of their minor child is not an absolute right to be accorded them under all circumstances, for it may be denied to either of them if it appears to the court that the parent, otherwise entitled to this right, is unfit for the trust; 29 W. Va. 751; 82 Va. 433.

A child will not be taken from the custody of its father and given to its mother when it does not appear that his welfare required the change; 4 Misc. Rep. 235.

The mother of a bastard child, as natural guardian, has a right to the custody and control of such child, even as against the putative father, and is bound to maintain it; 12 Mass. 387, 433; 2 Johns. 375; 6 S. & R. 255; but after her death the court will, in its discretion, deliver such child to the father in opposition to the claims of the maternal grandfather; 1 Ashm. 55; Stra. 1162.

As a general rule the mother of an illegitimate cannot recover damages for his death, under a statute giving a right of action to the relatives or representatives of one killed through the negligence of another; 2 Ont. 658; 46 Fed. Rep. 269. See, contra, 25 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 179. See BASTARD.

MOTHER-IN-LAW. The mother of one's wife or of one's husband.

MOTION. In Practice. An application to a court by one of the parties in a cause, or his counsel, in order to obtain some rule or order of court which he thinks becomes necessary in the progress of the cause, or to get relieved in a summary manner from some matter which would work injustice.

It is said to be a written application for an order; 83 Ia. 471, but it is frequently made verbally.

Where the object of the motion may be granted merely on request, without a hearing, it is a motion of course; those requiring a hearing are special; such as may be heard on the application of one party alone, ex parte; those requiring notice to the other party, on notice.

When the motion is made on some matter of fact, it must be supported by an affidavit that such facts are true; and for this purpose the party's affidavit will be received, though it cannot be read on the hearing; 1 Binn. 145. See 3 Bla. Com. 305; 15 Viner, Abr. 495; Graham, Pr. 542; Smith, Ch. Pr. Index; Mitchell, Motions and Rules.

Under the English Bankruptcy Rules of 1870, all applications to a court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, in the exercise of its primary jurisdiction, must in general be made by motion. Any application made to a divisional court of the high court of justice, or to a judge in an action, under the rules appended to the Judicature Act, 1875, must be made by motion. Moz. & W.

MOTION FOR DECREE. This has hitherto been (since its introduction by stat. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86) for the plaintiff in an English chancery suit to obtain the decree to which he claims to be entitled. It must be distinguished from interlocutory motions. See Hunt, Eq. Pl. i. ch. 4; Moz. & W.

MOTION FOR JUDGMENT. In English Practice. A proceeding whereby a party to an action moves for the judgment of the court in his favor, which he may adopt under various circumstances enumerated under the Judicature Act, 1875.

MOTIVE. The inducement, cause, or reason why a thing is done.

It is an inducement, or that which leads or tempts the mind to indulge the criminal act; it is resorted to as a means of arriving at an ultimate fact, not for the purpose of explaining the reason of a criminal act which has been clearly proved, but from the important aid it may render in completing the proof of the commission of the act when it might otherwise remain in doubt; 49 N. Y. 148. It is not indispensable to conviction for murder that the particular motive for taking the life of a human being shall be established by proof to the satisfaction of the jury; 151 U. S. 396.

An act legal in itself, which violates no right, is not actionable on account of the motive which actuated it; 34 Conn. 529; 28 Vt. 49; [1898] 1 Ch. 274; [1898] A. C. 1. See the learned paper on the doctrine of the last cited case, Allen v. Flood, by L. C. Krauthoff, in Rep. Am. Bar Assoc. 1898.

See MALICE; LIBEL; LUCRI CAUSA; CAUSE; CONSIDERATION; MISTAKE; WITNESS.

MOURNING. The apparel worn at funerals, and for a time afterwards, in order to manifest grief for the death of some one, and to honor his memory.

The expenses paid for such apparel.

It has been held, in England, that a demand for mourning furnished to the widow and family of the testator is not a funeral expense; 2 C. & P. 207. See 14 Ves. 346; 1 V. & B. 364. See 2 Bell, Com. 156.

MOVABLES. Such subjects of property as attend a man's person wherever he goes, in contradistinction to things immovable.

Things movable by their nature are such as may be carried from one place to another, whether they move themselves, as cattle, or cannot be removed without an extraneous power, as inanimate things. So in the civil law mobilia; but this term did not properly include living movables, which were termed moventia. Calvinus, Lex. But these words mobilia and moventia are also used synonymously, and in the general sense of "movables." Ibid. Movables are further distinguished into such as are in possession, or which are in the power of the owner, as a horse in actual use, a piece of furniture in a man's own house; and such as are in the possession of another, and can only be recovered by action, which are therefore said to be in action, as a debt. But it has been held that movable property, in a legacy, strictly includes only such as is corporeal and tangible; not, therefore, rights in action, as judgment or bond debts; 19 Conn. 238, 245; 2 Dall. 142; 1 Wm. Jones 225. But see 17 Pick. 404. See PERSONAL PROPERTY; Pow. Mortg. Index; 2 Bla. Com. 384; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 26; 1 P. Wms. 267.

In a will, "movables" is used in its largest sense, but will not pass growing crops, nor building materials on ground; nor, as stated above, rights in action; 2 Wms. Exec. 1014; 3 A. K. Marsh. 123; 2 Dall. 142. See MORTGAGE.

In Scotch Law. Every right which a man can hold which is not heritable; opposed to heritage. Bell, Dict.

MOVE. To apply to the court to take action in any matter. See MOTION. To propose a resolution, or recommend action in a deliberative body.

MUIRBURN. In Scotch Law. To set fire to a muir or moor. The time in which muirburn may be practised is regulated by statute. See 1 Bro. C. C. 78.

MULATTO. A person born of one white and one black parent. 7 Mass. 88; 1 Bailey 270; 2 id. 558; 18 Ala. 276.

Properly a mulatto is a person one of whose parents is wholly black and the other wholly white; but the word does not always, though perhaps it does generally, require so exactly even a mixture of blood, nor is its signification alike in all the states. 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 308.

MULCT. A fine imposed on the conviction of an offence.

An imposition laid on ships or goods by a company of trade for the maintenance of consuls and the like. It is obsolete in the latter sense, and but seldom used in the former.

MULE. A mule is not a mare, horse, or gelding. 4 D. R. Pa. 172.

MULIER. Anciently mulier was taken for a wife, as it is commonly used for a woman, and sometimes for a widow; but it has been held that a virgin is included under the name mulier. Co. Litt. 170, 253; 2 Bla. Com. 248.

The term is used always in contradistinction to a bastard, mulier being always legitimate, Co. Litt. 243, and seems to be a word corrupted from melior, or the French meilleur, signifying lawful issue born in wedlock. But by Glanville, lawful issue are said to be mulier, not from melior, but because begotten e muliere, and not ex concubina, for he calls such issue filios mulieratos, opposing them to bastards. Glanville, lib. 7, c. 1. If the said lands "should, according to the queen's lawes, descend to the right heire, then in right it ought to descend to him, as next heire being mulierlie borne, and the other not so borne." Hollnshed, Chron. of Ireland, an. 1568.

MULIER PUISNE. See BASTARD EIGNE; EIGNE.

MULTA. A fine imposed ex arbitrio by magistrates on the præsides provinciarum. Inst. 4. 1.

A fine given to the king that the bishop might have the power to make his will and to have the probate of other men's, and the granting adminstrations. Toml. Law Dict.

MULTIFARIOUSNESS. In Equity Pleading. The demand in one bill of several matters of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 182; 18 Ves. 80; 2 Mas. 201; 4 Cow. 682; 2 Gray 467. See Dan. Ch. Pr. 2093. See PATENT.

The uniting in one bill against a single defendant several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected. More commonly called misjoinder of claims. See MISJOINDER.

Multifariousness of the first kind is where the plaintiff joins several distinct claims against the same defendant and prays relief in respect to all; and of the second kind is where a plaintiff having a valid claim against one defendant joins another person as defendant in the same suit with a large part of which he is not connected.

The objection is discouraged where it might defeat the ends of justice; 12 Ga. 61; but joinder will be allowed unless it is apparent that the defence will be seriously embarrassed by confusing different issues and proofs in the same litigation; 4 Blatchf. 376. See 61 Ga. 520. A bill is multifarious where there is a misjoinder of distinct and independent causes of action. See 17 Ala. 119. Thus, unconnected demands against different estates cannot be united in the same bill, though the defendant is executor in both; 6 Dana 186; nor will a bill lie against two different partnerships, though one defendant is a partner in both; 10 Md. 364; nor a bill combining individual claims with claims in a representative capacity; 3 Story 25; but a bill may be brought by several persons claiming under a common title but in different shares; 18 How. 253; and where there is a joinder of a legal and an equitable claim and a prayer for relief as to both, the bill is not multifarious; 18 Ala. 439. To justify dismissal on this ground, it must appear that the interests are so diverse that they cannot be properly included in one decree: 21 Ala. 813.

There is no general rule by which to determine whether a bill is multifarious because it joins another person as defendant in a suit with a large part of which he is unconnected; it must be left to the discretion of the court; 3 How. 333; 18 id. 259; the courts do not disregard previous decisions, but have a due regard to general convenience and the advancement of justice; 3 Md. Ch. 47.

Defendants should not be put to the unnecessary trouble and expense of answering litigated matters in a bill in which they are not interested; 3 Barb. Ch. 432; but where the interests of different parties are so complicated in different transactions that entire justice could not be conveniently done without uniting the whole, the bill is not multifarious; 3 How. 411; 59 N. H. 507. The objection is confined to cases where the cause of each defendant is entirely different in subject-matter from that of his co-defendants, but it does not apply to a case where a general right is claimed by the plaintiff, though the defendants may have separate and distinct rights; 95 N. C. 303; 69 Mo. 436. To render a bill multifarious it must contain not only separate and distinct matters, but such that each entitles the complainant to separate equitable relief; Adams, Eq. 310.

The objection should be raised by demurrer; 9 Gill & Johns. 280; filing an answer and taking the testimony on the merits waives the objection, and it cannot be made on appeal after a decree pro confesso; id; 100 Ill. 297; or after a final decree on the merits of one part of the bill; 18 Ala. 787. In 57 Pa. 247, it was held that it was too late to object at the hearing. But in such case it has also been held that its allowance rests in the discretion of the court; 17 Ala. 425. It may be taken by plea, answer, or demurrer, but not at the hearing; but the court may raise it at any time; 3 How. 332.

One defendant cannot demur on the ground of the joinder of another defendant who does not object. See 38 N. J. Eq. 88, n.

A demurrer goes to the whole suit, and, if sustained, the bill should be dismissed; 3 Md. Ch. 46; 16 Ala. 87. See MISJOINDER.

MULTIPLE POINDING. In Scotch Law. Double distress; a name given to an action, corresponding to proceedings by way of interpleader, which may be brought by a person in possession of goods claimed by different persons pretending a right thereto, calling the claimants and all others to settle their claims, so that the party who sues may be liable only "in once and single payment." Bell, Dict.; 2 Bell, Com. 299; Stair, Inst. 3. 1. 39.

MULTIPLICITY OF ACTIONS, OR SUITS. Numerous and unnecessary attempts to litigate the same right. For such cases equity provides a proceeding called a bill of peace, q. v., and a court of common law may grant a rule for the consolidation of different actions; L. R. 2 Ch. 8; Story, Eq. Pl. 284; Bisph. Eq. 415.

MULTITUDE. The meaning of this word is not very certain. By some it is said that to make a multitude there must be ten persons at least, while others contend that the law has not fixed any number. Co. Litt. 257. That two cannot constitute a multitude, see 104 Mass. 595.

MULTURE. In Scotch Law. The quantity of grain or meal payable to the proprietor of a mill, or to the multurer, his tacksman, for manufacturing the corns. Erskine, Inst. 2. 9. 19; Ersk. Prin. 210.

MUMMIFICATION. In medical jurisprudence, the complete drying up of the body as the result of burial in a dry, hot soil, or the exposure of the body to a dry, cold atmosphere.

MUNERA. The name given to grants made in the early feudal ages, which were merely tenancies at will or during the pleasure of the grantor. Dalrymple, Feud. 198, 199; Wright, Ten. 19.

MUNICEPS (Lat. from munus, office, and capere, to take). In Roman Law. Eligible to office.

A freeman born in a municipality or town other than Rome, who had come to Rome, and though a Roman citizen, yet was looked down upon as a provincial, and not allowed to hold the higher offices (dignitates).

The inhabitants of a municipality entitled to hold municipal offices. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Calvinus, Lex.

MUNICIPAL. Strictly, this word applies only to what belongs to a city. It is used in this sense in the terms municipal court, municipal ordinance, municipal officer.

It has two meanings: (1) relating to cities, towns, and villages; (2) relating to the state or nation; 3 Wyo. 597. See 43 Ala. 598.

Among the Romans, cities were called municipia: these cities voluntarily joined the Roman republic in relation to their sovereignty only, retaining their laws, their liberties, and their magistrates, who were thence called municipal magistrates. With us this word has a more extensive meaning: for example, we call municipal law not the law of a city only, but the law of the state. 1 Bla. Com. 44. Municipal is used in contradistinction to international: thus, we say, an offence against the law of nations is an international offence, but one committed against a particular state or separate community is a municipal offence. See MUNICIPIUM.

MUNICIPAL BONDS. Evidences of indebtedness issued by a municipality.

In the ordinary commercial sense, they are negotiable bonds. 85 Tex. 520.

This class of securities is issued for sale in the market, with the object of raising money, under the express authority of the legislature. As to the power of municipal corporations to issue and sell bonds and borrow money, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS. Notwithstanding they are under seal, they are clothed with all the attributes of negotiable or commercial paper, pass by delivery or indorsement, and are not subject to prior equities (where the power to issue them exists) in the hands of holders for value, who took before maturity and without notice. Payment of interest on such bonds for a number of years will estop the corporation from setting up a mere irregularity in their issue, as against bona fide holders for value; 80 Fed. Rep. 672. The coupons usually attached to such bonds are likewise negotiable, and may be detached and held separately from the bond, and may be sued on by the holder in his own name without his being the owner of the bonds to which they were originally attached; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 486; 3 Wall. 327; 1 Dill. 338; whether he has given consideration for them or not; 80 Fed. Rep. 672.

Coupons when severed from the bonds cease to be incidents of the bonds, and become independent claims, and do not lose their validity, if for any cause the bonds are cancelled or paid before maturity; 20 Wall. 583. See as to coupons as distinct and separate instruments, 6 L. R. A. 562, n.; COUPONS.

The fact that such bonds are payable out of a special fund, known as a "sinking fund," does not prevent the holder from suing at law to enforce collection; 75 Fed. Rep. 967.

A very important principle with respect to municipal bonds was settled by the leading case of Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, in which it was held that bonds which were valid under the decisions of the state court of Iowa at the time they were issued, will be sustained by the federal court, although the state court had subsequently overruled its earlier decisions and held that they were issued without authority. See 3 id. 294; 7 id. 181. See also an article sustaining this doctrine in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 311, by Prof. J. B. Thayer, in a preliminary note to which are cited a number of adverse criticisms of it.

Purchasers of the bonds of a municipality issued to aid the building of a railway, which recite a compliance with the law authorizing their issue, are not required to ascertain conditions imposed by the proposition voted on, which do not appear in the bonds; 82 Fed. Rep. 873; they have a right to assume that the conditions have been complied with; 73 id. 966.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION. A public corporation, created by government for political purposes, and having subordinate and local powers of legislation: e. g. a county, town, city, etc. 2 Kent 275; Ang. & A. Corp. 9, 29; Baldw. 222. An incorporation of persons, inhabitants of a particular place, or connected with a particular district, enabling them to conduct its local civil government. Glover, Mun. Corp. 1. In the United States, until recently, municipal corporations have been created singly, each with its special or separate charter passed by the legislature of the state. These charters define the territorial boundaries; provide for a governing body, usually styled the town or city council, with representatives to be chosen from different wards of the city or town; fix the qualifications of voters; specify the mode of holding elections; provide for the election of a mayor; and contain a minute and detailed enumeration of the powers of the city council; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp., 4th ed. § 39.

A state is the proper party to impeach the validity of a municipal charter, and its corporate existence cannot be collaterally attacked; 167 U. S. 646. There must be both population and territory; 75 Ill. 156; 29 Mich. 451; and there cannot be two municipal corporations, at the same time, over the same territory; 25 Fla. 371.

There are territorial subdivisions, not incorporated, but which are like municipal corporations, instrumentalities of local government for certain definite purposes. Such are in some states, the counties, or towns, or school districts where they are not incorporated. They are termed quasi-corporations, which title see. They are not included in the phrase "counties or municipal corporations" in a statute; 44 Wis. 489.

The term municipal corporation has been held to include the District of Columbia; 129 U. S. 141; a city; 250 Ohio St. 143; a village; 27 Neb. 770.

Where a municipal charter is repealed, and the same, or substantially the same, inhabitants are erected into a new corporation, whether with extended or restricted territorial limits, such new corporation is the successor of the old one and entitled to its property and subject to its liabilities; 167 U. S. 646.

Public duties are required of such corporations as counties and districts as a part of the machinery of the state government, and in order that they may properly perform these duties they are invested with certain corporate powers, but their functions are wholly of a public nature, and they are at all times subject to the will of the legislature, unless restrained by the constitution; 30 W. Va. 424.

In England, the municipal corporation acts, 5 & 6 Will. IV. ch. 76, abolish all special charters, with enumerated exceptions, and enact general provisions for the incorporation, regulation, and government of municipal corporations. These acts have been followed in many of the United States. The usual scheme is to grade corporations into classes, according to their size, as into cities of the first class, second class, etc., and towns or villages, and to bestow on each class such powers as the legislature deems expedient; but the powers and mode of organization of corporations of each class are uniform; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 41, n.

The scope of legislative authority over municipal corporations is limited only by the terms of the state and federal constitutions, and the necessary implications derived therefrom; 24 Mich. 44; s. c. 9 Am. Rep. 108; 142 U. S. 366. Those matters which are of concern to the state at large, although exercised within defined limits, such as the administration of justice, the preservation of the public peace, and the like, are held to be under legislative control; while the enforcement of municipal by-laws proper, the establishment of gas works, of water works, the construction of sewers, and the like, are matters which pertain to the municipality as distinguished from the state at large; 69 Ill. 326; 62 Mo. 370; 51 Cal. 15; 28 Mich. 228; s. c. 15 Am. Rep. 202; 97 U. S. 284; 61 Fed. Rep. 782. See 160 Pa. 511.

As ordinarily constituted, municipal corporations have a dual character, the one governmental, legislative, or public; the other, proprietary or private. In their public capacity a responsibility exists in the performance of acts for the public benefit, and in this respect they are merely a part of the machinery of government of the sovereignty creating them, and the authority of the state is supreme. But in their proprietary or private character their powers are supposed to be conferred not from considerations of state, but for the private advantage of the particular corporation as a distinct legal personality.

"The functions of such municipalities are obviously two-fold: (1) political, discretionary, and legislative, being such public franchises as are conferred upon them for the government of their inhabitants and the ordering of their public officers, and to be exercised solely for the public good, rather than their special advantage; (2) those ministerial specified duties which are assumed in consideration of the privileges conferred by their charter." 17 Gratt. 375. And it was said by Folger, J., in 62 N. Y. 160, "There are two kinds of duties which are imposed upon a municipal corporation. One is of that kind which arises from the grant of a special power in the exercise of which the municipality is as a legal individual; the other is of that kind which arises or is implied from the use of political rights under the general law, in the exercise of which it is sovereign. The former power is private and is used for private purposes; the latter is public and is used for public purposes; the former is not held by the municipality as one of the political divisions of the state, the latter is." "The distinction is quite clear and well settled and the process of separation practicable. To this end regard should be had, not so much to the nature and character of the various powers conferred, as to the object and purpose of the legislature in conferring them. If granted for public purposes exclusively they belong to the corporate body in its public, political, or municipal character; but if the grant was for purposes of private advantage and emolument, though the public may derive a common benefit therefrom, the corporation quoad hoc is to be regarded as a private company." 3 Hill 531.

As to powers of the non-public nature and as to property acquired thereunder, and contracts made with reference thereto, they are to be considered as quoad hoc private corporations; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 66; 102 Mass. 489; 122 id. 359; s. c. 23 Am. Rep. 332. And in like manner, as such corporations they are liable for the misuser or nonuser of their powers of this nature. A city is liable for wrongfully permitting the accumulation of sewage in a cellar, thereby causing the death of a person who lived in the house over such cellar; 21 App. Div. N. Y. 311. But counties, though by modern legislation frequently constituted municipal corporations, are permitted greater immunity from liability for negligence than cities. On this principle in a recent case it was held that the act of 1892, declaring a county to be a municipal corporation, did not change the common-law rule as to its non-liability in such cases, and, consequently, it was not liable for personal injuries sustained by an individual by reason of a defective bridge which it was bound to maintain; 154 N. Y. 675. If a municipal corporation becomes indebted, the rights of creditors cannot be impaired by any subsequent legislative enactment; 4 Wall. 535; 19 Wis. 468; 100 U. S. 374; but authority to a city to borrow money, and to tax all the property therein to pay the debt thus incurred, does not necessarily deprive the state of the power to modify taxation, if the rights of creditors be not thereby impaired; 27 Ohio St. 426; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 321. So, also, as trustee for the general public, the legislature has control over the public property and the subordinate rights of municipal corporations. It can authorize a railroad company to occupy the streets of a city without its consent and without payment; 31 N. Y. 164; 13 La. Ann. 326. It can direct a municipal corporation to build a bridge over a navigable watercourse within its limits, or appoint agents of its own to build it, and empower them to create a loan for the purpose, payable by the corporation; 58 Pa. 320; 17 Wall. 322; 104 Mass. 236; 47 Md. 145. The legislature may compel a city to pay its bonds, by taxation, but not to pay an obligation for which no consideration had been received; 95 U. S. 644. In the absence of constitutional restraint, it may extend the boundaries of an existing municipal corporation without the consent, or even against the remonstrance, of the majority or of all of the inhabitants of the existing corporation; 73 Tex. 538. And in general the legislature may, by subsequent legislation, validate acts of a municipal corporation otherwise invalid; 97 U. S. 687; Cooley, Const. Lim. 371; 101 U. S. 196. The legislature may also interfere with the administration of public charitable trusts by municipal corporations; 64 Pa. 169; but not with those of a private character where a contract has been constituted; 11 Me. 118; 4 Wheat. 518; 53 N. H. 575. A contract made by a city with a water works company, so far as the city's rights are concerned, is subject to the will of the legislature, and a statute may authorize a change therein; 142 U. S. 79; and property acquired by it for the purpose of furnishing water is not held by it as a private corporation so as to prevent the legislature from modifying the management of it; 7 Houst. 44.

See as to special legislation, as applied to corporate powers of municipal corporations, 35 Cent. L. J. 266; as to the power of the legislature over the streets of municipalities, 26 Am. L. Rev. 520; as to municipal power of taxation, 35 Cent. L. J. 227.

"A municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: first, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation, not simply convenient but indispensable." 70 N. C. 14; 93 Ill. 236; 3 Wall. 320; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp., 4th ed. § 89; 22 Am. Rep. 261; 134 U. S. 198; 145 id. 135; 78 Ga. 683; 130 Ind. 149. No powers can be implied except such as are essential to the purposes of the corporations as created; they can bind the people and property only to the extent of their powers; 108 U. S. 110; 13 Ore. 17. Where discretionary powers are granted, the corporation thereby acquires a control and discretion as absolute as that originally possessed by the legislature; 5 Cow. 541; 7 Mart. (La.) N. S. 5; 78 Ill. 550; 37 N. J. L. 146; a grant of express power carries with it the right to determine the mode of its execution; 101 N. Y. 132; 58 Wis. 403; and its discretion in that respect should not be interfered with by courts except where it is clearly abused; 47 Mich. 115. Acts in excess of the express or implied powers are void; 114 Ill. 659. See as to municipal powers, express and implied, 1 L. R. A. 169; 2 id. 54.

A strict, rather than a liberal, construction of the powers of a municipal corporation is adopted; 43 Ia. 524; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 261; 23 How. 435; 31 Mo. App. 237; and only such can be implied as are essential to the corporate objects and purposes: 108 U. S. 110; 79 Ia. 587; 13 Ore. 17. But, bearing this in mind, it is also true that a municipal corporation may do many acts not expressly authorized by its charter, and it has been said that "it is a mistake to assume that municipal corporations should not keep abreast with the progress and improvements of the age;" 160 Pa. 511. This fairly expresses the elasticity which characterizes the decisions with respect to their implied powers. The functions of such corporations are so well understood that there is usually little difficulty in deciding whether a particular power is essential to its purpose or necessarily implied. These powers have been recognized:—To grade and pave streets; 84 Pa. 487; to establish and maintain a sewerage system; 2 Grant 291; 21 Ohio St. 499; provide for a water supply and an electric light plant; 91 Wis. 131; erect public buildings; 3 Allen 9; prevent damage by fire; 7 Cow. 349; 28 Mo. 488; and to that end appropriate money to fire companies; 27 Vt. 70; 26 Ga. 678; to make pleasure drives around public squares; 171 Pa. 542; regulate poles and electric wires; 148 Pa. 117; even to the extent of requiring them to be placed underground; 6 Am. Elec. Cas. 64 (it is settled that this power may be exercised by the legislature in the exercise of the sovereign power of the state; 145 U. S. 175; 107 N. Y. 593; 125 id. 641; 38 Fed. Rep. 552); so it may make police regulations; 61 Ga. 572; 5 Wash. 308; 93 Mich. 135; offer a reward for the detection of criminals; 7 Gray 374; 92 U. S. 73; contra, 57 Me. 174; appropriate public money for a police pension fund; 182 Pa. 373; or, where it will promote the interests of the inhabitants generally, for a survey for a ship canal: 183 Pa. 202; issue bonds in aid of a railway; see BONDS; and it was held that the city of Philadelphia had power to send the Liberty bell, owned by it absolutely, to the Atlanta Exposition; 4 D. R. Pa. 523.

Power in municipal corporations is denied:—To provide for fireworks on the fourth of July; 116 N. C. 296; or to prohibit screens in bar rooms; 135 Ind. 466; or issue commercial paper; 47 Ill. App. 254; 121 U. S. 165. See 110 id. 192. The municipal authorities may provide not only for the immediate, but also for the prospective, needs of the city, and may make temporary appropriation, as by lease for private use of such public property as is not presently needed; 37 Wis. 400; 25 Fed. Rep. 202; 131 Mass. 23.

A subject of the utmost importance is the power of a municipal corporation with respect to nuisances. Without legislative authority it cannot authorize a common nuisance; 9 Houst. 396; nor by ordinance prohibit, as one, the fencing by a railroad of its right of way; 30 Ore. 478; but in the exercise of a granted power to suppress nuisances it may invoke the aid of a court of equity; 66 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 815. In the Oregon case just cited, the subject was examined and the conclusion reached that even authority by charter to declare what shall constitute a nuisance does not authorize a city by ordinance to declare a particular use of property a nuisance, unless such use is such by common law or statute.

See 36 L. R. A. 593; 39 id. 520, 609, 649; for full annotations covering the entire ground of municipal power in regard to nuisances. See NUISANCE.

The power to borrow money and issue bonds therefor is not included among the implied powers of a municipal corporation, but when a debt has been lawfully incurred, it is not prohibited from issuing bonds for its payment; 84 Pa. 487; 51 Fed. Rep. 165; but see 19 Wall. 468; 5 Dill. 165.

They possess the incidental or implied power to borrow money and issue bonds therefor in order to carry out their express powers, or any affecting their legitimate objects; 7 Ohio 31; 11 Wis. 470.

The power to borrow money or to create a debt should not be implied against the spirit and policy clearly manifested by contemporaneous legislation as well as by the organic law in force when the legislation giving such power was enacted; 67 Tex. 519. It can only be implied from a special duty imposed, for the discharge of which it is necessary; the power to raise money does not include the power to borrow; 119 N. Y. 289.

It was generally held that where express power is given to borrow money it includes the power to issue negotiable bonds or other securities to the lender; 1 Wall. 272; 48 Ill. 423; 15 Ind. 395; 3 Wall. 654; 34 Pa. 496. But, in cases very much discussed, it has been held by the United States supreme court that the power conferred upon a municipal corporation to borrow money or to incur indebtedness merely authorized it to issue the usual evidences of indebtedness, but not "to issue for sale, in open market, a bond, as a commercial security, with immunity, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, from equitable defences;" Merrill v. Monticello, 138 U. S. 673. This case, it was claimed, was plainly at variance with Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. 654, and Mitchell v. Burlington, 4 Wall. 270; though it did not in terms overrule them. But that they were considered overruled by the later cases was expressly stated in 144 U. S. 173, which was re-argued before eight judges, by reason of the death of Bradley, J., pending its decision, and from the final decision in which Harlan, Brewer, and Brown, JJ., dissented. The decision was squarely to the effect that the power to borrow money did not authorize the issue of negotiable bonds, and that "even a bona fide holder of them cannot have a right to recover upon them or their coupons." See a critical review of these cases, 5 Harv. L. Rev. 157; 6 id. 58; BONDS; MUNICIPAL BONDS.

Where a statute confers power to borrow money and fixes the limit of the amount which can be borrowed, a municipality cannot exceed that amount under power conferred by a general provision to borrow money for any purpose within its discretion; 107 U. S. 68.

By constitutional provision in several of the states the legislature is required to restrict municipal corporations in their power to borrow money, contract debts, or pledge their credit. These provisions vary, but are most commonly in the nature of a restriction of possible indebtedness to a certain percentage of the assessed value of property; see 176 Pa. 80; and for a note collecting authorities on the municipal power to borrow money, see 7 L. R. A. 759. Constitutional limitations on state indebtedness apply to the state alone and not to her political or municipal subdivisions; 13 Cal. 175; 19 Ill. 406; 2 Ohio 607. As to both constitutional and statutory limitations, see 23 L. R. A. 402.

There can be no union of public and private funds or credit, nor of that which is produced by such funds or credit; 6 Ohio Dec. 1; and a statute authorizing the union of public and private capital or credit in any enterprise whatever is unconstitutional; 23 Ohio St. 78; 37 id. 97; but a joinder of a city with a county in purchasing a building for a city hall has been upheld; 2 Cal. 289; where it was held that they could take as tenants in common.

Such corporations have not the power of taxation, unless such is conferred by the legislature, and when it is so conferred the statute must be strictly construed; 82 Va. 324; 83 Ala. 608; 99 N. C. 210. A grant of the power of taxation by the legislature to a municipal corporation is subject to revocation, modification, and control by the legislature of the state; 130 U. S. 189.

While the power to make laws cannot be delegated, the creation of municipalities exercising local self-government cannot be held to trench upon that rule; 129 U. S. 141. See LEGISLATIVE POWER. So from necessity, these corporations exercise a large measure of police power (q. v.). A city council may by ordinance authorize police officers to arrest without warrant persons engaged in a breach of the peace, and an officer who, from the outside of a house, hears a disturbance or disorderly conduct within it, may, acting in good faith under such authority, enter the house and arrest the person guilty thereof as being the inmate of a disorderly house; 95 Wis. 492.

The delegation of power to municipal councils to determine between alternative methods for payment of assessments for municipal improvements is authorized by a constitutional provision directing the legislature to provide for municipal corporations; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 915.

Delegations of power to municipal corporations have been held valid to provide for the increase of justices in proportion to population, and authorizing the appointment of the additional justices by county commissioners; 45 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 357; allowing existing municipal corporations to elect to continue under their old charter or adopt the general incorporation law; 72 Miss. 950; authorizing a township committee to determine what territory shall be included in a proposed city; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 858; authorizing cities of a given class to make laws for their local self-government, subject to the general laws of the state; 11 Wash. 435; 13 id. 17.

The delegation, by the state to a city, of authority to act for it in granting franchises to build and operate street railways, does not include the power to institute and maintain actions for their forfeiture for misuse or abuse, and such forfeiture must be decreed in an action in the name of the state; 95 Wis. 39.

The delegated power of legislation involved in the authority of municipal corporations to enact ordinances springs naturally from the nature and functions of these corporations as an instrumentality of local government. Such ordinances, by the legislative body of the municipality, are the usual means of expressing the corporate will and enacting municipal laws and regulations. Such regulations may be by resolution as well as by ordinance where the charter is silent on the subject; 148 U. S. 591; 50 Wis. 204; 70 Ia. 105; 130 Ind. 149; 35 Pa. 231; 54 N. J. L. 325; if, however, the charter requires action by ordinance, a resolution is ineffective; 55 N. J. L. 285; 54 id. 474: 32 Kan. 456; and where an ordinance is required in a particular form it cannot be repealed by resolution; 89 Tex. 79; so even if an ordinance has been passed, where a resolution would have been sufficient, the latter is not sufficient to repeal it; 88 Ia. 558. Where the charter authorized action by ordinance, a resolution is sufficient if adopted and approved by the mayor with such formalities as an ordinance would require; 49 Mo. App. 612; and where an ordinance requires the approval of the mayor, a resolution not presented to him is unavailing; 113 Mo. 395. See ORDINANCE.

The principles upon which rests the right to enact penal ordinances is thus stated: (1) Unless forbidden by the constitution, the legislature can clothe municipal government with power to prohibit and punish any act made penal by the state laws, when done within the municipal limits. (2) Such an ordinance is not invalid, merely because it prescribes the same penalties as the state law for the commission or omission of the same act. (3) It is no valid objection to such an ordinance, that the offender may be tried and punished for the same act under both the ordinance and the state law. (4) A conviction or acquittal by the municipal courts, under such an ordinance, is no bar to a prosecution under the state law. (5) Such an ordinance is not invalid, merely because the trial thereunder is without a jury. (6) Nor is it invalid, because it excepts from its operation certain business pursuits that are not excepted from the operation of the state law on the same subject; 34 Fla. 440. To the same effect is id. 504. See 1 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. N. S. 669, 869.

Ordinances must not only not conflict with constitutional or general statute law, but they must be reasonable. It is, however, said that what may be reasonable under ordinary circumstances, as a prohibition against driving on the street at a greater speed than six miles an hour, would be unreasonable and void as applied to the members of a salvage corps or fire patrol responding to an alarm; 64 Minn. 287. An ordinance providing that "no person shall on any street or public place, or on land adjacent thereto, sing or recite any profane or obscene song or ballad, or use any profane or obscene language," was held unreasonable and therefore invalid; [1896] 1 Q. B. 290. It is suggested that the real ground of objection in this case was that the words "or on land adjacent thereto," were too wide, and that the other objection alone ought to be untenable because the use of profane or obscene language necessarily implies annoyance; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 327. But an ordinance which conforms to a definite statutory grant of power cannot be set aside as unreasonable; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 857. A statutory power to make ordinances regulating trade does not warrant one making it unlawful to carry on a lawful trade in a lawful manner; [1896] A. C. 88.

Municipal ordinances must be specific and definite, and they will not be construed as forbidding an act by implication; 7 Mart. 486; and, like a statute, they may be valid in some of their provisions and invalid as to others; 84 Ala. 17; 98 id. 134; but where the invalid provisions are inseparably connected with the valid ones, the ordinance is void; 54 N. J. L. 75: 49 Ill. App. 60. When a city council is vested with full power over a subject, and the mode of exercising it is not limited by the charter, it may exercise it in any manner most convenient; 16 Ore. 334. A city ordinance in conflict with the general policy and laws of the state is void; 45 La. Ann. 34. See ORDINANCE.

With respect to the liabilities of municipal corporations it may be said generally that as parties to a contract where they act qua private corporations, they are liable on their contract, and contracting parties are liable to them in the same manner as private persons and corporations are. A city can bind parties by such contracts only as it is authorized by its charter to make; 116 N. Y. 167. Those who contract with them are protected where their contracts are made according to law; 71 Mich. 227; 11 Colo. 483; and those who deal with them must exercise reasonable diligence to ascertain whether there be legally provided the funds from which the obligation to be created may be met; and the public is not estopped from setting up the illegality of the obligation by the fact that the other party has acted in reliance upon its validity; 50 N. J. L. 665.

Contracts may be entered into by the officers of a corporation, binding upon it, without the use of the corporate seal; 12 Mich. 138. Without express legislative authority, a municipality cannot act as surety or guarantee; 19 Ia. 199. Where the statute provides that no city officer should be interested in a municipal contract, and that any such contract contrary to that provision should be void, a contract with a school director for street work was held void; 98 Cal. 427; and the same is true if the interest of the officer is indirect merely, as the member of a contracting firm or corporation; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 578; such contract may be ratified by subsequent municipal action after the officer has ceased to be such, for it is a new contract; 132 Ind. 558. Even if there be no penal statute prohibiting the execution of such contract, it is void on grounds of public policy, but so long as it is executory it is voidable merely, and if entered into in good faith for a proper purpose and the city has received the benefit, there may be a recovery on a quantum meruit; 1 Kan. App. 35. For cases on the general subject of the liability of municipal corporations on contracts, see 6 L. R. A. 318, note.

The liability of private corporations for the misfeasance, or negligent nonfeasance, of its officers, is affected primarily by the distinction between their public functions as an instrumentality of government, and their private relations as a corporation transacting ordinary business. See supra. Within the sphere of the former they are entitled to exemption from liability, inasmuch as the corporation is a part of the government, and to that extent its officers are public officers, and as such, entitled to the protection of this principle; but within the sphere of the latter, they drop the badges of their governmental offices and stand forth as the delegates of a private corporation in the exercise of private franchises, and it is amenable as such to the fundamental doctrine of liability for the acts of a servant; 17 Gratt. 375. Although the difference between the two kinds of powers is plain and marked, yet, as they approximate each other, it is sometimes difficult to ascertain the exact line of distinction. All that can be done with safety is to determine, as each case arises, under which class it falls; 5 N. Y. 369.

Where a city or town is exercising the judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by its charter, or is discharging a duty imposed solely for the benefit of the public, it incurs no liability for the negligence of its officers, though acting under color of office, unless some statute (expressly or by necessary implication) subjects the corporation to pecuniary responsibility for such negligence; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 965; but where such corporations are not in the exercise of their purely governmental functions, but are exercising, as corporations, private franchises, powers, and privileges which belong to them for their ordinary corporate benefit, or dealing with property held by them for their corporate advantage, gain, or emolument, though enuring ultimately to the benefit of the general public, then they become liable for the negligent exercise of such powers precisely as though they were individuals; 122 Mass. 344; 36 N. H. 284; 17 How. 161; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 966.

The obligation and duty of a municipal corporation in the construction of public work is only the exercise of reasonable care; it does not insure against damage; 120 N. Y. 164. The inquiry must be whether the department or officer whose action or non-action is complained of is part of the machinery for carrying on the municipal government, and whether it was then engaged in discharging a duty resting upon it; 116 N. Y. 558. To constitute negligence in such actions, there must be a duty imperfectly discharged; 81 N. Y. 21; 8 C. B. N. S. 568; and if the duty is owed to the public, there is no action by an individual to whom the duty was not specially owed; 34 Md. 265; 8 Cow. 153; 44 N. H. 246; 43 Conn. 562. As illustrating the effect of their two-fold character, municipal corporations have been held liable for injuries resulting from negligence in the management of a public building rented out for profit; 102 Mass. 499; otherwise, if let gratuitously; 128 id. 561. So they are liable for torts of their agents amounting to the negligent breach of municipal duty; 22 Pa. 54. Upon this theory rests the exception to the general rule of exemption from liability for negligence in performance of a public duty, recognized in many states, as to defective highways; 24 Ala. 112; see 5 L. R. A. 143, 253; 10 id. 734; as is also in many jurisdictions the liability for defective drains and sewers; 78 Cal. 588; 1 L. R. A. 296; 7 id. 156; but it was held that there was no liability for damage by fire resulting from failure to keep fire plugs, etc., in order; 78 Ga. 241; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 341; or from not preventing the erection of a wooden building within the fire limits; 72 Mich. 278.

There is no liability for omission to exercise discretionary powers: 107 Ill. 334; 56 Vt. 228; there must be a corporate duty imposed; 76 N. Y. 506; 79 Ind. 491; L. R. 2 Q. B. 534; as, for example, a city is not liable for failure of its police to prevent crime which is a public duty, as distinguished from a strictly corporate duty; 1 Marvel, Del. 5. But if the corporation receives a benefit, it may be liable; 126 Mass. 324. It is then the general rule that they are not liable for misfeasance or nonfeasance of their agents. The cases on this point are very numerous.

The municipality has been held not liable for injuries resulting from negligence of a physician in charge of a pest-house; 65 Me. 402; see 1 L. R. A. 844; or for tortious acts of agents in their nature unlawful; 90 Mo. 377; 79 Me. 343; as a constable making an unlawful sale; 100 N. Y. 577; for negligence of an officer in whose selection there was no negligence; 34 Ala. 469; or of officers selected under a statute independently of municipal control; 71 Ill. 357; 17 Gratt. 382; see 1 L. R. A. 844; for negligence of police; 113 Pa. 269; unless there is statutory liability, express or implied; 89 Mo. 208; or of firemen; 34 Minn. 402; or of a civil engineer in establishing a grade for the benefit of an individual for whom he was bound to do it on payment of a fee; 69 Ia. 541; for damages resulting from the firing of a cannon under a license from the mayor authorized by ordinance; 148 Mass. 578; for the publication of defamatory matter contained in an official report of an investigating committee duly selected; 159 Mass. 434; for the wrongful act of its officers in closing an exhibition with intent to injure the owner thereof; 6 C. C. App. 627; see 76 Hun 390; for failure of its officers to provide by special tax a fund to pay street grade warrants; 16 Wash. 698. See 3 L. R. A. 257, note; MANDAMUS; QUASI CORPORATIONS.

Municipal corporations may be dissolved in England; (1) by act of parliament; Co. Litt. 176, n.; (2) by the loss of an integral part; 9 Gill & J. 365; (3) by a surrender of their franchises; 6 Term 277; (4) by forfeiture of their charter; 6 Beav. 220; 76 Ill. 419.

In the United States these modes of dissolution are not applicable, there can be no dissolution except by an act of the legislature which created the corporation. See 113 Ill. 491; 72 Tex. 182; 102 U. S. 472; 116 id. 289; 98 id. 258.

The change of name does not dissolve a municipal corporation; 7 Wall. 1; 93 U. S. 266; but the power of so changing exists only in the legislature.

Nor does the failure of the inhabitants of a municipality to elect officers operate as a dissolution of it; 71 Tex. 65; 72 id. 182; nor is a municipal charter forfeited by mere non-user for any period of time; 98 Ala. 358.

Upon the division of a municipal corporation into two separate towns, each is entitled to hold in severalty the public property within its limits; 2 Wend. 159. See 40 Minn. 13.

In actions generally, the original minutes or records of a corporation are competent evidence of its acts and proceedings; 6 Wend. 651. It is competent for the legislature to delegate to municipal corporations the power to make by-laws and ordinances which have, when authorized, the force, in favor of the municipality and against the persons bound thereby, of laws passed by the legislature of the state; 44 Ia. 508; s. c. 24 Am. Rep. 756; but ordinances cannot enlarge or change the charter by enlarging, diminishing, or varying its powers; 22 How. 422; 12 Wall. 349. See DELEGATION; POLICE POWER.

MUNICIPAL COURTS. At common law, municipal corporations frequently enjoyed the franchise of holding a court, and the franchise being a public right, could not be lost by non-user. A. & E. Encyc. L. See Dillon, Mun. Corp., 3d ed. § 424; 4 D. P. C. 562.

In the United States, in many of the larger cities, there are courts so designated, with statutory jurisdiction in criminal or civil cases, or both, usually limited not only in amount, but by the requirement that suits can only be instituted against residents, and crimes prosecuted which are committed within the city.

MUNICIPAL LAW. In contradistinction to international law, the system of law proper to any single nation or state. It is the rule or law by which a particular district, community, or nation is governed. 1 Bla. Com 44.

Municipal law contrasts with international law, in that it is a system of law proper to a single nation, state, or community. In any one state the municipal law of another state is foreign law. See FOREIGN LAW. A conflict of laws arises where a case arising in one state involves foreign persons or interests, and the foreign and the domestic laws do not agree as to the proper rule to be applied. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

The various provinces of municipal law are characterized according to the subjects with which they respectively treat: as, criminal or penal law, civil law, military law, and the like. Constitutional law, commercial law, parliamentary law, and the like, are departments of the general province of civil law, as distinguished from criminal and military law.

MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE. A statute or regulation enacted or adopted by a municipal corporation for the proper conduct of its affairs or the government of its inhabitants. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION; ORDINANCE.

MUNICIPAL SECURITIES. The evidences of indebtedness issued by cities, towns, counties, townships, school districts, and other such territorial divisions of the state. There are two general classes: (1) municipal warrants, orders, or certificates; (2) municipal negotiable bonds. A. & E. Encyc. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

MUNICIPALITY. The body of officers taken collectively, belonging to a city, who are appointed to manage its affairs and defend its interests.

MUNICIPIUM. In Roman Law. A free town which retained its original right of self-government, but whose inhabitants also acquired certain rights of Roman citizens. Morey, Rom. L. 51. See MUNICIPAL.

MUNIMENTS. The instruments of writing and written evidences which the owner of lands, possessions, or inheritances has, by which he is enabled to defend the title of his estate. Termes de la Ley; Co. 3d Inst. 170. Cathedrals, collegiate churches, etc., sometimes have a muniment house, where the seal, evidences, charter, etc., of such cathedral are kept. Cowel.

MUNUS. A gift; an office; a benefice, or feud. A gladiatorial show or spectacle. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange.

MURAGE. A toll formerly levied in England for repairing or building public walls.

MURAL MONUMENTS. Monuments made in walls.

Owing to the difficulty or impossibility of removing them, secondary evidence may be given of inscriptions on walls, fixed tables, gravestones, and the like. 2 Stark. 274.

MURDER. In Criminal Law. The wilful killing of any subject whatever, with malice aforethought, whether the person slain shall be an Englishman or a foreigner. Hawk. Pl. C. b. 1, c. 13, s. 3. Russell says, the killing of any person under the king's peace, with malice prepense or aforethought, either express, or implied by law. 1 Russ. Cr. 421; 5 Cush. 304; Archb. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 727 note; Whart. Cr. L. 303. When a person of sound mind and discretion unlawfully killeth any reasonable creature in being, and under the king's peace, with malice aforethought, either express or implied. Co. 3d Inst. 47.

The latter definition, which has been adopted by Blackstone, 4 Com. 195; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law, 724, and others, has been severely criticised. What, it has been asked, are sound mind and discretion? What has soundness of memory to do with the act? be it ever so imperfect, how does it effect the guilt? If discretion is necessary, can the crime ever be committed? for is it not the highest indiscretion in a man to take the life of another, and thereby expose his own? If the person killed be an idiot or a newborn infant, is he a reasonable creature? Who is in the king's peace? What is malice aforethought? Can there be malice aforethought? Livingston, Pen. Law, 186. It is, however, apparent that some of the criticisms are merely verbal, and others are answered by the construction given in the various cases to the requirements of the definition. See, especially, 5 Cush. 304.

According to Coke's definition, there must be, first, sound mind and memory in the agent. By this is understood there must be a will and legal discretion. Second, an actual killing; but it is not necessary that it should be caused by direct violence; it is sufficient if the acts done apparently endanger life, and eventually prove fatal; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 31, s. 4; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 431; 1 Ashm. 289; 9 C. & P. 356. Third, the party killed must have been a reasonable being, alive in the king's peace. To constitute a birth, so as to make the killing of a child murder, the whole body must be detached from that of the mother; but if it has come fully forth, but is still connected by the umbilical cord, such killing will be murder; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1722, note. Fœticide would not be such a killing; he must have been in rerum natura. Fourth, malice, either express or implied. It is this circumstance which distinguishes murder from every description of homicide. 83 Ala. 26. See MALICE.

Murder may be committed as the result of some illegal act, whether the design to take life is actually present or not; 30 S. C. 74. Wilful omission of duty resulting in death is murder, where the exposure or neglect clearly shows danger to life; 8 Mont. 95. It being contrary to the law of the land to commit suicide, if two persons meet together and agree so to do, and one of them dies, the other is guilty of murder; 10 Crim. L. Mag. 862. One who fires with deliberate purpose of killing A., and kills B., is as guilty as if he had killed A.; 160 Pa. 451; 69 Me. 163; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas.

568; but see 100 Mich. 518; obstructing a railroad track, by which a human being is killed, is murder in the first degree; 59 Ala. 98.

In some of the states, by legislative enactments, murder has been divided into degrees. In Pennsylvania, by the act of April 22, 1794, "all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, or by lying in wait, or by any other kind of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, shall be deemed murder of the first degree; and all other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder of the second degree; and the jury before whom any person indicted for murder shall be tried shall, if they find the person guilty thereof, ascertain in their verdict whether it be murder of the first or second degree; but if such person shall be convicted by confession, the court shall proceed, by examination of witnesses, to determine the degree of the crime, and give sentence accordingly." Many decisions have been made under this act, to which the reader is referred. See Whart. Cr. Law.

Similar enactments have been made in many other states; 3 Yerg. 283; 6 Rand. 721; 23 Ind. 231; 49 N. H. 399; Wright 20; 8 Mont. 110; 97 Mo. 31; 73 Ia. 32; 25 Tex. App. 631; 32 Fla. 462; 77 Va. 284; 101 Mass. 1.

The power of a state to punish crimes is limited to such as are committed within its territory, and consequently it cannot provide for the punishment, as crimes, of acts committed beyond the state boundary; 2 Park. Cr. Rep. 590; 36 Miss. 593; Cooley, Const. Lim. [128]; but if the ultimate and injurious result of an unlawful act committed outside of a state is effected within it, the perpetrator may be punished by it as an offender; id.; and it was held constitutional to punish in Michigan a homicide committed by a mortal blow in Canada waters from which death resulted in the state; 8 Mich. 320. See Cooley, Const. Lim. [128]. See also 16 Wis. 398; 35 U. C. 603. A murder committed on a United States battleship lying within territory ceded to the United States by New York, is triable in the United States court for the Southern District of New York; 84 Fed. Rep. 622. See JURISDICTION.

A question much discussed is whether a person who commits murder may take property by will or descent from his victim. It has been held that a child who murdered a parent was not thereby debarred of his heirship; 170 Pa. 203; 6 Ohio C. C. 357; so of a father who murdered his daughter; 41 Neb. 631, reversing 31 id. 61; a woman who murdered her husband; [1892] 1 Q. B. 147; and one who was an accessory to her husband's murder was held entitled to dower; 100 N. C. 240. In one case the contrary view was taken, and it was held that the devise was not rendered void, but equity might interfere to deprive the devisee of the fruits of his crime, but that his petition to compel payment of his distributive share would not be heard until after his trial on the indictment; 115 N. Y. 506. Neither the beneficiary in a life insurance policy, who has feloniously killed the assured, nor his assignee can recover on it; 117 U. S. 591. This was also held in [1892] 1 Q. B. 147, supra, where, although the wife could not take the money as a beneficiary, it passed to her as the legal representative of the assured as part of his estate.

See address of Judge Leslie W. Russell before the New York State Bar Association, Jan., 1898, reviewing these cases; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1390.

MURDRUM. In Old English Law. During the times of the Danes, and afterwards till the reign of Edward III., murdrum was the killing of a man in a secret manner; and in that it differed from simple homicide.

When a man was thus killed, and he was unknown, by the laws of Canute he was presumed to be a Dane, and the vill was compelled to pay forty marks for his death. After the conquest, a similar law was made in favor of Frenchmen, which was abolished by 3 Edw. III.

The fine formerly imposed in England upon a person who had committed homicide per infortunium or se defendendo. Prin. Pen. Law 219, note.

MURORUM OPERATIO. The service of work and labor done by inhabitants and adjoining tenants in building or repairing the walls of a city or castle. Cowel.

MURTHRUM. In Old Scotch Law. Murder.

MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The acts of congress of February 3, 1831, and July 8, 1870, authorize the granting of a copyright for a musical composition. A question was formerly agitated whether a composition published on a single sheet of paper was to be considered a book: and it was decided in the affirmative; 2 Campb. 28, n.; 11 East 244. Not only an original composition, but any substantially new arrangement or adaptation of an old piece of music, is a proper subject of copyright; Taney, Dec. 72; L. R. 2 C. P. 340: s. c. 3 id. 223; 2 Blatchf. 39; 7 C. B. 4; Drone, Copyright 175. See COPYRIGHT.

MUSTER. To collect together and exhibit soldiers and their arms. To employ recruits, and put their names down in a book to enroll them. In the latter sense the term implies that the persons mustered are not already in the service; 8 Allen 480. The same term is applied to a list of soldiers in the service of a government. Articles of War, R. S. § 1342.

MUSTER-ROLL. A written document containing the names, ages, quality, place of residence, and, above all, place of birth, of every person of the ship's company. It is of great use in ascertaining the ships's neutrality. Marsh. Ins. p. 407; Jacobsen, Sea Laws 161; 2 Wash. C. C. 201.

MUSTIZO. A name given to the issue of an Indian and a negro. Dudl. S. C. 174.

MUTATION. In French Law. This term is synonymous with change, and is particularly applied to designate the change which takes place in the property of a thing in its transmission from one person to another. Permutation therefore happens when the owner of the thing sells, exchanges, or gives it. It is nearly synonymous with transfer. Merlin, Répert.

MUTATION OF LIBEL. In Practice. An amendment allowed to a libel, by which there is an alteration of the substance of the libel, as by propounding a new cause of action, or asking one thing instead of another. Law, Eccl. Law 165–167; 1 Paine 435; 1 Gall. 123; 1 Wheat. 261.

MUTATIS MUTANDIS (Lat.). The necessary changes. This is a phrase of frequent practical occurrence, meaning that matters or things are generally the same, but to be altered when necessary, as to names, offices, and the like.

MUTE (mutus). When a prisoner upon his arraignment totally refuses to answer, insists upon mere frivolous pretences, or refuses to put himself upon the country, after pleading not guilty, he is said to stand mute.

In the case of the United States v. Hare et al., Circuit Court, Maryland Dist., May sessions, 1818, the prisoner standing mute was considered as if he had pleaded not guilty. See 19 Blatch. 251; 13 Fed. Rep. 27; 48 Ark. 39. In consequence an act of congress of March 8, 1825, provided that if any person, in case of an offence not capital, shall stand mute, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty. A similar provision is to be found in the laws of many states, and, in England, the same practice is adopted by the court.

In former times, in England, the terrible punishment or sentence of penance or peine (probably a corrupted abbreviation of prisone) fort et dure was inflicted where a prisoner would not plead, and stood obstinately mute. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE. Prisoners sometimes suffered death in this way to save their property from forfeiture. In treason, petit felony, and misdemeanors, however, wilfully standing mute was equivalent to a conviction, and the same punishment might be imposed. Giles Corey, accused of witchcraft, was perhaps the only person pressed to death in America for refusing to plead. 3 Bancroft's Hist. U. S. 93. See DEAF AND DUMB.

MUTILATION. In Criminal Law. The depriving a man of the use of any of those limbs which may be useful to him in fight, the loss of which amounts to mayhem. 1 Bla. Com. 130. See MAYHEM.

MUTINY. In Criminal Law. The unlawful resistance of a superior officer, or the raising of commotions and disturbances on board of a ship against the authority of its commander, or in the army in opposition to the authority of the officers; a sedition; a revolt. See Whart. Cr. L. § 1876.

By the act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, it is enacted as follows: Article 22. Any officer or soldier, who begins, excites, or causes, or joins in, any mutiny or sedition in any troop or company in the service of the United States, or in any party, post, detachment, or guard, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as a court-martial shall direct. Article 23. Any officer or soldier who, being present at any mutiny or sedition, does not use his utmost endeavors to suppress the same, or, having knowledge of any intended mutiny, does not without delay give information thereof to his commanding officer, shall be punished by death, or suffer such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

And by the act for the better government of the navy of the United States, it is enacted as follows: Article 4. Any person in the naval service who makes, or attempts to make, any mutinous assembly, or, being witness to or present at any mutiny, does not do his utmost to suppress it, or knowing of any mutinous assembly, or of any intended mutiny, does not immediately communicate his knowledge to his superior or commanding officer, shall suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may adjudge. And any person as aforesaid who utters any seditious or mutinous words, or joins in or abets any combination to weaken the lawful authority of, or lessen the respect due to, his commanding officer, or treats his superior officer with contempt, or is disrespectful to him, while in the execution of his office, may be punished by such punishment as a court-martial may adjudge. R. S. § 1624.

Mutiny, revolt, and the endeavor to make a revolt or mutiny, on board merchant-vessels, are made criminal, and a punishment provided for them; R. S. § 4596; 2 Curt. C. C. 225; 1 Woodb. & M. 306; 2 Sumn. C. C. 582.

MUTINY ACT. In English Law. A statute, annually passed, to punish mutiny and desertion, and for the better payment of the army and their quarters. It was first passed 12th of April, 1689. The passage of this bill was the only provision for the payment of the army. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 416, 417, n. In 1879, the army discipline act, 42 and 43 Vict., s. c. 33, consolidated the provisions of the mutiny act with the articles of war.

MUTUAL ACCOUNTS. Such as contain mutual credits between the parties; or an existing credit on one side which constitutes a ground for credit on the other, or where there is an understanding that mutual debts shall be a set-off pro tanto, between the parties. 27 Ark. 343. Such accounts, of however long standing, are not barred by the statute of limitations, if there be any items within the prescribed limit; 6 Term 189; Ang. Lim. 138. See MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS; LIMITATIONS.

MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIA-

TIONS. See BENEFICIAL SOCIETIES; INSURANCE.

MUTUAL CONSENT. Mutual consent is of the essence of every contract, and therefore it must always exist, in legal contemplation, at the moment when the contract is made. See Add. Contr. 13. It never, however, is the subject of direct allegation or proof, partly because it is generally incapable of direct proof, and partly because every contract is made by acts performed. Proof of the necessary acts carries with it presumptive proof of mutual consent. Thus, if two separate agreements be drawn up, signed and sealed, each of them purporting to be a contract between A. and B., and the parties, intending to deliver one of the instruments, deliver the other by mistake, there is no contract made; Langd. Contr. 193. Where the plaintiff's acceptance of the defendant's offer inadvertently made a slight change in a date, there was no contract, because there had not been mutual consent; 4 Bing. 653. Mutual consent must extend to the consideration as well as to the promise; Langd. Contr. 82.

MUTUAL CREDITS. Credits given by two persons mutually, i. e. each giving credit to the other. It is a more extensive phrase than mutual debts. Thus, the sum credited by one may be due at once, that by the other payable in futuro; yet the credits are mutual, though the transaction would not come within the meaning of mutual debts; 7 Term 378. And it is not necessary that there should be intent to trust each other: thus, where an acceptance of A. came into the hands of B, who bought goods of A, not knowing the acceptance to be in B's hands, it was held a mutual credit; 3 Term 507, n.; 3 Ves. 65; 8 Taunt. 156, 499; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 179; 26 Barb. 310; 4 Gray 284; 9 N. J. Eq. 44; 7 D. & E. 378. See 85 N. Y. 590; 9 N. J. Eq. 49.

MUTUAL INSURANCE. That form of insurance in which each person insured becomes a member of the company, and the members reciprocally engage to indemnify each other against losses, any loss being met by an assessment laid upon all the members. See INSURANCE.

MUTUAL PROMISES. Promises simultaneously made by two parties to each other, each promise being the consideration of the other. Ans. Contr. 72; 1 Pars. Contr. 464; Hob. 88; 14 M. & W. 855; Add. Contr. 13. If one of the promises be voidable, it will yet be good consideration, but not if void; Story, Contr. § 81; 2 Steph. Com. 114.

MUTUALITY. Reciprocity; an acting in return. Webster, Dict.; Add. Contr. 622; 9th ed. 13, 14; 26 Md. 37. See 83 Ky. 371.

MUTUARY. A person who borrows personal chattels to be consumed by him and returned to the lender in kind; the person who receives the benefit arising from the contract of mutuum. Story, Bailm. § 47.

MUTUATUS. A loan of money. See Gilbert, Com. Pleas 5.

MUTUUM. A loan of personal chattels to be consumed by the borrower and to be returned to the lender in kind and quantity; as, a loan of corn, wine, or money which is to be used or consumed, and is to be replaced by other corn, wine, or money. Story, Bailm. § 228; Edw. Bailm. § 120; Add. Contr. 724. See LOAN FOR USE.

MYSTERY (said to be derived from the French mestier, now written metièr, a trade). A trade, art, or occupation. Co. 2d Inst. 668.

Masters frequently bind themselves in the indentures with their apprentices to teach them their art, trade, and mystery. See Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 23, s. 11.

MYSTIC TESTAMENT. A will placed in a sealed envelope. La. Civ. Code, art. 1567; 5 Mart. La. 182; Schoul. Wills. § 9; 5 La. 396.

N. E. I. See NON EST INVENTUS.

NAAM. See NAMIUM.

NABOB. Originally the governor of a province under the Mogul government of Hindostan, whence it became a mere title of any man of high rank, upon whom it was conferred without any office being attached. Wils. Gloss; Whart.

NAIF. See NEIF.

NAIL. A measure of length, equal to two inches and a quarter. See MEASURE.

NAIL COUSINS. See SIB-SHIP.

NAKED. This word is used in a metaphorical sense to denote that a thing is not complete, and for want of some quality it is either without power or it possesses a limited power. A naked contract is one made without consideration, and for that reason it is void. See CONSIDERATION. A naked authority is one given without any right in the agent, and wholly for the benefit of the principal. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1302. See NUDUM PACTUM.

NAKED TRUST. A dry or passive trust; one which requires no action on the part of the trustee, beyond turning over money or property to the cestui que trust. See TRUST.

NAKED TRUSTEE. See TRUSTEE.

NAM. Distress; seizure. Anc. Inst. Eng. See NAMIUM.

NAMATION. The act of distraining or taking a distress. Cowel. See NAMIUM.

NAME. One or more words used to distinguish a particular individual: as Socrates, Benjamin Franklin.

Names are Christian, as Benjamin, or surnames, as Franklin. One Christian name only is recognized in law; 1 Ld. Raym. 562; Bacon, Abr. Misnomer (A); 7 Cold. 69; 5 Johns. 84; though two or more names usually kept separate, as John and Peter, may undoubtedly be compounded, so as to form in contemplation of law but one; 5 Term 195. An initial is no part of a name. See INITIAL. Nor is the title junior (q. v.); nor the prefix Mrs.; 13 Vroom 69; 33 Ill. App. 109. But it has been held that where Lewis R. instead of Lewis S. was inserted in a writ of sci. fa. to revive a judgment, the writ was not notice to purchaser for value in a chain of title, in which Lewis S. was the actual name; 1 Sup. Ct. Pa. 198. See 140 Pa. 335.

The name of a corporation is said to be "the very being of the constitution;" Bac. Abr. Corp. (C); 30 Ala. 664; and in general a corporation must contract and sue and be sued in its corporate name; 8 Johns. 295; 19 id. 300; 4 Rand. 359.

In the name of a corporation, which frequently consists of several descriptive words, the transposition, omission, or alteration of some of them may make no essential difference in the sense; 10 N. H. 124; 1 B. & Ald. 699; 10 Mass. 360; see 87 Ga. 734; if there is no possibility of mistaking the identity of the corporation; 12 La. 444. See 20 Me. 41; 2 Va. Cas. 362; 16 Mass. 141; 12 S. & R. 389.

A corporation, like an individual, may take a name by reputation; 2 N. H. 310; 10 Mass. 360; or may acquire it by usage; it is not indispensable that the name should be given by the charter; 30 Ala. 664; see 2 McLean 195; and after its name has been changed, it may continue under the old name and thus, by usage, regain the latter and sue thereunder; 28 N. J. Eq. 90. But it is held that a change of corporate name requires statutory authority, whether done directly or by user, though it may acquire a name by user when not given at incorporation; 132 Ill. 32; such change does not in any way affect its identity or rights; and an action against it by its former name cannot be defeated by showing the change, if the membership remains the same; 83 Va. 768. When a corporation is sued, a mistake in the name, in words and syllables, but not in substance, will not be regarded, unless pleaded in abatement; but if the mistake be in substance, the suit cannot be regarded as against the corporation; 1 B. & P. 39. Where the name in a contract in suit differed from the name in the declaration, but the identity was apparent, the variance was held not to constitute a defence; 31 Me. 290. There is said to be a distinction between a misnomer which incorrectly names, but correctly describes, a corporation and the statement in the pleading of an entirely different party; the former is curable by amendment, the latter is not; 30 Ala. 650. A grant to a corporation by the wrong name is good if the corporation really intended be apparent; 2 Kent 292; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 179; so of a contract; 6 S. & R. 12; and of a gift by will; 11 Eng. L. & Eq. 191. If a corporation conveys by the wrong name it cannot defeat its grant, if it has received the consideration; 132 Ill. 32.

As to the protection of a corporation in the use of its corporate name, see Moraw. Priv. Corp. § 355; TRADE-MARK.

See GOOD-WILL; PARTNERSHIP; PARTNERS; MISNOMER.

The real name of a party to be arrested must be inserted in the warrant, if known; 8 East 828; 6 Cow. 456; 9 Wend. 320; if unknown, some description must be given; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 39; with the reason for the omission; 1 Mood. & M. 281.

Proof may be given that the maker of an instrument habitually applied a nickname or peculiar designation used therein to a particular person or thing; 26 Ohio St. 604. As to mistakes in devises, see LEGACY. As to the use of names having the same sound, see IDEM SONANS; 1 Over. 434. As to the effect of using a name having the same derivation, see 2 Rolle, Abr. 135; 1 Wash. C. C. 285. At common law one could change his name; 10 Fed. Rep. 894; 123 Mass. 415; 3 B. & Ald. 544; and a person not having a fraudulent or criminal purpose in so doing may enter into a contract by any name he may choose to assume; 74 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 147; 38 Minn. 361; 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 567; 31 N. C. 184; 31 Mo. 188. Under this rule, legal proceedings against a married woman under an assumed name have been held good after judgment; 19 Kan. 522; and obligations incurred by or with third parties under her maiden name are mutually binding; 73 Wis. 646; 96 Cal. 609; see Schoul. Dom. Rel. 40; although until a decree in divorce giving a married woman leave to resume her maiden name goes into effect, or widowhood is succeeded by a new marriage, she keeps her former husband's surname; 2 P. D. 263.

A person, not having a fraudulent or criminal purpose in doing so, may enter into a contract by any name he may choose to assume; it is only a question of identity; 74 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 147; 41 N. Y. Super. 567. A grant of land under an assumed name will pass title: and evidence is admissible to prove identity; 38 Minn. 361.

When a person uses a name in making a contract under seal, he will not be permitted to say that it is not his name: as, if he sign and seal a bond "A and B" (being his own and his partner's name), and he had no authority from his partner to make such a deed, he cannot deny that his name is A and B; 1 T. Raym. 2; 1 Salk. 214. And if a man describes himself in the body of a deed by the name of James, and signs it John, he cannot, on being sued by the latter name, plead that his name is James; 3 Taunt. 505; Cro. Eliz. 897, n. a. See 3 P. & D. 271; 11 Ad. & E. 594; 19 Abb. N. C. 123. A man may sue by the name by which he has been known from childhood, instead of by that given him by his parents; 31 Wkly. Law Bul. 102.

The right to the exclusive use of a name in connection with a trade or business is familiar to the law; and any person using that name, after a relative right of this description has been acquired by another, is considered guilty of a fraud, or at least an invasion of another's rights, and renders himself liable to an action, or he may be restrained from the use of the name by injunction. But the mere assumption of a name which is the patronymic of a family by a stranger who has never been called by that name is a grievance to the family for which the law affords no redress; L. R. 2 P. C. 441. See 11 Beav. 112; L. R. 2 Ch. 307. A name may be a trade-mark; L. R. 10 Ch. D. 436; 1 Eq. 518; 13 Beav. 209; 13 Am. Rep. 111. A person cannot, however, have an exclusive right of trade-mark in a name as against all others bearing the same name, and honestly using the name in competition, unless the defendant uses the same brand or stamp in connection with the name; 122 Mass. 139; 96 U. S. 245; 50 Barb. 236. Nor in the name of the city in which a thing is made; 44 Fed. Rep. 277. But such exclusive right to a name may be acquired as against a corporation called by the same name. See 11 Cent. L. J. 3; Poll. Torts 152; ELECTION; TRADE-MARK.

NAMED. Mentioned nominatim, if not by all their names, by some at least, either Christian or surnames. 22 L. J. Ch. 393. It is sometimes used, but only in a secondary sense, as meaning mentioned or referred to. 34 S. J. 129.

NAMELY. A difference, in grammatical sense, in strictness exists between the words namely and including. Namely imports interpretation, i. e. indicates what is included in the previous term; but including imports addition, i. e. indicates something not included. 2 Jarm. Wills 222.

NAMIUM. An old word which signifies the taking or distraining another person's movable goods. 2 Inst. 140; 3 Bla. Com. 149. A distress. Dalrymple, Feud. Pr. 113.

NAMIUM VETITUM. The unjust taking of another person's cattle and driving them to an unlawful place, under pretence of damage having been done by them, in which case the owner may demand satisfaction for the injury. Cowel.

NANTISSEMENT. In French Law. The contract of pledge; if of a movable, it is called gago, and if of an immovable, antichrèse; Brown, Dict.

NARR. (an abbreviation of the word narratio). A declaration in a cause.

NARRATIO. A common-law name for the plaintiff's count or declaration as being a narrative of facts on which he relies.

NARRATIVE CLAUSE. In Scotch Law. The first clause in an original charter which follows immediately after the name and designation of the grantor. Ersk. Prin. 129.

NARRATOR. A pleader who draws narrs. Serviens narrator, a serjeant-at-law. Fleta, l. 2, c. 37. Obsolete.

NARROW SEAS. In English Law. Those seas which adjoin the coast of England. Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (B 3).

NASCITURUS. Not yet born. This term is applied in marriage settlements to the unborn children of a particular marriage, natus (born) being used to designate those already born.

NATALE. The state or condition of a man acquired by birth.

NATIO. A native place. Cowel.

NATION. An independent body politic. A society of men united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage by the joint efforts of their combined strength.

But every combination of men who govern themselves independently of all others will not be considered a nation; a body of pirates, for example, who govern themselves, is not a nation. To constitute a nation, another ingredient is required. The body thus formed must respect other nations in general, and each of its members in particular. Such a society has its affairs and interests; it deliberates and takes resolutions in common,—thus becoming a moral person, who possesses an understanding and will and is susceptible of obligations and rights. Vattel, Prelim. §§ 1, 2; 5 Pet. 52.

It belongs to the government to declare whether they will consider a colony which has thrown off the yoke of the mother-country as an independent state; and until the government have decided on the question, courts of justice are bound to consider the ancient state of things as remaining unchanged; 1 Johns. Ch. 543; 13 Johns. 141, 561. See 5 Pet. 1; 1 Kent 22.

In American constitutional law the word state is applied to the several members of the American Union, while the word nation is applied to the whole body of the people embraced within the jurisdiction of the federal government; Cooley, Const. Lim. See 7 Wall. 720.

NATIONAL BANKS. Banks created and governed under the provisions of the "National Bank Act."

They are private corporations organized under a general law of congress, by individual stockholders, with their own capital, for private gain, and managed by officers, agents, and employes of their own selection. They constitute no part of any branch of the government of the United States, and whatever public benefit they contribute to the country in return for grants and privileges conferred upon them by statute, is of a general nature arising from their business relations to the people through individual citizens, and not as direct representatives of the state as a body politic in exercising its legal and constitutional functions; 12 Ct. Cl. 281; but they are instruments designed to aid the government in an important branch of the public service; 91 U. S. 29. See 164 U. S. 347. Congress in the exercise of an undisputed constitutional power to provide a currency for the whole country, may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation, and to that end may restrain the circulation of any notes not issued under its authority; 8 Wall. 548.

Any number of persons, not less than five, may organize a national bank. They must sign, acknowledge before a court of record or notary public, and transmit to the comptroller of the currency, an organization certificate, containing the name of the bank, its place of business, the amount of capital stock and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, the names and residences of the shareholders, and the number of shares held by them, and that the applicants desire to avail themselves of the act of congress. The comptroller decides whether the bank is lawfully entitled to begin business; see 19 Mich. 196; if he so finds, his certificate of this fact must be published in a newspaper of the place where the bank is to do business for sixty days.

One hundred thousand dollars is the minimum capital allowed, except in places not exceeding 6,000 inhabitants, when, by consent of the comptroller, the capital may be $50,000; where the population exceeds 50,000 the capital must be at least $200,000. The term capital does not refer to borrowed money, but to the property or moneys of the bank permanently invested in its business; 21 Wall. 284. The capital stock is divided into shares of $100 each, which are personal property. At least fifty per cent. thereof must be paid in before organization, and the rest in monthly instalments of ten per cent. each. The stock of stockholders not paying these instalments may be sold, on notice; stockholders are individually responsible, in addition to what they have invested in their shares, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank, to the extent of their stock at its par value. This liability is several and not joint; 8 Wall. 505. The estate of a deceased owner of bank stock is liable to an assessment levied against his executor in consequence of the failure of the bank after his death; 60 Fed. Rep. 326; 121 U. S. 27.

Upon its organization a national bank has the usual corporate powers, also the right of succession for twenty years, and the power to exercise, by its board of directors or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, etc.; by receiving deposits, by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of title 62 of the Revised Statutes.

They have not the same rights in all the states. For all practical purposes they exercise their functions only within the limits of the state in which they are located and they have no authority to carry on business outside those limits; 2 McCrary 95; 6 Hun 71.

The powers of national banks are to be measured by the act creating them; 18 Wall. 589; 72 Pa. 456; 62 Mo. 329; 139 U. S. 67; the words of the act above quoted, "by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, etc.," are not to be read as limiting the mode of exercising the "incidental powers" necessary to carry on the business of banking, but as descriptive of the kind of business which is authorized; 22 Ohio St. 516. A national bank may buy negotiable notes and bills of exchange; 33 Minn. 40; 23 S. C. 339; 20 Kan. 440. This power, it has been held, simply implies an authority to realize upon such commercial paper as the bank may receive in the lawful conduct of its business, by negotiating, selling, and transferring it by means of a re-discount obtained or otherwise. It gives no implied authority to speculate or traffic in paper of this character or in financial securities of any description; 24 Minn. 140; 52 Md. 78. In the last case, by a divided court, the opinion was qualified by the remark that a national bank might invest its surplus capital in notes. The purchasing and discounting of paper has been held to be only a mode of loaning money; 26 Ohio 141; but it cannot discount a conditional note; 27 Alb. L. J. 447. It may collect notes; 9 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 709; deal in national bonds; 31 Ia. 69; 69 N. Y. 382; and own coupons on state bonds; 16 Blatch. 53; and it may deal in stocks; 12 Hun 97; but the tendency of the decisions is contra; 89 Pa. 324; 72 id. 456; 92 U. S. 122; 42 Md. 581; 3 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 124. It may lend on collateral security, including United States bonds; 44 Md. 47; or the stock of another national bank; 99 U. S. 628; or a warehouse receipt for merchandise; 40 Ohio 176; or a locomotive; 8 Biss. 158; 1 Hughes 101; but it may not lend its credit; 8 id. 467; 55 Fed. Rep. 465. It may borrow money on its own notes, and pledge its assets for its repayment; 41 Bank. Mag. 131. It may, in a fair and bona fide compromise of a contested claim against it, growing out of a legitimate banking transaction, pay a larger sum than would have been exacted in satisfaction of a demand, so as to obtain by the arrangement a transfer of stocks, if done in the belief that by turning the stocks into money under more favorable circumstances a loss which would otherwise accrue from the transaction might be averted or diminished; 92 U. S. 122, affirming 39 Md. 600.

It has authority to receive special deposits and is responsible for their loss if occasioned by gross negligence; 100 U. S. 699, affirming 79 Pa. 106; 26 Ia. 562; 99 Mass. 605; 58 Ga. 369; 33 Ohio 105; 80 N. Y. 82, affirming 17 Hun 419; 29 Fed. Rep. 498. See contra, 47 Vt. 546; 50 id. 388.

It may take legal proceedings to recover stolen property for itself or for depositors, and will be held responsible for lack of diligence, skill, and care in performing such an undertaking; 119 U. S. 361, affirming 15 Fed. Rep. 428.

A national bank has no power to indorse a note for compensation; 27 Hun 109; but, should it do so, only the government may object; id., citing 82 N. Y. 291; 96 U. S. 640; 84 N. Y. 190; 103 U. S. 99; but it may guarantee a note; 101 U. S. 183. It may not receive deposits when insolvent; 99 N. Y. 131. It cannot be garnisheed for a deposit of a trust estate or pay out funds of a bankrupt except upon a warrant of an assignee in bankruptcy of the district or by the register in bankruptcy of the district; 6 Thomp. & C. 346.

National banks may purchase, hold, and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others: 1. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business. 2. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security, for debts previously contracted. 3. Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings. 4. Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts due to it; title in the latter case to be held for no longer than five years.

It is now settled that a bank may lawfully take a mortgage to secure future indebtedness; 93 N. Y. 269; 31 Gratt. 228; 71 Mo. 228; 94 Pa. 64; 78 Ind. 19; 85 N. C. 240; 94 Ill. 349. Such a loan of money on real estate security by a national bank is valid between the parties; 98 U. S. 621, reversing 62 Mo. 329; contra, 72 Pa. 456; 87 Ill. 151; and that it had so loaned money in violation of the prohibition of the national banking law does not give the debtor a right to object; the United States alone can complain; 45 La. Ann. 75; 103 U. S. 99; 112 id. 439. It may take a purchase-money mortgage on real estate sold by it; 29 La. Ann. 355; and it may purchase real estate at a judgment sale; 70 Ind. 106; 112 U. S. 405; 120 Mass. 153; 88 Ill. 352; and a prior mortgage if needful to protect the interest of the bank; 90 Ind. 332. A converted bank may take real estate belonging to it whilst it was a state bank; 9 Neb. 316; it may accept personal property in payment upon the sale of real estate belonging to it; 73 Ia. 145; and the assignment of a mortgage on land to secure a loan made at the time of the assignment; 7 Wash. 261.

A transfer of stock in a national bank which is insolvent at the time, made with an intent to avoid liability, where the transferee has reason to believe that the bank is insolvent, will not relieve the transferor from the residuary liability to pay the debt of the bank, and such a transfer may be treated by the receiver as inoperative without regard to the financial condition of the transferee; but if the bank is solvent at the time of the transfer the motive with which it is made is immaterial; 169 U. S. 1.

When not defined by a board of directors the duties of the president and cashier are only such as may be incident to their offices respectively in their very nature, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the act of incorporation; 22 Gratt. 58. Neither of these officers, nor both acting together, can give up a debt or liability to the bank, nor make any admissions which would release the maker of a note due to the bank from his legal responsibility; id.; 6 Pet. 51; 8 id. 12; 50 How. Pr. 447. The president has no power to sell or surrender securities and receive others of an inferior value; 33 Mich. 520. Ordinarily his authority is very limited; he may bring actions at law and employ counsel for the purpose of protecting the rights of the bank, but he is not its executive officer nor has he charge of its money operations. He has no more power of management nor disposal of the property of the corporation than any other member of the board of directors unless further powers are conferred upon him by the charter of the bank or by the action of the managing board; 21 Neb. 280. He may not make an agreement binding on the bank and embodying a transaction not within the usual course of business of the bank; 89 Pa. 324; but see 7 Neb. 201; 9 Biss. 253.

A bank is liable upon notes, executed by it through its cashier, for loans made by another bank in an amount not so great as to create suspicion, where the actual management of the bank was left entirely to such cashier, and the negotiation and all the correspondence were such as might lead the officers of the lending bank to believe that he was acting on authority and in good faith and honest intention, though the money was used by him for his own individual purposes, and the signature of the president was forged; 80 Fed. Rep. 859; but where the affairs of a national bank were managed entirely by the cashier, who was universally believed to be honest and capable, but whose dishonesty and reckless management resulted in wrecking the bank, the president and directors, most of whom were farmers knowing little of banking, were not guilty of negligence so as to be liable for losses to creditors because they failed to examine the books, the statements being prepared and furnished them by the cashier, and reporting the bank to be in a prosperous condition, and there being no grounds of suspicion known to them; 82 Fed. Rep. 181, following 141 U. S. 132.

The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of all suits by or against national banks established in the district for which the court is held; R. S. § 629; see 3 Dill. 298; irrespective of the amount in controversy or the citizenship of the parties; Fed. Cas. No. 9670. A national bank may bring suit in the circuit court out of its district, against a citizen of the district where the court sits; 8 Blatch. 137; 9 Nev. 134. A national bank may waive its right to be sued in its own district; 2 Conn. 298; and state courts have jurisdiction of suits brought by national banks; 49 Vt. 1; 93 U. S. 130; but this must be a state court of its locality; 14 Wall. 383; 101 Mass. 240.

Mortgages held by national banks are not subject to taxation by a state; 21 Nev. 404; nor can the stock in a national bank be taxed in any state other than that in which the bank is located; 55 N. J. L. 110.

A national bank may go into liquidation and be closed by a vote of the shareholders of two-thirds of its stock; R. S. § 5220; although it be contrary to the wishes and against the interests of the owners of the minority of the stock; 51 Kan. 254. In case of a failure to pay its circulating notes, the comptroller may appoint a receiver to wind up national banks; R. S. § 5234.

State banks may be changed into national banks; the change when made is a transit, and not a creation; see 40 Mo. 140; and does not affect its identity or its right to sue upon obligations or liabilities incurred to it by its former name; 143 U. S. 293. See DEPOSIT; INTEREST; PROXY; RESERVE; BANK.

NATIONAL CHURCH. A church established by law in a country or nation. 25 Gratt. 965.

NATIONAL CURRENCY. Notes issued by national banks and by the government. See CURRENT MONEY; MONEY; LEGAL TENDER.

NATIONAL DEBT. A sum owing by the government to individuals who have advanced money to it for public purposes, either in anticipation of the produce of the particular branches of the revenue, or on credit of the general power which the government possesses of levying the amount necessary to pay interest for the money borrowed or to repay the principal. See FUNDING SYSTEM.

NATIONAL DOMAIN. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

NATIONAL DOMICIL. See DOMICIL.

NATIONAL ENSIGN. The National flag. See FLAG.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT. A government of the people of a single state or nation, united as a community by what is termed the social compact, and possessing complete and perfect supremacy over persons and things so far as they can be made the lawful objects of civil government. A federal government is distinguished from a national government by its being the government of a community of independent and sovereign states united by compact. 6 Ohio St. 393.

NATIONAL GUARD. A name given to the organized militia in some parts of the United States.

NATIONALITY. Character, status, or condition with reference to the rights and duties of a person as a member of some one state or nation rather than another.

Nationality may be determined from origin, naturalization, domicil, residence, trade, or other circumstances; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 403.

The term is in frequent use with regard to ships. Nationality determined by one's birthplace or parentage is called nationality of origin; that which results from naturalization, is by acquisition. A woman upon marriage acquires the nationality of her husband; Morse on Citizenship 142. In feudal times, nationality was determined exclusively by the place of birth, jure soli; but under the laws of Athens and Rome the child followed that of the parents, jure sanguinis. "Of these two tests, the place of birth and the nationality of the father, neither is at present adopted without qualification by British, French, or American law. The laws of these countries exhibit, in fact, different combinations of the two, Great Britain and the United States laying chief stress on the place of birth, while in France the father's nationality determines, though not absolutely and in all cases, that of the child; and this latter theory has found acceptance among other European nations," as Belgium, Bavaria, Prussia, and Spain. Morse, Citizenship 10.

Subject to the act of 1870, English jurists almost unanimously deny the right of expatriation to the extent of a change of primitive allegiance, without the consent of the liege lord. By the laws of France, a Frenchman loses his native character by naturalization in a foreign country, by accepting office under a foreign government without the permission of his own, or by so establishing himself abroad as to show an intention of never returning. In Austria national character is lost by authorized emigration from the empire without the intention of returning, and it is equally lost if effected without permission. In Germany, it is lost by unauthorized emigration except in the case of a German naturalized in the United States. Spain and the Spanish American Republics provide for the loss of Spanish nationality upon the acquisition of a new national character; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 403. The native, national character lost or suspended by a foreign domicil, easily reverts; id. 429.

A general rule is recommended by Westlake: "Legitimate children, wherever born, are regularly members of the state of which their parents form part the moment of their birth; but they may choose as their nationality the place of their birth." See 2 Kent 49; Cock. Nat.; Whart. Confl. Laws; Westlake, Priv. Int. Law. See, generally, ALLEGIANCE; CITIZEN; DENIZEN; DOMICIL; EXPATRIATION; NATURALIZATION.

NATIONS, LAW OF. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

NATIVE, NATIVE CITIZEN. A natural-born subject. 1 Bla. Com. 366. Those born in a country, of parents who are citizens. Morse, Citizenship 12. See CITIZEN. There is no distinction between native born as used in the French Extradition treaty and natural born as used in the extradition act; 37 W. R. 269.

NATIVO HABENDO. A writ which lay for a lord when his villein had run away from him. Termes de la Ley.

NATIVUS. See NEIF.

NATURAL AFFECTION. The affection which one naturally feels towards those who are nearly allied to him. It sometimes supplies the place of a valuable consideration in contracts; and natural affection is a good consideration in a deed. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 68. See BARGAIN AND SALE; COVENANT TO STAND SEIZED; CONSIDERATION.

NATURAL ALLEGIANCE. See ALLEGIANCE.

NATURAL AND REASONABLE WEAR AND TEAR. Wear and tear by use. Damage by operation of nature, as by freshets, is not included therein. 20 N. J. L. 544.

NATURAL-BORN. See NATURALIZATION.

NATURAL-BORN SUBJECT. See NATURALIZATION.

NATURAL CHILDREN. Bastards; children born out of lawful wedlock. But in a statute declaring that adopted children shall have all the rights of "natural" children, the word "natural" was used in the sense of legitimate; 9 Am. L. Reg. 747.

In Civil Law. Children by procreation, as distinguished from children by adoption.

In Louisiana. Illegitimate children who have been adopted by the father. La. Civ. Code, art. 220.

NATURAL DAY. That space of time included between the rising and the setting of the sun. See DAY.

NATURAL DEATH. See DEATH.

NATURAL EQUITY. That which is founded in natural justice, in honesty and right, and which arises ex æquo et bono.

It corresponds precisely with the definition of justice or natural law, which is a constant and perpetual will to give to every man what is his. This kind of equity embraces so wide a range that human tribunals have never attempted to enforce it. Every code of laws has left many matters of natural justice or equity wholly unprovided for, from the difficulty of framing general rules to meet them, from the almost impossibility of enforcing them, and from the doubtful nature of the policy of attempting to give a legal sanction to duties of imperfect obligation, such as charity, gratitude, or kindness. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3730. See EQUITY.

NATURAL FOOL. An idiot; one born without the reasoning powers or a capacity to acquire them.

NATURAL FRUITS. The natural production of trees, bushes, and other plants, for the use of men and animals, and for the reproduction of such trees, bushes, or plants.

This expression is used in contradistinction to artificial or figurative fruits: for example, apples, peaches, and pears, are natural fruits; interest is the fruit of money, and this is artificial.

NATURAL GAS. See GAS.

NATURAL HEIRS. As used in a will and by way of executory devise, they are considered as of the same legal import as "heirs of the body." 19 Conn. 112.

NATURAL INFANCY. A period of non-responsible life, which ends with the seventh year. Whart. Dict.

NATURAL LAW. See LAW OF NATURE.

NATURAL LIBERTY. See LIBERTY.

NATURAL LIFE. The period between birth and natural death. The use of the word natural before life in a sentence of solitary confinement in a state prison for life, is a surplusage and does not affect the sentence; 89 Mich. 70. See DEATH.

NATURAL OBLIGATION. One which in honor and conscience binds the person who has contracted it, but which cannot be enforced in a court of justice. Pothier, nn. 173, 191. See OBLIGATION; MORAL OBLIGATION.

NATURAL PERSONS. See PERSON.

NATURAL PRESUMPTIONS. In Evidence. Presumptions of fact; those which depend upon their own form and efficacy in generating belief or conviction in the mind, as derived from those connections which are pointed out by experience.

NATURALEZA. In Spanish Law. The state of a natural-born subject. White, New Recop. b. 1, t. 5, c. 2.

NATURAL WATERCOURSE. A natural stream flowing in a defined bed or channel, with banks and sides, and having permanent sources of supply. 86 N. Y. 140; 55 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 78. See WATERCOURSE.

NATURALIZATION. The act by which an alien is made a citizen of the United States of America.

The act of adopting a foreigner and clothing him with all the privileges of a native-born citizen. 9 Wheat. 827; 9 Op. Atty.-Gen. 359.

A nation, or the sovereign who represents it, may grant to a stranger the quality of a citizen, by admitting him into the body of the political society. This is called naturalization. Vattel, Laws of Nat., bk. 1, ch. xix. §§ 212–214.

It is believed that every state in Christendom accords to foreigners, with more or less restrictions, the right of naturalization, and that each has some positive law or mode of its own for naturalizing the native-born subjects of other states, without reference to the consent of the latter for the release of the transfer of the allegiance of such subjects. See Morse, Citizenship 66.

The fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the states where they reside."

It affirms the ancient rule of citizenship by birth, within the territory, in the allegiance, and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, with the exception of the children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on a foreign public ship, or, of enemies, within and during a hostile occupation of part of our territory, and children of members of the Indian tribes owing direct allegiance to their several tribes. It includes a child, born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who at the time of his birth are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent residence and domicile in the United States, and not employed in any diplomatic capacity; 169 U. S. 649, a learned opinion by Gray, J., Fuller, C. J., and Harlan, J., dissenting.

At common law a natural-born subject included every child born in England of alien parents except the child of an ambassador or diplomatic agent or of an alien enemy in hostile occupation of the place where the child was born; 169 U. S. 649. It made no difference whether the parents were permanently or only temporarily residing in England; Cockb. Nat. 7.

The term natural-born citizen used in the federal constitution is not therein defined. Its meaning must be gatherod from the common law. An alien enemy cannot be naturalized; R. S. § 2171.

An applicant for naturalization must have been a resident of the United States for five years next preceding his admission to citizenship, but uninterrupted habitation is not required; R. S. § 2165. Naturalization, of itself, conveys no right of suffrage; Pars. Rights, Amer. Citizen 190; though by it a foreigner becomes, to all intents and purposes, a citizen of the United States, with no disability except that he cannot become president or vice-president. It does not operate as a bar against prosecution in one's native country for prior offences; 2 Whart. Dig. Int. L. § 180. The provision of the constitution applies to persons of foreign birth only; 19 How. 419; but not to Mongolians, or American Indians; 5 Sawy. 55; 7 Op. Atty.-Gen. 746; and not, formerly, to a freeman of color, born in the United States; 26 Ind. 299. Indians may be naturalized by act of congress; 19 How. 393. Entire communities have been naturalized by a single act of national sovereignty; 36 Cal. 658; 143 U. S. 135. The act of July 14, 1870, extended the naturalization laws to persons of African descent. Under R. S. § 1994, providing that "any woman who is now or hereafter may be married to a citizen of the United States, and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, shall be deemed a citizen," applies to women of African blood; 86 Fed. Rep. 951.

An alien over twenty-one years who has enlisted in the United States army may, without previous declaration of intention, be naturalized on one year's residence, good moral character and honorable discharge; Act of July 17, 1862, § 21. An alien seaman may become a citizen by declaring his intention and serving three years on a merchant vessel of the United States; R. S. § 2174.

Minor children, though born out of the United States, if living within the United States at the time of the naturalization of the parents, become citizens by virtue of the naturalization of the parents; 97 Mo. 311; but not so if they came after the father had been naturalized; 135 Ill. 591. As to whether a child of a naturalized British subject is himself a British subject, see 5 L. Quart. Rev. 488.

A married woman may be naturalized; 1 Cra. C. C. 372; even without the concurrence of her husband; 16 Wend. 617; and an alien woman becomes a citizen when her husband is naturalized, even if she is not of age at the time; 44 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 635; and though she may have lived in a foreign country for years and has never come to the United States until after his death; 14 Op. Atty.-Gen. 402.

The federal constitution, art. 1, § 8, vests in congress the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. "It follows from the very nature of the power that to be useful it must be exclusive, for a concurrent power in the states would bring back all the evils and embarrassments which the constitution was designed to remedy, and accordingly, though there was a momentary hesitation when the constitution first went into operation as to whether the power might not still be exercised by the states subject only to the control of congress so far as the legislation of the latter extended as the supreme law, yet the power is now firmly established to be exclusive;" 2 Story, Const. § 1104; 7 How. 556; 19 id. 393; 5 Cal. 300; 56 Fed. Rep. 576; and no state can pass a law which contravenes the acts of congress on the subject; 2 Rand. 276. A state may confer such rights of citizenship as it pleases so far as relates to itself only; 19 How. 393; 16 Wis. 443; but this is not to be confounded with the right of citizenship of the United States; 19 How. 393; 143 U. S. 160; and no state can make a citizen of the United States; 4 Dill. 425.

By act of April 14, 1802, congress has conferred power to naturalize upon state courts having common-law jurisdiction and a seal and clerk; 18 B. Monr. 693; 83 Me. 489; and it may invest state courts with jurisdiction to naturalize; 33 N. H. 89; but it is held that it cannot impose the duty of naturalization upon state courts; 3 D. R. (Pa.) 728; nor require them to act upon applications for naturalization; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 743. See 37 Neb. 299. In 10 Ark. 631, the court say, "Whether the state courts are bound to exercise concurrent jurisdiction permitted to be retained by them even when enjoined upon them by act of congress, is not altogether well settled. Some strong intimations to the contrary have been given by the judges of the supreme court of the United States, and in some instances the courts of the particular states have refused to exercise this jurisdiction." No state can confer jurisdiction on any court, which does not come within the terms of the act of congress; 50 N. H. 245.

Courts of record, in naturalizing foreigners, act judicially, ascertaining the facts and applying the law to them; 4 Pet. 407; the certificate of naturalization issued by a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive proof of the citizenship of the person named therein; 147 Ill. 514; though not the only proof. The judgment of the court, like every judgment, has been decided to be complete evidence of its own validity; id.

When no record can be produced showing the naturalization of a foreigner, naturalization may be inferred from the fact that for a long time he voted, held office, and exercised all the rights and privileges of a citizen; 143 U. S. 135. The subject is fully discussed in Morse, Citizenship. See Miller, Const. 285, 302; 4 Am. Lawy. 348; 30 L. R. A. 761; CHINESE; CITIZEN; ALLEGIANCE; EXPATRIATION.

NATURALIZED CITIZEN. One who, being born an alien, has lawfully become a citizen of the United States under the constitution and laws.

In foreign countries he has a right to be treated as such, and will be so considered, even in the country of his birth, at least for most purposes; 1 B. & P. 430. See CITIZEN; DOMICIL; INHABITANT; NATURALIZATION.

NATURALLY. According to the usual course of things. 71 Cal. 164.

NAUCLERUS (Lat.). The master or owner of a vessel. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

NAUFRAGE. In French Maritime Law. When, by the violent agitation of the waves, the impetuosity of the winds, the storm, or the lightning, a vessel is swallowed up, or so shattered that there remain only the pieces, the accident is called naufrage.

It differs from échouement, which is when the vessel remains whole, but is grounded; or from bris, which is when it strikes against a rock or a coast; or from sombrer, which is the sinking of the vessel in the sea when it is swallowed up, and which may be caused by any accident whatever. Pardessus, n. 643. See WRECK.

NAUGHT. Bad; defective.

NAULAGE. See NAULUM.

NAULUM (Lat.). Freight or passage money. 1 Pars. Mar. Law 124, n.; Bened. Adm. § 288; Dig. l. 6, § 1, qui potiores in pignore.

NAUTA (Lat.). One who charters (exercet) a ship. L. 1, § 1, ff. nautæ, caupo; Calvinus, Lex. Any one who is on board a vessel for the purpose of navigating her. 3 Sumn. 213; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 2 Emerigon 448; Pothier, Pand. lib. 4, tit. 9, n. 2; lib. 47, tit. 5, nn. 1, 2, 3, 8, 10. A carrier by water. 2 Ld. Raym. 917.

NAUTICAL ASSESSORS. Experienced shipmasters or other persons having special knowledge of navigation and nautical affairs, who are called to the assistance of a court of admiralty in difficult cases involving questions of negligence, and who sit with the judge during the argument and give their advice upon questions of seamanship or the weight of testimony. 19 Fed. Rep. 559.

NAVAGIUM. A duty on certain tenants to carry their lord's goods in a ship. 1 Mon. Ang. 922.

NAVAL COURTS. Courts held abroad in certain cases to inquire into complaints by the master or seamen of a British ship, or as to the wreck or abandonment of such ship.

NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL. See COURT MARTIAL.

NAVAL LAW. A system of regulations for the government of the navy. 1 Kent 377, n. Consult act of April 3, 1800; act of December 21, 1861; act of July 17, 1862; Homans, Nav. Laws; De Hart, Courts-Martial.

NAVAL OFFICER. An officer of the customs of the United States.

His office relates to the estimating duties, countersigning permits, clearances, etc., certifying the collectors' returns, and similar duties.

NAVAL PRIZE ACT. The act of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 25, which regulates questions of prize. See PRIZE.

NAVARCHUS, NAVICULARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The master of an armed ship. Navicularius also denotes the master of a ship (patronus) generally. Cic. Ver. 4, 55; also, a carrier by water (exercitor navis). Calvinus, Lex.

NAVIGABLE WATERS. Those waters which afford a channel for useful commerce. 20 Wall. 430. See Patterson, Fed. Rest. 45.

The test by which the character of a stream as public or private is determined, is its navigability in fact; 122 Pa. 191; 100 N. C. 477.

In its technical sense, the term navigable, at common law, is only applied to the sea, to arms of the sea, and to rivers which flow and reflow with the tide,—in other words, to tide-waters, the bed or soil of which is the property of the crown. All other waters are, in this sense of the word, unnavigable, and are, prima facie, strictly private property; but in England even such waters, if navigable in the popular sense of the term, are, either of common right or by dedication, subject to the use of the public as navigable highways, the fee or soil remaining in the riparian proprietors; Davies 149; 5 Taunt. 705; 20 C. B. N. S. 1; 1 Pick. 180; 5 id. 199.

In the United States, this technical use of the term has been adopted in many of the states, in so far as it is employed to designate and define the waters, the bed or soil of which belongs to the state; 4 N. Y. 472; 4 Pick. 268; 2 Conn. 481; 3 Me. 269; 16 Ohio 540; 1 Halst. 31; 4 Wis. 486; 2 Swan 9. See 3 Abb. N. C. 88; 122 Pa. 191. But in Pennsylvania; 2 Binn. 475; 14 S. & R. 71; in North Carolina; 3 Ired. 277; 2 Dev. 30; in Iowa; 3 Ia. 1; 4 id. 199; and in Alabama; 11 Ala. 436; the technical use of the term has been entirely discarded, and the large fresh-water rivers of those states have been decided to be navigable, not only as being subject to public use as navigable highways, but also as having their bed or soil in the state.

The rule of the common law, by which the ebb and flow of the tide has been made the criterion of navigability, has never been adopted in any of the United States, or, if adopted, it has been in a form modified and improved to fit the condition of the country and the wants of its inhabitants. According to the rule administered in the courts of this country, all rivers which are found "of sufficient capacity to float the products of the mines, the forests, or the tillage of the country through which they flow, to market;" 8 Barb. 239; or which are capable of use "for the floating of vessels, boats, rafts, or logs"; 31 Me. 9 (but see 6 Cal. 443; 17 Or. 165); 50 Fed. Rep. 429; 58 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 257; are subject to the free and unobstructed navigation of the public, independent of usage or of legislation; 5 Wend. 358; 42 Me. 552; 18 Barb. 277; 5 Ind. 8; 2 Swan 9; 29 Miss. 21; 6 Cal. 180; 2 Stockt. 211. See 51 Me. 256; 3 Ore. 445; 42 Wis. 202; 111 N. C. 661; 107 U. S. 682. Water navigable for pleasure boating must be regarded as navigable; 108 Mass. 456.

The navigable waters of the United States are such as are navigable in fact; 16 U. S. App. 152; and which by themselves, or in connection with other waters, form a continuous channel for commerce with foreign countries or among the states; 109 U. S. 385; 11 Wall. 411.

A river may be navigable below the ebb and flow of the tide in the sense of the common law, and, in fact, navigable above; and the question of boundary in respect to lands adjoining it will be determined by one principle above, and by another below tide-water; 12 N. J. Eq. 1. It is not necessary that the stream should be navigable all the year round; 31 Mich. 336; 25 Fla. 1. See 86 Ala. 88. There can be no prescriptive right to maintain or continue an obstruction to the navigation of a public stream; 86 Ala. 88.

In 108 Mass. 447, Gray, J., says: "The term 'navigable waters,' as commonly used in the law, has three distinct meanings: first, as synonymous with 'tide-waters,' being waters whether fresh or salt wherever the ebb and flow of the sea is felt; or second, as limited to tide-waters which are capable of being navigated for some useful purpose; or third, as including all waters, whether within or beyond the ebb and flow of the tide which can be used for navigation." See 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 147; Ang. Waterc. § 542; 19 Abb. N. C. 159. In North Carolina the test of navigability is not whether the stream is subject to the ebb and flow of the tide, but whether it is navigable for sea-going vessels; 114 N. C. 787; while in South Carolina the test is its navigable capacity, without regard to the character of the craft; 19 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 963.

In New York, it seems that courts are bound to take judicial notice of what streams are, and what are not, highways, at common law; 8 Barb. 239; but it has been held that what is a navigable stream is a mixed question of law and fact; if a stream is not navigable the legislature cannot declare it to be so, because the legislature cannot appropriate it to public use without provision for compensation; 35 N. Y. 454. See WATERS; WATERCOURSE; RIVERS; LAKE; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; TIDE-WATER.

NAVIGATING. A vessel which, though touching bottom, forces her way by her own screw through the soft mud is navigating. 59 Fed. Rep. 365.

NAVIGATION ACT. The stat. 12 Car. II. c. 78. It was repealed by 6 Geo. IV. cc. 109, 110, 114. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107; 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 5 and 120; 3 Steph. Com. 145.

NAVIGATION, RULES OF. Rules and regulations which govern the motions of ships or vessels when approaching each other under such circumstances that a collision may possibly ensue.

These rules are firmly maintained in the United States courts. A federal question is presented by a ruling of a state court which substantially ignores the obligatory force of rules of navigation; 150 U. S. 674.

The rules of navigation which prevailed under the general maritime law, in the absence of statutory enactments, will be considered, although, as hereinafter stated, they have lately been superseded by express enactment in most of the commercial countries of the world.

These rules were derived mainly from the decisions of the high court of admiralty in England, and of the superior courts of the United States, and they are based upon the rules promulgated by the corporation of the Trinity House on the 30th of October, 1840, and which may be found in full in 1 W. Rob. 488. Though now codified, see infra, they are here continued as in the former edition as a matter of historical interest.

For sailing-vessels about to meet. 1. Those having the wind fair shall give way to those on a wind [or close-hauled].

2. When both are going by the wind, the vessel on the starboard tack shall keep her wind, and the one on the larboard tack bear up, thereby passing each other on the larboard hand.

3. When both vessels have the wind large or abeam, and meet, they shall pass each other in the same way, on the larboard hand; to effect which two last-mentioned objects the helm must be put to port.

For a sailing and a steam vessel about to meet. 1. Steam-vessels are to be considered in the light of vessels navigating with a fair wind, and should give way to sailing-vessels on a wind on either tack.

2. A steam-vessel and a sailing-vessel going large, when about to meet, should each port her helm and pass on the larboard side of the other; 1 W. Rob. 478; 2 id. 515.

But in the United States courts it has been almost uniformly held, and the rule is now firmly established, that when a sailing-vessel and a steamer are about to meet, the sailing-vessel must, under ordinary circumstances, and whether going large, or before the wind, or close-hauled by the wind, keep her course, and the steamer must take all the measures necessary to avoid a collision; 10 How. 557; 17 id. 152, 178; 18 id. 581; 3 Blatch. 92; Desty, Adm. § 357; 48 Fed. Rep. 760; 54 id. 411; 37 id. 330; 144 U. S. 871.

For steam-vessels about to meet. 1. When steam-vessels on different courses are about to meet under such circumstances as to involve the risk of collision, each vessel must put her helm to port, so as always to pass on the larboard side of the other.

2. A steam-vessel passing another in a narrow channel must always leave the vessel she is passing on the larboard hand.

The following abstract of authorities may also be referred to as furnishing rules of decision (in addition to the general rules of navigation) in the particular cases alluded to; and they will be found generally applicable in cases of collision arising under the new regulations, as well as in cases arising under the general maritime law.

When a steamer or other vessel is about to pass another vessel proceeding in the same general direction, she must allow the foremost boat to keep her way and course, and must take the necessary measures to avoid a collision; 23 How. 448; Abb. Adm. Pr. 108; Olc. 505; 1 Blatch. 363.

A vessel under sail or steam is bound to keep clear of a vessel stationary or at anchor, provided the latter is in a proper place, and exhibits a proper light,—the presumption in such cases being that the vessel in motion is at fault; 1 How. 89; 19 id. 103; 3 Kent 231; Daveis 359; 1 Swab. 88; 3 W. Rob. 49.

A vessel entering a harbor is bound to keep the most vigilant watch to avoid a collision; 18 How. 584; Daveis 359; see 51 Fed. Rep. 766; and in the night-time she ought generally to have her whole crew on deck; Daveis 359. And see 3 Kent 231; 1 Dods. 467.

By the general maritime law, vessels upon the high seas were not ordinarily required constantly to exhibit a light; 2 W. Rob. 4; 3 id. 49; 2 Wall. Jr. 268; but the subject is now regulated by statute in the various maritime countries.

Regulations made by various governments are binding upon all vessels within the jurisdiction of that government; Story, Confl. Laws, ch. 14; 1 Swab. 88, 63, 96; 1 How. 28; 14 Pet. 99; but it is beyond power of the legislature to make rules applicable to foreign vessels when beyond their jurisdiction; that is, more than a marine league from their shores; 1 Swab. 96. And see 18 How. 223; 21 id. 184. It has, accordingly, been held that an English rule is not applicable in a case of collision on the high seas between a British and a foreign vessel, and that the latter could not set up in its defence a violation of the English statute by the British vessel; 1 Swab. 63, 96; and it was declared that in such a case the general maritime law must be the rule of the court. See 92 U. S. 31.

The British Government, by an Order in Council, in 1863, promulgated certain regulations for preventing collisions at sea. An Order in Council, in 1879, promulgated new regulations, to take effect on September 1, 1880. These were adopted in pursuance of the recommendation of representatives of different nations, and are stated in the last-mentioned Order to have been very generally adopted by commercial nations. They were adapted to the United States with regard to vessels on the high seas and in coast waters, in 1864 (R. S. § 4233). A revised code was adopted by England in 1884, and then was adopted by the United States with reference to vessels on the high seas in 1885. In 1890 by international agreement congress adopted a complete system of rules of the road governing vessels both on the ocean and on our own inland waters. These rules consist of: 1. The International Rules agreed upon by all nations, which went into effect July 1, 1897; 1 R. S. Sup. 781. 2. Rules for the navigation of rivers, harbors, and inland waters of the United States, navigable by sea-going vessels, which went into effect October 7, 1897; 2 R. S. Sup. 620. 3. Rules to regulate the navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters as far east as Montreal, which went into effect March 1, 1895; 2 R. S. Sup. 320. 4. Rules for the navigation of the Red River of the North and rivers entering into the Gulf of Mexico and its tributaries, which are the same as were formerly in use, and are to be found in R. S. § 4233 and its amendments, and rules made pursuant to R. S. § 4412 by the Board of Supervising Inspectors of steam-vessels. Copies of all these rules are furnished on application by the Commissioner of Navigation. These various codes of rules are too long to be set forth here.

It is evident that these rules and regulations were intended to supersede all other rules of navigation, and every other system of vessels' lights, wherever they may be adopted. They establish a well-devised and complete system of vessels' lights, and furnish plain and simple rules of navigation applicable to all the ordinary cases of vessels approaching each other under such circumstances as to involve the risk of collision,—leaving extraordinary cases, such as the meeting of vessels in extremely narrow or other very difficult channels (in respect to which no safe general rule can be devised), to the practical good sense and professional skill of those in charge of such vessels. Under all ordinary circumstances a vessel discharges her full duty to another vessel by a faithful and literal observance of the international rules; 158 U. S. 187. Where there were no positive rules of navigation on a foreign river, but there was a certain practice, it was held that a vessel which disregarded the practice was responsible for a collision occurring thereby; L. R. 15 P. D. 194. A departure from the rules, to be justifiable, must be necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. But that necessity must not have been caused by the negligence or fault of the party disobeying the rule; and courts of admiralty lean against the exceptions; 18 How. 581, 583; 1 W. Rob. 157, 478. And see 2 Curt. C. C. 141, 363; 18 How. 581; 150 U. S. 674; 123 id. 349. It is no excuse that a vessel, in departing from the navigation rules, when rounding the Battery at New York, to say that vessels often agree with each other to do so, when it appears that the vessel in question took upon herself the responsibility of departing from the rules for her own convenience; 14 U. S. App. 684.

The maritime law, however, requires that in collision cases every violation of a rule of navigation, and every other act or omission alleged to be a fault, shall be considered in connection with all the attending circumstances; and when by inevitable accident, or the fault of one of two colliding vessels, a vessel free from fault is suddenly brought into such circumstances of imminent danger as probably to render the deliberate or proper exercise of the judgment and skill of an experienced seaman impossible, an error of judgment, or other mistake, is not regarded as a legal fault; 3 Blatch. 92; 12 How. 461; 14 Wall. 199; 19 id. 54; 54 Fed. Rep. 411; 123 U. S. 349; 144 id. 37.

The proper and continual exhibition of the bright and colored lights which these rules and regulations prescribe, and their careful observance by the officer of the deck and the lookout of every vessel, constitute the very foundation of the system of navigation established by such rules and regulations. The exhibition of such lights, and the strict compliance with the rules in respect to stationing and keeping a competent and careful person in the proper place and exclusively devoted to the discharge of the duties of a lookout, are of the utmost importance.

The stringent requirements of our maritime courts in respect to lookouts may be learned by consulting the following authorities: 10 How. 585; 12 id. 443; 18 id. 108, 223; 21 id. 548, 570; 23 id. 448; 3 Blatch. 92; 5 C. C. App. 390; 58 Fed. Rep. 669; 60 id. 1022. This rule admits of no exception on account of size, in favor of any craft capable of committing injuries; 56 Fed. Rep. 271. A sailing-vessel is entitled to assume that a steam-vessel, approaching her, is being navigated with a proper lookout and with reasonable attention to the obligations laid upon her; 1 U. S. App. 11. The absence of a lookout is not material where the presence of one would not have availed to prevent a collision; 144 U. S. 371.

The neglect to carry or display the lights prescribed by these rules and regulations will always by held, prima facie, a fault, in a collision case; 5 How. 441, 465; 21 id. 548, 556; 3 W. Rob. 191; Swab. 120, 245, 253, 519; 1 Lush. 382; 2 Wall. 538. And, upon the same principles, the neglect, in a fog, to use the prescribed fog-signals will also be considered, prima facie, a fault; Desty, Adm. § 360. See FOG.

It will be observed that the duty of slackening speed, in all cases when risk of collision is involved, is absolutely and imperatively imposed upon every steam-vessel, by these regulations, and that they require that every steam-vessel shall stop and reverse her engine when necessary to avoid a collision.

The duty of slackening speed in order to avoid a collision had been frequently declared by the maritime courts before the adoption of these regulations; 3 Hagg. Adm. 414; 3 Blatch. 92; Swab. 188; 2 W. Rob. 1; 3 id. 95, 270, 377; 10 How. 557; 12 id. 443; 18 id. 108; but there was no inflexible rule requiring a steamer to slacken speed in all cases when there was risk of collision; and the neglect to do it was held to be a fault only in those cases where its necessity was shown by the proofs. This left the question open to be determined by the courts in each particular case, and perhaps upon vague and unreliable estimates of time and distance and bearings, or upon conflicting and unsatisfactory testimony; but the legislature, in view of the great power and speed of the steamers now in general use, and the very disastrous consequences of a collision of such vessels when running at their ordinary speed, has wisely made the duty imperative; 5 Blatch. 256; 10 How. 586; 91 U. S. 200; 7 U. S. App. 20. See COLLISION; MARITIME LAW.

NAVIRE. In French Law. A ship. Emerig. Traite des Assur. c. 6, § 1.

NAVY. The whole shipping, taken collectively, belonging to the government of an independent nation, and appropriated for the purposes of naval warfare. It does not include ships belonging to private individuals nor (in the United States, at least) revenue vessels or transports in the service of the war department.

Under the constitution, congress has power to provide and maintain a navy. This power authorizes the government to buy and build vessels of war, to establish a naval academy, and to provide for the punishment of desertion and other crimes, and to make all needful rules for the government of the navy. See 3 Wheat. 337; 20 How. 65; 3 Wheat. 370.

NAVY BILLS. Bills drawn by the officers of the British navy for their pay, etc.

A bill of exchange drawn by the paymaster of a United States vessel, while abroad, to procure money for the expenses of his ship or fleet.

NAVY DEPARTMENT. See DEPARTMENT.

NAVY LIST. An official account of the officers of the British navy, with a list of the ships, published quarterly.

NAVY REGISTER. An official list published semi-annually of the officers of the United States navy, their stations, rates of pay, etc., with a list of the ships.

NE ADMITTAS (Lat.). The name of a writ now practically obsolete, so called from the first words of the Latin form, by which the bishop is forbidden to admit to a benefice the other party's clerk during the pendency of a quare impedit. Fitzh. N. B. 37; Reg. Orig. 31; 3 Bla. Com. 248; 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 31.

NE BAILA PAS (he did not deliver). In Pleading. A plea in detinue, by which the defendant denies the delivery to him of the thing sued for.

NE DISTURBA PAS. In Pleading. The general issue in quare impedit. Hob. 162. See Rast. Entr. 517; Winch, Entr. 703. Andr. Steph. Pl. 230.

NE DONA PAS, NON DEDIT. In Pleading. The general issue in formedon. It is in the following formula: "And the said C D, by J K, his attorney, comes and defends the right, when, etc., and says that the said E F did not give the said manor, with the appurtenances, or any part thereof, to the said G B, and the heirs of his body issuing, in manner and form as the said A B hath in his count above alleged. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." 10 Wentw. Pl. 182; Andr. Steph. Pl. 230.

NE EXEAT REPUBLICA, NE EXEAT REGNO (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ originally employed in England as a high prerogative process, for political purposes; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1467; 50 N. H. 353; but now applied in civil matters only, issued by a court of chancery, directed to the sheriff, reciting that the defendant in the case is indebted to the complainant, and that he designs going quickly into parts without the state, to the damage of the complainant, and then commanding him to cause the defendant to give bail in a certain sum that he will not leave the state without leave of the court, and for want of such bail that he, the sheriff, do commit the defendant to prison.

This writ is a part of the English chancery practice and is usually a part of that practice in states where it is in force. It may be issued by the United States District Courts; 48 Fed. Rep. 492.

This writ has been expressly abolished in very many of the states. Yet its place has been filled by other methods of procedure, similar in effect. The constitutions of Vermont, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Mississippi, and Louisiana prohibit any restraint upon emigration. In Arkansas the writ is abolished, and in the code of New York a system of arrest and bail is substituted. In Ohio and California it is abolished; 27 Ohio 654; 49 Cal. 465. In those jurisdictions where ne exeat is still recognized, the circumstances under which the writ will be granted, and the requisites to its issuance, are largely regulated by statute; but certain general principles govern in nearly every case. These will be found set forth in Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 191. See 14 Amer. Dec. 560, n.

This writ is issued to prevent debtors from escaping from their creditors. It amounts, in ordinary civil cases, to nothing more than process to hold to bail, or to compel a party to give security to abide the decree to be made in his case; Bisp. Eq. § 36; 2 Kent 32; 1 Clark 551; Beames, Ne Exeat; 13 Viner, Abr. 537; 1 Suppl. to Ves. Jr. 33, 352, 467; 1 Bla. Com. 138; Madd. Ch. Pr.; 1 Smith, Ch. Pr. 576; 19 V. & B. 312; 6 Johns. Ch. 138; 27 Ohio 666; 46 Vt. 708; 1 Del. Ch. 32; id. 295; 6 Phila. 143.

Arrest under this writ is not in violation of a constitutional provision that a person shall not be imprisoned for debt, unless in cases of tort, or where there is a strong presumption of fraud; 16 Colo. 75.

The writ may be issued against foreigners subject to the jurisdiction of the court, citizens of the same state, or of another state, when it appears by a positive affidavit that the defendant is about to leave the state, or has threatened to do so, and that the debt would be lost or endangered by his departure; 3 Johns. Ch. 75, 412; 7 id. 192; 1 Hopk. Ch. 499. On the same principle which has been adopted in the courts of law that a defendant could not be held to bail twice for the same cause of action, it has been decided that a writ of ne exeat was not properly issued against a defendant who had been held to bail in an action at law; 8 Ves. 594.

This writ can be issued only for equitable demands; 4 Des. Eq. 108; 6 Johns. Ch. 138; 1 Hopk. Ch. 499; and not where the plaintiff by process of law may hold the defendant to bail; 3 Bro. C. C. 218; 8 Ves. Jr. 593; 36 Ga. 573; 18 N. J. Eq. 249; 28 Wisc. 245; and where there is an adequate remedy at law, the writ will be dissolved; 30 Ga. 965. It may be allowed in a case to prevent the failure of justice; 2 Johns. Ch. 191. When the demand is strictly legal, it cannot be issued, because the court has no jurisdiction. When the court has concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of common law, the writ may, in such case, issue, unless the party has been already arrested at law; 2 Johns. Ch. 170. In all cases when a writ of ne exeat is claimed, the plaintiff's equity must appear on the face of the bill; 3 Johns. Ch. 414.

The writ may be provided for in the final decree and will continue in force until dissolved by the court or until the decree is satisfied; 48 Fed. Rep. 492. It is not superseded by a subsequent bond for the performance of final decree; 36 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 951. It may be granted on motion founded on affidavit, but where the facts charged in the bill are such as to entitle the complainant to the writ, it is sufficient to refer to them as showing the ground of the complainant's demand without restating them in the affidavit; 1 Del. Ch. 32.

The amount of bail is assessed by the court itself; and a sum is usually directed sufficient to cover the existing debt and a reasonable amount of future interest, having regard to the probable duration of the suit; 1 Hopk. Ch. 501.

The defendant arrested upon a writ of ne exeat may obtain a discharge of the writ upon giving bond, with surety, to answer and be amenable to the process of the court; 141 U. S. 260.

NE INJUSTE VEXES (Lat.). In Old English Law. The name of a writ which issued to relieve a tenant upon whom his lord had distrained for more services than he was bound to perform.

It was a prohibition to the lord, not unjustly to distrain or vex his tenant. Fitzh. N. B. Having been long obsolete, it was abolished in 1833.

NE LUMINIBUS OFFICIATUR (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which restrains the owner of a house from making such erections as obstruct the light of the adjoining house. Dig. 8. 4. 15. 17; SERVITUDE.

NE RECIPIATUR (Lat.). That it be not received. A caveat or words of caution given to a law officer, by a party in a cause, not to receive the next proceedings of his opponent. 1 Sell. Pr. 8.

NE RELESSA PAS (Law Fr.). The name of a replication to a plea of release, by which the plaintiff insists he did not release. 2 Bulstr. 55.

NE UNQUES ACCOUPLE (Law Fr.). In Pleading. A plea by which the party denies that he ever was lawfully married to the person to whom it refers. See the form, 2 Wils. 118; 10 Wentw. Pl. 158; 2 H. Bla. 145; 3 Chitty, Pl. 599.

NE UNQUES EXECUTOR. In Pleading. A plea by which the party who uses it denies that the plaintiff is an executor, as he claims to be; or that the defendant is executor, as the plaintiff in his declaration charges him to be. 1 Chitty, Pl. 484; 1 Saund. 274, n. 3; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 D 2); 2 Chitty, Pl. 498.

NE UNQUES SEISIE QUE DOWER. In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant denies the right of a widow who sues for and demands her dower in lands, etc., late of her husband, because the husband was not on the day of her marriage with him, or at any time afterwards, seised of such estate, so that she could be endowed of the same. See 2 Saund. 329; 10 Wentw. Pl. 159; 3 Chitty, Pl. 598, and the authorities there cited.

NE UNQUES SON RECEIVER. In Pleading. The name of a plea in an action of account-render, by which the defendant affirms that he never was receiver of the plaintiff. 12 Viner, Abr. 183.

NE VARIETUR (Lat. that it be not changed). A form sometimes written by notaries public upon bills or notes, for the purpose of identifying them. This does not destroy their negotiability. 8 Wheat. 338.

NEAP TIDES. Those tides which happen between the full and change of the moon, twice in every twenty-four hours. 18 Cal. 21.

NEAR. Close or at no great distance. 109 N. C. 358. Near is a relative term, and its precise meaning depends upon circumstances; 44 Mo. 197; 5 Allen 221; 39 N. J. Eq. 435; 108 U. S. 211; 31 Fed. Rep. 872.

Two and one half miles was held to be near; 44 Mo. 197.

NEAREST. Not necessarily nearest by geographical measurement, but by convenience of access, having regard to the usual travelled route. 54 Tex. 307. See MILEAGE.

NEAT, NET. The exact weight of an article, without the bag, box, keg, or other thing in which it may be enveloped.

NEAT CATTLE. Oxen or heifers. Whart. Dict. "Beeves" may include neat stock, but all neat stock are not beeves; 36 Tex. 324; 32 id. 479. The term neat cattle includes a cow. 17 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 745.

NEAT LAND. Land let out to the yeomanry. S. W. Cowel.

NEATNESS. In Pleading. The statement in apt and appropriate words of all the necessary facts and no more. Lawes, Plead. 62.

NEBRASKA. One of the states of the American Union, being the thirty-seventh admitted to the Union.

Its territory formed a part of the province of Louisiana as ceded by France, and was afterwards included in the district and the territory of Louisiana as organized in 1804 and 1805, respectively, and in the territory of Missouri, to which the name of the last-named territory was changed in 1812. The territory of Nebraska, extending beyond the limits of the present state westward to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and northward to the British possessions, was organized by the act of May 30, 1854. An enabling act for the formation of a state government was passed April 19, 1864; a state constitution was adopted June 21, 1866; on the 9th of February, 1867, an act was passed for the admission of the state into the Union, on condition that civil rights and the elective franchise should be secured to all races, excepting Indians not taxed; and on the first of March, 1867, a proclamation by the president announced the acceptance of this condition, whereupon by the terms of the act the admission of the state became complete. The present constitution was adopted October 12, 1875.

THE LEGISLATURE.—The legislative power is vested in a senate and a house of representatives. The senate consists of thirty-three members, and the house of one hundred, apportioned according to population every five years. The regular sessions are biennial, and begin on the first Tuesday in January. The pay of members is limited to a session of forty days. A majority of the members elected to each house is necessary for the passage of a bill. Acts of the legislature take effect three months after the end of the session at which passed, unless in case of an emergency declared by the vote of two-thirds of the elected members of each house.

THE EXECUTIVE.—The supreme executive power is vested in a Governor, who, with the Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, Auditor of Public Accounts, Treasurer, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Attorney General, and Commissioner of Public Lands and Buildings, is elected biennially. The governor must be at least thirty years of age, and have been for two years a citizen of the United States and of the state. The governor has the pardoning power, except in treason, when it rests with the legislature, and in cases of impeachment; and has a qualified veto, which may be applied to single items of appropriation. The treasurer is ineligible to the same office for two years after two consecutive terms.

THE JUDICIARY.—The courts of record are the Supreme Court, District Courts, and County Courts. Judges are elected. The Supreme Court is composed of three judges, elected alternately, for six years, the senior judge presiding. The supreme court has original jurisdiction in civil cases in which the state is a party, in revenue cases, and in matters of mandamus, quo warranto, and habeas corpus. Terms are held twice a year at the capital. The state is divided into fifteen judicial districts, in each of which a judge is elected for four years, who holds the district court in the several counties in his district successively. This is a court of first instance in civil cases involving over $100; and is the criminal trial court in all but petty cases. Inferior to the district courts are the county courts, with jurisdiction of probate business, and of minor civil and criminal matters; and police courts, and courts of justices of the peace, with the ordinary functions of such tribunals. Appeals lie in all cases from these lower courts to the district courts.

Jurisprudence.—The common law of England is the basis of the law of this state. Practice is under a code of procedure, based on that of Ohio. The distinction between legal and equitable proceedings is abolished. There is one form of civil action. The pleadings are the petition, the answer, and the reply. There is a very liberal rule as to amendments. Actions are in the name of "the real party in interest." Married women have full civil and property rights. Exemptions are broad; and there is a liberal stay law.

NECATINE. The act of killing.

NECESSARIES. Such things as are proper and requisite for the sustenance of man, including food, clothing, medicine, and habitation. 47 Minn. 250.

The term necessaries is not confined merely to what is requisite barely to support life, but includes many of the conveniences of refined society. It is a relative term, which must be applied to the circumstances and conditions of the parties; Add. Contr. 382; 7 S. & R. 247. Ornaments and superfluities of dress, such as are usually suitable to the party's rank and situation in life; 1 Campb. 120; 7 C. & P. 52; 8 Term 578; 47 Minn. 250; some degree of education; 4 M. & W. 727; 16 Vt. 683; lodging and house-rent; 1 B. & P. 340; see 12 Metc. 559; 1 M. & W. 67; 5 Q. B. 606; board bill; 83 Me. 305; pew rent; 40 Conn. 75; horses, saddles, bridles, liquors, pistols, but powder, whips, and fiddles have been held not to be necessaries; 1 Bibb 519; 2 N. & M'C. 524. Nor is an infant liable on a contract for the erection of a dwelling-house; 78 Hun 603. But a racing bicycle is a necessary for an apprentice earning 21*s.* a week and living with his parents; 78 L. T. 296.

The rule for determining what are necessaries is that whether articles of a certain kind or certain subjects of expenditure are or are not such necessaries as an infant may contract for, is a matter of law, and for instruction by the court; but the question whether any particular things come under these classes, and the question, also, as to quantity, are generally matters for the jury to determine; 10 Vt. 225; 12 Metc. 559; 11 N. H. 51; 1 Bibb 519; 2 Humphr. 27; 3 Day 37; 6 M. & W. 42; 6 C. & P. 690; Ans. Contr. 113; Poll. Contr. 67.

Infants, when not maintained by parent or guardian, may contract for necessaries; 4 M. & W. 727; 16 Mass. 28; 10 Mo. 451; 9 Johns. 141; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.), 345. But when living with and supported by their parents they are not liable for necessaries; 4 Wend. 403; 61 Ill. 177; 48 Mo. App. 59; Ewell, Lead. Cas. 55. Nor can an infant pledge his father's credit, as a wife can her husband's, for abandonment of duty; 17 Vt. 348; 6 M. & W. 482; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 328. Infants are not liable at law for borrowed money, though expended for necessaries; 10 Mod. 67; 1 Bibb 519; 7 W. & S. 83, 88; 10 Vt. 225. See 1 P. Wms. 558; 7 N. H. 368; 2 Hill S. C. 400; 32 N. H. 345. Otherwise in equity; 1 P. Wms. 558; 2 Duvall 149; 7 W. & S. 88. But they are liable for money advanced at their request to a third party to pay for necessaries: 1 Den. 460; 10 Cush. 486; 7 N. H. 368; 2 Hill S. C. 400; 83 Me. 305. An infant is not liable upon a bill of exchange at the suit of an indorsee of the bill, although it was accepted for the price of necessaries; [1891] 1 Q. B. 413. Services rendered by an attorney to an infant in examining the public records and advising him as to his rights to certain property are not necessaries; 48 Neb. 391. Necessaries for the infant's wife and children are necessaries for himself;

Stra. 168; Com. Dig. Enfant (B 5); 1 Bibb 519; 2 N. & M'C. 523; 9 Johns. 144; 16 Mass. 31; 14 B. Monr. 232. As to a note or acceptance by an infant for necessaries, see 35 Cent. Law J. 203. See INFANT.

When a wife is living with her husband, it is presumed that she has his assent to pledge his credit for necessaries. See 35 Me. 332; 83 id. 132; 79 Wis. 147; 64 Hun 634. But this presumption may be rebutted by showing a prohibition on his part or that he has already supplied her with necessaries. The fact of cohabitation is not conclusive of the husband's assent; 2 Ld. Raym. 1006; 34 N. H. 420; 39 N. Y. 351; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 80; 29 Am. L. Reg. 324. But if the husband altogether neglects to supply the wife, she may pledge his credit notwithstanding he has forbidden tradesmen to trust her; the law here raising a presumption of agency to enforce the marital obligation and protect the wife; 41 Barb. 558; 15 Conn. 535; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 77; 2 Misc. Rep. 49. A wife is ordinarily authorized to purchase clothing on the husband's credit only in case of necessity, and where the wife has habitually clothed herself out of her separate income which is adequate for that purpose, the husband is not liable for clothing ordered by her; 47 N. E. Rep. 408; 114 Mass. 424; 133 id. 513. See 67 Me. 238. The husband is also liable when away from his wife without her fault or by his own misconduct; 24 Ala. 337; 8 Ia. 51; 8 Gray 172; 2 Kent 146; 43 Ill. App. 39; 160 Mass. 149. In order to charge a husband with necessaries sold to his wife, it must affirmatively appear that the goods were sold on the husband's credit; 7 Misc. Rep. 118. But otherwise where it is the wife's fault; 10 Ill. 569; 29 N. H. 63; 40 Vt. 68; 19 Wisc. 268. But if the wife elopes, though it be not with an adulterer, he is not chargeable even for necessaries; the very fact of the elopement and separation is sufficient to put persons on inquiry, and whoever gives credit to the wife afterwards gives it at his peril; 1 Stra. 647; 11 Johns. 281; 3 Pick. 289; 2 Halst. 146; 2 Kent 123; Bacon, Abr. Baron and Feme (H); 1 Hare & W. Sel. Dec. 104, 106; 6 C. B. N. S. 519; 19 Wisc. 268. See MARRIED WOMAN. Insane persons are liable for necessaries; Pars. Contr. 420, note 2; 5 B. & C. 170; 10 Allen 59; 56 Me. 308. See, generally, Schouler, Dom. Rel.; Ewell, Lead. Cas. on Coverture, etc.; 29 Am. L. Reg. 324; 32 Mich. 204; 12 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 859; MARRIED WOMAN.

NECESSARY. Reasonably convenient. 19 So. Rep. 202.

This word has great flexibility of meaning. It is used to express mere convenience, or that which is indispensable to the accomplishment of a purpose, 43 Ill. 307. It frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another; 4 Wheat. 414.

As used in a code exempting the wages of a laboring man when necessary for the support of his family in whole or in part, it does not mean that his wages must be absolutely indispensable to the bare subsistence of the family and that the family could not live without them, but is used in a broader and less rigid sense looking rather to the comfort and well being of the family, and contemplates the furnishing to it whatever is necessary to its comfort and well-being as distinguished from luxuries. 29 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 337.

Witness fees are not necessary disbursements where witnesses were not called at the trial, unless the party shows why he did not call them; 28 N. Y. Supp. 663.

Necessary material for the construction of a railroad includes the railroad as a completed structure, station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn outs, and water tanks. 150 U. S. 1.

Necessary help. A physician may be appointed by a warden of a state prison under authority to appoint all necessary help. 13 Nev. 419.

Necessary implication. In construing a will, not a natural necessity, but so strong a probability that a contrary construction cannot be supported. 1 V. & B. 466.

NECESSITOUS CIRCUMSTANCES. In the civil code of Louisiana the words are used relative to the fortune of the deceased and to the condition in which the claimant lived during the marriage. 43 La. Ann. 1140.

NECESSITY. That which makes the contrary of a thing impossible.

Necessity is of three sorts: of conservation of life; see DURESS; of obedience, as the obligation of civil subjection, and, in some cases, the coercion of a wife by her husband; and necessity of the act of God, or of a stranger. Jacob; Moz. & W.

Whatever is done through necessity is done without any intention; and as the act is done without will (q. v.) and is compulsory, the agent is not legally responsible; Whart. Cr. L. § 95; Bacon, Max. Reg. 5. Hence the maxim, Necessity has no law; indeed, necessity is itself a law which cannot be avoided nor infringed. Clef des Lois Rom.; Dig. 10. 3. 10. 1; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (3 M 20, 3 M 30). As to the circumstances which constitute necessity, see 1 Russ. Cr. 16, 20; 2 Stark. Ev. 713; 31 Ind. 189; 4 Cush. 243; 55 Ga. 126.

NECK-VERSE. The Latin sentence Miserere mei, Deus, Ps. li. 1, because the reading of it was made a test for those who claimed benefit of clergy (q. v.).

> If a monk had been taken
> For stealing of bacon,
> For burglary, murder, or rape;
> If he could but rehearse
> (Well prompt) his neck-verse,
> He never could fail to escape.
> Brit. Apollo 1710; Whart. Dict.

NEEDLESSLY. In a statute with reference to the needless killing or bad treatment of animals, it denotes an act done without any useful motive, in a spirit of wanton cruelty, or for the mere pleasure of destruction. 29 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 933; 37 Ark. 460; 4 Mo. App. 215.

NEFAS. That which is against right or divine law; a wicked thing or act. Calv. Lex.

NEGATIVE. Negative propositions are usually much more difficult of proof than affirmative, and in cases where they are involved, it is often a nice question upon which side lies the burden of proof. The general rule has been thus stated: Whoever asserts a right dependent for its existence upon a negative, must establish the truth of the negative, except where the matter is peculiarly within the knowledge of the adverse party. Otherwise rights of which a negative forms an essential element may be enforced without proof; 72 Ind. 113; s. c. 37 Am. Rep. 141; 78 N. Y. 480. Thus inactions for malicious prosecution, the plaintiff must prove that there was no probable cause; 67 Ind. 375; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454. The rule applies whenever the claim is founded in a breach of duty in not repairing highways, and in cases of mutual negligence; 78 N. Y. 480; Shearm. & Red. Neg. 312. So one must prove the allegation that a negotiable promissory note was not taken in payment of a debt; 68 Ind. 254. So the onus is on a plaintiff who assigns as a breach by tenant that he did not repair; 9 C. & P. 734; 6 H. L. C. 672; 12 Mod. 526. In all actions for breach of warranty of the soundness of a personal chattel, the plaintiff must prove the negative. "It may be stated as a test admitting of universal application, that whether the proposition be affirmative or negative, the party against whom judgment would be given, as to a particular issue, supposing no proof to be offered on either side, has on him, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, the burden of proof which he must satisfactorily sustain." 1 Whart. Ev. § 357; see 14 M. & W. 95; 5 Cra. C. C. 298; 119 Mass. 469; 47 Pa. 476; 62 N. Y. 448; 33 Miss. 292; 39 Wis. 520; 69 Ill. 423; 52 Mo. 390; 123 U. S. 317; article in 25 Alb. L. Jour. 124; BURDEN OF PROOF; Tayl. Ev. § 365.

NEGATIVE AVERMENT. In Pleading. An averment in some of the pleadings in a case in which a negative is asserted.

NEGATIVE CONDITION. One where the thing which is the subject of it must not happen. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 751. See POSITIVE CONDITION.

NEGATIVE COVENANT. See COVENANT.

NEGATIVE EASEMENT. See EASEMENT.

NEGATIVE PREGNANT. In Pleading. Such a form of negative expression as may imply or carry within it an affirmative. 134 Ind. 46.

Thus, where a defendant pleaded a license from the plaintiff's daughter, and the plaintiff rejoined that he did not enter by her license, the rejoinder was objected to successfully as a negative pregnant; Cro. Jac. 87. The fault here lies in the ambiguity of the rejoinder, since it does not appear whether the plaintiff denies that the license was given or that the defendant entered by the license; Steph. Pl. 381.

This ambiguity constitutes the fault; Hob. 295; which, however, does not appear to be of much account in modern pleading; Com. Dig. Pleader (R 6); Gould, Pl. c. 6, § 36.

A special denial in the words of the allegation denied is a mere negative pregnant and a motion to make more definite and certain will lie; 60 Hun 582. A mere denial in the language of the complaint, that a partial payment was made on a specified day, is an admission that the payment was made on some other day; 81 Wis. 581.

NEGATIVE STATUTE. One which is enacted in negative terms, and which so controls the common law that it has no force in opposition to the statute. Bac. Abr. Statutes (G); Brook, Abr. Parliament, pl. 72; Bish. Writ. L. § 153.

NEGGILDARE. To claim kindred. Jac. L. Dict.

NEGLECT. To omit, as to neglect business, or payment, or duty, or work. It does not generally imply carelessness or imprudence, but simply an omission to do or perform some work, duty, or act. 54 N. Y. 262. See NEGLIGENCE.

NEGLIGENCE. The omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or the doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. 11 Ex. 784. See Webb, Poll. Torts 537; 4 Ind. App. 515. The standard is not that of a particular man, but of the average prudent man; 3 Bing. N. C. 468.

The failure to observe, for the protection of the interests of another person, that degree of care, precaution, and vigilance which the circumstances justly demand, whereby such other person suffers injury. Cooley, Torts 630; 91 Cal. 296.

The absence of care according to circumstances. See 78 Pa. 219; 46 Tex. 356; 9 W. Va. 252.

Such an omission by a reasonable person, to use that degree of care, diligence, and skill which it was his legal duty to use for the protection of another person from injury as, in a natural and continuous sequence, causes unintended injury to the latter. 25 Fla. 1.

The failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or the doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. 95 U. S. 441. See 82 Wis. 408.

Negligence, in its civil relation, is such an inadvertent imperfection, by a responsible human agent, in the discharge of a legal duty, as immediately produces, in an ordinary and natural sequence, a damage to another. Whart. Negl. § 3. It is conceded by all the authorities that the standard by which to determine whether a person has been guilty of negligence is the conduct of the prudent or careful or diligent man. Bigelow, Torts 261; 72 Tex. 592; 85 Ky. 423; 129 Ill. 335; 85 Tenn. 465. See 116 Mo. 450.

It is synonymous with, or about equivalent to, common prudence. 79 Ga. 44.

The opposite of care and prudence, the omission to use the means reasonably necessary to avoid injury to others. 39 Ill. 353. Opposed to diligence or carefulness. 95 Cal. 279.

The result of a failure to perform a duty. 109 Mo. 187; 33 Neb. 802. It implies a duty as well as its breach, and the fact can never be found in the absence of a duty; 55 Ark. 428.

When a contract creates a duty, the neglect to perform that duty, as well as the negligent performance of it, is a ground of action for tort. Hence it is at the election of the party injured to sue either on the contract or on the tort; Whart. Negl. § 435; 4 Gray 485; 24 Conn. 392; but there must be privity of contract between the parties, therefore an attorney who made a mistake in drawing a will is not liable to a person who, by the mistake, is deprived of a gift intended for him by the testator; 110 Cal. 339.

It is said that liability for negligence depends on the probability of the consequences, i. e. its capability of being foreseen by a reasonable man; Poll. Torts 37.

A person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences, but not against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur. See 5 Ex. 248. Some cases have gone to the extent of maintaining an action in tort even where no attempt has been made to perform a contract; 13 Ired. 39; 11 Cl. & F. 1.

It is said not to be essential to constitute negligence that the damage caused might reasonably have been expected from the negligent act; Whart. Negl. § 16. Thus Gray, C. J., says, in 107 Mass. 494: "A man who negligently sets fire on his own land and keeps it negligently, is liable to an action at common law for any injury done by the spreading or communication of the fire directly from his own land to the property of another, whether through the air or along the ground, and whether he might or might not have reasonably anticipated the particular manner in which it was communicated." And in L. R. 6 C. P. 14, where a railway company left a pile of rubbish in hot weather by the side of their track, and the pile was ignited by sparks from an engine, and the fire crossed a field and burned the plaintiff's cottage, Channell, B., said: "When there is no direct evidence of negligence, the question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in considering the question whether there is evidence for the jury of negligence or not, . . . but when it has been once determined that there has been evidence of negligence, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not."

Where a person unlawfully injures another, he is liable in damages, without regard to the intention with which the act was done; 32 N. J. L. 554; 44 N. H. 211; and good faith does not excuse negligence; 32 Vt. 652; 3 Sneed 677. As to the right of action for negligence resulting in the death of the injured person, see ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM PERSONA.

The damage caused must arise from inadvertence. If it be intentional, a suit for negligence will not lie; the remedy is in trespass and not case.

One negligent person cannot escape liability for his negligence because the negligence of another concurred in producing the injury; 119 Ind. 583.

Proof of negligence. The first requisite for the plaintiff is to show the existence of the duty which he alleges has not been performed, and then he must show a failure to observe this duty; that is, he must establish negligence on the defendant's part. This is an affirmative fact, the presumption always being, until the contrary appears, that every man will perform his duty; Cooley, Torts 659. It is not sufficient for the plaintiff to prove a state of facts consistent with the accident having been caused either by the negligence of the defendant or by that of the person injured. He must prove that it was caused by the defendant; 12 App. Cas. 41. In many cases evidence of the injury done makes out a prima facie case of negligence on the defendant's part; for instance, when a bailee returns in an injured condition an article loaned to him, or when a passenger on a railway train is injured without fault on his part.

As a general rule this liability cannot be avoided by stipulation; thus, a common carrier will not be permitted to contract for immunity from the results of its own negligence or that of its agents: 4 Ohio St. 362; 114 Pa. 523; 111 N. C. 482; 94 Ind. 281; 34 Ga. 315; 90 Tenn. 17; 2 Hill N. Y. 623; 101 Mo. 631; 84 Ill. 239; 14 Bush 590; 89 Ala. 294; 3 Col. 280; 41 Conn. 333; 4 Sandf. 136; 102 Mass. 552; 26 Gratt. 328; 3 Kan. 205; 69 Miss. 191; 9 Ir. R. C. L. 20; 75 Tex. 300; 4 Ben. 271; this may be considered as the rule generally followed in this country, in which the leading case is Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, where the authorities are collected by Bradley, J. In England, however, the courts seem to find no conclusive objection to sustaining such contracts when specially made; L. R. 10 Q. B. 212; 5 East 438; 23 U. C. Q. B. 600; and in New York, though the contracts are upheld, it is only when expressed in clear and specific language and not by mere general words in the usual printed bills of lading or receipts; 1 Jones & S. 423; 19 id. 196, following 56 N. Y. 168; 71 id. 180. So the liability may be limited in consideration of a reduced rate of transportation; 86 Va. 481; L. R. 8 H. L. 703; L. R. 10 Q. B. D. 250; 18 C. B. 805;

29 L. J. Ex. 441; or by special contract, for all negligence except gross; 42 Ill. App. 322. Such a contract, made in New York, was enforced in an action in Pennsylvania according to the law of New York; 128 Pa. 217. See 35 A. & E. R. Cas. 672; COMMON CARRIERS; FLAG.

By an act of February 13, 1893 (Harter Act), common carriers by land or sea cannot exempt themselves from responsibility for loss or damage arising from the negligence of their own servants, and any stipulation for such exemption is contrary to public policy and void. The Harter Act (q. v.) provides that if the owner of a vessel transporting merchandise to or from any port in the United States shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy, when properly manned, etc., neither the vessel, or her owner or charterer, shall be liable for errors in navigation or in the management of the vessel. In England, except so far as controlled by the railway and canal traffic act of 1854, carriers can exempt themselves from responsibility for loss occasioned by the negligence of servants; 42 Ch. D. 321; 168 U. S. 116.

Taking precaution after an accident against the future is not to be construed as an admission of responsibility for the past; 20 U. S. App. 326; so a subsequent alteration or repair of the machine which caused an injury is not evidence of negligence in its original construction; 144 U. S. 202.

There is a rule exempting public charitable corporations from liability for negligence, but the Young Men's Christian Association is not within the rule; 165 Mass. 280.

Law or fact. It is generally said that the question of negligence is a mixed question of law and fact, to be decided by the court when the facts are undisputed or conclusively proved, but not to be withdrawn from the jury when the facts are disputed, and the evidence is conflicting; Whart. Negl. § 420; 134 Ind. 269; see 17 R. I. 658; 36 W. Va. 329. In the great majority of cases the question is left to the jury to determine whether the defendant's conduct was reasonable under the circumstances. When a well-recognized legal duty rested upon the plaintiff, it is usual for the court to define this duty to the jury, and leave to it the question as to whether the plaintiff fulfilled this duty. More recently the courts have drawn a distinction between what is evidence of negligence for the jury and what is negligence per se, and therefore a question of law for the court, and the tendency has been rather to increase the number of cases in which the question of negligence is passed upon by the court. In Pennsylvania, when the standard of duty is defined by law, and is the same under all circumstances, and when there has been such an obvious disregard of duty and safety as amounts to misconduct, the courts have withdrawn the case from the consideration of the jury. It is said to be clear, by most of the authorities, that when the facts are found, and it is perfectly manifest that a prudent man would or would not do as the defendant has done, the court may rule accordingly, or rather, may direct the jury to find accordingly. The same is also true when the law has prescribed the nature of the duty, and also when there exists a well-known practice in the community, of a proper character. In other cases, the inference concerning negligence is left to the jury; Bigelow, Torts 263; 35 W. Va. 389. See Bigelow, L. C. Torts 589. When the evidence is conflicting, the court should instruct the jury that there would or would not be negligence, accordingly as they might find the facts; 110 N. C. 58.

"When the circumstances of a case are such that the standard of duty is fixed, when the measure of duty is defined by law and is the same under all circumstances, its omission is negligence and may be so declared by the court. But it is said that when the negligence is clearly defined and palpable, such that no verdict of a jury could make it otherwise, or when there is no controversy as to the facts, and from these it clearly appears what course a person of ordinary prudence would pursue under the circumstances, the question of negligence is purely one of law." 2 Thomp. Negl. 1236.

"As a general rule, a question whether a party has been guilty of negligence or not, is one of fact, not of law. Where, however, the plaintiff brings action for a negligent injury, and the action of the two parties must have concurred to produce it, it devolves upon him to show that he was not himself guilty of negligence; and if he gives no evidence to establish that fact, the court may properly instruct the jury that they should return a verdict for defendant. Where, however, the question of negligence depends upon a disputed state of facts, or when the facts, though not disputed, are such that different minds might honestly draw different conclusions from them, the court cannot give such positive instructions, but must leave the jury to draw their own conclusions upon the facts, and upon the question of negligence depending upon them. To warrant the court in any case in instructing the jury that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, the case must be a very clear one against him, and one which would warrant no other inference." Per Cooley, C. J., in 17 Mich. 99.

It is true, in many cases, that when the facts are undisputed, the effect of them is for the judgment of the court. That is true in that class of cases when the existence of such facts comes in question, rather than when deductions or inferences are to be made from the facts (and see 25 Kan. 391). In some cases, too, the necessary inference from the proof is so certain that it may be ruled as a question of law. Certain facts we may suppose to be clearly established from which one sensible, impartial man would infer that proper care had not been used; another man, equally sensible, equally impartial, would infer that proper care had been used. It is this class of cases and those akin to it that the law commits to the decision of a jury. Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and of little education, men of learning and men whose learning consists in what they have themselves seen and heard, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer; these sit together, consult, apply their separate experiences of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw a unanimous conclusion. This average judgment thus given, it is the final effort of the law to obtain; 17 Wall. 663. Although the facts are undisputed, it is for the jury and not for the judge to determine whether proper care was given or whether they established negligence; 73 Ind. 261; 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 613; 48 Neb. 563.

The terms "ordinary care," "reasonable prudence," and such like terms have a relative significance, and cannot be arbitrarily defined; and, when the facts are such that reasonable men differ as to whether there was negligence, the determination of the matter is for the jury; 144 U. S. 408; as it is in all cases where the inference from the facts is not so plain as to make it a legal conclusion that there was negligence; 163 id. 93; and it is only where they would draw the same conclusion that it is a question of law for the court; id. 353; 23 U. S. App. 1; 65 Fed. Rep. 181; and a decision of the trial judge on the question is subject to review; id.

Whether a railroad company should erect guards at its car windows is a question for the jury; 13 U. S. App. 655; so also where a workman, returning from his work on the train and being ordered by the conductor to jump off at a station when the train was moving about four miles an hour and where the platform was about a foot lower than the car step, jumped and was seriously injured, the question of contributory negligence was for the jury; 163 U. S. 93.

It is said that a presumption of negligence arises from the occurrence of an accident in the course of a business, which may, according to expert testimony, be safely carried on if conducted with due care; 107 Cal. 549.

See 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 284, where the subject is fully treated and the earlier decisions collected by states.

In the absence of a contract between the parties, the burden of proof of negligence is on the plaintiff, and if the "evidence is equally consistent with the existence or non-existence of negligence, it is not competent to the judge to leave the matter to the jury;" 11 C. B. N. S. 588; but the rule of the burden of proof is modified when there is a relation of contract between the parties; Poll. Torts 416; as in cases of common-carriers, or where the thing which was the cause of the mischief was "under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident was such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care;" 3 H. & C. 596.

In actions for negligence the English rule is said to be that the "judge has to say whether any facts have been established from which negligence may be reasonably inferred; the jurors have to say whether, from those facts, negligence ought to be inferred;" 3 App. Cas. 197; or better, whether, as reasonable men, they do infer it; Poll. Torts 420.

Contributory negligence. If the evidence shows that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, there can be no recovery; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 14. The distinction, however, must be drawn between condition and causes, between causa causans and causa sine qua non. The question must always be considered whether the act of the plaintiff had a natural tendency to expose him directly to the danger which resulted in the injury complained of. If it had not, the plaintiff's negligence is not considered in law as contributing to the injury. Thus, when the defendant was driving carelessly along the highway, and ran into and injured the plaintiff's donkey, which was straying improperly on the highway with his fore feet fettered, it was held that the plaintiff's negligence had not contributed to the accident; 10 M. & W. 546. It has also been held that if the plaintiff could by the exercise of reasonable care, at or just before the happening of the injury to him, have avoided the same, he cannot recover; 5 C. B. N. S. 573; 75 Mich. 557; 126 Ill. 381. One who sees or could have seen if he had looked, and has the faculties to understand the dangers to which he is exposed, is charged with a knowledge of them; and his failure to act on the knowledge as a prudent and cautious man would act under like circumstances, is negligence which, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant, will defeat a recovery; 73 Cal. 137. And when it appears that the plaintiff, by the defendant's misconduct, became frightened, and in endeavoring to escape the consequence of the defendant's misconduct, rushed into danger and was injured, the plaintiff's conduct does not contribute to the injury; 56 N. Y. 585. If, through the defendant's negligence, the injured person is placed in a position of peril and confronted with sudden danger, the law does not require him to exercise the same degree of care and caution that it does of a person who has ample opportunities for the full exercise of his judgment; 143 Ill. 409; 155 Pa. 279. See 152 U. S. 262. It is a general principle that one who invites another upon his premises is bound to exercise more than ordinary care towards him. If the person giving the invitation is alone benefitted he is responsible for even the slightest negligence. So a storekeeper, who either expressly or impliedly invites the public to enter his place of business for the purpose of trading must exercise a high degree of care to keep his premises in a safe condition, and where such person is accidentally injured the shopkeeper is liable in the absence of negligence on the part of the person injured; 80 Cal. 574; 26 Neb. 118; 82 Mich. 1; 27 Ill. App. 391; 82 Ia. 652; 48 N. Y. 1046; 84 Ala. 186; 134 Pa. 203; so letter-carriers have an implied invitation to enter certain buildings for the purpose of placing mail in boxes; 152 Mass. 513; 52 N. Y. 601; and an employe and contractor for the construction of a building is not a trespasser and may maintain an action for injuries; 58 Hun 610; 12 N. Y. 482. See Webb, Elevators. A person invited to come upon a ship for the purpose of business is entitled to be protected by the exercise of such care and prudence as would render the premises reasonably safe; 8 U. S. App. 129; and one who, while riding in a private carriage of another at his invitation, is injured by the negligence of a third party, may recover against the latter, notwithstanding the negligence of the driver of the carriage may have contributed to the injury; 4 U. S. App. 542. But the owner of land and of buildings is not liable to one who is on his premises as a mere licensee. As one who enters on premises by permission only, without any inducement being held out to him by the occupant, cannot recover for injuries caused by obstructions or pitfalls; 143 Ill. 182; unless it was unlawful to erect the machine or contrivance, or the injury was wilful and wanton; the wilfulness will be presumed from gross negligence; 70 Tex. 400; 23 N. Y. 548; where an elevator is out of order or is intended for freight only and not for passengers, and notice of such fact is duly posted, one who has a reasonable opportunity for seeing and reading such posted notice assumes the risk of venturing on or near such elevator; 137 Ind. 15; 58 Hun 60; 148 Mass. 95; 156 id. 511. There is an ambiguity in the use of the word license in decisions relating to negligence. It is sometimes used for sufferance of a trespass; L. R. 1 C. P. 274; sometimes equivalent to invitation; 4 C. B. N. S. 563, 567. See, also, 2 C. P. D. 310. When the defendant might, by proper care, have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's negligence, the plaintiff may still recover; 85 N. C. 512; 144 U. S. 408; 139 id. 551. See 70 Tex. 602. Contributory negligence has been held to be no defence where defendant's negligence was reckless or wanton; 39 Kan. 531. See 111 N. C. 80.

Contributory negligence is a good defence to an action for damages for a personal injury; and it is immaterial to what extent it is proven, provided it contributed to the injury; 8 Houst. 185; 29 W. Va. 98; in order to bar a recovery, the contributory negligence must have been a proximate cause of the injury; 97 N. C. 11; 100 id. 230; 84 Va. 498; 17 Nev. 245.

In some cases it has been held that the plaintiff must show affirmatively that he was in the exercise of due care, when the injury happened; 88 Ill. 354; 19 Conn. 566; 78 N. Y. 480; 101 Mass. 455; 3 Misc. Rep. 224; 43 Ill. App. 534; 84 Me. 334; 24 U. S. App. 326. This is frequently termed the Illinois rule. Probably the proof need not be direct, but may be inferred from the circumstances of the case; 104 Mass. 137; 2 Thomp. Negl. 1178, n. In other states, contributory negligence is a matter of defence, the burden of proving which is on the defendant; 66 Pa. 30; 85 id. 275; 22 Minn. 152; 65 Mo. 34; 35 Ohio St. 627; 3 Mo. App. 565; 50 Cal. 70; 11 W. Va. 14; 43 Wis. 513; 95 Ala. 397; 88 Ga. 599; 6 U. S. App. 381; 147 U. S. 571; 151 id. 73; 157 Pa. 593; 28 Am. Rep. 558, where the cases are discussed. But even in these courts, if the plaintiff's own showing disclose contributory negligence, he cannot recover. The rule that a plaintiff cannot recover, if himself guilty of contributory negligence, applies where the party inflicting the injury is not guilty of negligence indulged in after the position of the injured party was discovered, or, by the exercise then of reasonable care, could have been discovered; 23 U. S. App. 443.

The fact that the plaintiff lived in his home near a powder magazine, with knowledge of the danger, does not constitute contributory negligence; 12 U. S. App. 665.

The burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant; 24 U. S. App. 176; 147 U. S. 571. It has been said that the true rule is that the onus of proving contributory negligence rests in the first instance on the defendant, although the plaintiff may disclose upon his own case such evidence of it as to relieve the defendant of that primary obligation and shift on to the plaintiff the onus of displacing the effect of his own evidence; 12 Q. B. D. 71.

If the plaintiff, by ordinary care, could have avoided the effect of the negligence of the defendant, he is guilty of contributory negligence, no matter how careless the defendant may have been at the last or any preceding stage; Tuff v. Warman, 2 C. B. N. S. 740. "The true ground of contributory negligence being a bar is that it is the proximate cause (or 'decisive' cause) of the mischief; and negligence on the plaintiff's part, which is only part of the inducing cause (i. e. a 'condition,' not a 'cause'; Whart. Negligence) will not disable him"; Poll. Torts 434; and it "would seem that a person who has by his own act or default deprived himself of ordinary ability to avoid the consequences of another's negligence, can be in no better position than if, having such ability, he had failed to avoid them; unless, indeed, the other has notice of his inability in time to use care appropriate to the emergency; in which case the failure to use that care is the decisive negligence." Poll. Torts 434.

No one is bound to anticipate that others will be guilty of negligence. See L. R. 5 H. L. 45.

Where one is in danger through fault of another and chooses between two methods of escape, he is not negligent if he chooses that which, otherwise, would not be prudent; 12 Q. B. 439. See, further, 15 Wall.

401; 41 Wis. 105; 44 N. Y. 465; 28 Am. Rep. 563, n.; 20 Alb. L. J. 304, 359.

The question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury, under proper instructions, and is not one of law for the court; 9 Utah 141; 144 U. S. 408; 71 Hun 526; 44 Ill. App. 418; 6 Ind. App. 390. Where the evidence of contributory negligence is not of such a conclusive character as would warrant the court in setting aside a verdict, the question should be left to the jury; 147 U. S. 571.

Comparative negligence. In Illinois a rule of comparative negligence has been laid down. If, on comparing the negligence of the plaintiff with that of the defendant, or the negligence of the person injured with that of the person inflicting the injury, the former is found to have been slight and the latter gross, the plaintiff may recover. See 20 Ill. 478; 83 id. 405; 95 id. 25. In 36 Ill. 409, it was said: "The rule of this court is that negligence is relative, and that the plaintiff, although guilty of negligence which may have contributed to the injury, may hold the defendant liable if he has been guilty of a higher degree of negligence, amounting to wilful injury. The fact that the plaintiff is guilty of slight negligence does not absolve the defendant from the use of care and the use of reasonable efforts to avoid the injury." It has also been held that the negligence of the plaintiff must be but slight, and that of the defendant gross in comparison; and both of these terms, "gross" and "slight," or their equivalents, should be used in every instruction to a jury on the subject. "Want of ordinary care is not equivalent to gross negligence;" 8 Bradw. 133; a mere preponderance of negligence against the defendant will not make him liable; 96 Ill. 42. The doctrine of comparative negligence has no application unless the person injured observed ordinary care for his safety with reference to the particular circumstances involved; 44 Ill. App. 56.

This doctrine has been adopted to a certain extent in Kansas; 14 Kan. 37; and perhaps in Georgia. See 30 Fla. 1; 35 W. Va. 389; 87 Mich. 400.

In admiralty, where both ships are in fault, the damages are equally divided; Marsden, Coll. ch. 6; this rule is preserved by the Judicature Act in the Admiralty Division. See 2 L. Quart. R. 357; 13 id. 17; COLLISION; Report, Int. Law Asso. 1895.

Imputed negligence. In cases of actions brought by infants of tender years for damages caused by the defendant's negligence, it has sometimes been held that the negligence of the parent or guardian of the infant, in permitting it to become exposed to danger, is to be imputed to the infant so as to bar its right of action. This rule was laid down in Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615. The doctrine has been much discussed, and this case has been followed, sometimes with modification. See 104 Mass. 53; 88 Ill. 441; 28 Ind. 287; 2 Neb. 319; 52 Cal. 602; 83 Ala. 371; 78 Hun 248; but in other states, especially Pennsylvania (57 Pa. 187; 81 id. 19), its doctrine has been denied; 22 Vt. 213; 59 Tex. 64; 78 Ia. 598; 64 Mich. 514; 16 Neb. 139; 36 Mo. 489; 23 Vroom 446; 142 Mass. 301. The weight of authority is against the New York rule; 30 Ohio St. 451; 19 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 730; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 446. But see L. R. 1 Ex. 239. See, as to injuries to infants, 31 Am. Rep. 206; 14 Cent. L. J. 282. See 15 N. J. L. J. 262.

A child of such tender years as to be incapable of exercising any judgment or discretion is not chargeable with contributory negligence; but where he has attained such an age as to be capable of exercising judgment and discretion, he is held to such a degree of care as might be reasonably expected of one of his age and mental capacity; 39 Minn. 164; 46 Ohio St. 283; 70 Tex. 530; 83 Ala. 371; 81 Ga. 397; 39 Kan. 531; 129 Ill. 91.

At what age an infant's responsibility for negligence is presumed to begin is a question of law for the court; 20 N. Y. S. 262.

The negligence of a gripman on a cable car in running across the crossing of another road undergoing repairs, at an excessive rate of speed, is imputable to the conductor of such car in control of such gripman, and will prevent him recovering for injuries sustained by reason of such negligence; 53 Mo. App. 276.

A vessel colliding with an obstruction to navigation cannot be charged with the negligence of a tug acting as an independent contractor in towing her, and wholly controlling her movements; 63 Fed. Rep. 626.

In England, where a passenger has been injured by concurrent negligence of his own carrier and a third party, it was formerly held that the carrier's negligence was imputed to the passenger and barred his recovery; Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115. But the doctrine has been overruled in 13 App. Cas. 1. It was rejected in 47 N. J. L. 161; 19 N. Y. 341; 36 Ohio St. 86; 105 Ill. 364; and, after a review of the authorities, in 116 U. S. 366. It was followed in 39 Ia. 523; 105 Mass. 77; 43 Wis. 513.

The negligence of a husband cannot be imputed to his wife, who was riding with him over a defective highway, unless it be shown that he was at that time under her control and direction; 48 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 134. Such is the weight of the authorities; 36 Fed. Rep. 164; 111 N. Y. 199. There are cases to the contrary; 50 Conn. 379; 46 Ill. 402; 60 Ia. 429; 62 Tex. 344.

NEGLIGENT ESCAPE. The omission on the part of a gaoler to take such care of a prisoner as he is bound to take, when in consequence thereof the prisoner departs from his confinement without the knowledge or consent of the gaoler, and eludes pursuit.

For a negligent escape, the sheriff or keeper of the prison is liable to punishment, in a criminal case; and in a civil case he is liable to an action for damages at the suit of the plaintiff. In both cases the prisoner may be retaken; 3 Bla. Com. 415. See ESCAPE.

NEGOTIABLE. In Mercantile Law. A term applied to a contract, the right of action on which is capable of being transferred by indorsement (of which delivery is an essential part), in case the undertaking is to A or his order, A or his agent, and the like, or by delivery alone, in case the undertaking is to A or bearer,—the assignee in either case having a right to sue in his own name.

That which is capable of being transferred, by assignment, indorsement, or by delivery. 148 Pa. 583.

At common law, choses in action were not assignable; but exceptions to this rule have grown up by mercantile usage as to some classes of simple contracts, and others have been introduced by statute, so that now bills of exchange, promissory notes, and bank-notes, to order or bearer, are universally negotiable; and notes not to order or bearer have become quasi negotiable; that is, an indorsement will give a right of action in the name of the assignor; and in some states, by statute, bonds and other specialties are assignable by indorsement.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS. Besides notes, bills, and checks, the following have been held to be negotiable instruments: exchequer bills; 4 B.& Ald. 1; 12 Cl. & F. 787, 805; state and municipal bonds; 3 B. & C. 45; 96 U. S. 51; 3 Wall. 327; 113 U. S. 135; corporate bonds; L. R. 3 Ch. App. 758, 154; L. R. 11 Eq. 478; 21 How. 575; [1892] 3 Ch. 527; coupon bonds of an individual; 6 Ben. 175; coupon bonds of a corporation; 9 Wall. 477; 14 id. 282; 20 id. 583; 66 N. Y. 14; 44 Pa. 63 (the question has been whether such coupons are negotiable apart from the bonds to which they were formerly attached, and the decisions establish their negotiability; 102 Mass. 503); government scrip; L. R. 10 Ex. 337; U. S. treasury notes; 21 Wall. 138; 57 N. Y. 573; post-office orders; 65 Law Times 52; certificates of deposit; 13 How. 218; Pars. Bills 1, 2, 26; 34 Neb. 71; 40 id. 484. The following have been held not to be negotiable: lottery tickets; 8 Q. B. 134; dividend warrants; 9 Q. B. 396; iron scrip notes; 3 Macq. 1; debentures, on which authorities differ; L. R. 8 Q. B. 374; pass-book of savings bank; 60 Conn. 300; a treasury warrant not presented for three years, the amount having been covered back into the treasury; 27 Ct. Cls. 177.

In some of the states statutes have been enacted in regard to the nature and operation of bills of lading and warehouse receipts, but the statutes and interpretations of them lack uniformity. Warehouse receipts, bills of lading; 14 M. & W. 403; 44 Md. 11; 115 Mass. 224; 12 Barb. 310; 101 U. S. 559; letters of credit; 2 How. 249; 40 Tex. 306; 10 Pet. 482; 22 Pick. 228; 1 Macq. H. L. C. 513; certificates of stock; 28 N. Y. 600, 604; 86 Pa. 80; 74 N. Y. 226 (but see 53 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 291); county warrants are negotiable, transferable, or assignable; but not in the sense of the law merchant; 103 U. S. 74.

The weight of authority is in favor of the negotiability of instruments payable to bearer; 14 Conn. 362; [1891] 1 Ch. 270.

An instrument in the form of a promissory note drawn by a corporation, and bearing its seal, is not a promissory note negotiable by the law merchant; per Blatchford, J., in 8 Fed. Rep. 584.

Any addition to the form of a note which destroys its essential quality of a promise to pay, "simple, certain, unconditional, not subject to any contingency," will destroy its negotiable character; 84 Pa. 409. Thus, the addition of the words, "given as collateral security with agreement;" 127 Mass. 293: "a warrant to confess judgment;" 77 Pa. 131; "in facilities;" 14 Mass. 322; "foreign bills;" 4 id. 245; "and it is the understanding it will be renewed at maturity;" 126 Pa. 195; "return notice ticket with this order," and "deposit book must be at bank before money can be paid;" 139 Pa. 53; "with exchange" in varying forms with respect to place; 28 Fed. Rep. 865; 38 id. 283; 23 U. C. C. P. 503; 4 N. Dak. 30; 15 Ind. App. 563; contra, 39 Mich. 137; 55 N.W. Rep. (Minn.) 988; 3 N. M. 45; 4 Biss. 478; with counsel fees, expenses of collection, or other words to the same effect; 84 N. C. 27; 63 Mo. 35; 14 Fed. Rep. 705; 37 id. 708; 60 Wis. 206; contra, 32 Ia. 184; 31 Fed. Rep. 649; 16 id. 89; 2 id. 44; 18 Kan. 432.

A note containing a tax clause is not negotiable; 35 L. R. A. 537; 110 N. Y. 469; nor is one given for rent and subject to set-off for repairs; 40 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1010.

Contracts are not necessarily negotiable because by their terms they inure to the benefit of the bearer. Hence, a receipt acknowledging that a person has received from another named so many shares of stock in a specified corporation, entitling the bearer to so many dollars in certain bonds to be issued, is not free in the hands of a transferee from equities which would have affected it in the hands of the original recipient; 7 Wall. 392.

Indorsements of payment on the back of a promissory note before delivery do not destroy negotiability; 182 Pa. 24.

The rule in Illinois that a negotiable note, secured by a mortgage, transferred to a bona fide holder before maturity, is held subject to all equities between the original parties, is not binding on the federal courts, which hold in such cases that in a suit in equity brought to foreclose the mortgage, no other defences are allowed against it than would be allowed in an action at law to recover on the notes; 31 Fed. Rep. 858. Coupons attached to a railroad bond and payable to bearer, when detached and negotiated, are no longer incidents of the bond, but independent negotiable instruments; 34 Fla. 424. See COUPONS.

"By the decisive weight of authority in this country where negotiable paper has been put in circulation, and there is no infirmity or defence between the antecedent parties thereto, a purchaser of such securities is entitled to recover thereon, as against the maker, the whole amount, irrespective of what he may have paid therefor." 149 U. S. 327. See 107 Mass. 552; 25 Wis. 544; 33 Ia. 140.

A negotiable instrument act, codifying the law on the subject, went into effect in New York, October 1, 1897. It has also been enacted by Connecticut, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Florida. One of the most important changes is in the rule of Coddington v. Bay, 5 Johns. Ch. 54, and provides that an antecedent indebtedness is a valuable consideration.

As to the early history of negotiable instruments, see 9 Law Quart. Rev. 70.

See, generally, Dos Passos, Stock Brokers; 7 Harv. L. Rev. 1; Daniel, Negotiable Instruments; PROMISSORY NOTES; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; BOND; COUPONS.

NEGOTIATE. The power to negotiate a bill or note is the power to indorse and deliver it to another, so that the right of action thereon shall pass to the indorser or holder. 42 Md. 581. See 69 N. Y. 386; 30 Minn. 408. A note transferred by delivery is negotiated; 49 Mo. App. 153. A national bank, under the power to negotiate evidences of debt, may exchange government bonds for registered bonds; 69 N. Y. 383.

NEGOTIATION. The deliberation which takes place between the parties touching a proposed agreement.

That which transpires in the negotiation makes no part of the agreement, unless introduced into it. It is a general rule that no evidence can be given to add to, diminish, contradict, or alter a written instrument; Leake, Contr. 26; 1 Dall. 426: 3 S. & R. 609. But this rule has been much modified, and parol evidence is now held admissible to contradict, vary, or even avoid a written instrument where it would not have been executed but for the oral stipulation, except in the case of negotiable paper: 90 Pa. 82. See EVIDENCE.

As to negotiations preceding a contract, see MERGER.

In Mercantile Law. The act by which a bill of exchange or promissory note is put into circulation by being passed by one of the original parties to another person.

The transfer of a bill or note in the form and manner prescribed by the law merchant, with the incidents and privileges annexed thereby, i. e.:—

The transferee can sue all parties to the instrument in his own name;

The consideration for the transfer is prima facie presumed;

The transferor can under certain conditions give a good title, although he has none himself;

The transferee can further negotiate the bill with the like privileges and incidents.

There are two modes of negotiation, viz.: by delivery and by indorsements. The former applies to bills, etc., payable to bearer; the latter to those payable to order. See Chalm. Dig. of Bills, etc. § 106; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 14; Byles, Bills 169.

Until an accommodation bill or note has been negotiated, there is no contract which can be enforced on the note; the contract, either express or implied, that the party accommodated will indemnify the other, is, till then, conditional; 2 M. & G. 911. See CONTRACT; MERGER.

NEGOTIORUM GESTOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who spontaneously, and without authority, undertakes to act for another, during his absence, in his affairs.

In cases of this sort, as he acts wholly without authority, there can, strictly speaking, be no contract; but the civil law raises a quasi mandate by implication for the benefit of the owner, in many such cases; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 460; 2 Kent 616, n.; Story, Bailm. §§ 82, 189.

NEGRO. A black man descended from the black race of Southern Africa; it has been held not to include a mulatto; 18 Ala. 726. See MIXED JURY; CIVIL RIGHTS; RAILROAD; MISCEGENATION.

NEIF, NAIF, NATIVUS. In Old English Law. A woman who was born a villein, or a bond-woman.

NEIGHBORHOOD. A surrounding or adjoining district. It depends upon no arbitrary rule of distance or topography. The neighborhood of a person will cover a larger space in a sparsely settled country than in a city; 116 Mo. 162. See 22 Ill. App. 179; 63 N. H. 246.

It is not synonymous with territory or district, but is a collective noun, with the suggestion of proximity, and refers to the units which make up its whole, as well as to the region which comprehends those units. A district or locality, especially when considered with relation to its inhabitants or their interests. 32 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 803.

NEMINE CONTRADICENTE (usually abbreviated nem. con.). Words used to signify the unanimous consent of the house to which they are applied. In England, they are used in the house of commons; in the house of lords, the words used to convey the same idea are nemine dissentiente.

NEPHEW. The son of a brother or sister. Ambl. 514; 1 Jac. 207.

The Latin nepos, from which nephew is derived, was used in the civil law for nephew, but more properly for grandson; and we accordingly find neveu, the original form of nephew, in the sense of grandson. Britton, c. 119.

According to the civil law, a nephew is in the third degree of consanguinity; according to the common law, in the second; the latter is the rule of common law; 2

Bla. Com. 206. But in this country the rule of the civil law is adopted; 2 Hill. R. P. 194.

Nephews and nieces may be shown by circumstances to include grand-nephews and grand-nieces, and even a great-grand-niece; 3 Barb. Ch. 466; 131 N. Y. 456; but in a bequest, would not include, without special mention, nephews and nieces by marriage; 42 Pa. 25. See LEGACY.

NEPOS (Lat.). A grandson. See NEPHEW.

NEPTIS (Lat.). Granddaughter; sometimes great-granddaughter. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Code 33. See LEGACY.

NET. Clear of all charges and deductions; that which remains after the deduction of all charges or outlay, as net profit. 22 Wall. 148.

NET BALANCE. In commercial usage it means the balance of the proceeds after deducting the expenses incident to the sale. 71 Pa. 74.

NET EARNINGS. The excess of the gross earnings over the expenditures defrayed in producing them, aside from, and exclusive of, the expenditure of capital laid out in constructing and equipping the works themselves. 99 U. S. 420. See 27 Fed. Rep. 1; 10 Blatchf. 271; 22 Wall. 148; 110 U. S. 205; 25 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 494.

NET PROFITS. This term does not mean what is made over the losses, expenses, and interest on the amount invested; it includes simply the gain that accrues on the investment, after deducting the losses and expenses of the business. 50 Ga. 350. See 40 N. J. Eq. 114. See PROFITS.

NETHER HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT. The house of commons so called in the time of Henry VIII.

NETHERLANDS, THE. A monarchy of Europe.

The first constitution after its reconstruction as a kingdom was given in 1814. It has been revised, especially in 1848 and in 1887. It is a constitutional and hereditary monarchy.

The executive power consists of the Sovereign and the States-General. He has the command of the army and navy, the control of the colonies and the right to create nobles, etc. The Council of State of which the members are appointed by the Sovereign advises His Majesty. The Cabinet Ministers appointed by the Sovereign are responsible to the country. The First Chamber of the States-General consists of fifty members appointed by the Provincial States from the highest direct tax-payers. The Second Chamber consists of one hundred members elected by the male electors of the country. The Provincial States, elected by the male electors of the province, regulate the affairs of the province. The Parish Corporations, elected by the male electors of the parish, regulate the affairs of the parish. Justice is administered in the name of the Sovereign. Religion is free. Taxes are decreed by the law.

The judiciary consists of:

1. The Court of the Canton, of which there are one hundred and six, each having its judge, who decides without appeal all cases of civil or commercial nature in which the claim does not exceed fl. 50 ($20); and all criminal cases, subject to appeal, where the penalty does not exceed fl. 25 ($10). 2. The Arrondissement (or District) Court, of which there are twenty-three having from five to twenty-four judges each, and settling without appeal all civil and commercial cases in which the claim does not exceed fl. 400 ($160); all appeals from the Court of the Canton; and in criminal matters where the penalty does not exceed fl. 150 ($60). 3. The Court of Justice, of which there are five having from nine to twelve judges each, decides all appeals in civil, commercial and criminal cases from the Arrondissement Court. 4. The High Court of Justice, which has fourteen to sixteen judges and decides all cases in which the Sovereign, or the Royal House, or the State are the defendants; cases of appeal from the Courts of Justice; all criminal cases in which high officials of the State are implicated; and all cases outside the jurisdiction of the lower courts.

The Netherlands legislation is based on the French law as introduced by Napoleon, and the earlier provincial law, which is for the greater part of German origin.

NEUTRAL PROPERTY. Property which belongs to neutral owners, and is used, treated, and accompanied by proper insignia as such.

Where the insured party has property and commercial establishments and depositories in different countries, if the property and concern of any one are in, or belong to, a belligerent country, they will have the national character of such country though the national character of the owner may be that of a neutral; 1 Phil. Ins. § 164; 5 W. Rob. 302; 1 Wheat. 159; 16 Johns. 128. The declaration of war by a nation subsequently to the time in reference to which the policy takes effect will, however, only affect ownership thereafter acquired or acts thereafter done; 6 Cra. 274; 4 Mas. 256; 1 Johns. 192; 14 id. 308; 1 C. Rob. 107, 336; 6 id. 364; 3 Wheat. 245; 3 Gall. 274; 12 Mass. 246.

The description of the subject in a policy of insurance as neutral or belonging to neutrals, is, as in other cases, a warranty that the property is what it is described to be, and it must, accordingly, in order to comply with the warranty, not only belong to neutral owners at the time of making the insurance, but must continue to be so owned during the period for which it is insured, and must, so far as it depends upon the assured, be accompanied by the usual insignia, as such, and in all respects represented, managed, and used as such; 1 Johns. 192; 1 Wash. C. C. 219; 6 Cra. 274; 4 Mas. 256; 1 C. Rob. 26, 336; 2 id. 133, 218.

NEUTRALITY. The state of a nation which takes no part between two or more other nations at war with each other.

"Strictly speaking, [neutrality] consists in abstinence from any participation in a public, private, or civil war, and in impartiality of conduct toward both parties, but the maintenance unbroken of peaceful relations betweeen two powers when the domestic peace of one of them is disturbed, is not neutrality in the sense in which the word is used when the disturbance has acquired such head as to have demanded the recognition of belligerency; and, as mere matter of municipal administration, no nation can permit unauthorized acts of war within its territory in infraction of its sovereignty, while good faith towards friendly nations requires their prevention." 166 U. S. 52.

"The relation of neutrality will be found to consist in two principal circumstances: Entire abstinence from any participation in the war, and impartiality of conduct towards both belligerents." 3 Phill. Int. L. 225. They remain the common friends of the belligerents, favoring the arms of neither to the detriment of the other; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 141.

A recent writer (Risley, Law of War) has classified the rights and duties of neutrals thus:—

A neutral state must abstain from the following acts:—

Furnishing either belligerent with troops, arms, warlike materials, ships of war, or money. Allowing passage of forces of either belligerent across its territory. Deciding in its courts upon the validity of captures made by either belligerent. Acquiring, during the war, any conquest made by either belligerent.

It must restrain the conduct of its subjects in the following respects:—

Pecuniary gifts or gratuitous loans to either belligerent. Enlistment within its jurisdiction in the forces of either belligerent.

It must prevent the following by all persons within its jurisdiction:—

The issue of commissions by persons acting for either belligerent within the jurisdiction. The fitting out of hostile expeditions on behalf of either belligerent. The use of its ports by the ships of either belligerent as a base of operations and supplies.

It must suffer certain interferences with the trade of its subjects by permitting both belligerents to exercise the following rights: To prevent carriage of contraband and breach of blockade; to capture enemy ships carrying neutral goods; and to exercise the right of search.

It has been said that there should be, on the part of a neutral state, not an impartiality of action, but of non-action; Massé, Droit Com. 199.

Where a neutral has bound itself, by previous treaty, to one belligerent, assistance under such treaty does not necessarily forfeit its neutral character; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 142.

The recognition of the belligerency of insurgents relieves the parent state from all responsibility for damages for any irregularities committed against neutrals by the other belligerent, which claims could be enforced against the parent nation if the injuries were committed by insurgents.

Maritime warfare, with its incidents of blockade and the right of search, imposes heavy burdens and restrictions upon all commercial nations; in the view of international law it is the right of sovereigns alone; 25 Fed. Rep. 408.

The public ships of a neutral are inviolable; and so are its private ships, subject, however, to laws relating to a breach of blockade, contraband, and search. Neutral territory, including the sea for a distance of three miles from low-water mark, is inviolable. If a ship is captured in neutral waters, in violation of neutrality, the neutral power is bound to enforce its restoration or compensate the injured belligerent; and, in general, a neutral is bound to prevent and punish a violation of its rights as a neutral by either belligerent; Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 143.

Where a United States war vessel captured a Confederate steamer in a neutral port of Brazil and brought it to a United States port, and it was there sunk by a collision, and the United States disavowed the action of its ship in making the capture, it was held that as the capture was unlawful, or had been disavowed by the government, it was as if it had never been made; 101 U. S. 37. A neutral may demand the return of a captured vessel and further redress. But where a neutral ship chooses to resist capture in neutral waters, its capture is not an offence against the neutral; Cobb, Int. L. Cas. 230.

Where neutral immunity is violated by illegal outfit and equipment, the offence is deposited after the termination of the voyage; 6 Wheat. 348. A neutral ship should, ordinarily, submit to capture and seek its remedies in the courts for damage; 1 Rob. 374.

It has been suggested that a belligerent who has begun an attack on another belligerent outside of neutral territory or water may continue the contest within the neutral waters and complete the capture; 5 C. Rob. 365; but on the other hand it is said that the inviolability of neutral territory should allow of no exceptions, and that property captured under such circumstances must be restored, though it actually belonged to the enemy; 5 C. Rob. 15; 3 Phill. Int. L. 386.

It belongs exclusively to the neutral government to raise the question of a capture made within neutral territory; 6 Wall. 266; the owner of the captured ship must assert his claim through his government; 1 Kent 121; an enemy cannot do so; 5 Wall. 517; but whenever a capture is made by a belligerent in violation of neutral rights, if the prize come voluntarily within the jurisdiction of the neutral, it should be restored to its original owner; 3 Phill. Int. L. 532; 6 Wheat. 385.

A public vessel of a belligerent may enter a neutral port to make such repairs or to take in such coal and provisions as may be necessary; but the ordinary rule is that it must not remain more than twenty-four hours, except in case of necessity.

A belligerent vessel may bring a prize into a neutral port and sell it there, with the consent of the neutral; 5 Mas. 77; and a neutral may permit a prize to be brought into its ports for repairs; 1 Op. A. G. 603; but neutrals may prohibit this and have often, by proclamation, done so; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 148.

Where a neutral allows the right of passage through its territory to one belligerent, it must accord it to both; 3 Phill. Int.

L. 183; 1 Kent *120; 21 Rev. de Dr. Int. 117. The troops of a belligerent cannot cross neutral territory, nor can even the wounded be taken across neutral territory, without the express permission of the neutral, which, in the case of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, was refused by Belgium; nor can a neutral allow its ports and waters to be used as a base of operations or supplies, or as a point from which to watch the other belligerent. Rules are generally laid down by neutrals in each war to regulate these questions.

The subjects of neutral states are entitled to carry on, upon their own account, a trade with a belligerent; this doctrine is well settled; 3 Phill. Int. L. 300. But it was considered unlawful, under the common law, for an English subject to raise a loan to support the subjects of a foreign state at war with a government in alliance with his own; 3 Phill. Int. L. 247; yet it now appears to be the opinion that, although the neutral state cannot loan money, yet the individual citizens of a neutral state may, and such loans are not considered a violation of neutrality any more than the sales of arms and ammunition; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 119. But such loans to an insurgent state or colony have been considered unlawful; Risley, Law of War; 9 Moore, P. C. 586.

A neutral will not permit a belligerent's ship to coal in its ports except in case of necessity, and then only to the extent necessary to carry them to their nearest home port; and a belligerent vessel cannot take on coal again at any port of such neutral within three months.

It was formerly held that citizens of a neutral state may send armed vessels as well as munitions of war to a belligerent port for sale; 7 Wheat. 283; though they would be subject, of course, to capture as contraband. But this doctrine has been modified as between the United States and Great Britain by the treaty relating to the Alabama claims, by which those nations agreed that "A neutral state is bound: 1. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, etc., within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace, and also to use due diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel, etc., such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use." 2. "Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men." It is said that there is a growing consensus of nations in favor of some rule resembling these; Risley, Law of War 204.

A belligerent may capture certain articles as contraband of war when carried in neutral ships and having a hostile destination. This includes munitions of war. Other articles are of doubtful use, ancipitis usus, and may be contraband or not according to circumstances. There is no settled definition of contraband, nor any practice in regard to its exact limits. Provisions, money, or coal destined for the use of a belligerent army or fleet have been included within the term. Coal is declared contraband in the proclamation of President McKinley, April 26, 1898, and by the British government on the breaking out of the Hispano-American war. Where things are of doubtful use, that is, occasional contraband, they are not usually confiscated, but are bought by the captor at a fair price. This is called Pre-emption (q. v.), and usually applies to cargoes of provisions. See CONTRABAND; 1 Kent 138.

The question whether a belligerent may take the goods of its enemy, not contraband, which are being carried in a neutral ship, has been much discussed, and also whether innocent goods of a neutral can be transported in a belligerent's vessel without being confiscated when the vessel is captured. Formerly it was held that a belligerent might take enemy's goods from neutral custody, on the high seas. But the Declaration of Paris changed the rule of the nations, except the United States, Spain, and Venezuela, and a neutral flag now covers enemy's goods with the exception of contraband of war. This is a general rule of international law, although some treaties made by the United States have laid down a different rule; Snow, Int. Law 164; it was applied by the United States during the war of the Rebellion; 1 Kent 128; and adopted by it in the Hispano-American war of 1898.

By the Declaration of Paris (q. v.) the following principles were adopted:—The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, except contraband of war. Neutral goods, except contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag.

Neutral goods on an armed belligerent cruiser are not subject to capture, though there was resistance to capture by the vessel, provided the neutral owner did not aid in the armament or the resistance, notwithstanding he had chartered the whole vessel and was on board at the capture; 9 Cra. 388; 3 Wheat. 409; contra, 1 Dods. 443. If the neutral vessel is in the direct employ of the enemy, both ships and goods are liable to capture; 24 Fed. Rep. 33; and so are neutral goods on a neutral vessel, if the latter be under the enemy's protection; 27 Ct. Cls. 99.

It is lawful for a neutral ship to carry contraband goods, but the right is always exercised subject to capture. Ordinarily the neutral ship is not subject to confiscation and will be released in the prize court, unless she belongs to the owner of the contraband, or her owner is privy to the carriage of the contraband goods, or uses false papers; Risley, Law of War 232; 1 Kent 143.

When two states are at war, it has become the practice of modern times for other states to issue a proclamation of neutrality to protect their commercial interests and territory.

The subjects of a neutral power residing in a belligerent territory are not entitled to any special protection for their property or to exemption from military contributions to which they may be liable in common with the inhabitants of the place in which they reside or in which their property may be situated; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 144.

By Convention of the Great Powers, 1887 and 1888, the Suez Canal is neutralized, and is to remain open in war or peace, to vessels of commerce and war of all nations. See id. 149. In 1815, the Rhine was neutralized, as between the States of the Rhine, to a certain extent. In 1829, entrance into the Black Sea was admitted to belong to Russia and to powers at amity with Russia. By the treaty of Paris the Black Sea was neutralized, but this was largely abrogated in 1871. By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, 1850, Great Britain and the United States agreed that any canal built between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans should be forever neutral.

The neutrality acts of the United States, which regulate the conduct of its citizens and of aliens while within its jurisdiction, constitute Title LXVII. of the Revised Statutes. Their origin and scope are as follows:—President Washington, in his annual message to Congress, December 3, 1793, said: "The original arming and equipping of vessels in the ports of the United States by any of the belligerent parties for military services, offensive or defensive, is deemed unlawful." The act of 1794, which has been generally recognized as the first instance of municipal legislation in support of the obligations of neutrality, and a remarkable advance in the development of international law, was passed in accordance with this recommendation. The acts of 1817 and 1818 were successively passed and carried forward into R. S. Title LXVII., which forbids citizens from accepting a commission from a foreign prince against a foreign prince with whom we are at peace; enlisting or hiring or retaining another to enlist, or going away to enlist in the army or navy of such foreign prince; fitting out or arming a vessel in the service of a foreign prince to commit hostilities against a foreign prince, etc, (the vessel to be forfeited—one half to the informer); increasing the force of any vessel of war of such foreign prince by adding any equipment solely applicable to war; preparing any military expedition in the United States to be carried on thence against any foreign prince with whom we are at peace.

Sec. 5288 provides that the president may employ the land and naval forces of the United States and militia in compelling any foreign vessel to depart the United States in all cases in which by the laws of nations or the treaties of the United States she ought not to remain therein. Sec. 5289 provides that the owners or consignees of every armed vessel sailing out of our ports belonging wholly or in part to citizens thereof shall before clearing give bond in double the value of the vessel and cargo, conditioned that she shall not commit any hostilities against any foreign prince, etc., with whom we are at peace. Sec. 5290 provides that the United States shall detain any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes and about to depart the United States, the cargo of which consists principally of munitions of war, when the number of men on board or other circumstances render it probable that it is intended to commit hostilities against any such foreign prince, etc., until the decision of the president is had thereon or the owner gives bond and securities as required in cases under § 5289. Sec. 5291 provides that this title shall not extend to subjects of any foreign prince, etc., transiently within the United States, who enlist on a vessel of war or privateer which at the time of its arrival here was equipped as such, or who employ other citizens of the same foreign prince, etc., to enlist on board such vessel of war, etc., if the United States shall then be at peace with such foreign prince, etc. Offences under these sections are made high misdemeanors.

The act does not prohibit armed vessels belonging to citizens from sailing out of our ports, but only requires their owners to give security; 6 Pet. 445.

The word "people," as used in § 5283, covers any insurgent or insurrectionary body conducting hostilities, although its belligerency has not been recognized; 166 U. S. 1.

Where a vessel is chartered by a foreign government to carry a cargo of arms to that government, she is not liable to seizure; 37 Fed. Rep. 799. It is not the intent of § 5286 to interfere with the commercial activities of citizens of the United States, but to prevent complications between this government and foreign powers, and fitting out military expeditions against friendly nations; 84 id. 609, per Bradford, J.

The offence covered by the act consists of an act done in the United States, with the intent to commit an offence against the act; the intent is a necessary ingredient; 38 Fed. Rep. 431; and it must be formed and exist within the United States; 24 id. 33. The offence is complete when the expedition is organized; 53 id. 536; and although it is formed and detached in separate parts; 18 id. 529.

No particular number of men is necessary to constitute a military expedition under the act; its character may be determined by the designation of the officers, the organization of the men in regiments or companies, and the purchase of military stores; 53 id. 536. Where insurgents carrying on war against a foreign country sent a vessel to procure arms in the United States, the purchase of such arms and placing them on board the vessel was held not within § 5286, though they were intended to be used by the insurgents in carrying on war against a foreign country, if they are not designed to constitute any part of the furnishings of the vessel herself; 48 id. 99. Placing munitions of war on a vessel, with intent to carry them to insurgents in a foreign country, but without intent that they shall constitute any part of the furnishings of the vessel, is not within the act; 49 id. 646. One who provides the means for transporting a military expedition on any part of its journey, with knowledge of its ultimate destination and unlawful character, commits an offence under § 5286; 84 id. 799. Sec. 5283 is not applicable to such a case; 13 Op. Att. Gen. 177.

A proceeding under § 5283 is a simple suit in admiralty, where the decree is that the libel be dismissed, or the vessel condemned; and no decree of restitution is necessary; 38 Fed. Rep. 431.

The British Foreign Enlistment Act of 1819 forbade British subjects to enlist or to induce others to enlist, or to leave or to induce others to leave the queen's dominions in order to enlist; and forbade ship-owners to take aboard their ships persons illegally enlisted. It is a substantial copy of the American act of 1818; 166 U. S. 60. In 1870 a new British act was passed.

NEVADA. One of the states of the United States of America.

It was admitted into the Union, Oct. 31, 1864. Its boundaries were defined by an enabling act, approved March 21, 1864, as amended by the act of May 5, 1866.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative authority is vested in a senate and assembly, designated "the legislature of the state of Nevada." The sessions are biennial, commencing on the third Monday of January.

Senators and members of the assembly must be duly qualified electors of their respective districts, and the number of members of the senate must not be less than one-third, nor more than one-half of that of members of the assembly.

The members of the assembly are chosen biennially, at the general state election, for two years from the day next after the election. Senators are chosen at the same time and place as members of the assembly, for four years from the day next after their election.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The governor is elected at the time and place of voting for members of the legislature, for four years, and until his successor is qualified. He must be a qualified elector, and, at the time of election, of at least the age of twenty-five and a citizen of the state for two years next preceding the election. He has the usual powers, including those of appointing officers and adjourning the legislature.

The governor, justices of the supreme court, and attorney general, or a major part of them, of w' om the governor shall be one, may remit fines and forfeitures, commute punishments and grant pardons after conviction in all cases, except treason and impeachment, subject to such regulations as may be provided by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons.

A lieutenant-governor is elected at the same time and places and in the same manner as the governor, and his term of office and qualifications are the same. He is president of the senate, and in case of the death, removal, inability, or absence of the governor, the duties of his office shall devolve upon the lieutenant-governor for the remainder of his term, or until the disability shall cease. A secretary of state, a treasurer, a controller, a surveyor general, and an attorney general are elected at the same time, and in the same manner as the governor and for the same term. Any elector is eligible to those offices.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, district courts, and in justices of the peace. The legislature may also establish courts for municipal purposes only, in incorporated towns and cities.

The supreme court consists of a chief justice and two associate justices, a majority of whom constitute a quorum, but the legislature may provide for the election of two additional associate justices, in which case three shall constitute a quorum.

The justices of the supreme court are elected at the general election and hold office for the term of six years. The jurisdiction of this court is appellate in all cases in equity; and also in all cases at law in which is involved the title or right of possession to, or the possession of real estate or mining claims, or the legality of any tax, imposts, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, or in which the demand (exclusive of interest) or the value of the property in controversy exceeds three hundred dollars; also in all other civil cases not included in the general subdivisions of law and equity, and also in questions of law alone in all criminal cases in which the offence charged amounts to felony. This court also has power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, quo warranto, and habeas corpus, and all writs necessary or proper for the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

The state is divided into nine judicial districts, the judges of which are elected and hold office for four years. After the first Monday in January, 1899, the number of districts is reduced to five.

The district courts have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity; and also all cases at law, involving the title to or possession of real property or mining claims, or the legality of any tax, impost, etc., in which the demand or value exceeds three hundred dollars, exclusive of interest; also in all cases relating to the estates of deceased persons, the persons and estates of minors and insane persons, and of the action of forcible entry and detainer, and all criminal cases not otherwise provided for by law. They have final appellate jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' courts and such other inferior tribunals as may be established by law. They have also the power to issue writs of mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, etc.

The Justices of the Peace have jurisdiction in such cases as the legislature may determine; provided, that the amount of the demand or value of the property does not exceed three hundred dollars, and that they shall not have jurisdiction in cases wherein the title to real estate or mining claims or questions of boundaries to land are involved, or of cases that conflict in any manner with the jurisdiction of the state courts of record.

NEVER INDEBTED. A plea to an action of indebitatus assumpsit, by which the defendant asserts that he is not indebted to the plaintiff. 6 C. & P. 545; 1 M. & W. 542; 1 Q. B. 77. The plea of never indebted has, in England, been substituted for nil debet, in certain actions specified in schedule B (36) of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852; and the effect of the plea never indebted is to deny those facts from which the liability of the defendant is alleged. In actions on negotiable bills or notes, never indebted is inadmissible; Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 1833, §§ 6, 7; 3 Chitty, Stat. 560. By the judicature act, 1875, Ord. xix. r. 20, a defendant is no longer allowed to deny generally the facts alleged by the plaintiff; Whart. Lex. A defendant cannot, under the plea of "never indebted," contend that, though a contract was made in fact, it was void in point of law, for the facts from which its invalidity is inferred must form the subject of a special plea; Moz. & W.

NEW. This term in its ordinary acceptation, when applied to the same subject or object, is the opposite of old. 14 Pet. 364.

NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION. A phrase used in the act of congress relating to patents for inventions. See PATENT.

NEW ASSIGNMENT. A re-statement of the cause of action by the plaintiff, with more particularity and certainty, but consistently with the general statement in the declaration. Steph. Pl. 241; 20 Johns. 43.

Its purpose is to avoid the effect of an evasive plea which apparently answers the declaration, though it does not really apply to the matter which the plaintiff had in view; 1 Wms. Saund. 299 b. Thus, if a defendant has committed two assaults on the plaintiff, one of which is justifiable and the other not, as the declaration may not distinguish one from the other, the defendant may justify, and the plaintiff not being able either to traverse, demur, or confess and avoid, must make a new assignment.

There may be several new assignments in the course of the same action; 1 Chitty, Pl. 614. A plaintiff may reply to a part of the plea and also make a new assignment. A new assignment is said to be in the nature of a new declaration; 1 Saund. 299 c; but is more properly considered as a repetition of the declaration; 1 Chit. Pl. 602; differing only in this, that it distinguishes the true ground of complaint, as being different from that which is covered by the plea. Being in the nature of a new or repeated declaration, it is, consequently, to be framed with as much certainty or specification of circumstances as the declaration itself. In some cases, indeed, it should be even more particular; Gould, Pl. 339 n.; Bac. Abr. Trespass (I 4, 2); 1 Chit. Pl. 610. See 3 Bla. Com. 311; Archb. Civ. Pl. 286. In England, under the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. xix. r. 14, no new assignment is necessary or is to be used; but everything which has heretofore been alleged by way of new assignment is to be introduced by way of amendment of the statement of claim; Whart. Dict.

NEW BRUNSWICK. One of the provinces of the dominion of Canada.

It was originally part of the French province of Acadie (see NOVA SCOTIA), but was made a distinct province in 1784, having been first settled by the French A. D. 1639, ceded to the English in 1713 by the treaty of Utrecht, and settled by the British government in 1764. By the Imperial Act, known as the British North American Act, which went into operation July 1, 1867, New Brunswick became a province of the Dominion of Canada. It has an Executive Council of seven, a Legislative Assembly of forty-one members, and a Legislative Council of fifteen members. The seat of government is Fredericton. Justice is administered by a chief justice, an equity judge, five puisne judges, and five county court judges. See CANADA.

NEW FOR OLD. A term used in marine insurance in cases of adjustment of a loss when it has been but partial. In making such adjustment, the rule is to apply the old materials towards the payment of the new, by deducting the value of them from the gross amount of the expenses for repairs, and to allow the deduction of one-third new for old upon the balance. See 1 Cow. 265; 4 Ohio 284; 7 Pick. 259. The deduction, in the United States, is usually one-third, and is made from the cost of labor and material, and in practice also from the incidental expenses of repairs, as towage, etc.; but see, as to this last, 3 Sumn. 45; 9 Wall. 203. The deduction is without regard to the age of the vessel; 11 Johns. 315. A writer criticises the rule of thirds, and suggests that the increase of iron hulls will change the rule of law; Gourlie, Gen. Av. In Liverpool, no deduction is made on iron vessels for the first eighteen months.

NEW FOREST. The royal forest in Hampshire, founded by William the Conqueror. See FOREST LAW.

NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR. The most easterly parts of North America.

They are part of British North America, but are not included in the Dominion of Canada. The government is vested in a Governor assisted by an Executive Council not exceeding seven members, a Legislative Council not exceeding fifteen members, and a House of Assembly of thirty-six members elected by the people. It has a chief justice, two assistant justices, three district court judges, and twenty-two magistrates. Its capital is St. Johns.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. The name of one of the original thirteen United States of America.

It was subject to Massachusetts from 1641 to 1680. It was governed as a province, under royal commissions, by a governor and council appointed by the king, and a house of assembly elected by the people, until the revolution.

In January, 1776, a temporary constitution was adopted, which continued till 1784. The constitution adopted in 1784 was amended by a convention of delegates held at Concord, approved by the people in their town-meetings, and established by the convention in February, 1792. This constitution was amended in 1850, by abolishing the property qualifications for certain offices, and amended again in 1877, changing it in eleven particulars, the principal of which were the abolition of the religious test, and adoption of biennial elections, increasing the number of senators, and changing the election from March to November.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is lodged in the senate and house of representatives, and which together are styled the General Court of New Hampshire.

The Senate is composed of twenty-four members elected for two years. A senator must be at least thirty years old, an inhabitant of the district, and, for seven years next before his election, of the state.

Representatives are elected biennially, for the term of two years. A representative must be an inhabitant of the town for which he is elected, and, for two years next preceding his election, of the state.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—This is lodged in a governor and council.

The Governor is elected biennially. In case of a vacancy, the president of the senate exercises the powers of the office, but cannot then act as senator. The governor must be of at least the age of thirty years, and an inhabitant of the state for seven years next preceding his election.

The governor has a limited veto power.

Councillors are elected biennially, must have the qualifications of senators, and hold office for the same term as the governor. The state is divided by law into five districts, in each of which a councillor is elected, and vacancies are filled by a like election.

The governor and council may adjourn or prorogue the general court, in case of disagreement of the two houses, for any period not exceeding ninety days. They nominate and appoint all judicial officers, the attorney-general and coroners, and all general and field officers of the militia,—each having a negative upon the other. Nominations must be made three days before an appointment can be made, unless a majority of the council assent.

The power of pardoning offences—after conviction only, however—is vested in the governer and council, except in cases of impeachment. No money can be drawn from the treasury of the state but by warrant of the governor, with the advice and consent of the council.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Court consists of a chief justice and six assistant justices, appointed by the governor and council, to hold during good behavior, until seventy years of age. It has original jurisdiction of all cases and proceedings at common law, civil and criminal, except those in which justices of the peace have jurisdiction; of all cases in equity; in all cases of divorce and alimony; and appellate jurisdiction in all appeals from courts of probate, and in all appeals from police courts and from justices of the peace.

Judges of Probate are appointed by the governor and council in each county, who hold their office during good behavior, unless sooner removed by address of both houses or by impeachment. They have jurisdiction of all matters relating to the estates of persons deceased and the guardianship of minors, insane persons, and spendthrifts.

Justices of the Peace are appointed in sufficient number by the governor and council, who hold their office during the term of five years, unless sooner removed by address of both houses of the legislature. They have jurisdiction of all civil causes at common law in which the damages demanded do not exceed thirteen dollars and thirty-three cents, and where the title to real estate is not involved, and in many minor criminal cases, subject to appeal to the supreme court. They have authority to arrest, examine, and bind over for trial at the supreme court, persons charged with higher offences.

Police Courts have exclusive jurisdiction, in the cities and places where they are established, in all cases where justices of the peace have jurisdiction elsewhere.

NEW INDUSTRY. See LABOR.

NEW INN. An inn of chancery. See INNS OF COURT.

NEW JERSEY. The name of one of the original thirteen states of the United States of America.

The territory of which the state is composed was included within the patent granted by Charles II. to his brother James, duke of York, bearing date on the 12th of March, 1663-4. This grant comprised all the lands lying between the western side of Connecticut river and the east side of Delaware bay, and conferred powers of government over the granted territory. At this time the province was in the possession and under the government of Holland. Before the close of the year the inhabitants of the province submitted to the government of England, on the 23d and 24th of June, 1664. The duke of York, by deeds of lease and release, conveyed to John Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, their heirs and assigns forever, "all that tract of land adjacent to New England and lying and being to the westward of Long Island and Manhitas Island, and bounded on the east part by the main sea, and part by Hudson river, and hath upon the west Delaware bay or river, and extendeth southward to the main ocean as far as Cape May at the mouth of Delaware bay, and to the northward as far as the northernmost branch of the said bay or river of Delaware, which is in 41 degrees and 40 minutes of latitude, and crosseth over thence in a straight line to Hudson's river in forty-one degrees of latitude; which said tract of land is hereafter to be called Nova Cæsaria, or New Jersey."

This grant first defined the boundaries and gave the name of the province. It conferred upon the grantees, with the territory, powers of government in as full and ample manner as they were conferred by the crown upon the duke of York. Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, being by virtue of this conveyance the sole proprietors of New Jersey, on the 10th of February, 1664-5, signed a constitution which they published under the title of "The concessions and agreement of the lords proprietors of the province of Nova Cæsaria, or New Jersey, to and with all and every of the adventurers, and all such as shall settle or plant there." This document, under the title of "The Concessions," was regarded as the first constitution of New Jersey, and continued in force until the division of the province in 1676. The instrument was considered as irrevocable, and therefore of higher authority than the acts of assembly, which were subject to alteration and repeal. War having been declared by England against Holland in 1673, the Dutch were again in possession of the country, and the inhabitants submitted to their authority.

By the treaty of peace between England and Holland on the 9th of February, 1674, the country was restored to the possession of the English. On the conclusion of peace, in order to remove all grounds of objection to his title on account of the recapture of the country by the Dutch, the duke of York obtained from the crown a new patent, similar to the first, and dated on the 29th of June, 1674. On the 20th of July in the same year, the duke of York made a second grant of a portion of the province to Sir George Carteret individually. The partition which this patent was intended to secure, in addition to the confirmation of Carteret's grant, was accomplished by deeds of partition executed July 1, 1676, between Carteret and the trustees of Byllinge. In 1702, the proprietors of th two provinces, called respectively East New Jersey and West New Jersey, surrendered their powers of government to Queen Anne, still retaining their title to the land. The two divisions constituted thenceforth but one colony. The colony was governed by a governor and council appointed by the crown, and an assembly of the representatives of the people chosen by the freeholders. This form of government continued till the American revolution.

The first constitution of the state of New Jersey was adopted by the provisional congress on the second day of July, 1776. This body was composed of representatives from all the counties of the state, who were elected on the fourth Monday of May, and convened at Burlington on the tenth day of June, 1776. It was finally adopted on the second day of July, but was never submitted to a popular vote. This constitution continued in force until the first day of September, 1844, when it was superseded by the existing constitution. The new constitution was adopted May 14, 1844, by a convention composed of delegates elected by the people in pursuance of an act passed by the legislature. The constitution thus framed, having been submitted to and adopted by the people at an election held on the thirteenth day of August, took effect and went into operation, pursuant to one of its provisions, on the twenty-second of September, 1844. This constitution was amended at a special election held September 7, 1875.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is lodged in a senate and general assembly, which meet the second Tuesday in January each year.

The Senate is composed of one senator from each county, elected for three years. They are divided into classes, so that one-third of the senate is changed each year. A senator must be entitled to vote, at least thirty years old, have been a citizen and inhabitant of the state for four years, and of the county for which he is chosen one year, next before election.

The General Assembly is composed of members elected annually. Each member must be entitled to vote, at least twenty-one years old, must have been a citizen and inhabitant of the state for two years, and of the county for which he is chosen one year, next before his election.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for the term of three years. He is incapable of holding the office for three years next after his term of service. He must be not less than thirty years of age, and have been for twenty years at least a citizen of the United States, and a resident of this state seven years next before his election, unless he has been absent during that time on the public business of the United States or of this state.

He has the usual executive powers and may, except in cases of impeachment, suspend the collection of fines and forfeitures, and grant reprieves, to extend until the expiration of a time not exceeding ninety days after conviction; he may in connection with the chancellor and the six judges of the court of errors and appeals, or the major part of them, remit fines and forfeitures, and grant pardons in all cases after conviction, except impeachment. In case of a vacancy, the succession is to the president of the senate, and speaker of the house of assembly, in turn, but in such case another governor shall be chosen at the next election for members of the legislature, unless such vacancy occur within thirty days preceding such election, in which case a governor shall be chosen at the next succeeding election for members of the legislature.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Court of Errors and Appeals consists of a chancellor, the justices of the supreme court, and six judges. These six judges are appointed for six years by the governor, with the consent of the senate, and the seat of one of the judges is vacated each year; so that one judge is annually appointed. Three sessions are held annually, at Trenton. It is the highest court of appeals from decisions of the supreme court, court of chancery, and circuit court. After decision pronounced, the cause is remitted to the inferior courts for judgment and execution according to the decision.

The Court of Chancery consists of a chancellor, appointed by the governor for seven years, who is also the ordinary or surrogate general and judge of the prerogative court. Appeals lie from the order or decree of the orphans' court to the prerogative court. The chancellor is assisted by five vice-chancellors, who are appointed by the chancellor for five years.

The Supreme Court consists of one chief and eight associate justices, appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, for the term of seven years. This number may be increased or decreased by law, but may never be less than two. The judges are ex officio justices of the inferior court of common pleas, orphans' court, and court of general quarter sessions. This is the court of general inquiry, common-law jurisdiction. When issues of fact arise, they are sent to the circuit to be found by a jury and single judge.

Circuit Courts are held in every county in the state, by one or more justices of the supreme court, or a judge appointed for the purpose. For this purpose the state is divided into nine districts, and one judge assigned to each district. In all cases within the county, except in those of a criminal nature, these courts have common-law jurisdiction concurrent with the supreme courts; and any final judgment of a circuit court may be docketed in the supreme court, and operates as a judgment obtained in the supreme court from the time of such docketing. Final judgments in any circuit court may be removed by writ of error into the supreme court, or directly into the court of errors and appeals; and questions of law which arise are to be certified by the presiding judge to the supreme court for decision.

Court of Common Pleas. This is a county court of common law. Since the Act of March 26, 1896, it has been held by one judge.

Court of Oyer and Terminer has cognizance of all crimes committed in the county wherein the court is held. It has the jurisdiction of the Oyer and Terminer and of the Court of General Jail Delivery. It is held in each county by a justice of the supreme court and the judge of common pleas of the county. In the absence of the latter, the supreme court justice may hold the court alone. In counties having more than 300,000 inhabitants the common pleas judge may hold the court alone.

Court of Quarter Sessions. The judge of the Common Pleas in each county holds this court, which has cognizance of all crimes except indictments for treason and murder, which must be tried by the Oyer and Terminer or the Supreme Court.

Court of Special Sessions is held by the same judge, and has power to hear without a jury persons charged on oath before the Quarter Sessions, who, in writing, waive indictment and trial by jury and request a trial immediately before the court.

The Orphans' Court is held in each county by the judge of the Common Pleas. It has original jurisdiction of the probate of wills, estates of decedents, appointment and control of administrators and executors, and the care of minors, including the appointment and control of guardians. An appeal lies to the chancellor's prerogative court.

District Courts exist in all cities of over 20,000 inhabitants and exercise the civil jurisdiction of justices of the peace. In cities of over 100,000 inhabitants there are two such courts. This court has jurisdiction in civil causes at law where the matter in dispute does not exceed $300, except when the title to land may come in question.

Justices of the Peace have the usual powers to hear complaints and issue warrants and hold to bail in criminal cases, and except in cities where district courts exist, they have jurisdiction in civil causes at law where the real debt or demand does not exceed $200, and where the title to land does not come in question, except actions of replevin, slander, or trespass for assault, battery, or imprisonment. A jury of six men in a suit for not over $50, and twelve men for a larger case must be impanelled on demand of either party.

Police Courts are established in all cities of the second class in the state, having a population of fifty thousand and over. It is a court of record. The justices are appointed by the governor for a term of five years. These justices exercise the powers in criminal matters of justices of the peace.

NEW MATTER. In Pleading. Matter not previously alleged. Statements of fact not previously alleged by either party to the pleadings. Where special pleading prevails, such matter must be pleaded in avoidance, and it must, in general, be followed by a verification; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 195; 1 Chitty, Pl. 538; Steph. Pl. 251; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (E 32); 1 Wms. Saund. 103, n. 1; Ventr. 121. See PLEA.

In equity, new matter, discovered by either plaintiff or defendant, may be introduced by cross or supplemental bill before a decree has been pronounced, but not by amendment after an answer has been filed; 1 Paige, Ch. 200; Harr. Ch. 438.

NEW MEXICO. One of the territories of the United States.

By act of congress, approved September 9, 1850, the territory of New Mexico was constituted and described. A proviso was annexed that the United States might divide the territory into two or more, and that when admitted as a state the said territory, or any portion of the same, should be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution might prescribe at the time of admission.

Colorado was partly formed from New Mexico in 1861, and in 1863 the entire territory of Arizona, which reduced New Mexico to its present boundaries. By the organic act, the powers of the territory are lodged in three branches,—the legislative, executive, and judicial. The operation of this act was suspended until the Texan boundary was agreed upon, when it went into force by proclamation of the president, December 13, 1850.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Council is composed of thirteen members, elected by the people of the districts into which the territory is divided, for the term of two years.

The House of Representatives consists of twenty-six members, elected by the people of the districts into which the territory is divided, for the term of one year.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is appointed by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, for four years, but he may be sooner removed. He must reside in the territory. He is commander-in-chief of the military of the territory; is superintendent of Indian affairs, is to approve all acts passed by the legislature before they can become laws; may grant pardons and remit fines for offences against the laws of the territory, and reprieves for offences against the laws of the United States till the will of the president can be known; must take care that the laws be executed.

A Secretary of the Territory is also appointed in the same manner and for the same time. He is to record and preserve laws passed by the legislature, and acts done by the governor, in his executive capacity, and to transmit copies, etc.

The JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Court consists of a chief and four assistant justices, appointed by the president of the United States, with the advice and consent of the senate, for the term of four years. Two of the three judges constitute a quorum.

The jurisdiction is appellate solely, and extends to all matters of appeal and writs of error that may be taken from the judgments or decrees of the district courts, in cases of errors apparent on the face of the record.

Special terms may be called by the chief justice for the hearing of causes in both civil and criminal matters, when the parties or the accused, and the district attorney, agree. No jury trials are held by this court. An appeal lies to the supreme court of the United States as from a decision of the United States circuit court, where the amount involved exceeds the sum of one thousand dollars.

The District Court is held in each of the five districts into which the territory is divided for the purpose, by one of the judges of the supreme court. It has exclusive original jurisdiction of all matters at law or in equity, except those of which justices of the peace have concurrent jurisdiction, and of all crimes and misdemeanors, except those of which justices of the peace have exclusive cognizance.

Probate Courts are also to be provided for by law. They have, in general, the control of the settlement of the estates of decedents, and the appointment and control of guardians.

Justices of the Peace have a jurisdiction coextensive with the county, of all civil cases where the amount involved does not exceed one hundred dollars, except in actions for slander, libel, and false imprisonment, or where the title or to boundary of lands shall come in question. Act. 1876, ch. 27.

NEW PROMISE. A contract made after the original promise has, for some cause, been rendered invalid, by which the promisor agrees to fulfil such original promise. Within the meaning of the statute of frauds the renewal of a promise to pay is a new promise; 24 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 576. See LIMITATIONS.

NEW SOUTH WALES. The oldest of the Australian Colonies of the British government. The Governor is appointed by the Crown and has a Cabinet of ten ministers. There is a parliament of two houses, the Legislative Council of not less than twenty-one members nominated by the Crown, and a Legislative Assembly of one hundred and twenty-five members elected by the people. It has a chief justice, six puisne judges, and seven district court judges.

NEW TRIAL. In Practice. A re-examination of an issue in fact before a court and a jury, which has been tried at least once before the same court; Hill. N. Tr. 1. A rehearing of the legal rights of the parties, upon disputed facts, before another jury, granted by the court on motion of the party dissatisfied with the result of the previous trial, upon a proper case being presented for the purpose; 4 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 30; Grah. & W. N. Tr. 32. It is either upon the same, or different, or additional evidence, before a new jury, and probably, but not necessarily, before a different judge. It is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, court or referee; 99 Cal. 265.

The origin of the practice of granting new trials is of extremely ancient date, and, consequently, involved in some obscurity. Blackstone gives the most connected and satisfactory account of it of any writer; 3 Com. 387.

Courts have, in general, a discretionary power to grant or refuse new trials, according to the exigency of each particular case, upon principles of substantial justice; 1 Burr. 390. That the trial judge is not satisfied with a verdict is not binding on the court in banc, but deserves serious consideration; L. J. 55 Q. B. 403. This discretion is generally not reviewable on error; 10 Vt. 520; 14 N. H. 441: 20 Pick. 285; 10 Ga. 93; 132 U. S. 103. It should be exercised with great caution where a new trial is asked only because the verdict is against the weight of the evidence; 31 W. Va. 428.

Where one party moves for a new trial and the opposing party consents thereto, the court is not compelled to grant the same; 44 Kan. 144; 45 Ill. App. 426. An order granting a new trial operates to set aside the judgment; 76 Cal. 90.

The usual grounds for a new trial may be enumerated as follows:

The not giving the defendant sufficient notice of the time and place of trial, unless waived by an appearance and making a defence, will be a ground for setting aside the verdict; 3 Price 72; 1 Wend. 22. But the defendant's ignorance must not have been owing to his own negligence, and the insufficiency of the notice must have been reasonably calculated to mislead him; 2 Bibb 177; 3 B. & P. 1; 13 Tex. 516; 32 Conn. 402; 36 N. H. 74.

Pleadings. Failure of the complaint to state a cause of action is available on motion for a new trial; 46 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 74; so of one which shows the cause of action alleged to be barred; 26 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 431.

Misconduct of parties, counsel, or witnesses. The use of crutches by plaintiff in going to and from the witness stand, when just before and after the trial he walked readily without them, is ground for a new trial; 42 N. Y. S. 941; but plaintiff's hysteria while on the witness stand is not; 45 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 290; nor is a controversy, between court and counsel, during the trial, not prejudicial to the defeated party; 37 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 115; nor improper remarks made by counsel in his argument; 27 U. S. App. 663.

Mistakes or omissions of officers in summoning and drawing jurors, when the irregularity deprives the party complaining of a substantial right, will entitle him to a new trial; 2 Halst. 244; 16 Ark. 37; 12 Pick. 496. Likewise, where the officer summoning the jury is nearly related to one of the parties; 10 S. & R. 334; 1 South. 364; 20 Tex. 234; 1 Dev. & B. 196; or is interested in the event; 5 Johns. 133: unless the objection to the officer was waived by the party; 3 Me. 215; 21 Pick. 457; or the authority of the officer be so circumscribed as to put it out of his power to select an improper jury; 7 Ala. 253; 7 Cow. 720. A verdict will be set aside for the following causes: The unauthorized interference of a party, or his attorney, or the court, in selecting or returning jurors, unless the interference can be satisfactorily explained; 8 Humphr. 412; that a juror not regularly summoned and returned personated another; 77 Ga. 108; 7 Dowl. & R. 684; but not if the juror personated another through mistake, was qualified in other respects, and no injustice has been done; 12 East 229; 12 Ohio Cir. Ct. 367. That a juror sat on the trial after being challenged and stood aside, unless the party complaining knew of it, and did not object; 3 Yeates 318; that a juror was discharged without any sufficient reason, after being sworn; 1 Ohio St. 66; but not if the juror was discharged by mistake and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the party; 9 Metc. Mass 572; 5 Ired. 58; that the jury were not sworn, or that the oath was not administered in the form prescribed by law; 1 How. 497; 2 Me. 270.

The disqualification of jurors, if it has not been waived, will be ground for a new trial; but a principal cause of challenge to a juror, not discovered during the trial, will not require a new trial in a criminal case, unless injustice resulted to the prisoner from the fact that such juror served; 36 W. Va. 729; that a juror was also a member of the grand jury finding the bill will not sustain a motion in arrest of judgment, where no objection was made to the juror on the trial; 30 S. C. 105; 41 La. Ann. 688; 4 Utah 42. The want of a necessary property qualification is ground for a new trial; 4 Term 473; 15 Vt. 61; irregularity in selection, which results in injury to the defeated party; 59 Mo. 417; but after a plea of not guilty and conviction, defendant may not object to the venire or to jurors summoned under it; 9 Humphr. 626; or to a juror whose name was not in the box, on the list, or on the books of the tax receiver; 63 Ga. 791; but not if it appears that injustice was not done; 31 W. Va. 459; and there was a fair trial, and the verdict was fully warranted by the evidence; 53 Fed. Rep. 565. Relationship to one of the parties; 32 Me. 310; or to one of the counsel; 81 Me. 158; 17 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 631; or business relations with the counsel; 42 N. Y. S. 569; is ground; but knowledge of such relation must not have been obtained before trial, else the disqualification is waived; 84 Me. 304; unless the relationship be so remote as to render it highly improbable that it could have had any influence; 12 Vt. 661. So is interest in the event; 2 Johns. 194; 21 N. H. 438; concealment of his interest by juror; 111. Ind. 59; bias or prejudice; 3 Dall. 515; where a juror was deputy prosecuting attorney; 100 Ind. 357; conscientious scruples against finding a verdict of guilty; 13 N. H. 536; 16 Ohio 364; 13 Wend. 351; an opinion held by juror which would have excluded him if discovered before he was sworn; 36 W. Va. 729; and mental or bodily disease unfitting jurors for the intelligent performance of their duties; 6 Humphr. 59: 8 Ill. 368; alienage; 6 Johns. 332; 2 Ill. 476; 60 Vt. 449 (but not criminality of juror; 10 Oreg. 145; 15 Colo. 270: but see 8 Ill. 202; 4 Dall. 353). The want of purely statutory qualifications, such as citizenship, age, property, etc., which are not essential to an intelligent and impartial discharge of duty by a juror, are not treated with the same strictness as bias and like causes; 22 Fed. Rep. 234. See 2 N. H. 349.

When indirect measures have been resorted to, to prejudice the jury, or tricks practised or disingenuous attempts made to suppress or stifle evidence or thwart the proceedings, or to obtain an unconscionable advantage, they will be defeated by granting a new trial. For example: where papers material on the point in issue, not previously submitted, are surreptitiously handed to the jury; Cas. temp. Hardw. 116; 2 Yeates 273; or where the party, or some one in his behalf, directly approaches the jury on the subject of the trial; 7 S. & R. 458; 13 Mass. 218; or where one not a member of the jury slept in the same room with them, and had a conversation with one or two of them, in which he made statements reflecting on the character of the party against whom the verdict was rendered; 78 Ia. 207. But if the other party is aware of such attempts, and neglects to correct them when in his power, he will be deemed to have waived all objection; 11 Mod. 118. If the interference with the jury comes from a stranger, be without fault in the jury, and without the knowledge of the parties, and no injury has thereby ensued, the verdict will not be disturbed; 5 Mo. 525; 3 Bibb 8; 11 Humphr. 169, 491. But see 9 Miss. 187; 16 id. 465; 20 id. 398. Where the jury, after retiring to deliberate, examined witnesses in the case, a new trial was granted; Cro. Eliz. 189; 2 Bay 94; 1 Brev. 16; so, also, when one of their number communicates to his fellows private information possessed by him, which influences the finding; 1 Swan 61; 2 Yeates 166; 4 Yerg. 111; 36 Neb. 708; or the judge addresses a note to them, or privately visits them, after they have retired to deliberate; 1 Pick. 337; 10 Johns. 238; or a juror takes a private view; 157 Mass. 579; 57 Fed. Rep. 898; 52 Minn. 329.

Misconduct of the jury will sometimes avoid the verdict: as, for example, jurors betting as to the result; 4 Yerg. 111; sleeping during the trial; 8 Ill. 368; see 181 Pa. 172; unauthorized separation; 1 Va. Cas. 271; 11 Humphr. 502; 3 Harr. N. J. 468; but see 101 N. C. 761; 7 Mont. 489; 147 Ill. 385; taking refreshment at the charge of the prevailing party; 4 Wash. C. C. 32; 23 Neb. 171; see 49 Kan. 643; drinking spirituous liquor; 4 Cow. 17, 26; 4 Harr. 367; 78 Cal. 317; if any mental incapacity results therefrom: 8 Mont. 57; but see 40 La. Ann. 739; 8 Mont. 57; 7 id. 489; 100 N. C. 528; talking to strangers on the subject of the trial; 3 Day 223; 9 Humphr. 646; but not general conversation; 36 W. Va. 729; determining the verdict by a resort to chance: 15 Johns. 87; 8 Blackf. 32; 49 Cal. 275; 21 Ia. 379; 4 Wis. 67; 1 Minn. 156: 45 N. H. 408; by returning as the verdict the quotient obtained by dividing by twelve the total of the sums named by the jurors; 15 Johns. 87; 85 Tenn. 240; 35 Fed. Rep. 649; 11 L. R. A.

706. But every irregularity which would subject jurors to censure will not overturn the verdict, unless there be some reason to suspect that it may have had an influence on the final result. See 26 Tex. App. 260; 40 Kan. 258; 40 La. Ann. 751. In general, if it does not appear that the misconduct was occasioned by the prevailing party or any one in his behalf, does not indicate any improper bias, and the court cannot see that it either had or might have had an effect unfavorable to the party moving for a new trial, the verdict will not be disturbed. For gross misconduct of the jury a new trial may be granted on grounds of public policy; Hilly. New T. 198. Where the jury after returning an informal verdict were discharged, and within thirty seconds recalled and the verdict corrected, the separation will not vitiate the verdict; 26 Tex. App. 689. When the jury were kept out eighty-four hours it was held that their agreement was coerced and a new trial ordered; 156 N. Y. 268; s. c. 19 N. Y. L. J. 967.

Error of the judge will be ground for a new trial; such as, admitting illegal evidence which has been objected to,—unless the illegal evidence was wholly immaterial, or it is certain that no injustice has been done; 77 Ga. 692; and where the illegal testimony was admitted in gross violation of the well-settled principles which govern proof, it has been deemed per se ground for a new trial, notwithstanding the jury were directed to disregard it; 13 Johns. 350; but see 6 N. H. 333; improperly rejecting evidence tending in any degree to aid the jury in determining a material fact; 3 J. J. Marsh. 229; the admission of incompetent evidence, although of slight importance, if the party has suffered or might have suffered prejudice by its admission; 101 N. C. 134; 78 Ga. 480; 80 id. 549; 81 id. 93; (but the objection that the jury were not allowed to take to their room letters introduced in evidence cannot first be raised on a motion for a new trial; 70 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 769; nor the admission of improper evidence not objected to at the trial; 37 S. W. Rep. (Mo). 115;) withdrawing testimony once legally before the jury, —unless the excluded testimony could not be used on a second trial; 4 Humphr. 22; denying to a party the right to be heard through counsel; 2 Bibb 76; 3 A. K. Marsh. 465; erroneously refusing to grant a nonsuit; 19 Johns. 154; improperly restricting the examination or cross-examination of witnesses, or allowing too great latitude in that respect, under circumstances which constitute a clear case of abuse; 6 Barb. 383; refusing to permit a witness to refer to documents to refresh his memory, where, by the denial, the complaining party has sustained injury; 3 Litt. 338; improperly refusing an adjournment, whereby injustice has been done; 2 South. 518; 9 Ga. 121; improperly denying the right to open and close at the trial; 76 Ga. 79; refusing to give such instructions to the jury as properly arise in the case, where it is manifest that the jury erred through want of instruction; 4 Ohio 389; 9 Mo. 305; giving to the jury binding instructions, when there are circumstances in the case which ought to have been submitted to them,—unless the verdict is in strict accordance with the weight of evidence; 19 Wend. 402; 5 Humphr. 476; giving an erroneous exposition of the law on a point material to the issue,—unless it is certain that no injustice has been done, or the amount in dispute is very trifling, so that the injury is scarcely appreciable; 4 Conn. 356; 5 Sandf. 180; 3 Johns. 239; misleading the jury by a charge which is not explicit, or which is absurd and impossible, or contradictory, or argumentative and evasive; 9 Humphr. Tenn. 411; 11 Wend. 83; 6 Cow. 682; erroneous instruction as to the proof that is requisite; 3 Bibb 481; 21 Me. 20; misapprehension of the judge as to a material fact, and a direction to the jury accordingly, whereby they are misled; 1 Mills 200; see MISDIRECTION; instructing the jury as to the law upon facts which are purely hypothetical,—but not if the charge was correct in point of law, and the result does not show that the jury were misled by the generality of the charge; 8 Ga. 114; 2 Ala. N. S. 694; submitting as a contested point what has been admitted; 9 Conn. 216; erroneously leaving to the jury the determination of a question that should have been decided by the court, whereby they have mistaken the law; charging as to the consequences of the verdict; 1 Pick. 106; 2 Graham & W. New Tr. 595. Neither the rejection nor admission of immaterial evidence is cause for a new trial; 77 Ga. 692.

Surprise, as a ground for setting aside the verdict, is cautiously allowed. When it is occasioned by the act of the adverse party, or by circumstances out of the knowledge and beyond the control of the party injured by it, this has sometimes been held to constitute grounds for relief; but not when he might have been fully informed by the exercise of ordinary diligence; 6 Halst. 242; 12 Colo. 125; although even when the complainant is not entirely free from fault, the court, in cases where great wrong would otherwise be done, will, for the sake of promoting justice, grant a new trial. Among the cases of surprise may be enumerated the following: the unexpectedly being summoned and detained as a witness or juror in another court, or sudden and serious illness, which prevents the party from attending at the trial; 3 T. B. Monr. 113; 4 Litt. 1; 1 Halst. 344; that the cause was brought on prematurely, in the absence of the party; 6 Dana 89; erroneous ruling of the court as to the right to begin, which has worked manifest injustice; 4 Pick. 156; but see 8 Conn. 254, 296; perturbation of counsel, arising from sudden and dangerous sickness occurring in his family and coming to his knowledge during the trial; 14 Pick. 494; where some unforeseen accident has prevented the attendance of a material witness; 6 Mod. 22; 1 Harp. 267; that testimony beyond the reach of the party injured, and completely under the control of the opposite party, was not produced at the trial; 7 Yerg. 502; 7 Wend. 62; that competent testimony was unexpectedly ruled out on the trial; 9 Dana 26; 2 Vt. 573; 2 J. J. Marsh. 515; where a party's own witnesses, through forgetfulness, mistake, contumacy, or perjury, testify differently than anticipated, or where evidence is unexpectedly sprung upon a party by his opponent; 8 Ga. 136; 18 Miss. 326; see 69 Tex. 437; the withdrawal of a material witness before testifying, attended with suspicions of collusion; 25 Wend. 663; that a material witness was suddenly deprived of the power of testifying by a paralytic stroke, or other affection, or that the testimony of the witness was incoherent on account of his being disconcerted at the trial; 1 Root 175; where it is discovered after the trial that a material witness who testified is interested in the event, or where it is probable that the verdict was obtained by false testimony, which the party injured could not until after the trial contradict or expose; 2 C. B. 342; 1 Me. 322. But a new trial cannot be obtained on the ground of surprise caused by evidence which was clearly within the issues presented by the pleadings; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 343. There is no such ground for granting a new trial as mistake or inadvertence, as distinguished from accident or surprise; 96 Cal. 38. Accident or surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, does not include ignorance, mistake, nor misapprehension of an attorney, not occasioned by the adverse party, nor mismanagement of the defence by the attorney, through design, ignorance, or neglect; 52 Kan. 743; 107 Mo. 500.

New trials on account of after-discovered testimony are granted but rarely, and with great caution. The court, in order to set aside the verdict on this ground, must be satisfied that the evidence has come to the applicant's knowledge since the trial; 3 Stor. 1; 21 N. H. 166; see 76 Ga. 602; that it is not owing to the want of diligence that it did not come sooner; 6 Johns. Ch. 479; 80 Fed. Rep. 85; 91 Ga. 171; 99 Cal. 607; see 132 Mass. 341; 49 How. Pr. 53; 19 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1107; 73 Hun 195; 1 Blackf. 367; 49 Ill. App. 224; that it is so material that it will probably produce a different result; 1 Dudl. 85; 43 Ill. App. 417; see 76 Ga. 585; 41 Kan. 345; 29 W. Va. 410; 88 Tenn. 430; and that it is not cumulative; Woodb. & M. 348; as mere cumulative evidence is insufficient to warrant a new trial; 78 Cal. 41; 76 Ga. 602; 129 Ill. 101; 120 Ind. 138; 39 Minn. 190; 69 Tex. 679; 83 Va. 581; but the rule does not apply where it is cumulative evidence to prove an alibi; 3 Wash. 206. Nor must the sole object of the newly-discovered evidence be to impeach witnesses examined on the former trial; 7 Barb. 271; 8 Gratt. 637; 79 Ga. 633; 116 Ind. 84; 39 Kan. 320; 102 N. C. 347; 85 Va. 205; 43 Ill. App. 161; 41 La. Ann. 787. The moving party must state what the evidence is, and what diligence he has used in the preparation of his case; and his application must be accompanied by affidavits of the newly-discovered witness, unless some cause be shown why they cannot be produced; 5 Halst. 250; 1 Tyl. Vt. 441; 22 Me. 246. Evidence which could have been procured before the trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence is not sufficient; 76 Ga. 618; 73 Ia. 698; 41 Kan. 485; 62 Mich. 186; 69 Tex. 437; 82 Va. 827.

When a continuance on account of absent testimony is refused, and it subsequently appears that such evidence is necessary and material to the defendant, he should be awarded a new trial; 25 Tex. App. 27, 247; 26 id. 668.

Excessive damages may be good cause for granting a new trial; first, where the measure of damages is governed by fixed rules and principles, as in actions on contracts, or for torts to property, the value of which may be ascertained by evidence; second, in suits for personal injuries, where, although there is no fixed criterion for assessing the damages, yet it is clear that the jury acted from passion, partiality, or corruption; 10 Ga. 37.

A new trial should be granted for an error of law, where the general merits of the case, as one for a recovery at all, are doubtful, and where the damages are apparently excessive; 80 Ga. 602. In actions for personal torts, a new trial will not, in general, be granted on account of the smallness of the damages, unless the verdict is the result of contrivance by the defendant, or surprise on the plaintiff, or of partiality or misconduct of the jury, or unless the finding is entirely disproportioned to the injury. See 49 L. J. Q. B. 233, where a verdict of £7,000 in favor of a physician for damages, caused by defendant's negligence, was set aside on the ground of the damages being insufficient.

A state statute forbidding new trials on account of inadequate damages, if binding on the federal courts, would be in violation of the constitutional right of a trial by jury; 80 Fed. Rep. 72. Where the verdict is for an amount exceeding the damages laid in the writ, it will be set aside unless the plaintiff will release the excess; 7 Wend. 330. See JURY; DAMAGES.

It is within the discretion of the trial court, after a verdict awarding excessive damages, to make an order denying a motion for a new trial on the condition that the plaintiff will remit a certain part of the verdict; 98 Cal. 13; 130 U. S. 69; see 48 Mo. App. 79; 70 Ga. 119; 91 id. 813. It is error to set aside a verdict as excessive unless the amount is such as to show misconduct and impropriety on the part of the jury; 74 Hun 284. Where the question of damages is peculiarly for the jury, if the court grant a new trial, it should be granted absolutely and not on condition of a refusal to file a remittitur; 26 L. R. A. 653.

When the verdict is clearly against the law, it will be set aside, notwithstanding the jury had power to decide both the law and the fact, or the issue was one exclusively of fact and there have been concurrent verdicts by two successive juries; 1 Dudl. 213; 4 Ga. 198; see 79 Ga. 770; if, however, substantial justice has been done, a new trial will not be granted though the law arising on the evidence would have justified a different result; 1 Burr. 54; 4 Term 468.

Courts are at all times reluctant to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence; and where the jury have passed upon a mere question of fact, they will only do so when the verdict is palpably against the evidence; injustice must have been done by the verdict, and there must be a probability that justice will be done on a retrial; 21 Conn. 245; 5 Ohio 509; 3 Strobh. 358. A statute forbidding courts to set aside a third verdict in the same action, does not apply to a case where there is no evidence, and thus construed, is constitutional; 89 Tenn. 311. See 134 U. S. 614; 36 Neb. 642. Where the verdict is founded on circumstantial evidence, the court will rarely, if ever, interfere with it; 16 Mass. 345; 11 Ill. 36. On the other hand, when the issue approximates to a purely legal question, courts are somewhat more liberal in granting new trials; 2 McMull. 44. The verdict will be set aside where the witnesses upon whose testimony it was obtained have since the trial been convicted of perjury; 3 Dougl. 24; so where the testimony on which the verdict is founded derives its credit from circumstances, and those circumstances are afterwards clearly falsified by affidavit; 1 B. & P. 427; 3 Grah. & W. N. Tr. 1203.

The verdict may be void for obscurity or uncertainty; 1 S. & R. 367; and where special findings are contradictory on essential questions, a new trial should be granted; 111 N. C. 661. It will be set aside where it is not responsive to the issue, or does not comprehend all of the issues, unless the finding of one or more of the issues will be decisive of the cause; 2 Ala. N.S. 359; 11 Pick. 45; or where it is contrary to the instructions, whether the latter are right or wrong; 74 Ia. 330; or where the verdict shows that it includes items not shown by the evidence to be due; 45 Ill. App. 328. So, where the findings on the issues are contradictory, thus rendering the general verdict inconsistent and unintelligible; 97 N. C. 66. That it was not recorded in open court, or was received in the absence of the plaintiff, or was altered after it was recorded and the jury dismissed, will be ground for a new trial; 1 Ill. 109; 1 Wend. 36; 16 S. & R. 414. If rendered on Sunday, it will, in general, be void; but there are many instances in which verdicts have been sustained though rendered on that day; 1 South. 156; 15 Johns. 119; 3 Watts 56; 13 Ohio 490.

In the United States courts no exception lies to the overruling of a motion for a new trial; 7 U. S. App. 359; 85 Fed. Rep. 957; or where a new trial on the ground of after discovered evidence is refused; 24 U. S. App. 601.

The Pennsylvania act of 1891 provides that "the supreme court shall have power in all cases to affirm, reverse, amend, or modify a judgment, decree, etc., and to enter such judgment or decree as it may deem proper, without returning the record to the court below, and may order a verdict and judgment to be set aside and a new trial had." In 178 Pa. 481, it was said by the court that this was "a new power, a wide departure from the policy of centuries in regard to appellate courts and clearly exceptional in character;" but the act was held to be constitutional, and the court ordered the verdict set aside.

An act of Montana authorizing its supreme court to grant a new trial for excessive damages, was upheld in 131 U. S. 29, where it was held that the court below could order a new trial, or, with the plaintiff's consent, reduce the verdict, but could not enter judgment itself for a lesser sum than the verdict.

Courts of equity have always proceeded with great caution in awarding new trials at law. At the present day they are but seldom applied to for this purpose, as courts of law are liberal in exercising the same jurisdiction, and it has been held to be unconscionable and vexatious to bring into courts of equity a discussion which might have been had at law; 1 Sch. & L. 201. But, in general, when it would have been proper for a court of law to have granted a new trial if the application had been made while that court had the power, it is equally proper for a court of equity to do so if the application be made on grounds arising after the court of law can no longer act; 1 A. K. Marsh. 237. A court of equity will not grant a new trial at law to enable a party to impeach a witness, or because the verdict is against evidence; 1 Johns. Ch. 432; or when the new trial can be obtained by application to a law court; 52 N. J. Eq. 387. It will only interpose in cases of newly-discovered evidence, surprise, fraud, or the like, where the party is deprived of the means of defence by circumstances beyond his control; 1 Litt. 140; 2 Bibb 241; 2 Hawks 605; Will. Eq. Jur. 357.

A court of equity will often grant a second, and sometimes a third, fourth, and even fifth trial of a feigned issue, in cases where a court of law would not disturb a first verdict; 1 Edw. Ch. 96. This arises from the consideration that the responsibility of the decision rests upon the judge in equity; 3 Grah. & W. N. Tr. 1570.

New trials may be granted in criminal as well as in civil cases, at the solicitation of the defendant, when he is convicted even of the highest offences. But a person once lawfully convicted on a sufficient indictment can never after, against his consent, be a second time put in peril for the same offence, unless the former conviction was instituted by the fraudulent procurement of the defendant with a view to shield himself from adequate punishment; 2 Grah. & W. N. Tr. 61. Where the accused has been acquitted, and his acquittal has not been procured by his own fraud or evil practice, the law, mingling justice with mercy in favorem vitæ et libertatis, does not permit a new trial; 16 Conn. 54. In civil actions for the recovery of penalties, and in some cases where the form of proceeding is criminal, if the object be only to establish a civil right, as in cases of quo warranto and the like, new trials may be granted even after acquittal. But, in such cases, when the verdict is for the defendant, it will not, in general, be disturbed unless some rule of law be violated in the admission or rejection of evidence or in the charge of the court to the jury; 4 Term 753; 2 Cow. 811; 2 Graham & W. New Tr. 61. See Graham & Waterman; Hilliard, New Trials; JURY; MISDIRECTION; CHARGE; MISTRIAL.

NEW WORKS. By a new work is understood every sort of edifice or other work which is newly commenced on any ground whatever. Where the ancient form of work is changed, either by an addition being made to it or by some part of the ancient work being taken away, it is styled also a new work. La. Civ. Code, Art. 856.

NEW YORK. The name of one of the original states of the United States of America.

In its colonial condition this state was governed from the period of the revolution of 1688 by governors appointed by the crown, assisted by a council, which received its appointments also from the parental government, and by the representatives of the people. 1 Story, Const. b. 1, ch. 10.

There have been four constitutions adopted by the state since its colonial period: one in 1777, which remained in force until January 1, 1823, when the second went into operation. This second constitution remained until January 1, 1847, when a constitution, adopted by a convention of the people at Albany, went into force. This constitution was amended in certain particulars, and remained in force until January 1, 1895, when the present constitution was adopted by a convention at Albany and went into effect on January 1, 1895, except article six, relating to the courts, which became operative January 1, 1896.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is lodged in a senate and assembly.

The Senate consists of fifty members, chosen, one for each senatorial district, for the term of two years.

The Assembly consists of one hundred and fifty members, elected for the term of one year, one from each of the assembly districts, according to an apportionment by the legislature, and each county, except Hamilton, is to be always entitled to one member. No town is to be divided in forming assembly districts.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected biennially, for the term of two years, by the people, or by the legislature in consequence of a failure to elect by the people. He must be a citizen of the United States, thirty years old at least, and have been for five years next preceding his election a resident within the state. He has the usual executive powers including that of granting pardons and a veto subject to be overruled by a vote of two-thirds of both houses.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, for the same term, and must possess the same qualifications, as the governor, whose powers he exercises in case of a vacancy either permanent or temporary. He is president of the senate,—with only a casting vote therein. If the office of governor and lieutenant-governor are both vacant the succession is to the president of the senate and speaker of the assembly in that order.

A Secretary of State, a Comptroller, a Treasurer, an Attorney-General, and a State Engineer and Surveyor are elected by the people biennially, for the term of two years each.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Court of Appeals consists of the chief judge and six associate judges, who are chosen by the electors for the term of fourteen years, from and including the first day of January next after their election. Five members of the court form a quorum, and the concurrence of four is necessary to a decision.

It is the court of final appellate jurisdiction, limited to the review of questions of law, except in capital cases. No unanimous decision of the appellate division of the supreme court that there is evidence to support a verdict or finding not directed by the court, may be reviewed by the court of appeals. Except in capital cases appeals may be taken, as of right, only from judgments or orders entered upon decisions of the appellate division of the supreme court finally determining actions of special proceedings, and from orders granting new trials on exceptions where the appellants stipulate for final judgment upon affirmance. But the appellate division may allow an appeal on any question which, in its opinion, ought to be reviewed. The legislature may further restrict the jurisdiction and right of appeal, but the latter shall not depend upon the amount involved.

The Supreme Court.—There are four judicial districts for the appellate jurisdiction and eight for the election of judges. Seven justices in New York county and five in each of the other departments constitute the appellate division. In each department four constitute a quorum; the concurrence of three is necessary to a decision and no more than five shall sit in any case. From all the justices elected to the supreme court those who constitute the appellate division in each department and the presiding justice thereof are designated by the governor from time to time. The presiding justice remains such during his term, and must be a resident of the department, as must also be a majority of the other justices, all of whom are designated for terms of five years, or the unexpired portions of their terms of office if less. The jurisdiction is the same formerly exercised by the general terms of the supreme court and of the court of common pleas of the city of New York, the superior court of the cities of New York and Buffalo, and the city court of Brooklyn, and additional jurisdiction may be conferred by the legislature.

The supreme court has general and original jurisdiction in law and equity throughout the state, subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the appellate division and of the court of appeals. It has also the jurisdiction formerly vested in the courts of oyer and terminer which were abolished by the amended constitution, as were also the superior court and court of common pleas of the city of New York, the superior court of Buffalo, and the city court of Brooklyn, all their jurisdiction being transferred to the supreme court.

The County Courts in each county are held by a single judge elected for six years, except that in Kings County there are two judges. They have original civil jurisdiction only against resident defendants in cases involving not more than $2,000, and subject to these restrictions of residence and amount involved, the legislature may enlarge or restrict their jurisdiction. Except in the county of New York, they have also the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the court of sessions in each county, the latter being abolished by the amended constitution. They have also jurisdiction in cases of partition, dower, specific performance, and foreclosure and redemption of mortgages of real estate within the county; and the enforcement of liens on chattels within the county not exceeding $2,000. A county judge may hold court in any other county upon the request of the judge thereof.

The Surrogates' Courts in New York, Kings, and some of the larger counties are held by a surrogate elected for six years, excepting New York city where the terms is fourteen years. In the other counties the duties of surrogate are performed by the county judge. The surrogate has jurisdiction of the probate of wills, letters testamentary and of administration, accounts of executors, administrators, and trustees, and of the settlement of decedent's estates and the disposition of real property belonging thereto, for the payment of debts and the appointment of guardians.

Justices of the Peace are selected in each town and certain cities and villages of New York, for the term of four years, in number and classes as directed by law. They have jurisdiction of cases involving not more than $200 (or upon confession, $500), for breach of contract other than marriage, tortious injury of person or property, penalties, bonds conditioned for the payment of money, judgments of courts not of record, actions for the recovery of chattels, and not (over $200) upon surety bonds taken by them though the amount involved is more than $200. There are expressly excepted from their jurisdiction, actions where the people of the state are concerned, except for penalties not exceeding $200, and where the title to land comes in question, and actions for an assault and battery, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious prosecution, criminal conversation, and seduction, and matters of account where the sum total of the accounts exceeds four hundred dollars, and actions against an executor, administrator, heir, or devisee as such, and actions for damages for causing death. There are also justices' courts of Albany and Troy, and district courts of New York city, and the municipal court of the city of Rochester.

In New York city the city court has common law jurisdiction except against executors or administrators as such, where the amount involved is not above $2,000 and process is served in the city of New York. It has also jurisdiction to foreclose mechanics liens on property in the city, and the limitation as to amount does not apply to actions on undertakings in the court or for damages for breach of promise of marriage, and certain specified causes of action known as marine causes. By the charter of greater New York the jurisdiction of this court remains territorially as before. See MARINE COURT IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

The Municipal Court of New York is held in twenty-three districts of greater New York and has general common law jurisdiction where the amount does not exceed $500, except as affecting title to real property or where the recovery is for certain specified personal torts.

The Court of General Sessions is a criminal court divided into four parts, presided over by the recorder, the city judge, and two of three other judges known as judges of the court of general sessions. They have co-ordinate jurisdiction. For the general criminal administration greater New York is divided into two divisions in each of which there are courts of special sessions and also city magistrates, the latter of whom punish summarily petty offences and also act as magistrates.

NEW ZEALAND. A colony of Great Britain which was constituted a separate colony in 1841. It has a Governor appointed by the Crown. The legislation is vested in a Governor and General Assembly of two houses. The legislative council consists of forty-six members nominated by the Crown, and a house of representatives of seventy-five members elected for three years.

NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE. In Practice. Proof of some new and material fact in the case, which has been ascertained since the verdict. See NEW TRIAL.

NEWSPAPERS. Papers for conveying news, printed and distributed periodically.

A paper issued every day of the week except one is a daily newspaper; 45 Cal. 80.

A paper devoted principally to legal intelligence is a newspaper in which notices required by statute may be published; 75 Ill. 51; but see 25 Minn. 147.

Publication of notice from June 26 to July 26, both dates inclusive, is a sufficient compliance with an ordinance directing publication for thirty days, although the paper in which the publication is made is not issued on Sundays or on the 4th of July; 60 Fed. Rep. 961. See 7 Exch. 113; 4 Op. Atty. Gen. 11; LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

NEXI. In Roman Law. Persons bound (nexi); that is, insolvents, who might be held in bondage by their creditors until their debts were discharged. Heineccius, Antiq. Rom. ad Inst. lib. 3, tit. 330; Calvinus; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 486 a.

NEXT. Nearest or nighest, not in the sense of propinquity alone, as, for example, three persons on three chairs, one in the midst, those on each side of the middle one are equally near, each "next" to the middle one; but it signifies also order, or succession, or relation as well as propinquity. 27 L. J. Ch. 654. See generally 3 Q. B. 723; 4 Johns. Ch. 26; 3 Cai. (N. Y.) 89.

NEXT FRIEND. One who, without being regularly appointed guardian, acts for the benefit of an infant, married woman, or other person not sui juris. Where a person of unsound mind, not found so by inquisition, conveys his land by deed to another, the proper mode of proceeding in equity to have such deed cancelled, annulled, and made void is not by information exhibited by the attorney-general on the relation of others, but by a bill in the name of the incompetent person by a responsible next friend; 5 Del. Ch. 328, where the practice in such cases was elaborately discussed, both in argument and by Saulsbury, Ch., who permitted an information in the name of the attorney-general to be amended into a bill by next friend, and whose decision was affirmed on appeal, where the only question was the propriety of the amendment. It has been held in other states that such suit may be brought by next friend in behalf of a person not adjudged insane and having no guardian appointed; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 677; 72 Miss. 838; but in Ohio it was held that such action must be by guardian, not next friend; 41 N. E. Rep. 239; and in Iowa that it could not be done independently of statute; 96 Ia. 560. In such cases the court may supersede a next friend by a guardian ad litem, and in its discretion stay proceedings instituted by the former; 64 Fed. Rep. 331. See 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 513, 514; PROCHEIN AMI.

Where an infant is so young as to be incapable of making a selection of a person to represent him, the court will permit any person to institute suit in his behalf, exercising, however, discretion to prevent any abuse of that right; 134 U. S. 650.

NEXT OF KIN. This term is used to signify the relations of a party who has died intestate.

In general, no one comes within this term who is not included in the provisions of the statutes of distribution; 3 Atk. 423, 761; 1 Ves. Sen. 84; 28 How. Pr. 417. The phrase means relation by blood ; 72 N. Y. 312. It has been held, on the other hand, that next of kin in a will means "nearest of kin;" 10 Cl. & F. 215; 63 N. C. 242; 47 Ill. App. 292. A wife cannot, in general, claim as next of kin of her husband, nor a husband as next of kin of his wife ; 113 Mass. 430 ; 113 id. 431 ; 4 Ired. Eq. 56 ; 14 Ves. 372 ; 44 Ill. 446 ; 106 Pa. 176. But see 34 Barb. 410 ; 28 Ohio 192 ; 84 Iowa 655. But when there are circumstances in a will which induce a belief of an intention to include them under this term, they will be so considered, though in the ordinary sense of the word they are not ; Hovenden, Fr. 288, 289 ; 1 My. & K. 82 ; the same rule holds as to the interpretation of statutes; 7 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 185 ; 51 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 145 ; 25 Alb. L. J. 496. This phrase as used in the act of March 3, 1891 (French Spoliation claims), means next of kin living at the date of the act, to be determined according to the statutes of distribution of the respective states of the domicil of the original sufferers ; 162 U. S. 439 ; 160 Pa. 391, reversing 150 Pa. 85 ; 20 D. C. 261 ; 49 Leg. Int. 147, a Maryland case.

In the construction of wills and settlements, after a considerable conflict of opinions, the established rule of interpretation in England is that next of kin when found in ulterior limitations must be understood to mean nearest of kin without regard to the statute of distribution ; 2 Jarm. Wills 108 ; 162 U. S. 464. This rule was followed in 144 Mass. 135 ; 63 N. C. 242, but it was not approved in 95 N. Y. 17 ; 57 N. H. 226.

See LEGACY ; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION ; KIN ; KINDRED.

NEXUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The transfer of the ownership of a thing, or the transfer of a thing to a creditor as a security.

In one sense nexum includes mancipium ; in another sense, mancipium and nexum are opposed, in the same way as sale and mortgage or pledge are opposed. The formal part of both transactions consisted in a transfer per æs et libram. The person who became nexus by the effect of a nexum placed himself in a servile condition, not becoming a slave, his ingenuitas being only in suspense, and was said nexum inire. The phrases nexi datio, nexi liberatio, respectively express the contracting and the release from the obligation.

The Roman law as to the payment of borrowed money was very strict. A curious passage of Gellius (xx. 1) gives us the ancient mode of legal procedure in the case of debt, as fixed by the Twelve Tables. If the debtor admitted the debt, or had been condemned in the amount of the debt by a judex, he had thirty days allowed him for payment. At the expiration of this time he was liable to the manus injectio, and ultimately to be assigned over to the creditor (addictus) by the sentence of the prætor. The creditor was required to keep him for sixty days in chains, during which time he publicly exposed the debtor, on three nundinæ, and proclaimed the amount of his debt. If no person released the prisoner by paying the debt, the creditor might sell him as a slave or put him to death. If there were several creditors, the letter of the law allowed them to cut the debtor in pieces and take their share of his body in proportion to their debt. Gellius says that there was no instance of a creditor ever having adopted this extreme mode of satisfying his debt. But the creditor might treat the debtor, who was addictus, as a slave, and compel him to work out his debt ; and the treatment was often very severe. In this passage Gellius does not speak of nexi, but only of addicti, which is sometimes alleged as evidence of the identity of nexus and addictus, but it proves no such identity. If a nexus is what he is here supposed to be, the laws of the Twelve Tables could not apply ; for when a man became nexus with respect to one creditor, he could not become nexus to another ; and if he became nexus to several at once, in this case the creditors must abide by their contract in taking a joint security. This law of the Twelve Tables only applied to the case of a debtor being assigned over by a judicial sentence to several creditors, and it provided for a settlement of their conflicting claims. The precise condition of a nexus has, however, been a subject of much discussion among scholars. See Smith, Dict. Rom. & Gr. Antiq.; MANCIPIUM.

NICARAGUA. A republic of Central America. The president is elected for four years. The Senate of eighteen members is elected for six years and the House of Representatives of twenty-one members is elected for four years.

By a treaty of January 15, 1898, it was provided that Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, and San Salvador should constitute one republic in respect of their relations with foreign countries, to be called the Greater Republic of Central America. The treaty was to be ratified by the several republics. It has been ratified by Honduras, Nicaragua, and San Salvador, which are now known as states of the Greater Republic.

NICHILLS or NIHILS. Debts due to the exchequer which the sheriff could not levy, and as to which he returned nil. These sums were transcribed once a year by the clerk of the nichills, and sent to the treasurer's remembrancer's office, whence process was issued to recover the "nichill" debts. Both of these offices were abolished in 1833 ; Manning's Exch. Pr. 321 ; Moz. & W.

NICKNAME. A short name ; one nicked or cut off for the sake of brevity, without conveying any idea of opprobrium and frequently evincing the strongest affection or the most perfect familiarity. Busb. Eq. 74.

NIDERLING. A vile, base person or sluggard ; chicken-hearted. Spelm. Sometimes Nidering and Nithing. Toml. Dic.

NIECE. The daughter of a brother or sister. Ambl. 514; 1 Jac. 207. See NEPHEW ; LEGACY.

NIEFE. See NEIF.

NIENT COMPRISE (Law Fr. not included). An exception taken to a petition because the thing desired is not contained in that deed or proceeding whereon the petition is founded. Toml. Law Dict.

NIENT CULPABLE (Law Fr. not guilty). The name of a plea used to deny any charge of a criminal nature, or in an action for a tort.

NIENT DEDIRE (Law Fr. to say nothing). Words used to signify that judgment be rendered against a party because he does not deny the cause of action : i. e. by default.

When a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where the venue is laid, the practice in the English courts is, on an affidavit of the circumstances, to change it, in transitory actions; or, in local actions, they will give leave to enter a suggestion on the roll, with a nient dedire, in order to have the trial in another county. 1 Tidd, Pr. 655.

NIENT LE FAIT (Law Fr.). In Pleading. The same as non est factum, a plea by which the defendant asserts that the deed declared upon is not his deed.

NIENT SEIST. In Old Pleading. Not seised. The general plea in a writ of annuity. Crabb, Eng. L. 424.

NIGHT. That space of time during which the sun is below the horizon of the earth, except that short space which precedes its rising and follows its setting, during which by its light the countenance of a man may be discerned. It is night when there is daylight, crepusculum or diluculum, enough left or begun to discern a man's face withal. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 550; 4 Bla. Com. 224; Bac. Abr. Burglary (D); 2 Russ. Cr. 32. See 47 Conn. 182; 78 Ill. 295.

The common-law rule has been modified by statute in some of the states, and by the stat. 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, the night, for purposes of poaching, was held to begin one hour after sunset, and end one hour before sunrise. By the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, the night, during which a burglary may be committed, is deemed to commence at 9 P. M., and end at 6 A. M.; 4 Steph. Com. 105. But see 88 Wis. 163, where it was held that such an instruction is erroneous, as it is day when there is daylight enough by which to discern a person's face.

In the time of the English Saxons and even till Henry I., time was computed by nights: as fortnight for two weeks.

NIGHT WALKERS. Persons who sleep by day and walk by night; 5 Edw. III. c. 14; that is, persons of suspicious appearance and demeanor, who walk by night. In many of the states there are statutes against it; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 501, n. See 45 N. H. 543.

Watchmen may undoubtedly arrest them; and it is said that private persons may also do so; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 120. But see 3 Taunt. 14; Hamm. N. P. 135.

NIHIL CAPIAT PER BREVE (Lat. that he take nothing by his writ). In Practice. The form of judgment against the plaintiff in an action, either in bar or in abatement. When the plaintiff has commenced his proceedings by bill, the judgment is nihil capiat per billam. Co. Litt. 363.

NIHIL DICIT (Lat. he says nothing). The name of the judgment rendered against a defendant who fails to put in a plea or answer to the plaintiff's declaration by the day assigned. In such a case, judgment is given against the defendant of course, as he says nothing why it should not. See 15 Viner, Abr. 556; Dane, Abr. Index.

NIHIL EST (Lat. there is nothing). A form of return made by a sheriff where he has been unable to serve the writ. "Although non est inventus is the more frequent return in such case, yet it is by no means so full an answer to the command of the writ as is the return of nihil. That amounts to an averment that the defendant has nothing in the bailiwick; no dwelling-house, no family, no residence; and no personal presence to enable the officer to make the service required by the act of assembly. It is, therefore, a full answer to the exigency of the writ." 33 Pa. 139.

NIHIL HABET (Lat. he has nothing). The name of a return made by a sheriff, marshal, or other proper officer, to a scire facias or other writ, when he has not been able to serve it on the defendant. 5 Whart. 367.

Two returns of nihil in proceedings in rem are, in general, equivalent to a service; Yelv. 112; 1 Cow. 70; 1 Law Rep. N. C. 491; 4 Blackf. 188; 5 S. & R. 211; 24 Pa. 491; 71 id. 81.

NIHILS. See NICHILS.

NIL DEBET (Lat. he owes nothing). In Pleading. The general issue in debt on simple contract. Gould. Pl. 284. It is in the following form: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he does not owe the said sum of money above demanded, or any part thereof, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." When, in debt on specialty, the deed is the only inducement to the action, the general issue is nil debet. Steph. Pl. 174, n.; 8 Johns. 83. In English practice, by rule 11, Trinity Term, 1853, the plea of nil debet was abolished; 2 Chitty, Pl. 275.

NIL HABUIT IN TENEMENTIS. (Lat.). In Pleading. A plea by which the defendant, who is sued by his landlord in debt for rent upon a lease, but by deed indented, denies his landlord's title to the premises, alleging that he has no interest in the tenements. 2 Lilly, Abr. 214; 12 Viner, Abr. 184.

NISI PRIUS (Lat. unless before). In Practice. For the purpose of holding trials by jury. Important words in the writ (venire) directing the sheriff to summon jurors for the trial of causes depending in the superior courts of law in England, which have come to be adopted, both in England and the United States, to denote those courts or terms of court held for the trial of civil causes with the presence and aid of a jury.

The origin of the use of the term is to be traced to a period anterior to the institution of the commission of nisi prius in its more modern form. By Magna Charta it was provided that the common pleas should be held in one place, and should not follow the person of the king; and by another clause, that assizes of novel disseisin and of mort d'ancestor, which were the two commonest forms of actions to recover land, should be held in the various counties before the justices in eyre. A practice obtained very early, therefore, in the trial of trifling causes, to continue the cause in the superior court from term to term, provided the justices in eyre did not sooner (nisi prius justiciarii) come into the county where the cause of action arose, in which case they had jurisdiction when they so came. Bracton, l. 3, c. 1, § 11. By the statute of nisi prius, 13 Edw. I. c. 30, enforced by 14 Edw. III. c. 16, justices of assize were empowered to try common issues in trespass and other suits, and return them, when tried, to the superior court, where judgment was given. The clause was then left out of the continuance and inserted in the venire, thus: "Præcipimus tibi quod venire facias coram justiciariis nostris apud Westm. in Octavis Scti Michaelis, nisi talis et talis, tali die et loco, ad partes illas venerint, duodecim," etc. (we command you that you cause to come before our justices at Westminster, on the octave of Saint Michael, unless such and such a one, on such a day and place, shall come to those parts, twelve, etc.). Under the provisions of 42 Edw. III. c. 11, the clause is omitted from the venire, and the jury is respited in the court above, while the sheriff summons them to appear before the justices, upon a habeas corpora juratorum, or, in the king's bench, a distringas. See Sell. Pr. Introd. lxv.; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 116; 3 Shars. Bla. Com. 352–354; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 245, 382.

See, also, ASSIZE; COURT OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS; JURY.

NISI PRIUS ROLL. In Practice. The transcript of a case made from the record of the superior court in which the action is commenced, for use in the nisi prius court.

It includes a history of all the proceedings in the case, including the declaration, plea, replication, rejoinder, issue, etc. It must be presented in proper manner to the nisi prius court. When a verdict has been obtained and entered on this record, it becomes the postea, and is returned to the superior court.

Under the Judicature Act of 1875, 1st Sched. Ord. xxxvi. r. 17, the party entering the action for trial is to deliver to the officer a copy of the pleadings for the use of the judge. Moz. & W.

NITHING. See NIDERLING.

NO AWARD. The name of a plea in an action on an award. 2 Ala. 520; 1 N. Chipm. 131; 3 Johns. 367.

NO BILL. Words frequently indorsed on a bill of indictment by the grand jury when they have not sufficient cause for finding a true bill. They are equivalent to Not found, or Ignoramus. 2 N. & M'C. 558.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. In Scotch Law. An equitable power of the court of sessions, by which it is able, to a certain extent, to give relief when none is possible at law. Stair, Inst. b. iv. tit. 3, § 1; Erskine, Inst. 1. 3. 22; Bell, Dict.

NOBILITY. An order of men, in several countries, to whom special privileges are granted. The constitution of the United States provides, Art. 1, § 10, that "no state shall grant any title of nobility," and § 9, that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of congress, accept of any title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state." It is singular that there should not have been a general prohibition against any citizen whatever, whether in private or public life, accepting any foreign title of nobility. An amendment for this purpose has been recommended by congress, but it has not been ratified by a sufficient number of states to make it a part of the constitution, probably from a growing sense that it is unnecessary; Rawle, Const. 120; Story, Const. §§ 1350–52; Fed. No. 84.

NOCTANTER (By night). An abolished writ which issued out of chancery and returned to the queen's bench for the prostration of inclosures, etc. It was repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

NOCTES DE FIRMA. In Domesday book understood of entertainment of meat and drink for so many nights. Toml. Law Dict. See NIGHT.

NOCUMENTUM (Lat. harm, nuisance). In Old English Law. A thing done whereby another man is annoyed in his free lands or tenements. Also, the assize or writ lying for the same. Fitzh. N. B. 183; Old N. B. 108, 109. Manw. For. Laws, c. 17, divides nocumentum into generale, commune, speciale. Reg. Orig. 197, 199; Coke, Will Case. Nocumentum was also divided into damnosum, for which no action lay, it being done by an irresponsible agent, and injuriosum et damnosum, for which there were several remedies. Bracton 221; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 26, § 2.

NOISE. See NUISANCE; INJUNCTION.

NOL. PROS. See NOLLE PROSEQUI.

NOLENS VOLENS (Lat.). Whether willing or unwilling.

NOLISSEMENT. In French Law. Affreightment. Ord. Mar. liv. 3, t. 1.

NOLLE PROSEQUI. In Practice. An entry made on the record, by which the prosecutor or plaintiff declares that he will proceed no further. See Tr. & H. Pr. 566.

A nolle prosequi may be entered either in a criminal or a civil case. In criminal cases, before a jury is impanelled to try an indictment, and also after conviction, the attorney-general has power to enter a nolle prosequi without the consent of the defendant; but after a jury is impanelled a nolle prosequi cannot be entered without the consent of the defendant; 17 Pick. 395; 12 Vt. 93; 3 Hawks 613; 7 Humphr. 152; 1 Bail. 151; 9 Ga. 306. See 102 Mass. 487; 49 N. H. 155. It is for the prosecuting officer to enter a nol. pros. in his discretion; 3 Hawks 613; but in some states leave must be obtained of the court; 1 Hill N. Y. 377; 1 Va. Cas. 139; 12 Vt. 93; 7 Smith, Pa. Laws 227.

It may be entered as to one of several defendants; 11 East 307.

The effect of a nolle prosequi, when obtained, is to put the defendant without day; but it does not operate as an acquittal; for he may be afterwards reindicted, and, it is said, even upon the same indictment fresh process may be awarded; 6 Mod. 261; Com. Dig. Indictment (K); 2 Mass. 172; 4 Cush. 235; 13 Ired. 256. See 3 Cox, C. C. 93; 7 Humphr. 159; 57 Ga. 478; 61 Mo. 173.

A nolle prosequi as to some of the counts in an indictment works no acquittal, but leaves the prosecution just as though such counts had never been inserted in the indictment; 152 U. S. 539.

In civil cases, a nolle prosequi is considered not to be of the nature of a retraxit or release, as was formerly supposed, but an agreement only not to proceed either against some of the defendants, or as to part of the suit. See 1 Wms. Saund. 207, note 2, and the authorities there cited; 1 Chitty, Pl. 546. A nolle prosequi is now held to be no bar to a future action for the same cause, except in those cases where, from the nature of the action, judgment and execution against one is a satisfaction of all the damages sustained by the plaintiff; 3 Term 511; 1 Wils. 98.

In civil cases, a nolle prosequi may be entered as to one of several counts; 7 Wend. 301; or to one of several defendants; 1 Pet. 80; as in the case of a joint contract, where one of two defendants pleads infancy, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to him and proceed against the other; 1 Pick. 500. See, generally, 1 Pet. 74; 2 Rawle 334; 1 Bibb 337; 3 Cow. 335, 374; 5 Gill & J. 489; 5 Wend. 224; 3 Watts 460.

NOMEN (Lat.). In Civil Law. A name of a person or thing. In a stricter sense, the name which declared the gens or family: as, Porcius, Cornelius; the cognomen being the name which marked the individual: as Cato, Marcus; agnomen a name added to the cognomen for the purpose of description. The name of the person himself: e. g. nomen curiis addere. The name denoting the condition of a person or class: e. g. nomen liberorum, condition of children. Cause or reason (pro causa aut ratione): e. g. nomine culpæ, by reason of fault. A mark or sign of anything, corporeal or incorporeal. Nomen supremum, i. e. God. Debt or obligation of debt. A debtor. See Calvinus, Lex.

In Old English Law. A name. The Christian name, e. g. John, as distinguished from the family name: it is also called prænomen. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 10, §§ 7, 9; Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.

In Scotch Law. Nomen debiti. Right to payment of a debt.

NOMEN COLLECTIVUM (Lat.). A word in the singular number which is to be understood in the plural in certain cases.

Misdemeanor, for example, is a word of this kind, and when in the singular may be taken as nomen collectivum and including several offences. 2 B. & Ad. 75. Heir, in the singular, sometimes includes all the heirs. Felony is not such a term.

NOMEN GENERALISSIMUM (Lat.). A most universal or comprehensive term: e. g. land. 2 Bla. Com. 19; 3 id. 172; Tayl. Law Gloss. So goods. 2 Will. Ex. 1014.

NOMINAL DAMAGES. In Practice. A trifling sum awarded where a breach of duty or an infraction of the plaintiff's right is shown, but no serious loss is proved to have been sustained.

Those awarded where, from the nature of the case, some injury has been done, the amount of which the proofs fail entirely to show; 5 Wash. 807.

Wherever any act injures another's right, and would be evidence in future in favor of a wrong-doer, an action may be sustained for an invasion of the right without proof of any specific injury; 1 Wms. Saund. 346 a; 28 N. H. 438; 13 Conn. 269; and wherever the breach of an agreement or the invasion of a right is established, the law infers some damage, and if none is shown will award a trifling sum: as, a penny, one cent, six and a quarter cents, etc.; 14 Ill. 301; 4 Denio 554; Sedgw. Dam. 47; Field, Damages § 860.

Thus, such damages may be awarded in actions for flowing lands; 2 Stor. 661; 1 Rawle 27; 12 Me. 183; 28 N. H. 438; injuries to commons; 2 East 154; violation of trade-marks; 4 B. & Ad. 410; and see 7 Cush. 322; 2 R. I. 566; infringement of patents; 1 Gall. 429, 483; 49 Fed. Rep. 747; diversion of water-courses; 5 B. & Ad. 1; 17 Conn. 288; 2 Ill. 544; 6 Ind. 39; 32 N. H. 90; but see 21 Ala. N. S. 309; 6 Ohio St. 187; trespass to lands; 24 Wend. 188; 2 Tex. 206; see 4 Jones, N. C. 139; neglect of official duties, in some cases; 5 Metc. Mass. 517; 1 Denio 548; 27 Vt. 563; 12 N. H. 341; breach of contracts; 2 Hill N. Y. 644; 6 Md. 274; 129 N. Y. 148; 61 Conn. 56; 62 Fed. Rep. 136; 42 Mo. App. 659; when substantial damages have not been sustained; 44 Ill. App. 358; and many other cases where the effect of the suit will be to determine a right; 12 Ad. & E. 488; 13 Conn. 361; 20 Mo. 603; 28 Me. 505; 19 Miss. 98; 2 La. Ann. 907; 89 Ga. 815; 51 Mo. App. 601; 8 Wash. 307; 45 La. Ann. 1401. And see, in explanation and limitation; 10 B. & C. 145; 1 Q. B. 636; 22 Vt. 231; 1 Dutch. 255; 14 B. Monr. 330; 5 Ind. 250; 6 Rich. 75.

The title or right is as firmly established as though the damages were substantial; Sedgw. Dam. 47. As to its effect upon costs, see id. 55; 2 Metc. Mass. 96.

NOMINAL PARTNER. One who allows his name to appear as a member of a firm, wherein he has no real interest. See PARTNER.

NOMINAL PLAINTIFF. One who is named as the plaintiff in an action, but who has no interest in it, having assigned the cause or right of action to another, for whose use it is brought.

In general, he cannot interfere with the rights of his assignee, nor will he be permitted to discontinue the action, or to meddle with it; 1 Wheat. 238; 7 Cra. 152; 1 Johns. Cas. 411; 1 Johns. 592, n.; Bisp. Eq. § 172; Greenl. Ev. § 173.

NOMINATE CONTRACT. A contract distinguished by a particular name, the use of which name determines the rights of all the parties to the contract: as, purchase and sale, hiring, partnership, loan for use, deposit and the like. The law thus supersedes the necessity for special stipulations, and creates an obligation in the one party to perform, and a right in the other to demand, whatever is necessary to the explication of that contract. In Roman law there were twelve nominate contracts, with a particular action for each. Bell, Dict. Nominate and Innominate; Mackeldey, Civ. Law §§ 395, 408; Dig. 2. 14. 7. 1.

NOMINATION (from Lat. nominare, to name). An appointment: as, I nominate A B executor of this my last will.

A proposal or naming. The word nominate is used in this sense in the constitution of the United States, art. 2, s. 2, § 2: the president "shall nominate, and by and with the consent of the senate shall appoint, ambassadors," etc.

In an agreement for reference, a provision that each party shall nominate a referee means not only naming him, but also the communication of the nomination to the other party. 17 L. J. Q. B. 2; 11 Q. B. 7.

As to nominations under modern ballot laws, see ELECTION.

NOMINE PŒNÆ (Lat. in the nature of a penalty). In Civil Law. A condition annexed to heirship by the will of the deceased person. Domat, Civ. Law; Hallifax, Anal.

At Common Law. A penalty fixed by covenant in a lease for non-performance of its conditions. 2 Lilly, Abr. 221.

It is usually a gross sum of money, though it may be anything else, appointed to be paid by the tenant to the reversioner, if the duties are in arrear, in addition to the duties themselves. Hamm. N. P. 411.

To entitle himself to the nomine pœnæ, the landlord must make a demand of the rent on the very day, as in the case of a reentry; 1 Saund. 287 b, note; 7 Co. 28 b; Co. Litt. 202 a; 7 Term 117. A distress cannot be taken for a nomine pœnæ unless a special power to distrain be annexed to it by deed; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2451. See Bac. Abr. Rent (K 4); Woodf. Landl. & T. 253; Dane, Abr. Index.

NOMINEE. One who has been named or proposed for an office.

NOMOCANON. A body of canon law with the addition of imperial laws bearing upon ecclesiastical matters; also a collection of the canons of the ancient church and fathers without regard to the imperial constitutions.

NON-ABILITY. Inability; an exception against a person. Fitz. Nat. Brev. 35, 65.

NON ACCEPTAVIT (Lat. he did not accept). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action of assumpsit brought against the drawee of a bill of exchange upon a supposed acceptance by him. See 4 M. & G. 561.

NON-ACCESS. The non-existence of sexual intercourse between husband and wife is generally expressed by the words non-access of the husband to the wife; which expressions, in a case of bastardy, are understood to mean the same thing. 2 Stark, Ev. 218, n. See ACCESS.

NON-AGE. By this term is understood that period of life from birth till the arrival at twenty-one years. In another sense it means under the proper age to be of ability to do a particular thing: as, when non-age is applied to one under the age of fourteen, who is unable to marry. See AGE.

NON-APPARENT OR NON-CONTINUOUS EASEMENTS. Discontinuous easements. Such that have no means specially constructed or appropriated to their enjoyment, and that are enjoyed at intervals, leaving between these intervals no visible sign of their existence; such as a right of way, or right of drawing a seine upon the shore. 18 N. J. Eq. 262. See EASEMENT.

NON ASSUMPSIT (Lat. he did not undertake). In Pleading. The general issue in an action of assumpsit. Andr. Steph. Pl. 231.

Its form is, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he did not undertake or promise, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this he puts himself upon the country."

Under this plea almost every matter may be given in evidence, on the ground, it is said, that as the action is founded on the contract, and the injury is the non-performance of it, evidence which disaffirms the obligation of the contract, at the time when the action was commenced, goes to the gist of the action. Salk. 279; 2 Stra. 738; 1 B. & P. 481. See 12 Viner, Abr. 189; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 G 1).

NON ASSUMPSIT INFRA SEX ANNOS (Lat. he has not undertaken within six years). In Pleading. The plea by which, when pleadings were in Latin, the defendant alleged that the obligation was not undertaken and the right of action had not accrued within six years, the period of limitation of the right to bring suit. See LIMITATION. It is still in use.

NON BIS IN IDEM. In Civil Law. A phrase which signifies that no one shall be twice tried for the same offence: that is, that when a party accused has been once tried by a tribunal in the last resort, and either convicted or acquitted, he shall not again be tried. Code 9. 2. 9. 11; Merlin, Répert. See JEOPARDY.

NON CEPIT MODO ET FORMA (Lat. he did not take in manner and form). In Pleading. The plea which raises the general issue in an action of replevin; or rather which involves the principal part of the declaration, for, properly speaking, there is no general issue in replevin; Morris, Repl. 142.

Its form is, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he did not take the said cattle (or, goods and chattels, according to the subject of the action) in the said declaration mentioned, or any of them, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country."

It denies the taking the things and having them in the place specified in the declaration, both of which are material in this action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. 239, n.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 490.

NON-CLAIM. An omission or neglect by one entitled to make a demand within the time limited by law: as, when a continual claim ought to be made, a neglect to make such claim within a year and a day.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICER. A subordinate officer who holds his rank not by commission from the executive authority of a state or nation, but by appointment by a superior officer.

NON COMPOS MENTIS (Lat. not of sound mind, memory, or understanding). A generic term, including all the species of madness, whether it arise from idiocy, sickness, lunacy, or drunkenness. Co. Litt. 247; 4 Co. 124; 4 Comyns, Dig. 613; 5 id. 186; Shelf. Lun. 1. See INSANITY, and titles there referred to.

NON CONCESSIT (Lat. he did not grant). In English Law. The name of a plea by which the defendant denies that the crown granted to the plaintiff by letters-patent the rights which he claims as a concession from the king: as, for example, when a plaintiff sues another for the infringement of his patent right, the defendant may deny that the crown has granted him such a right. It does not deny the grant of a patent, but of the patent as described in the plaintiff's declaration; 3 Burr. 1544; 6 Co. 15 b. Also a plea resorted to by a stranger to a deed, because estoppels do not hold with respect to strangers. It brought into issue the title of the grantor as well as the operation of the deed; Whart. Dict.

NON-CONFORMISTS. In English Law. A name given to certain dissenters from the rites and ceremonies of the church of England.

NON CONSTAT (Lat. it does not appear. It is not certain). Words frequently used, particularly in argument, to express dissatisfaction with the conclusions of the other party: as, it was moved in arrest of judgment that the declaration was not good, because non constat whether A B was seventeen years of age when the action was commenced. Swinb. pt. 4, § 22, p. 331.

NON CULPABILIS (Lat.). In Pleading. Not guilty. It is usually abbreviated non cul.; 16 Viner, Abr. 1.

NON DAMNIFICATUS (Lat. not injured). In Pleading. A plea in the nature of a plea of performance to an action of debt on a bond of indemnity, by which the defendant asserts that the plaintiff has received no damage. 1 B. & P. 640, n. a; 1 Saund. 116, n. 1; 2 id. 81; 14 Johns. 177; 10 Wheat. 396, 405; 3 Halst. 1.

NON DECIMANDO. See DE NON DECIMANDO.

NON DEDIT. In Pleading. The general issue in formedon. See NE DONA PAS.

NON DELIVERY. Neglect, failure, or refusal to deliver goods on the part of a carrier, vendor, etc. See COMMON CARRIER.

NON DEMISIT (Lat. he did not demise). In Pleading. A plea proper to be pleaded to an action of debt for rent, when the plaintiff declares on a parol lease. Gilb. Debt 436; Bull. N. P. 177; 1 Chitty, Pl. 477. A plea in bar, in replevin, to an avowry for arrears of rent, that the avowant did not demise. Morris, Repl. 179. It cannot be pleaded when the demise is stated to have been by indenture; 12 Viner, Abr. 178; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 W 48).

NON DETINET (Lat. he does not detain). In Pleading. The general issue in an action of detinue. Its form is as follows: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he does not detain the said goods and chattels (or 'deeds and writings,' according to the subject of the action) in the said declaration specified; or any part thereof, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." Andr. Steph. Pl. 231.

It puts in issue the detainer only: a justification must be pleaded specially; 8 Dowl. Pract. Cas. 347. It is a proper plea to an action of debt on a simple contract in the case of executors and administrators. 6 East 549; Bac. Abr. Pleas (I); 1 Chitty, Pl. 476. See DETINET.

NON EST FACTUM (Lat. is not his deed). In Pleading. A plea to an action of debt on a bond or other specialty.

Its form is, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that the said supposed writing obligatory (or 'indenture,' or 'articles of agreement,' according to the subject of the action) is not his deed. And of this he puts himself upon the country." 6 Rand. 86; 1 Litt. 158.

It is a proper plea when the deed is the foundation of the action; 1 Wms. Saund. 38, note 3; 2 id. 187 a, note 2; 2 Ld. Raym. 1500; 11 Johns. 476; and cannot be proved as declared on; 4 East 585; on account of non-execution; 6 Term 317; or variance in the body of the instrument; 1 Campb. 70; 4 Maule & S. 470; 2 D. & R. 662. Under this plea the plaintiff may show that the deed was void ab initio; 2 Campb. 272; 12 Johns. 337; 10 S. & R. 25; see 2 Salk. 275; 6 Cra. 219; or became so after making and before suit; 5 Co. 119 b; 11 id. 27. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 417, n.

In covenant, the defendant may, under this plea, avail himself of a mis-statement or omission of a qualifying covenant; 2 Stra. 1146; 9 East 188; 1 Campb. 70; or omission of a condition precedent; 11 East 639; 7 D. & R. 249. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. xix. rr. 20, 23.

NON EST INVENTUS, (Lat. he is not found). In Practice. The sheriff's return to a writ requiring him to arrest the person of the defendant, which signifies that he is not to be found within his jurisdiction. The return is usually abbreviated N. E. I. Chitty, Pr. The English form "not found" is also commonly used.

NON-FEASANCE. The non-performance of some act which ought to be performed.

When a legislative act requires a person to do a thing, its non-feasance will subject the party to punishment: as, if a statute require the supervisors of the highways to repair such highways, the neglect to repair them may be punished. See 1 Russ. Cr. 48; MANDATUM.

NON FECIT (Lat. he did not make it). The name of a plea, for example, in an action of assumpsit on a promissory note. 3 M. & G. 446. Rarely used.

NON FECIT VASTUM CONTRA PROHIBITIONEM (Lat. he did not commit waste against the prohibition). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action founded on a writ of estrepement, that the defendant did not commit waste contrary to the prohibition. 2 Bla. Com. 226, 227.

NON IMPEDIVIT (Lat. he did not impede). In Pleading. The plea of the general issue in quare impedit. 3 Bla. Com. 305; 3 Woodd. Lect. 36. In law French, ne disturba pas.

NON IMPLACITANDO ALIQUEM DE LIBERO TENEMENTO SINE BREVI. A writ to prohibit bailiffs, etc., from levying a distress upon any man without the king's writ touching his freehold. Cowel.

NON INFREGIT CONVENTIONEM (Lat. he has not broken the covenant). In Pleading. A plea in an action of covenant. This plea is not a general issue: it merely denies that the defendant has broken the covenants on which he is sued. It being in the negative, it cannot be used where the breach is also in the negative. Bacon, Abr. Covenant (L); 3 Lev. 19; 2 Taunt. 278; 1 Aik. 150; 4 Dall. 436; 7 Cow. 71.

NON-INTERCOURSE. The refusal of one state or nation to have commercial intercourse with another. See EMBARGO.

NON-INTERCOURSE ACT. An act passed by congress in February, 1809, forbidding intercourse with certain nations. It remained in force till March 15, 1809, so far as related to all countries but France and Great Britain, and as to them, after the end of the next session of congress. On June 12, 1798, intercourse with France and her dependencies was forbidden by an act of congress. See EMBARGO; WAR.

NON INTROMITTENDO QUANDO BREVE DE PRÆCIPI IN CAPITE SUBDOLE IMPETRATUR. A writ which used to be directed to the justices of the bench or in eyre, commanding them not to give one who had (under cover of entitling the king to land, etc., as holding of him in capite) deceitfully obtained the writ, the benefit of the same, but to put him to his writ of right if he thought fit to use it. Cowel.

NON-ISSUABLE PLEAS. Those upon which an issue would not determine the action upon the merits, as a plea in abatement.

NON-JOINDER. In Pleading. The omission of one or more persons who should have been made parties to a suit at law or in equity, as plaintiffs or defendants.

In Equity. It must be taken advantage of before the final hearing; 1 Ala. N. S. 580; 24 Conn. 586; 1 Des. 315; 1 Stockt. Ch. 401; 10 Paige, Ch. 445; 2 McLean, 376; 47 Fed. Rep. 583; except in very strong cases; 1 Pet. 299; as, where a party indispensable to rendering a decree appears to the court to be omitted; 14 Vt. 178; 19 Ala. N. S. 213; 5 Ill. 424; 24 Me. 119. See 64 N. H. 2. The objection may be taken by demurrer, if the defect appear on the face of the bill; 5 Ill. 424; 1 Des. 315; 8 Ga. 506; 4 Rand. 451; or by plea, if it do not appear; 9 Mo. 605. The objection may be avoided by waiver of rights as to the party omitted; 4 Wisc. 54; or a supplemental bill filed, in some cases; 4 Johns. Ch. 605. It will not cause dismissal of the bill in the first instance; 3 Cra. 189; 6 Conn. 421; 17 Ala. 270; 1 T. B. Monr. 189; 1 Dev. Eq. 354; 1 Hill S. C. 53; but will, if it continues after objection made; 17 Ala. 270; 5 Mas. 561; without prejudice; 5 Mas. 561; 1 J. J. Marsh. 76; 4 B. Monr. 594; 7 Paige, Ch. 451. The cause is ordered to stand over in the first instance; 20 Me. 59; 9 Cow. 320; 2 Edw. Ch. 242. See JOINDER; PARTIES MISJOINDER.

In Law. See ABATEMENT; PARTIES.

In England, the Judicature Act of 1875, Ord. xvi., has made very full provisions as to the joinder of parties, and the consequences of misjoinder and non-joinder. All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative.

NON JURIDICUS. See DIES NON.

NON JURORS. In English Law. Persons who refuse to take the oaths, required by law, to support the government. See 1 Dall. 170.

NON LIQUET (Lat. it is not clear). In Civil Law. Words by which the judges (judices), in a Roman trial, were accustomed to free themselves from the necessity of deciding a cause when the rights of the parties were doubtful. On the tablets which were given to the judges wherewith to indicate their judgment, was written N. L.

NON MERCHANDIZANDO VICTUALIA. An ancient writ directed to justices of assize commanding them to inquire whether the officers of certain towns sold victuals in gross or by retail during the exercise of their office, contrary to a statute then in force, and to punish them accordingly. Cowel; Reg. Orig. 184.

NON MOLESTANDO. A writ which lay for him who was molested, contrary to the king's protection granted him. Cowel.

NON OBSTANTE. In English Law. These words, which literally signify notwithstanding, were used to express the act of the English king by which he dispensed with the law, that is, authorized its violation.

He would by his license or dispensation make an offence dispunishable which was malum in se; but in certain matters which were mala prohibita he could, to certain persons and on special occasions, grant a non obstante. Vaugh. 330; Lev. 217; Sid. 6, 7; 12 Co. 18; Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 7); 2 Reeve, Eng. C. L. 8, p. 83. But the doctrine of non obstante, which set the prerogative above the laws, was demolished by the bill of rights at the revolution; 1 W. & M. Stat. 2, c. 2; 1 Bla. Com. 342; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 441.

NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO. Notwithstanding the verdict. See JUDGMENT.

Judgment non obstante veredicto, strictly and technically, is a judgment given for the plaintiff, on his motion, where the defendant had a verdict, but it appears from the record that, either from some matter growing out of the pleading, or because the fact found by the jury is immaterial, the defendant is not, in law, entitled to the judgment. In such cases where the common-law practice prevails, a writ of inquiry is awarded to assess the damages; 2 Tidd, Pr. 920. "The right method . . . is not to state the entry of judgment upon the verdict by rule, but to enter the verdict upon record, and then the judgment for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto." Id. For a statement of the nature and effect of such a judgment at common law, see JUDGMENT, sub-title Classification, 1, (3). As appears from the definition there given, this was a judgment for the plaintiff, and in many of the states, it has been uniformly held that judgment non obstante veredicto can only be given for a plaintiff; the remedy for a defendant is to have the judgment arrested; 2 Ohio St. 287; 2 Hill 86; 6 Rich. 208. A motion by a defendant for a judgment non obstante veredicto is never allowable; 10 Ia. 402; 15 N. H. 546; 4 Wend. 486; 89 Wis. 6; 65 Vt. 231; 17 R. I. 208, 544; Steph. Pl. [98]; 1 Freem. Judg. § 7; 1 Black, Judg. § 16; unless the well-settled common-law rule has been relaxed by statute or decisions; 58 Fed. Rep. 144; 19 U. S. App. 24.

A motion for such judgment must be founded on the record alone; 8 Vt. 309; 62 id. 92; 2 Wend. 624; it cannot be rendered after a judgment upon a verdict has been entered; 14 Miss. 218; 12 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 628. It is allowed where a verdict has been found for the defendant on an insufficient plea in avoidance; 1 G. Green 134; 5 Pick. 187; that is, where the plea confesses the action and entirely fails to avoid it; 14 Ind. 115; 7 Blackf. 384; or if found true, is neither bar nor answer; 14 Ohio 204; or if an immaterial issue tendered by the plaintiff was found for the defendant and a repleader was unnecessary to effect justice; 7 Mo. 478; or if on motion for a new trial it is clear that in no event could damages be recovered on the cause of action; 5 R. I. 419.

It has been said that in Pennsylvania, where a point of law is reserved at the trial, the jury is instructed to find for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant moves for judgment on the point reserved non obstante veredicto. See 2 Brewster, Prac. 1219. And, in some other states, the technical common-law rule that this form of judgment should not be given for the defendant, has not been observed; though it would seem that this change of practice is due, in some degree, to the confusion of this subject with judgment on special verdicts and points reserved, and to the fact that judgments are frequently entered under the name non obstante veredicto, which properly and technically would not be such if the common-law distinctions were carefully observed. Such judgment for defendant has been entered in an action for damages where a plea of contributory negligence was not controverted; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 924; or where plaintiff's evidence is a mere scintilla; 155 Pa. 156; or where special findings in plaintiff's favor were set aside as against undisputed evidence, and defendant moved for judgment on the remaining findings and undisputed evidence; 91 Wis. 447. But such motion by defendant will not be granted where the defence is a general denial; 115 N. C. 402; or where the pleadings and evidence raise questions of fact proper for a jury; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 730; or where the evidence supports a verdict for plaintiff, but the undisputed facts show the transaction to be within the statute of frauds; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 736. A reservation of "the question whether there is any evidence in this case, to be submitted to the jury, on which plaintiff is entitled to recover," does not present a "point reserved" to authorize judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto; 170 Pa. 346; 164 id. 73; nor can such judgment be rendered for plaintiff where verdict is for defendant, subject to the question reserved, whether, notwithstanding the findings, plaintiff was not entitled to recover; 151 id. 415.

A motion for such judgment is properly denied, after verdict upon an issue distinctly raised by the answer and submitted to the jury without objection; 112 N. C. 402; or where the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict; 15 Ind. App. 188; or where there is a general finding for the party against whom the motion is made; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1060; or where, after reserving a point on certain facts, other evidence is submitted to the jury, and it is uncertain on which evidence the jury found; 110 Pa. 1.

It is not sufficient that the verdict was contrary to the weight of the evidence; 42 Neb. 712; and the judgment can be entered only when the moving party is entitled to it upon the pleadings of the party who had the verdict; 43 Neb. 132.

In Ohio, judgment against a general verdict cannot be entered unless all the facts necessary to support such judgment are expressly found; 66 Fed. Rep. 471. In Indiana, a judgment non obstante will not be granted unless there is an irreconcilable conflict between the general verdict and the answer to the interrogatories; 5 Ind. App. 204; 6 id. 52, 340, 646; 132 Ind. 278. When the special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former controls the latter, and the court may give judgment accordingly; 51 Kan. 731. In Oregon, there is a statutory provision authorizing judgment for the other party where the verdict does not correspond with pleadings, and it is held that that right is not impaired by failing to move for judgment before verdict; 21 Ore. 495. In Minnesota, such judgment can be given only to a party who, after the testimony, moved to direct a verdict in his favor; 64 Minn. 136.

In many states there are statutes on the subject which must be considered in connection with the decisions.

NON OMITTAS (Lat. more fully, non omittas propter libertatem, do not omit on account of the liberty or franchise). In Practice. A writ which lies when the sheriff returns on a writ to him directed, that he hath sent to the bailiff of such a franchise, which hath return of writs, and he hath not served the writ; then the plaintiff shall have this writ directed to the sheriff, that he omit not on account of any franchise, but himself enter into the franchise and execute the king's writ.

This clause is now usually inserted in all processes addressed to sheriffs. Wharton, Lex., 9th ed.; 2 Will. IV. c. 39; 3 Chitty, Stat. 494; 3 Chitty, Pr. 190, 310.

NON PONENDIS IN ASSISSIS ET JURATIS. A writ which lay for persons who are summoned to attend the assizes or to sit on a jury and wish to be freed and discharged from the same. Reg. Orig. 100.

NON-PLEVIN. In Old English Law. A neglect to replevin land taken into the hands of the king upon default, within fifteen days, by which seisin was lost, as by default. Heugh. de Magn. Ch. c. 8. By 9 Edw. III. c. 2, no man shall lose his land by non-plevin.

NON PROCEDENDO AD ASSISSAM REGE INCONSULTO. A writ to put a stop to the trial of a cause appertaining unto one who is in the king's service, etc., until the king's pleasure respecting the same be known. Cowel.

NON PROS. An abbreviation of non prosequitur, he does not pursue. Where the plaintiff, at any stage of the proceedings, fails to prosecute his action, or any part of it, in due time, the defendant enters non prosequitur, and signs final judgment, and obtains costs against the plaintiff, who is said to be non pros'd. 2 Archb. Pr., Chitty ed. 1409; 3 Bla. Com. 296; 3 Chitty, Pr. 10; Caines, Pr. 102. The name non pros. is applied to the judgment so rendered against the plaintiff; 1 Sell. Pr.; Steph. Pl. 195.

In modern English practice under the Jud. Act, 1875, a plaintiff, failing to deliver a statement of his claim in due time, may have his action dismissed for want of prosecution, And the same course may be taken with a plaintiff who fails to comply with an order to answer interrogatories; besides that the party so making default renders himself liable to "attachment." If the plaintiff fail in due time to give "notice of trial," the defendant may do so for him; Moz. & W.

NON-RESIDENCE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The absence of spiritual persons from their benefices.

NON-RESIDENT. Not residing in the jurisdiction. Service of process on non-resident defendants is void, excepting cases which proceed in rem, such as proceedings in admiralty or by foreign attachment, and the like, or where the property in litigation is within the jurisdiction of the court.

One does not necessarily become a non-resident by absconding or absenting himself from his place of abode; 52 Mo. App. 291; nor does a mere casual or temporary absence on business or pleasure render one a non-resident, even if he may not have a house of usual abode in the state; 4 Barb. 504; 15 Abb. Pr. 221; if there be no intent to change his residence; 54 N. W. Rep.

(Ia.) 225; 59 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 199. But where a man has a settled abode, for the time being, in another state for the purpose of business or pleasure, he is a non-resident; 82 Cal. 631; and it has been held that one who departs from the state with his family and remains absent for about a year is a non-resident, though he has not acquired a residence elsewhere, and though he intended to return in a few months; 69 Hun 308. See HOME; DOMICIL; RESIDENCE; PROCESS; SERVICE.

NON RESIDENTIA PRO CLERICUS REGIS. A writ addressed to a bishop charging him not to molest a clerk employed in the king's service, by reason of his non-residence. Cowel; Reg. Orig. 58.

NON SOLVENDO PECUNIAM AD QUAM CLERICUS MULCTATUR PRO NON RESIDENTIA. A writ prohibiting an ordinary from taking a pecuniary mulct imposed upon a clerk of the king's for non-residence. Cowel.

NON SUBMISSIT (Lat.). The name of a plea to an action of debt on a bond to perform an award, by which the defendant pleads that he did not submit. Bacon, Abr. Arbitration, etc. (G).

NON SUM INFORMATUS (Lat.). In Pleading. I am not informed. See JUDGMENT.

NON TENENT INSIMUL (Lat. they do not hold together). In Pleading. A plea to an action in partition, by which the defendant denies that he holds the property which is the subject of the suit, together with the complainant or plaintiff.

NON TENUIT (Lat. he did not hold). In Pleading. The name of a plea in bar in replevin, when the defendant has avowed for rent-arrear, by which the plaintiff avows that he did not hold in manner and form as the avowry alleges. Rosc. Real Act. 628.

NON-TENURE. In Pleading. A plea in a real action, by which the defendant asserted that he did not hold the land, or at least some part of it, as mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration; 1 Mod. 250; in which case the writ abates as to the part with reference to which the plea is sustained. 8 Cra. 242. It may be pleaded with or without a disclaimer. It was a dilatory plea, though not strictly in abatement; 2 Saund. 44, n. 4; Dy. 210: Booth, Real Act. 179; 3 Mass. 312; 11 id. 216; but might be pleaded as to part along with a plea in bar as to the rest; 1 Lutw. 716; Rast. Ent. 231 a, b; and was subsequently considered as a plea in bar; 14 Mass. 239: 1 Me. 54; 2 N. H. 10; Bac. Abr. Pleas (I 9).

NON-TERM. The vacation between two terms of a court.

NON-TRADING PARTNERSHIP. A partnership organized for the purpose of carrying on the business of sawing lumber pickets and lath is non-trading in character; 145 U. S. 512, reversing 30 Fed. Rep. 413. See PARTNERSHIP.

NON-USER. The neglect to make use of a thing.

A right which may be acquired by use may be lost by non-user; and an absolute discontinuance of the use for twenty years affords presumption of the extinguishment of the right in favor of some other adverse right; 5 Whart. 584; 23 Pick. 141; but non-user of the franchise of a corporation is held insufficient to constitute a dissolution of the same without a judicial adjudication thereof; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 209. See DISSOLUTION; FORFEITURE. A right of way, whether acquired by grant or prescription, is not extinguished by the habitual use by its owner of another way, equally convenient, instead of it, unless there is an intentional abandonment of the former way; 121 Mass. 3. See ABANDONMENT; EASEMENT.

Every public officer is required to use his office for the public good: a non-user of a public office is, therefore, a sufficient cause of forfeiture; 2 Bla. Com. 153; 9 Co. 50. Non-user for a great length of time will have the effect of repealing an old law. But it must be a very strong case which will have that effect; 13 S. & R. 452.

NONSENSE. That which in a written agreement or will is unintelligible.

It is a rule of law that an instrument shall be so construed that the whole, if possible, shall stand. When a matter is written grammatically right, but it is unintelligible and the whole makes nonsense, some words cannot be rejected to make sense of the rest: 1 Salk. 324; but when matter is nonsense by being contrary and repugnant to some precedent sensible matter, such repugnant matter is rejected; 14 Viner, Abr. 142; 15 id. 560. The maxim of the civil law on this subject agrees with this rule: Quæ in testamento ita sunt scripta, ut intelligi non possent; perinde sunt ac si scripta non essent. Dig. 50. 17. 73. 3. See AMBIGUITY; CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

In pleading, when matter is nonsense by being contradictory and repugnant to something precedent, the precedent matter, which is sense, shall not be defeated by the repugnancy which follows, but that which is contradictory shall be rejected: as in ejectment where the declaration is of a demise on the second day of January, and that the defendant postea scilicet, on the first of January, ejected him, here the scilicet may be rejected as being expressly contrary to the postea and the precedent matter; 5 East 255; 1 Salk. 324.

NONSUIT. The name of a judgment given against the plaintiff when he is unable to prove a case, or when he refuses or neglects to proceed to the trial of a cause after it has been put at issue, without determining such issue.

A voluntary nonsuit is an abandonment of his cause by plaintiff, who allows a judgment for costs to be entered against him by absenting himself or failing to answer when called upon to hear the verdict. 1 Dutch. 556. See 77 Me. 344.

An involuntary nonsuit takes place when the plaintiff, on being called, when his case is before the court for trial, neglects to appear, or when he has given no evidence on which a jury could find a verdict. 13 Johns. 334. See 73 Mich. 258.

At common law the plaintiff cannot be nonsuited against his will; for a party cannot be compelled to make default.

An involuntary nonsuit is not ordered against a plaintiff who has given evidence of his claim, in the federal courts; 103 U. S. 264; 1 Pet. 469; 1 McCrary 436; 7 U. S. App. 359; nor in many of the state courts; 9 Ind. 551; 6 Ark. 44; 14 id. 706; 57 id. 468; 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 125; 13 Mo. 312; 19 id. 101; 2 Or. 57; 4 Yerg. 528; 4 Vt. 363; 1 Wash. Va. 87, 219; 23 Md. 312; 12 Sm. & M. 550; but in other states if the evidence is insufficient to support the action a nonsuit may be granted; 40 Pa. 364; 155 Mass. 96; 36 Minn. 122; 15 R. I. 213; 30 N. J. L. 460; 15 Nev. 59; 13 Neb. 37; 45 Ia. 661; 13 Johns. 334; 24 N. Y. 430; 3 McCord 131; 42 Me. 259; 26 N. H. 351; 4 Ohio St. 628; 12 Or. 329; 17 Ill. 494; 126 id. 466; 1 Cal. 108; 103 id. 153; 16 Ga. 154.

In Pennsylvania, by statute, the plaintiff may be nonsuited compulsorily. This may be done in two cases: (1) under the act of March 11, 1836, when the defendant has offered no evidence, and the plaintiff's evidence is not sufficient in law to maintain his action; (2) under the act of April 14, 1846, confined to Philadelphia, when the cause is reached and the plaintiff or his counsel does not appear, or, if he appears, does not proceed to trial, and does not assign and prove a sufficient legal cause for continuance.

The granting of a nonsuit for want of sufficient evidence to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff is no infringement of the right of trial by jury; 164 U. S. 301.

The defendant cannot assign as error the denial of his motion for a nonsuit if thereafter he proceeds to examine witnesses and try the cause on the merits; 80 Fed. Rep. 638.

A nonsuit is no bar to another action for the same cause; Freeman, Judgt. § 261; 5 Allen 158; 9 N. J. L. 38; 77 Hun 30.

A judge has no power to nonsuit a plaintiff on the opening statement of his counsel without his consent; [1892] 1 Q. B. 122; nor is a nonsuit warranted unless it appears that plaintiff is not entitled to recover after giving him the most favorable view that a jury would be warranted in taking of the evidence; 137 N. Y. 389; 156 Pa. 34; but where the evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff the court should not grant a nonsuit; 69 Hun 373.

A nonsuit may be asked for at any time before verdict; 38 S. C. 507; 103 Cal. 251; see 31 Fla. 56; and, if it is proper, to grant it prematurely is harmless error; 102 Cal. 450. Defendant waives his motion for a nonsuit and cannot base any claim of error upon it, where, after it is overruled, he proceeds with his defence and introduces testimony; 149 U. S. 17; 153 id. 216; 128 id. 710; 124 id. 405. Exception cannot be taken to the court's refusal to enter a compulsory nonsuit; 161 Pa. 87.

After the trial is begun, plaintiff's right to take a nonsuit is not absolute, but lies in the discretion of the court, and will be denied when plaintiff gets all his own evidence in and is not surprised by defendant's evidence; 59 Fed. Rep. 670.

After a voluntary nonsuit taken by the plaintiff, the court cannot reinstate the case without defendant's consent; 36 Pittsb. L. J. Pa. 356.

The formality of calling the plaintiff when he is to suffer a nonsuit is obsolete in most of the states.

NORMAN FRENCH. See LANGUAGE.

NORROY. See HERALD.

NORTH. In a description in a deed, unless qualified or controlled by other words, it means due north. Northerly in a grant, where there is no object to direct its inclination to the east or west, must be construed to mean north. 1 Johns. 156; 96 Col. 505. See 115 Mass. 578.

NORTH CAROLINA. The name of one of the original states of the United States of America.

The territory which now forms this state was included in the grant made in 1663 by Charles II., to Lord Clarendon and others, of a much more extensive country. The boundaries were enlarged by a new charter granted by the same prince to the same proprietaries in the year 1665. By this charter the proprietaries were authorized to make laws, with the assent of the freemen of the province or their delegates, and they were invested with various other powers. Being dissatisfied with the form of government, the proprietaries procured the celebrated John Locke to draw up a plan of government for the colony, which was adopted, and proved to be impracticable: it was highly exceptionable on account of its disregard of the principles of religious toleration and national liberty, which are now universally admitted. After a few years of unsuccessful operation it was abandoned. The colony, had been settled at two points, one called the Northern and the other the Southern settlement, which were governed by separate legislatures. In 1729 the proprietaries surrendered their charter, when it became a royal province. and was governed by a commission and a form of government in substance similar to that established in other royal provinces. In 1732 the territory was divided, and the divisions assumed the names of North Carolina and South Carolina.

A constitution of North Carolina was adopted December 18, 1776. To this constitution amendments were made in convention June 4, 1835, which were ratified by the people, and took effect on January 1, 1836. There was a second constitution of 1868, and the amended constitution of 1876.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Senate consists of fifty members, chosen biennially, for the term of two years. Each senator must be twenty-five years of age, a resident of the state as a citizen for two years, and usually a resident of the district.

The House of Representatives is composed of one hundred and twenty representatives. They are elected biennially, for the term of two years. The qualifications required are that each representative be a qualified elector of the state and a resident in the county for which he is chosen, one year immediately preceding his election.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for the term of four years from the first day of January next following his election. He is not eligible more than four years in any term of eight years, unless the office shall have been cast upon him as lieutenant-governor or president of the senate. He must be thirty years of age, and a citizen of the United States five years, and a resident of the state for two years next before election.

There are also a lieutenant-governor, a secretary of state, an auditor, a treasurer, a superintendent of public instruction, and an attorney-general, elected for a term of four years by the qualified electors of the state.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The distinction between law and equity is done away with. There is but one form of action in all civil actions. Feigned issues also are abolished, and the issue is tried before a jury.

The Supreme Court is composed of a chief justice and four associate justices, elected by the qualified voters; they hold their office for eight years. Of these, one is selected by his associates to preside, and is styled the chief justice. It is almost entirely an appellate tribunal, having original jurisdiction only in proceedings by a bill in equity, or an information in the nature of a bill in equity, filed on behalf of the state, in the name of the attorney-general, to repeal grants and other letters patent obtained by fraud or false suggestions, and such decisions are merely recommendations to the general assembly. It has appellate jurisdiction over all cases in law or equity brought before it by appeal or otherwise from a superior court of law or a court of equity. It has also power to issue writs of certiorari, scire facias, habeas corpus, and other writs which may be necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. Criminal cases are to be certified to the superior court from which the appeal was taken, which court proceeds to judgment in accordance with the decision of the supreme court.

A Superior Court is held by one judge, in each county of the state, twice in each year. For this purpose the state is divided into twelve judicial districts. The judges are elected in the same manner and for the same term as the supreme judges. The superior courts have general original jurisdiction, unless otherwise provided, of all pleas, real, personal, and mixed, and also all suits and demands relative to dower, partition, legacies, filial portions, and estates of intestates; and, unless it be otherwise provided, of all pleas of the state, and criminal matters of what nature, degree, or denomination soever, whether brought before them by original or by mesne process, or by certiorari, writ of error, appeal from any inferior court, or by any other way or manner whatsoever; and they are hereby declared to have full power and authority to give judgment and to award execution and all necessary process therein, etc. For money demands the superior courts have exclusive original jurisdiction whenever the principal sum demanded exceeds $200.

The same judges who hold the superior courts of law hold, at the same times and places, courts of equity, and in doing so "possess all the powers and authorities within the same that the court of chancery, which was formerly held in this state under the colonial government, used and exercised, and that are properly and rightfully incident to such a court, agreeable to the laws and usages now in force and practice."

Justices of the Peace have jurisdiction of civil actions founded on contract, where the sum demanded does not exceed two hundred dollars, and where the title to real estate is not in controversy, and all criminal matters arising within their counties, where the punishment cannot exceed a fine of fifty dollars or imprisonment for thirty days. In issues of fact, on demand of either party, a jury of six men is summoned to try the same.

NORTH DAKOTA. One of the states of the United States.

By the act of congress of February 22, 1889 (1 Supp. Rev. Stat. 645), the area comprising the territory of Dakota was divided on the line of the seventh standard parallel produced due west to the western boundary of said territory, and that portion north of said parallel forms the state of North Dakota. The proclamation announcing the admission of this state into the Union was made by the President on November 2, 1889.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER is vested in a governor who holds his office for the term of two years.

THE JUDICIAL POWER is vested in the supreme court, district courts, county courts, justices of the peace, and in such other courts as may be created by law for cities, incorporated towns, and villages.

The Supreme Court, except as otherwise provided in the constitution, has appellate jurisdiction only, which is co-extensive with the state, and has a general superintending control over all inferior courts. It has power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, injunction, and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to the proper exercise of its jurisdiction. It consists of three judges, a majority of whom are necessary to form a quorum. The judges are elected for a term of six years.

The District Courts have original jurisdiction, except as otherwise provided, of all causes both at law and equity, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. They have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, quo warranto, certiorari, injunction, and other original and remedial writs. The state is divided into six judicial districts, in each of which there is elected one judge of the district court, whose term of office is four years.

The County Court has exclusive original jurisdiction in probate and testamentary matters, etc., and when the majority of the voters of a county desire, the county courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in civil actions where the amount in controversy does not exceed $1,000, and in all criminal actions below the grade of felony.

Justices of the Peace are elected in each county. They have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in civil actions, where the amount in controversy does not exceed $200, and under certain conditions to hear and determine cases of misdemeanor.

NORTHWEST PROVINCES. A territory of British India.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES. One of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada which was formerly known as Rupert's Land. Its government is vested in a lieutenant-governor and an executive council, consisting of seven appointed members and twenty-two elected members. The seat of government is Regina.

NORTHWEST TERRITORY. A name formerly applied to the territory northwest of the Ohio river. See OHIO.

NORTHAMPTON TABLES. See LIFE TABLES.

NORWAY. The most northerly country of Europe. It is a limited hereditary monarchy under the same sovereign as Sweden, but independent of that country, except that they are united in foreign and diplomatic relations. The executive power is vested in a king and a ministry, and the legislative in a Storthing consisting of an upper and a lower house.

NOSOCOMI. In Civil Law. Persons who have the management and care of hospitals for paupers. Clef Lois Rom. mot Administrateurs.

NOT FOUND. Words indorsed on a bill of indictment by a grand jury, when they have not sufficient evidence to find a true bill. See IGNORAMUS.

NOT GUILTY. In Pleading. The general issue in several sorts of actions.

In trespass, its form is as follows: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the force and injury, when, etc., and says that he is not guilty of the said trespasses above laid to his charge, or any part thereof, in the manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country."

Under this issue the defendant may give in evidence any matter which directly controverts the truth of any allegation, which the plaintiff on such general issue will be bound to prove; 1 B. & P. 213; and no person is bound to justify who is not primâ facie a trespasser; 2 B. & P. 359; 2 Saund. 284 d. For example, the plea of not guilty is proper in trespass to persons, if the defendant have committed no assault, battery, or imprisonment, etc.; and in trespass to personal property, if the plaintiff had no property in the goods, or the defendant were not guilty of taking them, etc.; and in trespass to real property, this plea not only puts in issue the fact of trespass, etc., but also the title, which, whether freehold or possessory in the defendant or a person under whom he claims, may be given in evidence under it, which matters show primâ facie that the right of possession, which is necessary in trespass, is not in the plaintiff, but in the defendant or the person under whom he justifies; 7 Term 354; 8 id. 403; Willes 222; Steph. Pl. 178; 1 Chitty, Pl. 491, 492.

In trespass on the case in general the formula is as follows: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he is not guilty of the premises above laid to his charge, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country."

This, it will be observed, is a mere traverse, or denial, of the facts alleged in the declaration, and therefore, on principle, should be applied only to cases in which the defence rests on such a denial. But here a relaxation has taken place; for, under this plea, a defendant is permitted not only to contest the truth of the declaration, but, with some exceptions, to prove any matter of defence that tends to show that the plaintiff has no cause of action, though such matters be in confession and avoidance of the declaration; as, for example, a release given, or satisfaction made; Steph. Pl. 182, 183; 1 Chitty, Pl. 486; McKelv. Pl. 31.

In trover. It is not usual in this action to plead any other plea, except the statute of limitations; and a release, and the bankruptcy of the plaintiff, may be given in evidence under the general issue; 7 Term 391.

In debt on a judgment suggesting a devastavit, an executor may plead not guilty; 1 Term 462.

In criminal cases, when the defendant wishes to put himself on his trial, he pleads not guilty. This plea makes it incumbent upon the prosecutor to prove every fact and circumstance constituting the offence, as stated in the indictment, information, or complaint. On the other hand, the defendant may give in evidence under this plea not only everything which negatives the allegations in the indictment, but also all matter of excuse and justification.

In English practice, under the Jud. Act, 1875, it is not sufficient for a defendant to deny generally the facts alleged by the plaintiff's statement of claim, but he must deal specifically with each allegation of fact of which he does not admit the truth. But this does not affect defendant's right to plead "not guilty by statute," which is a plea of the general issue by a defendant in a civil action, when he intends to give special matter in evidence by virtue of some act or acts of parliament; in which case he must add the reference to such act or acts, and state whether they are public or otherwise. But if a defendant so plead, he will not be allowed to plead any other defence without the leave of the court or a judge. Jud. Act, 1875, 1st Sched. Ord. xix. r. 16. Moz. & W.

NOT POSSESSED. In Pleading. A plea sometimes used in actions of trover, when the defendant was not possessed of the goods at the commencement of the action. 3 M. & G. 101, 103. See McKelv. Pl. 34. This plea would probably be held "evasive" within the meaning of Ord. xix. r. 22, Jud. Act, 1875. Moz. & W.

NOT PROVEN. In Scotch Criminal Law. It is a peculiarity of the Scotch jury system in criminal trials that it admits a verdict of not proven, corresponding to the non liquet of the Roman law. The legal effect of this is equivalent to not guilty; for a prisoner in whose case it is pronounced cannot be tried again. According to the homely but expressive maxim of the law, no man can be made to thole an assize twice. But, although the verdict of not proven is so far tantamount to an acquittal that the party cannot be tried a second time, it falls very far short of it with regard to the effect upon his reputation. He goes away from the bar of the court with an indelible stigma upon his name. There stands recorded against him the opinion of a jury that the evidence respecting his guilt was so strong that they did not dare to pronounce a verdict of acquittal. When Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was tried and acquitted by an English jury in 1554, he said, "It is better to be tried than to live suspected." But in Scotland a man may be not only tried, but acquitted, and yet live suspected, owing to the sinister influence of a verdict of not proven. Forsyth, Hist. Trial by Jury 334.

NOTARIUS. In Civil Law. One who took notes or draughts in shorthand of what was said by another, or of proceedings in the senate or in a court. One who draughted written instruments, wills, conveyances, etc. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

In English Law. A notary. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Cowel.

NOTARY, NOTARY PUBLIC. An officer appointed by the executive or other appointing power, under the laws of different states.

Notaries are of ancient origin; they existed in Rome during the republic, and were called tabelliones forenses, or personæ publicæ. Their employment consisted in the drawing up of legal documents. They exist in all the countries of Europe, and as early as A. D. 803 were appointed by the Frankish kings and the popes. Notaries in England are appointed by the archbishop of Canterbury. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, § 4. They are officers of the civil and canon law; Brooke, Office & Pr. of a Notary 9. In most of the states, notaries are appointed by the governor alone, in others by the governor, by and with the advice of his council, in others by and with the advice and consent of the senate; in the District of Columbia they are appointed by the President of the United States. As a general rule, throughout the United States, the official acts of a notary public must be authenticated by seal as well as signature; 10 Iowa 305; 49 Ala. 242; 12 Ill. 162.

Their duties differ somewhat in the different states, and are prescribed by statute. They are generally as follows: to protest bills of exchange and draw up acts of honor; to authenticate and certify copies of documents; to receive the affidavits of mariners and draw up protest relating to the same; to attest and take acknowledgments of deeds and other instruments, and to administer oaths. Ordinarily notaries have no jurisdiction outside the county or district for which they are appointed; but in several states they may act throughout the state.

By act of congress, Sept. 16, 1850, notaries are authorized to administer oaths and take acknowledgments in all cases where under the laws of the United States justices of the peace were formerly authorized to act.

By act of Aug. 15, 1876, c. 304, notaries are authorized to take depositions and do all other acts in relation to taking testimony to be used in the courts of the United States, and to take acknowledgments and affidavits with the same effect as commissioners of the United States circuit courts may do. R. S. § 1778. They may protest national bank circulating notes; R. S. § 5226; take acknowledgment of assignment of claims upon the United States; id. § 3477; and administer oaths of allegiance to persons prosecuting such claims; id. § 3479. By act of June 22, 1874, c. 390, notaries may take proof of debts against the estate of a bankrupt. By act of Feb. 26, 1881, c. 82, reports of national banks may be sworn to before notaries, but such notary must not be an officer of the bank; R. S. § 5211. By act of Aug. 18, 1856, c. 127, every secretary of legation and consular officer may, within the limits of his legation, perform any notarial act; R. S. § 1750. A statute which authorizes a notary public to commit for contempt a witness who has been duly subpœnaed to testify before him and who refuses to be sworn or give his deposition, is unconstitutional; 48 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 574.

The acts of notaries are respected by the custom of merchants and the law of nations. Their protest of a bill is received as evidence in the courts of all civilized countries. Except in cases of protest of bills, the signature of a notary to an instrument going to a foreign country ought to be authenticated by the consul or representative of that country.

The notaries of England have always considered themselves authorized to administer oaths; and the act of 5 & 6 Will. IV. has placed it beyond dispute. In this country they do not exercise the power unless authorized by statute, except in cases where the oath is to be used out of the state or in the courts of the United States.

Upon the general principle they cannot act in cases in which they are interested; 95 Am. Dec. 378, note; 37 Ga. 374; but where a notary public was intermediary between a borrower and lender on mortgage and took the acknowledgment of the mortgage, his act was held valid, there being nothing on the face of the papers to indicate to third parties that there was any incapacity to act; 84 Fed. Rep. 515; and the mere fact that he is an officer of a corporation does not make its acknowledgment before him invalid; 37 L. R. A. 434.

The books or registers of a deceased notary are admissible to prove his official acts as to presentment, demand, and notice of non-payment of negotiable paper; 8 Wheat. 326; 1 Gray 175; and so are entries of a notary's clerk; 51 N. Y. 84. When produced, the handwriting of the deceased person must be proved; 18 Wall. 516.

Where an action is brought against a notary for a false certificate of acknowledgment, the presumption is that the defendant, acting in his judicial capacity, did so on reasonable information, and discharged his full duty. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to prove a clear and intentional dereliction of duty; 97 Pa. 228; Proff. Notaries, 2d ed. §§ 48, 175; Notary's Manual. It has been held an actionable libel for a notary falsely and maliciously to protest for non-payment the acceptance of a person, and then send the draft with such protest to the source from whence it came; 88 Ga. 308.

One who has lost his chattel mortgage lien by the negligence of the notary in making a defective acknowledgment, can recover no damages from such notary, where the property covered by the mortgage is absolutely worthless; 75 Cal. 182.

NOTATION. The act of making a memorandum of some special circumstance on a probate or letters of administration.

NOTCHELL. "Crying the wife's Notchell" seems to have been a means of preventing her running up debts against her husband. See 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 280.

NOTE A BILL. When a foreign note has been dishonored it is usual for a notary public to present it again on the same day. If it is not then paid he makes a minute consisting of his initials, the day, month and year, and reason, if assigned, of non-payment, which proceeding is termed "noting the bill."

NOTE OF A FINE. The fourth step of the proceedings in acknowledging a fine, which is only an abstract of the writ of covenant and the concord, naming the parties, the parcel of land, and the agreement, and enrolled of record in the proper office. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 351, App. n. iv. § 3; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 542.

NOTE OF ALLOWANCE. A note delivered by a master to a party to a cause, who alleged that there was error in law in the record and proceedings, allowing him to bring error.

NOTE OF HAND. A popular name for a promissory note.

NOTE OF PROTEST. A note or minute of the protest, made by the notary, at time of protest, on the bill, to be completed or filled out at his leisure. Byles, Bills, 15th ed. 214.

NOTE OR MEMORANDUM. An informal note or abstract of a transaction required by the statute of frauds.

The form of it is immaterial; but it must contain the essential terms of the contract expressed with such a degree of certainty that it may be understood without reference to parol evidence to show intent of parties; Browne, Stat. of Fr. 353, 386; 43 Me. 158; 4 R. I. 14; 14 N. Y. 584; 31 Miss. 17; 11 Cush. 127; 9 Rich. 215; 23 Mo. 423; 17 Ill. 354; 3 Ia. 480. In some states, and in England, the consideration need not be stated in the note or memorandum; 4 B. & Ald. 595; 5 Cra. 142; 17 Mass. 122; 6 Conn. 81.

A memorandum of the terms of an agreement was signed by plaintiff but not by defendant; the latter subsequently wrote to plaintiff referring to "our agreement for the hire of your carriage," and "my monthly payment." There was no other arrangement between the parties, to which these expressions could refer. Held, that the letter and the document containing the terms of the arrangement together constituted a note and memorandum signed by defendant, within the fourth section of the statute of frauds; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; S. C. 25 Alb. L. J. 70. See 99 U. S. 100; 139 id. 210; 149 id. 481; 32 N. J. Eq. 828; 66 Ind. 474.

See Browne; Reed, Stat. of Frauds; MEMORANDUM.

NOTES. See JUDGE'S NOTES.

NOTICE. The information given of some act done, or the interpellation by which some act is required to be done. Knowledge.

A statutory notice is not binding unless given as the law directs or allows; 100 N. C. 225; 45 Ill. App. 572.

Actual notice exists when knowledge is actually brought home to the party to be affected by it. This statement is criticised, as being too narrow, in Wade, Notice 4. This writer divides actual knowledge into two classes, express and implied; the former includes all knowledge of a degree above that which depends upon collateral inference, or which imposes upon the party the further duty of inquiry; the latter imputes knowledge to the party because he is shown to be conscious of having the means of knowledge, though he does not use them, choosing to remain ignorant of the fact, or is grossly negligent in not following up the inquiry which the known facts suggest; Wade, Notice 5. In 42 Conn. 146, there is a division into "particular or explicit" and "general or implied" notice. Information which a prudent man believes to be true, and which if followed by inquiry must lead to knowledge, is equivalent to knowledge; 6 Or. 407.

Any fact which is sufficient to put a purchaser of land on inquiry, is adequate notice; 83 Va. 397; 84 id. 348; and of everything to which such inquiry may lead; 151 U. S. 607.

Constructive notice exists when the party, by any circumstance whatever, is put upon inquiry (which is the same as implied notice, supra), or when certain acts have been done which the party interested is presumed to have knowledge of on grounds of public policy; 2 Mas. 531; 14 Pick. 224; 4 N. H. 397; 14 S. & R. 333. The recording a deed; 23 Mo. 237; 25 Barb. 635; 28 Miss. 354; 4 Kent 182, n.; an advertisement in a newspaper, when authorized by statute as a part of the process, public acts of government, and lis pendens (but see LIS PENDENS), furnish constructive notice. Judge Story defines the term as "knowledge" imputed by the court on presumption, too strong to be rebutted, that the information must have been communicated; Story, Eq. Jur. § 399; and see 2 Anstr. 432. "Constructive notice is a legal inference of notice, of so high a nature, as to be conclusive, unless disproved, and is in most cases insusceptible of explanation or rebuttal by evidence that the purchaser had no actual notice, and believed the vendor's title to be good;" 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 77. Constructive notice is sometimes called notice in law; 1 Johns. Ch. 261. The constructive notice given by the record of a deed is sometimes called record notice. Where an instrument affecting the title to real estate is properly recorded, the record thereof is notice to subsequent purchasers, etc., from the same grantor; Wade, Notice, 2d ed. § 97; 38 Tex. 530; 30 Ark. 407; 28 N. J. Eq. 49.

The possession of land is notice to all the world of the possessor's rights thereunder; 24 Neb. 692; 74 Ia. 294; 125 Pa. 470; 29 S. C. 147; 142 U. S. 417.

Notice to an agent in the same transaction is, in general, notice to the principal; 25 Conn. 444; 10 Rich. 293; 3 Pa. 67; 39 N. Y. 70; 11 Colo. 223. See 25 Am. L. Reg.

1; 40 Minn. 390; 23 Neb. 334. A principal imposing confidence in an agent, and therefore neglecting some source of knowledge which he might have sought, is not chargeable with what he might have found out upon inquiry aroused by suspicion; 130 U. S. 505. Notice to the trustees is notice to the beneficiaries in a deed of trust; 133 U. S. 670; 32 W. Va. 244.

A principal is not bound by his agent's knowledge where it is not the duty of the agent to communicate it; 75 Ia. 689.

The giving notice in certain cases is in the nature of a condition precedent to the right to call on the other party for the performance of his engagement, whether his contract were express or implied. Thus, in the familiar instance of bills of exchange and promissory notes, the implied contract of an indorser is that he will pay the bill or note, provided it be not paid, on presentment at maturity, by the acceptor or maker (being the party primarily liable), and provided that he (the indorser) has due notice of the dishonor, and without which he is discharged from all liability: consequently, it is essential for the holder to be prepared to prove affirmatively that such notice was given, or some facts dispensing with such notice; 1 Chitty, Pr. 493; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 516.

Whenever the defendant's liability to perform an act depends on another occurrence which is best known to the plaintiff, and of which the defendant is not legally bound to take notice, the plaintiff must prove that due notice was in fact given. So, in cases of insurances on ships, a notice of abandonment is frequently necessary to enable the assured plaintiff to proceed as for a total loss when something remains to be saved, in relation to which, upon notice, the insurers might themselves take their own measures.

Notice may be written or oral, in many cases, at the option of the party required to give it; but written notice is generally preferable, both as avoiding doubt and ambiguity in its terms, and as admitting more easy and exact proof of delivery; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 972. See KNOWLEDGE.

NOTICE, AVERMENT OF. In Pleading. The statement in a pleading that notice has been given.

When the matter alleged in the pleading is to be considered as lying more properly in the knowledge of the plaintiff than of the defendant, then the declaration ought to state that the defendant had notice thereof: as, when the defendant promised to give the plaintiff as much for a commodity as another person had given or should give for the like.

But where the matter does not lie more properly in the knowledge of the plaintiff than of the defendant, notice need not be averred; 1 Saund. 117, n. 2; 2 id. 62 a, n. 4; Freem. 285. Therefore, if the defendant contracted to do a thing on the performance of an act by a stranger, notice need not be averred; for it lies in the defendant's knowledge as much as the plaintiff's, and he ought to take notice of it at his peril; Com. Dig. Pleader (C 65). See Com. Dig. Pleader (C 73, 74, 75); Viner, Abr. Notice; Hardr. 42; 5 Term 621.

The omission of an averment of notice, when necessary, will be fatal on demurrer or judgment by default; Cro. Jac. 432; but may be aided by verdict; 1 Stra. 214; 1 Saund. 228 a; unless in an action against the drawer of a bill, when the omission of the averment of notice of non-payment by the acceptor is fatal, even after verdict; Dougl. 679.

NOTICE OF DISHONOR. A notice given to a drawer or indorser of a bill, or an indorser of a negotiable note, by a subsequent party, that it had been dishonored either by non-acceptance in the case of a bill, or by non-payment in the case of an accepted bill or a note.

The notice must contain a description of the bill or note; Byles, Bills 220; 5 Cush. 546; 14 Conn. 362; 1 Fla. 301; 1 Wisc. 264; sufficient to leave no doubt in the mind of the indorser, as a reasonable man, what note was intended; 3 Metc. Mass. 495; 7 Ala. N. S. 205; 12 N. Y. 551; 26 Me. 45; 11 Wheat. 431; 56 N. J. L. 11. As to what is a misdescription, see 7 Exch. 578; 9 Q. B. 609; 9 Pet. 33; 11 Wheat. 431; 17 How. 606; 7 N. Y. 19; 2 Mich. 238; 12 Mass. 6; 14 Pa. 483; 2 Ohio St. 345.

It must also contain a clear statement of the dishonor of the bill; 1 Bingh. N. C. 194; 2 Cl. & F. 93; 2 M. & W. 799; 3 Metc. Mass. 495; 18 Conn. 361; and something more than the mere fact of non-acceptance or non-payment must be stated; 10 Ad. & E. 125; 2 Q. B. 388; 11 Wheat. 431; 3 Metc. Mass. 595; 5 Barb. 190; 1 Spears 244; 2 Ohio St. 345; 3 Md. 202, 251; 2 Hawks 560; 5 How. Miss. 552; except in some cases: 5 Cush. 546; 1 Md. 59, 504; see as to effect of the use of the word protested, 11 Wheat. 431; 7 Ala. N. S. 205; 2 Dougl. Mich. 379; 9 Rob. La. 161; 14 Conn. 362; 5 Cush. 546; 1 Wisc. 264; 4 N. J. 71. See some cases where the notice was held sufficient; 2 M. & W. 109, 799; 6 id. 400; 7 id. 515; 14 id. 7, 44; 6 Ad. & E. 499; 10 id. 131; 2 Q. B. 421; 1 E. & B. 801; 5 C. B. 687; 1 H. & W. 3; and others where it was held insufficient; 2 Exch. 719; 1 E. & B. 801; 4 B. & C. 339; 10 Ad. & E. 125; 7 Bingh. 530; 3 Bingh. N. C. 688; 8 C. & P. 355; 2 Q. B. 388; 1 M. & G. 76; 53 Minn. 386; 91 Tenn. 301; 63 Hun 625.

As to whether there must be a statement that the party to whom the notice is sent is looked to for payment, see 11 M. & W. 372; 7 C. B. 400; 4 D. & L. 744.

The notice is generally in writing, but may be oral; 16 Barb. 146; 3 Metc. Mass. 495; 8 Mo. 336; 7 C. B. 400; 8 C. & P. 355. Every person who, by and immediately upon the dishonor of the note or bill, and only upon such dishonor, becomes liable to an action either on the paper or on the consideration for which the paper was given, is entitled to immediate notice; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 499. The holder need give notice only to the parties and to the indorser whom he intends to hold liable; 25 Barb. 138; 19 Me. 62; 11 La. A second indorser duly notified cannot defend on the ground that the first was not so notified; 20 D. C. 26.

Notice may be given by any party to a note or bill not primarily liable thereon as regards third parties, and not discharged from liability on it at the time notice is given; 8 Mo. 336; 16 S. & R. 157; 3 Dana 126; 5 Miss. 272; 17 Ala. 258; 25 Barb. 138; 15 Md. 150; 15 La. 321; 14 Mass. 116; 5 Maule & S. 68; 15 M. & W. 231. The late English doctrine that any party to a note or bill may give the notice by which an antecedent party may be held liable to subsequent parties, is now quite firmly established; Wade, Notice § 709. Such notice may be by the holder's agent; 4 How. 336; 11 Rob. La. 454; 21 Tex. 680; 8 Mo. 704; 7 Ala. N. S. 205; 15 M. & W. 231; and in the agent's name; 99 Cal. 143; may be by an indorsee for collection; 3 N. Y. 248; a notary; 2 How. 66; 28 Mo. 339; the administrator or executor of a deceased person; Story, Pr. Notes § 304; the holder of the paper as collateral security; 14 C. B. N. S. 728. It has been held that notice by a stranger, pretending to be the holder, may be ratified by the real holder; 2 C. & K. 1016. Mere knowledge on the part of an indorser of a note, learned from the maker that it had been dishonored, is not a notice, since notice must come from a party who is entitled to look to the indorser for payment: 53 Minn. 386.

The notice must be forwarded as early as the day after the dishonor, by a mail which does not start at an unreasonably early hour; 9 N. H. 558; 24 Me. 458; 2 R. I. 437; 24 Pa. 148; 4 N. J. An indorser is entitled to notice of demand and non-payment of a note, notwithstanding that he has collateral security; 15 R. I. 44; 4 W. & S. 328.

Notice of dishonor may be excused: where it is prevented by inevitable accident, or overwhelming calamity; by the prevalence of a malignant disease which suspends the operations of trade; by war, blockade, invasion, or occupation by the enemy; by the interdiction of commerce between the countries from which or to which the notice is to be sent; by the impracticability of giving notice, by reason of the party entitled thereto having absconded or having no fixed place of residence, or his place of business or residence being unknown, and incapable of being ascertained upon reasonable inquiries. These are the excuses of a general nature given by Story, on Pr. Notes and on Bills. Special excuses are: That the note was for the accommodation of the indorser only; an original agreement on the part of the indorser, made with the maker or other party at all events to pay the note at maturity; the receiving security or indemnity from the maker, or other party for whose benefit the note is made, by the indorser, or money to take it up with; receiving the note as collateral security for another debt where the debtor is no party to the note, or if a party has not indorsed it; an original agreement by the indorser to dispense with notice; an order or direction from the makee to the maker not to pay the note at maturity. See Story, Pr. Notes §§ 293, 357.

NOTICE OF EXECUTION. Under an exemption act which requires an execution, the debtor desiring to avail himself of its benefits should make a schedule of all his personal property within ten days after notice of execution. The sheriff should, whenever practical, give personal notice, and an ambiguously worded notice by mail from which the debtor may infer that personal demand will be made on him at some time in the future, is insufficient; 46 Ill. App. 150.

NOTICE OF INQUIRY. The plaintiff must give a written notice of executing a writ of inquiry to the defendant or his solicitor; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac.; Wharton.

NOTICE OF JUDGMENT. In several of the states it is provided by statute that a written notice shall be served by the party entering the judgment upon his adversary or his attorney, stating the time when the judgment is entered.

NOTICE OF LIS PENDENS. A notice filed for the purpose of warning all persons that the title to certain property is in litigation. See LIS PENDENS.

NOTICE OF MOTION. A notice in writing, entitled in a cause, stating that, on a certain day designated, a motion will be made to the court for the purpose stated. Burrill.

NOTICE OF PROTEST. A notice given to a drawer or indorser of a bill, or to an indorser of a note, that the bill or note has been protested for refusal of payment or acceptance. See NOTICE OF DISHONOR.

NOTICE OF TRIAL. The plaintiff may give notice of trial at any time after the issues of fact are ready for trial; and if not given within a certain time the defendant may give notice of same or move to dismiss the action for want of prosecution.

NOTICE TO ADMIT. In the practice of the English high court either party may call upon the other to admit a document, and on refusal or neglect to admit he must bear the costs of proving the document, unless the judge certifies that the refusal was reasonable. Rules of Court XXXII; Whart.

NOTICE TO PLEAD. Written notice to defendant, requiring him to plead within a certain time. It must always be given before plaintiff can sign judgment for want of a plea. 1 Chitty, Archb. Pr. 221. Notice to plead, indorsed on the declaration or delivered separately, is sufficient without demanding plea or rule to plead, in England, by statute.

NOTICE TO PRODUCE PAPERS. In Practice. When it is intended to give secondary evidence of a written instrument or paper which is in the possession of the opposite party, it is, in general, requisite to give him notice to produce the same on the trial of the cause, before such secondary evidence can be admitted. See 50 Kan. 436.

To this general rule there are some exceptions: first, in cases where, from the nature of the proceedings, the party in possession of the instrument has notice that he is charged with the possession of it, as in the case of trover for a bond. 14 East 274; 4 Taunt. 865; 6 S. & R. 154; 4 Wend. 626; 1 Campb. 143; 48 Me. 218; 30 Barb. 338; 58 N. H. 68; second, where the party in possession has obtained the instrument by fraud; 4 Esp. 256. See 1 Phill. Ev. 425; 1 Stark. Ev. 362; Rosc. Ev., 16th ed., 8.

In general, a notice to produce papers ought to be given in writing, and state the title of the cause in which it is proposed to use the papers or instruments required; 2 Stark. 19. It seems, however, that the notice may be by parol; 1 Campb. 440. It must describe with sufficient certainty the papers or instruments called for, and must not be too general and by that means be uncertain; Ry. & M. 341; M'Cl. & Y. 139.

The notice may be given to the party himself, or to his attorney; 2 Term 203, n.; 3 id. 306; Ry. & M. 327.

The notice must be served a reasonable time before trial, so as to afford an opportunity to the party to search for and produce the instrument or paper in question; 1 Stark. 283; 92 Mich. 542; 66 Ia. 292.

When a notice to produce an instrument or paper in the cause has been proved, and it is also proved that such paper or instrument was, at the time of the notice, in the hands of the party or his privy, and upon request in court he refuses or neglects to produce it, the party having given such notice and made such proof will be entitled to give secondary evidence thereof. See 66 Hun 626; 155 Mass. 233.

Where a party is notified to produce certain writings, and the same are shown not to be within the state, copies may be introduced; 99 Ala. 331; 82 Tex. 368.

NOTICE TO QUIT. A request from a landlord to his tenant to quit the premises leased, and to give possession of the same to him, the landlord, at a time therein mentioned. 3 Wend. 337, 357; 7 Halst. 99.

The form of the notice. The notice or demand of possession should contain a request from the landlord to the tenant or person in possession to quit the premises which he holds from the landlord (which premises ought to be particularly described, as being situate in the street and city or place, or township and county), and to deliver them to him on or before a day certain,—generally, when the lease is for a year, the same day of the year on which the lease commences. But where there is some doubt as to the time when the lease is to expire, it is proper to add, "or at the expiration of the current year of your tenancy." 2 Esp. 589. It should be dated, signed by the landlord himself, or by some person in his name, who has been authorized by him, and directed to the tenant. The notice must include all the premises under the same demise; for the landlord cannot determine the tenancy as to part of the premises demised and continue it as to the residue. For the purpose of bringing an ejectment, it is not necessary that the notice should be in writing, except when required to be so under an express agreement between the parties; Com. Dig. Estate by Grant (G 11, n. p.); 2 Campb. 96. But it is the general and safest practice to give written notices; and it is a precaution which should always, when possible, be observed, as it prevents mistakes and renders the evidence certain. Care should be taken that the words of a notice be clear and decisive, without ambiguity or giving an alternative to the tenant; for if it be really ambiguous or optional, it will be invalid; Ad. Ej. 204.

As to the person by whom the notice is to be given. It must be given by the person interested in the premises, or his agent properly appointed; Ad. Ej. 120. See 3 C. B. 215. As the tenant is to act upon the notice at the time it is given to him, it is necessary that it should be such as he may act upon with security, and should, therefore, be binding upon all the parties concerned at the time it is given. Where, therefore, several persons are jointly interested in the premises, they need not all join in the notice; but, if any of them be not a party at the time, no subsequent ratification by him will be sufficient by relation to render the notice valid. But see 2 Phill. Ev. 184; 1 B. & Ad. 135; 7 M. & W. 139. But if the notice be given by an agent, it is sufficient if his authority is afterwards recognized; 3 B. & Ald. 689. But see 10 B. & C. 621.

As to the person to whom the notice should be given. When the relation of landlord and tenant subsists, difficulties can seldom occur as to the party upon whom the notice should be served. It should invariably be given to the tenant of the party serving the notice, notwithstanding a part may have been underlet or the whole of the premises may have been assigned; Ad. Ej. 119; 5 B. & P. 330; 14 East 234; 6 B. & C. 41; unless, perhaps, the lessor has recognized the sub-tenant as his tenant; 10 Johns. 270. When the premises are in possession of two or more as joint tenants or tenants in common, the notice should be to all. A notice addressed to all and served upon one only will, however, be a good notice; Ad. Ej. 123. The delivery of a notice to quit to the wife of a tenant, she being in possession of the premises, is a good service upon the husband; 30 Ill. App. 300.

As to the mode of serving the notice. The person about serving the notice should make two copies of it, both signed by the proper person, then procure one or more respectable persons for witnesses, to whom he should show the copies, who, upon comparing them and finding them alike, are to go with the person who is to serve the notice. The person serving the notice then, in their presence, should deliver one of these copies to the tenant personally, or to one of his family, at his usual place of abode, although the same be not upon the demised premises; 2 Phill. Ev. 185; or serve it upon the person in possession; and where the tenant is not in possession, a copy may be served on him, if he can be found, and another on the person in possession. The witnesses should then, for the sake of security, sign their names on the back of the copy of the notice retained, or otherwise mark it so as to identify it; and they should also state the manner in which the notice was served. In the case of a joint demise to two defendants, of whom one alone resided upon the premises, proof of the service of the notice upon him has been held to be sufficient ground for the jury to presume that the notice so served upon the premises has reached the other who resided in another place; 7 East 553; 5 Esp. 196. In ejectment the defence of adverse possession is inconsistent with a tenancy, and exempts the plaintiff from the necessity of proving a notice to quit; 92 Mich. 136; 126 Ill. 228; 75 Cal. 342.

At what time it must be served. At common law it must be given six calendar months before the expiration of the lease; 1 Term 159; 8 Cow. 13; 1 Vt. 311; 5 Yerg. 431; 4 Ired. 291; 17 Mass. 287; see 8 S. & R. 458; 2 Rich. 346; and three months is the common time under statutory regulations; and where the letting is for a shorter period the length of notice is regulated by the time of letting; 6 Bing. 362; 5 Cush. 563; 23 Wend. 616. Where a tenant under a lease for a term assents to the termination of his lease and continues to hold from day to day under a new arrangement, he is not entitled to a month's notice to quit; 94 Mich. 474; a tenant or sub-tenant holding over is not entitled to notice to quit; 81 Ill. App. 592. Difficulties sometimes arise as to the period of the commencement of the tenancy; and when a regular notice to quit on any particular day is given, and the time when the term began is unknown, the effect of such notice, as to its being evidence or not of the commencement of the tenancy, will depend upon the particular circumstances of its delivery; if the tenant, having been applied to by his landlord respecting the time of the commencement of the tenancy, has informed him it began on a certain day, and in consequence of such information a notice to quit on that day is given at a subsequent period, the tenant is concluded by his act, and will not be permitted to prove that in point of fact the tenancy has a different commencement; nor is it material whether the information be the result of design or ignorance, as the landlord is in both instances equally led into error; Ad. Ej. 141; 2 Esp. 635; 2 Phill. Ev. 186. In like manner, if the tenant at the time of delivery of the notice assent to the terms of it, it will waive any irregularity as to the period of its expiration; but such assent must be strictly proved; 4 Term 361; 2 Phill. Ev. 183. When the landlord is ignorant of the time when the term commenced, a notice to quit may be given not specifying any particular day, but ordering the tenant in general terms to quit and deliver up the possession of the premises at the end of the current year of his tenancy thereof, which shall expire next after the end of three months from the date of the notice. See 2 Esp. 589. Where a notice to quit is necessary, the day named therein must be the day of, or corresponding to the day of, the conclusion of the tenancy; 55 N. J. L. 217.

What will amount to a waiver of the notice. The acceptance of rent accruing subsequently to the expiration of the notice is the most usual means by which a waiver of it may be produced; but the acceptance of such rent is open to explanation; and it is the province of the jury to decide with what views and under what circumstances the rent is paid and received; Ad. Ej. 139; 2 Campb. 387. If the money be taken with an express declaration that the notice is not thereby intended to be waived, or accompanied by other circumstances which may induce an opinion that the landlord did not intend to continue the tenancy, no waiver will be produced by the acceptance; the rent must be paid and received as rent, or the notice will remain in force; Cowp. 243. The notice may also be waived by other acts of the landlord; but they are generally open to explanation, and the particular act will or will not be a waiver of the notice, according to the circumstances which attend it; 2 East 236; 1 Term 53. It has been held that a notice to quit at the end of a certain year is not waived by the landlord's permitting the tenant to remain in possession an entire year after the expiration of the notice, notwithstanding the tenant held by an improving lease,—that is, to clear and fence the land and pay the taxes; 1 Binn. 333. In cases, however, where the act of the landlord cannot be qualified, but must of necessity be taken as a confirmation of the tenancy, as if he distrain for rent accruing after the expiration of the notice, or recover in an action for use and occupation, the notice of course will be waived; Ad. Ej. 144; 1 H. Bla. 311; 19 Wend. 391. See 13 C. B. 178.

A tenant becomes a trespasser at the expiration of the time specified in a due notice to quit; and the landlord has a right during the tenant's absence to re-enter and take possession, and eject the tenant's goods and to keep the possession so obtained; 16 R. I. 524. A tenant at will, after a notice to quit, has a reasonable time in which to vacate the premises; 60 Vt. 386.

See LANDLORD AND TENANT; LEASE.

NOTING. A term denoting the act of a notary in minuting on a bill of exchange, after it has been presented for acceptance or payment, the initials of his name, the date of the day, month, and year when such presentment was made, and the reason, if any has been assigned, for non-acceptance or non-payment, together with his charge. The noting is not indispensable, it being only a part of the protest; it will not supply the protest; 4 Term 175.

NOTIO. The power of hearing and trying a matter of fact. Calv. Lex.

NOTORIOUS. As used in defining adverse possession, it means that the character of the holding must possess such elements of notoriety that the owner may be presumed to have notice of it and of its extent. 33 Fla. 261. See 94 Mo. 187.

NOTORIOUSLY. Well and generally understood. 46 Fed. Rep. 724.

NOTOUR. In Scotch Law. Open; notorious. A notour bankrupt is a debtor who, being under diligence by horning and caption of his creditor, retires to sanctuary, or absconds, or defends by force, and is afterwards found insolvent by court of sessions. Bell, Dict.

NOVA CUSTOMA. An imposition or duty. See ANTIQUA CUSTOMA.

NOVA SCOTIA. A province of the Dominion of Canada. It is governed by a Lieutenant-Governor and an Executive Council of seven members. The Legislature consists of a Council of eighteen members appointed by the governor, and an Assembly of thirty-eight members, chosen by the people. The seat of government is Halifax. It has a chief justice, an equity judge and five assistant judges, and seven county court judges.

England founds her claim to the original discovery of this province upon the patent granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, A. D. 1578.

This was followed by De la Roche's unfortunate attempt to colonize the Isle of Sable.

De Monts, having in 1608 received an appointment from Henri IV. of France, sailed the following year, with Champlain, De Poutrincourt, and others.

After exploring the outer shore of the peninsula, having entered the Bay of Fundy, De Poutrincourt settled Port Royal, 1605,—the first permanent settlement in British North America. From this time the English began to assert their claims, and colonists from Virginia expelled the colony of De Monts.

The French regained possession, but only to be again expelled by the strong force sent against them by Cromwell, 1654.

Thirteen years later, England ceded the province to France by the treaty of Breda, 1667; but in the new wars it was again ravaged by the English, who reacquired it, 1713; and in 1749 it was formally colonized by the British Government

The French colonists, having resisted and joined the Indians, were defeated by the British, and their stronghold, Louisburgh, on Cape Breton, was taken by Massachusetts colonists, acting under a plan suggested by a Massachusetts lawyer.

In 1758 the province received its constitution, and in 1763 France, by the treaty of Paris, ceded all rights whatsoever.

In 1784 New Brunswick and Cape Breton were separated from Nova Scotia; but Cape Breton was reattached in 1819.

In 1867 it became a province of the Dominion of Canada. See CANADA.

NOVA STATUTA. New statutes. A term including all statutes passed in the reign of Edw. III. and subsequently. See VETERA STATUTA.

NOVÆ NARRATIONES. New counts or talys. A book of such pleadings as were then in use, published in the reign of Edw. III. 3 Bla. Com. 297; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 439.

NOVATION (from Lat. novare, novus, new). The substitution of a new obligation for an old one, which is thereby extinguished.

A transaction whereby a debtor is discharged from his liability to his original creditor by contracting a new obligation in favor of a new creditor by the order of the original creditor. 1 Pars. Cont. 217; 136 N. Y. 152; 137 id. 542.

It is a mode of extinguishing one obligation by another—the substitution, not of a new paper or note, but of a new obligation in lieu of an old one—the effect of which is to pay, dissolve, or otherwise discharge it. 85 Ala. 401.

In Civil Law. There are three kinds of novation.

First, where the debtor and creditor remain the same, but a new debt takes the place of the old one. Here, either the subject-matter of the debt may be changed, or the conditions of time, place, etc., of payment.

Second, where the debt remains the same, but a new debtor is substituted for the old. This novation may be made without the intervention or privity of the old debtor (in this case the new agreement is called expromissio, and the new debtor expromissor), or by the debtor's transmission of his debt to another, who accepts the obligation and is himself accepted by the creditor. This transaction is called delegatio. Domat lays down the essential distinction between a delegation and any other novation, thus: that the former demands the consent of all three parties, but the latter that only of the two parties to the new debt. See DELEGATION.

Third, where the debt remains the same, but a new creditor is substituted for the old. This also is called delegatio, for the reason adduced above, to wit: that all three parties must assent to the new bargain. It differs from the cessio nominis of the civil law by completely cancelling the old debt, while the cessio nominis leaves the creditor a claim for any balance due after assignment.

In every novation the old debt is wholly extinguished by the new. To effect such a transformation, several things are requisite.

First, there must be an anterior obligation of some sort, to serve as a basis for the new contract. If the old debt be void, as being, e. g., contra bonos mores, then the new debt is likewise void; because the consideration for the pretended novation is null. But if the old contract is only voidable, in some cases the new one may be good, operating as a ratification of the old. Moreover, if the old debt be conditional, the new is also conditional unless made otherwise by special agreement,—which agreement is rarely omitted.

Second, the parties innovating must consent thereto. In the modern civil law, every novation is voluntary. Anciently, a novation not having this voluntary element was in use. And not only consent is exacted, but a capacity to consent. But capacity to make or receive an absolute payment does not of itself authorize an agreement to innovate.

Third, there must be an express intention to innovate,—the animus novandi. A novation is never presumed. If an intent to destroy the old debt be not proved, two obligations now bind the debtor,—the old and the new. Conversely, if the new contract be invalid, without fraud in the transaction, the creditor has now lost all remedy. The anterior obligation is destroyed without being replaced by a new one.

An important rule of novation is that the extinction of the debt destroys also all rights and liens appertaining thereto. Hence, if any hypothecations be attached to the ancient agreement, they are cancelled by the new one, unless express words retain them. The second contract is simple and independent, and upon its terms is the action ex stipulatu to be brought. Hence, too, the new parties cannot avail themselves of defences, claims, and set-offs which would have prevailed between the old parties.

Obviously, a single creditor may make a novation with two or more debtors who are each liable in solido. In this case any one debtor may make the contract to innovate; and if such a contract be completed, all his fellow-debtors are discharged with him from the prior obligation. Therefore Pothier says that, under the rule that novation cancels all obligations subsidiary to the main one, sureties are freed by a novation contracted by their principal. The creditor must specially stipulate that co-debtors and guarantors shall consent to be bound by the novation, if he wish to hold them liable. If they do not consent to such novation, the parties all remain, as before, bound under the old debt. So in Louisiana the debt due to a community creditor is not necessarily novated by his taking the individual note of the surviving spouse, with mortgages to secure its payment; 11 La. Ann. 687.

It follows that the new debtor, in a delegation, can claim nothing under the old contract, since he has consented to the destruction of that contract. For the same reason, a creditor cannot proceed against the discharged debtor. And this is true though the new debtor should become insolvent while the old remains solvent. And even though at the time of the novation the new debtor was insolvent, still the creditor has lost his remedy against the old debtor. But the rule, no doubt, applies only to a bona fide delegation. And a suit brought by the creditor against a delegated debtor is not evidence of intention to discharge the original debtor; 11 La. Ann. 93.

In a case of mistake, the rule is this: If the new debtor agree to be substituted for the old, under the belief that he himself owes so much to the discharged debtor, although he do not in fact owe the amount, yet he is bound to the creditor on the novation; because the latter has been induced to discharge the old debtor by the contract of the new, and will receive only his due in holding the new debtor bound. But where the supposed creditor had really no claim upon the original debtor, the substitute contracts no obligation with him; and even though he intended to be bound, yet he may plead the fact of no former debt against any demand of the creditor, as soon as this fact is made known to him.

A novation may be made dependent on a condition. In that case the parties remain bound, as before, until the condition is fulfilled. The new debtor is not freed from a conditional novation as to the creditor until the condition happens; and he is not liable in an action to the old debtor until it is performed.

Any obligation which can be destroyed at all may be destroyed by novation. Thus, legacies, judgments, etc., with mortgages, guarantees, and similar accessories, are as much the subjects of novation as simple contract debts. But a covenant by the obligee of a bond not to sue the obligor within a certain time is not an example of the civil-law novation. The agreement was not a release, not a substituted contract, but a covenant merely, for the breach of which the obligee has his action; 19 Johns. 129.

At Common Law. The common-law doctrine of novation mainly agrees with that of the civil law, but in some parts differs from it.

The term novation is rarely employed. The usual common-law equivalent is assignment, and sometimes merger. Still, this form of contract found its way into common-law treatises as early as Fleta's day, by whom it was called innovatio. Item, per innovationem, ut si transfusa sit obligatio de una persona in aliam, quæ in se susceperit obligationem. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60, § 12. The same words here quoted are also in Bracton, lib. 3, c. 2, § 13, but we have novationem for innovationem. In England, recently, the term novation has been revived in some cases.

A case of novation is put in Tatlock v. Harris, 3 Term 180. "Suppose A owes B £100, and B owes C £100, and the three meet, and it is agreed between them that A shall pay C the £100: B's debt is extinguished, and C may recover that sum against A."

The subject of novation has been much before the courts in reference to the transfers of the business of life assurance companies. In order to constitute a novation the old obligation must be discharged; and it has often been the interest of claimants on the transferor company, where the transferee company has become insolvent, to contend that there is no "novation," but that the old obligation is still in force. In England the questions which have arisen on this matter are for the most part set at rest by the stat. 35 & 36 Vict. c. 41, s. 7, providing that no policy-holder shall be deemed to have abandoned any claim against the original company, and to have accepted in lieu thereof the liability of the new company, unless such abandonment and acceptance shall have been signified by some writing signed by him, or by his agent lawfully authorized. Moz. & W.

There must always be a debt once existing and now cancelled, to serve as a consideration for the new liability. The action in all cases is brought on the new agreement. But in order to give a right of action there must be an extinguishment of the original debt; 4 B. & C. 163; 1 M. & W. 124; 14 Ill. 34; 4 La. Ann. 281; 15 N. H. 129; 110 Mass. 52; 53 Vt. 345; 78 Ia. 718; 46 Ark. 163. See 93 Mich. 342.

Where there is a substitution of a new contract for an old one, the new contract must be a valid one upon which the creditor can have his remedy; 57 Wis. 534; and the previous obligation of which novation is sought must be a valid one; 59 Ind. 509; 64 id. 413.

No mere agreement for the transformation of one contract into another is of effect until actually carried into execution and the consent of the parties thereto obtained. A good novation is an accord executed; 5 B. & Ad. 925; 3 N. & M'C. 171; 1 La. 410; 24 Conn. 621; otherwise, if there be no satisfaction; 2 Scott N. R. 938. The discharge of the old debt must be contemporaneous with, and result from the consummation of, an arrangement with the new debtor; 39 Minn. 407.

But where an agreement is entered into by deed, that deed gives in itself a substantial cause of action; and the giving such deed may be a sufficient accord and satisfaction for a simple contract debt; Co. Litt. 212 b; 1 Burr. 9; 2 Rich. 608; 3 W. & S. 276; 1 Hill N. Y. 567.

In the civil law delegatio, no new creditor could be substituted without the debtor's consent. This rule is observed in the common law. Hence, without this consent and promise to pay, a new creditor can have no action against the debtor, because there is no privity of contract between them. To establish such privity there must be a new promise founded on sufficient consideration; 3 Mer. 652; 5 Wheat. 277; 12 Ga. 406; 5 Ad. & E. 115; 7 Harr. & J. 213, 219; 21 Me. 484; 39 Minn. 407; 123 Mass. 28; 74 Wis. 456; 14 La. Ann. 54.

But in equity a creditor may assign his claim fully to another without any intervention of the debtor; and the assignee is not even compelled to sue in his assignor's name; 14 Conn. 141; 3 Swanst. 392; 4 Rand. 392; Mart. & Y. 378.

The extinction of the prior debt is consideration enough to support a novation. If A holds B's note, payable to A, and assigns this for value to C, B is by such transfer released from his promise to A, and this is sufficient consideration to sustain his promise to C; 1 Pars. Contr. ch. 13; 2 Barb. 349; Ans. Contr. 220; 37 Ohio 279; 95 Ind. 452; 53 Vt. 30. And a consideration need not be expressed in the contract of novation; though one must be proved in order to defend in a suit brought by creditors of the assignor.

When assent or consideration is wanting, the novation operates only as a species of collateral security. The transferee cannot sue in his own name, and will be subject to all the equitable defences which the debtor had against the original creditor. This assent on the debtor's part is said to be essential, for the reason that he may have an account with his assignor, and he shall not be barred of his right to a set-off.

Still, if anything like an assent on the part of a holder of money can be inferred, he will be considered as the debtor; 4 Esp. 203; 6 Tex. 163; if the debtor's assent be not secured, the order of transfer may be revoked before it is acted on.

In a delegation, if the old debtor agree to provide a substitute, he must put his creditor into such a position that the latter can claim full satisfaction from the delegated debtor, or otherwise the original liability remains, and there is no novation; 19 Mo. 322, 637. See 3 B. & Ald. 64; 2 M. & W. 484; 6 Cra. 253; 12 Johns. 409; 21 Wend. 450; 1 Misc. Rep. 176; 57 Wis. 534.

One who has contracted to pay the debts of another, and has been notified by a creditor that he accepts the arrangement, cannot be released from liability to such creditor by rescinding the contract without his consent; 25 Ill. App. 130.

The existing Louisiana law is based upon the doctrines of the Civil Code considered above. It is held in numerous cases that "novation is not to be presumed:" hence the receipt of a bill or note is not necessarily a novation, or extinguishment of the debt for which it is given. An express declaration to that effect is required in most of our states, or else acts tantamount to a declaration. An intention to discharge the old debt must be shown in all cases; and this intention is sufficient to work a novation; 4 La. Ann. 329, 548; 6 id. 669; 9 id. 228, 497; 12 id. 299. "The delegation by which the debtor gives to the creditor another debtor, who obliged himself towards such creditor, does not operate as a novation unless the creditor has expressly declared his intention to discharge the debtor who made the delegation." 13 La. Ann. 238.

One of the most common of modern novations is the surrender and destruction of an old promissory note or bill of exchange, and the receipt of a new one in payment thereof. The rules of novation apply as completely to debts evidenced by mercantile paper as to all other obligations; Story, Bills § 441; Pothier, de Change, n. 189; Thoms. Bills, ch. 1, § 3. Hence, everywhere, if the parties intend that a promissory note or bill shall be absolute payment, it will be so considered; Ans. Contr. 273, n.; 10 Ad. & E. 593; 4 Mas. 336; 1 Rich. 37, 112; 9 Johns. 310; 13 Vt. 452. In some states, the receipt of a negotiable promissory note is prima facie payment of the debt upon which it is given, and no action lies upon the account unless the presumption is controverted; 12 Mass. 237; 113 id. 194; 132 id. 538; 8 Me. 298; 79 Me. 62; 29 Vt. 32; 59 id. 154; 68 Ind. 254; 111 id. 137; 7 Or. 39. "If a creditor gives a receipt for a draft in payment of his account, the debt is novated;" 2 La. 109. But see the cases cited supra for the full Louisiana law. In most states, however, the rule is, as in England, that, whether the debt be pre-existing or arise at the time of giving the note, the receipt of a promissory note is prima facie a conditional payment only, and works no novation.

It is payment only on fulfilment of the condition, i. e. when the note is paid; 5 Beav. 415; 6 Cra. 264; 2 Johns. Cas. 438; 27 N. H. 253; 11 Gill & J. 416; 4 R. I. 383; 8 Cal. 501; 2 Rich. 244; 15 S. & R. 162.

If a vendor transfer his vendee's note, he can only sue on the original contract when he gets back the note, and has it in his power to return it to his vendee; 1 Pet. C. C. 262; 4 Rich. 59.

Where the holder of a note agrees to accept another as debtor in place of the maker, there is a complete novation of the debt, and the indorsers are discharged; 22 Can. S. C. R. 479.

A novation is not a promise to pay the debt of another, within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing; 18 So. Rep. (Tex.) 646. See 2 Misc. Rep. 301; 45 Ill. App. 648; 54 Mo. App. 221; 160 Mass. 225; 39 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 551.

See Dixon, Substituted Liabilities; 6 Harv. Law Rev. 184; DISCHARGE; PAYMENT; MORTGAGE; MERGER.

NOVEL ASSIGNMENT. See NEW ASSIGNMENT.

NOVEL DISSEISIN. The name of an old remedy which was given for a new or recent disseisin.

When a tenant in fee-simple, fee-tail, or for term of life, was put out and disseised of his lands or tenements, rents, and the like, he might sue out a writ of assize or novel disseisin; and if, upon trial, he could prove his title and his actual seisin, and the disseisin by the present tenant, he was entitled to have judgment to recover his seisin and damages for the injury sustained; 3 Bla. Com. 187. This remedy is obsolete.

NOVELLÆ LEONIS. The ordinances of the Emperor Leo, which were made from the year 887 till the year 893, are so called. These novels changed many rules of the Justinian law. This collection contains one hundred and thirteen novels, written originally in Greek, and afterwards, in 1560, translated into Latin by Agilæus.

NOVELS, NOVELLÆ CONSTITUTIONES. In Civil Law. The name given to the constitutions or laws of Justinian and his immediate successors, which were promulgated soon after the Code of Justinian.

It appears to have been the intention of Justinian, after the completion of the second and revised edition of the Code, to supply what had not been foreseen in the preceding laws, together with any necessary amendments or alterations, not by revising the Code, but by supplementary laws. Such laws he promulgated from time to time; but no official compilation of them is known to have been made until after his death, when his laws, 159 in number, with those of the reigns of Justin II. and Tiberius, nine in number, were collected, together with some local edicts, under this name. They belong to various times between 535 and 565.

Although the Novels of Justinian are the best known, and when the word Novels only is mentioned those of Justinian are always intended, he was not the first who used that name. Some of the acts of Theodosius, Valentinian, Leo, Severus, Authennius, and others, were also called Novels. But the Novels of the emperors who preceded Justinian had not the force of law after the legislation of that emperor. Those Novels are not, however, entirely useless: because, the Code of Justinian having been compiled to a considerable extent from the Theodosian Code and the earlier Novels, the latter frequently remove doubts which arise on the construction of the Code.

The original language of the Novels was for the most part Greek: but they are represented in the Corpus Juris Civilis by a Latin translation of 134 of them. These form the fourth part of the Corpus Juris Civilis. They are directed either to some officer, or an archbishop or bishop, or to some private individual of Constantinople; but they all had the force and authority of law.

The 118th Novel is the foundation and groundwork of the English Statute of Distribution of Intestates' Effects, which has been copied in many states of the Union. See 1 P. Wms. 27; Prec. in Chanc. 598; CIVIL CODE; CODE.

NOVELTY. In Patent Law. See PATENT.

NOVIGILD. A pecuniary satisfaction for an injury, amounting to nine times the value of the thing for which it was paid. Spelman.

NOVUS HOMO (Lat. a new man). This term is applied to a man who has been pardoned of a crime, by which he is restored to society and is rehabilitated.

NOW. At this time, or at the present moment; or at a time contemporaneous with something done. 15 Ore. 426. At the present time. 26 Ct. Cl. 15. In a will the word now is construed to mean at the death of the testator; 53 L. J. Ch. 1163 (reversed on other grounds, 30 Ch. D. 50); except where persons or classes must be ascertained or a description of property fixed; 30 L. J. Ex. 230; 6 H. & N. 583, where the word now is held to refer to the date of the will.

NOXA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Damage resulting from an offence committed by an irresponsible agent. The offence itself. The punishment for the offence. The slave or animal who did the offence, and who is delivered up to the person aggrieved (datur noxæ) unless the owner choose to pay the damage. The right of action is against whoever becomes the possessor of the slave or animal (noxa caput sequitur). D. de furt. L. 41; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calv. Lex.

NOXAL ACTION. See NOXA.

NOXIOUS. Hurtful; offensive. Within the meaning of a statute prohibiting noxious or offensive trade or manufactures, brick-making is not included. 32 L. J. M. C. 135; 13 C. B. N. S. 479.

A thing is noxious if capable of doing harm. And if noxious as administered, although innoxious if differently administered; 49 L. J. M. C. 44; 5 Q. B. Div. 307; 13 Cox 547; 12 id 463.

NUBILIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who is of a proper age to be married. Dig. 32, 51.

NUDE. Naked. Figuratively, this word is now applied to various subjects.

A nude contract, nudum pactum, is one without a consideration. Nude matter is a bare allegation of a thing done, without any evidence of it.

NUDUM PACTUM. A species of contract in the civil law. See CONSIDERATION. It is now commonly used to express a contract made without a consideration.

NUISANCE. Anything that unlawfully worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage. 3 Bla. Com. 5, 216. See Cooley, Torts 670.

That class of wrongs that arises from the unreasonable, unwarrantable, or unlawful use by a person of his own property, either real or personal, or from his own improper, indecent, or unlawful personal conduct, working an obstruction of or to the right of another, or of the public, and producing such material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt that the law will presume a consequent damage. Wood, Nuisance.

A private nuisance is anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. It produces damage to but one or a few persons, and cannot be said to be public; 36 N. Y. 297; 35 N. H. 357; 5 R. I. 185; Ad. Eq. 210; 3 Bla. Com. 215; Webb, Poll. Torts 484.

A public or common nuisance is such an inconvenience or troublesome offence as annoys the whole community in general and not merely some particular person. It produces no special injury to one more than another of the people; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 197; 4 Bla. Com. 166.

A mixed nuisance is one which, while producing injury to the public at large, does some special damage to some individual or class of individuals; Wood, Nuisance 35.

It is difficult to say what degree of annoyance constitutes a nuisance. If a thing is calculated to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of a man's house, it is a nuisance; 3 Jur. N. S. 571. In relation to offensive trades, it seems that when such a trade renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable it is a nuisance; 1 Burr. 333; 13 Allen 95; 116 E. C. L. 608; 45 Cal. 55; 35 Ia. 221; 34 Tex. 230; 15 N. Y. Supp. 701; for the neighborhood have a right to pure and fresh air; 2 C. & P. 485; 22 N. J. Eq. 26; 58 Pa. 275; 4 B. & S. 608. Every citizen holds his property subject to the implied obligation that he will use it in such way as not to prevent others from enjoying the use of their property; 97 N. C. 477.

A thing may be a nuisance in one place which is not so in another; therefore the situation or locality of the nuisance must be considered. A tallow-chandler, for example, setting up his business among other tallow-chandlers, and increasing the noxious smells of the neighborhood, is not guilty of setting up a nuisance unless the annoyance is much increased by the new manufactory; Peake 91. Such an establishment might be a nuisance in a thickly populated town of merchants and mechanics where no such business was carried on; 3 Grant 302. The same doctrine obtains as regards other trades or employments. Persons living in populous manufacturing towns must expect more noise, smoke, and disturbance than those living elsewhere, and the circumstances of every case must govern; 21 Conn. 213; 58 Pa. 275; 54 Me. 272; 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 228. A private hospital in a fashionable square in Dublin is an offensive trade; [1896] 1 I. R. 76. A private lunatic asylum is not an offensive trade; 2 A. & E. 161.

Coal burning was at one time decided to be a nuisance, and on petition Edw. II. issued a proclamation against the using it in London; Chamb. Encyc. tit. Coal, cited in 8 Ont. Q. B. Div. 583, where it was held that a barbed wire fence is not a nuisance. A city ordinance declaring a public laundry to be a nuisance if carried on in a city except in designated parts of it, is unconstitutional as contravening the fourteenth amendment of the United States constitution; 82 Fed. Rep. 623. Carrying on an offensive trade for several years in a place remote from buildings and public roads does not entitle the owner to continue it in the same place after houses have been built and roads laid out in the neighborhood, to the occupants of and travellers upon which it is a nuisance. Formerly the contrary doctrine obtained, on the ground that the complainants were in fault in coming to a nuisance. This doctrine is now very properly exploded, as it is manifest that an observance of it would interfere greatly with the growth of towns and cities; 6 Gray 473; 7 Blackf. 534; 2 C. & P. 488; 23 Wend. 446; 8 Phila. 10; 5 Scott 500; 3 Barb. 167; 52 N. J. Eq. 675; 82 Mich. 471; 11 H. L. Cas. 642; 18 N. J. Eq. 397; 38 id. 58; 62 Ia. 540; 18 Fed. Rep. 753. The trade may be offensive for noise; 51 N. Y. 300; 10 L. T. (N. S.) 241; 2 Bing. 34; L. R. 4 Ch. App. 388; 2 Sim. N. S. 133; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 467; 22 Vt. 321; 6 Cush. 80; 14 Mo. App. 590; see 146 Mass. 349; 133 id. 289; or smell; 2 C. & P. 485; 13 Metc. Mass. 365; 1 Den. 524; 34 Tex. 230; 100 Mass. 597; 33 Conn. 121; 43 N. H. 415; 74 Ia. 169; or for other reasons; 1 Johns. 78; 1 Swan 213; 3 Jur. N. S. 570; 73 Pa. 84; L. R. 5 Eq. Ca. 166; 52 N. H. 262; 51 N. J. L. 42; 25 Fla. 881.

To constitute a public nuisance, there must be such a number of persons annoyed that the offence can no longer be considered a private nuisance; 1 Burr. 337; 2 Chitty, Cr. L. 607; 8 Ind. 494; 1 Wheat. 469; 37 Barb. 301. Where pugilistic entertainments were given at a club and crowds collected outside, and men whistled for cabs during late hours, it was held a nuisance which would be enjoined; 63 L. T. 65.

Public nuisances arise in consequence of following particular trades, by which the air is rendered offensive and noxious; Cro. Car. 510; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 75, § 10; 2 Ld. Raym. 1163; 1 Burr. 333; 1 Stra. 686; 4 B. & S. 608; 23 Vt. 92; 52 N. J. Eq. 675; also where rendered offensive from stagnant ponds; 134 N. Y. 414; 71 Hun 149; from acts of public indecency, as bathing in a public river in sight of the neighboring houses; 2 Campb. 89; 29 Ind. 517; 18 Vt. 574; 5 Barb. 203; 20 Ala. 65; 5 Rand. 627; or for acts tending to a breach of the public peace, as for drawing a number of persons into a field for the purpose of pigeon-shooting, to the disturbance of the neighborhood; 3 B. & Ald. 184; or for rude and riotous sports or pastimes; 5 Hill 121; 8 Cow. 169; 1 S. & R. 40; 6 C. & P. 324; or keeping a disorderly house; 13 Gray 26; 5 Cranch 304; 8 Blackf. 208; 1 Salk. 282; 30 N. J. Eq. 103; or a gaming house; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 75, § 6; or a bawdy-house; 9 Conn. 350; 13 Gray 26; 26 N. Y. 190; 54 Barb. 299; 128 N. Y. 341; 85 Me. 288; or a merry-go-round; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 906; or a dangerous animal, known to be such, and suffering him to go at large, as a large bulldog accustomed to bite people; 28 Wisc. 430; 40 Vt. 347; or exposing a person having a contagious disease, as the smallpox, in public; 4 M. & S. 73, 472; and the like. The bringing a horse infected with the glanders into a public place, to the danger of infecting the citizens, is a misdemeanor at common law; 2 H. & N. 299; 16 Conn. 272; 41 Barb. 329. The selling of tainted and unwholesome food is likewise indictable; 4 Bla. Com. 162; 3 Hawks 376; 3 M. & S. 11. The leaving unburied the corpse of a person for whom the defendant was bound to provide Christian burial, as a wife or child, is an indictable nuisance, if he is shown to have been of ability to provide such burial; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 325. So of storing combustible articles in undue quantities or in improper places; 56 Barb. 72; 3 East 192; 57 Pa. 274; 2 Hen. & M. 345; or the placing of a powder magazine in dangerous proximity to a city; 34 Ill. App. 364; or the erection and maintenance of purprestures; Story, Eq. § 921; 9 Wend. 571; 28 N. Y. 396; 55 Barb. 404; 10 Pet. 623; 23 Vt. 92; 2 Wall. 406; 10 id. 557; or the keeping of a coal-shed by a railroad in a thickly settled part of a city; 134 Ill. 281; or maintaining a powder magazine within the city limits, against an ordinance; 12 U. S. App. 665.

Private nuisances may be to corporeal inheritances: as, for example, if a man should build his house so as to throw the rain-water which fell on it on my land; Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 184; 39 Barb. 400; 5 Rep. 101; have a tree projecting over the land of another; Poll. Torts 62; keep hogs or other animals so as to incommode his neighbor and render the air unwholesome; 9 Co. 58; 139 Mass. 198; or to incorporeal hereditaments; as, for example, obstructing a right of way by ploughing it up or laying logs across it, and the like; Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 183; 2 Rolle, Abr. 140; 80 Ga. 659; or obstructing a spring; 1 Campb. 463; 6 East 208; or "shooting" a gas well;

131 Ind. 408; or making musical and other sounds, for the purpose of vexing and annoying the next door neighbor; [1893] 1 Ch. 316; interfering with a franchise, as a ferry or railroad, by a similar erection unlawfully made; or with a navigable stream by a railroad bridge erected without authority; 28 Ga. 398; 122 Mass. 1. Any annoyance arising from odors, smoke, unhealthy exhalations, noise, interference with water power, etc., etc., whereby a man is prevented from fully enjoying his own property, may be ranked as a private nuisance. See 131 Ind. 375; 153 Pa. 366; 50 Kan. 478; 67 Hun 401; [1893] 2 Ch. 447; polluting a stream by discharge of drainage; 35 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 499; 39 N. E. Rep. (Md.) 909; lowering the grade of a highway; 17 U. C. Q. B. 165; building a railway across it unlawfully; 4 Gray 22; failing to keep a street railway in repair; 87 Tenn. 746. So making noises in the street and thereby occasioning damage to citizens; 6 Cush. 80; and making a great outcry and clamor in the streets, by which people are drawn together and the highway obstructed; 74 Phila. 365; 101 Mass. 29; and even though the noise disturbed but a single person; 113 Mass. 8; and a continuous and daily beating of drums on the street; 105 Cal. 558; if it be so troublesome as to annoy the whole community; 72 N. C. 27. See several full notes on nuisances in 39 L. R. A.; and see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS; ORDINANCE.

A person is not liable in damages for a nuisance erected on land by his grantor until after a request to abate; 42 Ill. App. 421; but see 57 Fed. Rep. 901.

The remedies are by an action for the damage done, by the owner, in the case of a private nuisance; 3 Bla. Com. 220; or by any party suffering special damage, in the case of a public nuisance; 4 Wend. 9; 8 Vt. 529; 1 Pa. 309; Vaugh. 341; 3 M. & S. 472; 2 Bingh. 283; 28 Vt. 142; 36 Cal. 193; 2 R. I. 498; 74 Cal. 463; 76 Ga. 804; 51 N. J. L. 26; 74 Ia. 127; 34 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 974; by abatement by the owner, when the nuisance is private; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; 3 Dowl. & R. 556; 37 Pa. 503; 8 Dana 158; and in some cases when it is public; Add. Torts 71. But in neither case must there be any riot, and very pressing exigency is requisite to justify summary action of this character, particularly in the case of a public nuisance; 14 Wend. 397; 11 Ark. 252; 16 Q. B. 546; by injunction, which is the most usual and efficacious remedy; see INJUNCTION; or by indictment for a public nuisance; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 856; Whart. Cr. L. § 1410, etc.; 57 Vt. 144; 91 Tenn. 445. A private individual cannot abate a nuisance in a public highway, unless it does him special injury, and then only so far as is necessary to the exercise of his right of passing along the highway; 26 U. S. App. 486; 9 Co. 55; 2 Salk. 458; 3 Bla. Com. 5.

Every continuance of a nuisance or recurrence of the injury is an additional nuisance forming in itself the subject-matter of a new action; 38 Minn. 179.

See Wood, Nuisance, as to municipal authority to abate a nuisance; 9 L. R. A. 711, n.

According to the principles of equity as recognized in the courts of the United States, a state can obtain relief by a suit in equity to restrain a public nuisance; 144 U. S. 550.

NUL AGARD (L. Fr. no award). In Pleading. A plea to an action on an arbitration bond, when the defendant avers that there was no legal award made. 3 Burr. 1730; 2 Stra. 923.

NUL DISSEISIN. In Pleading. No disseisin. A plea in a real action, by which the defendant denies that there was any disseisin. It is a species of the general issue.

NUL TIEL RECORD (Fr. no such record). In Pleading. A plea which is proper when it is proposed to rely upon facts which disprove the existence of the record on which the plaintiff founds his action. Andr. Steph. Pl. 234.

Any matters may be introduced under it which tend to destroy the validity of the record as a record, provided they do not contradict the recitals of the record itself; 10 Ohio 100. It is frequently used to enable the defendant to deny the jurisdiction of the court from which the alleged record emanates; 2 McLean 129; 22 Wend. 293.

It is said to be the proper plea to an action on a foreign judgment, especially if of a sister state, in the United States; 2 Leigh 72; 17 Vt. 302; 6 Pick. 232; 11 Miss. 210; 1 Pa. 499; 2 South. 778; 2 Breese 2; though it is held that nil debet is sufficient; 33 Me. 268; 3 J. J. Marsh. 600; especially if the judgment be that of a justice of the peace; 3 Harr. N. J. 408. It has been held that nul tiel record is an inappropriate plea to suits upon foreign judgments, since such judgments do not create a merger, and are only prima facie evidence of an indebtedness; 88 Me. 406.

See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

NUL TORT (L. Fr. no wrong). In Pleading. A plea to a real action, by which the defendant denies that he committed any wrong. It is a species of general issue.

NUL WASTE. In Pleading. The general issue in an action of waste. Co. 3d Inst. 700 a, 708 a. The plea of nul waste admits nothing, but puts the whole declaration in issue: and in support of this plea the defendant may give in evidence anything which proves that the act charged is no waste, as that it happened by tempest, lightning, and the like; Co. Litt. 283 a; 3 Wms. Saund. 238, n. 5.

NULL. Properly, that which does not exist; that which is not in the nature of things. In a figurative sense it signifies that which has no more effect than if it did not exist. 8 Toullier, n. 320.

NULLA BONA (L. Lat. no goods). The return made to a writ of fieri facias by the sheriff, when he has not found any goods of the defendant on which he could levy.

NULLITY. An act or proceeding which has absolutely no legal effect whatever. See Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 671.

NULLITY OF MARRIAGE. The requisites of a valid and binding marriage have been considered in the article on that subject. If any of these requisites are wanting in a given case, the marriage is either absolutely void, or voidable at the election of one or both of the parties. The more usual imperfections which thus render a marriage void or voidable are: 1. Unsoundness of mind in either of the parties. 2. Want of age, i. e. fourteen in males and twelve in females. 3. Fraud or error; but these must relate to the essentials of the relation, as personal identity, and not merely to the accidentals, as character, condition, or fortune. 4. Duress. 5. Physical impotence, which must exist at the time of the marriage and be incurable. 6. Consanguinity or affinity within the prohibited degrees. 7. A prior subsisting marriage of either of the parties. The fifth and sixth are termed canonical, the remainder, civil, impediments.

The distinction between the two is important,—the latter rendering the marriage absolutely void, while the former only renders it voidable. In the one case, it is not necessary (though it is certainly advisable) to bring a suit to have nullity of the marriage ascertained and declared: it may be treated by the parties as no marriage, and will be so regarded in all judicial proceedings. In the other case, the marriage will be treated as valid and binding until its nullity is ascertained and declared by a competent court in a suit instituted for that purpose; and this must be done during the lifetime of both parties: if it is deferred until the death of either, the marriage will always remain good. But the effect of such sentence of nullity, when obtained, is to render the marriage null and void from the beginning, as in the case of civil impediments.

For the origin and history of this distinction between void and voidable marriages, see 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 252.

A suit for nullity is usually prosecuted in the same court, and is governed by substantially the same principles, as a suit for divorce; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 39.

In its consequences, a sentence of nullity differs materially from a divorce. The latter assumes the original validity of the marriage, and its operation is entirely prospective. The former renders the marriage void from the beginning, and nullifies all its legal results. The parties are to be regarded legally as if no marriage had ever taken place: they are single persons, if before they were single; their issue are illegitimate; and their rights of property as between themselves are to be viewed as having never been operated upon by the marriage. Thus, the man loses all right to the property, whether real or personal, which belongs to the woman; and the woman loses her right to dower; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 907, 1597.

Neither is the woman, upon a sentence of nullity, entitled to permanent alimony; though the better opinion is that she is entitled to alimony pendente lite; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 907, 1597. See ALIMONY; MARRIAGE; DIVORCE.

NULLIUS FILIUS (Lat.). The son of no one; a bastard.

A bastard is considered nullius filius as far as regards his right to inherit. But the rule of nullius filius does not apply in other respects, and has been changed by statute in most states so as to make him the child of his mother, in respect of inheritance.

The mother of a bastard, during its age of nurture, is entitled to the custody of her child, and is bound to maintain it; 6 S. & R. 255; 2 Johns. 375; 2 Mass. 109; 4 B. & P. 148. But see 5 East 224, n.

The putative father, too, is entitled to the custody of the child as against all but the mother; 1 Ashm. 55. And it seems that the putative father may maintain an action, as if his child were legitimate, for marrying him without his consent, contrary to law; Add. Pa. 212. See BASTARD; CHILD; FATHER; MOTHER; PUTATIVE FATHER.

NULLUM ARBITRIUM (Lat.). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action on an arbitration bond for not fulfilling the award, by which the defendant asserts that there is no award.

NULLUM FECERUNT ARBITRIUM (Lat.). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action of debt upon an obligation for the performance of an award, by which the defendant denies that he submitted to arbitration, etc. Bac. Abr. Arbitr. etc. (G).

NULLUM TEMPUS ACT. The statute 8 Geo. III. c. 16. See 32 Geo. III. c. 58, and 7 Will. c. 3. It was so called because the right of the crown to sue, etc., was limited by it to sixty years, in contradiction to the maxim, Nullum tempus occurrit regi. 3 Chitty, Stat. 63.

NUMBER. A collection of units.

In pleading, numbers must be stated truly when alleged in the recital of a record, written instrument, or express contract; Lawes, Pl. 48; 4 Term 314; Cro. Car. 262; Dougl. 669; 2 W. Bla. 1104. But in other cases it is not, in general, requisite that they should be truly stated; because they are not required to be strictly proved. If, for example, in an action of trespass the plaintiff proves the wrongful taking away of any part of the goods duly described in his declaration, he is entitled to recover pro tanto; Bac. Abr. Trespass (I 2); Lawes, Pl. 48.

And sometimes, when the subject to be described is supposed to comprehend a multiplicity of particulars, a general description is sufficient. A declaration in trover alleging the conversion of "a library of books," without stating their number, titles, or quality, was held to be sufficiently certain; 3 Bulstr. 31; Carth. 110; Bac. Abr. Trover (F 1); and in an action for the loss of goods by burning the plaintiff's house, the articles may be described by the simple denomination of "goods" or "divers goods"; 1 Kebl. 825; Plowd. 85, 118, 123; Cro. Eliz. 837; 1 H. Bla. 284. The singular number may be included within the plural; 83 Ind. 228; 71 Ala. 157; 29 Kan. 734; 77 Mo. 246; Bish. Stat. Crimes § 213.

NUMERATA PECUNIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Money counted or paid; money given in payment by count. See PECUNIA NUMERATA and PECUNIA NON-NUMERATA. L. 3, 10, C. de non numerat. pecun.

NUNC PRO TUNC (Lat. now for then). A phrase used to express that a thing is done at one time which ought to have been performed at another.

A nunc pro tunc entry is an entry made now, of something which was actually previously done, to have effect as of the former date. Its office is not to supply omitted action by the court, but to supply an omission in the record of action really had, but omitted through inadventure or mistake. 31 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 670.

Leave of court must be obtained to act in legal proceedings nunc pro tunc; and this is granted to answer the purposes of justice, but never to do injustice. A judgment nunc pro tunc can be entered only when the delay has arisen from the act of the court; 3 C. B. 970. See 1 V. & B. 312; 1 Moll. 462; 13 Price 604; 52 Kan. 562. Entering a decree nunc pro tunc, and thereby restricting the time for appeal, is not prejudicial error, where the defeated party succeeds in perfecting his appeal; 144 Ill. 248, 651.

A plea puis darrein continuance may be entered nunc pro tunc after an intervening continuation, in some cases; 11 N. H. 299; and lost pleadings may be replaced by new pleadings made nunc pro tunc; 1 Mo. 327. See 159 U. S. 687.

NUNCIATIO. In Civil Law. A formal proclamation or protest. It may be by acts (realis) or by words. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 237. Thus, nunciatio novi operis was an injunction which one man could place on the erection of a new building, etc., near him, until the case was tried by the prætor. Id.; Calv. Lex. An information against a criminal. Calv. Lex.

NUNCIO. The name given to the pope's ambassador. Nuncios are ordinary or extraordinary; the former are sent upon usual missions, the latter upon special occasions.

NUNCIUS. In International Law. A messenger; a minister; the pope's legate, commonly called a nuncio. See LEGATE.

NUNCUPATIVE WILL. An oral will, declared by a testator in extremis, or under circumstances considered equivalent thereto, before witnesses, and afterwards reduced to writing. Beach, Wills 5; 4 Kent 576; 2 Bla. Com. 500; 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *78; Schoul. Wills § 360.

When a man lieth languishing for fear of sudden death, dareth not stay the writing of his testament, and therefore he prayeth his curate and others to bear witness of his last will, and declareth by word what his last will is. Perk. Conv. § 476; Bac. Abr. 305; 24 Atl. Rep. 370.

In early times this kind of will was very common, and before the statute of frauds, by which it was virtually abolished, save in the case of soldiers and sailors, was of equal efficacy, except for lands, tenements, and hereditaments, with a written testament. Such wills are subject to manifest abuses, and by stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, §§ 9, 11 (preceded by 1 Will. IV. c. 20), the privilege is confined to soldiers in actual service, and sailors at sea, and extends only to personal estate. Similar provisions have been enacted in Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Rhode Island, Virginia, West Virginia, and Montana. In Georgia, the statute embraces both real and personal property. In California and the Dakotas, the decedent must have been in actual military service, or at sea, and in immediate fear of death. In the other states, nuncupative wills by persons in extremis are still recognized, subject to restrictions as to amount of property bequeathed, similar to those of the English statute of frauds.

The following principles, among others, are well established: Statutes relating to nuncupative wills are strictly construed; 2 Phillim. 194; 78 Ill. 287; 47 Pa. 31; 33 Miss. 629. The testator must be in extremis, overtaken by violent sickness, in contemplation of death, and without time to make a written will; 1 Addams 389; 20 Johns. 502; 6 W. & S. 184; 10 Gratt. 548; 84 Ga. 619; but see 2 Ala N. S. 242; 82 Ill. 50; the deceased must have clearly intimated by word or sign to those present that he intended to make the will; 9 B. Monr. 553; 27 Ill. 247; 26 N. H. 372; 14 La. Ann. 729; 36 Md. 630; 2 Greenl. 298; 63 Ill. 455; 78 id. 287; 46 Ia. 694; 63 N. C. 637; testamentary capacity must be most clearly proved; 12 Gill & J. 192; 78 Ill. 287. In "actual military service," is held to mean during warfare, and while on an expedition; 3 Curt. 531; 53 Me. 561; but this rule has been somewhat freely treated; 39 Vt. 498; 1 Abb. Pr. U. S. 112. See 53 Me. 561. Sailors must be serving on shipboard; 2 Curt. 339; 2 R. I. 133. The term mariner applies to every one in the naval or mercantile service; 4 Bradf. 154. See note to Sykes v. Sykes, 20 Am. Dec. 44; 24 Atl. Rep. 370. See MILITARY TESTAMENT.

NUNDINÆ (Law Lat.). In Civil and Old English Law. Fair or fairs. Dion. Halicarnass. lib. 2, p. 98; Law Fr. & Lat. Dict. Hence Nundination, traffic at fairs.

NUNQUAM INDEBITATUS (Lat. never indebted). In Pleading. A plea to an action of indebitatus assumpsit, by which the defendant asserts that he is not indebted to the plaintiff. McKelv. Pl. 31; 6 C. & P. 545; 1 M. & W. 542; 1 Q. B. 77.

In England, this plea has been substituted for nil debet, q. v., as the general issue in debt on a simple contract.

NUNTIUS, NUNCIUS. In Old English Practice. One who made excuse for absence of one summoned. An apparitor, beadle, or sergeant. Cowel. A messenger or legate: e. g. pope's nuncio. Jacob, L. Dict. Essoniator was sometimes wrongly used for nuntius in the first sense. Bracton, fol. 345, § 2.

NUPER OBIIT (Lat. he or she lately died). In Practice. The name of a writ which in the English law lay for a sister coheiress dispossessed by her coparcener of lands and tenements whereof their father, brother, or any common ancestor died seized of an estate in fee-simple. Fitzh. N. B. 197. Abolished in 1833.

NURTURE. The act of taking care of children and educating them. See CHILD.

NURUS (Lat.). A daughter-in-law. Dig. 50. 16. 50.

O.

OATH. An outward pledge given by the person taking it that his attestation or promise is made under an immediate sense of his responsibility to God. Tyler, Oaths 15.

The term has been variously defined: as, "a solemn invocation of the vengeance of the Deity upon the witness if he do not declare the whole truth, so far as he knows it;" 1 Stark. Ev. 22; or, "a religious asseveration by which a person renounces the mercy and imprecates the vengeance of Heaven if he do not speak the truth;" 2 Leach 482; or, as "a religious act by which the party invokes God not only to witness the truth and sincerity of his promise, but also to avenge his imposture or violated faith, or, in other words, to punish his perjury if he shall be guilty of it;" 10 Toullier, n. 343–348; Puffendorff, b. 4, c. 2, § 4. The essential idea of an oath would seem to be, however, that of a recognition of God's authority by the party taking it, and an undertaking to accomplish the transaction to which it refers as required by his laws.

In its broadest sense, the term is used to include all forms of attestation by which a party signifies that he is bound in conscience to perform the act faithfully and truly. In a more restricted sense, it excludes all those forms of attestation or promise which are not accompanied by an imprecation.

Assertory oaths are those required by law other than in judicial proceedings and upon induction to office: such, for example, as custom-house oaths.

Extra-judicial oaths are those taken without authority of law. Though binding in foro conscientiæ, they do not; when false, render the party liable to punishment for perjury.

Judicial oaths are those administered in judicial proceedings.

Promissory or official oaths are oaths taken, by authority of law, by which the party declares that he will fulfil certain duties therein mentioned: as, the oath which an alien takes, on becoming naturalized, that he will support the constitution of the United States: the oath which a judge takes that he will perform the duties of his office. The breach of this does not involve the party in the legal crime or punishment of perjury; 3 Zabr. 49. Where an appointee neglects to take an oath of office when required by statute to do so, he cannot be considered qualified, nor justify his doings as an officer; 2 N. H. 202; s. c. 9 Am. Dec. 50.

Qualified oaths are circumstantial oaths. Rap. & L. Dict.

The form of administering the oath may be varied to conform to the religious belief of the individual, so as to make it binding upon his conscience; 4 Bla. Com. 43; 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 386–8; 16 Pick. 154; 2 Gall. 346; 3 Park. Cr. 590; 2 Hawks 458; 7 Ill. 540; Ry. & M. 77. The most common form is upon the gospel, by taking the book in the hand: the words commonly used are, "You do swear that," etc., "so help you God," and then kissing the book: 9 C. & P. 137. The oath was in common use long prior to the Christian era; Willes 545, 1744; the oath and Christianity became associated during the reign of Henry VIII. in England; 3 Robertson's Charles V. 257. The origin of this oath may be traced to the Roman law; Nov. 8, tit. 3; Nov. 74, cap. 5; Nov. 124, cap. 1. In ancient times a Bible containing the Gospels was placed upon a stand in view of the prisoner. The jurors placed their hands upon the book, and then the accused had a full view of "the peer" who was to try him. This was called the "corporal oath" because the hand of the person sworn touched the book. Probably, out of reverence, the book may have been kissed sometimes, as a Catholic priest now kisses it in a Mass; but it is doubtful if kissing the book was ever essential to the validity of the "corporal oath"; 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 59.

The terms "corporal oath" and "solemn oath" are synonymous, and an oath taken with the uplifted hand is properly described by either term in an indictment for perjury; 1 Ind. 184. In New England, New York, and in Scotland the gospels are not generally used, but the party taking the oath holds up his right hand and repeats the words here given; 1 Leach 412, 498.

Kissing the book has been abolished by statute (1895) in Pennsylvania.

Where a justice asks affiant if he swears to the affidavit, and he replies that he does, the oath is sufficient though he does not hold up his hands and swear; 65 Miss. 454.

Another form is by the witness or party promising holding up his right hand while the officer repeats to him, "You do swear by Almighty God, the searcher of hearts, that," etc., "and this as you shall answer to God at the great day."

In another form of attestation, commonly called an affirmation (q. v.), the officer repeats, "You do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm that;" which is the form prescribed in England by 8 Geo. I. ch. 6.

A general oath that the evidence "shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," etc., is all that is necessary for a witness who testifies to the signing of an instrument in his presence, and translates the language of such instrument for the benefit of the jury; 13 Or. 563.

A Jew is sworn on the Pentateuch, or Old Testament, with his head covered; Stra. 821, 1113; a Mohammedan, on the Koran; 1 Leach 54; a Gentoo, by touching with his hand the foot of a Brahmin or priest of his religion; a Brahmin, by touching the hand of another such priest; Wils. 549; 1 Atk. 21; a Chinaman, by breaking a china saucer; 1 C. & M. 248. See 25 Alb. L. J. 301; 92 Mo. 395.

After a witness has taken the oath according to the custom and religion of his country, it is not error to require him to take the statutory oath; 47 Pac. Rep. 961.

The requirement of an "oath" as used in any act or resolution of congress shall be deemed complied with by making affirmation in the judicial form; U. S. R. S. § 1.

The form and time of administering oaths, as well as the person authorized to administer, are usually fixed by statute. See Gilp. 439; 4 Wash. C. C. 555; 2 Blackf. 35; 2 McLean 135; 9 Pet. 238; 1 Va. Cas. 181; 8 Rich. So. C. 456; 1 Swan 157; 5 Mo. 21; 48 Cal. 197; 41 Conn. 206. The administering of unlawful oaths is an offence against the government; Whart. Lex.

The subject of oaths has undergone much revision of late years by parliment. By the Promissory Oaths Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 72) a number of unnecessary oaths have been abolished, and declarations substituted. The act of 1885 provides that in case of rape of a child under thirteen, the victim or a witness, if too young to be sworn, may give evidence not under oath. See also Promissory Oaths Act, 1871.

In Arkansas, California, Florida, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Ohio, Oregon, and Wisconsin there are constitutional provisions intended to exclude any religious test for the competency of witnesses.

The Bible is not an indispensable requisite in the adminstration of an oath; 4 Seld. 67.

OATH AGAINST BRIBERY. One which could have been administered to a voter at an election for members of parliament. Abolished in 1854. Whart. Lex.

OATH OF CALUMNY. In Civil Law. An oath which a plaintiff was obliged to take that he was not actuated by a spirit of chicanery in commencing his action, but that he had bona fide a good cause of action. Pothier, Pand. lib. 5, tt. 16, 17, s. 124. This oath is somewhat similar to our affidavit of a cause of action. See Dunl. Adm. Pr. 289, 290; JURAMENTUM CALUMNIÆ.

OATH DECISORY. In Civil Law. An oath which one of the parties defers or refers back to the other for the decision of the cause.

It may be deferred in any kind of civil contest whatever, in questions of possession or of claim, in personal actions, and in real. The plaintiff may defer the oath to the defendant whenever he conceives he has not sufficient proof of the fact which is the foundation of his claim; and in like manner the defendant may defer it to the plaintiff when he has not sufficient proof of his defence. The person to whom the oath is deferred ought either to take it or refer it back; and if he will not do either, the cause should be decided against him. Pothier, Obl. pt. 4, c. 3, s. 4.

The decisory oath has been practically adopted in the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts; and admiralty causes have been determined in that court by the oath decisory. But the cases in which this oath has been adopted have been where the tender has been accepted; and no case is known to have occurred there in which the oath has been refused and tendered back to the adversary. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 290.

It was familiar to the Roman tribunals, and could be administered by the court to either party for the satisfaction of his conscience, when in doubt. 3 Greenl. Ev., Lewis ed. § 412.

OATH EX OFFICIO. The oath by which a clergyman charged with a criminal offence was formerly allowed to swear himself to be innocent; also the oath by which the compurgators swore that they believed in his innocence. 3 Bla. Com. 101, 447; Moz. & W.

OATH IN LITEM. An oath which in the civil law was deferred to the complainant as to the value of the thing in dispute, on failure of other proof, particularly when there was a fraud on the part of the defendant and he suppressed proof in his possession. See Greenl. Ev. § 348; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 229; 1 Me. 27; 1 Yeates 34.

In general, the oath of the party cannot, by the common law, be received to establish his claim, but is admitted in two classes of cases: first, where it has been already proved that the party against whom it is offered has been guilty of some fraud or other tortious or unwarrantable act of intermeddling with the complainant's goods, and no other evidence can be had of the amount of damages. See 1 Pet. 591; 9 Wheat. 486; 5 Pick. 436; 16 Johns. 193; 17 Ohio 156; 3 N. H. 135: as, for example, where a trunk of goods was delivered to a shipmaster at one port to be carried to another, and on the passage he broke the trunk open and rifled it of its contents, in an action by the owners of the goods against the shipmaster, the facts above mentioned having been proved aliunde, the plaintiff was held a competent witness to testify as to the contents of the trunk; 1 Me. 27; 11 id. 412. And see 10 Watts 335; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 348; 12 Metc. 44; 12 Mass. 360. Second, the oath in litem is also admitted on the ground of public policy where it is deemed essential to the purposes of justice; 1 Pet. 596; 6 Mood. 137; 2 Stra. 1186. But this oath is admitted only on the ground of necessity. An example may be mentioned of a case where a statute can receive no execution unless the party interested be admitted as a witness; 16 Pet. 203. Parties in interest are now everywhere, and in most cases, permitted to testify.

OATH PURGATORY. An oath by which one destroys the presumptions which were against him, for he is then said to purge himself, when he removes the suspicions which were against him: as, when a man is in contempt for not attending court as a witness, he may purge himself of the contempt, by swearing to a fact which is an ample excuse. See PURGATION.

OATH SUPPLETORY. In Civil and Ecclesiastical Law. An oath required by the judge from either party in a cause, upon half-proof already made, which being joined to half-proof, supplies the evidence required to enable the judge to pass upon the subject. See 3 Bla. Com. 270.

OBEDIENCE. The performance of a command.

Officers who obey the command of their superiors, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, are not responsible for their acts. A sheriff may, therefore, justify a trespass under an execution, when the court has jurisdiction, although irregularly issued; 3 Chitty, Pr. 75; Hamm. N. P. 48.

A child, an apprentice, a pupil, a mariner, and a soldier owe respectively obedience to the lawful commands of the parent, the master, the teacher, the captain of the ship, and the military officer having command; and in case of disobedience submission may be enforced by correction. See ASSAULT; CORRECTION.

OBEDIENTARIUS. A monastic officer. Du Cange. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. 417.

OBEDIENTIAL OBLIGATION. See OBLIGATION.

OBIT. That particular solemnity or office for the dead which the Roman Catholic church appoints to be read or performed over the body of a deceased member of that communion before interment; also, the office which upon the anniversary of his death was frequently used as a commemoration or observance of the day. Dy. 313.

OBITER DICTUM. See DICTUM.

OBJECT. That which is perceived, known, thought of, or signified; that toward which a cognitive act is directed. Cent. Dict. The term includes whatever may be presented to the mind as well as to the senses; whatever also is acted upon or operated upon affirmatively or intentionally influenced by anything done, moved, or applied thereto; 8 Blatchf. 257; it may be used as having the sense of effect; 3 Wash. Ter. 131; and for all practical purposes the words subject and object are synonymous; id. But the subject of action cannot be the object of action; the latter is the remedy demanded, the relief prayed for, and is no part of the subject of action or the causes of action; 18 Kan. 406.

OBJECTION. Where evidence is objected to at the trial, the nature of the objections must be distinctly stated, whether an exception be entered on the record or not, and, on either moving for a new trial on account of its improper admission, or on arguing the exception, the counsel will not be permitted to rely on any other objections than those taken at nisi prius; 3 Tayl. Ev., Chamb. ed. § 1881 d; objections must state the specific ground; 40 Cal. 390; 99 Ind. 588; 35 Mo. 226; and counsel cannot change his ground on the argument in the appellate court; 70 N. Y. 34; general objections, such as irrelevant, incompetent, and the like, are said to be too general in their terms; 91 Mo. 138; 50 N. H. 121; evidence to which such objections are made will be held in the appellate court to have been properly admitted, if admissible for any purpose; 46 Cal. 397; one who has not objected to evidence when introduced is not entitled to have the court instruct the jury to disregard it; 85 Mo. 106; nor will an objection be heard if made for the first time on the motion for a new trial; 40 Ind. 516; or in the appellate court; 105 U. S. 4.

When testimony was received without objection, the court should not sign a bill of exceptions; if it does, it will be disregarded above; 38 Pa. 56.

Ordinarily, where an objection has been made and overruled, it is not necessary to repeat it to each succeeding question open to the same objection; Thomp. Trials § 705.

Objecting to a judge's instruction is said to be regarded as having the same force as excepting; 98 Mo. 640. See BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where objections have been twice presented and regularly allowed, it is not necessary that they should be renewed at the termination of the testimony of a witness; 163 U. S. 532.

OBJECTS OF A POWER. The persons who are intended to be benefited by the distribution of property settled subject to a power.

OBJURGATRICES. Scolds or unquiet women punished with the cucking stool (q. v.).

OBLATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A tender of money in payment of debt made by debtor to creditor. L. 9, C. de solut. Whatever is offered to the church by the pious. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

OBLATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. Offerings; obventions. See OBVENTIONS.

OBLIGATIO. In Roman Law. A legal bond which obliges us to the performance of something in accordance with the law of the land. Ortolan, Inst. 2, § 1179.

It corresponded nearly to our word contract. Justinian says, "Obligatio est juris vinculum quo necessitate adstringimur alicujus solvendæ rei, secundum nostræ civitatis jura." Pr. J. 3. 13.

The Romans considered that obligations derived their validity solely from positive law. At first the only ones recognized were those established in special cases in accordance with the forms prescribed by the strict jus civilis. In the course of time, however, the prætorian jurisdiction, in mitigation of the primitive rigor of the law, introduced new modes of contracting obligations and provided the means of enforcing them: hence the twofold division made by Justinian of obligationes civiles and obligationes prætoriæ. Inst. 1. 3. 13. But there was a third class, the obligationes naturales, which derived their validity from the law of nature and nations, or the natural reason of mankind. These had not the binding force of the other classes, not being capable of enforcement by action, and are, therefore, not noticed by Justinian in his classification; but they had, nevertheless, a certain efficacy even in the civil law: for instance, though a debt founded upon a natural obligation could not be recovered by an action, yet if it was voluntarily paid by the debtor he could not recover it back, as he might do in the case of money paid by mistake, etc., where no natural obligation existed. L. 38, pr. D. 12. 6. And see Ortolan 2, § 1180.

The second classification of obligations made by Justinian has regard to the way in which they arise. They were, in this aspect, either ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, or ex maleficio or quasi ex maleficio; Inst. 2. 3. 13. These will be discussed separately.

Obligationes ex contractu, those founded upon an express contract, are again subdivided into four classes, with reference to the mode in which they are contracted. The contract might be entered into re, verbis, literis, or consensu.

A contract was entered into re by the actual transfer of a thing from one party to the other. Though in such cases the understanding of the parties as to the object of the transfer, and the conditions accompanying it, formed an essential part of the contract, yet it was only by the actual delivery of the thing that the contract was generated. The only contracts which could be entered into in this way were those known to our law as bailments,—a term derived from the French word bailler, to deliver, and evidently pointing to the same characteristic feature in the translation which the Romans indicated by the word re. These were the mutuum, or loan of a thing to be consumed in the using and to be returned in kind, the commodatum, or gratuitous loan of a thing to be used and returned, the depositum, or delivery of a thing to be kept in safety for the benefit of the depositor, and the pignus, or delivery of a thing in pledge to a creditor, as security for his debt. See MUTUUM; COMMODATUM; DEPOSITUM; PIGNUS; Ortolan, Inst. § 1208; Mackeldey, Röm. Recht § 396. Besides the above named contractus reales, a large class of contracts which had no special names, and were thence called contractus innominati, were included under this head, from the fact that they, like the former, gave rise to the actio præscriptis verbis. Some of these were the contracts of exchange, of mutual compromise, of doubtful or contested claims (somewhat resembling our accord and satisfaction), of factorship, etc. See Mackeldey § 409.

Contracts were entered into verbis, by a formal interrogation by one party and response by the other. The interrogation was called stipulatio, and the party making it, reus stipulandi. The response was called promissio, and the respondent, reus promittendi. The contract itself, consisting of the interrogation and response, was often called stipulatio. In the time of the earlier jurists, the stipulation could only be entered into by the use of certain formulary words by the parties: as, for instance, Spondes? do you promise? Spondeo, I promise; Dabis? will you give? Dabo, I will give; Facies? will you do this? Faciam, I will do it, etc., etc. But by a constitution of the emperor Leo, A. D. 469, the obligation to use these particular words was done away, and any words which expressed the meaning of the parties were allowed to create a valid stipulation, and any language understood by the parties might be used with as much effect as Latin. Such contracts were called verbis, because their validity depended entirely upon the use of the words. The mere agreement of the parties without using the question and response could not beget a stipulation; and, on the other hand, if the question and response had been used, the obligation was created although there might be an absence of consent. In this latter case, however, equitable relief would be granted by the prætor; Ortolan, Inst. § 1250. Stipulations, and, indeed, all other forms of contracts, might be made either pure, i. e. absolutely, or in diem, i. e. to take effect at a future day, or sub conditione, i. e. conditionally. But some kinds of conditions, such as those physically impossible, were inadmissible, and invalidated the contract; while others, such as those which were absurd, were themselves invalidated, and the contract was considered as having been made absolutely. Mackeldey § 415–421; Ortolan, Inst. § 1235; Inst. 3. 13.

Contracts entered into literis were obsolete in the reign of Justinian. In the earlier days of Roman jurisprudence, every citizen kept a private account-book. If a creditor, at the request of his debtor, entered in such book his charge against his debtor, such entry, in pursuance of the request, constituted not merely evidence of a contract, but the contract itself. This was the contract formed literis, in writing. The debtor, on his part, might also make a corresponding entry of the transaction in his own book. This was, in fact, expected of him, and was generally done; but it seems not to have been necessary to the validity of the contract. The entry was made in the form of a fictitious payment; it was allowable only in pecuniary transactions; it must be simple and unconditional, and could not be made to take effect at a future day. The charge might be made against the original debtor, a re in personam, or against a third person who agreed to take his place, a persona in personam. This species of literal contract was called nomina. nomina transcriptitia or acceptilatio et expensilatio. Ortolan, Inst. § 1414. This species of contract seems never to have been of great importance; they had disappeared entirely before the time of Justinian; Hadley, Rom. Law 216.

There were two other literal contracts known to the early jurisprudence, called syngraphia and chirographia; but these even in the times of Gaius had become so nearly obsolete that very little is known about them. All these, it must be borne in mind, were contracts themselves, not merely evidences of a contract; and this distinguishes them from the instruments of writing in use during the latter ages of the civil law. Ortolan, Inst. § 1414; Mackeldey § 422.

Contracts were made consensu, by the mere agreement of the contracting parties. Although such agreement might be proved by a written instrument, as well as in other ways, yet the writing was only evidence of the contract, not the contract itself. This species of consensual contracts are emptio et venditio, or sale, locatio et conductio, or hiring, emphyteusis, or conveyance of land reserving a rent, societas, or partnership, and mandatum, or agency. See these words; HIRE.

Obligationes quasi ex contractu. In the Roman law, persons who had not in fact entered into a contract were sometimes treated as if they had done so. Their legal position in such cases had considerable resemblance to that of the parties to a contract, and is called an obligatio quasi ex contractu. Such an obligation was engendered in the cases of negotiorum gestio, or unauthorized agency, of communio incidens, a sort of tenancy in common not originating in a contract, of solutio indebiti, or the payment of money to one not entitled to it, of the tutela and cura, resembling the relation of guardian and ward, of the additio hereditatis and agnitio bonorum possessionis, or the acceptance of an heirship, and many others. Some include in this class the constitutio dotis, settlement of a dower. Ortolan, Inst. § 1522; Mackeldey § 457.

Obligationes ex maleficio or ex delicto. The terms maleficium, delictum, embraced most of the injuries which the common law denominates torts, as well as others which are now considered crimes. This class includes furtum, theft, rapina, robbery, damnum, or injury to property, whether direct or consequential, and injuria, or injury to the person or reputation. The definitions here given of damnum and injuria are not strictly accurate, but will serve to convey an idea of the distinction between them. All such acts, from the instant of their commission, rendered the perpetrator liable for damages to the party injured, and were, therefore, considered to originate an obligatio. Inst. 4. 1; Ortolan, Inst. § 1715.

Obligationes quasi ex delicto. This class embraces all torts not coming under the denomination of delicta and not having a special form of action provided for them by law. They differed widely in character, and at common law would in some cases give rise to an action on the case, in others to an action on an implied contract. Ortolan, Inst. § 1781.

Obligationes ex variis causarum figuris. Although Justinian confined the divisions of obligations to the four classes which have been enumerated, there are many species of obligations which cannot properly be reduced within any of these classes. Some authorities have, consequently, established a fifth class, to receive the odds and ends which belonged nowhere else, and have given to this class the above designation, borrowed from Gaius, l. 1, pr. § 1, D. 44. 7. See Mackeldey § 474. See, generally, Hadley, Rom. Law 209, etc.

OBLIGATION (from Lat. obligo, ligo, to bind). A duty.

A tie which binds us to pay or do something agreeably to the laws and customs of the country in which the obligation is made. Inst. 3. 14.

A bond containing a penalty, with a condition annexed, for the payment of money, performance of covenants, or the like, and which differs from a bill, which is generally without a penalty or condition, though it may be obligatory. Co. Litt. 172.

A deed whereby a man binds himself under a penalty to do a thing. Com. Dig. Obligation (A); 2 S. & R. 502; 6 Vt. 40; 1 Blackf. 241; Harp. 434; Baldw. 129. The word has a very broad and comprehensive legal signification and embraces all instruments of writing, however informal, whereby one party contracts with another for the payment of money or the delivery of specific articles. 103 N. C. 344; 6 Minn. 353; 23 Fed. Rep. 535.

An absolute obligation is one which gives no alternative to the obligor, but requires fulfilment according to the engagement.

An accessory obligation is one which is dependent on the principal obligation; for example, if I sell you a house and lot of ground, the principal obligation on my part is to make you a title for it; the accessory obligation is to deliver you all the title-papers which I have relating to it, to take care of the estate till it is delivered to you, and the like.

An alternative obligation is where a person engages to do or to give several things in such a manner that the payment of one will acquit him of all.

Thus, if A agrees to give B, upon a sufficient consideration, a horse, or one hundred dollars, it is an alternative obligation. Pothier, Obl. pt. 2, c. 3, art. 6, no. 245.

In order to constitute an alternative obligation it is necessary that two or more things should be promised disjunctively; where they are promised conjunctively, there are as many obligations as the things which are enumerated; but where they are in the alternative, though they are all due, there is but one obligation, which may be discharged by the payment of any of them.

The choice of performing one of the obligations belongs to the obligor, unless it is expressly agreed that it shall belong to the creditor; Dougl. 14; 1 Ld. Raym. 279; 4 Mart. La. N. S. 167. If one of the acts is prevented by the obligee or the act of God, the obligor is discharged from both. See 2 Evans, Pothier, Obl. 52; Viner, Abr. Condition (S b); CONJUNCTIVE; DISJUNCTIVE; ELECTION.

A civil obligation is one which has a binding operation in law, and which gives to the obligee the right of enforcing it in a court of justice; in other words, it is an engagement binding on the obligor. 4 Wheat. 197; 12 id. 318, 337.

Civil obligations are divided into express and implied, pure and conditional, primitive and secondary, principal and accessory, absolute and alternative, determinate and indeterminate, divisible and indivisible, single and penal, and joint and several. They are also purely personal, purely real, or mixed.

A conditional obligation is one the execution of which is suspended by a condition which has not been accomplished, and subject to which it has been contracted.

A determinate obligation is one which has for its object a certain thing: as, an obligation to deliver a certain horse named Bucephalus. In this case the obligation can only be discharged by delivering the identical horse.

A divisible obligation is one which, being a unit, may nevertheless be lawfully divided, with or without the consent of the parties.

It is clear that it may be divided by consent, as those who made it may modify or change it as they please. But some obligations may be divided without the consent of the obligor: as where a tenant is bound to pay two hundred dollars a year rent to his landlord, the obligation is entire; yet, if his landlord dies and leaves two sons, each will be entitled to one hundred dollars; or if the landlord sells one undivided half of the estate yielding the rent, the purchaser will be entitled to receive one hundred dollars and the seller the other hundred. See APPORTIONMENT.

Express or conventional obligations are those by which the obligor binds himself in express terms to perform his obligation.

Imperfect obligations are those which are not binding on us as between man and man, and for the non-performance of which we are accountable to God only: such as charity or gratitude. In this sense an obligation is a mere duty. Pothier, Obl. art. prél. n. 1.

An implied obligation is one which arises by operation of law: as, for example, if I send you daily a loaf of bread, without any express authority, and you make use of it in your family, the law raises an obligation on your part to pay me the value of the bread.

An indeterminate obligation is one where the obligor binds himself to deliver one of a certain species: as, to deliver a horse, where the delivery of any horse will discharge the obligation.

An indivisible obligation is one which is not susceptible of division: as, for example, if I promise to pay you one hundred dollars, you cannot assign one-half of this to another, so as to give him a right of action against me for his share. See DIVISIBLE.

A joint obligation is one by which several obligors promise to the obligee to perform the obligation. When the obligation is only joint, and the obligors do not promise separately to fulfil their engagement, they must be all sued, if living, to compel the performance: or, if any be dead, the survivors must all be sued. See PARTIES.

A natural or moral obligation is one which cannot be enforced by action, but which is binding on the party who makes it in conscience and according to natural justice.

As, for instance, when the action is barred by the act of limitation, a natural obligation still subsists, although the civil obligation is extinguished; 5 Binn. 578. Although natural obligations cannot be enforced by action, they have the following effect: first, no suit will lie to recover back what has been paid or given in compliance with a natural obligation; 1 Term 285; 1 Dall. 184; second, a natural obligation has been held to be a sufficient consideration for a new contract; 2 Binn. 591; 5 id. 33; Yelv. 41 a, n. 1; Cowp. 290; 2 Bla. Com. 445; 3 Bos. & P. 249, n.; 2 East 506; 3 Taunt. 311; 5 id. 36; 3 Pick. 207; Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 38; Hare, Contr. 264; Poll. Contr. 168; but see MORAL OBLIGATION; CONSIDERATION.

Obediential obligations. Such obligations as are incumbent on parties in consequence of the situation or relationship in which they are placed. Ersk. Prin. 60.

A penal obligation is one to which is attached a penal clause, which is to be enforced if the principal obligation be not performed. See LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

A perfect obligation is one which gives a right to another to require us to give him something or not to do something. These obligations are either natural or moral, or they are civil.

A personal obligation is one by which the obligor binds himself to perform an act, without directly binding his property for its performance.

It also denotes an obligation in which the obligor binds himself only, not including his heirs or representatives.

A primitive obligation, which in one sense may also be called a principal obligation, is one which is contracted with a design that it should itself be the first fulfilled.

A principal obligation is one which is the most important object of the engagement of the contracting parties.

A pure or simple obligation is one which is not suspended by any condition, either because it has been contracted without condition, or, having been contracted with one, it has been fulfilled.

A real obligation is one by which real estate, and not the person, is liable to the obligee for the performance.

A familiar example will explain this. When an estate owes an easement as a right of way, it is the thing, and not the owner, who owes the easement. Another instance occurs when a person buys an estate which has been mortgaged, subject to the mortgage: he is not liable for the debt, though the estate is. In these cases the owner has an interest only because he is seized of the servient estate or the mortgaged premises, and he may discharge himself by abandoning or parting with the property. The obligation is both personal and real when the obligor has bound himself and pledged his estate for the fulfilment of the obligations.

A secondary obligation is one which is contracted and is to be performed in case the primitive cannot be. For example, if I sell you my house, I bind myself to give a title: but I find I cannot, as the title is in another: then my secondary obligation is to pay you damages for my non-performance of my obligation.

A several obligation is one by which one individual, or, if there be more, several individuals, bind themselves separately to perform the engagement. In this case each obligor may be sued separately; and if one or more be dead, their respective executors may be sued. See PARTIES.

A single obligation is one without any penalty: as where I simply promise to pay you one hundred dollars. This is called a single bill, when it is under seal.

OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. A state statute which authorizes the redemption of property sold upon foreclosure of a mortgage, where no right of redemption previously existed, or which extends the period of redemption beyond the time formerly allowed, cannot constitutionally apply to a sale under a mortgage executed before its passage; 163 U. S. 118. The subject is treated under IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATIONS OF CONTRACTS.

OBLIGATORY PACT. In Civil Law. An informal obligatory declaration of consensus, which the Roman law refused to acknowledge. Sohm, Rom. L. 321.

OBLIGATORY RIGHTS. In the Civil Law. One class of private rights between debtors and creditors.

OBLIGEE. The persons in favor of whom some obligation is contracted, whether such obligation be to pay money or to do or not to do something. La. Code, art. 3522, no. 11.

Obligees are either several or joint. An obligee is several when the obligation is made to him alone; obligees are joint when the obligation is made to two or more; and in that event each is not a creditor for his separate share, unless the nature of the subject or the particularity of the expression in the instrument lead to a different conclusion. 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 56; Hob. 172; Cro. Jac. 251. The words obligee and payee have been held to have a technical and definite meaning under an act relative to promissory notes, bonds, etc., and apply only to notes, bonds, or bills whether given for the payment of money or for the performance of covenants and conditions, and not to mortgages; 2 Ill. 142.

OBLIGOR. The person who has engaged to perform some obligation. La. Code, art. 3522, no. 12. One who makes a bond.

Obligors are joint and several. They are joint when they agree to pay the obligation jointly; and then the survivors only are liable upon it at law, but in equity the assets of a deceased joint obligor may be reached; 1 Bro. Ch. 29; 2 Ves. 101, 371. They are several when one or more bind themselves and each of them separately to perform the obligation. In order to become an obligor, the party must actually, either himself or by his attorney, enter into the obligation and execute it as his own. If a man sign and seal a bond as his own and deliver it, he will be bound by it although his name be not mentioned in the bond; 4 Ala. 479; 4 Hayw. 239; 4 M'Cord 203; 7 Cow. 484; 5 Mass. 538; 2 Dana 463; 4 Dev. 272. When the obligor signs between the penal part and the condition, still the latter will be a part of the instrument; 7 Wend. 345; 3 Hen. & M. 144.

The execution of a bond by the obligor, in blank, with verbal authority to fill it up, does not bind the obligor, though it is afterwards filled up, unless the bond is redelivered or acknowledged or adopted; 1 Yerg. 69, 149; 1 Hill N. Y. 267; 2 N. & M'C. 125; 2 Brock. 64; 1 Ohio 368; 2 Dev. 369; 6 Gill & J. 250. But see, contra, 17 S. & R. 438; and see 6 id. 308; Wright Ohio 742; BLANK.

All obligors in a joint bond are presumed to be principals, except such as have the word "security" opposite their names; 82 Va. 751.

OBLITERATION. In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, the obliteration of part of a will, leaving it otherwise complete, with the intention by the testator to annul only what was cancelled, leaves the residue valid; 123 Mass. 102; 19 Alb. L. J. 328; 39 L. T. (N. S.) 581; 22 N. J. Eq. 463. But under the Wills Act in England; 1 Vict. c. 26; any obliterations or other alterations must be duly attested as is required for the execution of a will, except that such attestation may be limited to the alterations; 1 Wms. Exec. 144. A line drawn through the writing is, doubtless, an obliteration, though it may leave it as legible as it was before; 58 Pa. 244. For a review of the cases see note to 25 Am. Rep. 35; WILLS.

OBEAS. Works or trades which men carry on in houses or in covered places. White, New Recop. b. 1, t. 5, c. 3, § 6.

OBLOQUY. Censure; reproach. 70 Cal. 275.

OBREPTION. Acquisition of escheats, etc., from a sovereign, by making false representations. Bell, Dic. Subreption; Calv. Lex.

OBROGATION. The annulling a law, in whole or in part, by passing a law contrary to it. The alteration of a law. Calv. Lex.

OBSCENE. Ordinarily, something which is offensive to chastity; something that is foul and filthy, and for that reason is offensive to a pure-minded person. 38 Fed. Rep. 732. That which is offensive to chastity and modesty. 45 Fed. Rep. 414; 50 id. 918. See OBSCENITY.

OBSCENITY. In Criminal Law. Such indecency as is calculated to promote the violation of the law and the general corruption of morals. It is that form of indecency which is calculated to promote the general corruption of morals. 51 Fed. Rep. 41. In all cases an indictment for obscenity must aver exposure and offence to the community generally; mere private indecency is not indictable at common law; 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1431.

The exhibition of an obscene picture is an indictable offence at common law, although not charged to have been exhibited in public, if it be averred that the picture was exhibited to sundry persons for money; Arch. Cr. Pr. 1034; 2 S. & R. 91. The stat. 20 and 21 Vict. c. 83, gives summary powers for the searching of houses in which obsence books, etc., are suspected to be kept, and for the seizure and destruction of such books. By various acts of congress, the importation and circulation, through the mails or otherwise, of obscene literature or articles of any kind is rendered punishable with fine or imprisonment; R. S. §§ 2491, 3893, 5389. See 8 Phila. 458; 126 Mass. 46; 92 Ill. 182; 51 Fed. Rep. 41. R. S. § 3893, as amended by act of congress (19 Stat. L. p. 90), prohibiting the mailing of obscene papers, is not in contravention of the first amendment to the constitution providing that the freedom of the press shall not be abridged; 96 U. S. 727; 143 id. 110; 50 Fed. Rep. 921. An obscene book or paper within the act relating to nonmailable matter means one which contains immodest and indecent matter, the reading whereof would have a tendency to deprave and corrupt the minds of those in whose hands the publication might fall, and whose minds are open to such immoral influences; 38 Fed. Rep. 732. Mailing a private sealed letter containing obscene matter is an offence within the statute; 162 U. S. 420; 50 Fed. Rep. 410. The character of a publication as to whether obscene or otherwise is not to be determined by the motives of the author or sender in making or sending it; 38 Fed. Rep. 500. An indictment for selling an obscene book need not set out the obscene matter nor even describe the same in general terms, if it identifies the book and states that the contents are too indecent to be placed upon the record; 43 N. Y. Supp. 1046.

The fact that a woman, in whose presence obscene language is used, is herself in the habit of using such language, can in no case constitute a justification, but may mitigate the offence; 86 Ala. 601.

Legislative provisions forbidding the keeping, exhibition, or sale of indecent books or pictures, and authorizing their destruction if seized, are within the police powers of the states and are constitutional; Cooley, Const. Lim. 749.

OBSERVE. In Civil Law. To perform that which has been prescribed by some law or usage. Dig. 1. 3. 32.

OBSOLETE. A term applied to laws which have lost their efficacy without being repealed.

A positive statute, unrepealed, can never be repealed by non-user alone; 4 Yeates 181, 215; 1 P. A. Bro. App. 28; 13 S. & R. 447. The disuse of a law is at most only presumptive evidence that society has consented to such a repeal; however this presumption may operate on an unwritten law, it cannot, in general, act upon one which remains as a legislative act on the statute-book; because no presumption can set aside a certainty. A written law may indeed become obsolete when the object to which it was intended to apply, or the occasion for which it was enacted, no longer exists; 1 P. A. Bro. App. 28. "It must be a very strong case," says Chief Justice Tilghman, "to justify the court in deciding that an act standing on the statute-book, unrepealed, is obsolete and invalid. I will not say that such case may not exist,—where there has been a non-user for a great number of years,—where, from a change of times and manners, an ancient sleeping statute would do great mischief if suddenly brought into action,—where a long practice inconsistent with it has prevailed, and especially where from other and later statutes it might be inferred that in the apprehension of the legislature the old one was not in force." 13 S. & R. 452; Rutherford, Inst. b. 2, c. 6, s. 19; Merlin, Répert, Desuetude.

OBSTANTE. Withstanding; hindering. See NON OBSTANTE.

OBSTA PRINCIPIIS. Withstand beginnings. It is the duty of the court to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis. 116 U. S. 635.

OBSTRUCTING A STREET. To block up; to hinder or impede. To omit, after notice, to remove an obstruction, is to wilfully obstruct a highway; 12 Q. B. D. 121; as is the leaving on the side of a highway anything calculated to frighten horses; 12 id. 110. A certain use of the streets by carriages, either in front of private residences, hotels, clubs, theatres, churches, and similar buildings, is a legitimate use of the street as such, and when they are occupied temporarily and reasonably by a licensed coachman or by a private carriage, the practice does not amount to a nuisance; N. Y. Sup. Ct. (1896).

See STREET; NUISANCE; HIGHWAY.

OBSTRUCTING MAIL. See POSTAL SERVICE.

OBSTRUCTING PROCESS. In Criminal Law. The act by which one or more persons attempt to prevent, or do prevent, the execution of lawful process.

The officer must be prevented by actual violence, or by threatened violence accompanied by the exercise of force, or by those having capacity to employ it, by which the officer is prevented from executing his writ. The officer is not required to expose his person by a personal conflict with the offender; 2 Wash. C. C. 169. See 3 id. 335; 12 Ala. N. S. 199; 37 Wis. 196; 17 Tex. App. 232; Whart. Cr. L. § 652.

This is an offence against public justice of a very high and presumptuous nature; and more particularly so where the obstruction is of an arrest upon criminal process. A person opposing an arrest upon criminal process becomes thereby particeps criminis; that is, an accessory in felony, and a principal in high treason; 4 Bla. Com. 128; 1 Russ. Cr. 360. See 2 Gall. 15; 2 Chitty, Cr. L. 145; 3 Vt. 110; 25 id. 415; 2 Strobh. 78; 15 Mo. 486; 4 Am. L. J. 489; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 289; 148 U. S. 197.

The fact that a person whom a mayor attempts to arrest does not know that he is authorized by the charter of the city to make arrests, does not change his responsibility for acts committed in resisting arrest; 36 S. C. 493; but where a person, who is not vested by law with authority to make an arrest, attempts to do so, he acts as a private citizen, and one who opposes him therein is not guilty of opposing an officer; 48 Fed. Rep. 554.

OBSTRUCTING PUBLIC WORSHIP. See DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

OBSTRUCTING RAILWAYS. Acts constituting the obstruction of railroad tracks a crime exist in many states, e. g. Alabama, California, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, and Tennessee, and in England. The motive with which it is done is not material; 73 Ala. 473; it need not appear that an obstruction maliciously placed on the track did actually hinder the trains; 88 Ia. 257. It is the intent of the act and not the natural consequences which makes a crime; 25 Alb. L. J. 419. A driver of a vehicle who refuses to turn off a street railway track, when notified, may be guilty of obstructing a railway track; 14 Gray 69. In Texas it must be shown that the obstruction was such as would endanger human life; 7 Tex. App. 462. If a person's wagon accidentally becomes caught in a crossing, he is not liable on an indictment for obstructing the track, though he was negligent; 3 L. T. 665.

Permitting cars to remain for an unnecessarily long time on a highway is a nuisance; 95 N. C. 602; whether it be in bad faith or not; 120 Ind. 298.

See NUISANCE; RAILROAD.

OBVENTIO (Lat. obvenire, to fall in). In Civil Law. Rent or profit accruing from a thing, or from industry. It is generally used in the plural.

In Old English Law. The revenue of spiritual living, so called. Cowel. Also, in the plural, offerings. Co. 2d Inst. 661.

OBVIOUS. Apparent; evident; manifest. An obvious imitation of a patent does not mean obvious to an uneducated or unskilled eye, but obvious to a judge or jury, sitting as experts; 15 Ch. D. 181; 50 L. T. 420. See 15 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th ser. 660.

OCCASIO. A tribute imposed by the lord on his vassals or tenants.

OCCUPANCY. The taking possession of those things corporeal which are without an owner, with an intention of appropriating them to one's own use.

Pothier defines it to be the title by which one acquires property in a thing which belongs to nobody, by taking possession of it with design of acquiring it. Tr. du Dr. de Propriété, n. 20. The Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 3375, nearly following Pothier, defines occupancy to be "a mode of acquiring property by which a thing which belongs to nobody becomes the property of the person who took possession of it with an intention of acquiring a right of ownership in it." The basis of its origin seems to be not an instinctive bias towards the institution of property, but a presumption, arising out of the long continuation of that institution, that everything should have an owner. Maine, Anc. L. 249. Occupancy is sometimes used in the sense of occupation or holding possession; indeed it has come to be very generally so used in this country in homestead laws, public-land laws, and the like; 31 Ill. 178; 25 Barb. 54; Act of Cong. May 29, 1830 (4 Stat. at L. 420); 36 Wisc. 73; see 47 Minn. 13; 12 Q. B. Div. 356; 2 id. 588; but this does not appear to be a common legal use of the term, as recognized by English authorities.

To constitute occupancy, there must be a taking of a thing corporeal, belonging to nobody, with an intention of becoming the owner of it; Co. Litt. 416.

A right by occupancy attaches in the finder of lost goods unreclaimed by the owner; in the captor of beasts ferœ naturæ, so long as he retains possession; 2 Bla. Com. 403; the owner of lands by accession, and the owner of goods acquired by confusion.

It was formerly considered, also, that the captor of goods contraband of war acquired a right by occupancy; but this is now held otherwise, such goods being now held to be primarily vested in the sovereign, and as belonging to individual captors only, to the extent and under such regulations as positive laws may prescribe; 2 Kent 290. See PRIZE.

OCCUPANT. One who has the actual use or possession of a thing. See 12 Nev. 65.

When the occupiers of a house are entitled to a privilege in consequence of such occupation, as to pass along a way, to enjoy a pew, and the like, a person who occupies a part of such house, however small, is entitled to some right, and cannot be deprived of it; 2 B. & Ald. 164; 1 Chitty, Pr. 209; 4 Comyns, Dig. 64; 5 id. 199. See 30 Ia. 242; 3 Q. B. 449.

OCCUPATION. Use or tenure: as, the house is in the occupation of A B. A trade, business, or mystery: as, the occupation of a printer. See 99 Ill. 506.

A putting out of a man's freehold in time of war. Co. Litt. s. 412. See MILITARY OCCUPATION.

OCCUPAVIT (Lat.). In Old Practice. The name of a writ which lies to recover the possession of lands when they have been taken from the possession of the owner by occupation (q. v.).

OCCUPIER. One who is in the enjoyment of a thing.

A tenant, though absent, is, generally speaking, the occupier of premises; 1 B. & C. 178; but not a servant or other person who may be there virtute officii; 26 L. J. C. P. 12; 47 L. J. Ex. 112; L. R. 1 Q. B. 72.

OCCUPY. To hold in possession; to hold or keep for use: as, to occupy an apartment. 107 U. S. 343. In legal acceptation, actual use, possession, and cultivation. 11 Johns. 202; 37 N. J. Eq. 486.

OCCUR. To happen. 91 Ill. 95.

OCHLOCRACY. A government where the authority is in the hands of the multitude; the abuse of a democracy. Vauméne, Dict. du Langage Politique. Mob rule. See GOVERNMENT.

OCTAVE (Law Lat. utas). In Old English Practice. The eighth day inclusive after a feast. 3 Bla. Com. 277.

OCTO TALES (Lat. eight such). If, when a trial at bar is called on, the number of jurors in attendance is too small, the trial must be adjourned, and a decem or octo tales awarded, according to the number deficient; as, at common law, namely, a writ to the sheriff to summon eight more such men as were originally summoned. 3 Bla. Com. 364.

ODIO ET ATIA. See DE ODIO ET ATIA.

OF. The word has been held equivalent to after; 5 Term 283; 10 L. J. Q. B. 10; at; 3 Taunt. 147; belonging to; 2 B. & S. 703; 38 Ohio St. 506; manufactured by; 2 Bing. N. C. 668; by; 107 Mass. 355; residing at; 3 Wend. 329; 8 A. & E. 282.

OF COUNSEL. A phrase commonly applied in practice to the counsel employed by a party in a cause.

OF COURSE. That which may be done in the course of legal proceedings without making any application to the court; that which is granted by the court, without further inquiry, upon its being asked: as, a rule to plead is a matter of course.

OFFENCE. In Criminal Law. The doing that which a penal law forbids to be done, or omitting to do what it commands. In this sense, it is nearly synonymous with crime. In a more confined sense, it may be considered as having the same meaning with misdemeanor; but it differs from it in this, that it is not indictable, but punishable summarily by the forfeiture of a penalty; 1 Chitty, Pr. 14.

OFFER. A proposal to do a thing.

An offer, as an element of a contract, is a proposal to make a contract. It must be made by the person who is to make the promise, and it must be made to the person to whom the promise is made. It may be made either by words or by signs, either orally or in writing, and either personally or by a messenger; but in whatever way it is made, it is not in law an offer until it comes to the knowledge of the person to whom it is made; Langd. Contr. § 151; 6 H. L. Cas. 112. While an offer remains in force, it confers upon the offeree the power to convert it into a promise by accepting it. The offerer may state how long it shall remain in force; and it will then remain in force during the time so stated, unless sooner revoked; 3 Cush. 224. In the absence of any specification by the offerer, an offer will remain in force a reasonable time unless sooner revoked; Leake, Contr. 38; 119 U. S. 151. As to what will be a reasonable time, no uniform positive rule can be laid down. When an offer is made personally, it will prima facie continue until the interview or negotiation terminates, and longer; 6 Wend. 103. In commercial transactions, when an offer is made by mail, the general rule is that the offerer is entitled to an answer by return mail; but this will not apply in all cases, e.-g. when there are several mails each day. In transactions which are not commercial, much less promptitude in answering is required; Langd. Contr. § 152.

Where the offer contemplates a unilateral contract, the length of time that the offer will continue in force depends upon different considerations. The question is no longer one of accepting the offer orally or by letter, but of performing the consideration. The duration of such an offer, therefore, in the absence of any express limitation, will be measured by the length of time which may be reasonably required for the performance of the consideration. When performance of the consideration has been begun in good faith, it seems that the offer will continue, in the absence of actual revocation, until the performance is either completed or abandoned, especially when the performance of the consideration is constantly within the knowledge of the offerer; Langd. Contr. § 155. An offer which contains no stipulation as to how long it shall continue is revocable at any moment. A stipulation that an offer shall remain open for a specified time must be supported by a sufficient consideration, or be contained in an instrument under seal, in order to be binding; Langd. Contr. § 178; 3 Term 653. When thus made binding, the offer is not irrevocable, but the only effect is to give the offerer a claim for damages if the stipulation be broken by revoking the offer. When an offer is made for a time limited in the offer itself, no acceptance afterwards will make it binding; an offer which in its terms limits the time of acceptance is withdrawn by the expiration of the time; 144 U. S. 394.

As an offer can only be made by communication from the offerer to the offeree, so it can only be revoked in the same manner. But the death or insanity of the offerer during the pendency of the offer, revokes it; Langd. Contr. § 180.

An offer can only be accepted in the terms in which it is made; an acceptance, therefore, which modifies the offer in any particular, goes for nothing; L. R. 7 Ch. App. 587; 119 U. S. 151. The other party having once rejected the offer, cannot afterwards revive it by tendering an acceptance of it; 4 Wheat. 225; 14 Pet. 77; 101 U. S. 50; 119 id. 151.

A mere proposal to sell may be revoked at any time before acceptance; 45 La. Ann. 214. Where an offer of sale of land stands for twenty years, and until after the death of the party to whom it is made, without compliance with its terms, the widow and sole devisee of such party cannot accept the proposition, and offer to perform it, and thereby make a contract binding on the proposer; 51 Fed. Rep. 860.

A man may change his mind at any time, if it is not to the injury of another; he may, therefore, revoke or recall his offers at any time before they have been accepted; and, in order to deprive him of this right, the offer must have been accepted on the terms in which it was made; 10 Ves. 438; 2 C. & P. 553. See Ans. Contr. 31.

Any qualification of, or departure from, those terms invalidates the offer, unless the same be agreed to by the party who made it; 4 Wheat. 225; 3 Johns. 534; 7 id. 470; 6 Wend. 103; Poll. Contr. 38; i. e. there is no contract entered into.

When the offer has been made, the party is presumed to be willing to enter into the contract for the time limited, and, if the time be not fixed by the offer, then until it be expressly revoked or rendered nugatory by a contrary presumption; 6 Wend. 103. See 8 S. & R. 243; 1 Pick. 278; 10 id. 326; 12 Johns. 190; 9 Port. Ala. 605; 33 Neb. 460; 35 W. Va. 463; 1 Bell, Com. 326; Pothier, Vente, n. 32. And see ASSENT; BID; LETTER.

An offer must be communicated, but in many classes of contracts it need not be made to an ascertained person: as, auction sales; an offer of a reward (whether the service must have been rendered after knowledge of the offer of a reward is unsettled; see Ans. Contr. *24); an advertisement in railroad time-tables; letters of credit; offers to receive subscriptions for stocks or bonds. An offer of a stock of goods for sale on bids is not such an offer that a person who makes the highest bid is entitled to them (L. R. 5 C. P. 561). An offer may be determined:—by lapse of a specified time; by lapse of a reasonable time for accepting; by failure to comply with the terms of the offer as to the mode of acceptance; by the death of either party before acceptance; by revocation before acceptance; Hollingsworth, Contr. 11.

OFFERINGS. See OBVENTIO.

OFFICE. A right to exercise a public function or employment, and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it. Shelf. Mortm. 797; Cruise, Dig. Index; 3 S. & R. 149. An office is a public charge or employment; 2 Brock. 102, per Marshall, C. J. An office may exist without an incumbent: 28 Cal. 382.

Judicial offices are those which relate to the administration of justice, and which should be exercised by persons of sufficient skill and experience in the duties which appertain to them.

Military offices are such as are held by soldiers and sailors for military purposes.

Ministerial offices are those which give the officer no discretion as to the matter to be done, and require him to obey the mandates of a superior. 7 Mass. 280. See 5 Wend. 170; 10 id. 514; 8 Vt. 512; 1 Ill. 280; 12 Ind. 569. It is a general rule that a judicial office cannot be exercised by deputy, while a ministerial may.

Political offices are such as are not connected immediately with the administration of justice or the execution of the mandates of a superior officer: the offices of the president of the United States, of the heads of departments, of the members of the legislature, are of this number.

In the United States, all offices, according to the above definition, are public; but in another sense employments of a private nature are also called offices: for example, the office of president of a bank, the office of director of a corporation. For the incompatibility of office, see INCOMPATIBILITY; OFFICER.

See, generally, 3 Kent 362; MANDAMUS; QUO WARRANTO.

For word "office" as used of a place for transacting public business, see 6 Cush. 181. See, as to tenure of office, R. S. §§ 1767–1775. See RANK.

OFFICE-BOOK. A book kept in a public office, not appertaining to a court, authorized by the law of any state.

An exemplification of any such office-book, when authenticated under the act of congress of 27th March, 1804, is to have such faith and credit given to it in every court and office within the United States as such exemplification has by law or usage in the courts or offices of the state from whence the same has been taken. See FOREIGN LAWS; FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

OFFICE-COPY. A transcript of a record or proceeding filed in an office established by law, certified under the seal of the proper officer.

A copy made by an officer of the court, bound by law to make it, is equivalent to an exemplification, though it is sometimes called an "office copy"; Steph. Dig. Ev. Art. 77. Copies of public records, whether judicial or otherwise, made by a public officer authorized by law to make them, are often termed "office copies," e. g. copies of recorded deeds; 74 Me. 127.

A copy made by an officer of the court, who is authorized to make it by a rule of court, but not required by law to make it, is equivalent to an exemplification in the same cause and court, but in other causes or courts is not admissible unless it can be proved as an examined copy; Steph. Dig. Ev. Art. 78. These are called "office copies"; 6 Barb. 130. Office copies are said to be secondary evidence; Steph. Dig. Ev.

OFFICE FOUND. In English Law. When an inquisition is made to the king's use of anything, by virtue of office of him who inquires, and the inquisition is found, it is said to be office found. See 100 U. S. 212, 484; INQUEST OF OFFICE.

OFFICE GRANT. See GRANT.

OFFICE OF A JUDGE. In English Law. A criminal suit in an ecclesiastical court, not being directed to the reparation of a private injury, is regarded as a proceeding emanating from the office of the judge, and may be instituted by the mere motion of the judge. But in practice these suits are instituted by private individuals, with the permission of the judge or his surrogate: and the private prosecutor in any such case is, accordingly, said to promote the office of the judge. Coote's Eccl. Practice; Moz. & W.

OFFICER. One who is lawfully invested with an office.

An office is a public charge or employment; and one who performs the duties of an office is an officer. Marshall, C. J., in 2 Brock. 102.

Executive officers are those whose duties are mainly to cause the laws to be executed.

Legislative officers are those whose duties relate mainly to the enactment of laws, such as members of congress and of the several state legislatures. These officers are confined in their duties by the constitution generally to make laws, though sometimes, in cases of impeachment, one of the houses of the legislature exercises judicial functions somewhat similar to those of a grand jury, by presenting to the other articles of impeachment, and the other house acts as a court in trying such impeachment.

Judicial officers are those whose duties are to decide controversies between individuals, and accusations made in the name of the public against persons charged with violations of the law.

Ministerial officers are those whose duty it is to execute the mandates, lawfully issued, of their superiors.

Military officers are those who have command in the army. Non-commissioned officers are not officers in the sense in which that word is generally used; 16 Ct. Cls. 214.

Naval officers are those who are in command in the navy.

Officers are also divided into public officers and those who are not public. Some officers may bear both characters: for example, a clergyman is a public officer when he acts in the performance of such a public duty as the marriage of two individuals; 4 Conn. 209; and he is merely a private person when he acts in his more ordinary calling of teaching his congregation. See 4 Conn. 134; 18 Me. 155.

Officers are required to exercise the functions which belong to their respective offices. The neglect to do so may in some cases, subject the offender to an indictment; 1 Yeates 519; and in others he will be liable to the party injured; 1 Yeates 506.

Public office in the constitution means a permanent public trust or employment, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental; 71 N. Y. 238. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emoluments, and duties; 6 Wall. 385; but it has been held that duration and salary are not of the essence of public office, and that the duty of acting for and on behalf of the state constitutes an office; 68 N. C. 497; even though it expires as soon as a single act is done; 66 N. C. 59. The true test is that it is a parcel of the administration of government; 86 N. C. 241; though it is a clerkship in a department and the duties are confined within narrow limits; 8 Cal. 39; the term includes all persons in any public station or employment conferred by government; id. 39. It is said to depend upon the greater importance and dignity of the position; the requirement of an oath and perhaps of a bond, and usually upon the tenure; 40 Mich. 673. Officers of the United States are those nominated by the president and confirmed by the senate or those who are appointed under an act of congress, by the president alone, a court of law, or a head of a department; 99 U. S. 508; see 124 U. S. 303. The notification of the secretary of the navy is a valid appointment as a passed assistant surgeon; 95 U. S. 762. It is generally true that a relation arising out of a contract and dependent for its duration and extent upon the terms thereof is never considered an office; 36 Miss. 273; 2 Brock. 102. Not every employment under the government is an office; 2 Brock. 96. The distinction between officer and placeman is that the former must take an oath of office, the latter not; 63 N. C. 199.

Who are officers. The following have been held to be officers: All persons entrusted with the receipt of public money; 74 Pa. 124; the receiver of a national bank; 2 Ben. 303; clerks in an executive department of the federal government; 10 Ct. Cl. 426; a collector of city taxes, within the bankruptcy act of 1841; 7 Metc. 152; a representative in a state legislature; 2 N. H. 246 (see infra); members of the boards of public safety and public works; secretaries of such boards; assistant bailiff of the police court; and the stenographer of the said court, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that the salaries of public officers shall be neither increased nor diminished during their term of office; 36 S. W. Rep. (Kan.) 944; a notary public, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that any public officer who shall travel on a free pass shall forfeit his office; 32 N. Y. Supp. 108, affirmed in 145 N. Y. 434; a representative in congress; 77 N. Y. 503; a selectman; 53 N. H. 610; the president of a city council; 45 Ohio St. 196; a city superintendent of streets; 106 Mo. 488; an assistant of the board of aldermen; 3 Hun 680; a deputy county clerk; 39 N. J. Eq. 126; a county solicitor duly elected; 126 Pa. 48; a notary public; 15 Ala. 72; a passed assistant surgeon in the navy; 95 U. S. 760; a cadet engineer, a graduate of the naval academy; 116 U. S. 483; a clerk appointed by an assistant treasurer; 6 Wall. 385; a postmaster; 22 Cal. 336; judges and members of a state senate and house and state directors in corporations; 66 N. C. 59; justices of the peace; 73 Cal. 487; attendants of courts; 83 N. Y. 372; a marshal of the United States; 4 Woods 592; a deputy marshal; 17 Fed. Rep. 150; a sheriff; 63 N. C. 199; 33 Conn. 109; a deputy state treasurer; 41 Ia. 593; an additional paymaster in the army; 6 Wall. 244; trustees of the state university and directors of a state institution for the deaf and dumb, penitentiary, etc.; 68 N. C. 457; the superintendent of a county penitentiary; 11 How. Pr. 240; the medical superintendent of a hospital for the insane; 29 Ohio St. 347; trustees of a state library; 30 Cal. 160; a deputy constable; 90 Mo. 369. As to a policeman, see 45 Conn. 191; 30 Hun 396; 113 Pa. 395; a fire marshal; 49 N. Y. S. 1096. See 63 N. C. 9, where a long list of public officers is given.

It has been said that members of the bar are "public officers and ministers of justice;" Barn. Ch. 478; see also 22 N. Y. 67 (which gives a very learned argument by Prof. Dwight); 2 Cow. 13; contra, 20 Johns. 492; 7 Porter (Ala.) 293; 24 Cal. 241. An attorney-at-law is not, indeed, in the strictest sense a public officer, but he comes very near it; 131 Mass. 376, citing 6 Md. 18; 7 Wall. 364.

The following have been held not to be officers:—A special deputy sheriff; 41 Ala. 399; a civil surgeon appointed by the commissioner of pensions to examine applicants for pensions; 99 U. S 508; a lamp inspector; 130 N. Y. 394; a paymaster's clerk in the navy; 124 U. S. 303; a United States agent of fortifications; 2 Brock. 102; the keeper of a county jail; 39 Fed. Rep. 599; the chief clerk in a city assessor's office; 40 Mich. 673; a mail carrier; 17 Gratt. 243 (contra, 13 Ohio 523); an agent appointed by a state to receive an extradited person; 111 U. S. 624; patrolmen on the police force of a city; 30 Hun 396 (semble); firemen of cities and villages; 32 N. Y. 377; 57 Ohio St. 15; a pilot; 66 Ga. 503; a night watchman of a post-office building; 89 N. C. 133; members of the legislature; 63 N. C. 199. Nine-tenths of the employes of the United States government are said not to be officers; 99 U. S. 509. County commissioners are not officers for the purpose of impeachment; 167 Mass. 559.

See on this subject, 17 L. R. A. 243.

Public officers are public agents or trustees and have no proprietary interest or property in their office beyond the lawful term and salary (if any) prescribed. Their official rights and duties may be changed at the discretion of the legislature during their term of office; R. M. Charlt. 397; but it has been held that a clerk's office, to be held during good behavior, and many other public offices are, under certain limitations, the subject of property; 4 Dev. (N. C.) 18; the emoluments are private property; id.

The profits of a public office cannot be assigned for the benefit of creditors; 8 Cl. & F. 295.

The buying and selling of offices was forbidden by 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 15, under which it has been held that an officer having a certain salary or certain annual profits may make a deputation of it, reserving a sum not exceeding the amount of his profits, or the deputy may lawfully agree to pay so much out of the uncertain fees of an office; but if the office have uncertain fees or profits, an agreement by the deputy to pay a fixed sum annually is a sale within the statute; and so is an agreement to give the deputy all the profits; 3 Kent 456; see 9 Wend. 175.

An agreement by an applicant for an office to divide the fees with another applicant if the latter withdraw his application for it, is void; 4 Comst. 449; so is a contract for the sale of an office; 51 Mich. 524; whether made by the appointing power or the incumbent; 18 Ind. 390. An agreement for compensation for procuring the appointment or resignation of a public officer is void; 20 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 733. So is the sale by the owners of a vessel of the position of master; 2 B. & C. 661; and the promises of a stockholder that he will secure to the buyer of his stock the office of treasurer; 120 Mass. 501.

The tenure of office is never more permanent than during good behavior; 3 Kent 454; if not protected by the constitution, it may be changed by the legislature; 165 Pa. 284; but its term cannot be extended when fixed by the constitution; 44 Ohio St. 589. In England, servants of the crown, civil as well as military, except in special cases otherwise provided by law, hold their office only during the pleasure of the crown; [1896] 1 Q. B. 116, 121.

When an officer is protected in his office from removal, except for cause to be ascertained and adjudged upon a hearing of a judicial nature, his removal without such hearing is contrary to law, although at such hearing as was held he made no objection; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1241 (Ct. of App. N. Y.).

The right to appoint to a public office, when no term of office is fixed by law, carries with it as an incident the absolute power of removal at any time, without notice or charges or hearing; 66 N. W. Rep. (N. D.) 234.

The suspension of an officer by the governor does not deny him the equal protection of the laws because the governor refuses to produce to him the evidence against him, or to confront him with his accusers. He is not entitled to a jury trial; 169 U. S. 586.

An officer cannot be removed from office during his second term for a violation of duty committed during his first term; 40 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 435.

The power to remove a corporate officer for reasonable and just cause is one of the common-law incidents of all corporations; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 179; 89 N. C. 187; but not for pre-existing cause affecting his capacity to hold the office; id.

The act of a de facto officer is binding on the public; 159 U. S. 596. Persons coming into a public office to transact business, who find a person in charge of it, are not bound to ascertain his authority so to act. To them he is an officer de facto, and so far as they are concerned, de jure; 164 U. S. 657; though there was no power to appoint him; 37 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 732. A municipal corporation who has paid a salary to a de facto officer who has performed the duties of an office while the right to it was in litigation, cannot be held liable therefor again to one who may thereafter establish his title to the office: 68 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 308: the remedy is against the de facto officer; id.; 20 Kan. 298. See 68 N. Y. 279; but see 12 Heisk. 499; 53 Ill. 428; 28 Cal. 21. It is no defence to a prosecution for bribery that the act under which the officer was bribed was unconstitutional; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 999. See DE FACTO.

Where the settlement of a question involves the exercise of discretion and judgment, the duty is not ministerial and is beyond the review of the judicial department; 37 U. S. App. 71.

A town collector is responsible as a debtor and not merely as a bailee; 1 Den. 233. It is the policy of public laws to hold all receivers of public money to a very strict accountability; 15 Wall. 346. The obligation to keep safely the public money was said to be absolute, without any condition express or implied; 3 How. 587; but this was considered in 15 Wall. 347, as being too generally expressed, the court intimating there that loss of funds under special circumstances, as by an earthquake, would probably exonerate the official. In the same case it was said that it appears from all the cases (except that in 1 Den. 233) that the official bond of an officer is regarded as laying the foundation of a more stringent responsibility; but the court held that the forcible seizure by the rebel authorities in 1861 of public moneys in the hands of a loyal government agent, against his will and without fault on his part, was a discharge from his obligation in reference to such moneys, three judges dissented.

The responsibility of a public officer is determined, not by the law of bailment, but by the condition of his bond; 3 Pa. 372.

Where public money is lost by the failure of a bank; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 427; (contra, 151 N. Y. 135;) or a city treasurer is robbed; 113 Cal. 205; (contra, 44 Minn. 427;) the official being free from fault is not liable; but in 44 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 125, an officer was held liable for the safety of public moneys, lost in an insolvent bank, even though he was not negligent; and in New York the liability is very strictly maintained; 151 N. Y. 135. The weight of authority seems to be in favor of a strict accountability; 48 Neb. 1; 14 Wash. 117.

Where a subordinate officer takes the place of his superior in the case of death or disability, he is entitled to the same salary; 45 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 243.

There is no federal statute expressly bearing upon removals from office, except § 13 of the act of January 16, 1883—the Civil Service Act, relating to removal, etc., by reason of giving or refusing political contributions. The civil service rules of the executive are but regulations imposed by him upon his own actions or those of heads of departments, and do not confer upon an employe any property right in his office; 84 Fed. Rep. 551. Equity has no jurisdiction over the appointment and removal of public officers, whether the power is vested in executive or administrative boards or officers, or in a judicial tribunal; jurisdiction belongs exclusively to courts of law; 171 U. S. 366.

Equity has no jurisdiction over the appointment or removal of public officers; the jurisdiction belongs exclusively to courts of law; 124 U. S. 200; 54 Ala. 320; 151 Ill. 41; 119 Ind. 481. But equity will prevent a breach of trust affecting public franchises, or some illegal act, under color or claim of right, affecting injuriously the property rights of individuals, and falling under one of the acknowledged heads of equity jurisprudence; 55 N. Y. 390; 84 Fed. Rep. 554; and it is said that equity will protect the position of officers de facto against the interference of adverse claimants; High, Inj. § 1315; as by enjoining the dispossession of an officer, by force and unlawfully, and compelling the defendant to resort to a remedy at law; 84 Fed. Rep. 555.

The president may remove a district attorney within four years of his appointment; 167 U. S. 324; where the history of the question is reviewed. By the repeal (act of 1887) of the Tenure of Office Act, congress intended to concede to the president the power of removal, if it ever took it from him; id.

In the absence of constitutional or statutory regulation, the power of appointment carries with it, as an incident, the power of removal; 13 Pet. 230; 167 U. S. 324; 84 Fed. Rep. 552.

The Civil Service Act of 1891 is constitutional; 83 Fed. Rep. 578.

Department regulations cannot enlarge or restrict the liability of an officer on his bond; 81 Fed. Rep. 684.

The postmaster-general, when in the discharge of his duties, is not liable for damages on account of official communications made by him within those duties, by reason of any personal motive that might be alleged to have prompted his action; 161 U. S. 483.

The United States is not liable for the non-feasance or misfeasance or neglect of its officers; 141 U. S. 573.

A person holding two different federal offices cannot draw pay for both for the same period; 10 Ct. Cl. 426.

Congress cannot exercise the power of appointment to office; 147 U. S. 282. It may vest in the president the power to appoint a vice-consul; 169 U. S. 331.

The act, however tortious, of an executive officer of a court, done under color of its process, is to be regarded as a proceeding of the court, with which courts of concurrent jurisdiction will not interfere; 16 U. S. App. 325.

An act directing the employment of veterans in the labor service of the commonwealth, etc., in preference to other persons, if such veterans are qualified for the work, is constitutional; 166 Mass. 589, three judges dissenting.

One who accepts an office incompatible with one already held, ipso facto vacates the first office; 69 N. W. Rep. 82; 76 Hun 146. Where the mayor of Detroit was elected governor of Michigan, it was held that he thereby vacated the former office; 70 N. W. Rep. 450. In Louisiana a constitutional officer may also hold a municipal office; 25 La. Ann. 188. See OFFICE.

A woman is eligible to the office of court clerk where there is no provision expressly requiring such clerk to be a man, though the word "he" is used in the constitution of the state in declaring who is eligible to office; 39 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 270.

The officers of a corporation are not, as regards their criminal liability, a single person in respect to corporate acts, and therefore they may be guilty of conspiracy; 44 N. Y. Supp. 336. A college professor is not an officer but an employee; 21 Pa. 525.

The word "vacant" has no technical nor peculiar meaning; it means empty, unoccupied; as applied to an office—without an incumbent. An existing office without an incumbent is vacant, whether it be an old or a new one; 7 Ind. 320. Where a new office has been created and has not been filled, a vacancy exists; 5 Nev. 111; 7 Ind. 326; but see 51 Miss. 28. Where a newly appointed officer fails to qualify as required by law, there is usually not a vacancy, if, by law, the last incumbent holds over; 44 Ohio St. 589; but it has been held that in such case there is a vacancy; 34 La. Ann. 273; and so where the last incumbent has no authority to hold over; 1 id. N. S. 753.

Statutory provisions requiring a bond and oath of office are usually only directory; it will suffice if the oath be taken and the bond given before a vacancy has been declared; 33 Ala. 674; 95 Ill. 249, 593; but see 52 N. Y. 374; 77 Va. 265; 14 Fla. 277. See 16 L. R. A. 140.

At common law, the refusal of a public officer to accept office was indictable; 4 Term 778; such is still the rule; 145 Ill. 573. Mandamus will lie to compel a person to enter upon the discharge of the duties of an office; 103 U. S. 471; 145 Ill. 573.

A public officer may resign, but not till he has qualified; 25 Cal. 94. A resignation, in the absence of any statute, should be tendered to the officer or body authorized to act in filling the vacancy; 103 U. S. 471. The resignation of a public officer is not complete till acceptance; 103 U. S. 471; 87 Va. 689; 31 N. J. L. 107; contra, 49 Ala. 402; 3 Nev. 566; 12 Ia. 405; 77 N. Y. 378.

An unaccepted offer to resign may be withdrawn; 10 Ind. 62; 32 Kan. 191; and even without the consent of the person accepting; 10 Ind. 62; but not after acceptance; 45 Ind. 105; 14 Q. B. Div. 908; 49 Ala. 402. See 36 Am. St. Rep. 523; 25 L. R. A. 613.

Term of office means "a fixed and definite period of time;" 30 Am. & E. Corp. Cas. 351. When no time is mentioned in the law from which the term of office begins, it runs from the date of election; 7 Ohio 7.

Officers who are compelled to rely upon and act through subordinate officers and employers are not ordinarily responsible to the government for their misfeasance or non-feasance; 52 N. Y. Supp. 197.

OFFICER DE FACTO. One who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law; 6 East 360. See OFFICER.

OFFICIAL. In Old Civil Law. The person who was the minister of, or attendant upon, a magistrate.

In Canon Law. The person to whom the bishop generally commits the charge of his spiritual jurisdiction bears this name. Wood, Inst. 30, 505; Merlin, Répert.

OFFICIAL SOLICITOR TO THE COURT OF CHANCERY. An officer in England whose function is to protect the suitors' fund, and to administer under the direction of the court, so much of it as comes under the spending power of the court.

OFFICIAL TRUSTEES OF CHARITIES. Charity commissioners in England, created by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137, and amended by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 24.

OFFICIAL USE. An active use before the statute of uses, which imposed some duty on the legal owner or feoffee to uses, as a conveyance to A with directions for him to sell the estate and distribute the proceeds amongst B, C, and D. To enable A to perform this duty he had the legal possession of the estate to be sold. Wharton.

OFFICIARIIS NON FACIENDIS VEL AMOVENDIS. A writ addressed to the magistrates of a corporation, requiring them not to make such a man an officer, or to put one out of the office he has, until inquiry is made of his manners, etc. Reg. Orig. 126.

OFFICINA JUSTITIÆ. The workshop or office of justice. In English Law. The chancery was formerly so called, because all writs issued from it, under the great seal, returnable into the courts of common law. See CHANCERY.

OFFICIO, EX, OATH OF. An oath whereby a person might be obliged to make any presentment of any crime or offence, or to confess or accuse himself of any criminal matter whereby he might be liable to any censure, penalty, or punishment. 3 Bla. Com. 447.

OFFICIOUS WILL. A testament by which a testator leaves his property to his family. Sand. Just. Inst. 207.

OFFSET. See SET-OFF.

OFFSPRING. The word offspring in its proper and natural sense extends to any degree of lineal descendants and has the same meaning as issue. 32 L. J. Ch. 373.

OHIO. One of the states of the American Union.

Massachusetts, Connecticut and Virginia claimed, under their respective charters, the territory lying northwest of the river Ohio. At the solicitation of the continental congress, these claims were, soon after the close of the war of independence, ceded to the United States. Virginia, however, reserved the ownership of the soil of three million seven hundred thousand acres between the Scioto and the Little Miami rivers, for military bounties to the soldiers of her line who had served in the revolutionary war; and Connecticut reserved three million six hundred and sixty-six thousand acres in northern Ohio, now usually called the "Western Reserve." The history of these reservations, and of the several "purchases" under which land-titles have been acquired in various parts of the state, will be found in Albachi's Annals of the West, in the Preliminary Sketch of the History of Ohio, in the first volume of Chase's Statutes of Ohio, and in Swan's Land Laws of Ohio. The conflicting titles of the states having been extinguished, congress, on July 13, 1787, passed the celebrated ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio. 1 Curw. Rev. Stat. of Ohio 86. It provided for the equal distribution of the estates of intestates among their children, gave the widow dower as at common law, regulated the execution of wills and deeds, secured perfect religious toleration, the right of trial by jury, judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, security against cruel and unusual punishments, the right of reasonable bail, the inviolability of contracts and of private property, and declared that "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

These provisions have been, in substance, incorporated into the constitution and laws of Ohio, as well as of the other states which have since been formed within "the territory." The ordinance has been held to be a mere temporary statute, which was abrogated by the adoption of the constitution of the United States. 1 McLean 336; 3 id. 226; 3 How. 212, 589; 10 id. 82, 232. See ORDINANCE OF 1787.

On the 30th of October, 1802, congress passed an act making provision for the formation of a state constitution, under which, in 1803, Ohio was admitted into the Union, under the name of "the State of Ohio." This constitution was never submitted to a vote of the people. It continued to be the organic law of Ohio until September 1, 1851, when it was abrogated by the adoption of the present constitution.

The bill of rights which forms a part of this constitution contains the provisions common to such instruments in the constitutions of the different states. Such are the prohibitions against any laws impairing the right of peaceably assembling to consult for the common good, to bear arms, to have a trial by jury, to worship according to the dictates of one's own conscience, to have the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, to be allowed reasonable bail, to be exempt from excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishment, not to be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, to have a copy of the indictment, the aid of counsel, compulsory process for witnesses, a speedy and public trial, to be privileged from testifying against one's self, or from being twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. Provision is also made against the existence of slavery, against transporting offenders out of the state, against imprisonment for debt unless in cases of fraud, against granting hereditary honors, against quartering soldiers in private houses, for the security of persons from unreasonable arrest or searches, and for the freedom of speech and the press.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is lodged in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives.

The Senate is composed of thirty-five members, elected biennially, one in each of the senatorial districts into which the state is divided, for the term of two years. Senators must have resided in their respective districts one year next before election, unless absent on business of the state or the United States.

The House of Representatives is composed of one hundred members, elected biennially, one in each of the representative districts of the state, for the term of two years. A representative must have resided one year next preceding the election in the county or district for which he is elected. No person can be elected to either house who holds office under the United States or an office of profit under the state. Provision is made for re-districting the state every ten years from 1851.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.—The Governor is elected biennially, for the term of two years from the second Monday of January next following his election, and until his successor is qualified.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Court consists of five judges, elected by the people for five years. The judges are so classified that one goes out of office each year. It has original jurisdiction over writs of quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, and procedendo, and a large appellate jurisdiction by writs of error from inferior courts. It may issue writs of error and certiorari in any criminal case, and a supersedeas in any case, and all writs, not provided for, which are necessary to enforce the administration of justice. Writs of error, certiorari, habeas corpus, and supersedeas may be issued by the judge in vacation.

The Circuit Court consists of three judges in each circuit, who hold their office for a period of six years. The state is divided into eight judicial circuits. A majority of the judges is necessary for a quorum. It has like original jurisdiction with the Supreme Court, and on good cause shown, may issue writs of supersedeas in any case, and all other writs not specially provided for, nor prohibited by statute.

The Court of Common Pleas, under the constitution of 1851, was originally composed of three judges, elected by the people in each of the nine districts into which the state was divided, for the term of five years. Each of these nine districts was divided into three parts, following county lines, and as nearly equal as possible; and in each of these subdistricts one judge was elected. The general assembly may increase or diminish the number of judges in any district, and may alter the number of districts, and has in several districts increased the number of judges, and has increased the number of districts to ten. Courts of common pleas are to be held by one or more of these judges; and more than one common pleas court may be held in the district at the same time. This court has original jurisdiction of all civil causes where the matter in controversy exceeds one hundred dollars, and a service, personal or by attachment of property, can be made in the county or where the property in question is situated in the county. This court has also almost exclusively the criminal jurisdiction, with the exception of a petty jurisdiction exercised in some instances by local police courts. It has a supervisory jurisdiction in cases of distribution of decedent's property or the probate courts. It exercises appellate jurisdiction also of cases brought from justices of the peace and all other inferior judicial tribunals.

A Probate Court is held in each county by a probate judge, elected for three years by the people of the county. This court has jurisdiction in probate and testamentary matters.

Superior Courts have been established in Cincinnati, whose jurisdiction in civil causes is concurrent with the courts of common pleas within its territorial limits. The court consists of three judges. Its decisions are supervised by the supreme court, by writ of error allowed by that court, or by one of its judges in vacation.

Justices of the Peace, under certain restrictions, have exclusive jurisdiction of any sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, and concurrent jurisdiction with the court of common pleas in any sum over one hundred dollars, and not exceeding three hundred dollars.

Jurisprudence.—The common law of England is the basis of the civil law of this state, modified by the judicial rejection of that part which is "inapplicable to the condition of the people of Ohio."

The criminal law of the state is wholly statutory, and there are no offences recognized as common-law offences. The formal distinction between actions at law and in equity is abolished. Actions are brought by a petition stating the facts of the case.

OIL. Petroleum or rock oil is a mineral substance obtained from the earth by process of mining, and the land from which it is obtained is called mining land; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 399; 110 Pa. 313. It is a part of the realty; id.; 88 Pa. 198. But it is held that a reservation of "all timber suitable for sawing, also all minerals," will not include petroleum, the ordinary meaning of the word mineral overcoming the technical meaning; 101 Pa. 36.

A property owner has a right to drill for oil through a stratum of coal belonging to another; 152 Pa. 286. A contract giving the right to explore for oil, and if any be found, to sink wells, is a license only; 55 Pa. 164. A lease of land with the right to bore for oil is a lease and not a sale of the oil; 129 Pa. 94.

Oil produced from wells on lands leased for oil purposes during the owner's life is income; 138 Pa. 606. Where a life tenant united with a remainder-man in a leasing new oil territory, the court appointed a trustee to hold and invest the royalties and pay the income to the life tenant, and at her death, the principal to the remainderman; 174 Pa. 425. A life tenant cannot lease new oil territory, never operated before her title accrued; 179 Pa. 371.

When oil reaches a well and is produced at the surface, it becomes personal property; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 399. As to whether one holding oil on storage who converts it to his use is guilty of larceny as bailee, see 82 Pa. 472.

See Bryan, Petroleum and Natural Gas; as to oil leases, see 31 L. R. A. 673; as to liability for rent on oil leases, see 33 L. R. A. 847; as to assignment of an oil lease, see 34 L. R. A. 62. See NATURAL GAS; EMINENT DOMAIN; PIPE LINES; MINES AND MINING; WASTE.

OKLAHOMA. One of the territories of the United States.

It includes all that portion of the United States known as the Indian Territory, except so much of the same as is actually occupied by the five civilized tribes, and the Indian tribes within the Quapaw Indian Agency, and except the unoccupied part of the Cherokee outlet, together with that portion of the United States known as the Public Land Strip. Whenever the interest of the Cherokee Indians in the land known as the Cherokee outlet shall have been extinguished, and the President shall make proclamation thereof, the outlet will become a part of the Territory of Oklahoma.

The legislative power is vested in the governor and legislative assembly. The legislative assembly consists of a council and house of representatives; the former has thirteen members, whose term of service is two years, while the latter is composed of twenty-six members, with a like term of service. The sessions of the legislative assembly are biennial. The legislative power extends to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States.

The executive power is vested in a governor, who holds his office for four years, or until his successor is appointed or qualified, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States.

The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. The supreme court consists of a chief justice and two associate justices. The Territory is divided into three judicial districts, and a district court is held in each county in said district thereof by one of the justices of the supreme court.

The governor, secretary, chief justice and associate justices, attorney and marshal, are appointed by the President of the United States. See 1 Supp. Rev. Stat. U. S. 790 et seq.

OLD NATURA BREVIUM. The title of an English book, so called to distinguish it from Fitzherbert's work entitled Natura Brevium. It contains the writs most in use in the reign of Edward III., together with a short comment on the application and properties of each of them.

OLD STYLE. The mode of reckoning time in England until the year 1752, when the New Style, at present in use, and which had prevailed in the Roman Catholic countries of the continent since 1582, was introduced. According to the O. S., the year commenced on the 25th of March and every fourth year was a leap-year, instead of, as now, but 97 leap years in 400 years; Moz. & W.

OLD TENURES. The title of a small tract, which, as its title denotes, contains an account of the various tenures by which land was holden in the reign of Edward III. This tract was published in 1719, with notes and additions, with the eleventh edition of the First Institutes, and reprinted in 8vo in 1764, by Sergeant Hawkins, in a selection of Coke's Law Tracts.

OLEOMARGARINE. Artificial butter made out of animal fat, milk, and other substances; imitation butter. Anderson's L. Dict.

Oleomargarine is a recognized article of food and commerce, and being thus a lawful article of commerce it cannot be wholly excluded from importation into a state from another state where it was manufactured, though the former state may so regulate the introduction as to insure purity, without having the power totally to exclude it; 171 U. S. 1.

The New Hampshire Act prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine unless it is of a pink color is invalid as being, in necessary effect, prohibitory. The act is not an inspection law, it provides for no inspection, and apparently none was intended. It is an absolute prohibition of the sale of an article of commerce; 171 U. S. 30.

The Massachusetts Act of March 10th, 1891, "to prevent deception in the manufacture and sale of imitation butter," in its application to the sales of oleomargarine artificially colored and brought into Massachusetts, is in conflict with the commerce clause of the federal constitution; 155 U. S. 461.

The legislature of a state has the power to determine, as a matter of state policy, whether to permit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine within the state or entirely to forbid the same, so long as the legislation is confined to the manufacture and sale within the state; 127 U. S. 678, explained in 171 U. S. 16.

Under its taxing power and in connection with the internal revenue system, congress has passed a law defining butter and oleomargarine and imposing a tax upon and regulating the sale, etc., of oleomargarine. See 144 U. S. 677.

In many of the states the manufacture and sale of this substance are prohibited by statute, unless made in a specified form and in such manner as will inform the buyer as to its real character.

In England, all packages must be marked, as must each parcel exposed for sale. See [1895] 2 Q. B. 657.

See ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

OLERON, LAWS OF. See CODE.

OLIGARCHY (Gr. ὀλίγος and ἀρχή. The government of a few). A name given to designate the power which a few citizens of a state have usurped, which ought by the constitution to reside in the people. Among the Romans, the government degenerated several times into an oligarchy,—for example, under the decemvirs, when they became the only magistrates in the commonwealth. See GOVERNMENT.

OLOGRAPH. A term which signifies that an instrument is wholly written by the party. See La. Civ. Code, art. 1581; Code Civ. 970; 5 Toullier, n. 357; 1 Stu. Low. C. 327. See TESTAMENT; WILL; Beach, Wills 16.

OMISSION. The neglect to perform what the law requires.

When a public law enjoins on certain officers duties to be performed by them for the public, and they omit to perform them, they may be indicted: for example, supervisors of the highways are required to repair the public roads: the neglect to do so will render them liable to be indicted.

When a nuisance arises in consequence of an omission, it cannot be abated, if it be a private nuisance, without giving notice, when such notice can be given. See COMMISSION; NUISANCE.

OMNIA PERFORMAVIT (Lat. he has done all). In Pleading. A good plea in bar where all the covenants are in the affirmative. 1 Me. 189.

OMNIBUS. For all; containing two or more independent matters. Applied to a count in a declaration, and to a bill of legislation, and perhaps to a clause in a will, which comprises more than one general subject. 64 Pa. 428; 14 Md. 193. See IN OMNIBUS.

OMNIUM (Lat.). In Mercantile Law. A term used to express the aggregate value of the different stock in which a loan is usually funded. 2 Esp. 361; 7 Term 630.

ON. As denoting contiguity or neighborhood, it may denote near to as well as at; 45 Mo. 349; and has been held to be interchangeable with upon. 19 Wall. 264; 85 Va. 128. It is not equivalent to immediately on; 12 Kan. 25.

ON ACCOUNT OF WHOM IT MAY CONCERN, FOR WHOM IT MAY CONCERN. A clause in policies of insurance, under which all are insured who have an insurable interest at the time of effecting the insurance and who were then contemplated by the party effecting the insurance. 2 Pars. Marit. Law 30.

ON ALL FOURS. A phrase used to express the idea that a case at bar is in all points similar to another. The one is said to be on all fours with the other when the facts are similar and the same questions of law are involved. See IN OMNIBUS.

ON BEHALF. Where security is to be given on behalf of a person it cannot be given by the person himself. L. R. 4 C. P. 235.

ON BOARD. A devise of goods on board a ship may pass goods on board at the date of the will, but afterwards removed. 1 Ves. Sen. 271.

ON CALL. There is no legal difference between an obligation payable "on demand" and one payable "on call." 22 Gratt. 609.

ON DEMAND. A promissory note payable on demand is a present debt and is payable without demand. 39 Me. 494. It is payable the instant the note is signed; no demand is necessary prior to bringing an action; 2 M. & W. 461; 29 L. J. Ex. 377; 34 Ch. D. 566.

ONE MAN COMPANY. See PROMOTERS.

ONERANDO PRO RATA PORTIONIS. A writ that lay for a joint tenant, or tenant in common, who was distrained for more rent than his proportion of the land came to. Reg. Orig. 182.

ONERARI NON (Lat. ought not to be burdened). In Pleading. The name of a plea by which the defendant says that he ought not to be charged. It is used in an action of debt; 1 Saund. 290, n. a.

ONERATIO. A lading; a cargo.

ONERIS FERENDI (Lat. of bearing a burden). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude by which the wall or pillar of one house is bound to sustain the weight of the buildings of the neighbor.

The owner of the servient building is bound to repair and keep it sufficiently strong for the weight it has to bear. Dig. 8. 2. 23.

ONEROUS CAUSE. In Civil Law. A valuable consideration.

ONEROUS CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One made for a consideration given or promised, however small. La. Civ. Code, art. 1767.

ONEROUS DEED. In Scotch Law. A deed given for valuable consideration. Bell, Dict.; CONSIDERATION.

ONEROUS GIFT. The gift of a thing subject to certain charges imposed by the giver on the donee. Pothier, Obl.

ONEROUS TITLE. Under the Spanish and Mexican law that which was created by a valuable consideration, as the payment of money, the rendition of services, and the like, or by the performance of conditions or payment of charges to which the property was subject. See 13 Cal. 458; 8 La. 433; 20 id. 242.

O. Ni. In the exchequer, when the sheriff made up his account for issues, amerciaments, etc., he marked upon each head O. Ni., which denoted oneratur, nisi habeat sufficientem exonerationem, and presently he became the king's debtor, and a debet was set upon his head; whereupon the parties paravaile became debtors to the sheriff, and were discharged against the king etc., 4 Inst. 116. But sheriffs now account to the commissioners for auditing the public accounts; Whart. Lex.

ONOMASTIC. A term applied to a signature which is in a different handwriting from the body of the instrument. 2 Benth. Jud. Ev. 460.

ON STAND. A term used in the law of landlord and tenant. A tenant of a farm who cannot carry away manure but has the right to sell it to his successor, is said to have the right of on stand on the farm for it till he can sell it; he may maintain trespass for the taking of it by the incoming tenant before it is sold. See 16 East 116.

ONTARIO. A province in the Dominion of Canada. Its government is vested in a Lieutenant-Governor and an Executive Council of seven members. It has one Assembly of ninety members.

Toronto is the seat of government. It has a Supreme Court of Judicature composed of a Chief Justice of Ontario and three justices of appeal, and a high court, consisting of a queen's bench division, common pleas division, and chancery division; each of the first two divisions is presided over by a chief justice and two puisne judges, and the last by a chancellor and three judges.

ONUS EPISCOPALE. Ancient customary payments from the clergy to their diocesan bishop, of synods, pentacostals, etc.

ONUS IMPORTANDI. The charge of importing merchandise, mentioned in 12 Car. II. c. 28.

ONUS PROBANDI (Lat.). In Evidence. The burden of proof.

It is a general rule that the party who alleges the affirmative of any proposition shall prove it. It is also a general rule that the onus probandi lies upon the party who seeks to support his case by a particular fact: for example, when to a plea of infancy the plaintiff replies a promise after the defendant had attained his age, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to prove the promise, and it lies on the defendant to show that he was not of age at the time; 1 Term 648. But where the negative involves a criminal omission by the party, and, consequently, where the law, by virtue of the general principle, presumes his innocence, the affirmative of the fact is also presumed. See 11 Johns. 513; 19 id. 345; 9 Mart. La. 48; 3 Mart. La. N. S. 576. The burden of proof of the want of mental capacity of a person at the time of his marriage is on those asserting it, in the absence of proof of a confirmed condition of lunacy or idiocy prior to such marriage; 159 Pa. 634.

In general, wherever the law presumes the affirmative, it lies on the party who denies the fact to prove the negative; as when the law raises a presumption as to the continuance of life, the legitimacy of children born in wedlock, or the satisfaction of a debt. See, generally, 1 Phil. Ev. 156; 1 Stark. Ev. 376; Rosc. Civ. Ev., 16th ed. 94; Rosc. Cr. Ev., 8th ed. 17; Bull. N. P. 298; 2 Gall. 485; 1 M'Cord 573; 1 Houst. 44; 12 Viner, Abr. 201; Tayl. Ev. 343; 1 Greenl. Ev. 79; Whart. Ev. 353. As to shifting of burden of proof, see, generally, 44 La. Ann. 1043; 44 Mo. App. 141; 90 Tenn. 638.

The party on whom the onus probandi lies is entitled to begin, notwithstanding the technical form of the proceedings; 1 Stark. Ev. 584. See BURDEN OF PROOF; OPENING AND CLOSING; NEGATIVE.

OPEN. To begin. He begins or opens who has the affirmative of an issue. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 74.

To open a case is to make a statement of the pleadings in a case, which is called the opening. This should be concise, very distinct, and perspicuous. Its use is to enable the judge and jury to direct their attention to the real merits of the case and the points in issue; 1 Stark. 439; 2 id. 317.

To vacate; to relieve a party who has an equitable right to such relief against a proceeding which is to him a formal or legal bar; to allow a re-discussion on the merits.

For example, to open a rule of court. 2 Chitty, Bail 265; 5 Taunt. 628; 1 Mann. & G. 555; 7 Ad. & E. 519. To open a judgment or default; 4 R. I. 324; 1 Wisc. 631. See OPENING A JUDGMENT. To open an account: to make a judicial announcement, that a party, e. g. an executor, shall not be absolutely bound by the account he has rendered, but may show that it contains errors to his prejudice. To open a marriage settlement or an estate-tail; i. e. to allow a new settlement of the estate. To open biddings; i. e. to allow a re-sale. See OPENING BIDDINGS. To open a contract; 44 Me. 206; a highway; 37 N. J. L. 14.

OPEN A CREDIT. To accept or pay the draft of a correspondent who has not furnished funds. Pardessus, n. 296.

OPEN ACCOUNT. A running or unsettled account; not completely settled, but subject to future adjustment. 1 Ala. 62; 6 id. 438; 21 La. Ann. 406; 1 Ga. 275; 18 Oregon 414.

OPEN COMMISSION. A commission without written interrogatories issued out of any one of certain courts of record, an issue of fact having been joined in that court, to take the testimony of witnesses, not within the state, but within the United States and Canada; N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 893, 894, 897. The application for an open commission will be denied where there is reason to believe that a commission with interrogatories will develop all the facts bearing upon the case. 17 Weekly Dig. (N. Y.) 17.

OPEN COURT. A court formally opened and engaged in the transaction of all judicial functions. 45 Ia. 501.

A court to which all persons have free access as spectators while they conduct themselves in an orderly manner.

The term is used in the first sense as distinguishing a court from a judge sitting in chambers or informally for the transaction of such matters as may be thus transacted. See CHAMBERS; COURT.

In the second sense, all courts in the United States are open; but in England, formerly, while the parties and probably their witnesses were admitted freely in the courts, all other persons were required to pay in order to obtain admittance. Stat. 13 Edw. I. cc. 42, 44; Barr. on the Stat. 126, 127. See Prin. of Pen. Law 165.

In a trial for criminal assault, the court, in the interest of public morality and to prevent undue publicity, ordered the exclusion of all persons not connected by ties of friendship or blood with the accused or complaining witnesses. Newspaper reporters were also permitted to remain. It was held that the constitutional requirements of a public trial must be interpreted in the broadest sense, and that any restriction of the public's right to be present rendered the trial illegal; Mich. Sup. Ct. 1897, 55 Alb. L. J. 429.

In most of the states the constitution provides that persons accused shall have a speedy public trial; Stimson, Am. Stat. L. § 131. This has been construed to mean that "the doors of the court-room are expected to be kept open, the public are entitled to be admitted, and the trial is to be public in all respects . . . with due regard to the size of the court-room and the conveniences of the court, the right to exclude objectionable characters and youth of tender years, and to do other things which may facilitate the proper conduct of the trial;" 103 Cal. 242; in this case a conviction of assault with intent to commit rape was reversed because against defendant's objection all persons were excluded except the officers of the court and the defendant; id. See 65 Cal. 223. In a trial of a civil case of trespass for adultery the judgment was reversed because all but parties and witnesses were excluded; 86 Me. 80.

Judge Cooley says that the requirement of a public trial is for the benefit of the accused, but it is fairly met if a reasonable number are admitted; Const. Lim. 312.

In California the court may direct the trial of issues of fact in private; Cal. Code, C. P. § 125; but this act does not authorize the court to forbid the publication of the testimony, and when such an order was made judgment of guilty of contempt against a newspaper publisher was reversed; 99 Cal. 526. On a trial for assault with intent to kill, the court-room was cleared and all persons excluded except officers of the court, press reporters, and friends of defendant; the order was made on behalf of defendant, who was liable to be excited by a crowd, as well as to preserve order, and it was held that her right to a public trial was not violated; 14 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 849.

See 15 Am. L. Rev. 427; 89 Mich. 276; s.c. 28 Am. St. R. 294, where the subject is fully discussed. See IN CAMERA.

OPEN ENTRY. See ENTRY.

OPEN FOR BUSINESS. A store is open for business when, according to custom, the door is locked after dark, but customers can get in by knocking. 15 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1034. See INSURANCE.

OPEN INSOLVENCY. The condition of a person having no property, within the reach of the law, applicable to the payment of any debt. 8 Blackf. 305.

OPEN LAW. The waging of law. Magna Charta, c. 21.

OPEN POLICY. An open policy is one in which the amount of the interest of the insured is not fixed by the policy, and is to be ascertained in case of loss. See POLICY.

OPENING. In American Practice. The beginning. The commencement. The first address of the counsel.

The opening is made immediately upon the impanelling of the jury: it embraces the reading of such of the pleadings as may be necessary, and a brief outline of the case as the party expects to prove it, where there is a trial, or of the argument, where it is addressed to the court.

OPENING A RULE. The act of restoring or recalling a rule which has been made absolute to its conditional state, as a rule nisi, so as to re-admit of cause being shown against the rule. Brown.

OPENING A COMMISSION. See COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS.

OPENING AND CLOSING. After the evidence is all in, the plaintiff has the privilege of the opening and closing or summing up speeches to the jury; in the closing address he should confine himself to a reply to defendant's speech. It seems doubtful whether it is within the discretion of the court to interfere with this established mode of procedure; at least it should only be done with great caution; 36 Mich. 254; 32 Ohio 224; 8 Daly 61; 16 West. Jur. 18; 56 N. Y. 402; 87 Ky. 410. But in some courts it is the practice for the defendant's counsel to open to the jury, followed by the plaintiff's counsel. See Best's Right to Begin and Reply; TRIAL.

In English Practice. The address made immediately after the evidence is closed. Such address usually states—first, the full extent of the plaintiff's claims, and the circumstances under which they are made, to show that they are just and reasonable; second, at least an outline of the evidence by which those claims are to be established; third, the legal grounds and authorities in favor of the claim or of the proposed evidence; fourth, an anticipation of the expected defence, and statement of the grounds on which it is futile, either in law or justice, and the reasons why it ought to fail. But the court will sometimes restrict counsel from an anticipation of the defence; 3 Chitty, Pr. 881.

OPENING BIDDINGS. Ordering a re-sale. When estates are sold under decree of equity to the highest bidder, the court will, on notice of an offer of a sufficient advance on the price obtained, open the biddings, i. e. order a re-sale. But this will not generally be done after the confirmation of the certificate of the highest bidder. So, by analogy, a re-sale has been ordered of an estate sold under bankruptcy. Sugd. Vend. 90; 22 Barb. 167; 8 Md. 322; 13 Gratt. 639; 4 Wisc. 242; 31 Miss. 514.

In England, by stat. 30 & 31 Vict. c. 48, s. 7, the opening of biddings is now allowed only in cases of fraud or misconduct in the sale; Wms. R. P. The courts of this country also will not generally open the biddings merely to obtain a higher price, but require irregularity, fraud, or gross inadequacy of price to be shown.

OPENING A JUDGMENT. In Practice. An act of the court by which a judgment is so far annulled that it cannot be executed, although it still retains some qualities of a judgment: as, for example, its binding operation or lien upon the real estate of the defendant.

The opening of the judgment takes place when some person having an interest makes affidavit to facts which, if true, would render the execution of such judgment inequitable. The judgment is opened so as to be in effect an award of a collateral issue to try the facts alleged in the affidavit; 6 W. & S. 498.

The rule to open judgment and let defendant into a defence is peculiar to Pennsylvania practice, and is a clear example of the system of administering equity under common-law forms. By practice it is confined to judgments by default and those entered on warrants of attorney to confess, etc. It was, however, devised in the absence of a court of chancery, as a substitute for a bill in equity, to enjoin proceedings at law; Mitchell's Motions and Rules; 49 Pa. 365; 8 Phila. 553; 2 Watts 379; 6 W. N. C. 484.

OPENING OF A POLICY OF INSURANCE. The question has been made whether, and in what cases, if any, the valuation in a valued policy shall be opened. The valuation, being a part of the agreement of the parties, is not to be set aside as between them in any case. The question is, how shall it be treated where only a part of the subject insured and valued is put at a risk, and also in the settlement of a particular average? and the answer is the same in both cases: viz., when the proportion or rate per centum put at risk or lost is ascertained, the agreed valuation of the whole is to be applied to the part put at risk or the proportion lost, pro rata. 2 Phill. Ins. 1208.

OPERA. See COPYRIGHT.

OPERARI. Such tenants under feudal tenures, as held some portion of land by the duty of performing bodily labor and servile works for their lord.

OPERATING EXPENSES. They are, broadly speaking, those which it is reasonably necessary to incur for the purpose of keeping up a railroad (to which the term is commonly applied) as a going concern, or, as it is sometimes expressed, those which conduce to the conservation of the property. Short, Railw. Bonds § 653.

The term, when used in a reorganization plan, does not include money spent on steel rail betterments, or on steamers owned by the company to make them more efficient, or on the purchase of freight engines and coal cars; 34 Fed. Rep. 582. Under a Massachusetts statute, it was held that damage to property at a railroad crossing must be considered as operating expenses; 124 Mass. 154. See 138 Mass. 122; 124 Mass. 527. Judgments against a receiver for damages to persons by negligence are a part of the operating expenses; 73 Fed. Rep. 112. All outlays made by a receiver in the ordinary course, with a view to advance and promote the business of the road and render it profitable and successful, are fairly within the receiver's discretion; this will include not only keeping the road and rolling stock in repair, but also providing such additional accommodations, stock, and instrumentalities as the necessities of the business may require; 1 Woods 331. The court will authorize the purchase of new rails; 62 Fed. Rep. 771; and the payment of reasonable office rent; 1 Woods 331; and the payment of interest on money which a receiver has been obliged to borrow; id.; and of traffic balances on connecting roads; 64 Ala. 603; and rebates on freight; 1 Woods 331.

Damages paid to the owners of goods lost in transportation and for injury to property during a receivership will be allowed in the receiver's account of earnings; 93 U. S. 352; such claims stand upon the same footing as the other expenses of administration; Short, Railw. Bonds § 669; 62 Miss. 271; 80 N. Y. 458.

Earnings diverted to the payment of interest on receiver's certificates made payable out of the corpus, or to the costs or allowances in the foreclosure suit or any other matter not properly operating expenses, must be returned to the current earnings fund; 25 Fed. Rep. 232. See MORTGAGE; REORGANIZATION.

OPERATION OF LAW. The obligation of law; 1 Cra. C. C. 19; its practical working and effect. 5 Ia. 496. A term applied to indicate the manner in which a party acquires rights without any act of his own: as, the right to an estate of one who dies intestate is cast upon the heir at law, by operation of law; when a lessee for life enfeoffs him in reversion, or when the lessee and lessor join in a feoffment, or when a lessee for life or years accepts a new lease or demise from the lessor, there is a surrender of the first lease by operation of law; 5 B. & C. 269; 9 id. 298; 2 B. & Ad. 119; 5 Taunt. 518. See DESCENT; PURCHASE.

OPERATIVE. A workman; one employed to perform labor for another. See 1 Pa. L. J. 368; 3 C. Rob. 237; 2 Cra. 240, 270. See FACTORY ACTS; MASTER AND SERVANT.

OPERATIVE PART. That part of a conveyance, lease, mortgage or other instrument, which carries out its main object.

OPERATIVE WORDS. In a deed, or lease, the words which effect the transaction of which the instrument is the evidence; the terms generally used in a lease are "demise and lease," but any words clearly indicating an intention of making a present demise will suffice; Fawcett, L. & T. 74; Wms. R. P. 196; Bacon, Abr. (K) 161; see Martindale, Conv. 273.

OPINION. In Evidence. An inference or conclusion drawn by a witness as distinguished from facts known to him as facts.

It is the province of the jury to draw inferences and conclusions; and if witnesses were in general allowed to testify what they judge as well as what they know, the verdict would sometimes prove not the decision of the jury, but that of the witnesses. Hence the rule that, in general, the witness cannot be asked his opinion upon a particular question; Tayl. Ev. 1206; 29 N. H. 94; 16 Ill. 513; 18 Ga. 194, 573; 7 Wend. 560; 2 N. Y. 514; 17 id. 340. But while it is incompetent for a witness to state his opinion upon a question of law, where the intent with which an act done by him is drawn in question he may testify as to such intent; 12 Reptr. 664.

Some confusion in the application of this rule arises from the delicacy of the line which divides that which is to be regarded as matter of observation from that which is matter of judgment founded upon observation. Thus, it is held that an unprofessional witness may testify to the fact that a person whom he saw was intoxicated, whether he is able to state all the constituent facts which amount to drunkenness or not; 14 N. Y. 562; 26 Ala. N. S. 26; 53 Minn. 532; he may also testify as to the apparent condition of a party as to sobriety, shortly before the commission of an offence; 73 Cal. 7. He is also competent to testify whether a person with whom he is familiarly associated is in good or bad health and hearing, is lame or has the natural use of his limbs, and also whether on certain occasions he was unconscious; 143 Ill. 480; also whether a certain person has African blood in his veins; 113 N. C. 9. But, on the other hand, insanity or mental incapacity cannot, in general, be proved by the mere assertion of an unprofessional witness; 17 N. Y. 340; 7 Barb. 314; 13 Tex. 568. And see 25 Ala. N. S. 21; 117 Ind. 277; but the opinion of non-expert witnesses may be given as to mental capacity where the facts upon which the opinions are based are disclosed; 116 Ind. 278; 126 Ill. 507; 100 N. C. 457; 77 Ga. 724; 7 Mont. 489; 64 N. H. 573; 84 Va. 87; 30 Fla. 170; 36 W. Va. 757.

So handwriting may be proved by being recognized by a witness who has seen other writings of the party in the usual course of business, or who has seen him write; Steph. Ev. § 51; Peake, N. P. 21; 2 Johns. Cas. 211; 19 Johns. 134; 84 Ala. 53. See 85 Va. 146. But, on the other hand, the authorship of an anonymous article in a newspaper cannot be proved by one professing to have a knowledge of the author's style; How. App. Cas. 187.

From necessity, an exception to the rule of excluding opinions is made in questions involving matters of science, art, or trade, where skill and knowledge possessed by a witness, peculiar to the subject, give a value to his opinion above that of any inference which the jury could draw from facts which he might state; 1 Denio 281; 3 Ill. 297; 2 N. H. 480; 2 Story 421. Such a witness is termed an expert; and he may give his opinion in evidence; Whart. Ev. 440. Experts alone can give an opinion based on facts shown by others, assuming them to be true; 100 N. C. 457.

The following reference to some of the matters in which the opinions of expert witnesses have been held admissible will illustrate this principle. The unwritten or common law of foreign countries may be proved by the opinion of witnesses possessing professional knowledge; 1 Cra. 12, 38; 6 Pet. 763; 2 Wash. C. C. 1, 175; 2 Wend. 411; 3 Pick. 293; 4 Conn. 517; 4 Bibb 73; 2 Marsh. 609; 5 Harr. & J. 186; 1 Johns. 385; 14 Mass. 455; 6 Conn. 508; 1 Vt. 336; 15 S. & R. 87; 1 La. 153; 6 Cra. 274; the degree of hazard of property insured against fire; 17 Barb. 111; 4 Zabr. 843; whether a picture is a good likeness or not; 39 Ala. 193; handwriting; 35 Me. 78; 2 R. I. 319; 25 N. H. 87; 1 Jones N. C. 94, 150; 13 B. Monr. 258; mechanical operations, the proper way of conducting a particular manufacture, and the effect of a certain method; 3 N. Y. 322; negligence of a navigator, and its effect in producing a collision; 24 Ala. N. S. 21; sanity; 41 Ala. 700; 12 N. Y. 358; impotency; 3 Phill. Eccl. 14; value of chattels; 22 Ala. N. S. 370; 11 Cush. 257; 22 Barb. 652; value of land; 11 Cush. 201; 9 N. Y. 183; compare 4 Ohio St. 583; value of services; 15 Barb. 550; speed of a railway train; 59 N. Y. 631; benefit to real property by laying out a street adjacent thereto; 2 Gray 107; survey marks identified as being those made by United States surveyors; 24 Ala. N. S. 390; as to the location of surveys; 121 Pa. 182; 71 Mich. 520; seaworthiness; 10 Bingh. 57; and see 9 Cush. 226; whether a person appeared sick or well; 53 N. Y. 603; of the effect of a personal injury; 116 Ind. 446; 56 Fed. Rep. 184; whether fright would produce heart trouble; 128 Ill. 163; whether a child would have been born alive if he had received medical assistance in time; 71 Tex. 507; as to the distance at which it is safe to stop before going upon a crossing; 116 Ind. 60. So an engineer may be called to say what, in his opinion, is the cause of a harbor having been blocked up; 3 Dougl. 158; 1 Phil. Ev. 276; 4 Term 498. Opinion evidence as to the age of a person, from his appearance, is not admissible; 6 Conn. 9; but see 25 Tex. App. 448; 98 Mo. 640; 48 Mo. App. 39; nor is it in cases involving adultery, on the question of guilt or guilty intent; see 18 Ala. 738; nor can an opinion be given as to the meaning of an instrument where the words or phrases are not technical; 79 Ga. 105; 8 Misc. Rep. 253.

It is to be observed, however, that the principle of admitting such opinions is taken with the qualifications necessary to make, as far as possible, the judgment of the jury, and not that of the witness, the final means of determining the issue. Thus opinions of experts are not admissible upon the question of damages; 23 Wend. 425; 60 Vt. 343; 84 Ala. 102; nor whether damages were occasioned by negligence; 76

Ga. 532; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 210; 91 id. 422; 77 Hun 360; and experts are always confined to opinions within the scope of their professions, and are not allowed to give opinions on things of which the jury can as well judge; 4 Wend. 320; 14 Me. 398; 3 Dana 382; 1 Pa. 161; 2 Halst. 244; 7 Vt. 161; 6 Rand. 704; 9 Conn. 102; 3 N. H. 349; 5 Harr. & J. 438. A distinction is also to be observed between a feeble impression and a mere opinion or belief; 3 Ohio St. 406; 19 Wend. 477. See Mr. Lawson's article, in 25 Alb. L. J. 367. The testimony of experts is not admissible upon matters of judgment within the knowledge and experience of ordinary jurymen; 100 N. C. 310. See 37 W. Va. 524. The opinions of a witness are not admissible as to one's agency; 51 Minn. 141.

Upon an issue, in a suit upon a life policy, as to the insanity of the insured at the time he took his own life, the opinion of a non-professional witness as to his mental condition, in connection with a statement of the facts and circumstances, within his personal knowledge, upon which that opinion is based, is competent evidence; 111 U. S. 613.

Opinion evidence is not admissible as to whether the mode of coupling cars was careless and not the best way of performing the act; 39 Fed. Rep. 487. There are cases where the opinion of witnesses may be asked as to distance and other circumstances, but such questions are not permissible when it is practicable to draw out with exactness the data upon which a judgment must be founded; 109 Mass. 499. It must be left somewhat to the trial court; 58 Fed. Rep. 948. Whether a particular position on a wharf is a safe place for a wharfinger to stand while a steamboat is approaching is not matter for expert testimony; 139 U. S. 551.

In Practice. The statement of reasons delivered by a judge or court for giving the judgment which is pronounced upon a case. The judgment itself is sometimes called an opinion; and sometimes the opinion is spoken of as the judgment of the court.

A declaration, usually in writing, made by a counsel to the client of what the law is, according to his judgment, on a statement of facts admitted to him.

An opinion is in both the above cases a decision of what principles of law are to be applied in the particular case, with the difference that judicial opinions pronounced by the court are law and of authority, while the opinions of counsel, however eminent, are merely advice to his client or argument to the court.

Where there are several judges, and they do not all agree in the disposition of the cause, the opinion of the majority is termed the opinion of the court. The opinion of the minority is termed the dissenting opinion. The opinions of the courts, collected and provided with such preliminary statements of facts and of the arguments of counsel as may be necessary in each case to an understanding of the decision, make up the books of reports.

Opinions are said to be judicial or extra-judicial. A judicial opinion is one which is given on a question which is actually involved in the matter brought before the judge for his decision; an extra-judicial opinion is one which, although given by a judge in deciding a case, is not necessary to the judgment; Vaugh. 382; 1 Hale, Hist. 141; and, whether given in or out of court, is no more than the prolatum of him who gives it, and has no legal efficacy; 4 Pa. 28. Where a point is essential to the decision rendered, it will be presumed that it was duly considered, and that all that could be urged for or against it was presented to the court. But if it appears from the report of the case that such point was not taken or inquired into at all, there is no ground for this presumption, and the authority of the case is proportionably weakened; 8 Abb. Pr. 316.

Where two or more points are discussed in the opinions delivered on the decision of a cause, and the determination of either point in the manner indicated in such opinions would authorize the judgment pronounced by the court, the judges concurring in the judgment must be presumed to have concurred in such opinions upon all the points so discussed, unless some dissent is expressed or the circumstances necessarily lead to a different conclusion; 6 N. Y. 9. Where a judgment is reversed upon a part only of the grounds on which it went, it is still deemed an authority as to the other grounds not questioned. See 5 Johns. 125.

The opinion of the court assigning reasons for its conclusions cannot be treated as a special finding; 139 U. S. 222.

Counsel should, in giving an opinion, as far as practicable, give, first, a direct and positive opinion, meeting the point and effect of the question, and, if the question proposed is properly divisible into several, treating it accordingly. Second, his reasons, succinctly stated, in support of such opinion. Third, a reference to the statutes or decisions on the subject. Fourth, when the facts are susceptible of a material difference in statement, a suggestion of the probability of such variation. When an opinion is sought as a guide in respect to maintaining an action or defence, some other matters should be noticed:—as, Fifth, any necessary precautionary suggestions in reference to the possibility of a fatal defect in the evidence, arising from the nature of the case. Thus, where some important fact is stated as resting principally on the statement of the party interested, if by the law of the place such party is incompetent to testify respecting it, a suggestion ought to be made to inquire how that fact is to be proved. Sixth, a suggestion of the proper mode of proceeding, or the process or pleadings to be adopted.

In English and American law, the opinions of counsel, however eminent, are not entitled to any weight with the court, as evidence of the law. While the court will deem it their duty to receive such opinions as arguments, and as such entitled to whatever weight they may have, they will not yield to them any authority; 4 Pa. 28, per Gibson, C. J. In many cases, where a client acts in good faith under the advice of counsel, he may on that ground be protected from a liability which the law might otherwise have imposed upon him.

Expressions of opinion which are not statements of fact do not constitute fraud; 125 U. S. 247.

The attorney-general of the United States gives to the president his opinion and advice upon questions of law whenever required; and upon the request of the head of any of the executive departments of the government, he is required to give his opinion on questions of law arising in the administration of the department; R. S. §§ 354, 356. See JUDGE; EXPERT; OPINION OF JUDGES; PRECEDENT; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

OPINION OF JUDGES. Occasionally English judges have given opinions on legal matters to the crown, but the last instance appears to be in 1760. See 126 Mass. 562. The practice still obtains in the house of lords. See McNaghten's Case, 10 C. & F. 200. The federal judiciary can be called upon only to decide controversies brought before them in legal form. In Colorado, Florida, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and South Dakota, the constitution requires the supreme court to give opinions, at the request of the governor or legislature, or sometimes both. In Vermont the same practice obtains by statute, and in Nebraska without either constitutional or statutory sanction; 6 A. & E. Encyc. 1068. In Idaho, the constitution requires the supreme court judges to report annually to the governor as to defects and omissions in existing laws.

It has been held that the courts are the judges of whether the questions presented to them for their opinion fall within the scope of the law, and, generally, whether the exigency requires them to act. The court usually require that the questions shall be matters of public law and not those involving merely private rights; see Thayer on Advisory Opinions; Story, Const.; 6 A. & E. Encyc. 1065, where much law on the subject is collected. See LEGISLATIVE POWER.

OPPOSITE. Over against, standing in front or facing. 58 Me. 360. See 15 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 706; 23 L. J. Ch. 45.

OPPOSITION. In Practice. The act of a creditor who declares his dissent to a debtor's being discharged under the insolvent laws. 14 Bankr. Reg. 449.

OPPRESSION. An act of cruelty, severity, unlawful exaction, domination, or excessive use of authority. 14 Fed. Rep. 597.

OPPRESSOR. One who having public authority uses it unlawfully to tyrannize over another: as, if he keep him in prison until he shall do something which he is not lawfully bound to do. To charge a magistrate with being an oppressor is actionable; 1 Stark. Sl. 185.

OPPROBRIUM. In Civil Law. Ignominy; shame; infamy.

OPTION. Choice; election. See those titles.

In Contracts. A contract by which A, in consideration of the payment of a certain sum to B, acquires the privilege of buying from or selling to B, specified securities or property at a fixed price within a certain time. 71 N. Y. 420; 88 id. 93.

Where notes are given to cover losses on deals in options in grain, a part of which is to be delivered, the illegality of a part taints the whole, the consideration being entire; 40 Ill. App. 155. See 40 id. 307; 49 Ohio St. 240; 75 Hun 174; [1892] 2 Q. B. 484; 54 Mo. App. 606. The sale of commodities to be delivered at a future day is not per se unlawful where the parties intend in good faith to comply with the terms of the contract; 47 Minn. 228; 64 Hun 636; 87 Neb. 766. See WAGER; CONTRACTS.

These options are of three kinds, viz.: "calls," "puts," and "straddles," or "spread eagles." A call gives A the option of calling or buying from B or not certain securities. A put gives A the option of selling or delivering to B or not. A straddle is a combination of a put and a call, and secures to A the right to buy of, or sell to, B or not. Where neither party, at the time of making the contract, intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay differences according to the rise or fall of the market, the contract is void either by virtue of statute or as contrary to public policy; 11 C. B. 538. In each transaction the law looks primarily at the intention of the parties; and the form of the transaction is not conclusive; 11 Hun 471; 71 N. Y. 420; 5 M. & W. 466; 89 Pa. 250; 10 W. N. C. 112. Option contracts are not prima facie gambling contracts; 11 Hun 471; 71 N. Y. 420. But see 78 Ill. 43; 83 id. 83. See in general Dos Passos, Stock-Brokers.

OPTIONAL WRIT. An original writ in the alternative, commanding either to do a thing or show cause why it has not been done. 3 Bla. Com. 274; Finch, Law 257.

OPUS LOCATUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A work (i. e. the result of work) let to another to be used. A work (i. e. something to be completed by work) hired to be done by another. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Opus, Locare; L. 51, § 1, D. Locat.; L. 1, § 1, D. ad leg. Rhod.

OPUS MAGNIFICIUM or MANIFICIUM (from Lat. opus, work, manus, hand). Manual labor. Fleta, l. 2, c. 48, § 3.

OR. A disjunctive particle.

As a particle, or is often construed and,

and and construed or, to further the intent of the parties, in legacies, devises, deeds, bonds, and writings; 8 Gill 492; 7 id. 197; 1 Call. 212; 2 Rop. Leg. 1400, 1405; 3 Greenl. Ev. §§ 18, 25; 1 Jarm. Wills, c. 17, 427, 2d ed.; 1 Wills. Exrs. 932; 5 Co. 112 a; Cro. Jac. 322; 4 Zabr. 686; 3 Term 470; 27 N. J. Eq. 305; 98 U. S. 143; 30 Ohio St. 407; 33 Minn. 419; but its more natural meaning, when used as a connective, is to mark an alternative and present a choice, implying an election to do one of two things; 60 Conn. 32. It sometimes has the same effect as the word "nor"; 64 Hun 635; 65 id. 145.

Where an indictment is in the alternative, as forged or caused to be forged, it is bad for uncertainty; 2 Stra. 900; 1 Y. & J. 22. But a description of a horse as of a brown or bay color, in an indictment for larceny of such horse, is good; 13 Vt. 687; and so an indictment describing a nuisance as in the highway or road; 1 Dall. 150. See 28 Vt. 583; 24 Conn. 286; 13 Ark. 397. So, "break or enter," in a statute defining burglary, means "break and enter"; 82 Pa. 306, 326; 105 Mass. 185.

When the word or in a statute is used in the sense of to wit, that is, in explanation of what precedes, and making it signify the same thing, a complaint or indictment which adopts the words of the statute is well framed. Thus, it was held that an indictment was sufficient which alleged that the defendant had in his custody and possession ten counterfeit bank-bills or promissory notes, payable to the bearer thereof, and purporting to be signed in behalf of the president and directors of the Union Bank, knowing them to be counterfeit, and with intent to utter and pass them, and thereby to injure and defraud the said president and directors; it being manifest from the statute on which the indictment was framed, that promissory note was used merely as explanatory of bank-bill, and meant the same thing; 8 Mass. 59; 2 Gray 502.

In general, see Cro. Eliz. 832; 2 Sandf. 369; 1 Jones N. C. 309; 3 Term 470; 1 Bingh. 500; 2 Dr. & War. 471; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr., 9th ed. §§ 161, 251.

ORACULUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a kind of decision given by the Roman emperors.

ORAL. Spoken, in contradistinction to written: as, oral evidence, which is evidence delivered verbally by a witness. Steph. Ev. 135. Formerly pleadings were put in viva voce, or orally; Kerr's Act. Law. When a pleading sets up a contract, and does not allege that it was in writing, it will be taken to have been oral; 84 Ind. 583.

ORANDO PRO REGE ET REGNO. An ancient writ which issued, while there was no regular collect for a sitting parliament, to pray for the peace and good government of the realm.

ORATOR. In Chancery Practice. The party who files a bill. Oratrix, is used of a female plaintiff. These words are disused in England, the customary phrases now being plaintiff and petitioner. Brown.

In Roman Law. An advocate. Code 1. 3. 33. 1.

ORCINUS LIBERTUS. In Roman Law. A freedman who obtained his liberty by the direct operation of the will or testament of his deceased master was so called, being the freedman of the deceased (orcinus), not of the hæres.

ORDAIN. To make an ordinance, to enact a law.

The preamble to the constitution of the United States declares that the people "do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." The third article of the same constitution declares that "the judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." See 1 Wheat. 304, 324; 4 id. 316, 402.

To confer on a person the holy orders of priest or deacon. 4 Conn. 134.

ORDEAL. An ancient superstitious mode of trial.

When in a criminal case the accused was arraigned, he might select the mode of trial either by God and his country, that is, by jury, or by God only, that is, by ordeal.

The trial by ordeal was either by fire or by water. Those who were tried by the former passed barefooted and blindfolded over nine hot glowing ploughshares, or were to carry burning irons in their hands, and accordingly as they escaped or not they were acquitted or condemned. The water ordeal was performed either in hot or cold water. In cold water, the parties suspected were adjudged innocent if their bodies were not borne up by the water contrary to the course of nature; and if after putting their bare arms or legs into scalding water they came out unhurt, they were taken to be innocent of the crime.

It was supposed that God would, by the mere contrivance of man, exercise his power in favor of the innocent. 4 Bla. Com. 342; 2 Am. Jur. 280. See 110 U. S. 529. For a detailed account of the trial by ordeal, see Herbert, Antiq. of the Inns of Court 146.

ORDEFFE or ORDELFE. A liberty whereby a man claims the ore found in his own land; also, the ore lying under land. Cowel.

ORDELS. The right of administering oaths and adjudging trials by ordeal within a precinct or liberty. Cowell.

ORDENAMIENTO. In Spanish Law. An order from the sovereign and differing from a cedula in form and in the mode of its promulgation. Schm. Civ. L. Introd. 93, n.

ORDER. Command; direction.

An informal bill of exchange or letter of request requiring the party to whom it is addressed to deliver property of the person making the order to some one therein described.

A designation of the person to whom a bill of exchange or negotiable promissory note is to be paid. See 14 Conn. 445; 48 N. H. 45; 39 N. Y. 98. This order, in the case of negotiable paper, is usually by indorsement, and may be either express, as, "Pay to C D," or implied merely, as by writing A B [the payee's name].

See INDORSEMENT; STORE ORDERS.

In French Law. The act by which the rank of preferences of claim, among creditors who have liens over the price which arises out of the sale of an immovable subject, is ascertained. Dalloz, Dict.

In the Practice of Courts. An order is any direction of a court or judge made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment. N. Y. Code of Proc. § 400; 51 Ia. 127. But a decree is often called an order. See DECREE. For distinction between order and requisition, see 19 Johns. 7.

In Governmental Law. By this expression is understood the several bodies which compose the state. In ancient Rome, for example, there were three distinct orders: namely, that of the senators, that of the patricians, and that of the plebeians.

In the United States there are no orders of men; all men are equal in the eye of the law. See RANK.

ORDER IN COUNCIL. An order by the sovereign with the advice of the privy council. See PRIVY COUNCIL.

ORDER OF DISCHARGE. In England, an order made under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, by a court of bankruptcy, the effect of which is to discharge a bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands provable under the bankruptcy. Robson, Bkcy.; Whart. Lex.

ORDER OF FILIATION. The name of a judgment rendered by two justices, having jurisdiction in such case, in which a man therein named is adjudged to be the putative father of a bastard child, and it is further adjudged that he pay a certain sum for its support.

The order must bear upon its face—first, that it was made upon the complaint of the township, parish, or other place where the child was born and is chargeable; second, that it was made by justices of the peace having jurisdiction; 1 Salk. 122, pl. 6; 2 Ld. Raym. 1197; third, the birthplace of the child; fourth, the examination of the putative father and of the mother, but it is said the presence of the putative father is not requisite if he has been summoned; Cald. 308; fifth, the judgment that the defendant is the putative father of the child; Sid. 363; Style 154; Dougl. 662; sixth, that he shall maintain the child as long as he shall be chargeable to the township, parish, or other place, which must be named; 1 Salk. 121, pl. 2; but the order may be that the father shall pay a certain sum weekly as long as the child is chargeable to the public; Ventr. 210; seventh, it must be dated, signed, and sealed by the justices. Such order cannot be vacated by two other justices; 15 Johns. 208. See 4 Cow. 253; 2 Blackf. 42.

ORDER OF REVIVOR. In English Practice. An order as of course for the continuance of an abated suit. It superseded the bill of revivor. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52. Whart. Lex.

ORDER NISI. A conditional order, which is to be confirmed unless something be done, which has been required, by a time specified. Eden, Inj. 122.

ORDERS. Rules made by a court or other competent jurisdiction. The formula is generally in these words: It is ordered, etc.

The instructions given by the owner to the captain or commander of a ship, which he is to follow in the course of the voyage.

ORDERS OF THE DAY. Matters which the house of commons may have agreed beforehand to consider on any particular day, are called the "orders of the day," as opposed to original motions. May's Parl. Prac. Orders of the day are also known to the parliamentary practice of this country; Cush. Pr. Leg. Assemblies 1512.

ORDINANCE. A law; a statute; a decree.

Municipal ordinances are laws passed by the governing body of a municipal corporation for the regulation of the affairs of the corporation. The term ordinance is now the usual denomination of such acts, although in England and in some states, the technically more correct term by-law is in common and approved use. The main feature of such enactments is that they are local, as distinguished from the general applicability of the state laws; hence, the word law, with the prefix by, should in strictness be preferred to the word ordinance; Horr. & Bemis, Mun. Pol. Ord. 1. See 117 Ind. 221; BY-LAWS.

They are not, in a constitutional sense, public laws, but mere local rules or by-laws, police or domestic regulations, devoid in many respects of the characteristics of public or general laws; 17 Colo. 302.

This word is more usually applied to the laws of a corporation than to the acts of the legislature. The following account of the difference between a statute and an ordinance is from Bacon's Abridgment, Statute (A). "Where the proceeding consisted only of a petition from parliament and an answer from the king, these were entered on the parliament roll; and if the matter was of a public nature, the whole was then styled an ordinance: if, however, the petition and answer were not only of a public but a novel nature, they were then formed into an act by the king, with the aid of his council and judges, and entered on the statute roll." See Co. Litt. 159 b, Butler's note; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 146.

According to Lord Coke, the difference between a statute and an ordinance is that the latter has not had the assent of the king, lords, and commons, but is made merely by two of these powers. Co. 4th Inst. 25. See Barrington, Stat. 41, note (x).

A resolution of a council is but another name for an ordinance, and if it is a legislative act it is immaterial whether it is called a resolution or an ordinance, so long as the requirements essential to the validity of an ordinance be observed; 99 Pa. 330; but if the action is merely declaratory of the will of the corporation, it is proper to act by resolution, which is more in the nature of a ministerial act; 19 U. S. App. 622.

A municipal ordinance not passed under legislative authority, is not a law of the state within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against state laws impairing the obligation of contracts; 146 U. S. 258.

Equity will not restrain a city council from passing an ordinance allowing a gas company to lay pipes in its streets, although it has granted the exclusive privilege to do so to another company; 87 Ala. 245. See 92 Ky. 95. An illegal ordinance may be enjoined before passage; 92 Ky. 95; or the enforcement of an invalid ordinance; 132 Ind. 575; but not an ordinance restraining a certain act, unless it be a nuisance per se; 7 Mont. 173.

While it is not per se negligence for a railroad company to run its cars at a higher rate of speed than the limit specified in a city ordinance, yet the fact that it did so in the particular case may be taken into consideration by the jury, with other evidence, in ascertaining whether or not the defendant was negligent; 165 Pa. 118. In 34 Minn 29, it was held that running a railroad train at a speed exceeding the limit fixed by ordinance was evidence of negligence which should go to the jury. That it is negligence per se is held in 96 Mo. 509; 84 Ala. 141; 178 Ill. 197. (Also where the rate of speed is fixed by statute; 34 Ia. 276.) An ordinance as to the right of way between two street cars is not conclusive of the question of negligence; it is merely evidence of negligence on the part of the driver of a car whose duty under it was to give way; 173 Pa. 602.

An ordinance requiring an opening in a street to be guarded is admissible in evidence in an action against a city for injuries sustained by falling into such opening; 150 Pa. 611.

An ordinance which has the effect of denying to the owner of property the right to conduct a lawful business thereon is invalid, unless the business is of such a noxious or offensive character that the health, safety, or comfort of the community require its exclusion from the neighborhood; 98 Cal. 73; this does not extend to an asylum for the treatment of mild forms of insanity; id.; or to a laundry; 82 Fed. Rep. 623.

The burden of proving the unreasonableness of an ordinance is upon him who denies its validity; 58 N. J. L. 132; 19 L. R. A. 632.

A copy of an ordinance having the seal of the city attached is admissible in evidence without further proof; 113 Mo. 395.

See MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS; NUISANCE; POLICE POWERS.

ORDINANCE OF 1647. A law passed by the Colony of Massachusetts, still in force, in a modified form, whereby the state owns the great ponds within its confines, which are held in trust for public uses. 147 Mass. 548. See LAKE.

ORDINANCE OF 1648. A law of England relating to admiralty jurisdiction. See Bened. Adm. § 99. It expired in 1660.

ORDINANCE OF 1681. An ordinance of France relating to maritime affairs. See Bened. Adm. § 173.

ORDINANCE OF 1787. A statute for the government of the Northwest Territory. See OHIO.

It has no force in Illinois except as incorporated in its statutes; 168 Ill. 179.

ORDINANCES OF EDWARD I. Two laws and ordinances published by Edward I. in the second year of his reign, at Hastings, relating to admiralty jurisdiction. These are said to have been the foundation of a consistent usage for a long time. See Bened. Adm. § 55.

ORDINARY. In Ecclesiastical Law. An officer who has original jurisdiction in his own right, and not by deputation.

In England, the ordinary is an officer who has immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical causes. Co. Litt. 344. A bishop is an ordinary, and archbishops are the ordinaries of the whole province. Also an archdeacon; and an officer of the royal household.

In the United States, the ordinary possesses, in those states where such officer exists, powers identical with those usually vested in the courts of probate. In South Carolina, the ordinary was a judicial officer; 1 Const. S. C. 267; 2 id. 384; but the office no longer exists in South Carolina, where they have now a probate court. Georgia retains courts of ordinary. See COURTS OF ORDINARY.

ORDINARY CARE. That degree of care which men of ordinary prudence exercise in taking care of their own persons or property. Story, Bailm. 11; 95 Cal. 279; 143 Ill. 127; 108 Mo. 387; 3 S. Dak. 93; 49 Kan. 260. It can only be determined by the circumstances of each particular case whether ordinary care was used. This degree of care is said to be required of bailees for the mutual benefit of bailor and bailee; 8 Metc. 91; 16 Ark. 308; 23 Conn. 437, 443; 40 Me. 64; 26 Ala. N. S. 203; 36 E. L. & E. 506. See 4 Misc. Rep. 104; 156 Pa. 353; BAILEE; NEGLIGENCE; CARE.

ORDINARY NEGLIGENCE. The want of such care and diligence as reasonably prudent men, generally, in regard to the subject-matter of inquiry, would use to prevent or avoid an injury. 49 Kan. 460. See GROSS NEGLIGENCE.

ORDINARY SKILL. Such skill as a person conversant with the matter undertaken might be reasonably supposed to have. 11 M. & W. 113; 20 Mart. La. 68, 75; 8 B. Monr. 515; 13 Johns. 211; 7 C. & P. 289; 16 S. & R. 368; 15 Mass. 316; 108 N. C. 187. See Cooley, Torts 777; NEGLIGENCE.

One who undertakes to act in a professional or other clearly defined capacity is bound to exercise the skill appropriate to such capacity; Webb, Poll. Torts 26; though the undertaking be gratuitous; 20 Pa. 136; 31 N. H. 119.

ORDINATION. The act of conferring the orders of the church upon an individual. See ORDAIN.

ORDINATIONE CONTRA SERVIENTES. A writ that lay against a servant for leaving his master contrary to the ordinance of 23 & 24 Edw. III.

ORDINIS BENEFICIUM. See BENEFICIUM ORDINIS.

ORDINUM FUGITIVI. Those of the religious who deserted their houses, and, throwing off the habits, renounced their particular order in contempt of their oath and other obligations. Par. Antiq. 388.

ORDNANCE DEBENTURES. Bills which were issued by the Board of Ordnance on the treasurer of that office for the payment of stores, etc.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, or BOARD OF ORDNANCE. An office which was kept within the Tower of London, and which superintended and disposed of all the arms, instruments, and utensils of war, both by sea and land, in all the magazines, garrisons, and forts of Great Britain. It is divided into two distinct branches, the civil and the military. 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 24. But by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 117, the powers, duties, etc., of the board were transferred to the secretary of state for war. Wharton.

ORDO JUDICIORUM. The order of judgment; the rule by which the due course of hearing each cause was prescribed. 4 Reeves, Hist. Eng. L. 17.

ORDONNANCE DE LA MARINE. See CODE.

ORE LEAVE. A right to dig and take ore from land. 84 Pa. 340.

ORE TENUS (Lat.). Verbally; orally.

Formerly the pleadings of the parties were ore tenus; and the practice is said to have been retained till the reign of Edward III. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 95; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 59. And see Bracton 372 b.

In chancery practice, a defendant may demur at the bar ore tenus; 3 P. Wms. 370; if he has not sustained the demurrer on the record; 1 Swanst. 288; Mitf. Pl., Tyler's ed. 310; 6 Ves. 779; 8 id. 405; 17 id. 215.

OREGON. One of the Pacific coast states of the American Union, and the thirty-third state admitted therein.

The territory called Oregon from the early name of its principal river—now called the Columbia—originally included all the country on the Pacific coast west of the Rocky mountains, and north of the 42d and south of the 49th parallel of north latitude. From 1818 to 1846, this country was subject to the joint occupancy of the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States, under a disputed claim of title, which was settled by the treaty of June 15, of the latter year, in favor of the United States.

As early as 1841 the American and British occupants west of the Cascade mountains commenced to organize a government for their protection. These efforts resulted in the establishment of the "Provisional Government of Oregon" by a popular vote on July 5, 1845, consisting of an executive, legislative (one house), and judicial department, the officers of which were chosen and supported by the voluntary action of the citizens and subjects of both nations. On March 3, 1849, this government was superseded by the territorial government provided by congress in the act of August 14, 1848. On September 27, 1850, congress passed the "donation act," giving the settlers the land held by them under the provisional government—640 acres to a married man and his wife, and 320 to a single man.

In 1857 a state constitution was formed and ratified by the people, under which a portion of the territory was admitted into the Union on February 14, 1859, on an equal footing with the other states.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative authority is vested in a legislative assembly, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senate is to consist of sixteen members, which number may be increased to thirty, elected for the term of four years by the electors of the districts into which the state is divided for the purpose. The senate is divided into two classes, so that one-half the number may be changed every two years.

The House of Representatives is to consist of thirty-four members, which number may be increased to sixty, chosen by the electors from the respective districts into which the state is divided for the purpose, for the term of two years.

Senators and representatives must be twenty-one years old, citizens of the United States, and for a year at least preceding the election inhabitants of the county or district from which they were chosen. Sessions of the assembly are holden every second year.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is elected for the term of four years, by the qualified electors, at the time and places of choosing members of the assembly.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power of the state is vested in a supreme court, circuit and county courts, and justices of the peace; and municipal courts may be created to administer the regulations of incorporated towns.

The Supreme Court originally consisted of four justices, which number was increased to five, chosen in districts, within which they held the circuit courts. But in 1878 the legislative assembly, in pursuance of § 10 of art. vii. of the constitution, provided for the election of justices of the supreme and circuit courts in separate classes; and now the supreme court is held by three justices elected by the electors of the whole state. A judge of the supreme court is elected for six years, and in addition to the usual oath of office is required to swear that he will not accept any other office, except a judicial one, during the term for which he is elected. The court has jurisdiction only to revise the decisions of the circuit court. It holds two terms a year, at the seat of government, and the judges are required to file with the secretary of state concise written statements of their decisions.

The Circuit Courts have all jurisdiction not vested in any other court, including appellate jurisdiction and supervisory control of all inferior tribunals and officers. There are eight circuit judges who are elected by the electors of the districts in which they hold court, for the term of six years. There are but seven judicial circuits; in the fourth circuit, however, there are two judges. Their qualifications are the same as the judges of the supreme court, including the oath not to accept a political office.

County Courts are held in each county, by a judge elected for the term of four years. They have jurisdiction pertaining to courts of probate and county commissioners, and may have, by act of assembly, civil jurisdiction to the extent of five hundred dollars, and "criminal jurisdiction not extending to death or imprisonment in the penitentiary." The civil jurisdiction has been conferred but no criminal jurisdiction.

Justices Courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit and county courts of civil actions, where the sum in controversy does not exceed $250, except only actions in which the title to real property shall come in question, and actions for false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious prosecution, crim. con., seduction, or promise to marry. They have also certain criminal jurisdiction.

ORFGILD (Sax. orf, cattle, gild, payment. Also called cheapgild). A payment for cattle, or the restoring them. Cowel.

A restitution made by the hundred or county of any wrong done by one that was in pledge. Lambard, Archaion 125, 126.

A penalty for taking away cattle. Blount.

ORGANIC LAW. The fundamental law or constitution of a state or nation. See LAW.

ORIGINAL. An authentic instrument which is to serve as a model or example to be copied or imitated.

Originals are single or duplicate: single when there is but one; duplicate, when there are two. In the case of printed documents, all the impressions are originals, or in the nature of duplicate originals, and any copy will be primary evidence; 2 Stark. 130. But see 14 S. & R. 200. See TELEGRAPH; PHOTOGRAPH; PRESS COPY.

When an original document is not evidence at common law, and a copy of such original is made evidence by an act of the legislature, the original is not therefore made admissible evidence by implication; 2 Campb. 121, n.

Not deriving authority from any other source: as, original jurisdiction, original writ, original bill, and the like.

ORIGINAL BILL. In Chancery Practice. A bill relating to a matter not before brought before the court by the same parties, standing in the same interests. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 33.

Proceedings in a court of chancery are either commenced by way of information, when the matter concerns the state or those under its protection, or by original petition or bill when the matter does not concern the state or those under its protection. The original bill states simply the cause of complaint, and asks for relief. It is composed of nine parts; Story, Eq. Pl. 7; and is the foundation of all subsequent proceedings before the court. See 1 Dan. Ch. Pr., 6th Am. ed. *314; BILL.

ORIGINAL CHARTER. In Scotch Law. That one by which the first grant of land is made. Bell, Dict.

ORIGINAL CONSTRUCTION. This term, as distinguished from repairs, has a technical meaning in relation to railroads, and is that construction of bridges, etc., that is necessary to be done before the railroad can be opened, not such structures as are intended to replace worn-out counterparts. 86 Fed. Rep. 73.

ORIGINAL CONVEYANCES (sometimes called primary conveyances). Those conveyances by means whereof the benefit or estate is created or first arises: viz. feoffment, gift, grant, lease, exchange, partition. 2 Bla. Com. 309; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 464.

ORIGINAL ENTRY. The first entry made by a merchant, tradesman, or other person in his account-books, charging another with merchandise, materials, work, or labor, or cash, on a contract made between them.

Such an entry, to be admissible as evidence, must be made in a proper book. In general, the books in which the first entries are made, belonging to a merchant, tradesman, or mechanic, in which are charged goods sold and delivered or work and labor done, are received in evidence. There are many books which are not evidence, a few of which will be here enumerated. A book made up by transcribing entries made on a slate by a journeyman, the transcript being made on the same evening, or sometimes not until nearly two weeks after the work was done, was considered as not being a book of original entries; 1 Rawle 435; 4 id. 408; 2 Watts 451; 6 Whart. 189. A book purporting to be a book of original entries, containing an entry of the sale of goods when they were ordered, but before delivery, is not a book of original entries; 4 Rawle 404; 3 Dev. 449. And unconnected scraps of paper, containing, as alleged, original entries of sales by an agent, on account of his principal, and appearing on their face to be irregularly kept, are not to be considered as a book of original entries; 13 S. & R. 126; contra, 4 Harring. 532. See 2 Whart. 33; 4 M'Cord 76; 20 Wend. 72; 1 Yeates 198. A notched stick kept as a tally was admitted to prove items of different amount indicated by different cuts and notches; 2 Harring. 288.

The entry must be made in the course of business, and with the intention of making a charge for goods sold or work done; it ought not to be made after the lapse of one day; Tayl. Ev. 620; 1 N. & McC. 130; 4 S. & R. 5. Memoranda of sales found in an account-book are competent, when made contemporaneously with orders, by a witness knowing them to state correctly the facts; 35 Fed. Rep. 314.

The entry must be made in an intelligible manner and not in figures or hieroglyphics which are understood by the seller only; 4 Rawle 404. A charge made in the gross as "190 days work;" 1 N. & McC. 130; or "for medicine and attendance," or "thirteen dollars for medicine and attendance on one of the General's daughters in curing the hooping-cough;" 2 Const. So. C. 476, were rejected. An entry of goods without carrying out any prices proves, at most, only a sale; and the jury cannot, without other evidence, fix any price; 1 South. 370. The charges should be specific, and denote the particular work or service charged as it arises daily, and the quantity, number, weight, or other distinct designation of the materials or articles sold or furnished, and attach the price and value to each item; 2 Const. So. C. 745; 1 N. & M'C. 130.

The entry must, of course, have been made by a person having authority to make it; 4 Rawle 404; and with a view to charge the party; 8 Watts 545.

The proof of the entry must be made by the person who made it. If made by the seller, he is competent to prove it from the necessity of the case, although he has an interest in the matter in dispute; 5 Conn. 496; 12 Johns. 461; 1 Dall. 289. When made by a clerk, it must be proved by him. But in either case, when the person who made the entry is out of the reach of the process of the court, as in the case of death, or absence from the state, the handwriting may be proved by a person acquainted, with the handwriting of the person who made the entry; 2 W. & S. 137; if he is absent, proof must first be made that he cannot be found; 57 Ark. 402. But the plaintiff was not competent to prove the handwriting of a deceased clerk who made the entries; 1 Bro. App. liii. A book containing entries in defendant's handwriting of payments by him to payee in her lifetime, on the note in action, is not admissible as evidence in defendant's favor; 84 Va. 341.

The books and original entries, when proved by the supplementary oath of the party, are prima facie evidence of the sale and delivery of goods, or of work and labor done; 1 Yeates 347; 3 Vt. 463; 1 M'Cord 481; 2 Root 59. See 30 Fla. 419; 97 Ala. 619. But they are not evidence of money lent or cash paid; 1 Day 104; Kirb. 289; or of the time a vessel lay at the plaintiff's wharf; 1 Browne 257; or of the delivery of goods to be sold on commission; 2 Whart. 33. See, generally, Greenl. Ev. § 118.

These entries are sometimes evidence in suits between third parties; 8 Wheat. 326; 3 Campb. 305, 377; 2 P. & D. 573; 15 Mass. 380; 20 Johns. 168; 15 Conn. 206; 7 S. & R. 116; 2 Harr. & J. 77; 2 Rand. 87; 1 Y. & C. 53; and also in favor of the party himself; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 508; 2 Mass. 217; 1 Dall. 239; 2 Bay 173, 362; 5 Vt. 313; 108 Mo. 277. See 26 Tex. App. 404; 68 Hun 190; 160 Mass. 328.

ORIGINAL AND DERIVATIVE ESTATES. An original estate is the first of several estates, bearing to each other the relation of a particular estate and a reversion. It is contrasted with a derivative estate, which is a particular interest carved out of an another estate of larger extent. 1 Pres. Est. *123.

ORIGINAL JURISDICTION. See JURISDICTION.

ORIGINAL PACKAGE. The casing in which imported merchandise is kept and handled in course of transportation, whether hogsheads, bales, bottles, or boxes.

The package delivered by the importer to the carrier at the initial point of shipment in the exact condition in which it was shipped. In the case of liquors in bottles, if the bottles are shipped singly, each is an original package, but if a number are fastened together and marked, or are together in a box, etc., such box, etc., constitutes the original package; 81 Fed. Rep. 997.

An original package is a bundle put up for transportation and usually consists of a number of things bound together and convenient for handling; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 10.

An original package, trade in which is protected by the federal constitution, is such form and size of package as is used by purchasers or shippers for the purpose of securing both convenience in handling and security in transportation of merchandise between dealers in the ordinary course of commerce; 156 Pa. 201.

The power to regulate or forbid the sale of a commodity after it has been brought into a state does not carry with it the right and power to prevent its introduction by transportation from another state; 125 U. S. 465. This was followed by Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, where it was held (three judges dissenting), that a state statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, etc., purposes, and under a license, is, as applied to a sale by an importer and in the original packages or kegs unbroken and unopened, of such liquor brought from another state, unconstitutional and void as repugnant to the commerce clause of the constitution. See 4 Harv. L. Rev. 221, for a criticism of this case. The rule established in Leisy v. Hardin, does not justify the contention that a state is powerless to prevent the sale of foods made in or brought from another state, if their sale may cheat the people into buying something they do not intend to buy, and which is wholly different from what its condition and appearance import; 155 U. S. 461, upholding the Massachusetts Oleomargarine Act.

The act of congress of August 8, 1890 (Wilson Act), provided that upon the arrival in any state of liquors they should be subject to the laws of the state the same as if produced there, and should not be exempt therefrom whether in original packages or not. This was held constitutional in 140 U. S. 545. It does not confer upon any state the power of prohibiting the importation of articles by any one except certain officers appointed by the state. The South Carolina Dispensary Act of 1895 is therefore contrary to the commerce clause, and so far as it is so is invalid; 165 U. S. 58.

A consignment of liquor has arrived in the state, within the meaning of the Wilson Bill, as soon as it crosses the state boundary, although the contract of carriage is not then completed; 24 L. R. A. 245.

A state may regulate or prohibit the sale of liquor even in the original package; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674; but it cannot impose a penalty on a carrier for transporting such goods within the state and before their delivery; id. 664.

Opening a barrel of intoxicating liquor to obtain a small quantity for testing does not destroy the nature of the original package; 27 L. R. A. (Ia.) 219.

The peddling of separate articles after a package has been broken is subject to regulation by the state police power; 166 Pa. 89.

An act prohibiting the manufacture and sale of cigarettes interferes with interstate commerce as applied to sales in small boxes containing ten each imported in that form from other states; 76 Fed. Rep. 156; 82 id. 615.

A sale of ten-pound packages of oleomargarine, manufactured and packed in one state and imported into another, is a valid sale, though made to a person who was himself a consumer. The importer has not only a right to sell personally but to employ an agent to sell for him. The right of the importer to sell does not depend upon whether the original package was suitable for retail trade or not, but is the same even if the consumers are wholesale dealers, provided he sells in original packages. The Pennsylvania act of May 21st, 1885, forbidding the manufacture of any imitation of butter or cheese, and providing that no one should sell or have such imitation in his possession with intent to sell as an article of food, is invalid to the extent that it prohibits the introduction of oleomargarine into another state and its sale in the original packages; 171 U. S. 1, two judges dissenting, reversing 170 Pa. 284. Whether the right to sell extended beyond the first sale by the importer was not decided. The right to import a lawful article of commerce from one state to another continues until a sale in the original package; 171 U. S. 23; when the package is broken it becomes a part of the general mass of property; 124 Mo. 436.

Retail trade as well as wholesale is included in the idea of commerce; 81 Fed. Rep. 1000.

The form or size of the package the importer determines for himself; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 235; however small it may be, if it is an original package, it is protected; 42 Fed. Rep. 545.

Bottles, if sealed without the state, are the original packages and not the boxes or barrels in which they come; 138 Pa. 642; 82 Ia. 401; 86 id. 639; but where bottles were shipped separately in tissue paper, each labelled original package, and packed in an open box with hay, it was held that the boxes were the original packages; 91 Ala. 2. See 47 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 411; 60 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 462; 58 id. (Ia.) 330; 43 Fed. Rep. 372.

Where cigarettes are put up in small boxes, ten to a box, and these boxes are placed in larger boxes for shipping, the small boxes constitute original packages; but when they reach their place of destination for sale they become a part of the mass of property of the state; 81 Fed. Rep. 997; 82 id. 422.

Merely labelling each bottle "original package" does not make it one; 91 Ala. 2.

See 34 Am. L. Reg. 784; 29 id. 721; COMMERCE; LIQUOR LAWS; OLEOMARGARINE.

ORIGINAL PROCESS. Process to compel an appearance by the defendant.

ORIGINAL WRIT. In English Practice. A mandatory letter issued in the king's name, sealed with his great seal, and directed to the sheriff of the county wherein the injury was committed or supposed to have been done, requiring him to command the wrongdoer, or party accused, either to do justice to the complainant, or else to appear in court and answer the accusation against him. This writ is deemed necessary to give the courts of law jurisdiction. Andr. Steph. Pl. 62; Gould, Pl. 14.

This writ is now disused, the writ of summons being the process prescribed by the Uniformity of Process Act for commencing personal actions; and under the Judicature Act, 1873, all suits, even in the court of chancery, are to be commenced by such writs of summons; Brown. But before this, in modern English practice, the original writ was often dispensed with, by recourse to a fiction and a proceeding by bill substituted. In this country, our courts derive their jurisdiction from the constitution, and require no original writ to confer it. Improperly speaking, the first writ which is issued in a case is sometimes called an original writ; but it is not so in the English sense of the word. See 3 Bla. Com. 273; Walker, Am. Law, passim.

ORIGINALIA (Lat.). In English Law. The transcripts and other documents sent to the office of the treasurer-remembrancer in exchequer are called by this name to distinguish them from recorda, which contain the judgments of the barons. The treasurer-remembrancer's office was abolished in 1833.

ORIGINALITY. In Patent Law. The finding out, the contriving, the creating of something which did not exist and was not known before, and which can be made useful and advantageous in the pursuits of life, or which can add to the enjoyment of mankind. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 16.

ORNAMENT. An embellishment. In questions arising as to which of two things is to be considered as principal or accessory, it is the rule that an ornament shall be considered as accessory.

ORPHAN. A minor or infant who has lost both of his or her parents. Sometimes the term is applied to a person who has lost only one of his or her parents. 2 S. & S. 93; Aso & M. Inst. b. 1, t. 2, c. 1; 40 Wisc.

276. See 14 Hazzard, Penn. Reg. 188, 189, for a correspondence between Joseph Hopkinson and ex-president J. Q. Adams as to the meaning of the word orphan; see, also, Hob. 247; 147 Mass. 300.

ORPHANAGE. In English Law. The share reserved to an orphan by the custom of London. See LEGITIME; DEAD'S PART.

ORPHANS' COURT. In American Law. Courts of more or less extended jurisdiction, relating to probate, estates of decedents, etc., in Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. See the titles of the respective states.

ORPHANOTROPHI. In Civil Law. Persons who have the charge of administering the affairs of houses destined for the use of orphans. Clef des Lois Rom. Administrateurs.

OSTENSIBLE PARTNER. One whose name appears in a firm as a partner, and who is really such. Pars. Part. 27. See PARTNERS.

OSWALD'S LAW. The law by which was effected the ejection of married priests, and the introduction of monks into churches. Named from Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, about 964. Whart. Lex.

OTHER CASUALTY. In a lease providing that rent shall cease if the premises become untenantable by fire or other casualty, it refers to some fortuitous interruption of the use. 6 U. S. App. 42.

OTHER WRONGS. See ALIA ENORMIA.

OTHESWORTHE (Sax. eoth, oath). Worthy to make oath. Bract. 185, 192.

OUGHT. The word is generally directory, but may be taken as mandatory if the context requires it. Bract. fol. 185, 292 b.

OUNCE. The name of a weight. See WEIGHTS.

OUSTER (L. Fr. outre, oultre; Lat. ultra, beyond). Out; beyond; besides; farther; also; over and more. Le ouster, the uppermost. Over: respondeat ouster, let him answer over. Britton, c. 29. Ouster le mer, over the sea. Jacob, L. Dict. Ouster eit, he went away. 6 Co. 41 b; 9 id. 120.

To put out; to oust. Il oust, he put out or ousted. Oustes, ousted. 6 Co. 41 b.

In Torts. The actual turning out or keeping excluded the party entitled to possession of any real property corporeal.

It is the wrongful dispossession or exclusion from real property of a party entitled to the possession thereof; ouster of one cotenant by another is produced by the same acts as any other ouster; 91 Cal. 170.

An ouster can properly be only from real property corporeal, and cannot be committed of anything movable; 1 C. & P. 123; 1 Chitty, Pr. 148; nor is a mere temporary trespass considered as an ouster. Any continuing act of exclusion from the enjoyment constitutes an ouster, even by one tenant in common of his co-tenant; Co. Litt. 199 b, 200 a. See 3 Bla. Com. 167; Webb, Poll. Torts 447; 1 Chitty, Pr. 374, where the remedies for an ouster are pointed out. See 33 Cent. L. J. 297. A demand of possession by a tenant in common from his co-tenant, and refusal by the latter, constitutes an ouster from the joint possession; 107 Mo. 520. In an action of quo warranto, the judgment rendered, if against an officer or individuals, is called judgment of ouster; if against a corporation by its corporate name, it is ouster and seizure. See JUDGMENT; RESPONDEAT OUSTER; Rosc. Real Actions 502, 552, 574, 582; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 2454 a; 1 Woodd. Lect. 501; Washb. R. P.

OUSTER LE MAIN (L. Fr. to take out of the hand). In Old English Law. A delivery of lands out of the hands of the lord after the tenant came of age. If the lord refused to deliver such lands, the tenant was entitled to a writ to recover the same from the lord: this recovery out of the hands of the lord was called ouster le main. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24. Also, a livery of land out of the king's hands by judgment given in favor of the petitioner in a monstrans de droit; 3 Steph. Com. 657.

OUSTRE LE MER. Beyond the sea. A cause of excuse, if a person, being summoned, did not appear in court. Cowell.

OUT OF COURT. A plaintiff in an action at common law must have declared within one year after the service of the summons, otherwise he was out of court unless the court had, by special order, enlarged the time for declaring. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. xxi. r. 1. Whart. Lex.

Also used as a colloquial phrase applied to a litigant party when his case breaks down, equivalent to saying, "he has not a leg to stand on;" Moz. & W.

OUT OF THE STATE. Beyond sea, which title see.

OUT OF TIME. In Marine Insurance. Missing. Generally speaking, a ship may be said to be missing or out of time when she has not been heard of after the longest ordinary time in which the voyage is safely performed. 1 Arn. Ins., 6th ed. 536; 2 Duer, Ins. 469, n.

OUTER BAR. See UTTER BARRISTER.

OUTER HOUSE. A department of the court of session in Scotland, consisting of five lords ordinary, sitting each separately, to decide causes in the first instance. Paterson; Moz. & W.

OUTFANGTHEF. A liberty in the ancient common law, whereby a lord was enabled to call any man dwelling in his manor and taken for felony in another place out of his fee to judgment in his own court. Du Cange. See INFANGTHEF.

OUTFIT. An allowance made by the government of the United States to an ambassador, a minister plenipotentiary, or chargé d'affaires, on going from the United States to any foreign country.

The outfit can in no case exceed one year's full salary. No outfit is allowed to a consul. See MINISTER.

As to the meaning of "outfit" in the whaling business, see 9 Metc. 354.

OUTBUILDING. Something used in connection with a main building. 140 Mass. 287. While a stable may be a necessary outbuilding, yet when erected for use in connection with a tent placed temporarily on land, it is not so, within a restriction against the erection of a building other than dwellings of a specified value with necessary outbuildings; 159 Mass. 6. See OUTHOUSES.

OUTHOUSES. Buildings adjoining or belonging to dwelling-houses.

Buildings subservient to, yet distinct from, the principal mansion-house, located either within or without the curtilage. 4 Conn. 446; 4 Gill & J. 402; 2 Cr. & D. 479.

It is not easy to say what comes within and what is excluded from the meaning of outhouse. It has been decided that a schoolroom, separated from the dwelling-house by a narrow passage about a yard wide, the roof of which was partly upheld by that of the dwelling-house (the two buildings, together with some other, and the court which inclosed them, being rented by the same person), was properly described as an outhouse; Russ. & R. Cr. Cas. 295. See, for other cases, Co. 3d Inst. 67; 1 Leach 49; 2 East Pl. Cr. 1020; 5 C. & P. 555; 8 B. & C. 461; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 323, 336; 4 Conn. 446; 11 Ala. N. S. 594; 20 id. 30; 87 Ky. 454; 25 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1062.

OUTLAND. Land lying beyond the desmesnes and granted out to tenants at the will of the lord, like copyholds. Spelman.

OUTLAW. In English Law. One who is put out of the protection or aid of the law. 22 Viner, Abr. 316; 1 Phill. Ev. Index; Bacon Abr. Outlawry; 2 Sell. Pr. 277; Doctr. Plac. 331; 3 Bla. Com. 283, 284.

As used in the Alabama act of December 28, 1868, § 1, declaring counties liable for persons killed by an "outlaw," it is not used in the strict common-law sense of the term, but merely refers in a loose sense to the disorderly persons then roving through the state, committing acts of violence; 46 Ala. 118, 137. See 37 Me. 389.

When used with reference to a claim, as, a debt due on a promissory note, "outlawed" means barred by the statute of limitations; 37 Me. 392.

OUTLAWRY. In English Law. The act of being put out of the protection of the law, by process regularly sued out against a person who is in contempt in refusing to become amenable to the court having jurisdiction. The proceedings themselves are also called the outlawry.

At four successive county courts held month by month, a proclamation was made calling on the person "to come in to the king's peace," and at the fifth court he would be declared an outlaw. If, after this, he were caught he would be condemned to death without investigation. To slay him wherever he was found was not only the right but the duty of every true man, and even in the middle of the thirteenth century this was still the customary law of the Welsh marches; 1 Social England 296.

Outlawry may take place in criminal or in civil cases; 3 Bla. Com. 283; Co. Litt. 128.

In the United States, outlawry in civil cases is unknown, and if there are any cases of outlawry in criminal cases they are very rare; Dane, Abr. ch. 193 a, 34.

See Bac. Abr. Abatement (B), Outlawry; Gilbert, Hist. 196, 197; 2 Va. Cas. 244; 2 Dall. 92; 37 Me. 389.

OUTPARTERS. Stealers of cattle. Cowell.

OUTPUTERS. Such as set watches for the robbing any manor house. Cowell.

OUTRAGE. A grave injury; a serious wrong. This is a generic word which is applied to everything which is injurious in a great degree to the honor or rights of another. 44 Ia. 314.

OUTRIDERS. In English Practice. Bailiffs employed by the sheriffs and their deputies to ride to the farthest places of their counties or hundreds, to summon such as they thought good to attend their county or hundred court.

OUTROPER. A person to whom the business of selling by auction was confined by statute. 2 H. Bla. 557.

OUTSTANDING. Unpaid; uncollected; remaining undischarged.

OUTSTANDING CROP. One not harvested or gathered. It is outstanding from the day it commences to grow until gathered and taken away. 53 Ala. 474.

OUTSTANDING DEBT. Due but not paid; overdue; uncollected, as an outstanding draft, bond, premium, or other demand or indebtedness.

OUTSTANDING TERM. A term in gross at law, which, in equity, may be made attendant upon the inheritance, either by express declaration or by implication.

OUTSUCKEN MULTURES. Quantities of corn paid by persons voluntarily grinding corn at any mill to which they are not thirled or bound by tenure.

OUVERTURE DES SUCCESSIONS. In French Law. The right of succession which arises to one upon the death, whether natural or civil, of another. Brown.

OVERCYTED ; OVERCHYSED. Proved guilty or convicted. Blount.

OVERDRAFT. See OVERDRAW.

OVERDRAW. To draw bills or checks upon an individual, bank, or other corporation, for a greater amount of funds than the party who draws is entitled to.

When a person has overdrawn his account without any intention to do so, and afterwards gives a check on a bank, the holder is required to present it, and on refusal of payment to give notice to the maker, in order to hold him bound for it; but when the maker has overdrawn the bank knowingly, having no funds there between the time the check is given and its presentment, the notice is not requisite; 2 N. & M'C. 433; 16 Me. 36. A bank may properly refuse to pay a check which will overdraw the depositor's account, though on the bank books his balance seems to be larger than the amount of the check, because a check of his, paid by the bank two days before, had not yet been charged to such depositor; 138 Ill. 596. The president of a bank who directs the payment of checks of a customer who has no money in the bank, drawn in payment of property purchased by the customer, has no such interest in the property as will support an action by him for its conversion; 43 Mo. App. 566.

An overdraft on a bank is in the nature of a loan; it is considered a fraud on the part of the depositor; 52 Pa. 206. See 10 Wall. 647. Indebitatus assumpsit will lie against the depositor to recover the overdraft; 9 Pa. 475; 46 Ill. App. 461. See, generally, 24 N. J. L. 484.

A cashier who knowingly permits an overdraft is guilty of a breach of trust, and liable to an action to make good the amount, even though the directors had been wont to countenance him in a custom of allowing good depositors to overdraw; Morse, Bank., 3d ed. § 357.

If an overdraft on a national bank is properly made and allowed, or even if improperly allowed, the entry of the transaction on the books of the bank just as it occurred is not a false entry, under R. S. § 5209; 82 Fed. Rep. 904. The mere payment of a check which creates an overdraft is not a fraudulent misapplication of the funds; id.; and where a national bank officer arranges with a depositor in good faith to give him credit beyond his deposit and makes proper entries of his overdrafts, it is not a false entry under R. S. § 5209; 165 U. S. 323. But where the president of a bank, not acting in good faith, permitted overdrafts which he did not believe and had no reasonable ground to believe would be repaid, and it appeared that he intended by the transaction to injure and defraud the bank, the act becomes a crime; 162 U. S. 664.

OVERDUE. A bill, note, bond, or other contract for the payment of money at a particular day, when not paid upon the day, is overdue.

The indorsement of a note or bill overdue is equivalent to drawing a new bill payable at sight; 2 Conn. 419; 18 Pick. 260; 9 Ala. N. S. 153.

A note when passed or assigned after it is overdue, is subject to all the equities between the original contracting parties; 6 Conn. 5; 10 id. 30, 55; 18 N. J. L. 222; Byles, Bills 190.

OVER-INSURANCE. See DOUBLE INSURANCE.

OVERHAUL. To inquire into. The merits of a judgment can never be overhauled by an original suit. 2 H. Bla. 414.

OVERISSUE. Bonds. Where there is an agreement that a railroad company shall issue only a fixed number of bonds per mile, bonds issued in excess of the limit will be postponed in lien and payment to those within the limit; 134 U. S. 159; and one who buys bonds within the limit upon the faith of this agreement is fully entitled to the benefit of it; id.; where bonds are issued, secured by a mortgage which recites the amount of the bonds and that part of them were to be used to take up bonds of a prior issue, the lien of the mortgage will be confined to an amount of bonds which, added to the specified incumbrances, shall not exceed the limit fixed; 8 Fed. Rep. 118, where the question was raised by subsequent bondholders.

Where an issue of railroad bonds was limited in amount, and the governor of a state indorsed on them a recital that they were issued in pursuance of law, it was held that a bona fide purchaser was not bound to look beyond his certificate and that the bonds so certified in excess of the authorized issue were entitled to share pro rata with the other bonds; 2 Woods 523. Bonds are numbered for mere convenience, and holders of those of a higher number stand on the same footing, in a distribution of a fund, as those of lower numbers; id.

Where a mortgage was given to secure a specified issue of bonds and by mistake a larger number were issued and the excess came into the hands of a bona fide holder, there being nothing to put him on inquiry, the company was held estopped to set up that they were not secured by the mortgage, and it was held that the excess bonds had a prior lien as against income bonds not secured by a recorded mortgage, but not against a subsequent recorded mortgage; 1 Duv. 112. Where a statute limited the issue of bonds to the amount of the capital stock actually paid in, it was held that bonds issued in excess of this amount were illegal, and that a second mortgage bondholder could take advantage of their illegality, though the company itself did not seek to repudiate them; 10 Allen 448; but see 69 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 541, where bonds issued in excess were held to be valid to the extent of the consideration received for them. Where a railroad company was authorized to issue bonds to a certain amount in relation to the amount of the capital stock, and a mortgage was executed for a larger amount than was authorized, it was held that between bona fide holders of the mortgage bonds and the company, the bonds were entitled to the lien of the mortgage, and that subsequent creditors with notice of the bonds occupied no better position than the company; 138 Pa. 494. A constitutional provision forbidding the fictitious increase of corporate indebtedness will not be enforced where mortgage bonds are sold at par to innocent purchasers, for construction and equipment; id.

Stock. Any issue of stock of a corporation in excess of that authorized by statute or charter is void; 84 N. Y. 30; even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser; 99 Pa. 344, 513. A bona fide holder of overissued stock, purporting to be signed by an authorized corporate officer, and actually issued by the corporation, may sue the corporation in tort and recover damages; 34 N. Y. 30 (the leading case); 99 Pa. 513; Pars. Sel. Cas. 180, 216; the doctrine of estoppel applying; 18 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 383; and the same rule applies where the overissued stock is held as collateral for notes; 99 Pa. 513; not so, as to a purchaser not in good faith for full value; 134 N. Y. 83; although the signature of one corporate officer had been forged by another; 33 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 878.

If statutory or charter provisions authorize an increase of the capital stock, but the formalities prescribed for making the increase are not complied with, it is termed an irregular issue, and is voidable; 105 U. S. 143.

The authorized corporate officers and the corporation are jointly and severally liable to immediate or subsequent purchasers (buying upon the faith of certificates) of an overissue or irregular issue of stock, who have sustained damage thereby; 36 N. Y. 200.

Equity will enjoin the transfer of spurious stock, the payment of dividends thereon, or the voting thereof by the pretended owners; 78 N. Y. 159. Such stock is a cloud upon the title of the genuine stock, which a court of equity will remove at the suit of the corporation or the stockholders; 96 U. S. 198; and the holder thereof who knew it to be overissued, at the time of the subscription, can defeat an action at law on his subscription therefor; 105 U. S. 143; or an action upon a promissory note given therefor; 50 Ia. 404.

See Cook, St. & Stockh.; MORTGAGE; BOND; STOCK.

OVERPLUS. What is left beyond a certain amount; the residue; the remainder of a thing. The same as surplus.

The overplus may be certain or uncertain. It is certain, for example, when an estate is worth three thousand dollars, and the owner asserts it to be so in his will, and devises of the proceeds one thousand dollars to A, one thousand dollars to B, and the overplus to C, and in consequence of the deterioration of the estate, or from some other cause, it sells for less than three thousand dollars, each of the legatees, A, B, and C, shall take one-third. The overplus is uncertain where, for example, a testator does not know the value of his estate and gives various legacies, and the overplus to another legatee: the latter will be entitled only to what may be left; 18 Ves. 466. See RESIDUE; SURPLUS.

OVERRATE. In its strictest signification, a rating by way of excess and not one which ought not to have been made at all. 2 Ex. 352.

OVERREACHING CLAUSE. In a resettlement, a clause which saves the powers of sale and leasing annexed to the estate for life created by the original settlement, when it is desired to give the tenant for life the same estate and powers under the resettlement.

OVERRULE. To annul; to make void.

This word is frequently used to signify that a case has been decided directly opposite to a former case; when this takes place, the first-decided case is said to be overruled as a precedent, and cannot any longer be considered as of binding authority.

It also signifies that a majority of the judges of a court having decided against the opinion of the minority, in which case the latter are said to be overruled.

See PRECEDENTS.

OVERSAMESSA. A forfeiture for contempt or neglect in not pursuing a malefactor. 3 Inst. 116.

OVERSEERS OF HIGHWAYS. Officers having supervision of highways in some of the states. See COMMISSIONERS OF HIGHWAYS.

OVERSEERS OF THE POOR. Persons appointed or elected to take care of the poor with moneys furnished to them by the public authority.

The duties of these officers are regulated by local statutes. In general, the overseers are bound to perform those duties, and the neglect of them will subject them to an indictment. See 1 Bla. Com. 360; 16 Viner, Abr. 150; 1 Mass. 459; 3 id. 436; 2 N. J. L. 6, 136; 77 N. C. 494; Com. Dig. Justice of the Peace (B 63).

OVERSMAN. In Scotch Law. A person commonly named in a submission, to whom power is given to determine in case the arbiters cannot agree in the sentence. Sometimes the nomination of the oversman is left to the arbiters. In either case the oversman has no power to decide unless the arbiters differ in opinion; Erskine, Inst. 4. 3. 16. The office of an oversman very much resembles that of an umpire.

OVERT. Open.

An overt act in treason is proof of the intention of the traitor, because it opens his designs: without an overt act, treason cannot be committed; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 40. An overt act, then, is one which manifests the intention of the traitor to commit treason; Archb. Cr. Pl. 379; 4 Bla. Com. 79; Co. 3d Inst. 12; 1 Dall. 33; 2 id. 346; 4 Cra. 75; 3 Wash. C. C. 284. In order to sustain a conviction for treason under the United States constitution, there must be the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act or a confession in open court. A conspirator can be tried in any place where his co-conspirators perform an overt act; Rev. Stat. § 440. The phrase is used in relation to the Fugitive Slave Act in 5 How. 215.

In conspiracy, no overt act is needed to complete the offence; 11 Cl. & F. 155; 48 Md. 381; 49 Ind. 186. See 7 Biss. 175.

The mere contemplation or intention to commit a crime, although a sin in the sight of Heaven, is not an act amenable to human laws. The mere speculative wantonness of a licentious imagination, however dangerous or even sanguinary in its object, can in no case amount to a crime. But the moment that any overt act is manifest, the offender becomes amenable to the laws. See Cro. Car. 577; ATTEMPT; CONSPIRACY; SOLICITATION.

OWELTY. The difference which is paid or secured by one coparcener or cotenant to another for the purpose of equalizing a partition. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 612. Littleton § 251; Co. Litt, 169 a; 1 Watts 265; 16 Viner, Abr. 223, pl. 3. See 158 Pa. 396; 113 id. 578.

A charge on land for owelty of partition follows the land into the hands of a purchaser from the person to whom it was allotted; and the statute of limitation does not run against it, as the possession is not adverse; 106 N. C. 444.

OWING. Something unpaid. A debt, for example, is owing while it is unpaid, and whether it be due or not. See 40 La. Ann. 671.

In affidavits to hold to bail it is usual to state that the debt on which the action is founded is due, owing, and unpaid; 1 Pa. L. J. 210.

OWLER. In English Law. One guilty of the offence of owling (q. v.).

OWLING. In English Law. The offence of transporting wool or sheep out of the kingdom.

The name is said to owe its origin to the fact that this offence was carried on in the night, when the owl was abroad.

OWNER. He who has dominion of a thing, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal, which he has a right to enjoy and do with as he pleases,—even to spoil or destroy it, as far as the law permits, unless he be prevented by some agreement or covenant which restrains his right. See 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 578; 21 Or. 339.

Although there can be but one absolute owner of a thing, there may be a qualified ownership of the same thing by many. Thus, a bailor has the general ownership of the thing bailed, the bailee the special ownership. See 2 Cra. C. C. 83. The right of the absolute owner is more extended than that of him who has only a qualified ownership: as, for example, the use of the thing. Thus, the absolute owner of an estate, that is, an owner in fee, may cut the wood, demolish the buildings, build new ones, and dig wherever he may deem proper for minerals, stone, plaster, and similar things, which would be considered waste and would not be allowed in a qualified owner of the estate, as a lessee or a tenant for life. The word owner, when used alone, imports an absolute owner; but it has been held in Ohio that the word owner, in the mechanic's lien law of that state, includes the owner of the leasehold as well as of the reversion, on the ground that any other construction would be subversive of the policy and intent of the statute. 2 Ohio 123.

The owner continues to have the same right although he perform no acts of ownership or be disabled from performing them, and although another perform such acts without the knowledge or against the will of the owner. But the owner may lose his right in a thing if he permit it to remain in the possession of a third person for a sufficient time to enable the latter to acquire a title to it by prescription or under the statute of limitations. See La. Civ. Code, b. 2, tit. 2, c. 1; Encyclopédie d'Alembert, Proprietaire.

When there are several joint owners of a thing,—as, for example, of a ship,—the majority of them have the right to make contracts in respect of such thing in the usual course of business or repair, and the like, and the minority will be bound by such contracts; Holt 586; 5 Whart. 366; 105 Pa. 222. See PART-OWNER.

OWNERSHIP. The right by which a thing belongs to some one in particular, to the exclusion of all others. La. Civ. Code, art. 480.

OXGANG (fr. Sax. gang, going, and ox; Law Lat. bovata). In Old English Law. So much land as an ox could till. In the north of England a division of a carucate. According to some, fifteen acres. Co. Litt. 69 a; Crompton, Jurisd. 220. According to Balfour, the Scotch oxengang, or oxgate, contained twelve acres; but this does not correspond with ancient charters. See Bell, Dict. Ploughgate. Skene says thirteen acres. Cowell. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. 347.

OYER (Lat. audire; through L. French oyer, to hear).

In Pleading. A prayer or petition to the court that the party may hear read to him the deed, etc., stated in the pleadings of the opposite party, and which deed is by intendment of law in court when it is pleaded with a profert. The same end is now generally attained by giving a copy of the deed of which oyer is asked, or, in other instances, by setting forth the instrument in full in the plaintiff's statement of his case. Oyer as it existed at common law seems to be abolished in England; 1 B. & P. 646; 3 id. 398; 25 E. L. & E. 304. Oyer may be demanded of any specialty or other written instrument, as, bonds of all sorts, deeds-poll, indentures, letters testamentary and of administration, and the like, which the adverse party is obliged to plead with a profert in curia; Gould, Pl. 408. But pleading with a profert unnecessarily does not give a right to demand oyer; 1 Salk. 497; and it may not be had except when profert is made; Hempst. 265. Denial of oyer when it should be granted is ground for error; Andr. Steph. Pl. 59; 1 Blackf. 126. In such cases the party making the claim should move the court to have it entered on record, which is in the nature of a plea, and the plaintiff may counterplead the right of oyer, or strike out the rest of the pleading following the oyer, and demur; 1 Saund. 9 b, n. 1; Bac. Abr. Pleas 1; upon which the judgment of the court is either that the defendant have oyer, or that he answer without it; id.; 2 Lev. 142; 6 Mod. 28. See PROFERT IN CURIA.

After craving oyer, the defendant may set forth the deed or a part thereof, or not, at his election; 1 Chitty, Pl. 372; and may afterwards plead non est factum, or any other plea, without stating the oyer; 2 Str. 1241; 1 Wils. 97; and may demur if a material variance appear between the oyer and declaration; 2 Saund. 366, n.

See, generally, Com. Dig. Pleader (P), Abatement (I 22); 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2890.

OYER AND TERMINER. See ASSIZE; COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER.

OYEZ (Fr. hear ye). The introduction to any proclamation or advertisement by public crier. Used also by court officers in opening court. It is wrongly and usually pronounced oh yes. 4 Bla. Com. 340, n.

OYSTER. The right to take shell fish below high water mark from natural beds in tide waters is common to all citizens of the state, except as restrained by positive law or grants from the state; 50 N. J. L. 409; 32 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 166; 33 id. (Conn.) 1006. "A natural oyster-bed" is one not planted by man. 104 N. C. 764. There is a right of property in artificial oyster beds planted in public or navigable waters, in spots designated by stakes or otherwise; 27 N. J. L. 117; 22 Hun 53; the owner must clearly mark out and define his beds; 11 Barb. 248; this right is in the nature of a license from the state, which the state may revoke; 14 Wend. 41; 65 Md. 586.

The state, subject to the paramount right of navigation, is the owner of the oyster-beds in its waters and can prohibit their taking by any but its own citizens, and prescribe the times, instruments, and conditions of taking them; 36 Fed. Rep. 652; 94 U. S. 391; 76 Va. 989.

One who plants oysters on a natural bed cannot recover against one who removes them with the natural growth; 66 Conn. 285.

One who plants a bed of oysters in a bay on an arm of the sea, designating the bed, does not interfere with the common right of fishing, and may maintain trespass for an invasion of his property; 91 N. Y. 98; 7 Q. B. D. 106. Oysters deposited artificially may obstruct navigation and be a nuisance; 7 Q. B. 339.

A riparian owner has not the right to bed oysters along his entire water front; 65 Md. 586.

In Maryland by statute any citizen of any county bordering on the waters of the state may appropriate any area not exceeding an acre for bedding oysters.

An act (Maryland) exacting a license fee of three dollars per ton on oyster boats is not a tonnage tax, but a lawful compensation to the state for the privilege of taking oysters; 36 Fed. Rep. 651.

Statutes in several states, especially Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, regulate the matter.

P.

PAAGE. A toll for passage through another's land.

PACARE. To pay.

PACE. A measure of length, containing two feet and a half. The geometrical pace is five feet long. The common pace is the length of a step; the geometrical is the length of two steps, or the whole space passed over by the same foot from one step to another.

PACIFIC BLOCKADE. A means of coercion short of war, usually adopted by the joint action of several nations. An instance of it occurred when Great Britain and Germany united to prevent the slave traffic and stop the importation of arms on the east coast of Africa; Snow, Int. Law 79. In 1827 Greece was blockaded by France, Russia, and Great Britain; in 1850 the Greek ports were blockaded by Great Britain, and again in 1855 by the combined fleets of the five Great Powers.

In the blockade of Mexico by France in 1898, neutral vessels as well as Mexican were both seized and condemned. In other cases both classes of ships were seized, but were restored without compensation at the termination of conflict. In the blockades of Greece in 1850 and 1886, only Greek vessels were sequestrated.

In 1887 the Institute of International Law unanimously declared in favor of the legality of pacific blockade, subject to these conditions:—"(1) That the neutral flag can enter freely; (2) that there must, of course, be formal notice and a sufficient force; and (3) that ships of the blockaded country may be sequestrated, but should be restored with their cargoes at the end of the blockade, but without compensation." See 21 L. Mag. & Rev. 285; BLOCKADE.

PACIFICATION (Lat. pax, peace, facere, to make). The act of making peace between two countries which have been at war; the restoration of public tranquillity.

PACK. To deceive by false appearances; to counterfeit; to delude.

PACK OF WOOL. A horse load consisting of seventeen stone and two pounds. Cowell.

PACKAGE. A bundle put up for transportation or commercial handling. A parcel is a small package; 1 Hugh. 529; 44 Ala. 468, where a bale of cotton was held not a package; contra, 2 Daly 434. See L. R. 9 Ex. 67. Certain duties charged in the port of London on the goods imported and exported by aliens. Now abolished. Whart. Lex. See ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

PACKED PARCELS. The name for a consignment of goods consisting of one large parcel made up of several small ones, collected from different persons by the immediate consignor, who united them into one for his own profit, at the expense of the carrier. Whart.

PACKER. A person employed by merchants to receive and (in some instances) to select goods from manufacturers, dyers, calenders, etc., and pack the same for exportation. Arch. Bankr., 11th ed. 87.

PACKING A JURY. Improperly and corruptly selecting a jury to be sworn and impanelled for the trial of a cause. 12 Conn. 289.

PACT. In Civil Law. An agreement made by two or more persons on the same subject, in order to form some engagement, or to dissolve or modify one already made: Conventio est duorum in idem placitum consensus de re solvenda, id est facienda vel præstanda. Dig. 2. 14; Clef des Lois Rom.; Ayliffe, Pand. 558; Merlin, Rép. Pacte.

PACT DE NON ALIENANDO. A clause inserted in mortgages in Louisiana which secures to the mortgage creditor the right to foreclose his mortgage by executory process, directed solely against the mortgagor, and gives him the right to seize and sell the mortgaged property, regardless of any subsequent alienations. 35 La. Ann. 585; 36 id. 645; 124 U. S. 355. This rule applies to an alienation by condemnation in proceedings for confiscation, and as against the heirs-at-law of the person whose property is confiscated; 113 U. S. 293. If a mortgage debtor in Louisiana, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage containing this clause, waives the benefit of prescription, those who take through him are estopped from pressing it, as effectually as he is estopped; 124 U. S. 351.

PACTIONS. In International Law. Contracts between nations which are to be performed by a single act, and of which execution is at an end at once. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 100.

PACTUM CONSTITUTÆ PECUNIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement by which a person appointed to his creditor a certain day, or a certain time, at which he promised to pay; or it may be defined simply an agreement by which a person promises a creditor to pay him.

When a person by this pact promises his own creditor to pay him, there arises a new obligation, which does not destroy the former by which he was already bound, but which is accessory to it; and by this multiplicity of obligations the right of the creditor is strengthened. Pothier, Obl. pt. 2, c. 6, s. 9.

There is a striking conformity between the pactum constitutæ pecuniæ, as above defined, and our indebitatus assumpsit. The pactum constitutæ pecuniæ was a promise to pay a subsisting debt, whether natural or civil, made in such a manner as not to extinguish the preceding debt, and introduced by the prætor to obviate some formal difficulties. The action of indebitatus assumpsit was brought upon a promise for the payment of a debt; it is not subject to the wager of law and other technical difficulties of the regular action of debt; but by such promise the right to the action of debt was not extinguished nor varied; 4 Co. 91, 95. See 1 H. Bla. 550, 850; Brooke, Abr. Action sur le Case (pl. 7, 69, 73); 4 B. & B. 295; 1 Chitty, Pl. 89.

PACTUM DE NON PETENDO (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement made between a creditor and his debtor that the former will not demand from the latter the debt due. By this agreement the debtor is freed from his obligation. This is not unlike the covenant not to sue, of the common law. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 755; Leake, Contr., 3d ed. 798.

PACTUM DE QUOTA LITIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement by which a creditor of a sum difficult to recover promises a portion—for example, one-third—to the person who will undertake to recover it. In general attorneys should abstain from making such a contract: yet it is not unlawful at common law. See CHAMPERTY.

PAIN FORTE ET DURE. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE.

PAINS AND PENALTIES. See BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES.

PAINTING. A likeness, image, or scene depicted with paints. Cent. Dict. The term does not necessarily mean anything upon which painting has been done by a workman, but rather something of value as a painting and something on which skill has been bestowed in producing it; 3 Exch. Div. 121. Whether certain articles fall within the description of paintings as used in a statute is a question of fact for a jury; id.

Paintings on porcelain, the value of which depends on the skill of the artist, are dutiable as porcelain and not as china porcelain and parian ware gilded, decorated, or ornamented in any manner; 103 U. S. 677. As to copyright in paintings, see COPYRIGHT.

PAIRING-OFF. A system in vogue both in parliament and in legislative bodies in this country, whereby a member agrees with a member on the opposite side, that they shall both be absent from voting during a given time, or upon a particular question. It is said to have originated in the house of commons in Cromwell's time. See May, Parl. Prac.

PAIS, PAYS. A French word, signifying country. In law, matter in pais is matter of fact, in opposition to matter of record; a trial per pais is a trial by the country,—that is, by a jury. See IN PAIS.

PALACE CAR. See SLEEPING CAR.

PALACE COURT. In English Law. A court which had jurisdiction of all personal actions arising between any parties within twelve miles of Whitehall, not including the city of London.

It was erected in the time of Charles I., and was held by the steward of the household, the knight-marshal and steward of the court, or his deputy. It had its sessions once a week, in the borough of Southwark. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, § 13. See COURT OF MARSHALSEA.

PALAGIUM. A duty to lords of manors for exporting and importing vessels of wine at any of their ports. Jacob.

PALATINE. Possessing royal privileges. See COUNTY PALATINE; COURTS OF COUNTY PALATINE.

PALFRIDUS (L. Lat.). A palfrey; a horse to travel on. Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 93.

PALLIO COOPERIRE. (To cover with a cloak.) An ancient custom, where the parents of children born out of wedlock afterwards intermarried, of the parents and children standing together under a cloth extended, while the marriage was solemnized, the act being in the nature of adoption. Toml. See LEGITIMATION.

PALMER'S ACT. Statutes 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16, which enable a person accused of crime committed out of the jurisdiction of the central criminal court to be tried in that court.

PALMISTRY. The art or practice of telling fortunes by a feigned interpretation of the lines and marks on the hand. The word is used by good writers in the sense of a trick with the hand. 2 Exch. Div. 268.

PAMPHLET. A small book usually printed in octavo form and stitched.

Pamphlet laws. The name given in some states to the publication of the acts of the legislature. In Pennsylvania and Delaware they are originally published from session to session, unbound, with continuous paging, and indexed and bound after a number of sessions.

PANDECTS. In Civil Law. The name of an abridgment or compilation of the civil law, made by Tribonian and others, by order of the emperor Justinian, and to which he gave the force of law, A. D. 533.

It is also known by the name of the Digest, because in his compilation the writings of the jurists were reduced to order and condensed quasi digestiæ. The emperor, in 530, published an ordinance entitled De Conceptione Digestorum, which was addressed to Tribonian, and by which he was required to select some of the most distinguished lawyers to assist him in composing a collection of the best decisions of the ancient lawyers, and compile them in fifty books, without confusion or contradiction. The instructions of the emperor were to select what was useful, to omit what was antiquated or superfluous, to avoid contradictions, and by the necessary changes, to produce a complete body of law. This work was a companion to the Code of Justinian, and was to be governed in its arrangement of topics by the method of the Code. Justinian allowed the commissioners, who were sixteen in number, ten years to compile it; but the work was completed in three years, and promulgated in 533. A list of the writers from whose works the collection was made, and an account of the method pursued by the commissioners, will be found in Smith's Dict. of Gr. & Rom. Antiq. About a third of the collection is taken from Ulpian; Julius Paulus, a contemporary of Ulpian, stands next: these two contributed one-half of the Digest. Papinian comes next. The Digest, although compiled in Constantinople, was originally written in Latin, and afterwards translated into Greek.

The Digest is divided in two different ways: the first into fifty books, each book in several titles, and each title into several extracts or leges, and at the head of each series of extracts is the name of the lawyer from whose work they were taken. The fifty books are allotted in seven parts.

The division into digestum vetus (book first to and including title second of book twenty-fourth), digestum infortiatum (title third of book twenty-fourth, to and including book thirty-eighth), and digestum novum (from book thirty-ninth to the end), has reference to the order in which these three parts appeared. As to the methods of citing them, see CITATION OF AUTHORITIES.

The Pandects—as well indeed as all Justinian's laws, except some fragments of the Code and Novels—were lost to all Europe for a considerable period. During the pillage of Amalfi, in the war between the two soi-disant popes Innocent II. and Anaclet II., a soldier discovered an old manuscript, which attracted his attention by its envelope of many colors. It was carried to the Emperor Clothaire, and proved to be the Pandects of Justinian. The work was arranged in its present order by Warner, a German, whose Latin name is Irnerius, who was appointed by that emperor Professor of Roman Law at Bologna. 1 Fournel. Hist. des Avocats 44. The style of the work is very grave and pure, and contrasts in this respect with that of the Code, which is very far from classical. On the other hand, the learning of the Digest stands rather in the discussing of subtle questions of law, and enumerations of the variety of opinions of ancient lawyers thereupon, than in practical matters of daily use, of which the Code so simply and directly treats. See Eidley, View, pt. I. ch. 1, 2.

While the Pandects form much the largest fraction of the Corpus Juris their relative value and importance are far more than proportional to their extent. They are, in fact, the soul of the Corpus Juris. Hadley, Rom. L. 11.

PANEL (diminutive from either pane, apart, or page, pagella. Cowell). In Practice. A schedule or roll, containing the names of jurors summoned by virtue of a writ of venire facias, and annexed to the writ. It is returned into court whence the venire issued. Co. Litt. 158 b; 3 Bla. Com. 353; 40 Cal. 586. See 89 Ill. 575. The word may be used to designate either the whole number of jurors summoned or those selected by the clerk by lot according to the connection in which it is used. 76 Ia. 141.

In Scotch Law. The prisoner at the bar, or person who takes his trial before the court of justiciary for some crime. So called from the time of his appearance. Bell, Dict. Spelled, also, pannel.

PANTOMIME. A dramatic performance in which gestures take the place of words. 3 C. B. 871.

PAPACY. See PAPIST.

PAPER. A manufactured substance composed of fibres (whether vegetable or animal) adhering together in forms consisting of sheets of various sizes and of different thicknesses, used for writing or printing or other purposes to which flexible sheets are applicable. 4 H. & N. 470. Books are not paper within the meaning of the tariff act; 104 U. S. 735.

PAPER BLOCKADE. An ineffective blockade. See BLOCKADE.

PAPER-BOOK. In Practice. A book or paper containing an abstract of all the facts and pleadings necessary to the full understanding of a case.

The issues in actions, etc., upon special pleadings, made up by the clerk of the papers, who is an officer for that purpose. Upon an issue in law, it is termed the demurrer-book. The clerks of the papers of the court of K. B., in all copies of pleas and paper-books by them made up, shall subscribe to such paper-books the names of the counsel who have signed such pleas, as well on behalf of the plaintiff as defendant; and in all paper-books delivered to the judges of the court, the names of the counsel who did sign those pleas are to be subscribed to the books by the clerks or attorneys who deliver the same. Jac. L. Dict.; 2 Hill, Abr. 268.

The courts of error, and other courts, on arguments, require that the judges shall each be furnished with such a paper-book; Tr. & H. Pr. 867. In Pennsylvania the printed copy of the record, the argument, etc., used in the supreme and superior courts is so called.

In the court of king's bench, in England, the transcript containing the whole of the proceedings filed or delivered between the parties, when the issue joined is an issue in fact, is called the paper-book. Steph. Pl. 95; 3 Bla. Com. 317; 3 Chitt. Pr. 521; 2 Stra. 1181, 1266; 2 Wils. 243.

In modern English practice under the Jud. Act of 1875, printed copies of every special case must now be delivered by the plaintiff (Ord. xxxiv. r. 3). And any party who enters an action for trial must deliver to the officer of the court a copy of the whole of the pleadings in the action for the use of the judge at the trial. Ord. xxxvi. r. 17.

PAPER CREDIT. Credit given on the security of any written obligation purporting to represent property.

PAPER-DAYS. In English Law. Days on which special arguments are to take place. Tuesdays and Fridays in term-time are paper-days appointed by the court. Lee, Dict. of Pr.; Archb. Pr. 101.

PAPER MONEY. The engagements to pay money which are issued by governments and banks, and which pass as money. Pardessus, Droit. Com. n. 9. Bank-notes are generally considered as cash, and will answer all the purposes of currency; but paper money is not a legal tender if objected to. But see LEGAL TENDER.

See NATIONAL BANKS; MONEY; GOLD.

PAPER OFFICE. An ancient office in the palace of Whitehall, wherein state papers are kept. Also an ancient office for the court records in the court of queen's bench, sometimes called the paper-mill, Moz. & W. See Jac. L. Dict.

PAPER TITLE. A title to land evidenced by one or more conveyances, the term generally implying that such title, while it has color or plausibility, is without substantial validity. Black, L. Dict.

PAPERS. The term does not mean newspapers or perhaps even include them within the meaning of a statute, the object of which is to prevent a jury from receiving any evidence, papers, or documents not authorized by the court. 42 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 216. In a will, "all my books and papers" include a promissory note; 49 N. H. 107.

The constitution of the United States provides that the rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated. See SEARCH WARRANT.

PAPIST. A term applied by Protestants to Roman Catholics.

By the act of 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, known as the Catholic Emancipation Act, Roman Catholics were restored in general to the full enjoyment of all civil rights, except that of holding ecclesiastical offices and certain high appointments in the state. Before that act their condition had been much ameliorated by various statutes, beginning with 18 Geo. III. c. 60. As to the right of holding property for religious purposes, the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115, placed them on a level with Protestant dissenters, and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 49, repealed all enactments oppressive to Roman Catholics. See Whart. Lex.

See 2 Phill. Int. L. for a history of the political status of the Papacy.

PAR. Equal. It is used to denote a state of equality or equal value. Bills of exchange, stocks, and the like, are at par when they sell for their nominal value; above par, or below par, when they sell for more or less; 57 Ga. 324; 8 Paige 527; 22 Pa. 479.

PAR DELICTUM. Equal guilt. See IN PARI DELICTO; PARI DELICTO.

PAR OF EXCHANGE. The par of the currencies of any two countries means the equivalence of a certain amount of the currency of the one in the currency of the other, supposing the currency of both to be of the precise weight and purity fixed by their respective mints. 26 Wend. 224. The exchange between the two countries is said to be at par when bills are negotiated on this footing. Bowen, Pol. Econ. 321. See 11 East 267.

PAR ONERI. Equal to the burden or charge, or to the detriment or damage.

PAR VALUE. A current phrase having no other meaning than the value of the pound sterling formerly fixed by law for the purposes of revenue. 10 Allen 44. It is commonly used to indicate the face value of bonds or stock.

PARAGE. Equality of blood, name, or dignity, but more especially of land in the partition of an inheritance between co-heirs. Co. Litt. 166 b. See TENURE.

In Feudal Law. Where heirs took of the same stock and by same title, but, from right of primogeniture, or some other cause, the shares were unequal, the younger was said to hold of the elder, jure et titulo paragii, by right and title of parage being equal in everything but the quantity, and owing no homage or fealty. Calv. Lex. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 261, 274, 289.

PARAGIUM (from the Latin adjective par, equal; made a substantive by the addition of agium; 1 Thomas Co. Litt. 681). Equality.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The portion which a woman gets on her marriage. Ayl. Par. 336.

PARAGRAPH. A distinct part of a discourse or writing relating to a particular point.

An entire or integral statement of a cause of action equivalent to a count at common law. 63 Fed. Rep. 488. Where a complaint contains several causes of action, each must be distinctly paragraphed and numbered; 19 U. S. App. 157.

PARAGUAY. A republic of South America. The president is elected for four years and is assisted by responsible ministers. The legislation is in the senate and house of deputies, both representative. The civil and criminal courts are administered in Asuncion.

PARALLEL. Extending in the same direction, and in all parts equidistant; having the same direction or tendency. 14 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 803. See 144 Mass. 254.

In the specification of a patent the word was construed in its popular sense of going side by side and not in its purely mathematical sense; 2 App. Cas. 423; and so in 32 Cal. 231; 2 Cal. Cas. 363; 5 Johns. 489; 3 Me. 1031, where it was held that parallel lines were not necessarily straight lines. As to parallel and competing railroads, see MERGER.

PARAMOUNT (par, by, mounter, to ascend). Above; upwards. Kelh. Norm. Dict. Paramount especifié, above specified. Plowd. 209 a.

That which is superior: usually applied to the highest lord of the fee of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. Fitzh. N. B. 135. Where A lets land to B, and he underlets them to C, in this case A is the paramount and B is the mesne landlord. See 2 Bla. Com. 90; 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 484, n. 79, 485, n. 81; MESNE.

PARANOIA. A form of insanity which comes under the class of degenerative diseases. The main fundamental characteristic of this disease is a delusion which has become a part of the belief of the individual, and which he believes himself able to explain and defend. 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 288.

It is sometimes characterized as logical perversion, and is said to have "misplaced the antiquated term monomania, which not only implied that the delusion was restricted to one subject, but was otherwise insufficient and misleading;" 2 Clevenger, Med. Jur. 860. The memory, emotions, judgment, and conceptions are in most cases unimpaired, though each of these mental divisions may be involved; id. The intellect is rarely much involved. In all other relations the individual may be able to carry on his business in life. There is little doubt but that they are thoroughly responsible for their own actions. But if the act be the result of their delusion it is not so much a question of their ability to control their actions, as that they do not attempt to do so. 3 Witth. & Beck. 289.

PARAPHERNA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Goods brought by wife to husband over and above her dower (dos). Voc. Jur. Utr.; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 23, § 6; Mack. C. L. § 529.

PARAPHERNALIA. Apparel and ornaments of a wife, suitable to her rank and degree. 2 Bla. Com. 435.

Those goods which a wife could bequeath by her testament. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 427.

These are subject to the control of the husband during his lifetime; 3 Atk. 394; but go to the wife upon his death, in preference to all other representatives; Cro. Car. 343; and cannot be devised away by the husband; Noy, Max. They are liable to be sold to pay debts on a failure of assets; 1 P. Wms. 730. See, also, 2 Atk. 642; 11 Vin. Abr. 176. The judge of probate may, in the practice of most states, make an allowance to the widow of a deceased person which more than takes the place of the paraphernalia.

While a married woman may acquire title to articles of apparel by gift from her husband, yet her mere use and enjoyment of such articles purchased by her husband does not give title thereto as her separate property; 12 S. C. 180; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 508. See, also, 35 Ohio St. 514. The wearing apparel purchased by a married woman after her marriage, with her husband's money, or upon his credit, belongs to him as against her creditors; 87 Mich. 62. In New York, by statute, a married woman may sue in her own name for injury to her paraphernalia; 48 N. Y. 212; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 548; but in the absence of proof of a gift to her, the husband can sue; 74 N. Y. 116; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 271.

In some states, the paraphernalia of a wife is protected by statute (in Georgia by name, and in Rhode Island and Colorado by description). The articles covered by one or more of the statutes are: wearing apparel of the wife and such ornaments, jewelry, silver, table ware, plate, and such articles of property as have been given to her for her own use and comfort. In Louisiana the property not declared to be brought in marriage by the wife, or given to her in consideration of the marriage, is paraphernalia, and she has a right to administer it without the assistance of her husband; but as to any which is administered by her husband without her opposition, he is accountable for it. See MARRIED WOMAN.

PARAPHERNAUX BIENS. In French Law. All the property of the wife which is not subject to the régime dotal. Brown.

PARASYNEXIS. In Civil Law. A conventicle or unlawful meeting. Whart.

PARATITLA (Lat.). In Civil Law. An abbreviated explanation of some titles or books of the Code or Digest.

PARATUM HABEO (Lat. I have ready). In Practice. A return made by the sheriff to a capias ad respondendum, which signified that he had the defendant ready to bring into court. This was a fiction, where the defendant was at large. Afterwards he was required, by statute, to take bail from the defendant, and he returned cepi corpus and bail-bond. But still he might be ruled to bring in the body; 7 Pa. 535.

PARAVAIL. Tenant paravail is the lowest tenant of the fee, or he who is the immediate tenant to one who holds of another. He is called tenant paravail because it is presumed he has the avails or profits of the land. Fitzh. N. B. 135; Co. 2d Inst. 296.

PARCEL. A part of the estate. 38 Ia. 141; 1 Comyns, Dig. Abatement (H 51), Grant (E 10). Under a statute providing for an assessment of unplatted lands, synonymous with lot. 38 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 468. To parcel is to divide an estate. Bac. Abr. Conditions (O).

A small bundle or package.

The word "parcel" is not a sufficient description of the property alleged in an indictment to have been stolen. The prisoner was indicted for stealing "one parcel, of the value of one shilling, of the goods," etc. The parcel in question was taken from the hold of a vessel, out of a box broken open by the prisoner. Held an insufficient description; 7 Cox, C. C. 13. See PACKAGE.

PARCEL MAKERS. Two officers in the exchequer who formerly made the parcels of the escheator's accounts, wherein they charged them for everything they had levied for the sovereign's use within the time of their being in office, and delivered the same to the auditors to make up their accounts therewith. Whart. Law Lex.

PARCELS, BILL OF. See BILL OF PARCELS.

PARCENARY. The state or condition of holding title to lands jointly by parceners, before the common inheritance has been divided.

PARCENERS. The daughters of a man or woman seised of lands and tenements in fee-simple or fee-tail, on whom, after the death of such ancestor, such lands and tenements descend, and they enter. See ESTATE IN COPARCENARY.

PARCHMENT. Skeepskins dressed for writing, so called from Pergamus, Asia Minor, where they were invented. Used for deeds, and was used for writs of summons in England previous to the Judicature Act, 1875. Whart. Lex.

PARCO FRACTO (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ against one who violently breaks a pound and takes from thence beasts which, for some trespass done, or some other just cause, were lawfully impounded.

PARDON. An act of grace, usually proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment which the law inflicts for a crime he has committed. 7 Pet. 160; 19 N. Y. S. 508.

Every pardon granted to the guilty is in derogation of the law; if the pardon be equitable, the law is bad; for where legislation and the administration of the law are perfect, pardons must be a violation of the law. But, as human actions are necessarily imperfect, the pardoning power must be vested somewhere, in order to prevent injustice when it is ascertained that an error has been committed.

An absolute pardon is one which frees the criminal without any condition whatever.

A conditional pardon is one to which a condition is annexed, performance of which is necessary to the validity of the pardon. 1 Bail. 283; 10 Ark. 284; 1 M'Cord 176; 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 47. See 27 N. J. L. 637.

A general pardon is one which extends to all offenders of the same kind. It may be express, as when a general declaration is made that all offenders of a certain class shall be pardoned, or implied, as in case of the repeal of a penal statute. 2 Over. 423.

The pardoning power is lodged in the executive of the United States and of the various states, and extends to all offences except in cases of impeachment. In some states a concurrence of one of the legislative bodies is required; in other states, boards of pardon have been provided, whose recommendation of a pardon to the executive is a prerequisite to the exercise of the power. See the titles of the several states. The constitutional power of pardon vested in the executive is not subject to legislative control, either to limit the effect of a pardon, or to exclude from its operation any class of offenders; 4 Wall. 333; 169 Pa. 316. In Pennsylvania, the act of March 31, 1860, provides that when any person convicted of a felony, etc., has endured his punishment, it shall have the same effect as a pardon, and he becomes a competent witness; this is a legislative pardon and has the same effect as an executive pardon; 53 Fed. Rep. 352. The pardoning power is by no means confined to the executive; it was possessed by parliament (4 Bla. Com. 401; 7 Pet. 162); and from the very nature of government, in Pennsylvania it is vested in the legislative branch by the inherent supreme law-making power, and in the executive by constitutional provision; 53 Fed. Rep. 352.

The power of pardon conferred by the constitution upon the president is unlimited, except in cases of impeachment. It extends to every offence known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. A pardon reaches the punishment prescribed for an offence, and the guilt of the offender. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching: if granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights. It gives him a new credit and capacity. It blots out his guilt and makes him, in the eye of the law, as innocent as if he had never committed the offence. There is only this limitation to its operation; it does not restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others, in consequence of the conviction and judgment; 4 Wall. 333. See 93 Ky. 156; 26 N. J. L. 326; 27 id. 637. It may be granted after conviction and before sentence while exceptions are pending; 109 Mass. 328, where there is an extended discussion of the pardoning power by Gray, J.

The granting of a full and unconditional pardon by the president to a person convicted of a felony restores his competency as a witness, and this result is not affected by a recital in a pardon that it was granted for the reason, among others, that his testimony was desired by the government in a cause then pending in a federal court; 142 U. S. 450; and a pardon granted after the person has served his term of imprisonment has the same effect; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 98.

There are several ways (as given by Judge Cooley) in which the pardoning power of the president may be exercised: 1. A pardon may be given to a person under conviction by name, and this will take effect from its delivery, unless otherwise provided therein. 2. It may be given to one or more persons named, or to a class of persons, before conviction, and even before prosecution begun. Such a pardon is rather in the nature of an amnesty. 3. It may be given by proclamation, forgiving all persons who may have been guilty of the specified offence, or offences; 4 Wall. 330, 380; 13 id. 128; and in this case the pardon takes effect from the time the proclamation is signed; 17 Wall. 191. See infra. 4. It may in any of these ways be made a pardon on conditions to be first performed, in which case it has effect only on performance; or on conditions to be thereafter performed, in which case a breach of the condition will place the offender in the position occupied by him before the pardon was issued; 7 Pet. 150; 2 Caines 57; 1 McCord 176; 64 Cal. 29.

In Michigan it has been held that a pardoned convict charged with having violated the conditions of his release must be arrested and tried in the same manner as other offenders against the law; 62 Mich. 496; but in South Carolina a convict who has broken the conditions of his pardon may be remanded to the penitentiary to serve out the remainder of his sentence, though the time in which he was to serve has expired; 32 S. C. 14. A power to grant pardons on condition that the person pardoned shall leave the state and not return to it, is not in conflict with a constitutional provision which provides that no one shall be exiled from the state; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 106.

It is to be exercised in the discretion of the power with whom it is lodged.

As to promises of pardon to accomplices, see 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 83; 1 Leach 115.

In order to render a pardon valid, it must express with accuracy the crime intended to be forgiven; 4 Bla. Com. 400; 3 Wash. C. C. 335; 7 Ind. 359; 1 Jones N. C. 1.

The effect of a pardon is to protect the criminal from punishment for the offence pardoned; 6 Wall. 766; 16 id. 147; 91 U. S. 474; but for no other; 10 Ala. 475; 1 Bay 34. It seems that the pardon of an assault and battery, which afterwards becomes murder by the death of the person beaten, would not operate as a pardon of the murder: 12 Pick. 496. See Plowd. 401; 1 Hill N. Y. 426. In general, the effect of a full pardon is to restore the convict to all his rights; 169 Pa. 319; even though granted after he has served out his sentence, it restores his competency to testify; 23 U. S. App. 344; 142 U. S. 450; but to this there are some exceptions. First, it does not restore civil capacity; 2 Leigh 724. See 1 Strobh. 150; 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 451; 33 N. H. 388. Second, it does not affect a status of other persons which has been altered or a right which has accrued in consequence of the commission of the crime or its punishment; 10 Johns. 232; 2 Bay 565; 5 Gilm. 214; or third persons who, by the prosecution of judicial proceedings, may have acquired rights to a share in penalties or to property forfeited and actually sold; 4 Wash. C. C. 64; 9 Fed. Rep. 645; but see 4 Biss. 336; 6 Wall. 766 (as to forfeiture to U. S.).

In England a pardon removes not only the punishment but the legal disabilities consequent on the crime, wherever the latter are the consequence of the judgment, but where it is declared by act of parliament to be a part of the punishment, as in case of perjury under the 5 Eliz. c. 9, pardon will not make the person competent; 2 Russ. Cr. 975, followed in 1 Park. Cr. Rep. 241; 24 Ill. 298. See 11 Am. Jur. 356. But this distinction does not obtain here; 169 Pa. 316; 4 Wall. 333. It has been held in Ohio that a prisoner could not be tried on the charge of being a habitual criminal after having been pardoned by the governor for the previous offence; 56 Alb. L. J. 5.

When the pardon is general, either by an act of amnesty, or by the repeal of a penal law, it is not necessary to plead it; because the court is bound, ex officio, to take notice of it; Baldw. 91; 145 U. S. 546. A criminal cannot even waive such pardon, because by his admittance no one can give the court power to punish him when it judicially appears there is no law to do it. But when the pardon is special, to avail the criminal it must judicially appear that it has been accepted; and for this reason it must be specially pleaded; 4 Bla. Com. 401; 7 Pet. 150, 162; and if he has obtained a pardon before arraignment, and, instead of pleading it in bar, he pleads the general issue, he shall be deemed to have waived the benefit of it, and cannot afterwards avail himself of it in arrest of judgment; 1 Rolle 297. See 1 Dy. 34 a; T. Raym. 13; 3 Metc. Mass. 453.

The power to pardon extends to punishments for contempt; 7 Blatch. 23.

All contracts made for the buying or procuring a pardon for a convict are void; and such contracts will be declared null by a court of equity, on the ground that they are opposed to public policy; 4 Bouvier, Inst. 3857.

A mayor of a city may be vested with power to pardon one convicted of the violation of an ordinance. See 46 Fed. Rep. 52.

See AMNESTY.

PARDONERS. Persons who carried about the pope's indulgences and sold them. Whart. Law Lex.

PARENS PATRIÆ (Lat.). Father of his country. In England, the king; 3 Bla. Com. 427; 2 Steph. Com. 528; in the United States the state, as sovereign, has power of guardianship over persons under disabilities. See 17 How. 398.

PARENTAGE. Kindred in the direct ascending line. See 2 Bouv. Inst. n. 1955. For a discussion of the subject in connection with citizenship, see 2 Kent 49; Morse, Citizenship; CITIZEN; NATURALIZATION.

PARENTELA. The sum of those persons who trace descent from one ancestor. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 294. See LINE.

PARENTS. The lawful father and mother of the party spoken of. 1 Murph. N. C. 336; 11 S. & R. 93.

The term parent differs from that of ancestor, the latter embracing not only the father and mother, but every person in an ascending line. It differs also from predecessor, which is applied to corporators. 7 Ves. Ch. 522; 1 Murph. N. C. 336; 6 Binn. 255. See FATHER; MOTHER.

By the civil law, grandfathers and grandmothers, and other ascendants, were, in certain cases, considered parents. Dict. de Jur. Parents. See 1 Ashm. 55; 2 Kent 159; 5 East 223.

PARES (Lat.). A man's equals; his peers. 3 Bla. Com. 349.

PARES CURIÆ (Lat.). In Feudal Law. Those vassals who were bound to attend the lord's court. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, tit. 3, s. 17; 1 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 1. See MAGNA CHARTA.

PARI DELICTO (Lat.). In a similar offence or crime; equal in guilt or in legal fault.

A person who is in pari delicto with another differs from a particeps criminis in this, that the former term always includes the latter, but the latter does not always include the former. 8 East 381.

Ordinarily where two persons are in pari delicto the law will not relieve them; see CONTRIBUTION. But this doctrine does not apply where a president of a national bank has borrowed an amount exceeding twenty per cent. of its capital stock and suit is brought to recover the amount; 49 N. Y. Supp. 270.

The rule that both parties to an ultra vires contract are in pari delicto, and therefore a court of equity will not interpose to restore to one of them rights which it has thus parted with, is inapplicable to a municipal corporation whose trustees attempt to make an invalid grant; 56 Fed. Rep. 867.

PARI MATERIA (Lat.). Of the same matter; on the same subject: as laws pari materia must be construed with reference to each other. Bacon, Abr. Statute (I 8).

PARI PASSU (Lat.). By the same gradation. Used especially of creditors who, in marshalling assets, are entitled to receive out of the same fund without any precedence over each other.

PARI PASSU BONDS. A name given in Scotland to certain bonds secured upon lands which share an equal benefit of the security. Where several securities are created over the same lands by separate bonds and dispositions in security, they would ordinarily have priority according to the date of registration of the sasine or bond, as the case may be. If it is intended to have them rank as pari passu, it is usual to insert a clause in each bond declaring that they shall be so ranked without regard to their priority of registration. 9 Jurid. Rev. 74.

PARIS, DECLARATION OF. See DECLARATION OF PARIS; BLOCKADE; NEUTRALITY.

PARISH. A district of country, of different extents. As used in the revised statutes, the word is synonymous with county; 28 Fed. Rep. 840; as also in the state of Louisiana.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The territory committed to the charge of a parson, or vicar, or other minister. Ayl. Par. 404; 2 Bla. Com. 112; Hoffm. Eccl. Law.

Although, in the absence of a state church in this country, the status of parishes is comparatively unimportant, yet in the Protestant Episcopal Church, at least, their boundaries and the rights of the clergy therein are quite clearly defined by canon. In the leading case of Stubbs and Boggs v. Tyng, decided in New York, in March, 1868, the defendant was found guilty of violating a canon of the church, in having officiated, without the permission of plaintiffs within the corporate bounds of the city of New Brunswick, N. J., which then constituted the plaintiffs' parochial cure. Baum 108. As to their origin, see 2 Hallam, Mid. Ages, c. 7, p. 144. See, also, 1 Poll. & Maitl. 548, 602.

In New England. Divisions of a town, originally territorial, but which now constitute quasi-corporations, consisting of those connected with a certain church. See 2 Mass. 501; 16 id. 457, 488; 1 Pick. 91. Synonymous with church and used in the same sense as society. 16 Conn. 299.

PARISH APPRENTICES. The children of parents unable to maintain them, who are apprenticed by the overseers of the poor of their parish, to such persons as may be willing to receive them. 2 Steph. Com. 230.

PARISH CLERK. In English Law. An officer, in former times often in holy orders, and appointed to officiate at the altar; now his duty consists chiefly in making responses in church to the minister. By common law he has a freehold in his office, but it seems now to be falling into desuetude. 2 Steph. Com, 11th ed. 713; Moz. & W.

PARISH CONSTABLE. See CONSTABLE.

PARISH COURT. In Louisiana the local courts in each parish, corresponding generally to county and probate courts, and, in some respects, justices' courts, in other states were formerly so called.

PARISH OFFICERS. Churchwardens, overseers, and constables.

PARISH PRIEST. The parson; a minister who holds a parish as a benefice.

PARISHIONERS. Members of a parish. In England, for many purposes they form a body politic. See PARISH.

PARITOR. A beadle; a summoner to the courts of civil law.

PARIUM JUDICIUM (Lat. the decision of equals). The right of trial by one's peers: i. e. by jury in the case of a commoner, by the house of peers in the case of a peer.

PARK (L. Lat. parcus). An inclosure. 2 Bla. Com. 38. A pound. Reg. Orig. 166; Cowell. An inclosed chase extending only over a man's own grounds. 13 Car. II. c. 10; Manw. For. Laws; Crompton, Jur. fol. 148; 2 Bla. Com. 38.

A pleasure-ground in or near a city, set apart for the recreation of the public; a piece of ground enclosed for purposes of pleasure, exercise, amusement, or ornament. 36 N. Y. 120. A place for the resort of the public for recreation, air, and light; a place open for everyone. 40 N. J. L. 613. See 98 Cal. 43.

Public parks may be dedicated to the public like highways; 143 Mass. 521; 23 Ore. 176; and at common law, upon such dedication, the fee remains in the owners; 154 Mass. 323. Non-user by the public, however long continued, will not affect the public right or revest the title in the donor; 81 Wis. 313. The title is usually vested in municipalities by the legislature; 106 N. Y. 496; 27 Mich. 262; 148 Mass. 580; and held by them in trust for the use of the public. The municipality cannot lease them; 60 Ga. 221; nor can the legislature; 7 Ohio 218; but see 3 West. L. Bul. 551, where a right of way was granted through a public park in consideration of an agreed rental.

A public park may be crossed by a street railway where such use will not materially interfere with its enjoyment by the public; 76 Cal. 176; and compensation may not be demanded for the taking; 44 N. E. Rep. (Mass). 446; but it is also held that parks dedicated to the public use are not subject to a right of way for a street railway, and that neither the municipality nor the legislature can divert them for that purpose; 67 Ill. 540; Booth, St. Ry. L. § 11.

A park or public square may be enclosed, notwithstanding it has remained open many years; 58 Tex. 183; 2 Ohio St. 107; contra, 3 Pa. 206, where it was held that a public square was as much a highway as though it were a street, and that neither the county nor the public could block it up, to the prejudice of the public or an individual. See, also, 3 Ore. 226; 85 Mo. 674.

A city is not bound to keep parks in safe condition; 148 Mass. 580; 128 id. 584; and is not liable for injuries caused by a horse frightened by the firing of a cannon therein; 148 Mass. 580; but it must contribute to an assessment for the improvement of streets by which a park is bounded in common with private owners benefited thereby; 42 Ill. 192.

As to the right of the municipality to make regulations for the preservation of order in a park or public square, see POLICE POWER; LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

See, generally, DEDICATION; EMINENT DOMAIN; RAILROAD.

PARLE HILL (also called Parling Hill). A hill where courts were held in olden times. Cowell.

PARLIAMENT (said to be derived from parler la ment, to speak the mind, or parum lamentum).

In English Law. The legislative branch of the government of Great Britain, consisting of the house of lords and the house of commons.

The parliament is usually considered to consist of the kings, lords, and commons. See 1 Bla. Com. 147*, 157*, Chitty's note; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 341. In 1 Woodd. Lect. 30, the lords temporal, the lords spiritual, and the commons are called the three estates of the realm: yet the king is called a part of the parliament, in right of his prerogative of veto and the necessity of his approval to the passage of a bill. That the connection between the king and the lords temporal, the lords spiritual, and the commons, who when assembled in parliament form the three estates of the realm, is the same as that which subsists between the king and those estates—the people at large—out of parliament, the king not being in either case a member, branch, or co-estate, but standing solely in the relation of sovereign or head. See Colton, Record 710; Rot. Parl. vol. iii. 623 a; 2 M. & G. 457, n.

The House of Lords was the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom. It had no original jurisdiction (except to a certain extent before the reign of Charles II.), but was the court of appeal in the last resort, with a few exceptions and under some limitations as to the right, from the inferior courts upon appeal or writ of error for mistakes of law. Appeals lay to this tribunal from Scotch and Irish courts, in some cases. See stat. 4 Geo. IV. c. 85, as to Scotch, and stat. 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 67, art. 8, as to Irish, appeals.

This body, when sitting as a court of law, was presided over by the lord chancellor, whose attendance alone was in any respect compulsory, and was composed of as many of its members who had filled judicial stations as chose to attend. Three laymen also attended in rotation, but did not vote upon judicial matters; 11 Cl. & F. 421. In the absence of the chancellor, deputy speakers, who were members of the profession but not of the house, have been appointed; 3 Bla. Com. 56.

By statute 39 & 40 Vict. ch. 59, an appeal, by petition, lies to the House of Lords from the Court of Appeal in England and from Scotch and Irish courts from which an appeal or writ of error formerly lay to the House of Lords. The appeal is heard by the Lord Chancellor, two Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (whose appointment is provided for by the act), and such peers as are holders of or have held certain high judicial offices. The House of Lords sits also to try impeachments.

Records of writs summoning knights, burgesses, and citizens to parliament are first found towards the end of the reign of Henry III., such writs having issued in the thirty-eighth and forty-ninth years of his reign. 4 Bla. Com. 425; Prynne, 4th Inst. 2. The earliest parliamentary roll is said to be 1290. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 178. In the reign of Edward III. it assumed its present form. Since the reign of Edward III. the history of England shows an almost constant increase in the power of parliament. Anne was the last sovereign who exercised the royal prerogative of veto; and, as this prerogative no longer practically exists, the authority of parliament is absolutely unrestrained. The parliament can only meet when convened by the sovereign, except on the demise of the sovereign with no parliament in being, in which case the last parliament is to assemble; 6 Anne, c. 7. The sovereign has also power to prorogue and dissolve the parliament. The origin of the English parliament seems traceable to the witena-gemote of the Saxon kings. Encyc. Brit. A recent writer traces the origin back to the local institutions of the Germanic tribes, but considers that the final stages of its growth are to be sought in the period between the accession of Henry II. and the close of the reign of Edward I.; 1 Social Eng. 396. See May, Law, Priv. and Proc. of Parliament; St. Armand, Legislative Power; Bagehot, English Constitution; Pike, History of the House of Lords; HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT; FOLC-GEMOTE; WITENA-GEMOTE; LEGISLATIVE POWER; PEERS; HOUSE OF LORDS.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENTS. Persons professionally employed in the promotion of or opposition to private bills, and otherwise in relation to private business in parliament. Whart. Law Lex. Business in relation to private bills must be transacted through them, and counsel may be instructed by them. 2 Brett, Com. 775.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE. A committee of members of the house of peers, or of the house of commons, appointed by either house for the purpose of making inquiries, by the examination of witnesses or otherwise, into matters which could not be conveniently inquired into by the whole house. Whart. Law Lex.

PARLIAMENTARY LAW. That body of the recognized usages of parliamentary and legislative assemblies by which their procedure is regulated, which takes its name from the British parliament and on the practice of which it is mainly founded, with such changes and modifications in American deliberative bodies as have been necessary to adapt it to the usages of that country. See MEETINGS; QUORUM.

PARLIAMENTUM DIABOLICUM. A parliament held at Coventry, 38 Henry VI., wherein Edward, Earl of March (afterwards Edward IV.), and many of the chief nobility were attainted, was so called; but the acts then passed were annulled by the succeeding parliament. Jacob.

PARLIAMENTUM INDOCTUM (Lat. unlearned parliament). A name applied to a parliament assembled at Coventry, under a law that no lawyer should be a member of it. 6 Hen. IV.; 1 Bla. Com. 177; Walsingham 412, n. 30; Rot. Parl. 6 Hen. IV.

PARLIAMENTUM INSANUM. A parliament assembled at Oxford, 41 Hen. III., so styled from the madness of their proceedings, and because the lords came to it with armed men. Jacob.

PARLOR CAR. See SLEEPING CAR.

PAROCHE. A parish.

PAROCHIAL BOARD. In Scotch Law. A body of men in a parish who manage the relief of the poor. Ersk. Prin. 612.

PAROL (more properly, parole. A French word, which means, literally, word, or speech). A term used to distinguish contracts which are made verbally, or in writing not under seal, which are called parol contracts, from those which are under seal, which bear the name of deeds or specialties. 1 Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 7; 7 Term 350; 3 Johns. Cas. 60; 1 Chitty, Pl. 88. When a contract is made under seal, and afterwards it is modified verbally, it becomes wholly a parol contract; 2 Watts 451; 9 Pick. 298. See CONTRACT.

Pleadings are frequently denominated the parol. In some instances the term parol is used to denote the entire pleadings in a cause: as, when in an action brought against an infant heir, on an obligation of his ancestors, he prays that the parol may demur, i. e. that the pleadings may be stayed till he shall attain full age; 3 Bla. Com. 300; 4 East 485; 1 Hoffm. 178. See a form of a plea in abatement, praying that the parol may demur, in 1 Wentw. Pl. 43, and 2 Chitty, Pl. 520. But a devisee cannot pray the parol to demur; 4 East 485.

PAROL DEMURRER. See PAROL.

PAROL EVIDENCE. Evidence verbally delivered by a witness. See 56 Am. St. Rep. 659; 6 Harv. L. Rev. 417; Browne, Parol Evidence; EVIDENCE; RECEIPT; CONTRACT.

PAROL LEASE. An agreement made orally between parties, by which one of them leases to the other a certain estate. See LEASE.

PAROLE. In International Law. The agreement of persons who have been taken prisoner by an enemy that they will not again take up arms against those who captured them, either for a limited time or during the continuance of the war. Vattel, liv. 8, c. 8, § 151.

It is a sacred obligation to the fulfilment of which the national faith is pledged. 5 Phila. 299; Fed. Cas. No. 16777.

A parole can be given only by a commissioned officer for himself or the troops under him. And an inferior officer, if his superior is within reach, cannot give his parole without the consent of the latter. If the prisoner's government refuse to confirm his parole, he is bound in honor to return into captivity. A captor is not bound to offer, nor a prisoner to accept, parole; it is voluntary on both sides. Giving a parole precludes only active service in the field. It is ended by the prisoner's exchange or by peace. A prisoner who violates his parole and is again captured may be shot as a bandit; Risley, Law of War 131.

In Criminal Law. In some states acts have been passed providing for the release on parole of prisoners committed to prison upon conviction of crime. Such acts were passed in 1897 in Connecticut, Illinois, Idaho, Indiana, Minnesota, and Missouri. See PRISONER.

PARQUET. In French Law. The magistrates who are charged with the conduct of proceedings in criminal cases and misdemeanors.

PARRICIDE (from Lat. pater, father, caedere to slay). In the Civil Law. One who murders his father. One who murders his mother, his brother, his sister, or his children. Merlin, Rep. Parricide; Dig. 48. 9. 1. 3, 4.

This offence is defined almost in the same words in the penal code of China. Penal Laws of China, b. 1, s. 2, § 4.

The criminal was punished by being scourged, and afterwards sewed in a sort of sack, with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and then thrown into the sea or into a river; or, if there were no water, he was thrown in this manner to wild beasts. Dig. 48. 9. 9; Code 9, 17. 1. 1. 4, 18, 6; Brown, Civ. Law 428.

By the laws of France, parricide is the crime of him who murders his father or mother, whether they be the legitimate, natural, or adopted parents of the individual, or the murder of any other legitimate ascendant. Code Penal, art. 297. This crime was there punished by the criminal's being taken to the place of execution without any other garment than his shirt, barefooted, and with his head covered with a black veil. He was then exposed on the scaffold, while an officer of the court read his sentence to the spectators; his right hand was then cut off, and he was immediately put to death. Id. art. 13.

The common law does not define this crime, and makes no difference between its punishment and the punishment of murder; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 380; Prin. Penal Law, c. 18, § 8, p. 243; Dalloz, Dict. Homicide, § 3.

PARS ENITIA (Lat.). In Old English Law. The share of the eldest daughter where lands were parted between daughters by lot, she having her first choice after the division of the inheritance. Co. Litt. 166 b; Glanv. lib. 7, c. 3; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 10, § In divisionem.

PARS RATIONABILIS (Lat. reasonable part). That part of a man's goods which the law gave to his wife and children. 2 Bla. Com. 492; Magn. Chart.; 9 Hen. III. c. 18; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 194. See DEAD MAN'S PART.

PARSON. In Ecclesiastical Law. One that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church.

So called because the church, which is an invisible body, is represented by his person. In England he is himself a body corporate, in order to protect and defend the church (which he personates) by a perpetual succession; Co. Litt. 300. He is sometimes called the rector (q. v.), or governor, of the church: but the appellation of parson, however it may be depreciated by familiar, clownish, and indiscriminate use, is the most legal, most beneficial, and most honorable title that a parish priest can enjoy; because "such a one," Sir Edward Coke observes, "and he only, is said vicem seu personam Ecclesiæ gerere"; 1 Bla. Com. 384.

The parson has, during life, the freehold in himself of the parsonage-house, the glebe, the tithes, and other dues, unless these are appropriated, i. e. given away, to some spiritual corporation, sole or aggregate, which the law esteems as capable of providing for the service of the church as any single private clergyman; id.; 1 Hagg. Cons. 162; 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 5.

The ecclesiastical or spiritual rector of a rectory. 1 Woodd. Lect. 311; Fleta, lib. 7, c. 18; Co. Litt. 300. Also, any clergyman having a spiritual preferment. Co. Litt. 17. Holy orders, presentation, institution, and induction are necessary for a parson; and a parson may cease to be such by death, resignation, cession, or deprivation, which last may be for simony, nonconformity to canons, adultery, etc.; Co. Litt. 120; 4 Co. 75, 76.

PARSON IMPERSONEE (Lat.). A persona, or parson, may be termed impersonata, or impersonee, only in regard to the possession he hath of the rectory by the act of another. Co. Litt. 300. One that is inducted and in possession of a benefice; e. g. a dean and chapter. Dy. 40, 221. He that is in possession of a church, be it presentative or appropriate, and with whom the church is full,—persona in this case meaning the patron who gives the title, and persona impersonata the parson to whom the benefice is given in the patron's right. Reg. Jud. 24; 1 Barb. 330; 1 Busb. Eq. 55.

PARSONAGE. The house set apart for the minister's residence. A portion of lands and tithes established by law for the maintenance of a minister. Toml.

PART. A share; a purpart. This word is also used in contradistinction to counterpart; covenants were formerly made in a script and rescript, or part and counterpart.

PART AND PERTINENT. In Scotch Law. A term in a conveyance including lands or servitudes held for forty years as part of, or pertinent to, lands conveyed, natural fruits before they are separated, woods and parks, etc.; but not steelbow stock, unless the lands have been sold on a rental. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 2. 5. 3. et seq.

PART-OWNERS. Those who own a thing together, or in common.

In Maritime Law. A term applied to two or more persons who own a vessel together, and not as partners.

In general, when a majority of the part-owners are desirous of employing such a ship upon a particular voyage or adventure they have a right to do so upon giving security in the admiralty by stipulation to the minority, if required to bring her back and restore the ship, or in case of her loss, to pay them the value of their respective shares; Abb. Ship., 13th ed. 84; 3 Kent 151; Story, Partnership § 489; 11 Pet. 175. When the majority do not choose to employ the ship, the minority have the same right, upon giving similar security; 11 Pet. 175; 1 Hagg. Adm. 306; Jacobsen, Sea-Laws 442.

Where part-owners are equally divided as to the employment upon any particular voyage, the courts of admiralty have manifested a disposition to support the right of the court to order a sale of the ship; Story, Partn. § 439; Bee 2; Gilp. 10; 18 Am. Jur. 486. See VESSEL.

PARTES FINIS NIL HABUERUNT (Lat. the parties to the fine had nothing; i. e. nothing which they could convey). In Old English Pleading. The plea to a fine levied by a stranger, which only bound parties and privies. 2 Bla. Com. *356; Hob. 334; 1 P. Wms. 520; 1 Woodd. Lect. 315.

PARTIAL LOSS. See LOSS.

PARTIBLE LANDS. Lands which might be divided; lands held in gavelkind. See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 268, 271; GAVELKIND.

PARTICEPS CRIMINIS. A partner in crime.

PARTICIPATE. To take equal shares and proportions; to share or divide. 6 Ch. 696. Participate in an estate. To take as tenants in common. 28 Beav. 266.

PARTICULAR AVERAGE. Every kind of expense or damage, short of total loss, which regards a particular concern, and which is to be wholly borne by the proprietor of that concern or interest alone. See 3 Bosw. N. Y. 385; 14 Allen 320; 2 Phill. Ins. § 354; 1 Pars. Marit. Law 284; Gourlie, Gen. Average; AVERAGE.

PARTICULAR AVERMENT. See AVERMENT.

PARTICULAR CUSTOM. A custom which only affects the inhabitants of some particular district.

To be good, a particular custom must have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; must have been continued; must have been peaceable; must be reasonable; must be certain; must be consistent with itself; must be consistent with other customs. 1 Bla. Com. 74, 79.

PARTICULAR ESTATE. An estate which is carved out of a larger, and which precedes a remainder, as, an estate for years to A, remainder to B for life; or, an estate for life to A, remainder to B in tail: this precedent estate is called the particular estate, and the tenant of such estate is called the particular tenant. 2 Bla. Com. 165; 4 Kent 226; 16 Vin. Abr. 216; 4 Com. Dig. 32; 5 id. 346; Will. Real P. 281. See REMAINDER.

PARTICULAR LIEN. The right which a person has to retain property in respect of money or labor expended on such particular property. See LIEN.

PARTICULAR MALICE. Ill will; grudge; a desire to be revenged on a particular person. 11 Ind. 261. See MALICE.

PARTICULAR SERVICES. In this phrase is included the professional services of an expert; 59 Ind. 13; but not of a witness; 14 Ore. 20.

PARTICULAR STATEMENT. In Pennsylvania Pleading and Practice. A statement particularly specifying the date of a promise, book-account, note, bond (penal or single), bill, or all of them, on which an action is founded and the amount believed by the plaintiff to be due from the defendant. 6 S. & R. 21. It is founded on the provisions of a statute passed March 21, 1806. See 4 Sm. Pa. Laws 328. It is an unmethodical declaration, not restricted to any particular form; 2 S. & R. 537; 3 id. 405; 8 id. 316.

PARTICULAR TENANT. See PARTICULAR ESTATE.

PARTICULARS. See BILL OF PARTICULARS.

PARTIDAS. See LAS PARTIDAS.

PARTIES (Lat. pars, a part). Those who take part in the performance of an act, as, making a contract, carrying on an action. Parties in law may be said to be those united in interest in the performance of an act; it may then be composed of one or more persons. The term includes every party to an act. It is also used to denote all the individual, separate persons engaged in the act,—in which sense, however, a corporation may be a party.

In Contracts. Those persons who engage themselves to do or not to do the matters and things contained in an agreement.

In general, all persons may be parties to contracts. But no person can contract with himself in a different capacity, as there must be an agreement of minds: 2 Bro. C. C. 400; 13 S. & R. 210; 2 Johns. Ch. 252; 4 How. 503; 63 Vt. 231. See 5 Misc. Rep. 309.

Aliens were under greater disabilities at common law with reference to real than to personal property; 7 Co. 25 a; 6 Pet. 102; 11 Paige, Ch. 292; 1 Cush. 531. The disability is now removed, in a greater or less degree, by statutes in the various states, and alien friends stand on a very different footing from alien enemies; 2 Sandf. Ch. 586; 2 Woodb. & M. 1; 2 How. 65. See ALIEN; WAR.

Bankrupts and insolvents are disabled to contract, by various statutes, in England, as well as by insolvent laws in the states of the United States.

Duress renders a contract voidable at the option of him on whom it was practised. See DURESS.

Infants are generally incapable of contracting before the age of twenty-one years. This provision is intended for their benefit; and therefore most of their contracts are voidable, and not void. It is the infant's privilege at majority to elect whether to avoid or ratify the contract he has made during minority; 39 Kan. 495. Though the infant is not bound, the adult with whom he may contract is. The infant may always sue, but cannot be sued; Stra. 937. The infant cannot avoid his contract for necessaries; 11 N. H. 51; 12 Metc. 559; 6 M. & W. 42; 65 Hun 57. See [1891] 1 Q. B. 413. If he avoids an executed contract when he comes of age, on the ground of infancy, he must restore the consideration which he has received; the privilege of infancy is to be used as a shield, not as a sword; 7 Mont. 171; 1 App. D. C. 359. See INFANT; NECESSARIES.

Married women, at common law, were almost entirely disabled to contract, their personal existence being almost entirely merged in that of their husbands; 2 J. J. Marsh. 82; 23 Me. 305; 5 Exch. 388; so that contracts made by them before marriage could be taken advantage of and enforced by their husbands, but not by themselves; 13 Mass. 384: 17 Me. 29; 2 Dev. 360; 9 Cow. 230; 14 Conn. 99; 6 T. B. Monr. 257. The contract of a feme covert was, then, generally void, unless she was the agent of her husband, in which case it was the husband's contract, and not hers; 6 Mod. 171; 6 N. H. 124; 16 Vt. 390; 5 Binn. 285; 15 Conn. 347. See MARRIED WOMAN.

Non compotes mentis. At common law, formerly, in this class were included lunatics, insane persons, and idiots. It is understood now to include drunkards; 4 Conn. 203; 2 N. H. 435; 15 Johns. 503; 11 Pick. 304; 1 Rice 56; 3 Blackf. 51; 13 M. & W. 623; 56 Minn. 216. See 89 Va. 56; 63 Hun 629. Spendthrifts under guardianship are not competent to make a valid contract for the payment of money; 13 Pick. 206. Seamen "are the wards of the admiralty, and though not technically incapable of entering into a valid contract, they are treated in the same manner as courts of equity are accustomed to treat young heirs dealing with their expectancies, wards with their guardians, and cestuis que trust with their trustees." 2 Mas. 541. See 3 Kent 193; 2 Dods. 504.

As to the character in which parties contract. They may act independently or severally, jointly, or jointly and severally. The decision of the question of the kind of liability incurred depends on the terms of the contract, if they are express, or, if not express, upon the intention of the parties as gathered from the circumstances of the case. Whenever, however, the obligation is undertaken by two or more, or a right given to two or more, it is a general presumption of law that it is a joint obligation or right; words of joinder are not necessary for this purpose; but, on the other hand, there should be words of severance in order to produce a several responsibility or a several right; 13 M. & W. 499; 6 Wend. 629; 7 Mass. 58; 1 B. & C. 407; 12 Gill & J. 265; 37 W. Va. 834. See 53 N. J. L. 638. It may be doubted, however, whether anything less than express words can raise at once a joint and several liability. No joint liability exists upon separate individual contracts, though for the same subject-matter; 43 Ill. App. 378. Parties may act as the representatives of others, as agents, factors, or brokers, attorneys, executors, or administrators, and guardians. See these titles; JOINT PROMISE. They may also act in a collective capacity, as corporations, joint-stock companies, or as partnerships. See these titles.

New parties may be made to contracts already in existence, by novation, assignment, and indorsement, which titles see.

To Suits in Equity. The person who seeks a remedy in chancery by suit, commonly called the plaintiff, or complainant, and the person against whom the remedy is sought, usually denominated the defendant, or respondent, are the parties to a suit in equity.

In equity all persons materially interested, either legally or beneficially, in the subject-matter of a suit, are to be made parties to it, either as plaintiffs or defendants, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind them all; 133 U. S. 233, 579; it is not indispensable that all the parties should have an interest in all the matters contained in the suit, but it is sufficient if each party has an interest in some material matter in the suit, and it is connected with the others; 128 U. S. 403. In the absence of parties, and without their having an opportunity to be heard, a court is without jurisdiction to make an adjudication affecting them; 164 U. S. 471.

Active parties are those who are so involved in the subject-matter in controversy that no decree can be made without their being in court. Passive parties are those whose interests are involved in granting complete relief to those who ask it. 1 Wash. C. C. 517. See 3 Ala. 361.

PLAINTIFFS. In general, all persons, whether natural or artificial, may sue in equity; and an equitable title only is sufficient; 10 Ill. 332. Incapacities which prevent suit are absolute, which disable during their continuance, or partial which disable the party to sue alone.

Persons representing antagonistic interests cannot be joined as complainants; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 765.

Alien enemies are under an absolute incapacity to sue. Alien friends may sue; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 129; if the subject-matter be not such as to disable them; Co. Litt. 129 b; although a sovereign; 1 Sim. 94; 8 Wheat. 464; 4 Johns. Ch. 370; Ad. Eq. 314. In such case he must have been first recognized by the executive of the forum; Story, Eq. Pl. § 55; 3 Wheat. 324.

In such case the sovereign submits to the jurisdiction, as to the subject-matter, and must answer on oath; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 30; Ad. Eq. 313; 6 Beav. 1. See SOVEREIGN.

Attorney-general. Government (in England, the crown) may sue both in its own behalf, for its own political rights and interests, and in behalf of the rights and interests of those partaking of its prerogatives or claiming its peculiar protection; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 421; Coop. Eq. Pl. 21, 101; usually by the agency of the attorney-general or solicitor-general; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 7; Ad. Eq. 312. See INJUNCTION; QUO WARRANTO; MANDAMUS; TRUSTS.

Corporations, like natural persons, may sue; Moraw. Pr. Corp. § 357; Grant, Corp. 198; although foreign; id. 200; but in such case the incorporation must be set forth; 1 Cr. M. & R. 296; 4 Johns. Ch. 327; as it must if they are domestic and created by a private act; 3 Conn. 199; 15 Viner, Abr. 198. All the members of a voluntary association must be joined; 15 Ill. 251; unless too numerous; 2 Pet. 566; 3 Barb. Ch. 362. See JURISDICTION; EXPRESS COMPANIES.

As to the right of a stockholder to sue, see 104 U. S. 460; 106 id. 537; 18 How. 331.

Idiots and lunatics may sue by their committees; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 29. As to when a mere petition is sufficient, see 7 Johns. Ch. 24; 2 Ired. Eq. 294. See NEXT FRIEND.

Infants may sue; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 25; and, if they be on the wrong side of the suit, may be transferred at any time, on suggestion; 3 Edw. Ch. 32. The bill must be filed by the next friend (q. v.); Coop. Eq. Pl. 27; 2 Ala. 406; who must not have an adverse interest; 2 Ired. Eq. 478; and who may be compelled to give bail; 1 Paige, Ch. 178. If the infant have a guardian, the court may decide in whose name the suit shall continue; 12 Ill. 424.

A married woman, at common law, was under partial incapacity to sue; 7 Vt. 369. Otherwise, when in such condition as to be considered in law a feme sole; 2 Hayw. 406. She could sue on a separate claim by aid of a next friend of her own choice; Story, Eq. Pl. § 61; 1 Freem. 215; but see 2 Paige, Ch. 454; and the defendant might insist that she should sue in this manner; 2 Paige, Ch. 255; 4 Rand. 397.

Though at common law an action could not be maintained by a partnership against another partnership having a common member with the former, upon an agreement made between the two firms, equity will take jurisdiction, and afford an adequate remedy; 50 Minn. 171.

Societies. A certain number of persons belonging to a voluntary society may sue on behalf of themselves and their associates for purposes common to them all; 2 Pet. 366; such as bondholders and stockholders.

The objection for want of proper parties may be taken advantage of either by demurrer, plea, answer, or at the hearing; 24 U. S. App. 601.

Where a defendant insists upon the joinder of a certain party, as a necessary party, there is, upon joining such party, no ground for demurrer for improperly uniting causes of action; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1797, Supreme Ct. of N. Y., App. Div.

DEFENDANTS. Generally, all who are able to sue may be sued in equity. To constitute a person defendant, process must be prayed against him; 2 Bland, Ch. 106; 4 Ired. Eq. 175; 5 Ga. 251; 1 A. K. Marsh. 594. Those who are under incapacity may be made defendants, but must appear in a peculiar manner. One, or more, interested with the plaintiff, who refuse to join may be made defendants; 2 Bland, Ch. 264; 3 Des. 31; 10 Ill. 534; 15 id. 251; 156 Mass. 203. A court of equity even after a final hearing on the merits, and on appeal to the court of last resort, will compel the joinder of necessary parties defendant; 89 Mo. 284. One cannot be made a defendant on his own application, against the objection of the complainant; 15 So. Rep. (Miss.) 33; 2 Tenn. Ch. 140. See INTERVENTION.

Corporations must be sued by their corporate names, unless authorized to come into court in the name of some other person, as president, etc.; Story, Eq. Pl. § 70. Governments cannot, generally, be sued in their own courts; Story, Eq. Pl. § 69; yet the attorney-general may be made a party to protect its rights when involved; 1 Barb. Ch. 157; and the rule does not prevent suits against officers in their official capacity; 1 Dougl. Mich. 225. The directors of a corporation may be included as parties defendant in a bill against a corporation for infringement of a trade-mark; 53 Fed. Rep. 124; or of a patent; 45 id. 482; or where discovery is sought from the officers; 48 id. 349; but not on a bill for an accounting in which no discovery is sought against the officers; 44 id. 319. See INFRINGEMENT; PATENT.

Foreclosure. For the mere purpose of extinguishing an equity of redemption, the mortgagor is strictly the only necessary party; 23 Fed. Rep. 513; but if it be intended to divest other liens, other parties must be brought in; id.

In a suit to foreclose a junior mortgage, a prior mortgagee need not be joined; 112 U. S. 8; and more particularly if the prior mortgage is not yet due; 94 U. S. 734; but it is otherwise where the bill prays a receiver for the property covered by such prior mortgage; 106 U. S. 286; or where the junior mortgagee seeks a sale of the property free of incumbrance; 94 U. S. 734; or where there is a doubt as to the amount of the debt due under the prior incumbrance; 48 Hun 521; 94 U. S. 734. Senior mortgagees cannot become parties to an action to foreclose a junior mortgage; 9 Abb. N. C. 256. But where joined he may enforce his lien by a cross-bill; 30 Fed. Rep. 805. Even junior incumbrancers are not indispensable parties, but if not joined, their rights will not be affected; 62 Ill. App. 418; 23 Fed. Rep. 849.

A receiver is a proper, though not a necessary party to foreclosure proceedings begun after his appointment; 105 N. Y. 340; 38 N. J. Eq. 234; he may be permitted to intervene; 4 N. J. Eq. 377.

Bondholders cannot bring proceedings to foreclose a mortgage without showing that they have requested their trustee to proceed and he has refused; 79 Fed. Rep. 25.

Mortgage bondholders may proceed for the protection of their interests where the trustee has refused to sue; 130 Mass. 303; 35 Fed. Rep. 3; 106 U. S. 47; or has acquired interests adverse to those of the bondholders; 52 Fed. Rep. 826; and, in such case, one or more bondholders may sue for themselves and other like bondholders; 59 Fed. Rep. 957; such others may come in at any stage; 2 Woods 447.

A mortgage trustee is the only necessary party to a bill to foreclose the mortgage; he represents the bondholders; see 93 U. S. 156; 4 Dill. 533; 117 U. S. 434; and he is the proper person to bring foreclosure proceedings; 122 U. S. 1; 15 Fed. Rep. 52. A non-resident mortgage trustee may be brought in as defendant by publication in the federal courts; 13 Fed. Rep. 857. In a railroad foreclosure brought by a non-resident bondholder, the fact that the trustee is a resident of the same state as the plaintiff does not affect the jurisdiction of a federal court; 27 Fed. Rep. 1.

A trustee may intervene in a bondholder's suit to foreclose and carry on the suit in his own name; 3 Ill. 487. A buyer at a foreclosure sale makes himself a party to the record; 136 U. S. 89. See INTERVENTION; MORTGAGE.

Corporations are indispensable parties to a bill which affects corporate rights or liabilities; 148 U. S. 604; 110 Mass. 115.

Idiots and lunatics may be defendants and defend by committees, usually appointed guardians ad litem as of course; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 103; Story, Eq. Pl. § 70; 6 Paige, Ch. 287.

A guardian de facto may not have a bill against a lunatic for a balance due him, but must proceed by petition; 2 D. & B. Eq. 385; 2 Johns. Ch. 242; 2 Paige, Ch. 422.

Infants defend by guardians appointed by the court; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 103; 8 Pet. 128; 12 Mass. 16. On becoming of age, an infant is allowed, as of course, to put in a new plea, or to demur, on showing that it is necessary to protect his rights; 6 Paige, Ch. 353.

Married women might be made defendants, and might answer as if femes sole, if the husband was plaintiff, an exile, or an alien enemy, has abjured the realm or been transported under criminal sentence; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 104.

She should be made defendant where her husband sought to recover an estate held in trust for her separate use; 9 Paige, Ch. 225; and, generally, where the interests of her husband conflicted with hers in the suit, and he was a plaintiff; 3 Barb. Ch. 397. See MARRIED WOMEN.

See, generally, as to who may be defendants, JOINDER OF PARTIES.

A failure to join the husband of a married woman in an equitable action against her, is cured by his death pending suit; 84 Ala. 332.

Where proceedings are against an association having numerous members, all need not be made parties defendant; they are good as to all the members named; 11 C. C. R. 525; Story, Eq. Pl. § 94.

In 175 Pa. 13, the same trust company as trustee for two different estates was both plaintiff and defendant in a cause. The court in its opinion adverted to the fact without comment.

At Law. In Actions Ex Contractu.

There are two necessary parties to an action, viz. the person who seeks to establish a right in himself, commonly called the plaintiff, and the person upon whom he seeks to impose a corresponding duty or liability, commonly called the defendant. In attachment proceedings there is still a third party, commonly called the garnishee.

PLAINTIFFS. In general, all persons who have a just cause of action may sue, unless some disability be shown; Dicey, Part. 1. An action on a contract, of whatever description, must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest is vested; 3 B. & P. 147; 5 S. & R. 27; 10 Mass. 280, 287; 1 Pet. C. C. 109; 2 Root 119; 21 Wend. 110. See 51 N. H. 71.

On simple contracts, by the party from whom (in part, at least) the consideration moved; 1 Stra. 592; 2 W. & S. 287; although the promise was made to another, if for his benefit; 3 Pick. 83; 10 Wend. 87, 156; 5 Dana 45; and not by a stranger to the consideration, even though the contract be for his sole benefit; Browne, Act. 101. On contracts under seal, by parties to the instrument only; 10 Wend. 87; Co. Litt. 231.

Agents contracting in their own name, without disclosing their principals, may, in general, sue in their own names; 3 B. & Ald. 280; 5 M. & W. 650; 5 Pa. 41; or the principals may sue; 6 Cow. 181; 3 Hill N. Y. 72; 2 Ashm. 485; Broom, Part. 44. See, generally, Ans. Contr. 852.

So they may sue on contracts made for an unknown principal; 3 E. L. & E. 391; and also when acting under a del credere commission; 4 Maule & S. 566; 10 Barb. 202; but not an ordinary merchandise broker. An auctioneer may sue for the price of goods sold; 1 H. Bla. 81; 16 Johns. 1; but a mere attorney having no beneficial interest may not sue in his own name; 10 Johns. 388.

Alien enemies, unless resident under a license, or contracting under specific license, cannot sue, nor can suit be brought for their benefit; 1 Campb. 482; 1 Kent 67; 11 Johns. 418. License is presumed if they are not ordered away; 10 Johns. 69; 6 Binn. 241. See, also, Co. Litt. 129 b; 15 East 260; 1 Kent 68.

Alien friends may bring actions concerning personal property; Bac. Abr. Aliens; for libel published here; 8 Scott 182; and now, in regard to real estate generally, by statute; 13 Wend. 342; see 15 Tex. 495; and, by common law, till office found, against an intruder; 1 Johns. Cas. 399. But see 5 Cal. 373. See WAR. As a general rule, an alien may maintain a personal action in the federal courts; 3 Story 458; 4 McLean 516.

Assignees of choses in action cannot, at common law, maintain actions in their own names; Broom, Part. 10; 42 Me. 221. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, bail-bonds, and replevin bonds, etc., are exceptions to this rule; Hamm. Part. 106. Assignees of a note and mortgage can maintain an action thereon, whether they paid any consideration for the assignment, or not; 74 Wis. 289.

An assignee of real estate may have an action in his own name for breaches of a covenant running with the land, occurring after assignment; 14 Johns. 89; and he need not be named in an express covenant of this character; Broom, Part. 8.

An assignee in insolvency or bankruptcy should sue in his own name on a contract made before the act of bankruptcy or the assignment in insolvency; 1 Chitty, Pl. 14; Com. Dig. Abatement (E 17); 5 S. & R. 394. See 8 Term 779. Otherwise of a suit by a foreign assignee; 11 Johns. 488. The discharge of the insolvent pending suit does not abate it; 11 Johns. 488. But see 1 Johns. 118.

An assignee who is to execute trusts may sue in his own name; 4 Abb. 106. Cestuis que trustent cannot sue at law; 3 Bouvier, Inst. 135.

Civil death occurring in case of an outlaw, an attainted felon, or one sentenced to imprisonment for life, incapacitates the person for suing as plaintiff during the continuance of the condition; Broom, Part. 85. Sentence as above, during suit, abates it; 1 Du. N. Y. 664; but the right to sue is suspended only; Broom, Part. 85.

Corporations may sue in their true corporate name, on contracts made in their behalf by officers or agents; 2 Blatchf. 343; 6 Cal. 258; 5 Vt. 500; 20 Me. 45; 8 N. J. 321; 9 Ind. 359; Dicey, Part. 276; 39 W. Va. 294; as a bank, on a note given to a cashier; 5 Mo. 26; 4 How. Pr. 63; 21 Pick. 486. A suit against a director for his secret profits on a sale to the company is properly brought by the company and not by its stockholders; 64 Conn. 101.

The name must be that at the time of suit; 3 Ind. 285; 4 Rand. 359; with an averment of the change, if any, since the making of the contract; 6 Ala. 327, 494; even though a wrong name were used in making the contract; 6 S. & R. 16; 10 Mass. 360; 5 Ark. 234; 10 N. H. 123; 5 Halst. 323. See NAME.

If the corporation be a foreign one, proof of its existence must be given; 1 C. & P. 569; 13 Pet. 519; 2 Gall. 105; 5 Wend. 478; 10 Macs. 91; 2 Tex. 531; 1 T. B. Monr. 170; 2 Rand. 465; 2 Green N. J. 439; 1 Mo. 184. See 144 U. S. 451.

Executors and administrators, in whom is vested the legal interest, are to sue on all personal contracts; 5 Term 393; Will. Exec. Index; see 15 S. & R. 188; or covenants affecting the realty but not running with the land; 2 H. Bla. 310; and on such covenants running with the land, for breach during the decedent's lifetime occasioning special damage; 2 Johns. Cas. 17. They must sue, as such, on causes accruing prior to the death of the decedent; 1 Saund. 112; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 D 1); 2 Swan 170; and as such, or in their own names, at their election, for those accruing subsequently; 16 Ark. 36; 3 Dougl. 36; Will. Exec. 1590; and upon contracts made by them in their official capacity; 30 Ala. 482; 32 Miss. 319; 15 Tex. 44; in their own names only, in some states; 4 Jones 159.

On the death of an executor, his executor, or administrator, if he die intestate, is the legal representative of the original decedent; 7 M. & W. 306; 2 Swan 127; 2 Bla. Com. 506; unless altered by statute.

Foreign governments, whether monarchical or republican; 5 Du. 634; if recognized by the executive of the forum; 8 Wheat. 324; Story, Eq. Pl. § 55; see 4 Cra. 272; 2 Wash. C. C. 43; 9 Ves. 347; 11 id. 283; may sue; 26 Wend. 212.

Husband must sue alone for wages accruing to the wife, for the profits of business carried on by her, or money lent by her during coverture; 2 W. Bl. 1239; 4 E. D. Sm. 384; and see 1 Salk. 114; 1 Maule & S. 180; 4 Term 516; for slanderous words spoken of the wife which are actionable only by reason of special damage; 2 Du. 633; on a fresh promise, for which the consideration was in part some matter moving from him renewing a contract made with the wife, dum sola; 1 Maule & S. 180; and see 2 Pa. 827; for a legacy accruing to the wife during coverture; 22 Pick. 480; and as administrator of the wife to recover chattels real and personal not previously reduced into possession; Broom, Part. 74. See MARRIED WOMAN.

He may sue alone for property that belonged to the wife before coverture; 1 Murph. 41; 5 T. B Monr. 264; on a joint bond given for a debt due to the wife dum sola; 1 Maule & S. 180; 1 Chitty, Pl. 20; on a covenant running to both; Cro. Jac. 399; 1 B. & C. 443; to reduce choses in action into possession; 2 Maule & S. 396, n. (b); 2 Ad. & E. 30; for damages to his wife's separate real estate; 71 Tex. 264; and, after her death, for anything he became entitled to during coverture; Co. Litt. 351 a, n. 1. And see 4 B. & C. 529.

Infants may sue only by guardian or prochein ami; 13 M. & W. 640; 11 How. Pr. 188; 13 id. 413; 13 B. Monr. 193. In a suit by an infant against his guardian, the infant and not his next friend must be made the plaintiff; 157 U. S. 195. Infants who, by their next friend, have procured a judgment from a court with jurisdiction, for the sale of their lands, are bound thereby; 102 N. C. 112.

Joint tenants. See JOINDER.

Lunatic, or non compos mentis, may maintain an action, which should be in his own name; Broom, Part. 84; Hob. 215; 8 Barb. 552. His wife may appear, if he have no committee; 7 Dowl. 22. An idiot may, by a next friend, who petitions for that purpose; 2 Chitty, Archb. Pr. 909.

Married women cannot, in general, sue alone at common law; Broom, Part. 74; but a married woman may sue alone where her husband is civilly dead; see 4 Term 361; Cro. Eliz. 519; 2 B. & P. 165; or, in England, where he is an alien out of the country, on her separate contracts; 1 B. & P. 357; 2 id. 226; 3 Campb. 123; while he is in such condition; Broom, Part. § 114.

So she may sue alone after a sentence of nullity or divorce a vinculo; 9 B. & C. 698; but not after a divorce a mensa et thoro, or voluntary separation merely; 3 B. & C. 297.

She may, where he is legally presumed to be dead; 5 B. & Ad. 94; 2 M. & W. 894; or where he has been absent from the country for a very long time; 12 Mo. 30; 23 E. L. & E. 127. See 11 East 301; 2 B. & P. 226.

When the wife survives the husband, she may sue on all contracts entered into by others with her before coverture, and she may recover all arrears of rent of her real estate which became due during the coverture, on their joint demise; 8 Taunt. 181; 1 Rolle, Abr. 350 d. She is also entitled to all her real property, and her chattels real and choses in action not reduced into possession by the husband; Broom, Part. 76.

Partners. One partner cannot, in general, sue another for goods sold; 9 B. & C. 356; for work done; 7 B. & C. 419; for money had and received in connection with a partnership transaction; 6 B. & C. 194; or for contribution towards a payment made under compulsion of law; 5 B. & Ad. 936; 1 M. & W. 504. See id. 168; 2 Term 476. But one may sue the other for a final balance struck; Broom, Part. 57; 5 M. & W. 21; 2 Cr. & M. 361; see JOINDER; and they may sue the administrator of a deceased partner; 4 Wisc. 102. One making a contract for himself and his partner cannot sue therein in his own name alone; 72 Wis. 120. An action on an account due a firm is properly brought in the names of its members, though the firm has been dissolved; 160 Mass. 559. The fact that after suit brought by partners, one of them sells his interest in the firm to the others, does not necessitate a change of parties; 6 Tex. Civ. App. 254.

Partners cannot sue or be sued in their copartnership name, but the individual names of the members must be stated; 5 So. Rep. (Miss.) 112. A dormant partner is not a necessary party plaintiff in an action brought by the firm; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 1.

Survivors. The survivor or survivors of two or more jointly interested in a contract not running with the land must sue as such; Broom, Part. 21; Archb. Pl. 54; 1 East 497; 1 Dall. 65, 248; 3 Johns. Cas. 374; 7 Ala. 89.

The survivor of a partnership must sue alone as such; 9 B. & C. 538; 4 B. & Ald. 374; 2 Maule & S. 225. See 118 Ind. 313.

The survivor of several parties to a simple contract should describe himself as such; 3 Conn. 203.

Tenants in common may sue each other singly for actual ouster; Woodf. Landl. & T. 789. See JOINDER; Webb's Poll. Torts 447.

Trustees must sue, and not the cestuis que trustent; 1 Lev. 235; 15 Mass. 286; 12 Pick. 554; 4 Dana 474. See JOINDER.

DEFENDANTS. All persons having a direct and immediate legal interest in the subject-matter of the suit are to be made parties. The proper defendants to a suit on a specialty are pointed out by the instrument.

In case of simple contracts, the person made liable expressly by its terms; 3 Bingh. N. C. 732; or by implication of law, is to be made defendant; 2 Bla. Com. 443. See 6 Mass. 253; 1 Chitty, Pl. 24. Where there are several persons parties, if the liability be joint, all must be joined as defendants, either on specialties: 1 Wms. Saund. 154; or simple contracts; Chitty, Contr. 99. If it be joint and several, all may be joined;

1 Wms. Saund. 154, n. 4; or each sued separately; 1 Wms. Saund. 191, c.; Com. Dig. Obligations (G); 3 Term 782; 1 Ad. & E. 207; if it be several, each must be sued separately; 1 East 226. The presumption is, in such case, that a written agreement is joint; 2 Campb. 640; 3 id. 49, 51, n.; otherwise of verbal contracts; 1 Ad. & E. 691; 3 B. & Ald. 89.

Alien enemies may be sued; Broom, Part. 18; 1 W. Bla. 30; Cro. Eliz. 516; 4 Bingh. 421; Com. Dig. Abatement (E 3); see 18 Wall. 99; 66 Ill. 288; 30 Md. 512; and, of course, alien friends.

Assignees of a mere personal contract cannot, in general, be sued; of covenants running with the realty may be, for breach after assignment; 2 Saund. 304, n. 12; Woodf. Landl. & T., 1st Am. ed. 260; 7 Term 312; 1 Dall. 210; but not after an assignment by him; Bac. Abr. Covenant (E 4).

Assignees of bankrupts cannot be sued as such at law; Cowp. 134; Chitty, Pl. 11, n. (f).

Bankrupts after discharge cannot be sued. An insolvent after discharge may be sued on his contracts, but his person is not liable to arrest in a suit on a debt which was due at the date of his discharge; Dougl. 93; 8 East 311; 1 Saund. 241, n. 5.

See CONFLICT OF LAWS; BANKRUPTCY; INSOLVENCY.

Corporations must be sued by their true names; Moraw. Pr. Corp. § 355; 7 Mass. 441; 2 Cow. 778; 15 Ill. 185; 4 Rand. 359; 2 Blatchf. 343. See NAME. Assumpsit lies against a corporation aggregate on an express or implied promise, in the same manner as against an individual; 3 Halst. 182; 3 S. & R. 117; 12 Johns. 231; 7 Cra. 297; 2 Bay 109; 10 Mass. 397; 9 Pet. 541; 2 Conn. 260; 5 Q. B. 547.

Executors and administrators of a deceased contractor or the survivor of several joint contractors may be sued; Hamm. Part. 156; but not if any of the original contractors survive; 6 S. & R. 272; 2 Wheat. 844.

The liability does not commence till probate of the will; 2 Sneed 58. The executor or administrator de bonis non of a deceased person is the proper defendant; Broom, Part. 197.

The liability is limited by the amount of assets, and does not arise on subsequent breach of a covenant which could be performed only by the covenantor; Broom, Part. 118. They, or real representatives, may be parties, at the election of the plaintiff, where both are equally liable; 1 Lev. 189, 303.

The personal representative must be made a party before debts can be decreed against a decedent's estate; 32 W. Va. 14; 71 Tex. 103.

Foreign governments cannot be sued to enforce a remedy, but may be made defendants to give an opportunity to appear; 14 How. Pr. 517. A foreign sovereign cannot be sued for any act done by him in the character of a sovereign prince; 2 H. L. C. 1; 17 Q. B. 171; it would appear most probably that he can in no case be made defendant in an action; Dicey, Part. *5; but see 10 Q. B. 656. See JURISDICTION.

Heirs may be liable to suit under the ancestor's covenant, if expressly named, to the extent of the assets received; Broom, Part. 118; Platt, Cov. 449.

Husband may be sued alone at common law for breach of joint covenant of himself and wife; 15 Johns. 483; 17 How. 609; and must be on a mere personal contract of the wife made during coverture; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 A 2); 8 Term 545; 2 B. & P. 105; 16 Johns. 281; even if made to procure necessaries when living apart; 6 W. & S. 346; may be on a new promise for which the consideration is a debt due by the wife before marriage; 7 Term 348; but such promise must be express; Broom, Part. 174; and have some additional consideration, as forbearance, etc.; 1 Show. 133; 11 Ad. & E. 438, 451; on lease to both made during coverture; Com. Dig. Baron & F. (2 B); on lease to wife dum sola, for rent accruing during coverture, or to wife as executrix; Broom, Part. 178; Com. Dig. Baron & F. (T); 1 Rolle, Abr. 149; not on wife's contracts dum sola after her death; 3 Mod. 186; 3 P. Wms. 410; except as administrator; 7 Term 350; Cro. Jac. 257; 1 Campb. 189, n.

He is liable, after the death of the wife, in cases where he might have been sued alone during her lifetime. See MARRIED WOMEN.

Idiots, lunatics, and non compotes mentis, generally, may be sued on contracts for necessaries; 2 M. & W. 2.

Infants may be sued on their contracts for necessaries; 10 M. & W. 195; Macph. Inf. 447. Ratification in due form; 11 Ad. & E. 934; after arriving at full age, renders them liable to action on contracts made before.

Partner is not liable to action by his copartners. A sole ostensible partner, the others being dormant, may be sued alone by one contracting with him; Broom, Part. 172.

A partnership cannot be sued as such, but the names of its members must be set out; 17 Or. 256. Garnishment to secure a claim against a partnership cannot be maintained against a partner individually; 19 Colo. 206.

Survivor of two or more joint contractors must be sued alone; 1 Saund. 291, n. 2; 2 Burr. 1196. A sole surviving partner may be sued alone; Chitty, Pl. 152; 1 B. & Ald. 29.

IN ACTIONS EX DELICTO. PLAINTIFFS. The plaintiff must have a legal right in the property affected, whether real; 2 Term 684; Broom, Part. 202; Co. Litt. 240 b; 2 Bla. Com. 185; or personal; 11 Cush. 55; though a mere possession is sufficient for trespass, and trespass quare clausum; Cro. Jac. 122; 4 B. & C. 591; 1 Ad. & E. 44; and the possession may be constructive in case of trespass for injury to personal property; 6 Q. B. 606; 5 B. & Ald. 603; 1 Hill N. Y. 311. The property of the plaintiff may be absolute; 5 Bingh. 305; 1 C. B. 672; or special. See 7 Term 9; 4 B. & C. 941.

Agents who have a qualified property in goods may maintain an action of tort in their own names for injury to the goods.

A principal may sue in the name of his agent for a false representation to the agent; 12 Wend. 176.

Assignees of property may sue in their own names for tortious injuries committed after the assignment; 3 Maule & S. 7; 1 Ad. & E. 580; although it has never been in their possession; 9 Wend. 80; 8 B. & C. 270; Wms. Saund. 252 a, n. (7). Otherwise of the assignee of a mere right of action; 12 N. Y. 322; 18 Barb. 500; 7 How. 492. See 15 N. Y. 432. Assignees in insolvency may sue for torts to the property; 8 S. & R. 124; but not to the person of the assignee; W. Jones 215.

Executors and administrators cannot, in general, sue in actions ex delicto, as such actions are said to die with the plaintiff; Broom, Part. 212; 13 N. Y. 322. See ACTIO PERSONALIS. They may sue in their own names for torts subsequent to the death of the deceased; 11 Rich. 368.

Heirs and devisors have no claim for torts committed during the lifetime of the ancestor or devisor; 2 Inst. 305.

Husband must, at common law, sue alone for all injuries to his own property and person; 3 Bla. Com. 143; Cro. Jac. 473; 1 Lev. 3; including personalty of the wife which becomes his upon marriage; 6 Call 55; 18 N. H. 283; Cro. Eliz. 133; 6 Ad. & E. 259; 27 Vt. 17; Hempst. 64; and including the continuance of injuries to such property commenced before marriage; 1 Salk. 141; 6 Call 55; in replevin for timber cut on land belonging to both; 8 Watts 412; for personal injuries to the wife for the damages which he sustains; 3 Bla. Com. 140; Chitty, Pl. 718, n.; 4 B. & Ald. 523; 4 Ia. 420; as in battery; 8 Mod. 342; 2 Brev. 170; 11 So. Rep. (La.) 541; slander, where words are not actionable per se; 4 B. & Ad. 514; 22 Barb. 396; or for special damages; 4 B. & Ad. 514; 112 N. C. 293.

He may sue alone, also, for injuries to personalty commenced before marriage and consummated afterwards; 2 B. & P. 407; and the right survives to him after death of the wife in all cases where he can sue alone; 1 Chitty, Pl. 75; Viner, Abr. Baron & F. (G); for cutting trees on land held by both in right of the wife; 16 Pick. 385; 1 Rop. Husb. & W. 215; and generally, for injury to real estate of the wife during coverture; 18 Pick. 110; 20 Conn. 296; 2 Wils. 414; although her interests be reversionary only; 5 M. & W. 142; he may also sue alone for damages for the negligent failure of a telegraph company to transmit and deliver a message to his wife; 70 Tex. 689.

Infants may sue by guardian for torts; Broom, Part. 238.

Lessors and reversioners, generally, may have an action for injury to their reversions; Broom, Part. 214. Damage necessarily to the reversion must be alleged and shown; 1 Maule & S. 284; 11 Ad. & E. 40; 10 B. & C. 145.

Lessees and tenants, generally, may sue for injuries to their possession: 4 Burr. 2141; Woodf. Landl. & T. 661.

Married woman must sue alone for injury to her separate property; 29 Barb. 512; see 129 Ind. 472; she may bring an action of detinue to recover her separate personal property and join her husband as co-plaintiff; 37 W. Va. 377.

The restrictions on her power to sue are the same as in actions ex contractu; Broom, Part. 233. Actions in which she might or must have joined her husband survive to her; Rolle, Abr. 349 (A). A married woman though living with her husband may maintain an action for slander in her own name, and without joining him; 89 Ga. 829.

The dissolution of marriage by divorce does not enable the wife to sue her husband for a tort committed on her during coverture; 46 Ill. App. 106. She may maintain in her own name an action for the alienation of her husband's affections; 29 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 389; 32 id. 982. See 31 Cent. L. J. 29.

Master has an action in tort for enticing away an apprentice; 3 Bla. Com. 142; 3 Maule & S. 191; and, upon the same principle, a parent for a child; 1 Halst. 322; 4 B. & C. 660; 4 Litt. 25; and for personal injury to his servant, for loss of time, expenses, etc.; 3 Bla. Com. 142; 8 m. M. & S. 171.

For seduction or debauchery, a master; Broom, Part. 227; 4 Cow. 422; and if any service be shown, a parent; 2 M. & W. 542; 6 id. 56; has his action.

Survivor, whether sole or several, must sue for a tortious injury, the rule being that the remedy, and not the right, survives; Broom, Part. 212; 1 Show. 188; 2 Maule & S. 225.

Tenants in common must sue strangers separately in distress and avowry for rent; 15 Johns. 479.

A tenant in common may sue his co-tenant, where there has been actual ouster, in ejectment; Littleton § 322; 1 Campb. 173; 11 East 49; or trespass quare clausum; 7 Pa. 397; and trespass for mesne profits after recovery; 3 Wils. Ch. 118. Where there is a total destruction or conversion of the property, one tenant in common may sue his co-tenant in trespass; Co. Litt. 200 a, b; Cro. Eliz. 157; 8 B. & C. 257; or in trover; 1 Term 658; 2 Ga. 73; 2 Johns. 468; 6 Ired. 388. For a misfeasance, waste, or case in the nature of waste, may be brought.

DEFENDANTS. He who commits the tortious act or asserts the adverse title is to be made defendant: as the wrongful occupant of land, in ejectment: 1 B. & P. 573; the party converting, in trover; Broom, Part. 246; making fraudulent representations; 3 Term 56; 3 M. & W. 582. The act may, however, have been done by the defendant's agent; 2 M. & W. 650; his mischievous animal: 12 Q. B. 29; or by the plaintiff himself if acting with due care and suffering from the defendant's negligence; 1 Q. B. 29; 10 Ill. 425.

Agents and principals; Story, Ag. § 625; Paley, Ag. 294; are both liable for tortious act or negligence of the agent under the direction; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 431, n.; or in the regular course of employment, of the principal; 10 Ill. 425; 1 Metc. Mass. 550. See 2 Den. 115. As to the agent of a corporation acting erroneously without malice, see 1 East 555.

Subsequent ratification is equivalent to prior authority; Broom, Part. 259.

Agents are liable to their principals for conversion; 14 Johns. 128; 8 Pa. 442.

Assignees are liable only for torts committed by them: as, where one takes property from another who has possession unlawfully; Bac. Abr. Actions (B); or continues a nuisance; 2 Salk. 460; 1 B. & P. 409.

Bankrupts; 3 B. & Ald. 408; 2 Den. 73; and insolvents; Broom, Part. 284; 2 B. & Ald. 407; 9 Johns. 161; are liable even after a discharge, for torts committed previously.

Corporations are liable for torts committed by their agents; Moraw. Pr. Corp. § 725; 2 Wend. 452; 17 Mass. 508; 4 S. & R. 16; 2 Ark. 255; 4 Ohio 500; 4 Wash. C. C. 106; 5 Ind. 252; but not, it seems, at common law, in replevin; Kyd, Corp. 205; or trespass quare clausum; 9 Ohio 31. In an action against a corporation for a tort, the corporation and its servant by whose act the injury was done may be joined as defendants; 98 N. C. 34.

Death of a tort-feasor, at common law, takes away all cause of action for torts disconnected with contract; 5 Term 651; 1 Saund. 291 e. But actions against the personal representatives are provided for by statute in most of the states, and in England by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 2.

Executors and administrators, at common law, are liable for the continuance of torts first committed by the deceased; W. Jones 173; 5 Dana 34; see 28 Ala. N. S. 360; but such continuance must be laid to be, as it really is, the act of the executor; 1 Cowp. 373; Will. Exec., 7th Am. ed. *1602; 13 Pa. 54; 1 Harring. Mich. 7.

Husband must be sued alone for his torts, and in detinue for goods delivered to himself and wife; 2 Bulstr. 308; 1 Leon. 312.

He may be sued alone for a conversion by the wife during coverture; 2 Rop. Husb. & W. 127. In an action for a wife's personal tort the husband is properly joined as defendant; 61 Hun 164; 44 Mo. App. 583.

Idiots and lunatics are liable, civilly, for torts committed; Bac. Abr. Trespass (G); Webb, Poll. Torts 59, n.; though they may be incapable of design; Broom, Part. 281. But if the lunatic is under control of chancery, proceedings must be in that court, or it will constitute a contempt; 3 Paige 199.

Infants may be sued in actions ex delicto, whether founded on positive wrongs or constructive torts; Broom, Part. 280; Co. Litt. 180 b, n. 4: as, in detinue for goods delivered for a specific purpose; 4 B. & P. 140; for tortiously converting or fraudulently obtaining goods; 3 Pick. 492; 5 Hill N. Y. 391; 4 M'Cord 387; for uttering slander; 8 Term 337; but only if the act be wholly tortious and disconnected from contract; 8 Term 35; 6 Watts 1; 6 Cra. 226.

Lessor and lessee are respectively liable for their part of the tort in case of a wrong commenced by one and continued by the other; as, for example, a nuisance; 2 Salk. 460; Broom, Part. 253; Woodf. Landl. & T. 671.

Master is liable for a negligent tortious act or default of his servant while acting within the scope of his employment; 6 Cow. 189; 2 Gray 181; 23 N. H. 157; 16 Me. 241; 5 Rich. 44; 18 Mo. 362; 75 Hun 68; 160 Pa. 300; 37 W. Va. 606; for the direct effect of such negligence; 17 Mass. 132; but not to one servant for the neglect of another engaged in the same general business; 36 Eng. L. & Eq. 486; 3 Cush. 270; 15 Barb. 574; 6 Ind. 205; 22 Ala. N. S. 294; 23 Me. 269; 4 Sneed 36; 161 Pa. 270; 160 Mass. 45; 98 Mich. 185; 7 Wash. 178; 154 U. S. 349; if the servant injured be not unnecessarily exposed; 28 Vt. 59; 6 Cal. 209; 4 Sneed 36.

And the servant is also liable; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 431, n. For wilful acts; 9 C. & P. 607; 3 Barb. 42; for those not committed while in the master's service; 26 Pa. 482; or not within the scope of his employment, he alone is liable.

Partners may be sued separately for acts of the firm, its agents or servants; 4 Gill 406; 1 C. & M. 93; 17 Mass. 182; 11 Wend. 571.

In an action to recover damages for a tort committed by a corporation prior to the appointment of a receiver, the latter is not a proper party; 83 Fed. Rep. 93. See INTERVENTION; MORTGAGE; UNITED STATES COURTS; REMOVAL; JOINDER; MISJOINDER; MISNOMER; NAME; RECEIVER; PATENT.

PARTITION. The division which is made between several persons of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or of goods and chattels which belong to them as co-proprietors. The term is more technically applied to the division of real estate made between co-parceners, tenants in common, or joint tenants.

Voluntary partition is that made by the owners by mutual consent. It is effected by mutual conveyances or releases to each person of the share which he is to hold, executed by the other owners. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 6, § 14.

Compulsory partition is that which takes place without regard to the wishes of one or more of the owners.

At common law the right of compulsory partition existed only in cases of co-parcenary; Litt. § 264. By statutes of 31 Henry VIII. c. 1, and 32 id. c. 2, the right was extended to joint tenants and tenants in common. These statutes have been generally re-enacted or adopted in the United States, and usually with increased facilities for partition; 4 Kent 362; Co. Litt. 175 a;

2 Bla. Com. 185; 16 Vin. Abr. 217. Partition at common law is effected by a judgment of the court and delivering up possession in pursuance of it, which concludes all the parties to it. In England the writ of partition has been abolished by stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, § 36.

Courts of equity also exercise jurisdiction in cases of partition where no adequate remedy could be had at law, as where the titles to the estates in question are such as are cognizable only in equity or where it is necessary to award owelty of partition. This jurisdiction was first settled in Elizabeth's time, and has increased largely on account of the peculiar advantages of the chancery proceeding; 1 Spence, Eq. 654. Nor have the increased facilities grafted by statute upon the common-law proceedings ousted the jurisdiction; 1 Story, Eq. § 646.

Partition in equity is effected by first ascertaining the rights of the several parties interested; and then issuing a commission to make the partition required; and finally on return of the commissioners and confirmation thereof, by decreeing mutual conveyances between the parties; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 120; 2 Sc. & L. 371. Where the titles of the parties are legal titles, the decree in the partition has been held to vest the titles in the purparts without conveyances.

A suit in the nature of partition cannot be maintained where there has been an ouster of the complainants by the defendant tenant in common, by acts so overt and notorious as to imply notice to his co-tenants; 87 Fed. Rep. 273; 80 Ala. 70. An adverse holding by any one of the parties for a period of time, however short, before the institution of proceedings in partition, is effectual to defeat the proceedings; 126 Pa. 297.

A voluntary partition of land by persons under legal disabilities is binding when fairly and equally made and free from fraud; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 373.

Where there is a parol partition, a party acquiescing in it and accepting exclusive possession under it is estopped from asserting title or right to possession in violation of its terms; 65 Fed. Rep. 742.

PARTNERS. Members of a partnership.

General partners are those whose liability for partnership debts is unlimited.

Ostensible partners are those whose names appear to the world as partners, and who in reality are such.

Nominal partners are those who are held out as partners but who have no interest in the firm or business. They may be liable as partners by reason of their own acts, without being actually partners.

Secret partners are partners whose connection with the firm is not publicly made known.

Silent partners are those who, though having a share in the firm profits, have no voice in the firm business.

Dormant partners are those whose names and transactions as partners are professedly concealed from the world. They combine the characters of both secret and silent partners.

A dormant partner is one whose name is not mentioned in the title of the firm, or embraced in some general term, as company, son, etc.; 4 Phill. 1. It is not necessary that his membership be universally unknown; it is enough if he is not an ostensible partner; 2 Fed. Rep. 640.

Special partners are those whose liabilities are limited by statute to the amount of their respective contributions. Ordinarily a special partner is associated with at least one general partner by whom the business is managed, but in the "partnerships limited" organized under recent statutes, all the parties have a limited liability.

WHO MAY BE. General rule. Persons who have the legal capacity to make other contracts may enter into that of partnership; Lind. Part. *77; 1 Col. Part. § 11; Pars. Part. § 14.

Aliens. An alien friend may be a partner; Lind. Part. *78; Co. Litt. 129 b. An alien enemy cannot enter into any commercial contract; 1 Kent *66; 16 Johns. 438; 7 Pet. 586; 9 Bush 15; 11 Exch. 135; and the breaking out of a war between two countries in which partners reside dissolves the partnership; 91 U. S. 70. See WAR.

Clergymen were disqualified to enter into a partnership in England by 57 Geo. III.

Corporations. There is no general principle of law which prevents a corporation from being a partner with another corporation, or with ordinary individuals, except the principle that a corporation cannot lawfully employ its funds for purposes not authorized by its charter; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *78; 46 Conn. 136; Grant, Corp. 5; 5 Gray 58; they are said to be prima facie ineligible as partners; George, Partn. 15; 121 N. Y. 582; 68 Pa. 173; 86 Tenn. 598; Beach, Corp. § 842. The purchase of an interest in a firm by a corporation does not make it a partner; 62 Mo. App. 390; but see 46 Conn. 136, where the charter authorized the corporation to enter into a partnership. See also 7 Wend. 412, where it was held that two corporations cannot form a partnership. A corporation which shares profits may be held to make good losses; 14 Barb. 479. While a contract of partnership between a corporation and an individual is ultra vires as to this corporation, yet if the corporation has received the benefit of the contract, it must account to the other party for what is due him under the contract; 182 Pa. 206.

Firms. Two firms may be partners in one joint firm; 1 Abb. Pr. 243; 1 Fed. Rep. 800. Where a partnership and an individual form a second partnership, all the members of the first partnership are members of the new firm; 114 Ill. 574.

Felons. Felons probably are not disqualified, in the absence of any statutory restriction, to enter into a contract of partnership in this country; George, Partn. 11.

Infants. An infant may contract the relation of partner, as he may make any trading contract which is likely to prove for his advantage; 17 Gratt. 503; 5 B. & Ald. 147. Such a contract made by a person during infancy is voidable and may be affirmed or disaffirmed by him at majority; Story, Part. § 7; 42 Mich. 134; but whether he may disaffirm before majority is doubtful; 31 Mich 182; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *74, n.; though it is said that he may; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 136. He may reclaim his contribution before majority; 83 N. Y. 245. Unless he gives notice of disaffirmance, or in some manner repudiates the contract within a reasonable time after becoming of age, he will be presumed to have ratified it; Story, Part. § 7; 9 Vt. 368; but it is held that there must be positive acts of ratification after majority; neglect to disaffirm is not ratification; 3 Cush. 372; see 8 Exch. 181; 8 N. Y. 228; and his liability then relates back to firm contracts made during his minority; 33 S. C. 285; 21 Mich. 304. The person with whom the minor contracts will be bound; 2 M. and S. 205; 1 Watts 412; 3 Green N. J. 343. In England and in Maine ratification, after majority, must be in writing.

Lunatics. A lunatic is probably not absolutely incapable of being a partner; Lind. Part. *84; since the insanity of a partner does not per se dissolve the firm, but simply amounts to a sufficient cause for a court of equity to decree a dissolution; 1 Cox, Ch. 107; 2 Myl. & K. 125; 15 Johns. 57; contra, 6 Humphr. 85. Whether a contract by a lunatic to become a partner can in all cases be avoided by him, is, perhaps, unsettled; Story, Part. § 7, n. 1.

Married women. Married women, at common law, are incapable of becoming partners, since they are generally unable to contract or engage in trade; 30 Md. 402; Story, Part. § 10; 3 De G., M. & G. 18; see 36 S. C. 424; and cannot be made partners by estoppel; 27 S. C. 525; 31 Ind. 113. But where a married woman is authorized by custom, statute, or otherwise to trade as a feme sole, she may probably be a partner; 52 Miss. 402; 43 Ark. 212; 57 Ia. 361; contra, 91 Ind. 384; Story, Part. § 10; Pars. Part. § 19. The mere consent of her husband to her trading as a feme sole does not necessarily permit her to become a partner; Story, Part. § 12. In some states she may be a partner as to her separate estate; 74 Pa. 448; 94 Mich. 230; contra, 20 W. Va. 571. A married woman, by acting as partner and continuing the business after her husband's death, creates a partnership from the beginning; 10 Paige 82.

Except as above stated, a married woman cannot become a partner without statutory authority; 23 Fla. 83; 27 S. C. 525; 20 W. Va. 571; in any case, however, the capital she puts in is liable for the firm debts; 66 Mo. 617. It has been held that where the wife cannot be a partner, the husband will be considered as such; 65 Tex. 131.

Under modern married women statutes, a wife is not, according to most of the cases, permitted to enter into partnership with her husband; 140 Mass. 521; 4 Wash. St. 263; 16 L. R. A. (Ark.) 526; 73 Mich. 146; contra, 122 N. Y. 308. See 3 Biss. 405.

Number of persons. Generally speaking, the common law imposes no restriction as to the number of persons who may carry on trade as partners; 1 Col. Part. § 10: 27 Ind. 399; unless by statute, as in England, where the limit is twenty. But a partnership cannot consist of but one person; 46 Mich. 449.

As to who are partners, see PARTNERSHIP.

POWERS OF PARTNERS. General rule. It has been customary to derive the authority of a partner from an assumed relation of mutual agency between the members of the firm, and it is true that the firm is responsible for whatever is done by any of the partners while acting for it within the limits of the authority conferred by the nature of the business carried on; 8 H. L. Cas. 268; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *124; 36 Pa. 498; 58 Mo. 532; 45 Miss. 499; 59 Ala. 386. The principle of agency applies to copartners; but it is only when one is acting as their agent that he binds them; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1315. It is perhaps more accurate to trace a partner's power to his standing as a co-principal, and to consider his agency an incident of this relation; 5 Ch. Div. 458; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. The relation is a peculiar sort of agency, where the partner is agent for the firm and not merely for the other partners; 5 Ch. Div. 458. Whatever the source of a partner's power, it is, as a rule, limited to acts incident to carrying on, in the usual way, the particular business in which the firm is engaged, and each partner has the power to manage the ordinary business of the firm, and, consequently, to bind his co-partners, whether they be ostensible, dormant, actual, or nominal; 2 B. & Ald. 673; 1 Cr. & J. 316; by whatever he may do, in the course of such management, as entirely as to bind himself. But the acts of a partner wholly unconnected with the business of the partnership do not bind the firm; 2 B. & Ald. 678; 8 Me. 320; 15 Pick. 290; 3 Johns. Ch. 23; nor will an act beyond the scope of the partnership; 79 Ga. 268.

The partner's authority is incident to, and co-extensive with, the business; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 133. A partner's authority to act cannot be restricted by notice from another partner to a third party; 5 Den. 541; 41 N. Y. 376. An insolvent partner has the same authority, even after dissolution; 1 Duer 662. Partners may, by agreement, restrict the authority of a partner, as between themselves, but not as to third parties, without notice; Pars. (Jas.) Part. § 134.

One of two partners in the practice of the law has no authority to accept for the firm an agency for the mere sale of real estate; 152 U. S. 673.

Accounts. One partner can bind his firm by rendering an account relating to a partnership transaction; 8 Cl. & F. 121; 47 Mo. 346; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *28

Actions. One partner can bring an action on firm account in his own and his co-partners' names without their consent, but they are entitled to indemnity if he sues against their will; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *271; 2 Cr. & M. 318; 67 Mo. 568. This power of a partner survives the dissolution of the firm; 1 E. D. Sm. 423. One partner cannot, as a rule, sue in his own name for a firm debt; the suit must be in the names of all; Penn. N. J. 711.

Admissions. After the relation of partnership has been established, a partner may bind his co-partner by an admission; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 121; 143 Mass. 473; 65 Wis. 247; but the existence of the partnership must be shown by other evidence; 102 N. Y. 336. See infra.

Appearance. In an action against partners, one may enter or authorize an appearance for the rest; 7 Term 207; 17 Vt. 531; 1 Binn. 214; 6 Johns. 296; 32 N. Y. Supp. 840; 4 Kan. 240; contra, L. R. 8 Q. B. 398; 3 Ohio 519; see Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 119; 10 App. Cas. 680; but not after dissolution of the firm; 2 McCord 311. Nor can one partner bind his co-partners personally and individually by entering an appearance for them when they are not within the jurisdiction, nor served with process; 9 Cush. 390; 11 How. 165. A partner cannot authorize an appearance for a co-partner, not subject to the jurisdiction of the court, or if the firm has been dissolved; 91 U. S. 160; but a solicitor instructed by a managing partner may enter an appearance for all partners; [1896] 1 Q. B. 886.

Arbitration. As a general rule, one partner cannot bind the firm by submitting any of its affairs to arbitration, whether by deed or parol; 3 Kent 49; 3 C. & B. 742; 85 Mich. 5; 2 So. Rep. (Ala.) 268; 40 Vt. 460; 19 Johns. 137; 1 Pet. 221. The reason given being that such a power is unnecessary for carrying on the business in the ordinary way; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *129, *272. But the acting partner may be bound; 19 Johns. 137; 5 G. & J. 412. And the general rule is perhaps somewhat relaxed; Pars. Partn. § 121. It is held that one partner may bind the firm by submission to arbitration, by an agreement not under seal; 89 Pa. 453; 3 T. B. Monr. 435; 25 Ill. 48; but apparently only so as to bind firm assets; 12 S. & R. 243; 89 Pa. 453.

Assignments. The right of a partner to dispose of the property of the firm extends to the assignment of at least a portion of it as security for antecedent debts, as well as for debts thereafter to be contracted; Story, Part. § 101; 5 Cra. 289; 58 Mo. 532; 17 Vt. 394. Although the authorities differ, the better opinion seems to be that one partner cannot, without the knowledge or consent of his co-partners, assign all the property of the firm to a trustee for the benefit of creditors; 13 Minn. 43; 84 Mo. 329; 50 Ala. 251; 29 Ohio St. 441; 32 Wis. 444; 17 Vt. 390; 69 Miss. 17; 2 Tex. App. 236; 134 U. S. 206; unless the co-partner is absent, or is incapable of giving his assent or dissent; 90 Va. 200; 27 Minn. 255; but not against the assent, or without the consent, of the co-partner, if the latter is present and capable of acting; 176 Pa. 52. A surviving partner has power to make an assignment for the benefit of the firm's creditors; 76 Md. 581.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes. A partner may draw, accept, and indorse bills and notes in the name and for the use of the firm, for purposes within the scope of its business; 7 Term 210; 20 Miss. 226; 119 Mass. 215; 78 Ill. 234. A restriction of this power by agreement between the partners does not affect third persons unless they have notice; 27 La. Ann. 352; 44 Miss. 283. This power cannot be exercised after dissolution of the firm; 42 Mich. 110; 51 Cal. 531; but its exercise may bind the firm if such dissolution be without proper notice; 130 Mass. 591; or when the other party subsequently assents thereto; 98 Ga. 468.

The doctrine is generally limited to partnerships in trade and commerce, and does not apply to other partnerships, unless it is the common usage of such business so to bind the firm, or it is necessary for the due transaction thereof; 145 U. S. 512. Non-trading partners, such as farmers; 57 Ill. 531; lawyers; 37 Wis. 285; physicians; 1 Humph. 23; cannot usually bind the firm by such instruments. Parties dealing with non-trading partnerships are put on inquiry; 10 Heisk. 629; 33 La. Ann. 196; the doctrine of general agency does not apply; 53 Conn. 53.

A bill or note made by one partner in the name of the firm is prima facie for partnership purposes; 31 Mich. 373; 34 Pa. 344; 16 Wend. 504; 44 Miss. 283.

A partner has no implied authority to indorse a note made payable to a co-partner, although for firm account; 64 Ga. 221; nor to bind the firm as a party to a note for the accommodation of or as surety for another; 19 Johns. 154; 5 Conn. 574; 21 Miss. 122; 31 Me. 452; 49 Minn. 557; 1 App. D. C. 171; unless by special authority implied from the nature of the business or previous course of dealing; 3 Kent 46; 3 Humph. 597; 4 Hill N. Y. 261; and the burden is on the holder of the instrument to show such authority; 19 Johns. 154; 86 Mich. 632; 69 Miss. 17. Direct proof is not necessary; the authority or ratification may be inferred from circumstances; 2 Cush. 309; 22 Me. 188; 14 Wend. 133; 10 Vt. 268. Indorsement of a note for a third person by a partner in the firm name without the knowledge of the other member of the firm and having no connection with its business, does not bind the firm; 129 U. S. 372.

Borrowing money. One partner may borrow money on the credit of the firm, when it is necessary for the transaction of the business in the ordinary way; 115 Mass. 388; 62 Pa. 393; 75 Ill. 629; 61 Ala. 143; but the amount must be within the usual business of the firm; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 125; but a partner in a cash business, as a firm of solicitors, cannot borrow; 37 Wis. 285; or physicians; Humph. 28. It is said that a partner cannot borrow to increase the firm's capital; 2 Hare 218. A contract to borrow money in violation of a partnership agreement is not valid, though made in furtherance of the interests of the firm; 13 So. Rep. (Miss.) 282.

Checks. One partner has the implied power to bind the firm by firm checks drawn on its bankers; 3 C. B. N. S. 442. See 159 Pa. 287. Such checks must not be post-dated; L. R. 6 Q. B. 209.

Compromise. A partner may compromise with debtors or creditors of the firm; Story, Part. § 115; 30 Conn. 1; 7 Gill 49.

Confession of judgment. One partner cannot, by confessing a voluntary judgment against the firm, bind his co-partners; 172 Pa. 70; see 51 Mo. App. 470; 43 id. 121. But a judgment so confessed will bind the partner who confessed it; 91 U. S. 160; 3 C. B. 742; 154 Pa. 152; 13 Ia. 496; 32 Vt. 709; 30 La. Ann. 692; but see 22 How. 209; and will bind the firm assets; see 8 Kulp Pa. 264; 32 La. Ann. 607, where it was held that a "commercial partner" has a right to confess judgment on behalf of the firm. Only the other partner can object to it; 42 Ill. App. 291. Where a judgment note has been signed in the firm name only, the plaintiff may name the individual members, and judgment may be entered in this form; 172 Pa. 70.

Contracts. A partner has the power to bind the firm by simple contracts within the scope of the partnership business; 15 Mass. 75; 5 Pet. 529; and make a contract which will bind them as partners and also as individuals; 78 Ga. 797; but not a contract to convey firm real estate; 5 Hill N. Y. 107.

Debts. One partner may receive debts due the firm, and payment to him by the debtor extinguishes the claim; 12 Mod. 446; 1 Wash. Va. 77; 2 Blackf. 371; 14 La. Ann. 681; 4 Binn. 375; even after dissolution; 15 Ves. 198; although the debtor knew there was an agreement that one party alone was to collect and pay the debts; 44 Ill. App. 500. A partner may also bind the firm by assenting to the transfer of a debt due to it, as the transfer of the firm's account from one banker to another; 2 H. & N. 826. A partner cannot employ partnership funds to pay his own pre-existing debt, without the consent of his co-partners; 18 Conn. 294; 12 Pet. 221; 31 Ala. 532; 28 Ohio St. 55; 94 Pa. 31; 87 Ga. 651; 121 U. S. 310. But in 57 Fed. Rep. 257, it was held that one of two co-partners could pledge the partnership property to secure his private debts, to the extent of his interest therein.

Deeds. One partner has no implied authority to bind his co-partners by a deed, even for a debt or obligation contracted in the ordinary course of commercial dealings within the scope of the partnership business; 3 Kent 47; 11 Ohio St. 223; 26 Vt. 154. Such an instrument binds the maker only; 62 Pa. 393; 7 Ohio St. 468. But such a deed may be ratified; 12 Ill. App. 517; and this consent or adoption may be by parol; 26 Vt. 154; 11 Pick. 400. It binds the firm if they were present at the execution; 3 Ves. 578. The fact that the partnership articles are under seal does not give such authority; 7 Term 297; unless they contain a particular power to that effect; id. One partner may convey by deed property of the firm which he might have conveyed without deed. The seal in such a case would be surplusage; 2 Ohio St. 478; 5 Hill N. Y. 107; 7 Metc. 244; he may assign a mortgage in payment of a firm debt, or release a mortgage; 4 Gill & J. 310; 4 Mas. 206. See infra under Release. One partner may acknowledge a deed for the firm; 70 Mo. 206.

Distress. Where a lease has been granted by the firm, any partner may distrain or appoint a bailiff to do so; 4 Bing. 562, and cases there cited.

Firm property. Each partner has the power to dispose of the entire right of his co-partners in the partnership effects, for the purposes of the partnership business and in the name of the firm; Story, Part. § 9. This power is held not to extend to real estate, which a single partner cannot transfer without special authority; Story, Part. § 101; 1 Brock. 456; 3 McLean 27. Since the power to transfer the firm property must be exercised for the ordinary purposes of the partnership business, it is held that a partner's employment of firm capital in a new partnership, which he forms for his firm with third persons charges him for a conversion of the fund to his own use; 25 Ohio St. 180.

Guarantees. A partner derives no authority from the mere relation of partnership to bind the firm as guarantor of the debt of another; 4 Exch. 623; 31 Me. 454; 21 Miss. 122; 35 Pa. 517. If the contract of guaranty is strictly within the scope of the firm business, one partner may bind the firm by it; 41 Ia. 518; or if guaranty is usual in that kind of business or is such as the firm has frequently recognized; Pars. Partn. § 144; and where a partner sold notes and applied the proceeds to firm use; 24 Barb. 549.

Insurance. One partner may effect an insurance of the partnership goods; 1 M. & G. 130; 54 Mich. 531; 141 Mass. 298. The assignment of a partner's interest in the firm stock without the insurer's consent, does not violate a policy of insurance upon it; 27 Ohio St. 1.

Leases. The rule is that a partner has no power to contract on behalf of the firm for a lease of a building for partnership purposes; 22 Beav. 606. But it is held that a partner may bind the firm for the rent of premises necessary for partnership purposes, and so used; 47 Conn. 26; 21 La. Ann. 21; 51 Wis. 547; but see 22 Beav. 606. A partner can give a valid notice to quit; 1 B. & Ad. 135.

Statute of limitations. Before dissolution an acknowledgment by one partner of a debt barred by the statute will bind the firm; Pars. Part. § 127; as to whether it will do so, if made after dissolution, the authorities are conflicting; the better view appears to be that it will not; id.; 15 Fed. Rep. 888; 76 Ala. 501; 5 Neb. 368; some cases distinguish between acknowledgments made before and after the statutory period has run; if made after, it does not bind; 43 Md. 70; if made before, it does; 36 Conn. 270; 45 Mo. 365. Some cases hold that it binds though made after dissolution and after the statutory period has run; 50 Vt. 421; 6 Call. 51. If made after dissolution by a liquidating partner, it is binding; 3 W. & S. 345; but not otherwise; 101 Pa. 233. In England and in many states statutes have rendered the acknowledgment of one partner insufficient to toll the statute.

Majority, power of. The weight of authority seems to be in favor of the power of a majority of the firm, acting in good faith, to bind the minority in the ordinary transactions of the partnership business; 3 Kent 45; 33 Beav. 595; 4 Johns. Ch. 473; 46 Pa. 434; 27 Ala. 245; 49 Ga. 417. But see 6 Ves. 778; 1 Yo. & Jer. 227; 57 Pa. 365. It is said that, in the absence of an express stipulation, a majority may decide as to the disposal of the partnership property; 3 Chitty, Com. L. 234; but the power of the majority must be confined to the ordinary business of the partnership; 14 Beav. 367; 2 De G. M. & G. 49; it does not extend to the right to change any of the provisions therein; 4 Johns. Ch. 573; 32 N. H. 9; nor to engage the partnership in transactions for which it was never intended; 3 Maule & S. 488; and all must be consulted; 2 Ia. 504. Where a majority is authorized to act, it must be fairly constituted and must proceed with the most entire good faith; 10 Hare 493; 5 De G. & S. 310. A majority cannot change the place of business after a lease has expired; 8 Ch. Div. 129. The American cases are said to have enlarged the power of the majority; Pars. Partn. § 147; but the question is not clearly settled; id.

Mortgages. A partner has no implied power to make a mortgage of partnership real estate; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *139; 2 Humph. 534. See 37 Neb. 666. But one partner may execute a valid chattel mortgage of firm property, without the consent of his co-partners; 47 Wis. 261; 18 Minn. 232; 16 Or. 153; 30 W. Va. 586; 96 Mich. 233; 130 Ind. 68; 83 Ia. 449. A deed of trust of partnership property to secure certain creditors to the exclusion of others will bind the partnership, though executed by only two out of three partners; 136 U. S. 223. Two or three members of a firm have authority to mortgage partnership stock for the security of the debts of the firm; 78 Ia. 399. A mortgage by one partner of the whole stock in trade to secure a firm debt has been held valid; 1 Metc. 515.

Pledges of firm property. A partner may pledge its personal property to raise money for the firm; 3 Kent 46; 10 Hare 453; 7 M. & G. 607; 3 Bradw. 261. It is thought that a partner's equitable mortgage of firm real estate, by depositing deeds of partnership property as a pledge, would be valid; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *140.

Purchases. A partner may bind the firm by purchasing on credit such goods as are necessary for carrying on the business in the usual way; 1 Camp. 185; 5 W. & S. 564; 19 Ga. 520; 76 N. C. 139; even land; 14 Nev. 265; but see 13 Bush 67.

Ratification. If a contract on behalf of the co-partnership, executed under seal by one partner, be, after its execution, ratified by the other partners, it becomes the deed of the firm as fully as if executed under seal by all the partners; even if the contract did not pertain to the ordinary business of the firm; 45 Minn. 11; see 70 Tex. 517.

Receipts. The power of a partner to receipt for the firm is incident to his power to receive money for it; see Debts; Story, Part. § 115.

Relative extent of each partner's power. In all ordinary matters relating to the partnership, the powers of the partners are co-extensive, and neither has a right to exclude another from an equal share in the management of the concern or from the possession of the partnership effects; 2 Paige, Ch. 310; 2 J. & W. 558.

Release. The rule that one partner cannot bind his co-partners by deed does not extend to releases; 75 Ill. 583; 2 Co. 68; 3 Johns. 68; 4 Gill & J. 310; 3 Kent 48; but see 40 Ia. 76. As a release by one partner is a release by all; 21 Ill. 604; 37 Vt. 573; so a release to one partner is a release to all; 5 Gill & J. 314; 23 Pick. 444.

Sales. A partner has power to sell any of the partnership goods; Cowp. 445; 3 Kent 44; or its negotiable notes; 102 U. S. 564; even the entire stock, if the sale be free from fraud on the part of the purchaser; and such sale dissolves the firm, although the term for which it was formed has not expired; 24 Pick. 89; 5 Watts 22; 59 Ala. 338; see, contra, 8 Bosw. 495; and this rule is doubted; George, Partn. 234; the implied power of a partner to sell applies only to property which is held for the purposes of sale; 37 Pa. 217; 12 Misc. Rep. 620; a partner has no power to sell all the partnership property without his co-partners' assent. A partner cannot transfer the whole of the partnership assets to a third person who is not a creditor; 82 N. Y. S. App. 423. A partner has power to sell after dissolution; 4 De G. M. & G. 542; and may then sell partnership realty to pay debts; 104 U. S. 18. A sale by one partner of his share of the stock dissolves the firm and gives the purchaser the right to an account; 50 Cal. 615. A bona fide sale of all the partnership effects by one partner to another is valid, although the firm and both partners are at the time insolvent; 9 Cush. 553; 21 Conn. 130; 21 N. H. 462.

Servants. One partner has the implied power to hire servants for partnership purposes; 9 M. & W. 79; 74 Pa. 166; and probably to discharge them, though not against the will of his co-partner; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *147.

Specialties. As a rule, the relation of partnership gives a partner no authority to bind his co-partners by specialty; Story, Part. § 117; and see Deeds and Mortgages, supra. The reason is that a seal belongs to the common law and partnership to the law merchant; Pars. Part. § 123. But it has been held that a partner may bind his firm by an executed contract under seal, because the firm is really bound by the act, and the seal is merely evidence; 38 Pa. 231; and, as stated above, a partner may bind his firm by a release under seal. If the seal was not necessary, it will be regarded as surplusage; as in an assignment for creditors; 5 Cra. 289; a mortgage of firm chattels; 7 Metc. 244; an assignment of a chose in action due the firm; 5 Hill 163. The general rule is now of less importance than formerly; Pars. Part. § 123. A lender may disregard a specialty executed by one partner, for a loan, and recover from the firm in assumpsit; 98 Ill. 27.

Warranties. It is laid down as a general rule that a power to sell does not carry with it the implied authority to bind the firm by a warranty; Pars. Part. 4th ed. § 144. See 46 Ill. App. 213. But if the partner has power to sell, his warranty would probably bind the firm; Pars. Partn. § 144; 24 Barb. 549.

Liabilities. General Rule. If an act is done by one partner on behalf of the firm, and it can be said to have been necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business in the ordinary way, the firm will prima facie be liable, although in point of fact the act was not authorized by the other partners; but if the act cannot be said to have been necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business in the ordinary way, the firm will prima facie not be liable; 10 B. & C. 128; 14 M. & W. 11. As to reason for such liability, see Powers, supra.

Admissions. It is laid down as a general rule that partners are bound by the admissions, representations, and acknowledgments of one of their number, concerning partnership transactions; Story, Part. § 107; 1 Harr. N. J. 41. A better rule seems to be that the admissions of one partner with reference to a partnership transaction are evidence against the firm; 2 C. & P. 232; but not necessarily conclusive evidence; 2 K. & J. 491; 5 Stew. N. J. 828. It is held that the admission of one partner in legal proceedings is the admission of all; 1 Maule & S. 259; 40 Md. 499; 68 Ind. 110; 47 Mo. 346; 4 Conn. 326; 15 Mass. 44; 2 Wash. C. C. 388. See supra.

Agreements inter se. No arrangement between the partners themselves can limit or prevent their ordinary responsibilities to third persons, unless the latter assent to such arrangement; 2 B. & Ald. 679; 3 Kent 41; 5 Pet. 129; 3 B. & C. 427. But where the creditor has express notice of a private arrangement between the partners, by which either the power of one to bind the firm or his liability on partnership contracts is qualified or defeated, such creditor will be bound by the arrangement; 4 Ired. 129; 38 N. H. 287; 6 Pick. 372; 4 Johns. 251; 5 Conn. 597; 5 Bro. P. C. 489.

Attachment. A partner's interest in a firm is liable to attachment by his creditors; 7 C. B. 229; 2 Johns. Ch. 548; 8 N. H. 252; but one partner cannot maintain an attachment against the firm of which he is a member; 98 Ala. 526.

Contracts. See Powers, supra.

Contribution. A partner's contribution to the capital of his firm is a partnership debt for the repayment of which each partner is liable on an accounting and after payment of debts; 119 Mass. 38. Failure of a partner to pay his contribution in full does not entitle his co-partner to exclude him from the business without a dissolution; 3 C. E. Green 385.

Debts. Each partner is liable to pay the whole partnership debts. In what proportion the partners shall contribute is a matter merely among themselves; 5 Burr. 2613. Universally, whatever agreement may exist among the partners themselves, stipulating for a restricted responsibility, and however limited may be the extent of his own separate beneficial interest in, and however numerous the members of, the partnership, each individual member is liable for the joint debt; 5 Burr. 2611; 1 V. & B. 157; 2 Des. 148; 6 S. & R. 333; 34 Ohio St. 187. See 45 N. J. Eq. 738. In Louisiana, ordinary partners are not bound in solido for the debts of the partnership; La. Civ. Code, art. 28: though commercial partners who deal in personal property are bound in solido; a partner is bound for his share of the partnership debts, calculating such share in proportion to the number of partners, without attention to the proportion of the stock or profits each is entitled to; id. art. 2873. In equity, partnership debts are regarded as both joint and several; 45 N. J. Eq. 738.

An incoming partner is not liable for the debts of the firm incurred before he became a member, unless he assumes them by agreement; 58 Pa. 179; 27 La. Ann. 352; 73 Ill. 381; 6 Wash. 514; 53 Kan. 251; 49 Ark. 457; 77 Cal. 440. But a retiring partner remains liable for the outstanding debts of the firm; 4 Russ. 430.

Dormant partners. Dormant partners are, when discovered, equally liable with those who are held out to the world as partners, upon contracts made during the time they participate in the profits of the business; 1 Cr. & J. 316; 5 Mas. 176; 9 Pick. 272; 5 Pet. 529; 2 Harr. & G. 159; 5 Watts 454; 1 Dougl. 371; 21 Miss. 656; 25 Ill. 359; 46 La. Ann. 894. This liability is said to be founded on their participation in the profits; 5 Pet. 574; 10 Vt. 170; 16 Johns.

40; 1 H. Bla. 31. Another reason given for holding them liable is that they might otherwise receive usurious interest without any risk; 4 B. & Ald. 663; 10 Johns. 226. But inasmuch as a dormant partner differs from an ostensible partner only in being unknown as such, the liability of each must be owing to the same cause, viz.: that they are principals in the business, the dormant partner being undisclosed; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. Sharing profits is simply evidence of this relation; 5 Ch. Div. 458; and the usurious interest theory is so palpably illogical that it has never been accepted to any extent; 2 W. Bla. 997.

Dower. It has been held that a partner's widow is entitled to dower in firm lands subject to the equities of the parties; 3 Stew. N. J. 415. Firm debts are a lien on partnership lands paramount to a widow's right of dower; 8 Ohio St. 328; 86 Ill. 286; where partnership land is sold to pay debts, the widow of a partner has no dower; 65 Mo. 138; but contra, 20 S. C. 550; 7 How. (Miss.) 437. See 34 Fed. Rep. 375. Where the firm debts are all paid the dower revives; 68 Ala. 210.

Firm funds. A partner who withdraws firm funds from the business, thereby diminishing the stock, and applies them to his own use, is liable to the others for the injury; 1 J. J. Marsh. 507; 3 Stor. 101; and funds so used by a partner may be followed into his investments; 1 Stew. N. J. 595.

Fraud. One partner will be bound by the fraud of his co-partner in contracts relating to the affairs of the partnership, made with innocent third persons; 6 Cow. 497; 2 Cl. & F. 250; 7 T. B. Monr. 617; 15 Mass. 75, 331; 56 Ind. 406; 73 Ill. 381. This doctrine proceeds upon the ground that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, he shall suffer who has been the cause or the occasion of the confidence and credit reposed in such third person; 1 Metc. 562, 563. The liability, therefore, does not arise when there is collusion between the fraudulent partner and the party with whom he deals; 1 East 48; or the latter has reason to suppose that the partner is acting on his own account; 2 C. B. 821; 10 B. & C. 298. See infra.

Not only gross frauds, but intrigues for private benefit, are clearly offences against the partnership at large, and, as such, are relievable in a court of equity; 3 Kent 51, 52; 1 Sim. 52, 89.

A fraud committed by a partner (in a law firm) while acting on his own separate account is not imputable to the firm, although, had he not been a member of the firm, he would not have been in a position to commit the fraud; 18 N. Y. L. J. (Dec. 17, 1897).

Insolvency. It has been held that the discharge of the partners in insolvency, as individuals, does not relieve them from liability for the firm debts; 56 Cal. 631.

Judgments. The rule is that a judgment obtained against one partner on a firm liability is a bar to an action against his co-partners on the same obligation; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *255, *703; 3 De G. & J. 33; 4 McLean 51; 11 Gill & J. 11; see contra, 14 Bush 777; except when they are abroad and cannot be sued with effect; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *255; 42 Ohio St. 11; 71 Ga. 466; 4 De G. & S. 199; and this is so even if the other partners were not known to him. But in Pennsylvania and other states this rule is changed by statute. Where one partner is sued and judgment is given for him, the creditor may still have recourse to the others; 2 H. & C. 717.

Mismanagement. As a rule, a partner is not liable to the firm for the mismanagement of its business; Penn. N. J. 717; 1 Gray 376. See 41 Pa. 505; see infra, Torts. Because it is unreasonable to hold a partner, who acts fairly and for the best interests of the firm according to his judgment, liable for a loss thus unwittingly occasioned; 3 Wash. C. C. 224.

Notice. A retiring ostensible partner remains liable to persons who have had dealings with the firm and who have no notice of his retirement; 51 Ala. 126; 57 Ind. 284; 83 Pa. 148. Actual notice is not necessary to escape liability to new customers; Wade, Notice 226; Pars. Part. § 317; even though the business is continued in the same firm name; 36 Ohio St. 135. As a general rule, notice to one partner of any matters relating to the business of the firm is notice to all; 40 Mich. 546; 40 N. H. 267; 6 La. Ann. 684; 20 Johns. 176; 79 Pa. 251; even if two firms have a common partner; 3 Pa. 399.

Surviving partner. The surviving partner stands chargeable with the partnership debts, and takes the partnership property by survivorship, for all purposes of holding and administering the estate, until the effects are reduced to money and the debts paid; 3 Kent 37; 5 Metc. 576; 10 Gill & J. 404; 30 Me. 386; 3 Paige, Ch. 527; 13 Miss. 44; 18 Conn. 294. See 1 Exch. 164. The debts of the partnership must be collected in his name; 6 Cow. 441; Story, Part. § 346; 3 Kent 37; 4 Metc. 540. He has full power to control and dispose of the firm assets for the purpose of winding up its affairs and may secure a firm creditor by the execution of a mortgage, which is not invalid by reason of the fact that it also secures money borrowed by him after the death of his partner, if used for the partnership debts; 46 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 932. He has power to make an assignment for the benefit of firm creditors with preferences; 118 U. S. 3.

Torts. The firm is not liable for the torts of a partner committed outside of the usual course of the business, unless they are assented to or adopted by its members; 42 N. H. 25; 87 Ill. 508; 2 Ia. 580; 4 Blatch. 129; 32 Miss. 17; otherwise, in regard to torts committed in conducting the affairs of the partnership or those assented to by the firm; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *198, *702; as for the negligent driving of a coach by a member of a firm of coach proprietors; 4 B. & C. 223; or for the negligence of a servant employed by the firm while transacting its business; 14 Gray 191; or for the conversion of property by a partner, to be appropriated to the use of the firm; 87 Ill. 508; or for obtaining goods by false pretences and fraudulently disposing of them; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 116. Demand of, and a refusal by, one partner to deliver up property is evidence of a conversion by the firm; 24 Wend. 169; 4 Rawle 120. A partnership may be liable for the publication of a libel; 83 Ala. 404. See 73 Mich. 203. If the firm is liable for the tort of a partner, each partner is liable in solido; Pars. Partn. § 100; and all or one or more may be sued; 142 Ill. 9.

It has been held that the fraud of one partner does not charge the firm; 6 Mass. 245; without participation by the firm; 5 Greenl. 295 (but see as to these cases 1 Metc. 564); and that it is not liable for malicious prosecution instituted by one partner for the larceny of firm property, unless the others participated in the prosecution; 101 Ala. 165.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES. General rules. Good faith, reasonable diligence and skill, and the exercise of a sound judgment and discretion, lie at the very foundation of the relation of partnership. In this respect the same general rules apply to partners which are applicable to the other fiduciary relations; Story, Part. § 169; 14 Beav. 250; 1 Johns. Ch. 470; 53 Mo. 122; 81 Ill. 221; 80 Pa. 234. It becomes, therefore, the implied duty of each partner to devote himself to the interests of the business, and to exercise due diligence and skill for the promotion of the common benefit of the partnership. No partner has, ordinarily, a right to engage in any business or speculation which must necessarily deprive the partnership of a portion of his skill, industry, or capital; 3 Kent 51; 1 Johns. Ch. 305; 1 S. & S. 133; nor to place himself in a position which gives him a bias against the discharge of his duty; Story, Part. § 175; 1 S. & S. 124; 11 S. & R. 41, 48; 3 Kent 61; see 129 U. S. 512; nor to make use of the partnership property for his own private benefit; 6 Madd. 367; 4 Beav. 584; 1 Sim. 52; 3 Stew. N. J. 254; nor to make a personal profit out of any transaction connected with firm interests; 61 N. Y. 123. He cannot make a profit out of any transaction between himself and the firm; 18 Beav. 75; L. R. 18 Eq. 524; a partner cannot engage in any other business in which he competes with his firm; 1 S. & S. 124. But a partner may traffic outside of the scope of the firm's business for his own benefit and advantage; 150 U. S. 524.

Account in equity. Every partner has a right to an account from his co-partner, which may be enforced in equity, whereby a partner is enabled to secure the application of partnership assets to firm debts and the distribution of the surplus among the members of the firm; 8 Beav. 106; 24 Conn. 279. A silent partner may have a bill for an account; 98 Mass. 118. It has been held that a partner's bill for an account will be barred by the statute of limitations; 3 C. E. Green 457. See 66 Hun 469. But not for secret profits made by one partner in transacting firm business; 8 Stew. N. J. 254. A partner cannot maintain account against a co-partner for the profits of an illegal traffic; 120 Mass. 285.

Accounts to be kept. In order to give the partners information that the business is being carried on for their mutual advantage, it is the duty of each to keep an accurate account ready for inspection; 2 J. & W. 556; Story, Part. § 181; and see 104 Mass. 436; 16 Fla. 99; 3 Y. & C. 655; 20 Beav. 219.

Actions. As a general rule an action at law does not lie by one partner against his co-partners for money paid or liabilities incurred on account of the partnership, because without an account it is impossible to tell whether a partner is a debtor or creditor of the firm; 33 Mo. 557; 54 Barb. 353. See, contra, Gow, Part. c. 2, § 3. There are, however, many circumstances under which partners may sue each other; see Story, Part. § 219, note (2).

Articles of co-partnership. Partners may enter into any agreements between themselves, which are not void as against statutory provisions or general principles of law, even though they do conflict with the ordinary rules of the law of partnership, and such engagements will be enforced between the parties; Pars. Part., 4th ed. § 160; 28 E. L. & Eq. 7.

One partner may obtain an injunction to restrain his co-partner from violating his rights under the contract of partnership, even when the dissolution of the partnership is not asked; 12 U. S. App. 193. But it is held that equity will not interfere with the suit of a partner to prevent a dissolution made in contravention of the partnership articles, or to compel specific performance of them, the contract being of an essentially personal character; 4 Del. Ch. 337; 118 Mass. 279; 168 U. S. 336.

But the partnership articles do not affect third persons, unless they have notice of them; 2 B. & Ald. 697; 8 M. & W. 703; 1 Dall. 269; 14 Ohio St. 592; 16 Wend. 505.

Claims against the firm. A partner may be a firm creditor and is entitled to payment of his claim before judgment creditors of the individual partners; 5 C. E. Green 288.

Compensation. As it is the duty of partners to devote themselves to the interests of the business, it follows that they are not entitled to any special compensation for so doing, although the services performed by them are very unequal in amount and value, unless there is an express stipulation for remuneration; 7 Paige, Ch. 483; 4 Gill 338; 2 D. & B. Eq. 123; 44 Ia. 428; 69 Pa. 30; 11 So. Rep. (Ala.) 754; 89 Mich. 233; 99 U. S. 355; nor for services performed prior to the partnership, although they enure to its benefit; 124 Mass. 305. A surviving partner has been held entitled to compensation for continuing the business, in order to save the good-will; 26 Ohio St. 190. A surviving partner is ordinarily entitled to compensation after dissolution; 25 Beav. 382; but it is held that a liquidating partner is not entitled to compensation for winding up the concern; 82 Hun 488; 89 Pa. 139; 99 U. S. 355; 124 Mass. 305; so of a surviving or liquidating partner; 31 N. Y. Supp. 614; but he is entitled to be paid his expenses; 2 Super. Ct. Pa. 306. But where it was agreed that a partner should not give personal services, he may recover for services rendered the firm at their request; 11 Ill. 392. See Liquidating partner, infra.

Contribution. Since partners are co-principals and all liable for the firm debts, any partner who pays its liabilities is, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, entitled to contribution from his co-partners; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *367; 6 De G. M. & G. 572; 3 Ill. 464; 18 Pa. 351.

Dissolution. A member of an ordinary partnership, the duration of which is indefinite, may dissolve it at any time; Pars. Part. § 306; Lind. Part. *220; 51 Ind. 478; 76 N. Y. 373; 168 U. S. 336; 4 Col. 567. It will then continue only for purposes of winding up; 17 Ves. 298; 5 Leigh 583; 55 N. J. L. 427. But a court of equity would perhaps interfere to prevent irreparable injury by an untimely dissolution; 1 Swanst. 512. Where there is an agreement to continue the business for a certain time, one partner has no right to have a dissolution except for special cause; 50 Barb. 169; 9 Utah 236. But it is held that a partner can dissolve a partnership formed for a definite period, before the end of that period, but that he is liable in damages for the value of the profits which the other partner would otherwise have received; 10 N. Y. 489; 168 U. S. 337. In general, any circumstance which renders the continuance of the partnership, or the attainment of the end for which it was created, practically impossible, would seem sufficient to warrant a dissolution; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *576; 22 Beav. 471. A sale by one partner of his interest in the firm's property to the others has been held not necessarily to work a dissolution of the firm; 93 Mich. 569; but see 28 Fla. 680; PARTNERSHIP.

Exemption. The right of partners to statutory exemption out of firm property is a disputed point, and depends somewhat on the statutes of the several states. It has been held that they are not so entitled; 77 Cal. 403; 7 Neb. 134; 61 Wis. 335; 26 Ohio St. 317; 44 Pa. 442; contra, 57 Ga. 229; 44 Mich. 86; 37 N. Y. 350. See Thomps. Hom. & Ex. § 197.

Firm name, use of. It has been held that one partner has no right to use the firm name after dissolution; 7 South. 749; 7 Abb. Pr. 202; 7 Phila. 257; the reason given being that such a continued use of the firm name would impair the value of the good-will (q. v.), and might also subject the retired partners to additional liabilities; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *444; 43 Ch. D. 208 (C. A). For cases contra see 3 Swanst. 490; 7 Sim. 421; 28 Beav. 536; 34 id. 566; 121 N. Y. 484; 4 Denio 559. It is said to be the better opinion that the firm name is an asset of the firm; Pars. Partn. § 182, n. Where there is a sale of the business to a partner, the latter does not, without express agreement, acquire a right to the firm name; 43 Ch. D. 208 (C. A.); 88 Mich. 473; but see 10 Ch. D. 436 (C. A.); 37 Conn. 278; even so as to advertise himself as "successor;" id.; but he may advertise that he is "late of" the former firm; id. A continuing partner who has acquired the right to a retiring partner's name, cannot transfer it to a corporation; Bagby, etc., Co. v. Rivers, Ct. of App. Md., 57 Alb. L. J. 261.

Firm property. Each partner has a claim, not to any specific share or interest in the property in specie, as a tenant in common has, but to the proportion of the residue which shall be found to be due to him upon the final settlements of their accounts, after the conversion of the assets and the liquidation of all claims upon the partnership; and therefore each partner has a right to have the same applied to the payment of all such claims, before any one of the partners, or his personal representatives, or his individual creditors, can claim any right or title thereto; Story, Part. § 97; 4 Ves. 396; 6 id. 119; 17 id. 193.

Each partner has also a specific lien on the present and future property of the partnership, the stock brought in, and everything coming in during the continuance and after the determination of the partnership, not only for the payment of debts due to third persons, but also for the amount of his own share of the partnership stock, and for all moneys advanced by him beyond that amount, as also for moneys withdrawn by his co-partners beyond the amount of his share; 3 Kent 65; 8 Dana 278; 10 Gill & J. 253; 20 Vt. 479; 9 Cush. 558; 25 Beav. 280; 52 N. J. Eq. 628. This lien attaches to real estate held for partnership purposes, as well as to the personal estate; 5 Metc. Mass. 562, 577; and is co-extensive with the transactions on joint account; 1 Dana 58; 11 Ala. N. S. 412.

Upon a settlement of a partnership by an account, the assets are divided among the partners in proportion to their contributions; and each partner is liable for a deficit in proportion to his share of the profits; 120 Mass. 324.

Fraud. A partner has an equity to rescind the partnership and be indemnified for his co-partner's fraud in inducing him to enter the business; 126 Mass. 304; 3 De G. & J. 304; 1 Giff. 355. Where the partnership suffers from the fraud or wanton misconduct of any partner in transacting firm business, he will be responsible to his co-partners for it; Story, Part. § 169. See supra.

Interest. As a general rule partners are not entitled to interest on their respective contributions to capital unless by special agreement, or unless it has been the custom of the firm to have such interest charged in its accounts ; 3 De G. J. & S. 1 ; 6 Beav. 433 ; 89 Pa. 139 ; 119 Mass. 38 ; 20 Ala. 747 ; 92 Ill. 92. See 52 Minn. 342 ; 56 Mich. 276. But a partner is entitled to interest on advances made by him to the firm ; 6 Mad. 145 ; 129 Mass. 517 ; 35 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 60 ; 14 N. J. Eq. 44 ; 17 Vt. 242 ; 79 N. Y. 366 ; and no express agreement is necessary ; 1 McCart. Ch. 44. See, however, 8 Dana 214 ; 24 Conn. 185. But it is held that interest will not be allowed on advances and profits not drawn out ; 25 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 728. Where profits are left in the business, a partner is not entitled to interest thereon ; L. R. 5 Ch. 519 ; 89 Pa. 139 ; 53 Mich. 421 ; a partner who has not paid in his contribution to capital will be charged with interest ; 42 Kan. 247 ; 109 Ill. 94 ; a partner will not be charged with interest on overdrafts ; 72 Ga. 154. A partner has been held entitled to interest on a sum contributed to capital in excess of the agreed share ; 17 Ala. 32.

Liquidating partner. It is the duty of those upon whom, by appointment or otherwise, it devolves, after the dissolution of a firm, to wind up the affairs of the partnership, to act for the best advantage of the concern, to make no inconsistent use of the property, and to seek no private advantage in the composition of debts or in any other transaction in the performance of this business ; 1 Swanst. 507 ; 2 id. 627 ; 11 Ill. 392 ; 54 Kan. 793. Nor, in this case, can any partner claim any commission for getting in the debts, or, in any other particular, reward or compensation for his trouble ; id. ; 14 Misc. Rep. 18 ; 99 U. S. 355 ; 1 Knapp, P. C. 312 ; 3 Kent 64, note ; Story, Part. § 331 ; 17 Pick. 519 ; 4 Gratt. 138 ; but in 16 Vt. 613, a partner who performed services in settling up the affairs of a firm after dissolution was allowed compensation for them, and where one partner contributed all the capital and exercised complete management of the business, he was allowed compensation ; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 921 ; and where there is a great difference between the services of the partners, there may be compensation ; 19 Pa. 516 ; see 124 Mass. 305 ; it is held that no compensation will be allowed for an excess of services without a special agreement : 57 Ill. App. 20. But it is held that a partner will be allowed compensation for extra and outside services in winding up ; 118 Mass. 236. See Compensation, supra.

Litigation. A partner may recover the costs of carrying on litigation for the firm —but not compensation for conducting it, unless by express agreement ; 2 Stew. N. J. 504.

Profits and losses, how distributed. As between the partners, they may by agreement stipulate for equal or unequal shares in the profit and loss of the partnership ; 132 U. S. 539 ; Story, Part. § 23 ; but in the absence of any express agreement or stipulation between them, and of all controlling evidence and circumstances, the presumption has been held to be that they are interested in equal shares ; 183 Pa. 186 ; 6 Wend. 263 ; 9 Ala. N. S. 372 ; 2 Murph. 70 ; 5 Dana 211 ; 1 Ired. Eq. 332 ; 1 J. J. Marsh. 506 ; 20 Beav. 98 ; 54 Fed. Rep. 237 ; 132 U. S. 539 ; 70 Md. 523. And the circumstance that each partner has brought an unequal amount of capital into the common stock, or that one or more have brought in the whole capital and the others have only brought industry, skill, and experience, would not seem to furnish any substantial ground of difference as to the distribution ; Story, Part. § 24 ; 3 Kent 28, 29 ; 21 Me. 117.

It has sometimes been asserted, however, that it is a matter of fact, to be settled according to all the circumstances, what would be a reasonable apportionment, uncontrolled by any natural presumption of equality in the distribution ; Story, Partn. § 24 ; 2 Camp. 45. The opinion in England seems divided ; but in America the authorities seem decidedly to favor the doctrine of a presumed equality of interest. See American cases cited above ; Story, Part. § 24. "The better view is that although all or a large part of the capital is furnished by one partner, the entire loss is to be borne by all. Hence, after payment of the debts, the contributions of partners to capital are all to be repaid before there can be any division of profits (L. R. 7 Eq. 538 ; 119 Mass. 38 ; 113 N. Y. 39). And if the assets are not sufficient, after paying the debts, to repay the capital, the deficit must be shared by all the partners ; and the partner who has contributed more than his share of capital is therefore entitled to contribution from the rest (37 Fed. Rep. 294 ; 124 Pa. 498)." Pars. Part., Beale's ed. § 173.

Receiver, appointment of. To authorize a partner to demand the appointment of a receiver of a subsisting partnership, he must show such a case of gross abuse and misconduct on the part of his co-partner, that a dissolution ought to be decreed and the business wound up ; Story, Part. §§ 228, 231 ; 2 Mer. 405 ; 8 C. E. Green 208, 388. Where it appears that the surviving members of a firm are conducting the business for the purpose of enlarging and continuing it, and not to close it up, a receiver may be appointed for that purpose, on application of the legal representatives of the deceased member ; 20 N. Y. S. 65. After dissolution a court of equity will appoint a receiver almost as a matter of course ; Lind. Part. *1008 ; 1 Ch. Div. 600 ; 65 N. C. 162 ; 2 C. E. Green 343 ; 20 Md. 30. But see 18 Ves. 281 ; and [1892] Ch. 633, where it was held that the mere fact of dissolution of a partnership does not give one partner an absolute right, as against his co-partners, to have a receiver appointed of the partnership business.

Set-off. It may be stated as a general rule in law and equity that there can be no set-off of joint debts against separate debts unless under a special agreement ; Story, Part. § 396. Thus, a debt due by one of the members of a firm cannot be set off against a debt due the firm ; 2 C. B. 821 ; 16 R. I. 288 ; 2 Bay 146 ; 4 Wend. 583 ; 88 Ala. 356 ; unless the partners assent; 89 Pa. 392. Nor can a debt owing to a partner be set off against a debt due by the firm; 119 Ill. 407; 6 C. & P. 60; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *269; 1 South. 220; but see 67 Miss. 60. But otherwise where the partnership's debt is reduced to judgment; Pars., Part., Beale's ed. § 262; 69 Wis. 410.

Torts. If the partnership suffers loss from the gross negligence, unskilfulness, fraud, or other wanton misconduct of a partner in the partnership business, or from a known deviation from the partnership articles, he must bear the loss; 6 W. & S. 529; 1 Sim. 89; Pothier, Part. n. 133; 3 Kent 52, note; Story, Part. § 173. But not if it be the result of an honest mistake in judgment, not caused by gross negligence or ignorance; 1 McCart. 44; 76 Ia. 288.

PARTNERSHIP. A relation founded upon a contract between two or more persons to do business as individuals on joint, undivided account.

A contract of two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor, and skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, and to divide the profit and bear the loss in certain proportions. 3 Kent 23; 94 Ala. 116.

This definition was criticised by Jessel, M. R., in 5 Ch. D. 472, on the ground that there may be partners who do not contribute any property, labor, or skill, as where a share is given to the widow of a former partner. Pollock (Partnership 3) considers it the most businesslike and substantially accurate definition, and one which might be accepted, with more or less verbal condensation and amendment.

A voluntary contract between two or more persons for joining together their money, goods, labor, and skill, or any or all of them, in some lawful commerce or business, under an understanding, express, or implied from the nature of the enterprise, that there shall be a communion of profit and loss between them, will constitute a partnership. Colly. Part. § 2; 10 Me. 489; 3 Harr. N. J. 485; 5 Ark. 278.

A legal entity formed by the association of two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on business together and dividing its profits between them. Parsons, Part., Beale's ed. § 1. See 5 Ch. D. 458.

The relation which subsists between persons who have agreed to share the profits of a business carried on by all or any of them on behalf of all of them. Colly. Part., 5th ed. 4.

Sir F. Pollock says: "The nearest approach to a definition which has been given by judicial authority in England is the statement that 'to constitute a partnership the parties must have agreed to carry on business and to share profits in some way in common;'" but he adds that this principle "excludes several kinds of transactions which, at first sight, have some appearance of partnership." Poll. Part. 4.

A contract of partnership is one by which two or more persons agree to carry on a business for their own benefit, each contributing property or services and having a community of interest in the profits. It is, in effect, a contract of mutual agency, each partner acting as a principal in his own behalf and as agent for his co-partner. Gray, J., in 168 U. S. 334.

An agreement that something shall be attempted with a view to gain, and that the gain shall be shared by the parties to the agreement, is the grand characteristic of every partnership, and is the leading feature in every definition of the term. Ewell's Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *2, where many definitions are collected.

The relation which subsists between persons carrying on a business in common with a view of profit. English Partnership Act, 1890.

It has been said that "the various definitions have been approximate rather than exhaustive;" 145 U. S. 611.

Partnership, though often called a contract, is in truth the result of a contract; the relation which subsists between persons who have so agreed that the profits of a business inure to them as co-owners. George, Part. 30.

That a partnership is an entity, distinct from the partners, is the view of the business world everywhere. And such is the state of the law where the civil law is in force. In our law, the partnership has not been clearly recognized as an entity. In an action at law, at least, the partners alone are recognized as parties in interest, yet even at law certain doctrines are explained only by recognizing the firm as an entity. The courts of equity show more recognition of the true character of a partnership; but even in equity this has not been made clear until recently. There is now, however, a strong disposition on the part of the courts to recognize the mercantile doctrine. Pars. Part., Beale's ed. 2.

"The firm is the contracting party, not the individuals composing the firm; the credit is given to the firm; the partnership, the ideal person, formed by the union of interest, is the legal debtor. A partnership is considered in law as an artificial person, or being, distinct from the individuals composing it." 2 Green. L. 410.

"Everybody knows that partnership is a sort of agency, but a very peculiar one. You cannot grasp the notion of agency, properly speaking, unless you grasp the notion of the existence of the firm as a separate entity from the existence of the partners; a notion which was well grasped by the old Roman lawyers, and which was partly understood in the courts of equity before it was part of the whole law of the land, as it is now. But when you get that idea clearly, you will see at once what sort of agency it is. It is the one person acting on behalf of the firm." 5 Ch. D. 476, per Jessel, M. R.

"When one joins a partnership, he makes himself a part of an entity already existing, which has acquired certain property and business, and in acquiring it has incurred certain indebtedness. The firm owns the property, holds the business, and owes the debts." 17 Kan. 340, per Brewer, J.

A partnership is a distinct entity, having its own property, debts, and credits; for the purpose for which it was created, it is a person, and as such is recognized by the law. 22 Neb. 744. See 82 Ga. 129.

"The partnership for most legal purposes is a distinct entity." 39 Mich. 784, per Cooley, J.

"A partnership, or joint stock company, is just as distinct and palpable an entity in the idea of the law, as distinguished from the individuals composing it, as is a corporation. . . . The obligation and the liability, inter partes, are the same in the one case as the other. The only practical difference is a technical one, having reference to the forum and form of remedy." 50 Vt. 676.

There are statutes in some states providing that a partnership may sue and be sued by its name.

The relation between the partners and the firm is that of agent to principal; and the firm property, the legal title to which is held by the partners, is in trust for the firm. Each partner, in doing an act which is within the scope of his agency, is acting therefor for the firm, and not for himself nor for his co-partners. Pars. Part., Beale's ed. 4.

The law of partnership, as administered in England and in the United States, rests on foundations derived from three sources, —the common law, the law merchant, and the Roman law; Colly. Part. § 1.

Partnership in the Roman law (societas) included every associated interest in property which resulted from contract; e. g. where two bought a farm together. Every other associated interest was styled communitas, e. g. where a legacy was left to two; Pothier, Droit Franc. III. 444; Ewell's Lind. Part. *58, note 2; 11 La. Ann. 277.

Partnership at the common law is an active notion. The relation implies a business and a turning of capital. It is to be contrasted with ownership, which is, whatever the tenancy, a passive notion; 1 Johns. 106; 54 Cal. 429. But there may be at the common law a joint purchase and an individual liability for the whole price without a partnership. In a purchase expressly by two the contract is prima facie joint with a consequent liability of each for the whole price. But this inference may be contradicted by circumstances known to the seller which indicate a division of title: 1 Wms. Saund. 291 c; 4 Cow. 168, 282; 27 Ia. 131; 9 Johns. 475; 15 Me. 17.

Partnership, in the Roman law, was in buying or selling. True partnership, at common law, is only in buying and selling. This peculiarity of the common law is due to the commercial origin of the relation and of the rules by which the relation is governed. The Roman societas was an outgrowth of the ancient tribal constitution. The common-law partnership is an expedient of trade; 15 Wend. 187; 42 Ala. 179; 41 Me. 9; 1 Pa. 140; Camp. 793; 1 Johns. 106. Buying to sell again fixes the transaction as a joint one. The transaction is joint because the sale excludes the idea of division of title in the purchase. The property dealt in becomes the instrument of both parties in obtaining a totally distinct subject of distribution, i. e. the profit; 14 Wend. 187; 3 Kent *25. There must be an agreement, not a mere intention, to sell jointly; 47 N. Y. 199.

In a partnership, the members do business in their unqualified capacity as men, without special privilege or exemption; they are treated in law as a number of individuals, occupying no different relation to the rest of the world than if each were acting singly; 7 Ves. 773. On the other hand, a corporation, though in fact but an association of individuals with special privileges and exemptions, is in contemplation of law a fictitious person distinct from the members who compose it; Ewell's Lind. Part. *4. Every unincorporated association for purposes of gain is a partnership; unless it can claim corporate privilege on the ground of a de facto standing; 27 Ind. 399; 66 N. Y. 425; 7 Pa. 165; 65 Ill. 532. A club or association not for gain is not a partnership: it is not a commercial relation; 6 Mo. App. 465: 22 Ohio St. 159; 97 Pa. 498; 2 M. & W. 172. In this country there is a far wider extent in the variety of purposes for which partnerships are established than anywhere else; Pars. Part. § 37; including farming, manufacturing, mining, lumbering, the business of lawyers, physicians, etc.; id.

Whether a partnership exists or not in a particular case is not a mere question of fact, but one mixed of law and fact; 111 U. S. 529. It is, nevertheless, generally to be decided by a jury. See 3 Harr. N. J. 358; 1 N. & M'C. 20; 1 Cai. 184; 2 Fla. 541; 8 C. B. N. S. 562, 563: 42 Ala. 179; 61 Mich. 216. If the facts are admitted or the evidence consists of a written instrument, it is for the court to say whether a partnership exists; 58 Conn. 413; 13 R. I. 27.

Elements of partnership. The elements of partnership are the contribution and a sharing in the profits. These two elements must be combined. Without contribution the alleged partner cannot be said to do business; unless he shares the profits, the business is not carried on for his account. Contribution without a share in the profits is a simple gift to the firm, by which firm creditors are enriched, not damaged. Sharing profits without contribution is a gift by the firm to the beneficiary, with which creditors may of course interfere by seizing the property and closing out the concern. In neither case does the alleged partner enter into business relations with the customers and creditors of the firm; 8 H. L. Cas. 286; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 8 Hun 189; L. R. 7 Exch. 218.

Contribution need not be made to the firm stock; any co-operation in the business will be enough; 4 East 144; 16 Johns.

34; Story, Partn. §§ 27, 40. A contribution must be kept in the concern, and take the risk of the business; a loan, on the other hand, is made upon the personal credit of the partners merely, and may be used by them as they please; it is to be repaid at all events. Because of this difference, sharing profits in lieu of interest upon a loan does not create a partnership. The English statute to this effect has been decided to be merely declaratory; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 7 Ch. Div. 511; 62 N. Y. 508; 6 Pick. 372. Mere loaning of money to a partnership for a definite period, the creditor to receive interest in proportion to the profits, does not make the lender liable as a partner; 145 U. S. 611. It is not necessary, however, that each partner should bring into the concern both labor and property; Parsons, Partn. Beale's ed. § 63. The contribution of money or property by an incoming partner is not essential to the creation of a partnership; it is competent for the prior partners, in consideration of the new partner undertaking the entire charge and control of the business of the company, to give him an interest as partner in the property which is to constitute, at the outset, the whole capital of the partnership; 132 U. S. 539.

It was formerly held that sharing profits constituted the parties partners, though no such relationship was intended between them; 2 W. Bla. 998; 2 H. Bla. 235; 1 Story 371; 58 N. Y. 272; but not sharing gross profits; 1 Camp. 329. Again, it is called prima facie evidence of partnership, but a contribution will have the same effect. Each is an element in a relation not complete without both.

It has been held that a partnership subsists between merchants who divide the commissions received by each other on the sale of goods recommended or "influenced" by the one to the other; 4 B. & Ald. 663. See 95 Ky. 387. So between persons who agree to share the profits of a single adventure; 9 C. B. 431; 1 Rose 297; and between persons one of whom is in the position of a servant to the others, but is paid a share of the profits instead of a salary: 1 Deac. 341; 1 Rose 92; (contra, 182 Pa. 624); and between persons one of whom is paid an annuity out of the profits made by the others; 17 Ves. 412; 8 Bingh. 469; or an annuity in lieu of any share in those profits; 2 W. Bla. 999. So between the vendor and purchaser of a business, if the former guarantee a clear profit of so much a year, and was to have all profits beyond the amount guaranteed; 3 C. B. 641. The character in which a portion of the profits was received did not affect the result; see 1 Maule & S. 412; 21 Beav. 164. Persons who share profits were quasi-partners, although their community of interest was confined to the profits; 2 B. & C. 401. But it is held that a contract for the sale of goods, which provides that they shall be charged for at reasonable prices, and that the purchaser shall have a credit of one-half the profits, does not establish a partnership between the seller and purchaser; 16 Colo. 447.

An agreement to share losses is not essential; that follows as an incident to the relation. Indeed all liability inter se may be provided against by contract and a partnership may nevertheless subsist; 3 M. & W. 357; 3 C. B. 32, 39; Ewell's Lind. Part. *22; 7 Ala. 761; 5 La. An. 44. Partnership is a question of intention, and the intention which makes a partnership is ordinarily to contribute to the business and share the profits. In this way, the parties become co-principals in a business carried on for their account. The question of intention is to be decided by a consideration of the whole agreement into which the parties have entered, and ought not to be made to turn upon a consideration of only a part of its provisions; 15 M. & W. 292; 3 Kent 27; Ewell's Lind. Part. *10.

An agreement to share profits, nothing being said about the losses, amounts prima facie to an agreement to share losses also; so that an agreement to share profits is prima facie an agreement for a partnership; and, accordingly, it is held that, unless an agreement to the contrary is shown, persons engaged in any business or adventure, and sharing the profits derived from it, are partners as regards that business or adventure. It is strong presumptive evidence of partnership; 37 Conn. 250. Still, it cannot be said that persons who share profits are necessarily partners in the proper sense of the word; Ewell's Lind. Part *7, *12; 28 Ohio St. 319; 54 Mo. 325; 5 Gray 59, 60; 12 Conn. 69; 12 N. H. 185; 15 Me. 294; 8 H. L. Cas. 268; see 18 Johns. 34; 18 Wend. 175; 6 Conn. 347; 132 U. S. 539; unless the business is carried on by them personally or by their agents; 8 H. L. Cas. 268. Although a presumption of partnership would seem to arise in such a case; Colly. Part. § 85; 101 Cal. 500; 127 Pa. 442; still, the particular circumstances of the case may be such as to repel this presumption. It may appear that the share of the profits taken was merely a compensation to one party for labor and service, or for furnishing the raw materials, or a mill privilege, or a factory, or the like, from which the other is to earn profits; 5 Gray 60; 3 Kent 33; 6 Halst. 181; 2 McCord 421; but see 38 N. H. 289. Originally it was immaterial whether the profits were shared as gross or net; but the later cases have established a distinction. A division of gross returns is thought to be identical with a purchase for the purpose of division; the price represents the thing. There is no unity of interest; 1 Camp. 329; 3 Kent *25; 4 Maule & S. 240; 5 N. Y. 186. But the distinction is not absolutely decisive on the question of partnership. See 1 Camp. 330; 6 Vt. 119; 6 Pick. 335; 4 Me. 264; 12 Conn. 69; 38 N. H. 287, 304; 4 B. & Ald. 663. The officers and crews of whaling and other fishing vessels, who are to receive certain proportions of the produce of the voyage in lieu of wages; 4 Esp. 182; 17 Mass. 206; 2 Y. & C. 61; captains of merchant-ships who, instead of wages, receive shares in the profits of the adventure; 4 Maule & S. 240; or who take vessels under an agreement to pay certain charges and receive a share of the earnings; 16 Mass. 336; 7 Me. 261; persons making shipments on half-profits; 14 Pick. 195; have generally been held not to be partners with the owners, and the like. Running a steamboat on shares does not make the owners partners in respect of the vessel; 35 Fed. Rep. 785; so of an agreement between two parties to farm on shares; 42 Ga. 226; 67 Mo. 170; 30 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 637; and a purchase of land on joint account for the purpose of sale and profit; 142 U. S. 682; and a hotel lease where the rental depends in part on the profit of the hotel; 28 N. Y. Supp. 134; or running a saw mill where one erects it and another furnishes logs and they divide profits; 58 Ala. 618. But a partnership can be created in a single business transaction, as upon the sale of horses, sharing the profits and loss; 2 Super. Ct. Pa. 104; or in the purchase and sale of lands; 149 U. S. 248. A seamen who is to receive pay in proportion to the amount of fish caught, is not a partner; 68 Me. 241. Sharing profits in lieu of wages is not a partnership. There is no true contribution; 182 Pa. 624; 69 Ill. 237; 118 Mass. 443; 34 Md. 49; 29 N. J. L. 270; 14 Cal. 73; 43 Mo. 538; 44 Ga. 228; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 444; 41 Kan. 503; 112 N. Y. 419. Where a person enters into a contract with another by which the latter is to receive a certain salary and a percentage of the profits, while the former is to own the entire capital, no partnership exists; 104 Mo. 425; nor where one receives a share of the profits by way of compensation; 76 N. Y. 55; 4 Nev. 420. A factor, simple or del credere, may receive a portion of the profits in lieu of commissions, without becoming a partner; 62 Pa. 374; 24 L. J. Ch. 58. A mere participation in profits and losses of a business does not necessarily constitute a partnership; 89 Mo. 192.

Where a business is assigned to trustees who are to manage it and pay creditors out of the profits, the creditors are not partners; the distribution of so-called profit is really the payment of a debt; 8 H. L. C. 268; but creditors who set up their insolvent debtor in business and share the profits with him, forbearing meanwhile to press their claims, have been held to be partners; 8 Hun 189.

The case of Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. C. 268. which held that persons who share profits do not thereby incur the liability of partners, is said to have put an end to two doctrines formerly held to be fundamental: that persons may be held to the liability of partners who are not partners in fact, merely because some other relation exists between them; and that profit-sharing is conclusive of the existence of a partnership; Pars. Part. § 43. The true question of partnership is said in L. R. 1 C. P. 86, to be as stated by Lord Cranworth in 8 H. L. C. 268: "Whether the trade is carried on, on behalf of the person sought to be charged as a partner, the participation in the profits being a most important element in determining that question, but not being in itself decisive; the test being whether it is such a participation of profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the person taking the profits and those actually carrying on the business."

The doctrine of Cox v. Hickman has been generally followed in this country; 145 U. S. 611; George, Partn. 43, where cases in nearly all the states are collected; but in Pennsylvania the rule in Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bla. 235, supra, has been held to be firmly established, though overruled in England; 62 Pa. 374. There is a distinction in Pennsylvania between participation in profits as such and a compensation or consideration merely measured by a proportion of profits; while this distinction is of a very refined and shadowy character, it is said to be too late to question the rule or the exception; 62 Pa. 374; 176 Pa. 361. In New York, Cox v. Hickman was considered, but not followed, in 58 N. Y. 272; and in 115 N. Y. 625, the rule in Waugh v. Carver was held to be still in force in that state. The rule was fully discussed in 53 N. H. 276 and 45 Mich. 188. The result of the English doctrine is said to be that there can be no partnership between parties unless by contract among themselves, but parties may be charged as partners by way of estoppel. It is the present law of England that no person who does not hold himself out as a partner is liable to third persons for the acts of persons whose profits he shares, unless he and they are really partners inter se; 1 Lind. Part. *42; L. R. 1 C. P. 86.

Mutual agency as a final test of partnership has been approved in some cases; 53 N. H. 276; 64 L. J. Q. B. 170; and rejected in others; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 145 U. S. 611.

The ultimate test is said to be the coownership of the profits, which the owner receives as owner and not by way of compensation for something, such as services, etc.; George, Partn. 50. To constitute partnership each person must have an interest in the profits as a principal in the joint business: 54 Mo. 325.

A distinction is made between a share in the profits and a commission equal to a certain per cent. on the profits. In the latter case there is no partnership, because no sharing in the profits as such. The rule is based upon authority, but is acknowledged to have no foundation in common sense. It is said to be an attempt to escape from the rigidity of the proposition that a share in the profits must in all cases make a man a partner; L. R. 4 P. C. App. 419; 62 Pa. 374; 18 Ves. 300; 12 Conn. 69; 6 Metc. 82.

In other cases, it is held that in order to render a man liable as partner he must have a specific interest in the profits as a principal trader; 1 Den. 337; 15 Conn. 73;

10 Metc. 303; 28 Ohio St. 319. But in reference to these positions the questions arise: When may a party be said to have a specific interest in the profits, as profits? when, as a principal trader?—questions in themselves very nice, and difficult to determine. See 6 Metc. 82; 12 Conn. 77.

Sometimes the partnership relation has been made dependent on the power to control the business. In strictness the only control necessary is the power to control the application of the contribution. A partner may have no power, as between him and his partners, to manage the business; 4 Sandf. 311.

Again, partnership has been said to require that a partner have an initiative in the conduct of the business; but the proposition seems to lose sight of dormant partners; L. R. 4 P. C. 419.

Again, partnership has been made to depend on what is termed the legal title to the business: A was held not a partner, though he shared in the profits of a business created solely by his contribution but assigned to B for A's protection; L. R. 1 C. P. 86. There are other cases in which considerable stress is laid on the right to an account of profits, as furnishing a rule of liability; 3 Kent 25; 18 Wend. 184; 3 C. B. N. S. 544, 561. But, although it is true that every partner must have a right to an account, it seems not to be equally true that every party who has a right to an account is a partner; 5 Gray 58.

Partnership has sometimes been styled a branch of the law and relation of principal and agent. But mutual agency is not the basis, it is the incident of partnership. Partners are co-principals, and the right and power of representation springs from this circumstance. A dormant partner is not at all the agent of the firm; L. R. 7 Ex. 227. The principal distinction between a partnership and a mere agency is that a partner has a community of interest with the other partners in the business and responsibilities of the partnership,—sometimes both in the stock and profits, and sometimes only in the profits,—whereas an agent, as such, has no interest in either; 4 B. & C. 67. The authority of a partner is very much more extensive than that of a mere agent; 10 N. H. 16. See PARTNERS. The reference to agency as a test of partnership is unfortunate and inconclusive, inasmuch as agency results from partnership, rather than partnership from agency; 145 U. S. 611.

The formation of a contract of partnership does not require any particular formality. It is, in general, sufficient that it is formed by the voluntary consent of the parties, whether that be express or implied, whether it be by written articles, tacit approbation, or by parol contract, or even by mere acts; 3 Kent 27; Daveis 320; 4 Conn. 568; Pars. Part. § 627. As a general rule a writing is unnecessary; 2 Barb. Ch. 336; Ewell's Lind. Part. *80. Under the statute of frauds, where there is an agreement that a partnership shall commence at some time more than a year from the making of the agreement, a writing is necessary; 5 B. & C. 108. As to partnership in lands, see infra.

Where there is no written agreement, the evidence generally relied upon to prove a partnership is the conduct of the parties, the mode in which they have dealt with each other, and the mode in which each has, with the knowledge of the others, dealt with other persons. This can be shown by the books of account, by the testimony of clerks, agents, and other persons, by letters and admissions, and, in short, by any of the modes by which facts can be established. As to the presumption arising from the joint retainer of solicitors, see 20 Beav. 98; 7 Hare 159. For cases in which partnership has been inferred from various circumstances, see 4 Russ. 247; 2 Camp. 45. Though formed by deed, partnership may be dissolved by parol; Ewell's Lind. Part. *572. See ARTICLES OF PARTNERSHIP.

A contract for the creation of a partnership is enforcible at law; 3 Super. Ct. Pa. 527. The practical construction of partnership articles given for several years by the partners to its language will usually be accepted by the courts as conclusive; 152 Mass. 316.

Kinds. The Roman law recognized five sorts of partnership. First: societas universorum bonorum, a community of goods: probably a survival of the old tribal relation. Second: societas universorum quæ ex quæstu veniunt, or partnership in everything which comes from gain,—the usual form; Pothier, Part. nn. 29, 43. Such contracts are said to be within the scope of the common law; but they are of very rare existence; Story, Part. § 72; 5 Mas. 183. Third: societas vectigalium, a partnership in the collection of taxes. It was not dissolved by the death of a member; and if it was so agreed in the beginning, the heir immediately succeeded to the place of the ancestor. Fourth: societas negotiationis alicujus, i. e. in a given business venture. Fifth: societas certarum rerum vel unius rei, i. e. in the acquisition or sale of one or more specific things; Pothier, Part. *24.

In the French law there are four principal classes of partnership; First: en nom collectif, the ordinary general partnership. Second: en commandite, an association corresponding to our limited partnership, composed of general and special partners in which the liability of the latter is limited to the fund invested by them. Third: anonyme, a joint stock company with limited liability. Fourth: en participation, simply a partnership with a dormant partner: Merlin, Rèpert. de Jur. tit. Societé; Mackenzie, Rom. Law 217; Pothier, Part. *39. See Goiraud, Code, etc.

In the common law all partnership is for gain. General partnership is for a general line of business; 3 Kent *25; Cowp. 814. But where the parties are engaged in one branch of trade or business only, they would be usually spoken of as engaged in a general partnership; Story, Part. § 74.

Special or particular partnership is one confined to a particular transaction. The extent or scope of the agreement is different in the two cases, but the character of the relation is the same. A partnership may exist in a single transaction as well as in a series; Daveis 323; 2 Ga. 18; 3 C. B. 641; 49 Pa. 83. Special or limited partnership differs from the ordinary relation. It is composed of general partners to whom all the ordinary rules of partnership apply, and of limited partners with circumscribed power and liability limited to the amount of their contribution. The privilege is imparted by charter in England. In America it exists by statute; and unless the provisions of the act are strictly complied with, the association will be treated as a general partnership; 3 Kent *35; 62 N. Y. 513; 91 Ill. 96; 127 Pa. 161, 255; 151 id. 79; 35 Ill. App. 336. The special exemption of a limited partner will be recognized in other jurisdictions than the one in which the association is formed, though the firm has made the contract in the foreign jurisdiction; 69 N. Y. 24.

Another sort of association is styled limited partnership (q. v.). It is of recent, statutory origin and strongly resembles a corporation. The members incur no liability beyond the amount of their subscription; unless they violate in some manner the requirements of the statute under which they organize. It is a general requirement, that the word "limited" be in all cases added to the firm name. Limited partnerships in Pennsylvania, which can be sued in the partnership name, are nevertheless not corporations entitled to sue as artificial citizens of the states, within the constitution and laws of the United States; 38 Fed. Rep. 574.

There is still another class of partnerships, called joint-stock companies (q. v.).

Sub-partnerships. The delectus personæ, q. v., which is inherent in the nature of partnership (excepting mining partnerships; see 102 U. S. 641; 28 Cal. 569; and joint-stock companies, and certain partnership associations in Massachusetts; see 137 Mass. 510; 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 502) precludes the introduction of a stranger into the firm without the concurrence of all the partners; 7 Pick. 235; 11 Me. 488; 1 Hill, N. Y. 234; 8 W. & S. 63; 16 Ohio 166; 2 Rose 254; Pars. Part. § 106. Yet no partner is precluded from entering into a sub-partnership with a stranger: nam socii mei socius meus socius non est. In such case the stranger may share the profits of the particular partner with whom he contracts; and although it has been decided that it is not true as a general proposition that such stranger will not be liable for the debts of the general partnership; 13 Gray 468; still, it is quite evident that a mere participation in profits renders one responsible only for the debts and liabilities of those with whom he participates; and, inasmuch as such stranger shares the profits only of and with one of the partners, he can be held only as the partner of that partner; he cannot be held as a partner in the general partnership, because he does not share or participate with the other persons who compose it. See 2 Rose 255; 3 Kent 52; 1 B. & P. 546; 19 Ind. 113; 3 Ired. Eq. 226; 114 Ill. 574. Besides, a subpartner does not receive a certain share of the whole profits of the firm, but only a part of a share thereof; and he does not receive this part of a share, nor is he entitled to interfere with it at all, to say whether it shall be more or less in amount, until it has actually been set out and the time has come for a division between himself and the partner with whom he contracted. He does not draw out of the general concern any of its profits; he only draws from the profits of one who has previously drawn them from the general partnership. See 6 Madd. 5; 4 Russ. 285. If this stranger has caused damage to the partnership by his default, the party who has taken him into the partnership will be liable to the other partners the same as if he had done the damage himself; Pothier, Part. n. 93.

Any number of partners less than the whole may form an independent co-partnership, which, though not strictly a subpartnership, is entitled to a separate standing in equity. In case of insolvency the subordinate co-partnership is treated as a distinct concern, and the assets are marshalled accordingly. Consequently, although the creditors of the smaller firm are strictly separate creditors when compared with the creditors of the larger firm; yet debts owing by one firm to the other are collected on insolvency for the benefit of the creditors of the creditor firm; 1 B. & P. 539; 1 Cox 140. See 176 Pa. 354. Indeed, one partner may have this independent standing if the trade is distinct; Lind. Part. 2d Am. ed. *725. But the debts must arise in the ordinary course of trade; Lind. Part. 2d Am. ed. *527.

Quasi-partnership. This is simply the case of a man who without being actually a partner, holds himself out or suffers himself to be held out as such; he is estopped to deny his liability as a partner; Pars. Part. § 93; 27 N. H. 252; 2 Campb. 802; 2 McLean 347; 17 Vt. 449; 6 Ad. & E. 469; 122 U. S. 583. This rule of law rests, not upon the ground of the real transaction between the partners, but upon principles of general policy, to prevent the frauds to which creditors would be liable if they lent their money upon the apparent credit of three or four persons, when in fact they lent it only to two of them, to whom, without others they would not have been willing to lend anything; 3 Kent 32; 6 S. & R. 259, 333; 16 Johns. 40; 2 Des. 148: 2 N. & M'C. 427; 39 Minn. 404; 70 Md. 205.

The term "holding one's self out as partner" imports, at least, the voluntary act of the party holding himself out; 3 Conn. 324; 2 Camp. 617; but no particular mode of holding himself out is requisite to charge a party. It occurs most frequently where a partner retires from a firm and his retirement is not made known. It may be express and either by direct assertion or by authority to a partner to use the party's name. It may result from negligence, as a failure to forbid the use of one's name by the firm; 2 Zab. 372; 61 N. Y. 456; 41 Pa. 30; 64 Ind. 545; 53 Ga. 98; 30 Md. 1; 32 Ark. 733. It must appear that the "holding out" was done by him or by his consent; 51 N. J. L. 103.

Holding out is a question of fact; 10 Ind. 475; 47 Mo. App. 31; 70 Md. 205. The usual evidence to charge a party in such cases is that he has suffered the use of his name over the shop-door, etc., or that he has done other acts, or suffered his agents to do acts; 37 N. H. 9; no matter of what kind, sufficient to induce others to believe him to be a partner; 3 McLean 364, 549; 3 Camp. 310; 20 N. H. 453; 39 Me. 157; 55 Ga. 116; 139 Mass. 275; 43 La. Ann. 258. A person is not relieved from liability though he was induced by the fraud of others to hold himself out as a partner with them. See 5 Bingh. 521; 1 Rose 69. The holding out must have been before the contract with the third person was entered into, and must have been the inducement to it; 7 B. & C. 409; 8 Ala. 560; 67 Ill. 161; 37 Me. 252; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 351. A third party will be held liable as a partner only to one who knew of the holding out at the time he acted and who acted in reliance upon it; 1 B. & Ald. 11; 111 U. S. 529; 82 Ala. 322; 130 Mass. 476; 81 N. Y. 550. The cases contra in 61 N. Y. 456 and 2 H. Bla. 242, cannot be considered as good law; Pars. Partn. Beale's ed. § 93. If the plaintiff knew at the time he made the contract that the party he seeks to charge was not a partner, he cannot hold him as such; 50 Fed. Rep. 684; or if the plaintiff had notice of any kind; 85 Ala. 19; 1 Camp. 404; and a representation made after the contract was entered into will not charge the defendant; 1 C. M. & R. 415. The doctrine is based upon estoppel. But it has been held that even where there was no evidence that the plaintiff was misled, the reputed partner will be held liable; 26 Kan. 221.

A person who is not actually a partner cannot, by reason of having held himself out to the world as a partner, be held liable on a contract made by the partnership with one who had no knowledge that he was so held out; 111 U. S. 529.

Where the new firm had the same name as the old, one who sold goods to the former may recover of the members of the old firm, though notice of dissolution was published in a newspaper, and though the old firm, owed him nothing at the dissolution, and though he did not know the names of the members of the old firm; 143 Mass. 479.

A person does not become liable as partner because he represents that he is willing or intends to become one; 9 B. & C. 632; 15 M. & W. 517.

Where persons hold themselves out as a corporation, without having even a de facto corporate existence, persons dealing with them, if not estopped to deny their corporate existence, may hold them liable as partners; Clark, Corp. 108; 76 Mich. 579; 108 Pa. 569; 64 Fed. Rep. 90. Other cases hold that the remedy is against the agent who professed to act for a non-existent corporation; 1 Thomps. Corp. § 418; 7 Cush. 188. Where there is a de facto corporation, the members cannot be held as partners; 91 Ala. 224; 80 Tex. 344; 48 N. J. L. 599; 69 Ga. 159. If the organization is defective and the parties act in good faith, they are not liable as partners; 22 Fed. Rep. 197; 80 Tex. 344; 48 N. J. L. 599; contra, 72 Mo. 446; 29 Mich. 369; 56 Ia. 104; 43 N. H. 636. Text writers differ widely. That stockholders in a defective or illegal corporation are liable as partners, see Cook, Stockh. § 233; Beach, Priv. Corp. § 162; Spell. Priv. Corp. § 838; contra, whether the corporation is de facto or not; Moraw. Priv. Corp. § 748; Tayl. Priv. Corp, § 148; Bates, Partn. § 4. Incorporators who transact business upon the strength of an organization which is materially defective, are individually liable, as partners, to those with whom they have dealt. Failure to record the charter as required by law, renders the incorporators personally liable to persons who deal with them without knowledge of the attempted incorporation or without knowledge of facts which ought to put them on inquiry; 159 Pa. 303.

Where persons enter into articles of association for banking purposes, and go through the usual steps for forming a corporation, such as subscribing for shares, etc., but without a charter, they are liable as partners; 60 Ill. 454. Where persons associate together to form a corporation, but none is formed, by reason of a failure to comply with the statute, they become a quasi-partnership; 85 Ill. 164; but not as against a creditor who is also a stockholder; 161 Ill. 417; or is a director; 48 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 399; or when it appears that third parties dealt with the concern as a corporation; 38 Mich. 779.

If the charter is obtained by fraud, the members will be held liable as partners; 45 Pa. 410; or if it be obtained for gambling purposes; 85 Tenn. 572. Where parties go to another state to get a charter to carry on business in their own state, with powers which they could not obtain at home, they will be held liable as partners, the transaction being substantially forbidden by statute; 12 L. R. A. (Tex. App.) 366; 148 Mass. 249; contra, 128 N. Y. 205. It is held that when parties incorporate in one state to do business in another, they are partners; 12 N. J. Eq. 31; contra, 84 N. Y. 207; 35 Ohio St. 158; Cook, St. & Stockh. § 237; 35 Kan. 242. The intent to form a corporation will not prevent parties being held as partners; 79 Mo. 401.

After dissolution of a corporation, stockholders are not liable as partners for corporate debts; 66 N. Y. 424; unless they agree to continue the business as partners; 45 N. Y. 410.

The fact that a special partner fails to comply with the stipulated requirements, does not change his special partnership into a general one, but simply makes him liable to creditors as a general partner; 131 U. S. 66.

The Domain. A partnership is primarily a commercial relation. The notion has, however, been gradually extended to include other associations than those for trade merely: e. g. partnerships between two attorneys at law; 6 Pa. 360; 8 Wend. 665; 13 Ark. 178. It is said by Collyer that "perhaps it may be laid down generally that a partnership may exist in any business or transaction which is not a mere personal office, and for the performance of which payment may be enforced." Colly. Part. 5th ed. § 56.

The early law did not recognize partnerships for trading in land, because the land was all held by the barons who did not engage in trade. But in modern times, and especially in America, where the social conditions are different, land is largely held by speculators whose operations as partners the law must recognize; 21 Me. 421, 422; 7 Pa. 165; 10 Cush. 458; 4 Conn. 568; 4 Ohio St. 1; 54 N. Y. 1. In transferring title to and from the firm the ordinary rules of conveyancing must be observed. When the title is in all the partners, all must join in the deed; if in the name of one, he alone need execute; Story, Part. § 92, note; 15 Johns. 158; 15 Gratt. 11; 16 B. Monr. 631; 2 Nev. 234.

Building operations are now upon the same footing as land speculations; 4 Cow. 282. But the tradition has been too strong to be impaired as yet in landlord and tenant cases. Farming on shares is not partnership. The owner of land may either receive a share in the produce as rent, or give such a portion to a laborer in lieu of wages; Lind. Part. Am. ed. *651; 58 Ind. 379. But there may be a partnership in the development of land owned by one; 59 Ala. 587. See supra, as to mining partnerships; also MINES AND MINING.

Firm Property. Partners have, presumptively, the same interest in the stock that they have in the profits; 16 Hun 163. Their shares are presumed to be equal both in capital and profits; Ewell's Lind. Part. *348; 23 Cal. 427; 16 Hun 163; 23 Cal. 427. Where no definite arrangement is made between partners as to a division of profits, the presumption of law is that they are to be equally divided; 182 Pa. 186. But a joint stock is not essential to a partnership. The partner without capital is then interested, not in the fund, but in the adventure; 2 Bingh. 170; 7 Hun 425; Ewell's Lind. Part. *13.

Sometimes a partnership exists between parties merely as the managers and disposers of the goods of others; 4 B. & Ald. 663; 15 Johns. 409, 422. So, it seems, two persons may be owners in common of property, and also partners in the working and management of it for their common benefit; 2 C. B. N. S. 357, 363; 16 M. & W. 503.

Whether a partnership includes the capital stock, or is limited to the profit and loss, must be determined from the agreement and intention of the parties; 21 Me. 120. See 5 Taunt. 74; 4 B. & C. 867; Story, Part. § 26.

A partner may contribute only the use of his capital, retaining full control of the principal; and he may charge interest for the use whether profits are earned or not; Ewell's Lind. Part. *328. If, however, the firm funds are expended in repairing and improving the property thus placed at their disposal, it becomes partnership stock; Ewell's Lind. Part. *330; 49 Me. 252; 23 N. J. Eq. 247; 72 Pa. 142.

The partnership property consists of the original stock and the additions made to it in the course of trade. All real estate purchased for the partnership, paid for out of the funds thereof, and devoted to partnership uses and trusts, whether the legal title is in one or all of the partners, is treated in equity in the same manner as other partnership property until the partnership account is settled and the partnership debts are paid; Story, Part. § 98; 5 Ves. 189; 10 Cush. 458; 4 Metc. Mass. 527; 3 Kent 37; 27 N. H. 37; Ewell's Lind. Part. *324. See 111 N. Y. 423. Leases or real estate taken by one partner for partnership purposes, mines, and trade-marks are held to be partnership property; 17 Ves. 298; 1 Taunt. 250; Story, Part. § 98. See 83 Ia. 571. The good-will of a business is an asset of the firm. It does not always have a salable value, however; Ewell's Lind. Part. *327, *443; 9 Neb. 258; 4 Sandf. Ch. 405; 1 Hoff. Ch. 68; 5 Ves. 539. But Chancellor Kent says, "The good-will of a trade is not partnership stock;" 3 Kent 64. The good-will of a professional partnership belongs, in the absence of express stipulations, exclusively to the survivors; 3 Madd. 64; a surviving partner has the right to carry on the business under the firm name; 7 Sim. 421; 4 Den. 559; contra, 7 Abb. Pr. 202. The firm name is a part of the good-will; 8 Daly 1. Upon dissolution, it passes with the assets and good-will to one who buys the business and continues it; 7 Abb. N. C. 292; L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 436. On dissolution and a division of firm assets, each partner may use the firm name in a similar business; 34 Beav. 566; 47 How. Pr. 532 (but see 53 Hun 501); see 79 N. Y. 490; but he must not do it in such a way as to mislead the public; L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 196; 22 Ohio St. 370. The name of a withdrawing partner cannot be used by the remaining partners without an agreement; L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 208; nor can a partner who buys the firm stock in trade, but not the good-will, keep the name of the retiring partner in the firm name; 26 L. J. N. S. 391. There are statutes which partially govern the subject in New York and Massachusetts. See 15 L. R. A. 462; GOOD-WILL.

A ship, as well as any other chattel, may be held in strict partnership; 3 Kent 154; 12 Mass. 54; 15 Me. 427. But ships are generally owned by parties as tenants in common; and they are not in consequence of such ownership to be considered as partners; 6 Me. 77; 24 Pick. 19; 14 Conn. 404; 14 Pa. 34, 88; 47 N. Y. 462. The same is true of any other species of property in which the parties have only a community of interest; Ewell's Lind. Part. 51; 8 Exch. 825; 21 Beav. 536. As against an assignment of partnership property for the benefit of creditors, property in the possession of and used by the firm, cannot be claimed to have been the individual property of a member of the firm, by one to whom such member subsequently assigned it; 70 Hun 593.

Partners hold land by a peculiar title. In one respect it most resembles an ancient joint tenancy. Neither partner can convey title to a moiety of the goods; his assignee takes subject to the right of the other partner to have firm debts paid out of that fund; he therefore can assign only a moiety of what is left after firm debts paid. Upon this principle depends also the special right of survivorship for the purposes of liquidation. With these qualifications the partner's title at law differs but slightly from a tenancy in common; Story, Part. §§ 90, 97; 9 Me. 28; 5 Johns. Ch. 417. See 85 Tex. 22. They hold the land in common and must grant it as other tenants in common; 11 Gray 179. The legal title to the land, with all the characteristics of realty, attaches to it until applied to partnership purposes; 76 Ala. 501; equity interferes for partnership purposes only; 13 Allen 252. Co-partners may withdraw realty from the partnership for the purpose of holding it in severalty; and in this event they become simply co-tenants in such land; 7 Mont. 206.

A partner has the same title to the stationary capital of the firm that he has to its product in his hands for sale, but his power over it is less extensive. He cannot sell the permanent capital stock. The power of a partner to sell results not from the title, but from the general partnership relation; 37 Pa. 217.

It has been held that in order to make the land really firm assets the title should be in the partners as a firm, otherwise, the partners would be mere tenants in common, and the land, as to purchasers and creditors, would be the individual estate of the partners, regardless of the funds by which it was purchased and the uses to which it was put; 81 Pa. 377; but as to the partners and their representatives, the land would belong to the firm, in such case; 5 Metc. 582; 89 Pa. 203 (even if the title is in one partner's name; 31 N. Y. Supp. 78, 543). The rule is applied to cases of equitable, as well as legal, estates; 70 Pa. 79. In other cases it has been held that where land has been bought with firm money and is used for firm purposes, or been dedicated to the firm, it must be regarded as partnership property without considering the record title; 64 N. Y. 479; 55 Ill. 416; 14 Fla. 565; 17 Cal. 262. It has been thought necessary to resort to an equitable conversion of firm land into personalty in order to subject it to the rules governing partnership property; 7 J. Baxt. 212; 15 Gratt. 11; 74 Pa. 391; 135 U. S. 621. But this fiction seems unnecessary. See 25 Ala. 625; 3 Stew. N. J. 415; 11 Barb. 43.

Partnership lands are liable for firm debts prior to the claim of the widow or heirs of a deceased partner; 118 U. S. 97. After liquidation, the lands or their surplus proceeds pass as real estate; 3 Stew. N. J. 415; 7 J. Baxt. 212; 11 Barb. 43; 74 Pa. 391; upon a dissolution the equitable title to land passes to the surviving partner; 34 Fed. Rep. 375; 86 Wis. 552; 109 N. Y. 383.

If one partner buys land with firm money and takes title in his own name, a resulting trust arises to the firm; 39 Pa. 535; 135 U. S. 621; 81 Me. 207; 73 Cal. 394; 85 Ky. 539. No length of possession by one partner of real estate paid for with partnership funds and conveyed to him, bars the other partners; 135 U. S. 621. A deed made to a partnership as grantee in the firm name, vests in the individual partners the power to convey; 8 C. C. App. 600; 15 Oreg. 476; but it has been held that such a conveyance vests title only in the partner whose name appears in the firm name; 22 Mo. 378. See 36 Ark. 476. In Pennsylvania, so far as third parties without notice are concerned, the title of the firm must appear of record; 128 Pa. 153. As to partnership realty, see 28 L. R. A. 86, 129, 161; 27 id. 449.

Profits made by a member of a firm through individual outside transactions do not belong to the firm, though he employs therein the skill and information acquired by him as a member thereof; 150 U. S. 524. Nor do they when made with the consent of the firm which receives a commission on them; 30 N. Y. Supp. 321; but if a partner avails himself of information obtained by him in the firm business, and uses it for any purposes within the scope of the firm business, or in competition with the firm in its business, he is liable to account to it for the profits made by him; [1891] 2 Ch. 244.

Marshalling Assets. A firm is not a corporation, and hence firm creditors are in theory separate creditors as well. But in administering insolvent estates equity has established the "rule of convenience" that firm and separate creditors shall have priority upon, and be confined to, the firm and separate funds respectively; 116 Ind. 317; 84 Ky. 85; 31 W. Va. 688; 22 Neb. 526; 98 N. C. 1; 133 U. S. 670. A surplus of a separate fund is divided among firm creditors pro rata; and a surplus of a firm fund is divided among the separate creditors of the various partners in proportion to the shares of the partners therein; Pars. Part. § 382; 67 Ind. 485; 50 Miss. 300; 44 Pa. 503; 13 N. J. Eq. 126; 41 N. H. 12; 35 Vt. 44; 94 Ill. 271; 28 Ga. 371; 29 Ala. 172. If there is no firm fund and no solvent partner, the firm creditors come in on an equal footing with separate creditors against the separate estates of partners pari passu with individual creditors; 39 Fed. Rep. 203; 78 Mo.

491; 58 Wis. 499; contra, 46 N. H. 188; 100 Ind. 593; 9 Cush. 553. A very slight firm fund over and above costs will suffice to exclude firm creditors from the separate estate; five shillings has been said to be enough; 7 Am. L. Reg. 499; and five pounds is enough, and so is a joint estate of less than two pounds; 2 Rose 54; one dollar and a quarter was considered too little; Pars. Part. 4th ed. § 384. A solvent partner, if living, is equivalent to a firm fund; 8 Conn. 584; Lind. Part. *731.

But though there is no separate estate, separate creditors cannot come against the joint estate until the firm debts are paid, after which they may resort to the partners' interest in any surplus remaining; Pars. Part. § 382; 3 B. & P. 288, 289; 12 Ohio 647; 43 N. H. 144.

As a general rule partnership creditors, after they have exhausted firm assets, cannot share equally with individual creditors in the individual assets; 89 Ala. 503; 133 U. S. 670; 103 Mo. 78; some cases hold that they can; 33 La. Ann. 1279; 21 Conn. 41; 86 Va. 478. In Kentucky they share the separate assets equally with the separate creditors after the latter have received the same dividend from the separate estate that the firm creditors have received from the firm estate; 79 Ky. 133. It has been said not to be settled that, at law, the partnership creditors may not look to the several funds at once, in common with several creditors, but that the law is now tending towards the adoption of the rule to that effect which prevails in equity; Pars. Part. § 383.

If two firms having one or more common members, are both bankrupt, there can be no proof by one against the other; Pars. Part. § 381. Various explanations have been offered for this rule. Sometimes it is called a "rule of convenience"; sometimes a fundamental principle of equity; Ewell's Lind. Part. *692; 22 Pick. 450; 5 Johns. Ch. 60; Story, Part. § 377; 44 Pa. 503. Sometimes it is said to depend on the principle of destination; the partners by gathering together a firm fund have dedicated it to the firm creditors. Upon this theory, the partnership stock becomes a trust fund. The firm creditors occupy a commanding position and restrain even the partners in dealing with the property; 3 Biss. 122; 41 Barb. 307; 52 N. Y. 146. Usually it is declared to be the outgrowth of the partner's equity, i. e. his right to have firm funds applied first to the payment of firm debts; 7 Md. 398; 32 Gratt. 431; 4 Bush 25; 4 R. I. 173; 7 B. Monr. 210. Consequently, where the partner gives up this right, the firm creditor loses his priority; 3 Ired. L. 218; 59 Tenn. 167; 2 Disn. 286; 1 Woods 127; 32 Gratt. 481. The rule does not apply where a partnership creditor has acquired a lien by contract; 84 Ky. 85. If insolvent partners divide the firm fund among their separate creditors in proportion to the interest of each in the partnership, firm creditors cannot object; 39 Pa. 369; 77 N. Y. 195.

As a general rule, insolvency fixes the position of the different funds. A debt to a partner by the firm cannot be collected for the benefit of separate creditors; a debt of a partner to the firm cannot be collected for the benefit of firm creditors; because a man cannot prove against his own creditors; 4 H. & McH. 167. What one partner owes his co-partner independently of the firm can be collected from the separate estate of the debtor for the benefit of the separate estate of the creditor: but this will not be allowed unless the situation is such that the firm creditors can derive no benefit even indirectly from the enforcement of the claim, i. e. there must be no surplus to go to them; 4 De G. J. & S. 551; contra, where both partners owe the firm one-half of the excess of one debt over the other, it is payable to the firm creditors out of the estate of the greater debtor; 55 Pa. 252. Partners, before insolvency, may, by an executed agreement, change firm into separate property. Firm creditors have no lien to prevent the alteration; e. g. where one partner sells out to the others, the fund becomes primarily liable for the claims of the creditors of the new firm; 20 N. J. Eq. 13; 6 Bosw. 533; 19 Ga. 190; 9 Cush. 553; 35 Ia. 323; 21 Pa. 77; 6 Ves. 119.

Equity will not interfere to embarrass a vested legal right. Therefore if a firm creditor levies on a separate estate, he has priority over the subsequent execution of a separate creditor; 24 Ga. 625; 22 Pick. 450; 9 N. J. Eq. 353; 17 N. Y. 300. A separate creditor can sell nothing but his debtor's interest. An execution against the firm, though subsequent, has priority, because it attaches this paramount right of the co-partner. But a firm creditor, without a legal lien, has no standing; 22 Cal. 194; 17 N. J. Eq. 259; 5 Johns. Ch. 417; 9 Me. 28. But where there is an execution against each partner and a subsequent execution against the firm, and the sheriff seizes and sells firm goods under the three, the proceeds are given first to the joint creditor, and the remainder to the separate creditors in proportion to each partner's interest; 29 Pa. 90. So in the case of judgments against real estate. A judgment on a separate claim has no lien on the firm real estate, but only on the partner's interest. But a firm judgment is a lien on a partner's separate real estate, and takes priority over a subsequent separate judgment; Ewell's Lind. Part. *299; 17 N. Y. 300; 46 Ia. 461. Partnership creditors who have a levy on partnership goods are entitled to be paid before a creditor of one of the partners, who had a prior attachment on the individual interest of one partner; 97 Mo. 145.

When an assignment for creditors has been made by a firm, and also by the partners individually, the holder of a note executed by the firm and by the individual members is entitled to have the estates of the partnership and of each partner kept separate, and to receive a dividend from each, though the note was given for a firm liability; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 239.

Duration. Prima facie every partnership is determinable at will. But it may be entered into for a definite term by agreement express or implied: Ewell's Lind. Part. *121, 413.

A partnership at will is presumed to continue so long as the parties are in life and of capacity to continue it; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 42; 9 Humphr. 750. See PARTNERS. A partnership for a term in presumed to continue during the term, provided the parties are in life and of legal capacity to continue it. See 7 Mo. 29. If a partnership be continued by express or tacit consent after the expiration of the prescribed period, it will be presumed to continue upon the old terms, but as a partnership at will; 17 S. & R. 165. But in no case will the law presume a partnership to exist beyond the life of the parties; 1 Wils. Ch. 181. When a partnership has been entered into for a definite term, it is nevertheless dissolved by death within the term; Story, Part. § 195. The delectus personæ is so essentially necessary to the constitution of a partnership that even the executors or other representatives of partners themselves do not, in their capacity of executors or representatives, succeed to the state and condition of partners; 7 Pick. 237, 238; 3 Kent 55; 42 Ill. 342; 46 Mo. 197. The civilians carried this doctrine so far as not to permit it to be stipulated that the heirs or executors of partners should themselves be partners; Domat, lib. 1, tit. 8, s. 2; Pothier, Part. n. 145; though Pothier thinks it binding.

At common law, the representatives of a deceased partner may be made partners in his stead either by original agreement or by testamentary direction; Ewell's Lind. Part. *590; 47 Tex. 481. Clauses providing for the admission into the firm of a deceased partner's representatives will, in general, be construed as giving them an option to become partners, and not as constituting them partners absolutely; 7 Jarm. Conv. 120; 1 McCl. & Y. 569; 2 Russ. 62. The executor of a deceased partner is not compelled in such case to become a partner, so as to charge the estate with debts incurred after the partner's death; 168 Pa. 331. In any event it must be a new partnership; Pars. Part. 4th ed. § 343; 5 Allen 290; 32 Barb. 425; 79 Ala. 540; 31 Minn. 186; contra, 46 Conn. 136; 66 Mo. 468; 81 Me. 207; 51 Tex. 578; and such is said to be the tendency of modern decisions; Pars. Part. Beale's ed. § 343, n.

Only the fund already invested or directed to be invested by the testator is subject to the claims of new creditors; 15 Gratt. 11; 10 Ves. 110; 47 Tex. 481; 135 N. Y. 430; any direction, in order to charge the general assets, must be clear and unambiguous; 2 How. 577; 48 Pa. 275.

The rule in England is clear that when an executor undertakes to participate in the business, whether in consequence of a testamentary direction or otherwise, he becomes personally liable to creditors as a partner, in addition to the liability of the estate. The common-law relation of partnership will not admit of a qualified liability; Ewell's Lind. Part. *593, *604; 11 Moo. P. C. 198. See 113 N. Y. 586; 59 Miss. 305. But simply taking the profits will not charge the executor; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. In America, some authorities have declared that the executor is not personally liable when the testator has directed him to continue the business, but only when he does so of his own motion; 4 Ala. 588; 33 Md. 382; 39 How. Pr. 82; 48 Pa. 275; contra, for personal liability of executor; 8 Conn. 584. A simple direction to allow a fund to remain in a partnership may be construed as a loan to the survivors; 9 Hare 141. An executor is not liable personally if he merely leaves the estate of his testator in the business and takes no part in it; 60 Miss. 367; 48 N. J. L. 129.

Dissolution. A partnership may be dissolved: 1. By the act of the parties: as by their mutual consent; Pars. Part. § 284; 98. Ill. 109; 3 Kent 54; and where no specified period is limited for the continuance of the partnership, either party may dissolve it at any time; 4 Russ. 260; 131 Mass. 312; 76 N. Y. 373; 168 U. S. 334; 3 Kent 53; Story, Part. §§ 84, 272. Whether a partnership for a certain time can be dissolved by one partner at his mere will before the term has expired, seems not to be absolutely and definitively settled; Story, Part. § 275. In favor of the right of one partner in such cases, see 3 Kent 55; 17 Johns. 525; 3 Bland, Ch. 674; 55 Mich. 256, per Cooley, J.; 58 Pa. 155; 168 U. S. 337. Against it, see Story, Part. § 275; 5 Ark. 281; 4 Wash. C. C. 284; Pothier, Part. 152; Ewell's Lind. Part. *571, note; 20 N. J. Eq. 172; 9 Utah 236.

A partner exercising such right would be liable for his breach of the partnership articles; 55 Mich. 256; 168 U. S. 337, 256. As against third persons, a partner may certainly withdraw from a partnership at his pleasure; 3 C. B. N. S. 561. Partners may terminate the partnership at any time by mutual agreement; 126 Ill. 166; and this may be inferred from an abandonment of the undertaking; 109 Ill. 94; 54 Cal. 463; but see 16 Pick. 412. The incorporation of the partners for a similar business may perhaps work a dissolution as by consent. See Pars. Part. § 285. Dissolution need not be under seal, even though the partnership articles were under seal; Pars. Part. § 284. See PARTNERS.

A partner, who, within the time stipulated in the articles of partnership for its continuance, undertakes to dissolve the partnership and takes exclusive possession of its property and business, is liable to account to his co-partner for profits according to the partnership agreement; 168 U. S. 328.

2. By the act of God: as, by the death of one of the partners: and this operates from the time of the death; 3 Mer. 610; 6 Cow. 441; 6 Conn. 184; 2 How. 560; 7 Ala. N. S. 19; 7 Pet. 594; 17 Pick. 519; 5 Gill 1; 40

Mich. 343. As to the effect of a provision in the partnership articles to the contrary, see supra.

A partnership dissolved by the death of one of the partners is dissolved as to the whole firm; 7 Pet. 586, 594; 31 Minn. 186; and the reason given for this rule is applicable not only to dissolution by death, but to every species of dissolution; Story, Part. § 317.

3. By the act of law: as by the bankruptcy of one of the partners; Cowp. 448; 6 Ves. 126; 5 Maule & S. 340; 45 Miss. 703; 59 Ala. 597; or by the bankruptcy of the firm; id.; such dissolution takes place when bankruptcy is legally declared, and then relates back to the act of bankruptcy; 11 Ves. 78.

4. By a valid assignment of all the partnership effects for the benefit of creditors, either under insolvent acts; Colly. Part. 6th ed. § 102; or otherwise; 41 Me. 378; but this is only prima facie evidence of dissolution which other circumstances may rebut; 1 Dall. 380; by a sale of the partnership effects under a separate execution against one partner; 2 V. & B. 300; 3 Kent 59. It is said that this does not constitute a dissolution but inevitably leads to it; 24 Pick. 89; 53 Tex. 540. The mere insolvency of one or all of the members of a partnership, without a suspension or judicial process, etc., does not of itself operate a dissolution; 24 Pick. 89.

5. By the civil death of one of the partners; Pothier, Part. n. 147. But the absconding of a party from the state does not of itself operate a dissolution; 24 Pick. 89. See Story, Part. § 298.

6. By the breaking out of war between two states in which the partners are domiciled and carrying on trade; 16 Johns. 438; 3 Bland, Ch. 674; 50 N. Y. 166; 91 U. S. 7. See WAR.

7. By the marriage of a feme sole partner; 4 Russ. 260; 3 Kent 55. This would now, in view of the recent married women acts, depend upon the laws of the state; 61 Tex. 437. The marriage of a male and female partner would work a dissolution; 52 Mich. 3.

8. By the extinction of the subject-matter of the joint business or undertaking; 16 Johns. 401; and by the completion of the business or adventure for which the partnership was formed; Story, Part. § 280.

9. By the termination of the period for which a partnership for a certain time was formed; Colly. Part. § 105.

10. By the assignment of the whole of one partner's interest either to his co-partner or to a stranger; 4 B. & Ad. 175; 17 Johns. 525; 1 Freem. Ch. 231; 8 W. & S. 262; 45 Ill. App. 469; 28 Fla. 680; where it does not appear that the assignee acts in the concern after the assignment; 17 Johns. 525; 8 Wend. 442; 5 Dana 213; 1 Whart. 381; 2 Dev. Eq. 481. But in England this can occur only in partnerships at will. See 135 U. S. 632. It has been held that a sale by one partner of his interest in the firm's property to the other does not necessarily work a dissolution of the firm; 93 Mich. 569. In partnerships for a term, assignment is a ground for dissolution by remaining co-partners, but probably not by the transferee. In America, the transferee always has a right to an account; Ewell's Lind. Part. *363; 60 Ala. 226; 50 Cal. 615. But see 14 Pick. 322, where it was held that such an assignment would not ipso facto work a dissolution. See 55 N. J. L. 427. "If a member of an ordinary partnership assigns where the partnership is at will, the assignment dissolves it, and if the partnership is not at will, the assignment may be treated by the other members of the concern as a cause of dissolution. The assignee of one partner cannot be made a member of the partnership against the will of the other partners, but the absolute right to have the affairs of the firm at once wound up, when the specified duration of the partnership has not yet expired, may be subject to modification according to circumstances." 135 U. S. 632.

11. By the award of arbitrators appointed under a clause in the partnership articles to that effect. See 1 W. Bla. 475; 4 B. & Ad. 172; 5 Wend. 268.

The addition of a member to a firm creates a new firm and operates as a dissolution of the old one, even though the business be continued under the old firm name, and so does the retirement of a member; 96 Mo. 591.

A partnership for a term may be dissolved before the expiration of the term, by the decree of a court of equity founded on the wilful fraud or other gross misconduct of one of the partners; Pars. Part. § 270, § 357; 4 Beav. 502; 2 V. & B. 299; 5 Ark. 270; 145 U. S. 578; so on his gross carelessness and waste in the administration of the partnership, and his exclusion of the other partners from their just share of the management; 1 J. & W. 592; 5 Ark. 278; 79 Mich. 290; or persistent violation of partnership articles; 41 Fed. Rep. 841; or the loss of health by a partner; Pars. Part. § 360; or the pecuniary inability of a partner to fulfil his engagement with the others; id.; so on the existence of violent and lasting dissension between the partners; 1 Ia. 537; where these are of such a character as to prevent the business from being conducted upon the stipulated terms; 3 Kent 60, 61; and to destroy the mutual confidence of the partners in each other; 21 Beav. 482; 20 N. J. Eq. 172. Equity will not act on slight grounds; 58 Pa. 168. A partner cannot, by misconducting himself and rendering it impossible for his co-partners to act in harmony with him, obtain a dissolution on the ground of the impossibility so created by himself; 21 Beav. 493; 3 Hare 387; 84 Ill. 121. A partnership may be dissolved by decree when its business is in a hopeless state, its continuance impracticable, and its property liable to be wasted and lost; 3 Kent 60; 16 Johns. 491; 3 K. & J. 78; 13 Sim. 495; 8 Oreg. 84; 41 Fed. Rep. 841; or where there was fraud in inducing a partner to enter into the partnership; id.

The confirmed lunacy of an active partner is sufficient to induce a court of equity to decree a dissolution, not only for the purpose of protecting the lunatic, but also to relieve his co-partners from the difficult position in which the lunacy places them. See 1 Cox, Ch. 107; 1 Swanst. 514; 2 My. & K. 125; 6 Beav. 324; 2 Kay & J. 441; 3 Y. & C. 184; 128 Ill. 256. The same may be said of every other inveterate infirmity, which has seized upon one of the partners and rendered him incompetent to act where his personal labor and skill were contracted for; 3 Kent 62. But lunacy does not itself dissolve the firm, nor do other infirmities; 3 Kent 58; Story, Part. § 295; this is said to be supported by the current of authorities; Pars. Part. § 362. It is, however, contended by Mr. Justice Story and by Parker, C. J., that a clear case of insanity ought to effect that result; Story, Part. § 295; 10 N. H. 101. An inquisition of lunacy found against a member dissolves the firm; 6 Humph. 85. The court does not decree a dissolution on the ground of lunacy except upon clear evidence that the malady exists and is incurable; 3 Y. & C. 184; 2 K. & J. 441. A temporary illness is not sufficient; 2 Ves. Sen. 34; 1 Cox 107. A dissolution by the court on the ground of insanity dates from the decree and not from a prior day; 1 Phill. 172; 1 K. & J. 765.

Actual notice of dissolution must be brought home to persons who have been in the habit of dealing with the firm; but as to all persons who have had no previous dealings with the firm, notice fairly given in the public newspapers is deemed sufficient; Colly. Part. 6th ed. 163, n. See 159 Pa. 165; 99 Ala. 47; 148 Mass. 498. This notice is necessary to terminate the agency of each partner, and, consequently, his powers and liabilities as a member; 68 N. Y. 314; 25 Gratt. 321; 47 Wisc. 261; 67 Ill. 106; 83 Pa. 148; 7 Price 193; 1 Camp. 402. If there is no notice of the dissolution and the retiring partner permits the use of his name, he is liable for the acts of the continuing partner; 48 Mo. App. 518. It is said that notice of dissolution need not be given to one who has sold goods to the firm for cash; 17 Kan. 287; 12 N. Y. 283; or to one who, without the knowledge of the firm, has discounted its commercial paper; 20 N. Y. 241.

It is not necessary to give notice of the retirement of a dormant partner from the firm, if the fact of his being a partner be unknown to all the creditors of the firm; if it be known to some, notice to those must be given, but that will be sufficient; 1 Metc. Mass. 19; 1 B. & Ad. 11; 5 B. Monr. 170; 36 Pa. 325; 37 Ill. 76. See 35 Ala. 242; 87 Ill. 281; 3 N. Y. 168; 87 Ky. 525. But where there were an active and two dormant partners, and the firm retained a solicitor in pending litigation, and the dormant partners retired, the solicitor never having known that they were partners and having no notice of dissolution, the dormant partners were held liable for the solicitor's costs incurred after dissolution; [1897] 2 Q. B. 397.

Notice of the dissolution is not necessary, in case of the death of one of the partners, to free the estate of the deceased partner from further liability; 3 Kent 63; 3 Mer. 614; 17 Pick. 519; 25 Gratt. 321; nor is notice, in fact, necessary in any case where the dissolution takes place by operation of law; 3 Kent 63, 67; 15 Johns. 57; Cowp. 445; 9 Exch. 145. Bankruptcy of a member, after dissolution, is notice of dissolution; 146 Mass. 413.

One partner may obtain an injunction to restrain his co-partner from violating his rights under the partnership articles, even when the dissolution of the partnership articles is not asked; 54 Fed. Rep. 439.

If a retiring partner leaves a firm and the remaining partners agree to pay the debts and indemnify the outgoing partner, the creditors who know these facts and raise no objections are bound to treat the outgoing partner merely as surety for the debts; [1894] A. C. 586.

Effect of dissolution. The effect of dissolution, as between the partners, is to terminate all transactions between them as partners, except for the purpose of taking a general account and winding up the concern; 1 Pa. 274; 3 Kent 62. As to third persons; the effect of a dissolution, with notice as stated supra, is to absolve the partners from all liability for future transactions, but not for past transactions of the firm; 53 Miss. 280; 51 Cal. 530; 61 Ind. 225; 57 Ill. 215; 2 Cush. 175; 3 M'Cord 378; 4 Munf. 215; 5 Mas. 56; Harp. 470; 4 Johns. 224; 41 Me. 376.

It is said that a firm, notwithstanding its dissolution, continues to exist so far as may be necessary for the winding up of its business; 11 Ves. 5; 16 id. 57; 2 Russ. 242; Ewell's Lind. Part. *217. See 55 N. J. L. 427. The power of the partners subsists for many purposes after dissolution: among these are—first, the completion of all the unfinished engagements of the partnership; second, the conversion of all the property, means, and assets of the partnership existing at the time of the dissolution, for the benefit of those who were partners, according to their respective shares; third, the application of the partnership funds to the payment of the partnership debts; Story, Part. § 326; 3 Kent 57; 17 Pick. 519. See 135 U. S. 621. But although, for the purposes of winding up the concern and fulfilling engagements that could not be fulfilled during its existence, the power of the partners certainly subsists even after dissolution, yet, legally and strictly speaking, it subsists for those purposes only; 5 M. & G. 504; 4 M. & W. 461; 10 Hare 453; 61 N. Y. 222; 49 Ia. 177; 45 Pa. 49. The surviving members of a co-partnership have the legal title to the firm property, and the right to dispose of its assets, only for the purpose of closing the business, not to continue it; 66 Hun 628.

Whether a dissolution of a partnership is per se a breach of a contract by the firm to employ a person in their service is questionable; 8 H. & N. 981. A contract of employment for a year by a firm terminates on the dissolution of the firm during the year by the death of a partner; 4 Misc. Rep. 99.

PARTURITION. The act of giving birth to a child. See BIRTH.

PARTUS (Lat.). The child just before it is born, or immediately after its birth. Offspring. See MAXIMS, Partus sequitur, etc.

PARTY. See PARTIES.

PARTY AGGRIEVED. The phrase is not technical. They are ordinary English words and are to be construed in the ordinary meaning put upon them. 7 Q. B. D. 470.

PARTY-JURY. A jury de medietate linguæ. See JURY.

PARTY TO BE CHARGED. A phrase used in the seventeenth section of the Statute of Frauds, under which, in the case of certain sales, a note or memorandum of the contract must be in writing, "signed by the parties to be charged by such contract." In the fourth section the language is "by the party to be charged." It is held to be sufficient if the signature is only by the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced; 6 Gray 31; 90 Cal. 307; 42 N. Y. 493; and if a written offer be made though accepted by parol; L. R. 1 Exch. 342; contra, 58 Mich. 574. The signature may be by mark, or by initials, or printed, if the printed name be shown to have been adopted; Tiff. Sales 75. If the name be shown to have been signed to the writing to authenticate it, it is immaterial in what part of the writing it is placed; L. R. 2 H. L. 127. An agent may be authorized to sign by parol and a subsequent ratification proved; 24 W. Va. 643; 114 Ind. 311. An auctioneer at a public sale may sign for either party; 7 East 558; 35 N. J. L. 338; and so, ordinarily may a broker; 16 Gray 436; and his memorandum need not be signed; id.

See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; NOTE OR MEMORANDUM.

PARTY-WALL. A wall erected on the line between two adjoining pieces of land belonging to different persons, for the use of both properties. 2 Washb. R. P. 385.

A structure for the common benefit and convenience of both the tenements which it separates. 118 Ill. 17.

The phrase ordinarily means a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common. Emden, Building Leases 285. But it does not as a matter of law necessarily imply a solid structure; 129 N. Y. 61.

It is a wall built by one owner partly on the land of another for the common benefit of both. The adjoining owners are not joint tenants or tenants in common of the party wall. Each is possessed in severalty of his own soil up to the dividing line, and of that portion of the wall which rests upon it; but the soil of each, with the wall belonging to him, is burdened with an easement or servitude in favor of the other, to the end that it may afford a support to the wall and buildings of such other; 57 Miss. 746; 32 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 681.

"The words party wall appear to me to express a meaning rather popular than legal, and they may, I think, be used in four different senses. They may mean, first, a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common, which is the most common and the primary meaning of the term. In the next place the term may be used to signify a wall divided longitudinally into two strips, one belonging to each of the neighboring owners. Then, thirdly, the term may mean a wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing wall between the two tenements. The term is so used in some of the building acts. Lastly, the term may designate a wall divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross-easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety." 14 Ch. Div. 192.

A brick wall which is used in common, as the wall of two adjacent properties in a city, is a party-wall, if erected partly on the soil of each, and so used for many years without question or complaint by either; 43 La. Ann. 1157.

Party-walls are generally regulated by statute. The principles of these acts generally are that the wall shall be built equally on the lands of the adjoining owners, at their joint expense, but when only one owner wishes to use such wall, it is built at his expense, and when the other wishes to make use of it he pays one-half of its value. Each owner has a right to place his joists in it and use it for the support of his roof. See 4 Sandf. 480; 24 Mo. 69; 12 La. An. 785. When the party-wall has been built, and the adjoining owner is desirous of having a deeper foundation, he has a right to undermine such wall, using due care and diligence to prevent any injury to his neighbor; and, having done so, he is not answerable for any consequential damages which may ensue; 17 Johns. 92.; 12 Mass. 220; 2 N. H. 534. See 1 Dall. 346; 5 S. & R. 1. An adjoining owner of a party wall has a right to increase its height, but in doing so is liable for any injury to the adjoining building, even though the addition is being built by a contractor and the damages result from a windstorm which causes the wall to fall; 50 N. Y. 639; 68 Hun 293. See 14 Daly 450.

When such a wall exists between two buildings, belonging to different persons, and one of them takes it down with his buildings, he is required to erect another in its place in a reasonable time and with the least inconvenience; the other owner must contribute to the expense, if the wall required repairs, but such expense will be limited to the costs of the old wall; 3 Kent 436; 6 Den. 717. See 41 La. Ann. 194. When the wall is taken down, it must be done with care; but it is not the duty of the person taking it down to shore up or prop the house of his neighbor to prevent it from falling. If, however, the work be done with negligence, by which injury accrues to the neighboring house, an action will lie; 1 M. & M. 362; 15 N. Y. 601. If one tenant in common of a party-wall excludes the other from the use of it by placing obstacles in it, the only remedy is to remove the obstcales; 14 Ch. Div. 192.

Where the owner of two contiguous lots erects a brick messuage, with a division wall, and sells to different purchasers, the wall is not a party-wall; 2 Miles 247; contra, 6 Duer 17. The right to use a party-wall is not lost by lapse of time, even seventy-five years: 1 Phila. 366. It can be acquired by prescription after a sufficient period; 80 N. Y. 614. A party-wall must be built without openings; 61 Pa. 118; 51 Tex. 480; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 627; 6 Mackey 580; 71 Hun 295; 159 Mass. 427. A party-wall can only be built for mutual support; painting a sign on it is unlawful; 2 W. N. C. Pa. 333. The principle of party-walls is based upon mutual benefit, and does not extend to the interior of lots where the adjoining owner cannot be expected to build; 2 Pears. 324. Where one built a party-wall, which was defective and fell over, injuring the adjoining premises, he was held liable to the owner of the premises; 125 Mass. 232; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 224. Where a building having a party-wall is destroyed by fire, leaving the wall standing, the easement in the wall ceases; 57 Miss. 746; and so where the wall becomes unfit either from age or accident; 24 Or. 16.

An agreement between adjoining owners in relation to a party-wall erected on the division lines of their lots is binding on the parties and those who purchase subject to such agreement, and creates cross easements upon the lots; 33 Neb. 437; 135 N. Y. 312; but see 9 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 205. It creates a covenant running with the land; 88 Mo. 524; s. c. 1 L. R. A. 3. But an agreement to pay half the cost is merely a personal covenant; 115 Ill. 199.

By statute in Iowa, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina, and in the District of Columbia, one adjacent owner may build over his neighbor's line, without compensating him, except that the latter may, when he pleases, use the wall so built, upon paying for it. The cases should be read with a view to the statutes. The regulation of party walls is a very ancient form of exercise of the police power, and came to Pennsylvania from the customs of London, like so many other parts of our early law. Those interested will find the subject discussed in a note in 7 Amer. L. Reg. N. S. 10. But such regulation, as it exists in Pennsylvania and some other states, is an interference with the rights and enjoyment of property, sustainable only on the police power, and therefore to be governed and measured by the strict extent of the statutory grant; 146 Pa. 636. The provincial act of 1692 in Massachusetts, similar to the Pennsylvania act, was held void as contrary to the bill of rights; 139 Mass. 29, a case cited by counsel, but not followed, in 16 W. N. C. Pa. 83. But it has also been said that there can be no available objection to the principle upon which the law of party-walls is based. It has constituted a part of the law of France for ages. The principle is no invasion of the absolute right of property. Per Lowrie, J., in 23 Pa. 36.

PARVA SERJEANTIA. Petty serjeanty. See SERJEANTY.

PARVUM CAPE. See PETIT CAPE.

PASS. A certificate given to a slave, by his master or mistress, in which it is stated that he is permitted to leave his home with their authority. The paper on which such certificate is written.

In Practice. To be given or entered: as, let the judgment pass for the plaintiff.

To become transferred: thus, the title to goods passes by the sale whenever the parties have agreed upon the sale and the price, and nothing remains to be done to complete the agreement; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 939.

To decide upon. When a jury decide upon the rights of the parties, which are in issue, they are said to pass upon them.

The constitution of various states forbid the issue of free passes on railroads, except in certain cases, as does the Interstate Commerce Act. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

PASS AND REPASS. The phrase has been held to mean going and returning over the road once only. 34 J. P. 823.

PASS-BOOK. In Mercantile Law. A book used by merchants with their customers, in which an entry of goods sold and delivered to a customer is made.

It is kept by the buyer, and sent to the merchant whenever he wishes to purchase any article. It ought to be a counterpart of the merchant's books, as far as regards the customer's account.

The term pass-book is given to a small book made up from time to time from the banker's ledger and forwarded to the customer: this is not considered as a statement of account between the parties: yet when the customer neglects for a long time to make any objection to the correctness of the entries, he will be bound by them; 2 Atk. 252; 2 D. & C. 534; 2 M. & W. 2.

A depositor in a bank, who sends his pass-book to be written up and receives it back with entries of credits and debits and his paid checks as vouchers for the latter, is bound to examine with due diligence the pass-book and vouchers, and to report to the bank without any unreasonable delay any errors which may be discovered in them; and if he fails to do so and the bank is thereby misled to its prejudice, he cannot afterwards discredit the balance as shown by the pass-book. If a depositor delegates the examination to a clerk without proper supervision he will not be protected from loss if it turns out that without his knowledge the clerk had committed forgery in raising the amounts of some of the checks, and thereby misled the bank to its prejudice, in spite of due care on the part of its officers; 117 U. S. 96.

PASSAGE. Properly a way over water. Where a seaman shipped for a voyage to foreign parts, and at the termination of the voyage was provided with a passage to a port within the United Kingdom, but not the one from which he originally shipped, he was held to have been provided with a passage home, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act; [1897] 1 Q. B. 712.

PASSAGE COURT. An ancient court of record in Liverpool, once called the "mayor's court of pays sage," but now usually called the "court of the passage of the borough of Liverpool." M. & W.

PASSAGE-MONEY. The sum claimable for the conveyance of a person, with or without luggage, on the water.

The difference between freight and passage-money is this, that the former is claimable for the carriage of goods, and the latter for the carriage of the person. The same rules which govern the claim for freight affect that for passage-money; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 424; 1 Pet. Adm. 126; 3 Johns. 335. See COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS.

PASSAGIO. An ancient writ addressed to the keepers of the ports to permit a man who had the king's leave to pass over sea. Reg. Orig. 193.

PASSAGIUM REGIS. A voyage or expedition to the Holy Land made by the kings of England in person. Cowell.

PASSATOR. He who has the interest or command of the passage of a river; or a lord to whom a duty is paid for passage. Wharton.

PASSENGER. One who has taken a place in a public conveyance, by virtue of a contract, for the purpose of being transported from one place to another, on the payment of fare or its equivalent. 132 Pa. 1. See 96 id. 267.

The purchase of a ticket and the entry by a person on the premises or accommodations of the carrier creates the relation of passenger and carrier with all its rights, duties, and obligations; 104 Ill. 296; 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 264; 37 Ia. 264; so does entry on the premises with the intention of buying a ticket; 40 Barb. 546; 89 Va. 639.

A carrier is not liable to one who rides by stealth; 83 Ill. 427; or who is a trespasser; 91 Mo. 332; although invited to ride by an employe of the carrier; 76 Tex. 174. Express messengers and mail clerks are passengers; 15 N. Y. 444; 96 Pa. 256; but not a voluntary assistant to an express messenger or mail clerk; 12 Am. Rep. 475; or a newsboy permitted to ride free; 69 Pa. 210; 60 Mo. 413; or an employe of the carrier who rides free between his home and place of employment; 30 Kan. 689.

One who travels free; 14 How. 468; on an annual pass; 17 So. Rep. (La.) 503; or on a drover's pass; 51 Pa. 316; is entitled to the same care as the holder of a regular ticket; even if he expressly assumes the risk of accident; 176 Pa. 45; but an employe travelling on a free pass containing a stipulation that the company will not be liable cannot recover for injuries; 34 N. J. L. 513.

A passenger voluntarily riding in a baggage car, or other dangerous place, even by permission of the conductor, cannot recover for injuries; 14 Allen 429; 92 Pa. 21; 55 Tex. 88; but it has been held that the permission of the conductor justifies such conduct in the passenger; 20 Minn. 125; 1 Duer 571; so of permitting a passenger to ride on a freight train; 115 Ind. 435.

A passenger is bound by the reasonable rules of a carrier; 55 Ill. 185; 11 Fed. Rep. 683; 41 Am. Dec. 472; which do not violate the obligation of the contract; 142 Mass. 40; 26 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 54. Whether such rule is reasonable is a question for the court; 18 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 356; 92 Mo. 359; 43 Ill. 420; 14 Lea 128; 20 N. Y. 127; but it has been held to be one for the jury; 4 Fed. Rep. 37; 41 Am. Dec. 472. A passenger who places his arm outside the car window and is injured cannot recover; 36 L. R. A. (Ky.) 123; see 56 Alb. L. J. 250; but it is not contributory negligence for a passenger on a crowded train to ride on the platform; Ky. L. Rep., July 15, 1897.

Provisions have been made by the United States laws for the health and safety of passengers by sea. See acts March 2, 1847; Jan. 31, 1848; May 17, 1848; 11 Stat. 127, 149, 210.

Seamen have no right, even in cases of extreme peril, to sacrifice the lives of passengers, for the sake of preserving their own; Fed. Cas. 15, 383.

See NEGLIGENCE; BAGGAGE; TICKET; COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS; SLEEPING CAR; RAILROAD.

PASSENGER SHIP. "Every description of sea-going vessel carrying one or more passenger or passengers on any voyage from any place in Her Majesty's Dominions to any place whatever." 52 & 53 Vict. c. 29.

PASSENGER TRAIN. "A train advertised to take passengers generally,—people travelling from place to place,—upon the terms and in the manner ordina- rily applicable to such passengers." 54 L. J. Q. B. 585.

PASSIAGIARIUS. A ferryman. Jacob.

PASSIVE. See DEBT; TRUST.

PASSPORT (Fr. passer, to pass, port, harbor or gate). In Maritime Law. A paper containing a permission from a neutral state to the captain or master of a ship or vessel to proceed on the voyage proposed. It usually contains his name and residence, the name, property, description, tonnage, and destination of the ship, the nature and quantity of the cargo, the place from whence it comes, and its destination, with such other matters as the practice of the place requires.

It is also called a sea-brief, or sea-letter (q.v.). But Marshall distinguishes sea-letter from passport, which latter, he says, is pretended to protect the ship, while the former relates to the cargo, destination, etc. See Jacobs, Sea-Laws 66, note.

This document is indispensably necessary in time of war for the safety of every neutral vessel; Marsh. Ins. 317, 406 b.

A Mediterranean pass (q v.), or protection against the Barbary powers.

A document granted in time of war to protect persons or property from the general operation of hostilities. Wheat. Int. Law, 3d Eng. ed. § 408; 1 Kent 161; 6 Wheat. 3.

In most countries of continental Europe passports are given to travellers. These are intended to protect them on their journey from all molestation while they are obedient to the laws. The secretary of state may issue, or cause to be issued in foreign countries by such diplomatic or consular officers of the United States, and under such rules as the president may prescribe, passports, but only to citizens of the United States; R. S. §§ 4075–4076. See SAFE CONDUCT.

PASTURES. Lands upon which beasts feed themselves. By a grant of pastures the land itself passes. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 202.

PATENT. A grant of some privilege, property, or authority, made by the government or sovereign of a country to one or more individuals. Phillips, Pat. 1.

As the term was originally used in England, it signified certain written instruments emanating from the king and sealed with the great seal. These instruments conferred grants of lands, honors, or franchises; they were called letters patent, from being delivered open, and by way of contradistinction from instruments like the French lettres de cachet, which went out sealed.

In the United States, the word patent is sometimes understood to mean the title-deed by which a government, either state or federal, conveys its lands. But in its more usual acceptation it is understood as referring to those instruments by which the United States secures to inventors for a limited time the exclusive right to their own inventions.

The granting of exclusive privileges by means of letters patent was a power which for a long time was greatly abused by the sovereigns of England. The sole right of dealing in certain commodities was in that manner conferred upon particular individuals, either as a matter of royal favor or as a means of replenishing the royal treasury. These exclusive privileges, which were termed monopolies, became extremely odious, and, at an early date, met with the most determined resistance. One of the provisions of Magna Charta was intended to prevent the granting of monopolies of this character; and subsequent prohibitions and restrictions were enacted by parliament even under the most energetic and absolute of their monarchs. See Hallam, Const. Hist. 153, 205.

Still, the unregulated and despotic power of the crown, which reached its height in Elizabeth's reign, proved, in many instances, superior to the law, until the reign of James I., 1623, when an act was passed, known as the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jac. 1, ch. 3, which entirely prohibited all grants of that nature, and abolished existing monopolies. But the king was permitted to secure by letters patent to the inventor of any new manufacture, the sole right to make and vend the same for a term not exceeding fourteen years. Since that time the power of the monarch has been so far controlled by the law that the prohibition contained in the Statute of Monopolies has been fully observed, and under that statute has grown up the present system of British patent law, from which ours has to a great extent being derived. See Rob. Pat. §§ 1–8. See 12 Law Quart. Rev. 141, as to the earliest grants of privileges in England and the early history of patent law.

The constitution of the United States confers upon congress the power to pass laws "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;" U. S. Const. art. i. s. 6, cl. 8. This right can, accordingly, be conferred only upon the authors and inventors themselves; but it rests with congress to determine the length of time during which it shall continue. Congress at an early day availed itself of the power. The first act passed was that which established the patent office, on the 10th of April, 1790. There were several supplements and modifications to this law, namely, the acts passed February 7, 1793, June 7, 1794, April 17, 1800, July 3, 1832, July 13, 1832. These were all repealed, by an act passed July 4, 1836, and a new system was established. Subsequently other changes were made by the acts of March 3, 1837, March 3, 1839, August 29, 1842, May 27, 1848, March 3, 1849, February 18, 1861, March 2, 1861, July 16, 1862, March 3, 1863, June 25, 1864, and March 3, 1865. The act of July 8, 1870, repealed all existing acts. See acts of March 3, 1883 (patents to United States officers); Feb'y 4, 1887 (pirating patented designs); Feb'y 9, 1893 (act establishing court of appeals in D. C.); March 3, 1897 (various amendments); March 3, 1897 (jurisdiction over infringers).

Letters patent for inventions are granted for a term of seventeen years.

The present law does not furnish any guarantee of the validity of the title conferred upon the patentee. The patent is, nevertheless, prima facie evidence of its own validity; 1 Stor. 336; 14 Pet. 458; 2 Blatchf. 229; as also for a defendant as tending to show non-infringement, in some cases. See 15 How. 252.

The exclusive right of the patentee did not exist at common law; it is created by acts of congress; and no rights can be acquired unless authorized by the statute and in the manner it prescribes; 10 How. 494; 19 id. 195; 137 U. S. 41. The power granted by the patent is domestic in its character, and confined within the limits of the United States; consequently it does not extend to a foreign vessel lawfully entering one of our ports, where the patented improvement was placed upon her in a foreign port and authorized by the laws of the country to which she belongs; 19 How. 183.

Of the subject-matter of a patent. The act of July 8, 1870, sec. 24, provides for the granting of a patent to the first inventor or discoverer of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, not known or used by others in this country, and not patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof, and not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his application, unless the same is proved to have been abandoned. By act of March 3, 1897 (to go into effect January 1, 1898), amending this section, the patenting or publication of an invention in a foreign country, if more than two years before the application in this country bars a patent. There are four classes of inventions which may be the subjects of patents: first, an art; second, a machine; third, a manufacture; and, fourth, a composition of matter. In Great Britain, as we have seen, letters patent granting exclusive privileges can be issued only to the inventors of a "new manufacture." But the courts in defining the meaning of the term, have construed the word "manufacture" to be coextensive in signification with the whole of the four classes of inventions thus recognized by our law. An art or process, a machine, and a composition of matter are all regarded there as manufactures. The field of invention in Great Britain is, therefore, coincident with that provided by our law, and the legal subject-matter of patents is the same in each country; 2 B. & Ald. 349; 2 M. & W. 544. But, inasmuch as we have three other classes of inventions, the term "manufacture" has a more limited signification here than it receives in Great Britain. See infra.

A process is an art or method by which any particular result is produced. Where a result or effect is produced by chemical action, by the operation or application of some element or power of nature, or of one substance to another, such modes, methods, or operations are called processes. A new process is usually the result of discovery; a machine, of invention. The arts of tanning, dyeing, vulcanizing india-rubber, smelting ores, etc., are usually carried on by processes, as distinguished from machines. But the term process is often employed more vaguely in a secondary sense in which it cannot be the subject of a patent. Thus, we say that a board is undergoing the process of being planed, grain of being ground, iron of being hammered or rolled. Here the term is used subjectively or passively, as applied to the material operated on, and not to the method or mode of producing that operation, which is by mechanical means, or the use of a machine as distinguished from a process. In this use of the term it represents the function of a machine, or the effect produced by it on the material subjected to the action of the machine, and does not constitute a patentable subject-matter, because there cannot be a valid patent for the function or abstract effect of a machine, but only for the machine which produces it. 15 How. 267.

"A process is a mode of treatment of certain materials to produce a given result. It is an act, or series of acts, performed upon the subject-matter, to be transferred and reduced to a different state or thing. . . . In the language of the patent law, it is an 'art.' The machinery pointed out as suitable to perform the process may or may not be new or patentable; whilst the process itself may be entirely new, and produce an altogether new result. The process requires that certain things should be done with certain substances, and in a certain order; but the tools to be used in doing this may be of secondary consequence." 94 U. S. 788. The term process is not used in the patent statutes, but it has been uniformly held that there may be a patent for a process; 102 U. S. 727. A process may be new though the apparatus is old; 122 U. S. 413; 21 Fed. Rep. 811. The process by which an article is produced and the product are two different inventions; 7 Fed. Rep. 213. The new combination of old processes constitutes a new process; 13 Fed. Rep. 172; 7 E. & B. 725.

Letters patent for a process irrespective of the particular mode or form of apparatus for carrying it into effect are granted under the laws of the United States. Whoever discovers that a certain useful result will be produced in any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, by the use of certain means, is entitled to a patent for it, provided he specifies the means he uses in a manner so full and exact that any one skilled in the science to which it apper-tains can, by using the means he specifies, without any addition to or subtraction from them, produce precisely the result he discovers; 102 U. S. 727.

Processes of manufacture which involve chemical or other similarly elementary action are patentable, though mechanism may be necessary in carrying out the process, while those which consist solely in the operation of a machine are not, and where such mechanism is subsidiary to the chemical action, the fact that the patentee may be entitled to a patent upon the mechanism, does not impair his right to the patent for the process. A valid patent cannot be obtained for a process which involves nothing more than the operation of a piece of mechanism, that is to say, for the function of a machine; 158 U. S. 68.

To procure a patent for a process the inventor must describe his invention with sufficient clearness to enable those skilled in the matter to understand what the process is, and must point out some practiable way of putting it into operation; but he need not bring the art to the highest degree of perfection; 126 U. S. 1. It must first be reduced to practice; Rob. Pat. §. 171; 30 Fed. Rep. 63.

Where a patent clearly shows and describes the functions of a certain process, no other person can afterwards patent that process; 21 Fed. Rep. 580. Where the process is described with the method of operation of a machine, the machine alone is patentable; 32 Fed. Rep. 221; the product, unless itself new, is not patentable; id.

A machine is any contrivance which is used to regulate or modify the relations between force, motion, and weight.

"The term machine includes every mechanical device or combination of mechanical powers and devices to perform some function and produce a certain effect or result;" 15 How. 267; but when the effect is produced by chemical action, or by the application of some element or power of nature, or of one substance to another, such methods or operations are called processes; 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 175.

A machine is an instrument composed of one or more of the mechanical powers, and capable, when set in motion, of producing, by its own operation, certain predetermined physical effects. Rob. Pat. § 173. A machine differs from an art in that the act or series of acts which constitute the art become, in the machine, inseparably connected with a specific physical feature. The art is the primary conception, the machine the secondary. A machine differs from all other mechanical instruments in that its rule of action resides within itself. The structural law of a machine is its one enduring and essential characteristic. Rob. Pat. §. 175; 1 Fish. 44. See 23 O. G. 1827.

What are sometimes called the simple machines are six in number: the lever, the pulley, the wheel and axle, the wedge, the screw, and the inclined plane. These are sometimes known as the mechanical powers, though neither these nor any other machinery can ever constitute or create power; they can only control, direct, and render it useful.

Machines, as generally seen and understood, are compounded of these simple machines in some of their shapes and modification. Such a combination as, when in operation, will produce some specific final result, is regarded as an entire machine. It is so treated in the patent law; for although a new machine, or a new improvement of a machine, is an invention, and although only one invention can be included in a single patent, still several different contrivances, each of which is in one sense a machine, may all be separately claimed in a single patent, provided they all contribute to improve or to constitute one machine, and are intended to produce a single ultimate result; and a new combination of machines is patentable whether the machines themselves be new or old; 3 Wash. C. C. 69; 1 Sto. 273, 568; 3 Wheat. 454; 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 600.

Inventions pertaining to machines may be divided into four classes: 1. Where the invention embraces the entire machine; 2. Where it embraces one or more of the elements of the machine only, as the coulter of a plough; 3. Where the invention embraces both a new element and a new combination of elements previously used and well known; 4. Where all the elements of the machine are old and the invention consists in a new combination. Almost all of the modern machines are of the fourth class; 3 Cliff. 639.

The combination of two existing machines is patentable; 18 Pa. 465.

It has been said that a machine becomes entitled to protection by a patent only when embodied in an operative instrument. The expression of the idea in language, drawings, or a model, does not fulfil the legal requirements. It must be constructed of sufficient size, etc., to accomplish its purpose; Rob. Pat. § 180. But this is probably not a correct statement.

A manufacture is a term which is used to denote whatever is made directly by the hand of man, or indirectly through the instrumentality of any machinery which is controlled by human power. A commodity may be regarded as being in itself a manufacture, or as being produced by manufacture.

The term is used in its widest sense in the patent law of Great Britain. See supra. It has been defined there to be "anything made by the hand of man." 8 Term 99.

A manufacture is an instrument created by the exercise of mechanical forces and designed for the production of mechanical effects, but not capable, when set in motion, of attaining, by its own operation, to any predetermined results. It receives its rule of action from the external source which furnishes its motive power. A manufacture requires the constant guidance and control of some separate intelligent agent; a machine operates under the direction of that intelligence with which it was endowed by its inventor when he imposed on it its structural law. The parts of a machine, considered separately from the machine itself, all kinds of tools and fabrics, and every other vendible substance, which is neither a complete machine nor produced by the mere union of ingredients, is included under the title "manufacture"; Rob. Pat. § 182. An article of ornament may be a manufacture; 20 Blatch. 413; and a bond and coupon register in the form of a book; 3 Fed. Rep. 338; and a wooden pavement; 2 Webst. 126. The parts of a machine are not patentable upon the ground that it makes a known article more perfectly than it has been made before; 11 Blatch. 215. A manufacture, if new in itself, may be patentable whether the process or apparatus by which it is produced be new or not; 6 Holmes 208. A manufacture may be an invention distinct from the mode of producing it; 21 Blatch. 226. Making an article by a new process or apparatus is not making a new manufacture; 8 Fed. Rep. 710; a new process producing a new manufacture may involve two separate inventive acts; 7 Fed. Rep. 213. A new form of an old article may be a new manufacture; 25 O. G. 601; but to perceive a hitherto unknown quality in an existing substance is not the invention of a new substance; 32 Fed. Rep. 81. Although a new process for producing an article is patentable, the product itself cannot be patented, if it is old; 111 U. S. 293.

Invention, what constitutes. The general rule is that, wherever invention has been exercised, there will be found the subject-matter of a patent; 1 McAll. 48; 5 Blatch. 46.

An invention differs from a discovery, inasmuch as this latter term is used to signify the finding out of something that existed before. Thus, we speak of the discovery of the properties of steam, or of electricity; but the first contrivance of any machinery by which those discoveries were applied to practical use was an invention: the former always existed, though not before known; the latter did not previously exist.

Although the word "discovery" is used in our statute as entitling the discoverer to a patent, still, every discovery is not a patentable invention. The discoverer of a mere philosophical principle, or abstract theory, or elementary truth of science, cannot obtain a patent for the same, unless he applies it to some directly useful purpose. The patent can only be for such a principle, theory, or truth reduced to practice and embodied in a particular structure or combination of parts; 1 Sto. 285; 1 Mas. 187; 140 U. S. 481; nor can there be a patent for a function or for an effect only, but for an effect produced in a given manner or by given means; 1 Holmes 20; 2 Fish. 229; or by a particular operation; 1 Mas. 476; 1 Sto. 270; 1 Pet. C. C. 394; 15 How. 62; 4 Fish. 468; but a patent covers the means employed to effect results; 151 U. S. 186. While the end or purpose sought to be accomplished by the device is not the subject of a patent, the device or mechanical means by which the desired result is to be secured, is; 150 U. S. 221. An idea is not patentable; a patent is valid only for the practical application of an idea; 3 Blatch. 535; 20 Wall. 498. A principle denotes the physical force employed by an invention. It is some natural power or energy which operates with uniformity under given circumstances, and may thus be contemplated as obedient to law. It is a necessary factor in every means which produce physical effects, whether such means be natural or artificial; Rob. Pat. § 135.

To be entitled to a patent, a person must have invented and discovered some new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or some new and useful improvement thereof; and it is not enough that a thing is new, in the sense that in the shape or form in which it is produced, it has not been known, and that it is useful, but it must amount to an invention or discovery; 133 U. S. 349; 132 id. 693.

An invention, to be patentable, must not only be new, but must also be useful. But by this it is not meant that it must be more useful than anything of the kind previously known, but that it is capable of use for a beneficial purpose. The word "useful" is also to be understood in contradistinction to "pernicious," or "frivolous." A contrivance directly and mainly calculated to aid the counterfeiter, the pickpocket, or the assassin, or which would in any way be directly calculated to be injurious to the morals, the health, or the good order of society, would not be patentable. Neither would a new contrivance which was of too trivial a character to be worthy of serious consideration; 1 Paine 203; 1 Blatch. 372, 488; 13 N. H. 311; 5 Fish. 396; 1 Biss. 362; 3 Fish. 218, 536.

The patent itself is prima facie evidence of utility; 9 Blatch. 77; s. c. 5 Fish. 48; 1 Bond 212; and its use by the defendant and others is evidence of utility; 1 Holmes 340.

In the trial of an action for infringement, evidence of the comparative utility of the plaintiff's machine and the defendant's is inadmissible, except for the purpose of showing a substantial difference between the two machines; 1 Stor. 336.

A mere application of an old device or process to the manufacture of an article is held to constitute only a "double use," and not to be patentable. There must be some new process or machinery used to produce the effect; 2 Sto. 190, 408; 2 Curt. 340; 12 Blatch. 101; 91 U. S. 37, 150. See 134 U. S. 388; 135 id. 227; 138 id. 124; 147 id. 623; 148 id. 547. A combination of old elements does not constitute a patentable invention, where they are all found, some in one and some in another of earlier devices for the same purpose, in which each element performs the same function that it has in the new combination; 137 U. S. 423; 150 id. 221; 133 id. 349.

A mere carrying forward of the original thought, a change only in form, proportions, or degree, doing the same thing in the same way, by substantially the same means, with better results, is not such an invention as will sustain a patent; 152 U. S, 100; 148 id. 547; 144 id. 11; 138 id. 124; 137 id. 423; 133 id. 349; and something more is required to support one than a slight advance over what has preceded it, or mere superiority in workmanship or finish; 140 U. S. 55.

Inventive skill has been defined as "that intuitive faculty of the mind put forth in the search for new results, or new methods, creating what had not before existed, or bringing to light what lay hidden from vision; it differs from a "suggestion of that common experience which arose spontaneously and by a necessity of human reasoning in the minds of those who had become acquainted with the circumstances with which they had to deal." 113 U. S. 72.

"Not every improvement is invention; but to entitle a thing to protection it must be the product of some exercise of the inventive faculties, and it must involve something more than what is obvious to persons skilled in the art to which it relates." 22 Fed. Rep. 841.

"An invention, in the sense of the patent law, means the finding out—the contriving, the creating of something which did not exist, and was not known before, and which can be made useful and advantageous in the pursuits of life, or which can add to the enjoyment of mankind." 4 Fish. 12.

"It was never the object of those [patent] laws to grant a monopoly for every trifling device, every shadow of a shade of an idea, which would naturally and spontaneously occur to any skilled mechanic or operator in the ordinary progress of manufactures." 107 U. S. 200, Bradley, J.

"The law gives no monopoly to industry, to wise judgment, or to mere mechanical skill in the use of known means, nor to the product of either if it be not new. . . . It is invention of what is new, and not comparative superiority or greater excellence in what was before known, which the law protects as exclusive property, and it is that alone which is secured by patent." 1 O. G. 331.

"Originality is the test of invention. If that is successfully exercised, its product is protected; and it is immaterial whether it is displayed in a greater or less degree, or whether the new idea revealed itself to the inventor by a sudden flash of thought or dawned on his mind after groping his way through many and dubious experiments." 6 Blatch. 195. Whenever a change or device is new, and accomplishes beneficial results, courts look with favor upon it. The law, in such cases, has no nice standard by which to gauge the degree of mental power or inventive genius brought into play in originating the new device. A lucky casual thought, involving a comparatively trifling change, often produces decided and useful results, and, though the result of a small amount of inventive skill, the law extends to it the same protection as if it were the product of a lifetime of profound thought and most ingenious experiment; 3 Fish. 141. The patentee must be an inventor and he must have made a discovery. It is not enough that a thing shall be new and that it shall be useful, but it must amount to an invention or discovery; 114 U. S. 11.

The unsuccessful effort of others in the same art, to accomplish the same result, indicates that the means by which the patentee has produced it are the result of inventive skill; 28 Fed. Rep. 195; 29 id. 248. In The Barbed Wire Patent, 143 U. S. 275, it appeared that the sales of the earlier article had been but tentative and slight, and those of the patented article enormous. In sustaining the patent in suit, Brown, J., said: "Under such circumstances courts have not been reluctant to sustain a patent to the man who has taken the final step which has turned a failure into a success. In the law of patents it is the last step that wins. . . . It may be laid down as a general rule, though perhaps not an invariable one, that if a new combination and arrangement of known elements produces a new and beneficial result, never attained before, it is evidence of invention."

The degree of invention is not prescribed by the statute; 69 Fed. Rep. 958; nor is it material; 4 Fed. Rep. 900; each case must stand on its own facts, but if the patented structure is at the head of the evolution in its particular art and is a marked improvement on what preceded it, the court should surely be predisposed in its favor; 70 Fed. Rep. 1006. Courts give a liberal construction to the law, so as to protect every contrivance which can be called new, and which proves at all useful. The inventor, therefore, has the benefit of the doubt. But it is obvious that there is a limit beyond which mere changes cannot and ought not to receive this protection; 3 Fish. 265.

Where the question of patentable novelty in a device was by no means free from doubt, the court, in view of the extensive use to which the patent had been put by manufacturers of wagons, resolved the doubt in favor of the patentee and sustained the patent; 145 U. S. 156. While the utility of a contrivance, as shown by the general public demand for it when made known, is not conclusive evidence of novelty and invention, it is nevertheless highly persuasive in that direction, and in the absence of pretty conclusive evidence to the contrary, will generally exercise controlling influence; 27 Fed. Rep. 560; see 4 id. 900; 36 id. 183; in case of doubt it will turn the scale; 148 U. S. 556; it is better evidence of invention than the opinion of an expert or the intuition of a judge; 34 Fed. Rep. 336; but not where public acceptance is the plain result of successful business methods in creating a market for the article. And not when the popularity is not due to any patentable feature. The fact that a patented device went into immediate use, and supplanted all others, cannot be attributed to artful advertising, in the case of an article such as an electric heater for railway cars, which is sold, not to the public, but to mechanicians of skill in their art; 82 Fed. Rep. 993. But extensive use has been said to be an unsafe criterion of patentability; 141 U. S. 419. When, in a class of machines widely used, it appears that at last, after repeated and futile attempts, a machine has been contrived which accomplishes the result desired, and when a patent has been granted to the successful inventor, the courts should not be ready to adopt a narrow or astute construction, fatal to the grant; 151 U. S. 139.

Simplicity in the device is itself a merit; 2 Webst. Pat. Cas. 113. Mere suggestions from others do not negative the existence of patentable invention, unless they cover the entire invention; 5 Ct. of Cl. 1. The suggestion by others of a part of a device does not show the absence of inventive skill as to the whole; 11 Fed. Rep. 505. Where inventive skill was necessary in addition to suggestions of others, the inventor is entitled to a patent; 15 Blatch. 160; 1 Sto. 336; 15 How. 62. To suggest that a certain result may be obtained, but without indicating how, is not an invention; 7 Biss. 490. Mere experiment is not invention; 1 Fish. 17.

The simplicity of a device and its apparent obviousness after the event, ought not to detract from its meritoriousness. That it had never been suggested or thought of before, and effectually supplied the one thing necessary to bring success, when before there had been nothing but failure, is sufficient within the meaning of the patent law; 61 Fed. Rep. 102. "The apparent simplicity of a new device often leads an inexperienced person to think that it would have occurred to any one familiar with the subject; but the decisive answer is that with dozens and perhaps hundreds of others laboring in the same field, it had never occurred to any one before. The practised eye of an ordinary mechanic may be safely trusted to see what ought to be apparent to every one." 155 U. S. 597.

A "double use" may involve invention if the second use is an art remote from the former use; otherwise, if the new use is such that it would occur to a person of ordinary mechanical skill; much depends upon the nature of the changes required to adapt the device to its new use; id.

Study, effort, and experiment are not alone enough to constitute inventive skill; 27 Fed. Rep. 219. Nor is the exercise of good judgment; 109 U. S. 633. Nor the exercise of the reasoning process; 23 Fed. Rep. 443. Inventive skill requires thought, while mechanical skill does not; 24 Blatch. 163. Small discoveries may involve inventive skill; 27 Fed. Rep. 656.

The exercise of mechanical skill must be considered as it existed at the date of the invention; 31 Fed. Rep. 224.

It is said by an able writer: These two requirements of novelty and utility are clearly susceptible of proof by evidence; and it is deducible from the earlier decisions and those which have followed in the same line, that a change which involves those requirements is an invention within the meaning of the patent law with certain well defined exceptions. The exceptions are that a change, even when new and useful, does not amount to invention when it is a mere change of form, or in size, or degree, or in proportions, or of material, or of location, or of arrangement. A mere application of an old thing to a new purpose or a double use of an old thing is an exception. Also a mere application of an old thing to perform its usual functions with its usual mode of operation, or movement. A mere substitution of one old device for another, or a duplication of old devices, or a change of direction of movement of a moving device, or discovery of a new property of matter are exceptions. But there are changes in each of the above respects which are not mere changes, but are substanstial, and amount to invention when the changes are new and useful; Renwick, Pat. Inv. 4.

The doctrine of equivalents is treated under novelty as a part of Patentable Invention; Rob. Pat. § 245. It is there said that equivalent "signifies the interchangeability of agencies which are known in the arts to be capable of serving the same purpose as integral parts of some particular invention. It must be capable of performing the same office in the invention as the act or substance whose place it supplies; it must relate to the form of embodiment alone and not affect in any degree the idea of means; and it must have been known in the arts at the date of the patent, as endowed with this capability, or have subsequently become so known without the further exercise of inventive skill." Id. § 246. See 27 Fed. Rep. 691; 15 Wall. 187; 3 Bann. & Ard. 598.

A mechanical equivalent exists where one device may be adopted instead of another by a person skilled in the art, from his knowledge of the art; 1 Fish. 351. Equivalents have been said to be "obvious and customary" interchanges; 1 Fish. 64. It is a question of fact depending on the opinion of experts and on an inspection of the machine; 2 Fish. 31. It is a question of use, not of name; 5 Fish. 1. Equivalents may differ in shape; 11 Fed. Rep. 148; a substitute in a combination does not cease to be an equivalent because, in addition, it does something more and better; 3 B. & Ard. 161. Only those things can be considered equivalents for the elements of a manufacture which perform the same function in substantially the same way; 102 U. S. 222. Where no inventive skill is shown in the substitute, it is an equivalent; 103 U. S. 797; 96 id. 549.

Successive patents. "No patent can issue for an invention actually covered by a former patent, especially to the same patentee, although the terms of the claims may differ. The second patent, in such case, although containing a claim broader and more generic in its character than the specific claims contained in the prior patent, is also void. But where the second patent covers matters described in the prior patent, essentially distinct and separable, and distinct from the invention covered thereby, and claims made thereunder, its validity may be sustained." 151 U. S. 186. See also 69 Fed. Rep. 257; 83 id. 1014.

An improvement is an addition to or alteration in some existing means, which increases its efficiency without destroying its identity. It includes two necessary ideas: the idea of a complete and practical operative art or instrument and the idea of some change in such art or instrument not affecting its essential character but enabling it to produce its appropriate results in a more perfect or economical manner; Rob. Pat. § 210.

No patent can be granted in the United States for the mere importation of an invention brought from abroad; although it is otherwise in England. The constitution, as we have seen, only authorizes congress to grant these exclusive privileges to the inventors themselves. The mere fact of an inventor having obtained a patent for a device in a foreign country will not prevent his obtaining a patent for the same thing here, provided he applies for a patent here within seven months from the date of the foreign patent (Act of March 3, 1897). When the foreign patent issues before the United States patent issues, the latter expires at the same time as the former, or, if there be more than one, with the former patent having the shortest term; but in no case will the term exceed seventeen years; 157 U. S. 1.

Of caveats. See CAVEAT.

The caveator can prevent the grant of any interfering patent, on any application filed within one year from the day when the caveat was lodged in the patent office, without his being notified of the application and having an opportunity of contesting the priority of invention of the applicant, by means of an "interference," which will be treated of hereafter. In this way an inventor can obtain a year to perfect his invention, without the risk of having the patent to which he believes he is entitled granted to another in the mean time.

Upon application within one year by any other person for a patent covering the same invention, it is the duty of the commissioner of patents to give notice of such application to the person filing the caveat, who shall within three months file his description, etc. The caveat is filed in the secret archives of the office. See 1 Bond 212; 4 Blatch. 362. A caveat is evidence of the date of the invention, but it does not necessarily show that the invention was then completed. It is not assignable. The caveator is not concluded by his description of the invention, but may proceed with his experiments; Rob. Pat. § 438 et seq.

Of the application for a patent. When the invention is complete, and the inventor desires to apply for a patent, he causes a specification to be prepared, setting forth in clear and intelligible terms the exact nature of his invention, describing its different parts and the principle and mode in which they operate, and stating precisely what he claims as new, in contradistinction from those parts and combinations which were previously in use. This should be accompanied by a petition to the commissioner of patents, stating the general nature of his invention and the object of his application. One copy of drawings should be attached to the specification, where the nature of the case admits of drawings; and, where the invention is for a composition of matter, specimens of the ingredients and of the composition of matter should be furnished. The specification, as well as the drawings, must be signed by the applicant and attested by two witnesses; the drawings may be signed by an attorney in fact; and appended to the specification must be an affidavit of the applicant (or in case of his death, of his personal representatives), stating that he verily believes himself to be the original and first inventor of that for which he asks a patent, and that he does not know and does not believe that the same was ever before known or used, and, also, of what country he is a citizen. It may be sworn to before any person in the United States authorized to administer oaths, and, in foreign countries, before certain officials designated in the act. The whole is then filed in the patent office.

A substituted specification covering a different invention fixes the date of the application; 27 Fed. Rep. 450.

Of the examination. As has been already observed. the act provides for an examination whenever an application is completed in the prescribed manner. And if on such examination it appears that the claim of the applicant is invalid and would not be sustained by the courts, the application is rejected.

As a general rule, an invention is considered patentable whenever the applicant is shown to be the original and first inventor; and his own affidavit appended to the application is sufficient to raise a presumption that he is the first inventor, until the contrary is shown. But if it is ascertained by the office that the same thing had been invented by any other person in this country, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, prior to its invention by the applicant, a patent will be denied him. But a mere prior invention of the same thing in a foreign country, if not patented or described in some printed publication, will not affect his right to a patent here. Under the act of March 3, 1897 (taking effect Jan. 1, 1898), the patenting or publication of an invention in any foreign country, for more than two years before the application in this country, or its patenting in a foreign country by the applicant for more than seven months before his application, bars a patent here.

The rule that the applicant is entitled to a patent whenever he is shown to be the original and first inventor is subject to one important exception. If he has, either actually or constructively, abandoned his invention to the public, he can never afterwards recall it and resume his right of ownership.

Abandonment may be by conduct from which an intention to abandon will be inferred, or by public use or sale. In the former class, it may be before the application; by the application; or after application. Abandonment before application may be shown by any conduct from which can be inferred an intention to give the invention to the public; as, by throwing it aside and not using it; disclaiming any right in it, or giving it expressly to the public; and by public use of the device for even less than two years, taken in connection with circumstances tending to show that the inventor did not intend to secure a monopoly; Rob. Pat. § 349. It is a question of intention; 2 Blatch. 240; and of fact; 10 id. 140.

An applicant, either by express words in his specification, or by a failure to claim all of his invention or by unreasonable delay in applying for a revision, may abandon the whole or a part of his invention; and after application he can abandon his invention by withdrawing his application.

Public use or sale of the invention for more than two years before the application works an abandonment; 123 U. S. 267; 26 Fed. Rep. 262; this is a conclusive presumption; 9 Blatch. 185; and a single use is enough; 104 U. S. 333. But this rule does not apply to a strictly experimental use; 22 Fed. Rep. 780; 19 Fed. Rep. 735; 12 id. 731; no matter how long it had continued; 97 U. S. 126. A mere temporary use by a few persons as an act of kindness, for a limited period, or a use where the party using it is bound to secrecy, or is actually under the control of the inventor, or a use by the inventor in private is not within the rule; 1 Sto. 273. See 1 Fish. 1. Such public use, with or without the consent of the subsequent patentee, renders the patent invalid; 123 U. S. 267.

The sale which works an abandonment in this connection must be a sale in the usual course of business; 2 Fed. Rep. 78; and of the completed invention; id.; and merely placing the device on sale is not sufficient; 14 Fed. Rep. 919. A sale on trial, to test the invention, is not an abandonment, even though warranted; 11 Fed. Rep. 859.

Use by the inventor for the purpose of testing the machine, in order to devise means for perfecting its operation, is admissible where, as incident to such use, the product of its operation is disposed of by sale; such use does not change its character; but where the use is mainly for the purposes of trade and profit and the experiment is merely incidental to that, the principle, and not the incident, must give character to the use. The thing implied as excepted out of the prohibition may be characterized as substantially the purpose of experiment; 123 U. S. 249.

Where an invention was complete and capable of producing the result sought to be accomplished, and the construction and mode of operation and use of the mechanism were necessarily known to the workmen who put it into safes, which were the articles in question, where it was hidden from view after the safes were completed and no attempt was made to expose the mechanism and thus prove whether or not it was efficient, it was held that it was not an experimental use; 107 U. S. 90. If an inventor, after having made his device, gives or sells it to another to be used by the donee or vendee without limitation or restriction or injunction of secrecy, and it is so used, such use is public even though confined to one person; 104 U. S. 333. Where the inventor of a connecting tie for rails used the device in constructing a cable road and reserved no future control over it, and had no expectation of making any material changes in it, and never examined it to see whether it was defective or could be improved, it was held that it was a public use so as to defeat the patent; 146 U. S. 210. But where the inventor of a wooden pavement himself constructed an experimental pavement which was used for six years before the patent was applied for, and it appeared that he built it at his own expense and went to see the effect of traffic upon it and its durability, and examined it almost daily, it was held that this was an experimental use; 97 U. S. 126. Where the invention is a machine, such as a grist mill, its experimental use does not cease to be so because its products have been sold. But if the inventor allows his machine to be used by other persons generally, with or without compensation, or if it by his consent put on sale for such use, then it will be in public use and on public sale, within the act; 146 U. S. 223. Where there is no evidence of use or sale of the invention, which was a method of driven wells, by the applicant before his application, or by others with his consent, except putting down a single well, it was held that the use was merely experimental; 122 U. S. 71.

The abandonment extends only to the exact invention publicly used or sold; 2 Fed. Rep. 78.

An inventor whose application for a patent has been rejected by the patent office and withdrawn by him, and who, without substantial reason or excuse, omits for eight years to reinstate or renew it, during which time many patents embodying the substance of the invention are granted to other persons, must be held to have abandoned the invention; 118 U. S. 22.

A delay of 13 years in the patent office, was held, under the circumstances, not to invalidate a patent; 167 U. S. 225.

By the act of March 3, 1897, it is provided that the failure to apply for a patent in this country for more than seven months after the inventor's application in a foreign country, bars the patent. And, by the same act, a failure to complete an application and prepare it for examination within one year after its filing, and a failure to prosecute the same within one year after action in the office, of which notice shall have been given, works an abandonment, unless the commissioner be satisfied that the delay was unavoidable; but these provisions do not apply to patents granted or applications filed prior to January 1, 1898.

If the application or any claim is rejected, the specification or the claim may be amended and a second examination requested. If again rejected, an appeal may be taken to the examiners-in-chief. If rejected by them, an appeal lies to the commissioner; and if rejected by him, an appeal may be taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, upon notice to the commissioner, and filing the reasons of appeal in writing. If all this proves ineffectual, the applicant may still file a bill in equity in the circuit court to compel the allowance of his patent.

All the proceedings before the patent office connected with the application for a patent are ex parte, and are kept secret, except in cases of conflicting claims, which will be referred to below.

Of the date of the patent. The patent usually takes date on the day it issues; every patent shall bear date as of a day not later than six months from its allowance and notice to the applicant.

The date of the application and not the date of the patent, controls in determining the legal effect to be given to two patents issued at different dates to the same inventor, and the order in which they are to be considered; 143 U. S. 275.

The conception of an invention consists in the complete performance of the mental part of the inventive act. While this in theory necessarily precedes the physical reduction to practice, it in fact also embraces whatever of thought and skill the inventor may have exercised in bringing the invention to that point where reduction to practice can begin; Rob. Pat. § 376; and the date of the conception is the date when the idea of means, including all the essential attributes of the invention, becomes so clearly defined in the mind of the inventor as to be capable of exterior expression; Rob. Pat. § 80. The true date of invention is at the point where the work of the inventor ceases and the work of the mechanic begins; 18 O. G. 520.

Whoever first perfects a machine and makes it capable of useful operation is entitled to a patent; an imperfect and incomplete invention resting in theory or intellectual motion and uncertain experiments, not actually reduced to practice and embodied in some machine, etc., is not patentable; 2 Cliff. 224.

The one who first conceives the invention, and is diligent to reduce it to practice is entitled to a patent in preference to one who conceives it subsequently, although the latter may have been the first to render the invention available for public use; Rob. Pat. § 383. See 1 Sto. 590.

Of interferences. When an application is filed which interferes with another pending application or with an unexpired patent, an investigation is ordered for the purpose of determining who was the prior inventor, and a patent is directed to be issued or not accordingly. When the controversy is between two applications a patent will be finally granted to him who is shown to be the first inventor, and will be denied to the other applicant so far as the point thus controverted is concerned. But if the interference is between an application and an actual patent, as there is no power in the patent office to cancel the existing patent, all that can be done is to grant or withhold from the applicant the patent he asks. If the patent is granted to him there will be two patents for the same thing. The two parties will stand upon a footing of equality, and must settle their rights by a resort to the courts.

The parties to an interference are required to put their claims into proper shape, and the question of the patentability of the device for which the application is filed is then determined by the examiner. The issues are then defined by the examiner and the parties notified. Each party is then required to file a concise written statement under oath of the date of the conception of his invention, its reduction to practice, etc. If a party to an interference fail to file such a statement, he cannot show an earlier date for his invention than the date of his application. The averments of fact in the preliminary statement are conclusive upon the party who files it. If, in an interference between two applications, the date fixed in the preliminary statement is not earlier than the date of filing the previous application, the priority is awarded to the earliest application. Testimony is taken in contested cases and the question of priority passed upon. An appeal lies to the Examiners-in-Chief and from them to the Commissioner. Priority of inventive act consists in the prior conception of the idea of means and the prior embodiment of this idea in some practically operative art or instrument, or reasonable diligence in perfecting such embodiment, and must be established by a clear preponderance of evidence; Rob. Pat. § 600. Conception of the invention may be shown by verbal descriptions, sketches, models, etc., but these have little weight in proving a reduction to practice. The testimony cannot carry the date of conception back of the statement filed. An applicant can terminate interference proceedings by disclaiming the matter in contest, whereupon judgment goes against him on the interference. A judgment in an interference has been held to be binding only on the parties to the record, and only in respect of further proceedings on the same question in the patent office, and not on the courts on the question of novelty or priority; 1 Bann. & A. 394; though the courts will consider it on a motion for a preliminary injunction against the defeated party; 24 Fed. Rep. 275; but the supreme court has recently held that where the question decided in the patent office is one between contesting parties as to priority of invention, the decision there must be accepted as controlling upon that question of fact in any subsequent suit between the same parties, unless the contrary is established by testimony, which in character and amount carries thorough conviction; 153 U. S. 125. The opinion of the patent office on claims or earlier patents do not affect the applicant, except so far as they lead him to abandon or modify some of his claims; 84 Fed. Rep. 659.

The question of interference is determined by the claims and not by the general appearance and functions of the machine shown, but not claimed; 56 Fed. Rep. 714.

An appeal lies from the Commissioner of Patents in an interference case to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia; Act of Feb. 9, 1893.

Whenever there are interfering patents, any person interested in any one of such patents may have relief against the interfering patent by suit in equity against its owners; the court may thereupon adjudge either patent void in whole or in part, etc., but such judgment shall affect none but parties to the suit and those deriving title under them subsequently to the judgment.

Of the specification. The specification is required to describe the invention in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it relates, to make, construct, or use it. In the trial of an action for infringement, it is a question of fact for the jury whether this requirement has been complied with. See 2 Brock. 298; 1 Mas. 182; 2 Sto. 432; 1 W. & M. 53. At the same time, the interpretation of the specification, and the ascertainment of the subject-matter of the invention from the language of the specification and claims and from the drawings are a matter of law exclusively for the court; 5 How. 1; 3 McLean 250, 432; 2 Fish. 62; 4 Blatch. 61; 1 Fish. 44, 289, 351. The specification will be liberally construed by the court, in order to sustain the invention; 1 Sumn. 482; 1 Sto. 270; 5 Fish. 153; 2 Bond 189; 15 How. 341; 4 Blatch. 238; 1 Wall. 491; but it must, nevertheless, identify with reasonable clearness and accuracy the invention claimed, and describe the manner of its construction and use so that the public from the specification alone may be enabled to practise it; and if the court cannot satisfactorily ascertain the meaning of the patent from its face, it will be void for ambiguity; 2 Blatch. 1; 2 Brock. 303; 1 Sumn. 482; 1 Mas. 182, 447. It will be construed in view of the state of the art; 2 Fish. 477; 14 Blatch. 79; 1 Biss. 87; 124 U. S. 1; 133 id. 349. A specification in letters patent is sufficiently clear and descriptive, when expressed in terms intelligible to a person skilled in the art to which it relates; 152 id. 561.

It is required to distinguish between what is new and what is old, and not mix them together without disclosing distinctly that for which the patent is granted; 1 Sto. 273, 475; 1 Sumn. 482; 3 Wheat. 534. If the invention consists of an improvement, the patent should be confined thereto, and should clearly distinguish the improvement from the prior device, so as to show that the former only is claimed; 1 Gall. 438, 478; 1 Mas. 447; 3 McLean 250. Ambiguous terms should be avoided; nothing material to the use of the invention should be omitted; and the necessity of trials and experiments should not be thrown upon the public.

Of the claim. The claim is the statutory requirement prescribed for the purpose of making a patentee define what the invention is. It is to be read in the light of the description contained in the specification, and its literal terms may be enlarged or narrowed accordingly, but not to an extent inconsistent with their meaning; 38 U. S. App. 55. If an invention is not covered by the claim, it will not be protected by the patent; 148 U. S. 54. A mere reference in a claim to a letter on the drawing does not in itself limit the claim to the precise geometrical shape shown in the drawing; 20 U. S. App. 14.

The claim is the measure of a patentee's right to relief; and while the specification may be referred to, to limit the claim, it can never be made available to expand it; 141 U. S. 419.

The inventor need not describe all the functions to be performed by his machine if they are evident in its practical operation; 37 U. S. Ap. 239.

The terms of the claims are carefully scrutinized in the patent office. It defines and determines what the applicant is entitled to. The scope of the patent should be limited to the invention covered by the claim; although the claim may be illustrated, it cannot be enlarged by the language used in other parts of the specification; 104 U. S. 112. The whole patent, including specifications and drawings, is to be taken into consideration, though the court looks to them only for the purpose of placing a proper construction upon the claims; 2 Fish. 10. The scope of the patent is given by the claims; 117 U. S. 555; though it be less than the real invention; 9 Blatch. 77; parts which may be indispensable to the invention are not covered by the patent unless mentioned in the claims; 1 Fed. Rep. 722; and where a feature is inserted in the claims which is not essential, its materiality cannot be afterwards denied; 13 Fed. Rep. 86. The patentee, in a suit brought on his patent, is bound by his claims; 95 U. S. 274; 9 Blatch. 363; the court will not enlarge the claims by the specification; 117 U. S. 554. Words in a claim such as "substantially as described" refer back to the descriptive parts of the specification and are implied in a claim whether inserted or not; 19 Wall. 287; they relate only to the material features of the invention; 9 Blatch. 77. See 86 Fed. Rep. 315. "Substantially as set forth" are technical words and are equivalent to saying "by the means described in the text of the inventor's application for letters patent as illustrated by the drawings, diagrams, and model which accompany the application;" 25 U. S. App. 475.

A patentee cannot hold under his patent anything excluded therefrom by him or with his acquiescence during the stages of his application therefor; 28 U. S. App. 525.

Where one originates a generic invention and also several specific inventions and presents the same for patent contemporaneously, he cannot enlarge each invention by use of general terms so as to obtain overlapping patents; 1 U. S. App. 320. An inventor is required to explain the principle of his machine and the best mode of applying the principle, so as to distinguish it from other inventions; but he is not necessarily limited to the one mode shown. A pioneer inventor is entitled to a generic claim, which will include every species within the genus, and may also insert in the same application specific claims for one or more of the species; 80 Fed. Rep. 121.

A claim must be interpreted with reference to the rejected claims and to the prior state of the art, and cannot be so construed as to cover either what was rejected by the patent office or disclosed by prior devices; 150 U. S. 221.

A claim for a function is bad; 4 Fed. Rep. 635; though it will, if possible, be construed as a claim for means of performing the function; 28 Fed. Rep. 850; thus a claim for doing an act is treated as a claim for the means of doing it; 94 U. S. 288.

While the law does not limit the number of claims, their multiplication is disapproved; 21 Fed. Rep. 816.

A drawing must be filed whenever the nature of the invention permits; 16 O. G. 809; a model is not required until called for by the patent office.

Of re-issues. It often happens that errors, defects, and mistakes occur in the specification of a patent, by which it is rendered wholly or partially inoperative, or perhaps invalid. Sec. 53 of the act of 1870 provides that when such errors or defects are the result of inadvertence, accident, or mistake, without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the patent may be surrendered by the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and a new patent issued in proper shape to secure the real invention intended to have been patented originally. Rob. Pat. § 658. The identity between the invention described in the re-issue and that in the original patent is a question of fact for the jury; 4 How. 380; 27 Pa. 517; 1 Wall. 531. A patentee cannot secure in a re-issue claims covering what has been previously rejected upon his original application; 150 U. S. 38.

A re-issued patent has the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions for causes subsequently arising, as though the patent had been originally issued in such corrected form. From this it appears that after a re-issue no action can be brought for a past infringement of the patent. But, as the bare use of a patented machine is (if unauthorized) an infringement of the rights of the patentee, a machine constructed and lawfully used prior to the re-issue may be an infringement of the patent if used afterwards. The re-issued patent will expire when the original patent would have expired.

All matters of fact relating to a re-issue are finally settled by the decision of the commissioner, granting the re-issue; but it may be shown that the commissioner has exceeded his authority in granting a re-issue for an invention different from the one embraced in the original patent; 11 Wall. 516; 9 id. 796; 8 Blatch. 513. See 123 U. S. 87. Where a re-issue is sought on the ground of inadvertent errors, rendering the patent inoperative, the decision of the commissioner upon the questions of fact relating to inoperativeness and inadvertence will not be re-examined by the courts; 82 Fed. Rep. 916.

Where the only mistake suggested is that the claim is not so broad as it might have been, the mistake was apparent on the first inspection of the patent, and any correction desired should have been applied for immediately; the right to a correction may be lost by unreasonable delay. The claim of a specific device, and the omission to claim other devices apparent on the face of the patent, are in law a dedication to the public of that which was not claimed, and the legal effect of the patent cannot be revoked unless the patentee surrenders it and proves that the specification was so framed by real inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and this should be done with due diligence and before adverse rights have accrued. It was not the special purpose of the legislation to authorize re-issues with broader claims, though such a re-issue may be made when it clearly appears that there has been a bona fide mistake, such as chancery in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction would correct. The specifications cannot be substantially changed, either by the addition of new matter or the omission of important particulars, so as to enlarge the invention as intended to be originally claimed; 129 U. S. 294; 119 id. 664. The re-issue is an amendment and cannot be allowed unless the imperfections in the original patent arose without fraud, and from inadvert-ence, accident, or mistake; 137 U. S. 258. The re-issued patent is not a new patent; and an existing contract concerning the patent before its surrender applies equally to it after the surrender and re-issue; 11 Cush. 569.

A re-issue can cover only what an examination of the original shows the original was intended to embrace; 127 U. S. 563; 123 id. 87; and not that which the original did not describe or claim; 40 Fed. Rep. 667. It can enlarge a claim by omitting an element previously claimed as essential; 124 U. S. 347. Claims cannot be enlarged so as to cover matter already in public use after unreasonable delay; 127 U. S. 563. If not for the same invention, the re-issue is void; 145 U. S. 226.

A claim restricted by the patent office in the first re-issue cannot be enlarged by subsequent re-issues; 125 U. S. 427. A re-issue which brings in a claim originally rejected by the patent office with the acquiesence of the applicant, is void; 35 Fed. Rep. 329; but a re-issue may correct errors occasioned by the mistaken ideas raised in the patent office; 33 Fed. Rep. 502. Both the specification and the claims may be corrected by a re-issue; 16 Fed. Rep. 240.

Laches in applying for a re-issue is fatal to the re-issue and may be taken advantage of by a demurrer; 39 Fed. Rep. 273; 33 id. 840. What is reasonable delay is a question for the court and the decision of the patent office on that point is not conclusive; 125 U. S. 217. The plaintiff must explain the delay in applying for a re-issue; 125 U. S. 217. The inadvertence must be in reference to the application and not to the invention. See a review of the cases in 123 U. S. 89. A delay of three years is held to invalidate a re-issue; 76 Fed. Rep. 816; but where a patent, dated in 1882, was held void in 1894 and a re-issue was granted five months later, it was held valid; 86 Fed. Rep. 124; where, on an application for a re-issue, the primary examiner rejects certain claims, and the applicant abandons his application, the claims disallowed are not invalidated; 169 U. S. 606.

No action lies on the orginal patent after its surrender for re-issue; 35 Fed. Rep. 833. A patentee, imposing words of limitation upon himself in his claim in taking out a re-issue, is bound thereby in subsequent suits on the re-issued patent; 123 U. S. 589.

A patent cannot be re-issued to enlarge a claim unless there has been a clear mistake in the wording of the claim, and an application is made within a reasonably short period after the original patent was granted; 123 U. S. 87; 125 id. 217; 148 id. 270.

The application for a re-issue must be sworn to by the inventor, if living, and not by the assignee. if any.

A re-issue of a patent for an invention, after the expiration of foreign patents for the same invention is invalid; 135 U. S. 176.

Until an amended patent issues, the original stands as if the re-issue had never been applied for; 171 U. S.—Not reported.

Of patents for designs. The act of 1870 permits any person to obtain a patent for a design, which shall continue in force for three and a-half, seven, or fourteen years, at the option of the applicant, upon the payment of a fee of ten, fifteen, or thirty dollars, according to the duration of the patent obtained. These patents are granted wherever the applicant, by his own industry, genius, efforts, and expense, has invented or produced any new and original design for a manufacture, alto-relievo, or bas-relief, or any new and original design for the printing of woollen, silk, cotton, or other fabrics; any new and original impression, ornament, pattern, print, or picture, to be printed, painted, cast, or otherwise placed on or worked into any article of manufacture, or any new and original shape or configuration of any article of manufacture, not known or used by others before his invention or production thereof, or patented or described in any printed publication.

A design is an instrument created by the imposition upon a physical substance of some peculiar shape or ornamentation which produces a particular impression upon the human eye, and through the eye, upon the mind. Its creation involves a change in the substance itself and not merely in the mode of presenting it for sale; and affects, not its abstract qualities, nor those on which its practical utility depends, but those only which determine its appearance to the sight; Rob. Pat. § 200. The acts of congress were plainly intended to give encouragement to the decorative arts; they contemplate not so much utility as appearance; 14 Wall. 511. A design is patentable though not more beautiful than former ones; 105 U. S. 94. Design patents require as high a degree or exercise of the inventive or originative faculty as utility patents; 18 Fed. Rep. 321. Where scroll-work is used there must be something peculiar to sustain a patent; 84 Fed. Rep. 182.

A design patent cannot be enlarged in its scope from the specifications; 84 Fed. Rep. 170.

The general method of making the application is the same as has been hereinbefore described, and the patent issues in a similar form.

The use of a design or colorable imitation thereof on any article of manufacture or the sale of any article to which the same shall have been applied, knowing that it has been so applied, renders the party liable to pay $250 or the profits in excess of that amount, and this may be recovered at law or in equity.

Of disclaimers. R. S. § 4922 provides that the plaintiff in a suit for infringement may disclaim so much of his patent as is in excess of his real invention and thus recover damages for the injury he has really sustained. Sec. 4917 provides for the filing in the patent office of a disclaimer of either a separate claim or some distinct and separate matter which can be exscinded without mutilating or changing what is left. These two sections are part of one law having one general purpose and both relate to a case in which a patentee, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent intention, has included in his claim and in his patent, inventions to which he is not entitled, and which are clearly distinguishable from those to which he is entitled. The purpose of § 4917 is to authorize him to file a disclaimer to the part to which he is not entitled and of § 4922 is to legalize the suit on the patent mentioned in the section, and to the extent to which the patentee can rightfully claim the patented invention; 123 U. S. 582.

Delay in a disclaimer under § 4917 goes only to the question of costs; 145 U. S. 29.

No person can avail himself of the benefits of this provision who has unreasonably neglected or delayed to enter his disclaimer. The act of 1870 follows substantially the act of 1837 in this respect.

A disclaimer by one owner will not affect the interest of any other owner.

A disclaimer cannot be used to change the character of the invention; 123 U. S. 582; 130 id. 56.

After an action in equity for the infringement of letters patent has been heard and decided upon its merits, the plaintiff cannot file a disclaimer in court, or introduce new evidence upon that or any other subject, except at a rehearing granted by the court upon such terms as it thinks fit to impose; 132 U. S. 103.

Of the extension of a patent. See EXTENSION OF PATENTS.

Of the repeal of letters patent. The United States may sue in equity for the repeal of a patent obtained by fraud; 128 U. S. 315; and a bill in equity to repeal two patents for the same subject-matter and to the same party is not multifarious; 128 U. S. 315.

R. S. § 4918 provides that any person interested in one or more interfering patents may bring his bill in equity against the owner of the adverse patent, upon which the court may declare either of the patents void in whole or part, or inoperative, or invalid in any particular part of the United States. The judgment rendered affects only the parties or those taking under them.

Suits may be maintained by the government in its own courts to set aside one of its own patents, not only when it has a proprietary and pecuniary interest in the result, but also when it is necessary in order to enable it to discharge its obligations to the public, and sometimes when the purpose and effect are merely to enforce the rights of an individual. In a suit between individuals to set aside an instrument for a fraud, the testimony must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing and more than a bare preponderance of evidence is required. This is much more so when the government attempts to set aside its solemn patent. In establishing the patent office, congress created a tribunal to pass upon all questions of novelty and utility, giving it exclusive jurisdiction in the first instance, with provisions for review. Its determination of facts should therefore be held conclusive upon the government subject to the same limitations as apply in suits between individuals; 167 U. S. 224.

Of the assignment of patents. Every patent or an interest therein is assignable in law, by an instrument in writing; such assignments, etc., are void as against any purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration, without notice, unless recorded in the patent office within three months. But an unrecorded assignment is valid as against a subsequent party who has had actual notice; Holmes 152: 2 Sto. 609.

The right may be successively assigned without limit; 9 Fed. Rep. 390. Any person may take under an assignment, a married woman, an infant, etc.; 17 Fed. Rep 841. An invention may be assigned before it is perfected; 26 Fed. Rep. 249; 92 U. S. 724; but an agreement for the future assignment of a patent not yet granted is not a recordable instrument; 32 Fed. Rep. 783.

A deed conveying "all the inventor's property and estate whatsoever" carries rights in unpatented inventions; 10 Wall. 367.

An assignment is the transfer of the entire interest in a patented invention or of an undivided portion of such entire interest as to every section of the United States; Rob. Pat. § 762; it differs from grant in relation to the territorial area to which they relate. A grant is the transfer of the exclusive right in a specific part of the United States. It is an exclusive sectional right. A license is a transfer of a less or different interest than either the interest in a whole patent or an undivided part of such whole interest or an exclusive sectional interest; 4 Blatch. 206. See 3 Fed. Rep. 143; 21 Wall. 205. Any transfer of an interest in a patented invention, which cannot operate as an assignment or grant, is a license; Rob. Pat. § 806. See 4 Blatch. 206. A license is distinguished from an assignment and a grant in that the latter transfers the monopoly as well as the invention, while a license transfers only the invention and does not affect the monopoly otherwise than by estopping the licensor from exercising his prohibitory powers in derogation of the privileges conferred by him upon the licensee; Rob. Pat. § 806. See 5 Fish. 411; 138 U. S. 252; 144 id. 248. A license is said to be merely the right not to be sued; 7 Hun 146. It need not be recorded: 2 Sto. 69. It may be by parol; 153 U. S. 332. The right of a patent owner to license the use of his patent is not a creature of statute, but of the common law; 29 Fed. Rep. 17.

No particular form is required for an assignment; 32 Fed. Rep. 790; to comply with the act it must be in writing; 104 U. S. 521; Holmes 152; 5 Fish. 528. It may be made either before or after the patent issues; 94 U. S. 225.

A grant of the exclusive right to make, use, and sell a patented article throughout the United States for the full term of the patent, is an assignment; 41 Fed. Rep. 792; where the intention of a writing is to transfer all rights under the patent, it is an assignment; 32 Fed. Rep. 790.

One owning a patent with several claims cannot assign a single claim so as to pass the legal title; such a transfer is a mere license; 144 U. S. 238. A joint owner may give a license; 61 Fed. Rep. 401.

A licensee cannot dispute the validity of the patent; 41 Fed. Rep. 48; but where a license does not recite the validity of the patent, a licensee who abandons the patent may set up the defence of invalidity in an action for royalties alleged to be payable by him after his repudiation; 55 Fed. Rep. 645; and a licensee is not estopped to question the validity of a patent in vindication of acts done after his license expired; 37 Fed. Rep. 686. A patentee cannot question the validity of his own patent as against his assignee; 31 Fed. Rep. 918; 60 id. 283.

An oral agreement for the sale and assignment of the right to obtain a patent, is not within the statute of frauds, nor within R. S. § 4898, requiring assignments of patents to be in writing, and may be specifically enforced in equity, upon sufficient proof thereof; 149 U. S. 315.

The right to damages for past infringements does not pass by a mere assignment; 18 Fed. Rep. 638; 30 id. 241, 444; but see 30 id. 250; 32 id. 629, 790; 34 id. 327.

Acts in pais will sometimes justify the presumption of a license; 1 How. 202; 17 Pet. 228; 3 Sto. 402. As to a verbal license, see 1 Bond 194; s. c. 1 Fish. 380. A license to use an invention implied from circumstances is not transferable; 119 U. S. 226; and a licensee cannot divide the territory in which he is licensed among third parties although the license is to him and his assigns; 52 Fed. Rep. 945. A verbal assignment of an interest in a patent has no force against a subsequent assignee under a written transfer, without notice; 153 U. S. 332; but it has been held that a license to use a patent, not exclusive of others, need not be recorded and may be by parol; and a subsequent assignee of the patent takes title subject to such license, of which he must inform himself as best he may; but the verbal license will be strictly construed, and must show the consideration and alleged payment of royalties; 58 Fed. Rep. 1006.

An assignment may be made prior to the granting of a patent. And when duly made and recorded, the patent may be issued to the assignee. This, however, only applies to cases of assignments proper, as contradistinguished from grants or licenses. The application must, however, in such cases be made and the specification sworn to by the inventor. See 5 McLean 131; 4 Wash. C. C. 71; 1 Blatch. 506. The assignment transfers the right to the assignee, although the patent should be afterwards issued to the assignor; 10 How. 477. The assignee of the entire right in a patent has the exclusive right to sue either at law or in equity for its subsequent infringement; 138 U. S. 252; and may sue in his own name, and so may the assignee of the entire interest for some particular territory; 2 Blatch. 20; but see 14 Fed. Rep. 297.

A license to use includes the right to make for use; 43 Fed. Rep. 847.

The title to a patent passes to the assignee in bankruptcy of the patentee, subject to the assignee's election not to accept it if in his opinion it is worthless or would prove to be burdensome and unprofitable; and he is entitled to a reasonable time to elect whether he will accept it or not; 145 U. S. 29. Upon the death of the owner of a patent, intestate, it passes to his administrator; 19 Fed. Rep. 913; who can sue thereon in another state without taking out ancilliary letters of administration therein; 1 Dill. 104. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

It has been held that any breach of the condition of a license by the licensee works a forfeiture; 1 Blatch. 165.

Licenses containing express stipulations for their forfeiture are not ipso facto forfeited upon condition broken, but remain inoperative and pleadable until rescinded by a court of equity; Rob. Pat. § 822; 3 Fed. Rep. 222. The question of forfeiture depends upon the ordinary principles of equity; therefore a court will not rescind a license for non-payment of money at the time fixed therein, if payment has been subsequently tendered or justice can be done by a judgment for the amount already due; Rob. Pat. § 822; 5 Bann. & A. 572. A refusal to pay royalties coupled with an abandonment of the license and a defence on other grounds, are sufficient for annulment; 1 Fish. 380. If the contract contain no power of revocation, the licensor can only proceed at law for any breach; 41 Fed. Rep. 475; 32 id. 544; 28 id. 814.

Where an assignment, grant, or conveyance of a patent has been acknowledged before a notary public or United States commissioner, or any secretary of legation or consular officer authorized to administer oaths under R. S. § 1750, the certificate of such acknowledgment under the hand and seal of such officer is prima facie evidence of the execution of the instrument; Act of March 3, 1897.

A certified copy of an assignment of a patent has been held sufficient, prima facie, to show title in the assignee; 56 Fed. Rep. 149; but see 26 id. 763; 60 id. 1016.

Of joint inventors. The patent must in all cases issue to the inventor, if alive and if he has not assigned his interest. And if the invention is made jointly by two inventors, the patent must issue to them both. This is equally the case where one makes a portion of the invention at one time and another at another time.

It is not necessary that exactly the same idea should have occurred to each at the same time. If an idea is suggested to one and he even goes so far as to construct a machine embodying this invention, but it is not a completed working machine and another person takes hold of it and by their joint labor a perfect machine is made, a joint patent may be properly issued to them. But if each person invented a distinct part of a machine, each should obtain a patent for his invention; 11 Fed. Rep. 505.

A joint patent is invalid as to a feature previously invented by one of the patentees, which is not a necessary part of the device jointly invented; 58 Fed. Rep. 868.

Of executors and administrators. Where an inventor dies before obtaining a patent, his executor or administrator may apply for and obtain such patent, holding it in trust for the heirs at law or devisees, accordingly as the inventor died intestate or testate. Nothing is said as to its being appropriated to the payment of debts; but, having once gone into the hands of the executors or administrators, it would perhaps become assets, and be used like other personal property. In England, a patent will pass as assets to assignees in bankruptcy; 3 B. & P. 565.

The right to make a surrender and receive a re-issue of a patent also vests by law in the executor or administrator. The law further provides that the executor or administrator may make the oath necessary to obtain the patent,—differing in this respect from the case of an assignment, where, although the patent issues to the assignee, the inventor must make the oath.

The liability of a patent to be levied upon for debt. The better opinion is that letters patent cannot be levied upon and sold by a common-law execution. The grant of privilege to the patentee would, from its incorporeal nature, seem to be incapable of manual seizure and of sale. Even if such a sale were made, there does not appear to be any provision in the acts of congress which contemplates the recording of a sheriff's deed: and without a valid record, the patentee might nevertheless make a subsequent transfer to a bona fide purchaser without notice, which would be valid.

But this peculiar species of property may be subjected to the payment of debts through the instrumentality of a bill in equity. The chancellor can act upon the person. He can direct the patent to be sold, and by attachment can compel the patentee to execute a conveyance to the purchaser; 105 U. S. 126; see where it was further held that the court might compel the holder of the patent to assign it, or appoint a trustee for that purpose. The right of a patentee will pass to his assignees in bankruptcy; 3 B. & P. 777; 145 U. S. 29; but not to a trustee in insolvency, in Massachusetts; 1 Holmes 152. The legal title to a patent does not pass to a receiver of an insolvent owner; but the receiver may maintain a bill to compel the owner to transfer it to him; 45 Fed. Rep. 479.

How far a patent is retroactive. By the earlier law on this subject in the United States, a patent, when granted, operated retroactively; so that a machine covered by the terms of the patent, though constructed with the inventor's knowledge, or consent, or purchased from him, previously to the date of that instrument, could not be used after the issuing of the patent without subjecting the party so using it to an action for infringement. The use of the machine previously to the date of the patent has been held not an infringement; 128 U. S. 605. See, also, 163 U. S. 49.

The 37th section of the act of 1870, following substantially the act of 1837, provides "that every person who may have purchased of the inventor, or with his knowledge and consent may have constructed any newly-invented or discovered machine, or other patentable article, prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, or sold or used one so constructed, shall have the right to use, and vend to others, to be used, the specific thing so made or purchased, without liability therefor."

At present, therefore, property rightfully acquired in a specific machine, etc., cannot be affected by a patent subsequently obtained by the patentee. It has been held, however, that, under the general grant contained in the constitution, congress has power to pass a special act which shall operate retrospectively so as to give a patent for an invention already in public use; 3 Wheat. 454; 2 Stor. 164; 3 Sumn. 535.

On the question of anticipation by a prior device, the patentee's invention will be considered as relating back to the original conception; 4 Wash. C. C. 68. 703.

Marking patented articles. Sec. 38 of the act of 1870 declares that in all cases where an article is made or vended by any person under the protection of letters patent, it shall be the duty of such person to give sufficient notice to the public that said article is so patented, either by fixing thereon the word "patented," together with the day and year the patent was granted, or when, from the character of the article patented, that may be impracticable, by enveloping one or more of the said articles, and affixing a label to the package, or otherwise attaching thereto a label containing a like notice; on failure of which, in any suit for the infringement of letters patent by the party failing so to mark, no damage shall be recovered by the plaintiff, except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement, and continued after such notice, to make, use, or vend the article patented. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff, in a suit for infringement, to allege and prove actual or constructive notice of the patent: 155 U. S. 584; 152 id. 244.

Penalties provided in certain cases. The act of 1870 provides a penalty of not less than $100 and costs for every person who shall mark, etc., any article for which he has not obtained a patent, with the name or imitation of the name of any person who has a patent thereupon, without his consent, etc., or who shall so mark the word "patent" or any word of similar import with intent to counterfeit the mark or device of the patentee, without consent; or who shall in any manner mark upon an unpatented article the word "patent," etc., for the purpose of deceiving the people. This penalty may be recovered in the district court where the offence was committed; one half goes to the person who sues for the penalty and the other to the United States.

A similar statute—that of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 83—exists in England, for observations upon which see Hindm. Pat. 366. It has been decided under that statute that where there has been an unauthorized use of the word "patent," it must be proved that the word was used with a view of imitating or counterfeiting the stamp of the patentee, and that it is no defence that the patented article imitated was not a new manufacture, the grant of the patent being conclusive on the defendant; 3 H. & N. 802. See 1 Fish. 647; 3 Fish. 72, 374; 5 id. 384; 5 Blatch. 494; 6 id. 33.

Defences. In any action for infringement the defendant may plead the general issue and having given thirty days notice previous to trial, may prove: 1. That for the purpose of deceiving the public the specification contained less than the whole truth relative to the invention or more than necessary to produce the desired effect; 2. That the patentee had surreptitiously or unjustly obtained the patent for that which was in fact invented by another, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same; 3. That it had been patented or described in some printed publication prior to his supposed invention thereof [or more than two years prior to the application]; 4. That the patentee was not the original and first inventor of any material and substantial part of the thing patented; 5. That it had been in public use or on sale in this country more than two years before the application or had been abandoned to the public. R. S. § 4920, as amended.

The portions above in [ ] were inserted in § 4920 by the act of March 3, 1897, and do not apply to patents previously granted.

Special notice must be given at law or must be set up in the answer in equity; notice of previous invention, knowledge, or use must state the names of the patentees and when granted and the names and residences of the persons alleged to have invented or to have had a prior knowledge of the thing patented and where and by whom it had been used.

Numerous other defences can be set up at law or in equity, such as the want of invention, novelty, or utility; absence of title in the plaintiff; non-infringement; estoppel; title in the defendant; a release, etc. See Rob. Pat. All of these, and also the above statutory defences, can be proved at law under a general issue plea; those not statutory do not require notice of special matter, unless under special practice in the particular court. The statute of limitations must be pleaded specially.

Prior use must be proved beyond reasonable doubt; 36 Fed. Rep. 183; it must antedate the patentee's invention and not merely his application; 80 Fed. Rep. 121.

A prior use of a device, in order to defeat a patent, must be something which was identical with the patented invention; 4 Blatch. 307. It is not enough to show older devices having part of the elements in one machine, part in a second, and part in a third, and then say that the patented device is anticipated; 17 Fed. Rep. 520. A prior use of all the elements of a device does not anticipate their combination; 4 Cliff. 424; a prior invention must have been complete and operative; 14 Fed. Rep. 457. A mere written description or drawing does not constitute a prior use; 9 Fed. Rep. 293; nor does the construction of a model; 16 Blatch. 76. But there may be circumstances under which a complete model will suffice; 19 Blatch. 473; 18 Wall. 120. A patent, though a mere paper one, may constitute anticipation if it discloses the principle of a subsequent invention; 82 Fed. Rep. 228.

If the prior use was embryotic or inchoate it is not enough. If the device was a machine, it must have been clothed in a substantial form, sufficient to demonstrate at once its practical efficacy and utility; 18 Wall. 120.

Trade magazines, copyrighted, and found in public and scientific libraries are "publications"; 87 Fed. Rep. 470.

Abandoned experiments do not constitute a prior use; 23 Fed. Rep. 327; 23 Wall. 181; 26 Fed. Rep. 329. But throwing aside an invention does not necessarily show that it was an unsuccessful experiment; 20 Fed. Rep. 826. It has been said that where an invention once in use has become a lost art, one who has reinvented it may obtain a patent therefor; Webst. Pat. 720.

Evidence as to the state of the art before the date of the conception of the invention is always admissible to show what was then known, to distinguish the new features from the old and to enable the court to perceive the precise limits of the inventive act; Rob. Pat. § 1020. No previous notice of this evidence is necessary; 91 U. S. 337.

If letters patent be manifestly invalid upon their face, the question of their validity may be raised on demurrer; 158 U. S. 299; 83 Fed. Rep. 170; but only in an unusual case; 84 id. 189.

The doctrine of laches has been said to apply to a case where a patentee has slept on his rights for sixteen years while infringement was open and notorious; 82

Fed. Rep. 96; but on the other hand it is held that mere delay will not bar a right unless it act as an estoppel; 69 id. 838.

The failure of a patentee for some years to manufacture his device does not defeat his right to his patented invention; 59 Fed. Rep. 613.

Utility is said to be absence of frivolity and mischievousness, and utility for some beneficial purpose; Rob. Pat. § 339; and the degree of utility is not material; 19 Fed. Rep. 323. But there is no utility if the invention can be used only to commit a fraud with; 19 Wall. 433; or for some immoral purpose; 1 Mas. 182; or can be used only for gambling purposes in saloons; 82 Fed. Rep. 448; or if the invention is dangerous in its use; 19 Wall. 287.

Of infringements. The criterion of infringement is substantial identity of construction or operation. Mere changes of form, proportion, or position, or substitution of mechanical equivalents, will still be infringements, unless they involve a substantial difference of construction, operation, or effect; 3 McLean 250, 432; 1 Wash. C. C. 108; 15 How. 62; 1 Curt. 279; 1 McAll. 48. As a general rule, whenever the defendant has incorporated in his structure the substance of what the plaintiff has invented and properly claimed, he is responsible to the latter; 1 Wall. 531.

Where the patent is for a new combination of machines to produce certain effects, it is no infringement to use any of the machines separately, if the whole combination is not used; 1 Mas. 447; 2 id. 112; 1 Pet. C. C. 322; 1 Sto. 568; 16 Pet. 336; 3 McLean 427; 14 How. 219; 1 Black 427; 1 Wall. 78. But it is an infringement to use one of several improvements claimed, or to use a substantial part of the invention, although with some modification or even improvement of form or apparatus; 2 Mas. 112; 1 Sto. 273. Where the patent describes and claims a machine, it cannot be construed to be for a process or function, so as to make all other machines infringements which perform the same function; and no infringement will in such case take place where the practical manner of giving effect to the principle is by a different mechanical structure and mechanical action; 15 How. 252. If the patentee is the inventor of a device, he may treat as infringers all who make a similar device operating on the same principle and performing the same functions by analogous means or equivalent combinations, although the infringing machine may be an improvement of the original and patentable as such. But if the invention claimed is itself but an improvement on a known machine, by a mere change of form or combination of parts, it will not be an infringement to improve the original machine by the use of a different form or combination of parts performing the same functions. The doctrine of equivalents does not in such case apply, unless the subsequent improvements are mere colorable invasions of the first; 20 How. 405. A pioneer in the art of making a practical device, who has invented a principle which has gone into almost universal use in this country, is entitled to a liberal construction of his claim; and another device containing all the elements of his combination should be held an infringement, though there are superficial dissimilarities in their construction; 145 U. S. 29. A pioneer means one covering a function never before performed; a wholly novel device marking a distinct step in the progress of the art; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707. The new application of a patented device to another use, which does not involve the exercise of the inventive faculty, is an infringement as much as though the new machine were an exact copy of the old; 139 U. S. 601. The mere fact that one who uses a patented process finds it applicable to more extended use than has been perceived by the patentee is not a defence to a charge of infringement; 147 U. S. 623.

A sale of the thing patented to an agent of the patentee, employed by him to make the purchase on account of the patentee, is not per se an infringement, although, accompanied by other circumstances, it may be evidence of infringement; 1 Curt. 260.

The making of a patented machine for philosophical experiment only, and not for use or sale, has been held to be no infringement; 1 Gall. 429, 485; but a use with a view to an experiment to test its value is an infringement; 4 Wash. 580. The sale of the articles produced by a patented machine or process is not an infringement; 3 McLean 295; 4 How. 709; 94 U. S. 568; nor is the bona fide purchase of patented articles from an infringing manufacturer; 10 Wheat. 359; nor a sale of materials by a sheriff; 1 Gall. 485; 1 Robb 47. Selling the parts of a patented machine may be an infringement; 1 Holmes 88. As to infringement by a railroad corporation, where its road was worked and its stock owned by a connecting road, see 17 How. 30. Ignorance by the infringer of the existence of the patent infringed is no defence, but may mitigate damages; 11 How. 587. See INFRINGEMENT.

The purchaser of a car load of beds covered by a patent from the owner of the territorial rights of Michigan, for the express purpose of selling them in Massachusetts, had the right to sell them anywhere within the United States, even within the territory already assigned to another person; 157 U. S. 659 (Brown J., dissenting); 149 id. 355; but one cannot buy a patented article in a foreign country from a person authorized to sell it there and then sell it in the United States; 84 Fed. Rep. 192.

The owners of letters patent cannot sue the United States in the court of claims for infringement of his patent; 155 U. S. 163.

The United States has no right to use a patented invention without a license from the patentee or making compensation to him. No suit can be maintained, or injunction granted, against the United States, unless expressly permitted by act of congress. Officers or agents of the United States, although acting under order of the United States, are personally liable to be sued for their own infringement of a patent. Upon a suit in equity by the patentee of an improvement in caisson gates against officers of the United States, using in their official capacity a caisson gate made and used by the United States, in infringement of his patent, the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction. Nor can he recover profits, if the only profit proved is a saving to the United States in the cost of the gate; 161 U. S. 10.

Of damages for infringement. Damages may be recovered in any circuit court of the United States, in the name of the party interested either as patentee, assignee, or grantee, and in case of a verdict for the plaintiff the court may enter judgment thereon for any sum above the amount found by the verdict as the actual damages sustained, according to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding three times the amount of such verdict, together with costs. A court of equity may award damages for infringement and increase the same in a similar manner. R. S. § 4921, as amended March 3, 1897, provides that upon a decree in equity for infringement the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to profits, the damages he has sustained, which shall be assessed by the court, and the court has the same power to increase the damages as is given to the court to increase the damages found by verdict, even though the infringer made no profit; 97 U. S. 348. See 13 Am. L. Rev. 1. At law a plaintiff is entitled to recover what he has lost although it exceed defendant's profits; in equity only the profits the defendant has actually made; 151 U. S. 139; 155 id. 565; 161 id. 10.

The actual damage is all that can be allowed by a jury, as contradistinguished from exemplary, vindictive, or punitive damages. The amount of defendant's profits from the unlawful user is, in general, the measure of the plaintiff's damages; and this may be determined by the plaintiff's price for a license; 11 How. 607; 16 id. 480; 20 id. 198; 1 Blatch. 244, 405; 2 id. 132, 194, 229, 476; but no interest is allowed on the profits until their amount is judicially ascertained: 125 U. S. 136. The rule of damages is different where a patent is only for an improvement on a machine and where it is for an entire machine; 16 How. 480. If there be a mere making and no user proved, the damages should be nominal; 1 Gall. 476; and where there is in the evidence no basis for a computation of the damages, only nominal damages can be given; 131 U. S. 159. Where a royalty was proved on a device covering two claims and one only was sustained, only nominal damages were allowed; 4 Fed. Rep. 415; but it has been held that in an action at law, if there is no established royalty, the jury may consider what would be a reasonable royalty; and, in so doing, may consider the utility and advantage of the invention, and take into account defendant's profits; 81 Fed. Rep. 1012.

In equity, a plaintiff, though he has an established license fee, is not limited to the amount thereof as damages: but may instead of damages recover the profits the defendants have made; 125 U. S. 136.

The plaintiff may recover in equity as profits the advantages which the defendants have gained by using the invention, and a definite saving shown to have been made in the cost of manufacture; 125 U. S. 136. The expense of using the new process is to be ascertained from the manner in which the defendants have used it and not in the manner in which they might have used it; id.

A plaintiff cannot recover a defendant's entire profits unless the whole market value of defendant's article is shown to be due to the invention; 24 Blatch. 275. But if the entire saleability of the article is the result of the introduction of the patented feature, the plaintiff is entitled to all the profits made; 39 Fed. Rep. 466; 130 U. S. 456. Where the invention apparently gave the device its value, the defendant must show the extent to which his own improvements were the cause of the profits which he had made; 39 Fed. Rep. 468. The profits are what the defendant made or saved; 36 Fed. Rep. 378. Nominal damages only are allowed where it is not shown what definite profits were due to the invention; 24 Blatch. 396, 463; 39 Fed. Rep. 613; or where plaintiff shows no established license fee, no market price, and no other use of the invention than by the defendant; 81 Fed. Rep. 863.

Where the owner of a patent has a fixed license fee, this is the measure of damages for an invention; 2 Fed. Rep. 677; 27 Fed. Rep. 691; this must be the license fee existing at the date of infringement; 25 Fed. Rep. 274; one established afterwards may be considered, though it is not conclusive; 26 Fed. Rep. 274; it is immaterial whether in such case the use of the invention has been profitable to the defendant. A single instance is not sufficient to establish a license fee; 35 Fed. Rep. 597; but two instances may be; 37 Fed. Rep. 654; it is not enough to show foreign license fees; 14 Blatch. 265. And a license fee must be shown by actual payment and not merely by promises to pay; 28 Fed. Rep. 360; nor by amount paid in settlement of a claim; 43 Fed. Rep. 478.

In the absence of an established license fee, damages must be shown by general evidence; 3 Wall. 315; and there is a difference between infringement by sale and those by use. The measure of recovery in a suit in equity for infringement of patent is the gains and profits made by the infringer and such further damage as the proof shows that the complainant sustained in addition; but in an action at law the damages are measured only by the extent of the plaintiff's loss, as proved by the evidence, and when the evidence dis-closes the existence of no license fee, no impairment of the plaintiff's market, no damages of any kind, only nominal damages can be recovered; 155 U. S. 565.

Where the defendant's acts compelled the plaintiff to reduce his price, such loss is an item of damage; 43 Fed. Rep. 72.

It is said that any attempt to classify the reported cases on damages would be futile; Rob. Pat. § 1061.

The statute of limitation is six years prior to the filing of the bill of complaint or the issuing of a writ at law; Act of March 3, 1897 (in effect January 1, 1898).

It is the province of the court to define the patented invention, as indicated by the language of the claims; and of the jury to determine whether, as so defined, it covers the defendant's article; 155 U. S. 565.

If one is employed to devise or perfect an instrument or a means for accomplishing a prescribed result, he cannot, after successfully accomplishing the work for which he was employed, plead title thereto as against his employer. What he accomplishes becomes the property of the employer. He has sold it in advance to him. So when one is in the employ of another in a certain line of work and devises an improved instrument for that work and uses the property of his employer and the services of other employes to develop and put in practical form his invention, a jury or court is warranted in finding that the benefits resulting from his use of the property and the assistance of the co-employes of his employer have given to such employer an irrevocable license to use the invention; 130 U. S. 342; 150 id. 430; 1 How. 202; 160 U. S. 426. But a railroad company is not entitled to the use of an invention of its master mechanic, when none of the company's material or labor entered into the perfecting of the invention or was devoted to its construction until after the patent had issued; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 322.

Patents can be granted to United States officers, except those in the patent office, without any fee, when the invention is used or to be used in the public service, but the patentee must file a stipulation, which must be inserted in the patent, that the invention may be used by the government and its officers in public work or by any other person in the United States; Act of March 3, 1883.

In patent cases, costs will not be awarded to complainant, where some of the claims sued on are withdrawn at the argument, and others are adjudged not infringed, although the decree is in favor as to others still; 71 Fed. Rep. 886.

Jurisdiction of cases under the patent laws. The act of 1870, § 55, gives original jurisdiction to circuit courts of the United States and to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or of any territory, in all cases arising under the laws of the United States granting exclusive privileges to inventors. This act was amended by giving this jurisdiction to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia and abolishing that of the supreme court of the District. This jurisdiction extends both to law and equity, and is irrespective of the citizenship of the parties or the amount in controversy. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is exclusive of that of the state courts; 3 N. Y. 9; 40 Me. 430. But this is to be understood of cases arising directly under the acts of congress, and not of those where the patent comes collaterally in question: as, for instance, where it is the subject-matter of a contract or the consideration of a promissory note; 3 McLean 525; 1 W. & M. 34; 16 Conn. 409. Hence a bill to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a patent-right is not such a case arising under the patent laws as gives jurisdiction to the federal courts; 10 How. 477; 140 U. S. 344. A contract relating to a patent does not necessarily involve a federal question; 125 U. S. 46, 54; 140 id. 344. For the requirements of a bill on a patent, see 121 U. S. 484. If a bill is filed so near the expiration of a patent that, under the rules, there could be no injunction, it will be dismissed; but if one could be obtained, though only three days before the expiration, the court may retain jurisdiction and proceed, with or without an injunction; 119 U. S. 322.

The expiration of a patent pending a suit for infringement does not defeat the jurisdiction of a court of equity, although it is a reason for denying an injunction which was the basis of equity jurisdiction; 122 U. S. 71; 119 id. 322. A bill is not maintainable when filed only a few days before the patent expired; 84 Fed. Rep. 344.

Patent-right, note given for a. In many of the states, laws have been passed making void all notes given in consideration of a patent-right unless the words "given for a patent-right" are prominently written on the face of the note. These laws have been decided to be unconstitutional in 37 Mich. 309; 70 Ill. 109; 23 Minn. 24; 25 Fed. Rep. 394; 2 Biss. 311; 2 Flipp. 83; 14 Neb. 134; contra, 109 N. Y. 127; 108 Ind. 365. The property in inventions exists by virtue of the laws of congress, and no state has a right to interfere with its enjoyment or annex conditions to the grant; 2 Biss. 314; 4 Bush 311. In Pennsylvania, however, a distinction has been made, the statute of April 12, 1872, requiring the insertion of the words "given for a patent-right," merely having the effect of making the note or instrument in the hands of a purchaser subject to the same defence as if in the hands of the original owner or holder. By necessary implication, notes without such words inserted in them remain on the same footing as before the act, and innocent holders, who take such notes without notice, take them clear of all equities existing between the original parties. And in several cases these acts have been sustained as constitutional; 36 Ohio St. 370; 116 Ind. 118, 502; 109 N. Y. 127; 93 Pa. 373.

As between the original parties to a note given for a patent-right, it is well settled that it is a good defence to show that the alleged patent was void, and therefore there was no consideration; 18 Pa. 465. All who take with notice of the consideration, take subject to same defence; id.; 93 Pa. 373. Sharswood, J., held that there was nothing in this view which interfered with any just right of the holder of a valid patent under the acts of congress, nor in permitting the maker to show, against a holder with such notice, that the note was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; 86 Pa. 173. An innocent purchaser of a note is not affected by the act; 93 Pa. 373; 118 Ind. 586; 88 Tenn. 705. If the patent is void; 124 Mass. 523; or the patented article is useless; 42 Nev. 97; 40 Ind. 1; the note is void.

To secure the insertion of the words, some acts make it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person "knowing the consideration of a note" to be the sale of a patent-right, to sell or transfer it without the words "given for a patent-right" inserted, as provided by the act; 26 Am. Rep. 514; 23 Minn. 24; 53 Ind. 454; 54 id. 270.

On the expiration of patents on the "Singer" sewing-machine, under which name it came to indicate a type of machine made by that company, the right to make the patented article and use the generic name passed to the public, but one using the name in selling such type of machines may be compelled to indicate that the articles made by him are his product and not the product of the owners of the extinct patent; 163 U. S. 169.

See CAVEAT; EXPERT; EXTENSION OF PATENTS; INFRINGEMENT; LIBEL.

PATENT AMBIGUITY. An ambiguity which appears upon the face of an instrument. It is a settled rule that extrinsic evidence is not admissible to explain such an ambiguity. The general rule on the subject is thus stated in 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 707: "Where a legal relation is sought to be established by means of a written instrument, if an uncertainty of intention appear by the expression of the instrument itself, the true intention cannot be ascertained by the aid of extrinsic evidence. For, as said by Lord Bacon (Maxims, Reg. 23), 'ambiguitas patens cannot be holpen by averment.'" 5 Bing. N. C. 425; s. c. 8 L. J. C. P. 227. See AMBIGUITY; LATENT AMBIGUITY.

PATENT OFFICE. The office through which applications for letters patent for inventions, etc., are made, and from which those letters patent emanate.

Some provision for the purpose of issuing patents is, of course, found in every country where the system of granting patents for inventions prevails; but nowhere else is there an establishment which is organized in all respects on the same scale as the United States Patent Office.

By the act of 1790, the duty of transacting this business was devolved upon the secretary of state, the secretary of war, and the attorney-general. In the provision for a board for this purpose found in the act of 1793 the secretary of war is omitted. From that time during a period of more than forty years all the business connected with the granting of patents was transacted by a clerk in the office of the secretary of state, the duties of the secretary in this respect being little more than nominal, and the attorney-general acting only as a legal adviser.

The act of July 14, 1836, reorganized the office and gave it a new and higher position. A commissioner of patents was constituted. Provision was made for a library, which has since become one of the finest of the kind in the country.

The act of 1870 provides for the appointment by the President of one commissioner, one assistant commissioner and three examiners-in-chief. Other officers are appointed by the secretary of the interior, in whose department the patent office is, upon the nomination of the commissioner.

The patent office is an office of record, in which assignments of patents are recordable, and the record is notice to all the world of the facts to be found on record. Under section 4 of the act of 1793, an assignment was not valid unless recorded in the office of the secretary of state; 4 Blackf. 183. See PATENT.

PATENT OFFICE, EXAMINERS IN. Officials in the United States Patent Office, whose duty it is to determine whether the subject-matter of applications for letters patent is such as to entitle the applicant to the grant of such letters. See PATENT OFFICE.

PATENT RIGHT. See PATENT.

PATENT ROLLS. Registers in which are recorded all letters patent granted since 1516. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 346; Whart. L. Lex.

PATENT WRIT. A writ not closed or sealed up. Jacob, Law Dict.; Co. Litt. 289; 7 Co. 20.

PATENTEE. He to whom a patent has been granted. The term is usually applied to one who has obtained letters patent for an invention. See PATENT.

PATER (Lat.). Father. The term is frequently used in genealogical tables.

PATER-FAMILIAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who was sui juris, and not subject to the paternal power.

In order to give a correct idea of what was understood in the Roman law by this term, it is proper to refer briefly to the artificial organization of the Roman family,—the greatest moral phenomenon in the history of the human race. The comprehensive term familia embraced both persons and property: money, lands, houses, slaves, children, all constituted part of this artificial family, this juridical entity, this legal patrimony, the title to which was exclusively vested in the chief or pater-familias, who alone was capax dominii, and who belonged to himself, sui juris.

The word pater-familias is by no means equivalent to the modern expression father of a family, but means proprietor in the strongest sense of that term; it is he qui in domo dominium habet, in whom were centred all property, all power, all authority: he was, in a word, the lord and master, whose authority was unlimited. No one but he who was sui juris, who was pater-familias, was capable of exercising any right of property, or wielding any superiority or power over anything; for nothing could belong to him who was himself alieni juris. Hence the children of the filii familias, as well as those of slaves, belonged to the pater-familias. In the same manner, everything that was acquired by the sons or slaves formed a part of the familia, and, consequently, belonged to its chief. This absolute property and power of the pater-familias, only ceased with his life, unless he voluntarily parted with them by a sale; for the alienation by sale is invariably the symbol resorted to for the purpose of dissolving the stern dominion of the pater-familias over those belonging to the familia. Thus, both emancipation and adoption are the results of imaginary sales,—per imaginarias venditiones. As the daughter remained in the family of her father, grandfather, or great-grandfather, as the case might be, notwithstanding her marriage, it followed as a necessary consequence that the child never belonged to the same family as its mother: there is no civil relationship between them; they are natural relations,—cognati,—but they are not legally related to each other,—agnati; and therefore the child never inherits from its mother, nor the mother from her child. There was, however, a means by which the wife might enter into the family and subject herself to the power of her husband. in manu mariti, and thereby establish a legal relationship between herself and her husband. This marital power of the husband over the wife was generally acquired either coemptione, by the purchase of the wife by the husband from the pater-familias, or usu, by the prescription based on the possession of one year,—the same by which the title to movable property was acquired according to the principles governing the usucapio (usu capere, to obtain by use). Another mode of obtaining the same end was the confarreatio, a sacred ceremony performed by the breaking and eating of a small cake, farreum, by the married couple. It was supposed that by an observance of this ceremony the marital power was produced by the intervention of the gods. This solemn mode of celebrating marriages was peculiar to the patrician families. By means of these fictions and ceremonies the wife became in the eye of the law the daughter of her husband, and the sister of the children to whom she gave birth, who would otherwise have been strangers to her. Well might Gaius say, Fere nulli alii sunt homines qui talem in liberos habeant potestatem qualem nos habemus.

There is some similarity between the agnatio, or civil relationship, of the Romans, and the transmission of the name of the father, under the modern law, to all his descendants in the male line. The Roman law says of the children, patris, non matris, familiam sequuntur; we say, patris, non matris, nomen sequuntur. All the members of the family who, with us, bear the same name, were under that law agnates, or constituted the agnatio, or civil family. Those children only belonged to the family, and were subject to the paternal power, who had been conceived in justis nuptiis, or been adopted. Nuptiæ, or matrimonium, was a marriage celebrated in conformity with the peculiar rules of the civil law. There existed a second kind of marriage, call concubinatus,—a valid union and a real marriage,—which has been often improperly confounded, even by high authority, with concubinage. This confusion of ideas is attributable to a superficial examination of the subject; for the illicit intercourse between a man and a woman which we call concubinage was stigmatized by the opprobrious term stuprum by the Romans, and is spoken of in the strongest terms of reprobation. The concubinatus was the natural marriage, and the only one which those who did not enjoy the jus connubii were permitted to contract. The Roman law recognized two species of marriage, the one civil, and the other natural, in the same manner as there were two kinds of relationship, the agnatio and cognatio. The justæ nuptiæ or justum matrimonium, or civil marriage, could only be contracted by Roman citizens and by those to whom the jus connubii had been conceded: this kind of marriage alone produced the paternal power, the right of inheritance, etc.

But the rapid rise and extraordinary greatness of the city attracted immense crowds of strangers, who, not possessing the jus connubii, could form no other union than that of the concubinatus, which, though authorized by law, did not give rise to those legal effects which flowed from the justæ nuptiæ. By adoption, the person adopted was transferred from one family to another; he passed from the paternal power of one pater-familias to that of another: consequently, no one who was sui juris could be adopted in the strict sense of that word. But there was another species of adoption, called adrogatio, by which a person sui juris entered into another family, and subjected himself to the paternal power of its chief. The effect of the adrogation was not confined to the person adrogated alone, but extended over his family and property. 1 Marcade 7b.

This extraordinary organization of the Roman family, and the unlimited powers and authority vested in the pater-familias, continued until the reign of Justinian, who by his 118th Novel, enacted on the 9th of August, 544, abolished the distinction between the agnatio and cognatio, and established the order of inheritance which, with some modifications, continues to exist at the present day in all countries whose jurisprudence is based on the civil law. See Maine, Anc. L. Ch. 5; GENS; PATRIA POTESTAS.

PATERNA PATERNIS (Lat. the father's to the father's). In French Law. An expression used to signify that, in a succession, the property coming from the father of the deceased descends to his paternal relations.

PATERNAL. That which belongs to the father or comes from him: as paternal power, paternal relation, paternal estate, paternal line. See LINE.

PATERNAL POWER. The authority lawfully exercised by parents over their children. See FATHER.

PATERNAL PROPERTY. That which descends or comes from the father and other ascendants or collaterals of the paternal stock. Domat, Liv. Prél. tit. 3, s. 2, n. 11.

PATERNITY. The state or condition of a father.

The husband is prima facie presumed to be the father of his wife's children born during coverture or within a competent time afterwards: pater is est quem nuptiæ demonstrant; 7 Mart. La. N. S. 553. So if the child is en ventre sa mere at time of marriage; Co. Litt. 123; 8 East 192. In civil law the presumption holds in case of a child born before marriage as well as after; 1 Bla. Com. 446, 454; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 6. In cases of marriage of a widow within ten months after decease of husband, the paternity is to be decided by circumstances; Hargrave, note to Co. Litt. § 188. Marriage within ten months after decease of husband was forbidden by Roman, Danish, and Saxon law, and English law before the Conquest; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 481; Brooke, Abr. Bastardy, pl. 18; Palm. 10; 1 Bla. Com. 456.

The presumption of paternity may always be rebutted by showing circumstances which render it impossible that the husband can be the father; 6 Binn. 283; 8 East 193; Stra. 51, 940; 2 Myl. & K. 349; 3 Paige, Ch. 139; 1 S. & S. 150; T. & R. 138.

The declarations of one or both of the spouses, however, cannot affect the condition of a child born during the marriage; 7 Mart. La. N. s. 553; 3 Paige, Ch. 139. See ACCESS; BASTARD; BASTARDY; LEGITIMACY; PREGNANCY.

PATHOLOGY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The science or doctrine of diseases. In cases of homicides, abortions, and the like, it is of great consequence to the legal practitioner to be acquainted in some degree with pathology. 2 Chitty, Pr. 42, n.

PATIBULUM. A gallows or gibbet. Fleta, l. 2, c. 3, § 9.

PATRIA (Lat.). The country; the men of the neighborhood competent to serve on a jury; a jury. This word is nearly synonymous with pais, which see.

PATRIA POTESTAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The paternal power; the authority which the law vests in the father over the persons and property of his legitimate children.

One of the effects of marriage is the paternal authority over the children born in wedlock. In the early period of the Roman history, the paternal authority was unlimited: the father had the absolute control over his children, and might even, as the domestic magistrate of his family, condemn them to death. They could acquire nothing except for the benefit of the pater-familias; and they were even liable to be sold and reduced to slavery by the author of their existence. But in the progress of civilization this stern rule was gradually relaxed.

There are several instances given in which the emperors interfered to moderate the severity of fathers, and the power to kill the child was restricted and finally abolished during the empire. The father could originally abandon his male child to relieve himself of responsibility for it, but this was forbidden by the institutes. Inst. 4, 8, 7. Over the property of the child the rights of the father were as absolute as over that of the slave; but this power was also moderated under the emperors until in the time of Justinian it was practically destroyed. The power of the pater familias extended to all descendants in the male line, and it was not lost even over those who held the highest offices in the state or became victorious generals.

The children of a daughter were not subject to the paternal authority of her own father but entered into the family of her husband. The paternal power was never exercised by a woman, even if she were herself sui juris. It is for this reason, Ulpian observes, that the family of which a woman, sui juris, was the head, mater familias, commenced and ended with her: mulier autem familiæ suæ et caput et finis est. 1 Ortolan 191.

See PATER FAMILIAS.

The modern civil law has hardly preserved any features of the old Roman jurisprudence concerning the paternal power.

The Louisiana code provides that a child owes honor, respect, and obedience to the parents, but even the power of correction ceases with the age of puberty, and boys at fourteen and girls at twelve years of age may leave the paternal roof in opposition to the will of their parents. By modern law the paternal authority is vested in both parents, but usually exercised by the father alone. During the marriage the parents are entitled to the property of their minor children, subject to the obligation of support and education, paying taxes, repairs, etc. The paternal power ceases with the death of one spouse and is succeeded by tutorship, which, however, usually devolves upon the surviving parent, who can also at death appoint a testamentary tutor.

PATRICIDE. One guilty of killing his father. See PARRICIDE.

PATRIMONIAL. A thing which comes from the father, and, by extension, from the mother or other ancestor.

PATRIMONIUM. In Civil Law. That which is capable of being inherited.

Things capable of being possessed by a single person exclusively of all others are, in the Roman or civil law, said to be in patrimonio; when incapable of being so possessed, they are extra patrimonium.

Most things may be inherited; but there are some which are said to be extra patrimonium, or which are not in commerce. These are such as are common, as the light of heaven, the air, the sea, and the like; things public, as rivers, harbors, roads, creeks, ports, arms of the sea, the sea-shore, highways, bridges, and the like; things which belong to cities and municipal corporations, as public squares, streets, market-houses, and the like. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 421.

PATRIMONY. Any kind of property. Such estate as has descended in the same family; estates which have descended or been devised in a direct line from the father, and, by extension, from the mother or other ancestor. It has been held that the word is not necessarily restricted to property inherited directly from the father. 5 Ir. Ch. Rep. 525.

PATRINUS (Lat.). A godfather.

PATRON. In Ecclesiastical Law. He who has the disposition and gift of an ecclesiastical benefice.

In Roman Law. The former master of a freedman. Dig. 2. 4. 8. 1.

PATRONAGE. The right of appointing to office; as, the patronage of the President of the United States, if abused, may endanger the liberties of the people.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. 2 Bla. Com. 21.

PATRONIZE. To act as patron towards. The occupants of a house cannot be said to patronize it; 9 Bradw. 344. See 48 N. Y. 472.

PATRONUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A modification of the Latin word pater, father. A denomination applied by Romulus to the first senators of Rome, and which they always afterwards bore.

Romulus at first appointed a hundred of them. Seven years afterward, in consequence of the association of Tatius to the Romans, a hundred more were appointed, chosen from the Sabines. Tarquinius Priscus increased the number to three hundred. Those appointed by Romulus and Tatius were called patres majorum gentium, and the others were called patres minorum gentium. These and their descendants constituted the nobility of Rome. The rest of the people were called plebeians, every one of whom was obliged to choose one of these fathers as his patron. The relation thus constituted involved important consequences. The plebeian, who was called cliens (a client), was obliged to furnish the means of maintenance to his chosen patron, to furnish a portion for his patron's daughters, to ransom him and his sons if captured by an enemy, and pay all sums recovered against him by judgment of the courts. The patron, on the other hand, was obliged to watch over the interests of his client, whether present or absent, to protect his person and property, and especially to defend him in all actions brought against him for any cause. Neither could accuse or bear testimony against the other, or give contrary votes, etc. The contract was of a sacred nature; the violation of it was a sort of treason, and punishable as such. According to Cicero (De Repub. ii. 9), this relation formed an integral part of the governmental system, Et habuit plebem in clientelas principum descriptum, which he affirms was eminently useful. Blackstone traces the system of vassalage to this ancient relation of patron and client. It was, in fact, of the same nature as the feudal institutions of the middle ages, designed to maintain order in a rising state by a combination of the opposing interests of the aristocracy and of the common people, upon the principle of reciprocal bonds for mutual interests. Ultimately, by force of radical changes in the institution, the word patronus came to signify nothing more than an advocate.

PATROON. In New York. The lord of a manor. See MANOR.

PATRUELIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A cousin-german by the father's side; the son or daughter of a father's brother. Dig. 38. 10. 1.

PATRUUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An uncle by the father's side; a father's brother. Dig. 38. 10. 10. Patruus magnus is a grandfather's brother, grand-uncle. Patruus major is a great-grandfather's brother. Patruus maximus is a great-grandfather's father's brother.

PAUPER (Lat. poor). One so poor that he must be supported at the public expense.

A laboring man, who has always been able to make a living, and who, until his last sickness, has never had occasion to ask or receive charity, is not a pauper, although without money or property with which to pay the expense of that sickness; 21 Nev. 415. See 16 Viner, Abr. 259; Botts' Poor-Laws; Woodf. Landl. & T. 201.

Before a person can be admitted to sue or defend as a pauper, proof must be given that he is not worth £25, his wearing apparel and the subject-matter of the cause or matter only excepted. He is exempt from court fees. Counsel may be assigned to him, and no fees can be taken from him. Brett, Comm. 681. See POOR.

PAUPERIES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Poverty. In a technical sense, Damnum absque injuria: i. e. a damage done without wrong on the part of the doer: e. g. damage done by an irrational being, as an animal. L. 1, § 3, D. si quod paup. fec.; Calvinus, Lex.

PAVE. To cover with stone, brick, concrete, or any other substantial matter, making a smooth and level surface. 60 N. Y. 22.

To lay or cover with stone, brick, or other material, so as to make a firm, level, or convenient surface for horses, carriages, or persons on foot to travel on. It means as well to cover with asphalt or concrete, as to lay or cover with stone; 110 Mo. 502.

The laying of a cross walk comes within the general designation of paving; 62 N. Y. 224; paving includes flagging, as well as other modes of making a smooth surface for streets and sidewalks; 76 N. Y. 181; 66 Hun 179. A footway made up with gravel, but not paved with stone or flags is a pavement; 15 Q. B. D. 652; 54 L. J. M. C. 147. To pave a street has been held not to include curbing and sidewalks; 9 Wash. 272.

PAVIAGE. A contribution or tax for paving streets or highways.

PAWN. A pledge. A pledge includes, in Louisiana, a pawn and an antichresis; but sometimes pawn is used as the general word, including pledge and antichresis. La. Civ. Code, art. 3101; Hennen, Dig. Pledge. See PLEDGE.

PAWNBROKER. One whose business it is to lend money, usually in small sums, upon pawn or pledge. An ordinance requiring pawnbrokers to keep a book in which shall be entered a description of all property left in pawn, with the name and description of the pledgor and to submit such book to the inspection of the mayor or any police officer on demand, is a valid police regulation; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 101; 111 Ill. 291. And one forbidding them to purchase certain specified articles is not unreasonable as imposing upon pawnbrokers a penalty for doing that which is lawful for other persons to do, as a city may not only regulate their business, but suppress and prohibit it; 30 Ill. App. 203.

An ordinance requiring pawnbrokers to take out a license is not authorized by a statute empowering city councils to make by-laws and ordinances not inconsistent with the laws of the state and necessary to carry out the object of the corporation; 127 Ind. 109. See 78 Ga. 773; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 526; LICENSE; ORDINANCE; POLICE POWER.

PAWNEE. He who receives a pawn or pledge. See PLEDGE.

PAWNOR. One who, being liable to an engagement, gives to the person to whom he is liable a thing to be held as a security for the payment of his debt or the fulfilment of his liability. 2 Kent 577. See PLEDGE.

PAX REGIS (Lat.). That peace or security for life and goods which the king promises to all persons under his protection. Bract. lib. 3, c. 11. See PEACE.

In ancient times there were certain limits which were known by this name. The pax regis, or verge of the court, as it was afterwards called, extended from the palace-gate to the distance of three miles, three furlongs, three acres, nine feet, nine palms, and nine barleycorns; Crabb, C. L. 41; or from the four sides of the king's residence, four miles, three furlongs, nine acres in breadth, nine feet, nine barleycorns, etc.; LL. Edw. Conf. c. 12, et LL. Hen. I.

PAY. To discharge a debt, to deliver a creditor the value of a debt, either in money or in goods, to his acceptance, by which the debt is discharged. 36 N. Y. 527. See 1 Cush. 76.

PAY. A fixed and definite amount given by law to persons in military service in consideration of and as compensation for their personal services. 16 Ct. Cl. 496. See LONGEVITY PAY.

Payable in trade. Payable in such article as the promissor deals in. 114 Mass. 34.

Payable as convenient. A phrase which can be construed only as an extension of credit. 120 Mass. 171.

PAYEE. The person in whose favor a bill of exchange is made payable. See BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

PAYMENT. The fulfilment of a promise, or the performance of an agreement.

The discharge in money of a sum due.

It implies the existence of a debt, of a party to whom it is owed, and of a satisfaction of the debt to that party; 53 Conn. 175.

The word payment is not a technical term: it has been imported into legal proceedings from the exchange, and not from law treatises. When payment is pleaded as a defence, the defendant must prove the payment of money, or something accepted in its stead, made to the plaintiff or to some person authorized in his behalf to receive it; 2 Greenl. Ev. 509.

Payment, in its most general acceptation, is the accomplishment of every obligation, whether it consists in giving or in doing: solutio est præstatio ejus quod in obligatione est.

It follows, therefore, that every act which, while it extinguishes the obligation, has also for its object the release of the debtor and his exemption from liability, is not payment. Payment is doing precisely what the payer has agreed to do. Solvere dicitur cum qui fecit quod facere promisit.

However, practically, the name of payment is often given to methods of release which are not accompanied by the performance of the thing promised. Restrinximus solutiones ad compensationem, ad novationem, ad delegationem, et ad numerationem.

In a more restricted sense, payment is the discharge in money of a sum due. Numeratio est nummariæ solutio. 5 Massé, Droit commerciel 229. That a payment may extinguish a debt, it must be made by a person who has a right to make it, to a person who is entitled to receive it, in something proper to be received both as to kind and quality, and at the appointed place and time.

In the civil law, it is said, where payment is something to be done, it must be done by the debtor himself. If I hire a mechanic to build a steam-engine for me, he cannot against my will substitute in his stead another workman. Where it is something to be given, the general rule is that it can be paid by any one, whether a co-obliger, or surety, or even a third person who has no interest; except that in this last case subrogation will prevent the extinction of the debt as to the debtor, unless the payer at the time of payment act in the name of the debtor, or in his own name to release the debtor. See SUBROGATION.

What constitutes payment. According to Comyns, payment by merchants must be made in money or by bill; Com. Dig. Merchant (F).

It is now the law that payment must be made in money, unless the obligation is, by the terms of the instrument creating it, to be discharged by other means. In the United States, congress has, by the constitution, power to decide what shall be a legal tender; that is, in what form the creditor may demand his payment or must receive it if offered: and congress has determined this by statutes. The same power is exercised by the government of all civilized countries. As to the medium of payment in the United States, see LEGAL TENDER.

In England, Bank of England notes are legal tender. But the creditors may waive this right, and anything which he has accepted as satisfaction for the debt will be considered as payment. What the parties agree shall constitute payment, the law will adjudge to be payment; 115 Ind. 525.

A debt contracted in a foreign country is payable in the currency of that country, and therefore, where the creditor sues in the United States, he is entitled to recover such sum in the money of the United States as equals the debt in the foreign country where it was payable; 34 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 73. Where rent is payable in coin, its value is to be estimated at the market price of the coin at the time and place of payment; 152 Ill. 207. See GOLD.

Upon a plea of payment, the defendant may prove a discharge in bank-notes, negotiable notes of individuals, or a debt already due from the payee, delivered and accepted or discounted as payment; Phil. Ev. Cowen & H. ed. n. 387. Bank-notes, in conformity to usage and common understanding, are regarded as cash; 1 Burr. 452; 9 Johns. 120; 6 Md. 37; unless objected to; 1 Metc. Mass. 356; 8 Ohio 169; 10 Me. 475; 2 Cr. & J. 16, n.; 5 Yerg. 199; 3 Humphr. 162; 6 Ala. N. S. 226. Treasury notes are not cash; 3 Conn. 534. Giving a check is not considered as payment; the holder may treat it as a nullity if he derives no benefit from it, provided he has not been guilty of negligence so as to cause injury to the drawer; 2 B. & P. 518; 4 Ad. & E. 952; 4 Johns. 296; 30 N. H. 256; 78 Cal. 15. See 17 R. I. 746; 8 Misc. Rep. 535; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 535; 39 Minn. 340; 101 N. C. 589; 59 Mo. App. 610. But see 14 How. 240. Giving a check is a conditional payment, and the debt is discharged only when the check is paid, unless it was agreed that the check should be received in satisfaction of the debt; 76 Hun 194.

Payment in forged bills is generally a nullity, both in England and this country; 10 Wheat. 333; 2 Johns. 455; 6 Hill, N. Y. 340; 7 Leigh 617; 3 Hawks 568; 4 Gill & J. 463; 11 Ill. 137; 3 Pa. 330; 5 Conn. 71. So also of counterfeit coin; but an agreement to sell goods and accept specific money is good, and payment in these coins is valid even though they be counterfeit; 1 Term 225; 14 S. & R. 51. The forged notes must be returned in a reasonable time, to throw the loss upon the debtor; 7 Leigh 617; 11 Ill. 137. Payment to a bank in its own notes which are received and afterwards discovered to be forged is a good payment; 2 Parsons, Contr. 622, n. A forged check received as cash and passed to the credit of the customer is good payment; 4 Dall. 234; 10 Vt. 141. Payment in bills of an insolvent bank, where both parties were innocent, has been held no payment; 7 Term 64; 13 Wend. 101; 11 Vt. 576; 9 N. H. 365; 22 Me. 85. On the other hand, it has been held good payment in 1 W. & S. 92; 6 Mass. 185; 12 Ala. 280; 8 Yerg. 175. See 121 U. S. 27. The point is still unsettled, and it is said to be a question of intention rather than of law; Story, Pr. Notes 125, 477*, 641. The payment of bonds, secured by a mortgage, made in Confederate money during the Civil War is held to have been received in good faith, and if accepted and acquiesced in for a long time, a court of equity will not interfere; 145 U. S. 214.

If a bill of exchange or promissory note be given to a creditor and accepted as payment, it shall be a good payment; Benj. Sales 726; Com. Dig. Merchant (F); 30 N. H. 540; 27 Ala. N. S. 254; 16 Ill. 161; 2 Du. 133; 14 Ark. 267; 4 Rich. 600; 34 Me. 324. But regularly a bill of exchange or note given to a creditor shall not be a discharge of the debt till payment of the bill, unless so accepted; 1 Salk. 124.

If the debtor gives his own promissory note, it is held in England and the United States generally not to be payment, unless it be shown that it was so intended; 10 Pet. 567; 4 Mas. 336; 27 N. H. 244; 15 Johns. 247; 9 Conn. 23; 26 E. L. & E. 56.

And if payment be made in the note of a factor or agent employed to purchase goods, or intrusted with the money to be paid for them, if the note be received as payment it will be good in favor of the principal; 1 B. & Ald. 14; 7 B. & C. 17; but not if received conditionally; and this is a question of fact for the jury; 6 Cow. 181; 10 Wend. 271.

It is said that an agreement to receive the debtor's own note in payment must be expressed; 1 Cow. 359; 1 Wash. C. C. 328; 47 Minn. 207; 7 Ind. App. 1; and when so expressed it extinguishes the debt; 5 Wend. 85; 49 Ark. 508; 77 Ga. 463; but if such be not the express agreement of the parties, it only operates to extend the period of the payment of the debt; 131 U. S. 287. Whether there was such an agreement is a question for the jury; 9 Johns. 310; 131 U. S. 287. Acceptance of an indorsed note of a debtor in payment for goods sold, merges and extinguishes the original debt; 6 Misc. Rep. 77. See 115 Ind. 512. But the giving of a void note for an indebtedness does not pay it; 29 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 406.

A bill of exchange drawn on a third person and accepted discharges the debt as to the drawer; 10 Mod. 37; and in an action to recover the price of goods, in England, payment by a bill not dishonored has been held a good defence; 4 Esp. Cas. 46; 1 M. & M. 28; 4 Bingh. 454; 5 Maule & S. 62.

Retaining a draft on a third party an unreasonable length of time will operate as payment if loss be occasioned thereby; 13 S. & R. 318; 2 Wash. C. C. 191; Ans. Contr. 359. The receipt of a draft, in the absence of an express agreement, does not constitute a payment of the debt for which the draft is drawn; 92 Ga. 511. See 62 Hun 376.

In the sale of a chattel, if the note of a third person be accepted for the price, it is good payment; 3 Cow. 272; 1 D. & B. 291. Not so, however, if the note be the promise of one of the partners in payment of a partnership debt; 4 Dev. 91, 460.

In Maine and Massachusetts, the presumption where a negotiable note is taken, whether it be the debtor's promise or that of a third person, is that it is intended as payment; 6 Mass. 143; 8 Me. 298; 37 id. 419. The fact that a note was usurious and void was allowed to overcome this presumption; 11 Mass. 361. Generally, the question will depend upon the fact whether the payment was to have been made in notes or the receiving them was a mere accommodation to the purchaser; 17 Mass. 1. And the presumption never attaches where non-negotiable notes are given; 15 Me. 340.

Payment may be made through the intervention of a third party who acts as the agent of both parties: as, for example, a stakeholder. If the money be deposited with him to abide the event of a legal wager, neither party can claim it until the wager is determined, and then he is bound to pay it to the winner; 4 Campb. 37. If the wager is illegal, the depositor may reclaim the money at any time before it is paid over; 8 B. & C. 221; 29 E. L. & E. 424. And at any time after notice given in such case he may hold the stakeholder responsible, even though he may have paid it over; see 2 Pars. Contr. 138.

An auctioneer is often a stake-holder, as in case of money deposited to be made over to the vender if a good title is made out. In such case the purchaser cannot reclaim except on default in receiving a clear title. But if the contract has been rescinded by the parties there need be no notice to the stake-holder in case of a failure to perform the condition; 2 M. & W. 244; 1 M. & R. 614.

A payment of a debt by a stranger without the debtor's request, if accepted as such by the creditor, discharges the debt so far as the creditor is concerned, and also as to the debtor, if he ratify it; 38 W. Va. 390.

A transfer of funds, called by the civil-law phrase a payment by delegation, is payment only when completely effected; 2 Pars. Contr. 137; and an actual transfer of claim or credit assented to by all the parties is a good payment; 2 id.; 5 B. & Ald. 228; 7 N. H. 845, 397; 17 Mass. 400. This seems to be very similar to payment by drawing and acceptance of a bill of exchange.

Where a purchaser contracts to pay a certain amount in printing, the seller cannot enforce the collection of such amount in cash, as a profit presumably attaches to the printing; 7 Wash. 316: unless, of course, the party declines to pay in printing.

Foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure a debt operates as payment made when the foreclosure is complete; but if the property mortgaged does not produce a sum equal in value to the amount of the debt then due, it is payment pro tanto only; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 524; 3 Mass. 562; 2 Gall. 152; 3 Mass. 474; 10 Pick. 396; 11 Wend. 106. A transfer of a worthless mortgage in payment of a debt, does not discharge the debt where neither party at the time of the transfer knew that the mortgage was worthless; 75 Hun 445. A legacy also is payment, if the intention of the testator that it should be so considered can be shown, and if the debt was liquidated at the death of the testator; 1 Esp. 187; 12 Mass. 391; 5 Cow. 368; 61 Vt. 110. See LEGACY.

When money is sent by letter, even though the money is lost, it is good payment, and the debtor is discharged, if he was expressly authorized or directed by the creditor so to send it, or if such authority can be presumed from the course of trade; Benj. Sales 727; 11 M. & W. 233; and in the case of an insurance premium, such premium is paid when the letter containing it is deposited in the postoffice, addressed to the company; 77 Hun 556. But, even if the authority be given or inferred, at least ordinary diligence must be used by the debtor to have the money safely conveyed. See 3 Mass. 249; Ry. & M. 149; 1 Exch. 477.

Payment must be of the whole sum; and even where a receipt in full has been given for a payment of part of an ascertained sum, it has been held not to be an extinction of the debt; 5 Co. 117; 2 B. & C. 477; 3 N. H. 518; 11 Vt. 60; 37 Me. 361; 10 Ad. & E. 121; 4 Gill & J. 305; 9 Johns. 333; 11 How. 100.

But payment of part may be left to the jury as evidence that the whole has been paid; 5 Cra. 11; 3 N. H. 518; and payment of a part at a different time; 2 Metc. Mass. 283; or place; 3 Hawks 580; or in any way more beneficial to the creditor than that prescribed by the contract, is good; 15 M. & W. 23. Giving a chattel, though of less value than the debt, is a discharge; Dy. 75 a; 2 Litt. 49; 3 Barb. Ch. 621; or rendering certain services, with the consent of the creditor; 5 Day 359; or assigning certain property; 5 Johns. 386; 13 Mass. 424. So if a stranger pay a part, or give his note for a part, and this is accepted, it is a good payment of the debt; 4 B. & C. 500; 13 Ala. N. S. 353; 14 Wend. 116; 2 Metc. Mass. 283; 53 Minn. 88. And where a creditor by process of law compels the payment of a part of his claim, by a suit for that part only, this is generally a discharge of the whole: 11 S. & R. 78; 16 Johns. 121. See ACCORD.

The payment must have been accepted knowingly. Many instances are given in the older writers to illustrate acceptance; thus if the money is counted out, and the payee takes a part and puts it in a bag, this is a good payment, and if any be lost it is the payee's loss; 5 Mod. 398. Where A paid B £100 in redemption of a mortgage, and B bade C put it in his closet, and C did so, and A demanded his papers, which B refused to deliver, and A demanded back his money, and B directed C to give it to him, and C did, it was held to be a payment of the mortgage; Viner, Abr. Payment (E). When interest coupons on railroad bonds have been presented and paid at the usual place of payment, with money furnished by a third party, a private arrangement between such third party and the mortgagor that the transaction shall constitute a purchase of the coupons and not payment, will not be enforced against the bondholders; 138 Pa. 494. One who lends money to a company to take up its coupons, is not entitled to be paid out of funds in the hands of the receiver; 12 Bush 673.

Generally, there can be but little doubt as to acceptance or non-acceptance, and the question is one of fact for the jury to determine under the circumstances of each particular case. Of course where notes or bank-bills are given in payment of a debt, the evidence that they were so given is to be the same as evidence of any other fact relating to payment.

Evidence of payment. Evidence that any thing has been done and accepted as payment is evidence of payment.

A receipt is prima facie evidence of payment; but a receipt acknowledging the payment of ten dollars and acquitting and releasing from all obligations would be a receipt for ten dollars only; 5 B. & Ald. 696; 18 Pick. 325; 1 Edw. Ch. 341. And a receipt is only prima facie evidence of payment; 2 Taunt. 241; 7 Cow. 334; 4 Ohio 346; 18 Colo. 538. For cases explaining this rule, see, also, 2 Mas. 141; 11 Mass. 27; 9 Johns. 310; 4 H. & M'H. 219; 96 Ala. 496; 46 Ill. App. 121. And it may be shown that the particular sum stated in the receipt was not paid, and, also, that no payment has been made; 2 Term 366; 26 N. H. 12; 9 Conn. 401; 10 Humphr. 188; 13 Pa. 46. As against strangers thereto, a receipt is incompetent evidence of the payment thereby acknowledged; 41 Neb. 93. See RECEIPT.

Payment may be presumed by the jury in the absence of direct evidence; thus, possession by the debtor of a security after the day of payment, which security is usually given up upon payment of the debt, is prima facie evidence of payment by the debtor; 1 Stark. 374; 9 S. & R. 385; 83 Tex. 385; 36 Neb. 741. See 37 Ill. App. 564.

If an acceptor produce a bill of exchange, this is said to afford in England no presumption of payment unless it is shown to have been in circulation after he accepted it; 2 Campb. 439. See, also, 14 M. & W. 379. But in the United States such possession is prima facie evidence of payment; 7 S. & R. 116; 4 Johns. 296; 2 Pick. 204. Payment is conclusively presumed from lapse of time. After twenty years' non-demand, unexplained, the court will presume a payment without the aid of a jury; 1 Campb. 27; 14 S. & R. 15; 6 Cow. 401; 2 Cra. 180; 112 Mo. 300; 152 Pa. 102; 65 Fed. Rep. 910. Facts which destroy the reason of this rule may rebut the presumption; 1 Pick. 60; 2 La. 481; 84 Me. 107; 23 Or. 313. See 34 S. C. 289; 50 Ark. 485; 73 Hun 177. And a jury may infer payment from a shorter lapse of time, especially if there be attendant circumstances favoring the presumption; 7 S. & R. 410. As to presumptions against the existence of the debt, see 5 Barb. 63. The statute of limitations does not apply to an action by a legatee to collect a legacy which is a charge on land, and no presumption of payment arises from the lapse of twenty years; 82 Wis. 398. Where an indebtedness is shown, it is presumed to remain unpaid until the contrary is shown; 56 Mo. App. 535.

In a suit to enforce a vendor's lien the acknowledgment of payment contained in the deed is only prima facie evidence of payment; 150 Ill.212.

A presumption may rise from the course of dealing between the parties, or the regular course of trade; Tayl. Ev. 194. Thus, after two years it was presumed that a workman had been paid, as it was shown that the employer paid his workmen every Saturday night, and this man had been seen waiting among others; 1 Esp. 296. See, also, 3 Camp. 10.

A receipt for the last year's or quarter's rent is prima facie evidence of the payment of all the rents previously due; 2 Pick. 204. If the last instalment on a bond is paid in due form, it is evidence that the others have been paid; if paid in a different form, that the parties are acting under a new agreement.

Where receipts had been regularly given for the same amount, but for a sum smaller than was due by the agreement, it was held evidence of full payment; 4 Mart. La. 698.

Who may make payment. Payment may be made by the primary debtor, and by other persons from whom the creditor has a right to demand it.

An agent may make payment for his principal. An attorney may discharge the debt against his client; 5 Bingh. 506. One of any number of joint and several obligors, or one of several joint obligors, may discharge the debt; Viner, Abr. Payment (B). Payment may be made by a third person, a stranger to the contract.

It may be stated, generally, that any act done by any person in discharge of the debt, if accepted by the creditor, will operate as payment. In the civil law there are many exceptions to this rule, introduced by the operation of the principle of subrogation. Most of these have no application in the common law, but have been adopted, in some instances, as a part of the law merchant. See SUBROGATION; CONTRIBUTION.

To whom payment may be made. Payment is to be made to the creditor. But it may be made to an authorized agent. And if made in the ordinary course of business, without notice requiring the payment to be made to himself, it is binding upon the principal; 6 M. & G. 166; 4 B. & Ald. 395; 41 La. Ann. 1. Payment to a third person by appointment of the principal will be substantially payment to the principal: 1 Phill. Ev. 200. Payment to an agent who made the contract with the payee (without prohibition) is payment to the principal; 16 Johns. 86; 2 Gall. 565; 10 B. & C. 755. But payment may be made to the principal after authority given to an agent to receive; 6 Maule & S. 156. Payments made to an agent after the death of the principal do not discharge the debtor's obligation, even if made in ignorance of the principal's death; 150 U. S. 520. Payment to a broker or factor who sells for a principal not named is good; 11 East 36. Payment to an agent, when he is known to be such, will be good, if made upon the terms authorized; 11 East 36; if there be no notice not to pay to him; 3 B. & P. 485; 15 East 65; and even after notice, if the factor had a lien on the money when paid; 5 B. & Ald. 27. If the broker sells goods as his own, payment is good though the mode varies from that agreed on; 1 Maule & S. 147; 2 C. & P. 49. Bankers are not agents of the owner to receive payment of the notes by reason simply of the fact that the notes were made payable at their bank; and moneys left with them to be used as payment are not thereby the moneys of the owner of the notes; 134 U. S. 68.

Payment to an attorney is as effectual as payment to the principal himself; 2 Pars. Contr. 727; 102 Mich. 483. So, also, to a solicitor in chancery after a decree; 2 Ch. Cas. 38. The attorney of record may give a receipt and discharge the judgment; 1 Call 147; 1 Coxe 214; 1 Pick. 347; 10 Johns. 220; 2 Bibb 382; if made within one year; 1 Me. 257. Not so of an agent appointed by the attorney to collect the debt; 2 Dougl. 623. Payment by an officer to an attorney whose power has been revoked before the officer received the execution did not discharge the officer; 13 Mass. 465 See, also, 1 Des. Ch. 461. Payment to one of two co-partners discharges the debt; 8 Wend. 542; 2 Blackf. 371; 1 Ill. 107; 6 Maule & S. 156; 1 Wash. C. C. 77; even after dissolution; 4 C. & P. 108. And see 7 N. H. 568. So payment to one of two joint creditors is good, though they are not partners; 4 J. J. Marsh. 367. But payment by a banker to one of several joint depositors without the assent of the others was held a void payment; 1 M. & R. 145; 4 E. L. & E. 342.

Payment to the wife of the creditor is not a discharge of the debt, unless she is expressly or impliedly his agent; 2 Scott N. R. 372; 2 Freem. 178; 22 Me. 335; as to payment to the husband, see 66 Hun 633. One who purchases the property of a married woman through the agency of her husband, must pay for it precisely as if he had purchased through an agent who sustained no such relation; 116 Ind. 164. An auctioneer employed to sell real estate has no authority to receive the purchase-money by virtue of that appointment merely; 1 M. & R. 326. Usually, the terms of sale authorize him to receive the purchase-money; 5 M. & W. 645. Payment was made to a person sitting in the creditor's counting-room and apparently doing his business, and it was held good; 1 M. & M. 200; 5 Taunt. 307; but payment to an apprentice so situated was held not to be good;

2 Cr. & M. 304. Payment to a person other than the legal owner of the claim must be shown to have been made to one entitled to receive the money; 114 N. Y. 481. Generally, payment to the agent must be made in money, to bind the principal; 10 B. & C. 760; 61 Vt. 534; 40 Kan. 395. Power to receive money does not authorize an agent to commute; 1 Wash. C. C. 454; 1 Pick. 347; nor to submit to arbitration; 5 How. 891. See, also, Story, Ag. § 99.

An agent authorized to receive money cannot bind his principal by receiving goods; 4 C. & P. 501; or a note; 5 M. & W. 645; but a subsequent ratification would remedy any such departure from authority; and it is said that slight acts of acquiescence will be deemed ratification. Payment to one of several joint creditors of his part will not alter the nature of the debt so as to enable the others to sue separately; 4 Tyrwh. 488. Payment to one of several executors has been held sufficient; 3 Atk. 695. Payment to a trustee generally concludes the cestui que trust in law; 5 B. & Ad. 96. Payment of a debt to a marshal or sheriff having custody of the person of the debtor does not satisfy the plaintiff; 4 B. & C. 32. Interest may be paid to a scrivener holding the mortgage deed or bond, and also the principal, if he deliver up the bond; otherwise of a mortgage-deed as to the principal, for there must be a re-conveyance; 1 Salk. 157. It would seem, then, that in those states where no re-conveyance is needed, a payment of the principal to a person holding the security would be good, at least prima facie.

Subsequent ratification of the agent's acts is equivalent to precedent authority to receive money; Pothier, Obl. n. 528.

When to be made. Payment must be made at the exact time agreed upon. This rule is held very strictly in law; but in equity payment will be allowed at a time subsequent, generally when damages can be estimated and allowed by way of interest; 8 East 208; 3 Pick. 414; 5 id. 106, 187. Where payment is to be made at a future day, of course nothing can be demanded till the time of payment, and, if there be a condition precedent to the liability, not until the condition has been performed. And where goods had been sold "at six or nine months' credit," the debtor was allowed the option; 5 Taunt. 338.

Where no time of payment is specified, the money is to be paid immediately on demand; 1 Pet. 455; 4 Rand. 346. When payment is to be made at a certain time, it may be made at a different time if the plaintiff will accept; Viner, Abr. Payment (H); and it seems that the debtor cannot compel the creditor to receive payment before the debt is due. The time of payment of a pecuniary obligation is a material provision in the contract, and a creditor cannot be compelled by statute to accept payment in advance; 111 N. Y. 1.

Where to be made. Payment must be made at the place agreed upon, unless both the parties consent to a change. If no place of payment is mentioned, the payer must seek out the payee; 2 Pars. Part. 751; Moore, P. C. 274; Shepp. Touchst. 378; 2 M. & W. 228; 20 E. L. & E. 498. Refusal to receive payment offered at a place other than the stipulated place of payment, except upon certain conditions, is an implied waiver of the right to have the payment made in the place agreed on; 37 Fed. Rep. 286. Where there is a covenant for the payment of rent, the tenant must seek the landlord; 8 Exch. 689. A lessor must demand the rent upon the land on the day when it becomes due at a convenient time before sunset, in order to re-enter for breach of condition upon non-payment; 47 Conn. 366; 63 Ind. 415. It has been held that a licensor of a patent must apply to the licensee for an account and payment; 6 Fed. Rep. 493.

So, too, the creditor is entitled to call for payment of the whole of his claim at one time, unless the parties have stipulated for payment otherwise.

Questions often arise in regard to the payment of debts and legacies by executors and administrators. These questions are generally settled by statute regulations.

As a general rule, debts are to be paid first, then specific legacies. The personal property is made liable for the testator's debts, and, after that is exhausted, the real estate, under restrictions varying in the different states.

See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; EXECUTOR; ADMINISTRATOR; LEGACY.

In the payment of mortgages, if the mortgage was made by the deceased, the personal estate is liable to discharge the mortgage debts; 2 Cruise, Dig. 147. But where the deceased acquired the land subject to the mortgage, the mortgaged estate must pay the debt; 3 Johns. Ch. 252; 2 Bro. C. C. 57; 24 Pa. 203. See MORTGAGE.

Effect of Payment. The effect of payment is—first, to discharge the obligation; and it may happen that one payment will discharge several obligations by means of a transfer of the evidence of obligations; Pothier, Obl. 554, n. Payment by one who is primarily liable to one entitled to collect the debt is an extinguishment of the debt and all liability thereunder, and however held, transferred, or assigned, it is ever afterwards a mere nullity; 84 Va. 806. Second, payment does not prevent a recovery back when made under mistake of fact. The general rule is that a mistake or ignorance of law furnishes no ground to reclaim money paid voluntarily under a claim of right; 2 Kent 491; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 123; 44 Mo. App. 249; 27 Ct. Cls. 547; 29 id. 115; 99 Cal. 607. But acts done under a mistake or ignorance of an essential fact are voidable and relievable both in law and equity; Poll. Cont. 439; 34 Fla. 471. Laws of a foreign country are matters of fact; Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1304; 9 Pick. 112; and the several United States are foreign to each other in this respect. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; FOREIGN LAWS. In Kentucky and Connecticut there is a power of recovery equally in cases of mistake of law and of fact; 19 Conn. 548; 3 B. Monr. 510. In Ohio it may be remedied in equity; 11 Ohio 223. In New York a distinction is taken between ignorance of the law and mistakes of law, giving relief in the latter case; 18 Wend. 422; 2 Barb. Ch. 508. In England, money paid under a mistake of law cannot be recovered back; 4 Ad. & E. 858. The payment of a note for the purchase price of land, after the discovery of a mistake in computing the price, is no bar to an action to recover an overpayment resulting from such mistake; 158 Mass. 352. See IGNORANCE; MISTAKE. A payment under protest is nevertheless voluntary, unless there was duress or coercion; 3 N. Dak. 160; 136 N. Y. 363. Third, part payment of a note will have the effect of waiver of notice of protest. Fourth, payment of part of the debt will bar the application of the Statute of Limitations as to the residue; 22 N. H. 219; 6 Md. 201; 8 Mass. 134; 28 E. L. & E. 454; even though made in goods and chattels; 4 Ad. & E. 71. But it must be shown conclusively that the payment was made as part of a larger debt; 6 M. & W. 824; 20 Miss. 663; 9 Ark. 455; 11 Barb. 554; 24 Vt. 216. See, also, 3 Pars. Contr. 8th ed., 74; EARNEST; PROTEST, PAYMENT UNDER.

The Burden of Proof, on a plea of payment, is on the party pleading it; 7 Misc. Rep. 668; 91 Ga. 791; 33 Neb. 519; 1 Mo. App. Rep. 295. As to appropriation of payments, see that title. One English and one American case reported since its publication may be here cited as stating the general principles. When a debtor pays money on account and makes no appropriation, the creditor has the right to make it and may exercise it up to the last moment by action or otherwise; [1897] A. C. 286, reversing the court of appeal. The right of appropriation of payments belongs exclusively to the debtor and creditor and no third party can demand a change in appropriations assented to by them; 10 U. S. App. 415.

See NOVATION.

In Pleading. The name of a plea by which the defendant alleges that he has paid the debt claimed in the declaration; this plea must conclude to the country. See Chitty, Plead. In Pennsylvania a plea of payment, with leave, etc., is in common use; under it a defendant may give in evidence anything tending to show that, of right, the plaintiff cannot recover.

PAYMENT INTO COURT. In Practice. Depositing a sum of money with the proper officer of the court by the defendant in a suit, for the benefit of the plaintiff and in answer to his claim.

It may be made in some states under statutory provisions; 18 Ala. 293; 7 Ill. 671; 1 Barb. 21; 5 Harring. 17; 24 Ga. 211; 16 Tex. 461; 11 Ind. 532; and see 3 E. L. & E. 185; and in most by a rule of court made for the purpose; 2 Bail. 28; 7 Ired. 100; 1 Swan 92; in which case notice of an intention to apply must, in general, have been previously given.

The effect is to divest the defendant of all right to withdraw the money; 1 Wend. 191; 3 Watts 248; except by leave of court; 1 Coxe 298; and to admit conclusively every fact which the plaintiff would be obliged to prove in order to recover it; 1 B. & C. 3; 6 M. & W. 9; 1 Dougl. Mich. 330; 24 Vt. 140; 66 Pa. 27; as, that the amount tendered is due; 1 Campb. 558; 5 Mass. 365; 2 Wend. 431; for the cause laid in the declaration; 5 Bingh. 28, 32; 2 B. & P. 550; 5 Pick. 285; to the plaintiff in the character in which he sues; 2 Campb. 441; the jurisdiction of the court; 5 Esp. 19; that the contract was made; 3 Campb. 52; and broken as alleged; 1 B. & C. 3; but only in reference to the amount paid in; 7 Johns. 315; 3 E. L. & E. 548; and nothing beyond such facts; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 206.

Generally, it relieves the defendant from the payment of further costs unless judgment is recovered for a sum larger than that paid in; 1 Wash. 10; 3 Wend. 326; 2 Miles 65; 2 Rich. 64; 24 Vt. 140; 32 Fed. Rep. 316. As to the capacity in which the officer receiving the money acts, see 1 Coxe 298; 2 Bail. 28; 17 Ala. 293.

Payment of money into court, when the declaration is on a special contract, is an acknowledgment of the right of action to the amount of the sum brought in, and no more; 1 Tidd's Pr. 624. It does not waive the benefit of a defence, though that be to the whole claim; 66 Pa. 27; 100 U. S. 673. But no defence can deprive the plaintiff of the right to the money in court. See TENDER.

PAYS. Country. Trial per pays, trial by jury (the country). See IN PAIS; PAIS.

PEACE. The concord or final agreement in a fine of land. 18 Edw. I. modus levandi finis.

The tranquillity enjoyed by a political society, internally by the good order which reigns among its members, and externally by the good understanding it has with all other nations. Applied to the internal regulations of a nation, peace imports, in a technical sense, not merely a state of repose and security as opposed to one of violence or warfare, but likewise a state of public order and decorum; Hamm. N. P. 139; 12 Mod. 566; 86 Mich. 175.

The term peace in English and American law is used in a general way to express that condition which is violated by the commission of crime. In modern times it is expressed in England by the phrase king's peace, and in this country peace of the state or commonwealth. But originally the phrase king's peace had no such broad meaning, but was used only in connection with crimes committed against persons, or in places, or at times and seasons, which were under the special protection of the king. See PAX REGIS. "Breach of the king's peace was an act of personal disobedience, and a much graver matter than an ordinary breach of public order; it made the wrong-doer the king's enemy. The notion of the king's peace appears to have had two distinct origins. These were, first, the special sanctity of the king's house, which may be regarded as differing only in degree from that which Germanic usage attached everywhere to the homestead of a free man; and, secondly, the special protection of the king's attendants and servants, and other persons whom he thought fit to place on the same footing. . . . The rapid extension of the king's peace till it becomes, after the Norman Conquest, the normal and general safeguard of public order, seems peculiarly English. On the continent the king appears to have been recognized as protector of the general peace, besides having power to grant special protection or peace of a higher order, from a much earlier time." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 22.

There was the peace of the church, both that of the parish and the minster; so there was the peace of the sheriff, and of each lord, and indeed of every householder, for the breach of which atonement could be exacted. In writing of the criminal law of England in the twelfth century it is said, "The time has not yet come when the king's peace will be eternal and cover the whole land. Still we have here an elastic notion; if the king can bestow his peace on a privileged person by a writ of protection, can he not put all men under his peace by proclamation." See 2 Poll. & Maitl. 451-2. The phrase peace of the king was in that period used to express the idea that the crime which was alleged to be in breach of the "peace of God and of our lord the king," was one of those reserved as specially punishable in behalf of the king himself. These crimes were the original pleas of the crown but the king's peace by an easy process extended itself "until it had become an all-embracing atmosphere;" id. 462. That general peace which is now denominated the peace of the king or of the state, as the case may be, was in the early days protected only by the hundred court and the ealdorman. It is possible that mediæval usage which applied to an inferior court the phrase the peace of the lord who held it, dates from the earliest period of the administration of justice. There is said to be some evidence that in the tenth century the phrase peace of the witan, was used, but no authority for the use of the term folk-peace; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 23. See also Pollock, The King's Peace, Oxford Lectures; Inderwick, The King's Peace.

The Lord Chancellor and the judges of the Queen's Bench Divison of the High Court are conservators of the peace at common law; they have all the common-law powers for the preservation of the peace which are possessed by other conservators, such as sheriffs and justices of the peace; they may command all men, whether private citizens, soldiers, or constables, to assist in the suppression of unlawful assemblies, and may arrest peace-breakers, by command, on view of the breach, or by their warrants.

PEACE OF GOD. The words, "in the peace of God and the said commonwealth, then and there being," as used in indictments for homicide and in the definition of murder, mean merely that it is not murder to kill an alien enemy in time of war, provided such killing occur in the actual exercise of war; Whart. Cr. Law § 310; 13 Minn. 341.

PEACE OF GOD AND THE CHURCH. The freedom from suits at law between the terms. Spelman, Gloss.; Jacob, Law Dict. See PEACE.

PEACEABLE ASSEMBLY. See ASSEMBLY; LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

PECK. A measure of capacity, equal to two gallons. See MEASURE.

PECULATION. The unlawful appropriation by a depository of public funds, of the property of the government intrusted to his care, to his own use or that of others. Domat, Suppl. au Droit Public, l. 3, tit. 5. See EMBEZZLEMENT.

PECULIARS. In Ecclesiastical Law. A parish in England which has jurisdiction of ecclesiastical matters within itself and independent of the ordinary.

They may be either—

Royal, which includes the sovereign's free chapels;

Of the archbishops, excluding the jurisdiction of the bishops and archdeacons;

Of the bishops, excluding the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese in which they are situated;

Of the bishops in their own diocese, excluding archdeaconal jurisdiction;

Of deans, deans and chapters, prebendaries, and the like, excluding the bishop's jurisdiction in consequence of ancient compositions.

See 1 Phill. Eccl. 202, n. 245; Skinn. 589; 3 Bla. Com. 65; COURT OF PECULIARS.

PECULIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Private property.

The most ancient kind of peculium was the peculium profectitium of the Roman law, which signified that portion of the property acquired by a son or slave which the father or master allowed him, to be managed as he saw fit. In modern civil law there are other kinds of peculium, viz.: peculium castrense, which includes all movables given to a son by relatives and friends on his going on a campaign, all the presents of comrades, and his military pay and the things bought with it: peculium quasi-castrense, which includes all acquired by a son by performing the duties of a public or spiritual office or of an advocate, and also gifts from the reigning prince; peculium adventitium, which includes the property of a son's mother and relatives on that side of the house, and all which comes to him on a second marriage of his parents, and, in general, all his acquisitions which do not come from his father's property and do not come under castrense or quasi-castrense peculium.

The peculium profectitium remains the property of the father. The peculium castrense and quasi-castrense are entirely the property of the son. The peculium adventitium belongs to the son; but he cannot alien it nor dispose of it by will; nor can the father, unless under peculiar circumstances, alien it without consent of the son. Mackeldey, Civ. Law, § 557; Inst 2. 9. 1; Dig. 15. 1. 5. 3; Pothier, ad Pand. lib. 50, tit. 17, c. 2, art. 3.

A master is not entitled to the extraordinary earnings of his apprentices which do not interfere with his services so as to affect the master's profits. An apprentice was therefore decreed to be entitled to salvage, in opposition to his master's claim for it. 2 Cra. 270.

PECUNIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Property, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal. Things in general (omnes res).

The law of the Twelve Tables said, uti quisque pater familias legasset super pecunia tutelave rei suæ ita jus esto: in whatever manner a father of a family may have disposed of his property or of the tutorship of his things, let this disposition be law. 1 Lecons Elém. du Dr. Civ. Rom. 288. But Paulus, in l. 5, D. de verb. signif., gives it a narrower sense than res, which he says means what is not included within patrimony, pecunia what is. Vicat, Voc. Jur. In a still narrower sense, it means those things only which have measure, weight, and number, and most usually strictly money. Id. The general sense of property occurs, also, in the old English law. Leg. Edw. Confess. c. 10.

Flocks were the first riches of the ancients; and it is from pecus that the words pecunia, peculium, peculatus, are derived. In old English law pecunia often retains the force of pecus. So often in Domesday: pastura ibidem pecuniæ villæ, i. e. pasture for cattle of the village. So vivæ pecuniæ, live stock. Leg. Edw. Confess. c. 10; Emendat. Willielmi Primi ad Leges Edw. Confess.; Cowell.

PECUNIA NUMERATA (Lat.). Money given in payment of a debt.

Properly used of the creditor, who is properly said to number, i. e. count out, the money to the debtor which he must pay, and improperly of the debtor, who is said to number or count out the money to the creditor, i. e. to pay it. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

PECUNIA NON-NUMERATA (Lat.). Money not paid or numbered.

The exceptio non-numeratæ pecuniæ (plea of money not paid) is allowed to the principal or surety by the creditor. Calvinus, Lex.

PECUNIA TRAJECTITIA (Lat.). A loan of money which, either itself or in the shape of goods bought with it, is to be carried over the sea, the lender to take the risk from the commencement of the voyage till arrival at the port of destination, and on that account to have higher interest; which interest is not essential to the contract, but, if reserved, is called fœnus nauticum. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 398 b. The term fœnus nauticum is sometimes applied to the transaction as well as the interest, making it coextensive with pecunia trajectitia.

PECUNIARY. That which relates to money. A pecuniary provision does not apply to a provision in an agreement for alimony specifically dividing personal property of the parties; 61 Me. 395. The exemption from registration of annuities without regard to pecuniary consideration was held to include the case of a grantee's giving up his business to the grantor; 4 Term 790; 5 id. 639. Bank notes; 3 id. 554; 1 B. & P. 208; checks; 8 Term 328; and a verbal promise to pay a debt in full; 6 Gray 327; are pecuniary considerations. But the assignment of a leasehold interest is not; 2 B. & B. 702; or a transfer of stock; 3 B. & A. 602; or a surrender of a life interest in a sum of money and of a contingent interest in the corpus; 2 El. & Bl. 374; 2 B. & C. 875.

PECUNIARY CAUSES. Causes in ecclesiastical courts where satisfaction is sought for withholding ecclesiastical dues or the doing or neglecting some act connected with the church. 3 Bla. Com. 88. As to what causes are ecclesiastical, see 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 39.

PECUNIARY LEGACY. See LEGACY.

PECUNIARY LOSS. A loss of money, or of something by which money or something of money value may be acquired. 32 Barb. 33.

PECUNIARY PROFIT. An academy is not a corporation for pecuniary profit. 116 Ill. 376.

PEDAGIUM (Lat. pes, foot). Money paid for passing by foot or horse through any forest or country. Cassan de Coutum. Burgund. p. 118; Rot. Vasc. 22 Edw. III. m. 34.

PEDAULUS (Lat. pes, foot). In Civil Law. A judge who sat at the foot of the tribunal, i. e. on the lowest seats, ready to try matters of little moment at command of the prætor. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PEDDLER. Persons who travel about the country with merchandise for the purpose of selling it.

An itinerant trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them, to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale, and sells them, at a fixed place of business. A petty chapman, or other trading person going from town to town, or to other men's houses, and travelling either on foot or with horses, or otherwise, carrying to sell or expose to sale, any goods, wares, or merchandise. 107 Ind. 502; 12 Cush. 493; 63 Hun 123. Any person carrying a wagon, cart, or buggy for the purpose of exhibiting or delivering any wares or merchandise. N. C. Act 1895, c. 116.

An itinerant individual, ordinarily without local habitation or place of business, who travels about the country carrying commodities for sale. 75 Ia. 74.

The distinctive feature has been held not to consist in the mode of transportation, though one of the statutory modes is essential to constitute a peddler, but in the fact that the peddler goes from house to house or place to place carrying his merchandise with him and concurrently sells and delivers it; 87 Ala. 144; 140 N. Y. 187. One who, having a place of business in another town, goes about delivering goods at the houses of his customers, in pursuance of orders previously taken, and takes orders for future delivery, is not a peddler; 140 N. Y. 187; 140 Pa. 158; 113 N. C. 681; but one who manufactures and deals in proprietary medicines who, although having a permanent manufactory and residence, yet attends county fairs and publicly recommends his medicines as a cure for certain ailments, is held a peddler; 85 Ia. 21.

The driver of a delivery wagon who takes orders for goods and subsequently delivers them is not a peddler; 55 N. J. L. 522; nor is one who merely delivers goods previously sold by another; 88 Ia. 191; or a canvasser; 135 Ill. 36; or one who exhibits samples of cloth and takes orders for clothing to be made therefrom; 28 Wkly. L. Bul. 107.

But one who goes from house to house with merchandise, selling the same on the instalment plan is held a peddler; 64 N.

W. Rep. (Mich.) 333; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 315.

A state may impose a tax upon itinerant peddlers and require them to take out a license to practice their trade; 156 U. S. 296; but it may not discriminate between its own citizens and non-residents; 12 Wall. 418; 103 U. S. 344; 64 N. H. 48; 84 Ga. 754; nor charge a higher price to the latter for a license than it imposes on the former; 64 N. H. 508. See COMMERCE; LICENSE.

PEDIGREE. A succession of degrees from the origin: it is the state of the family as far as regards the relationship of the different members, their births, marriages, and deaths. This term is applied to persons or families who trace their origin or descent.

On account of the difficulty of proving in the ordinary manner, by living witnesses, facts which occurred in remote times, hearsay evidence has been admitted to prove a pedigree: As declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage may be given in evidence in matters of pedigree; 117 U. S. 397. See Rawle, Covenants § 17 N. 1; Warv. Abs. of Title 33, 313. See DECLARATION; HEARSAY.

PEDIS POSITIO (Lat. a planting or placing of the foot). A term used to denote an actual corporal possession. Possessio est quasi pedis positio: possession is as it were a planting of the foot. 3 Co. 42; 8 Johns. per Kent, C. J.; 5 Pa. 308; 2 N. & McC. 343. See PEDIS POSSESSIO.

PEDIS POSSESSIO (Lat.). A foothold; an actual possession. To constitute adverse possession, there must be pedis possessio, or a substantial inclosure. 2 N. & M'C. 343.

PEERS (Lat. pares). The vassals of a lord; the freeholders of a neighborhood, before whom livery of seisin was to be made, and before whom, as the jury of the county, trials were had. 2 Bla. Com. 316. These vassals were called pares curiæ, which title see. 1 Washb. R. P. 5th ed. *23.

Trial by a man's peers or equals is one of the rights reserved by Magna Charta. 4 Bla. Com. 349.

The nobility of England, though of different ranks, viz., dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons, are equal in their privileges of sitting and voting in the house of lords; hence they are called peers of the realm.

They are created by writ summoning them to attend the house of lords by the title intended to be given, or by letters patent directly conferring the dignity. The former is the more ancient way; but the grant by patent is more certain. See Sullivan, Lect. 19 a; 1 Wood. Lect. 37.

Peers are tried by other peers in cases of treason, felony, and misprision of the same. In cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, they have no privilege from arrest; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*, n. 11.

Bishops who sit in parliament are peers; but the word spiritual is generally added; e. g. "lords temporal and spiritual." 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*, n. 12.

The titles of all temporal peers are now hereditary; May, Law of Parl. 14; except certain peers holding judicial office, whose peerage is a life peerage only.

Scotch and Irish peers are not entitled to sit in the lords, but sixteen representative Scotch peers are elected to each parliament, and twenty-eight Irish peers are elected to sit in the lords for life.

A peerage is not transferable, except with consent of parliament; id. Succession to the title is destroyed by attainder; see 1 Bla. Com. 412*. When an English peer has been adjudicated a bankrupt, he cannot sit in the house of lords; he loses no other privilege thereby. When the bankruptcy is determined he may resume his seat. If he obtains his discharge with a certificate that bankruptcy was the result of misfortune, the disqualification may be removed. But in the case of Scotch or Irish representative peers in the house of lords, the bankruptcy not determined within a year vacates their seat.

A member of the House of Commons, when he becomes a member of the English peerage, ceases thereby to have a right to sit in the Commons.

As to the trial of peers, see tit. Lord High Steward, in 8 Encyc. Laws of Eng.

PEINE FORTE ET DURE (L. Fr.). In English Law. A punishment formerly inflicted in England on a person who, being arraigned of felony, refused to plead and put himself on his trial, and stubbornly stood mute.

A jury was empanelled to try whether he stood "mute of malice," or "mute by the visitation of God," and if the latter the trial proceeded; but if the former the prisoner was solemnly warned by the judges of the terrible consequences described by Lord Coke, in the trial of Sir Richard Weston in 1615 for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, by the words—overe, frigore, et fame. Time was given for reflection and often the unfortunate was subjected to entreaties of friends and others, but if he remained obdurate he was adjudged to suffer peine forte et dure. The judgment was that he return from whence he came, to a low dungeon into which no light could enter; he was to be laid down, naked, on his back, on the ground, his feet and head and loins covered, his arms and legs drawn apart by cords tied to posts, a sharp stone under his back, and as much weight of iron or stone as he could bear, or more than he could bear, placed on his chest. He was to have the next day three morsels of barley bread, without drink; the next, three draughts, as much each time as he could drink, of the nearest stagnant water to the prison, without bread; and such was to be his diet on alternate days, till he died. This punishment was vulgarly called pressing to death; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 134; 4 Bla. Com. 324; Cowell; Britton c. 4. fol. 11*. This punishment as above described dates back to a period between 31 Edw. III. and 8 Hen. IV.; 4 Bla. Com. 324; Year B. 8 Hen. IV. 1. It did not at first include the pressing. Originally when asked how he would be tried the accused must choose between a trial "by God" (by ordeal) and "by my country" (by jury). After the former method of trial was abolished about 1215 the other method remained a privilege to be claimed and in those days the idea did not occur to any one of trying a prisoner by jury without his consent. By standing mute a prisoner put the court in difficulty, and at first he was put to death for not consenting to be tried "according to the law and custom of the realm." This was thought too severe and in the Parliament of Westminster under Edward I. there was provided for notorious felons confinement in prison torte et dure; which included all possible harsh features except death. Then to conquer obduracy starvation was resorted to; but this being too slow, under Henry IV. the peine was substituted for the prison. It continued until 1772 although occasionally something stronger than exhortation was resorted to, as tying up by the thumbs in the presence of the court, at the Old Bailey in 1734. It only ended when standing mute, by statute, in England, became equivalent to a confession or verdict of guilty; 12 Geo. III. c. 20; but in 1827 it was enacted by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 28 "that in such cases a plea of not guilty should be entered for the accused."

The obvious effect of standing mute was to avoid the forfeiture of goods consequent upon conviction of felony and the results of corruption of blood, by an attainder, in case of capital felony. Often, indeed usually, in treason cases certainly, conviction was sure and the fortitude required to endure this death by torture would save his children or other heirs from disinheritance. Great numbers did in fact undergo the punishment which was recorded by the clerk's entry or record, "mortuus en pen' fort' et dur'." The number in rural Middlesex alone in 1609–1618 was thirty-two, of whom three were women, and peers were not protected from it by their privilege. A case is recorded in the last year of George I. and one at least in the reign of George II.

The only instance in which this punishment has ever been inflicted in this country is that of Giles Cory, of Salem, who refused to plead when arraigned for witchcraft; Washb. Jud. Hist. 142; 1 Chandl. Cr. Tr. 122.

PENAL ACTION. An action for recovery of statute penalty. 3 Steph. Com. 535. See Hawk. Pl. Cr. Informatio. It is distinguished from a popular or qui tam action, in which the action is brought by the informer, to whom part of the penalty goes. A penal action or information is brought by an officer, and the penalty goes to the king; 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 25; 2 Archb. Pr. 188.

PENAL BILL. The old name for a bond with condition by which a person is bound to pay a certain sum of money or do a certain act, or, in default thereof, pay a certain sum of money by way of penalty. Jacob, Law Dict. Bill.

PENAL CLAUSE. That particular clause or subdivision of a statute which fixes the penalty for a violation of previous provisions. See STATUTE; PENAL STATUTES.

A secondary obligation entered into for the purpose of enforcing the performance of a primary obligation. La. Civ. Code, art. 2117.

PENAL SERVITUDE. A punishment which consists in keeping an offender in confinement and compelling him to labor.

PENAL STATUTES. Those which inflict a penalty for the violation of some of their provisions. Strictly and properly, they are those laws imposing punishment for an offence committed against the state, which the executive has power to pardon, and the expression does not include statutes which give a private action against a wrong-doer. 146 U. S. 657.

It is a rule of law that such statutes must be construed strictly; 1 Bla. Com. 88; Cro. Jac. 415; 1 Com. Dig. 444; 5 id. 360; 1 Kent 467; Whart. Cr. L. 28. They cannot, therefore, be extended by their spirit or equity to other offences than those clearly described and provided for; 1 Paine 32; 6 Cra. 171. But they are not to be so strictly construed as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature; 134 U. S. 624. See 120 id. 678; CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

PENALTY. A clause in an agreement, by which the obligor agrees to pay a certain sum of money if he shall fail to fulfil the contract contained in another clause of the same agreement.

A penal obligation differs from an alternative obligation, for the latter is but one in its essence; while a penalty always includes two distinct engagements, and when the first is fulfilled the second is void. When a breach has taken place, the obligor has his option to require the fulfilment of the first obligation, or the payment of the penalty, in those cases which cannot be relieved in equity, when the penalty is considered as liquidated damages. Dalloz, Dict. Obligation avec Clause penale.

A distinction is made in courts of equity between penalties and forfeitures. In cases of forfeiture for the breach of any covenant other than a covenant to pay rent, relief will not be granted in equity, unless upon the ground of accident, fraud, mistake, or surprise, when the breach is capable of compensation; Eden, Inj. 23; 3 Ves. 692; 16 id. 403; 18 id. 58.

For the distinction between a penalty and liquidated damages, see LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

The penalty remains unaffected, although the condition may have been partially performed: as, in a case where the penalty was one thousand dollars, and the condition was to pay an annuity of one hundred dollars, which had been paid for ten years, the penalty was still valid; 5 Vt. 355.

The punishment inflicted by a law for its violation. The term is mostly applied to a pecuniary punishment; see 6 Pet. 404; 7 Wheat. 18; 1 Wash. C. C. 1; 1 Paine 661; 1 Gall. 26; 1 Mas. 243; 7 Johns. 72; 1 Pick. 451; 1 Saund. 58, n.; 16 Viner, Abr. 301; 62 Hun 407; 23 Fed. Rep. 74; 124 U. S. 571; although not restricted to it; 16 Ind. App. 357.

The words penal and penalty in their strict and primary sense, denote a punishment, whether corporal or pecuniary, imposed and enforced by the state for a crime or offence against its laws; 146 U. S. 657.

PENAL LAWS. See PENAL STATUTES.

PENANCE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical punishment inflicted by an ecclesiastical court for some spiritual offence. Ayliffe, Parerg. 420.

PENCIL. An instrument made of plumbago, red chalk, or other suitable substance, for writing without ink.

It has been holden that a will written with a pencil is valid; 1 Phill. Eccl. 1: 2 id. 173; Beach, Wills § 23. See WILL.

PENDENTE LITE (Lat.). Pending the continuance of an action; while litigation continues.

An administrator is appointed pendente lite, when a will is contested. See ADMINISTRATOR; LIS PENDENS.

PENDENTES (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fruits of the earth not yet separated from the ground; the fruits hanging by the roots. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, tit. 2, s. 4.

PENDING. See LIS PENDENS.

PENDING SUIT. See AUTER ACTION PENDANT; UNITED STATES COURTS.

PENETRATION. See RAPE.

PENITENTIARY. A prison for the punishment of convicts.

A prison or place of punishment. The place of punishment in which convicts, sentenced to confinement and hard labor, are confined by the authority of the law. 2 Kan. 174; 48 Kan. 723.

There are two systems of penitentiaries in the United States, each of which is claimed to be the best by its partisans,—the Pennsylvania system and the New York system. By the former, convicts are lodged in separate, well-lighted, and well-ventilated cells, where they are required to work during stated hours. During the whole time of their confinement they are never permitted to see or speak with each other. Their usual employments are shoemaking, weaving, winding yarn, picking wool, and such like business. The only punishments to which convicts are subject are the privation of food for short periods, and confinement without labor in dark but well-aired cells: this discipline has been found sufficient to keep perfect order; the whip and all other corporal punishments are prohibited. The advantages of the plan are numerous. Men cannot long remain in solitude without labor; convicts, when deprived of it, ask it as a favor, and, in order to retain it, use, generally, their best exertions to do their work well; being entirely secluded, they are of course unknown to their fellow-prisoners, and can form no combination to escape while in prison, or associations to prey upon society when they are out; being treated with kindness, and afforded books for their instruction and amusement, they become satisfied that society does not make war upon them, and more disposed to return to it, which they are not prevented from doing by the exposure of their fellow-prisoners when in a strange place; the labor of the convicts tends greatly to defray the expenses of the prison. The disadvantages which were anticipated have been found to be groundless. Among these were that the prisoners would be unhealthy; experience has proved the contrary: that they would become insane; this has also been found to be otherwise: that solitude is incompatible with the performance of business: that obedience to the discipline of the prison could not be enforced. These, and all other objections to this system, are by its friends believed to be without force.

The New York system, adopted at Auburn, which was probably copied from the penitentiary at Ghent, in the Netherlands, called La Maison de Force, is founded on the system of isolation and separation, as well as that of Pennsylvania, but with this difference, that in the former the prisoners are confined to their separate cells during the night only; during the working-hours in the daytime they labor together in workshops appropriated to their use. They eat their meals together, but in such a manner as not to be able to speak with each other. Silence is also imposed upon them at their labor. They perform the labor of carpenters, blacksmiths, weavers, shoemakers, tailors, coopers, gardeners, woodsawyers, etc. The discipline of the prison is enforced by stripes inflicted by the assistant keepers, on the backs of the prisoners; though this punishment is rarely exercised. The advantages of this plan are that the convicts are in solitary confinement during the night: that their labor, by being joint, is more productive; that, inasmuch as a clergyman is employed to preach to the prisoners, the system affords an opportunity for mental and moral improvements. Among the objections made to it are that the prisoners have opportunities of communicating with each other and of forming plans of escape, and, when they are out of prison, of associating together in consequence of their previous acquaintance, to the detriment of those who wish to return to virtue, and to the danger of the public; that the discipline is degrading, and that it engenders bitter resentment in the mind of the convict.

PENNED AND CORRALLED. Confined in a small enclosure or narrow space, either by means of an artificial structure or through some other agency without such structure. 105 Cal. 636.

PENNSYLVANIA. One of the thirteen original states of the United States of America.

It received its name from a royal charter granted March 4, 1681, by Charles II. to William Penn. By that charter, Penn was constituted the proprietary and governor of the province, and vested with power to enact laws, with the consent of the freemen, to execute the laws, to appoint judges and other officers, incorporate towns, establish ports, levy customs, import and export goods, sell lands creating a tenure, levy troops, make war, and exercise other attributes of sovereign power. Appeals in judicial matters lay to the crown, and all laws could be annulled by the Crown within five years after their passage.

The first frame of government was adopted and promulgated on April 25, 1682. The government was to be by the governor and freemen in a provincial council and general assembly. Both of the latter were chosen annually by the people. All laws were to originate with the council. A governor, judges, and other officers were to be appointed, during good behavior, by the governor from a double list presented by the council or assembly.

On April 2, 1683, a new frame was adopted, reducing the numbers both of the council and assembly. In 1688 the proprietary was deprived of his government and the province placed under the government of New York. But in 1694 Penn was duly reinstated.

A new frame of government adopted on October 28, 1696, made some material alterations in the existing order of things. The power of originating laws was thereby first conferred on the assembly.

The charter of privileges granted by the proprietary and accepted by the assembly on October 28, 1701, confirming the foregoing provisions and making numerous others, continued the supreme law of the province during the residue of the proprietary government.

In 1776, after the declaration of American independence, a constitution was formed adapted to the altered circumstances of the country, which continued in force until 1790, when a new one was substituted. This was amended in 1837 by the introduction of some very radical changes. Other amendments were made in 1850, in 1857, and in 1864. In 1874 a new constitution was adopted, which remains still in force.

The LEGISLATIVE power is vested in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives, who sit in regular session every two years, beginning the first Tuesday of January, and at such other times as they are convened by the governor.

Members of the senate must be at least twenty-five years old, and representatives twenty-one. They must have been citizens and inhabitants of the state four years, and inhabitants of their respective districts one year next before their election (unless absent on public business of the United States or of the state), and must reside in their respective districts during continuance in office. They are paid a fixed salary which can neither be increased nor diminished during their term of office.

The constitution imposes numerous restrictions upon the general power to legislate, notably prohibiting special legislation in many instances and putting bounds to the power of appropriating the public moneys to charitable objects. All laws relating to taxation and courts of justice are general and uniform in their operation throughout the state. Restrictions are laid upon the right of the state or of any municipality therein to contract debts. Most of the essential provisions of Magna Charta are embodied in the Declaration of Rights.

The supreme EXECUTIVE power of the state is vested in a governor, who is chosen by the electors qualified to elect members of the legislature. His term of office is four years from the third Tuesday of January next ensuing his election, and he is incapable of re-election to office for the next succeeding term. He has power to remit fines and forfeitures, and grant reprieves, commutations of sentence, and pardons, on recommendation of three or more of a board of pardons consisting of the lieutenant-governor, secretary of the commonwealth, attorney-general, and secretary of internal affairs. He has a veto power over every bill passed by the legislature; but if, notwithstanding his objection, two-thirds of both houses agree to the bill after reconsideration, it becomes a law.

In case of the death or resignation of the governor, his removal from office, or other disability, the office devolves upon the lieutenant-governor, and in case of a vacancy in that office, on the president pro tem. of the senate.

The supreme court is the highest JUDICIAL tribunal of the state. It is composed of seven judges elected by the qualified electors of the state at large. They hold their offices for the term of twenty-one years if they so long behave themselves well, but are not again eligible. They must during their term of office reside within the commonwealth. The jurisdiction of the court extends over the state, and the judges are, ex officio, justices of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery in the several counties. The court is principally a court of errors and appeals, and its writs run to all other courts in the state. It has original jurisdiction only in cases of injunction where a party corporation is defendant, of habeas corpus, of mandamus to courts of inferior jurisdiction, and of quo warranto to officers whose jurisdiction extends over the whole state. In all cases of felonious homicide, and in such other criminal cases as are provided by law, the accused is entitled of right to remove the proceedings to this court for review. It holds its sessions once in each year at least, in Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and Harrisburg.

The superior court is composed of seven judges, elected by the people, for a term of ten years. Its jurisdiction extends throughout the commonwealth; it has no original jurisdiction except that it may issue writs of habeas corpus, but it has the exclusive and final appellate jurisdiction which are now allowed to the supreme court in the following classes of cases: proceedings in quarter sessions court, except cases involving a right to an office; proceedings in oyer and terminer court, except in cases of felonious homicide; proceedings in common pleas court or in equity or other actions, where the amount in controversy is not greater than one thousand dollars; and proceedings in orphans' court. Appeals from this court lie to the supreme court in certain classes of cases.

For the courts of common pleas, the state is divided into fifty-four districts. Most civil issues are tried by the courts of common pleas, but their decisions are reviewable. All judges of these and every other court (except those of the supreme court) required to be learned in the law, are elected by the qualified electors of the district in which they are to preside, and hold office for ten years if they so long behave themselves well. They must reside within their respective districts during their terms of office, and are liable on sufficient cause to be removed by the governor on address of two-thirds of each house of the assembly. Every district is entitled to one court of common pleas, and one president judge learned in the law, and such additional judges as the general assembly may provide. In every county constituting a separate judicial district such associate judges must be learned in the law.

In Philadelphia there are four, and in Allegheny county three courts of common pleas of co-ordinate powers. In each county the judges of the courts of common pleas are ex officio justices of oyer and terminer, quarter sessions of the peace and general jail delivery, and within their respective districts are justices of the peace as to criminal matters.

In counties exceeding in population one hundred and fifty thousand, separate orphans' courts may be established, to consist of one or more judges. The orphans' courts have general jurisdiction over the settlement of decedents' estates, and the accounts of executors, administrators, and guardians, subject, however, to an appellate jurisdiction in the superior or supreme court. No new courts can be created to exercise the powers now vested in the courts of common pleas, and orphans' courts.

Aldermen, justices of the peace, and magistrates are elected in the various counties for terms of five years. A register's office for the probate of wills and granting letters of administration, is maintained in each county.

PENNY. The name of an English coin, of the value of one-twelfth part of a shilling.

The weight of a penny is approximately, 1-3 oz. avoird.; of a half penny, 1-5 oz.; of a farthing, 1-10 oz. A half penny is one inch in diameter. Whittaker's Alm.

While the United States were colonies, each adopted a monetary system composed of pounds, shillings, and pence. The penny varied in value in the different colonies.

PENNYWEIGHT. A troy weight of twenty-four grains, or one-twentieth part of an ounce. See WEIGHTS.

PENSION. A stated and certain allowance granted by the government to an individual, or those who represent him, for valuable services performed by him for the country.

The act of August 26, 1776, of the old congress promised pensions to soldiers and seamen who might be disabled in the war; and the act of May 15, 1778, promised half pay for seven years after the end of the war to all commissioned officers who should serve until the end of the war. The earliest act of the United States congress was that of September 29, 1789, which directed that pensions that had been paid by the states should be paid by the United States. The act of July 4, 1836, was the foundation of pensions to widows and orphans. In 1866 and 1868 "old war" pensioners were put upon the same footing with widows and orphans of the War of the Rebellion. Originally the secretary of war was directed to make out the list of pensioners. The law of May 15, 1828, was executed at the treasury department, but by resolution of June 28, 1832, all duties devolved on that department were transferred to the war department. On March 2, 1833, an independent pension bureau was established in the war department. For a time navy pension laws were executed in the navy department, but on March 4, 1840, this was transferred to the pension bureau. The act of March 3, 1849, created the interior department and transferred the pension business to that department, where it has since been.

Pensions have been divided into "invalid pension," "gratuitous or service pensions" and "land bounties."

"No pensioner has a vested legal right to his pension. Pensions are the bounties of the government, which congress has the right to give, distribute, or recall at its discretion." 107 U. S. 68. But by an act of December 21, 1893, payment of a pension cannot be withheld or suspended without notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days.

Invalid pensions were granted to volunteers and the militia in suppressing Indian depredations in Florida; and pensions were granted to the widows and children under sixteen years of age of those engaged in various Indian wars since 1790 who remained in the service at the date of their death, or who had received an honorable discharge and died, or should thereafter die of injuries received or disease contracted in the service. In 1892, service pensions were granted to survivors who had served for thirty days in certain Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, and were honorably discharged and to those personally named in any resolution of congress though they may have served less than thirty days, and to their surviving widows, if not remarried. This act does not apply to persons who are not citizens of the United States.

Invalid pensions were granted to regulars and volunteers, disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the Mexican war if they received an honorable discharge; R. S. § 4730; and in case of their death, to their widows, or if the latter die or remarry, to the children under sixteen. By act of January 29, 1887, service pensions were granted to survivors of the Mexican war who served sixty days or were actually engaged in a battle or were personally named in any resolution of congress for specific service in the war.

By R. S. § 4728, invalid navy pensions are granted to any person in the navy or marine service disabled in the service prior to March 4, 1861; and in case of death from injury received or disease contracted in the service, a pension is granted to the widow, and, in case of her death or remarriage, to the children under sixteen years; R. S. §§ 4728, 4729. By R. S. § 4741, officers and men on revenue cutters co-operating with the navy are placed on the navy pension list. Special acts provide for a navy pension fund and a privateer pension fund and the pensioners thereon.

No person can draw a pension as an invalid and the pay of his rank for any period, unless his disability caused his employment in a lower grade or in the civil branch of the service; R. S. § 4724; and no person can draw two pensions; R. S. § 4715. No pension shall be paid to any person or to the widow or children or heirs of any deceased person who voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the rebellion; R. S. § 4716; unless such person afterwards voluntarily enlisted in the army or navy and incurred disability therein; act of March 3, 1877, amended August 1, 1892.

Pensions are not liable to attachment in any way; R. S. § 4747.

If any one entitled under R. S. § 4693, supra, has died since March 4, 1861, or dies after this act, by reason of any wound, etc., which under said section would have entitled him to an invalid pension, had he been disabled, his widow, or if none, or in case of her death without the payment to her of any part of the pension mentioned in the act, his child or children under sixteen years, shall receive the same pension as the husband or father would have been entitled to, to continue from the death of the husband or father, to continue to the widow during widowhood and to the children until they attain sixteen years (longer if permanently helpless); in case of the widow's marriage the children draw the pension from her marriage, etc., R. S. § 4702, as amended August 7, 1882. Pensions of widows are increased by two dollars a month for each child under sixteen years; R. S. § 4703.

By act of March 19, 1886, widows' pensions are raised to twelve dollars a month (with allowance of two dollars a month for each child under sixteen years); but the act applies only to widows married prior to that date, and those who may marry prior to and during the husband's service.

If a widow entitled to a pension abandon a child under sixteen or is an unsuitable person, by reason of immoral conduct, to have the custody of it, no pension is allowed the widow till the child attains sixteen years, but the child shall be pensioned as if no widow had survived, the pension being payable to the guardian; R. S. § 4706. Children born before marriage, if acknowledged by the father before or after marriage, are deemed legitimate; R. S. § 4704. On remarriage of a widow entitled to a pension, her pension ceases; R. S. § 4708; and no pension shall be granted to a widow for the same period that her husband received one; R. S. § 4735.

Dependent relations of one entitled under R. S. § 4793, supra, in case of his death since March 4, 1861, or after the act, leaving neither widow nor legitimate children, are entitled to the same pension as such person would have been entitled to, in the following order of precedence: — the mother; the father; orphan brothers and sisters under sixteen (jointly); R. S. § 4707. See act of March 19, 1886. They take in substance, successively; but are entitled only so long as the pension shall be necessary as a means of adequate subsistence; R. S. § 4707; and the rate is raised to twelve dollars a month; act of March 19, 1886. The marriage of a dependent mother or sister terminates the pension.

Arrears of pensions granted in consequence of death which originated from a cause occurring in the service since March 4, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, commence on the death or discharge of the person, if the disability occurred prior to discharge; if after discharge, then from disability, or from the termination of the right of the person having the prior right to such pension; provided the application was filed prior to July 1, 1880, otherwise the pension begins at the filing of the application; but this limitation does not apply to widows, insane persons, or children under sixteen; acts of January 25, 1879; March 3, 1879; June 7, 1888. Where death or disability occurred prior to March 4, 1861, and an application was not filed in three years from discharge or death or from the termination of a previously granted pension, the pension commences from the date of filing the application; but no claim allowed prior to June 6, 1886, is affected by this section; R. S. § 4713. In pensions payable to dependent parents, it is enough to show that the parents have no means of support except their own manual labor or the contributions of others, not legally bound to support them; the pension continues only so long as the dependence; act June 27, 1890.

All persons who served ninety days or more in the rebellion, and were honorably discharged, and are or may be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from support by manual labor, shall receive not more than twelve nor less than six dollars a month, proportioned to the degree of inability, beginning with the date of filing the application after June 27, 1890; and the widow, if without means of support other than her daily labor, or the children under sixteen are placed on the pension list from the date of the application, on proof of the husband's death, but without proving his death to have been the result of army service.

An offence against the act of June 27, 1890, is committed when a sum greater than ten dollars has been taken, regardless of the fact whether the pension has or has not been received, and it is not necessary to aver a demand for the return of the money wrongfully taken; 157 U. S. 160. Where one fraudulently obtained pension money from a client he is not guilty of wrongfully withholding money from the pensioner under R. S. § 4786; it applies to money before it reaches the hands of the pensioner; 160 U. S. 187. See MILITARY BOUNTY LANDS.

A reasonable appropriation of municipal funds for a police pension is for a strictly municipal use and is valid; 182 Pa. 373.

PENSIONER. One who is supported by an allowance at the will of another. It is more usually applied to him who receives an annuity or pension from the government.

PENT ROAD. A road shut up or closed at its terminal points. 40 Vt. 41.

PEONIA. In Spanish Law. A portion of land which was formerly given to a simple soldier on the conquest of a country. It is now a quantity of land of different size in different provinces. In the Spanish possessions in America it measured fifty feet front and one hundred feet deep. 2 White, N. Rec. 49; 12 Pet. 444, notes.

PEOPLE. A state: as, the people of the state of New York. A nation in its collective and political capacity. 4 Term 783. See 6 Pet. 467.

When the term the people is made use of in constitutional law or discussions, it is often the case that those only are intended who have a share in the government through being clothed with the elective franchise. Thus, the people elect delegates to a constitutional convention; the people choose the officers under the constitution, and so on. For these and similar purposes, the electors, though constituting but a small minority of the whole body of the community, nevertheless act for all, and, as being for the time the representatives of sovereignty, they are considered and spoken of as the sovereign people. But in all the enumerations and guaranties of rights the whole people are intended, because the rights of all are equal, and are meant to be equally protected; Cooley, Const. 2d ed. 40, 267; Cooley, Const. L. 278.

In a policy of insurance, "detainments of all kings, princes, and people," the word does not include insurance against any promiscuous or lawless rabble which may be guilty of attacking or detaining a ship; 2 Marsh. Ins. 508. See INSURGENTS; NATION.

The term people of the United States is synonymous with citizens; both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives.

Sovereign people. Every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of the sovereignty; 19 How. 393; 143 U. S. 135; it includes registered voters as well as tax payers. 19 R. I. 610.

PER. By. When a writ of entry is sued out against the alienee, or descendant of the original disseisor, it is then said to be brought in the per, because the writ states that the tenant had not the entry but by the original wrong-doer. 3 Bla. Com. 181. See ENTRY, WRIT OF; POST.

PER ÆS ET LIBRAM (Lat. æs, brass, libra, scale). In Civil Law. A sale was said to be made per æs et libram when one called libripens held a scale (libra), which the one buying struck with a brazen coin (æs), and said, "I say, by the right of a Roman, this thing is mine," and gave the coin to the vendor, in presence of at least three witnesses. This kind of sale was used in the emancipation of a son or slave, and in making a will. Calvinus, Lex. Mancipatio.

PER AGREEMENT. The addition of these words in a bill of particulars for services does not preclude from recovering the value of the services specified, although no agreement for the payment of a specified sum is proven. 45 N. Y. 810.

PER ALLUVIONEM (Lat.). In Civil Law. By alluvion, or the gradual and imperceptible increase arising from deposit by water. Vocab. Jur. Utr. Alluvio; Ang. & A. Waterc. 53.

PER AND CUI. When a writ of entry is brought against a second alienee or descendant from the disseisor, it is said to be in the per and cui, because the form of the writ is that the tenant had not entry but by and under a prior alienee, to whom the intruder himself demised it. 3 Bla. Com. 181. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

PER ANNULUM ET BACULUM (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. The symbolical investiture of an ecclesiastical dignity was per annulum et baculum, i. e. by the ring and staff. 1 Bla. Com. 378; 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 209.

PER ANNUM. Strictly speaking, by the year or through the year. 50 Kan. 440.

PER AUTRE VIE. See ESTATE PER AUTRE VIE.

PER AVERSIONEM (Lat.). In Civil Law. By turning away. Applied to a sale not by measure or weight, but for a single price for the whole in gross; e. g. a sale of all the wine of a vineyard for a certain price. Vocab. Jur. Utr. Aversio. Some derive the meaning of the phrase from a turning away of the risk of a deficiency in the quantity from the seller to the buyer; others, from turning away the head, i. e. negligence in the sale; others think aversio is for adversio. Calvinus, Lex.; 2 Kent 640; 4 id. 517.

PER CAPITA (Lat. by the head or polls). When descendants take as individuals, and not by right of representation (per stirpes), they are said to take per capita. For example, if a legacy be given to the issue of A B, and A B at the time of his death shall have two children and two grandchildren, his estate shall be divided into four parts, and the children and grandchildren shall each have one of them. 3 Ves. 257; 2 Bla. Com. 218; 6 Cush. 158; 2 Jarm. Wills 6th Am. ed. 945; 3 Beav. 451; 4 id. 239.

PER CURIAM (Lat. by the court). A phrase which occurs constantly in the reports. It distinguishes the opinion or decision of the court from that of a single judge. Abb. Law Dict. 353. It designates, in Pennsylvania, opinions written by the chief justice of the supreme court.

PER FORMAM DONI (Lat. by the form of the gift). According to the line of descent prescribed in the conveyance of the ancestor or donor of estate-tail. 2 Bla. Com. 113; 3 Harr. & J. 323; 1 Washb. R. P. 74, 81.

PER FRAUDEM (Lat.). A replication to a plea where something has been pleaded which would be a discharge if it had been honestly pleaded that such a thing has been obtained by fraud; for example, where, on debt on a statute, the defendant pleads a prior action depending, if such action has been commenced by fraud, the plaintiff may reply per fraudem. 2 Chitty, Pl. *675.

PER INCURIAM. Through want of care; through inadvertence. 35 E. L. & Eq. 302.

PER INFORTUNIUM (Lat. by misadventure). In Criminal Law. Homicide per infortunium, or by misadventure, is said to take place when a man in doing a lawful act, without any intent to hurt, unfortunately kills another. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 11; Fost. Cr. Law 258; Co. 3d Inst. 56.

PER LEGEM TERRÆ. By the law of the land.

PER MINAS (Lat. by threats). When a man is compelled to enter into a contract by threats or menaces, either for fear of loss of life or mayhem, he may avoid it afterwards. 1 Bla. Com. 131; Bac. Abr. Duress, Murder (A). See DURESS.

PER MY ET PER TOUT (Law Fr. by the moiety, or half, and by the whole). The mode in which joint tenants hold the joint estate, the effect of which, technically considered, is that for purposes of tenure and survivorship each is the holder of the whole, but for purposes of alienation each has only his own share, which is presumed in law to be equal. 1 Washb. R. P. 406; 2 Bla. Com. 182; Chal. R. P. 335.

PER PAIS TRIAL. Trial by the country, i. e. by jury.

PER PROC. By procuration; by letter of attorney. It does not necessarily mean that the act is done under procuration. 27 L. J. Ex. 468; 3 H. & W. 554. A signature of a promissory note or bill of exchange by procuration operates as notice that the agent has but limited authority to sign, and the principle is only bound by such signature if the agent was acting within the actual limits of his authority. 12 C. B. N. S. 373.

PER QUOD CONSORTIUM AMISIT (Lat. by which he lost her company). If a man's wife is so badly beaten or ill used that thereby he loses her company and assistance for any time, he has a separate remedy by an action of trespass (in the nature of an action on the case) per quod consortium amisit, in which he shall recover satisfaction in damages. 3 Bla. Com. 140; Cro. Jac. 501.

PER QUOD SERVITIUM AMISIT (Lat. by which he lost her or his service). Where a servant has been so beaten or injured that his or her services are lost to the master, the master has an action of trespass vi et armis, per quod servitium amisit, in which he must allege and prove the special damage he has sustained. 3 Bla. Com. 142. This action is commonly brought by the father for the seduction of his daughter, in which case very slight evidence of the relation of master and servant is necessary; but still some loss of service, or some expense, must be shown; 5 East 45; 5 B. & P. 466; 5 Price 641; 11 Ga. 603; 15 Barb. 279; 8 N. Y. 191; 14 id. 413; 20 Pa. 354; 5 Md. 211; 1 Wisc. 209; 3 Sneed 29. See SEDUCTION.

PER SALTUM. By sudden movement, passing over certain proceedings. 8 East 511.

PER SAMPLE. By sample. A purchase so made is a collateral engagement that the goods shall be of a particular quality. 4 B. & Ald. 387.

PER SE. Taken alone; in itself; by itself.

PER STIRPES (Lat. stirps, trunk or root of a tree or race). By or according to stock or root; by right of representation. 6 Cush. 158; 2 Bla. Com. 217; 2 Steph. 253; 2 Woodd. Lect. 114; 2 Kent 425.

When descendants take by representation of their parent, they are said to take per stirpes; that is, children take among them the share which their parent would have taken, if living. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

PER TOUT ET NON PER MY (Law Fr. by the whole and not by the moiety). Where an estate in fee is given to a man and his wife, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety, per tout et non per my. 2 Bla. Com. 182. The late married woman's acts have been held to abolish estates by entireties; 76 Ill. 57; 56 N. H. 105; 76 N. Y. 262; contra, 57 Ind. 412; s. c. 26 Am. Rep. 64; 25 Mich. 350; 56 Pa. 106. See 20 Alb. L. J. 346; ENTIRETY.

PER UNIVERSITATEM (Lat. by the whole). Used of the acquisition of any property as a whole, in opposition to an acquisition by parts: e. g. the acquisition of an inheritance, or of the separate property of the son (peculium), etc. Calvinus, Lex. Universitas.

PER YEAR. Equivalent to the word "annually." 39 N. Y. 213.

PERAMBULATIONE FACIENDA, WRIT DE. In English Law. The name of a writ which is sued by consent of both parties when they are in doubt as to the bounds of their respective estates; it is directed to the sheriff to make perambulation, and to set the bounds and limits between them in certainty. Fitzh. N. B. 309.

"The writ de perambulatione facienda is not known to have been adopted in practice in the United States, but in several of the states remedies somewhat similar in principle have been provided by statutes." Greenl. Ev. § 146.

PERCEPTION (From per and capere). The taking possession of. For example, a lessee or tenant before perception of the crops, i. e. before harvesting them, has a right to offset any loss which may happen to them, against the rent; but after the perception they are entirely at his risk. Mackeldey, Civil Law § 378. Used of money, it means the counting out and payment of a debt. Also used for food due to soldiers. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PERCH. The length of sixteen feet and a half; a pole or rod of that length. Forty perches in length and four in breadth make an acre of land.

PERCOLATION. See SUBTERRANEAN WATERS.

PERDONATIO UTLAGARIÆ (Lat.). In English Law. A pardon for a man who, for contempt in not yielding obedience to the process of the king's courts, is outlawed, and afterwards, of his own accord, surrenders.

PERDUELLIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. At first, an honorable enmity to the republic; afterwards, a traitorous enmity of a citizen; consisting in being of a hostile disposition towards the republic, e. g. treason aiming at the supreme power, violating the privileges of a Roman citizen by beating him, etc., attempting anything against the person of the emperor, and, in general, any open hostility to the republic. Sometimes used for the enemy or traitor himself. Perduellio was distinguished from crimen imminutæ majestatis, as being an attempt against the whole republic, punishable in comitia centuriata, by crucifixion and by infamy after death. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PEREGRINI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Under the denomination of peregrini were comprehended all who did not enjoy any capacity of the law, namely, slaves, alien enemies, and such foreigners as belonged to nations with which the Romans had not established relations. Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 66.

PEREMPT. To waive or bar an appeal by one's own act so as partially to comply with or acquiesce in a sentence of a court. Phill. Eccl. L. 1275; Rog. Eccl. L. 47.

PEREMPTORIUS (Lat. from perimere, to destroy). In Civil Law. That which takes away or destroys forever: hence, exceptio peremptoria, a plea which is a perpetual bar. See PEREMPTORY. Bract. lib. 4, c. 20; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 36, § 3; Calvinus, Lex.

PEREMPTORY. Absolute; positive. A final determination to act, without hope of renewing or altering. Joined to a substantive, this word is frequently used in law; as, peremptory action; Fitzh. N. B. 35, 38, 104, 108; peremptory nonsuit; id. 5, 11; peremptory exception; Bract. lib. 4, c. 20; peremptory undertaking; 3 Chitty, Pr. 112, 798; peremptory challenge of jurors; Inst. 4. 13. 9; Code 7. 50. 2; 8. 36. 8; Dig. 5. 1. 70. 73.

PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE. See CHALLENGE.

PEREMPTORY DAY. A precise time when certain business by rule of court ought to be spoken to.

PEREMPTORY DEFENCE. A defence which insists that the plaintiff never had the right to institute the suit, or that, if he had, the original right is extinguished or determined. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4206.

PEREMPTORY EXCEPTION. Any defence which denies entirely the ground of action. 1 White, Rec. 283. So of a demurrer; 1 Tex. 364.

PEREMPTORY MANDAMUS. A mandamus requiring a thing to be done absolutely. It is usually granted after failure to show satisfactory cause on an alternative mandamus. No other return will be permitted but absolute obedience; 3 Bla. Com. *110; Tapp. Mand. 400. See MANDAMUS.

PEREMPTORY PAPER. A court paper containing a list of all motions.

PEREMPTORY PLEA. A plea which goes to destroy the right of action itself; a plea in bar or to the action. 3 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 541; 3 Woodd. Lect. 57; 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 645.

PERFECT. Complete. The word implies either physical, moral, or mechanical perfection. 17 C. B. N. S. 601. A guaranty that goods are perfect is construed to mean that they are perfect for the use intended; 41 Wis. 360.

The term is applied to obligations in order to distinguish those which may be enforced by law, which are called perfect, 37 Ga. 128, from those which cannot be so enforced, which are said to be imperfect.

A perfect title is one which is good both at law and in equity. 21 Conn. 449.

PERFIDY. The act of one who has engaged his faith to do a thing, and does not do it, but does the contrary. Wolff § 390.

PERFORMANCE. The act of doing something. It is synonymous with fulfilling. 81 Ind. 97.

The thing done: as, Paul is exonerated from the obligation of his contract by its performance.

When a contract has been made by parol, which under the statute of frauds could not be enforced, because it was not in writing, and the party seeking to avoid it has received the whole or a part performance of such agreement, he cannot afterwards avoid it; 1 Johns. Ch. 273; L. R. 1 Ch. 35; 40 U. S. App. 579; and such part performance will enable the other party to prove it aliunde; 1 Pet. C. C. 380; 1 Rand. 165; 1 Blackf. 58; 2 Day 255; 1 Des. 350; 1 Binn. 218; 3 Paige, Ch. 545.

The statute of frauds does not apply to a contract which has been fully performed by one party and partially, at least, by the other; 35 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 579. An agreement for constructing a party wall is so performed as to take it out of the statute when built by one owner and used by the other; 7 Ohio Dec. 426. Part performance of a verbal contract for the sale of land is not sufficient to avoid the statute; 73 Miss. 665; though in some cases it is; 89 Me. 506; as where the land was selected and a conveyance made; 15 Ind. App. 432; and where there has been an entry into possession under a parol promise and a deed has been tendered, it is sufficient part performance to sustain an action for the purchase money, though it would not have been for compelling specific performance; 48 Neb. 659.

The question what is sufficient delivery to operate as part performance to avoid the statute is one of frequent occurrence, and must usually be determined upon the circumstances of each case and is not a subject upon which it is easy to generalize. For cases in which the question has arisen see 59 Minn. 295; 64 Vt. 147; 114 N. C. 530; 84 Md. 426; 88 Neb. 339; 15 Ind. App. 34; 10 Utah 31.

The question of performance becomes important where it is necessary to determine whether the non-performance of one party according to the exact terms of the contract will prevent a recovery upon it, or in case that is not permitted, upon a quantum meruit. As to the effect of a contract for services, where the employe is discharged for good cause before the termination of his contract, the authorities conflict. See 24 L. R. A. 231, where the authorities are collected. See also MASTER AND SERVANT. Where there is a contract for permanent employment, a substantial performance by the employer would have the effect of releasing him from liability upon his contract to an employe who refused to comply with the terms of the contract; 42 Neb. 531.

The non-performance of a building contract is not excused by inevitable accident; 88 Mo. 285; 25 Conn. 530; 2 Wall. 1; 25 N. Y. 272; nor by the acceptance of the buildings when not finished in due time; 23 How. 220; but it may be by acts of the other party which delay completion, even if acquiesced in by the contractor; 11 id. 461; 102 N. Y. 205. The prevention of performance by the destruction of a building before completion, if the contract is entire, will prevent recovery for any part; L. R. 2 C. P. 651; but where there is a provision for payment from time to time, it is otherwise; 4 M. & W. 699. There may be waiver of strict performance as to time; 102 N. Y. 228; and a recovery for work actually done; 91 U. S. 640; a vendor who has waived performance at the time specified cannot rescind without reasonable notice to the vendee; 8 Paige 423; 36 Minn. 317; 4 Mich. 578. Nothing can be recovered for part performance of a contract unless full performance was waived or prevented; 26 N. Y. 217; 39 Wis. 553; 67 Me. 449; but see 81 N. Y. 341. See 2 Benj. Sales § 1032. It is said that substantial performance of a building contract is all that is required: 88 N. Y. 648; but one who invokes that doctrine must himself have faithfully endeavored to perform; 123 Pa. 119. See 5 L. R. A. 270; 9 id. 52.

Whether a contract is entire or severable with respect to its performance depends generally upon the consideration, and not the subject matter; 110 Pa. 236; if the latter is apportioned, either expressly or impliedly, the contract is severable; 77 id. 228; so also where it provides for the performance of different things at different times; 143 Mass. 11; or where the price is apportioned to different items to be separately performed; 11 N. Y. 35; 5 B. & Ald. 942. See 1 L. R. A. 826.

Where no time is fixed for performance, a reasonable time will be presumed to have been intended; 45 Ill. App. 624; 79 Mich. 47; 10 Vt. 274; 4 Q. B. D. 133; 39 N. Y. 481; 27 Fla. 482; 11 L. R. A. 526. What is a reasonable time will depend upon the circumstances of the case; 24 Me. 131; L. R. 1 C. P. 385; 30 Vt. 633; 14 W. Va. 1; and is a question for the jury; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1809. Where no time has been fixed, or where performance at an appointed time has been waived, either party may limit a reasonable period within which it must be performed, giving notice thereof to the other party; Hoffm. Ch. 125; 16 Beav. 59, 239; L. R. 10 Eq. 281.

A contract for the delivery of a number of personal chattels of the same kind is severable in its nature, and if a part is accepted and appropriated to the use of the vendee, he must pay the stipulated price for such part, less damages sustained by reason of the failure to make complete delivery: 86 Fed. Rep. 225.

Where the contract is silent as to the mode of performance, it should be according to the usage of the place where it is made; 11 Ex. 645; but it must be substantial and bona fide, conforming to the true intent and meaning, and not merely the letter, of the agreement; 4 id. 128. Conditions precedent must be performed; 3 Addison, Contr. 8th ed. [1189]. See CONDITION.

The question of performance also becomes important with respect to the effect of non-performance as a rescission, so as to give a right of action to the other party. The refusal or inability of one party to a contract to perform his part of it, discharges the other, who is ready and willing to perform his part, from further responsibility, and entitles him to sue at once for a breach. If before the time of the performance, one party announces to the other that he does not intend to perform his promise, the latter may treat the contract as broken and bring suit at once; 158 Pa. 107.

The leading case for this rule is Hochster v. De La Tour, 22 L. J. Q. B. 455, which was followed in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Ex. 111; but in Johnston v. Milling, 16 Q. B. D. 460, it was doubted whether the doctrine extended to a contract containing various stipulations, where the whole cannot be treated as put an end to upon the wrongful repudiation of one of the stipulations. The rule has generally been followed in England and in this country; 11 C. B. N. S. 152; 13 id. 825; 102 N. Y. 10; 108 Ill. 170; 36 Md. 567; contra, 114 Mass. 530.

The principle has been applied to sustain an action for breach of promise of marriage where the defendant, before the time fixed for fulfilling his promise, has married another person; L. R. 7 Ex. 111; 32 Ia. 409; 42 N. Y. 246.

The refusal of performance must be treated as a breach; the plaintiff cannot maintain his action if he persists in seeking performance; 6 El. & Bl. 953; 2 C. B. N. S. 563.

The refusal to perform must be distinct, unequivocal, and absolute; 15 Wall. 36; and acted on by the other party; Benj. Sales § 568. In 117 U. S. 502, the court considered the cases, but declined to decide whether or not the rule should be maintained as applicable to the class of cases to which the one then before it belonged; and said it has been called in England a "novel doctrine" and has never been applied in that court.

The cases in 8 C. C. A. 14 (59 Fed. Rep. 87) and 19 C. C. A. 599 (73 Fed. Rep. 603) followed Hochster v. De la Tour. In 84 Fed. Rep. 569, Dallas, J., was of opinion that the question was an open one, so far as the supreme court was concerned, and followed the ruling of Judge Lowell in 11 Fed. Rep. 372, supported by the two federal cases last above mentioned. He considered that Judge Lowell had answered the argument of the court in 114 Mass. 530, and concurred with him in thinking that the cases which follow the English rule are "founded in good sense, and rest on strong grounds of convenience, however difficult it may be to reconcile them with the strictest logic."

Wallace, C. J., in 85 Fed. Rep. 853, considered that Dingley v. Oler, 117 U. S. 490, was a dictum, and that there was an overwhelming preponderance of adjudication in favor of the doctrine of Hochster v. De la Tour. He cited also 137 N. Y. 471; 60 Minn. 284; 41 W. Va. 717. See 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 576; ELECTION OF RIGHTS OR REMEDIES.

PERIL. The risk, contingency, or cause of loss insured against, in a policy of insurance. See RISK; INSURANCE.

PERIL OF DEATH. A term used to denote that condition of apprehension of death in which it is necessary that the donor should be, in order to make a valid gift causa mortis.

In the cases on this subject there is found a great lack of precision of definition. The result of a critical examination of the authorities is thus stated by Bates, Ch., in Robson v. Robson's Adm., 3 Del. Ch. 51, 63: "I have labored to obtain from the authorities a clear view of what is implied in these terms, peril of death, in other words, what is that precise condition of disability in consideration of which it is that the law gives effect to a gift causa mortis. Thus much is certain, that the gift, to be valid, in the first instance must be made under apprehension of death, as likely to result from some present peril, usually that of sickness. It is further certain that to render the gift finally effectual death must in fact ensue from the sickness or other peril under which it was made. But on another question I am unable to derive from the text books and decisions any settled conclusion: That question is, whether the apprehension of death must be an apprehension of death as presently imminent, the donor being, as it is said, in extremis; or, whether it is sufficient for the validity of the gift if death be contemplated as the probable result of the sickness, a result likely or even certain to occur but after an indefinite interval, it may be of weeks or months; as in the case of chronic diseases generally." After adverting to the difference of view to be found in the leading English cases, the chancellor continues: "The question is uncontrolled by any decisions known to me in our own courts; and as between the English cases I confess a strong preference for the narrower construction of these terms 'peril of death,' the one which seems to have been at first held. It is consistent with the original object of admitting these gifts into the English law; it guards the policy of the statute of wills; and prevents frauds and uncertainties of title." This view of the proper construction of the phrase "peril of death," was founded upon the theory that gifts causa mortis were testamentary in their nature. But Gibson, C. J., in Nicholas v. Adams, 2 Whart. 17, held to the contrary, "that these gifts are not testamentary, but, as he describes them, are gifts executed in the first instance by delivery of the thing, though defeasible by reclamation, the contingency of survivorship or deliverance from the peril." By way of comment on the last cited case it has been suggested that, "that able judge (and this is said with great deference) seems to have been misled by a consideration of gifts causa mortis under the civil law. Under that law these gifts formed quite an expanded system. They embraced all cases of gifts made in consideration of mortality, whether made in present danger or not." 3 Del. Ch. 66. See also Prec. in Ch. 269; 2 Ves. Sr. 437; 1 Bligh 538; DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS.

PERILS OF THE SEA. All marine casualities resulting from the violent action of the elements, as distinguished from their natural, silent influence upon the fabric of the vessel. 74 Fed. Rep. 413.

A phrase contained in bills of lading, and a class of dangers to goods carried, the effects of which the carriers do not undertake to insure against in virtue of their general undertaking.

Bills of lading generally contain an exception that the carrier shall not be liable for "perils of the sea." What is the precise import of this phrase is not, perhaps, very exactly settled. In a strict sense, the words perils of the sea denote the natural accidents peculiar to the sea; but in more than one instance they have been held to extend to events not attributable to natural causes.

Perils of the sea denote natural accidents peculiar to that element, which do not happen by the intervention of man, nor are to be prevented by human prudence. It is a loss happening in spite of all human effort and sagacity; 2 Kent 597, approved in 166 U. S. 386. It is said to have a broader signification than the act of God and includes calamities not caused by violence or a convulsion of nature, such as lightning, flood, or tempest; 20 U. S. App. 508, on appeal in 166 U. S. 386, where Fuller, C. J., said that this might be the case, but did not decide the exact point.

The damage must be due to an accident, of a kind peculiar to the sea, directly and exclusively, without any negligence on the part of the ship-owner or his servants, and must not be due to unseaworthiness of the ship when she started on the voyage; Pollock, Bill of Lading Excep. 40. "There must be some casualty, something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure;" 12 App. Cas. 509.

Perils of the sea include a capture by pirates; 9 Allan 310; loss by fire; 26 Conn. 128; 10 N. Y. 431; hidden obstructions in a river, recently brought there by the current; 52 Barb. 489; but see 6 Gratt. 189; loss due to motion of the sea; 41 Fed. Rep. 62; but not by the natural and inevitable action of winds and waves; 12 App. Cas. 509; by a tidal wave and flood of unusual violence; 41 Fed. Rep. 106. Also the following, if the immediate damage is caused by salt water; rolling and pitching of the ship in rough weather; 32 L. T. 847; running ashore in a fog; L. R. 9 Ex. 339; foundering in a collision; 12 App. Cas. 509; rats eating a hole in a ship and letting water in; 12 App. Cas. 527; the destruction of goods at sea by rats has been held a peril of the sea, the carrier not being in default; 1 Binn. 592.

It includes striking on a sunken rock not on the chart, or a rock from which the light has been removed, or an iceberg, or a vessel without lights; 12 App. 514; or a sword fish making a hole in the ship; id. 525.

Where the vessel's main shaft was broken by a cause coming within perils of the sea and by the necessary delays for repairs the cargo was destroyed, and the plaintiff lost the entire freight, it was held that this was a claim consequent on the disabling of the vessel by peril of the sea; 75 L. T. Rep. 155. Where a cargo was damaged by sea water, which, during the voyage, was caused by the giving way of a bolt used to fasten a stanchion, and it appeared that the ship had encountered very heavy weather, but the evidence showed that the stanchion had withstood with much heavier cargo on a former voyage, and there was no fault in the original construction shown, it was held that the loss came within the exemption clause; 14 U. S. App. 626.

The stranding of a steamer by reason of the negligence of a local pilot, by which the anchor dragged and a portion of her cargo was damaged, is a sea peril and the steamer is not responsible for the negligence of the pilot; 38 U. S. App. 50.

It does not include: Restraint of princes and rulers; 100 Mass. 301; 10 Q. B. 517; 22 How. 502; loss by rats; 5 Blatch. 335; 17 Q. B. Div. 670; destruction by vermin in certain seas, where such injury is to be expected; 2 Mass. 429; 12 App. Cas. 524; by worms; 48 Fed. Rep. 463; confiscation of cargo as contraband by a foreign court; 10 Q. B. 517; damage caused by an accident to machinery that would equally have occurred on land under similar condition; 12 App. Cas. 592; retardation of the voyage by which meats are spoiled; L. R. 4 C. P. 206; encountering heavy seas; 42 Fed. Rep. 861.

Where a cargo was damaged by water which reached it through a pipe which had been gnawed by rats, it was held that the ship was responsible for the whole damage to the cargo, less such portion as could be shown affirmatively to have been done by sea peril; 38 U. S. App. 1.

Where the loss might not have occurred but for the unseaworthiness of the ship or the negligence or breach of contract of the owner or master, it would seem that the owner is not exonerated by the fact that the proximate cause of the loss was a peril of the sea; 9 Wall. 684; 14 C. B. N. S. 59.

The mere fact of a collision at sea is not proof that it occurred in such a way as to be a peril of the sea; 11 P. D. 170. The burden of proof is on the shipowner: 56 Fed. Rep. 243; 1 U. S. App. 251; if goods are lost, the presumption is that it was the fault of the carrier; 41 Fed. Rep. 62.

The exception in a charter-party as to dangers of the seas and navigation, is not applicable to the perils which arise from a breach of the ship-owner's obligation; 11 U. S. App. 648. Where the ship-owner, prima facie, appears to have been negligent, it is not enough for him to prove that his ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage; 78 Fed. Rep. 155.

The mere fact that goods are damaged by sea water entering the ship does not create a presumption of damage by peril of the sea even when aided by the presumption of seaworthiness, for the water may still have got in through negligence: 75 Fed. Rep. 74. But where sea perils have been encountered adequate to cause damage to a seaworthy ship and there is general proof of seaworthiness, the damage is presumptively due to such perils; 79 Fed. Rep. 371.

See ACT OF GOD; FORTUITOUS EVENT; PILOT; RESTRAINT OF RULERS; SEAWORTHY.

PERINDE VALERE. A writ of dispensation granted by the pope to a clerk admitted to a benefice, although incapable. Gibs. 87; 3 Burn, Eccl. L. 111.

PERIOD. A stated and recurring interval of time, a round or series of years, by which time is measured. 67 N. Y. 528.

When used to designate an act to be done or to be begun, though its completion may take an uncertain time, as for instance, the act of exportation, it must mean the day on which the exportation commences. 20 How. 579. See TIME.

PERIODICAL PAYMENTS. Payments occurring periodically, that is, at fixed times from some antecedent obligation and not at variable periods at the discretion of individuals. 42 L. J. Ch. 337.

PERIODICAL WORK. Within the copyright act, 5 & 6 Vict., one that comes out from time to time and is miscellaneous in its articles; 16 L. J. Ch. 142; but a newspaper has been held not a periodical within that act; 39 L. J. Ch. 132; L. R. 9 Eq. 324; contra, 50 L. J. Ch. 621; 17 Ch. D. 708.

PERIPHRASIS. Circumlocution; the use of other words to express the sense of one.

Some words are so technical in their meaning that in charging offences in indictments they must be used or the indictment will not be sustained; for example, an indictment for treason must contain the word traitorously; an indictment for burglary, burglariously; and feloniously must be introduced into every indictment for felony; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 242; Co. 3d Inst. 15; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 172; 4 Bla. Com. 307; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Cro. Car. c. 37.

PERISH. To come to an end; to cease to be; to die.

What has never existed cannot be said to have perished.

When two or more persons die by the same accident, as a shipwreck, no presumption arises that one perished before the other.

PERISHABLE. Subject to speedy decay. 31 Conn. 498.

PERISHABLE GOODS. Goods which are lessened in value and become worse by being kept.

Losses due to the natural decay, deterioration, and waste of perishable goods in the hands of a carrier are excusable. Reference must always be had, however, to the nature and inherent qualities of the articles in question, their unavoidable exposure at the time and place, and under the general circumstances, while in the charge of a carrier of ordinary prudence, and their condition when entrusted to him; Schoul. Bail. 397; 31 Am. Rep. 567.

In admiralty practice, property in its nature perishable, or liable to deterioration, injury, or decay, may be sold pending suit and the proceeds brought into court to abide the event of the suit; or the court may order it appraised and deliver it to the claimant, upon his paying into court such sum of money, or giving such bond as the court may direct; Bened. Adm. § 444; Adm. Rule 10; 1 Gall. 148, 476.

There is a similar practice in equity and in most of the states such property when taken in execution or under attachment, on petition may be ordered sold, pending suit; in which case the proceeds of sale are held in place of the property. See COMMON CARRIERS.

In order to authorize the court to order property levied upon under a warrant of attachment, to be sold as being perishable, it must appear that such property is inherently liable to deterioration and decay and it is not sufficient to show that it will depreciate in value because of changes in fashion; 25 Hun 367. Fattened cattle are perishable property; 3 Munf. 288; also potatoes; 16 Me. 208; skins and furs; 7 Cow. 202; kid gloves; 25 Hun 367; but not merchantable corn; 54 Ill. 67. The doctrine applies to real estate in litigation and liable to deteriorate; 26 N. J. Eq. 269.

PERJURY. In Criminal Law. The wilful assertion as to a matter of fact, opinion, belief, or knowledge, made by a witness in a judicial proceeding as part of his evidence, either upon oath or in any form allowed by law to be substituted for an oath, whether such evidence is given in open court, or in an affidavit, or otherwise, such assertion being known to such witness to be false, and being intended by him to mislead the court, jury, or person holding the proceeding. 2 Whart. C. L. § 1244.

The wilful giving, under oath, in a judicial proceeding or course of justice, of false testimony material to the issue or point of inquiry. 2 Bish. N. Cr. Law § 1015.

It consists in swearing wilfully and corruptly to some matter which is untrue. 63 Vt. 201.

The intention must be wilful. The oath must be taken and the falsehood asserted with deliberation and a consciousness of the nature of the statement made; for if it has arisen in consequence of inadvertency, surprise, or mistake of the import of the question, there was no corrupt motive; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 2; Cro. Eliz. 492; 4 McLean 113; 3 Dev. 114; 7 C. & P. 17; 11 Q. B. 1028; 1 Rob. Va. 729; 3 Ala. N. S. 602: 74 Cal. 306. But one who swears wilfully and deliberately to a matter which he really believes, and which is false, and which he had no probable cause for believing, is guilty of perjury; 6 Binn. 249. See Baldw. 370; 1 Bail. 50; 4 McLean 113. And so is one who swears falsely, though he testifies against his will; 98 Ky. 526. Where a bankrupt, having submitted the facts fairly to his counsel, swore to a schedule wrongly made out on his advice, it was not perjury; 3 McLean 573.

The oath must be false. The party must believe that what he is swearing to is fictitious; and if, intending to deceive, he asserts that which may happen to be done without any knowledge of the fact, he is equally criminal, and the accidental truth of his evidence will not excuse him; Co. 3d Inst. 166; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 6; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 437. See 4 Mo. 47; 4 Zabr. 455; 9 Barb. 567; 1 C. & K. 519; 15 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 118. As, if a man swears that C D revoked his will in his presence, if he really had revoked it, but it was unknown to the witness that he had done so, it is perjury; Hetl. 97. Knowledge by a witness that his testimony is false, is tested, like intention generally, by sound mind and discretion, and by all the circumstances; soundness of mind, where nothing to the contrary appears, being assumed; 83 Ga. 521.

The party must be lawfully sworn. The person by whom the oath is administered must have competent authority to receive it; an oath, therefore, taken before a private person, or before an officer having no jurisdiction, will not amount to perjury, "For where the court hath no authority to hold plea of the cause, but it is coram non judice, there perjury cannot be committed;" 1 Ind. 232; 1 Johns. 498; 3 M'Cord 308; 3 C. & P. 419; 4 Hawks 182; 1 N. & M'C. 546; 2 Hayw. 56; 8 Pick. 453; 12 Q. B. 1026; 2 Russ. Cr. 520; Co. 3d Inst. 166; 40 La. Ann. 460; 131 U. S. 50; 20 D. C. 424. See 79 Ga. 162; 24 Tex. App. 715; 36 Tex. Cr. Rep. 483; 107 N. C. 832; 87 Tenn. 693; 9 Mackey 424. Where a defect in the proceedings is waived, perjury may be committed; 135 Ill. 416. A false affidavit will be perjury where the officer who administered the oath was a minor, in the absence of a statutory disqualification of minors from holding office; 35 Tex. Cr. Rep. 243.

The proceedings must be judicial; 5 Mo. 21; 1 Bail. 595; 11 Metc. 406; 5 Humphr. 83; 1 Johns. 49; Wright, Ohio 173; R. & R. 459. Proceedings before those who are in any way intrusted with the administration of justice, in respect of any matter regularly before them, are considered as judicial for this purpose; 2 Russ. Cr. 518; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 3. See 9 Pet. 238; 11 Conn. 408; 4 M'Cord 165. Perjury cannot be committed where the matter is not regularly before the court; 4 Hawks 182; 2 Hayw. 56; 8 Pick. 453; 1 N. & M'C. 546; 9 Mo. 824; 18 Barb. 407; 26 Me. 33; 7 Blackf. 25; 5 B. & Ald. 634. An oath not administered pursuant to, or required or authorized by, any law, cannot be made the basis of a charge of perjury; 41 Minn. 59.

The assertion must be absolute. If a man, however, swears that he believes that to be true which he knows to be false, it will be perjury; 10 Q. B. 670; 2 W. Bla. 881; 1 Leach 232; 6 Binn. 249. It is immaterial whether the testimony is given in answer to a question or voluntarily; 3 Zabr. 49; 12 Metc. 225. Perjury cannot be assigned upon the valuation, under oath, of a jewel or other thing the value of which consists in estimation; Sid. 146; 1 Kebl. 510. But in some cases a false statement of opinion may become perjury; 10 Q. B. 670; 15 Ill. 357; 3 Ala. N. S. 602; 3 Strobh. 147; 1 Leach, C. C. 325; 9 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 161.

The oath must be material to the question depending; 1 Term 63; 12 Mass. 274; 3 Murph. 123; 4 Mo. 47; 2 Ill. 80; 9 Miss. 149; 6 Pa. 170; 2 Cush. 212; 40 Kan. 631; 98 N. C. 759; 64 Cal. 106. See 23 Neb. 486; 111 Mo. 464; 14 Fed. Rep. 447. Where the facts sworn to are wholly foreign from the purpose and altogether immaterial to the matter in question, the oath does not amount to perjury; 2 Russ. Cr. 521; Co. 3d Inst. 167; 8 Ves. 35; Bac. Abr. Perjury (A); 2 N. & M'C. 18; 2 Mo. 158; 95 Cal. 657. But all false statements wilfully and corruptly made by a witness as to matters which affect his credit are material; [1895] 1 Q. B. 797; and so is every question in cross-examination which goes to the credit of a witness, as, whether he has been before convicted of felony; 3 C. & K. 26; 1 C. & M. 655. And see 10 Mod. 195; 8 Rich. 456; 9 Mo. 824; 12 Metc. 225; 28 Tex. Ap. 301. False evidence, whereby, on the trial of a cause, the judge is induced to admit other material evidence, even though the latter evidence is afterwards withdrawn by counsel, or though it was not legally receivable, is indictable as perjury; 2 Den. C. C. 302; 3 C. & K. 302.

It is perjury where the witness swears falsely in giving evidence legally inadmissible, but which becomes material by being introduced in evidence; 5 Okl. 173.

The materialty of the false oath is for the court and not for the jury; 54 Fed. Rep. 488; 97 Cal. 224; 1 Okl. 336.

A defendant in a criminal prosecution, who testifies in his own behalf and of his own accord, is guilty of perjury if he testifies falsely. He is to be treated the same as any other witness; 115 N. C. 712; 33 Tex. Cr. Rep. 314; id. 67; 57 Kan. 431.

Where one person arranges with another to commit perjury, both are in pari delicto; 135 U. S. 483. An attempt to induce a person to commit perjury on the contemplated trial of an indictment not yet returned, has been held not to be subornation of perjury; 137 Mo. 289.

Punishment of perjury is provided for by statutes in all the states, and also by the United States when it is committed in any proceeding by or under federal laws; U. S. R. S. §§ 5392–5396. For a form of indictment approved as correct in every substantial part, see 159 U. S. 682.

The power of punishing witnesses for testifying falsely in a judicial proceeding belongs peculiarly to the government in whose tribunals that proceeding is had; 134 U. S. 372. In general, it may be observed that a perjury is committed as well by making a false affirmation as a false oath. See OATH.

R. S. § 5392, provides that every person taking an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, etc., by him subscribed is true, who wilfully, and contrary to such oath, states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, punishable by a fine of not more than $2,000 and imprisonment at hard labor for not more than five years, and is rendered incapable of testifying in any court of the United States until the judgment against him is reversed.

It is unnecessary in an indictment for perjury under R. S. § 5396 to set out the affidavit at length; 50 Fed. Rep. 915.

PERMANENT. This word does not always embrace the idea of absolute perpetuity; 8 Barb. 185; or forever or lasting forever, or existing forever; 136 U. S. 393; 2 N. J. Eq. 155; but where the citizens of a locality are induced to give large sums of money for the establishment of an educational institution, it means that the place agreed on shall be the site of the institution so long as it shall endure; 8 Barb. 186.

PERMANENT ABODE. A domicil, a home, which a party is at liberty to leave, as interest or whim may dictate, but without any present intention of changing it. 78 Ill. 181. See NON-RESIDENT; DOMICIL; HOME.

PERMANENT EMPLOYMENT. Employment for an indefinite time which may be severed by either party. 81 Cal. 596; 12 Bush 541; 4 C. B. 479.

PERMANENT TRESPASS. A trespass consisting of trespasses of one and the same kind, committed on several days, which are, in their nature, capable of renewal or continuation, and are actually renewed or continued from day to day, so that the particular injury done on each particular day cannot be distinguished from what was done on another day. In declaring for such trespasses, they may be laid with a continuando; 3 Bla. Com. 212; Bac. Abr. Trespass (B 2, I 2); 1 Saund. 24, n. 1; Poll. Torts 482. See CONTINUANDO; TRESPASS.

PERMISSION. A license to do a thing; an authority to do an act which without such authority would have been unlawful. A permission differs from a law: it is a check upon the operations of the law.

A negation of law, arising either from the law's silence, or its express declaration. Ruth. Nat. L. b. 1, c. 1.

Express permissions derogate from something which before was forbidden, and may operate in favor of one or more persons, or for the performance of one or more acts, or for a longer or shorter time.

Implied permissions are those which arise from the fact that the law has not forbidden the act to be done.

PERMISSIVE. Allowed; that which may be done: as, permissive waste, which is the permitting real estate to go to waste. When a tenant is bound to repair, he is punishable for permissive waste. See WASTE.

PERMISSIVE LETTERS. In a note by the secretary of the navy, October 1, 1861, this term was used as indicating an authority something less than a grant of letters of marque. See 2 Hall. Int. L. Baker's ed. 120.

PERMIT. A license or warrant to do something not forbidden by law: as to land goods imported into the United States, after the duties have been paid or secured to be paid. Act of Congr. March 2, 1799, s. 49, cl. 2. See form of such a permit, Gordon Dig. App. II. 46.

It denotes a decided assent; 105 Ill. 558. It may mean suffer; 7 Ch. Div. 145; although it is more positive than allow or suffer; 105 Ill. 558. It implies consent given or leave granted; 4 Bosw. 391. It has been defined to mean allow by not prohibiting. 9 Allen 266. Every definition of suffer or permit includes knowledge of what is to be done under the sufferance or permission and intention that what is done was what was to be done; 17 Blatch. 325.

PERMUTATION. In Civil Law. Exchange; barter.

This contract is formed by the consent of the parties; but delivery is indispensable, for without it it is a mere agreement. Dig. 31. 77. 4; Code 4. 64. 3.

Permutation differs from sale in this, that in the former a delivery of the articles sold must be made, while in the latter it is unnecessary. It agrees with the contract of sale, however, in the following particulars: that he to whom the delivery is made acquires the right or faculty of prescribing; Dig. 41. 3. 4. 17; that the contracting parties are bound to guarantee to each other the title of the things delivered; Code 4. 64. 1; and that they are bound to take back the things delivered when they have latent defects which they have concealed; Dig. 21. 1. 63. See Aso & M. Inst. b. 2, t. 16, c. 1; MUTATION; TRANSFER.

PERMUTATIONE. A writ to an ordinary commanding him to admit a clerk to a benefice upon exchange made with another. Cow.; Moz. & W.

PERNANCY (from Fr. prendre, to take). A taking or receiving.

PERNOR OF PROFITS. He who receives the profits of lands, etc. A cestui qui use, who is legally entitled and actually does receive the profits, is the pernor of profits. Termes de la Ley.

PERPARS. A part of the inheritance. Fleta.

PERPETRATOR. Within the meaning of a statute giving an action against the perpetrator of an act, where a servant of a railroad company is killed through the negligence of a fellow-servant, the company itself may be regarded as the perpetrator. 33 Ia. 47.

PERPETUAL. That which is to last without limitation as to time: as, a perpetual statute, which is one without limit as to time, although not expressed to be so.

PERPETUAL EDICT. In Roman Law. An edict issued by the prætor on taking office. It was intended to be valid for the whole term of his year of office. Sohm, Rom. L. 51.

PERPETUAL CURACY. The office of a curate in a parish where there is no spiritual rector or vicar, but where the curate is appointed to officiate by the impropriator. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 55.

The church of which the curate is perpetual. 2 Ves. Sen. 425. See 2 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 695; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 55; 9 Ad. & E. 556. As to whether such curate may be removed, see 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 55.

PERPETUAL INJUNCTION. Opposed to an injunction ad interim; an injunction which finally disposes of the suit, and is indefinite in point of time. See INJUNCTION.

PERPETUAL SUCCESSION. The continuous existence which enables a corporation to manage its affairs and hold property without the necessity of conveyances for the purpose of transmitting it. By reason of this quality, this ideal and artificial person remains, in its legal entity and personality, the same, though frequent changes may be made of its members; and although all of its members may be changed, and new ones substituted for the old, it still legally remains the same. Field, Corp. § 50; 5 Mo. App. 340.

PERPETUATING TESTIMONY. The act by which testimony is reduced to writing as prescribed by law, so that the same shall be read in evidence in some suit or legal proceedings to be thereafter instituted.

The origin of this practice may be traced to the canon law, cap. 5, X ut lite non contestata, etc. Bockmer, n. 4; 8 Toullier, n. 22. Statutes exist in most of the states for this purpose. Equity also furnishes means, to a limited extent, for the same purpose.

PERPETUITY. Any limitation tending to take the subject of it out of commerce for a longer period than a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years beyond, and, in case of a posthumous child, a few months more, allowing for the term of gestation. Randall, Perp. 48.

Such a limitation of property as renders it inalienable beyond the period allowed by law. Gilbert, Uses, Sugd. ed. 260, n.

"A future limitation, whether executory or by way of remainder, and of real or personal property, which is not to vest till after the expiration of or which will not necessarily vest within, the period prescribed by law for the creation of future estates, and which is not destructible by the person for the time being entitled to the property subject to the future limitation, except with the concurrence of the person interested in the contingent event." Lewis, Perpetuities ch. 12. This was said by Gibson, C. J., to be the nearest approach to a perfect definition of a perpetuity; 10 Pa. 334.

It is suggested that some confusion has arisen in connection with the law of perpetuities because of a certain ambiguity in the legal definition of the term itself. "The original meaning of a perpetuity is an inalienable, indestructible interest. The second artificial meaning is, an interest which will not vest to a remote period. This latter is the meaning which is attached to the term when the rule against perpetuities is spoken of;" Gray, Perp. § 140. The author last cited considers it a matter of regret that the rule should not have been known as the rule against remoteness, rather than the rule as against perpetuities.

The comment was made upon this statement that notwithstanding the declaration quoted from this author, "yet in all his illustrations he shows that interests which were destructible were not perpetuities"; 121 Pa. 205; where it is held that indestructibility of the estate of the person, for the time being entitled to the property, is essential to constitute a perpetuity.

The following is suggested as the true form of the rule: "No interest subject to a condition precedent is good, unless the condition must be fulfilled, if at all, within twenty-one years after some life in being at the creation of the interest;" Gray, Perp. 201. A later work adheres more closely to the familiar phraseology (a course which has great advantages in the discussion of common-law rules of decision), in defining it as a rule which "forbids the postponement of the vesting of real or personal property for an estate in fee-simple, in tail or absolute interest, during a longer period than lives in being and twenty-one years after, an extension being allowed for gestation if gestation exists;" Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 47. See, also, 7 Cra. 456; 113 U. S. 340; L. R. 44 Ch. D. 85. The rule against perpetuities as distinguished from that against making estates indefinitely inalienable, concerns itself only with the vesting or assignment of estates and not with their termination; 90 Me. 318; and when properly so limited, it is applicable to a gift in trust for charity; id. An interesting case in Colorado holds that notwithstanding statutory adoption, in that state, of the common law prior to 4 James I., English decisions after that year are to be regarded as authority in determining what the common law as to perpetuities was at that time; 23 Colo. 40; s. c. 35 L. R. A. 41.

The rule against perpetuities is one of decision only, and in England is affected only by statute under what is known as the Thelluson Act, the passage of which was occasioned by litigation arising under the will of Peter Thelluson who died in 1797. See Thelluson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. Jr. 227; 11 Ves. 112. For the text of the act see Gray, Perp. Appx. B. note; and for the history of the litigation which led to it, see Hargrave, Thelluson Case ch. 1.

The act was directed against trusts for accumulation. Such a trust which violates the rule against perpetuities is wholly void, but one which is good within the rule might violate the Thelluson Act and be void for the excess; Gray, Perp. § 687. The act prohibits accumulations other than during four distinct periods, the language being: "For any longer term than the life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settler or settlers; or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settler, devisor, or testator; or during the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who shall be living, or en ventre sa mere at the time of the death of such grantor, devisor, or testator; or during the minority or respective minorities only of any person or persons who, under the uses or trusts of the deed, surrender, will, or other assurances directing such accumulations, would, for the time being, if of full age, be entitled unto the rents, issues and profits, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce so directed to be accumulated." And only one of these periods can be taken; 16 Sim. 391; 25 Ch. D. 729. In Pennsylvania there is a statute of the same kind, Act 1853, Apr. 18, § 9, the text of which will be found in Gray, Perp. Appx. B. In Alabama accumulations are prohibited for more than ten years, or to the termination of minority in case of a minor in being at the date of conveyance or death of the testator.

The legislation in the United States on the subject of perpetuities has been classified as of three kinds: 1. A general provision that perpetuities shall not be allowed. 2. A short and simple statute declaring or modifying the law. 3. An elaborate scheme to be substituted for the common law.

The first class consists mainly of constitutional provisions in Arkansas, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Vermont. A similar provision existed formerly in Florida, being omitted in the last constitution. The second class includes Georgia, Iowa, and Kentucky, with statutes properly declaratory of the common law; and Alabama, Connecticut, Indiana, Mississippi, Ohio, Pennsylvania, where the common-law rule is somewhat modified. The third class embraces the states which have followed, in the main, the New York statute, providing against, (1) remoteness of interests in land; (2) accumulation of land and profits therefrom; (3) the same as to personal property. Michigan and Minnesota have followed the first and second parts of the New York system, and Indiana substantially the whole of it. The prohibition of this legislation is against a restraint upon the power of alienation for more than two lives in being at the creation of the estate. But in Indiana, California, and Dakota, where the New York system to a large extent was followed, the restraint was not confined to two existing lives. In Wisconsin, where the New York statute was first followed exactly, in 1887, the period was extended to two lives in being and twenty-one years thereafter. See Gray, Perp. Appx. B. & C.; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1440. The rule affects both legal and equitable interests and real and personal estate; it is not of feudal origin, but the outgrowth of necessities of modern times; and while strictly applied, regard is had rather to substance than form; Gray, Perp. §§ 202, 208.

Under the common-law rule there is no limit to the number of lives that can be taken; 11 Ves. 146.

In the application of the rule, a child en ventre sa mere is to be considered as born when necessary for its own benefit; 2 H. Bla. 399; but not for that of third persons; 2 De G. J. & S. 665. The principle controlling the allowance of the period of gestation under the rule is, that life begins from conception and it is sufficient if the person entitled to a future interest at majority is begotten though not born within a life in being at its creation; Gray, Perp. § 220. This principle has been extended to allow two periods of gestation; 7 Term 100; and it has been a subject of discussion whether three might be allowed; 3 Yo. & Coll. 328; Lewis, Perp. 726; Gray, Perp. § 222. The time runs only from testator's death; id. § 231; Lewis, Perp. Suppl. 27. Where a future interest is void as against the rule, prior limitations will be treated precisely as if the void limitation had been omitted; 3 Gray 142; 4 Ves. Jr. 427; 83 Wis. 617. See an extended note classifying and analyzing the cases, 20 L. R. A. 509. Subsequent limitations following an interest too remote were held by Sugden, L. C., to fail. The authorities relied upon for this view are, his argument as counsel in Beard v. Westcott, 5 B. & Ald. 801; and his decision as chancellor in Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145. In Beard v. Westcott, the limitation was held good in the common pleas; 5 Taunt. 393; and bad in the king's bench; 5 B. & Ald. 801. The latter view is seriously controverted as not supported by the authorities cited in Sudgen's argument; Gray, Perp. §§ 251–257; Lewis, Perp. 421, 661.

A vested interest is not subject to the rule, and therefore it does not affect reversions and vested remainders and analogous equitable interests and interests in personalty; Gray, Perp. § 205. Whether contingent remainders are so has been the subject of much discussion involving the mooted question of limiting a possibility upon a possibility. That they are within the rule is contended by many authorities; Gray, Perp. §§ 284–298, where it is earnestly contended that contingent remainders and all future interests should fall within the rule, which conclusion is also supported by Lewis, Perp. c. 16, Suppl. 97. See, also, 20

Ch. D. 562; 1 Jarm. Wills 255, 260; 2 id. 845; Theobald, Wills 424; 46 N. H. 230; 60 L. T. 247; 69 id. 360; 1 Hayes, Conv. 494; contra, Wms. R. P. 6th Am. ed. 274; Challis, R. P. 90, 159; 8 Jurist, pt. 2, p. 20, 283; 4 D. & W. 1; s. c. 2 H. L. Cas. 186. See L. R. 43 Ch. D. 246.

The rule applies to personal property; Lewis, Perp. 613; Gray, Perp. § 315; and equitable interests are affected by analogy to legal estates; those vested are subject, and those not vested are not subject to the rule; id. §§ 322, 323. The rule against perpetuities does not affect contracts unless they are such as create rights of property; id. § 329; L. R. 43 Ch. D. 265. The rule is not applicable to a resulting trust which arises on the failure of an estate granted for a particular use which has ceased; 165 U. S. 342; nor to a power to sell, upon the expiration of an estate tail, and divide the proceeds among persons then ascertainable; 166 U. S. 83.

The statutes against perpetuities were directed at private trusts and accumulations and not at public, charitable, or eleemosynary trusts or uses; 107 U. S. 174; 95 id. 303; 3 Pet. 99; 15 How. 367; 6 Paige 639. The rule cannot be invoked to defeat a charitable use; 68 Fed. Rep. 796; but a gift for the encouragement of yacht-racing is not such a use and may therefore be void as a perpetuity; [1895] 2 Ch. 657.

If a gift by will to a class is void as to one of the class because against the rule as to perpetuities, it is void as to all; 124 Pa. 10.

Mr. Justice Powell, in Scattergood v. Edge, 12 Mod. 278, distinguished perpetuities into two sorts, absolute and qualified; meaning thereby, as it is apprehended, a distinction between a plain, direct, and palpable perpetuity, and the case where an estate is limited on a contingency, which might happen within a reasonable compass of time, but where the estate, nevertheless, from the nature of the limitation, might be kept out of commerce longer than was thought agreeable to the policy of the common law. But this distinction would not now lead to a better understanding or explanation of the subject, for whether an estate be so limited that it cannot take effect until a period too much protracted, or whether on a contingency which may happen within a moderate compass of time, it equally falls within the line of perpetuity, and the limitation is therefore void; for it is not sufficient that an estate may vest within the time allowed, but the rule requires that it must; Randall, Perp. 49; 48 Conn. 293; 7 Sim. 173; 10 Allen 1; Schoul. Wills § 21; 124 Pa. 10. See Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 23; 1 Belt, Suppl. to Ves. Jr. 406; 2 Ves. 357; 3 Saund. 388; Com. Dig. Chancery (4 G 1); 3 Ch. Cas. 1; 85 Tenn. 646.

Under statutes of the New York class, a devise which suspends the power of alienation for a specific time, not measured by two lives, but by a term of years, is void; 5 App. Div. 318; 74 Hun 297. That a contingency may arise which will make the estate alienable is immaterial, but the validity of the provision must be determined independently of any possible agreement of parties; 157 Mass. 362; but a power is not rendered void because by its terms an appointment might possibly be made which would not take effect within the required period; 136 Pa. 354.

PERQUISITES. In its most extensive sense, perquisites signifies anything gotten by industry or purchased with money, different from that which descends from a father or ancestor. Bract. l. 2, c. 30, n. 3; l. 4, c. 22. In a more limited sense, it means something gained by a place or office beyond the regular salary or fee.

PERSIA. An absolute monarchy of Asia. The executive functions are deputed to a ministry. The laws are based on the Koran and justice is administered according to the Divine law as therein set forth.

PERSON. A man considered according to the rank he holds in society, with all the right to which the place he holds entitles him, and the duties which it imposes. 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 137; 134 N. Y. 506.

The term is, however, more extensive than man. It may include artificial beings, as corporations; 2 Ill. 178; 1 Bla. Com. 123; 4 Bingh. 669; 1 Mod. 164; 23 N. Y. 242; 48 Ga. 321; quasi-corporations; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 372; L. R. 5 App. Cas. 857; territorial corporations; 58 Conn. 507; and foreign corporations; 80 N. Y. 259; under statutes, forbidding the taking of property without due process of law and giving to all persons the equal protection of the laws; 169 U. S. 466, citing 118 id. 394; 142 id. 386; 165 id. 150; concerning claims arising from Indian depredations; 164 U. S. 686; relating to taxation and the revenue laws; 1 Bush 250; 80 N. Y. 254; to attachments; 20 Conn. 416; usurious contracts; 7 How. (Miss.) 508; 13 Conn. 249; applying to limitation of actions; 20 N. Y. 210; 4 Kan. 453; and concerning the admissibility as a witness of a party in his own behalf when the opposite party is a living person; 22 N. Y. 852; 31 Barb. 267. A corporation is also a person under a penal statute; 11 Wheat. 392. See RAILROAD.

It has been held that when the word person is used in a legislative act, natural persons will be intended unless something appear in the context to show that it applies to artificial persons; 2 Ill. 178; 112 Pa. 337; but as a rule corporations will be considered persons within the statutes unless the intention of the legislature is manifestly to exclude them; 5 Rand. (Va.) 132.

A county is a person in a legal sense; 52 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 711; but a sovereignty is not: 52 N. Y. 535; 44 Fed. Rep. 17; 94 U. S. 315; but contra within the meaning of a statute, providing a penalty for the fraudulent alteration of a public record with intent that any "person" be defrauded; 24 Tex. 61; and within the meaning of a covenant for quiet and peaceful possession against all and every person or persons; 19 Mont. 268. An Indian is a person; 5 Dill. 459; 2 Sawy. 264; and a slave was so considered, in so far as to be capable of committing a riot in conjunction with white men; 1 Bay 358. The estate of a decedent is a person; 107 Ind. 54; and where the statute makes the owner of a dog liable for injuries to any person, it includes the property of such person; 11 Gray 29; but where the statute provided damages for the bite of a dog which had previously bitten a person, it was held insufficient to show that the dog had previously bitten a goat; [1896] 2 Q. B. 109; a dog will not be included in the word in an act which authorizes a person to kill dogs running at large; 84 Mich. 283.

It includes women; 136 Mass. 580; 50 Conn. 131; 16 Col. 441; 25 Ohio St. 21; 76 Mich. 1; 74 Ga. 795; but see 39 Wis. 232; 55 Ill. 535, where the statute was in reference to admission to the bar, and it was held that, while the term was broad enough to include them, such a construction could not be presumed to be the legislative intent.

Where the statute prohibited any person from pursuing his usual vocation on the Lord's Day, it was held to apply to a judge holding court; 49 Ga. 436.

A child en ventre sa mere is not a person; 138 Mass. 14; but an infant is so considered; 131 id. 441.

In the United States Bankruptcy Act of 1898, it is provided that the word "persons" shall include corporations, except where otherwise specified, and officers, partnerships, and women, and, when used with reference to the commission of acts which are therein forbidden, shall include persons who are participants in the forbidden acts, and the agents, officers, and members of the board of directors or trustees, or their controlling bodies, of corporations.

PERSONA (Lat.) In Civil Law. Character, in virtue of which certain rights belong to a man and certain duties are imposed upon him. Thus, one man may unite many characters (personæ); as, for example, the characters of father and son, of master and servant; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 117.

In its original signification, a mask; afterwards, a man in reference to his condition or character (status). Vicat, Voc. Jur. It is used metaphorically of things, among which are counted slaves. It is often opposed to res: as, actio in personam and actio in rem.

Power and right belonging to a person in a certain character (pro jure et potestate personæ competente). Vicat, Voc. Jur. Its use is not confined to the living, but is extended to the dead and to angels. Id. A statue in a fountain whence water gushes.

PERSONAL. Belonging to the person.

PERSONAL ACTION. In Practice. In the Civil Law. An action in which one person (the actor) sues another (the reus) in respect of some obligation which he is under to the actor either ex contractu or ex delicto. It will be seen that this includes all actions against a person, without reference to the nature of the property involved. In a limited sense of the word action in the civil law, it includes only personal action, all others being called petitions. See REAL ACTION.

In the Common Law. An action brought for the recovery of personal property, for the enforcement of some contract or to recover damages for its breach, or for the recovery of damages for the commission of an injury to the person or property. Such arise either upon contracts as, account, assumpsit, covenant, debt, and detinue (see these words), or for wrongs, injuries, or torts, as trespass, trespass on the case, replevin, trover (see these words). Other divisions of personal actions are made in the various states; in Vermont and Connecticut an action is in use called the action of book debt. See PERSONAL PROPERTY.

PERSONAL ASSETS. See ASSETS.

PERSONAL CHATTELS. See CHATTELS.

PERSONAL CONTRACT. A contract as to personal property. A covenant (or contract) personal relates only to matters personal as distinguished from real, and is binding on the covenantor (contractor) during his life, and on his personal representatives after his decease, in respect of assets. 3 Co. 22 a.

PERSONAL COVENANT. A covenant which binds only the covenantor and his personal representatives in respect to assets, and can be taken advantage of only by the covenantee.

A covenant which must be performed by the covenantor in person. Fitzh. N. B. 340.

All covenants are either personal or real; but some confusion exists in regard to the division between them. Thus, a covenant may be personal as regards the covenantor, and real as regards the covenantee; and different definitions have been given, according to whether the rights and liabilities of the covenantor or the covenantee have been in consideration. It is apprehended, however, that the prevalent modern usage is to hold a covenant real, if it is real,—that is, runs with the land so as to apply to an assignee, either as regards the covenantor or the covenantee. See Platt, Cov. 61; 4 Bla. Com. 304; 3 N. J. 260; 7 Gray 83. See COVENANT.

PERSONAL EFFECTS. In a will, the words are held not to include personal property in the testator's house, such as furniture and pictures. 173 Pa. 368. See WILL.

PERSONAL ESTATE. The term is sometimes used as synonymous with personal property, but its use should not lead to the supposition that there can be any such thing as an estate in personalty, properly so called. Will. Pers. Prop. 8.

But Dicey (Confl. Laws, Moore's ed. 811) considers personal estate and personal property synonymous. They are so used in Acts of Parliament.

PERSONAL GOODS. That property which passes by hand and property which marriage passed from the wife to the husband. Co. Litt. 185 b. See PERSONAL PROPERTY.

PERSONAL INJURY. Bodily injury. 45 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 303.

PERSONAL LIABILITY. The statutory liability of stockholders of corporations by which they are held individually liable for the debts of the corporation. See STOCKHOLDERS; JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

PERSONAL LIBERTY. Freedom from physical and personal restraint; the right to the pursuit of happiness; freedom to go where one chooses and to pursue such lawful occupations as may seem suitable.

In its broad sense personal liberty would include freedom from unlawful arrest and restraint, from unlawful seizures and searches, from assault and battery, from libel and slander, from general warrants of arrest, from unfair monopolies in trade, and from quartering soldiers in time of peace; and it would include also the right of trial by jury, liberty of conscience, freedom of the press, the right to travel and emigrate, to bear arms and to petition the government for redress of grievances. But in its stricter sense it includes only freedom to move about as one pleases and to pursue any lawful calling. 94 U. S. 142; 4 Am. St. Rep. 468; 16 Wall. 106; 111 U. S. 757; 99 N. Y. 377; 50 Am. Rep. 636. See CONSTITUTIONAL; POLICE POWER; ASSAULT; CORRECTION; IMPRISONMENT; HABEAS CORPUS; EXPATRIATION; PHYSICAL EXAMINATION; SEARCH; PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS; LIBERTY OF CONTRACT; LIBERTY.

PERSONAL PROPERTY. The right or interest which a man has in things personal.

The right or interest less than a freehold which a man has in realty, or any right or interest which he has in things movable.

Personal property is to be distinguished from things personal. There may be, for example, a personal estate in realty, as chattels real; but the only property which a man can have in things personal must be a personal property. The essential idea of personal property is that of property in a thing movable or separable from the realty, or of perishability or possibility of brief duration of interest as compared with the owner's life, in a thing real, without any action on the part of the owner. See 2 Bla. Com. 14 and notes, 384 and notes.

It includes money, chattels, things in action and evidence of debt; 62 Hun 298; 2 S. Dak. 226; 129 Md. 595; and the right which a vendor has to enforce a contract for the sale of real property; 133 N. Y. 383. It does not include dogs untaxed; 79 Ind. 9.

A crop growing in the ground is personal property so far as not to be considered an interest in land, under the statute of frauds; 12 Me. 337; 5 B. & C. 829; 9 id. 561; 10 Ad. & E. 753; 117 Ind. 56, 58.

It is a general principle of American law that stock in corporations is to be considered as personal property; Walker, Am. Law, 9th ed. Sec. 3; 4 Dane, Abr. 670; 1 Hill, R. P. 18; 76 Cal. 536; though it was held that such stock was real estate; 2 Conn. 567; but the rule was then changed by the legislature.

Title to personal property is acquired—first, by original acquisition by occupancy; as, by capture in war, by finding a lost thing; second, by original acquisition by accession; third, by original acquisition by intellectual labor: as, copyrights and patents for inventions; fourth, by transfer, which is by act of law, by forfeiture, by judgment, by insolvency, by intestacy; fifth, by transfer by act of the party, by gift, by sale. See Graves, Title to Pers. Prop; PEW; PROPERTY; REAL PROPERTY; POSSESSION.

Possession of personal property is prima facie title thereto; 76 Ga. 299. See 113 N. Y. 52.

PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES. The executors or administrators of the person deceased. 6 Mod. 155; 5 Ves. 402; 1 Madd. 108; 118 Mass. 198. The personal representative of a lessee for years is his assignee. 1 Ld. Raym. 553; 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 59.

In wills, these words are sometimes construed to mean next of kin; 3 Bro. C. C. 224; 2 Jarm. Wills 112; 1 Beav. 46; 1 R. & M. 587; that is, those who would take the personal estate under the statute of distributions. They have been held to mean descendants; 19 Beav. 448. See LEGAL PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES.

PERSONAL SECURITY. The legal and uninterrupted enjoyment by a man of his life, his body, his health, and his reputation. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 202.

PERSONAL SERVICE. The delivery of a writ to the person therein named in person. Leaving a copy at his place of abode is not personal service; 12 Wis. 336.

PERSONAL STATUTE. A law whose principal, direct, and immediate object is to regulate the condition of persons.

The term is not properly in use in the common law, although Lord Mansfield, in 2 W. Bla. 154, applied it to those legislative acts which respect personal transitory contracts, but it is occasionally used in the sense given to it in civil law and which is adopted as its definition. It is a law, ordinance, regulation, or custom, the disposition of which affects the person and clothes him with a capacity or incapacity which he does not change with his abode. See 2 Kent 613.

PERSONALTY. That which is movable; that which is the subject of personal property and not of a real property.

PERSONALITY. A term used to designate that quality of a law which concerns the condition, state, or capacity of persons.

An action in personality is one brought against the right person, or the person against whom it lies. Fitzh. N. B. 92.

The personality of laws is a phrase used by foreign jurists to designate all laws concerning the condition, state, or capacity of persons, as distinguished from the reality of laws, which means all laws concerning property or things. To express the idea that the operation of a law is universal it is termed a personal statute, and, on the other hand, to express the idea that its operation is confined to the country of its origin it is designated a real statute. Sto. Confl. L. § 16.

Livermore used the words personality and reality, and Henry the words personalty and realty; Story preferred the former, as less likely to lead to mistakes, as, in our law, personalty and realty are used exclusively to designate personal and real property. Id.

PERSONATE. In Criminal Law. To assume the character of another without lawful authority, and, in such character, do something to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of another, without his will or consent.

The bare fact of personating another for the purpose of fraud is no more than a cheat or misdemeanor at common law, and punishable as such; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1010; 2 Russ. Cr. 479.

By statute punishment is inflicted in the United States courts for false personation of any person under the naturalization laws, and of any person holding a claim or debt against the government; R. S. §§ 5424, 5436. See, generally, 2 Johns. Cas. 293; 16 Viner, Abr. 336; Comyns, Dig. Action on the Case for a Deceit (A 3).

PERSUADE, PERSUADING. To persuade is to induce to act. Persuading is inducing others to act. Inst. 4. 6. 23; Dig. 11. 3. 1. 5.

In the act of the legislature which declared that "if any person or persons knowingly and willingly shall aid or assist any enemies at open war with this state, etc., by persuading others to enlist for that purpose, etc., he shall be adjudged guilty of high treason," the word persuading thus used means to succeed; and there must be an actual enlistment of the person persuaded in order to bring the defendant within the intention of the clause; 1 Dall. 39; 4 C. & P. 369; 9 id. 79. The attempt to persuade a servant to steal his master's goods, or other person to undertake a larceny or other crime, is an indictable misdemeanor, although the person approached declines the persuasion; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 767.

If one counsels another to suicide, and it is done in his presence, the adviser is as guilty as the principal. Accordingly, where two persons, agreeing to commit suicide together, employ means which take effect on one only, the survivor is a principal in the murder of the other; 8 C. & P. 418; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 652; Whart. Cr. L. § 448.

PERSUASION. The act of influencing by expostulation or request. While the persuasion is confined within those limits which leave the mind free, it may be used to induce another to make his will, or even to make it in his own favor. But if such persuasion should so far operate on the mind of the testator that he would be deprived of a perfectly free will, it would vitiate the instrument; 3 S. & R. 269; 5 id. 207; 13 id. 323.

PERTINENT. (from Lat. pertineo, belong to). That which tends to prove or disprove the allegations of the parties. Willes 319. Matters which have no such tendency are called impertinent; 8 Toullier, n. 22.

PERTINENTS. In Scotch Law. Appurtenances. Ersk. Inst. 2. 6. 6.

PERTURBATION. This is a technical word which signifies disturbance or infringement of a right. It is usually applied to the disturbance of pews or seats in a church. In the ecclesiastical courts, actions for these disturbances are technically called "suits for perturbation of seat." 1 Phill. Eccl. 323. See PEW.

PERU. A republic of South America. The executive is vested in a president and cabinet of ministers responsible to him. The Senate and House of Representatives are representative bodies. The constitution is modelled on that of the United States; it was adopted in 1856, and revised in 1860. It guarantees political but not religious freedom. The Roman Catholic is declared the religion of the State.

PERVERSE VERDICT. A verdict rendered by a jury which choose not to take the law from the judge, but will act on their own erroneous view of the law. In such cases, however honest the intentions of the jury may be, their verdict is perverse. A. & E. Encyc.; 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 532.

PERVISE, PARVISE. The palace yard at Westminster.

A place where counsel used to advise with their clients.

An afternoon exercise or moot for the instruction of students. Cowell; Blount.

PESAGE. In England, a toll charged for weighing avoirdupois goods other than wool. 2 Chitty, Com. Law 16.

PESQUIDOR. In Spanish Law. A coroner. White, New Recop. b. 1, tit. 1, § 3.

PETENS. A demandant; the plaintiff in a real action. Bract. fol. 102, 106 b.

PETER-PENCE. An ancient levy or tax of a penny on each house throughout England paid to the pope. It was called Peter-pence because collected on the day of St. Peter, ad vincula; by the Saxons it was called Rome-feoh, Rome-scot, and Rome-pennying, because collected and sent to Rome; and lastly, it was called hearth money, because every dwelling-house was liable to it, and every religious house, the abbey of St. Albans alone excepted.

It was not intended as a tribute to the pope, but chiefly for the support of the English school or college at Rome; the popes, however, shared it with the college, and at length found means to appropriate it to themselves.

PETIT (sometimes corrupted into petty). A French word signifying little, small. It is frequently used: as, petit larceny, petit jury, petit treason (q. v.).

PETIT ASSIZE. A jury to decide on questions of possession. Britton c. 42; Glanv. lib. 2, c. 6, 7. Used in contradistinction to the grand assize, which was a jury to decide on questions of property. See GRAND ASSIZE.

PETIT CAPE. See CAPE; GRAND CAPE.

PETIT JURY or PETTY JURY. The "little" jury, so called to distinguish it from the "grand" (or "large") jury. Brett, Comm. 1162, n.

PETTY LARCENY. See LARCENY.

PETIT SERJEANTY. See SERJEANTY.

PETIT TREASON. In English Law. The killing of a master by his servant, a husband by his wife, a superior by a secular or religious man. In the United States, this is like any other murder. See HIGH TREASON; TREASON.

PETITIO. A count or declaration. Glanv.

PETITION. An instrument of writing or printing, containing a prayer from the person presenting it, called the petitioner, to the body or person to whom it is presented, for the redress of some wrong or the grant of some favor which the latter has the right to give.

By the constitution of the United States, the right "to petition the government for a redress of grievances" is secured to the people. Amend. art. 1.

Petitions are frequently presented to the courts in order to bring some matters before them. It is a general rule in such cases that an affidavit should be made that the facts therein contained are true as far as known to the petitioner, and that those facts which he states as knowing from others he believes to be true. The sufficiency of a petition must be determined by its face, and can neither be aided nor destroyed by the accompanying exhibits, the exhibits being no part of it; 46 Mo. App. 236.

PETITION OF RIGHT. In English Law. A proceeding in chancery by which a subject may recover property in the possession of the king.

This is in the nature of an action against a subject, in which the petitioner sets out his right to that which is demanded by him, and prays the king to do him right and justice; and, upon a due and lawful trial of the right, to make him restitution. It is called a petition of right because the king is bound of right to answer it and let the matter therein contained be determined in a legal way, in like manner as causes between subject and subject. The petition is presented to the king, who subscribes it with these words, soit droit fait al partie, and thereupon it is delivered to the chancellor to be executed according to law. Co. 4th Inst. 419, 422 b; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 30, 31; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 22, 23.

The modern practice is regulated by statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 34, which provides that the petition shall be left with the home secretary for Her Majesty's consideration, who, if she shall think fit, may grant her fiat that right be done, whereupon the fiat having been served on the solicitor of the treasury, an answer, plea, or demurrer shall be made in behalf of the crown, and the subsequent pleadings be assimilated as far as practicable to the course of an ordinary action; Mozl. & W.

The stat. 3 Car. I. was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people. 1 Bla. Com. 128.

PETITORY. That which demands or petitions; that which has the quality of a prayer or petition; a right to demand.

A petitory suit or action is understood to be one in which the mere title to property is to be enforced by means of a demand, petition, or other legal proceeding, as distinguished from a suit where only the right of possession and not the mere right of property is in controversy. 1 Kent 371; 7 How. 846; 10 id. 257. Admiralty suits touching property in ships are either petitory, in which the mere title to the property is litigated, or possessory, to restore the possession to the party entitled thereto.

The American courts of admiralty exercise unquestioned jurisdiction in petitory as well as possessory actions; 23 Fed. Rep. 403, 406; 26 id. 708; 46 id. 204; but admiralty will not enforce a merely equitable title; 135 U. S. 599. In England the courts of law, some time after the restoration in 1660, claimed exclusive cognizance of mere questions of title, until the statute of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. By that statute the court of admiralty was authorized to decide all questions as to the title to or ownership of any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof remaining in the registry in any cause of possession, salvage, damage, wages, or bottomry, instituted in such court after the passing of that act; Ware 232; 18 How. 267; 2 Curt. C. C. 426.

In Scotch Law. Actions in which damages are sought.

This class embraces such actions as assumpsit, debt, covenant, and detinue, at common law. See Patterson, Comp. 1058, n.

PETROLEUM. See OIL.

PETTY AVERAGE (called, also, customary average). Several petty charges which are borne partly by the ship and partly by the cargo, such as the expense of tonnage, beaconage, etc. Abb. Sh. 13th ed. 658; 2 Pars. Mar. Law 312; 1 Bell, Com. 567; 2 Magens 277. See AVERAGE.

PETTY BAG OFFICE. In English Law. An office in the court of chancery, appropriated for suits against attorneys and officers of the court, and for process and proceedings by extent on statutes, recognizances ad quod damnum, and the like. Termes de la Ley.

PETTY CONSTABLE. The ordinary constable, as distinguished from the high constable of the hundred. 1 Bla. Com. 355; Bac. Law Tr. 181, Office of Constable; Willc. Cons. c. 1, § 1. See CONSTABLE.

PETTY SESSIONS. See SESSION.

PETTIFOGGER. One who pretends to be a lawyer, but possesses neither knowledge of the law nor conscience.

An unprincipled practitioner of law, whose business is confined to petty cases.

PEW. A seat in a church, separate from all others, with a convenient place to stand therein.

It is an incorporeal interest in the real property. The pewholder does not own the soil; 32 Barb. 234. And although a man has the exclusive right to it, yet it seems he cannot maintain trespass against a person entering it; 1 Term 430; but case is the proper remedy; 3 B. & Ald. 361; 8 B. & C. 294. See 47 Vt. 262. In 3 Paige, Ch. 296, it was held that the owner of a pew can, if disturbed in its use, maintain trespass, case, or ejectment, according to the circumstances.

The right to pews is limited and usufructuary, and does not interfere with the right of the parish or congregation to pull down and rebuild the church; 4 Ohio 541; Mitch. R. E. & Conv. 60; 5 Cow. 496; 109 Mass. 21; 6 S. & R. 508; 9 Wheat. 445; 9 Cra. 52; 6 Johns. 41; 6 Term 396; 3 How. 74; indemnifying those whose pews are destroyed; 17 Mass. 435. See 2 Bla. Com. 429; 1 Pow. Mortg. 17; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1; 9 Am. Dec. 161; 24 id. 230. The pewholder's right is only to occupy his pew during public worship; 47 Vt. 262.

His right is subject to the paramount rights of the parish; 59 Me. 250; but it is held that a rule of the Roman Catholic Church forbidding a layman to control his pew will not be regarded by the courts, unless it was part of the contract; 33 Vt. 602 (criticised in 15 Am. L. Reg. 280).

When pews are removed from a church merely as a matter of expediency, the owners are entitled to payment; 160 Mass. 118. See PERTURBATION.

A pew may be used only for divine service and for meetings of the congregation held for temporal purposes. The pew-owner must preserve order, while enjoying his pew; 34 N. Y. 149. The owner of a pew does not own the soil under it, nor the space above it; 17 Mass. 435.

Where not otherwise provided by statute the interest is considered as real estate, subject to the incidents of that kind of property; 1 Washb. R. P. 9; 33 Vt. 602; 34 Barb. 104 (see also 2 Edw. Ch. 608); 14 Conn. 279; 23 La. Ann. 9; 21 N. J. L. 325. In Massachusetts and New Hampshire pews are personal property by statute. In Pennsylvania they are held personal property as to devolution, although, strictly speaking, an interest in real estate; 24 Pa. 251. See, generally, 45 N. J. L. 320; 27 Wkly. L. Bul. 25; Best, Pres. 111; Crabb, R. P. § 481; Baum, Church Law.

PHARMACY. See DRUGGIST.

PHAROS. A watch-tower, at sea mark, which cannot be erected without lawful warrant and authority. 3 Inst. 204.

PHOTOGRAPH. The mechanical process of photography is judicially recognized as a means of producing true likenesses which are admissible in evidence in the trial of civil and criminal cases. The difference between the images produced upon a photographic plate and upon the human eye does not render a photograph inadmissible in evidence, but bears only upon the effect of such evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. 92; 2 Rice, Ev. 1169; Tayl. Ev. 1613; 75 Fed. Rep. 373; 52 Mich. 214. A photograph of the subject-matter in controversy is admissible in evidence, when proved to have been fairly taken; 83 N. Y. 464; 31 Wis. 512; 162 Mass. 90; 69 Ga. 42; 47 Am. Rep. 748; 90 Ala. 25; 41 U. S. App. 498; 76 Pa. 340; 81 Cal. 408; 67 Ia. 146; 50 N. H. 159. While the reported cases do not always show that the photograph offered in evidence was first authenticated, yet there is no case which holds that such proof is unnecessary. The following cases show that such proof was assumed to be necessary or was given; 57 Conn. 9; 30 Fla. 256; 52 Ia. 210; 160 Mass. 288; 95 Mich. 586; 54 Minn. 379; 134 Mo. 85; 57 Am. Rep. 766; 125 N. Y. 136; 46 S. C. 55; 77 Tex. 438; 91 Ala. 112; 128 Ind. 97; 31 Wis. 512. It has been said that photographs are merely secondary evidence; 107 Ill. 113; 2 Woods 680; and where the jury has viewed the premises in question a photograph of them is generally inadmissible; 7 D. R. Pa. 321; 118 Mass. 420; 31

Wis. 512; but where the photographs themselves are the subject of the controversy, or the original subject of the photograph cannot for any reason be produced, it is otherwise; 39 Ala. 193; 49 Ill. App. 398; 5 Wash. 479; 52 Mich. 214; 26 Am. Rep. 319; 2 Woods 680; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 240; 36 Neb. 361; 31 Wis. 512; 46 Hun 32; 81 Cal. 408; 6 L. R. A. 594; 6 Blatch. 137. The discretion of the court in the admission of photographs does not differ from the exercise of that power with reference to other kinds of evidence; 30 Fla. 256; 162 Mass. 414; 26 L. R. A. 430; 106 N. Y. 598; 37 Am. Rep. 538.

Photographs are admissible to show the physical condition, characteristics, and identity of persons and property, in civil and criminal cases; 65 Mich. 306; 88 Tex. 642; 139 N. Y. 73; 38 Am. It is doubtful if they ought to be admitted to show the health, strength, or agility of a person; 160 Mass. 403.

Upon a criminal trial, photographic likenesses taken after death, of persons whom it is material to identify, may be exhibited to witnesses acquainted with such persons in life as aids in the identification; 45 N. Y. 215. Where a mutilated body was found, the witness was allowed to testify that the face resembled a photograph of a person alleged to be the one found, though he had not known the man before death; 76 Pa. 340. The healthy condition of the deceased may be proved by a colored photograph taken a short time before death; 1 W. N. C. Pa. 369; and in an indictment for bigamy a photograph of the first husband may be shown to a witness to the first marriage to prove his identity with the person mentioned in the marriage certificate; 4 F. & F. 103.

See an extended note on the use of photographs as evidence, where the cases are collected and classified; 35 L. R. A. 802.

A photograph made by the cathode or X-ray process will be admitted as secondary evidence; its competency depends upon the science, skill, experience, and intelligence of the person who took the picture and testified with regard to it. Lacking these important qualifications, it should not be admitted, and it is to be weighed like other competent evidence. In an action for personal injuries it was held competent to submit to the jury an X-ray photograph taken by a surgeon, showing the overlapping bones of one of the plaintiff's legs, where it was broken at the time of the accident, and where the surgeon was familiar with the process by which the impression was secured, as well as with fractures, and the surgeon testified that the photograph accurately represented the condition of the leg at the point of the fracture, and that by the aid of the X-rays he was enabled to see the fracture and overlapping bones as if they were uncovered to the sight; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tenn). 445. So in an action for negligence by which the plaintiff's foot was injured, an X-ray photograph was admitted to prove the condition of the injured foot; Hawkins, J., in 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 62.

In a criminal case in New York the prosecution claimed that a bullet struck the victim in the jaw, and split, one piece being deflected into the jaw and the other piece into the back of his head. The defence claimed that the piece lodged in the back of the victim's head was not a fragment but a bullet. To prove this, the defence introduced an X-ray photograph of the head and neck showing the lodgment of the bullet, and the testimony of the physician who took the photograph; 56 Alb. L. J. 309; 15 Med. Leg. J. 246. This question was also recently presented to the District Court of Colorado, wherein Lefevre, J., said:

"During the last decade, at least, no science has made such mighty strides forward as surgery. It is eminently a scientific profession, alike interesting to the learned and the unlearned. It makes use of all science and learning. It has been of inestimable value to mankind. It must not be said of the law that it is wedded to precedent; that it will not lend a helping hand. Rather let the courts throw open the door to all well considered scientific discoveries. Modern science has made it possible to look beneath the tissues of the human body and has aided surgery in telling of the hidden mysteries. We believe it to be our duty in this case to be the first, if you please, to so consider it, in admitting in evidence a process known and acknowledged as a determinate science." 29 Chi. Leg. News 145.

It is a breach of contract and violation of confidence for a photographer to make unauthorized copies of his customer's photograph. A private individual may enjoin the publication of his photograph, but a public character may not, in the absence of a breach of contract or violation of confidence in procuring the likeness from which the publication is made. A statesman, author, artist, or inventor who seeks public recognition, may be said to have surrendered this right to the public; 64 Fed. Rep. 280; 40 Ch. D. 345. See PRIVACY; INJUNCTION.

One who reproduces a copyrighted photograph cannot escape liability as an infringer by merely showing that the copy which he reproduced did not bear the notice of copyright when he purchased it, but he must also show that it bore no notice when it left the custody of the owner of the copyright; 54 Fed. Rep. 890; s. c. 4 C. C. A. 548. Violation of the right in a copyrighted photograph is subject by statute to a penalty. See 77 Fed. Rep. 966.

See COPYRIGHT.

PHOTOGRAPHER. An artist who takes impressions or likenesses of things and persons on prepared plates or surfaces. 11 Lea 517.

PHRENASTHENIA. A morbid condition, also known as the insanity of the degenerates, used to indicate the general mental infirmity of degenerates, or individuals with vices of organization who are insane, but whose insanity presents special characteristics growing out of mental infirmity. It is usually hereditary and congenital. The insanity is a secondary phenomenon, vice of organization being the primary one; 2 Clevenger, Med. Jur. 856.

PHYSICAL EXAMINATION. The question as to whether, and under what circumstances, courts will permit the physical examination of litigants and of persons accused of crime, and also of property in litigation, has been much mooted. A physical examination of a woman under the writ of de ventre inspiciendo was known to the common law under special circumstances. See JURY OF WOMEN. This early practice has been urged as a precedent for permitting a physical examination in certain civil and criminal cases.

In Union Pacific R. Co. v. Bottsford, 141 U. S. 250, the question was the right of a court of the United States to order a surgical examination of the plaintiff, in an action of tort. Mr. Justice Gray referred to the common-law writ of de ventre inspiciendo in capital cases, and also in civil cases involving the rightful succession to property of a decedent against fraudulent claims of bastards, and said that the learning and research of counsel for the plaintiff in error (John F. Dillon) had "failed to produce an instance of its even having been considered in any part of the United States as suited to the habits and conditions of the people." He added that "so far as the books within our reach show, no order to inspect the body in a personal action appears to have been made or even moved for, in any of the English courts of common law, at any period of their history." The ruling of the court below, refusing such an examination, was sustained. See, also, 129 Ind. 401; 129 N. Y. 50; 80 Fed. Rep. 278; 25 C. C. A. 413; 102 Ill. 272.

It appears however that such an order was moved for and made by a judge at chambers, not purporting to be by consent, though in fact unopposed, and of which Cockburn, C. J., said, "the order for such examination was clearly ultra vires;" 46 L. J. 696.

"The right to one's person may be said to be a right of complete immunity,—to be let alone." Cooley, Torts 29.

But while it has been held that the defendant has no absolute right to have a personal physical examination of the plaintiff made, in an action for personal injuries, yet in the discretion of the court such examination may be made, if essential for the ascertainment of truth or to subserve the ends of justice; 3 Am. St. Rep. 549; 95 Mo. 169; 49 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 434; 13 Med. Leg. J. 23; 72 Tex. 95; 90 Ala. 71; 2 Dist. R. (Pa.) 825; 34 L. R. A. 207; 96 Mich. 625; 39 W. Va. 86; 82 Ga. 719; 61 Wis. 536; 46 Ark. 275; 29 Kan. 466.

In 1865, in New York, it was said that in an action for personal injuries the defendant could examine the actual physical condition of the plaintiff before trial, and if the plaintiff refused, the defendant might prove the refusal at the trial; 64 Barb. 299. In 1868, in an action in the same state against a physician for personal injuries resulting from malpractice, it was said that no case involving the right to a physical examination was to be found on the books; but the court permitted the examination, citing as authority proceedings in divorce for impotency, mayhem, and the writ de ventre inspiciendo; 52 How. Pr. 334. The supreme court of that state, in an action against a carrier for injury to a passenger, overruled this view of the law, holding that in such divorce cases a physical examination was necessary to arrive at the truth, and that the other proceedings were obsolete; 29 Hun 154; 129 N. Y. 50. In a note by the reporter in 52 How. Pr. 334, it is said that there were few cases decisive of the right of physical examination, and he cites: Andrew's Trials 41; 45 How. 216; 1 Brews. (Pa.) 561; 71 N. C. 85; 5 Jones (N. C.) 259.

A plaintiff, in an action for personal injuries alleged to have caused the secretion of albumen and sugar, may be required to produce in court, for analysis, specimens of his urine, accompanied by an affidavit that it was voided by him; the privacy of his person not being thereby invaded; 46 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 678; 36 L. R. A. 681.

It is within the discretion of the court to refuse to require the plaintiff to submit to a physical examination which necessitates the administration of anæsthetics; 65 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 616.

In some courts plaintiffs are allowed to exhibit to the jury their injuries, and to perform physical acts showing the nature and extent of their injuries; 47 Ia. 375; 33 Minn. 130; but other courts hold this to be improper, because such evidence cannot be preserved in a bill of exceptions for use in an appellate court; 19 Cent. L. J. 144.

In a trial of an action of trespass for assault and battery, it is not error to permit the jury to examine with their fingers scars on the plaintiff's head caused by a blow from defendant's pistol; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 528.

A court of equity will not, in a patent case, even if it had the power, require the respondent, claiming under an alleged anticipating patent, to perform experiments in the presence of plaintiff's witnesses, except where so extraordinary a course is necessary; 83 Fed. Rep. 490.

In an action for breach of warranty on a sale of a horse, the court has no power to order that the defendant have the privilege of sending a veterinary surgeon into the plaintiff's stable to examine the horse; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 998; 95 Mich. 266.

In a suit for divorce on the ground of impotence a court has power to compel the parties to submit to a surgical examination when facts essential to a correct decision may thereby be ascertained; 5 Paige 554; 89 Ala. 291; 32 L. J. Mat. 12; in divorce proceeding because of malformation of the wife the court made an order for her inspection, but did not require the husband to submit to inspection; 16 Week. Rep. 943.

The measurement in the presence of the jury of a woman's foot and her leg six inches above the ankle, in a suit for injuries to the foot and ankle, must be permitted by the court when there is a direct conflict as to such measurement by the medical men called by the respective parties,—at least if the witness herself does not object; 99 Ia. 698; s. c. 34 L. R. A. 208.

The better practice seems to be to apply to the party to be examined, before trial, for permission to make the examination, and upon his refusal, to present a motion for leave, by affidavit, showing the refusal, and also the probability that the examination will result in some material disclosure. The party applying for the order for examination should also offer to pay the expense of such examination; 82 Ga. 719. In practice, some courts order a private physical examination of a party to be made by a physician, who may then testify in regard thereto at the trial of the cause.

A physical examination, if made, must be made by physicians agreed upon by the parties or selected by the court, care being taken to prevent danger to life, pains of body, or any indignity to the person; 47 Ia. 375; 33 Minn. 137; 37 Ohio St. 104.

Where an order for physical examination is made, the court will enforce it by refusing to try the cause until it is complied with; 7 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 565; by dismissing the action, or refusing to allow the plaintiff to give evidence to establish his injury; 37 Ohio St. 104; or by striking out and withdrawing from the consideration of the jury the allegations relative to his inquiry, or punishing him for contempt; 47 Ia. 375; 33 Minn. 130. A refusal to submit to a physical examination, if the court permit him to prosecute his claim will be very strong evidence against the person refusing; 85 Mo. App. 97; and may be considered by the jury as reflecting on his good faith; 141 U. S. 250.

Upon an appeal of mayhem where the issue joined is whether it is mayhem or no mayhem, it will be decided by the court upon inspection with the assistance of surgeons, if desired; 3 Bla. Com. 332.

The Stat. 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, § 26, expressly authorizes any judge of a court in which an action is pending to recover compensation for a railway accident or any person having power to fix such compensation, to order an examination of the person injured by a duly qualified medical practitioner named in the order, and not being a witness on either side, the costs to be at the discretion of the judge or court making the order. When an examination has been procured by a railway company under this statute the report is privileged and the plaintiff is not entitled to an order for its production; 43 L. J. Rep. Exch. 150.

The act of 1894 in New York provides that, in all actions for personal injuries, the court may, before trial, order the plaintiff to submit to a physical examination "by one or more physicians or surgeons" under such restrictions as the order may impose; the order must require the person to appeal before the judge or a referee, for the purpose of taking the examination, at a time and place named therein. A woman is entitled to have the examination made by "surgeons of her own sex."

In criminal proceedings there is no power to undress and medically examine the person of a prisoner, without his consent, although such examination might further the ends of justice; 13 Cox, C. C. 625. It is error for a court to require a person on trial for murder to exhibit his leg at the place where it was amputated, although a certain material fact may be established thereby; 3 Cr. Law Mag. (Ga.) 398; 71 N. C. 85. Where a prisoner refused to make a print of his foot in a pan of soft earth in order that the witnesses for the prosecution might testify as to similarity of such tracks with those found at the scene of the crime, the court said it was optional with the accused, who refused, and upon conviction a new trial was granted; 5 Baxt. 619; contra, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 245. A woman indicted for the murder of her illegitimate child refused to allow physicians selected by the coroner to examine whether she had recently been delivered of a child, and upon being threatened, yielded. The court ruled out the testimony of the physicians, saying that such proceedings violated the spirit of the constitution which declares that no person shall, in any criminal case, be compelled to be a witness against himself; 45 How. Pr. 216.

On the other hand, it has been held not to be error to compel the defendant to exhibit tattoo marks on his body, to the existence of which a witness had testified; 14 Nev. 79; 33 Am. Rep. (S. C.) 530; or to compel the accused to make his footprints in an ash heap, and to allow the prosecution to show that they corresponded with those found at the scene of the crime; 7 Tex. Civ. App. 245; or for an officer to compel the accused to put his foot in print found at the place where the crime was committed and at the trial testify to the result of the comparison; 74 N. C. 646; 67 Ga. 76; 26 N. E. (Ind.) 138.

See JURY OF WOMEN; PRIVACY; VIEW.

PHYSICAL FACT. A fact, the existence of which is perceptible by the senses.

"A fact considered to have its seat in some inanimate being, or, by virtue, not of the qualities by which it is constituted animate, but of those which it has in common with the class of inanimate beings." 1 Benth. Jud. Ev. 45.

PHYSICIAN. A person, who has received the degree of doctor of medicine from an incorporated institution.

One lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine.

As used in a policy of life insurance, the term "family physician" has been held to mean the physician who usually attends, and is consulted by, the members of a family, in the capacity of a physician, whether or not he usually attended on or was consulted by the insured himself; 17 Minn. 497; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 166. See 58 Mo. 421.

Although the physician is civilly and criminally responsible for his conduct while discharging the duties of his profession, he is in no sense a warrantor or insurer of a favorable result, without an express contract to that effect; Elwell, Malp. 20; 7 C. & P. 81.

Every person who offers his services to the public generally, impliedly contracts with the employer that he is in possession of the necessary ordinary skill and experience which are possessed by those who practise or profess to understand the art or science, and which are generally regarded by those most conversant with the profession as necessary to qualify one to engage in such business successfully. This ordinary skill may differ according to locality and the means of information; Elw. Malp. 22, 201; Story, Bailm. 433; 3 C. & P. 629; 34 Ia. 286; s. c. 11 Am. Rep. 141, n.; 82 Ill. 379; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 328; 70 Md. 162; 36 Neb. 794; 27 Abb. N. C. 45; 108 N. C. 187. If the treatment of the patient has been honest and intelligent only ordinary care and skill is required of defendant and errors of judgment will be overlooked; 60 Barb. 485; 75 N. Y. 21. Experimenting with a patient outside of the rules of practice renders the practitioner liable in damages; 4 Ill. 209. Any one who treats patients as a clairvoyant must be held to the same degree of care as a regular practitioner; 59 Me. 181; 72 Wis. 391.

The physician's responsibility is the same when he is negligent as when he lacks ordinary skill, although the measure of indemnity and punishment may be different; Elw. Malp. 27; 3 Maule & S. 14, 15; 5 id. 198; 1 Lew. C. C. 169; Broom, Leg. Max. 168, 169; 4 Denio 464; 19 Wend. 345; 62 How. 621. See 69 Hun 826; 84 Me. 497. Where a physician is charged with manslaughter, resulting from a surgical operation performed by him, it is error to charge that if deceased consented to the performance of the operation, defendant must be acquitted; 8 Wash. 12.

One who holds himself out as a healer of diseases, and accepts employment as such, must be held to the duty of reasonable skill in the exercise of his vocation; failing in this he must be held liable for any damages proximately caused by unskilful treatment of his patient; 72 Wis. 591. Gross negligence may constitute criminal liability; 138 Mass. 165; 38 Ark. 605; and an unlicensed practitioner may be guilty of manslaughter; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 79. See 4 F. & F. 519; 29 Ohio St. 577.

Bad or unskilful practice in a physician or other professional person, whereby the health of the patient is injured, is usually called Malpractice (Mala praxis).

Wilful malpractice takes place when the physician purposely administers medicines or performs an operation which he knows and expects will result in damage or death to the individual under his care; as in the case of criminal abortion; Elw. Malp. 243; 2 Barb. 216.

Negligent malpractice comprehends those cases where there is no criminal or dishonest object, but gross negligence of that attention which the situation of the patient requires; as if a physician should administer medicines while in a state of intoxication, from which injury would arise to his patient.

Ignorant malpractice is the administration of medicines calculated to do injury, which do harm, which a well-educated and scientific medical man would know were not proper in the case; Elw. Malpr. 198; 7 B. & C. 493; 6 Mass. 134; 5 C. & P. 333; 1 Mood. & R. 405; 5 Cox, C. C. 587; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. 755.

This offence is a misdemeanor (whether it be occasioned by curiosity and experiment or neglect), because it breaks the trust which the patient has put in the physician, and tends directly to his destruction. See 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 863; 4 Wentw. Pl. 360; 2 Russ. Cr. 277; 6 Mass. 134; 138

id. 165; 38 Ark. 605; 10 Cox, C. C. 525; 8 Mo. 561; 3 C. & P. 629; 4 id. 423.

Besides the public remedy for malpractice, in many cases the party injured may bring a civil action; 9 Conn. 209; 3 Watts 355; 7 N. Y. 397; 39 Vt. 447.

Civil cases of malpractice are of very frequent occurrence on those occasions where surgical operations are rendered necessary, or supposed to be so, by disease or injury, and are so performed as either to shorten a limb or render it stiff, or otherwise prevent the free, natural use of it, by which the party ever after suffers damage. This may embrace almost every kind of surgical operation; but nine-tenths of all such cases arise from amputations, fractures, or dislocations; Elw. Malpr. 55.

To the performance of all surgical operations the surgeon is bound to bring at least ordinary skill and knowledge. He must apply without mistake what is settled in his profession. He must possess and practically exercise that degree and amount of knowledge and science which the leading authorities have pronounced as the result of their researches and experience up to the time, or within a reasonable time, before the issue or question to be determined is made; Elwell, Malpract. 55; 6 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 774; 36 Neb. 764.

A physician in the treatment of a patient is bound only to use the reasonable degree of skill and care which is ordinarily possessed and exercised; 27 Abb. N. C. 45; the law imposes on a surgeon the duty of being reasonably skilled in his profession, and the exercise of care and prudence in the application of that skill, and if he be wanting in either, to the injury of his patient, he is liable for damages; 62 Hun 621; although there may be no contractual relation between the patient and the physician; 130 N. Y. 35. If one physician, being unable to attend, sends another in his stead, the former is not liable to one who is injured by the unskilfulness of the latter, since the latter, being engaged in a distinct and independent occupation of his own, is not the servant or agent of the former; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 388. See, also, 8 East 347; 2 Wils. 259; 1 H. Bla. 61; Wright, Ohio 466; 22 Pa. 261; 27 N. H. 460; 13 B. Monr. 219; 27 Abb. N. C. 45; 62 Hun 621.

In the Roman civil law and at common law until 1422 the practice of medicine and surgery was free to all. A statute in that year confined it to those who had studied the subject in a university and who were bachelors of science. In the United States statutes regulating the right to practice are constitutional; 129 U. S. 114; 10 N. W. Rep. 323; 11 Colo. 109; 52 Hun 65.

In England, at common law, a physician could not maintain an action for his fees for anything done as physician either while attending to or prescribing for a patient; but a distinction was taken when he acted as a surgeon or in any other capacity than that of physician, and in such cases an action for fees would be sustained; 1 C. & M. 227, 370; 3 Q. B. 928. But now by the act of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, a physician who is registered under the act may bring an action for his fees, if not precluded by any by-law of the college of physicians; 2 H. & C. 92. It has not been denied in this country; 26 Wend. 451.

In this country, the various states have statutory enactments regulating the collection of fees and the practice of medicine; they will be found in Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur.; an unlicensed physician can not maintain an action for medical attendance and medicines; 4 Den. 60; 91 Tenn. 16; 21 Ala. N. S. 680; contra, 1 Metc. 154.
