In a suit for medical sevices the plaintiff is presumed to have been licensed; 24 Wend. 15. See, also, 24 Ill. App. 42. Sec. 153 of ch. 661 of the laws of New York (1895), as amended by ch. 398, laws of 1895, providing that no person shall practice medicine who has ever been convicted of felony, applies to persons who had been convicted of felony before the passage of the act. As to such persons the statute if not ex post facto; 55 Alb. L. J. 218. Such an act does not conflict with the federal constitution; 170 U. S. 189.

The business of massage does not violate a statute forbidding the practice of medicine without a license; 24 Hun 32; but prescribing patent medicine does; 15 Wend. 395; 4 Ohio 295. The law does not recognize any difference between schools of medicine; 4 E. D. Sm. 1. See 42 N. Y. 161. Contracts for contingent compensation are valid; 71 N. Y. 443; 19 Vt. 54. Where a physician called in a stranger, an unmarried man in a confinement case, it was held that this was a breach of duty, for which both were liable to the patient; 46 Mich. 160.

Where the wife of the defendant, being afflicted with a dangerous disease, was carried by him to a distance from his residence and left under the care of the plaintiff as a surgeon, and after the lapse of some weeks the plaintiff performed an operation, soon after which she died, it was held, in an action by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover compensation for his services, that the performance of the operation was within the scope of the plaintiff's authority, if, in his judgment, it was necessary or expedient, and that it was not incumbent on him to prove that it was necessary or proper under the circumstances, or that before he performed it he gave notice to the defendant, or that it would have been dangerous to the wife to wait until notice could be given to the defendant; 19 Pick. 333.

If physicians attending a woman deem it necessary for the preservation and prolongation of her life, to perform an operation they are justified in doing so if she consents, whether her husband consents or not; 70 Md. 162.

Where one who has received personal injury through the negligence of another uses reasonable and ordinary care in the selection of a physician, the damages awarded him will not be reduced because more skilful medical aid was not secured; 32 Ia. 324; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 200. In assumpsit by a physician for his services, the defendant cannot prove the professional reputation of the plaintiff; 3 Hawks 105. Physicians can recover for the services of their students in attendance upon their patients; 4 Wend. 200. Partners in the practice of medicine are within the law merchant, which includes the jus accrescendi between traders; 9 Cow. 631. An agreement between physicians whereby, for a money consideration, one promises to use his influence with his patrons to obtain their patronage for the other, is lawful and not contrary to public policy; 39 Conn. 326; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 390. If a physician carries contagious disease into a family, on a suit for services this may be shown to reduce his claim; 12 B. Monr. 465. A physician who has been guilty of negligence in the treatment of his patient, resulting in damages to the latter, does not necessarily lose his right to recover any compensation whatever for his services; but the amount of his recovery, if any, depends in the amount of damages suffered because of negligence; 66 N. W. Rep. 898.

A law providing that no person shall be licensed to practise medicine except after examinations by the state board, is not in conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the United States constitution; 4 Wash. St. 424; nor is a statute making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment to practise medicine without a certificate from the state board of health that the practitioner is a graduate of a reputable medical college, unconstitutional, as depriving him of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; 129 U. S. 114. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; EXPERT; OPINION; EVIDENCE.

PIA FRAUS. A pious fraud; a fraud considered morally justifiable on account of the ends sought to be promoted.

PIACLE. An enormous crime. Obsolete.

PICAROON. A robber; a plunderer.

PICKERY. In Scotch Law. Stealing of trifles, punishable arbitrarily. Bell, Dict.; Tait, Inst. Theft.

PICKETING. Picketing by members of a trade union or strikers, consists in posting members at all the approaches to the works struck against for the purpose of reporting the workman going to or coming from the works; and to use such influence as may be in their power to prevent the workman from accepting work there. Dav. Friend. Soc. 212. See LABOR UNION; STRIKE; BOYCOTT.

PICKPOCKET. A thief; one who in a crowd or in other places steals from the pockets or person of another without putting him in fear. This is generally punished as simple larceny.

PIE-POUDRE, PIE POWDER. See COURT OF PIE POWDER.

PIER. A wharf. A structure erected for ferry purposes which was simply a ferry rack and bridge was held not a pier. 5 Robt. N. Y. 285. See DOCK; HARBOR; PORT.

PIERAGE. The duty for maintaining piers and harbor.

PIGNORATIO (Lat. from pignorare, to pledge). In Civil Law. The obligation of a pledge. L. 9 D. de pignor. Sealing up (obsignatio). A shutting up of an animal caught in one's field and keeping it till the expenses and damage have been paid by its master. New Decis. 1. 34. 13.

PIGNORATIVE CONTRACT. In Civil Law. A contract by which the owner of an estate engages it to another for a sum of money and grants to him and his successors the right to enjoy it until he shall be reimbursed, voluntarily, that sum of money. Pothier, Obl.

PIGNORIS CAPTIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. The name given to one of the legis actiones of the Roman law. It consisted chiefly in the taking of a pledge, and was, in fact, a mode of execution. It was confined to special cases determined by positive law or by custom, such as taxes duties, rents, etc., and is comparable in some respects to distresses at common law. The proceeding took place in the presence of a prætor.

PIGNUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Pledge, or pawn. The contract of pledge. The right in the thing pledged.

"It is derived," says Gaius, "from pugnum, the fist, because what is delivered in pledge is delivered in hand." Dig. 50. 16. 238. 2. This is one of several instances of the failure of the Roman jurists when they attempted etymological explanations of words. The elements of pignus (pig) are contained in the word pan(g)-o and its cognate forms. See Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq.

Though pledge is distinguished from mortgage (hypotheca), as being something delivered in hand, while mortgage is good without possession, yet a pledge (pignus) may also be good without possession. Domat, Civ. Law b. iii. tit. 1, § 5: Calvinus, Lex. Pignus is properly applied to movables, hypotheca to immovables; but the distinction is not always preserved. Id.

PILA. That side of money which was called pile, because it was the side on which there was an impression of a church built on piles. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 39.

PILFER. To steal. To charge another with pilfering is to charge him with stealing and is slander; 4 Blackf. 499.

PILFERER. One who steals petty things.

PILLAGE. The taking by violence of private property by a victorious army from the citizens or subjects of the enemy. This in modern times is seldom allowed, and then only when authorized by the commanding or chief officer at the place where the pillage is committed. The property thus violently taken belongs, in general, to the common soldiers. It is expressly forbidden under the rules of the Brussel's Conference, 1874, which however have never been adopted by the European nations. See Dalloz, Dict. Propriété, art. 3, § 5; Wolff § 1201; BOOTY; PRIZE; WAR.

PILLORY. A wooden machine, in which the neck of the culprit is inserted. This punishment has in most of the states been superseded by the adoption of the penitentiary system. See 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 797. The punishment of standing in the pillory, so far as the same was provided by the laws of the United States, was abolished by the act of congress of February 27, 1839, s. 5. See Barrington, Stat. 48.

PILOT. An officer serving on board of a ship during the course of a voyage, and having charge of the helm and of the ship's route. An officer authorized by law who is taken on board at a particular place for the purpose of conducting a ship through a river, road, or channel, or from or into port.

Pilots of the second description are established by legislative enactments at the principal seaports in this country, and have rights, and are bound to perform duties, agreeably to the provisions of the several laws establishing them.

Pilots have been established in all maritime countries. After due trial and experience of their qualifications, they are licensed to offer themselves as guides in difficult navigation; and they are usually, on the other hand, bound to obey the call of a ship-master to exercise their functions; Abb. Sh. 13th ed. 190; 1 Johns. 305; 4 Dall. 205; 5 B. & P. 82; 5 Rob. Adm. 308; 6 id. 316; Laws of Oleron, art. 23; Molloy, b. 2, c. 9, ss. 3, 7; Wesk. Ins. 395; Act of Congr. of August 7, 1789, s. 4; Pardessus, n. 637.

The master of a vessel may decline the services of a pilot, but in that event he must pay the legal fees; 1 Cliff. 492. A pilot who first offers his services, if rejected, is entitled to his fee; 2 Am. Law Rev. 458; Desty. Shipp. § 349; 102 U. S. 592.

The pilot is to conduct the navigation, regulate the course of the ship and the management of the sails; 7 Moore, P. C. 171, 184. He is not liable for damages to the vessel unless caused by his failure to use ordinary diligence, i. e., the degree of skill commonly possessed by others in the same employment; 57 Fed. Rep. 227. A river pilot is bound to be familiar with the channel of the river, and with the various obstructions to navigation, and is liable for damages occasioned by the want of such knowledge, but not for damages occasioned by an error of judgment on his part; 48 Fed. Rep. 690. Shipowners are responsible to third parties for obedience to the pilot; his orders ordinarily, are to be implicitly obeyed; but the shipowner is not responsible for the acts of the pilot where pilotage is compulsory; 7 Moore, P. C. 171; 7 P. Div. 134; 63 Fed. Rep. 845; 73 L. T. 49; 2 W. Rob. 10; in such case the ship has been held liable; 7 Wall. 53. But the owner remains liable for the ship's management in all things that do not relate to mere navigation; 158 U. S. 186. The compulsory pilotage law applies within the three mile limit; 70 Fed. Rep. 331. See TERRITORIAL WATERS. Where a steamer in need of a pilot disregarded the speaking pilot and it appeared that the speaking pilot was within the three mile limit, the pilot was held entitled to recover his fee; 28 U. S. App. 593. See SEAWORTHINESS; PERILS OF THE SEA.

By acts of Aug. 7, 1789, March 2, 1837, each state has authority over pilotage on its navigable waters, though not exclusive; 9 Fed. Rep. 164. A Delaware pilot may recover for services upon the Delaware River and to Philadelphia, although a Pennsylvania act prohibits any one acting as such without a Pennsylvania license; 12 Fed. Rep. 846. The state of Delaware cannot exclude pilots of other states, on the Delaware River; 14 Fed. Rep. 972. A state law may permit or direct a pilot to tender his services beyond the three mile limit.

The usual signal by which a pilot tenders his services is the Union Jack set at the main truck, by day, and "flare-ups" by night; 19 Fed. Rep. 207.

PILOTAGE. The compensation given to a pilot for conducting a vessel in or out of port. Pothier, Des Avaries, n. 147.

Pilotage is a lien on the ship, when the contract has been made by the master or quasi-master of the ship or some other person lawfully authorized to make it; 1 Mas. 508; see 32 Fed. Rep. 486; 24 id. 397; and the admiralty court has jurisdiction when services have been performed at sea; 10 Wheat. 428; 6 Pet. 682; Bened. Adm. § 289; 10 Fed. Rep. 185. And see 1 Pet. Adm. Dec. 227; 42 Fed. Rep. 793. The statutes of the several states regulating the subject of pilotage are, in view of the numerous acts of congress recognizing and adopting them, to be regarded as constitutionally made, until congress by its own acts supersedes them; 12 How. 312; 13 Wall. 236.

PIMP. One who provides for others the means of gratifying lust; a procurer; a panderer. The word pimp is not a technical one, nor has it acquired any peculiar or appropriate meaning in the law; and is therefore to be construed and understood according to the common and approved usage of the language; 75 Mich. 127, where the court disapproved the action of the judge at nisi prius who defined the term to mean a man who has intercourse with a loose woman, who usually is taking care of him,—supporting him.

The Indiana statutes provide: "Whoever, being a male person, frequents houses of ill-fame or of assignation, or associates with females known or reputed as prostitutes, or frequents gambling-houses with prostitutes, or is engaged in or about a house of prostitution, is a pimp." R. S. (1881) § 2002. See 102 Ind. 156, which was an indictment for being a pimp under that statute.

PIMP-TENURE. A very singular and odious kind of tenure mentioned by old writers, "Wilhelmus Hoppeshort tenet dimidiam virgatam terræ, per servitium custodiendi sex damisellas, scil. meretrices, ad usum domini regis." 12 Edw. 1.

PIN-MONEY. Money allowed by a man to his wife to spend for her own personal comforts.

It has been conjectured that the term pin-money has been applied to signify the provision for a married woman because anciently there was a tax laid for providing the English queen with pins; Barrington, Stat. 181.

When pin-money is given to but not spent by the wife, on the husband's death it belongs to his estate; 4 Viner, Abr. 138, Baron & Feme (E a. 8); 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 156; 2 P. Will. 341; 1 Ves. 190, 267; 1 Madd. 489.

In England it was once adjudged that a promise to a wife, by the purchaser, that if she would not hinder the bargain for the sale of the husband's lands he would give her ten pounds, was valid, and might be enforced by an action of assumpsit instituted by husband and wife; Rolle, Abr. 21.

In the French law, the term épingles, pins, is used to designate the present which is sometimes given by the purchaser of an immovable to the wife or daughters of the seller to induce them to consent to the sale. This present is not considered as a part of the consideration, but a purely voluntary gift. Dict. de Jur. Epingles.

PINT. A liquid measure, containing half a quart or the eighth part of a gallon.

PIOUS USES. See CHARITABLE USES.

PIPE ROLL. In English Law. The name of a roll in the exchequer, otherwise called the Great Roll. A measure, containing two hogsheads: one hundred and twenty-six gallons is also called a pipe.

PIPE LINES. A connected series of pipes for the transportation of oil, gas, or water.

A line of pipes running upon or in the earth carrying with it the right to the use of the soil in which it is placed. 95 Cal. 92.

The right to construct a pipe line is a public use, as is also that of laying pipes for a proper purpose in the streets of a city. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

A pipe line company for conveying oil is a common carrier bound to receive and transport for all persons alike, all goods entrusted to its care, and is not in any sense, or at any time, an agent for the person committing oil to its care; 172 Pa. 580.

A pipe line for the transportation of oil is not rendered a nuisance by the mere fact that its presence enhances the rates of insurance in the neighborhood; 29 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 688.

A pipe line is held to create an additional servitude on a country highway but not on city or borough streets; 111 Pa. 85; 160 id. 372. It may remove its pipes and abandon its easement; 184 id. 28.

See Bryan, Nat. Gas; GAS; OIL.

PIRACY. In Criminal Law. A robbery or forcible depredation on the high seas, without lawful authority, done animo furandi, in the spirit and intention of universal hostility. 3 Wheat. 610; 5 id. 153, 163; 3 Wash. C. C. 209. This is the definition of this offence by the law of nations; 1 Kent 183.

"Depredation upon the high seas, without authority from any sovereign." It is not necessary that the motive be plunder or that the depredations be directed against the vessels of all nations indiscriminately. As in robbery upon land, it is only necessary that the spoliation or intended spoliation be felonious, that is, with intent to injure, and without legal authority or lawful excuse; 25 Fed. Rep. 408.

All nations and individuals are warranted in seizing pirates. It has been held by many authorities that insurgents who have not been accorded belligerent rights are pirates, although it may be their intention to prey upon no ships except those of their mother country whom they are resisting. The American colonists in the American Revolution were declared to be pirates by Great Britain, and so were the cruisers of the confederate government by the federal government during the American Civil War; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 52.

Piracy has two aspects: As a violation of the common right of nations, punishable under the common law of nations by the seizure and condemnation of the vessel only, in prize courts. Its liability to punishment criminally by the municipal law of the place where the offenders are tried; Whart. Cr. L. § 2830; 2 Phil. Int. Law 414. Acts hostile in their nature, done for plunder, hatred, revenge, or mischief, or in the wanton exercise of power, are piratical; 2 How. 210, where the subject is elaborately discussed.

Property found on board a pirate ship goes to the Crown, of strict right; but the claim of the original owner is admitted, on application; 1 Hagg. Adm. 142. Vessels recaptured from pirates, after whatever length of time, are always restored to the owner on payment of salvage; 4 C. Rob. 3.

Congress may define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations; Const. U. S. art. 1, s. 7, n. 10; 3 Wheat. 336; 5 id. 76, 153, 184. The following laws have been passed:

Every person who on the high seas commits the crime of piracy as defined by the Law of Nations, and is afterward brought into or found in the United States, shall suffer death; § 5368. Every seaman who lays violent hands upon his commander, thereby to hinder and prevent his fighting in the defence of his vessel or the goods entrusted to him, is a pirate and shall suffer death; § 5369. Robbery on the high seas or in any open roadstead, haven, or harbor where the sea ebbs and flows, committed upon any vessel or ship's company or its lading, is piracy punishable by death; § 5370. Robbery on shore committed by the crew of a piratical vessel is piracy punishable by death. Every person who commits upon the high seas or in any river, harbor, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery or any crime which by the laws of a county would be punishable by death, by the laws of the United States, is a pirate, punishable by death. Every citizen who aids in murder or robbery or act of hostility against the United States or any citizen thereof on the high seas under color of any commission from any foreign prince or state or on pretence of authority from any person, is a pirate punishable by death. Every subject of a foreign state found upon the sea making war upon the United States or cruising against its vessels or citizens contrary to the provisions of any treaty between the United States and the state of which he is a subject, when by such treaty such acts are declared to be piracy, is guilty of piracy, and shall suffer death; § 5374. Every person who knowingly aids, etc., another to commit murder, robbery, or other piracy upon the seas is an accessory before the fact, punishable by death; § 5323. Every person who knowingly receives any vessel or other property feloniously taken by any robber or pirate, against the laws of the United States, and any person who, knowing that said pirate has committed any act of piracy or robbery on the land or sea, receives or conceals him, is accessory after the fact; § 5324. Secs. 5375, 5376 refer to confining and detaining negroes on board vessels and landing or seizing negroes on foreign shores, and constitute piracy punishable by death.

See RECAPTURE.

In Torts. By piracy is understood the plagiarism of a book, engraving, or other work for which a copyright has been taken out; infringement of copyright may be by unfair quotation; by piratical copying; by piratical use other than copying.

Where the violation of the copyright consists of excerpts from plaintiff's book, the court is bound to consider the quantity and quality of the matter appropriated and the extent to which the plaintiff is injured by it and the damage to the defendant by an injunction. It seems that the complainant is not always bound to prove pecuniary damage to entitle him to an injunction. Where the parts of the complainant's book are scattered through the defendant's book and cannot be separated, the whole will be enjoined; 33 Fed. Rep. 494. See Drone, Copyr. 494.

Piratical copying was held to be established in the case of a society directory by proof that out of 2800 names, 39 common errors were found to exist; 30 Fed. Rep. 772; and by proof that out of 60,000 names there were 67 common errors; 66 Fed. Rep. 977. Two common errors in maps were held sufficient to establish the fact that one map had been copied from the other; 18 Fed. Rep. 539; in a mercantile agency book, the existence of 15 common errors was held sufficient to establish the use of the complainant's book by the defendant; 84 Hun 12. It is not necessary to point out many common errors to establish a presumption of piracy; 66 Hun 38. The court does not feel bound to go through the whole of the defendant's book to ascertain the extent of the piracy; 19 L. J. N. S. Ch. 90. In 2 Beav. 6, the court enjoined the defendant who had pirated parts of a topographical dictionary, without waiting until the whole of the pirated parts could be ascertained, and held that if the parts which had been copied could not be separated from those which were original without destroying the use and value of the original matter, the defendant must suffer the consequences.

The majority of copyright infringements that occur, which have been called "literary larcency" lie intermediately between open piracy and fair use; Chamier, Copyr. 108.

In 30 Fed. Rep. 772, it was intimated that the injunction would be modified at the final hearing, if the proofs of the defendant tended to segregate any part of the material which had been made subject to the injunction.

The rule is well settled that although the entire copyrighted work is not copied in the infringement, but only portions, if such portions are so intermingled with the rest of the piratical work that they cannot well be distinguished from it, the entire profits realized by the defendant will be given to the plaintiff; 144 U. S. 488, following 128 id. 617. See 2 Russ. 385; 97 U. S. 126.

It is the unfair appropriation of the compiler's labor in the case of the syllabus of a legal opinion that constitutes infringement. Identity of language will often prove that the offence was committed, but it is not the sole proof. If the subsequent digestor has made an unfair use of any part of a syllabus of his predecessor, the burden is on him to show that there were parts of it that he did not use. Where the defendant's editor, in compiling a digest of reports, digested some 13,300 cases from the complainant's pamphlet reports and a partial comparison of the copyrighted syllabi with the digest showed internal evidence of piracy in some 400 instances, it was held that this indicated a general, systematic, and unfair use of the copyrighted work, coupled with an attempt to disguise such use, and made out a prima facie case, which was not rebutted by the simple denial of the defendant's editors that they had made use of the complainant's syllabi. It was held that the whole work, so far as taken from the complainant's pamphlet reports, should be enjoined, with liberty to defendant to show by further proofs what paragraphs were digested by non-offending editors and to move to have them excluded from the injunction; 79 Fed. Rep. 756. See COPYRIGHT; MEMORIZATION.

PIRATE. A sea-robber, who, to enrich himself, by subtlety or open force, setteth upon merchants and others trading by sea, despoiling them of their loading, and sometimes bereaving them of life and sinking their ships. Ridley, View pt. 2, c. 1, s. 3. One guilty of the crime of piracy. Merlin, Répert. See, for the etymology of this word, Bac. Abr. Piracy. See PIRACY.

PIRATICALLY. In Pleading. This is a technical word, essential to charge the crime of piracy in an indictment, which cannot be supplied by another word or any circumlocution. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 37, s. 15; Co. 3d Inst. 112; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. *244.

PISCARY. The right of fishing in the waters of another. Bac. Abr.; 5 Com. Dig. 366. See FISHERY.

PISTAREEN. A small Spanish coin. It is not made current by the laws of the United States. 10 Pet. 618.

PIT. A hole dug in the earth, which was filled with water, and in which women thieves were drowned, instead of being hung. The punishment of the pit was formerly common in Scotland.

PIT AND GALLOWS (Law Lat. fossa et furca). In Scotch Law. A privilege of inflicting capital punishment for theft, given by king Malcolm, by which a woman could be drowned in a pit (fossa) or a man hanged on a gallows (furca). Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 277 § 62.

PLACE. The word is associated with objects which are, in their nature, fixed and territorial. 3 Wheat. 336. See VENUE.

It is applied to any locality, limited by boundaries however large or however small. It may be used to designate a country, state, county, town, or a very small portion of a town. The extent of the locality designated by it must, generally, be determined by the connection in which it is used; 46 Vt. 432.

Any piece of ground appropriated by its owner or occupier for the time being is a place within the English betting houses act; 51 L. J. M. C. 56; but the ground must be so appropriated and must be an ascertained place; 14 Q. B. D. 588. The habitual standing or using a table in Hyde Park does not make it a place for betting; 19 C. B. N. S. 765; as habitual user is not of the essence of place; 10 Q. B. 102; but a piece of ground bounded on one side by a boarding and on two other sides by stays which support the boarding is a place under 16 & 17 Vic. c. 119, relating to betting; [1896] 1 Q. B. 295. See [1897] 1 Q. B. 579.

A private residence may become a public place when it is used for the purpose of public amusement, recreation, business, or religious worship; 45 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 702.

PLACE OF AMUSEMENT. A hall containing a stage whereon a nightly programme of music, vocal and instrumental, is rendered is a place of amusement; 4 D. R. Pa. 37; and a dance hall is a public amusement. 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 1043.

PLACE OF BUSINESS. The place where a man usually transacts his affairs or business.

When a man keeps a store, shop, counting-room, or office, independently and distinctly from all other persons, that is deemed his place of business; and when he usually transacts his business at the counting-house, office, and the like, occupied and used by another, that will also be considered his place of business, if he has no independent place of his own. But when he has no particular right to use a place for such private purpose, as in an insurance-office, an exchange-room, a banking-room, a postoffice, and the like, where persons generally resort, these will not be considered as the party's place of business, although he may occasionally or transiently transact business there; 1 Pet 582; 2 id. 121; 10 Johns. 501; 11 id. 231; 16 Pick. 392.; Byles, Bills 296.

It is a general rule that a notice of the non-acceptance or non-payment of a bill, or of the non-payment of a note, may be sent either to the domicil or place of business of the person to be affected by such notice; and the fact that one is in one town and the other in the other will make no difference, and the holder has his election to send to either. A notice to partners may be left at the place of business of the firm or of any one of the partners; Story, Pr. Notes § 312; Dan. Neg. Instr. 4th ed. § 1016. See Notice.

PLACE OF CONTRACT. See LEX LOCI.

PLACE OF DELIVERY. The place where goods sold are to be delivered. If no place is specified in the contract they must, generally, be delivered at the place where they are at the time of the sale. 100 U. S. 134.

PLACER. See MINES AND MINING.

PLACITA COMMUNIA (Lat.). Common pleas. All civil actions between subject and subject. 3 Bla. Com. 38, *40; Cowell, Plea. See PLACITUM.

PLACITA CORONÆ (Lat.). Pleas of the crown. All trials for crimes and misdemeanors, wherein the king is plaintiff, on behalf of the people. 3 Bla. Com. 40*; Cowell, Plea.

PLACITA JURIS (Lat.). Arbitrary rules of law. Bac. Law Tr. 73; Bac. Max. Reg. 12.

PLACITUM (Lat. from placere). In Civil Law. Any agreement or bargain.

A law; a constitution or rescript of the emperor; the decision of a judge or award of arbitrators. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex; Dupin, Notions sur le Droit.

In Old English Law (Ger. plats, Lat. platea, i. e. fields or streets). An assembly of all degrees of men, where the king presided and they consulted about the great affairs of the kingdom: first held, as the name would show, in the fields or street. Cowell.

So on the continent. Hinc. de Ordine Palatii, c. 29; Bertinian, Annals of France in the year 767; Const. Car. Mag. cap. ix.; Hinc. Epist. 197, 227; Laws of the Longobards, passim.

A lord's court. Cowell.

An ordinary court. Placita is the style of the English courts at the beginning of the record at nisi prius; in this sense, placita are divided into pleas of the crown and common pleas, which see. Cowell.

A trial or suit in court. Cowell; Jacobs.

A fine. Black Book of Exchequer, lib. 2, tit. 13; 1 Hen. I. cc. 12, 13.

A plea. This word is nomen generalissimum, and refers to all the pleas in the case. 1 Saund. 388, n. 6; Skinn. 554; Carth. 334; Yelv. 65. By placitum is also understood the subdivisions in abridgments and other works, where the point decided in a case is set down separately, and, generally, numbered. In citing, it is abbreviated as follows; Viner, Abr. Abatement pl. 3.

Placitum nominatum is the day appointed for a criminal to appear and plead.

Placitum fractum. A day past or lost to the defendant. 1 Hen. I. c. 59.

PLAGIARISM. The act of appropriating the ideas and language of another and passing them for one's own.

When this amounts to piracy, the party who has been guilty of it will be enjoined when the original author has a copyright. See COPYRIGHT; PIRACY; QUOTATION; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 169.

PLAGIARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. He who fraudulently concealed a freeman or slave who belonged to another.

The offence itself was called plagium.

It differed from larceny or theft in this, that larceny always implies that the guilty party intended to make a profit, whereas the plagiarius did not intend to make any profit. Dig. 48. 15. 6; Code 9. 20. 9. 15.

PLAGIUM (Lat.). Man-stealing; kidnapping. This offence is the crimen plagii of the Romans. Alison, Cr. L. 280.

PLAIN STATEMENT. One that can be readily understood not merely by lawyers but by all who are sufficiently acquainted with the language in which it is written. 5 Sandf. 564. See 79 N. C. 574.

PLAIN TYPE. Large or ordinary sized type, not that of very small size. 57 Mo. 255.

PLAINT. In English Law. The exhibiting of any action, real or personal, in writing. The party making his plaint is called the plaintiff.

PLAINTIFF (Fr. pleyntife). He who complains. He who, in a personal action, seeks a remedy for an injury to his rights. 3 Bla. Com. 25; Hamm. Part.; 1 Chitty, Pl.; 1 Com. Dig. 36, 205, 308.

The legal plaintiff is he in whom the legal title or cause of action is vested.

The equitable plaintiff is he who, not having the legal title, yet is in equity entitled to the thing sued for. For example: when a suit is brought by B. for the use of A., B. the legal, and A. the equitable, plaintiff. This is the usual manner of bringing suits when the cause of action is not assignable at law but is so in equity.

The word plaintiff occurring alone means the plaintiff on record, not the real or equitable plaintiff. After once naming the plaintiff in pleading, he may be simply called the plaintiff. 1 Chitty, Pl. 266; 9 Paige, Ch. 226; 5 Hill, N. Y. 523, 548; 7 Term 50.

PLAINTIFF IN ERROR. A party who sues out a writ of error; and this, whether in the court below he was plaintiff or defendant.

PLAN. The delineation or design of a city, a house or houses, a garden, a vessel, etc., traced on paper or other substance, representing the position and the relative proportions of the different parts.

A plan referred to in a deed describing land as bounded by a way laid down upon a plan may be used as evidence in fixing the locality of such way; 16 Gray 374; and if a plan is referred to in the deed for description, and in it are laid down courses, distances, and other particulars, it is the same as if they were recited in the deed itself; 3 Washb. R. P. 430.

When houses are built by one person agreeably to a plan, and one of them, with windows and doors in it, is sold to a person, the owner of the others cannot shut up those windows, nor has his grantee any greater right; 1 Price 27; 2 Ry. & M. 24; 2 Saund. 114, n. 4; 1 Mood. & M. 396. See 12 Mass. 159; Hamm. N. P. 202; Com. Dig. Action on the Case for a Nuisance (A). ANCIENT LIGHTS; PLAT; MAP; WINDOWS.

PLANT. The fixtures and tools necessary to carry on any trade or mechanical business. 77 Ga. 752. The term does not cover property forming part of a separate business; 77 Fed. Rep. 938. As used in the business of a wharfinger, a horse was held part of the plant; 19 Q. B. D. 647; and a legacy of plant and good will was held to pass the house of business held by lease; 8 W. R. 410.

PLANTATIONS. Colonies; dependencies. 1 Bla. Com. 107.

In England, this word, as it is used in stat. 12 Car. II. c. 18, is never applied to any of the British dominions in Europe, but only to the colonies in the West Indies and America; 1 Marsh. Ins. 69.

In its ordinary use it is nearly synonymous with farm, and includes all the land forming the parcel or parcels under culture as one farm, or even what is worked by one set of hands. 38 Cal. 291; 10 Ired. 131. It has been held that in order to constitute a plantation, the estate should be under the control of one proprietor. 79 Ga. 721. The devise of a plantation passes the stock, implements, utensils, etc., on it; 1 Sim. 435; but plantation stock does not include cotton seed; 4 Jones, Eq. 208.

PLASTERING. Plastering a building includes lathing. 16 Ill. 502; 49 N. Y. 464.

PLAT. A map of a piece of land, on which are marked the courses and distances of the different lines, and the quantity of land it contains.

Such a plat may be given in evidence in ascertaining the position of the land and what is included, and may serve to settle the figure of a survey and correct mistakes; 5 T. B. Monr. 160. See 17 Mass. 211; 5 Me. 219; 7 id. 61; 4 Wheat. 444; 14 Mass. 149.

PLEA. In Equity. A special answer showing or relying upon one or more things as a cause why the suit should be either dismissed, or delayed, or barred. Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 219; Coop. Eq. Pl. 223; Story, Eq. Pl. § 649.

The modes of making defence to a bill in equity are said to be by demurrer, which demands of the court whether from the matter apparent from the bill the defendant shall answer at all; by plea, which resting on the foundation of a new matter offered, demands whether the defendant shall answer further; by answer, which responds generally to the charges of the bill; by disclaimer, which denies any interest in the matters in question; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 13; 2 Stor. 59; Story, Eq. Pl. § 437. Pleas are said to be pure which rely upon foreign matter to discharge or stay the suit, and anomalous or negative which consist mainly of denials of the substantial matters set forth in the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 651, 667; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 97, 110; Beames, Eq. Pl. 123; Adams, Eq. 236.

Pleas to the jurisdiction assert that the court before which the cause is brought is not the proper court to take cognizance of the matter.

Pleas to the person may be to the person of the plaintiff or defendant. Those of the former class are mainly outlawry, excommunication, popish recusant convict, which are never pleaded in America and very rarely now in England; attainder, which is now seldom pleaded; 2 Atk. 399; alienage, which is not a disability unless the matter respect lands, when the alien may not hold them, or he be an alien enemy not under license; 2 V. & B. 323; infancy, coverture, and idiocy, which are pleadable as at law (see ABATEMENT); bankruptcy and insolvency, in which case all the facts necessary to establish the plaintiff as a legally declared bankrupt must be set forth; 3 Mer. 667; though not necessarily as of the defendant's own knowledge; Younge 331; 4 Beav. 554; 1 Y. & C. 39; want of character in which he sues, as that he is not an administrator; 2 Dick. 510; 1 Cox, Ch. 198; is not heir; 2 V. & B. 159; 2 Bro. C. C. 143; 3 id. 489; is not a creditor; 2 S. & S. 274; is not a partner; 6 Madd. 61; as he pretends to be; that the plaintiff named is a fictitious person, or was dead at the commencement of the suit; Story, Eq. Pl. § 727. Those to the person of the defendant may show that the defendant is not the person he is alleged to be, or does not sustain the character given by the bill; 6 Madd. 61; Cas. temp. Finch 334; or that he is bankrupt, to require the assignees to be joined; Story, Eq. Pl. § 732. These pleas to the person are pleas in abatement, or, at least, in the nature of pleas in abatement.

Pleas to the bill or the frame of the bill object to the suit as framed, or contend that it is unnecessary. These may be—the pendency of another suit, which is analogous to the same plea at law and is governed in most respects by the same principles; Story, Eq. Pl. § 736; 2 My. & C. 602; 1 Phill. 82; 1 S. & S. 491; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 248; see AUTER ACTION PENDANT; the other suit must be in equity, and not at law; Beames, Eq. Pl. 146; want of proper parties, which goes to both discovery and relief, where both are prayed for; Story, Eq. Pl. § 745; see 3 Yo. & C. 447; but not to a bill of discovery merely; 2 Paige, Ch. 280; 3 Cra. 220; a multiplicity of suits; 1 P. Wms. 428; 2 Mas. 190; multifariousness, which should be taken by way of demurrer, when the joining or confession of the distinct matters appears from the face of the bill, as it usually does; Story, Eq. Pl. § 271. A plea to the jurisdiction which sets up matters affecting the validity of the service, matters showing want of proper citizenship, and also the pendency of a prior suit, is bad for duplicity; 58 Fed. Rep. 717.

Pleas in bar rely upon a bar created by statute; as, the Statute of Limitations; 1 S. & S. 4; 3 Sumn. 152; 10 Ves. 466; which is a good plea in equity as well as at law, and with similar exceptions; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 253; see LIMITATION, STATUTE OF; the Statute of Frauds, where its provisions apply; 1 Johns. Ch. 425; 4 Ves. 24, 720; 2 Bro. C. C. 559; or some other public or private statute; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 768; matter of record or as of record in some court, as a common recovery; 1 P. Wms. 754; 1 Vern. 13; a judgment at law; 1 Keen 456; 2 My. & C. Ch. 602; Story, Eq. Pl. § 781, n.; the sentence or judgment of a foreign court or a court not of record; 12 Cl. & F. 368; 14 Sim. 265; especially where its jurisdiction is of a peculiar or exclusive nature; 12 Ves. 307; 2 How. 619; with limitation in case of fraud; 1 Ves. 284; Story, Eq. Pl. § 788; or a decree of the same or another court of equity: Cas. Talb. 217; 7 Johns. Ch. 1; 2 S. & S. 464; 2 Y. & C. 43; matters purely in pais, in which case the pleas may go to discovery, relief, or either, both, or a part of either, of which the principal (though not the only) pleas are: account, stated or settled; 7 Paige, Ch. 573; 1 My. & K. 231; accord and satisfaction; 1 Hare 564; award; 2 V. & B. 764; purchase for valuable consideration; 2 Sumn. 507; 2 Yo. & C. 457; release; 3 P. Wms. 315; lapse of time analogous to the Statute of Limitations; 1 Yo. & C. 432, 453; 2 J. & W. 1; 1 Hare 594; 1 Johns. Ch. 46; 10 Wheat. 152; 1 Sch. & L. 721; 3 Paige, Ch. 273; 7 id. 62; title in the defendant; Story, Eq. Pl. § 812.

The same pleas may be made to bills seeking discovery as to those seeking relief; but matter which constitutes a good plea to a bill for relief does not necessarily to a bill for discovery merely. See Story, Eq. Pl. § 816; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 281. The same kind of pleas may be made to bills not original as to original bills, in many cases, according to their respective natures. Peculiar defences to each may, however, be sometimes urged by plea; Story, Eq. Pl. § 826; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 288.

Effect of a plea. A plea may extend to the whole or a part, and if to a part only must express which part, and an answer over-rules a plea if the two conflict; 3 Yo. & C. 683; 3 Cra. 220. The plea may be accompanied by an answer fortifying it with a protest against waiver of the plea thereby; Story, Eq. Pl. § 695. A plea or argument may be allowed, in which case it is a full bar to so much of the bill as it covers, if true; Mitford, Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 301; or the benefit of it may be saved to the hearing, which decides it valid so far as then appears, but allows matter to be disclosed in evidence to invalidate it, or it may be ordered to stand for an answer, which decides that it may be a part of a defence; 4 Paige, Ch. 124; but is not a full defence, that the matter has been improperly offered as a plea, or it is not sufficiently fortified by answer, so that the truth is apparent; 3 Paige, Ch. 459.

While a defendant cannot plead merely the facts averred in the bill of complaint, but must present his objection to their sufficiency by demurrer, yet he may present a good plea by averring along with the facts contained in the bill, other and additional facts, provided that both together establish a defence to the bill; 50 Fed. Rep. 151.

A plea which avoids the discovery prayed for is no evidence for defendant, even when under oath and denying a material averment in the bill; 120 U. S. 303.

At Law. The defendant's answer by matter of fact to the plaintiff's declaration, as distinguished from a demurrer, which is an answer by matter of law.

It includes as well the denial of the truth of the allegations on which the plaintiff relies, as the statement of facts on which the defendant relies. In an ancient use it denoted action, and is still used sometimes in that sense: as, "summoned to answer in a plea of trespass;" Steph. Pl. 38; Warren, Law Stud. 272; Oliver, Prec. 97. In a popular, and not legal, sense, the word is used to denote a forensic argument. It was strictly applicable in a kindred sense when the pleadings were conducted orally by the counsel. Steph. Pl. App. n. 1.

Pleas are either dilatory, which tend to defeat the particular action to which they apply on account of its being brought before the wrong court, by or against the wrong person, or in an improper form; or peremptory, which impugn the right of action altogether, which answer the plaintiff's allegations of right conclusively. Pleas are also said to be to the jurisdiction of the court, in suspension of the action, in abatement of the writ, in bar of the action. The first three classes are dilatory, the last peremptory. Steph. Pl. And. ed. 136; 1 Chitty, Pl. 425; Lawes, Pl. 36.

Pleas are of various kinds. In abatement. See ABATEMENT. In avoidance, called also, confession and avoidance, which admits, in words, or in effect, the truth of the matters contained in the declaration, and alleges some new matter to avoid the effect of it and show that the plaintiff is, notwithstanding, not entitled to his action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 540; Lawes, Pl. 122. Every allegation made in the pleadings subsequent to the declaration which does not go in denial of what is before alleged on the other side is an allegation of new matter. See Gould, Pl. § 195; CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.

Pleas in bar deny that the plaintiff has any cause of action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 407; Co. Lit. 303 b. They either conclude the plaintiff by matter of estoppel, show that he never had any cause of action, or, admitting that he had, insist that it is determined by some subsequent matter. Steph. Pl. And. ed. 448; Britt. 92 § 190. They either deny all or some essential part of the averments in the declaration, in which case they are said to traverse it, or, admitting them to be true, allege new facts which obviate and repel their legal effect, in which case they are said to confess and avoid; Steph. Pl. And. ed. 146. The term is often used in a restricted sense to denote what are with propriety called special pleas in bar. These pleas are of two kinds; the general issue, and special pleas in bar. The general issue denies or takes issue upon all the material allegations of the declaration, thus compelling the plaintiff to prove all of them that are essential to support his action. There is, however, a plea to the action which is not strictly either a general issue or a special plea in bar, and which is called a special issue, which denies only some particular part of the declaration which goes to the gist of the action. It thus, on the one hand, denies less than does the general issue, and, on the other hand, is distinguished from a "special plea in bar" in this,—that the latter universally advances new matter, upon which the defendant relies for his defence, which a special issue never does; it simply denies. Lawes, Pl. 110, 145; Co. Litt. 126 a; Gould, Pl. 5th ed. ch ii. § 38, ch. vi. § 8. The matter which ought to be so pleaded is now very generally given in evidence under the general issue. 1 Chitty, Pl. 415. A plea which merely amounts to the general issue, though not such in form, is bad; 84 Md. 414.

Special pleas in bar admit the facts alleged in the declaration, but avoid the action by matter which the plaintiff would not be bound to prove or dispute in the first instance on the general issue. Ld. Raym. 88. They are very various, according to the circumstances of the defendant's case: as, in personal action the defendant may plead any special matter in denial, avoidance, discharge, excuse, or justification of the matter alleged in the declaration, which destroys or bars the plaintiff's action; or he may plead any matter which estops or precludes him from averring or insisting on any matter relied upon by the plaintiff in his declaration. The latter sort of pleas are called pleas in estoppel. In real action, the tenant may plead any matter which destroys and bars the demandant's title; as, a general release; Steph. Pl. 115.

The general qualities of a plea in bar are —first, that it be adapted to the nature and form of the action, and also conformable to the count. Co. Litt. 303 a; 285 b; Bac. Abr. Pleas (I); Rolle 216. Second, that it answers all it assumes to answer, and no more. Co. Litt. 303 a; Com. Dig. Pleader (E 1, 36); 1 Saund. 28; 2 B. & P. 427. Third, in the case of a special plea, that it confess and admit the fact. 3 Term 298; 1 Saund. 28, 14; 10 Johns. 289. Fourth, that it be single. Co. Litt. 307; Bac. Abr. Pleas (K 1, 2); 2 Saund. 49, 50. Fifth, that it be certain. Com. Dig. Pleader (E 5-11, C 41). See CERTAINTY; PLEADING. Sixth, it must be direct, positive, and not argumentative. See 6 Cra. 126; 9 Johns. 313. Seventh, it must be capable of trial. Eighth, it must be true and capable of proof.

The parts of a plea are—first, the title of the court. Second, the title of the term. Third, the names of the parties in the margin. These, however, do not constitute any substantial part of the plea. The surnames only are usually inserted, and that of the defendant precedes the plaintiff's: as, "Roe v. Doe." Fourth, the commencement, which includes the statement of the name of the defendant, the appearance, the defence, see DEFENCE, the actio non, see ACTIO NON. Fifth, the body, which may contain the inducement, the protestation, see PROTESTATION, ground of defence, quæ est eadem, the traverse. Sixth, the conclusion.

Dilatory pleas go to destroy the particular action, but do not affect the right of action in the plaintiff, and hence delay the decision of the cause upon its merits. Gould, Pl. ch. ii. § 33. This class includes pleas to the jurisdiction, to the disability of the parties, and all pleas in abatement. All dilatory pleas must be pleaded with the greatest certainty, must contain a distinct, clear, and positive averment of all material facts, and must in general, enable the plaintiff to correct the deficiency or error pleaded to; And. Steph. Pl. 136. See ABATEMENT; JURISDICTION.

Pleas in discharge admit the demand of the plaintiff, and show that it has been discharged by some matter of fact. Such are pleas of judgment, release, and the like.

Pleas in excuse admit the demand or complaint stated in the declaration, but excuse the non-compliance with the plaintiff's claim, or the commission of the act of which he complains, on account of the defendant's having done all his power to satisfy the former, or not having been the culpable author of the latter. A plea of tender is an example of the former, and a plea of son assault demesne an instance of the latter.

Foreign pleas go to the jurisdiction; and their effect is to remove the action, from the county in which the venue is originally laid. Carth. 402. Previous to the statute of Anne, an affidavit was required. 5 Mod. 335; Carth. 402; 1 Saund. Pl. 98, n. 1; Viner, Abr. Foreign Pleas; 1 Chitty, Pl. 382; Bacon, Abr. Abatement (R).

Pleas of justification assert that the defendant has purposely done the act of which the plaintiff complains, and in the exercise of his legal rights. 8 Term 78; 3 Wils. 71. No person is bound to justify who is not prima facie a wrong-doer; 1 Leon. 301; 2 id. 83; Cowp. 478; 4 Pick. 126; 13 Johns. 443, 579; 1 Chitty, Pl. 436.

Pleas puis darrein continuance introduce new matter of defence, which has arisen or come to the plaintiff's knowledge since the last continuance. In most of the states, the actual continuance of a cause from one term to another, or from one particular day in term to another day in the same term, is practically done away with, and the prescribed times for pleading are fixed without any reference to terms of court. Still, this right of a defendant to change his plea so as to avail himself of facts arising during the course of the litigation remains unimpaired; and though there be no continuance, the plea is still called a plea puis darrein continuance,—meaning, now, a plea upon facts arising since the last stage of suit. They are either in bar or in abatement. Matter which arises after purchase or issue of the writ, and before issue joined, is properly pleaded in bar of the further maintenance of the suit; 4 East 502; 5 Pet. 224; 4 Me. 582; 12 Gill & J. 358; see 7 Mass. 325; while matter subsequent to issue joined must be pleaded puis darrein continuance; 30 Ala. N. S. 253; Hempst. 16; 40 Me. 582; 7 Gill 415; 10 Ohio 300. Their object is to present matter which has arisen since issue joined, and which the defendant cannot introduce under his pleadings as they exist, for the rights of the parties were at common law to be tried as they existed at the time of bringing the suit, and matters subsequently arising come in as it were by exception and favor. See 7 Johns. 194.

Among other matters, it may be pleaded that the plaintiff has become an alien enemy; 3 Camp. 152; that an award has been made after issue joined; 2 Esp. 504; 29 Ala. N. S. 619; that there has been accord and satisfaction; 5 Johns. 392; 19 Wend. 98; 5 Pet. 231; that the plaintiff has become bankrupt; 1 Dougl. Mich. 267; 15 East 622; that the defendant has obtained a bankrupt-certificate, even though obtained before issue joined; 9 East 82; see 2 H. Bla. 553; 3 B. & C. 23; 3 Den. 269; that a feme plaintiff has taken a husband; Bull. N. P. 310; 1 Blackf. 288; that judgment has been obtained for the same cause of action; 9 Johns. 221; 5 Dowl. & R. 175; that payment has been made; 61 Ind. 453; that letters testamentary or of administration have been granted; 1 Saund. 265, n. 2; or revoked; Com. Dig. Abatement (I 4); that the plaintiff has released the defendant; 4 Cal. 331; 3 Sneed 52; 17 Mo. 267. See 33 N. H. 179. But the defendant in ejectment cannot plead release from the lessor of the plaintiff; 4 Maule & S. 300; and the release will be avoided in case of fraud; 4 B. & Ad. 419; 4 J. B. Moo. P. C. 192; 23 N. H. 535. In ejectment a right to the land obtained by defendant since the commencement of the action, must be set up by a plea puis darrein continuance; 99 Mich. 253.

As a general rule, such matters must be pleaded at the first continuance after they happen or come to the plaintiff's knowledge; 11 Johns. 424; 1 S. & R. 146; though a discharge in insolvency or bankruptcy of the defendant; 2 Johns. 294; 9 id. 255, 392; and coverture of the plaintiff existing at the purchase of the suit, are exceptions; Bull. N. P. 310; in the discretion of the court; 10 Johns. 161; 4 S. & R. 239; 5 Dowl. & R. 521; 2 Mo. 100. Great certainty is required in pleas of this description; Freem. 112; Cro. Jac. 261; 2 Wils. 130; 2 Watts 451. They must state the day of the last continuance, and of the happening of the new matter; Bull. N. P. 309; And. Steph. Pl. 356, n; 7 Ill. 252; 75 Me. 551; cannot be awarded after assizes are over; 2 M'Cl. & Y. 350; must be verified on oath before they are allowed; 1 Stra. 493; 1 Const. S. C. 455; and must then be received; 3 Term 554; 1 Marsh. 70, 280; 15 N. H. 410. They stand as a substitute for former pleas; Hob. 81; Hempst. 16; 4 Wisc. 159; 1 Strobh. 17; 73 Me. 465; 14 Wend. 161; and demurrers; 32 E. L. & E. 280; may be pleaded after a plea in bar; 1 Wheat. 215; Freem. 252; and if decided against the defendant, the plaintiff has judgment in chief; 1 Wheat. 215; Al. 67; Freem. 252.

Sham pleas are those which are known to the pleader to be false, and are entered for the purpose of delay. There are certain pleas of this kind which, in consequence of their having been long and frequently used in practice, have obtained toleration from the courts, and, though discouraged, are tacitly allowed: as, for example, the common plea of judgment recovered, that is, that judgment has been already recovered by the plaintiff for the same cause of action; Steph. Pl. 444, 445. See 14 Barb. 393; 2 Den. 195. The later practice of courts in regard to sham pleas is to strike them out on motion, and give final judgment for the plaintiff, or impose terms (in the discretion of the court) on the defendant, as a condition of his being let in to plead anew. The motion is made on the plea itself, or on affidavits in connection with the plea.

Pleas in suspension of the action show some ground for not proceeding in the suit at the present period, and pray that the pleading may be stayed until that ground be removed. The number of these pleas is small. Among them is that which is founded on the nonage of the parties, and termed parol demurrer. Steph. Pl. And. ed. 138.

A plea which avers a legal conclusion is bad, as "that a dam is no higher than the statute authorized;" 13 Wall. 175.

In ecclesiastical courts, a plea is called an allegation. See ALLEGATION.

PLEAD, TO. To answer the indictment or, in a civil action, the declaration of the plaintiff, in a formal manner. To enter the defendant's defence upon record. In a popular use, to make a forensic argument. The word is not so used by the profession. Steph. Pl. App. n. I; Story, Eq. Pl. § 4, n.

PLEADING. The written allegation of what is affirmed on the one side, or denied on the other, disclosing to the court or jury having to try the cause, the real matter in dispute between the parties. 1 Minn. 17.

In Chancery Practice. It consists in making the formal written allegations or statements of the respective parties on the record to maintain the suit, or to defeat it, of which, when contested in matters of fact, they propose to offer proofs, and in matters of law to offer arguments to the court. Story, Eq. Pl. § 4. The substantial object of pleading is the same, but the forms and rules of pleading are very different, at law and in equity.

In Civil Practice. The stating in a logical and legal form the facts which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action or the defendant's ground of defence: it is the formal mode of alleging that on the record which constitutes the support or the defence of the party in evidence. 3 Dougl. 278; Com. Dig. Pleader (A); Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleading. Pleading is used to denote the act of making the pleadings.

The object of pleading is to secure a clear and distinct statement of the claims of each party, so that the controverted points may be exactly known, examined, and decided, and the appropriate remedy or punishment administered. See Cowp. 682; Dougl. 159. The object is to develop the real issue; 28 Pa. 522. A pleading must proceed upon some single definite theory, and it must be good upon the theory on which it proceeds; 118 Ind. 87. Good pleading consists in good matter pleaded in good form, in apt time, and due order. Co. Litt. 303. Good matter includes all facts and circumstances necessary to constitute the cause of complaint or ground of defence, and no more. It does not include arguments or matters of law. But some matters of fact need not be stated, though it be necessary to establish them as facts. Such are, among others, facts of which the courts take notice by virtue of their office: as, the time of accession of the sovereign; 2 Ld. Raym. 794; time and place of holding parliament; 1 Saund. 131; public statutes and the facts they ascertain; 1 Term 45; including ecclesiastical, civil, and marine laws; Ld. Raym. 338; but not private; 2 Dougl. 97; or foreign laws; 2 Carth. 273; 4 R. I. 523; common-law rights, duties, and general customs; Ld. Raym. 1542; Co. Litt. 175; Cro. Car. 561; the almanac, days of the week, public holidays, etc.; Salk. 269; 6 Mod. 81; 4 Dowl. 48; 4 Fla. 158; political divisions; Co. 2d Inst. 557; 4 B. & Ald. 242; 6 Ill. 73; the meaning of English words and terms of art in ordinary acceptation; 1 Rolle, Abr. 86, 525; their own course of proceedings; 2 Lev. 176; 10 Pick. 470; and that of courts of general jurisdiction; 1 Saund. 73; 5 McLean 167; 10 Pick. 470; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 4; see JUDICIAL NOTICE; facts which the law presumes: as, the innocence of a party, illegality of an act, etc.; 4 Maule & S. 105; 1 B. & Ald. 463; 6 Johns. 105; 72 Tex. 272; 6 Conn. 130; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 76; matters which the other party should plead, as being more within his knowledge; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 293, n.; 2 H. Bla. 530; 2 Johns. 415; 9 Cal. 286; 1 Sandf. 89; mere matters of evidence of facts; 9 Co. 96; 25 Barb. 457; 7 Tex. 603; 6 Blackf. 173; 1 N. Chipm. 293; see 25 Fla. 1; unnecessary matter: as, a second breach of condition, where one is sufficient; 2 Johns. 443; 1 Saund. 58, n. 1; 33 Miss. 474; 4 Ind. 409; 23 N. H. 415; 12 Barb. 27; 2 Green, N. J. 577; see DUPLICITY; or intent to defraud, when the facts alleged constitute fraud; 16 Tex. 335; see 3 Maule & S. 182; irrelevant matter; 1 Chitty, Pl. 209. Such matter may be rejected without damage to the plea, if wholly foreign to the case, or repugnant; 7 Johns. 462; 3 Day 472; 2 Mass. 283; 8 S. & R. 124; 16 Tex. 656; 7 Cal. 348; 23 Conn. 134; 1 Du. 242; 6 Ark. 468; 8 Ala. N. S. 320; but in many cases the matter must be proved as stated, if stated; 7 Johns. 321; 3 Day 283. The matter must be true and susceptible of proof; but legal fictions may be stated as facts; 2 Burr. 667; 4 B. & P. 140. Facts necessarily implied from direct averments will be treated as having been pleaded; 48 Mo. App. 319; 44 Ill. App. 22; and facts and not conclusions should be pleaded; 44 Ill. App. 203. See 96 Ala. 454; 52 Fed. Rep. 898.

The form of statement should be according to the established forms; Co. Litt. 303; 6 East 351; 8 Co. 48 b. This is to be considered as, in general, merely a rule of caution, though it is said the courts disapprove a departure from the well-established forms of pleading; 1 Chitty, Pl. 212. In most of the states of the United States, and in England since 1852, many radical changes have been introduced into the law of pleading: still, it is apprehended that a reasonable regard to the old forms will be profitable, although the names of things may be changed. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 301, n.; 3 Cal. 196; 28 Miss. 766; 14 B. Monr. 83. In general, it may be said that the facts should be stated logically, in their natural order, with certainty, that is, clearly and distinctly, so that the party who is to answer, the court, and the jury may readily understand what is meant; 2 B. & P. 267; Co. Litt. 303; 33 Miss. 669; Hempst. 238; with precision; 13 Johns. 437; 19 Ark. 695; 5 Du. 689; and with brevity; 36 N. H. 458; 1 Chitty, Pl. 212. The facts stated must not be insensible or repugnant; 7 Co. 25; 25 Conn. 431; 5 Blackf. 339; 18 Colo. 16; nor ambiguous or doubtful in meaning; 5 Maule & S. 38; 86 Wis. 64; nor argumentative; Co. Litt. 303; 5 Blackf. 557; nor by way of recital; 2 Bulstr. 214; Ld. Raym. 1413; and should be stated according to their legal effect and operation; Steph. Pl. And. ed. 366; 16 Mass. 443.

The time within which pleas must be filed is a matter of local regulation, depending upon the court in which the action is brought. The order of pleading different matters is of importance as affecting the defendant, who may oppose the plaintiff's suit in various ways. The order is as follows:—

First, to the jurisdiction of the court.

Second, to the disability, etc., of the person: first, of the plaintiff; second, of the defendant.

Third, to the count or declaration.

Fourth, to the writ: first, to the form of the writ,—first, matter apparent on the face of it, secondly, matters dehors; second, to the action of the writ.

Fifth, to the action itself in bar.

This is said to be the natural order of pleading, because each subsequent plea admits that there is no foundation for the former; 13 La. An. 147; 41 Me. 102; 7 Gray 38; 5 R. I. 235; 2 Bosw. 267; 1 Grant, Pa. 359; 4 Jones, N. C. 241; 20 Miss. 656. See 16 Tex. 114; 4 Ia. 158. An exception exists where matter is pleaded puis darrein continuance; see PLEA; and where the subject-matter is one over which the court has no jurisdiction, a failure to plead to the puis cannot confer jurisdiction; 10 S. & R. 229; 17 Tex. 52.

The science of pleading, as it existed at common law, has been much modified by statutory changes; but, under whatever names it is done,—whether under rules of court, or of the legislative power, by the parties, the court, or the jury,—it is evident that, in the nature of things, the end of pleading must be attained, namely, the production of one or more points of issue, where a single fact is affirmed by one party and denied by the other. By pleading at the common law, this was done by the parties; in the civil law, by the court.

In England, pleadings in actions are now governed by the provisions of the Judicature Act, ord. xix., which made a number of changes in the old common-law methods. See Wharton, Dict.; JUDICATURE ACTS.

Up to judgment pleadings are construed most strongly against the pleader, and unknown, unrecited facts are not assumed in his favor; 45 La. Ann. 935. See 45 Mo. App. 519; 84 Ky. 330; 17 Or. 308; 79 Ga. 315.

In Criminal Practice the rules of pleading are the same as in civil practice. There is, however, less liberty of amendment of the indictment. The order of the defendant's pleading is as follows:—first, to the jurisdiction; second, in abatement; third, special pleas in bar: as, autrefois acquit, autrefois attaint, autrefois convict, pardon; fourth, the general issue.

PLEADING, SPECIAL. By special pleading is meant the allegation of special or new matter, as distinguished from a direct denial of matter previously alleged on the opposite side. Gould, Pl. c. 1, s. 18. See SPECIAL PLEADING.

PLEADINGS. In Chancery Practice. The written allegations of the respective parties in the suit. The pleadings in equity are less formal than those at common law.

The parts of the pleadings are—the bill, which contains the plaintiff's statement of his case, or information, where the suit is brought by a public officer in behalf of the sovereign; the demurrer, by which the defendant demands judgment of the court, whether he shall be compelled to answer the bill or not; the plea, whereby he shows some cause why the suit should be dismissed or barred; the answer, which, controverting the case stated by the bill, confesses and avoids it; or traverses and denies the material allegations in the bill, or, admitting the case made by the bill, submits to the judgment of the court upon it, or relies upon a new case or upon new matter stated in the answer, or upon both; disclaimer, which seeks at once a termination of the suit by the defendants, disclaiming all right and interest in the matter sought by the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. § 546; Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jer. 13, 106; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 108; 2 Sto. 59.

In Civil Practice. The statements of the parties, in legal and proper manner, of the causes of action and grounds of defence. The result of pleading. They were formerly made by the parties or their counsel, orally, in open court, under the control of the judge. They were then called the parole; 3 Bla. Com. 293; 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law 267.

The parts of the pleadings may be arranged under two heads: the regular, which occur in the ordinary course of a suit; and the irregular or collateral, which are occasioned by errors in the pleadings on the other side.

The regular parts are—the declaration or count; the plea, which is either to the jurisdiction of the court, or suspending the action, as in the case of a parol demurrer, or in abatement, or in bar of the action, or in replevin, an avowry or cognizance; the replication, and, in case of an evasive plea, a new assignment, or, in replevin, the plea in bar to the avowry or cognizance; the rejoinder, or, in replevin, the replication to the plea in bar; the sur-rejoinder, being in replevin the rejoinder; the rebutter; the sur-rebutter; Viner, Abr. Pleas and Pleading (C); Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (A); pleas puis darrein continuance, when the matter of defence arises pending the suit.

The irregular or collateral parts of pleading are stated to be—demurrers to any part of the pleadings above mentioned; demurrers to evidence given at trials; bills of exceptions; pleas in scire facias; and pleas in error. Viner, Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (C).

In Admiralty, the proceedings might go on, by turns, as long as the mode of pleadings require it. The successive pleadings, after the replication, were called duplication, triplication, and quadruplication, and so on; but they are now obsolete; Bened. Adm. § 482.

In Criminal Practice, the pleadings are—first, the indictment; second, the plea; and the other pleadings as in civil practice.

PLEAS OF THE CROWN. In English Law. A phrase now employed to signify criminal causes in which the king is a party. Formerly it signified royal causes for offences of a greater magnitude than mere misdemeanors. Pleas of the crown, were so called because the sovereign is supposed by law to be the person injured by every wrong, done to the community. Blackstone vol. 4, p. 2.

These were left to be tried in the courts of the barons; whereas the greater offences, or royal causes, were to be tried in the king's courts, under the appellation of pleas of the crown. 1 Robertson, Hist. Charles V. 48.

PLEAS ROLL. In English Practice. A record which contains the declaration, plea, replication, rejoinder, and other pleadings, and the issue. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 29, p. 111.

PLEBEIAN. One who is classed among the common people, as distinguished from the nobles.

PLEBISCITUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. A law established by the people (plebs), on the proposal of a popular magistrate, as a tribune. Vicat. Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.; Mackeldey, Civ. Law §§ 27, 87. The term is used in France to express a popular vote (plébiscite).

PLEDGE. A bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement.

The word is also applied to the res or personal property forming the subject-matter of the bailment. Pawn was synonymous with pledge at common law, but modern usage tends to restrict these words to the bailment of tangible chattels for money advanced, and has introduced the term collateral security, or simply collateral, to designate the subject-matter of a pledge given as security for an engagement other than a simple borrowing of money, and particularly when the subject-matter consists of incorporeal chattels such as stocks, bonds, or choses in action.

A pledge or pawn (Lat. pignus), according to Story, is a bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement; Story, Bailm. § 286; which see for the less comprehensive definitions of Sir Wm. Jones, Lord Holt, Pothier, etc. Domat broadly defines it as an appropriation of the thing given for the security of an engagement. But the term is commonly used as Sir Wm. Jones defines it: to wit, as a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept till the debt is discharged. Jones, Bailm. 117; 2 Ld. Raym. 909; Pothier, De Naut. art. prelim. 1; Code Civ. 2071; Domat b. 3, tit. 1, § 1; La. Civ. Code 3100; 6 Ired. 309. The pledgee secures his debt by the bailment, and the pledgor obtains credit or other advantage. See 1 Pars. Contr. 591.

In Louisiana there are two kinds of pledges: the pawn and the antichresis. The former relates to movable securities, and the latter to immovables. If a creditor have not a right to enter on the land and reap the fruits, the security is not an antichresis; 3 La. 157. A pledge of negotiable paper is not valid against third parties without transfer from debtor to creditor; 2 La. 387; 96 U. S. 467, 496.

Pledge is distinguished from mortgage because the essential feature of pledge is transfer of possession, while the essential feature of mortgage is transfer of title; 96 U. S. 467 (see MORTGAGE). The same distinction exists at the civil law between pignus and hypotheca; Story, Bailm. § 286. In modern transactions title is often transferred under a pledge, but this arises from the nature of the collateral security, and is not a necessity of the relation. In a mortgage, at common law, the property on non-payment of the debt passes wholly to the mortgagee. In a pledge, the property is sold, and only so much of the proceeds as will pay his debt passes to the pledgee. A mortgage is a conditional conveyance of property, which becomes absolute unless redeemed at a specified time. A pledge is not strictly a conveyance at all, nor need any day of redemption be appointed for it. A mortgagee can sell and deliver the thing mortgaged, subject only to the right of redemption. A pledgee cannot sell and deliver the thing pledged until the debt is due and payment denied (though he can assign his contract, and with it the collateral security, or pledge).

Whether a particular contract be held a pledge or a mortgage is often a question of importance, and the courts hold it to be whichever seems best to effectuate the intention of the parties without regard to the language employed; 9 Wend. 80; 47 Minn. 437; 8 So. Dak. 570; leaning, however, to pledge rather than mortgage as ordinarily more favorable to the debtor; 3 Tex. 119; 2 Cow. 324.

Subject of pledge. Any personal property capable of delivery or transfer may be pledged, except for the peculiar rules of maritime law which are applicable to shipping, and except, also, that on the ground of public policy the common law (apart from statutory prohibitions which are frequent) does not permit the pay and emoluments of officers and soldiers to be pledged; 1 H. Bla. 627; 4 Term 248. Hence, probably, a fishing bounty could not be pledged, nor any form of government pension or bounty given for the personal benefit of the donee.

Not only goods and chattels and money, but also negotiable paper, may be put in pledge; 3 Pa. 381; 25 Minn. 202; 82 Ill. 584; 22 Gratt. 262. So may choses in action, patent rights, coupon bonds, and manuscripts of various sorts; 2 Taunt. 268; 15 Mass. 389, 534; 2 Blackf. 198; 7 Me. 28; 4 Den. 227; 2 N. Y. 443; 1 Stockt. 667. So may bonds secured by a mortgage on personal property and corporate franchises; 50 N. H. 57; and coupon bonds; 104 U. S. 505; 9 N. J. Eq. 667; and chattel mortgages of every description; and policies of life insurance; 4 Colo. 138; 13 Fed. Rep. 803. Even a lease may be taken in pledge; 8 Cal. 145; L. R. 10 Eq. 92; for leases are but chattels real; or a mortgage of real estate, which, before foreclosure, is now to be ranked with personal property; 9 Bosw. 322. Incorporeal things could be pledged immediately probably, under the civil law, and so in the Scotch law, or, at all events, by assignment; 1 Domat b. 3, tit. 1, § 1; Pothier, de Naut. n. 6; 2 Bell, Com. 23. In the civil law, property of which the pledgor had neither present possession nor title could be pledged,—though this was rather a contract for pledge, called a hypothecation. The pledge became complete when the property was acquired by the pledgor. The same rule holds in our law, where a hypothecary contract gives a lien which attaches when the property is vested; 1 Hare 549; 13 Pick. 175; 54 N. Y. 18; 21 Me. 86; 16 Conn. 276; 60 id. 463; Daveis 199. And it has been held that a pledge may be made to secure an obligation not yet risen into existence; 12 La. An. 529. In an agreement to pledge a vessel not then completed, the intent of the parties governs in determining when the property passes; 8 Pick. 236; 24 E. L. & E. 220.

Buying and selling through a broker on deposit of a "margin" with him is held in New York to create the relation of pledgor and pledgee; so that, on the pledgor's failure to keep his "margin" good, the pledgee or broker cannot sell the stock, except upon the pledge formalities, for repayment of his advances and commissions; 41 N. Y. 235; and the rule has been adopted in other states; 119 Ill. 554; 68 Conn. 198.

Delivery of possession is essential to a pledge. Unless the pledgee take and retain possession there is no pledge; 96 U. S. 467; 133 id. 243; 37 Me. 543; 167 Mass. 322; 86 Md. 392; 30 W. Va. 586; 48 La. Ann. 488. If possession be given to a third person for the pledgee such person must know of the trust and accept the obligation it imposes; 46 La. Ann. 1036. But a constructive delivery is all that is required, that is, such delivery as the nature or situation of the goods admits. Hence goods in transit or in store will pass by transfer of the bill of lading or warehouse receipt; 8 How. U. S. 384; 86 Ky. 176; 132 N. Y. 41; 133 Mass. 154; 13 Wash. 645; 29 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 752; 44 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 572. A change of the location of bulky articles is not in all cases necessary, but it is sufficient if the best means available to give notice of the change of possession are made use of; 147 Pa. 49; such as posting signs on, or marking, the goods; 17 Nev. 401; or appointing an agent to take charge, which agent may be an employe of the pledgor; 12 Pick. 76; 24 Minn. 423. Delivery of a larger quantity than the amount pledged with the right in pledgee to select the pledge, is good; 14 Pick. 497; 2 Gray 195; 2 N. Y. 258; and so where the pledgee is put and kept in possession of a quantity in excess of the pledged amount, allowing the pledgor to add to, or subtract from, the mass, but maintaining the quantity of the pledge, the pledge is good; 81 Fed. Rep. 439. But there cannot be a valid pledge of a portion of a mass, there being no segregation, and the pledgor retaining the whole; 15 Pa. 618; 63 Me. 459. When goods are in the hands of an agent of the pledgor an order on him to hold for the use of the pledgee, accepted by him, constitutes a delivery; 42 W. Va. 156.

In the case of commercial paper, stocks, bonds, and securities, which together constitute by far the most important division of pledges, or collateral securities, and of choses in action, delivery of possession is essential, but to make the delivery effective assignment is necessary, and assignment is transfer of title. As both title and possession are transferred, the distinction between mortgage and pledge ceases to be of much practical importance—the title to the collateral depends not on the principal obligation, but on the mode of transfer; 65 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 643. But there is a distinction between the position of the pledgee in relation to the pledgor and in relation to third persons. His position cannot be described as simply that of a trustee, because he holds the collateral primarily for his own benefit, which affects his relation to the pledge; 174 Pa. 529. So far as the pledgor is concerned the question of the title of the pledgee is determined by the intention of the parties; as to third parties he is practically owner. Thus a pledgee of stock may transfer it to his own name; 82 Tex. 368; though this is not necessary; 43 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 896; and so far as the corporation is concerned he is the owner of it; 149 Pa. 363. The legal title to a pledged note or chose in action is in him; 36 Fla. 619; 96 Ga. 445; 39 So. West. Rep. (Tex.) 1002. He occupies the position of a bona fide holder for value, except when the pledge is for an existing debt; 112 Ala. 228; and though an assignee of a pledgee have notice of equities, he is not bound by them if his assignor, the pledgee, had not; 75 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 433. His title to an accommodation note is good, notwithstanding equities between maker and payee; 15 S. E. Rep. (So. Car.) 430; and he has the rights of a bona fide holder against the corporation, when the collateral is a certificate of stock which proves to have been fraudulently issued; 137 N. Y. 231. See STOCK.

He is bound by anything which should amount to notice that the pledgor is without authority to pledge; 131 N. Y. 595; 185 Pa. 476; 5 Wash. 792; 99 Ala. 130; 52 Fed. Rep. 513; 20 Can. S. C. R. 481. But in dealing with one in possession of the securities and having the apparent right to dispose of them he will be protected, though the pledge be a fraud on the real owner; 113 Ala. 372. Of course if the true owner has been deprived of possession by what amounts to embezzlement he can recover from the pledgee; 168 Mass. 573. And a pledgee from one who has no authority either to sell or pledge acquires no lien on the property as against the true owner; 28 So. East. Rep. (W. Va.) 740. As holder of a note to which there is a valid defence against the payee he is protected, but only to the extent of his interest, i. e. to the amount which he has advanced; 88 Tex. 653. See 41 Neb. 754.

Factors and Agents. A factor cannot, at common law, pledge his principal's goods; and the principal may recover them from the pledgee's hands; 6 Maule & S. 1; 2 Br. & B. 639; 4 B. & C. 5; [1893] 1 Q. B. 62; 1 M'Cord 1; 6 Metc. 68; 20 Johns. 421; 4 Hen. & M. 432; 18 Mo. 147, 191; 11 How. 209, 226; 52 Fed. Rep. 513; and this is so whether entrusted with the goods themselves or with the symbol of them, as a bill of lading; 120 U. S. 20. But the Factors' Acts in England, to remedy the intolerable condition which would exist if an unknown owner were permitted to repudiate transactions of a factor have enacted that a pledge by a factor having a power of sale shall be valid. Similar acts have been passed in many of the States. See AGENTS; FACTOR; FACTORS' ACTS.

Co-Pledgees. A pledgee may hold a pledge for another pledgee also, and it will be a good pledge to both; 43 La. Ann. 1049. If the pledge be not large enough for both debts after sale, and no other arrangement be made, the prior pledgee will have the whole of his debt paid before any part of the proceeds is applied to the subsequent pledge. If there is no priority of time, they will divide ratably. But an agreement between the parties will always determine the right of two or more pledgees; 12 Mass. 321. Where possession is given to one of three pledgees, to hold for all three the other two have a constructive possession, which is equally good, for the purpose of sharing, with an actual possession. Hence the mere manual possession of one pledge will not give a right to discharge the whole debt of the holder and a part only of that of his co-pledgee's. So, by the rule of constructive possession, if the holder should lose the pledge by his own negligence, he would be liable to his co-bailees out of actual possession, as well as to his bailor.

Substituted collateral is held on the same terms as that originally pledged, the surrender of that given up being sufficient consideration for the new deposit; 143 Ill. 598; 132 Mo. 492; 67 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 469. Collateral deposited on a demand by the pledgee for additional "margin" would probably be held to be security given for an existing debt. The point does not appear to have been decided. When the pledgee changes the form of the collateral he continues to hold under the terms of the pledge, e. g. where he forecloses a mortgage and buys in the land; 87 Ga. 389. See 114 Cal. 126; 124 Mass. 242; 86 N. Y. 176; 159 Ill. 416.

Other debts. A pledge cannot, in general, be held for any other debt than that which it was given to secure, except on the special agreement and consent of the parties; 6 Ves. 226; 88 Tex. 545; 153 N. Y. 490; 154 Mass. 359; 33 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 870. (The civil and Scotch law are otherwise; 2 Bell, Com. 22.) Unless the intention is clear to the contrary it will be held that this special agreement applies only to subsequent debts; 77 Ind. 423; 52 N. J. Eq. 188; and the court was equally divided where a custom of brokers was set up to justify the application to existing debts; 94 Va. 686. Where a judgment has been paid the parties may lawfully agree that it shall remain as collateral for a new loan made, or to be made; 161 Pa. 469. After his debt is paid the pledgee may continue to hold the pledge as security for another creditor; 47 La. Ann. 800.

The renewal of the note or obligation of pledge does not affect the pledgee's rights in regard to the collaterals, it is a mere prolongation of the original contract; 10 U. S. App. 415; Colebrooke, Collat. Secur. § 14.

Assignment by the pledgee is valid, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, and carries with it all the collaterals pledged as security. The pledgor is not injured thereby, his right to redeem remaining unimpaired; 99 Mich. 121; 43 Neb. 489; 19 Colo. 149. The pledgor may sell or transfer his right to a third party, who may bring trover against the pledgee if the latter, after tender of the amount of the debt, refuse to deliver the pledge; 9 Cow. 52; 13 M. & W. 480; L. R. 1 Q. B. 585; 73 Pa. 153; 78 Ill. 449.

Conversion. If the pledgee assign the debt without the collateral he loses his lien on the latter, and the pledgor can recover it. If he assign the collateral, except by exercising whatever right of sale he has under the pledge, he is liable to the pledgor, who has an immediate right of action, without tendering the amount due, for the conversion, though the defendant can offset the debt due him; 69 Hun 311. If he hold negotiable paper he has no right to sell it, but should wait until its maturity and then collect it; 25 Minn. 202; 82 Ill. 584; 22 Grat. 262; 16 N. Y. 392; but a court may under certain circumstances order a judicial sale of it; 57 Minn. 341. See 164 Pa. 95; 89 Wis. 444; 55 N. J. L. 296; 79 Md. 41. Treating the pledge as his own property in disregard of his obligation to the pledgor is, of course, a conversion; 41 N. Y. Sup. 451.

Shares of stock have no individuality, no earmarks. The certificates are merely evidence of ownership, muniments of title, like title deeds. Therefore a pledgee of stocks need not preserve a careful separation of certificates connected with each transaction, but complies with his obligation by holding at all times a sufficient number of shares to answer the pledge when called on; 11 Fed. Rep. 115; 82 Tex. 368. The right to re-pledge for his own debt was not enjoyed by a common-law pledgee, but where a custom of brokers justifies re-pledging securities of customers it is not unlawful; 68 Conn. 198; [1893] 2 Ch. Div. 120. No usage will justify such re-pledging of the collateral as to put it out of the power of the pledgee to return it on payment of his debt; that would be to destroy the contract; 78 Md. 475. If a broker re-hypothecate for a larger amount than the pledgor's debt to him, for his own benefit, he is guilty of conversion; 17 App. Div. (N. Y.) 329. See, as to pledgees of shares, 12 L. R. A. 781.

Re-delivery to pledgee. Possession is of the very essence of the pledge, and if possession be re-delivered by the pledgee, or with his consent, without more, the pledge is extinguished. The exceptions to the rule are where the pledgor holds as the pledgee's agent, or where the pledge is re-delivered for a temporary purpose only, e. g. for sale, or for collection or suit by the pledgor; 96 U. S. 478; 127 id. 532; [1895] App. Cas. 56; 47 La. Ann. 742; 42 So. West. Rep. (Tenn.) 698; 60 Mo. App. 83; 53 Minn. 327. Such possession by the pledgor will not defeat the pledge.

Property. The pledgee has at common law a special property in the pledge, and is entitled to the exclusive possession of it during the time and for the objects for which it is pledged. If a wrong-doer take the pledge from him, he is not thereby ousted from his right. His special property is enough for him to support replevin or trover against the wrong-doer. He has, moreover, a right of action, because he is responsible to his pledgor for proper custody of the bailment. The pledgor, also, may have his action against the wrongdoer resting it on the ground of his general property. A judgment for either pledgor or pledgee is a bar against a similar action by the other; 2 Bla. Com. 395; 1 B. & Ald. 59; 5 Binn. 457. See 15 Conn. 302; 9 Gill 7; 13 Me. 436; 13 Vt. 504.

The pledgee may bring replevin or trover against the pledgor if the latter remove the pledge before paying the debt and thus injure the pledgee's rights, on the ground that the owner has parted with his absolute right of disposing of the chattel until he has redeemed it from its state of pledge; 2 Taunt. 268; 1 Sandf. 208; 22 N. H. 196; 11 N. Y. 150; 2 M'Cord 126. He recovers only the value of his special property as against the pledgor, or one who derives title from him; 4 Barb. 491; 13 Ill. 465; but the value of the whole property as against a stranger, and the balance beyond the special property, he holds for the owner; 15 Conn. 302. So if the owner brings the action and recovers the whole damages, including those for deprivation of possession, it must be with the consent of the pledgee.

A creditor of the pledgor can only take his interest, and must pay the debt before securing the pledge. It is now settled that the pledgor's general property in the pledge may be sold on execution, and the purchaser or assignee of the pledgor succeeds to the pledgor's rights and may himself redeem. At common law, a pledge could not be taken in execution; 1 Ves. 278; 3 Watts 258; 17 Pick. 85; 1 Gray 254; 27 Md. 354; 21 N. H. 72. On an extent the king takes a pawn on paying the pawnee's debt; 2 Chit. Prerog. 285.

Where securities have been pledged by assignment and delivery it would seem that the property vests in the pledgee, who in suit upon them can recover their full value; 72 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 872. It has been held, however, that the pledgor does not entirely lose his right to protect his interests and can proceed against the maker of notes transferred by him as collateral; 47 La. Ann. 1230; and that when the pledgee refuses to proceed for collection he can proceed in equity against the pledgee and the maker; 21 So. Rep. (Miss.) 970. A bill which discloses that complainant has pledged the stock for which he sues is not demurrable on the ground that it fails to show payment in full of the debt for which the stock was pledged, because a pledgor always has an interest sufficient to enable him to maintain a suit; 77 Fed. Rep. 779. Where a pledgee of securities has wrongfully re-hypothecated them, and the owner secures them by paying the debt for which they were re-hypothecated, a judgment recovered by the pledgor against the original pledgee for the conversion does not vest the title to the securities in the pledgee; 78 Fed. Rep. 216.

Ordinary care. The pledgee is bound to take ordinary care of the pledge, and is liable only for neglect of such care, the bailment being for the mutual benefit of the parties; 41 Minn. 46; 119 N. Y. 263; 99 Cal. 234. Where he is to do work upon the pledge and incur expenditure he must use reasonable diligence to secure the best net results, and account, showing that expenses for which allowance is claimed were reasonable and necessary; 55 Minn. 14; where he is to sell, paying himself out of the proceeds, he will be liable for carelessness in properly keeping the pledge, and for failing to sell until the market has fallen; 52 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 229. If the pledge is lost, and the pledgee has not failed to exercise ordinary care, he may still recover his debt. Such losses often result from casualty, superior force, or intrinsic defect against which a man of ordinary prudence would not have effectually guarded himself. If a pledgor find it necessary to employ an agent, and exercise ordinary care in the selection, he will not be liable for the latter's neglect or misconduct; 1 La. An. 344; 10 B. Monr. 239; 4 Ind. 425; 8 N. H. 66; 6 Cal. 643; 68 N. W. Rep. (So. Dak.) 735. Loss or depreciation in value of the thing pledged, through negligence of the pledgee, does not operate to extinguish pro tanto the debt secured; 41 Minn. 46; but the pledgee is liable to the pledgor for the depreciation in value of the property pledged after a tender of the amount due and a refusal of the pledgee to deliver; 74 Cal. 250.

Loss by theft is prima facie evidence of a want of ordinary care, and the bailee must rebut the presumption. The facts in each case regulate the liability. Theft is only evidence, in short, and not absolute presumption, of negligence. Perhaps the only safe rule is that, where the pledgee pleads loss by theft as ground for not performing his duty, to excuse himself he must show that the theft could not have been prevented by ordinary care on his part. If the bailor should assert in his declaration that the pledge was lost by the bailee's fault, he would be compelled to prove the charge as laid.

The holder of collateral security, by accepting it, binds himself to use reasonable diligence in protecting it; 71 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 113. Thus, by negligently releasing the indorser he becomes chargeable with the amount of a note; 50 Fed. Rep. 798; if he refuse to sue on a note the pledgor may file a bill to have the note collected and credited on the debt; 21 So. Rep. (Miss.) 970; by failure to use due diligence to collect accounts assigned he becomes responsible for the resulting losses; 37 So. Car. 200; he must account for the real value of an insurance policy surrendered to the company for its cash value without notice to the pledgor; 37 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 8. But as assignee of a policy of life insurance he is not obliged to pay premiums unless he has engaged to do so; 72 Hun 194; though authorized to sell collateral in the event of its depreciation he is not bound to do so, nor liable if he fails; 15 App. Div. (N. Y.) 102; by taking notes secured on property he incurs no obligation to sue for the property, and if he does so, at the request of the pledgor, he incurs no obligation to take charge of it, and advance expenses upon it; 97 Tenn. 308; when only required to collect a sufficient sum on a note to pay the debt, and then to turn it over to the pledgor, after collecting such sum, he is not liable for failure to take prompt steps to collect the residue at maturity; 44 So. West. Rep. (Tenn.) 204. But he is responsible as bailee after, as well as before, the maturity of the debt; 49 Neb. 280.

Pledgee's expenses. Whatever reasonable expense is necessarily incurred by the pledgee in keeping and caring for the property pledged, and protecting it against liens and taxes and assessments, and asserting title to it, or rendering it available, is a fair charge against the property pledged; 147 Ill. 570; 173 Pa. 633; 116 Cal. 9; 67 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 837. For any unusual care he may get compensation from the pledgor, if it were not contemplated by the parties or is implied in the nature of the bailment; Ld. Raym. 909; 2 Salk. 522; 1 Pars. Contr. 593.

Use. The reasonable use of a pledge is allowed to a pledgee, according to Lord Holt, Sir Wm. Jones, and Story, provided it be of no injury or peril to the bailment. The reason given by Story is precise, namely, that where use of the pledge is beneficial to it, or cannot depreciate it, the consent of the pledgor to such use may be fairly presumed; but not otherwise. Still, the word peril is somewhat broad. If the pawn be in its nature a charge upon the pawnee,—as a horse or a cow,—he may use it, moderately, by way of recompense. The pawnee is answerable in damages for an injury happening while he is using the pawn. Still, though he use it tortiously, he is only answerable by action. His pledgee's lien is not thereby forfeited; 4 Watts 414. A pledgee can exercise a horse, but not loan it for hire. The rule is, that if he derive any profits from the pledge they must be applied to the debt; 2 Murph. 111. A sewing machine that is pledged cannot be used; 72 Ill. 358.

Redemption. The pledgor may redeem at any time until his right to do so has been foreclosed by judicial decree, or by sale after notice. He has his whole lifetime in which to redeem, and the right survives to his representatives; 3 Mo. 316; 1 Call 290. Failure to pay the debt at maturity works no forfeiture; 10 Utah 3. If the pledgee fail to deliver on tender the pledgor may maintain trover, or if special ground be shown may proceed in equity; 113 Ala. 372.

Remedies of pledgee. The contract of pledge is security for some debt or engagement, that is to say it is a secondary or subordinate contract, and the pledgee may enforce the primary contract, or may proceed upon any one of several collateral securities, or may proceed upon all together, unless restricted by his engagement with the pledgor, though he can have but one satisfaction of the debt. It is a settled principle of equity that a creditor holding collaterals is not bound to apply them before enforcing his direct remedies against the debtor; 92 U. S. 618; 184 Pa. 318; 164 Mass. 318; 27 Abb. N. C. 278; 56 Ark. 105; 76 Fed. Rep. 86; 85 id. (C. C. A.) 536. Even where the pledgee wrongfully claims that he is the owner of the goods, the pledgor cannot recover them without a tender of the debt; 67 L. T. 642; and the levy of an attachment by the pledgee on the pledge in the hands of the pledge-holder is not a waiver of the pledge; 59 Fed. Rep. 249; 34 So. West. Rep (Ky.) 232. But one personal obligation cannot constitute collateral security for another obligation of the same debtor, hence if he hold bonds of a corporation as collateral for its note he cannot, if the pledgor become insolvent, claim both on the notes and the bonds; 3 Wyo. 808; 67 Conn. 324.

Formerly on default the pledgee had no power to realize upon his pledge, in the absence of agreement, except by securing a judicial decree; Glanv. lib. x. c. 6; 5 Bligh N. S. 136; 2 Johns. Ch. 100; 8 Ill. 423; 3 Tex. 119; 22 Pick. 40; 2 N. Y. 443. While this might in some cases still be necessary (see 57 Minn. 341), it is now generally conceded that on default the pledgee may sell after demand for payment and reasonable notice to pledgor. The pledge must be sold at public auction, and if it be divisible, only enough must be sold to pay the debt.

Generally an agreement is entered into when the pledge is made which provides what remedies the pledgee shall have in case of default, and the agreement of the parties will be sustained if not fraudulent or contrary to public policy; 3 Cal. 151; 52 Kan. 195; 49 Neb. 280. Thus the pledgor may waive notice; 133 N. Y. 660; or authorize the pledgee to sell at public or private sale without advertisement or notice, at his discretion; 84 Fed. Rep. 557; but the sale must be in good faith; 80 id. 665. The fact that the price realized was small will not affect the purchaser's title; 56 id. 164. But a merely colorable and pretended sale of the pledged property by the pledgee does not affect the rights of the pledgor as against one not standing in the position of a bona fide purchaser; 41 Minn. 146. The pledgee may in anticipation of default make a valid contract to sell the collateral when the default occurs; 162 Mass. 527. But a stipulation for a forfeiture to pledgee in case of default is void; 84 Hun 496; and a court of equity will scrutinize carefully an agreement for transfer of ownership, and set it aside if it appear to have been obtained under a harsh contract, brought about by the position of vantage occupied by the pledgee; 79 Fed. Rep. 522.

In the absence of an agreement permitting it, the pledgee cannot buy the pledge; 84 Me. 72; 127 U. S. 532; see 81 Fed. Rep.

450; though his purchase is voidable merely, at the election of the pledgor, and not void; 54 Fed. Rep. 759; 85 id. (C. C. A.) 539. But on procuring a decree of foreclosure in a proceeding in equity to which he has made the pledgor a party, he can sell, and buy in, taking an indefeasible title; 145 Ill. 168.

When corporate bonds, pledged to secure claims against the company, are sold at public auction and bought in by the pledgee the latter is entitled to be paid the full value of the bonds, and not merely the amount for which they were pledged; 86 Fed. Rep. 975.

PLEDGEE. One to whom a thing is pledged.

PLEDGES. In Pleading. Those persons who became sureties for the plaintiff's prosecution of the suit. Their names were anciently appended at the foot of the declaration. In time it became purely a formal matter, because the plaintiff was no longer liable to be amerced for a false claim, and the fictitious persons John Doe and Richard Roe became the universal pledges, or they might be omitted altogether; 1 Tidd, Pr. 455; Archb. Civ. Pl. 171; or inserted at any time before judgment; 4 Johns. 90; they are now omitted.

PLEDGOR. The party who makes a pledge.

PLEGII DE RETORNO HABENDO. Pledges to return the subject of distress, should the right be determined against the party bringing the action of replevin. 3 Steph. Com. 422, n.

PLEGIIS ACQUIETANDIS, WRIT DE. The name of an ancient writ in the English law, which lies where a man becomes pledge or surety for another to pay a certain sum of money at a certain day; after the day, if the debtor does not pay the debt, and the surety be compelled to pay, he shall have this writ to compel the debtor to pay the same. Fitzh. N. B. 321.

PLENA FORISFACTURA. See FORISFACTURA.

PLENA PROBATIO. In Civil Law. A term used to signify full proof, in contradistinction to semi-plena probatio, which is not merely a suspicion, but such evidence as produces a reasonable belief though not complete evidence. Tait, Ev. 273; Code 4. 19. 5. etc.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 119.

PLENARTY. In Ecclesiastical Law. Signifies that a benefice is full. See AVOIDANCE.

PLENARY. Full; complete.

In the courts of admiralty, and in the English ecclesiastical courts, causes or suits in respect of the different course of proceedings in each are termed plenary or summary. Plenary, or full and formal, suits are those in which the proceedings must be full and formal; the term summary is applied to those causes where the proceedings are more succinct and less formal. 2 Chitty, Pr. 481.

PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT (Lat. he has fully administered). In Pleading. A plea in bar entered by an executor or administrator, by which he affirms that he had not in his possession at the time of the commencement of the suit, nor has had any time since, any goods of the deceased to be administered; when the plaintiff replies that the defendant had goods, etc., in his possession at that time, and the parties join issue, the burden of the proof will be on the plaintiff. See 15 Johns. 323; 1 B. & Ald. 254; 11 Viner, Abr. 349; 12 id. 185; 3 Saund. (a) 315, n. 1; 6 Com. Dig. 311.

PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT PRÆTER (Lat. he has fully administered except). In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant executor or administrator admits that there is a residue remaining in his hands unadministered.

PLENE COMPUTAVIT (Lat. he has fully accounted). In Pleading. A plea in an action of account render, by which the defendant avers that he has fully accounted. Bac. Abr. Accompt (E). This plea does not admit the liability of the defendant to account. 15 S. & R. 153.

PLENIPOTENTIARY. Possessing full powers: as, a minister plenipotentiary is one authorized fully to settle the matters connected with his mission, subject, however, to the ratification of the government by which he is authorized. See MINISTER.

PLENUM DOMINIUM (Lat.). The unlimited right which the owner has to use his property as he deems proper, without accountability to any one.

PLIGHT. An old English word, used sometimes for the estate with the habit and quality of the land. Co. Litt. 221. It extends to a rent-charge and to a possibility of dower. Id.; 1 Rolle, Abr. 447; Littl. § 289.

PLOUGH ALMS. The ancient payment of a penny to the church from every plough land. 1 Mon. Aug. 256.

PLOUGH-BOTE. An allowance made to a rural tenant of wood sufficient for ploughs, harrows, carts, and other instruments of husbandry.

PLOUGH-LAND. In Old English Law. An uncertain quantity of land. According to some opinions, it contains one hundred and twenty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a.

PLOUGH SILVER. Money formerly paid by some tenants in lieu of service to plough the lord's land.

PLUNDER. The capture of personal property on land by a public enemy, with a view of making it his own. The property so captured is called plunder. See, for a full discussion of the subject, 8 Fed. Rep. 246; 16 Pick. 9; CAPTURE; BOOTY; PRIZE.

PLUNDERAGE. In Maritime Law. The embezzlement of goods on board of a ship.

The rule of the maritime law in such cases is that the whole crew shall be responsible for the property thus embezzled, because there must be some negligence in finding out the depredator; Abb. Ship. 457; 3 Johns. 17; 1 Pet. Adm. 200, 239; 4 B. & P. 347.

PLURIS PETITIO. In Scotch Law. A demand of more than is due. Bell, Dict.

PLURIES (Lat. many times). A writ issued subsequently to a first and second (alias) of the same kind, which have proved ineffectual. The name is given to it from the word pluries in the Latin form of the writ: "We command you, as we have often (pluries) commanded you before," which distinguishes it from those which have gone before. Pluries is variously translated, in the modern forms of writs, by "formerly," "more than once," "often." The next writ to the pluries is called the second pluries; and so on. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 283; App. 15; Nat. Brev. 33.

PLEVIN. A warrant, or assurance.

PLY. A hackney carriage plies for hire if it solicits passengers in a railway station. L. R. 6 Q. B. 351.

POACHING. Unlawfully entering land in night-time, armed, with intent to destroy game. 1 Russ. Crimes 469; 2 Steph. Comm. 11th ed. 20. This offence is punished in England by imprisonment for any period not exceeding three months with hard labor, and at the expiration of such period the party convicted is to be bound over by sureties for good behavior for one year, or in default thereof to be imprisoned for a further period of six months, or until such sureties be found. For a second offence, the offender is liable to an imprisonment of six months and then to be bound in sureties for two years. And for a third, he is guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to penal servitude or imprisonment at hard labor for not more than two years. By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, power is given to any constable in the highway to search any person he may have good cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been unlawfully in search of game and to seize such game and to apply to some justice for a summons citing the offender to appear before two justices, by whom the party may, on conviction, be fined. See GAME LAWS.

POCKET JUDGMENT. A statute-merchant which was enforceable at any time after non-payment on the day assigned, without further proceedings.

POCKET SHERIFF. In English Law. A sheriff appointed by sole authority of the crown, not being one of the three nominated by the judges in the exchequer. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 342.

PŒNA CORPORALIS. Corporal punishment.

PŒNA PILLORALIS. Punishment of the pillory. Fleta, lib. 1, ch. 38, § 11.

POINDING. In Scotch Law. That diligence (process) affecting movable subjects by which their property is carried directly to the creditor. Poinding is real or personal. Erskine, Inst. 3. 6. 11.

POINDING, PERSONAL. Poinding of the goods belonging to the debtor, and of those goods only.

It may have for its warrant either letters of horning, containing a clause for poinding, and then it is executed by messengers: or precepts of poinding, granted by sheriffs, commissaries, etc., which are executed by their proper officers. Erskine, Inst. 3. 6. 11. This process is somewhat similar to distress.

POINDING, REAL. POINDING OF THE GROUND. Though it be properly a diligence, this is generally considered by lawyers as a species of real action, and is so called to distinguish it from personal poinding, which is founded merely on an obligation to pay.

Every debitum fundi, whether legal or conventional, is a foundation for this action. It is, therefore, competent to all creditors in debts which make a real burden on lands. As it proceeds on a real right, it may be directed against all goods that can be found on the lands burdened; but goods brought upon the ground by strangers are not subject to this diligence. Even the goods of a tenant cannot be poinded for more than his term's rent. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 3.

POINT. In Practice. A proposition or question arising in a case.

It is the duty of a judge to charge the jury on every point of law properly arising out of the issue which is propounded to him by counsel. But where the conclusion of a point does not necessarily flow from the premise contained in the first part of it, it is not error for the court to refuse to affirm it; 182 Pa. 427.

POINT RESERVED. A point or question of law, which the court, not being fully satisfied how to decide, in the trial of a cause, rules in favor of the plaintiff, but subject to revision on a motion for a new trial. If, after argument, it be found to have been ruled correctly, the verdict is supported; if otherwise, it is set aside. Tr. & H. Pr. § 708. It must be a pure question of law; the facts on which it is based must appear on the record, distinctly stated; and it must be a point which is decisive of the case. The verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant then moves for a new trial and judgment non obstante veredicto. See NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

POINTS. Marks in writing and in print, to denote the stops that ought to be made in reading, and to point out the sense.

Points are not usually put in legislative acts or in deeds; Eunom. Dial. 2, § 33, p. 239; yet in construing such acts or instruments, the courts must read them with such stops as will give effect to the whole; 4 Term 65.

The points are—the comma, the semicolon, the colon, the full point, the point of interrogation, and the point of exclamation. Barrington, Stat. 294, n. See PUNCTUATION.

Statements of fact and of the law applicable thereto submitted to a trial judge with a request that he so charge the jury. See BRIEF; PAPER BOOK; CHARGE; INSTRUCTION.

POISON. In Medical Jurisprudence. A substance of definite chemical composition, which, when taken into the living organism, is capable of causing impairment or cessation of function. Blyth, Poisons.

The history of poisoning, and many remarkable early instances of a wide-spread use of poisons, are recorded in works on medical jurisprudence. See these, and also, especially, Taylor, Poisons; Archb. Cr. Pract. Waterman's ed. 940; Whart. & Stillé, Med. Jur.; 1 Beekman, Hist. Jur. 74. The classification proposed by Mr. Taylor (Med. Jur. § 71, 74, 78) is as follows:—

IRRITANTS.
- MINERAL
  - NON-METALLIC (Acids, Alkalies and their Salts. Metalloids.)
  - METALLIC (Arsenic).
- VEGETABLE—Croton Oil.
- ANIMAL (Cantharides).

NARCOTICS.
- CEREBRAL (Morphia).
- SPINAL (Strychnia).
- CEREBRO-SPINAL (Conia, Aconitina).

GASEOUS. (Carbon Monoxide, Chlorine).

Irritant poisons, when taken in ordinary doses, occasion speedily violent vomiting and purging, preceded, accompanied, or followed by intense pain in the abdomen, commencing in the region of the stomach. The corrosive poisons, as distinguished from those in a more limited sense termed irritant, generally produce their results more speedily, and give chemical indications; but every corrosive poison acts as an irritant in the sense here adopted.

Narcotic poisons act chiefly on the brain or spinal marrow. Either immediately or some time after the poison has been swallowed, the patient suffers from headache, giddiness, paralysis, stupor, delirium, insensibility, and, in some instances, convulsions.

The effects of one class are, however, sometimes produced by the other,—more commonly as secondary, but sometimes even as primary symptoms.

The evidence of poisoning as derived from symptoms is to be looked for chiefly in the suddenness of their occurrence; this is perhaps the most reliable of all evidence derived from symptoms in cases of criminal poisoning; see Taylor, Pois. 107; Christison, Pois. 42; though none of this class of evidence can be considered as furnishing anything better than a high degree of probability: the regularity of their increase; this feature is not universal, and exists in many diseases; uniformity in their nature; this is true in the case of comparatively few poisons; the symptoms begin soon after a meal; but sleep, the manner of administration, or certain diseases, may affect this rule in the case of some poisons; when several partake at the same time of the same poisoned food, all suffer from similar symptoms; 2 Park. C. C. 235; Taylor, Pois. 118; the symptoms first appearing while the body is in a state of perfect health; Archb. Cr. Pl. Waterman ed. 948.

Appearances which present themselves on post-mortem examinations are of importance in regard to some classes of irritant poisons; see The Hersey Case, Mass. 1861; Palmer's Case, Taylor, Poisons 697; 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 145; but many poisons leave no traces which can be so discovered.

Chemical analysis often results in important evidence, by discovering the presence of poison, which must then be accounted for; but a failure to detect it by no means proves that it has not been given. Christison, Poisons 61, 62.

The evidence derived from circumstances differs in nothing in principle from that in case of commission of other crimes.

Homicide by poisoning is generally either accidental, so as not to amount to murder, or deliberate: yet it has been held that there may be a verdict of murder in the second degree under an indictment for poisoning; 19 Conn. 388. The doctrine of principal and accessory is also modified to some extent in its application to cases of poisoning; 2 Mood. Cr. Cas. 120; 9 C. & P. 356; 9 Co. 81. To constitute an administering of poison, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by hand; 4 C. & P. 356; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 651.

Intent to kill need not be specifically alleged in an indictment for murder by poison; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 346; 3 Cox, C. C. 300; 8 C. & P. 418; 2 Allen 173. Where a wholesale dealer supplied a poisonous drug in place of a harmless drug ordered, he was held liable in damages to the customer who bought it from the retailer and suffered injury from taking it; 6 N. Y. 397.

Many of the states have statutes inflicting severe penalties upon the administering of poisons with a malicious intent. See Archb. Cr. Pr. Waterman's ed. 942; 86 Va. 223.

Practicing physicians, who are graduates of a medical college, are competent to testify as experts on the subject of arsenical poisoning, although it is not shown that they have had actual experience in poison cases; 143 Ill. 571.

POLE. A measure of length, equal to five yards and a half. See MEASURE.

POLES. The extended use of poles on highways in connection with electric railways, telegraph, and telephone companies, has raised many interesting questions in connection with the right to erect and maintain them and the relation thereto of abutting owners and municipal corporations. The erection of such poles in a street or on the sidewalk is an obstruction of the highway, and, like all other obstructions, is only justified when done under authority of law; 31 Hun 596; Keasbey, Electric Wires. Where authorized, they must be erected in such manner as to cause the least interference with public travel and this condition is implied even if it were not expressed in the authority given; id.; in a proper case it is left to the jury to determine the question of damage; 15 N. J. L. J. 50; 33 Fed. Rep. 320; see 77 Wis. 589; but the rule of reasonable care does not require the company to provide against all contingencies of accident or inconvenience; 36 Fed. Rep. 164. It has been justly said that the question of damage arising from the obstruction of a highway by poles, depends largely on the extent of the right of the public which is under the control of the legislature, and subject to the exercise of its discretion in legalizing new uses of the highway; Keasbey, Electric Wires 157.

The question most discussed with respect to poles, has been whether their erection is a legitimate use of the street, and whether it imposes a new servitude on the land of the abutting owner. A recent writer holds the view that the substitution of electricity for horse power is not a change of use; Keasbey, Electric Wires 106; but a different view was taken by the New Jersey supreme court; 15 N. J. L. J. 39, 45.

Poles have been permitted to stand as being a proper use of the street; 3 Ohio C. C. 425; 22 Wkly. L. Bul. 67; 16 R. I. 668; 85 Mich. 634; 47 id. 393; 47 N. J. Eq. 280; 59 N. J. L. 101; 139 Pa. 419; 84 Mich. 634.

The conclusion reached from a detailed examination of the cases by Mr. Keasbey in his work on the subject, is that whilst an electric railway may have some additional elements of damage and obstruction, possibly the solution of the difficulty is to be found in the suggestion of Campbell, C. J., in the case last cited, that compensation should be recoverable for damage actually sustained. In that case poles and wires prevented the extinguishment of a fire, but it was held that the company owning them was not liable to one who had erected buildings alongside of them and permitted a tenant to use one of the wires and had never made any objection to them. The poles are held to be an additional servitude on country roads; 86 Va. 696; 71 Hun 532; 107 Ill. 507; and on a street where the fee was in the abutting owner and there were direct and immediate injuries suffered; 74 Md. 36. In Minnesota the court was evenly divided on the subject; 37 Minn. 347; and in Massachusetts even the owner of the fee was held entitled to no compensation; 136 Mass. 75.

Where the right to erect poles is recognized, the courts will regulate strictly the manner in which the privilege is used. An injunction has been granted against the erection of broken or unsightly poles; 12 Mo. App. 494; so the poles must be set with as little damage as possible and the cutting off trees to clear the way for them will be a ground for recovering damages; 24 L. R. A. 724; 16 Lea 456; 39 La. Ann. 996. See HIGHWAYS; ELECTRIC LIGHT; WIRES; RAILROADS; LICENSE; TELEGRAPH.

POLICE. That species of superintendence by magistrates which has principally for its object the maintenance of public tranquillity among the citizens. The officers who are appointed for this purpose are also called the police. See 9 Cent. L. J. 353.

The word police has three significations. The first relates to the measures which are adopted to keep order, the laws and ordinances on cleanliness, health, the markets, etc. The second has for its object to procure to the authorities the means of detecting even the smallest attempts to commit crime, in order that the guilty may be arrested before their plans are carried into execution and delivered over to the justice of the country. The third comprehends the laws, ordinances, and other measures which require the citizens to exercise their rights in a particular form.

Police has also been divided into administrative police, which has for its object to maintain constantly public order in every part of the general administration; and judiciary police, which is intended principally to prevent crimes by punishing the criminals. Its object is to punish crimes which the administrative police has not been able to prevent.

See PENSION.

POLICE JURY. In Louisiana. A name given to certain officers who collectively exercise jurisdiction in certain cases of police: as, levying taxes, regulating roads, etc.

POLICE POWER. The powers of government inherent in every sovereignty. 5 How. 583.

The power vested in the legislature to make such laws as they shall judge to be for the good of the commonwealth and its subjects. 7 Cush. 814. It is much easier to realize the instances and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its exercise; id.

The power to govern men and things, extending to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the state. 27 Vt. 149.

The authority to establish such rules and regulations for the conduct of all persons as may be conducive to the public interest. 109 N. C. 279; 117 N. Y. 14.

The exercise of this power has been left with the individual states; 11 Bush 311; 123 U. S. 623; and embraces the whole system of internal regulation by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offences against itself, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens, those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent the conflict of rights and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as it is reasonably consistent with the right enjoyment of rights by others; Cooley, Const. Lim. 572.

Most of the law on this subject has been the growth of the nineteenth century and the latter half of it. The earliest instances of the exercise of this power were found when houses were destroyed to prevent the spread of fire. The right to take a man's property in such cases was called the law of overruling necessity. There are also some very early instances of sanitary legislation. An act of parliament in 1388 imposed a penalty for throwing animal filth or refuse into rivers, and one of 1489 prohibited the slaughtering of cattle in the cities. Laws regulating wharfingers, millers, common carriers, innkeepers, chimney sweeps, auctioneers, ferry-keepers and drovers have been common for many centuries before the term was used.

Among former exercises of the police power which have become obsolete, may be mentioned laws restraining extravagance in dress, punishing heresy, interfering with the worship of particular churches or sects, and restraining speculation, or combinations to control a product and by withholding it, increase the price thereof; Tiedm. Pol. Pow. § 96 a; although in some of the states there are statutory provisions forbidding the cornering of grain, they are repetitions of old laws as to forestalling and engrossing; id.

This right must be clearly distinguished from the administration of criminal law and from police regulations and police authority, nor should it be confused with eminent domain, as has sometimes been done, or with the power of taxation. It is distinct from both of these. It is more despotic and broader in its action than the right of eminent domain, caring for the public health and morals of the community, restraining individuals from interfering with them, and when it is found necessary to take private property under the police power, no compensation need be given the owner unless expressly provided by statute; 7 Cush. 84; 11 Metc. 55; 81 Pa. 80; 101 U. S. 814; 69 Ga. 320; 78 Mo. 107; 17 Fed. Rep. 109; 50 Tex. 614. It is the application of the personal right or principle of self-preservation of the body politic; 13 N. Y. 378; to its exercises there are no limits except the restrictions contained in the written constitution; 1 Thay. Const. L. 720.

The confusion of police power with the power of taxation usually arises in cases where the police power has affixed a penalty for a certain act, or required licenses for certain occupations to be taken out and the sum paid therefor. But this is in no sense taxation, but an attempt to levy a tax which might be open to the constitutional objection to lack of equality. Its admitted right to regulate includes the implied power to license or tax; 12 Wheat. 419; 5 Wall. 462; 92 U. S. 214; 109 id. 3; 113 id. 27; 140 id. 545. See LICENSE.

Each law relating to the police power involves the questions: First, is there a threatened danger? Second, does the regulation involve a constitutional right? Third, is the regulation reasonable? 66 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 882. See 144 N. Y. 529; 145 id. 32.

The rights insured to private corporations by their charters and the manner of their exercises are subject to such new regulations as from time to time may be made by the state, but these regulations must not conflict with the charter, nor take from the corporation any of its essential rights and privileges; Cooley, Const. Lim. 718; 61 Mo. 24; 18 Conn. 53; 35 Wis. 425; 161 U. S. 695. A municipal corporation may regulate the speed of railroad trains within its limits; 67 Ill. 113; 79 Pa. 33 (but only in the streets and public grounds of the municipality; 29 N. J. L. 170); require the railroad to fence its tracks; 27 Vt. 156; regulate the grade of the railroad and prescribe how the railroads may cross each other and apportion expenses of making necessary crossings between the corporations owning the roads; 77 Pa. 173; 4 Allen 198; it may require the railroad company to abolish a grade crossing at its own expense; 151 U. S. 556; to repair and maintain a safe viaduct over a street in a populous city; C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Nebraska, S. C. of U. S., not yet reported; regulate such crossings in a populous city; 170 id. 58; limit the charges by the railroad company; 116 id. 307; prevent extortion on their part by unreasonable charges, favoritism, or discrimination; 128 id. 174; forbid consolidation of competing lines; 161 id. 697; make the company liable for fires; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243; require salaries and expenses of a state commission to be borne by the railroad corporations within the state; 142 U. S. 386; require locomotive engineers to be licensed after examination as to competency; 124 id. 265; and the examination of railroad employes for color blindness; 128 id. 96; regulate the speed of trains at highway and other crossings; 72 Ill. 235; require the bell to be rung or the whistle blown before crossing highways at grade, and flagmen to be stationed at dangerous crossings; 67 Ill. 37; impose a penalty on conductors for failing to cause their trains to stop five minutes at every station; 4 Tex. App. 545; require them to stop at county seats; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627; direct the printing upon railroad tickets of any condition limiting the liability of a railroad company in type of a specified size, and provide for the redemption by the company of tickets sold but not used; 63 Ind. 552.

It may regulate insurance businesses and forbid unjust and oppressive conditions; 164 Pa. 306; and require returns from insurance companies; 153 U. S. 446; direct companies operating electric conductors to file maps and plans; 145 U. S. 175; forbid the running of freight trains on Sunday; 163 id. 299; require prompt delivery of telegraph messages; 162 U. S. 650. It may regulate the use of public highways and their alterations; Cooley, Const. Lim. 725; require the owners of urban property to construct and keep in repair sidewalks in front of it; 8 Mich. 309; 19 Ohio 418; 4 R. I. 230, 445; 36 Barb. 226; 16 Pick. 504; regulate bicycle riding on highways; 97 N. C. 477; control and regulate the use of navigable waters (subject to the commerce powers of congress); Cooley, Const. Lim. 729; prescribe the maximum charges of a business affected by the public interest; 69 Ill. 80; 94 U. S. 113; 153 U. S. 391; 143 id. 517; 118 Ind. 194, where a telephone company was held to be a business affected with a public interest; 164 U. S. 579; 154 id. 22. It may regulate plumbing; 51 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 136.

In the exercise of its police power, a state may not invade the domain of the national government; 9 Wheat. 1; 7 How. 572; and the states may pass no laws conflicting with existing regulations by the federal government on the subjects intrusted to it; 95 U. S. 465; 138 id. 78; 135 id. 100. The power of congress to regulate commerce was never intended to cut the states off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country; 161 U. S. 701; but since the range of a state's power comes very near to the field committed by the constitution to congress, it is the duty of courts to guard against any needless intrusion; 95 U. S. 465. All that the federal authority can do is to see that the states do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any power which the constitution has confided to the nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the federal constitution; Cooley, Const. Lim. 715. See 16 Wall. 36; 7 How. 283.

State quarantine laws, prohibiting the entry of persons or cargoes which might bring contagious diseases, are constitutional; and the national government also has jurisdiction in quarantine to prohibit improper immigrants and injurious traffic between the states; 118 U. S. 464; 107 U. S. 687; 141 U. S. 47. Cattle infected with pleuro-pneumonia, dangerous persons, Chinese, coolies, contract laborers, and rags may be kept out of the country; 118 U. S. 465; 130 id. 581; 140 id. 424; 149 id. 698; 169 id. 613; peach trees may be destroyed, when affected with peach yellows; 56 Conn. 216; adulteration of food prohibited; 64 N. H. 549; 63 Md. 592; 56 Minn. 69; and the manufacture of oleomargarine; 146 Pa. 265, where it was held that the legislature might prohibit, if it saw fit, the manufacture of a wholesome article of food; but see 99 N. Y. 377, where the decision is criticised, and in 40 L. R. A. (Tex.) 201, it is held that the state cannot constitute it a crime to mix wholesome and nutritious articles of food. See OLEOMARGARINE.

The legislature may require all oleomargarine to be stamped as such; 63 Ind. 592; or to be colored pink; 84 Fed. Rep. 136; or prohibit artificially coloring it; 155 U. S. 461; prescribe the price at which bread should be sold; 3 Ala. 140; suppress gambling and opium dens, and lotteries; 101 U. S. 814; and carrying on offensive manufactures; 47 Barb. 64; regulate laundries; 113 U. S. 703; 31 Fed. Rep. 680; 118 U. S. 356; pawn-brokers, hawkers, and peddlers; 132 Pa. 69; and require a license fee, where no discrimination is made between residents or products of the state and those of another state; 156 U. S. 296; enact laws for the preservation of game and fish; 152 U. S. 133; to prevent the waste of natural gas; 37 L. R. A. 294; the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors; 123 U. S. 623; 80 Fed. Rep. 785; forbid the sending of threatening letters by a debtor to a creditor; 135 Mo. 450; close cemeteries within the built-up parts of a city; 5 Cow. 538; 88 Pa. 42; and forbid the pollution of streams; 44 N. J. L. 88; the keeping of gunpowder in cities or villages; 1 Gray 27; the erection of wooden buildings in populous cities; 11 Mich. 425; 7 Cow. 852; or the keeping of swine therein; 97 Mass. 221; or of a slaughter house; 109 id. 315; 111 U. S. 746; 39 La. Ann. 247; or a bone boiling factory; 67 Hun 52; or any other business injurious to the public; 35 Wis. 298; the sale of indecent books; 8 Gray 488; 38 N. H. 426; 152 U. S. 133; 135 id. 100; restrain the employment of children at a theatrical exhibition; 54 N. Y. 559; or prohibit their employment altogether when below a specified age. Similarly there seems to be no doubt that the hours of labor of women and children and the wages to be paid them may be controlled through the police power; 94 U. S. 113; 5 Hill, N. Y. 121; 48 Am. Dec. 609, 337; 70 N. Y. 569; 36 Barb. 392; 110 N. Y. 418; 105 Ind. 250; 66 Md. 399; 38 Wis. 428; 160 Mass. 86. Laborers wages may be controlled; 5 Ark. 416; 50 Fed. Rep. 628, 681; and the issuance to them, in payment, of scrip or store orders prohibited; 48 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 512.

The confinement of the insane and their control in asylums, is an exercise of the police power; 40 Mich. 90; and skilled trades and learned professions often come under its control, as where examinations are provided for those who wish to practise law, medicine, or pharmacy. Physicians, dentists, and midwives may be compelled to take out licenses and report births and deaths; 46 Am. Rep. 63; 113 Ind. 514; 129 U. S. 114. Every city has also numerous regulations about the sale of medicines and poisons, ventilation and drainage, etc.

The following are not within police power:—Laws levying taxes upon alien passengers from foreign ports, for the use of hospitals; 7 How. 283. Requiring a bond to be given for alien passengers from foreign ports to indemnify the state against expense for the support of the person named therein; 92 U. S. 259. Prohibiting the driving of foreign cattle into a state within certain dates; 95 U. S. 465. Requiring an inspection before slaughtering of cattle, etc., so far as they apply to foreign meats; 136 U. S. 313. (This offends against inter-state commerce.) Requiring a license under onerous conditions from the agents of foreign express companies; 141 U. S. 47.

"Whether the prohibited act or omission shall be made a criminal offence, punishable under the general laws, or subject to punishment under municipal by-laws, or, on the other hand, the party be deprived of all remedy for any right which, but for the regulation, he might have had against other persons, are questions which the legislature must decide." Cooley, Const. Lim. 745.

The determination by the legislature as to what is a proper exercise of its police power is subject to the supervision of the courts; 123 U. S. 623; 152 U. S. 137.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE, COURT OF. See COURT OF POLICIES OF INSURANCE.

POLICY. In Insurance. The instrument whereby insurance is made by an underwriter in favor of an assured, expressed, implied, or intended, against some risk, peril, or contingency, in reference to some subject.

The written or printed form to which the contract has been reduced, and which evidences the agreement or contract between the parties. It may be either a specialty or simple contract. 1 Joyce, Ins. § 145.

It must show expressly, or by implication, in whose favor it is made. It may be upon a valuable property, interest, or contingency, or be a gaming or wagering policy on a subject in which the assured has no interest, or against risks in respect to which the assured has no interest except what arises from the contract itself.

An interest policy is one where the insured has a real, substantial, assignable interest in the thing insured. 87 Wis. 539.

An open policy is one on which the value is not fixed, but is left to be definitely determined in case of loss. 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 4, 6, 7; 101 N. Y. 458; 4 Dal. 430. By an "open policy" is also sometimes meant, in the United States, one in which an aggregate amount is expressed in the body of the policy, and the specific amounts and subjects are to be indorsed from time to time; 12 La. An. 259; 19 N. Y. 305; 6 Gray 214; it may also mean one kept open for new subscriptions, or one on cargo kept open for new subjects of insurance; 1 Joyce, Ins. § 156.

A valued policy is one where a value has been set on the ships or goods insured, and this value inserted in the policy in the nature of liquidated damages. In such a policy the value of the subject is expressly agreed; 33 Md. 109; 3 Rich. S. C. 331; or is, as between the parties, the amount insured. Under an open policy in case of loss, the insured must prove the true value of the property, while under a valued policy, the sum agreed upon is conclusive, except in case of fraud; 3 Camp. 319; 15 Mass. 341; 48 Pa. 372; May, Ins. § 30.

A mixed policy is one which is open as to certain property and valued as to other property. 2 Conn. 368.

A wager policy is a pretended insurance, founded on an ideal risk, where the insured has no interest in the thing insured, and can therefore sustain no loss by the happening of any of the misfortunes insured against. These policies are strongly reprobated; 3 Kent 225; Beach, Ins. § 1142.

A floating policy is one which applies to goods of a class or kind, which, from its fluctuating, changing nature, differs as to specific articles. 32 N. Y. 405.

In the absence of any insurable interest of the beneficiary, the law will presume that a policy was taken out for the purpose of a wager, or speculation: 122 Pa. 324.

The insured must be held to a knowledge of the conditions of his policy, and the fact that he had never seen it does not help him any more than the fact that he had not read it, where there is no adequate reason shown why he could not have seen it had he so desired, and the company had not kept it from him through any fault or fraud; 71 Mich. 414; 69 Tex. 353.

Records and documents expressly referred to in the policy are, in effect, for the purpose of the reference, a part of the contract; 22 Conn. 235; 37 Me. 137; 23 Pa. 50; 23 E. L. & E. 514; 33 N. H. 203; 10 Cush. 337; 70 N. Y. 72; 16 Or. 283; 84 Ky. 658; 133 Ind. 376; 58 Ark. 277; May, Ins. § 158.

All prior negotiations are presumed to be merged in the written contract, and the policy itself, in the absence of fraud, duress, or mistake, must be looked to to ascertain the intent of the parties; 13 Mass. 96. Where the form of the policy is not prescribed by statute, it should contain, either by itself, or by reference to other papers, the exact agreement between the parties, set forth therein in clear, precise, and unambiguous terms, and should embody all the requirements of a valid insurance contract. Where the terms are plain and unambiguous, parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or control them; 42 Mo. 38; 116 N. Y. 317; but if it is ambiguous, extrinsic evidence is admissible, not to contradict or change the contract, but to develop and explain its true meaning; 40 Mo. 33. Conversasations had between the parties at the time have been held admissible; 1 Sto. 574; and when parties have, by certain acts of their own, placed a construction on doubtful terms of the contract, this construction will be adopted by the court against them.

The language of the policy must be construed with reference to the subject-matter and the nature of the property to which it is applied, and with a view to the objects and intentions of the parties, as the same may be gathered from the whole instrument; 2 Gill & J. 136; 30 N. Y. 136; 38 Minn. 501; and the whole policy with all its parts should be construed together as one entire contract; 16 Ore. 283. A special clause in a policy which creates an exception to a general clause governs the latter; 27 Mo. 152. When susceptible of more than one interpretation, the contract should be construed in favor of the assured; 116 N. Y. 54; 105 Ind. 212; 111 U. S. 335; 133 Ill. 556. The written part of the policy controls that part which is printed; 4 East 136; 32 Fed. Rep. 47; 34 id. 501; 38 Me. 404; 31 N. Y. 389. A special indorsement exempting from liability for partial loss will control; 97 N. Y. 333. See LEX LOCI.

A policy may take effect on actual or constructive delivery; 1 Phill. Ins. ch. xi. sect. i; 25 Ind. 537; 27 Pa. 268; 42 Me. 259; 25 Conn. 207; 5 Gray 52; and may be retrospective, provided there is no concealment or misrepresentation by either party; Hill. Ins. § 925; 2 Dutch. 268; S. C. 3 id. 645.

Every policy, whether marine, against fire, or on life, specifies or imports parties, and specifies the subject or interest intended to be insured, the premium or other consideration, the amount insured, the risks and perils for which indemnity is stipulated, and the period of the risk or the terminus a quo and ad quem. The subject-matter is usually more minutely described in a separate paper—called an application; Beach, Ins. § 352. See APPLICATION. May, Ins. § 29.

The duration of the risk, under a marine insurance, or one on inland navigation, is either from one geographical terminus to another, called a "Voyage Policy," or from a specified time, called a "Time Policy;" that of a fire policy is for a specified time; one on life is either for life or a term of years, months, etc. It is a leading principle, as to the construction of a policy of insurance, that its distinguishing character as a contract of indemnity is to be favored; which is in conformity with the common maxim, ut res valeat magis quam pereat; 8 N. Y. 351; 18 id. 385; 8 Cush. 393; 17 Pa. 253; 29 E. L. & E. 111, 215; 2 Du. 419, 554; 5 id. 517, 594; 16 Mo. 98; 22 Conn. 235; 13 B. Monr. 311; 11 Ind. 171; 28 N. H. 234; 2 Curt. C. C. 322, 610; 37 Me. 137; 4 Zabr. 447; 18 Ill. 553; 4 R. I. 159. See May, Ins. § 7; 94 U. S. 457. Any reasonable doubt as to the meaning of an insurance policy must be resolved in favor of the insured; 38 Minn. 501; 84 Va. 72; 145 Pa. 346; 3 Ind. App. 361; 151 U. S. 452.

In marine insurance the contract has necessarily more implied reference to customs and usages than most other contracts; or, in other words, a larger proportion of the stipulations are not specifically expressed in the instrument; 1 Phill. Ins. § 119; whence it has been thought to be an imperfect, obscure, confused instrument; 5 Cra. 342; 1 Burr. 347. But the difficulty in giving it a practical construction seems to arise more from the complication of the circumstances necessarily involved than from any remediable defects in its provisions and phraseology. New provisions are, however, needed, from time to time, to adapt the contract to new circumstances. A mistake in filling up a policy may be corrected by order of a court of equity; Beach, Ins. § 509; 5 B. & P. 322; 1 Wash. C. C. 415; 2 Cra. 441; 2 Johns. 330; 1 Ark. 545; 2 Curt. C. C. 277. If by accident, inadvertence, or mistake, the terms of the contract are not fully set forth in a policy, it may be reformed so as to express the real agreement; 136 U. S. 287. A marine policy is assignable without the consent of the insurers; May, Ins. § 377; while a fire policy is not; 16 Wend. 385; 2 Pet. 25; 4 Bro. P. C. 431; 18 Ia. 319; 9 L. T. N. S. 688. An outstanding and valid life policy is held to be assignable without the insurer's consent, provided the sale is bona fide and not a device to evade the law; 13 N. Y. 31; 29 Ind. 236; 98 Mass. 381; 26 Pa. 189; 26 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 959. But see, contra, 41 Ind. 116. See, generally, 9 L. R. A. 660; Joyce, Insurance. A pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration for an assignment of insurance policies after loss of the property insured; 40 Ill. 102. When a policy of insurance expressly stipulates that no assignment shall be valid without the consent of the company, an assignment without such consent is without effect; 45 La. Ann. 736; 161 Mass. 320; and it is avoided by an assignment for the benefit of creditors; 64 N. H. 257; but if made subsequently to the loss, it is valid regardless of the conditions; 32 W. Va. 283; 35 Neb. 214.

For the rules of construction of a policy of credit insurance, see 73 Fed. Rep. 95.

See ABANDONMENT; AVERAGE; INSURABLE INTEREST; INSURANCE; SALVAGE; LOSS; TOTAL LOSS; VOLUNTARY EXPOSURE; RESERVE; PREMIUM.

A standard form of policy is provided by statute in Massachusetts, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, North Dakota, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. A statute providing for a standard policy without fixing its terms or conditions and leaving them to be fixed by the insurance commissioner is unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power; it seems that the legislature could prescribe a form; 166 Pa. 72, reversing 8 D. R. 788; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 788.

A method of gambling by betting as to what numbers will be drawn in a lottery. 60 Conn. 87.

POLICY, PUBLIC. See PUBLIC POLICY; RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

POLITICAL. Pertaining to policy, or the administration of the government. Political rights are those which may be exercised in the formation and administration of the government: they are distinguished from civil rights, which are the rights which a man enjoys as regards other individuals, and not in relation to the government. A political corporation is one which has principally for its object the administration of the government, or to which the powers of government, or a part of such powers, have been delegated. See 37 Ia. 544; 90 Ill. 568.

POLITICAL OFFENDER. A political offender if accused of what is prima facie an extraditable crime cannot be legally surrendered, if the offence is of a political character, that is if it is incidental to, and forms part of, a political disturbance; [1891] 1 Q. B. 149; [1896] 1 Q. B. 108.

POLITICAL PARTIES. See ELECTION; NOMINATION.

POLITICS. Everything that concerns the government of the country. 2 Ves. Sr. 156.

POLL. A head. Hence poll-tax is the name of a tax imposed upon the people at so much a head.

To poll a jury is to require that each juror shall himself declare what is his verdict. This may be done, at the instance of either party, at any time before the verdict is recorded, according to the practice in some states. See 18 Johns. 188; 9 Ill. 336. In some states it lies in the discretion of the judge; 1 M'Cord 24, 525; 22 Ga. 431. A defendant has a right to a poll of the jury to ascertain whether each member concurs in the verdict, but the exact words used by the juror in answering are immaterial, if they indicate clearly the assent of the individual mind to the verdict; 153 Pa. 535. Where a court directs a verdict, a party is not entitled to have the jury polled; 87 Mich. 13.

In Conveyancing. A deed-poll, or single deed, is one made by a single party, whose edges are polled, or shaved even, in distinction from an indenture, whose sides are indented, and which is executed by more than one party. 2 Bla. Com. 296. See DEED POLL.

POLL-TAX. A capitation tax; a tax assessed on every head, i. e. on every male of a certain age, etc., according to statute. Webst. Dict.; Whart. Dict. See TAXATION.

POLLICITATION. In Civil Law. An offer not yet accepted by the person to whom it is made. Langd. Contr. § 1.

It differs from a contract, inasmuch as the latter includes a concurrence of intention in two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who accepts, on his part, such promise. Grotius l. 2, c. 2; Pothier, Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 1, § 2.

POLLS. The place where electors cast in their votes.

POLLUTION OF WATERS. A riparian proprietor is required to refrain from erecting upon the banks of a water course any works which will pollute the water and thereby create a nuisance; 9 Co. 59; 5 B. & Ald. 1; 4 Mas. 397; 5 C. E. Greene 416; 4 Cush. 345; [1897] Ch. D. 96. See 13 Q. B. 426.

It is the right of the owner of land through which a stream flows, to have the natural flow free from pollution, as also from diversion or obstruction; and for an interference with this right an action will lie; 10 R. I. 106; 14 N. J. Eq. 335. An injury to the purity of the water which affects the riparian owner is considered an injury of the same character as an obstruction or diversion of the water; 122 Mass. 583. So one who pollutes his neighbor's spring is liable therefor; 99 Mass. 582; 89 Ky. 468; 29 Ch. D. 115; and one who deposits filth or noxious matter on his own premises from which it percolates through the soil; 162 Pa. 493; 57 Cal. 412; 29 Ch. D. 115; 92 Ill. 19; 108 Mass. 261; 43 N. J. Eq. 128.

Sources of the pollution of water for which it has been held that an action would lie, are: fouling by the discharge into it of muriatic acid; 7 H. & P. 160; sulphuric acid; 5 Ch. D. 769; vitriol, having a corrosive effect on boilers; 13 Allen 16; dye wares or dye liquors, madder, indigo, potash, etc.; 16 Jur. N. S. 75; heated water, which affects a stream injuriously; 3 Exch. 748; 3 B. & Ad. 304; 2 K. & J. 264; blood from a slaughter-house; 20 N. J. Eq. 296, 415; 57 Md. 1; setting up hog-pens, or lime-pits; 46 Wis. 391; Y. B. Hen. II. b. 6; 11 Mo. 517; the erection of a cess-pool, placing near the water oil or manure; 12 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 937; placing the carcass of a dead animal in the water; 25 Kan. 608.

It is not always actionable to discharge into a stream waste or impure matter, but it is a question for the jury whether such use of it is, under the circumstances, reasonable, and as a general rule the same consideration would control as in case of obstructions of the water generally. It is necessary to take into consideration the character of the stream, its natural uses and the importance of the use proposed to be made of it by the party complained of and the extent and character of the injury to the other party. See Ang. Waterc. § 140 d. A riparian proprietor cannot use the water in such manner as to pollute the atmosphere, and it is no defence to an action for so doing that the injury was public in its character as affecting an entire community and that it was a subject of criminal indictment; 4 Ohio 883; and if such a condition of things cannot be remedied by action, equity will interfere to abate the nuisance; 21 N. J. Eq. 576; in all these cases where the injury is continuous and irreparable so that an action for damages is not an adequate remedy, an injunction will be granted. See INJUNCTION. For a collection of cases in which injunctions have been granted, see Amer. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 648, 653.

The weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine that an action by the lower riparian owner will lie for the pollution of the stream by a discharge into it of refuse water from a mine, and that such action may be enjoined; [1893] App. Cas. 691; 54 N. J. Eq. 65, where it was expressly held that it was no defence, that the pollution was a natural and necessary result of mining operations prosecuted in the ordinary way. In this case the defendant was not a riparian owner. The decree was affirmed by the court of appeals in which Garrison, J., thus stated the conclusion: "A non-riparian mine-owner may not artificially cause the injurious discoloration of a natural water course, if, by the use of practicable means within his knowledge and under his control, he may carry on his mining operations without injury to the right of others,—a paraphrase of the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas."

In the English case cited, the general principle as laid down by the House of Lords in a much considered case was thus expressed: "Every riparian proprietor is entitled to have the natural water of the stream transmitted to him, without sensible alteration in its character or quality. Any invasion of this right, causing actual damage or calculated to found a claim which may ripen into an adverse right entitles the party injured to the intervention of the court."

The contrary doctrine was held in Pennsylvania in the case of Penn. Coal Co. v. Sanderson; 113 Pa. 126; a decision which was criticised and expressly disapproved in both the above cases. The Pennsylvania case had been twice decided otherwise; 86 Pa. 401; 94 id. 302; and these decisions were overruled in the third case by a bare majority of the court, Mercur, C. J., Gordon, and Trunkey, JJ., dissenting. Referring to this, Lord Shand, in the English case last cited, says: "This circumstance and the grounds of the judgment seem to me to be sufficient to deprive the case of any real weight." One other case seems in a measure to follow the Pennsylvania case; Barnard v. Shirley, 135 Ind. 537, where it was held that one who sinks an artesian well on his own land, and uses the water to bathe the patients in a sanitarium erected by him on said premises, is not liable to injunction and damages for allowing the water, after such use, to flow into a stream which crosses the land of an adjoining owner, and is the only natural and available outlet." Of this case it is remarked: "There were, however, many features to distinguish this from the Sanderson case, so that the adoption of the language of the latter was unnecessary. In the first place, the pollution was slight; in the second, before the water reached the plaintiff's premises, it was further defiled by passing through a city; either of which would tend to defeat the claim, apart from all other considerations;" 8 Eng. & Am. Dec. in Eq. 652, by Henry Budd.

The same writer draws attention to the fact that "even in Pennsylvania, the doctrine of the Sanderson case is carefully limited to the natural drainage of the mine water; and any other means of getting rid of it will be enjoined;" id., citing 7 Kulp 493. See, also, 8 Atl. Rep. 620.

The right of the lower riparian proprietor to have the use of the stream unimpaired, must be adjusted with due regard to the rights possessed by the upper riparian owner to use the stream for the proper purposes, such as casting sewage or waste therein; 74 N. Y. 341; 108 Mass. 208; 44 N. H. 580; and the necessary result of the legitimate use of a stream for irrigation, manufacturing, and domestic purposes, will have a tendency, with the natural increase of population, to render the stream more impure; see 110 Mass. 221; 113 Pa. 126; and the courts will not interfere by injunction with extensive manufacturing enterprises until satisfied from all the circumstances that there is no adequate remedy at law, and that the failure to interfere will result in irreparable injury; 54 Pa. 164; 57 id. 105. The pollution, by a properly constructed city sewer, of a stream which is the natural drainage of the land on which the city is built, gives no right of action to a lower riparian owner whose mill property, constructed and operated before the building of the city, is injured thereby; 18 Ind. App. 482. A plaintiff was held entitled to recover damages where sewers constructed by a city, polluted a stream and the foul water found its way to the two springs of the plaintiff, and he was unable to obtain pure water by digging wells, the whole underground supply being polluted; 162 Pa. 493. As a general thing the circumstances of each case must be considered by the court and the conflicting interests, carefully and judiciously weighed, and no general rule can be framed which will afford a rule to be applied by the courts in all cases as matter of law. The right to deposit in the stream must be settled as a question of reasonable use in the same way that courts deal with questions of diversion or obstruction; 30 Minn. 249; as to many uses of the water, either by common consent or other obvious considerations, settled rules have been established; Redfield, C. J., in 28 Vt. 459; many of these cases may be found collected in Gould, Waters § 220. See LAND.

Where a municipal corporation was authorized by statute to construct sewers and discharge sewerage into the tide water it was held liable for damages, caused by the sewerage destroying the plaintiff's oysters, although the damage involved no physical taking of property; 22 App. Div. N. Y. 406.

One who had permission to use the water of a canal was held entitled to recover damages from a third person, who fouled the water so that the plaintiff's boilers were injured, the action of the defendant having been without any authority; 2 H. & N. 476; in a case in the Exchequer Chamber, although the judgment was reversed on other grounds, there was no dissent from the doctrine of the court below, "that he had no right to cause dirty water to flow on his neighbors' land without some special right to do so," but it was left doubtful whether the mere permission of the riparian owner to take the water out of the stream was sufficient to authorize the action against the wrong-doer either for diverting or fouling; 3 H. & N. 675.

The pollution of streams has been the subject of extended legislation in England, which is embodied in the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, which is of general application, and also various acts of local application, all of which, with notes and decisions are collected in Haworth on Rivers Pollution.

POLYANDRY. The state of a woman who has several husbands.

Polyandry is legalized only in Thibet. It is inconsistent with the law of nature. See LAW OF NATURE.

POLYGAMY. The act or state of a person who, knowing that he has two or more wives, or that she has two or more husbands, marries another.

It differs from bigamy. Com. Dig. Justices (S 5); Co. 3d Inst. 88.

But bigamy is now commonly used even where polygamy would be strictly correct; 1 Russ. Cr. 186, n. On the other hand, polygamy is used where bigamy would be strictly correct; Mass. Gen. Stat. 1860, p. 817.

Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries another, whether married or single, in a territory or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of bigamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; R. S. § 5352; 103 U. S. 304.

An act of congress of March 3, 1887, was passed for the express purpose of the suppression of polygamy in Utah Territory. It expressly annuls the act of territorial legislation which contravenes its purposes and provided for winding up the corporation in the territory, known as the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints, and required the attorney-general to take proceedings for that purpose. The act contains elaborate provisions for adjusting property interests involved in this change, and providing severe penalties for violation of its provisions; U.S.R.S. 1 Supp. 568. This act was held constitutional; 136 U. S. 1; where it was also held that the pretence of religious belief cannot deprive congress of the power to prohibit polygamy and all other open offences against the enlightened sentiment of mankind.

See BIGAMY; RELIGION.

POLYGARCHY. A term used to express a government which is shared by several persons.

POND. A body of stagnant water; a pool. See Call. Sew. 103.

Any one has a right to erect a fish-pond; the fish in it are considered as real estate, and pass to the heir, and not to the executor; Ow. 20. Where land bounding on a lake or pond is conveyed, the grant extends only to the water's edge if it is a natural pond (some cases say to low-water mark; 13 Pick. 261); but to the middle of the stream if it is artificial; Ang. Wat. Cours. § 41. See 3 Washb. R. P. 5th ed. *633.

By the common law, fresh water lakes and ponds, except the great navigable lakes, belong to the owners of the soil adjacent, who own the soil usque ad filum aquæ; 140 U. S. 371. See 135 Mass. 364. See LAKES.

PONE. (Lat. ponere, to put). In English Practice. An original writ issuing out of chancery, for the purpose of removing a plaint from an inferior court into the superior courts at Westminster. The word signifies "put": put by gages, etc. The writ is called from the words it contained when in Latin, Pone per vadium et salvos plegios, etc.; put by gage and safe pledges, etc. See Fitzh. N. B. 69, 70 a; Digby, Hist. R. P. 71.

The writ of certiorari is now used in its place.

PONENDIS IN ASSISIS. An old writ directing a sheriff to empanel a jury for an assize or real action. Moz. & W. Law Dict.; Whart. Law Lex.

PONENDUM IN BALLIUM. A writ commanding that a prisoner be bailed in cases bailable. Whart. Law Lex.; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

PONENDUM SIGILLUM. A writ requiring justices to put their seals to a bill of exceptions, according to Stat. West. 2, 13 Ed. I. c. 31. Whart. Law Lex.; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

PONERE (Lat.). To put. The word is used in the old law in various connections, in all of which it can be translated by the English verb "put." See Glanv. lib. 2, c. 3.

PONIT SE (Lat. puts himself). In English Criminal Practice. When the defendant pleads "not guilty," his plea is recorded by the officer of the court, either by writing the words "po se," an abbreviation of the words ponit se super patriam (puts himself upon his country), or, as at the central criminal court, non cul. 2 Den. C. C. 392. See ARRAIGNMENT.

PONTAGE. A contribution towards the maintenance, rebuilding, or repairs of a bridge. The toll taken for this purpose also bears this name. Obsolete. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 1, § 16.

PONTIBUS REPARANDIS. An old writ directed to the sheriff commanding him to charge one or more to repair a bridge. Cow.; Reg. Orig. fol. 153.

POOL. A small lake of standing water. By the grant of a pool, it is said, both the land and water will pass; Co. Litt. 5. Undoubtedly the right to fish, and probably the right to use hydraulic works, will be acquired by such grant; 2 N. H. 259; Co. Litt. 5; Bac. Abr. Grants (H 3); Com. Dig. Grant (E 5); 5 Cow. 216; Cro. Jac. 150; 1 Lev. 44; Vaugh. 103. See LAKE.

A combination of stakes, the money derived from which goes to the winner. 146 Mass. 203. See GAMING; HORSE RACE.

A commercial term used to indicate a contract between two competing railroad companies, whereby they agree to divide all their earnings over and above the amounts required for the payment of operating expenses.

They have been held to be illegal; 6 So. Rep. (La.) 888; 61 N. H. 161; 55 id. 531; 26 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 159. See 1 J. & H. 252; 2 id. 89; 3 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 144.

As a business term the word "pool," as used in the phrase "real estate pool," means no more than that certain individuals are engaged in dealing in real estate as a commodity of traffic. 103 U. S. 195. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

POOLING AGREEMENT. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

POOR. Destitute; helpless and in extreme want; 52 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 444; so completely destitute of property as to require assistance from the public. 14 Kan. 421. A trust for the benefit of the poor does not generally include those receiving parochial relief; 3 Biss. 395; 1 Jarm. 209; but a trust for the benefit of poor boys was held not confined to those who required parish relief; 31 L. J. Ch. 810. See CHARITABLE USES; LEGACY.

POOR DEBTORS. By the constitution of the several states and territories, or by the laws which exist for the relief of poor debtors, it is provided in general terms that there shall be no imprisonment for debt. But this is usually qualified by provisions for the arrest of debtors in certain enumerated cases of fraud. The statutes in the different states are very similar, and as a rule, require the creditor to make affidavit that the debtor is about to remove some of his property out of the jurisdiction of the court with intent to defraud his creditors, or that, for the same reason, he is about to dispose or has disposed of his property, or that he is fraudulently concealing it; or that the debt, concerning which suit is brought, was fraudulently contracted. Such in general is the law in most of the states and territories.

A classification of the states shows that there are constitutional provisions that there shall be no imprisonment for debt in Indiana, Minnesota, Kansas, Maryland, North Carolina, Missouri, Texas, Oregon, Nevada, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida; that there shall be none in any civil action on mesne or final process in Ohio, Iowa, Nebraska, Tennessee, Arkansas, California, Oregon, and Arizona; or in any action or judgment founded on contract in New Jersey, Michigan, and Wisconsin. In Vermont, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Kentucky, and Colorado, the provision is that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action when he has delivered up his property for the benefit of creditors in the manner prescribed by law; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 80.

Subject to these constitutional provisions the subject is regulated in most states by general statutes which should be consulted with respect to any particular case.

It may be stated generally that the object of such statutes is to induce the defendant to pay the debt, give security, or take advantage of the insolvent laws or of some enactments made especially for the relief of poor debtors. It follows therefore that in most of the states a person under arrest for debt may obtain his release in any of these ways. A poor debtor is of course usually compelled to resort to one of the two last mentioned, and, although the proceedings differ in the different states, yet as a rule he is released upon delivering his property to a trustee, or taking oath that he has not more than ten or twenty dollars above the amount exempted by statute in the particular state in which he is confined.

In a few states the rule that there shall be no imprisonment for an ordinary contract debt is strictly adhered to. In Tennessee a debtor may be imprisoned in criminal actions, and in Missouri for the non-payment of fines or penalties imposed by law. So he may be imprisoned for fraud in civil or criminal actions in Vermont, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, North Carolina, Kentucky, Arkansas, California, Oregon, Nevada, Colorado, South Carolina, Florida, and Arizona. In Georgia and Louisiana the legislature has power to provide for the punishment of fraud, and for reaching property of the debtor concealed from his creditors. Debtors may be imprisoned in Oregon if absconding; in Nevada, in cases of libel or slander; in Colorado and California, in actions of tort, and in the latter state also for malicious mischief; in Michigan and Arizona for breach of trust or moneys collected by public officers, or in any professional employment; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 80.

Women are not subject to arrest as debtors in North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New Hampshire, District of Columbia. See INSOLVENCY; INSOLVENT.

POOR LAW BOARD. A government board appointed by statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 109, to take the place of poor law commissioners, who had general management of the poor and the funds for their relief. The poor law board is now superseded by the local government board, established under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 70; 3 Steph. Com. 49; Moz. & W.

POOR RATE. A rate levied by church authorities for the relief of the poor.

POPE. The bishop of Rome and head of the Roman Catholic church. He is elected by certain officers called cardinals, and remains in power during life. In the 9th Collation of the Authentics it is declared the bishop of Rome hath the first place of sitting in all assemblies, and the bishop of Constantinople the second. Ridley, Civ. & Eccl. L. pt. 1, c. 3, § 10.

"It does not appear necessary that a Pope be selected either from the ranks of the Cardinals or that he be in Orders." 1 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 104.

The Catholic powers concede the precedency to the Pope as the visible head of the church; but Russia and Turkey and the Protestant states of Europe consider him only as the bishop of Rome, and a sovereign prince, although since September 20, 1870, he has been dispossessed of substantially all his territory. By the Italian decree of May 13, 1871, he is guaranteed his sovereign rights and other immunities by Italy, but he has refused to accept this decree. He maintains diplomatic relations with France and some other Catholic states; id. 118. See PAPACY.

POPULAR ACTION. An action given by statute, to any one who will sue for the penalty. A qui tam action. Dig. 47. 23. 1.

POPULAR SENSE. The sense in which a subject is understood by those conversant therewith. 1 Ex. D. 248.

POPULAR USE. The occasional and precarious enjoyment of property by the members of society in their individual capacity, without the power to enforce such enjoyment according to law. 18 Cal. 238.

POPULISCITUM (Lat.). An act of the commons; same as plebiscitum. Ainsworth, Dict.

A law passed by the whole people assembled in comitia centuriata, and at the proposal of one of the senate, instead of a tribune, as was the case with a plebiscitum. Tayl. Civ. Law 178; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 26.

PORCH. A portico; a shelter in front of a door. 148 Mass. 584.

PORT. A place to which the officers of the customs are appropriated, and which includes the privileges and guidance of all members and creeks which are allotted to them. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 726; Postlewaith, Com. Dict. According to Dalloz, a port is a place within land, protected against the waves and winds and affording to vessels a place of safety. By the Roman law a port is defined to be locus conclusus quo importantur merces et unde exportantur. Dig. 50. 16. 59. See 7 Mart. La. N. S. 81. In the revenue laws it is synonymous with district, when the limits of the port and district are the same; 3 Mass. 153. As used in the R. S. § 4347 it means any place from which merchandise may be shipped.

A port differs from a haven, and includes something more. First, it is a place at which vessels may arrive and discharge or take in their cargoes. Second, it comprehends a ville, city, or borough, called in Latin caput corpus, for the reception of mariners and merchants, for securing the goods and bringing them to market, and for victualling the ships. Third, it is impressed with its legal character by the civil authority. Hale, de Portibus Mar. c. 2; 1 Hargr. Tracts 46, 73; Bac. Abr. Prerogative (D 5); Com. Dig. Navigation (E); Co. 4th inst. 148; Callis, Sew. 56; 2 Chitty, Com. L. 2; Dig. 50. 16. 59; 43. 12. 1. 13; 47. 10. 15. 7; 39. 4. 15.

The exact meaning of the term was much considered by Lord Esher, M. R., in 15 Q. B. D. 580. He held that it was not usually the legal port as defined by acts of Parliament, but, "a place of safety for the ship and goods, whilst the goods are being loaded and unloaded"; that there never would be a port in the ordinary business sense of the word, unless there was some element of safety in it for the ship and goods, and that nothing was more certain to be such a port than a natural port; that a natural port was "a place in which the conformation of the land with regard to the sea is such that, if you get your ship within certain limits, she is in a place of safety for loading and unloading"; that any place at which the loading and unloading took place might safely be inferred to be within "the port," as understood by the parties; that beyond the place of loading and unloading, the port would extend to any further space over which the court authorities were in the habit of exercising "port discipline."

In L. R. 4 Ex. 238, 245, Byles, J., said: "The passage from Lord Hale, de Portibus Maris (ch. 2, p. 46), shows that the limits of a port may depend on the existence of wharves, quays, buildings, and other conveniences. It may accordingly, from time to time, vary and increase with the increase of population and of buildings. Lord Hale further says: "The port of London anciently extended to Greenwich in the time of Edward I. and Gravesend is a member of it. The extent of a port therefore after a lapse of years may become a question of fact."

In the same case below the meaning of "port" generally was considered by Martin, B.; L. R. 3 Ex. 330, 345. See HOME PORT.

PORT OF DELIVERY. This is sometimes used to distinguish the port of unlading or destination, from any port at which the vessel touches for other purposes. 2 Mas. 319.

PORT OF DEPARTURE. As used in the United States statutes requiring a ship to procure a bill of health from the consular officer at the place of departure, it is not the last port at which the ship stops while bound for the United States, but the port from which she cleared. 61 Fed. Rep. 986.

PORT OF DESTINATION. As used in a time policy, the phrase has been held to mean any foreign port to which the vessel may be destined during the voyage, as well as her home port, and to include any usual stopping place for lading or unlading cargoes. 12 Gray 501.

PORT OF DISCHARGE. The place where the substantial part of the cargo is discharged has been held to be such, although done with the intent to complete the discharge at another basin. 104 Mass. 510. Some cargo must be discharged to make the port of destination the port of discharge; 5 Mas. 414. See, further, 2 Cliff. 4; 1 Sprague 485; 18 Law Rep. 94.

PORT RISK. A risk upon a vessel whilst she is lying in port and before she has taken her departure on another voyage. 71 N. Y. 459.

PORT TOLL. The toll paid for bringing goods into a port.

PORTATICA (L. Lat.) In English Law. The generic name for port duties charged to ships. Hargr. Law Tracts 64.

PORTER. The name of an ancient English officer who bore or carried a rod before the justices. The door-keeper of the English parliament also bears this name.

One who is employed as a common carrier to carry goods from one place to another in the same town is also called a porter. Such person is, in general, answerable as a common carrier. Story, Bailm. § 496.

PORTGREVE (from Sax. gerefa, reeve or bailiff, and port). A chief magistrate in certain maritime towns. The chief magistrate of London was anciently so called, as appears from a charter of king William I. Instead of this portgreve of London, the succeeding king appointed two bailiffs, and afterwards a mayor. Camden, Hist. 325.

PORTION. That part of a parent's estate, or the estate of one standing in loco parentis, which is given to a child. 1 Vern. 204. See 8 Com. Dig. 539; 16 Viner, Abr. 432; 1 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 34, 58, 303; 2 id. 46; 108 Pa. 137; 54 Ala. 240.

The part, share, or division, made for a child by the parent. 138 Ill. 541.

PORTION DISPONIBLE. In French Law. The part of a person's estate which he may bequeath to others than his natural heirs. A parent having one legitimate child may dispose of one-half only of his property; leaving two, one-third only; and leaving three or more, one-fourth only; and it matters not whether the disposition is inter vivos, or by will. See LEGITIME.

PORTIONIBUS. Is properly employed to mean a portion of the tithes of one parish claimed by the rector of another parish. 4 Cl. & F. 1.

PORTORIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Duties paid in ports on merchandise. Code 4. 61. 8. Taxes levied in old times at city gates. Tolls for passing over bridges. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Spelman, Gloss.

PORTRAIT. A picture of a person painted from life or from reasonable materials, if there are such, from which a likeness can be framed; or a picture painted after a man's death and meant to represent him. If there is nothing affording the materials for the portrait, it is completely an ideal one and cannot properly be called a portrait; Lord Lyndhurst, in 14 L. J. Ch. 73.

PORTSALES. Auctions were anciently so called, because they took place in ports.

PORTSOKA, or PORTSOKEN. Any place within the jurisdiction of a city. Cowell.

PORTUGAL. A kingdom of Europe. The government is an hereditary monarchy, based on the "Carta Constitucional." The executive is vested in the sovereign and a responsible cabinet. The legislature consists of two chambers; the upper or "Camara dos Pares" consists of ninety life members in addition to peers who are at present members by hereditary right. The lower chamber or "Camara dos Deputados" has one hundred and twenty deputies, of whom six are from the colonies. The chambers meet without the intervention of the sovereign, who has no veto on a law passed twice by both houses. The Codigo Civil Portuguëz was established in 1868. The law is administered in about one hundred and twenty public law courts and a high court of appeal at Lisbon. There are three high courts at Lisbon. There are also three other high courts. Some cases are tried before a jury.

POSITIVE. Express; absolute; not doubtful. This word is frequently used in composition.

POSITIVE CONDITION. One in which the thing which is the subject of it must happen: as, if I marry. It is opposed to a negative condition, which is where the thing which is the subject of it must not happen: as, if I do not marry.

POSITIVE EVIDENCE. That which, if believed, establishes the truth or falsehood of a fact in issue, and does not arise from any presumption. It is distinguished from circumstantial evidence. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3057.

POSITIVE FRAUD. See FRAUD.

POSITIVE LAW. Law actually ordained or established, under human sanctions, as distinguished from the law of nature or natural law, which comprises those considerations of justice, right, and universal expediency that are announced by the voice of reason or of revelation. Municipal law is chiefly, if not essentially, positive; while the law of nations has been deemed by many of the earlier writers as merely an application of the law of nature. That part of the law of nations which rests on positive law may be considered in a threefold point of view:—1. The universal voluntary law, or those rules which become law by the uniform practice of nations in general, and by the manifest utility of the rules themselves; 2. The customary law, or that which, from motives of convenience, has, by tacit but implied agreement, prevailed, not necessarily among all nations, nor with so permanent a utility as to become a portion of the universal voluntary law, but enough to have acquired a prescriptive obligation among certain states so situated as to be mutually benefited by it. 1 Taunt. 241; 3. The conventional law, or that which is agreed between particular states by express treaty, a law binding on the parties among whom such treaties are in force. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 28. See LAW.

POSSE. This word is used substantively to signify a possibility. For example, such a thing is in posse, that is, such a thing may possibly be. When the thing is in being, the phrase to express it is, in esse.

POSSE COMITATUS (Lat.). The power of the county.

The sheriff, or other peace officer, has authority by the common law, while acting under the authority of the writ of the United States, commonwealth, or people, as the case may be, and for the purpose of preserving the public peace, to call to his aid the posse comitatus; 1 Bla. Com. 343.

But with respect to writs which issue in the first instance to arrest in civil suits, or on mesne process, the sheriff is not bound to take the posse comitatus to assist him in the execution of them; though he may, if he pleases, on anticipated, or actual resistance to the execution of the process; Co. 2d Inst. 193; Co. 3d Inst. 161; 10 Johns. 85; 2 Jones N. C. 339.

Although the sheriff is not bound upon a capias ad respondendum to take the posse comitatus, it has been held to be his duty to do so if he has any reason to anticipate resistance; nor can it be said to be a hardship on the sheriff that he should be bound to provide against resistance; 12 Jurist 1052; Winst. 144. And likewise with reference to a capias ad satisfaciendum; 20 Ga. 598; and he cannot, in an action for escape, plead that the prisoner was rescued; id.

Having the authority to call in the assistance of all citizens, he may equally require that of any individual; but to this general rule there are some exceptions; persons of infirm health, or who lack understanding, minors under the age of fifteen years, women, and perhaps some others, it seems, cannot be required to assist the sheriff, and are, therefore, not considered as a part of the power of the county; Viner, Abr. Sheriff (B).

A refusal on the part of an individual lawfully called upon to assist the officer in putting down a riot is indictable; 1 Carr. & M. 314. In this case will be found the form of an indictment for this offence.

Although the sheriff is acting without authority, yet it would seem that any person who obeys his command, unless aware of that fact, will be protected; 34 Vt. 69.

An individual not called upon by the sheriff to lend his aid does so at his peril; 5 Tex. App. 60. In a case where the defendant assisted a sheriff's officers in executing a writ of replevin without their solicitation, the court held him justified in so doing; 2 Mod. 244; see 78 Me. 373; 19 Am. Dec. 122; Bac. Abr. Sheriff (N); Hamm. N. P. 63; 5 Whart. 437. See SHERIFF; PEACE.

POSSESSED. This word is applied to the right and enjoyment of a termor, or a person having a term, who is said to be possessed, and not seised. Bac. Tr. 335; Poph. 76; Dy. 369. It is sometimes synonymous with "seised"; 89 Ga. 632.

"Possessed" is a variable term in the law, and has different meanings as it is used in different circumstances. It sometimes implies a temporary interest in lands: as we say a man is possessed, in contradistinction to being seised. It sometimes implies the corporal having; as we say a man is seised and possessed. But it sometimes implies no more than that one has a property in a thing; that he has it as owner; that it is his; 44 Mich. 603.

POSSESSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The detention of a thing: divided into—first, natural, or the naked detention of a thing, without intention to acquire ownership; second, civil, or the detention of a thing to which one has a right, or with intention of acquiring ownership. Hein. Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1288; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 210.

In Old English Law. Possession; seisin. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; 2 Bla. Com. 227; Bracton, lib. 2, c. 17; Cowell, Possession. But seisina cannot be of an estate less than freehold; possessio can. New England Sheriff 141; 1 Metc. Mass. 450; 6 id. 439.

POSSESSIO FRATRIS (Lat. the brother's possession). A technical phrase applied in the English law relating to descents, to denote the possession by one in such privity with a person as to be considered the person's own possession.

By the common law, the ancestor from whom the inheritance was taken by descent must have had actual seisin of the lands, either by his own entry, or by the possession of his own or his ancestor's lessee for years, or by being in the receipt of rent from the lessee of the freehold. But there are qualifications as to this rule, one of which arises from the doctrine of possessio fratris. The possession of a tenant for years, guardian, or brother is equivalent to that of the party himself, and is termed in law possessio fratris; Littl. sect. 8; Co. Litt. 15 a; 3 Wills. 516; 7 Term 386.

In Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Virginia, and probably in other states, the real and personal estates of intestates are distributed among the heirs without any reference or regard to the actual seisin of the ancestor; Reeve, Desc. 377; 4 Mass. 467; 3 Day 166; 2 Pet. 59. In Maryland, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Vermont, the doctrine of possessio fratris, it seems, still exists; 2 Pet. 625; Reeve, Desc. 377; 4 Kent 384.

POSSESSION. The detention or enjoyment of a thing which a man holds or exercises by himself, or by another who keeps or exercises it in his name.

By the possession of a thing we always conceive the condition in which not only one's own dealing with the thing is physically possible, but every other person's dealing with it is capable of being excluded. Thus, the seaman possesses his ship, but not the water in which it moves, although he makes each subserve his purpose.

It expresses the closest relation that can exist between a corporeal thing and the person who possesses it, implying an actual, physical contact, as by sitting or standing upon a thing: 109 N. C. 57.

Actual possession exists where the thing is in the immediate occupancy of the party. 3 Dev. 34.

Constructive possession is that which exists in contemplation of law, without actual personal occupation. 11 Vt. 129. And see 1 McLean 214, 265; 2 Bla. Com. 116.

In order to complete a possession, two things are required: that there be an occupancy, apprehension, or taking; that the taking be with an intent to possess (animus possidendi): hence persons who have no legal wills, as children and idiots, cannot possess or acquire possession; Pothier; Etienne. See 1 Mer. 358; Abb. Sh. 9. But an infant of sufficient understanding may lawfully acquire the possession of a thing; Mitch. R. E. 259.

Proof of the possession of property is commonly said to be prima facie evidence of title to it; and this is so with respect to land, in which case it has been held that proof of possession is sufficient evidence of title to maintain an action against a powder company for damages caused by an explosion; 58 Fed. Rep. 152. This particular phrase that possession is prima facie evidence of title has been very much criticised by Sir Frederick Pollock, who says that "it would be less intelligible at first sight, but not less correct to say that in the developed system of common-law pleading and procedure as it existed down to the middle of this century, proof of title was evidence only of a right to possess." Poll. Torts 317. Under the common-law forms of action, possession was of the utmost importance and was rather to be considered than ownership. "An owner in possession was protected against disturbance, but the rights of an owner out of possession were obscure and weak. To this day it continues so with regard to chattels. For many purposes the true owner of goods is the person, and the only person, entitled to immediate possession." Poll. Torts 316.

Commenting on the suggestion sometimes made that there is no doctrine of possession in our law, the same author says: "The reason of this appearance, an appearance capable of deceiving even learned persons, is that possession has all but swallowed up ownership; and the rights of a possessor, the one entitled to possess, have all but monopolized the very name of property." Id. 317.

"Legal possession does not necessarily coincide either with actual physical control . . . or with the right to possess (constantly called property in our books), and it need not have a rightful origin." Id. 318. "The common law, when it must choose between denying legal possession to the persons apparently in possession and attributing it to a wrongdoer, generally prefers the latter course. In Roman law there is no such general tendency, though the results are often similar." Id. 319.

Judge Holmes considers possession a conception only less important than contract, and he contends that the English system is far more civilized than the Roman. He seeks to answer the question which presents so much difficulty to German philosophers: "Why is possession protected by the law when the possessor is not also an owner?" His reply is that "possession is to be protected because a man by taking possession of an object has brought it within the sphere of his will; he has extended his personality into or over that object." Holmes. Com. Law 207. "Rights of ownership are substantially the same as those incident to possession. . . . The owner is allowed to exclude all and is accountable to no one; the possessor is allowed to exclude all but one and is accountable to no one but him." Id. 246. See Holmes, Common Law, Lect. 6; Pollock, Torts, 5th ed. ch. 9; F. W. Maitland in 1 Law Quart. Rev. 324; 2 id. 481.

A very high degree of legal protection is accorded to one lawfully in possession and, whether its origin is rightful or not, a stranger cannot be heard in opposition to it. The true owner may be heard, but an intruder never. It is said, however, that the bald proposition that possession is a good title against a wrongdoer is inaccurate, if stated entirely without a qualification, and that the true limits of the bare possessor's right to recover damages for interference with his possession are: 1. If the defendant cannot show who the true owner is, the bare possessor may recover the same measure of damages as if he were the true owner, though he may be liable over to the latter. 2. Where the true owner is shown, the bare possessor cannot recover the value of the goods taken or the diminution in their value, or for injury, unless he is liable. 3. Whether the true owner be shown or not, the possessor may recover damages for the taking or trespass, nominal or substantial, as the taking is or is not attended with aggravation. 7 Law Quart. Rev. 242.

Possession in the Roman law is the subject of an extended discussion by a writer in 3 Law Quart. Rev. 32, who takes issue with Judge Holmes' treatment of that subject, as to which he says, that although the differences between the two systems are very striking, Judge Holmes treats the civilians with scant respect, although "the knowledge he shows of their rights proves that he has himself by no means neglected them and we shall not be far wrong in following his practice rather than his precept."

Failure to take possession is sometimes considered a badge of fraud, in the transfer of personal property. See SALE; MORTGAGE.

Possession of real property will be presumed to accompany ownership until the contrary is proved; and constructive possession consequent upon legal ownership is sufficient as against mere trespassers; 120 U. S. 605. Long continued possession and use of real property creates a presumption of lawful origin; and this presumption need not rest upon belief that a conveyance was in point of fact executed; 120 U. S. 534.

See ADVERSE POSSESSION; LIMITATIONS.

In Louisiana. Civil possession exists when a person ceases to reside in a house or on the land which he occupied, or to detain the movable which he possessed, but without intending to abandon the possession. It is the detention of a thing by virtue of a just title and under the conviction of possessing as owner. La. Civ. Code, art. 3392, 3394.

Natural possession is that by which a man detains a thing corporeal; as, by occupying a house, cultivating ground, or retaining a movable in his possession. Natural possession is also defined to be the corporeal detention of a thing which we possess as belonging to us, without any title to that possession, or with a title which is void. La. Civ. Code, art. 3391, 3393.

Possession applied properly only to corporeal things, movables and immovables. The possession of incorporeal rights, such as servitudes and other rights of that nature, is only a quasi-possession, and is exercised by a species of possession of which these rights are susceptible. Id. art. 3395.

Possession may be enjoyed by the proprietor of the thing or by another for him: thus, the proprietor of a house possesses it by his tenant or farmer.

To acquire possession of a property, two things are requisite: the intention of possessing as owner; the corporeal possession of the thing. Id. art. 3399.

Possession is lost with or without the consent of the possessor. It is lost with his consent—when he transfers this possession to another with the intention to divest himself of it; when he does some act which manifests his intention of abandoning possession: as, when a man throws into the street furniture or clothes of which he no longer chooses to make use. Id. art. 3411. A possessor of an estate loses the possession against his consent—when another expels him from it, whether by force in driving him away, or by usurping possession during his absence, and preventing him from re-entering; when the possessor of an estate allows it to be usurped and held for a year, without during that time having done any act of possession or interfered with the usurper's possession. Id. art. 3412.

In Criminal Law. In some states it is made a criminal offence to have possession of burglars' tools with intent to use them for the purpose for which they were intended. Under such statutes it was held (1) that it is sufficient to allege in the information possession with the intent to break open places of deposit in general and take property, without specifying any particular place or property. (2) That where the defendant was found with the tools concealed about his person while stealing a ride on a railway and he testified that he found the tools, it was proper to refuse to take the case from the jury. (3) Where the only evidence produced by the state was the concealment of the tools on the person, and there was no evidence that the defendant had been convicted of theft, the application to him in argument by the prosecuting attorney of the term thief, followed by a ruling by the court that the assertion was warranted by the evidence, was ground for reversal; 91 Wis. 552.

See RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY.

In International Law. As indicating political control, a possession means the same as a colony. It was so used in the treaty of 1897, between the United States and Great Britain, which failed to receive the approval of the senate.

POSSESSION MONEY. An allowance to one put in possession of goods taken under writ of fieri facias. Holthouse, Dict.

POSSESSION, WRIT OF. See HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM.

POSSESSOR. He who holds, detains, or enjoys a thing, either by himself or his agent, which he claims as his own.

In general, the possessor of personal chattels is presumed to be the owner; and in case of real estate he has a right to receive the profits until a title adverse to his possession has been established, leaving him subject to an action for the mesne profits.

POSSESSORY ACTION. In Old English Law. A real action, in which the plaintiff, called the demandant, sought to recover the possession of land, tenements, and hereditaments. On account of the great nicety required in its management, and the introduction of more expeditious methods of trying titles by other actions, it has been laid aside. Finch, Laws 257.

In admiralty law the term is still in use. See PETITIONS.

In Louisiana. An action by which one claims to be maintained in the possession of an immovable property, or of a right upon or growing out of it, when he has been disturbed; or to be reinstated to that possession, when he has been divested or evicted. 2 La. 227, 254.

In Scotch Law. An action by which the possession of heritable or movable property may be recovered and tried. An action of molestation is one of them. Paterson, Comp. § 1058, n.

POSSESSORY JUDGMENT. In Scotch Law. A judgment which entitles a person who has uninterruptedly been in possession for seven years, to continue in possession until the question of right be decided in due course of law. Bell, Dict.

POSSIBILITY. An uncertain thing which may happen. Lilly, Reg. A contingent interest in real or personal estate. 1 Madd. 549.

Possibilities are near, as when an estate is limited to one after the death of another; or remote, as that one man shall be married to a woman, and then that she shall die and he be married to another. 1 Fonbl. Eq. n. e; Viner, Abr.; 2 Co. 51 a.

Possibilities are also divided into—a possibility coupled with an interest. This may, of course, be sold, assigned, transmitted, or devised. Such a possibility occurs in executory devises, and in contingent, springing, or executory uses. See 89 N. C. 81.

A bare possibility, or hope of succession. This is the case of an heir apparent during the life of his ancestor. It is evident that he has no right which he can assign, devise, or even release. See Chal. R. P. 66.

A possibility or mere contingent interest, as, a devise to Paul if he survive Peter. Dane, Abr. c. 1, a. 5, § 2, and the cases there cited. See PERPETUITY.

POSSIBLE. Liable to happen or come to pass, capable of existing or of being conceived or thought of; capable of being done; not contrary to the nature of things. 38 Kan. 383. It is sometimes equivalent to practicable or reasonable; 44 Wis. 208. An undertaking to supply an article as soon as possible is construed to mean with all reasonable promptitude, regard being had to the manufacturer's means of business, and his orders already in hand; 26 L. J. C. P. 78; 4 Q. B. D. 670.

POST (Lat.). After. When two or more alienations or descents have taken place between an original intruder and the tenant or defendant in a writ of entry, the writ is said to be in the post, because it states that the tenant had not entry unless after the ouster of the original intruder. 3 Bla. Com. 182. Persons claiming under the propositus by feofment or inheritance were said to be "in the per," while those claiming in any other manner, e. g. the limitation of a use, as tenant in dower, etc., were said to be "in the post." Except in case of the heir, the distinction is that persons in the per take by the act of the party at common law unassisted by statute, while persons in the post take by operation of law without any act of the party or by his act aided by statute; 4 L. Quart. Rev. 362. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

A military establishment where a body of troops is permanently fixed. 19 Wall. 268; a military post is synonymous with military station. 94 U. S. 219.

POST CONQUESTUM. After the conquest. Words inserted in the king's title by King Edward I., and constantly used in the time of Edward III. Toml.

POST-DATE. To date an instrument a time after that on which it is made. See DATE.

POST DIEM (Lat.). After the day; as, a plea of payment post diem, after the day when the money became due. Com. Dig. Pleader (2 W 29).

POST DISSEISIN. In English Law. The name of a writ which lies for him who, having recovered lands and tenements by force of a novel disseisin, is again disseised by a former disseisor. Jacob, Law Dict.

POST ENTRY. In Maritime Law. An entry made by a merchant upon the importation of goods, after the goods have been weighed, measured, or gauged, to make up the deficiency of the original or prime entry. The custom of making such entries has arisen from the fact that a merchant in making the entry at the time of importation is not or may not be able to calculate exactly the duties which he is liable to pay: he therefore makes an approximately correct entry, which he subsequently corrects by the post entry. See Chitty, Com. L. 746.

POST FACTO. See EX POST FACTO.

POST FINE. A duty formerly paid to the king for a fine acknowledged in his court.

POST LITEM MOTAM (Lat.). After the commencement of the suit.

Declarations or acts of the parties made post litem motam are presumed to be made with reference to the suit then pending, and, for this reason, are not evidence in favor of the persons making them; while those made before an action has been commenced, in some cases, as when a pedigree is to be proved, may be considered as evidence; 4 Camp. 401.

POST-MARK. A stamp or mark put on letters in the postoffice.

Post-marks are evidence of a letter's having passed through the postoffice; 2 Camp. 620; 2 B. & P. 316; 15 East 416; 1 Maule & S. 201; 15 Conn. 206. But they are not evidence per se without proof; 1 Campb. 215; id. 178; 16 M. & W. 124; 3 Stark. 64; R. & R. C. C. 264. The opinion of a person in the habit of receiving letters is, it seems, evidence of the genuineness of a post-mark; 5 Bing. 299. Cited in Stark. Ev., Sharsw. ed. 174, note e. See LETTER; POSTAL SERVICE.

POST MORTEM (Lat.). After death: as, an examination post mortem is an examination made of a dead body to ascertain the cause of death; an inquisition post mortem is one made by the coroner.

It is the duty of the coroner, after death by violence, to cause a post mortem examination to be made by a competent medical authority. A physician thus employed may, at common law, maintain an action against the county for trouble and labor expended in such examination; Gibson, C. J., in 4 Pa. 269.

A father may maintain an action against one to whom he has intrusted his child for treatment, for an autopsy performed upon it after death; 47 N. E. Rep. 401, where it was held that as the natural guardian of the child, the father had the right to the possession of the dead body. Being entitled to such possession for the purpose of burial, his right against one who unlawfully interferes with it and mutilates it is as great as if that one had unlawfully removed the body from the lot in which it was buried. See 55 Alb. L. J. 434. A widow may recover damages in a similar case for the unlawful dissection of the body of her dead husband; 47 Minn. 307. The right of a person entitled to the possession of a body is thus defined by Patterson, J.: "The right is to the possession of the corpse in the same condition it was in when death supervened. It is the right to what remains when the breath leaves the body, and not merely to such a hacked, hewed, and mutilated corpse as some stranger, an offender against the criminal law, may choose to turn over to an afflicted relative;" 1 App. Div. N. Y. 551; other authorities to the same general effect are 125 Ind. 536; 81 Md. 358; 19 Am. Law Rev. 251; 10 Alb. L. J. 71; 4 Am. L. T. 127; 3 Chic. Leg. N. 378; Perley, Mortuary Law 26. See DEAD BODY.

POST-NATUS (Lat.). Literally, after born; it is used by the old law writers to designate the second son. See PUISNE; POST-NATI.

POST NOTES. A species of bank-notes payable at a distant period, and not on demand. 2 W. & S. 463. A kind of bank-notes intended to be transmitted at a distance by post. See 24 Me. 36.

POST-NUPTIAL. Something which takes place after marriage: as, a post-nuptial settlement, which is a conveyance made generally by the husband for the benefit of the wife.

A post-nuptial settlement is either with or without consideration. The former is valid even against creditors, when in other respects it is untainted with fraud; 4 Mas. 443; 2 Bail. 477. The latter, when made without consideration, if bona fide, and the husband be not involved at the time, and it be not disproportionate to his means, taking his debts and situation into consideration, is valid; 4 Mas. 443. See 4 Dall. 304; SETTLEMENT; VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE.

POST-OBIT (Lat.). An agreement by which the obligor borrows a certain sum of money and promises to pay a larger sum, exceeding the lawful rate of interest, upon the death of a person from whom he has some expectation, if the obligor be then living. 7 Mass. 119; 6 Madd. 111; 5 Ves. 57; 19 id. 628. See CATCHING BARGAIN; EXPECTANCY; MACEDONIAN DECREE.

POSTOFFICE. A government office for the receipt and delivery of the mail.

All the streets of the city are post roads, because they are letter carrier routes, as are all public roads and highways while kept up and maintained as such; 1 Suppl. 423; and all railroads; 148 U. S. 92; 160 id. 1, 40; 38 Fed. Rep. 552; all the waters, canals, and plank roads of the United States during the time the mail is carried thereon; R. S. § 3964. See also 3 How. 151; 13 Ct. Cl. 199.

The power to establish postoffices does not enable the postmaster-general to bind the government by leasing a postoffice for twenty years when there is no appropriation therefor; 155 U. S. 489.

The top of a letter-box is not an authorized depository for mail matter; 17 Op. A. G. 524.

A repair shop though designated as a station is not a branch postoffice or station; 30 Ct. Cl. 59.

Where goods are sent by mail the postoffice is the agent of the buyer and not the seller; [1898] A. C. 200; and when they are delivered by the seller to the postoffice the title vests in the buyer; id. 204.

No person shall furnish any private conveyance for letters or packets, or in any manner cause or provide for the conveyance of the same by regular trips or at stated periods over any post route or between places between which the mail is carried. See 16 Fed. Rep. 609.

POST ROADS. See POSTOFFICE.

POSTAGE. The money charged by law for carrying and delivering mail matter.

The rates of postage between places in the United States are fixed by law; the rates of postage upon foreign letters are fixed by arrangements entered into by the postmaster-general, in pursuance of authority vested in him by congress for that purpose.

All mailable matter is divided into four classes: letters, embracing all correspondence wholly or partly in writing, except that mentioned in the third class; regular printed matter, embracing all mailable matter exclusively in print and regularly issued at stated periods, without addition by writing, mark, or sign; see 12 How. 284; 4 Opin. Atty. Genl. 10; miscellaneous matter, including pamphlets, occasional publications, books, book-manuscripts, and proof-sheets, whether corrected or not, maps, prints, engravings, blanks, flexible patterns, samples, and sample cards, phonographic paper, letter envelopes, postal envelopes or wrappers, cards, paper, plain or ornamental, photographic representations of different types, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, and scions, and all other matters not embraced in the first, second, and third classes and which does not exceed four pounds in weight; U. S. Rev. Stat. 2 Suppl. 507.

The postmaster-general is authorized and directed to furnish and issue to the public, with postage stamps impressed upon them, "postal-cards," which cards shall be used as a means of postal intercourse, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the postmaster-general, and when so used shall be transmitted through the mails at a postage charge of one cent each. R. S. § 3916.

It is lawful to transmit through the mail, free of postage, any letters, packages, or other matters, relating exclusively to the business of the government of the United States, provided that every such letter or package, to entitle it to pass free, shall bear over the words "official business," an indorsement showing also the name of the department and bureau or office, as the case may be, whence transmitted; R. S. 1 Supp. p. 288.

Senators, representatives, and delegates in congress, the secretary of the senate, and clerk of the house of representatives, may send and receive through the mail all public documents printed by order of congress; and the name of each senator, representative, delegate, secretary of the senate, and clerk of the house shall be written thereon, with the proper designation of the office he holds, and the provisions of this act apply to each of the persons named therein until the first of December following the expiration of his term of office; R. S. 1 Supp. p. 288.

POSTAGE-STAMPS. The act of congress approved March 3, 1847, section 11, and the act of congress of March 3, 1841, sections 3, 4, provide that, to facilitate the transportation of letters in the mail, the postmaster-general be authorized to prepare postage-stamps, which when attached to any letter or packet shall be evidence of the payment of the postage chargeable on such letter. The same sections declare that any person who shall falsely or fraudulently make, utter, or forge any post-stamp, with the intent to defraud the postoffice department, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And if any person shall use or attempt to use, in prepayment of postage, any postage-stamp which shall have been used before for like purposes, such person shall be subject to a penalty of fifty dollars for every such offence; to be recovered in the name of the United States, in any court of competent jurisdiction. See, also, Act of Mar. 3, 1851, 9 Stat. at L. 589; Act of Aug. 31, 1852, 10 Stat. at L. 141; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 249, § 28. It is made penal to sell stamps or stamped envelopes for a larger sum than that indicated on the stamp or than is charged by the department; Act of Mar. 3, 1855, 10 Stat. at L. 642. See R. S. § 5468. Postmasters and other postal employes are forbidden to dispose of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, or postal cards except for cash, or sell or dispose of them for any larger or less sum than the values indicated on their faces; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 187.

POSTAL SERVICE. That relating to the mails, their transmission and delivery.

The act of July 26, 1892, provides that after a general advertisement for the transportation of the mails, the postmaster-general may secure any mail service that may become necessary, and the contract shall be made with the lowest bidder. Where a contract is awarded to the lowest bidder, it can be changed only in the manner provided in §§ 3957–3959; 31 Ct. Cl. 382. The contract should be in the name of the United States; 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 112; and the bid must have with it an acceptable bond; 17 id. 294. Under § 3962 the postmaster-general may by order make a mail service subject to fines and deductions; 24 Ct. Cl. 61, 350; 26 id. 344.

A contractor for mail messenger service is not required to haul mail bags for repairs to and from a subsequently established repair shop; 30 Ct. Cl. 59.

The compensation of mail contractors is fixed by contract and by law of congress. The postmaster-general may make deduction for failure to perform services, and may also deduct the price of the trip in all cases where the trip is not performed; 24 Ct. Cl. 61; 26 id. 344. Compensation for additional services in carrying the mail is not to be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original services; 131 U. S. 31, 35. The original letting, and not any subsequent increase of service or pay, is made the standard of limitation under § 3960; 17 Op. Atty. Gen. 166. If an allowance is made under false representations or by mistake, the money paid can be recovered; 132 U. S. 271, 644; 135 id. 550; and money received under an expedited schedule as payment for additional horses and men and never used, though allowed in the order of expedition, was held bound to be subject to being refunded to the United States; 132 U. S. 271. The clause providing that the compensation should not be in excess of the exact proportion does not prevent its being less; 19 Op. Atty. Gen. 147.

Most of the criminal legislation of congress rests upon no express grant of power, but upon the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers conferred; Ordron. Const. Leg. 559. The power to establish postoffices and post roads includes the power to punish offences committed against its administration, by whatever name it may be known; 13 Blatch. 335; 2 Cra. 212; 7 Wall. 482; and to forbid the use of the mails to carry matter which disseminates crime and immorality; 143 U. S. 110.

Opening a letter which had been in the postoffice, before delivery to the person to whom it was directed, with the intent to pry into his correspondence, is an offence against the postal laws, even though the letter was not sealed at the time; 2 Curt. 265; and though it come from a criminal and is supposed to contain improper information; 1 Biss. 227; 162 U. S. 420; but in order to constitute an offence against the postal laws the letter must have been in the custody of the postmaster or his agents; 20 Fed. Rep. 625.

Obstructing mails. The United States may enjoin obstructions to highways used in interstate commerce and in transporting the mails; 158 U. S. 564. This applies to obstructions upon railroads and electric railways, and includes employes who suddenly desert their work: id.; 55 Fed. Rep. 380; 44 id. 592. See LABOR UNION.

Arresting a letter carrier on an indictment for murder is not obstructing the mail; 7 Wall. 482. A state statute which necessarily interferes with speedy and uninterrupted carriage of the United States mails cannot be considered as a reasonable police regulation; 163 U. S. 642. The committing an unprovoked assault upon a postmaster, the necessary result whereof was an obstruction and retarding of the passage of the mail, is an offence, unless the act was independent and disconnected from the postoffice and matters pertaining thereto; 14 Fed. Rep. 127.

A person having a lien against horses for their keeping cannot enforce the same in such a manner as to stop the United States mail in a stage coach drawn by such horses; 3 Hughes 545. But no offence is committed by enforcing it unless the mail is in transitu and unless the horses or vehicle taken are actually being used in carrying mail; id. It has been held that it is an offence under the statute to stop a mail train although one had obtained a judgment and writ of execution from a state court against the railway company; 3 Fed. Rep. 478. It is not an offence under the statute to restrain the driver of a mail coach from driving through a crowded city at such a rate as seriously to endanger the lives of the citizens; 9 Pet. 390. Restricting the speed of trains to six miles an hour by city ordinance does not obstruct the mails; 5 Op. Atty. Gen. 554.

Larceny and robbery. Embezzlement or destruction of mail matter by an employe in any department of the postal service is an offence against the postal laws. This statute has been held to create two distinct offences; viz.: (1) the embezzlement of a letter carried in the United States mail, and (2) the stealing of its contents; and one may be punished separately for each offence; 37 Fed. Rep. 200; 34 id. 316; and see 134 U. S. 624. Under the statute no one can be convicted who is not an employe of the postoffice department; 1 McLean 499; 2 id. 14. One who steals from the mail, whether an employe or not, commits an offence against the postal laws; 35 Fed. Rep. 59; and in taking or abstracting articles or receiving them when so taken, with the object of opening, secreting, destroying, embezzling, or stealing the same constitutes the offence; 37 Fed. Rep. 108.

As to the use of decoy letters, see that title.

As to using the mails for improper or non-mailable matter, see LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; LOTTERY; OBSCENITY.

See SAVINGS BANKS.

POSTAL UNION. A treaty made at Berne in October, 1874, for the regulation of rates of postage and other matters connected with the postoffice between England and various other countries. See 38 & 39 Vict. c. 22; 1 Hall. Int. L. 286. Several international conferences have since been held on the subject.

POSTEA (Lat. afterwards). In Practice. The indorsement, on the nisi prius record, purporting to be the return of the judge before whom a cause is tried, of what has been done in respect of such record.

It states the day of trial, before what judge, by name, the cause is tried, and also who is or was an associate of such judge; it also states the appearance of the parties by their respective attorneys, or their defaults, and the summoning and choice of the jury, whether those who were originally summoned, or those who were tales, or taken from the standers-by; it then states the finding of the jury upon oath, and, according to the description of the action, and the assessment of the damages, with the occasion thereof, together with the costs.

These are the usual matters of fact contained in the postea; but it varies with the description of the action. See Lee, Dict. Postea; 2 Lilly, Abr. 337; 16 Viner, Abr. 465; Bacon, Law Tr. 127.

When the trial is decisive, and neither the law nor the facts can afterwards be controverted, the postea is delivered by the proper officer to the attorney of the successful party, to sign his judgment; but it not unfrequently happens that after a verdict has been given there is just cause to question its validity: in such case the postea remains in the custody of the court. Eunomus, Dial. 2, § 33, p. 116.

POSTERIORES (Lat.). This term was used by the Romans to denote the descendants in a direct line beyond the sixth degree. It is still used in making genealogical tables.

POSTERIORITY. Being or coming after. It is a word of comparison, the correlative of which is priority: as, when a man holds lands from two landlords, he holds from his ancient landlord by priority, and from the other by posteriority. Co. 2d Inst. 392.

These terms, priority and posteriority, are also used in cases of liens: the first are prior liens, and are to be paid in the first place; the last are posterior liens, and are not entitled to payment until the former have been satisfied.

POSTERITY. All the descendants of a person in a direct line to the remotest generation. 8 Bush 527.

POSTHUMOUS CHILD. One born after the death of its father; or, when the Cæsarean operation is performed, after that of the mother. The doctrine is universally adopted throughout the United States, that posthumous children inherit in the same manner as if born during the father's life; and this relates back to the conception of the child, if it is born alive; 3 Washb. R. P. *412; 4 Paige 52; 30 Pa. 173; Mitch. R. E. 231. The court will allow a longer time than nine months for the birth of the child, when the opinion of physicians, or circumstances warrant it; 2 Greenl. Cruise, R. P. 140.

When a father makes a will without providing for a posthumous child, the will is generally considered as revoked, pro tanto; 3 Washb. R. P. 699, 412; 4 Kent 412, 521, n., 525; 28 Am. Rep. 486; 160 Pa. 433.

In most of the states there are statutes providing that in case of future estates or remainders limited to heirs, issue, or children of any person, posthumous children take as if living at the death of the parent without the limitation of an estate to support contingent remainders; and most of such statutes also provide that the future estate limited to take effect on the death of a person without heirs, etc., is defeated by the birth of a posthumous child. In a few states the time within which such child must be born is limited to ten months after the death of the father. See 31 Fla. 139; LEGACY; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; EN VENTRE SA MERE.

POSTLIMINIUM (Lat. from post, after, and limen, threshold). A fiction of the civil law, by which persons or things taken by the enemy were restored to their former state on coming again under the power of the nation to which they formerly belonged. Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Kent 108. It is also recognized by the law of nations. But movables are not entitled to the benefit of this rule, by strict law of nations, unless promptly recaptured. If recaptured after twenty-four hours they vest in the recaptor, subject, amongst most nations, to revest in the owner, upon payment of military salvage; Risley, Law of War 143.

The rule does not affect property which is brought into a neutral territory; 1 Kent 108. It is so called from the return of the person or thing over the threshold or boundary of the country from which it was taken.

When an enemy's military occupation comes to an end, the legal state of things previously existing is deemed to have been in continuous existence during the occupation. Postliminium applies to territory, to private immovable property, and to every kind of property that may not lawfully be seized. But property, public or private, that has been lawfully taken by an enemy, such as booty or treasure, is not subject to the fiction. Acts done once and for all, within an invader's competence to perform, hold good. There is no postliminium as regards lawful prize, though it is said there may be by recapture; which, if it occur before capture is complete, may have effects like those of postliminium, though the latter fiction does not include any idea of salvage; Risley, Law of War 143.

The jus postliminii in international law is derived from a similar term in the Roman law by which persons and property captured by an enemy and then recaptured are restored to their original owner. The term now applies almost exclusively to property both real and personal which when recaptured does not belong to the recaptor but to the original owner. Snow, Int. Law 116.

POSTLIMINY. See POSTLIMINIUM.

POSTMAN. A senior barrister in the court of exchequer, who has precedence in motions; so called from place where he sits. 2 Bla. Com. 28; Wharton, Dict. A letter-carrier. Webster, Dict.

POSTMASTER. An officer who keeps a postoffice, attending to the receipt, forwarding, and delivery of letters and other matter passing through the mail.

Postmasters must reside within the delivery district for which they are appointed. For those offices where the salary or compensation is less than a thousand dollars a year, the postmaster-general appoints; where it is more, the president. Postmasters are divided into four classes, exclusive of the postmaster at New York, according to the amount of salary; those of the first class receiving three thousand or more, those of the fourth less than one thousand; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 110; id. 417. They must give bond to the United States of America; see 19 How. 73; Gilp. 54; which remains in force, for suit upon violation, during the term; 1 W. & M. 150; for three, formerly two, years after the expiration of the term of office; R. S. § 3838; 7 How. 681. See R. S. § 3836.

Where an office is designated as a money-order office, the bond of the postmaster shall contain an additional condition for the faithful performance of all duties and obligations in connection with the money-order business; R. S. § 3834.

The presumption that public officers do their duty applies to the duty of postmasters to report a contractor's delinquencies; 132 U. S. 644.

Every postmaster is required to keep an office in the place for which he may be appointed; and it is his duty to receive and forward by mail, without delay, all letters, papers, and packets as directed, to receive the mails, and deliver, at all reasonable hours, all letters, papers, and packets to the persons entitled thereto.

Every person who, without authority from the postmaster-general, sets up any office bearing the title of postoffice is liable to a penalty of $500 for each offence; R. S. § 3829.

A postmaster is liable for all losses occasioned by his own default in office; 3 Wils. 443; Cowp. 754; 5 Burr. 2709; Edw. Bailm. 483; 1 Bell, Com. 468; 2 Kent 474; Story, Bailm. § 463; see 97 Ala. 710; but in order to make him liable for negligence, it must appear that the loss or injury sustained was in consequence of such negligence; 7 Cra. 242; 6 Barb. 232. He is bound only to the exercise of due diligence in the care of matter deposited in the post-office; 15 Wall. 337. See 1 Ld. Raym. 646, where the question is elaborately discussed.

A postmaster is liable for the acts of his clerks or servants who were not regularly appointed and sworn as his assistants; 28 Vt. 668; 106 Mass. 446. In Pennsylvania it has been decided that he is not responsible for their secret delinquencies; though, perhaps, he is answerable for want of attention to the official conduct of his subordinates; 8 Watts 453; but see 97 Ala. 710. An attempt to induce a postmaster to sell stamps on credit is in violation of a statute providing against the attempt to influence any officer of the United States to a violation of his lawful duties; 136 U. S. 257.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL. The chief officer of the postoffice department of the executive branch of the government of the United States.

His duties, in brief, are, among other things, to establish postoffices and appoint postmasters (see POSTMASTER) at convenient places upon the post-roads established by law; to give instructions for conducting the business of the department; to provide for the carriage of the mails; to obtain from the postmasters balances due, with accounts and vouchers of expenses; to pay the expenses of the department; see 15 Pet. 377; to prosecute offences, and, generally, to superintend the business of the department in all the duties assigned to it. He is assisted by four assistants and a large corps of clerks,—the four assistants being appointed by the president. He must make ten several reports annually to congress, relating chiefly to the financial management of the department, with estimates of the expenses of the department for the ensuing year. R. S. § 418. He is a member of the cabinet. See R. S. §§ 388–414; DEPARTMENT; OFFICER.

POSTNATI (Lat.). Those born after. Applied to American and British subjects born after the separation of England and the United States; also to the subjects of Scotland born after the union of England and Scotland. Those born after an event, as opposed to antenati, those born before. 2 Kent 56; 2 Pick. 395; 5 Day 169*. See ANTENATI.

POSTPONE. To put off; to delay; to continue or adjourn, as to postpone a hearing.

POSTULATIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. The name of the first act in a criminal proceeding.

A person who wished to accuse another of a crime appeared before the prætor and requested his authority for that purpose, designating the person intended. This act was called postulatio. The postulant (calumnium jurabat) made oath that he was not influenced by a spirit of calumny, but acted in good faith with a view to the public interest. The prætor received this declaration, at first made verbally, but afterwards in writing, and called a libel. The postulatio was posted up in the forum, to give public notice of the names of the accuser and the accused. A second accuser sometimes appeared and went through the same formalities.

Other persons were allowed to appear and join the postulant or principal accuser. These were said postulare subscriptionem, and were denominated subscriptores. Cic. in Cæcil. Divin. 15. But commonly such persons acted concurrently with the postulant, and inscribed their names at the time he first appeared. Only one accuser, however, was allowed to act; and if the first inscribed did not desist in favor of the second, the right was determined, after discussion, by judges appointed for the purpose. Cic. in Verr. i. 6. The preliminary proceeding was call divinatio, and is well explained in the oration of Cicero entitled Divinatio. See Aulus Gellius, Att. Noct. lib. ii. cap. 4.

The accuser having been determined in this manner, he appeared before the prætor, and formally charged the accused by name, specifying the crime. This was called nominis et criminis delatio. The magistrate reduced it to writing, which was called inscriptio, and the accuser and his adjuncts, if any, signed it, subscribebant. This proceeding corresponds to the indictment of the common law.

If the accused appeared, the accuser formally charged him with the crime. If the accused confessed it, or stood mute, he was adjudged to pay the penalty. If he denied it, the inscriptio contained his answer, and he was then in reatu (indicted, as we should say), and was called reus, and a day was fixed, ordinarily after an interval of at least ten days, according to the nature of the case, for the appearance of the parties. In the case of Verres, Cicero obtained one hundred and ten days to prepare his proofs; although he accomplished it in fifty days, and renounced, as he might do, the advantage of the remainder of the time allowed him.

At the day appointed for the trial, the accuser and his adjuncts or colleagues, the accused, and the judges, were summoned by the herald of the prætor. If the accuser did not appear, the case was erased from the roll. If the accused made default, he was condemned. If both parties appeared, a jury was drawn by the prætor or judex quæstionis. The jury was called jurati homines and the drawing of them sortitio, and they were, taken from a general list made out for the year. Either party had a right to object to a certain extent to the persons drawn; and then there was a second drawing called subsortitio, to complete the number.

In some tribunals quæstiones (the jury) were editi (produced) in equal number by the accuser and the accused, and sometimes by the accuser alone, and were objected to or challenged in different ways, according to the nature of the case. The number of the jury also varied according to the tribunal (quæstio): they were sworn before the trial began. Hence they were called jurati.

The accusers, and often the subscriptores, were heard, and afterwards the accused, either by himself or by his advocates, of whom he commonly had several.

After the pleadings were concluded, the prætor or the judex quæstionis distributed tablets to the jury, upon which each wrote, secretly, either the letter A. (absolvo), or the letter C. (condemno), or N. L. (non liquet). These tablets were deposited in an urn. The president assorted and counted the tablets. If the majority were for acquitting the accused, the magistrate declared it by the words fecisse non videtur, and by the words fecisse videtur if the majority were for a conviction. If the tablets marked N. L. were so many as to prevent an absolute majority for a conviction or acquittal, the cause was put off for more ample information, ampliatio, which the prætor declared by the word amplius. Such, in brief, was the course of proceedings before the quæstiones perpetuæ.

The forms observed in the comitia centuriata and comitia tributa were nearly the same, except the composition of the tribunal and the mode of declaring the vote.

POSTULATIO ACTIONIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Demand of an action (actio) from the prætor, which some explain to be a demand of a formula, or form of the suit; others, a demand of leave to bring the cause before the judge. Taylor, Civ. Law 80; Calvinus, Lex. Actio.

POT-DE-VIN. In French Law. A sum of money frequently paid at the moment of entering into a contract, beyond the price agreed upon.

It differs from arrha in this that it is no part of the price of the thing sold, and that the person who has received it cannot by returning double the amount, or the other party by losing what he has paid, rescind the contract; 18 Toullier, n. 52.

POTENTATE. One who has a great power over an extended country; a sovereign.

By the naturalization laws of the United States, an alien is required, before he can be naturalized, to renounce all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereign whatever.

POTENTIALLY. In possibility, not in act, not positively; in efficacy, not in actuality. 19 Neb. 556.

POTESTAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Power; authority; domination; empire. Imperium, or the jurisdiction of magistrates. The power of the father over his children, patria potestas. The authority of masters over their slaves, which makes it nearly synonymous with dominium. See Inst. 1. 9. 12; Dig. 2. 1. 13. 1; 14. 1; 14. 4. 1. 4.

POUND. A place, enclosed by public authority, for the temporary detention of stray animals. 4 Pick. 258; 9 id. 14.

Animals may not be impounded unless they are suffered by the owner to run at large within the strict construction of the statute; 1 Aik. 316; if the impounding is illegal, they can be recovered by the owner; 28 Me. 481; 21 N. H. 448; 23 Vt. 674. If it is legal, the owner must pay the costs imposed; 20 Ill. 363; and the pound-keeper need not deliver over the animals until all legal charges are paid; 5 Cush. 263; 39 Vt. 34; the impounder has the right to use the same force to maintain his possession as a sheriff has to protect his possession under legal process; 36 Vt. 625.

Where the proper officer finds cattle running at large in public streets, he may pursue them upon private property; 63 Me. 84; but when a man finds strange cattle in his field, he is not bound to impound or retain them for the owner, but may drive them off into the highway; 18 Pick. 227; if, however, he impounds, he must feed and water them properly, according to the usage of the country and good husbandry; 13 id. 384; he must proceed strictly according to the statute, or he will be a trespasser; 16 Pa. 22; notice must be given before the impounded animal can be sold; 126 Mass 364; and such notice must state the legal charges; 16 Metc. 198. Laws authorizing the impounding and sale of stock without notice or judicial investigation are held to be unconstitutional as authorizing a sale of private property without due process of law; 35 N. Y. 302; 98 N. C. 44; 64 Miss. 283; but it has been held that such laws are valid under the police power; 58 Wis. 144. See ANIMAL; ESTRAY; RUNNING AT LARGE.

Weights. There are two kinds of weights, namely, the troy and the avoirdupois. The pound avoirdupois is greater than the troy pound in the proportion of seven thousand to five thousand seven hundred and sixty. The troy pound contains twelve ounces, that of avoirdupois sixteen ounces.

Money. The sum of twenty shillings. Previous to the establishment of the federal currency, the different states made use of the pound in computing money: it was of different value in the several states.

Pound Sterling is a denomination of money of Great Britain. It is of the value of a sovereign (q. v.). In calculating the rates of duties, the pound sterling shall be considered and taken as of the value of four dollars and eighty-six cents and six and one-half mills; R. S. § 3565.

The pound sterling of Ireland is to be computed, in calculating said duties, at four dollars and ten cents; id.

POUND-BREACH. The offence of breaking a pound in order to take out the cattle impounded. 3 Bla. Com. 146. The writ de parco fracto, or pound-breach, lies for recovering damages for this offence; also case. Id. It is also indictable.

POUND-KEEPER. An officer charged with the care of a pound, and of animals confined there.

POUNDAGE. In Practice. The amount allowed to the sheriff, or other officer, for commissions on the money made by virtue of an execution. This allowance varies in different states and to different officers.

POUR FAIRE PROCLAIMER. An ancient writ addressed to the mayor or bailiff of a city or town, requiring him to make proclamation concerning nuisances, etc. Fitz. Nat. B. 176.

POURPARLER. In French Law. The conversations and negotiations which have taken place between the parties in order to make an agreement. These form no part of the agreement. Pardessus, Dr. Com. 142.

POURSUIVANT. A follower; a pursuer. In the ancient English law, it signified an officer who attended upon the king in his wars, at the council-table, exchequer, in his court, etc., to be sent as a messenger. A poursuivant was, therefore, a messenger of the king.

POVERTY AFFIDAVIT. An affidavit furnished by a party to a suit that he is not able to furnish security for costs. 36 Kan. 263. In the United States courts, an affidavit of poverty for the purpose of avoiding the giving of a cost bond, may be filed after the granting, on notice to plaintiff, of an order for such bond; 82 Fed. Rep. 865.

POWER. The right, ability, or faculty of doing something.

The distinction between "power" and "right," whatever may be its value in ethics, in law is very shadowy and unsubstantial. He who has legal power to do anything has the legal right; 143 Pa. 64.

Technically, an authority by which one person enables another to do some act for him. 2 Lilly, Abr. 339.

Derivative Powers are those which are received from another. This division includes all the powers technically so called. They are of the following classes:—

Coupled with an interest, being a right or authority to do some act, together with an interest in the subject on which the power is to be exercised. Marshall, C. J., 8 Wheat. 203; and the interest coupled with a power in order to make it irrevocable, must be an interest in the thing itself; 125 U. S. 342.

A power of this class survives the person creating it, and, in case of an excess in execution, renders the act valid so far as the authority extends, leaving it void as to the remainder only. It includes powers of sale conferred on a mortgagee.

Naked, being a right of authority disconnected from any interest of the donee in the subject-matter. 3 Hill, N. Y. 365. In the case of a naked power not coupled with an interest the law requires that every prerequisite to the exercise of that power should precede it; 4 Wheat. 77; 134 U. S. 256. A naked power given to several persons cannot be executed by the survivors; 16 Beav. 233.

Inherent Powers. Those which are enjoyed by the possessors of natural right, without having been received from another. Such are the powers of a people to establish a form of government, of a father to control his children. Some of these are regulated and restricted in their exercise by law, but are not technically considered in the law as powers.

Powers under the Statute of Uses. An authority enabling a person, through the medium of the statute of uses, to dispose of an interest in real property, vested either in himself or another person.

Methods of causing a use, with its accompanying estate, to spring up at the will of a given person. Will. R. P., 16th ed. 333; 2 Washb. R. P. 300.

The right to designate the person who is to take a use. Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note, 231, § 3, pl. 4.

A right to limit a use. 4 Kent 334.

An authority to do some act in relation to lands, or the creation of estates therein, or of charges thereon, which the owner granting or reserving such power might himself lawfully perform.

They are distinguished as—

Appendant. Those which the donee is authorized to exercise out of the estate limited to him, and which depend for their validity upon the estate which is in him. 2 Washb. R. P. 304. A life-estate limited to a man, with a power to grant leases in possession, is an example. Hardr. 416; 1 Cai. Cas. 15; Sugd. Pow. 107; Burton, R. P. § 179.

Of appointment. Those which are to create new estates. Distinguished from powers of revocation.

Collateral. Those in which the donee has no estate in the land. 2 Washb. R. P. 305.

General. Those by which the donee is at liberty to appoint to whom he pleases.

In gross. Those which give a donee, who has an estate in the land, authority to create such estates only as will not attach on the interest limited to him or take effect out of his own interest. 2 Cow. 236; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 293; Watk. Conv. 260.

Of revocation. Those which are to divest or abridge an existing estate. Distinguished from those of appointment; but the distinction is of doubtful exactness, as every new appointment must divest or revoke a former use. Sanders, Uses 154.

As to the effect of the insertion of a power of revocation, either single or in connection with one of appointment, see Styles 389; 2 Washb. R. P. 307.

Special. Those in which the donee is restricted to an appointment to or among particular objects only. 2 Washb. R. P. 307.

The person bestowing a power is called the donor; the person on whom it is bestowed is called the donee.

The person who receives the estate by appointment is called the appointee; the donee of the power is sometimes called the appointor.

The creation of a power may be by deed or will; 2 Washb. R. P. 314; Mitch. R. E.

506; by grant to a grantee, or reservation to the grantor; 4 Kent 319; and the reservation need not be in the same instrument, if made at the same time; 1 Sugd. Pow. 158; by any form of words indicating an intention; 2 Washb. R. P. 315. The doubt whether a power is created or an estate conveyed can, in general, exist only in cases of wills; 2 Washb. R. P. 316; and in any case is determined by the intention of the grantor or devisor, as expressed in or to be gathered from the whole will or deed; 10 Pet. 532; 8 How. 10; 3 Cow. 651; 6 Watts 87; 4 Bibb 307. It must be limited to be executed, and must be executed within the period fixed by the rules against perpetuities; 5 Bro. P. C. 592; 2 Ves. 368; 13 Sim. 393.

The interest of the donee is not an estate; Watk. Conv. 271; 2 Prest. Abstr. 275; but is sufficient to enable the donee to act, if the intention of the donor be clear, without words of inheritance; 3 Ves. 467; 1 P. Wms. 171; 7 Johns. Ch. 34; see Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note 231; and may coexist with the absolute fee in the donee; 10 Ves. 255; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 241, n. As a general rule a power to sell does not include a power to mortgage; 3 Hill N. Y. 361; 66 Tex. 31; 89 Va. 873; but where it is for raising a particular charge, and the estate itself is settled or devised subject to that charge, then it may be proper under the circumstances to raise the money by mortgage, and the court will support it as a conditional sale; 1 De G. M. & G. 645; 3 Jur. N. S. 1143; Sugd. Powers 425; and sale generally means a cash sale; 4 Kent 331; 3 Hill N. Y. 373. See infra.

As to exercising the power. If it be simply one in which no person is interested but the donee, it is a matter of election on his part whether to exercise it or not; 1 Sugd. Pow. 158; see infra; but if coupled with a trust in which other persons are interested, equity will compel an execution; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1062; 2 Mas. 244, 251.

A power to appoint by will, conferred on a life tenant, does not empower him to devise the land for the payment of his own debts; 69 Md. 390. But a power conferred by will to invest or use includes the power to sell; 115 N. C. 40.

The execution must be in the manner prescribed, by the proper person, see APPOINTMENT, and cannot be by an assignee; 2 Washb. R. P. 321; unless authorized by the limitation; 4 Cruise, Dig. 211; or unless an interest be coupled with the power; 2 Cow. 236; 8 Wheat. 203; nor by a successor, as on the death of an executor; 13 Metc. 220. As to whether a sale by a donee who has also an estate in the land is held to be an execution of the power, see 2 Washb. R. P. 325; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 306; 5 B. & C. 720; 6 Co. 18; 16 Pa. 25.

A power to sell gives authority to sell for cash only, and does not uphold a mere exchange; 140 U. S. 253; 22 How. 75; 62 Ia. 91; Perry, Trusts § 769; or mortgage; 15 Minn. 212; 6 Cush. 117; 66 Tex. 31; contra, 151 Pa. 322; 163 id. 626; and see 153 Mass. 137.

Where three executors, given power to sell real estate, have accepted the trust, one alone cannot execute the power; 73 Tex. 293; and in a devise to two sisters to sell if they desired, the power can only be exercised by their joint deed and is lost by the death of either of them; 56 Conn. 316. A power given by will cannot be delegated, but an appointment under it need not allude to the power; 88 Va. 588.

Where an exact execution is impossible under authority of court, it may be executed as near as may be (cy-près) to carrying out the donor's intention; 2 Term 241; 4 Ves. 681; 5 Sim. 632; 3 Wash. C. C. 12.

It must be made at a proper time, and, where several powers are given over different parts of the same estate, in proper succession; 1 Co. 174; 1 W. Bla. 281.

Equity will compel the donee to execute a power where it is coupled with a trust in which other persons are interested; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1062; and to correct a formal defect in the manner of execution; 2 P. Wms. 489, 622; 2 Mas. 251; 3 Edw. Ch. 175.

Three classes of cases have been held sufficient demonstrations of an intended exercise of a power: 1. Where there has been some reference in the will, or other instrument, to the power; 2. or a reference to the property, which is the subject on which it is to be executed; 3. or when the provisions in the will or other instrument, executed by the donee of the power, would otherwise be ineffectual or a mere nullity, in other words it would have no operation, except as an execution of the power; 134 U. S. 590. See 98 id. 326; 109 id. 366; 33 N. Y. 392; 92 Ill. 538.

The suspension or destruction of a power may sometimes happen by a release by the donee, by an alienation of his estate, by his death, and by other circumstances.

An appendant power may be suspended by a conveyance of his interest by the donee; 4 Cruise, Dig. 221; Cro. Car. 472; 4 Bingh. N. C. 734; 2 Cow. 237; and may be extinguished by such conveyance; 2 B. & Ald. 93; 10 Ves. 246; or by a release; 1 Russ. & M. 431, 436, n.; 1 Co. 102 b; 2 Washb. R. P. 308.

Illusory powers. It was held at common law that when a power is given to appoint among certain persons, it is a sufficient and legal exercise of the power if a large part of property is appointed to some of the beneficiaries and very little to the others. Thus a power to appoint a thousand dollars between A. and B. would be satisfied if nine hundred and ninety-nine were given to A. and only one dollar to B. The courts of equity interfered in such case and compelled a substantial distribution to prevent the appointment becoming illusory or a fraud on the power. But by 1 Wm. IV. c. 36, the common-law rule was restored; 44 Pa. 527; 66 Pa. 248.

A power in gross may be released to one having the freehold in possession, reversion, or remainder, and not by any other act of the donee; Tud. Lead Cas. 294; Burt. R. P. § 176; Chance, Pow. § 3172; Hardr. 416; 1 P. Wms. 777; an infant may execute a power in gross; 7 Ch. D. 728.

A collateral power cannot be suspended or destroyed by act of the donee; F. Moo. 605; 5 Mod. 457; such a power may be executed by an infant; 4 Kent 342. And see 1 Russ. & M. 431; 13 Metc. 220.

Impossibility of immediate vesting in interest or possession does not suspend or extinguish a power; 2 Bingh. 144. A power of sale in a mortgage for condition broken is not revoked by the mortgagor's death; 143 Mass. 49; 4 S. D. 604. In general, a power of sale is exhausted by a single exercise of power; 30 Fed. Rep. 532.

A power may be executed by a married woman; 4 Kent 342; but she will not be compelled to exercise a power of appointment of which she is donee for the benefit of her creditors; 17 Q. B. D. 521.

For the distinction between political and judicial power, see 78 Ill. 261; 75 id. 152; 29 Mich. 451; 43 Ia. 452; 114 Mass. 247; s. c. 19 Am. Rep. 341; 10 Bush 72; Cooley, Const. Lim. 122.

POWER OF ATTORNEY. An instrument authorizing a person to act as the agent or attorney of the person granting it. It is often called letter of attorney.

A general power authorizes the agent to act generally in behalf of the principal.

A special power is one limited to particular acts.

It may be by parol or under seal. 1 Pars. Contr. 94. The attorney cannot, in general, execute a sealed instrument so as to bind his principal, unless the power be under seal; 2 B. & P. 338; 5 B. & C. 355; 2 Me. 358. See 7 M. & W. 322, 331; 7 Cra. 299; 4 Wash. C. C. 471; 19 Johns. 60; 2 Pick. 345.

Powers of attorney are strictly construed; 6 Cush. 117; 5 Wheat. 326; 8 M. & W. 806; 5 Bingh. 442. General terms used with reference to a particular subject-matter are presumed to be used in subordination to that matter; 7 B. & C. 278; 5 Den. 49; 7 Gray 287. See, as to a power to collect a debt; 1 Blackf. 252; to settle a claim; 5 M. & W. 645; 8 Blackf. 291; to make an adjustment of all claims; 8 Wend. 494; 7 Watts 716; 14 Cal. 399; 7 Ala. N. S. 800; to accept bills; 7 B. & C. 278.

Where a power of attorney is executed in a foreign country in the language of that country, the intention of the writer is to be ascertained by evidence of competent translators and experts, including, if necessary, lawyers of the country, as to the meaning of the language used; and if, according to such evidence, the intention appears to be that the authority shall be acted upon in other countries, the extent of the authority in any country in which the authority is acted upon must be determined by the law of that country; [1891] 1 Q. B. 79.

Third parties dealing with an agent on the basis of a written letter of attorney are not prejudiced by any private instructions from the principal to the agent, unless such instructions are in some way referred to in the letter; 15 Johns. 44; 3 Term 757; 81 N. C. 5; 27 Gratt. 119. Where an agent is acting under such a written letter, it is the duty of third persons to examine the instrument; Story, Ag. § 72. A failure to do this precludes a recovery unless the claim is based on fraud; 1 Pet. 264; Whart. Ag. § 227; 22 N. H. 360; 72 Pa. 351; 53 Md. 28. When a power of attorney is to a partnership as such, a deed executed in the partnership name by one of the partners is good; 81 Tex. 505.

A power of attorney to convey lands is immediately revoked by the death of the principal, and deeds subsequently made by the attorney are void; 50 Fed. Rep. 712; and upon the death of some of the donors of a power of attorney, it is revoked as to them if not as to all; 119 U. S. 156.

See AGENCY; PRINCIPAL.

PRACTICABLE, PRACTICABLY. Practicable is that which may be done, practiced, or accomplished, that which is performable, feasible, possible; and the adverb practically means in a practical manner. 43 Ill. 165.

Reasonably practicable, when used in directing the observance of a set of affirmative and negative rules, will usually apply to the negative; 16 Q. B. D. 340.

Where a statute provides that persons having in charge animals affected with a contagious disease shall notify the police of the fact with all practicable speed, it was held to be necessary that the person shall have knowledge of the animal's being diseased before it becomes neglect to give notice; L. R. 8 C. P. 322.

PRACTICAL LOCATION. Means the same as actual location. 47 Barb. 287.

PRACTICE. The form, manner, and order of conducting and carrying on suits or prosecutions in the courts through their various stages, according to the principles of law and the rules laid down by the respective courts. In its ordinary meaning it is to be distinguished from the pleadings. The term applies to a distinct part of the proceedings of the court. 10 Jur. N. S. 457. In a popular sense, the business which an attorney or counsellor does: as, A B has a good practice.

The books on practice are very numerous: among the most popular are those of Tidd, Chitty, Archbold, Sellon, Graham, Dunlap, Caines, Troubat & Haly, Blake, Impey, Daniell, Benedict, Colby, Curtis, Hall, Law, Day, Abbott.

A settled, uniform, and long-continued practice, without objection, is evidence of what the law is; and such practice is based on principles which are founded in justice and convenience: 2 Russ. 19, 570; 2 Jac. 232; 5 Term 380; 1 Y. & J. 167, 168; 2 C. & M. 55; Ram, Judgm. c. 7.

With respect to criminal practice, it has been forcibly remarked by a learned judge that even where the course of practice in criminal law has been unfavorable to parties accused, and entirely contrary to the most obvious principles of justice and humanity, as well as those of law, it has been held that such practice constituted the law, and could not be altered without the authority of parliament. Per Maule, J., Scott, N. C. 599, 600.

PRACTICE COURT. In English Law. A court attached to the court of king's bench, which heard and determined common matters of business and ordinary motions for writs of mandamus, prohibition, etc.

It was usually called the bail court. It was held by one of the puisne justices of the king's bench.

PRACTICES. A succession of acts of a similar kind or in a like employment. Webst.

PRACTICING. A retired lawyer who tries a case for a neighbor gratuitously, is not a practicing lawyer subject to a penalty for practicing without having paid the license tax. "The term practicing implies something more than a single act or effort." 1 So. Rep. (Miss.) 161; 98 N. C. 644.

PRACTITIONER. He who is engaged in the exercise or employment of any art or profession.

PRÆCEPTORS (Lat.). Heretofore masters in chancery were so called, as having the direction of making out remedial writs. Fleta 76; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 251. A species of benefice, so called from being possessed by the principal templars (præceptores templi), whom the chief master by his authority created. 2 Mon. Ang. 543.

PRÆCIPE, PRECIPE (Lat.). A slip of paper upon which the particulars of a writ are written. It is lodged in the office out of which the required writ is to issue. Wharton, Dict. A written order to the clerk of a court to issue a writ.

PRÆCIPE IN CAPITE. A writ out of chancery for a tenant holding of the crown in capite, viz., in chief. Magna Char. c. 24.

PRÆCIPE QUOD REDDAT (Lat.). Command him to return. An original writ, of which præcipe is the first word, commanding the person to whom it is directed to do a thing or to show cause why he has not done it. 3 Bla. Com. 274; Old, N. B. 13. It is as well applied to a writ of right as to other writs of entry and possession.

PRÆCIPE QUOD TENEAT CONVENTIONEM. The writ which commenced the action of covenant in fines, which are abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

PRÆCIPITIUM. The punishment of casting headlong from some high place.

PRÆCIPUT CONVENTIONNEL. In French Law. Under the régime en communauté, when that is of the conventional kind, if the survivor of husband and wife is entitled to take any portion of the common property by a paramount title and before partition thereof, this right is called by the somewhat barbarous title of the conventional præciput, from præ, before, and capere, to take. Brown.

PRÆDIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Lands.

Prædia urbana, those lands which have buildings upon them and are in the city.

Prædia rustica, those lands which are without buildings or in the country. Voc. Jur. Uta.

Prædia stipendiaria, provincial lands belonging to the people.

Prædia tributaria, provincial lands belonging to the emperor.

Prædia volantia, certain things movable which were ranked among immovable things. 2 Bla. Com. 428.

It indicates a more extensive domain than fundus. Calvinus, Lex.

PRÆDIA BELLI (Lat.). Booty. Property seized in war. See BOOTY.

PRÆDIAL. That which arises immediately from the ground: as, grain of all sorts, hay, wood, fruits, herbs, and the like.

PRÆDIUM DOMINANS (Lat. the ruling estate). In Civil Law. The name given to an estate to which a servitude is due; it is called the ruling estate.

PRÆDIUM RUSTICUM (Lat. a country estate). In Civil Law. By this is understood all heritages which are not destined for the use of man's habitation; such, for example, as lands, meadows, orchards, gardens, woods, even though they should be within the boundaries of a city.

PRÆDIUM SERVIENS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an estate which suffers or yields a service to another estate.

PRÆDIUM URBANUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. By this term is understood buildings and edifices intended for the habitation and use of man, whether they be built in cities or whether they be constructed in the country.

PRÆFECTI APOSTOLICI. Officers of the same character as the Vicarius Apostolicus (q. v.), but without the power of exercising episcopal functions. 2 Phill. Int. L. 529.

PRÆFECTUS URBI. An officer who had the superintendence of the city and its police with jurisdiction extending one hundred miles from the city and power to decide both civil and criminal cases. Whart.

PRÆFECTUS VIGILIUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The chief officer of the night-watch. His jurisdiction extended to certain offences affecting the public peace, and even to larcenies. But he could inflict only slight punishments.

PRÆMUNIRE (Lat.). In order to prevent the pope from assuming the supremacy in granting ecclesiastical livings, a number of statutes were passed in England, during the reigns of Edward I. and his successors, punishing certain acts of submission to the papal authority therein mentioned. In the writ for the execution of these statutes, the words præmunire facias (cause to be forewarned), being used to command a citation of the party, gave not only to the writ, but to the offence itself of maintaining the papal power, the name of præmunire. Co. Litt. 129; Jacob, Law Dict.

The penalties of præmunire were subsequently applied to other offences of various kinds, as the molestation of possessors of abbey lands, the assertion that the houses of parliament have a legislative authority without the sovereign or the sending subjects of the realm into parts beyond the seas. Whart. Law Dict.

PRÆNOMEN. In Civil Law. See COGNOMEN.

PRÆSUMPTIO HOMINIS. A presumption based upon what is probable in human experience, whereby, from a given fact or state of facts, another fact or state of facts may be naturally inferred. Morey, Rom. L. 411.

PRÆSUMPTIO JURIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A deduction from the existence of one fact as to the existence of another, which admits of proof to the contrary. A rebuttable presumption. An intendment of law which holds good until it is weakened by proof or a stronger presumption. Best, Pres. 29.

PRÆSUMPTIO JURIS ET DE JURE (Lat.). In Roman Law. A deduction drawn, by reason of some rule of law, from the existence of one fact as to the existence of another, so conclusively that no proof can be admitted to the contrary. A conclusive presumption.

PRÆTOR. In Roman Law. A municipal officer of Rome, so called because (præiret populo) he went before or took precedence of the people.

The consuls were at first called prætors. Liv. Hist. iii. 55. The word prætor means literally a general and is a title of honor accorded to the counsels in the first centuries of the republic. The prætor was really a third consul who was specially intrusted, not with the military command, but with the administration of justice. This is the reason why, in point of rank (and in the number of his lictors), he was inferior to the consul, though, on principle, his power was consular; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 48, n. 1. He was a sort of minister of justice, invested with certain legislative powers, especially in regard to the forms or formalities of legal proceedings. Ordinarily, he did not decide causes as a judge, but prepared the grounds of decision for the judge, and sent to him the questions to be decided between the parties. The judge was always chosen by the parties, either directly, or by rejecting, under certain rules and limitations, the persons proposed to them by the prætor. Hence the saying of Cicero (pro Cluentio 43) that no one could be judged except by a judge of his own choice. There were several kinds of officers called prætors. See Vicat, Voc.

Before entering on his functions, he published an edict announcing the system adopted by him for the application and interpretation of the laws during his magistracy. The edict issued by the prætor on his taking office was called the edictum perpetuum. It was said that these edicts were of great authority. They were called the jus honorarium "because those who bear honors in the state, that is the magistrate, have given it their sanction; Inst. 1. 2. 7; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 10; the fact that the circumstances and habits of thought, untrammelled as they were under this system, led to the exercise by the prætor of equitable functions and extension of the narrow limits of the old civil law, was a potent factor in the judge-made law which replaced the ancient technical and rigid system by one more flexible. The lex Cornelia (B. C. 67) forbade a prætor to depart during his term from the edict promulgated by him at its beginning. The edicts of preceding prætors were collected and condensed by Salvius Julianus, who had filled the office during the time of Hadrian, this was a final edictum perpetuum, and it was known distinctively by that title. It is doubtful whether after that annual edicts were issued; Sand. Inst. Just. 11; Sohm, Rom. L. § 14; Mack. Rom. L. § 47.

The authority of the prætor extended over all jurisdictions, and was summarily expressed by the words do dico, addico, i. e. do I give the action, dico I declare the law, I promulgate the edict, addico I invest the judge with the right of judging. There were certain cases which he was bound to decide himself, assisted by a council chosen by himself,—perhaps the decemvirs. But the greater part of causes brought before him he sent either to a judge, an arbitrator, or to recuperatores, or to the centumvirs, as before stated. The prætor had no power to legislate, but he might grant or refuse an action; Sohm, Rom. L. 53. Under the empire, the powers of the prætor passed by degrees to the prefect of the prætorium or the prefect of the city; so that this magistrate, who at first ranked with the consuls, at last dwindled into a director or manager of the public spectacles or games.

The prætor urbanus was a special officer appointed to administer justice in the city; afterwards (about 242 B. C.) the increase of business made it necessary to appoint a second prætor, who was called a prætor peregrinus to whom were assigned all cases in which either or both of the parties were foreigners. Prætores tutelares were special magistrates nominated in Rome and vested with the power of appointing tutors which right had previously been exercised by the prætor urbanus.

A prætor fidei commissarius was a magistrate specially appointed to have jurisdiction of fidei commissa.

The prætor fiscalis has special jurisdiction of cases affecting the public treasury.

PRAGMATIC SANCTION. In French Law. An expression used to designate those ordinances which concern the most important object of the civil or ecclesiastical administration. Merlin Répert.; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Advocats 24, 38.

In Civil Law. The answer given by the emperors on questions of law, when consulted by a corporation or the citizens of a province or of a municipality, was called a pragmatic sanction. Leçons El. du Dr. Civ. Rom. § 53. This differed from a rescript.

PRAIRIE. An extensive tract of land destitute of trees, covered with coarse grass, and usually characterized by a deep, fertile soil; a meadow or tract of grassland; especially a so called "natural meadow." 51 Kan. 23.

PRAYER. In Equity Practice. The request in a bill that the court will grant the aid which the petitioner desires.

That part of the bill which asks for relief. The word denotes, strictly, the request, but is very commonly applied to that part of the bill which contains the request.

Of Process. That part of the bill which asks that the defendant may be compelled to appear and answer the bill, and abide the determination of the court upon the subject.

It must contain the names of all the parties; 1 P. Wms. 593; 2 Dick. Ch. 707; 2 Johns. Ch. 245; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; Bisph. Eq. § 9; see 55 Fed. Rep. 825; although they are out of the jurisdiction; 1 Beav. 106; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 164. The ordinary process asked for is a writ of subpœna; Story, Eq. Pl. § 44; and in case a distringas against a corporation; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; or an injunction; 2 S. & S. 219; 1 Sim. 50; is sought for, it should be included in the prayer.

For Relief, is general, which asks for such relief as the court may grant; or special, which states the particular form of relief desired. A special prayer is generally inserted, followed by a general prayer, 4 Madd. 408; 16 Pet. 195; 23 Vt. 247; 6 Gill 105; 25 Me. 153; 10 Rich. Eq. 53; 7 Ind. 661; 15 Ark. 555; a general prayer if omitted, may be added by amendment or amended bill; 38 W. Va. 583. Unless the general prayer is added, if the defendant fails in his special prayer he will not be entitled to any relief; 1 Ves. 426; 12 id. 62; 2 R. I. 129; 15 Ala. 9; except in case of charities and bills in behalf of infants; 1 Atk. 6, 355; 18 Ves. 325; 1 Russ. 235; 2 Paige, Ch. 396.

A general prayer is sufficient for most purposes; and the special relief desired may be prayed for at the bar; 4 Madd. 408; 1 Edw. 26; Story, Eq. Pl. § 41; 31 N. H. 193; 2 Paine 11; 9 How. 390; 9 Mo. 201; 9 Gill & J. 80; 19 Ark. 62; 18 Ala. 371; 23 Vt. 247; but where a special order and provisional process are required, founded on peculiar circumstances, a special prayer therefor is generally inserted; 6 Madd. 218; 8 Ind. 419. A prayer for general relief is sufficient to support any decree warranted by the allegations of the bill; 148 Ill. 622; but under such a prayer a party cannot recover a claim distinct from that demanded by the bill; 29 W. Va. 1.

Such relief, and such only, will be granted, either under a special prayer, whether at bar; 2 Ves. 299; 4 Paige, Ch. 229; 25 Me. 153; 30 Ala. N. S. 416; or in the bill; 16 Tex. 399; 18 Ga. 492; 21 Pa. 131; or under a general prayer, as the case as stated will justify; 7 Ired. Eq. 80; 4 Sneed 623; 18 Ill. 142; 5 Wisc. 117, 424; 24 Mo. 31; 7 Ala. N. S. 193; 13 Ark. 183; 3 Barb. Ch. 613; 3 Gratt. 518; 9 How. 390; and a bill framed apparently for one purpose will not be allowed to accomplish another, to the injury of the defendant; 16 Tex. 399; 21 Pa. 131; 6 Wend. 63.

And, generally, the decree must conform to the allegations and proof; 7 Wheat. 522; 19 Johns. 496; 2 Harr. Ch. 401; 1 Ired. Eq. 88; 6 Ala. N. S. 518; 4 Bibb 376; 13 Conn. 146. See 75 Tex. 287. But a special prayer may be disregarded, if the allegations warrant relief under the general prayer; 15 Ark. 555; 4 Tex. 20; 2 Cal. 269; 22 Ala. N. S. 646; 8 Humphr. 230; 1 Blackf. 305; the relief granted must be consistent with the special prayer; 27 Ala. 507; 21 Pa. 131; 1 Jones, Eq. 100; 14 Ga. 52; 1 Edw. Ch. 654; 9 Gill & J. 80; 4 Des. Eq. 530; 9 Yerg. 301; 1 Johns. Ch. 111.

PREAMBLE. An introduction prefixed to a statute, reciting the intention of the legislature in framing it, or the evils which led to its enactment. It is no part of the law; 26 Pa. 287. It is no more than a recital of some inconveniences, which does not exclude any other, for which a remedy is given by the enacting part of the statute. Resort cannot be had to the preamble of a statute to ascertain the intention of an act unless there is an ambiguity in the enacting part. Effect should be given to a preamble to the extent that it shows what the legislature intended, and if the words of enactment have a meaning which does not go beyond that preamble, or which may come up to the preamble, in either case that meaning should be preferred to one which shows an intention of the legislature which would not answer the purposes of the preamble or would go beyond them. To that extent only is the preamble material; 8 App. Cas. 388. The clear language of an act cannot be cut down by a reference to the preamble; 29 Ch. D. 950. It may explain what is of doubtful meaning, but will not limit what is clear; 15 R. I. 299; 19 Fed. Rep. 804.

A preamble is said to be the key of a statute, to open the minds of the makers as to the mischiefs which are to be remedied and the objects which are to be accomplished by the provisions of the statute; Co. 4th Inst. 330; 6 Pet. 301. In modern legislative practice, preambles are much less used than formerly, and in some of the United States are rarely inserted in statutes. In the interpretation of a statute, though resort may be had to the preamble, it cannot limit or control the express provisions of the statute; Dwarris, Stat. 504; Wilberf. Stat. Law 277. Nor can it by implication enlarge what is expressly fixed; 1 Story, Const. b. 3, c. 6; 3 M'Cord 298; 15 Johns. 89; Busb. 131; Daveis 38.

A preamble reciting the existence of public outrages, provision against which is made in the body of the act, is evidence of the facts it recites. See 4 Maule & S. 532; 2 Russ. Cr. 720.

The facts recited in a preamble of a private statute are not evidence, as between the person for whose benefit the act passed and a third person; 3 Litt. 472; 7 Hill 80; but the statement of legislative reasons in the preamble will not affect the validity of an act; 42 Conn. 583.

See Statute; Construction.

A recital inserted in a contract for the purpose of declaring the intention of the parties.

PREBEND. In Ecclesiastical Law. The stipend granted to an ecclesiastic, in consideration of officiating in the church. It is in this distinguished from a canonicate, which is a mere title and may exist without stipend. The prebend may be a simple stipend, or a stipend with a dignity attached to it, in which case it has some jurisdiction belonging to it. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 88; Stra. 1082; 1 Term 401; 2 id. 630; 1 Wils. 206; Dy. 273 a; 7 B. & C. 113; 8 Bingh. 490; 5 Taunt. 2; Jacob, L. Dict.

PRECARIÆ. Day works which the tenants of certain manors were bound to give their lords in harvest time. Cowel.

PRECARIOUS. The affairs of an executor are precarious only when conducted with such recklessness as in the opinion of prudent and discreet men endangers their security. 60 Barb. 56.

PRECARIOUS RIGHT. The right which the owner of a thing transfers to another, to enjoy the same until it shall please the owner to revoke it.

If there is a time fixed during which the right may be used, it is then vested for that time, and cannot be revoked until after its expiration, Wolff, Inst. § 333.

PRECARIUM (Lat.). The name of a contract among civilians, by which the owner of a thing, at the request of another person, gives him a thing to use as long as the owner shall please. Pothier, n. 87. See Yelv. 172; Cro. Jac. 235; 9 Cow. 687; Rolle 128; Bac. Abr. Bailment (C); Ersk. Inst. 3. 1. 9; Story, Bailm. §§ 127, 253 b.

A tenancy at will is a right of this kind.

PRECATORY WORDS. Expressions in a will praying or requesting that a thing shall be done. A trust created by such words, which are more like words of entreaty and permission, than of command or certainty.

Examples of such words, which the courts have held sufficient to constitute a trust, are "wish and request," "have fullest confidence," "heartily beseech," and the like; Rap. and Lawr. L. Dict.

Although recommendatory words used by a testator, of themselves, seem to leave the devisee to act as he may deem proper, giving him a discretion, as when a testator gives an estate to a devisee, and adds that he hopes, recommends, has a confidence, wish, or desire that the devisee shall do certain things for the benefit of another person, yet courts of equity have formerly construed such precatory expressions as creating a trust; 8 Ves. Ch. 380; 18 id. 41; Bac. Abr. Legacies (B); 98 Mass. 274; 85 Vt. 173; 4 Am. L. Rev. 617; 113 Mo. 112. See, contra, 20 Pa. 268; 1 McCart. 397; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1069; 49 N. J. Eq. 570; 139 Mass. 117; Bisph. Eq. 73.

But this construction will not prevail when either the objects to be benefited are imperfectly described, or the amount of property to which the trust should attach is not sufficiently defined; 1 Bro. C. C. 142; 1 Sim. 542, 556.

While the expression of confidence, if the context shows that a trust is intended, may create a trust, yet, if upon the whole will the confidence is merely that the legatee will do what is right in disposing of the property, a trust is not imposed; 4 Kent 305; [1895] 2 Ch. 370; 140 N. Y. 122; 152 Pa. 108; 159 Mass. 229. As to when the words confidence, etc., create a trust, see note to Lloyd & G. 154; see also 2 Pa. 129. The words in the fullest confidence were held to create a trust; 1 Turn. & R. 143.

The current of decision in England with regard to precatory words is said to be now changed. A trust will not be created where the testator shows an intention to leave property absolutely; 27 Ch. Div. 394. See 70 Pa. 153; 19 Conn. 351. The leaning of the courts is against the implication of a trust; 1 Jarm. Wills 365. It is a question of what was the intention, not of what particular word was used; [1895] 2 Ch. 370. But it was held that a testamentary gift with added words of entreaty or recommendation, or expressing a hope or confidence will constitute a trust; 100 Mass. 340; 34 Ala. 349. See the cases in 1 Jarm. Wills 385, on this subject.

"The true rule, upon principle, and according to the weight of more recent authorities, is said to be that the whole will must be examined to determine whether the words used were to impose an obligation or to give the devisee full discretion." 4 Kent 305, note b, citing 8 Ch. D. 540; 109 U. S. 725; 126 Mass. 218; 79 Ky. 378. See 140 N. Y. 122.

Vagueness in the object tends to show that no trust was intended. See L. R. 8 Eq. 673. It has been held that precatory words are prima facie imperative, and create a trust; 88 Md. 200; 71 id. 108; 127 U. S. 300.

Precatory words do not always create a trust. The question in every case is one of intention. Expressions per se sufficient to create a trust may be deprived of that effect by a context especially declaring or by implication showing no trust was intended. The question in all cases is, was the direction imperative? The real question to be determined when such words are used is whether the confidence, hope, or wish expressed is meant to govern the donee, or whether it was a mere indication of that which the testator thinks would be a reasonable or suitable use of the property conveyed, leaving the matter ultimately to the decision of the donee; 1 Jarm. Wills 406, n.

PRECEDENCE. The right of being first placed in a certain order,—the first rank being supposed the most honorable.

In this country no precedence is given by law to men.

Nations, in their intercourse with each other, do not admit any precedence: hence, in their treaties, it is the usage for the powers to alternate, both in the preamble and in the signatures, so that each power occupies, in the copy intended to be delivered to it, the first place. Sometimes signatures are made in alphabetical order of the states which are parties to the act, the French alphabet being adopted for that purpose. 2 Hall. Int. L. 122.

In some cases of officers, when one must of necessity act as the chief, the oldest in commission will have precedence: as, when the president of a court is not present, the associate who has the oldest commission will have a precedence; or if their commissions bear the same date, then the oldest man.

In the army and navy there is a regular order of precedence. See RANK.

For rules of precedence in England, see Whart. Law Dict.

PRECEDENTS. In Practice. Legal acts or instruments which are deemed worthy to serve as rules or models for subsequent cases.

The word is similarly applied in respect to political and legislative action. In the former use, precedent is the word to designate an adjudged case which is actually followed or sanctioned by a court in subsequent cases. An adjudged case may be of any degree of weight, from that of absolute conclusiveness down to the faintest presumption: and one which is in fact disregarded is said never to have become a precedent. In determining whether an adjudication is to be followed as a precedent, the following considerations are adverted to. First, the justice of the principle which it declares, and the reasonableness of its application. Hob. 270. If a precedent is to be followed because it is a precedent, even when decided against an established rule of law, there can be no possible correction of abuses, because the fact of their existence would render them above the law. It is always safe to rely upon principles. See 16 Viner, Abr. 499; 2 J. & W. 318; 3 Ves. 527; 2 P. Wms. 258; 2 Bro. C. C. 86; 1 Tex. 11; 2 Evans, Poth. 377, where the author argues against the policy of making precedents binding when contrary to reason. "The reason and spirit of cases make law: not the letter of particular precedents." 3 Burr. 1364, per Lord Mansfield. See, also, 1 Kent 475; Liverm. Syst. 104; Gresl. Eq. Ev. 300; 16 Johns. 402; 20 id. 722; Cro. Jac. 527; 33 Hen. VII. 41; Jones, Bailm. 46; 1 Hill, N. Y. 438; 9 Barb. 544; 50 N. Y. 451; Wells, Res. Adj. & Dec.

According to Lord Talbot, it is "much better to stick to the known general rules than to follow any one particular precedent which may be founded on reasons unknown to us." Cas. t. Talb. 26. Blackstone, 1 Com. 70, says that a former decision is, in general, to be followed, unless "manifestly absurd or unjust;" and in the latter case it is declared, when overruled, not that the former sentence was bad law, but that it was not law. If an adjudication is questioned in these respects, the degree of consideration and deliberation upon which it was made; 4 Co. 94; the rank of the court, as of inferior or superior jurisdiction, which established it, and the length of time during which it has been acted on as a rule of property, are to be considered. The length of time which a decision has stood unquestioned is an important element; since where a rule declared to be law, even by an inferior tribunal, has been habitually adopted and acted upon by the community, and becomes thus imbedded in the actual affairs of men, it is frequently better to enforce it as it is, instead of allowing it to be re-examined and unsettled. It is said that in order to give precedents binding effect there must be a current of decision; Cro. Car. 528; Cro. Jac. 386; 8 Co. 163; 10 Wisc. 370; and even then, injustice in the rule often prevails over the antiquity and frequency of its adoption, and induces the court to overrule it. But this is to be very cautiously done where it is a rule of property, or wherever a departure from it would unjustly affect vested rights; 8 Cal. 188; 47 Ind. 286; 30 Miss. 256; 23 Wend. 340.

"The only use of authorities, or decided cases, is the establishment of some principle which the judge can follow out in deciding the case before him. . . . Where a case has decided a principle, although I myself do not concur in it, and although it has been only the decision of a tribunal of co-ordinate jurisdiction, I have felt bound to follow it where it is of respectable age and has been used by lawyers as settling the law, leaving to the appellate court to say that a case is wrongly decided, if the appellate court should so think." 13 Ch. D. 712, per Jessel, M. R.

"Without minutely examining all the cases, or saying whether I do or do not agree with them, it is sufficient for me to abide by the principle established by them; the principle is the thing which we are to extract from cases, and to apply it in the decision of other cases." 7 Term 148, per Lord Kenyon, C. J.

"Now, I have often said, and I repeat it, that the only thing in a judge's decision binding as an authority upon a subsequent judge is the principle upon which the case was decided; but it is not sufficient that the case should have been decided on a principle, if that principle is not itself a right principle, or one not applicable to the case." 13 Ch. D. 785, per Jessel, M. R.

"If one authority were produced to me, and my own opinion were the other way, I would not follow that authority; but if the authorities are numerous, I admit that I must be bound." L. R. 19 Eq. 460, per Jessel, M. R.

"Courts should be careful not to overrule decisions which, not being manifestly erroneous and mischievous, have stood for some time unchallenged, and from their nature and the effect which they may reasonably be supposed to have produced upon the conduct of a large portion of the community, as well as of parliament itself, in matters affecting rights of property, may fairly be treated as having passed into the category of established and recognized law." 15 Ch. D. 336, per Thesiger. L. J.

"Where an old case is contrary to the principles of the general law, the court of appeal ought not to shrink from overruling it even after a considerable lapse of time. But when an old decided case has made the law on a particular subject, the court of appeal ought not to interfere with it, because people have considered it as establishing the law and have acted upon it;" 9 Q. B. D. 352, per Jessel, M. R., cited by Lord Esher, M. R., in 22 Q. B. D. 619. See also 12 Q. B. D. 318.

"Where there is a decision which has stood for more than two hundred years in respect of a subject-matter constantly arising in practice, the court does not overrule it unless absolutely obliged to do so. . . . Even if the court did not agree with the decision, it would not overrule it." [1895] 2 Q. B. 665. Where a dictum of law has been accepted, and is likely to have affected divers contracts and dealings between man and man, and if not followed, many transactions done on the faith of it would be disturbed, the court will follow the dictum; 26 Ch. D. 821. But where a decision had not stood wholly unquestioned the court need not feel bound to follow it merely because it has stood for twelve years without being authoritatively overruled; 27 Ch. D. 154.

"Where the decision is really one as to the jurisdiction of another court there is no reason why, at any distance of time, a superior court may not overrule it." 13 Q. B. D. 591, per Brett, M. R.

"Speaking for myself, I do not pay much attention to the dicta of modern judges, as I consider it my duty to decide for myself. This, of course, does not apply to decisions of modern judges, nor to old recognized dicta by eminent judges." 23 Ch. D. 49, per Jessel, M. R. See, also, 23 Ch. D. 127; [1891] 3 Ch. 376.

Decisions on the constructions of instruments, if the words are identical, are not strictly binding, much less so if the words are only similar; L. R. 10 Ch. 397; 22 Ch. D. 488; and this is true even of the decisions of the appeal court; 23 Ch. D. 111.

In 25 Q. B. D. 57, Lord Esher drew a distinction between "fundamental propositions of law," which could be changed only by parliament, and "the evidence of the existence of such a proposition," which was within the disposition of the court.

There is no common law or statutory rule to oblige a court to bow to its own decision; it does so again on the grounds of judicial comity. But when a court is equally divided, this comity does not exist, for there is no authority of the court as such, and those who follow must choose one of two adverse decisions. When the court is equally divided, if the case comes before it again, it will exercise an independent opinion and abide by one of the two views. The case may be different as regards the house of lords, for it is the ultimate court of appeal, for if it is otherwise there exists an uncertainty as to the law; 9 P. D. 98.

In 44 L. T. 440, Jessel, M. R., stated that he had frequently differed from the courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction and the same was said by Brett, L. J., in 10 Q. B. D. 328, in reference to a decision in the Exchequer Chamber, where the judges were equally divided, and it was said by Brett, M. R., in 13 Q. B. D. 355, that a court of law is not justified in overruling the decisions of another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, citing Jessel, M. R., in 13 Ch. D. 130.

"For us to reverse the judgment of a lord chancellor would require a tremendous case—a case of a clear error." 12 Ch. D. 47, per James, L. J. While the decisions of the lord chancellor, at all events sitting alone, are not absolutely binding, yet the greatest weight ought to be given to them, and unless manifestly wrong, they ought not to be overruled; 12 Ch. D. 54, per Thesiger, L. J. The old lord chancellors overruled one another, and sometimes they overruled their own decisions without the slightest trouble; 21 Ch. D. 346, Jessel, M. R.

It is said that the house of lords has the same power that every other tribunal has in subsequently applying the law laid down by it to other cases; 5 H. L. Cas. 63. The observations made by the members beyond the ratio decidendi which is propounded and acted upon in giving judgment, although they may be entitled to respect, are only to be followed in so far as they may be considered agreeable to sound reason and to prior authorities. But the house of lords, as a tribunal, is bound by its own precedents which it will not overrule, and the doctrine on which the judgment of the house is founded must be universally taken for law, and can only be altered by act of parliament; 3 H. L. Cas. 391; 8 id. 391; 9 id. 338; L. R. 8 C. P. 313. This doctrine has just been again laid down, after argument, in 78 L. T. Rep. 361. If two cases in the house of lords are not to be reconciled, the more recent ought to prevail; 5 App. Cas. 798; 7 id. 294, 302.

The judicial committee of the privy council is not bound by its own precedents; see 4 Moore, P. C. 63; but where a decision of the privy council has been reported to the queen, and been sanctioned and embodied in an order in council, it becomes the decree or order of the final court of appeal, and every subordinate tribunal to whom the order is addressed should carry it into execution; 6 App. Cas. 488.

The supreme court of the United States has overruled its own precedents in some instances, notably on the question of the extent of admiralty jurisdiction and in the legal tender cases.

It has been said that a judgment made by an equally divided court has no weight as a precedent; 5 Wend. 372; 25 id. 256; and does not even settle the question of law; 5 id. 372; but a judgment affirmed by a divided court in the house of lords is a binding precedent; 9 H. L. Cas. 388. The subject of precedents both in English law and in other systems is treated by Prof. John C. Gray in 9 Harv. L. Rev. 327.

Instances of a lower court disregarding the decision of a higher court will be found in L. R. 2 Eq. 335, where a case formerly decided by Lord Westbury was disregarded because he had decided it in ignorance of a statute, and in L. R. 3 Ch. 420, where the lord chancellor made a ruling as to the abatement of legacies, which was nothing more than a blunder, and was subsequently disregarded by the vice-chancellors. See 9 Harv. Law Rev. 327.

See STARE DECISIS.

Mr. Powell (Appellate Proceedings) develops at some length the thought that two of the most important ideas and principles in judicial proceedings are essentially of modern origin. These are the force and effect of precedent, and the aid afforded by appellate proceedings in the correction of errors and the perfecting of the law. Neither of these ideas were known to the ancients, or recognized in the civil law, and they were almost entirely disregarded in the courts of continental Europe until the present day. We are indebted for their development to England. Both of the subjects—the citation of a former case as evidence of the law, upon the trial of a subsequent case, and the supervision by the superior courts of the correctness of the proceedings and decisions of the inferior courts began to make their appearance about the time of Edward I.

The argument until quite recently so much used by jurists of continental Europe and civilians, is thus summarized and answered: "They say that judicial decisions are either conformable to law or not; if the former, they are mere applications of a pre-existing rule to individual cases falling within it, and do not therefore create new laws; if the latter, they are not binding, but are themselves against law. This is more ingenious than fair or truthful; for such decisions are not made and called into requisition where a pre-existing rule existed, but in those doubtful and evenly balanced questions between two or more opinions, and further light and aid are called for, where all pre-existing rules have failed, satisfactorily, to give that aid. The assumption of the dilemma is contrary to experience and reason; for it is the frequent experience of the jurist to find cases where pre-existing rules entirely fail him; and reason also teaches that it must be so, since it is found that all human productions are imperfect. The using of such former judicial decisions as aids in forming a judgment and decision, is no more than what was done under the civil law, in calling in aid the opinion and writings of distinguished juris consulti. But the usefulness and justice of thus using previous judicial decisions is now generally admitted and followed." The earliest use of judicial proceedings as precedents is said, on the authority of Guterbock on Bracton and his Relation to the Roman Law, to have been by Bracton about the time of Edward I.

The considerations bearing upon the weight of authority given to judicial decisions are said by the author quoted to be:

1. The decisions of the appellate courts are of absolute authority in the subordinate courts, no matter how much the latter may differ in their conclusions "unless in any case it was considered (which is hardly supposable) to be contrary to the constitution or common sense."

2. Decisions of the same court, or co-ordinate ones, are authorities, but subject to be reviewed, dissented from, or overruled with reference to the time when they were made, and the extent to which they have been acted upon.

3. The decision of any court or the opinion of any jurist, is an authority, to be more or less relied upon as it accords with settled principles of law, and as it is justified by reason. The opinions of jurists, though they may be received, are not to be accorded the weight of judicial decisions.

These principles, it is contended, though very important, are only made effective by a judicious system of appellate jurisdiction, sifting out errors and irregularities, and bringing the decisions into harmony with the law and rendering it one consistent whole; Powell, App. Proc. 4.

The real object and function of appellate tribunals is, in this last sentence, very well expressed. It has been the subject of much discussion in connection with regulating the right of appeal by the amount in controversy. Such limitations are sometimes thought to cause inequality in the administration of justice, between, as it is said, the rich and the poor. It may, however, be said that the primary purpose of an appellate tribunal is to settle and unify the law as administered by the various subordinate courts under the general supervisory jurisdiction of the appellate court. In theory, an appeal to a higher court cannot be considered as a right of any litigant; the rights of a litigant are fully protected by giving him a day in court for the trial of his cause in the court below, with the opportunity, by motion for a new trial, to secure the correction of any error of law or manifest injustice in the verdict.

Of the place filled by case law in the jurisprudence of England and America, it has been said: "The resource of English lawyers, when called on to fill the gap which was elsewhere supplied by the Roman law, was custom. Of this custom the judges were themselves, in the last resort, the repository. Thus it comes to pass that English case law does for us what the Roman law does for the rest of western Europe." Markby, Elem. of Law § 90. The difference between the common law of England and the continental law is thus characterized by the same author: "Where the principles of the Roman law are adopted, the advance must always be made on certain lines. An English or American judge can go wherever his good sense leads him. The result has been that whilst the law of continental Europe is formally correct, it is not always easily adapted to the changing wants of those amongst whom it is administered. On the other hand, the English law, whilst it is cumbrous, ill-arranged, and barren of principles, whilst it is obscure and frequently in conflict with itself, is yet a system under which justice can be done; anyhow it stands alone in the history of the world." Id. § 92. Freeman says: "The life and soul of English law has ever been precedent," and to this he ascribes, not only the growth of the common law but that of the unwritten constitution of England. Freem. Eng. Const. ch. ii. iii.

In a lucid discussion of the value of judicial decisions as an essential part of the English and American systems, Judge Dillon says: "Judicial precedent is not simply part of the law in a general sense... but it is a part of our law in a sense, and with effects, which are distinctively and most strikingly peculiar. The doctrine, as established, is shortly this: that a decision by a court of competent jurisdiction of a point of law lying so squarely in the pathway of judicial judgment that the case could not be adjudged without deciding it, is not only binding upon the parties to the cause in judgment, but the point, so decided, becomes, until it is reversed or overruled, evidence of what the law is in like cases, which the courts are bound to follow, not only in cases precisely like the one which was first determined, but also in those which, however different in their origin or special circumstances, stand, or are considered to stand, upon the same principles." Laws and Jurisp. 231. Passing over the question whether a judicial decision is law or only evidence of it, the same writer notes the difference between the authoritative effect of a judicial decision in our system, and the entire want of it in continental Europe, the result being that under the former system "a point solemnly decided has the force and effect of law, binding the judges in all other cases that clearly fall within its principle, which the judges are therefore bound to follow and apply, unless, to use Blackstone's well-known and much criticised qualification, the precedent is 'flatly absurd or unjust;'" id.

Allusion is very properly made to a point of great importance in estimating the value of judicial decisions, which is frequently overlooked, that is, the contribution made by the arguments of counsel. The writer quoted says: "Indirectly, the reports embody also the results of the researches, studies, experience, and ability of the bar during the same period, since of these the judges have had the advantage in the argument of the causes so decided. Indeed the doctrine of judicial precedent implies that the point of the decision whereof such force is attributed should have been argued by opposing counsel." Id. 233. So important is this consideration that it might almost be suggested as a wise rule to apply to the use of judicial decisions as precedents, that no case should be held to acquire binding force as law unless the point on which it was decided had been argued by counsel.

The fortuitous and irregular growth of case law is the necessary result of the rule of its existence, that no point can become the subject of a judicial decision until it actually arises for judgment. So that it is left, as has been observed, to "the casual exigencies of litigation to determine what parts of it shall be filled up and what left incomplete," with the result that "all kinds of curious little questions receive elaborate answers, while great ones remain in a provoking state of uncertainty." Pollock, Essays on Jurisprudence and Ethics, ch. iii.

Concerning the true office and use of adjudged cases, the views of Mr. Justice Miller are expressed in a letter which is published in a note to lecture IX. of Judge Dillon's work already referred to. After adverting to the difficulty experienced by a judge in the use of judicial decisions, he groups the cases into three classes: 1. Those which must be decided by principles not disputed, in which citations are of little value, because the duty of the judge is confined to the application of principles in a particular case. 2. Those which construe the constitutions and statutes, as to which the decisions of the highest court of the government which adopted them, are generally conclusive. 3. Those depending upon general principles of law or equity which must be determined, if there is a conflict of decision, by the weight of authority, and in which the citation of adjudged cases is most useful.

Allusion is also made to the fact that the opinions of certain judges, even when dissenting or obiter, carry special weight apart from the courts in which they were delivered.

Another very able writer considers that the development of the law, by this system, results, to some extent, in a paradox both in form and substance. "In form its growth is logical. The official theory is that each new decision follows syllogistically from existing precedents," but they "survive in the long run after the use they once served is at an end and the reason for them has been forgotten. The result of following them must often be failure and confusion from a merely logical point of view." On the other hand, he considers that the growth of the law, in substance, is legislation in the sense that "the secret root from which it draws all the juices of life" is really to be found in the consideration of what is "expedient for the community concerned" on "more or less definitely understood views of public policy," not less so because the "unconscious result of instinctive preferences and inarticulate convictions." When the law is administered with ability and experience, even if ancient rules are maintained, they will be fitted with new reasons, so that both form and substance are changed by the transplanting. Holmes, Com. L. 35.

Few modern writers agree with the older theory formulated by Blackstone, that the courts are "not delegated to pronounce a new law, but to maintain and expound the old one;" 1 Bla. Com. 69; but see Lieber, Hermaneutics Ham. ed. 312. The tendency is strongly to accept the view that it is a "childish fiction employed by our judges that judiciary or common law is not made by them, but is a miraculous something made by nobody; existing from eternity and merely declared from time to time by the judges;" 2 Aust. Lect. Jurisp. 655. The same view is elaborated by Sir Henry Maine who makes judicial decision the beginning of all law, and contends that the distinction between case law and code law is only one of form, and that both are, properly speaking, written, not unwritten, law. Anc. Law ch. 1.

"I cannot understand how any person who has considered the subject can suppose that society could possibly have gone on if judges had not legislated, or that there is any danger whatever in allowing them that power which they have in fact exercised to make up for the negligence or incapacity of the avowed legislature. That part of the law of every country which was made by judges has been far better made than that part which consists of statutes enacted by the legislature." 1 Aust. Lect. Jurisp. 224.

It must be accepted as a fact that courts have always exercised the power of making rules for new cases or modifying existing laws in accordance with current ideas of equity or changed conditions, and that they justify themselves under cover of exercising the judicial function of determining whether a binding custom exists or applying general laws to particular cases. Holland, Jur. 56.

But it has also been said that the application of an existing principle to a new state of facts is not judicial legislation. To call it such is to assert that the existing body of law consists practically of the statutes and decided cases and to deny that the principles (of which these cases are ordinarily said to be evidence) existed at all. 4 Harv. L. Rev. 213.

As to what are considered precedents in prize courts, see that title.

Written forms of procedure which have been sanctioned by the courts or by long professional usage, and are commonly to be followed, are designated precedents. Steph. Pl. 392. And this term, when used as the title of a law-book, usually denotes a collection of such forms.

PRECEPARTIUM. The continuance of a suit by consent of both parties. Cowell.

PRECES PRIMARIÆ, OR PRIMÆ. A right of the crown to name to the first prebend that becomes vacant after the accession of the sovereign, in every church of the kingdom. This right was exercised by the crown of England in the reign of Edward I. 2 Steph. Com. 670, n.

PRECEPT (Lat, precipio, to command). A writ directed to the sheriff, or other officer, commanding him to do something.

PRECINCT. The district for which a high or petty constable is appointed is, in England, called a precinct. Wilcox, Const. xii. See 124 Mass. 172.

Precinct is used, in certain legislation in Wyoming, relatively to assessing taxes on railroad property, as a general word and not a technical one, and indicates any district marked out and defined. It further signifies a district inferior to a county and superior to a township. 116 U. S. 524.

In Pennsylvania and other states it is used to indicate a subdivision of a city for election purposes.

PRECIPUT. In French Law. An object which is ascertained by law or the agreement of the parties, and which is first to be taken out of property held in common by one having a right, before a partition takes place.

The preciput is an advantage or a principal part to which some one is entitled præcipium jus, which is the origin of the word preciput. Dalloz, Dict.; Pothier, Obl. By preciput is also understood the right to sue out the preciput.

PRECISE. When the terms "clear, precise, explicit, unequivocal, and indubitable," are used by the courts to define the requisite proof of a fact, it is meant that the witnesses shall be credible, that the facts are distinctly remembered by them, that details are narrated exactly, and that their statements are true. 89 Pa. 314.

PRECLUDI NON (Lat.). In Pleading. A technical allegation contained in a replication which denies or confesses and avoids the plea.

It is usually in the following form: "And the said A B, as to the plea of the said C D, by him secondly above pleaded, says that he, the said A B, by reason of anything by the said C D in that plea alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against the said C D, because he says that," etc. 2 Wils. 42; 1 Chitty, Pl. 573; Steph. Pl. 398.

PRECOGNITION. In Scotch Law. The examination of witnesses who were present at the commission of a criminal act, upon the special circumstances attending it, in order to know whether there is ground for a trial, and to serve for direction to the prosecutor. But the persons examined may insist on having their declaration cancelled before they give testimony at the trial. Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. n. 49.

PRECONTRACT. An engagement entered into by a person which renders him unable to enter into another; as, a promise or covenant of marriage to be had afterwards. When made per verba de presenti, it is in fact a marriage, and in that case the party making it cannot marry another person. Bish. Mar. & D. § 53; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 280, 1891. See PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

PREDECESSOR. One who has preceded another.

This term is applied in particular to corporators who are now no longer such, and whose rights have been vested in their successor; the word ancestor is more usually applicable to common persons. The predecessor in a corporation stands in the same relation to the successor that the ancestor does to the heir.

One who has filled an office or station before the present incumbent.

PREDICATE. To affirm logically.

PREDOMINANT. Something greater or superior in power and influence to others with which it is connected or compared. 22 Pick. 53.

PRE-EMPTION. In International Law. The right of pre-emption is the right of a nation to detain the merchandise of strangers passing through her territories or seas, in order to afford to her subjects the preference of purchase. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 103; 2 Bla. Com. 287.

According to general modern usage the doctrine of pre-emption rests upon the distinction between articles which are contraband (q. v.) universally, and those which are contraband only under the particular circumstances of the case. The carrying of the former class alone is punishable, and entails the penalty of confiscation, either of ship or cargo or both. The latter class are subject to the milder belligerent right of pre-emption, which is regarded as a fair compromise between the right of the belligerent to seize, and the claim of the neutral to export his native commodities, though immediately subservient to the purpose of hostility; 3 Phill. Int. L. 450; 1 C. Rob. 241. The right of pre-emption is said to be rather a waiver of a greater right than a right itself; an indulgence to the neutral rather than a right of the belligerent; Ward, Contraband 196.

This right is sometimes regulated by treaty. In the treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, November 19, 1794, ratified in 1795, it was provided, after mentioning that the usual munitions of war, and also naval materials, should be confiscated as contraband, that, "whereas the difficulty of agreeing on precise cases in which alone provisions and other articles not generally contraband may be regarded as such, renders it expedient to provide against the inconveniences and misunderstandings which might thence arise, it is further agreed that whenever any such articles so being contraband according to the existing laws of nations shall for that reason be seized, the same shall not be confiscated, but the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified; and the captors, or, in their default, the government under whose authority they act, shall pay to the masters or owners of such vessel the full value of all articles, with a reasonable mercantile profit thereon, together with the freight, and also the damages incident to such detention." According to the practice of the British prize court, a profit of ten per cent. has been usually allowed to the proprietor of the goods seized, for the purposes of pre-emption; 3 Phill. Int. L. 451.

See NEUTRALITY.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHT. The right given to settlers upon the public lands of the United States to purchase them at a limited price in preference to others.

It gave a right to the actual settler who was a citizen of the United States, or who had filed a declaration of intention to become such, and had entered and occupied without title, to obtain a title to a quarter-section at the minimum price fixed by law, upon entry in the proper office and payment, to the exclusion of all other persons. It is an equitable title; 15 Miss. 780; 9 Mo. 688; 15 Pet. 407; and does not become a title at law to the land till entry and payment; 2 Sandf. Ch. 78; 11 Ill. 529; 15 id. 131. It may be transferred by deed; 9 Ill. 454; 15 id. 131; and descends to the heirs of an intestate; 2 Pet. 201; 12 Ala. N. S. 822.

No person is entitled to more than one pre-emption right to public land; and where a party has filed a declaration, he cannot file another for another tract, or for an addition to the first tract; 139 U. S. 642.

A person cannot acquire by his occupation only of unsurveyed lands of the United States, a right of pre-emption to them under the laws of the United States; 130 U. S. 232. The word heirs as used in R.S. § 269, which provides for the issuance of a patent to the heirs of a deceased pre-emptor, includes illegitimate children, when such can inherit it from their father in the state where he was domiciled and the land located; 162 U. S. 65.

By act of March 3, 1891, the pre-emption laws were repealed, saving the rights of claims already initiated; 1 R. S. Sup. 942; and bona fide pre-emption claimants were permitted to transfer any part of their land for church, cemetery, and school purposes and for the right of way of railroads, canals and irrigation and drainage works.

See LANDS, PUBLIC.

PRE-EXISTING. "Pre-existing" debt includes all debts previously contracted whether they have become payable or not; 136 Mass. 340.

PREFECT. In French Law. A chief officer invested with the superintendence of the administration of the laws in each department. Merlin, Répert.

PREFER. To bring any matter before a court: as,—A. preferred a charge of assault against B.

To apply or move: thus,—"to prefer for costs." Abb. Law Dict.

PREFERENCE. The paying or securing to one or more of his creditors, by an insolvent debtor, the whole or a part of their claim, to the exclusion of the rest. The right which a creditor has acquired over others to be paid first out of the assets of his debtor; as, when a creditor has obtained a judgment against his debtor which binds the latter's land, he has a preference.

A failing creditor, if an individual or partnership, may prefer any one creditor to the exclusion of others; 6 Cow. 285; 12 Pet. 178; 38 Pa. 446; 7 Hun 146; 15 Mo. 378; 48 Ala. 377. See 144 Mass. 192; 48 Ala. 376; 76 Va. 276; 13 R. I. 463.

At common law, unless prohibited by statute, a corporation whether insolvent or not, had a right to pay a creditor, whether a director, officer, stockholder or outsider; 94 N. Y. 168; 2 Moraw. Corp. § 802; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1601; so had an individual a right to prefer any creditor; 94 N. Y. 168. As to preference by failing corporations, there are now two doctrines; one that the assets are a trust fund for the benefit of all creditors pro rata and no preference can be given to any creditor; 45 Fed. Rep. 7; 130 Ill. 162; 64 Wis. 639; 46 Ohio St. 86, 493; 5 L. R. A. 378; 3 N. Y. 479; 39 Mo. App. 131; 96 Ala. 439; 76 Mich. 634. The other that a corporation has the same power in dealing with the assets and preferring creditors as an individual has under similar circumstances; 70 Ia. 697; 16 N. J. Eq. 229; 41 id. 635; 45 Fed. Rep. 148; 30 W. Va. 95, 123; 78 Va. 737; 14 Mich. 477; 25 Fed. Rep. 577; 35 id. 433; 5 W. & S. 223; 25 Mo. App. 190; 79 Ga. 135; 13 Ark. 563; 46 Am. Dec. 743; 78 Fed. Rep. 71; 150 U. S. 371; 184 Pa. 1; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1601. In the absence of statutory prohibition it has been held a corporation may convey its property to the creditor upon condition that he pay himself and return the surplus; 5 W. S. 223, 247; 6 Conn. 233; Am. Dec. 561.

It has been held that a failing corporation may prefer its own stockholders; 106 Ill. 439; 17 B. Mon. 412; 66 Am. Dec. 165; 20 Vt. 425; but not its own directors; 149 Pa. 148; 39 N. Y. 202; 36 Md. 60; 61 N. H. 632; 96 Ala. 357, 439; 23 Mo. App. 132; 44 Fed. Rep. 231; 45 id. 7; 130 Ill. 162; 64 Wis. 639; 25 Fed. Rep. 577; but see, contra, 70 Ia. 697; 72 id. 666; 78 Va. 737; 1 Spears, Eq. 545; 92 Mo. 79. After suspension and insolvency no preference will be allowed; 43 N. H. 263; 16 R. I. 597; 5 L. R. A. 361. The directors may advance money to a corporation in difficulties and secure themselves by mortgage of its property; 91 U. S. 587; 138 Ill. 655. If the preferred creditor be one of its officers, he must show that the preference was fair and conscionable and not collusive for the mere purpose of preference; 184 Pa. 1. The liquidation in good faith of debts due to directors with the hope of continuing business, is not invalid; 164 Mass. 437; 59 N. Y. 5. Judge Thompson takes very strong ground against the right of a corporation to prefer any creditor, but especially an officer, or stockholder; Thompson, Corp. § 6492; 32 Am. L. Rev. 138. The opposite ground is taken on principle in 2 No. W. L. Rev. by Prof. Harriman. In New York, by statute, a failing corporation cannot transfer any of its property to an officer, director or stockholder. This does not apply to a non-stock, mutual insurance company; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1601.

Preferences in assignment are allowed: Arizona, to creditors who will accept their share and release; Arkansas, generally, but not by corporations; Georgia, by individuals and firms, not by corporations; Massachusetts, if assented to by creditors in excess of the amount assigned and not valid against insolvent assignee; Mississippi and N. Carolina, generally; Virginia, certain preferences allowed, but not by limited partnerships; Montana, good, if absolute; New York, as to one-third of the estate, less claims preferred by law; but none by corporations or limited partnerships; Utah, none, if conditioned on release. In the other states and the territories, preferences appear to be invalid. In some states assignments which attempt to create a preference are void and the assignment is for the equal benefit of all creditors. See 4 Am. Lawy. 344. Preferences are usually invalidated by bankrupt acts.

PREFERENCE SHARES. Shares of a corporation or a joint-stock company entitling their holders to a preferential dividend and sometimes to priority on the division of the assets. See STOCK.

PREFERENTIAL DEBTS. Preferential debts, in bankruptcy, are those prior to all others; as, wages of a clerk, servant, or workman, rates due and taxes. Brett, Comm. 890.

PREFERRED. This word is relative; it refers to something else, and it means that the thing to which it is attached, whatever that may be, has some advantage over another thing of the same character, which, but for this advantage, would be like the others. 16 S. C. 530.

PREFERRED CLAIMS. See MORTGAGE; RECEIVER.

PREFERRED CREDITOR. A creditor whom the debtor has directed shall be paid before other creditors. See PREFERENCE.

PREFERRED STOCK. See STOCK.

PREGNANCY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The condition of a woman who has within her the product of a conception which has occurred within a year. Billings, Nat. Med. Dictionary.

Extra uterine or ectopic pregnancy is the development of the ovum outside of the uterine cavity, as in the Fallopian tubes or ovary. Extra uterine pregnancy commonly terminates by rupture of the sac, profuse internal hemorrhage, and death if not relieved promptly by a surgical operation. Rupture usually takes place between the second and sixth month of pregnancy.

The signs of pregnancy. These acquire a great importance from their connection with the subject of concealed, and also of pretended, pregnancy. The first may occur in order to avoid disgrace, and to accomplish in a secret manner the destruction of offspring. The second may be attempted to gratify the wishes of a husband or relations, to deprive the legal successor of his just claims, to gratify avarice by extorting money, and to avoid or delay execution.

These signs and indications are both subjective and objective. The chief subjective signs are: (1) cessation of menstruation, which rarely may not occur, and on the other hand may occur in other conditions; (2) nausea and vomiting which usually develop about the 6th week; (3) nervous disorders, including changes in disposition; (4) pain or discomfort in the breasts; (5) quickening or sensations due to the movements of the fœtus within the uterus. These sensations are first noticed about the end of the fourth month. The movements begin much earlier but are not felt until the uterus has developed sufficiently to come in contact with the abdominal walls.

The chief objective symptoms are: (1) changes in the facial expression with dark rings about the eyes and often spots of figmentation resembling large freckles; (2) enlargement of the breast, the nipple becoming prominent, and in brunettes surrounded by an aureola of figmentation; (3) enlargement of the abdomen, usually not evident before the third or fourth month. The prominence is pear-shaped with the small end downward; (4) Fœtal movements which can be felt through the abdominal walls as early as the end of the fifth month; (5) the uterine souffle or sound heard with the ear upon the abdomen and caused by the blood current in the dilated uterine arteries. This sound may be heard as early as the end of the fourth month; (6) the most important of all the signs consists of the sounds of the fœtal heart. These sounds can be heard about the beginning of the fifth month, and are of course a positive sign of pregnancy. The sounds have been aptly compared to the ticking of a watch heard through a pillow; (7) softening of the cervix or neck of the uterus; (8) Ballottement, the impulse or wave excited by suddenly lifting the uterus with a hand in the vagina, the other hand being placed firmly upon the abdomen.

The duration of pregnancy is normally about nine calendar or ten lunar months, or about 275 days from the cessation of the last menstrual period. The possibility of prolonged pregnancy has long been a fruitful subject of discussion but "by a study of the analogy of other functions of the body, by observations in the lower animals, and by accurate reliable data, from women in particular, we are forced to the conclusion that pregnancy may be and often is prolonged. . . . Gestation may be lengthened, parturition may be delayed from a few days to several months." American Text-Book of Obstetrics, Saunders, 1896.

The laws relating to pregnancy concern the circumstances under and the manner in which the fact is ascertained. There are two cases where the fact whether a woman is or has been pregnant is important to ascertain. The one is when it is supposed she pretends pregnancy, and the other when she is charged with concealing it.

Pretended pregnancy may arise from two causes: the one when a widow feigns herself with child in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate. The presumptive heir may in such case have a writ de ventre inspiciendo, by which the sheriff is commanded to have such made, and the fact determined whether pregnancy exists or not, by twelve matrons, in the presence of twelve knights. If the result determine the fact of pregnancy, then she is to be kept under proper guard until she is delivered. If the pregnancy be negatived, the presumptive heir is admitted to the inheritance; 1 Bla. Com. 456; Cro. Eliz. 566; 4 Bro. C. C. 90; 2 P. Wms. 591; Cox, C. C. 297. A practice quite similar prevailed in the civil law.

The second cause of pretended pregnancy occurs when a woman is under sentence of death for the commission of a crime. At common law, in case this plea be made before execution, the court must direct a jury of twelve matrons, or discreet women, to ascertain the fact, and if they bring in their verdict quick with child (for barely with child, unless it be alive in the womb, is not sufficient), execution shall be stayed, generally till the next session of the court, and so from session to session, till either she is delivered or proves by the course of nature not to have been with child at all; 4 Bla. Com. 394; 1 Bay 497.

In Scotland, all that is necessary to be proved, to have execution delayed, is the fact of pregnancy, no difference being made whether she be quick with child or not. This is also the provision of the French penal code upon this subject. In this country, there is little doubt that clear proof that the woman was pregnant, though not quick with child, would at common law be sufficient to obtain a respite of execution until after delivery. The difficulty lies in making the proof sufficiently clear, the signs and indications being all somewhat uncertain, some of them wanting, all liable to variation, and conviction of the fact only fastening upon the mind when a number of them, inexplicable upon any other hypothesis, concur in that one result.

It has been held that pregnancy at the time of marriage by another than the husband is sufficient ground for divorce, provided the pregnancy was unknown to the husband and there was no reasonable ground of suspicion by him; 99 Pa. 196; 79 Mich. 591. This can hardly be laid down as an absolute rule; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 483. And in a later case it was held that false representations of pregnancy made by a woman to induce a man, with whom she has had illicit intercourse, to marry her are not such fraud as will entitle him to a divorce if he does so, at least if they were not believed by him; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 128. See 20 Ore. 579.

Pregnancy is seldom concealed except for the criminal purpose of destroying the life of the fœtus in utero, or of the child immediately upon its birth. Infant life is easily extinguished; while proof of the unnatural crime is hard to be furnished. This has led to the passage of laws, both in England and in this country, calculated to facilitate the proof and also to punish the very act of concealment of pregnancy and death of the child when, if born alive, it would have been illegitimate. In England, the very stringent act of 21 Jac. I. c. 27, required that any mother of such child who had endeavored to conceal its birth should prove by at least one witness that the child was actually born dead; and for want of such proof it arrived at the forced conclusion that the mother had murdered it. This cruel law was essentially modified in 1803, by the passage of an act declaring that women indicted for the murder of bastard children should be tried by the same rules of evidence and presumption as obtain in other trials of murder.

The early legislation of Pennsylvania was characterized by the same severity. The act of May 31, 1781, made the concealment of the death of a bastard child conclusive evidence to convict the mother of murder. This was repealed by the act of 5th April, 1790, s. 6, which declared that the constrained presumption that the child whose death is concealed was therefore murdered by the mother shall not be sufficient to convict the party indicted, without probable presumptive proof is given that the child was born alive. The law was further modified by the act of 22d April, 1794, s. 18, which declares that the concealment of the death of any such child shall not be conclusive evidence to convict the party indicted for the murder of her child, unless the circumstances attending it be such as shall satisfy the mind of the jury that she did wilfully and maliciously destroy and take away the life of such a child. The act also punishes the concealment of the death of a bastard child by fine and imprisonment. The act of 31 March, 1860, P. & L. Dig. 1118, now governs in Pennsylvania. It makes the concealment of the death of an illegitimate child a substantive offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and leaves the question of the murder of the child by its mother, subject to the mode of trial and punishment as ordinary cases of murder. Counts for murder and concealing the death of the child may, however, be united in the same indictment. The states of New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Georgia, Illinois, and Michigan, all have enactments on this subject,—the punishment prescribed being, generally, fine and imprisonment. For duration of pregnancy, see GESTATION.

See PHYSICAL EXAMINATION; JURY OF WOMEN; EN VENTRE SA MERE.

PREGNANT. See AFFIRMATIVE PREGNANT; NEGATIVE PREGNANT.

PREJUDICE (Lat. præ, before, judicare, to judge).

A forejudgement. A leaning toward one side of a cause for some reason other than its justice. See 12 Ga. 448.

PRELATE. The name of an ecclesiastical officer. There are two orders of prelates: the first is composed of bishops, and the second, of abbots, generals of orders, deans, etc.

PRELEVEMENT. In French Law. The portion which a partner is entitled to take out of the assets of a firm before any division shall be made of the remainder of the assets between the partners.

The partner who is entitled to a prelèvement is not a creditor of the partnership: on the contrary, he is a part-owner; for, if the assets should be deficient, a creditor has the preference over the partner; on the other hand, should the assets yield any profit, the partner is entitled to his portion of it, whereas the creditor is entitled to no part of it, but he has a right to charge interest when he is in other respects entitled to it.

PRELIMINARY. Something which precedes: as, preliminaries of peace, which are the first sketch of a treaty, and contain the principal articles on which both parties are desirous of concluding, and which are to serve as the basis of the treaty.

PRELIMINARY ACT. In English Law. A document stating the time and place of a collision between vessels, the names of the vessels, and other particulars required to be filed by each solicitor in actions for damage by such collisions. Whart. Law. Dict.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION. The hearing given to a person accused of crime, by a magistrate or judge, exercising the functions of a committing magistrate, to ascertain whether there is evidence to warrant and require the commitment and holding to bail of the person accused. See Bish. New Cr. L. § 32, 225–239 a.

Coroners generally have the powers of a committing magistrate as also have the mayors of cities in many of the states; id. 239 b.

In case, as it often happens, there is question as to what precise crime should be charged against the prisoner or whether more than one crime is involved in the facts shown, the commitment should be so framed as to cover them all, leaving to the prosecuting officer and the grand jury the opportunity for election; but if the commitment does not cover all charges it does not discharge the prisoner from liability for the rest; id. § 33. The discharge of a prisoner on a preliminary examination will not operate as a bar to further proceedings; 47 N. J. L. 251; 16 Tex. App. 321; 10 Neb. 78.

It is said that a person charged with crime, unless a fugitive from justice, is entitled to a preliminary examination; 44 Neb. 417; but it was also held that such examination is not necessary as a basis for finding an indictment; 3 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 272; and that in proper cases the court may direct the prosecuting attorney to submit indictments without such examination; 2 Dist. Rep. Pa. 743. A complaint made on such examination may be dismissed and a new charge prosecuted before another magistrate; 7 Wash. 506; but after holding the accused to bail the magistrate cannot discharge him without notice to the prosecutor; 160 Pa. 119. The denial of the right to be taken before a magistrate of the county in which one is arrested, to give bail does not vitiate a subsequent trial and conviction; 79 Hun 410.

Where the evidence seems to warrant the commitment of the accused person, or time is required for the introduction of other evidence or for further investigation, the person may be committed or held to bail for further hearing. The examination may be postponed on account of the physical inability to attend of important witnesses for the state; 47 La. Ann. 1677.

Generally the offence charged is stated in the complaint and warrant and a preliminary examination is waived; and a plea that there was no such examination will not be entertained after information filed; 54 Kan. 206. An objection that there was no preliminary examination must be raised before trial by plea in abatement or motion to quash; 44 Neb. 417.

A person arrested and taken before a magistrate for preliminary examination may waive it even where the state constitution secures the right to such examination; 115 Cal. 57; 47 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 945. See, also, 46 Neb. 631. See, also, as to waiver of such examinations, 83 Wis. 486; 103 Mich. 473; 25 Fla. 675; 45 Hun 34.

It is the duty of the committing magistrate to secure the attendance of witnesses for the prosecution who are examined by him, for which purpose he may require them to give bail for their appearance before the grand jury or in the criminal court, with or without surety which is usually in his discretion; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 34. Where the preliminary examination is provided for by law, the testimony of the witnesses taken thereat may be afterwards shown in contradiction; 85 Cal. 421; 17 Vt. 658; 34 La. Ann. 1037; 40 Ark. 454; see 2 Swan 237; 32 Ia. 36. And the witnesses are liable to the penalties of perjury for false swearing if so authorized, otherwise not; 40 La. Ann. 460; 26 Me. 69; 2 McClain, Cr. Law § 858.

The filing of an information after the preliminary examination, but before a return of it made by the examining magistrate, is a mere irregularity and does not vitiate the proceedings; 115 Cal. 57. In Colorado, by statute, an information may be filed without a preliminary examination, upon the affidavit of any person who has knowledge of the commission of the offence and is a competent witness; 23 Col. 1, 9.

Where a complaint charged perjury on a certain date, and examination was waived, and the information subsequently filed charged the commission of the crime on another date, a plea in abatement on the ground that there was no examination on the offence charged in the information, was substained; 91 Wis. 245.

A statutory requirement that the magistrate shall, on preliminary examination, examine the witnesses to support the accusation, does not require that all of the witnesses known to the state shall be examined, but merely sufficient to justify the magistrate in binding over the accused for trial; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 848.

United States commissioners holding preliminary examinations have no judicial power, but only authority to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the offence was committed; 70 Fed. Rep. 972; and a district judge holding a preliminary examination has only, quoad hoc, the powers of a commissioner; id.

Where an examining magistrate certified that he found probable cause to believe that an offence had been committed and had taken bail, it was sufficient to sustain an information without a positive certificate by the magistrate that an offence had been committed; 102 Mich. 519.

In England, when an accused person has been arrested, either without warrant or by a justice's warrant, if he is charged with an offence for which he may be tried before a jury, the justice holds a preliminary inquiry to decide whether he ought or ought not to be sent for trial. The admission of the public during these inquiries is a matter of discretion with the justice. The witnesses for the prosecution are examined under oath and may be cross-examined by the defendant or his counsel or solicitor. The evidence is taken down in writing and after the prosecution is closed, it is read in the hearing of the defendant and he is asked whether he has anything to say in answer to the charge, being first told that he is not required to speak but that whatever he does say will be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence against him on the trial. The defendant is then allowed to call witnesses to prove his innocence. He may examine these himself or by his counsel or solicitor, and they may be cross-examined by the prosecutor. The defendant may not be questioned nor may he give evidence on his own behalf, except in certain special cases. If he choose to give evidence on oath he is liable to be cross-examined by the prosecutor.

If a prima facie case is not made out the defendant is discharged. If the justices are of opinion that a case has been made out they send him to trial. Hearings may be adjourned upon reasonable grounds to a stated time and place, in which case the accused is either removed under custody or discharged on his own recognizance, with or without sureties, to appear at the adjourned hearing. The limit of time must not exceed eight days. If the accused be held for trial, the prosecutor and the witnesses are bound by recognizance to appear and give evidence at the trial. The accused will not be released on bail when the charge is treason. In cases of felony and a large number of misdemeanors, the justice has a discretion in the matter. In case of misdemeanors not specially provided for, they have no power to refuse bail. Haycraft, Exec. Pow. in Rel. to Crime.

As to present French system, See JUGE D'INSTRUCTION.

See PRISONER.

PRELIMINARY PROOF. In Insurance. Marine policies in the United States generally have a provision that a loss shall be payable in a certain time, usually sixty days, "after proof," meaning "preliminary proof," which is not particularly specified. Fire policies usually specify the preliminary proof. Life policies, like marine, usually make the loss payable sixty or ninety days after notice and proof; 31 Me. 325; 6 Gray 396; 6 Harr. & J. 408; 3 Gill 276; 2 Wash. Va. 61; 23 Wend. 43; 1 La. 216; 11 Miss. 278; Stew. Low. C. 354; 14 Mo. 220; 10 Pet. 507; 6 Ill. 434; 5 Sneed 139; 2 Ohio 452; 6 Ind. 137; 30 Vt. 659; Beach, Ins. 1216. See PROOFS OF LOSS.

PREMEDITATEDLY. Thought of beforehand, for any length of time, however short. 106 Mo. 198. "Deliberately" logically contains in it all that is meant by "premeditatedly," and more. But "premeditatedly" is also contained in the phrase "malice aforethought." 108 Mo. 205; 118 id. 96.

PREMEDITATION. A design formed to commit a crime or to do some other thing before it is done. 3 Wash. St. 99.

Intent before the act, but not necessarily existing any extended time before. 28 Fla. 313.

Premeditation differs essentially from will, which constitutes the crime; because it supposes, besides an actual will, a deliberation, and a continued persistence which indicate more perversity. The preparation of arms or other instruments required for the execution of the crime are indications of premeditation, but are not absolute proof of it; as these preparations may have been intended for other purposes, and then suddenly changed to the performance of the criminal act. Murder by poisoning must of necessity be done with premeditation. See MALICE.

PREMIER. The principal minister of state; the prime minister. See CABINET.

PREMISES (Lat. præ, before, mittere, to put, to send).

That which is put before. The introduction. Statements previously made. See 1 East 456.

In Conveyancing. That part of a deed which precedes the habendum, in which are set forth the names of the parties with their titles and additions, and in which are recited such deeds, agreements, or matters of fact as are necessary to explain the reasons upon which the contract then entered into is founded: and it is here, also, the consideration on which it is made is set down and the certainty of the thing granted. 2 Bla. Com. 298; 8 Mass. 174; 6 Conn. 289; 13 N. J. Eq. 331; 15 id. 418.

In Equity Pleading. The stating part of a bill. It contains a narrative of the facts and circumstances of the plaintiff's case, and the wrongs of which he complains, and the names of the persons by whom done and against whom he seeks redress. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 9; Bart. Suit in Eq. 28; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 43; Story, Eq. Pl. § 27.

Every material fact to which the plaintiff intends to offer evidence must be stated in the premises; otherwise, he will not be permitted to offer or require evidence of such fact; 1 Bro. C. C. 94; 3 P. Wms. 276; 11 Ves. 240; 2 Hare 264; 6 Johns. 565; 9 Ga. 148.

In Estates. Lands and tenements. 1 East 453; 3 Maule & S. 169; 21 Ohio St. 188.

PREMIUM. In Insurance. The consideration for a contract of insurance.

A policy of insurance always expresses the consideration called the premium, which is a certain amount or a certain rate upon the value at risk, paid wholly in cash, or partly so and partly by promissory note or otherwise. 2 Pars. Marit. Law 182. By the charters of mutual fire insurance companies, the insured building is usually subject to a lien for the premium; 19 Miss. 53; 21 How. 35. The premium may be payable by service rendered; 5 Ind. 96.

In life insurance, the premium is usually payable periodically; 18 Barb. 541; and the continuance of the risk is usually made to depend upon the due payment of a periodical premium; 2 Dutch. 268. But if the practice of the company and its course of dealings with the insured, and others known to him, have been such as to induce a belief that so much of the contract as provides for a forfeiture upon non-payment at a fixed time will not be insisted on, the company will not be allowed to set up such a forfeiture, as against one in whom their conduct has induced such belief; May, Ins. § 361; 95 U. S. 380; 85 Ala. 348. The acceptance by a manager and agent of a life insurance company of a promissory note from the insured for the amount of the advance premium, and a delivery of the policy upon receipt of the note, constitute a waiver of the cash premium provided for in the application and policy which binds the company, although the policy also provides that the first premium shall be paid at the home office of the company on the delivery of the policy, and that no agent has power in any way to waive the terms of the contract; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1785. An action lies to recover a premium paid on a policy of life insurance where the company, upon the discovery of certain false statements inserted therein by the company's agents, cancelled the policy, but the cost of the insurance enjoyed by the insured during the life of the policy must first be deducted; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 500. But this is doubted in 46 Am. L. Reg. 40, because the insured should be entitled to recover the entire premium, he never having had any insurance under the void policy. See 117 U. S. 519. So far as the agreed risk is not run in amount or time under a marine policy, the whole or a proportional stipulated or customary part of the premium is either not payable, or, if paid, is to be returned unless otherwise agreed; 2 Pars. Mart. Law 185; 16 Barb. 280; 7 Gray 246. Where an insurance company authorizes the insured to send a premium by mail, such premium is paid when the letter containing it is deposited in the post office addressed to the company; 77 Hun 556.

PREMIUM NOTE. In Insurance. A note given in place of payment of the whole or a part of the premium.

The premium, or a part of it, is not unfrequently paid wholly or in part by a promissory note, with a stipulation in the policy that the unpaid amount shall be set off and deducted in settling for a loss; 1 Phill. Ins. § 51. It is also usually collaterally secured by a stipulation in the policy for the forfeiture of the policy by non-payment of the premium note, or any amount due thereon by assessment or otherwise; 12 N. Y. 477; 2 Ind. 65; 3 Gray 215; 19 Miss. 135; 35 N. H. 328; 29 Vt. 23; 32 Pa. 75; 34 Me. 451; Beach, Ins. 520.

PREMIUM PUDICITÆ (Lat. the price of chastity.) The consideration of a contract by which a man promises to pay to a woman with whom he has illicit intercourse a certain sum of money.

When the contract is made as the payment of past cohabitation, as between the parties, it is good, and will be enforced, if under seal, but such consideration will not support a parol promise; 3 Q. B. 483; Poll. Contr. 288; 1 Story, Contr. § 670. It cannot be paid on a deficiency of assets, until all creditors are paid, though it has a preference over the heir, next of kin, or devisee. If the contract be for future cohabitation, it is void; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. § 296; 5 Ves. 286; 3 E. & B. 642; 2 P. Wms. 432; 1 W. Bla. 517; 1 Ball & B. 360; Roberts, Fraud. Conv. 428; Cas. Talb. 153, and the cases there cited; 6 Ohio 21; 5 Cow. 253; Harp. 201; 3 T. B. Monr. 35; 11 Mass. 368; 2 N. & M'C. 251. See CONSIDERATION.

PRENDER, PRENDRE (L. Fr.). To take. This word is used to signify the right of taking a thing before it is offered: hence the phrase of law, it lies in render, but not in prender. See A PRENDRE; PROFITS A PRENDRE; Gale & W. Easem; Washb. Easem.

PRENOMEN (Lat.). The first or Christian name of a person. Benjamin is the prenomen of Benjamin Franklin. See Cas. Hardw. 286; 1 Tayl. 148.

PREPENSE. Aforethought. See 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 1784.

PREPONDERENCE OF EVIDENCE. Greater weight of evidence, or evidence which is more credible and convincing to the mind. 80 Wis. 193. See 37 Ark. 588.

PREROGATIVE. In Civil Law. The privilege, pre-eminence, or advantage which one person has over another: thus, a person vested with an office is entitled to all the rights, privileges, prerogatives, etc., which belong to it.

In English Law. The royal prerogative is an arbitrary power vested in the executive to do good and not evil. Rutherforth, Inst. 279; Co. Litt. 90; Chitty, Prerog. Bac. Abr. The word simply means a power or will which is discretionary, and above and uncontrolled by any other will. It is frequently used to express the uncontrolled will of a sovereign power in the state and is applied not only to the king but also to the legislative and judicial branches of the government.

It is sometimes applied by law writers to the thing over which the power or will is exercised, as fiscal prerogatives, meaning king's revenues; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 147.

PREROGATIVE COURT. In English Law. An ecclesiastical court held in each of the two provinces of York and Canterbury before a judge appointed by the archbishop of the province.

Formerly in this court testaments were proved, and administrations granted where a decedent left chattels to the value of five pounds (bona notabilia) in two distinct dioceses or jurisdictions within the province, and all causes relating to the wills, administrations, or legacies of such persons were originally cognizable. This jurisdiction was transferred to the court of probate by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, § 4, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, and now, by the Judicature Acts, it is included in the supreme court of judicature.

An appeal lay formerly from this court to the king in chancery, by stat. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, afterwards to the privy council, by stat. 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92; 2 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 206; 3 Bla. Com. 65.

In American Law. A court having a jurisdiction of probate matters, in the state of New Jersey.

PREROGATIVE WRITS. Processes issued by an exercise of the extraordinary power of the crown on proper cause shown. They are the writs of procedendo, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, habeas corpus; 3 Stephens, Com. 11th ed. 626. They differ from other writs in that they are never issued except in the exercise of the judicial discretion, and are directed generally not to the sheriff, but to the parties sought to be affected themselves; 3 Bla. Com. 132.

PRESCRIBABLE. To which a right may be acquired by prescription.

PRESCRIPTION. A mode of acquiring title to incorporeal hereditaments by immemorial or long-continued enjoyment.

A prescribing for title; the claim of title to a thing by virtue of immemorial use and enjoyment; the right or title acquired by possession had during the time and in the manner fixed by law; a mode of acquiring real property, when a man can show no other title to what he claimed than that he and those under whom he claimed had immemorially used to enjoy it; 26 W. Va. 427.

The distinction between a prescription and a custom is that a custom is a local usage and not annexed to a person: a prescription is a personal usage confined to the claimant and his ancestors or grantors. The theory of prescription was that the right claimed must have been enjoyed beyond the period of the memory of man, which for a long time, in England, went back to the time of Richard I. To avoid the necessity of proof of such long duration, a custom arose of allowing a presumption of a grant on proof of usage for a long term of years.

The length of time necessary to raise a strict prescription was limited by statute 32 Hen. VIII. at sixty years; 8 Pick. 308; 7 Wheat. 59; 4 Mas. 402; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 539. See 29 Vt. 43; 24 Ala. N. S. 130; 29 Pa. 22; 4 Del. Ch. 643.

Grants of incorporeal hereditaments are presumed upon proof of enjoyment of the requisite character for a period of years equal to that fixed by statute as the period of limitation in respect of real actions; 3 Kent 442; 12 Wend. 330; 27 Vt. 265; 2 Bail. 101; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 386; 13 N. H. 360; 4 Day 244; 10 S. & R. 63; 9 Pick. 251. See 3 Me. 120; 1 B. & P. 400; 5 B. & Ald. 232; 7 Mackey 1; 84 Ky. 420; 82 Ga. 770; 66 Hun 633; but a grant cannot be presumed where it would have been unlawful; 112 N. Y. 142.

Prescription properly applies only to incorporeal hereditaments; 3 Barb. 105; Finch, Law 132; such as easements of water, light and air, way, etc.; 4 Mas. 397; 20 Pa. 331; 1 Gale & D. 205, 210, n.; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 114; see 140 Ill. 581; 4 Misc. Rep. 48; 44 La. Ann. 492; 156 Mass. 89; a class of franchises; Co. Litt. 114; 10 Mass. 70; 10 S. & R. Pa. 401. See FERRY; Herbert. Prescription.

A person cannot acquire a prescriptive right of way over his own lands, or the lands of another which he occupies as tenant; 116 Mo. 379. The fact that certain persons have a right of way by grant does not prevent other persons from acquiring a prescriptive right to use the way; 156 Mass. 449.

It has been held that corporations may exist by prescription; 2 Kent *277; 12 Mass. 400. It is necessary in such case to presuppose a grant by charter or act of parliament, which has been lost; 35 Barb. 319.

In Louisiana, a manner of acquiring property or discharging debts by the effect of time. Rev. Code of La. Art. 3457. See 40 La. Ann. 761.

See as to rights by prescription to use lands of another, 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 484.

In France thirty years has been substituted for immemorial prescription, and in Prussia periods of from thirty to fifty years.

In International Law. The doctrine of Immemorial Prescription is indispensable in public law; 1 Phill. Int. L. § 255. The general consent of mankind has established the principle that long and uninterrupted possession by one nation excludes the claim of every other. All nations are bound by this consent, since all are parties to it; none can safely disregard it without impugning its own title to its possessions; 1 Wheat. Int. L. 207. The period of time cannot be fixed in public law as it can in private law; it must depend upon varying and variable circumstances; 1 Phill. Int. L. § 260.

Burke speaks of the "solid rock of prescription—the soundest, the most general, the most recognized title between man and man that is known in municipal, as in public jurisprudence." Vol. ix. p. 449.

PRESENCE. The being in a particular place.

In many contracts and judicial proceedings it is necessary that the parties should be present in order to render them valid; for example, a party to a deed, when it is executed by himself, must personally acknowledge it, when such acknowledgment is required by law, to give it its full force and effect, and his presence is indispensable, unless, indeed, another person represent him as his attorney, having authority from him for that purpose.

Actual presence is being bodily in the precise spot indicated.

Constructive presence is being so near to or in such relation with the parties actually in a designated place as to be considered in law as being in the place.

Attempting to deter a witness from testifying, while he is in the witness-room or hallway of the court-room, by offering him money, is a misdemeanor in the presence of the court, and punishable without indictment, as contempt; 131 U. S. 267.

It is a rule in the civil law that he who is incapable of giving his consent to an act is not to be considered present although he be actually in the place. A lunatic, or a man sleeping, would not, therefore, be considered present; Dig. 41. 2. 1. 3. And so if insensible; 4 Bro. P. C. 71; 3 Russ. 441; or if the act were done secretly so that he knew nothing of it; 1 P. Wms. 740.

The English statute of frauds, § 5, directs that all devises and bequests of any lands or tenements shall be attested or subscribed in the presence of the devisor. Under this statute it has been decided that an actual presence is not indispensable, but that where there was a constructive presence it was sufficient; as, where the testatrix executed the will in her carriage standing in the street before the office of her solicitor, the witness retiring into the office to attest it, and it being proved that the carriage was accidentally put back, so that she was in a situation to see the witness sign the will, through the window of the office; Bro. C. C. 98. See 2 Curt. Eccl. 320, 331; 2 Salk. 688; 3 Russ. 441; 1 Maule & S. 294; 2 C. & P. 491; 135 Mass. 241; 81 Va. 410.

In Criminal Law. In trials for cases in which corporal punishment is assigned, the defendant's appearance must ordinarily be in person, and must so appear on record. There can be no judgment of conviction taken by default; 6 Pa. 387; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 540. The prisoner's actual presence is not requisite at the making and arguing of motions of all kinds, though in motions for arrest of judgment and in error, the old practice was to require it; 88 Ill. 284; Bish. New Cr. Pro. 265; 63 Mo. 159. This is not now usually required in proceedings in error; 1 Park. C. C. 360. In felonies presence at the verdict is essential, and this right cannot be waived; 18 Pa. 103; 63 id. 386; but where a prisoner was voluntarily absent during the taking of a portion of the testimony in an adjoining room, he was considered as constructively present; 25 Alb. L. J. 303. See 88 Pa. 189. In trials for misdemeanors these rules do not apply; 9 Dana 304; 7 Cow. 525; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 550.

PRESENT. A gift, or more properly, the thing given. It is provided by the constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 9, n. 7, that "no person holding any office of profit or trust under them [the United States] shall, without the consent of congress, accept of any present, emolument, or office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state."

PRESENT USE. One which has an immediate existence and is at once operated upon by the statute of uses.

PRESENTATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of a patron offering his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted in a church or benefice.

PRESENTATION OFFICE. The office of the lord chancellor's official, the secretary of presentations.

PRESENTEE. In Ecclesiastical Law. A clerk who has been presented by his patron to a bishop in order to be instituted in a church.

PRESENTMENT. In Criminal Practice. The written notice taken by a grand jury of any offence, from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the government. 4 Bla. Com. 301.

Upon such presentment, when proper, the officer employed to prosecute afterwards frames a bill of indictment, which is then sent to the grand jury, and they find it to be a true bill. In an extended sense, presentments include not only what are properly so called, but also inquisitions of office and indictments found by a grand jury. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 25, s. 1.

The difference between a presentment and an inquisition is this: that the former is found by a grand jury authorized to inquire of offences generally, whereas the latter is an accusation found by a jury specially returned to inquire concerning the particular offence. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 25, s. 6. See, generally, Com. Dig. Indictment (B); Bac. Abr. Indictment (A); 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 163; 7 East 387; 1 Meigs 112; 11 Humphr. 12.

The writing which contains the accusation so presented by a grand jury. 1 Brock. 156.

In Contracts. The production of a bill of exchange or promissory note to the party on whom the former is drawn, for his acceptance, or to the person bound to pay either, for payment.

The holder of a bill is bound, in order to hold the parties to it responsible to him, to present it in due time for acceptance, and to give notice, if it be dishonored, to all the parties he intends to hold liable; 2 Pet. 170; 12 Pick. 399; 7 Gray 217; 20 Wend. 321; 12 Vt. 401; 13 La. 357; 7 B. Monr. 17; 8 Mo. 268; 7 Blackf. 367; 1 M'Cord 322; 7 Leigh 179. See 20 D. C. 26; 1 App. D. C. 171. And when a bill or note becomes payable, it must be presented for payment.

In general, the presentment for payment should be made to the maker of a note, or the drawee of a bill, for acceptance, or to the acceptor for payment; 2 Esp. 509; but a presentment made at a particular place, when payable there, is, in general, sufficient; 8 N. Y. 266. A personal demand on the drawee or acceptor is not necessary; a demand at his usual place of residence; 1 M. & G. 83; 3 B. Monr. 461; 17 Ohio 78; of his wife, or other agent, is sufficient; Byles, Bills 283; 17 Ala. N. S. 42; 1 Const. 367; 2 Esp. 509; Holt 313; or place of business, of the acceptor; 3 Kent 64, 65; 4 Mo. 52; 11 Gratt. 260; 2 Camp. 596. See 158 Mass. 90. When, on presentment of a bill of exchange at the acceptor's usual place of business, within proper hours, a notary finds the doors closed, he is justified, nothing further appearing, in protesting the bill for non-payment, without inquiry for the acceptor at his residence, and without making further effort to find him; 86 Tenn. 201. The term residence is not used in a strict sense, so necessarily implying a permanent, exclusive, or actual abode in a place, but it may be satisfied by a temporary, partial, or even constructive residence; 148 Mass. 181. See RESIDENCE.

The presentment for acceptance must be made in reasonable time; and what this reasonable time is depends upon the circumstances of each case; 9 Moore, P. C. 66; 2 H. Bla. 565; 4 Mass. 336; 1 M'Cord 322; 7 Gray 217; 7 Cow. 205; 9 Mart. La. 326; 7 Blackf. 367. See 65 Miss. 242. The presentment of a note or bill for payment ought to be made on the day it becomes due; 4 Term 148; 8 Mass. 453; 3 N. H. 14; 12 La. 386; 22 Conn. 213; 20 Me. 109; 7 Gill & J. 78; 8 Ia. 394; 10 Ohio 496; and notice of non-payment given, otherwise the holder will lose the security of the drawer and indorsers of a bill and indorsers of a promissory note; 1 Wheat. 171; 1 Harr. Del. 10; 5 Leigh, 522; 5 Blackf. 215; 2 Jones, N. C. 23; 13 Pick. 465; 19 Johns. 391; 8 Vt. 191; 1 Ala. N. S. 375; 8 Mo. 336; and if the money be lodged there for its payment, the holder would probably have no recourse against the maker or acceptor if he did not present them on the day and the money should be lost; 5 B. & Ald. 244; 27 Me. 149. The facts being undisputed, the question of reasonable time for presentment of a draft is one of law; 51 Mo. App. 245.

The excuses for not making a presentment are general, and applicable to all persons who are indorsers; or they are special, and applicable to the particular indorser only.

Among the former are—inevitable accident or overwhelming calamity; Story, Bills § 308; 3 Wend. 488; 2 Ind. 224. The prevalence of a malignant disease, by which the ordinary operations of business are suspended; 2 Johns. Cas. 1; 3 Maule & S. 267. The breaking out of war between the country of the maker and that of the holder; 1 Paine 156. The occupation of the country where the note is payable, or where the parties live, by a public enemy, which suspends commercial operations and intercourse; 8 Cra. 155; 15 Johns. 57; 7 Pet. 586; 2 Brock 20. The obstruction of the ordinary negotiations of trade by vis major. Positive interdictions and public regulations of the state which suspend commerce and intercourse. The utter impracticability of finding the maker or ascertaining his place of residence; Story, Pr. Notes §§ 205, 236, 238, 241, 264; 4 S. & R. 480; 14 La. An. 484; 3 M'Cord 494; 1 Dev. 247; 2 Cai. 121.

Among the latter, or special excuses for not making a presentment, may be enumerated the following. The receiving the note by the holder from the payee, or other antecedent party, too late to make a due presentment; this will be an excuse as to such party; 16 East 248; 7 Mass. 483; Story, Pr. Notes §§ 201, 265; 11 Wheat. 431; Byles, Bills 206. The note being an accommodation note of the maker for the benefit of the indorser; Story, Bills § 370. See 2 Brock. 20; 7 Harr. & J. 381; 7 Mass. 452; 1 Wash. C. C. 461; 1 Hayw. 271; 4 Mas. 413; 1 Cai. 157; 1 Stew. Ala. 175. A special agreement by which the indorser waives the presentment; 8 Me. 213; 11 Wheat. 629; Story, Bills § 371. The receiving security or money by an endorser to secure himself from loss, or to pay the note at maturity. In this case, when the indemnity or money is a full security for the amount of the note or bill, no presentment is requisite; Story, Bills § 374; Story, Pr. Notes § 281; 4 Watts 328; 9 Gill & J. 47; 7 Wend. 165; 2 Me. 207; 5 Mass. 170; 5 Conn. 175. The receiving the note by the holder from the indorser as a collateral security for another debt; Story, Pr. Notes § 284; Story, Bills § 372; 2 How. 427, 457.

Where a negotiable note is by its terms payable at a particular bank, proof of presentment at that bank for payment, at its maturity, is indispensable to a recovery in an action thereon against an endorser; 29 W. Va. 528.

A want of presentment may be waived by the party to be affected, after full knowledge of the fact; 8 S. & R. 438. See 6 Wend. 658; 3 Bibb 102; 5 Johns. 385; 4 Mass. 347; 8 Cush. 157; Bac. Abr. Merchant, etc. (M); 47 Mo. App. 151; 114 Mo. 276. See, generally, 1 Hare & W. Sel. Dec. 214, 224; Story, Pr. Notes; Byles, Bills; Parsons, Bills; Dan. Neg. Instr.; 12 L. R. A. 727.

PRESENTS. This word signifies the writing then actually made and spoken of: as, these presents; know all men by these presents; to all to whom these presents shall come.

PRESERVATION. Keeping safe from harm; avoiding injury. This term always presupposes a real or existing danger.

A jettison, which is always for the preservation of the remainder of the cargo, must therefore be made only when there is a real danger existing. See AVERAGE; JETTISON.

In certain cases the court may make orders for the preservation of the subject-matter of litigation. An order has been made for the sale of a horse which was consuming its value in food while an action on a warranty was pending; 3 C. P. D. 316; Brett, Comm. 762 See PERISHABLE GOODS.

PRESIDENT. An officer of a company who is to direct the manner in which business is to be transacted. From the decision of the president there is an appeal to the body over which he presides.

PRESIDENT JUDGE. A title sometimes given to the presiding judge. It was formerly used in England and is now used in the courts of common pleas in Pennsylvania. The lord chief justice is now permanent president of the high court in England. The title president is said to have a high Norman flavor. Inderwick, King's Peace 225.

PRESIDENT OF A BANK. This officer, under the banking system in the United States, is ordinarily a member of the board of directors of the bank, and is chosen by them. It is his duty to preside at all meetings of the board of directors; to exercise a constant, immediate, and personal supervision over the daily affairs of the bank; and to institute and carry on legal proceedings to collect demands or claims due the institution; Morse, Banks 144, citing 2 Metc. (Ky.) 240; 5 How. 83; Bolles, Bank Off. 1-70; 28 Vt. 24. Mortgages to secure subscriptions to stock are often put in his name; 1 Sandf. Ch. 179; but he has no more control over the property of the bank than any other director; 7 Ala. 281; 1 Seld. 320. He has no authority to release the claims of the bank without the authorization of the board of directors; 7 R. I. 224; 115 Mass, 547; and an agreement made by him, after the bank has gone into liquidation, to continue its guarantee upon certain notes, is not binding upon the stockholders; 133 U. S. 67. See NATIONAL BANKS; OFFICER. See, generally, Ball, Nat. Banks 58.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. An officer of state who is a member of the cabinet. He attends on the sovereign, proposes business at the council table, and reports to the sovereign the transactions there. 1 Bla. Com. 230.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. The title of the chief executive officer of the United States.

The constitution directs that the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. Art. 2, s. 1.

No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years and been fourteen years resident within the United States. Art. 2, s. 1, par. 5.

He is chosen by presidential electors (q. v.). See 1 Kent 276; Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1453. The votes of the electors are transmitted to the vice-president and by him opened in the presence of both houses of congress and counted by tellers previously selected by the two houses separately. If there is no election, a president is chosen by the house of representatives, the members voting by states, from the candidates not exceeding three, having the highest number of electoral votes.

In case of a vacancy the vice-president succeeds, and if there be none then the members of the cabinet succeed in a prescribed order. See CABINET.

The president shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected; and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them. Art. 2, s. 1, par. 7. The act of March 3d, 1873, c. 226, fixed the salary of the president at fifty thousand dollars.

In addition to certain specified powers, the president is vested by the constitution with the executive power of the federal government and the duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. As to his powers, generally, and the historical development of the executive office, see EXECUTIVE POWER.

The president and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Art 2, sec. 4.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS. Persons chosen in the different states whose sole duty it is to elect a president and vice-president of the United States. Each state appoints a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the state is entitled in congress, and it is within the power of the state legislature to direct how such electors shall be appointed. (Const. art. ii. sect. 1). The electors have frequently been appointed by the state legislatures directly, and they have been elected separately by congressional districts; but the more usual method of appointment is by general ballot, so that each voter in a state votes for the whole number of electors to which his state is entitled.

The appointment and mode of appointment of electors belong exclusively to the states, under the constitution; 146 U. S. 1.

The constitution provides, Amend. art. 12, that "the electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for president and vice-president, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as president, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as vice-president; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as president, and of all persons voted for as vice-president, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the president of the senate." See PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

PRESS. By a figure this word signifies the art of printing.

All men have a right to print and publish whatever they may deem proper, unless by doing so they infringe the rights of another, as in the case of copyrights (q. v.), when they may be enjoined. For any injury they may commit against the public or individuals they may be punished, either by indictment or by a civil action at the suit of the party injured, when the injury has been committed against a private individual. See U. S. Const. Amendm. art. 1; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; LIBEL.

PRESS COPIES. The identity of the handwriting as shown on the impression is not destroyed, nor rendered unrecognizable by persons acquainted with its characteristics. A person having accurate knowledge can testify to the genuineness with as much accuracy as if the original sheets were before him. Such copies are the same as other writings partially obliterated by damp and exposure, which are admissible as evidence, if duly identified by testimony. They are not however satisfactory as standards of comparison of handwriting. Enough originality is left to be identified by a witness when its own originality is in question; 7 Allen 561; 1 Cush. 217; to prove the contents of a lost letter, or where a party refused to give up the original; 6 S. & R. 420; 19 La. An. 91; 37 Conn. 555. The necessity of producing the original, or laying the foundation in the usual way for secondary evidence, is not obviated by the fact that a party keeps letter press copies; 44 N. Y. 171; so in 35 Md. 123. A copy, sworn to be correctly made from a press copy of a letter, is admissible as secondary evidence, to prove its contents, without producing the press copy; 102 Mass. 362. Press copies are admissible against a party when they appear to be in his handwriting and the originals cannot be produced; 7 Allen 561. Strictly speaking, a letter-press copy is secondary to the document from which it is taken, and cannot be treated as an original; 3 Camp. 228; 4 McLean 378; 35 Md. 123; 19 La. An. 91; 31 Fed. Rep. 313. See, generally, 57 Ga. 50; 73 Ill. 161; 18 Kan. 546.

PREST. A duty in money that was to be paid by the sheriff on his account in the exchequer, or for money left or remaining in his hands. Cowell.

PRESTATION. A right by which neutral vessels may be appropriated by way of hire by a belligerent on payment of freight beforehand. In 1870 the Prussian troops sank six British vessels to obstruct navigation in the river Seine. The act was defended by Prussia on the ground of military necessity; indemnification was subsequently made; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 485.

PRESTIMONY, OR PRÆSTIMONIA. In the Canon Law. A fund or revenue appropriated by the founder for the subsistence of a priest, without being erected into any title or benefice, chapel, prebend, or priory. It is not subject to the ordinary; but of it the patron, and those who have a right from him, are the collators. Whart. Law Lex.

PRESUME. To believe or accept upon probable evidence. It is not so strong a word as infer; 46 Conn. 385. See INFERENCE; PRESUMPTION.

PRESUMPTION. An inference affirmative or disaffirmative of the truth or falsehood of any proposition or fact drawn by a process of probable reasoning in the absence of actual certainty of its truth or falsehood, or until such certainty can be ascertained. Best, Presump. 4.

An inference affirmative or disaffirmative of the existence of a disputed fact, drawn by a judicial tribunal, by a process of probable reasoning, from some one or more matters of fact, either admitted in the cause or otherwise satisfactorily established. Best, Presump. 12.

A rule of law that courts and judges shall draw a particular inference from a particular fact, or from particular evidence, unless and until the truth of such inference is disproved. Steph. Ev. 4; 136 N. Y. 120.

Conclusive presumptions are inferences which the law makes so peremptorily that it will not allow them to be overturned by any contrary proof, however strong. Best, Presump. 20. They are called, also, absolute and irrebuttable presumptions.

Disputable presumptions are inferences of law which hold good until they are invalidated by proof or a stronger presumption. Best, Presump. 29; 2 H. & M'H. 77; 4 Johns. Ch. 287.

Presumptions of fact are inferences as to the existence of some fact drawn from the existence of some other fact; inferences which common sense draws from circumstances usually occurring in such cases. 3 B. & Ad. 890; 3 Hawks 122; 1 Wash. C. C. 372.

Presumptions of law are rules which, in certain cases, either forbid or dispense with any ulterior inquiry. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 14. Inferences or positions established, for the most part, by the common, but occasionally by the statute, law, which are obligatory alike on judges and juries. Best, Presump. 17. They are either conclusive or disputable.

Mixed presumptions hold an intermediate place and consist of presumptive inferences which, from their strength, importance, or frequent occurrence, attract the observation of the law, and, from being constantly recommended by judges and acted on by juries, become as familiar to the courts as presumptions of law, and occupy as important a place in the administration of justice. They have been termed quasi legal presumptions, and are divided into three classes: 1st, Where the inference is one which common-sense would have made for itself; 2d, Where an artificial weight is attached to the evidentiary facts, beyond their mere natural tendency to produce belief; and 3d, Where from motives of legal policy, juries are recommended to draw inferences which are purely artificial. Chamb. Best, Ev. § 324.

The distinctions between presumptions of law and presumptions of fact are—first, that in regard to presumptions of law a certain inference must be made whenever the facts appear which furnish the basis of the inference; while in case of other presumptions a discretion more or less extensive is vested in the tribunal as to drawing the inference. See 9 B. & C. 643. Second, in case of presumptions of law, the court may draw the inference whenever the requisite facts are developed in pleading;

Steph. Pl. 382; while other presumptions can be made only by the intervention of a jury. Presumptions of law are reduced to fixed rules, and form a part of the system of jurisprudence to which they belong; presumptions of fact are derived wholly and directly from the circumstances of the particular case, by means of the common experience of mankind. See 2 Stark. Ev. 684; 35 Pa. 440.

It has been said that a more useful and accurate division of presumptions of fact is obtained by treating them with reference to their effect upon the burden of proof and designating them in this aspect as slight and strong; Chamb. Best, Ev. § 319. Slight presumptions, though sufficient to excite suspicion or produce an impression in favor of the truth of the facts they indicate, do not, when taken singly, either constitute proof or shift the burden of proof; id. Strong presumptions shift the burden of proof even though the evidence to rebut them involved the proof of a negative; id. § 321. These are of great weight and in the absence of other evidence are decisive in civil cases; id. § 322. It has been suggested as the characteristic distinction between presumptions of law and presumptions of fact, either simple or mixed, that when the former are disregarded by a jury, a new trial is granted as matter of right, but that the disregard of any of the latter, however strong and obvious, is only ground for a new trial at the discretion of the court; Chamb. Best, Ev. § 327; 1 Term 167; 44 Ala. 159; 31 Ga. 331.

The lack of precision which attaches to the use of the word presumption springs naturally from the variety of the uses to which the word is applied. Of these Prof. J. B. Thayer in his pamphlet on the Presumption of Innocence enumerates seven: (1) The presumption of facts properly defined, where a fact or set of facts furnishes evidence or inference of another. (2) The presumption of law properly defined, as, where a fact or set of facts is considered sufficient evidence of another in the absence to the contrary. (3) Where a fact or set of facts makes out a case which shall stand until overthrown by a specific quantity of evidence; (a) sufficient to satisfy a jury; (b) a preponderance; (c) evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. (4) Where the term is used to imply that a certain fact is the legal equivalent of another fact; e. g. the presumption of malice. (5) Where the contrary of the so-called presumption is not to be taken as true without evidence, the effect being to regulate the burden of proof. (6) Where neither a fact nor the contrary of it is to be assumed as true without evidence, the presumption being of the truth of what is termed a neutral fact, or in other words, that there is no presumption; as in case of shipwreck where there is no presumption of survivorship. 8 H. L. Cas. 183. (7) Where the word is used as a rhetorical term to express a legal doctrine as the presumption of innocence. See, for a discussion of this classification and a collection of cases relating thereto, Chamb. Best, Ev. 306.

In giving effect to presumptions of fact, it is said that the presumption stands until proof is given of the contrary; 1 Cr. M. & R. 895; 2 H. & M'H. 77; 2 Dall. 22; 4 Johns. Ch. 287. See BURDEN OF PROOF; ONUS PROBANDI. This contrary proof may be a conflicting presumption; and Mr. Best lays down the following rules for application in such cases: first, special presumptions take the place of general ones; see 8 B. & C. 737; 9 id. 643; 5 Taunt. 326; 1 Marsh. 68; second, presumptions derived from the ordinary course of nature are stronger than casual presumptions; 4 B. & C. 71; Co. Litt. 373 a; third, presumptions are favored which tend to give validity to acts; 1 Mann. & R. 668; 3 Camp. 432; 7 B. & C. 573; 2 Wheat. 70; 1 South. 148; 7 T. B. Monr. 344; 2 Gill & J. 114; 10 Pick. 359; 1 Rawle 386; 72 Mich. 446; 38 Minn. 143; and see MAXIMS, Omnia præsumuntur, etc.; fourth, the presumptions of innocence is favored in law; 4 C. & P. 116; Russ. & R. 61; 10 M. & W. 15.

Among conclusive presumptions may be reckoned estoppels by deed, see ESTOPPELS; solemn admissions, of parties, and unsolemn admissions which have been acted on; 1 Camp. 139; 1 Taunt. 398; 15 Mass. 82; see ADMISSIONS; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 205; that a sheriff's return is correct as to facts stated therein as between the parties; 15 Mass. 82; that an infant under the age of seven years is incapable of committing a felony; 4 Bla. Com. 23; see 84 Ky. 457; that a boy under fourteen is incapable of committing a rape; 7 C. & P. 582; contra, 5 Lea 352; 84 Ky. 457; that children born in wedlock are presumed to be legitimate; 2 Allen 453; 75 Ill. 315; 2 Bush 621; 75 Cal. 379; at least where the husband might have had access and though the infidelity of the wife be proved; 3 C. & P. 215; 5 Cl. & F. 163; and positive proof of non-access is required to rebut the presumption; 58 Vt. 49; 85 Va. 245; and it cannot be proved by the wife; 60 Wis. 583; that despatches of an enemy carried in a neutral vessel between two hostile ports are hostile; 6 C. Rob. 440; that all persons subject to any law which has been duly promulgated, or which derives its validity from general or immemorial custom, are acquainted with its provisions; 4 Bla. Com. 27; 1 Co. 177; 2 id. 3 b; 6 id. 54 a. See, also, LIMITATION; PRESCRIPTION.

A person not heard from for seven years by those who would probably have heard from him if alive is presumed to be dead; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41; Chamb. Best, Ev. 304, note citing cases; 180 Pa. 644; and though the time at which death is presumed to have taken place is a subject of controversy, the better opinion is that there is no presumption as to that; Chamb. Best, Ev. 305; 2 Brett, Com. 941; 2 M. & W. 894; and the onus is on the person whose case requires proof of death at a particular period; 75 Ala. 27; 72 Wis. 170; 13 Ired. Law 333; 8 U. C. Q. B. 291; though in some cases it has been held that death will be presumed at the end of seven years; 11 N. H. 197; 15 N. J. Eq. 119; 4 Bradf. Sur. N. Y. 117; 4 U. C. Q. B. 510. In most states this subject is regulated by statute but it is held that the statutory presumption of death from absence or concealment for seven years, without having been heard from, does not apply to children of tender age, incapable of absenting or concealing themselves of their own volition, and whose movements are governed by others; 73 Miss. 417. In order to establish a presumption of death the place to look for the person is his last known place of residence, and not the place from which he has removed; 183 Pa. 155. See, as to presumption of death, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 512–553.

Among rebuttable presumptions may be reckoned the presumptions that a man is innocent of the commission of a crime; Steph. Ev. 97; 2 Lew. Cr. Cas. 227; see 3 Gray 465; 4 B. & C. 247; 2 B. & Ald. 385; 23 Neb. 33; 44 N. J. Eq. 329; that the possessor of property is its owner; 1 Stra. 505; 9 Cush. 150; 21 Barb. 333; 35 Me. 139, 150; 113 N. Y. 284; 4 Harring. 327; that buildings belong to the owner of the land on which they stand; 150 U. S. 483; that possession of real property accompanies ownership; 120 U. S. 605; that possession of the fruits of crime is guilty possession; 2 C. & P. 359; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 596; 7 Vt. 122; 9 Conn. 527; 19 Me. 398; 111 N. Y. 569; 25 Tex. A favorite maxim is that ignorantio legis neminem excusat, or that every one is conclusively presumed to know the law. There is no such presumption in fact; 2 C. B. 720; L. R. 3 Q. B. 629. The fact is simply that it is a rule of public policy that ignorance of the law shall not be set up as a defence against legal liability; 11 Blatch. 200; 37 Miss. 379; 7 Pick. 279. In many cases a commonly accepted misconstruction of law has been held sufficient excuse; 80 Pa. 430; 2 Black 372; 21 Wall. 178; 91 U. S. 45; 36 N. J. L. 125; 43 Ala. 197.

Another very much misused maxim is that one is presumed to intend the natural consequence of his act. This has been characterized as "merely a fantastic transference into the law of evidence of the phraseology of positive law;" Chamb. Best, Ev. 310; 10 Cush. 373; 7 Md. 108. So far as it is a rule of law it means simply that mere carelessness is not a ground of defence against legal liability; 72 N. Y. 90; 80 Ill. 28; 23 Vt. 151; 8 Cal. 113; 100 Mass. 505.

There is a presumption of jurisdiction which attaches to the record of the judgment or the decree of a court of general jurisdiction in another state, and where the record discloses nothing in regard to the service of process or notice and no evidence is given on the subject, jurisdiction over the person will be presumed; 154 N. Y. 333, affirming 12 App. Div. N. Y. 278.

PRESUMPTIVE EVIDENCE. See EVIDENCE.

PRESUMPTIVE HEIR. See HEIR PRESUMPTIVE.

PRESUMPTIVE TITLE. See TITLE.

PRET A USAGE. (Fr. loan for use). A phrase used in the French law instead of commodatum.

PRETENDED TITLE STATUTE. The statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, § 2. It enacts that no one shall sell or purchase any pretended right or title to land, unless the vendor hath received the profits thereof for one whole year before such grant, or hath been in actual possession of the land, or of the reversion or remainder, on pain that both purchaser and vendor shall each forfeit the value of such land to the king and the prosecutor.

PRETENSION. In French Law. The claim made to a thing which a party believes himself entitled to demand but which is not admitted or adjudged to be his.

The words right, actions, and pretensions are usually joined; not that they are synonymous, for right is something positive and certain, action is what is demanded, while pretension is sometimes not even accompanied by a demand.

PRETERITION (Lat. præter and eo, to go by). In Civil Law. The omission by a testator of some one of his heirs who is entitled to a legitime (q. v.) in the succession.

Among the Romans, the preterition of children when made by the mother was presumed to have been made with design; the preterition of sons by any other testator, was considered as a wrong, and avoided the will, except the will of a soldier in service, which was not subject to so much form.

PRETEXT (Lat. prætextum, woven before). The reasons assigned to justify an act, which have only the appearance of truth, and which are without foundation, or which, if true, are not the true reasons for such act. Vattel, liv. 3, c. 3, § 32.

Ostensible reason or motive assigned or assumed as a color or cover for the real reason or motive; false appearance, pretence. 27 Neb. 604.

PRETIUM AFFECTIONIS (Lat.). An imaginary value put upon a thing by the fancy of the owner in his affection for it or for the person from whom he obtained it. Bell, Dict.

When an injury has been done to an article, it has been questioned whether in estimating the damage there is any just ground, in any case, for admitting the pretium affectionis. It seems that when the injury has been done accidentally by culpable negligence, such an estimation of damages would be unjust, but when the mischief has been intentional it ought to be so admitted. Kames, Eq. 74, 75.

PRETIUM PERICULI. The price of the risk, e. g. the premium paid on a policy of insurance; also the interest paid on money advanced on bottomry or respondentia.

PRETORIUM. A court house or hall of justice. 3 How. St. Tr. 425.

PREVAILING PARTY. To be such does not depend upon the degree of success at different stages of the suit, but whether, at the end of the suit, or other proceeding, the party who has made a claim against the other, has successfully maintained it. 60 Me. 286. See 53 Mo. 330.

PREVARICATION. In Civil Law. The acting with unfaithfulness and want of probity. The term is applied principally to the act of concealing a crime. Dig. 47. 15. 6.

PREVENT. To hinder; to obstruct; to intercept. 20 Ark. 185. It is held not to mean to obstruct by physical force; 17 Q. B. 145.

PREVENTION (Lat. prevenire, to come before). In Civil Law. The right of a judge to take cognizance of an action over which he has concurrent jurisdiction with another judge.

In Pennsylvania it has been ruled that a justice of the peace cannot take cognizance of a cause which has been previously decided by another justice. 2 Dall. 77, 114.

PREVIOUS QUESTION. In parliamentary practice, the question whether a vote shall be taken on the main issue, or not, brought forward before the main or real question is put by the speaker and for the purpose of avoiding, if the vote is in the negative, the putting of this question. The motion is in the form "that the question be now put," and the mover and seconder vote against it.

In the house of representatives of the United States and in many state legislatures the object of moving the previous question is to cut off debate and secure immediately a vote on the question under consideration.

PREVIOUSLY. An adverb of time, used in comparing an act or state named, with another act or state, subsequent in order of time, for the purpose of asserting the priority of the first. 40 Ia. 94.

PRICE. The consideration in money given for the purchase of a thing.

It is not synonymous with value; 51 Kan. 408.

There are three requisites to the quality of a price in order to make a sale.

It must be serious and such as may be demanded; if, therefore, a person were to sell me an article, and by the agreement, reduced to writing, he were to release me from the payment, the transaction would no longer be a sale, but a gift. Pothier, Vente, n. 18.

It must be certain and determinate; but what may be rendered certain is considered as certain; if, therefore, I sell a thing at a price to be fixed by a third person, this is sufficiently certain, provided the third person make a valuation and fix the price; Pothier, Vente, n. 23; 2 Sumn. 539; 4 Pick. 179; 13 Me. 400; 2 Ired. 36; 3 Pa. 50; 2 Kent 477. When the parties have not expressed any price in their contract, the presumption of law is that the thing is sold for the price it generally brings at the time and place where the agreement was made; 3 T. B. Monr. 133; 6 H. & J. 273; Coxe 261; 10 Bingh. 376; 11 U. C. Q. B. 545.

The third quality of a price is that it consists in money, to be paid down, or at a future time; for if it be of anything else it will no longer be a price, nor the contract a sale, but exchange or barter; Pothier, Vente, n. 30; 16 Toullier, n. 147; 12 N. H. 390; 10 Vt. 457; see, 54 N. Y. 173, where it was held that price in an act meant value or compensation.

The true price of a thing is that for which things of a like nature and quality are usually sold in the place where situated, if real property; in the place where exposed to sale, if personal; Pothier, Vente, n. 243. The first price or cost of a thing does not always afford a sure criterion of its value. It may have been bought very dear or very cheap; Ayl. Parerg. 447; Merlin, Répert; 4 Pick. 179; 16 id. 227.

In a declaration in trover it is usual, when the chattel found is a living one, to lay it as of such a price; when dead, of such a value; 8 Wentw. Pl. 372, n.; 2 Lilly, Abr. 629.

Lord Tenterden's act has substituted value for price in the English statute of frauds; 25 L. J. C. P. 257. See Campb. Sales 162; COST.

PRICE CURRENT. A list or enumeration of various articles of merchandise, with their prices, the duties (if any), payable thereon, when imported or exported, with the drawbacks occasionally allowed upon their exportation. Wharton.

PRIDE GAVEL. A rent or tribute. Tayl. Gavelk. 112.

PRIEST. An officer in the second order of ministry in the church.

PRIMA FACIE (Lat.). At first view or appearance of the business; as the holder of a bill of exchange, indorsed in blank, is prima facie its owner.

Prima facie evidence of fact is in law sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted; 6 Pet. 622, 632; 14 id. 334. See, generally, 7 J. J. Marsh. 425; 3 N. H. 484; 7 Ala. 267; 5 Rand. 701; 1 Pick. 332; 1 South. 77; 1 Yeates 347; 2 N. & M'C. 320; 1 Mo. 334; 11 Conn. 95; 2 Root 286; 16 Johns. 66, 136; 1 Bail. 174; 2 A. K. Marsh. 244; 97 U. S. 3. For example, when buildings are fired by sparks emitted from a locomotive engine passing along the road, it has been held to be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of those who have the charge of it; 3 C. B. 229; and proof of the mailing of a letter is prima facie evidence of its receipt by the person to whom it is addressed; 147 Ill. 176; 27 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 436; 63 Hun 624.

PRIMA TONSURA (Lat.). A grant of a right to have the first crop of grass. 1 Chitty, Pr. 181.

PRIMAGE. In Mercantile Law. A duty payable to the master and mariners of a ship or vessel,—to the master for the use of his cables and ropes to discharge the goods of the merchant, to the mariners for lading and unlading in any port or haven. Abb. Sh. 270.

A small payment to the master for his care and trouble which he is to receive for his own use, unless he has otherwise agreed with the owner. Abb. Sh. 13th ed. 531; it is of a very ancient date and subject to authority and regulations. "In the 'Guidon,' it is called la contribution des chausses ou pot de vin du maître." It is sometimes called the master's hat-money;" id.

It is no longer a gratuity to the master, unless especially stipulated; but it belongs to the owners or freighters, and is nothing but an increase of the freight rate; 14 Fed. Rep. 421.

PRIMARY. That which is first or principal: as, primary evidence, that evidence which is to be admitted in the first instance, as distinguished from secondary evidence, which is allowed only when primary evidence cannot be had.

PRIMARY ELECTION. A popular election held by members of a particular political party, for the purpose of choosing delegates to a convention empowered to nominate candidates for that party to be voted for at an approaching election. 125 Ind. 210. In many states they are regulated by law and frauds are punishable as in a general election.

PRIMARY EVIDENCE. The best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3053. See Steph. 67; EVIDENCE.

PRIMARY OBLIGATION. An obligation which is the principal object of the contract: for example, the primary obligation of the seller is to deliver the thing sold, and to transfer the title to it. It is distinguished from the accessory or secondary obligation to pay damages for not doing so. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 702.

PRIMARY POWERS. The principal authority given by a principal to his agent: it differs from mediate powers. Story, Ag. § 58.

PRIMATE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An archbishop who has jurisdiction over one or several other metropolitans.

PRIME. In a contract for delivery of "prime barley" prime will be understood according to its use among merchants. 14 Mo. 9.

Prime cost, the true price paid for goods upon a bona fide purchase. 2 Mas. 53.

PRIME MINISTER. See CABINET; PREMIER.

PRIME SERJEANT. The Queen's first serjeant at law.

PRIMER ELECTION. A term used to signify first choice.

In England, when coparcenary lands are divided, unless it is otherwise agreed, the eldest sister has the first choice of the purparts: this part is called the enitia pars. Sometimes the oldest sister makes the partition; and in that case, to prevent partiality, she takes the last choice. Hob. 107; Litt. §§ 243; 245; Bac. Abr. Coparceners (U)

PRIMER FINE. The fine due the crown by ancient prerogative on suing out the writ of præcipe. 1 Steph. Com. 560.

PRIMER SEISIN. In English Law. The right which the king had, when any of his tenants died seised of a knight's fee, to receive of the heir, provided he were of full age, one whole year's profits of the lands, if they were in immediate possession; and half a year's profits, if the lands were in reversion, expectant on an estate for life. 2 Bla. Com. 66. See FEUDAL LAW.

PRIMICERIUS. The first of any degree of men. 1 Mon. Ang. 888.

PRIMO BENEFICIO. A writ directing a grant of the first benefice in the sovereign's gift. Cowell.

PRIMOGENITURE. The state of being first born; the eldest.

At common law, in cases of the descent of land, primogeniture gave a title to the oldest son in preference to the other children. This distinction has been abolished in the United States. Formerly in Pennsylvania, in cases of intestacy, the oldest son took a double portion of the real estate; 1 Binn. 91, where it was held that a trust estate (the legal title) descends as at common law; and this case was followed in Delaware; 4 Houst. 648.

The law of primogeniture has not been altered in England; see however the radical act of 1897, cited in LAND TRANSFER.

PRIMOGENITUS (Lat.). The first-born. 1 Ves. 290. And see 3 Maule & S. 25; 8 Taunt. 468; 3 Vern. 660.

PRIMUM DECRETUM (Lat.). In the courts of admiralty, this name is given to a provisional decree. Bacon, Abr. The Court of Admiralty (E).

PRINCE. In a general sense, a sovereign; the ruler of a nation or state. The son of a king or emperor, or the issue of a royal family: as, princes of the blood. The chief of any body of men.

PRINCE OF WALES. A title given to the eldest son of the British sovereign or to the heir apparent to the crown.

PRINCES OF THE BLOOD. The younger sons of the British sovereign and male members of other branches of the royal family not in the direct line of succession.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND. A province of the Dominion of Canada. Its government is vested in a lieutenant-governor and a ministry of nine members. Its legislature consists of a council of thirteen members and a house of assembly of thirty members, both elected by the people. Charlottetown is the seat of government. The judicial establishment consists of the chief justice of the supreme court and two assistant judges, and three county court judges.

PRINCIPAL. Leading; chief; more important.

This word has several meanings. It is used in opposition to accessary, to show the degree of crime committed by two persons. Thus, we say, the principal is more guilty than the accessary after the fact.

In estates, principal is used as opposed to incident or accessary: as in the following rule: "The incident shall pass by the grant of the principal; but not the principal by the grant of the incident: accessorium non ducit sed sequitur suum principale." Co. Litt. 152 a.

It is used in opposition to agent, and in this sense it signifies that the principal is the prime mover.

It is used in opposition to interest: as, the principal being secured, the interest will follow.

The corpus or capital of the estate in contradistinction to the income.

Money bearing interest; a capital sum lent on interest.

It is used also in opposition to surety: thus, we say, the principal is answerable before the surety.

Principal is used also to denote the more important: as, the principal person.

In the English law, the chief person in some of the inns of chancery is called principal of the house. Principal is also used to designate the best of many things: as, the principal bed, the principal table, and the like.

In Contracts. One who, being competent sui juris to do any act for his own benefit or on his own account, confides it to another person to do for him. 1 Domat b. 1, tit. 15, Introd.; Story, Ag. § 3.

Every one of full age, and not otherwise disabled, is capable of being a principal; for it is a rule that whenever a person has power, as owner, or in his own right, to do a thing, he may do it by another; Com. Dig. Attorney (C 1); Heineccius, ad Pand. p. 1,l. 3, tit. 1, § 424; 9 Co. 75 b; Story, Ag. § 6. Infants are generally incapable of appointing an agent; but under special circumstances they may make such appointments. For instance, an infant may authorize another to do any act which is beneficial to him, but not to do an act which is to his prejudice; 2 Kent 233; 9 Co. 75; 3 Burr. 1804; 6 Cow. 393; 10 Ohio 37; 10 Pet. 58. 69; 14 Mass. 463. A married woman could not, in general, appoint an agent or attorney; and when it was requisite that one should be appointed, the husband usually appointed for both. She might, perhaps, dispose of or incumber her separate property, through an agent or attorney; Cro. Car. 165; 2 Bulstr. 13; but this seemed to be doubted; Cro. Jac. 617; 1 Brownl. 134; Ad. Ej. 174. Idiots, lunatics, and other persons sui juris are wholly incapable of appointing an agent; Story, Ag. § 6.

The general principle which governs the liability of a principal is that the responsibility is measured by the character and extent of the authority given; see AGENCY; AGENT; for example, authority to an agent to vote at a corporate meeting upon the stock of his principal does not empower the former to act for the latter in connection with other stockholders, who were also creditors of the corporation, in taking measures for cancelling a mortgage of the corporation under which the claims of the principal and those stockholders against the corporation were secured; 112 Ala. 228. The powers of the agent must be measured and determined by the application to each particular case of ordinary business principles, and sound judgment to be exercised by the agent in executing his authority, and by the court which is to deal with the case in considering the question of the responsibility of the principal. Where a discretion has been conferred upon the agent the principal must abide the result of its exercise and will be held liable to third persons where it has been honestly exercised. So where an agent has power to borrow money on exceptional terms in cases of emergency, a lender is not bound to inquire whether in the particular case the emergency has or has not arisen; 15 L. R. App. 357. And where the agent was entrusted with securities and instructed by the principal to raise a certain sum upon them, but borrowed a larger sum and fraudulently appropriated the difference, the principal could not redeem the securities without paying the lender in full where he had acted bona fide and in ignorance of the limitation, although he had no knowledge of the agent's authority to borrow and made no inquiry, and the agent practised fraud and forgery to obtain the loan; [1895] App. Cas. 173, affirming [1895] 3 Ch. 180.

The principal is entitled to the service of the agent with respect to the matter in hand as though the agent were attending to his own business; and the latter will be considered, to that extent, as merging his own individuality and will be held to act entirely for the benefit of the principal. He cannot make a profit out of the business which he transacts for the principal derived from any knowledge acquired by him in the course of it, except consistently with the engagements between the principal and agent. So where an agent, acting in a confidential capacity, obtained information of a defect in his principal's title and put in an outstanding claim through a third party, it was held that he could not profit by his purchase but held the title for his principal; 12 U. S. App. 606. On the other hand, a principal cannot retain the fruit of his agent's acts and yet disclaim his authority in order to escape the corresponding obligation. Where a corporation obtained from the plaintiff the right to construct a road in front of his property and constructed it, it could not refuse to recognize its agent's authority to bind it to pay the sum he agreed to pay; 47 N. Y. Supp. 327. It is said in this case that agency cannot be proved by the uncorroborated testimony of the agent, nor can any implication of consent to the work done arise, in the absence of proof of knowledge that it was being done.

The rights to which principals are entitled arise from obligations due to them by their agents or by third persons.

The rights of principals in relation to their agents are—first, to call them to an account at all times in relation to the business of the agency; 2 Bouvier, Inst. 28. Second, when the agent violates his obligations to his principal, either by exceeding his authority, or by positive misconduct, or by mere negligence or omissions in the discharge of the functions of his agency, or in any other manner, and any loss or damage falls on his principal, the latter will be entitled to full indemnity; Story, Ag. § 217 c; 12 Pick. 328; 6 Hare 366; 7 Beav. 176. But the loss of damage must be actual, and not merely probable or possible; Story, Ag. § 222; Paley, Ag. 7, 8, 74, 75. But see id. 74, note 2. Third, where both the principal and agent may maintain a suit against a third person for any matter relating to the agency, the principal has a right to supersede the agent by suing in his own name; and he may by his own intervention intercept, suspend, or extinguish the right of the agent under the contract; Story, Ag. § 403; 4 Camp. 194; 3 Hill, N. Y. 72, 73; 6 S. & R. 27; 2 Wash. C. C. 223; 1 Maule & S. 576. See 57 Fed. Rep. 463. But, as we shall presently see, an exception to this rule arises in favor of the agent, to the extent of any lien, or other interest, or superior right, he may have in the property; Story, Ag. §§ 393, 397, 407, 424. The principal has a right to determine or revoke the authority given to his agent, at his own mere pleasure, where not otherwise agreed between them; 141 U. S. 627.

Agents are not entitled to use the materials gained or collected by them in the cause of their employment to the detriment of their principal; [1893] 1 Ch. 218.

In general, the principal, as against third persons, has a right to all the advantages and benefits of the acts and contracts of his agent, and is entitled to the same remedies against such third persons, in respect to such acts and contracts, as if they were made or done with him personally; Story, Ag. §§ 418, 420; Paley, Ag. 323; 8 La. 296; 2 Stark. 443. See 103 Cal. 43. But to this rule there are the following exceptions. First, when the instrument is under seal, and it has been exclusively made between the agent and the third person, as, for example, a charter-party or bottomry bond made by the master of a ship in the course of his employment, in this case the principal cannot sue or be sued on it; Story, Ag. § 422; Abb. Sh. pt. 3, ch. 1. § 2; 4 Wend. 285; 1 Paine 251; 3 Wash. C. C. 560. Second, when an exclusive credit is given to and by the agent, and therefore the principal cannot be considered in any manner a party to the contract, although he may have authorized it and be entitled to all the benefits arising from it. The case of a foreign factor buying or selling goods is an example of this kind; he is treated, as between himself and the other party, as the sole contractor, and the real principal cannot sue or be sued on the contract. This, it has been well observed, is a general rule of commercial law, founded upon the known usage of trade; and it is strictly adhered to, for the safety and convenience of foreign commerce; Story, Ag. § 425; 9 B. & C. 87; 4 Taunt. 574. Third, when the agent has a lien or claim upon the property bought or sold, or upon its proceeds, which is equal to or exceeds the amount of its value, the principal cannot sue without the consent of the agent; Story, Ag. §§ 403, 407, 424.

But contracts are not unfrequently made without mentioning the name of the principal. In such case he may avail himself of the agreement; for the contract will be treated as that of the principal as well as of the agent. If, however, the person with whom the contract was made, bona fide dealt with the agent as owner, he will be entitled to set off any claim he may have against the agent, in answer to the demand of the principal; and the principal's right to enforce contracts entered into by his agent is affected by every species of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of the agent which would defeat it if proceeding from himself; Story, Ag. §§ 420, 440; 2 Kent 632; Paley, Ag. 324; 3 B. & P. 490; 24 Wend. 458.

Where the principal gives notice to the debtor not to pay money to the agent, unless the agent has a superior right, from a lien or otherwise, the amount of any payment afterwards made to the agent may be recovered by the principal from the debtor; Story, Ag. § 429; 4 Camp. 60; 6 Cow. 181, 186. Money paid by an agent may also be recovered by the principal under any of the following circumstances: first, where the consideration fails; second, where money is paid by an agent through mistake; third, where money is illegally extorted from an agent in the course of his employment; fourth, where the money of the principal has been fraudulently applied by the agent to an illegal and prohibited purpose; Paley, Ag. 335. When goods are intrusted to an agent for a specific purpose, a delivery by him for a different purpose, or in a manner not authorized by the commission, passes no property in them, and they may, therefore, be reclaimed by the owner; Paley, Ag. 340; 3 Pick. 495. Third persons are also liable to the principal for any tort or injury done to his property or rights in the course of the agency. If both the agent and third person have been parties to the tort or injury, they are jointly as well as severally liable to the principal, and he may maintain an action against both or either of them. Story, Ag. § 436; 3 Maule & S. 562.

The liabilities of the principal are either to his agent or to third persons. The liabilities of the principal to his agent are—to reimburse him all his advances, expenses, and disbursements lawfully incurred about the agency, and also to pay him interest upon such advances and disbursements whenever interest may fairly be presumed to have been stipulated for or to be due to the agent; Story, Ag. § 335; Story, Bailm. 196, 197; Paley, Ag. 107, 108; second, to pay him his commissions as agreed upon, or according to the usage of trade, except in cases of gratuitous agency; Story, Ag. § 324; Paley, Ag. 100; third, to indemnify the agent when, without his own default, he has sustained damages in following the directions of his principal: for example, when the agent has innocently sold the goods of a third person, under the direction or authority of his principal, and a third person recovers damages against the agent, the latter will be entitled to reimbursement from the principal; Story, Ag. § 339; 9 Metc. Mass. 212.

The principal is bound to fulfil all the engagements made by the agent for or in the name of the principal, which come within the scope of his usual employment, although the agent in the particular instance has in fact exceeded or violated his private instructions; Story, Ag. 443; 4 Watts 222; 21 Vt. 129; 26 Me. 84; 1 Wash. C. C. 174; 114 N. Y. 415; 98 Mo. 478. See [1893] 1 Q. B. 346. And where an exclusive credit is not given to the agent, the principal is liable to third persons upon contracts made by his agent within the scope of his authority, although the agent contracts in his own name and does not disclose his agency; Story, Ag. § 446. But if the principal and agent are both known, and exclusive credit be given to the latter, the principal will not be liable though the agent should subsequently become insolvent; Story, Ag. § 447. When goods are sold to a person who in fact is the agent of another, but the seller has no knowledge of the agency, the latter may elect to make the principal his debtor on discovering him; 48 Conn. 314; 50 Ark. 433. The same principle applies where the seller is informed at the time of the sale that the buyer is an agent, but is not informed who the principal is; 9 B. & C. 78; 2 Metc. 319. Where money is paid by a third person to the agent, by mistake or upon a consideration that has failed, the principal will be liable to repay it although he may never have received it from his agent; Story, Ag. § 451; Paley, Ag. 293; 2 Esp. 509.

An interesting collection of cases illustrating the doctrine of the liability of the principal for the act of the agent is the subject of an annotation in 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 580, as to the authority of officers of corporations to employ physicians and nurses in cases of accident to employes or others. It has been held that the superintendent or general manager of a railroad company has the authority to employ a physician in such cases; 126 Ind. 99; 28 Mich. 289; 24 Kan. 328; L. R. 2 Ex. 228. Such employment was sustained in the case of any superior officer, where no higher one was present; as, a division superintendent; 52 Kan. 433; a conductor; 121 Ind. 353; 22 Fla. 356; a master mechanic; 19 Kan. 256; a yard master; 28 Mich. 289; and a station agent; 3 Ex. 268. In any case the company will be bound if the employment be ratified by the superintendent; 98 Ind. 391; 19 Kan. 256. There is no inherent power in the general manager, but the question of his delegated authority is for the jury; 45 Mo. App. 232; 42 Conn. 556; 7 Ind. App. 676; and so the authority of a superintendent and general manager of an electric light company, who was also a director, to bind the corporation by employing a nurse, was held a question for the jury; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 564.

The death of the principal usually revokes the authority to act for him or for his estate; 150 U. S. 520; 75 Cal. 349. Where an agent by the sudden death of his principal without known heirs is left in sole charge of his principal's estate, he is entitled to compensation for services in connection with the estate until the persons entitled to the property are found and their rights established in the orphans' court; 180 Pa. 192. See AGENCY.

There is a general presumption that an agent is presumed to have disclosed to his principal all facts which come to his knowledge in the course of the agency, and this presumption remains in force so long as the agent acts within the scope of his employment in good faith for the interest of the principal; but if he forms the purpose of dealing with the principal's property for his own benefit or that of some one else opposed in interest, his subsequent action based upon such purpose is considered to be in fraud of the rights of the principal, and the presumption no longer prevails; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1121.

The principal is not, in general, liable to a criminal prosecution for the acts or misdeeds of his agent, unless he has authorized or co-operated in such acts or misdeeds; Story, Ag. § 452; Paley, Ag. 303; 1 Mood. & M. 433. He is, however, civilly liable to third persons for the misfeasance, negligence, or omission of duty of his agent in the course of the agency, although he did not authorize or know of such misconduct, or even although he forbade it; Story, Ag. § 452; Paley, Ag. 294; 26 Vt. 112, 123; 6 Gill & J. 291; 20 Barb. 507; 7 Cush. 385; 83 Ala. 333; 51 Fed. Rep. 160; 33 Fla. 696; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 476; see 78 Ga. 328; and he is liable for the injuries and wrongs of sub-agents who are retained by his direction, either express or implied; Story, Ag. § 454; Paley, Ag. 296; 1 B. & P. 409. But the responsibility of the principal for the negligence or unlawful acts of his agent is limited to cases properly within the scope of the agency. Nor is he liable for the wilful acts of his agent whereby damage is occasioned to another, unless he originally commanded or subsequently assented to the act; Paley, Ag. 298, 299; Story, Ag. § 456; 9 Wend. 268; 23 Pick. 25; 20 Conn. 284. See 11 Colo. 233. Strict compliance with the instructions of a principal by the agent is a condition of exemption of the agent from liability; 137 U. S. 473.

A principal who accepts the benefits of a contract made on his behalf by his authorized agents is responsible for the fraudulent representation of the agent, although made without authority; 85 Tenn. 139; 2 C. C. App. 535; and a person who has adopted a sale made by his agent, and receives the benefit of it, takes the sale with all the burdens created by false representations of the agent; 78 Cal. 490; 40 Minn. 476; 52 Kan. 245; 65 Hun 182; see 160 Mass. 177; and a principal must adopt the acts of his agents as a whole; 24 Neb. 653; 150 U. S. 128; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 16. A ratification by a principal of an unauthorized contract made by his agent, relates back to the beginning of the transaction; 57 Fed. Rep. 973; and a principal having the right to disaffirm acts of an agent must do it promptly, and if not done within a reasonable time ratification will be presumed; 120 U. S. 256. There can be no ratification by a principal of the acts of his agent, where he has no knowledge of such acts; 71 Md. 200; 76 Ia. 129.

In Criminal Law. The actor in the commission of a crime.

All who are present, either actually or constructively, at the place of a crime, and are either aiding, abetting, assisting, or advising its commission, or are present for such purpose, are principals in the crime; 45 Fed. Rep. 851. See 25 Tex. App. 538; 21 id. 107.

Principals are of two kinds, namely, principals in the first degree, and principals in the second degree.

A principal in the first degree is one who is the actual perpetrator of the act. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 233, 615; 15 Ga. 346. But to constitute him such it is not necessary that he should be actually present when the offence is consummated; 3 Denio 190; 21 Tex. App. 107. For if one lay poison purposely for another, who takes it and is killed, the offender, though absent when it was taken, is a principal in the first degree; Clark, Cr. L. 83; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 31, § 7; 4 Bla. Com. 34; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 257. And the offence may be committed in his absence, through the medium of an innocent agent: as, if a person incites a child under the age of discretion, or any other instrument excused from the responsibility of his actions by defect of understanding, ignorance of the fact, or other cause, to the commission of crime, the inciter, though absent when the act was committed, is ex necessitate liable for the act of his agent and a principal in the first degree; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 514; 2 Leach 978. But if the instrument be aware of the consequences of his act, he is a principal in the first degree; the employer, in such case, if present when the fact is committed, is a principal in the second degree, and, if absent, an accessary before the fact; Russ. & R. 163; 1 C. & K. 589; 1 Archb. Cr. L. 58.

Principals in the second degree are those who are present aiding and abetting the commission of the act. 2 Va. Cas. 356. They are generally termed aiders and abettors, and sometimes, improperly, accomplices; for the latter term includes all the particeps criminis, whether principals in the first or second degree or mere accessaries. A person to be a principal in the second degree need not be actually present, an ear or eye-witness of the transaction. The presence may be constructive. He is, in construction of law, present aiding and abetting if, with the intention of giving assistance, he be near enough to afford it should the occasion arise. If, for instance, he be outside the house watching to prevent surprise or the like, whilst his companions are in the house committing a felony, such constructive presence is sufficient to make a principal in the second degree; Clark, Cr. L. 85; 1 Russ. Cr. L. 27; 1 Hale 555; Wright, Ohio 75; 9 Pick. 496; 9 C. & P. 437; 15 Ill. 511. There must, however, be a participation in the act; for although a person be present when a felony is committed, yet if he does not consent to the felonious purpose or contribute to its execution, he will not be a principal in the second degree merely because he does not endeavor to prevent the felony or apprehend the felon; 1 Russ. Cr. 27; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 439; 9 Ired. 440; 3 Wash. C. C. 223; 1 Wisc. 159.

The law recognizes no difference between the offence of principals in the first and principals in the second degree. And so immaterial is the distinction considered in practice that, if a man be indicted as principal in the first degree, proof that he was present aiding and abetting another in committing the offence, although his was not the hand which actually did it, will support the indictment; and if he be indicted as principal in the second degree, proof that he was not only present, but committed the offence with his own hand, will support the indictment. So, when an offence is punishable by a statute which makes no mention of principals in the second degree, such principals are within the meaning of the statute as much as the parties who actually commit the offence; 1 Archb. Cr. L. 66. See 89 Mo. 312.

In treason, and in offences below felony, and in all felonies in which the punishment of principals in the first degree and of principals in the second degree is the same, the indictment may charge all who are present and abet the fact as principals in the first degree, provided the offence permits of a participation, or specially, as aiders and abettors; Archb. Cr. Pl. 7; 11 Cush. 422; 1 C. & M. 187. But where by particular statutes the punishment is different, then principals in the second degree must be indicted specially as aiders and abettors; Archb. Cr. Pl. 7. If indicted as aiders and abettors, an indictment charging that A gave the mortal blow, and that B, C, and D were present aiding and abetting, will be sustained by evidence that B gave the blow, and that A, C, and D were present aiding and abetting; and even if it appears that the act was committed by a person not named in the indictment, the aiders and abettors may, nevertheless, be convicted; Dougl. 207; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 350. And the same though the jury say that they are not satisfied which gave the blow, if they are satisfied that one of them did, and that the others were present aiding and abetting; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 52; 2 C. & K. 382.

PRINCIPAL CHALLENGE. See CHALLENGE.

PRINCIPAL CONTRACT. One entered into by both parties on their own account or in the several qualities they assume.

PRINCIPAL OBLIGATION. That obligation which arises from the principal object of the engagement which has been contracted between the parties. It differs from an accessory obligation. For example, in the sale of a horse, the principal obligation of the seller is to deliver the horse; the obligation to take care of him till delivered is an accessory engagement. Pothier, Obl. n. 182. By principal obligation is also understood the engagement of one who becomes bound for himself, and not for the benefit of another. Pothier, Obl. n. 186.

PRINCIPLES. By this term is understood truths or propositions so clear that they cannot be proved nor contradicted unless by propositions which are still clearer.

That which constitutes the essence of a body or its constituent parts. 8 Term 107. See 5 McLean 63; PATENT.

They are of two kinds: one when the principle is universal, and these are known as axioms or maxims: as, no one can transmit rights which he has not; the accessory follows the principal, etc. The other class are simply called first principles. These principles have known marks by which they may always be recognized. These are —first, that they are so clear that they cannot be proved by anterior and more manifest truths; second, that they are almost universally received; third, that they are so strongly impressed on our minds that we conform ourselves to them whatever may be our avowed opinions.

First principles have their source in the sentiment of our own existence, and that which is in the nature of things. A principle of law is a rule or axiom which is founded in the nature of the subject, and it exists before it is expressed in the form of a rule. Domat, Lois Civiles, liv. prél. t. 1, s. 2; Toullier, tit. prél. n. 17. The right to defend one's self continues as long as an unjust attack, was a principle before it was ever decided by a court: so that a court does not establish but recognizes principles of law.

PRINT. The word includes most of the forms of figures or characters or representations, colored or uncolored, that may be impressed on a yielding surface. 97 U. S. 367; 20 Blatchf. 464; 38 Fed. Rep. 829.

PRINTED FORMS. A court in construing a contract will look at what was originally the printed form and at what was introduced in writing to alter that printed form; 2 C. & M. 539. Words written in a printed form, such as an insurance policy, will in case of doubt have a greater effect than the printed words; 22 Q. B. D. 501.

PRINTING. The art of impressing letters; the art of making books or papers by impressing legible characters.

In patent cases in the circuit court, the taxable costs do not include expenditures for printing, charts, models, exhibits, printed records, briefs, copies of testimony, and the like; 83 Fed. Rep. 183; but the practice varies in different circuits.

See LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; PRESS.

PRIORITY. Precedence; going before.

He who has the precedency in time has the advantage in right, is the maxim of the law; not that time, considered barely in itself, can make any such difference, but because, the whole power over a thing being secured to one person, this bars all others from obtaining a title to it afterwards; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 320.

In the payment of debts, the United States is entitled to priority when the debtor is insolvent or dies and leaves an insolvent estate. The priority was declared to extend to cases in which the insolvent debtor had made a voluntary assignment of all his property, or in which his effects had been attached as an absconding or absent debtor, on which an act of legal bankruptcy had been committed; 1 Kent 243.

Among common creditors, he who has the oldest lien has the preference,—it being a maxim both of law and equity, qui prior est tempore potior est jure; 2 Johns. Ch. 608. See INSOLVENCY.

But in respect to privileged debts, arising ex contractu, existing against a ship or vessel under the general admiralty law, the order of priority is most generally that of the inverse order of their creation,—thus reversing the order of priority generally adopted in the courts of common law. The ground of this inversion of the rule is that the services performed at the latest hour are more efficacious in bringing the vessel and her freightage to their final destination. Each foregoing incumbrance is, therefore, actually benefited by means of the succeeding incumbrance; 16 Bost. Law Rep. 1, 264; 17 id. 421. See MARITIME LIENS; ASSETS; LIEN.

PRISAGE. An ancient duty or right of the crown of one-tenth of the amount of wine carried by the ships of merchants, aliens, or denizens. 3 Bulstr. 1.

PRISEL EN AUTER LIEU. A taking in another place. A plea in abatement to a writ of replevin.

PRISON. A public building for confining persons, either to insure their production, in court, as accused persons and witnesses, or to punish them as criminals.

The root is French, as is shown by the Norman prisons, prisoners; Kelham, Norm. Fr. Dict.; and Fr. prisons, prisons. Britton, c. 11, de Prisons. Originally it was distinguished from gaol, which was a place for confinement, not for punishment. See Jacob, Dict. Gaol. But at present there is no such distinction.

The United States has no prisons. The joint resolution of September 3, 1789, recommended to the states to authorize state prisons to receive United States prisoners, the latter paying the states for the service. In the absence of a state prison, the marshal, under the jurisdiction of the district judge, may procure a suitable place. See R. S. § 5537, 5539; 9 Cra. 76; PENITENTIARY; GAOL; PRISONER; DETAINER.

PRISON BREAKING. The act by which a prisoner, by force and violence, escapes from a place where he is lawfully in custody. This is an offence at common law. This offence is to be distinguished from rescue (q. v.), which is a deliverance of a prisoner from lawful custody by a third person. 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1065.

To constitute this offence there must be —a lawful commitment of the prisoner on criminal process; Co. 2d Inst. 589; 1 Carr. & M. 295; 2 Ashm. 61; 1 Ld. Raym. 424; see 43 N. J. L. 555; an actual breach with force and violence of the prison, by the prisoner himself, or by others with his privity and procurement; Russ. & R. 458; 1 Russ. Cr. 380; the prisoner must escape; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 18, s. 12. See 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 607; 4 Bla. Com. 130; Co. 2d Inst. 500; 1 Gabb. Cr. Law 305; Alison, Scotch Law 555; Dalloz, Dict. Effraction; 3 Johns. 449; 5 Metc. Mass. 559. See BREACH OF PRISON; ESCAPE.

PRISON LABOR. In most of the states prisoners convicted of crime are sentenced to hard labor, and in the constitution of the United States and of several of the states, the right to require the services of prisoners is secured by the exception of cases of punishment for crime from the provisions which abolish involuntary servitude.

In some states convict labor is farmed out to contractors, who thereby acquire a right in the prison and its inmates where the former is leased. The state, in order to resume its possession, must compensate the lessee as in other cases of taking private property; 16 Cal. 11. The right of the lessee, however, is subject to the pardoning power; 15 id. 429; and to the legislative power to modify and control the punishment; id.; 55 Mo. 101. A contract by the warden of a penitentiary for the hire of convicts is substantially a contract by the state, and a bill for the specific performance of it will not lie; 70 Ala. 493; 7 Paige 301.

In some states the sale or lease of convict labor is forbidden by constitution or statute. See 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 141, where these provisions are collected. In North Carolina it is unlawful, unless authorized by the court before which the prisoner has been tried, and it has been held that this authority cannot be given at a term other than that at which the prisoner was convicted; 100 N. C. 414.

Where the statute provides as to how the letting of contracts shall be done, the directions as to advertising, etc., are mandatory and not directory; 1 Mich. 438.

As the result of labor agitation there have been attempts by legislation to forbid or regulate strictly the sale of convict-made goods. The Ohio act of May 19, 1894, forbidding any person to sell without license convict-made goods, was held unconstitutional. The court said: "It is not competent for a state legislature to declare that convict-made goods are not articles of traffic and commerce, and then to act upon such declaration, and discriminate against such goods, or exclude them from the state by unfriendly legislation. Whatever congress, either by silence or statute, recognizes as articles of traffic and commerce, must be so received and treated by the several states. There is no act of congress declaring that convict-made goods are not fit for traffic or commerce, and it therefore follows that such goods are the subject of commerce, and when transported from one state to another for sale or exchange, become articles of interstate commerce, and entitled to be protected as such; and any discrimination against such goods in the state where offered for sale is unconstitutional. . . . The act in question is not a police regulation, but an attempt to prevent, or at least to discourage, the importation of convict-made goods from other states, and thereby protect our citizens, laborers, and market against such goods. But if we are in a condition to require such protection, the appeal for relief must be made to congress, which body alone has the power to legally grant such relief." 56 Ohio St. 417.

In Massachusetts a law limiting the production of goods in prison work-shops went into effect on Jan. 1, 1898. It provides that not over thirty per cent. of the number of the inmates of any penal institution in the state having more than one hundred inmates, shall be employed in any one industry, except in the industry of cane-seating and in the manufacture of umbrellas. See PRISONER; HARD LABOR.

In England, by 60 & 61 Vict. c. 63, the importation of foreign prison-made goods is absolutely prohibited.

PRISON-MADE GOODS. See PRISON LABOR.

PRISONER. One held in confinement against his will.

Lawful prisoners are either prisoners charged with crimes or for a civil liability. Those charged with crimes are either persons accused and not tried; and these are considered innocent, and are therefore entitled to be treated with as little severity as possible, consistently with the certain detention of their persons; they are entitled to their discharge on bail, except in capital cases; or those who have been convicted of crime, whose imprisonment, and the mode of treatment they experience, is intended as a punishment: these are to be treated agreeably to the requisitions of the law, and, in the United States, always with humanity. See PENITENTIARY. Prisoners in civil cases are persons arrested on original or mesne process, and these may generally be discharged on bail; and prisoners in execution, who cannot be discharged except under the insolvent laws.

Persons unlawfully confined are those who are not detained by virtue of some lawful, judicial, legislative, or other proceeding. They are entitled to their immediate discharge on habeas corpus. For the effect of a contract entered into by a prisoner, see 1 Salk. 402, n.; 6 Toullier 82.

Throughout the United States there have grown up abuses in the treatment of prisoners, particularly by the detective force of larger cities, which amount in those cases to a practical denial of the plainest constitutional guaranties of liberty of person and property and of freedom from unreasonable searches. Among these abuses have been the illegal searches of the person of prisoners arrested on bare suspicion, who are often the victims of the mere whim of the arresting officer. The growth of these abuses is promoted by the fact that the large majority of prisoners in whose cases they occur are, through ignorance or poverty, unable to assert their rights.

In a recent case in Illinois the principles governing this subject were thus stated: "An officer may take from a prisoner any articles of property which it is presumable may furnish evidence against him, but money should not be taken unless it is in some way connected with the charge or proof against him, as he is thereby deprived of the means of making his defence. The arresting officer if he finds on the prisoner's body, or otherwise in his possession, either goods or money which he reasonably believes to be connected with the supposed crime as its fruits, or as supplying proofs relating to the transaction, may take and hold them to be disposed of as the court directs." It was there held that whether money found on a prisoner and taken from him by the officer is the fruits of the crime, is a question for the jury; 69 Ill. App. 668. By statute in Iowa an officer making an arrest, or a jailer upon committing a person to jail, may search him and take from him all offensive weapons and property which might be used in effecting an escape, but he has no right to take from him watches and money in no way connected with crime; 65 Ia. 666, where it was said: "Where a party submits to a search of his person by an officer, it cannot be said that the search was with his consent, because he makes no physical resistance; when the search is completed and the fruits thereof are retained by the officer, it would require a strong showing to hold that this was with the consent of the prisoner."

Where money had been taken from a prisoner and an effort was made to reach it by garnishment against the officer, it was held that it was illegally taken, not being connected with the offence charged or necessary as evidence of the crime; but an application for a mandamus to compel the restoration of the money by the officer was denied because the propriety of its restoration was the subject of litigation under the attachment; 92 Ala. 102; s. c. 13 L. R. A. 120.

Pieces of silver intended for the manufacture of counterfeit coin were held to have been properly taken by the sheriff from the person who was carrying them to the place of manufacture, and it was held that the owner could not sustain trover therefor against the sheriff; 21 Vt. 9, where it was held by Redfield, J., that the base metal was properly detained both as evidence and because from its character it was, "so to speak, outlawed, and common plunder." In New Hampshire it was held that "if a prisoner has about his person money, or other articles of value, by means of which, if left in his possession, he might obtain tools or implements, or assistance, or weapons, with which to effect his escape, the officer arresting him may seize and hold such property for a time, without being liable for a conversion of the property, if he acts in good faith and for the purposes aforesaid. It is a question of fact in such cases for the jury, whether the officer taking such property from his prisoner, acted in good faith and for a proper purpose, or in bad faith, with an improper and unlawful purpose." 47 N. H. 482.

It has been held that United States officials have no right to confiscate money found on federal prisoners, and when it has been done and the money paid into the treasury, it may be recovered back by suit against the United States under the act of March 3, 1887, 1 Supp. 559; 77 Fed. Rep. 821.

In England it has been held that an officer who arrests a prisoner has no right to take from him money which he has about him unless it is in some way connected with the offence with which he is charged, as he thereby deprives him of the means of making his defence; 7 C. & P. 138, 488, 515; and it was also so held with respect to a watch and other articles taken by a police officer at the time of arrest; id. 447. In this case the indictment was for rape, and it was said by Patteson, J.: "Certainly the property must be given up; it has nothing whatever to do with the charge. It ought not to have been taken." And Gurney, B., said: "It should not have been taken; it must be delivered up to the prisoner himself." See SEARCH.

Handcuffing an accused person arrested on suspicion, not yet put upon his trial, was characterized at the hearing of a prisoner before a Manchester magistrate in England as degrading and improper, and in the unreported case of Norman v. Smith at the Manchester Assizes, in 1880, a plaintiff was awarded £15 damage for being wrongfully handcuffed; 29 Chi. Leg. News 88. It was laid down as early as 1825 that handcuffing could only be justified in cases when it was necessary to prevent the prisoner from escaping when he has attempted to escape; 4 B. & C. 596. Recently Lord Russell, C. J., remarked that "handcuffing was only justifiable where reasonable necessity existed, and if it were resorted to in the absence of such necessity, the person so treated might bring an action to recover damages for such a grievous indignity." 59 J. P. 393. In commenting on these cases it is said that handcuffs may be justified when the prisoner is of notoriously bad character, violent or dangerous, or threatens or assaults the constable, or the offence is of a grave nature, or when there is an attempt to escape. In the absence of such grounds or in case of trivial offences he should not be. Nor should women or aged prisoners; 29 Chi. Leg. News 88. See FETTERS.

A party waives his constitutional right "to be confronted with the witness against him," by admitting that witnesses, if present, would testify to certain facts stated in the affidavit of the district attorney for a continuance, and thereby preventing a postponement of the trial; 2 Mont. 239; or by wrongfully keeping away the witnesses; 7 Am. L. Reg. 9.

Bertillon System. The increase of habitual criminals in modern times has given additional interest to the various expedients for their identification, and records of various kinds are kept of all persons confined as prisoners for criminal offences. The simplest and most natural expedient of photographing all such persons gives rise to the "rogues' gallery," which is now, in most cities, a prominent institution in connection with the criminal administration. But an improved method which is considered the most effectual, is what is known as the Bertillon system of anthropometrical measurements. This system rests upon three distinct bases which it is said by M. Bertillon, Chief of the Central Bureau of Identification of France since 1882, have been shown by ten years' experience to be unimpeachable. (1) The almost absolute immutability of the human frame after the twentieth year of age; the growth thereafter, being only of the thigh bone, is so little that it is easy to make allowance for it. (2) The diversity of dimension of the human skeleton of different subjects is so great that it is difficult, if not impossible, to find two individuals whose bony structure is even sufficiently alike to make confusion between them possible. (3) The facility and comparative precision with which certain dimensions of the skeleton may be measured in the living subject by calipers of simple construction. The measurements which, as the result of minute criticism, have been preferred, are as follows: (1) Height (man standing); (2) reach (finger tip to finger tip); (3) trunk (man sitting);

Measurements are classified and grouped and preserved in an elaborate card index. The French statistics indicate that practically the result of this system is certainly in the recognition of a criminal by measurements. It has been adopted by statute in the states of Massachusetts and New York, and permitted by statute in Pennsylvania, and adopted by prison regulations in Illinois, Ohio, and some United States military posts. There is a bureau of identification on this system in Chicago to which resort is had by the police of any cities, and the use of the system is rapidly extending in the United States. See the work of M. Bertillon on his System of Identification; Rep. U. S. Commr. Education, 1895–6, vol. 2, ch. 28, where the system is fully described and the statutes on the subjects are collected.

The subject of granting a parole to convicts, independently of the exercise of the power of pardon, is the subject of an able report made to the American Bar Association, 1898, by Hon. J. Franklin Fort of Newark, N. J.

Acts have been passed in Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Utah, and Wisconsin. Iowa, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia have a system of conditional pardon which has a very similar operation. Maryland has a statute which permits the trial court to parole any person convicted of a crime not capital, by which he is not sentenced, but is subject to recall for sentence at any time. Nearly all of these acts have been passed within the last five years. None of them extend to any person convicted of murder in the first or second degree, and most of them are limited to persons serving a term for a first offence. In some states there is a further limitation to persons between the ages of 16 and 25 or 30 at the time of their conviction. The committee report that the most carefully considered statute is that of Indiana passed in 1897.

The same committee reports on indeterminate sentences, which it defines as "sentences imposed by the court without fixing a definite period of limitation or term of imprisonment, but which simply directs that the convict be imprisoned or placed in the custody of the prison authorities to be held for not less than the minimum nor longer than the maximum fixed by law for the offence for which the prisoner stands convicted." New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana have passed such acts which have worked well in practice. They are mostly confined to prisoners who are first offenders and are between the ages of 16 and 30 years. The committee reported that it was not willing to give this system its unconditional approval, though it might prove successful in connection with the parole system provided the judge who sentenced the prisoner should fix a maximum term. Indeterminate sentences as defined by the committee have been sustained as constitutional in 43 Ohio 629; 148 Ill. 413; 167 id. 447; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 894; 167 Mass. 144. They have been held unconstitutional in 88 Mich. 249.

The committee report that after careful investigation and correspondence with the executives of various states the system of paroling convicts has been beneficial.

In England, by statute, a convict undergoing a term of servitude may be set at large by a license granted by the home secretary, who may revoke the license at any time. It is subject to the conditions indorsed upon it, which generally are that the holder shall produce it when called upon to do so by a magistrate or police officer, shall abstain from any violation of the law, shall not habitually associate with notoriously bad characters, and shall not lead an idle and vicious life without visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood. The holder is obliged to report his place of residence to the general officer of the district where he resides and report himself there once a month. When he removes from one district to another, he must notify his removal to the general officer of the old district and report his address to the general officer of the new district. If a licensed convict is indicted and convicted of any offence his license is forfeited thereby. When forfeited the convict is liable to undergo a term of penal servitude equal to the unexpired portion of his original term. See TICKET-OF-LEAVE; SENTENCE.

PRISONER OF WAR. One who has been captured while fighting under the banner of some state. He is a prisoner although never confined in a prison.

In modern times, prisoners are treated with more humanity than formerly: the individual captor has now no personal right to his prisoner. Prisoners are under the superintendence of the government, and they are now frequently exchanged. See 1 Kent 14.

The Brussels Conference, 1874, laid down rules which are generally accepted. Lawful combatants become prisoners of war when captured: and so may such non-combatants as guides, messengers, newspaper correspondents, balloonists, telegraphers, and contractors who are with their army and so clearly associated with it as to be rendering it direct service; Risley, Law of War 129. Important public officials may be captured in any place where acts of war are lawful. Sailors may become prisoners of war, but surgeons and chaplains are considered as exempt; id.

It is a general rule that a prisoner is out of the protection of the laws of the state so far that he can have no civil remedy under them, and he can, therefore, maintain no action. But his person is protected against all unlawful acts. Bac. Abr. Abatement (B 3), Aliens (D). See PAROLE.

PRIVACY. The right of privacy has been defined as the right of an individual to withhold himself and his property from public scrutiny, if he so chooses. The doctrine is of recent growth, and is as yet insufficiently defined. It is said to be incapable of exact definition, and to exist only so far as its assertion is consistent with law or public policy, and in a proper case equity will interfere, if there is no remedy at law, to prevent an injury threatened by the invasion of, or infringement upon, this right from motives of curiosity, gain, or malice. Such remedy has been invoked to prevent the publication of oral lectures delivered by a professor; 12 App. Cas. 326; 3 L. J. Ch. 209; or copies of private drawings and etchings; 1 MacN. & G. 25; or a letter in the possession of a person by whom it was received, without the writer's consent, where the publication is not necessary for the vindication of the receiver or the public interests; 2 Ves. & B. 19; 2 Atk. 342; Ambl. 737; 2 Swanst. 402; 4 Duer 379; 2 Bush 480; a telegram of a private nature; 50 How. Pr. 194; a scientific, artistic, or literary composition kept for the private use of the composer; 4 Burr. 2303, 2330, 2408; 2 Eden 329; 2 Meriv. 435; 8 Pet. 591; a portrait in a newspaper: 6 Misc. Rep. 290; or a photograph by the photographer; 40 Ch. Div. 345; 64 Fed. Rep. 280. But such publication of a photograph or portrait will not be prevented where the person is a "public character," such as a foremost inventor of world-wide reputation; 64 Fed. Rep. 280, reversing 57 id. 434, on this point. The case on appeal held that the publication of such a photograph will not be restrained. The doctrine prevailed one time that an injunction against the publication of letters could only be granted where they were of the nature of a literary composition; 3 Edw. Ch. 515; 3 Barb. Ch. 320; but this doctrine no longer prevails; 4 Duer 379. In many cases the unauthorized use of one's name, where it will tend to cause irreparable damage, will be enjoined, as a recommendation of a medicinal preparation by a physician; 27 Abb. N. C. 402; see 11 Beav. 561; a use of a person's name as director of a corporation: 10 Beav. 561; or a publisher's statement that one is a member of a bankrupt firm; 7 L. R. Eq. 488; a false statement of a dispute pending a suit in relation thereto; 52 L. J. Ch. 134; 8 W. R. 734.

The property of an author or composer of any work, whether of literature, art, or science, in such work, unpublished and kept for his private use or pleasure, cannot be questioned; 1 MacN. & G. 42.

Every clerk employed in a merchant's counting house is under an implied contract that he will not make public that which he learns in the execution of his duty as clerk; 2 Hare 393; 1 Mac N. &G. 45.

The court will interfere by injunction to prevent a party's availing himself in any manner of a title arising out of the violation of right or any breach of confidence; 1 MacN. & G. 25.

A photographer who had taken a negative likeness of A, for money, was restrained from selling or exhibiting copies, both on the ground that there was an implied contract not to use the negative for such purposes, and also that such sale or exhibition was a breach of confidence. The right to enjoin the copying of a photograph does not depend on the existence of a property right; the court of chancery has always had original jurisdiction to prevent what it considered and treated as a wrong, whether arising from the violation of a right or from breach of contract or confidence; 40 Ch. Div. 354, following 1 MacN. & G. 25.

Where a party was employed to make a certain number of copies of a picture, his employment carried with it the necessary implication that he would not make more copies for himself or sell the additional copies in competition with his employer. Such conduct on his part is a gross breach of contract and a gross breach of faith, which clearly entitles the employer to an injunction whether there is a copyright on the picture or not; 19 L. R. Q. B. Div. 639.

Where the defendant was intrusted by the plaintiff with the secret of making a kind of medicine which the plaintiff called a patent medicine, though he had no patent, it was held that there was such a relation between the plaintiff and the defendant and such a breach of contract or breach of faith on the part of the defendant as would entitle the plaintiff to an injunction restraining the use of the secret by the defendant; 9 Hare 241 (approved in 19 L. R. Q. B. Div. 639). In 9 Hare 241, the court said that different grounds have been assigned for the exercise of the jurisdiction; in some cases it has been referred to property, in others to contract, and in others again it has been treated as founded upon trust or confidence, but upon whatever grounds the jurisdiction is founded, the authorities leave no doubt as to the exercise of it.

In Prince Albert v. Strange, De G. & S. 652, and, on appeal, 1 MacN. & G. 23, it was held that the reproduction of etchings belonging to the plaintiff and Queen Victoria, and made for their own pleasure, would be restrained, and the defendants would also be restrained from publishing a description of them, whether more or less limited or summary, and whether in the form of a catalogue or otherwise.

An author of letters or papers of whatever kind, whether they be letters of business or private letters, or literary compositions, has a common and exclusive copyright therein unless he has unequivocally dedicated them to the public or some private person, but no person has the right to publish them without his consent unless such publication be required to establish a personal right or claim or to vindicate character. The government has perhaps a right to publish official letters addressed to it by public officers; but no private person has such a right without the sanction of the government; 2 Story 100.

If the recipient of a letter attempt to publish such letter on occasions not justifiable, equity will prevent the publication as a breach of private rights. . . . . The general property, and the general rights incident to property, belong to the writer, whether the letter is a literary composition, or a familiar letter, or contains details of business. Third persons standing in no privity with either party are not entitled to publish letters to subserve their own private purposes of interest or curiosity or passion; 2 Story 111. The writer of letters, though written without any purpose of profit or any idea of literary property, possesses such a right of property in them that they cannot be published without his consent, unless the purposes of justice, civil or criminal, require the publication; 2 Swanst. 418, Romilly, arguendo; but see High, Inj. § 1012, contra.

This subject of the right to privacy was much discussed in the case Schuyler v. Curtis, in which an injunction was sought to prevent certain persons from making a statue of a deceased woman and exhibiting it at the Columbian Exposition, the avowed object being to honor her as a philanthropist and reformer. A decree for an injunction entered by the supreme court of New York was affirmed by the general term, but was reversed by the court of appeals; 147 N. Y. 434, reversing 70 Hun 598; s. c. 2 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 462, and 24 N. Y. Supp. 512 [1893]. In this case the question whether the action contemplated was a violation of the right of privacy was discussed, and the conclusion reached by a majority of the court that "the individual right of privacy which any person has during his life dies with the person, and any right of privacy which survives is a right pertaining to the living only," and that "any privilege of surviving relatives of a deceased person to protect his memory exists for the benefit of the living to protect their feelings and to prevent a violation of their own rights in the character and memory of the deceased." It was held that "persons attempting to raise a statue or bust of a woman who is no longer living, if their motive is to do honor to her, and if the work is to be done in an appropriate manner, cannot be restrained by her surviving relatives from carrying out such a purpose, merely because they had not the honor of her personal acquaintance or friendship while she was living, or, at the most, had merely been associated with her philanthropic enterprises. The mere fact that a person's feelings may be injured by the erection of a statue to a deceased relative was decided not to be a ground for an injunction against its erection, unless there is reasonable and plausible ground for the existence of this mental distress and injury. It must not be the creation of mere caprice, nor of pure fancy, nor the result of a supersensitive and morbid mental organization dwelling with undue emphasis upon the exclusive and sacred character of this right of privacy."

The opposite view was presented by Gray, J., who dissented:

"Upon the findings in this case, I think we are bound to say that the purpose of the defendants was to commit an act which was an unauthorized invasion of the plaintiff's right to the preservation of the name and memory of Mrs. Schuyler intact from public comment and criticism. As the representative of all her immediate living relatives, it was competent for him to maintain action to preserve them from becoming public property, as would be the case if a statue were erected by strangers for public exhibition under such classification, with respect to the characteristic virtues of the deceased, as they judged befitting. I cannot see why the right of privacy is not a form of property, as much as is the right of complete immunity of one's person."

In 1893 it was held in a New York case that an injunction will lie to restrain the publication of the plaintiff's picture in a newspaper, with an invitation to the readers of the newspaper to vote upon the question of the popularity of the plaintiff as compared with that of another person whose picture was also published; 26 N. Y. Supp. 908.

In an article in 4 Harv. Law Rev. 193, by Samuel D. Warren and Louis Brandeis, the following are suggested as the limitations to the right to privacy:—

1. The right to privacy does not prohibit any publication of matter which is of public or general interest.

2. The right to privacy does not prohibit the publication of any matter, if in itself not private, when the publication is made under circumstances which would render it a privileged publication according to the law of slander and libel.

3. The law would probably not grant any redress for the invasion of privacy by oral publication in the absence of special damage.

4. The right to privacy ceases upon the publication of facts by the individual, or with his consent.

5. The truth of the matter published does not afford a defence.

6. The absence of "malice" in the publisher does not afford a defence.

PRIVATE DWELLING-HOUSE. A covenant which requires a house to be used as a private dwelling-house only, is broken by its being used as a school or dancing academy; 25 L. J. Q. Ch. 230; or as a club; id.; or as a hotel or lodging-house; 53 id. 682; but not by a public auction of the furniture of the house; 24 W. R. 485.

PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW. A name used by some writers to indicate that branch of the law which is now commonly called conflict of laws.

Mr. Dicey, in 6 Law Quart. Rev., says: This department of law has been called by various names, none of which are free from objection. The defect in the use of the term "conflict of laws" is that the supposed "conflict" is fictitious, and the expression has the further radical effect of concealing from view the circumstance that the question by the law of what country a given transaction shall be governed is often a matter too plain to admit of doubt. The term has been defended on account of its applicability, not to any conflict between the laws themselves, but to a question in the mind of the judge as to which of two systems of law should govern a given case. This, however, gives a new and forced sense to a received expression.

The term private international law is convenient and manageable. It brings into light the great and increasing harmony between the rules as to the application of foreign laws which prevail in all civilized countries, but the term is at bottom incorrect. The words private international law should mean a private species of the body of rules which prevails between one nation and another, but nothing of this sort is, however, intended, and the unfortunate employment of the phrase has led to endless misconception of the true nature of this department of legal science. Further, it confounds two classes of rules which are generically different from each other. The principles of international law, properly so called, are international because they prevail among nations, but they are not in the proper sense laws. On the other hand, the principles of private international law are laws in the strictest sense of that term, but they are not international, for they are laws which determine the private rights of one individual as against another, and these individuals may or may not belong to one and the same nation. The expression International Private Law is no doubt a slight improvement, but the name has the insuperable fault of giving to the adjective, international, a meaning different from the sense in which it is generally and correctly employed.

The same learned author further approaches the subject from the standpoint adopted by English judges when it is their duty to deliver a judgment on any question which may raise a so-called conflict of laws. If the case falls within the terms of any English statute there is no further room for discussion. If it does not fall within a statute, the next inquiry for the judge is whether it is covered by any English precedent which has the authority of law, and if it does, discussion is again closed. If, lastly, it falls neither within the terms of a statute nor under any principle established by authority, English judges look for guidance to foreign decisions, to the opinions of jurists, or to arguments drawn from general principles. See INTERNATIONAL LAW; CONFLICT OF LAWS.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS. The United States obtained from the Republic of Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d of February, 1848, and by the treaty of Masilla, known as the Gadsen purchase, dated December 30, 1853, all the property included in what is now the states of California, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, and Nebraska, and the territories of new Mexico and Arizona; and by these treaties the United States agreed to protect and recognize the rights of property of every kind belonging to Mexicans that was situated in the ceded territory. Under the stipulations contained in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, congress, on March 3, 1851, passed a law to determine the validity of private land grants in the state of California; and on March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L. 854), it passed a law for the settlement of title to private land grants under both treaties, entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain states and territories." By this act all persons claiming rights protected by the treaties, whether their title was complete and perfect or incomplete and inchoate, are given the right to present their claims and have the validity thereof ascertained and determined by the court.

These private land claims originated from grants and cessions made by Spain to various settlers, emigrants, and citizens up to the treaty of Cordoba, August 24, 1821 (which was the initiation of the severance of Mexico from Spain, and which culminated, after many desultory revolutions, in the complete independence of Mexico, by the adoption of the new constitution on October 23, 1835), and from various sales and grants, made by the Mexican government, both under the monarchy and under the republic, from 1835 down to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo on February 2, 1848.

These various sales and grants of public lands may be conveniently divided into the first and second epoch of the Central System of Government, beginning on Oct. 3, 1835, when all legislatures were abolished and departmental councils (juntas) were established, and (December 29, 1836) when the new constitution was adopted, which divided the national territory into departments, provided for the appointment of governors and the election of departmental councils and defined their powers, and running down to August 4, 1846, when the constitution of 1824 was re-established. It was at this time (August 18, 1846) that General Kearney entered Santa Fe and took possession of New Mexico in the name of the United States. This period marks the end of the first epoch of the central system of government.

From that time, March 17, 1853, there was a succession of revolutions and counter-revolutions, culminating in the election of Santa Anna as president of the republic, from which time dates the beginning of the second epoch of the central system of government. Many of these claims are conflicting in their nature; many of them which were granted by one government were declared null upon the inauguration of another, and as each revolution succeeded the other, attempts were made to undo everything that had been done during the lease of power by the other forces, so that the titles to the lands of that portion of the United States obtained through the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsen purchase, having for their foundation the grants made by Spain and the various succeeding governments of Mexico, were in an almost hopeless state of confusion and uncertainty, rendering the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing the court of private land claims, for the purpose of passing upon these titles, at once a necessity and a boon.

For a history and compilation of the various Spanish and Mexican land laws, see Reynolds on Spanish and Mexican land laws, passim. This work, compiled by the United States attorney for the court of private land claims, contains, in addition to the court of private land claims act and the rules of practice in that court, an historical sketch of new Spain and New Mexico and old Mexico under its Spanish dominion and subsequently, together with a translation of all of the Spanish and Mexican land laws, and to any one interested in these matters it will be found to be an invaluable aid.

Court of Private Land Claims. By the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L. 854), congress created a court of private land claims. The court is composed of a chief justice and four associate justices, appointed by the president of the United States. The United States are represented by a United States attorney appointed by the president to protect the interests of the government in litigation before that court. The jurisdiction and method of procedure is specifically pointed out in section 9 of the act. The jurisdiction embraces all claims for lands within the limits of the territory derived by the United States from the republic of Mexico, and now embraced within the territories of New Mexico, Arizona, or Utah, or within the states of Nevada, Colorado, or Wyoming, claimed by virtue of any Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey, which the United States are bound to recognize and confirm by virtue of the treaties of cession of said country by Mexico to the United States, which at the date of the passage of the said act had not been confirmed by act of congress or otherwise finally decided upon lawful authority and are not already complete and perfect. The action is begun by filing a petition, whereupon procedure is had in accordance with the act and in accordance with the rules of practice laid down by the court. If a title shall be found to be perfect and be confirmed, the confirmation shall be for so much land only as is found to be held by a perfect title, excepting any part of such land that shall have been disposed of by the United States, and always subject to and not to affect any conflicting private interests, rights, or claims held or claimed adversely to any such claim or title, or adversely to the holder of any such claim or title. No confirmation of claims or title shall have any effect other or further than as a release of all claims of title by the United States; and no private right of any person as between himself and other claimants or persons in respect of any such lands, shall be in any wise affected thereby. It is also provided that the head of the Department of Justice may, through the United States attorney for the court of private land claims, file in the court a petition against the holder or possessor of any claim or land within these states or territories who shall not have voluntarily come in under the provisions of this act for the purpose of settling the title to the claim held by him. It is provided, also, that any party against whom the court shall in any case decide, may appeal to the supreme court of the United States, and that the United States may appeal in case of the confirmation of any title, such appeals to be taken within six months after the rendition of the decision. Upon any such appeal, the supreme court is required to try the case de novo. Whenever a decision of confirmation shall have become final, the clerk of the court is required to certify that fact to the commissioner of the general land office, together with a copy thereof, and the commissioner is required thereupon, without delay, to cause the tract so confirmed to be surveyed at the cost of the United States, and when this shall have been done, he is required to give notice thereof, by publication in Spanish and in English, in newspapers published in the capital of the territory or state. Such survey shall be open to public inspection for ninety days, and if, at the expiration of that period, no objection shall have been filed, shall be approved and forwarded to the general land office. If objection be made, the survey is to be forwarded, together with such objections and the proofs thereof and report thereon. The commissioner of the general land office is required to transmit the survey to the court of final decision, by which, if found to be correct, it shall be approved, and if found incorrect, shall be corrected. When any survey is finally approved by the court, it is required to be returned to the commissioner of the general land office, who is required to issue a patent to the proper party; the neglect to file a petition in this case for the period of two years is a bar to the claim, except in cases of minors, married women, or persons non compos mentis, in which case the court is required to appoint a guardian ad litem for such persons. It is provided that no claim shall be allowed unless it appear to be upon a title lawfully and regularly derived from the government of Spain or Mexico, or from some of the states of the republic of Mexico having lawful authority to make grants of lands, and one that, if not then complete and perfect at the date of the acquisition of the territory by the United States, the claimant would have had a lawful right to make perfect had the territory not been acquired by the United States, and such that the United States are bound, upon the principles of public law or by the provisions of the treaty of cession, to respect and permit to become complete and perfect if the same was not at said date already complete and perfect. No claim can be allowed that will interfere with or overthrow any just and unextinguished Indian title or right. No confirmation confers title to mines or minerals, unless the grantee has become otherwise entitled thereto in law or in equity, but all such mines and minerals remain the property of the United States. No claim hitherto decided by congress shall be confirmed. Private rights of persons, as between each other, are not concluded by a decree under this act, but only the rights as between the United States and claimants, and that only for the purpose of releasing to the claimant such right or title to the land as the United States may have acquired from the treaties. No confirmation can be made for more than eleven square leagues to the original grantee.

There are other minor and unimportant exceptions and reservations, for which see the act itself.

By the original act this court was to cease to exist on December 31, 1895, but its life was subsequently extended to December 31, 1897, and again to March 4, 1899 (Sup. Rev. Stats. vol. 2, pp. 417 and 556). See UNITED STATES COURTS.

PRIVATE NUISANCE. Anything done to the hurt and annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. 3 Bla. Com. 215; 131 N. Y. 211. See NUISANCE.

PRIVATE PROPERTY. As used in a constitution, the term applies to such property as belongs absolutely to an individual, and of which he has the exclusive right of disposition; property of a specific, fixed, and tangible nature, capable of being had in possession and transmitted to another, as houses, lands, and chattels; 29 Miss. 32.

PRIVATE WAY. An incorporeal hereditament of a real nature, entirely different to a common highway. The right of going over another man's ground. 98 Pa. 5. See WAY.

PRIVATEER. A vessel owned by one or more private individuals, armed and equipped at his or their expense, for the purpose of carrying on a maritime war, by the authority of one of the belligerent parties.

A privateer is a private vessel commissioned by the state by the issue of a letter of marque to its owner to carry on all hostilities by sea, presumably according to the laws of war. She continues under the control of her private owner, and her crew are under the same discipline as the crew of a merchant ship. Formerly a state issued letters of marque to its own subjects, and to those of neutral states as well, but a privateersman who accepted letters of marque from both belligerents was regarded as a pirate.

For the purpose of encouraging the owners of private armed vessels, they are usually allowed to appropriate to themselves the property they capture, or, at least, a large proportion of it; 1 Kent 96. See 2 Dall. 36; 1 Wheat. 46; 2 Gall. 19, 56, 526; 1 Mass. 365; 3 Wash. C. C. 209.

By the Declaration of Paris (q. v.) privateering was abolished, but the United States, Spain, Mexico, and Venezuela did not accede to this declaration.

The creation of a volunteer navy by a belligerent was not prohibited by the Declaration of Paris. A volunteer cruiser is a vessel loaned by her private owner to the state. Her officers are commissioned and her crew are subject to the discipline of a ship of war; she only resembles a privateer in that her prizes belong to her owner. In 1870, when Prussia proposed the creation of a volunteer navy, the French government protested, but the English government held that such a navy was to be distinguished from privateers, and that their employment was no evasion of the Declaration of Paris: but from this opinion Phillimore decidedly dissented; Risley, Law of War 112.

A merchant vessel without any commission may become a lawful combatant in self-defence, and if she captures her assailant, the latter may be condemned as lawful prize.

During the civil war in America, congress authorized the president to issue letters of marque, but he did not do so. The confederates offered their letters of marque to foreigners, but they were not accepted. The confederate vessels were commissioned as of its regular navy. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law.

The president's proclamation at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war, 1898, declared that privateering would not be resorted to by the United States.

It has been thought that the constitutional provision empowering congress to issue letters of marque deprives it of the power to join in a permanent treaty abolishing privateering. See 28 Am. L. Rev. 615; 24 id. 902; 19 Law Mag. & Rev. 35.

PRIVATION. A taking away or withdrawing. Co. Litt. 239.

PRIVEMENT ENCEINTE (L. Fr.). A term used to signify that a woman is pregnant, but not quick with child. See Wood, Inst. 662; ENCEINTE; FŒTUS; PREGNANCY.

PRIVIES. Persons who are partakers or have an interest in any action or thing, or any relation to another. Wood, Inst. b. 2, c. 3, p. 255; Co. Litt. 271 a.

There are several kinds of privies: namely, privies in blood, as the heir is to the ancestor; privies in representation, as is the executor or administrator to the deceased; privies in estate, as the relation between the donor and donee, lessor and lessee; privies in respect to contracts; and privies on account of estate and contract together. Prest. Conv. 327. Privies have also been divided into privies in fact and privies in law. 8 Co. 42 b. See Viner, Abr. Privity; 5 Com. Dig. 347; Hamm. Part. 131; Woodf. Landl. & T. 279; 1 Dane, Abr. c. 1, art. 6. The latter are created by the law casting land upon a person, as in escheat; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 189.

No one is privy to a judgment whose succession to the rights of property thereby affected occurred previously to the institution of the suit. Freem. Judg. § 162; 83 Fed. Rep. 515.

PRIVIGNUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Son of a husband or wife by a former marriage; a stepson. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PRIVILEGE. Exemption from such burdens as others are subjected to. 24 N. J. L. 557. See 67 Tex. 542; 123 Mass. 519.

In Civil Law. A right which the nature of a debt gives to a creditor, and which entitles him to be preferred before other creditors. Dalloz, Dict. Privilege; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 2, t. 1, s. 4, n. 1; 43 La. Ann. 1078, 1194.

Privilege is "a real right in a thing (jus in re) springing from the nature of a debt which has been contracted with reference to that thing, and securing the debt by a preference on the proceeds of the thing when it is sold under legal process." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 86.

"A mortgage under the civil law is to all intents and purposes what it is in equity in the English law or the law of Connecticut, a security for a debt given by the agreement of the debtor. But a debtor cannot, by his mere agreement, proprio vigore, confer a privilege.

"If he contracts a debt, which by its nature has a privilege under the law, then the privilege exists, as a method of securing the debt. It inheres in the thing with reference to which the debt has been contracted, follows it into the hands of third persons (in the absence of some law of recordation providing to the contrary), and as a rule would prime a mortgage of the same property." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 87.

"The one is legal; the other conventional. This former is sometimes called by the civilians a privileged hypothecation; the latter a mere hypothecation." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 88.

The civil law privilege became, by adoption of the admiralty courts, the admiralty lien; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 89; 19 How. 82, 90; 148 U. S. 1.

Creditors of the same rank of privileges are paid in concurrence, that is, on an equal footing. Privileges may exist either in movables or immovables, or in both at once. They are general or special, on certain movables. The debts which are privileged on all the movables in general are the following, which are paid in this order. Funeral charges. Law charges, which are such as are occasioned by the prosecution of a suit before the courts. But this name applies more particularly to costs, which the party cast has to pay to the party gaining the cause. It is in favor of these only that the law grants the privilege. Charges, of whatever nature, occasioned by the last sickness, concurrently among those to whom they are due. See LAST SICKNESS. The wages of servants for the year past, and so much as is due for the current year. Supplies of provisions made to the debtor or his family during the last six months by retail dealers, such as bakers, butchers, grocers, and during the last year by keepers of boarding-houses and taverns. The salaries of clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind. Dotal rights due to wives by their husbands.

The debts which are privileged on particular movables are—the debt of a workman or artisan, for the price of his labor, on the movable which he has repaired or made, if the thing continues still in his possession; that debt on the pledge which is in the creditor's possession; the carrier's charges and accessory expenses on the thing carried; the price due on movable effects, if they are yet in the possession of the purchaser; and the like. See LIEN.

As to privileges on movables, see a good summary in 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 4662, and compare with the texts.

Creditors who have a privilege on moveables in Louisiana are (1) vendors for purchase money, (2) architects, mechanics, contractors, etc., for construction, rebuilding and repair of houses, etc., (3) material men, (4) those who have worked by the job in the manner required by law or police regulation on levees, bridges, ditches, and roads of a proprietor; Code §§ 3249–51.

In regard to privilege, Domat says, "We do not reckon in the number of privileges the preference which the creditor has on the moveables that have been given him in a pawn, and which are in his custody. The privilege of a creditor is the distinguishing right which the nature of his credit gives him, and which makes him to be preferred before other creditors, even those who are prior in time, and who have mortgages." Domat, pt. 1, lib. iii. tit. i. sec. v.

These privileges were of two kinds: one gave a preference on all the goods, without any particular assignment on any one thing; the other secures to the creditors their security on certain things, and not on the other goods.

Among creditors who are privileged, there is no priority of time, but each one is in the order of his privilege, and all creditors who have a privilege of the same kind take proportionately, although their debts be of different dates. And all privileges have equally a preference over those of an inferior class, and over debts which do not have this favored character, whether subsequent or antecedent in point of time.

The vendor of immovable property, for which payment has not been made, is preferred before creditors of the purchaser, and all other persons, as to the thing sold. By the Roman law, this principle applies equally to movables and immovables; and the seller may seize upon the property in the hands of his vendee, or wherever he can find it.

So, too, a person who has lent money to repair a thing, or to make improvements, has this privilege. And this, though he lends to workmen or architects, etc., if it be done with the knowledge of the owner.

Carriers have a privilege not only for the price of carriage, but for money paid on account of the goods.

Landlords have a privilege for the rents due from their tenants even on furniture of the under-tenants, if there be a sublease. But not if payment has been made to the tenant by an immediate lessor; although a payment made by the sub-tenant to the landlord would be good as against the tenant.

The privilege was lost by a novation, or by anything in the original contract which showed that the vendor had taken some other security inconsistent with the privilege. See Domat, pt. i. lib. iii. tit. i. sec. v.

See Dalloz, Dict. Privilege; LIEN; LAST SICKNESS; PREFERENCE.

In Maritime Law. An allowance to the master of a ship of the general nature of primage, being compensation, or rather a gratuity, customary in certain trades, and which the law assumes to be a fair and equitable allowance, because the contract on both sides is made under the knowledge of such usage by the parties.

PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST. Privilege from arrest on civil process.

It is either permanent, as in case of ambassadors, public ministers, and their servants, the royal family and servants, peers and peeresses, etc., or temporary, as in case of members of both houses of congress, and of the state legislature, who are privileged eundo, manendo, et redeundo; 1 Kent 243; Cooley, Const. Lim. 163; 8 R. I. 43; see 2 Stra. 985; practising barristers, while actually engaged in the business of the court; 2 Dowl. 51; 1 H. Bla. 636; 1 M. & W. 488; 6 Ad. & E. 623; a clergyman in England whilst going to church, performing services, and returning; 7 Bingh. 320; witnesses and parties to a suit and bail, eundo, manendo, et redeundo; 5 B. & Ad. 1078; 6 Dowl. 632; 1 Maule & S. 638; 1 M. & W. 488; 6 Ad. & E. 623; 17 R. I. 715; 136 N. Y. 585; and other persons who are privileged by law. See ARREST. Privilege (from arrest) does not extend to defendants in criminal cases; 6 Dist. Rep. Pa. 595.

In case of the arrest of a legislator contrary to law, the house of which he is a member may give summary relief, by ordering his discharge, and if this be not complied with, by punishing the persons concerned in such arrest, as for contempt of its authority. If the houses neglect to interfere, the court from which the process issued should set it aside, on the fact being shown to it; and any court or officer having authority to issue writs of habeas corpus may inquire into the case and release the party; Cooley, Const. Lim. 163; Cush. Parl. Pract. § 546. "When attachment is mere process, privilege exists; when it is punitive or disciplinary, privilege does not exist." Brett, Comm. 748. See 1 H. L. Cas.

By the constitutions of some of the states, the privilege has been enlarged, so as to exempt the persons of legislators from any service of civil process; e. g. Michigan, Kansas, Nebraska, California, Wisconsin, Indiana, Oregon, and others.

See EXTERRITORIALITY; Piggott, Consular Jurisdiction.

PRIVILEGE, WRIT OF. A process to enforce or maintain a privilege. Cowell.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS. Communications made bona fide upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contain criminatory matter which without this privilege would be slanderous and actionable.

Duty, in this canon, cannot be confined to legal duties, which may be enforced by indictment, action, or mandamus, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation; 5 E. & B. 347. The proper meaning of a privileged communication, said Baron Parke, is only this: that the occasion on which the communication was made rebuts the inference prima facie arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts it upon him to prove that there was malice in fact,—that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill-will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made; 2 Cr. M. & R. 573. So, also, in 16 N. Y. 373. See 73 Mich. 445; 40 Minn. 475; 88 Va. 106; 3 How. 287; [1891] App. Cas. 78; 85 Wis. 451.

The law recognizes two classes of cases in which the occasion either supplies an absolute defence, or a defence subject to the condition that the party acted bona fide without malice. The distinction turns entirely on the question of malice. The communications last mentioned lose their privilege on proof of express malice; 12 Fed. Rep. 526. The former depend in no respect for their protection upon the bona fides of the defendant. The occasion is an absolute privilege, and the only questions are whether the occasion existed, and whether the matter complained of was pertinent to the occasion; Heard, Lib. & S. § 89. See Webb, Poll. Torts 335; Odg. Sl. & L. 184; 109 N. C. 270.

As to communications which are thus absolutely privileged, no person is liable, either civilly or criminally, in respect of anything published by him as a member of a legislative body, in the course of his legislative duty, or in respect of anything published by him in the course of his duty in any judicial proceeding. This privilege extends not only to parties, counsel, witnesses, jurors, and judges in a judicial proceeding, but also to proceedings in legislative bodies, and to all who, in the discharge of public duty or the honest pursuit of private right, are compelled to take part in the administration of justice, or in legislation. A fair report of any judicial proceeding or inquiry is also privileged; Heard, Lib. & S. §§ 90, 103, 110; Odg. Lib. & S. *185; but to be privileged it must be an accurate and impartial account of what actually occurred; 50 Ohio St. 71. A report to a newspaper of judicial proceedings if made by an outsider is actionable if made from motives of personal hostility; 5 Ex. Div. 53. See 46 Ill. App 313; 45 La. Ann. 1184; [1893] 1 Q. B. 65.

The bona fide statements of one church member on the trial of another, before a church tribunal, are privileged; 88 Ga. 620. They have a qualified privilege; Poll. Torts 253.

Freedom of speech in parliament is protected by the Bill of Rights; 1 W. & M. Sess. 2, c. 2. An action will not lie against a judge for words spoken in his judicial capacity in a court of justice; L. R. 3 Ex. 220.

Unfounded insinuations made by counsel against the prosecutor are privileged; 11 Q. B. Div. 588; so are volunteered statements of a witness involving a criminal charge against a person not connected with the case under inquiry. Military courts stand in the same way; L. R. 7 H. L. 744; communications relating to affairs of state and passing between officials are absolutely privileged; Poll. Torts 253; [1895] 1 Q. B. 888; as to whether military and naval reports, not made in the cause of some judicial inquiry, are absolutely privileged, or have only a qualified privilege, see L. R. 5 Q. B. 94. Fair reports of judicial and parliamentary inquiries are said to have an absolute privilege; Poll. Torts 253.

A communication is privileged when made in good faith in answer to one having an interest in the information sought, and it will be privileged if volunteered, when the party to whom it is made has an interest in it and such party stands in such relation to him as to make it a reasonable duty, or at least proper, that he should give the information.

"A communication which would otherwise be privileged, if made with malice in fact or through hatred, ill-will, and a malicious design to injure, is not a privileged communication, but the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to show malice in fact." 12 Fed. Rep. 526; 111 Pa. 404. A member of a legislative body cannot take advantage of his position to utter private slanders against others; 184 Pa. 108.

Information furnished by a charity organization society at the request of a person not a member, but who was interested, is a privileged communication; 13 Cent. L. J. 432. So are communications to a near relative respecting the character of a person with whom the relative is negotiating for a marriage; 8 C. & P. 88 (but not by a stranger; 5 Allen 170); so where one communicated to an employer his suspicions of dishonest conduct in a servant towards himself; 8 C. B. N. S. 597.

A publication by a newspaper of an article without inquiry is not privileged because received from a regular correspondent; 68 Hun 474. Communications between an applicant for a patent and the patent office touching an unissued patent are not privileged; 44 Fed. Rep. 294. As to statements made to commercial agencies, see that title. Whenever it is right in the interest of society for one person to communicate to another what he believes or has heard concerning any person's conduct or character is a privileged occasion; Poll. Torts 256; L. R. 5 Q. B. 11. Thus a solicitor to his client about the soundness of a security, or a father to his daughter about her suitor; Poll. Torts 256; a creditor of a firm in liquidation to another of its creditors as to a member of the debtor firm; L. R. 4 Ex. 232; communications addressed to a person in public position relating to the redress of grievances; 5 E. & B. 344. Where the defendant dismissed the plaintiff from its service on account of gross neglect of duty, a statement by the defendant to its servants of the reason for plaintiff's dismissal is a privileged communication, The occasion being privileged, the communication is so, unless the plaintiff can show that it was malicious; [1891] 2 Q. B. 189.

In making privileged communications of a confidential kind, the failure to use the ordinary means of insuring privacy will destroy the privilege; L. R. 9 C. P. 393.

If the occasion be privileged the plaintiff must prove malice, that is dishonest or reckless ill-will. To constitute malice there must be something more than the absence of reasonable ground for belief; Poll. Torts 262. See 8 Harv. L. Rev. 9; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; LIBEL; MALICE; JUSTIFICATION; SLANDER.

In America, as in England, the defence of privilege is confined to comment and criticism of the acts of public men, as they actually happened, and does not extend to false assertions of fact; 55 Fed. Rep. 456. See 152 Pa. 406; 13 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 97.

PRIVILEGED COPYHOLDS. Those copyholds which are held according to the custom of the manor and not according to the will of the lord. They include ancient demesne and customary freehold. See CUSTOMARY COPYHOLD; 2 Woodd. Lect. 33; Lee, Abs. 63; 1 Crabb, R. P. 709, 919; 2 Bla. Com. 100.

PRIVILEGED DEBTS. Those which an executor or administrator, assignee in bankruptcy, etc., may pay in preference to others, such as funeral expenses, servants' wages, and doctors' bills during last sickness, etc. See PRIVILEGE; ADMINISTRATOR.

PRIVILEGED DEED. In Scotch Law. An instrument, for example, a testament, in the execution of which certain statutory formalities usually required are dispensed with, either from necessity or expediency. Erskine, Inst. 3. 2. 22; Bell, Dict.

PRIVILEGED VILLEINAGE. Villein socage. 1 Steph. Com. 188, 223. See SOCAGE.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES. The words privileges and immunities are used in the XIV amendment of the constitution, and in other parts of that document, and were also used in the articles of confederation. They are such privileges as are fundamental, which belong to the citizens of all free governments and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the United States; 16 Wall. 76; 123 U. S. 150; 144 U. S. 361.

These have been enumerated as some of the principal privileges: Protection by the government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; 16 Wall. 76; 123 U. S. 156; 144 id. 361; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through or reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise (but he is entitled to no greater privileges and immunities than are possessed by the citizens of the latter state; 135 U. S. 492), to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, to institute and maintain actions of every kind in the courts of the state, to take, hold, and dispose of property, and an exemption from higher federal taxes or impositions than are paid by the citizens of other states, etc.; 4 Wash. C. C. 371. Other judges have preferred to leave the meaning of the phrase to be determined as each case arises; 94 U. S. 391. See Cooley, Const. 24.

The constitution also declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States;" but this amendment does not control the power of the state over its own citizens; 31 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 322.

A citizen of the United States has been said to have a right as such to participate in foreign and inter-state commerce, to have the benefit of the postal laws, to make use in common with others of the navigable waters of the United States, to pass from state to state and into foreign countries; he may petition the federal authorities, visit the seat of government without being subjected to the payment of a tax for the privilege (6 Wall. 35), be the purchaser of public lands on the same terms as others; 112 U. S. 76; 144 id. 263; participate in the government if he comes within the conditions of suffrage, be protected from violence while exercising his right of suffrage; 144 U. S. 263; demand the protection of the government on the high seas or in foreign countries; Cooley, Const. 489, 246; see 16 Wall. 36; take out patents and copyrights, buy, sell, or devise United States securities, and take the benefit of the national bankrupt laws; Black, Const. L. 531. A state may not impose a tax upon travellers passing by public conveyance out of the state; 6 Wall. 35; nor impose conditions upon the rights of citizens of other states to sue its citizens in the federal courts; 20 Wall. 445; see 37 Ia. 145; nor deny to colored citizens the privilege of serving on the jury, because of their color; 100 U. S. 303, 313, 339; or to citizens who have become such by naturalization; 5 Leigh 743.

The right to free education is not a privilege and immunity; 30 Chi. Leg. N. 138; or the right of suffrage; 21 Wall. 162; 48 Hun 198; or the right to practise law in the courts of the state; 16 Wall. 130; or to have a controversy in the state court prosecuted or determined by one form of action rather than by another; 160 U. S. 389; nor does an act forbidding the practice of medicine until after examination by a state board; 4 Wash. St. 424.

Among statutes which have been held not to abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens are: Requiring that every child attending school shall be vaccinated; 65 Conn. 183; that policies of insurance shall not be issued without securing a charter of incorporation; 164 Pa. 306; that contractors shall accept no more than eight hours' work in twenty-four except in cases of necessity; 77 Hun 120; that every person before registration for election must be able to read and write; 34 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 521; that one who sells patents shall file an authenticated copy of the letters patent and an affidavit that such letters are genuine; 51 Fed. Rep. 774 (distinguishing 25 id. 394); that women shall not be employed in saloons, theatres, etc., where liquor is sold; 83 Fed. Rep. 157; that minors shall not remain therein; 73 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 111; prohibiting plumbers from exercising their calling without a certificate from a board of examiners; 81 Hun 434; requiring that the seller of fertilizers shall take out a license; 43 Fed. Rep. 609; that those carrying on the banking business shall comply with the provisions of an act relating thereto; 51 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 858; regulating the right to practise medicine; 10 Col. 383; 88 Ala. 122; 112 Ind. 462; dentistry; 52 Ark. 228; 44 Kan. 565 (but such regulation cannot discriminate against citizens of other states; 65 N. H. 103); suppressing a nuisance; 82 Fed. Rep. 623; regulating or prohibiting the sale of liquor within a state. See LIQUOR LAWS.

Refusal to any person of the accommodations of any public conveyance or place of amusement; 109 U. S. 3; refusing to allow colored children to attend the public schools; 103 Mo. 546 (but see 7 Nev. 342); excluding persons of color not taxed, in an enumeration of inhabitants for the purpose of reorganizing a senatorial district; 19 N. Y. S. 978; the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children; 107 N. C. 609; or prohibiting the carrying of dangerous weapons; 35 W. Va. 367; 153 U. S. 535; do not abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens; nor does a statute prohibiting the intermarriage of white and colored persons; 86 Ind. 389; 63 N. C. 547.

See Black, Const. L.; Cooley, Const. Lim.; 14 L. R. A. 579; CIVIL RIGHTS; DUE PROCESS OF LAW; PROTECTION OF THE LAW; LIBERTY OF CONTRACT; SCHOOLS.

PRIVILEGIUM (priva lex, i. e. de uno homine). In Civil Law. A private law inflicting a punishment or conferring a reward. Calvinus, Lex.; Cicero, de Lege 3, 19; pro Domo 17; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Every peculiar right by which one creditor or class of creditors is preferred to another in personal actions. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Every privilege granted by law in derogation of common right. Mackeldey § 188. A claim or lien on a thing, which once attaching, continues till waiver or satisfaction, and which exists apart from possession. So at the present day in maritime law; e. g. the lien of seamen on ship for wages. 2 Pars. Marit. Law 561. See PRIVILEGE.

PRIVILEGIUM CLERICALE (Lat.) Benefit of clergy, which see.

PRIVILEGIUM, PROPTER, PROPERTY. A qualified property in animals feræ naturæ, i. e. a privilege of hunting, taking, and killing them, in exclusion of others. 2 Bla. Com. 394.

PRIVITY. The mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 189; 6 How. 60; 1 U. S. App. 101; 2 Colo. App. 571.

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT. The relationship which subsists between two contracting parties.

From the nature of the covenant entered into by him, a lessee has both privity of contract and of estate; and though by an assignment of his lease he may destroy his privity of estate, still the privity of contract remains, and he is liable on his covenant notwithstanding the assignment; Dougl. 458, 764; Viner, Abr.; 6 How. 60.

PRIVITY OF ESTATE. Identity of title to an estate.

The relation which subsists between a landlord and his tenant.

It is a general rule that a termor cannot transfer the tenancy or privity of estate between himself and his landlord without the latter's consent: an assignee who comes in only in privity of estate is liable only while he continues to be legal assignee: that is, while in possession under the assignment; Bac. Abr. Covenant (14); Woodf. Landl. & T. 261; Viner, Abr.; Washb. R. P.

PRIVITY OF POSSESSION. To establish this, the later occupant must enter under the prior one, and must obtain his possession either by purchase or deed. When the possession is actual, it may commence in parol without deed or writing; and it may be transferred or pass from one occupant to another by parol. bargain, and sale, accompanied by delivery. All the law requires is continuity of possession, where it is actual; 2 Sawy. 545; 22 Or. 77.

PRIVY. One who is a partaker or has any part or interest in any action, matter, or thing.

PRIVY COUNCIL. The chief council of the sovereign, called, by pre-eminence, "the Council," composed of those whom the king appoints. 1 Bla. Com. 229.

The statute of Charles II. in 1679 limited the number to thirty,—fifteen of the chief officers of the state ex virtute officii, the other fifteen at the king's pleasure; the number is now indefinite. A committee of the privy council was a court of ultimate appeal in admiralty and ecclesiastical cases and cases of lunacy; 3 P. Wms. 108; and from all dominions of the crown except Great Britain and Ireland; H. Wood. Lect. 157 b. The court of appeal now has its jurisdiction in lunacy and admiralty. See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.

PRIVY PURSE. The income set apart for the sovereign's personal use.

PRIVY SEAL. In English Law. A seal which the king uses to such grants or things as pass the great seal. Co. 2d Inst. 554.

PRIVY SIGNET. The seal which is first used in making grants, etc., of the crown. It is always in custody of the secretary of state. 2 Bla. Com. 347; 1 Woodd. Lect. 250; 1 Steph. Comm., 11th ed. 593.

PRIVY TOKEN. By stat. 33 Henry VIII. c. 1, punishment is provided against those evil-disposed persons who devised how they might unlawfully get into their possession goods, chattels, and jewels of other persons by "privy tokens and counterfeit letters in other men's names," unto divers persons their friends and acquaintances, by color whereof they have unlawfully obtained the same. A false privy token within the statute has generally been taken to denote some seal, visible mark, or thing, as a key, a ring, etc. 13 Viner, Abr. 460. When one makes use of a false token, he is indictable for the cheat, though the act is not larceny; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 585. But when the consent obtained covers no more than the possession, and the goods are converted to his own use, the offence becomes larceny; 1 Leach 420; East, Pl. Cr. 691. See FALSE TOKEN.

PRIVY VERDICT. One which is delivered privily to a judge out of court.

PRIZE. In Maritime Law. The apprehension and detention at sea of a ship or other vessel, by authority of a belligerent power, either with the design of appropriating it, with the goods and effects it contains, or with that of becoming master of the whole or a part of its cargo. 1 C. Rob. 228. See Bened. Adm. § 509.

The vessel or goods thus taken.

Goods taken on land from a public enemy are called booty; and the distinction between a prize and booty consists in this, that the former is taken at sea and the latter on land.

A lawful prize includes enemy's property captured on the high seas or in territorial waters belonging either to the captor or to the enemy, and property of neutrals captured and confiscated for breach of blockade or as contraband of war; Risley, Law of War 144.

In order to vest the title of the prize in the captors, it must ordinarily be brought with due care into some convenient port for adjudication by a competent court. But circumstances may render such a step improper; and of these the captor must be the judge. In making up his decision, good faith and reasonable discretion are required; 18 How. 110; 1 Kent 101. The condemnation must be pronounced by a prize court of the government of the captor sitting in the country of the captor or his ally; 7 Wheat. 283; the prize court of an ally cannot condemn.

Strictly speaking, as between the belligerent parties the title passes, and is vested when the capture is complete; and that was formerly held to be complete and perfect when the battle was over, or the flag hauled down, and the spes recuperandi was gone. Later, twenty-four hours' possession was required, and in still later times it was considered that the captured vessel must be brought infra præsidia (q. v.) to a place of safety. But by the modern usage of nations this is not sufficient to change the property. A judicial tribunal must pass upon the case; and the property is not charged in favor of a neutral vendee or recaptor, so as to bar the original owner, until a regular sentence of condemnation; 1 Kent 102; 1 C. Rob. 135; but this rule is not inflexible.

A neutral ship in the employment of a belligerent is, as well as the enemy's cargo, subject to capture; 24 Fed. Rep. 33. Where a vessel is captured by the army it is not subject to condemnation as prize; 108 U. S. 92.

Formerly prizes could be brought into a neutral port and kept there until condemned by a prize court sitting in the belligerent's territory; but it is probable that, at present, this right would be limited to cases arising out of stress of weather, lack of supplies, etc., and only for such length of time as necessity requires; Risley, Law of War 176.

All captures are made for the government; 10 Wheat. 306; and the title to captured property always vests primarily in the government of the captors. The rights of individuals, where such rights exist, are the result of local law or regulation; 101 U. S. 42; 2 Russ. & M. 56. The question of prize or no prize in England is triable only in a court of admiralty under a commission from the crown, with an appeal to the crown in council, for the crown reserves the right to decide such questions by its own authority and does not commit its determination to any municipal court.

Under the prize laws of the United States a ship includes a torpedo steam launch; 113 U. S. 747.

Where there is a probable cause to believe that a vessel is liable to capture, it is proper to take her and subject her to the examination and adjudication of a prize court; 4 Dall. 34. Circumstances creating a reasonable suspicion of conduct warranting her capture are sufficient; 1 Mas. 24.

A captured vessel is usually put in charge of a prize master, whose duty is, immediately on his arrival in port, to institute proceedings for condemnation. He is a bailee for the captors, and may become liable for negligence resulting in loss to them, for demurrage, etc.; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 391. A captor should bring his prize, as speedily as may be consistent with his other duties, within the jurisdiction of a competent prize court, though under imperious circumstances, he may take it to a foreign port or even sell it. The proceeds of a sale must be subject to the order of a prize court.

The Navy Department rules of August, 1876, and the act of June 30, 1864, prescribe rules for the captors of prizes.

A captor's right of prize may be forfeited in various ways, as by delay in seeking a prize court; cruel treatment of the captured crew, embezzlement, etc.

See PRIZE COURT; NEUTRALITY; RECAPTURE; CAPTURE; INFRA PRÆSIDIA; PREEMPTION.

In Contracts. A reward which is offered to one of several persons who shall accomplish a certain condition; as, if an editor should offer a silver cup to the individual who shall write the best essay in favor of peace. In this case there is a contract subsisting between the editor and each person who may write such essay that he will pay the prize to the writer of the best essay; Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 675.

PRIZE COURT. In English Law. That branch of admiralty which adjudicates upon cases of maritime captures made in time of war. A special commission issues in England, in time of war, to the judge of the admiralty court, to enable him to hold such court. See ADMIRALTY.

Some question has been raised whether the prize court is or is not a separate court from the admiralty court. Inasmuch as the commission is always issued to the judge of that court, and the forms of proceeding are substantially those of admiralty, while the law applicable is derived from the same sources, the fact that the commission of prize is only issued occasionally would hardly seem to render the distinction a valid one. But Lord Mansfield said that the whole system of procedure, litigation, and jurisprudence is different; Dougl. 613. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

In the United States, the admiralty courts discharge the duties both of a prize and an instance court (q. v.). The district courts are prize courts; 3 Dall. 6. The president cannot confer jurisdiction to act as a prize court; 13 How. 498. The circuit and district courts and the supreme court are now courts of admiralty for the condemnation of prizes, the original jurisdiction being in the district court. Appeals may be taken directly from it to the supreme court if the amount in controversy exceeds two thousand dollars, or if there is a certificate of the district judge that the question involved is one of general importance; but by the act of March 3, 1891, this limitation is probably removed.

On the breaking out of hostilities the district court appoints commissioners to examine witnesses, etc., under the direction of the court; R. S. § 4621. For the practice see Bened. Adm. §§ 509–512; 1 Wheat. 494; 2 id. 429; and as to the English practice, 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 421. Questions of booty may be referred to the admiralty by the crown; Knapp, P. C. 360.

If there is probable cause for the seizure of a vessel that is not a good prize, the captors may have their costs though the vessel is not condemned; 12 Ct. Cls. 408; they are not liable in damages; 2 Gall. 240, 325; but if a captor unreasonably delays bringing suit for condemnation, he is liable for demurrage if the court decrees a restoration; 108 U. S. 92, where the United States was held liable for demurrage from the time when surrender might have been made, at the rate fixed by the charter party. A captor does not lose his right by delay in sending home a prize for adjudication, if he thinks it necessary and uses discretion and good faith; 18 How. 110. It is the usual practice of the prize court to give freight to the neutral carrier of enemy's goods that are seized; 3 Phill. Int. L. 373. The burden of proof that the prize is neutral rests upon the claimant; and if he fails to show it, condemnation ensues; 2 C. Rob. 77; he must clear himself of suspicion; 22 Ct. Cls. 408.

A prize court of the captors cannot sit in neutral territory, though it may in conquered territory, and in that of a co-belligerent; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 401.

The decision of a prize court is conclusive against the subject of the state and as to the property in the subject-matter against all parties; but unlawful condemnation may subject the state of the captors to demands for indemnity by a foreign state; id. 407. But courts of other nations may examine as to the jurisdiction of a prize court, and if a condemnation therein was not according to the rules of international law, may treat it as a nullity; id. 411. Condemnations of prize courts are final in actions between individuals, and as to the vessel condemned, giving purchasers a good title against all the world, but do not bind foreign nations, if wrongfully decreed; 22 Ct. Cls. 1.

There is a clearly marked distinction between proceedings for prize and forfeiture. "The libel for prize is founded upon the law of nations, and depends for proof upon the facts of her acts upon the high seas. The libel for forfeiture is for the violation of a municipal statute, and depends upon a set of facts and circumstances entirely different from that of piratical aggression. The offences charged are separate and distinct, and the cause of action is in no wise the same." 28 Fed. Rep. 150. In the case of The Itata, it was said that "when a ship is libelled for prize, and the facts fail to sustain the libel, but make out a strong prima facie case of a statutory forfeiture, it would be the duty of the court to remand the case for a new libel; but under no circumstances could a ship be libelled for one offence, and have a decree entered against it for another distinct and separate offence." 56 id. 505, 515.

The duties of prize courts are thus described by Lord Stowell:—

"In forming my judgment, I trust that it has not for a moment escaped my anxious recollection what it is that the duty of my station calls for from me; namely, not to deliver occasional and shifting opinions to serve present purposes of particular national interests, but to administer, with indifference, that justice which the Law of Nations holds out, without distinction, to independent States, some happening to be neutral, and some belligerent. The seat of judicial authority is, indeed, locally here, in the belligerent country, according to the known law and practice of nations; but the law itself has no locality. It is the duty of the person who sits here, to determine this question exactly as he would determine the same question, if sitting at Stockholm; to assert no pretensions on the part of Great Britain which he would not allow to Sweden in the same circumstances; and to impose no duties on Sweden, as a neutral country, which he would not admit to belong to Great Britain in the same character." 1 C. Rob. 350.

In another case, he says:

"It is to be recollected that this is a court of the Law of Nations, though sitting here under the authority of the King of Great Britain. It belongs to other nations as well as to our own; and what foreigners have a right to demand from it, is the administration of the Law of Nations simply, and exclusively of the introduction of principles borrowed from our own municipal jurisprudence, to which it is well known they have at all times expressed no inconsiderable reluctance." 6 id. 349.

PRIZE-FIGHT. A public prize-fight is an indictable offence. No concurrence of wills can justify a public tumult and alarm; therefore, persons who voluntarily engage in a prize-fight and their abettors are all guilty of assault; 4 C. & P. 537; Poll. Tort 186, n.; 1 Cox, C. C. 177; 2 Bish. C. L. § 35. Prize-fights are unlawful, and all persons guilty of aiding and abetting a prize-fight are guilty of an assault; 8 Q. B. Div. 534. See, also, 108 Mass. 302; 67 Miss. 350.

To constitute prize-fighting there must be an expectation of reward to be gained by the contest or competition, either to be won from the contestant or to be otherwise awarded, and there must be an intent to inflict some degree of bodily harm on the contestant; 96 Mich. 576.

Prize-fighting is unlawful; 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 535; C. & M. 314; fighting with the fists is an assault and battery, though the parties agree thus to fight and have no ill-will toward each other: Washb. Manual of Crim. Law; it is a breach of the peace; Poll. Torts 139; 9 C. & P. 214.

If two persons go out to fight with their fists, by consent, and do fight with each other, each is guilty of an assault, although there is no danger or ill-will; 119 Mass. 350, disagreeing with 1 Hill S. C. 10; it is no bar to an action for assault that the parties fought with each other by mutual consent, but such consent may be shown in mitigation of the damages; 33 Ind. 531; one may recover in an action for assault and battery, although he agreed to fight with his adversary; for such agreement to break the peace being void, the maxim volenti non fit injuria does not apply; 3 Jones N. C. 131; mere voluntary presence at a fight does not, as a matter of law, necessarily render persons so present guilty of an assault, as aiding and abetting in such fight; 8 Q. B. Div. 534 (4 C. & P. 537, distinguished); semble, mere presence of a person at a prize-fight affords some evidence for the consideration of a jury of an aiding and abetting in such fight; 8 Q. B. Div. 534.

To constitute a prize-fight it is not essential that the fight should be with the naked fist or hand, but the fact that a contest was had with gloved hands, as also the kind, size, weight, and other characteristics of the gloves so used, may be looked to in connection with the other evidence in the case in determining whether a contest was a prize-fight, or merely a sparring or boxing exhibition without prize or reward to the victor; 4 Ohio N. P. 81.

Prize-fighting was not a distinct offence at common law and participants were indictable and punishable for assault, riot, or affray; 8 Q. B. Div. 534; 3 C. & M. 314; 2 C. & P. 234; 67 Miss. 350.

A spectator at a sparring match is not particeps criminis; there is nothing unlawful in sparring, unless the men fight until they are so weak that a dangerous fall is likely to be the result of the game. Therefore, except in the latter case, death caused by an injury received during a sparring match does not amount to manslaughter; 10 Cox, C. C. 371.

In Arkansas a court of equity has power to issue an injunction to restrain a prize-fight advertised to take place within its jurisdictional limits; 35 Am. Law Reg. & Rev. 100; 28 L. R. A. 727; in Indiana an injunction was granted at the suit of the state, upon the ground that a corporation was misusing its franchise and maintaining its property as a nuisance, although the act complained of was a crime; 143 Ind. 98.

Consent to engage in a boxing match is not a defence to an indictment for a breach of the peace. It is for the jury to determine from the nature of the contest whether it was a breach of the peace, under proper instructions as to what constitutes such a breach.

Evidence is not admissible to prove that such matches are common and harmless amusements, practised in the colleges of this country, nor was there error in refusing to allow the jury to examine the boxing gloves used by the respondent; 56 Vt. 445.

It is not necessary that an indictment aver that the fight took place in public; nor that it contain averments which negative the existence of matters mentioned in the proviso of § 6890 of the revised statutes; 49 Ohio St. 117.

An agreement to engage in a prize-fight is a conspiracy to commit a crime; and the declarations of either party with reference to the common object, or in furtherance of the criminal design, while engaged in its prosecution, are competent evidence against the other, though the agreement was made through backers or other representatives of the principals and the latter were unknown to each other. Letters written by one of the principals, while in training for the fight, describing what the fight is to be, stating when and where it is to occur, and requesting the presence of his friends and others thereat, are in furtherance of the unlawful enterprise, and admissible in evidence against the other; 49 Ohio St. 117.

Whether a pugilistic encounter is a fight or boxing exhibition, is not a question upon which expert testimony is admissible on the trial of an indictment for engaging in a prize-fight. The question must be decided by the jury upon the evidence of what actually took place, under proper instructions from the court, and not upon the opinions of professional pugilists, and others experienced in such combats, or the rules adopted by associations for conducting such contests; 49 Ohio St. 117.

Statutes prohibiting prize-fights have been passed in nearly all the states. That of Nevada (1897) alone need be set forth. Any male person over twenty-one years may procure a license for an exhibition in a public place for any contest or exhibition with gloves between man and man for a wager or reward, and the weight of the gloves used shall not be less than four ounces. The sheriff of any county in which such exhibition is to be held, shall issue a license therefor on payment to him of one thousand dollars. The licensee shall, ten hours before any proposed contest, file with the county clerk where such contest is to be held, a certificate in writing executed by two regular practising physicians of the state showing that the contestants are in sound physical health and condition. The exhibition shall be within an enclosure sufficient to exclude the view of the public not in attendance thereat; no intoxicating liquors of any kind shall be sold or given away at or during the contest upon the grounds or within the enclosure. A charge may be made for admission. Any persons who shall participate in, conduct, or manage any glove contest contrary to the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

What constitutes prize-fighting is a question of law; but it is a term in common use, and the very employment of the word indicates what is meant; 96 Mich. 576.

By statute it is even made criminal for inhabitants of a state by previous agreement to leave the state and engage in a fight outside of its limits; 108 Mass. 302.

See McClain, Cr. Law §§ 196, 249, 1013; 1 Bish. Cr. Law §§ 632–633; 6 L. Quart. Rev. 110.

PRIZE PACKAGES. See SALES; LOTTERY.

PRO BONO PUBLICO. For the public good.

PRO CONFESSO (Lat. as confessed). In Equity Practice. A decree taken where the defendant has either never appeared in the suit, or, after having appeared, has neglected to answer. 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 479; Ad. Eq., 8th ed. *328, 330, 374; 1 Sm. Ch. Pr. 254.

PRO CONSILIO. For counsel given. An annuity pro consilio amounts to a condition, but in a feoffment or lease for life, etc., it is the consideration, and does not amount to a condition: for the state of the land by the feoffment is executed, and the grant of the annuity is executory. Plowd. 412.

PRO DEFECTU EXITUS. For, or in case of, default of issue. 2 Salk. 620.

PRO DIGNITATE REGALI. In consideration of the royal dignity. 1 Bla. Com. 223.

PRO EO QUOD (Lat.). In Pleading. For this that. This is a phrase of affirmation, and is sufficiently direct and positive for introducing a material averment. 1 Saund. 117, n. 4; 2 Chit. Pl. 369–393; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 34.

PRO FALSO CLAMORE SUO. A nominal amercement of a plaintiff for his false claim, which used to be inserted in a judgment for the defendant.

PRO FORMA. As a matter of form. 2 Kent 245.

PRO HAC VICE (Lat.). For this occasion.

PRO INDIVISO (Lat.). For an undivided part. The possession or occupation of lands or tenements belonging to two or more persons, and where, consequently, neither knows his several portion till divided. Bract. l. 5.

PRO INTERESSE SUO (Lat.). According to his interest.

PRO LÆSIONE FIDEI. For breach of faith. 3 Bla. Com. 52.

PRO LEGATO. As a legacy.

PRO MAJORI CAUTELA. From greater caution.

PRO PARTIBUS LIBERANDIS. An ancient writ for partition of lands between co-heirs. Reg. Orig. 316.

PRO QUERENTE (Lat.). For the plaintiff; usually abbreviated pro quer.

PRO RATA (Lat.). According to the rate, proportion, or allowance. A creditor

PRO RATA (Lat.). According to the rate, proportion, or allowance. A creditor of an insolvent estate is to be paid pro rata with creditors of the same class.

According to a certain rule or proportion. 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 355, n. (U. S. D. C. Cal.). It is presumed to be used in that sense in a will; id.

PRO RE NATA (Lat.). For the occasion as it may arise.

PRO SALUTE ANIMÆ. For the good of his soul,

PRO TANTO (Lat.). For so much. See 17 S. & R. 400.

PRO TEMPORE. For the time being; temporary.

PROAMITA (Lat.). A grandfather's sister; a great aunt. Ainsworth, Dict.

PROAVIA (Lat.). A great-grandmother. Ainsworth, Dict.

PROAVUNCULUS (Lat.). A great-grandmother's brother. Ainsworth, Dict.

PROAVUS (Lat.). Great-grandfather. This term is employed in making genealogical tables.

PROBABILITY. Likelihood; consonance to reason; for example, there is a strong probability that a man of good moral character, and who has heretofore been remarkable for truth, will, when examined as a witness under oath, tell the truth; and, on the contrary, that a man who has been guilty of perjury will not, under the same circumstances, tell the truth: the former will, therefore, be entitled to credit, while the latter will not.

PROBABLE. Having the appearance of truth; appearing to be founded in reason.

PROBABLE CAUSE. A reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that a person accused is guilty of the offence with which he is charged. 53 N. Y. 17; 109 Mo. 281; 63 Hun 626; id. 254; 1 Colo. App. 297.

Want of probable cause is one of the elements required to support an action for malicious prosecution, which title see for a discussion of the subject.

In extradition cases, probable cause is made out by proof furnishing good reason to believe that the crime alleged has been committed by the person charged with having committed it; 161 U. S. 502. See EXTRADITION.

In cases of municipal seizure for the breach of revenue, navigation and other laws, if the property seized is not condemned, the party seizing is exempted from liability for such seizure if the court before which the cause is tried grants a certificate that there was probable cause for the seizure. If the seizure was without probable cause, the party injured has his remedy at common law. See 7 Cra. 339; 2 Wheat. 118; 9 id. 362; 16 Pet. 342; 3 How. 197; 4 id. 251; 13 id. 498.

PROBATE. Originally, relating to proof; afterwards, relating to the proof of wills. In American law, now a general name or term used to include all matters of which probate courts have jurisdiction. 47 Minn. 575.

PROBATE CODE. The body or system of law relating to the estates of deceased persons, and of persons under guardianship. 47 Minn. 575.

PROBATE COURT. See COURT OF PROBATE.

PROBATE COURTS. See COURTS OF PROBATE.

PROBATE DUTY. A tax laid by the government on the gross value of the personal property of the deceased testator.

PROBATE OF A WILL. The proof before an officer authorized by law that an instrument offered to be proved or registered is the last will and testament of the deceased person whose testamentary act it is alleged to be.

Jurisdiction. In England, the ecclesiastical courts were the only tribunals in which, except by special prescription, the validity of wills of personal estate could be established or disputed. Hence in all courts, the seal of the ecclesiastical court is conclusive evidence of the factum of a will of personalty; from which it follows that an executor cannot assert or rely on his authority in any other court, without showing that he has previously established it in the spiritual court,—the usual proof of which is the production of a copy of the will by which he is appointed, certified under the seal of the ordinary. This is usually called the probate. The probate of a will is conclusive as to personalty; but not as to realty, which can only be settled by an issue out of chancery or a trial at law; 4 Kent 510.

The ecclesiastical courts had no jurisdiction of devises of lands; and in a trial at common law or in equity the probate of a will is not admissible as evidence, but the original will must be produced, and proved the same as any other disputed instrument. This rule has been modified by statute in some of the United States. In New York, the record, when the will is proved by the subscribing witnesses, is prima facie evidence, and provision is made for perpetuating the evidence. See 12 Johns. 192; 14 id. 407. In Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Michigan the probate is conclusive of its validity, and a will cannot be used in evidence till proved; 12 Allen 1; 1 Gall. 622; 2 Mich. Comp. Laws (1871) 1375; Battle, Rev. 849. In Pennsylvania, the probate was held not conclusive as to lands, and, although not allowed by the register's court, it might be read in evidence; 5 Rawle 80; but see 119 Pa. 138; but it becomes conclusive as to realty, unless within five years from probate those interested shall contest its validity. In South Carolina the will must be proved de novo in the court of common pleas, though allowed in the ordinary; 1 N. & M'C. 326. In New Jersey, probate is necessary, but it is not conclusive; 1 Penn. N. J. 42; except in actions not commenced within seven years from the probate; N. J. Rev. Stat. 1250. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The effect of the probate in this country, and the rules in regard to jurisdiction, are generally the same as in England; but, as no ecclesiastical courts exist in the United States, probate is granted by some judicial officer, who performs the part of the ordinary in England, but generally with more ample powers in relation to the administration of the estate. See SURROGATE; LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The proof of the will is a judicial proceeding, and the probate a judicial act. The party propounding the instrument is termed the proponent, and the party disputing, the contestant. In England, proof ex parte was called probate in common form, and proof on notice to the next of kin, proof in solemn form. In the United States, generally speaking, proofs are not taken until citation or notice has been issued by the judge to all the parties interested to attend. On the return of the citation, the witnesses are examined, and the trial proceeds before the court. If the judge, when both parties have been heard, decides in favor of the will, he admits it to probate; if against the will he rejects it. In Pennsylvania no citation is required.

More than one instrument may be proved; and where the contents of two or more instruments are not wholly inconsistent with each other, they may all be admitted as together constituting the last will and testament of the deceased; Will. Exec. *138.

On the probate the alleged will may be contested on any ground tending to impeach its validity; as, that it was not executed in due form of law and according to the requisite statutory solemnities; that it was forged, or was revoked, or was procured by force, fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence over a weak mind, or that the testator was incompetent by reason of idiocy or lunacy.

PROBATION. The evidence which proves a thing. It is either by record, writing, the party's own oath, or the testimony of witnesses. Proof. It also signifies the time of a novitiate; a trial. Nov. 5.

PROBATOR. In Old English Law. Strictly, an accomplice in felony who to save himself confessed the fact, and charged or accused any other as principal or accessary, against whom he was bound to make good his charge. It also signified an approver, or one who undertakes to prove a crime charged upon another. Jacob, Law Dict.

PROBATORY TERM. In the British courts of admiralty, after the issue is formed between the parties, a time for taking the testimony is assigned. This is called a probatory term.

This term is common to both parties, and either party may examine his witnesses. When good cause is shown, the term will be enlarged. 2 Brown, Civ. Law 418; Dunlop, Adm. Pr. 217.

PROBI ET LEGALES HOMINES (Lat.). Good and lawful men; persons competent in point of law to serve on juries. Cro. Eliz. 654, 751; Cro. Jac. 635; Mart. & Y. 147; Hard. 63; Bac. Abr. Juries (A).

PROCEDENDO (Lat.). In Practice. A writ which issues where an action is removed from an inferior to a superior jurisdiction by habeas corpus, certiorari, or writ of privilege, and it does not appear to such superior court that the suggestion upon which the cause has been removed is sufficiently proved; in which case the superior court by this writ remits the cause to the court from whence it came, commanding the inferior court to proceed to the final hearing and determination of the same. See 2 W. Bla. 1060; 6 Term 365; 52 Conn. 166.

PROCEDURE. The methods of conducting litigation and judicial proceedings.

It might be termed, by way of illustration, the mechanism of the law, as distinguished from jurisprudence, which is the science of the law.

The term is so broad in its signification that it is seldom employed in our books as a term of art. It includes in its meaning whatever is embraced by the three technical terms, pleading, evidence, and practice, And practice in this sense means those legal rules which direct the course of proceeding to bring parties into the court and the course of the court after they are brought in; and evidence as a part of procedure signifies those rules of law whereby we determine what testimony is to be admitted and what rejected in each case, and what is the weight to be given to the testimony admitted. Bish. Cr. Proc. § 2; 107 U. S. 231. See 5 Ind. App. 95.

The term is, with respect to its present use, rather a modern one. Recently the supreme court of the United States commented on the fact that it was unable to find anywhere a satisfactory definition of it. Apart from observations of the most general character the subject is one which does not admit of distinct or detailed treatment under this title. It includes all the practical titles of the law to which reference should be had, with respect to any particular matter, as they are separately treated in this work.

Probably the most salient fact with respect to legal procedure in civil cases is the modern tendency in England and the United States to obliterate technical distinctions between law and equity and to authorize the enforcement of equitable remedies, as well in courts of law as of chancery. But with respect to this tendency it has been very justly said that:

"Although, under modern systems, courts of law may enforce equitable rights, the proof must agree with the pleadings, and the relief granted must be within the prayer for relief and the grounds relied on." 70 Fed. Rep. 949.

Another feature of modern thought on the subject of procedure is the controversy between the advocates of common-law practice and that under codes, which will be found discussed at length under the titles CODE and COMMON LAW, respectively. See also Clarke, The Science of Law and Law-Making.

In England the last quarter of the century has witnessed the most radical change in procedure as the result of the Judicature Acts, which title see. Under the changes thus introduced, where one formerly, in seeking relief from judicial tribunals, was obliged to use different forms of procedure in different courts, these acts, and the rules made pursuant to them, "have to a very large extent introduced uniformity in this respect into the practice of the different divisions of the court." 1 Brett, Com. 336.

In criminal procedure there is a strong tendency indicated towards simplification and expedition. The most notable tendency of a general character is that towards the abolition or modification of the grand jury system, as to which see that title. Very recently vital and comprehensive changes have been made in the criminal procedure of France relating to the preliminary examination of accused persons. See JUGE D'INSTRUCTION.

A new criminal code, notable both as to the changes introduced and the care with which it was prepared, went into effect in Italy in 1890, a careful analysis of which will be found in 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 696. In Great Britain the criminal procedure of Scotland is very different from that of England notwithstanding the union, and a carefully detailed account of it may be found in 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 619.

In a case defining the functions and authority of a prosecuting attorney and his right to enter a nolle prosequi after conviction, the supreme court of Louisiana, in a very able opinion, directed attention to some differences between the criminal procedure of that state and that of England and the states which follow English precedence. The great power given to the prosecuting officer under the common law is greatly diminished in that state, and the court concludes its examination of the subject by the statement that:

"First. The inauguration or preliminary stage, when the prosecuting officer has absolute control of his indictments.

"Second. The trial of the cause, and its incidents, during which the court has control and the power of the prosecuting officer is suspended.

"Third. The period between the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the court, when the pardoning power comes into operation." 48 La. Ann. 109, 144.

See POSTULATIO.

PROCEDURE ACTS. Three acts of parliament passed in 1852, 1854, and 1860, for the amendment of procedure at common law. Moz. & W. They have been largely superseded by the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

PROCEEDING. In its general acceptation, the form in which actions are to be brought and defended, the manner of intervening in suits, of conducting them, the mode of deciding them, of opposing judgments, and of executing. It includes certified copies of pleadings on which the case was tried. 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1084.

Ordinary proceedings intend the regular and usual mode of carrying on a suit by due course at common law.

Summary proceedings are those where the matter in dispute is decided without the intervention of a jury; these must be authorized by the legislature, except, perhaps, in cases of contempt, for such proceedings are unknown to the common law.

In 81 Fed. Rep. 830 the question was suggested whether proceedings before pension commissioners are judicial proceedings within the meaning of R. S. § 860, which provides that evidence obtained from a party or witness shall not be used against him in any criminal proceeding. The court passed the question without deciding it, though apparently inclined to the affirmative.

In Louisiana there is a third kind of proceeding, known by the name of executory process (q. v.).

In New York the code of practice divides remedies into actions and special proceedings. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which one party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offence. Every other remedy is a special proceeding.

PROCEEDS. Money or articles of value arising or obtained from the sale of property. Goods purchased with money arising from the sale of other goods, or obtained on their credit, are proceeds of such goods. 2 Pars. Marit. L. 201; Bened. Adm. 290. See 61 Hun 372. The sum, amount, or value of goods sold, or converted into money. Whart. Dict. Proceeds does not mean necessarily money; 101 U. S. 380.

PROCERES (Lat.). The name by which the chief magistrates in cities were formerly known. St. Armand, Hist. Eq. 88.

PROCES-VERBAL. In French Law. A true relation in writing in due form of law, of what has been done and said verbally in the presence of a public officer, and what he himself does upon the occasion. It is a species of inquisition of office.

The procès-verbal should be dated, contain the name, qualities, and residence of the public functionary who makes it, the cause of complaint, the facts tending to prove the existence of the crime, that which serves to substantiate the charge, point out its nature, the time, the place, the circumstances, state the proofs and presumptions, describe the place,—in a word, everything calculated to ascertain the truth. It must be signed by the officer. Dalloz, Dict. See JUGE D'INSTRUCTION.

PROCESS. In Practice. The means of compelling a defendant to appear in court, after suing out the original writ, in civil, and after indictment, in criminal, cases.

The method taken by law to compel a compliance with the original writ or commands of the court.

A writ, warrant, subpœna, or other formal writing issued by authority of law; also the means of accomplishing an end, including judicial proceedings; 84 Ia. 567; the means or method pointed out by a statute, or used to acquire jurisdiction of the defendants, whether by writ or notice. 108 Mo. 588.

In civil causes, in all real actions and for injuries not committed against the peace, the first step was a summons, which was served in personal actions by two persons called summoners, in real actions by erecting a white stick or wand on the defendant's grounds. If this summons was disregarded, the next step was an attachment of the goods of the defendant, and in case of trespasses the attachment issued at once without a summons. If the attachment failed, a distringas issued, which was continued till he appeared. Here process ended in injuries not committed with force. In case of such injuries, an arrest of the person was provided for. See ARREST. In modern practice some of these steps are omitted; but the practice of the different states is too various to admit of tracing here the differences which have resulted from retaining different steps of the process.

In the English law, process in civil causes is called original process, when it is founded upon the original writ; and also to distinguish it from mesne or intermediate process, which issues pending the suit, upon some collateral interlocutory matter, as, to summon juries, witnesses, and the like; mesne process is also sometimes put in contradistinction to final process, or process of execution; and then it signifies all process which intervenes between the beginning and end of a suit. 3 Bla. Com. 279. See REGULAR PROCESS; OBSTRUCTING PROCESS.

No court can, at common law, exercise jurisdiction over a party unless he is served with the process within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, or voluntarily appears; 149 U. S. 194. See JURISDICTION.

As to the grant of letters patent for a process, see PATENT.

PROCESS OF INTERPLEADER. See INTERPLEADER.

PROCESS OF LAW. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

PROCESSION. A peaceable procession in the streets of a town, if lawful, and the streets are not obstructed more than is ordinarily the case under such circumstances, is not an indictable offence on the part of those composing it. 72 N. C. 25.

The peaceable procession in the streets of a religious body, known as the Salvation Army, has been held lawful, although the members were aware of the lawless intention of their opponents to make it the occasion of a riot; 26 Sol. Journ. 505. See 26 Alb. L. J. 22.

PROCESSIONING. A term used to denote the manner of ascertaining the boundaries of land, as provided for by the laws of that state. 1 Tenn. Comp. Stat. § 2020. The term is also used in North Carolina and Georgia. 3 Murph. 504; 3 Dev. 268; 79 Ga. 406.

PROCESSUM CONTINUANDO. A writ for the continuation of process after the death of the chief justice or other justices in the commission of oyer and terminer. Reg. Orig. 128.

PROCHEIN (L. Fr.). Next. A term somewhat used in modern law, and more frequently in the old law; as, prochein ami, prochein cousin. Co. Litt. 10.

PROCHEIN AMI (L. Fr.; spelled, also, prochein amy and prochain amy). Next friend (q. v.).

PROCLAMATION. The act of causing some state matters to be published or made generally known. A written or printed document in which are contained such matters, issued by proper authority: as, the president's proclamation, the governor's, the mayor's proclamation. Also used to express the public nomination made of any one to a high office: as, such a prince was proclaimed emperor.

The president's proclamation may give force to a law, when authorized by congress; as, if congress were to pass an act, which should take effect upon the happening of a contingent event, which was to be declared by the president by proclamation to have happened, in this case the proclamation would give the act the force of law, which till then it wanted. How far a proclamation is evidence of facts, see Bac. Abr. Evidence (F); Bull. N. P. 226; 12 Mod. 216; 8 How. St. Tr. 212; 4 Maule & S. 546; 2 Camp. 44; Dane, Abr. ch. 96, a. 2, 3, 4; 6 Ill. 577; Brooke, Abr. The public proclamation of pardon and amnesty has the force of public law, of which courts and officers will take notice though not specially pleaded; 145 U. S. 546. Courts take judical notice of official proclamations and messages of the governor of the state; 110 Mo. 286.

On the breaking out of war it is usual for a nation to issue a proclamation announcing the existence of hostilities. See MANIFESTO; WAR.

In Practice. The declaration made by the crier, by authority of the court, that something is about to be done.

It usually commences with the French word Oyez, do you hear, in order to attract attention: it is particularly used on the opening of the court, and at its adjournment; it is also frequently employed to discharge persons who have been accused of crimes or misdemeanors.

PROCLAMATION OF EMANCIPATION. See BONDAGE.

PROCLAMATION OF EXIGENTS. In Old English Practice. On awarding an exigent, in order to outlawry, a writ of proclamation issued to the sheriff of the county where the party dwelt, to make three proclamations for the defendant to yield himself or be outlawed.

PROCLAMATION OF A FINE. The proclamation of a fine was a notice, openly and solemnly given at all the assizes held in the county where the lands lay. It was made within one year after engrossing the fine; and anciently consisted in the fine as expressed being openly read in court sixteen times,—four times in the term in which it was made, and four times in each of the three succeeding terms. This, however, was afterwards reduced to one reading in each term. These proclamations were upon transcripts of the fine, sent by the justices of the common pleas to the justices of assize and the justices of the peace. Abb. Law Dict. See 2 Bla. Com. 352.

PROCLAMATION OF REBELLION. In Old English Practice. When a party neglected to appear upon a subpœna, or an attachment in chancery, a writ bearing this name issued; and, if he did not surrender himself by the day assigned, he was reputed and declared a rebel.

PROCLAMATOR. An officer of the English court of common pleas.

PROCREATION. The generation of children: it is an act authorized by the law of nature. One of the principal ends of marriage is the procreation of children. Inst. tit. 2, in pr.

PROCTOR. One appointed to manage the affairs of another or represent him in judgment. The authority was in writing under the hand of the principal and was called a proxy.

One who is employed to manage for another proceedings in admiralty and ecclesiastical causes.

A proctor, strictly speaking, conducts the proceeding out of court, as an English solicitor does in common-law courts; while the advocate conducts those in court. But in this country the distinction is not observed. A proctor is properly appointed in writing, but not necessarily so. Until final decree, he has entire control of the cause; but after decree he has no power except to enforce it. See Bened. Adm. § 334; W. Rob. 335. The fees of proctors are fixed by R. S. §§ 823–829; but fees not in the statute may be allowed in special cases; 7 Fed. Rep. 246; 25 id. 672.

In England under the judicature acts proctors may practise in all divisions of the supreme court of judicature.

One of the representatives of the clergy in the convocations of the two provinces of Canterbury and York in the church of England.

An official in a university whose function it is to see that good order is kept.

See QUEEN'S PROCTOR.

PROCURATION. In Civil Law. The act by which one person gives power to another to act in his place, as he could do himself. A letter of attorney.

An express procuration is one made by the express consent of the parties. An implied or tacit procuration takes place when an individual sues another managing his affairs and does not interfere to prevent it. Dig. 17. 1. 6. 2; 50. 17. 60; Code 7. 32. 2.

Procurations are also divided into those which contain absolute power, or a general authority, and those which give only a limited power. Dig. 3. 3. 58; 17. 1. 60. 4.

Procurations are ended in three ways: first, by the revocation of the authority; second, by the death of one of the parties; third, by the renunciation of the mandatory, when it is made in proper time and place and it can be done without injury to the person who gave it. Inst. 3. 27; Dig. 17. 1; Code 4, 35. See AUTHORITY; LETTER OF ATTORNEY; MANDATE; PER PROC.

PROCURATIONS. In Ecclesiastical Law. Certain sums of money which parish priests pay yearly to the bishops or archdeacons, ratione visitationis. Dig. 3. 39. 25; Ayliffe, Parerg. 429; 17 Viner, Abr. 544.

PROCURATOR. In Civil Law. A proctor; a person who acts for another by virtue of a procuration. Procurator est, qui aliena negotia mandata Domini administrat. Dig. 3. 3. 1. See ATTORNEY; AUTHORITY.

PROCURATOR FISCAL. In Scotch Law. A public prosecutor. Bell, Dict.

PROCURATOR LITIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who by command of another institutes and carries on for him a suit. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Procurator is properly used of the attorney of actor (the plaintiff), defensor of the attorney of reus (the defendant). It is distinguished from advocatus, who was one who undertook the defence of persons, not things, and who was generally the patron of the person whose defence he prepared, the person himself speaking it. It is also distinguished from cognitor who conducted the cause in the presence of his principal, and generally in cases of citizenship; whereas the procurator conducted the cause in the absence of his principal. Calvinus, Lex.

PROCURATOR IN REM SUAM. In Scotch Law. A term which imports that one is acting as attorney as to his own property. When an assignment of a thing is made, as a debt, and a procuration or power of attorney is given to the assignee to receive the same, he is in such case procurator in rem suam. 3 Stair, Inst. 1. 2. 3. etc.; Erskine, Inst. 3. 5. 2; Bell, Dict.

PROCURATORIUM (Lat.). The proxy or instrument by which a proctor is constituted and appointed.

PROCURATORY OF RESIGNATION. A proceeding by which the vassal authorized the return of the fee to his superior. Bell, Dict.

PROCURE. To contrive, effect, or bring about; to cause. 23 Neb. 45.

There is a clear legal distinction between procuring an act to be done and suffering it to be done. 2 Ben. 196.

PROCUREUR DE LA REPUBLIQUE. The name of an officer charged with the prosecution of crimes under the French procedure, corresponding to the prosecuting attorney in the United States. See JUGE D'INSTRUCTION.

PRODIGAL. In Civil Law. A person who, though of full age, is incapable of managing his affairs, and of the obligations which attend them, in consequence of his bad conduct, and for whom a curator is therefore appointed.

PRODITORIE (Law Lat.). Treasonably. This is a technical word formerly used in indictments for treason, when they were written in Latin. Tomlins.

PRODUCE. The product of natural growth, labor, or capital. The produce of a farm has been held not to include beef raised and killed thereon; 6 W. & S. 269; and yearly produce of a farm is held to be confined to crops gathered annually; 19 Conn. 513.

PRODUCE BROKER. A person occupied in buying and selling agricultural or farm products. 1 Abb. 470. See BROKER; COMMISSION MERCHANT; FACTOR.

PRODUCENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. He who produces a witness to be examined.

PRODUCTION. That which is produced or made product; fruit of labor; as the productions of the earth, comprehending all vegetables and fruits; the productions of intellect, or genius, as poems and prose compositions; the productions of art, as manufactures of every kind. 27 Ark. 567.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS. Where there is an issue either direct or collateral on the forgery of papers, courts of equity or law will compel their production for inspection in advance of trial. A party to an action at law may, before trial, maintain a bill for discovery of letters relied on by the other party to the suit and alleged to have been written by the plaintiff in the bill, but which the plaintiff alleges are forgeries. The production of private writings in which another person has an interest may be had by a bill of discovery in proper cases, or in trials at law by an order for inspection, a notice to produce or a writ of subpœna duces tecum.

The order for inspection, though now provided for by statute in most states, was within the practice of the English common-law courts at an early date. It is resorted to where documents in the possession of the other party are required for use in preparing the pleadings either by the plaintiff; 4 Bing. 539; 1 Taunt. 386; 8 Dowl. 118; 89 Hun 613; or the defendant; 2 Cr. & M. 456; 6 B. & S. 888; 1 App. Div. N. Y. 136; but an order requiring a prospective defendant to produce books at an examination by plaintiff to enable the latter to prepare his complaint is erroneous; 81 Hun 496. Where there was but one copy of an agreement between two persons, he who retained it would be compelled to produce it for the inspection of the other who might also take a copy of it, as, in the case of a partnership agreement; 1 Brod. & B. 318; or a lease; 4 Taunt. 666; or plans constituting part of an agreement sued on; 70 Fed. Rep. 337.

The practice was originally confined to cases in which there was but one copy, but it was speedily extended to any case in which the parties seeking an inspection have an interest in the document; 8 C. B. N. S. 617; nor was it necessary that it should be a single paper, but it extended to correspondence, as, a letter accepting an oral offer; id. An order for inspection might also be obtained by a defendant who suggested the alteration or forgery of the document which formed the cause of action; 2 Man. & G. 758. In such a case it was usual and proper for the application to be founded on an affidavit attacking the genuineness of the paper; 3 Cow. 17.

The right of inspection is confined to documents supporting the case of the party applying for it and does not extend to those which support the case of his opponent; 1 Myl. & K. 88; 4 Ves. 66; 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 712, and notes; nor can the right be used for the purpose of finding out the case of the other party; 6 C. B. N. S. 679; [1897] 2 Q. B. 62; or where the books applied for contain entries of a confidential, privileged nature, not relative to the action, and the legitimate information from them can be obtained at the trial, and they are in possession of the plaintiff and can be produced under subpœna; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 330; and in a libel suit an order will not be made for the production of the original manuscript where the publication is admitted: [1897] 2 Q. B. 188: [1895] 2 Q. B. 148. If, however, the party is entitled to the production of the document as being applicable to his case, his right is unaffected by the circumstance that it discloses the case of his opponent; id.; or that it is evidence for the other party's case also; 180 Pa. 14.

The right of common-law courts to order an inspection was established in England by stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, § 6, which authorized the exercise of the power where an action was pending, and documents were in the control of the other party, of which by a bill of discovery the inspection could be secured. In the United States prior to the statutes of the same character which were passed in most states, the courts were indisposed to assume the power; 6 Cow. 62; and resort was more frequently had to a bill of discovery, the use of which is now usually unnecessary except in special cases. There is no federal statute definitely applying to the subject, though Rev. Stat. §§ 724, 858, 914, provide for the production of documents at the trial and in those courts therefore to secure an inspection before the trial a bill of discovery must still be resorted to. At least it would appear that the weight of the earlier authorities confines production under the section cited to the trial; 28 Fed. Rep. 82; 32 id. 743; contra, 9 id. 577; 67 id. 18. See, also, 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 267.

As to notice to produce and subpœna duces tecum, see those titles.

Public documents are subject to the general rule that their inspection will not be ordered where it would be detrimental to the public interest; 3 Tayl. Ev., 9th ed. § 1483; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 251, 476. As to the right of inspection of public records generally, see RECORDS.

It has been held that corporation books are not open to the inspection of strangers; 8 Term 590; 8 B. & C. 375; 44 Barb. 64; or in a litigation to which the corporation is not a party; 35 Fed. Rep. 15; contra, 15 id. 716; but its members or stockholders or officers always have the right of inspection and production in their interest; 3 Pick. 108; 70 N. Y. 220; 105 Pa. 111; 40 N. J. Eq. 392; 28 La. Ann. 204; 53 Vt. 519.

An objection to the production of documents on the ground that they may tend to criminate the party ordered to produce them must be taken only to the production of the documents alleged to have that effect and not to the order; [1897] 2 Q. B. 124. A person who has obtained an order for inspection of books cannot have irrelevant parts kept concealed during the whole litigation or unsealed and resealed on oath from time to time as the books are required in business, so as to cause interruption of it; it is sufficient if irrelevant entries are covered, during the actual inspection, with the affidavit of the person producing them that nothing material has been covered; [1897] 1 Ch. 761.

The provisions for production and inspection of documents in the New Jersey common-law practice act are held to apply to the court of chancery; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 864. An order for production will be refused where the party applying refuses to state how the papers in question are material; 25 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 31.

Too great generality in the application for production of books is cured by particularizing books in the order; 12 Misc. Rep. 3.

See NOTICE TO PRODUCE PAPERS; SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM; PROFERT IN CURIA.

PRODUCTION OF SUIT (productio sectæ). The concluding clause of all declarations is, "and thereupon he brings his suit." In old pleading, this referred to the production by the plaintiff of his secta or suit, i. e. persons prepared to confirm what he had stated in the declaration. The phrase has remained; but the practice from which it arose is obsolete; 3 Bla. Com. 295; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 220.

PROFANE. That which has not been consecrated. By a profane place is understood one which is neither sacred, nor sanctified, nor religious. Dig. 11. 7. 2. 4.

PROFANELY. In a profane manner. In an indictment, under the act of assembly of Pennsylvania, against profanity, it is requisite that the words should be laid to have been spoken profanely. 11 S. & R. 394. See BLASPHEMY.

PROFANENESS, PROFANITY. In Criminal Law. A disrespect to the name of God or His divine providence. This is variously punished by statute in the several states. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 580. See BLASPHEMY.

PROFECTITUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. That which descends to us from our ascendants. Dig. 23. 3. 5.

PROFERT IN CURIA (Lat. he produces in court: sometimes written profert in curiam, with the same meaning). In Pleading. A declaration on the record that a party produces the deed under which he makes title in court. In ancient practice, the deed itself was actually produced; in modern times, the allegation only is made in the declaration, and the deed is then constructively in possession of the court; 3 Salk. 119; 6 M. & G. 277; 11 Md. 322; 67 Fed. Rep. 597.

Profert is, in general, necessary when either party pleads a deed and claims rights under it, whether plaintiff; 2 Dutch. 293; or defendant; 17 Ark. 279; to enable the court to inspect and construe the instrument pleaded, and to entitle the adverse party to oyer thereof; 10 Co. 92 b; 1 Chitty, Pl. 414; 1 Archb. Pr. 164; Andr. Steph. Pl. 160; and is not necessary when the party pleads it without making title under it; Gould, Pl. c. 7, p. 2, § 47. But a party who is actually or presumptively unable to produce a deed may plead it without profert, as in suit by a stranger; Com. Dig. Pleader, O 8: Cro. Jac. 217; Cro. Car. 441: or one claiming title by operation of law; Co. Litt. 225; Bac. Abr.

Pleas (I 12) ; 5 Co. 75 ; or where the deed is in the possession of the adverse party or is lost. In all these cases the special facts must be shown, to excuse the want of profert. See Gould, Pl. c. 8, p. 2 ; Lawes, Pl. 96 ; 1 Saund 9 a. Profert and oyer are abolished in England by the Common Law Procedure Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76 ; and a provision exists, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, for allowing inspection of all documents in the possession or under the control of the party against whom the inspection is asked. See 25 E. L. & E. 304. In many of the states of the United States profert has been abolished, and in some instances the instrument must be set forth in the pleading of the party relying upon it. The operation of profert and oyer, where allowed, is to make the deed a part of the pleadings of the party producing it ; 11 Md. 322 ; 3 Cra. 234. See 7 Cra. 176 ; PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS.

PROFESSION. A public declaration respecting something. Code 10. 41. 6. A state, art, or mystery : as, the legal profession. Dig. 1. 18. 6. 4 ; Domat, Dr. Pub. l. 1, t. 9, s. 1, n. 7.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of entering into a religious order. See 17 Viner, Abr. 545.

The term professions in a statute laying a tax includes lawyers ; 59 Ga. 187. See 41 Mich. 155 ; 19 id. 217.

PROFIT A PRENDRE. The right to take soil, gravel, minerals, and the like from the land of another. An interest in the estate. 49 Fed. Rep. 549 ; Washb. Easem. 11. This right may be the subject of a separate grant ; 85 Me. 448. It is an interest in the estate ; 22 Wend. 425 ; 70 N. Y. 419.

Profit à prendre is a peculiar species of easements. It is "the right to take something which is the produce of the land." It is in its nature an incorporeal right incapable of livery, though it is imposed upon corporeal or tangible property. It may be appurtenant to a dominant tenement, in the nature of an easement, or it may be a right in gross. It may be held apart from the possession of land, and differs therein from an easement, which requires a dominant tenement for its existence. When attached to other land it is in the nature of an easement ; when not so attached it cannot properly be said to be an easement, but is an interest or estate in the land itself. Jones, Easements § 49.

The right can be acquired only by grant or prescription. Such a right in the soil of another cannot be claimed by custom. Thus a claim by the inhabitants of a township upon the land of another to take sand, etc., from the seashore, is without foundation ; 15 C. B. N. S. 240 ; 17 N. H. 524.

The privilege of watering cattle at a pond or brook or of taking the water for domestic purposes is an easement and not a profit à prendre ; 5 Ad. & El. 758 ; the right to take seaweed from the shores is a right to a profit in the soil ; 48 Me. 100 ; and so is the right to take coal or any mineral from the land of another ; 53 Pa. 206 ; and so is a right to use lands of another to cut grass, for pasturage, for hunting, or fishing ; Jones, Easements 57 ; so is the right to take and kill game on land or water ; 9 Q. B. D. 315.

The right to profit à prendre acquired by grant or prescription as appurtenant to certain lands cannot be used as a right in gross by one not holding any connection with the land : 12 C. B. N. S. See EASEMENTS ; A PRENDRE.

PROFITS. The advance in the price of goods sold beyond the cost of purchase. See 84 N. Y. 23.

The gain made by the sale of produce or manufactures, after deducting the value of the labor, materials, rents, and all expenses, together with the interest of the capital employed.

An excess of the value of returns over the value of advances.

The excess of receipts over expenditures ; that is, net earnings. 15 Minn. 519.

The receipts of a business, deducting current expenses ; it is equivalent to net receipts. 94 U. S. 500 ; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 276.

This is a word of very extended signification. In commerce, it means the advance in the price of goods sold beyond the cost of purchase. In distinction from the wages of labor, it is well understood to imply the net return to the capital of stock employed, after deducting all the expenses, including not only the wages of those employed by the capitalist, but the wages of the capitalist himself for superintending the employment of his capital or stock. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nat. b. i. c. 6, and M'Culloch's Notes ; Mill, Polit. Econ. c. 15. After indemnifying the capitalist for his outlay, there commonly remains a surplus, which is his profit, the net income from his capital. 1 Mill, Polit. Econ. c. 15. The word profit is generally used by writers on political economy to denote the difference between the value of advances and the value of returns made by their employment.

The profit of the farmer and the manufacturer is the gain made by the sale of produce or manufactures, after deducting the value of the labor, materials, rents, and all expenses, together with the interest of the capital employed,—whether land, buildings, machinery, instruments, or money. The rents and profits of an estate, the income or the net income of it, are all equivalent expressions. The income or the net income of an estate means only the profit it will yield after deducting the charges of management ; 5 Me. 202 ; 35 id. 420.

Under the term profit is comprehended the produce of the soil, whether it arise above or below the surface : as, herbage, wood, turf, coals, minerals, stones ; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 666 ; also fish in a pond or running water. Profits are divided into profits à prendre, or those taken and enjoyed by the mere act of the proprietor himself, and profits à vendre, namely, such as are received at the hands of and rendered by another. Hamm. N. P. 172.

Profits are divided by writers on political economy into gross and net,—gross profits being the whole difference between the value of advances and the value of returns made by their employment, and net profits being so much of that difference as is attributable solely to the capital employed. The remainder of the difference, or, in other words, the gross profits minus the net profits, has no particular name; but it represents the profits attributable to industry, skill, and enterprise. See Malthus, Political Econ.; M'Culloch, Political Econ. 563. But the word profit is generally used in a less extensive signification, and presupposes an excess of the value of returns over the value of advances.

It was said by Jessel, M. R., that "there is no such thing as gross profits." See 10 App. Cas. 446. Where a life insurance company issued "participating policies" for an increased premium, agreeing at the end of every five years to give two-thirds of the "gross profits" of such policies to the policy holders, it was held that this two-thirds constituted "annual profits or gains" of the company and were assessable to income tax; 10 App. Cas. 438, per Lords Blackburn and Fitzgerald, Lord Bramwell dissenting. The case seems to disregard the nature of the return of that portion of the premium charged in advance and subsequently ascertained to have been excessive, which the companies curiously call "dividends." See DIVIDENDS; NET PROFITS; OPERATING EXPENSES.

Using profit in this more limited and popular sense, persons who share profits do not necessarily share losses; for they may stipulate for a division of gain, if any, and yet some one or more of them may, by agreement, be entitled to be indemnified against losses by the others: so that whilst all share profits, some only bear losses. Persons who share gross returns share profits in the sense of gain; but they do not by sharing the returns share losses, for these fall entirely on those making the advances. Moreover, although a division of gross returns is a division of profits if there are any, it is so only incidentally, and because such profits are included in what is divided: it is not a division of profits as such; and under an agreement for a division of gross returns, whatever is returned must be divided, whether there be profit or loss, or neither; 1 Lindl. Part. 8, 17. These considerations have led to the distinction between agreements to share profits and agreements to share gross returns, and to the doctrine that, whilst an agreement to share profits creates a partnership, an agreement to share gross returns does not. See PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

Commissions may be considered as profits, for some purposes. A participation in commissions has been held such a participation in profits as to constitute the participants partners; 2 H. Bla. 235; 4 B. & Ald. 663. So, commissions received from the sales of a pirated map are profits which must be accounted for by the commission merchant on a bill by the proprietor of the copyright; 2 Curt. C. C. 608. As between partners, all gains which equitably belong to the firm, but which are clandestinely received by one partner, are accounted profits of the firm; Story, Part. § 174; 2 Curt. C. C. 608.

Depreciation of buildings in which a business is carried on, though they were erected by expenditure of the capital invested, is not ordinarily or necessarily considered in estimating the profits; 94 U. S. 500.

In computing the profits to which a party is entitled, interest on fines, debts, and taxes should be charged off and also a proper sum for depreciation of plant; 24 N. Y. Supp. 547.

A direction or power given in a will to raise money out of the rents and profits of an estate for the payment of debts and legacies, or to raise a portion within a definite period, within which it could not be raised out of the annual rents and profits, authorizes a sale; 2 Ch. Cas. 205; 1 Vern. 104; 2 id. 26, 310, 420, 424; 1 Ves. Sen. 491. And judges in later times, looking to the inconvenience of raising a large sum of money in this manner, have inclined much to treat a trust to apply the rents and profits in raising a portion, even at an indefinite period, as authorizing a sale or mortgage; 2 Jarm. Wills, 282; 1 Ves. 284; 1 Ves. Sen. 42. But, as a general rule, the question whether the money is to be raised by a sale or mortgage or out of the annual rents and profits will depend upon the nature of the purpose for which the money is to be raised, and the general tenor of the will; 2 Jarm. Wills 383; 3 Bro. P. C. 66; 3 Yo. & J. 360; 1 Atk. 550; 1 Russ. & M. 590; 2 P. Wms. 63. The circumstances that have chiefly influenced the decisions are—the appointment of a time within which the charge cannot be raised by annual profits; the situation of the estate, where a sale or mortgage would be very prejudicial, as in the case of a reversion, especially if it would occasion any danger that the charge would not be answered in its full extent; the nature of the charge, as where it is for debts or portions, and, in the latter instance, the age or death of the child; 2 Ves. 480, n. 1; 2 Vern. 26, 72, 420; 2 P. Wms. 13, 650; 1 Atk. 506, 550; 2 id. 358. But in no case where there are subsequent restraining words has the word profit been extended; Prec. Ch. 586, note, and the cases cited there; 1 Atk. 506; 2 id. 105.

A devise of the rents and profits of land is equivalent to a devise of the land itself, and will carry the legal as well as the beneficial interest therein; 1 Ves. Sen. 171; 2 B. & Ald. 42; 9 Mass. 372; 1 Cush. 93; 1 Spenc. 142; 17 Wend. 393; 35 Me. 414; 1 Bro. C. C. 310. A direction by the testator that a certain person shall receive for his support the net profits of the land is a devise of the land itself, for such period of time as the profits were devised; 35 Me. 419.

An assignment of the profits of an estate amounts to an equitable lien, and would entitle the assignee in equity to insist upon a mortgage. Thus, if a tenant for life of the real estate should, by covenant, agree to set apart and pay the whole or a portion of the annual profits of that estate to trustees for certain objects, it would create a lien in the nature of a trust on those profits against him and all persons claiming as volunteers or with notice under him; 2 Cox, Ch. 253; s. c. 1 Ves. 477; 3 Bro. C. C. 531, 538.

Profits expected to arise from merchandise employed in maritime commerce are a proper subject of insurance in England and in the United States; 3 Kent 271; 16 Pick. 399; 1 Sumn. 451. So in Italy; Targa, cap. xliii. no. 5; Portugal; Santerna, part iii. no. 40; and the Hanse Towns; 2 Magnus 213; Beneck, Ass. chap. 1, sect. 10, vol. 1, p. 170. But in France; Code de Comm. art. 347; Holland; Rynkershoek, Quæst. Priv. Jur. lib. iv. c. 5; and in Spain, except to certain distant parts; Ordinanzas de Bilboa, ch. xxii. art. 7, 8, 11; it is illegal to insure expected profits. Such insurance is required by the course and interest of trade, and has been found to be greatly conducive to its prosperity; 3 Kent 271; 2 East 544; 1 Arn. Ins., 6th ed. 37, 205. Sometimes the profits are included in a valuation of the goods from which they are expected to arise; sometimes they are insured as profits; 1 Johns. 433; 3 Pet. 222; 1 Sumn. 45.; 6 E. & B. 312. They must be insured as profits; May, Ins. § 79. They may be insured equally by valued and by open policies; 1 Arn. Ins. 205; 3 Camp. 267. But it is more judicious to make the valuation; 1 Johns. 433; 3 Kent 273. The insured must have a real interest in the goods from which the profits are expected; 3 Kent 271; but he need not have the absolute property in them; 16 Pick. 397, 400. See May, Ins. § 79; INSURANCE.

A trustee, executor, or guardian, or other person standing in a like relation to another, may be made to account for and pay all the profits made by him in any of the concerns of his trust, as by embarking the trust funds in trade; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 465; 2 Myl. & K. 66, 672, note; Lindl. Part., Am. ed. 523; 1 Ves. 32, 41; 11 id. 61; 2 V. & B. 315; 1 J. & W. 122, 131; 2 Will. Exec. 139, n.; 1 S. & R. 245; 1 Maule & S. 412; 2 Bro. C. C. 400; 10 Pick. 77; Lind. Part.

The expected profits of a special contract may be reckoned as a part of the damages for a failure to fulfil it, where it appears that such profits would have accrued from the contract itself as the direct and immediate consequence of its fulfilment; 13 How. 307, 344; 7 Cush. 516, 522; 8 Exch. 401; 16 N. Y. 489; Mayne, Dam. 15; 2 C. B. N. S. 592; 90 Ga. 416; 9 Utah 175; 66 Hun 631; 83 Wis. 309; 92 Mich. 606; 88 id. 390. But where the profits are such only as were expected to result from other independent bargains actually entered into on the faith of such special contract, or for the purposes of fulfilling it, or are contingent upon future bargains or speculations or states of the market, they are too remote and uncertain to be relied upon as a proper basis of damages; 13 How. 307, 344; 38 Me. 361; 7 Cush. 516, 522; 7 Hill 61; 13 C. B. 358. See, also, 21 Pick. 378, 381; 1 Pet. C. C. 85, 94; 3 Wash. C. C. 184; 1 Pet. 172; 11 S. & R. 445; 48 Ill. App. 26. Profits may be recovered as damages for the breach of a contract, where they are not uncertain or remote, or where, from the terms of the contract itself or the special circumstances under which it was made, it may be reasonably presumed that they were within the intent and mutual understanding of both parties at the time the contract was made; 139 U. S. 199; 153 id. 540. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES; PATENT.

A purchaser is entitled to the profits of the estate from the time fixed upon for completing the contract, whether he does or does not take possession of the estate; 2 Sugd. Vend. ch. 16, sect. 1, art. 1; 6 Dana 298; 3 Gill 82. See 12 M. & W. 761.

Under what circumstances a participation or sharing in profits will make one a partner in a trade or adventure, see PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

PROGRESSION (Lat. progressio; from pro and gredior, to go forward). That state of a business which is neither the commencement nor the end. Some act done after the matter has commenced and before it is completed. Plowd. 343. See CONSUMMATION; INCEPTION.

PROHIBITIO DE VASTO DIRECTA PARTI. A judicial writ which was formerly addressed to a tenant, prohibiting him from waste pending suit. Reg. Jud. 21.

PROHIBITION (Lat. prohibitio; from pro and habeo, to hold back). Forbidden to do; inhibition; interdiction. 74 Md. 545.

In Practice. The name of a writ issued by a superior court, directed to the judge and parties of a suit in an inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution of the same, upon a suggestion that the cause originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognizance of some other court. 3 Bla. Com. 112; Com. Dig.; Bac. Abr.; Viner, Abr.; 2 Sell. Pr. 308; Ayliffe, Parerg. 434; 2 H. Bla. 533; 4 Wash. 655; 142 U. S. 479; 147 id. 14.

The writ of prohibition may also be issued when, having jurisdiction, the court has attempted to proceed by rules differing from those which ought to be observed; Bull. N. P. 219; or when by the exercise of its jurisdiction, the inferior court would defeat a legal right; 2 Chitty, Pr. 355; or to prevent a judge from granting a new trial after expiration of the trial term; 113 Mo. 42.

A writ of prohibition is a civil remedy given in a civil action, even when instituted to arrest a criminal prosecution; 129 U. S. 104; and only lies in case of the unlawful exercise of judicial functions; 31 W. Va. 617; 2 Hill 367; 41 Mo. 44; 33 Wis. 93; 36 Barb. 341.

The writ of prohibition issues only in cases of extreme necessity, and before it can be granted, it must appear that the party aggrieved has applied in vain for redress; and it is never allowed except in cases of usurpation or abuse of power, and not then unless other existing remedies are inadequate to afford relief, or no other remedy exists; 30 W. Va. 532; 40 La. Ann. 837. When a writ of error or appeal furnishes a complete and effective remedy, a writ of prohibition will not be issued; 98 Mo. 252; 40 La. Ann. 837; 46 id. 29; 78 Ga. 683; 84 Va. 696. Prohibition will not issue after judgment and sentence unless want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the proceedings, but before judgment the supreme court can examine not simply the process and pleadings of record, but also the facts and evidence upon which action was taken; 143 U. S. 472, 513, 515.

A writ of prohibition will not be issued to restrain a district court from taking jurisdiction of a petition of the owner of a barge for the benefit of the limited liability act; 146 U. S. 357.

When a party aggrieved by a judgment has an appeal to the supreme court which becomes inefficacious through his neglect, a writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent the enforcement of the judgment; 143 U. S. 472, 513.

"Where it appears that the court whose action is sought to be prohibited has clearly no jurisdiction of the cause originally, or of some collateral matter arising therein, a party who has objected to the jurisdiction at the outset and has no other remedy is entitled to a writ of prohibition as a matter of right. But where there is another legal remedy by appeal or otherwise, or where the question of the jurisdiction of the court is doubtful, or depends on facts which are not made matter of record, or where the application is made by a stranger, the granting or refusal of the writ is discretionary. Nor is the granting of the writ obligatory where the case has gone to sentence, and the want of jurisdiction does not appear upon the face of the proceedings." See 155 U. S. 402, followed in 166 U. S. 110.

The supreme court of Mississippi has revisory jurisdiction only and cannot grant a writ of prohibition to circuit courts; 47 Miss. 200, 668.

The term prohibition is also applied to the interdiction of making and of selling or giving away, intoxicating liquors, either absolutely or for other than medicinal, scientific, and religious (sacramental) purposes. Anderson's L. Dict. See LIQUOR LAWS.

PROHIBITIVE IMPEDIMENTS. Those impediments to a marriage which are only followed by a punishment but do not render the marriage null. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law 44.

PROJET. In International Law. The draft of a proposed treaty or convention.

PROLES (Lat.). Progeny; such issue as proceeds from a lawful marriage; and, in its enlarged sense, it signifies any children.

PROLETARIUS. In Civil Law. One who had no property to be taxed, and paid a tax only on account of his children (proles); a person of mean or common extraction. The word has become, in French, prolétaire signifying one of the common people; and in English proletariat.

PROLICIDE (Lat. proles, offspring, cædere, to kill). In Medical Jurisprudence. A word used to designate the destruction of the human offspring. Jurists divide the subject into fœticide, or the destruction of the fœtus in utero, and infanticide, or the destruction of the new-born infant. Ryan, Med. Jur. 137.

PROLIXITY. The unnecessary and superfluous statement of facts in pleading or in evidence. This will be rejected as impertinent. 7 Price 278, n.

PROLOCUTOR (Lat. pro and loquor, to speak before). In Ecclesiastical Law. The president or chairman of a convocation.

The speaker of the house of lords is called the prolocutor. The office belongs to the lord chancellor by prescription; 3 Steph. Com. 347.

PROLONGATION. Time added to the duration of something.

When the time is lengthened during which a party is to perform a contract, the sureties of such a party are, in general, discharged, unless the sureties consent to such prolongation. See GIVING TIME.

In the civil law the prolongation of time to the principal did not discharge the surety; Dig. 2. 14. 37; 12. 1. 40.

PROLYTÆ (Lat.). In Roman Law. The term used to denominate students of law during the fifth and last year of their studies. They were left during this year very much to their own direction, and took the name prolytæ, omnino soluti. They studied chiefly the Code and the imperial constitutions. See Dig. Pref. Prim. Const. 2; Calvinus, Lex.

PROMATERTERA (Lat.). Great maternal aunt; the sister of one's grandmother. Inst. 3. 6. 3; Dig. 38. 10. 10. 14.

PROMISE (Lat. promitto, to put forward). An engagement by which the promisor contracts with another to perform or do something to the advantage of the latter.

Within the statute of frauds a promise to pay the debt of another is an undertaking by a person not before liable, for the purpose of securing or performing the same duty for which the party for whom the undertaking is made, continues liable. 60 Conn. 71.

When an oral promise is made, all that is said at the time in relation to it must be considered; if, therefore, a man promises to pay all he owes, accompanied by a denial that he owes anything, no action will lie to enforce such a promise; 15 Wend. 187.

Strictly speaking a promise is not a representation; the failure to make it good may give a cause of action, but it is not a false representation, which will authorize the rescission of a contract; 96 Ala. 564.

And when the promise is conditional, the condition must be performed before it becomes of binding force; 7 Johns. 36. See CONDITION; CONTRACTS; 5 East 17; 2 Leon. 224; 4 B. & Ald. 595.

PROMISE OF MARRIAGE. A contract mutually entered into by a man and a woman that they will marry each other. Every marriage is necessarily preceded by an express or implied contract of this description, as a wedding cannot be agreed upon and celebrated at one and the same instant; Addison, Contr. 1196.

When a man and a woman agree to marry and subsequently either one refuses, the other may bring suit for damages, such suits being called breach of promise suits. It is no defence to an action for breach of promise that the defendant was married if the plaintiff did not have knowledge of such fact; 60 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 222; 133 N. Y. 623. If a man refuse to marry a woman she need not make a demand before bringing action; 77 Wisc. 663. Before the Reformation no action for breach of promise could be maintained, for marriage was a matter of spiritual jurisdiction. It was not till the middle of the seventeenth century that marriage was recognized by our law as a temporal benefit, and a breach of promise as cognizable by the temporal courts; 20 Q. B. D. 494, 504, 505.

A promise of marriage is not to be likened to an actual marriage. The latter, as has been seen in the article on marriage, is not a contract, but a legal relation; while the former is an executory contract in the strict sense of the term, and governed in general by the ordinary law of contracts, though it has certain peculiarities of its own. As in other contracts, the parties must be sui juris. If, therefore, the man or the woman be an infant, or labor under any other legal disability, he or she will not be bound by a promise of marriage; but if one of the parties be an infant and the other be an adult, the promise will be binding upon the latter; Stra. 937; 5 Cow. 475; 7 id. 22; 5 Sneed 659; 1 D. Chipm. 252; 42 Ill. App. 511. A promise made during infancy may be ratified after the infant attains majority. A late English statute requires a new and distinct contract, after majority, in order to bind the infant on his promise to marry after he comes of age; but a new contract may be inferred from continued acceptance of the engagement; L. R. 5 C. P. 410; and see 4 C. P. Div. 485. Neither does it follow, as we shall see presently, that a promise of marriage is not binding because the parties to the promise cannot form a valid marriage; they may be competent to contract, though not competent to marry.

There must be a legal and valid consideration; but as there are always mutual promises, they are a sufficient consideration for each other. There must be a meeting of the minds of the parties, i. e. a request or proposition on the one side, and an assent on the other. If the communications between the parties are verbal, the only questions which usually arise relate to evidence and proof. The very words or time or manner of the promise need not be proved, but it may be inferred from the conduct of the parties, and from the circumstances which usually attend an engagement to marry: as, visiting, the understanding of friends and relations, preparations for marriage, and the reception of the man by the woman's family as a suitor; 3 Salk. 16; 15 Mass. 1; 2 D. & C. 282; Leake, Contr. 210; 13 Pa. 331; 1 Ohio St. 26; 2 C. & P. 553; 6 Cow. 254; 26 Conn. 398; 4 Zabr. 291; 65 Vt. 273. But as to the evidence of a contract to marry, more direct proof is now commonly required than formerly, since modern statutes permit parties themselves to take the stand; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 43. Therefore a promise cannot be inferred from devoted attention, frequent visits, and apparently exclusive attention; 53 N. Y. 267; nor from mere presents or letters not to the point; see 2 Brewst. 487; [1891] 2 Q. B. 534; nor from the plaintiff's wedding preparations, unknown to the defendant; 48 Ind. 562; 63 Ill. 41; nor from the woman's unexplained possession of an engagement ring; 2 Brewst. 487. See, generally, 53 N. Y. 267.

A later New York case holds that under the law allowing parties to an action to testify, a promise of marriage cannot be inferred from the mere proof of circumstances such as usually attend an engagement to marry. In the absence of fraud, there must be proof of an actual contract; a meeting of minds of the two parties. Courtship alone or mere intention to marry is not enough. Thorough acquaintance with character, habits, and disposition is essential in order to enter into such a contract intelligently, and an opportunity must be allowed to form the acquaintance which is required, without raising the inference of a contract; 151 N. Y. 598. Mere courtship is not an agreement to marry; 14 Am. R. 111; 63 Am. Dec. 529; 63 Ill. 41.

When the parties are at a distance from each other, and the offer is made by letter, it will be presumed to continue for a reasonable time for the consideration of the party addressed; and if accepted within a reasonable time, and before it is expressly revoked, the contract is then complete; 1 Pars. Contr. 84. No particular form of word is necessary; 53 N. Y. 267.

A promise of marriage is not within the third clause of the fourth section of the statute of frauds, relating to agreements made upon consideration of marriage; but if not to be performed within a year, it has been held to be within the fifth clause, and must, therefore, be in writing in order to be binding; 1 Ld. Raym. 387; 58 Ind. 29; 2 N. H. 515. But the later cases are inclined to construe the statute so as not to affect promises to marry; 56 Me. 187; 20 Conn. 495; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 44; the marriage may be performed within a year, and that is enough. See 85 Ill. 222.

If no time be fixed and agreed upon for the performance of the contract, it is, in contemplation of law, a contract to marry within a reasonable period, considering the circumstances of the age, pecuniary means, etc., of the contracting parties, and either party may call upon the other to fulfil the engagement, and in case of default may bring an action for damages. If both lie by for an unreasonable period, and do not treat the contract as continuing, it will be deemed to be abandoned by mutual consent. If the parties are somewhat advanced in years, and the marriage is appointed to take place at a remote period of time, the contract would be voidable at the option of either party, as in restraint of marriage; Addison, Contr. 678. The fact that the plaintiff consented to a two years' postponement of the wedding-day does not relieve defendant from his promise; 71 Hun 137.

Upon a refusal to marry, an action lies at once, although the time set for the marriage has not come; Leake, Contr. 752; 42 N. Y. 246; 60 N. Y. Super. Ct. 222; so if a party puts it out of his power to perform his promise of marriage; 27 Mich. 217; 15 M. & W. 189. An action lies when one party has given notice that he will not fulfil his promise, although the time for fulfilment has not arrived; L. R. 8 C. P. 167. See PERFORMANCE. A refusal to fulfil the contract may be as well manifested by acts as by words. After the lapse of a reasonable time, if one party, without excuse, neglects or refuses to fulfil his promise, the other may consider this a breach and sue; 42 Mich. 346. It is sufficient if plaintiff shows that defendant has violated his promise by refusing to marry her, without averring or proving an offer on her part to marry defendant; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 346. See 71 Wis. 663.

It has been said that the action has curious points of affinity with actions of tort, one of which is a very large discretion given to the jury as to damages; Poll. Torts 184; and damages are often given which are, in fact, exemplary; L. R. 1 C. P. 331. The amount awarded is usually estimated according to plaintiff's loss of reputation, wealth, social position, and prospects in life, as well as the endurance of mortification, pain, or disgrace; 12 Ohio St. 313; 53 Wis. 462; 8 Barb. 323; 58 Mo. 600; 52 Mich. 336.

The defences which may be made to an action for a breach of promise of marriage are, of course, various; but it is only necessary to notice in this place such as are in some degree peculiar. Thus, if either party has been convicted of an infamous crime, or has sustained a bad reputation generally, and the other was ignorant of it at the time of the engagement, or if the woman has committed fornication, and this was unknown at the time to the man who promised to marry her, or if the woman prove unchaste subsequently; 77 Pa. 504; 51 Ill. 288; or if the woman is deeply involved in debt at the time of the engagement, and the fact is kept secret from her intended husband; Add. Contr. 680; but see 1 E. B. & E. 7, 96; or if false representations are made by the woman, or by her friends in collusion with her, as to her circumstances and situation in life and the amount of her fortune and marriage portion, either of these will constitute a good defence; 1 C. & P. 350, 529; 3 Esp. 236; 44 Me. 164; 1 C. & K. 463; 3 Bingh. N. C. 54; 5 La. Ann. 316; 18 Ill. 44. But it has been held not to be a defence that the plaintiff at the time of the engagement was under an engagement to marry another person, unless the prior engagement was fraudulently concealed; 1 E. B. & E. 796. But see 2 Pars. Contr. 550. And the defendant's pre-engagement would be no defence; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 48. It is not justification of a breach of promise to marry a woman, to show that she has been heard to use obscene language; 8 Can. L. J. 426; and where marriage between cousins is not forbidden by statute, such relationship will not mitigate or excuse a breach of promise to marry; 78 Wis. 72. A bare offer of marriage is not a defence to a prosecution for seduction; it must be accepted; 50 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 800; but the contrary was held in 27 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 815, which is said to be the only case sustaining that view; 57 Alb. L. J. 51. The general rule is undoubtedly that nothing short of actual marriage is a bar; 79 Ia. 703; 82 id. 393; 118 Mo. 181; 97 Cal. 448.

If after the engagement either party is guilty of gross misconduct, inconsistent with the character which he or she was fairly presumed to possess, the other party will be released; 4 Esp. 256; so if either party is guilty of acts of unchastity after the making the promise, the other party will be absolved; 51 Ill. 288; 77 Pa. 504; but mutual improprieties and lewdness between the parties will not be allowed to bar the action or to go in mitigation or aggravation of damages; 3 Pittsb. 84; or excuse the performance of the contract; 107 Mo. 471. If the engagement is made without any agreement respecting the woman's property, and she afterwards disposes of any considerable portion of it without her intended husband's knowledge and consent, or if she insists upon having her property settled to her own separate use, it is said that this will justify him in breaking off the engagement; Add. Contr. 1201. So, if the situation and position of either of the parties as regards his or her fitness for the marriage relation is materially and permanently altered for the worse (whether with or without the fault of such party) after the engagement, this will release the other party. Thus, if one of the parties is attacked by blindness, or by an incurable disease, or any malady calculated permanently to impair and weaken the constitution, this will dispense with the performance of the contract on the part of the other party; Add. Contr. 1199; Pothier, Tr. du Mar. no. 1, 60, 61, 63. (In 1 Abb. App. Dec. 282, it was held that evidence that the plaintiff drank intoxicating liquors to excess was not admissible as a defence.) Whether it will also constitute a defence for the party afflicted, is a question of much difficulty. In 1 E. B. & E. 746, 765, where it appeared that the defendant since the engagement had become afflicted with consumption, whereby he was rendered incapable of marriage without great danger of his life, it was held, by six judges against five, that this constituted no defence; though it seemed to be agreed that it would have been a good defence for the other party.

The common opinion that an agreement to marry between persons incapable of forming a valid marriage is necessarily void, is erroneous. If the disability pertains only to one of the parties, and the other party was ignorant of it at the time of the engagement, it will constitute no defence for the former. Thus, if a man who already has a wife living makes a promise of marriage to another woman who is ignorant of the former marriage, he will be liable in damages for a breach of his promise, although a performance is impossible; Leake, Contr. 597; 2 C. & P. 553; 7 C. B. 999; 5 Exch. 775; 29 Barb. 22; 106 Mass. 339; 60 Hun 578. Otherwise, if the woman knew at the time the engagement to marry was entered into, that the man was married; 39 N. J. L. 133; 63 Ill. 99. Knowledge that the man was married, obtained by the woman subsequently to the engagement to marry, is not a defence, but may go in mitigation of damages; 1 Heisk. 368.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage, the court will not interfere with the discretion of the jury as to the amount of damages, unless there has been some obvious error or misconception on their part, or it is made apparent that they have been actuated by improper motives; 1 C. B. N. S. 660; 1 Y. & J. 477; 26 Conn. 398. And if the defendant has undertaken to rest his defence, in whole or in part, on the general bad character or the criminal conduct of the plaintiff, and fails altogether in the proof, the jury may take this into consideration as enhancing the damages; 6 Cow. 254; 27 Mo. 600. Where such an action is brought by a woman, she may prove, in aggravation of damages, that the defendant, under color of a promise of marriage, has seduced her; 106 id. 395; S. C. 8 Am. Rep. 838, n.; 42 Mich. 346; S. C. 36 Am. Rep. 442; 37 Wisc. 46; 33 Md. 288; S. C. 3 Am. Rep. 174; L. R. 1. C. P. 331; 8 Barb. 323; 2 Ind. 402; 3 Mass. 73; 75 Tex. 352. But see, contra, 2 Pa. 80, commented on in 11 id. 316; 1 R. I. 493. And misconduct, showing that the plaintiff would be an unfit companion in married life, may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages; 1 Abb. App. Dec. 282. The defendant may show that his failure to marry the plaintiff proceeded from opposition by his mother to the marriage; 24 N. Y. 252; or that he was afflicted with an incurable disease at the time of his breach of the promise to marry, in mitigation of damages; 51 Ill. 288; 129 Ind. 430. Evidence that the general character of the plaintiff for chastity previously to the engagement was bad, is admissible in mitigation of damages; 71 Pa. 240; 4 Mo. App. 94; 2 Bradw. 236; so is indelicate conduct (not criminal) of plaintiff before the promise was made; 7 Wend. 142. Evidence of the defendant's financial standing is admissible; 42 Mich. 346; S. C. 36 Am. Rep. 442; so of his social position; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 49.

See 21 Alb. L. J. 327; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 40; 5 So. L. Rev. N. S. 57; Maccola, Breach of Promise; Bishop, M. & D. chap. xi.

PROMISEE. A person to whom a promise has been made.

In general, a promisee can maintain an action on a promise made to him; but when the consideration moves not from the promisee, but some other person, the latter, and not the promisee, has a cause of action, because he is the person for whose use the contract was made; Latch 272; Cro. Jac. 77; 1 T. Raym. 271, 368; 4 B. & Ad. 435; 1 N. & M. 303; Cowp. 437; Dougl. 142. But see Carth. 5; 2 Ventr. 307; 9 M. & W. 92, 96.

PROMISES. When a defendant has been arrested, he is frequently induced to make confession in consequence of promises made to him that if he will tell the truth he will be either discharged or favored; in such a case, evidence of the confession cannot be received, because, being obtained by the flattery of hope, it comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it; 1 Mass. 144; 1 Leach 299. This is the principle; but what amounts to a promise is not so easily defined. See CONFESSION.

The promisor is bound to fulfil his promise, unless when it is contrary to law, as a promise to steal or to commit an assault and battery; when the fulfilment is prevented by the act of God, as where one has agreed to teach another drawing and he loses his sight, so that he cannot teach it; when the promisee prevents the promisor from doing what he agreed to do; when the promisor has been discharged from his promise by the promisee; when the promise has been made without a sufficient consideration; and perhaps in some other cases.

PROMISSORY NOTE. A written promise to pay a certain sum of money, at a future time, unconditionally. 7 W. & S. 264; 2 Humphr. 143; 10 Wend. 675; 1 Ala. 233; 7 Mo. 42; 2 Cow. 536; 6 N. H. 364; 7 Vern. 22; 112 Mo. 251; the form of a promissory note is unessential, provided it contain the essential ingredients thereof. See 50 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 713.

An unconditional written promise, signed by the maker, to pay absolutely and at all events, a sum certain in money, either to the bearer or to a person therein designated or his order. Benj. Chalm. Bills § 271.

A promissory note differs from a mere acknowledgment of a debt without any promise to pay, as when the debtor gives his creditor an I O U. See 2 Yerg. 50; 15 M. & W. 23. But see 2 Humphr. 143; 6 Ala. N. S. 373. In its form it usually contains a promise to pay, at a time therein expressed, a sum of money to a certain person therein named or to his order, for value received. It is dated and signed by the maker. It is never under seal; 9 Hun 931; even when made by a corporation; 15 Wend. 265; 3 Houst. 288; 8 Fed. Rep. 408. But in L. R. 3 Ch. Ap. 758, it was held that a "debenture" under a corporate seal was provable against the company by the indorsee, free from equities between the payee and the corporation, and, semble, that it was a promissory note. In 15 R. I. 121, it was held that a paper seal of a corporation on an instrument in the form of a promissory note should be regarded as "mere excess." No particular form of words is necessary; but there must be an intention to make a note; see 15 M. & W. 29; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc. 274; and it should amount in legal effect to an absolute promise to pay money; 75 Cal. 268.

He who makes this promise is called the maker, and he to whom it is made is the payee; 3 Kent 46. A writing in the form of a note payable to the maker's order, becomes a note by indorsement; 22 Pa. 89. A note payable to the maker's order, and indorsed by him in blank, is, in legal effect, a note payable to bearer and is transferable by delivery; 6 C. C. App. 423.

Although a promissory note in its original shape bears no resemblance to a bill of exchange, yet when indorsed it is exactly similar to one; for then it is an order by the indorser of the note upon the maker to pay the indorsee. The indorser is as it were the drawer; the maker, the acceptor; and the indorsee, the payee; 4 Burr. 669; 4 Term 148; 3 Burr. 1224.

Most of the rules applicable to bills of exchange equally affect promissory notes. No particular form is requisite to these instruments: a promise to deliver the money, or to be accountable for it, or that the payee shall have it, is sufficient; Chitty, Bills 53.

There are two principal qualities essential to the validity of a note: first, that it be payable at all events, not dependent on any contingency; 20 Pick. 132; nor payable out of any particular fund; 3 J. J. Marsh. 170, 542; 5 Ark. 441; 2 Blackf. 48; 1 Bibb 503; 9 Miss. 393; 3 Pick. 541; 4 Hawks 102; 5 How. 382. Second, it is required that it be for the payment of money only; 10 S. & R. 94; 47 Wisc. 551; 27 Mich. 191; 35 Me. 364; 11 Vt. 268 (though statutes in some states have made notes payable in merchandise negotiable); that is, in whatever is legal tender at the place of payment; 2 Ames, Bills 828; and not in bank-notes; though it has been held differently in the state of New York; 9 Johns. 120; 19 id. 144. The rule on this subject is said to be more strict in England than here, but to have been relaxed there in 2 Q. B. Div. 194. It is said that the tendency here is to use the term money in a very wide sense; Benj. Chalm. Bills, 2d Am. ed. 10.

A promissory note payable to order or bearer passes by indorsement, and although a chose in action, the holder may bring suit on it in his own name. Although a simple contract, a sufficient consideration is implied from the nature of the instrument. See 5 Com. Dig. 133, n., 151, 472; 4 B. & C. 235; 1 C. & M. 16. It has been urged that, upon principle, negotiable instruments are contracts binding by their own force, and therefore not requiring any consideration; Langd. Contr. § 49. When the back of a note is covered by various indorsements, an assignment of the note, written on a piece of paper pasted to the note, will pass the legal title. See INDORSEMENT.

A negotiable instrument payable to bearer is one which, by custom of trade, passes from hand to hand by delivery, and the holder of which for the time being, if he is a bona fide holder for value without notice, has a good title, notwithstanding any defect in title in the person from whom he took it; [1891] 1 Ch. 270.

As to whether a stipulation in an instrument, otherwise in the form of a promissory note, for the payment of an attorney's fee for the collection of the note in case of dishonor renders the instrument non-negotiable, see BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

A promissory note on the face of which, across one end, is written an agreement that the note will be renewed at maturity, is not negotiable; 126 Pa. 194; nor is one indorsed "without recourse"; 59 Fed Rep. 853.

A promissory note does not discharge the debt for which it is given unless such be the agreement of the parties; it only operates to extend the period for the payment of the debt; 131 U. S. 287. The holder of a note which is destroyed may recover on the note without giving a bond of indemnity; 47 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 1037. See, also, 9 Wheat. 558; 16 N. Y. 582; 21 Grat. 556; contra, 4 Cal. 37; 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 122; 1 Humph. 145. See 7 B. & C. 90.

As to promises to pay a debt in specific articles, see 21 Am. Dec. 422.

See BILL OF EXCHANGE; INDORSEMENT; NOTICE; PAYMENT; Dan. Neg. Instr.; Ames, Bills & Notes; Byles, Bills.

PROMOTERS. Those who, in popular and penal actions, prosecute offenders in their own name and the king's.

Persons or corporations at whose instance private bills are introduced into and passed through parliament. Especially those who press forward bills for the taking of land for railways and other public purposes, who are then called promoters of the undertaking.

Persons who assist in organizing joint stock companies or corporations. Mozl. & W.

It has been said to be a term usefully summing up in a single word a number of business operations familiar to the commercial world, by which a company is generally brought into existence; 28 W. R. 351. One who does an act with reference to the formation of a company or in aid of its organization, is, as regards that act, a promoter of the company. Lloyd, Corp. Liab. for Acts of Prom. 17. It applies to any person who takes an active part in inducing the formation of a company, whether he afterwards becomes connected with the company or not; 97 Cal. 610. See 89 Va. 455.

Promoters stand in a relation of trust and confidence to the intended company, and are bound to exercise uberrima fides; Lloyd Corp. Liab. 18; 64 Pa. 43; L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 372; their acts are carefully scrutinized; L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218; they are precluded from making a secret advantage over the other stockholders; 64 Pa. 43.

The relation of promoters to the company has been considered as similar to that of a trustee to a beneficiary; 25 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 505; 6 Ch. Div. 371; or of an agent to a principal; id.; or as analogous to that of partners; 64 Pa. 43.

As between themselves, the relation has been said to be that of partners; 86 Mo. 382; 2 Rawle 359; contra, 34 Minn. 355; or to be rather that of agency; 55 Mo. 315; promoters may, in fact, be partners. It has also been held that their relation towards each other is that of principal and agent; each is liable for such contracts as he authorizes; 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 826.

As to the liability of a corporation in regard to any contract made by its promoters on its behalf (supposing the contract to be one which the corporation, after its organization, could legally have made), these rules have been laid down by a writer in 16 Am. L. Rev. 281.

I. As long as the contract remains executory on both sides, the party who contracted with the promoter cannot enforce the contract against the corporation, unless the corporation has ratified the same; and the corporation cannot enforce the contract against the other contracting party without carrying out all the engagements entered into with the other contracting party at the time of making the contract.

II. When a contract made by a promoter on behalf of a future corporation has been ratified and performed by the latter, it may force the party who contracted with the promoter to perform on his side.

III. When the contract has been executed by the other contracting party, the corporation should be held to perform on its side, if (1) it has ratified the contract, or (2) voluntarily accepted the benefit arising from the performance of the contract in such a manner as to estop the corporation from denying that it has ratified the contract. But on the other hand if the benefit from the contract came to the corporation without any voluntary action on its part, or on the part of those whose acts in regard to the subject-matter of the contract are to be regarded as the acts of the corporation, then there is no principle in law or in equity on which it can be compelled to carry out engagements entered into without its authority, and which it has never even impliedly ratified.

A promoter though he purport to act on behalf of a projected corporation cannot bind it by acts performed before it came into existence; 86 Tex. 350; also 44 Ark. 383; 63 Mo. App. 477; 29 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 878; 19 N. Y. Supp. 592; 134 N. Y. 197; 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 584; 43 id. (Oreg.) 719. It has been said in one case, 143 N. Y. 430, that this rule does not apply to a private corporation; 9 N. Y. Supp. 184. The rule does not apply when there was a de facto corporation in existence when the acts were performed; 93 Ill. 153; or when the charter provides that the company shall be liable; 129 Mo. 106; 103 N. Y. 58. "Except as a fiction, therefore, this doctrine that a company can be bound before it is formed, and enters upon its corporate life 'cum onere,' must be regarded as unfounded in principle. . . . It is discredited in England and has not been followed (as far as can be ascertained) since the decision in 2 Macq. H. of L. 393. The American authorities repudiate it." Lloyd, Corp. Liab. for Acts of Prom. 42, citing 5 H. L. 605. The fact that all the stockholders were promoters and entered into the contract, does not make it binding upon the company when formed; 33 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 327; 37 Ark. 164; but see 2 Nev. 257. A corporation cannot, by ratification, become liable on a contract made by its promoters before it came into existence; L. R. 2 C. P. 175; L. R. 9 C. P. 503; 86 Tex. 350; contra, 59 Conn. 272; 21 Neb. 621; 129 Mo. 106; 50 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 776; such ratification, if binding, would date back to the original agreement; 59 Conn. 272. It has been held that the company may "adopt" the original contract and thus become liable under it; 86 Tex. 350; 103 N. Y. 58; 141 Mass. 145; but see 150 Mass. 248; 72 Ill. 531. But adoption is, in effect, the making of a new contract on the same terms as the old; L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 16; 51 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 216. It has been held that estoppel will constitute a ground of liability; 40 Md. 395; 86 Tex. 350.

Where a promoter has contracted for something to be performed after incorporation, the company, if it accept performance, with knowledge of the facts, is liable; 141 Mass. 145; L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 156; 143 N. Y. 430. Where the performance is partly before and partly after incorporation, the company may, by acceptance, render itself liable; 51 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 216; but see 86 Tex. 350, where services were rendered, under different contracts, before and after incorporation, and a recovery was allowed for the latter and not for the former.

A vote of the directors (under a clause in the articles of association) that the promoter's preliminary expenses be paid, was held not a ground of recovery; L. R. 9 C. P. 503; but see 59 Conn. 272; and a vote of the directors that "the agreement of purchase be ratified" was held not to bind the corporation; L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 125.

A recovery for work done before incorporation, at the request of a promoter, has been allowed on the ground of a quasi-contractual obligation; 13 N. Y. Supp. 583; but see 27 Conn. 170; 65 Ill. 328; L. R. 9 C. P. 503; 86 Tex. 350. See Keener, Quasi-Contracts.

Ratification may be express, or may be implied from the voluntary acceptance of the benefit of the contract, whereby an estoppel is worked. See 12 N. H. 205; 15 Barb. 323. See, also, 7 Ch. Div. 368; L. R. 2 C. P. 174. A corporation cannot enforce a subscription to shares made before its formation on the faith of certain promises of its promoters, without fulfilling the promises; 10 N. Y. 550.

Promoters are personally liable on contracts made by them for the intended company when the latter proves abortive; L. R. 2 C. P. 174; and also for subscriptions paid in to an abortive company, and that without any deduction for expenses incurred; Beach, Priv. Corp. 159; 3 B. & C. 814.

A promoter is not liable ex contractu to a person who has been induced by his fraud to take shares in a company, but he may be liable ex delicto; 2 E. & B. 476. Promoters are liable in damages to subscribers whose subscriptions are obtained by fraud; 42 Vt. 389; 66 N. Y. 558; a bill in equity lies to recover back money which a person has been induced, through fraud, to invest in a bubble; 2 P. Wms. 153. As against a person acting as promoter, the corporation is entitled to the full benefit of all acts done and contracts made by him while acting in that capacity; and the promoter, as between himself and the corporation, is entitled to no secret profits; he may not purchase property for the corporation, and then sell the same to the corporation at an advance; 61 Pa. 202; 5 Ch. Div. 73, 395; 6 id. 371. Where one has already purchased a certain property at a good bargain, it is no fraud to organize a company and sell the property to it at an advance; Thomp. Liab. of Off. 222. See 1 Ch. Div. 182; 4 Hun 192. But if at the time of making the sale he occupies towards the corporation a position of trust, as promoter or otherwise, it would seem that he should not be allowed to sell at an exorbitant price; 16 Am. L. Rev. 289; but see 64 Penn. 43; and he should faithfully state to the company all material facts relating to the property which would influence it in deciding as to the purchase; Thomp. Liab. of Off. 219; L. R. 5 Eq. 464. See 2 Lind. Part. 580.

The writer quoted (Lloyd, Corp. Liab. for Acts of Prom.) states four propositions as the result of the cases as to the relation between the corporation and its promoters: 1. Where a promoter buys property intending to sell it to the company (already in process of formation) he cannot make a profit on the transaction without the fullest disclosure; L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 918. 2. Where one owns property he is at liberty to form a company and sell it at any price and without disclosing his profit, providing he make no fraudulent misrepresentations; 64 Pa. 43. 3. Where one buys property and soon after begins to promote a company, and declares that he bought the property for the company, and effects a sale to the company, he is liable for any profit made, on the ground that he has alleged that he acted as an agent in the matter; 61 Pa. 202. 4. If the promoter receive a gift or commission from the vendors of the property for arranging a sale to the company, he must account therefor; L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 918.

Where a promoter acts as the agent of the company, if he is under no special duty to purchase the land in question for the corporation, he may sell his own land to it, or buy any other land, and sell at a profit, provided he do so fairly, but it must appear that the company had an independent board of directors, who could exercise their own discretion in the purchase of the property; 3 App. Cas. 1218; 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 644; 52 N. J. Eq. 219; he must disclose his interest in the property; 3 App. Cas. 1218; 101 Cal. 94; he must state truly all the material facts; 3 App. Cas. 1218; 101 Cal. 90; 74 Wis. 307. A promoter who acts as a mere agent for the purchase of the property cannot retain a secret profit out of the transaction; 11 Ch. D. 918; 4 C. P. D. 396; 30 Fed. Rep. 538; 122 N. Y. 349; but a profit made with the knowledge and assent of all the members of the corporation may be retained; 14 Ch. D. 390. But where a promoter deals with the corporation at arm's length, he may make such profit as he can; 2 Hare 461.

The remedy for the corporation is either to rescind the contract, if no equities intervene to prevent, or to call upon the promoter to account for his unlawful profit; 4 Russ. 562; 54 N. Y. 408.

When a solvent trader converts his business into a limited liability company, complying with all the statutory requirements, the court will not go behind the transaction and decide that the company is not validly constituted on account of the nonfulfilment of conditions which are not found in the company's acts; [1897] A. C. 22. This case sustains the validity of what are known in England as "one man companies."

The use of the English Company Acts to enable two partners to carry on business with limited liabilities is an abuse of those acts; but the company so created is an effectual company, and the parties cannot be sued as partners, though, possibly, if they and the company were both before the court, the creditors might be entitled to an indemnity from them personally; 74 L. T. 149.

The subject is fully treated by Judge Thompson in his work above cited. See, also, Alger, Promoters; 16 Am. L. Rev. 281; 3 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 489; Keener, Quasi-Contracts; PROSPECTUS.

PROMPT. Quick, sudden, or precipitate. One who is ready is said to be prepared at the moment; one who is prompt is said to be prepared beforehand. 105 N. Y. 412.

PROMULGATION. The order given to cause a law to be executed, and to make it public; it differs from publication. 1 Bla. Com. 45; Stat. 6 Hen. VI. c. 4.

With regard to trade, unless previous notice can be brought home to the party charged with violating their provisions, laws are to be considered as beginning to operate in the respective collection districts only from the time they are received from the proper department by the collector. Paine 23, 32.

The promulgation of laws is an executive function. The mode may be prescribed by the legislature. It is the extrinsic act which gives a law, perfect in itself, executory force. Unless the law prescribes that it shall be executory from its passage, or from a certain date, it is presumed to be executory only from its passage; 17 La. Ann. 390. Formerly promulgation meant introducing a law to the senate; Aust. Jur. Lect. 28. See STATUTE.

PROMUTUUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A quasi-contract, by which he who receives a certain sum of money, or a certain quantity of fungible things, which have been paid to him through mistake, contracts towards the payer the obligation of returning him as much. Pothier, de l'Usure, pt. 3, s. 1, a. 1.

This contract is called promutuum, because it has much resemblance to that of mutuum. This resemblance consists in this: first, that in both a sum of money or some fungible things are required; second, that in both there must be a transfer of the property in the thing; third, that in both there must be returned the same amount or quantity of the thing received. But, though there is this general resemblance between the two, the mutuum differs essentially from the pro-mutuum. The former is the actual contract of the parties, made expressly, but the latter is a quasi-contract, which is the effect of an error or mistake. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1125.

PRONEPOS (Lat.). Great-grandson.

PRONEPTIS (Lat.). A niece's daughter. A great-granddaughter. Ainsworth, Dict.

PRONURUS (Lat.). The wife of a great-grandson.

PROOF. In Practice. The conviction or persuasion of the mind of a judge or jury, by the exhibition of evidence, of the reality of a fact alleged. Thus, to prove is to determine or persuade that a thing does or does not exist; 8 Toullier, n. 2; Ayliffe, Parerg. 442; 2 Phil. Ev. 44, n. a; Steph. Ev. 62; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 1; 31 Cal. 208; 36 Ia. 106. Proof is the perfection of evidence; for without evidence there is no proof, although there may be evidence which does not amount to proof: for example, if a man is found murdered at a spot where another has been seen walking but a short time before, this fact will be evidence to show that the latter was the murderer, but, standing alone, will be very far from proof of it.

Ayliffe defines judicial proof to be a clear and evident declaration or demonstration of a matter which was before doubtful, conveyed in a judicial manner by fit and proper arguments, and likewise by all other legal methods: first, by proper arguments, such as conjectures, presumptions, indicia, and other adminicular ways and means; secondly, by legal methods, or methods according to law, such as witnesses, public instruments, and the like. Ayliffe, Parerg. 442; Aso & M. Inst. b. 3, t. 7.

PROOF OF DEATH. See DEATH.

PROOF OF LOSS. See LOSS.

PROOF OF SPIRITS. Testing the strength of alcoholic spirits, also the degree of strength; as high proof, first proof, second, third, and fourth proofs. In the internal revenue law it is used in the sense of degree of strength. 6 U. S. App. 58.

PROPER. That which is essential, suitable, adapted, and correct.

Congress is authorized, by art. 1, s. 8, of the constitution of the United States, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution of the United States, in any department or officer thereof."

PROPER LAW OF CONTRACT. See LEX LOCI.

PROPERTY. The right and interest which a man has in lands and chattels to the exclusion of others. 6 Binn. 98; 4 Pet. 511; 17 Johns. 283; 11 East 290, 518; 14 id. 370.

The sole and despotic dominion which one man claims and exercises over the external things of the world in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the universe. 2 Bla. Com. 2. The right to possess, use, enjoy, and dispose of a thing. 56 N. Y. 268; which is in itself valuable; 4 McLean 603. The right or interest which one has in lands or chattels. 6 Binn. 94; 4 Pet. 511. The free use and enjoyment by a person of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the law of the land. 2 Ark. 291; 61 Hun 571. The right of a person over a thing (in rem) indefinite in point of user. Austin's Lectures.

That which is peculiar or proper to any person; that which belongs exclusively to one; the first meaning of the word from which it is derived—proprius—is one's own. Drone, Copyr. 6.

A vested right of action is property in the same sense that tangible things are property; 106 U. S. 132. It is a thing owned, that to which a person has or may have a legal title; 43 N. Y. 389. See 50 Ala. 509; 20 Cal. 387; 59 Ill. 142; 9 Ind. 202; 13 B. Mon. 298; 11 East 290.

In the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, property comprehends every species of title, inchoate or complete, legal or equitable, and embraces rights which lie in contract, executory as well as executed; 113 U. S. 179.

The term "property" embraces every species of valuable right and interest, including real and personal property, easements, franchises, and hereditaments; 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. 138; it includes money as well as other assets; 12 Colo. 152; a chose in action; 49 Ohio St. 60; a mining claim; 143 U. S. 431; a debt; 55 Ill. App. 563; a ferry franchise; 1 Black 603; 110 Mo. 557; 9 C. C. App. 174; the reciprocal rights of the wife to the society, protection, and support of her husband, and his right to her society and services in his household may be regarded as the property of the respective parties; 39 Hun 40; 89 Mich. 123. A liquor license is not property; 13 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 197. See LIQUOR LAWS.

All things are not the subject of property; the sea, the air, and the like cannot be appropriated; every one may enjoy them, but he has no exclusive right in them. When things are fully our own, or when all others are excluded from meddling with them or from interfering about them, it is plain that no person besides the proprietor, who has this exclusive right, can have any claim either to use them, or to hinder him from disposing of them as he pleases: so that property, considered as an exclusive right to things, contains not only a right to use those things, but a right to dispose of them, either by exchanging them for other things, or by giving them away to any other person without any consideration, or even throwing them away. Rutherforth, Inst. 20; Domat, liv. prél. tit. 3; Pothier, des Choses; 18 Viner, Abr. 63; Com. Dig. Biens. See, also, 2 B. & C. 281; 9 id. 396; 3 Dowl. & R. 394; 1 C. & M. 39; 4 Call 472; 18 Ves. 193; 6 Bingh. 630.

See 90 N. Y. 122; 130 id. 360, where easements of light and air and ingress and egress to buildings were held to be property.

The ownership of property implies its use in the prosecution of any legitimate business which is not a nuisance in itself; 82 Fed. Rep. 623.

Property is said to be real and personal property. See those titles.

Dicey (Confl. Laws, Moore's ed. 72) treats of property as consisting of movables and immovables, but says that this "does not square with the distinction known to English lawyers between things real, or real property, and things personal, or personal property." Movables are equivalent to personal property with the omission of chattels real; immovables are equivalent to realty, with the addition of chattels real or leaseholds. Law is concerned, not with things but with rights over, or in reference to property.

It is also said to be, when it relates to goods and chattels, absolute or qualified. Absolute property is that which is our own without any qualification whatever: as, when a man is the owner of a watch, a book, or other inanimate thing, or of a horse, a sheep, or other animal which never had its natural liberty in a wild state.

Qualified property consists in the right which men have over wild animals which they have reduced to their own possession, and which are kept subject to their power; as, a deer, a buffalo, and the like, which are his own while he has possession of them, but as soon as his possession is lost his property is gone, unless the animals go animo revertendi; 2 Bla. Com. 396; 3 Binn. 546; but a whale, harpooned, but not connected with a boat by line, is vested in the crew that harpooned it, and not in one which afterwards followed and captured it; 8 Fed. Rep. 159; when killed and marked, it belongs to the person who killed it; 1 Sprague 315.

But property in personal goods may be absolute or qualified without any relation to the nature of the subject-matter, but simply because more persons than one have an interest in it, or because the right of property is separated from the possession. A bailee of goods, though not the owner, has a qualified property in them; while the owner has the absolute property. See BAILEE; BAILMENT.

Personal property is further divided into property in possession, and property or choses in action. See CHOSE IN ACTION.

Property is again divided into corporeal and incorporeal. The former comprehends such property as is perceptible to the senses, as lands, houses, goods, merchandise, and the like; the latter consists in legal rights, as choses in action, easements, and the like.

In a strict legal sense, land is not property, but the subject of property. The term property, although in common parlance applied to a tract of land or a chattel, in its legal signification means only the right of the owner in relation to it. It denotes a right over a determinate thing. Property is the right of any person to possess, use, enjoy, and dispose of a thing. 18 N. Y. 378; 1 Bla. Com. 186; 2 Austin, Jurispr. 817. If property in land consists in certain essential rights, and a physical interference with the land substantially subverts one of those rights, such interference takes, pro tanto, the owner's property. The right of using a thing indefinitely is an essential quality of absolute property, without which absolute property can have no legal existence. Use is the real side of property. This right of user necessarily includes the right and power of excluding others from the land; 103 Mass. 14. From the very nature of these rights of user and of exclusion, it is evident that they cannot be materially abridged without, ipso facto, taking the owner's property. If the right of indefinite user is an essential element of absolute property or complete ownership, whatever physical interference annuls this right, takes property, although the owner may still have left to him valuable rights in the article of a more limited and circumscribed nature; 51 N. H. 512.

Property is lost by the act of man by—first, alienation; but in order to do this the owner must have a legal capacity to make a contract; second, by the voluntary abandonment of the thing; but unless the abandonment be purely voluntary the title to the property is not lost: as, if things be thrown into the sea to save the ship, the right is not lost; Pothier, n. 270; 3 Toullier, n. 346. But even a voluntary abandonment does not deprive the former owner from taking possession of the thing abandoned at any time before another takes possession of it.

It is lost by operation of law—first, by the forced sale, under a lawful process, of the property of a debtor to satisfy a judgment, sentence, or decree rendered against him, to compel him to fulfil his obligations; second, by confiscation, or sentence of a criminal court; third, by prescription; fourth, by civil death: fifth, by capture by a public enemy. It is lost by the act of God, as in the case of the death of slaves or animals, or in the total destruction of a thing: for example, if a house be swallowed up by an opening in the earth during an earthquake.

It is proper to observe that, in some cases, the moment that the owner loses his possession he also loses his property or right in the thing; animals feræ naturæ, as mentioned above, belong to the owner only while he retains the possession of them. But, in general, the loss of possession does not impair the right of property, for the owner may recover it within a certain time allowed by law. Bouvier, Inst.

As to the situs of property, it has been said:—"Lands, and generally, though not invariably, goods, must be held situate at the place where they, at a given moment, actually lie; debts, choses in action, and claims of any kind must be held situate where the debtor or other person against whom a claim exists, resides; or, in other words, debts or choses in action are generally to be looked upon as situate where they are properly recoverable or can be enforced." Dicey, Confl. Laws, Moore's ed. 318.

A British ship belonging to a deceased person, and registered at any port of the United Kingdom, is to be held, for some purposes at any rate, to be situate at that port. Goods on the high seas, which are capable of being dealt with in England by means of bills of lading in that country, are held situate in England, and goods which at the death of the deceased owner are in transitu to that country, and arrive there after his death, are apparently to be held situate in England at his death. Money in a bank in Canada belonging to one who dies in England is considered as virtually in transitu. Bonds or other securities forming part of the property of a deceased person, if they are in fact in England and are marketable securities there, saleable and transferable there by delivery only, without its being necessary to do any act out of England to make the transfer valid, are situate in England, though the debts or money are owing from foreigners. Such bonds differ essentially from foreign loans, which cannot be fully transferred without doing some act in a foreign country. A debt due on a deed situate in England from a debtor resident abroad, and a debt due on a deed situate abroad from a debtor resident in England, are situate in England. A judgment debt is assets where the judgment is recorded; 4 M. & W. 171. A share in a partnership business is situate where the business is carried on, but it has been said to be only a claim, and therefore situate wherever it can be enforced. See 15 App. Cas. 482. Most of the cases arise upon the liability of a decedent's property to the payment of probate duties, but sometimes on the question of jurisdiction; Dicey, Confl. Laws, Moore's ed. 318.

A license to use a patent in New South Wales could not be said to be locally situate anywhere. However, for the purposes of probate duty, property is capable of being localized, yet, for any other purposes, incorporeal rights could not be said to have any local situation. [1896] 2 Q. B. 178. See 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 116.

The locality of a mortgage debt is that of the debt and does not depend on that of the mortgaged property. See Dicey, Confl. Laws 319.

"The general rule of law is well settled that for the purpose of founding administration, all simple contract debts are assets at the domicil of the debtor; and that the locality of such a debt for this purpose is not affected by a bill of exchange or promissory note having been given for it, because . . . the bill or note is merely evidence of it, and therefore the debt is assets where the debtor lives, without regard to the place where the instrument is found or payable." 109 U. S. 654, citing 102 Mass. 186; 10 Ohio St. 136; 4 M. & W. 171. See 143 Ill. 25; 74 Me. 85.

A claim against the United States is not a local asset in the District of Columbia; 27 Ct. Cl. 529. A bond does not come within the rule as to simple contract debts, but is assets for the purpose of administration in the place in which it is found; 73 N. Y. 292. A life insurance policy is assets, for the purpose of founding an administration, in a state into which it is brought after the death of the insured; 111 U. S. 138. An insurance policy, issued and payable in New York, on the life of a person domiciled in Virginia, was held to have passed to his administrator in Virginia, although it was deposited with a person in Mississippi, who, as administrator there, sought to collect it; 71 Miss. 590. See note to Dicey, Confl. Laws 331.

As between the states of the United States, a ship at sea is presumed to be situate in the state in which it is registered; 16 Wall. 610.

See TAXATION, as to the situs of property for the purposes of taxation; and Waples, Debt. & Cred., where the subject of the location of property is treated.

PROPINQUITY (Lat.). Kindred; parentage. See AFFINITY; CONSANGUINITY; NEXT OF KIN.

PROPIOR SOBRINA, PROPIOR SOBRINO (Lat.). The son or daughter of a great-uncle or great-aunt on the father's or mother's side. Calvinus, Lex.

PROPIOS, PROPRIOS. In Spanish Law. Certain portions of ground laid off and reserved when a town was founded in Spanish America, as the inalienable property of the town, for the purpose of erecting public buildings, markets, etc., or to be used in any other way, under the direction of the municipality, for the advancement of the revenues or the prosperity of the place. 12 Pet. 442.

PROPONENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who propounds a thing; as, "the party proponent doth allege and propound." 6 Eccl. 356, n. Often used of one who offers a will for probate.

PROPORTUM. Intent or meaning. Cowel.

PROPOSAL. An offer. A formal offer to perform some undertaking, stating the time and manner of performance and price demanded, or one or more of these particulars, either directly or by implied or direct reference to some announcement requesting such an offer. See 35 Ala. N. S. 33. A proposal of this character is not to be considered as subject to different rules from any other offer. Pierce, Am. Railw. Law 364; Poll. Contr. 13. See OFFER.

PROPOSITUS (Lat.). The person proposed. In making genealogical tables, the person whose relations it is desired to find out is called the propositus.

PROPOUND. To offer; to propose; as, the onus probandi in every case lies upon the party who propounds a will. 1 Curt. Eccl. 637; 6 Eccl. 417.

PROPRES. In French Law. The term propres or biens propres is used to denote that property which has come to an individual from his relations, either in a direct line, ascending or descending, or from a collateral line, whether the same have come by operation of law or by devise. Propres is used in opposition to acquêts. Pothier, Des Propres; 2 Burge, Confl. of Law 61.

PROPRIA PERSONA (Lat. in his own person). It is a rule in pleading that pleas to the jurisdiction of the court must be plead in propria persona, because if pleaded by attorney they admit the jurisdiction, as an attorney is an officer of the court, and he is presumed to plead after having obtained leave, which admits the jurisdiction. Lawes, Pl. 91.

An appearance may be in propria persona, and need not be by attorney.

PROPRIETARY. In its strict sense, this word signifies one who is master of his actions, and who has the free disposition of his property. During the colonial government of Pennsylvania, William Penn was called the proprietary.

Belonging to ownership; as proprietary rights. 117 U. S. 487.

PROPRIETATE PROBANDA. See DE PROPRIETATE PROBANDA.

PROPRIETOR. The owner.

One who has the legal right or exclusive title to anything. In many instances it is synonymous with owner. 83 Tex. 218. A receiver is not a proprietor; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 77.

PROPRIO VIGORE (Lat.). By its own force and vigor: an expression frequently used in construction. A phrase is said to have a certain meaning proprio vigore.

PROPTER AFFECTUM (Lat.). For or on account of some affection or prejudice. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER DEFECTUM (Lat.). On account of or for some defect. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER DELICTUM (Lat.). For or on account of crime. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER HONORIS RESPECTUM. On account of respect or honor of rank. See CHALLENGE.

PROROGATED JURISDICTION. In Scotch Law. That jurisdiction which, by the consent of the parties, is conferred upon a judge who, without such consent, would be incompetent. Erskine, Inst. 1. 2. 15.

At common law, when a party is entitled to some privilege or exemption from jurisdiction he may waive it, and then the jurisdiction is complete; but the consent cannot give jurisdiction.

PROROGATION. Putting off to another time. It is generally applied to the English parliament, and means the continuance of it from one time to another; it differs from adjournment, which is a continuance of it from one day to another in the same session. 1 Bla. Com. 186.

In Civil Law. The giving time to do a thing beyond the term prefixed. Dig. 2. 14. 27. 1. See PROLONGATION.

PROSCRIBED (Lat. proscribo, to write before). In Civil Law. Among the Romans, a man was said to be proscribed when a reward was offered for his head; but the term was more usually applied to those who were sentenced to some punishment which carried with it the consequences of civil death. Code 9. 49.

PROSECUTION (Lat. prosequor, to follow after). In Criminal Law. The means adopted to bring a supposed offender to justice and punishment by due course of law. See 34 La. Ann. 1198.

Prosecutions are carried on in the name of the government, and have for their principal object the security and happiness of the people in general. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 3; Bac. Abr. Indictment (A 3).

In England, the modes most usually employed to carry them on are—by indictment; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 132; presentment of a grand jury; id. 133; coroner's inquest; id. 134; and by an information. In this country, the modes are—by indictment, by presentment, by information, and by complaint, which see. See POSTULATIO; MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

PROSECUTOR. In Practice. He who prosecutes another for a crime in the name of the government.

The public prosecutor is an officer appointed by the government to prosecute all offences: he is the attorney-general or his deputy.

A private prosecutor is one who prefers an accusation against a party whom he suspects to be guilty.

Every man may become a prosecutor; but no man is bound, except in some few of the more enormous offences, as treason, to be one; but if the prosecutor should compound a felony he will be guilty of a crime. The prosecutor has an inducement to prosecute, because he cannot, in many cases, have any civil remedy until he has done his duty to society by an endeavor to bring the offender to justice. If a prosecutor act from proper motives, he will not be responsible to the party in damages though he was mistaken in his suspicions; but if, from a motive of revenge, he institute a criminal prosecution without any reasonable foundation, he may be punished by being mulcted in damages, in an action for a malicious prosecution (q, v.).

In Pennsylvania, a defendant is not bound to plead to an indictment, where there is a private prosecutor, until his name shall have been indorsed on the indictment as such, and on acquittal of the defendant, in all cases except where the charge is for a felony, the jury may direct that he shall pay the costs. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 110; 2 Va. Cas. 3, 20; 1 Dall. 5; 2 Bibb 210; 6 Call 245; Bish. Cr. Pro. 691; DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF THE UNITED STATES; INFORMER.

PROSECUTOR OF THE PLEAS. The title of the prosecuting officer in each county in New Jersey and one or two other states.

The term is used in the same sense as district attorney in other states.

PROSOCER (Lat.). A father-in-law's father; grandfather of wife. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PROSOCERUS (Lat.). A wife's grandmother.

PROSPECTIVE (Lat. prospicio, to look forward). That which is applicable to the future: it is used in opposition to retrospective. To be just, a law ought always to be prospective. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 116. See RETROSPECTIVE.

PROSPECTUS. A prospectus of an intended company ought not to omit actual and material facts, or to conceal facts material to be known, the misrepresentation or concealment of which may improperly influence the mind of the reader; for if he is thereby deceived into becoming an allottee of shares and suffers loss he may proceed against those who have misled him. The proper purpose of a prospectus of an intended company is held to be only to invite persons to become original shareholders or allottees of shares in the company. When it has performed this office, it is exhausted; Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 377; but a purchaser of shares from an original allottee may maintain an action for misrepresentations contained in a prospectus, if he can show that it was intended by those issuing it to be, and was, communicated to him prior to his purchase of shares; [1896] 1 Q. B. 372; such an intention may be inferred if the prospectus was circulated after all its shares had been allotted, particularly if they were taken up by the promoters themselves. See [1892] 3 Ch. 566; 17 Ch. D. 467.

The doctrine of Peek v. Gurney is considered by Judge Thompson (Corp. § 1471) as "destitute of any foundation in reason and opposed to the common opinions of justice and business morality." It is not followed in this country, where it is held that it is sufficient if the prospectus was issued to influence the public, and the plaintiff saw it and was induced thereby to purchase shares; id.

A prospectus set forth that a tramway company had the right to use steam power as well as horses; the directors believed the statement to be true, but it was not; it was held that the officers of the company were not liable for deceit: Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337. This decision was followed in England by an act of 1890 which provided that when a prospectus contains any untrue statement the directors of the company issuing it shall be liable in damages to any person taking shares, etc., for any loss he may sustain; see Beach, Priv. Corp. § 271.

If a director of a company knowingly issues or sanctions the circulation of a false prospectus, containing untrue statements of material facts tending to deceive the community, and to induce the public to buy the stock in the market, he is responsible to those who are injured thereby; 62 N. Y. 319.

A letter intended to be used to promote the sale of bonds of a trust company is a representation to all persons to whom it is shown; 159 Mass. 437.

A prospectus is admissible in evidence in an action at law by a company against its promoters for secret profits; 61 Pa. 202. See Thomp. Liab. of Off. 309.

A statement in a prospectus of the purpose for which money is wanted, is a material statement of fact, and if untrue may be ground for an action of deceit; 29 Ch. Div. 459.

A prospectus of a new company, so far as it alleges facts concerning the position and prospects of the undertaking, is a representation to all persons who may apply for shares therein, but not to subsequent transferees of shares; L. R. 6 H. L. 377; but it may be as to the latter, if actively used to induce the purchase of shares; [1896] 1 Q. B. 372; Poll. Torts 284. The material question as to a prospectus is, "Was there or was there not misrepresentation in point of fact?" id.

See 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 561; Alger, Promoters; DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION; PROMOTERS.

PROSTITUTION. The common lewdness of a woman for gain. The act of permitting a common and indiscriminate sexual intercourse for gain. 12 Metc. 97.

The act or practice of prostituting or offering the body to an indiscriminate intercourse with men; common lewdness of a woman for gain; the act of permitting a common and indiscriminate sexual intercourse for hire. 108 Mo. 575. See 54 Me. 24; 98 Ala. 61.

By the word in its most general sense is understood the act of setting one's self to sale, or of devoting to infamous purposes what is in one's power: as, the prostitution of talents or abilities; the prostitution of the press, etc. 8 Barb. 610.

In all well-regulated communities this has been considered a heinous offence, for which the woman may be punished; and the keeper of a house of prostitution may be indicted for keeping a common nuisance.

A landlord cannot recover for the use and occupation of a house let for the purpose of prostitution; 1 Esp. Cas. 13; 1 B. & P. 340, n. It is not a crime to let rooms to prostitutes for quiet and decent occupation, nor to permit a house to be visited by disreputable people, if they visit it for innocent and proper purposes; 15 R. I. 24.

In a figurative sense, it signifies the bad use which a corrupt judge makes of the law, by making it subservient to his interest: as, the prostitution of the law, the prostitution of justice.

PROTECTION. In Mercantile Law. The name of a document generally given by notaries public to sailors and other persons going abroad, in which is certified that the bearer therein named is a citizen of the United States.

In Governmental Law. That benefit or safety which the government affords to the citizens.

In English Law. A privilege granted by the king to a party to an action, by which he is protected from a judgment which would otherwise be rendered against him. Of these protections there are several kinds. Fitzh. N. B. 65.

PROTECTION ORDERS. Orders granted by the court upon the application of a wife living apart from her husband to protect her property. Brett, Com. 988.

PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. The fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, among other provisions respecting the life, liberty, and property of citizens, provides that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." This provision has been subjected to much judicial construction. The protection extends to "acts of the state whether through its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities;" 154 U. S. 45; 100 id. 313, 339; 103 id. 370. In a late case the court said: "But it must be observed that the prohibitions of the amendment refer to all the instrumentalities of the state, to its legislative, executive, and judicial authorities, and, therefore, whoever by virtue of public position under a state government deprives another of any right protected by that amendment against deprivation by the state, 'violates the constitutional inhibition, and, as he acts in the name and for the state, and is clothed with the state's power, his act is that of the state.' This must be so, or, as we have often said, the constitutional prohibition has no meaning, and 'the state has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it.'" Harlan, J., in 166 U. S. 226. See 162 id. 565; 118 id. 356. That amendment conferred no new and additional rights, but only extended the protection of the federal constitution over rights of life, liberty, and property that previously existed under all state constitutions. Prior to the passage of this amendment "the laws of all the states in terms gave equal protection to all white persons. This amendment, however, is general, and forbids the denial to any class of persons the equal protection of the laws by any state; and there is no doubt that class legislation is forbidden;" 14 Utah 71. "What must constitute a denial of the equal protection of the law will depend, in this view, in a large measure, upon what rights of the law have been conferred, or protection extended, under the constitution and laws of the particular state in which the question arises. As the constitution and laws of the states vary, the proposition that each case must, to an extent, depend upon its own facts, is especially applicable to this class of cases. When the state itself undertakes to deal with its citizens by legislation, it does so under certain limitations, and it may not single out a class of citizens, and subject that class to oppressive discrimination, especially in respect to those rights so important as to be protected by constitutional guaranty. That the prohibitions of that amendment are now regarded as protecting the citizen against a denial of the equal protection of the law, and against taking property without due process of law, under the power of taxation, is a proposition clearly deducible from the many causes in which that question has been considered;" 86 Fed. Rep. 168, 185. The state statute providing that in case of a loss under a life insurance policy, the insurer shall be liable to pay, in addition to the amount thereof, 12 per cent. with attorney's fees for the collection of the same, is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, which secures the equal protection of the laws, inasmuch as it is a discrimination against such companies; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 680.

By equal protection is meant equal security to every one in his private rights—in his rights to life, to liberty, to property, and to the pursuit of happiness. It implies not only that the means which the laws afford for such security shall be equally accessible to him, but that no one shall be subject to any greater burdens or charges than such as are imposed upon all others under like circumstances; 18 Fed. Rep. 898. See PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES; CIVIL RIGHTS; DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

PROTECTORATE. Treaties of protection are treaties in the nature of unequal alliance, from which they are chiefly distinguished by keeping a garrison within the protected state; Twiss, Rights of Nations § 247. The rights of sovereignty must be exercised de facto as well as de jure. See Halleck, Int. L. 69; 1 Kent, Gould's ed. *23.

The term protectorate is one of which the meaning is somewhat divided; or rather, perhaps, it may be said with more correctness to have different meanings under different circumstances. As exercised, however, by a European power over a smaller civilized state, it differs from the relation which links an Eastern protected state with a European country; a German protectorate inclines to the assumption of more full control than a British.

Formerly protected nations were said to retain their independence and internal sovereignty, placing their foreign relations under a stronger country. It is believed that all the states represented at the Berlin Conference in 1885, except Great Britain, maintained that a Protectorate includes the right of administering justice over the subjects of a protected state. See Hall, For. Jur. of the British Crown.

PROTEST. In Contracts. A notarial act, made for want of payment of a promissory note, or for want of acceptance or payment of a bill of exchange by a notary public, in which it is declared that all parties to such instruments will be held responsible to the holder for all damages, exchanges, re-exchange, etc.

A formal notarial certificate attesting the dishonor of a bill of exchange or promissory note. Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 176.

There are two kinds of protest, namely, protest for non-acceptance, and protest for non-payment. There is also a species of protest common in England, which is called protest for better security. Protest for non-acceptance or non-payment, when duly made and accompanied by notice to all the parties to the bill or note, has the effect of making all of them responsible to the holder for the amount of the bill or note, together with damages, etc.; 3 Kent 63; Byles, Bills 273, 394; Chitty, Bills 278; Com. Dig. Merchant (F 8, 9, 10); Bac. Abr. Merchant, etc. (M 7). Protest for better security may be made when the acceptor of a bill fails, becomes insolvent, or in any other way gives the holder just reason to suppose it will not be paid. It seems to be of doubtful utility, except that it gives the drawer of a bill on a foreign country an opportunity of availing himself of any attachment law there in force; 1 Ld. Raym. 745.

The protest is a formal paper signed and sealed by a notary wherein he certifies that on the day of its date he presented the original bill attached thereunto, or a copy (a description of the bill is enough; 17 How. 606), to the acceptor, or the original note to the maker thereof, and demanded payment, or acceptance, which was refused, for reasons given in the protest, and that thereupon he protests against the drawer and indorsers thereof for exchange, re-exchange, damages, costs, and interest. See Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 176; 2 Ames. Bills & N. 863. It is usual, also, for the notary to serve notices of the protest on all the parties to the bill. The notice contains a description of the bill, including its date and amount, the fact of demand and refusal, and that the holder looks to the person notified for payment. Protest of foreign bills is proof of demand and refusal to pay or accept; 2 H. & J. 399; 8 Wheat. 333; 2 Pet. 179, 688. Protest is said to be part of the constitution of a foreign bill; and the form is governed by the lex loci contractus; 2 Hill N. Y. 227; 11 La. 14; 2 Pet. 179, 180; Story, Bills 176 (by the place where the protest is made; Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 180). A protest must be made by a notary public or other person authorized to act as such; Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 177; but it has been held that the duties of a notary cannot be performed by a clerk or deputy; 102 Mass. 141. Inland bills and promissory notes need not be protested; 6 How. 23; see 1 App. D. C. 171; but the term protest, as applied to inland bills of exchange, includes only the steps necessary to charge the drawer and indorser; 36 Neb. 744. See 8 Misc. Rep. 516. Protest is unnecessary to fix the liability of an indorser on a non-negotiable instrument; 70 Tex. 568. See ACCEPTANCE; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; NOTICE OF DISHONOR.

In Legislation. A declaration made by one or more members of a legislative body that they do not agree with some act or resolution of the body: it is usual to add the reasons which the protestants have for such a dissent.

In Maritime Law. A writing, attested by a justice of the peace, a notary public, or a consul, made and verified by the master of a vessel, stating the severity of a voyage by which a ship has suffered, and showing that it was not owing to the neglect or misconduct of the master. See Beach, Ins. § 1321; 1 Wash. C. C. 145, 238, 408, n.; 1 Pet. C. C. 119; 1 Dall. 6, 10, 317; 2 id. 195; 3 W. & S. 144.

The protest is not, in general, evidence for the master of the vessel or his owners in the English or American courts; yet it is often proper evidence against them; Abb. Sh., 13th ed. 457.

PROTEST, PAYMENT UNDER. A person who without the compulsion of legal process, or duress of goods or of the person, yields to the assertion of an invalid or unjust claim by paying it, cannot by mere protest, either in writing or oral, change its character from a voluntary to an involuntary payment. The payment overcomes and nullifies the protest; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 493. Where an illegal tax is paid under protest to one having authority to enforce its collection, it is an involuntary payment and may be recovered back; 29 Ia. 310; 21 Mich. 483; but see 34 id. 170; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 512.

A mere apprehension of legal proceedings to collect a tax is not sufficient to make the payment compulsory; there must be an immediate power or authority to institute them; 46 Md. 552.

An action will not lie to recover money voluntarily paid to redeem land sold upon a void tax judgment when the party making the payment has at the time full knowledge of the character of the sale and all the facts affecting its validity; 26 Minn. 543.

The payment of illegal fees cannot generally be considered as voluntary, so as to preclude the plaintiff from recovering them back; 2 B. & C. 729; 2 B. & A. 562. Where money is paid under an illegal demand, colore officii, the payment can never be voluntary; 8 Exch. 625.

Where a railway company exacted from a carrier more than they charged to other carriers in breach of the acts of parliament, it was held that sums thus exacted could be recovered back; 7 M. & G. 253. Where a man pays more than he is bound to do by law for the performance of a duty which the law says is owed to him for nothing, or for less than he has paid, he is entitled to recover back the excess; L. R. 4 H. L. C. 249.

The object of the protest is to take from the payment its voluntary character; it serves as evidence that the payment was not voluntary, and in order to be efficacious there must be actual coercion, duress, or fraud, presently existing, or the payment will be voluntary in spite of the protest; 59 N. Y. 603; 115 Mass. 367. Whether actual protest, in case of the payment of money illegally demanded by a public officer is a condition precedent to a recovery by the party paying the money is not clearly settled; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 495. Where the person demanding the money has notice of the illegality of the demand, a protest is not necessary, but otherwise it is necessary; 49 Cal. 624.

On certiorari the supreme court held that when duties are paid in order to get possession of the goods, a protest made within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties is sufficient; 164 U. S. 54, where the statutes on the subject are collated and examined and the decision of the circuit court of appeals was affirmed; Fuller, C. J., and Field, Harlan, and Brewer, JJ., dissenting.

PROTESTANDO. See PROTESTATION.

PROTESTANT. It includes all those who believe in the Christian religion and do not acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. 52 Conn. 418; 53 id. 493. See 53 N. H. 57.

PROTESTATION. In Pleading. The indirect affirmation or denial, by means of the word protesting (in the Latin form of pleadings, protestando), of the truth of some matter which cannot with propriety or safety be positively affirmed, denied, or entirely passed over. See 3 Bla. Com. 311.

The exclusion of a conclusion. Co. Litt. 124.

Its object was to secure to the party making it the benefit of a positive affirmation or denial in case of success in the action, so far as to prevent the conclusion that the fact was admitted to be true as stated by the opposite party, and at the same time to avoid the objection of duplicity to which a direct affirmation or denial would expose the pleading; 19 Johns. 96; 2 Saund. 103; Com. Dig. Pleader (N). Matter which is the ground of the suit upon which issue could be taken could not be protested; Plowd. 276; 2 Johns. 227. But see 2 Wms. Saund. 103, n. Protestations are no longer allowed; 3 Bla. Com. 312: and were generally an unnecessary form; 3 Lev. 125.

The common form of making protestations was as follows: "because protesting that," etc., excluding such matters of the adversary's pleading as are intended to be excluded in the protestando, if it be matter of fact; or, if it be against the legal sufficiency of his pleading, "because protesting that the plea by him above pleaded in bar" (or by way of reply, or rejoiner, etc., as the case might be) "is wholly insufficient in law." See, generally, 1 Chitty, Pl. 534; Com. Dig. Pleader (N); Steph. Pl. 235.

In Practice. An asseveration made by taking God to witness. A protestation is a form of asseveration which approaches very nearly to an oath. Wolffius, Inst. § 875.

PROTHONOTARY. The title given to an officer who officiates as principal clerk of some courts. Viner, Abr.

In ecclesiastical law, the name of prothonotary is given to an officer of the court of Rome. He is so called because he is the first notary,—the Greek word πρωτος signifying primus, or first. These notaries have pre-eminence over the other notaries, and are put in the rank of prelates. There are twelve of them. Dalloz, Dict. de Jur.

PROTOCOL. A record or register. Among the Romans, protocollum was a writing at the head of the first page of the paper used by the notaries or tabellions. Nov. 44.

In France the minutes of notarial acts were formerly transcribed on registers, which were called protocols. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 3, c. 6, s. 1, n. 413.

By the German law it signifies the minutes of any transaction. Encyc. Amer. In the latter sense the word has of late been received into international law. Id.

In International Law it is a diplomatic expression which signifies the register on which the deliberations of a conference, etc., are inscribed, whence the word comes to signify the deliberations themselves. 1 Halleck, Int. L. 298, note.

It is used to indicate a preliminary treaty, as the instrument of August 12, 1898, entered into between the United States and Spain.

PROTOCOLO. In Spanish Law. The original draft of an instrument which remains in the possession of the notary. White, New Recop. l. 3, t. 7, c. 5, § 2.

PROTUTOR (Lat). In Civil Law. He who, not being the tutor of a pupil or minor, has administered his property or affairs as if he had been, whether he thought himself legally invested with the authority of a tutor or not.

He who marries a woman who is tutrix becomes, by the marriage, a protutor. The protutor is equally responsible with the tutor.

PROUT PATET PER RECORDUM (Lat.). As appears by the record. This phrase is frequently used in pleading; as, for example, in debt on a judgment or other matter of record, unless when it is stated as an inducement, it is requisite, after showing the matter of record, to refer to it by the prout patet per recordum. 1 Chitty, Pl. *356; 10 Me. 127.

PROVER. In Old English Law. One who undertakes to prove a crime against another. 28 Edw. I.; 5 Hen. IV. One who, being indicted and arraigned for treason or felony, confesses before plea pleaded, and accuses his accomplices to obtain pardon; state's evidence. 4 Bla. Com. 330*. To prove. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Britton, c. 22.

PROVIDED. The word always expresses a condition, unless it appears from the context to be the intent of the parties that it shall constitute a covenant; 16 Conn. 419; but it has been held that, though it is apt to create a condition, it does not necessarily do so; it is often used by way of limitation or qualification only, especially when it does not introduce a new clause, but only serves to qualify or restrain the generality of a former clause; 8 Allen 596. The word is often used as a conjunction to an independent paragraph; 128 U. S. 174

Provided always may constitute a condition, limitation, or covenant, according to circumstances; 20 Ind. 403.

See PROVISO.

PROVINCE. Somtimes this signifies the district into which a country has been divided: as, the province of Canterbury, in England; the province of Languedoc, in France. Sometimes it means a dependency or colony: as, the province of New Brunswick. It is sometimes used figuratively to signify power or authority: as, it is the province of the court to judge of the law, that of the jury to decide on the facts.

PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTIONS. The decrees of provincial synods held under divers archbishops of Canterbury.

PROVING THE TENOR. In Scotch Law. An action for reviving a writing which has been destroyed or is missing. Ersk. Prin. 496.

PROVISION. In Common Law. The property which a drawer of a bill of exchange places in the hands of a drawee: as, for example, by remittances, or when the drawee is indebted to the drawer when the bill becomes due, provision is said to have been made. Acceptance always presumes a provision. See Code de Comm. art. 115–117.

In French Law. An allowance granted by a judge to a party for his support,—which is to be paid before there is a definite judgment. In a civil case, for example, it is an allowance made to a wife who is separated from her husband, Dalloz, Dict.

PROVISIONAL INJUNCTION. Sometimes, though not correctly, used for interlocutory injunction.

PROVISIONAL REMEDY. One provided for present need, or for the occasion, that is, one adapted to meet a particular exigency. 54 How. Pr. 100.

PROVISIONAL SEIZURE. In Louisiana. A term which signifies nearly the same as attachment of property.

It is regulated by the Code of Practice as follows, namely:—

The plaintiff may, in certain cases, hereafter provided, obtain the provisional seizure of the property which he holds in pledge, or on which he has a privilege (q. v.), in order to secure a payment of his claim. La. Code, art. 284.

Provisional seizure may be ordered in the following cases: first, in executory proceedings, when the plaintiff sues on a title importing confession of judgment; second, when a lessor prays for the seizure of furniture or property used in the house, or attached to the real estate which he has leased; third, when a seaman, or other person, employed on board of a ship or water craft, navigating within the state, or person having furnished materials for or made repairs to such ship or water craft, prays that the same may be seized, and prevented from departing, until he has been paid the amount of his claim; fourth, when the proceedings are in rem, that is to say, against the thing itself which stands pledged for the debt, when the property is abandoned, or in cases where the owner of the thing is unknown or absent. La. Code, art. 285. See 6 Mart. La. N. S. 168; 7 id. 153; 8 id. 320; 1 Mart. La. 168; 12 id. 32.

PROVISIONS. Food for man; victuals.

Corn on the ear in the shuck is provisions within the meaning of a constitutional provision with reference to exemptions; 88 Ga. 352; 23 Ark. 103; but the word does not include a milch cow; 80 Ga. 733; nor cotton; 79 Ga. 172. It has been held to mean only articles of food; 20 Wend. 177. The sale of unwholesome provisions is a misdemeanor; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 822; 3 Maule & S. 10; 4 id. 214; 4 Camp. 10. And the rule is that the seller impliedly warrants that they are wholesome; 3 Bla. Com. 166. See ADULTERATION; FOOD; GROCERIES; SALE; WARRANTY.

PROVISO. The name of a clause inserted in an act of the legislature, a deed, a written agreement, or other instrument, which generally contains a condition that a certain thing shall or shall not be done, in order that an agreement contained in another clause shall take effect.

A limitation or exception to a grant made, or authority conferred, the effect of which is to declare that the one shall not operate, or the other be exercised, unless in the case provided. 10 Pet. 471; 98 Cal. 433.

The general purpose of a proviso is to except the clause covered by it from the provisions of a statute or to qualify the operation of the statute; 128 U. S. 174. See 93 id. 83. It always implies a condition, unless subsequent words change it to a covenant; 12 Conn. 419; but when a proviso contains the mutual words of the parties to a deed, it amounts to a covenant; 2 Co. 72; Cro. Eliz. 242; Moore 707.

A proviso differs from an exception; 1 B. & Ald. 99. An exception exempts, absolutely, from the operation of an engagement or an enactment; a proviso defeats their operation, conditionally. An exception takes out of an engagement or enactment something that would otherwise be part of the subject-matter of it; a proviso avoids them by way of defeasance or excuse; 8 Am. Jur. 242; Plowd. 361; 1 Saund. 234*a*, note; Lilly, Reg., and the cases there cited. The natural presumption from a proviso is, that, but for the proviso, the enacting part of the section would have included the subject-matter of the proviso; 5 Q. B. D. 173. See, generally, Am. Jur. no. 16, art. 1: Bac. Abr. Conditions (A); Com. Dig. Conditions (A 1), (A 2); Dwarris, Stat. 660; PROVIDED.

The proper use of provisoes in drafting acts is explained by Coode on Legislative Construction, printed as an appendix to Purdon's Pennsylvania Digest. He considers that the abuse of the proviso is universal, and doubts if it need ever be employed in drafting acts. The early, and, as he thinks, the correct use, is by way of taking special cases out of general enactments and providing for them. The courts have generally assumed that such was the proper mode of using a proviso. It is incorrectly used to introduce mere exceptions to the operation of the enactment where no special provision is made for the exception; these are better expressed as exceptions. If a general provision is merely to be negatived in some particular, the negative should be expressed in immediate contact with the general words. Sometimes a proviso introduces several stages of consecutive operation, which would be better expressed by "and." It is impossible to deduce any general rule from the doctrines laid down by the courts in the multitude of adjudicated cases.

Trial by proviso. A trial at the instance of a defendant in a case in which the plaintiff, after issue joined, does not proceed to trial when by the practice of the court he ought to have done so.

PROVISOR. He that hath the care of providing things necessary; but more especially one who sued to the court of Rome for a provision. Jacob; 25 Edw. III. One nominated by the pope to a benefice before it became void, in prejudice of the right of the true patron. 4 Bla. Com. 111*.

PROVOCATION (Lat. provoco, to call out). The act of inciting another to do something.

Provocation simply, unaccompanied by a crime or misdemeanor, does not justify the person provoked to commit an assault and battery. In cases of homicide it may reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter; but not if the provocation is by mere words, however exasperating; 164 U. S. 492. But when the provocation is given for the purpose of justifying or excusing an intended murder, and the party provoked is killed, it is no justification; Whart. Cr. L. 457; 2 Gilb. Ev. by Lofft 753. See 81 Va. 298.

The unjust provocation by a wife of her husband, in consequence of which she suffers from his ill usage, will bar her divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty; her remedy in such cases is to change her manners; 2 Lee 172; 1 Hagg. Cons. 155. See CRUELTY; 1 Russ. Cr. 434, 486; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 232–241.

PROVOKE. To excite; to stimulate; to arouse. 34 Conn. 279. See PROVOCATION.

PROVOST. A title given to the chief of some corporations or societies.

The chief officer of certain colleges, e. g. the University of Pennsylvania.

The chief dignitary of a cathedral or collegiate church. In France, this title was formerly given to some presiding judges. The word is derived from the Latin præpositus.

PROVOST MARSHAL. An officer appointed by some general officer commanding a body or force of troops, for police duty, or for the general maintenance of order and the repression of all offences in connection with military occupation. He or his assistants may, at any time, arrest and detain for trial, persons subject to military law committing offences, and may carry into execution any punishments to be inflicted in pursuance of a court martial.

PROXENETÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Among the Romans these were persons whose functions somewhat resembled those of the brokers of modern commercial nations. Dig. 50. 14. 3; Domat, l. 1, t. 17, § 1, art. 1.

PROXIMATE. In its legal sense, closeness of causal connection. 55 N. J. L. 205.

PROXIMATE CAUSE. That which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produces an event, and without which the event would not have occurred. The proximate cause is that which is most proximate in the order of responsible causation; 37 W. Va. 180; 30 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 916. That which stands next in causation to the effect, not necessarily in time or space but in causal relation; 143 Ill. 242. See 93 U. S. 130; CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR; NEGLIGENCE.

PROXIMITY (Lat.). Kindred between two persons. Dig. 38. 16. 8.

PROXY (contracted from procuracy, procurator). A person appointed in the place of another, to represent him.

The instrument by which a person is appointed so to act.

The right of voting at an election of an incorporated company by proxy is not a general right, and the party claiming it must show a special authority for that purpose; Ang. & A. Corp. § 128; 76 Pa. 42; and although not defined on the face of the proxy, it will be held to be for the election then in contemplation, and for no other; 5 R. R. & Corp. L. J. 255. At common law it was allowable only by the peers of England, and that is said to be in virtue of a special permission of the king; 1 Paige 590; but that practice has been discontinued; Bagehot, Eng. Const. 175.

Where there was no clause in the act of incorporation empowering the members to vote by proxy, but a by-law provided that the shareholders may so vote, it was held, in view of this by-law, that a vote given by proxy should have been received; 5 Day 329. The court did not say how they would have decided had there been no such by-law, but drew a clear distinction between public and moneyed corporations. A by-law prohibiting voting by proxy has been held unreasonable and invalid; 38 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 452. In 2 Green N. J. 222, it was held that it required legislative sanction before any corporation could make a by-law authorizing members to vote by proxy. So, also, in 3 Grant, Cas. 209. See 2 Kent 294; Beach, Pub. Corp. 391; 6 Wend. 509. Stockholders of national banks may vote by proxy, but no officer, clerk, teller, or bookkeeper of a bank may act as proxy; R. S. § 5144; many of the states have passed statutes regulating the right to vote by proxy. Where it is provided in the charter of a corporation that votes may be given by proxy, and an appointment is made without limitation, a vote by the proxy binds the stockholder, whether exercised in his interest or not, to the same extent as if the vote had been cast in person; 98 Ala. 92.

A power of attorney, irrevocable for ten years, executed by joint owners of stock, is not against public policy, nor within an act providing that every proxy shall be revocable at the pleasure of the person issuing it; 36 N. Y. S. 627; and a by-law providing that no proxy should be voted by any one not a stockholder of the corporation is invalid under an act providing generally that stockholders may be represented by proxies; 104 Cal. 649.

A stockholder who holds a proxy from another stockholder, and votes at a corporate meeting by a show of hands, counts as one person, without regard to the number of proxies he has; [1897] 1 Ch. 1; 52 L. T. N. S. 846; 101 L. T. J. 327; contra, per Kekewich, J., 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 46; but if proxies are held by non-members, every such has one vote (semble); [1897] 1 Ch. 1. In England it is said that proxyholders cannot demand a poll; 3 Q. B. D. 442. See VOTING TRUST; MEETING.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A judicial proctor, or one who is appointed to manage another man's law concerns is called a proxy. Ayliffe, Parerg.

An annual payment made by the parochial clergy to the bishop, etc., on visitations. Tomlins, Law Dict.

In Rhode Island and Connecticut the name of an election or day of voting for officers of government. Webst. Dict.

PRUDENCE. That degree of care required by the exigencies or circumstances under which it is to be exercised. 8 S; Dak. 93. See NEGLIGENCE.

PRYK. A kind of service of tenure. It signified an old-fashioned spur with one point only, which the tenant, holding land by this tenure, was to find for the king. Blount.

PSEUDOGRAPH. False writing.

PUBERTY. In Civil Law. The age in boys of fourteen, and in girls of twelve years. Ayliffe, Pand. 63; Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. tom. 5, p. 100; Inst. 1. 22; Dig. 1. 7. 40. 1; Code 5. 60. 3; 1 Bla. Com. 436.

PUBLIC. The whole body politic, or all the citizens of the state. The inhabitants of a particular place.

This term is sometimes joined to other terms, to designate those things which have a relation to the public: as, a public officer, a public road, a public passage, a public house.

A distinction has been made between the terms public and general: they are sometimes used as synonymous. The former term is applied strictly to that which concerns all the citizens and every member of the state; while the latter includes a lesser, though still a large, portion of the community. Greenl. Ev. § 128.

When the public interest and its rights conflict with those of an individual, the latter must yield. Co. Litt. 181. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

PUBLIC ACT. An act which concerns the whole community and of which courts of law are bound to take judicial notice. A land patent granted by a sister state is a public act. 4 Hen. & M. 146.

See JUDICIAL NOTICE. As to giving full faith and credit to the public acts of a state, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENT. See PLACE OF AMUSEMENT; THEATRE.

PUBLIC BID. See BIDDER.

PUBLIC BRIDGE. See BRIDGE.

PUBLIC BUILDING. One of which the possession and use, as well as the property in it, are in the public. 34 N. J. L. 383.

PUBLIC CARRIER. See COMMON CARRIER.

PUBLIC CHAPELS. Chapels of ease. See CHAPEL.

PUBLIC CHARACTER. An individual who asks for and desires public recognition. A statesman, author, artist, or inventor who does so may be said to have surrendered his right of protection against the publication of his portrait; 64 Fed. Rep. 280. See INJUNCTION; PRIVACY; LIBEL.

PUBLIC CHARITY. A charity which is so general and indefinite in its objects as to be of common and public benefit. 11 Allen 456. It would be almost impossible to say what charities are public and what private in their nature; 2 Atk. 87. A devise to the poor of a parish is a public charity; id. An incorporated library association, the object of which is the diffusion of public knowledge and the acquirement of the arts and sciences, and the revenues and income of which are devoted exclusively to such objects and purposes, is an institution of purely public charity under a statute exempting such institutions from taxation; 36 Ohio St. 53; as is an orphan asylum which restricts its inmates to children of a specified religion; 90 Pa. 21. See CHARITABLE USE.

PUBLIC CORPORATION. See CORPORATIONS.

PUBLIC DEBT. That which is due or owing by the government.

The constitution of the United States provides, art. 6, s. 1, that "all debts contracted and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation." The fourteenth amendment provides that "the validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of pensions and bounties for the services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned." See FUNDING SYSTEM.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS. The publications printed by order of congress or either house thereof. 1 Dak. Ter. 328. In an action involving a title to swamp lands the official correspondence and reports of public officers of the United States relating to swamp lands and published by the authority of the legislature are public documents which the court may consult even if not made formal proof in the case; 39 Fed. Rep. 66.

PUBLIC ENEMY. This word, used in the singular number, designates a nation at war with the United States, and includes every member of such nation. Vattel 3, c. 5, § 70.

To make a public enemy, the government of the foreign country must be at war with the United States; for a mob, how numerous soever it may be, or robbers, whoever they may be, are never considered as a public enemy; 2 Marsh. Ins. 508; 3 Esp. 131, 132; 74 Me. 413.

A common carrier is exempt from responsibility whenever a loss has been occasioned to the goods in his charge by the act of a public enemy; but the burden of proof lies on him to show that the loss was so occasioned; 3 Munf. 239; 4 Binn. 127; Edw. Bailm. 547–548; 2 Bail. 157. See COMMON CARRIER.

In the late rebellion, the federal troops were a public enemy, against whose acts a common carrier within the confederate lines did not insure. 1 Heisk. 256.

PUBLIC FUND. See FUNDING SYSTEM.

PUBLIC GRANT. See FRANCHISE; CORPORATION; LANDS, PUBLIC.

PUBLIC HEALTH. See ADULTERATION; POLICE POWER; HEALTH; QUARANTINE.

PUBLIC HIGHWAY. One under the control of and kept by the public, established by regular proceedings for the purpose, or generally used by the public for twenty years, or dedicated by the owner of the soil and accepted by the proper authorities and for the maintenance of which they are responsible. 119 N. C. 868. It includes roads, streets, alleys, and lanes, laid out or erected as such by the public, or dedicated or abandoned to the public by the owner; 93 Cal. 128. A railroad is a public highway; 112 Mo. 103; but not a road on paper; 182 Pa. 681, reversing 2 Super. Ct. Pa. 265; nor, it is said, is a turnpike; 10 Ired. 222. See HIGHWAY.

PUBLIC HOUSE. A house kept for the entertainment of all who come lawfully and pay regularly. 3 Brewst. 344. It does not include a boarding-house; id.; but under a statute, a store-house in the country is included in this term; 29 Ala. 40; and a barber shop; 30 id. 550; and a broker's office; 31 id. 371. A room to which persons generally are permitted to resort, to play cards, though not every one has access to it, is a public gambling-house. See many cases collected in 22 Alb. L. J. 24, and Abb. Dic.

In England it applied to a licensed place where liquor is sold. The keeper of a public house is bound to serve any person who presents ready money; 2 Q. B. Div. 136.

PUBLIC INTEREST. If by public permission one is making use of public property and he chances to be the only one with whom the public can deal with respect to the use of that property, his business is affected with a public interest which requires him to deal with the public on reasonable terms; Cooley, Const. Lim. 746.

Business affected with a public interest. 1. Where the business is one, the following of which is not of right but is permitted by the state as a privilege or franchise. 2. Where the state on public grounds renders to the business a special assistance by taxation or otherwise. 3. Where for the accommodation of a business special use is allowed to be made of public property or of a public easement. 4. Where special privileges are granted in consideration of some special return to be made to the public; id.

As to the publication of matter of public interest, see LIBEL; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION.

PUBLIC LANDS. Such lands as are subject to sale or other disposition by the United States, under general laws; 92 U. S. 761; 145 id. 535. See LANDS, PUBLIC; 10 Nev. 260.

PUBLIC MEETING. See ASSEMBLY; UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY.

PUBLIC MONEY. As used in the U. S. statutes, the money of the federal government received from the public revenues, or intrusted to its fiscal officers, wherever it may be. It does not include money in the hands of the marshals and other officers of the courts, held to await the judgment of the court. 12 Ct. Cl. 281.

PUBLIC OFFICE. Where, by virtue of law, a person is clothed, not as an incidental or transient authority, but for such time as denotes duration and continuance, with independent power to control the property of the public, or with public functions to be exercised in the supposed interest of the people, the service to be compensated by a stated yearly salary, and the occupant having a designation or title, the position so created is a public office. 29 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 593. See OFFICER.

PUBLIC PASSAGE. A right to pass over a body of water. This term is synonymous with public highway, with this difference: by the latter is understood a right to pass over the land of another; by the former is meant the right of going over the water which is on another's land. Carth. 193; Hamm. N. P. 195. See PASSAGE.

PUBLIC PEACE. "That invisible sense of security which every man feels so necessary to his comfort, and for which all governments are instituted." Redfield, J., in 11 Vt. 236. See 6 Daly 280. See PEACE.

PUBLIC PLACE. Any place so situated that what passes there can be seen by any considerable number of persons, if they happen to look. Steph. Cr. L. 115. Under a statute against gaming, a steamboat carrying passengers and freight is a public place; 13 Ala. 602; so is an infirmary; 19 id. 551; so is a shoemaker's shop into which many went, but a few were excluded during the gaming; 17 id. 369; but a secluded place on a mountain, some distance from a roadway and in a dense thicket, is not; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 394. Under statutes against indecent exposure, a public omnibus is a public place; 3 C. & K. 360; so is a urinal in a public park; L. R. 1 C. C. 282; and a part of the sea beach, visible from inhabited houses; 2 Campb. 89. See many cases cited in 22 Alb. L. J. 24, and Abb. Dict. See PUBLIC HOUSE; PLACE.

PUBLIC POLICY. That principle of the law which holds that no subject can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good. 4 H. L. Cas. 1; Greenh. Pub. Pol. 2. It has been designated by Burroughs, J., as "an unruly horse pursuing us, and when once you get astride of it you never know where it will carry you." 2 Bingh. 229.

"Public policy is a variable quantity; it must and does vary with the habits, capacities, and opportunities of the public." 36 Ch. Div. 359.

Public policy is manifested by public acts, legislative and judicial, and not by private opinion, however eminent; 42 Fed. Rep. 470. See POLICE POWER; STATUTE; CONSTITUTIONAL.

As to public policy in the law of contracts, see VOID CONTRACTS.

PUBLIC PURPOSE. As employed to denote the objects for which taxes may be levied, it has no relation to the urgency of the public need or to the extent of the public benefit which is to follow. It is on the other hand merely a term of classification to distinguish the objects for which, according to settled usage, the government is to provide, from those which by the like usage are left to private inclination, interest, or liberality. 20 Mich. 452. The power of a municipal corporation to borrow money for a public purpose gives it authority to borrow money and issue bonds to aid a railroad company in making its road as a way of public travel and transportation; 3 Wall. 654, affirmed in 4 id. 270.

PUBLIC SALE. See SALE; AUCTION.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS. Common schools. 103 Mass. 97. See SCHOOLS.

PUBLIC SHIP. See SHIPS OF WAR.

PUBLIC SQUARE. In its popular import, the phrase refers almost exclusively to ground occupied by a courthouse and owned by a county. 8 Ind. 378; but it may be used as synonymous with park; 33 N. J. L. 13. See PARK.

As to the right of a municipality to prohibit lecturing, preaching, etc., in public squares, see LIBERTY OF SPEECH; POLICE POWER; PROCESSION.

PUBLIC STATUTES. See STATUTE.

PUBLIC TRUST. See TRUST.

PUBLIC, TRUE, AND NOTORIOUS. The old form by which charges in the allegations in the ecclesiastical courts were described at the end of each particular.

PUBLIC USE. Under Eminent Domain. Implies the use of many, or by the public. It may be limited to the inhabitants of a small or restricted locality, but must be in common, and not for a particular individual. Lewis, Em. Dom. c. 7; 130 N. Y. 249; 62 Cal. 182; 66 Hun 619. It arises when the sovereign power is essential to an enterprise, and is for that reason therein exercised; 50 Fed. Rep. 312. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

PUBLICAN. In Civil Law. A farmer of the public revenue; one who held a lease of some property from the public treasury. Dig. 39. 4. 1. 1; 39. 4. 12. 3; 39. 4. 13.

PUBLICATION. The act by which a thing is made public.

It differs from promulgation, which see; and see, also, Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. titre Préliminaire, n. 59, for the difference in the meaning of these two words.

Publication has different meanings. When applied to a law it signifies the rendering public the existence of the law; when it relates to the opening of the depositions taken in a case in chancery, it means that liberty is given to the officer in whose custody the depositions of witnesses in a cause are lodged, either by consent of parties, or by the rules or orders of the court, to show the depositions openly, and to give out copies of them; Pract. Reg. 297; Blake, Ch. Pr. 143. And when spoken of a will it signifies that the testator has done some act from which it can be concluded that he intended the instrument to operate as his will; 3 Atk. 161; 4 Me. 220; 3 Rawle 15; Com. Dig. Estates by Devise (E 2). See Com. Dig. Chancery (Q). As to the publication of an award, see 6 N. H. 36.

Some of the state constitutions provide that general laws shall not take effect till published. The mode of publication is for the legislature to determine. A general law printed in a volume of private laws was held to have been published; 9 Wisc. 264; but an unauthorized publication is no publication; 10 Wisc. 136. In Pennsylvania, where the constitution did not require publication, it was held to be necessary before an act could be operative; but nevertheless that publication in the legislative journals was sufficient, and that neglect to publish an act in the pamphlet laws did not invalidate the act; 31 Pa. 432. An inaccuracy in the publication of a statute which does not change its substance or legal effect, will not invalidate the publication; 14 Wisc. 212; a joint resolution of a general nature must be published; 4 Kan. 261. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d. ed. 189–191.

A commercial agency book is a publication; 75 Fed. Rep. 703. See LIBEL.

PUBLICI JURIS. Of public right.

PUBLICIANA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an action introduced by the prætor Publicius, the object of which was to recover a thing which had been lost. Inst. 4. 6. 4; Dig. 6. 2. 1. 16 et 17. Its effects were similar to those of our action of trover.

PUBLICITY. The doing of a thing in the view of all persons who chose to be present.

The law requires that courts should be open to the public: there can therefore be no secret tribunal, except the grand jury (q. v.); and all judgments are required to be given in public. See OPEN COURT.

Publicity must be given to the acts of the legislature before they can be in force; but in general their being recorded in a certain public office is evidence of their publicity.

PUBLISH. Primarily it means to make known. 54 N. J. L. 111.

PUBLISHER. One who by himself or his agent makes a thing publicly known; one engaged in the circulation of books, pamphlets, and other papers.

The publisher of a libel is responsible as if he were the author of it, and it is immaterial whether he has any knowledge of its contents or not; 9 Co. 59; Odger, L. & Sl. 125, 166, 432; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 73, § 10; 4 Mas. 115; and it is no justification to him that the name of the author accompanies the libel; 10 Johns. 447; 2 Mood. & R. 312.

When the publication is made by writing or printing, if the matter be libellous, the publisher may be indicted for a misdemeanor, provided it was made by his direction or consent; but if he was the owner of a newspaper merely, and the publication was made by his servants or agents, without any consent or knowledge on his part, he will not be liable to a criminal prosecution. But see 107 Mass. 199. In either case he will be liable to an action for damages sustained by the party aggrieved; 7 Johns. 260; 60 Ill. 51; 38 Mich. 10.

In order to render the publisher amenable to the law, the publication must be maliciously made; but malice will be presumed if the matter be libellous. This presumption, however, will be rebutted if the publication be made for some lawful purpose, as, drawing up a bill of indictment, in which the libellous words are embodied for the purpose of prosecuting the libeller; or if it evidently appear that the publisher did not, at the time of publication, know that the matter was libellous; as, when a person reads a libel aloud in the presence of others, without beforehand knowing it to be such; 9 Co. 59. See LIBEL; LIBELLER; PUBLICATION; Odg. Lib. & S.

PUDICITY. Chastity; the abstaining from all unlawful carnal commerce or connection. A married woman or a widow may defend her pudicity as a maid may her virginity. See CHASTITY; RAPE.

PUDZELD. In Old English Law. To be free from the payment of money for taking of wood in any forest. Co. Litt. 233 a. The same as Woodgeld.

PUEBLO. In its original signification, it means people or population, but is used in the sense of the English word "town." It has the indefiniteness of that term, and, like it, is sometimes applied to a mere collection of individuals residing at a particular place, a settlement, or village, as well as to a regularly organized municipality. 100 U. S. 251.

PUER (Lat. a boy; a child). In its enlarged sense this word signifies a child of either sex; though in its restrained meaning it is applied to a boy only.

A case once arose which turned upon this question, whether a daughter could take lands under the description of puer; and it was decided by two judges against one that she was entitled; Dy. 337 b. In another case, it was ruled the other way; Hob. 33.

PUERILITY. In Civil Law. A condition which commenced at the age of seven years, the end of the age of infancy, and lasted till the age of puberty,—that is, in females till the accomplishment of twelve years, and in males till the age of fourteen years fully accomplished. Ayliffe, Pand. 63.

The ancient Roman lawyers divided puerility into proximus infantiæ, as it approached infancy, and proximus pubertati, as it became nearer to puberty. 6 Toullier, n. 100.

PUERITIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Age from seven to fourteen. 4 Bla. Com. 22; Wharton, Dict. The age from birth to fourteen years in the male, or twelve in the female. Calvinus, Lex. The age from birth to seventeen. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PUFFER. A person employed by the owner of property which is sold at auction to bid it up, who does so accordingly, for the purpose of raising the price upon bona fide bidders.

This is a fraud, which, at the option of the purchaser, invalidates the sale. 3 Madd. 112; 2 Kent 423; 3 Ves. 628; 2 Bro. C. C. 326; 11 S. & R. 89; 2 Hayw. 328; 4 H. & McH. 282; 2 Dev. 126. See AUCTION; BIDDER; BY BIDDER.

PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE (L. Fr. since last continuance). In Pleading. A plea which is put in after issue joined, for the purpose of introducing new matter, or matter which has come to the knowledge of the party pleading it subsequently to such joinder. See CONTINUANCE; PLEA.

PUISNE (L. Fr.). Younger; junior. Associate. Puisne judge, an associate judge; not the chief justice.

PULLMAN CAR. See SLEEPING CAR.

PUNCTUALITY. As a general rule, a railroad company is liable to damage accruing to a passenger for a negligent failure on its part to run its trains according to the company's time tables; but there must be proof of negligence. Neither time table nor advertisement is a warrant of punctuality. Whart. Negl. § 662.

The publication of the time table cannot amount to less than this, viz.: a representation that it is ordinarily practicable for the company, by the use of due care and skill, to run according to the table, and an engagement on their part that they will do all that can be done, by the use of due care and skill, to accomplish that result; 52 N. H. 596. See also 5 E. & B. 860. The company is undoubtedly liable for any want of punctuality which they could have avoided by the use of due care and skill; nor can they excuse a want of conformity to the time table for any cause, the existence of which was known to them, or ought to have been known to them, at the time of publishing the table; 52 N. H. 596. See 8 E. L. & Eq. 362; 14 Allen 433; 36 Miss. 660; L. R. 2 C. P. 339. In Ang. Carriers 527 a, it is said that time tables are in the nature of a special contract, so that any deviation from them renders the company liable. But it does not appear that the cases go so far.

PUNCTUATION. The division of a written or printed instrument by means of points, such as the comma, semicolon, and the like.

Courts of law in construing statutes and deeds must read them with such punctuation as will give effect to the whole; 4 Term 65.

In construing deeds, it is said that no regard is to be had to punctuation, and although stops are sometimes used, they are not to be regarded in the construction of the instrument; 3 Washb. R. P. 397. See 21 W. Va. 707. Punctuation is not allowed to throw light on printed statutes in England; 24 Beav. 330.

In an act of parliament there are no such things as brackets, any more than there are such things as stops; 24 Q. B. D. 478.

Punctuation may be considered in determining the meaning of a contract, when it is doubtful; 138 U. S. 1.

Where a comma after a word in a statute, if any force were attached to it, would give the section containing it broader scope than it would otherwise have, it was held that that circumstance should not have a controlling influence. Punctuation is no part of the statute; 105 U. S. 77; in construing statutes, courts will disregard punctuation; or, if need be, repunctuate, to render the true meaning of the statute; 16 Ohio St. 432, approved in 105 U. S. 77; also 65 Pa. 311; 9 Gray 385.

Punctuation is a most fallible standard by which to interpret a writing; it may be resorted to when all other means fail, but the court will first ascertain the meaning from the four corners of the instrument; 11 Pet. 64.

Lord St. Leonards said: "In wills and deeds you do not ordinarily find any stops; but the court reads them as if they were properly punctuated;" 2 Dr. & War. 98.

Judges in the later cases have been influenced in construing wills by the punctuation of the original document; 2 M. & G. 679; 26 Beav. 81; 1 Phila. 528; 17 Beav. 589; 24 L. J. Ch. 523; but see 1 Mer. 651, where Sir William Grant refused to resort to punctuation as an aid to construction. See, also, 25 Barb. 405; 16 Can. L. J. 183.

PUNISHABLE. Liable to punishment. 118 Mass. 36. See 107 id. 225; 49 Conn. 232; 135 U. S. 266.

PUNISHMENT. In Criminal Law. Some pain or penalty warranted by law, inflicted on a person for the commission of a crime or misdemeanor, or for the omission of the performance of an act required by law, by the judgment and command of some lawful court.

The penalty for the transgression of the law. Whart.; 8 N. Y. Crim. R. 355.

"The infliction of pain in vengeance of crime." Dr. Johnson.

The right of society to punish is derived, by Beccaria, Mably, and some others, from a supposed agreement which the persons who composed the primitive societies entered into, in order to keep order, and, indeed, the very existence of the state. According to others, it is the interest and duty of man to live in society; to defend his right, society may exert this principle, in order to support itself; and this it may do whenever the acts punishable would endanger the safety of the whole. And Bentham is of opinion that the foundation of this right is laid in public utility or necessity. Delinquents are public enemies, and they must be disarmed and prevented from doing evil, or society would be destroyed. But, if the social compact has ever existed, says Livingston, its end must have been the preservation of the natural rights of the members; and therefore the effects of this fiction are the same with those of the theory which takes abstract justice as the foundation of the right to punish; for this justice, if well considered, is that which assures to each member of the state the free exercise of his rights. And if it should be found that utility, the last source from which the right to punish is derived, is so intimately united to justice that it is inseparable from it in the practice of law, it will follow that every system founded on one of these principles must be supported by the other.

The proper end of human punishment is not the satisfaction of justice, but the prevention of crime; Paley.

The end of punishment, therefore, is neither to torment sensible beings nor undo a crime already committed, nor yet recall the past, nor reverse the crime. It is to punish the criminal for doing some injury to society; to repair the wrong done to society or to a private individual, and to amend his life for the future, and by his example to prevent others from committing like offences. The chief end of punishment is by punishing the crime and preventing the doing of it again; and that by means of fines, imprisonment, hard labor, moral and physical treatment, and new habits formed. The infliction of pain for its own sake is now condemned by all enlightened governments, statesmen, and philanthropists; 16 L. Mag. & Rev. 99.

The main objects of penal justice is laid down by Bentham: example, reformation, incapacitation, satisfaction for the person injured, economy to the public. He further says that all our forms of punishment should be put to these five tests and should be subjected most especially to all except the last.

To attain their social end, punishments should be exemplary, or capable of intimidating those who might be tempted to imitate the guilty; reformatory, or such as should improve the condition of the convicts; personal, or such as are at least calculated to wound the feelings or affect the rights of the relations of the guilty; divisible, or capable of being graduated and proportioned to the offence and the circumstances of each case; reparable, on account of the fallibility of human justice.

Punishments are either corporal or not corporal. The former are—death, which is usually denominated capital punishment; imprisonment, which is either with or without labor, see PENITENTIARY; whipping, in some states; and banishment.

The punishments which are not corporal are—fines, forfeitures; suspension or deprivation of some political or civil right; deprivation of office, and being rendered incapable to hold office; compulsion to remove nuisances.

The object of punishment is to reform the offender, to deter him and others from committing like offences, and to protect society. See 4 Bla. Com. 7; Whart. Cr. L. 3, 4, 7; Rutherforth, Inst. b. 1, c. 18. A state may provide for a severer punishment for a second than for a first offence, provided it is dealt out to all alike; 159 U. S. 673.

The constitution of the United States, Amendments, art. 8. forbids the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. This is intended only for congress and the federal courts; 12 S. & R. 220; 3 Cow. 686; and does not apply to the states; 144 U. S. 323 (Field, Harlan, and Brewer, J.J., dissenting). Punishments are cruel when they involve torture or a lingering death; but the punishment of death is not cruel, within the meaning of that word as used in the federal constitution; 136 U. S. 436.

A state statute which provides for the punishment of death by electricity, and which is held by the state courts not to inflict a cruel and unusual punishment, does not abridge the privileges or immunities of a convict under the federal constitution; 142 U. S. 155.

What punishment is suited to a specified offence must in general be determined by the legislature, and the case must be very extraordinary in which its judgment could be brought in question. A punishment may possibly be unlawful because it is so manifestly out of all proportion to the offence as to shock the moral sense with its barbarity, or because it is a punishment long disused for its cruelty until it has become unusual; Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 401-403. So, for example, is the punishment of depriving a native of China of his hair; 18 Am. L. Reg. 676. Whipping, as a punishment for stealing mules, is not contrary to this provision: 1 New Mex. 415. In New York, where a general law created a crime and fixed the maximum of its punishment, a special statute operating only in localities, or upon particular individuals, whereby, for no perceptible reason, the same identical crime, which consists in the violation of a statute applicable to the whole state, can therein or in those persons be punished with double the severity that it can be elsewhere in the same state, is within the prohibition of section five of article one of the constitution of the state as to "cruel and unusual punishments"; 61 How. Pr. 294; 35 L. R. A. 562. See INFAMY; INFAMOUS CRIME; JEOPARDY; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; PRISONER; SENTENCE; PARDON; ELECTROCUTION; HANGING; CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT; ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCES.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

PUPIL. In Civil Law. One who is in his or her minority. See Dig. 1. 7; 26. 7. 1. 2; 50. 16. 239; Code 6. 30. 18. One who is in ward or guardianship. See SCHOOLS; ASSAULT; BATTERY; CORRECTION.

PUPILLARIS SUBSTITUTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The nomination of another besides his son as pupil to succeed, if the son should not be able or inclined to accept the inheritance, or should die before he came of age to make a testament.

If the child survived the age of puberty, though he made no testament, the substitute had no right of succession. See Bell, Dict. Substitution; Dig. 28. 6.

PUPILLARITY. In Civil Law. That age of a person's life which included infancy and puerility.

PUR. A corruption of the French word par, by or for. It is frequently used in old French law phrases; as pur autre vie. It is also used in the composition of words: as, puparty, purlieu, purview.

PUR AUTRE VIE (old French, for another's life). See ESTATE PUR AUTRE VIE.

PURCHASE. A term including every mode of acquisition of estate known to the law, except that by which an heir on the death of his ancestor becomes substituted in his place as owner by operation of law. 2 Washb. R. Prop., 5th ed. *401; 15 Barb. 568; 9 Cow. 437. A title by purchase is one that is vested in a person by his own act or agreement; 2 Bla. Comm. 241. A title by devise is a title by purchase; 134 Ind. 78.

There are six ways of acquiring a title by purchase, namely, by deed; by devise; by execution; by prescription; by possession or occupancy; by escheat. In its more limited sense, purchase is applied only to such acquisitions of lands as are obtained by way of bargain and sale for money or some other valuable consideration; Cruise, Dig. tit. 30, §§ 1-4; 1 Dall. 20. See 96 Ill. 535. In common parlance, purchase signifies the buying of real estate and of goods and chattels.

PURCHASER. A buyer; a vendee. A mortgagee or a conditional vendee is not a purchaser; 46 Neb. 830.

See SALE; PARTIES; CONTRACTS.

PURCHASE-MONEY. The consideration which is agreed to be paid by the purchaser of a thing in money. See 15 Barb. 568. As to vendor's lien, see LIEN. See APPLICATION OF PURCHASE-MONEY.

PURE DEBT. In Scotch Law. A debt actually due, in contradistinction to one which is to become due at a future day certain, which is called a future debt, and one due provisionally, in a certain event, which is called a contingent debt. 1 Bell, Comm. 315.

PURE OBLIGATION. One which is not suspended by any condition, whether it has been contracted without any condition, or, when thus contracted, the condition has been performed. Pothier, Obl. n. 176.

PURE PLEA. In Equity Pleading. One which relies wholly on some matter dehors the bill, as, for example, a plea of a release on a settled account.

Pleas not pure are so called in contradistinction to pure pleas; they are sometimes also denominated negative pleas. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4275.

PURGATION (Lat. purgo, from purum and ago, to make clean). The clearing one's self of an offence charged, by denying the guilt on oath or affirmation.

Canonical purgation was the act of justifying one's self, when accused of some offence, in the presence of a number of persons worthy of credit, generally twelve, who would swear they believe the accused. See COMPURGATOR; WAGER OF LAW.

Vulgar purgations consisted in superstitious trials by hot and cold water, by fire, by hot irons, by battel, by corsned, etc.

See OATH PURGATORY.

PURGED OF PARTIAL COUNSEL. In Scotland every witness, before making oath or affirmation, is purged of partial counsel, i. e. cleared by examination on oath of having instigated the plea of having been present with the party for whom he testifies at consultations of lawyers, where it might be shown what was necessary to be proved, or of having acted as his agent in any of the proceedings. So, in a criminal case, he who is agent of prosecutor or who tampers with the panel cannot be heard to testify, because of partial counsel. Stair, Inst. p. 768, § 9; Bell, Dict. Partial Counsel.

PURGING A TORT. Is like the ratification of a wrongful act by a person who has power of himself to lawfully do the act. But, unlike ratification, the purging of the tort may take place even after commencement of the action. 1 Brod. & B. 282.

PURLIEU. In English Law. A space of land near a forest, known by certain boundaries, which was formerly part of a forest, but which has been separated from it.

The history of purlieus is this. Henry II., on taking possession of the throne, manifested so great a taste for forests that he enlarged the old ones wherever he could, and by this means enclosed many estates which had no outlet to the public roads; forests increased in this way until the reign of king John, when the public reclamations were so great that much of this land was disforested, — that is, no longer had the privileges of the forests—and the land thus separated bore the name of purlieu. See FOREST LAWS.

PURPARTY. That part of an estate which, having been held in common by parceners, is by partition allotted to any of them. To make purparty is to divide and sever the lands which fall to parceners. Old, N. B. 11.

PURPORT. In Pleading. The substance of a writing as it appears on the face of it to the eye that reads it. It differs from tenor. 2 Russ. Cr. 865; 1 East 179.

PURPOSELY. Intentionally; designedly. 23 Ind. 231.

PURPRESTURE. An enclosure by a private individual of a part of a common or public domain.

An inclosure by a private person of a part of that which belongs to, and ought to be open and free to the enjoyment of the public at large. 34 Mich. 472; 89 id. 94. See 76 Cal. 156.

According to Lord Coke, purpresture is a close or enclosure, that is, when one encroaches or makes several to himself that which ought to be in common to many: as, if an individual were to build between high and low water mark on the side of a public river. In England this is a nuisance, and in cases of this kind an injunction will be granted, on ex parte affidavits, to restrain such a purpresture and nuisance; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2382; 4 id. n. 3798; Co. 2d Inst. 28. And see Skene, Pourpresture; Glanville, lib. 9, ch. 11, p. 289, note; Spelman, Gloss. Purpresture; Hale, de Port. Mar.; Hargrave, Law Tracts 84; 2 Anstr. 606; Bisph. Eq. 443; Callis, Sew. 174.

PURSER. The person appointed by the master of a ship or vessel, whose duty it is to take care of the ship's books, in which everything on board is inserted, as well the names of mariners as the articles of merchandise shipped. Roccius, Ins. note.

By statute pursers in the navy are now called paymasters. R. S. § 1383.

PURSUE. To execute or carry out. Co. Litt. 52 a.

PURSUER. The name by which the complainant or plaintiff is known in the ecclesiastical courts. 3 Eccl. 350.

PURVIEW. That part of an act of the legislature which begins with the words, "Be it enacted," etc., and ends before the repealing clause. Cooke 330; 3 Bibb 181. According to Cowel. this word also signifies a conditional gift or grant. It is said to be derived from the French pourvu, provided. It always implies a condition.

PUT. In Pleading. To select; to demand: as, "the said C D puts himself upon the country;" that is, he selects the trial by jury as the mode of settling the matter in dispute, and does not rely upon an issue in law. Gould, Pl. c. 6, part 1, § 19.

PUT OFF. To postpone. In a bargain for the sale of goods, it may mean to postpone its completion or to procure a resale of the goods to a third person. 11 Ex. 302.

PUTATIVE. Reputed to be that which is not. The word is frequently used: as, putative father, putative marriage, putative wife, and the like. And Toullier, tome 7, n. 29, uses the words putative owner, proprietaire putatif. Lord Kames uses the same expression. Princ. of Eq. 391.

PUTATIVE FATHER. The reputed father.

This term is usually applied to the father of a bastard child.

The putative father is bound to support his children; and is entitled to the guardianship and care of them in preference to all persons but the mother. 1 Ashm. 55. And see 5 Esp. 131; 1 B. & Ald. 491; Bott, Poor Law 499; 1 C. & P. 268; 3 id. 36; 1 Ball & B. 1.

PUTATIVE MARRIAGE. A marriage which is forbidden but which has been contracted in good faith and ignorance of the impediment on the part of at least one of the contracting parties.

Three circumstances must concur to constitute this species of marriage. There must be bona fides. One of the parties at least must have been ignorant of the impediment, not only at the time of the marriage, but must also have continued ignorant of it during his or her life, because if he became aware of it he was bound to separate himself from his wife. The marriage must be duly solemnized. The marriage must have been considered lawful in the estimation of the parties or of that party who alleges the bona fides.

A marriage in which these three circumstances concur, although null and void, will have the effect of entitling the wife, if she be in good faith, to enforce the rights of property which would have been competent to her if the marriage had been valid, and of rendering the children of such marriage legitimate.

This species of marriage was not recognized by the civil law: it was introduced by the canon law. It is unknown to the law of the United States, and in England and Ireland. In France it has been adopted by the Code Civil, art. 201, 202. In Scotland the question has not been settled. Burge, Confl. Laws 151, 152.

PUTS AND CALLS. As used in a board of brokers. A "put" is defined in the evidence to be a privilege of delivering or not delivering the grain, and a "call" is a privilege of calling or not calling for the grain. 79 Ill. 353. See OPTION.

PUTTING IN FEAR. These words are used in the definition of a robbery from the person: the offence must have been committed by putting in fear the person robbed. Co. 3d Inst. 68; 4 Bla. Com. 243.

This is the circumstance which distinguishes robbery from all other larcenies. But what force must be used or what kind of fears excited are questions very proper for discussion. The goods must be taken against the will of the possessor.

There must either be a putting in fear or actual violence, though both need not be positively shown, for the former will be inferred from the latter, and the latter is sufficiently implied in the former. For example, when a man is suddenly knocked down, and robbed while he is senseless, there is no fear, yet in consequence of the violence, it is presumed; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 711; 4 Binn. 379; 3 Wash. C. C. 209.

In an indictment for robbery, at common law, it is not necessary to allege a putting in fear in addition to the allegation of force and violence; 7 Mass. 242; 8 Cush. 217.

PYROMANIA. An irresistible propensity to burn.

Pyromania always occurs in young subjects, and is supposed to be connected with disordered menstruation, or that physiological evolution which attends the transition from youth to manhood. See MANIA.

Q.

QUACK. One who, without sufficient knowledge, study, or previous preparation, undertakes to practise medicine or surgery, under the pretence that he possesses secrets in those arts.

To call a regular physician a quack is actionable. A quack is criminally answerable for his unskilful practice, and also civilly to his patient in certain cases. See MALPRACTICE; PHYSICIAN.

QUADRANS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fourth part of the whole. Hence the heir ex quadrante; that is to say, of the fourth part of the whole.

QUADRIENNIUM UTILE (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The four years of a minor between his age of twenty-one and twenty-five years are so called. During this period he is permitted to impeach contracts made against his interest previously to his arriving at the age of twenty-one years. 1 Bell, Com. 135.

QUADRIPARTITE (Lat.). Having four parts, or divided into four parts: as, this indenture quadripartite, made between A B, of the one part, C D, of the second part, E F, of the third part, and G H, of the fourth part.

QUADROON. A person who is descended from a white person and another person who has an equal mixture of the European and African blood. 2 Bail. 558. See MULATTO.

QUADRUPLATORES. Informers among the Romans, who, if their information were followed by conviction, had the fourth part of the confiscated goods for their trouble.

QUADRUPLICATION. In Pleading. A pleading in admiralty, third in order after a replication; now obselete. Formerly this word was used instead of surrebutter. 1 Brown, Civ. Law. 469, n.

QUÆ EST EADEM (Lat. which is the same). In Pleading. A clause containing a statement that the trespass, or other fact mentioned in the plea, is the same as that laid in the declaration, where from the circumstances there is an apparent difference between the two. 1 Chitty, Pl. *582; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 79, 80; 29 Vt. 455.

The form is as follows: "which are the same assaulting, beating, and ill-treating, the said John, in the said declaration mentioned, and whereof the said John hath above thereof complained against the said James." See 1 Saund. 14, 208, n. 2; 2 id. 5 a., n. 3; Arch. Civ. Pl. 217; Com. Dig. Pleader (E 31); Cro. Jac. 372.

QUÆ PLURA. A writ which lay where an inquisition had been taken by an escheator of lands, etc. of which a man, died seised, and all the land was supposed not to be found by the office or inquisition; it was to inquire of "what more" lands or tenements the party dies seised. Reg. Orig. 293.

QUÆRE (Lat.). Query: noun and verb. A word frequently used to denote that an inquiry ought to be made of a doubtful thing. 2 Lilly, Abr. 406. Commonly used in the syllabi of the reports, to mark points of law considered doubtful.

QUÆRENS NON INVENIT PLEGIUM (Lat.). In Practice. The plaintiff has not found pledge. The return made by the sheriff to a writ directed to him with this clause, namely, si A fecerit B securum de clamore suo prosequendo, when the plaintiff has neglected to find sufficient security. Fitz. N. B. 38.

QUÆSTIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. A sort of commission (ad quærendum) to inquire into some criminal matter given to a magistrate or citizen, who was called quæsitor or quæstor, who made report thereon to the senate or the people, as the one or the other appointed him. In progress of time, he was empowered (with the assistance of a counsel) to adjudge the case; and the tribunal thus constituted was called quæstio.

This special tribunal continued in use until the end of the Roman republic, although it was resorted to, during the last times of the republic, only in extraordinary cases.

The manner in which they were constituted was this. If the matter to be inquired of was within the jurisdiction of the comitia, the senate, on the demand of the consul, or of a tribune, or of one of its members, declared by a decree that there was cause to prosecute a citizen. Then the consul ex auctoritate senatus asked the people in comitia (rogabat rogatio) to enact this decree into a law. The comitia adopted it, either simply or with amendment, or they rejected it.

The increase of population and of crimes rendered this method, which was tardy at best, onerous, and even impracticable. In the year A. U. C. 604, or 149 B. C., under the consulship of Censorinus and Manilius, the tribune Calpurnius Piso procured the passage of a law establishing a questio perpetua, to take cognizance of the crime of extortion committed by Roman magistrates against strangers de pecuniis repetundis. Cicero, Brut. 27; de Off. ii. 21; in Verr. iv. 25.

Many such tribunals were afterwards established, such as Quæstiones de majestate, de ambitu, de peculatu, de vi, de sodalitiis, etc. Each was composed of a certain number of judges taken from the senators, and presided over by a prætor, although he might delegate his authority to a public officer, who was called judex quæstionis. These tribunals continued a year only; for the meaning of the word perpetuus is non interruptus, not interrupted during the term of its appointed duration.

The establishment of these quæstiones deprived the comitia of their criminal jurisdiction, except for the crime of treason; they were, in fact, the depositories of the judicial power during the sixth and seventh centuries of the Roman republic, the last of which was remarkable for civil dissensions and replete with great public transactions. Without some knowledge of the constitution of the Quæstio perpetua, it is impossible to understand the forensic speeches of Cicero, or even the political history of that age. But when Julius Cæsar, as dictator, sat for the trial of Ligarius, the ancient constitution of the republic was, in fact, destroyed, and the criminal tribunals, which had existed in more or less vigor and purity until then, existed no longer but in name. Under Augustus, the concentration of the triple power of the consuls, pro-consuls, and tribunes in his person transferred to him, as of course, all judicial powers and authorities.

QUÆSTOR (Lat.). The name of a magistrate of ancient Rome.

QUALE JUS. A judicial writ, which lay where a man of religion had judgment to recover land before execution was made of the judgment.

QUALIFICATION. The endowment or acquirement which renders eligible to place or position. 52 Miss. 672; 64 Mo. 89. It relates to the fitness or capacity of a party for a particular pursuit or profession; 4 Wall. 319. It has been held not only to imply the presence of every requisite demanded, but the absence of every disqualification imposed. 17 B. Monr. 786.

QUALIFIED ELECTOR. A person who is legally qualified to vote. 28 Wisc. 358.

QUALIFIED FEE. One which has a qualification subjoined to it, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. A limitation to a man and his heirs on the part of his father affords an example of this species of estate. Littleton § 254; 2 Bla. Com. 109; Chall. R. P. 50. See BASE FEE.

QUALIFIED INDORSEMENT. A transfer of a bill of exchange or promissory note to an indorsee, without any liability to the indorser: the words usually employed for this purpose are sans recours, without recourse. 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 1138.

QUALIFIED OATH. See OATH.

QUALIFIED PROPERTY. Property not in its nature permanent, but which may sometimes subsist and at other times not subsist. A defeasible and precarious ownership, which lasts as long as the thing is in actual use and occupation: e. g. first, property in animals feræ naturæ, or in light, or air, where the qualified property arises from the nature of the thing; second, property in a thing held by any one as a bailee, where the qualified property arises not from the nature of the thing, but from the peculiar circumstances under which it is held; 2 Bla. Com. 391, 395*; 2 Kent 347; 2 Woodd. Lect. 385.

Any ownership not absolute.

QUALIFIED VOTER. A person qualified to vote generally. 9 Colo. 629; or, it may mean a person qualified and actually voting. 111 U. S. 565.

QUALIFY. To become qualified or fit for any office or employment. To take the necessary steps to prepare one's self for an appointment: as, to take an oath to discharge the duties of an office, to give the bond required of an executor, etc.

It is held synonymous with probate in a statute authorizing probate judges to qualify wills by receiving the evidence of witnesses, etc. 23 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 238.

QUALITY. Of Persons. The state of condition of a person.

Two contrary qualities cannot be in the same person at the same time. Dig. 41. 10. 4. Every one is presumed to know the quality of the person with whom he is contracting. In the United States the people are all upon an equality in their civil rights.

In Pleading. That which distinguishes one thing from another of the same kind.

It is, in general, necessary, when the declaration alleges an injury to the goods and chattels, or any contract relating to them, that the quality should be stated; and it is also essential, in an action for the recovery of real estate, that its quality should be shown: as, whether it consists of houses, lands, or other hereditaments, whether the lands are meadow, pasture, or arable, etc. The same rule requires that in an action for an injury to real property, the quality should be shown; Steph. Pl. 214, 215. See, as to the various qualities, Ayliffe, Pand. [60].

It is often allowable to omit from the indictment, and it is seldom necessary to prove with precision, allegations of quality, or, in other words, those allegations which describe the mode in which certain acts have been done. Thus, if the charge is of a felonious assault with a staff, and the proof is of such an assault with a stone, or if a wound, alleged to have been given with a sword, is proved to have been inflicted by an axe, or if a pistol is stated to have been loaded with a bullet, and it turns out to have been loaded with some other destructive material, the charge is substantially proved, and no variance occurs: 1 East, Pl. C. 341; 5 C. & P. 128; 9 id. 525, 548.

QUAMDIU SE BENE GESSERIT (Lat. as long as he shall behave himself well). A clause inserted in commissions, when such instruments were written in Latin, to signify the tenure by which the officer held his office.

QUANDO ACCIDERINT (Lat. when they fall in).

In Practice. When a defendant, executor, or administrator pleads plene administravit, the plaintiff may pray to have judgment of assets quando acciderint; Bull. N. P. 169; Bac. Abr. Executor (M). A similar judgment may be taken at the plaintiff's election, in an action against an heir, on a plea of riens perdescent, instead of taking issue on the plea. In either of these cases if assets afterwards come to the hands of the executor or heir a scire facias must be sued out before execution can issue, or there may be an action of debt, suggesting a devastavit; 2 Bouv. Inst. 3708. It is also sometimes termed a judgment of assets in futuro.

By taking a judgment in this form the plaintiff admits that the defendant has fully administered to that time; 1 Pet. C. C. 442, n.; and therefore the plaintiff will not be allowed to give evidence of effects come to defendant's hands before the judgment. For this reason the scire facias on a judgment of assets quando acciderint must only pray execution of such assets as have come to the defendant's hands since the former judgment, and if it pray judgment of assets generally, it cannot be supported. See 2 Bouv. Inst. 3708; 11 Viner, Abr. 379; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 D 9).

QUANTI MINORIS (Lat.). The name of a particular action in Louisiana. An action quanti minoris is one brought for the reduction of the price of a thing sold, in consequence of defects in the thing which is the object of the sale.

Such action must be commenced within twelve months from the date of the sale, or from the time within which the defect became known to the purchaser; 8 Mart. La. N. S. 287; 11 Mart. La. 11.

QUANTITY. In Pleading. That which is susceptible of measure.

It is a general rule that, when the declaration alleges an injury to goods and chattels, or any contract relating to them, their quantity should be stated; Gould, Pl. § 35. And in actions for the recovery of real estate the quantity of the land should be specified; Bracton 431 a; 11 Co. 25 b, 55 a; Doctr. Plac. 85, 86; 1 East 441; 13 id. 102; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 163.

QUANTITY OF ESTATE. Its time of continuance, or degree of interest, as in fee, during life, or for years. See ESTATE.

QUANTUM DAMNIFICATUS (Lat.). In Equity Practice. An issue directed by a court of equity to be tried in a court of law, to ascertain by a trial before a jury the amount of damages suffered by the non-performance of some collateral undertaking which a penalty has been given to secure. When such damages have thus been ascertained, the court will grant relief upon their payment. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3913.

QUANTUM MERUIT (Lat.). In Pleading. As much as he has deserved.

When a person employs another to do work for him, without any agreement as to his compensation, the law implies a promise from the employer to the workman that he will pay him for his services as much as he may deserve or merit. In such case the plaintiff may suggest in his declaration that the defendant promised to pay him as much as he reasonably deserved, and then aver that his trouble was worth such a sum of money, which the defendant has omitted to pay. This is called an assumpsit on a quantum meruit. 2 Bla. Com. 162, 163; 1 Viner, Abr. 346. See 43 Mo. App. 653.

When there is an express contract for a stipulated amount and mode of compensation for services, the plaintiff cannot abandon the contract and resort to an action for a quantum meruit on an implied assumpsit; 14 Johns. 326; 18 id. 169; 10 S. & R. 236; Ans. Contr. 278-279; 51 Fed. Rep. 725. But see 7 Cra. 299; Stark. 277; Holt, N. P. 236; 10 Johns. 36; 12 id. 374; 13 id. 56, 94, 359; 14 id. 326; 5 M. & W. 114; 4 C. & P. 93; 4 Scott N. S. 374; 4 Taunt. 475; 1 Ad. & E. 333; 126 Ind. 461. See COMMON COUNTS.

QUANTUM VALEBAT. (Lat. as much as it was worth). In Pleading. When goods are sold without specifying any price, the law implies a promise from the buyer to the seller that he will pay him for them as much as they were worth.

The plaintiff may, in such case, suggest in his declaration that the defendant promised to pay him as much as the said goods were worth, and then aver that they were worth so much, which the defendant has refused to pay. See the authorities cited under the article QUANTUM MERUIT.

QUARANTINE. In Maritime Law. The space of forty days, or less, during which the crew of a ship or vessel coming from a port or place infected or supposed to be infected with disease are required to remain on board after their arrival, before they can be permitted to land. It was probably established by the Venetians in 1484. Baker, Quar. 3. In England it is governed by 6 George IV. c. 78, and the Public Health Act of 1875. Ships of war are bound, equally with merchant ships, to respect municipal quarantine regulations.

By act of congress of April 29, 1878, ch. 66, vessels from foreign ports where contagious and other diseases exist, are forbidden to enter the United States, excepting subject to certain regulations prescribed.

The object of the quarantine is to ascertain whether the crew are infected or not. To break the quarantine without legal authority is a misdemeanor; 1 Russ. Cr. 133.

Quarantine regulations made by the states are sustainable as the exercise of the police power; Cooley, Const. Lim. 729; 95 U. S. 465; 118 id. 455; 57 Fed. Rep. 276. See 25 Am. L. Rev. 45, where the subject is discussed at large. The detention and disinfection of immigrants by order of a state board of health, with the purpose of preventing infectious disease, is not a regulation of foreign commerce by a state, within the meaning of the constitution; 57 Fed. Rep. 276; 12 Wheat. 419.

In cases of insurance of ships, the insurer is responsible when the insurance extends to her being moored in port twenty-four hours in safety, if before the twenty-four hours are expired she is ordered to perform quarantine, and any accident contemplated by the policy occur; 1 Marsh. Ins. 264. Where a ship was prevented from complying with her charter party by quarantine regulations, it was held that this was "restraint of princes or rulers and people"; 3 U. S. App. 147. See CHARTER PARTY.

See Baker, Quarantine; 47 Am. St. Rep. 540; POLICE POWER.

In Real Property. The space of forty days during which a widow has a right to remain in her late husband's principal mansion immediately after his death. The right of the widow is also called her quarantine.

In some of the states provision has been made by statute securing to the widow this right for a greater or less space of time. See 4 Kent 62; Digb. Hist. R. P. 110; Walk. Am Law, 9th ed. § 106, 231; 3 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. *272. Quarantine is a personal right, forfeited, by implication of a law, by second marriage; Co. Litt. 32. See Bacon, Abr. Dower (B); Co. Litt. 32 b, 34 b; Co. 2d Inst. 16, 17.

QUARE (Lat.). In Pleading. Wherefore.

This word is used sometimes in the writ in certain actions, but is inadmissible in a material averment in the pleadings, for it is merely interrogatory; and, therefore, when a declaration began with complaining of the defendant, "wherefore with force, etc., he broke and entered" the plaintiff's close, it was considered ill; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (B. 5, 4); Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 34.

QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT. See TRESPASS; TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT.

QUARE EJECIT INFRA TERMINUM. See EJECTMENT.

QUARE IMPEDIT (Lat. why he hinders). In English Law. A real possessory action which can be brought only in the court of common pleas, and lies to recover a presentation when the patron's right is disturbed, or to try a disputed title to an advowson. See DISTURBANCE; Mireh. Advow. 265; 2 Saund. 336 a.

QUARE INCUMBRAVIT. Why he incumbered. A writ which lay against a bishop, who, within six months after the vacation of a benefice, conferred it on his clerk, whilst two others were contending at law for the right of presentation, calling upon him to show cause why he had incumbered the church. Reg. Orig. 32.

QUARE OBSTRUXIT (Lat. why he obstructs). The name of a writ formerly used in favor of one who, having a right to pass through his neighbor's grounds, was prevented enjoying such right, because the owner of the grounds had obstructed the way.

QUARREL. A dispute; a difference. In law, particularly in releases, which are taken most strongly against the releasor, when a man releases all quarrel he is said to release all actions, real and personal. 8 Co. 153.

QUARRY. A place whence stones are dug for the purpose of being employed in building, making roads, and the like. In mining law it is said to be an open excavation where the works are visible at the surface. It is said to be derived from quadratarius, a stone-cutter or squarer. Bainbr. Mines 2.

When a farm is let with an open quarry, the tenant may, when not restrained by his contract, take out the stone; but he has no right to open new quarries. See MINES; WASTE.

QUART. A liquid measure, containing one-fourth part of a gallon.

QUARTER. A measure of length, equal to four inches. See MEASURE.

In the Law of War. By the end of the seventeenth century quarter became a recognized usage of war. It is forfeited only under exceptional circumstances. 1. In case of absolute and overwhelming necessity, as where a small force is incumbered with a large number of prisoners in a savage and hostile country, and may be justified in killing them for their own self-preservation. 2. Where belligerents violate the laws of war they may be refused quarter. 3. By way of retaliation against an enemy who has denied quarter without a cause. Risley, The Law of War.

QUARTER DAYS. The four days of the year on which rent payable quarterly becomes due.

QUARTER DOLLAR. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of twenty-five cents.

Previous to the act of Feb. 21, 1853, c. 79, 10 U. S. Stat. at Large 160, the weight of the quarter-dollar was one hundred and three and one-eighth grains; but coins struck after the passage of that act were of the weight of ninety-six grains. The fineness was not altered by the act cited: of one thousand parts, nine hundred are pure silver and one hundred alloy. By the act of 12th of Feb. 1873, the weight of the quarter-dollar is fixed at one-half that of the half-dollar (twelve and one-half grams); R. S. § 3573; and by act of July 22, 1876, it is made legal tender in all sums public and private not exceeeding ten dollars; 1 Supplement R. S. p. 488.

See HALF-DOLLAR; ANNUAL ASSAY; LEGAL TENDER.

QUARTER-EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of two and a half dollars. See MONEY; COIN.

QUARTER-SALES. In New York a certain fraction of the purchase-money is often conditioned to be paid back on alienation of the estate; and this fine on alienation is expressed as a tenth-sales, a quarter-sales, etc. 7 Cow. 285; 7 Hill 253; 7 N. Y. 490.

QUARTER SEAL. In Scotch Law. The seal kept by the director of the chancery in Scotland is so called. It is in the shape and impression of the fourth part of the great seal Bell, Dict.

QUARTER SESSIONS. A court bearing this name, mostly invested with the trial of criminals. It takes its name from sitting quarterly, or once in three months. See COURT OF QUARTER SESSIONS.

The English courts of quarter sessions were erected during the reign of Edward III. See stat. 36 Edw. III.; Crabb, Eng. Law 278.

QUARTER-YEAR. In the computation of time, a quarter-year consists of ninety-one days. Co. Litt. 135 b; 2 Rolle, Abr. 521, l. 40.

QUARTERING. A barbarous punishment formerly inflicted on criminals by tearing them to pieces by means of four horses, one attached to each limb.

QUARTERING OF SOLDIERS. Furnishing soldiers with board or lodging or both. The constitution of the United States, Amendm. art. 3, provides that "no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law." See Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 373; Rawle, Const. 126.

QUARTEROON. One who has had one of his grandparents of the black or African race.

QUARTO DIE POST (Lat. fourth day after). Appearance-day, which is the fourth day inclusive from the return of the writ; and if the person summoned appears on that day, it is sufficient. On this day, also, the court begins to sit for despatch of business. These three days were originally given as an indulgence. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 278*; Tidd, New Pr. 134. But this practice is now altered. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76. It still obtains in Pennsylvania.

QUASH. In Practice. To overthrow or annul.

When proceedings are clearly irregular and void, the courts will quash them, both in civil and criminal cases: for example, when the array is clearly irregular, as, if the jurors have been selected by persons not authorized by law, it will be quashed. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3342.

In criminal cases, when an indictment is so defective that no judgment can be given upon it, should the defendant be convicted, the court, upon application, will, in general, quash it: as, if it have no jurisdiction of the offence charged, or when the matter charged is not indictable; 1 Burr. 516, 543; Andr. 226; 49 Fed. Rep. 914. It is in the discretion of the court to quash an indictment or to leave the defendant to a motion in arrest of judgment; 1 Cush. 189; 97 N. C. 401; 100 id. 543. When the application to quash is made on the part of the defendant, in English practice, the court generally refuses to quash the indictment when it appears some enormous crime has been committed; Comyns, Dig. Indictment (H); Wils. 325; 3 Term 621; 5 Mod. 13; 6 id. 42; 3 Burr. 1841; Bacon, Abr. Indictment (K).

When the application is made on the part of the prosecution, the indictment will be quashed whenever it is defective so that the defendant cannot be convicted, and the prosecution appears to be bona fide. If the prosecution be instituted by the attorney-general, he may, in some states, enter a nolle prosequi, which has the same effect; 1 Dougl. 239, 240. The application should be made before plea pleaded: Leach 11; 4 How. State Tr. 232; 1 Hale 35; Fost. 231; 35 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 710; and before the defendant's recognizance has been forfeited; 1 Salk. 380. See CASSETUR BREVE.

QUASI (Lat. as if, almost). A term used to mark a resemblance, and which supposes a difference between two objects. Dig. 11. 7. 1. 8. 1. See 60 Ill. 402. It is exclusively a term of classification, Prefixed to a term of Roman law, it implies that the conception to which it serves as an index is connected with the conception with which the comparison is instituted by a strong superficial analogy or resemblance. It negatives the idea of identity, but points out that the conceptions are sufficiently similar for one to be classed as the equal of the other; Maine, Anc. Law 332. Civilians use the expressions quasi-contractus, quasi-delictum, quasi-possessio, quasi-traditio, etc.

QUASI-AFFINITY. In Civil Law. The affinity which exists between two persons, one of whom has been betrothed to the kindred of the other, but who have never been married. See AFFINITY.

QUASI-CONTRACTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An obligation similar in character to that of a contract, but which arises not from an agreement of parties but from some relation between them, or from a voluntary act of one of them.

An obligation springing from voluntary and lawful acts of parties in the absence of any agreement. Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 171.

An obligation which grows out of certain relations between persons whereby they become bound to each other by duties similar to those arising from a contract. Morey, Rom. L. 371.

Quasi-contracts were a well-defined class under the civil law. By the civil code of Louisiana they are defined to be "the lawful and purely voluntary acts of a man, from which there results any obligation whatever to a third person and sometimes a reciprocal obligation between parties. In quasi-contract the obligation arises not from consent, as in the case of contracts, but from the law or natural equity. The term was not found in the common law, but it has been taken by writers of the common law from the Roman law and may be considered now as quite domesticated even to the extent of being used as the title of a very valuable common-law text book; Keener, Quasi-Contract. The subject will be found treated in a sub-title of CONTRACT, supra. See also CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

It need only be added here that quasi-contracts were in the Roman law of almost infinite variety but were divided into five classes:—1 Negotiorum gestio, the management of the affairs of another, without authority. 2, Tutelæ administratio, the administration of a tutorship. 3. Rei communis administratio, or communio bonorum, the management of common property. 4. Hereditatis aditio, the entering upon an inheritance. 5, Indebiti Solutio, payment by mistake of money not due. They all have certain general features, as that from their nature each has an affinity with some contract; and persons under disabilities may be affected by them though incapable of contracting. A common error which needs to be avoided is the confusion of quasi-contracts with implied contracts. The latter are real contracts, differing from express contracts in the nature of the proof by which they are established, but in quasi-contracts the essential part of the contract, the agreement or convention, is wanting; Maine, Anc. L. 332. See, generally, Inst. 3. 28; Dig. 3. 5; Ayl. Pand. b. 4, tit. 31; 1 Bro. Civ. L. 386; Ersk. Inst. 3. 3. 16; Pard. n. 192; Poth. Obl. n. 113; Merl. Rép. h. t.; Keener, Quasi-Contract; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. Lect. x.; Morey, Rom. Law 371; Sohm, Inst. Rom. Law 315–21.

QUASI-CORPORATIONS. A term applied to those bodies or municipal societies which, though not vested with the general powers of corporations, are yet recognized, by statutes or immemorial usage, as persons or aggregate corporations, with precise duties which may be enforced, and privileges which may be maintained by suits at law. They may be considered quasi-corporations, with limited powers, co-extensive with the duties imposed upon them by statute or usage, but restrained from a general use of the authority which belongs to those metaphysical persons by the common law. See 13 Mass. 192; L. R. 1 H. L. 293; Boone, Corp. § 10.

Among quasi-corporations may be ranked counties, and also towns, townships, parishes, hundreds, and other political divisions of counties, which are established without an express charter of incorporation; commissioners of a county, most of the commissions instituted for public use, supervisors of highways, overseers, or guardians or the poor, loan officers of a county, trustees of a school fund, trustees of the poor, school districts, trustees of schools, judges of a court authorized to take bonds to themselves in their official capacity, and the like, who are invested with corporate powers sub modo and for a few specified purposes only. The governor of a state has been held a quasi-corporation sole; 8 Humph. 176; so has a trustee of a friendly society in whom, by statute, property is vested, and by and against whom suits may be brought; see 1 B. & Ald. 157; so of a levee district organized by statute to reclaim land from overflow; 51 Cal. 406; and fire departments having by statute certain powers and duties which necessarily invest them with a limited capacity to sue and be sued; 1 Sweeny 224. It may be laid down as a general rule that where a body is created by statute possessing powers and duties which involve incidentally a qualified capacity to sue and be sued, such body is to be considered a quasi-corporation; id.; 51 Cal. 406. See, generally, Ang. & A. Corp. § 24; 13 Am. Dec. 524; Beach, Pub. Corp. 971, n. 1003; but not such a body as the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, which has not the capacity to sue and be sued; 4 Whart. 531; Ang. & A. Corp. § 24. See CORPORATION; MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

QUASI-CRIMES. Offences for which some person other than the actual perpetrator is responsible, the perpetrator being presumed to act by command of the responsible party.

Injuries which have been unintentionally caused. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

All offences not crimes or misdemeanors, but which are in the nature of crimes; a class of offences against the public which have not been declared crimes, but wrongs against the general or local public which it is proper should be repressed or punished by forfeitures and penalties. 68 Ill. 375. See 29 Minn. 132.

QUASI-DELICT. In Civil Law. An act whereby a person, without malice, but by fault, negligence, or imprudence not legally excusable, causes injury to another.

A quasi-delict may be public or private; the neglect of the affairs of a community, when it is our duty to attend to them, may be a crime; the neglect of a private matter, under similar circumstances, may be the ground of a civil action. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law, c. 43, p. 265.

QUASI-DEPOSIT. A kind of involuntary bailment, which takes place where a person acquires possession of property lawfully, by finding. Story, Bailm. § 85.

QUASI-DERELICT. The condition of a vessel which is not abandoned, but those on board of which are physically incapable of doing anything for their safety. 1 Newb. Adm. 452.

QUASI-ENTAIL. An estate pur autre vie, to a man and the heirs of his body.

The interest so granted is not properly an estate tail, but so far in the nature of one that it will go to the heir of the body as special occupant during the life of the cestui que vie in the same manner as an estate of inheritance would descend, if limited to the grantee and the heirs of his body.

QUASI-FEE. An estate gained by wrong.

QUASI-OFFENCES. See QUASI-CRIMES.

QUASI-PARTNERS. Partners of lands, goods, or chattels, who are not actual partners, are sometimes so called. Pothier, de Société App. n. 184. See PART-OWNERS.

QUASI-PERSONALTY. Things immovable in point of law; though fixed to things real either actually or fictitiously.

QUASI-POSTHUMOUS CHILD. In Civil Law. One who, born during the life of his grandfather or other male ascendant, was not his heir at the time he made his testament, but who by the death of his father became his heir in his lifetime. Inst. 2. 13. 2; Dig. 28. 3. 13.

QUASI-PUBLIC CORPORATION. See CORPORATION.

QUASI-PURCHASE. This term is used in the civil law to denote that a thing is to be considered as purchased from the presumed consent of the owner of a thing; as, if a man should consume a cheese, which is in his possession and belonging to another, with an intent to pay the price of it to the owner, the consent of the latter will be presumed, as the cheese would have been spoiled by keeping it longer. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 691.

QUASI-REALTY. Things which are fixed in contemplation of law to realty, but movable in themselves, as heirlooms (or limbs of the inheritance), title deeds, court rolls, etc. Whart. Law Lex.

QUASI-TRADITIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A term used to designate that a person is in the use of the property of another, which the latter suffers and does not oppose. Lec. Elem. § 396. It also signifies the act by which the right of property is ceded in a thing to a person who is in possession of it; as, if I loan a boat to Paul, and deliver it to him, and afterwards I sell him the boat, it is not requisite that he should deliver the boat to me to be again delivered to him: there is a quasi-tradition or delivery.

QUATUORVIRI (Lat. four men). In Roman Law. Magistrates who had the care and inspection of roads. Dig 1. 2. 3. 30.

QUAY. A wharf at which to load or land goods. (Sometimes spelled key.)

In its enlarged sense the word quay means the whole space between the first row of houses of a city, and the sea or river; 5 La. 152, 215. So much of the quay as is requisite for the public use of loading and unloading vessels is public property, and cannot be appropriated to private use, but the rest may be private property.

A public quay in a city, dedicated to public use, does not cease to be locus publicus and become private property because it is leased by the public authorities for a purpose subservient to the public use; 140 U. S. 654.

QUE EST MESME (L. Fr.). Which is the same. See QUÆ EST EADEM.

QUE ESTATE (quem statum, or which estate). A plea by which a man prescribes in himself those whose estate he holds. 2 Bla. Com. 270; 18 Viner, Abr. 133–140; Co. Litt. 121 a.

QUEAN. A worthless woman; a strumpet. The meaning of this word, which is now seldom used, is said not to be well ascertained. 2 Rolle, Abr. 296; Bacon, Abr. Slander (U 3).

QUEBEC. One of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. The government is vested in a lieutenant-governor and responsible ministry. There is a legislative council of 24 members and a legislative assembly of 63 members. Quebec is the seat of government. Justice is administered by a chief justice of queen's bench and five puisne judges, the chief justice of the superior court and 26 puisne judges, a judge of the vice-admiralty court, and a judge of sessions of the peace at Montreal.

The judicial system in the province of Quebec is based upon that in France in the last century, while that in Ontario and the other provinces is modelled mainly after the English system.

The province of Quebec is divided into twenty judicial districts, in which circuit and superior courts are held. The circuit court has jurisdiction in cases up to $200, except in Montreal and Quebec, where it is limited to $100. The superior court has unlimited jurisdiction in civil matters beyond that of the circuit. A single superior court judge presides over each court. The court of review is a revisionary tribunal consisting of three judges of the superior court, sitting in Montreal and Quebec, before which all superior court cases and cases in the circuit court over $100 may be re-argued, after decision of a single judge. The judgment of this court—confirming or reversing the original judgment—becomes the judgment of record, but in case of a reversal of the original judgment an appeal may be taken to the court of queen's bench (appeal side) to which appeals may also be taken direct from the first judgment. This court consist of six judges, five of whom constitute a full bench, and sits alternately at Montreal and Quebec. A judge of this court is detailed in both Montreal and Quebec to hold the terms of the criminal court, a duty imposed in country districts upon the judge of the superior court.

In this province (Quebec) the members of the bar are incorporated by act of parliament under the name of "The Bar of the Province of Quebec," with absolute control over their own organization, —both as to admission to its ranks and control and discipline over its members.

The notarial profession is also regularly organized and incorporated. Its members are obliged to take a certain course of study and clerkship before admission. A notary when once admitted becomes a public functionary. Documents executed before him remain always in his custody, and copies only are delivered to the parties, but these copies when authenticated by the notary make proof of themselves in all courts and legal proceedings. Upon the decease of the notary his original documents (minutes, as they are called), all numbered consecutively, are delivered up to the clerk of the superior court and deposited in the archives of that court for future reference. A very elaborate system of registration is in force in all the provinces for all transactions affecting real estate, and throughout the cities and older provinces, Cadastral plans are in force showing the exact position and dimensions of each property with its Cadastral number, which is a sufficient designation of it for legal or registration purposes.

In the province of Quebec either the English or French language may be used in contracts, in writs or other legal proceedings or pleadings, and both languages are used in all official proclamations and in the publication of the statutes.

In the other provinces the English language only is officially used, and the procedure in all the courts —based upon that of England—is quite uniform and similar to that still in use there.

QUEEN. A woman who is sovereign of a kingdom. The wife of a king.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY. By stat. 2 Anne, c. 11, all the revenue of firstfruits and tenths was vested in trustees forever, to form a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings. 1 Bla. Com. 286; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 260–268.

QUEEN CONSORT. The wife of a reigning king. 1 Bla. Com. 218. She is looked upon by the law as a feme sole, as to her power of contracting, suing, etc. Id.

QUEEN DOWAGER. The widow of a king. She has most of the privileges belonging to a queen consort. 1 Bla. Com. 229.

QUEEN-GOLD. A royal revenue belonging to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and due from every person who has made a voluntary fine or offer to the king of ten marks or upwards, in consideration of any grant or privilege conferred by the crown. It is due of record on the recording of the fine. It was last exacted in the reign of Charles I. It is now quite obsolete. 1 Bla. Com. 220–222; Fortescue, de Laud. 398.

QUEEN REGNANT. She who holds the crown in her own right. She has the same duties and prerogatives, etc., as a king. Stat. 1 Car. I. st. 3, c. 1; 1 Bla. Com. 218; 1 Woodd. Lect. 94.

QUEEN'S ADVOCATE. See ADVOCATE.

QUEEN'S COUNSEL. Barristers appointed as counsel to the crown on the nomination of the lord chancellor, taking precedence over ordinary barristers, and having the privilege of wearing a silk gown as their professional robe. See [1898] App. Cas. 252.

QUEEN'S ENEMIES. A phrase used in bills of lading importing a limitation upon the liability of the ship owner under the contract therein contained.

It includes the enemies of the sovereign of the carrier; 34 L. J. C. P. 14. It does not include the acts of an armed band of depredators; 1 Term 27; or a seizure of goods by a foreign revenue official for a breach of revenue laws; 10 Q. B. 517. It is less extensive in its scope than Restraint of Rulers and Princes (q. v.). See PUBLIC ENEMY.

QUEEN'S PROCTOR. A proctor or solicitor representing the crown in the former practice of the courts of probate and divorce. Moz. & W. Law Dict.

QUEENSLAND. A colony of Great Britain including the whole northeastern portion of the continent of Australia. It was separated from New South Wales in 1859. It has a governor appointed by the crown and an assembly consisting of two houses. The legislative council consists of 37 life members appointed by the crown and the legislative assembly of 72 members elected for three years by the people. To compose the courts there are a chief justice, four puisne judges, and three district court judges.

QUERELA (Lat.). An action preferred in any court of justice. The plaintiff was call querens, or complainant, and his brief, complaint, or declaration was called querela. Jacob, Law Dict.

QUERELA CORAM REGE ET CONCILIO DISCUTIENDA ET TERMINANDA. A writ by which one was called to justify a complaint of a trespass made to the king himself, before the king and his council. Reg. Orig. 124.

QUERELA INOFFICIOSI TESTAMENTI (Lat. complaint of an undutiful or unkind will). In Civil Law. A species of action allowed to a child who had been unjustly disinherited, to set aside the will, founded on the presumption of law, in such cases, that the parent was not in his right mind. Calvinus, Lex.; 2 Kent 327; Bell, Dict.

QUESTION. Something in controversy or which may be the subject of controversy. 39 Mich. 45.

A means sometimes employed, in some countries, by torture, to compel supposed great criminals to disclose their accomplices or to acknowledge their crimes.

This torture is called question because, as the unfortunate person accused is made to suffer pain, he is asked questions as to his supposed crime or accomplices. This is unknown in the United States. See Pothier, Procédure Criminelle, sect. 5, art. 2, § 3.

In Evidence. An interrogation put to a witness, requesting him to declare the truth of certain facts as far as he knows them.

Questions are either general or leading. By a general question is meant such a one as requires the witness to state all he knows, without any suggestion being made to him: as, Who gave the blow?

A leading question is one which leads the mind of the witness to the answer, or suggests it to him: as, Did A B give the blow?

The Romans called a question by which the fact or supposed fact which the interrogator expected or wished to find asserted in and by the answer was made known to the proposed respondent, a suggestive interrogation: as, Is not your name A B? See LEADING QUESTION.

In Practice. A point on which the parties are not agreed, and which is submitted to the decision of a judge and jury.

When the doubt or difference arises as to what the law is on a certain state of facts, this is said to be a legal question; and when the party demurs, this is to be decided by the court; when it arises as to the truth or falsehood of facts, this is a question of fact, and is to be decided by the jury. See JURY.

Proof beyond reasonable question is held synonymous with proof beyond reasonable doubt; 103 N. C. 1.

QUESTORES CLASSICI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Officers entrusted with the care of the public money.

Their duties consisted in making the necessary payments from the ærarium, and receiving the public revenues. Of both they had to keep correct accounts in their tabulæ publicæ. Demands which any one might have on the ærarium, and outstanding debts were likewise registered by them. Fines to be paid to the public treasury were registered and exacted by them. They were likewise to provide proper accommodations for foreign ambassadors and such person as were connected with the republic by ties of public hospitality. Lastly, they were charged with the care of the burials and monuments of distinguished men, the expenses for which had been decreed by the senate to be paid by the treasury. Their number at first was confined to two; but this was afterwards increased as the empire became extended. There were questors of cities and of provinces, and questors of the army; the latter were in fact paymasters.

QUESTORES PARRICIDII (Lat.). In Roman Law. Public accusers, two in number, who conducted the accusation of persons guilty of murder or any other capital offence, and carried the sentence into execution. They ceased to be appointed at an early period. Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq.

QUESTUS EST NOBIS. A writ of nuisance, which, by 15 Edw. I., lay against him to whom a house or other thing that caused a nuisance descended or was alienated; whereas, before that statute the action lay only against him who first levied or caused the nuisance to the damage of his neighbor. Cowel.

QUI IMPROVIDE. A supersedeas granted where a writ was erroneously sued out or misawarded.

QUI TAM (Lat. who as well). An action under a statute which imposes a penalty for the doing or not doing an act, and gives that penalty in part to whomsoever will sue for the same, and the other part to the commonwealth, or some charitable, literary, or other institution, and makes it recoverable by action. The plaintiff describes himself as suing as well for the commonwealth, for example, as for himself. Espinasse, Pen. Act 5, 6; 1 Viner, Abr. 197; 1 Salk. ‡29, n.; Bac. Abr.

QUIA (Lat.). In Pleading. Because. This word is considered a term of affirmation. It is sufficiently direct and positive for introducing a material averment. 1 Saund. 117, n. 4; Com. Dig. Pleader (C 77).

QUIA EMPTORES (Lat.). A name sometimes given to the English Statute of Westminster 3, 18 Edw. I. c. 1, which prohibited sub-infeudation; so called from its initial words. 2 Bla. Com. 91. See MANOR; SUB-INFEUDATION; TENURE.

QUIA TIMET (Lat. because he fears). A term applied to preventive or anticipatory remedies. According to Lord Coke, "there be six writs of law that may be maintained quia timet, before any molestation, distress, or impleading: as, First, a man may have his writ or mesne before he be distrained. Second, a warrantia chartæ, before he be impleaded. Third, a monstraverunt, before any distress or vexation. Fourth, an audita querela, before any execution sued. Fifth, a curia claudenda, before any default of enclosure. Sixth, a ne injuste vexes, before any distress or molestation. And these are called brevia anticipantia, writs of prevention." Co. Litt. 100. And see 7 Bro. P. C. 125.

These writs are generally obsolete. In chancery, when it is contemplated to prevent an expected injury, a bill quia timet is filed. See BILL QUIA TIMET.

QUIBBLE. A slight difficulty raised without necessity or propriety; a cavil.

No justly eminent member of the bar will resort to a quibble in his argument. It is contrary to his oath, which is to be true to the court as well as to the client; and bad policy, because by resorting to it he will lose his character as a man of probity.

QUICK DESPATCH. A steamer chartered to be discharged with customary "quick despatch" arrived in port, March 8th, was ordered to berth March 10th, and began to discharge March 11th at one o'clock, and completed March 20th at noon; discharged by "sticks" instead of platform scales, and from but one hatch, while there were four to be discharged from. It was held that this was not "customary quick despatch"; 28 U. S. App. 383. See DEMURRAGE; LAY DAYS.

QUICK WITH CHILD. See QUICKENING.

QUICKENING. In Medical Jurisprudence. The sensation a mother has of the motion of the child she has conceived.

The period when quickening is first experienced varies from the tenth to the twenty-fifth, but is usually about the sixteenth week from conception; Denman, Midw. 129.

It was formerly supposed that either the child was not alive until the time of quickening, or that it had acquired some new kind of existence that it did not possess before: hence the presumption of law that dates the life of the child from that time.

The child is, in truth, alive from the first moment of conception, and, according to its age and state of development, has different modes of manifesting its life, and, during a portion of the period of gestation, by its motion. By the growth of the embryo, the womb is enlarged until it becomes of too great a size to be contained in the pelvis, it then rises to the abdomen, when the motion of the fœtus is for the first time felt.

Quickening as indicating a distinct point in the existence of the fœtus has no foundation in physiology; for it arises merely from the relation which the organs of gestation bear to the parts that surround them; it may take place early or late, according to the condition of these different parts, but not from any inherent vitality for the first time manifested by the fœtus.

As life, by law, is said to commence when a woman first becomes quick with child, so procuring an abortion after that period is a misdemeanor. Before this time, formerly the law did not interfere to prevent a pregnant woman convicted of a capital offence from being executed; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 413. If, however, the humanity of the law of the present day would not allow a woman to be executed who is, as Blackstone terms it, privément enceinte, Com. 129, i. e. pregnant, although not quick, it would be but carrying out the same desire to interfere with long-established rules, to hold that the penalty for procuring abortion should also extend to the whole period of pregnancy.

"Quick with child is having conceived; 49 N. Y. 86; with quick child is where the child has quickened." 8 C. & P. 265; approved in 1 Leg. Gaz. Rep. (Pa.) 183; 2 Whar. & St. Med. Jur., 4th ed. III. § 7. See 26 Am. Dec. 60, n.; 2 Zabr. 52.

QUID JURIS CLIMAT. A judicial writ issued out of the record of a fine which lay for the grantee of a reversion or remainder, when the particular tenant would not attorn. Cowel.

QUID PRO QUO (Lat. what for what). A term denoting the consideration of a contract. See Co. Litt. 47 b; 7 M. & G. 998.

QUIDAM (Lat. some one; somebody). In French Law. A term used to express an unknown person, or one who cannot be named.

A quidam is usually described by the features of his face, the color of his hair, his height, his clothing, and the like, in any process which may be issued against him. Merlin, Répert.

QUIET ENJOYMENT. The name of a covenant in a lease, by which the lessor agrees that the lessee shall peaceably enjoy the premises leased. This covenant goes to the possession, and not to the title; 3 Johns. 471; 5 id. 120; 2 Dev. 388; 3 id. 200. A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not extend as far as a covenant of warranty; 1 Aik. 233.

The covenant for quiet enjoyment is broken only by an entry, or lawful expulsion from, or some actual disturbance in, the possession; 3 Johns. 471; 8 id. 198; 15 id. 483; 7 Wend. 281; 2 Hill N. Y. 105; Ham. Cov. 35; 9 Metc. 63; 4 Whart. 86; 4 Cow. 340. But the tortious entry of the covenantor, without title, is a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment; 7 Johns. 376. The covenant for quiet possession in a deed merges all previous representatives as to the possession, and limits the liability growing out of them; 130 U. S. 643.

See COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT.

QUIET TITLE. See BILL TO QUIET POSSESSION AND TITLE.

QUIETUS (Lat. freed or acquitted). In English Law. A discharge; an acquittance.

An instrument by the clerk of the pipe and auditors in the exchequer, as proof of their acquittance or discharge of accountants. Cowel.

Discharge of a judge or attorney-general. 3 Mod. *99.

In American Law. The discharge of an executor by the probate court. 4 Mas. 131.

QUINTO EXACTUS (Lat.). In Old English Law. The fifth call or last requisition of a defendant sued to outlawry.

QUIT-CLAIM. In Conveyancing. A form of deed of the nature of a release containing words of grant as well as release. 3 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 606.

The term is in constant and general use in American law to denote a deed substantially the same as a release in English law. It presupposes a previous or precedent conveyance or a subsisting estate and possession; Thornt. Conv. 44. It is a conveyance at common law, but differs from a release in that it is regarded as an original conveyance in American law, at least in some states; 6 Pick. 499; 3 Conn. 398; 9 Ohio 96; 5 Ill. 117; Me. Rev. Stat. c. 73, § 14; Miss. Code 1857, p. 309, art. 17. The operative words are remise, release, and forever quit-claim; Thornt. Conv. 44. Covenants of warranty against incumbrances by the grantor are usually added. See a full article in 12 Cent. L. J. 127; 34 id. 174.

The rule that a purchaser by a quit-claim deed is not to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice of a prior incumbrance; 85 Ala. 80; 89 Tex. 214; has no application where the registry laws require the recording of such an incumbrance in order to make it a lien on lands in the hands of a subsequent purchaser; 47 Fed. Rep. 420. One accepting a quit-claim deed from his grantor is bound, at his peril, to ascertain what equities, if any, exist against his title; 35 Neb. 361; but the receipt of the quit-claim deed does not of itself prevent the grantee from showing that he is a bona fide purchaser; 148 U. S. 21, 31, 49; and the grantee under such deed may be a bona fide purchaser under the recording acts; 146 Ind. 77.

A quit-claim deed conveys only the interest of the grantor at the time of the conveyance; 39 Neb. 741; but such a deed is as effectual to divest and transfer a complete title as any other form of conveyance; 148 U. S. 21. Such a deed from a judgment debtor of land, sold under execution, passes merely the right of redemption and does not relieve the land of dower of the debtor's wife, though she did not reside in the state when the deed was executed; 19 Mont. 23. A title acquired subsequently to the execution of a quit-claim, with special warranty simply, does not enure to the grantee, and a subsequent purchaser from the grantor is not affected by the recording of the deed executed before the grantor acquired the title; 90 Me. 457.

Under a Massachusetts statute, a quit-claim deed takes precedence over a prior deed, recorded subsequently to the quit-claim, where the grantee in the latter is without notice of the other; 167 Mass. 443. A quit-claim deed, duly recorded, is held to be within the protection of a statute providing that deeds shall take effect only on delivery for record; 49 Neb. 187, where will be found much learning on the subject of these deeds.

QUIT-RENT. A rent paid by the tenant of the freehold, by which he goes quit and free,—that is, discharged from any other rent. 2 Bla. Com. 42.

In England, quit-rents were rents reserved to the king or a proprietor, on an absolute grant of waste land, for which a price in gross was at first paid, and a mere nominal rent reserved as a feudal acknowledgment of tenure. Inasmuch as no rent of this description can exist in the United States, when a quit-rent is spoken of some other interest must be intended. 5 Call 364. A perpetual rent reserved on a conveyance in fee-simple is sometimes known by the name of quit-rent in Massachusetts. See GROUND-RENT; RENT.

QUO ANIMO (Lat. with what intention). The intent; the mind with which a thing has been done: as, the quo animo with which the words were spoken may be shown by the proof of conversations of the defendant relating to the original defamation. 19 Wend. 296.

QUO JURE, WRIT OF. In English Law. The name of writ commanding the defendant to show by what right he demands common of pasture in the land of the complainant who claims to have a fee in the same. Fitzh. N. B. 299.

QUO MINUS (Lat.). The name of a writ. In England, when the king's debtor is sued in the court of the exchequer, he may sue out a writ of quo minus, in which he suggests that he is the king's debtor, and that the defendant has done him the injury or damage complained of, quo minus sufficiens existit, by which he is less able to pay the king's debt. This was originally requisite in order to give jurisdiction to the court of exchequer; but now this suggestion is a mere form. 3 Bla. Com. 46.

QUO WARRANTO (Lat. by what authority). In Practice. The name of a writ (and also of the whole pleading) by which the government commences an action to recover an office or franchise from the person or corporation in possession of it.

The writ commands the sheriff to summon the defendant to appear before the court to which it is returnable, to show (quo warranto) by what authority he claims the office or franchise. It is a writ of right, a civil remedy to try the mere right to the franchise or office, where the person in possession never had a right to it or has forfeited it by neglect or abuse; 3 Bla. Com. 262, 263.

The action of quo warranto was prescribed by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I., and is a limitation upon the royal prerogative. Before this statute, the king, by virtue of his prerogative, sent commissions over the kingdom to inquire into the right to all franchises, quo jure quove nomine illi retinent, etc.; and, as they were grants from the crown, if those in possession of them could not show a charter, the franchises were seized into the king's hands without any judicial proceeding. Like all other original civil writs, the writ of quo warranto issued out of chancery, and was returnable alternatively before the king's bench or justices in eyre; Co. 2d Inst. 277, 494; 2 Term 549.

The writ of quo warranto has given place to an information in the nature of quo warranto. This, though in form a criminal; see 14 Fla. 256; is in substance a civil, proceeding, to try the mere right to the franchise or office; 3 Bla. Com. 263; 1 S. & R. 382; Ang. & A. Corp. 469; 2 Kent 312; 3 Term 199; 23 Wend. 537, 591; but see 13 Ill. 66. Leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto rests in the sound discretion of the court, and, without strong grounds for questioning defendant's title to the office, the court will refuse to grant it; 6 Houst. 487. A constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, does not guarantee the right of trial by jury in quo warranto proceedings; 16 Wash. St. 382.

If the proceedings refer to the usurpation of the franchises of a municipal corporation, the right to file the information is in the state, at the discretion of the attorney-general; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1613; 14 Fla. 256; see 59 Miss. 453; 126 Mass. 300; 81 N. C. 298; 49 N. J. L. 515; not of citizens; id.; see 20 Pa. 518; 51 N. J. L. 180. Individuals cannot take proceedings to dissolve a corporation; 16 S. & R. 144; but in regard to the election of a corporate officer the writ may issue at the suit of the attorney-general or of any person interested. 1 Zab. 9; 20 Pa. 415; but a private citizen must have some interest; 50 Mo. 97. See 80 Ill. 496; 46 Conn. 479. In Pennsylvania it was held that a stock-holder, whose votes were wrongly rejected at a corporate election, was the proper party to institute proceedings of quo warranto against the officers who claimed to have been elected, though the petitioner was at the same time elected to an office and his title was in dispute; 168 Pa. 582. The attorney-general may act without leave of court; 83 Pa. 105; 38 N. J. L. 282; 12 Fla. 190; but a private relator may not; 15 S. & R. 127; s. c. 16 Am. Dec. 531; and the court will use its discretion in granting the writ; 70 Ill. 25; 2 Johns. 184. Leave is granted on a petition or motion with affidavits, upon which a rule to show cause is granted; 70 Ill. 25. The writ lies against the corporate body, if it is to restrain a usurpation; 50 Mo. 56; or enforce a forfeiture; 57 N. H. 498; but if it is to inquire whether a corporation has been legally organized, the writ lies against the individuals; 15 Wend. 113; s. c. 30 Am. Dec. 34. Whether a corporation de facto is also one de jure can be determined only in quo warranto; 125 Ill. 664.

In New York a statutory action in the nature of a quo warranto has been substituted. Code Civ. Proc. § 1983. This is a civil writ of legal, not equitable, cognizance; 52 N. Y. 576. So in other states it is subject to the rules strictly applicable to civil proceedings; 50 Ala. 568; 44 Mo. 154; Boone, Corp. § 161. The terms "quo warranto" and "information in the nature of a quo warranto" are synonymous; 34 Wisc. 197; contra, 25 Mo. 555; 26 Ark. 281.

Although quo warranto proceedings will lie against a municipal corporation in this country, yet they are seldom employed. See a case in 32 Vt. 50; and see 66 Mo. 328; 30 Ala. 66. They will lie against members of a city council; 70 Pa. 465; 80 N. Y. 117; 23 Neb. 365; contra, 47 Cal. 624; 20 Kans. 692; a county treasurer; 15 Ill. 517; district school trustees; 84 Ill. 162; a sheriff; 5 Mich. 146; 88 Pa. 105; a lieutenant-governor; 12 Fla. 265; a governor; 4 Wisc. 567; a judge of probate; 77 N. C. 18; a mayor; 55 N. Y. 525; an elector of president of the United States, proceedings being taken in the name of the United States; 8 S. C. 400; a major-general of militia; 5 R. I. 1; so of other militia officers; 26 Pa. 31; 2 Green, Law 84; but see 1 Rich. 42; superintendent of the poor; 73 Mich. 234; but not against a policeman; 84 Mich. 223. There must first be a user of the office; 83 Ill. 128; 5 T. R. 85; but taking the oath; id.; or exercising its functions without taking the oath; 52 Miss. 665; is enough.

Quo warranto lies against a corporation to determine whether there has been a misuser or a nonuser of corporate franchises, or whether the corporation has usurped franchises never granted to it; but does not lie to test the legality of any act of the corporation; 37 Mo. App. 496.

Quo warranto is the only direct and adequate remedy for trying title to public office; 58 N. J. L. 340. The review of an election to public office by certiorari may determine collateral questions respecting validity of laws or ordinances, but can have no effect as a bar in a subsequent information in the nature of a quo warranto; id. 325.

The validity of proceedings for the election of a minor officer such as janitor of a court-house, may be reviewed on certiorari; id. 319.

An incumbent cannot proceed in quo warranto against one not in possession of the office, he must await the attack of his adversary; id. 325.

Pleadings in quo warranto are anomalous. In ordinary legal proceedings, the plaintiff, whether he be the state or a person, is bound to show a case against the defendant. But in an information of quo warranto, as well as in the writ for which it is substituted, the order is reversed. The state is not bound to show anything, but the defendant is bound to show that he has a right to the franchise or office in question; and if he fail to show authority, judgment must be given against him; 4 Burr. 2146, 2127; Ang. & A. Corp. 696. To the writ of quo warranto the defendant simply pleaded his charter, which was a full answer to the writ; just as before the statute of Edward I. the production of the charter to the king's commissioners was full authority for the possession of the franchise or office. But to an information of quo warranto the plea of the defendant consists of his charter, with an absque hoc denying that he usurped the franchise, and concludes with a verification. The plea is in form a special traverse, but in substance it is not such. The information was originally a criminal proceeding, to punish the usurpation of the franchise by a fine, as well as to seize the franchise; therefore the information charged usurpation, and the defendant was compelled to deny the usurpation, as well as to show his charter, which he did in the form of an absque hoc to his plea. But when the proceeding ceased to be criminal, and, like the writ of quo warranto, was applied to the mere purpose of trying the civil right to the franchise, the absque hoc denying the usurpation became immaterial, though it is still retained in the forms; 2 Jacob, Law Dict. 374; 4 Cow. 106, note. In Coke's Entries 351, there is a plea to an information of quo warranto without the absque hoc. The absque hoc, being immaterial, should not be answered by the replication, as it must always be in a special traverse; but the charter, in the first part of the plea, though occupying the place of an inducement, must be denied by the replication, its existence and character being the sole question in controversy upon which the legality of the acts of the corporation turns; Gilb. Ev. 6, 145; 10 Mod. 111, 296.

Until the statute 32 Geo. III. c. 58, the defendant could not plead double in an information of quo warranto to forfeit an office or franchise; 1 P. Wms. 220; 4 Burr. 2146, n.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 479; 5 Bac. Abr. 449; 4 Cow. 113; 2 Dutch. 215.

In information of quo warranto there are two forms of judgment. When it is against an officer or against individuals, the judgment is ouster; but when it is against a corporation by its corporate name, the judgment was ouster and seizure. In the first case, there being no franchise forfeited, there is none to seize; in the last case, there is: consequently the franchise is seized; 2 Kent 312, and note; 2 Term 521, 550. Now judgment is ouster and dissolution; 15 Wend. 113; s. c. 30 Am. Dec. 34; but there may be a judgment of ouster of a particular franchise, and not of the whole charter; 15 Wend. 113. See, as to the judgment, 32 Vt. 50; 4 Cow. 120. By such judgment of ouster and seizure the franchises are not destroyed, but exist in the hands of the state; but the corporation was destroyed, and ceased to be the owner or possessor of lands or goods, or rights or credits. The lands reverted to the grantor and his heirs, and the goods escheated to the state. But, later, it has been held that the judgment must be confined to seizure of the franchises; if it be extended to seizure of the property, so far it is erroneous; 1 Blackf. 267.

Quo warranto lies against a corporation to determine its right to exercise its franchises, but not to divest it of the ownership of property, unless acquired by a usurpation of the proprietary rights of the state; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 1051. See SCIRE FACIAS; 30 Barb. 588.

The principle of forfeiture is that the franchise is a trust; and all the terms of the charter are conditions of the trust; and if any one of the conditions of the trust be violated, it will work a forfeiture of the charter. And the corporate powers must be construed strictly, and must be exercised in the manner and in the forms and by the agents prescribed in the charter; 2 Kent 298, 299; 1 Bla. Com, 485; 13 Viner, Abr. 511; 13 Pet. 587; 5 Wend. 211; 2 Term 546; 4 Gill & J. 121.

Cases of forfeiture may be divided into two great classes. Cases of perversion: as, where a corporation does an act inconsistent with the nature, and destructive of the ends and purposes, of the grant. In such cases, unless the perversion is such as to amount to an injury to the public who are interested in the franchise; 34 Pa. 283; it will not work a forfeiture. Cases of usurpation: as, where a corporation exercises a power which it has no right to exercise. In such cases the cause of forfeiture is not determined by any question of injury to the public, but the abuse which will work a forfeiture need not be of any particular measure or extent; 3 Term 216, 246; 23 Wend. 242; 34 Miss. 688; 21 Ill. 65. See 30 Ala. N. S. 66. In case of usurpation of an office or franchise by an individual, it must be of a public nature to be reached by this writ; 21 Ill. 65; 28 Vt. 594, 714; 9 Cush. 596.

In England corporations are the creatures of the crown, and on dissolution their franchises revert to the crown; and they may be re-granted by the crown either to the old, or to the new, or to the old and new, corporators: and such grant restores the old rights, even to sue on a bond given to the old corporation, and the corporation is restored to the full enjoyment of its ancient liberties; and if it were a corporation by prescription it would still be so; 2 Term 524, 543; 3 id. 241. In the United States, corporations are the creatures of the legislature, and on dissolution their franchises revert to the state: and the legislature can exercise the same powers by legislation over the franchises, and with the same effects, as the crown can in England; Ang. & A. Corp. 652 (subject, however, at the present time, to constitutional provision that corporations must be created by general acts; see GENERAL LAWS; STATUTES).

By the statute of Anne, c. 20, an information in the nature of quo warranto may by leave of court be applied to disputes between party and party about the right to a corporate office or franchise; 4 Zabr. 529; 1 Dutch. 354; 32 Pa. 478; 33 Miss. 508; 7 Cal. 393, 432. See 75 Mich. 508. And the person at whose instance the proceeding is instituted is called the relator; 3 Bla. Com. 264. The court will not give leave to private informers to use the king's name and suit to call in question the validity of a franchise, when such persons apply under very unfavorable circumstances; 4 Burr. 2123. As to where the burden falls of showing the lawful or unlawful character of a franchise or right, see 28 Pa. 383; 5 Mich. 146; 100 Cal. 87. Where a proceeding to oust the incumbent of an office is prosecuted in the name of the party asserting title to such office, the burden of proof is on plaintiff; 93 Ky. 600; 58 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 883. The information, it is said, may be filed after the expiration of the term of office; 2 Jones No. C. 124; but see High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 633; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 35, n.

See High, Extr. Leg. Rem.; 30 Am. Dec. 33 and full note; Boone, Corp.; Ang. & A. Corp.

QUOAD HOC (Lat. as to this; with respect to this). A term frequently used to signify, as to the thing named, the law is so and so.

QUOD BILLA CASSETUR. See BILLA CASSETUR; CASSETUR BREVE.

QUOD CLERICI BENEFICIATI DE CANCELLARIA. A writ to exempt a clerk of the chancery from the contribution towards the proctors of the clergy in parliament, etc. Reg. Orig. 261.

QUOD COMPUTET (Lat. that he account). The name of an interlocutory judgment in an action of account-render; also the name of a decree in the case of creditors' bills against executors or administrators. Such a decree directs the master to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors, to cause the creditors, upon due and public notice, to come before him to prove their debts, at a certain place and within a limited period, and also directs the master to take an account of all personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator; Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 548. See JUDGMENT; ACCOUNT; CAPIAS AD COMPUTANDUM.

QUOD CUM (Lat.). In Pleading. For that whereas. A form of introducing matter of inducement in those actions in which introductory matter is allowed to explain the nature of the claim: as, assumpsit and case. Hardr. 1; 2 Show. 180.

This form is not allowable to introduce the matter which constitutes the gravamen of the charge, as such matter must be stated by positive averment, while quod cum introduces the matter which depends upon it by way of recital merely. Hence in those actions, as trespass vi et armis, in which the complaint is stated without matter of inducement, quod cum cannot be properly used; 2 Bulstr. 214. But its improper use is cured by verdict; 1 P. A. Browne 68; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 86).

QUOD EI DEFORCEAT (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ given by stat. Westm. 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 4, to the owners of a particular estate, as for life, in dower, by the curtesy, or in fee-tail, who are barred of the right of possession by a recovery had against them through their default or non-appearance in a possessory action; by which the right was restored to him who had been thus unwarily deforced by his own default. 3 Bla. Com. 193.

QUOD PERMITTAT (Lat.). In English Law. That he permit. The name of a writ which lies for the heir of him who is disseised of his common of pasture against the heir of the disseisor, he being dead. Termes de la Ley.

QUOD PERMITTAT PROSTERNERE (Lat. that he give leave to demolish). In English Law. The name of a writ which commands the defendant to permit the plaintiff to abate the nuisance of which complaint is made, or otherwise to appear in court and to show cause why he will not. On proof of the facts, the plaintiff is entitled to have judgment to abate the nuisance and to recover damages. This proceeding, on account of its tediousness and expense, has given way to a special action on the case.

QUOD PERSONA NEC PREBENDARI. A writ which lay for spiritual persons, distrained in their spiritual possessions, for payment of a fifteenth with the rest of the parish. Fitz. Nat. Brev. 175.

QUOD PROSTRAVIT (Lat.). The name of a judgment upon an indictment for a nuisance, that the defendant abate such nuisance.

QUOD RECUPERET. See JUDGMENT QUOD RECUPERET.

QUORUM. Used substantively, quorum signifies the number of persons belonging to a legislative assembly, a corporation, society, or other body, required to transact business. A quorum is such a number of the officers or members of any body as is competent by law or constitution to transact business. 18 Col. 18. There is a difference between an act done by a definite number of persons, and one performed by an indefinite number; in the first case a majority is required to constitute a quorum, unless the law expressly directs that another number may make one; in the latter case any number who may be present may act, the majority of those present having, as in other cases, the right to act; 7 Cow. 402; 9 B. & C. 856; 34 Vt. 316; Beach, Pub. Corp. 485; 27 Miss. 517.

It has been said that there are two rules as to quorum in legislative bodies: one, where the quorum is fixed by the power creating the body, in which case a majority of the specified quorum may transact business; the other, where the quorum is not fixed by such power, in which case the general rule is that a quorum is a majority of all the members; 108 N. C. 678; Cush. Elect. § 247.

In England where the articles of a company provide that the business of a corporation shall be conducted by not less than a specified number of directors, the words are mandatory, and at least the specified number must join in the performance of any act; 16 Ch. D. 681.

In a private corporation a majority of the directors must be present to constitute a quorum, unless the charter, a valid by-law, or a usage provides a different number; 3 Thomps. Corp. § 3913; 23 N. H. 555; but when a quorum is present a majority may act; 92 Mo. 79. It is settled that those stockholders who attend a duly called stockholders' meeting may transact the business of that meeting although a majority in interest or number are not present; 1 Cook, St. & Stockh. § 607. Where a meeting is composed of an indefinite number of persons like stockholders, that is the rule; but where a definite number is involved, as directors, a majority must be present; 87 Pa. 42; 10 W. N. C. 85; 5 Blatch. 585.

Where articles of association did not prescribe the number of directors necessary for a quorum, it was held that the number who usually transacted the business constituted a quorum; L. R. 4 Eq. 233. A single shareholder was held not to constitute a meeting; 2 Q. B. Div. 26; at least two persons are necessary to make a corporate meeting; 46 L. J. 104. Where one stockholder, holding also proxies of the three remaining stockholders, held a meeting and voted and elected officers, the meeting was held invalid; W. N. [1877] 223. When an authority is confided to several persons for a private purpose, all must join in the act, unless otherwise authorized; 6 Johns. 38; 17 Abb. Pr. 201; otherwise if the trust is a continuous public duty; 17 Abb. Pr. 201. See AUTHORITY; MAJORITY; PLURALITY; MEETINGS; Cook, Stockholders. A majority of a board of directors is a quorum, and a majority of such quorum can act; 19 N. J. Eq. 402; so of a board of selectmen of a town; Maine Laws (1880) 225.

The rule of the lower house of congress, that the names of the members present who do not vote shall be noted and counted in determining the presence of a quorum to transact business, is a constitutional mode of ascertaining the presence of a quorum; 144 U. S. 1. In such case no quorum is present until such a number convene.

QUOT. In Scotch Law. The twentieth part of the movables, computed without computation of debts, was so called.

Formerly the bishop was entitled, in all confirmations, to the quot of the testament. Erskine, Inst. 3. 9. 11.

QUOTA. That part which each one is to bear of some expense: as, his quota of this debt; that is, his proportion of such debt.

QUOTATION. In Practice. The allegation of some authority or case, or passage of some law, in support of a position which it is desired to establish.

The transcript of a part of a book or writing from a book or paper into another.

If the quotation is fair, and not so extensive as to extract the whole value or the most valuable part of an author, it will not be a violation of the copyright. It is mostly difficult to define what is a fair quotation. When the quotation is unfair, an injunction will lie to restrain the publication. See 17 Ves. 424; 1 Bell, Com. 121.

"That part of a work of one author found in another," observed Lord Ellenborough, "is not of itself piracy, or sufficient to support an action; a man may adopt part of the work of another; he may so make use of another's labors for the promotion of science and the benefit of the public." 1 Camp. 94. See Curtis, Copyr. 242; 3 Myl. & C. 737; 17 Ves. 422; 2 Stor. 100; 2 Beav. 6; ABRIDGMENT; COPYRIGHT; PIRACY.

QUOUSQUE. A Latin adverb, which signifies how long, how far, until.

In old conveyances it is used as a word of limitation; 10 Co. 41.

In practice, it is the name of an execution which is to have force until the defendant shall do a certain thing. Of this kind is the capias ad satisfaciendum, by virtue of which the body of the defendant is taken into execution, and he is imprisoned until he shall satisfy the execution; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3371.

R.

RACHETUM (Fr. racheter, to redeem). In Scotch Law. Ransom: corresponding to Saxon weregild, a pecuniary composition for an offence. Skene; Jacob, Law Dict.

RACING. The offering of prizes or purses of a definite sum by a racing association, to be awarded to the successful horses in a race, and to be paid out of the general funds of the association, made up in part of entrance fees paid by the owners of the competing horses, is not a violation of the constitutional provision against gambling. 6 Park. Cr. Rep. 256.

See HORSE RACE.

RACK. An engine with which to torture a supposed criminal, in order to extort a confession of his supposed crime and the names of his supposed accomplices.

RACK RENT. In English Law. The full extended value of land left by lease, payable by a tenant for life or years. Wood, Inst. 192.

RADIUS. A straight line drawn from the centre of a circle to any point of the circumference. Its length is half the diameter of that circle, or is the space between the centre and the circumference. 40 La. Ann. 174.

An act prohibiting private markets within a radius of six squares of any public market was held to meet six squares measured on city streets; 41 La. Ann. 46.

A contract not to practise dentistry within a radius of ten miles was held a valid contract not to practise within ten miles of the centre point of the village; 47 Conn. 175.

RADOUR. In French Law. A term including the repairs made to a ship, and a fresh supply of furniture and victuals, munitions, and other provisions required for the voyage. Pardessus, n. 602.

RAFFLE. A kind of lottery. A raffle may be described as a species of "adventure or hazard," but has been held not to be a lottery. 2 Mills (S. C.) 128.

See LOTTERY.

RAFT. See LOGS.

RAGMAN'S-ROLL, or RAGIMUND'S ROLL. A roll, called from one Ragimund, or Ragimont, a legate in Scotland, who, summoning all the beneficed clergymen in that kingdom, caused them on oath to give in the true value of their benefices, according to which they were afterwards taxed by the court of Rome. Whart. Law Lex.

RAILROAD. A road graded and having rails of iron or other material for the wheels of railroad cars to run upon.

In their modern form, railroads are usually owned by corporations; 2 Col. 673; 18 Pa. 187. But a private individual may construct and work a railroad if he can obtain a right of way by purchase; 70 Pa. 210; L. R. 4 H. L. 171; 30 Vt. 182.

Railroads were once regarded as public highways upon which private individuals might place their cars, to be drawn by the company; 12 Gray 180; 63 Pa. 18. A land grant conditioned that the road should be a public highway for the government, free of toll, applied only to the tracks; 93 U. S. 442.

Railroad and railway are ordinarily interchangeable terms; 136 Pa. 96; 30 Minn. 522; 88 Fed. Rep. 588; where a summons was against a railroad company and a judgment was entered against a railway, it was held immaterial; 89 Ind. 88; so in 83 Ala. 518. But in 60 Mo. 334, railway was held to mean the rails when laid, and railroad the highway in which the railway is laid.

A railroad and a street railway are distinct and different things; 2 Duv. 175. Whether "railroad" in a statute includes street railways depends upon the general intent of the act and the circumstances. Thus an act forbidding the obstruction of a railroad track applies to both; 74 Ga. 78; so does an act giving powers to railroad companies to enter into operating contracts; 24 Ill. 52; and an act authorizing the lease of one railroad to another; 89 Pa. 210; and an act giving a right of action against any railroad for death by negligence; 10 Bush 231; and an act relating to crossing the tracks of a railroad; 22 So. Rep. (Ala.) 279; but a constitutional clause forbidding the merger of competing railroads was held not to apply to street railways; 136 Pa. 96; and so of an act giving a mechanic's lien upon a "railroad or other structure;" 2 Wash. St. 115 (contra, 3 Mo. App. 559); and an early act (1857) giving a penal action against railroad companies for demanding fares in excess of the amount allowed by law; 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 357; and an act giving a laborer's lien upon a railroad or other structure and the land upon which it is erected; 25 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 1084. A passenger railway in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, where there are no streets, but only country roads, is not a street passenger railway within the constitution of the state which requires local consent for building such; 175 Pa. 33.

A railroad company is a quasi-public corporation and owes certain duties to the public; 27 U. S. App. 1. In 128 U. S. 182, it was said that a railroad company is a private corporation though its uses are public. In 169 U. S. 466, it was said that a railroad is a public highway and is created for public purposes.

The charter of a public railroad requires the grant of the supreme legislative authority of the state; 3 Engl. Railw. Cas. 65; 2 Railw. Cas. 177; 3 N. Y. 480. It is usually conferred upon a private corporation, but sometimes upon a public one, where the stock is owned and the company controlled by the state; Redf. Railw. 17; 1 Ohio St. 657; 21 Conn. 304; 10 Leigh 454; 4 Wheat. 668; 8 Watts 316. It is sometimes by special act, but now, more commonly, under general laws. A railroad may be chartered by act of congress; 1 Dill. 314. If created by two states, it is a corporation of each state; 31 Ohio St. 317. See MERGER. Such charter, when conferred upon a private company or a natural person, as may be, is, in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions to the contrary, irrevocable, and only subject to general legislative control, the same as other persons natural or artificial; 4 Wheat. 668; 2 Kent 275; 27 Vt. 140. See IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

But a company must be held to have accepted its rights, etc., subject to the condition that the legislature may protect the people against the exaction of unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it, subject to the constitutional guarantee for the protection of its property; 169 U. S. 466.

An act requiring that all regular passenger trains shall stop at all railroad stations and county seats is unconstitutional when its effect is to compel a fast interstate mail train to turn aside from its direct route to a county seat three and a half miles away, the company having provided ample accommodations for travel from such county seat; 163 U. S. 143; otherwise, if applicable only to trains running within a state; 166 U. S. 427. An act requiring railroad companies where there is a telegraph office to note on a blackboard in each station whether trains are late, etc., and if so, how late, is constitutional; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 937. See PUNCTUALITY.

A state statute which requires railroad companies to provide separate accommodations for white and colored persons and makes a passenger who insists upon occupying a coach other than the one set apart for his race, liable to a penalty, does not violate either the thirteenth or the fourteenth amendment; 163 U. S. 537, Harlan, J., dissenting.

Their charters are now usually subject to legislative control, either by virtue of a right reserved in the charter or in general laws subject to which they are organized. In either case legislation is binding upon the company. But where there is a right to repeal the charter for cause, it cannot be done without inquiry; 1 Abb. (U. S.) 9. A corporation maintaining a public highway, although it owns the property it employs for accomplishing public objects, must be held to have accepted its rights, etc., subject to the condition that the legislature may protect the people against the exaction of unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it, subject to the constitutional guarantee for the protection of its property; 169 U. S. 466.

But a municipal ordinance which requires a street railway to sell six tickets for twenty-five cents is invalid; 57 Alb. L. J. 390; U. S. C. C. (Wisc.). The power of a municipality to reduce street railway fares is subject to limitations: (1) that there is reasonable need on the part of the public of lower rates; (2) that the rates fixed by the ordinance are not unreasonable in view of all the conditions; 87 Fed. Rep. 577. See an important case in 83 Fed. Rep. 529, as to the constitutionality of an act regulating fares, and a case contra, on the same act, in 51 N. W. Rep. (Ind.) 80.

The right of way is generally obtained by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. This can only be done in strict conformity to the charter or grant; 4 Engl. Railw. Cas. 235, 513, 524; 6 Gill 363. In this country, in many cases, the provisions of the charter enable companies to obtain land by purchase; 25 Vt. 49. The company may enter upon lands for the purpose of making preliminary surveys, by legislative permission, without becoming trespassers, and without compensation; 34 Me. 247; 9 Barb. 449; Wright Ohio 132; but compensation must be made or secured before the permanent occupation of the lands. See 6 Biss. 168; 27 Ind. 260. A company may not take land for speculation, or to prevent competition; 43 N. Y. 137. It may make any use of the land acquired for the right of way, which contributes to the safe and efficient operation of the road, and which does not interfere with the rights of property pertaining to the adjacent lands; 95 Ala. 631. See EMINENT DOMAIN. Railroad corporations possess the powers conferred upon them by charter and such as are fairly incidental thereto; and they cannot, except with the consent of the state, disenable themselves from the discharge of their functions, duties, and obligations. The general rule is that a contract by which a railroad company renders itself incapable of performing its duties to the public, or contracts beyond the scope of its powers, cannot be rendered enforcible by the doctrine of estoppel; but where the subject-matter is not foreign to the purposes of its creation, a contract embracing whatever may be fairly regarded as incidental to the things authorized, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held to be ultra vires; 163 U. S. 364.

The construction and operation by a railroad of a part of its road proves an acceptance of its charter where no particular mode of acceptance is designated; 106 Mo. 557. See 83 Me. 440.

The company may lay their road across a highway, but not without making compensation to the owner of the fee for the additional servitude thus imposed upon the land; 26 N. Y. 526; 75 Ill. 74; 41 Cal. 256; 1 Exch. 723; 21 Mo. 580; 27 Pa. 339; 9 Cush. 1.

Steam railroads on highways impose an additional burden thereby and cannot be built without compensation to abutting land-owners; 48 Ind. 178; 19 N. J. Eq. 386; 124 Pa. 544; contra, 16 R. I. 668; 35 Minn. 112; 85 Ky. 640. In the absence of constitutional provisions, the legislature may authorize the use of streets by a steam or street railroad without municipal consent; 66 Mo. 228; 6 Whart. 25; 45 Ga. 602.

If it is required by statute to be raised out of a cut in a street and placed on a viaduct, the company is liable for additional damages; N. Y. L. J., Nov. 19, 1897 (S. C. of N. Y.).

The legislature may authorize a railroad to be constructed under, as well as upon, highways; and when so constructed, the rights of the land-owners are determined upon the same principles as if they were built upon the surface; Peirce, Railr. 248; 42 Md. 117. It may also authorize elevated railroads, or railroads built upon structures raised above the highway; Peirce, Railr. 248. See 70 N. Y. 327, 361; 6 Blatch. 487; 82 N. Y. 95. But a company incorporated as a street passenger railroad cannot build an elevated railroad over and along the streets of Philadelphia; 161 Pa. 409.

The construction of the road must be within the prescribed limits of the charter. The right of deviation secured by the charter or general laws is lost when the road is once located; 1 Myl. & K. 154; 2 Ohio St. 235; 31 N. J. L. 205. The location can then be changed only by act of legislature: 35 Barb. 373; 42 Miss. 555; 31 N. J. L. 205. Distance, having reference either to the length of the line or to deviation, is to be measured in a straight line through a horizontal plane; 9 Q. B. 76; 27 Vt. 766. But charters must be taken to allow such discretion in the location of the route as is incident to an ordinary practical survey thereof, with reference to the nature of the country; 6 Minn. 150. A right to build to a city named imports a right to extend within the city limits; 45 Tex. 88. Where a location of a terminus was fixed at or near P. it was held that a point a mile and a half from P. was a compliance with the charter; 64 Pa. 137. A deviation from the line specified in the charter will not be permitted; 27 Pa. 339; but slight deviations may be allowed; Wood, Ry. 1104. A charter power to change the location of the line in case of any obstacle to the one first selected, will authorize a relocation before, but not after, the line has been constructed; 15 Ohio St. 21. Ordinarily the courts will not interfere with the selection of a route; 13 Barb. 646.

A railroad company constructing its line is bound to do so in a careful manner; and if it is so constructed it is not liable to adjacent property owners; but if it appears that it exceeded its authority, or exercised it negligently, it will become liable; 85 Ill. 370; 149 Mass. 335; 29 Ia. 153. So if the injury amounts to taking property, as by the destruction of an easement.

A company cannot build only part of its charter line; 126 N. Y. 29. It cannot abandon a part; 63 Tex. 529.

Liability for the acts of contractors, subcontractors, and agents. The company are not in any case liable for the act of a contractor or sub-contractor, or their agents, if it be not in doing precisely what is contemplated in the contract; 6 M. & W. 499; 12 Ad. & E. 737; 24 Barb. 355; 3 Gray 349; Redf. Railw. § 168.

Railroad companies are liable for the acts of their agents within the range of their employment; and for all acts of their agents within the most extensive range of their charter-powers; 14 How. 483; 27 Vt.

110; 7 Cush. 385; but not for the wilful acts of their agents, out of the range of their employment, unless directed by the company or subsequently adopted by them; 2 Harr. N. J. 514; 1 Fla. 136.

Railroad companies are liable for any injury accruing to the person or property of another through any want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of their employes. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

A railroad company operating its road through the streets of a populous city is bound to observe extraordinary precautions for the safety of the public, particularly at street crossings; 40 La. Ann. 810; 70 Tex. 126; 84 Va. 63; 85 Ky. 224.

It is the duty of the company to use on its cars, etc., all the modern improvements in machinery commonly used; 65 Barb. 92; 76 N. C. 454; 83 Ala. 518; 76 Ia. 387.

Express business. Railroad companies are not required to transport the traffic of independent express companies over their lines in the manner in which such traffic is usually carried; or to do more as express carriers than to provide the public at large with reasonable express accommodation. They need not furnish all express companies equal facilities on their passenger trains; 117 U. S. 1; Miller and Field, JJ., dissenting; 70 Cal. 169; 57 Fed. Rep. 673; 43 N. J. Eq. 77. But it has been held that they may be compelled to admit the agents of express companies on their trains, with their safes; 6 L. R. A. (N. C.) 271. And an early case held that a contract giving exclusive privileges to one express company is void; 2 Phila. 107; and in Maine a statute provides for equal facilities to all; 81 Me. 92. It has been held that a railroad company cannot assume the exclusive right of carrying on the express business over its own lines; 4 Fed. Rep. 481; but this was decided prior to the case in 117 U. S. 1, supra. See EXPRESS COMPANIES; FACILITIES.

The exclusive grants to railroad companies are to be strictly construed in favor of the corporation, and liberally expounded in favor of public rights and interests; 11 Pet. 420; 13 How. 71; 1 La. Ann. 253.

The power to build a railroad includes the power to build switches; 56 Pa. 325; but all customers have not an equal right to have switches built for them. 31 U. S. App. 252.

An act providing that a carrier accepting goods for transportation over connecting lines assumes an obligation for their safe carriage to the point of destination, etc., is not a regulation of interstate commerce, but establishes a rule of evidence and does not conflict with the United States constitution touching interstate commerce; 169 U. S. 311. But a carrier is not liable beyond its own lines, unless its liability be established by clear evidence; 155 U. S. 333. See COMMON CARRIERS.

A railroad corporation is a person within the fourteenth amendment declaring that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; 169 U. S. 466. See PERSON.

Railroad grants of lands by congress are granted in presenti, and take effect upon the section of the land when the road is definitely located, by relation, as of the date of the grant; 137 U. S. 528. See 133 id. 496. When different grants cover the same premises, the earlier takes the title; 130 U. S. 1; 146 id. 570; 152 id. 284. Title does not pass until the act is complied with. 15 U. S. App. 339. See LAND GRANTS.

A company is not liable for injuries to a person who goes into its yard, merely because such yard is a dangerous place, but it must be shown to be unnecessarily dangerous and that the injury resulted from the negligence of the company; 48 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 16.

A hotel-keeper who sends his servant to the station to accompany guests, etc., has no right to use the station except with the leave of the railway company; 56 Alb. L. J. 130.

Where a number of passengers who have right to take a certain train is in excess of its capacity, the company must exercise the same care and forethought in providing additional cars as it is bound to exercise in relation to its other passengers: 43 N. W. Rep. (Ill.) 698.

It is the duty of a railroad company to heat its cars in cold weather; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 677.

When a person (in this case a physician) is, while driving along a public highway, detained for twenty minutes at a grade crossing by the negligent delay of the employes of the railroad company in opening the gates, the company is liable in damages for delay; [1895] 2 Ir. R. 255.

When no legislative prohibition is shown, a railroad company may lease and maintain a summer hotel at its seaside terminus; 160 U. S. 514.

Mandamus will lie to compel a railroad company to operate its road; 28 Hun 453; 91 U. S. 343 (though the business be unprofitable; 7 Neb. 357; but not where it carries traffic on another line owned by it; 103 N. Y. 95); also to build a bridge; 70 N. Y. 569. The remedy for abandonment of a railroad may also be by indictment or by proceedings to forfeit the charter; 24 N. Y. 261.

An agreement whereby a railroad company has the right to run its trains into the depot of another railroad company is not a lease; 143 U. S. 596. See a contract for trackage in 45 Fed. Rep. 304.

Neither a railroad, nor any part of its property, is subject to levy under execution, unless by statute. See 114 U. S. 340; 65 Pa. 278; 117 Ind. 501. See LEASE.

STREET RAILWAYS. As to the difference between street and steam railways, see supra.

When a railway is laid in a street, to facilitate its use by the public, it is a street railway; 87 Mich. 371; so, if confined within the limits of a city and to be used exclusively under the streets; 107 N. Y. 52. A distinctive feature is that it is entirely for the carriage of passengers; Booth, Rys. § 1. It makes no difference whether it be on, above, or below the surface; id.; see supra; or what kind of motor power it uses; 41 Fed. Rep. 556. The difference between street railroads and steam railroads lies in their use and not in their motive power; 88 Fed. Rep. 588.

Street railroads belong to the surface of an open highway. They must conform to the grade of the highway. They must carry passengers only, under Pennsylvania acts; 161 Pa. 396. A street railway has been said to be one which is used expressly for the transportation of passengers, and which stops its cars at frequent intervals to take on passengers. 47 N. J. Eq. 380; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 179.

The general (steam) railroad act of Pennsylvania does not authorize the incorporation of elevated street passenger railroads in the streets of a city, and they cannot be incorporated under the general act providing for the incorporation of street passenger railways; 161 Pa. 396.

The right to permit their construction or refuse consent, is often vested in the local authorities. See Booth, Rys. § 28, as to the legislation of various states. Whether they have implied, in the absence of express, authority, is said not to be settled; id. § 15. A city cannot, without legislative authority, grant the right to build a street railway; 73 Ia. 513; 3 Duer 119; 24 Ill. 52; 66 Mo. 228; 9 Bush 127. See 10 Wall. 38. But the power to open and improve streets has been held to confer such authority; 85 Mo. 263; so of a power to regulate and improve streets and regulate vehicles thereon; 14 La. Ann. 842. It is also held that it cannot grant an exclusive right without legislative authority; 24 Fed. Rep. 306; 11 So. Rep. (La.) 77; which must be express: Booth, Rys. § 17. The power to grant easements in city streets, in perpetuity and in monopoly, can only be conferred by express words, or, if inferred from other powers, must be indispensable to their exercise; 171 U. S. (not reported).

Where the authority is express, it cannot be delegated; 34 Ohio St. 194.

A city cannot grant to individuals the exclusive right to lay tracks; 61 Ia. 11; 36 N. J. L. 79; 38 N. Y. 201; contra, 26 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 286. See Booth, Rys. § 2.

Ordinarily, and apart from constitutional or statutory provisions, a second company may be authorized to lay additional tracks; 45 Cal. 365; 23 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 463.

It is held that the local authorities, when their consent to building a street railway is required by law, may impose any conditions they choose; 37 Mich. 558; 168 Pa. 181; but it has been also held that if the conditions imposed by the local authorities relate to matters over which the legislature has entire control, the acts of the legislature cannot be affected by the local authorities; 105 N. Y. 97. The legislature may impose conditions other than, and in addition to, those prescribed by the constitution, and the local authorities may prescribe conditions additional to both the constitutional and statutory provisions on the subject; 102 N. Y. 343. See 118 id. 113. Where a municipality has the right to control the use of its streets, its action is not subject to judicial control; 17 N. J. Eq. 83; 40 La. Ann. 446; Booth, Rys. § 40.

Where local authorities have granted a right to construct a street railway, they cannot, without the consent of the company and in the absence of a reserved right so to do, impose additional obligations; 84 Mich. 257; as, the use of iron poles instead of wooden poles; id.; or requiring the railway company to pave and keep in repair a portion of the street outside of the tracks; 26 N. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 188.

The consent of the local authorities once given and accepted and acted upon, cannot be revoked; 109 N. C. 688; 45 Tex. 88; see 23 Chi. L. News 147; but where a right to revoke has been reserved, it may be exercised by the local authorities; 111 Mass. 282.

The use of its tracks by a railway company may be temporarily interrupted by municipal authorities, when necessary for the purpose of repairs on the streets; 48 Md. 168; 11 Phila. 358; 103 Mass. 262.

Where a route has been established under the direction of the local authorities, the company cannot change the location so fixed without a new consent for that purpose; 53 Hun 131. The local authorities may permit the tracks to be relaid on another part of the street; 23 La. Ann. 535; and may compel a change where it has reserved the right so to do; 10 Phila. 70. A railway company may adopt any gauge for its track which it sees fit and afterwards change the same, in the absence of anything to the contrary; 131 Pa. 1; and it may ordinarily adopt any kind of rails and change the same from time to time; 19 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 263; but the rails used must be such as not to interfere with the use of the street by the public; 133 Pa. 505.

A city cannot grant the use of its streets to so many companies as to impair its public use; 48 Mich. 433. It cannot, ordinarily, grant the right to build in a city park; 26 La. Ann. 478; 67 Ill. 540; but see 76 Cal. 156; 175 Pa. 33; PARK. See 20 Hun 201.

The legislature, unless forbidden by the constitution, may grant a right to lay a street railway in a street; 10 Wall. 38; 24 N. J. Eq. 158.

Many cases hold that a street railway is not a new servitude on the street, for which the owners of abutting lands are entitled to compensation; 24 N. J. Eq. 158; 58 Md. 603; 94 U. S. 324; 38 Mich. 66; 78 Md. 261; 55 N. J. L. 605; 27 Wis. 194; 32 Conn. 579; 125 Mass. 515; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 725; and their consent to the construction of such railways is not necessary; but see an able dissenting opinion, 85 Mich. 634. It has been held that the abutting owner may recover where the tracks were laid next the curb; 14 Ohio St. 528.

It is held that this is so even if steam motors are used in propelling the cars; 79 Me. 363; 85 Minn. 112; 47 N. J. Eq. 380; or electricity; 85 Mich. 634; 75 Md. 222; 47 N. J. Eq. 380; 16 R. I. 668. But as to whether the use of steam on street railways imposes an additional servitude, the weight of judicial opinion is said to be very nearly evenly balanced; Booth, Rys. § 86.

The substitution of cable propulsion for horse power imposes no new servitude on the street; 19 N. E. Rep. (Ga.) 831; 121 N. Y. 536; 32 Fed. Rep. 270.

In New York it is held that street railways impose an additional burden on the streets; 39 N. Y. 404; 121 id. 505; unless the fee of the soil of the street is vested in the city; 27 N. Y. 108; but even then the abutting owner has a right of action if access to his property is cut off; 128 id. 157.

An elevated railroad is an additional burden on the highway; 23 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 463; 90 N. Y. 123; 129 N. Y. 252. Their structures are incompatible with the free and unobstructed use of the street and abutting property owners are entitled to an injunction unless their rights have been properly acquired by the company and they have received compensation therefor. See 90 N. Y. 122; 128 id. 157; 125 id. 164; 130 id. 14; 121 id. 505; 128 id. 157. Though not owning the soil of the street, they have easements of light, air, and access therein; 130 N. Y. 14; 90 id. 122.

Non-abutting property owners are not entitled to damages by reason of the use of a street by an elevated railway; 16 Daly 145; 18 N. Y. Supp. 238.

An elevated railway in New York which has not acquired the right from abutting proprietors is a continuous trespass upon their property which gives rise to a separate cause of action at law for damages. See 128 N. Y. 426; 120 id. 119. Equity will prevent the continuance of trespass by including as damages injuries permanently resulting from the interference of easement with light, air, and access, An abutting owner has a right of action for the pollution of air by smoke.

Constructing an elevated railroad on pillars in a public street is held, in 36 L. R. A. (Ill.) 97, not to constitute a new servitude or an unlawful use of the street. In Pennsylvania a street railway on a country road in a township is an additional burden on the highway and cannot be constructed without the consent of abutting property owners, though it is otherwise as to the streets of a city or borough; 167 Pa. 162.

An electric street railway between cities and villages for the transportation of passengers, merchandise, and baggage imposes an additional servitude on the highway; 70 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 678.

It is said that equity will not relieve an abutting property owner but will leave him to his remedy at law; 147 U. S. 248. But the rule appears to be otherwise in Pennsylvania. See 167 Pa. 162.

Ordinarily street railways have no right of eminent domain.

In 152 Pa. 163, the court seemed to consider that the right to build a passenger railway carries with it, at least in the absence of specific denial, the right from time to time, to operate it by new methods, but the point was not decided. An ordinance permitting the building of a horse-car railway covers an electric railway; 135 N. Y. 393.

The erection of trolley poles in the middle of the street does not entitle the abutting owners to compensation; 47 N. J. Eq. 380. Where electric railways are authorized the authority extends to the necessary and proper apparatus for operating them; 139 Pa. 419; including poles and wires; 47 N. J. Eq. 380. But where this right encroaches on property rights of an abutting owner it should be so exercised by the company as to minimize the inconveniences and danger to such rights; 51 N. J. Eq. 213.

Poles must be so placed as not to interfere with the rights of ingress and egress to abutting property; 85 Mich. 634; stringing a wire along the street twenty feet above the surface is no interference with the right to light and air; 51 N. J. Eq. 213. See POLES; WIRES.

If a street railway is constructed and operated without lawful authority, it is a nuisance; 137 Pa. 533; 133 id. 505; 2 Colo. 673; 87 Mich. 361; and a railroad company cannot grant to an individual a right to operate a railroad for his private purposes over a part of its line which it does not use; 102 N. Y. 441.

Where the use of a street is unlawful, an injunction will lie at the suit of an abutting owner; 19 Ohio St. 78; contra, 16 R. I. 533; 100 Mo. 508; 112 Ill. 611; or at the suit of a duly authorized public officer; 50 Ga. 451; 27 N. Y. 611; 102 id. 441; a company so operating a steam road may be indicted for a nuisance; 14 Gray 93; 101 Pa. 92; and, by analogy, a street railway; Booth, Rys. § 4.

A municipality can maintain proceedings in the nature of quo warranto to oust a street railway company of its franchises for non-user; 140 Mo. 539.

Ordinarily, a franchise to build a street railway is not exclusive; 48 Mich. 433; 41 La. Ann. 561; 73 Ia. 513.

A right or permit from a muncipality to construct a street railway on a given street, is not a part of the company's franchise, but is property, and is an incorporeal right; 87 Ill. 317.

Street railway companies are subject to regulation by statutes and by ordinances under the police power; Booth, Rys. § 221; such as ordinances regulating the speed of cars; 84 Mo. 119; 129 Mass. 310; requiring cars to stop at designated places; 42 Ark. 321; requiring the watering of tracks; 77 Ga. 731; forbidding the use of sand upon tracks; 47 Hun 221.

Where a railway company has not built all the line specified in its charter and has abandoned a part of what it had built its charter is subject to forfeiture; 126 N. Y. 29; 63 Tex. 529.

A street railway company owns the structure laid by it in the highway, and has a superior right to the space covered by its track; Peirce, Railr. 252. See 14 Gray 69; 76 N. Y. 530; 34 Ia. 527. The public, on foot or in carriages, may cross its tracks, and travel on the spaces covered by it, and even incidentally drive ordinary carriages on the rails. But a person driving a carriage on the track should leave it without retarding the cars; 76 N. Y. 530; 69 Ill. 388. See 9 Misc. Rep. 270. It is also held that an electric street railway company has a common right in the highway with other travellers, not a superior right, and they must be so managed as not unnecessarily to interfere with the like rights of others; 37 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 379. But its rails cannot be used by other competing common carriers driving railway or other carriages, without special legislative authority; 72 N. Y. 330; 4 Stew. N. J. 525; 81 Ill. 528.

A company may remove snow from its track to another part of the street, but in so doing, it must avoid unnecessary injury to the owners of property; 50 Md. 73. See Peirce, Railr. 252.

When an electric street railway car is stopping at a crossing, it should not run its car in an opposite direction on the other track without warning pedestrians; 34 Atl. Rep. N. J. 1094; 97 Cal. 553; contra, 16 N. Y. Supp. 350; but one who crosses a street behind a moving car at a place which is not a regular crossing, is bound to look for cars on the other track; 145 N. Y. 196; though it is held that a passenger alighting from a car has a right to presume that the other track will be kept clear; 127 Ill. 1; 36 N. Y. Supp. 105; but it is also held that it is a question of ordinary care; 126 Pa. 559. See 39 N. Y. Supp. 440. Where a passenger alights from a car on a double track trolley line, it is the duty of the company to regulate the speed of its cars and to give such warning of their approach as will reasonably protect the passenger from injury; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 207.

A street car has recently been held by the house of lords to be a coach within the meaning of an act relating to tolls on a particular bridge.

RAILROAD-AID BONDS. See BOND.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONERS. officers appointed in various states for the supervision of the construction and operation of railroads.

A suit against railroad commissioners to restrain the enforcement of rates, as unjust, is not a suit against the state; 154 U. S. 362, 418, 420.

RAILROAD PROPERTY. The property which is essential to a railroad company to enable it to discharge its functions and duties as a common carrier by rail. It includes the road bed, right of way, tracks, bridges, stations, rolling stock, and such like property. Lands owned and held for sale, or other disposition for profit, and in no way connected with the use or operation of the railroad, are not railroad property in the sense mentioned, but are property of the company independently of its functions and duties as a common carrier. 47 Fed. Rep. 681.

RAILROAD RELIEF FUNDS. A term applied to funds raised by periodical contributions of corporations' employes, or by them jointly with the corporation, and usually managed jointly, for the purpose of providing relief to the employes in case of injury, and the payment of money to their families in case of death, in the service. They are usually managed jointly by the corporation and representatives of the members, the business facilities being furnished by the corporation, which usually guarantees the funds and undertakes to make good deficiencies. Their management usually constitutes a department of the corporation business. They have been instituted in England and in some of the largest railroad systems in the United States. Compulsory contribution to funds for charitable, financial, etc., purposes, is forbidden in some states. In Massachusetts, acts provide for such societies for employes of railroad, street railroad, and steamboat companies.

Members are usually required to contract that the acceptance of relief benefits from the fund in case of injury or death shall operate as a release to the company of all rights of action for damages for injury or death made by, or on behalf of, the member or his legal representatives.

Such contracts are sustained as defences to actions for personal injuries; 169 Ill. 312; 64 Ill. App. 444; 44 Neb. 44; 70 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 630; 61 id. 971; 71 Fed. Rep. 136, 139, 931; 10 Ind. App. 47; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 423; 75 Md. 162; 81 id. 412; 63 Mich. 690; 41 Fed. Rep. 125; 36 id. 655; 9 Q. B. Div. 357; L. R. 3 Q. B. 555.

A contract by which, if the member or his representatives accept benefits, he or they thereby release all rights of action against the company, for damages for injury, etc., is valid; and when the injured party after the right of action has arisen accepts the benefits, he is merely settling for the past; 163 Pa. 133. See 164 id. 329.

But it was held that where, under such a contract, the widow of a member accepted a benefit upon her husband's death, and personally released the fund and the company, the contract of the husband did not waive a right of action, and that neither the contract nor the widow's receipt of the benefit discharged her right of action; 58 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1120. In 65 Fed. Rep. 308, the court, on a demurrer to such a defence, upheld the demurrer and held the contract and release void, and expressed its surprise at finding that several courts of unquestionable dignity and authority had sustained such defences. This case was affirmed on appeal, though not quite on such broad ground as was taken below; 76 Fed. Rep. 439.

A rule of a railway relief department which provides that all claims of beneficiaries shall be submitted to the superintendent, with the right of appeal to an advisory committee whose decision shall be final, does not bar the holder of a claim which has been rejected by such committee from the right of action in the courts; 46 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 577.

An Ohio act which provides that no railroad company shall require any stipulation with any person in or about to enter its employ, whereby such person agrees to waive any right of action against the company for personal injuries, and that all such agreements shall be void, is in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution as taking away liberty of contract; 71 Fed. Rep. 981.

RAILROAD STATION. See STATION.

RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS. A body of three commissioners appointed under the English regulation of railways act, 1873, principally to enforce the provisions of the railway and canal traffic act, 1854, by compelling railway and canal companies to give reasonable facilities for traffic, to abstain from giving unreasonable preference to any company or person, and to forward through traffic at through rates.

RAIN-WATER. The water which naturally falls from the clouds.

No one has a right to build his house so as to cause the rain-water to fall over his neighbor's land; 1 Rolle, Abr. 107; 1 Stra. 643; Fortesc. 212; Bacon, Abr. Action on the Case (F); 5 Co. 101; unless he has acquired a right by a grant or prescription.

When the land remains in a state of nature, said a learned writer, and by the natural descent the rain-water would descend from the superior estate over the lower, the latter is necessarily subject to receive such water; 1 Lois des Batiments 15, 16. See 2 Rolle 140.

RAISE. To create. A use may be raised; i. e. a use may be created. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 449.

When a child has reached the age of twenty-one years, he is raised; 59 Ind. 598.

RAISE REVENUE. Is to collect revenue, not necessarily to increase the amount; 58 Ala. 546. Authority to raise money for prosecuting and defending suits only authorizes raising money by taxation and not by borrowing; 119 N. Y. 280 a.

RANGE. A word used in the land-laws of the United States to designate the order of the location of public lands. In patents from the United States to individuals for public lands, they are described as being within a certain range.

RANGER. A sworn officer of the forest to inquire of trespasses, and to drive the beasts of the forest out of the deforested ground into the forest. Jacob, Law Dict.

RANK. The order or place in which certain officers are placed in the army and navy, in relation to others.

It is a maxim that officers of an inferior rank are bound to obey all the lawful commands of their superiors, and are justified for such obedience.

Army and Navy. In 1868, a retiring board found a colonel incapacitated from the result of wounds received in battle while commanding a division with the brevet rank of major-general. He was thereupon retired by the president, under the act of July 18, 1866, with the full rank of major-general. Subsequently his retired rank was changed by the provisions of the act of March 3, 1875, to that of brigadier-general. It was held that he was not appointed to the office of major-general; that he still retained on the retired list the office of colonel; that the rank conferred upon him by act of congress was in no sense a constitutional appointment to a new office: and that the same power that gave him his rank could take it away. Rank is often used to express something different from office. It then becomes a designation or title of honor, dignity, or distinction conferred upon an officer in order to fix his relative position in reference to other officers in matters of privilege, precedence, and sometimes of command, or by which to determine his pay and emoluments. This is the case with the staff officers of the army. 15 Ct. Cl. 159. See R. S. §§ 1122, 1128, 1131, 1168, for instances.

The distinction between rank and office is more clearly apparent with reference to staff officers than to officers of the line, because in the latter case the words used to designate the rank and the office are usually the same, while in the former case they are always different.

In some cases, officers of the line have a rank assigned to them different from the title of their office. See R. S. §§ 1096, 1097. Selections under these sections are usually made from among officers whose rank is raised to a higher degree by the service assigned to them, but the new rank does not confer a new office.

In the army, all officers, except chaplains, are paid according to their rank; in the navy, the pay of staff officers does not depend upon their rank; and there rank only determines matter of precedence, etc., among officers.

Grade is a step or degree in either office or rank. See 15 Ct. Cl. 151, per Richardson, J.

Officers in the regular army, active or retired, who served in the volunteer forces in the civil war may receive a brevet equal to their highest rank held in the said forces; act of Feb. 16, 1897.

RANKING. In Scotch Law. Determining the order in which the debts of a bankrupt ought to be paid.

RANSOM. A redemption for money or other consideration of that which is taken in war. 8 Term 277.

The custom of ransom of prisoners of war, which superseded slavery, has given place to the exchange of prisoners; Risley, Law of War 127. See PRISONERS OF WAR; RANSOM BILL.

RANSOM BILL. A contract for payment of ransom of a captured vessel, with stipulations of safe conduct if she pursue a certain course and arrive at a certain time. If found out of time or course, the safe conduct is void; Wheaton, Int. Law 107. The payment cannot be enforced in England, during the war, by an action on the contract, but can in this country; 1 Kent 104, 105; 4 Wash. C. C. 141; 2 Gall. 325.

By the general maritime law ransoms are allowed and the master of a ship may bind the whole cargo as well as the ship, by his contract for ransom; 3 C. Rob. 240. They were formerly prohibited in England, but now the queen in council may make rules for prohibiting or allowing them, under the act of 1864.

Ransoms have never been prohibited by the United States; 15 Johns. 6; nor by the other nations, except England; 1 Kent 112.

A belligerent may deliver up neutral property on ransoms as well as enemy's property; per Story, J., in 2 Gall. 337, where the subject of ransom is discussed.

A ransom strictly speaking is not a repurchase of the captured property, it is rather a repurchase of the actual right of the captors at the time, be it what it may, or, more properly, it is a relinquishment of all the interest or benefit which the captors might acquire or consummate in the property by the regular adjudications of a prize tribunal. There seems to be no legal difference between the case of a ransom of the property of an enemy and of a neutral, for if the property be neutral and yet there be probable cause of capture, or if the delinquency be such that the penalty of confiscation might be justly applied, there can be no intrinsic difficulty in supporting a contract by which the captors agree to waive their rights in consideration of a sum of money voluntarily paid or agreed to be paid by the captured; 3 Phil. Int. L. 645.

In the absence of stipulation, if the ransomed vessel be lost, the contract is still binding; but usually there is a clause excepting loss on the high seas, but not by stranding; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 331.

RAPE (Lat. rapere, to snatch, to seize with violence). In Criminal Law. The carnal knowledge of a woman by a man forcibly and unlawfully against her will. Russ. Cr. L. 904.

The statute of Westminster 2, c. 34, defines the crime to be where "a man do ravish a woman, married, maid, or other, where she did not consent neither before nor after." And this statute definition has been adopted in several very recent cases. Addenda to 1 Den. Cr. Cas.; 1 Bell, Cr. Cas. 63, 71.

Much difficulty has arisen in defining the meaning of carnal knowledge, and different opinions have been entertained,—some judges having supposed that penetration alone is sufficient, while others deemed emission an essential ingredient in the crime; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 41, s. 3; 12 Co. 37; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 638; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 810. Penetration is the act of inserting the penis into the female organs of generation. 9 C. & P. 118. See 5 C. & P. 321; 9 id. 31. It was once held that in order to commit the crime of rape it is requisite that the penetration should be such as to rupture the hymen; 5 C. & P. 321. But this case has since been expressly overruled; 2 Mood. Cr. Cas. 90; 9 C. & P. 752; Whart. Cr. L. 554. In the United States in modern times the better opinion seems to be that both penetration and emission are not necessary; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 439; Add. Pa. 143; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 410; 2 Bish. N. Cr. Law § 1131; 111 Ind. 279; 14 Neb. 205; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 363; 25 Fla. 702; contra, 14 Ohio 222; but later cases in that state intimated that if the question were new, the decision would be the other way; 22 Ohio St. 102, 541. See 65 N. C. 466. Slight penetration has been held to be sufficient; 76 Ga. 623. By statute in England carnal knowledge is completely proved by proof of penetration; 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, § 18. Statutes to the same effect have been passed in some of the United States; but these statutes have been thought to be merely declaratory of the common law; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 210. See, on this subject, 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 628; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 437; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 386; 1 Russ. Cr. Law 860. It is to be remarked, also, that very slight evidence may be sufficient to induce a jury to believe there was emission; Add. Pa. 143; 2 Const. 351; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 140; 4 Chitty, Bla. Com. 213, note 8. See [1891] 2 Q. B. 149. In Scotland, emission is not requisite; 1 Swint. 93. See EMISSION.

By the term man in this definition is meant a male of the human species, of the age of fourteen years and upwards; for an infant under fourteen years is supposed by law incapable of committing this offence: Whart. Cr. L. 551; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 631; 8 C. & P. 738; Tayl. Ev. 127; 29 Fla. 565. But this presumption has been held by some authorities not to be conclusive, but capable of removal by proof; 5 Lea 352. But not only can an infant under fourteen years, if of sufficient mischievous discretion, but even a woman may be guilty as principal in the second degree: 83 N.C. 605. And the husband of a woman may be a principal in the second degree of a rape committed upon his wife; as, where he held her while his servant committed the rape; 1 Hargr. St. Tr. 388. See 62 Mich. 280; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1135.

Drunkenness is no excuse for rape; nor can it excuse or mitigate an assault with intent to commit a rape; 98 Mo. 431.

The knowledge of the woman's person must be forcibly and against her will; and if her consent has not been voluntarily and freely given (when she has the power to consent), the offence will be complete, nor will any subsequent acquiescence on her part do away the guilt of the ravisher. A consent obtained from a woman by actual violence, by duress or threats of murder, or by the administration of stupefying drugs, is not such a consent as will shield the offender or turn his crime into adultery or fornication; and if the connection took place when she was in a state of insensibility from liquor, having been made drunk by the prisoner, though the liquor was given only for the purpose of exciting her, it is a rape; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 89; 1 C. & K. 746; 12 Cox, C. C. 311. Having carnal knowledge of a woman by a fraud which induces her to suppose it is her husband, does not amount to a rape; 8 C. & P. 265, 286. But it is otherwise by act of 1885. No doubt the party would be liable in such a case for an assault.

The injured party cannot condone the crime of rape by excusing or forgiving the guilty party; 147 Mass. 423.

It has been decided that if a physician professing to take steps to cure a woman of disease, induces her to submit to sexual intercourse with him, under the impression that it is a necessary portion of her medical treatment, this does not amount to rape. To constitute rape there must be an actual resistance of the will on the part of the woman; 19 L. J. M. C. 174; 1 Den. C. C. 580; 12 Am. Rep. 283, n.; s. c. 25 Mich. 356; and it has been held that this must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt; 126 Ind. 185. If it appear that the intercourse was effected without her consent, the crime of rape is proved, although no positive resistance by her is shown; 85 Va. 638. Some authorities have held that the woman's resistance is not sufficient to render the crime rape, if finally she consent through fear, duress, or fraud. It must appear that she showed the utmost reluctance and resistance; 50 Wisc. 418; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 856; 59 N. Y. 374. But this is not the general rule, the better opinion being that a consent obtained by fear of personal violence is no consent—and though a man puts no hand on a woman, yet if, by the array of physical force, he so overpowers her mind that she dares not resist, he is guilty of rape; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1125; 36 Am. Rep. 860, n.; s. c. 50 Wisc. 518. The offence of rape is complete where prosecutrix is rendered unconscious in consequence of the assault and violence; 39 Minn. 277. It has been said that consent during any part of the act will prevent its being rape; 73 Ia. 532; 36 Mich. 203; 50 Wis. 518; but Mr. Bishop takes the very sensible view that after the offence has been completed by penetration no subsequent consent is of any avail to relieve the man from the charge of rape; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1122. A written statement by the prosecutrix on a trial for rape cannot be used to contradict her where she admits making it, but testifies that she did so under compulsion and that it is false; 136 Mo. 74.

The matrimonial consent of the wife cannot be retracted; and, therefore, her husband cannot be guilty of a rape on her, as his act is not unlawful. But, as already observed, he may be guilty as principal in the second degree.

As a child under ten years of age is incapable in law to give her consent, it follows that the offence may be committed on such a child whether she consent or not. See stat. 18 Eliz. c. 7, s. 4.

There is a recent trend in legislation in this country in the direction of raising the age of consent. This has resulted from a very active agitation on the subject largely promoted by the societies for the prevention of cruelty to children and persons who devote themselves especially to the promotion of social purity. In most of the states there are statutes, some of which are extremely drastic. By recent legislation the age of consent is made in Virginia, Wisconsin, and Indiana, fourteen years; in Iowa, Texas, and Delaware, fifteen years; Connecticut, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Oregon, and South Dakota, sixteen years; and in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, Nebraska, New York, Utah, and Wyoming, it is eighteen years. In England, thirteen years, but it is a misdemeanor if between thirteen and sixteen. Ignorance of the woman's age is no defence; 117 Cal. 583; nor is the fact that she was large for her age and physically strong: 73 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 344.

It has been questioned whether rape was a felony at common law, or was made one by a statute in the reign of Edward I. The benefit of clergy was first taken away by a statute of Elizabeth. By a statute of Victoria, the offence is no longer punishable with death, but, at most, with transportation for life; previously to that statute, the capital punishment was almost invariably enforced.

See, as to the possibility of committing a rape, and as to the signs which indicate it, 1 Beck, Med. Jur. c. 12; Merlin, Répert. Viol.; Biessy, Manuel Médico-Légal, etc., 149; Parent-Duchatellet, De la Prostitution, etc., c. 3, § 5; 9 C. & P. 752; 2 Pick. 380; 12 S. & R. 69; 7 Conn. 54. See, generally, 2 Bish. N. Cr. In English Law. A division of a county similar to a hundred, but oftentimes containing in it more hundreds than one.

RAPE OF THE FOREST. Trespass committed in a forest by violence. Cowell.

RAPINE. In Criminal Law. The felonious taking of another man's personal property, openly and by violence, against his will. The civilians define rapine to be the taking with violence the movable property of another, with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it to one's own use. Leç. El. Dr. Rom. § 1071.

RAPPORT A SUCCESSION (Fr.; similar to hotchpot). In Louisiana. The reunion to the mass of the succession of the things given by the deceased ancestor to his heir, in order that the whole may be divided among the co-heirs.

The obligation to make the rapport has a triple foundation. First, it is to be presumed that the deceased intended, in making an advancement, to give only a portion of the inheritance. Second, it establishes the equality of a division, at least, with regard to the children of the same parent, who all have an equal right to the succession. Third, it preserves in families that harmony which is always disturbed by unjust favors to one who has only an equal right. Dalloz, Dict. See ADVANCEMENT; COLLATION; HOTCHPOT.

RASCAL. An opprobious term, applied to persons of bad character. The law does not presume that a damage has arisen because the defendant has been called a rascal, and therefore no general damages can be recovered for it; if the party has received special damages in consequence of being so called, he can recover a recompense to indemnify him for his loss.

RASURE. The scratching or scraping a writing, so as to prevent some part of it from being read. The word writing here is intended to include printing.

RATABLE ESTATE. Within the meaning of a tax law, taxable estate. 55 Vt. 545.

RATABLE PROPERTY. Property in its quality and nature capable of being rated, i. e. appraised, assessed. 10 B. & S. 323; 16 R. I. 240.

RATE. A public valuation or assessment of every man's estate; or the ascertaining how much tax every one shall pay. See Pow. Mortg.; 1 Hopk. Ch. 37.

RATE OF EXCHANGE. In Commercial Law. The price at which a bill drawn in one country upon another may be sold in the former.

RATES. The power of the legislature to regulate rates or charges of corporation is treated under IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. The case of Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, has since decided: While rates for the transportation of persons and property within a state are primarily for the determination of the state, the question whether they are made so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without just compensation cannot be so determined by the legislature of the state that the matter cannot become the subject of judicial inquiry. The reasonableness of rates prescribed by a state must be determined without reference to the interstate business done by the company. A railroad is a public highway and is therefore subject to governmental control. It may not fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests, but the rights of the public will be ignored if rates are imposed without reference to the fair value of the property, and, in order simply that the company may meet operating expenses, pay its interest and declare a dividend: but where a company has bonded its property in excess of its fair value or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose on the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required to realize profits thereon, and the apparent value of the property as represented by its securities is not alone to be considered on the question of reasonable rates. It must be held to have accepted its rights and franchises subject to the condition that the government may protect the people against unreasonable charges.

The basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates must be the fair value of the property used by it, and this includes the original cost of construction, probable earning capacity of the property under particular rights prescribed by the statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses. All these items are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. The company is entitled to ask a fair return upon the value of its property and the public is entitled to demand that no more be exacted than the services rendered are reasonably worth. Neither market nor par value of stock is a criterion of value, but the owner is entitled to any appreciation above the original cost; 82 Fed. Rep. 850.

Stockholders are not the only persons to be considered: if the establishment of new lines of transportation should cause a diminution in the tolls collected, that, in itself, is not a sufficient reason why the corporation maintaining the road should be allowed to maintain rates that would be unjust to those who use its property. It is not necessary that all corporations exacting tolls should be placed upon the same footing as regards rates; 164 U. S. 578.

The doctrine of state control over rates has been applied as follows:—To Bridges; 8 Fed. Rep. 190. See 154 U. S. 204. Ferries; 24 N. J. L. 718, where the charter subjected the ferry company to such regulations as might be fixed by law. Boom Companies; 150 Pa. 475; 50 Fed. Rep. 902. See 44 Mich. 403. Gas Companies; 5 Ohio C. C. 559 (natural gas); 34 Ohio St. 572. See 27 Am. L. Reg. 286. Mills for Grinding; 86 Me. 102; 40 W. Va. 480. Railroads; 94 U. S. 155, 180; 143 U. S. 339; 82 Ia. 312; 22 Neb. 313; 15 Colo. 601; 64 Fed. Rep. 165 (where the company was incorporated by an act of congress). Railways, Street; 36 Neb. 307 (by ordinance); 111 N. Y. 132. Stock Yards. See 82 Fed. Rep. 850. Telegraphs; 116 N. C. 211. Telephones; 105 Ind.

250; 118 Ind. 194, 598. See 96 Mo. 623. Water; 110 U. S. 347 (a California case under the constitution). Warehouses; for grain, etc., requiring them to keep insured for the benefit of its owner of grain stores; 153 U. S. 391. This power cannot be delegated to private persons or corporations; 160 Mass. 62; 100 Mich. 350. An act fixing minimum rates for railroad freight and passenger fares does not apply to the transportation of messengers and freight of express companies; 6 Fed. Rep. 426. An act requiring a railroad company to sell one thousand mile books for twenty dollars and to accept for fare such books issued by other companies, was held unconstitutional, because it attempted to compel one company to carry passengers on the credit of another company; 160 Mass. 62.

An act of Illinois making it a penal offence for a railroad company within that state to charge or receive for transporting passengers or freight of the same class the same or a greater sum for any distance than it does for a longer distance, is unconstitutional. A state statute intended to regulate or to tax or to impose any other restriction upon the transmission of persons or property or telegraph messages from one state to another is not within that class of legislation which the states may enact in the absence of legislation by congress, and such statutes are void even as to that part of such transmission as may be within the state; 118 U. S. 557.

The authority of a city under a street railway charter to fix the rates of fare thereon is exhausted by fixing such rates in an ordinance granting it the use of the streets; 83 Fed. Rep. 39. See RAILROAD.

A statute fixing the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or service performed on public works is not unconstitutional; 142 N. Y. 101; nor is an act of congress making it a misdemeanor for a pension agent to charge more than ten dollars on a pension claim; 157 U. S. 160.

The interstate commerce commission (q. v.) cannot fix rates; 168 U. S. 144.

As to discrimination in rates, see DISCRIMINATION; INSTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; FACILITIES.

See 33 L. R. A. 177, a full note on rates; 79 Fed. Rep. 665; Butterworth, Max. Rates, as to the English practices; RAILROADS.

RATIFICATION. An agreement to adopt an act performed by another for us.

Express ratifications are those made in express and direct terms of assent. Implied ratifications are such as the law presumes from the acts of the principal; as, if Peter buy goods for James, and the latter, knowing the fact, receive them and apply them to his own use.

Ratification of a contract implies an existing person on whose behalf the contract might have been made at the time. There cannot, in law, be a ratification of a contract which could not have been made binding on the ratifier at the time it was made, because the ratifier was not then in existence. 48 Minn. 319.

By ratifying a contract a man adopts the agency altogether, as well what is detrimental as what is for his benefit; 2 Stra. 859; 6 East 164; 16 Mart. La. 105; 1 Ves. 509; Story, Ag. § 250; 9 B. & C. 59; 24 Neb. 653; 34 id. 110; 31 U. S. App. 340. See 150 U. S. 128.

A ratification, to be efficacious, must be made by a party who had power to do the act in the first place, and it must be made with knowledge of the material facts; 152 U. S. 346.

Where there has been actual and positive fraud, or the adverse party has acted mala fide, there can be no such thing as a confirmation; 8 W. & S. 36. The ratification of the signing of a bond by an obligor whose signature has been forged, does not render him liable thereon, there being no new consideration; 67 Pa. 391; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 445, n.; 33 Ohio St. 405; s. c. 31 Am. Rep. 546, n. But if a contract be merely against conscience, then if a party, being fully informed of all the circumstances of it and objections to it, voluntarily confirms it, his ratification will stand; 67 Pa. 217; 62 Ill. 483; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 106. When a claim is founded upon an act done without the claimant's knowledge and authority, by a person claiming to act as his agent, the bringing of an action by him based upon that act is a ratification of it; 155 U. S. 13. A forged note cannot be ratified; L. R. 6 Ex. 49; 92 Pa. 447; but see 4 Allen 447.

A party from whom a contract has been wrung by duress must disclaim it on the recovery of freedom, subsequent recognition is the equivalent of ratification; 23 Misc. Rep. 173.

Ratification will, in general, relieve the agent from all responsibility on the contract, when he would otherwise have been liable; 2 Br. & B. 452. See 16 Mass. 461; 8 Wend. 494. See ASSENT; Ayliffe, Pand. *386; 18 Viner, Abr. 156; Story, Ag. 239. See, generally, 25 Am. Law Rev. 14; AGENCY.

A principal having the right to disaffirm acts of an agent must do it promptly, and if not done within a reasonable time ratification will be presumed; 120 U. S. 256. The principle of ratification by laches or delay is applicable to a municipal corporation, such as a county; 139 U. S. 684.

An infant is not, in general, liable on his contracts; but if, after coming of age, he ratify the contract by an actual or express declaration, he will be bound to perform it, as if it had been made after he attained full age. The ratification must be voluntary, deliberate, and intelligent, and the party must know that without it he would not be bound; 3 Pa. 428; see 12 Conn. 551; 10 Mass. 137; 4 Wend. 408; and now in England must be in writing. But a confirmation or ratification of a contract may be implied from acts of the infant after he becomes of age, as, by enjoying or claiming a benefit under a contract he might have wholly rescinded;

1 Pick. 221; and an infant partner will be liable for the contracts of the firm, or at least such as were known to him, if he, after becoming of age, confirm the contract of partnership by transacting business of the firm, receiving profits, and the like; 2 Hill S. C. 479; 1 J. B. Moore 289; 33 S. C. 285.

Where an infant, during his minority, has made a deed or mortgage, his mere failure to disaffirm the conveyance on coming of age, without some positive and clear act of affirmation, will not amount to a ratification; 86 Ala. 442; 86 Ky. 572. See INFANT.

A board of directors may ratify and authorize the execution of a promissory note by the secretary of the corporation for money borrowed; 12 U. S. App. 699.

When a contract is not ultra vires a corporation may ratify it though made without proper authority by its agents; 6 U. S. App. 26.

RATIFICATION OF TREATIES. See TREATY.

RATIHABITION. Confirmation; approbation of a contract; ratification.

RATIO (Lat.). A reason; a cause; a reckoning of an account.

RATIONABILI PARTE BONORUM. See DE RATIONABILE PARTE BONORUM.

RATIONABILIBUS DIVISIS, WRIT DE. See DE RATIONALIBUS DEVISIS.

RATIONE TENURÆ. By reason of tenure.

RATTENING. The offence on the part of members of a trades union, of causing the tools, clothes, or other property of a workman to be taken away or hidden, in order to compel him to join the union or cease working. 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86.

RAVINE. A long, deep, and narrow hollow, worn by a stream or torrent of water; a long, deep, and narrow hollow or pass through the mountains. 36 Ia. 60.

RAVISHED. In Pleading. A technical word necessary in an indictment for rape.

No other word or circumlocution will answer. The defendant should be charged with having "feloniously ravished" the prosecutrix, or woman, mentioned in the indictment; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Hawk. Pl. Cr. 2, c. 25, s. 26; Cro. Car. 37; Co. Litt. 184, n. p; Co. 2d Inst. 180; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 447. The words "feloniously did ravish and carnally know" imply that the act was done forcibly and against the will of the woman; 12 S. & R. 70. See 3 Chitty, Cr. L. 812.

RAVISHMENT. In Criminal Law. An unlawful taking of a woman, or of an heir in ward. Rape, which see.

RAVISHMENT OF WARD. In English Law. The marriage of an infant ward without the consent of the guardian. It is punishable by statute Westminster 2, c. 35.

READING. The act of pronouncing aloud, or of acquiring by actual inspection, a knowledge of the contents of a writing or of a printed document.

In order to enable a party to a contract, or a devisor, to know what a paper contains, it must be read, either by the party himself or by some other persons to him. When a person signs or executes a paper, it will be presumed that it has been read to him; 14 Pa. 496; 82 id. 203; see 82 Ala. 496; 117 U. S. 532; but this presumption may be rebutted.

In the case of a blind testator, if it can be proved that the will was not read to him, it cannot be sustained; 3 Wash. C. C. 580. But when the testator was blind and there are any circumstances giving reasonable ground for suspicion of fraud or imposition, the burden is on those who support the will to show that it was read to him; 1 Houst. 44.

Where one who cannot read or write is disqualified for jury service, the words mean that he must be able to do so in the English language, and that he is able to read and write in German will not remove the objection; 12 Tex. App. 167.

READY. Prepared. The words, "I will be ready to," are held to imply a covenant. 1 Rolle, Abr. 519, pl. 8.

READY AND WILLING. Implies capacity to act as well as disposition. 11 L. J. Ex. 322. See 5 Bing. N. C. 399.

READY MONEY. A bequest of ready money includes cash at the banker's, whether balance on current account, or a deposit, or withdrawable after notice; 12 L. J. Ch. 385; 27 id. 797; but not unreceived dividends on stock; 18 L. J. Ch. 401; nor money in the hands of a sales-master; 9 Ir. Eq. Rep. 398; but it has been held that a debt would pass under a bequest of ready money. 23 L. J. Ch. 496.

REAL. At Common Law. A term which is applied to land in its most enlarged signification. Real security, therefore, means the security of mortgages or other incumbrances affecting lands. 2 Atk. 806; S. C. 2 Ves. Sen. 547.

In Civil Law. That which relates to a thing, whether it be movable or immovable, lands or goods: thus, a real injury is one which is done to a thing, as a trespass to property, whether it be real or personal in the common-law sense. A real statute is one which relates to a thing, in contradistinction to such as relate to a person.

REAL ACTION. In Practice. IN THE CIVIL LAW. One by which a person seeks to recover his property which is in the possession of another. Dig. 50. 16. 16. It is to be brought against the person who has possession.

At the Common Law. One brought for the specific recovery of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. Stephen, Pl. 3.

They are droitural when they are based upon the right of property, and possessory when based upon the right of possession. They are either writs of right; writs of entry upon disseisin (which lie in the per, the per et cui, or the post), intrusion, or alienation; writs ancestral possessory, as mort d'ancestor, aiel, besaiel, cosinage, or nuper obiit. Comyns, Dig. Actions (D 2).

These actions were always local, and were to be brought in the country where the land lay; Bracton 189, 414. They are now pretty generally laid aside in practice, upon account of the great nicety required in their management, and the inconvenient length of their process,—a much more expeditious method of trying titles being since introduced by other actions, personal and mixed. See Stearns; Booth, Real Act.; Bac. Abr. Actions; Com. Dig. Actions; 3 Bla. Com. 118: Action.

REAL ASSETS. See Assets.

REAL BURDEN. In Scotch Law. Where a right to land is expressly granted under the burden of a specific sum, which is declared a burden on the lands themselves, or where the right is declared null if the sum be not paid, and where the amount of the sum and the name of the creditor in it can be discovered from the records, the burden is said to be real. Bell, Dict.

REAL CHATTELS. See Chattel.

REAL CONTRACT. At Common Law. A contract respecting real property. 8 Rep. 22 a.

In Civil Law. Those contracts which require the interposition of a thing (res) as the subject of them. See Contract.

REAL COVENANT. A covenant whereby a man binds himself to pass a real thing, as lands or tenements; as, a covenant to levy a fine, etc. Shepp. Touchst. 161; Fitzh. N. B. 145; Co. Litt. 384 b.

A covenant, the obligation of which is so connected with the realty that he who has the latter is either entitled to the benefit of or liable to perform the other. 2 Bla. Com. 304, Coleridge's note; Stearns, Real Act. 134; 4 Kent 472.

A covenant by which the covenantor binds his heirs. 2 Bla. Com. 304.

Those by which a single covenantor undertakes the performance of the covenant. It frequently happens that each one of several covenantors binds himself to perform singly the whole undertaking. The words commonly used for this purpose are "severally," "each of us." Still more commonly the undertaking is both joint and several.

It is the nature of the interest, and not the form of the covenant, which determines its character in this respect; 16 How. 580; 1 Gray 376.

Very considerable confusion exists among the authorities in the use of the term real covenants. The definition of Blackstone which determines the character of covenants from the insertion or non-insertion of the word "heir" by the covenantor, is pretty generally rejected. Of the other definitions, that which makes a real covenant an obligation to pass realty is the most ancient. The second definition is that now ordinarily understood when the term "real covenant" is employed. The benefit of such covenants will always run with the land and can be enforced by any vendee, no matter how remote. The burden, however, will not run with the land so as to be capable of enforcement unless there be privity either of contract or estate between the plaintiff and the defendant; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 115. These covenants are of various kinds. Some are used in lieu of the ancient warranty. Of these the most common are covenants of warranty, both general and special, covenants of seisin, that the vendor has a good right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, for freedon from incumbrances, and for further assurance. Wms. R. P. 447. In regard to all these, it may be said that in England the right of action passes to and vests in the party in whose time the substantial breach occurs, and who ultimately sustains injury: Rawle, Cov. 324. In the United States, however, the covenants for seisin, for right to convey, and against incumbrances are usually construed to be broken as soon as made and cannot enure to the advantage of subsequent grantees. Covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment are, however, prospective, and no breach occurs until eviction, actual or constructive; id. 313. See Covenant, and the various titles thereunder.

Other real covenants now in use are as follows: either to preserve the inheritance, as to keep in repair; 9 B. & C. 505; 17 Wend. 148; 1 Dall. 210; 6 Yerg. 512; 6 Vt. 276; 38 E. L. & E. 462; to keep buildings insured, and reinstate them if burned; 5 B. & Ald. 1; 6 Gill & J. 372; to continue the relation of landlord and tenant, as to pay rent; 1 Dougl. 183; 2 Rawle 159; 1 Wash. C. C. 375; to do suit to the lessor's mill; 5 Co. 18; 1 B. & C. 410; to grind the tenant's corn; 2 Yeates 74; for the renewal of leases; Moore 159; or to protect the tenant in his enjoyment of the premises, as to warrant and defend, never to claim or assert title; 7 Me. 97; 3 Metc. 121; to release suit and service; Co. Litt. 384 b; to produce title-deeds in defence of the grantee's title; Dig. tit. xxxii. c. 27, § 99; 1 S. & S. 449; to supply water to the premises; 4 B. & Ald. 266; to draw water off from a mill-pond; 19 Pick. 449; not to establish another mill on the same stream; 17 Wend. 136; not to erect buildings on adjacent land; 4 Paige, Ch. 510; to use the land in a specified manner; 13 Sim. 228; generally to create or preserve easements for the benefit of the land granted: 4 E. D. Sm. 122; 1 Bradf. 40. See 2 Greenl. Ev. § 240; 2 Washb. R. P. 648; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 115.

REAL EFFECTS. Real property. 1 Cowp. 307. See EFFECTS; REAL PROPERTY.

REAL ESTATE. Landed property. See LAND; REAL PROPERTY.

REAL ESTATE BROKER. One who engages in the purchase and sale of real estate as a business, and holds himself out to the public in that character and capacity. 26 Pa. 138.

REAL EVIDENCE. Evidence of which any object belonging to the class of things is the source, persons also being included in respect of such properties as belong to them in common with things. This sort of evidence may be either immediate, where the thing comes under the cognizance of our senses; or reported, where its existence is related to us by others. Chamb. Best, Ev. 16.

REAL LAW. At Common Law. A popular term used to denote such parts of the system of common law as concern or relate to real property.

In Civil Law. A law which relates to specific property, whether movable or immovable.

If real law in any given case relate to immovable property, it is limited in its operation to the territory within which that property is situate, real estate being, both by the common and continental laws, subject exclusively to the laws of the government within whose territory it is situate; Story, Confl. L. 426. See LEX REI SITÆ.

REAL PROPERTY. Land, and generally whatever is erected or growing upon or affixed to land. 9 Day 374; 37 Minn. 4; also rights issuing out of, annexed to, and exercisable within or about the same. Annexations made by a stranger to the soil of another without his consent become the property of the owner of the soil; Britton, bk. 2, ch. 2, sec. 6, p. 856; 2 Kent 334; 15 Ill. 397; 16 Mass. 449; 105 id. 414; 82 Fed. Rep. 857. When annexations are made by the owner of the soil with the materials of another, so long as the identity of the original materials can be proved, the right of the original owner is not lost; 25 Vt. 620; 57 N. H. 514. Such property has the quality of passing on the death of the owner to the heir and not the executor. It may either be corporeal or incorporeal. See Will. Real P. 12.

In respect to property, real and personal correspond very nearly with immovables and movables of the civil law. By the latter "biens" is a general term for property; and these are classified into movable and immovable, and the latter are subdivided into corporeal and incorporeal. Guyot, Répert. Biens.

By immovables the civil law intended property which could not be removed at all, or not without destroying the same, together with such movables as are fixed to the freehold, or have been so fixed and are intended to be again united with it, although at the time severed therefrom. Taylor, Civ. L. 475.

Real property includes also some things not strictly land or rights exercised or engaged in reference thereto—such are offices and dignities, which are so classed because in ancient times such titles were annexed to the ownership of various lands; Wms. R. P. 8. Corodies and annuities are also sometimes classed as real property. Shares of stock in railway and canal companies are in England real property unless made personalty by act of parliament. In the United States the better opinion is that they are personalty independent of statutory enactment; Ang. & A. Corp. § 557; 2 Kent 340, n. Some interests in lands are regarded as personal property, and are governed by the rules relating thereto—such are terms of years of lands. Such interests are known as chattels real; 2 Bla. Com. 386.

Though the term real, as applied to property, in distinction from personal, is now so familiar, it is one of a somewhat recent introduction. While the feudal law prevailed, the terms in use in its stead were lands, tenements, or hereditaments. These acquired the epithet of real from the nature of the remedy applied by law for the recovery of them, as distinguished from that provided in case of injuries, contracts broken, and the like. In the one case the claimant or demandant recovered the real thing sued for,—the land itself,—while, ordinarily, in the other he could only recover recompense in the form of pecuniary damages.

The term, it is said, as a means of designation, did not come into general use until after the feudal system had lost its hold, nor till even as late as the commencement of the seventeenth century. One of the earliest cases in which the courts applied the distinctive terms of real and personal to estates, without any words of explanation, is said to have been that of Wind v. Jekyl, 1 P. Wms. 575; Wms. R. P. 66.

Corporeal hereditaments comprise land and whatever is erected or growing upon or affixed thereto, including whatever is beneath or above the surface, "usque ad orcum" as well as "usque ad cœlum;" 2 Bla. Com. 17–19; Co. Litt. 4 a. Houses, trees, growing crops, and other articles fixed to the soil, though usually classed as realty, may under certain circumstances and for certain purposes acquire the character of personalty. Thus if one erect a building on the land of another with the latter's consent, it is the personal estate of the builder and may be levied on by his creditors as such; 6 N. H. 555; 6 Me. 452; 8 Pick. 402; 55 Minn. 211; 39 id. 479; see 159 U. S. 483; but if he fail to remove it within a reasonable time after being ejected from the land, it becomes a part of the realty; 57 Minn. 104. If it is sold to the owner of the soil, it becomes real property; 80 Me. 542. So if a nurseryman plant trees upon land leased for the purpose of growing them for the market, the trees are deemed personalty; 1 Met. 27; 4 Taunt. 316, So where the owner of land sells growing trees (not in a nursery to be cut by the vendee), they will be deemed to pass as personalty where the contract gives no right to the vendee to allow them to remain upon the land; 4 Metc. Mass. 580; 9 B. & C. 561. But where there is an understanding, express or implied, that the trees may remain upon the land and be cut at the pleasure of the vendee, then the property in the trees is deemed real; 4 Mass. 266; 7 N. H. 522. So crops, while growing, planted by the owner of the land, are a part of the real estate; but if sold by him when fit for harvesting, they become personalty; 5 B. & C. 829; and a sale of such crops, though not fit for harvest, has been held good as personalty; 4 M. & W. 343; 2 Dana 206; 2 Rawle 161. See 39 Ill. App. 404. A rose-bush in a yard will pass by a deed of the realty; 19 N. Y. S. 381. See EMBLEMENTS; MINES AND MINING.

There are a large number of articles known as fixtures, which, though originally wholly movable and personal in their nature, have acquired, by having been affixed to real estate or applied to use in connection with it, the character of realty. Such articles pass from the vendor to the vendee of the land as realty; 2 Kent 345; 2 Sm. L. C. 228; 20 Wend. 636; even though they may be at the time temporarily disconnected. See FIXTURES.

The intention of the parties immediately concerned, who have agreed that property annexed to the soil shall retain its character as personalty, will prevail except as against innocent purchasers without notice, unless the property be of such a nature that it necessarily becomes incorporated into and a part of the realty by the act and manner of annexation; 117 Ind. 176.

Manure made upon a farm in the usual manner for consumption of its products would be a part of the real estate; while if made from products purchased and brought on to the land by the tenant, as in case of a livery-stable, it would be personal; 21 Pick. 367; 3 N. H. 503; 6 Me. 222; 2 N. Chipm. 115; 11 Conn. 525; 15 Wend. 169; 30 N. H. 558. See MANURE; FIXTURES.

Equity will, in many instances, for the sake of enforcing and preserving the rights of parties interested, regard realty as converted into personalty and personalty as converted into realty, although no such change may actually have taken place. So where realty is devised by a testator to his executors with imperative directions to sell, the devolution of the property, even before actual conversion, will be controlled by the rules relating to personalty; 1 Bro. C. C. 497; 3 Wheat. 563; 72 Pa. 417. So where money is directed to be laid out in lands, it will be deemed realty for purposes of descent even before the purchase; 1 Bro. C. C. 503. But such direction must be imperative, otherwise no such result ensues; 3 Atk. 255; L. R. 7 Eq. 226; 10 Pa. 131. So realty owned by a partnership will be deemed personalty for the purposes of the partnership; 3 Kent 39; 81 Pa. 377; 1 Black 346; 7 Conn. 11. And the moment a corporation has exercised its right to condemn land, conversion takes place, in Pennsylvania. See PARTNERSHIP; CONVERSION; INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS; LAND TRANSFER; REGISTRATION.

REAL RIGHT. In Scotch Law. That which entitles him who is vested with it to possess the subject as his own, and, if in the possession of another, to demand from him its actual possession.

It is distinguished from a personal right, which is that of action against a debtor, but without any right in the subject which the debtor is obliged to transfer to him. Real rights affect the subject itself; personal are founded in obligation. Erskine, Prin. 479.

By analogy, the right which a claimant in an action of replevin seeks to enforce at common law would be a real one, while the compensation which the plaintiff seeks in an action of assumpsit or trover, being a pecuniary one, would be personal.

REAL SERVITUDE. In Scotch Law. A burden imposed upon one tenement in favor of another tenement. Ersk. Prin. 206.

REAL STATUTES. Statutes which have property for their principal object, and do not speak of persons, except in relation to property. Sto. Confl. L. § 13.

REAL THINGS. Things substantial and immovable, and the rights and profits annexed to or issuing out of them. 1 Steph. Com. 167.

REALM. A kingdom; a country. 1 Taunt. 270; 4 Camp. 289; Rose 387.

REALTY. A term sometimes used as a collective noun for real property or estate—more generally to imply that that of which it is spoken is of the nature or character of real property or estate. See REAL PROPERTY.

REAR. The word has been held not necessarily to mean directly behind. 109 Mass. 82.

REASON. That power by which we distinguish truth from falsehood and right from wrong, and by which we are enabled to combine means for the attainment of particular ends. Encyclopédie; Shelf. Lun. Introd. xxvi. Ratio in jure æquitas integra.

A man deprived of reason is not, in many cases, criminally responsible for his acts, nor can he enter into any contract.

Reason is called the soul of the law; for when the reason ceases the law itself ceases. Co. Litt. 97, 183; 1 Bla. Com. 70; 7 Toullier, n. 566; MAXIMS, Cessante ratione, etc.

REASONABLE. Conformable or agreeable to reason: just; rational.

An award must be reasonable; for if it be of things nugatory in themselves, and offering no advantage to either of the parties, it cannot be enforced; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2096. See AWARD.

REASONABLE ACT. This term signifies such an act as the law requires. When an act is unnecessary, a party will not be required to perform it as a reasonable act; 9 Price 43; Yelv. 44; Platt, Cov. 342, 157.

REASONABLE AND PROBABLE CAUSE. In Malicious Prosecution. A reasonable amount of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in believing that the accused is guilty; but mere suspicion alone is not sufficient. 32 Neb. 444. See MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

REASONABLE CARE. That care and foresight which men of ordinary prudence are accustomed to employ. 6 Duer 646. It is synonymous with ordinary care; 3 S. Dak. 93; see 42 Mo. 95; or due care; 10 Allen 532. See CARE; DUE CARE; NEGLIGENCE; ORDINARY CARE.

REASONABLE DOUBT. See DOUBT.

REASONABLE EXPECTATION. Within the meaning of the English bankruptcy act of 1883, one who begins business without capital and with a mortgage on all his assets, is held to have contracted his debts without reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay. 14 Q. B. D. 600.

REASONABLE FACILITIES. See FACILITIES.

REASONABLE PORTION. A power to charge an estate with reasonable portions or fortunes for younger children and for their maintenance and education is sufficiently certain to be capable of execution, and the word reasonable there is applicable not only to the amount of the portion, but also to the time and occasion on which the child would want it. Beatty 318.

REASONABLE QUESTION. See QUESTION.

REASONABLE RATES. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; RATES.

REASONABLE SKILL. Such skill as is ordinarily possessed and exercised by persons of common capacity, engaged in the same business or employment. 6 Metc. 26.

REASONABLE TIME. The English law, which in this respect has been adopted by us, frequently requires things to be done within a reasonable time; but what a reasonable time is, it does not define: quam longum debet esse rationabile tempus non definitur in lege, sed pendet ex discretione justiciariorum; Co. Litt. 50.

The question of reasonable time is left to be fixed by circumstances and the usages of business. A bill of exchange must be presented within a reasonable time; Chitty, Bills 197-202. An abandonment must be made within a reasonable time after advice received of the loss; Marsh. Ins. 589.

The commercial code of France fixes a time in both these cases, which varies in proportion to the distance. See Code de Com. l. 1, t. 8, s. 1, § 10, art. 160; id. l. 5, t. 10, s. 3, art. 373. See NOTICE OF DISHONOR; PROTEST.

Where the facts are admitted or clearly proved, what is a reasonable time is a question of law for the court depending upon all the circumstances of the case; 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1023.

It has been held that where the question of reasonable time is one affected by many different circumstances with respect to which no definite rule of law has been laid down, it is a question for the jury. It is a question for the court when by a series of decisions on the same data it has been rendered certain; 22 U. S. App. 164.

REASSURANCE. When an insurer is desirous of lessening his liability, he may procure some other insurer to insure him from loss for the insurance he has made: this is called reassurance.

RE-ATTACHMENT. A second attachment of him who has formerly attached and dismissed the court without day, by the not coming of the justices, or some such casualty. Reg. Orig. 85.

REBATE. In Mercantile Law. Discount; the abatement of interest in consequence of prompt payment. An allowance by way of discount or drawback.

The allowance of rebates is a common method by which common carriers discriminate between shippers; the practice is unlawful; and a contract to procure rebates from railroad companies for a shipper is void as being in violation of the provisions of the interstate commerce law; 6 Misc. Rep. 570.

There is nothing in the interstate commerce law which, by reason of the allowance of rebates, if actually made, would invalidate a contract of affreightment, or exempt a railroad company from liability on its bills of lading; 151 U. S. 368; in cases where the facts are controverted or doubtful, it is for the jury to determine the facts, and the court to apply the law in determining the question; Wells, Law & Fact 135.

REBEL. A citizen or subject who unjustly and unlawfully takes up arms against the constituted authorities of the nation, to deprive them of the supreme power, either by resisting their lawful and constitutional orders in some particular matter or to impose on them conditions. Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, § 328. In another sense, it signifies a refusal to obey a superior or the commands of a court.

REBELLION. In Criminal Law. The taking up arms traitorously against the government. The forcible opposition and resistance to the laws and process lawfully issued.

Insurrection, sedition, rebellion, revolt, and mutiny express action directed against government or authority, while riot has this implication only incidentally, if at all. They express actual and open resistance to authority. Except sedition, which may be secret or open, and often is only of a nature to lead to overt acts. An insurrection goes beyond sedition, in that it is an actual arising against the government. Rebellion goes beyond insurrection in aim, being an attempt actually to overthrow the government, while an insurrection seeks only some change of minor importance. A rebellion is generally on a larger scale than an insurrection. A revolt has generally the same aim as a rebellion, but it is on a smaller scale. A revolt may be against military government, but is generally like insurrection, sedition, and rebellion against civil government. A mutiny is organized resistance to law in an army or navy, and sometimes a similar act by an individual. The success of a rebellion often dignifies it with the name of a revolution. Cent. Dict.

If the rebellion amount to treason, it is punished by the laws of the United States with death. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5332. If it be a mere resistance of process, it is generally punished by fines and imprisonment. Id. § 5336. See Dalloz, Dict.; Code Penal 209.

When a rebellion has broken out in any state, the rebel cruisers may be treated as pirates by the established government, if the rebel government has not been recognized as belligerent by the parent state or by foreign nations; but the right ceases to exist on the recognition of the rebels as belligerents; 2 Black 273; 11 Wall. 268; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law 169.

REBELLION, COMMISSION OF. In Old English Practice. A writ issuing out of chancery to compel the defendant to appear.

REBOUTER. To repel or bar. The action of the heir by the warranty of his ancestor is called to rebut or repel.

REBUT. To contradict; to do away.

REBUTTABLE PRESUMPTION. See PRESUMPTION.

REBUTTAL. See REBUTTING EVIDENCE.

REBUTTER. In Pleading. The name of the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's surrejoinder. It is governed by the same rules as the rejoinder. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (K). See PLEADINGS; Andr. Steph. 51.

REBUTTING EVIDENCE. That evidence which is given by a party in the cause to explain, repel, counteract, or disprove facts given in evidence on the other side. The term rebutting evidence is more particularly applied to that evidence given by the plaintiff to explain or repel the evidence given by the defendant.

It is a general rule that anything may be given as rebutting evidence which is a direct reply to that produced on the other side; 2 M'Cord 161; and the proof of circumstances may be offered to rebut the most positive testimony; 1 Pet. C. C. 235. It is within the discretion of the court to allow evidence in rebuttal which should have been offered in chief; 36 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1019.

But there are several rules which exclude all rebutting evidence. A party cannot impeach his own witness, though he may disprove, by other witnesses, matters to which he has testified; 3 Litt. 465; nor can he rebut or contradict what a witness has sworn to which is immaterial to the issue; 16 Pick. 153; 2 Bail. 118.

Parties and privies are estopped from contradicting a written instrument by parol proof; but this rule does not apply to strangers; 10 Johns. 229. But the parties may prove that before breach the agreement was abandoned, or annulled by a subsequent agreement not in writing; 4 N. H. 196. And when the writing was made by another, as where the log-book stated a desertion, the party affected by it may prove that the entry was false or made by mistake; 4 Mas. 541. It is within the discretion of a trial court to permit witnesses to be called in rebuttal whose testimony is in support of that given in chief; 4 U. S. App. 563.

RECALL. In International Law. To deprive a minister of his functions; to supersede him.

Where a mission to a foreign country is terminated by a formal letter of recall, the minister usually delivers a copy thereof to the minister or secretary of foreign affairs, obtains an audience of the sovereign or chief executive, and delivers or exhibits the original of his recall. If he is recalled at the request of the government to which he is accredited, he would neither ask nor receive an audience of leave. If recalled on account of a misunderstanding between the two governments, it must depend upon circumstances whether a formal letter of recall is to be sent to him or whether he may quit the residence without waiting for it; also as to whether he shall demand or the sovereign shall grant him an audience of leave; 1 Hall. Int. L. 365. See LETTER OF RECALL; MINISTER.

RECALL A JUDGMENT. To reverse a judgment on a matter of fact.

RECAPTION. The act of a person who has been deprived of the custody of another, to which he is legally entitled, by which he regains the peaceable custody of such person; or of the owner of personal or real property who has been deprived of his possession, by which he retakes possession peaceably.

In each of these cases the law allows the recaption of the person or of the property, provided he can do so without occasioning a breach of the peace or an injury to a third person who has not been a party to the wrong. Co. 3d Inst. 134; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; 3 Bla. Com. 5.

The right of reception of a person is confined to a husband, in retaking his wife; a parent, his child, of whom he has the custody; a master, his apprentice; and, according to Blackstone, a master, his servant,—but this must be limited to a servant who assents to the reception: in these cases, the party injured may peaceably enter the house of the wrong-doer, without a demand being first made, the outer door being open, and take and carry away the person wrongfully detained. He may also enter peaceably into the house of a person harboring, who was not concerned in the original abduction; 8 Bingh. 186.

The same principles extend to the right of reception of personal property. The true owner of goods wrongfully taken may retake them if he can, even from a third party, using (it is said) whatever force is reasonably necessary; Poll. Torts 361; and may enter, for that purpose, on the first taker's land, but not on a third person's land, unless, it is said, the original taking was felonious, or, perhaps, after the goods have been claimed and the occupier of the land has refused to deliver them up; Poll. Torts 361.

In the reception of real estate, the owner may, in the absence of the occupier, break open the outer door of a house and take possession; but if in regaining his possession the party be guilty of a forcible entry and breach of the peace, he may be indicted; but the wrong-doer, or person who had no right to the possession, cannot sustain any action for such forcible regaining possession merely; 1 Chitty, Pr. 646. See Cooley; Pollock, Torts.

RECAPTURE. The recovery from the enemy, by a force friendly to the former owner, of a prize by him captured.

It seems incumbent on fellow-citizens, and it is of course equally the duty of allies, to rescue each other from the enemy when there is a reasonable prospect of success; 3 C. Rob. 224.

By the act of March 3, 1800, in case of recapture of vessels or goods belonging to persons resident within, or under the protection of, the United States, the same, not having been condemned as prize by competent authority before the recapture, shall be restored to the owner upon payment of salvage of one-eighth of the value, if recaptured by a public ship, and one-sixth if recaptured by a private ship; and if the recaptured vessel shall appear to have been set forth and armed as a vessel of war before its capture, or afterwards and before recapture, then the salvage shall be one moiety of the value. If the recaptured vessel belong to the government and be unarmed, the salvage is one-sixth, if recaptured by a private ship, and one-twelfth if recaptured by a public ship; if armed, the salvage is one moiety, if recaptured by a public ship. In respect to public armed ships, the cargo pays the same rate of salvage as the vessel; as to private ships, the rate of salvage is the same on the cargo whether the vessel be armed or unarmed. See 9 Cra. 244. The valuation of the property is to be made at the place of restitution, not of recapture; Edw. Adm. 210.

Salvage is not generally allowed on the recapture of neutral property, unless there be danger of condemnation, or such injustifiable conduct on the part of the government of the captors as to bring the property into jeopardy; 6 C. Rob. 410; 1 Cra. 102. To entitle a party to salvage there must have been actual or constructive capture; but it is sufficient if the property was completely under the dominion of the enemy; 3 C. Rob. 305; it is a recapture if the prize was actually rescued from the grasp of the hostile captor; id.; 3 Phill. Int. L. 638. Where the enemy has captured a ship and then abandoned her and she is recaptured, she is to be restored on payment of salvage, but the rate of salvage is discretionary; 6 C. Rob. 273; but if the abandonment be caused by terror of a hostile fleet, it is a recapture; id.

Where a prize is abandoned and brought into court by neutral salvors, a neutral court has jurisdiction to decree salvage, but cannot restore the property to the original owner; neutral nations ought not to inquire into the validity of a capture as between belligerents; 3 Dall. 188.

Recapture can be made by a non-commissioned vessel; 3 C. Rob. 229.

In Great Britain prize statutes were formerly passed at the beginning of every war. The Naval Prize Act, 1864, provides that, as between subjects, the right to recover possession is preserved forever, except where the vessel, after capture, has been fitted out by the enemy for war. The right is subject, when the recapture is by a public ship, to the payment of one-eighth salvage or when the recapture is made under circumstances of special difficulty or danger, more than one-eighth, but not exceeding one-fourth. The French rule is to restore a vessel recaptured by a public vessel on the payment of one-thirtieth of the value, if recaptured within twenty-four hours; if after that the time, the salvage is one-tenth.

If a belligerent captures neutral property, and it is recaptured by the other belligerent, the latter usually restores it without the payment of salvage.

If the prize has been duly condemned and sold to a neutral purchaser by the captors, that title prevails against the original owners and the recaptors, both under the English and American rule. But such condemnation must be in a competent prize court of the belligerents and not one held in neutral territory; 1 C. Rob. 135.

A recaptured vessel may be permitted, under the English act of 1864, to continue her voyage, or be brought in at once for adjudication; in the former case the re-captor does not lose his right to salvage. If she does not return to a port of the kingdom within six months, the recaptor may proceed in the admiralty, for his salvage.

See INFRA PRÆSIDIA; NEUTRALITY; POSTLIMINIUM; PRIZE.

RECEIPT (Lat. receptum, received; through Fr. receit). A written acknowledgment of payment of money or delivery of chattels.

It is executed by the person to whom the delivery or payment is made, and may be used as evidence against him, on the general principle which allows the admission or declaration of a party to be given in evidence against himself. As an instrument of evidence, the receipt of one person is, in general, inoperative against another, although often useful as a voucher in the private settlement of accounts; and the statutes of some states make receipts for small payments made by executors, etc., evidence of the payment on a settlement of their accounts. And receipts of public officers are sometimes admissible per se; 1 Ill. 45. It is essential to a receipt that it acknowledge the payment or delivery referred to; Russ. & R. 227; 7 C. & P. 549. And under the stamp laws a delivery or payment must be stated: 1 Camp. 499. Also the receipt must, from the nature of the case, be in writing, and must be delivered to the debtor; for a memorandum of payment made by the creditor in his own books is no receipt; 2 B. & Ald. 501, n.; 1 Spear 53. See 87 Mo. 432.

Receipts, effect of. The mere acknowledgment of payment made is not treated in law as binding or conclusive in any high degree. So far as a simple acknowledgment of payment or delivery is concerned, it is presumptive evidence only; Whart. Ev. 1064, 1130, 1365; 1 Pet. C. C. 182; 1 Rich. 32; 1 Harring. 5; 16 Wend. 460; 16 Me. 475; 5 Ark. 61; 11 Mass. 27, 363; 3 McLean 265; 6 B. Monr. 199; 1 Perr. & D. 437; 8 Gill 179; 3 Jones N. C. 501; 18 Colo. 538; 43 Ill. App. 615; 115 U. S. 183; 46 Hun 270; 111 Pa. 562; and is, in general, open to explanation; Tay. Ev. 654, 736, 965; 2 Johns. 378; Add. Contr. 142; 8 Ala. N. S. 59; 4 Vt. 308; 3 McLean 387; 4 Barb. 265; 5 J. J. Marsh. 79; 5 Mich. 171; 32 S. C. 595; 35 Kan. 464; 125 U. S. 90; 68 Ia. 537; being an exception to the general rule that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict or vary a written instrument; 5 Johns. 68; 2 Metc. Mass. 283. Thus, a party may always show, in explanation of a receipt limited to such acknowledgment, the actual circumstances under which it was made; 8 Johns. 389; e. g. that it was obtained by fraud; Wright Ohio 764; 4 H. & M'H. 219; or given under a mistake; 6 Barb. 58; 3 Dana 427; or that, in point of fact, no money was actually paid as stated in it; 2 Strobh. 390; 3 N. Y. 168; 10 Vt. 96; 34 Mo. App. 189; 82 Ill. 134. But see 1 J. J. Marsh. 583; or that the medium of remittance on which the receipt was based has failed; 51 Neb. 5; or where it is given by a contractor under an assurance that it is only a receipt for moneys then paid, and would not preclude him from making a claim for extra work; 18 App. Div. N. Y. 514. A receipt in full for part of an undisputed claim does not prevent recovery of the balance, though given with knowledge and there was no error or fraud; 19 Misc. Rep. 357. A receipt is an admission only; Greenl. Ev. 1, 212; 3 B. & Ad. 318; 112 Mo. 661; it is but prima facie evidence against the creditor; 13 U. S. App. 597; and may be explained, unless executed with the formalities of a deed; Leake, Contr. 901; in law as well as equity; L. R. 6 Ch. 584. As against a stranger thereto, it is incompetent evidence of the payment thereby acknowledged; 50 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 703. Mere negligence in signing a receipt without reading it will not conclude the signer or preclude explanation of its contents, particularly if the signing were induced by fraud or misrepresentation; 57 Kan. 195.

Receipts "in full." When, however, we find a receipt acknowledging payment "in full" of a specified debt, or "in full of all accounts" or of "all demands," the instrument is of a much higher and more conclusive character. It does not, indeed, like a release, operate upon the demand itself, extinguishing it by any force or virtue in the receipt, but it is evidence of a compromise and mutual settlement of the rights of the parties. The law infers from such acknowledgment an adjustment of the amount due, after consideration of the claims of each party, and a payment of the specified sum as a final satisfaction: 10 Vt. 491; 2 Dev. 247; Wright Ohio 764; 21 N. H. 85; 120 N. Y. 190. This compromise thus shown by the receipt will often operate to extinguish a demand, although the creditor may be able to show he did not receive all that he justly ought. Papers showing a receipt of money in full satisfaction of a decree appealed from, cannot be varied or contradicted by parol evidence; 120 U. S. 198. See ACCORD.

If the rights of a party are doubtful, are honestly contested, and time is given to allow him to satisfy himself, a receipt in full, though given for less than his just rights, will not be set aside. Thus, in general, a receipt in full is conclusive when given with a knowledge of the circumstances, and when the party giving it cannot complain of any misapprehension as to the compromise he was making, or of any fraud; 5 Vt. 520; 1 Camp. 392; 2 Strobh. 203; and unless given in ignorance of its purport, or under circumstances constituting duress, it is an acquittance in bar of any further demand; 151 U. S. 483.

But receipts of this character are not wholly exempt from explanation; fraud or misrepresentation may be proved, and so may such mistake as enters into and vitiates the compromise of the demand admitted; Brayt. 75; 1 Camp. 394; Coxe N. J. 48; 2 Brev. 223; 4 H. & M'H. 219; 4

Barb. 265; 2 Harring. 392; 2 C. & P. 44. See 73 Mich. 138; 141 U. S. 564. The evidence in explanation must be clear and full, and addressed to the point that there was not in fact an intended and valid compromise of the demand. For if the compromise was not binding, the receipt in full will not aid it. The receipt only operates as evidence of a compromise which extinguished the claim; 26 Me. 88; 4 Denio 166; 2 M'Cord 320; 4 Wash. C. C. 562.

A receipt for a specified amount of money and designated notes executed by a defendant to the plaintiff's intestate may be used as evidence that it was a deposit with the latter and not a payment to him where there is other evidence to the same effect; 114 Cal. 612.

Though a receipt in full is presumed to be in full settlement the presumption is not conclusive; 32 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 623; and where it is given for work and labor, a receipt in full for the bill rendered is not conclusive evidence of a final settlement unless it purports to be so; 91 Hun 639. Where the question is raised whether the purchase price of an article has been paid notwithstanding a receipt, and there is evidence to the contrary, the question is for the jury; 2 App. Div. N. Y. 93; and a jury is not precluded from finding that a receipt in full was not intended to be such by the fact that he who signed it gave no explanation for doing so; 87 Me. 429.

Receipts in deeds. The effect to be given to a receipt for the consideration-money, so frequently inserted in a deed of real property, has been the subject of numerous and conflicting adjudications. The general principle settled by weight of authority is that for the purpose of sustaining the conveyance as against the vendor and his privies the receipt is conclusive: they are estopped to deny that a consideration was paid sufficient to sustain the conveyance; 1 Binn. 502; 26 Mo. 56; 4 Hill N. Y. 643. But, in a subsequent action for the purchase-money or upon any collateral demand, e. g. in an action to recover a debt which was in fact paid by the conveyance, or in an action for damages for breach of a covenant in the deed, and the like, the grantor may show that the consideration was not in fact paid—that an additional consideration to that mentioned was agreed for, etc.; 16 Wend. 460; 10 Vt. 96; 4 N. H. 229, 397; 1 M'Cord 514; 7 Pick. 533; 1 Rand. 219; 4 Dev. 355; 6 Me. 364; 5 B. & Ald. 606; 5 Ala. 224; 2 Harring. Del. 354; 13 Miss. 238; 5 Conn. 113; 1 Harr. & G. 139; 2 Humphr. 584; 1 J. J. Marsh. 387; 3 Ind. 212; 15 Ill. 230; 1 Stockt. Ch. 492. See 30 Mo. App. 258. But there are many contrary cases. See 1 Me. 2; 7 Johns. 341; 3 M'Cord 552; 1 Harr. & J. 252; 1 Hawks 64; 4 Hen. & M. 113; 2 Ohio 182; 1 B. & C. 704. And when the deed is attacked for fraud, or is impeached by creditors as voluntary and therefore void, or when the object is to show the conveyance illegal, the receipt may be explained or contradicted; 3 Zabr. 465; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 461; 21 Pa. 480; 20 Pick. 247; 12 N. H. 248. See ASSUMPSIT; DEED; RECITAL.

With this exception of receipts inserted in a sealed instrument having some other purpose to which the receipt is collateral, a receipt under seal works an absolute estoppel, on the same principles and to the same general extent as other specialties; Ware 496; 4 Hawks 22. Thus, where an assignment of seamen's wages bore a sealed receipt for the consideration money, even though the attesting witness testified that no money was paid at the execution of the papers, and defendant offered no evidence of any payment ever having been made, and refused to produce his account with the plaintiff (the assignor), on the trial, it was held that the receipt was conclusive; 2 Taunt. 141. See SEAL; SPECIALTY.

Receipt embodying contract. A receipt may embody a contract; and in this case it is not open to the explanation or contradiction permitted in the case of a simple receipt; 4 Gray 186; 44 Minn. 471. An agreement in a receipt is as conclusive as any other paper executed between the parties; 125 U. S. 90. The fact that it embodies an agreement brings it within the rule that all matters resting in parol are merged in the writing. See EVIDENCE. Thus, a receipt which contains a clause amounting to an agreement as to the application to be made of the money paid—as when it is advanced on account of future transactions—is not open to parol evidence inconsistent with it; 5 Ind. 109; 14 Wend. 116; 12 Pick. 40, 562. A bill of parcels with prices affixed, rendered by a seller of goods to a purchaser, with a receipt of payment executed at the foot, was held in one case to amount to a contract of sale of the goods, and therefore not open to parol explanation; while in another case a similar bill was held merely a receipt, the bill at the head being deemed only a memorandum to show to what the receipt applied; 3 Cra. 311; 1 Bibb 271. A bill of lading, which usually contains words of receipt stating the character, quantity, and condition of the goods as delivered to the carrier, is the subject of a somewhat peculiar rule. It is held that so far as the receipt is concerned it may be explained by parol; 6 Mass. 422; 7 id. 297; 3 N. Y. 321; 10 id. 529; 1 Abb. Adm. 209, 397; 39 Ill. App. 17. But see 1 Bail. 174.

A receipt for rent given to a tenant after notice to quit where the person signing it is not shown to have been authorized by the landlord to receive the rent, is not admissible in an action by the latter to recover possession; 19 Misc. Rep. 56; and in such action receipts given by the same landlord to another tenant are not admissible to show the character of the tenancy by a difference in the form of receipts, the receipt being in the one case for one month only and in the other not specifying the time, and the effort being to establish a monthly tenancy; id.

But as respects the agreement to carry and deliver, the bill is a contract, to be construed, like all other contracts, according to the legal import of its terms, and cannot be varied by parol; 3 Sandf. 7. In this connection may also be mentioned the receipt customarily given in the New England states, more particularly for goods on which an attachment has been levied. The officer taking the goods often, instead of retaining them in his own manual control, delivers them to some third person, termed the "receiptor," who gives his receipt for them, undertaking to redeliver upon demand. This receipt has in some respects a peculiar force. The receiptor having acknowledged that the goods have been attached cannot afterwards object that no attachment was actually made, or that it was insufficient or illegal; 11 Mass. 219, 317; 24 Pick. 196. Nor can he deny that the property was that of the debtor, except in mitigation of damages or after redelivery; 12 Pick. 562; 15 id. 40. And in the absence of fraud, the value of the chattels stated in the receipt is conclusive upon the receiptor; 12 Pick. 362.

Where the payment is made in some particular currency or medium, as doubtful bank bills, a promissory note of another person, etc., clauses are often inserted in the receipts specifying the condition in which such mode of payment is accepted. In most states negotiable paper given in payment is presumed to have been accepted on the condition that it shall not work a discharge of the demand unless the paper shall ultimately produce satisfaction; and if an intent to accept it absolutely does not affirmatively appear, the creditor is entitled, in case the paper turned out to him is dishonored, to return it and claim to be paid anew. See PAYMENT. If the receipt is silent on that subject, it is open to explanation, and the creditor may rebut it by proof that the payment admitted was in fact made by a note, bill, check, bank-notes afterwards ascertained to be counterfeit, or notes of a bank in fact insolvent though not known to be so to the parties, etc.; 1 Wash. C. C. 338; 1 W. & S. 521; 2 Johns. Cas. 438; 13 Wend. 101; 3 McLean 265; 5 J. J. Marsh. 78. But see 3 Caines, Cas. 14; 1 Munf. 460; 1 Metc. Mass. 156. But if the agreement of the parties is specified in the receipt, the clause which contains it will bind the parties, as being in the nature of a contract; 5 Vt. 555; 1 Rich. 111; 16 Johns. 277; 23 Wend. 345; 2 Gill & J. 493; 3 B. Monr. 353. A receipt for a note taken in payment of an account will not, in general, constitute a defence to an action on the account, unless it appears by proof that the creditor agreed to receive the note as payment and take the risk of its being paid; 10 Md. 27.

Receipts, uses of. A receipt is often useful as evidence of facts collateral to those stated in it. It proves the payment; and whatever inference may be legally drawn from the fact of the payment described will be supported by the receipt. Thus, receipts for rent for a given term have been held prima facie evidence of the payment of all rent previously accrued; 15 Johns. 479; 1 Pick. 332. And they have been admitted on trial of a writ of right, as showing acts of ownership on the part of him who gave them; 7 C. B. 21. A receipt given by A to B for the price of a horse, afterwards levied on as property of A, but claimed by B, has been admitted as evidence of ownership against the attaching creditor; 2 Harr. N. J. 78. A receipt "in full of all accounts," the amount being less than that called for by the accounts of the party giving it, was held in his favor evidence of a mutual settlement of accounts on both sides, and of payment of the balance ascertained to be due after setting off one account against the other; 9 Wend. 332. A receipt given by an attorney for securities he was to collect and account for has been held presumptive evidence of the genuineness and justness of the securities; 14 Ala. 500. And a general receipt by an attorney for an evidence of debt then due, is presumed to have been received by him as attorney, for collection; and he must show the contrary to avoid an action for neglect in not collecting: 3 Johns. 185.

A receipt signed in the name of a certain person by another person, constitutes no evidence of the receipt of the money by the latter; 74 Mich. 220.

Receipts, larceny and forgery of. A receipt may be the subject of larceny; 2 Abb. Pr. 211; or of forgery; Russ. & R. 227; 7 C. & P. 459. Punched railroad tickets shown to be receipts to the conductor and vouchers to him for the amount of fare between stations, are receipts within a statute making it larceny to steal any receipt; 95 Ia. 341.

And it is a sufficient "uttering" of a forged receipt to place it in the hands of a person for inspection with intent fraudulently to induce him to make an advance on the faith that the payment mentioned in the spurious receipt has been made; 14 E. L. & Eq. 556. See FORGERY.

RECEIPTOR. In Practice. A name given to the person who, on a trustee process being issued and goods attached, becomes surety to the sheriff to have them forthcoming on demand, or in time to respond to the judgment, when the execution shall be issued; upon which the goods are bailed to him. Story, Bailm. § 124. The term is used in New York and New Hampshire; 11 N. H. 557; and Maine; 14 Me. 414. See ATTACHMENT; RECEIPT.

As to whether a receiptor is estopped to show property in himself, see 31 Am. Dec. 62; s. c. 14 Me. 414; 25 Am. Dec. 426, n.; 116 Mass. 454; 28 Am. Dec. 695; 24 Am. Dec. 108. He may defend by showing that the property has been taken from him; 11 N. H. 570.

RECEIVABLE. In a legacy, payable; vested. 29 L. J. Ch. 822; L. R. 6 Eq. 59.

RECEIVER. One who receives money to the use of another to render an account.

Story, Eq. Jur. § 446. Receivers were at common law liable to the action of account-render for failure in the latter portion of their duties.

In Equity. A person appointed by a court possessing chancery jurisdiction, to receive the rents and profits of land, or the profits or produce of other property in dispute.

A receiver is an indifferent person between the parties appointed by the court to collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits of land, or the produce of personal estate, or other things, which it does not seem reasonable to the court that either party should do; or where a party is incompetent to do so, as in the case of an infant. The remedy of the appointment of a receiver is one of the very oldest in the court of chancery, and is founded on the inadequacy of the remedy to be obtained in the courts of ordinary jurisdiction; Bisph. Eq. 606.

He is a ministerial officer of the court. 2 S. & S. 98; 1 Cox, Ch. 422; 9 Ves. 335; 11 Ga. 413; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 88; with no powers but those conferred by his order of appointment and the practice of the court; 6 Barb. 589; 2 Paige, Ch. 452; which do not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the court which appoints him; 17 How. 322 (but see infra); appointed on behalf of all parties who may establish rights in the cause; 8 U. S. App. 597, 610; he stands in the shoes of the company; 59 Fed. Rep. 523; 3 Atk. 564; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 278; 4 Madd. 80; 4 Sandf. Ch. 417; and after his appointment neither the owner nor any other party can exercise any acts of ownership over the property; 2 S. & S. 96. Neither party is responsible for his acts; 2 Wall. 519. His custody is that of the court, and leaves the right of the parties concerned to be controlled by the ultimate decree of the court; 10 Bank. Reg. 517.

The appointment of a receiver does not change the title or right of possession of the property, but puts it into his custody for the benefit of the party ultimately entitled; 136 U. S. 223; nor does it work a dissolution of the corporation, but only suspends the function of its officers as far as provided in the decree; 11 Colo. 464; 115 Ind. 466.

A court will protect its receiver in the possession and use of franchises and property committed to him; 53 Fed. Rep. 687.

The rule that property in the hands of a receiver is in custodia legis, and that interference with such possession without leave of the court is a contempt, is as applicable in the seizure thereof to enforce payment of taxes due the state as in any other case; 149 U. S. 164; id. 191.

A receiver is an officer of the court which appointed him, and a judgment in another court in a suit affecting the receiver's right of possession, begun without the permission of the court appointing him, is void; 22 U. S. App. 313. A receiver is not the agent of the corporation nor a substitute for the board of directors. He is but the hand of the court appointing him. His acts are not the acts of the corporation, and his servants are not the servants of the corporation; 31 U. S. App. 644. A decree appointing a receiver is an act of such notoriety that all persons have constructive notice thereof; 31 U. S. App. 644. A receivership is not personal, but continuous, and claims arising against different successive receivers stand on the same footing; 84 Fed. Rep. 67; 62 id. 771; he is analogous to a corporation sole; id.

A receiver is appointed only in those cases where in the exercise of a sound discretion it appears necessary that some indifferent person should have charge of the property; 1 Johns. Ch. 56; 25 Ala. N. S. 81; only during the pendency of a suit; 1 Atk. 578; 2 Du. 632; except in extreme cases; 2 Atk. 315; 2 Dick. Ch. 580; as when a fund in litigation is in peril; 2 Blatch. 78; and ex parte; 14 Beav. 423; 8 Paige, Ch. 373; or before answer; 13 Ves. 266; 4 Price 346; 4 Paige, Ch. 574; 2 Swanst. 146; in special cases only; and, generally, not till all the parties are before the court; 2 Russ. Ch. 145; 1 Hog. Ir. 93. Ordinarily a receiver will not be appointed on an ex parte application; 59 Ia. 307. The action of the court in the appointment of a receiver is not reviewable on appeal; 1 Bond. 422; 1 Biss. 198. But by act of Feb. 9, 1893, an appeal from such an order in the supreme court of the District of Columbia may be taken to the court of appeals; R. S. 2 Supp. 79.

The appointment of a receiver is authorized when the party seeking the appointment shows prima facie a title reasonably free from doubt, or a lien upon the subject-matter of controversy to which he has a right to resort for the satisfaction of his claim, and that it is in danger of loss from waste, misconduct, or insolvency if the defendant is permitted to retain the possession; 86 Ala. 370; 41 Kan. 475; 97 N. C. 367.

One will not be appointed, except under special circumstances making a strong case, where a party is already in possession of the property under a legal title; 19 Ves. 59; 1 Ambl. 311; 2 Y. & C. 351; as a trustee; 2 Bro. C. C. 158; 1 V. & B. 183; 1 My. & C. 163; 16 Ga. 406; 2 J. & W. 294; an executor; 13 Ves. 266; tenant in common; 2 Dick. Ch. 800; 4 Bro. C. C. 414; 2 S. & S. 142; a mortgagee; 4 Abb. Pr. 235; 13 Ves. 377; 1 J. & W. 176, 627; 1 Hog. Ir. 179; or a mortgagor when the debt is not wholly due; 5 Paige, Ch. 38; a director of a corporation in a suit by a stockholder; 2 Halst. Ch. 374; where the property is or should be already in the possession of some court, as during the contestation of a will in the proper court; 2 Atk. 378; 6 Ves. 172; 2 V. & B. 85, 95; 7 Sim. 512; 1 My. & C. 97; but see 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 278; when admiralty is the proper forum; 5 Barb. 209; or where there is already a receiver; 1 Hog. Ir. 199; 10 Paige, Ch. 43; 1 Ired. Eq. 210; 11 id. 607; nor, on somewhat similar grounds, where salaries of public officers are in question; 2 Sim. 560; 10 Beav. 602; 2 Paige, Ch. 333; or where a public office is in litigation; 9 Paige, Ch. 507; where the equitable title of the party asking a receiver is incomplete as made out, as where he has delayed asking for one; 1 Hog. Ir. 118; 1 Donn. Min. Cas. 71; or where the necessity is not very apparent, as on account merely of the poverty of an executor; 12 Ves. 4; 1 Madd. 142; 18 Beav. 161; see 4 Price 346; pending the removal of a trustee; 16 Ga. 406; where a trustee mixes trust-money with his own; 1 Hopk. Ch. 429.

A person holding an unliquidated claim against a corporation is not entitled to the appointment of a receiver, which would be a denial of trial by jury; 148 U. S. 604; 150 id. 385; mere insolvency of a corporation does not authorize the appointment of a receiver at the suit of general creditors, but one will be appointed where it is no longer able to proceed with its business; 64 Fed. Rep. 928.

A receiver will not be appointed without the consent of the corporation on the application of a mere contract creditor, and especially where he cannot claim a definite sum as due; 82 Fed. Rep. 776.

Where the only indebtedness of an insolvent corporation is to the party bringing the creditor's bill, a receiver is unnecessary; 8 U. S. App. 340.

Where the business of a corporation is being mismanaged, a receiver will be appointed at the suit of a stockholder; 103 Ill. 472.

Where a partnership has been dissolved, a receiver will usually be appointed if the property is unsafe in the hands of the partners; 125 N. Y. 688; 104 Ind. 53. On a bill for dissolution on account of improper conduct of partners, a receiver is almost a matter of course; but where a partnership has expired by limitation and there is no special ground for a receiver one will not ordinarily be appointed; 104 Ind. 53. A receiver will not be appointed to continue the business, except temporarily; 6 Fla. 164.

A receiver will be appointed if there is fraud or mismanagement on the part of one partner; or a disagreement between them; or an appropriation of firm property to individual use; or one partner is excluded from the management; or where a liquidating partner is insolvent; Smith, Rec. § 191.

Receivers will be appointed to take charge of trust property when it is in danger, and such appointment is necessary for its preservation; 66 Ga. 66; as where the trustee is not responsible; 92 N. C. 519; or neglects his duties; 4 D. & W. 117; or uses the trust funds on his own account; 91 N. C. 220; or refuses to collect a debt belonging to the estate; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 597; or has failed to obey an order to pay over money of the trust; 54 L. J. Ch. 1130; but ordinarily the remedy will be by the removal of the trustee. The jurisdiction to appoint a receiver exists, but will usually be exercised only in very special cases.

Where a sole trustee is insolvent, a receiver will be appointed; L. R. 1 Ch. App. 325; or where the trustee is poor and of bad habits; 12 Sim. 363.

Equity will appoint a receiver as between co-tenants of real estate in cases of necessity; 17 N. J. Eq. 151; though the cases are rare; as in case of partition suits; 56 Cal. 32; and where one tenant excludes the other from possession; or is insolvent and refuses to account; or refuses to execute the necessary leases or interferes with the collection of rent; Smith, Rec. § 317.

It is said that equity will more willingly appoint a receiver of a mining property, than of ordinary property; 22 Cow. 194.

A receiver will be appointed for good cause in a suit for specific performance; 142 Ind. 324; 91 Hun 304; but see 4 Lea 597. Under special and urgent circumstances, a receiver may be appointed as between lessor and lessee; 57 Pa. 83.

In 2 Daly 425, the income of property of the defendant in divorce proceedings was placed in the hands of a receiver to provide for the wants of his family during the divorce litigation and after its termination; so in case of a decree for alimony; 28 Wis. 367.

A receiver will be appointed to take charge of the estate of a decedent, but "a strong case must be made out to induce the court to dispossess a trustee or executor who is willing to act"; 1 Woods 262, affirmed in 91 U. S. 254. Pending probate proceedings the property will in some cases be protected by the appointment of a receiver; 3 Md. Ch. 279. In 60 Pa. 172, where a will had been admitted to probate and an appeal was pending on an issue to try the validity of the will, a bill for the appointment of a receiver was refused.

A receiver may be appointed in lieu of an executor or administrator, where there has been waste or misappropriation; or such a result is probable; or the executor is insolvent and this is coupled with misapplication; 57 N. C. 390; but not for poverty alone; id.; or where an executor is dead or refuses to act; or where the executor is a non-resident; Smith, Rec. § 301.

A receiver will be appointed as between the vendee and vendor of realty where there is a contract of sale under which possession has been delivered and there is a default in payments, the vendee not being responsible; Smith, Rec. § 315.

The comptroller of the currency has power to appoint a receiver of a national bank, to take possession of its assets, collect its debts, and enforce the personal liability of the stockholders. In cases not within the national bank act, equity has jurisdiction to appoint receivers as in case of other corporations.

A receiver of a national bank is an officer and agent of the United States within R. S. § 380, requiring the district attorney to conduct all suits relating to national banks in which the United States or any of its officers or agents are parties; 150 U. S. 342. The closing of a national bank and the appointment of a receiver transfers the assets of the bank to him; 146 U. S. 499; he has a reasonable time to elect whether he will take property leased with an option to purchase or return it; 142 U. S. 313.

Generally any stranger to the suit may be appointed receiver. The court will not appoint attorneys and solicitors in the cause; 1 Hog. Ir. 322; masters in chancery; 6 Ves. 427; an officer of the corporation; 28 N. J. Eq. 166; 1 Paige, Ch. 517; though it is sometimes done especially in the case of large railroad systems. There is no general rule about appointing officers of the company as receivers: generally the courts refuse to do so; 65 Fed. Rep. 557. Counsel for an adverse party cannot act as receiver's counsel, and if he do he will not be paid out of the funds; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 871; a public officer charged with the duty of winding up an insolvent corporation may be appointed; 3 Fed. Rep. 465; so also a mortgagee; 2 Term 238; 9 Ves. 271; a trustee; 3 Ves. 516; 8 id. 72; but not ordinarily a party in the cause; 62 Ill. 408.

A receiver may be appointed without notice to the adverse party, though generally this should not be done; 41 Kan. 475. It will be done only where the defendant cannot be found or where there is danger of loss or irreparable injury; Smith, Rec. § 5. The appointment and retention of a receiver cannot be collaterally attacked; 52 Kan. 109.

A receiver has no power without the previous direction of the court to incur any expenses, except those absolutely necessary for the preservation and use of the property; 93 U. S. 352.

He is responsible for good faith and reasonable diligence. When the property is lost or injured by any negligence or dishonest execution of the trust, he is liable in damages; but he is not as of course responsible because there has been an embezzlement or theft. He is bound to such ordinary diligence as belongs to a prudent and honest discharge of his duties, and such as is required of all persons who receive compensation for their services; Story, Bailm. §§ 620, 621; see 80 N. Y. 458; but he is not the agent of an insolvent railroad company, and hence the company is not liable for damages occasioned by his negligence in operating the road; 58 N. Y. 61; nor is he personally liable; 63 N. Y. 281; but he is liable as receiver for loss as a carrier of goods; 99 Mass. 395. It is held that where an injury results from the fault or misconduct of a receiver appointed by a court of equity, the court may in its discretion either take cognizance of the question of the receiver's liability, and determine it, or permit the aggrieved party to sue at law; 11 C. E. Green 474; 4 Hun 378; 12 Am. Law Rev. 660.

In a railroad receivership the court will not order the receiver to pay the rental of a leased portion of the road, when he has not received therefrom sufficient to pay such rental, over and above operating expenses, and when the trustee of the leased property has asked the court for its surrender, but has permitted it to remain in the receiver's hands and has not taken possession of it under an order granted by the court; 145 U. S. 82.

Receivers are not assignees and are not bound to adopt a lease, but have an option to do so or not: 58 Fed. Rep. 280; 60 id. 966. A receiver is not compelled to adopt the contracts or leases of the railroad company, but is entitled to a reasonable time to elect, and a court will not order him to pay rental when the income is not sufficient to pay running expenses; 150 U. S. 287, 310. A receiver of an insolvent corporation, who takes possession of a leasehold estate held by the corporation, does not thereby become an assignee of the term, nor liable on the covenants of the lease, but is liable only for a reasonable rent while in possession; 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 857; and in some cases for the rental specified in the lease; 163 Ill. 126. See LEASE.

A receiver is entitled to a reasonable time in which to elect whether or not to retain rolling stock formerly obtained by the company on periodical payments. If he retains it, he must pay the contract price; if he retains it for a time and then releases it, he must pay a fair price for its use, which is usually based on the mileage of the cars and is not the stipulated "rental" under the contract; 42 Fed. Rep. 6.

The receiver of a railroad is not liable for his refusal to carry the plaintiff on a ticket issued by the company before his appointment. The plaintiff has only the right to come in as a general creditor for the price of the ticket; 48 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 58.

Freight money paid to a company before the appointment of a receiver does not entitle the company to sue the receiver for refusal to carry the goods; 51 Fed. Rep. 15.

Damages accruing during the time a railroad is in the hands of a receiver are part of the operating expenses, payable out of the income, if there is any; if not, out of the corpus of the property; 86 Fed. Rep. 1; 31 U. S. App. 644.

An act in South Carolina by which a judgment for personal injuries recovered in an action commenced twelve months from the time the injury was sustained, takes precedence of any mortgage deed or trust given to secure the payment of bonds, is an amendment of the charters of all railroad corporations theretofore created in that state, and any existing mortgagee must be taken to have given his assent to this provision.

Equity may order a receiver to buy rolling stock when necessary for the continued operation of the road and charge the price as a first lien on the property; 117 U. S. 434; 97 id. 146.

Separate receivers will not be appointed in two suits against the same railroad company. The existing receivership should be extended; 65 Fed. Rep. 351.

A receiver appointed in a federal court is required to manage the property in accordance with the laws of the state wherein it is situate; 2 Supp. R. S. 613.

Where a receiver has been discharged and a railroad turned over to the company, it was held that the company was liable to an action by one who had suffered personal injury by the negligence of the employes while the road was in the hands of the receiver; 23 U. S. App. 143.

A mortgagee plaintiff at whose instance a receiver has been appointed for a railway cannot be compelled, if expenses of operation and management exceed the value of the property, to make good a deficit, unless the order of appointment was made on that condition, and he is not liable to the employes of the receiver for their wages; 47 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 706.

Equity in appointing a receiver for a corporate property may, in its discretion, require mortgage bondholders to do equity by providing for the payment of claims for labor and supplies as a condition of the appointment; 99 U. S. 235. Orders appointing a receiver usually direct the payment of such preferred claims of this class as the master shall find to be equitably entitled; 22 Fed. Rep. 471; and it is the better practice to make the order then; 41 Fed. Rep. 551; they will be paid even if not provided for in the original decree; 106 U. S. 286; the order can be made afterwards; 41 Fed. Rep. 551. It has been held that there can be no preference as to the corpus of the property where payment was not provided for in the original record; 61 Fed. Rep. 150; nor any preference whatever; 69 Fed. Rep. 295; but it is also held that where the earnings have been diverted to the payment of interest or permanent improvements, preferred debts will be charged on the corpus if the current income is not sufficient to pay them; 107 U. S. 59; 111 id. 776; 125 id. 268; and sometimes even without showing a diversion of earnings; 106 U. S. 286.

Where a receiver is in under forclosure proceedings of a general mortgage on a system of railroads, preferred debts will be charged on the earnings of the entire system; 30 Fed. Rep. 332.

As to the classes of preferred debts, they are said to be those "which, when incurred, operated in a direct way to the advantage of the bondholder;" 38 Fed. Rep. 12; or which were "made to preserve the estate;" 88 Tenn. 138; or were payments "necessary in the ordinary administration of the affairs of the corporation;" 23 Fed. Rep. 521; or were reasonably "necessary to incur in order to keep the road in operation;" Short, Ry. Bonds § 624.

They include: Debts for freight and ticket balances; 106 U. S. 280: wages: 99 id. 235: 106 id. 286; wages and salaries of employes of every grade; 33 Fed. Rep. 778; counsel; 8 Fed. Rep. 579; 23 id. 521 (but not one employed for a special purpose; 138 U. S. 501; nor an attorney's fee for services rendered a year and a half before the receivership; 51 Fed. Rep. 58; but the annual salary of a regular counsel for a short time before receivership will be preferred; 23 Fed. Rep. 521; not a secretary of the company; 69 Fed. Rep. 295; nor a claim for legal services in advising parties who lent money to keep the road in operation; 138 U. S. 501); supplies and material for equipping, operating, and repairing the road; 99 U. S. 252; 69 Fed. Rep. 23; but not when furnished on credit payable at some definite period, in the future; 58 Fed. Rep. 473; 46 id. 101. The vendor of rolling stock under a car trust is not preferred as to the balance of payments due him; 99 U. S. 258. The rental of cars used by the receiver is held to be chargeable to the proceeds of the sale of the property as one of the expenses of the administration; 96 Ga. 630; as is also the unpaid rental during their use by the company before the receiver was appointed, and compensation for the ordinary wear and tear and the expense of returning the cars to the owner; id.; contra, as to rentals accruing before the receivership; 136 U. S. 89; 117 id. 479.

Rentals on a leased line will not be preferred: 58 Fed. Rep. 268; debts contracted for original construction will not be preferred; 134 U. S. 296; nor the price of a locomotive bought six months before the receivership; 44 Minn. 115; nor will claims for damages for breach of contract; 32 Fed. Rep. 566; nor those caused by the operation of the road before the appointment of the receiver; 14 id. 141; 28 id. 871; but see 20 id. 260, a case said to be of doubtful authority; Short, Ry. Bonds § 626.

A bondholder who pays taxes will be subrogated to the lien of the state; 100 Ill. 511.

The ordinary period within which such claims are allowed is six months; 6 Biss. 535; but claims have been awarded a preference after eight months; 3 Hughes 320; eleven months; 111 U. S. 776; nearly two years; 41 Fed. Rep. 551; two years; 83 id. 605; three years; 99 U. S. 389. There is no fixed time within which a loan priority can be given; it is a question of reasonable time; 70 Fed. Rep. 741.

Preferred debts do not come in before mortgage debts because they have a lien; 75 Va. 701.

The doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 252 (first suggested by Judge Dillon), is that the income of a railroad company, out of which a mortgage is to be paid, is the net income obtained by deducting from gross earnings what is required for operating expenses, proper equipment, and useful improvements. Every mortgagee impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim on the income. Also, that when there is a diversion of income from the payment of current debts to pay fixed charges, thus increasing the security of the latter, this must be returned to the current debt fund before the mortgagee is paid. This was followed in 111 U. S. 781, where it was held that a supply claim incurred prior to the receivership was a charge on the income coming into the receiver's hands, as well as that received before his appointment. Such a claim is payable out of the receiver's surplus earnings, whether or not, during the company's operation of the road, there was a diversion of income, either in paying interest or in betterments; and even where the company has misappropriated such income to purposes not beneficial to the mortgagee; 170 U. S. 355. See 106 id. 286.

The dominant feature of the doctrine, as applied in 111 U. S. 776, is said to be that where expenditures were made which were essentially necessary to enable the road to be operated as a continuing business, and it was the expectation of the creditors that the indebtedness would be paid out of current earnings, a superior equity arises in favor of the materialman as against the mortgage bonds in the income arising both before and after the appointment of a receiver; 170 U. S. 355. This equity arises upon the tacit or express understanding that the current earnings would be appropriated for the payment of the debt. Even though the mortgage provides for a sequestration of income for the benefit of the bondholders, that income, until strict foreclosure or a sale of the road, is charged with the prior equity of unpaid supply claims; id. Equity will confine itself within very restricted limits in the application of this doctrine; 136 U. S. 89; 149 U. S. 95; in both of which cases it was not, under special circumstances, applied to car trust rentals prior to the suit for foreclosure. To the same effect, 48 Am. & E. R. Cas. (Tex.) 656.

A receiver of a railroad on coming into possession of earnings should pay out of the same all debts for supplies contracted within a reasonable time before the receivership, before making any expenditure for betterments or interest on mortgages; 76 Fed. Rep. 502.

The court may authorize receivers, in their discretion, to pay the current payrolls and supply accounts incurred in the operation of the road within four months before their appointment; 75 Fed. Rep. 54. Current operating expenses for a limited time before the appointment of a receiver under a foreclosure bill may be charged on the income earned during the receivership or upon the corpus of the property, in preference to the liens of the mortgage; 74 Fed. Rep. 335. A receiver of a railroad is properly authorized to pay all balances due to other carriers and connecting lines, and should be allowed to pay, from the proceeds of the sale of receiver's certificates, charges for freight on cars, coal, oil, etc., consigned to the insolvent company and due before the appointment of a temporary receiver; 8 U. S. App. 547.

Mileage due under a contract for the use of Pullman cars is not distinguishable from car rentals, and cannot be made a preferred claim on the appointment of a receiver; 84 Fed. Rep. 18; 149 U. S. 95.

A cable for a cable railway, if necessary, is entitled to a preference, though no diversion of income is shown; and the lapse of two years will not bar the claim; 88 Fed. Rep. 365.

The payment of unpaid debts for operating expenses accrued within ninety days, and of ticket and freight balances due, are necessary for the preservation of the mortgaged property, in order to keep it a going concern; 117 U. S. 456.

The doctrine has in some courts been extended with great freedom, and the granting of preferences and the issue of receiver's certificates carried to such an extent as to give rise in the public mind to an erroneous view of the powers of courts of equity in this regard. In 80 Fed. Rep. 624, the circuit court of appeals remarks that "the liberality with which this equity was extended by some of the circuit courts in favor of general creditors, induced the supreme court in Kneeland v. Trust Co., 136 U. S. 89, to call attention to the necessity of preserving the general priority of contract liens over all but a limited class of claims. Through Mr. Justice Brewer, the court said: 'The appointment of a receiver vests in the court no absolute control over the property, and no general authority to displace vested contract liens. Because, in a few specified and limited cases, this court has declared that unsecured claims were entitled to priority over mortgage debts, an idea seems to have obtained that a court appointing a receiver acquire power to give such preference to any general and unsecured claims. It has been assumed that a court appointing a receiver could rightfully burden the mortgaged property for the payment of any unsecured indebtedness. . . . It is the exception, and not the rule, that such priority of liens can be displaced. We emphasize this fact of the sacredness of contract liens, for the reason that there seems to be growing an idea that the chancellor, in the exercise of his equitable power, has unlimited discretion in this matter of the displacement of vested liens.'" While the court appointing an ancillary receiver will protect local creditors having prior rights or liens, it will recognize no distinction between foreign and domestic creditors whose claims stand on equal footing, and it rests in the court's discretion whether it will distribute the assets or transmit them to a primary receiver; 88 Fed. Rep. 130.

The rule has been held to apply only to railroads; 128 U. S. 416; not to manufacturing corporations; 35 Fed. Rep. 436; 42 id. 372; nor to street railways; 84 Fed. Rep. 257; nor to steamship lines; 50 Fed. Rep. 312; nor to a hotel company; 106 N.

Y. 423; it is held applicable to street railways; 8 Utah 15; 87 Fed. Rep. 269. In a recent Alabama case it has been held applicable to all public corporations; 39 L. R. A. 628.

See MORTGAGE,

Suits. A receiver must ordinarily obtain leave of the appointing court before instituting a suit; but not where he sues for debt due him in his official capacity; L. R. 12 Eq. 614; or sues in the appointing court with its sanction; Smith, Rec. § 69; 86 Mo. 505.

It was formerly held that a receiver had no standing in a foreign court; Smith, Rec. § 73; but it is said to be now "well established that a receiver may invoke the aid of a foreign court in obtaining possession of property or funds within its jurisdiction to which he is entitled," but not against the creditors of a non-resident debtor who are seeking to subject property to the payment of their debts; 123 Ind. 477; and this is a matter of comity; 33 N. J. Eq. 155.

Late cases hold that a receiver appointed in one state can sue in another by comity, in respect of property rights in the latter state, provided the domestic creditors are protected; 123 N. Y. 37; 55 How. Pr. 52; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1059 (App. Div.).

It is held that an Illinois receiver appointed at the suit of a non-resident creditor may hold the assets against an Illinois creditor; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1091. It is the safer course in important cases to secure an ancillary receivership in the foreign state, and such is a common practice.

In 161 Mass. 224, it was held that the ancillary receiver should remit the fund to the home receiver for distribution, if it should appear that Massachusetts claimants would there be placed on an equality with home claimants. This case is said to have gone to the limits of comity; Smith, Rec. § 73. Where a receiver takes property to a foreign state his possession will be protected; 75 Pa. 112; 108 Mo. 317; contra, 81 Cal. 551.

One who has a legal cause of action sounding merely in tort against a receiver appointed by a court of chancery has a right to pursue his redress by an action at law. Such action cannot be brought without the chancellor's permission, but this cannot be refused, unless the claim preferred be manifestly unfounded; 16 Wall. 218. See 25 Alb. L. J. 46.

A receiver cannot be sued without the consent of the appointing court; 2 Idaho 590; 149 U. S. 473; 134 Ind. 672; but there are exceptions to this rule: By act of congress, March 3d, 1889, every receiver appointed by a federal court may be sued without leave of court, but subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court which appointed him. This act extends to any court of competent jurisdiction, state or federal, and not merely to the appointing court; 141 U. S. 327; 73 Tex. 47. It applies to actions for personal injuries to passengers; 121 Mo. 1; suits on patents may be brought without leave; 66 Fed. Rep. 788. Receivers operating a railroad in another state are liable to action there; 99 Mass. 395; property in another state, in the hands of a receiver, may be garnisheed there; 5 Colo. 14; where a receiver has taken possession of property not specified in the decree appointing him; 111 Mass. 508.

It is held that suing without leave is mere contempt of court and does not affect the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit is brought; 5 Colo. 14; and that the proceedings are regular till the appointing court interferes; 60 N. Y. 88; other cases hold that there is no jurisdiction till leave is granted; 104 U. S. 126; 96 Ind. 69; 14 How. 52. Leave to sue rests in the discretion of the appointing court; 68 Wis. 44; ordinarily leave will be granted to sue only in the appointing court; 21 Fed. Rep. 354.

Under the strict common law, a receiver must sue in the name of the corporation or firm of which he is receiver; 115 U. S. 499; but in states having codes of procedure he may sue in his own name, as having the beneficial interest; 5 Thomps. Corp. § 6979.

Suit should be brought against the company, but service made on the receiver; 141 U. S. 327. The receiver brings suit in the company's name but for his own use; 44 Pa. 294; but he sues in his own name on his own contracts; 75 Pa. 112; an attachment execution should be served on him; 167 Pa. 589.

The receiver of a corporation appointed by a court of equity cannot sue in his own name to recover property of the corporation which has never been in his possession nor been assigned to him, where authority to bring such suit has not been conferred on him by statute or by decree of court; 157 Mass. 77. Actions against the receiver are, in law, actions against the receivership, or the funds in the hands of the receiver, and his contracts, misfeasances, negligences, and liabilities are official and not personal; and judgments against him as receiver are payable only out of the funds in his hands; 141 U. S. 327. The corporation is not liable for the receiver's contracts; 58 Ill. 61.

The court can, by summary proceedings, compel payment by a purchaser from a receiver of the price of goods sold and delivered; 36 Atl. Rep. (N. J. Ch.) 937.

Where a circuit court has appointed a receiver of a steamer and all other property of a railroad company, and the steamer came into collision with another vessel and was libelled in admiralty, it was held that the circuit court did not err in declining to issue an injunction against the admiralty proceedings; 21 U. S. App. 466.

Where property is in the hands of a receiver, an independent suit cannot be brought to foreclose a mortgage on it, even in the same court; 86 Fed. Rep. 390.

Judgment against a corporation obtained between the entry of an order appointing a receiver therefor and the approval of his bond creates no lien on the property; 80 Fed. Rep. 441.

Where a receiver has been guilty of a public nuisance, the court will enjoin him therefrom; 22 U. S. App. 154.

A purchaser of a claim against a railroad company which is in the hands of a receiver is not estopped to attack the validity of an order appointing the receiver made before he became a party to the action; 47 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 872.

It is not inconsistent with the relations between a receiver and the court appointing him that he should appeal from an order of such court granting an injunction against him; 22 U. S. App. 154.

The appointment of a receiver of a corporation fixes the status and priorities of its creditors; 184 Pa. 1.

A circuit court of the United States has no power to appoint a receiver of property already in the possession of a receiver duly and previously appointed by a state court; 157 U. S. 169.

A receiver appointed for one corporation cannot act for another; 24 U. S. App. 341.

An order fixing the compensation of a receiver, and taxed as such in the costs, is a final judgment upon a collateral matter arising out of the action and appealable by any party interested in the fund; 47 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 872. As to a receiver's compensation, see 32 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 532.

The appointment of a receiver does not abate personal actions against the debtor, and the receiver has no status in court thereunder until he is made a party thereto on his own application. The plaintiff may proceed to final judgment without him; 87 Fed. Rep. 843.

In Smith, Receiverships, will be found references to state legislation relating to the appointment of receivers.

RECEIVER GENERAL OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER. An officer of the Duchy court, who collects all the revenues, fines, forfeitures, and assessments within the duchy.

RECEIVER GENERAL OF THE PUBLIC REVENUE. An officer appointed in every county in England to receive the taxes granted by parliament, and remit the money to the treasury.

RECEIVER OF STOLEN GOODS, In Criminal Law. By statutory provision, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, may be punished as the principal, in perhaps all the United States.

To make this offence complete, the goods received must have been stolen, they must have been received by the defendant, and the receiver must know that they had been stolen.

A boy stole a chattel from his master, and after it had been taken from him in his master's presence, it was, with the master's consent, restored to him again, in order that he might sell it to the defendant, to whom he had been in the habit of selling similar stolen articles. He accordingly sold it to the defendant, who, being indicted for feloniously receiving it of an evil-disposed person, knowing it to be stolen, was convicted, and, notwithstanding objection made, sentenced; Car. & M. 217. But this case has since been held not to be law, and a defendant not to be liable to conviction under such circumstances, inasmuch as at the time of the receipt the goods were not stolen goods; Dearsl. 468.

The goods stolen must have been received by the defendant. Prima facie, if stolen goods are found in a man's house, he, not being the thief, is a receiver; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 601. And though there is proof of a criminal intent to receive, and a knowledge that the goods were stolen, if the exclusive possession still remains in the thief, a conviction for receiving cannot be sustained; 2 id. 37. So a principal in the first degree, particeps criminis, cannot at the same time be treated as a receiver; 2 id. 459. Where a prisoner is charged in two counts with stealing and receiving, the jury may return a verdict of guilty on the latter count, if warranted by the evidence, although the evidence is also consistent with the prisoner having been a principal in the second degree in the stealing; Bell, Cr. Cas. 20. See 48 Ohio St. 220. But a person having a joint possession with the thief may be convicted as a receiver; Dearsl. 494. The actual manual possession or touch of the goods by the defendant, however, is not necessary to the completion of the offence of receiving; it is sufficient if they are in the actual possession of a person over whom the defendant has a control, so that they would be forthcoming if he ordered it; id. 494. Husband and wife were indicted jointly for receiving. The jury found both guilty, and found, also, that the wife received the goods without the control or knowledge of the husband, and apart from him, and that "he afterwards adopted his wife's receipt." It was held that this finding did not warrant the conviction of the husband; Dearsl. & B. 329.

The offence of receiving stolen property involves a criminal intent as a material element, such as an intent to aid the thief, of obtaining a reward for restoring it to the owner, or in some way to derive profit from the act; 27 Tex. App. 193. See 58 Ark. 513.

It is almost always difficult to prove guilty knowledge; and that must, in general, be collected from circumstances. If such circumstances are proved which to a person of common understanding and prudence, and situated as the prisoner was, must have satisfied him that they were stolen, this is sufficient. For example, the receipt of watches, jewelry, large quantities of money, bundles of clothes of various kinds, or personal property of any sort, to a considerable value, from boys or persons destitute of property and without any lawful means of acquiring them, and specially if bought at untimely hours, the mind can arrive at no other conclusion than that they were stolen. This is further confirmed if they have been bought at an under-value, concealed, the marks defaced, and falsehood resorted to in accounting for the possession of them; Alison, Cr. Law 330; 2 Russ. Cr. 253; 1 Fost. & F. 51; Whart. Cr. L. 983, 986. See 135 Ill. 243.

Evidence that other stolen goods were found in defendant's possession is admissible to show guilty knowledge; 38 S. C. 330.

In order to sustain a prosecution for receiving stolen property, it is necessary to prove that defendant knew it was stolen, but such knowledge need not be personal or actual; 50 Mo. App. 186.

At common law, receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, is a misdemeanor; 2 Russ. Cr. 253. But in Massachusetts it has been held to partake so far of the nature of felony that if a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect one of the crime of receiving or aiding in the concealment of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, he may without warrant arrest the supposed offender; 5 Cush. 281. See [1892] 2 Q. B. 597; RECENT POSSESSION, etc.

RECEIVERS' CERTIFICATES. Acknowledgments of indebtedness issued by a receiver under the order of the court by which he was appointed, either directly in discharge of obligations incurred in the management of the property, or for borrowing money for the maintenance and operation of the property, and redeemable out of its proceeds. They may be made a lien on the property when that is necessary for its proper management and operation in the interest of all who may be concerned in it, as directed in the order under which they are issued, and are usually made a first charge on the fund in the receiver's hands, after payment of the operating expenses.

In the case of property such as a railroad, which is of a character to give the public a right to its continued operation and use, the court in a proper case may impose the expenses and obligations of operation upon the property regardless of the question of who may be the ultimate owner of the property; 115 Cal. 285. A court of equity has power to appoint a receiver for a railroad and to authorize the issue of certificates for raising money necessary for the management and preservation of the road, and make the debt thereby created a first lien; 97 U. S. 146; 117 id. 434. But a court of equity cannot order the issue of certificates, to be a paramount lien, by the receiver of an insolvent private corporation, where the business is affected with no public interest, unless such issue is essential to preserve the property or franchises; 68 Fed. Rep. 623; as against lienors who have not assented to their issue; 78 id. 62.

In the case of a mining company the court cannot, against the objection of even a small minority of the mortgage bondholders, authorize the issue of certificates to be a first lien, to enable a continuance of the operation of the mines; 50 Fed. Rep. 481; nor can such certificates be issued for payment of taxes in the case of the foreclosure of the second mortgage of a private corporation, to be a paramount lien, against the consent of the first mortgagee; 70 Fed. Rep. 2; or in the like case for carrying out contracts for improvements made with purchasers of the company's land; id.; s. c. 36 U. S. App. 61. In the case of a railroad such certificates cannot be issued and given a first lien, on an application ex parte without notice to lienholders, the proceeds to be used for the maintenance of the road; 45 S. C. 464.

Where a mine and railroad were operated in connection with each other by the same company, certificates were issued as a charge upon both properties; 86 Va. 754.

If the order authorizing certificates for borrowing money to carry on the business does not limit their payment to any particular fund, the right of bona fide holders for value to resort to the general assets as against general creditors will not be qualified by a quasi-limitation apparent on the face of the certificates; 22 W. N. C. Pa. 31; s. c. 12 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 271.

When the receiver is appointed on petition of a stockholder, and earnings have been used to pay interest on the bonds, there is no equity which requires payment of past due claims for labor and materials by the issue of receivers' certificates therefor, payable out of the corpus of the property; there is an equity to pay out of net earnings for labor necessary to keep the property in actual operation, but such earnings cannot be anticipated by the issue of receivers' certificates unless by agreement of parties; 59 Fed. Rep. 25; nor can such certificates be issued against the opposition of first mortgage bondholders for new equipment and construction of a narrow gauge road of which new owners would manifestly change the gauge to the standard, so that the proposed improvements would be useless; id. Except under extraordinary circumstances, a court ought not to order the issue of receivers' certificates, with a prior lien, to complete an unfinished railroad; 100 U. S. 605. Such an order was made in 2 Dill. 448, where it was necessary to complete the road in order to secure a land grant; and in 2 Woods 506, to preserve a railroad and complete some inconsiderable portion of it.

Certificates issued, under an order made without notice to creditors, for debts prior to the receivership, give the holders no preference over other creditors; 64 Fed. Rep. 25. They cannot be issued, with priority over existing mortgages, for wages accrued before the appointment of the receiver or for deficiency of supplies; 1 Wall.

234; 94 id. 734; 97 id. 146; 107 id. 592; 96 N. Y. 49; 95 Ill. 134. Certificates issued, not to preserve the property, but to pay unsecured claims, cannot be given priority over an antecedent mortgage; 81 Mo. 559; when in excess of the amount authorized by the court they cannot be enforced against the property unless the proceeds were used for its benefit; 77 Hun 144. They cannot be issued to pay interest on bonds; 76 Fed. Rep. 418.

Allowances to receivers and their counsel as compensation for services are taxable as costs, and have priority over receivers' certificates; 70 Fed. Rep. 643; and certificates issued under an order not giving them priority over other claims, are not entitled to preference over debts of the receiver contracted in carrying on the business; 27 Pittsb. L. J. Pa. N. S. 396; and persons taking such certificates in exchange for certificates before issued under an order giving them a preference, are not entitled to priority even under the first order; id.

The holder of certificates is put upon inquiry as to the whole course of the proceedings of a litigation in which they were issued, and is charged with notice thereof; 58 Fed. Rep. 6; and when the order for the issue was ex parte, and the proceeds were improperly applied, a holder who made no demand for three years and until the foreclosure sale was confirmed and a decree of distribution entered, was guilty of gross laches and estopped by the decree from asserting his claim; id. Where defendants held receivers' certificates for a right of way and agreed that they should be postponed to other certificates to be issued to plaintiffs, but on a sale defendants were paid for the right of way and plaintiffs' certificates were not paid in full, the latter were entitled to recover from the defendants the amount so paid them; 137 Ind. 159.

Holders of certificates cannot enjoin a sale under a decree in favor of an intervening mechanics' lien creditor whose claim was prosecuted before the certificates were authorized; 62 Fed. Rep. 686.

It has been held that a chancellor cannot authorize a receiver to borrow money by selling interest-bearing receivers' certificates of indebtedness at less than their face value; 53 Ala. 237; but see 2 Woods 506.

They are not negotiable, and in fact lack almost every characteristic of negotiable paper; Gluck & Beck. Rec. § 95.

Purchasers of certificates are not bound to see to the application of the purchase money; id.; 117 U. S. 434. See RECEIVERS; ROLLING STOCK; MORTGAGE.

RECEIVING. Taking or having. 23 Atl. Rep. (Neb.) 735.

RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY. In Criminal Law. Possession of the fruits of crime recently after its commission is prima facie evidence of guilty possession; and if unexplained, either by direct evidence, or by the attending circumstances, or by the character and habits of life of the possessor, or otherwise, it is usually regarded by the jury as conclusive. 1 Tayl. Ev. § 122. See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 34; 162 U. S. 615.

It is manifest that the force of this rule of presumption depends upon the recency of the possession as related to the crime, and upon the exclusiveness of such possession.

If the interval of time between the loss and the finding be considerable, the presumption, as it affects the party in possession of the stolen property, is much weakened, and the more especially so if the goods are of such a nature as, in the ordinary course of things, frequently to change hands. From the nature of the case, it is not possible to fix any precise period within which the effect of this rule of presumption can be limited; it must depend not only upon the mere lapse of time, but upon the nature of the property and the concomitant circumstances of each particular case. Thus, where two ends of woollen cloth in an unfinished state, consisting of about twenty yards each, were found in the possession of the prisoner two months after they had been stolen, it was held that the prisoner should explain how he came by the property; 7 C. & P. 551. But where the only evidence against a prisoner was that certain tools had been traced to his possession three months after their loss, an acquittal was decided; 3 C. & P. 600. And so, on an indictment for horse-stealing, where it appeared that the horse was not discovered in the custody of the accused until after six months from the date of the robbery; 3 C. & K. 318; and where goods lost sixteen months before were found in the prisoner's house, and no other evidence was adduced against him, he was not called upon for his defence; 2 C. & P. 459.

It is obviously essential to the just application of this rule of presumption that the house or other place in which the stolen property is found, be in the exclusive possession of the prisoner. Where they are found in the apartments of a lodger, for instance, the presumption may be stronger or weaker according as the evidence does or does not show an exclusive possession. Indeed, the finding of stolen property in the house of the accused, provided there were other inmates capable of committing the larceny, will of itself be insufficient to prove his possession, however recently the theft may have been effected, though, if coupled with proof of other suspicious circumstances, it may warrant the prisoner's conviction even though the property is not found in his house until after his apprehension; 3 Dowl. & R. 572; 2 Stark. 139. The force of this presumption is greatly increased if the fruits of a series of thefts be found in the prisoner's possession, or if the property stolen consist of a multiplicity of miscellaneous articles, or be of an uncommon kind, or, from its value or other circumstances, be unsuited to the station of the party.

Such possession of stolen goods may be indicative of any more aggravated crime which has been connected with theft. Upon an indictment for arson, proof that property which was in the house at the time it was burnt was soon afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner was held to raise a probable presumption that he was present and concerned in the offence; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1035. A like inference has been raised in the case of murder accompanied by robbery; Wills, Circ. Ev. 72, 241; in the cases of burglary and shopbreaking; 4 B. & Ald. 122; 9 C. & P. 364; 1 Mass. 106; and in the case of the possession of a quantity of counterfeit money; Russ. & R. 308; Dearsl. 552; but the recent possession of stolen property by one charged with receiving it, knowing it to be stolen, raises no presumption that he knew that it had been stolen; 89 Mo. 595.

Upon the principle of this presumption, a sudden and otherwise inexplicable transition from a state of indigence, and a consequent change of habits, is sometimes a circumstance extremely unfavorable to the supposition of innocence; 11 Metc. 584. See 1 Gray 101.

But this rule of presumption must be applied with caution and discrimination; for the bare possession of stolen property, though recently stolen, uncorroborated by other evidence, is sometimes fallacious and dangerous as a criterion of guilt; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 289, where it is said: "If a horse be stolen from A, and the same day B be found upon him, it is a strong presumption that B stole him; yet," adds that excellent lawyer, "I do remember before a learned and very wary judge, in such an instance, B was condemned and executed at Oxford assizes, and yet, within two assizes after, C being apprehended for another robbery, and convicted, upon his judgment and execution confessed he was the man that stole the horse, and, being closely pursued, desired B a stranger, to walk his horse for him while he turned aside upon a necessary occasion, and escaped; and B was apprehended with the horse, and died innocently."

The rule is occasionally attended with uncertainty in its application, from the difficulty attendant upon the positive identification of articles of property alleged to have been stolen; and it clearly ought never to be applied where there is reasonable ground to conclude that the witnesses may be mistaken, or where, from any other cause, identity is not satisfactorily established. But the rule is nevertheless properly applied in peculiar circumstances, where, though positive identification is impossible, the possession of the property cannot but be considered of a guilty character: as in the case of persons employed in carrying sugar and other articles from ships and wharves. Cases have frequently occurred of convictions of larceny, in such circumstances, upon evidence that the parties were detected with property of the same kind upon them recently after coming from such places, although the identity of the property as belonging to any particular person could not otherwise be proved.

It is seldom, however, that juries are required to determine upon the effect of evidence of the mere recent possession of stolen property: from the very nature of the case, the fact is generally accompanied by other corroborative or explanatory circumstances of presumption. If the party have secreted the property; if he deny it is in his possession, and such denial is discovered to be false; if he cannot show how he became possessed of it; if he give false, incredible, or inconsistent accounts of the manner in which he acquired it, as that he had found it, or that it had been given or sold to him by a stranger or left at his house; if he has disposed of or attempted to dispose of it at an unreasonably low price; if he has absconded or endeavored to escape from justice; if other stolen property, or picklock keys, or other instruments of crime, be found in his possession; if he were seen near the spot at or about the time when the act was committed, or if any article belonging to him be found at the place or in the locality where the theft was committed, at or about the time of the commission of the offence: if the impression of his shoes or other articles of apparel correspond with marks left by the thieves; if he has attempted to obliterate from the articles in question marks of identity, or to tamper with the parties or the officers of justice: these and all like circumstances are justly considered as throwing light upon and explaining the fact of possession; and render it morally certain that such possession can be referable only to a criminal origin, and cannot otherwise be rationally accounted for; 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 371, where this subject is fully considered.

RECEPTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name sometimes given to an arbitrator, because he had been received or chosen to settle the differences between the parties. Dig. 4, 8; Code 2, 56.

RECESSES. The time in which the court is not actually engaged in business. 69 Cal. 55.

RECESSION. A re-grant; the act of returning the title of a country to a government which formerly held it, by one which has it at the time; as, the recession of Louisiana, which took place by the treaty between France and Spain, of October 1, 1800. See 2 White, N. Rec. 516.

RECIDIVE. In French Law. The state of an individual who commits a crime or misdemeanor, after having once been condemned for a crime or misdemeanor; a relapse.

Many statutes provide that for a second offence punishment shall be increased: in those cases the indictment should set forth the crime or misdemeanor as a second offence.

The second offence must have been committed after the conviction for the first; a defendant could not be convicted of a second offence, as such, until after he had suffered a punishment for the first; Dalloz, Dict.

RECIDIVIST. A habitual criminal. One who makes a trade of crime. Reformation in such cases is rare. Such criminals generally either succumb to tuberculosis or heart disease in prison or end in an asylum. Sometimes attacks of acute mania or melancholia have a good influence upon such persons, but generally after an attack of acute insanity they are found to be still subject to their criminal tendencies. McDonald, Criminology, ch. viii. As to cases of innate tendency to particular crimes or special propensities, see id. pt. ii. ch. i.–ii.

RECIPROCAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One by which the parties enter into mutual engagements.

They are divided into perfect and imperfect. When they are perfectly reciprocal, the obligation of each of the parties is equally a principal part of the contract, such as sale, partnership, etc. Contracts imperfectly reciprocal are those in which the obligation of one of the parties only is a principal obligation of the contract: as, mandate, deposit, loan for use, and the like. In all reciprocal contracts the consent of the parties must be expressed. Pothier, Obl. n. 9; La. Civ Code, art. 1758, 1759. See CONTRACT; MUTUAL CONSENT.

RECIPROCITY. Mutuality; state, quality, or character of that which is reciprocal.

The states of the Union are bound to many acts of reciprocity. The constitution requires that they shall deliver to each other fugitives from justice; that the records of one state, properly authenticated, shall have full credit in the other states; that the citizens of one state shall be citizens of any state into which they may remove. In some of the states, as in Pennsylvania, the rules with regard to the effect of a discharge under the insolvent laws of another state are reciprocated; the discharges of those courts which respect the discharges of the courts of Pennsylvania are respected in that state.

Between nations. Mutual concessions made by nations in favor of the importation of the products and manufactures of each other.

The president of the United States has been authorized by various tariff acts to enter into reciprocal agreements with foreign countries, concerning the mutual importation of manufactures and products, and to suspend certain provisions of the tariff laws, accordingly. By act of July 24, 1897, he may enter into such agreements with the governments of countries exporting certain specified products, and by proclamation reduce the tariff rates thereon during such agreement, to a lower schedule than specified in the act. He may, also, within two years of the passage of the act, with the consent of the senate, enter into treaties with foreign governments for a specified period of not exceeding five years, which will provide for a reduction of not over twenty per cent. on the tariff rates imposed by the act upon certain articles and for the addition of any such articles to the free list.

RECITAL. The repetition of some former writing, or the statement of something which has been done. It is useful to explain matters of fact which are necessary to make the transaction intelligible. 2 Bla. Com. 298; Big. Estop. 365.

IN CONTRACTS. The party who executes a deed is bound by the recitals of essential facts contained therein; Com. Dig. Estoppel (A 2); 2 Co. 33; 8 Mod. 311. The amount of consideration received is held an essential fact under this rule, in England; 2 Taunt. 141; 5 B. & Ald. 606; 1 B. & C. 704; 2 B. & Ad. 544; otherwise in the United States; 5 Cush. 431; 6 Me. 364; 10 Vt. 96; 4 N. H. 229, 397; 8 Conn. 304; 14 Johns. 210; 7 S. & R. 311; 1 Harr. & G. 139; 1 M'Cord 514; 15 Ala. 498; 10 Yerg. 160; 7 Monr. 291. But see 1 Hawks 64; 11 La. 416; 2 Ohio 350; 3 Mas. 347.

IN DEEDS. The recitals in a deed of conveyance bind parties and privies thereto, whether in blood, estate, or law; Whart. Ev. 1039; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 23; Tayl. Ev. 119; and see 8 Ad. & E. 265; 4 Pet. 1. See ESTOPPEL. Recitals in a deed bind parties and claimants under them, but not strangers claiming by an adverse title, or those who claim by title anterior or paramount to the deed; 124 U. S. 261. Recitals of preliminary proceedings in tax deeds are not evidence of the facts recited; 61 Vt. 530; 101 N. C. 35; 69 Tex. 103.

Recitals are deemed to be made upon suggestion of the grantee; 4 Pet. 87; and are part of the title; 4 Binn. 231; they are evidence against the grantee; 58 Pa. 304; and parol evidence is not admissible to contradict them.

If the recitals of a patent nullify its granting clause, the grant falls; 104 U. S. 344. See 39 Fed. Rep. 70. If the operative parts of a deed are ambiguous, the recitals may be referred to as a key to the intention of the parties; 5 Russ. 344; but not if the operative parts are clear; 19 L. J. Q. B. 462; and the same rule applies to statutes; 4 Ch. D. 592. If they are at variance, the operative parts must be effective and the recitals ineffective, but the latter may explain ambiguities; L. R. 1 Eq. 183; in such case, in a conveyance, if the recital is clear as to what is meant and the operative parts go beyond the recitals, the conveyance must be restricted; L. R. 1 Eq. 361; 29 Ch. D. 514. See, also, 17 Q. B. D. 286. A misrecital in a deed may influence its construction; Elphins. Interpr. of Deeds 139.

The recital of the payment of the consideration money is evidence of payment against subsequent purchasers from the same grantor; 54 Pa. 19; but not against third parties, when it is necessary for the party claiming under the deed to show full payment before receiving notice of an adverse equity; 28 Pa. 425. A deed of defeasance which professes to recite the principal deed must do so truly; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 7, § 28. See 3 Pa. 425; 3 Ch. Cas. 101; Co. Litt. 352; Com. Dig. Fait (E 1).

In Statutes. A mere recital in an act, whether of fact or of law, is not conclusive, unless it is clear that the legislature intended that the recital should be accepted as a fact in the case; 150 U. S. 483.

In Bonds. The recitals in corporate bonds may constitute notice to holders of facts which will affect their rights. See 99 U. S. 434; 175 Pa. 318. One who buys bonds which recite that they are for the principal and interest of other bonds, is chargeable with notice that the former indebtedness was overdue; 154 Ill. 301. It has been held by the supreme court of the United States that recitals in county bonds prescribed by statute and subject to the determination of county officers, have been complied with; 170 U. S. 593. In that case, the court said:—"By a long series of decisions such recitals are held conclusive, in favor of a bona fide holder of bonds, that precedent conditions, prescribed by statute and subject to the determination of those county officers, have been fully complied with. For instance, whether an election has been held, whether at such an election a majority voted in favor of the issue of bonds, whether the terms of the subscription have been complied with, and matters of a kindred nature which either expressly or by necessary implication are to be determined in the first instance by the officers of the county, will in favor of a bona fide holder be conclusively presumed to have been fully performed, provided the bonds contain recitals similar to these in the bonds before us." The court applied the doctrine of the conclusive effect of such recitals not only to matters transpiring before the placing of the bonds in the hands of the trustee, such as the election, etc., but also to conditions which it was urged were to be performed subsequently to the execution, such as that the bonds should not be binding until the railway should have been so completed through the county, that a train of cars had passed over it. See, also, 92 U. S. 484; 97 id. 96; 102 id. 278; 110 id. 608; 133 id. 523; 156 id. 692; 158 id. 312; Bonds; Municipal Bonds.

In Judicial Records. A recital in the record of a court imports absolute verity, and all parties thereto are estopped from denying its truth; 15 So. Rep. [Ala.] 450; and the recitals of the record of a trial court are conclusive on the parties as to the term at which a decree was rendered; and if the record is incorrect, the remedy is by a proper proceeding in the trial court to secure a correction; 35 Neb. 822.

In Pleading. In Equity. The decree formerly contained a recital of the pleadings. This usage is now mostly abolished, though it obtains largely in New Jersey.

At Law. Recitals of deeds or specialties bind the parties to prove them as recited; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 W. 18); 4 East 585; 3 Den. 356; 9 Pa. 407; Hempst. 294; 13 Md. 117; see 6 Gratt. 130; and a variance in an essential matter will be fatal; 18 Conn. 395; even though the variance be trivial; Hempst. 294; 1 Chitty, Pl. 424. The rule applies to all written instruments; 7 Pa. 401; 11 Ala. N. S. 529; 1 Ind. 209; 32 Me. 283; 6 Cush. 508; 24 N. J. L. 218; 16 Ill. 495; 36 N. H. 252; not, it seems, where it is merely brought forward as evidence, and is not made the ground of action in any way; 11 Ill. 40. See 31 Me. 290.

Recitals of public statutes need not be made in an indictment or information; Dy. 155 a, 346 b; Cro. 187; 1 Wms. Saund. 135; nor in a civil action; 6 Ala. N. S. 289; 16 Me. 69; 3 N. Y. 188; but, if made, a variance in a material point will be fatal; 4 Co. 48; Cro. Car. 135; 5 Blackf. 548; Bac. Abr. Indictment ix.

Recitals of private statutes must be made; 10 Wend. 75; 1 Mo. 593; and the statutes proved by an exemplified copy unless admitted by the opposite party; Steph. Pl. 347; 10 Mass. 91; but not if a clause be inserted that it shall be taken notice of as a public act; 1 Cr. M. & R. 44, 47; 5 Blackf. 170; contra, 1 Mood & M. 421. Pleading a statute is merely stating the facts which bring a case within it, without making any mention, or taking any notice of the statute itself; 6 Ired. 352; 7 Blackf. 359. Counting upon a statute consists in making express reference to it, as by the words "against the form of the statute [or "by force of the statute"] in such case made and provided." Reciting a statute is quoting or stating its contents; Steph. Pl. 347; Gould, Pl. 46.

Recital of a record on which the action is based must be correct, and a variance in a material point will be fatal; 9 Mo. 742; 2 Paine 209; 29 Ala. N. S. 112; 30 Miss. 126; 17 Ark. 371; 19 Ill. 637; otherwise where it is offered in evidence merely; 12 Ark. 760, 766, 768.

RECITE. In a statute requiring that a sheriff's deed recite the execution, names of the parties, etc., it was held that the word recite does not mean to copy or repeat verbatim, but only to state the substance of the execution. 12 Kan. 282; 8 Ohio 128; 10 id. 433.

RECKLESS. Heedless, careless, rash, indifferent to consequences. 95 Ala. 412. It implies heedlessness and indifference. 139 Ill. 596.

RECKLESSNESS. An indifference whether wrong is done or not. An indifference to the rights of others. Recklessness and wantonness are stronger terms than mere or ordinary negligence. 39 Kan. 531.

RECLAIM. To demand again; to insist upon a right; as, when a defendant for a consideration received from the plaintiff has covenanted to do an act, and fails to do it, the plaintiff may bring covenant for the breach, or assumpsit to reclaim the consideration. 1 Caines 47.

RECLAIMING BILL. In Scotch Law. A petition for review of an interlocutor, pronounced in a sheriff's or other inferior court. It recites verbatim the interlocutor, and, after a written argument, ends with a prayer for the recall or alteration of the interlocutor, in whole or in part. Bell, Dict. Reclaiming Petition; Shaw, Dig. 394.

RECOGNITION. An acknowledgment that something which has been done by one man in the name of another was done by authority of the latter. See AGENCY; RATIFICATION.

As a general rule international law is not concerned with internal changes within a sovereign state. The government may change from a democracy to a republic or monarchy without any change in the identity of the state in the family of nations. But the ruler of an independent state may call upon other states and nations to recognize a new title he has assumed or new territory which he has acquired by conquest and wishes to have recognized as part of his domain, and often part of a nation separates itself from the rest by revolution and claims to be recognized as a new member of the family of nations. In the latter case the new state is never recognized until the mother country has ceased military operations against it and its government has the appearance of stability; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 23. The recognition of the independence of a revolted state is lawful only when its independence has been de facto established. See 1 Kent 25. As to recognition of belligerency, see NEUTRALITY; BELLIGERENCY; INSURGENCY.

RECOGNITORS. In English Law. The name by which the jurors impanelled on an assize were known. 17 S. & R. 174.

RECOGNIZANCE. An obligation of record, entered into before a court or officer duly authorized for that purpose, with a condition to do some act required by law which is therein specified. 2 Bla. Com. 341. See 49 Fed. Rep. 776; Troub. & H. Pr. 2028.

The liability of bail above in civil cases, and of the bail in all cases in criminal matters, must be evidenced by a recognizance, as the sheriff has no power to discharge upon a bail-bond being given to him in these cases. See 4 Bla. Com. 297.

The object of a recognizance is to secure the presence of the defendant to perform or suffer the judgment of the court. In some of the United States, however, this distinction is not observed, but bail in the form of a bail-bond is filed with the officer, which is at once bail below and above, being conditioned that the party shall appear and answer to the plaintiff in the suit, and abide the judgment of the court.

In civil cases they are entered into by bail, conditioned that they will pay the debt, interest, and costs recovered by the plaintiff under certain contingencies, and for other purposes under statutes.

In criminal cases they are either that the party shall appear before the proper court to answer to such charges as are or shall be made against him, that he shall keep the peace or be of good behavior. The presence of witnesses may also be secured in the same manner; 6 Hill 506.

Who may take. In civil cases recognizances are generally taken by the court; 15 Vt. 9; 7 Blackf. 221; or by some judge of the court in chambers, though other magistrates may be authorized therefor by statute, and are in many of the states; 6 Whart. 359; 4 Humphr. 213. See 2 Dev. 555; 3 Gratt. 82.

In criminal cases the judges of the various courts of criminal jurisdiction and justices of the peace may take recognizances; 6 Ohio 251; 19 Pick. 127; 14 Conn. 206; 6 Blackf. 284, 315; 18 Miss. 626; 26 Ala. N. S. 81; 3 Mich. 42; see 2 Curt. C. C. 41; 44 La. Ann. 905; the sheriff, in some cases; 5 Ark. 265; 11 Ala. 676; but in case of capital crimes the power is restricted usually to the court of supreme jurisdiction. See BAIL.

In cases where a magistrate has the power to take recognizances it is his duty to do so, exercising a judicial discretion, however; 7 Blackf. 611. In form it is a short memorandum on the record, made by the court, judge, or magistrate having authority, which need not be signed by the party to be found; 5 S. & R. 147; 9 Mass. 520; 4 Vt. 488; 1 Dana 523; 6 Ala. 465; 2 Wash. C. C. 422; 6 Yerg. 354. It is to be returned to the court having jurisdiction of the offence charged, in all cases; 7 Leigh 371; 9 Conn. 350; 4 Wend. 387; 14 Vt. 64. See 27 Me. 179.

Discharge and excuse under. A surrender of the defendant at any time anterior to a fixed period after the sheriff's return of non est to a ca. sa., or taking the defendant on a ca. sa.; 1 Hawks 51; 6 Johns. 97; discharges the bail (see FIXING BAIL); Arch. Cr. P. by Pom. 184; as does the death of the defendant before the return of non est; Bish. Cr. Proc. 264; 1 N. & M'C. 251; 3 Conn. 84; see 14 Daly 333; or a loss of custody and control by act of government or of law without fault of the bail prior to being fixed; 3 Dev. 157; 18 Johns. 335; 5 Metc. Mass. 380; 2 Ga. 33; 14 Gratt. 698; see 8 Mass. 264; 5 Sneed 623; 2 Wash. C. C. 464; including imprisonment for life or for a long term of years in another state; 18 Johns. 35; 6 Cow. 599; but not voluntary enlistment; 11 Mass. 146, 234; or long delay in proceeding against bail; 2 Mass. 485; 1 Root 428; see 4 Johns. 478; or a discharge of the principal under the bankrupt or insolvent laws of the state; 2 Bail. 492; 1 Harr. & J. 101, 156; 21 Wend. 670; 1 Mass. 292; 1 Harr. Del. 367, 466; 1 McLean 226; 1 Gill 259; and see, also, 2 Pa. 492; and, of course, performance of the conditions of the recognizance by the defendant, discharges the bail. And see BAIL-BOND; FIXING BAIL.

The formal mode of noting a discharge is by entering an exoneration; 5 Binn. 332; 1 Johns. Cas. 329; 2 id. 101, 220; 7 Conn. 439; 1 Gill 529; 2 Ga. 331. A culprit giving a recognizance to appear to an indictment, and not to depart from the court without leave, is not discharged from his obligation, nor is his surety thereon, by the quashing of the indictment; 54 N. J. L. 393.

The remedy upon a recognizance is by means of a scire facias against the bail; 1 H. & G. Md. 154; 1 Ala. 34; 7 T. B. Monr. 130; 4 Bibb Ky. 181; 7 Leigh 371; 4 Ia. 289; 3 Blackf. 344; 6 Halst. 124; 19 Pick. 127; 2 Harr. N. J. 446; or by suit, in some cases; 13 Wend. 33; 5 Ark. 691; 14 Conn. 329. A surety on a recognizance may defend by showing the invalidity of the indictment against his principal; 78 Ga. 188; contra, 25 Tex. App. 331.

Without notice to the principal, a recognizance cannot be legally amended against objection of the sureties; 28 Tex. App. 28.

It is indispensable to a legal default and declaration of forfeiture of a recognizance, that the principal in the recognizance should have been regularly called, and, upon such call, failed to appear; 24 Ill. App. 72. See SURETYSHIP; SUBROGATION.

RECOGNIZE. To try; to examine in order to determine the truth of a matter. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. App. No. III. § 4; Bracton 179.

To enter into a recognizance.

RECOGNIZEE. He for whose use a recognizance has been taken.

RECOGNIZOR. He who enters into a recognizance.

RECOLEMENT. In French Law. The reading and re-examination by a witness of a deposition, and his persistence in the same, or his making such alteration as his better recollection may enable him to do after having read his deposition. Without such re-examination the deposition is void. Pothier, Procéd. Cr. s. 4, art. 4.

RECOMMENDATION. The giving to a person a favorable character of another.

When the party giving the character has acted in good faith, he is not responsible for the injury which a third person, to whom such recommendation was given, may have sustained in consequence of it, although he was mistaken.

But when the recommendation is knowingly untrue, and an injury is sustained, the party recommending is civilly responsible for damages; 3 Term 51; 7 Cra. 69; 7 Wend. 1; 14 id. 126; 6 Pa. 310; whether it was done merely for the purpose of benefiting the party recommended or the party who gives the recommendation. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

And in case the party recommended was a debtor to the one recommending, and it was agreed, prior to the transaction, that the former should, out of the property to be obtained by the recommendation, be paid, or in case of any other species of collusion to cheat the person to whom the credit is given, they may both be criminally prosecuted for the conspiracy. See CHARACTER; Fell, Guar. c. 8; 6 Johns. 181; 13 id. 224; 1 Day 22; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 443.

RECOMPENSATION. In Scotch Law. An allegation by the plaintiff of compensation on his part made in answer to a compensation or set-off pleaded by the defendant in answer to the plaintiff's demand.

RECOMPENSE. A reward for services; remuneration for goods or other property.

In maritime law there is a distinction between recompense and restitution. When goods have been lost by jettison, if at any subsequent period of the voyage the remainder of the cargo be lost, the owner of the goods lost by jettison cannot claim restitution from the owners of the other goods; but in the case of expenses incurred with a view to the general benefit, it is clear that they ought to be made good to the party, whether he be an agent employed by the master in a foreign port, or the ship-owner himself.

RECOMPENSE OF RECOVERY IN VALUE. A phrase applied to the matter recovered in a common recovery, after the vouchee has disappeared and judgment is given for the demandant. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2093.

RECONCILE. While etymologically not synonymous with "harmonize," reconcile is so nearly equivalent as not to mislead a jury instructed as to the reconciliation of conflicting testimony. 3 S. Dak. 134.

RECONCILIATION. The act of bringing persons to agree together, who before had had some difference.

A renewal of cohabitation between husband and wife is proof of reconciliation; and such reconciliation destroys the effect of a deed of separation; 4 Eccl. 238. See Bish. Mar. & D. § 1707.

RECONDUCTION. In Civil Law. A renewing of a former lease; relocation. Dig. 19. 2. 13. 11; Code, Nap. art. 1737–1740.

RECONSTRUCTION. This term has been widely used to describe the measures adopted by congress, at the close of the civil war in the United States, to regulate the admission of the representatives from the Southern states, the re-establishment of the federal authority within their borders, and the changes in their internal government, in order to adapt them to the condition of affairs brought about by the war. See 1 Am. L. Rev. 238.

RECONVENTION. In Civil Law. An action brought by a party who is defendant against the plaintiff before the same judge. 4 Mart. La. N. S. 439. To entitle the defendant to institute a demand in reconvention, it is requisite that such demand, though different from the main action, be nevertheless necessarily connected with it and incidental to the same. La. Code of Pr. art. 375; 11 La. 309; 7 Mart. La. N. S. 282. The reconvention of the civil law was a species of cross-bill. Story, Eq. Pl. § 402. See RECOUPMENT.

RECORD. A written memorial made by a public officer authorized by law to perform that function, and intended to serve as evidence of something written, said, or done. 6 Call 78; 1 Dana 595.

Records may be either of legislative or judicial acts. Memorials of other acts are sometimes made by statutory provisions.

Legislative acts. The federal and state constitutions, acts of congress and of the several legislatures are the highest kind of records. The printed journals of congress have been so considered. See Dougl. 598; Cowp. 17. And public documents transmitted to congress by the president are at least records so far that copies of them printed by the public printer are evidence; 7 Johns. 38.

A record in judicial proceedings is a precise statement of the suit from its commencement to its termination, including the conclusion of law thereon, drawn up by the proper officer, for the purpose of perpetuating the exact state of facts; or in the language of Lord Coke, "records are memorials or remembrances, in rolls of parchment, of the proceedings and acts of a court of justice, which hath power to hold plea according to the course of the common law." See 13 Conn. 216.

The proceedings of the courts of common law are records. But every minute made by a clerk of a court for his own future guidance in making up his record is not a record; 4 Wash. C. C. 698. See 10 Pa. 157; 2 Pick. 448; 4 N. H. 450; 5 Ohio St. 545; 3 Wend. 267; 2 Vt. 573; 5 Day 363; 3 T. B. Monr. 63; 146 Ill. 189; 57 Me. 107; 115 Mass. 201.

Proceedings in courts of chancery are said not to be, strictly speaking, records; but they are so considered; Gresl. Ev. 101. And see 8 Mart. La. N. S. 303; 1 Rawle 381; 8 Yerg. 142; 1 Pet. C. C. 352.

It is within the power of any court of general jurisdiction to restore its lost records or to expunge false or fraudulent interpolations therein; 61 Ill. App. 454; 69 Mo. App. 504; 49 La. Ann. 1012; or where the record is silent, or, where it suggests as a fact something contrary to the fact, to correct the record by an order nunc pro tunc; 70 Ga. 155. See 134 U. S. 136. The power of a court to amend its own records is limited to the correction of actual mistakes and omissions; 65 Hun 619. A court may always, after the expiration of the term, amend the record nunc pro tunc to conform to the facts, where there are sufficient data; 8 N. Mex. 446. If there has been a failure to file a record within the time required, a subsequent filing cures this defect; provided no motion to docket and dismiss has been made; 24 U. S. App. 527.

In criminal proceedings all parts of the record must be interpreted together, and a deficiency in one part may be supplied by what appears elsewhere therein; 154 U. S. 134.

Altering records of a court is a crime punishable at common law; 2 East, P. C. 865, 866. See 38 Mich. 218; 30 Me. 484. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 468 (6).

A form of entry signed by the judge, and intended to be entered in the journal of the court, is not a public record, the mutilation or changing of which is prohibited by Cr. Code § 1853; 43 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 717.

An attorney may be disbarred for alteration of the record by falsifying the stenographer's transcript of the evidence to deceive an appellate court; 129 Mo. 291; and the proceedings for that purpose may be properly instituted in the appellate court on relation of the attorney-general; id.; but it was held that the senior counsel who was not connected with the mutilation of the record, would not be disbarred for arguing the appeal from the record as filed; id. 231.

The fact of an instrument being recorded is held to operate as a constructive notice to all subsequent purchasers of any estate, legal or equitable, in the same property; 1 Johns. Ch. 394. And even if not recorded, if it has been filed for record and its existence is necessarily implied from the existence of another instrument already of record, purchasers will be deemed to have had notice of its existence; 14 Cent. L. J. 374.

But all conveyances and deeds which may be de facto recorded are not to be considered as giving notice: in order to have this effect, the instruments must be such as are authorized to be recorded, and the registry must have been made in compliance with the law, otherwise the registry is to be treated as a mere nullity, and it will not affect a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer unless he has actual notice; 2 Sch. & L. 68; 4 Wheat. 466; 1 Johns. Ch. 300; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 403; 5 Me. 272; but where a statute makes it discretionary to record an instrument, the effect of recording is in no wise lessened, but is deemed a constructive notice the same as if the recording had been required; 77 Pa. 373. The record of a deed is not constructive notice of its contents when it is not entitled to be recorded under the recording acts; 7 C. C. App. 293. Where a proper book is kept for the purpose of showing when an instrument is left for record, delay or negligence in entering it in other books will not affect it as a lien upon the property; 82 Pa. 116. See, as to recording acts, 3 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th sec. 412; Judge Cooley's Paper in 4th Rep. Am. Bar Asso. (1881); Lecture of W. H. Rawle before the Law Dept. Univ. of Pa., 1881; as to mortgages, see MORTGAGE; as to courts of record see that title; as to falsification of a record see FORGERY.

As to giving full faith and credit to judicial proceedings, under the United States constitution, see FOREIGN JUDGMENT. The constitutional provision applies in terms to public acts, records, and judicial proceedings, and it is held that the term records in the Judiciary Act of May 26, 1790, which provides how they shall be proved and admitted in evidence, includes all acts, legislative, executive, judicial, and ministerial, composing the public records of the state; 20 How. 250; 16 Tex. 509.

Questions as to what is or is not a part of the record have arisen, principally on writ of error or appeal, as to what parts of the record and proceedings of the court below are to be considered as parts of the record before the appellate court. In many of these cases matters which were actually a part of the record below are only such in the court above when made so by being embodied in the bill of exceptions. Among the matters and things which have been held not to be a part of the record, but to be considered with reference to the foregoing qualification, are: Trial list; 1 Pa. 129; bond for costs; 5 Ark. 264; 8 Mich. 81; writing sued on; 7 Humphr. 255; 2 Ark. 109 (unless made so by oyer or otherwise; 4 Ark. 202); an affidavit made to supply a part of the record which has been lost; 4 Ill. 119, 259; papers presented to a court and acted upon merely as matters of evidence; 16 Me. 81; the registry of a mechanic's lien; 1 W. & S. 240; the statement of demand, in the court for the trial of small causes; 3 Green N. J. 224; a warrant of attorney to confess judgment and an affidavit showing the death of one of the signers of it; 12 Ill. 379; instructions to the jury; 1 Ia. 226; 11 id. 454 (contra, where they were signed by the judge and filed; 16 Ind. 416); letters copied into the transcripts as exhibits; 28 Ala. 416; papers filed after an appeal prayed, taken, and signed by the judge; 1 Ark. 557; a plea stricken from the files; 5 id. 166, 223; 29 Ind. 120; minutes of the court taken at the trial; 23 Cal. 103; or clerk's minutes; 33 id. 171; a bill of particulars; 24 Ill. 262; a summons or other writ; 1 Morr. 439 (otherwise where there was no appearance; 19 Ind. 273).

The following have been held to be parts of the record: A stipulation as to sale of mortgaged premises and solicitor's fee; 15 Wis. 211; depositions in a probate court; 38 Miss. 476; affidavits filed in opposition to an application for an injunction; 22 Cal. 362; motions, notices, and rulings of court; 4 Greene (Ia.) 123; a finding of the court; 20 Wis. 350; 21 Mo. 157; 11 Ind. 314; a submission and award filed; 27 Ill. 374; a bill of exceptions settled on an appeal from an order; 20 Wis. 518; an instrument of which oyer is craved; 5 Ark. 116. The opinion of the trial court as to the facts was held a part of the record; 96 Ia. 501; but in Pennsylvania it is said to be not a good principle so to treat the opinion; 183 Pa. 155.

Under recording acts. Statutes of the several states have required enrolment of certain deeds, mortgages, and other instruments, and declared that the copies thus made should have the effect of records. An instrument lodged for record is considered as recorded from that time, whether it was actually copied in the book or not, or in the proper book or not; 172 Pa. 234.

Inspection of Records. At common law, there was no general right of inspection, but the right depended entirely upon the question whether the party seeking to exercise it had an interest. If he had, he was entitled to exercise the right upon the payment of the usual fees; 7 Mod. 127; 1 Stra. 304; 2 id. 260, 954, 1005; but a mere stranger who had no such interest had no right of inspection at common law; 8 Term 390; and the custodian might permit or refuse the inspection at his discretion without any control by a court; 6 Ad. & El. 84; 9 Cent. L. J. 425. At a comparatively early period, this distinction between those who had and those who had not an interest became obliterated; 1 Wils. 297; 47 Barb. 329. The effect of modern recording acts making the public records notice, has aided to accomplish this result, and, indeed, makes the right of inspection and of enforcing the privilege an essential one; 4 D. & R. 820; 61 Ala. 310; 71 id. 299; 45 Ill. 224; 66 Me. 305; 90 Mich. 648. It does not extend in England to merely quasi-public records, such as court rolls of a manor; Bunb. 269; or to records of a justice of the peace; 66 Vt. 485; or to a marriage license docket; 4 D. R. (Pa.) 284; contra, id. 162.

The right of inspection will not exist as to the record of private suits, at least before trial, where it is sought only to gratify malice or curiosity, or to make profit by disclosing private affairs and making public scandalous matters; 72 Mich. 560; 85 id. 1; nor does it extend to records required by law to be kept secret, as, the proceedings of a county electrical board; 25 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 552. The right of inspection is secured by statute in most of the states, and is not dependent on interest, though in some cases it is denied if detrimental to public policy or is sought by a citizen of another state; 51 Mich. 145; 61 Ala. 310. In case of refusal, the right may be enforced; 44 Fed. Rep. 786; 39 N. J. L. 287; 37 W. Va. 266; even though the rules of the office require the records to be kept secret. The right when denied is enforced by mandamus; 53 N. J. Eq. 158, reversing 49 id. 474; 71 Ala. 299; 90 Mich. 643; 66 Me. 305. Injunction is usually held not to be a proper remedy; 73 Md. 289; 51 Ga. 391; 51 Mich. 145; 27 Ill. App. 36; 53 N. J. Eq. 158. The right of inspection is very much drawn into question in cases where the right is sought to be exercised by abstract and title insurance companies. Objections to the use of public offices by the agents of such companies are made upon the ground of interference with the legitimate fees of the public officers, with the business of the office, and of possible injuries to the records. The right has been sustained in 44 Fed. Rep. 786; 17 Colo. 248; 17 id. 546; 38 Hun 429; 99 N. Y. 620; 12 W. N. C. (Pa.) 291; and, after some fluctuation, in 53 N. J. Eq. 158; 78 Mich. 363; 102 id. 55; 17 Colo. 248; 76 Ala. 49; 82 Ala. 527; 7 Colo. 200; 51 Ga. 391; 73 Md. 289 (the statute having been passed as a result of a previous decision otherwise).

Where the right is permitted, the custodian may make reasonable rules; 99 N. Y. 620; 96 Mich. 600; 17 Colo. 546; and charge reasonable fees; 102 Mich. 55. The right to inspect has been held to include the right to copy; 69 Wis. 538; 37 Minn. 372; contra, 39 Kan. 301; 82 Ala. 527.

RECORD OF NISI PRIUS. In English Law. A transcript from the issue-roll: it contains a copy of the pleadings and issue. Steph. Pl. 105.

RECORDARE. A writ to bring up judgments of justices of the peace. 3 Jones N. C. 491.

RECORDARI FACIAS LOQUELAM. In English Practice. A writ commanding the sheriff that he cause the plaint to be recorded which is in his county, without writ, between the parties there named, of the cattle, goods, and chattels of the complainant taken and unjustly distrained as it is said, and that he have the said record before the court on a day therein named, and that he prefix the same day to the parties, that then they may be there ready to proceed in the same plaint. 2 Sell. Pr. 166. Now obsolete.

RECORDATUR (Lat.). An order or allowance that the verdict returned on the nisi prius roll be recorded. Bacon, Abr. Arbitration, etc. (D).

RECORDER. A judicial officer of some cities, possessing generally the powers and authority of a judge. 3 Yeates 300; 4 Dall. 299. See 1 Const. S. C. 45.

Anciently, recorder signified to recite or testify on recollection, as occasion might require, what had previously passed in court; and this was the duty of the judges, thence called recordeurs. Steph. Pl. note 11.

An officer appointed to make record or enrolment of deeds and other legal instruments authorized by law to be recorded.

RECORDER OF LONDON. One of the justices of oyer and terminer, and a justice of the peace of the quorum for putting the laws in execution for the preservation of the peace and government of the city. Whart. Law Lex.

RECORDING ACTS. Statutes which regulate the official recording of conveyances, mortgages, bills of sale, hypothecations, assignments for the benefit of creditors, articles of agreement, and other instruments, for the purpose of informing the public, creditors and purchasers, of transactions affecting the ownership of property and the pecuniary responsibility of individual persons. See RECORD.

RECORDUM. A record: a judicial record. It is used in the phrase prout patet per recordum, which is a formula employed, in pleading, for reference to a record, signifying as it appears from the record. 1 Chit. Pl. 385; 10 Me. 127.

RECOUPMENT (Fr. recouper, to cut again). The act of abating or recouping a part of a claim upon which one is sued by reason of a legal or equitable right resulting from a counter-claim arising out of the same transaction. The right of the defendant, in the same action, to claim damages from the plaintiff, either because he has not complied with some cross-obligation of the contract upon which he sues, or because he has violated some duty which the law imposed upon him in the making or performance of that contract. 4 Wend. 483; 22 id. 155; 10 Barb. 55; 13 N. Y. 151; 3 Ind. 72, 265; 9 id. 470; 7 Ala. N. S. 753; 27 id. 574; 12 Ark. 699; 17 id. 270; 6 B. Monr. 528; 15 id. 454; 3 Mich. 281; 39 Me. 382; 16 Ill. 495; 11 Mo. 415; 25 id. 430; 83 Ga. 212.

Recoupment is the right to set off unliquidated damages, while the right of set-off, as distinguished from recoupment, comprehends only liquidated demands, or those capable of being ascertained by calculation; 32 N. J. Eq. 225. Both these terms have a technical meaning and both are included in the same general term, counter-claim, which see.

This is not a new title in the law, the term occurring from the 14th to the 16th centuries, although it seems of late years to have assumed a new signification, and the present doctrine is said to be still in its infancy; 7 Am. L. Rev. 389. Originally it implied a mere deduction from the claim of the plaintiff, on account of payment in whole or in part, or a former recovery, or some analogous fact; 3 Co. 65; 4 id. 94; 5 id. 2, 31; 11 id. 51, 52. See note to Icily v. Grew, 6 Nev. & M. 467; Viner, Abr. Discount, pl. 8, 4, 9, 10; 28 Vt. 413. This meaning has been retained in many modern cases, but under the name of deduction or reduction of damages; 11 East 232; 1 Maule & S. 318, 323; 2 M. & G. 941; 7 M. & W. 314; 12 id. 772; 20 Conn. 204; 21 Wend. 610; 3 Dana 489; 14 Pick. 356. The word recoupment has also been applied to cases very similar to the above; 4 Den. 227; 20 Wend. 267. See 7 Am. L. Rev. 389, where recoupment is fully treated.

Recoupment as now understood seems to correspond with the Reconvention of the civil law, sometimes termed demands incidentes by the French writers, in which the reus, or defendant, was permitted to exhibit his claim against the plaintiff for allowance, provided it rose out of, or was incidental to, the plaintiff's cause of action. Œuvres de Pothier, vol. 9, p. 39; 1 White, New Rec. 285; Voet. tit. de Judiciis, n. 78; La. Code Pr. art. 375; 4 Mart. N. S. 499; 5 id. 671; 12 La. Ann. 114, 170; 6 Tex. 406.

In England, as well as in some of the United States, the principles of recoupement as defined above have been recognized only in a restricted form. Under the name of reduction of damages, the defendant is allowed to show all such violations of his contract by the plaintiff as go to render the consideration less valuable, but he is compelled to resort to an independent action for any immediate or consequential damages affecting him in other respects; 8 M. & W. 858; 3 Campb. 450; 1 C. & P. 384; 6 Barb. 387; 6 B. Monr. 528; 12 Conn. 129; 11 Johns. 547; 12 Pick. 330; 8 Humphr. 678; 9 How. 231. See 84 Ala. 496; 65 Miss. 315. But these restrictions are all gradually disappearing, and the law is assuming the form expressed in the cases cited under the definition of modern recoupment, the main reason upon which the doctrine now rests being the avoidance of circuity of action.

In Pennsylvania a defendant may avail himself, by way of recoupment or equitable defence, of a breach of warranty or of a fraudulent representation, and show that the goods sold were worth less than they would have been if they were such as they were wrranted or represented to be; 120 U. S. 648.

There are some limitations and qualifications to the law of recoupment, as thus established. Thus, it has been held that the defendant is not entitled to any judgment for the excess his damages in recoupment may have over the plaintiff's claim, nor shall he be allowed to bring an independent action for that excess; 6 N. H. 481; 14 Ill. 424; 3 Mich. 281; 12 Ala. N. S. 643; 3 Hill N. Y. 171; 17 Ark. 270. See 83 Ala. 333. If recoupment is put upon the ground of a cross-action and not a mere defence for the reduction of damages, there is no reason why he should not have judgment to the extent of his injury. Such seems to be the practice in Louisiana, under the name of reconvention; 12 La. Ann. 170; and such will probably be the practice under those systems of pleading which authorize the court, in any action which requires it, to grant the defendant affirmative relief; 2 E. D. Sm. 317. See, also, 3 W. & S. 472; 17 S. & R. 385; 12 How. Pr. 310.

The damages recouped must be for a breach of the same contract upon which suit is brought; 3 Hill N. Y. 171; 4 Sandf. 147; 10 Ind. 329; 74 Mich. 424. See 77 Mo. 345; 95 Ill. 476; 54 Miss. 563. For example, when chattels have been sold with an express or implied warranty, and there were latent defects unknown to the purchaser, he may retain the goods without notifying the vendor, and either sue for his damages or recoup the same in an action against him for the price; 67 Wis. 129; 18 Ohio C. C. 99; even if the sale were on approval, but the contract did not limit the purchaser to the return of the property, if unsatisfactory; 56 Conn. 489; or one who has pledged stocks as collateral to a note, if sued on the note, may recoup the damages resulting from wrongful appropriation of the stocks by the pledgee; 36 U. S. App. 248; s. c. 71 Fed. Rep. 102. The surety on a note, in an action by the payee, may set up, by way of recoupment, the breach of warranty of the property sold to the maker for which the note was given; 15 App. Div. N. Y. 498; but if a surety is sued alone, he cannot recoup for a warranty in favor of his principal, without the consent of the latter; 40 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 482. It may be for a tort; but it seems that the tort must be a violation of the contract, and it is to be measured by the extent of this violation, and no allowance taken of malice; 10 Barb. 55; 17 Ill. 38; 4 S. & R. 249. The language of some cases would seem to imply that recoupment may be had for damages connected with the subject-matter or transaction upon which the suit is brought, but which do not constitute a violation of any obligation imposed by the contract, or of any duty imposed by the law in the making or performance of the contract; 14 Ill. 424; 17 id. 38. But these cases will be found to be decided with reference to statutes of counter-claim. And even in the construction of such statutes it has been doubted whether it is not better to confine the damages to violations of the contract; 8 Ind. 399; 2 Sandf. 120.

It is well established, in the absence of statutory provisions, that it is optional with the defendant whether he shall plead his cross-claim by way of recoupment, or resort to an independent action; 14 Johns. 379; 13 Wend. 277; 12 Ala. N. S. 643; 3 Ind. 59; 21 Mo. 415. Nor does the fact of a suit pending for the same damages estop him from pleading them in recoupment, although he may be compelled to choose upon which action he shall proceed; 3 E. D. Sm. 135; 5 Watts 116. Payment after action brought, although never pleadable in answer to the action, was usually admitted in reduction of damages; 4 N. H. 557; 6 Ind. 26; 2 Bingh. N. C. 88; 7 C. & P. 1; 1 M. & W. 463. But the defendant can never recoup for damages accruing since action brought; 20 E. L. & E. 277; 4 Barb. 256; 2 Binn. 287.

The right of recoupment will usually be allowed to sureties and indorsers in cases where it would be permitted for the benefit of the principal debtor, as, for example, a successful recoupment by the maker of a note will enure to the benefit of the indorser when sued with the maker; 21 Misc. 86.

It has been maintained by some courts that the law of recoupment is not applicable to real estate. Accordingly, they have denied the defendant the right, when sued for the purchase-money, to recoup for a partial failure of title; 11 Johns. 50; 2 Wheat. 13; 12 Ark. 709; 17 id. 254. But most of these cases will be found denying him that right only before eviction. A confusion has been introduced by regarding failure of title and failure of consideration as convertible terms. The consideration of a deed without covenants is the mere delivery of the instrument; Rawle,

Cov. 588. A failure of title in such case is not a failure of consideration, and it therefore affords no ground for recoupment. The consideration of a deed with covenants does not fail till the covenantee has suffered damages on the covenants, which in most cases does not happen till eviction, either actual or constructive. After this has happened, his right to recoup is now pretty generally admitted. This is nothing more than allowing him to recoup as soon as he can sue upon the covenants; 21 Wend. 131; 13 N. Y. 151; 3 Pick. 459; 14 id. 293; 6 Gratt. 305; Dart, Vend. 381; Rawle, Cov. 583.

It has been more generally admitted that where there is a failure of the consideration as to the quantity or quality of the land, the purchaser may recoup upon his covenants; 12 Ark. 699; 17 id. 254; 2 Kent 470; 18 Mo. 368; 20 id. 443; 71 Wis. 54.

Under the common-law system of pleading, the evidence of a recoupment, if going to a total failure of consideration, might be given under the general issue without notice, but if it went only to a partial failure, notice was required to prevent surprise; 6 Barb. 386; 2 N. Y. 157; 6 N. H. 497; 3 Ind. 265. This is the only way it could be admitted, for it could not be pleaded, a partial defence constituting neither a plea in bar nor in abatement. Under a notice it was admitted to aid in sustaining the general denial.

But under the new systems of practice there being no general issue to which the notice was subsidiary, the defendant is required to plead his defence whether it is in answer of the whole demand or only in reduction of damages; 6 How. Pr. 433; 11 N. Y. 352; 12 Wend. 246; 18 Mo. 368.

The effect to be given to the law of recoupment will depend, in many of the states, upon the statutes of counter-claim and offset in force. In Missouri, for instance, it is provided that if any two or more persons are mutually indebted in any manner whatever, and one of them commence an action against the other, one debt may be set against the other, although such debts are of a different nature; 1 R. S. § 3867. The term counter-claim under this statute is held to include both set-off and recoupment; 49 Mo. 570; the distinction between the two terms being important only from the fact that the former must arise from contract, and can only be used in an action founded on contract; while the latter may spring from a wrong, provided it arose out of the transaction set forth in the petition, or was connected with the subject of the action; id. In the case of actions arising out of contracts it has been held that nothing would be allowed by way of recoupment unless it worked a violation of some obligation imposed by the contract, or some duty imposed by the law in the making or performance of it; 2 Sandf. 120; 8 Ind. 399.

RECOURSE. To recur. As to indorsement without recourse, see INDORSEMENT.

RECOVERER. The demandant in a common recovery, after judgment has been given in his favor, assumes the name of recoverer.

RECOVERY. The restoration of a former right, by the solemn judgment of a court of justice. 3 Murph. 169. See 28 L. J. C. P. 312; 8 Q. B. D. 470.

In its general use, recovery signifies a collection of a debt by process and course of law. 76 Cal. 269.

The phrase right of recovery is used to express the possession of a right of action under the existing facts.

A common recovery is a judgment obtained in a fictitious suit, brought against the tenant of the freehold, in consequence of a default made by the person who is last vouched to warranty in such suit. Bacon, Tracts 148.

A true recovery, usually known by the name of recovery simply, is the procuring a former right by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction: as, for example, when judgment is given in favor of the plaintiff when he seeks to recover a thing or a right.

Common recoveries are considered as mere forms of conveyance or common assurances: although a common recovery is a fictitious suit, yet the same mode of proceeding must be pursued, and all the forms strictly adhered to, which are necessary to be observed in an adversary suit. The first thing, therefore, necessary to be done in suffering a common recovery is that the person who is to be the demandant, and to whom the lands are to be adjudged, should sue out a writ or præcipe against the tenant of the freehold; whence such tenant is usually called the tenant to the præcipe. In obedience to this writ the tenant appears in court, either in person or by his attorney; but, instead of defending the title to the land himself, he calls on some other person, who upon the original purchase is supposed to have warranted the title, and prays that the person may be called in to defend the title which he warranted, or otherwise to give the tenant lands of equal value to those he shall lose by the defect of his warranty. This is called the voucher, vocatio, or calling to warranty. The person thus called to warrant, who is usually called the vouchee, appears in court, is impleaded, and enters into the warranty, by which means he takes upon himself the defence of the land. The defendant then desires leave of the court to imparl, or confer with the vouchee in private, which is granted of course. Soon after the demandant returns into court, but the vouchee disappears or makes default, in consequence of which it is presumed by the court that he has no title to the lands demanded in the writ, and therefore cannot defend them; whereupon judgment is given for the demandant, now called the recoverer, to recover the lands in question against the tenant, and for the tenant to recover against the vouchee lands of equal value in recompense for those so warranted by him, and now lost by his default. This is called the recompense of recovery in value; but as it is customary for the crier of the court to act, who is hence called the common vouchee, the tenant can only have a nominal and not a real recompense for the land thus recovered against him by the demandant. A writ of habere facias is then sued out directed to the sheriff of the county in which the lands thus recovered are situated: and on the execution and return of the writ the recovery is completed. The recovery here described is with single voucher; but a recovery may be, and is frequently, suffered with double, treble, or further voucher, as the exigency of the case may require, in which case there are several judgments against the several vouchees.

Common recoveries were invented by the ecclesiastics in order to evade the statute of mortmain, by which they were prohibited from purchasing, or receiving under the pretence of a free gift, any land or tenements whatever. They have been used in some states for the purpose of breaking the entail of estates. See, generally, Cruise, Digest, tit. 36; 2 Wms. Saund. 42, n. 7; 4 Kent 487; Pigot, Comm. Rec. passim. See Chall. Real P. 279; Big. Estop. 418.

All the learning in relation to common recoveries is nearly obsolete, as they are out of use. Rey, a French writer, in his work Des Institutions Judiciaires de l'Angleterre, tom. ii. p. 221, points out what appears to him the absurdity of a common recovery. As to common recoveries, see 3 S. & R. 435; 9 id. 330; 1 Yeates 244; 4 id. 413; 1 Whart. 139, 151; 2 Rawle 168; 6 Pa. 45; 2 Halst. 47; 5 Mass. 438; 6 id. 398; 8 id. 34; 3 Harr. & J. 292.

RECREANT. A coward; a poltroon. 3 Bla. Com. 340.

RECRIMINATION. In Criminal Law. An accusation made by a person accused against his accuser, either of having committed the same offence or another.

In general, recrimination does not excuse the person accused nor diminish his punishment, because the guilt of another can never excuse him. But in applications for divorce on the ground of adultery, if the party defendant can prove that the plaintiff or complainant has been guilty of the same offence, the divorce will not be granted; 2 Bish. Mar. & D. 340; 1 Hagg. Cons. 144; 4 Eccl. 360. The laws of Pennsylvania contain a provision to the same effect. See 1 Hagg. Eccl. 790; 3 id. 77; 1 Hagg. Cons. 147; Dig. 24. 3. 39; 48. 3. 13. 5; 1 Add. Eccl. 411; 2 Colo. App. 8; COMPENSATION; CONDONATION; DIVORCE.

RECTIFIER. As used in the internal revenue laws, this term is not confined to a person who runs spirits through charcoal; but is applied to any one who rectifies or purifies spirits in any manner whatever, or who makes a mixture of spirits with anything else, and sells it under any name. 3 Ben. 73; s. c. 2 Am. L. T. Rep. 23.

RECTOR. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who rules or governs: a name given to certain officers of the Roman church. Dict. Canonique.

In English Law. He that hath full possession of a parochial church. A rector (or parson) has for the most part the whole right to all the ecclesiastical dues in his parish; where, as in theory of law, a vicar has an appropriator over him, entitled to the best part of the profits, to whom the vicar is, as it were, perpetual curate, with a standing salary. Cowell; 1 Bla. Com. 384; 2 Steph. Com. 677.

RECTORY. In English Law. Corporeal real property, consisting of a church, glebe-lands, and tithes. 1 Chitty, Pr. 163.

RECTUS IN CURIA (Lat. right in court). The condition of one who stands at the bar, against whom no one objects any offence or prefers any charge.

When a person outlawed has reversed his outlawry, so that he can have the benefit of the law, he is said to be rectus in curia. Jacob, Law Dict.

RECUPERATORES (Lat.). In Roman Law. A species of judges originally established, it is supposed, to decide controversies between Roman citizens and strangers concerning the right to the possession of property requiring speedy remedy, but gradually extended to questions which might be brought before ordinary judges.

After the enlargement of their powers, the difference between them and judges, it is supposed, was simply this:—if the prætor named three judges, he called them recuperatores; if one, he called him judex. But opinions on this subject are very various. Colman, De Romano judicio recuperatorio. Cicero's oration pro Cæcin. 1, 3, was addressed to recuperatores.

The result of the latest investigation of this subject is that, while ordinary cases were referred to the college of centumviri, in cases where the prætor wished to obtain a speedy decision he had power to appoint an extraordinary college of three or five recuperatores whose instructions required them to find a verdict within a designated time. Such a course was often required in cases involving personal liberty, and the result was that the jurisdiction of the decemviri over all such actions became displaced by the court of recuperatores. The latter were also appointed in cases to which aliens were parties. Like the judices the recuperatores were private persons; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 150, n. 3.

RECUSABLE. See IRRECUSABLE; CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

RECUSANTS. In English Law. Persons who wilfully absent themselves from their parish church, and on whom penalties were imposed by various statutes passed during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Whart. Dict.

Those persons who separate from the church established by law. Termes de la Ley.

RECUSATION. In Civil Law. A plea or exception by which the defendant requires that the judge having jurisdiction of the cause should abstain from deciding, upon the ground of interest, or for a legal objection to his prejudice.

A recusation is not a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, but simply to the person of the judge. It may, however, extend to all the judges, as when the party has a suit against the whole court. Pothier, Procéd. Civ. 1ère part. ch. 2, s. 5. It is a personal challenge of the judge for cause. See 2 La. 390; 6 id. 134.

The challenge of jurors. La. Code Pract. art. 499, 500. An act, of what nature soever it may be, by which a strange heir, by deeds or words, declares he will not be heir. Dig. 29. 2. 95. See, generally, 1 Hopk. Ch. 1; 5 Mart. La. 292.

RED BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER. An ancient record, wherein are registered the holders of lands per baroniam in the time of Henry III., the number of hides of land in certain counties before the conquest, and the ceremonies on the coronation of Eleanor, wife of Henry III., compiled by Alexander de Swenford, archdeacon of Salop and treasurer of St. Paul's, who died in 1246. 31 Hen. III.; Jacob, Law Dict.; Cowell.

RED TAPE. In a derivative sense, order carried to fastidious excess; system run out into trivial extremes. 55 Ga. 434.

REDDENDO SINGULA SINGULIS (Lat.). Referring particular things to particular persons. For example: when two descriptions of property are given together in one mass, both the next of kin and the heir cannot take, unless in cases where a construction can be made reddendo singula singulis, that the next of kin shall take the personal estate, and the heir-at-law the real estate. 14 Ves. 490. See 11 East 513, n.; Bac. Abr. Conditions (L).

REDDENDUM (Lat.). That clause in a deed by which the grantor reserves something new to himself out of that which he granted before. It usually follows the tenendum, and is generally in these words, "yielding and paying." In every good reddendum or reservation these things must concur: namely, it must be in apt words; it must be of some other thing issuing or coming out of the thing granted, and not a part of the thing itself nor of something issuing out of another thing; it must be of a thing on which the grantor may resort to distrain; it must be made to one of the grantors, and not to a stranger to the deed. See 2 Bla. Com. 299; Co. Litt. 47; Shepp. Touchst. 80; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 24, s. 1; Dane. Abr. Index.

REDDIDIT SE (Lat. he has rendered himself). In English Practice. An indorsement made on the bail-piece when a certificate has been made by the proper officer that the defendant is in custody. Com. Dig. Bail (Q 4).

REDDITION. A surrendering or restoring; also, a judicial acknowledgment that the thing in demand belongs to the demandant, and not to the person surrendering. Cowell.

REDEEM. To purchase back; to regain, as mortgaged property by paying what is due; to receive back by paying the obligation. 47 Ohio St. 156. See 47 N. J. Eq. 170.

REDEMPTION (Lat. re, back, emptio, a purchase).

A purchase back by the seller from the buyer. It is applied to denote the performance of the conditions upon performance of which a conditional sale is to become ineffective as a transfer of title, or, more strictly, a right to demand a reconveyance becomes vested in the seller. In the case of mortgages, this right is a legal right until a breach of conditions, when it becomes an equitable right, and is called the equity of redemption. See MORTGAGE; EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

REDEMPTIONES (Lat.). Heavy fines. Distinguished from Misericordia, which see.

REDHIBITION. In Civil Law. The avoidance of a sale on account of some vice or defect in the thing sold, which renders its use impossible or so inconvenient and imperfect that it must be supposed that the buyer would not have purchased it had he known of the vice. La. Civ. Code, art. 2496.

This is essentially a civil-law right. The effect of the rule expressed by the maxim caveat emptor is to prevent any such right at common law, except in cases of express warranty. 2 Kent 374; Sugd. Vend. 222.

REDHIBITORY ACTION. In Civil Law. An action instituted to avoid a sale on account of some vice or defect in the thing sold which renders its use impossible or so inconvenient and imperfect that it must be supposed the buyer would not have purchased it had he known of the vice. La. Civ. Code 2496.

REDISSEISOR. See DISSEISIN.

REDITUS ALBI (Lat.). A rent payable in money; sometimes called white rent, or blanche farm. See ALBA FIRMA.

REDITUS NIGRI (Lat.). A rent payable in grain, work, and the like: it was also called black mail. This name was given to it to distinguish it from reditus albi, which was payable in money.

REDITUS QUIETI. Quit rents. 1 Steph. Com. 676.

REDMANS, or RADMANS. Men who, by the tenure or custom of their lands, were to ride with or for the lord of the manor, about his business. Domesd.

REDOBATORES (L. Lat.). Those that buy stolen cloth and turn it into some other color or fashion, that it may not be recognized. Redubbers, q. v. Barrington, Stat., 2d ed. 87, n.; Co. 3d Inst. 134; Britton, c. 29.

REDRAFT. In Commercial Law. A bill of exchange drawn at the place where another bill was made payable and where it was protested, upon the place where the first bill was drawn, or, when there is no regular commercial intercourse rendering that practicable, then in the next best or most direct practicable course. 1 Bell, Com. 406. See RE-EXCHANGE.

REDRESS. The act of receiving satisfaction for an injury sustained. For the mode of obtaining redress, see REMEDIES; 1 Chitty, Pr. Anal. Table.

REDUBBERS. In Criminal Law. Those who bought stolen cloth and dyed it of another color to prevent its being identified, were anciently so called. Co. 3d Inst. 134. See REDOBATORES.

REDUCTION. In Scotch Law. An action for the purpose of setting aside or rendering null and void some deed, will, right, etc. Bell, Dict.

REDUNDANCY. Matter introduced in an answer or pleading which is foreign to the bill or article.

The respondent is not to insert in his answer any matter foreign to the articles he is called upon to answer, although such matter may be admissible in a plea; but he may, in his answer, plead matter by way of explanation pertinent to the articles, even if such matter shall be solely in his own knowledge, and to such extent incapable of proof; or he may state matter which can be substantiated by witnesses; but in this latter instance, if such matter be introduced into the answer, and not afterwards put in the plea, or proved, the court will give no weight or credence to such part of the answer. Per Lushington, 3 Curt. Eccl. 543.

A material distinction is to be observed between redundancy in the allegation and redundancy in the proof. In the former case, a variance between the allegation and the proof will be fatal, if the redundant allegations are descriptive of that which is essential. But in the latter case, redundancy cannot vitiate because more is proved than is alleged, unless the matter superfluously proved goes to contradict some essential part of the allegation; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 67; 1 Stark. Ev. 401.

RE-ENTRY. The act of resuming the possession of lands or tenements in pursuance of a right which the party exercising it reserved to himself when he quit his former possession.

Conveyances in fee reserving a ground-rent, and leases for a term of years, usually contain a clause authorizing the proprietor to re-enter in case of the non-payment of rent, or of the breach of some covenant in the lease, which forfeits the estate. Without such reservation he would have no right to re-enter for the mere breach of a covenant, although he may do so upon the breach of a condition which, by its terms, is to defeat the estate granted; 2 Bingh. 13; 1 M. & Ry. 694; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 290; Woodf. Landl. & T. 310.

When a landlord is about to enforce his right to re-enter for the non-payment of rent, he must make a specific demand of payment, and be refused, before the forfeiture is complete, unless such demand has been dispensed with by an express agreement of the parties; 18 Johns. 451; 6 S. & R. 151; 6 Halst. 270; 7 Term 117; 5 Co. 41. In the latter case, a mere failure to pay, without any demand, constitutes a sufficient breach, upon which an entry may at any time subsequently be made; 2 N. Y. 147; 2 N. H. 164; 2 Dougl. 477; 2 B. & C. 490. The demand may be in the form of a notice to quit; 35 Neb. 766.

The requisites of a demand upon which to predicate a forfeiture for the non-payment of rent, at common law, are very strict. It must be for the payment of the precise sum due upon the day when, by the terms of the lease, it becomes payable; if any days of grace are allowed for payment, then upon the last day of grace; Co. Litt. 203; 7 Term 117; 2 N. Y. 147; see 55 N. J. L. 217; at a convenient time before sunset, while there is light enough to see to count the money; 17 Johns. 66; 1 Saund. 287; at the place appointed for payment, or if no particular place has been specified in the lease, then at the most public place on the land, which, if there be a dwelling-house, is the front door; 4 Wend. 313; 18 Johns. 450; 1 How. 211; Co. Litt. 202*a*; notwithstanding there be no person on the land to pay it; Bac. Abr. Rent (I); and if the re-entry clause is coupled with the condition that no sufficient distress be found upon the premises, the landlord must search the premises to see that no such distress can be found; 15 East 286; 6 S. & R. 151; 8 Watts 51.

A re-entry, at common law, for condition forfeited in a lease, is void unless the evidence shows that the common-law forms have been complied with. A mere taking possession of the premises, when unoccupied, is not sufficient; 15 Wall. 475.

But the statutes of most of the states, following 4 Geo. II. c. 28, now dispense with the formalities of a common-law demand, by providing that an action of ejectment may be brought as substitute for such a demand in all cases where no sufficient distress can be found upon the premises. And this latter restriction disappears entirely from the statutes of such of the states as have abolished distress for rent.

The clause of re-entry for non-payment of rent operates only as a security for rent; for at any time before judgment is entered in the action to recover possession the tenant may either tender to the landlord, or bring into the court where the action is pending, all the rent in arrear at the time of such payment, and all costs and charges incurred by the landlord, and in such case all further proceedings will cease. And in some states, even after the landlord has recovered possession, the tenant may in certain cases be reinstated upon the terms of the original lease, by paying up all arrearages and costs; Tayl. Landl. & T. 302. See, generally, Wms. R. P. 285.

The acceptance by a landlord, after his right of possession is fixed, of property from the tenant in payment of rent that had accrued, is no waiver of his right to enter; 44 Ill. App. 61; but the acceptance of rent accruing after breach of a condition in a lease, with full knowledge of the breach, is a waiver of the right to declare a forfeiture and re-enter; 12 So. Rep. (Ala.) 61. See 6 Misc. Rep. 408.

But the courts will not relieve against a forfeiture which has been wilfully incurred by a tenant who assigns his lease, or neglects to repair or to insure, contrary to his express agreement, or if he exercises a forbidden trade, or cultivates the land in a manner prohibited by the lease; for in all such cases the landlord, if he has reserved a right to re-enter, may at once resume his former possession and avoid the lease; 2 Price 206, n.; 2 Mer. 459; 9 C. & P. 706; 1 Dall. 210; 9 Mod. 112; 3 V. & B. 29; 12 Ves. 291.

Where the landlord is justified in re-entering and taking possession of the premises, the lessee can recover no damages for the loss of the portion of the term, or for injury to the business, but may recover for property destroyed or any unnecessary damage thereto; 72 Wis. 559.

REEVE. An ancient English officer of justice, inferior in rank to an alderman.

He was a ministerial officer appointed to execute process, keep the king's peace, and put the laws in execution. He witnessed all contracts and bargains, brought offenders to justice and delivered them to punishment, took bail for such as were to appear at the county court, and presided at the court or folcmote. He was also called gerefa.

There were several kinds of reeves: as, the shire-gerefa, shire-reeve or sheriff; the heh-gerefa, or high-sheriff; tithing-reeve, burghor or borough-reeve.

RE-EXAMINATION. A second examination of a thing. A witness may be re-examined, in a trial at law, in the discretion of the court; and this is seldom refused. In equity, it is a general rule that there can be no re-examination of a witness after he has once signed his name to the deposition and turned his back upon the commissioner or examiner. The reason of this is that he may be tampered with, or induced to retract or qualify what he has sworn to; 1 Mer. 130.

RE-EXCHANGE. The expense incurred by a bill being dishonored in a foreign country where it is made payable and returned to that country in which it was made or indorsed and there taken up. 11 East 265; 2 Campb. 65. 1 Pars. Notes & B. 648. See Danl. Neg. Inst. 1445.

The loss resulting from the dishonor of a bill of exchange in a country different from that in which it was drawn or indorsed.

It is ascertained by proof of the sum for which a sight bill (drawn at the time and place of dishonor at the then rate of exchange at the place where the drawer or indorser sought to be charged resides) must be drawn in order to realize at the place of dishonor the amount of the dishonored bill and the expenses consequent on its dishonor. The holder may draw a sight bill for such sum on either the drawer or one of the indorsers. Such bill is a "redraft"; Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 221. See L. R. 3 App. Cas. 146; Byles, Bills 444.

The drawer of a bill is liable for the whole amount of re-exchange occasioned by the circuitous mode of returning the bill through the various countries in which it has been negotiated, as much as for that occasioned by a direct return; 11 East 265; 3 B. & P. 335. And see 10 La. 562; 24 Mo. 65; 8 Watts 545; 10 Metc. 375; 7 Cra. 500; 4 Wash. C. C. 310; 2 How. 711, 764; 3 Exch. 25; 6 Moo. P. C. 314.

In some states legislative enactments have been made which regulate damages on re-exchange. These damages are different in the several states; and this want of uniformity, if it does not create injustice, must be admitted to be a serious evil. See 23 Pa. 137; 4 Johns. 119; 4 Cal. 395; 3 Ind. 53; 8 Ohio 292; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

RE-EXTENT. A second extent on lands or tenements, on complaint that the former was partially made, etc. Cowell.

REFALO. A word composed of the three syllables re. fa. lo., for recordari facias loquelam. 2 Sell. Pr. 160; 8 Dowl. 514.

REFARE. To bereave, take away, or rob. Cowell.

REFECTION (Lat. re, again, facio, to make). In Civil Law. Reparation; re-establishment of a building. Dig. 19. 1. 6. 1.

REFEREE. A person to whom has been referred a matter in dispute, in order that he may settle it. His judgment is called an award. See ARBITRATOR; REFERENCE.

REFEREES, COURT OF. In the passage of private bills through the house of commons, the practice was adopted in 1864 of the appointment of referees on such bills, consisting of the chairman of ways and means and not less than three other persons to be appointed by the speaker. The referees were formed into one or more courts, three at least being required to constitute each court, a member in every case being chairman, but receiving no salary. The referees inquired into the proposed works, etc., and reported to the house. The committees of the house on any bill might also refer any question to the referees for their decision. It was also ordered in 1864 that the referees should decide on all petitions as to the right of the petitioner to be heard, i. e. his locus standi. A court of referees was specially constituted for the adjudication of this right, called locus standi. A series of reports of the court of referees on private bills in parliament, called Locus Standi reports, has been published since 1867.

REFERENCE. In Contracts. An agreement to submit to certain arbitrators matters in dispute between two or more parties, for their decision and judgment.

In Mercantile Law. A direction or request by a party who asks a credit to the person from whom he expects it, to call on some other person named, in order to ascertain the character or mercantile standing of the former. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

In Practice. The act of sending any matter by a court of chancery, or one exercising equitable powers, to a master or other officer, in order that he may ascertain facts and report to the court.

That part of an instrument of writing where it points to another for the matters therein contained. For the effect of such reference, see 1 Pick. 27; 15 id. 66; 17 Mass. 443; 7 Halst. 25; 14 Wend. 619; 10 Conn. 422; 3 Me. 393; 4 id. 14, 471. The thing referred to is also called a reference.

REFERENDARIUS (Lat.). An officer by whom the order of causes was laid before the Roman emperor, the desires of petitioners made known, and answers returned to them. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

A king's chancellor at the time of the conquest. 1 Social England 136. See CANCELLARIUS.

REFERENDUM (Lat.). In International Law. A note addressed by an ambassador to his government, submitting to its consideration propositions made to him touching an object over which he has no sufficient power and is without instructions. When such a proposition is made to an ambassador, he accepts it ad referendum; that is, under the condition that it shall be acted upon by his government, to which it is referred.

In Municipal Law. The submission of a proposed law to the voting citizens of a country for their ratification or rejection. A mode of appealing from an elected body to the whole body of voters.

The laws are first passed upon by the legislature and then referred to the people for their final ratification.

This method of government is supposed to have originated in Switzerland; but it has in effect been employed in the United States since the revolution, in country, city, township, and school district governments, especially in New England. It has also, during the same time, been the practice in the United States for new state constitutions to be submitted to popular vote after they have been prepared by a convention of delegates elected by the people.

The referendum has been introduced in some local communities in Belgium, and is advocated by some of the minor political parties in the United States and in England. The system of submitting liquor laws to the decision of the people concerned, which has long been practised in the United States, is steadily extending and is usually held to be constitutional by the courts; 42 Conn. 364; 54 Ga. 317; 8 La. Ann. 341; 108 Mass. 27; 4 Cal. 385; 72 Pa. 491; 7 Cra. 382.

A correlative of the referendum is known as the initiative, which is an authority given to the people to propose legislation.

An act has recently been passed in Nebraska which enables the voters of cities and towns to adopt the referendum and also the initiative under the following principles: Fifteen per cent. of the voters may propose ordinances by petition, and twenty per cent. of the voters may compel the city council and mayor to submit proposed ordinances to a popular vote. As for ordinances passed by the city council, of its own initiative, they are not to go into effect for thirty days, and if, meantime, five per cent. of the voters petition for the submission of any ordinance so passed to the people, the same must be so submitted and must receive the approval of a majority of the voters before going into effect. A petition from ten per cent. of the voters obliges the city government to submit the proposed ordinance at a special election held within twenty days. Only ordinances relating to the immediate preservation of the public peace and health, and items of appropriations for current expenditures, are excepted from the provisions of the referendum law. 56 Alb. L. J. 33.

See Oberholtzer, The Referendum in America; LOCAL OPTION; DELEGATION; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

REFORM. To reorganize; to rearrange. Thus, the jury "shall be reformed by putting to and taking out of the persons so impannelled." Stat. 3 Hen. VIII. c. 12; Bacon, Abr. Juries (A).

To reform an instrument in equity is to make a decree that a deed or other agreement shall be made or construed as it was originally intended by the parties, when an error or mistake as to a fact has been committed. A contract has been reformed although the party applying to the court was in the legal profession and he himself drew the contract, it appearing clear that it was framed so as to admit of a construction inconsistent with the true agreement of the parties; 1 S. & S. 210; 3 Russ. 424. But a contract will not be reformed in consequence of an error of law; see 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 109; 1 Russ. & M. 418; 1 Chitty, Pr. 124; 159 Pa. 531; nor unless the mistake is mutual; 49 Mo. App. 255; see 142 U. S. 417; and only as between the original parties, or those claiming under them in priority, including purchasers with notice; 81 Me. 525. Equity will not reform instruments which express an intention of the parties at the time they are made, based on the knowledge then possessed by them, though their intention would have been different if they had been better informed; 69 Miss. 891.

A person who seeks to rectify a deed on the ground of mistake must establish in the clearest and most satisfactory manner, that the alleged intention to which he desires it to be made conformable continued concurrently in the minds of all the parties down to the time of its execution; and also must be able to show exactly and precisely the form to which the deed ought to be brought; 4 De G. & J. 265; 68 Hun 299; 16 Or. 412; 142 U. S. 417. See 50 Ark. 179; 31 Fla. 73; 78 Hun 462. Before commencing an action to reform a deed a demand must be made on the grantee: 133 Ind. 19; 77 id. 74. Where the mistake has been on one side only, the utmost that the party desiring relief can obtain is rescission, not reformation: Ad. Eq. 171; 14 N. H. 175. But if there is mistake on one side and fraud on the other, there is a case for reformation; 44 N. Y. 325; Bisph. Eq. § 469; 142 U. S. 417.

A lease will not be reformed in equity, so as to make it conform to another lease, where both leases have the same legal effect, as judicially construed; 159 Pa. 350.

Where a deed does not express the intention of the parties at the time of its execution, equity will afford relief and decree a reformation; 39 U. S. App. 162.

A clerical mistake by one party at the time of executing the contract, unknown to the other, for which the latter is not responsible, will be sufficient ground for such relief and decree; 80 Fed. Rep. 46.

Where a policy of insurance was issued to a receiver of property, there being a contest as to the title to the property held by the receiver, the real owner, having established his title, may have the policy reformed, or, if the intent of the parties appears on its face, no reformation is necessary in order to enable the real owner to maintain an action on it; 7 U. S. App. 325.

The correction of a written instrument for fraud or mistake in its execution requires clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence; 144 U. S. 154.

Reformation will not be decreed against bona fide purchasers for value; 15 U. S. App. 79.

Where a bid for certain public work contained an error in the amount for which it was offered to do the work, and the bidder sought to rescind his offer, it was held that equity would not reform a written contract unless a mistake is proved to be the mistake of both parties, but may rescind and cancel a contract upon the ground of a mistake of one party as to facts material to the contract; 82 Fed. Rep. 255.

See MISTAKE.

REFORMATORY. An institution or place in which efforts are made, either to cultivate the intellect or instruct the conscience or improve the conduct where the inmates voluntarily submit themselves to its instruction or discipline or are forcibly detained therein. 49 Conn. 34. See PRISONER.

The most famous reformatory is at Elmira, New York, under the control, for years, of Z. R. Brockway. Its annual reports contain much valuable matter on the subject of criminology.

REFRESHING THE MEMORY. To revive the knowledge of a subject by having a reference to something connected with it.

In the ascertainment of facts of which judges are bound to take judicial notice, as in the decision of matters of law which it is their office to know, they may refresh their memory and inform their conscience from such sources as they deem most trustworthy; 137 U. S. 216; Gresley, Eq. Ev. pt. 3, c. 1; 17 How. 557; 91 U. S. 37; 61 Me. 178.

As to witnesses, see MEMORANDUM.

REFUND. To pay back by the party who has received it, to the party who has paid it, money which ought not to have been paid.

On a deficiency of assets, executors and administrators cum testamento annexo are entitled to have refunded to them legacies which they may have paid, or so much as may be necessary to pay the debts of the testator; and in order to insure this they are generally authorized to require a refunding bond. See Bac. Abr. Legacies (H).

REFUNDING BOND. See REFUND.

REFUSAL. The act of declining to receive or to do something.

A grantee may refuse a title, see ASSENT; one appointed executor may refuse to act as such. In some cases, a neglect to perform a duty which the party is required by law or his agreement to do will amount to a refusal.

The word is often used to indicate an option: as, the refusal of a house. See OFFER; CONTRACT.

REFUSE. To deny a request or demand. 113 Ind. 206.

REFUSE MATTER. That which is in fact noisome and has been refused or rejected by the owner as worthless. 68 Conn. 101.

REGALIA. A privilege, prerogative, or right of property pertaining to a sovereign. The regalia includes the power of judicature of life and death, of war and peace, of masterless goods as estrays; of assessments, and of minting money.

In England the term was sometimes applied to things, as the crown and sceptre, etc., and sometimes to the dignity, power, and pecuniary rights of the king. The term differs from sovereignty as being applicable to both things and to rights to things, and also as not being inherent in or inseparable from the sovereign power, for regalia may be alienated, either with or without the consent of parliament. 1 Hall. Int. Law 150.

Upon the breaking up of the Roman Empire, the princes and cities which declared themselves independent appropriated to themselves those parts in which nature, most rich and liberal, yields extraordinary products. These portions or reserved rights were called regalia. Id.

REGARD, COURT OF. See COURT OF REGARD.

REGARDANT (French, regardant, seeing or vigilant). A villein regardant was one who had the charge to do all base services within the manor, and to see the same freed of annoyances. Co. Litt. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 93.

REGE INCONSULTO. A writ issued from the sovereign to the judges not to proceed in a cause which may prejudice the crown, until advised. Jenk. Cent. 97.

REGENCY. The authority of the person in monarchical countries invested with the right of governing the state, in the name of the monarch, during his minority, absence, sickness, or other inability.

REGENT. A ruler; a governor. The term is usually applied to one who governs a regency, or rules in the place of another.

In the canon law, it signifies a master or professor of a college. Dict. du Dr. Can.

It sometimes means simply a ruler, director, or superintendent; as in New York, where the board who have the superintendence of all the colleges, academies, and schools are called the regents of the University of the state of New York.

REGIAM MAJESTATEM (Lat.). An ancient book purporting to contain the law of Scotland, and said to have been compiled by king David, who reigned 1124–1153. It is not part of the law of Scotland, though it was ordered to be revised with other ancient laws of Scotland by parliaments of 1405 and 1407. Stair, Inst. 12, 508. So Craig, Inst. 1. 8. 11; Scott, Border Antiq. prose works 7, 30; but Erskine, Inst. b. 1, tit. 1, § 13, and Ross 60, maintain its authenticity. It is cited in some modern Scotch cases. 2 Swint. 409; 3 Bell, Hou. L. It is, according to Dr. Robertson, a servile copy of Glanville. Robertson, Hist. Charles V. 262.

REGICIDE (Lat. rex, king, cædere, to kill, slay). The killing of a king, and, by extension, of a queen. Théorie des Lois Criminelles, vol. 1, p. 300.

REGIDOR. In Spanish Law. One of a body, never exceeding twelve, who formed a part of the ayuntamiento, or municipal council, in every capital of a jurisdiction in the colonies of the Indies. The office of a regidor was held for life; that is to say, during the pleasure of the supreme authority. In most places the office was purchased; in some cities, however, they were elected by persons of the district, called capitulares. 12 Pet. 442, note.

REGIME DOTAL. See DOTAL PROPERTY.

REGIMIENTO. In Spanish Law. The body of regidores, who never exceeded twelve, forming a part of the municipal council, or ayuntamiento, in every capital of a jurisdiction. 12 Pet. 442, note.

REGIO ASSENSU. A writ whereby the sovereign gives his assent to the election of a bishop. Reg. Orig. 294.

REGISTER. A book containing a record of facts as they occur, kept by public authority; a register of births, marriages, and burials.

In England, where there is a state church, which has authority to legislate with respect to parish records, parish records are by law invested with the characteristics of public records: 1 Salk. 281; Stark. Ev., 4th ed. 299. But in the United States where there is no religion established by law, church registers, in the absence of statutory provisions, are not regarded as public records; 10 Allen 161; 16 Mo. 24; 47 id. 521; 12 How. 472.

Entries in the baptismal register of a church, made by a clergyman in the regular discharge of his duties, are admissible in evidence after his death, though there is no law requiring such records to be kept. Ordinarily such entries are admissible only for the purpose of proving the fact and date of baptism, and not of other matters therein stated, such as the date of the birth of the child; 52 Md. 708; 92 Mass. 161; 3 Wall. 175.

These registers, when admissible, are not, in general, evidence of any fact not required to be recorded in them; 37 Kan. 298; 47 Mo. 521; 51 Hun 639; 61 Mich. 471; 8 Me. 75; 3 Wall. 175. They have sometimes been admitted in evidence as being made by a third person in the discharge of an official duty; 92 Mass. 161; 115 Mass. 167; 52 Md. 708; 3 Wall. 75. See DECLARATIONS.

Statutes have been enacted in several states which give to such records, in a measure, their common-law importance. See 5 Pet. 475; 74 Wis. 349; 37 Kan. 298; 47 Md. 521; 133 Mass. 242.

In Pennsylvania, the registry of births, etc., made by any religious society in the state is evidence, by act of assembly, but it must be proved as at common law; 6 Binn. 416. A copy of the register of births and deaths of the Society of Friends in England, proved before the lord mayor of London by an ex parte affidavit, was allowed to be given in evidence to prove the death of a person; 1 Dall. 2; and a copy of a parish register in Barbadoes, certified to be a true copy by the rector, proved by the oath of a witness, taken before the deputy secretary of the island and notary public, under his hand and seal, was held admissible to prove pedigree, the handwriting and office of the secretary being proved; 10 S. & R. 383. In North Carolina, a parish register of births, marriages, and deaths, kept pursuant to the statute of that state, is evidence of pedigree: 2 Murph. 47. In Connecticut, a parish register has been received in evidence; 2 Root 99. See 15 Johns. 226; 1 Phill. Ev. 305; 1 Curt. 755; 6 Eccl. 452.

The certificate of registry granted to the person or persons entitled thereto, by the collector of the district, comprehending the port to which any ship or vessel shall belong; more properly, the registry itself. For the form, requisites, etc., of certificate of registry, see Acts of Cong. Dec. 31, 1792, 1 Stat. at L. 287, § 9; May 6, 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 69, § 4; Desty, Com. & Nav. § 4155; 3 Kent 141. See 1 Cra. 158; 9 Pet. 682; 19 How. 76; 3 Wheat. 601; 1 Newb. 309; 1 Wash. C. C. 125; 1 Mas. 306; 1 Blatch. & H. 52.

REGISTER, REGISTRAR. An officer authorized by law to keep a record called a register or registry: as, the register for the probate of wills.

REGISTER GENERAL. An officer appointed by the sovereign of England to whom, subject to such regulations as shall be made by a principal secretary of state, the general superintendence of the whole system of registration of births, deaths, and marriages is entrusted. 3 Steph. Com. 234.

REGISTER OF SHIPS. A register kept by the collectors of customs, in which the names, ownership, and other facts relative to the merchant vessels are required by law to be entered. The register is evidence of the nationality and privileges of an American ship. Rap. & L. Law Dict.

The purpose of a registry is to declare the nationality of a vessel engaged in trade with foreign nations, and to enable her to assert that nationality wherever found ; 3 Wall. 566.

A certificate of a vessel's registry and proof that she carried the flag of the United States establish a prima facie case of proper registry under the laws of the United States, and of the nationality of the vessel and its owners ; 154 U. S. 134.

REGISTER OF WRITS. A book preserved in the English court of chancery, in which were entered, from time to time, all forms of writs once issued. Stat. Westm. 2, c. 25.

It is spoken of as one of the most ancient books of the common law. Co. Litt. 159 ; Co. 4th Inst. 150 ; 8 Co. Pref. ; 3 Shars. Bla. Com. 183*. It was first printed and published in the reign of Hen. VIII. This book is still an authority, as containing, in general, an accurate transcript of the forms of all writs as then framed, and as they ought still to be framed in modern practice,

But many of the writs now in use are not contained in it. And a variation from the register is not conclusive against the propriety of a form, if other sufficient authority can be adduced to prove its correctness. Steph. Pl. 7, 8.

REGISTERED BOND. One whose negotiability is temporarily withdrawn by a writing thereon that it belongs to a specific person, and by a registry to that effect at a specified office. Cook, St. & Stockh. § 15.

REGISTERED LETTER. A letter is not registered so as to complete service of notice by registered letter until it is numbered as required by the postal laws, although the postmaster has received it properly addressed and given a receipt therefor. 34 L. R. A. (Ia.) 466. A registered letter must be delivered by the carrier to the person to whom it is addressed ; 4 id. (Neb.) 457.

REGISTER'S COURT. In American Law. A court in the state of Pennsylvania which had jurisdiction in matters of probate.

REGISTRARIUS (Lat.). An ancient name given to a notary. In England this name is confined to designate the officer of some court the records or archives of which are in his custody.

REGISTRATION. The word "registration," used in the U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2011, has a general, not a technical, meaning, and indicates any list or schedule containing a list of voters, the being upon which constitutes a prerequisite to vote, unless there is a system of registration described by act of congress, and applied by the act as the only registration of voters under the law. The Delaware assessment lists, made primarily by the assessors of the different hundreds, and completed by the levy courts of the different counties, are such lists, though they contain not only a list of voters, but of other persons besides. The registration of voters intended by the act of congress need not be conclusive evidence that the person registered is qualified to vote ; 1 Fed. Rep. 1. This decision was prior to the existence in Delaware of a registration act eo nomine.

In the United States circuit court for South Carolina it was held that the registration laws of that state were null and void as being an unreasonable restriction of the right of suffrage, evidently intended to exclude ignorant persons, especially of the African race, and a violation both of the constitution of the state and of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the constitution of the United States ; 67 Fed. Rep. 818. In that case it appeared that in 1882 an act was passed providing that in that year a registration of voters should be made and the books closed to be opened thereafter once a month after the general election in each year until the first of July preceding the general election in November following ; but that after the closing of the books each year persons coming of age before election might be registered. Voters receive certificates of registration which must be produced in order to vote and were transferred under different conditions upon removal into another county.

The registration of voters under the Delaware act was held to be so far judicial and not ministerial that a mandamus was refused to restore to the voting list the name of a person stricken off by the board of registration ; 1 Marvel 450.

A land registration act went into effect in Massachusetts October 1, 1898. It provides for a court of registration consisting of two judges sitting in Boston, with a right to adjourn to such other place as convenience may require. Examiners of title may be appointed by the judge of registration in each county. Only estates in fee simple can be registered. The act provides for the form of application and the form of notice to be given to the occupants of the land and to adjoining owners, which may be given by mail and by publication. The decree of the court confirming title and ordering registration binds the land and quiets the title thereto. It cannot be opened except within one year in case the registration is obtained by fraud, and not for that reason if an innocent purchaser for value has acquired an interest. The decree is registered in the county. A certificate of registration constitutes the owner's evidence of title. After registration the owner may convey it, etc., as at present, but no voluntary instrument of transfer except a will and a lease for not over seven years binds the land, but operates only as a contract between the parties and as authority for registration. Upon re-registration this certificate is surrendered and a new one issued. The act was drawn by Alfred Hemenway, under an appointment by act of 1897.

See LAND TRANSFER; TORRENS SYSTEM.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS. In most states acts have been passed requiring physicians, clergymen, etc., to register all such events with the proper county officer. The validity of these laws has been sustained under the police power; 14 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 202. See REGISTER.

REGISTRUM BREVIUM (Lat.). The name of an ancient book which was a collection of writs. See REGISTER OF WRITS.

REGISTRY. A book, authorized by law, in which writings are registered or recorded.

REGNAL YEARS. The years in which a sovereign has reigned.

The following table of the reigns of English and British kings and queens is added, to assist the student in many points of chronology:—

REGNANT. One having authority as a king; one in the exercise of royal authority.

REGRATING. In Criminal Law. Every practice or device, by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other merchandise, is so denominated. Co. 3d Inst. 196; 1 Russell, Cr. 169. Whart. Cr. Law 1849. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

REGULA. See MAXIMS.

REGULAR CLERGY. Monks who lived according to the rules of their respective houses or societies, in contradistinction to the parochial clergy, who did their duties "in seculo," and hence were called secular clergy. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 387, n.

REGULAR PROCESS. Regular process is that which has been lawfully issued by a court or magistrate having competent jurisdiction.

When the process is regular, and the defendant has been damnified, as in the case of a malicious arrest, his remedy is by an action on the case, and not trespass; when it is irregular the remedy is by action of trespass.

If the process be wholly illegal or misapplied as to the person intended to be arrested, without regard to any question of fact, or whether innocent or guilty, or the existence of any debt, then the party imprisoned may legally resist the arrest and imprisonment, and may escape, be rescued, or even break prison; but if the process and imprisonment were in form legal, each of these acts would be punishable, however innocent the defendant might be, for he ought to submit to legal process and obtain his release by due course of law; 1 Chitty, Pr. 637; 5 East 304, 308; 2 Wils. 47; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 310. See ESCAPE; ARREST; ASSAULT; FALSE IMPRISONMENT; MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

* References in legal works to reign of Mary couple the name of Philip, her husband, with her.

† The Restoration of Charles II. did not take place till 1660, but the regnal year of his reign is always computed from the death of Charles I., disregarding the Commonwealth.

REGULATE. To adjust by rule, method, or established mode; to direct by rule or restriction; to subject to governing principles or laws. 16 Neb. 688.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE. It is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed, that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine when it shall be free and when subject to duties or other exactions. The power also embraces within its control all the instrumentalities by which that commerce may be carried on, and the means by which it may be aided and encouraged. 114 U. S. 203. As used in the constitution, transportation being essential to commerce, every obstacle to it, or burden laid upon it, by legislative authority, is regulation; 95 U. S. 470; 109 N. C. 279. See COMMERCE.

REHABERE FACIAS SEISINAM (Lat. do you cause to regain seisin). When a sheriff in the "habere facias seisinam" had delivered seisin of more than he ought, this judicial writ lay to make him restore seisin of the excess. Reg. Jud. 13, 51, 54.

REHABILITATION. The act by which a man is restored to his former ability, of which he had been deprived by a conviction, sentence, or judgment of a competent tribunal.

REHEARING. A second consideration which the court gave to a cause on a second argument.

In England a case heard by the Chancellor on appeal from the Master of the Rolls, etc., is a rehearing; 1 W. & M. 21.

A rehearing cannot be granted by the supreme court after the record has been remitted to the court below; 7 Wheat. 58.

Where any judge, who concurred in the decision, thinks proper to have a rehearing, the motion for one will be considered, otherwise it will be denied as of course; 16 U. S. App. 718.

Where the grounds for a rehearing were not brought to the attention of the court at the argument or by brief, permission to reargue will be granted only in extreme cases; 21 U. S. App. 426; and not where the questions have already been fully considered; 27 U. S. App. 290; and not when the ground was not overlooked at the former trial: 34 U. S. App. 45. That a judgment of affirmance was by an equal decision of the judges merely, affords no ground for granting a rehearing; 25 Wend. 256. See PRECEDENT.

The practice in the federal courts is to file a petition for a rehearing which, with the argument in its support, is submitted, without oral argument, for the consideration of the court, which decides whether to have the case reargued or not.

In the federal courts a petition for rehearing must be signed by counsel, and the accompanying affidavits should, by distinct and positive allegation, be made a part of the petition. Neither the petition nor affidavits should be verified before a notary public who is also counsel for petitioner; 85 Fed. Rep. 481.

When a motion for a new trial of an action at law and a petition for rehearing have been denied, equity will not entertain a bill to set the judgment aside on the same grounds alleged in the motion and petition; id. 508.

The refusal of the circuit court to grant a rehearing is not the subject of review; 113 U. S. 697.

Courts, especially in cases of general interest, order a reargument where they are in doubt or where the case was not argued before a full bench. In 71 Pa. 81, eminent counsel not connected with the cause petitioned the court for a reargument on the ground that the judgment was not well considered and that it would unsettle titles to real estate. A reargument was ordered and the former decision was reversed. See REOPENING CASE.

REHYPOTHECATION. See PLEDGE.

REI INTERVENTUS (Lat.). When a party is imperfectly bound in an obligation, he may, in general, annul such imperfect obligation; but when he has permitted the opposite party to act as if his obligation or agreement were complete, such things have intervened as to deprive him of the right to rescind such obligation: these circumstances are the rei interventus; 1 Bell, Com., 5th ed. 328, 329; Burton, Man. 128.

REIMBURSE. To pay back. 83 Pa. 264.

REINSCRIPTION. The law of Louisiana requires a mortgage to be periodically reinscribed in order to preserve its priority. When ten years have elapsed from the date of inscription without reinscription the mortgage is without effect as to all persons whatsoever who are not parties to it; 29 La. Ann. 315. A failure to reinscribe a mortgage within the statutory limits is not remedied or supplied by the pendency of a suit to foreclose it; 30 La. Ann. 1. See 103 U. S. 281; 34 La. Ann. 797; 149 U. S. 505; MORTGAGE.

REINSTATE. To restore to a state from which one has been removed. 86 Ky. 190.

REINSTATEMENT. This term in the law of insurance implies placing the insured in the same condition that he occupied and sustained towards the insurer next before the forfeiture was incurred, and does not imply reinsurance or the making of a new contract or policy of insurance. 110 N. C. 93.

REINSURANCE. Insurance effected by an underwriter upon a subject against certain risks, with another underwriter, on the same subject, against all or a part of the same risks, not exceeding the same amount. In the original insurance, he is the insurer; in the second, the assured. His object in reinsurance is to protect himself against the risks which he has assumed. There is no privity of contract between the original assured and the reinsurer, and the reinsurer is under no liability to such original assured; 3 Kent 227; 1 Phill. Ins. § 78 a, 404; 20 Barb. 468; 23 Pa. 250; 9 Ind. 443; 13 La. Ann. 246. See Beach, Ins. 1283; Pars. Mari. Ins. 301.

In the absence of any usage to the contrary, and of any specific stipulation in the policy, the original insurer may protect himself by reinsurance to the whole extent of his liability; 140 U. S. 565.

REISSUABLE NOTES. Bank-notes which, after having been once paid, may again be put into circulation.

They cannot properly be called valuable securities while in the hands of the maker, but in an indictment may properly be called goods and chattels; Ry. & M. 218. See 5 Mas. 537; 2 Russ. Cr. 147. And such notes would fall within the description of promissory notes; 2 Leach 1090, 1093.

REISSUE; REISSUED PATENT. See PATENT.

REJOINDER. In Pleading. The defendant's answer to the plaintiff's replication. Andr. Steph. Pl. 151.

It must conform to the plea; 16 Mass. 1; 2 Mod. 348; be triable, certain, direct, and positive, and not by way of recital, or argumentative; 1 H. & M'H. 159; must answer every material averment of the declaration; 23 N. H. 198. It must not be double; 6 Blackf. 421; 3 McLean 163; and there may not be several rejoinders to the same replication; 1 How. Miss. 139; 1 Wms. Saund. 337, n.; nor repugnant or insensible. See Co. Litt. 394; Archb. Civ. Pl. 278; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (H).

REJOINING GRATIS. Rejoining within four days from the delivery of the replication, without a notice to rejoin or demand of rejoinder. 1 Archb. Pr. 280, 317; 10 M. & W. 12. But judgment cannot be signed without demanding; 3 Dowl. 537.

RELATION (Lat. re, back, fero, to bear). In Civil Law. The report which the judges made of the proceedings in certain suits to the prince were so called.

These relations took place when the judge had no law to direct him, or when the laws were susceptible of difficulties; it was then referred to the prince, who was the author of the law, to give the interpretation. They were made in writing, and contained the pleadings of the parties and all the proceedings, together with the judge's opinion, and prayed the emperor to order what should be done. This ordinance of the prince thus required was called a rescript. Their use was abolished by Justinian, Nov. 125.

In Contracts. When an act is done at one time, and it operates upon the thing as if done at another time, it is said to do so by relation: as, if a man deliver a deed as an escrow, to be delivered, by the party holding it, to the grantor, on the performance of some act, the delivery to the latter will have relation back to the first delivery. Termes de la Ley. Again, if a partner be adjudged a bankrupt, the partnership is dissolved, and such dissolution relates back to the time when the commission issued; 3 Kent 33. See Litt. 462; 2 Johns. 510; 15 id. 309; 2 Harr. & J. 151; FICTION.

RELATIONS. A term which, in its widest sense, includes all the kindred of the person spoken of. It has long been settled that in the construction of wills it includes those persons who are entitled as next of kin under the statute of distribution; 2 Jarm. Wills 661; 54 Me. 291; L. R. 20 Eq. 410; [1894] 3 Ch. 565; 132 N. Y. 338; in the interpretation of a statute, the term was held not to include a stepson; 108 Mass. 382; or a wife; 101 id. 36; 10 Wash. 533; or a brother-in-law; 162 Mass. 448.

A legacy to "relations" generally, or to "relations by blood or marriage," without enumerating any of them, will, therefore, entitle to a share such of the testator's relatives as would be entitled under the statute of distributions in the event of intestacy; 1 Madd. 45; 1 Bro. C. C. 33. The same rule extends to devises of real estate; 1 Taunt. 263. See LEGACY; KINDRED.

Relations to either of the parties, even beyond the ninth degree, have been holden incapable to serve on juries; 3 Chitty, Pr. 795, note c. As to the disqualification of a judge by reason of relationship, see JUDGE. Relationship or affinity is no objection to a witness, unless in the case of husband and wife. See WITNESS.

RELATIVE. See RELATIONS.

RELATIVE FACT. A fact having relation to another fact; a minor fact; a circumstance. Burril, Circ. Ev. 121. See RELEVANCY.

RELATIVE POWERS. Those which relate to land; so called to distinguish them from those which are collateral to it.

These powers are appendant: as, where a tenant for life has a power of making leases in possession. They are in gross when a person has an estate in the land, with a power of appointment, the execution of which falls out of the compass of his estate, but notwithstanding, is annexed in privity to it, and takes effect in the appointee out of an interest appointed in the appointer. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1930.

RELATIVE RIGHTS. Those to which a person is entitled in consequence of his relation with others; such as the rights of a husband in relation to his wife; of a father as to his children; of a master as to his servant; of a guardian as to his ward.

In general, the superior may maintain an action for an injury committed against his relative rights. See 2 Bouvier, Inst. nn. 2277–2296; 3 id. n. 3401; 4 id. nn. 3615–3618; ACTION.

RELATOR. A rehearser or teller. One who, by leave of court, brings an information in the nature of a quo warranto.

At common law, strictly speaking, no such person as a relator to an information is known, he being a creature of the statute of Anne, c. 20. In this country, even where no statute similar to that of Anne prevails, informations are allowed to be filed by private persons desirous to try their rights, in the name of the attorney-general, and these are commonly called relators; though no judgment for costs can be rendered for or against them; 5 Mass. 231; 3 S. & R. 52; 15 id. 127; Ang. Corp. 470. In chancery, the relator is responsible for costs; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4022.

RELAXATION, LETTERS OF. Letters which a debtor might procure and which had the effect to restore him to his former state. Ersk. Prin. 156.

RELEASE. The giving up or abandoning a claim or right to the person against whom the claim exists or the right is to be exercised or enforced.

Releases may either give up, discharge, or abandon a right of action, or convey a man's interest or right to another who has possession of it or some estate in the same. Shepp. Touchst. 320; Littleton 444; Bac. Abr.; Viner, Abr.; Rolle, Abr. In the former class a mere right is surrendered; in the other not only a right is given up, but an interest in the estate is conveyed and becomes vested in the release.

An express release is one directly made in terms by deed or other suitable means.

An implied release is one which arises from acts of the creditor or owner, without any express agreement. See Pothier, Obl. nn. 608, 609.

A release by operation of law is one which, though not expressly made, the law presumes in consequence of some act of the releasor; for instance, when one of several joint obligors is expressly released, the others are also released by operation of law; 3 Salk. 298; Hob. 10, 66; 4 Mod. 380; 7 Johns. 207.

Releases of claims which constitute a cause of action acquit the releasee, and remove incompetency as a witness resulting from interest.

Littleton says a release of all demands is the best and strongest release; sect. 508. Lord Coke, on the contrary, says claims is a stronger word; Co. Litt. 291 b.

In general, the words of a release will be restrained by the particular occasion of giving it; 1 Lev. 235; T. Raym. 399. It cannot apply to circumstances of which the party had no knowledge at the time he executed it; and if it be so general as to include matters never contemplated, the party will be entitled to relief; 6 H. & N. 347.

The general words in a release are limited always to the things which were in the contemplation of the parties when the release was given; L. R. 4 H. L. 623.

The word release in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, requiring creditors accepting its terms to execute releases of their claims, was held to include any instrument sufficient to secure the absolute discharge of the debtor as to creditors accepting the terms of the assignment; 17 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 56. See PREFERENCE.

The reader is referred to the following cases where a construction has been given to the expressions mentioned. A release of "all actions, suits, and demands;" 3 Mod. 277; "all actions, debts, duties, and demands;" id. 1, 64; 8 Co. 150 b; 2 Saund. 6 a; "all demands;" 5 Co. 70 b; 1 Lev. 99; Salk. 578; 2 Rolle 20; 2 Conn. 120; "all actions, quarrels, trespasses;" Dy. 2171, pl. 2; Cro. Jac. 487; "all errors, and all actions, suits, and writs of error whatsoever;" T. Raym. 399; "all suits;" 8 Co. 150; "of covenants;" 5 Co. 70 b.

Where a creditor promised to sign a release of his claim, but afterwards refuses to execute it, the debtor is not released from liability; 153 Pa. 281.

A parol agreement to release a party from liability on a note, unsupported by any consideration, cannot be enforced; 96 Ala. 454. The voluntary payment by a third person of the amount then due on a contract is a sufficient consideration to support a release of the contract; 120 U. S. 256. A release of plaintiff's cause of action, under seal and for a money consideration, is a bar to an action, though fraud in obtaining it be alleged, unless it be shown that the consideration was tendered back before the action was commenced, or that defendant was non compos mentis when he executed the release, and his mental unsoundness prevented him from understanding the transaction; 53 Fed. Rep. 569. Where it is claimed that a release is not effective because of the mental condition of the person who signed it, it raises a question of fact for the jury, as where in an action against a railroad company for injury by reason of negligence, a written release of damages was set up in bar of the action, it was held to be for the jury to say whether he executed it under the influence of great suffering through his injury and in a state approaching unconsciousness caused thereby and by the use of morphine; 158 U. S. 326.

Where one has a right of action against two or more, and covenants with one of them not to sue him, it does not operate as a release of the others, though an express release to him would have that effect; 6 Taunt. 289; L. R. 8 Ex. 81; 4 Ch. App. 208.

A release by a witness where he has an interest in the matter which is the subject of the suit, or release by the party on whose side he is interested, renders him competent; 1 Phill. Ev. 102, and the cases cited in n. a. See Chitty, Bail. 329; 1 Dowl. & R. 361.

The release of one of the joint makers of a note constitutes a release of the other also; 37 W. Va. 15; 17 Mass. 581; but a covenant not to sue one of two joint tort feasors does not operate as a release of the other from liability; [1892] 2 Q. B. 511.

In Estates. The conveyance of a man's interest or right which he hath unto a thing to another that hath the possession thereof or some estate therein. Shepp. Touchst. 320. The relinquishment of some right or benefit to a person who has already some interest in the tenement, and such interest as qualifies him for receiving or availing himself of the right or benefit so relinquished. Burton, R. P. 15*.

The words generally used in such conveyance are "remised, released, and forever quit-claimed." Littleton § 445.

Releases of land are, in respect of their operation, divided into five sorts: releases that enure by way of passing the estate, or mitter l'estate (q. v.), e. g. a release by joint-tenant to co-joint-tenant, which conveyance will pass a fee without words of limitation. Releases that enure by way of passing the right, or mitter le droit, e. g. by disseisee to disseisor. Releases that enure by enlargement of the estate. A release to the tenant in possession, by him who hath the reversion or inheritance, is said to enlarge his estate and to be equal to an entry and feoffment and to amount to a grant and attornment. The law requires privity of estate, that the releasor have a right, and the releasee such a possession as will make him capable of taking an estate; Bac. Abr. Release (C) 4.

Releases that enure by way of extinguishment: e. g. a lord releasing his seignorial rights to his tenant.

Releases that enure by way of feoffment and entry: e. g. if there are two disseisors, a release to one will give him a sole estate, as if the disseisee had regained seisin by entry and enfeoffed him. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 325*. See 4 Cruise, Dig. 71; Gilb. Ten. 82; Co. Litt. 264; 8 Brock. 185; 2 Sumn. 487; 8 Pick. 143; 5 Harr. & J. 158; 2 N. H. 402; 10 Johns. 456.

The technicalities of English law as to releases are not generally applicable in the United States. The corresponding conveyance is a quit-claim deed. 21 Ala. N. S. 125.

RELEASEE. A person to whom a release is made.

RELEASOR. He who makes a release.

RELEGATIO (Lat.). A kind of banishment known to the civil law, which did not take away the rights of citizenship, which deportatio did.

Some say that relegatio was temporary, deportatio perpetual; that relegatio did not take away the property of the exile, and that deportatio did: but these distinctions do not seem always to exist. There was one sort of relegatio for slaves, viz. in agros; another for freemen, viz. in provincias. Relegatio only exiled from certain limits; deportatio confined to a particular place (locus pœnæ). Calvinus, Lex.

RELEGATION. The temporary banishment or exile by special act of parliament. Co. Litt. 133 a.

RELEVANCY. Applicability to the issue joined. That quality of evidence which renders it properly applicable in determining the truth and falsity of the matters in issue between the parties to a suit. See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49. Two facts are said to be relevant to each other when so related "that according to the common course of events, one either taken by itself or in connection with other facts, proves or renders probable the past, present, or future existence or non-existence of the other." Steph. Dig. Ev. art. 1. This is relevancy in a logical sense. Legal relevancy requires a higher standard of evidentiary force. It includes logical relevancy and demands a close connection between the fact to be proved and the fact offered to prove it. The fact, however, that it is logically relevant does not insure admissibility; it must also be legally relevant; 92 U. S. 281; it is, however, the tendency of modern jurisprudence to admit most evidence logically relevant. Chamb. Best. Ev. 251, n.

RELICTA VERIFICATIONE (Lat. his pleading being abandoned).

In Pleading. A confession of judgment made after plea pleaded: viz. a cognovit actionem accompanied by a withdrawal of the plea.

RELICTION (Lat. relinquo, to leave behind). An increase of the land by the retreat or recession of the sea or a river.

Where the sea cut off the sea front of the main land between certain points and afterwards a beach was reformed outside the main land, and divided from it by a bay of navigable water, it was held that the title to the new formation was in the owners of the part cut off. 61 How. Pr. 197.

See AVULSION; ALLUVION; LAKE; RIVER; WATERS.

RELIEF. A sum payable by a new tenant, the duty being incident to every feudal tenure, by way of fine or composition with the lord for taking up the estate which was lapsed or fallen in by the death of the last tenant. At one time the amount was arbitrary; but afterwards the relief of a knight's fee became fixed at one hundred shillings. 2 Bla. Com. 65.

RELIEF ASSOCIATION. See RAILROAD RELIEF.

RELIGION (Lat. re, back, ligo, to bind). Real piety in practice, consisting in the performance of all known duties to God and our fellow-men. It has been held to include the principle of gratitude to an active power who can confer blessings. 38 L. J. M. C. 5.

The constitution of the United States provides that "congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." See Story, Const. 1870; Miller, Const. 645. Congress cannot pass a law for the government of a territory which prohibits the free exercise of religion; 98 U. S. 162; religion is not defined in the constitution, its meaning there must be ascertained elsewhere. Jefferson was the leader of the movement for placing this clause in the constitution; id. See 12 Hening's Stat. 84; 1 Jeff. Works 45, 79; 2 id. 355; 8 id. 113. This provision and that relating to religious tests (q. v.) are limitations upon the power of congress only; Cooley, Const. 205; perhaps the fourteenth amendment may give additional securities if needful; id. By establishment of religion is meant the setting up of a state church, or at least the conferring upon one church of special favors which are denied to others; 1 Tuck. Bla. Com. App. 296; 2 id. App. n. G. The Christian religion is, of course, recognized by the government, yet not so as to draw invidious distinctions between different religious beliefs, etc.; Cooley, Const. 206. With the exception of these provisions, the preservation of religious liberty is left to the states. The various state guarantees have been summed up by Judge Cooley, who says that under American constitutions the following things are unlawful: 1. Any law respecting the establishment of religion. 2. Compulsory support by taxation or otherwise of religious instruction. 3. Compulsory attendance upon religious worship. 4. Restraints upon the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience. 5. Restraints upon the expression of religious belief. Const. Lim. 575.

The constitutions of most of the states forbid any religious test for holding office; but those of Arkansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Texas provide that any one who denies the existence of God is ineligible to office. In Maryland, Kentucky, and Tennessee, by constitution, clergymen are ineligible to civil office. The constitution of New Hampshire permits the legislature to authorize the towns to make adequate provision for the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of religion.

A person's religious belief cannot be accepted as a justification for his committing an overt act, made criminal by the law of the land (polygamy); 98 U. S. 145. By the constitution "congress is deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order;" id. 164. Where the parents of a sick child omitted to call in medical attendance because of their religious belief that what they did would be effective, they were held not guilty of manslaughter; 10 Cox, Cr. Cas. 531; otherwise, if they had actively starved it to death under like religious belief; id. See 98 U. S. 167.

Where congress appropriated money for a building to be erected on the grounds of a hospital in the District of Columbia, at the discretion of the commissioners, they were restrained from placing it on the grounds of a Roman Catholic institution; 26 Wash. Law Rev. 84; s. c. 11 Harv. Law Rev. 542.

See Cooley, Const. Lim. ch. 13; 32 Am. L. Rev. 541; 29 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 273, 321; Spear, Religion and the State; 5 Revue Lég. 569; 4 Alb. L. J. 221; 10 id. 17.

See CHARITIES; CHARITABLE USES; POLYGAMY; RELIGIOUS TEST; RELIGIOUS EDUCATION; CHRISTIANITY.

RELIGIOUS BOOKS. Those which tend to promote the religion taught by the Christian dispensation, unless by associated words the meaning is so limited to show that some other form of worship is referred to. 72 Me. 500.

RELIGIOUS CORPORATION. See RELIGIOUS SOCIETY.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. Questions respecting the religious education of children arise not infrequently by reason of applications to the courts for either restraining or mandatory process intended to control the religious education of children where differences exist between the parents or where the relations of a deceased parent seek to control the direction given to the mind of the child.

Where the husband was a Roman Catholic and the wife a Protestant, and by an antenuptial agreement the children were to be brought up as Roman Catholics, but they had been educated as Protestants, and it appeared that the father gave way to drink and two girls of fifteen and eleven were before the court on the application of the father, who had reformed, to restore them to his charge and educate them at a Papist school, it was held that the children should remain at the Protestant school where they then were; [96] 1 Ch. 740.

Courts or those who have the guardianship of a child after the father's death should have a sacred regard to the religion of the father and, unless under very special circumstances, should see that the child is brought up in his religious faith; L. R. 6 Ch. 539.

Where both father and mother were Roman Catholics and, after the death of the father, a posthumous child was born, and five years after the father's death, the mother became a Protestant and, until the child was about nine years of age, educated it in that faith, the court refused to order the child to be brought up in the father's belief; 8 D. M. & G. 760.

Where no abandonment by the father is shown, the mere fact that a child will be better off or more contented under other people's care will not justify his instruction in a creed other than the father's; but when abandonment is proved, the question turns upon the welfare of the child; L. R. 8 Ch. 622. See 24 Ch. Div. 317. The pecuniary welfare of the child will be weighed together with its moral welfare, but the danger of making the former all important must be guarded against; 4 My. & Cr. 688.

The practice of the courts of having interviews with the children is discouraged as tending to encourage controversial opinions in their tender minds, and because the child is often so nervous that the court can form no useful opinion in that way; [93] 1 Ch. 143. See FATHER; INFANT.

As to reading the Bible in schools, see SCHOOLS.

RELIGIOUS IMPOSTORS. Those who falsely pretend an extraordinary commission from heaven, or terrify and abuse the people with false denunciations of judgment; punishable with fine, imprisonment, and infamous corporal punishment. 4 Br. & H. Com. 71.

RELIGIOUS MEN. Such as entered into some monastery or convent. In old English deeds, the vendee was often restrained from aliening to "Jews or religious men," lest the lands should fall into mortmain. Religious men were civilly dead. Blount.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETY. A body of persons associated together for the purpose of maintaining religious worship. In this country they are not ecclesiastical corporations in the English sense, but ordinary private, civil corporations, and as such subject to the ordinary civil jurisdiction; 13 Wall. 679; 36 N. Y. 161; 18 Vt. 511.

The religious corporation and the church are distinct bodies, independent of each other, though one may exist within the other. When a church and society are united, the society commonly owns the property and makes the pecuniary contract with the clergyman, but in many instances a society exists without a church and a church without a society; 16 Gray 329; 9 Cush. 186. Membership in the church is not ordinarily a prerequisite to membership in the corporation, and the excommunication of a member who was trustee of a religious society did not disqualify him from holding that office; 15 Wall. 131. This distinction between the church and the society has been stated by Judge Cooley, who said that the statute under consideration contemplates a church connected with the corporation, though that may not be essential. The church is not incorporated and does not control the property or the membership of the society, while the corporation has nothing to do with the church except to provide for its temporal wants; 51 Mich. 137. The unincorporated ecclesiastical body has power to control and discipline its membership, but the religious corporation has no power to try or disfranchise a corporator for moral delinquency, and in case of an attempt to do so, he has his remedy at law; 53 N. Y. 103.

Their powers, like those of other corporations, are construed with reference to the object of their corporate existence and extend so far, and so far only, as necessary to effectuate them. It has been held that a church corporation the object of whose incorporation was "the more efficient worship of God, the preservation and perpetuation of said church, and the better control and regulation of the property thereof," had no power to charter a steamboat, manage a public excursion, and sell tickets therefor, in order to raise money to pay debts of the church; 63 Ga. 186. In this case the steamboat company had refused to proceed because of an attempt to overload the boat, and it was held that no action would lie against it for breach of contract.

Where there is a dispute over the rights of contending factions of an unincorporated church to the use of the church property, an injunction will lie at the suit of the faction entitled to the property to restrain trespasses thereon by the other faction; 34 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 875.

Even where the corporation is defective, yet where land has been acquired for the use of a religious society, equity will enforce that use no matter where the legal title is vested or though it be in an individual. So the corporation itself will be compelled by the courts to administer the property upon the trusts attached to it in the grant or donation. "The corporation or society are trustees and can no more divert the property from the use to which it was originally dedicated than any other trustee. If they should undertake to divert the funds, equity will raise some other trustee to administer them and apply them according to the intention of the original donors or subscribers." Sharswood, J., in 67 Pa. 138.

The effect of church divisions upon such trusts is discussed by Mr. Justice Miller in the leading case of Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. 679. He classifies the cases under three heads. 1. Where the property is devoted to some specific form of religious doctrine. 2. Where it is held by a congregation strictly independent of ecclesiastical associations. 3. Where it is merely a subordinate member of some general church organization. Trusts of the first class are enforced in some states, but mainly in jurisdictions which sustain charitable uses. And in such case the limitation must be express and not ambiguous. Kynett, Rel. Corp. 96. Such conveyance might be sustained in New York where the trust is put in the form of a condition which can only be enforced by the grantor; id. See 21 N. Y. 267. Such trusts have been held invalid in several states: 31 Minn. 173; 41 Mich. 730; 64 Md. 333; contra, 2 W. Va. 310; 9 Kan. 592.

In the second class of cases referred to in Watson v. Jones, it was there said that the ordinary rules governing voluntary associations must be applied, and in case of schism, the right to the property must be determined by the principles regulating the government of the association. This view is said to have been uniformly adopted; Kynett, Rel. Corp. 100, and cases cited in note.

As to the third class of societies, the denominational relations are considered by the court, and it is quite settled that if the doctrines of the denomination are abandoned by the majority, they forfeit the right to retain and use the property; id. 100–104, where the cases are collected.

In questions relating to church property, the decision of ecclesiastical tribunals, while accorded great weight, are not binding upon the civil courts, but they will be respected by the latter in all matters of purely ecclesiastical concern, such as the decision of questions of faith within the association, and the government of its individual members; id. 105.

Where land was bought and the title was taken by a bishop, and money was raised by the members of his church to purchase land and build a temple, and the land was dedicated by religious services by the head of the order, and when the bishop left the state he executed a declaration of trust in favor of the church, it was held that the grant was impressed with a trust in favor of the church; 60 Fed. Rep. 937.

In some states, as Illinois, Maryland, and Massachusetts, statutes provide that the appropriate Roman Catholic archbishop shall be and may become a corporation sole.

An allegation that by the regulations of the Catholic Church the bishop of the diocese holds all its property in his own name as trustee, for its benefit, and that each priest assigned to duty is entitled to hold the bishop individually liable for his salary, is not sufficient to sustain an action for salary brought by a priest against his bishop. A trust created by the rules of a church which is not shown to be capable of making contracts, accepting benefits, and compelling performance, is not recognized by law. The courts will not take judicial notice of the nature and powers of a church, so far as its civil rights and duties are concerned, in the absence of averment or proof upon the subject. Where such a question has been submitted to an ecclesiastical tribunal in the church, its decision, adverse to the claim, is a bar to an action therefor; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1618 (C. of App. N. Y., March 1, 1898).

A bishop is not liable to a priest for his salary; both are fellow-servants of the same church; 46 Mich. 457. Those who deal with an unincorporated church must trust the performance of civil obligations to the honor and good faith of its members; 41 Mich. 737.

The decision of an ecclesiastical tribunal is conclusive as to matters of discipline; and as to property rights it is said that the courts will treat the determination of the highest tribunal in the church as controlling; 13 Wall. 679; 54 N. Y. 551.

A priest necessarily subjects his conduct, in that capacity, to the laws and customs of his church; and in that respect, when his case has been heard according to the prescribed forms, the decision of the tribunals of the church will be respected by the courts; 149 N. Y. 401, 414; 98 Pa. 213; 58 Ill. 509.

In religious bodies all matters of faith and internal government will be left to the decision of the bodies themselves; 104 Pa. 493; 42 Minn. 503; 5 Del. Ch. 573; 156 Pa. 119; 146 Ill. 428. But where these decisions violate the law of the land, or their own law; 89 Pa. 477; courts will examine them; 36 Neb. 564; after the ecclesiastical remedies have been exhausted; 58 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 884.

If property rights are involved, courts will assume jurisdiction; 162 Pa. 280; 33 N. J. L. 162; L. R. 1 Sc. & Div. App. 568; and the office of priest; 90 Pa. 477; or vestryman; 68 Cal. 248; involves a property right.

RELIGIOUS TEST. The constitution of the United States declares that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." This clause was introduced for the double purpose of satisfying the scruples of many persons who feel an invincible repugnance to any religious test or affirmation, and to cut off forever every pretence of any alliance between church and state in the national government. Story, Const. § 1841. See RELIGION.

RELIGIOUS USE. See CHARITABLE USES.

RELINQUISHMENT. In Practice. A forsaking, abandoning, or giving over a right: for example, a plaintiff may relinquish a bad count in a declaration, and proceed on a good; a man may relinquish a part of his claim in order to give a court jurisdiction.

RELIQUA. The remainder or debt left upon balancing an account.

RELOCATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A renewal of a lease on its determination on like terms as before. It may be either express or tacit; the latter is when the tenant holds over with the knowledge and without objection of the landlord. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 379.

REMAINDER. The remnant of an estate in land, depending upon a particular prior estate created at the same time and by the same instrument and limited to arise immediately on the determination of that estate and not in abridgment of it. 4 Kent 197. See Will. Real P. 282; Chall. Real P. 69.

A contingent remainder is one which is limited to an uncertain or dubious person, or which is to take effect on an event or condition which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding particular estate.

A vested remainder is one by which a present interest passes to the party, though perhaps to be enjoyed in future, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate has been spent.

There are four classes of contingent remainders. 1. Where the remainder depends on a contingent determination of the preceding estate, and it remains uncertain whether the use or estate limited in future will ever vest. 2. Where the contingency on which the remainder is to take effect is independent of the determination of the preceding estate and must precede the remainder. 3. Where the condition upon which the remainder is limited is certain in event, but the determination of the particular estate may happen before it. 4. Where the person to whom the remainder is limited is not ascertained or not in being. 4 Kent 207, quoting Fearne, Cont. Rem.

They are divided by Blackstone into two kinds. 1. Remainders limited to take effect to a dubious and uncertain person, or 2. Upon a dubious or uncertain event; and by Lord Ch. J. Willes into, 1. Where the person to whom the remainder was limited is not in esse. 2. Where the commencement of the remainder depended on some matter collateral to the determination of the particular estate; Willes 327; 4 Kent 207, and note, where the classification of Blackstone is approved.

There are exceptions to the third and fourth classes of contingent remainders, as enumerated by Fearne, as, a limitation for a long term of years with remainder over gives a vested remainder; and where one takes an estate of freehold and an immediate remainder is limited thereon in the same instrument to his heirs in fee or in tail, the remainder is immediately executed in possession and he becomes seised in fee or in tail. 4 Kent 209. See SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN.

The rule that where there is a possibility upon a possibility, the remainder is void; 2 Co. 51; is said to be obsolete; 4 Kent 206, n.; 2 H. L. Cas. 186.

See CONTINGENT REMAINDER; CROSS-REMAINDER; EXECUTORY DEVISE; LIMITATION; REVERSION.

REMAINDER-MAN. One who is entitled to the remainder of the estate after a particular estate carved out of it has expired. Will. Real P. 290.

REMAND. When a prisoner is brought before a judge on a habeas corpus, for the purpose of obtaining his liberty, the judge hears the case, and either discharges him or not: when there is cause for his detention, he remands him.

REMANDING A CAUSE. The sending it back to the same court out of which it came, for the purpose of having some action on it there. March 100.

REMANENT PRO DEFECTU EMPTORUM (Lat. remanent, they remain, pro defectu, through lack, emptorum, of buyers). The return made by the sheriff to a writ of execution when he has not been able to sell the property seized, that the same remains unsold for want of buyers; in that case the plaintiff is entitled to a venditioni exponas. Com. Dig. Execution (C 8).

REMANET (Lat.). In Practice. The causes which are entered for trial, and which cannot be tried during the term, are remanets. 1 Sell. Pr. 434; 1 Phillipps, Ev. 4.

REMEDIAL. That which affords a remedy: as, a remedial statute, or one which is made to supply some defects or abridge some superfluities of the common law. 1 Bla. Com. 86. The term remedial statute is also applied to those acts which give a new remedy. Esp. Pen. Act. 1. See Wilberf. Stat. L. 231.

REMEDY. The means employed to enforce a right or redress an injury.

Remedies for non-fulfilment of contracts are generally by action; see ACTION; ASSUMPSIT; COVENANT; DEBT; DETINUE; or in equity, in some cases, by bill for specific performance. Remedies for the redress of injuries are either public, by indictment, when the injury to the individual or to his property affects the public, or private, when the tort is only injurious to the individual. See INDICTMENT; FELONY; MERGER; TORTS; CIVIL REMEDY.

Remedies are preventive which seek compensation, or which have for their object punishment. The preventive, or removing, or abating remedies may be by acts of the party aggrieved or by the intervention of legal proceedings: as in the case of injuries to the person or to personal or real property, defence, resistance, recaption, abatement of nuisance, and surety of the peace, or injunction in equity, and perhaps some others. Remedies for compensation may be either by the acts of the party aggrieved, or summarily before justices, or by arbitration, or action, or suit at law or in equity. Remedies which have for their object punishments or compensation and punishments are either summary proceedings before magistrates, or indictment, etc.

Remedies are specific or cumulative: the former are those which can alone be applied to restore a right or punish a crime: for example, where a statute makes unlawful what was lawful before, and gives a particular remedy, that is specific, and must be pursued, and no other; Cro. Jac. 644; 1 Salk. 45; 2 Burr. 803. But when an offence was antecedently punishable by a common-law proceeding, as by indictment, and a statute prescribes a particular remedy, there such particular remedy is cumulative, and proceedings may be had at common law or under the statute; 1 Saund. 134, n. 4.

In a very large number of cases there are concurrent remedies the resort to one of which does not bar the other. This is particularly true where there is a legal and an equitable remedy with respect to the same subject-matter. For example, a bill in equity against the holder of a note to recover possession of it, and against makers for the balance due on it, may be maintained, pending an action at law against the holders and makers to recover from the latter the balance due; and where the action at law failed on the ground that the plaintiffs were not in possession, the judgment did not bar the proceeding in equity; 166 Mass. 46.

The maxim ubi jus ibi remedium has been considered so valuable that it gave occasion to the first invention of that form of action called an action on the case; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 472. The novelty of the particular complaint alleged in an action on the case is no objection, provided there appears to have been an injury to the plaintiff cognizable by law; 2 Wils. 146; 3 Term 63; Willes 577; 2 M. & W. 519.

There is an important distinction to be considered in connection with the construction and effect of statutes, between those which create rights, and those which afford remedies. This distinction has an important effect upon the legislative power, with respect to many subjects constantly involved in the question whether an act is obnoxious to the provision of the federal constitution against impairing the obligation of contracts, under which title the subject is discussed and to which reference should be made. The distinction is also important in many questions merely of state legislation. "The remedies which one legislature may have prescribed for the redress of private wrongs, a subsequent legislature can change or modify at pleasure, and make the new remedy applicable to pending controversies, provided a substantial or adequate remedy is left, and provided, further, that the legislature is not prohibited from making the new remedy applicable to pending suits by some provision of the organic law. . . . It is true that the courts have, on some occasions, refused to apply statutes which dealt with the remedy for the redress of private grievances to existing controversies, and have held them solely applicable to actions thereafter brought. But it will be found, we think, on an examination of most of this class of cases, that the refusal to apply to existing suits statutes which were plainly applicable thereto, and which merely changed or modified the course of procedure, was based either on the ground that, if so applied, they would operate unfairly, and cause loss or inconvenience to the parties, or on the ground that the right involved had become so far established by acts done and performed in reliance on the prior law, and its continuance in force, that it would savor of injustice to take away such right by making the new law applicable to the pending controversy;" 83 Fed. Rep. 643, where it was held that a statute giving two new trials as of right in ejectment suits conferred not a vested right protected by constitutional guaranties, but a mere privilege pertaining to the remedy, which may be legally taken away by the legislature, as to pending suits, except in cases wherein a verdict is standing which a party is entitled to have set aside when the act takes effect. REMEMBRANCERS. In English Law. Officers of the exchequer, whose duty it is to remind the lord-treasurer and the justices of that court of such things as are to be called and attended to for the benefit of the crown.

REMISE, RELEASE, AND QUIT-CLAIM. The ordinary effective words in a release. These words are, in this country, sufficient to pass the estate in a primary conveyance; 7 Conn. 250; 24 N. H. 460; 21 Ala. N. S. 125; 7 N. Y. 422. Remise is a French word synonymous with release. See QUIT-CLAIM.

REMISSION (Lat. re, back, mitto, to send).

In Civil Law. A release of a debt.

It is conventional when it is expressly granted to the debtor by a creditor having a capacity to alienate; or tacit, when the creditor voluntarily surrenders to his debtor the original title, under private signature constituting the obligation. La. Civ. Code, art. 2195.

Forgiveness or pardon of an offence.

It has the effect of putting back the offender into the same situation he was before the commission of the offence. Remission is generally granted in cases where the offence was involuntary or committed in self-defence. Pothier, Pr. Civ. sect. 7, art. 2, § 2.

At Common Law. The act by which a forfeiture or penalty is forgiven. 10 Wheat. 246.

REMIT. To annul a fine or forfeiture.

This is generally done by the courts where they have a discretion by law: as, for example, when a juror is fined for non-attendance in court, after being duly summoned, and, on appearing, he produces evidence to the courts that he was sick and unable to attend, the fine will be remitted by the court.

In Commercial Law. To send money, bills, or something which will answer the purpose of money.

To send back, as to remit a check. 66 Hun 543.

REMITTANCE. In Commercial Law. Money sent by one merchant to another, either in specie, bill of exchange, draft, or otherwise.

REMITTEE. A person to whom a remittance is made. Story, Bailm. § 75.

REMITTER. To be placed back in possession.

When one having a right to lands is out of possession, and afterwards the freehold is cast upon him by some defective title, and he enters by virtue of that title, the law remits him to his ancient and more certain right, and, by an equitable fiction, supposes him to have gained possession under it; 3 Bla. Com. 190; Com. Dig. Remitter.

REMITTIT DAMNA (Lat. he releases damages). An entry on the record by which the plaintiff declares that he remits the damages or a part of the damages which have been awarded him by the jury.

In some cases a misjoinder of action may be cured by the entry of a remittit damna; Chitty, Pl. 207.

REMITTITUR DAMNUM. The act of the plaintiff upon the record, whereby he abates the excess of damages found by the jury beyond the sum laid in the declaration. See 1 Saund. 285, n. 6; 4 Conn. 109. It cannot be filed by one of several plaintiffs, and where the widow of one killed by the negligence of a railroad company brought an action for damages on behalf of herself and her children and the parents of the deceased, a remittitur filed by the widow, reducing the judgment on behalf of each claimant, was held to be invalid and a new trial was ordered; 168 U. S. 369.

REMITTITUR OF RECORD. After a record has been removed to the supreme court and a judgment has been rendered, it is to be remitted or sent back to the court below, for the purpose of re-trying the cause, when the judgment has been reversed, or of issuing an execution when it has been affirmed. The act of so returning the record, and the writ issued for that purpose, bear the name of remittitur.

REMITTOR. A person who makes a remittance to another.

REMONSTRANCE. A petition to a court or deliberative or legislative body, in which those who have signed it request that something which is in contemplation to perform shall not be done.

REMOTE. At a distance; afar off. See CAUSA PROXIMA; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

REMOVAL FROM OFFICE. A deprivation of office by the act of a competent officer or of the legislature. It may be express, that is, by a notification that the officer has been removed, or implied, by the appointment of another person to the same office; Wall. Jr. 118. See 13 Pet. 130; 1 Cra. 137. See OFFICER.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES. Under what are known as the removal acts, provision is made by federal statutes for the removal of causes in the state courts to the federal courts in certain cases.

The legislation on the subject begins with the Judiciary Act of 1789, which provided for the removal of suits commenced in the state courts against aliens, or citizens of other states, where the matter in dispute exceeded $500; 1 Stat. L. 73. This act continued in force, being substantially included in the revised statutes (§ 639), until 1875, when the jurisdiction was greatly enlarged; 18 Stat. L. 470; 3 Woods 397. The same section also provided for the removal of suits between citizens of one state claiming lands under grants of different states; 1 Stat. L. 73; and this act was also substantially included in the revised statutes (§ 647), and also in the act of 1887, with changes as to the jurisdictional limit, the party who might petition for removal, and the state from which the grant must be derived.

The act of 1833, occasioned by the nullification laws in South Carolina, provided for the removal of proceedings against federal revenue officers; 4 Stat. L. 633. This act was included in the revised statutes (§ 643), and with some extension of its scope is still in force, not having been repealed expressly or by implication by the act of 1875; 105 U. S. 666; and being excepted from repeal by the act of 1887; 25 Stat. L. 433. The act of 1863 related in terms to certain cases arising out of the civil war and has no subsequent force or effect. Several acts were passed during the reconstruction period, which were consolidated in the revised statutes, §§ 641, 642, relating to the removal of causes in which there was a denial of civil rights either by the action or non-action of the judicial tribunals of the state. This act is expressly saved from repeal by the act of 1887. The act of 1866 was one relating to procedure merely, and authorized the removal of a separable part of a cause by one non-resident defendant joined with a resident; 14 Stat. L. 306. This was substantially covered by Rev. St. § 639, but was repealed by the act of 1875 and not revived by that of 1887. The act of 1870 (14 Stat. L. 558), subsequently included in Rev. St. § 639, authorized the removal of causes upon an affidavit of prejudice or local influence. This was not repealed by the act of 1875 (113 U. S. 73), but was repealed and supplied by that of 1887; 142 id. 459. See infra. The act of 1863 authorized the removal of suits against federal corporations other than banks; 15 Stat. L. 227; Rev. St. § 640; but this was repealed by the act of 1887. The act of 1872 authorized the removal of personal actions brought by an alien against civil officers of the United States; 17 Stat. L. 44; Rev. St. § 644. Subject to the change in the jurisdictional amount, this act is not expressly, and probably not impliedly, repealed by the act of 1887.

The general act of 1875 was one largely extending the federal jurisdiction and the right of removal: 18 Stat. L. 470; and the result of it was such an overcrowding of the dockets of the federal courts as to induce the passage of the very restrictive act of 1887, which is now in force. The act of 1887 is generally considered to have been framed for the purpose of reorganiz ing the circuit courts of the United States and its operation is practically to repeal prior legislation on the subject, except some special acts of limited scope, and to substitute this act for pre-existing legislation as to the federal law on the subject of the removal of causes. The act of 1887 was supplemented by the act of August 13, 1888; 25 Stat. L. 433, which was passed for the purpose of correcting many errors and ambiguities in the act of 1887. As thus amended, the act gives to the circuit courts of the United States original concurrent jurisdiction of all civil suits where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000. In certain classes of cases there is a right to remove independently of amount; such as criminal cases and those civil actions touching matters not capable of a reduction to a pecuniary basis.

In determining whether an amount in dispute exceeds $2,000, the plaintiff's demand, unless colorable, must furnish the rule, but where the law does give the rule, the legal cause of action, and not the plaintiff's demand, must be regarded; 85 Fed. Rep. 4. See JURISDICTION.

Where the main controversy is removed the ancillary proceedings go with it, without respect to the amount involved; 79 Fed. Rep. 657; 137 U. S. 366.

The act of 1887 authorizes the removal from the state courts of the following classes of suits:

1. Suits at law or in equity arising under the constitution or laws or treaties of the United States.

2. Any other suits of which the circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction under the act.

3. Any suits in which there is a controversy wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them.

4. Any suit pending in a state court in which the defendant, being a citizen of another state, shall make it appear to the circuit court that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in the state court.

In all these cases the jurisdictional limit of $2,000 is applicable. It was at first doubted whether this was so in cases removed on the ground of prejudice or local influence, and there were decisions to the effect that the limitation of amount did not apply in those cases; 32 Fed. Rep. 673; 38 Fed. Rep. 529; 41 Fed. Rep. 449; but it was finally settled by the supreme court that the limitation applies in this as in other cases; 137 U. S. 451. See 22 U. S. App. 707; 42 Fed. Rep. 420.

The proceeding for removal is by petition filed in the state court, upon which an order is made, if the case is within the act, directing the removal, upon the filing of a bond, with surety, for entering a copy of the record in the circuit court, where the case proceeds as if originally commenced therein; if improperly removed it may be remanded to the state court and there proceeded with. The proceedings under the act of 1887 are generally of the same character as those under the preceding acts, and, as a rule, the decisions under the latter are applicable, with the exception, of course, of cases relating to the construction of acts repealed and not supplied by subsequent legislation.

The removal acts are not penal and therefore not subject to any rule of strict construction; they are not in derogation of any right to a trial in a state court, as there is no such right; the rule of construction is that applied to other statutes giving jurisdiction; 8 Fed. Rep. 650; but the act of 1887 is to be construed with reference to its evident restrictive intent, and more strongly against one seeking to avoid its requirements; 32 id. 497. The right to remove is no more a vested right than the right to trial in the state court, and may therefore be taken away at will by congress; id. 708.

The cognizance over cases removed to the federal court has been referred to the appellate jurisdiction; on the ground that the suit is not instituted in that court by original process; 1 Wheat. 304; but this jurisdiction has been more accurately characterized as "original jurisdiction acquired indirectly by a removal from the state court;" 5 Blatchf. 336; 6 id. 362. The validity of the legislation on this subject has been repeatedly affirmed; 92 U. S. 10; 100 id. 257, 303; 77 N. C. 530; 28 Ohio St. 208. And it has been further decided that when the terms upon which the right is given have been complied with, the right of removal cannot be defeated by state legislation; 20 Wall. 445. It has been said that a state has the right to impose conditions, not in conflict with the constitution or the laws of the United States, on the transaction of business within its territory by a foreign corporation, or having given a license, to revoke it with or without cause; and that it may therefore require foreign corporations to forego their right of removal, or cease to do business within the state; 94 U. S. 535; 40 Wis. 220.

But in 121 U. S. 186, it was said that the point decided in 94 id. 435, was expressly limited to the principle that an injunction would not be granted to restrain the action of state officers in such case; and it is settled that any legislation by the states intended to defeat the right of removal or to require from foreign corporations a stipulation in advance that they will not exercise it, is unconstitutional and void; id.; 146 id. 202; 97 Ky. 238; 32 Ohio St. 468; or by a state law providing a special remedy in its own courts; 3 Wall. Jr. 252; nor can the right of removal be defeated by agreement of parties; 6 Pet. 41; 10 Wall. 415; Fed. Cas. No. 12, 90; 6 Gray 192; 56 Me. 521. See JURISDICTION.

Formerly the right of removal was given to either party without regard to the position occupied as plaintiff or defendant; 100 U. S. 457; but under the act of 1887 this right is in most cases given to the defendant only, the exception being where citizens of the same state claim land under grants from different states and the defendant must be a non-resident; 148 U. S. 663; but a case is not removable from the state court on the ground of citizenship, unless both at the commencement of the action, and also when the removal is asked, the defendants are citizens of a state other than the one of which the plaintiff is a citizen; 130 U. S. 230; 144 id. 568; 132 id. 267. Some question has arisen as to which party is to be considered the plaintiff in proceedings for the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and if, by local practice, the landowner is the plaintiff, he cannot remove; 50 Fed. Rep. 637; 54 id. 545.

Where several are sued as partners and only one has been served, he is not precluded from removal by the non-joinder of the others in the removal proceedings; 84 id. 413. Where one may sue either one of two parties and he chooses to sue both, he may do so, though his motive in joining them is to prevent a removal to a federal court; 85 Fed. Rep. 876.

A suit between a state and citizens of another state cannot be removed on the ground of citizenship; 117 U. S. 480; 155 id. 482; 65 N. C. 714; 9 Ohio C. C. 21; 85 Fed. Rep. 870. Corporations existing by virtue of acts of congress may remove to the federal courts actions brought against them in the state courts, on the ground that they are "suits arising under the laws of the United States;" 76 Fed. Rep. 468.

The diversity of citizenship at the commencement of the action must appear from the petition; 130 U. S. 230; 137 U. S. 61.

Application for removal must be before the plea is due; and this means at or before the time when the defendant is required by the laws of the state to answer or plead to the merits; 82 Fed. Rep. 15; and the time is not extended by delay in taking judgment or default for want of plea: 138 U. S. 298; nor can it be by stipulation of the parties or by the discretionary action of the judge in a particular case; 80 Fed. Rep. 945.

All the facts essential to federal jurisdiction must appear on the record; 22 U. S. App. 707. They must appear from the plaintiff's statement where that is the ground of removal, and cannot be supplied by statement in the petition for removal or subsequent pleadings; 155 U. S. 482, 488; 162 id. 490.

If a cause removed is not remanded when it might be, and proceeds without objection to judgment, the latter remains in force until vacated; 123 U. S. 552. One who petitions for or consents to removal cannot afterwards object to it as not asked for in time; 156 U. S. 335. If a cause is removed and the circuit court decides it has no jurisdiction, it remands and does not dismiss; 149 U. S. 452.

Where the state court denies the motion for removal but the record is nevertheless filed in the circuit court, which proceeds to a hearing and then remands, the order refusing removal works no prejudice, and the error, if any, is immaterial; 160 U. S. 556.

Actual removal subjects the defendants to the jurisdiction of the federal court and is a waiver of privileges claimed by pleas in abatement, but the mere filing a petition in the state court is not a waiver of exception to its jurisdiction; 13 U. S. App. 222.

An order of the circuit court remanding a case to a state court is not reviewable by the supreme court by any direct proceeding; 140 U. S. 117; 169 U. S. 92; 160 id. 556. The act of 1887 takes away the power of the supreme court to relieve by mandamus when a case removed is improperly remanded; 137 U. S. 451; and when the state court asserts jurisdiction after a proper application for removal, the question is not waived by the party entitled to the removal by reason of his appearing and contesting the matter in dispute; 19 Wall. 214; 100 U. S. 457; 106 id. 118; 112 id. 12. He may take an appeal, should the decision be against him, to the highest court of the state, save the question of removal on the record, and failing there, to the supreme court of the United States; 118 U. S. 43; 104 id. 5. In the event of his obtaining a decision in favor of removal there, the judgment of the state court will be reversed and an order made to transfer the case to the circuit court for trial on the merits; 92 U. S. 10. If a cause be improperly removed and the circuit court entertains jurisdiction improperly, its judgment will be reversed by the supreme court with directions to the circuit court to remand the same to the state court; 20 Wall. 117.

The denial by a state court of an application to amend a petition for removal is not a denial of a right secured by the constitution of the United States; 157 U. S. 370.

When a suit over which a state court has full jurisdiction in equity is removed to a circuit court of the United States on the ground of diverse citizenship, and it appears that the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction in equity over such a controversy, the cause should be remanded to the state court, instead of dismissing it for want of jurisdiction; 149 U. S. 451.

A bill in equity to reach partnership property and set aside judgments confessed by fraud, presented a single controversy as to all defendants and could not be removed by one for diversity of citizenship; 132 U. S. 571; so also of a bill to prevent the payment of county bonds alleged to be invalid where some bondholders were citizens of the same state with the plaintiffs and others who sought to remove of a different state; 138 U. S. 571; so of a bill to recover possession of town bonds where the bailee is a necessary party and a citizen of the same state; 151 U. S. 56. One of two corporations sued jointly in a state court for tort, though pleading severally, cannot remove the case on the ground of a separable controversy; 132 U. S. 599; so of a complaint against a corporation and its agents individually for damages for polluting a stream, and seeking a remedy against them jointly, though they answer separately with separate defences; 118 U. S. 264. To remove upon the ground of separable controversy, the case must be capable of separation into two or more independent suits, one of which is wholly between citizens of different states in the sense that it may be fully determined as between them without the presence of the other parties to the record; 19 U. S. App. 646; 140 U. S. 406; see 151 id. 368; but separate defences do not create separate controversies within the meaning of the removal act; 132 U. S. 571; 118 id. 596; and a defendant cannot make an action several which plaintiff elects to make joint; 118 U.S. 596; 144 id. 527.

The right of removal under R. S. § 641, supra, is authorized only upon petition setting forth infractions of the 14th amendment to the constitution previous to the trial and final hearing of the cause, and has no applicability to those occurring after the trial or final hearing has commenced. This section was drawn only with reference to state action, and has no reference to individual violations of rights; 100 U. S. 313. The right of removal under section 641 of the revised statutes exists only in the special cases mentioned in it, and in the absence of the denial or inability to enforce in the judicial tribunals of the state the equal civil rights of citizens, does not embrace cases in which a right is denied by judicial action during trial, or in the sentence or mode of its execution; 162 U. S. 565, where it was held, following 103 id. 370, that a removal was not authorized by the exclusion of negroes because of their race from service on grand juries.

A suit cannot be removed on the ground of prejudice or local influence, unless all the opposing parties are citizens of the state in which suit was brought, which state must also be other than that of which the petitioners are citizens; 118 U. S. 54; 119 id. 586; or under the act of 1887, where there is no separable controversy, and in such case the petition and affidavit must show facts, not mere conclusions; 19 U. S. App. 300. If the petition is filed by the final hearing it is in time; 129 U. S. 688. The motion cannot be made ex parte; 59 Fed. Rep. 209; 112 N. C. 396. The application is too late after a third trial in the state court; 142 U. S. 459; it may be at any time before the first trial; 58 Fed. Rep. 980; 54 id. 7. The matter in dispute in a case removed for prejudice, etc., must exceed $2,000; 137 U. S. 451; 22 U. S. App. 707; 30 Neb. 161; though it was at first a matter of some controversy whether the jurisdictional limit of amount applied to these cases, and there were decisions that it did not; 32 Fed. Rep. 673; 38 id. 529; 41 id. 449. In such case the defendant should obtain an order from the federal court for the removal, file that order in the state court, and take from it a transcript which should be filed in the federal court; 148 U. S. 255. All issues of fact upon petition for removal for prejudice or local influence must be tried in the circuit court; 122 U. S. 513.

In cases under Rev. St. § 643, the jurisdiction of the state court is taken away only after the petition for removal is filed in the circuit court and a writ of certiorari or of habeas corpus cum causa issued and served; 148 U. S. 107.

A motion under a state statute as to corporations, for executions against a stockholder, cannot be removed; 5 Dill. 223. Nor can an appeal under a state law from assessment of taxes; 135 U. S. 467; or a writ of habeas corpus (under act of 1875); 115 U. S. 487.

Proceedings in a probate court to determine whether the property of a deceased person is separate or community property, cannot be removed to a federal court, though the opposing parties are citizens of different states. The federal courts will not interfere with the custody of the estate of a deceased person by the state probate court in which proceedings are pending for administration; 80 Fed. Rep. 949. A proceeding by mandamus to compel the register of the transfer of stock may be removed; id. 489; but not one on a plea which raises the issue of title to an office; 29 La. Ann. 399; nor an action in the nature of quo warranto to determine the title to office of presidential electors; 8 S. C. 382. Suits by attachment may be removed; 5 Blatchf. 107; 2 Curt. C. C. 212; ejectment suits; 3 Wall. Jr. 258, 263; a bill in equity to reform an insurance policy; 6 Blatchf. 208; a suit to annul a will; 92 U. S. 10; a railway foreclosure suit; 6 Biss. 529. A condemnation proceeding; 124 U. S. 197; suit against a marshal for trespass for goods taken on attachment; 139 U. S. 628; where the controversy involved the authority of the land department to grant a patent; 140 U. S. 406. An action of tort against several defendants for a conspiracy cannot be removed by a part of them; 40 Ala. 639. Where the suit is in its nature an equitable proceeding, it must proceed as such in the federal court, and in accordance with the rules governing equity cases in such court without regard to the system in the state court; 13 How. 268; 23 id. 484. Where the suit unites legal and equitable questions of relief or defence, a repleader is necessary after removal; 1 Dill. 290; 8 Blatchf. 299; 15 id. 432; 15 Wall. 573. The circuit court may issue a certiorari to bring in the record from the state courts. This was provided by the act of 1875 (18 Stat. L. 470) and not repealed by the act of 1887; but a certiorari is not an essential part of the proceeding and need only be resorted to if necessary to procure the record; 6 Biss. 529. So the circuit court may enjoin further proceedings in the state court; 17 Blatchf. 332; 56 Fed. Rep. 329; 22 Wall. 250, where it was held that the prohibition against injunctions by federal courts touching proceedings in the state courts has no application to such cases.

See Dillon, Removal of Causes (Black's ed.); UNITED STATES COURTS.

REMOVE. To move away from the position occupied; to displace. 86 Ky. 190. To change place in any manner; to go from one place to another. 12 Conn. 186.

REMOVER. In Practice. A transfer of a suit or cause out of one court into another, which is effected by writ of error, certiorari, and the like. 11 Co. 41.

REMUNERATION. Reward; recompense; salary. Dig. 17. 1. 7. See 1 Q. B. Div. 663.

RENDER. To yield; to return; to give again: it is the reverse of prender. See 77 Ia. 387.

A judgment is "rendered" when the court makes an order therefor; 12 Mont. 11.

RENDEZVOUS. A place appointed for meeting. Especially used of places appointed for the meeting of ships and their convoy, and for the meeting of soldiers.

RENDITION. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; EXTRADITION.

RENEGADE. One who has changed his profession of faith or opinion. Whart.

RENEW. To make again; as, to renew a treaty or a covenant. 124 Mass. 151.

RENEWAL. A change of something old for something new; as, the renewal of a note; the renewal of a lease. See NOVATION; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 800.

RENOUNCE. To give up a right; for example, an executor may renounce the right of administering the estate of the testator; a widow, the right to administer to her intestate husband's estate.

RENOUNCING PROBATE. Giving up the right to be executor of a will, wherein he has been appointed to that office, by refusing to take out probate of such will. 1 Will. Exec. 230, 231. It is usually done by writing filed in the probate office.

RENOVANT. Renewing. Cowel.

RENT (Lat. reditus, a return). A return or compensation for the possession of some corporeal inheritance. A certain profit, either in money, provisions, or labor, issuing out of lands and tenements, in return for their use.

The compensation, either in money, provisions, chattels, or labor, received by the owner of the soil from the occupant thereof. Jacks. & Gross, Landl. & T. § 38; Woodf. Landl. & T. 375.

It has been held that a rent may issue out of lands and tenements corporeal, and also, out of them and their furniture, in this case a dairy farm with its stock and utensils; 31 Pa. 20; 99 id. 52. See, as to furnished lodgings, 5 B. & P. 224; 5 Co. 16 b.

Some of its common-law properties are that it must be a profit to the proprietor, certain in its character, or capable of being reduced to a certainty, issuing yearly, that is, periodically, out of the thing granted, and not be part of the land or thing itself; Co. Litt. 47; 2 Bla. Com. 41.

At common law there were three species of rent: rent service, where the tenant held his land by fealty, homage, or other corporal service and a certain rent to which the right of distress was necessarily incident; 3 Kent *461; 9 Watts 258; rent charge, which was a reservation of rent, with a clause authorizing its collection by distress; and rent seck, where there was no such clause, but the rent could only be collected by an ordinary action at law as by a writ of annuity or writ of assize. These distinctions, however, for all practical purposes, have become obsolete, in consequence of various statutes both in England and in this country, allowing every kind of rent to be distrained for without distinction. See Tayl. Landl. & T. § 370; FEUDAL LAW.

The payment of rent is incident to every tenancy where the relation of landlord and tenant subsists, except as to mere tenancies at will or by sufferance, where this relation cannot be said to exist. And no tenant can resist a demand for rent unless he shows that he has been evicted or become otherwise entitled to quit the premises, and has actually done so, before the rent in question became due. By the strictness of the common law, when a tenant has once made an agreement to pay rent, nothing will excuse him from continuing to pay, although the premises should be reduced to a ruinous condition by some unavoidable accident of fire, flood, or tempest; 6 Mass. 63; 4 Harr. & J. 564; 72 Pa. 285; 39 Cal. 151; 3 Johns. 44; 1 Term 310; 9 Price 294; 85 Ala. 99; 37 Ill. App. 542. See 72 Mich. 438.

But this severity of the ancient law has been somewhat abated in this country, and in this respect conforms to the more reasonable provisions of the Code Napoléon, art. 1722, which declares that if the thing hired is destroyed by fortuitous events, during the continuance of the lease, the contract of hiring is rescinded, but if it be only destroyed in part, the lessee may, according to circumstances, demand either a diminution of the rent or a rescission of the contract itself. The same provision is to be found substantially in the Code of Louisiana, art. 2667, and in the act of the legislature of New York of 1860, c. 345, § 1. A somewhat similar provision is found in the laws of Minnesota; Laws 1883, c. 100; 47 Minn. 291. In South Carolina and Pennsylvania it was decided that a tenant who had been dispossessed by a public enemy ought not to pay rent for the time the possession was withheld from him; and in Maryland it has been held that where a hurricane rendered a house untenantable it was a good defence to an action for rent. But these cases are evidently exceptions to the general rule of law above stated; 1 Bay 499; 5 Watts 517; 1 M'Cord 447. A tenant is not compelled to keep and pay rent for a house which, from defects in its construction, becomes untenantable and unfit for habitation; 73 Mich. 577. Where land has been swept away or gained upon by the sea, the lessee is no longer liable for rent; Bac. Abr. 63; Rolle, Abr. 236.

The right of the lessor to terminate a lease for non-payment of rent will not give the lessee any right to avoid the lease or his liability for agreed rent; 150 U. S. 665.

The quiet enjoyment of the premises, unmolested by the landlord, is an implied condition to the payment of rent. If, therefore, he ousts the tenant from any considerable portion of the premises, or erects a nuisance of any description upon or so near to them as to oblige the tenant to remove, or if the possession of the land should be recovered by a third person, by a title superior to that of the landlord, the dispossession in either case amounts to an eviction, and discharges the obligation to pay rent; 2 Ired. 350; 3 Harr. N. J. 364; 4 Leigh 484; 4 N. Y. 217; 1 M. & W. 747; 91 Pa. 322; 106 Mass. 201; 54 N. H. 426; 49 Vt. 109; 31 Ala. 412; 44 Mo. App. 279; 1 App. D. C. 447. By retaining possession of premises in spite of such acts of his landlord as would otherwise amount to an eviction, a tenant waives his right to withhold the rent; 112 Mass. 8; 20 N. Y. 32. The entry of a landlord upon demised premises for the purpose of rebuilding does not operate as an eviction, where it was with the tenant's assent, and not to his entire exclusion; 151 Pa. 101.

A tenant's liability for rent is not affected by condemnation of part of the leased premises; 136 Ill. 37; 144 id. 537; but where the estate of both landlord and tenant in the entire premises is extinguished by condemnation, the obligation to pay rent ceases; 144 Ill. 537.

As rent issues out of the land, it is said to be incident to the reversion, and the right to demand it necessarily attaches itself to the ownership, and follows a transfer of the premises, and the several parts thereof, without the consent of the occupant. Every occupant is chargeable with rent by virtue of his occupation, whether he be the tenant or an assignee of the tenant. The original tenant cannot avoid his liability by transferring his lease to another, but his assignee is only liable so long as he remains in possession, and may discharge himself by the simple act of assigning over to some one else; 14 Wend. 63; 1 N. & M'C. 104; 12 Pick. 460; 4 Leigh 69; 2 Ohio 221; 1 Wash. C. C. 375; 1 Rawle 155; 3 B. & Ald. 396; 11 Ad. & E. 403; Cro. Eliz. 356; Co. Litt. 46 b. When rent will be apportioned, see APPORTIONMENT; LANDLORD AND TENANT.

The day of payment depends, in the first instance, upon the contract; if this is silent in that respect, rent is payable quarterly or half-yearly, according to the custom of the country; but if there be no usage governing the case, it is not due until the end of the term. Formerly it was payable before sunset of the day whereon it was to be paid, on the reasonable ground that sufficient light should remain to enable the parties to count the money; but now it is not considered due until midnight or the last minute of the natural day on which it is made payable; 36 Pa. 272. This rule, however, may be varied by the custom of different places; Co. Litt. 202 a; 15 Pick. 147; 5 S. & R. 432. Under a lease requiring rent to be paid annually on a certain day for a year in advance, a tenant continuing in possession three months after that day is liable for the year's rent: 17 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 719. See FORFEITURE; RE-ENTRY; PAYMENT.

Interest accrues on rent from the time it is due, but cannot be included in a distress; 17 S. & R. 390.

When rent is payable in money, it must strictly be paid in legal-tender money; with respect to foreign coin, the lessor may decline to receive it except by its true weight and value. Bank-notes constitute part of the currency of the country, and ordinarily pass as money, and are a good tender, unless specially objected to by the creditor at the time of the offer; 10 Wheat. 347. Payment may be made in commodities, when so reserved. If the contract specifies a place of payment, a tender of rent, whether in money or in kind, must be made at that place; but, if no place is specified, a tender of either on the land will be sufficient to prevent a forfeiture; 16 Term 222; 10 N. Y. 80; 4 Taunt. 555.

Under an income-tax statute, rent is to be treated as identical with land; 158 U. S. 601. An assignment of rent must be in writing under the statute of frauds; 23 N. Y. 521.

See DISTRESS; RE-ENTRY; GROUND-RENT; REPLEVIN; PAYMENT.

RENT CHARGE. A rent reserved with a power of enforcing its payment by distress. See RENT.

RENT ROLL. A list of rents payable to a particular person or public body. See RENT.

RENT SECK. A rent collectable only by action at law in case of non-payment. See RENT.

RENT SERVICE. A rent embracing some corporal service attendant upon the tenure of the land. Distress was necessarily incident to such a rent. See RENT; GROUND-RENT; FEUDAL SYSTEM.

RENTAL. A roll or list of the rents of an estate, containing the description of the lands let, the names of the tenants, and other particulars connected with such estate. This is the same as rent roll, from which it is said to be corrupted.

It is commonly used as synonymous with rent.

RENTAL ROLLS. Tiend bolls, due the parson as tithes. Ersk. Prin. 2. 10. 6.

RENTE. In French Law. A word nearly synonymous with our word annuity. Rentes: Public funds.

RENTE FONCIERE. In French Law. A rent which issues out of land; and it is of its essence that it be perpetual, for if it be made but for a limited time it is a lease. It may, however, be extinguished. La. Civ. Code, art. 2750, 2759; Pothier. See GROUND-RENT.

RENTE VIAGERE. In French Law. An annuity for life. La. Civ. Code, art. 2764; Pothier, Rente, n. 215.

RENTS, ISSUES, AND PROFITS. The profits arising from property generally. This phrase in the Vermont statute has been held not to cover "yearly profits." 26 Vt. 741.

RENTS OF ASSIZE. The certain and determined rents of the freeholders and ancient copyholders of manors. Brown.

RENUNCIATION. The act of giving up a right.

It is a rule of law that any one may renounce a right which the law has established in his favor. To this maxim there are many limitations. A party may always renounce an acquired right; as, for example, to take lands by descent; but one cannot always give up a future right before it has accrued, nor the benefit conferred by law, although such advantage may be introduced only for the benefit of individuals.

For example, the power of making a will, the right of annulling a future contract on the ground of fraud, and the right of pleading the act of limitations cannot be renounced. The first, because the party must be left free to make a will or not; and the latter two, because the right has not yet accrued.

This term is usually employed to signify the abdication or giving up of one's country at the time of choosing another. The act of congress requires from a foreigner who applies to become naturalized a renunciation of all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof such alien may at the time be a citizen or subject. See Morse, Citizenship; CITIZEN; EXPATRIATION; NATURALIZATION.

REOPENING A CASE. A court of equity, in the exercise of a sound discretion, has full power to reopen a case, and allow the correction of mistakes in testimony. To reopen a case is to permit the introduction of new evidence and, practically, try it anew; to rehear a case is to hear it again upon the same proofs and allegations. Such applications are not favored, however, and, when granted, must be based upon strong circumstances to justify a deviation from the general rule; 93 Pa. 214; Adams, Eq. 372; 8 Phila. 380; 11 Fed. Rep. 425; 3 id. 95. An application to reopen a case and take further proofs has been granted on condition that the moving party pay his opponent's counsel fee for the previous argument, where the new testimony appeared to be newly discovered, material, and not cumulative, and there was no great laches; 44 Fed. Rep. 283. But an application to reopen and admit a newly discovered defence, after final hearing, will only be granted when it appears that such defence, if made at the final hearing, would have been effectual; 7 id. 920.

Reopening patent cases is to be discouraged when the grounds offered therefor pertain to matters of evidence which could as well have been produced at the hearing; 20 id. 111; 31 id. 918. See REHEARING; NEW TRIAL; BILL OF REVIEW.

REORGANIZATION. A term in common use to denote the carrying out, by proper agreements and legal proceedings, of a business plan or scheme for winding up the affairs of, or foreclosing a mortgage or mortgages upon the property of, insolvent corporations, more frequently railroad companies. It is usually by the judicial sale of the corporate property and franchises, and the formation, by the purchasers of a new corporation, in which the property and franchises are thereupon vested, and the stock and bonds of which are divided among such of the parties interested in the old company as are parties to the reorganization plan.

In most of the states, statutes have been passed to regulate the purchase of corporate properties and franchises at judicial sales. A list of them is given in Short, Ry. Bonds 842. They usually provide that the purchasers shall be, or become, or may organize a new corporation in taking over the assets and franchises purchased, and have and enjoy the corporate rights and franchises of the former company.

Usually some of the security holders name a committee who formulate a plan of reorganization providing for the deposit of securities with the committee as agents or trustees for the owners; for the purchase of the property at the sale; and the organization of a new company upon the basis of a specified scheme of distribution of the new securities among those who assent to the plan. The securities are generally deposited with the committee with very full powers of control, under the plan, and usually with a certain power of modification of the plan, under specified circumstances. When the new company has been formed, the new securities are issued to the assenting parties in accordance with the terms of the plan.

Where a reorganization is the only feasible method of protecting the relative rights of all parties interested in a large enterprise, and it can be done only by co-operation, courts of equity, in the absence of fraud or oppression, are disposed to aid rather than to thwart such schemes of reorganization; 56 Fed. Rep. 7. Such arrangements are to be promoted, because they are necessary to prevent great sacrifice and loss; 28 id. 340; 22 id. 138.

The creditors of a mortgagor railroad company may fairly combine to purchase the property at a mortgage sale, and other creditors are not, by such combination, deprived of the right to bid at such sale; 2 id. 302. Courts will endeavor to carry into effect a fair plan of reorganization and will overlook merely technical defects in it; 11 Ch. D. 605. Such an agreement is not a fraud on non-assenting creditors and does not entitle them to claim their debts against the new company; 101 Pa. 576.

Where a railroad company has issued several series of mortgage bonds, some covering all the property and some only a part, and become insolvent, and the principal of some of the mortgages was due and the company had a large floating debt, it was held that a decree foreclosing all the mortgages, entered by consent of the bondholders, would not be set aside on the petition of some of the stockholders on the ground that some of the mortgages were not yet due, as it was in the interest of the company to effect a reorganization which would secure and extend its bonded debt and reduce the rate of interest thereon and provide the necessary means to satisfy the floating debt; 45 Fed. Rep. 438.

Reorganization agreements must be carried out according to their terms. If they are not, the subscribers to them are not bound; 40 Vt. 399; and the assenting security holders must also comply strictly with the agreement to which they have assented; Short, Ry. Bonds 857.

Where there was a compromise in which stockholders of a company were given the right to subscribe for stock in the reorganized company, upon terms specified in a circular addressed to the old stockholders, it was held, on proceedings by a stockholder who averred want of notice of the circular, that he had no right of action against the company, because the agreement was not made by the company or on its behalf, and that he could not complain of the terms of the agreement, as he was not a party to it; 81 N. Y. 462. A reorganization committee is not a trustee for non-assenting bondholders; 78 Fed. Rep. 49.

Creditors who do not assent to a reorganization agreement are entitled to enforce payment of the purchase price paid at a foreclosure sale by the reorganization committee, for the purpose of discharging their claims. Creditors coming in under the plan thereby release their rights against the old company; 80 Fed. Rep. 569.

Where a reorganization agreement provided that if stockholders neglected to pay the assessments within the period limited, the privilege of receiving the shares allotted to them should be ratably distributed among those who did pay their assessments, it was held that as soon as the default occurred on the part of a non-assenting stockholder, his interest became a vested right in the assenting stockholders under the plan. Likewise that an assenting bondholder who fails to deliver his bonds to the trustee under the agreement is debarred from any benefit therein; 44 Barb. 75.

In an action against a reorganized railroad company for failure to deliver its stock in amount equal to the bonds and coupons of the old company held by the plaintiff, it was held that, as the plaintiff had not exercised his option to come into the plan prior to the execution of the deed of the property to the new company, he was not entitled to the stock, and his only right was to take his share of the proceeds of the sale; 133 Pa. 579. The right to participate ceases when the property has passed to the new corporation; the rights of the security holders thereby become fixed, and a majority of certificate holders cannot then modify them; 14 N. Y. Supp. 558.

Where a statute required the consent of bondholders for foreclosure proceedings of a railroad property and such consent was given, it was held that outstanding bondholders would be regarded as consenting by reason of their silence during a protracted litigation; 122 U. S. 1.

A majority of bondholders cannot compel a minority, however small, to enter into a joint agreement with them; 109 U. S. 535; but it is said by an able writer that the relations of corporate bondholders are peculiar, and that the courts, in foreclosure proceedings, have sometimes considered them as analogous to those which exist among stockholders; Short, Ry. Bonds § 27; and that this is especially true in carrying out reorganization schemes; id. See 100 U. S. 605. An act for the reorganization of an embarrassed corporation which provides that all mortgage bondholders who do not, within a given time, expressly dissent from the plan of reorganization, shall be deemed to have assented to it, is valid; 109 U. S. 401; and so is an act which provides that a majority of the bondholders, with equal opportunities to all, may reorganize a new corporation; 53 Conn. 333. The theory is that railroad property is pledged to public use and that this consideration is superior to the property rights of corporators, stockholders, and bondholders. See 109 U. S. 535. Acts relating to reorganization are for the good of all, and are a species of bankruptcy acts; unless forbidden, as in the United States, there is no good reason why they should not be passed in respect of existing obligations; id.

Where a corporation mortgage vests certain powers of control in a majority of the bondholders, as to sanction a modification of a deed of trust; 55 L. T. N. S. 347; 74 Fed. Rep. 110; [1893] 1 Ch. 477, 484; to direct the trustee to purchase the mortgaged property at a foreclosure sale and to reorganize a new company; 99 U. S. 334; or to control the mortgagee trustee in beginning or discontinuing foreclosure proceedings; 134 U. S. 500; the courts will carry into effect the action of such majority.

In 13 Fed. Rep. 242, Treat, J., criticised the decree of foreclosure then before the court, for the omission of what he considered the usual clause in foreclosure decrees, viz., one permitting the minority bondholders to come in, after purchase, within a limited time, on equal terms with purchasing bondholders.

A sale under foreclosure of an insolvent railroad company under an agreement by which the bondholders, according to their priorities, got more or less of their debt (100 to 30 per cent.), and the stockholders of the company the residue of the proceeds (16 per cent. of the par of their stock), was held fraudulent as against general creditors, although the road was mortgaged far above its value; 7 Wall. 392. But where the plan gives stockholders an interest but does not include general creditors, it is not invalid unless the scheme is to give the stockholders that which should go to creditors; 85 Fed. Rep. 888.

The holders of preferred stock may not use it to make up the amount of their bid on foreclosure sale of the property; 86 Fed. Rep. 930.

Where the local managers and officers of an insolvent railroad company, holding a small portion of its bonds, of which a much greater portion was held by non-residents, got an order of sale and proceeded in a hasty and rather secret way to sell and buy it in at the lowest value for themselves, the proceedings were held invalid as against the bondholders, generally, and the stockholders; 21 Wall. 616.

In England, if some of the majority of bondholders are not acting in good faith, a reorganization agreement will not be sanctioned; 44 Ch. Div. 403. Secured creditors of a railroad company, after bringing the property within the jurisdiction of the court, will not be permitted, by any private arrangement with the company or otherwise, so to dispose of the property as seriously and unnecessarily to prejudice the unsecured creditors. They may not, for their own benefit or for the common interest of themselves and the debtor, place the surplus which may exist after the satisfaction of their own claims beyond the reach of the latter; 21 Fed. Rep. 264.

On proceedings by an unsecured creditor praying that the stock of a reorganized company, set aside in the reorganization agreement for the stockholders of the old company, should be sold and the proceeds paid to the holders of the floating debt, it appearing that the plan showed a due regard for the interests of all classes of creditors and stockholders, and that the bill did not show any injustice intended or done to the complainant, the bill was dismissed; 9 Fed. Rep. 738.

Bondholders who decline, on request, to assent, and take no steps to protect themselves, have no standing in equity to set aside a foreclosure sale, if the transaction was fair; 8 Fed. Rep. 177. And a bill praying that a reorganization of a railroad company be set aside and a new plan formulated, and for a receiver, was dismissed, it appearing that the plaintiff had her representative on the new board and had attempted to buy more of the new issue of bonds, although it was alleged that the new company was illegally organized, which fact was, however, known to the plaintiff; 15 Fed. Rep. 691.

Where a reorganization of an English mining company, whose property was all in the United States, was carried on in England by the voluntary act of the English stockholders and not by the British courts, and was found to have been in flagrant violation and disregard of the rights of the American stockholders, it was held that no principle of international comity required that it should be sustained; 55 Fed. Rep. 7.

In 112 U. S. 609, it was held that a mortgage on a charter of a corporation made in the exercise of a power given by a statute, confers no right upon purchasers at a foreclosure sale to exist as the same corporation; if it confers any right of corporate existence upon them, it is only a right to reorganize as a corporation, subject to the laws existing at the time of the reorganization. The court said: "The real transaction, in legal effect, is nothing more or less, and nothing other, than a surrender or abandonment of the old charter by the corporators, and a grant de novo of a similar charter to the so-called transferees or purchasers. To look upon it in any other light, and to regard the transaction as a literal transfer or sale of the charter, is to be deceived by a mere figure of speech. The vital part of the transaction, and that without which it would be a nullity, is the law under which the transfer is made. The statute authorizing the transfer and declaring its effect is the grant of a new charter couched in a few words, and to take effect upon condition of the surrender or abandonment of the old charter, and the deed of transfer is to be regarded as mere evidence of the surrender or abandonment."

In Pennsylvania, under the act of April, 1861, the sale of a railroad does not extinguish the corporation, but creates the purchaser a body corporate, with all the rights, etc., of the old corporation. Irregularities in the organization are not necessarily fatal to the being of the new corporation, and will, at the most, enable the commonwealth to retake the franchise. It cannot be said that the franchises do not exist; 52 Pa. 506.

Where foreclosure was brought on a railroad mortgage containing the usual clause that the trustee on request of a majority of the bondholders should bid at the sale, and reorganize on their account, it was held that the agreement enured equally for the benefit of the bondholders, and that each held his interest subject to the controlling power given to the majority; that, upon proper request from the bondholders, the court might direct the trustee to bid at the sale the amount of the principal and interest due on the first mortgage bonds and to proceed to execute the trust; 99 U. S. 334.

The pendency of a reorganization plan for the preservation of an entire railroad system may sometimes be reason for refusing temporarily an application on the part of the trustees of a divisional mortgage to be put in possession of the property covered by the mortgage to them; Short, Ry. Bonds 854.

In reorganization proceedings it is not necessary that notice of the terms of the plan nor of the legal proceedings be given to the stockholders in order to bar their rights if they do not assent; 96 N. Y. 49.

Where a Canadian act provides for the reorganization of a Canadian railroad company, and the settlement is accepted by a large majority of the shareholders and goes into effect, United States bondholders are bound by it, if they could participate on the same terms as Canadian bondholders; 109 U. S. 527.

Where the stockholders of an insolvent company formed a new company, under the laws of another state, which took a lease of the property of the old company and paid off its debts, and then in its turn became insolvent, it was held to be, as to third persons, substantially the same company and the property remained charged with a mechanic's lien for labor and materials furnished to the new company; 75 Fed. Rep. 368.

See MERGER; MORTGAGE; NEWSPAPER; RAILROAD; RECEIVER; LEASE.

Modern systems of railroad reorganization are severely criticised by Moorfield Storey in Am. Bar Asso. Rep. 1896.

Reorganization agreements frequently contain provisions conferring a control by means of a voting trust, which see.

REPAIRS. That work which is done to property to keep it in good order.

Repair is held to mean to restore to a sound state after decay, injury, dilapidation, or partial injury; 85 Mo. 268; to be synonymous with "make and keep up"; 23 Ind. 281; and sometimes to mean replace; 2 N. Y. 93.

Tenantable repairs. Decorative repair is not included. But papering always, and painting, unless intended for the protection of the property, are decorative repairs. The obligation does not extend to repairing or restoring what is worn out by age, but voluntary waste is a breach of the obligation. 36 W. R. 54; 59 L. J. Q. B. 129.

What a party is bound to do, when the law imposes upon him the duty to make necessary repairs, does not appear to be very accurately defined. Natural and unavoidable decay in the buildings must always be allowed for, when there is no express covenant to the contrary; and it seems the lessee will satisfy the obligation the law imposes on him by delivering the premises at the expiration of his tenancy in a habitable state. Questions in relation to repairs most frequently arise between the landlord and tenant.

In determining whether there has been a breach of a covenant to repair, regard must be had to the age and character of the premises at the date of the demise; and if the premises through their own inherent defects fall in the course of the tenancy into a particular condition, the result of their being in that condition are not breaches of a covenant to repair, however wide that covenant may be; [1893] 2 Q. B. 212.

When there is no express agreement between the parties the tenant is always required to do the necessary repairs; Woodf. Landl. & T. 244; 6 Cow. 475. He is, therefore, bound to put in windows or doors that have been broken by him, so as to prevent any decay of the premises; but he is not required to put a new roof on an old worn-out house; 2 Esp. 590. The landlord is under no implied obligation to make ordinary repairs; 161 Pa. 87.

An express covenant on the part of the lessee to keep a house in repair, and leave it in as good a plight as it was when the lease was made, does not bind him to repair the ordinary and natural decay; Woodf. Landl. & T. 256. See 7 Gray 550. And it has been held that such a covenant does not bind him to rebuild a house which had been destroyed by a public enemy; 1 Dall. 210; but where in a lease there is an express and unconditional agreement to repair and keep in repair, the tenant is bound to do so, though the premises be destroyed by fire or accident; 91 Pa. 88; 2 Wall. 1; 49 Barb. 554.

Repair means to restore to its former condition, not to change either the form or material of a building; 63 Pa. 162. When a landlord covenants to repair, he is bound only to restore to a sound state either what has become decayed or dilapidated, or better, what has been partially destroyed; his covenant does not extend to improvements, nor to new buildings erected by the tenant; 4 Pa. 364. See 1 Dy. 33 a.

In order to entitle a tenant to recover from his landlord for repairs made by the tenant upon the premises, he must show a contract with the landlord, express or implied, to pay for them; 38 Neb. 157.

As to the time when the repairs are to be made, it would seem reasonable that when the lessor is bound to make them he should have the right to enter and make them, when a delay until after the expiration of the lease would be injurious to the estate; but when no such damage exists, the landlord should have no right to enter without the consent of the tenant. See 18 Toullier, n. 297. A general covenant by a lessor to repair is construed to mean within a reasonable time after notice; 76 Cal. 173. When a house has been destroyed by accidental fire, neither the tenant nor the landlord is bound to rebuild, unless obliged by some agreement so to do; 4 Paige, Ch. 355; 1 Term 708. See LANDLORD AND TENANT; RENT; 4 Camp. 275; Co. Litt. 27 a; 3 Johns. 44; 6 Mass. 63; Platt. Co. 266; 1 Saund. 322, n. 1, 323, n. 7; 2 id. 158 b, n. 7 & 10.

REPARATION. The redress of an injury; amends for a tort inflicted. See REMEDY.

REPARATIONE FACIENDA, WRIT DE (Lat.). The name of an ancient writ which lies by one or more joint tenants against the other joint tenants, or by a person owning a house or building against the owner of the adjoining building, to compel the reparation of such joint property. Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 295.

REPATRIATION. The regaining nationality after expatriation.

REPAY. Repay does not necessarily mean to pay money. It has also the meaning of return, restore, etc.; 19 Kan. 390.

REPEAL. The abrogation or destruction of a law by a legislative act.

A repeal is express, as, when it is literally declared by a subsequent law, or implied, when the new law contains provisions contrary to or irreconcilable with those of the former law.

The power to revoke or annul a statute or ordinance is equivalent to the power to repeal it; and in either case the power is legislative and not judicial in its character; 30 W. Va. 479.

A statute is not to be deemed repealed merely by the enactment of another statute on the same subject. There must be a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law and the old, to work a repeal by implication; and even then the old law is repealed only to the extent of such repugnancy; 16 Pet. 342; 51 N. J. Eq. 382; 137 U. S. 682. This rule is supported in a vast variety of cases.

A law may be repealed by implication, by an affirmative as well as by a negative statute, if the substance is inconsistent with the old statute; 1 Ohio 10; 2 Bibb 96; Harp. 101; 4 Wash. C. C. 691; and a repeal by implication has been effected even where two inconsistent enactments have been passed in the same session; 2 B. & Ald. 818; or where two parts of the same act have proved repugnant to each other; 4 C. P. Div. 29; but this will be presumed only in extreme cases; 13 C. B. 461. A repeal by implication is not favored, the leaning of the courts is against the doctrine, if it be possible to reconcile the two acts; 1 Black 470; 137 U. S. 682; 146 Ill. 268; 57 Mich. 407; 73 Cal. 360; 78 Ia. 88; 50 Ark. 132; 9 Q. B. D. 58; [1892] 1 Q. B. 654; see 76 Ga. 181; 100 N. C. 474; and a general law is not to be held as repealing a prior special law unless it clearly manifests such intention; 98 Mo. 426; 85 Ky. 265; 45 La. Ann. 227; 146 Ill. 268; 12 U. S. App. 574. General legislation must give way to special legislation on the same subject; id. 267. But where the constitution directs the legislature to pass general legislation, and a law is passed, which is complete and does evidently intend to provide a uniform system, no words of repeal are necessary; 176 Pa. 67.

The later of two clearly inconsistent and repugnant acts must prevail; 104 N. Y. 218; 28 Neb. 618; and is an implied repeal of the earlier; 29 Ch. D. 15; but not unless their provisions are clearly inconsistent; 12 U. S. App. 574; and where they can be read together without repugnancy, both should stand; 50 L. J. M. C. 6; 157 U. S. 46; and the burden is on the one who asserts that there is an implied repeal; 29 Ch. D. 15.

An earlier statute is repealed by a subsequent one only in those particulars wherein it is clearly inconsistent and irreconcilable with the later enactment. The leaning of all courts is against repealing the positive provisions of former statutes by construction, unless there be such a manifest and total repugnance between the two enactments that they cannot both stand. It is not enough that there is a discrepancy between different parts of a system of legislation on the same general subject; there must be a conflict between different acts on the same specific subject; 177 Pa. 112. Where the repealing act is unconstitutional and void, it will not work a repeal; 26 Ala. 165; 3 Gray 476; 14 Mich. 276; 1 Wash. 382; contra, 11 Ind. 489.

Special legislation is not necessarily repealed by subsequent general legislation without words of repeal; 91 N. Y. 231; 152 Pa. 244; 146 Ill. 268; L. R. 10 A. C. 68. To have that effect there must be express reference or necessary implication; 2 J. & H. 53; 10 App. Cas. 68. Where a statute amends a former statute "so as to read as follows" and restates it at length the prior act is not repealed and re-enacted but is continued; 143 Mass. 418; inconsistent provisions in the former, omitted in the later, act are repealed; 136 N. Y. 347.

Where there is a general revision of statutes, clearly intended to be complete, it repeals prior legislation, though not repugnant and though the revision contains no words of repeal; 82 Ky. 256; 12 Mass. 537, 545; 9 Pick. 97; 42 Me. 53; 121 N. Y. 284; 37 N. H. 295; 30 Vt. 344; 8 Tex. 62; 14 Ill. 334; 6 B. Monr. 146; but only where the intent to repeal plainly appears; 62 Vt. 442. See 9 Ind. 337; 10 id. 566.

There can be no repeal by non-user; 2 Term 274. It was otherwise in the civil law, and it is said to be otherwise in Scotland; 1 Kent 466.

A statute purporting to cover an entire subject repeals all former statutes on the same subject, either with or without a repealing clause and notwithstanding it may omit material provisions of the earlier statutes; 86 Tenn. 523; 85 id. 495; 86 Ky. 170; 73 Ia. 619; 20 Oreg. 345.

A statute will not repeal a prior statute merely because it repeals some of its provisions and omits others, or adds new provisions; the later act operates as a repeal only when it plainly appears that it was intended as a substitute for the first act; 127 U. S. 406; and a previous statute will be held to be modified by a subsequent one, if the latter was plainly intended to cover the whole subject embraced by both, and prescribes the only rules in respect to that subject that are to govern; 134 U. S. 206.

Where a new statute expressly repeals the former statute, and the new and the repeal of the old are to take effect at the same time, a provision in the old statute which is embodied in the new is deemed to have continued in force without suspension; 3 Wisc. 667; 15 Ill. 595. But it has been held that where the new law does not go into effect until a time subsequent to that at which the repeal takes effect, such a provision is to be deemed repealed meantime; 12 La. Ann. 593. But see 1 Pick. 33.

As to what force should be given to portions of a statute excepted from repeal, see Endlich, Interpr. Stat.; 3 Wall. 495; 109 U. S. 556.

A difference in the punctuation of similar statutes does not in all cases warrant a different construction, particularly when the printer is responsible for it, and not the legislature; 39 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 548. See 34 Cent. L. J. 253.

Where an amendment changes the phraseology of a former act, it will be presumed that it was the intention to make a corresponding change in its meaning; 50 Fed. Rep. 749. Where a section of a statute is amended and afterwards such section "as amended" is repealed, the original section, and not the amendment merely, is repealed; 80 Ia. 661. The amendment of a statute does not repeal it so that a subsequent statute, which professes to amend the original act, is invalid; 45 Neb. 724. See 1 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 566.

It is a general rule that when a penal statute punishes an offence by a certain penalty, and a new statute is passed imposing a greater or a lesser penalty for the same offence, the former statute is repealed by implication; 5 Pick. 168; 3 Halst. 48; 3 A. K. Marsh. 70; see 1 Binn. 601; Bacon, Abr. Statute (D); but subsequent statutes which add accumulative penalties do not repeal former statutes; 1 Cowp. 297; 6 Mod. 141.

At common law the repeal of a repealing act revived the former act; 6 Co. 199; 1 Gray 163; 7 W. & S. 263; 2 Blackf. 32; 54 N. J. L. J. 175; and it has been held in the supreme court to have this effect, unless the language of the repealing statute or some general statute provides otherwise; 120 U. S. 52; but this rule is now altered in England by an act passed in 1880 and amended in 1889, and in many states this rule has been changed, as in Ohio and Louisiana; La. Civ. Code, art. 23. And in some states, as Tennessee and Georgia, the substance of an act repealed or revived must be stated in the caption or otherwise, and in others, as Connecticut and Arkansas, a repealing or amending act must recite the law so amended sufficiently to show the effect of the amendment or repeal. For a summary of statutes on the subject of repeals, see Stimson, Am. Stat. L. §§ 1042–3.

It has been held that when the repealing clause in an unconstitutional statute repeals all inconsistent acts, the repealing clause is to stand and have effect, notwithstanding the invalidity of the act; 11 Ind. 489. But other cases hold that such repealing clause is to be understood as designed to repeal all conflicting provisions, in order that those of the new statute can have effect, and that if the statute is invalid, nothing can conflict with it, and therefore nothing is repealed; 6 Wis. 605; 35 Barb. 264; Cooley, Const. Lim. 186.

A repealed statute is as if it had never existed, except as to transactions which are past and closed before the repeal; 4 De G. & J. 557; but the repeal leaves all the civil rights of the parties acquired under the law unaffected; 3 La. 337; 2 South. 689; Breese 29; 2 Stew. Ala. 160; 2 Wall. 450. An action for penalties cannot be sustained when the statute inflicting them has been repealed before judgment; 13 How. 429; nor an action for the recovery of money paid in violation of law, under similar circumstances; 5 Blatch. 229.

When a penal statute is repealed or so modified as to exempt a class from its operation, violations committed before the repeal are also exempted, unless specifically reserved, or unless there has been some private right vested by it; 2 Dana 330; 4 Yeates 392; 5 Rand. 657; 1 Wash. C. C. 84; 2 Va. Cas. 382.

REPERTORY. In French Law. A word used to donate the inventory or minutes which notaries are required to make of all contracts which take place before them. Dalloz, Dict.

REPETITION. In Civil Law. The act by which a person demands and seeks to recover what he has paid by mistake or delivered on a condition which has not been performed. Dig. 12. 4. 5.

The name of an action which lies to recover the payment which has been made by mistake when nothing was due.

Repetition is never admitted in relation to natural obligations which have been voluntarily acquitted, if the debtor had capacity to give his consent. 6 Toullier 386.

In order to entitle the payer to recover back money paid by mistake, it must have been paid by him to a person to whom he did not owe it, for otherwise he cannot recover it back,—the creditor having, in such case, the just right to retain the money. Repetitio nulla est ab eo qui suum recepit.

How far money paid under a mistake of law is liable to repetition has been discussed by civilians; and opinions on this subject are divided. 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans

ed. 369, 408-437; 1 Story, Eq. Pl. § 111, note 2.

In Scotch Law. The act of reading over a witness's deposition, in order that he may adhere to it or correct it, at his choice. The same as recolement (q. v.) in the French law. 2 Benth. Ev. 239.

REPLEADER. In Pleading. Making a new series of pleadings.

Judgment of repleaders differs from a judgment non obstante veredicto in this: that it is allowed by the court to do justice between the parties where the defect is in the form or manner of stating the right, and the issue joined is on an immaterial point, so that it cannot tell for whom to give judgment; 3 Pick. 124; 19 id. 419; while judgment non obstante is given only where it is clearly apparent to the court that the party who has succeeded has, upon his own showing, no merits, and cannot have by any manner of statement; 1 Chitty, Pl. 568. See 19 Ark. 194.

It may be ordered by the court for the purpose of obtaining a better issue, if it will effect substantial justice where issue has been reached on an immaterial point; 3 B. & P. 353; 2 Johns. 388; 3 Hen. & M. 118, 161; Gould, Pl. 473; as a plea of payment on a given day to an action on a bond conditioned to pay on or before that day; 2 Stra. 994. It is not to be allowed till after trial for a defect which is aided by verdict; 2 Saund. 319 b; Bac. Abr. Pleas. If granted or denied where it should not be, it is error; 2 Salk. 579. See 9 Ala. N. S. 198.

The judgment is general, and the parties must begin at the first fault which occasioned the immaterial issue; 1 Ld. Raym. 169; entirely anew, if the declaration is imperfect; 1 Chitty, Pl. 568; that the action must be dismissed in such case; 1 Wash. Va. 135; with the replication, if that be faulty and the bar be good; 3 Keb. 664; 1 Wash. Va. 155. No costs are allowed to either side; 6 Term 131; 2 B. & P. 376.

It cannot be awarded after a default at nisi prius; 1 Chitty, Pl. 568; nor where the court can give judgment on the whole record; Willes 532; nor after demurrer; 2 Mass. 81; unless, perhaps, where the bar and replication are bad; Cro. Eliz. 318; 7 Me. 302; nor after writ of error, without the consent of the parties; 3 Salk. 306; nor at any time in favor of the person who made the first fault; 1 Ld. Raym. 170; 1 Hempst. 268; 1 Humphr. 85; 6 Blackf. 375; see 3 Hen. & M. 388; nor after judgment; 1 Tyl. Vt. 146. The same end is secured in many of the states by statutes allowing amendments. See, generally, Tidd, Pr. 813, 814; Com. Dig. Pleader (R 18); Bac. Abr. Pleas (M).

REPLEGIARE (Lat.). To replevy; to redeem a thing detained or taken by another, by putting in legal sureties.

REPLEGIARE DE AVERIIS (Lat.). A writ brought by one whose cattle are impounded or distrained, upon security given to the sheriff to pursue or answer the action at law. 7 Hen. VIII. c. 4; Fitzh. N. B. 68; New Book of Entries, Replevin; Dy. 173; Reg. Orig. 81.

REPLEGIARE FACIAS (Lat.). A writ of replevin, which issued out of chancery, commanding the sheriff to deliver the distress to the owner, and afterwards to do justice in regard to the matter in his own county court. It was abolished by statute of Marlbridge (q. v.), which provided a shorter process. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 147*; Andr. Steph. Pl. 92.

REPLEVIN. In Practice. A form of action which lies to regain the possession of personal chattels which have been taken from the plaintiff unlawfully.

The action originally lay for the purpose of recovering chattels taken as a distress, but has acquired a much more extended use. In England and most of the states of the United States it extends to all cases of illegal taking, and in some of the states it may be brought wherever a person wishes to recover specific goods to which he alleges title. See infra.

A general use of this remedy seems to date from the latter part of the 13th century, referring to the fact that at that period the remedy known as vetitum namium (q. v.) was falling into desuetude. It is said that at that time, "under the name of Replegiare, or Replevin, an action was being developed which was proving itself to be convenient action for the settlement of disputes between landlord and tenant; but it seems to have owed its vigor, its rapidity, and therefore its convenience, to the supposition that a serious offence had been committed against the king." 2 Poll. & Maitl. 576.

By virtue of the writ, the sheriff proceeds at once to take possession of the property therein described and transfer it to the plaintiff, upon his giving pledges which are satisfactory to the sheriff to prove his title, or return the chattels taken if he fail so to do. It is said to have laid formerly in the detinuit, which is the only form now found at common law, and also in the detinet, where the defendant retained possession, and the sheriff proceeded to take possession and deliver the property to the plaintiff after the trial and proof of title; Bull. N. P. 52; Chitty, Pl. 145; 3 Bla. Com. 146; DETINET; DETINUIT.

It differs from detinue in this: that it requires an unlawful taking as the foundation of the action; and from all other personal actions in that it is brought to recover the possession of the specific property claimed to have been unlawfully taken.

The action lies to recover personal property; 19 Pa. 71; including parish records; 11 Pick. 492; trees after they had been cut down; 2 Barb. 613; 9 Mo. 259; 13 Ill. 192; records of a corporation; 5 Ind. 165; articles which can be specifically distinguished from all other chattels of the same kind by indicia or ear-marks; 18 Ill. 286; including money tied up in a bag and taken in that state; 2 Mod. 61; a promissory note; 155 Mass. 339; trees cut into boards; 30 Me. 370; 13 Ill. 192; a house which is being moved from the land on which it was built; 84 Me. 138; see 81 Wis. 341; 93 Mich. 49; but does not lie for injuries to things annexed to the realty; 4 Term 504; 2 M'Cord 329; 17 Johns. 116; 10 B. Monr. 72; nor to recover such things, if dissevered and removed as part of the same act; 3 S. & R. 509; 6 Me. 427; 8 Cow. 220; nor for writings concerning the realty; 1 Brownl. 168.

Replevin lies in Massachusetts wherever detinue does, e. g. for deeds which attend the inheritance; Holmes, Com. L. 352.

A general property with the right to immediate possession gives the plaintiff sufficient title to maintain it; 3 Wend. 280; 15 Pick. 63; 9 Gill & J. 220; 2 Ark. 315; 4 Blackf. 304; 8 Dana 268; 27 Miss. 198; 2 Swan 358; 60 Vt. 624; as do a special property and actual possession; 2 Watts 110; 2 Ark. 315; 4 Blackf. 304; 10 Mo. 277; 9 Humphr. 739; 2 Ohio St. 82; and the bare possession of property, though wrongfully obtained, is sufficient title to maintain it against a mere stranger; 51 Minn. 294.

A joint owner of personal property can maintain replevin in his own name to recover it, against one whose right is not superior to his; 60 Vt. 718.

It will not lie for the defendant in another action to recover goods belonging to him and taken on attachment; 5 Co. 99; 20 Johns. 470; 2 N. H. 412; 2 B. Monr. 18; 3 Md. 54; nor, generally, for goods properly in the custody of the law; 2 N. & M'C. 456; 3 Md. 54; 7 Watts 173; 4 Ark. 525; 8 Ired. 387; 16 How. 622; 3 Mich. 163; Hempst. 10; 2 Wisc. 92; 1 Sneed 390; 72 Hun 633; but this rule does not prevent a third person, whose goods have been improperly attached in such suit, from bringing this action: 4 Pick. 167; 14 Johns. 84; 6 Halst. 370; 2 Blackf. 172; 7 Ohio 133; 19 Me. 255; 9 Gill & J. 220; 24 Vt. 371.

As to the rights of co-tenants to bring this action as against each other, see 1 Harr. & G. 308: 12 Conn. 331; 15 Pick. 71; 36 Neb. 621; as against strangers, see 4 Mas. 515; 12 Wend. 131; 15 Me. 245; 2 N. J. L. 552; 27 N. H. 220; 6 Ind. 414.

The action lies, in England and most of the United States, wherever there has been an illegal taking; 18 E. L. & E. 230; 7 Johns. 140; 5 Mass. 283; 3 S. & R. 562; 1 Mas. 319; 11 Me. 28; 2 Blackf. 415; 1 Const. 401; 3 N. H. 36; 6 Halst. 370; 1 Ill. 130; 1 Mo. 345; 6 T. B. Monr. 421; 6 Ark. 18; 4 Harr. Del. 327; and in some states wherever a person claims title to specific chattels in another's possessions; 2 Harr. & J. 429; 4 Me. 306; 1 Pa. 238; 4 Harr. N. J. 160; 4 Mo. 93; 8 Blackf. 244; Hempst. 10; 4 R. I. 539; 121 Mass. 107; 54 Me. 447; 48 Miss. 357; while in others it is restricted to a few cases of illegal seizure; 9 Conn. 140; 3 Rand. 448; 16 Miss. 279; 4 Mich. 295. The object of the action is to recover possession; and it will not lie where the property has been restored. And when brought in the detinet the destruction of the articles by the defendant is no answer to the action; 3 Bla. Com. 147.

The declaration must describe the place of taking. Great accuracy was formerly required in this respect; 2 Wms. Saund. 74 b; 10 Johns. 53; but now a statement of the county in which it occurred is said to be sufficient; 1 P. A. Bro. 60.

The chattels must be accurately described in the writ; 6 Halst. 179; 1 Harr. & G. 252; 4 Blackf. 70; 1 Mich. 92.

The plea of non cepit puts in issue the taking, and not the plaintiff's title; 6 Ired. 38; 25 Me. 464; 3 N. Y. 506; 2 Fla. 42; 12 Ill. 378; and the pleas, not guilty; 9 Mo. 256; cepit in alio loco, and property in another, are also of frequent occurrence.

An avowry, cognizance, or justification is often used in defence. See those titles.

The judgment, when the action is in the detinuit, if for the plaintiff, confirms his title, and is also for damages assessed by the jury for the injurious taking and detention; 1 W. & S. 513; 20 Wend. 172; 15 Me. 20; 1 Ark. 557; 5 Ired. 192. In actions of replevin the measure of damages is the real value of the chattel at the time the tortious possession of the defendant began, with damages for its unlawful detention: 54 N. J. L. 597.

The defendant in replevin is not concluded by the value of the property named in the bond of the writ, when he brings an action on the bond, and is not estopped from showing such value to be greater than there stated; 125 U. S. 426.

See JUDGMENT; Morris, Repl.; 6 E. & B. 842; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 3.

REPLEVY. To re-deliver goods which have been distrained to the original possessor of them, on his giving pledges in an action of replevin. It signifies also the bailing or liberating a man from prison, on his finding bail to answer. See REPLEVIN.

REPLIANT. One who makes a replication.

REPLICATION (Lat. replicare, to fold back).

The plaintiff's answer to the defendant's plea or answer.

In Equity. The plaintiff's avoidance or denial of the answer or defence. Story, Eq. Pl. § 877.

A general replication is a general denial of the truth of the defendant's plea or answer, and of the sufficiency of the matter alleged in it to bar the plaintiff's suit, and an assertion of the truth and sufficiency of the bill. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 329, 330. Such a replication is always sufficient to put in issue every material allegation of an answer or amended answer, unless the rules of pleading imperatively require an amendment of the bill: 168 U. S. 1.

A special replication was one which introduced new matter to avoid the defendant's answer. It might be followed by rejoinder, surrejoinder, and rebutter. Special replications have been superseded by the practice of amending bills; 1 How. Intr. 55; 17 Pet. App. 68. A replication must be made use of where the plaintiff intends to introduce evidence, and a subpœna to the defendant to rejoin must be added, unless he will appear gratis; Story, Eq. Pl. § 879.

A replication may be filed nunc pro tunc after witnesses have been examined under leave of court; Story, Eq. Pl. § 881; Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jeremy 328. If a replication is taken to a plea and issue be found thereon, the bill will not be dismissed, provided the facts contained in the plea are proved; 24 U. S. App. 542.

In the federal courts, after an answer is filed on any rule day, complainant has until the second rule day thereafter to file a general replication; 85 Fed. Rep. 508 (in the 8th Circuit).

In Admiralty. No replication to the answer to a libel is now allowed; the libellant, under Adm. Rule 51, is considered as denying new facts set up in the answer.

At Law. The plaintiff's reply to the defendant's plea. It contains a statement of matter, consistent with the declaration, which avoids the effect of the defendant's plea or constitutes a joinder in issue thereon. See Andr. Steph. Pl. 151.

It is, in general, governed by the plea, whether dilatory or in bar, and most frequently denies it. When the plea concludes to the country, the plaintiff must generally reply by a similiter. See SIMILITER; Hempst. 67. When it concludes with a verification, the plaintiff may either conclude the defendant by matter of estoppel, deny the truth of the plea in whole or in part, confess and avoid the plea, or new assign the cause of action in case of an evasive plea. Its character varies with the form of action and the facts of the case. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 519.

As to the form of the replication:

The title contains the name of the court, and the term of which it is pleaded, and in the margin the names of the plaintiff and defendant. 2 Chitty, Pl. 641.

The commencement is that part which immediately follows the title, and contains a general denial of the effect of the defendant's plea. When the plea is to the jurisdiction, it contains a statement that the writ ought not to be quashed, or that the court ought not to be ousted of their jurisdiction. Rastell, Entr. 101. When misnomer is pleaded, no such allegation is required; 1 B. & P. 61.

When matter in estoppel is replied, it is, in general, in the words "and the said plaintiff saith that the said defendant."

When the replication denies or confesses and avoids the plea, it contains a precludi non, which see.

The body should contain—

Matter of estoppel, which should be set forth in the replication if it does not appear from the previous pleadings: as, if the matter has been tried upon a particular issue in trespass and found by the jury; 3 East 346; 4 Mass. 443; 4 Dana 73; denial of the truth of the plea, either of the whole plea, which may be by a denial of the fact or facts constituting a single point in express words; 12 Barb. 573; 36 N. H. 232; 28 Vt. 279; 1 Humphr. 524; or by the general replication and injuria, etc., according to the form of action; 8 Co. 67; 1 B. & P. 79; 13 Ill. 80; 19 Vt. 329; or of a part of the plea, which may be of any material fact; 20 Johns. 406; 13 T. B. Monr. 288; and of such only; 20 N. H. 323; 37 E. L. & E. 479; 9 Gill 310; 3 Pet. 31; or of matter of right resulting from facts; 1 Saund. 23 a, n. 5; 10 Ark. 147; see 2 Ia. 120; and see TRAVERSE; a confession and avoidance; 23 N. H. 535; 2 Denio 97; 10 Mass. 226; see CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE; a new assignment, which see.

The conclusion should be to the country when the replication denies the whole of the defendant's plea containing matter of fact; 2 McLean 92; 7 Pick. 117; 1 Johns. 516; as well where the plea is to the jurisdiction; 1 Chitty, Pl. 385; as in bar; 1 Chitty, Pl. 554; but with a verification when new matter is introduced; 1 Saund. 103, n.; 17 Pick. 87; 1 Brev. 11; 11 Johns. 56. See 5 Ind. 264. The conclusions in particular cases are stated in 1 Chitty, Pl. 615; Com. Dig. Pleader (F 5). See 1 Saund. 103, n.; 1 Johns. 516; Archb. Civ. Pl. 258; 19 Viner, Abr. 29; Bac. Abr. Trespass (I 4).

As to the qualities of a replication. It must be responsive to the defendant's plea; 17 Ark. 365; 4 McLean 521; answering all which it professes to answer; 12 Ark. 183; 8 Ala. N. S. 375; and if bad in part, is bad altogether; 1 Saund. 338; 7 Cra. 156; 32 Ala. N. S. 506; directly; 10 East 205; see 7 Blackf. 481; without departing from the allegations of the declaration in any material matter; 2 Watts 306; 4 Munf. 205; 22 N. H. 303; 5 Blackf. 306; 1 Ill. 26; see DEPARTURE; with certainty; 6 Fla. 25; see CERTAINTY; and without duplicity; 4 Ill. 423; Daveis 236; 14 N. H. 373; 26 Vt. 397; 4 Wend. 211; see DUPLICITY. Although the replication is a departure from the complaint, yet the defendant cannot avail himself of such a defect in a court of error, where he did not raise the question by demurrer or by motion, but went to trial upon the issues as made up; 148 U. S. 345.

An objection that replications were not filed to the defendant's pleas when the trial commenced, nor before judgment with leave of court, comes too late if made after entry of judgment; 144 U. S. 484.

REPLY. In England in public prosecutions for felony or misdemeanor, instituted by the Crown, the law officers have a general right of reply, whether the defendant has introduced evidence or not; but prosecuting counsel in ordinary cases have not this right. See 6 Law Mag. & Rev., 4 Ser. 102. See OPENING AND CLOSING; RIGHT TO BEGIN; BURDEN OF PROOF.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE. That communication which the chairman makes to the house upon the close of the investigation in which the committee has been engaged.

REPORT OFFICE. Formerly a department of the English court of chancery. Whart.

REPORTS. A printed or written collection of accounts or relations of cases judicially argued and determined.

The value and force of adjudicated precedents, which is, to a grepter or less degree, acknowledged in the jurisprudence of all civilized countries, is elsewhere discussed under the titles herein, judge-made law, precedent, and stare decisis. The greater weight given to precedent, however, in England and America, makes the subject of law reporting one of the utmost interest and importance. The multiplication of reports has given rise to much discussion on the subject.

In an able report to the American Bar Association, 1898, presented by Edward Q. Keasbey, it was suggested that the evils of excessive reports would be lessened if the court could be induced to write shorter opinions, especially when passing upon well-settled principles of law, and if the dissenting opinions were brief. The committee thought that dissenting opinions should be published. Only the important cases should be reported, omitting those which decide only questions of fact, or reaffirm settled principles of law, the selection to be made by the reporter. In preparing the syllabus all dicta should be omitted, and also propositions of law made by the court which were only arguendo. The reporter should state the facts even though they are stated by the court; an abstract of the arguments should be printed only in novel and important cases; Rep. Am. Bar Ass'n, 1898.

Prior to the year 1800, there were only one or two American Reports. In England, however, there were very many, but before the period of official reporting, and particularly among the early reports, there is a great difference in the value of the reports published by volunteer reporters. While some of them are of the highest authority, both in England and America, others are of little or, in many cases, of no authority whatever, and it is of the highest importance that a lawyer in citing them should know the character of the volume cited.

They are often mere note-books of lawyers or of students, or copies hastily and very inaccurately made from genuine manuscripts. In some instances one part of the book is good, when another is perfectly worthless. This is especially true of the early Chancery Reports, which were generally printed as booksellers' "jobs."

The failure to give due attention to the character of the old reports has led to grave judicial errors. Mr. Wallace, in "The Reporters," calls attention to the fact that the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, which "had the effect of almost totally subverting in two states of our Union the entire law of charitable uses," relied upon the authority, which, twenty-five years afterwards, under the critical examination of Mr. Binney, was shown to be no authority, and the opinion passed upon it was overruled. The necessity of attention to the apparent value of the old reports is enhanced by the fact that even in books of the worst authority, there are occasional cases well reported, and different parts of the same book are of very different value. The most thorough and satisfactory source of information on this subject is "The Reporters," the author of which made the most exhaustive investigations in London, and his work received the highest commendation from English judges; 5 C. B. N. S. 854, where the book was characterized "as highly valuable and interesting," and one to which "they could not refrain from referring" on a question involving the reputation of one of the early English reporters."

Although want of space requires the omission in this revision of the detailed list of reports, a few of the comments upon the older reporters are given here in view of the fact that some of the sources from which they were drawn are out of print.

For a history of the "Law Reports" in England, with much information on reporting, see Daniel, History of the Origin of the Law Reports, 1884.

See 1 Abbott's National Digest x, for much information as to the Federal Reports, other than those in supreme court. All of the federal cases (except in the Supreme Court) have been reprinted in a very valuable series, in thirty volumes, under the name of "Federal Cases."

See, generally, 1 Kent, 14th ed. 471; 9 L. Quart. Rev. 179; 1 id. 137; Wambaugh, Study of Cases, passim; 2 Jurid. Soc. Papers 745, "The Expediency of Digesting the Precedents of the Common Law, and Regulating the Publication of Reports."

For a list of reports, see Soule, Lawyers' Reference Manual, which gives the chronology of all reports.

Among the English reporters the following possess little authority: Noy, Godbolt, Owen, Popham, Winch, March, Hutton, Ley, Lane, Hetley, Carter, J. Bridgman, Keble, Siderfin, Latch, several volumes of the "Modern" Reports, 3d Salkeld, Gilbert's Cases in Law and Equity, the 1st and 2d parts of "Reports in Chancery," Chancery Cases, Reports temp. Finch, "Gilbert's Reports," 8th Taunton, Peake's Nisi Prius Reports.

Prof. Wambaugh (Study of Cases) speaks of the "many cases excellently reported by Dyer, Plowden, Coke, Croke, Yelverton, Hobart, and Saunders." The first reporter to make orderly and condensed reports in full harmony with modern ideas was Sir James Burrow (1756–1772, K. B.); id.

Aleyn (John). K. B., 1646–48. 1 vol. These are reports of cases in the time of the civil wars of Charles I., and do not possess much authority, though containing reports of Rolle's decisions.

Ambler (Charles). Cases in the High Court of Ch. 1737–83. Second edition by J. E. Blunt. 2 vols. As originally published of very little authority, but much improved by Mr. Blunt, whose edition was published in 1828.

Barnardiston (Thomas). High Ct. of Ch., 1740–41. 1 vol. Lord Mansfield (2 Burr. 1142) forbade the citing of this book as it would be only misleading the students to put them upon reading it. He said it was marvellous, however, to those who knew the sergeant, and his manner of taking notes, that he should so often stumble upon what was right; but that there was not one case in his book which was so throughout. Lord Eldon, however, in 1 Bligh, N. R. 538, says, "in that book there are reports of very great authority."

Barnardiston (Thomas). K. B., 1726–34. 2 vols. A book which for many years was very little esteemed, the author having been reputed a careless fellow who let the wags scribble what they liked in his note-book while he was asleep. However, where his accuracy has been tested, as it has been of later times, it has come out pretty fairly; and now both the K. B. and Ch. reports of Barnardiston are reasonably respected. See Wallace, Report. 423.

Bendloes (Guilelme). All the Courts, 1531–1628. 1 vol. Properly cited as New Benloe, but sometimes as old Benloe.

Benloe (Gulielme) & Dalison (Gulielme). C. P. Benloe contains cases from 1532 to 1579, and Dalison from 1546 to 1574. 1 vol. of each, bound together. There is very great confusion in the citations of the reports of Benloe and Dalison. Some cases of Benloe's are given at the end of Keilway's Reports and of Ashe's Tables. It is supposed that the title New Benloe was given to the volune here given as Bendloes to distinguish it from the cases in Keilway and Ashe. The volume given as Benloe & Dalison consists in reality of two separate series of reports, paged independently, although bound together, and the modes of reference are very various, being sometimes to Dalison when Benloe is intended, and vice versa. A full account is given in Wallace's Report. 80–85. 93, of these reports, and of the various mistakes made in citation.

Blackstone (William). K. B., C. P., and Exch. Chamber, 1746–79. 2 vols. Lord Mansfield said (Dougl. 92, n.): "We must not always rely on the words of reports, though under great names. Mr. Justice Blackstone's reports are not very accurate," but of late they have been well edited, and are more esteemed.

Bosanquet (J. B.) & Puller (C.). New Reports, C. P., Exch. Chamb., and House of Lords, 1804–07. 3 vols. The volumes of Bosanquet & Puller are generally cited from 1 to 5 in American books. In English books the latter series is frequently cited as New Reports.

Brooke (Robert). New Cases. Called also Petit Brooke, Little Brooke and Bellewe's Cases, temp. Henry VIII. A selection of cases in the K. B., C. P., and Exch., 1515–58. These cases were selected out of Brooke's Abridgment by Richard Bellewe.

Burrow (James). K. B., 1756–71. 5 vols. A full, excellent, and accurate reporter, who holds in a legal point of view the same relation to Lord Mansfield that in a literary and historical one Boswell does to Dr. Johnson.

Carthew (Thomas). King's Bench, 3 Jac. II.–12 Will. III. 1 vol. Lord Thurlow said, "Carthew and his book were equally bad authority," but Lord Kenyon, in 2 Term 776, says that Carthew is in general a good reporter. See also Willes 182.

Cary (George). Ch., 1557–1604. 1 vol. Frequently mere transcripts from the Registrar's books.

Cases in B. R. temp. Holt. Cases and Resolutions in the Court of K. B., 1714–29. 1 vol. This must not be mistaken for "Reports temp. Holt," for which see "Holt."

Cases in Chancery. Two parts in 1 vol.; with this is usually bound "Select Cases in the High Ct. of Ch.," which contains the cases of the Duke of Norfolk and of the Earls of Bath & Montagu; it is cited as 1st, 2d, & 3d "Chancery Cases."

Cases tempore Hardwicke. K. B. at Westminster during the time of Hardwicke, usually cited as Hardwicke's Cases, which see; see also Ridgway.

Cases tempore Talbot. K. B., C. P., and Ch., 1734–38. 1 vol. By Alex. Forrester to page 217, and from there to the end, by Hawkins. A book of highly respectable authority, though not a monument worthy of Lord Talbot's transcendent virtue. Wallace, Report. 506.

Cases tempore William III. King's Bench, 1690–1702. 1 vol. See Modern, vol. 12. Buller said in Dougl. 83, "12th Modern is not a book of any authority."

Choyce Chancery Cases. 1557–1606. 1 vol. A very good little book, so far as it goes. See Wallace, Report. 470, where curious extracts are given from the volume. Reprinted, 1870.

Coke (Edward). King's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer; and Chancery. 1572–1618. 13 parts or volumes. Lord Coke's reports are very voluminous. They have been severely criticised by Sir Edward Sugden, Lord Redesdale, and others, and Coke charged with "telling untruths" in them: but all the charges made against him have been examined by Mr. Wallace (Reporters, p. 165), and Lord Coke's integrity vindicated from the imputations of his countrymen.

Comberbach (Roger). K. B., 1685–99. It is said by Lord Thurlow (1 Bro. C. C. 97) to be bad authority, though a few cases are better reported than in any other place. Its chief use is for comparison with other reports of the same cases. Wallace, Report. 396.

Cox (Edward W.). Criminal Cas. in all the Cts. in England and Ireland, 1843–81. 14 vols. These reports, which are edited by Mr. Cox, are prepared by a large number of reporters.

Croke (Sir George). Ch., K. B., and C. P., 1582–1641. 4 vols. The reports in Croke are generally short, and, as the books consist of four closely-printed volumes, the cases are, of course, very numerous. Occasionally cases are misreported: but taken as a whole, Croke has enjoyed from early times a high reputation, and even now is constantly cited. Wallace, Report. 198. The Chancery cases in the time of Elizabeth are Sir Harbottle Grimston's. The reports are commonly cited by the name of the author and the reigning sovereign: vol. 1 as Croke Car., vols. 2 & 3 Croke Eliz., and vol. 4 Croke Jac.

Davies, or Davis, or Davy (Sir John). K. B., C. P., and Exch. in Ireland, 1604–12. 1 vol. Davies, who was chief-justice of Ireland, and died on the night of the day on which he had been appointed chief-justice of England, was a man of great genius and accomplishments. For an account of these reports, see Wallace, Report. 229.

Dickens (John). High Ct. of Ch., 1559–1798. 2 vols. Mr. Dickens was a very attentive and diligent register; but his notes, being rather loose, are not to be considered as of very high authority. Lord Redesdale, 1 Sch. & L. 240. See, also, Sugd. Vend. 146. A few cases, where the opinions are printed from manuscripts prepared for publication, are valuable. Wallace, Report. 476.

Dyer (Sir James). K. B. and C. P. Exch. and Ch., 1513–82. 3 vols. Short notes, never intended by Dyer to have been published; always regarded, however, as among the best of the old reports. Wallace, Report. 126.

Ellis (Thomas F.) & Blackburn (Colm). Q. B., 1852–58. 8 vols. Among modern reports few are more valued for the success with which extraneous matter is stripped off and nothing but the essence of the case presented to the reader. 9 Lond. Law Mag. 339.

Equity Cases Abridged. Cases in the High Court of Ch., 1667–1744. 3 vols. This work is a digest, rather than reports, and is frequently cited. The first volume, which is attributed to Pooley, is of excellent authority; the second, much less so.

Fortesque (John). Select cases in all the courts of Westminster Hall, tempore Will. III., Anne, Geo. I., and Geo. II.; also the Opinion of all the Judges of England relative to the Grandest Prerogatives of the royal family, and some observations relating to the Prerogative of a Queen-Consort. 1 vol.

Freeman (Richard). K. B. and C. P., 1670–1704. 1 vol. Freeman's note-book having been stolen by a student, and these reports published surreptitiously, they were for a long time but little esteemed. Of late, however, they have been re-edited, and enjoy a higher reputation than they formerly did. Lord Mansfield said, in Cowp. 16, "Some of the cases in Freeman are very well reported." Wallace, Report. 390.

Gilbert (J.). Cases in Law and Eq., 1713–15. 1 vol. A posthumous work, containing one or two cases well reported, but generally consisting of loose notes very badly edited. Wallace, Report. 251. Commonly cited as Gilbert's Cases.

Hardwicke's Cases. Court of King's Bench at Westminster, 7th to 10th Geo. II., during which time Hardwicke presided in that court, to which are added some cases decided by Lee and two Equity cases by Hardwicke.

Hetley (Sir Thomas). C. P., 1627–31. 1 vol. Not marked by any peculiar skill, accuracy, or information. Dougl. ix. Not valued. 2 Jurid. Soc. Papers 577.

Hobart (Sir Henry). C. P. and Ch., 1–23 Jac. I. Hobart was a great judge; and these reports, which are by himself, have always been esteemed. Wallace (Report. p. 163) cites from Judge Jenkins a splendid tribute to his character.

Holt. Reports tempore Holt. K. B., C. P., Exch., and Ch., 1688–1710. 1 vol., by Giles Jacob. (Taken from a MS. of Thomas Farresley.) In Rex v. Bishop of London, Lee, C. J., said this was a book of no authority.

Howell (Thomas B.) & (Thomas J.). State Trials and Proceedings for High Treason and other Crimes and Misdemeanors, 1163–1820. 33 vols., and Index.
Vol. 1–21, 1163–1783. T. B. Howell.
22–33, 1783–1820. T. J. Howell.
This is an immense collection of cases, brought together by hunting through every collection in England, and, therefore, having very different degrees of merit. For a full account of its character and value, see Wallace's Report. 64.

Hutton (Sir Richard). C. P., 1612–38. 1 vol. This book, says Mr. Wallace, seems to belong to that class of literary productions which do not obtain notoriety enough to be abused. Wallace, Report. 246.

Jenkins (David). Exchequer, 1220–1623. 1 vol. Eight centuries, or eight hundred cases. See an interesting account of Jenkins, who was a Welsh judge, by Mr. D'Israeli, given in Wallace's Report. 71.

The reports of Jenkins were prepared in prison, where Jenkins was put for his loyalty to Charles I. and kept for fifteen years. The book is of excellent authority.

Jones (Sir William). K. B. and C. P., House of Lords, and Exch. Chamb., 1620–41. It is a book of good authority. It is sometimes cited as 1st Jones, to distinguish it from Sir Thomas Jones, which is then correspondingly cited as 2d Jones.

Keble (Joseph). K. B., 12–20 Car. II. 3 vols., an inaccurate reporter, yet a tolerable historian of the law; 3 Wils. 330. Not a satisfactory reporter, but a pretty good register, and more esteemed of late, perhaps, than formerly. Wallace, Report. 315.

Keilwey (Robert). K. B. and C. P. It also contains some cases incerti temporis, and some temp. Edw. III. The volume, having been edited by John Croke, is sometimes cited as Croke's Reports. See Wallace, Report. 119.

Leonard (William). K. B., C. P., and Exch., 1540–1615. A very good and much-esteemed reporter; one of the best, indeed, of the old books. See Wallace, Report. 142, citing Sugden, Lord Nottingham, and Sir George Treby.

Ley (Sir James). King's Bench, C. P., Ex., and Court of Wards, and Star Chamber, 1608–29. 1 vol. The book is seldom cited. Wallace, Report. 241. It is sometimes cited as Leigh; id. 244.

Lofft (Capel). K. B., C. P., and Ch., 1772–74. 1 vol. Not a very highly esteemed reporter, but the only volume giving an account of the great case of the negro Somerset.

Meeson (R.) & Welsby (W. N.). Exch. and Exch. Chamb., 1836–47. 16 vols. Among the most useful and best reported of the modern English reports.

Modern Cases in Law and Equity. See Modern Reports, parts 8 & 9; in 1 Burr. 396, it is observed, that it is a miserable, bad book, and in 3 Burr. 1326, the court said they treated it with the contempt it deserved.

Modern Reports. Select Cases in the K. B., C. P., Ch., and Exch., 1669–1755. 12 vols. By various hands, and of various degrees of excellence; some are very inferior. See much learning on the subject in Wallace, Report. 347–390. See Modern Cases in Law and Equity.

Moore (Edmund F.). Cases in Privy Council. New Series, 1862–78. 9 vols. Vol. 3, p. 347 to the end, and vols. 4–9 are identical word for word with 1–4 Law Reports, Privy Council.

Moore (Francis). K. B., C. P., Exch., and Ch., 1512–1612. 1 vol. Moore's Reports are printed from a genuine manuscript, and are esteemed valuable and accurate.

Mosely (William). High Court of Ch., time of King, 1726–30. 1 vol. Condemned by Lord Mansfield, but perhaps on insufficient ground. Lord Eldon, a better judge of the merits of a Chancery Reporter, spoke well of it (19 Ves. 488, n.), as did also Mr. Hargrave. Wallace, Report. 504.

New Reports. See Bosanquet & Puller.

Noy (William). K. B. and C. P., 1559–1649. 1 vol. This is an abridgment by Serjeant Size, who when a student borrowed Noy's Reports and abridged them for his own use. Vide Ventr. 81; 2 Keb. 652; for a full account see Wallace, Report. 154.

Plowden (Edmund). K. B., C. P., and Exch., 1550–80. 1 vol. Probably the most full, finished, and thoroughly accurate of the old reporters; always highly esteemed. For an amusing illustration of subtle argumentation, see the case of Hales v. Petit, as quoted by Wallace, Report. 147, where he shows it to be the original of the grave-digger's scene in Hamlet.

Raymond (Lord Robert). K. B. and C. P., 1694–1734. 3 vols. Some of the earlier cases in Lord Raymond, having been taken when he was a young man, or copied from the papers of his different young friends, have not been so highly esteemed, perhaps, as his other cases, which are, generally speaking, his own. As a whole, his reports are highly respected, and often cited, even in this day and country. Wallace, Report. 401.

Ridgeway (William). K. B. and Ch., at the time Lord Hardwicke presided in those courts. King's Bench, 1736, Chancery, 1744–45.

Salkeld (William). K. B., Ch., C. P., and Exch., 1 Will. III. to 10 Anne. 3 vols. The third volume having been published from notes less carefully prepared than the first two, is not accounted as of the highest authority.

Saville (Sir John). C. P. and Exch., 1580–94. This book, says Wallace (Report. 197), appears to be in the condition of Pope's "most women," and to have no character at all. I have not found a word upon it, either of censure or of praise.

Sayer (Joseph). K. B., 1751–56. 1 vol. "An inaccurate reporter." 1 Sugd. Vend. 80.

Select Chancery Cases. High Court of Ch. Containing the great cases of the Duke of Norfolk, and of the Earls of Bath and Montague. (This is part 3 of Chancery Cases, and is usually bound with parts 1 & 2.)

Strange (Sir John). Ch., K. B., C. P., and Exch. 2 vols. Authoritative, though too brief in the style of reporting. Mr. Nolan, in 1795, published a new edition, which has rendered Strange more valuable than he was. Wallace, Report. 420.

Style (William). K. B., "now Upper Bench," 1646–1655. Printed from a genuine manuscript, and esteemed.

Taunton (William P.). C. P. and other Cts., 1807–19. 8 vols. The eighth volume of Taunton is not very highly esteemed, having been made up from his notes and not supervised by him. Wallace, Report. 533, note; 9 Lond. Law Mag. 389.

Vaughan (Sir J.). C. P., 1665–74. 1 vol. Edited by Edward Vaughan. Containing some cases from his own perfected manuscript, very well reported, but some others not fully prepared, and not so much esteemed. Vaughan was an interesting character, upon whose merits the author of The Reporters dwells with interest. See page 884.

Vernon (Thomas). High Ct. of Ch., 1680–1719. 2 vols. Vernon was a very eminent chancery lawyer; but his reports were posthumously published from notes found in his study after his death. They were loose, and on that account unsatisfactory and inaccurate. A very highly improved edition was published in 1806, 1807, by Mr. Raithby, under the auspices of Lord Eldon. The manuscript reports of Vernon were the subject of an entertaining chancery suit between his widow, his heir-at-law, and his residuary legatee. No one of the parties, however, succeeded; and the case was ended by the lord chancellor's keeping the manuscript himself. See Wallace, Report. 493.

West (Martin, J.). High Court of Ch., 1736–39. 1 vol. A book published only of recent time, though from ancient and genuine manuscripts. It is a good work so far as it goes, but, unfortunately, includes but a short term of Lord Hardwicke's administration in Chancery.

Willes (John). C. P., Exch. Chamb., Ch., and House of Lords, 1737–58. 1 vol. Edited by Charles Durnford. Posthumously published, but quite authoritative and useful.

Year-Books. Cases in different Courts, 1307–1537. 11 vols. See YEAR-BOOKS.

Year-Books of Edward I. K. B., 1292–1307. 5 vols. Edited and translated by A. J. Horwood. Published by the authority of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls.

Yelverton (Sir Henry). K. B., 1603–13. 1 vol. Excellent reports of a first-rate old-school English lawyer, and admirably edited in America by Judge Metcalf. See Wallace, Report. 211, where a full biographical sketch of the gifted and unfortunate reporter is given.

REPRESENT. To exhibit, to expose before the eyes. To represent a thing is to produce it publicly. Dig. 10. 4. 2. 3.

REPRESENTATION. In Insurance. The stating of facts by either of the parties to a policy of insurance, to the other, whether in writing or orally, expressly or by plain implication, preliminary and in reference to making the insurance, obviously tending to influence the other as to entering into the contract. 12 Md. 348; 11 Cush. 324; 2 N. H. 551; 6 Gray 391.

A statement incidental to the contract, relative to some fact having reference thereto, and upon the faith of which the contract is made. May, Ins. 190. It may be affirmative or promissory.

The distinction between representation and warranty must be carefully observed; the latter is a part of the contract, the former is but a statement incidental thereto. In an action on the policy the plaintiff must show facts sufficient to bring him within the terms of the warranty, while the burden of proving the untruthfulness of representations, if any, is on the defendant. Further, representations need not be literally complied with; 49 Neb. 811; but only in material points; while in cases of warranty, the question of materiality does not arise; May, Ins. § 183. All reasonable doubts as to whether statements inserted in or referred to in an insurance policy are warranties or representations should be resolved in favor of the assured; 58 Ark. 528. Representations in writing are, ipso facto, material; 4 H. L. C. 484; 98 Mass. 381; 31 Ia. 216. Representations are material though the fact represented may not relate directly to the risk; 20 N. Y. 32.

Doctrines respecting representation and concealment usually have reference to those by the assured, upon whose knowledge and statement of facts the insurance is usually made; but the doctrine on the subject is equally applied to the underwriter, so far as facts are known to him; 3 Burr. 1905.

In the absence of fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation, the assured cannot be protected by claims of ignorance of the contents of the application, since it is his duty to inform himself of its contents before signing; 45 Mo. App. 426; and it is the duty of the assured to communicate all material facts, and he cannot urge as an excuse for his omission to do so that they were actually known to the underwriters, unless the knowledge of the latter was as full and particular as his own information; 107 U. S. 485.

A misrepresentation though made unintentionally, or through mistake, makes the insurance void, notwithstanding its being free from fraud; 1 Du. 747; 18 Eng. L. & Eq. 427. See 87 Ky. 541.

The material falsity of an oral promissory representation, without fraud, is no defence in an action on a policy. If made with the intent to deceive, the policy may be thereby avoided. Promissory representations, reduced to writing and made a part of the contract, become substantial warranties; May, Ins. § 182. See 9 Allen 540.

A substantial compliance with a representation is sufficient,—the rule being less strict than in case of a warranty; 3 Metc. Mass. 114; 4 Mas. 439; 31 Ia. 216; 34 Md. 582. See 98 Mass. 381. The validity of the policy does not depend on the literal truth of the assertion ; 49 Neb. 811. The substantial truth of the statement is for the jury, but not its materiality; May, Ins. § 187.

Insurance against fire and on life rests upon the same general conditions of good faith as marine insurance ; but in the first two classes the contract is usually based mainly upon statements by the applicant in written replies to numerous inquiries expressly referred to in the policy, which answers are thus made express warranties and must, accordingly, be strictly true whether their being so is or is not material to the risk. The inquiries are intended to cover all material circumstances, subject, however, to the principle, applicable to all contracts, that fraud by either party will exonerate the other from his obligations, if he so elects ; 7 Barb. 570 ; 10 Pick. 535 ; 6 Gray 288 ; 2 Rob. La. 266 ; 24 Pa. 320 ; 3 Md. 341 ; 2 Ohio 452 ; 21 Conn. 19 ; 6 Humphr. 176 ; 6 McLean 324 ; 8 How. 235 ; 2 M. & W. 505. 86 Fed. Rep. 118 ; 119 Ill. 482 ; 80 Ala. 470. See 10 L. R. A. 666 ; CONCEALMENT ; INSURANCE ; MISREPRESENTATION ; WARRANTY.

In Scotch Law. The name of a plea or statement presented to a lord-ordinary of the court of session, when his judgment is brought under review.

REPRESENTATION OF PERSONS. A fiction of the law, the effect of which is to put the representative in the place, degree, or right of the person represented.

The heir represents his ancestor ; Bac. Abr. Heir and Ancestor (A); the devisee, his testator ; the executor, his testator ; the administrator, his intestate ; the successor in corporations, his predecessor ; and, generally speaking, they are entitled to the rights of the persons whom they represent, and bound to fulfil the duties and obligations which were binding upon them in those characters.

Representation was unknown to the Romans, and was invented by the commentators and doctors of the civil law. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 1, c. 3, n. 180. See Ayliffe, Pand. 397 ; Dalloz, Dict. Succession, art. 4, § 2.

REPRESENTATIVE. One who represents or is in the place of another.

In the law of decedents' estates any person who has succeeded to the rights of the decedent, whether by purchase descent, or operation of law. 67 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 771.

A representative of a deceased person, sometimes called a "personal representative," or "legal personal representative," is one who is executor or administrator of the person described. 6 Madd. 159 ; 5 Ves. 402. See 118 Mass. 200 ; 139 id. 504.

A gift in a will to the "representative" of a person is a gift to his legal personal representatives, in the absence of any context in the will showing that the word is to have a different meaning ; 45 Ch. Div. 269.

See PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES ; LEGAL PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE.

In legislation, it signifies one who has been elected a member of that branch of the legislature called the house of representatives.

The securing of fair apportionment of representatives in legislative bodies is one of the most serious problems in modern constitutional law, there being no subject as to which the legislation is more frequently affected by partisan bias. In many of the states there has been an effort to control the matter by constitutional provisions under which it is usually required that the districts shall be formed of contiguous territory and contain as nearly as possible an equal number of inhabitants. These are the principal provisions in the constitution of Illinois, in which state it was held that an apportionment act was valid which was a substantial compliance with the constitution, though the rule of compactness was only applied to a limited extent ; 155 Ill. 451. The subject has been very carefully considered in Indiana. Among the conclusions reached there are : that under the state constitution requiring a sexennial enumeration of the male inhabitants over twenty-one years and an apportionment at the next legislative session thereafter, the legislature, having once made a valid apportionment after an enumeration, is prohibited from making a reapportionment and from repealing such valid apportionment during the enumeration period ; that if the first apportionment is invalid, even before it has been declared so by the courts, a second may be passed ; that the question of the validity of such a law is not a political one, to be determined only at the discretion of the legislature, but that it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the courts to determine its constitutionality ; that where the question of constitutionality has been determined by a lower court in an action between the citizens, and an appeal is dismissed, the subject is not res judicata as against the state ; and that the state is not estopped from objecting to the constitutionality of an apportionment by the fact that a legislature has been elected under an unconstitutional act ; 144 Ind. 598.

In New Jersey it was held that the constitutionality of such acts is a subject of judicial inquiry and not a mere political question, but that the courts cannot overturn a law passed within constitutional limitations on the ground that it is unwise, impolitic, unjust, or oppressive, or even that it was procured by corporate means ; 56 N. J. L. 126, where it was held that mandamus to compel officers to proceed under prior laws in respect to elections instead of following an unconstitutional statute is not premature because no demand and refusal has been made or the time arrived when it is the duty of the officers to act.

In a Virginia case it was said that the laying off and defining of districts under a constitutional requirement that they should be of contiguous counties, etc., compact, and, as nearly as may be, equal in population, was an exercise of political and discretionary power of the legislature for which they are amenable to the people; 79 Va. 269; but this, it is remarked, "was a mere declaration of the court without discussion of the question and without any facts reported which show any attempt at a gerrymander"; 15 L. R. A. 561, note.

Any clear violation of the constitutional provisions will make an apportionment invalid; as, the division of a county or district where the constitution forbids it; 81 Wis. 440; or the allotment of a greater number of representatives than the constitution directs; 26 Kan. 724; and glaring inequalities either of representation or of population in the districts will be considered a sufficient indication that the legislature has exceeded its discretion; 88 Wis. 90; 93 Mich. 1; 2 Idaho 1208; 73 N. C. 198; 133 Ind. 178; contra, 135 N. Y. 473, as to which see 31 Am. Law Reg. 851. The opinion by Peckham, J., in the New York case takes a radically different view of the nature of the power involved in the apportionment of a state for representatives from that expressed in the other cases cited, particularly those from Indiana and New Jersey. He says: "From the formation of government under written constitutions in this country the question of the basis of representation in the legislative branch of the government has been one of the most important and most frequently debated. It is not true that equality of members in representation has been the leading idea at all times in regard to republican institutions. . . . . The power to readjust the political divisions of a sovereignty with the view of representation of those divisions or of the inhabitants thereof, in the legislature, resides, of course, in the first instance, with the people, who in this country are the source of all political power. The essential nature of the power itself is not, however, altered by that fact. In its nature it is political as distinguished from legislative or judicial."

If the discretion of the legislature is fairly exercised, the apportionment will be sustained even if not mathematically correct; 48 Ohio St. 438; 11 Kan. 235, per Brewer, J.; 18 Me. 458; but there can be no legislative discretion to give a county of less population than another greater representation under a constitution requiring representative districts to contain "as nearly as may be" an equal number of inhabitants; 92 Mich. 638.

These principles have been also applied to apportionments made by minor administrative bodies to which the power is granted; 142 N. Y. 523, 531; 138 id. 95. In the case last cited a distinction was made by Peckham, J., between the legislative power of apportionment and that confided to an inferior body. The former, it was said, might reasonably be considered a power to divide according to the legislative discretion, "but in the case of inferior bodies, like boards of supervisors, who have no legislative power excepting what is specifically granted, the power to divide being given, the implication would be strong that it was only a power to divide equally." Nevertheless, as some discretion was necessarily involved, it must be an honest and a fair discretion arising out of the circumstances of the case and reasonably effecting the exercise of the power of equal division. But it was not to be considered "that every trifling deviation from equality of population would justify or warrant an application to a court for redress. . . . It must be a grave, palpable, and unreasonable deviation from the standard," making it apparent "that very great and wholly unnecessary inequality has been intentionally provided for." 138 N. Y. 95.

As to the apportionment of representatives in congress among the states, see APPORTIONMENT; and see, generally, JUDICIAL POWER; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

REPRESENTATIVE DEMOCRACY. A form of government where the powers of the sovereignty are delegated to a body of men, elected from time to time, who exercise them for the benefit of the whole nation. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 31.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS. See PEERS.

REPRIEVE (from Fr. reprendre, to take back). In Criminal Practice. The withdrawing of a sentence for an interval of time, which operates in delay of execution. 4 Bla. Com. 394.

It is granted by the favor of the pardoning power, or by the court who tried the prisoner. Reprieves are sometimes granted ex necessitate legis; for example, when a woman is convicted of a capital offence, after judgment she may allege pregnancy in delay of execution. In order, however, to render this plea available, she must be quick with child (q. v.), the law presuming —perhaps wrongly enough—that before that period life does not commence in the fœtus; Co. 3d Inst. 17; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 368; 2 id. 413; 4 Bla. Com. 395. See JURY OF WOMEN.

The judge is also bound to grant a reprieve when the prisoner becomes insane; 4 Hargr. St. Tr. 205, 206; Co. 3d Inst. 4.

The president, under the constitution, Art. II. § 2, has the power to grant reprieves. A reprieve is said to be a withdrawal or withholding of punishment for a time after conviction and sentence, in the nature of a stay of execution. Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 104. See Bish. Cr. Proc. 1299. When a reprieve is granted in a capital case to a day certain, the warden should execute the sentence on the day the reprieve expires, and the time of execution need not be again fixed by the court: 40 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 883. See 29 Ohio St. 457; 13 Wend. 159; PARDON.

REPRIMAND. The censure which in some cases a public officer pronounces against an offender.

This species of punishment is used by legislative bodies to punish their members or others who have been guilty of some impropriety of conduct towards them. The reprimand is usually pronounced by the speaker.

REPRISALS. The forcibly taking a thing by one nation which belonged to another, in return or satisfaction for an injury committed by the latter on the former. Vattel, b. 2, c. 18, s. 342; 1 Bla. Com. c. 7.

General reprisals take place by virtue of commissions delivered to officers and citizens of the aggrieved state, directing them to take the persons and property belonging to the offending state wherever found.

Negative reprisals take place when a nation refuses to fulfil a perfect obligation which it has contracted, or to permit another state to enjoy a right which it justly claims.

Positive reprisals consist in seizing the persons and effects belonging to the other nation, in order to obtain satisfaction.

Special reprisals are such as are granted in times of peace to particular individuals who have suffered an injury from the citizens or subjects of the other nation.

Reprisals are used between nation and nation to do themselves justice, when they cannot otherwise obtain it.

Where an individual is injured by a foreign state he must first apply to its courts, if possible, and it is only when refused redress there that his own government can claim to interfere. Similarly where the injury is to a state, compensation should be demanded before recourse is had to reprisal. Risley, Law of War 57. An instance of reprisal occurred in December, 1897, when Germany threatened bombardment at Hayti unless the government within eight hours saluted the German flag and made compensation to an injured German subject. See LETTERS OF MARQUE.

Reprisals are made in two ways, either by embargo, in which case the act is that of the state, or by letters of marque and reprisals. in which case the act is that of the citizen, authorized by the government. See 2 Brown, Civ. Law 334. Such letters are generally granted for a refusal to pay debts, for an unwarrantable suspension of treaty obligations, denial of evident justice, or a refusal to pay indemnity for losses. One of the last instances of a letter of reprisal was in 1778 when the King of France gave authority of reprisal to certain people whose vessels had been seized by the British government for carrying contraband of war; Snow, Int. Law 76. Congress has the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal. U. S. Const. art. 1, s. 8, cl. 11.

The property seized in making reprisals is preserved while there is any hope of obtaining satisfaction or justice; as soon as that hope disappears, it is confiscated, and then the reprisal is complete; Vattel, b. 2, c. 18, § 342. See Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law.

REPRISES. The deductions and payments out of lands, annuities, and the like are called reprises, because they are taken back; when we speak of the clear yearly value of an estate, we say it is worth so much a year ultra reprises, besides all reprises.

In Pennsylvania, lands are not to be sold under an execution when the rents can pay the debt and interest and costs in seven years, beyond all reprises.

REPROBATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The propounding exceptions either against facts, persons, or things; as, to allege that certain deeds or instruments have not been duly and lawfully executed; or that certain persons are such that they are incompetent as witnesses; or that certain things ought not, for legal reasons, to be admitted.

REPROBATUR, ACTION OF. An action in Scotch law for the purpose of convicting a witness of perjury. Bell.

REPUBLIC. A commonwealth; that form of government in which the administration of affairs is open to all the citizens, In another sense, it signifies the state, independently of its form of government. 1 Toullier 28 and n., 202, note.

REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT. A government in the republican form; a government of the people; a government by representatives chosen by the people. Cooley, Const. 194. It is usually put in opposition to a monarchical or aristocratic government. But it is said to be, strictly speaking, by no means inconsistent with monarchical forms; Cooley, Const. 194; there can be no doubt that in the light of the fact that the Revolution was intended to throw off monarchical forms, a republican form of government in the constitution means a government in which the people choose, directly or indirectly, the executive.

The fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution directs that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government." Mill. Const. U. S. 640. The form of government is to be guaranteed, which supposes a form already established; and this is the republican form of government the United States have undertaken to protect. See Story, Const. § 1807.

A republican government, once established, may be endangered so as to call for the action of congress: 1. By the hostile action of some foreign power, and taking possession of the territory of some state, and setting up a government therein not established by the people. 2. By the revolutionary action of the people themselves in forcibly rising against the constituted authorities and setting the government aside, or attempting to do so, for some other.

In either of the above cases, it will be the duty of the federal government to protect the people of the state by the employment of military force. Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 202; see 7 Wall. 700: 7 How. 1, 3. Even in strict accordance with the forms prescribed for amending a state constitution, it would be possible for the people of the state to effect such changes as would deprive it of its republican character. It has been suggested that it would then be the duty of congress to intervene. In any case there could probably be no appeal from the decision of congress. Cooley, Const. 196. See GOVERNMENT.

REPUBLICATION. An act done by a testator, from which it can be concluded that he intended that an instrument which had been revoked by him should operate as his will. Schoul. Wills 441; or it is the re-execution of a will by the testator, with a view of giving it full force and effect.

The republication is express when there has been an actual re-execution of it; 1 Ves. 440; 2 Rand. 192; 9 Johns. 312; it is implied when, for example, the testator by a codicil executed according to the statute of frauds, reciting that he had made his will, added, "I hereby ratify and confirm my said will, except in the alterations after mentioned." 3 Bro. P. C. 85. See 30 Neb. 149; 16 Ves. Jr. 167. The will might be at a distance or not in the power of the testator, and it may be thus republished; 1 Ves. Sen. 437; 1 Ves. 486; 4 Bro. C. C. 2.

The republication of a will has the effect —first, to give it all the force of a will made at the time of the republication; Beach, Wills 143; if, for example, a testator by his will devise "all his lands in A," then revokes his will, and afterwards buys other lands in A, the republication, made after the purchase, will pass all the testator's lands in A; Cro. Eliz. 493. See 1 P. Wms. 275. Second, to set up a will which had been revoked. See, generally, Will. Exec.; Jarm. Wills; Schoul. Ex; Schoul. Wills.

REPUDIATE. To express in a sufficient manner a determination not to accept a right, when it is offered.

He who repudiates a right cannot by that act transfer it to another. Repudiation differs from renunciation in this, that by the former he who repudiates simply declares that he will not accept; while he who renounces a right does so in favor of another. Renunciation is, however, sometimes used in the sense of repudiation. See RENOUNCE; RENUNCIATION; Wolff, Inst. § 339.

REPUDIATION. In Civil Law. A term used to signify the putting away of a wife or a woman betrothed.

Properly, divorce is used to point out the separation of married persons; repudiation, to denote the separation either of married people, or those who are only affianced. Divortium est repudium et separatio maritorum; repudium est renunciatio sponsalium, vel etiam est divortium. Dig. 50. 16. 101.

A determination to have nothing to do with any particular thing: as, a repudiation of a legacy is the abandonment of such legacy, and a renunciation of all right to it.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The refusal to accept a benefice which has been conferred upon the party repudiating.

As to repudiation of a contract before the time of performance, see ELECTION OF RIGHTS AND REMEDIES; PERFORMANCE.

REPUGNANCY (Lat. re, back, against, pugnare, to fight). In Contracts. A disagreement or inconsistency between two or more clauses of the same instrument. In deeds, and other instruments inter vivos, the earlier clause prevails, if the inconsistency be not so great as to avoid the instrument for uncertainty; 2 Taunt. 109; 15 Sim. 118; 2 C. B. 830; 13 M. & W. 534.

In wills, the latter clause prevails, under the same exceptions; Co. Litt. 112 b; Plowd. 541; 6 Ves. 100; 2 My. & K. 149; 1 Jarm. Wills 411. See, however, 18 Ch. Div. 17.

Repugnancy in a condition renders it void; 2 Mod. 285; 11 id. 191; 1 Hawks 20; 7 J. J. Marsh. 192; 6 Ch. Div. 549. And see, generally, 3 Pick. 272; 4 id. 54; 6 Cow. 677; Schoul. Wills 498; Beach, Wills 521.

In Pleading. An inconsistency or disagreement between the statements of material facts in a declaration or other pleading: as, where certain timber was said to be for the completion of a house already built; 1 Salk. 213. Repugnancy of immaterial facts, or of redundant and unnecessary matter, if it does not contradict material allegations, will not, in general, vitiate the pleadings; Co. Litt. 303 b; 10 East 142; 1 Chitty, Pl. 283. See Steph. Pl. 378; Gould, Pl. § 172.

REPUTABLE. Worthy of repute or distinction, held in esteem, honorable, praiseworthy. 123 Ill. 245.

REPUTATION (Lat. reputo, to consider). The opinion generally entertained in regard to the character or condition of a person by those who know him or his family. The opinion generally entertained by those who may be supposed to be acquainted with a fact.

In general, reputation is evidence to prove a man's reputation in society; a pedigree; 14 Camp. 416; 1 S. & S. 153; certain prescriptive or customary rights and obligations; matters of public notoriety. But as such evidence is in its own nature very weak, it must be supported, when it relates to the exercise of a right or privilege, by proof of acts of enjoyment of such right or privilege within the period of living memory; 1 Maule & S. 679; 5 Term 32. Afterwards, evidence of reputation may be given. The fact must be of a public nature; it must be derived from persons likely to know the facts; 9 B. Monr. 88; 4 B. & Ald. 53. Evidence of the reputation of a man for truth and veracity in the neighborhood of his home is equally competent to affect his credibility as a witness, whether it is founded upon a dispassionate judgment, or upon warm admiration for habitual truthfulness or natural indignation at habitual falsehood, and whether his neighbors are virtuous or immoral in their own lives; 164 U. S. 221. The facts must be general, and not particular; they must be free from suspicion; 1 Stark. Ev. 54. An existing reputation is a fact to which any one may testify who knows it; he knows it because he hears it, and what he hears constitutes the reputation; 50 Mich. 642.

Formerly, and until the middle of this century, witnesses in England could testify as to their personal knowledge and opinion of a defendant's or witness's character. At present the question to be asked is whether the witness knows the witness's reputation, what it is, and whether, from such knowledge, he would believe him on oath. Tayl. Ev. § 1324. In America, as to the character of a defendant, reputation is in most states made the exclusive mode of proof; and as to a witness's character, reputation is the sole source of proof. See an interesting article by Prof. John H. Wigmore, in 32 Am. L. Rev. 718.

Injuries to a man's reputation by circulating false accounts in relation thereto are remediable by action and by indictment. See LIBEL; SLANDER; CHARACTER.

REPUTE. Character, as distinguished from reputation. 3 Dist. Rep. (Pa.) 271.

REPUTED. Accepted by general, or public opinion.

REPUTED OWNER. In English Practice. A bankrupt trader who has in his apparent possession goods, which he holds with the consent of the true owner, is called the reputed owner. The Bankruptcy Act of 1869, sec. 15, § 5, provides that such goods in his possession at the commencement of his bankruptcy pass to his trustee; but things in action, other than debts due to him in the course of his trade or business, are not deemed goods and chattels within the meaning of that clause; Whart. Dict.; 2 Steph. Com. 166.

By the English Bankruptcy Act of 1883, the trustee is entitled to such goods as are, at the commencement of the bankruptcy (the date of the earliest act of bankruptcy), in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, by the consent of the true owner, in such a way that the former is the reputed owner of them; provided they are with the bankrupt in his trade or business. The ownership may be rebutted by showing a custom in the trade to take goods on hire, as in the case of a hotel-keeper having hired furniture; 18 Ch. D. 30; or of pianos; 18 id. 601; and perhaps of furniture in general; 41 L. J. Q. B. 20; but see, contra, 23 Ch. D. 261.

In mechanic's lien law, where the remedy is usually in rem, liens are commonly filed of record against the "owner or reputed owner."

REQUEST (Lat. requiro, to ask for). Within the provision of the constitution of a religious society providing that a change therein cannot be granted except at the request of two-thirds of the society, a vote was held not a request. 31 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 216.

In Contracts. A notice of a desire on the part of the person making it, that the other party shall do something in relation to a contract. Generally, when a debt is payable immediately, no request need be made; 10 Mass. 230; 3 Day 327; 1 Johns. Cas. 319.

In some cases, the necessity of a request is implied from the nature of the transaction; as, where a horse is sold to A, to be paid for on delivery, A must show a request; 5 Term 409; or impossibility on the part of the vendor to comply, if requested; 5 B. & Ad. 712; previous to bringing an action; and on a promise to marry; 2 Dowl. & R. 55. See DEMAND. And if the contract in terms provides for a request, it must be made; 1 Johns. Cas. 327. It should be in writing, and state distinctly what is required to be done; 1 Chitty, Pr. 497.

In Pleading. The statement in the plaintiff's declaration that a demand or request has been made by the plaintiff of the defendant to do some act which he was bound to perform, and for which the action is brought.

A general request is that stated in the form "although often requested so to do" (licet sæpe requisitus), generally added in the common breach in the money counts. Its omission will not vitiate the declaration; 1 B. & P. 59; 1 Johns. Cas. 100.

A special request is one provided for by the contract, expressly or impliedly. Such a request must be averred; 5 Term 409; 3 Camp. 549; 2 B. & C. 685; and proved; 1 Saund. 33, n. 2. It must state time and place of making, and by whom it was made, that the court may judge of its sufficiency; 1 Stra. 89. See Com. Dig. Pleader (C 69, 70); 1 Saund. 33, n.; DEMAND.

REQUEST NOTES. In English Law. Certain notes or requests from persons amenable to the excise laws, to obtain a permit for removing any excisable goods or articles from one place to another.

REQUESTS, COURTS OF. See COURTS OF REQUESTS. Vol. 12 (1896) of the publications of the Selden Society contains Select Cases in this court.

REQUISITION. The act of demanding a thing to be done by virtue of some right. See MILITARY OCCUPATION.

The demand made by the governor of one state on the governor of another for a fugitive, under the provision of the United States constitution. See EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

REQUISITIONS OF TITLE. Written inquiries made by the solicitor of an intending purchaser of land, to the vendor's solicitor, in respect of some apparent insufficiency in the abstract of title. Mos. & W.

RERE FIEFS. Inferior feudatories in Scotland. Wharton.

RES (Lat. things). The terms Res, Bona, Biens, used by jurists who have written in the Latin and French languages, are intended to include movable or personal, as well as immovable or real, property. 1 Burge, Confl. L. 19. See BIENS; BONA; THINGS; JUS AD REM.

RES ADJUDICATA. See RES JUDICATA.

RES COMMUNES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which, though a separate share of them can be enjoyed and used by every one, cannot be exclusively and wholly appropriated; as, light, air, running water. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 156; Erskine, Inst. 1. 1. 5. 6.

RES GESTÆ (Lat.). Transaction; thing done; the subject-matter.

Those circumstances which are the automatic and undesigned incidents of a particular litigated act, and which are admissible in evidence when illustrative of such act. Whart. Ev.; 96 Cal. 125.

Events speaking for themselves through the instructive words and acts of participants, not the words and acts of participants when narrating the events. 18 Colo. 170.

When it is necessary in the course of a cause to inquire into the nature of a particular act, or the intention of the person who did the act, proof of what the person said at the time of doing it is admissible evidence as a part of the res gestæ, for the purpose of showing its true character. On an indictment for a rape, for example, what the girl said so recently after the fact as to exclude the possibility of practising on her, has been held to be admissible evidence as a part of the transaction; 2 Stark. 241; 1 Phill. Ev., 4th Am. ed. 185.

Declarations or acts, accompanying the fact in controversy and tending to illustrate or explain it, as conversations contemporaneous with the facts; 112 Mo. 374; 18 Fed. Rep. 156; 148 Pa. 566; or the complaints of the injured party, both as to bodily suffering and the circumstances of the occurrence; 79 Pa. 493; 95 N. Y. 274; 86 Wis. 518; 24 U. S. App. 364; 116 Ind. 566; 158 U. S. 271; or the declarations and conduct of third persons at the time; 107 Mo. 240; 49 Ohio St. 25; 62 Tex. 318; see 21 How. St. Tr. 514; are admissible; also declarations of a party at the time of taking possession of personal property as to the nature of his possession; 35 Mo. 533; statements made by the parties at the time of the sale of personal property, when such statements bear upon the question of good faith or other fact in issue; 19 N. Y. 464; 36 N. H. 353; statements as to the conditions of an execution sale; 1 Rawle 223; or of an officer or other persons interested at the time of levying on property; id.; 47 Barb. 243; of a person at the time of making an entry upon land, when they explain the character and purpose of making such entry; 3 Bla. Com. 174; by a bondsman when signing a bond; 132 Ind. 387; declarations accompanying the payment of money, to show the purpose or application of such payment; 25 Vt. 308; statements of a grantor at the time of making a conveyance; 16 N. H. 168; 33 Barb. 491; 31 Mo. 62. Declarations of a wife showing maltreatment on the part of her husband are part of the res gestæ in an action by him for the alienation of her affections; 64 Vt. 432. Declarations made by one officer of a steamboat while engaged in violently removing a passenger from a part of the vessel in which his contract for transportation did not entitle him to be, were admitted as part of the res gestæ; 121 U. S. 637.

A mere narrative of a past occurrence is inadmissible as part of the res gestæ; 9 Cush. 42; 41 Conn. 55; 70 Miss. 874; the declaration must so harmonize with the fact as to form one transaction; 123 N. Y. 85. In a case frequently criticised, a statement made immediately after the act and whilst running from the room, where her throat had been cut, was held inadmissible; 14 Cox, Cr. C. 341. The length of the interval of time between the main facts and the statements cannot be important if sufficient time elapsed to make the statements, having regard to their form and substance, mere narrative; 71 Ind. 66; and that only a minute elapsed, does not alter the rule; 65 Miss. 576; but see 8 Wall. 397; 3 Cush. 181, where the declarations are considered part of the res gestæ, if there is neither time nor motive for misrepresentation or invention; and see 25 Gratt. 921; and if they are voluntary and spontaneous and made within so short a time after the occurrence as to preclude the idea of deliberate design; 35 Cal. 49; 116 Ind. 566; 82 Tex. 657; 77 Va. 681. In an action for personal injury, a physician's written statement concerning the injury made at the time and annexed to his deposition, is not admissible as part of the res gestæ; 119 U. S. 99; nor were the declarations of an officer of a corporation that a note on which it had brought suit was indorsed to it only for the purpose of suing on it, where there were no circumstances connected with the declaration which would raise an estoppel; 35 Fed. Rep. 644. In Georgia, it is provided by the code that declarations accompanying the act or so nearly connected therewith in time as to be free from all suspicion of device or afterthought, are admissible in evidence; Georgia Code § 3733. See 14 Am. L. Rev. 817; 15 id. 1; 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 298; Taylor, Evidence; Jones, Evidence; EVIDENCE.

RES INCORPORALES. Things incorporeal; fixed relations in which men stand to things or to other men; relations giving them power over things or claims against persons. Inst. 2. 2.

RES INTEGRA (Lat. an entire thing; an entirely new or untouched matter). A term applied to those points of law which have not been decided, which are untouched by dictum or decision. 3 Mer. 269; 1 Burge, Confl. L. 241.

RES INTER ALIOS ACTA (Lat.). A technical phrase which signifies acts of others or transactions between others.

Neither the declarations nor any other acts of those who are mere strangers, or, as it is usually expressed any res inter alios acta, are admissible in evidence against any one; when the party against whom such acts are offered in evidence was privy to the act, the objection ceases; it is no longer res inter alios; 1 Stark. Ev. 52; 3 id. 1300; 4 Mann. & G. 282. See 1 Metc. Mass. 55; MAXIM.

RES IPSA LOQUITUR (Lat. the thing speaks for itself). A phrase often used in actions for injury by negligence where no proof of negligence is required beyond the accident itself, which is such as necessarily to involve negligence. See 5 Ex. 787. Where contractual relations existed between the parties, and the plaintiff shows actual negligence or conditions so obviously dangerous as to admit of no other inference, the burden thus thrown on the defendant is not that of satisfactorily accounting for the accident, but of showing that he used due care; 184 Pa. 519. See NEGLIGENCE.

For cases in which this doctrine has been applied or considered, see 167 Mass. 388; 9 App. D. C. 60; 78 Fed. Rep. 442; 79 id. 125; 90 Me. 110; 56 Alb. L. J. 96; 17 App. Div. N. Y. 402; 18 id. 22; 89 Tex. 168.

RES JUDICATA (Lat. the matter has been decided). In Practice. A legal or equitable issue which has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction.

When one is barred in any action, real or personal, by judgment, demurrer, confession, or verdict, he is bound as to that or a like action forever; 14 Q. B. D. 146; XII B. L. R. 304.

When a question is necessarily decided in effect though not in express terms between parties to the suit, they cannot raise the same question as between themselves in any other suit in any other form; 3 Atkins 626. This definition of Lord Hardwicke, in Gregory v. Molesworth, has been by some writers considered the best.

The doctrine of res judicata is plain and intelligible, and amounts simply to this, that a cause of action once finally determined, without appeal, between the parties, on the merits, by a competent tribunal, cannot afterwards be litigated by a new proceeding either before the same or any other tribunal; 100 Mass. 409.

Estoppel rests on equitable principles, while res judicata does not rest upon equitable principles, but on the two maxims which were its foundation in the Roman Law (see infra); Ind. L. R. VIII. All. 332; it is rather a principle of public policy than the result of equitable considerations. Thus it is also a matter of private right; 34 N. J. Eq. 535.

It is a general principle that a decision by a court of competent jurisdiction, of matters put in issue by the pleadings, is binding and conclusive upon all other courts of concurrent power, and between parties and their privies; 168 U. S. 48, reviewing the federal cases. This principle pervades not only our own, but all other systems of jurisprudence, and has become a rule of universal law, founded on the soundest policy, and is necessary for the repose and peace of society and the maintenance of civil order; id. See also 125 id. 702; 7 Wall. 107.

It has been characterized as a "fundamental concept in the organization of civil society;" 22 How. 352.

It was derived from Roman law, being founded on the maxims nemo debet bis vexari pro eadem causa, and interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium.

It was commonly said by the civilians res judicata facit ex albo nigrum, ex nigro album, ex curvo rectum, ex recto curvum (a decision makes white black; black, white; the crooked, straight; the straight, crooked).

It was said by Blackburn, L. J., that the doctrine was not received in England, as it was on the continent, directly from the Roman law; L. R. 2 App. Cas. 530.

But in order to make a matter res judicata there must be a concurrence of the four conditions following:

1. Identity in the thing sued for; 5 M. & W. 109; 7 Johns. 20; 1 Hen. & M. 449; 1 Dana 434.

2. Identity of the cause of action; Whart. Ev. 763; 6 Wheat. 109; 2 Gall. 216; 17 Mass. 237; 2 Leigh 474; 8 Conn. 268; 1 N. & McC. 329; 16 S. & R. 282; 3 Pick. 429; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 611.

An action for breach of covenant of seisin is not a bar to an action for the breach of a covenant in the same deed against incumbrances; the action not being founded on the same cause of action, and the rule prohibiting the splitting of a single cause of action having, therefore, no application; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 825. A person who obtains an order from a police magistrate for the delivery of goods improperly detained, is not thereby precluded from subsequently bringing an action for special damage arising out of the same detention. It is not res judicata, since the matter of damage was one with which the magistrate had no power to deal; [1893] 2 Q. B. 172.

A judgment against an administrator for moneys due the estate is not a bar to a subsequent action for a further sum not known by the plaintiff at the time of the former action, to be due; 23 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 259.

But the estoppel arising from a finding in a previous suit between the same parties extends to a decision of the legal rights of the parties on a state of facts common to both suits, although the causes of action are different; 55 Fed. Rep. 690.

3. Identity of persons and of parties to the action; 7 Cra. 271; 1 Wheat. 6; 14 S. & R. 435; 4 Mass. 441; 2 Yerg. 10; 5 Me. 410; 8 Gratt. 68; 16 Mo. 168; 12 Ga. 271; 21 Ala. N. S. 813; 23 Barb. 464; 83 Va. 862; 82 id. 172; 50 Kan. 342.

A judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action upon notes which they had previously transferred to a bank, is not conclusive that they owned the cause of action at the time of recovery, or that it was due at the commencement of the action as against other creditors of the maker not parties or privies to the action, and does not bar them from asserting their rights to precedence; 95 Wis. 169.

4. Identity of the quality in the persons for or against whom the claim is made; 5 Co. 32 b; 6 Mann. & G. 164; 4 C. B. 884.

A judgment is only presumptively conclusive against parties in the character in which they sue or are sued; 114 Ind. 303. As a rule it must be a final decision of a cause on the merits to constitute res judicata; 92 Mo. 120. The following have been held not to be a bar to a subsequent suit: A final judgment on a third demurrer to the second amended petition; 61 Mo. App. 297; a judgment of dismissal entered upon the plaintiff's failure to appear; 42 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 11; an order of "judgment reversed," but without an award of a venire de novo, entered in the supreme court on a writ of error; 98 Pa. 142; a suit which was dismissed under the rule as to dismissal for want of prosecution and was not heard on the merits; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 789; a judgment of peremptory nonsuit against the plaintiff; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 253. See NONSUIT. The findings of the court do not constitute a bar in a subsequent action between the same parties unless followed by a judgment based thereon; 86 Hun 411.

Cases to which the doctrine of res judicata has been applied are: The decision of a referee on a point properly determined by him and reviewable on appeal; 3 East 346; 4 Cow. 559; 14 N. Y. 329; a judgment rendered on a compromise; 39 La. Ann. 809; a decision on habeas corpus as to the custody of a child; 99 Mo. 484; a judgment upon the ownership of property where that is the material point in issue; 29 N. Y. St. Rep. 569; judgment by default; 122 U. S. 306; 111 N. Y. 177; or on demurrer; 91 U. S. 526; 124 id. 225; 10 Col. 599; or by an equally divided court; 68 Md. 516; a judgment of dismissal entered under an agreement reciting a settlement that nothing is due; 120 U. S. 89; or upon a hearing where the entry is not "expressly without prejudice"; 125 id. 698; or a simple dismissal with taxation of costs and award of execution; 30 Fed. Rep. 525; or dismissal for want of prosecution; 81 Va. 709; or dismissal for failure in the proof of execution of a contract for breach of which an action is brought, even where the words, without prejudice, are added to the decree; 33 W. Va. 464; judgments in other states; 53 Me. 346; 69 Md. 211; 97 U. S. 331; but where the state is a party it is not estopped from denying the constitutionality of an act which it is claimed was a contract between the state and an individual, where that question was not raised in a previous adjudication of the state court upon the meaning of the statute; 94 U. S. 645.

A judgment on a plea in abatement in an action of attachment for rent is not res adjudicata on the trial on the merits; 58 Mo. App. 181; nor is a judgment in another state on habeas corpus for the custody of a child conclusive, where there has been a material change of conditions and circumstances; 30 Wkly. Law Bul. 164. A judgment ordering that the cause be filed away for want of prosecution is not final or a bar to a subsequent action; 23 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 366. A judgment abating an action entered upon a verdict finding that plaintiff's powers as administrator had ceased pending the action, is not a bar to the subsequent revival of the action on plaintiff's reinstatement as administrator; 61 Ark. 203.

The decision of a motion or summary application is not to be regarded in the light of res judicata, or as so far conclusive upon the parties as to prevent their drawing the same matter in question again in the more regular form of an action; 128 U. S. 489. An adjudication sustaining a demurrer going to the merits is res judicata as to the whole matter in controversy; 117 Mo. 261; 126 Ind. 477; 5 Ind. App. 369.

In determining whether a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction operates as an estoppel, the court in a subsequent case is entitled to consider what facts were before the court in the former case, and to give effect to any fresh facts that subsequently take place; [1894] 2 Q. B. 108. Its conclusiveness does not depend upon the question whether there is the same demand in both cases, but it exists even where there are different demands, if the question upon which the recovery of the second demand depends has, under identical circumstances and conditions, been previously concluded by a judgment between the parties or their privies; 167 U. S. 371. Where the causes of action are different, but the parties the same, the former judgment is conclusive as to matters, in fact, necessarily decided and as to matters which might have been, but which were not, presented and decided; 32 Fed. Rep. 652. A judgment, when introduced in evidence as an estoppel, cannot be explained or varied by parol; 45 Ill. App. 355.

The fact that a court is composed of several divisions does not prevent the judgment of one of the divisions from being res judicata; 167 U. S. 371. A change in a person holding an office does not destroy the effect of a judgment against such officer as res judicata; 167 U. S. 371.

A judgment in a civil action is not admissible in a criminal proceeding, for the reason that the parties "are necessarily different, and the objects and results of the two proceedings are equally diverse;" 69 Conn. 212; 25 id. 185; 77 Ala. 202; 35 Vt. 457; contra, 88 Ind. 357, where, in a prosecution for the unlawful removal of a fence, a judgment in a civil action between the defendant and the prosecuting witness was admitted in evidence. But this case was criticised in 69 Conn. 212, as founded upon an error which was not relieved by the instruction of the court to the jury that the evidence was not conclusive, but merited serious consideration. The Connecticut court cite a former decision of their own to the effect that, "a judgment is conclusive or is nothing. If not conclusive, there is no rule by which courts can measure and determine its effect;" 51 Conn. 494.

Where there is concurrent jurisdiction at law and in equity, a decision in one court is res judicata as to the other; 1 Johns. Ch. 91; 18 Johns. 534; 5 Mass. 207; 70 N. Y. 11. Where there is jurisdiction both of the cause and the parties a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is conclusive, even though erroneous, until it is reversed upon appeal or vacated; 7 Co. 76; 1 Pet. 340; 9 Cow. 227; 3 Binn. 419; 6 Pick. 435; 4 Johns. Ch. 460; 106 N Y. 604; 81 Va. 677; 82 Ga. 168. See 7 L. R. A. 577; 11 id. 155, 308.

A decree on a bill by a stockholder for the benefit of himself and all other stockholders who come in, to enjoin the consummation of an agreement by the corporation, is conclusive in a subsequent suit by another stockholder for the same purpose and involving the same question, in the absence of fraud or collusion; 50 N. J. Eq. 656, citing 15 R. I. 75; 23 Am. Rep. 44; 6 Metc. 546; 60 Vt. 1; 11 Fed. Rep. 97; 123 Ill. 122.

The doctrine of res judicata applies even though the amount in controversy in the former suit was so small that the party was not entitled to a review in an appellate court; 152 U. S. 252.

What might be an extension of the doctrine of res judicata, though not technically within the definition of the subject, is the rule that obtains among the circuit courts of the United States by which a decision in one circuit court is followed in the other upon like facts although between different parties. This practice is more common in patent litigation. It can hardly be sustained on principle. It is a convenient rule which saves litigation and tends towards unity of decision among the federal courts other than the supreme court; 67 Fed. Rep. 928. Thus, a circuit court should follow the decision of another circuit court upholding a patent, except when new evidence of invalidity is introduced, and in such case, confine its investigation to the new evidence; 53 Fed. Rep. 791; on a motion for a preliminary injunction even greater effect is given to the prior adjudication; the new evidence must be so conclusive as to lead the court to believe that, if introduced before, it must have changed the result; 75 id. 609. This is usually spoken of as a rule of comity. While the circuit court should follow the decision in another circuit, the circuit court of appeals will re-examine the whole case anew and not follow the earlier adjudication in the circuit court; 53 id. 792.

As analogous to this subject the following may be cited: The decision of the supreme court upon questions of fact in a suit determining the validity of a patent, did not operate strictly as res judicata or as a technical estoppel in a subsequent suit in the circuit court, upon the same patent between different parties, but operated merely upon the conscience of the inferior tribunal, and therefore in applying the conclusions of the superior court the circuit court should first inquire what facts are proven in the pending case by independent evidence, and, second, examine the opinions of the superior court and the line of reasoning and conclusion which they exhibited, and from these or otherwise, but not by formal evidence, become satisfied whether or not the proofs of which the latter court took cognizance were substantially the same as those in the case at bar; 55 Fed. Rep. 516.

RES MANCIPI. In Roman Law. Those things which might be sold and alienated, or of which the property might be transferred from one person to another.

The division of things into res mancipi and res nec mancipi was one of ancient origin, and it continued to a late period in the empire. Res mancipi (Ulp. Frag. xix.) are prædia in italico solo, both rustic and urban; also, jura rusticorum prædiorum or servitutes, as via, iter, aquæductus; also slaves, and four-footed animals, as oxen, horses, etc., quæ collo dorsove domantur. Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq. To this list may be added children of Roman parents, who were, according to the old law, res mancipi. The distinction between res mancipi and nec mancipi was abolished by Justinian in his Code. Id.; Cooper, Inst. 442.

RES NOVA (Lat.). Something new; something not before decided.

RES NULLIUS (Lat.). A thing which has no owner. A thing which has been abandoned by its owner is as much res nullius as if it had never belonged to any one.

The first possessor of such a thing becomes the owner; res nullius fit primi occupantis. Bowy. Com. 97.

RES PERIIT DOMINO (Lat. the thing is lost to the owner). A phrase used to express that when a thing is lost or destroyed it is lost to the person who was the owner of it at the time. For example, an article is sold; if the seller has perfected the title of the buyer so that it is his, and it be destroyed, it is the buyer's loss; but if, on the contrary, the title has not vested in the buyer, then the loss falls on the seller. See SALE.

RES PRIVATÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things the property of one or more individuals. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 157.

RES PUBLICÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things the property of the state. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 157; Erskine, Inst. 2. 1. 5. 6.

RES RELIGIOSÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things pertaining to religion. Places where the dead were buried. Thevenot Dessaules, Dict. du Dig. Chose.

RES SACRÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which had been publicly consecrated.

RES SANCTÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which were especially protected against injury of man.

RES UNIVERSITATIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those things which belonged to cities or municipal corporations. They belonged so far to the public that they could not be appropriated to private use; such as public squares, market-houses, streets, and the like. Inst. 2. 1. 6.

RESALE. A second sale made of an article; as, for example, when A, having sold a horse to B, and the latter, not having paid for him, and refusing to take him away, when by his contract he was bound to do so, again sells the horse to C. The effect of a resale is, in this case, that B would be liable to A for the difference of the price between the sale and resale; 4 Bingh. 722; 4 Mann. & G. 898; Blackb. Sales 463. See SALE.

RESCEIT, RECEIT. The admission or receiving of a third person to plead his right in a cause formerly commenced between two other persons: as, when an action is brought against a tenant for life or years, or any other particular tenant, and he makes default, in such case the reversioner may move that he may be received to defend his right and to plead with the demandant. Jacob, Law Dict.; Cowel.

The admittance of a plea when the controversy is between the same two persons. Co. Litt. 192.

RESCISSION OF CONTRACTS. The abrogation or annulling of contracts.

It may take place by mutual consent; Ans. Contr. 258; and this consent may be inferred from acts; 4 Mann. & G. 898; 1 Pick. 57; 5 Me. 277; 156 Pa. 276. It may take place as the act of one party, in consequence of a failure to perform by the others: 2 C. B. 905; 4 Wend. 285; 2 Pa. 454; 28 N. H. 561; 9 La. Ann. 31; 63 Hun 439; 76 Ga. 3; not so, ordinarily, where the failure is but partial; 4 Ad. & E. 599; 1 M. & W. 231; on account of fraud, even though partially executed; 5 Cush. 126; 15 Ohio 200; 23 N. H. 519; 129 U. S. 86. See 25 Alb. L. J. 69. Misrepresentations not a part of the same transaction are no cause for rescinding the contract; 83 Va. 504.

A contract cannot, in general, be rescinded by one party unless both parties can be placed in the same situation and can stand upon the same terms as existed when the contract was made; 2 Y. & J. 278; 4 Mann. & G. 903; 1 M. & W. 231; 3 Me. 30; 1 Denio 69; 22 Pick. 283; 4 Blackf. 515; 2 Watts 433; 10 Ohio 142; 3 Vt. 442; 1 N. H. 17; 73 Ia. 749; 39 Kan. 105; 73 Tex. 619. It must be done at the time specified, if there be such a time: otherwise, within a reasonable time; 2 Camp. 530; 14 Me. 57; 22 Pick. 546; in case of fraud, upon its discovery; 1 Den. 69; 5 M. & W. 83; 141 U. S. 429; 45 N. J. Eq. 186; 37 Fed. Rep. 418; 39 Kan. 105. The right may be waived by mere lapse of time; 3 Story 612; see 6 Cl. & F. 234; or other circumstances; 9 B. & C. 59; 4 Den. 554; 4 Mass. 502; Baldw. 331.

In case of a conditional sale or exchange the party desiring to rescind must return or tender a return of all the property received by him under the terms of the sale or exchange, and within a reasonable time; 1 Marvel Del. 156. In that case it was held that the question as to what is a reasonable time is a question for the court under the circumstances of each case; id.; in another case, however, it is said that the question whether the defendants delayed for an unreasonable time in asserting a right to rescind is for the jury; 3 C. C. App. 600.

If a party means to rescind a contract because of the failure of the other party to perform he should give a clear notice of his intention to do so, unless the contract itself dispenses with such notice, or unless notice becomes unnecessary by reason of the conduct of the parties; 137 U. S. 78.

The equity for the rescission and cancellation of agreements, securities, deeds, and other instruments arises when a transaction is vitiated by illegality or fraud, or by reason of its having been carried on in ignorance or mistake of facts material to its operation; Bisp. Eq. 31; 128 U. S. 315. The jurisdiction of the court of equity is exercised upon the principle of quia timet; that is, for fear that such agreements, securities, deeds, and other instruments may be vexatiously or injuriously used against the party seeking relief, when the evidence to impeach them may be lost; or that they may throw a cloud or suspicion over his interest or title; or where he has a defence good in equity which cannot be made available at law. The cases in which this relief will be granted on account of misrepresentation and fraud may be divided into four classes: first, where there is actual fraud in the party defendant in which the party plaintiff has not participated; 13 Pet. 26; secondly, where there is constructive fraud against public policy and the party plaintiff has not participated therein;

see 4 Munf. 316; thirdly, where there is a fraud against public policy and the party plaintiff has participated therein, but public policy would be defeated by allowing it to stand; fourthly, where there is a constructive fraud by both parties,—that is, where both parties are in delicto, but not in pari delicto; see 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 694; 3 Jones, Eq. 494; 2 Mas. 378; 25 Ga. 89; 1 Pat. & H. 307; Bisph. Eq. § 31. The court will decree that a deed or other solemn instrument shall be delivered up and cancelled, not only when it is avoidable on account of fraud, but also when it is absolutely void, unless its invalidity appears upon the face of it, so that it may be defeated at any time by a defence at law; 2 Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 698; 6 Du. 597. To cancel an executed contract for alleged false representations, fraud must be made clearly to appear, and it must be shown that the complainant has been injured and deceived thereby; 124 U. S. 173.

The ignorance or mistake which will authorize relief in equity must be an ignorance or mistake of material facts; 1 Stor. 173; 11 Conn. 134; 6 Wend. 77; 6 Harr. & J. 500; 10 Leigh 37; and the mistake must be mutual; 3 Green, Ch. 103; 2 Sumn. 387; 11 Pet. 63; 24 Me. 82; 10 Vt. 570; 6 Mo. 16; 153 Pa. 134; 89 Ga. 619. If the facts are known but the law is mistaken, the same rule applies in equity as at law, that a mere mistake or ignorance of law, where there is no fraud or trust, is immaterial: ignorantia legis neminem excusat; Adams, Eq., 8th ed. 188. See 99 N. C. 30; IGNORANCE; MISTAKE.

Instruments may also be rescinded and cancelled when they have been obtained from persons who were at the time under duress or incapacity; 2 Root 216; 8 Ohio 214; 3 Yerg. 537; 36 Miss. 685; or by persons who stood in a confidential relation and took advantage of that relation; 5 Sneed 583; 31 Ala. N. S. 292; 3 Cow. 537; 2 A. K. Marsh. 175; 9 Md. 248; 3 Jones, Eq. 152, 186; 30 Miss. 369; 8 Beav. 437; 151 Pa. 593; 115 Mo. 465; 96 Mich. 562.

Gross inadequacy of consideration; 17 Vt. 9; 23 Ga. 637; 19 How. 308; 82 Va. 394; 119 U. S. 499; fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment; 3 Pet. 210; 2 Ala. N. S. 251; 10 Yerg. 206; 1 A. K. Marsh. 235; 2 Mo. 126; 34 Ala. N. S. 596; 6 Wisc. 295; 74 Ia. 161; 85 Ky. 160; 116 Md. 367; hardship and unfairness; 17 Vt. 542; 2 Root 216; 2 Green, Ch. 357; 2 Harr. & J. 285; 3 Yerg. 537; 8 Ohio 214; 31 Vt. 101; undue influence; 2 Mas. 378; are among the causes for a rescission of contracts in equity.

RESCISSORY ACTIONS. In Scotch Law. Actions which are brought to set aside deeds. Patterson, Comp. 1058, n.

Proper improbation is an action brought for declaring writing false or forged.

Reduction - improbation is an action whereby a person who may be hurt or affected by a writing insists upon producing or exhibiting it in court, in order to have it set aside, or its effects ascertained under the certification that the writing, if not produced, shall be declared false and forged.

In an action of simple reduction the certification is only temporary, declaring the writings called for null until they be produced; so that they recover their full force after their production. Erskine, b. 4, tit. 1, §§ 5, 8.

RESCOUS. An old term, synonymous with rescue, which see.

RESCRIPT. In Canon Law. A term including any form of apostolical letter emanating from the pope. The answer of the pope in writing. Dict. Droit Can.

In Civil Law. The answer of the prince, at the request of the parties, respecting some matter in dispute between them, or to magistrates, in relation to some doubtful matter submitted to him.

The rescript was differently denominated according to the character of those who sought it. They were called annotations or subnotations, when the answer was given at the request of private citizens; letters or epistles, when he answered the consultation of magistrates; pragmatic sanctions, when he answered a corporation, the citizens of a province, or a municipality. See CODE.

At Common Law. A counterpart.

In Massachusetts it is used to denote the statement of the decision of the supreme judicial court as an appellate tribunal, and the accompanying brief statement of the reasons for the decision sent to the court from which the case was brought.

RESCRIPTION. In French Law. A rescription is a letter by which the maker requests some one to pay a certain sum of money, or to account for him to a third person for it. Pothier, Contr. de Change, n. 225.

According to this definition, bills of exchange are a species of rescription. The difference appears to be this,—that a bill of exchange is given when there has been a contract of exchange between the drawer and the payee; whereas the rescription is sometimes given in payment of a debt, and at other times it is lent to the payee.

RESCUE. In Criminal Law. The forcibly and knowingly freeing another from arrest or imprisonment. 4 Bla. Com. 131.

A deliverance of a prisoner from lawful custody by a third person. 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 1065; 1 Russ. Cr. § 597.

Taking and setting at liberty, against law, a distress taken for rent, services, or damage feasant. Bacon, Abr. Rescous.

If the rescued prisoner was arrested for felony, then the rescuer is a felon; if for treason, a traitor; 3 P. Wms. 468; Cro. Car. 583; and if for a trespass, he is liable to a fine as if he had committed the original offence; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 5, c. 21. See 2 Gall. 313; Russ. & R. 432. If the principal be acquitted, the rescuer may nevertheless be fined for the misdemeanor in the obstruction and contempt of public justice; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 598. See T. U. P. Charlt. 13.

In order to render the rescuer criminal, it is necessary he should have knowledge that the person whom he sets at liberty has been apprehended for a criminal offence, if he is in the custody of a private person; but if he be under the care of a public officer, then he is to take notice of it at his peril; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 606. See further, 1 Stor. 88; 2 Gall. 313; 1 Car. & M. 299; 1 Ld. Raym. 35, 589.

A departure from an unlawful imprisonment or custody is not an escape, within the meaning of the law; and one who, without violence, assists a person who is confined without authority or process of law to depart from his place of confinement, is not guilty of the crime of assisting a prisoner to escape; 92 Cal. 421; 7 Conn. 452. See BREACH OF PRISON; ESCAPE.

The rescue of cattle and goods distrained by pound-breach is a common-law offence and indictable; 7 C. & P. 233; 5 Pick. 714.

In Maritime Law. The retaking by a party captured of a prize made by the enemy. There is still another kind of rescue which partakes of the nature of a recapture: it occurs when the weaker party, before he is overpowered, obtains relief from the arrival of fresh succors, and is thus preserved from the force of the enemy. 1 C. Rob. 224, 271; Halleck, Int. Law cxxxv.

Rescue differs from recapture. The rescuers do not by the rescue become owners of the property, as if it had been a new prize; but the property is restored to the original owners by the right of postliminium.

RESCUSSOR. The party making a rescue is sometimes so called; but more properly he is a rescuer.

RESEALING WRIT. The second sealing of a writ by a master so as to continue it, or cure it of an irregularity. Whart. Dict.

RESERVATION. That part of a deed or instrument which reserves a thing not in esse at the time of the grant, but newly created. 2 Hilliard, Abr. 359.

The meaning of a reservation in a contract must be determined in every case by the particular facts of the case, such as the character of the conveyance, the nature and situation of the property conveyed and of the property excepted, and the purpose of such exception; 143 U. S. 596.

The creation of a right or interest which had no prior existence as such in a thing or part of a thing granted, by means of a clause inserted by the grantor in the instrument of conveyance.

A reservation is distinguished from an exception in that it is of a new right or interest: thus, a right of way reserved at the time of conveying an estate, which may have been enjoyed by the grantor as owner of the estate, becomes a new right. 42 Me. 9. An easement may be acquired by the grantor of a deed poll by a clause of reservation; and the technical distinction between reservation and exception will be disregarded, and the language used so construed as to effectuate the intention of the parties; 50 N. J. Eq. 464.

A reservation may be of a life-estate; 28 Vt. 10; 33 N. H. 18; 23 Mo. 373; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 230; of a right of flowage; 41 Me. 298; right to use water; 41 Me. 177; 9 N. Y. 423; right of way; 25 Conn. 331; 6 Cush. 254; 10 id. 313; 10 B. Monr. 463; 5 Wash. St. 509; a ground rent, in Pennsylvania, and of many other rights and interests; 33 N. H. 507; 9 B. Monr. 163; 5 Pa. 317; 29 Ohio 568; 107 Mass. 290.

The public land laws of the United States provide for reservations or "reserves" of government land for certain public purposes; such as Indian reservations (see INDIAN TERRITORY); and those for military posts. The jurisdiction of a circuit court over crimes committed on military reservations extends to the whole of such reservations, whether used for military purposes or not; 146 U. S. 325. See 66 Fed. Rep. 671.

The land department of the United States has authority to withdraw or reserve public lands from sale, etc., and a grant by congress does not operate upon lands theretofore reserved for any purpose whatever. Lands withdrawn from sale by the land department are considered as reserved within the terms of this rule; 34 U. S. App. 66. An act for the sale of desert lands does not embrace alternate sections reserved to the United States along the lines of railroads for the construction of which congress has made grants of lands; 160 U. S. 136. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND GRANT.

RESERVE. The National Bank Act directs that all national banks in the sixteen largest cities shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least twenty-five per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and deposits. Fifteen per cent. is required of all other national banks. When the reserve falls below the proper limit, the bank must not increase its liability, otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend, till the limit is reached. On a failure to make good the reserve for thirty days after notice by the comptroller of the currency, the latter may, with the concurrence of the secretary of the treasury, appoint a receiver to wind up the bank. R. S. § 5191.

In Insurance Law. Under the statutes of many states insurance companies are required to deposit in each state where they do business securities approved by some state officer, usually an insurance commissioner, to an amount specified over and above the capital stock of the company, which is termed the reserve fund. Such statutes usually prescribe rules for its investment and also the percentage at which it shall be accumulated; Biddle, Ins. § 66. They are held not to apply to relief associations where the assessments are purely voluntary; 11 Ins. L. J. N. Y. 859; or mutual insurance companies; 9 Colo. 73. The securities which compose a reserve fund are in the nature of a trust fund for the policy holders, and not a security for the general creditors; 43 Ohio St. 359; 76 Mo. 594; 12 R. I. 259; and a receiver appointed in case of the insolvency of a company is not entitled to control it, but securities are held in trust for distribution by the trustee; 56 Conn. 234. After the policy holders are satisfied, the securities, if the property of the company, may be applied for the benefit of general creditors; 12 R. I. 259.

In many states such fund is required as a prerequisite to permission to a foreign insurance company to do business in the state, and ordinarily the deposits required by such laws are for the benefit of domestic policy holders; 91 Mo. 177; 77 Va. 85; 25 Neb. 834; 17 U. C. Ch. 160.

Another use of the term is its application to a fund sometimes called the safety fund and sometimes a reserve fund in policies issued by companies which provide for an assessment to meet the losses. Such fund is intended for the protection of living members by the use of the income for the payment of dues and assessments; 2 Joyce, Ins. § 1287. Where a reserve fund and the mortuary and benefit fund were to be raised by assessments, the latter being for the payment of death claims only and the former for the exclusive use of members, except that it might be used in payment of death claims when they exceed the experience table of mortality, it was held, upon dissolution, that the reserve fund was to be distributed exclusively among the holders of certificates in force, and that death claims had no right to share in it; 65 N. Y. 867; 131 N. Y. 354. See 92 Hun 592.

In a policy on the Tontine system (see INSURANCE, subtitle, Tontine), where, in addition to the provision for the payment of death claims, it was provided that in case the policy holder survived the specified period and the policy remained in force, there should be a payment in cash or annuity bonds from a fund created by a certain class of policy holders consisting of those effecting insurance on the same plan and in the same year, the surplus and profits to be equitably apportioned among survivors of that class, it was held that the policy did not require a separate investment of these funds and that the consent of the assured to placing the dividends in a reserve fund did not extend its obligations in that respect; 101 N. Y. 328.

Where a policy recited that it was upon the "reserve dividend plan," and that if premiums were paid for ten years the company would pay to the person designated his equitable proportion of the "reserve dividend fund," it was held that the meanings of the terms employed must be ascertained by recourse to contemporary insurance literature, and as the only reserve dividend plan then known was the one devised and copyrighted by W. P. Stewart, who was engaged as actuary by the defendant and his plan used by it, the liability must be determined by reference thereto; 37 Fed. Rep. 163.

The term reserve in life insurance is also applied to the fund accumulated out of premiums after the payment of expenses and other charges properly apportioned to each policy, and where a life policy provides that, in case of lapse for non-payment of premium, the net reserve, less indebtedness, shall be applied to the purchase of extended insurance, or, if the assured shall so elect within three months, to the purchase of a paid-up policy, and also that said indebtedness may be paid in cash, and the entire net reserve so applied, such indebtedness must be paid within the three months; 81 Fed. Rep. 935.

For point reserved, see that title.

RESET. The receiving or harboring an outlawed person. Cowel.

RESET OF THEFT. In Scotch Law. The receiving and keeping stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, with a design of feloniously retaining them from the real owner. Alison, Cr. Law 328.

RESETTER. In Scotch Law. A receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen.

RESIANCE. A man's residence or permanent abode. Such a man is called a resiant. Kitch. 33.

RESIANT ROLLS. Those containing the resiants in a tithing, etc., which were called over by the steward on holding courts leet.

RESIDENCE (Lat. resideo). Personal presence in a fixed and permanent abode. 20 Johns. 208; 1 Metc. Mass. 251.

The abode where one actually lives, not the legal domicil. 69 Hun 617.

A residence is different from a domicil, although it is a matter of great importance in determining the place of domicil. The essential distinction between residence and domicil is that the first involves the intent to leave when the purpose for which one has taken up his abode ceases. The other has no such intent; the abiding is animo manendi. One may seek a place for the purposes of pleasure, of business, or of health. If his intent be to remain, it becomes his domicil; if his intent be to leave as soon as his purpose is accomplished, it is his residence; 53 Fed. Rep. 811. See 13 Mass. 501; 2 Gray 490; 19 Wend. 11; 11 La. 175; 5 Me. 143; 50 Hun 454; 59 L. J.

67; DOMICIL. But it has been held synonymous with domicil; 15 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 312. It is an element of domicil. See 97 Pa. 74; 21 Wall. 350; Dicey, Dom. 1. Residence and habitancy are usually synonymous; 2 Gray 490; 2 Kent 574, n. Residence indicates permanency of occupation, as distinct from lodging, or boarding, or temporary occupation, but does not include as much as domicil, which requires an intention combined with residence; 19 Me. 293; 2 Kent 576. See 5 Sandf. 44; 16 N. Y. S, 834. In a statute it was held not to mean business residence, but the fixed home of the party; 13 Reptr. 430 (S. C. of Md.). See 15 M. & W. 433; 69 Hun 308.

Residence has been held to be more restricted than domicil as applied to homestead laws; 113 N. C. 421.

An averment of residence is not equivalent to an allegation of citizenship; 21 U. S. App. 45.

It was held that within the meaning of the statute against kidnapping, any place where a child has a right to be is its residence; 147 Ind. 621. See KIDNAPPING; DOMICIL.

See, generally, 105 Mass. 93; 117 N. Y. 159; 24 Q. B. Div. 29; 134 U. S. 351.

RESIDENT. One who has his residence in a place.

One is a resident of a place from which his departure is indefinite as to time, definite as to purpose; and for this purpose he has made the place his temporary home; 53 Fed. Rep. 311. See NON-RESIDENT.

RESIDENT MINISTER. In International Law. See MINISTER.

RESIDUARY ACCOUNT. In English Practice. The account which every executor and administrator, after paying the debts and particular legacies of the deceased, and before paying over the residuum, must pass before the Board of Inland Revenue. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 221, n.; Moz. & W.

RESIDUARY CLAUSE. The clause in a will by which that part of the property is disposed of which remains after satisfying previous bequests and devises. 4 Kent 541*; 2 Will. Exec., 7th Am. ed. *1316.

RESIDUARY DEVISEE. The person to whom the residue of a testator's real estate is devised after satisfying previous devises.

RESIDUARY ESTATE. What remains of a testator's estate after deducting the debts and the bequests and devises.

RESIDUARY LEGATEE. He to whom the residuum of the estate is devised or bequeathed by will. Rop. Leg.; Powell, Mortg. See LEGACY.

RESIDUE. That which remains of something after taking away a part of it: as, the residue of an estate, which is what has not been particularly devised by will.

What is left; the rest. 63 Hun 352. What is left after all liabilities are discharged, and the objects of the testator carried into effect. 48 Fed. Rep. 3.

A will bequeathing the general residue of personal property passes to the residuary legatee everything not otherwise effectually disposed of; and it makes no difference whether a legacy falls into the estate by lapse or as void at law, the next of kin is equally excluded; 15 Ves. 416; 2 Mer. 392. See 40 Conn. 264.

Where a residuary legacy lapses, there is a pro tanto intestacy; 82 Pa. 428. Where the residue is not expressly disposed of and it does not appear by the will that the executors were intended to take it beneficially, they are to be deemed trustees for the next of kin; 8 Beav. 475; though previous to 1830, it was considered in the English courts that if the testator had named in his will an executor, but no residuary legatee, the executor should retain the residue of the personal estate for his own benefit; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 494. Under the statutes 2 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 40, the executor is a trustee for the next of kin, unless it shall appear from the will that he is to take the residue beneficially; L. R. 7 H. L. 606; and he is not entitled to it by implication of law; id. See 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 20; LEGACY. A legacy to the next of kin does not exclude his claim to the residue; Amb. 566; 12 Ves. 298.

RESIGNATION (Lat. resignatio: re, back, signo, to sign). See OFFICER.

RESIGNATION BOND. In Ecclesiastical Law. A bond given by an incumbent to resign on a certain contingency. It may be conditioned to resign for good and sufficient reason, and therefore lawful, e. g. to resign if he take a second benefice, or on request, if a patron present his son or kinsman when of age to take the living, etc. Cro. Jac. 249. 274. But equity will generally relieve the incumbent; 1 Rolle, Abr. 443.

RESIGNEE. One in favor of whom a resignation is made. 1 Bell, Com. 125, n.

RESIST. To oppose by direct, active, and quasi-forcible means. 37 Wis. 261.

RESISTANCE (Lat. re, back, sisto, to stand, to place). The opposition of force to force. See ARREST; ASSAULT; OFFICER; PROCESS.

RESOLUTION (Lat. re, again, solvo, to loose, to free). A solemn judgment or decision of a court. This word is frequently used in this sense in Coke and some of the more ancient reporters.

An agreement to a law or other thing adopted by a legislature or popular assembly. See Dict. de Jurisp.; ORDINANCE; JOINT RESOLUTION.

In Civil Law. The act by which a contract which existed and was good is rendered null.

Resolution differs esssentially from rescission. The former presupposes the contract to have been valid, and it is owing to a cause posterior to the agreement that the resolution takes place; while rescission, on the contrary, supposes that some vice or defect annulled the contract from the beginning. Resolution may be by consent of the parties or by the decision of a competent tribunal; rescission must always be by the judgment of a court; 7 Troplong, de la Vente, n. 689; 7 Toullier 551.

RESOLUTIVE CONDITION. In Scotch Law. A condition of which the obligation comes to an end on the occurrence of the uncertain event. Ersk. Prin. 3. 1. 3, RESOLUTORY CONDITION. One which has for its objects, when accomplished, the revocation of the principal obligation; for example, I will sell you my crop of cotton if my ship America does not arrive in the United States within six months; my ship arrives in one month: my contract with you is revoked. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 764.

RESOURCES. Money or any property that can be converted into supplies, capabilities of producing wealth, or to supply necessary wants; available means or capabilities of any kind. 3 Mont. 386.

RESPECTIVE, RESPECTIVELY. Words of severance. Occurring in a testamentary gift to more persons than one, their effect is to sort out the devisees or legatees so that they take as tenants in common; 31 L. J. Ch. 368. In court or in chambers respectively, as used in the Judicature Act, means either in court or in chambers; 53 L. J. Q. B. 428; 13 Q. B. D. 218.

RESPECTU COMPUTI VICECOMITIS HABENDO. A writ for respiting a sheriff's account addressed to the treasurer and barons of the exchequer. Reg. Orig. 139.

RESPIRATION (Lat. re, back, spiro, to breathe). Breathing, which consists of the drawing into, inhaling, or, more technically, inspiring, atmospheric air into the lungs, and then forcing out, expelling, or, technically, expiring, from the lungs the air therein. Chitty, Med. Jur. 92, 416, note n.

RESPITE. In Civil Law. An act by which a debtor who is unable to satisfy his debts at the moment transacts (i. e. compromises) with his creditors and obtains from them time or delay for the payment of the sums which he owes to them. La. Code 3051.

A forced respite takes place when a part of the creditors refuse to accept the debtor's proposal, and when the latter is obliged to compel them, by judicial authority, to consent to what the others have determined in the cases directed by law.

A voluntary respite takes place when all the creditors consent to the proposal of the debtor to pay in a limited time the whole or a part of his debt.

A delay, forbearance, or continuation of time.

In Criminal Law. A reprieve. A temporary suspension of the execution of a sentence. See 62 Pa. 60. It differs from a pardon, which is an absolute suspension. See PARDON; REPRIEVE.

RESPITE OF HOMAGE. To dispense with the performance of homage by tenants who held their lands in consideration of performing homage to their lords. Cowell.

RESPONDE BOOK. In Scotch Law. A book of record of the chancellary, in which are entered all non-entry and relief duties payable by heirs who take precepts from chancery. Stair, Inst. p. 296, § 28; Erskine, Inst. 11. 5. 50.

RESPONDEAT OUSTER (that he answer over). See ABATEMENT; JUDGMENT; OUSTER.

RESPONDEAT SUPERIOR. A phrase often used to indicate the responsibility of a principal for the acts of his servant or agent. MASTER AND SERVANT; PRINCIPAL; AGENT.

RESPONDENT. The party who makes an answer to a bill or other proceeding in chancery.

In Civil Law. One who answers or is security for another; a fidejussor. Dig. 2. 8. 6.

RESPONDENTIA. In Maritime Law. A loan of money, on maritime interest, on goods laden on board of a ship, upon the condition that if the goods be wholly lost in the course of the voyage, by any of the perils enumerated in the contract, the lender shall lose his money; if not, that the borrower shall pay him the sum borrowed, with the interest agreed upon. See Newb. 514.

The contract is called respondentia because the money is lent mainly, or most frequently, on the personal responsibility of the borrower. It differs principally from bottomry, which see, in the following circumstances: bottomry is a loan on the ship; respondentia is a loan upon the goods. 1 Pet. 386. The money is to be repaid to the lender, with maritime interest, upon the arrival of the ship in the one case, and of the goods in the other. In most other respects the contracts are nearly the same, and are governed by the same principles. In the former, the ship and tackle, being hypothecated, are liable, as well as the borrower; in the latter, the lender has, in general, it is said, only the personal security of the borrower; Marsh. Ins. 734.

If any part of the goods arrive safely at the end of the voyage, the lender is entitled to have the proceeds applied to the payment of his debt. If the loan is made to the master, and not to the owners of the goods, the necessity for the loan and for the hypothecation of the cargo must be clearly shown, or the owners of the goods, and, consequently, the goods themselves, will not be bound. The ship and freight are always first to be resorted to to raise money for the necessity of the ship or the prosecution of the voyage; and it seems that a bond upon the cargo is considered by implication of law a bond upon the ship and freight also, and that unless the ship be liable in law the cargo cannot be held liable; The Constancia, 4 Notes of Cas. 285, 512, 677; 10 Jur. 845; 2 W. Rob. 83; 14 Jur. 96. See MASTER OF A SHIP.

If the contract clearly contemplates that the goods on which the loan is made are to be sold or exchanged, free from any lien, in the course of the voyage, the lender will have no lien on them, but must rely wholly upon the personal responsibility of the borrower. It has frequently been said by elementary writers, and without qualification, that the lender has no lien; 2 Bla. Com. 458; 3 Kent 354; but the form of bond generally in use in this country expressly hypothecates the goods, and thus, even when there is no express hypothecation, if the goods are still on board at the end of the voyage, it is not doubtful that a court of admiralty will direct the arrest of the goods and enforce against them the maritime lien or privilege conferred by the respondentia contract. There is, perhaps, no common-law lien, but this maritime lien only; but the latter will be enforced by the proper admiralty process. See the authorities cited in note to Abb. Shipp., 13th ed. 152, 154, 175; 4 Wash. C. C. 662; form of respondentia bonds in Conkl. Adm. 263; 1 Pars. Mar. Law 437, and n. 5; Abb. Shipp. 455. See ADMIRALTY; MARITIME CAUSE; LIEN.

RESPONDERE NON DEBET (Lat. ought not to reply). In Pleading. The prayer of a plea where the defendant insists that he ought not to answer, as when he claims a privilege: for example, as being a member of congress or a foreign ambassador. 1 Chitty, Pl. *433.

RESPONSA PRUDENTUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. Opinions given by Roman lawyers.

Before the time of Augustus, every lawyer was authorized, de jure, to answer questions put to him; and all such answers, responsa prudentum, had equal authority—not the force of law, but the opinion of a lawyer. Augustus was the first prince who gave to certain distinguished jurisconsults the particular privilege of answering in his name; and from that period their answers acquired greater authority. Adrian determined in a more precise manner the degree of authority which these answers should have, by enacting that the opinions of such authorized jurisconsults, when unanimously given, should have the force of law (legis vicem) and should be followed by the judges, and that when they were divided the judge was allowed to adopt that which to him appeared the most equitable. The opinions of other lawyers held the same place they had before: they were considered merely as the opinions of learned men. Mackeldey, Man. Introd. § 43; Mackeldey, Hist. du Dr. Rom. §§ 40, 49; Hugo, Hist. du Dr. Rom. § 313; Inst. 1. 2. 8; Institutes Expliquées, n. 39.

RESPONSALIS. In Old English Law. One who appeared for another.

A person, without restrictions as to character, permitted by the judge to act for a party in his presence. Such a person was sometimes allowed by a justice to act on the appearance of the defendant, which, according to the old writs, was always in proper person. Lord Coke calls special attention to the difference between a responsalis and an attorney; 2 Co. Inst. 249; 22 N. Y. 68, per T. W. Dwight, arguendo.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A proctor.

RESPONSIBILITY. The obligation to answer for an act done and to repair any injury it may have caused.

One person—as, for example, a principal, master, or parent—is frequently responsible, civilly, for the acts of another.

Penal responsibility is always personal; and no one can be punished for the commission of a crime but the person who has committed it, or his accomplice.

RESPONSIBLE. Able to pay the sum which may be required of him; able to discharge an obligation. Webst. Dict.; 26 N. H. 527; 55 How. Pr. 119. A promise "to be responsible" for the debt of another is merely a guaranty, and not a suretyship; 9 Phila. 499; 80 Pa. 209.

In an act directing municipal officers to award contracts to the lowest responsible bidder, responsible applies not only to pecuniary ability but also to judgment and skill; 164 Pa. 477. See 160 Ill. 655.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT. A term used in England and her colonial possessions to indicate an obligation to resign, on the part of the ministry, upon the declaration of a want of confidence by vote of the legislative branch of the colonial government. Mills, Col. Const. 27.

RESSEISER. The taking of lands into the hands of the crown, where a general livery or ouster le main was formerly misused. Whart.

RESTAUR, or RESTOR. The remedy or recourse which assurers have against each other, according to the date of their assurances; or against the master, if the loss arise through his default; also the remedy or recourse a person has against his guarantor, or other person, who is to indemnify him from any damage sustained. Whart.

RESTAURANT. As currently understood, an eating house. 10 Fed. Rep. 6. See INN; INNKEEPER.

RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRAM

(Lat.). In Civil Law. A restoring parties to the condition they were in before entering into a contract or agreement, on account of fraud, infancy, force, honest mistake, etc. Calvinus, Lex. The going into a cause anew from the beginning. Id.

RESTITUTION. In Maritime Law. The placing back or restoring articles which have been lost by jettison: this is done, when the remainder of the cargo has been saved, at the general charge of the owners of the cargo; but when the remainder of the goods is afterwards lost, there is not any restitution. Stevens, Av. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 1, n. 8. As to restitution of captured vessels, see RECAPTURE; Desty, Sh. & Adm. § 446.

In Practice. The return of something to the owner of it or to the person entitled to it.

After property has been taken into execution, and the judgment has been reversed or set aside, the party against whom the execution was sued out shall have restitution; and this is enforced by a writ of restitution; Cro. Jac. 698; 13 S. & R. 294. When the thing levied upon under an execution has not been sold, the thing itself shall be restored; when it has been sold, the price for which it is sold is to be restored; Bacon, Abr. Execution (Q); 1 Maule & S. 425.

"Pending an appeal from an order of the common pleas striking off the satisfaction of a judgment, the plaintiff in the judgment issued an execution, and the terre-tenant of the land was compelled to pay to the sheriff a large sum of money to prevent a sale of the land; the supreme court subsequently reversed the order striking off the satisfaction of the judgment; held, that the terre-tenant was entitled to a writ of restitution." 176 Pa. 170. Whether restitution should be made in the progress of judicial procedure if the interest of the parties defendant are diverse, is a question of fact; 33 U. S. App. 393.

RESTITUTION EDICT. An edict issued in 1629, by Emperor Ferdinand II., requiring Protestants to restore to the Roman Catholic authorities all ecclesiastical property which they had appropriated at the peace of Passau in 1552.

RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS. In Ecclesiastical Law. A compulsory renewal of cohabitation between a husband and wife who have been living separately. Unknown in the United States.

A suit may be brought in the divorce and matrimonial court for this purpose whenever either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without sufficient reason, by which the party injured may compel the other to return to cohabitation; 3 Bla. Com. 94; 3 Steph. Com. 11; but a woman cannot take proceedings for the restitution of conjugal rights until she has used reasonable means to induce her husband to take her back; 14 P. Div. 26; and the rule requires a written demand for cohabitation, of a conciliatory character; id. A wife whose husband had refused to receive her because she had left her home on account of a disagreement with his children by a former marriage, was held entitled to a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights; [1896] P. 175; 1 Add. Eccl. 305; 3 Hagg. 619. Formerly a deed of separation afforded no bar to this suit, even though it in terms forbade such proceedings. But this rule is now changed, and to one separated spouse chancery will now grant an injunction, to restrain the other from suing for restitution of conjugal rights; Schoul. Hus. & Wife § 482. See CRUELTY.

RESTITUTION OF MINORS. In Scotch Law. A minor on attaining majority may obtain relief against a deed previously executed by him, which may be held void or voidable, according to circumstances. This is called restitution of minors. Bell.

RESTITUTION OF STOLEN GOODS. At common law there was no restitution of goods upon an indictment, because it was at the suit of the crown only, therefore the party was compelled to bring an appeal of robbery in order to have his goods again; but a writ of restitution was granted by 21 Hen. VIII. c. 11, and it became the practice of the crown to order, without any writ, immediate restitution of such goods. The Larceny Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, § 100, gives power to the court from time to time to issue writs of restitution for stolen property or to order the restitution thereof in a summary manner upon a conviction of the guilty party upon an indictment on behalf of the owner, and this notwithstanding the guilty party may have sold them for value to an innocent purchaser; but by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, § 9, a sum not exceeding the proceeds of such sale out of moneys taken from the guilty party on his apprehension may be delivered to such innocent purchaser. Whart. Lex.

RESTITUTION, WRIT OF. A writ which lies, after the reversal of a judgment, to restore a party to all that he has lost by occasion of the judgment. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1186.

RESTITUTIONE EXTRACTI AB ECCLESIA. A writ which formerly lay to restore a man to the church, which he had recovered for a sanctuary being suspected of a felony. Reg. Orig.; Cowel.

RESTITUTIONE TEMPORALIUM. A writ addressed to the sheriff to restore the temporalities of a bishopric to the bishop elected and confirmed. Fitz. N. B. 169.

RESTRAINING. Narrowing down; making less extensive. For example, a restraining statute is one by which the common law is narrowed down or made less extensive in its operation. Restraining powers are the limitations or restrictions upon the use of a power imposed by the donor. Restraining order is an order granted on motion or petition, restraining the Bank of England or other public company from allowing any dealing with certain specified stock or shares. Hunt, Eq. pt. iii. c. 3, s. 2.

In the United States a restraining order is an interlocutory order made by a court of equity upon an application for an injunction and as part of the motion for a preliminary injunction, by which the party is restrained pending the hearing of the motion.

RESTRAINT. The effect of restraint in the law is to be considered mainly with respect to trade, marriage, princes, and alienation, all of which are herein separately considered. As to restraint upon anticipation, see MARRIED WOMAN; and as to the execution of deeds or other documents under restraint, see DURESS.

RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE. Conditions attached to gifts or bequests to a person who has never been married, in general restraint of marriage, are void; Chit. Const. 619; so is an agreement not to marry any one except a particular person; 4 Burr. 2225. The gift or bequest is good and the condition fails, but if the restraint is partial, with a gift over in case of marrying a Roman Catholic or a particular person or without the consent of a particular person, the condition is good, and so is a condition in restraint of a second marriage. See Allen v. Jackson, 1 Ch. D. 399; 1 Q. B. D. 279; 16 Ch. D. 188.

It is said that a condition in restraint of marriage is valid if it is a condition precedent; 2 Dick. 712. In 1 Q. B. D. 279, it was held to be the intention of the testator not to restrain marriage but to make provision for the devisee until marriage. See Poll. Contr. 307.

A limitation until marriage is good; Wats. Comp. Eq. 1139; being construed as a provision until marriage and not a restraint on marriage.

RESTRAINT OF PRINCES AND RULERS. A phrase used in the exceptions to bills of lading, importing a limitation upon the liability of a ship-owner under the contract.

The words apply only to the ruling power of a country and not to pirates or any lawless power; 4 Term 783; they apply not only to hostile acts, but to those committed by the government of which the assured is a subject, as the seizure of a vessel for use as a fire-ship; 2 Ld. Raym. 840; or the wrongful seizure of an English ship and cargo by a British ship of war; 2 E. & E. 160; L. R. 5 Q. B. 599; to a temporary embargo by a friendly government; 6 Term 413; 3 B. & S. 163; 32 L. J. Q. B. 50; a detention of a neutral vessel in a blockaded port; 7 L. R. Q. B. 404; or a siege; L. R. 9 C. P. 518. A reasonable apprehension of capture will justify delay under the usual exception of restraint of princes, etc.; L. R. 5 P. C. 301; L. R. 3 A. & E. 435; 1 Maule & S. 352.

It does not include a seizure of the cargo by an armed mob; 4 Term 783, n.; or a remote danger of capture; 10 East 530; nor, it seems, a restraint sanctioned by municipal law of the ship-owner's country; 3 B. & S. 163; nor the process of a court of law; 23 L. T. 251.

Where goods contraband of war were shipped under a bill of lading containing this exception, it was held that the risk of the goods being seized amounted to a restraint of princes; [1896] 2 Q. B. 326.

Enforced obedience to lawfully prescribed quarantine regulations is a restraint of natural liberty of action devised by and proceeding from the people, and detention at quarantine is fairly included within an exception in a charter party which has reference to restraint of princes or rulers and people; 3 U. S. App. 147.

See CHARTER PARTY; PERILS OF THE SEA; QUARANTINE.

RESTRAINT OF TRADE. Contracts operating for the restraint of trade are presumptively illegal and void on the ground of the policy of the law favoring freedom of trade; but the presumption of illegality may be rebutted by the occasion and circumstances; 2 Pars. Contr. 870. See 7 C. C. App. 15. Thus in agreements for the sale of the good-will of a firm, or the formation or dissolution of a partnership, provisions operating in restraint of trade are frequently inserted. Their validity depends upon whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in whose favor it is imposed; Leake, Contr. 633; 49 N. J. Eq. 217. Whatever restraint is larger than is necessary for the protection of this party is void: therefore, the restraint must be limited in regard to space; 5 M. & W. 562; L. R. 15 Eq. 59. An agreement reasonable in regard to space may be unlimited in regard to the duration of time provided for; but where the question is as to whether the space is unlimited, the duration of the restraint in point of time may become an important matter; Leake, Contr. 634; 2 M. & G. 20. It has been said generally that where a covenant in restraint of trade is general, that is, without qualifications, it is bad, as being unreasonable and contrary to public policy. Where it is partial, that is, subject to some qualification either as to time or space, then the question is whether it is reasonable; and if reasonable, it is good in law; [1892] 3 Ch. 447.

There are cases where an unlimited restraint is justified: e. g. the sale of a secret process of manufacture of an article in general demand, which it is agreed shall be communicated for the exclusive benefit of the buyer; see L. R. 9 Eq. 45; 131 U. S. 88; so of the sale of a patent right, the restraint may be unlimited while the patent continues; 1 H. & N. 189.

Some cases have required the presence of a sufficient and reasonable consideration to support a contract in restraint of trade; 8 Mass. 223; 21 Wend. 158; see 3 Ohio St. 275; but in England a legally valid consideration only is required; 6 A. & E. 438. See, generally, 1 Sm. L. C. 724; 35 Am. Rep. 269.

The decision in Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, may be regarded as the first announcement of the rule in relation to the invalidity of contracts in restraint of trade.

Mitchell v. Reynolds contains much more in the way of legal statement than is required for the decision of the precise point involved, which was that a reasonable restraint agreed to for a good consideration is valid, and it was afterwards remarked by Tindal, C. J., that when it was said by Parker, C. J., in Mitchell v. Reynolds, that "'a restraint to carry on a trade throughout the kingdom must be void; a restraint to carry it on within a particular place is good,' those are only examples and not limits of the application of the rule which can only be, 'What is a reasonable restraint with reference to the particular case'"; 7 Bing. 735. More than sixty years after this case the English rule is stated in the same terms, and it is said that the true test of validity is whether the contract is or is not reasonable; [1894] App. Cas. 535; and a more comprehensive statement is that a general covenant in restraint of trade, without qualifications, is bad, because unreasonable and contrary to public policy, but if partial, that is, subject to some qualification either as to time or place, then the question is whether it is reasonable, and if it is, it is legally valid; [1892] 3 Ch. 447. In Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351, the existence of an absolute rule with respect to restraint unlimited as to space, was denied, but that question was left somewhat in doubt by the English court of appeal in 36 id. 351; see also 4 App. Cas. 674; so that by way of summing up a review of the English decisions, it is said the question "whether there is an inflexible rule that contracts, the restraint of which extends throughout England, are null and void, is still a mooted one"; Patterson, Restr. of Trade 16. See, also, [1893] 1 Ch. 630; [1898] 1 Ch. 676. In the United States it was early held that a covenant not to pursue an occupation in the state was in total restraint of trade and void; 21 Wend. 157; 10 Barb. 641; 13 Allen 375; 36 Cal. 312; contra, 31 Mich. 490; 17 R. I. 3; see 106 N. Y. 473, where it was held that the question as to what is a general restraint of trade does not depend on state lines, and a restraint is not necessarily general which embraces an entire state. The United States supreme court took the view that a restraint co-extensive with the state was not necessarily void; 20 Wall. 64, where the subject was ably discussed by Bradley, J., and in a later case it was said by Fuller, C. J., "The question is whether under the particular circumstances of the case, the nature of the particular contract involved in it, the contract is or is not unreasonable;" 130 U. S. 396. In 2 Ohio St. 519, a covenant not to manufacture candles in the United States was held void, and in 51 Hun 157, a similar contract as to space but limited to ten years in time, for the manufacture of thermometers, was held valid as a reasonable restriction. An agreement in a contract not to engage in the business of manufacturing or dealing in certain articles of commerce for a period of five years, and without any limitation of space, is held to be unlawful; 146 Mass. 469; as was a contract excluding the obligor from engaging in a useful trade everywhere and for all time; 19 Pick. 51; and a contract of sale of fire alarm or police telegraph machines, with a covenant not to enter into competition with the purchaser for ten years without restriction as to place; 160 Mass. 50; see 45 Cal. 152; but a contract unlimited territorially save by the words so far as the law allows, is not void as being in conflict with public policy, nor as being too uncertain to be capable of being enforced; 47 Ia. 137.

"The general rule can then best be stated as follows: Contracts in restraint of trade are in themselves, if nothing more appear to show them reasonable, bad in the eye of the law, but if from the peculiar circumstances of each case they appear to be reasonable and are founded upon a good consideration, they are valid." Patterson, Restr. of Trade 5, and cases cited: 68 Pa. 173.

Contracts in general restraint of trade are void unless natural and not unreasonable for the protection of the parties; 21 Wend. 157; 4 Daly 168; 47 Ia. 137; as such contracts impose too great a restraint on trade and are oppressive to one party without being of benefit to another; 3 G. Green 596; 5 Fed. Rep. 119. Contracts for limited restraint are valid if entered into for good reasons, such as to afford fair protection to the purchaser of a business; 7 Cow. 307; 52 Ia. 241; 39 Ga. 655. A contract not to carry on a trade in a particular town or county is valid; 7 J. J. Marsh. 368. Contracts in restraint of trade held to be valid are: Not to practise medicine within twelve miles of a place; 58 Pa. 51; not to engage in a certain business within sixty miles of a place for ten years; 40 Me. 224; not to run a stage on a certain route; 8 Mass. 223; not to set up the business of an apothecary within twenty miles of a place; 6 Ad. & El. 438. A contract relating to a compound involving a secret in its preparation and based upon a valuable consideration, and limited as to the space within which, though unlimited as to the time for which the restraint is to operate, is reasonable and enforcible; 131 U. S. 88.

An agreement never to engage in a certain trade in the city and county of San Francisco or state of California, was held too extensive in its restriction and therefore void; 40 Cal. 251; as was a covenant not to run a steamboat belonging to a certain corporation or allow its machinery to be used on any other boat in any of the waters of certain states; 1 Wash. 283. But the contract by the owner of a line of vessels running between New York and the West Indies, who had sold the goodwill thereof, to do no business with such ports within any place in the United States east of the Mississippi River, is not an unreasonable restraint of trade; 51 N. Y. Suppl. 572.

The conclusion from the cases is stated to be that the weight of authority in this country as in England is opposed to a fixed limit beyond which the restraint under a contract cannot extend; Patterson, Restr. of Trade 25. That there is no limitation as to time is no objection; 5 M. & W. 548 (where Parke, B., states clearly the reasons for applying a different rule to time from that relating to space); 6 Ind. 200; 47 Conn. 175; 44 Ill. App. 441; 26 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 977.

An agreement to relinquish a business and not to carry it on thereafter, limited as to place but unlimited as to time, is not void; 61 N. H. 40; 57 Mich. 362; and the limit of space may be according to the nature of the contract; L. R. 1 Ch. 463.

It has been held that no contracts are void as being in general restraint of trade when they operate simply to prevent a party from engaging or competing in the same business; 110 N. Y. 519.

Agreements to restrain rivalry and competition in bidding for public work are void, but an honest co-operation is not within the rule against combinations to stifle competition; 83 Fed. Rep. 372.

The tendency of recent adjudications is now clearly marked in the direction of relaxing the rigor of the doctrine that all contracts in general restraint of trade are void, irrespective of special circumstances; 106 N. Y. 473. It has of late years been denied that a hard and unjust rule of that kind has ever been the law of England; L. R. 14 Ch. D. 251.

Courts will not lend their aid to enforce the performance of a contract which they hold to be in restraint of trade, as contrary to public policy, on the ground that one side has performed the agreement, but will leave the parties in the plight in which their own illegal action placed them; 27 U. S. App. 1. See 9 id. 96; 3 id. 16.

The reasonableness of such covenants, and consequently whether they are in restraint of trade or not, is a question of law for the court and not of fact for the jury; 11 M. & W. 548; id. 653; 3 Chand. 133; 7 Bing. 743.

Covenants of this character have been held divisible, partly valid and partly void; 11 M. & W. 653; 2 Ohio 519; 113 Pa. 579; 20 Wall. 64; 40 Cal. 251.

Where the restriction of a business is in accordance with public policy, the rule against such covenants does not apply, upon the ground that the reason ceasing, the rule also ceases. This is true in the case of patents, the object of granting which is to create a monopoly; 103 Mass. 73; 32 Mo. 265; 133 U. S. 88; trade secrets; L. R. 9 Eq. 345; 19 Pick. 523; intoxicating liquors; 25 Ind. 112; but in case of a business in which competition is particularly beneficial to the public interest, the tendency is to view with disfavor any restrictions. This principle has been applied to the manufacture of gas; 121 Ill. 530; pipe lines; 22 W. Va. 660; telegraphing; 65 Ga. 160. It is this principle which underlies the legislation against limitations upon railroad competition. See infra. But it has been held that a statute which prohibits companies doing business in a state from combining with other persons in the state for the creation of a monopoly, or the unlawful restraint of trade, or the prevention of competition, applies to a combination to control the price of a certain article, though its manufacture is protected by patents; 47 N. Y. Supp. 462; and that the fact that several patentees are exposed to litigation does not justify the creation by them of combinations to public disadvantage; 83 Fed. Rep. 36.

While the strictness of the ancient rule with respect to what was then termed restraint of trade has thus been relaxed, the mischief against which that rule was directed has taken a new form, and the creation of monopolies and restrictions upon competition are now accomplished under the guise of what are termed trusts, pooling agreements, and the like. The distinguishing feature of these attempts to stifle competition is a combination of persons engaged in any particular business under agreements for controlling and limiting the output of manufacturing establishments, lessening the amount of goods placed upon the market, and stipulating for uniform minimum prices of goods sold. The term trust is derived from the means employed to carry out the designs of these combinations, the stock of the various corporations or the property of the various concerns which become parties to a combination being in some cases assigned to trustees to control and manage in execution of the agreement.

It has been maintained that the rules governing contracts in restraint of trade are not applicable to trusts because persons constituting trusts become partners, and, as is well known, partners are not subject to these rules; see 3 Political Sci. Quart. 592; and the same writer is doubtful whether the offence of engrossing, forestalling, or regrating ever existed independently of the statutes 5 & 6 Edw. IV. ch. 14, and when these statutes were repealed courts had no authority to punish offenders; id. See 4 Harv. L. Rev. 128.

In modern state constitutions, following generally that of Illinois, 1870, there are efforts to prevent combinations to suppress competition. Most of these are directed against such attempts by railroad companies either through unjust discriminations or consolidation of competing lines. There are constitutional provisions on this subject in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Michigan, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, Texas, and West Virginia. A summary of them will be found in Spelling, Trusts & Monopolies § 89, note. They are usually considered as declaratory of the common law, as that of Colorado was expressly decided to be; 102 U. S. 667. Of the same character are state statutes directed against restraint of trade generally, which add but little to the limitations of the common law. The difficulty in dealing with the subject by state legislation is inherent. The great trusts cannot be reached by legislation within the states, inasmuch as their operations are not circumscribed by state boundaries. On the other hand attempts to deal with the subject by congress are hampered and obstructed by the constitutional limitation that federal legislation can deal only with interstate and foreign commerce; nevertheless an attempt was made by what was known as the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, 26 Stat. L. 209, which is generally admitted to deal very unsatisfactorily with the acknowledged evil which it was intended to reach. The most peculiar feature of this law is that, as construed, it expressly fails to prevent the combinations of capital and affords very drastic remedies against combinations of labor whenever they affect interstate commerce, which is the fact in almost every case of railroad strikes. See STRIKE; LABOR UNION.

Where an effort has been made under the anti-trust act to prosecute attempts to create a monopoly they have usually failed by reason of the vague and general terms in which the offences are described by the act; 50 Fed. Rep. 469; 52 id. 104, where the construction of the statute and the common-law principles involved are elaborately discussed by Jackson, J.; id. 146.

A bill was introduced in the senate in 1893 to repeal the anti-trust act of 1890 and "to defeat, punish, and restrain acts, contracts and combinations in restraint of trade and interstate commerce." This bill, which was referred and never passed, is characterized as comprehensive and specific and covering the necessities of the situation; Spell. Tr. & Mon. § 134, n.

In New York, the act of 1897, ch. 384, prohibits combinations for the creation of a monopoly or unlawful restraint of trade. The Texas constitution forbids perpetuities and monopolies, and the Texas act of 1889, ch. 117, makes void any contract whereby a combination of capital or goods of two or more persons is effected to create restrictions in trade or to prevent competition in the sale of commodities. In California, a contract restraining a profession, trade, or business except in the sale of good-will, as for a county or city or dissolution of partnership, is void by statute; Civ. Code § 1673; and in Georgia one in general restraint of trade is void; Code § 2750.

The decisions on the subject of these trusts and combinations are usually under the constitutional provisions or statutes on the subject, either state or federal, but most of them have been made in view of the common-law doctrine concerning restraint of trade and the creation of monopolies, and they need to be read and considered in connection with both the common and local statute law.

It has been said that "the nearest to a definite proposition which may be advanced is that any compact between two or more persons or corporations affecting any article or commodity of which the public must have a constant supply, the sole intent and direct tendency of such arrangement being the creation of a scarcity or the enhancement of the price, will be nullified by the courts, or specific enforcement refused." Spelling, Trusts & Monopolies § 52.

This principle has been applied to the case of agreements for combinations of manufacturers to control the market for many articles of general consumption. The usual features of such agreements are substantially the same, and the method adopted is the formation of a trust through which the objects of the combination are affected (see supra). Such trusts have been held illegal in the case of: coal mining companies: 68 N. Y. 568, where the principles involved are well stated; manufacturers of grain bags; 90 Cal. 110; of lumber; 76 Cal. 387; of wire cloth; 14 N. Y. S. 277; persons engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers on New York canals; 5 Den. 534; 4 id. 349; or in the business of manufacturing and selling preserves; 157 Ill. 284; in the manufacture and sale of distillery products; 156 id. 448; brewers who combined to lease "all the cooling room capacity for cooling beer" in a town, to prevent competition (and in this case it was held that the parties could not recover for non-performance of the contract); 88 Tex. 184; dealers in mineral waters; 63 L. T. 455; a combination of local milk dealers for buying and selling milk, wholesale and retail, but which only acted as the seller's agent to find purchasers and charged to commission, and acted under a by-law giving the directors the power to fix the price to be paid for milk; 145 N. Y. 267; a combination to control the price and production of a floating-spring tooth harrow which is held to be an instrument of such general use and utility as to render such a combination a violation of public policy; 21 App. Div. N. Y. 290. See also 67 Fed. Rep. 131; 76 id. 667; 47 U. S. App. 166; s. c. 77 Fed. Rep. 293.

A similar combination between a corporation and its stockholders, although it did not combine with any other corporation, was void within the Illinois anti-trust act; 155 Ill. 166, reversing 46 Ill. App. 576. An agreement for buying and selling coal at prices fixed by an association organized to control them is void so far as it is not executed, but not so as to deny to the seller his remedy for non-payment for coal delivered under the contract; 81 Hun 178. A contract for the sale of good-will and agreeing not to do the business of carpet beating in several counties is void as to all but the county in which the business is carried on, under the California Code; 102 Cal. 506. An association, the object of which is to prevent competition in a certain business and pay dues of an officer thereof, is illegal, and the parties cannot recover the amount so paid; 55 Ill. App. 213. A railroad pool, ing contract, the manifest purpose of which is to stifle competition and raise rates, is void as against public policy; 61 Fed. Rep. 993; s. c. 27 U. S. App. 1. An agreement between sheep brokers, to form an association and pay the treasurer so much for every head sold and receive an arbitrary proportion of the sum accumulated, which is made to carry out a contract with a similar butchers' association, simultaneously formed,—under which the brokers were to slaughter no sheep and the butchers were to buy only of the brokers' association—is void as a contract to enhance the price of food and not enforcible against a member of the association; 139 N. Y. 105. A contract not to sell or be interested in the sale of beer except to one company, which, in its turn, contracts not to sell or consign beer to any other party in the vicinity, is a combination in violation of the Texas statute; 90 Tex. 298, 277. Where a masons and builders' association, by its laws or rules, required all who competed for any contract or job to bring their bids for examination and have six per cent. added to the lowest before it should be submitted in competition, is contrary to public policy; 95 Wis. 129.

In Montana, where water rights are of great importance in connection with mining, a contract to control them is void; 7 Mont. 89. What are known as "corners" in the necessaries of life have been held void as violating the law against the creation of monopolies; 40 Mich. 447; 78 Ind. 487; 101 Mass. 145; and this is true whether the agreement on which they are based is temporary or permanent; id.; so the courts have held invalid a combination of grain-dealers; 79 Ill. 346; of cotton bagging; 66 N. Y. 288. So also the courts hold void expedients for buying up or cornering particular stocks in the market, by whatever means the result is accomplished; 19 Abb. N. C. 460; 30 Fed. Rep. 91; and see 5 Blatchf. 535; 6 Paige 337. An agreement of a large number of stenographers to raise the price and force the increase by penalties, was held invalid, though the combination did not include all the stenographers in the city; 41 Ill. App. 164; as was also the agreement by the grocers of a town with a firm about to open a butter store, that they would not buy any butter for two years; 83 Ia. 156; and a combination of mill-owners designed to control the output of cotton seed oil; 83 Tex. 650.

There are other cases in which the courts have held combinations of this general character valid, as in 143 Mass. 353; but there the manufactured article was shade-rollers, which possibly would not be enumerated among the necessaries of life, as to the enhancement of the price of which the law is so jealous.

A corporation organized for the purpose of acquiring patents and granting licenses thereunder covering machines relating to a certain art, is not subject to the anti-trust laws of Illinois; 53 Fed. Rep. 592; 51 id. 819; 69 id. 333; 71 id. 302, disapproving 67 id. 131. The purchase of the stock of sugar refining companies for the purpose of acquiring control of the business in the United States, does not involve a monopoly or restraint of interstate or foreign commerce within the meaning of the federal anti-trust act, since the business of refining and selling sugar is not commerce; 156 U. S. 1, affirming 60 Fed. Rep. 934.

A contract to refrain from forming a corporation for the construction of waterworks in a specified city and from carrying on such work in order that the other party to the contract might obtain a corporation for such purpose and conduct the business without competition, is not void as against public policy; 143 N. Y. 430. An agreement by manufacturers of watch cases to fix an arbitrary price on them, and not to sell them to persons buying watch cases of a rival manufacturer, was held not to be a violation of the federal anti-trust act or to be a cause of action in favor of the rival manufacturer; 58 Fed. Rep. 851.

A contract by which three out of four persons engaged in manufacturing oleomargarine consolidate, in order to stop sharp competition and agree not to engage separately in the business for five years, is not void; 18 R. I. 484.

It was held by the circuit court that what was known as the railroad freight pooling association to maintain rates and regulate freight traffic was not a contract in restraint of trade under the federal anti-trust act, where the rates maintained were reasonable and the tendency was to diminish rather than to enhance them, and no monopoly of trade or attempt at such is proved by such contract; 58 Fed. Rep. 58, affirming 53 id. 44; but this decision was reversed by the supreme court which held that any contract or combination made in violation of law is void, without respect to previous decisions as to what was the public policy of the country on the subject, and the right of a railroad company to charge reasonable rates does not include the right to enter into a combination with competing roads to maintain reasonable rates; 166 U. S. 290.

An arrangement by which a company promised all persons who would purchase from its distributing agents for six months exclusively and would permit the company to regulate their prices, that it would pay them a rebate on the amount of their purchases, was not a contract in restraint of trade or an attempt to monopolize it; 52 Fed. Rep. 104, where it was held that the restraint was only partial, and reasonable for the protection of the particular business; id., approving [1892] App. Cas. 25.

An agreement to raise the price of lumber fifty cents a thousand feet is not a restraint upon trade unless it involves the absorption of the entire traffic; 52 Fed. Rep. 646. The by-law of the Associated Press, which provides that no member of it "shall receive or publish the regular news dispatches of any other news association covering a like territory and organized for a like purpose," is not void as unreasonable and in restraint of trade; 136 N. Y. 333, 662. In California it is held that the law against unlawful restraint of trade is not violated by an agreement by an association of stevedores to control prices, unless it appears that the entire business of the city is controlled by it, and that the prices are unreasonable or the restriction prevents fair competition; 115 Cal. 16.

A contract with an independent manufacturer for the entire product of his plant is not in itself a contract in illegal restraint of trade; and if made without knowledge of similar contracts made by the buyer with other manufacturers, and without any knowledge that such contract was intended as a step in a general scheme of monopoly, there is no conspiracy against freedom of commerce, or contract in illegal restraint of trade; 86 Fed. Rep. 439.

To constitute the offence of "monopolizing or attempting to monopolize" trade or commerce among the states, within the meaning of the federal anti-trust act, it is necessary to acquire or attempt to acquire an exclusive right in such commerce by such means as are adequate to prevent others from engaging therein; 52 Fed. Rep. 104.

The federal anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, confers no right upon private individuals to sue in equity to restrain the acts forbidden by the statute. That right is vested only in the district attorneys of the United States and the only remedy of private persons injured is an action at law for damages; 64 Fed. Rep. 821.

It is not a legal defence to an action for goods sold and delivered or service rendered, that the seller or person rendering service is a member of an illegal trust or combination, since the illegality is collateral to the contract of sale and does not taint it; 86 Wis. 352; 74 Fed. Rep. 802; and it is no defence to an action by a milk-shippers' association for goods sold that it is an illegal corporation under the Illinois act of June 11, 1891; 46 Ill. App. 576.

It is no defence to an action for compensation due from the federal government for mail service over a leased line that the leases were void because operated by a combination intended to prevent competition; 28 Ct. Cl. 77.

In the U. S. v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, it was held (four justices dissenting), that the prohibitory provisions of the federal anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, applied to all contracts in restraint of interstate or foreign trade or commerce without exception or limitation, and are not confined to those in which the restraint is unreasonable. In that case it was applied to a contract between competing railroads forming an association for maintaining and regulating transportation rates, and it was held that such an agreement is within the act; 166 U. S. 290, reversing the circuit court of appeals which held the agreement reasonable; 19 U. S. App. 36. After the decision of the circuit court of appeals and before that of the supreme court, two other cases were decided holding such agreements not contracts in unlawful restraint of trade or in violation of the act; 73 Fed. Rep. 438; 76 id. 495.

See TRUST for the decision in the Joint Traffic case just handed down.

The federal anti-trust act was held not applicable to the case of a state which by its laws assumed a monopoly of the traffic in intoxicating liquors; 69 Fed. Rep. 908. So the act was held not to apply where members of a business exchange sought to enjoin the board of directors from enforcing against them by-laws which were alleged to be illegal as in restraint of trade and commerce; 77 Fed. Rep. 1.

RESTRAINT ON ALIENATION. A provision in a settlement to the special use of a married woman without power of alienation, which is valid as an exception to the general rule against any restraint on alienation. It is in force only during marriage; Snell. Eq. 290; 11 Ch. D. 645.

A restriction, by way of devise over, against all alienation during a limited time upon an estate in fee, is void: 141 U. S. 296. See PERPETUITY; SPENDTHRIFT TRUST; MARRIED WOMAN.

RESTRICTIVE INDORSEMENT. See INDORSEMENT.

RESTS. A term used in computing interest especially on mortgages and in trust accounts. It consists in striking a balance of the account, at the end of any fixed period, upon which interest is allowed, thus giving the benefit of compound interest. 3 Pars. Contr. § 151.

RESULTING TRUST. A trust raised by implication or construction of law, and presumed to exist from the supposed intention of the parties and the nature of the transaction.

All trusts created by implication or construction of law are often included under the general term implied trusts; but these are commonly distinguished into implied or resulting and constructive trusts; resulting or presumptive trusts being those which are implied or presumed from the supposed intention of the parties and the nature of the transaction; constructive trusts, such as are raised independently of any such intention, and which are forced on the conscience of the trustee by equitable construction and the operation of law. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1095; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 510; 2 id. 198; 3 Swanst. 585; 1 Ohio 321; 6 Conn. 285; 2 Edw. Ch. 373; 6 Humphr. 93.

Where upon a purchase of property the conveyance of the legal estate is taken in the name of one person, while the consideration is given or paid by another, the parties being strangers to each other, a resulting or presumptive trust immediately arises by virtue of the transaction, and the person named in the conveyance will be a trustee for the party from whom the consideration proceeds; 30 Me. 126; 8 N. H. 187; 5 Cush. 435; 10 Paige, Ch. 618; 2 Green, Ch. 480; 18 Pa. 283; 2 Harr. Del. 225; Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 218; 75 Cal. 166; 83 Ala. 135; 64 Vt. 326; 112 Mo. 412; and if he conveys the property to the cestui que trust, such conveyance is good as against the creditors of the trustee; 151 U. S. 420.

Resulting trusts are raised by the law from the presumed intention of the parties, and the natural equity that one who furnishes the means for the acquisition of property should enjoy its benefits. But it cannot arise where an obligation exists on his part, legal or moral, to provide for the grantee, as in the case of a husband for his wife, or a father for his child, as under such circumstance the relation to the party is of itself sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption of a resulting trust, for in such cases arises the contrary presumption of an advancement for the grantee's benefit; 91 U. S. 125.

Where land is bought by a husband with the separate property of a married woman, and the title is taken in his name, a trust results to her, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary; 110 N. C. 403; 176 Pa. 67. But where a wife gives to her husband money from her father's estate, without any agreement for its investment, or that he should be accountable to her for it, and he subsequently informed her that he has invested it in land for her, when, in fact, he has not done so, but has taken the title in his own name, it was held that, under the proof in that case, no resulting trust therein was created in favor of the wife; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 977.

To establish a resulting trust in one person of land purchased in the name of another, to whom title is conveyed, it is essential that the party setting up the trust shall have paid, or become bound for the purchase-money on his own account, and as part of the original transaction of purchase; 4 Del. Ch. 445; payment by way of loan to the nominal purchaser raises no resulting trust; id. It is a latent equity, which cannot prejudice a bona fide holder for value; id. 135.

The fact that a conveyance is voluntary, especially when accompanied by other circumstances indicative of such an intention, it is said, may raise a resulting trust. See 2 Vern. 473; 23 Pa. 243; 29 Me. 410; 1 Johns. Ch. 240; 1 Dev. Eq. 456; 14 B. Monr. 585.

Where a voluntary; 1 Atk. 188; disposition of property by deed; 1 Dev. Eq. 493; or will is made to a person as trustee, and the trust is not declared at all; 10 Ves. 527; 3 Sim. 538; or is ineffectually declared: 1 Myl. & C. 286; 13 Sim. 496; 2 Dev. Eq. 255; or does not extend to the whole interest given to the trustee; 8 Pet. 326; 14 B. Monr. 585; 3 H. L. C. 492; or it fails either wholly or in part by lapse or otherwise; 5 Harr. & J. 392; 5 Paige, Ch. 318; 6 Ired. Eq. 137; 7 P. Monr. 481; 15 Pa. 500; 10 Hare 204; the interest so undisposed of will be held by the trustee, not for his own benefit, but as a resulting trust for the donor himself, or for his heir at law or next of kin, according to the nature of the estate.

A resulting trust must arise at the time the title is taken. No subsequent oral agreement or payment will create it; 32 W. Va. 14; 85 Va. 740; 84 id. 813; 65 N. H. 39; 149 Mass. 400; 138 U. S. 587. Where a father was induced to execute an absolute deed of his land to one of his children, by fraudulent representations that the grantee would hold it in trust for the other children, and subsequently without fraud executed another deed to the same grantee for the same land, the latter deed passed the title free from any trust in favor of the other children, as the fraud in procuring the first deed created a resulting trust in favor of the father, the express trust being void, as not being in writing, and the second deed carried the father's equitable interest; 60 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 976.

The property may be personal or real; 8 Humphr. 447; 1 Ohio St. 10; 26 Miss. 615; 2 Beav. 454. Parol evidence is admissible to prove a resulting trust in land; 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 810; 37 W. Va. 507; 52 Kan. 469. One who buys shares of stock with his own money does not become trustee for another, though he tells him that the purchase is made for his benefit and he expects to be reimbursed by him; 18 U. S. App. 293. Resulting trusts cannot be declared upon doubtful evidence, nor upon a mere preponderance of evidence. There should be no room for a reasonable doubt as to the facts relied upon to establish the trust; 96 Mo. 361; 76 Ia. 192; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 367.

The statute of frauds has no application to a trust resulting from the purchase of property with funds of another; 126 Ill. 58; 69 Tex. 685.

Consult Story, Bispham, Spence, Adams, on Equity Jur.; Hill, Lewin, Sanders, on Trusts.

RESULTING USE. A use raised by equity for the benefit of a feoffor who has made a voluntary conveyance to uses without any declaration of the use. 2 Washb. R. P. 100.

The doctrine, at first limited to the case of an apparently voluntary conveyance with no express declaration, became so extended that a conveyance of the legal estate ceased to imply an intention that the feoffee should enjoy the beneficial interest therein; and if no intent to the contrary was expressed, and no consideration proved or implied, the use always resulted to the feoffor; 2 Washb. R. P. 100. And if part only of the use was expressed, the balance resulted to the feoffor; 2 Atk. 150; 2 Rolle, Abr. 781 · Co. Litt. 23 a. And, under the statute, where a use has been limited by deed and expires, or cannot vest, it results back to the one who declared it; 4 Wend. 494; 15 Me. 414; 5 W. & S. 323. And see Cro. Jac. 200; Tudor, Lead. Cas. Eq. 258; 2 Washb. R. P. 132.

RESUME WORK. To begin work anew with a bona fide intention of prosecuting it. 104 Cal. 227.

RESUMMONS. A second summons calling upon a person to answer an action where the first summons is defeated. 2 Chitty, Arch. Pr. 1347.

RESUMPTION. The taking again by the crown of land or tenements, which, on false suggestion, had been granted by letters patent. Whart. Dict.

RETAIL. To sell by small parcels, and not in the gross. 5 Mart. La. N. S. 297; 7 Metc. 308.

RETAILER OF MERCHANDISE. One who deals in merchandise by selling it in smaller quantities than he buys,—generally with a view to profit. 1 Cra. C. C. 268.

RETAIN. To continue to hold; to keep in possession. To keep is a synonym for retain. 84 Va. 269.

In Practice. To engage the services of an attorney or counsellor to manage a cause. See RETAINER.

RETAINER. The act of withholding what one has in one's own hands, by virtue of some right. See ADMINISTRATOR; EXECUTOR; LIEN.

In Practice. The act of a client by which he engages an attorney or counsellor to manage a cause, either by prosecuting it, when he is plaintiff, or defending it, when he is defendant.

The retaining fee.

A general retainer merely gives a right to expect professional service when requested. It binds the person retained not to take a fee from another against his retainer; but to do nothing except what he is asked to do, and for this he is to be distinctly paid; 6 R. I. 206.

In English practice a much more formal retainer is usually required than in America. Thus it is said by Chitty, 3 Pr. 116, note m, that, although it is not indispensable that the retainer should be in writing, unless required by the other side, it is very expedient. It is therefore recommended, particularly when the client is a stranger, to require from him a written retainer, signed by himself; and, in order to avoid the insinuation that it was obtained by contrivance, it should be witnessed by one or more respectable persons. When there are several plaintiffs, it should be signed by all, and not by one for himself and the others, especially if they are trustees or assignees of a bankrupt or insolvent. The retainer should also state whether it be given for a general or a qualified authority. See 9 Wheat. 738, 830; 6 Johns. 34, 296; 11 id. 464; 1 N. H. 23; 28 id. 302; 7 Harr. & J. 275; 27 Miss. 567. The existence of the relation of solicitor and client between parties may be inferred from their acts, although the solicitor has not received any express retainer; [1891] 1 Ch. 337.

The effect of a retainer to prosecute or defend a suit is to confer on the attorney all the powers exercised by the forms and usages of the courts in which the suit is pending; 2 M'Cord, Ch. 409; 13 Metc. 269. He may receive payment; 13 Mass. 320; 4 Conn. 517; 39 Me. 386; may bring a second suit after being nonsuited in the first for want of formal proof; 12 Johns. 315; may sue a writ of error on the judgment; 16 Mass. 74; may discontinue the suit; 6 Cow. 385; may restore an action after a nol. pros.; 1 Binn. 469; may claim an appeal, and bind his client in his name for the prosecution of it; 1 Pick. 462; may submit the suit to arbitration; 1 Dall. 164; 16 Mass. 396; 6 McLean 190; 7 Cra. 436; 89 Ga. 83; may sue out an alias execution; 2 N. H. 376; may receive livery of seisin of land taken by an extent; 13 Mass. 363; may waive objections to evidence, and enter into stipulation for the admission of facts or conduct of the trial; 2 N. H. 520; and for release of bail; 1 Murph. 146; may waive the right of appeal, review, notice, and the like, and confess judgment; 5 N. H. 393; 4 T. B. Monr. 377; 5 Pet. 99; may agree to the entry of a judgment; 3 Ind. App. 379; 66 Hun 151; may waive a jury trial; 99 N. C. 58. But he has no authority to execute a discharge of a debtor except upon the actual payment of the full amount of the debt; 8 Dowl. 656; 8 Johns. 361; 10 Vt. 471; 32 Me. 110; 21 Conn. 245; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 392; 14 Pa. 87; 13 Ark. 644; 1 Pick. 347; 35 W. Va. 323; nor to satisfy a judgment for a less sum than is due; 66 Tex. 366; and that in money only; 16 Ill. 272; 1 Ia. 360; see 6 Barb. 201; nor to release sureties; 3 J. J. Marsh. 532; 4 McLean 87; nor to enter a retraxit; 3 Blackf. 137; nor to act for the legal representatives of his deceased client; 2 Penn. N. J. 689; and ordinarily one retained to collect a debt has no right to compromise it; 85 Ia. 643; 47 Mo. App. 1; 122 Pa. 1. An attorney's authority to appear for his client ceases after the entry of final judgment, except that he may take the necessary steps to collect the judgment; 66 Hun 626.

There is an implied contract on the part of an attorney who has been retained, that he will use due diligence in the course of legal proceedings; but it is not an undertaking to recover a judgment; Wright Ohio 446. See 3 Camp. 17; 7 C. & P. 289; 16 S. & R. 368; 2 Cush. 316; 73 Mich. 331. An attorney is bound to act with the most scrupulous honor; he ought to disclose to his client if he has any adverse retainer which may affect his judgment or his client's interest; but the concealment of the fact does not necessarily imply fraud; 8 Mas. 305. See Weeks, Att. at Law

RETAINING A CAUSE. Under the English Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875, a cause brought in a wrong division of the High Court of Justice may be retained therein, at the discretion of the court or a judge.

RETAINING FEE. A fee given to counsel on being consulted, in order to insure his future services. See RETAINER.

RETAKING. The taking one's goods, wife, child, etc., from another, who without right has taken possession thereof. See RECAPTION; RESCUE.

RETALIATION. See LEX TALIONIS.

RETENEMENTUM. Detaining, withholding, or keeping back. Cowel.

RETENTION. In Scotch Law. The right which the possessor of a movable has of holding the same until he shall be satisfied for his claim either against such movable or the owner of it; a lien.

General retention is the right to withhold or detain the property of another, in respect of any debt which happens to be due by the proprietor to the person who has the custody, or for a general balance of accounts arising on a particular train of employment. 2 Bell, Com. 90.

Special retention is the right of withholding or retaining property or goods which are in one's possession under a contract, till indemnified for the labor or money expended on them.

RETIRE. As applied to bills of exchange, this word is ambiguous. It is commonly used of an indorser who takes up a bill by handing the amount to a transferee, after which the indorser holds the instrument with all his remedies intact. But it is sometimes used of an acceptor, by whom, when a bill is taken up or retired at maturity, it is in effect paid, and all the remedies on it extinguished; Byles, Bills, 15th ed. 93, 195, 263, 296; Dan. Neg. Inst. 12.

RETORNA BREVIUM. In Old English Law. The return of writs by sheriffs and bailiffs, which is only a certificate delivered to the court on the day of return, of that which he hath done touching the execution of their writ directed to him: this must be indorsed on back of writ by officer; 2 Lilly, Abr. 476. Each term has return days, fixed, as early as 51 Hen. III., at intervals of about a week, on which all original writs are returnable. The first return day is regularly the first day in the term; but there are three days' grace. 3 Bla. Com. 278.

RETORNO HABENDO. In Practice. A writ issued to compel a party to return property to the party to whom it has been adjudged to belong, in an action of replevin. See DE RETORNO HABENDO; REPLEVIN.

RETORTION, RETORSION. An act employed by a government to impose the same hard treatment on the citizens or subjects of a state that the latter has used towards the citizens or subjects of the former, for the purpose of obtaining the removal of obnoxious measures. Vattel, liv. 2, c. 18, § 341. An act of retaliation in kind when a nation has failed in courtesy or friendship. Instances of retortion usually arise in discriminating duties or restrictions upon commercial intercourse; Snow, Int. Law 78. It is equivalent to retaliation and may be either amicable or vindictive. The former, retorsion de droit, is a remedy for a departure from any international courtesy, done in an unfriendly, but not an illegal manner. The latter, retorsio facti, implies the infliction of the same amount of evil on an aggressive state that it has inflicted on the state aggrieved; Risley, Law of War 57. This is a purely belligerent act; id.

RETOUR SANS PROTET. A request or direction by the drawer of a bill of exchange, that in case the bill should not be honored by the drawee, it may be returned without protest, by writing the words "retour sans protet" or "sans pais." Should such request be made, it is said that a protest as against the drawer, and perhaps as against the indorsers, is unnecessary; Byles, Bills, 15th ed. 216.

RETRACT (Lat. re, back, traho, to draw). To withdraw a proposition or offer before it has been accepted. See LETTER; OFFER.

After pleading guilty, a defendant will, in certain cases where he has entered that plea by mistake or in consequence of some error, be allowed to retract it. But where a prisoner pleaded guilty to a charge of larceny, and sentence has been passed upon him, he will not be allowed to retract his plea and plead not guilty; 9 C. & P. 346; Dig. 12. 4. 5.

RETRAXIT (Lat. he has withdrawn). In Practice. The act by which a plaintiff withdraws his suit. It is so called from the fact that this was the principal word used when the law entries were in Latin.

A retraxit differs from a nonsuit—the former being the act of the plaintiff himself, for it cannot even be entered by attorney; 8 Co. 58; 8 Pa. 157, 163; 68 Ind. 305; 31 Ala. 108; and it must be after declaration filed; 8 Pa. 163; while the latter occurs in consequence of the neglect merely of the plaintiff. A retraxit also differs from a nolle prosequi. The effect of a retraxit is a bar to all actions of a like or a similar nature; Bac. Abr. Nonsuit (A); 31 Ala. 108; 79 Va. 333; 120 U. S. 95; a nolle prosequi is not a bar even in a criminal prosecution; 2 Mass. 172. See 2 Sell. Pr. 338; Com. Dig. Pleader (X 2).

RETRIBUTION. That which is given to another to recompense him for what has been received from him: as, a rent for the hire of a house.

A salary paid to a person for his services.

The distribution of rewards and punishments.

RETROACTIVE. See RETROSPECTIVE.

RETROCESSION. In Civil Law. When the assignee of heritable rights conveys his rights back to the cedent, it is called a retrocession. Erskine, Inst. 3. 5. 1.

RETROSPECTIVE (Lat. retro, back, spectare, to look). Looking backward. Having reference to a state of things existing before the act in question.

This word is usually applied to those acts of the legislature which are made to operate upon some subject, contract, or crime which existed before the passage of the acts; and they are therefore called retrospective laws. These laws are generally unjust, and are to a certain extent forbidden by that article in the constitution of the United States which prohibits the passage of ex post facto laws, or laws impairing contracts. See EX POST FACTO LAW; IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

A general law for the punishment of offences, which endeavors to reach, by its retrospective operation, acts previously committed, as well as to prescribe a rule of conduct for the citizen in future, is void in as far as it is retrospective; but such invalidity will not affect its operation in regard to future cases; 128 U. S. 189; but statutes affecting remedies are entirely at the discretion of the legislature.

A statute of limitations which provides that in all civil suits in which the cause of action shall have arisen within the state, the defendant, who shall have become a non-resident of the state after such cause of action shall have arisen, shall not have the benefit of any statute of this state for the limitation of actions during the period of such residence without the state, if retrospective in its effect, is constitutional and applies to the trial of issues pending when the act was passed; 177 Pa. 633.

Legislation which concerns merely modes of procedure, applies to pending suits whether the act so specify or not; 140 Pa. 99.

A statutory amendment allowing, as of right, but one new trial in ejectment is not unconstitutional as retrospective legislation, when applied to a pending action in which there has been one new trial long after the date of the act; 83 Fed. Rep. 643.

In the absence of constitutional prohibition against it, retrospective legislation is usually valid if not subject to the objection that it impairs vested rights. Where there is a constitutional prohibition, much legislation otherwise valid will fail; as, for example, the deed of a person of unsound mind could not in such case be ratified: 35 Mo. 174. Retrospective statutes which have been held valid are: One validating a married woman's power of attorney; 30 Cal. 138; authorizing the insertion in a deed of the name of a married woman which was omitted by mistake; 11 Ohio St. 641; or validating an unauthorized conveyance of a married woman of her separate estate; 57 Pa. 369; prohibiting the defence to a suit on a contract that it was made on Sunday, unless the defendant restores whatever of value he received under the contract; 77 Me. 482; rendering a bond valid which when executed was invalid because not bearing the proper stamp; 12 Md. 195.

It has been held that the legislature has power to cure a defective conveyance by retroactive legislation; 17 Ia. 528; or to confirm conveyances defectively executed; 6 Gill & J. 461.

The right to pass retrospective laws, with the exceptions above mentioned, exists in the several states, according to their own constitutions, and they become obligatory if not prohibited by the latter: 4 S. & R. 364; 1 Bay 179; 7 Johns. 477. See 2 Cra. 272; 2 Pet. 414; 18 Ind. 237; 19 Ia. 388; 52 Pa. 474; 57 N. J. L. 180..

An instance may be found in the laws of Connecticut. In 1795, the legislature passed a resolve setting aside a decree of a court of probate disapproving of a will, and granted a new hearing: it was held that the resolve, not being against any constitutional principle in that state, was valid; 3 Dall. 386. And in Pennsylvania a judgment was opened by the act of April 1, 1837, which was held to be constitutional; 2 W. & S. 271.

Under a New York statute which provides that no person should practise medicine in the state who had ever been convicted of a felony, it was held that the statute applied to persons convicted before its passage, and that as to such of them at least as were not engaged in the practice of medicine at the time of its passage, it was not an ex post facto law; 46 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 607. See PHYSICIAN.

Laws should never be considered as applying to cases which arose previously to their passage, unless the legislature have clearly declared such to be their intention; 12 La. 352. See Barrington, Stat. 466, n.; 7 Johns. 477; 1 Kent 455; Code 1. 14. 7; Story, Const. § 1393; 1 McLean 40; 12 S. & R. 330.

The English courts also hold that a statute should not be construed so as to make it retrospective; 3 C. B. 551. Nothing but clear and express words will give such effect to it; 4 H. & N. 76; so of criminal acts; [91] 2 Q. B. 148.

The power of congress to pass a retrospective tariff act is discussed in 55 Alb. L. J. 243, in connection with the tariff act of 1897, and the conclusion reached that if it is desired to make a law retrospective, all that is necessary is that congress shall express its intention to that effect in unambiguous terms. The writer contends that the only decision bearing upon the subject is Burr v. United States, in which the question of the constitutionality of retrospective legislation would naturally have arisen, but it was assumed both by counsel and the court that the only question was as to the intent of congress in fixing a date from which the act should take effect. The court said, "No question exists, or is really made, but that this whole subject was within the law-making power; but that a law should not have any retrospective application unless that is plainly intended is more strenuously urged;" 66 Fed. Rep. 642. It had been previously declared by the supreme court with respect to such a tax that "congress could have passed a law to reimpose this tax retrospectively, to revive the sections under consideration if they had expired, to re-act the law by a simple reference to sections; 20 Wall. 332; and this case was determined as one merely of intent. The same court in another case treated the case from the same standpoint of intent, but arrived at a different conclusion. The main point made by Chief Justice Fuller was that the new act comprised a saving clause to the effect that "all rights and liabilities under said law shall continue, and may be enforced in the same manner as if said repeal or modification had not been made." "If," it was argued, "congress intended that this section should relate back to August 1, still the intention is quite apparent that the act of 1890 should remain in full force and effect until the passage of the new act, on August 28, and that all acts done, rights accrued, and liabilities incurred under the earlier act, prior to the repeal, should be saved from the effect thereof as to all parties interested, the United States included." 159 U. S. 78. This principle of construction appears also to have been accepted by the supreme court in a very early case, where it was said that "words in a statute ought not to have a retrospective application, unless they are so clear, strong, and imperative that no other meaning can be annexed to them, or unless the intention of the legislature cannot otherwise be satisfied." 3 Cra. 398, 413; 15 How. 423; 112 U. S. 559. See, also, 52 Pa. 315; 31 N. J. L. 133; 54 Md. 486; 16 Pa. 62; 17 How. 456; 66 N. C. 361. See, generally, 4 Wall. 277, 333; 129 U. S. 114; Pom. Const. L. § 530, 525–533. See STATUTE; REMEDY; EX POST FACTO LAW; IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS; Wade, Retrosp. Leg.

RETURN. An official statement by an officer of what he has done in obedience to a command from a superior authority, or why he has done nothing, whichever is required. 61 Conn. 287.

Persons who are beyond the sea are exempted from the operation of the statute of limitations of some states, till after a certain time has elapsed after their returning. See 14 Mass. 203; 3 Johns. 263; 2 W. Bla. 723; 3 Litt. 48; 1 Harr. & J. 89, 350.

When a member of parliament has been elected to represent a certain constituency, he is said to be returned, in reference to the return of the writ directing the proper officer to hold the election. In this country, election returns are the statements or reports of the balloting at an election, by the proper officers.

To come or go back to the same place; to revisit. 12 Conn. 186.

RETURN-DAY. A day appointed by law when all writs are to be returned which have issued since the preceding return-day. The sheriff is, in general, not required to return his writ until the return-day. After that period he may be ruled to make a return. See RULE DAY.

RETURN OF PREMIUM. In Insurance. A repayment of a part or the whole of the premium paid. Policies of insurance, especially those on marine risks, not unfrequently contain stipulations for a return of the whole or a part of the premium in certain contingencies; 2 Phill. Ins. xxii. sect. xi.; but in the absence of any such stipulation, in a case free of fraud on the part of the assured, if the risk does not commence to run, he is entitled to a return of it, if paid, or an exoneration from his liability to pay it, subject to deduction settled by stipulation or usage; and so, pro rata, if only a part of the insured subject is put at risk; 2 Phill. Ins. ch. xxii. sect. i.; and so an abatement of the excess of marine interest over the legal rate is made in hypothecation of ship or cargo in like case; id. sect. vii.

RETURN OF WRITS. In Practice. A short account, in writing, made by the sheriff, or other ministerial officer, of the manner in which he has executed a writ. Steph. Pl. 24.

It is the duty of such officer to return all writs on the return-day: on his neglecting to do so, a rule may be obtained on him to return the writ, and if he do not obey the rule he may be attached for contempt. See 19 Com. Dig. Return; 1 Rawle 520.

RETURNUM AVERIORUM. A judicial writ, similar to the retorno habendo. Cowel.

RETURNUM IRREPLEGIABILE. A judicial writ addressed to the sheriff for the final restitution or return of cattle to the owner when unjustly taken or distrained, and so found by verdict; it is granted after a nonsuit in a second deliverance. Reg. Judic. 27.

REUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A party to a suit, whether plaintiff or defendant. Reus est qui cum altero litum contestatum habet, sive id egit, sive cum eo actum est.

A party to a contract. Reus credendi is he to whom something is due, by whatever title it may be: reus debendi is he who owes, for whatever cause. Pothier, Pand. lib. 50. Reus stipulandi, a party to a stipulation; reus promittendi, the debtor or obligor to the stipulation. Where there were several creditors or several debtors jointly entitled to, or jointly liable under, a stipulation they were respectively called correi.

See MENS REA.

REVE. The bailiff of a franchise or manor; an officer in parishes within forests who marks the commonable cattle. Cowel.

REVELAND. In Domesday Book we find land put down as thane-lands, which were afterwards converted into revelands, i. e. such lands as, having reverted to the king upon death of his thane, who had it for life, were not since granted out to any by the king, but vested in charge upon account of the reve or bailiff of the manor. Spelm. Feuds, c. 24. Coke was mistaken in thinking it was land held in socage.

REVELS. Sports of dancing, masking, etc., formerly used in princes' courts, the inns of court, and noblemen's houses, commonly performed by night; there was an officer to order and supervise them, who was entitled the "master of the revels." Cowel.

REVENDICATION. In Civil Law. An action by which a man demands a thing of which he claims to be owner. It applies to immovables as well as movables, to corporeal or incorporeal things. Merlin, Répert.

By the civil law, he who has sold goods for cash or on credit may demand them back from the purchaser if the purchase-money is not paid according to contract. The action of revendication is used for this purpose. See an attempt to introduce the principle of revendication into our law, in 2 Hall, Law Journ. 181.

Revendication, in another sense, corresponds very nearly to the stoppage in transitu of the common law. It is used in that sense in the Code de Commerce, art. 577. Revendication, says that article, can take place only when the goods sold are on the way to their place of destination, whether by land or water, and before they have been received into the warehouse of the insolvent (failli) or that of his factor or agent authorized to sell them on account of the insolvent. See Dig. 14. 4. 15; 18. 1. 19. 53; 19. 1. 11.

REVENUE. The income of the government arising from taxation, duties, and the like; and, according to some correct lawyers, under the idea of revenue is also included the proceeds of the sale of stocks, lands, and other property owned by the government. Story, Const. § 877. Internal revenue. The revenue raised by the United States from all sources of taxation except duties on imports. By revenue is also understood the income of private individuals and corporations.

See TAXATION.

A bill establishing rates of postage is not a bill for for raising revenue, within the meaning of the constitution; but post-office laws may be revenue laws without being laws for raising revenue: 18 Blatchf. 207. See 15 Wall. 390; 4 Blatchf. 311; 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 30.

REVENUE LAWS. Laws made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating and securing revenue or public funds for the service of the government. 1 Gall. 398. See 123 U. S. 686.

No country ever takes notice of the revenue laws of another; 1 Cowp. 343, per Lord Mansfield; 3 D. & R. 190.

Under the constitution of the United States revenue bills must originate in the house of representatives; Const. art. 1, § 7. In the sense of this clause, revenue bills are not those which create revenue incidentally, or those which are intended primarily for other purposes, but those which upon their face are plainly designed to raise revenue; 4 Biss. 188; those which levy taxes in the strict sense of the word; 1 Sto. Const. § 880. See 41 Cal. 165. "An act of congress providing a national currency secured by a pledge of bonds of the United States, and which, in the furtherance of that object, and also to meet the expenses attending the execution of the act, imposed a tax on the notes in circulation of the banking association organized under statute, is clearly not a revenue bill which the constitution declares must originate in the house of representatives." 167 U. S. 196.

The existing revenue laws of the United States under which the funds necessary for the expenses and disbursements of the government are raised, are the tariff laws and the internal revenue laws. The existing tariff law is what is commonly known as the Dingley tariff bill, being the act passed July 24, 1897. The internal revenue taxes are provided for by what is known as the war revenue bill, being an act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, passed June 13, 1898.

REVENUE SIDE OF THE EXCHEQUER. That jurisdiction of the court of exchequer, or of the exchequer division of the high court of justice, by which it ascertains and enforces the proprietary rights of the crown against the subjects of the realm. The practice in revenue cases is not affected by the orders and rules under the Judicature Act of 1875. Moz. & W.

REVERSAL. In International Law. A declaration by which a sovereign promises that he will observe a certain order, or certain conditions, which have been once established, notwithstanding any changes that may happen to cause a deviation therefrom; as, for example, when the French court consented for the first time, in 1745, to grant to Elizabeth, the Czarina of Russia, the title of empress, it exacted as a reversal a declaration purporting that the assumption of the title of an imperial government by Russia should not derogate from the rank which France had held towards her.

Letters by which a sovereign declares that by a particular act of his he does not mean to prejudice a third power. Of this we have an example in history: formerly the emperor of Germany, whose coronation, according to the golden bull, ought to have been solemnized at Aix-la-Chapelle, gave to that city, when he was crowned elsewhere, reversals, by which he declared that such coronation took place without prejudice to its rights, and without drawing any consequences therefrom for the future.

In Practice. The decision of a superior court by which the judgment, sentence, or decree of the inferior court is annulled.

After a judgment, sentence, or decree has been rendered by the court below, a writ of error may be issued from the superior to the inferior tribunal, when the record and all proceedings are sent to the supreme court on the return to the writ of error. When, on the examination of the record, the superior court gives a judgment different from the inferior court, they are said to reverse the proceeding. As to the effect of a reversal, see 9 C. & P. 513. See REVERSE; JUDGMENT; RES JUDICATA.

REVERSE, REVERSED. A term frequently used in the judgments of an appellate court, in disposing of the case before it. It then means "to set aside, to annul, to vacate." 7 Kans. 254.

REVERSER. In Scotch Law. A reversioner.

REVERSION. The residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him. The return of land to the grantor and his heirs after the grant is over. Co. Litt. 142 b; 2 Bla. Com. 175; 4 Kent 354. See CONDITION; CONDITIONAL FEE; BASE FEE.

The reversion is a vested interest or estate and arises by operation of law only. In this latter respect it differs from a remainder, which can never arise except either by will or deed; Chall. Real Pr. 68; Cruise, Dig. tit. 17; 4 Kent 345; 19 Vin. Abr. 217. A reversion is said to be an incorporeal hereditament; 4 Kent 354; 1 Washb. R. P. 37, 47; 38 N. J. Eq. 124. The possibility of reverter in the grantor of a qualified or determinable fee is not void for remoteness; 130 Mass. 448; 106 id. 479; 155 id. 171; as to the reversion or remainder in lands confiscated by the United States because of the owners engaging in the rebellion, see 145 U. S. 546. See REMAINDER; LIMITATION.

In some cases land taken under the right of eminent domain for a specific purpose reverts to the former owner when that purpose has ceased. See EMINENT DOMAIN; 6 Am. & E. Corp. Cas. 586.

REVERSIONARY INTEREST. The interest which one has in the reversion of lands or other property. The residue which remains to one who has carved out of his estate a lesser estate. See REVERSION. An interest in the land when possession shall fail. Cowel.

REVERSIONARY LEASE. One to take effect in futuro. See LEASE.

REVERSOR. In Scotch Law. A debtor who makes a wadset, and to whom the right of reversion is granted. Erskine, Inst. 2. 8. 1. A reversioner. Jacob, Law Dict.

REVERTER. Reversion. A possibility or reverter is that species of reversionary interest which exists when the grant is so limited that it may possibly terminate. See 1 Washb. R. P. 63.

REVEST. To replace one in the possession of anything of which he has been divested, or put out of possession. 1 Rop. H. & W. 353.

REVIEW. In Practice. A second examination of a matter. For example, by the laws of Pennsylvania, the courts having jurisdiction of the subject may grant an order for a view of a proposed road: the reviewers make a report, which, when confirmed by the court, would authorize the laying out of the same. After this, by statutory provision, the parties may apply for a review or second examination, and the last viewers may make a different report. For the practice of reviews in chancery, see BILL OF REVIEW. A bill of review is the appropriate mode of correcting errors apparent on the face of the record. 103 U. S. 766; 125 id. 1.

The criticism of a publication. See CRITICISM; LIBEL.

REVIEW, COURT OF. In England. A court of appeal in bankruptcy cases, established in 1832 and abolished in 1847. Robson, Bkcy.

REVILING CHURCH ORDINANCES. An offence against religion punishable in England by fine and imprisonment. 4 Steph. Com. 208. See BLASPHEMY.

REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES. The Revised Statutes were enacted June 22, 1874, and, when printed in 1875, embraced the laws, general and permanent in their nature, in force December 1, 1873. A second edition was completed in the latter part of 1878, and includes only the specific amendments passed by the forty-third and forty-fourth congresses, with references to some other acts. The period from 1874 to 1880 is provided for by a supplement published in 1881. See Preface to Supplement to Rev. Stat. A second edition of the supplement, covering the legislation from 1874 to 1891, and embracing the matter in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes of 1881, was prepared and published under the direction of congress by Chief Justice Wm. A. Richardson of the Court of Claims. Volume 2 of the Supplement has since been published, covering legislation down to March 4, 1897.

Transactions subsequent to the enactment of the Revised Statutes must be determined by the law as there found, and not by the earlier statutes incorporated therein. In cases of ambiguity or uncertainty, the previous statutes may be referred to to elucidate the legislative intent, but where the language is clear, the Revised Statutes must govern. The second edition is neither a new revision nor a new enactment; it is only a new publication, a compilation containing the original law with certain specific alterations and amendments made by subsequent legislation incorporated therein according to the judgment of the editor, who had no discretion to correct errors or supply omissions; 15 Ct. Cl. 80. Sections of a statute re-enacted in the Revised Statutes are to be given the same meaning they had in the original, unless a contrary intention is clearly manifested; 121 U. S. 278; the Revised Statutes are merely a compilation of the statutes of the United States, and resort may be had to the original statute to ascertain what, if any, change of phraseology there is, and whether such change should be construed as changing the law; 134 U. S. 626; and this is specially so where the act authorizing the revision directs marginal references as in this case; 169 U. S. 227, where some historical matter relating to the subject is found. "They must be treated as the legislative declaration of the statute law on the subjects embraced, on the first day of December, 1873. When the meaning is plain, the courts cannot look to the statutes which have been revised, to see if congress erred in that revision, but may do so when necessary to construe doubtful language." 157 U. S. 1; 74 Fed. Rep. 145.

The act of June 4, 1897, appointed a commission to revise the Criminal Code of the United States.

See STATUTES AT LARGE.

REVISING ASSESSORS. In English Law. Two officers formerly elected to assist the mayor in revising the parish burgess lists, but now abolished and the duties transferred to the revising barristers.

REVISING BARRISTERS. In English Law. Barristers appointed to revise the list of voters for county and borough members of parliament, and who hold courts for that purpose throughout the country.

REVIVAL. Of Contracts. An agreement to renew the legal obligation of a just debt after it has been barred by the act of limitation or lapse of time is called its revival.

In Practice. The act by which a judgment which has lain dormant or without any action upon it for a year and a day is, at common law, again restored to its original force.

When a judgment is more than a day and a year old, no execution can issue upon it at common law; but till it has been paid, or the presumption arises from lapse of time that it has been satisfied, it may be revived and have all its original force, which was merely suspended. This may be done by a scire facias or an action of debt on the judgment. See SCIRE FACIAS.

REVIVE. To bring again to life, to reanimate, to renew; to bring into action after a suspension. 37 Ia. 207.

REVOCATION (Lat. re, back, vocare, to call). The recall of a power or authority conferred, or the vacating of an instrument previously made.

An act of the mind demonstrated by some outward and visible sign. 47 Minn. 171.

Revocation of grants. Grants may be revoked by virtue of a power expressly reserved in the deed, or where the grant is without consideration or in the nature of a testamentary disposition; 3 Co. 25.

Voluntary conveyances, being without pecuniary or legal consideration, may be superseded or revoked, in effect, by a subsequent conveyance of the same subject-matter to another for valuable consideration. And it will make no difference that the first conveyance was meritorious, being a voluntary settlement for the support of one's self or family, and made when the grantor was not indebted, or had ample means besides for the payment of his debts. And the English cases hold that knowledge of the former deed will not affect the rights of the subsequent purchaser; 9 East 59; 4 B. & P. 332; 18 Ves. 84. See, also, the exhaustive review of the American cases, in note to Sexton v. Wheaton, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 36.

In America, it is generally held that a voluntary conveyance which is also fraudulent, is void as to subsequent bona fide purchasers for value with notice; but if not fraudulent in fact, it is only void as to those purchasing without notice. See Bisp. Eq. 257; 18 Pick. 131; 2 B. Monr. 345; 10 Ala. N. S. 348, 352; 12 Johns. 536, 557; 4 McCord 295; FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

The fact that the voluntary grantor subsequently conveys to another, is regarded as prima facie evidence that the former deed was fraudulent as to subsequent purchasers without notice, or it would not have been revoked; 5 Pet. 265; 4 M'Cord 295; 3 Strobh. 59; 1 Rob. Va. 500, 544.

In some of the states, notice of the voluntary deed will defeat the subsequent purchaser; 1 Rawle 231; 6 Md. 242; 4 M'Cord 295; 2 M'Mull. 508; 1 Bail. 575; 15 Ala. 525; 5 Pet. 265. But in other states the English rule prevails; 1 Yerg. 13; 1 A. K. Marsh. 208; 1 Dana 531; 3 Ired. Eq. 81.

There is a distinction between the creditors of the grantor by way of family settlement (he being not insolvent or in embarrassed circumstances), and a subsequent purchaser for value. The claim of the latter is regarded as superior to a mere creditor's, whether prior or subsequent to the voluntary conveyance,—especially if he buy without notice. Some of the foregoing cases do not advert to this distinction; 3 Ired. Eq. 81; 4 Vt. 389.

So, too, if one bail money or other valuables to another, to be delivered to a third person on the day of marriage, he may countermand it at any time before delivery over; 1 Dy. 49. But if such delivery be made in payment or security of a debt, or for other valuable consideration, it is not revocable; 1 Stra. 165. And although the gift be not made known to the donee, being for his benefit, his assent will be presumed until he expressly dissents; 3 Co. 26 b; 2 Salk. 618.

Powers of appointment to uses are revocable if so expressed in the deed of settlement. But it is not indispensable, it is said, that this power of revocation should be repeated in each successive deed of appointment, provided it exist in the original deed creating the settlement; 4 Kent 336; 1 Co. 110 b; 2 Bla. Com. 339.

It has been said that the power of revocation does not include the appointment of new uses; 2 Freem. 61; Pr. in Ch. 474.

A voluntary deed of trust, without power of revocation, made with a nominal consideration, and without legal advice as to its effect, when there was evidence that its effect was misunderstood by the grantor, will be set aside in equity; 13 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 345, and note. In a similar case it was held that the mere omission of counsel to advise the insertion of a power of revocation is not a ground to set aside the deed; but that this omission and the absence of the power are circumstances tending to show that the act was not done with a deliberate intent. The deliberate intent of a party to tie up his hands should clearly appear. In the absence of such an intent the omission of a power to revoke is prima facie evidence of mistake. The mistake being one of fact mixed with legal effects, equity will relieve; 75 Pa. 269; the earlier English cases seem to have insisted upon the presence of a power of revocation in voluntary settlements; L. R. 8 Eq. 558; 14 id. 365; but in a later case it was held that the absence of such a power was merely a circumstance of more or less weight, according to the other circumstances of each case; L. R. 8 Ch. Ap. 430. A reserved right of revocation is not inconsistent with the creation of a valid trust; 1 Mo. App. 99.

A quitclaim deed from a trustee to the donor of the trust will not revoke the trust, though made solely for that purpose, since a completed trust, without reservation of power to revoke, can only be revoked by the consent of all the beneficiaries; 113 Mo. 188. See 70 Cal. 449.

As to the revocation of powers conferred upon agents, see AGENCY. It is a general rule that a principal may revoke the agent's authority at his own will; 141 U. S. 627.

The American courts, following the case of Brown v. M'Gran, 14 Pet. 479, hold that the consignee of goods for sale, who has incurred liability or made advances upon the faith of the consignment, acquires a power of sale which, to the extent of his interest, is not revocable or subject to the control of the consignor. But if orders are given by the consignor, contemporaneously with the consignment and advances, in regard to the time and mode of sale, and which are, either expressly or impliedly, assented to by the consignee, he is not at liberty to depart from them afterwards. But if no instructions are given at the time of the consignment and advances, the legal presumption is that the consignee has the ordinary right of factors to sell, according to the usages of the trade and the general duty of factors, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and reimburse the advances out of the proceeds, and that this right is not subject to the interference or control of the consignor. See 52 Miss. 7; 45 Ind. 115.

The right of the factor to sell in such case is limited to the protection of his own interest, and if he sell more than is necessary for that purpose contrary to the order of his principal, he is liable for the loss incurred; 37 Conn. 378.

The case of Parker v. Branker, 22 Pick. 40, seems to go to the length of holding that where the consignment is to sell at a limited price the consignee may after notice sell below that price, if necessary, to reimburse advances. But to this extent the American rule has not gone; 1 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. 70. See, also, 12 N. H. 239; 3 N. Y. 78.

The English courts do not hold such a power irrevocable in law; 3 C. B. 380; 5 id. 895. In the last case, Wilde, C. J., thus lays down the rule. It may furnish a ground for inferring that the advances were made upon the footing of an agreement that the factor shall have an irrevocable authority to sell in case the principal made default. But it would be an inference of fact, not a conclusion of law. The fact that the agent has incurred expense in faith of the authority being continued, and will suffer loss by its revocation, is a ground of recovery against the principal, but does not render the power irrevocable. A pledge of personal property to secure liabilities of the pledgor, with an express power of sale, confers such an interest in the subject-matter that it will not be revoked by his death; 10 Paige, Ch. 205. But a power to pledge or sell the property of the constituent and from the avails to reimburse advances made on liabilities incurred by the appointee is not so coupled with an interest as to be irrevocable; 8 Wheat. 174; 6 Conn. 559. The interest must exist in the subject-matter of the power, and not merely in the result of its exercise, to become irrevocable; 15 N. H. 468; 20 Ohio St. 185. Hence, if one give a letter of credit agreeing to accept bills to a certain amount within a limited time, the letter is revoked by death, and bills drawn after the death and before knowledge thereof reaches the drawer cannot be enforced against the estate of such deceased party; 28 Vt. 209.

All contracts which are to be executed in the name of the constituent by virtue of an agency, although forming an essential part of a security upon the faith of which advances have been made, are of necessity revoked by the death of the constituent. Even a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, although not revocable by the act of the party, is revoked by his death. The courts, however, allow judgment in such cases to be entered as of a term prior to the death of the constituent; 2 Kent 646; 9 Wend. 452; 8 Wheat. 174. See 75 Cal. 349; see, also, 2 Ld. Raym. 766, 849, where the form of procedure is discussed; 7 Mod. 93; Stra. 108. A warrant of attorney to confess judgment, executed by a feme sole, is revoked by her marriage; but if executed to a feme sole, the courts will allow judgment to be entered up in the name of the husband and wife; 3 Harring. 411.

Where one is not notified of the revocation of the authority of an agent, he is justified in acting upon the presumption of its continuance; 128 U. S. 374; 75 Cal. 159; 82 Va. 712.

The powers of arbitrators. These are revocable by either party at any time before final award; 20 Vt. 198; 156 Mass. 113; 126 Ill. 72; 58 Mo. App. 288; 22 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 165. It is not competent for the parties to deprive themselves of this power by any form of contract; 8 Co. 80; 16 Johns. 205. But where the submission releases the original cause of action, and the adversary revokes, the party so releasing may recover the amount so released by way of damages caused by the revocation; 13 Vt. 97.

Where the submission is made a rule of court, it becomes practically irrevocable, since such an act would be regarded as a contempt of court and punishable by attachment; 7 East 608. This is the only mode of making a submission irrevocable "when the fear of an attachment may induce them to submit." 6 Bingh. 443.

In the American courts a submission by rule of court is made irrevocable by the express provisions of the statutes in most of the states, and the referee is required, after due notice, to hear the case ex parte, where either party fails to appear; 12 Mass. 47; 1 Conn. 498; 4 Me. 459; 5 Pa. 497; 3 Ired. 333. In Ohio, a submission under the statute is irrevocable after the arbitrators are sworn; 19 Ohio St. 245; and it has been held that a naked submission is not revocable after the arbitrator has made his award and published it to one of the parties; 6 N. H. 36. But while a statute requisite, as being witnessed, is not complied with, it is incomplete and so the submission is revocable; 5 Paige, Ch. 575.

When one party to the submission consists of several persons, one cannot revoke without the concurrence of the others; Rolle, Abr. Authority (H); 12 Wend. 578. But the text-writers are not fully agreed in this proposition; see Russ. Arb. 141; 2 Chitty, Bail. 452, where it was held that the death of one of several parties on one side of the submission operates as a revocation as to such party at least, and that an award made in the name of the survivors and the executor of the deceased party is void. It is here intimated by way of query whether, that where the cause of action survives, the award might not legally be made in the name of the surviving party. See Russ. Arb. 155.

An award made after the revocation of the submission is entirely void; 1 Sim. 134.

The power of the arbitrator is determined by the occurrence of any fact which incapacitates the party from proceeding with the hearing. The marriage of a feme sole is a revocation of the arbitrator's power; 11 Vt. 525; without notice to the arbitrators; Russ. Arb. 152. So, also, if she be joined with another in the submission, her marriage is a revocation as to both; W. Jones, 228; Rolle, Abr. Authority.

Insanity in either party, or in the arbitrator, will determine his authority. The death of either party, or of the arbitrator, or one of them, or where the arbitrators decline to act, will operate as a revocation of the submission; 4 T. B. Monr. 3; 1 B. & C. 66; 36 Fed. Rep. 408; 58 Mo. App. 288.

It is competent to make provision in the submission for the completion of the award, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties, by proceedings in the name of the personal representative. This seems to be the general practice in England in late years; 3 B. & C. 144; 8 M. & W. 873. And in some of the American states it is held that a submission by rule of court is not determined by the death of the party, where the cause of action survives, but may be revived and prosecuted in the name of the personal representative; 15 Pick. 79; 3 Halst. 116; 3 Gill 190. Bankruptcy of the party does not operate to revoke a submission to arbitration; Caldw. Arb. 89. But it seems to be considered in 9 B. & C. 659, that the bankruptcy of one party will justify the other in revoking. But see 2 Chitt. Bail. 43; 1 C. B. 131.

The time when the revocation becomes operative. Where it is by the express act of the party, it will be when notice reaches the arbitrator; 5 B. & Ald. 507; 8 Co. 80. But in the case of death, or marriage, or insanity, the act itself terminates the power of the arbitrator at once, and all acts thereafter done by him are of no force; 11 Vt. 525; 5 East 266.

The form of the revocation is not important, if it be in conformity with the submission, or if, when it is not, it be acquiesced in by the other party; 7 Vt. 237.

It is said in the books that the revocation must be of as high grade of contract as the submission. This seems to be assumed by the text-writers and judges as a settled proposition; 8 Co. 82; 8 Johns. 125. Where the submission is in writing, the revocation "ought to be in writing"; 18 Vt. 91. But see 7 Vt. 237, 240; 15 N. H. 468. It seems questionable whether at this day a submission by deed would require to be revoked by deed, since the revocation is not a contract, but a mere notice, and no special right is conferred upon such an act by the addition of wax or wafer; 9 Ired.

74. But see 26 Me. 251, contra. But it is conceded the party may revoke by any act which renders it impracticable for the arbitrators to proceed; 7 Mod. 8; Story, Ag. 474.

So a revocation imperfectly expressed, as of the bond instead of the submission, will receive a favorable construction, in order to effectuate the intention of the party; 1 Cow. 325.

It has been held, too, that bringing a suit upon the same cause of action embraced in the submission, at any time before the award, was an implied revocation; 6 Dana 107; 126 Ill. 72.

The power of a partner to contract in the name of the firm may be revoked, by injunction out of chancery, where there is a wanton or fraudulent violation of the contract constituting the association; Bisp. Eq. 426; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 673. This will sometimes be done on account of the impracticability of carrying on the undertaking; 1 Cox, Ch. 213; 2 V. & B. 299. So, too, such an injunction might be granted on account of the insanity or permanent incapacity of one of the partners; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 673. But insanity is not alone sufficient to produce a dissolution of the partnership; 2 My. & K. 125. See PARTNERSHIP.

An oral license to occupy land is, where the statute of frauds prevails, revocable at pleasure, unless permanent and expensive erections have been paid by the licensee in faith of the permission. In such case a court of equity will decree a conveyance on equitable terms, in conformity with the contracts of the parties, or else require compensation to be made upon equitable principles; 1 Stockt. 471; Red. Railw. 106; 13 Vt. 150; 10 Conn. 375.

For the law in regard to the revocation of wills, see WILLS.

REVOCATIONE PARLIAMENTI. An ancient writ for recalling a parliament. 4 Inst. 44.

REVOCATUR (Lat. it is recalled). A term used to denote that a judgment is annulled for an error in fact. The judgment is then said to be recalled, revocatur; not reversed, which is the word used when a judgment is annulled for an error in law; Tidd, Pr. 1126.

REVOLT. The endeavor of the crew of a vessel, or any one or more of them, to overthrow the legitimate authority of her commander, with intent to remove him from his command, or against his will to take possession of the vessel by assuming the government and navigation of her, or by transferring their obedience from the lawful commander to some other person. 11 Wheat. 417.

According to Wolff, revolt and rebellion are nearly synonymous: he says it is the state of citizens who unjustly take up arms against the prince or government. Wolff, Droit de la Nat. § 1232. See REBELLION.

By R. S. § 5359, if any one of the crew of an American vessel, on the high seas or other waters, within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the U. S., endeavors to make a revolt, etc., or conspires, etc., so to do, or incites, etc., any other of the crew to disobey lawful others, or to neglect their duty, or assembles such orders in a mutinous manner, or makes a riot, or unlawfully confines the master, etc., he is punishable by a fine of not over $1,000, or imprisonment for not over five years, or both. By § 5360, if any one of the crew, etc., usurps the command of the vessel, or deprives the master of authority, or resists his authority, or transfers the same to one not entitled thereto, he is punishable by a fine of not over $2,000, and imprisonment for not over ten years. Foreign seamen on American vessels are punishable under this section; 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 88. If, before a voyage is begun, the seamen for good reason believe that the vessel is unseaworthy, they may resist an attempt to compel them to go to sea in her, without being guilty of revolt; 1 Sprague 75.

Revolts on shipboard are to be considered as defined by the last-mentioned act; 1 W. & M. 306.

A confederacy or combination must be shown; 2 Sumn. 582; 1 W. & M. 305; Crabbe 558. The vessel must be properly registered; 3 Sumn. 342; must be pursuing her regular voyage; 2 Sumn. 470. The indictment must specifically set forth the acts which constitute the crime; Whart. Prec. § 1061, n. And see 1 Mas. 147; 5 id. 402; 1 Sumn. 448; 4 Wash. C. C. 402, 528; 2 Curt. C. C. 225; 1 Pet. C. C. 213. See SEAMEN.

REWARD. The offer of recompense given by authority of law for the performance of some act for the public good, which, when the act has been performed, is to be paid. The recompense actually so paid.

The offer may be made to an individual; 6 Blatch. 426; or by public, oral statement, poster, or newspaper; 56 Ind. 46; 14 Cal. 134; 6 Mass. 244; and its acceptance and performance create a valid contract; Poll. Contr. 11; Ans. Contr. 31; 82 N. Y. 503; 71 Tex. 584; 52 Pa. 484; such performance being sufficient consideration; 7 N. H. 549; 73 Am. Dec. 634; 4 B. & Ad. 621. The offer, not being a contract until performance, may be withdrawn prior thereto; 16 Ind. 140; 79 Ga. 658; 5 Metc. 57; 14 Cal. 137. See 92 U. S. 75. As to what information will constitute a performance, see 3 C. B. 254; L. R. 2 Q. B. 301. The offer of a reward may contain such terms as the party sees fit to prescribe; 43 Ark. 337; 7 Metc. 412; provided they are lawful; Bish. Contr. § 467; 106 Mass. 269; 68 Me. 142; 61 Pa. 415; and substantial performance is usually sufficient; 9 Allen 152; 85 Am. Dec. 747.

A reward may be offered by the government or by a private person; 21 N. J. L. 310; by a railroad company; 19 Am. Rep. 80; 85 Ala. 48; but not by the District of Columbia; 7 D. C. 134; nor by municipal corporations, unless authorized by statute; 32 Ill. App. 397; 41 Mich. 367; 51 Me. 174; 48 Ia. 472; 14 Bush 324; 18 Fla. 318; 72 Ind. 455; contra, 23 Pa. 391. But where the selectmen of a town offered a reward in excess of that authorized by statute, it was held good for the lawful amount; 39 Conn. 159; and such officials are personally liable for the excess; 30 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 95; 7 Dana 29; contra, 2 McCrary 152.

Any one who complies with the terms of the offer, if not guilty of fraud, may recover the reward; 38 Me. 45; 133 Mass. 283; 69 Tex. 74; 24 Ia. 78; although not embraced in the description of the persons to whom it was originally proposed; 55 Ill. 62; 64 L. T. 594; but not for apprehending a person who has been admitted to bail; 8 Bush 22; nor one discharged from arrest by the committing magistrate; 62 Miss. 193.

One may recover a reward offered by his employers; 16 Ill. App. 181; but not if he is morally bound to furnish the information; 50 Cal. 218; or it is his official duty to do so; 79 Tex. 141; 10 Pa. 39. And a reward offered by the state for the capture of a criminal cannot be claimed by an officer whose official duty it is to make the arrest; the rule being founded on public policy, it is opposed to opening the door to any inducement for public officers to delay arrests until rewards are offered; 45 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 515. In that case it was also decided that no one could have any property right in a reward until it was earned by making the arrest, so that where, by sharp practice in making use of information derived over the telephone, one person secured the reward and prevented another, who really gave the information, from obtaining the benefit of it, the latter had no right of action. But it is held that a promise to pay a reward to a police constable is binding because there might be some information which he was not bound, in the discharge of his ordinary duty, to give; 11 A. & E. 856.

An offer of a reward is not void as against public policy, because made for conviction of offences afterwards to be committed; 151 Pa. 200.

It is held to be necessary that the person performing the service should know of the offer when he did so; 51 N. Y. 604; 16 Ill. App. 181; 2 Handy 193; 7 Dana 129; contra, 8 Ind. App. 459; 9 Bush 459; 44 Vt. 170; 12 C. B. N. S. 740; 104 E. C. L. 740.

The person first complying with the terms of the offer is entitled to the reward; 4 B. & Ad. 621; 24 E. C. L. 126; 7 Fed. Rep. 709; 6 Blatch. 406; and where the offer is for information, the whole of which is furnished in fragments by different persons, the reward may be equitably apportioned; 48 N. H. 86; 43 How. Pr. 193; 28 Md. 147; and so as to the recovery of property; 48 Ia. 472; 25 Am. Dec. 187; 6 Mass. 344.

The finder of lost property is not entitled to a reward, if there was no promise of one by the owner; 1 Ore. 86.

RHANDIR. A part in the division of Wales before the Conquest; every township comprehended four gavels, and every gavel had four rhandirs, and four houses or tenements constituted every rhandir. Tayl. Hist. Gav. 69.

RHODE ISLAND. One of the original thirteen states of the United States of America; its full style being, "The State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations."

Its territory lies between Massachusetts and Connecticut, in the southwest angle of that portion of the territory of the former state which was known as the colony of New Plymouth, and is situated at the head and along both shores of the Narragansett Bay, comprising the islands in the same, the principal of which is Rhode Island, placed at the mouth of the bay. The settlement was commenced as early as June, 1636, on the present site of the city of Providence, by five men under Roger Williams. Williams founded his colony upon a compact which bound the settlers to obedience to the major part "only in civil things"; leaving to each perfect freedom in matters of religious concernment, so that he did not, by his religious practices, encroach upon the public order and peace. A portion of the Massachusetts colonists, who were of the antinomian party, after their defeat in that colony, settled on the island of Aquetnet, now Rhode Island, where they associated themselves as a colony on March 7, 1638. These settlements, together with one "at Shawomet, now Warwick, made by another sect of religious outcasts, under Gorton, in 1642-3, remained under separate voluntary governments until 1647, when they were united under one government, styled "The Incorporation of Providence Plantations in the Narragansett Bay in New England," by virtue of a charter granted in 1643.

This colony remained under this charter, which, upon some divisions, was confirmed by Cromwell in 1655, until after the restoration, when a new charter was procured from Charles II., in the fifteenth year of his reign, under which a new colonial government was formed on the 24th of November, 1663, which continued, with the short interruption of the colonial administration of Sir Edmund Andros, down to the period of the American revolution.

In the general assembly of the colony, on the first Wednesday of May, 1776, in anticipation of the declaration of independence, an act was passed which absolved the colonists from their allegiance to the king of Great Britain, and which ordered that in future all writs and processes should issue in the charter name of "The Governor and Company of the English Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," instead of the name of the king. The old colonial charter, together with a bill of rights adopted by the general assembly, remained the sole constitution of state government until the first Tuesday in May, 1843, when a state constitution framed by a convention assembled in November, 1842, and adopted by the people of the state, went into operation.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Senate consists of the lieutenant-governor and one senator from each town or city in the state; the governor, and in his absence the lieutenant-governor, shall preside, and may vote only in case of a tie; the senate may elect a presiding officer in case of the death or disability of the governor and lieutenant-governor; the secretary of state shall be secretary of the senate, unless otherwise provided by law, and shall preside over the senate in case of death of the presiding officer, till a new one is chosen.

The House of Representatives shall not exceed seventy-two members, elected on the basis of population, giving each town and city one at least, and one for more than half the ratio, allowing reapportionment after each United States or state census. The districting any town or city is forbidden; the house shall elect its presiding officer, and the senior members from the town of Newport shall preside in the organization.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The chief executive power is to be vested in a governor, who, together with a lieutenant-governor, shall be annually elected by the people.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—This is vested by the constitution in a supreme court and in such inferior courts as may from time to time be prescribed by law. Chancery powers may be conferred on the supreme court but on no other to any greater extent than was prescribed by law at the time of the adoption of the constitution. The Supreme Court consists of a chief justice and five associate justices elected by the two houses of the assembly in grand committee. They hold office until their places are declared vacant by a resolution passed by a majority of both houses at the annual session for electing officers, unless removed by impeachment.

This court has original jurisdiction concurrent with courts of common pleas, of all civil actions, as well between the state and its citizens as between citizens, and of all criminal proceedings legally brought before it, and statutory power to punish contempts. It consists of two divisions. The Appellate Division consists of the chief justice and two associate justices to be from time to time designated by the chief justice. No justice can exercise appellate jurisdiction of a case heard by him. One justice is a quorum for motions, interlocutory proceedings, etc., and three justices constitute a quorum for all purposes in the appellate division, but as many as practicable shall sit on all constitutional questions. It has exclusive jurisdiction of all suits in equity, and exclusive authority to issue writs of error, certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, to entertain informations in the nature of quo warranto; has exclusive cognizance of all motions and petitions for a new trial, petitions for divorce, separate maintenance, alimony, custody of children. It is also the supreme court of probate. This division is required by law to be in session from the third Monday in September to the third Monday in July. The sessions are at Providence, except that on two days each year fixed by law and such others as may be designated by the court, sessions are held at Newport and South Kingston respectively.

The Common Pleas Division is held by some one or more of the justices of the supreme court, designated for that purpose by the chief justice. This court has original jurisdiction of all civil actions which involve title to real estate or where real estate is attached, if the amount exceed $300, except in case of certain writs. It has original jurisdiction of all crimes. It has appellate jurisdiction in such cases from other tribunals as may be given to it by the law. This division holds four sessions a year in each county except Providence, where it is to sit continuously from the third Monday in September to the third Monday in July.

The state is divided into twelve judicial districts and a district court is established in each, to be held by a justice elected by the general assembly for a term of three years. It has all the statutory jurisdiction of justices of the peace and also of offences against municipal laws and ordinances unless the same is otherwise specially conferred. It may also take the declarations of any alien of his intention to become a citizen, and may issue writs of habeas corpus.

Courts of Probate are held by the town councils of the various towns, except in Providence, where the municipal court acts as a probate court. This court has jurisdiction of the settlement of estates of deceased persons, supervision of guardians, probate of wills, and other similar matters, with a right of appeal to the supreme court.

RHODIAN LAWS. A code of maritime laws adopted by the people of Rhodes, who had by their commerce and naval victories obtained the sovereignty of the sea, about nine hundred years before the Christian era. There is reason to suppose this code has not been transmitted to posterity, at least not in a perfect state. See CODE.

RIAL. A piece of gold coin current for ten shillings in the reign of Henry VI.

RIBAUD. A rogue; a vagrant.

RIBBONMEN. Associations or secret societies formed in Ireland, having for their object the dispossession of landlords and political purposes. See Whart. Law Lex.

RIDER. A schedule or small piece of paper or parchment added to some part of a record or policy of insurance; as, when on the reading of a bill in the legislature a new clause is added, this is tacked to the bill on a separate piece of paper, and is called a rider.

RIDING. In English Law. An ascertained district; part of a county. This term has the same meaning in Yorkshire that division has in Lincolnshire. 4 Term 459.

RIDING ARMED. The offence of riding or going armed with dangerous or unusual weapons. It is a misdemeanor; 4 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 203.

RIDING CLERK. One of the Six Clerks in chancery, who, in his turn, for one year kept the controlment books of all grants that passed the Great Seal. Whart. Dict.

RIENS. A French word which signifies nothing. It has generally this meaning: as, riens en arriere; riens passe per le fait, nothing passes by the deed; riens per descent, nothing by descent: it sometimes signifies not, as, rien culpable, not guilty.

RIENS EN ARRIERE (L. Fr. nothing in arrear). In Pleading. A plea which alleges that there is nothing remaining due and unpaid of the plaintiff's demand. It is a good plea, and raises the general issue in an action for rent. 2 Wm. Saund. 297, n. 1; 2 Chitty, Pl. 486; 2 Ld. Raym. 1503; Gould, Pl. 286; McKelv. Pl. 88.

RIENS PASSE PER LE FAIT (L. Fr. nothing passed by the deed). In Pleading. A plea which avoids the effect of a deed where its execution cannot be denied, by asserting that nothing passed thereby: for example, an allegation that the acknowledgment was before a court which had not jurisdiction.

RIENS PER DESCENT. A plea by an heir sued for the debt of his ancestor that he had no lands by descent from the ancestor. Chitty, Prec. 433.

RIER, or REER-COUNTY. Close county, in opposition to open county. It appears to be some public place which the sheriff appoints for the receipt of the king's money after the end of the county court. Fleta says it is dies crastinus post comitatum. Encyc. Lond.

RIFFLARE. To take away anything by force.

RIGGING THE MARKET. A term of the stock exchange denoting the practice of inflating the price of given stocks or enhancing their quoted value by a system of pretended purchasers, designed to give the air of an unusual demand for such stocks. L. R. 13 Eq. 447.

RIGHT. A well-founded claim.

If people believe that humanity itself establishes or proves certain claims, either upon fellow-beings, or upon society or government, they call these claims human rights; if they believe that these claims inhere in the very nature of man himself, they called them inherent, inalienable rights; if people believe that there inheres in monarchs a claim to rule over their subjects by divine appointment, they call the claim divine right, jus divinum; if the claim is founded or given by law, it is a legal right. The ideas of claim and that the claim must be well founded always constitute the idea of right. Rights can only inhere in and exist between moral beings: and no moral beings can coexist without rights, consequently without obligations. Right and obligation are correlative ideas. The idea of a well-founded claim becomes in law a claim founded in or established by the law: so that we may say a right in law is an acknowledged claim.

Men are by their inherent nature moral and social beings; they have, therefore, mutual claims upon one another. Every well-grounded claim on others is called a right, and, since the social character of man gives the element of mutuality to each claim, every right conveys along with it the idea of obligation. Right and obligation are correlative. The consciousness of all constitutes the first foundation of the right or makes the claim well grounded. Its incipiency arises instinctively out of the nature of man. Man feels that he has a right of ownership over that which he has produced out of appropriated matter, for instance, the bow he has made of appropriated wood; he feels that he has a right to exact obedience from his children, long before laws formally acknowledge or protect these rights; but he feels, too, that if he claims the bow which he made as his own, he ought to acknowledge (as correlative obligation) the same right in another man to the bow which he may have made; or if he, as father, has a right to the obedience of his children, they have a corresponding claim on him for protection as long as they are incapable to protect themselves. The idea of rights is coexistent with that of authority (or government); both are inherent in man; but if we understand by government a coherent system of laws by which a state is ruled, and if we understand by state a sovereign society, with distinct authorities to make and execute laws, then rights precede government, or the establishment of states, which is expressed in the ancient law maxim: Ne ex regula jus sumatur, sed ex jure quod est, regula fiat. See GOVERNMENT. We cannot refrain from referring the reader to the noble passage of Sophocles, Œdyp. Tyr. 876 et seq., and to the words of Cicero, in his oration for Milo: Est enim hæc, judices, non scripta sed nata lex; quam non didicimus, accepimus, legimus; verum ex natura ipsa arripuimus, hausimus, expressimus; ad quam non docti sed facti; non instituti sed imbuti sumus.

As rights precede government, so we find that now rights are acknowledged above governments and their states, in the case of international law. International law is founded on rights, that is, well-grounded claims which civilized states, as individuals, make upon one another. As governments come to be more and more clearly established, rights are more clearly acknowledged and protected by the laws, and right comes to mean a claim acknowledged and protected by the law. A legal right, a constitutional right, means a right protected by the law, by the constitution; but government does not create the idea of right or original rights; it acknowledges them; just as government does not create property or values and money, it acknowledges and regulates them. If it were otherwise, the question would present itself, whence does government come? whence does it derive its own right to create rights? By compact? But whence did the contracting parties derive their right to create a government that is to make rights? We would be consistently led to adopt the idea of a government by jus divinum,—that is, a government deriving its authority to introduce and establish rights (bestowed on it in particular) from a source wholly separate from human society and the ethical character of man, in the same manner in which we acknowledge revelation to come from a source not human.

Rights are claims of moral beings upon one another: when we speak of rights to certain things, they are, strictly speaking, claims of persons on persons,—in the case of property, for instance, the claim of excluding others from possessing it. The idea of right indicates an ethical relation, and all moral relations may be infringed; claims may be made and established by law which are wrong in themselves and destitute of a corollary obligation; they are like every other wrong done by society or government; they prove nothing concerning the origin or essential character of rights. On the other hand, claims are gradually more clearly acknowledged, and new ones, which were not perceived in early periods, are for the first time perceived, and surrounded with legislative protection, as civilization advances. Thus, original rights, or the rights of man, are not meant to be claims which man has always perceived or insisted upon or protected, but those claims which, according to the person who uses the term, logically flow from the necessity of the physical and moral existence of man; for man is born to be a man,—that is, to lead a human existence. They have been called inalienable rights; but they have been alienated, and many of them are not perceived for long periods. Lieber, in his Political Ethics, calls them primordial rights: he means rights directly flowing from the nature of man, developed by civilization, and always showing themselves clearer and clearer as society advances. He enumerates, as such especially, the following: the right of protection; the right of personal freedom,—that is, the claim of unrestricted action except so far as the same claim of others necessitates restriction: these two rights involve the right to have justice done by the public administration of justice, the right of production and exchange (the right of property), the right of free locomotion and emigration, the right of communion in speech, letter, print, the right of worship, the right of influencing or sharing in the legislation. All political civilization steadily tends to bring out these rights clearer and clearer, while in the course of this civilization, from its incipiency, with its relapses, they appear more or less developed in different periods and frequently wholly in abeyance: nevertheless, they have their origin in the personality of man as a social being.

Publicists and jurists have made the following further distinction of rights:—

Rights are perfect and imperfect. When the things which we have a right to possess, or the actions we have a right to do, are or may be fixed and determinate, the right is a perfect one; but when the thing or the actions are vague and indeterminate, the right is an imperfect one. If a man demand his property which is withheld from him, the right that supports his demand is a perfect one, because the thing demanded is or may be fixed and determinate; but if a poor man ask relief from those from whom he has reason to expect it, the right which supports his petition is an imperfect one, because the relief which he expects is a vague, indeterminate thing. Rutherforth, Inst. c. 2, § 4; Grotius, lib. 1. c. 1, § 4.

Rights are also absolute and qualified. A man has an absolute right to recover property which belongs to him; an agent has a qualified right to recover such property when it has been intrusted to his care and which has been unlawfully taken out of his possession.

Rights might with propriety be also divided into natural and civil rights; but as all the rights which man has received from nature have been modified and acquired anew from the civil law, it is more proper, when considering their object, to divide them into political and civil rights.

Political rights consist in the power to participate, directly or indirectly, in the establishment or management of government. These political rights are fixed by the constitution. Every citizen has the right of voting for public officers, and of being elected; these are the political rights which the humblest citizen possesses.

Civil rights are those which have no relation to the establishment, support, or management of the government. These consist in the power of acquiring and enjoying property, of exercising the paternal and marital powers, and the like. It will be observed that every one, unless deprived of them by a sentence of civil death, is in the enjoyment of his civil rights,—which is not the case with political rights; for an alien, for example, has no political, although in the full enjoyment of his civil, rights.

These latter rights are divided into absolute and relative. The absolute rights of mankind may be reduced to three principal or primary articles: the right of personal security, which consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation; the right of personal liberty, which consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation or removing one's person to whatsoever place one's inclination may direct, without any restraint unless by due course of law; the right of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution save only by the laws of the land. 1 Bla. Com. 124–139.

The relative rights are public or private: the first are those which subsist between the people and the government; as, the right of protection on the part of the people, and the right of allegiance which is due by the people to the government; the second are the reciprocal rights of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, master and servant.

Rights are also divided into legal and equitable. The former are those where the party has the legal title to a thing; and in that case his remedy for an infringement of it is by an action in a court of law. Although the person holding the legal title may have no actual interest, but hold only as trustee, the suit must be in his name, and not, in general, in that of the cestui que trust; 8 Term 332; 1 Saund. 158, n. 1; 2 Bing. 20. The latter, or equitable rights, are those which may be enforced in a court of equity by the cestui que trust.

RIGHT CLOSE, WRIT OF. An abolished writ which lay for tenants in ancient demesne, and others of a similar nature, to try the right of their lands and tenements in the court of the lord exclusively. 1 Steph. Com. 224.

RIGHT HEIRS. The heirs of the testator at common law, who, if more than one, take as tenants in common. 47 L. J. Ch. 714; 35 W. R. 356.

RIGHT OF ACTION. The right to bring suit in a case. Also sometimes used in the same sense as right in action, which is identical with chose in action (q. v.).

RIGHT OF APPEAL. This is not limited to a right of appeal by statute, but includes a case where a judge has given leave to appeal. 46 L. J. Q. B. 226; 2 Q. B. D. 125.

RIGHT OF COMMON. See COMMON.

RIGHT OF DISCUSSION. In Scotch Law. The right which the cautioner (surety) has to insist that the creditor shall do his best to compel the performance of the contract by the principal debtor, before he shall be called upon. 1 Bell, Com. 347.

RIGHT OF DIVISION. In Scotch Law. The right which each of several cautioners (sureties) has to refuse to answer for more than his own share of the debt. To entitle the cautioner to this right, the other cautioners must be solvent, and there must be no words in the bond to exclude it. 1 Bell, Com. 347.

RIGHT OF HABITATION. In Louisiana. The right of dwelling gratuitously in a house the property of another. La. Civ. Code, art. 623; 3 Toullier, c. 2, p. 335; 14 id. n. 279, p. 330; Pothier, n. 22–25.

RIGHT OF LIEN. The word lien is of the same origin as the word liable, and the right of lien expresses the liability of certain property for a certain legal duty, or a right to resort to it in order to enforce the duty. 30 Pa. 277. See LIEN.

RIGHT OF POSSESSION. The right to possession which may reside in one man, while another has the actual possession, being the right to enter and turn out such actual occupant: e. g. the right of a disseisee. An apparent right of possession is one which may be defeated by a better; an actual right of possession, one which will stand the test against all opponents. 2 Bla. Com. *196.

RIGHT OF PROPERTY. The abstract right (merum jus) which remains after the actual possession has been so long gone that the right of possession is also lost, and the law will only allow recovery of the land by a writ of right. It, together with possession and right of possession, makes a perfect title; e. g. a disseisor has naked possession, the disseisee has right of possession and right of property. But after twenty years without entry the right of possession is transferred from the disseisee to the disseisor; and if he now buys up the right of property which alone remains in the disseisee, the disseisor will unite all three rights in himself, and thereby acquire a perfect title. 2 Bla. Com. *197.

RIGHT OF SALE. A contractual right of sale of an article constitutes the taker of such right an agent for the sale of the article, but does not bind the giver to supply the article; 6 L. R. Ir. 319.

RIGHT OF SEARCH. See SEARCH, RIGHT OF; PRISONER.

RIGHT OF WAY. See EASEMENT; WAY.

RIGHT PATENT. The name of an ancient writ, which Fitzherbert says, "ought to be brought of lands and tenements, and not of an advowson, or of common, and lieth only of an estate of fee-simple, and not for him who has a lesser estate, as tenant in tail, tenant in frank-marriage, or tenant for life." Fitzh. N.B.1.

RIGHT, PETITION OF. See PETITION OF RIGHT.

RIGHT TO BEGIN. In Practice. The party who asserts the affirmative of an issue has the right to begin and reply, as on him is the burden of proof. The substantial affirmative, not the verbal, gives the right; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 74; 18 B. Monr. 136; 6 Ohio St. 307; 2 Gray 260; Tay. Ev. 356. See OPENING AND CLOSING.

RIGHT, WRIT OF. See WRIT OF RIGHT.

RIGHTS, BILL OF. See BILL OF RIGHTS.

RING. A combination of persons, usually for the attainment of a selfish aim or purpose; especially a clique formed for controlling a market, or local or state politics. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

RING-DROPPING. In Criminal Law. A phrase applied in England to a trick frequently practised in committing larcenies. It is difficult to define it; it will be sufficiently exemplified by the following cases. The prisoner, with some accomplices, being in company with the prosecutor, pretended to find a valuable ring wrapped up in a paper, appearing to be a jeweller's receipt for "a rich brilliant diamond ring." They offered to leave the ring with the prosecutor if he would deposit some money and his watch as a security. The prosecutor, having accordingly laid down his watch and money on a table, was beckoned out of the room by one of the confederates, while the others took away his watch and money. This was held to amount to a larceny; 1 Leach 278. In another case, under similar circumstances, the prisoner procured from the prosecutor twenty guineas, promising to return them the next morning, and leaving the false jewel with him. This was also held to be larceny; 1 Leach 314; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 679.

RINGING THE CHANGE. A trick practised by a criminal, by which, on receiving a good piece of money in payment of an article, he pretends it is not good, and, changing it, returns to the buyer a spurious coin. See 2 Leach 786.

RINGS-GIVING. The giving of golden rings by a newly-created sergeant-at-law to every person of rank at court, from the princes of the blood, through the lords in parliament and the justices and barons of the courts, down to the meanest clerk of common pleas, to each one according to his dignity. The expense was not less than forty pounds English money. Fortesque 190; 10 Co. Introd. 23.

RIOT. In Criminal Law. A tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling together of their own authority with an intent mutually to assist each other against any who shall oppose them, in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful. Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 65, § 1. See 3 Blackf. 209; 3 Rich. 337; 5 Pa. 83; 78 Ga. 258.

"An unlawful assembly which has actually begun to execute the purpose for which it is assembled, by a breach of the peace, and to the terror of the public or a lawful assembly, may become a riot if the persons assembled form and proceed to execute an unlawful purpose to the terror of the people, although they had not that purpose when they assembled." Steph. Dig. Cr. Law, art. 77.

In this case there must be proved—first, an unlawful assembling; 15 N. H. 169; for if a number of persons lawfully met together, as, for example, at a fire, or in a theatre or a church, should suddenly quarrel and fight, the offence is an affray, and not a riot, because there was no unlawful assembling; but if three or more being so assembled, on a dispute occurring, form into parties with promises of mutual assistance, which promises may be express, or implied from the circumstances, then the offence will no longer be an affray, but a riot; the unlawful combination will amount to an assembling within the meaning of the law. In this manner any lawful assembly may be converted into a riot; 18 Me. 346; 1 Camp. 328; 24 Hun 562. Any one who joins the rioters after they have actually commenced is equally guilty as if he had joined them while assembling.

Secondly, proof must be made of actual violence and force on the part of the rioters, or of such circumstances as have an apparent tendency to force and violence, and calculated to strike terror into the public mind; 2 Camp. 369. See 60 Ga. 126; 26 Mo. 429. The definition requires that the offenders should assemble of their own authority, in order to create a riot: if, therefore, the parties act under the authority of the law, they may use any necessary force to enforce their mandate, without committing this offence. See 1 Hill S. C. 362; 72 N. C. 25.

Thirdly, evidence must be given that the defendants acted in the riot and were participants in the disturbance; 1 Morr. Tenn. 142. It is sufficient if they be present encouraging or giving countenance, support, or acquiescence to the act; 9 Miss. 270. See 1 Russ. Cr. *382; Co. 3d Inst. 176; 4 Bla. Com. 146; Com. Dig.; Ros. Cr. Ev. Women and infants above, but not those under, the age of discretion are punishable as rioters; 1 Russ. Cr. *387.

In a case growing out of the riots in Pittsburg in 1877, under a statute making a county liable for the property "situated" therein, when destroyed by a mob, the liability was held to attach to property owned by a non-resident of the state, in transit in possession of a common carrier; 90 Pa. 397; s. c. 35 Am. Rep. 670.

In the absence of a statute giving a remedy, municipal corporations are not liable for damages resulting in loss of life from the acts of a mob or riotous assemblage, no matter what the negligence of the city officials may have been; 23 U. S. App. 533. See RIOT; MOB; UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY; PUBLIC MEETING; AFFEAY.

RIOT ACT. The stat. 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5. It forbade the unlawful assembling of twelve persons or more to the disturbance of the peace. If they continue together for one hour after the sheriff, mayor, etc., has commanded them to disperse, such contempt shall be felony. Stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 11, requires that, in order to constitute felony, the riotous act must consist in demolishing, or beginning to demolish, some building; Moz. & W.; Cox & S. Cr. Law 104.

By statute 1 Geo. I., the Riot Act, which is directed to be read in a loud voice by a justice of the peace or other person authorized by the act, is to be in the following words or in words of like effect:—"Our Sovereign Lord the King chargeth and commandeth all persons, being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the act made in the first year of King George for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies. God save the King."

Persons who wilfully obstruct or hinder the reading of the proclamation are guilty of felony, and if the proclamation would have been read had it not been prevented by the interference of any person or persons, any twelve or more persons who remain together after the proclamation would have been read, are guilty of felony, as if the act had been read. See 21 St. Tr. 485.

RIOTOUSLY. In Pleading. A technical word, properly used in an indictment for a riot, which of itself implies violence. 2 Sess. Cas. Sc. 13; 2 Stra. 834; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 489.

RIPA (Lat.). The banks of a river, or the place beyond which the waters do not in their natural course overflow.

An extraordinary overflow does not change the banks of the river. Pothier, Pand. lib. 50. See BANKS; RIVER.

RIPARIAN NATIONS. Those that possess opposite banks or different parts of banks of the same river.

RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS. Those who own the lands bounding upon a watercourse. 4 Mass. 397.

Each riparian proprietor owns that portion of the bed of the river (not navigable) which is adjoining his land usque ad filum aquæ; or, in other words, to the thread or central line of the stream; Hargr. Tracts 5; Holt 499; 3 Dane, Abr. 4; 7 Mass. 496; 5 Wend. 423; 2 Conn. 482; 11 Ohio St. 138; Ang. Wat.-Courses 3; 28 Am. Law Reg. 147, 337; 47 Ill. App. 258; 142 U. S. 254. Where the middle of a stream is the boundary between states or private landowners, that boundary follows any changes in the stream which are due to a gradual accretion or degradation of its banks; 143 U. S. 359; but where a navigable stream suddenly changes its course, the owner of the shore does not acquire title to the abandoned channel; 117 Mo. 33.

Where one had obtained title by adverse possession of land bounded by a stream, it was held that he had not acquired title to the middle line of the stream; 39 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 495. See RIVER; WATER-COURSE; TIDE-WATER; WHARF; ALLUVION; AVULSION; FISHERY; RELICTION; LAKE; ACCRETION.

As to the rights of riparian owners over the bed of navigable waters between high and low water-mark, the decisions are somewhat conflicting, although the general rule is that the riparian owner holds the right of access to the water, subject to the right of the state to improve navigation; Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. 413, 592 et seq.; 81 Pa. 80; 7 W. N. C. Pa. 322; 122 Pa. 191. That the riparian owner has a right of action where his access to the water is cut off by a structure erected between high and low water mark, by a corporation acting under its charter, see L. R. 5 H. L. 418; 10 Wall. 497; 25 Wend. 462; 42 Wisc. 214; s. c. 24 Am. Rep. 394, n.; contra, 32 Ia. 106; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 176; 8 Cow. 146; 34 N. J. 532; 3 Am. Rep. 269. Where, by the action of the sea, the sea front was cut off between certain points, and a beach formed outside the main-land, divided from it by a navigable bay, the title to the new formation was held to be in the owners of the part cut off; 61 How. Pr. 197. See 95 Ill. 84; 85 Ia. 241. An owner does not lose his property in the soil by submersion or avulsion if he afterwards reclaims it by natural or artificial means, nor does the length of time during which the soil was submerged bar his rights: 169 Ill. 392.

Where the land of the riparian owner ended in an almost perpendicular bank from five to six feet high, to the foot of which the bed of the river reached, often rising some height above it, and by accretion caused by the planting of trees in the river a short distance from the bank by one who owned the bed of the river and a separate fishery, the accretion was held to be the property of the latter, and not of the riparian owner; [1896] 2 Ch. 1, practically reversing [1896] 1 Ch. 78. In the leading cases of Gould v. Hudson River R. R. Co., 6 N. Y. 522, it was held, Edmonds, J., dissenting, that "whatever rights the owner of the land has in the river, or in its shore below high-water mark, are public rights, which are under the control of the legislative power, and any loss sustained through the act of the legislature affecting them is damnum absque injuria." Government grants for lands bordering upon navigable waters extend only to high-water mark; 85 Fed. Rep. 45. One riparian owner cannot build out into the stream, so as to injure the land of another riparian owner, even when armed with a license granted under act of parliament; L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662. The owner of lands situated on the sea cannot maintain ejectment for that portion of a wharf constructed on his land, which extends below low-water mark; 52 Cal. 385. The owner of both sides of a stream above tide-water has a right to the ice formed between his boundaries; 14 Chic. Leg. News 83. The intervention of a public road between an estate and a river does not prevent the owner of the estate from being considered as the front or riparian proprietor, when nothing susceptible of private ownership exists between the road and river; 44 La. Ann. 1043. A riparian proprietor of land bordering upon a running stream has a right to the flow of its waters as a natural incident to his estate, and they cannot be lawfully diverted against his consent; 133 U. S. 541.

As to riparian rights, see 10 L. R. A. 207, n.; 3 Kent [427]; RIVER; LAKES.

RIPTOWELL, or REAPTOWEL. A gratuity or reward given to tenants after they had reaped their lord's corn, or done other customary duties. Cowell.

RIPUARIAN LAW. A code of laws of the Franks, who occupied the country upon the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Scheldt, who were collectively known by the name Ripuarians, and their laws as Ripuarian law.

RISKS AND PERILS. In Insurance. Those causes against loss from which the insurer is to be protected in virtue of the contract for insurance.

The risk or peril in a life policy is death; under a fire policy, damage by fire; and under a marine policy, by perils of the seas, usually including fire; and under a policy upon subjects at risk in lake, river, or canal navigation, by perils of the same. See INSURABLE INTEREST; INSURANCE; POLICY; WARRANTY.

Under a marine insurance the risks are from a certain place to a certain other, or from one date to another. The perils usually insured against as "perils of the seas" are—fire, lightning, winds, waves, rocks, shoals, and collisions, and also the perils of hostile capture, piracy, theft, arrest, barratry, and jettisons. 1 Phill. Ins. § 1099. But a distinction is made between the extraordinary action of perils of the seas, for which underwriters are liable, and wear and tear and deterioration by decay, for which they are not liable; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1105. See PERILS OF THE SEA.

Perils of lakes, rivers, etc., are analogous to those of the seas; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1099, n.

Underwriters are not liable for loss occasioned by the gross misconduct of the assured or imputable to him; Biddle, Ins. 981; but if a vessel is seaworthy, with suitable officers and crew, underwriters are liable for loss though occasioned through the mistakes or want of assiduity and vigilance of the officers or men; 1 Phill. Ins. § 1049; Beach, Ins. 923. Underwriters are not answerable for loss directly attributable to the qualifications of the insured subject, independently of the specified risks; 1 Phillips, Ins. c. xiii. sect. v.; or for loss distinctly occasioned by the fraudulent or gross negligence of the assured.

Insurance against illegal risks—such as trading with an enemy, the slave-trade, piratical cruisers, and illegal kinds of business—is void; 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 210, 691. Policies usually contain express exceptions of some risks besides those impliedly excepted. These may be—in maritime insurance, contraband and illicit, interloping trade, violation of blockade, mobs and civil commotions; in fire policies, loss on jewelry, paintings, sculpture, by hazardous trades, etc.; in life policies, loss by suicide, risk in certain climates or localities, and in certain hazardous employments without express permission; 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 55, 63, 64. See LOSS; TOTAL LOSS; AVERAGE.

RIVAGE. In French law, the shore, as of the sea. In English law, a toll anciently paid to the crown for the passage of boats or vessels on certain rivers. Cowel.

RIVER. A natural stream of water flowing betwixt banks or walls in a bed of considerable depth and width, being so called whether its current sets always one way or flows and reflows with the tide. Woolrych, Wat. 40; 16 N. H. 467.

A body of flowing water; a running stream of no specific dimensions, larger than a brook or rivulet, and pent on either side by walls or banks; 7 Ind. App. 309.

Rivers are either public or private. Public rivers are divided into navigable and non-navigable,—the distinction being that the former flow and reflow with the tide, while the latter do not. Both are navigable in the popular sense of the term; Ang. Tide-Wat. 74; 7 Pet. 324; 5 Pick. 199; 26 Wend. 404; 4 B. & C. 602.

At common law, the bed or soil of all rivers subject to the ebb and flow of the tide, to the extent of such ebb and flow, belongs to the crown; and the bed or soil of all rivers above the ebb and flow of the tide, or in which there is no tidal effect, belongs to the riparian proprietors, each owning to the centre or thread,—ad filum aquæ, which see,—where the opposite banks belong to different persons; Ang. Tide-Wat. 20; Daveis 149; 5 B. & Ald. 268. In this country the common law has been recognized as the law of many of the states,—the state succeeding to the right of the crown; 4 Pick. 268; 26 Wend. 404; 31 Me. 9; 1 Halst. 1; 2 Conn. 481; 2 Swan 9; 16 Ohio 540; 4 Wis. 486; 117 Mo. 33. See 146 U. S. 387. But in some states the common-law distinction founded on the tide is not recognized, and it is held that the ownership of the bed of soil of all rivers navigable for any useful purpose of trade or agriculture, whether tidal or fresh-water, is in the state; 2 Binn. 475; 14 S. & R. 71; 3 Ired. 277; 1 M'Cord 580; 3 Ia. 1; 29 Miss. 21; 11 Ala. 436; 71 Hun 153; 122 Pa. 191. See 152 U. S. 1. At common law, the ownership of the crown extends to high-water mark; Ang. Tide-Wat. 69; 3 B. & Ald. 967; and in several states this rule has been followed; 12 Barb. 616; 3 Zabr. 624; 7 Cush. 53; 7 Pet. 324; 3 How. 221; 25 Conn. 346; 44 N. J. Eq. 398; 124 U. S. 656; but in others it has been modified by extending the ownership of the riparian proprietor, subject to the servitudes of navigation and fishery, to low-water mark; 28 Pa. 206; 14 B. Monr. 367; 11 Ohio 138; 95 Ala. 116; see 122 Pa. 191; 84 Ky. 372; unless these decisions may be explained as applying to fresh water rivers; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 224.

In Wisconsin the riparian ownership extends to the centre or thread of the stream, subject, if such stream be navigable, to the right of the public to its use as a public highway for the passage of vessels; 142 U. S. 254.

In Michigan, a grant of land bounded by a stream, whether navigable or not, carries with it the bed of the stream to the centre line thereof; 159 U. S. 87.

So in Ohio it was held that the ownership of a riparian proprietor to the middle of a navigable river does not carry with it the right to the exclusive use of the water over land ordinarily covered by water, but is subordinate to the paramount easement of navigation by the public, which includes the right to use such water for navigation and commerce, and such uses as may be reasonably incident thereto: Pollock v. Cleveland Ship Building Co., Ohio Sup. Ct., June 22, 1897. Among the rights of the public is that of mooring vessels for repairs and of putting in engine, boilers, and machinery, after such vessels have been launched; id. The right of the public does not extend to the use of lands not covered by water, and such use may be prevented by injunction, although the land may be unimproved and there is no present damage; id.

Upon the acquisition of territory by the United States, whether by cession from one of the states, or by treaty with a foreign country, or by discovery and settlement, the title and dominion over land under tide water passes to the United States for the benefit of the whole people and in trust for the several states; 152 U. S. 1.

In England, many rivers originally private have become public, as regards the right of navigation, either by immemorial use or by acts of parliament; Woolr. Wat. 40. In this country, all rivers, whether tidal or fresh-water, are, of common right, navigable highways, if naturally capable of use for the floating of vessels, boats, rafts, or even logs, or "whenever they are found of sufficient capacity to float the products of the mines, the forests, or the tillage of the country through which they flow, to market;" 8 Barb. 239; 31 Me. 9; 3 N. H. 321; 10 Ill. 351; 2 Swan 9; 2 Mich. 519; 5 Ind. 8. As to the navigability of rivers. See NAVIGABLE WATERS. The state has the right to improve all such rivers, and to regulate them by lawful enactments for the public good; 4 Rich. 69; 31 Me. 361; 5 Ind. 13; 29 Miss. 21. Any obstruction of them without legislative authority is a nuisance, and any persons having occasion to use the river may abate the same, or, if injured thereby, may receive his damages from its author: 28 Pa. 195; 4 Wisc. 454; 4 Cal. 180; 10 Mass. 70; 1 McCrary 281; 80 N. Y. 239; 53 Md. 422; 8 Mo. App. 266. See BRIDGE. One who seeks to abate an obstruction in a navigable stream and for an injunction must allege and show that the commerce for which he would utilize the stream is lawful; 50 Fed. Rep. 429. By the ordinance of 1787, art. 4, relating to the northwestern territory, it is provided that the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying-places between the same, shall be common highways and forever free; 29 Miss. 21; 2 Mich. 519.

Congress has absolute power over the navigable waters of the United States and may declare what constitutes obstruction thereto. The act of March 1, 1893, created a California débris commission and prohibited hydraulic mining "directly or indirectly injuring the navigability" of the Sacramento and San Joaquin river systems; the commission may, on petition, grant permission to mine. The act is intended to prohibit such mining until such permission is granted; 81 Fed. Rep. 243, affirmed in 48 U. S. App. 2; s. c. 83 Fed. Rep. 2. See 7 Yale L. J. 385.

To bring obstructions and nuisances in navigable waters within a state within the cognizance of the federal courts, there must be a federal statute directly applicable to such streams; 81 Fed. Rep. 658.

Rivers, when naturally unfit for public use, as above described, are called private rivers. They are the private property of the riparian proprietors, and cannot be appropriated to public use, as highways, by deepening or improving their channels, without compensation to their owners; 16 Ohio 540; 6 Barb. 265; 8 Pa. 379; 10 Me. 278; 1 McCord 580. And see WATER-COURSE.

A river, then, may be considered—as private in the case of shallow and obstructed streams; as private property, but subject to public use, when it can be navigated; and as public, both with regard to its use and property. Some rivers possess all these qualities. The Hudson is mentioned as an instance; in one part it is entirely private property; in another, the public have the use of it; and it is public property from the mouth as high up as the tide flows; 6 Barb. 265. See, generally, La. Civ. Code 444; Bac. Abr. Prerogatives (B 3); Jacobsen, Sea Laws; 3 Kent 411; Woolr. Waters; Schultes, Aquatic Rights; Washb. R. P.; Cruise, Dig., Greenl. ed.; BOUNDARIES; FISHERY; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; POLLUTION.

In International Law. A river which is entirely within a state is part of its territory. Where a river forms a boundary between two states and flows to the ocean, it is "now generally considered that the right of navigation, for commercial purposes, is common to all the states inhabiting the different parts of its banks; but this is a right of innocent passage only, subject to the regulations of the abutting state. These rights have usually been adjusted by treaty; the Rhine is free in its whole navigable length, under the Congress of Vienna; and so of most of the other large rivers of Europe. In 1795, the free navigation of the Mississippi was secured to the United States by treaty. After much controversy, the St. Lawrence was, in 1871, stipulated to be free to the United States for the purposes of commerce, from the point where it ceased to be a boundary between it and Canada, to the sea, subject to the regulations of Great Britain or Canada, not inconsistent with such privilege. See 1 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 171.

Levees. The construction and maintenance of levees is an important subject of legislation in the states bordering on the Mississippi river and its tributaries. Such statutes usually provide for the construction of levees by some public authorities or under delegated power of eminent domain, and provide for a charge on the land benefited thereby for making and repairing the same. This tax is usually a lien on the land and applies to all lands lying within a certain specified distance of the Mississippi river. It has been held that such taxation is constitutional, and that the power, whether exercised for general or local purposes, belongs to the legislature and is not subject to interference from the court; 27 Miss. 209. The legislature has power to impose local taxation for such purposes, and laws imposing taxes upon certain districts, whether the citizens affected are of the same political division, subdivision, or district or not, are constitutional; 38 Miss. 652.

The building of the levees is a proper subject of legislation and a general tax may be levied therefor; 26 La. Ann. 564; 22 id. 58. In Louisiana, it has been made a criminal offence to cut levees; Laws 1875, 49. Crevasses in the district, do not release the owner of the land from the levee tax; there is in such case a greater necessity for its payment; 16 La. Ann. 440.

RIXA (Lat.). In Civil Law. A dispute; a quarrel. Dig. 48. 8. 17.

RIXATRIX (Lat.). A common scold.

ROAD. A passage through the country for the use of the people. 3 Yeates 421; and it is frequently used as a synonym of railroad; 46 N. J. L. 292; 33 Fed. Rep. 699; as when a charter power to take stock in companies for making "roads" to a city was held to authorize a subscription to the stock of a railroad; 161 U. S. 434.

A state statute imposing a duty of two days' labor in every year on each person for the purpose of keeping roads in repair is not unconstitutional; 91 Ga. 770; 36 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 832. As to the constitutionality of an act authorizing the establishment of a private way over property of another, see EMINENT DOMAIN, where the cases are collected, and see also 4 Ore. 318, where such an act was held unconstitutional. See HIGHWAY; WAY; STREET; DEDICATION; EASEMENT.

In Maritime Law. An open passage of the sea, which, from the situation of the adjacent land and its own depth and width, affords a secure place for the common riding and anchoring of vessels. Hale, de Port. Mar. p. 2, c. 2. This word, however, does not appear to have a very definite meaning; 2 Chitty, Com. Law 4, 5. Often called "roadstead"; 2 Hugh. 17.

ROADBED, ROADWAY. The roadbed of a railroad "is the foundation upon which the superstructure of a railroad rests;" the roadway is the right of way which has been held to be the property liable to taxation; 32 Cal. 499, cited in 118 U. S. 413. See 25 Md. 353. The roadbed does not include ends of ties of unusual length; 60 Ark. 681. A space of 10 ft. between railroad tracks is not the roadbed; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 578.

ROBBATOR. A robber. Bract.

ROBBER. One who commits a robbery. One who feloniously and forcibly takes goods or money to any value from the person of another by violence or putting him in fear.

ROBBERY. In Criminal Law. The felonious and forcible taking from the person of another, goods or money to any value, by violence or putting him in fear. 4 Bla. Com. 243; Baldw. 102. See 12 Ga. 293; 33 Neb. 354; 2 N. Dak. 510; 28 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 868.

In this offence the kind and value of the property taken is not material, but it must be of some value, however little, to the person robbed; 61 Ala. 287; 73 N. C. 83; 58 Mo. 581.

Robbery, by the common law, is larceny from the person, accompanied by violence or by putting in fear; and an indictment therefor must allege that the taking was from the person, and that it was by violence, or by putting in fear, in addition to the averments that are necessary in indictments for other larcenies; Jebb 62; 1 Leach 195; 7 Mass. 242; 17 id. 539; 8 Cush. 215.

By "taking from the person" is meant not only the immediate taking from his person, but also in his presence when it is done with violence and against his consent; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 533; 2 Russ. Cr. 61; 3 Wash. C. C. 209; 11 Humphr. 167; Whart. C. L. 847. The taking must be by violence or putting the owner in fear; but both these circumstances need not concur; for if a man should be knocked down, and then robbed while he is insensible, the offence is still a robbery; 4 Binn. 379. And if the party be put in fear by threats and then robbed, it is not necessary there should be any greater violence; 17 Mass. 539. The violence or putting in fear must be at the time of the act or immediately preceding; 1 C. & P. 304. See 53 Kan. 324.

A person taking property from another under a bona fide claim of right, and with the purpose of applying it to the payment of a debt from the latter to himself, is not guilty of robbery, for in such case the animus furandi is lacking; 90 Ga. 701.

One who is present and aids and abets a robbery is punishable as a principal, though he receives none of the money, and the amount taken is immaterial; 104 Mo. 365.

ROE, RICHARD. See EJECTMENT; PLEDGES.

ROGATORY LETTERS. See LETTERS ROGATORY.

ROGUE. A French word, which in that language signifies proud, arrogant. In some of the ancient English statutes it means an idle sturdy beggar, which is its meaning in law. Rogues are usually punished as vagrants. Although the word rogue is a word of reproach, yet to charge one as a rogue is not actionable; 5 Binn. 219. See 2 Dev. 162; Hard. 529.

ROGUES' GALLERY. See PRISONER.

ROLE D'EQUIPAGE. The list of a ship's crew; the muster roll.

ROLL. A schedule of parchment which may be turned up with the hand in the form of a pipe or tube. Jacob, Law Dict.; 2 Hun 502.

In early times, before paper came in common use, parchment was the substance employed for making records, and as the art of bookbinding was but little used, economy suggested as the most convenient mode the adding of sheet to sheet, as was found requisite, and they were tacked together in such a manner that the whole length might be wound up together in the form of spiral rolls. Rolls of the exchequer are kept in that court relating to the revenue. The ancient manuscript registers of the proceedings in parliament were called Rolls of Parliament. A Roll of the Temple is kept in each of the two temples, called the calves' head roll, wherein every bencher, barrister, and student is taxed yearly.

The records of a court or offices.

ROLL OF A MANOR. See COURT ROLLS; COPYHOLD.

ROLLING STOCK. Rolling stock has been held in some cases to be a fixture, so far as to pass under a mortgage of the realty; 25 Ill. 357; 12 Bush 233; 3 Dill. 412. Where essential to the operation of the road, it is held to pass under a mortgage of the railroad; 56 Me. 458; 18 Md. 493; 6 Wall. 142. A mortgage of a railroad afterwards to be built, and of the rolling stock appurtenant to such road, attaches to the rolling stock as soon as it is acquired: 23 How. 117; 6 Biss. 529; 11 Wall. 459; Jones, Railr. Sec. 147. It is not essential that the rolling stock should be especially mentioned in the mortgage; general words are enough. For instance, a mortgage of a line of a railroad "with all the revenue or tolls thereof" covers rolling stock; 18 Md. 183. See also 53 Ala. 237; 4 Biss. 35. See FUTURE ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

Rolling stock has been held to be subject to execution as a chattel; 130 Ind.

97; and to attachment; 140 Mass. 131; so, when not in use; 37 N. H. 410; but where a company is insolvent or the equipment is mortgaged, it has been held not subject to execution; 3 Grant, Cas. 384. It is held that it may be sold for taxes as personal property, notwithstanding a statute declaring it to be a fixture; 21 Wis. 44; and see 51 Ia. 184, 714. It is held to be a chattel in 29 N. J. 307, reversing 28 id. 277. The better opinion is said to be that it is personalty; 3 Wood, Rys. 1961, citing 39 Ia. 56; 53 Mo. 17; 54 N. Y. 315; 37 N. H. 410; 29 N. J. Eq. 311.

It is held that a mortgage of rolling stock should be recorded as a chattel mortgage; 29 N. J. Eq. 311; but it has also been held that chattel mortgage acts do not apply; 105 U. S. 77; 3 Dill. 412. The constitutions of some states provide that rolling stock shall be considered personal property and shall be liable to execution and sale. Such is the case in Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, South Dakota, Texas, Washington, and West Virginia.

Of late years railroad companies have secured large quantities of rolling stock on deferred periodical payments, commonly known as the "car trust" plan. The contracts in some instances are drawn as leases from the builder or owner to the railroad company. In other cases they take the form of conditional sales. The earliest car trust was created in Pennsylvania in 1868. It is probable that the form of a lease or hiring of the cars, with a reservation of title in the former owner, was rendered necessary in that state because of the well-established rule there that a reservation of title under a conditional sale of a chattel is void as against the vendee's creditors, when the vendee is in possession. See SALES. The weight of authority would seem to hold that such contracts, though drawn in the form of bailments, if the aggregate of all the instalments is really the purchase price and the contract gives the "bailee" an option to purchase when all the payments have been made, are, in legal effect, conditional sales. It was said in 93 U. S. 664, in holding such a contract to be a conditional sale: "Nor is the transaction changed by giving it the form of a lease. In determining the real character of a contract, courts will always look to its purpose rather than to the name given it by the parties." So in 54 Vt. 544, the "hire" of an organ was held to be a conditional sale. To the same effect is 102 U. S. 235. See id. 1. In 102 U. S. 1, the court considered it unnecessary to decide the question. In 3 Super. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 149, a "lease" or purchase on the instalment plan was held to be a conditional sale. So of the sale of a clock upon weekly payments, the aggregate of which amounted to the price of the article; 166 Pa. 89; s. c. 27 L. R. A. 388; but see 115 Pa. 487. In 84 Fed. Rep. 582, it was held that whether a contract for the sale of fixed machinery was a bailment or a conditional sale depended upon the intent of the parties. The contract there was held a bailment.

Statutes have been passed in nearly all the states and territories providing that conditional sales or contracts of leasing or hiring of railroad equipment shall be valid if duly acknowledged and recorded, and the name of the vendor, etc., placed on both sides of each car. Most of these acts are substantially uniform in their language. There is some diversity among them as to the place of record, some specifying the county where the principal office of the vendee is, others the counties through which its line runs, and still others the office of the secretary of state. Many of these acts were passed through the instrumentality of Joseph I. Doran, Esq., in 1881 to 1883, and others were passed in 1891 and subsequently, by the efforts of the present editor. An existing statute in Utah covers the necessary ground for the protection of these contracts. No acts exist in California, Idaho, or Nevada.

The lien on, or title to, cars thus sold is not subordinate to the lien of the company's mortgage; 99 U. S. 256; even if the contract has not been recorded; 102 U. S. 1.

Contracts of this kind usually contain a clause that the vendor or lessor may retake the property on default in the payment of instalments. Statutes in some of the states forbid the retaking of chattels sold under the instalment plan except upon the condition of refunding the purchase-money paid, less a certain proportion to cover the depreciation. See 46 Ohio St. 450.

There is a conflict of authority as to the right of the vendor to collect unpaid purchase-money after retaking the property. Some cases hold that the retaking excludes further recovery; other cases hold that the remedies are not inconsistent. See 82 L. R. A. 455, where the cases are collected. The fact that the property has been destroyed after possession has passed to the conditional vendee or lessee does not relieve him from making the periodical payments: 107 N. C. 47; 66 Miss. 48; 58 Ill. 248; contra, 2 Tex. App. 153. See also 111 Mass. 355.

Usually a clause is inserted covering this ground, and the contract provides that the vendor, upon retaking, shall sell the property and credit the proceeds on the unpaid instalments, holding the vendee for the residue then remaining unpaid.

The usual lease notes or warrants given to cover the periodical payments have been held to be negotiable instruments; 136 U. S. 268.

A car trust association is an association of capitalists formed to buy and sell rolling stock, usually for a particular road. The members furnish the funds to buy the property and the association transfers it to the railroad company, usually through the intervention of a trustee, under a conditional sale (sometimes in the form of a lease), the purchase-money being payable in a series of years, by instalments, and the title to pass in the railroad company upon the payment of the final instalment.

The trustee issues certificates to the members of the association indicating the amount of their investment. The railroad company pays the instalments with interest to the trustee, who distributes to the holders of the certificates. Such an association has been held to be a partnership; 140 U. S. 346; but in 29 Fed. Rep. 410, such an association was held to be an unincorporated association resembling those partnerships which are not dissolved by the death or bankruptcy of a member, or by the assignment of a member's interest, and such as are referred to in 102 U. S. 64; 114 id. 252. They are analogous to mining partnership; 23 Cal. 206. See PARTNERSHIP. They are said to be unincorporated joint stock associations with transferable shares; Poll. Contr. 222.

As to the status of car trust cars under railroad receiverships, see LEASE; MORTGAGE; RECEIVER; RECEIVERS' CERTIFICATES.

See a pamphlet by Davis & Browne, and a paper by the present editor in Am. Bar Asso. Reports (1885).

Cars of other companies in use on a railroad are materials furnished for its operation, and claims for their loss when destroyed are properly payable by the receivers as operating expenses; 88 Fed. Rep. 636.

A railroad company receiving the cars of other companies to be hauled in its trains is bound to inspect such cars before putting them on its trains, and is responsible for the consequence of defects in them which might have been discovered by a reasonable inspection; 157 U. S. 72.

See LEX REI SITÆ.

ROLLING STOCK (OF RAILWAYS) PROTECTION ACT. The act of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 50, passed to protect the rolling stock of railways from distress or sale in certain cases.

ROLLS, MASTER OF THE. See MASTER OF THE ROLLS; JUDICATURE ACTS.

ROLLS OFFICE OF THE CHANCERY. An office in Chancery Lane, London, which contains rolls and records of the high court of chancery, of which the master of the rolls is keeper.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES ACT. The stat. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 134, providing a method for enjoying estates given upon trust for Roman Catholics, but invalidated by reason of certain of the trusts being superstitious or otherwise illegal. 3 Steph. Com. 76. See SUPERSTITIOUS USES; CHARITIES.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. See PAPACY.

ROMAN LAW. See CIVIL LAW.

ROME PENNY, ROME SCOT, or ROME FEOH. See PETER PENCE.

ROMNEY MARSH. A tract of land in the county of Kent, England, containing twenty-four thousand acres, governed by certain ancient and equitable laws of sewers, composed by Henry de Bathe, a venerable judge in the reign of king Henry III.; from which laws all commissioners of sewers in England may receive light and direction. 3 Steph. Com. 442; 3 Bla. Com. 73.

ROOD OF LAND. The fourth part of an acre.

ROOT. The part of a tree or plant under ground from which it draws most of its nourishment from the earth. See TREE.

In a figurative sense, root is used to signify the person from whom one or more others are descended. See CONSANGUINITY; LINE.

ROTA (Lat.). A court. A celebrated court of appeals at Rome, of which one judge must be a German, one a Frenchman, two Spaniards, and eight Italians. Encyc. Brit. Its decisions had great weight, but were not law, although judged by the law. There was also a celebrated rota at Genoa about the sixteenth century, or before, whose decisions in maritime matters form the first part of Straccha de Merc. See Ingersoll's Roccus.

ROTURIER. In Old French Law. One not noble. Dict. de l'Acad. Franç. A free commoner; one who did not hold his land by homage and fealty, yet owed certain services. Howard, Dict. de Normande.

ROUP. In Scotch Law. Sale by auction. Auction. Bell, Dict. Auction.

ROUT. A disturbance of the peace by persons assembled together with an intention to do a thing which if executed would have made them rioters, and actually making a motion towards the execution of their purpose. Hawk. Pl. C. 516.

It generally agrees in all particulars with a riot, except only in this: that it may be a complete offence without the execution of the intended enterprise; id. c. 65, s. 14; 1 Russ. Cr. 253; 4 Bla. Com. 140. Where a number of persons met, staked money, and agreed to engage in a prize-fight, it was held a rout; 2 Speers 599. Not less than three assembled persons are sufficient to constitute the offence; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1186. See RIOT.

ROUTOUSLY. A technical word, properly used in indictments for a rout as descriptive of the offence. 2 Salk. 593.

ROYAL BURGHS. Boroughs incorporated in Scotland by royal charter. Bell.

ROYAL ASSENT. See LE ROI LE VEUT; VETO.

ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE. The buildings, together with all the additions thereto, erected under the statute 28 & 29 Vict. c. 48, 49.

ROYAL FISH. See FISH ROYAL.

ROYAL GRANTS. Conveyances of record in England. They are of two kinds: letters patent and letters close; 2 Bla. Com. 346. See PATENT.

ROYAL HONORS. In diplomatic language, by this term is understood the rights enjoyed by every empire or kingdom in Europe, by the pope, the grand duchies of Germany, and the Swiss confederation, to precedence over all others who do not enjoy the same rank, with the exclusive right of sending to other states public ministers of the first rank, as ambassadors, together with other distinctive titles and ceremonies. Vattel, Law of Nat. b. 2, c. 3, § 38; Wheat. Int. Law pt. 2, c. 3, § 2.

ROYAL MINES. See MINES AND MINING.

ROYALTY. A payment reserved by the grantor of a patent, mining lease, etc., and payable proportionately to the use made of such right., 1 Ex. Div. 310. See PATENT.

RUBRIC. The title or inscription of any law or statute; because the copyists formerly drew and painted the title of laws and statutes in red letters (rubro colore). Ayliffe, Pand. b. 1, t. 8; Dict. de Jur.

RUDENESS. An impolite action, contrary to the usual rules observed in society, committed by one person against another. This is a relative term, which it is difficult to define, and must be considered with reference to the station in life which the parties occupy; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 731. See BATTERY.

RULE. A regulation or formula to which conduct must be conformed. See GENERAL RULES.

An order or direction. See ORDER.

To establish by direction; to determine; to decide.

RULE ABSOLUTE. If, upon the hearing of a rule to show cause, the cause shown should be decided insufficient, the rule is made absolute, i. e. the court makes final order for the party to perform the requirements of the rule. See RULE NISI.

RULE DAY. The regularly appointed day on which to make orders to show cause returnable.

In the United States circuit court it is the first Monday of each month, on which subpœnas are to be made returnable, and answers and replications filed.

RULE IN SHELLEY'S CASE. See SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN.

RULE NISI. In Practice. A rule obtained on motion ex parte to show cause against the particular relief sought. Notice is served on the party against whom the rule is obtained, and the case is then heard like other motions, except that the party showing cause is entitled to open and reply. The rule is made absolute unless (nisi) good cause is shown against it; 3 Steph. Com. 680.

RULE OF COURSE. A rule which a court authorizes their officers to grant without formal application to a judge.

RULE OF COURT. An order made by a court having competent jurisdiction.

Rules of court are either general or special; the former are the laws by which the practice of the court is governed; the latter are special orders made in particular cases.

Disobedience to these is punished by giving judgment against the disobedient party, or by attachment for contempt.

RULE OF LAW. A general principle of law, recognized as such by authorities. It is called a rule because in new cases it is a rule for their decision; it embraces particular cases within general principles; 1 Bla. Com. 44; Ram, Judgm. 30; 3 B. & Ad. 34; 1 B. & C. 86; 4 Maule & S. 348. See MAXIM.

RULE OF 1793. Where a commerce which had previously been considered a nominal monopoly is thrown open, in time of war, to all nations, by a general regulation, neutrals have no right to avail themselves of the concession, and their entrance on such trade is a breach of the impartiality they are bound to observe. 2 Halleck, Int. L. 302.

RULE OF THE ROAD. See NAVIGATION RULES; HIGHWAY; BICYCLES.

RULE OF THE WAR OF 1756. A rule relating to neutrals, practically established in 1756, and universally promulgated, providing that "neutrals are not to carry on in times of war a trade which was interdicted to them in times of peace." Chitty, Law of Nat. 166; 2 C. Rob. 186; 4 id. App.; 1 Kent 82.

RULE TO PLEAD. A rule of court requiring defendant to plead within a given time, entered as of course by the plaintiff on filing his declaration, or thereafter. On defendant's failure to put in his plea accordingly, a judgment in the nature of a judgment by default may be entered against him. In England, under the common-law Procedure Act of 1852, the rule to plead is abolished, a notice to plead indorsed on the declaration being sufficient. The Judicature Act of 1875 allows the defendant eight days for his defence after the delivery of the statement of claim.

RULE TO SHOW CAUSE. An order made by the court, in a particular case, upon motion of one of the parties calling upon the other to appear at a particular time before the court, to show cause, if any he have, why a certain thing should not be done.

This rule is granted generally upon the oath or affirmation of the applicant; but upon the hearing the evidence of competent witnesses must be given to support the rule, and the affidavit of the applicant is insufficient. See RULE ABSOLUTE; RULE NISI.

RULES. Certain limits without the actual walls of the prisons, where the prisoner, on proper security previously given to the proper authority, may reside. These limits are considered, for all legal and practical purposes, as merely a further extension of the prison walls. So used in America. See 3 Bibb 202. The rules or permission to reside without the prison may be obtained by any person not committed criminally; 2 Stra. 845; nor for contempt; id. 817; by satisfying the marshal or warden or other authority of the security with which he may grant such permission.

Proceedings in an action out of court, and in vacation time. See 12 Gratt. 312.

RULES OF PRACTICE. Certain orders made by the courts for the purpose of regulating the practice of members of the bar and others.

Every court of record has an inherent power to make rules for the transaction of its business; which rules they may from time to time change, alter, rescind, or repeal. While they are in force, they must be applied to all cases which fall within them; they can use no discretion, unless such discretion is authorized by the rules themselves. Rules of court cannot, of course, contravene the constitution or the law of the land; 3 Pick. 512; 2 Harr. & J. 79; 1 Pet. 604; 3 S. & R. 253.

RUMOR. A general public report of certain things, without any certainty as to their truth.

In general, rumor cannot be received in evidence; but when the question is whether such rumor existed, and not its truth or falsehood, then evidence of it may be given. See LIBEL; EVIDENCE.

RUN. A watercourse of a small size. 2 Bibb 354. The word is sometimes used interchangeably with creek. 7 Wheat. 162.

RUNCINUS (Lat.). A nag. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 471.

RUNNING ACCOUNT. An open account. See 2 Pars. Contr. 351; ACCOUNT; MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS; LIMITATIONS.

RUNNING AT LARGE. A term applied to animals estray, wandering apparently without owner or keeper, and not confined to any certain place. The phrase has been judicially construed in a number of recent cases. In 50 Vt. 130, a hound, in close pursuit of a fox, and out of sight and hearing of its master, was held not to be within the meaning of a statute permitting any one to kill a dog "running at large off the premises of the owner or keeper, without a collar with the keeper's name on it." Animals escaping from the owner's premises cannot be said to be running at large; the phrase implies permission or assent, or at least some fault, on the owner's part; 21 Hun 249; but contra, 53 Ia. 632. See 52 Cal. 653; 23 Alb. L. J. 504. An animal running on the range where it was permitted to run by its owner has been held not an estray, especially where the owner was known to the person taking it up; 4 Oreg. 206; 27 Wisc. 422; 29 Ia. 437. See ESTRAY; POUND.

RUNNING DAYS. Days counted in succession, without any allowance for holidays. The term is used in settling lay-days or days of demurrage, which see.

RUNNING LANDS. In Scotch Law. Lands where the ridges of a field belong alternately to different proprietors. Bell, Dict.

RUNNING OF THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. A metaphorical expression, by which is meant that the time mentioned in the statute of limitations is considered as passing. See LIMITATIONS.

RUNNING POLICY. One which contemplates successive insurance and provides that the object of the policy may be from time to time defined by additional statements or indorsements. Cal. Civ. Code § 2597.

RUNNING WITH THE LAND. A technical expression applied to covenants real which affect the land. See COVENANT.

RURAL SERVITUDE. See SERVITUDE.

RUSE DE GUERRE (Fr.). Literally, a trick in war. A stratagem. It is said to be lawful among belligerents, provided it does not involve treachery and falsehood. Grotius, Droit de la Guerre, liv. 3, c. 1, § 9.

RUSTICUM JUDICIUM. A rough judgment or decision, applied in maritime law when the blame for a collision is undiscoverable. 3 Kent 231.

RUTA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name given to those things which are extracted or taken from land: as, sand, chalk, coal, and such other things. Pothier, Pand. l. 50.

RYOT. In India. A peasant, subject, or tenant of house or land. Whart. Dict.

S.

S S. A collar formerly worn on state occasions by the Lord Chief Justice of England, and of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron—now only by the first named of these (q. v.).

SABBATH. A name sometimes used for Sunday (q. v.).

Sabbath and Sunday are used indiscriminately to denote the Christian Sabbath, Sunday ; 64 N. C. 591.

SABBATH-BREAKING. The desecration of the Lord's day. 45 Md. 432. See SUNDAY.

SABBULONARIUM. A gravel pit, or liberty to dig gravel and sand ; money paid for the same. Cowel.

SABINIANS. A sect of lawyers whose first chief was Atteius Capito, and the second Cælius Sabinus, from whom they derived their name. Clef des lois Rom.

SABLE. The heraldic term for black. It is called Saturn by those who blazon by planets, and Diamond by those who use the names of jewels. Engravers commonly represent it by numerous perpendicular and horizontal lines crossing each other. Whart. Law Lex.

SAC, SAK (Lat. saca or sacha). An ancient privilege, which a lord of a manor claimed to have in his court, of holding plea in causes of trespass arising among his tenants, and imposing fines touching the same.

SACABURTH, SACABERE (from sac, cause, and burh, pledge). He that is robbed and puts in surety to prosecute the felon with fresh suit. Britton, c. 15, 29 ; Bracton, l. 3, c. 32 ; Cowel.

SACCUS CUM BROCHIA. A service or tenure of sending a sack and a broach (pitcher) to the sovereign for the use of the army. Bract. l. 2, c. 16.

SACQUIER. In Maritime Law. The name of an ancient officer, whose business was to load and unload vessels laden with salt, corn, or fish, to prevent the ship's crew defrauding the merchant by false tale, or cheating him of his merchandise otherwise. Laws of Oleron, art. 11, published in an English translation in 1 Pet. Adm. XXV. See ARRAMEUR ; STEVEDORE.

SACRAMENTALES (L. Lat. sacramentum, oath). Compurgatores, which see. Jurors. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.

SACRAMENTUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A gage in money laid down in court by both parties that went to law, returned to him who had the verdict on his side, but forfeited by the party who was cast, to the exchequer, to be laid out in sacris rebus, and therefore so called. Varro, lib. 4. de Ling. Lat. c. 36.

An oath, as a very sacred thing. Ainsworth, Dict. ; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

Sacramentum Fidelitatis. The oath of fealty. See FEALTY.

The oath taken by soldiers to be true to their general and country. Id.

SACRAMENTUM DECISIONIS (Lat.). The voluntary or decisive oath of the civil law, where one of the parties to a suit, not being able to prove his case, offers to refer the decision of the cause to the oath of his adversary, who is bound to accept or make the same offer on his part, or the whole is considered as confessed by him. 3 Bla. Com. 342.

SACRILEGE, SACRILEGIUM. The act of stealing, from the temples or churches dedicated to the worship of God, articles consecrated to divine uses. Ayliffe, Parerg. 476 ; Cowell. Also, the alienation to laymen of property given to pious uses. Par. Ant. 390.

SÆMEND. An umpire, arbitrator. Anc. Inst. Eng.

SÆVITIA (Lat.). Cruelty. To constitute sævitia there must be such a degree of cruelty as to endanger the party's suffering bodily hurt. 1 Hagg. Cons. 35 ; 2 Mass. 150 ; 4 id. 587.

SAFE-CONDUCT. A written permission given by a belligerent government, or one of its naval or military commanders, enabling an enemy subject to go to a particular place for a particular object. Risley, Law of War 156.

According to common usage, the term passport is employed on ordinary occasions for the permission given to persons when there is no reason why they should not go where they please ; and safe-conduct is the name given to the instrument which authorizes certain persons, as enemies, to go into places where they could not go without danger unless thus authorized by the government.

A safe-conduct is said to be a name given to an instrument which authorizes an enemy or an alien to go into places where he could not go without danger, or to carry on trade forbidden by the laws of war ; it may cover either persons or things, while a passport usually is given to a friend and applies only to persons. 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 323.

They may be given for a certain time only and revoked for cause, the holder being allowed to withdraw in safety.

The grantor of the safe-conduct tacitly pledges himself to protect the holder of it and to punish any person subject to his command who may violate it. Should the holder be detained beyond the time limited, by illness or some cause over which he has no control, he should still be protected, but if he otherwise exceeds the limited time, he is subject to the ordinary rules of war or to penalties, if such are imposed by the law of the place; Risley, L. of War 156.

For a limited territory, they may be framed by a commander; but when general, they must proceed from the supreme authority.

The name of an instrument given to the captain or master of a ship to proceed on a particular voyage: it usually contains his name and residence, the name, description, and destination of the ship, with such other matters as the practice of the place requires. This document is indispensably necessary for the safety of every neutral ship.

The act of congress of April 30, 1790, s. 27, punishes the violation of any safe-conduct or passport granted under the authority of the United States, on conviction, with imprisonment, not exceeding three years, and a fine at the discretion of the court.

See PASSPORT; 18 Viner, Abr. 272.

SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY. A company which maintains vaults for the deposit and safekeeping of valuables in which compartments or boxes are rented to customers who have exclusive access thereto, subject to the oversight and under the rules and regulations of the company. It was formerly the custom for banks to accept gratuitously the custody of boxes containing securities for their customers; but this custom has been discontinued since the establishment of companies making that their special business. The relation of the company to the depositor is rather that of bailor and bailee, though it has been said that there is a resemblance to the relation of landlord and tenant, but that it exists merely in form; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 131; but a case of joint renting, cited infra, seems to the contrary. The reasons given for the relation of bailor and bailee are that by analogy to the case of an agreement for board and lodging, there is no interest acquired by the depositor in the real estate, and the agreement of the company for safekeeping established the relation of bailor and bailee; id. 132. This view has been sustained in the courts; 123 N. Y. 57; 90 id. 4. In the latter case the plaintiff had an allotment of space in a storage house for the safekeeping of household furniture under an agreement that the same would be securely kept and guarded. The action was brought to recover damages for the loss of the property by theft committed by persons in charge of the building, and the relation of the parties was described by Earl, J., as "a species of bailment like that existing in the case of a depositor in a safe deposit company who hires a box for his valuables and keeps the key." In such case he says further, that the company, without special contract, would be held to at least ordinary care, the duty of which would arise from the nature of the business and the relation of the parties.

From this relation springs naturally the obligation and liability of the company, and where the contract was that the depositor was to "keep a constant and adequate guard and watch over and upon the safe," and the bonds were stolen, there being no evidence that the vault was broken or the lock tampered with, it was held to throw upon the company the burden of showing whether it was guilty of negligence, and that question was properly left to the jury; 85 Pa. 391.

Where property was taken from the safe under a search warrant against the depositor, the description in which did not actually correspond with the property taken, the company was held liable for not resisting so far as it was able to do, and contenting itself with a mere protest; 158 N. Y. 57. The burden of proof in actions against such companies for damages on account of negligence is, in accordance with the general rule in similar cases, upon the plaintiff unless, as in the Pennsylvania case above cited, there is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant which demands an explanation and a prima facie case is made by the bailor when he shows such loss or damage to the chattels as ordinarily does not happen if such care as the law requires has been exercised; Edw. Bailm. § 399; 14 Mo. App. 431; 46 N. Y. 490; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 134.

An important question arises as to the position and duty of the company where legal proceedings are taken against the property of the depositor, and the conclusion from an examination of the subject is thus stated: "The extent of their duty is reached in satisfying themselves beyond question that the process is legal and regular; and that, this being so, the company is exempt from all responsibility for the subsequent acts of the officer under it; . . . that the company cannot be subjected to garnishment or trustee process; that the only process by which property deposited with it can be reached is through seizure by the sheriff under direct attachment; also that the company is not liable for property of third persons taken from the safe of the debtor, either as his property or because confused with this property." 9 Harv. L. Rev. 135. That there can be no garnishment in such case would seem to arise from the principle that to be subjected to it, a bailee must have more than constructive possession; as, in the case of baggage in transportation, horses in a livery stable, etc.; Waples, Attachment § 453. The point was directly decided with respect to a safe deposit company in 8 Phila. 91; and as to a locked trunk deposited in a bank vault in 7 Cush. 487.

The property in the safe may be seized under a direct attachment; 67 Barb. 304; 123 N. Y. 57. The officer may be directed in the order of attachment to open the safe, and the company's officers may be required to give such assistance as will not lead to a breach of trust; 9 Harv. L. Rev. 139. It has been held that an officer may force the door of a warehouse if refused admittance by those in charge of it; 18 Vt. 186; and in the case of a safe deposit company the officers and representatives of the company were not allowed to be present at the time of the opening of the safe by the sheriff; 67 Barb. 304.

In case of a joint rental of a safe by two or more persons, they were treated as co-tenants of real estate, and a renewal of the lease obtained by one of the renters in his own name was held to inure to the benefit of the co-tenants; 40 N. Y. St. 813. Where one co-tenant abstracted, without authority, a stock certificate and transferred it to an innocent purchaser for value, it was held that it had not been intrusted to the possession of the wrong-doer either directly or by implication, and he was not authorized to remove it from the box and the transfer passed no title; 52 Fed. Rep. 520.

SAFE LOADING PLACE. A place where a vessel can be rendered safe for loading by reasonable measures of precaution. 14 Q. B. D. 105; 54 L. J. Q. B. 121.

SAFE-PLEDGE. A surety given that a man shall appear upon a certain day. Bracton, l. 4, c. 1.

SAFEGUARD. A protection of the king to one who is a stranger, who fears violence from some of his subjects for seeking his right by course of law. Reg. Orig. 26.

Protection granted by an officer commanding belligerent forces, for persons or property within the limits of their commands, and against the operations of their own troops. 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 325.

SAFELY. "Safely and securely" in a declaration in bailment means with due care. 15 L. J. C. P. 182.

SAID. Before mentioned.

In contracts and pleadings it is usual and proper, when it is desired to speak of a person or thing before mentioned, to designate them by the term said or aforesaid, or by some similar term; otherwise the latter description will be ill for want of certainty. Com. Dig. Pleader (C 18); Gould, Pl. § 68. Adopted in 28 Tex. App. 379.

The reference of the word said is to be determined, in any given case, by the sense. The relative same refers to the next antecedent, but in the interpretation of a written instrument, the word said does so only when the plain meaning requires it; 2 Kent 555; 10 Ind. 373. See 97 Ind. 502.

SAILING. It is sometimes important, in the construction of a charter party, or marine insurance policy, to know when a vessel commenced her voyage, and to this end to determine what constitutes a sailing. It has been held that complete readiness for the sea, with the intention of proceeding at once on the voyage, is sufficient, though head winds should prevent any actual progress; 20 Pick. 275; see 32 Fed. Rep. 842; but the word sail is held to be a technical word and to mean to start on a voyage; 34 L. J. C. P. 195; so a ship which drew out from its wharf and anchored in a river, whence it proceeded the next day, sailed on the latter day; [1898] 1 Q. B. 27. It has also been held that some measurable progress, though by tow-boat, is also necessary; 4 W. N. C. Pa. 415. See NAVIGATION, RULES OF.

If the vessel quits her moorings and removes, though only to a short distance, being perfectly ready to proceed upon her voyage, and is by some subsequent occurrence detained, that is, nevertheless, a sailing; 3 B. & Ad. 514. There can be no "sailing" without a clear intention on the part of the master to proceed directly on his voyage; [1898] 1 Q. B. 27. Moving from the wharf into the stream may be enough; id. See 37 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 201, an article by Erskine Hazard Dickson.

As advanced freight is frequently made payable at or within a certain time after final sailing from the port of loading, there has been much discussion as to the meaning of both of these terms. In the leading English case, Parke, B., considered that final sailing "meant more than if the word sailing were used alone," that it had reference to the particular port of Cardiff, out of which the vessel sailed, meaning a final departure and being out of the limits of the artificial port, at sea, ready to proceed upon her voyage; 23 L. J. Ex. 169. Where the ship left the harbor to anchor in the roadstead and lie there until the crew should be completed, without the intention of returning to the harbor, it was held that she had not sailed; 24 L. J. Q. B. 340; so also where the master took the vessel out of the port and left her in the roads under easy sailing, while he returned ashore to complete her papers; 26 id. 239. "Final sailing I apprehend means getting clear of the port for the purpose of proceeding on the voyage;" Lindley, L. J., in 9 Q. B. D. 679.

SAILING INSTRUCTIONS. In Maritime Law. Written or printed directions, delivered by the commanding officer of a convoy to the several masters of the ships under his care, by which they are enabled to understand and answer his signals, to know the place of rendezvous appointed for the fleet in case of dispersion by storm, by an enemy, or by any other accident.

Without sailing instructions no vessel can have the full protection and benefit of convoy. Marsh. Ins. 368.

SAILORS. Seamen; mariners. See SEAMEN; SHIPPING ARTICLES.

ST. MARTIN LE GRAND, COURT OF. An ancient court in London, of local importance, formerly held in the church from which it took its name.

SAISIE-ARRET. In French Law. An attachment of property in the hands of a third person.

SAISIE-EXECUTION. In French Law. A writ of execution by which the creditor places under the custody of the law the movables of his debtor, which are liable to seizure, in order that out of them he may obtain payment of the debt due by him. La. Code of Pract. art. 641; Dalloz, Dict. It is a writ very similar to the fieri facias of the common law.

SAISIE-FORAINE. In French Law. A permission given by the proper judicial officer to authorize a creditor to seize the property of his debtor in the district which he inhabits. Dalloz, Dict. It has the effect of an attachment of property, which is applied to the payment of the debt due.

SAISIE-GAGERIE. In French Law. A conservatory act of execution, by which the owner or principal lessor of a house or farm causes the furniture of the house or farm leased, and on which he has a lien, to be seized, in order to obtain the rent due to him. It is similar to the distress of the common law. Dalloz, Dict.

SAISIE-IMMOBILIERE. In French Law. A writ by which the creditor puts in the custody of the law the immovables of his debtor, that out of the proceeds of their sale he may be paid his demand.

SALADIN'S TENTH. A tax imposed in England and France, in 1188, by Pope Innocent III., to raise a fund for the crusade undertaken by Richard I. of England and Philip Augustus of France, against Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, then going to besiege Jerusalem. Encyc. Lond.; Whart.

SALARY. A reward or recompense for services performed.

It is usually applied to the reward paid to a public officer for the performance of his official duties. (Adopted in 24 Fla. 29.)

Salary is also applied to the reward paid for the performance of other services; but if it be not fixed for each year it is called honorarium. Pothier, Pand. According to M. Duvergier, the distinction between honorarium and salary is this. By the former is understood the reward given to the most elevated professions for services performed; and by the latter the price of hiring of domestic servants and workmen; 19 Toullier, n. 268, p. 292, note.

There is this difference between salary and price; the former is the reward paid for services or for the hire of things; the latter is the consideration paid for a thing sold: Leç. Elem. § 907. Salary seems to denote a higher degree of employment and is suggestive of a larger compensation for more important services than wages, which indicates inconsiderable pay; 69 Hun 291. See also 42 Alb. L. J. 332; 99 Pa. 542; 10 Md. 85, where salary is regarded as a per annum compensation, while wages are defined as compensation paid or to be paid by the day, week, etc.

SALE. An agreement by which one of two contracting parties, called the seller, gives a thing and passes the title to it, in exchange for a certain price in current money, to the other party, who is called the buyer or purchaser who, on his part, agrees to pay such price. 2 Kent 363; Pothier, Vente, n. 1.

Ordinarily a transfer of property for a fixed price in money or its equivalent. 110 U. S. 471; 47 Fed. Rep. 604.

An executed sale is both a contract and a conveyance.

This contract differs from a barter or exchange in this; that in the latter the price or consideration, instead of being paid in money, is paid in goods or merchandise susceptible of a valuation. 12 N. H. 390; 43 Ia. 194; 65 Ind. 409; 21 Vt. 520. See PRICE. It differs from accord and satisfaction, because in that contract the thing is given for the purpose of quieting a claim, and not for a price; and from bailment, because there the agreement is for the return of the subject-matter, in its original or an altered form, while in sale it is for the return of an equivalent in money; L. R. 3 P. C. 101; 81 Tex. 505; and see 100 Mass. 198; 79 Pa. 488; 39 Conn. 70; 55 Ill. 45; 150 U. S. 312.

An onerous gift, when the burden it imposes is the payment of a sum of money, is, when accepted, in the nature of a sale. When partition is made between two or more joint owners of a chattel, it would seem the contract is in the nature of a barter. See 11 Pick. 311.

An absolute sale is one made and completed without any condition whatever.

A conditional sale is one which depends for its validity upon the fulfilment of some condition.

A forced sale is one made without the consent of the owner of the property, by some officer appointed by law, as by a marshal or a sheriff, in obedience to the mandate of a competent tribunal. This sale has the effect to transfer all the rights the owner had in the property, but it does not, like a voluntary sale of personal property, guarantee a title to the thing sold; it merely transfers the rights of the person as whose property it has been seized. This kind of a sale is sometimes called a judicial sale.

A private sale is one made voluntarily, and not by auction.

A public sale is one made at auction to the highest bidder. Auction sales sometimes are voluntary, as when the owner chooses to sell his goods in this way, and then as between the seller and the buyer the usual rules relating to sales apply; or they are involuntary or forced, when the same rules do not apply.

A voluntary sale is one made freely without constraint by the owner of the thing sold: this is the common case of sales, and to this class the general rules of the law of sale apply.

A sale in gross is one without regard to quantity. 77 Va. 616.

An offer to sell imposes no obligations until accepted according to its terms; and an offer rejected cannot be afterward accepted; 119 U. S. 149. See OFFER.

Parties. As a general rule, all persons sui juris may be either buyers or sellers; Story, Sales § 9. See PARTIES. But no one can sell goods and convey a valid title to them unless he be owner or lawfully represent the owner; nemo dat quod non habet; Benj. Sales § 6; 2 Ad. & E. 495; 89 Ill. 540; 56 N. H. 158; 115 Mass. 129. And even an innocent purchaser from one not the owner, or his proper representative, acquires no valid title; 13 M. & W. 603; Benj. Sales § 6; 54 Ind. 141; 61 N. Y. 477.

An innocent purchaser of property from a bailee for hire acquires no title, and on disposing of the property is liable to the bailor for its value; 155 Pa. 208. But see MARKET OVERT. Another exception is that one not the owner, even a thief, may make a valid transfer of negotiable instruments, if they are in the usual state in which they commonly pass on delivery, provided the buyer has been guilty of no fraud in taking them. The bona fide holder of such negotiable instruments, and also of bank-notes, or money, lost or stolen, who has paid a valuable consideration or furnished an equivalent, can retain title against any former owner; even against one from whom such chattel has been stolen; 20 Pick. 545; 32 Vt. 125; 8 Conn. 336; 6 Tex. 515; 3 Burr. 1516; 5 B. & Ad. 909; 10 Ad. & E. 784; Benj. Sales (4th ed.) § 15. So (arguendo) of coupon bonds of the ordinary kind; 2 Wall. 110, disapproving Gill v. Cubit, 3 B. & C. 466; and approving Goodman & Harvey, 4 Ad. & El. 870; also a lost or stolen bill or note; arguendo in 101 U. S. 857; but otherwise of a lost or stolen bill of lading; id.

Where two parties in good faith buy the same property, the one first receiving possession is entitled to hold it; 47 Mo. App. 84.

There is a class of persons who are incapable of purchasing except sub modo, as infants and married women, insane persons and drunkards; Benj. Sales § 21; and another class, who, in consequence of their peculiar relation with regard to the owner of the thing sold, are totally incapable of becoming purchasers while that relation exists; such as trustees, guardians, assignees of insolvents, and, generally, all persons who, by their connection with the owner, or by being employed concerning his affairs, have acquired a knowledge of his property, as attorneys, conveyancers, and the like.

Mutual assent. The consent of the contracting parties, which is of the essence of a sale, consists in the agreement of the will of the seller to sell a certain thing to the buyer for a certain price, and in the will of the buyer to purchase the same thing for the same price. It must, therefore, be mutual, intended to bind both parties, and must co-exist at the same moment of time; Benj. Sales § 39. Thus, if a condition be affixed by the party to whom an offer is made, or a modification requested, this constitutes a rejection of the offer, and a new proposal, which must be accepted by the first proposer, otherwise there would be no assent by the parties to the same thing, at the same time; 4 De G. J. & S. 646; 34 U. C. Q. B. 410; 1 Bradw. 153. It follows that the assent must correspond with the offer in every particular; 8 C. E. Green 512; 14 Pet. 77; 43 Vt. 161; 118 Mass. 232.

Goods delivered to one for examination, with an option to buy, may be retaken by the owner before the exercise of the option; 4 Misc. Rep. 88.

When there has been a mistake made as to the article sold, there is no sale, because no mutual agreement upon the subject of the sale: as, for example, where a broker, who is the agent of both parties, sells an article and delivers to the seller a sold note describing the article sold as "St. Petersburg clean hemp," and a bought note to the buyer as "Riga Rhine hemp," there is no sale; 4 Q. B. 747; 112 Mass. 32; 49 N. Y. 588.

The consent is certain when the parties expressly declare it. This, in some cases, it is requisite should be in writing. By the statute of frauds no sale of goods, etc., for the price of £10 sterling and upwards, is valid, except the buyer shall accept part of the goods and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part payment, or some note or memorandum be made, signed by the party to be charged. This applies to both executed and executory contracts of sale.

The writing may be a letter. See LETTER; 4 Bingh. 653; 3 Metc. Mass. 207; 16 Me. 458.

See ACCEPTANCE; EARNEST; PART PAYMENT; PARTY TO BE CHARGED; GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE; NOTE OR MEMORANDUM; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

When a party, by his acts, approves of what has been done, as if he knowingly uses goods which have been left at his house by another who intended to sell them, he will by that act confirm the sale.

One who has accepted and used goods cannot refuse to pay for them on the ground that he never ordered them; 152 U. S. 200.

Care must be taken to distinguish between an agreement to enter into a future contract of sale, which would be called an executory contract of sale, and pass no title until executed, and a present actual agreement to make a sale, which passes the title immediately.

The distinction between executed and executory contracts of sale depends upon the intention of the parties. When the vendor appropriates goods to the vendee, or, in other words, signifies his intention that the right of property shall pass at once, and the vendee assents, the law will give effect to the intention and the title will pass immediately; 104 Mass. 262; 54 N. Y. 167; 14 B. Monr. 413. This principle remains the same,—whether the goods are sold for cash or on credit, whether they are to be delivered forthwith or at a future time; whether they have yet to be weighed, measured, or set apart, or whether they are still unfinished; and by the terms of the agreement, the vendor has either to complete them, or in some way add to their value. These circumstances may be reason for supposing that the parties do not mean to pass the title, but will not defeat the intention to do so if it exists; Lectures on Contracts, by Prof. Hare; 1 Q. B. 389; 2 B. & C. 540; 102 Mass. 443; 13 Pick. 175; 6 Rand. 473.

The thing sold. There must be a thing which is the object of the sale; for if the thing sold at the time of the sale had ceased to exist, it is clear there can be no sale; Benj. Sales § 76; 5 Maule & S. 228; 11 Pet. 63; 20 Pick. 139; if, for example, you and I being in Philadelphia, I sell you my house in Cincinnati, and at the time of the sale it be burned down, it is manifest there was no sale as there was not a thing to be sold. Where the thing does not exist at the date of the contract the sale is void; as where, unknown to the parties, corn on a vessel not yet arrived, had, before the sale, been sold at an intermediate port; 5 H. L. C. 673. Where, after the sale, and without fault of the seller, the thing sold perished, the seller is released; 107 Mass. 514; 70 Me. 288; but it is otherwise if property has passed, though the goods were left in the seller's possession; 32 L. J. Q. B. 164. On a contract of future sale, if the subject-matter perish before property has passed, the contract is avoided. It is evident, too, that no sale can be made of things not in commerce: as, the air, the water of the sea, and the like.

In general, there must be an agreement as to the specific goods which form the basis of the contract of sale; in other words, to make a perfect sale the parties must have agreed, the one to part with the title to a specific article, and the other to acquire such title.

In an unconditional contract of sale of specific goods, title passes at once, without delivery; 143 U. S. 354; 3 B. & C. 862, though it is said that no title vests in the buyer under a cash sale till the price is paid; 141 Mass. 423. Other cases hold that title passes, but the vendor has a lien for the price. Where no time is agreed upon for payment, it is presumed to be a cash sale; 58 Cal. 431; 111 Mass. 489; 76 Ill. 358. If the seller delivers possession upon the understanding of immediate payment, he may reclaim the goods in case he is not paid; 31 Wis. 176; 53 N. Y. 426; 18 Pa. 91. Where goods sold have to be selected from a larger mass of uniform quality, some cases hold that title passes when the sale is made; 19 N. Y. 330; 137 Ill. 393; 39 Conn. 413; this is approved as the true rule in Hare, Contr. 425. Other cases hold that the property does not pass till the separation is complete; 11 Cush. 573; 90 Ind. 268; 9 Ore. 66. If the larger mass consists of units of varying quality or value, it is held that the property does not pass till selection; Tiff. Sales 95.

Where the seller is to do anything to the goods to put them in shape to deliver under the contract, this is a condition precedent to the vesting of the property in the buyer; Blackb. Sales 151; and so where anything is to be done for the purpose of ascertaining the price, as weighing, testing, etc., where the price depends on quantity, etc.; id. But it is said that the latter rule is too broad and that the property is presumed to pass to the buyer; when weighing, testing, etc., alone remain to be done by the buyer; Graves, Title to Pers. Prop. 50. This presumption is stronger when the buyer receives possession; id.

Where a brewer's carter took orders for jars of beer, and delivered the jars to the customers' houses, making his collections the following week, there being no mark to show that any particular jar had been appropriated to any particular customer, until delivery, it was held that the sale was made at the customers' house; [1895] 2 Q. B. 229.

Where a contract provides for the sale, delivery, and setting up of machinery and for payment of part of the price on receipt of the bill of lading, and the residue at stated times thereafter, it was held that the delivery of the machinery completed the sale; 146 U. S. 42.

The thing sold must have an actual or potential existence and be specifically identified and capable of delivery; otherwise it is not strictly a sale, but an executory agreement; 2 Kent 468.

In the sale of non-existent chattel, at law, if the seller has a potential interest in it, the sale is a valid sale in præsenti to take effect in futuro; but if the contract concerns a mere possibility or expectation, the transaction will not take effect unless the seller, after the chattel has come into existence, ratifies the contract, or the buyer, with his consent, gets possession; Graves, Title to Pers. Prop. 41. A potential interest would include the wool to grow upon a man's own sheep, but not on those of another. A sale of fish to be caught did not pass the property in them when caught; 108 Mass. 347. An assignment of future wages, there being no existing contract of service, is invalid; 1 Gray 105; otherwise if the wages are to accrue under an existing contract of service; 2 Gray 265.

One may sell a crop of hay to be grown on his field or wool from his sheep or the milk that his cows will yield the coming month, and the sale is valid; but he can only make a contract to sell, and not an actual sale, where the subject is something to be afterwards acquired, as the sale of any sheep, etc., or any goods, which he may attain the title to within the next six months; Benj. Sales § 78.

The statutes as to the assignment of an invention before patent embraces only perfected inventions. There can, properly speaking, be no assignment of an incomplete invention, although a contract to convey a future invention may be valid; Curt. Pat. § 160. A contract to transfer inventions not yet in being is not an assignment; 2 Rob. Pat. § 771.

But in equity the sale takes effect as soon as the chattel comes into existence, without further act of the parties; 10 H. L. C. 209. See 3 Pom. Eq. § 1288; but see 46 Am. Dec. 718; 76 id. 731.

As to mortgages or sales of unplanted crops, some cases hold them invalid; 9 Bush 318; others hold them valid to transfer a legal title; 51 Cal. 620; others hold them valid only to transfer an equitable title; 69 Ala. 403; 48 Miss. 513. See 4 Am. Dec. 559.

The delivery of crops to be grown is not essential to pass title, crops being an exception to the rule that no title can vest in property not in existence; 143 U. S. 346.

The sale of grain in an elevator, part of a mass, passes the title of the vendor without separation; 111 Mass. 490; 4 Ill. 344.

In case of unascertained goods, part of a larger quantity, the seller usually has the right to select the particular goods. The selection is fixed and title passes on delivery to the buyer, and, usually, upon the delivery to a carrier, unless the contract is for a delivery to the buyer at the place of destination.

It is held that where delivery is made to a carrier C. O. D. (q.v.), the property does not pass; 146 Mass. 68; 3 Colo. 176; 58 Vt. 140; contra, 130 Pa. 138; 73 Me. 278; 104 N. C. 25. When goods are delivered by the seller to the postoffice the title vests in the buyer; [1898] A. C. 204.

In shipbuilding contracts, where payments are to be made as the work progresses, property does not pass till the work is complete; 99 Mass. 397; 81 Pa. 18; 1 Houst. 506, 546. But in England it passes when the first instalment is paid, and subsequent additions to the work become the property of the buyer; 5 B. & Ald. 942; 4 Ad. & E. 448; so also in 1 Cliff. 370; 27 Ind. 522.

Where goods are delivered to a carrier, but the bill of lading is made out to the seller's order, the property does not pass to the buyer; 74 N. Y. 568; 84 Ala. 173; so where the seller ships the goods consigned to himself; 56 Ill. 494.

A buyer has a right to a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods before he accepts them; Tiff. Sales 197.

When goods are to be paid for on delivery at a certain place, title will not pass till delivery; 153 Pa. 440; 88 id. 147; 113 Mass. 391.

The price. To constitute a sale, there must be a price agreed upon. The presumption is that where the price is not definitely ascertained, the title remains in the vendor until a computation has been made; Blackb. Sales 122; 24 N. H. 336; 11 Cush. 573; 78 Ga. 66. But this may be rebutted by proof that the parties intended to have the right of property vest in the purchaser at once; 39 Conn. 413; 55 Ga. 633; 19 N. Y. 330. Upon the maxim id certum est quod reddi certum potest, a sale may be valid although it is agreed that the price for the thing sold shall be determined by a third person; 4 Pick 179. See 10 Bingh. 382, 487; 11 Ired. 166. A contract of sale is valid though no time of payment is agreed on, the law implying payment on delivery; 96 Mich. 175.

The price must be an actual or serious price, with an intention on the part of the seller to require its payment: if, therefore, one should sell a thing to another, and by the same agreement he should release the buyer from the payment, this would not be a sale, but a gift; because in that case the buyer never agreed to pay any price, the same agreement by which the title to the thing is passed to him discharging him from all obligations to pay for it. As to the quantum of the price, that is altogether immaterial unless there has been fraud in the transaction. The price must be certain or determined; but it is sufficiently certain if, as before observed, it be left to the determination of a third person; 4 Pick. 179. And an agreement to pay for goods what they are worth is sufficiently certain; Coxe N. J. 261. The title to property may pass to the vendee without fixing an absolute price, if the circumstances attending the transaction show the same to be the intention of the parties; 85 Ala. 221; 100 N. C. 59.

If the passing of property is made to depend upon doing some act as a condition, such as paying the price, the property remains in the seller, though possession may be in the buyer. Apart from statute, the buyer, in most states, takes no title which can be reached by creditors or which he can transfer even to a bona fide purchaser, except subject to the seller's rights; 118 U. S. 663; though in Pennsylvania the rule is otherwise, and also in Illinois, Kentucky, and Maryland. In Pennsylvania transactions which are in legal effect conditional sales on the instalment plan, have been sustained when drawn in the language of bailments with an option of purchase, but the rule there seems uncertain.

The buyer in conditional sales ordinarily acquires an interest which he may sell or which may be attached; and may maintain trover if his possession is wrongfully invaded. The seller may mortgage his interest and it is subject to attachment by his creditors.

Upon breach of condition, the seller may retake or replevin the goods or sue to recover their value. In some states, in a suit to recover their value, he need not allow for payments on account; and if he reclaim the goods, the buyer is not entitled to recover instalments paid; 89 Ill. 233; 7 Daly 297; in others, the buyer is held to be entitled to an account for instalments paid; 28 Mich. 260; 61 Ga. 230; 25 Minn. 530. In some states by statute he must repay the instalments less a proportion for wear and use. An action will not lie for the residue of the purchase-money after the properties have been retaken by the vendor; 43 Minn. 409.

Where there is a contract for leasing property with an option of buying it, with a provision allowing its return to the seller, upon such return of the property, equity will decree a return of the money paid on account of its purchase, less the amount of damages to the property and reasonable pay therefor; 142 U. S. 313. The cases are collected in 32 L. R. A. 455.

Statutes exist in many states which provide that conditional sales of chattels with a reservation of title in the vendor are void as against third parties purchasing from the vendee or against his creditors, unless recorded. In nearly all the states there are similar statutes relating specially to the conditional sale of railroad rolling stock. See ROLLING STOCK.

A common transaction is the hire of furniture and other like chattels, on the instalment plan, called hire-purchase in England, by which "an intending purchaser of goods is put into immediate possession thereof and agrees to pay a fixed sum by fixed periodical instalments; the amount payable for each instalment is expressly declared to be nothing more than hire-money for the use of the goods during the period intervening between two consecutive instalments, and the lender agrees that on a certain number of instalments, making up the total sum, being paid, the hirer shall become the owner of the goods. On default in the payment of any instalment, power is reserved to the lender to resume possession of the goods." Law Mag. & Rev., Feb. 1896.

Where one had hired a piano on this plan and after paying some instalments on it, pledged it to a third party, against whom the lender brought suit, the house of lords sustained the lender's title; 11 L. T. R. 446.

A contract for the hire-purchase of a chattel, the title to pass when the last instalment is paid, is a conditional sale; 85 Ga. 741; S. C. 9 L. R. A. 373; 46 Ill. 47; the court will look to the purpose of the contract rather than to the name given to it; 93 U. S. 664; contra, 115 Pa. 487, where the cases are somewhat at variance with other decisions, due to the necessity of sustaining conditional sales, held invalid in that state, by calling them bailments. See ROLLING STOCK.

A conditional vendee under an instalment purchase contract cannot return the goods when not fully paid for and escape liability for the future instalments; 53 Conn. 4.

Sale to arrive. A sale of goods to arrive per Argo, or on arrival per Argo, is construed to be a sale of goods subject to a double condition precedent: that the ship arrives and the goods are on board; 5 M. & W. 639; Ry. & M. 406. In such case, title to the goods does not pass till their arrival; 16 N. Y. 597.

Sale for illegal purpose. A sale of goods for the purpose of smuggling is invalid; 3 Term 454; but not when a foreigner sold the goods abroad having no concern in the smuggling; 1 Cowp. 34. See 50 N. H. 253. The mere knowledge of the vendor that the goods sold would be used for an illegal purpose does not render the sale illegal; 50 N. H. 253; 32 Vt. 110; 3 Cliff. 494. See Benj. Sales § 511, n.

Where a buyer is insolvent and has no intention to pay for goods, the sale may be avoided by the seller: 93 U. S. 631; 67 N. Y. 1; but the mere knowledge on the buyer's part that he will be unable to pay for them, will not alone form a fraudulent intent; Tiedm. Sales § 170; there must be other facts of a suspicious nature, such as re-selling them at a reduced price; id. In Pennsylvania, it is not enough to show that the buyer was insolvent and did not intend to pay for the goods; some artifice must be shown; 21 Pa. 367.

A Massachusetts act of 1884 makes it a crime for any one to sell any property under representation that anything other than what is specifically stated to be the subject of the sale is to be delivered, etc., as a part of the transaction. In a case under this act it appeared that a retail dealer in tobacco offered to each purchaser a selection of a photograph among a number exposed for his choice. A conviction under this act was set aside upon the ground that what was sold in this case was specifically understood to be the subject of the sale. In a case under a like act in New York, the buyer purchased coffee and received a present as a part of the transaction. It appeared that the presents were lying in full view of the purchasers who could make their choice if they bought as much as two pounds of coffee. The act was held to be unconstitutional; 109 N. Y. 389. A Maryland act was held to be unconstitutional only so far as related to transactions which were dependent upon chance; 74 Md. 565. See LOTTERY.

A New York act (1898) provides that a seller who publicly advertises statements with respect to quantity, quality, value, price, method of production, or manufacture, which are untrue or calculated to mislead, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION.

Real estate. The above rules apply to sales of personal property. The sale of real estate is governed by other rules. When a contract has been entered into for the sale of lands, the legal estate in such lands still remains vested in the vendor, and it does not become vested in the vendee until he shall have received a lawful deed of conveyance from the vendor to him; and the only remedy of the purchaser at law is to bring an action on the contract and recover pecuniary damages for a breach of the contract. In equity, however, after a contract for the sale, the lands are considered as belonging to the purchaser, and the court will enforce his rights by a decree for a specific performance; and the seller will be entitled to the purchase-money; Wms. R. P. 127. See SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

In general, the seller of real estate does not guarantee the title; and if it be desired that he should, this must be done by inserting a warranty to that effect.

Section 8 of the statute of frauds provides that no interest in land shall be created unless by deed or note in writing signed by the party or his agent, authorized by writing, or by act of operation of law.

The question whether sales of standing timber involves any interest in land has been much mooted. The majority of cases seem to support the following propositions: 1. Where the vendor has expressly stipulated that the trees may remain standing on the land a given number of years if the purchaser elects. Here, as they derive more or less growth and increase from the soil, there is some reason to hold that the sale involves an interest in land. It has in fact been considered a sale, not only of the trees as they then are, but as they will be at the end of the stipulated period with all the additions to them subsequently acquired by the soil. See 6 Seld. 114; 50 Barb. 302; 57 id. 243; 45 N. H. 313; 40 id. 304. 2. Where the trees are to stand for an indefinite time and to be severed solely at the pleasure of the buyer, the statute of frauds requires a written agreement. See 27 Vt. 157; 42 id. 309.

See ACCEPTANCE; CONTRACT; DELIVERY; PARTIES; STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU; WARRANTY; EARNEST; FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; CONSIDERATION; PRICE; GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE; NOTE OR MEMORANDUM; SAMPLE; MORTGAGE; ROLLING STOCK; TRADING STAMPS; OPENING BIDDINGS.

Under the civil law, in a contract of sale the seller was not bound to make the buyer absolute master (dominus) of the thing sold, as he would have been in a stipulation. What he was bound to do was this: 1. To deliver the thing itself (præstare, tradere), to give free and undisturbed possession of it (possessionem vacuam tradere), and to give lawful possession of it (præstare licere habere). 2. If the buyer was disturbed in his possession by the real owner (evictio), to recompense him for what was lost. 3. To secure the buyer against secret faults; if such faults were discovered, either compensation might be claimed by an actio æstimatoria, reducing the price to a greater or less amount, according as the seller had or had not knowledge of the defect, or at the option of the buyer, the contract might be rescinded by an action actio redhibitoria, and the thing returned (which was termed redhibitio: redhibere est facere ut rursus habeat venditor quod habuerat). Just. Inst., 8th ed. 365.

SALE-NOTE. A memorandum given by a broker to a seller or buyer of goods, stating the fact that certain goods have been sold by him on account of a person called the seller to another person called the buyer. Sale-notes are also called bought and sold notes. See BOUGHT NOTE.

SALE ON APPROVAL. See SALE.

SALE OR RETURN. When goods are sent from a manufacturer or wholesale dealer to a retail trader, in the hope that he may purchase them, with the understanding that what he may choose to take he shall have as on a contract of sale, and what he does not take he will retain as a consignee for the owner, the goods are said to have been sent on sale and return.

The goods taken by the receiver as on sale will be considered as sold, and the title to them is vested in the receiver of them: the goods he does not buy are considered as a deposit in the hands of the receiver of them, and the title is in the person who sent them. 1 Bell, Com. 268.

Contracts of sale or return exist where the privilege of purchase or return is not dependent upon the character or quality of the property sold, but rests entirely upon the option of the purchaser to retain or return; and the title passes to the purchaser subject to his option to return the property; 150 U. S. 312; upon return the title reverts (a condition subsequent); Tiff. Sales 98.

SALIC OR SALIQUE LAW. The name of a code of laws, so called from the Salians, a people of Germany who settled in Gaul under their king Pharamond.

The most remarkable law of this code is that which regards succession. De terra vero salica nulla portio hæreditatis transit in mulierem, sed hoc virilis sextus acquirit: hoc est, filii in ipsa hæreditate succedunt: no part of the salique land passes to women, but the men alone are capable of taking; that is, the sons succeed to the inheritance. This has always excluded women from the throne of France.

SALOON. A place of refreshment. 26 Mich. 325. An apartment for a specified public use. 45 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 406; 20 Nev. 282. In common parlance, the word is used to designate a place where intoxicating liquors are sold, and this restricted meaning may be given to saloons, where the context or other circumstances requires it; 13 Neb. 434; 40 Mich. 401; 105 Mass. 40; but it is held that it does not necessarily import a place where liquors are sold; 26 Mich. 328; 23 Tex. App. 364. The word has a much broader meaning than dram shop. To constitute a saloon it is not necessary that ardent spirits should be offered for sale and that it should be a business requiring a license under the revenue laws of the state; 50 Ark. 561. See LIQUOR LAWS.

SALT. In an insurance policy salt does not include saltpetre. 1 Park. 245.

SALUTE. A coin made by Henry V., after his conquests in France.

In the army and navy an honor paid to a distinguished personage, when troops or squadrons meet, when officers are buried, or to celebrate an event or show respect to a flag and on many other ceremonial occasions. Cent. Dict.

Upon the arrival of a man of war in a foreign port the salutes and other ceremonials toward the port and its authorities are prescribed in full detail by the naval regulations. A ship of war entering a harbor or passing by a port or castle should pay the first salute except when the sovereign or his ambassador is on board, in which case the salute should be made first on the shore; Woolsey, Introd. Int. Law, 4th ed. § 85.

No salute is to be fired in honor of any nation, or official of any nation not formally recognized by the United States; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 70. See 2 Phill. Int. Law.

SALVAGE. In Maritime Law. A compensation given by the maritime law for service rendered in saving property or rescuing it from impending peril on the sea or wrecked on the coast of the sea, or, in the United States, on a public navigable river or lake, where interstate or foreign commerce is carried on. 1 Sumn. 210, 416; 12 How. 466; 1 Blatchf. 420; 5 McLean 359.

The property saved. The only proper subjects of salvage are vessels or ships used for the purpose of being navigated, and goods which at one time formed the cargoes of such vessels, whether found on board, or drifting, or cast on shore; [1897] A.C. 347. It has been held that there can be no salvage against a floating dry dock intended to be permanently moored to the shore; 119 U. S. 625; nor against coal barges on the Mississippi river, which were mere boxes without tackle, apparel, furniture, master, or crew, and which were sold with the coal or broken up for old lumber; 46 Fed. Rep. 204; nor a floating structure intended to be moored alongside a wharf for carts containing refuse to drive over it to a dumping boat; 38 Fed. Rep. 158; nor a pile-driving machine erected on a floating platform; 69 Fed. Rep. 1005; nor a gas-float fifty feet long by twenty wide moored in a river to give light to vessels; [1897] A. C. 337; as to rafts of timber, quære; see id.

When a ship was almost becalmed on the high seas a floating chest was found and with but little trouble taken on board. It contained seventy doubloons. It was held that the finders were not entitled to the whole property, though there were no marks of ownership, but should be compensated by a moiety as for salvage services. The other moiety was directed to be paid into court; Fed. Cas. 6620. Passengers' lives may be the subject of salvage services, by statute. See 55 Alb. L. J. 404.

A person who offers useful services to a vessel in distress without any previous contract, is a salvor; 24 U. S. App. 559.

Salvage, after actual compensation for the services rendered, is a gratuity for the benefit of commerce, as an encouragement for like services and efforts; no amount of reward to owners and machinery will so stimulate efforts to save life and property as will moderate awards to master and crew who are the effective agents to set the machinery in motion; 13 U. S. App. 662.

"Salvage consists (1) of an adequate compensation for the actual outlay of labor and expense made in the enterprise; and (2) of the reward as bounty allowed from motives of public policy, as a means of encouraging such exertions. In determining the amount of an award the leading considerations are: the degree of danger from which the rescue is made; value of the property saved; risk to the salvors; the value of property risked by salvors and the dangers to which it was exposed; the skill shown and the time and labor spent." 23 U. S. App. 435.

Moral considerations and questions of policy enter largely into salvage cases. 2 Hagg. 3.

The peril. In order to found a title to salvage, the peril from which property was saved must be real, not speculative merely; 1 Cra. 1; 1 Ben. Adm. 166; but it need not be such that escape from it by any other means than by the aid of the salvors was impossible. It is sufficient that the peril was something extraordinary, something differing in kind and degree from the ordinary perils of navigation; 1 Curt. C. C. 353; 2 id. 350. See 9 C. C. App. 292; 40 Fed. Rep. 909; 41 id. 103. All services rendered at sea to a vessel in distress are salvage services; 1 W. Rob. 174; 3 id. 71. But the peril must be present and pending, not future, contingent, and conjectural; 1 Sumn. 216; 3 Hagg. Adm. 344. It may arise from the sea, rocks, fire, pirates, or enemies; 1 Cra. 1; see 22 Ct. Cls. 408; or from the sickness or death of the crew or master; 1 Curt. C. C. 376; 2 Wall. Jr. 59; 1 Swab. 84.

The saving. In order to give a right to salvage, the property must be effectually saved; it must be brought to some port of safety, and it must be there in a state capable of being restored to the owner, before the service can be deemed completed; 1 Sumn. 417; 1 W. Rob. 329, 406; 35 Fed. Rep. 796; 57 id. 661. The salvage services must be performed by persons not bound by their legal duty to render them; 1 Hagg. Adm. 227; 2 Spinks, Adm. 253. The property must be saved by the instrumentality of the asserted salvors, or their services must contribute in some certain degree to save it; 4 Wash. C. C. 651; Olc. 462; though, if the services were rendered on the request of the master or owner, the salvor is entitled to salvage though the services were slight and the property was saved mainly by a providential act; 5 McLean 359; 1 Newb. 130; 2 W. Rob 91; Bee 90.

Towage services are sometimes the subject of compensation as salvage. Mere expediting the voyage of a vessel, by towing, is not salvage; but salvage was allowed in the case of a steamship who had broken her main shaft, but could sail fairly well, the weather also being favorable, in which condition she was towed ninety miles; 1 Spinks, A. & E. 169, said to be the extreme case; Kennedy, Civil Salvage 22; courts are liberal to such claims in respect of the amount of danger necessary to render towage a salvage source; id.

The place. In England it has been held that the services must be rendered on the high seas, or, at least, extra corpus comitatus, in order to give the admiralty court jurisdiction to decree salvage; but in this country it is held that the district courts of the United States have jurisdiction to decree salvage for services rendered on tide waters and on the lakes or rivers where interstate or foreign commerce is carried on, although infra corpus comitatus; 12 How. 466; 1 Blatchf. 420; 5 McLean 359.

The amount. Some foreign states have fixed by law the amount or proportion to be paid for salvage services; but in England and the United States no such rule has been established. In these countries the amount rests in the sound discretion of the court awarding the salvage, upon a full consideration of all the facts of the case. It generally far exceeds a mere remuneration pro opere et labore, the excess being intended, upon principles of sound policy, not only as a reward to the particular salvor, but also as an inducement to others to render like services; 2 Cra. 240; 1 C. Rob. 312, n.; 3 id. 355; 3 Hagg. Adm. 95. But it is equally the policy of the law not to provoke the salvor's appetite of avarice, nor encourage his exorbitant demands, nor teach him to stand ready to devour what the ocean has spared; Gilp. 75. Adequate rewards encourage the tendering and acceptance of salvage services; exorbitant demands discourage their acceptance and tend to augment the risk and loss of vessels in distress. 7 Notes of Cas. 579. Salvage viewed as a reward is not properly the subject of a binding contract in advance. Courts of admiralty fully examine into the circumstances of the service in the interest of the property saved, and award no more than a reasonable sum, and are not bound by the amount agreed on beforehand; 48 Fed. Rep. 923. But a salvage agreement for services to be performed on the high seas will not be set aside merely because only one of the contracting parties was at a disadvantage. But, if in addition to that circumstance, the sum required by the intending salvor appears to the court exorbitant, the agreement will be set aside as inequitable; [1891] P. 175. The amount is determined by a consideration of the peril to which the property was exposed, the value saved, the risk to life or property incurred by the salvors, their skill, the extent of labor or time employed, and the extent of the necessity that may exist in any particular locality to encourage salvage services; 3 Hagg. Adm. 121; 1 Gall. 133; 1 Sumn. 413; 2 Sprague 102. An ancient rule of the admiralty allowed the salvors one-half of the property saved, when it was absolutely derelict or abandoned; but that rule has been latterly distinctly repudiated by the high court of admiralty and our supreme court, and the reward in cases of derelict is now governed by the same principles as in other salvage cases; 20 E. L. & E. 607; 4 Notes of Cas. 144: 19 How. 161. While there is no rule of giving salvors of a derelict a moiety, or other specific proportion of the value of the property saved, and the award is to be assessed as in other cases of salvage, still there are usually present three special elements which tend to increase the award: the high degree of danger to which the property is exposed; the difficulty of approaching a derelict vessel without any aid in boarding her; and the necessity of supplying men to steer her; [1897] Pr. Div. 59. But it is usual to give half of the value, and even seven-eighths have been given. See 2 Blatch. 323.

Risking life to save the lives of others is an ingredient in salvage service which will enhance the salvage upon the property saved; Daveis 61; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 84. No salvage was formerly due for saving life merely, unaccompanied by any saving of property; 1 W. Rob. 330; unless it was the life of a slave; Bee 226, 260. But the saving of life in addition to property was held to increase the award of salvage on the property; Br. & L. 344. By statute 17 & 18 Vict. salvage was extended to the saving of life and the award therefor was given priority over other salvage. If the vessel is not of large enough value to pay the award, it is payable out of the Mercantile Marine Fund.

"It is the value of the property which is restored to the owner that is to be considered, and of which a proportion is to be awarded as salvage in salvage cases, and not the original value imperilled. The exact value of the property saved, when large, is but a minor element in computing salvage, and as it increases, the rate per cent. given is rapidly reduced." 13 U. S. App. 662.

Where part of a cargo saved consists of specie, it must bear its share of the common burden; 86 Fed. Rep. 340; up to the time when it was removed, but not of the expense of getting the ship afloat after the specie was removed; 82 id. 104. There is no distinction in the proportion of salvage charges against different parts of a cargo; 4 Asp. 385.

The fact that a vessel receives injuries in the course of salvage operations will tend to reduce the amount of compensation; 83 Fed. Rep. 715.

A salvage award will not be set aside as too large, unless so grossly excessive as to shock the conscience of the appellate court; 82 Fed. Rep. 751.

The property saved. Salvage is properly a charge apportionable upon all the interests and property at risk in the voyage which derive any benefit from the salvage service; 1 Stor. 469. Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. It follows that salvage expenses incurred in saving ship, cargo, and freight in one common and continuous service are apportionable upon them all, according to their respective values; but expenses incurred for any one interest separately, or any two interests only, are chargeable wholly to it or to them; 2 W. Rob. 315; 7 E. & B. 523; 2 Pick. 1; 11 id. 90; 4 Whart. 301; 5 Du. 310. Goods of the government pay the same rate as if owned by individuals; 3 Sumn. 308; Edw. Adm. 79; but not the mails; Marv. Salv. 132. But, it is said, no proceedings in rem can be instituted against public ships or stores on them, or against property of the state on a private ship; though the question is not always raised, and the British Admiralty usually appeals and submits to the judgment of the court in the case of claims for saving public stores, and foreign governments have sometimes requested the British Admiralty to award as an arbitrator in respect of their property when salved; Kennedy, Civil Salvage 61. See 5 P. D. 197, where the subject was reviewed. Vessels of war belonging to a foreign neutral power cannot be arrested in our ports for salvage; 7 Cra. 116.

Salvage is not allowed on the clothing left by the master and crew on board the vessel which they abandon, but this should be returned free of charge; Ware 378; or for saving from a wreck bills of exchange or other evidences of debt, or documents of title; Daveis 20.

The wearing apparel of passengers is not liable for salvage services; L. R. 3 A. & E. 490; this extends only to apparel with the usual changes for the voyage and not to trunks in the hold; 36 Fed. Rep. 705.

Wreck was formerly limited to those portions of ship or cargo which are stranded. But by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, it includes jetsam and derelict, and, in salvage law, it includes any part of a ship or cargo aground or afloat; Kennedy, Civil Salvage 53.

The right to salvage for saving life depends upon something—ship, cargo, or freight—having been preserved; 8 P. D. 117; and such salvage can be recovered only against the party to whom the property belonged; 15 P. D. 146; i. e. from the ship if the cargo was lost; or from the cargo, if the ship was lost. The value of the property salved is the limit of recovery; 2 P. D. 157. Life salvors may claim against the property salved, although its preservation was not due to salvage services; 2 P. D. 145. Taking passengers from a burning vessel at sea is not the subject of salvage under the British act; L. R. 3 A. & A. 487.

The liability to pay salvage is not confined to the actual legal owners of the property saved, but extends to those who have an interest in the property, and whose interests have been saved by the placing of the property itself in security; 15 Prob. Div. 142.

A tug being partly in fault in colliding with a schooner, is not entitled to salvage for towing the schooner into port; 52 Fed. Rep. 323.

Bar to salvage claim. An express explicit agreement, in distinct terms, to pay at all events, whether the property shall be saved or not, a sum certain, or a reasonable sum, for work, labor, and the hire of a vessel in attempting to save the property, is inconsistent with a claim for salvage; and when such agreement is pleaded in bar and proved, any claim for salvage will be disallowed; 2 Curt. C. C. 350; 2 W. Rob. 177. See 123 U. S. 40. An agreement fairly made and fully understood by the salvors, to perform a salvage service for a stipulated sum or proportion to be paid in the event of a successful saving, does not alter the nature of the service as a salvage service, but fixes the amount of compensation. But such an agreement will not be binding upon the master or owner of the property unless the court can clearly see that no advantage has been taken of the party's situation, and that the rate of compensation agreed upon is just and reasonable; 1 Stor. 323; 1 Sumn. 207; 1 Blackf. 414. A custom in any particular trade that vessels shall assist each other without claiming salvage is legal, and a bar to a demand for salvage in all cases where it properly applies; 1 W. Rob. 440. See supra.

Forfeiture or denial of salvage. Embezzlement of any of the goods saved works a forfeiture of the salvage of the guilty party; Ware 380; 1 Sumn. 328; and, in general, fraud, negligence, or carelessness in saving or preserving the property, or any gross misconduct on the part of the salvors in connection with the property saved, will work a total forfeiture of the salvage, or a diminution of the amount; 2 Cra. 240; 1 W. Rob. 497; 3 id. 122; 2 E. L. & E. 554; 6 Wheat. 152; 6 Wall. 548; [1892] Prob. 58, 70.

Salvors rescuing a derelict property are bound to care for its preservation while they retain possession; 84 Fed. Rep. 202.

Distribution. The distribution of salvage among the salvors, like the amount, rests in the sound discretion of the court. In general, all persons, not under a pre-existing obligation of duty to render assistance, who have contributed by their exertions to save the property, and who have not forfeited their rights by their misconduct, are entitled to share in the salvage, as well those who remain on board the salvor vessel in the discharge of their duty, but are ready and willing to engage in the salvage enterprise, as those who go on board and navigate the wreck; Ware 483; 2 Dods. 132; 2 W. Rob. 115; 2 Cra. 240. The apportionment between the owners and crew of the salvor ship depends upon the peculiar circumstances of each case: such as, the character, size, value, and detention of the vessel, its exposure to peril, and like considerations, and the number, labor, exposure, and hazard of the crew. In ordinary cases, the more usual proportion allowed the owners of a salvor sail-vessel is one-third; 2 Cra. 240; 1 Sumn. 425; 3 id. 579. The owner of a steam-vessel, if of considerable value, is often allowed a larger proportion; Marv. Wreck & Salv. 247. The master's share is usually double that of the mate, and the mate's double that of a seaman, and the share of those who navigate the derelict into port, or do the labor, double that of those who remain on board the salvor vessel. But these proportions are often varied according to the circumstances, so as to reward superior zeal and energy and discourage indifference and selfishness; 3 Hagg. Adm. 121. See Abb. Shipp., 13th ed. 1021.

In marine insurance, the salvage is to be accounted for by the assured to underwriters in an adjustment of a total or salvage loss, or assigned to the underwriters by abandonment or otherwise; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1726. And so, also, the remnant of the subject insured or of the subject pledged in bottomry, and (if there be such) in that of a fire insurance, and of the interest in the life of a debtor (if so stipulated in this case), is to be brought into the settlement for the loss in like manner; 2 Dutch. 541; 15 Ohio 81; 2 N. Y 285; 4 La. 289; 2 Sumn. 157.

The liability to pay salvage is not confined to the actual legal owners of the property saved, but it extends to all those who have an interest in the property and whose interests have been saved; 15 Prob. Div. 142.

Provision is made in R. S. § 4652 for salvage for the recapture of vessels or other property captured by any force hostile to the United States, before the capture. See the next titles; WRECK; RECAPTURE.

SALVAGE CHARGES. In Insurance. All those costs, expenses, and charges necessarily incurred in and about the saving and preservation of the property imperilled, and which, if the property be insured, are eventually borne by the underwriters. Stevens, Av. c. 2, § 1.

SALVAGE LOSS. That kind of loss which it is presumed would, but for certain services rendered and exertions made, have become a total loss. It also means, among underwriters and average-adjusters, a mode of settling a loss, under a policy, in cases where the goods have been necessarily sold at a port short of the port of destination, in consequence of the perils insured against. In such cases, though the property be not abandoned to the underwriter, the principle of abandonment is assumed in the adjustment of the loss. The underwriter pays a total loss. The net proceeds of the sale of the goods, after deducting all the expenses, are retained by the assured, and he credits the underwriter with the amount; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1480.

SALVOR. In Maritime Law. A person who saves property or rescues it from impending peril on the sea or when wrecked on the coast of the sea, or, in the United States, on a public navigable river or lake where interstate commerce is carried on, and who is under no pre-existing contract or obligation of duty by his relation to the property to render such services. 1 Hagg. Adm. 236; 1 Curt. C. C. 378.

In general the crew cannot claim as salvors of their own ship or cargo, they being under a pre-existing obligation of duty to be vigilant to avoid the danger, and when in it to exert themselves to rescue or save the property, in consideration of their wages merely; 1 Hagg. Adm. 236; 2 Mas. C. C. 319. But if their connection with the ship be dissolved, as by a capture, or the ship or cargo be voluntarily abandoned by order of the master, sine spe revertendi aut recuperandi, such abandonment taking place bona fide and without coercion on their part, and for the purpose of saving life, their contract is put an end to, and they may subsequently become salvors; 16 Jur. 572; 3 Sumn. 270; 2 Cra. 240; Daveis 121. A passenger; 3 B. & P. 612, n.; 1 W. N. C. (Pa.) iv.; 48 Fed. Rep. 479; 33 id. 884; a pilot; 10 Pet. 108; Gilp. 65; Lloyd's agent; 3 W. Rob. 181; an agent; [1892] Prob. 366; official persons; 3 Wash. C. C. 567; 1 C. Rob. 46; officers and crews of naval vessels; 2 Wall. Jr. 67; 1 Hagg. Adm. 158; 15 Pet. 518; coast guards; Bened. Adm. § 300 a; may all become salvors, and, as such, be entitled to salvage for performing services in saving property, when such services are not within or exceed the line of their proper official duties. But it is said that neither crew, pilot, ship's agent, nor public servants can, under ordinary circumstances, be salvors; Kennedy, Civil Salvage 25; nor can passengers; 2 Hagg. 3.

The fact that a part owner in a salving ship also has an interest in the salved property, will not prevent him from sharing in the salvage; 51 Fed. Rep. 916. An incorporated wrecking and salvage company may be granted salvage awards as liberally as natural persons so engaged; 40 Fed. Rep. 301.

The finders of a derelict (that is, a ship or goods at sea abandoned by the master and crew without the hope or intention of returning and resuming the possession) who take actual possession with an intention and with the means of saving it, acquire a right of possession which they can maintain against all the world, even the true owner, and become bound to preserve the property with good faith and bring it to a place of safety for the owner's use. They are not bound to part with the possession until their salvage is paid, or the property is taken into the custody of the law preparatory to the amount of salvage being legally ascertained; Davies 20; Olc. 462; Ware 339. If they cannot with their own force convey the property to a place of safety without imminent risk of a total or material loss.

they cannot, consistently with their obligations to the owner, refuse the assistance of other persons proffering their aid, nor exclude them from rendering it under the pretext that they are the finders and have thus gained the right to the exclusive possession. But if third persons unjustifiably intrude themselves, their services will inure to the benefit of the original salvors; 1 Dods. 414; 3 Hagg. Adm. 156; Olc. 77. See SALVAGE.

If a first set of salvors fall into distress, and are assisted by a second or third set, the first or second do not lose their claim to salvage, unless they voluntarily and without fraud or coercion abandon the enterprise, but they all share together according to their respective merits; 1 Sumn. 400; 1 W. Rob. 406; 2 id. 70. When a vessel stands by and renders services to another, upon request, even though no benefit result from her doing so, she is entitled to salvage; 8 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 263. In cases of ships stranded or in distress, not derelicts, salvors do not acquire an exclusive possession as against the owner, the master, or his agent. While the master continues on board, he is entitled to retain the command and control of the ship and cargo and to direct the labor. The salvors are assistants and laborers under him; and they have no right to prevent other persons from rendering assistance, if the master wishes such aid; 3 Hagg. Adm. 383; 2 W. Rob. 307; 2 E. L. & E. 551. When the ship has been relieved from its peril, salvors forfeit no right and impair no remedy by leaving the ship; 1 Hagg. Adm. 156; 1 Newb. 275. Their remedy to recover salvage is by libel or suit in the district court of the United States, sitting as a court of admiralty.

SALVUS PLEGIUS. A safe pledge; called, also, "certus plegius," a sure pledge. Bract. 160 b.

SAME. Same does not always mean identical. It frequently means of the kind or species, not the specific thing. 40 Ia. 487, 493. See Stroud, Dict.

SAMPLE. A small quantity of any commodity or merchandise, exhibited as a specimen of a larger quantity called the bulk.

A part shown as a specimen. 33 Gratt. 909.

When a sale is made by sample, the vendor warrants the quality of the bulk to be equal to that of the sample; Benj. Sales § 648; and if it afterwards turn out that the bulk does not correspond with the sample, the purchaser is not, in general, bound to take the property on a compensation being made to him for the difference; 1 Camp. 113. See 4 Camp. 22; 5 Johns. 395; 13 Mass. 139; 3 Rawle 37; 14 M. & W. 651. It is held that the vendor does not warrant goods, as fit for a particular purpose; 37 S. C. 7.

To constitute a sale by "sample," the contract must be made solely with reference to the sample; 13 Mass. 139; 40 N. Y. 113. Not every sale where a sample is shown is a sale by sample; there must be an understanding, expressed or implied, that the sale is by sample; 10 Wall. 383; 19 Md. 157. The mere exhibition of a sample is but a representation that it has been fairly taken from the full; 5 N. Y. 73. In Pennsylvania it has been held that in the absence of fraud or representation as to the quality, a sale by sample is not in itself a warranty of the quality of the goods, but simply a guaranty that the goods shall be similar in kind and merchantable; 83 Pa. 319; but the rule was changed by statute in 1887, the decision having been unsatisfactory to the profession and the public.

Although goods sold by sample are not in general deemed to be sold with an implied warranty that they were merchantable, the facts and circumstances may justify the inference that this implied warranty is superadded to the contract; L. R. 4 Ex. 49. If a manufacturer agrees to furnish goods according to sample, the sample is to be considered as if free from any secret defect of manufacture not discoverable on inspection, and unknown to both parties; L. R. 7 C. P. 438; but if the sale is made by a merchant, who is not a manufacturer, there is no implied warranty against secret defects; 7 Allen 29. It is an implied condition in a sale by sample that the buyer shall have a fair opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sample, and an improper refusal by the vendor to allow this will justify the buyer in rejecting the contract; 1 B. & C. 1. See Benj. Sales § 649.

SAN SALVADOR. A republic of Central America. The president is elected for four years and has a ministry. The national assembly is elected for two years by universal suffrage. There is a high court and a court of appeal. The code of laws is adopted from the Spanish and Napoleonic Codes.

SANCTION. That part of a law which inflicts a penalty for its violation or bestows a reward for its observance. Sanctions are of two kinds,—those which redress civil injuries, called civil sanctions, and those which punish crimes, called penal sanctions. 1 Hoffm. Leg. Outl. 279; Ruth. Inst. b. 2, c. 6, s. 6; Toull. tit. prél. 86; 1 Bla. Com. 56. See LAW.

SANCTUARY. A place of refuge, where the process of the law cannot be executed.

Sanctuaries may be divided into religious and civil. The former were very common in Europe,—religious houses affording protection from arrest to all persons, whether accused of crime or pursued for debt. This kind was never known in the United States, and was abolished in England by statute 21 Jac. I. c. 28.

Civil sanctuary, or that protection which is afforded to a man by his own house, was always respected in this country. The house protects the owner from the service of all civil process in the first instance, but not if he is once lawfully arrested and takes refuge in his own house. See DOOR; HOUSE; ARREST.

No place affords protection from arrest in criminal cases: a man may, therefore, be arrested in his own house in such cases, and the doors may be broken for the purpose of making the arrest. See ARREST.

SANÆ MENTIS. Of sound mind. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 7, § 1.

SANE. Whole; sound; in healthful state. It is applicable equally to the mind and to the body. 5 N. J. L. 661.

SANE MEMORY. That understanding which enables a man to make contracts and his will, and to perform such other acts as are authorized by law. See LUNACY; MEMORY; NON COMPOS MENTIS.

SANG, SANC. Blood. These words are nearly obsolete.

SANGUINEM EMERE. A redemption by villeins, of their blood or tenure, in order to become freemen.

SANGUIS. The right or power which the chief lord of the fee had to judge and determine cases where blood was shed. Mon. Ang. t. i. 1021.

SANIS. A kind of punishment among the Greeks; inflicted by binding the malefactor fast to a piece of wood. Encyc. Lond.

SANITARY AUTHORITIES. Persons having jurisdiction over their respective districts in regard to sewerage, drainage, supply of water, prevention of nuisances, etc. See HEALTH; QUARANTINE.

SANITY. The state of a person who has a sound understanding; the reverse of insanity.

The sanity of an individual is always presumed; 5 Johns. 144; 1 Pet. 163; 1 Hen. & M. 476; 4 Wash. C. C. 262. See INSANITY.

SANS CEO QUE. The same as Absque hoc, which see.

SANS FRAIS. Without expense.

SANS IMPEACHMENT DE WASTE. Without impeachment of waste. Litt. § 152.

SANS NOMBRE (Fr. without number). In English Law. A term used in relation to the right of putting animals on a common. The term common sans nombre does not mean that the beasts are to be innumerable, but only indefinite, not certain; Willis 227; but they are limited to the commoner's own commonable cattle, levant et couchant, upon his lands, or as many cattle as the land of the commoner can keep and maintain in winter. 5 Term 48; 1 Wms. Saund. 28, n. 4.

SANS RECOURS (Fr. without recourse). Words which are sometimes added to an indorsement by the indorsee to avoid incurring any liability. 7 Taunt. 160; 3 Cra. 193; 7 id. 159; 12 Mass. 172; 14 S. & R. 325. See INDORSEMENT.

SAIO. A tip-staff or sergeant-at-arms. Cowel; Cunningham.

SASINE. In Scotch Law. The ceremony of the symbolical tradition of land, answering to livery of sasine of the English law. 4 Kent 459.

SATISDATIO (Lat. satis, and dare). In Civil Law. Security given by a party to an action to pay what might be adjudged against him. It is a satisfactory security in opposition to a naked security or promise. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 3 Bla. Com. 291.

SATISFACTION (Lat. satis, enough, facio, to do, to make). In Practice. An entry made on the record, by which a party in whose favor a judgment was rendered declares that he has been satisfied and paid.

In many states provision is made by statute, requiring the mortgagee to discharge a mortgage upon the record, by entering satisfaction in the margin, or by separate instrument, to be recorded on the margin. The refusal or neglect to enter satisfaction after payment and demand renders the mortgagee liable to an action after the time given him by the respective statutes for doing the same has elapsed, and subjects him to the payment of damages, and, in some cases, treble costs. In Indiana and New York, the register or recorder of deeds may himself discharge the mortgage upon the record on the exhibition of a certificate of payment and satisfaction signed by the mortgagee or his representatives, and attached to the mortgage, which shall be recorded. See MORTGAGE. As to accord and satisfaction, see ACCORD.

In Equity. The donation of a thing, with the intention, expressed or implied, that such donation is to be an extinguishment of some existing right or claim in the donee. See LEGACY; CUMULATIVE LEGACY.

SATISFACTION, CONTRACTS TO. A term used to express a class of contracts in which one party agrees to perform his promise to the satisfaction of the other. The cases have been recently classified by an able writer (Prof. Lawson, in 46 Cent. L. J. 360) as follows:—1. Where the fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment of the promisor are involved. 2. Where the question is merely one of operative fitness or mechanical utility. In the first class the courts refuse to say that where a man agrees to pay if he is satisfied with the performance, he should be compelled to pay if some one else is satisfied with it. The courts recognize that in matters of taste or opinion there is no absolute standard as to what is good or bad. Hence, where the subject-matter is a suit of clothes; 113 Mass. 136; a bust of the defendant's husband; 44 Conn. 218; a portrait of the defendant's daughter; 39

Mich. 49; a cabinet organ; 2 Atl. Rep. (Va.) 583; a set of artificial teeth; 7 Pitts. L. J. 140; a carriage; 2 C. B. N. S. 779; a steam-heater for a house; 26 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 745; a play to be written by an author for an actor; 34 N. Y. Supp. 292; a design for a bank-note; 10 N. Y. Supp. 5; 14 id. 155; the question is not one for the court or jury to decide, but for the promisee alone.

So where the contract gives the master a right to discharge a servant if he is satisfied that the servant is incompetent; 54 Am. Rep. 714; or to employ him so long as he is satisfactory; 24 Hun 115; 6 Lans. 280; or to pay for services if they are satisfactory; 8 N. Y. Supp. 485.

In the second class of cases, the writer maintains that the same principle of law should be applied, and gives a number of cases where it has been applied; where the subject-matter of the agreement was the making of a book-case; 7 Gray 171; the sale of a harvesting machine; 50 Mich. 565; the sale of a steam fire engine; 24 Fed. Rep. 893; of a cord binder; 33 Minn. 32; a steamboat; 11 Hun 70; an elevator; 108 Pa. 297; steam fans; 66 Wis. 218; a printing press; 36 Fed. Rep. 414; a grain binder; 35 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 841; a gas machine; 99 Mass. 183; a fanning mill; 43 Ill. 445.

The promisee, to come under the rules in the above cases, must act in good faith; his dissatisfaction must be actual, not feigned; real, not merely pretended; 49 Vt. 345; 108 Pa. 297; 43 Vt. 528. He must not act from caprice; 130 Pa. 66. He must, if a test is necessary to determine its fitness, give that test or allow it to be made; 65 Md. 198; 66 Wis. 218; 38 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 763; 80 Fed. Rep. 705; 26 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 745, holding that where the promisor dies before the test is made, the right to reject vests in his executor.

So an article to be manufactured cannot be rejected before it is substantially completed, so that the promisor will be able fairly to determine whether it was or would be satisfactory to him; 108 Pa. 297.

In a contract to furnish ventilating machinery, to the buyer's satisfaction, in order to justify a refusal of the work, some reasonable ground of dissatisfaction must be shown, and the existence of such ground is for the jury; 18 N. Y. L. J., following 108 N. Y. 289.

That the goods are not satisfactory does not give the purchaser the right to reject them and to claim damages for the breach of contract of the seller; 15 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 405; nor to keep them and recover damages in an action for the contract price; 36 Fed. Rep. 414; 19 Me. 147.

If one agrees to perform to the satisfaction of another, he cannot recover without fulfilling the terms of the contract.

But, (1) in matters of personal taste the promisee is the sole judge as to whether he is or ought to be satisfied; 113 Mass. 136; 44 Conn. 218; 155 Pa. 394.

(2) In sales of goods where the promisor can be put substantially in statu quo the promisee is the sole judge; 50 Mich. 565; 66 Wis. 218.

(3) In contracts for work and labor other than such as are to satisfy a matter of personal taste, where the work and labor would be wholly lost to the promisor if refused, the courts tend to the view that the promisee must be satisfied when he ought to be; 101 N. Y. 387; 149 Mass. 284. See Huffcutt's Ans. Contr. 348.

There are a few cases which are apparently discordant, but which will be found, as Prof. Lawson observes, to rest on the difference between executory contracts of sale, and contracts for work and labor which have been done on the house or land of the promisee; 149 Mass. 284; 116 N. Y. 230; 108 id. 292; 9 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 427; 81 Fed. Rep. 943; 21 So. Rep. (Ala.) 983; 14 Mo. App. 503. The cases in 127 Mo. 138; 2 Johns. 395; 45 Hun 75, appear to be really discordant.

SATISFACTION PIECE. In English Practice. An instrument of writing in which it is declared that satisfaction is acknowledged between the plaintiff and defendant. It is signed by the attorney, and on its production and the warrant of attorney, to the clerk of the judgments, satisfaction is entered on payment of certain fees. Lee, Dict of Pract. Satisfaction.

SATISFACTORY EVIDENCE. That which is sufficient to induce a belief that the thing is true; in other words, it is credible evidence. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3049.

SATISFACTORY LEASE. Under an agreement to pay commissions for negotiating a "satisfactory lease" the lessor cannot arbitrarily refuse to accept a lease negotiated; 29 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1001.

SATISFACTORY PROOF. Where a city charter authorized contracts for street improvements to be given to the lowest bidder "who shall give satisfactory proof of his" ability to properly perform the work, it was held that the board of public works could not exercise an arbitrary discretion in awarding the contract, but must base their discretion on facts reasonably tending to support its determination. 31 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 613.

SATISFIED. When applied to a note or bond, paid. 1 Root 306.

SATISFIED TERMS ACT. The stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112, passed to abolish satisfied outstanding terms of years in land. By this act, terms which shall henceforth become attendant upon the inheritance, either by express declaration or construction of law, are to cease and determine. This in effect abolishes outstanding terms; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 296, 297; Wms. R. P. pt. iv. c. 1; Moz. & W.

SATURDAY'S STOP. A space of time from evensong on Saturday till sunrising on Monday, in which it was not lawful to take salmon in Scotland and the northern parts of England. Cowel.

SAVING CLAUSE. In a legal instrument a clause exempting something which might otherwise be subjected to the operation of the instrument. In an act of parliament, a saving clause which is repugnant to the body of such act is void. 1 Co. 118. See CONSTRUCTION.

SAVING THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. The saving or preserving a debt from being barred by the operation of the statute.

SAVINGS BANK. An institution in the nature of a bank, established for the purpose of receiving deposits of money, for the benefit of the persons depositing, to accumulate the produce of so much thereof as shall not be required by the depositors, their executors or administrators, at compound interest, and to return the whole or any part of such deposit, and the produce thereof to the depositors, their executors or administrators, deducting out of such produce so much as shall be required for the necessary expenses attending the management of such institution, but deriving no benefit whatever from any such deposit or the produce thereof. Grant, Bank., 5th ed. 262; Bolles, Banks & Dep. 177.

Savings banks are not banking institutions in the commercial sense of that phrase and are not to be classed as national banks in determining the validity of state taxation of the latter; 125 U. S. 60.

Savings banks cannot do business as banks of discount unless by statute; 12 Blatch. 209. It has been considered that savings banks are trustees for depositors; 68 Me. 396; 32 N. J. Eq. 163; and therefore subject to the jurisdiction of equity; 28 N. J. Eq. 552; they have been held to be agents for the depositor; 38 Conn. 203; and debtors; 92 N. Y. 7; 122 id. 135; 130 Mass. 443. That the rights of the depositors are of a two-fold character and occupy a position similar to that of stockholders in an ordinary corporation, see 1 Moraw. Corp. § 391; but as long as the institution is solvent the depositors are mere creditors; id.

Where the by-laws require the presentation of the pass-book, as a condition precedent to the withdrawal of the deposit and this regulation is printed in the book, it becomes a part of the contract between the parties; 91 Pa. 315; 141 Mass. 33. In case of the loss of the pass-book, the depositor has the right to receive his money without producing it; 14 R. I. 68.

It has been held that after payment to one who was apparently in lawful possession of the pass-book, the real depositor cannot recover unless upon proof of want of care on the part of the officers of the savings banks. See 101 N. Y. 58. And even where the pass-book contains a stipulation that the deposit may be paid to any one who presents the book, the officers are still bound to use reasonable care; 59 N. H. 1. A by-law that a savings bank shall not be liable to pay a depositor when it has already paid the holder of his pass-book which had been stolen, is not binding unless the depositor has notice of it; 68 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 118.

In case of insolvency the assets are distributable among the depositors; 93 Mo. 503. In 28 N. J. Eq. 552, the court made an order scaling down the deposits and authorized the savings bank to continue business. By statute in New York courts may scale down deposits of insolvent savings banks and authorize them to continue business.

The surplus of a savings bank belongs in equity to its depositors, and si a part of its deposits in the same sense as the stipulated interest is; 154 N. Y. 122; and is exempt from taxation as much as deposits; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1341 (S. C. of N. Y., since affirmed).

Postoffice saving banks were established in England in 1861. The act authorized the postmaster-general, with the consent of the treasury, to cause his officers to receive deposits in all towns in which a branch office for that purpose was appointed, for remittance to the principal office, and to repay the same, under such regulations as should be prescribed. Deposits are payable ten days after demand, with interest at the rate of two pounds ten shillings per cent. per annum. The deposits are paid over to the national debt commissioners and by them invested in such securities as are lawful for the funds of other savings banks. Any deficiency is made good out of the consolidated fund; 3 Steph. Com. 88.

SAVOY. One of the ancient privileged places or sanctuaries. 4 Steph. Com. 227, n.

SAXON LAGE. The laws of the West Saxons. Cowel.

SAY ABOUT. Words frequently used in contracts to indicate an uncertain quantity. They have been said to mark emphatically the vendor's purpose to guard himself against being supposed to have made an absolute promise as to quantity; 21 W. R. 609. There a sale of all the spars manufactured, say about 600, was held to be complied with by tender of 496 spars. See 2 B. & Ad. 106; 5 Gray 589; 8 Pet. 181.

SCACCARIUM. A chequered cloth resembling a chess-board which covered the table in the Exchequer, and on which, when certain of the king's accounts were made up, the sums were marked and scored with counters. Hence the court of exchequer or curia scaccarii derived its name. 3 Bla. Com. 44.

SCALAM. The old way of paying money into the Exchequer. Cowel.

SCALING LAWS. A term used to signify statutes establishing the process of adjusting the difference in value between depreciated paper money and specie.

Such statutes were rendered necessary by the depreciation of paper money necessarily following the establishment of American independence. And, more recently, to discharge those debts which were made payable in Confederate money. The statutes are now obsolete.

SCANDAL. A scandalous verbal report or rumor respecting some person.

SCANDALOUS MATTER. In Equity Pleading. Unnecessary matter criminatory of the defendant or any other person, alleged in the bill, answer, or other pleading, or in the interrogatories to or answers by witnesses. Adams, Eq. 306. Matter which is relevant can never be scandalous; Story, Eq. Pl. § 270; 15 Ves. 477; see 42 N. J. Eq. 248, and the degree of relevancy is of no account in determining the question; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 19; 2 Ves. 24; 15 id. 477. Where scandal is alleged, whether in the bill; 2 Ves. 631; answer; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 313; or interrogatories to or answer of witnesses; 2 Y. & C. 445; it will be referred to a master at any time; 2 Ves. 631; and, by leave of court, even upon the application of a stranger to the suit; 6 Ves. 514; 5 Beav. 82; and matter found to be scandalous by him will be expunged; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 266, 862; 4 Hen. & M. 414; at the cost of counsel introducing it, in some cases; Story, Eq. Pl. § 266. The circuit court has an inherent power to strike out scandalous matter on their own motion and in the absence of pleading, and may order a bill to be struck from its files and to permit the complainant to file a new bill excluding such matter; 85 Fed. Rep. 55. The presence of scandalous matter in the bill is no excuse for its being in the answer; 19 Me. 214. Parts of an answer, though immaterial as a defence and scandalous, will not be suppressed when intended to meet charges of bad faith in the bill; 84 Fed. Rep. 379.

SCANDALUM MAGNATUM (L. Lat. slander of great men). Words spoken in derogation of a peer, a judge, or other great officer of the realm. 1 Ventr. 60. This was distinct from mere slander in the earlier law, and was considered a more heinous offence. Bull. N. P. 4; Webb's Poll. on Torts 288 b.

It depended on early English statutes which after being long obsolete in practice were repealed in 1887. See 3 Bla. Com. 124.

SCAVAGE, SCHEVAGE, SCHEWAGE, or SHEWAGE. A kind of toll or custom, exacted by mayors, sheriffs, etc., of merchant strangers, for wares showed or offered for sale within their liberties. Prohibited by 19 Hen. VII. c. 7. Cowel.

SCHEDULE. In Practice. When an indictment is returned from an inferior court in obedience to a writ of certiorari, the statement of the previous proceedings sent with it is termed the schedule. 1 Saund. 309 a, n. 2.

Schedules are also frequently annexed to answers in a court of equity, and to depositions and other documents, in order to show more in detail the matter they contain than could otherwise be conveniently shown.

The term is frequently used instead of inventory.

SCHIREMAN. A sheriff; the ancient name of an earl.

SCHIRRENS-GELD. A tax paid to sheriffs for keeping the shire or county court. Cowel.

SCHISM-BILL. An act passed in the reign of Queen Anne to restrain Protestant dissenters from educating their own children, and forbade all tutors and schoolmasters to be present at any dissenting place of worship.

SCHOOL. An institution of learning of a lower grade than a college or a university. A place of primary instruction. Webster, Dict. As used in the American reports, the term generally refers to the common or public schools existing under the laws of each state and maintained at the expense of the public.

Public school is synonymous with common school; 103 Mass. 97; but the term is not limited to a school of the lowest grade; it includes all schools from those lower than grammar schools to high schools, but not one founded by a charitable bequest which vests the order and superintendence of it in a board of trustees; id.

When the legislature has placed the management of public schools under the exclusive control of directors, trustees, and boards of education, the courts have no rightful authority to interfere by directing what instruction shall be given, or what book shall be used therein; 23 Ohio St. 211; s. c. 13 Am. Rep. 233. A statute establishing separate systems of schools for white and colored children is not in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States. And where appropriate schools for colored children are maintained, such children may be lawfully excluded from schools established for white children; 48 Col. 36; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 405; 48 Ind. 327; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 738; 93 Ind. 303; 45 Ark. 121; 95 U. S. 504; nor did such exclusion violate any constitutional right before the fourteenth amendment was adopted; 5 Cush. 108. But it has been held that unless the legislature clearly confers upon boards of education the power to establish separate schools for white and colored children, the power does not exist; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 616. A Chinese pupil cannot be excluded from a public school; 66 Cal. 473. A mandamus will lie compelling trustees to admit colored children to public schools where separate schools are not provided for them; 7 Nev. 342; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 713.

Reading the Bible in the public schools is sectarian instruction; 76 Wis. 177 (under the language of the constitution and laws); contra, 38 Me. 379; 12 Allen 127; 95 Ill. 263; 64 Ia. 367; 23 Ohio St. 211.

In Ohio, the constitution of the state does not enjoin or require religious instruction or the reading of religious books in the public schools of the state.

The legislature having placed the management of the public schools under the exclusive control of directors, trustees and boards of education, the courts have no rightful authority to interfere by directing what instruction shall be given or what books read therein; 23 Ohio St. 211.

In that case an injunction was granted by the court below to restrain the Board of Education of Cincinnati from prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the public schools and the decree was reversed. For the history of the case, arguments, and opinions, see "The Bible in the Public Schools," published in Cincinnati, 1870.

A writ of mandamus to compel the discontinuance of Bible reading in the common schools was granted by a unanimous court, upon the ground that it was sectarian instruction, forbidden by the state constitution; 76 Wis. 177; s. c. 7 L. R. A. 330.

This case was followed by Carpenter, J., in a case in Detroit, Pfeiffer v. School Board, May, 1897.

In a Pennsylvania case it was held by Edwards, J., that the reading of the Holy Scriptures, in either version, as a part of the opening exercises in our public schools, does not violate any constitutional provision. It is not in contravention of art. 1, 3, nor art. 10, 2; 7 Dist. Rep. Pa. 596.

The argument of Richard H. Dana, Jr., in the case in 38 Me. 376, has been published in pamphlet form.

In an action by a father for the expulsion of his child from school for a refusal to comply with the orders of her instructor to read the Bible as a part of the course of instruction, a non-suit was granted and confirmed on the ground that an action could not be maintained by a parent, for want of direct pecuniary injury; 38 Me. 376; and an action by the child by her next friend was not sustained upon the ground that the action by the school committee was discretionary and could not be reviewed.

A student of the University of Illinois, after six years' acquiescence in the regulations requiring attendance at chapel, absented himself, disclaiming any conscientious scruples on the subject and was dismissed; an application for a mandamus to reinstate him was denied upon the ground that the rule requiring attendance upon chapel was not a violation of the constitutional provision that "no person shall be required to attended on or support any ministry or place of worship, against his consent;" 137 Ill. 296.

A bill by a taxpayer for an injunction to restrain school directors from allowing the schoolhouse to be used by any society or organization for the purpose of a religious meeting-house, was dismissed on demurrer; 93 Ill. 61. But it has been held that school directors have no authority to permit public school buildings to be used for holding sectarian religious meetings or public lyceum meetings, or for any other purpose than school purposes, but they may permit them to be used for lectures of an educational nature; 182 Pa. 251.

A public school teacher has no authority to compel a pupil to pursue a certain study against the wishes of its parent; 35 Wis. 59; 79 Ill. 567; 87 Ill. 303; contra, 108 Ind. 31; 105 Mass. 475; 48 Vt. 444; 38 Me. 379; 59 N. H. 473; 29 Ohio St. 89. A teacher has no right to punish a child for neglecting or refusing to study certain branches from which the parents of the child have requested that it might be excused, or which they have forbidden it to pursue, if those facts are known to the teacher. The proper remedy is to exclude the pupil from the school; 50 Ia. 145; 35 Wis. 59.

Directors; 105 Mass. 475; and teachers; 48 Vt. 444; may expel or suspend pupils for sufficient cause, as for breach of discipline; 46 Vt. 452; or for general immoral character; 8 Cush. 160; for refusal to take part in musical exercises; 108 Ind. 31; for refusal to write English compositions; 32 Vt. 224; for absence contrary to rules; 48 id. 444; for refusal on the part of the parents to sign and return periodical written reports of the pupil's standing; 52 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 710; for misbehavior outside of the school tending to injure the school and subvert the master's authority; 32 Vt. 114; for a father's refusal to permit the master to whip the child or to correct him himself; 30 S. W. Rep. 269; by reason of the parent visiting the school when in session and using offensive language to the teacher; 28 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 896, in which case the court cited a letter from Bleckley, C. J., to the court relating to the case. In 71 Mo. 628, it was held that the proper remedy for truancy was not expulsion, but it is also held that the conduct of a pupil at a boarding school, in continually playing truant, and finally leaving for his home, is ground for expulsion; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 268.

Truancy is an offence not known to the common law, but it is held that boys between the ages of twelve and fifteen who refuse to attend school and wander about public places during school hours are truants under a statute: 36 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 1001, which case see as to correction for that offence. Where the rules of a boarding school provide that there will be no reduction in case of withdrawals, and that all payments will be forfeited on expulsion, there can be no recovery; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 268.

It is usually provided by constitution or statute that school facilities must be provided for children of the proper age, and compulsory education has been established in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Massachusetts, Montana, Vermont, Washington, Wyoming, Wisconsin, Rhode Island, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

School directors cannot terminate a contract with a teacher by doing away with the particular school; 1 Ind. App. 138.

In the absence of any express stipulation to that effect there is no contract to give a scholarship to the candidate who obtains the highest marks in the scholarship examination; [1895] 1 Ch. 480.

A college has no right to refuse arbitrarily to examine a student for a degree. See N. Y. L. J., June 27, 1891.

Within the scope of his powers the decision of a state superintendent of schools is conclusive and will be enforced by mandamus; 31 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 168.

See Am. & E. Encyc. Law; Taylor, Public Schools; VACCINATION; LANDS, PUBLIC; EDUCATION; CORRECTION; ASSAULT; BATTERY. And as to correction, see also 35 Am. L. Reg. 88.

SCHOOLMASTER. One employed in teaching a school. See SCHOOL.

The schoolmaster is entitled to be paid for his services, by those who employ him. See 1 Bingh. 357; 8 J. B. Moore 368. His duties are to teach his pupils what he has undertaken, and to have a special care over their morals. See 1 Stark. 421; ASSAULT. The salary of a public school teacher is not attachable by trustee process while in the hands of city officials whose duty it is to pay it; 54 Ga. 21; s. c. 21 Am. Rep. 273.

SCENERY. Where a contract provided for the furnishing of scenery and fixtures for a theatre it was held that painting the walls did not fall within the denomination either of scenery or fixtures. 4 R. I. 364.

SCIENCE. The knowledge of many, methodically digested and arranged, so as to be attainable by one; a body of principles and deductions to explain the nature of some matter. 33 La. Am. 637. See 13 Wend. 205; BOOKS OF SCIENCE.

SCIENDUM (L. Lat.). In English Law. The name given to a clause inserted in the record by which it is made "known that the justice here in court, in this same term, delivered a writ thereupon to the deputy sheriff of the county aforesaid, to be executed in due form of law." Lee, Dict. Record.

SCIENTER (Lat. knowingly). The allegation in a pleading of knowledge; Webb's Poll. Torts 614; on the part of a defendant or person accused, which is necessary to charge upon him the consequence of the crime or tort.

A man may do many acts which are justifiable or not, as he is ignorant or not ignorant of certain facts. He may pass a counterfeit coin, when he is ignorant of its being counterfeit, and is guilty of no offence; but if he knew the coin to be counterfeit, which is called the scienter, he is guilty of passing counterfeit money.

Where evidence of the scienter has been given, it may be rebutted, as where the charge is passing counterfeit money, the defendant may show that the bill was genuine or that under the circumstances he had reason to suppose it was, or that he examined a counterfeit detector in regard to it; 8 Wis. 167. Proof of a conspiracy to put forth counterfeit bills is admissible to show the scienter as against one of the parties to it; 19 Conn. 233.

In an action against the owner of a dog, alleged to be a dangerous animal, the fact that it is a watch-dog, chained during the day and loosed at night, is sufficient without further proof of scienter; 35 La. Ann. 1091.

The averment of a scienter in an indictment is not sufficient to supply omission of the positive statement that the defendant did the act; 2 McCord 377; and a charge in an indictment that the defendant passed, etc., a counterfeit, without alleging that he knew it to be such, is insufficient even after verdict; 105 U. S. 611.

SCILICET (Lat. scire, to know, licet, it is permitted: you may know: translated by to wit, in its old sense of to know). That is to say; to wit; namely.

It is a clause to usher in the sentence of another, to particularize that which was too general before, distribute what was too gross, or to explain what was doubtful and obscure. It neither increases nor diminishes the premises or habendum, for it gives nothing of itself; it may make a restriction when the preceding words may be restrained; Hob. 171; 1 P. Wms. 18; Co. Litt. 180 b, n. 1.

When the scilicet is repugnant to the precedent matter, it is void: for example, when a declaration in trover states that the plaintiff on the third day of May was possessed of certain goods which on the fourth day of May came to the defendant's hands, who afterward, to wit, on the first day of May, converted them, the scilicet was rejected as surplusage; Cro. Jac. 428. And see 6 Binn. 15; 3 Saund. 291, note 1.

Stating material and traversable matter under a scilicet will not avoid the consequences of a variance; 1 M'Cl. & Y. 277; 2 B. & P. 170, n. 2; 4 Johns. 450; 2 Pick. 223; nor will the mere omission of a scilicet render immaterial matter material; 2 Saund. 206 a; even in a criminal proceeding; 2 Camp. 307, n. See 3 Term 68; 3 Maule & S. 173.

SCINTILLA OF EVIDENCE. The doctrine that where there is any evidence, however slight, tending to support a material issue, the case must go to the jury, since they are the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence. 43 Ga. 323; 106 Mass. 271; 40 Mo. 151; 87 id. 462; 35 Ia. 585; 48 Vt. 358. In the United States courts and in England, it has been decided that the more reasonable rule is, "that before the evidence is left to the jury, there is, or may be, in every case, a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the burden or proof is imposed;" 94 U. S. 278; 11 How. 373; 9 Wall. 197; 13 C. B. 916; 3 C. B. N. S. 150.

The old rule is likewise exploded in several of the states, whose courts are now in the constant habit of ordering nonsuits against the complaint of the plaintiff; 49 N. J. L. 671; 76 Me. 132; 1 Greene 494; 9 Gill 331; 26 N. H. 351; 49 N. Y. 671; or giving peremptory instructions to the jury to find for one party or the other; 71 N. C. 451; 15 Kan. 244; or of sustaining demurrers to the evidence, in cases where there is confessedly some evidence supporting a material issue. This is done under the guise of various expressions, which seem to leave the ancient prerogative of the jury intact. In Maryland, the judge achieves this result by determining the legal sufficiency of the evidence; 7 Gill & J. 20; and in Missouri by determining its legal effect; 9 Mo. 113. See Thomps. Charg. Jury § 30; Thomps. Jur. § 2246.

SCINTILLA JURIS (Lat. a spark of law or right). A legal fiction resorted to for the purpose of enabling feoffees to uses to support contingent uses when they come into existence, thereby to enable the statute of uses, 27 Hen. VIII., to execute them. For example, a shifting use: a grant to A and his heirs to the use of B and his heirs, until C perform an act, and then to the use of C and his heirs. Here the statute executes the use in B, which, being coextensive with A's seisin, leaves no actual seisin in A. When, however, C performs the act, B's use ceases, and C's springs up, and he enjoys the fee-simple; upon which the question arises, out of what seisin C's use is served. It is said to be served out of A's original seisin; for upon the cessor of B's use it is contended that the original seisin reverted to A for the purpose of serving C's use, and is a possibility of seisin, or scintilla juris. See 4 Kent 238, and the authorities there cited, for the learning upon this subject; Burton, R. P. 48; Wilson, Springing Uses 59; Washb. R. P.

SCIRE FACIAS (Lat. that you make known). The name of a writ (and of the whole proceeding) founded on some public record. Fost. Fed. Pr. 301.

Public records, to which the writ is applicable, are of two classes, judicial and non-judicial.

Judicial records are of two kinds, judgments in former suits, and recognizances which are of the nature of judgments. When founded on a judgment, the purpose of the writ is either to revive the judgment, which because of lapse of time —a year and a day at common law, but now varied by statutes—is presumed in law to be executed or released, and therefore execution on it is not allowed without giving notice, by scire facias, to the defendant to come in, and show if he can, by release or otherwise, why execution ought not to issue; or to make a person, who derives a benefit by or becomes chargeable to the execution, a party to the judgment, who was not a party to the original suit. In both of these classes of cases, the purpose of the writ is merely to continue a former suit to execution. When the writ is founded on a recognizance, its purpose is, as in cases of judgment, to have execution; and though it is not a continuation of a former suit, as in the case of judgments, yet, not being the commencement and foundation of an action, it is not an original, but a judicial, writ, and at most is only in the nature of an original action. When founded on a judicial record, the writ must issue out of the court where the judgment was given or recognizance entered of record, if the judgment or recognizance remains there, or if they are removed out of the court where they are; 3 Bla. Com. 416, 421; 3 Gill & J. 359; 2 Wms. Saund. 71, notes. See 78 Ill. 78; 58 Tex. 472.

Scire facias to revive a judgment being a continuation of the suit, jurisdiction thereon is in the court where the judgment was rendered, regardless of the residence of the parties; 71 Tex. 103. A scire facias to revive a judgment being regarded in Pennsylvania as a substitute for an action of debt on the judgment, a judgment so revived without service or appearance has no binding force as against a defendant who resides in another state; 161 U. S. 642; and in Vermont it is held that when judgment is thus revived the plaintiff cannot recover in another state thereon after the limitation has run against the original judgment; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 489. A judgment may be revived at common law on a writ and alias writ of sci. fa. with return of nihil as to each; 52 Mo. App. 251; but such revival on two returns of nihil operates merely to keep in force the local lien and does not stop the running of the statute of limitations in another state where the defendant resides; 161 U. S. 642.

Non-judicial records are letters patent and corporate charters. The writ, when founded on a non-judicial record, is the commencement and foundation of an original action; and its purpose is always to repeal or forfeit the record. Quo warranto is the usual and more appropriate remedy to forfeit corporate charters and offices; and scire facias, though used for that purpose, is more especially applicable to the repeal of letters patent. When the crown is deceived by a false suggestion, or when it has granted anything which by law it cannot grant, or where the holder of a patent office has committed a cause of forfeiture, and other like cases, the crown may by its prerogative repeal by scire facias its own grant. And where by several letters patent the self-same thing has been granted to several persons, the first patentee is of right permitted, in the name and at the suit of the crown by scire facias, to repeal the subsequent letters patent; and so, in any case of the grant of a patent which is injurious to another, the injured party is permitted to use the name of the crown in a suit by scire facias for the repeal of the grant. This privilege of suing in the name of the crown for the repeal of the patent is granted to prevent multiplicity of suits; 2 Wms. Saund. 72, notes. A state may by scire facias repeal a patent of land fraudulently obtained; 1 H. & M'H. 162. See REPEAL; PATENT.

Scire facias is also used by government as a mode to ascertain and enforce the forfeiture of a corporate charter; 3 Wood, Ry. L. 208, n.; where there is a legal existing body capable of acting, but who have abused their power; it cannot, like quo warranto (which is applicable to all cases of forfeiture), be applied where there is a body corporate de facto only, who take upon themselves to act, but cannot legally exercise their powers. In scire facias to forfeit a corporate charter, the government must be a party to the suit; for the judgment is that the parties be ousted and the franchises be seized into the hands of the government; 2 Kent 313; 10 B. & C. 240; 5 Mass. 230; 16 S. & R. 140; 4 Gill & J. 1; 9 id. 365; 4 Gill 404. See QUO WARRANTO.

Scire facias is also used to suggest further breaches on a bond with a condition, where a judgment has been obtained for some but not all of the breaches and to recover further instalments where a judgment has been obtained for the penalty before all the instalments are due; 1 Wms. Saund. 58, n. 1; 4 Md. 375.

By statute, in Pennsylvania, scire facias is the method of proceeding upon a mortgage.

The pleadings in scire facias are peculiar. The writ recites the judgment or other record, and also the suggestions which the plaintiff must make to the court to entitle him to the proceeding by scire facias. The writ, therefore, presents the plaintiff's whole case, and constitutes the declaration, to which the defendant must plead; 1 Blackf. 297. And when the proceeding is used to forfeit a corporate charter, all the causes of forfeiture must be assigned in distinct breaches in the writ, as on a bond with a condition is done in the declaration or replication. And the defendant must either disclaim the charter or deny its existence, or deny the facts alleged as breaches, or demur to them. The suggestions in the writ, disclosing the foundation of the plaintiff's case, must also be traversed if they are to be avoided. The scire facias is founded partly upon them and partly upon the record; 2 Inst. 470, 679. They are substantive facts, and can be traversed by distinct pleas embracing them alone, just as any other fundamental allegation can be traversed alone. All the pleadings after the writ or declaration are in the ordinary forms. There are no pleadings in scire facias to forfeit a corporate charter to be found in the books, as the proceeding has been seldom used. There is a case in 1 P. Wms. 207, but no pleadings. There is a case also in 9 Gill 379, with a synopsis of the pleadings. Perhaps the only other case is in Vermont; and it is without pleadings. A defendant cannot plead more than one plea to a scire facias to forfeit a corporate charter: the statutes of 4 & 5 Anne, ch. 16, and 9 Anne, ch. 20, allowing double pleas, do not extend to the crown; 1 Chitty, Pl. 479; 1 P. Wms. 220.

SCIRE FACIAS AD AUDIENDUM ERRORES (Lat.). The name of a writ which is sued out after the plaintiff in error has assigned his errors. Fitzh. N. B. 20; Bac. Abr. Error (F). Where a scire facias ad audiendum errores describes correctly, in its recital, the parties to the judgment complained of, but in the citing part brings in parties whose names do not appear in the writ of error, the irregularity in the scire facias may be cured by amendment; 30 Fla. 210.

SCIRE FACIAS AD DISPROBANDUM DEBITUM (Lat.). The name of a writ in use in Pennsylvania, which lies by a defendant in foreign attachment against the plaintiff, in order to enable him, within a year and a day next ensuing the time of payment to the plaintiff in the attachment, to disprove or avoid the debt recovered against him. Act, June 13, 1836.

SCIRE FACIAS FOR THE CROWN. The summary proceeding by extent is only resorted to when a crown debtor is insolvent, or there is good ground for supposing that the debt may be lost by delay. Whart. Law Lex.

SCIRE FACIAS QUARE RESTITUTIONEM NON. A writ which lies where execution on a judgment has been levied, but the money has not been paid over to the plaintiff, and the judgment is afterwards reversed in error or on appeal; in such a case a scire facias is necessary before a writ of restitution can issue. Chit. 582.

SCIRE FECI (Lat. I have made known). In Practice. The return of the sheriff, or other proper officer, to the writ of scire facias, when it has been served.

SCIRE FIERI INQUIRY. In English Law. The name of a writ formerly used to recover the amount of a judgment from an executor.

The history of the origin of the writ is as follows: When on an execution de bonis testatoris against an executor the sheriff returned nulla bona and also a devastavit, a fieri facias de bonis propriis might formerly have been issued against the executor, without a previous inquisition finding a devastavit and a scire facias. But the most usual practice upon the sheriff's return of nulla bona to a fieri facias de bonis testatoris was to sue out a special writ of fieri facias de bonis testatoris, with a clause in it, "et si tibi constare poterit," that the executor had wasted the goods, then to levy de bonis propriis. This was the practice in the king's bench till the time of Charles I.

In the common pleas a practice had prevailed in early times upon a suggestion in the special writ of fieri facias of a devastavit by the executor, to direct the sheriff to inquire by a jury whether the executor had wasted the goods, and if the jury found he had, then a scire facias was issued out against him, and, unless he made a good defence thereto, an execution de bonis propriis was awarded against him.

The practice of the two courts being different, several cases were brought into the king's bench on error, and at last it became the practice of both courts, for the sake of expedition, to incorporate the fieri facias inquiry, and scire facias, into one writ, thence called a scire fieri inquiry,—a name compounded of the first words of the two writs of scire facias and fieri facias, and that of inquiry, of which it consists.

This writ recites the fieri facias de bonis testatoris sued out on the judgment against the executor, the return of nulla bona by the sheriff, and then, suggesting that the executor had sold and converted the goods of the testator to the value of the debt and damages recovered, commands the sheriff to levy the said debt and damages of the goods of the testator in the hands of the executor, if they could be levied thereof, but if it should appear to him by the inquisition of a jury that the executor had wasted the goods of the testator, then the sheriff is to warn the executor to appear, etc. If the judgment had been either by or against the testator or intestate, or both, the writ of fieri facias recites that fact, and also that the court had adjudged, upon a scire facias to revive the judgment, that the executor or administrator should have execution for the debt, etc. Clift, Entr. 659; Lilly, Entr. 664.

Although this practice is sometimes adopted, yet the most usual proceeding is by action of debt, on the judgment, suggesting a devastavit because in the proceeding by scire fieri inquiry the plaintiff is not entitled to costs unless the executor appears and pleads to the scire facias: 1 Saund. 219, n. 8. See 2 Archb. Pr. 934.

SCIREWYTE. The annual tax or prestation paid to the sheriff for holding the assizes or county courts. Par. Ant. 573.

SCOLD. See COMMON SCOLD.

SCOPE. Design, aim, or purpose. 75 Ill. 246. As ordinarily used, extent, limits, etc.

SCOT AND LOT. In English Law. See LOT AND SCOT.

SCOTALE. An extortion by officers of the forests who kept ale-houses and compelled people to drink there under fear of their displeasure. Manw. For. Laws, pt. 1, 216.

SCOTCH MARRIAGES. See GRETNA GREEN.

SCOTCH PEERS. Peers of the kingdom of Scotland; of these sixteen are elected by the rest and represent the whole body. They are elected for one parliament only. See PEERS.

SCOTLAND. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

SCOUNDREL. An opprobrious title, applicable to a person of bad character. General damages will not lie for calling a man a scoundrel, but special damages may be recovered when there has been an actual loss; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2250; 1 Chitty, Pr. 44.

SCRAWL. A mark which is to supply the place of a seal. 2 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. 589. See SCROLL.

SCRIBE. See CANCELLARIUS.

SCRIP. A certificate or schedule. Evidence of the right to obtain shares in a public company; sometimes called scrip certificate, to distinguish it from the real title to shares. Whart. L. Dict.; 15 Ark. 12. Sometimes, in this country, it indicates a substitute for a cash dividend, usually payable out of future earnings. Land scrip is a certificate that the holder is entitled to take up so much (usually government) land. The possession of such scrip is prima facie evidence of ownership of the shares therein designated; Add. Contr. 203*. It is not goods, wares, or merchandise within the statute of frauds; 16 M. & W. 66. Scrip certificates have been held negotiable; L. R. 10 Ex. 337; Dos Passos, Stockbrokers 488. Where the interest of a mortgage bond may, at the option of the mortgagor, be paid in scrip, if he allows the day for payment to pass without exercising such option, the interest must be paid in money; 122 U. S. 687. See DIVIDEND.

SCRIPT. The original or principal instrument, where there are part and counterpart.

SCRIVENER. A person whose business it is to write deeds and other instruments for others; a conveyancer.

Money scriveners are those who are engaged in procuring money to be lent on mortgages and other securities, and lending such money accordingly. They act also as agents for the purchase and sale of real estates.

An attorney, qua attorney, is not a scrivener; 18 E. L. & Eq. R. 402.

To be considered a money scrivener, a person must be concerned in carrying on the trade or profession as a means of making a livelihood. He must in the course of his occupation receive other men's money into his trust and custody, to lay out for them as occasion offers; 3 Camp. 538.

SCROLL. A mark intended to supply the place of a seal made with a pen on a deed or other instrument of writing. Mitch. R. E. & Conv. 454, 455. In Mississippi and Florida it has been held, that "a scroll attached to a written instrument has the effect of a seal, whenever it appears from the body of the instrument, the scroll itself, or the place where affixed, that such scroll was intended as a seal;" 42 Miss. 304; 9 Sm. & M. 34. In Tennessee and Minnesota the word "seal" affixed to the name has been held equivalent to a seal or scroll: 1 Swan 333; 57 Minn. 499; and so where the word seal is printed and appears opposite the name; 156 Pa. 329; otherwise in Virginia and Indiana. In Wisconsin and Pennsylvania a printed "L. S.," inclosed in brackets, in the usual place of a seal, is sufficient; 5 Wis. 549 (see 140 N. Y. 249); or in the latter state a seal made with a flourish of the pen; 1 S. & R. 72; 121 Pa. 192. In Georgia a printed "L. S." annexed to the maker's signature constitutes a seal by adoption where the instrument recites that it is executed under the maker's hand and seal; 81 Ga. 453. An expression in the body of the instrument denoting that it is sealed is sufficient, whatever the scroll may be; 5 Mo. 79; 1 Morris (Ia.) 43; 5 Harr. (Del.) 351; 13 La. Ann. 524. See Martindale, Conveyancing; SEAL.

SCRUET ROLL (called, also, Scruet Finium, or simply Scruet). In Old English Law. A record of the bail accepted in cases of habeas corpus. The award was set down in the remembrance roll, together with the cause of commitment, the writ and return were put on file, the bail was recorded in the scruet. 3 Howell, St. Tr. 134, arg. For remembrance roll, see Reg. Mich. 1654, § 15.

SCRUTATOR (Lat. from scrutari, to search). In Old English Law. A bailiff whom the king of England appointed in places that were his in franchise or interest, whose duty was to look after the king's water-rights: as, flotsam, jetsam, wreck, etc. 1 Hagr. Tracts 23; Pat. 27 Hen. VI. parte 2, m. 20; Pat. 8 Ed. IV. parte 1, m. 22.

SCUTAGE (from Lat. scutum, a shield). Knight-service. Littleton § 99. The tax which those who, holding by knight-service, did not accompany the king, had to pay on its being assessed by parliament. Scutage certain was a species of socage where the compensation for service was fixed. Littleton § 97; Reg. Orig. 88.

SCYREGEMOTE. The name of a court among the Saxons. It was the court of the shire, in Latin called curia comitatis, and the principal court among the Saxons. It was holden twice a year for determining all causes both ecclesiastical and secular.

SE DEFENDENDO (Lat.). Defending himself. Homicide se defendo may be justifiable.

SEA. The ocean; the great mass of water which surrounds the land, and which probably extends from pole to pole, covering nearly three-quarters of the globe. Waters within the ebb and flow of the tide are to be considered the sea. Gilp. 526.

A large body of salt water communicating with the ocean is also called a sea; as, the Mediterranean sea, etc.

Very large inland bodies of salt water are also called seas: as, the Caspian sea, etc.

"A sea," in nautical language, may mean a general disturbance of the surface of the water occasioned by a storm, and breaking it up into the roll and lift of waves following or menacing each other; some particular wave or surge, separate from its fellows; 101 N. Y. 463.

As a boundary in a conveyance, includes the beach to low water mark; 84 Me. 14.

The high seas include the whole of the seas below high water mark and outside the body of the county. Couls. & F. on Waters. See 2 Ex. Div. 62; HIGH SEAS.

The open sea is public and common property, and any nation or person has ordinarily an equal right to navigate it or to fish therein; 1 Kent 27; Ang. Tide-Waters 44; and to land upon the sea-shore. Bened. Adm. 224–257.

Every nation has jurisdiction over the person of its own subjects in its own public and private vessels when at sea; and so far territorial jurisdiction may be considered as preserved; for the vessels of a nation are in many respects considered as portions of its territory, and persons on board are protected and governed by the laws of the country to which the vessel belongs. The extent of jurisdiction over adjoining seas is often a question of difficulty, and one that is still open to controversy. As far as a nation can conveniently occupy, and that occupation is acquired by prior possession or treaty, the jurisdiction is exclusive; 1 Kent 29–31. This has been heretofore limited to the distance of a cannon-shot, or marine league, over the waters adjacent to its shore; 2 Cra. 187, 234; 1 Cra. C. C. 62; Bynkershoek, Qu. Pub. Juris. 61; 1 Azuni, Marit. Law 185, 204; Vattel 207. See LEAGUE; SEAMAN; ADMIRALTY; ARM OF THE SEA; LOW WATER MARK; LITUS MARIS; TERRITORIAL WATERS; SEA-SHORE; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

SEA BATTERIES. Assaults by masters in the merchant service upon seamen, at sea.

SEA DAMAGED. In a contract for sale of goods shipped or to be shipped, the phrase, "Sea damaged, if any, to be taken at a fair valuation," contemplates the risk of damage to the goods by perils of the sea, and does not restrict to any particular ship the subsequent transportation of such goods to their destination. 161 U. S. 57. See PERILS OF THE SEA.

SEA-GREENS. In Scotch Law. Grounds overflowed by the sea in spring tides. Bell, Dict.

SEA-LETTER. SEA-BRIEF. In Maritime Law. A document which should be found on board of every neutral ship; it specifies the nature and quantity of the cargo, the place from whence it comes and its destination. Chitty, Law of Nat. 197; 1 Johns. 192. See SHIP'S PAPERS.

SEA POSTAGE. The difference reached by subtracting inland postage from the total postage. 28 Ct. Cl. 1.

SEA-SHORE. That space of land on the border of the sea which is alternately covered and left dry by the rising and falling of the tide; or, in other words, that space of land between high and low water mark. Hargrave, St. Tr. 12; 6 Mass. 435; 1 Pick. 180; 5 Day 22; 15 Me. 237; 2 Zabr. 441; 4 De G. M. & G. 206; 40 Conn. 382; s. c. 16 Am. Rep. 51, n; 123 Mass. 361; 23

Tex. 358; 70 Cal. 206; 34 Miss. 21. See TIDE; TIDE-WATER.

At common law, the sea-shore, in England, belongs to the crown; in this country, to the state; Ang. Tide-Wat. 20; 3 Kent 347; 27 E. L. & E. 242; 6 Mass. 435; 1 Pick. 180; 60 N. Y. 56; 16 Pet. 367; 3 How. 221; 3 Zabr. 624. In England, the sovereign is not the absolute proprietor, but holds the sea-shore subject to the public rights of navigation and fishery; and if he grants it to an individual, his grantee takes subject to the same rights; Phear, Rights of Water 45–55; Ang. Tide-Wat. 21. So in this country it has been held that the rights of fishery and navigation remain unimpaired by the grant of lands covered by navigable water; 6 Gill 121. But the power of the states, unlike that of the crown, is absolute except in so far as it is controlled by the federal constitution; Ang. Tide-Wat. 59. The states, therefore, may regulate the use of their shores and the fisheries thereon, provided such regulations do not interfere with the laws of congress; 4 Wash. C. C. 371; 18 How. 71; 4 Zabr. 80; 2 Pet. 245. And see TIDE-WATER; RIVER; FISHERY.

The public right of fishing includes shrimping and gathering all shell-fish or other fish whose natural habitat is between high and low water mark; 5 Day 22; 2 B. & P. 472; 22 Me. 353.

In Massachusetts and Maine, by the colony ordinance of 1641, and by usage arising therefrom, the proprietors of the adjoining land on bays and arms of the sea, and other places where the tide ebbs and flows, go to low water mark, subject to the public easement, and not exceeding one hundred yards below high water mark; 6 Mass. 439; 19 Pick. 191; 3 Kent 429; Dane, Abr. c. 68, a. 3, 4. It was a question whether this ordinance extended to New Hampshire; 17 N. H. 527. A description of lands extending to the sea-shore will not include the shore itself; 6 Mass. 439; 13 Gray 257; 31 Me. 134; but it is the general rule that the owner of land holds to low water mark, although bounded by stakes and stones on the bank of the river; 1 Whart. 131; 5 Dana 181; 6 Humphr. 358.

A conveyance of a wharf has been held to include flats in front of it; 6 Mass. 332; 7 Cush. 66; and as an incident sea weed cast upon them is prima facie an appurtenant belonging to the owner of the soil; 6 Hun 257; 7 Metc. 322. See LAKE; WHARF.

By the Roman law, the shore included the land as far as the greatest wave extended in winter: est autem littus maris, quatenus hibernus fluctus maximus excurrit. Inst. l. 2, t. 1, s. 3. Littus publicum est eatenus qua maxime fluctus exæstuat. Dig. 50. 16. 112.

The Civil Code of Louisiana seems to have followed the law of the Institutes and the Digest; for it enacts, art. 442, that the "sea-shore is that space of land over which the waters of the sea are spread in the highest water during the winter season." See 5 Rob. 182; Dougl. 425; 1 Holst. 1; 2 Rolle, Abr. 170; Dy. 326; 5 Co. 107; Bacon, Abr. Courts of Admiralty (A); 16 Pet. 234, 367; Ang. Tide-Waters; 5 M. & W. 327; 22 Me. 350; Coul. & F. Waters; Hale's De Jure Maris, given in full in Hale, Sea Sh. and for the most part in 16 Am. Rep. 54.

SEA WEED. A species of grass which grows in the sea.

When cast upon land, it belongs to the owner of the land adjoining the sea-shore, upon the grounds that it increases gradually, that it is useful as manure and a protection to the ground, and that it is some compensation for the encroachment of the sea upon the land; 3 B. & Ad. 967; 2 Johns. 313, 323. See 5 Vt. 223; 34 N. Y. 215; 2 R. I. 218. But when cast upon the shore between high and low water mark it belongs to the public and may be lawfully appropriated by any person; 40 Conn. 382; s. c. 16 Am. Rep. 54.

SEAL. An impression upon wax, wafer, or some other tenacious substance capable of being impressed. 5 Johns. 239; 4 Kent 452. It does not seem necessary that an impression be made; 6 C. P. 411; Sugd. Powers 282.

Lord Coke defines a seal to be wax, with an impression. 3 Inst. 169. "Sigillum," says he, "est cera impressa, quia cera sine impressione non est sigillum." The definition given above is the common-law definition of a seal; Perkins 129, 134; Brooke, Abr. Faits 17, 30; 2 Leon. 21; 5 Johns. 239; 21 Pick. 417; but any other material besides wax may be used; 1 Am. L. Rev. 639; 5 Cush. 359.

Where the seal of a public officer does not contain the name of the state, but it is written in a blank left for that name, a verification authenticated by such a seal is insufficient; 68 N. W. Rep. 393.

Merlin defines a seal to be a plate of metal with a flat surface, on which is engraved the arms of a prince or nation, or private individual, or other device with which an impression may be made on wax or other substance on paper or parchment, in order to authenticate them; the impression thus made is also called a seal; Répert. mot Sceau; 3 M'Cord 583; 5 Whart. 563.

A person may adopt any seal as his own, or anything in place of a seal; 35 Fed. Rep. 337; it is not necessarily of any particular form or figure, and may consist of an outline without an enclosure, or of a single dash or flourish of the pen; and its precise form in each case depends wholly upon the taste or fancy of the person who makes it; 121 Pa. 192.

In many states, a scroll or similar device may constitute a valid seal: California, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. In several states the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments is abolished; Arkansas, California, North Dakota, South Dakota, Mississippi, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The use of seals by private persons is unnecessary in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, Ohio, Tennessee, Utah, and Washington. In some states official or corporate seals may be impressed on the paper itself: California, Connecticut, Dakota, Kansas, New York, Rhode Island, and Virginia. By U. S. R. S. § 6, an impression on the paper of any common process or instrument is sufficient.

When a seal is affixed to an instrument it makes it a specialty, and consideration is presumed; 2 Bla. Com. 446; 94 U. S. 76; but the presumption does not extend to contracts in restraint of trade where actual consideration is wanting; 3 Bing. 327; or where the real consideration was illegal; Whart. Contr. § 495; but where the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments is abolished by statute, any failure of consideration may be shown; 27 Ia. 251; 21 Ala. 88. One seal may serve for a number of signers; 47 Am. Rep. 521; 36 Am. Dec. 511; although the contrary was held in 7 Gill & J. 248; 54 Md. 327. It is said the burden is upon a party to prove the adoption of another's seal; and the question of the adoption of a seal has been held to be for the jury; 3 Dev. 420. The same contract may be the specialty of one and the parol agreement of another party to it; 20 Ill. 389; whether a mark or character is a seal depends upon the intention of the executant, as shown by the paper; 160 U. S. 514.

It is not necessary to recite in a deed that it is under seal; 34 Am. Dec. 558; 22 Cal. 157; 20 Ill. 389; although the contrary is held in Virginia and Alabama; 1 Wash. C. C. 170; 4 Ala. 140; and is recognized in New Jersey; 16 N. J. L. 324; and in many jurisdictions, conclusions are expressed as to what language in an instrument is a recognition of the seal, it being held that the use of the technical language of specialties is sufficient; 15 Ala. 43; 12 Johns. 197; or if the fact of the seal appears in the attestation clause; 5 Sawy. 510. The word "seal" written or printed within a scroll is held to be a sufficient seal; 42 Miss. 304; 28 Pa. 489; contra, 2 Rand. 446; 1 E. D. Smith 335. A recital in an instrument that it is sealed, will not make it a specialty; 66 Ill. 501; 68 Me. 160.

When an instrument concludes with the words, "witness our hands and seals," and is signed by two persons, with only one seal, the jury may infer from the face of the paper that the person who signed last adopted the seal of the first; 6 Pa. 302.

An executory contract under seal, ignorantly made in pursuance of a parol authority, will be sufficient to maintain an action, the seal being disregarded as mere excess; 60 Pa. 214.

Where a corporation executed a promissory note, payable to the order of its president, attaching thereto, before delivery, its corporate seal, it was held that the note was not a negotiable note under the law merchant, but was a specialty; 8 Fed. Rep. 534. See 1 Ohio 386; PROMISSORY NOTE; as to the origin and use of seals, see Addison, Contr. 6; SCROLL. The affixing of his private seal by a corporate officer to a contract of the corporation binds the latter only by simple contract; 14 Pet. 19; Ang. & Ames, Corp. § 295.

The public seal of a foreign state proves itself; 4 Dall. 416; and public acts, decrees, and judgments exemplified under this seal are received as true and genuine; 2 Cra. 187, 238; 7 Wheat. 273, 335; 2 Conn. 85; 6 Wend. 475; 35 Fed. Rep. 134. See 2 Munf. 53. But to entitle its seal to such authority the foreign state must have been acknowledged by the government within whose jurisdiction the forum is located; 3 Wheat. 610; 9 Ves. 347.

While an action of covenant will lie on an unsealed instrument in the state where executed, it will not lie in the state requiring a sealed instrument to support such action; 8 Pet. 362; nor is the rule different where, by the lex loci contractus, a scroll or other device is recognized as a seal, but is not in the state of the forum; 8 How. 471. Whether any seal is required upon a protest of a bill of exchange is determined by the lex loci contractus; 13 How. 472; 106 U. S. 546. A scroll does not amount to a seal of office; 15 Neb. 470; or a corporate seal; 10 Allen 251.

The seal of a notary public is taken judicial notice of the world over; 2 Esp. 700; 5 Cra. 535; 6 S. & R. 484; 3 Wend. 173; 1 Gray 175; but it must not be a scroll; 4 Blackf. 158. Judicial notice is taken of the seals of superior courts; Com. Dig. Evidence (A 2); not so of foreign courts; 3 East 221; 9 id. 192; except admiralty or marine courts; 2 Cra. 187; 4 id. 292, 435; 3 Conn. 171. See Story, Confl. Laws § 643; 2 Phill. Ev. 454, notes.

In Louisiana and other civil-law jurisdictions the effects of a deceased person are taken into public custody by being sealed, and the details of the action of officials in connection therewith are carefully regulated by statute.

SEAL DAYS. In English Practice. Motion days in the court of chancery, so called because every motion had to be stamped with the seal, which did not lie in court in the ordinary sittings out of term. Whart. Dict.

SEAL FISHERIES. The controversy concerning the sealing interest in Bering sea between the United States and Great Britain has involved an elaborate discussion with respect to the characteristics and habits of the seals, and the question whether their custom of going in herds through the open sea to certain islands at stated periods of the year for breeding purposes, made them the lawful prey of any captor, or whether the United States could assert over them a property right growing out of the fact that unquestionably the home of the animal was in the territory of the United States. This subject occupied the attention of the Paris tribunal under the treaty for the settlement of claims growing out of the seizure of vessels engaged in the seal fishery. The discussions were of great interest and extended to the general question so much mooted by writers on the subject, whether international law had any real basis other than the mere consent of nations to specific propositions. That particular controversy was decided against the United States and the proceedings may be referred to for information on the subject. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Rev. St. § 1956 prohibits the killing within the limits of Alaska Territory of fur seals and various other fur-bearing animals under penalty of fine and imprisonment, and forfeiture of vessels found engaged in violating the section, but power is given to the secretary of the treasury to make regulations authorizing the killing of such animals.

Rev. St. § 1957 provides for the prosecution of offences under the preceding section in the United States district courts of California, Oregon, and Washington.

Rev. St. § 1958 authorizes the secretary of the treasury to remit the fine where in his opinion it was incurred without wilful negligence or fraud.

By act of Feb. 21, 1893, it was provided that when any international arrangement for the protection of fur seals should be concluded, the provisions of R. S. § 1956 should be extended over all that portion of the Pacific ocean included in such international arrangement; 2 Sup. 89. By act of Dec. 21, 1897, all citizens of the United States or owing an allegiance thereto are prohibited from killing, capturing, or hunting fur seals in the waters of the Pacific ocean north of Lat. 35° N. and including Bering sea and the sea of Okhotsk, or from equipping vessels for that purpose under penalty of fine and imprisonment and forfeiture of the vessel. Any seals found in any vessel of the United States within the waters specified are presumed to have been unlawfully killed, and the importation into the United States of fur seals' skins is prohibited under penalty of being seized and destroyed; Stat. 55 Cong. 2d Sess. 226.

It has been held by United States courts that the waters of Bering sea are those within the three-mile zone from Alaska; 75 Fed. Rep. 513; 143 U. S. 472. R. S. § 1956 is violated though the animals are taken by boats sent out to a distance from the vessel seized; 60 Fed. Rep. 914. See 50 id. 108. A vessel is liable to forfeiture if her boats take seals within the prohibited zone though she does not go there; 77 Fed. Rep. 908, under act of 1894. R. S. § 1958 does not authorize the secretary of the treasury to remit forfeiture of a vessel condemned by the United States district court for Alaska for being engaged in killing fur seals; 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 584.

See FISHERY.

SEAL OFFICE. In English Practice. The office at which certain judicial writs are sealed with the prerogative seal, and without which they are of no authority. The officer whose duty it is to seal such writs is called "sealer of writs."

SEAL OF THE UNITED STATES. The seal used by the United States in congress assembled shall be the seal of the United States, viz.: ARMS, paleways of thirteen pieces argent and gules; a chief azure; the escutcheon on the breast of the American eagle displayer proper, holding in his dexter talon an olive-branch, and in his sinister a bundle of thirteen arrows, all proper, and in his beak a scroll, inscribed with this motto, "E pluribus unum." For the CREST: over the head of the eagle which appears above the escutcheon, a glory, or breaking through a cloud, proper, and surrounding thirteen stars, forming a constellation argent on an azure field. REVERSE, a pyramid unfinished. In the zenith, an eye in a triangle, surrounded with a glory proper: over the eye, these words, "Annuit cœptis." On the base of the pyramid, the numerical letters MDCCLXXVI; and underneath, the following motto: "Novus ordo sectorum." Resolution of Congress, June 20, 1782; R. S. § 1793. See 1 Cra. 158. It is in the custody of the secretary of state; R. S. § 1794.

SEAL-PAPER. A document issued by the lord chancellor previously to the commencement of the sittings, detailing the business to be done for each day in his court, and in the courts of the lords justices and vice-chancellors. The master of the rolls in like manner issued a seal-paper in respect to the business to be heard before him. Sm. Ch. Pr. 9.

SEALED AND DELIVERED. The common formula of attestation of deeds and other instruments, written immediately over the witnesses' names.

SEALER. An officer in chancery who sealed the writs and instruments.

SEALING A VERDICT. In Practice. The putting a verdict in writing, and placing it in an envelope, which is sealed. To relieve jurors after they have agreed, it is not unusual for the counsel to agree that the jury shall seal their verdict and then separate. When the court is again in session, the jury come in and give their verdict in all respects as if it had not been sealed; and a juror may dissent from it if since the sealing he has honestly changed his mind; 8 Ohio 405; 1 Gilm. 333.

SEAMAN. A sailor; a mariner; one whose business is navigation. 3 Boulay-Paty, Dr. Com. 233; Laws of Oleron, art. 7; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 19; Bened. Adm. 277.

The term seamen, in its most enlarged sense, includes the captain as well as other persons of the crew; in a more confined signification, it extends only to the common sailors; 3 Pardessus, n. 667. But the mate; 1 Pet. Adm. 246; the cook and steward; 2 id. 268; and engineers, clerks, carpenters, firemen, deck-hands, porters, and chamber-maids, on passenger-steamers, when necessary for the service of the ship; 1 Conkl. Adm. 107; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 582; are considered, as to their rights to sue in the admiralty, as common seamen; and persons employed on board of steamboats and lighters engaged in trade or commerce on tide-water are within the admiralty jurisdiction; while those employed in ferry-boats are not; Gilp. 203, 532. Persons who do not contribute their aid in navigating the vessel or to its preservation in the course of their occupation, as musicians, are not to be considered as seamen with a right to sue in the admiralty for their wages; Gilp. 516. Persons employed upon a flat boat with an engine erected thereon, mainly employed in constructing bulkheads and to assist in moving materials to and fro, are to be regarded as rendering maritime services, so as to give them a lien on the vessel for their wages; 84 Fed. Rep. 200. One who brings a vessel to her home port, and lays her up there, i. e. anchors her out of the channel, pumps her out, dries her sails, sees to her fastenings, and renders other services usually performed by mariners, is entitled to a lien for his compensation; 59 Fed. Rep. 297. See LIEN.

Seamen are employed either in merchant-vessels for private service, or in public vessels for the service of the United States.

Seamen in the merchant-vessels are required to enter into a contract in writing, commonly called shipping articles, which see. This contract being entered into, they are bound, under severe penalties, to render themselves on board the vessel according to the agreement; they are not at liberty to leave the ship without the consent of the captain or commanding officer; and for such absence, when less than forty-eight hours, they forfeit three days' wages for every day of absence; and when the absence is more than forty-eight hours at one time, they forfeit all the wages due to them, and all their goods and chattels which were on board the vessel, or in any store where they may have been lodged at the time of their desertion, to the use of the owners of the vessel; and they are liable for damages for hiring other hands. They may be imprisoned for desertion until the ship is ready to sail.

A consular officer of the United States may discharge a seaman on the application of the master, for any cause sanctioned by the usages and principles of maritime law, as recognized in the United States, on the payment of the wages then earned; and all claims for wages for the remainder of the voyage is thereby cut off and barred; 36 Fed. Rep. 442.

On board, a seaman is bound to do his duty to the utmost of his ability; and when his services are required for extraordinary exertions, either in consequence of the death of other seamen or on account of unforeseen perils, he is not entitled to an increase of wages, although it may have been promised to him; 2 Camp. 317; 38 U. S. App. 219. For disobedience he could formerly be imprisoned or punished with stripes; but the correction must be reasonable; 4 Mas. 508; 2 Day 294; 1 Wash. C. C. 316; but see CORRECTION; ASSAULT; BATTERY; and, for just cause, may be put ashore in a foreign country; 1 Pet. Adm. 186; 2 id. 268; 2 East 145. By act of congress, Sept. 28, 1850, it is provided that flogging in the navy and on board of vessels of commerce be abolished. And this prohibits corporal punishment by stripes inflicted with a cat, and any punishment which in substance amounts thereto; 1 Curt. C. C. 501. See 35 Fed. Rep. 152. A master may punish a seaman who refuses to do his duty, and may, if he is incorrigible, discharge him, confine him, or deprive him of privileges; but forfeiture of wages cannot be superadded to corporal punishment, and it is not within the ordinary powers of a master to imprison a sailor on shore; 54 Fed. Rep. 533.

Seamen are entitled to their wages, of which one-third is due at every port at which the vessel shall unlade and deliver her cargo before the voyage be ended; and at the end of the voyage an easy and speedy remedy is given them to recover all unpaid wages. When taken sick, a seaman is entitled to medical advice and aid at the expense of the ship, such expense being considered in the nature of additional wages and as constituting a just remuneration for his labor and services; Gilp. 435; 2 Mas. 541; 40 Fed. Rep. 904. In case of sickness preventing a performance of duty, if the malady be not occasioned by the mariner's malconduct, the full wages are payable; and if a sailor dies on the voyage, his heirs shall have his full wages; 41 Fed. Rep. 224; Bee 134.

The right of seamen to wages is founded not in the shipping articles, but in the services performed; Bee 395: and to recover such wages the seaman has a triple remedy,—against the vessel, the owner, and the master; Gilp. 592; Bee 254. But he cannot claim wages to the end of the voyage when he has obtained his discharge at his own solicitation, and against the advice and even against the expostulation of the master; 40 Fed. Rep. 903. The legislation of most maritime countries, ancient and modern, established that the contract of a seaman always involved, to a certain extent, the surrender of his personal liberty during the life of the contract, and the necessities, and perhaps the safety, of navigation have called into existence legislation, by nearly all maritime nations, for the purpose of securing the personal attendance of the crew on board and for their criminal punishment for their desertion or absence without leave; and it is, therefore, a natural and equitable result that the expenses of their confinement and the wages of their substitutes whilst they are refusing to work should be deducted from their wages; 85 Fed. Rep. 978. In cases of desertion of seamen, the proper expenses for their arrest and detention, and the cost of supplying substitutes whilst so detained, and also the cost of any damage to property by them, may be deducted from their wages; id.

When destitute in foreign ports, American consuls and commercial agents are required to provide for them, and for their passage to some port of the United States, in a reasonable manner, at the expense of the United States; and American vessels are bound to take such seamen on board at the request of the consul, but not exceeding two men for every hundred tons of the ship, and transport them to the United States, on such terms, not exceeding ten dollars for each person, as may be agreed on. See R. S. §§ 4554–4591; SEAMEN'S FUND.

Seamen in the public service are governed by particular laws. See NAVY; NAVAL CODE; LIEN; DESERTION OF A SEAMAN; SHIPS; PARTIES.

SEAMEN'S FUND. By the act of July 16, 1798, a provision is made for raising a fund for the relief of disabled and sick seamen: the master of every vessel arriving from a foreign port into the United States is required to pay to the collector of customs at the rate of twenty cents per month for every seaman employed on board of his vessel, which sum he may retain out of the wages of such seamen; vessels engaged in the coasting trade, and boats, rafts, or flats navigating the Mississippi with intention to proceed to New Orleans, are also laid under similar obligations. The fund thus raised is to be employed by the president of the United States, as circumstances shall require, for the benefit and convenience of sick and disabled American seamen. Act of March 3, 1802, s. 1.

By R. S. § 4584, it is provided that when a seaman is discharged in a foreign country with his own consent, or when the ship is sold there, he shall, in addition to his usual wages, be paid three months' wages into the hands of the American consul, two-thirds of which are to be paid to such seamen on his engagement on board any vessel to return home, and the remaining one-third is retained in aid of a fund for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign ports. See 11 Johns. 66; 12 id. 143; 1 Mas. 45; 4 id. 541; Edw. Adm. 239.

SEARCH. In Criminal Law. An examination of a man's house, premises, or person, for the purpose of discovering proof of his guilt in relation to some crime or misdemeanor of which he is accused. See SEARCH WARRANT.

By act of March 2, 1799, s. 68, it is enacted that every collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or other person specially appointed by either of them for that purpose, shall have full power and authority to enter any ship or vessel or any dwelling-house in the daytime, upon taking proper measures, to search for goods forfeited for non-payment of duties; R. S. § 3066.

In England a prisoner arrested for an indictable offence may be searched for the purpose of finding upon him any property which will afford material evidence for the prosecution or any weapon or instrument which might be used for the purpose of escape or of inflicting injury on himself or others. There does not appear to be any authority permitting the search of prisoners for other purposes than the above, and there have been cases in which the court has directed property taken from an unconvicted person and not necessary to be used for the purpose of evidence, to be returned to him. It is said that money not connected with the offence charged should not be taken from a prisoner. Women should be employed to search female prisoners. The person's lodgings and effects may also be searched. In England special statutory provisions as to searching are made in the case, of numerous specified crimes; see Haycraft, Ex. Pow. in Rel. to Crime.

Where one was fined for drunkenness and the mayor, as a committing magistrate, found certain money on his person and applied it, against his protest, to the payment of the fine, and the prisoner insisted upon his right to accept imprisonment in place of a fine, it was held that the mayor was justified; 19 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 669.

Officers making arrests may seize articles on a prisoner and retain them for the purposes of evidence against him, though they belong to other parties; 36 Wash. L. Rep. 421. See PRISONER.

An English (1897) act provides that police magistrates may order the return of such articles, or, if not claimed, may make such order as to their disposal as they deem proper. See RES JUDICATA, as to this act.

In Practice. An examination made in the proper lien office for mortgages, liens, judgments, or other incumbrances against real estate. The certificate given by the officer as to the result of such examination is also called a search.

Conveyancers and others who cause searches to be made ought to be very careful that they should be correct with regard—to the time during which the person against whom the search has been made owned the premises; to the property searched against, which ought to be properly described; and to the form of the certificate of search. In England, by the act of 1897, a search may be ordered by telegraph.

See JUDGMENT; LIEN.

SEARCH, RIGHT OF. In International Law. The right existing in a belligerent to visit and search a neutral vessel at sea. On the continent of Europe this is called the right of visit. A distinction was formerly maintained by England between visitation and search. The former was claimed in time of peace, to ascertain whether a merchant vessel was justly entitled to the protection of the flag she had hoisted. The distinction was repudiated by Mr. Webster and by Wheaton and Kent (who concede the right of approach for the same purpose) and by Story, J., in 11 Wheat. 42. Visitation and search are no longer permissible in time of peace; 3 Whart. Dig. Int. L. § 327; except where a cruiser is sent in pursuit of a merchant vessel which has left its port under the suspicion of having committed a fraud upon the revenue, or some other crime; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 159.

The right does not extend to examine the cargo, nor does it extend to a ship of war, it being strictly confined to the searching of merchant-vessels. The exercise of the right is to prevent the commerce of contraband goods. Although frequently resisted by powerful neutral nations, yet this right appears now to be fixed beyond contravention; 1 C. Rob. 340; 11 Wheat. 42. Unless in extreme cases of gross abuse of his right by a belligerent, the neutral has no right to resist a search; 1 Kent 154.

The right of search does not exist in time of peace except upon reasonable ground to believe that the vessel is a pirate. By the Treaty of Washington, 1862, Great Britain and the United States concede a mutual right of search in certain latitudes where there is reasonable ground to believe that the flag of either country is being used to cover the African slave trade.

The right, in time of war, can be exercised by a belligerent's war-vessel or a privateer. It exists even though the neutral vessel have a government mail on board; 5 Wall. 28; neutral public ships are not subject to it; 1 Kent 156.

In making a search the ship papers are first examined, and if anything suspicious appear, the ship and cargo may be examined. If the search is resisted, or if the ship's papers (q. v.) are unsatisfactory or are absent or are destroyed or concealed, the ship may be captured. The right does not extend to persons on board. A neutral when searched is bound to have and produce proper papers. If a neutral ship resists search, both ship and cargo are liable to confiscation; 4 C. Rob. 408.

In treaties made by the United States it has generally been stipulated that the declaration of the commander of the convoy that the vessels under his charge belong to his flag and, when bound to an enemy's port, that they carry no contraband of war, shall be sufficient, and European nations, except England, have generally excepted from search merchant vessels under the convoy of public ships of the same state; and such is the opinion of most continental writers. Lord Stowell and English writers have held the opposite opinion as to the right of search in such case; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 264; and so Kent holds; 1 Kent 157, and Story, J., in 2 Cra. 438. Sailing under an enemy's convoy is conclusive ground of confiscation in England; 2 Halleck, Int. L. 266; so also 2 Cra. 438 (a dictum by Story, J.), and 1 Kent 157.

By the navy regulations, 1876, United States vessels of war are not to take under their convoy the vessels of any power at war with another, with which we are at peace, nor vessels of a neutral, unless for some special reason. Commanding officers are forbidden to permit vessels under their protection to be searched or detained by a belligerent.

The exercise of search is not a trespass; but if the cruiser capture the vessel as prize, and upon adjudication there is no probable cause, the cruiser is responsible; 2 Mas. 439.

As to the right of search—or rather of visitation—in time of peace, especially in its connection with the suppression of the slave-trade, see Wheat. Right of Search; Webster, Works, vol. 6, 329; 3 Phillimore, Int. Law, Visit and Search; Morse, Citizenship 75.

SEARCH WARRANT. In Practice. A warrant requiring the officer to whom it is addressed to search a house, or other place, therein specified, for property therein alleged to have been stolen, and, if the same shall be found upon such search, to bring the goods so found, together with the body of the person occupying the same, who is named, before the justice or other officer granting the warrant, or some other justice of the peace, or other lawfully authorized officer.

It should be given under the hand and seal of the justice, and dated.

Originally search warrants were used almost exclusively for the discovery of stolen property, but of late years their use has been extended to searches for intoxicating liquors; 54 N. H. 164; 150 Mass. 164; gaming implements; 119 id. 332; and the like. The United States laws provide for the search in the daytime only, by any custom-house officer under a search warrant; Rev. Stat. § 3066. Ownership in some specific person must be alleged in the information; 64 Ia. 300.

The constitution of the United States, Amendm. art. 4, declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or thing to be seized." See 11 Johns. 500; 3 Cra. 447; Story, Const. 1900; 116 U. S. 616.

Hale, 2 Pl. Cr. 149, recommends great caution in granting such warrants:—first, that they be not granted without oath made before a justice of a felony committed, and that the complainant has probable cause to suspect that the goods are in such a house or place, and his reason for such suspicion, see 2 Wils. 283; 1 Dowl. & R. 97; 13 Mass. 236; 5 Ired. 45; 1 R. I. 464; second, that such warrants express that the search shall be made in the daytime (but in this country this limitation is not observed; 25 Conn. 278; 145 Mass. 182; third, that they ought to be directed to a constable or other proper officer, and not to a private person; fourth, that they ought to command the officer to bring the stolen goods, and the person in whose custody they are, before some justice of the peace. See 6 B. & C. 332; 5 Metc. Mass. 98. They should designate the place to be searched; 1 M. & W. 255; 2 Metc. 329; 2 J. J. Marsh. 44; 6 Blackf. 249; 1 Conn. 40; 10 Johns. 263. The description "suspected place" is not sufficient; 3 Par. Cr. C. 656. It has been said that "the description of the place to be searched should be as certain in a warrant as would be necessary in a deed to convey such place;" 41 Me. 254. Trespass will not lie against a party who has procured a search warrant to search for stolen goods, if the warrant be duly issued and regularly executed; 6 Wend. 382; but if the warrant itself shows that the magistrate had no jurisdiction, the officer who serves it will be a trespasser; 19 How. St. Tr. 1029; 5 Ired. 45. And see 6 Me. 421; 2 Conn. 700; 11 Mass. 500; 2 Litt. 231; 6 Gill & J. 377.

Search warrants are available only in public prosecutions and not to enforce private rights; 13 Gray 454, where it was said: "Even in those cases, if we may rely on the authority of Lord Coke, their legality was formerly doubted; and Lord Camden said that they crept into the law by imperceptible practice. But their legality has long been considered to be established, on the ground of public necessity; because, without them, felons and other malefactors would escape detection." At common law they were confined to places, but in California it is held that a search warrant may be authorized by law for the person; 68 Cal. 284. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 364; 1 Archb. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 126, note; 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. ch. 16; GENERAL WARRANT.

SEAT OF JUSTICE. The county seat; the place where the courthouse, jail, and county offices are located; the place where the chancery, circuit, and county courts are held, and where the county records are kept. 20 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 502.

SEATED LANDS. In the early land legislation of some of the United States, seated is used, in connection with improved, to denote lands of which actual possession was taken. 5 Pet. 468.

Lands which are actually resided upon, cultivated, or occupied. Residence without cultivation or cultivation without residence, or both together, constitute seated lands. 6 Watts 269; 4 Pa. 214; 55 id. 98; 73 id. 418. See UNSEATED LANDS.

SEAWORTHINESS. In Maritime Law. The sufficiency of the vessel in materials, construction, equipment, officers, men, and outfit, for the trade or service in which it is employed.

It is that quality which fits a ship for carrying safely the particular cargo which it takes on board for the voyage for which it is destined. 8 U. S. App. 580.

Under a marine policy on ship, freight, or cargo, the fitness for the service of the vessel, if there is no provision to the contrary at the outset, is an implied condition, non-compliance with which defeats the insurance; 2 Johns. 231; 1 Whart. 399; 1 Camp. 1; 5 Pick. 21; 2 Ohio 211; 2 B. & Ald. 78; 6 Cow. 270; 3 Hill N. Y. 250; 4 Mas. 439; 20 Wend. 287; 1 Pet. C. C. 410; 1 Wall. Jr. 273; 1 Curt. C. C. 278; 26 Pa. 192; 4 H. L. C. 253; Olc. 110; 12 Md. 348.

It is of no consequence whether the insured was aware of the condition of the ship, or not. His innocence or ignorance is no answer to the fact that the ship was not seaworthy. When the want of seaworthiness arises from justifiable ignorance of the cause of the defect, and is discovered and remedied before any injury occurs, it is not to be considered as a defect; 1 Johns. 241; 1 Pet. 183; 2 B. & Ald. 73. See 136 U. S. 408.

The warranty of seaworthiness is absolute and extends to latent defects; 10 P. D. 103. Seaworthiness varies with the place of voyage, the class of ship, and the nature of the cargo; 2 F. & F. 263.

It includes a master having competent skill in navigation; 3 C. & P. 18; and a sufficient and competent crew; 7 B. & C. 798; and proper equipment, including proper medicines and necessaries for the voyage; 3 Esp. 257.

A vessel is not seaworthy if the cargo is so badly stowed that it is difficult and dangerous to navigate the ship; 2 F. & F. 663; or if she is not properly disinfected for the carriage of cattle; 12 Q. B. Div. 297; or has a defective crank-shaft; 10 P. D. 103; as to unseaworthiness by reason of not employing a pilot, it is said that if a vessel sails from a port where there is a pilot and the navigation requires one, the master must employ one; 3 B. & Ad. 383; but in entering a port, if the master uses due diligence to obtain a pilot but cannot find one, and, being competent himself, attempts to enter a harbor without one, it is not a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness; 3 B. & Ad. 383.

The warranty of seaworthiness in a time policy is complied with if the vessel be seaworthy at the commencement of the risk; 124 U. S. 405. Where a vessel sprung a leak, and was lost without encountering any sea peril, it was held that she was not seaworthy, heavy seas not being a sea peril within the meaning of a policy of marine insurance; 42 Fed. Rep. 861.

The opinion of carpenters who have repaired the vessel, however they may strengthen the presumption that the ship is seaworthy, when it is favorable, is not conclusive of the fact of seaworthiness; 4 Dowl. 209. The presumption prima facie is for seaworthiness; 1 Dowl. 336. See 40 Fed. Rep. 847. And it is presumed that a vessel continues seaworthy if she was so at the inception of the risk; 20 Pick. 389. See 1 Brev. 252. Where nothing is said on the subject, seaworthiness is an implied condition of a hiring of shipping; 76 Mich.

158. Any sort of disrepair left in the ship, by which she or the cargo may suffer, is a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness. A deficiency of force in the crew, or of skill in the master, mate, etc., is a want of seaworthiness; 1 Camp. 1; 4 Du. N. Y. 234; 36 Fed. Rep. 784. See 48 Fed. Rep. 463. But if there was once a sufficient crew, their temporary absence will not be considered a breach of warranty; 2 B. & Ald. 73; 1 Johns. Cas. 184; 1 Pet. 183. A charge of unseaworthiness by reason of the pilot's intoxication is not sustained when there is no evidence that he was not perfectly capable when the vessel left port, or, if he was not, that the master knew the fact, and where the pilot, when sober, was one of the best; 44 Fed. Rep. 374. A vessel may be rendered not seaworthy by being overloaded; 2 B. & Ald. 320; or by having a defective compass; 136 U. S. 408. The burden of the proof of seaworthiness is on the one who alleges it; 3 Q. B. Div. 594. The fact that a ship after being eleven hours at sea in fair weather began to leak so that she was obliged to run for a harbor of refuge, is sufficient to throw the burden of proof on the carrier even if it is not sufficient proof of unseaworthiness; 75 Fed. Rep. 74.

It can never be settled by positive rules of law how far this obligation of seaworthiness extends in any particular case, for the reason that improvements and changes in the means and modes of navigation frequently require new implements, or new forms of old ones; and these, though not necessary at first, become so when there is an established usage that all ships of a certain quality, or those to be sent on certain voyages or used for certain purposes, shall have them; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 134. Seaworthiness is, therefore, in general, a question of fact; 1 Pet. 170, 184; 9 Wall. 526; 116 N. Y. 599.

SEAWORTHY FOR THE VOYAGE. The words in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, mean that the ship must be "in a fit state, as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects, to encounter ordinary perils of the voyage." They do not include "a neglect properly to use the appliances on board a vessel well equipped and furnished." [1894] App. Cas. 222, approving 5 M. & W. 405.

SEBASTOMANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. Religious insanity or monomania.

SECESSION. The act of withdrawing; separation.

The attempted secession of eleven of the states from the United States government led to the civil war of 1861–65, and gave rise to many important decisions affecting the mutual relations of the national and state governments, and the rights of citizens under contracts made before and during the war. And first, as to the Power or Right of Secession.

The union of the states was never a purely artificial relation. By the articles of confederation the union was declared to be perpetual, and the constitution was ordained to form a more perfect union. But this by no means implies the loss of individual existence on the part of the states; the constitution looks throughout to an indestructible union of indestructible states; and the more recent states are no less subject to this principle than the original ones. Considered as transactions under the constitution, the ordinance of secession adopted by any one of the seceding states, and all the acts of her legislature intended to give effect to that ordinance, were absolutely null and without operation in law. The state did not cease to be a state, nor her citizens, citizens of the union. The war of secession was therefore treason. It is the practice of modern governments when attacked by formidable rebellion to concede belligerent rights: this establishes no rights except during the war. Legal rights could neither be created nor defeated by the action of the government of the Confederate States. Neither the pretended acts of secession nor the magnitude of the war could constitute a confederate state government de facto, so as to create civil rights which could outlast the war, except that acts necessary to peace and good order among citizens, such as those relating to private relations and private property, which would be valid if emanating from a lawful government, must be regarded in general as valid when proceeding from an actual, though unlawful, government; 7 Wall. 700; 1 Abb. U. S. 50; Chase's Dec. 136.

As to the validity of contracts. Where one engaged actively in the service of the rebel government purchased cotton which was afterwards seized by the military forces of the United States, sold, and the proceeds paid into the treasury, held, that his purchase of the cotton was illegal and void and gave him no title thereto; 98 U. S. 605; 21 Wall. 350. The Confederate government had no corporate power to take, hold, or convey a valid title to property, real and personal, and a purchaser of cotton from said government during the rebellion acquired no title thereto; 8 Ct. Cls. 499.

Confederate bonds. The bonds issued by the seceding states do not constitute a valid consideration for a promissory note; 15 Wall. 459; and so of the securities known as confederate treasury notes; 1 Abb. U. S. Rep. 261; but a promise to pay in "Confederate notes" in consideration of the receipt of such notes and of drafts payable by them, is neither a nudum pactum nor an illegal contract; 16 Wall. 483.

Validity of statutes. When the military forces of the Confederate government were overthrown, it perished, and with it all its enactments. But the legislative acts of the several states forming the confederacy stand on different grounds, and so far as they did not impair or tend to impair the supremacy of the national authority or the just rights of citizens under the constitution, they are in general to be treated as valid and binding; 96 U. S. 177; 97 id. 594; 1 Chase's Dec. 167; 7 Wall. 733; 22 id. 99.

Payments made under the Confederate sequestration acts were void and gave no title. See 96 U. S. 128.

Decisions of the Confederate courts. Judgments of such courts merely settling the rights of private parties actually within their jurisdiction, not tending to defeat the just rights of citizens of the United States, nor in furtherance of laws passed in aid of the rebellion, are valid: 1 Woods 437; 97 U. S. 509; and a judgment of a court of Georgia in November, 1861, for the purchase-money of slaves, was held a valid judgment when entered, and enforcible in 1871; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 641. But during the war, the courts of states in rebellion had no jurisdiction of parties residing in states which adhered to the the national government; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 53. See further, 15 Wall. 610; 12 Op. Att. Gen. 141, 189; 13 id. 149; 45 Ga. 370; 20 Gratt. 81; 13 Wall. 646; Hurd's Theory of Nat. Govt.; RECONSTRUCTION; CONFEDERATE STATES; CONFEDERATE MONEY; WAR.

SECK. A want of remedy by distress. Littleton, s. 218. See RENT. Want of present fruit or profit, as in the case of the reversion without rent or other service, except fealty. Co. Litt. 151 b, n. 5.

SECOND COUSINS. Those who are related, being descended from the same great-grandfather, or great-grandmother. L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 204. See LEGACY.

SECOND DELIVERANCE. The name of a writ given by statute of Westminster 2d, 13 Edw. I. c. 2, founded on the record of a former action of replevin. Co. 2d Inst. 341. It commands the sheriff, if the plaintiff make him secure of prosecuting his claim and returning the chattels which were adjudged to the defendant by reason of the plaintiff's default, to make deliverance. On being nonsuited, the plaintiff in replevin might, at common law, have brought another replevin, and so ad infinitum, to the intolerable vexation of the defendant. The statute of Westminster restrains the plaintiff when nonsuited from so doing, but allows him this writ, issuing out of the original record, in order to have the same distress delivered again to him, on his giving the like security as before; 3 Bla. Com. 150.

SECOND DISTRESS. See DISTRESS.

SECOND-HAND EVIDENCE. This term is sometimes applied to hearsay evidence, and should not be confounded with secondary evidence. See Pow. Ev.

SECOND SURCHARGE, WRIT OF. The name of a writ issued in England against a commoner who has a second time surcharged the common. 3 Bla. Com. 239.

SECONDARY. An officer who is second or next to the chief officer; as, secondaries to the prothonotaries of the courts of king's bench or common pleas; secondary of the remembrancer in the exchequer, etc. Jacob, L. Dict.

SECONDARY CONVEYANCES, or derivative conveyances, are those which presuppose some other conveyance precedent, and only serve to enlarge, confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by such original conveyance. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 324*.

SECONDARY EVIDENCE. That evidence which is admissible after proof which accounts satisfactorily for the absence of the evidence. The rule which requires the production of the best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible, is adopted for the prevention of fraud and is essential to the administration of justice; 31 Fed. Rep. 313. For discussion of this subject see EVIDENCE.

Secondary evidence includes:

1. Examined copies, exemplifications, office copies, and certified copies.

2. Other copies made from the original and proved to be correct.

3. Counterparts of documents as against the parties who did not execute them.

4. Oral accounts of the contents of a document given by some person who has himself seen it; Steph. Dig. Ev. art. 70. A good illustration of the rule respecting such evidence is that in an action to recover a stock subscription, the subscription paper is primary evidence; the stock ledger is secondary; 51 Fed. Rep. 409.

SECONDARY USE. A use limited to take effect in derogation of a preceding estate, otherwise called a "shifting use" as a conveyance to the use of A and his heirs, with a proviso that when B returns from India, then to the use of C and his heirs. 1 Steph. Com. 546.

SECONDS. In Criminal Law. Those persons who assist, direct, and support others engaged in fighting a duel.

Where the principal in deliberate duelling would be guilty of murder, the second is considered equally guilty. It has been contended that the second of him who is killed is equally guilty with the second of the successful principal; but this is denied by Hale, who considers such a one guilty only of a great misdemeanor; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 311.

SECRET COMMITTEE. A secret committee of the house of commons is a committee especially appointed to investigate a certain matter, and secrecy being deemed necessary in furtherance of its objects, its proceedings are conducted with closed doors. All other committees are open to members of the house, although they may not be serving upon them. Brown.

SECRET PARTNERSHIP. One where the existence of certain persons as partners is not avowed to the public. 49 N. H. 225. See PARTNERS.

SECRET SERVICE. A branch of government service concerned with the detection of counterfeiting and other offences, civil or political, committed or threatened by persons who operate in secrecy. It is under the charge and direction of the treasury department.

SECRETARY. An officer who, by order of his superior, writes letters and other instruments. He is so called because he is possessed of the secrets of his employer. This term was used in France in 1343, and in England the term secretary was first applied to the clerks of the king, who being always near his person were called clerks of the secret, and in the reign of Henry VIII. the term secretary of state came into use.

In the United States the term is used to denote the head of a department: as, secretary of state, etc. See DEPARTMENT.

SECRETARY OF EMBASSY. An officer appointed by the sovereign power to accompany a minister of the first or second rank, and sometimes, though not often, of an inferior rank.

He is, in fact, a species of public minister; for, independently of his protection as attached to an ambassador's suite, he enjoys in his own right the same protection of the law of nations, and the same immunities, as an ambassador. But private secretaries of a minister must not be confounded with secretaries of embassy or of legation. Such private secretaries are entitled to protection only as belonging to the suite of the ambassador.

SECRETARY OF LEGATION. An officer employed to attend a foreign mission and to perform certain duties as clerk.

He is considered a diplomatic officer; R. S. § 1674. The salary of a secretary of embassy, or the secretary of a minister plenipotentiary, is the same as that of a secretary of legation.

SECTA (Lat. sequor, to follow). The persons, two or more in number, whom the plaintiff produced in court, in the ancient form of proceedings, immediately upon making his declaration, to confirm the allegations therein, before they were called in question by the defendant's plea. Bracton 214 a. The word appears to have been used as denoting that these persons followed the plaintiff into court; that is, came in a matter in which the plaintiff was the leader or one principally concerned. The actual production of suit was discontinued very early; 3 Bla. Com. 295; but the formula "et inde producit sectam" (for which in more modern pleadings "and thereupon he brings suit" is substituted) continued till the abolition of the Latin form of pleadings. Steph. Pl., And. ed. 171. The count in dower and writs of right did not so conclude, however; 1 Chitty, Pl. 399. A suit or action. Hob. 20; Bracton 399 b. A suit of clothes. Cowel; Spelman, Gloss.

SECTA AD CURIAM. A writ that lay against him who refused to perform his suit either to the county court or the court-baron. Cowel.

Ad Furnum. Suit due a public bakehouse.

Ad Molendrinum. A service arising from the usage, time out of mind, of carrying corn to a particular mill to be ground. 3 Bla. Com. 235. A writ adapted to the injury lay at the old law. Fitzh. N. B. 123.

Ad Torrale. Suit due a man's kiln or malt-house. 3 Bla. Com. 235.

Curiæ. Suit at court. The service due from tenants to the lord of attending his courts-baron, both to answer complaints alleged against themselves, and for the trial of their fellow-tenants. 2 Bla. Com. 54.

SECTA FACIENDA PER ILLAM QUÆ HABET ENICIAM PARTEM. A writ to compel the heir, who has the elder's part of the co-heirs, to perform suit and services for all the coparceners. Reg. Orig. 177.

SECTA REGALIS. A suit or service by which all persons were bound twice in a year to attend the sheriff's tourn.

SECTA UNICA TANTUM FACIENDA PRO PLURIBUS HÆREDITATIBUS. A writ for an heir who was distrained by the lord to do more suits than one, that he should be allowed to do one suit only in respect of the land of divers heirs descended to him. Cowel.

SECTARIAN. A Roman Catholic orphanage where the pupils are instructed in the doctrines of their church is a sectarian institution within a constitutional provision forbidding the use of public funds for sectarian purposes. 16 Nev. 373. See RELIGION.

SECTATORES. A man's followers. Suitors of court among the Saxons. 1 Reeve's Hist. Eng. L. 22.

SECTION. A part separated from the rest, a division, a portion, as, specifically, a distinct part of a book or writing; the subdivision of a chapter; the division of a law or other writing, a paragraph, an article. 23 Neb. 128. The smallest numbered subdivision of a statute, code, textbook, etc., which contains a distinct subject. A paragraph (q. v.); an article. 23 Neb. 128.

SECTION OF LAND. A parcel of government land containing six hundred and forty acres. The lands of the United States are surveyed into parcels of six hundred and forty acres; each such parcel is called a section.

These sections are divided into half-sections, each of which contains three hundred and twenty acres, and into quarter-sections of one hundred and sixty acres each. See 2 Washb. R. P.

SECTIS NON FACIENDIS. A writ for a woman, who, for her dower, ought not to perform suit of court. Reg. Orig. 174.

SECTORES (Lat.). In Roman Law. Bidders at an auction. Babington, Auct. 2.

SECULAR. Temporal things; of the world; worldly. 14 N. H. 139.

SECURITATIS PACIS. A writ that lay for one who was threatened with death or bodily harm by another, against him who so threatened. Reg. Orig. 88.

SECURITY. That which renders a matter sure; an instrument which renders certain the performance of a contract. A person who becomes the surety for another, or who engages himself for the performance of another's contract. See 3 Blackf. 431.

SECURITY FOR COSTS. In Practice. In some courts there is a rule that when the plaintiff resides abroad he shall give security for costs, and until that has been done, when demanded, he cannot proceed in his action.

This is a right which the defendant must claim in proper time: for if he once waives it he cannot afterwards claim it: the waiver is seldom or perhaps never expressly made, but is generally implied from the acts of the defendant. When the defendant had undertaken to accept short notice of trial: 2 H. Bla. 573; or after issue joined, and when he knew of plaintiff's residence abroad, or, with such knowledge, when the defendant takes any step in the cause, these several acts will amount to a waiver; 5 B. & Ald. 702; 3 Wash. Ty. 518. It is never too late, however, if the motion do not delay the trial;

1 Yeates 176. See 1 Johns. Ch. 202; 1 Ves. 396; Bright. Costs 257.

The fact that the defendant is out of the jurisdiction of the court will not alone authorize the requisition of security for costs: he must have his domicil abroad; 1 Ves. 396. A wife petitioning for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain from her husband, who resides in the state, the custody of their child, cannot be required without proofs to give bond as a non-resident, since her domicil is prima facie the same as her husband's; 131 Ind. 489. When the defendant resides abroad, he will be required to give such security although he is a foreign prince. See 11 S. & R. 121; 1 Miles, Pa. 321; 2 id. 402. A general affidavit is sufficient on moving for security for costs; the particulars of the defence need not be specified; 1 W. N. Cas. (Pa.) 134; a rule of court requiring non-residents to enter security for costs does not violate article iv. sec. 2 of the constitution, which provides that citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several states; 19 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 339; 9 Md. 194; 13 W. Va. 299.

SECUS (Lat.). Otherwise.

SEDERUNT, ACTS OF. Ancient ordinances of the court of session in Scotland, by which authority is given to the court to make regulations equivalent to the Regulæ Generales of the English courts. Various modern acts give the court such power; Whart. Dict.

SEDGE FLAT. A tract of land below high water mark. 34 Conn. 421.

SEDITION. In Criminal Law. The raising commotions or disturbances in the state: it is a revolt against legitimate authority. Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. 14.

The distinction between sedition and treason consists in this: that though the ultimate object of sedition is a violation of the public peace, or at least such a course of measures as evidently engenders it, yet it does not aim at direct and open violence against the laws or the subversion of the constitution. Alison, Crim. Law 580.

The obnoxious and obsolete act of July 14, 1798, 1 Story, Laws 543, was called the sedition law, because its professed object was to prevent disturbances.

SEDUCED. Means that a virtuous woman has been corrupted, deceived, and drawn aside from the path of virtue which she was pursuing, by such acts and wiles, in connection with a promise of marriage, as were calculated to operate upon a virtuous woman. 106 Mo. 585; 108 id. 658.

SEDUCING TO LEAVE SERVICE. See ENTICE.

SEDUCTION. The act or crime of persuading a female, by flattery or deception, to surrender her chastity. Webster.

The wrong of inducing a female to consent to unlawful sexual intercourse, by enticements and persuasions overcoming her reluctance and scruples. 111 N. C. 215. See 17 Or. 283; 98 Mo. 368. And seduction may occur whether the woman is conscious or not; 98 Cal. 55. In civil cases, seduction and debauching are generally used as substantially similar terms; 73 Mich. 588.

Mere illicit intercourse is not seduction, although a promise of marriage be made; 33 Mich. 112; there must be some promise, deception, art, or influence of the seducer whereby chastity is surrendered; 55 Am. Dec. 542; 97 Mo. 668. Force is not an element of seduction, although force is used after consent is obtained; 31 N. W. Rep. 585.

The complainant must be chaste at the time of the seduction, and a reasonable doubt as to such fact is fatal to a recovery; 51 Ia. 467. Chastity, in the civil or criminal action, means actual personal virtue, and not reputation; 68 Am. Dec. 708; and requires specific acts of lewdness for impeachment; 26 N. Y. 203. Previous chastity is presumed; 42 N. W. Rep. 933. As to what may be shown to establish lack of chastity, see 7 S. W. Rep. 103; 5 Ia. 389; 7 N. W. Rep. 707; 42 N. W. Rep. 562; 11 S. W. Rep. 732; 88 Mo. 88. Chastity must be affirmatively shown where the statute requires that the person seduced be of good repute; 101 Pa. 215. Although a woman may have fallen, if she repent and reform, she is the object of seduction; 87 Am. Dec. 401; 73 Ala. 527.

Most states have enacted statutes making seduction a crime. What allurements are sufficient to constitute seduction, is for the jury to determine; 32 Ia. 262; and the courts allow considerable latitude in the evidence; 87 Mich. 518; 79 Ia. 703.

The indictment should allege the essential elements of the crime as defined by statute; 73 Ala. 527. Where there are several counts the prosecution cannot be compelled to elect; 70 N. Y. 38.

The statutes generally require:—that seduction be accomplished by promise of marriage; 102 Pa. 408; which need not be valid; 63 Ind. 198; provided the seduced was ignorant of its invalidity; 106 Mass. 339; and it may have been made some time prior to the seduction; 70 N. Y. 38; and the defendant may have intended to fulfil it; 27 Conn. 319; and he need not be of lawful age to marry; 48 Am. Rep. 17. Chastity of character must be alleged; 13 Md. 565; the previous character of the prosecutrix is to be determined by the jury; 18 Ia. 372. Chastity is always an issue; 86 Ala. 34; but is always presumed, and the burden of impeaching it is on the defendant; 73 Ia. 663.

The statutes generally require the evidence of the complainant to be corroborated; 104 Mo. 644; but as to what must be corroborated there is much confusion; 4 Minn. 325; 110 N. Y. 188; 73 Ala. 527.

The seduction of a married woman is known as criminal conversation, for which the husband has an action against the seducer; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 40. In England the statute 20 & 21 Vict. ch. 85, § 59, deprives the husband of the action but allows him damages in a suit for divorce where the seducer is made co-respondent. See CRIM. CON.

As to the seduction or alienation of a husband's affections, see ENTICE.

At common law the woman herself has no action for damages, though practically the end is reached by a suit for breach of promise of marriage, in many cases, but in some states the rule has been altered by statute. The parent, as being entitled to the services of his daughter, may maintain an action in many cases grounded upon that right, but only in such cases; 6 M. & W. 55; 7 Ired. 408; 4 N. Y. 38; 14 Ala. N. S. 235; 11 Ga. 603; 13 Gratt. 726; 3 Sneed 29; 6 Ind. 262; 10 Mo. 634; 130 N. Y. 239. In England the parent's right of action terminates when the child leaves the parent's house without the intention of returning; 5 East 45; but in America the right of action depends on the will of the parent, not the child; if he has not divested himself of a right to require his child's services, he may recover, even though at the time of the injury she was in another's service with his permission; 9 Johns. 387; s. c. Big. L. C. Torts 286; 16 S. W. Rep. 4; otherwise if his power over the child was gone at the time of the seduction. If the control was divested by fraud, the parent has still a right of action; 2 Stark. 493. Specific acts of service are not necessary to a right of action: the right to the service is enough; Big. Torts 146. The right of action continues after the majority of the child, if the relation of master and servant continues; 3 Vroom 58; 84 Wis. 629; 48 Ill. App. 371. See 111 N. C. 215. It is not necessary that pregnancy should ensue; Big. Torts 147; contra, 1 Exch. 61; where the proper consequence of the defendant's act was a loss of the child's health, resulting in an incapacity for service, an action lies; 104 Mass. 222; especially where sexual disease is communicated to the child; Big. Torts 147. The daughter's consent does not affect the parent's right to recover; 5 Lans. 454. If the mother, after the father's death, is the child's guardian, she has a right of action; Big. Torts 149; apart from the mother's guardianship, she has a right of action so long as the daughter continues to give her services to her mother. See 51 N. Y. 424. Where the daughter in her illness returns to her mother and is taken care of by her, the mother may sue for the seduction; 5 Cow. 106; contra, 2 Watts 474; 14 Ala. 235. See, generally, as to the mother's right of action, Big. L. C. Torts 302. Any one standing in loco parentis, and entitled to, or receiving, in his own right, the services of a minor, is entitled to maintain the action; Big. Torts 152; 2 C. & P. 303. If the parent consented to the seduction, or rendered it easy by his misconduct or neglect, he cannot recover; Peake 240; Big. Torts 151.

It is competent to show that the seduced yielded to defendant's solicitations under promise of marriage; 91 Mich. 611; but the mere promise of marriage as the inducement is not sufficient, where she was not seduced by any arts, wiles, or blandishments; 97 Mo. 668.

While the loss of services is the gist of the action, yet, when that has once been established, the jury may give damages commensurate with the real injury inflicted on the plaintiff. See Big. L. C. Torts 294. By statutes, seduction has been made a criminal offence in some states.

SEE. The diocese of a bishop.

SEEDS. The substance which nature prepares for the reproduction of plants or animals.

Seeds which have been sown in the earth immediately become a part of the land in which they have been sown: quæ sata solo cedere intelliguntur. Inst. 2. 1. 32.

SEIGNIOR, SEIGNEUR. Among the feudists, this name signified lord of the fee. Fitzh. N. B. 23. It is still used in French Canada. The most extended signification of this word includes not only a lord or peer of parliament, but is applied to the owner or proprietor of a thing: hence the owner of a hawk, and the master of a fishing vessel, is called a seigneur. 37 Edw. III. c. 19; Barrington, Stat. 258. Seignior in gross, a lord without a manor.

SEIGNIORAGE. A royalty or prerogative of the sovereign, whereby an allowance of gold and silver, brought to a mint in the mass to be exchanged for coin, is claimed. Cowel. Mintage, the charge for coining bullion into money at the mint. Black, L. Dict.

SEIGNIORY. In English Law. The rights of a lord, as such, in lands. Swinb. Wills 174.

SEISIN. The completion of the feudal investiture, by which the tenant was admitted into the feud and performed the rights of homage and fealty. Stearns, Real Act. 2; Mitchell, R. E. & Conv. 225.

Possession with an intent on the part of him who holds it to claim a freehold interest. 8 N. H. 58; 1 Washb. R. P. 35.

Ex vi termini, the whole legal title. 48 Minn. 462.

"Seisin is a technical term to denote the completion of that investiture, by which the tenant was admitted into the tenure, and without which no freehold could be constituted or pass." 1 Burr. 110, per Lord Mansfield.

This definition is said to be more applicable to the ceremony of livery of seisin than to seisin itself, while the definition of seisin as possession, does not lay sufficient stress on what is really the most important element in seisin—the element of title; 12 L. Quart. Rev. 240.

It is said that seisin is of practical importance at the present day in England in those rare cases where land is conveyed by an infant under the custom of gavelkind, and where a man claims an estate by curtesy. If feoffments were abolished and the law of curtesy made similar to that of dower, seisin would be completely obsolete, as it is in all other respects; 12 L. Quart. Rev. 246, 251.

Immediately upon the investiture or livery of seisin the tenant became tenant of the freehold; and the term seisin originally contained the idea of possession derived from a superior lord of whom the tenant held. There could be but one seisin, and the person holding it was regarded for the time as the rightful owner; Littleton § 701; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 136. In the early history of the country, livery of seisin seems to have been occasionally practised. See 1 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. *344; Colony Laws (Mass.) 85, 86; Smith, Landl. & T. 6, n.

In Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, seisin means merely ownership, and the distinction between seisin in deed and in law is not known in practice; 4 Day 305; 14 Pick. 224. A patent by the commonwealth, in Kentucky, gives a right of entry, but not actual seisin; 3 Bibb 57.

Seisin in fact is possession with intent on the part of him who holds it to claim a freehold interest.

Seisin in law is a right of immediate possession according to the nature of the estate. Cowel; Com. Dig. Seisin (A 1, 2).

If one enters upon an estate having title, the law presumes an intent in accordance, and requires no further proof of the intent; 12 Metc. 357: 4 Wheat. 213; 8 Cra. 229; but if one enters without title, an intent to gain seisin must be shown; 5 Pet. 402; 9 id. 52. Seisin once established is presumed to continue till the contrary is shown; 5 Metc. Mass. 173. Seisin will not be lost by entry of a stranger if the owner remains in possession; 1 Salk. 246; 9 Metc. 418. Entry by permission of the owner will never give seisin without open and unequivocal acts of disseisin known to the owner; 10 Gratt. 305; 9 Metc. 418. Simple entry by one having the freehold title is sufficient to regain seisin; 4 Mass. 416; 25 Vt. 316; 10 Pet. 412; 8 Cra. 247. The heir is invested with the seisin by law upon descent of the title; 24 Pick. 78. As a general proposition, by the law in this country, the making, delivery, and recording of a deed of lands passes the seisin without any formal entry being necessary. This is generally by force of the statutes of the several states,—in some such a deed being in terms declared to be equivalent to livery of seisin, and in others dispensing with any further act to pass a full and complete title; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 45, n., 47, n; Smith, Landl. & T. 6, n.; 3 Dall. 489.

The seisin could never be in abeyance; 1 Prest. Est. 255; and this necessity gave rise to much of the difficult law in regard to estates enjoyable in the future. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 156.

SEISIN OX. In Scotch Law. A perquisite formerly due to the sheriff when he gave possession to an heir holding crown lands. It was long since converted into a payment in money proportioned to the value of the estate. Bell, Dict.

SEISINA HABENDA. A writ for delivery of seisin to the lord, of lands and tenements, after the sovereign, in right of his prerogative, had had the year, day, and waste, on a felony committed, etc. Reg. Orig. 165.

SEIZING OF HERIOTS. Taking the best beast, etc., where an heriot is due, on the death of the tenant. 2 Bla. Com. 423; Whart. Dict.

SEIZURE. In Practice. The act of taking possession of the property of a person condemned by the judgment of a competent tribunal to pay a certain sum of money, by a sheriff, constable, or other officer lawfully authorized thereto, by virtue of an execution, for the purpose of having such property sold according to law to satisfy the judgment. 54 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 20. The taking possession of goods for a violation of a public law; as, the taking possession of a ship for attempting an illicit trade; 2 Cra. 187; 4 Wheat. 100; 1 Gall. 75; 2 Wash. C. C. 127, 567; 6 Cow. 404.

The seizure is complete as soon as the goods are within the power of the officer; 16 Johns. 287; 2 N. & M'C. 392; 2 Rawle 142; 3 id. 401; Wats. Sher. 172, approved 84 Wis. 80.

The taking of part of the goods in a house, however, by virtue of a fieri facias in the name of the whole, is a good seizure of all; 8 East 474. As the seizure must be made by virtue of an execution, it is evident that it cannot be made after the return-day; 2 Caines 243; 4 Johns. 450. See DOOR; HOUSE; SEARCH WARRANT.

SELECTI JUDICES (Lat.). In Roman Law. Judges who were selected very much like our juries. They were returned by the prætor, drawn by lot, subject to be challenged and sworn. 3 Bla. Com. 366.

SELECTMEN. The name of certain town officers in several states of the United States, who are invested by the statutes of the states with extensive powers for the conduct of the town business.

SELF-DEFENCE. In Criminal Law. The protection of one's person and property from injury. Whart. Crim. Law 97. A man may defend himself, and even commit a homicide for the prevention of any forcible and atrocious crime which if completed would amount to a felony; 17 Ala. N. S. 587; 5 Ga. 85; 1 Jones N. C. 190; 30 Miss. 619; 14 B. Monr. 103, 614; 3 Wash. C. C. 515; and, of course, under the like circumstances, mayhem, wounding, and battery would be excusable at common law; 4 Bla. Com. 180. A man may repel force by force even to the taking of life; 45 Vt. 308; 134 Ind. 46; in defence of his person, property, or habitation, or of a member of his family, against any one who manifests, intends, attempts, or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a forcible felony, such as murder, rape, robbery, arson, burglary, and the like; 38 Pa. 265; 8 Bush 481. In these cases he is not required to retreat; 57 Ind. 80; but he may resist, and even pursue his adversary, until he has secured himself from all danger; 7 J. J. Marsh. 478; 4 Bingh. 628; 45 La. Ann. 969; but see 7 N. Y. 396. A man may defend his dwelling to any extremity; and this includes whatever is within the curtilage of his dwelling-house; 8 Mich. 150. Where one finds another trying to break into his house in the night-time he may employ such force as to prevent his doing so, and if the other threatens to kill him and makes a motion as if to do so and puts him in fear of his life, he is not bound to retreat, but may use such force as is necessary to repel the assault; 162 U. S. 499. In deciding what force is necessary, a person need only act upon the circumstances as they appear to him at the time. See 24 Tex. 454; 28 Ill. 17.

In the case of homicide the law permits the resistance of force or seriously threatened force, actually impending or reasonably apparent, by force sufficient to repel the actual or apparent danger, and no more; 96 Ala. 81. The law of self-defence justifies an act done "in an honest and reasonable belief of immediate danger;" 142 U. S. 18. To justify a homicide, however, on the ground of self-defence, there must have been not only the belief but also reasonable ground for believing that at the time of killing the deceased, he was in imminent or immediate danger of his life or great bodily harm; 30 Fla. 234; 99 Cal. 1; 27 Tex. App. 562; 28 S. C. 201; and to justify shooting, on apparent necessity, the circumstances must have been such as to induce the mind of a reasonably prudent person to entertain the belief that the defendant was in imminent peril of his life or great bodily harm; 97 Ala. 54; there must be a reasonable apprehension of immediate danger justified by the circumstances; 89 Va. 619.

Reasonable fear does not mean the fear of a coward, but the fear of a reasonably courageous man; 92 Ga. 463; 89 Mont. 77; 79 Ga. 696; fear that one's life is in danger will not excuse a homicide in the absence of an overt act or hostile demonstration on the part of the deceased.

A question whether a homicide is committed in repelling an attack is a question of fact not necessarily dependent upon the duration or quality of the reflection by which the act may have been preceded; 151 U. S. 303. One assailed on his own grounds, without provocation, by a person armed with a deadly weapon and apparently seeking his life, is not obliged to retreat and may defend himself with such means as are within his control; 158 U. S. 550; 95 Ky. 623; 86 id. 99. So a person who has had an angry altercation with another person may be justified in arming himself for self-defence; and if, on meeting his adversary afterwards, he kills him, but not in necessary self-defence, his crime may be manslaughter or murder, according to the circumstances on the occasion of the killing, and is not necessarily murder by reason of his having previously armed himself; 155 U. S. 271. Accordingly it is wrong to charge that the intentional arming of himself with a pistol by a defendant, even if with a view to self-defence, would make a case of murder unless the actual affray developed a case of self-defence; 157 U. S. 675.

Where the accused embarks in the quarrel with no felonious intent or malice or purpose of doing bodily harm or killing, and, under reasonable belief of imminent danger, inflicts a deadly wound, it is not murder; 162 U. S. 466; but where a difficulty is intentionally brought on for the purpose of killing the deceased, the fact of imminent danger to the accused constitutes no defence; 162 U. S. 466.

What is or what is not an overt demonstration of violence sufficient to justify a resistance which ends in the death of the party making the demonstration varies with the circumstances and is a question for the jury; 160 U. S. 203.

If a person, under the provocation of offensive language, assaults the speaker personally, but in such a way as to show that there is no intention to do him serious bodily harm, and then retires under such circumstances as show that he does not intend to do anything more, but in good faith withdraws from further contest, his right of self-defence is restored when the person assaulted, in violation of law, pursues him with a deadly weapon, and seeks to take his life, or do him great bodily harm; 164 U. S. 546; 88 Ala. 4; Whart. Hom. § 483; 158 U. S. 550, 564; but there must be a real and bona fide surrender and withdrawal on the part of the original aggressor, otherwise he will continue to be so regarded; Whart. Cr. L., 9th ed. § 486. The meaning of the principle is that the law will always leave the original aggressor an opportunity to respond before he takes the life of his adversary; Bish. Cr. L., 7th ed. § 871; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 702. It is "for the jury to say whether the withdrawal was not in good faith or was a mere device by the accused to obtain some advantage of his adversary"; 164 U. S. 546. It is said of the two United States cases cited that they "consistently united in expressing a judicial policy on the subject of self-defence which is not only logical in principle, but commends itself to the practical sense of justice"; 55 Alb. L. J. 268; to the same effect in substance are recent cases in state courts; 124 Mo. 397; 141 Ind. 236.

The possession of a good conscience is not an indispensable prerequisite to justification of action in the face of imminent and deadly peril, nor does the intrinsic rightfulness of the occupation or situation of a party, having in itself no bearing upon or connection with an assault, impose a limitation upon the right to repel it; 153 U. S. 614.

The doctrine of constructive self-defence comprehends the principal civil and domestic relations; therefore master and servant, parent and child, husband and wife, killing an assailant in the necessary defence of each, respectively, are excused, the act of the relation being construed the same as the act of the party himself; 4 Bla. Com. 186; 32 Fla. 56; strangely enough, there seems to be no authority for placing a brother or sister in this category, though they doubtless occupy as good a position as a stranger; 25 Alb. L. J. 187. See 2 Bish. Cr. L. 877.

A man may defend himself when no felony has been threatened or attempted. First, when the assailant attempts to beat another and there is no mutual combat: as where one meets another and attempts to commit or does commit an assault and battery on him, the person attacked may defend himself; 4 Den. 448; 24 Vt. 218; 3 Harring. Del. 22; 3 Brev. 515; 5 Gray 475; 8 C. & P. 31; but it is not true as a general proposition, that one who is assaulted by another with a dangerous weapon is justified in taking the life of the person so assaulting him; 45 La. Ann. 14; and in case of an offer or attempt to strike another, when sufficiently near, so that there is danger, the person assailed may strike first, and is not required to wait until he has been struck; Bull. N. P. 18. Second, when there is a mutual combat upon a sudden quarrel. In these cases both parties are the aggressors; and if in the fight one is killed, it will be manslaughter at least, unless the survivor can prove two things, viz.: that before the mortal stroke was given he had refused any further combat, and had retreated as far as he could with safety; 8 N. Y. 396; 4 D. & B. 491; 15 Ga. 117; 1 Ohio St. 66; 1 Hawks 78, 210; and that he killed his adversary from necessity, to avoid his own destruction; 32 Me. 279; 2 Halst. 220; 11 Humphr. 200; 2 N. Y. 193; Coxe, N. J. 424; 25 Ala. N. S. 15.

A person assaulted by another, whom he kills, cannot set up the plea of self-defence if he could have safely retreated or have disarmed the other without danger to himself, and believed himself able to do so; 86 Ala. 13; id. 595; 83 id. 33; 74 Ia. 653.

The settled rule that where a person having authority to arrest and using the proper means for that purpose is resisted, he can repel force with force, and, if the party making the resistance is unavoidably killed, the homicide is justifiable, may be invoked by a person who resists and kills the officer, if he was ignorant of the fact that he was an officer; 153 U. S. 614.

A man may defend himself against animals, and he may during the attack kill them, but not afterwards; 1 C. & P. 106; 10 Johns. 365; 13 id. 12. See Horr. & T. Cas. on Self-Defence, where cases are collected. See JUSTIFICATION; MURDER; HOMICIDE.

SELF-DESTRUCTION. This term in an insurance policy is synonymous with, not more comprehensive than, suicide. It does not include an intentional though insane killing of one's self. "The act, whether described by words of Saxon or of Latin origin, or partly of the one and partly of the other, 'dying by his own hand,' 'self-killing,' 'self-slaughter,' 'suicide,' 'self-destruction,' without more, cannot be imputed to a man who, by reason of insanity (as is commonly said), 'is not himself';" 150 U. S. 468. See SUICIDE.

SELF-DISSERVING EVIDENCE. See SELF-REGARDING EVIDENCE.

SELF-EXECUTING PROVISIONS. See CONSTITUTIONAL; and also Thomps. Corp. § 3004.

SELF-REGARDING EVIDENCE. That evidence for or against a party which is afforded by the language or demeanor of himself or of those who represent him. When in favor of the party supplying it, the evidence may be said to be "self-serving," when otherwise, "self-disserving," and these terms are also applicable to the statement and demeanor of witnesses.

Self-serving evidence is not originally admissible except where part of the document is used against the party, who is entitled to have the whole of it laid before the jury who may consider such statements as are self-serving, and give such weight to them as they see fit; 5 Taunt. 245; 2 D. & Ryl. 358. See CONFESSION.

Self-disserving statements are termed "admissions" in civil cases and "confessions" in criminal cases. See those titles. They are also classified as "plenary" when the statements are not absolutely inconsistent with the existence of fact different from those indicated by it. See, generally, Best, Evidence §§ 518–577.

SELF-SERVING EVIDENCE. See SELF-REGARDING EVIDENCE.

SELION OF LAND. A ridge of ground rising between two furrows, containing no certain quantity, but sometimes more and sometimes less. Termes de la Ley.

SELLER. One who disposes of a thing in consideration of money; a vendor.

This term is more usually applied in the sale of chattels, and that of vendor in the sale of estates. See SALE.

SELLING PUBLIC OFFICES. Buying or selling any office in the gift of the crown, or making any negotiation relating thereto, was deemed a misdemeanor under stats. 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16, and 49 Geo. III. c. 126. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 631.

SEMBLE (Fr. it seems). A term frequently used before the statement of a point of law which has not been directly settled, but about which the court have expressed an opinion and intimated what a decision would be.

SEMESTRIA. The collected decisions of the emperors in their councils. Whart. Dict.

SEMI-COLON. According to well-established grammatical rules, this is a point only used to separate parts of a sentence more distinctly than a comma. 76 N. Y. 220.

SEMI-MATRIMONIUM. Half-marriage. Concubinage was so called in the Roman law. Tayl. Civ. L. 278.

SEMI-PROOF. In Civil Law. Presumption of fact. This degree of proof is thus defined: "Non est ignorandum probationem semiplenam eam esse, per quam rei gestæ fides aliqua fit judici; non tamen tanta ut jure debeat in pronuncianda sententia eam sequi." Mascardus, de Prob. vol., 1 Quæst. 11, n. 1, 4.

SEMINARY. A place of education. Any school, academy, college, or university in which young persons are instructed in the several branches of learning which may qualify them for their future employments. Webster, Dict.

The word is said to have acquired no fixed and definite legal meaning. 12 N. Y. 229.

SEMINAUFRAGIUM (Lat.), A term used by Italian lawyers, which literally signifies half-shipwreck, and by which they understand the jetsam, or casting merchandise into the sea to prevent shipwreck. Locré, Esp. du Code de Com. art. 409. The state of a vessel which has been so much injured by tempest or accident that to repair the damages, after being brought into port, and prepare her for sea, would cost more than her worth. 4 Bost. L. Rep. 120.

SEMPER PARATUS (Lat. always ready). The name of a plea by which the defendant alleges that he has always been ready to perform what is demanded of him. 3 Bla. Com. 303. The same as Tout temps prist.

SEN. This is said to be an ancient word which signified justice. Co. Litt. 61 a.

SENAGE. Money paid for synodals.

SENATE. The name of the less numerous of the two bodies constituting the legislative branch of the government of the United States, and of the several states. See the articles upon the various states.

The Senate of the United States is composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years; and each senator has one vote. The equal suffrage of the states in the senate is secured to them beyond the ordinary power of amendment; no state can be deprived thereof without its consent. Art. 5. The senate has been, from the first formation of the government, divided into three classes. The rotation of the classes was originally determined by lot, and the seats of one class are vacated at the end of the second year, so that one-third of the senate is chosen every second year. Const. art. 1, s. 3. This provision was borrowed from a similar one in some of the state constitutions, of which Virginia gave the first example.

The qualifications which the constitution requires of a senator are that he should be thirty years of age, have been nine years a citizen of the United States, and, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen. Const. art. 1, s. 3. See CONGRESS.

SENATORS OF THE COLLEGE OF JUSTICE. The judges of the court of session in Scotland are so called.

SENATUS. In Roman Law. The senate. Also the place where the senate met. Calv. Lex.

SENATUS CONSULTUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. A decree or decision of the Roman senate, which had the force of law.

When the Roman people had so increased that there was no place where they could meet, it was found necessary to consult the senate, instead of the people, both on public affairs and those which related to individuals. The opinion which was rendered on such an occasion was called senatus consultum. Inst. 1. 2. 5; Clef. des Lois Rom.; Merlin, Répert. These decrees frequently derived their titles from the names of the consuls or magistrates who proposed them; as senatus-consultum Claudianum, Libonianum, Velleianum, etc., from Claudius, Libonius, Valleius. Ayliffe, Pand. 30.

SENATUS DECRETA. (Decisions of the senate.) Private acts concerning particular persons merely.

SENESCHAL. A steward; also one who has the dispensing of justice. Co. Litt. 61 a.

SENESCHALLO ET MARESHALLO QUOD NON TENEAT PLACITA DE LIBERO TENEMENTO. A writ addressed to the steward and marshal of England, inhibiting them to take cognizance of an action in their court that concerns freehold. Reg. Orig. 185.

SENESCHALLUS (Lat.). A steward. Co. Litt. 61 a.

SENILITY. The state of being old.

When on account of senility the party is unable to manage his affairs, a committee will be appointed as in case of lunacy; 1 Collier, Lun. 66; 2 Johns. Ch. 232; 4 Call 423; 12 Ves. Jr. 446; 8 Mass. 129; 19 Ves. Jr. 285.

SENILE DEMENTIA. See DEMENTIA.

SENIOR. The elder. This addition is sometimes made to a man's name, when two persons bear the same, in order to distinguish them. In practice, when nothing is mentioned, the senior is intended; 8 Miss. 59. See NAME.

One older in office, or whose entrance upon an office was anterior to that of another. 44 Ohio St. 6. See 126 Mass. 603.

SENTENCE. A judgment, or judicial declaration made by a judge in a cause. The term judgment is more usually applied to civil, and sentence to criminal, proceedings.

Sentences are final, when they put an end to the case; or interlocutory, when they settle only some incidental matter which has arisen in the course of its progress. See Aso & Man. Inst. b. 3, t. 8, c. 1.

A sentence exceeding the term allowed by law will be reversed upon certiorari; 3 Brews. 30. Under some circumstances a sentence may be suspended after conviction; 43 N. J. L. 113; 115 Mass. 133. But a single sentence exhausts the power of the court to punish the offender, after the term is ended or the judgment has gone into operation; 18 Wall. 163; 129 Mass. 317; 57 Pa. 291. See ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCE.

The court may set a day for the execution of a prisoner after the time originally fixed has elapsed. The prisoner may be held in confinement after the first day fixed for execution has passed; 146 U. S. 271. Upon the affirmance of a judgment, sentencing a prisoner to death, there is nothing which requires that he shall be sentenced anew by the trial court; 143 U. S. 442.

Where a court has jurisdiction of the person and the offence, the imposition of a sentence in excess of what the law permits does not render the authorized portion of the sentence void, but only such part as may be in excess; 153 U. S. 48; so, on a plea of guilty, if the court had authority to impose the punishment actually adjudged on a conviction of a higher grade of the offence; 42 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 373.

Where the judgment on the first count is reversed and there is arrest of judgment under the second, a term of imprisonment under the third may be made to commence on the day fixed for the first count; 153 U. S. 396.

Failure in the sentence to name the crime for which the prisoner was sentenced may be supplied by reference to the rest of the record; 151 U. S. 396.

Where a verdict against one for embezzling money received by him as an assistant postmaster, was taken on embezzlement alone, without, as required by law, finding the amount embezzled as a fine, and was reversed for that reason, the trial court was without authority to fix the fine without the finding of a jury, and as he could not be put in jeopardy again, he was discharged; 68 Fed. Rep. 536.

When a sentence different from that authorized by law has been imposed and the judgment has been reversed for that error, and the cause remanded to the trial court with instructions to proceed therein according to law, the trial court resumes jurisdiction of the cause at the point where the error supervened and may resentence the defendant and impose the penalty provided by law, although part of the void sentence has been executed; 68 Fed. Rep. 472.

Statutes providing for a severer punishment when a criminal is convicted of a second or third offence are not in violation of the constitutional provision that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence; 159 U. S. 673. The doctrine is that the subsequent punishment is not for the first offence, but for persistence in crime; 47 Cal. 113; 115 Ill. 583; 158 Mass. 598; 48 Wis. 647. For the same reason, they are not open to the objection that they are ex post facto, even when the prior convictions occurred before the passage of the act imposing the additional penalty; 45 Cal. 429; 155 Mass. 163; 50 Ohio St. 428; 9 Gratt. 738. Such statutes cannot apply to the case of a conviction for an offence committed after that for which the prisoner is on trial, but for which he is first tried; 9 Gratt. 738.

The indictment must allege that the defendant had been previously convicted, sentenced, and imprisoned (once or twice, as the case may be) in some penal institution for felonies (as such penalties are usually only prescribed for felonies or penitentiary offences), describing each separately; 130 Mass. 85; 158 Mass. 598; 113 Mo. 538; 50 Ohio St. 428. As a general rule the courts have no discretion in the matter of imposing sentence under the habitual criminal acts; 158 Mass. 598; 50 Ohio St. 428. It is not necessary, unless required by statute, that the subsequent conviction or convictions should be for the same identical offence or character of offence. It is sufficient if the accused has been convicted of any one of the offences of the grade named; 115 Ill. 583. The previous offences must have been penitentiary offences, and not merely made so by repeated convictions for what would otherwise have been misdemeanors; 22 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 874.

See ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCES; JUDGMENT; HABITUAL CRIMINALS' ACT.

As to parole and indeterminate sentences, see PRISONER; 31 Am. L. Rev. 744.

SENTENCE OF DEATH RECORDED. A custom in the English courts, now disused, of entering sentence of death on the record which is not intended to be pronounced. The effect was the same as if it had been pronounced and the offender reprieved.

SENTENTIA. See MAXIM.

SEPARALITER (Lat. separately). A word sometimes used in indictments to show that the defendants are charged separately with offences which without the addition of this word would seem, from the form of the indictment, to be charged jointly; as, for example, when two persons are indicted together for perjury, and the indictment states that A and B came before a commissioner, etc., this is alleging that they were both guilty of the same crime, when by law their crimes are distinct, and the indictment is vicious; but if the word separaliter is used, then the affirmation is that each was guilty of a separate offence. 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 174.

SEPARATE ACTION. An action is so called which each of several persons must bring when they are denied the privilege of joining in one suit. See JOINDER.

SEPARATE ESTATE. That which belongs to one only of several persons: as, the separate estate of a partner, which does not belong to the partnership. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1519.

The separate estate of a married woman is that which belongs to her and over which her husband has no right in equity. It may consist of lands or chattels. 4 Barb. 409; 1 Const. 452.

See MARRIED WOMAN.

SEPARATE MAINTENANCE. The allowance made by a husband to his wife for her separate support and maintenance. In general, if a wife is abandoned by her husband, without fault on her part, and left without adequate means of support, a bill in equity will lie to compel the husband to support her, without asking for or procuring a decree of divorce; Schoul. Hus. & W. § 485; 50 Miss. 694; 30 N. J. Eq. 359.

When this allowance is regularly paid, and notice of it has been given, no person who has received such notice will be entitled to recover against the husband for necessaries furnished to the wife, because the liability of the husband depends on a presumption of authority delegated by him to the wife, which is negatived by the facts of the case; 2 Stark. Ev. 699.

SEPARATE TRIAL. See JOINDER.

SEPARATION. A cessation of cohabitation of husband and wife by mutual agreement.

Contracts of this kind are generally made by the husband for himself and by the wife with trustees; 3 Paige, Ch. 483; 4 id. 516; 5 Bligh N. S. 339; 1 Dow & C. H. L. 519. This contract does not affect the marriage, and the parties may at any time agree to live together as husband and wife. The husband who has agreed to a total separation cannot bring an action for criminal conversation with the wife; 4 Viner, Abr. 173; 2 Stark. Ev. 698; Shelf. Marr. & D. 608. Articles of separation are no bar to proceedings for divorce for subsequent cause; 4 Paige 516; 33 Md. 401. Under recent legislation, separation deeds are legalized in England; L. R. 11 Ch. D. 508; Schoul. Hus. & W. §§ 476, 479; Bish. M. D. & S. 1489.

Reconciliation after separation supersedes special articles of separation, in courts of law and equity; 1 Dowl. P. C. 245; 11 Ves. 532; 9 Cal. 479. Public policy forbids that parties should be permitted to make agreements for themselves to hold good whenever they choose to live separate; 5 Bligh N. S. 367. And see 1 C. & P. 36; 11 Ves. 526; 2 S. & S. 372; 1 Y. & C. 28; 3 Johns. Ch. 521; 1 Des. Eq. 45, 198; 8 N. H. 350.

SEPARATION A MENSA ET THORO. A partial dissolution of the marriage relation.

By the ecclesiastical or canon law of England, which had exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce, marriage was regarded as a sacrament and indissoluble. This doctrine originated with the church of Rome, and became established in England while that country was Catholic; and though after the reformation it ceased to be the doctrine of the church of England, yet the law remained unchanged until the recent statute of 20 & 21 Vict. (1857) c. 85, and amendments; Bish. Marr. & D. §§ 65, n., 225; 1 Bish. M. Div. & S. § 1377. Hence, as has been seen in the article on divorce, a valid marriage could not be dissolved in England except by what has been termed the omnipotent power of parliament.

This gave rise, in the ecclesiastical courts, to the practice of granting divorces from bed and board, as they used to be called, or judicial separation, as they are called in the recent statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, § 7; Bish. Marr. & D. §§ 65, n., 225; 1 Bish. M. D. & S. § 1377. From England this practice was introduced into this country; and though in some of the states it has entirely given way to the divorce a vinculo matrimonii, in others it is still in use, being generally granted for causes which are not sufficient to authorize the latter.

The only causes for which such a divorce is granted in England are adultery and cruelty. In this country it is generally granted also for wilful desertion, and in some states for other causes.

The legal consequences of a separation from bed and board are much less extensive than those of a divorce a vinculo matrimonii or a sentence of nullity. Such a separation works no change in the relation of the parties either to each other or to third persons, except in authorizing them to live apart until they mutually come together. In coming together, no new marriage is required; neither, it seems, under the general law, are any new proceedings in court necessary; but the reconciliation, of its own force, annuls the sentence of separation; 5 Pick. 461; 4 Johns. Ch. 187; 2 Dall. 128; Cro. Eliz. 908.

Nor does such a separation, at common law and without statutory aid, change the relation of the parties as to property. Thus, it neither takes away the right of the wife to dower, nor the right of the husband to the wife's real estate, either during her life or after her death, as tenant by the curtesy; neither does it affect the husband's right in a court of law to reduce into possession the choses in action of the wife; though in equity it may be otherwise; 2 Pick. 316; 5 id. 61; 6 W. & S. 85; Cro. Eliz. 908; 4 Barb. 295.

It should be observed, however, that in this country the consequences of a judicial separation are frequently modified by statute. See Bishop, Marr. & D. §§ 660–695, Bish. M. D. & S. § 1832.

Of those consequences which depend upon the order and decree of the court, the most important is that of alimony. See ALIMONY. In respect to the custody of children, the rules are the same as in case of divorce a vinculo matrimonii; Bish. Marr. & D. c. 25. See DIVORCE; 2 Bish. M. D. & S. § 1185; Macq. Husb. & W. 220; Browne, Div. 29.

SEPTUM. An enclosure; any place paled in. Cowel.

SEPULCHRE. The place where a corpse is buried. The violation of sepulchres is a misdemeanor at common law.

The right of a widow to remove the body of her husband from its place of original sepulchre is dependent on her consent to the first interment; 26 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 42. See DEAD BODY; CEMETERY.

SEQUATUR SUB SUO PERICULO. A writ that lay where a summons ad warrantizandum was awarded, and the sheriff returned that he had nothing whereby he might be summoned, then issued an alias and a pluries, and if he came not in on the pluries, this writ issued. O. N. B. 163.

SEQUEL. A small quantity of meal given to the servants at a mill where corn was ground, under the names of knaveship, bannock, and lock or gowpen. Ersk. Prin. 211. See THIRLAGE.

SEQUELA CAUSÆ. The process and depending issue of a cause for trial. Cowel.

SEQUELA CURIÆ. Suit of court. Cowel.

SEQUELA VILLANORUM. The family retinue and appurtenances to the goods and chattels of villeins, which were at the absolute disposal of the lord. Par. Ant. 216.

SEQUESTER. In Civil and Ecclesiastical Law. To renounce. Example: when a widow comes into court and disclaims having anything to do or to intermeddle with her deceased husband's estate, she is said to sequester. Jacob, Law Dict.

SEQUESTRATIO. The separating or setting aside of a thing in controversy, from the possession of both the parties that contend for it; it is twofold—voluntary, done by consent of all parties; and necessary, when a judge orders it.

SEQUESTRATION. In Chancery Practice. A writ of commission, sometimes directed to the sheriff, but usually to four or more commissioners of the complainant's own nomination, authorizing them to enter upon the real or personal estate of the defendant, and to take the rents, issues, and profits into their own hands, and keep possession of or pay the same, as the court shall order or direct, until the party who is in contempt shall do that which he is enjoined to do and which is especially mentioned in the writ. Newl. Ch. Pr. 18; Blake, Ch. Pr. 103.

A process for contempt, used by chancery courts, to compel a performance of their orders and decrees. 88 Ga. 361.

Upon the return of non est inventus to a commission of rebellion, a sergeant-at-arms may be moved for; and if he certifies that the defendant cannot be taken, a motion may be made upon his certificate for an order for a sequestration; 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 203; Blake, Ch. Pr. 103. It is the process formerly used instead of an attachment to secure the appearance of persons having the privilege of peerage or parliament, before a court of equity; Adams, Eq. 326.

Under a sequestration upon mesne process, as in respect of a contempt for want of appearance or answer, the sequestrators may take possession of the party's personal property and keep him out of possession, but no sale can take place, unless perhaps to pay expenses; for this process is only to form the foundation of taking the bill pro confesso. After a decree it may be sold. See 3 Bro. C. C. 72, 372; 2 Cox, Ch. 224; 1 Ves. 86.

A judgment of sequestration does not dissolve the corporation against which it is rendered, but it may appeal from an adverse judgment in an action brought by it and pending when the judgment of sequestration was rendered; 68 Hun 401.

See, generally, as to this species of sequestration, 19 Viner, Abr. 325; Bac. Abr. Sequestration; Com. Dig. Chancery (D 7, Y 4); 1 Hov. Suppl. to Ves. 25; 7 Vern., Raithby ed. 58, n. 1, 421, n. 1.

In Contracts. A species of deposit which two or more persons, engaged in litigation about anything, make of the thing in contest with an indifferent person, who binds himself to restore it, when the issue is decided, to the party to whom it is adjudged to belong. La. Code, art. 2942; Story, Bailm. § 45. See 19 Viner, Abr. 325; 1 Vern. 58, 420; 2 Ves. 28.

In Louisiana. A mandate of the court, ordering the sheriff, in certain cases, to take in his possession, and to keep, a thing of which another person has the possession, until after the decision of a suit, in order that it be delivered to him who shall be adjudged entitled to have the property or possession of that thing. This is what is properly called a judicial sequestration. See 1 Mart. La. 79; 1 La. 439; La. Civ. Code 2941, 2948.

SEQUESTRATOR. One to whom a sequestration is made.

A depositary of this kind cannot exonerate himself from the care of the thing sequestered in his hands, unless for some cause rendering it indispensable that he should resign his trust. La. Civ. Code, art. 2947.

Officers appointed by a court of chancery and named in a writ of sequestration. As to their powers and duties, see 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 205; Blake, Ch. Pr. 103.

SERF. In Feudal Law. A term applied to a class of persons who were bound to perform very onerous duties towards others. Pothier, Des Personnes.

There is this essential difference between a serf and a slave: the serf was bound simply to labor on the soil where he was born, without any right to go elsewhere without the consent of his lord; but he was free to act as he pleased in his daily life: the slave, on the contrary, was the property of his master, who might require him to act as he pleased in every respect, and who might sell him as a chattel. Lepage, Science du Droit, c. 3, art. 2, § 2.

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. An officer appointed by a legislative body, whose duties are to enforce the orders given by such bodies, generally under the warrant of its presiding officer.

SERIATIM (Lat.). In a series; severally: as, the judges delivered their opinions seriatim.

SERIOUS. Important, weighty, momentous, and not trifling. 74 Ill. 231. A serious injury is defined by statute in Ohio to be any such injury as shall permanently or temporarily disable a person receiving it from earning a livelihood by manual labor; Ohio L. 1892, 136, and serious bodily injury is held to be one which gives rise to apprehension, or is attended with great danger. 21 Tex. App. 317.

SERJEANTS-AT-LAW. A very ancient and the most honorable order of advocates at the common law.

They were called, formerly, countors, or serjeant-countors, or countors of the bench (in the old law-Latin phrase, banci narratores), and are mentioned by Matthew Paris in the life of John I., written in 1255. They are limited to fifteen in number, in addition to the judges of the courts of Westminster, who were always admitted before being advanced to the bench.

The most distinctive feature in the Serjeant's dress in olden times was the "coif," a close-fitting head-covering of lawn or silk. He was invested with this on the day of his call by the chief justice of the king's bench, and it was not doffed even in the presence of the sovereign. It is supposed that the coif was invented for the purpose of hiding the clerical tonsure. This concealment became desirable after the law of 1217, which debarred churchmen from their lucrative practice in the courts.

The most valuable privilege formerly enjoyed by the serjeants was the monopoly of the practice in the court of common pleas. A bill was introduced into parliament for the purpose of destroying this monopoly, in 1755, which did not pass. In 1833, a warrant under the sign manual was directed to the judges of the common pleas, commanding them to open that court to the bar at large. The order was received and complied with. In 1839, the matter was brought before the court and decided to be illegal; 10 Bingh. 571; 6 Bingh. N. C. 187, 232. The statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 54, has since extended the privilege to all barristers; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 27, n. Upon the Judicature Act coming into operation, the institution and office of serjeant-at-law virtually came to an end; Weeks, Att. at Law § 33. See Experiences of Serjeant Ballantine, Lond. 1882; Pulling, Order of Coif; INNS OF COURT; FARYNDON INN.

SERJEANTS' INN. The Inn to which the serjeants-at-law belonged, near Chancery Lane, formerly called Faryndon Inn. See INNS OF COURT; 3 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 292, n. It no longer exists.

SERJEANTY. In English Law. A species of service which cannot be due or performed from a tenant to any lord but the king, and is either grand or petit.

"The exact idea of serjeanty as conceived in the thirteenth century," says a recent writer on this subject, "is not one easily defined." Several different classes of men were grouped together under one heading, the bond between them being very slight, and the distinction between serjeanty and knight's service on the one hand and socage on the other is hard to determine; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 262.

Grand serjeanty consisted in some service immediately respecting the person or dignity of the sovereign; as, to carry the king's standard or to be his constable or marshal, his butler or chamberlain, or to perform some military service; Litt. § 153. The honorable parts of this tenure were retained and its oppressive incidents swept away by stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bla. Com. 73; while petit serjeanty required some inferior service, not strictly military or personal, to the king; as, the annual render of a bow, a sword, a lance, or an arrow; Litt. § 159; and this service, Littleton continues, is but socage in effect, as it was no personal service but a certain rent. It has, however, been overlooked by this writer that, whilst it is clearly not a predial service or service of the plough, and in all respects liberum et commune socagium, it was, nevertheless, held of the king, and by way of eminence was dignified by the title of parvum servitium regis, and in this light was respected by Magna Charta when it enacted that no wardship of lands or body should be claimed by the king in virtue of a tenure by petit serjeanty; 2 Bla. Com. 82.

SERVAGE. Where a tenant, besides his rent, finds one or more workmen for his lord's service. King John brought the Crown of England in servage to the see of Rome; 2 Inst. 174; Whart. Dict.

SERVANTS. In Louisiana. A term including slaves and, in general, all free persons who let, hire, or engage their services to another in the state, to be employed therein at any work, commerce, or occupation whatever, for the benefit of him who has contracted with them, for a certain sum or retribution, or upon certain conditions. La. Civ. Code, art. 155.

Personal Relations. Domestics; those who receive wages, and who are lodged and fed in the house of another and employed in his service. Such servants are not particularly recognized by law.

One who serves, or does service, voluntary or involuntary; a person who is employed by another for menial offices or for other labor, and is subject to his command; a person who labors or exerts himself for the benefit of another, his master or employer; a subordinate helper. Webst., approved in 115 Mo. 1. They are called menial servants, or domestics, from living infra mœnia, within the walls of the house. 1 Bla. Com. 324; Wood, Inst. 53.

The right of the master to their services in every respect is grounded on the contract between them.

Laborers or persons hired by the day's work or any longer time are not considered servants; 3 S. & R. 351. See 12 Ves. 114; 16 id. 486; 2 Vern. 546; 3 Deac. & C.

332; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 652; DOMESTIC; OPERATIVE; MASTER AND SERVANT.

SERVI. Bondmen or servile tenants.

SERVIA. A kingdom in the Balkan peninsula in southeastern Europe. The government is a constitutional, hereditary monarchy. The legislative power is vested in the king jointly with the Skuptschina or National Assembly. No military man or lawyer may be a member of this assembly. There is a senate, or council of state, constantly in session, which examines and elaborates projects of laws, etc. The Skuptschina of one hundred and seventy-eight members is, as to three-fourths, elected by the nation, and as to one-fourth, appointed by the king. There is also a Great Assembly of five hundred and thirty-eight members, none being royal nominees. This is called upon when required to decide vital and constitutional questions. All taxpaying citizens are electors. The Greek church is the religion of the state but other religions are tolerated. At the close of the war against Turkey in 1876, Servia was declared independent. Before then it was an autonomous province of Turkey.

SERVICE. In Contracts. The being employed to serve another.

In cases of seduction, the gist of the action is not the injury which the seducer has inflicted on the parent by destroying his peace of mind and the reputation of his child, but for the consequent inability to perform those services for which she was accountable to her master or her parent, who assumes this character for the purpose. See SEDUCTION; 2 M. & W. 539; 7 C. & P. 528.

In Feudal Law. That duty which the tenant owed to his lord by reason of his fee or estate.

The services, in respect of their quality, were either free or base, and in respect of their quantity, and the time of exacting them, were either certain or uncertain. 2 Bla. Com. 62.

In Civil Law. A servitude.

In Practice. The execution of a writ or process. Thus, to serve a writ of capias signifies to arrest a defendant under the process; Kirb. 48; 2 Aik. 338; 11 Mass. 181; to serve a summons is to deliver a copy of it at the house of the party, or to deliver it to him personally, or to read it to him: notices and other papers are served by delivering the same at the house of the party, or to him in person.

But where personal service is impossible, through the non-residence or absence of a party, constructive service by publication is, in some cases, permitted, and is effected by publishing the paper to be served in a newspaper designated in the order of court and by mailing a copy of the paper to the last known address of the party.

Substituted service is a constructive service made upon some recognized representative, as where a statute requires a foreign insurance company doing business in the state of Massachusetts to appoint the insurance commissioner of the state their attorney, "upon whom all lawful processes in any proceeding against the company may be served with like effect as if the company existed in that commonwealth;" 16 Am. L. Rev. 421. Questions are constantly arising as to the validity of service on some particular agent of a foreign corporation within state statutes giving jurisdiction in suits against such corporations. It was held in Louisiana that any service sufficient as against a domestic corporation might be, by law, sufficient against a foreign one, and consequently, that such service might be made upon the president of the latter while temporarily within the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit was commenced; 47 La. Ann. 389; but the rule laid down by the federal courts is that such service is insufficient; 156 U. S. 518; 53 Fed. Rep. 850. See FOREIGN CORPORATION. But it was held by the circuit court that when the manager of a corporation goes into another state on business of the corporation, service of summons against the corporation in a suit relating to that business may be made on him there; 85 Fed. Rep. 757.

"It is useful in all cases to consult the careful opinion in U. S. v. American Bell Tel. Co., 29 Fed. 17, and to re-state the three conditions which it is there said must concur or co-exist in order to give the federal courts jurisdiction in personam over a corporation created in another state:

"(1) It must appear as a matter of fact that the corporation is carrying on its business in the state where it is served with process; (2) that such business is transacted or managed by some agent or officer appointed by and representing the corporation in such state; and (3) the existence of some local law making such corporation, or foreign corporations generally, amenable to suit there, as a condition, express or implied, of doing business in the state." 83 Fed. Rep. 823.

Service of a subpœna in New York on a foreign steamship company may be made on its financial agent who is the head of a firm which is the general agent of the company; 150 U. S. 653.

A salaried agent, empowered to solicit advertisements for a non-resident newspaper corporation, and to make contracts therefor, and receive payment, and who carries on business at an office having the name of the newspaper on its windows, is a "managing agent," on whom valid service of process against the corporation may be made under the New York Code; 82 Fed. Rep. 694.

In an action against a foreign corporation service on an officer who is also the attorney in fact of the plaintiff to institute and prosecute the action is invalid and confers no jurisdiction; 46 S. C. 1.

Service by publication is in general held valid only in proceedings in rem, where the subject-matter is within the jurisdiction of the court, as in suits in partition, attachment, for the foreclosure of mortgages, and the enforcement of mechanics' liens. In many of the states statutes have been passed to meet this class of cases. In purely personal actions, service by publication is invalid, upon the well-settled principle that the person or thing proceeded against must be within the jurisdiction of the court entertaining the cause of action. 27 Am. L. Reg. 92; 95 U. S. 704; 103 id. 439; Story, Confl. L. § 539. See 144 U. S. 41.

No court can exercise, at common law, jurisdiction over a party unless he is served with the process within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, or voluntarily appears; 149 U. S. 194.

Where suit was brought in Massachusetts against a non-resident, and he, in Pennsylvania, accepted service of process, it was held that this did not give the court jurisdiction; 72 Pa. 110.

A notice served in another state upon a person alleged to be a stockholder in a Missouri corporation must be personally made upon him within the territorial jurisdiction of the court which issued it; 144 U. S. 41. The process does not run outside of the state; 25 U. S. App. 70.

Substituted service will be allowed upon a defendant who was within the jurisdiction when the writ issued, but had left the country (though not to evade service), before service could be made; 77 L. T. R. 335.

Where a suit is brought to enforce a lien on real estate in the district to remove a cloud on the title, the plaintiffs are entitled to get substituted service on a non-resident party in order to bring him within the jurisdiction of the court; 31 U. S. App. 486.

The fact that duly qualified officers of a township live outside the township, but within the county, does not necessarily render invalid the service of a notice upon them as officers of the township; 4 U. S. App. 616.

Some states, however, have gone so far as to allow suits in chancery to be maintained against non-residents upon constructive service of process by publication; 15 Am. L. Reg. 2. Proceedings in divorce are sometimes recognized as forming an exception to the rule; 1 Bish. Marr. Div. & Sep. § 837; Bish. Mar. & D. § 159.

A suit in equity in the federal court is commenced by suing out process and a bona fide attempt to serve it; 85 Fed. Rep. 827.

Priority of jurisdiction between two courts of concurrent jurisdiction is determined by the date of the service of process; 86 N. Y. 271; 84 Fed. Rep. 633; as to criminal cases, see 16 Wall. 366. As to the effect of service in relation to the commencement of actions see LIMITATION.

See DIVORCE; FOREIGN JUDGMENT; NON-RESIDENT.

When the service of a writ is prevented by the act of the party on whom it is to be served, it will, in general, be sufficient if the officer do everything in his power to serve it; 1 Mann. & G. 238.

If the service of a summons is not illegal, but slightly irregular, and the irregularity does not appear on the face of the return, it will not be set aside on motion, but the objection must be raised by plea; 15 U. S. App. 400.

As to what constitutes the being in the service of the United States within the meaning of an act relating to longevity pay, see that title.

SERVICE OF AN HEIR. An old form of Scotch law, fixing the right and character of an heir to the estate of his ancestor. Bell, Dict. Abolished in 1874.

SERVICES FONCIERS. In French Law. Easements.

SERVIENT. In Civil Law. A term applied to an estate or tenement by or in respect of which a servitude is due to another estate or tenement.

SERVIENTIBUS. Certain writs touching servants and their masters violating the statutes made against their abuses. Reg. Orig. 189.

SERVILE. The service of a writ has been held to be servile labor. 6 Conn. 49.

SERVITIIS ACQUIETANDIS. A judicial writ for a man distrained for services to one, when he owes and performs them to another, for the acquittal of such services. Reg. Jud. 27.

SERVITIUM FEODALE ET PRÆDIALE. A personal service, but due only by reason of lands which were held in fee. Bract. l. 2, c. 16.

SERVITIUM FORINSECUM. A service which did not belong to the chief lord, but to the king. Mon. Angl. ii. 48.

SERVITIUM LIBERUM. See FREEHOLD.

SERVITIUM REGALE. Royal service, or the prerogatives that within a royal manor, belonged to the lord of it, viz.: power of judicature in matters of property; of life and death in felonies and murders; right to waifs and estrays; remitting of money; assize of bread and beer, and weights and measures. Whart. Dict.

SERVITORS OF BILLS. Such servants or messengers of the marshal belonging to the king's bench as were heretofore sent abroad with bills or writs to summon men to that court, being now called "tipstaves." Blount; 2 Hen. IV. c. 23.

SERVITUDE. In Civil Law. The subjection of one person to another person, or of a person to a thing, or of a thing to a person, or of a thing to a thing.

A right which subjects a land or tenement to some service for the use of another land or tenement which belongs to another master. Domat, Civ. Law, Cushing's ed. § 1018.

A mixed servitude is the subjection of persons to things, or things to persons.

A natural servitude is one which arises in consequence of the natural condition or situation of the soil.

A personal servitude is the subjection of one person to another: if it consists in the right of property which a person exercises over another, it is slavery. When the subjection of one person to another is not slavery, it consists simply in the right of requiring of another what he is bound to do or not to do: this right arises from all kinds of contracts or quasi-contracts. Lois des Bât. p. 1, c. 1, art. 1.

A real or predial servitude is a charge laid on an estate for the use and utility of another estate belonging to another proprietor. La. Code, art. 648. When used without any adjunct, the word servitude means a real or predial servitude. Lois des Bât. p. 1, c. 1; Mitch. R. E. & Conv. 49. Real servitudes are divided into rural and urban.

Rural servitudes are those which are due by an estate to another estate, such as the right of passage over the serving estate, or that which owes the servitude, or to draw water from it, or to water cattle there, or to take coal, lime, and wood from it, and the like.

Urban servitudes are those which are established over a building for the convenience of another, such as the right of resting the joists in the wall of the serving building, of opening windows which overlook the serving estate, and the like. Dalloz, Dict. Servitudes.

This term is used as a translation of the Latin term servitus in the French and Scotch Law, Dalloz, Dict.; Paterson, Comp., and by many common-law writers, 3 Kent 434; Washb. Easem., and in the Civil Code of Louisiana. Service is used by Wood, Taylor, Harris, Cowper, and Cushing in his translation of Domat. Much of the common-law doctrine of easements is closely analogous to, and probably in part derived from, the civil-law doctrine of servitudes.

In common law the use of the word servitude is as a correlative of easement; where one person has an easement which creates a burden upon the property of another, the latter is said to be burdened with a servitude. See also HIGHWAYS; WAYS; RAILROADS; PIPE LINES; SEWER; ELEVATED RAILWAYS; POLES; WIRES; Jones, Easements.

SERVITUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. Servitude; slavery; a state of bondage; a disposition of the law of nations by which, against common right, one man has been subjected to the dominion of another. Inst. 1. 2. 3; Bracton 4 b; Co. Litt. 116.

A service or servitude; a burden imposed by law, or the agreement of parties, upon one estate for the advantage of another, or for the benefit of another person than the owner.

Servitus actus, a right of way on horseback or in a carriage. Inst. 2. 3. pr.

Servitus altius non tollendi, a servitude preventing the owner of a house from building higher than his neighbor. Inst. 2. 3. 4; Paterson, Comp.

Servitus aquæ ducendæ, a right of leading water to one's own land over that of another. Inst. 2. 3. pr.

Servitus aquæ educendæ, a right of conducting water from one's own land unto a neighbor's. Dig. 8. 3. 29.

Servitus aquæ hauriendæ, a right of drawing water from another's spring or well. Inst. 2. 3. 2.

Servitus cloacæ mittendæ, a right of having a sewer through a neighbor's estate. Dig. 8. 1. 7.

Servitus fumi immitendi, a right of conducting smoke or vapor through a neighbor's chimney or over his ground. Dig. 8. 5. 8.

Servitus itineris, a right of way on horseback or in a carriage. This includes a servitus actus. Inst. 2. 3.

Servitus luminum, a right to have an open place for receiving light into a chamber or other room. Domat, 1. 1. 4; Dig. 8. 2. 4.

Servitus oneris ferendi, a servitude of supporting a neighbor's building.

Servitus pascendi, a right of pasturing one's cattle on another's lands. Inst. 2. 3. 2.

Servitus pecoris ad aquam adpulsam, a right of driving one's cattle on a neighbor's land to water.

Servitus prædii rustici, a rural servitude.

Servitus prædii urbani, an urban servitude.

Servitus prædiorum, a servitude on one estate for the benefit of another. See PRÆDIÆ.

Servitus projiciendi, a right of building a projection into the open space belonging to a neighbor. Dig. 8. 2. 2.

Servitus prospectus, a right of prospect. Dig. 8. 2. 15. This may be either to give one a free prospect over his neighbor's land, or to prevent a neighbor from having a prospect over one's own land. Domat, 1. 1. 6.

Servitus stillicidii, a right of having the water drip from the eaves of one's house upon a neighbor's house or ground.

Servitus tigni immittendi, a right of inserting beams in a neighbor's wall. Inst. 2. 3. 1. 4; Dig. 8. 2. 2.

Servitus viæ, a right of way on foot or horseback, or with a loaded beast or wagon, over a neighbor's estate. Inst. 2. 3.

See, generally, Inst. 2. 3; Dig. 8. 2; Dict. de Jur.; Domat. Civ. Law; Bell, Dict.; Washb. Easem.; Gale, Easem.; Jones, Easem.

SERVUS (Lat.). A slave.

The institution of slavery is traced to the remotest antiquity. It is referred to in the poems of Homer; and all the Greek philosophers mention it without the slightest censure. Aristotle justified it on the ground of a diversity of race. The Roman jurists rest the institution of slavery on the law of nations: in a fragment of Florentinus copied in the Institutes of Justinian, servitude is defined, Servitus autem est constitutio juris gentium, qua quis dominio alieno contra naturam subjicitur. D. 1. 5. 4. 1; Inst. 1. 3. 2. The Romans considered that they had the right of killing their prisoners of war.

manu capti; and that by preserving their lives, servati, they did not abandon but only postponed the exercise of that right. Such was, according to their ideas, the origin of the right of the master over his slave. Hence the etymology of the words servi, from servati, and mancipia, from manu capti, by which slaves were designated. It is, however, more simple and correct to derive the word servus from servire. Inst. 1. 3. 3. Children born of a woman who was a slave followed the condition of their mother; servi nascuntur aut fiunt.

A free person might be reduced to slavery in various ways: by captivity, ex captivitate. The Roman who was taken prisoner by the enemy lost all his rights as a citizen and a freedman: thus, when Regulus was brought to Rome by the Carthaginian ambassadors he refused to take his seat among the senators, saying that he was nothing but a slave. But if he had made his escape and returned to Rome, all his rights would have been restored to him by the jus postliminii; and the whole period of his captivity would have been effaced, and he would have been considered as if he had never lost his freedom. According to the law of the Twelve Tables, the insolvent debtor became the slave of his creditor, by a judgment rendered in a proceeding called manus injectio,—one of the four leges actiones. The thief taken in the act of stealing, or while he was carrying the thing stolen to the place where he intended to conceal it, was deprived of his freedom, and became a slave. So was a person, who, for the purpose of defrauding the state, omitted to have his name inscribed on the table of the census. The illicit intercourse of a free woman with a slave without the permission of his master, the sentence to a capital punishment and the sentence to work perpetually in the mines,—in metallum dati,—made the culprit the slave as his punishment (servi pœnæ). The ingratitude of the emancipated slave towards his patron or former master and the fraud of a freeman who had suffered himself to be sold by an accomplice (after having attained the age of twenty years) in order to divide the price of the sale, were so punished.

Liberty being inalienable, no one could sell himself; but in order to perpetrate a fraud on the purchaser, a freeman was offerered for sale as a slave and bought by an innocent purchaser: after the price had been paid and divided between the confederates, the pretended slave claimed and, of course, obtained his freedom. To remedy this evil and punish this fraud, a senatus consultum issued under Claudius provided that the person who had thus suffered himself to be sold should loose his liberty and remain a slave. In the social and political organization slaves were not taken into consideration; they had no status. Quod attinet ad jus civile, servi pro nullis habentur. Servitutem mortalitati fere comparamus. With regard to the master there was no distinction in the condition of slaves: they were all equally subject to the domini potestas. But the master some times established a distinction between the servi vicarii and the servi ordinarii: the former exercised a certain authority over the latter. But there was a marked difference between those slaves of whom we have been speaking and the coloni censili, adscripti and tributarii, who resembled the serfs of the middle ages. 1 Ortolan 27; 1 Etienne 68 et seq.; Lagrange 93. See SLAVE.

SESSION. The time during which a legislative body, a court, or other assembly, sits for the transaction of business: as, a session of congress, which commences on the day appointed by the constitution, and ends when congress finally adjourns before the commencement of next session; the session of a court which commences at the day appointed by law, and ends when the court finally rises. Approved 64 Ill. 86.

A term.

SESSION COURT. See COURT OF SESSION.

SESSION LAWS. A term used to designate the printed statutes as passed at the successive legislative sessions of the various states. In Pennsylvania they are usually called pamphlet laws. See PAMPHLET.

SESSIONAL ORDERS. Certain orders agreed to by both houses of parliament at the commencement of each session, and in force only during that session. May, P. L.

SESSIONS OF THE PEACE. In English Law. Sittings of justices of the peace for the execution of the powers which are confided to them as such.

Petty sessions (or petit sessions) are sittings held by one or more justices for the trial of minor offences, admitting to bail prisoners accused of felony, and the like purposes.

When sitting for purposes of preliminary inquiry, the public cannot claim admittance; but it is otherwise when sitting for purposes of adjudication.

Special sessions are sittings of two or more justices on a particular occasion for the exercise of some given branch of their authority, upon reasonable notice given to the other magistrates of the hundred or other division of the county, city, etc., for which they are convened. See stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 33.

The counties are distributed into divisions, and authority given by various statutes to the justices acting for the several divisions to transact different descriptions of business, such as licensing alehouses, or appointing overseers of the poor, surveyors of the highways, etc., at special sessions. 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 37.

General sessions of the peace are courts of record, holden before the justices, whereof one is of the quorum, for execution of the general authority given to the justices by the commission of the peace and certain acts of parliament.

See COURT OF GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

SETI. As used in mining laws, lease. Brown.

SET ASIDE. To annul; to make void: as, to set aside an award.

When proceedings are irregular, they may be set aside on motion of the party whom they injuriously affect.

SET OF EXCHANGE. The different parts of a bill of exchange, taken together. Each part is a perfect instrument by itself; but the parts are numbered successively, and upon payment of any one the others become useless. See Chitty, Bills 175; Pars. Notes & B.

SET-OFF. In Practice. A demand which a defendant makes against the plaintiff in the suit for the purpose of liquidating the whole or a part of his claim. See 7 Fla. 329.

A set-off was unknown to the common law, according to which mutual debts were distinct, and inextinguishable except by actual payment or release; Waterm. Set-Off; 1 Rawle 293; Babingt. Set-Off 1.

The statute 2 Geo. II. c. 22, which has been generally adopted in the United States, with some modifications, in cases of mutual debts, however, allowed the defendant to set his debt against the other, either by pleading it in bar, or giving it in evidence, when proper notice had been given of such intention, under the general issue. The statute, being made for the benefit of the defendant, is not compulsory; 8 Watts 39; the defendant may waive his right, and bring a cross-action against the plaintiff; 2 Camp. 594; 9 Watts 179.

It seems, however, that in some cases of intestate estates and of insolvent estates, perhaps owing to the peculiar wording of the law, the statute has been held to operate on the rights of the parties before action brought or an act done by either of them; 2 Rawle 293; 3 Binn. 135; Bac. Abr. Bankrupt (K). See 7 Gray 191, 425.

Set-off takes place only in actions on contracts for the payment of money: as, assumpsit, debt, and covenant; and where the claim set off grows out of a transaction independent of the contract sued on; 31 Conn. 398; the claims to be set off against each other must both be due. In a suit by a railroad company, the company's coupons which had matured during the suit are admissible under a set-off, but not those that had matured after the appointment of a receiver of the plaintiff company; 25 U. S. App. 306. An unliquidated claim cannot be set off against one which is for a stipulated amount. Damages for malicious prosecution cannot be set off in an action for rent; 24 U. S. App. 21. A set-off is not allowed in actions arising ex delicto; as, upon the case, trespass, replevin, or detinue; Bull. N. P. 181; 4 E. D. Sm. 162. And an independent tort cannot be made a defence against another tort, either by way of set-off or counter-claim; 117 Ind. 556; 39 Kan. 183; nor is a set-off available as a defence to an action of tort; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 790. Nor can there be a set-off to a set-off; 86 Ala. 523. The right of set-off, except in equity, is a matter of local legislation, and the federal court will follow the rules established by the tribunals of the state in which it is sitting; 73 Fed. Rep. 980.

In Pennsylvania, if it appear that the plaintiff is overpaid, then defendant has a certificate of the amount due to him, which has the effect of a verdict against the plaintiff; Purd. Dig. 487; 10 Pa. 496. But the plaintiff may suffer a nonsuit, notwithstanding a plea of set-off; 7 Watts 496.

The matters which may be set off may be mutual liquidated debts or damages; but unliquidated damages cannot be set off; 3 Bosw. 560; 34 Pa. 239; 34 Ala. N. S. 659; 20 Tex. 31; 2 Head 467; 3 Ia. 163; 1 Blackf. 394; 6 Halst. 397; 5 Wash. C. C. 282. Damages for malicious prosecution cannot be set off in an action for rent; 24 U. S. App. 21. There must be a mutuality in claims to authorize a set-off; 62 Mich. 517. The statutes refer only to mutual unconnected debts; for at common law, when the nature of the employment, transaction, or dealings necessarily constitute an account consisting of receipts and payments, debts and credits, the balance only is considered to be the debt, and therefore in an action it is not necessary in such cases either to plead or give notice of set-off; 4 Burr. 2221. By joining his wife in a suit for her legacy, a husband exercises his election to treat it as joint property; and in such case her debt, dum sola, may be set off, but not his own debt; if he sues alone, his debt may be set off, but not hers dum sola; 4 Del. Ch. 117.

A purchaser of goods from the agent of a known principal cannot set off a sum owing to him from the agent; 83 Fed. Rep. 66.

A claim, an action to recover which would be barred by statute, is also barred as a set-off; 61 Vt. 65; but a plea of set-off cannot be defeated by the statute of limitations, where the claim offered to be set off was a legal subsisting claim at the time the right of action accrued to the plaintiff on the claim in the suit; 83 Ala. 420.

Set-off against the government will only be allowed after the claim has been rejected by the accounting department, or where a statute permits it; 9 Cra. 213. There can be no recovery on an independent claim against a state; 4 Dall. 303.

A depositor in an insolvent bank, who had indorsed a note that was subsequently discounted by said bank, can, in a suit by the bank to recover the amount of the note, set off his deposit against this amount, when the note matured after the insolvency of the bank; 49 Fed. Rep. 337. See 146 U. S. 499. A debt from an insolvent not due at the time of his making an assignment for the benefit of creditors, may be set off by the creditor against a debt due from him to the insolvent at the time of the assignment; 42 Hun 73; 65 id. 619. Where mutual obligations have grown out of the same transaction insolvency on the one hand justifies the set-off of the debt due upon the other; 146 U. S. 499. A stockholder indebted to an insolvent corporation for unpaid shares cannot set off against this trust fund for creditors a debt due him by the corporation; 139 U. S. 417.

Judgments in the same rights may be set off against each other, at the discretion of the court; 3 Bibb 283; 3 Watts 78; 3 Halst. 172; 18 Tex. 541; 30 Ala. N. S. 470; 4 Ohio 90; 7 Mass. 140, 144; 8 Cow. 126; 112 N. Y. 655. Equitable set-off cannot be pleaded by way of answer, but the relief sought must be invoked by bill or cross-bill; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 960. See Montague, Babington, Set-Off; 10 L. R. A. 378; DEFALCATION; LIEN; RECOUPMENT.

SET ON FOOT. Arrange; place in order; set forward; put in the place of being ready. 53 Fed. Rep. 538. See NEUTRALITY.

SETTLE. To adjust or ascertain; to pay.

Two contracting parties are said to settle an account when they ascertain what is justly due by one to the other; when one pays the balance or debt due by him, he is said to settle such debt or balance. 11 Ala. N. S. 419.

SETTLED CASE ON APPEAL. That power of the record of appeal which consists of a statement prepared by the appellant's counsel setting forth so much of the testamentary proceedings had in the court below as may be material to the questions intended to be required of the appellate court, subject to amendments of the opposing counsel and to a statement of the trial judge. In other states the word appeal book or paper book is applied. 15 Alb. L. J. 242.

SETTLEMENT. A residence under such circumstances as to entitle a person to support or assistance in case of becoming a pauper.

It is obtained in various ways, to wit: by birth; by the legal settlement of the father, in the case of minor children; by marriage; by continued residence; by the payment of requisite taxes; by the lawful exercise of a public office; by hiring and service for a specified time; by serving an apprenticeship; and perhaps some others, which depend upon the local statutes of the different states. See 1 Bla. Com. 363; 1 Dougl. 9; 6 S. & R. 103, 565; 10 id. 179.

In Contracts. An agreement by which two or more persons who have dealings together so far arrange their accounts as to ascertain the balance due from one to the other; payment in full.

The conveyance of an estate for the benefit of some person or persons. See ANTE-NUPTIAL CONTRACT; WIFE'S EQUITY.

SETTLEMENT, DEED OF. A deed made for the purpose of settling property, i.e. arranging the mode and extent of the enjoyment thereof. The party who settles property is called the settler; Brown. See SETTLEMENT. In England, the term was used prior to 1862, indicating in relation to a corporation the same things as articles or memorandum of association. Cook, St. & Stockh. § 15.

SETTLER. A person who, for the purpose of acquiring a pre-emption right, has gone upon the land in question, and is actually resident there. See 27 Minn. 222. See LANDS, PUBLIC; SETTLEMENT, DEED OF.

SETTLING DAY. The day on which transactions for the "account" are made up on the Stock Exchange. Whart. Dict. The settling days for English and foreign stocks and shares occur twice a month, the middle and the end. Those for consols are once in every month, generally near the commencement of the month; Moz. & W. A conspiracy to obtain a settling day by fraudulent means in order to defraud buyers of shares, or a conspiracy by fraudulent means to raise or lower the price of shares with intent to defraud buyers or sellers, is an indictable offence; 1 Q. B. D. 730; 3 M. & S. 67; 2 Lind. Part. *711, 816.

SETTLING ISSUES. In English Practice. Deciding the forms of the issues to be determined in a trial, according to the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1875. Sched. I. ord. 26; 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 549.

SEVER. In Practice. To separate; to insist upon a plea distinct from that of other co-defendants.

SEVERAL. Separate; distinct. Exclusive, individual, appropriated. In this sense it is opposed to common; and it has been held that the word could not be construed as equivalent to respective; 67 N. Y. 348; though it has been construed to mean all; 42 N. J. Eq. 501.

More than two, but not very many. 58 Ala. 158; several hundred dollars includes seven hundred dollars. Id. See JOINT AND SEVERAL.

SEVERAL FISHERY. See FISHERY.

SEVERAL ISSUES. This occurs where there is more than one issue involved in a case. 3 Steph. Com. 560.

SEVERAL OBLIGATION. See OBLIGATION.

SEVERAL TAIL. An entail severally to two; as, if land is given to two men and their wives, and to the heirs of their bodies begotten; here the donees have a joint estate for their two lives, and yet they have a several inheritance, because the issue of the one shall have his moiety, and the issue of the other the other moiety. Cowel.

SEVERAL TENANCY. A tenancy which is separate, and not held jointly with another person.

SEVERALLY. Distinctly, separately, apart from others. 124 Ill. 471. When applied to a number of persons the expression severally liable usually implies that each one is liable alone. 21 N. Y. 301.

SEVERALTY, ESTATE IN. An estate which is held by the tenant in his own right only, without any other being joined or connected with him in point of interest during the continuance of his estate. 2 Bla. Com. 179.

SEVERANCE. The separation of a part of a thing from another: for example, the separation of machinery from a mill is a severance, and in that case the machinery, which while annexed to the mill was real estate, becomes by the severance personalty, unless such severance be merely temporary. Mitch. R. E. & Conv. 20; 8 Wend. 587.

In Pleading. When an action is brought in the name of several plaintiffs, in which the plaintiffs must of necessity join, and one or more of the persons so named do not appear, or make default after appearance, the other may have judgment of severance, or, as it is technically called, judgment ad sequendum solum.

But in personal actions, with the exception of those by executors, and of detinue for charters there can be no summons and severance; Co. Litt. 139.

After severance, the party severed can never be mentioned in the suit nor derive any advantage from it.

When there are several defendants, each of them may use such plea as he may think proper for his own defence; and they may join in the same plea, or sever, at their discretion; Co. Litt. 303 a; except, perhaps, in the case of dilatory pleas; Hob. 245, 250. But when the defendants have once united in the plea they cannot afterwards sever at the rejoinder, or other later stage of the pleading. See, generally, Brooke, Abr. Summ. and Sev.; 2 Rolle 488.

Of Estates. The destruction of any one of the unities of a joint tenancy. It is so called because the estate is no longer a joint tenancy, but is severed.

A severance may be effected in various ways, namely: by partition, which is either voluntary or compulsory; by alienation of one of the joint tenants, which turns the estate into a tenancy in common; by the purchase or descent of all the shares of the joint tenants, so that the whole estate becomes vested in one only. Comyns, Dig. Estates by Grant (K. 5); 1 Binn. 175.

SEVERE. Within the meaning of a life insurance policy, severe illness means such an illness as has, or ordinarily does have, a permanent, detrimental effect upon the physical system. 20 Fed. Rep. 569; 64 N. Y. 236.

SEWAGE PURPOSES. Where the effluent water from a sewage farm flows into a pool, the cleansing, levelling, and concreting the bottom of that pool to prevent the accumulation of sewage is a work for "sewage purposes." 56 L. J. Ch. 159; 32 Ch. D. 421; Stroud.

SEWER. A subterranean passage for drainage, usually constructed and maintained by a municipal corporation.

A drain or passage to carry off water and filth underground. Webst. Dict.

A conduit or canal constructed, especially in a town or city, to carry off superfluous water, soil, and other matters; a public drain. Cent. Dict.

A fresh-water trench or little river, encompassed with banks on both sides, to carry the water into the sea and thereby preserve the lands against inundation, etc. See Callis, Sew. 80, 99; Cowel. Properly, a trench artificially made for the purpose of carrying water into the sea, river, or some other place of reception. Crabb, R. P. s. 113; 110 Mass. 433. A ditch or trench through marshy places to carry off water. Spelman, Gloss. See Washb. Easem.

The general corporation act in Pennsylvania provides for the construction of sewerage systems by private corporations by consent of the local authorities.

The authority to construct public sewers is not incident to corporate powers, if ample provision is made by general statutes; 82 Me. 352; but permission may be granted to a private person to lay an under-drain in the street from his premises, without the consent of abutting lot-owners; 150 Pa. 451.

Where general laws place the duty of constructing sewers on municipal officers, the municipality cannot be held liable for negligence; 82 Me. 352; or for injuries to one who falls into a sewer which they negligently leave unguarded.

Damages for the negligent construction of a sewer must be confined to actual, not prospective, damages at time of suit; 88 Tenn. 415.

A municipal corporation owes to the public a duty in the construction of its sewers not to injure the gas mains or other under-ground conveniences and is responsible to any one injured in consequence of a breach of that duty, although the performance of it had been delegated to an independent contractor; [1896] 1 Q. B. 335, where it was held that when a gas main was broken by the negligence of the contractors, and an explosion took place in a private house because of the escape of the gas from the broken main, the municipality was liable, the damages not being too remote.

Generally a city will be enjoined from using or building a sewer so as to create a nuisance; 142 Ill. 197; 127 N. Y. 261; and a license for discharge of sewage from a particular district will not authorize the discharge from a larger one; 127 id. 591; but an injunction was refused to restrain the discharge of sewage from one district into another, where the first district had private connections with the sewer, the remedy being a suit against the inhabitants; [1891] 3 Ch. 527. Authority to carry a sewer under a highway does not grant power to discharge it into a river; 1 Hen. & M. 299; at a place that destroys navigation or the use of a dock; 126 Mass. 367; or into a private canal; 117 Mass. 396.

A borough has a right to make a sewer which empties into a natural stream, though it increased the flowage; 40 Pa. 364; and may permit citizens to lay a drain pipe into it to carry off their surplus water; 150 Pa. 451.

A landlord making a sewer under his tenant's land, without his consent, is liable for damages caused by the tenant stopping the sewer; 40 L. T. N. S. 130; but if the nuisance is created by a tenant, a grantee subject to the tenancy is not liable to third persons; 157 Mass. 117.

A drain passing through private ground, but receiving the drainage of more than one building, is held to be a sewer; [1894] 1 Q. B. 253.

The construction of sewers does not impose an additional burden on a highway; 32 Vt. 367; 28 Conn. 363; 27 N. Y. 204; 13 Allen 159, 211, 291; see 99 U. S. 635; but in Pennsylvania it is contra as to country roads; 18 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 670. And the consent of abutting owners is required, where they are constructed by private corporations; 160 Pa. 372. See POLLUTION.

SEX. The physical difference between male and female in animals.

In the human species the male is called man, and the female woman. Some human beings whose sexual organs are somewhat imperfect have acquired the name of hermaphrodite.

SEXTERY LANDS. Lands given to a church for maintenance of a sexton or sacristan. Cowel.

SHACK. See COMMON.

SHALL. The various meanings of this word range under two general classes according as it is used as implying futurity or implying a mandate, as the words shall be born in a will in the absence of a context are words of futurity; 6 App. Cas. 471; and where a statute declares a thing SHALL be done, the natural and proper meaning is that a peremptory mandate is enjoined; Stroud, L. Dict., which see for classifications of cases in which the word has been held to be used in a directory and others in which it is used in a peremptory sense. It is held in the United States that it is to be construed as may, unless a contrary intention is shown. 95 U. S. 170.

SHAM PLEA. See PLEA.

SHARE. A portion of anything. Sometimes shares are equal, at other times they are unequal.

As to shares in corporation law, see CORPORATION; PERSONAL PROPERTY; STOCK; STOCKHOLDER.

The proportion which descends to one of several children from his ancestor is called a share. The term share and share alike signifies in equal proportions. See PURPART.

SHARE CERTIFICATE. See STOCK.

SHAREHOLDER. See STOCKHOLDER.

SHARPING CORN. A customary gift of corn which, at every Christmas, the farmers in some parts of England give to their smith for sharpening their plough-irons, harrow-tines, etc. Blount.

SHAVE. To buy any security for money at a discount. 2 Den. 293; also, to obtain the property of another by oppression and extortion. Id.

SHEADING. A riding, tithing, or division in the Isle of Man, where the whole island is divided into six sheadings, in each of which there is a coroner or chief constable appointed by a delivery of a rod at the Tinewald court or annual convention. King, Isle of Man 7.

SHEEP. A wether more than a year old. 4 C. & P. 216.

SHEEP SILVER. A service turned into money which was paid because anciently the tenants used to wash the lord's sheep.

When applicable it is not affected by the testator's intention; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 587. It is equally applicable to conveyances by deed and limitations by will; 4 Kent *217. If applied to real estate, it enlarges the estate for life into an inheritance, and makes the tenant for life a tenant in fee; it makes the tenant for life of personalty an absolute owner; 4 Kent 227.

SHELLEY'S CASE, RULE IN. "When the ancestor, by any gift or conveyance, taketh an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs in fee or in tail, the heirs are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase." 1 Co. 104.

This rule has been the subject of much comment. Its origin can be deduced from feudal tenure; 4 Kent 217. It is given by Mr. Preston, Estates, pp. 263, 419, as follows: When a person takes an estate of freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed, will, or other writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without the interposition of another estate, of the same legal or equitable quality, to his heirs, or heirs of his body, as a class of persons to take in succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate. See 15 B. Monr. 282; Hargr. Law Tracts 489, 551; 2 Kent 214.

If the limitation be to one and the heirs of the body, he takes an estate tail; if to one and his heirs generally, a fee-simple; 1 Day 299; 2 Yeates 410.

It does not apply where the ancestor's estate is equitable and that of the heirs legal; 1 Curt. C. C. 419.

The rule was adopted as a part of the common law of this country, and in many of the states still prevails. It has been abolished in most of them. The subject has been exhaustively treated in Pennsylvania, and the numerous decisions will be found analyzed and arranged in tabular form in an essay by J. P. Gross, Esq. (Harrisburg, 1877.) The rule has been held applicable to instruments in which the words, "heir" or "heirs;" 8 W. & S. 38; "issue;" 8 W. & S. 160; 30 Pa. 158; 45 id. 179; "child" or "children;" 7 W. & S. 288; 50 Pa. 483; "son" or "daughter;" 3 S. & R. 433; 70 Pa. 335; "next of kin;" "offspring;" 86 Pa. 117; "descendants," and similar expressions are used in the technical sense of the word heirs. Chief Justice Gibson states the operation of the rule as follows: "It operates only on the intention (of the devisor) when it has been ascertained, not on the meaning of the words used to express it. The ascertainment is left to the ordinary rules of construction peculiar to wills. . . . It gives the ancestor an estate for life, in the first instance, and, by force of the devise to his heirs, general or special, the inheritance also, by conferring the remainder on him, as the stock from which alone they can inherit;" 13 Pa. 344, 354. Although a fee is given in the first part of a will, it may be restrained by subsequent words, so as to convert it into a life estate; 86 Pa. 386. See 75 id. 339; 83 id. 242, 377; 87 id. 144; id. 248; 91 id. 30; Hayes on Est. Tail *53. See 9 Yerg. 309; 77 L. J. Rep. (H. of L.) 170.

SHEPWAY, COURT OF. See COURTS OF THE CINQUE PORTS.

SHERIFF (Sax. scyre, shire, reve, keeper). A county officer representing the executive or administrative power of the state within his county.

The office is said by Camden to have been created by Alfred when he divided England into counties; but Lord Coke is of opinion that it is of still greater antiquity, and that it existed in the time of the Romans, being the deputy of the earl (comes), to whom the custody of the shire was originally committed, and hence known as vicecomes; Camden 156; Co. Litt. 168 a; Dalt. Sheriff 5.

At the common law the office of sheriff might be granted to one in fee, and the grant was not void although the office should descend to an infant; 9 Co. 97 b; and the reason for the validity of such grants was that responsible deputies might be appointed on behalf of infants; 5 B. & Ald. 81. An infant cannot be appointed general deputy sheriff, but might be deputed to serve a particular writ; 1 Kan. 169.

The selection of sheriffs in England was formerly by an election of the inhabitants of the respective counties, except that in some counties the office was hereditary, and in Middlesex the shrievalty was and still is vested by charter in the city of London. But now the lord chancellor, in conjunction with the judges of the courts, nominates suitable persons for the office, and the king appoints. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, § 42.

In this country the usual practice is for the people of the several counties to elect sheriffs.

It is the sheriff's duty to preserve the peace within his bailiwick or county. To this end he is the first man within the county, and may apprehend and commit to prison all persons who break or attempt to break the peace, or may bind them over in a recognizance to keep the peace. He is bound, ex officio, to pursue and take all traitors, murderers, felons, and rioters; has the safekeeping of the county jail, and must defend it against all rioters; and for this, as well as for any other purpose, in the execution of his duties he may command the inhabitants of the county to assist him, which is called the posse comitatus. And this summons every person over fifteen years of age is bound to obey, under pain of fine and imprisonment; Dalt. Sheriff 355; 2d Inst. 454.

In his ministerial capacity he is bound to execute, within his county, all processes that issue from the courts of justice, except where he is a party to the proceeding, in which case the coroner acts in his stead. On mesne process he is to execute the writ, to arrest and take bail; when the cause comes to trial he summons and returns the jury, and when it is determined he carries into effect the judgment of the court. In criminal cases he also arrests and imprisons, returns the jury, has the custody of the prisoner, and executes the sentence of the court upon him, whatever it may be.

It is a settled principle of the common law that every man's house is his castle; accordingly, in the service of civil process, an officer may not break open the outer door of a dwelling-house. He must await his opportunity to enter peaceably without force or violence; 5 Co. 91; 19 Vt. 151; 24 Wend. 369; but having, without force, obtained admission to the house, he may go from one room to another and forcibly open any inner doors, chests, trunks, or other places where property is kept, in order to make a levy; Cowp. 1; 2 Harring. 494; 5 Johns. 352; 1 Bay 358. Where a building was kept by several tenants and had an outer door through which they all passed to gain their several apartments, it was held that an officer who entered this door might enter any other; 6 Daly 449. A building occupied for business as a work-shop, any other building not being a dwelling-house, but connected therewith, may be entered by breaking through the outer door; [1895] 2 Q. B. 668. Where a building is occupied partly as a dwelling and partly for business, a common outer door through which both parties are approached may be broken to make a levy in the store; 50 Mich. 209; but where a milliner carried on her business and resided in one room, it was held to be a trespass, when an officer made an entry by breaking; 34 Minn. 92.

In England it was formerly held that although an officer who forced the outer door of a dwelling was a trespasser, the levy made by him was good; 5 Co. 93; Year Book 18 Edw. IV. fol. 4, pl. 19; but it is now doubtful; 7 Ex. 72; 6 H. L. Cas. 443; and in the United States the doctrine is said to have met with no favor; Freem. Ex. 256; and it is held that such a levy is void; 12 Pick. 270; 24 Wend. 369; 4 Hill 433; 47 N. H. 482.

He also possesses a judicial capacity, and may hold a court and summon a jury for certain purposes; this jurisdiction, in this respect, is at common law quite extensive. This branch of his powers, however, is circumscribed in this country by the statutes of the several states, and is generally confined to the execution of writs of inquiry, of damages, and the like, sent to him from the superior courts of law; 1 Bla. Com. 339.

He has no power or authority out of his own county, except when he is commanded by a writ of habeas corpus to carry a prisoner out of his county; and then if he conveys him through several counties the prisoner is in custody of the sheriffs of each of the counties through which he passes; Plowd. 37 a; 2 Rolle 163; 26 Tex. App. 7. If, however, a prisoner escapes and flies into another county, the sheriff or his officers may, upon fresh pursuit, take him again in such county. But he may do mere ministerial acts out of his county, if within the state, such as making out a panel or return, or assigning a bail-bond, or the like; 2 Ld. Raym. 1455; 2 Stra. 727.

To assist him in the discharge of his various duties, he may appoint an under-sheriff, and as many general or special deputies as the public service may require, who may discharge all the ordinary ministerial duties of the office, such as the service and return of process and the like, but not the execution of a writ of inquiry, for this is in the nature of a judicial duty, which may not be delegated. All acts of the under-sheriff or of the deputies are done in the name of the sheriff, who is responsible for them, although such acts should amount to a trespass or an extortion on the part of the officer; for which reason he usually takes bonds from all his subordinates for the faithful performance of their duties; Cro. Eliz. 294; Dougl. 40. But a deputy sheriff cannot, as such, engage to guard the property of a private person not in the custody of the law; 58 Ark. 381.

The sheriff also appoints a jailer, who is usually one of his deputies. The jailer is responsible for the escape of any prisoner committed to his charge, and is bound to have sufficient force at his disposal to prevent a breach of the prison by a mob or otherwise; and nothing will excuse him but an act of God or the public enemy. He must not be guilty of cruelty, without sufficient cause; but he may defend himself at all hazards if attacked. In a case where a prisoner, notwithstanding his remonstrances, was confined by the jailer in a room in which was a person ill with the small-pox, which disease he took and died, it was held to be murder in the jailer; Viner, Abr. Gaol (A); 4 Term 789; 4 Co. 84; Co. 3d Inst. 34; 2 Stra. 856.

A deputy cannot depute another person to do the duty intrusted to him; although it is not necessary that his should be the hand that executes the writ: it is sufficient if he is present and assists. A deputy sheriff's return of process in his own name, with the words "deputy sheriff" added, is void; 31 Fla. 147; but a return of a levy may properly be indorsed on an execution by a third person at the discretion and in the presence of the sheriff; 98 Ala. 479. In the execution of criminal process, he may, after demanding admittance, break open the outer door of a house; but in civil actions he may not forcibly enter a dwelling-house, for every man's house is said to be his castle and fortress, as well for defence as for repose. But a warehouse, store, or barn, or the inner door of a dwelling-house after the officer has peaceably entered, is not privileged. Process or writs of any description may not be served on Sunday, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace; nor may the sheriff on that day retake a prisoner who has escaped from custody; 6 Wend. 454; 4 Taunt. 619; Cro. Eliz. 908; Cro. Car. 537; W. Jones 429; 3 B. & P. 223.

In the absence of representations of title made at a sheriff's sale of property on execution, the purchaser has no remedy against the plaintiff or sheriff for failure of title; 117 Ind. 206.

A sheriff is not liable on his bond, but is personally liable, for acts done under process void on its face; and the order of a criminal court in excess of its jurisdiction, directing him to redeliver a certain person to prison, is no protection to a sheriff, no matter what the decision of the court having jurisdiction of the habeas corpus proceeding might be; 92 Tenn. 520; but he is not liable for acts done by order of a court of competent jurisdiction; 45 La. Ann. 1221; or by a court in excess of its jurisdiction, if the process does not show that fact on its face; 61 Am. Dec. 470. He is not required to question apparently regular process; 66 Mich. 181. He is bound to serve voidable process; 11 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 383; if the error may be amended; 2 Col. 388. See FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

If a court having jurisdiction issues a writ against specific property, the sheriff is protected in seizing it; 50 N. Y. 355; whoever owns it; 87 Ill. 617; if he take it from the defendant in the writ; 114 Mass. 570; although the plaintiff had no claim; 39 Conn. 507. See infra.

A levy on the goods of a stranger to an execution amounts to a trespass, although the goods are not touched and there is no actual taking, and to maintain the action the plaintiff must have the right of, or be in actual, possession of the property at the time of the levy; and the sheriff may abandon or restrict the levy to the defendant's interests, and be thereby discharged, even though the return was not altered until after the action of trespass is begun; 128 Pa. 397.

A sheriff may not serve a writ to which he is a party; 17 Pick. 166; or in which he is interested; 43 N. H. 238.

Where there are several writs, it is the sheriff's duty to serve them in the order of their receipt; Freeman, Exec. § 197; 18 Wis. 406. Where the judgment is a lien, it is his duty to apply the proceeds to the oldest lien; 85 Am. Dec. 568; but if the defendant gives him money to apply to a junior execution, he must so apply it; 35 Pa. 166.

A sheriff cannot arrest in civil proceedings without a writ; 8 Term 187; which the person arrested is entitled to see; 13 Mass. 321; and the writ must contain the correct name of the person arrested; 9 Wend. 319; unless he is known by either name; 1 Wend. 132; but the officer is liable for arresting the wrong person, whose name is the same as that in the writ; 14 Mass. 184. Misnomer in an execution in which the same mistake occurred as in the original writ, does not affect the officer; 1 Mass. 76. See ARREST.

Where a person in custody on civil process escapes, the sheriff is liable to the plaintiff for the value of the claim; 63 N. C. 188. At common law, voluntary escape made the sheriff liable for the plaintiff's claim, and discharged the defendant; 78 Pa. 396; but if the escape was through negligence, or was involuntary, recaption before suit by the plaintiff was a bar; 10 Gratt. 529.

The sheriff must act with diligence; 38 Ala. 315; and, in the absence of instructions, execute the process according to its terms; 60 N. H. 127; 18 Barb. 56. Special instructions regarding a general writ should be followed; 34 N. H. 261; in the absence of which he should make reasonable search for the defendant and his property; Freeman, Exec. § 252. If he has doubt as to the title of the defendant, he may require indemnity; 8 Ala. 685; which is implied by instructions to proceed in a special manner; 83 Mo. 323. If he seize the property of one not named in the writ he is liable as a trespasser; 24 Ill. 56; if he remain in a house a long time in possession of goods taken in execution, he becomes a trespasser ab initio; 8 Ex. 237.

An officer may continue to levy until the return day in order to satisfy the writ; 26 N. J. L. 124; but is liable for an excessive levy; 40 Cal. 408; and must take due care to preserve the lien on the property attached; 16 Mass. 5; in moving goods; 2 La. Ann. 162; but if the property attached perishes without his fault, he is not liable; 20 Me. 266.

See EXECUTION; ARREST; ESCAPE; LEVY; SERVICE; PROCESS.

SHERIFF-DEPUTE. The judge of a Scotch county. Bell.

SHERIFF-GELD. A rent formerly paid by a sheriff, and it is prayed that the sheriff in his account may be discharged thereof. Rot. Parl. 50 Edw. III.

SHERIFF-TOOTH. 1. A tenure by the service of providing entertainment for the sheriff at his county courts. 2. An ancient tax on land in Derbyshire. 3. A common tax levied for the sheriff's diet. Cowel; Moz. & W.

SHERIFF'S COURT. In Scotch Law. A court having an extensive civil and criminal jurisdiction.

Its judgments and sentences are subject to review by the court of session and court of justiciary. Alison, Pract. 25; Paterson, Comp. 941, n.

SHERIFF'S COURT IN LONDON. A tribunal having cognizance of personal actions under the London (city) Small Debts Act of 1852.

The sheriff's court in London is one of the chief of the courts of limited and local jurisdiction in London. 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 301, 449, note (1); 3 Bla. Com. 80, note (j).

By the County Courts Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, this court is now classed among the county courts, so far as regards the administration of justice; 3 Steph., 11th ed. 30, n.

SHERIFF'S JURY. In Practice. A jury composed of no determinate number, but which may be more or less than twelve, summoned by the sheriff for the purposes of an inquisition or inquest of office. 3 Bla. Com. 258.

SHERIFF'S OFFICERS. Bailiffs who are either bailiffs of hundreds or bound-bailiffs.

SHERIFF'S SALE. A sale of property by a sheriff or his deputy, in execution of the mandate of legal process. Anderson, L. Dict; 2 Vt. 172.

SHERIFF'S TOURN. A court of record in England, held twice every year, within a month after Easter and Michaelmas, before the sheriff, in different parts of the county.

SHERIFFALTY, or SHRIEVALTY. The office of sheriff.

SHERRERIE. A word used by the authorities of the Roman church, to specify contemptuously the technical parts of the law, as administered by non-clerical lawers. Bacon.

SHIFTING CLAUSE. In a settlement, a clause by which some other mode of devolution is subtituted for that primarily prescribed.

SHIFTING USE. Such a use as takes effect in derogation of some other estate, and is limited expressly by the deed or is allowed to be created by some person named in the deed. Gilb. Uses 152, n.; 2 Washb. R. P. 284.

For example, a feoffment in fee is made to the use of W and his heirs till A pays £40 to W, and then to the use of A and his heirs. A very common application is in the case of marriage settlements. Wms. R. P., 16th ed. 330. The doctrine of shifting uses furnished a means of evading the principle of law that a fee could not be limited after a fee. See 2 Washb. R. P. 284; Wms. R. P., 16th ed. 330; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 452; 1 Vern. 402; 1 Edw. Ch. 34.

SHILLING. In English Law. The name of an English coin, of the value one-twentieth part of a pound. In the United States while they were colonies there were coins of this donomination; but they varied greatly in their value.

SHIN-PLASTER. Formerly a jocose term for a bank-note greatly depreciated in value; also for paper money of a denomination less than a dollar. Webster. See 2 Ind. 483.

SHIP. A vessel employed in navigation; Ben. Ad. § 215; for example, the terms the ship's papers, the ship's husband, shipwreck, and the like, are employed whether the vessel referred to be a brig, a schooner, a sloop, or a three-masted vessel.

The word comprehends every description of vessel navigating on any sea or channel, lake or river, to which the provisions of revised statutes, title "Merchant Marine," may be applicable; R. S. § 4612; 48 Fed. Rep. 312. See 119 U. S. 629. See 46 Fed. Rep. 204, as to what is not a ship.

A vessel with three masts, employed in navigation; 4 Wash. C. C. 530; the boats and rigging; 2 Marsh. Ins. 727; together with the anchors, masts, cables, and such-like objects, are considered as part of the ship; Pardessus, n. 599.

As to what passes by a bill of sale under the general term ship, or ship and her appurtenances, or ship, apparel, and furniture, see 1 Pars. Marit. Law 71, n. 3; APPAREL. The capacity of a ship is ascertained by its tonnage, or the space which may be occupied by its cargo. A majority of the owners cannot change the ownership by forming themselves into a limited company; [1895] P. 284; admiralty will authorize a majority in value of the owners of a ship to employ the ship, taking a bond for the protection of the minority; 3 Kent 151; a dissenting part-owner, receiving securities, cannot claim compensation or a share of the profits; 4 Sim. 439; and is not liable for a collision; 18 Fed. Rep. 547.

Carriers by water are to a certain extent common carriers, in all the strictness of the common-law rule; 3 Kent *217; 19 How. 312; like common carriers, apart from express contract, they are absolutely responsible for the goods intrusted to them, and insure them against all contingencies excepting only the act of God and the enemies of the Queen. Per Lopes, L. J., in 16 Q. B. D. 633. See, also, L. R. 9 Ex. 342; 1 C. P. D. 19; this rule is said to have been established in the seventeenth century; 1 C. P. D. 430. The master of a general ship is liable where his goods were stolen by robbers; 1 Mod. 85; and an action will lie against the owners as well as the master; Carth. 58. It has been held that the owner of a private ship is subject to the same rule; L. R. 9 Ex. 688.

Lord Cockburn has denied that a carrier by sea is subject to the same liability as a common carrier by land; 1 C. P. D. 426; and Brett. J., was of opinion that he is not a common carrier, but that his liability to carry at his absolute risk arises from recognized custom; L. R. 9 Ex. 338; 7 id. 267. See article in 5 L. Q. Rev. 15. It is said that they are not common carriers, because not bound to receive all goods offered. See 1 Pars. Ship. 248.

Ships are of different kinds: as, ships of war and merchant-ships, steamships and sailing-vessels. Merchant-ships may be devoted to the carriage of passengers and property, or either alone. When propelled in whole or in part by steam, and employed in the transportation of passengers, they are subject to inspection and certain stringent regulations imposed by act of congress passed 28th Feb., 1871; R. S. §§ 4463–4500; and steam-vessels not carrying passengers are likewise subject to inspection and certain regulations; R. S. §§ 4399–4462.

Stringent regulations in regard to the number of passengers to be taken on board of sailing-vessels, and the provisions to be made for their safety and comfort, are also prescribed by R. S. § 4465.

Numerous acts of congress have been passed from time to time in reference to the registering, enrolling, licensing, employment, and privileges of the vessels of commerce owned in the United States. See R. S. §§ 4399, 4500.

Construction of the Harter Act. The act of Feb. 13, 1893, known as the Harter Act (see that title), was not intended as general legislation concerning the rights or liabilities of ship-owners, but only to deal with the carrying vessel and her own cargo. And all principles and rules of decisions previously applicable, as to the apportionment of damages in case of mutual fault, should still be followed as closely as possible and no more changes admitted than the evident intent of the act necessitates; 60 Fed. Rep. 296; 74 id. 899; s. c. 33 U. S. App. 510. In determining the effect of the statute in restricting the operation of general and well-settled principles, the course of decision has been to treat those principles as still existing, and limit the relief from their operation afforded by the statute to precisely that called for by the language of the statute, and no more. It is said that the intent of the act is that damages to the cargo arising from negligence in navigation shall be borne by the cargo owner and not by the ship, and that the act was not designed to increase or diminish the liability of the other vessel in cases of mutual fault and a division of damages; 77 Fed. Rep. 329. The requirement in the act of due diligence to exempt the owner from liability to cargo owners means not only the personal diligence of the owner but also of his agents employed to fit the vessel for sea; 82 Fed. Rep. 664. Such diligence is not exercised where no inspection is made of the cement covering the bottom of an iron steamship; 51 U. S. App. 100; s. c. 79 Fed. Rep. 973. The word management in the act relates to management on the voyage and not to the master's acts in stowing the ship; 82 Fed. Rep. 665. Insufficiency of the mechanical fog-horn on the sailing vessel because of failure to provide any means for repairing it is a lack of proper equipment under the act; 77 Fed. Rep. 329. Diligent care of the ship for the purposes of the act does not require re-docking more than once a year; 79 id. 371.

The provisions of the Harter Act relieving vessel owners from liability do not extend to foreign vessels; 33 U. S. App. 510; s. c. 74 Fed. Rep. 899; and no restrictive operation can be given to it; 73 id. 239; s. c. 44 U. S. App. 434.

The words "ex ship" are not restricted to any particular ship; and by the usage of merchants, simply denote that the property in the goods shall pass to the buyer upon their leaving the ship's tackle, and that he shall be liable for all subsequent charges of lading. They do not constitute a condition of the contract but are inserted for the benefit of the seller; 161 U. S. 57; L. R. 1 C. P. 684. See PRIZE.

As to limited liability of owners in cases of collisions, see ABANDONMENT. As to statute regarding overcrowding of steamers, see 1 U. S. App. 147.

In regard to collisions at sea where both are to blame, see paper by F. W. Raikes, 17th Rep. Int. Law Asso. 198. See COLLISION.

A vessel is deemed a part of the territory of the country to which she belongs; 150 U. S. 249; 154 U. S. 152; and although the deck of a private American vessel is considered for many purposes constructively as territory of the United States, yet persons on board of such vessels, whether officers, sailors, or passengers, cannot invoke the protection of the provisions of the constitution as to the indictment and trial by jury, until brought within the actual territorial boundaries of the United States; 140 U. S. 453.

SHIP-BROKER. One who transacts business relating to vessels and their employment between the owners of vessels and merchants who send cargoes.

SHIP-MONEY. An imposition formerly levied on port towns and other places for fitting out ships; revived by Charles I. and abolished in the same reign. 17 Car. I. c. 14; Whart. Dict.

SHIP'S BILL. The copy of the bill of lading retained by the master. In case of a variance between this and the bill delivered to the shipper, the latter must control; 14 Wall. 98.

SHIP'S HUSBAND. An agent appointed by the owner of a ship, and invested with authority to make the requisite repairs and attend to the management, equipment, and other concerns of the ship. He is the general agent of the owners in relation to the ship, and may be appointed in writing or orally. Abb. Sh. 90. He is usually, but not necessarily, a part-owner; 1 Pars. Mar. Law 97. He must see to the proper outfit of the vessel in the repairs adequate to the voyage and in the tackle and furniture necessary for a seaworthy ship; must have a proper master, mate, and crew for the ship, so that in this respect it shall be seaworthy; must see to the due furnishing of provisions and stores according to the necessities of the voyage; must see to the regularity of the clearances from the custom-house and the regularity of the registry; must settle the contracts and provide for the payment of the furnishings which are requisite to the performance of those duties; must enter into proper charter-parties, or engage the vessel for general freight under the usual conditions, and settle for freight and adjust averages with the merchant; and must preserve the proper certificates, surveys and documents, in case of future disputes with insurers and freighters, and keep regular books of the ship; 4 B. & Ad. 375; 1 Y. & C. 326; 8 Wend. 144; 16 Conn. 12. These are his general powers; but, of course, they may be limited or enlarged by the owners; and it may be observed that without special authority he cannot borrow money generally for the use of the ship; though, as above observed, he may settle the accounts for furnishings, or grant bills for them, which form debts against the concern whether or not he has funds in his hands with which he might have paid them; 1 Bell, Com. § 499. Although he may, in general, levy the freight which is by the bill of lading payable on the delivery of the goods, it would seem that he would not have power to take bills for the freight and give up the possession of the lien over the cargo, unless it has been so settled by the charter-party.

He cannot insure or bind the owners for premiums; 17 Me. 147; 2 Maule & S. 485; 7 B. Monr. 595; 11 Pick. 85; 5 Burr. 2627.

As the power of the master to enter into contracts of affreightments is superseded in the port of the owners, so it is by the presence of the ship's husband or the knowledge of the contracting parties that a ship's husband has been appointed; 2 Bell, Com. 199. The ship's husband, as such, has no lien on the vessel or proceeds; 2 Curt. C. C. 427; 31 Fed. Rep. 923. See EXERCITOR MARIS.

SHIP'S PAPERS. The papers or documents required for the manifestation of the ownership and national character of a vessel and her cargo, and to show her compliance with the revenue and navigation laws of the country to which she belongs.

The want of these papers or any of them renders the character of a vessel suspicious; 2 Boulay-Paty, Droit Com. 14; and the use of false or simulated papers frequently subjects the vessel to confiscation; 15 East 46, 70, 364; or avoid an insurance, unless the insurer has stipulated that she may carry such papers; id.

The absence of any one of a ship's proper papers is not conclusive against the good faith of the ship; 1 Kent *157. Spoliation of ship's papers is an aggravated ground of suspicion and is said to be almost conclusive of guilt; 1 Dods. 480; but it is not of itself a ground of condemnation; 2 Wheat. 227.

A ship's papers are of two sorts: first, those required by the law of the particular country to which the ship belongs: as, the certificate of registry or of enrolment, the license, the crew-list, the shipping articles, clearance, etc.; and, second, such as are required by the law of nations to be on board of neutral ships as evidence of their title to that character: as, the sea brief or letter, or passport; the proofs of property in the ship, as bills of sale, etc.; the charter-party; the bills of lading; the invoices; the crew-list or muster-roll; the log-book, and the bill of health. M'Culloch, Com. Dict.

The following constitute a ship's papers according to 1 Kent *157: a certificate of registry, sea-letter, muster-roll, log-book, charter-party, invoice, and bill of lading. As to what are ship's papers under the rules of various foreign nations, see 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 98.

The register, or other document in lieu thereof, together with the clearance and other papers granted by the officers of the customs to any foreign vessel, at her departure from the port from which she may have arrived, are required to be produced to the collector of any United States port previous to her entry. The master is required, within forty-eight hours after entry, to deposit the papers with the consul or vice-consul of the nation to which the vessel belongs, and to deliver to the collector of the port the certificate of such consul or vice-consul that he has done so; R. S. § 4209.

An application by a vice-consul for a permit for a vessel to depart, a bill of lading signed by the captain, a license to sail, a certificate of the custom-house official that the vessel had paid its tax for hospital dues, and a bill of health signed by the maritime sub-delegate; the bill of lading being identified by the mate and the other papers being official documents under seal executed by the Chilian authorities, are entitled to confidence and should be admitted in evidence as documents of a public nature; 86 Fed. Rep. 156. It is not necessary that they should be confirmed and sanctioned by the ordinary tests of truth; id., citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 423.

SHIPPER. One who ships or puts goods on board of a vessel, to be carried to another place during her voyage. In general the shipper is bound to pay for the hire of the vessel or the freight of the goods; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1030.

SHIPPING. Ships in general; ships or vessels of any kind intended for navigation. Relating to ships; as, shipping interests, shipping affairs, shipping business, shipping concerns. Putting on board a ship or vessel, or receiving on board a ship or vessel. Webster, Dict.; Worcester, Dict. See SHIP; SHIP'S PAPERS.

SHIPPING ARTICLES. An agreement, in writing or print, between the master and seamen or mariners on board his vessel (except such as shall be apprenticed or servant to himself or owners), declaring the voyage or voyages, term or terms of time, for which such seamen or mariners shall be shipped. It is also required that at the foot of every such contract there shall be a memorandum, in writing, of the day and the hour on which each seaman or mariner who shall so ship and subscribe shall render himself on board to begin the voyage agreed upon. Provision is made in the R. S. of U. S. for shipping articles, and a penalty is imposed for shipping seamen without them; R. S. § 4509 et seq.

The shipping articles ought not to contain any clause which derogates from the general rights and privileges of seamen; and, if they do, such clause will be declared void; 2 Sumn. 443; 2 Mas. 541.

A seaman who signs shipping articles is bound to perform the voyage; and he has no right to elect to pay damages for non-performance of the contract; 2 Va. Cas. 276.

See, generally, Gilp. 147, 219, 452; 1 Pet. Adm. 212; 1 Mas. 443; 5 id. 272; 14 Johns. 260; SEAMEN.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONER. An officer appointed by the several circuit courts of the United States for each port of entry, which is also a port of ocean navigation within their respective jurisdictions, which, in the judgment of such court, may require the same. His duties are: to facilitate and superintend the engagement and discharge of seamen; to secure the presence on board of the men engaged at the proper times; to facilitate the making of apprenticeship to the sea service; and such other like duties as may be required by law; R. S. §§ 4501–4508.

SHIPMENT. The delivery of the goods within the time required on some vessel destined to the particular port which the seller has reason to suppose will sail within a reasonable time. It does not mean a clearance of the vessel as well as putting the goods on board where there is nothing to indicate that the seller was expected to exercise any control over the clearance of the vessel or of her subsequent management; 121 N. Y. 179. See L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455; 97 N. Y. 221; 7 Mass. 453; 105 N. Y. 404.

SHIPS OF WAR. The ports of every nation are considered as open to the ships of war of other powers with whom it is at peace. They are exempt from all forms of process in private suit and cannot be seized or interfered with by judicial proceedings to punish violation of the public laws; 7 Op. A. G. 122. Such violations are to be remedied by the offended state appealing directly to the other sovereign.

But such ships must not appear as a disturbing agency in the port of a friendly state. They must conform to the rules of quarantine and anchorage, and a ship of war which refuses to comply with such local regulations may be refused admittance, or her stay limited. If any of her crew while on land infringe the laws of the country, they are subject to the local authorities, but if an offender escapes to his vessel, he cannot be pursued there; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 33. They are probably not subject to salvage claims; 1 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 217.

In international law a state has jurisdiction over its property and citizens on the high seas when carried under its own flag. This jurisdiction is sometimes based on the theory that the ships of a country are a prolongation of its territory and sometimes on the theory that the jurisdiction arises from the mere fact of property; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 147.

Woolsey says of public ships: "They are not only public property, built or bought by the government, but they are, as it were, floating barracks, a part of the public organism and represent the national dignity, and on these accounts even foreign ports are exempt from the local jurisdiction. . . . However, it is on account of the crew rather than on account of the ship itself that they have any territorial quality. Take the crew away, let the abandoned hulk be met at sea; it now becomes property, nothing more." Wheaton says: "A public vessel belonging to an independent sovereign is exempt from every species of visitation and search, even within the territorial jurisdiction of another state." The principle is universally admitted.

Public ships of a friendly nation, coming into ports of the United States, and demeaning themselves in a friendly manner are exempt from the jurisdiction of the country; 7 Cr. 116. See NEUTRALITY.

SHIRE. In English Law. A district or division of country. Co. Litt. 50 a.

A county.

The ancient English states, though degraded to the rank of shires, preserved their autonomy to the utmost practicable extent. They retained the state assembly, which was the supreme court of law, the king himself sitting in it as in the national assembly. In the absence of the king, the ealdorman presided in it. The shire government was not royal, but ducal. The king, in appointing the ealdorman, appointed, not a servant of his will, but a prince and lord of the shire. The Anglo-Saxon shire constitution, in spite of the establishment of the empire, was an expression of still undeveloped royalty. See Essays Ang. Sax. Law 21.

SHIRE-GEMOT (spelled, also, Scire-gemote, Scir-gemot, Scyre-gemote, Shire-mote; from the Saxon scir or scyre, county, shire, and gemote, a court, an assembly).

The Saxon county court. It was held twice a year before the bishop and aldermen of the shire, and was the principal court. Spelman, Gloss, Gemotum; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law 28.

SHIRE-MAN, or SCYRE-MAN. Before the conquest the judge of the county, by whom trials for land, etc., were determined. Toml.; Moz. & W.

SHIRE RIEVE, or SHIRE REVE A sheriff (q. v.).

SHOP. A place kept and used for the sale of goods. 14 Gray 378. A building as distinguished from a place of sale which is open like a stall. 60 Mich. 426. In order to constitute a shop there must be some structure of a more or less permanent character; 6 B. & S. 303.

As used in a statute it is a house or building in which small quantities of goods, wares, or drugs and the like are sold, or in which mechanics labor, and sometimes keep their manufactures for sale. 98 N. C. 643.

SHOP-BOOKS. The books of a retail dealer, mechanic, or other person, in which entries or charges are made of work done, or goods sold and delivered to customers, commonly called "account-books," or "books of account." The party's own shop-books are in certain cases admissible in evidence to prove the delivery of goods therein charged, where a foundation is laid for their introduction. The following are the general rules governing the production of this kind of evidence. First, that the party offering the books kept no clerk; second, that the books offered by the party are his books of account, and that the entries therein are in his handwriting; third, it must appear, by some of those who have dealt with the party and settled by the books offered, that they found them correct; fourth, it must be shown that some of the articles charged have been delivered. Where entries are made by a clerk who is dead, such entries are admissible in evidence on proof of the handwriting; Steph. Ev. art. 38; 4 Ill. 120; 19 id. 393; 8 Johns. 212; 11 Wend. 568; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 117; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 282. Where memoranda made during the day by one, are at night transcribed to a book by another, who did not know the truth of the facts recorded by the former, the book is not competent testimony and cannot be used to refresh his memory; 22 U. S. App. 646. See ORIGINAL ENTRY; MEMORANDUM; ACCOUNT BOOK.

SHOP LIFTING. See LARCENY; KLEPTOMANIA.

SHOP RIGHT. See PATENT.

SHORE. Land on the side of the sea, a lake, or a river. Strictly speaking, when the water does not ebb and flow in a river, there is no shore. See 6 Mass. 435; 23 Tex. 349; 23 N. J. L. 624, 683; 38 id. 548; RIVER; SEA.

SHORT CAUSE. A suit in the chancery division of the high court of justice, where there is only a simple point for discussion, which will probably occupy not more than ten minutes in the hearing. A suit may often be greatly accelerated by being placed on the list of short causes, which are heard one day in each week (generally Saturday) during the sittings of the court; Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th ed. 836; Hunt. Eq. Pt. I. ch. 4, s. 4. A similar provision is familiar to the practice of the courts of several of the states, but its operation is not restricted to chancery cases, and the time allowed for the hearing varies in the different courts.

SHORT ENTRY. A term used among bankers to denote the fact which takes place when a note has been sent to a bank for collection, and an entry of it is made in the customer's bank-book, stating the amount in an inner column, and carrying it out into the accounts between the parties when it has been paid.

SHORT-FORD. An ancient custom of the city of Exeter, similar to that of gavelet in London, which was in effect a foreclosure of the right of the tenant by the lord of the fee, in cases of non-payment of rent; Cowel.

SHORT HAUL. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

SHORT NOTICE. In English Practice. Four days' notice of trial. Wharton, Law Dict. Notice of trial; 1 Cr. & M. 499. Where short notice has been given, two days is sufficient notice of continuance; Wharton, Lex.

SHORTAGE. No allowance for shortage can be made where the contents of missing bags of sugar had been put into new bags by seamen and actually delivered; 1 U. S. App. 14.

SHOW. To make apparent or clear by evidence, to prove. 104 Pa. 133.

SHRUB. A low, small plant, the branches of which grow directly from the earth without any supporting trunk or stem. 70 Miss. 406.

SHUT DOWN. Within the meaning of an insurance policy, a saw mill which has stopped running for the winter, is shut down, though men are employed about the premises and the machinery has not been dismantled. 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 922.

SHYSTER. A trickish knave; one who carries on any business, especially a legal business, in a dishonest way. 34 Minn. 343; see 40 Mich. 251.

SI ACTIO. The conclusion of a plea to an action when the defendant demands judgment, if the plaintiff ought to have his action, etc. Obsolete.

SI ITA EST. If it be so. Emphatic words in the old writ of mandamus to a judge, commanding him, if the act alleged be truly stated (si ita est), to affix his seal to a bill of exceptions. 5 Pet. 192.

SI PRIUS. If before. Formal words in ancient writs for summoning juries. Fleta, l. 2. c. 65, § 12.

SI TE FECERIT SECURUM (Lat. if he make you secure). Words which occur in the form of writs, which originally required, or still require, that the plaintiff should give security to the sheriff that he will prosecute his claim, before the sheriff can be required to execute such writ.

SICKNESS. By sickness is understood any affection of the body which deprives it temporarily of the power to fulfil its usual functions. It has been held to include insanity. L. R. 8 Q. B. 295.

Sickness is either such as affects the body generally, or only some parts of it. Of the former class a fever is an example; of the latter, blindness. When a process has been issued against an individual for his arrest, the sheriff or other officer is authorized, after he has arrested him, if he be so dangerously sick that to remove him would endanger his life or his health, to let him remain where he found him, and to return the facts at large, or simply languidus.

SIDE-BAR RULES. In English Practice. Rules which were formerly moved for by attorneys on the side-bar of the court, but now may be had of the clerk of the rules, upon a præcipe. These rules are, that the sheriff return his writ, that he bring in the body, for special imparlance, to be present at the taxing of costs, and the like. As to side-bar applications, see Mitchell, Rules 20.

SIDESMEN (testes, synodales). In Ecclesiastical Law. A kind of impanelled jury, consisting of two, three, or more persons, in every parish, who were upon oath to present all heretics and irregular persons. In process of time they became standing officers in many places, especially cities. They were called synodsmen,—by corruption sidesmen; also questmen. But their office has become absorbed in that of church-warden. 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 399.

SIDEWALK. That part of a public street or highway designed for the use of pedestrians.

As used in this country it does not mean a walk or way constructed of any particular kind of material, or in any special manner, but ordinarily is used to designate that part of the street of a municipality which has been set apart and used for pedestrians, as distinguished from that portion set apart and used for animals and vehicles. 48 Minn. 201.

Generally the sidewalk is included with the gutters and roadway in the general term street; 42 Ill. 503; 76 N. Y. 174; 50 Wis. 429. It was so held in the construction of a statute providing for compensation for damages caused by changing the grade of streets; 100 Ind. 242; and in one authorizing the improvement of streets; 114 Ind. 371; but in many cases of municipal ordinances and contracts, the word street is held not to include sidewalks; 52 Cal. 440; 138 Mass. 555.

It is the duty of a municipal corporation to keep the sidewalks, as well as the roadbed of the street, in repair; 74 N. Y. 264; 76 id. 174; 136 Pa. 533; but it has been held that where the absolute duty is not imposed by the charter, the obligation of the city with respect to keeping the sidewalks free from defects is less imperative than the same obligation with respect to the roadway; 51 Barb. 396; 36 id. 226; but these decisions have been questioned; 44 id. 385. One who knows of a defect in the sidewalk is bound to use particular care to avoid injury; 14 Hun 544; but the injury does not defeat recovery, if due care is used; 2 N. Y. St. 351.

The duty imposed on municipal corporations of keeping highways safe and convenient includes obstructions from ice and snow; 12 Vt. 338; 13 Pick. 343; 17 How. 161, where it was held that it was for the jury to say whether treading down and not removing the snow was a safe and convenient method of removing the obstruction.

Ice formed by melting snow and ice falling from a building simply as the result of natural laws, is not a defect for which the municipality is liable; 85 Wis. 187. There must be a breach of duty on the part of the city, such as an unusual or dangerous obstruction to travel from snow and ice, and such time must have elapsed after the creation of the obstruction as to afford a presumption of knowledge; 121 N. Y. 147. The duty of removing such obstructions is a qualified one, becoming imperative only under the circumstances mentioned; 109 id. 134. Where, however, there is by statute an absolute liability for injuries resulting from a defective sidewalk, no question of want of notice or the exercise of care is a defence; 31 W. Va. 384. The remedy for an injury resulting from a defective sidewalk is exclusively against the city, and its liability cannot be avoided by the existence of any ordinance on the subject; 105 N. Y. 202; 14 Gray 249. The right of action arises solely from negligence; 122 Ind. 39; the fact that an accident occurs is not sufficient, there must be a neglect of duty; 39 N. Y. St. 603. In order to hold the city liable for negligence in permitting an obstruction, it must have notice, but this may be constructive through the elapse of sufficient time for the presumption of notice to arise; 27 Can. 545; 18 Hun 167; 22 W. N. C. 132.

Where an awning over the sidewalk was permitted to remain in an unsafe condition by the accumulation of snow and ice, the city was held liable for injuries sustained by the fall of the awning; 13 Metc. 292; but where an accident was occasioned by ice formed by water dripping from the awning, it was held that the city was not liable and the action should have been against the owner; 22 W. N. C. Pa. 133.

In actions for damages from defective sidewalks, it was a question for the jury whether, under the circumstances, the corporation is liable; 48 Conn. 469; 185 Pa. 32. A question for their decision was whether ordinary care was used and whether the sidewalk was reasonably safe; 40 id. 134; 10 Cush. 260; or whether there was negligence in not removing the obstruction; 100 N. Y. 15; 25 Neb. 133; or whether there was a sufficient lapse of time to be considered constructive notice; 39 N. Y. St. 744.

Even if the city were negligent, a person injured by a defective sidewalk cannot recover unless he show himself in the exercise of due care; 133 Ill. 177; and if the accident occurred by reason of the plaintiff's being intoxicated, he cannot recover; 76 Wis. 499.

Where the sidewalk is manifestly dangerous it is the duty of a pedestrian to walk on the roadway; 130 Pa. 123; and he cannot recover for an injury which his own observation, prudently exercised, ought to have enabled him to avoid; 31 W. Va. 842.

A municipal corporation may require its citizens to clean the snow from their sidewalks; 105 N. Y. 202. A law requiring the abutting owners to keep sidewalks in repair is a duty cast directly upon the property owner and is in the nature of a police regulation; it is not a tax or municipal assessment; 131 Pa. 109.

Where the abutting owners permitted the sidewalk to be obstructed for an unreasonable time in loading and unloading a truck with skids so that a pedestrian was injured in passing over it, the owner was held liable; 29 App. Div. N. Y. 462; id. 309.

Where the proprietor of a theatre invites an unusual crowd to occupy his sidewalk, he is bound to greater precaution and owes a duty to pedestrians that they are not injured through any lack of care; 5 Super. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 609. See STREET; HIGHWAY.

SIGHT. Presentment. Bills of exchange are frequently drawn payable at sight or a certain number of days or months after sight.

Bills payable at sight are said to be entitled to days of grace by the law merchant; Big. Bills & N. 92; Dan. Neg. Instr. § 617; 13 Gray 597; 42 Ala. 186; 28 Mo. 596; contra, 1 E. D. Sm. 505. Statutes have settled the question in some states.

The holder of a bill payable at sight is required to use due diligence to put it into circulation, and, if payable after sight, have it presented in reasonable time; 20 Johns. 146; 12 Pick. 399; 28 E. L. & E. 131; 13 Mass. 137; 4 Mas. 336; 5 id. 118; 1 M'Cord 322; 1 Hawks 195.

After sight in a bill means after acceptance; in a note, after exhibition to the maker; Dan. Neg. Instr., 4th ed. § 619. It is usual to leave a bill for acceptance one whole day; but the acceptance is dated as on the day it was left; Sewell, Bank.

A bill drawn payable a certain number of days after sight, acceptance waived, must be presented to fix the time at which the bill is to become due, and the term of the bill begins to run from the date of presentment. See 4 Montreal L. Rep. 249.

Sight drafts and sight bills are bills payable at sight.

SIGILLUM (Lat.). A seal.

SIGN. To affix a signature to; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting. Webst.; 131 Pa. 230.

SIGN MANUAL. In English Law. The signature of the king to grants or letters patent, inscribed at the top. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 347*.

Any one's name written by himself. Webster, Dict.; Wharton, Law Dict. The sign manual is not good unless countersigned, etc.; 9 Mod. 54.

SIGNA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those species of indicia which come more immediately under the cognizance of the senses: such as, stains of blood on the person of one accused of murder, indications of terror at being charged with the offence, and the like.

SIGNAL. A means of communication between vessels at sea or between a vessel and the shore. The international code of signals for the use of all nations assigns arbitrary meanings to different arrangements of flags or displays of lights. Where a steamer did not hear the signal but should have heard it, she is as culpable as if she had heard and disregarded it; 1 U. S. App. 72. Where a collision results through the failure of one of two colliding steamers to conform to her own signals, she is responsible for the collision; 35 U. S. App. 161. See COLLISION; VESSEL; NAVIGATION, RULES OF.

SIGNATORY. A term used in diplomacy to indicate a nation which is a party to a treaty.

SIGNATURE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a sort of rescript, without seal, containing the supplication, the signature of the pope or his delegate, and the grant of a pardon. Dict. Dr. Can.

In Practice. By signature is understood the act of putting down a man's name at the end of an instrument, to attest its validity. The name thus written is also called a signature.

A person's name as set down by himself. 2 N. Dak. 30.

It is not necessary that a party should write his name himself, to constitute a signature: his mark is now held sufficient, though he was able to write; 8 Ad. & E. 94; 7 L. R. Pr. 590; 3 Nev. & P. 228; 3 Curt. C. C. 752; 5 Johns. 144; see 96 Cal. 598; 138 N. C. 134; and the signature to a note may be by initials only; 14 L. T. 433; 1 Ames, B. & N. 145. A signature by pencil is valid; 5 B. & C. 234; or on a telegraph message given to an operator; L. R. 5 C. P. 295. The printed name of the vendor on the heading of a bill of parcels sent by him to the vendee is a sufficient signature to bind the vendor under the statute of frauds. A signature made by a party, another person guiding his hand with his consent, is sufficient; 4 Wash. C. C. 262, 269.

It is not necessary in the execution of a note, that the person executing it, if unable to write, touch the pen while the person authorized signs his name; 9 Md. App. 624; and the signature of the grantor affixed to a deed by another in the presence and at the request of the grantor is as binding as if he had personally affixed his signature; 98 Ala. 479. A person who is sui juris, will not, in the absence of a fraud, be permitted to avoid his written obligation by showing that he did not read it or hear it read; 16 Mo. App. 527. And where a promissory note was signed under the impression that it was one of some unimportant papers, the signature was held valid in the hands of an innocent third party; 43 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 699.

One who cannot read a contract which he is about to execute is bound to procure it to be read and explained to him before he signs it, and is chargeable with knowledge of its contents whether he does so or not; 83 Fed. Rep. 437.

The signature is usually made at the bottom of the instrument; but in wills it has been held that when a testator commenced his will with these words, "I, A B, make this my will," it was a sufficient signing; 3 Lev. 1. And see Sudg. Vend. 71; 2 Stark. Ev. 605, 613. But this decision is said to be absurd; 1 Brown, Civ. Law 278, n. 16; Schoul. Wills 315. The initials "A. B." are not the signature of the judge, or a sufficient authentication of the bill of exceptions, or sufficient evidence of its allowance by the judge; 125 U. S. 240. The possession of a rubber stamp of his signature by a depositor in a bank, kept without negligence, but without notice to the bank, does not relieve the latter for having paid out money on a forged check, made from the stamp. Here an employe used the stamp to obtain a tracing of the depositor's signature; 186 Pa. 458. See Merlin, Répert. Signature, for a history of the origin of the signature; and, also, 4 Cruise, Dig. 32, c. 2, s. 73 et seq. See, generally, 8 Toullier, n. 94; 1 Dall. 64; 5 Whart. 386; 2 B. & P. 238; 2 Maule & S. 286; MONOGRAM; MARK.

SIGNET. A seal commonly used for the sign manual of the sovereign. Whart. Lex. The signet is also used for the purpose of civil justice in Scotland; Bell. See WRITERS TO THE SIGNET.

SIGNIFICATION (Lat. signum, a sign, facere, to make). In French Law. The notice given of a decree, sentence, or other judicial act.

SIGNIFICAVIT (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. When this word is used alone, it means the bishop's certificate to the court of chancery in order to obtain the writ of excommunication; but where the words writ of significavit are used, the meaning is the same as writ de excommuni- cato capiendo. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 248; Shelf. Marr. & D. 502. Obsolete.

SIGNING JUDGMENT. In English Practice. The plaintiff or defendant, when the cause has reached such a stage that he is entitled to a judgment, obtains the signature or allowance of the proper officer; and this is called signing judgment, and is instead of the delivery of judgment in open court. Steph. Pl., And. ed. 196. It is the leave of the master of the office to enter up judgment, and may be had in vacation. 3 B. & C. 317; Tidd, Pr. 616.

In American Practice, it is an actual signing of the judgment on the record, by the judge or other officer duly authorized. Graham, Pr. 341.

SILENCE. The state of a person who does not speak, or of one who refrains from speaking.

Pure and simple silence cannot be considered as a consent to a contract, except in cases where the silent person is bound in good faith to explain himself; in which case silence gives consent; 14 S. & R. 393; L. R. 6 Q. B. 597; 102 Mass. 135; 6 Pa. 396. But no assent will be inferred from a man's silence unless he knows his rights and knows what he is doing, nor unless his silence is voluntary.

When any person is accused of a crime or charged with any fact, and he does not deny it, in general, the presumption is very strong that the charge is correct; 5 C. & P. 332; 7 id. 832; Joy, Conf. p. 77.

The rule does not extend to the silence of the prisoner when, on his examination before a magistrate, he is charged by another prisoner with having joined with him in the commission of an offence; 3 Stark. 33; Steph. Ev. art. 7.

When an oath is administered to a witness, instead of expressly promising to keep it, he gives his assent by his silence and kissing the book.

The person to be affected by the silence must be one not disqualified to act, as, non compos, an infant, or the like; for even the express promise of such a person would not bind him to the performance of any contract.

SILENTIARIUS. One of the privy council; an usher who saw that good rule and silence were kept in the court.

SILK. Under a statute referring to silk in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, any fabric which contains silk will not necessarily be included, but silk watchguards and silk dresses; 28 L. J. C. P. 265; silk hose: id.; and elastic webbing composed of one-third silk; 33 L. J. Ex. 187, will be so considered.

SILK GOWN. Used especially of the gowns worn by queen's counsel; hence, "to take silk" means to attain the rank of queen's counsel. Moz. & W.

SILVA CÆDUA (Lat.). By these words, in England, is understood every sort of wood, except gross wood of the age of twenty years. Bac. Abr. Tythes (C).

SILVER. The legislation on the subject of silver coinage is stated up to that date in a note to R. S. 1 Supp. 774, which with the addition of legislation subsequent to that date is as follows: Laws on silver coinage are as follows: By R. S. §§ 3513, 3516, the silver coins of the United States are limited to a trade dollar, a half dollar, a quarter dollar, and a dime. By § 3526 silver bullion is to be purchased with the bullion fund. By § 3586 the silver coins of the United States are legal tender in amounts not exceeding $5. By act of 1875, Jan. 14, ch. 15, fractional silver is to be issued in redemption of fractional currency. By act of 1876, April 17, ch. 63, this is repeated with some amendments. By Res. No. 17, of 1876, July 22, the silver coin in the treasury is to be issued in exchange for legal tender notes. The issue of fractional silver to fifty million dollars is authorized. By act of 1878, Feb. 28, ch. 20, the coinage of the standard silver dollar and the issuance of silver certificates of $10 or over is authorized. By act of 1879, June 9, ch. 12, fractional silver and lawful money of the United States may be reciprocally exchanged at the treasury or any sub-treasury in sums of $20, and fractional silver is made legal tender up to $10. By act of 1882, August 7, ch. 433, par. 5, free transportation of silver coins is authorized. By act of 1887, March 3, ch. 362, the issuance of silver certificates of one, two, and five dollars is authorized in lieu of higher denominations.

By act of July 14, 1890, the purchasing clause of the act of 1878 was repealed and the secretary of the treasury was authorized to purchase not to exceed 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month and to issue in payment therefor treasury notes. By act of 1890, Sept. 26, ch. 944, changes in the design of coins are authorized. The trade dollar was declared not a legal tender by Res. No. 17, of 1876, July 22, and by act of 1887, March 3, ch. 396, § 2 (24 Stat. L. 643), its coinage was terminated and its redemption and recoinage into standard dollars was directed. By act of 1893, Nov. 1, repeal of the purchasing clause of the act of July 14, 1890.

SIMILAR. Denotes partial resemblance, and also sameness in all essential particulars; 127 Mass. 454. Similar offence may mean an offence identical in kind. Id.

SIMILAR DESCRIPTION. Such words as used in a tariff act import that the goods are similar in product and adopted to similar uses; not necessarily that they have been produced by similar methods of manufacture; 1 Hask. 586.

SIMILITER (Lat. likewise). In Pleading. The plaintiff's reply, that, as the defendant has put himself upon the country, he, the plaintiff, does the like. It occurs only when the plea has the conclusion to the country, and its effect is to join the plaintiff in the issue thus tendered by the defendant; Co. Litt. 126 a. The word similiter was the effective word when the proceedings were in Latin; 1 Chitty, Pl. 519; Archb. Civ. Pl. 250. See Steph. Pl. 255; 2 Saund. 319 b; Cowp. 407; 1 Stra. 551; 11 S. & R. 32.

SIMONY. In Ecclesiastical Law. The selling and buying of holy orders or an ecclesiastical benefice. Bacon, Abr. Simony. By simony is also understood an unlawful agreement to receive a temporal reward for something holy or spiritual. Code 1. 3. 31; Ayliffe, Parerg. 496.

SIMPLE AVERAGE. Particular average. See AVERAGE.

SIMPLE CONTRACT. A contract the evidence of which is merely oral or in writing, not under seal nor of record. 1 Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 6. See 11 Mass. 30; 4 B. & Ald. 588; 2 Bla. Com. 472. See CONTRACT; PAROL.

Under the act of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, in the administration of the estate of a decedent, after Jan. 1, 1870, his simple contract debts are placed on an equal footing with those secured by specialty. But this does not prejudice any lien or other security, which any creditor may hold.

SIMPLE LARCENY. The felonious taking and carrying away the personal goods of another, unattended by acts of violence: it is distinguished from compound larceny, which is stealing from the person or with violence. LARCENY.

SIMPLE OBLIGATION. An unconditional obligation; one which is to be performed without depending upon any event provided by the parties to it.

SIMPLE TRUST. A simple trust corresponds with the ancient use, and is where property is simply vested in one person for the use of another, and the nature of the trust, not being qualified by the settler, is left to the construction of law. It differs from a special trust. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1896.

SIMPLE WARRANDICE. See WARRANDICE.

SIMPLEX (Lat.). Simple or single; as, charta simplex is a deed-poll or single deed. Jacob, Law Dict.

SIMPLEX JUSTICIARIUS. A style formerly used for any puisne judge who was not chief in any court.

SIMPLEX OBLIGATIO. A single unconditional bond.

SIMPLICITER (Lat.). Simply; without ceremony; in a summary manner.

SIMUL CUM (Lat. together with). In Pleading. Words used in indictments and declarations of trespass against several persons, when some of them are known and others are unknown.

In cases of riots, it is usual to charge that A B, together with others unknown, did the act complained of; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 488; 2 Salk. 598.

When a party sued with another pleads separately, the plea is generally entitled in the name of the person pleading, adding, "sued with ——," naming the other party. When this occurred, it was, in the old phraseology, called pleading with a simul cum.

SIMULATIO LATENS. A species of feigned disease in which disease is actually present, but where the symptoms are falsely aggravated. Beck, Med. Jur. 3.

SIMULATION (Lat. simul, together). In French Law. The concert or agreement of two or more persons to give to one thing the appearance of another, for the purpose of fraud. Merlin. Répert.

SINCE. The proper signification is after, and in its apparent sense includes the whole period between the event and the present time; 79 Me. 195; since the day named, does not necessarily include that day; 41 N. H. 201.

SINE DIE (Lat.). Without day. A judgment for a defendant in many cases is quod eat sine die, that he may go without day. While the cause is pending and undetermined, it may be continued from term to term by dies datus. See CONTINUANCE; Co. Litt. 362 b. When the court or other body rise at the end of a session or term, they adjourn sine die.

SINE HOC. A phrase formerly used in pleading as equivalent to absque hoc (q. v.).

SINE PROLE. Without issue. Used in genealogical tables, and often abbreviated into "s. p."

SINECURE. In Ecclesiastical Law. A term used to signify that an ecclesiastical officer is without a charge or cure.

In common parlance, it means the receipt of a salary for an office when there are no duties to be performed.

SINGLE BILL. One without any condition, which does not depend upon any future event to give it validity.

SINGLE BOND. A deed whereby the obligor obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators to pay a certain sum of money to the obligee at the day named.

SINGLE COMBAT. See WAGER OF BATTEL.

SINGLE ESCHEAT. The reversion of a person's movables to the crown because of his being declared a rebel.

SINGLE WOMAN. The words include a widow; 12 L. J. W. C. 74; and a married woman living apart from her husband; 12 Q. B. D. 681.

SINGULAR. In grammar, the singular is used to express only one; not plural. Johnson.

In law, the singular frequently includes the plural. A bequest to "my nearest relation," for example, will be considered as a bequest to all the relations in the same degree who are nearest to the testator; 1 Ves. Sen. 357; 1 Bro. C. C. 296. A bequest made to "my heir," by a person who had three heirs, will be construed in the plural; 4 Russ. Cr. Cas. 384.

Under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, words in acts of parliament importing the singular shall include the plural, and vice versa, unless the contrary is expressly provided; Whart. Lex.

SINGULAR SUCCESSOR. A phrase in Scotch law, applied to the purchase of a specific chattel or specific land, as e. g. an executor or administrator, in contradistinction to the heir. Bell.

SINKING FUND. A fund arising from particular taxes, imposts, or duties, which is appropriated towards the payment of the interest due on a public loan and for the gradual payment of the principal. This definition was quoted and approved in 9 Neb. 453. A fund created for extinguishing or paying a funded debt. 14 N. Y. 379, cited in 30 Fed. Rep. 89. Formerly corporation mortgages usually contained a provision for a sinking fund. They are now less common.

The constitution of Pennsylvania provides that every city shall create a sinking fund which shall be inviolably pledged for the payment of the public debt. Under this provision commissioners of the sinking fund may apply the money in the sinking fund to the purchase of the funded debt of the city, and the debt to that extent is thereby paid, and it is immaterial in determining the actual debt that the commissioners of the sinking fund have no authority immediately upon purchase to cancel or destroy the obligation of the city which they have bought. Securities other than those of the city held by the sinking fund are merely an asset of the city and do not operate to the reduction of the funded debt. If payments are not made into the sinking fund as required by law the commissioner must see to it that they are made, even to the institution of legal proceedings against the city to compel payment; 162 Pa. 123. See FUNDING SYSTEM.

SIST ON A SUSPENSION. A Scotch phrase equivalent to "stay of proceedings." Bell.

SISTER. A woman who has the same father and mother with another, or has one of them only. In the first case, she is called sister, simply; in the second, half-sister. Approved in 61 How. Pr. 48.

SITIO. A measure used in Mexican land grants, equivalent to 4338.464 acres. A sitio de ganado menor or sheep ranch is equivalent to 1928.183 acres. 161 U. S. 219.

SITTINGS IN BANK, or BANC. The sittings which the respective superior courts of common law hold during every term for the purpose of hearing and determining the various matters of law argued before them.

They are so called in contradistinction to the sittings at nisi prius, which are held for the purpose of trying issues of fact.

In America, the practice is essentially the same, all the judges, or a majority of them usually, sitting in banc, and but one holding the court for jury trials; and the term has the same application here as in England. See LONDON AND MIDDLESEX SITTINGS.

SITTINGS IN CAMERA. See CHAMBERS.

SITUS (Lat.). Situation; location. 5 Pet. 524.

Real estate has always a fixed situs, while personal estate has no such fixed situs: the law rei sitæ regulates real but not personal estate; Story, Confl. Laws, 8th ed. §§ 363–365. See PROPERTY; LEX LOCI; TAX; Waples, Debtor and Creditor, where the subject of the location of property is treated.

SIX ACTS. The acts passed in 1819 for the pacification of England.

SIX ARTICLES, LAWS OF. A celebrated act entitled "An act for abolishing diversity of opinion," 31 Hen. VIII. c. 14; enforcing conformity to six of the strongest points in the Roman Catholic religion, under the severest penalties; repealed by 1 Eliz. c. 1; 4 Reeve, Eng. L. 378.

SIX CLERKS IN CHANCERY. Officers who received and filed all proceedings, signed office copies, attended court to read the pleadings, etc. Abolished by 5 Vict. c. 5. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 443*; Spence, Eq. Jur.

SIX MONTHS' RULE. See MORTGAGE; RECEIVER.

SKELETON BILL. In Commercial Law. A blank paper, properly stamped, in those countries where stamps are required, with the name of the person signed at the bottom.

In such case the person signing the paper will be held as the drawer or acceptor, as it may be, of any bill which shall afterwards be written above his name, to the sum of which the stamp is applicable: 1 Bell, Com. 390.

SKILL. The art of doing a thing as it ought to be done.

Every person who purports to have skill in a business, and undertakes for hire to perform it, is bound to do it with ordinary skill, and is responsible civilly in damages for the want of it; 11 M. & W. 483; and sometimes he is responsible criminally. See PHYSICIAN; 2 Russ. Cr. 288.

The degree of skill and diligence required rises in proportion to the value of the article and the delicacy of the operation: more skill is required, for example, to repair a very delicate mathematical instrument, than upon a common instrument; Jones, Bailm. 91; 2 Kent 458, 463; Ayliffe, Pand.

466; 1 Rolle Abr. 10; Story, Bailm. § 431; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 144.

SLANDER. In Torts. Words falsely spoken, which are injurious to the reputation of another.

False, defamatory words spoken of another. See Odger, Libel & S. *7.

There is a distinction, probably the result of some historical accident, between slander and libel; in libel any defamatory matter is prima facie libellous while the same matter when spoken would require proof of special damage, excepting in the classes of cases mentioned infra, which are actionable per se.

Verbal slander. Actionable words are of two descriptions: first, those actionable in themselves, without proof of special damages; and, secondly, those actionable only in respect of some actual consequential damages.

Words of the first description must impute.

First, the guilt of some offence for which the party, if guilty, might be indicted and punished by the criminal courts; as, to call a person a "traitor," "thief," "highwayman," or to say that he is guilty of "perjury," "forgery," "murder," and the like. And although the imputation of guilt be general, without stating the particulars of the pretended crime, it is actionable; Cro. Jac. 114, 142; 6 Term 694; 5 B. & P. 335; 56 Ark. 100; 43 La. Ann. 967; 82 Va. 239; it is enough if the offence charged be a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; Bigel. Torts 44. If the charge is that the plaintiff has already suffered the punishment, the words, if false, are actionable; ibid.; see 5 Pa. 272; 50 Ohio St. 71.

Second, that the party has a disease or distemper which renders him unfit for society; Bac. Abr. Slander (B. 2). An action can, therefore, be sustained for calling a man a leper; Cro. Jac. 144. Imputations of having at the present time a venereal disease are actionable in themselves; 8 C. B. N. S. 9; 7 Gray 181; 22 Barb. 396; 2 Ind. 82; 2 Ga. 57. But charging another with having had a contagious disease is not actionable, as he will not on that account be excluded from society; 2 Term 473, 474; 2 Stra. 1189.

Third, unfitness in an officer, who holds an office to which profit or emolument is attached, either in respect of morals or inability to discharge the duties of the office; in such a case an action lies; 4 Co. 16 a; 5 id. 125; 1 Stra. 617; 2 Ld. Raym. 1369; Bull. N. P. 4. The holder of an office, not being an office of profit, cannot, in the absence of special damage, maintain an action of slander for words imputing to him misconduct and consequent unfitness for the office, unless the imputation relates to his conduct in the office, or unless, if true, it would lead to his removal therefrom; [1892] 1 Q. B. 797; or where the office is not one of profit, and whether there is a power of removal from the office for such misconduct or not; [1895] 1 Q. B. 571.

Fourth, the want of integrity or capacity, whether mental or pecuniary, in the conduct of a profession, trade, or business, in which the party is engaged, is actionable; as, to accuse an attorney or artist of inability, inattention, or want of integrity; 3 Wils. 187; 2 W. Bla. 750; or a clergyman of being a drunkard; 1 Binn. 178, is actionable. Words spoken of a butcher, charging him with slaughtering diseased cattle for sale for human food are actionable per se; 70 Md. 328.

Fifth. Bigelow (Torts 48) gives as a fifth class words tending to defeat an expected title: as to call an heir apparent to estates a bastard. See Cro. Car. 469.

Of the second class are words which are actionable only in respect of special damages sustained by the party slandered. Though the law will not permit in these cases the inference of damage, yet when the damage has actually been sustained the party aggrieved may support an action for the publication of an untruth; 1 Lev. 53; unless the assertion be made for the assertion of a supposed claim; Com. Dig. Action upon the Case for Defamation (D 30); Bac. Abr. Slander (B); but it lies if maliciously spoken. In this case special damage is the gist of the action, and must be particularly specified in the declaration. For it is an established rule that no evidence shall be received of any loss or injury which the plaintiff had sustained by the speaking of the words unless it be specially stated in the declaration. And this rule applies equally where the special damage is the gist of the action and where the words are in themselves actionable; Heard, Libel & S. § 51.

The charge must be false; 5 Co. 125. The falsity of the accusation is to be implied till the contrary is shown; 2 East 436; 1 Saund. 242. The instance of a master making an unfavorable representation of his servant, upon an application for his character, seems to be an exception, in that case there being a presumption, from the occasion of speaking, that the words were true; 3 B. & P. 587.

The slander must, of course, be published,—that is, must be communicated to a third person,—and in a language which he understands; otherwise the plaintiff's reputation is not impaired; 1 Rolle, Abr. 74; Cro. Eliz. 857; 1 Saund. 242, n. 3; Bac. Abr. Slander (D 3). There is no publication if the words were not understood by the persons present, nor repeated by them; 48 Ill. App. 435. The slander must be published respecting the plaintiff.

It is not enough to say that by some person or other the words used might be understood in a defamatory sense; [1897] A. C. 68. "Because some persons may choose, not by reason of the language itself, but by reason of some fact to which it refers, to draw an unfavorable inference, it does not follow that such matter is libellous: 5 C. P. D. 541.

It will afford no justification that the defamatory matter has been previously published by a third person, that the defendant at the time of his publication disclosed the name of that third person and believed all the statements to be true; Heard, Libel & S. § 148. And a repetition of oral slander already in circulation, without expressing any disbelief of it or any purpose of inquiring as to its truth, though without any design to extend its circulation or credit, or to cause the person to whom it is addressed to believe or suspect it to be true, is actionable; 5 Gray 3. It is no defence in an action of slander that the words were used to and not of plaintiff, when others were present and heard the words spoken; 89 Ga. 829.

To render the words actionable, they must be uttered without legal occasion. On some occasions it is justifiable to utter slander of another; in others it is excusable, provided it be uttered without express malice; Bac. Abr. Slander (D, 4); Rolle, Abr. 87; 1 Viner, Abr. 540. It is justifiable for an attorney to use scandalous expressions in support of his client's cause and pertiment thereto; 1 Maule & S. 280; 1 Holt 531; 1 B. & Ald. 232. See 2 S. & R. 469; 11 Vt. 596. The bona fide statements of one church member, on the trial of another before a church tribunal, that such other had committed adultery with plaintiff, not a member of the church, are privileged communications; 88 Ga. 620. Members of congress and other legislative assemblies cannot be called to account for anything said in debate. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

Malice is essential to the support of an action for slanderous words. Odgers, Lib. & Sl. 271. But malice is, in general, to be presumed until the country be proved; 4 B. & C. 247; 1 Saund. 242, n. 2; 1 East 563; 5 B. & P. 385; Bull. N. P. 8; see 55 Fed. Rep. 240; except in those cases where the occasion prima facie excuses the publication; 4 B. & C. 247. See 14 S. & R. 359; 48 Ill. App. 294. Repetition of the slander after suit begun may be shown to prove malice and aggravate damages; 48 Ill. App. 413. Defendant is not required, in an action for slander in charging plaintiff with theft, to prove the truth of the charge beyond a reasonable doubt, but a preponderance of evidence is sufficient; 67 Hun 543. An admission by defendant at plaintiff's request and in the presence of a third party that on a previous occasion he had used the alleged slanderous words, is no ground of action when it does not appear that the language was originally used in the presence of a third party; 86 Fed. Rep. 96.

The word "malicious" in defining the intent with which a slander is spoken, is not to be considered in the sense of spite or hatred against a person, but as meaning that the party is actuated by improper and indirect motives other than interest of the public; 70 Md. 328; 57 Conn. 78. See MALICE.

See as to slander of a physican, 28 Am. L. Reg. 465. As to the admissibility of evidence of the defendant's pecuniary means, see 23 Alb. L. J. 44.

See, generally, Comyns, Dig.; Bacon, Abr.; 1 Viner, Abr. 187; Starkie, Slander; Heard, Libel & Slander; Odger, Slander; Bigelow, L. C. Torts; 1 Marvel, Del. 408; JUSTIFICATION; PUBLICATION; LIBEL.

SLANDER OF TITLE. A statement tending to cut down the extent of one's title.

"An action on the case for special damage sustained by reason of the speaking or publication of the slander of the plaintiff's title." 3 Bing. N. C. 371.

Malice, that is absence of good faith, is an essential condition of liability; 19 Ch. Div. 386; or actual malice, as well as special damage; Poll. Torts 294.

The action formerly applied only to real property; but now extends to chattels and to property rights, such as those under patents. See LIBEL, where the subject is discussed.

An assertion of title made by way of self-defence or as a warning to others, is not actionable, though the claim be mistaken, if made in good faith; Poll. Torts 295; L. R. 4 Q. B. 730.

An action for slander of title is not properly an action for words spoken, but an action on the case for special damage sustained by reason of the speaking or publication of the slander of the plaintiff's title. The property may be either real or personal, and the plaintiff's interest therein may be anything that has a market value. It makes no difference whether the defendant's words be spoken, written, or printed, save as affecting the damages, which should be larger when the publication is more permanent or extensive, as by advertisement. The action is ranged under that division of actions in the digests and other writers on the text law, and is so held by the courts of the present day. The slander may be of such a nature as to fall within the scope of ordinary slander. It is essential, to give a cause of action, that the statement should be false. It is essential, also, that it should be malicious,—not malicious in the worst sense, but with intent to injure the plaintiff. If the statement be true, if there really be the infirmity in the title that is suggested, no action will lie however malicious the defendant's intention might be; Heard, Libel & S. §§ 10, 59; Poll. Torts 389. See 90 Cal. 532.

Where a person claims a right in himself which he intends to enforce against a purchaser, he is entitled, and in common fairness bound, to give the intended purchaser warning of his intention; and no action will lie for giving such preliminary warning, unless it can be shown either that the threat was made mala fide, only with intent to injure the vendor, and without any purpose to follow it up by an action against the purchaser, or that the circumstances were such as to make the bringing an action altogether wrongful; L. R. 4 Q. B. 730; 14 Cent. L. J. 187; Odger, Libel & S. 138. The denial of a complaining party's title made bona fide in assertion of the title (real or honestly believed to exist) of the party making such denial, will not sustain an action for slander of title; 101 N. C. 273.

SLANDERER. A calumniator who maliciously and without reason imputes a crime or fault to another of which he is innocent. See SLANDER.

SLAVE. One over whose life, liberty, and property another has unlimited control.

Every limitation placed by law upon the absolute control modifies and to that extent changes the condition of the slave. In every slaveholding state of the United States the life and limbs of a slave were protected from violence inflicted by the master of third persons.

Among the Romans the slave was classed among things (res). He was homo sed non persona. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. l. 1, § 75. He was considered pro nullo et mortuo, quia nec statu familiæ nec civitatis nec libertatis gaudet. Id. § 77. See, also, 4 Dev. 340; 9 Ga. 582. In the United States, as a person, he was capable of committing crimes, of receiving his freedom, of being the subject of homicide, and of modifying by his volition very materially the rules applicable to other species of property. His existence as a person being recognized by the law, that existence was protected by the law; 1 Hawks 217; 1 Ala. 8; 1 Miss. 83; 5 Rand. 678; 1 Yerg. 156.

In the slaveholding states the relations of husband and wife and parent and child were recognized by statutes in relation to public sales, and by the courts in all cases where such relations were material to elucidate the motives of their acts.

A slave had no political rights. His civil rights, though necessarily more restricted than the freemen's, were based upon the law of the land. He had none but such as were by that law and the law of nature given to him. The civil-law rule, "partus sequitur ventrem," was adopted in all the slaveholding states, the status of the mother at the time of birth deciding the status of the issue; 2 Rand. 246; 1 Hayw. 234; 1 Cooke 381; 2 Dana 432; 2 Mo. 71; 14 S. & R. 446; 3 H. & M'H. 139; 20 Johns. 1; 12 Wheat. 508; 2 How. 265, 496.

The slave could not acquire property: his acquisitions belonged to his master; 5 Cow. 397; 1 Bail. 633; 2 Hill, Ch. 397; 6 Humphr. 299; 2 Ala. 320; 5 B. Monr. 186; 92 U. S. 27. The peculium of the Roman slave was ex gratia, and not of right; Inst. 2. 9. 3. In like manner, negro slaves in the United States were, as a matter of fact, sometimes permitted by their masters ex gratia, to obtain and retain property. The slave could not be a witness, except for and against slaves or free negroes. This was, perhaps, the rule of the common law. None but a freeman was otherwise. In the United States the rule of exclusion which we have mentioned was enforced in all cases where the evidence was offered for or against white persons; 6 Leigh 74. In most of the states this exclusion was by express statutes, while in others it existed by custom and the decision of the courts; 10 Ga. 519. In the slaveholding states, and in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, by statute, the rule was extended to include free persons of color or emancipated slaves; 14 Ohio 199; 3 Harr. & J. 97. The slave could be a suitor in court only for his freedom. For all other wrongs he appeared through his master, for whose benefit the recovery was had; 9 Gill & J. 19; 1 Mo. 608; 4 Yerg. 303; 3 Brev. 11; 4 Gill 249; 9 La. 156; 4 T. B. Monr. 169. The suit for freedom was favored; 1 Hen. & M. 143; 8 Pet. 44; 2 A. K. Marsh. 467. Lapse of time worked no forfeiture by reason of his dependent condition; 8 B. Monr. 631; 1 Hen. & M. 141. The master was bound to maintain, support, and defend his slave, however helpless or impotent. If he failed to do so, public officers were provided to supply his deficiency at his expense.

Cruel treatment was a penal offence of a high grade. Emancipation of the slave was the consequence of conviction in Louisiana; and the sale of the slave to another master was a part of the penalty in Alabama and Texas.

It will be presumed that a person who was a slave before 1865 in this country is a negro; 107 N. C. 609.

The enfranchisement of a slave was called manumission. See BONDAGE; MANUMISSION; SERVUS; FREEDOM. Slavery was abolished in the United States by the thirteenth amendment to the constitution.

SLAVE-TRADE. The traffic in slaves, or the buying and selling of slaves for profit. It is either foreign or domestic.

The history of the slave-trade is as old as the authentic records of the race. Joseph was sold to Ishmaelitish slave-traders, and Egypt has been a mart for the traffic from that day to this. The negro early became a subject of it. In every slave-market he has been found, and never as a master except in Africa. The Roman mart, however, exhibited a variety of all the conquered races of the world. At Bristol, in England, for many years about the eleventh century, a brisk trade was carried on in purchasing Englishmen and exporting them to Ireland for sale. And William of Malmsbury states that it seems to be a natural custom with the people of Northumberland to sell their nearest relations.

The African slave-trade on the eastern coast has been carried on with India and Arabia from a period difficult to be established, and was continued with British India while British ships-of-war hovered on the western coast to capture the pirates engaged in the same trade. On the western coast the trade dates from 1442. The Spaniards for a time monopolized it. The Portuguese soon rivalled them in its prosecution. Sir John Hawkins, in 1562, was the first Englishman who engaged in it; and queen Elizabeth was the first Englishwoman known to share in the profits.

Immense numbers of African negroes were transported to the New World, although thousands were landed in England and France and owned and used as servants. The large profits of the trade stimulated the avarice of bad men to forget all the claims of humanity; and the horrors of the middle passage, though much exaggerated, were undoubtedly very great.

The American Colonies raised the first voice in Christendom for the suppression of the slave-trade, but the interests of British merchants were too powerful with the king, who stifled their complaints. The constitution of the United States, in 1789, was the first governmental act towards its abolition. By it, congress was forbidden to prohibit the trade until the year 1808. This limitation was made at the suggestion of South Carolina and Georgia, aided by some of the New England states. Yet both of those states, by state action, prohibited the trade many years before the time limited,—Georgia as early as 1793. In 1807, an act of congress was passed which prohibited the trade after 1808, and by subsequent acts it was declared piracy. The federal legislation on the subject will be found in acts of congress passed respectively March 22, 1794, May 10, 1800, March 2, 1807, April 20, 1818, March 3, 1819, and May 15, 1820. In the year 1807, the British parliament also passed an act for the abolition of the slave-trade,—the consummation of a parliamentary struggle continued for nineteen years, and fourteen years after a similar act had been adopted by Georgia. Great efforts have been made by Great Britain, by treaties and otherwise, to suppress this trade, one being entered into at Brussels in 1896. As to the present condition of the slave trade throughout the world, see Rep. Int. L. Assn. (1895) 155. See Buxton's Slave-Trade, etc.; Carey's Slave-Trade; Cobb's Historical Sketch of Slavery.

SLAY. When not used in relation to battle the word is synonymous with kill. 32 La. Ann. 351.

SLEEPING-CAR. The servants and employes in charge of sleeping or drawing-room cars are considered in the same light as if they were employed by the railroad company, notwithstanding the existence of a separate agreement between the railroad and the sleeping-car company, whereby the latter furnishes its own servants and conductors, and has exclusive control of the cars used on the former company's road; Beach, Railr. 1007; 19 Alb. L. J. 471; 125 Mass. 54. See 52 Fed. Rep. 262.

Sleeping-car companies are not liable as innkeepers; 73 Ill. 360; 16 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 352; 6 Ohio Dec. 85; 24 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 95; 28 Neb. 239; nor as common carriers; 73 Ill. 360; 143 Mass. 267; 40 La. Ann. 87; 151 N. Y. 163; 8 Penny. 78; 124 N. Y. 53; 69 Tex. 120; 24 Mo. App. 29; 63 Miss. 609; 52 Fed. Rep. 262; 74 id. 499; nor as a carrier providing state-rooms for his passengers; 43 How. Pr. 466.

A sleeping-car company impliedly undertakes to keep a reasonable watch on the passenger and his property; but no more; 28 Am. L. Reg. N. S. (Ky.) 788; whether the passenger is in his berth or in the wash-room; 28 Mo. App. 199; 23 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 186; while he is asleep; 73 Ill. 360; 24 Mo. App. 29; or while occupying his berth; 143 Mass. 267. The company is liable for the watch and money of a passenger stolen while he was asleep, where it appeared that the company's servant disobeyed a regulation which required him to keep a continuous watch during the night; 16 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 824. It is the duty of a sleeping-car company to keep reasonable guard over the persons and property of passengers; 84 Ind. 474; 74 Tex. 654; 143 Mass. 267; it is liable only where there is a lack of ordinary care; 6 Ohio Dec. 85.

It is not liable for a pocket-book, containing money, negligently left by a passenger, if stolen by some one not in the company's employ, unless an agent of the company knew, before the theft, that the property had been so left; 63 Miss. 609. It is not ordinarily liable for property stolen by another passenger; 84 Ind. 474. Where a porter, acting under the rules of the company, takes charge of baggage to aid in removing it from the car, it is within the scope of his employment, and the company is liable for its loss; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ind. App.) 1010.

The company is liable—in any case—only for a reasonable amount of money and personal belongings appropriate to the circumstances of the plaintiff; 51 Fed. Rep. 796; 143 Mass. 267; 28 Mo. App. 199; 72 Ia. 228; 49 N. Y. S. 1111. In the absence of evidence of what is a reasonable amount, it has been held that the verdict must be for nominal damages only; 32 Mo. App. 682.

The duty of a sleeping-car company to protect its passengers from thieves cannot be waived by words printed upon the passenger's ticket or notices posted in the car; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 112. It cannot avoid its liability by posting in the car a notice disclaiming responsibility for personal property left in berths, if such notice is not known to the passenger; 143 Mass. 267.

Though a passenger negligently leave his property exposed, if it is stolen by a servant of the sleeping-car company, the company is liable; 74 Tex. 754; 23 S. W. Rep. Tenn. 70; but it is not liable where a passenger's satchel is carelessly left, during his absence from his seat, within the reach of persons outside; 143 Mass. 243; if a passenger leave a large sum of money under his pillow while he goes to the wash-room, he cannot recover; 37 Mo. App. 600; unless it was left with the porter; 50 id. 474.

Negligence on the part of the sleeping-car company's servants is not to be presumed from the mere fact of the loss, but must be shown; 28 Mo. App. 199; 6 Ohio Dec. 85; 124 N. Y. 53; 72 Ia. 228; 69 Tex. 120. Contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff may defeat his recovery; 143 Mass. 267; 51 Fed. Rep. 796; 63 Miss. 609. The presumption of negligence arising from proof of loss is rebutted by the porter's uncontradicted evidence that he watched the car till after the loss; 3 Colo. App. 340.

The railroad company is liable to a passenger who is injured through the negligence of a servant of a sleeping-car company; 38 Ohio St. 461; 102 U. S. 451; though riding in a different car from the one in which he has purchased a seat; 102 U. S. 451; even though he knew that the sleeping-car was operated by a separate corporation; see 102 U. S. 451; Wood, Ry. 1700; though the question of his knowledge was deemed important in 38 Ohio St. 461.

For an unjustifiable and wanton assault by a porter on a passenger on a railroad train who had not purchased a sleeping-car ticket, it was held that the railway company was liable, but that the sleeping-car company was not; 40 La. Ann. 87, 417. Whether the latter is to be held liable for the violent act of a porter depends upon whether the act came within the scope of his employment; 20 Fed. Rep. 100. The porter was held to be the servant of the railroad company in 120 N. Y. 117 (8 L. R. A. 224); 102 U. S. 451. Where a passenger is ejected from a sleeping-car by train hands, their act is the act of the railroad company, not of the sleeping-car company; 49 Mo. App. 75.

It has been held that where a passenger is wrongfully expelled from a sleeping-car by a servant of the railroad company, the sleeping-car company is not liable, and if expelled by a servant of the latter, the railroad company is not liable; 37 Fed. Rep. 841.

It cannot be said on demurrer that a company is not liable for injury to a passenger caused by the excessively low temperature of a car; 74 Fed. Rep. 499.

A railroad company cannot, by any arrangement with a sleeping-car company, evade the duty of providing proper means for the safe carriage of passengers; 102 U. S. 457; 16 Lea 380; 125 Mass. 54; 108 N. Y. 80.

A passenger travelling on a free pass, by which he waived action for injuries, purchased a seat in a sleeping-car, and while riding in it was injured; it was held that he was still bound by his waiver; 108 N. Y. 80.

A rule of a railroad company requiring a passenger to have a first-class ticket for his transportation before he can be assigned to a berth in a sleeping-car, is a reasonable one and can be legally enforced; 49 Ill. App. 75.

A sleeping-car company is bound to afford equal facilities to all travellers who apply for them in compliance with reasonable regulations; 106 Ill. 222; 45 Fed. Rep. 330; but it has a right to sell a section to one passenger and is not liable to a passenger to whom it has refused to sell one of the berths in such section, though it was not occupied; 45 Fed. Rep. 339. And it is not bound to furnish a berth to one who by the rules of the railroad company is not entitled thereto; 144 Mass. 6; 52 Fed. Rep. 262.

A purchaser of a section may share its use with any proper person whom he invites into it; 45 Fed. Rep. 330; and he may, on leaving the train, transfer the use of his section to another first-class passenger for the rest of the trip; 34 Am. L. Reg. 709 (Super. Ct. of Baltimore).

A passenger is entitled to occupy only the berth he pays for and which his ticket specifies; 14 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 855.

One who has paid for a berth from one point to another is entitled to a continuous passage in it, or in one equally good, and cannot be transferred to another berth or another car at the arbitrary discretion of the company; 65 Ind. 153.

In the contract for the use of the berth there is directly involved an obligation to awaken and notify the passenger in time for him to prepare safely and comfortably to leave the train at his destination; 79 Tex. 468.

See 2 Beach, Railways § 1007; Hutchinson, Carriers, 2d ed. § 617 d; 2 Rorer, Railroads; Bishop, Non-Contract Law § 1162; 21 L. R. A. 289; 9 L. R. A. 173.

SLEDGE. A hurdle used to draw traitors to execution. 1 Hale, P. C. 82.

SLEEPING RENT. A fixed rent, as opposed to one varying with the profits. 2 Harr. & W. 43.

SLIP. In negotiations for a policy of insurance the "slip" is a memorandum between the parties containing the terms of the proposed insurance, and initialled by the underwriters.

SLIPPA. A stirrup. There is a tenure of land in Cambridgeshire by holding the sovereign's stirrup.

SLOUGH. An arm of a river flowing between islands and the main land. 55 Ia. 565.

SMALL DEBTS COURTS. The several county courts established by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, for the purpose of bringing justice home to every man's door.

SMART-MONEY. Vindictive or exemplary damages given beyond the actual damage, by way of punishment and example, in cases of gross misconduct of defendant. 15 Conn. 225; 14 Johns. 352; 10 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 566. That it cannot be given by jury, see 2 Greenl. Ev. § 253, n. See EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

SMELTING. Smelting, though by derivation synonymous with melting, has come to mean a melting of ores in the presence of some re-agent which operates to separate the metallic element by combining with a non-metallic element. 68 Fed. Rep. 354.

SMOKE-SILVER. A modus of sixpence in lieu of tithe-wood. Twisdale, Hist. Vindicat. 77.

SMUGGLING. The fraudulent taking into a country, or out of it, merchandise which is lawfully prohibited.

This definition was quoted and approved by Brewer, J., in 156 U. S. 185.

"Smuggling consists in the bringing on shore, or carrying from the shore, goods and merchandise, for which the duty has not been paid, or of goods of which the importation or exportation is prohibited." 6 Bac. Abr. 258; so, in almost precisely the same words in 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 661; 1 Russ. Cr. 172; Gabb. Cr. L. 848.

In the Anti-Moiety Act, June 22, 1874, it was provided:

"That for the purpose of this act, smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles without passing the same, or the packages containing the same, through the custom-house, or submitting them to the officers of the revenue, for examination." 18 U. S. Statutes at Large, ch. 391, p. 186.

SO. The terms "hence" and "therefore" are sometimes the equivalent of "so," and the latter word is thus understood whenever what follows is an illustration of or conclusion from what has gone before. 33 Ind. 431.

SO HELP YOU GOD. See OATH.

SOC. See SOCAGE.

SOCAGE. A species of tenure, whereby the tenant held his lands of the lord by any certain service in lieu of all other services, so that the service was not a knight's service. Its principal feature was its certainty: as, to hold by fealty and a certain rent, or by fealty-homage and a certain rent, or by homage and fealty without rent, or by fealty and certain corporal service, as ploughing the lord's land for a specified number of days. 2 Bla. Com. 80.

The term socage was afterwards extended to all services which were not of a military character, provided they were fixed: as, by the annual payment of a rose, a pair of gilt spurs, a certain number of capons, or of so many bushels of corn. Of some tenements the service was to be hangman, or executioner of persons condemned in the lord's court; for in olden times such officers were not volunteers, nor to be hired for lucre, and could only be bound thereto by tenure. There were three different species of these socage tenures—one in frank tenure, another in ancient tenure, and the third in base tenure: the second and third kinds are now called, respectively, tenure in ancient demesne, and copyhold tenure. The first is called free and common socage, to distinguish it from the other two; but, as the term socage has long ceased to be applied to the two latter, socage and free and common socage now mean the same thing. Bracton; Co. Litt. 17, 86. See TENURE.

By the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24, the ancient tenures by knight's service were abolished, and all lands, with the exception of copyholds and of ecclesiastical lands, which continued to be held in free alms (frankalmoigne), were turned into free and common socage and the great bulk of real property in England is now held under this ancient tenure. Many grants of land in the United States, made previous to the revolution, by the British Crown, created the same tenure among us, until they were formally abolished by the legislatures of the different states. In 1787, the state of New York converted all feudal tenures within its boundaries into a tenure by free and common socage; but in 1830 it abolished this latter tenure, with all its incidents, and declared that from thenceforth all lands in the state should be held upon a uniform allodial tenure, and vested an absolute property in the owners according to their respective estates. Similar provisions have been adopted by other states; and the ownership of land throughout the United States is now essentially free and unrestricted. See TENURE; SOKA.

SOCER (Lat.). The father of one's wife; a father-in-law.

SOCIAL ENJOYMENT. These words are too comprehensive to state as the object for which a corporation is to be formed, as some social enjoyments are unlawful. 2 D. R. Pa. 702.

SOCIDA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a contract by which one man delivers to another, either for a small recompense or for a part of the profits, certain animals, on condition that if any of them perish they shall be replaced by the bailor or he shall pay their value.

A contract of hiring, with the condition that the bailee takes upon him the risk of the loss of the thing hired. Wolff § 638.

SOCIETAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A contract in good faith made to share in common the profit and loss of a certain business or thing, or of all the possessions of the parties. Calvinus, Lex.; Inst. 3. 26; Dig. 17. 21. See PARTNERSHIP.

SOCIETAS LEONINA (Lat.). In Roman Law. That kind of society or partnership by which the entire profits should belong to some of the partners in exclusion of the rest.

It was so called in allusion to the fable of the lion and other animals, who having entered into partnership for the purpose of hunting, the lion appropriated all the prey to himself; Dig. 17. 2. 29. 2; Poth. Traité de Société, n. 12. See 2 M'Cord 421; 6 Pick. 372.

SOCIETE. In French Law. Partnership.

SOCIETE EN COMMANDITE. In Louisiana. A partnership formed by a contract by which one person or partnership agrees to furnish another person or partnership a certain amount, either in property or money, to be employed by the person or partnership to whom it is furnished, in his or their own name or firm, on condition of receiving a share in the profits, in the proportion determined by the contract, and of being liable to losses and expenses to the amount furnished and no more. La. Civ. Code, art. 2810; Code de Comm. 26, 33; 4 Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 1027; Dalloz, Dict. Société Commerciale, n. 166. See Goirand, Code; COMMENDAM; PARTNERSHIP.

SOCIETY. A society is a number of persons united together by mutual consent, in order to deliberate, determine, and act jointly for some common purpose.

Societies are either incorporated and known to the law, or unincorporated, of which the law does not generally take notice.

By civil society is usually understood a state, a nation, or a body politic. Rutherforth, Inst. c. 1, 2.

SODOMITE. One who has been guilty of sodomy. Formerly such offender was punished with great severity, and was deprived of the power of making a will.

SODOMY. A carnal copulation by human beings with each other against nature, or with a beast. See 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 1191; Whart. Cr. Law 579.

It may be committed between two persons both of whom consent, even between husband and wife; 8 C. & P. 604: and both may be indicted; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 464; 2 C. & K. 869. Penetration of the mouth is not sodomy; Russ. & R. 331; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 551. As to emission, see 12 Co. 36; 1 Va. Cas. 307. See 1 Russ. Cr. 698; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 34; 8 C. & P. 417; 3 Harr. & J. 154; 94 Mich. 27.

A minor 12 years of age cannot consent to an act of sodomy committed on his person; and if he submits to it without resistance the act is still done by force: 61 Conn. 50.

A domestic fowl is an "animal" within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, punishing unnatural offences. 24 Q. B. Div. 357. But see 1 Russ. Cr. 698.

SOIL. The superficies of the earth on which buildings are erected or may be erected.

The soil is the principal, and the building, when erected, is the accessory.

SOIT DROIT FAIT AL PARTIE. In English Law. Let right be done to the party. A phrase written on a petition of right, and subscribed by the king. See PETITION OF RIGHT.

SOIT FAIT COMME IL EST DESIRE. Let it be as it is desired. The royal assent to private acts of parliament.

SOKA, SOC, SOK. Jurisdiction; a power or privilege to administer justice and execute the laws; also a shire, circuit, or territory. Cowel.

In the Domesday Book and the Leges Henrici distinction between "sake and soke" is obliterated. Soke means jurisdiction and "sake and soke" is but a pleonastic phrase, which means no more than soke. Before the Norman times the idea of jurisdiction was expressed by a technical word, the meaning of which was rigorously observed. This is sacu and the word has strangely vanished from our legal vocabulary, but is still preserved even in its technical sense by the German sache; Maitl. Domesd. 259. The same writer says that of the two words soke is by far the commoner, and that sake is rarely found except in connection with soke, and when so found it seems to be merely an equivalent for the latter word. Sake originally signified a matter, a thing; hence, a matter or cause in the lawyers' sense of these terms. A "matter" in dispute between litigants, a "cause" before a court. While soke, socna, soka, is the Anglo-Saxon socn, and has for its primary meaning a seeking. The phrase "holding with sake and soke" seems to be equivalent after the Conquest with "he held freely;" Maitl. Domesd. 80; which see for a learned discussion as to the distinction between the two words.

SOKEMANS, SOCMEN. Freeholders whose holdings might be no larger than those of the villans, but who would generally, instead of the heavy services, pay fixed and not heavy rent; 1 Soc. Eng. 360. Those who held their land in socage 2 Bla. Com. 100.

SOLAR DAY. That period of time which begins at sunrise and ends at sunset; the same as "artificial day." Co Litt. 135 a.

SOLAR MONTH. A calandar month. Co. Litt. 135 b; 1 W. Bla. 450; 1 Maule & S. 111; 1 Bingh. 307.

SOLARES. In Spanish Law. Lots of ground. This term is frequently found in grants from the Spanish government of lands in America. 2 White, Recop. 474.

SOLATIUM. Compensation.

SOLD NOTE. The name of an instrument in writing, given by a broker to a buyer of merchandise, in which it is stated that the goods therein mentioned have been sold to him. 1 Bell, Com. 435; Story, Ag. § 28. Some confusion may be found in the books as to the name of these notes: they are sometimes called bought notes.

SOLDIER. A military man; a private in the army.

Soldiers re-enlisted "for clerical service and messenger duty," under act of congress of July 29, 1886, are still in the service, and under U. S. Rev. St. § 1285, are entitled to the additional pay for certificates of merit. 28 Ct. Cl. 462. See LONGEVITY PAY.

SOLE. Alone, single; used in contradictinction to joint or married. A sole tenant, therefore, is one who holds lands in his own right, without being joined with any other. A feme sole is a single woman; a sole corporation is one composed of only one natural person.

SOLEMNITY. The formality established by law to render a contract, agreement, or other act valid.

As the solemnization of a marriage is the consummation of a valid marriage; 33 L. J. Ch. 139; 49 id. 193; and an oath to be taken solemnly does not merely mean religiously, but with all due solemnities; 14 Q. B. D. 667. See MARRIAGE.

SOLICITATION. Solicitation to commit a crime is usually held to be punishable as a misdemeanor, though the offence solicited may not be committed; 135 Mass. 545; 27 N. J. 112; but it has been held otherwise, as, where a letter was written requesting one to commit murder, which never reached the person to whom it was addressed; 19 W. R. 109. See 29 Mich. 50; 11 Ga. 253. If the offence requires the concurrent action of two or more persons, it is doubtful whether a solicitation of one person by another to commit the offence is in itself criminal; 1 McClain, Cr. Law § 220.

The offence of this character most frequently mentioned in criminal law books is what is termed solicitation of chastity. The asking a person to commit adultery or fornication of itself is not an indictable offence; Salk. 382; 2 Chitty, Pr. 478; 54 Pa. 209; contra, 7 Conn. 267; Bish. N. Cr. L. §§ 767, 768. The distinction is sharply drawn by the Pennsylvania case and the Connecticut case. In the latter, solicitation to commit adultery, which was a statutory felony, was held indictable, in the former where the offence was a misdemeanor, it was not. See also Whart. Cr. L., 9th ed. § 179, and a criticism thereon in 146 Pa. 83. In England, the bare solicitation of chastity is punished in the ecclesiastical courts; 2 Chitty, Pr. 478. See Whart. Cr. Law 1738; 2 Ld. Raym. 809; Bish. Cr. Law § 767.

The civil law punished arbitrarily the person who solicited the chastity of another; Dig 47. 11. 1.

The term solicitation is also used in connection with other offences, as, solicitation to larceny, sodomy, bribery, threatening notice. 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 767. Under the stat. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, § 4, whoever shall solicit any one to murder any other person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Under this act the editor of a German paper in London was indicted and found guilty, for having published an article commending the assassination of the emperor of Russia; 7 Q. B. Div. 244; 1 Bish. Cr. L. 768 a. Solicitation and an offer of money to commit murder, meet the test of a common-law crime (see MISDEMEANOR), constituting an act done, a step in the direction of that crime; 146 Pa. 88. On an indictment for solicitation to commit arson, evidence that the prisoner solicited other parties to burn the same building is admissible; 19 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 360.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT. See PENITENTIARY; PUNISHMENT.

SOLICITOR. A person whose business is to be employed in the care and management of suits depending in courts of chancery.

A solicitor, like an attorney, will be required to act with perfect good faith towards his clients. He must conform to the authority given him. It is said that to institute a suit he must have a special authority, although a general authority will be sufficient to defend one. The want of a written authority may subject him to the expenses incurred in a suit; 3 Mer. 12. See 1 Phil. Ev. 192; 2 Chitty, Pr. 2. In a recent English case it was held that a compromise entered into before the issue of a writ is not binding on the client; 16 L. T. N. S. 332; the English court of appeal has just held that the same rule applies where a solicitor before action accepted a small sum in discharge of his client's claim without the latter's sanction; 55 Alb. L. J. 404. See ATTORNEY AT LAW; COUNSELLOR AT LAW; PROCTOR.

Solicitors have hitherto been regarded as officers of the court of chancery; and it has been the usual course that, as soon as any one has been admitted an attorney, he should apply to be admitted a solicitor, which is done by the Master of the Rolls as a matter of course. Hunt, Eq. Pl. III. c. 6. But now by the Judicature Act of 1873, s. 87, all solicitors, attorneys, and proctors are to be henceforth called solicitors of the supreme court; Moz. & W.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL. The solicitor-general of the United States is appointed by the president to assist the attorney-general in the performance of his duties, and in case of a vacancy in the office of attorney-general, or of his absence or disability, the solicitor-general has the power to exercise all the duties of that office. Except when the attorney-general in particular cases otherwise directs, he and the solicitor-general argue cases in the supreme court, in which the United States is interested. R. S. §§ 347, 359.

In English Law. A law officer of the crown, appointed by patent during the royal pleasure, who assists the attorney-general in managing the law business of the crown. Selden I. 6. 7. He is first in right of preaudience; 3 Sharsw. Bl. Com. 28, n. (a), n. 9; Encyc. Brit.

SOLICITOR OF THE SUPREME COURT. The solicitors before the supreme courts, in Scotland, are a body of solicitors entitled to practise in the court of session, etc. Their charter of incorporation bears date August 10, 1797.

SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY. The title of one of the officers of the United States, created by the act of May 29, 1830; he is appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and is under the supervision of the department of justice. R. S. § 349.

SOLIDO, IN. See IN SOLIDUM.

SOLUTIO (Lat. release). In Civil Law. Payment. By this term is understood every species of discharge or liberation, which is called satisfaction, and with which the creditor is satisfied. Dig. 46. 3. 54; Code 8. 43. 17; Inst. 3. 30. This term has rather a reference to the substance of the obligation than to the numeration or counting of the money. Dig. 50. 16. 176.

SOLUTIO INDEBITI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The case where one has paid a debt, or done an act or remitted a claim because he thought that he was bound in law to do so, when he was not. In such cases of mistake there is an implied obligation (quasi ex contractu) to pay back the money, etc.; Poll. Contr. 439; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 458.

SOLVENCY. The state of a person who is able to pay all his debts: as also such attitude of his property as that it may be reached and subjected by process of law, without his consent, to the payment of such debts. 116 Mo. 226; 32 id. 369; 4 Cush. 127. The opposite of insolvency (q. v.).

SOLVENT. One who has sufficient to pay his debts and all obligations. Dig. 50. 16. 114.

A person is solvent who owns property enough and so situated that all his debts can be collected from it by legal proceedings; 13 Wend. 377; 53 Barb. 547. But other cases hold that to be solvent one must be able to pay all his debts in the ordinary course of trade. See 2 N. B. R. 149; 79 Ia. 432. See INSOLVENCY.

SOLVERE (Lat. to unbind; to untie). To release; to pay; solvere dicimus eum qui fecit quod facere promisit. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 807.

SOLVIT AD DIEM (Lat. he paid at the day). The name of a plea to an action on a bond, or other obligation to pay money, by which the defendant pleads that he paid the money on the day it was due. See 1 Strs. 652; Rep. temp. Hardw. 133; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 W. 29).

This plea ought to conclude with an averment, and not to the country; 1 Sid. 315; 12 Johns. 253. See 2 Phill. Ev. 92; Coxe N. J. 467.

SOLVIT POST DIEM (Lat. he paid after the day). The name of a special plea in bar to an action of debt on a bond, by which the defendant asserts that he paid the money after the day it became due. 1 Chitty, Pl. 480, 555; 2 Phill. Ev. 98.

SOMNAMBULISM (Lat. somnium, sleep; ambulo, to walk). Sleep-walking.

The mental condition in this affection is not very unlike that of dreaming. Many of their phenomena are the same; and the former differs from the latter chiefly in the larger number of the functions involved in the abnormal process. In addition to the mental activity common to both, the somnambulist enjoys the use of his senses in some degree, and the power of locomotion. He is thereby enabled to perform manual operations as well, frequently, as in his waking state. Usually, however, the action of the senses is more or less imperfect, many of the impressions being incorrectly or not at all perceived. The person walks against a wall, or stumbles over an object in his path; he mistakes some projections for a horse, strides across it, and imagines himself to be riding; he hears the faintest sound connected with what he is doing, while the voices of persons near him, and even the blast of a trumpet, are entirely unnoticed. Occasionally the power of the senses is increased to a degree unknown in the waking state. Jane Rider, whose remarkable history was published some thirty years ago, could read the almost obliterated dates of coins in a dark room, and was able to read and write while her eyes were covered with several folds of handkerchief. For the most part, however, the operations of the somnambulist consist in getting up while asleep, groping about in the dark, endeavoring to make his way out of the house through doors or windows, making some inarticulate sounds, perhaps, and all the while unconscious of persons or things around him. The power of the perceptive faculties, as well as that of the senses, is sometimes increased in a wonderful degree. It is related of the girl just mentioned that in the fit she would sing correctly, and play at backgammon with considerable skill, though she had never done either when awake.

The somnambulist always awakes suddenly, and has but a faint conception, if any, of what he has been thinking and doing. If conscious of anything, it is of an unpleasant dream imperfectly remembered. This fact, not being generally known, will often enable us to detect simulated somnambulism. If the person on waking continues the same train of thought and pursues the same plans and purposes which he did while asleep, there can be no doubt that he is feigning the affection. When a real somnambulist, for some criminal purpose, undertakes to simulate a paroxysm, he is not at all likely to imitate one of his own previous paroxysms, for the simple reason that he knows less than others how he appeared while in them. If, therefore, somnambulism is alleged in any given case, with no other proof than the occurrence of former paroxysms unquestionably genuine, it must be viewed with suspicion if the character of the alleged paroxysm differs materially from that of the genuine ones. In one way or another, a case of simulation would generally be detected by means of a close and intelligent scrutiny, so difficult is it to imitate that mixture of consciousness and unconsciousness, of dull and sharp perceptions, which somnambulism presents. The history of the individual may throw some light on the matter. If he has had an opportunity of witnessing the movements of a somnambulist in the course of his life, this fact alone would rouse suspicion, which would be greatly increased if the alleged paroxysm presented many traits like those of the paroxysms previously witnessed.

The legal consequences of somnambulism should be precisely those of insanity, which it so nearly resembles. The party should be exempt from punishment for his criminal acts, and be held amenable in damages for torts and trespasses. Somnambulism, though possibly not technical insanity, will sometimes have the same effect as excusing crime; 78 Ky. 183; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 395; "simply because the person committing it would not know what he was doing;" Stephen, J., in 23 Q. B. D. 168. The only possible exceptions to this principle is to be found in those cases where the somnambulist, by meditating long on a criminal act while awake, is thereby led to commit it in his next paroxysm. Hoffbauer contends that, such being generally the fact, too much indulgence ought not to be shown to the criminal acts of the somnambulist. Die Psychologie, etc., c. 4, art. 2. But surely this is a rather refined and hazardous speculation; and seems like punishing men solely for bad intentions,—because the acts, though ostensibly the ground of punishment, are actually those of a person deprived of his reason. The truth is, however, that criminal acts have been committed in a state of somnambulism by persons of irreproachable character. Tayl. Med. Jur. 744. See Gray, Med. Jur. 265; Whart. & S. Med. Jur. § 492; Rush on the Mind 302; 18 Am. Journ. of Ins. 236. Tirrell's Case, Mass.

SON. An immediate male descendant. In its technical meaning in devises, this is a word of purchase; but the testator may make it a word of descent. Sometimes it is extended to more remote descendants. 2 Des. 123, n.

SON ASSAULT DEMESNE (L. Fr. his own first assault). In Pleading. A form of a plea to justify an assault and battery, by which the defendant asserts that the plaintiff committed an assault upon him and the defendant merely defended himself.

When the plea is supported by evidence, it is a sufficient justification, unless the retaliation by the defendant were excessive and bore no proportion to the necessity or to the provocation received; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 406; 4 Denio 448.

SON-IN-LAW. The husband of one's daughter.

SOON. Within a reasonable time. 14 Kan. 232.

SOREHON, or SORN. An arbitrary exaction, formerly existing in Scotland and Ireland. Whenever a chieftain had a mind to revel he came down among the tenants with his followers, by way of contempt called "Gilliwitfitts," and lived on free quarters. Bell, Dict.

SORS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A lot; chance; fortune. Calvinus, Lex.; Ainsworth, Dict. Sort. Kind. The little scroll on which the thing to be drawn by lot was written. Carpentier, Gloss. A principal or capital sum: e. g. the capital of a partnership. Calvinus, Lex.

In Old English Law. A principal lent on interest, as distinguished from the interest itself. Pryn. Collect. p. 161; Cowel.

SORTITIO. A casting of lots. Sortitio judicum, a drawing of judges, on criminal trials, similar to the modern practice of drawing a jury. 3 Bla. Com. 366.

SOUL SCOT. A mortuary, or customary gift due ministers, in many parishes of England, on the death of parishioners. It was originally voluntary and intended as amends for ecclesiastical dues neglected to be paid in the lifetime. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 425*.

SOUND MIND. That state of a man's mind which is adequate to reason and comes to a judgment upon ordinary subjects like other rational men. 2 Hamilton, Syst. Leg. Med. 28.

The law presumes that every person who has acquired his full age is of sound mind, and, consequently, competent to make contracts and perform all his civil duties; and he who asserts to the contrary must prove the affirmation of his position by explicit evidence, and not by conjectural proof; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 434; 3 Add. Eccl. 86; 8 Watts 66; Ray, Med. Jur. § 92; 3 Curt. Eccl. 671.

SOUND MIND AND MEMORY. This phrase does not mean a mind without a flaw, or a memory without a fault. 16 Daly 540. See WILL.

SOUNDING IN DAMAGES. When an action is brought, not for the recovery of lands, goods, or sums of money (as is the case in real or mixed actions or the personal action of debt or detinue), but for damages only, as in covenant, trespass, etc., the action is said to be sounding in damages. Steph. Pl. 126.

SOUNDNESS. General health; freedom from any permanent disease. 1 Carr. & M. 291. To create unsoundness, it is requisite that the animal should not be useful for the purpose for which he is bought, and that inability to be so useful should arise from disease or accident. 2 Mood. & R. 113, 137; 9 M. & W. 670.

In the sale of animals they are sometimes warranted by the seller to be sound; and it becomes important to ascertain what is soundness. Horses affected by roaring; a temporary lameness, which rendered the horse less fit for service; 4 Camp. 271; but see 2 Esp. Cas. 573; a cough, unless proved to be of a temporary nature; 2 Chitty, Bail. 245, 416; and a nerved horse; Ry. & M. 290; have been held to be unsound. But crib-biting is not a breach of a general warranty of soundness; Holt, Cas. 630; but see 8 Gray 430; 43 Vt. 608. The true test is whether the defect complained of renders the horse less than reasonably fit for present use; 9 M. & W. 668. See Oliph.; Hanover, on Horses; Benj. Sales § 619.

An action on the case is the proper remedy for a verbal warrant of soundness; 1 H. Bla. 17; 9 B. & C. 259; 2 Dowl. & R. 10; 1 Taunt. 566; Bac. Abr. Action on the Case (E).

SOURCES OF THE LAW. The authority from which the laws derive their force. A term used to include all the reliable testimonials of what constitutes the law.

The power of making all laws is in the people or their representatives, and none can have any force whatever which are derived from any other source. But it is not required that the legislator shall expressly pass upon all laws, and give the sanction of his seal, before they can have life or existence. The laws are, therefore, such as have received an express sanction, and such as derive their force and effect from implication.

The express laws are—first, the constitution of the United States: secondly, the treaties made with foreign powers; thirdly, the acts of congress; fourthly, the constitutions of the respective states; fifthly, the laws made by the several state legislatures; sixthly, the laws made by inferior legislative bodies, such as the councils of municipal corporations, and the general rules made by the courts.

The constitutions of the respective states, if not opposed to the provisions of the constitution of the United States, are of binding force in the states respectively; and no act of the state legislature has any force which is made in contravention of the state constitution.

The laws of the several states constitutionally made by the state legislatures have full and complete authority in the respective states.

Laws are frequently made by inferior legislative bodies which are authorized by the legislature: such are the municipal councils of cities or boroughs. Their laws are generally known by the name of ordinances, and when lawfully ordained they are binding on the people. The courts, perhaps by a necessary usurpation, have been in the practice of making general rules and orders, which sometimes affect suitors and parties as much as the most regular laws enacted by congress. These apply to all future cases. There are also rules made in particular cases as they arise: but these are rather decrees or judgments than laws.

The tacit laws, which derive their authority from the consent of the people without any legislative enactment, may be subdivided into,—

The common law, which is derived from two sources, the common law of England, and the practice and decisions of our own courts. In some states it has been enacted that the common law of England shall be the law, except where the same is inconsistent with our constitutions and laws. See LAW.

Customs which have been generally adopted by the people have the force of law.

The principles of Roman law. See CIVIL LAW.

The Canon law, which was adopted by the ecclesiastical courts, figures in our laws respecting marriage, divorces, wills and testaments, executors and administrators, and many other subjects.

The jurisprudence, or decisions of the various courts, have contributed their full share of what makes the law. These decisions are made by following precedents, by borrowing from the sources already mentioned, and sometimes by the less excusable disposition of the judges to legislate on the bench.

The monument where the common law is to be found are the records, reports of cases adjudicated by the courts, and the treatises of learned men. The books of reports are the best proof of what is the common law; but, owing to the difficulty of finding out any systematic arrangement, recourse is had to treatises upon the various branches of the law. The records, owing to their being kept in one particular place and therefore not generally accessible, are seldom used.

See LAW; PRECEDENT; JUDGE-MADE LAW; JUDICIAL POWER; LEGISLATIVE POWER; STARE DECISIS; CONSTITUTIONAL; TREATY; STATUTE; COMMON LAW; CIVIL LAW; PRIZE COURT.

SOUS SEING PRIVE. In Louisiana. An act or contract evidenced by writing under the private signature of the parties to it. The term is used in opposition to the authentic act, which is an agreement entered into in the presence of a notary or other public officer.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA. A colony of Great Britain constituting a part of Australia. See AUSTRALIA.

SOUTH CAROLINA. One of the original thirteen United States.

This state was originally part of the British province of Carolina, then comprehending both North Carolina and South Carolina. That province was granted by Charles II., by charter issued to eight lord proprietors, in 1663, and amended in 1665 so as to extend it between twenty-nine and thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, north latitude, drawn from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. The first permanent settlement in South Carolina was effected in 1670 by emigrants from England who landed at Beaufort, then Port Royal, in the same year and removed to the point on the river Ashley nearly opposite the present site of Charleston; but, abandoning this position, they again removed, in 1680, to Oyster Point, at the confluence of the Ashley and Cooper, where they founded Charleston.

In 1719, the colonial legislature disowned the proprietary government and threw the colony into the hands of the king, who, accordingly, assumed the control of it, but not until 1729 was the charter surrendered. In that year the shares of seven out of the eight lords proprietors were ceded. The eighth share, which belonged to the family of Lord Granville, formerly Cartaret, was retained, and laid off in North Carolina,—which was about the same time finally divided from South Carolina.

In 1732, that part of South Carolina lying west of the river Savannah was granted by the crown to the Georgia Company, under Oglethorpe. Thus South Carolina was reduced in extent, and, in consequence of subsequent arrangements, made with Georgia in 1787 in the treaty of Beaufort, and with North Carolina in the early part of the present century, the present boundaries were established.

On March 26, 1776, the first constitution was adopted,—the earliest it is believed, of the American constitutions. This constitution was replaced in 1778 by another, and that in 1790 by yet another. Some amendments were made in 1808, 1810, 1816, 1828, and 1834. In 1865 a new constitution was adopted. This in its time was succeeded by that of 1868, which was amended in 1873 and 1876. The present constitution of the state was adopted Dec. 4, 1895.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The legislative power consists of a senate and a house of representatives, and both together are called the general assembly of the state of South Carolina.

The Senate is composed of one member from each county as established for the election of the house of representatives. The members are elected for four years, one half going out of office each second year. The election takes place on the first Tuesday following the first Monday in November.

The House of Representatives consists of one hundred and twenty-four members, apportioned among the counties according to their population, elected for two years, at the same time that the election of senators is held.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The supreme executive authority is the governor. No person is eligible to the office of governor who denies the existence of the Supreme Being or who has not attained the age of thirty years and has not been a citizen of the United States, and a citizen and resident of this state five years preceding his election.

He is elected, by the electors qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives, for two years and until his successor is chosen and qualified. He has the usual executive powers and may grant reprieves and pardons after conviction, except in cases of impeachment, and remit fines and forfeitures unless otherwise directed by law.

A Lieutenant-Governor is to be chosen at the same time, in the same manner, continue in office for the same period, and be possessed of the same qualifications, as the governor, and shall be ex-officio president of the senate. The succession after the lieutenant-governor is to the president of the senate, or in case of his disability the speaker of the house.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The judicial power is vested in a supreme court, two circuit courts (common pleas and general sessions). The legislature may establish county courts, municipal courts, and such inferior courts as may be deemed necessary.

The Supreme Court consists of a chief justice and three associate justices. They are elected by the legislature for the term of eight years.

It has appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and otherwise is a court for the correction of errors at law. It has power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus, certiorari, prohibition, and other original and remedial writs.

The state is required to be divided into judicial districts as the general assembly may prescribe and for which a circuit judge is elected by the general assembly for a term of four years. He must be an elector of a county of, and during his continuance in office must reside in, the circuit. These judges hold two circuit courts, to wit: A court of common pleas and a court of general sessions.

The courts of common pleas have original jurisdiction, subject to appeal to the supreme court, to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, habeas corpus, and such other writs as may be necessary to carry their powers into full effect. They have jurisdiction in all civil cases. They have appellate jurisdiction in all cases within the jurisdiction of inferior courts, except those in which an appeal may be provided by law directly to the supreme court.

The court of general sessions has jurisdiction in all criminal cases except those in which exclusive jurisdiction shall be given to inferior courts, and in these it has appellate jurisdiction. It has concurrent jurisdiction with, as well as appellate jurisdiction from, the inferior courts in all cases of riot, assault and battery, and larceny. It sits in each county twice each year at such times and places as the general assembly may direct.

They have such powers as the legislature may grant.

The Probate Court in the county of Charleston has jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration; in business appertaining to minors and the allotment of dower, in cases of idiocy and lunacy, and of persons non compotes.

In all the other counties this jurisdiction is vested under the constitution as the general assembly may provide, and until such provision in the then existing courts of probate.

SOUTH DAKOTA. One of the states of the United States.

It was admitted to the Union under the act of Feb. 22, 1889, which included also North Dakota, Montana, and Washington, which together constituted the territories of Dakota, Montana, and Washington. See NORTH DAKOTA.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is vested in a legislature consisting of a senate and house of representatives. The number of members of the house shall not be less than seventy-five nor more than one hundred and thirty-five, and those of the senate not less than twenty-five nor more than forty-five. Members of both houses must be qualified electors in the district and citizens of the United States, twenty-five years of age and resident in the state or territory for two years. The sessions are biennial, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of January in the odd-numbered years.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—This is vested in the governor who is elected for two years, a lieutenant-governor, being elected at the same time and for the same term. A plurality elects, but in case of a tie one of the two candidates must be elected by the legislature. The governor has the usual powers, including that of granting pardons and reprieves except in case of treason and impeachment; provided, that where the sentence is capital punishment or imprisonment for more than two years, or a fine exceeding $200, no pardon, commutation, or remission shall be granted except on the recommendation of a board of pardons consisting of the presiding judge, secretary of state, and attorney-general. In case of treason the governor may suspend execution until the next meeting of the legislature, which may pardon or commute the sentence.

The lieutenant-governor succeeds to the powers and duties of the governor in case of a vacancy, with the succession, after him, to the secretary of state.

THE JUDICIAL POWER is vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, county courts, justices of the peace, and such municipal courts as may be created by law.

The Supreme Court consists of three judges chosen from districts by qualified electors of the state at large. The number may be increased after five years but not to exceed five. It has appellate jurisdiction only, with a superintending control over inferior courts. It may also issue writs of mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, injunction, etc.

The Circuit Courts have original jurisdiction of all suits at law and in equity and such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. The jurisdiction as to value and amount and grade of offence may be limited by law, and the judges thereof have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari, injunction, etc.

The state is divided into judicial circuits, the electors of each of which elect one circuit judge for four years. The number of circuits and judges may be increased by the legislature. Writs of error and appeals lie from the decisions of the circuit courts to the supreme court.

The County Courts. There is elected in each organized county a county judge for two years. County courts are courts of record and have original jurisdiction in matters of probate, guardianship, and settlement of estates of decedents, and such other civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be conferred by law, provided that they shall not have jurisdiction in any case where the amount involved exceeds $1,000, except in matters of probate, guardianship, and decedents' estates. Writs of error and appeal may be allowed from the county to the circuit courts or to the supreme court as provided by law. But no appeal or writ of error shall be allowed to the circuit court from its judgment on appeal from a justice of the peace or police magistrate. They have jurisdiction in criminal matters not of the grade of felony and prosecutions may be by information.

SOVEREIGN. A chief ruler with supreme power; a king or other ruler with limited power. An action is not maintainable against a foreign sovereign. 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 199.

Courts of England will take judicial notice of the status of a foreign sovereign and will not take jurisdiction over him, unless he voluntarily submits to it; [1894] 1 Q. B. 149.

A foreign sovereign brought suit to restrain the defendants from using a fund in a certain way, and the defendants set up a claim for damages; it was held that the court had no jurisdiction over such claim; [1898] 1 Ch. 190.

"When a foreign sovereign comes into court for the purpose of obtaining a remedy, then, by way of defence to that proceeding (by counter-claim, if necessary), to the extent of defeating that claim, the person sued may file a cross claim . . . for the purpose of enabling complete justice to be done between them." 29 W. R. 125, per James, L. J.

It is a general rule that the sovereign cannot be sued in his own court without his consent; and hence no direct judgment can be rendered against him therein for costs, except in the manner and on the condition he has prescribed; 40 La. Ann. 856. See STATE.

In English Law. A gold coin of Great Britain, of the value of a pound sterling.

SOVEREIGN STATE. One which governs itself independently of any foreign power. See SOVEREIGNTY; STATE.

SOVEREIGNTY. The union and exercise of all human power possessed in a state: it is a combination of all power; it is the power to do everything in a state without accountability,—to make laws, to execute and to apply them, to impose and collect taxes and levy contributions, to make war or peace, to form treaties of alliance or of commerce with foreign nations, and the like. Story, Const. § 207.

Abstractly, sovereignty resides in the body of the nation and belongs to the people. But these powers are generally exercised by delegation.

When analyzed, sovereignty is naturally divided into three great powers: namely, the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary; the first is the power to make new laws and to collect and repeal the old; the second is the power to execute the laws, both at home and abroad; and the last is the power to apply the laws to particular facts, to judge the disputes which arise among the citizens, and to punish crimes. See EXECUTIVE POWER; LEGISLATIVE POWER; JUDICIAL POWER.

Strictly speaking, in our republican forms of government the absolute sovereignty of the nation is in the people of the nation; and the residuary sovereignty of each state, not granted to any of its public functionaries, is in the people of the state; 2 Dall. 471.

In international law a state is considered sovereign when it is organized for political purposes and permanently occupies a fixed territory. It must have an organized government capable of enforcing law and be free from all external control. A wandering tribe of savages, or nomads, or people united merely for commercial purposes or under control of another state cannot be considered as a sovereign state. Until a state becomes sovereign in the sense above described, it is not subject to international law. The states of the American Union are each, in a certain sense, sovereign in their domestic concerns, but not in international law, and Norway is an instance of a community not sovereign in international law because bound in a union with Sweden. The fact of sovereignty is usually established by general recognition of other states, and, until such recognition is universal, no community can be considered as sovereign; Snow, Int. Law 19. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Every sovereign state is bound to respect the independence of every other sovereign state, and the courts of one country will not sit in judgment on the acts of the government of another, done within its own territory. 168 U. S. 250.

"The transactions of independent states between each other are governed by other laws than those which municipal courts administer; such courts have neither the means of deciding what is right, nor the power of enforcing any decision which they may make." 13 Moore, P. C. 75. And the same is the case with their dealings with the subjects of other states; Poll. Torts 105.

Public agents, military or civil, or foreign governments, whether such governments be de jure or de facto, cannot be held responsible in any courts of the United States for things done in their own states in the exercise of the sovereignty thereof, in pursuance of the directions of their governments. 65 Fed. Rep. 577. See TORT.

As to the jurisdiction of English courts over foreign subjects and ambassadors, see 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 23.

A judgment for plaintiffs in an action against army officers in possession of land used as a fort in which the plaintiff claimed a one-third interest, was a judgment directly against the United States and will be set aside ; 162 U. S. 255, reversing 8 Tex. Civ. App. 679.

SOWMING AND ROWMING. The apportioning or placing of cattle on a common, according to the rights of the different persons interested. See Bell, Dict.

SOWNE. A corruption of the French souvenn, remembered. Estreats that sowne are such as the sheriff may gather. Cowel. See ESTREATS.

SPADONES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those who, on account of their temperament or some accident they have suffered, are unable to procreate. Inst. 1. 11. 9 ; Dig. 1. 7. 2. 1. And see IMPOTENCE.

SPAIN. A kingdom of Europe. It is a constitutional monarchy.

The executive authority is vested in a king; the power to make laws is in the Cortez with the king. The Cortez comprises a senate and congress with equal authority. There are three classes of senators : those by their own right by birth ; life senators nominated by the crown ; and the senators elected by the corporations of state and by the largest taxpayers. In the first class are the sons of the king, after majority ; grandees who can prove an annual rental of $12,000 ; captains-general of the army and admirals of the navy ; the patriarch of the Indies and the archbishops ; the president of the council of state, of the supreme tribunal and of the tribunal of Cuentas del Reino. The elective senators are one-half renewable every five years and all of them go out when the king dissolves that part of the Cortez. The congress consists of 431 deputies apportioned according to population and elected for five years. Both chambers meet annually. The sovereign may convoke and dissolve them. The ministers are responsible and all royal decrees must be signed by one of them. The succession to the crown follows the regular order of primogeniture. If all the lines become extinct, the Cortez will elect a king. Spain is divided into various provinces, districts, and communes governed by local laws free from the control of the king or Cortez. The present constitution was proclaimed June 30, 1876. Justice is administered by a Tribunal Supremo or highest court of appeal, the Audiencias civiles, and eighty courts for criminal causes—Audencias de la Criminal. In every important town there are one or more judges. There are two codes, a Codigo Civil and a Codigo Penal.

SPARSIM (Lat.). Here and there ; in a scattered manner ; sparsely ; dispersedly. It is sometimes used in law : for example, the plaintiff may recover the place wasted, not only where the injury has been total, but where trees growing sparsim in a close are cut. Bac. Abr. Waste (M) ; Brownl. 240.

SPEAKER. The title of the presiding officer of the house of representatives of the United States. The position is one of great importance, as the speaker appoints the standing committees of the house. The presiding officer of either branch of the state legislature generally is called the speaker.

Both houses of parliament are presided over by a speaker. That of the house of lords is commonly the lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal, though the latter office is practically merged in that of lord chancellor. In the commons the speaker never votes, except when the votes are equal ; in the lords he has a vote with the rest of the house ; see May, P. L. ch. 7. See QUORUM ; PROLOCUTOR ; MacConochie, Congressional Committees ; Follett, The Speaker.

SPEAKING DEMURRER. In Pleading. One which alleges new matter in addition to that contained in the bill as a cause for demurrer. 4 Bro. C. C. 254 ; 2 Ves. 83 ; 4 Paige, Ch. 374 ; 85 Ala. 589.

SPEAKING WITH PROSECUTOR. A kind of imparlance, allowed in English practice, where the court permits a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor to speak with the prosecutor before judgment is pronounced ; if the prosecutor declares himself satisfied, the court may inflict a trivial punishment. 4 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 260.

SPECIAL. That which relates to a particular species or kind ; opposed to general : as, special verdict and general verdict ; special imparlance and general imparlance ; special jury, or one selected for a particular case, and general jury ; special issue and general issue, etc.

The meaning of special, as used in a constitutional provision authorizing the legislature to confer jurisdiction in special cases, has been the subject of much discussion in the court of appeals of the state of New York. See 12 N. Y. 593 ; 18 id. 57.

SPECIAL ACCEPTANCE. The qualified acceptance of a bill of exchange, as payable at a particular place, and there only. Byles, Bills, 15th ed. 260, 1891. See ACCEPTANCE.

SPECIAL ACT. See STATUTE.

SPECIAL AGENT. One authorized to do one or two special things. Ross, Cont. 44. One appointed only for a particular purpose, and vested with limited powers. Chit. Cont. 285 ; 94 Ala. 346.

It is a general rule that he who is invested with a special authority must act within the bounds of his authority, and he cannot bind his principal beyond what he is authorized to do ; 15 Johns. 44 ; 1 Wash. C. C. 174 ; Story, Ag. 17. See AGENT.

SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS. They differ from general taxation, in that they are made upon the assumption that a portion of the community is to be specially and peculiarly benefited in the enhancement of the value of property peculiarly situated as regards a contemplated expenditure of public funds. 35 Neb. 133.

SPECIAL ASSUMPSIT. An action of assumpsit brought on a special contract, which the plaintiff declares upon setting out its particular language or its legal effect.

It is distinguished from a general assumpsit, where the plaintiff, instead of setting out the particular language or effect of the original contract, declares as for a debt arising out of the execution of the contract, where that constitutes the debt. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3426.

SPECIAL BAIL. See BAIL.

SPECIAL BAILIFF. A bound bailiff (q. v.).

SPECIAL BASTARD. One whose parents afterwards intermarry. 3 Bla. Com. 335.

SPECIAL CASE. See CASE STATED.

SPECIAL COMMISSION. An extraordinary commission of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, issued by the crown to the judges when it is necessary that offences should be immediately tried and punished. Whart. Law Lex.

SPECIAL CONSTABLE. One who has been appointed a constable for a particular occasion, as in the case of an actual tumult or a riot, or for the purpose of serving a particular process.

SPECIAL COUNT. As opposed to the common counts, in pleading, a special count is a statement of the actual facts of the particular case.

SPECIAL CUSTOM. A particular or local custom. 23 Me. 95. See CUSTOM.

SPECIAL DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

SPECIAL DEMURRER. See DEMURRER.

SPECIAL DEPOSIT. A deposit made of a particular thing with the depositary: it is distinguished from an irregular deposit.

A deposit made with the understanding that the identical money deposited shall be returned to the depositor. 43 Ill. App. 340.

When a thing has been specially deposited with a depositary, the title to it remains with the depositor, and if it should be lost the loss will fall upon him. When, on the contrary, the deposit is irregular, as where money is deposited in a bank, the title to which is transferred to the bank, if it be lost, the loss will be borne by the bank. This will result from the same principle: the loss will fall in both instances, on the owner of the thing, according to the rule res periit domino. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1054; Edw. Bailm. 48; BAILMENT.

SPECIAL ERRORS. Special pleas in error are those which assign for error matters in confession and avoidance, as a release of errors, the act of limitations, and the like, to which the plaintiff in error may reply or demur. See PLEA.

SPECIAL EXAMINER. An examiner appointed by a court of equity in a particular case. See EXAMINERS IN CHANCERY.

Any fit person may be a special examiner. The taking of testimony by a special examiner is conducted in the same manner as before a standing examiner in chancery. The examination should take place in the presence of the parties and their attorneys; the testimony is, under the English chancery practice, taken in the narrative form, and the examiner may take down the questions and answers if he thinks fit; he cannot pass upon the materiality or relevancy of any question. When there is an objection, it should be noted, and the examiner will state his opinion thereon to the attorney and refer to it in the depositions.

The depositions should not be prepared beforehand; 35 Vt. 476. Formerly it was considered that the whole of the deposition should be written down by the examiner, with his own hand; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. *906; but such is not now the usual practice. An examiner is a ministerial officer and has no power to lay down rules as to the most convenient time of taking examinations; L. R. 16 Eq. 102. He may exclude the public from the hearings; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. *906. Subpœnas may issue to bring witnesses before him. If an examiner in England dies, his successor may sign the deposition; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. *910. If the witness refuse to sign his deposition, the examiner signs it. See EXAMINERS IN CHANCERY.

SPECIAL EXECUTION. A copy of a judgment with a direction to the sheriff indorsed thereon to execute it. 47 Minn. 581.

SPECIAL FINDING. Where a jury find specially a particular fact, presumably material to the general question before them, but which does not involve the whole of that question. Moz. & W. The special findings referred to in the Revised Statutes, § 700, is not a report of the evidence, but it must be like the special verdict of a jury, a finding of the ultimate facts which the evidence establishes; 19 U. S. App. 567.

SPECIAL IMPARLANCE. In Pleading. An imparlance which contains the clause, "saving to himself all advantages and exceptions, as well to the writ as to the declaration aforesaid." 2 Chitty, Pl. 407. See IMPARLANCE.

SPECIAL INDORSEMENT. An indorsement in full, which, besides the signature of the indorser, expresses in whose favor the indorsement is made; thus "Pay C D, or order, A B." See Byles, Bills, 15th ed. 172; Tiedm. Com. Paper 266.

In English practice, under the Judicature Act of 1875, a special indorsement on a writ of summons is one which may be made in all cases where a definite sum of money is claimed. When the writ is thus indorsed and the defendant does not appear within the time appointed, the plaintiff may then sign final judgment for any sum not exceeding that indorsed on the writ. See 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 530; Lush. Pr. 366. See INDORSEMENT.

SPECIAL INJUNCTION. An injunction obtained only on motion, usually with notice to the other party. It is applied for sometimes on affidavit before answer, and frequently upon merits disclosed in the defendant's answer. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3756. See INJUNCTION.

SPECIAL ISSUE. In Pleading. A plea to the action which denies some particular material allegation, which is in effect a denial of the entire right of action. It differs from the general issue which traverses or denies the whole declaration or indictment. Gould, Pl. c. 2, § 38. See GENERAL ISSUE; ISSUE.

SPECIAL JURY. One selected in a particular way by the parties. See JURY.

SPECIAL LAWS. See STATUTE; GENERAL LAWS.

SPECIAL LEGISLATION. See GENERAL LAWS; STATUTE.

SPECIAL LICENSE. One granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury to authorize a marriage at any time or place. 2 Steph. Com. 247.

SPECIAL MATTER. Under a plea of the general issue, a defendant may, instead of pleading specially, give the plaintiff notice, that on the trial he will give some special matter, of such and such a nature, in evidence.

Such notice is not required in an action on a sealed instrument where consideration need not be averred in the declaration, except when a failure of consideration is set up as an equitable defence.

Notice of special matter is required by R. S. § 4920 in actions at law on letters patent, in some cases. It must be given thirty days "before trial," which is said to be before the opening of the term. See 3 Rob. Pat. § 1019.

See PLEA; PLEADING.

SPECIAL NON EST FACTUM. The name of a plea by which the defendant says that the deed which he has executed is not his own or binding upon him, because of some circumstance which shows that it was not intended to be his deed, or because it was not binding upon him for some lawful reason.

SPECIAL OCCUPANT. When an estate is granted to a man and his heirs during the life of cestui que vie, and the grantee die without alienation, and while the life for which he held continues, the heir will succeed, and is called a special occupant. 2 Bla. Com. 259. In the United States the statute provisions of the different states vary considerably upon this subject. In New York and New Jersey, special occupancy is abolished. Virginia, and probably Maryland, follow the English statutes. In Massachusetts and other states, where the real and personal estates of intestates are distributed in the same way and manner, the question does not seem to be material; 4 Kent 27.

SPECIAL PAPER. A list kept in the courts of common law, and afterwards in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, in which list special cases, etc., to be argued are set down. Whart. Law Lex.

SPECIAL PARTNERSHIP. See PARTNERSHIP.

SPECIAL PLEA IN BAR. See PLEA.

SPECIAL PLEADER. In English Practice. A lawyer whose professional occupation is to give verbal or written opinions upon statements submitted to him, either in writing or verbally, and to draw pleadings, civil or criminal, and such practical proceedings as may be out of the general course. 2 Chitty, Pr. 42.

Special pleaders are not necessarily at the bar; but those that are not are required to take out annual certificates under stat. 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, ss. 60, 63; Moz. & W.

SPECIAL PLEADING. The allegation of special or new matter to avoid the effect of the previous allegations of the opposite party, as distinguished from a direct denial of matter previously alleged on the opposite side. Gould, Pl. c. 1, § 18; 3 Wheat. 246; Com. Dig. Pleader (E 15); Steph. Pl., And. ed. 240, n. See PLEADING, SPECIAL.

SPECIAL PROPERTY. That property in a thing which gives a qualified or limited right. See PROPERTY.

SPECIAL REQUEST. A request actually made, at a particular time and place; this term is used in contradiction to a general request, which need not state the time when nor place where made. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2843.

SPECIAL RULE. See RULE OF COURT.

SPECIAL SESSIONS. See SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

SPECIAL TAIL. See ESTATE TAIL.

SPECIAL TERM OR TERMS. See TERM.

SPECIAL TRAVERSE. See TRAVERSE.

SPECIAL TRUST. A special trust is one where a trustee is interposed for the execution of some purpose particularly pointed out, and is not, as in case of a simple trust, a mere passive depositary of the estate, but is required to exert himself actively in the execution of the settler's intention: as, where a conveyance is made to trustees upon trust to reconvey, or to sell for the payment of debts. Lew. Tr. 3, 16; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1896. See TRUST.

SPECIAL VERDICT. In Practice.

A special verdict is one by which the facts of the case are put on the record, and the law is submitted to the judges. See VERDICT; Bac. Abr. Verdict (D).

SPECIAL. Metallic money issued by public authority. See also IN SPECIE.

This term is used in contradistinction to paper money, which in some countries is issued by the government, and is a mere engagement which represents specie.

In cases of salvage, specie on board is treated like any other cargo; 1 Pet. Adm. 416; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 254; 86 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 340. See 15 Am. L. Rev. 416; SALVAGE.

SPECIAL GRAVITY. The ratio of the weight of a body to the weight of an equal volume of some other body, taken as the standard or unit. This standard is usually water for liquids and solids, and air for gases. 6 U. S. App. 53.

SPECIALTY. A writing sealed and delivered, containing some agreement or promise. 2 S. & R. 503; 1 P. Wms. 130. A writing sealed and delivered, which is given as a security for the payment of a debt, in which such debt is particularly specified. Bac. Abr. Obligation (A).

Although in the body of the writing it is not said that the parties have set their hands and seals, yet if the instrument be really sealed it is a specialty, and if it be not sealed it is not a specialty, although the parties in the body of the writing make mention of a seal. 2 S. & R. 504; 2 Co. 5 a; Perkins § 120. See BOND; DEBT; OBLIGATION; SEAL.

SPECIFIC LEGACY. See LEGACY.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. The actual performance of a contract by the party bound to fulfil it. As the exact fulfilment of an agreement is not always practicable, the phrase may mean, in a given case, not literal, but substantial performance; Waterm. Spec. Perf. § 1.

Many contracts are entered into by parties to fulfil certain things, and then the contracting parties neglect or refuse to fulfil their engagements. In such cases the party aggrieved has generally a remedy at law, and he may recover damages for the breach of the contract; but in many cases the recovery of damages is an inadequate remedy, and the party seeks to recover a specific performance of the agreement.

It is a general rule that courts of equity will entertain jurisdiction for a specific performance of agreements, whenever courts of law can give but an inadequate remedy; and it is immaterial whether the subject relate to real or personal estate; 2 Story, Eq. § 717; Pom. Contr. 28, 34; 1 S. & S. 607; 1 P. Wms. 570; 1 Sch. & L. 553; 84 Me. 195. But the rule is confined to cases where courts of law cannot give an adequate remedy; 1 Grant, Cas. 83; 18 Ga. 473; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 718; if there is an adequate legal remedy, the court will refuse specific performance, unless under all the circumstances it would be inequitable and unjust to do so; 84 Ky. 157; 30 W. Va. 790; and a decree is to be granted or refused in the discretion of the court; 38 N. H. 400; 2 Ia. 126; 9 Ohio St. 511; 8 Wisc. 392; 5 Harring. 74; Hempst. 245; 2 Jones, Eq. 267; 6 Ind. 259; 51 Fed. Rep. 860; 152 Pa. 529. Specific performance is not of absolute right, but one which rests entirely in judicial discretion; exercised according to the settled principles of equity and with reference to the facts of the particular case, and not arbitrarily or capriciously; 144 U. S. 224; 128 id. 438; 127 id. 668; 82 Va. 269; 99 N. C. 215; 23 Neb. 795.

A vendor of real estate may either sue at law for the purchase-money or resort to equity for specific performance; 10 U. S. App. 601.

As the doctrine of a specific performance in equity arises from the occasional inadequacy of the remedy at law upon a violated contract, it follows that the contract must be such a one as is binding at law; 33 Ala. N. S. 449; 37 U. S. App. 185; and where the existence of a contract is in doubt, equity will not, as a rule, decree specific performance, especially when it appears that the property in question was rapidly rising in value; 158 U. S. 216; and it must be executory, certain in its terms, and fair in all its parts. It must also be founded upon a valuable consideration, and its performance in specie must be practicable and necessary; and, if it be one of the contracts which is embraced in the statute of frauds, it must be evidenced in writing; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 751; Adams, Eq. 77; Busb. Eq. 80. The first requisite is that the contract must be founded upon a valuable consideration; 19 Ark. 51; either in the way of benefit bestowed or of disadvantage sustained by the party in whose favor it is sought to be enforced; 1 Beasl. Ch. 498; and this consideration must be proved even though the contract be under seal; 12 Ind. 539; 14 La. Ann. 606; 17 Tex. 397; a promise against a promise is not such a consideration as will support a decree of specific performance, nor does the presence of seals import such a consideration; 2 Colo. App. 259. The consideration must be strictly a valuable one, and not one merely arising from a moral duty or affection, as towards a wife and children; although it need not necessarily be an adequate one; Adams, Eq. 78. See 6 Ia. 279; 6 Mich. 364.

The second requisite is that the mutual enforcement of the contract must be practicable; for if this cannot be judicially secured on both sides, it ought not to be compelled against either party. Among the cases which the court deems impracticable is that of a covenant by a husband to convey his wife's land, because this cannot be effectuated without danger of infringing upon that freedom of will which the policy of the law allows the wife in the alienation of her real estate; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 731; 63 Pa. 335; 3 Bush 694. See 3 Wash. St. 554. To justify a decree, the proof must be clear both as to the existence of the agreement and the terms. Equity will not enforce a contract in favor of an employer as against an employe which is against conscience; 149 U. S. 315. And the actual performance of personal services by an employe will not be enforced in equity; 24 U. S. App. 239. And the contract must be mutual at the time it is entered into; 29 W. Va. 577; and specific performance of a contract will not be enforced, unless the remedy as well as the obligation is mutual, and alike attainable by both parties to the agreement; 83 Ala. 498; 73 Cal. 415.

The third requisite is that the enforcement in specie must be necessary; that is, it must be really important to the plaintiff, and not oppressive to the defendant; 1 Beasl. Ch. 497. However strong, clear, and emphatic a contract may be, and however plain the right at law, specific performance will not be decreed if it would cause a result harsh, inequitable, or contrary to good conscience; 81 Me. 365; see 144 U. S. 224; and the court is not bound to shut its eyes to the evident character of the transaction; it will never lend its aid to carry out an unconscionable bargain, but will leave a party to his remedy at law; 135 U. S. 457. Specific performance was refused of a contract for an unexpired term of years by which one party agreed to perform continuous mechanical services (in the generation of electricity), demanding the highest degree of skill, and the other to maintain costly machinery and the daily use of cars moved by electricity on the line of its railway; 109 Ala. 190. Mere inadequacy of consideration is not necessarily a bar to a specific performance of a contract; but if it be so great as to induce the suspicion of fraud or imposition, the court of equity will refuse its aid to the party seeking to enforce, and leave him to his remedy at law; 2 Jones, Eq. 267. This is upon the ground that the specific enforcement of the contract would be oppressive to the defendant. The court will equally withhold its aid where such enforcement is not really important to the plaintiff, as it will not be in any case where the damages which he may recover at law will answer his purpose as well as the possession of the thing which was contracted to be conveyed to him; Adams, Eq. 83. As a general rule, a contract to convey real estate will be specifically enforced; unless the title thereto is not marketable; 15 Cent. L. J. 8; 40 Minn. 312; 40 La. Ann. 845; while one for the transfer of personal chattels will be ordinarily denied any relief in equity; Waterm. Spec. Perf. § 16; 40 Miss. 119. An instrument defective as a deed will not be enforced as a contract to convey, if no valuable consideration passed between the parties; 49 N. J. Eq. 210. But even in the case of personal property, if the plaintiff has not an adequate remedy at law, equity will take jurisdiction; and more willingly in America than in England; Story, Eq. Jur. § 724; Bisph. Eq. 368. When goods were sold and there were no other similar goods in the market, a disposal of them by the seller has been enjoined; 33 L. J. Q. B. 335. Equity will decree the specific delivery of goods of a peculiar value; as heirlooms; 10 Ves. 139; an ancient silver altar; 3 P. Wms. 390; the celebrated Pusey horn; 1 Vern. 273; the decorations of a lodge of Freemasons; 6 Ves. 773; a faithful family slave; 3 Murphey 74. Contracts for the sale of stock will not, usually, be enforced, but the rule has been departed from; 23 Cal. 390; L. R. 3 Ch. 388; 1 S. & S. 174. A covenant for a renewal of a lease, which is indefinite as to the length of the term and rental to be paid, cannot be enforced specifically; 65 Hun 39; nor will a contract which is perpetual; 136 U. S. 393. A right to use a right of way under a traffic agreement between two railroad companies will be enforced in equity; 138 U. S. 1; and a contract between railroad companies for the joint use of a bridge and seven miles of track; 51 Fed. Rep. 309; or a contract by which one had acquired the right to use a part of the other party's railroad line for 999 years; 10 U. S. App. 98. Option contracts for the purchase or sale of land may be enforced; 12 U. S. App. 274; and the rule of non-enforcement for want of mutuality has no application to such an option contract; id. Where time is of the essence of a contract, specific performance will not be decreed after the lapse of the time specified; but it is otherwise when time is not of the essence of the contract; 23 U. S. App. 401

A court of equity will not refuse to enforce a contract specifically which was fair when made, by reason of the increase in value of the subject-matter; 145 U. S. 459. Where the vendee bought property for $300, and paid one dollar down and then did nothing for nine years, and it appeared that the property had reached a value of $15,000, specific performance was refused; 155 U. S. 550.

Equity will enforce a contract for the exclusive rights under letters patent, and will enjoin the breach of a negative covenant; 23 Fed. Rep. 86; 147 Mass. 185; 4 Del. Ch. 337; 34 Conn. 325. See 149 U. S. 315; including a contract to assign all future inventions relating to a certain art; 122 Pa. 392; although the agreement be oral; 73 Ia. 367; but not if the contract be unconscionable; 84 Fed. Rep. 877.

When the statute of frauds requires that a contract shall be evidenced in writing, that will be a fourth requisite to the specific execution of it. In such case the contract must be in writing and certain in its terms; but it will not matter in what form the instrument may be, for it will be enforced even if it appear only in the consideration of a bond secured by a penalty; 6 Gray 25; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 751. The specific performance of a parol contract to convey land cannot be enforced if defendant urges the statute of frauds; 99 N. C. 85.

Equity will not decree specific performance of an agreement to convey property which has no existence, or to which the defendant has no title; 128 U. S. 671. If it appear that the want of title was known to the plaintiff when he began suit, the bill will not be retained for the assessment of damages, but the plaintiff will be left to his remedy at law; id.

In applying the equity of specific performance to real estate, there are some modifications of legal rules, which at first sight appear inconsistent with them and repugnant to the maxim that equity follows the law, The modifications here referred to are those of enforcing parol contracts relating to land, on the ground that they have been already performed in part; of allowing time to make out a title beyond the day which the contract specifies; and of allowing a conveyance with compensation for defects; Adams, Eq. 85; Bisph. Eq. 364.

The principle upon which it is held that part-performance of a contract will in equity take a case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, is that it would be a fraud upon the opposite party if the agreement were not carried into complete execution; Pom. Contr. 103; 11 Cal. 28; 30 Barb. 633; 24 Ga. 402; 28 Mo. 134; 40 Me. 94. The act which is alleged to be part-performance must be done in pursuance of the contract and with the assent of the defendant. What will be a sufficient part-performance must depend on circumstances. The taking possession of the land and making improvements thereon will answer: 10 Cal. 136; 8 Mich. 463; 6 Ia. 279; 30 Vt. 516; 5 R. I. 149; 33 N. H. 32; 4 Wisc. 79; 76 Ia. 565, 82 Va. 269; though the payment of a part or even the whole of the purchase-money will not; 14 Tex. 373; 22 Ill. 643; 4 Kent 451; 108 Mass. 404; 68 N. Y. 499. See, however, 1 Harr. Del. 532; 26 Md. 37. If the purchaser have entered and made improvements upon the land, and the vendor protect himself from a specific performance by taking advantage of the statute, the plaintiff shall be entitled to a decree for the value of his improvements; 14 Tex. 331; 1 D. & B. 9. The doctrine of part-performance is not recognized in some of the states; 37 Mo. 388; 40 Me. 187; 8 Cush. 223; 13 Sm. & M. 93.

Where several parcels of land are included in one parol contract of sale, part payment of the purchase-money and the delivery of one of those parcels is sufficient to enable the purchaser to enforce specific performance of the contract as to all the parcels; 95 U. S. 96.

The doctrine of allowing time to make out a title beyond the day which the contract specifies, and which is embodied in the maxim that time is not of the essence of a contract in equity, has no doubt been generally adopted in the United States; 1 D. & B. Eq. 237; 3 Jones, Eq. 84, 240; 2 McLean 495; 57 Ill. 480. But to entitle the purchaser to a specific performance he must show good faith and a reasonable diligence; 4 Ired. Eq. 386; 3 Jones, Eq. 321 If during the vendor's delay there has been a material change of circumstances affecting the rights and interests of the parties, equity will not relieve; 15 Pa. 429.

The third equity, to wit, that of allowing a conveyance with compensation for defects, applies where a contract has been made for the sale of an estate, which cannot be literally performed in toto, either by reason of an unexpected failure in the title to part of the estate; 34 Ala. N. S. 633; 1 Head 251; 6 Wisc. 127; of inaccuracy in the terms of the description, or of diminution in value by a liability to a charge upon it. In any such case, the court of equity will enforce a specific performance, allowing a just compensation for defects, whenever it can do so consistently with the principle of doing exact justice between the parties; Adams, Eq. 89. This doctrine has also been adopted in the United States. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 794; 1 Ired. Eq. 299; 1 Head 251; 76 Cal. 299.

A contract for the sale of land entered into under the belief by both parties that the vendor has title, when in fact he has none, will not be specifically enforced in equity; 140 Ill. 583. The fact that vendor's title is disputed by a third person gives him no right to refuse to convey such title as he has; and the fact will not prevent a decree for specific performance; 128 Ill. 540.

When a vendor files a bill he must show a tender of the title and an offer to perform; 46 Ill. 113; 39 Mich. 175; that is a tender of a deed; 63 Ind. 213; Tiedm. Eq. Jur. 499; but it has been held that an offer of a deed in the bill is enough; 63 N. Y. 301; 20 Ia. 295; 52 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 586. Where a vendee announces that he will not comply with his contract, the vendor need not tender a deed before suing for specific performance; 114 Ill. 388. See PERFORMANCE. And a vendee must show a tender of the purchase-money; 67 Pa. 24; 21 Gratt. 29; 142 Ill. 258. And such tender must not be delayed till circumstances have changed; 4 Brewst. 49. The vendee need not tender the purchase-money where the vendor refuses to consider the question of sale under the contract and denies any obligation thereunder: 87 Tenn. 4.

A decree for specific performance will not be made against a vendor whose wife refuses to join in the conveyance; 75 Pa. 141.

In a suit for specific performance, the plaintiff must show that he has performed, or was ready to perform, his part of the contract, and that he has not been guilty of laches or unreasonable delay, and, where the proof leaves the case doubtful, the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree; 76 Md. 229. See 48 N. J. Eq. 638; 140 Ill. 583. Specific performance will not be decreed after an unreasonable delay; 127 U. S. 668; or where a party has been backward in claiming the relief, and has held off until circumstances have changed, so as to give him an opportunity to enforce or abandon the contract, as events might prove most advantageous; 86 Va. 75; 35 Fed. Rep. 174; 76 Cal. 590.

Specific performance of a contract to leave property by will will not be decreed, where the contract is made by a mere donee of a testamentary power of appointment; [1892] 3 Ch. 510.

Specific performance should never be granted unless the terms of the agreement sought to be enforced are clearly proved, or where it is left in doubt whether the party against whom the relief is asked in fact made such an agreement; 128 U. S. 438: 127 id. 668; and performance will not be decreed unless the proof is clear and satisfactory, both as to the existence of the agreement and as to its terms; 149 U. S. 315.

A feme covert cannot maintain a bill for specific performance; 4 Brewst. 49. A decree for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a real estate is granted or withheld according as equity and justice seems to demand; 155 U. S. 550. See, generally, Fry; Waterman, on Specific Performance.

SPECIFICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The process by which, from material either of one kind or different kinds, either belonging to the person using them or to another, a new form or thing is created; as, if from gold or gold and silver a cup be made, or from grapes wine. Calvinus, Lex. Whether the property in the new article was in the owner of the materials or in him who effected the change was a matter of contest between the two great sects of Roman lawyers. Stair, Inst. p. 204, § 41; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 241.

SPECIFICATION. A particular and detailed account of a thing. When used in the patent law without the word claim, it means the description and claims. 6 Fed. Rep. 611. See PATENT.

In Military Law. The clear and particular description of the charges preferred against a person accused of a military offence. Tytler, Courts-Mar. 109.

SPECULATION. The hope or desire of making a profit by the purchase and resale of a thing. Pardessus, Droit Com. n. 12. The profit so made.

SPEECH. A formal discourse in public. The liberty of speech is guaranteed to members of the legislature, in debate, and to counsel in court.

The reduction of a speech to writing and its publication is a libel if the matter contained in it is libellous; and the repetition of it upon occasions not warranted by law, when the matter is slanderous, will be slander; and the character of the speaker will be no protection to him from an action; 1 Maule & S. 273; 1 Esp. 226. See DEBATE; LIBERTY OF SPEECH; SLANDER; LIBEL.

SPEED. The test of safe speed is whether it is such as allows the vessel to comply with the duty imposed on her and to avoid collision with other vessels in the situations in which she may reasonably expect to find them. 8 U. S. App. 9.

In a fog a vessel is bound to observe unusual caution and to maintain only such rate of speed as will enable her to come to a standstill by reversing her engines at full speed, before she shall collide with a vessel which she may see; 8 U. S. App. 312.

A vessel running fifteen knots an hour, when she strikes a fog bank, has not complied with the statutory requirements to go at moderate speed; 24 U. S. App. 164. See MODERATE SPEED.

SPEEDY TRIAL. The right to a speedy trial in all criminal prosecutions is given under the United States constitution.

The speedy trial to which a person charged with crime is entitled under the constitution is a trial at such a time, after the finding of the indictment, regard being had to the terms of court, as shall afford the prosecution a reasonable opportunity, by the fair and honest exercise of reasonable diligence, to prepare for trial, and if the trial is delayed or postponed beyond such period, when there is a term of court at which the trial might be had, by reason of the neglect or laches of the prosecution in preparing for trial, such delay is a denial to the defendant of his right to a speedy trial, and in such case a party confined, upon application by habeas corpus, is entitled to a discharge from custody; 3 Mont. 512.

SPELLING. The art of putting the proper letters in words in their proper order.

It is a rule that bad spelling will not vitiate a contract when it appears with certainty what is meant: for example, where a man agreed to pay threty pounds he was held bound to pay thirty pounds; and seutene was holden to be seventeen; Cro. Jac. 607; 10 Co. 133 a; 2 Rolle, Abr. 147. Even in an indictment undertood has been holden as understood; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law.

A misspelling of a name in a declaration will not be sufficient to defeat the plaintiff, on the ground of variance between the writing produced and the declaration, if such name be idem sonans: as, Kay for Key; 16 East 110; 2 Stark. 29; Segrave for Seagrave; 2 Stra. 889. See IDEM SONANS; ELECTION.

SPENDTHRIFT. A person who, by excessive drinking, gaming, idleness, or debauchery of any kind, shall so spend, waste, or lessen his estate as to expose himself or his family to want or suffering, or expose the town to charge or expense for the support of himself or family. Vt. Rev. Stat. c. 65, § 9.

A person having the entire right to dispose of property may settle it or give it by will in trust for another, with the provision that the income shall not be alienated by the beneficiary by anticipation, or be taken by his creditors in advance of its payment to him, although there is no cesser or limitation over of the estate in such an event; 133 Mass. 170; 146 id. 369; 91 U. S. 716; 94 id. 523; 8 B. Mon. 56; 2 Rawle 33; 134 Pa. 114; 30 Vt. 338; 87 Va. 758; 111 Ill. 247; 4 Fed. Rep. 136; 84 Me. 335; 86 Tenn. 81; 20 Mo. App. 616. See also 1 Perry, Trusts 495.

In a very recent case in the New York court of appeals, it was held that a party could not by conveying his property in trust, reserving to himself the income thereof during his life, with remainder over, place his beneficial interest beyond the reach of creditors. Notwithstanding the life beneficiary was solvent and free from debt at the time he created the trust, the interest in the estate which he has reserved to himself is subject to a judgment upon a debt incurred subsequently to the creation of the trust; 156 N. Y. 316.

One cannot create a spendthrift trust of his own property for his own benefit; 42 Pa. 330. Nor can there be a valid spendthrift trust where the trustee is also the cestui que trust, with the absolute ownership of the subject of the trust; 42 Pa. 330; 177 id. 208; 133 Mass. 175.

A trust to place one's property beyond the reach of creditors, while retaining full enjoyment of the income, through the instrumentality of a trustee, cannot be created by a married woman or a woman in contemplation of marriage; 39 L. R. A. (Md.) 806. A married woman may, however, make a valid spendthrift trust in favor of her husband; 177 Pa. 208.

The rule has prevailed in the English courts that when the income of a trust estate is given to any person (other than a married woman) for life, the equitable estate for life is alienable by, and liable in equity to the debts of, the cestui que trust, and that this quality is so inseparable from the estate that no provision, however express, which does not operate as a cesser or limitation over of the estate itself, can protect it from his debts or control; 18 Ves. 429; 6 Sim. 524; 1 Russ. & Myl. 395; 9 Hare 475.

Spendthrift trusts, there called alimentary funds, are upheld in Scotland; Gray, Restr. on Alienation 158. The English rule has been adopted in several courts of this country; 5 R. I. 305; 4 Ired. Eq. 131; 83 Ga. 703; 73 N. C. 119; 4 Rich. Eq. 46; 1 Dev. & Bat. Eq. 480.

In Arkansas; 8 Ark. 302; Indiana; 82 Ind. 38; and New Hampshire; 58 N. H. 155, the question has been raised, but not decided. Apart from statute, the rule in New Jersey is the same as the English rule; See 3 Stockt. 172; 12 C. E. Green 308; 41 N. J. Eq. 100. In Wisconsin, the question is in doubt, See 35 Wis. 687; 87 id. 449; 64 id. 210. In Connecticut, the status of such trusts is undecided; 21 Conn. 1; 36 id. 18.

By statute, in Kentucky, one cannot vest property or funds in trustees for the use of another without subjecting it to the debts of the cestui que trust; 14 S. W. Rep. 423; 12 Bush 344. In New York a statute excludes from proceedings in equity to reach beneficial interests, all cases of trusts for maintenance and support where the trust has proceeded from some person other than the debtor, but makes available to the creditor any surplus beyond what may be necessary for the maintenance and support of the beneficiary; 70 N. Y. 270; 42 Hun 636.

Where property is devised in trust for a testator's son and his family, the profits to be applied to the extent the trustee sees fit, judgment creditors of the son cannot reach the property or its income; 59 Fed. Rep. 923.

An absolute discretion vested in trustees to make payments out of trust property confers no interest on the beneficiary that can be asserted by him or his assignee in bankruptcy; 91 U. S. 716, where the court proceeded to sustain the doctrine of trusts of this class in a forcible argument.

A spendthrift trust may be created for a term of years with the remainder to the cestui que trust in fee; 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 282.

See Gray, Restr. on Alienation, where the cases are fully considered and an able protest made against the validity of such trusts.

SPERATE (Lat. spero, to hope). That of which there is hope.

In the accounts of an executor and the inventory of the personal assets, he should distinguish between those which are sperate and those which are desperate: he will be prima facie responsible for the former and discharged for the latter; 1 Chitty, Pr. 520; 2 Will. Exec. 644; Toller, Exec. 248. See DESPERATE.

SPES RECUPERANDI (Lat. the hope of recovery). A term applied to cases of capture of an enemy's property as a booty or prize, while it remains in a situation in which it is liable to be recaptured. As between the belligerent parties, the title to the property taken as a prize passes the moment there is no longer any hope of recovery; 2 Burr. 683. See INFRA PRÆSIDIA; POSTLIMINY; BOOTY; PRIZE.

SPIGURNEL. The sealer of the royal writs.

SPINSTER. An addition given in legal writings, to a woman who never was married. Lovelace, Wills 269. So called because she was supposed to be occupied in spinning.

SPIRITUAL CORPORATIONS. See ECCLESIASTICAL CORPORATIONS.

SPIRITUAL COURTS. Ecclesiastical courts (q. v.).

SPIRITUAL LORDS. The archbishops and bishops of the house of peers. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 341.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS. See LIQUOR LAWS.

SPLITTING A CAUSE OF ACTION. The bringing an action for only a part of the cause of action. This is not permitted either at law or in equity. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4167.

SPOLIATION. In English Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a writ sued out in the spiritual court to recover for the fruits of the church or for the church itself. Fitzh. N. B. 85.

A waste of church property by an ecclesiastical person. 3 Bla. Com. 90.

In Torts. Destruction of a thing by the act of a stranger: as, the erasure or alteration of a writing by the act of a stranger is called spoliation. This has not the effect to destroy its character or legal effect. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 566. See IN ODIUM SPOLIATORIS.

In Admiralty Law. By spoliation is also understood the total destruction of a thing: as, the spoliation of papers by the captured party is generally regarded as a proof of guilt; but in America it is open to explanation, except in certain cases where there is a vehement presumption of bad faith; 2 Wheat. 227, 241; 1 Dods. Admr. 480, 486. Bened. Adm. 310. See ALTERATION; FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

SPONSALIA STIPULATIO SPONSALITIA (Lat.). A promise lawfully made between persons capable of marrying each other, that at some future time they will marry. See ESPOUSALS; Ersk. Inst. 1. 6. 3.

SPONSIO JUDICIALIS (Lat.). A judicial wager. This corresponded in the Roman law to our feigned issue.

SPONSIONS. In International Law. Agreements or engagements made by certain public officers, as generals or admirals, in time of war, either without authority or by exceeding the limits of authority under which they purport to be made.

Before these conventions can have any binding authority on the state, they must be confirmed by express or tacit ratification. The former is given in positive terms and in the usual forms; the latter is justly implied from the fact of acting under the agreement as if bound by it, and from any other circumstance from which an assent may be fairly presumed; Wheat. Int. Law, 3d Eng. ed. § 255; Grotius, de Jur. Bel. de Pac. l. 2, c. 15, § 16; id. l. 3, c. 22, § 1; Vattel, Law of Nat. b. 2, c. 14, § 209; Wolff, Inst. § 1156.

SPONSOR. In Civil Law. He who intervenes for another voluntarily and without being requested. The engagement which he enters into is only accessary to the principal. See Dig. 17. 1. 18; Nov. 4. 1; Code de Comm. art 158, 159; Code Nap. 1236; Wolff, Inst. § 1556.

SPOUSE BREACH. Adultery. Cowel.

SPRING. A fountain.

A natural source of water, of a definite and well-marked extent. 6 Ch. Div. 264 (C. A.). A natural chasm in which water has collected, and from which it either is lost by percolation, or rises in a defined channel. 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457. The water issuing by natural forces out of the earth at a particular place. It is not a mere place or hole in the ground, nor is it all the water that can be gathered or caused to flow at a particular place. A well is not necessarily a spring, nor is water which by the expenditure of labor can be gathered into a reservoir. 135 N. Y. 50.

The owner of the soil has the exclusive right to use a spring arising on his grounds. When another has an easement or right to draw water from such a spring, acquired by grant or prescription, if the spring fails the easement ceases, but if it returns the right revives.

The owner of land on which there is a natural spring has a right to use it for domestic and culinary purposes and for watering his cattle, and he may make an aqueduct to another part of his land and use all the water required to keep the aqueduct in order or to keep the water pure; 15 Conn. 366. He may also use it for irrigation, provided the volume be not materially decreased; Ang. Waterc. 34. See 1 Root 535; 9 Conn. 291; 2 Watts 327; 2 Hill S. C. 634; Coxe N. J. 460; 2 D. & B. 50; 8 Mass. 106; 3 Pick. 269; 8 Me. 253.

The owner of a spring cannot lawfully turn the current or give it a new direction. He is bound to let it enter the inferior estate on the same level it has been accustomed to, and at the same place, for every man is entitled to a stream of water flowing through his land without diminution or alteration; 6 East 206; 2 Conn. 584. See 3 Rawle 84; 12 Wend. 330; 10 Conn. 213; 14 Vt. 239.

Where one conveyed a spring or well to be enjoyed without interruption, and afterwards conveyed contiguous property to a railway company whose works drained the water from the land before it reached the spring, on an action for breach of agreement, held, that the grantor had only conveyed the flow of the water after it had reached the spring, and therefore there was no breach; 41 L. T. N. S. 455 (C. A.). See Gould, Waters 286; 15 L. J. N. S. Ex. 315. Where the value of land was enhanced by a spring, it was held ratable for taxation at such improved value; 1 M. & S. 503. See Coul. & F. Waters.

The owner of the superior inheritance, or of the land on which there is a spring, has no right to deprive the owner of the estate below him; 5 Pick. 175; 3 Harr. & J. 231; 12 Vt. 178; 13 Conn. 303; 4 Ill. 492; nor can he detain the water unreasonably; 17 Johns. 306; 2 B. & C. 910. See 1 Dall. 211; 3 Rawle 256; 13 N. H. 360; IRRIGATION; SUBTERRANEAN WATER; SURFACE WATER; WATER-COURSE.

SPRING-BRANCH. A branch of a stream flowing from a spring. 12 Gratt. 196.

SPRINGING USE. A use limited to arise on a future event where no preceding use is limited, and which does not take effect in derogation of any other interest than that which results to the grantor or remains in him in the meantime. Gilbert, Uses, Sugden ed. 153, n.; 2 Crabb, R. P. 498.

A future use, either vested or contingent, limited to arise without any preceding limitation. Cornish, Uses 91.

It differs from a remainder in not requiring any other particular estate to sustain it than the use resulting to the one who creates it, intermediate between its creation and the subsequent taking effect of the springing use; Dy. 274; Pollexf. 65; 1 Ed. Ch. 34; 4 Drur. & W. 27; 1 Me. 271. It differs from an executory devise in that a devise is created by will, a use by deed; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 385, Butler's note; Wilson, Uses. It differs from a shifting use, though often confounded therewith. See, generally, 2 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 281*.

SPUILZIE (spoliatio). In Scotch Law. The taking away movables without the consent of the owner or order of law. Stair, Inst. 96, § 16; Bell, Dict.

SPY. One who enters the enemy's lines secretly or in disguise, or upon false pretences, for the purpose of obtaining information. The punishment, if captured, flagrante delicto, is death. But if a spy rejoins his own army and is afterwards captured, he cannot be treated as a spy.

The employment of spies in time of war is recognized as a military necessity. The Brussels Conference admitted no distinction between a merely mercenary spy and one who acts from purely patriotic motives. See Risley, Law of War 121.

SQUATTER. One who settles on the lands of others without any legal authority; this term is applied particularly to persons who settle on the public land. 3 Mart. La. N. S. 293. See PRE-EMPTION RIGHT.

STAB. To make a wound with a pointed instrument. A stab differs from a cut or a wound. Russ. & R. 356; Russ. Cr. 597; Bac. Abr. Maihem (B).

STABILIA. A writ called by that name, founded on a custom of Normandy, that where a man in power claimed lands in the possession of an inferior, he petitioned the prince that it might be put into his hands till the right was decided, whereupon he had this writ. Whart. Law Lex.

STAGNUM (Lat.). A pool. It is said to consist of land and water; and therefore by the name of stagnum the water and the land may be passed. Co. Litt. 5.

STAKE LANDS. Tide lands belonging to the state are held not to be stake lands. 7 Wash. 150.

STAKE RACE. See SWEEPSTAKES.

STAKEHOLDER. A third person chosen by two or more persons to keep in deposit property the right or possession of which is contested between them, and to be delivered to the one who shall establish his right to it. Thus, each of them is considered as depositing the whole thing. This distinguishes this contract from that which takes place when two or more tenants in common deposit a thing with a bailee. Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 1, t. 7, s. 4; 1 Vern. 44, n. 1.

A person having in his hands money or other property claimed by several others is considered in equity as a stakeholder. 1 Vern. 144.

A mere depositary for both parties of the money advanced by them respectively with a naked authority to deliver it over upon the proposed contingency. He is not regarded as a party to the illegal contract. 117 Mass. 562.

The duties of a stakeholder are to deliver the thing holden by him to the person entitled to it on demand. It is frequently questionable who is entitled to it. In case of an unlawful wager, although he may be justified in delivering the thing to the winner, by the express or implied consent of the loser; 8 Johns. 147; yet if before the event has happened he has been required by either party to give up the thing deposited with him by such party, he is bound so to deliver it; 3 Taunt. 377; 4 id. 492; or if, after the event has happened, the losing party give notice to the stakeholder not to pay the winner, a payment made to him afterwards will be made in his own wrong, and the party who deposited the money or thing may recover it from the stakeholder; 16 S. & R. 147; 7 Term 536; 8 id. 575; 2 Marsh. 542. See 5 Wend. 250; 1 Bail. 486, 503; WAGER; HORSE RACE.

A deposit of stakes by one of the parties in a match may be recovered back on demand from the stakeholder, as upon a void contract; 1 Q. B. D. 189; 5 App. Ca. 342, overruling 5 C. B. 818.

STALE DEMAND. A claim which has been for a long time undemanded: as, for example, where there has been a delay of twelve years unexplained. 3 Mas. 161.

STALLAGE (Sax. stal). The liberty or right of pitching or erecting stalls in fairs or markets, or the money paid for the same. Blount; Whart. Dict.; 6 Q. B. 31.

STALLARIUS (Lat.). In Saxon Law. The præfectus stabuli, now master of the horse (Sax. stalstabulum). Blount. Sometimes one who has a stall in a fair or market. Fl. lib. 4, c. 28, p. 13.

STAMP. An impression made by order of the government, on paper, which must be used in reducing certain contracts to writing, for the purpose of raising a revenue. See Stark. Ev.; 1 Phill. Ev. 444.

A paper bearing an impression or device authorized by law and adopted for attachment to some subject of duty or excise.

The term in American law is used often in distinction from stamped paper, which latter meaning, as well as that of the device or impression itself, is included in the broader signification of the word.

Stamps or stamped paper are prepared under the direction of officers of the government, and sold at a price equal to the duty or excise to be collected. The stamps are affixed and cancelled; and where stamped paper is used, one use obviously prevents a second use. The Internal Revenue acts of the United States of 1862 and subsequent years required stamps to be affixed to a great variety of subjects, under severe penalties in the way of fines, and also under penalty of invalidating written instruments and rendering them incapable of being produced in evidence. The statutes under which these stamps were required had been repealed from time to time, and that method of raising revenue was discontinued except in the case of tobacco and possibly some other articles. The necessity of raising additional revenue to meet the expenditures required for the Spanish-American war of 1898 led to the passage of what was known as the War Revenue Act of June 13, 1898, under which stamps are now required on almost every kind of document. The stamp taxes imposed by this act will be found in schedule A of the act, stat. 55 Cong. 2d Sess. 458.

Instruments not duly stamped are not void or inadmissible in evidence, in the absence of a fraudulent intent; 39 Vt. 412; 53 Pa. 176; 26 Wis. 163; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 51; 47 N. Y. 467; 7 Am. Rep. 468; see 82 Pa. 280; in the absence of affirmative proof, a fraudulent intent will not be presumed; cases supra. See PORTAGE.

If a foreign instrument is, by the laws of the country where it is made, void for want of a stamp, it cannot be enforced in England. But if those laws merely require that it must be stamped before it can be received in evidence there, it is admissible in England without a stamp; 5 Exch. 279. The revenue act of 1898 is too recent to have been the subject of finished litigation at the time this title goes to the press. One question raised in the courts, but not yet decided, is whether the stamp tax on express receipts are to be paid by the carrier or whether they may be added by him to his charges for freight or expressage.

Under the previous revenue acts imposing stamp taxes the question arose as to the exact legal effect of the requirement that an instrument should be stamped, and whether if an unstamped instrument was wholly invalid the law made it necessary to have certain contracts in writing which would otherwise be valid by parol, as for instance, the contract of insurance. The suggestion that the passage of these laws requiring a stamp might make it necessary that such contracts should be in writing was made in 2 Kan. 347; but this doctrine is said not to be well founded; 1 May, Ins., 3d ed. § 25; and in New York it was held that the validity of a parol contract for insurance was not affected by the stamp act, that, if in writing, it would require to be stamped, but it might be oral; 44 N. Y. 538. The power of congress to declare unstamped instruments wholly void was seriously doubted; 1 Bush 238; 45 Ill. 29; and the doubt went so far as to deny the constitutional right of the federal government to determine rules of evidence by which the state courts should be governed; May, Ins. § 85; 101 Mass. 243. Some of the cases hold that congress cannot prohibit the making of contracts permitted by state laws, and that to declare them void is not a proper penalty for the enforcement of tax laws; Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 592; 50 Mich. 505; 105 Mass. 49; 22 Ind. 276; 40 Ala. 385; 19 Wis. 369. See, also, 1 Joyce, Ins. § 33.

STAND. To abide by a thing; to submit to a decision; to comply with an agreement.

STANDARD. In War. An ensign or flag used in war.

In Measures. A weight or measure of certain dimensions, to which all other weights and measures must correspond: as, a standard bushel. Also, the quality of certain metals, to which all others of the same kind ought to be made to conform: as, standard gold, standard silver. See DOLLAR; EAGLE.

STANDARD POLICY. See POLICY.

STANDING ASIDE JURORS. In order to mitigate the effect of the statute 33 Edw. I. which forbade the challenging of jurors by the crown excepting for cause shown, a rule of practice gradually arose of permitting the prosecution to direct jurors to stand aside until the whole panel was exhausted, without showing cause. The validity of this practice has been repeatedly upheld in England; 26 How. St. Tr. 1231.

In the United States this statute became a part of the fundamental law after the revolution; Baldw. 78, 82; 8 Phila. 440; 22 Pa. 94; 7 Watts 585; and notwithstanding statutes of various states granting to the prosecution a number of peremptory challenges, the custom of standing aside has been preserved. This practice has been opposed where the statutes allowing peremptory challenges are in force, but where the number allowed is very small, it has heretofore been allowed to continue. See Thomp. & Mer. Juries 147; 14 Cent. L. J. 402.

The practice applies in misdemeanors as well as felonies, although there is a peremptory right of challenge; 39 Leg. Int. 384.

STANDING BY. This term, as so often used in discussing cases of estoppel, does not mean actual presence or actual participation in the transaction, but it means silence where there is knowledge and a duty to make a disclosure. 93 Ind. 573; 6 id. 289.

STANDING MUTE. See MUTE; PEINE FORTE ET DURE.

STANDING ORDERS. General regulations of the procedure of the two houses of the parliamentary body, respecting the manner in which its business shall be conducted.

STANNARY COURTS (stannary, —from Lat. stannum, Cornish stean, tin,—a tin mine).

In English Law. Courts of record, in Devonshire and Cornwall, England, for the administration of justice among the tinners therein. They are of the same limited and exclusive nature as those of the counties palatine.

By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, the plaintiff may choose between the stannary court and the county court of the district in which the cause of action arises.

STAPLE. In International Law. The right of staple, as exercised by a people upon foreign merchants, is defined to be that they may not allow them to set their merchandises and wares to sale but in a certain place.

This practice is not in use in the United States. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 103; Co. 4th Inst. 238; Bac. Abr. Execution (B 1). See STATUTE STAPLE.

STAPLE INN. An inn of chancery. See INNS OF COURT.

STAR-CHAMBER. See COURT OF STAR-CHAMBER.

STAR PAGE. The line and word at which the pages of the first edition of a book began are frequently marked by a star in later editions, and always should be.

STARE DECISIS (Lat.). To abide by, or adhere to, decided cases. Stare decisis et non quieta movere. It is a general maxim that when a point has been settled by decision, it forms a precedent which is not afterwards to be departed from. The rule as stated is "to abide by former precedents, stare decisis, where the same points come again in litigation, as well to keep the scale of justice even and steady, and not liable to waver with every new judge's opinion, as also because, the law in that case being solemnly declared and determined, what before was uncertain, and perhaps indifferent, is now become a permanent rule, which it is not in the breast of any subsequent judge to alter or swerve from according to his private sentiments; he being sworn to determine, not according to his own private judgment, but according to the known laws and customs of the land,—not delegated to pronounce a new law, but to maintain and expound the old one—jus dicere et non jus dare." Broom. Leg. Max., 7th ed. 147. As it was said more briefly by Alderson, B., "My duty is plain. It is to expound and not to make the law to decide on it as I find it, not as I may wish it to be;" 7 Exch. 543, quoted by Coltman, J., in 4 C. B. 560.

The doctrine of stare decisis is not always to be relied upon; for the courts find it necessary to overrule cases which have been decided contrary to principle. It should not be pressed too far; 8 Gr. Bag 257. Many hundreds of such overruled cases may be found in the American and English reports. It is held that it should require very controlling considerations to induce any court to break down a former decision, and lay again the foundations of the law; 7 How. (Miss.) 569.

The doctrine of stare decisis is a salutary one and is to be adhered to on proper occasions, in respect of decisions directly upon points in issue; but the supreme court should not extend any decision upon a constitutional question if it is convinced that error in principle might supervene; 157 U. S. 429; and there are cases in which a court of last resort has felt constrained by a sense of duty to disregard all precedents, even their own. This is particularly so in constitutional questions involving the validity of statutes affecting public interests, but where no right of property or contract inter partes is involved. In such a case, said Bleckley, C. J., the maxim for a supreme court "supreme in the majesty of duty as well as in the majesty of power," is not stare decisis, but fiat justitia ruat coelum; 87 Ga. 691, and it was said by Howard, J., in quoting this language: "Let this decision be right whether other decisions were right or not;" 144 Ind. 593 (involving the validity of statutes of apportionment of legislative representatives). And a court when asked to do so should consider how far its action would affect transactions entered into and acted upon, under the law as it exists; 11 Tex. 455. Where there have been a series of decisions by the supreme judicial tribunal of a state, the rule of stare decisis may usually be regarded as impregnable, except by legislative act: 29 Ind. 470. Especially is this the case where the law has become settled as a rule of property, and titles have become vested on the strength of it; 44 Mo. 206; and even an isolated decision will not be reversed when it has remained undisputed for a long time, and rights to land have been acquired under it; 31 Cal. 402; 22 Cal. 110. The court will not overrule cases upon which conveyancers may have relied, even though the court does not consider the case a sensible decision; [1891] 1 Ch. 258. It has been said that the doctrine of stare decisis has greater or less force according to the nature of the question decided, those questions where the decisions do not constitute a business rule, e. g. as where personal liberty is involved, will be met only by the general considerations which favor certainty and stability in the law; but where a decision relates to the validity of certain modes of transacting business, and a change of decision must necessarily invalidate everything done in the mode prescribed by the former case, as in the manner of executing deeds or wills, the maxim becomes imperative, and no court is at liberty to change it; 15 Wisc. 691. An erroneous decision subsequently overruled, though the law of the particular case, and binding on the parties, does not conclude other parties having rights depending on the same question; 52 Minn. 59. The United States courts will follow the decisions of those of the several states in interpreting state laws; but when the decisions of the state courts are unsettled and conflicting the rule does not apply; 1 Wall. 205; 5 Wall. 772; 37 Fed. Rep. 323; 35 id. 357. When titles to real estate depend on any compact between states, the rule of decision will not be drawn from either of the states; 11 Pet. 1; but where any principle of law is laid down by a state court regarding a sale of real property; 6 Wall. 723; or concerning the title to land; 37 Fed. Rep. 767; 125 U. S. 309; 128 id. 212; the violation of a charter by a state corporation; 7 How. 198; that a particular corporation is a corporation of that state; 45 Fed. Rep. 812; the payment of taxes; 7 Wall. 71; the United States courts will follow it in analogous cases; 7 How. 738. In matters relating to the construction of treaties, constitutional provisions, or laws of the United States, the authority of the federal courts is paramount, while e converso in the construction of state constitutions and state laws, the decisions of the state courts are final within their jurisdiction; 23 Miss. 498; Wells, Res. Adj. & Stare Decisis 583. The doctrine of stare decisis will not be applied by the circuit court of appeals to those decisions of the circuit courts from which no appeal has been taken; 29 U. S. App. 12. A decision of one of the circuit courts of the United States is not necessarily binding on the others; 47 Fed. Rep. 604; but see 46 Fed. Rep. 854; 53 id. 791; 40 id. 677. See RES JUDICATA. On a question of jurisprudence the circuit court of appeals is bound by a decision of the United States supreme court, but not the highest courts of the various states; 35 U. S. App. 67. See Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 137; Greenl. Overruled Cases; 1 Kent 477; Livingston, Syst. of Pen. Law 104; 35 Cent. L. J. 322; 32 id. 486. See Jenkins, Century vi., for a list of curious aphorisms on this subject; AUTHORITIES; PRECEDENTS; JUDGE-MADE LAW; JUDICIAL LEGISLATION; JUDICIAL POWER.

STARE IN JUDICIO (Lat.). To appear before a tribunal, either as plaintiff or defendant.

START. This term is not limited to setting out upon a journey or a race; it means, as well, the commencement of an enterprise or an undertaking. 54 Ia. 721.
