LAW DICTIONARY.

J.

JACENS. In abeyance. Toml.

JACENS HÆREDITAS. See HÆREDITAS JACENS.

JACET IN ORE. It lies in the mouth. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 5, § 49.

JACOBUS. A gold coin an inch and three-eighths in diameter, in value about twenty-five shillings, so called from James I., in whose reign it was first coined.

It was also called broad, laurel, and broad-piece. Its value is sometimes put at twenty-four shillings, but Macaulay speaks of a salary of eight thousand Jacobuses as equivalent to ten thousand pounds sterling. Hist. Eng. ch. xv. A cut of this coin showing both sides will be found in the Century Dictionary, sub v. broad.

JACTITATION. Boasting of something which is challenged by another. Moz. & W.

The word is used principally with reference to jactitation of marriage, which title see. In Louisiana, it is the name used as an action for slander of title to land.

Jactitation of right to a seat in a church appears to be the boasting by a man that he has a right or title to a pew or sitting in a church to which he has legally no title.

Jactitation of tithes is the boasting by a man that he is entitled to certain tithes, to which he has legally no title. See Rog. Ecc. L. 482.

JACTITATION OF MARRIAGE. In English Ecclesiastical Law. The untruthful boasting by an individual that he or she has married another, from which it may happen that they will acquire the reputation of being married to each other. 3 Bla. Com. 93. It was held that the boasting must be malicious as well as false; 2 Hagg. 220, 280.

The ecclesiastical courts formerly might in such cases entertain a libel by the party injured, and on proof of the facts enjoin the wrong-doer to perpetual silence, and, as a punishment, make him pay the costs; 3 Bla. Com. 93; 2 Hagg. Cons. 423, 285; 2 Chitty, Pr. 459.

The jurisdiction of such a suit would now be in the Probate, Divorce, and Matrimonial Division, but the remedy is now rarely resorted to, as, in general, since Lord Hardwicke's act (1766), there is sufficient certainty in the forms of legal marriage in England to prevent any one being in ignorance whether he or she is really married or not—a reproach which, however, is often made against the law of Scotland. The Scotch suit of a declarator of putting to silence, which is equivalent to jactitation of marriage, is often resorted to, a notorious instance of its use being that in the Yelverton marriage case; 1 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d ser. 161.

JACTURA (Lat. jaceo, to throw). A jettison (q. v.).

JACTUS (Lat.). A throwing goods overboard to lighten or save the vessel, in which case the goods so sacrificed are a proper subject for general average. Dig. 14. 2, de lege Rhodia de jactu; 1 Pardessus, Collec. des Lois marit. 104; Kuricke, Inst. Marit. Hanseat tit. 8; 1 Par. Mar. Law 288, note.

JAIL. See GAOL; PRISON.

JACTUS LAPILLI (Lat. the throwing down of a stone). In Civil Law. A method of preventing the acquisition of title by prescription by interrupting the possession. The real owner of land on which another was building, and thereby acquiring title by usucapion (q. v.), could challenge the intrusion and interrupt the prescription by throwing down a stone from the building before witnesses called upon to note the transaction.

JAMUNLINGI, JAMUNDILINGI. Freemen who delivered themselves and property to the protection of a more powerful person, in order to avoid military service and other burdens. Spelman, Gloss. Also, a species of serfs among the Germans. Du Cange. The same as commendati.

JAMUNLINGUS. Commendatus (q. v.).

JANITOR. A person employed to take charge of rooms or buildings, to see that they are kept clean and in order, to lock and unlock them, and generally to care for them. 84 N. Y. 352. See FLAT.

Formerly, a door-keeper. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 24.

JAPAN. An empire of Asia, consisting of four islands lying in the Pacific Ocean east of China, Korea, and Siberia. The government is a limited monarchy administered by an emperor, and what may be termed a cabinet and privy council. The constitution was promulgated in 1889. There is an imperial parliament consisting of two houses. The house of peers is partly hereditary and partly elective, a limited number being nominated by the emperor. The house of commons consists of three hundred members elected by the people. The great council or cabinet consists of ten members, and the sumitsuin, established in 1888, is very similar to the English privy council. The empire is divided for administrative purposes into three fu and forty-three ken (prefectures), and there is a political subdivision into eighty-five provinces. There are numerous courts by which justice is administered in accordance with modern jurisprudence. The daishin-in, or supreme court, is a court of appeal in all except district court cases, and its decisions are binding on the lower courts. It has, like the German imperial court, original and exclusive jurisdiction of treason and capital crimes. The chihosaibansho, or provincial court, is the general court of original jurisdiction for civil cases and also criminal cases, except treason, capital crimes, and charges against the imperial family. It also has jurisdiction in bankruptcy. The koso-in, or superior court, is an intermediate court of appeal for cases from the provincial court and of final appeal for cases from the district court. The ku-saibansho, or district court, has jurisdiction of civil cases to the amount of 100 yen, and of other cases without limitation of amount where (as we would express it) the venue is local, such as suits concerning rents, boundaries, or possession; also of suits on contracts, of employment for less than a year, bailments, guardianships, and custody of various registers, as of ships, land, patents, trade-marks, and the like. The judges are appointed for life and are irremovable except by a special law. The feudal system was abolished in 1871.

For an extended review of the "Administration of Justice in Japan," see a series of articles by Professor John H. Wigmore, 36 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 437, 491, 571, 628.

JAVELOUR. In Scotch Law. Jailor or gaoler. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 33.

JEOFAILE (L. Fr.). I have failed; I am in error.

Certain statutes are called statutes of amendments and jeofailes, because, where a pleader perceives any slip in the form of his proceedings, and acknowledges the error (jeofaile), he is at liberty, by those statutes, to amend it. The amendment, however, is seldom made; but the benefit is attained by the court's overlooking the exception; 3 Bla. Com. 407; 1 Saund. 228, n. 1; Doct. Pl. 297; Dane, Abr. These statutes do not apply to indictments.

JEOPARDY. Peril; danger.

The term is used in this sense in the act establishing and regulating the post-office department. The words of the act are, "or if, in effecting such robbery of the mail the first time, the offender shall wound the person having the custody thereof, or put his life in jeopardy by the use of dangerous weapons, such offender shall suffer death." 3 Story, Laws U. S. 1992. See Baldw. 93–95.

The situation of a prisoner when a trial jury is sworn and impanelled to try his case upon a valid indictment, and such jury has been charged with his deliverance. 1 Bail. 655; 7 Blackf. 191; 1 Gray 490; 38 Me. 574, 586; 23 Pa. 12; 12 Vt. 93.

It is the peril in which a prisoner is put when he is regularly charged with a crime before a tribunal properly organized and competent to try him; 121 Pa. 109.

This is the sense in which the term is used in the United States constitution: "no person . . . shall be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," U. S. Const. art. v. Amend., and in the statutes or constitutions of most if not all of the states.

This provision in the constitution of the U. S. binds only the United States; 2 Cow. 819; 5 How. 410; 20 S. C. 392; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 981. At one time it was not uniformly so considered, and it was held contra, 2 Pick. 521; 18 Johns. 187; Walker, Miss. 134. This was the same fluctuation of judicial opinion as to the effect of the early constitutional amendments which affected other questions. See EMINENT DOMAIN. In this country this rule depends in most cases on constitutional provisions. In England it is said to be one of the universal maxims of the common law; 4 Bla. Com. 335; and Stephen in repeating the expression adds in a note that although Blackstone uses the term "jeopardy of his life," it is not confined to capital offences, and extends to misdemeanors; 4 Steph. Com. 384; 3 B. & C. 502. In a leading case where the question was considered whether the rule applied when a jury had been discharged for want of agreement it was held that the court had authority in its discretion to discharge the jury in such a case, and that such action did not operate as an acquittal. This is also the prevailing opinion in this country. See infra. In the English case referred to, it was said by Cockburn, C. J., that in considering the question of the right to discharge a jury in such case they were not dealing with one of those principles which lie at the foundation of the law, but with a matter of practice, which has fluctuated at various times, and "even at the present day may perhaps be considered as not finally settled;" L. R. 1 Q. B. 289. This would seem to be a more reasonable construction of the language of Lord Cockburn than that sometimes put upon it. See 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 982. That which he characterized as a mere matter of practice was not the existence of the doctrine of jeopardy, but whether it was applicable.

The constitutional provision, which refers to "life or limb," properly interpreted, extends only to treason and felonies, but it has usually been extended to misdemeanors; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 990; 26 Ala. 135; but not to proceedings for the recovery of penalties, nor to applications for sureties of the peace; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 990.

A person is in legal jeopardy when he is put upon trial, before a court of competent jurisdiction, upon indictment or information which is sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and a jury has been charged with his deliverance; Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 404; approved in 9 Bush 333; 21 Alb. L. J. 398; 77 Cal. 183.

The discharge of a competent jury without defendant's consent, express or implied, without sufficient cause, operates as an acquittal; 62 Mich. 307; 76 Cal. 57; 88 Ala. 96.

But where the indictment was good and the judgment erroneously arrested, the verdict was held to be a bar; 2 Yerg. 24.

After a jury has been impanelled and sworn in a criminal case, the trial cannot stop short of a verdict without the defendant's consent except for imperative reasons, such as the illness of a juror, the judge, or the defendant, the absence of a juror, or a disagreement. The absence of a witness for the state is not sufficient unless by consent of the accused, and his consent is not established by the mere fact that, being without counsel, he does not object to a postponement; 25 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 220. The discharge of a jury on the last day of the term after they have for five days failed to agree upon a verdict, made against the objection of the defendant, bars another trial for the same offence; 121 Pa. 109; contra, 111 N. C. 695; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 602.

Where one of the jurors is discharged because of the death of his mother, and the court declared a mistrial, a plea of former jeopardy is not good; 91 Ga. 831.

An order of an examining magistrate, either committing or discharging the accused, is not a bar to a second hearing on the same charge; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 729.

But it has been held by the United States Supreme Court, that where a jury in a criminal case is discharged during the trial and the defendant subsequently put on trial before another jury, he is not twice put in jeopardy within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution; 142 U. S. 148; and in a later case it is said that a jury may be discharged from giving any verdict, whenever the court is of opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and may also order a trial before another jury, and a defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy; 155 U. S. 271. This case is quite in accord with an English decision made upon much consideration; L. R. 1 Q. B. 289; and Bishop, as the result of a very extended examination and citation of authorities, concludes: "But in England and Ireland, at present, and in most of our states, when a reasonable time for discussion and reflection has been given the jury, and they have in open court declared themselves unable to agree, and the judge is satisfied of the truth of the declaration, they may be discharged and the prisoner held to be tried anew. And this doctrine is applied as well in felony as in misdemeanor." Bish. Cr. L. § 1033. See JURY.

It has been held that the accused was not in jeopardy, and may be again put upon trial, if the court had no jurisdiction of the cause; 7 Mich. 161; or one of its members is related to the prisoner and under a statute the conviction is void; 142 N. Y. 130; or if the indictment was so defective that no valid judgment could be rendered upon it; 36 Ga. 447; 105 Mass. 53; or if by any overruling necessity the jury are discharged without a verdict; 9 Wheat. 579; 68 N. C. 203; or if the term of the court comes to an end before the trial is finished; 5 Ind. 290; or the jury are discharged with the consent of the defendant, express or implied; 9 Metc. 572; or if after verdict against the accused it has been set aside on his motion for a new trial or on writ of error, or the judgment thereon has been arrested; 13 Johns. 351; 8 Kan. 232; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 469, n.; 7 Mont. 489; 127 Ill. 507; 41 Minn. 50; 111 N. C. 695; 64 Cal. 260; 33 Fla. 389; or where there is any irregularity of verdict which will compel a reversal upon the application of the accused; 88 Ala. 96; 77 Cal. 213. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 404–5; Von Holst, Const. L. 260; Story, Const. § 1787.

Where a prisoner during his trial fled the jurisdiction, and it became necessary to discharge the jury, it was held that he was never in jeopardy; 13 Reporter 105; s. c. 59 Cal. 357.

The constitutional guaranty is against two trials for the same offence, and the decisions as to what constitutes identity of the offences are not uniform. They are collected in 1 N. Cr. L. §§ 1048–69, by Mr. Bishop, who lays down the following rules as sustained by just principle: "They are not the same when (1) the two indictments are so diverse as to preclude the same evidence from maintaining both; or when (2) the evidence to the first and that to the second relate to different transactions, whatever be the words of the respective allegations; or when (3) each indictment sets out an offence differing in all its elements from that in the other, though both relate to one transaction,—a proposition of which the exact limits are difficult to define; or when (4) some technical variance precludes a conviction on the first indictment, but does not appear on the second.

On the other side, (5) the offences are the same whenever evidence adequate to the one indictment will equally sustain the other. Moreover, (6) if the two indictments set out like offences and relate to one transaction, yet if one contain more of criminal charge than the other, but upon it there could be a conviction for what was embraced in the other, the offences, though of different names, are, within our constitutional guaranty, the same." The author considers the test to be, "whether if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction; when there could, the second cannot be maintained; when there could not, it can be;" id. § 1052, and cases cited in notes.

Where the greater offence includes a lesser one, a verdict on an indictment for the minor offence only is a bar to a trial on an indictment for the greater offence, and the same principle applies if the jury are out in the first case when the second is called; 149 Pa. 35. In this case, this was said to be not a mere technical rule of procedure, but a substantial one founded in reason, and in harmony with the constitutional mandate that no person shall be subject to be twice in jeopardy for the same offence.

There is some difference of opinion, however, in the application of this rule in homicide cases. If a prisoner is put on trial for murder and convicted of manslaughter and that verdict is set aside, on defendant's application for a new trial or an appeal, he cannot again be tried for murder; 11 Ia. 350; 54 Ill. 325; 41 La. Ann. 610; on this principle it has been held that if a prisoner has been indicted for murder, convicted of murder in the second degree, and afterwards granted a new trial on his own motion, he cannot, on the second trial, be convicted of a higher crime than murder in the second degree; 33 Wis. 121; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 748, n.; 35 Mo. 105; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 246; 31 Fla. 262; 72 Ala. 201 (see 99 Cal. 227); contra, 20 Ohio St. 572; 8 Kan. 232; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 469, n. A distinction has been made in some cases based upon the theory that the two lower grades of homicide do not bear the same relation to the offence charged. Manslaughter is clearly a different crime from that charged, and a conviction of that offence is therefore an acquittal of the graver one. But it has been said that the division of murder into two degrees does not make two offences and the same rule should not apply; 65 Cal. 232; 67 Vt. 465. Indeed the whole theory is that, when the defendant obtains a reversal, the conviction of the lesser crime is an acquittal of the graver one, so that another trial would be within the prohibition against putting the accused twice in jeopardy; 18 Neb. 57; 20 Ohio St. 572; 8 Kan. 232; 60 Ind. 291; 83 Ky. 1; 11 Mo. App. 92. But it is said that "the weight of authority is that securing a new trial only operates to set aside conviction and not the verdict so far as it operates as an acquittal;" 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 390; 30 Wis. 216; 13 Tex. 168. If it is an acquittal pro tanto nothing less than constitutional amendment can remove the effect of the general provision as to jeopardy; 107 U. S. 221. In some state constitutions, as those of Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, and Missouri, the usual declaration securing a person from being put twice in jeopardy is modified by a further provision that if the jury disagree, or if the judgment be arrested after verdict or reversed for error in law, the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy; Ark. II. 8; Colo. II. 18; Ga. I. 8; Mo. II. 23.

Statutes which provide for a severer punishment when a criminal is convicted of a second or third offence are not in violation of the constitutional provision that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. The doctrine is that the subsequent punishment is not imposed for the first offence, but for persistence in crime; 2 Pick. 165; 158 Mass. 598; 115 Ill. 583; 48 Wis. 647; 47 Cal. 113; 159 U. S. 673, aff. 121 Mo. 514.

The question of former jeopardy cannot be passed upon by the supreme court on habeas corpus proceedings, but is a proper plea in bar, to be tried by the lower court; 32 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 1063.

Whether an offence is one against the laws of the state or against the United States, and whether the same act may be an offence against both, punishable by each, without infringing upon the constitutional guaranty against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offence, are questions which a state court of original jurisdiction is competent to decide in the first instance, and the proper time to invoke the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States is after the highest state court has passed upon the question adversely to the accused; 155 U. S. 89. See NON BIS IN IDEM; AUTREFOIS ACQUIT; JURY.

JERGUER. In English Law. An officer of the custom-house, who oversees the waiters. Techn. Dict.

JET. In French Law. Jettison (q. v.).

JETTISON, JETSAM. The casting out of a vessel, from necessity, a part of the lading. The thing so cast out.

It differs from flotsam in this, that in the latter the goods float, while in the former they sink, and remain under water. It differs also from ligan.

The jettison must be made for sufficient cause, and not for groundless timidity; 66 Fed. Rep. 776; 57 id. 403. It must be made in a case of extremity, when the ship is in danger of perishing by the fury of a storm, or is laboring upon rocks or shallows, or is closely pursued by pirates or enemies.

If the residue of the cargo be saved by such sacrifice, the property saved is bound to pay a proportion of the loss. In ascertaining such average loss, the goods lost and saved are both to be valued at the price they would have brought at the place of delivery on the ship's arrival there, freight, duties, and other charges being deducted; Marsh. Ins. 246; 3 Kent 185; Park. Ins. 123; Pothier, Charte-partie, n. 108; Boulay-Paty, Dr. Com. tit. 13; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 734; 1 Ware 9. The owner of a cargo jettisoned has a maritime lien on the vessel for the contributory share from the vessel on an adjustment of the average, which may be enforced by a proceeding in rem in the admiralty; 19 How. 162; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 373. See Abbott; Kay, Shipping; AVERAGE; ADJUSTMENT; DERELICT.

JEUX DE BOURSE. In French Law. A kind of gambling or speculation, which consists of sales and purchases which bind neither of the parties to deliver the things which are the object of the sale, and which are settled by paying the difference in the value of the things sold between the day of the sale and that appointed for delivery of such things. 1 Pardessus, Droit Com. n. 162.

JEWEL. A precious stone; a gem; a personal ornament, consisting more or less of precious stones. Ornaments intended to be worn on the person.

The precise meaning of the word was discussed by Shaw, C. J., in 14 Pick. 370. He said: "The question whether plain gold earrings and knobs, without any precious stone, pearl, or other gem set in them, constitute jewelry." "Jewelry is not found in any English dictionary, and is probably an Americanism. It is defined in Webster to be jewels in general. He defines 'jewel' to be 'an ornament worn by ladies,' 'a pendant in the ear.' It is manifest, however, that these are put by way of instances, and not intended as strict definitions. The term 'bijou,' which seems to be nearly analogous to it in the French language, is defined to be 'a little work of ornament, valuable (precieux) for its workmanship or by its material. Cette femme a de beaux bijoux.' Dict. de l'Acad. The counsel on both sides cited passages of Scripture to show, on the one side, that the translators of the common version included ornaments of gold under the name of jewels, and on the other, to show that by a distinct enumeration they excluded them. These instances do little more than show that, though the argument founded on them is at first view plausible, it would be entirely unsafe to rely upon it as a ground of legal construction. Nor can much more reliance be placed upon lexicographers; they are necessarily confined, in a considerable degree, to generalities, and cannot ordinarily go into minute and very accurate distinctions. On the best consideration we have been able to give the subject, we are satisfied that the legislature, in the use of the word 'jewelry,' intended to employ it as a generic term, of the largest import, including all articles under the genus. Without attempting to define the term used in the statute, we are all of opinion that earrings and ear-knobs are included under the term jewelry, as it was used in the statute."

It has been held that a watch is not a "jewel ornament," "it is not carried or used as a jewel or ornament, but as a timepiece or chronometer, an article of ordinary wear by most travellers of every class, and of daily and hourly use by all. It is as useful and necessary to the guest in his room as out of it, in the night as in the day-time. It is carried for use and convenience, and not for ornament." 43 N. Y. 539. See also, to the same effect, 33 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 271.

The meaning of the word is most frequently drawn into question in cases involving the construction of statutes limiting the liability of innkeepers for money, jewelry, or valuables not deposited in the safe. In such a case it was said, "The watch, and pen and pencil case are certainly valuables, and perhaps might be called jewels, but I think should be considered a part of the traveller's personal clothing or apparel. The legislature certainly did not expect the traveller, after retiring, to send down his ordinary clothing or apparel to be deposited in the safe;" 36 Barb. 70; but under a similar statute specifying money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture, a gold watch was held to be included as an article of gold manufacture; 24 Wis. 241.

The meaning of the word is also frequently involved in cases arising under the tariff laws, which usually contain also the term "imitation jewelry." In such a case Lacombe, J., said: "The word jewelry is generally used as including articles of personal adornment, and the word further imports that the articles are of value in the community where they are used. . . . The articles of value used for personal adornment in our civilization are, and for centuries have been, the precious metals gold and silver, to which, I think, platina is now generally added, and what are known as the precious stones, the diamond, sapphire, ruby, etc." "There is such a thing as imitation jewelry. . . . If by a pleasing combination of appropriate materials, by an attractive arrangement of parts, an article is produced bearing a general resemblance to real jewelry ornaments, and suitable for similar uses, it may fairly be called imitation jewelry." 33 Fed. Rep. 709.

Where a jeweller claimed an exemption as tools of a debtor, of those which he himself worked with on watches as well as of those which his apprentice worked with on jewelry, and it being found by the jury that the principal business was that of jeweller, both were held to be exempt. The court said that the circumstance that he was also engaged in the business of repairing watches did not make him a watchmaker in distinction to a jeweller; . . . "this is rather part of the employment of a jeweller, as exercised in this country, than a distinct and separate occupation by himself." 2 Pick. 80.

Family jewels constitute one of the kinds of personal property for the unlawful detention of which the remedy at law is considered inadequate and equitable relief is sustained; Ad. Eq., 8th ed. 91.

They are also included in the paraphernalia (q. v.), and "even the jewels of a peeress have been held such;" 2 Bla. Com. 436.

Jewels of the wife, though given by her husband's will to her for life, were decreed to her absolutely, as her paraphernalia (q. v.), as against creditors who sought to have them sold to pay debts charged on real estate in aid of the testator's personal estate; 1 Bro. C. C.* 576.

JEWS. The name given to the descendants of the patriarch Abraham.

The Jews were exceedingly oppressed during the middle ages throughout Christendom. In France, a Jew was a serf, and his person and goods belonged to the baron on whose demesnes he lived. He could not change his domicil without permission of the baron, who could pursue him as a fugitive even on the domains of the king. Like an article of commerce, he might be lent or hired for a time, or mortgaged. If he became a Christian, his conversion was considered a larceny of the lord, and his property and goods were confiscated. They were allowed to utter their prayers only in a low voice and without chanting. They were not allowed to appear in public without some badge or mark of distinction. Christians were forbidden to employ Jews of either sex as domestics, physicians, or surgeons. Admission to the bar was forbidden to Jews. They were obliged to appear in court in person when they demanded justice for a wrong done them; and it was deemed disgraceful to an advocate to undertake the cause of a Jew. If a Jew appeared in court against a Christian, he was obliged to swear by the ten names of God and invoke a thousand imprecations against himself if he spoke not the truth. Sexual intercourse between a Christian man and a Jewess was deemed a crime against nature, and was punishable with death by burning. Quia est rem habere cum cane, rem habere a Christiano cum Judæa quæ CANIS reputatur: sic comburi debet; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, 108, 110. See Merlin, Répert. Juifs.

Under the Roman law the Jews were the subject of severe restrictive laws and were classed in the enactments of the Christian emperors with apostates, heretics, and heathens; Mack. Rom. L. § 152. Marriage with them was forbidden; id. § 555; and a Jew could not be the tutor of a Christian; id. § 616.

In the fifth book of the Decretals it is provided that if a Jew have a servant that desireth to be a Christian, the Jew shall be compelled to sell him to a Christian for twelve-pence; that it shall not be lawful for them to take any Christian to be their servant; that they may repair their old synagogues, but not build new; that it shall not be lawful for them to open their doors or windows on Good Friday; that their wives shall neither have Christian nurses, nor themselves be nurses to Christian women; that they wear different apparel from the Christians, whereby they may be known, etc. See Ridley's View of the Civ. and Eccl. Law, part 1, chap. 5, sect. 7; Madox, Hist. of Exch.

In England, the Jew could have nothing that was his own, for whatever he acquired he acquired not for himself but for the king; Bract. f. 386 b. For about a century and a half they were important elements in English history, as their greatest privilege was to be allowed to do things that were forbidden to Christians, notably, to take interest on money. This money-lending business required some governmental regulation, the king having a deep interest in it, for what was potentially owed to the Jew was owed to the king, and this matter could hardly be left to the English tribunals as they would do but scant justice to the Jew, and therefore but scant justice to the king who stood behind the Jew. In 1194, an edict was issued about the Jewish loans. In every town in which the Jews lived an office was established for the registration of their deeds. All loans and payments of loans were to be made under the eye of certain officers, some of them Christians, some of them Jews, and a copy or part of every deed was to be deposited in an ark or chest under official custody. A few years later a department of the royal exchequer—the exchequer of the Jews—was organized for the supervision of this business. At its head were a few "Justices of the Jews." This exchequer was, like the great exchequer, both a financial bureau and a judicial tribunal. It managed all the king's transactions—and there were many—with the Jews, saw to the exaction of tallages, reliefs, escheats, and forfeitures, and also acted judicially, not merely as between king and Jew, but also as between king and gentile, when, as often happened, the king had for some cause or another seized into his hand the debts due to one of his Jews by Christian debtors. Also it heard and determined all manner of disputes between Jew and Christian. 1 Pol. & M. 451.

This system could not work well; it oppressed both Jew and Englishman, and from the middle of the thirteenth century the king was compelled to rob them of their privileges, to forbid them to hold lands, and some efforts were made to induce them to give up their profession of usury, as was also done in France and elsewhere during the same period, but the fact is, that they were so heavily taxed by the sovereigns or governments of Christendom, and at the same time debarred from almost every other trade or occupation—partly by special decrees, partly by the vulgar prejudice—that they could not afford to prosecute ordinary vocations. In 1253 the Jews—no longer able to withstand the constant hardships to which they were subjected in person and property—begged of their own accord to be allowed to leave the country. Richard of Cornwall, however, persuaded them to stay. Ultimately, in 1290 A. D., they were driven from the shores of England, pursued by the execrations of the infuriated rabble, and leaving in the hands of the king all their property, debts, obligations, and mortgages, they emigrated for the most part to France and Germany.

Practically, the only disabilities to which Jews are now subject in England are, incompetence to fill certain high offices in the state (e. g. that of lord chancellor), and inability to present to an ecclesiastical benefice attached to an office in her majesty's gift. 3 Steph. Com. 88.

JOB. The whole of a thing which is to be done. In this sense it is employed in the Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 2727: "To build by plot, or to work by the job," says that article, "is to undertake a building for a certain stipulated price." See Duranton, du Contr. de Louage, liv. 3, t. 8, nn. 248, 263; Pothier, Contr. de Louage, nn. 392. 394. See DEVIATION.

JOBBER. In Commercial Law. One who buys and sells articles in bulk and resells them to dealers. Stock-jobbers are those who buy and sell stocks for others. This term is also applied to those who speculate in stocks on their own account.

JOCALIA (Lat.). Jewels (q. v.). This term was formerly more properly applied to those ornaments which women, although married, call their own. When these jocalia are not suitable to her degree, they are assets for the payment of debts; 1 Rolle, Abr. 911.

JOCKEY CLUB. An association of persons for the purpose of regulating all matters connected with horse racing.

Such a club is a private and not a quasi-public corporation, and may refuse to allow certain persons to enter horses for its races; 22 N. Y. S. 394; s. c. 2 Misc. Rep. 512. A grant by the state to such a corporation to make and register bets and sell pools on the result of its races is not a grant of state aid, but is merely a removal of the statutory prohibition against the exercise of a right existing at common law ; id.

JOINDER. In Pleading. Union ; concurrence.

Of Actions. In Civil Cases. The union of two or more causes of action in the same declaration.

At common law, to allow a joinder, the form of actions must be such that the same plea may be pleaded and the same judgment given on all the counts of the declaration, or, the counts being of the same nature, that the same judgment may be given on all ; 2 Saund. 177 c ; Comyns, Dig. Actions (G) ; 16 N. Y. 548 ; 4 Cal. 27 ; 12 La. Ann. 873 ; 33 N. H. 495. And all the causes of action must have accrued to the plaintiff or against the defendant ; 12 La. Ann. 44 ; in the same right, though it may have been by different titles. Thus, a plaintiff cannot join a demand in his own right to one as representative of another person, or against the defendant himself to one against him in a representative capacity ; 2 Viner, Abr. 62 ; Bacon, Abr. Action in General (C) ; 21 Barb. 245 ; 54 Fed. Rep. 985. See 25 Mo. 357. Nor can a cause of action in tort and in contract be joined ; 28 Abb. N. C. 317 ; nor a tort with a claim for money had and received ; 89 Ga. 154.

In real actions there can be but one count.

In mixed actions joinder occurs, though but infrequently ; 8 Co. 876 ; Poph. 24 ; Cro. Eliz. 290.

In personal actions joinder is frequent.

By statutes, in many of the states, joinder of actions is allowed and required to a greater extent than at common law.

In Criminal Cases. Different offences of the same general nature may be joined in the same indictment ; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 253, 255 ; 29 Ala. N. S. 62 ; 28 Miss. 267 ; 4 Ohio St. 440 ; 6 McLean 596 ; 4 Denio 133 ; 18 Me. 103 ; 1 Cheves 103 ; 4 Ark. 56 ; 158 Mass. 164 ; 25 Neb. 581 ; see 14 Gratt. 687 ; 30 Tex. App. 623 ; and it is no cause of arrest of judgment that they have been so joined ; 29 E. L. & Eq. 536 ; 29 N. H. 184 ; 11 Ga. 225 ; 3 W. & M. 164 ; see 1 Strobh. 455 ; but not in the same count ; 5 R. I. 385 ; 24 Mo. 353 ; 1 Rich. 260 ; 4 Humphr. 25 ; see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 182, note ; and an indictment may be quashed, in the discretion of the court, where the counts are joined in such manner as will confound the evidence ; 17 Mo. 544 ; 19 Ark. 568, 577 ; 20 Miss. 468.

No court, it is said, will, however, permit a prisoner to be tried upon one indictment for two distinct and separate crimes ; Steph. Cr. Proc. 154 ; 29 N. H. 184. See 5 S. & R. 59 ; 10 Cush. 530.

Where, out of precaution to meet every aspect of a single offence, an indictment charges distinct crimes, and no attempt is made to convict accused of disconnected offences, the state will not be compelled to elect on which he shall be tried ; 91 Ala. 87. Three separate offences, but not more, against the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5480, prohibiting the use of the mails with intent to defraud, when committed within the same six calendar months, may be joined, and when so joined there is to be a single sentence for all, but this does not prevent other indictments for other offences under the same statute committed within the same six calendar months ; 123 U. S. 672.

In Demurrer. The answer made to a demurrer. Co. Litt. 71 b. The act of making such answer is merely a matter of form, but must be made within a reasonable time ; 10 Rich. 49.

Of Issue. The act by which the parties to a cause arrive at that stage of it in their pleadings, that one asserts a fact to be so, and the other denies it. For example, when one party denies the fact pleaded by his antagonist, who has tendered the issue thus, "And this he prays may be inquired of by the country," or, "and of this he puts himself upon the country," the party denying the fact may immediately subjoin, "And the said A B does the like ;" when the issue is said to be joined.

Of Parties. In Civil Cases. In Equity. All parties materially interested in the subject of a suit in equity should be made parties, however numerous ; Mitf. Eq. Plead. 144 ; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 179 ; 1 Pet. 299 ; 13 id. 359 ; 7 Cra. 72 ; 2 Mas. 181 ; 5 McLean 444 ; 2 Paine 536 ; 1 Johns. Ch. 349 ; 2 Bibb 184 ; 24 Me. 20 ; 7 Conn. 342 ; 11 Gill & J. 426 ; 4 Rand. 451 ; 7 Ired. Eq. No. C. 261 ; 2 Stew. Ala. 280 ; either as plaintiffs or defendants, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind them all ; 133 U. S. 233, 579. But, where the parties are very numerous, and sue in the same right, a portion may in some cases appear for all in the same situation ; Beach, Eq. Pr. § 63 ; 16 Ves. 321 ; 16 How. 288 ; 11 Conn. 112 ; 3 Paige, Ch. 222 ; 19 Barb. 517. See 152 Mass. 128.

Mere possible or contingent interest does not render its possessor a necessary party ; 6 Wheat. 550 ; 3 Conn. 354 ; 5 Cow. 719. And see 3 Bibb 86 ; 6 J. J. Marsh. 425. Contingent remaindermen are not necessary parties to a suit to set aside the deed creating the remainder ; 143 Ill. 290 ; nor a residuary legatee to a bill filed by a legatee or creditor to assert a claim against the estate of a testator ; 17 N. J. Eq. 156.

There need be no connection but community of interest ; 2 Ala. N. S. 209. It is not indispensable that all the parties to a suit should have an interest in all the matters contained in the suit, but it will be sufficient if each party has an interest in same material matters in the suit, and they are connected with the others ; 128 U. S. 403.

A court of equity, even after final hearing on the merits and on appeal to the court of last resort, will compel the joinder of necessary parties ; 89 Mo. 284.

Plaintiffs. All persons having a unity of interest in the subject-matter ; 3 Barb. Ch. 397 ; 2 Ala. N. S. 209 ; and in the object to be attained ; 2 Ia. 55 ; 113 Mo. 348 ; 89 Va. 455 ; who are entitled to relief ; 14 Ala.

N. S. 135; may join as plaintiffs. The rights claimed must not arise under different contracts; 8 Pet. 123; 5 J. J. Marsh. 154; or be vested in the same person in different capacities; 1 Busb. Eq. 196. And see 1 Paige 637; 5 Metc. 118. Persons representing antagonistic interests cannot be joined as complainants; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 765.

But he should not be joined where he has parted with all his legal and beneficial interest; 32 Me. 203, 343; 13 B. Monr. 210. The assignee of a mere chose in action may sue in his own name, in equity; 17 How. 43; 5 Wisc. 270; 6 B. Monr. 540; 7 id. 273.

Corporations. Two or more may join if their interest is joint; 8 Ves. 706. A corporation may join with its individual members to establish an exemption on their behalf; 3 Anstr. 738. Corporations themselves are indispensable parties to a bill which affects their corporate rights or liabilities; 148 U. S. 603.

Husband and wife must join where the husband asserts an interest in behalf of his wife; 6 B. Monr. 514; 3 Hayw. 252; 5 Johns. Ch. 196; 9 Ala. 133; as, for a legacy; 5 Johns. Ch. 196; or for property devised or descended to her during coverture; 5 J. J. Marsh. 179, 600; or where he applies for an injunction to restrain a suit at law against both, affecting her interest; 1 Barb. Ch. 313. Where a widow sues to set aside a deed executed by herself and husband on the ground that it was procured by fraud, the administrator of the husband is not a necessary party; 58 Hun 605.

Under modern statutes for the enlargement of the rights and remedies of married women, it is in many cases unnecessary to join the husband in suits to which he was formerly a necessary party. See MARRIED WOMAN.

Idiots and lunatics may be joined or not in bills by their committees, at the election of the committee, to set aside acts done by them whilst under imbecility; 1 Ch. Cas. 112; 1 Jac. 377; 7 Johns. Ch. 139. They must be joined in suits brought for the partition of real estate; 3 Barb. Ch. 24. In England it seems to be the custom to join; 2 Vern. 678. See Story, Eq. Pl. § 64, and note; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1336, and note.

Infants. Several may join in the same bill for an account of the rents and profits of their estate; 2 Bland 68.

Trustee and cestui que trust should join in a bill to recover the trust fund: 5 Dana 128; but need not to foreclose a mortgage; 5 Ala. 447; 4 Abb. Pr. 106; nor to redeem one made by the trustee; 2 Gray 190. And see 3 Edw. Ch. 175; 7 Ala. N. S. 386.

An appeal may be prosecuted by one party to the record, as against another, without joining other parties who are in no way interested in the controversy; 80 Fed. Rep. 961.

Defendants. In general, all persons interested in the subject-matter of a suit who cannot be made plaintiffs should be made defendants. They may claim under different rights if they possess an interest centering in the point in issue; 4 Cow. 682. In order to obtain the rescission of a contract of sale, all of the parties interested in the property involved must be brought before the court; 52 Kan. 227.

Bills for discovery need not contain all the parties interested as defendants; 1 M'Cord, Ch. 301; and a person may be joined merely as defendant in such bill; 3 Ala. 214. A person should not be joined as a party to such bill who may be called as a witness on trial; 13 Ill. 212; 3 Barb. Ch. 482. And see 1 Chandl. 286.

Assignor and assignee. An assignor who retains even the slightest interest in the subject-matter must be made a party; 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 395; 1 Green, Ch. 347; 2 Paige 289; 11 Cush. 111; as a covenantee in a suit by a remote assignee; 1 Dana 585; or an assignee in insolvency, who must be made a party; 3 Johns. 543; 1 Johns. Ch. 339; 10 Paige 20; or the original plaintiff in a creditor's bill by the assignee of a judgment; 4 B. Monr. 594.

The directors of a corporation may be included as parties defendant in a bill against the corporation for infringement of a trade-mark; 53 Fed. Rep. 124. When discovery is sought, the officer from whom the information is to be obtained should be made a co-defendant with the corporation; 93 Ala. 542.

Officers and agents may be made parties merely for purposes of discovery; Beach, Eq. Pr. § 61, n.; 9 Paige 188.

So, when judgments are impeached and sought to be set aside for fraud, the plaintiffs therein are indispensable parties to the bill; 20 Ala. 200. To a bill brought against an assignee by a creditor claiming the final balance, the preferred creditors need not be made parties; 28 Vt. 465. See, also, 20 How. 94; 1 Md. Ch. 299; 3 Metc. 474; 11 Paige 49.

301; unless utterly irresponsible; 1 Mich. 446. Judgment debtors must in some cases be joined in suits between the creditor and assignees or mortgagees; 5 Sandf. 271. Monr. 127; to a bill by creditors to subject lands fraudulently conveyed by the testator, their debtor, to the satisfaction of their debt; 9 Mo. 304. See, also, 21 Ga. 433; 6 Munf. 520; 7 E. L. & Eq. 54.

Monr. 74; but need not to a bill affecting personalty; 1 M'Cord, Ch. 280. Where, in a suit to set aside a deed for fraud, one of the heirs did not join as plaintiff, he may be made a party defendant, even if he should elect to affirm the deed; 156 Mass. 203. Some contracts may be considered as either joint or several, and in such case all may join, or each may sue separately; but part cannot join leaving the others to sue separately.

In an action for a breach of a joint contract made by several, all the contracting parties should be made defendants; 1 Saund. 158, n.; even though one or more be bankrupt or insolvent; 2 Maule & S. 33; but see 1 Wils. 89; or an infant; but not if the contract be utterly void as to him; 3 Taunt. 307; 5 Johns. 160, 280; 1 Pick. 500.

Part. § 202; 10 B. & C. 671; 4 B. & Ald. 437. See 4 Wend. 628; 71 Mich. 475. A partner who has sold his interest to another partner is not a necessary party to an action for an accounting of the partnership affairs; 130 U. S. 505. Where one partner contracts in his name for the firm, he may sue alone, or all may join; 4 B. & Ad. 815; 4 B. & Ald. 437; but alone if he was evidently dealt with as the sole party in interst; 1 M. & S. 249. Partners cannot sue or be sued in their copartnership name, but the individual names of its members must be set out; 5 So. Rep. (Miss.) 112; 17 Or. 256.

The surviving partners; 3 Ball & B. 30; 1 B. & Ald. 29, 522; 18 Barb. 592; must all be joined as defendants in suits on partnership contracts; 1 East 30. And third parties are not bound to know the arrangements of partners amongst themselves; 4 M. & S. 482; 8 M. & W. 703, 710.

A partner need not be joined if he was not known as such at the time of making the contract and there was no indication of his being a partner; Lind. Part. 281; 1 Bosw. 28; 19 Ark. 701. And see PARTNERSHIP.

Tenants in common should join in an action on any joint contract; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (E 10).

Trustees must all join in bringing an action; 1 Wend. 470.

In actions ex delicto. Joint owners must, in general, join in an action for a tortious injury to their property; 1 Saund. 291 g; 11 N. H. 141; in trover, for its conversion; 5 East 407; in replevin, to get possession; 6 Pick. 571; 8 Mo. 522; 15 Me. 245; or in detinue, for its detention, or for injury to land; 3 Bingh. 455; 29 Barb. 9.

So may several owners who sustain a joint damage; 1 W. & M. 223.

The grantor and grantee of land cannot join in a counter-claim for continuing trespasses on the land sold, since their rights of action are not joint; 6 Ind. App. 663.

For injury to the person, plaintiffs cannot, in general, join; 2 Wms. Saund. 117 a; Cro. Car. 512; Cro. Eliz. 472.

Partners may join for slanders; 3 Bingh. 452; Lind. Part. 278; 8 C. & P. 708; for false representations; 17 Mass. 182; injuring the partnership. The joinder or nonjoinder of a dormant partner constitutes no objection to the maintenance of a suit in any manner whatever; 71 Mich. 475.

In a suit against joint contractors, one of whom is dead, the survivors only should be made parties, the administrator of the deceased partner not being necessary; 44 Ill. App. 114.

An action for the infringement of letters patent may be brought jointly by all the parties who at the time of the infringement were the holders of the title; 1 Gall. 429; 1 McAll. 82.

In cases where several join in the commission of a tort, they may be joined in an action as defendants; 6 Taunt. 29; 14 Johns. 462; as, in trover; 1 M. & S. 588; in trespass; 2 Wms. 117 a; for libel; Broom, Part. 249,—not for slander; Cro. Jac. 647; in trespass; 1 C. & M. 96.

Husband and wife must join in action for direct damages resulting from personal injury to the wife; Schoul. Husb. & W. 167; 3 Bla. Com. 140; 4 Iowa 420; see 11 So. Rep. (La.) 541; in detinue, for the property which was the wife's before marriage; 2 Tayl. 266; 37 W. Va. 877; see 30 Ala. N. S. 582; for injury to the wife's property before marriage; 2 Jones, N. C. 59; where the right of action accrues to the wife in autre droit; Comyns, Dig. Baron & F. (V); 2 B. & P. 407; and, generally, in all cases where the cause of action by law survives to the wife; 4 B. & Ald. 523; 10 Pick. 470; 35 Me. 89.

They may join for slander of the wife, if the words spoken are actionable per se, for the direct injury; 4 M. & W. 5; 22 Barb. 396; 2 T. B. Monr. 56; 25 Mo. 580; 4 Ia. 420; 11 Cush. 10; 112 N. C. 293; (but she may maintain an action in her own name; 89 Ga. 829;) and in ejectment for lands of the wife they may join; Broom, Part. 285; 1 Bulstr. 21. An action for permanent injury to community property must be brought by husband and wife jointly; 8 Wash. 78.

They must be joined as defendants for torts committed by the wife before marriage; Co. Litt. 351 b; 5 Binn. 43; or during coverture; 19 Barb. 321; 2 E. D. Smith 90; 17 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 851; or for libel or slander uttered by her; 5 C. & P. 484; and in an action for waste by the wife, before marriage, as administratrix; 2 Wms. Ex. 1441.

They may be joined in trespass for their joint act; 3 B. & Ald. 687; 6 Gratt. 213.

Joint tenants and parceners, during the continuance of the joint estate, must join in all actions ex delicto relative thereto, as in trespass to their land, and in trover or replevin for their goods; 2 Bla. Com. 182, 188; Bacon, Abr. Joint Ten. (K); 29 Barb. 29. Joint tenants may join in an action for slander of the title to their estate; 3 Bingh. 455. They should be sued jointly, in trespass, trover, or case, for anything respecting the land held in common; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (F 6); 1 Wms. Saund. 291 e. Joint tenants should join in an avowry or cognizance for rent; 3 Salk. 207; or for taking cattle damage feasant; Bacon, Abr. Joint Ten. (K); or one joint tenant should avow in his own right, and as bailiff to the other; 3 Salk. 207. But a tenant in common cannot avow the taking of the cattle of a stranger upon the land damage feasant, without making himself bailiff or servant to his co-tenant; 2 H. Bla. 388; Bacon, Abr. Replevin (K).

Master and servant, where co-trespassers should be joined though they be not equally culpable; 5 B. & C. 559. Partners may join for a joint injury in relation to the joint property; 3 C. & P. 196. They may be joined as defendants where property is taken by one of the firm for its benefit; 1 C. & M. 93; and where the firm makes fraudulent representations as to the credit of a third person, whereby the firm gets benefit; 17 Mass. 182. In an action against a corporation for a tort, the corporation and its servants by whose act the injury was done may be joined as defendants; 98 N. C. 34.

Tenants in common must join for a trespass upon the lands held in common; Littleton § 315; 8 Cow. 304; 28 Me. 136; or for taking away their common property; Cro. Eliz. 148; or for detaining it; 1 Hill, N. Y. 234; or for a nuisance to their estate; 14 Johns. 246.

In Criminal Cases. Two or more persons who have committed a crime may be jointly indicted therefor; 7 Gratt. 619; 6 McLean 596; 10 Ired. 153; 8 Blackf. 205; only where the offence is such that it may be committed by two jointly; 3 Sneed 107; and not where there are distinct and different offences; 97 N. C. 474. A principal and accessory may be joined in one indictment; 155 Mass. 224; 65 N. H. 284.

They may have a separate trial, however, in the discretion of the court; 15 Ill. 536; 1 Park. Cr. Ca. 424; 7 Gratt. 619; 10 Cush. 530; 5 Strobh. 85; 9 Ala. N. S. 137; and in some states as a matter of right; 1 Park. Cr. Ca. 371.

See Dicey, Parties; Steph. Pl.; Parties.

As to the effect of Misjoinder and Nonjoinder, and how and when advantage should be taken of either, see those titles.

JOINT. Joined together; united; shared by two or more. The term is used to express a common property interest enjoyed or a common liability incurred by two or more persons; as applied to real estate it involves the idea of survivorship. See Estate in Joint Tenancy; Estate in Common.

With respect to the ownership of choses in action, the term implies that the interest and right of action are united so that all the owners must be joined in a suit to enforce the obligation jointly held. See Joint and Several.

A joint liability on choses in action implies that though each person subject to it is liable for the whole, they are all treated in law as together constituting one legal entity and must be sued together or a release to one will operate in favor of all. One who pays the debt is entitled to contribution (q. v.).

JOINT ACTION. An action brought by two or more as plaintiffs or against two or more as defendants. See JOINT AND SEVERAL; ACTIONS; JOINDER.

JOINT ADMINISTRATORS. See ADMINISTRATOR.

JOINT AND SEVERAL. A liability is said to be joint and several when the creditor may sue one or more of the parties to such liability separately, or all of them together at his option. Dicey, Parties 230. Where one is compelled to pay the whole debt or more than his proper share, he is entitled to contribution (q. v.). In case of the death of one his liability remains against his estate; Wms. Pers. Prop. 363. As a general rule all the transactions of partners are said to be joint and several. See PARTNERSHIP.

As to joint and several debtors, Lord Mansfield said in Rice v. Shute, Burr. 2611, that "all contracts with partners were joint and several, and every partner was liable to pay the whole." But it was remarked by Spencer, C. J., that "it would be straining Lord Mansfield's opinion unreasonably to say, that he meant technically that all contracts with partners were joint and several, for, then, the non-joinder of any of the partners never could be pleaded in abatement, which all the court expressly decided. In equity they are joint and several; and so they were as regarded that suit, the defendant having neglected to avail himself of the objection in a legal manner. Surely it cannot be said that in a legal sense, when there are a plurality of debtors, that their contract is joint and several, when they have engaged jointly to pay the debt. Each debtor is bound for the whole, until the debt is paid; but as regards the remedy to coerce payment, there is a material and settled distinction. If they have undertaken severally to pay, separate suits may be brought against each; but when their undertaking is joint, unless they waive the advantage, by not interposing a plea in abatement, they must be sued jointly, if in full life, and neither has been discharged by operation of a bankrupt or insolvent law, or is not liable on the ground of infancy." 18 Johns. 459.

JOINT AND SEVERAL BOND. A bond of two or more obligors, who bind themselves jointly and severally to the obligees, who can sue all the obligors jointly, or any one of them separately, for the whole amount, but cannot bring a joint action against part,—that is, treat it as joint as to some and several as to others.

JOINT BOND. The bond of two or more obligors, the action to enforce which must be joint against them all.

JOINT COMMITTEE. A committee composed of members of both houses of a legislature. See May, Parl. Pr.

JOINT CONTRACT. One in which the contractors are jointly bound to perform the promise or obligation therein contained, or entitled to receive the benefit of such promise or obligation.

It is a general rule that a joint contract survives, whatever may be the beneficial interests of the parties under it. When a partner, covenantor, or other person entitled, having a joint interest in a contract not running with the land, dies, the right to sue survives in the other partner, etc.; 1 Dall. 65, 248; Add. Contr., 9th ed. 239. And when the obligation or promise is to perform something jointly by the obligors or promisors, and one dies, the action must be brought against the survivor; Hamm. Partn. 156.

When all the parties interested in a joint contract die, the action must be brought by the executors or administrators of the last surviving obligee against the executors or administrators of the last surviving obligor; Add. Contr. 239. See CONTRACTS; PARTIES; CO-OBLIGOR.

JOINT DEBTORS. Two or more persons jointly liable for the same debt.

To sustain a suit against joint debtors, a joint and subsisting indebtedness must be shown; 18 Johns. 459; and by proceeding to judgment against one or more of joint debtors the debt is merged in the judgment as to all; id.

JOINT DEBTORS' ACTS. Statutes enacted in many of the states, which provide that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants, and that, "in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper." The name is also given to statutes providing that where an action is instituted against two or more defendants upon an alleged joint liability, and some of them are served with process, but jurisdiction is not obtained over the others, the plaintiff may still proceed to trial against those who are before the court, and, if he recovers, may have judgment against all of the defendants whom he shows to be jointly liable. 1 Black, Judg. §§ 208, 235.

JOINT EXECUTORS. Those who are joined in the execution of a will. See EXECUTOR.

JOINT FIAT. A fiat which was formerly issued against two or more trading partners.

JOINT FINE. The fine which might be levied upon a whole vill.

JOINT HEIRS. Co-heirs.

JOINT INDICTMENT. One indictment brought against two or more offenders, charging the defendants jointly. It may be where there is a joint criminal act, without any regard to any particular personal default or defect of either of the defendants: thus, there may be a joint indictment against the joint keepers of a gaming-house; 1 Ventr. 302; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 240.

JOINT LIVES. An expression used to designate the duration of an estate or right, limited or granted to two or more persons, to be enjoyed during the lives of both or all of them.

An annuity to two for their lives is payable until the death of one. Where the survivor is to be benefited, the conveyance or devise is usually expressed to be "to hold their joint lives and the life of the survivor."

JOINT OWNERSHIP. See JOINT.

JOINT RESOLUTION. A resolution adopted by both houses of congress or a legislature. When such a resolution has been approved by the president or passed with his approval, it has the effect of a law. 6 Op. Atty. Gen. 680.

The distinction between a joint resolution and a concurrent resolution of congress, is that the former requires the approval of the president while the latter does not. Rep. Sen. Jud. Com. Jan. 1897.

JOINT STOCK BANKS. In English Law. A species of quasi corporations, or companies regulated by deeds of settlement. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. An association of individuals for purposes of profit, possessing a common capital contributed by the members composing it, such capital being commonly divided into shares of which each member possesses one or more, and which are transferable by the owner. Shelf. Jt. St. Co. 1.

A quasi partnership, invested by statutes in England and many of the states with some of the privileges of a corporation. See 10 Wall. 556: L. R. 4 Eq. 695.

A partnership whereof the capital is divided, or agreed to be divided, into shares so as to be transferable without the express consent of the co-partners. Pars. Part. § 435.

Such associations are not pure partnerships, for their members are recognized as an aggregate body; nor are they pure corporations, for their members are more or less liable to contribute to the debts of the collective whole. Incorporated companies are intermediate between corporations known to the common law and ordinary corporations and partake of the nature of both. 1 Lindl. Partn., 1st ed. 6.

They are to be distinguished from limited partnerships chiefly in that there is, in a joint stock company, no dilectus personarum, that is, no choice about admitting partners, the shares are transferable without involving a dissolution of the asssociation, the assignee of shares becomes a partner by virtue of the transfer, and the rights and duties of the members are determined by articles of association, or in England by a deed of settlement; 1 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. 144.

The power to manage the business is vested exclusively in the directors, and a shareholder, as such, has no power to contract for the company; 2 H. L. Cas. 520. Generally the number of shares is fixed by the charter, but it is sometimes provided that there shall not be less than a certain number nor more than a certain number. In such cases it is left for the company to determine the number within the limits prescribed; 45 Me. 254; but where the charter fixes the amount of the capital stock, and provides that it may be increased from time to time at the pleasure of the corporation, the directors have no power to increase the amount of the stock, although the charter provides that all the corporate powers shall be vested in, and exercised by a board of directors, and such officers and agents as such board shall appoint; 18 Wall. 283.

In New York joint stock companies have all the attributes of a corporation except the right to have and use a common seal, and an action is properly brought for or against the president as such, and the judgment and execution against him bind the joint property of the association, but do not bind his own property; 74 N. Y. 284; but it has been held that the provisions in the New York statutes are merely local in their operation, and that the members may be sued in other states as partners; 128 Mass. 445; 60 Me. 468. They may be served with summons in another state in the same manner that corporations are served; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 506; and on an issue as to whether an association was a joint stock company or a corporation, its classification by the statutes of New York, where it was created, has been held not conclusive; 1 Ohio, N. P. 259. A joint stock company having some of the characteristics of a corporation and some of a partnership, including the right to a common seal, ownership of the property by the association, and the right to sue and be sued in the corporate name, is as much a citizen of the state which created it as a corporation organized under its laws, and when sued in another state is entitled to a removal to the federal court irrespective of the citizenship of its individual members; 46 Fed. Rep. 209; 1 Flip. 611; 10 Biss. 278.

At common law they are held not corporations but are to be sued as partners; 128 Mass. 445; 60 Me. 468; 4 Metc. 535; 64 Ia. 220. But in states where there are statutory provisions concerning them the indebtedness of joint stock companies will be charged pro rata to the solvent members; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 178. An English joint stock company (in this case a fire insurance company) endowed by its deed of settlement with the following powers and faculties, 1. A distinctive artificial name by which it can make contracts. 2. A statutory authority to sue and be sued in the name of its officers as representing the association. 3. A statutory recognition of it as an entity distinct from its members by allowing them to sue it or be sued by it. 4. A provision for its perpetuity by transfer of its shares so as to secure succession of membership, was held to be a corporation in this country; 10 Wall. 566; 100 Mass.

531; notwithstanding the acts of parliament declaring it should not be so considered, and the court held that such corporations, whether organized under the laws of a state of the Union or a foreign government, may be taxed by another state for the privilege of conducting their corporate business therein.

When such a company is not organized under the statutes a suit brought by or against it should be in the name of all the partners or of one or more for the use of all; 1 Ia. 369; 58 Me. 537; and a defective certificate of organization will render all the parties liable to a common-law action as partners; 127 Pa. 255. A mere subscription for shares in an unincorporated joint stock company will not make the subscribers liable as partners to third persons dealing with the company; they must have intended to become members and share in the profits of the business, but an unexplained subscription is evidence of that fact; 53 Mo. App. 245.

It is an incumbent duty on the part of a joint stock company not to permit a transfer of stock until fully satisfied of the shareholder's authority to transfer; L. R. 9 Eq. 181; 152 Pa. 232; 129 Mass. 46; 2 Bing. 393; and as to the nature of shares in such an association see SHARES.

An authority conferred on the directors to make contracts and bargains, and to transact all matters requisite for the affairs of the company will not in general authorize the directors to draw bills; 19 L. J. Ex. 34; 9 C. B. 574; 20 L. J. Q. B. 160; but if the directors have authority to bind the company by bills, and they regularly accept, in the name of the company, a bill drawn on the company, every member is liable as a joint acceptor to any holder who is not also a member of the company; 8 M. & H. 834; 10 id. 132; 19 L. J. Ex. 34; 5 E. & B. 1; so the acceptance of a bill by an agent who is also a member of the company binds him personally; 9 Exch. 154.

To a suit for a dissolution or winding up of the affairs of a joint stock company, all the shareholders, however numerous, must be parties; 1 Keen 24; and any member of the company may institute an action for its dissolution; 92 Hun 432. The fact that such a company has conducted business for twenty-three years without making dividends for its stockholders, is good ground for its dissolution at suit of one of them; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 459. A society that cannot be incorporated because organized to resist the enforcement of laws cannot sue in the society name for the collection of a debt; 44 Mich. 313. See Bissett; Buckley; Wordsworth, Joint Stock Companies; Ang. & Ames; Thompson, Corporations; Lindl. Partn.; Lindl. Company Law; CORPORATION; DIRECTOR; STOCKHOLDER; PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

JOINT TENANTS. Two or more persons to whom are granted lands or tenements to hold in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life, for years, or at will. Freem. Coten. & Par. § 9; 2 Bla. Com. 179. The estate which they thus hold is called an estate in joint tenancy. See ESTATE OF JOINT TENANCY; JUS ACCRESCENDI; SURVIVOR.

JOINT TORTFEASORS. Wrongdoers; two or more who commit a tort.

When several persons join in an offence or injury, they may generally be sued jointly, or any number less than the whole may be sued, or each one may be sued separately; 10 Wend. 654. Each is liable for himself, because the entire damages sustained were occasioned by each, each sanctioning the acts of the others, so that by suing one alone, he is not charged beyond his just proportion. Any number less than the whole may be sued, because each is answerable for his companion's acts. Thus a joint action may be brought against several for an assault and battery, or for composing and publishing a libel; 2 Saund. 117 a; Bacon, Abr. Actions in General (C); 2 Tyl. 129.

But to this rule that for a joint injury a joint action may be brought, there is an exception, namely, that no joint action can be maintained for a joint slander; this exception, seems to proceed upon the ground that each man's slander is his own, and it cannot by any means be considered that of another. Although this exception appears to be fully established, yet it is difficult to see the reason of it; when one of several trespassers gives the blow, he is considered as acting for the others, and, if they acted jointly, they may be jointly sued; why not consider the speaker, when acting in concert with others, as the actor for the whole in uttering the words? The blow is no more that of the person who did not give it than the words are the words of him who only united with the other in an agreement that they should be spoken. In either case, upon principle, the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, ought to have its force. Such, however, is not the law.

Where a person is injured by a joint tort and accepts satisfaction from one of the wrongdoers, he cannot sue the other; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 582.

A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not operate as a release of the other from liability; [1892] 2 Q. B. 511; nor does the dismissal of an action against one together with an executor for a valuable consideration, of an agreement not to sue him, release the other; 143 Ill. 358; nor does the fact that where property is jointly converted by two persons, and one of those converting accounts to the owner, who accepts part of the proceeds, remove the other's liability; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 341.

JOINT TRESPASSERS. Two or more who unite in committing a trespass.

JOINT TRUSTEES. Two or more persons who are intrusted with property for the benefit of one or more others. See TRUSTEE.

JOINTRESS, JOINTURESS. A woman who has an estate settled on her by her husband, to hold during her life, if she survive him. Co. Litt. 46.

JOINTURE. A competent livelihood of freehold for the wife, of lands and tenements, to take effect, in profit or possession, presently after the death of the husband, for the life of the wife at least.

Jointures are regulated by the statute of 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10, commonly called the statute of uses.

To make a good jointure, the following circumstances must concur, namely: It must take effect, in possession or profit, immediately from the death of the husband. It must be for the wife's life, or for some greater estate. It must be limited to the wife herself, and not to any other person in trust for her. It must be made in satisfaction for the wife's whole dower, and not of part of it only. The estate limited to the wife must be expressed or averred to be in satisfaction of her whole dower. It must be made before marriage. See 27 Ohio St. 60, where it is said that it may also be made after marriage. A jointure attended with all these circumstances is binding on the widow, and is a complete bar to the claim of her dower; or, rather, it prevents its ever arising. See 4 Kent 55.

But there are other modes of limiting an estate to a wife, which, Lord Coke says, are good jointures within the statute, provided that the wife accepts them after the death of the husband. She may, however, reject them, and claim her dower; Cruise, Dig. tit. 7; 2 Bla. Com. 137. As to the effect of jointure as a bar of dower, see Wms. R. P., 6th ed. 235, and the American notes. See DOWER. It is held that a jointure cannot be affected by a post-nuptial agreement; 7 Houst. 102; s. c. 30 Atl. Rep. 735.

In its more enlarged sense, a jointure signifies a joint estate limited to both husband and wife. 2 Bla. Com. 137. See 14 Viner, Abr. 540; 3 Bac. Abr. 190; Bouvier, Inst. 176; Washb. R. P.

JOUR. A French word signifying day. It is used in our old law-books: as, tout jours, forever. It is also frequently employed in the composition of words: as, journal, a day-book; journeyman, a man who works by the day; journeys account.

JOURNAL. In Maritime Law. The book kept on board of a ship or other vessel which contains an account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage. Another name for log-book. Chitty, Law of Nat. 199.

In Commercial Law. A book used among merchants, in which the contents of the waste-book are separated every month, and entered on the debtor and creditor side, for more convenient posting in the ledger.

In Legislation. An account of the proceedings of a legislative body.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, directs that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy. See 2 Sto. Const., 5th ed. § 839.

The constitutions of the several states contain similar provisions.

On a reference to the journal of the federal house of representatives to ascertain whether a duly authenticated law was passed, the court is bound to assume that the journal speaks the truth, and cannot receive oral evidence to impeach its correctness; 144 U. S. 1; but the debates in congress may not be resorted to for the purpose of discovering the meaning of a statute; 166 id. 290

The journal of either house is evidence of the action of that house upon all matters before it; 7 Cow. 613; Cowp. 17. It is a public record of which the courts may take judicial notice; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 482; 5 W. Va. 85; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 28; 16 id. 647; 94 U. S. 260; 60 Ia. 549; 79 Va. 280; 1 Wyo. 85; Cooley, Const. Lim. 135; contra, 45 Ill. 119; 2 Cent. L. J. 407. If it should appear therefrom that any act did not receive the requisite vote, or that the act was not constitutionally adopted, the courts may adjudge the act void; Cooley, Const. Lim. 164. Failure to comply with certain constitutional provisions in the passage of an act can be shown only by the journals; 27 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 188; and if the journal sufficiently shows on its face a substantial compliance with constitutional requirements, a mere clerical omission in the journals of either house will not vitiate an act; 27 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 218. Where they are silent as to the observance of any constitutional requirement, it will not be presumed that such requirement was disregarded, and where they do not expressly show whether the act was constitutionally passed it will be held valid unless there is an omission of some matter expressly required by the constitution to be entered therein; 47 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 670.

Where the constitution requires that the yeas and nays be entered on the journals, they are conclusive as against not only a printed statute published by law, but a duly enrolled act; 25 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 966.

In determining whether an act was passed in accordance with a constitutional provision requiring the assent of two-thirds of the members, recourse may be had to the journals, if the certificate of the presiding officer fails to show by what vote the bill was passed; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 1088.

The journals need not show that a bill was read by sections on its final passage, as required by the constitution, the presumption being that it was read; 18 So. Rep. (Fla.) 767. And where they affirmatively show non-compliance with an essential requirement to the enactment of a bill, or fail to show any essential step in the enactment which the constitution requires them to show, the enrolled bill as evidence of the law is overcome; 18 So. Rep. (Fla.) 767.

Where a bill, as approved, contains important clauses which the journals show were stricken out by the amendment in the houses it is invalid; 68 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 759.

The journals cannot be resorted to by the court for the purpose of inquiring into the motive which actuated the legislature or any member of it in enacting a law; 45 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 890.

The journals are inadmissible to show that parts of the bill, as passed by the houses, were omitted from the enrolled bill as signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and the governor, where all bills are required to be signed by the governor after having passed the legislative assembly; 42 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 1025. Every reasonable presumption is made in favor of the action of a legislative body; it will not be presumed from the mere silence of the journals that either house disregarded a constitutional requirement in the passage of an act, unless in cases where the constitution has required the journals to show the action that has been taken; 25 Ill. 181; 11 Ind. 424; 3 Ohio St. 475; and the presumption that a properly authenticated bill was passed is not overcome by the failure of the journals to show any fact which is not specifically required by the constitution to be entered therein; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 632. Such a bill properly enrolled, signed, and approved cannot be impeached by reference to the journals of either house, to show that it was enacted in conformity to constitutional requirements; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 3; id. 275.

JOURNEY. Originally a day's travel. It is now applied to travel from place to place, without restriction of time. But when thus applied, it is employed to designate a travel which is without the ordinary habits, business, or duties of the person, to a distance from his home, and beyond the circle of his friends or acquaintances. 53 Ala. 521.

JOURNEYS ACCOUNT. In English Practice. A new writ which the plaintiff was permitted to sue out within a reasonable time after the abatement, without his fault, of the first writ. This time was computed with reference to the number of days which the plaintiff must spend in journeying to reach the court: hence the name of journeys account, that is, journeys accomptes or counted. This writ was quasi a continuance of the first writ, and so related back to it as to oust the defendant or tenant of his voucher, plea of non-tenure, joint tenancy fully administered, or any other plea arising upon matter happening after date of the first writ; Co. Litt. fol. 9 b.

This mode of proceeding has fallen into disuse, the practice now being to permit that writ to be quashed, and to sue out another. See Termes de la Ley; Bacon, Abr. Abatement (Q); 14 Viner, Abr. 558; 4 Comyn, Dig. 714; 7 M. & G. 762; 8 Cra. 84.

JUBILACION. In Spanish Law. The right of a public officer to retire from office, retaining his title and his salary, either in whole or in part, after he has attained the age of fifty years and been in public service at least twenty years, whenever his infirmities prevent him from discharging the duties of his office.

JUDAISMUS (Lat.). The religion and rites of the Jews. Du Cange. A quarter set apart for residence of Jews. Du Cange. A usurious rate of interest. 1 Mon. Angl. 839; 2 id. 10, 665. Sex marcas sterlingorum ad acquietandam terram prædictam de Judaismo, in quo fuit impignerata. Du Cange. An income anciently accruing to the king from the Jews. Blount.

JUDEX (Lat.). In Old English Law. A juror. Spelman, Gloss. A judge, in modern sense, especially—as opposed to justiciarius, i. e. a common-law judge—to denote an ecclesiastical judge. Bracton, fol. 401, 402.

In Roman Law. One who, either in his own right or by appointment of the magistrate for the special case, judged causes.

Thus, the prætor was formerly called judex. But, generally, prætors and magistrates who judge of their own right were distinguished from judices, who were private persons, appointed by the prætor, on application of the plaintiff, to try the cause, as soon as issue was joined, and furnished by him with instructions as to the legal principles involved. They were variously called judices delegati, or pedanei, or speciales. It has been said that they resembled in many respects jurors: thus, both are private persons, brought in at a certain stage of the proceedings, viz., issue joined, to try the cause, under instructions from the judge as to the law of the case. But civilians are not clear whether the judices had to decide the fact alone, or the law and fact. The judex resembles in many respects the arbitrator, or arbiter, the chief differences being, first, that the latter is appointed in cases of trust and confidence, the former in cases where the relations of the parties are governed by strict law (in pactionibus strictis); second, the latter has the whole control of cases, and decides according to equity and good conscience, the former by strict formulæ; third, that the latter may be a magistrate, the former must be a private person; fourth, that the award of the arbiter derives its force from the agreement of submission, while the decree of the judex has its sanction in the command of the prætor to try the cause; Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 210, note; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, Kaufmann ed. § 193, note.

It has been said that there was generally one judex, sometimes three,—in which case the decision of two, in the absence of the third, had no effect; Calvinus, Lex. But another careful writer says that "although there could never be more than one judex, there were sometimes several arbitri, but the arbiter was chosen from the same class as the judex." Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. lxiii.

Down to the time of handing over the cause to the judex, that is, till issue joined, the proceedings were before the prætor, and were said to be in jure; after that before the judex, and were said to be in judicio. In all this we see the germ of the Anglo-Saxon system of judicature; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 67.

A judge who conducted the trial from beginning to end; magistratus. The practice of calling in judices was disused before Justinian's time: therefore, in the Code, Institutes, and Novels, judex means judge in its modern sense. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1327.

The term judex is used with very different significations at different periods of Roman law. The distinctive features of the position of the judex belong to the earlier history of the Roman law.

A recent writer defines very clearly the functions of the judex at that period as distinguished from those of the magistrate: "In the earlier history of civil procedure in Rome, we find two sharply defined divisions,—the proceedings which were said to be in jure, and those which were in judicio. The former took place before the magistrate, who represented officially the judicial power of the State. This magistrate in this capacity decided, in the first instance, whether the claim of the complaining party was cognizable at all,—whether there was any form of procedure by which it could be enforced. If it was controverted, and there seemed to be any action that would fit the case, the litis contestatio was formed, by a solemn appeal addressed by each party to his witnesses, and the controversy was then referred to the judex, or in some cases to a body or college of judices. The judices were not magistrates, and did not represent the power of the State. They were, it would seem, more in theory like referees. They took up the issue which had been stated by the magistrate, heard the testimony, and pronounced the sententia, and this finding was afterwards enforced by the magistrate." Howe, Stud-Civ. L. 246.

This relates to the period during which the sharply defined distinction between proceedings in jure and those in judicio was strictly observed. If, for example, the dispute concerned property it was assigned temporarily to the possession of one party, who gave security for its restoration if required, and the judex simply decided which litigant was right; Morey, R. L. 18, 389. The growth of the proceeding by formula during the next period was doubtless largely due to its convenience as a method of conveying to the judex the instructions of the magistrate with respect to the case referred to him. The new proceeding tended very much to increase the flexibility of the law in its application to particular cases, as it has been said there was no tradition to fetter the formula of the prætor. In the old litis contestatio the issue was formulated in narrowly prescribed terms; in the new formula the terms used were informal and freely chosen by the magistrate. "The formula was thus well adapted as a means for directly submitting to the decisions of a judex in judicio any question, or complex of questions, which the prætor deemed actionable. The prætor himself was now in a position, while formulating the legal issue, to give the judex at the same time direct instructions in reference to the decision of such issue. For whether the judge condemned or acquitted depended now solely on the manner in which the prætor formulated the question in dispute." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 177. It was now for the first time that the judex became in effect an official, he ceased to be an independent private person bound only by the positive law, and his action was dominated by the limitations of the prætor's edict. Thus the latter became a dominating force in legal procedure, and the judex in some sense a subordinate official, and the result was "that the formulary procedure obliterated beyond recovery the clear sharp line which had hitherto severed jus and judicium." This naturally resulted from the fact that by the formula the judex was converted into an organ or instrument not only of the civil, but also of the prætor, made law, and the proceedings in judicio and those in jure were controlled by the same authority; id. 178, 220. In the last period of Roman procedure during the later empire the prætor lost his former power of directing the administration of the law, and when the edict came to be fixed by the will of the emperor the prætor and the præses were bound by it equally with the judex and in the same way that the latter had before been limited by their own edict. Its publication by the prætor was merely formal, and he became a mere instrument for applying the law, and his duties became more and more ministerial in proportion as, on the one hand, scientific jurisprudence developed and defined the contents of the existing law and, on the other hand, the imperial power, superseding all other agencies, appropriated to itself the function of developing the law. Thus the judex gradually became an official whose duty it was to assist the prætor, and, in the same way, the prætor became in reality an official whose duty it was to assist the emperor; id. 220.

For a long period senators alone were qualified to act as judges, and during that time any member of the senate could act, if justified, by mutual consent of the parties, or if they could not agree by law. There were also plebeian judges called centumviri elected by the comitia constituting a collegium divided into sections and having special jurisdiction of citizenship and successions; their jurisdiction was exclusive where it existed. As to the duties of the judex see also Inst. 4. 17. 1-7; Sand. Introd. xii., xxi., lxi., lxxiv.; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. §§ 84-87; PRÆTOR; RECUPERATORS; JUDICIO; IN JURE.

Judex Ordinarius (Lat.). In Civil Law. A judge who had jurisdiction by his own right, not by another's appointment. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Blackstone says that judices ordinarii decided only questions of fact, while questions of law were referred to the centumviri; but this would seem to be rather the definition of judices selecti; and not all questions of law were referred to the centumviri, but particular actions: e. g. querela inofficiosi testamenti. See 2 Bla. Com. 315; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr. Centumviri.

Judex Pedaneus. Inferior judges; deputy judges; "petit judges that try only trifling cases (so-called because they had only a low seat and no tribunal)." Harper's Lat. Dict.; Dig. 3. 1. 1. 6.

The name was given to the judex who was delegated to hear the whole cause. Their appointment is said to have been due, in the first instance, to the great increase in the volume of judicial business, which led the emperor Diocletian to authorize the provincial governors to refer cases of minor importance to them. They "were not judices in the old sense of the word, but, according to the opinion of Ortolan, permanent magistrates entrusted with the special duty of conducting such cases as the governor might see fit to refer to them. No other view of the character of these officers seems consistent with the autocratic spirit which permeated the whole imperial system;" Morey, Rom. L. 142. A recent writer says, "About the end of the third century, the præsides provinciarum were in the habit of proceeding extra ordinem in civil actions, i. e. they were in the habit of either giving judgment themselves or of delegating the whole cause to a deputy judge, a judex pedaneus. This deputy judge (who is also called judex datus or judex delegatus) is now in form as well as in substance an official who acts in lieu of the magistrate; he is not merely entrusted, like the old judex privatus, with the conduct of the proceedings in judicio, but is deputed—and this is the reason why no formula is used—to hear and determine the whole cause, including the proceedings in jure. Like the proceedings before the præses himself, the proceedings before this subordinate judge are extra ordinem;" Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 222. It has been said with respect to these judges that the prætors and other great magistrates did not themselves decide the actions which arose between private individuals: these were submitted to judges chosen by the parties, and these judges were called judices pedanei. In choosing them, the plaintiff had the right to nominate, and the defendant to accept or reject those nominated; Heineccius, Antiq. lib. 4, tit. b. n. 40; 7 Touillier, n. 353. As to judices pedanei, generally, see Zimmern, Ges. Rom. Priv. § 18.

Judex Quæstionis. A magistrate who decided the law of a criminal case, when the prætor himself did not sit as a magistrate. Morey, Rom. L. 88.

The director of the criminal court under the presidency of the prætor. Harper's Lat. Dict.; Cic. Brut. 76, 264.

Judex Selectus. A select or selected judex or judge.

The judges in criminal suits selected by the prætor. Harper's Lat. Dict.; Cic. Verr. 2, 2, 13, § 32.

These judices selecti were used in criminal causes, and between them and modern jurors many points of resemblance have been noticed; 3 Bla. Com. 366. They were first returned by the prætor, then drawn by lot, subject to challenge; they were sworn and talesmen were struck. So many points of resemblance were thought to exist between them and the δικάσται of the Greeks and our juries that the English institution has been thought to be derived from the former ones; id. note (n). But the root idea of both systems is sufficiently natural and logical to have been indigenous in both countries. See JURY.

JUDGE. A public officer lawfully appointed to decide litigated questions according to law.

An officer so named in his commission, who presides in some court.

In its most extensive sense the term includes all officers appointed to decide litigated questions while acting in that capacity, including justices of the peace, and even jurors, it is said, who are judges of the facts. 4 Dall. 229; 3 Yeates 300. In ordinary legal use, however, the term is limited to the sense of the second of the definitions here given; 15 Ill. 388; unless it may be that the case of a justice or commissioner acting judicially is to be considered an extension of this meaning. See 3 Cush. 584.

By the common law every court, while engaged in the exercise of its lawful functions, has the authority to preserve order, decency, and silence in its presence, and may apprehend and punish the offender without examination or proof; but if the offence be committed out of court the party is entitled to notice and a hearing in his defence; 1 Cal. 152; 28 Ind. 205. See CONTEMPT.

An assault on a judge sitting in court is not only punishable as a contempt, but indictable, as a crime against public justice, and more aggravated than an ordinary assault, or even than an assault committed upon another person in a court; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 250; this principle comes from the common law and was, as early as 25 Edw. 3, embodied in a statute, under which such an offence was punishable by the loss of the right hand, forfeiture of lands and goods, and perpetual imprisonment. In Neagle's case, 135 U. S. 1, it was held that "an assault upon a judge of a court of the United States, while in discharge of his official duties, is a breach of the peace of the United States, as distinguished from the peace of the State in which the assault takes place." In this case the petitioner was a United States deputy marshal, appointed for the express purpose of guarding Mr. Justice Field against a threatened attack, which took place, and the killing was held by the court to have been caused by a just apprehension that an attack would result in the death of the justice, and was justifiable and a judgment of the circuit court, discharging him from the custody of the sheriff, by whom he was held under process of the state court, was affirmed.

So any insult, disrespect, or insolence to a judge is punishable; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 250. On this subject, it was said by Holroyd, J.: "In the case of an insult to (the judge) himself, it is not on his own account that he commits; for that is a consideration which should never enter his mind. But though he may despise the insult, it is a duty which he owes to the station to which he belongs not to suffer those things to pass which will make him despicable in the eyes of others. It is his duty to support the dignity of his station, and uphold the law, so that in his presence, at least, it shall not be infringed;" 4 B. & Ald. 329, 339.

Within this principle it was held to be a contempt to write a letter to a judge, libelling or abusing him in regard to one of his decisions; 18 Kan. 72; or when the judge of an inferior tribunal refuses obedience to processes from a superior one; 13 Wend. 664; 1 Eng. L. & Eq. 516; 2 Caines 97; 2 Johns. Cas. 118; 6 B. Monr. 638; T. U. P. Chart. 43, 315.

It has been held that abusing a judge out of court, with reference to expressions made by him on a trial, was a contempt; 2 Va. Cas. 408; but in another case it was held that newspaper articles in regard to the conduct of a judge during a trial, and charging him with being an abettor of a person against whom an indictment for murder was pending, could not be visited as a contempt; 4 Sm. & M. 751. In the federal courts, and in many states, the subject is regulated by statute; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725; 16 Fed. Rep. 853; 1 Flipp. 108; 19 Wall. 505; 64 Ill. 195; 89 N. C. 23; 8 W. & S. 77; 110 Ind. 301. The question whether a contempt can be committed otherwise than in court cannot be said to be settled, but Bishop is of the opinion that the English and better American doctrines recognize such contempts, yet, under limitations easily defined; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 258. In all such cases the offence is against the state, not the judge; id. § 269; 7 Wheat. 38; 36 Wis. 355; 36 Ind. 196; 7 Blatch. 23.

In a recent case a judge who was a candidate for re-election, instituted contempt proceedings against the editor of a newspaper and a lawyer who wrote a communication in the newspaper criticising his judicial conduct. An order adjudging both parties in contempt was entered, but its execution was prevented by a writ of prohibition from the supreme court of Wisconsin, which said: "Truly, it must be a grievous and weighty necessity which will justify so arbitrary a proceeding, whereby a candidate for office becomes the accuser, judge, and jury, and may within a few hours summarily punish his critic by imprisonment. The result of such doctrine is that all unfavorable criticism of a sitting judge's past official conduct can be at once stopped by the judge himself, or, if not stopped, can be punished by immediate imprisonment. If there can be any more effectual way to gag the press and subvert freedom of speech, we do not know where to find it. Under such a rule the merits of a sitting judge may be rehearsed, but as to his demerits there must be profound silence. In our opinion no such divinity 'doth hedge about' a judge—certainly not when he is a candidate for public office;" 18 N. Y. L. J. 28, where the subject of contempt out of court is discussed generally.

The question has recently been raised, "Can a judge be guilty of contempt of court?" In a county court in England the judge made some strong observations on the conduct of a bankrupt who applied for his discharge, characterizing him as being guilty of "bare-faced and impudent robbery." It is suggested in this connection that while liable to abuse, on the whole, the rule exempting judges from prosecution of any kind for observations made upon the bench is a rational one; 56 Alb. L. J. 202.

Bribery or attempting to bribe a judge was, at common law, a very grave offence. Indeed the earlier definitions of bribery seem to confine the offence to judicial officers; 4 Bla. Com. 139; 3 Inst. 145; and they have been criticised upon this ground for being too narrow. See 1 East 183; 4 Burr. 2494; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 85, n. 1. Upon the same ground are condemned sinister approaches, with intent to influence judges indirectly, though not amounting to bribery; id.; and on this subject it was said by Lord Cottenham: "Every private communication to a judge, for the purpose of influencing his decision upon a matter publicly before him, always is, and ought to be, reprobated; it is a course calculated, if tolerated, to divert the course of justice, and is considered, and ought, more frequently than it is, to be treated, as what it really is, high contempt of court;" 1 Macn. & G. 116, 122.

Judges are appointed or elected in a variety of ways in the United States. For the federal courts they are appointed by the president, by and with the consent of the senate; in some of the states they are appointed by the governor, the governor and senate, or by the legislature. The judges of the federal courts, and of the courts of some of the states, hold their offices during good behavior; of others, during good behavior, or until they shall attain a certain age; and of others, for a limited term of years. The federal judges must have the tenure of office during good behavior conferred upon them before they can be invested with any portion of the judicial power of the government; 37 Fed. Rep. 567.

Impartiality is the first duty of a judge: if he has any (the slightest) interest in the cause, he is disqualified from sitting as a judge; Aliquis non debit esse judex in propria causa; 8 Co. 118; 6 Pick. 109; 4 Ohio 675; 17 Ga. 253; 22 N. H. 473; 19 Conn. 595; 43 La. Ann. 924; 91 Cal. 342; 75 Ia. 150. See 38 Ill. App. 441; 83 Tex. 99; such as his relationship to the parties; 142 N. Y. 130; even where such party is administrator only; 37 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 846; (but relationship to plaintiff's attorney will not disqualify him; 38 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 58.) Either party may make the objection that the judge is of kin to one of them; 10 Ind. 299; and it is for the judge to determine, in the exercise of sound judicial discretion, whether by reason of kinship, etc., it would be improper for him to hear a particular case; he cannot be compelled to vacate the bench by the affidavit of the litigant; 84 Ky. 18. A pecuniary interest in the case on trial will incapacitate him from sitting in the cause, both by the common law and the statutes: 12 Fla. 138; 9 Md. 324; 13 Mass. 340; as where he is interested as a stockholder in a railroad corporation making an application for a commission to appraise land, his interest is such as to invalidate the report of the commissioners; 4 Ohio St. 675; and where the lord chancellor who was a shareholder in a company in whose favor the vice-chancellor had made a decree, affirmed this decree, it was reversed on that ground; 3 H. L. Cas. 759; but it has been held that where the interest of the judge is merely that of a corporator in a municipal corporation, the legislature may provide that this shall constitute no disqualification when the corporation is a party, apparently on the ground that the interest is insignificant; 1 Gray 475. But it is doubtful whether even the legislature can go beyond this class of cases and abolish the maxim; Cooley, Const. Lim. 516.

If one of the judges is disqualified on this ground, a judgment rendered will be void, even though the proper number may have concurred in the result, which includes the interested judge; 6 Q. B. 753; or though the parties agree to waive objections to the jurisdictions; 38 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 10. The objection may be raised for the first time in the appellate court; 6 Cush. 332; 2 H. L. Cas. 387; but in Iowa it was held that an objection to a judge of the court of original jurisdiction on the ground of interest must be made in that court; 1 Ia. 486.

In a suit on a collector's bond by the chosen freeholders of a county, one who was an inhabitant, a freeholder, and a taxpayer in the same county was incompetent to sit as judge; 21 N. J. L. 656. A judge is not disqualified to try a case because he has tried an action in trespass concerning the same property; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 333.

The interest which disqualifies a judge of the supreme court so that a judge of the circuit court may sit in his stead must be immediate, certain, and dependent on the result of the case, and not remote, uncertain, or speculative; 10 Fla. 213.

The general rule that it is irregular and improper for a judge to try any cause in which he has such an interest as would disqualify as a witness does not apply to orders purely formal in their character, and it is doubtful whether it would extend to a case in which no other judge could try and determine the cause. If the judge is deprived of authority to act, by statutory inhibition, the proceedings are void, otherwise voidable only, and therefore valid until avoided; 27 Ala. 428.

It is said to be discretionary with him whether he will sit in a cause in which he has been of counsel; 2 A. K. Marsh. 517; Coxe, N. J. 164. See 2 Binn. 454; 5 Ind. 230; 82 Tex. 484. But the practice is to refuse to sit in such case. And in 5 Coldw. 217, it was held that where the judge who rendered the judgment in the case had been counsel in it, the judgment was a nullity; 30 Fla. 595. The question arose in Delaware at the time of the appointment of Bates, Chancellor, in 1865, whether he was legally disqualified from sitting in such cases, so as to bring them within the constitutional provision, giving jurisdiction to the chief justice in all cases in which the chancellor was interested. In view of the desire of the chancellor not to sit in cases in which he had been of counsel, the question was considered by him and Gilpin, C. J., and the conclusion reached that there was not a legal disqualification. This conclusion was communicated by the chancellor to the legislature with a suggestion that provision should be made for the appointment of a chancellor ad litem in such cases; MSS. notes of Bates, Chancellor. A magistrate authorized to sign writs cannot sign them in his own case: 47 Conn. 316.

Where there is no other tribunal that can act, the judge may hear the case; Freem. Judg. § 146; 5 H. L. C. 88; 19 Johns. 501; contra, Hopk. Ch. 2; 105 Mass. 221. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 207, 506, 509; 25 Mich. 83.

It was held that the absence of a judge from the court-room for a considerable time during the arguments of the jury without the consent of the parties was reversible error; 70 N. E. Rep. (Wis.) 682.

A judge is not competent as a witness in a cause trying before him, for this among other reasons, that he can hardly be deemed capable of impartially deciding on the admissibility of his own testimony, or of weighing it against that of another; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 364; 2 Mart. La. N. S. 312; 2 Cal. 358. See Comyn, Dig. Courts (B 4), (C 2), (E 1), (P 16), Justices (I 1, 2, 3); Bacon Abr. Courts (B); 1 Kent 291, 1889 ed.; CHARGE.

While acting within the bounds of his jurisdiction, the judge is not responsible for any error of judgment or mistake of law; 12 Co. 23; 2 Dall. 160; 2 N. & M'C. 168; 1 Day. Conn. 315; 5 Johns. 282; 9 id. 395; 3 A. K. Marsh. 76; 1 South. 74; 1 N. H. 374; 45 La. Ann. 1299; 8 Mo. 148; 21 Me. 550; 26 Ala. 527; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 460; unless, possibly, a mistake was induced by gross carelessness or ignorance partaking of a criminal quality; 12 Mod. 493. An action will not lie against a judge of a court of record for any act done by him in his judicial capacity; 6 B. & C. 611. An action of a judge, to be criminally or even civilly cognizable, must be wilful and corrupt; 1 W. Bla. 19; 2 Mo. 23; 47 Me. 462; 26 Ala. 527; 9 Johns. 395; 8 Mo. 148, 254.

It is a rule sometimes asserted to be absolute and sometimes only prima facie that a judicial officer has no protection against the consequences of an act not within his jurisdiction; 2 Gray 120, 410, 570; 13 Wall. 335; 4 Conn. 407; 1 id. 40. But a distinction has sometimes been suggested between acts in excess of jurisdiction and those outside of it. For the latter it has been said that a judge of a court of superior jurisdiction is not liable; Lord De Grey, C. J., in 2 W. Bla. 1141. Of this case it is said by a writer cited infra, who dissents from the doctrine: "It is true this rule is a mere dictum, and also that the decision has been since overruled; but this dictum has sometimes been referred to with approval in subsequent cases;" 15 Am. L. Rev. 440. And Field, J., in 7 Wall. 523, said that such a judge is not liable when he acts in excess of his jurisdiction, except for malice. This expression, like that of Lord De Grey, was obiter, inasmuch as the case sustained the jurisdiction which had been questioned. In 73 N. Y. 12, this point was so decided, but the court drew a distinction between the case where the judge had acquired no jurisdiction at all, and the case where the act was merely in excess of jurisdiction after jurisdiction had been acquired. There the judge of the circuit court had imposed a re-sentence upon a prisoner, and he was accordingly imprisoned; the supreme court held the second sentence illegal, and discharged the prisoner. These cases and the doctrine asserted in them have been doubted and criticised by Arthur Biddle in 15 Am. L. Rev. 442 and note, where the authorities cited and relied on are critically examined. More recently the distinction has been discussed by Bishop, who states the doctrine of distinction between excess and absence of jurisdiction with approval, and even goes further, considering that where the jurisdiction is a close one and it is decided by the judge or magistrate carefully and earnestly in favor of his jurisdiction, "in reason and not quite without support from authority," he should not "suffer, though another or even a higher court held the contrary"; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 460; Bish. Non-Contr. § 783.

There is no distinction between a judge acting in court and acting judicially out of court, that is, in chambers; 3 Moore, P. C. 52; Wilm. 208. See 46 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 24.

"A judge of a court not of record is not liable for any injury sustained which is the result of an honest error of judgment in a matter wherein the court has jurisdiction, and when the act done is not of a purely ministerial nature." The rule is thus stated in 15 Am. L. Rev. 444. See further an article in Ir. L. T. and Sol. J., Nov. 13, 1880; 6 Am. Dec. 303; 29 Am. Rep. 80, n.; 28 Am. Rep. 690. See CORAM NON JUDICE.

One circuit judge has no power to review and revise the action of another circuit judge; 16 S. C. 362; 35 id. 273; nor has a judge when without the state, power to grant an injunction; 131 Ind. 437.

The acts of a judge de facto are not open to collateral attack; 140 U. S. 118.

A judge who acts corruptly may be impeached; 5 Johns. 282; 8 Cow. 178; 4 Dall. 225. See IMPEACHMENT.

See, generally, JUDICIAL POWER; JUDGE-MADE LAW.

Under the Roman law a judge, by whose act or default in deciding or conducting a lawsuit, a party to the suit was injured, was liable to an action for damages, the amount of which was left to the discretion of the judge. Such action was regarded as quasi-delictual, because it was available, not only in cases of deliberately unfair decisions, but also in cases of less serious errors committed by the judge, as overlooking the day fixed for trial or disregarding the rules of law concerning adjournment and the like (imprudentia judicis). In such a case he was termed judex qui litem suam fecit (who makes the suit his own). The action in question, however, could not be taken on the ground that the judgment was unjust in substance; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 330; Mack. Rom. L. § 506; Morey, Rom. L. 383.

JUDGE ADVOCATE. An officer of a court-martial who is to discharge certain duties at the trial of offenders. His duties are to prosecute in the name of the United States; but he shall so far consider himself as counsel for the prisoner, after the prisoner shall have made his plea, as to object to leading questions to any of the witnesses or any question to the prisoner the answer to which might tend to criminate himself. He is, further, to swear the members of the court before they proceed upon any trial, and may also administer oaths for purposes of military justice and other purposes of military administration; U. S. Rev. Stat. 2 Supp. 524.

There are eight judge advocates of the army with the rank of major of cavalry, who perform their duties under the direction of the judge-advocate-general (q. v.), and have power to issue process for witnesses and to appoint reporters of court to which they are assigned; U. S. Rev. St. §§ 1200-2. See Rules and Articles of War, art. 69; 2 Story, U. S. Laws 1001; Holt. Dig. passim.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL. An officer of the army of the United States, provided for by Rev. St. § 1194, who is the head of the bureau of military justice and has the rank of brigadier-general; id. 1198. His duty is to receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been incident to the office; id. § 1199.

By the act of July 5, 1884, the bureau of military justice and the corps of judge advocates were consolidated under the title of judge-advocate-general's department, consisting of one judge-advocate-general, with the rank and pay of a brigadier general, one assistant with the rank and pay of colonel, three deputies with rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel, and three judge-advocates, each with rank and pay of a major; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. § 457.

A similar officer was provided for the navy under the act of June 8, 1880, with the title of judge-advocate-general of the navy. He has the rank and pay of a captain in the navy, or colonel of the marine corps, as the case may be. His duties are to receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and boards for examination of officers, for retirement and promotion, in the naval service, and such other duties as were theretofore performed by naval judge-advocates-general; U. S. Rev. St. 1 Supp. § 290; 2 id. § 500.

JUDGE'S CERTIFICATE. In English Practice. The written statement of the judge who tried the cause that one of the parties is entitled to costs in the action. It is very important in some cases that these certificates should be obtained at the trial. See Tidd, Pr. 879; 3 Chitty, Pr. 458, 486; 3 Campb. 316; 5 B. & Ald. 796. A statement of the opinion of the court, signed by the judges, upon a question of law submitted to them by the chancellor for their decision.

Under the County Courts Act of 1867, in order to entitle a plaintiff to costs if he brings action in the high court, it is necessary that the judge before whom the action was tried shall certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior court, if he do not recover as much as £20 in an action of contract, or £10 in one of tort.

Under some English statutes the plaintiff is entitled to double or treble costs if the judge before whom the action is tried certifies that he is entitled to them; Archb. Pr. 430. See 3 Bla. Com. 453; CASE STATED.

JUDGE-MADE LAW. A phrase used to indicate judicial decisions which construe away the meaning of statutes, or find meanings in them the legislature never intended. It is sometimes used as meaning, simply, the law established by judicial precedent. Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 70, n. See Austin, Prov. of Jur. where the necessity of judicial legislation and its uses are discussed in extenso.

The expression judge-made law is undoubtedly more frequently used in the former sense, and as expressing a certain degree of opprobium. It is, however, unavoidable that in the distribution of powers which is now recognized as a necessary element of civilized government, there should be found at times some uncertainty as to the line of demarcation between the legislative and judicial powers as well as between each of them and the executive. The necessity of what is called judge-made law in the proper sense, and the possibility of its existence in the other sense, arises from the power of construction which necessarily exists, and though salutary when properly exercised, is susceptible of abuse, and in such case, difficult, if not impossible, to remedy. Of this power of construction it has been said that it "is a mighty one, and, unrestrained by settled rules, would tend to throw a painful uncertainty over the effect that might be given to the most plainly worded statutes, and render courts, in reality, the legislative power of the state. Instances are not wanting to confirm this. Judge-made law has overrode the legislative department. It was the boast of Chief Justice Pemberton, one of the judges of the despot Charles II., and not the worst even of those times, that he had entirely outdone the parliament in making law." 5 Ind. 41, 46. A recent philosophical writer thus characterizes that kind of judicial legislation which is necessary and proper under such a system as the common law; "Although it is considered necessary in all free states to keep the legislative, executive, and judicial powers for the most part separate, and all our American constitutions provide for this, yet it cannot be completely done. The judges, it is well known, actually make a great deal of law, and this judicial legislation cannot be avoided, and indeed much of the best work that we get in this line is done by them. But this they do as delegates of the sovereign people, as much as congress or the state legislatures;" Terry, Anglo-American Law 11.

Mr. Bishop earnestly contends that there is no judge-made law; he says that "law preceded writing, and no writing can be made comprehensive enough to include all law, and no blundering of the judge is so monstrous as denial of right to a suitor who is simply unable to find his case laid down in the statute law or in a previous decision." His view is that more errors are committed by failure to administer justice according to "the general principles of our jurisprudence and the collective conscience of mankind," for want of statute or precedent, than in all other ways. The common-law system was built up when there were few statutes and the judges derived "principles for their decisions from the known usages of the country and from what they found written by God in the breasts of men." Such, he considers, should be the action of judges now, and he assumes that they will always find principles on which to adjudicate any matter unprovided for by statutes or previous decisions. He argues that in view of "the ceaseless variety of changes in human affairs," while precedents are properly followed, yet, now, as in the earlier periods, they have not covered the entire ground, and it is absurd that questions of right or remedy should depend, not upon the abstract right or the convenience or propriety of a decision either way, but "solely on the accident, whether it arose in early times, received then an adjudication, and the adjudication found a reporter." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. §§ 18, 19.

In a case for which he could find no precedent, Jessel, M. R., said: "I am afraid that, whatever I may call my decision, it will, in effect, be making law, which I never have any desire to do; but I cannot find that the point is covered by any decided case, or even appears to have been discussed in any decided case. The only satisfaction I have in deciding the point is this, that it will in all probability be carried to a higher court, and it will be for that court to make the law, or, as we say, declare the law, and not for me." L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 798, 805.

It has been said that the phrase judicial legislation carries on its face the notion of judicial usurpation, and is habitually used by the courts as a term of reproach; but it is contended by the writer who admits this current use of the phrase, that, properly used, it means the growth of the law at the hand of the judges, and in that sense, so far from being an evil, "it is a desirable, and indeed a necessary, feature of our system." 5 Harv. L. Rev. 172. In the discussion of the subject the writer last cited considers that with respect to much that has been written on the subject of judicial legislation, the meaning cannot be fully understood without taking into consideration the different theories as to the nature of law. Those writers who accept the theory of Austin and Bentham are naturally found to use the terms judge-made law and judicial legislation as terms meriting contempt, and indeed Bentham so characterizes the whole common law. On the other hand, those writers who take the opposite view and maintain that the origin of law is not command but custom, not only eliminate from consideration the idea of judicial legislation, but go so far as to limit the function of the legislature itself in the effort "to assist society in getting rid of its old customs and forming new ones." Recent supporters of this view are James C. Carter, Rep. Am. B. Assn. 1890, and Prof. Hammond, 1 Bla. Com., Hammond's ed. § 2. See also INTERNATIONAL LAW. The writer in the Harvard Law Review already cited discusses these conflicting views, giving preference to a third theory, intermediate between these two extremes, developed by Lawrence, Essay, Int. L., 2d ed. ch. i. The result is that, in what has been written on the subject of judicial legislation by the advocates of these various theories, there is less difference than is apparent on the surface, and that the process itself is recognized by all, though under different names. The importance of the subject is greatly enhanced in English law by the binding authority which is attributed to former decisions, and the reverence which is accorded to precedent. The conclusion reached is that judicial legislation is a necessary element in the development of the common law, but no precise rules can be laid down either as to the extent to which it should properly go, or how far a judge, in carrying on the process, may undertake to discard old doctrines and substitute new ones. Lord Esher, M. R., in a recent case attempted to distinguish between "fundamental propositions of law" which might be changed only by parliament, and the "evidence of the existence of such a proposition," which was within the disposition of the court; 25 Q. B. Div. 57; but as it is very properly remarked, there is no test suggested to enable a court to make this discrimination. "Even when a reform seems most plainly desirable, the conditions under which the judge works often make it preferable that the change should come from the legislature. One step by the court unless followed up can cause nothing but confusion; and the fact that the actual decision alone is binding makes it often doubtful how far a later court will continue the course upon which its predecessor has entered. Whether such a course should be begun depends on all the circumstances of the case. The only sure guides are common sense, and a knowledge of the law which is founded upon a knowledge of its history." 5 Harv. L. Rev. 201. See JUDICIAL POWER; DICTUM; JUDICIAL DECISIONS; PRECEDENTS.

JUDGE'S NOTES or MINUTES. Short statements, noted by a judge on the trial of a cause, of what transpires in the course of such trial.

They usually contain a statement of the testimony of witnesses, of documents offered or admitted in evidence, of offers of evidence, and whether it has been received or rejected, and the like matters.

In general, judge's notes are not evidence of what transpired at a former trial, nor can they be read to prove what a deceased witness swore to on such former trial; for they are no part of the record, and he is not officially bound to make them. But in chancery, when a new trial is ordered of an issue sent out of chancery to a court of law, and it is suggested that some of the witnesses in the former trial are of an advanced age, an order may be made that, in the event of death or inability to attend, their testimony may be read from the judge's notes; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 166.

JUDGMENT. In Practice. The conclusion of law upon facts found, or admitted by the parties, or upon their default in the course of the suit. Tidd, Pr. 930; 32 Md. 147; 143 Ill. 537. It may be on the main question, or on all of the questions, if there are several; 49 Ohio St. 364.

The decision or sentence of the law, given by the court of justice or other competent tribunal, as the result of proceedings instituted therein for the redress of an injury. 3 Bla. Com. 395; 12 Minn. 437. It is said to be the end of the law; 51 Pa. 373. It affects only parties and privies; 40 Minn. 281; 83 Ala. 171; 97 N. C. 112; 17 Or. 42; 139 U. S. 156.

The language of judgments, therefore, is not that "it is decreed," or "resolved," by the court; but "it is considered" (consideratum est per curiam) that the plaintiff recover his debt, damages, or possession, as the case may require, or that the defendant do go without day. This implies that the judgment is not so much the decision of the court, as the sentence of the law pronounced and decreed by the court, after due deliberation and inquiry.

Litigious contests present to the courts facts to appreciate, agreements to be construed, and points of law to be resolved. The judgment is the result of the full examination of all these.

DEFINITIONS. The various forms of judgment are designated by the following terms:

Judgment of assets in futuro, is one against an executor or heir, who holds at the time no property on which it can operate. See QUANDO ACCIDERINT.

Judgment of cassetur breve or billa (that the writ or bill be quashed) is a judgment rendered in favor of a party pleading in abatement to a writ or action. Steph. Pl., Andr.'s ed. § 97.

Judgment by confession is a judgment entered for the plaintiff in case the defendant, instead of entering a plea, confesses the action, or at any time before trial confesses the action and withdraws his plea and other allegations.

Contradictory judgment is a judgment which has been given after the parties have been heard; either in support of their claims or in their defence. 11 La. 366. It is used in Louisiana to distinguish such judgments from those rendered by default.

Judgment de melioribus damnis is a judgment entered at the election of the plaintiff for the highest amount where damages have been differently assessed against several defendants. See DE MELIORIBUS DAMNIS.

Judgment by default is a judgment rendered in consequence of the non-appearance of the defendant. The term is also applied to judgments entered under statutes or rules of court, for want of affidavit of defence, plea, answer, and the like, or for failure to take some required step in the cause.

Judgment in error is a judgment rendered by a court of error on a record sent up from an inferior court.

Final judgment is one which puts an end to a suit.

As to judgment in rem, inter partes, or in personam, see those titles.

Interlocutory judgment is one given in the progress of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate and does not finally determine or complete the suit. 3 Bla. Com. 396.

Judgment on the merits is one rendered after argument and investigation, and when it is determined which party is in the right, as distinguished from a judgment rendered upon some preliminary or merely technical point, or by default, and without trial.

Judgment of nil capiat per breve or per billam is a judgment in favor of the defendant upon an issue raised upon a declaration or peremptory plea.

Judgment by nil dicit is one rendered against a defendant for want of a plea.

Judgment of nolle prosequi is a judgment entered against the plaintiff where after appearance and before judgment he says "he will not further prosecute his suit." Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment of non obstante veredicto is a judgment rendered in favor of one party without regard to the verdict obtained by the other party.

Judgment of non pros. (non prosequitur) is one given against the plaintiff for a neglect to take any of those steps which it is incumbent on him to take in due time. See NON PROS.

Judgment of non suit, a judgment rendered against the plaintiff when he, on trial by jury, on being called or demanded, at the instance of the defendant, to be present while the jury give their verdict, fails to make an appearance. See NON-SUIT.

Judgment by non sum informatus is one which is rendered when, instead of entering a plea, the defendant's attorney says he is not informed of any answer to be given to the action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment nunc pro tunc, is one entered on a day subsequent to the time at which it should have been entered, as of the latter date. See NUNC PRO TUNC.

Judgment pro retorno habendo is a judgment that the party have a return of the goods.

Judgment quando acciderint, is such a judgment against an executor or heir as binds only future assets. See QUANDO ACCIDERINT.

Judgment quod computet is a judgment in an action of account-render that the defendant do account.

Judgment quod partitio fiat is the interlocutory judgment in a writ of partition that partition be made.

Judgment quod partes replacitent is a judgment for repleader. See REPLEADER.

Judgment quod recuperet is a judgment in favor of the plaintiff (that he do recover) rendered when he has prevailed upon an issue in fact or an issue in law other than one arising on a dilatory plea. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment of respondeat ouster is a judgment given against the defendant after he has failed to establish a dilatory plea upon which an issue in law has been raised.

Judgment of retraxit is one given against the plaintiff where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff enters upon the record that he "withdraws his suit."

See these several titles where they are separately treated.

CLASSIFICATION. Judgments in civil causes, considered with respect to the method of obtaining them, may be thus classified.

1. When the result is obtained by the trial of an issue of fact. In this case the trial may involve questions both of law and fact, but the law is applied incidentally to the trial of the disputed facts, as in the admission or rejection of evidence, the conduct of the trial, and the instruction of the jury or, it may be, in the determination of the question whether the evidence is sufficient either in quality or quantity to be submitted to the jury. In these cases the law is admitted or applied to facts found by a jury or the court.

Judgments upon facts found are the following:

(1) Judgment of nul tiel record (q. v.) occurs when some pleading denies the existence of a record, and issue is joined thereon; the record being produced is compared by the court with the statement in the pleading which alleges it; and if they correspond, the party asserting its existence obtains judgment; if they do not correspond, the other party obtains judgment of nul tiel record.

(2) Judgment upon verdict (q. v.) is the most usual of the judgments upon facts found, and is for the party obtaining the verdict.

(3) Judgment non obstante veredicto is a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff notwithstanding the verdict for the defendant: this judgment is given upon motion (which can only be made by the plaintiff) when, upon an examination of the whole proceedings, it appears to the court that the defendant has shown himself to be in the wrong, and that the issue, though decided in his favor by the jury, is on a point which does not at all better his case; Smith, Act. 161. This is sometimes called a judgment upon confession, because it occurs after a pleading by defendant in confession and avoidance and issue joined thereon, and verdict found for defendant, and then it appears that the pleading was bad in law and might have been demurred to on that ground. The plea being substantially bad in law, of course the verdict which merely shows it to be true in point of fact, cannot avail to entitle the defendant to judgment; while, on the other hand, the plea being in confession and avoidance involves a confession of the plaintiff's declaration, and shows that he was entitled to maintain his action. Sometimes it may be expedient for the plaintiff to move for judgment non obstante veredicto, even though the verdict be in his favor; for, in a case like that described above, if he takes judgment as upon the verdict it seems that such judgment would be erroneous, and that the only safe course is to take it as upon confession; Cro. Eliz. 778; 2 Rolle, Abr. 99; 1 Bingh. N. C. 767. See, also, Cro. Eliz. 214; 6 Mod. 10; 8 Taunt. 413; Rastell, Ent. 622; 1 Wend. 307; 5 id. 513; 6 Cow. 225. See NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

(4) A judgment of repleader is given when issue is joined on an immaterial point, or one on which the court cannot give a judgment which will determine the right. On the award of a repleader, the parties must recommence their pleadings at the point where the immaterial issue originated. See REPLEADER. This judgment is interlocutory, quod partes replacitent. See Bacon, Abr. Pleas, 4 (M); 3 Hayw. 159.

2. When the facts are admitted by the parties, leaving only issues of law to be determined, which are as follows:

(1) Judgment upon a demurrer against the party demurring concludes him, because by demurring, a party admits the facts alleged in the pleadings of his adversary, and relies on their insufficiency in law. See DEMURRER.

(2) It sometimes happens that though the adverse parties are agreed as to the facts, and only differ as to the law arising out of them, still these facts do not so clearly appear on the pleadings as to enable them to obtain the opinion of the court by way of demurrer; for on demurrer the court can look at nothing whatever except the pleadings. In such circumstances the statute 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 25, which has been imitated in most of the states, allows them after issue joined, and on obtaining the consent of a single judge, to state the facts in a special case for the opinion of the court, and agree that a judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff or defendant by confession or nolle prosequi immediately after the decision of the case; and judgment is entered accordingly, called judgment on a case stated.

(3) Sometimes at the trial the parties find that they agree on the facts, and the only question is one of law. In such case a verdict pro forma is taken, which is a species of admission by the parties, and is general, where the jury find for the plaintiff generally, but subject to the opinion of the court on a special case, or special, where they state the facts as they find them, concluding that the opinion of the court shall decide in whose favor the verdict shall be, and that they assess the damages accordingly. The judgments in these cases are called respectively, judgment on a general verdict subject to a special case, and judgment on a special verdict. See CASE STATED; POINT RESERVED; VERDICT.

3. Besides these, a judgment may be based upon the admissions or confessions of one only of the parties.

(a) Such judgments when for defendant upon the admissions of the plaintiff are:

(1) Judgment of nolle prosequi, where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff says he "will not further prosecute his suit."

(2) Judgment of retraxit is one where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff enters upon the record that he "withdraws his suit," whereupon judgment is rendered against him. The difference between these is that a retraxit is a bar to any future action for the same cause; while a nolle prosequi is not, unless made after judgment; 7 Bingh. 716; 1 Wms. Saund. 207, n.

(3) A plaintiff sometimes, when he finds he has misconceived his action, obtains leave from the court to discontinue, on which there is a judgment against him and he has to pay costs; but he may commence a new action for the same cause.

(4) A stet processus is entered where it is agreed by leave of the court that all further proceedings shall be stayed: though in form a judgment for the defendant, it is generally, like discontinuance, in point of fact for the benefit of the plaintiff, and entered on his application, as, for instance, when the defendant has become insolvent, it does not carry costs; Smith, Act. 162.

(b) Judgments for the plaintiff upon facts admitted by the defendant are:

(1) Judgment by cognovit actionem, cognovit or confession, where, instead of entering a plea, the defendant chooses to acknowledge the rightfulness of the plaintiff's action.

(2) Judgment by confession relicta verificatione, where, after pleading and before trial, he both confesses the plaintiff's cause of action to be just and true and withdraws or abandons his plea or other allegations. Upon this, judgment is entered against him without proceeding to trial.

Analogous to this is the judgment confessed by warrant of attorney: this is an authority given by the debtor to an attorney named by the creditor, empowering him to confess judgment either by cognovit actionem, nil dicit, or non sum informatus. This differs from a cognovit in that an action must be commenced before a cognovit can be given; 3 Dowl. 278, per Parke, B.; but not before the execution of a warrant of attorney. Judgments by nil dicit and non sum informatus, though they are in fact founded upon a tacit acknowledgment on the part of the defendant that he has no defence to the plaintiff's action, yet as they are commonly reckoned among the judgments by default, will be explained under that head.

4. A judgment is rendered on the default of a party, on two grounds: it is considered that the failure of the party to proceed is an admission that he, if plaintiff, has no just cause of action, or, if defendant, has no good defence; and it is intended as a penalty for his neglect; for which reason, when such judgment is set aside or opened at the instance of the defaulting party, the court generally require him to pay costs.

(a) Such judgments against the defendant are:

(1) Judgment by default is against the defendant when he has failed to appear after being served with the writ; to plead, after being ruled so to do, or, in Pennsylvania and some other states, to file an affidavit of defence within the prescribed time; or, generally, to take any step in the cause incumbent on him. The practice of permitting judgment to be entered by default for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence, when the cause of action is a record, or is sworn to, has become practically universal. Under it courts usually refuse a judgment in cases in which motion on the affidavits raises a doubtful question. When such decisions can be reviewed, an order refusing judgment will rarely be reversed; 163 Pa. 638.

(2) Judgment by non sum informatus is a species of judgment by default, where, instead of entering a plea, the defendant's attorney says he is "not informed" of any answer to be given to the action.

(3) Judgment by nil dicit is rendered against the defendant where, after being ruled to plead, he neglects to do so within the time specified.

(b) Such judgments against the plaintiff are:

(1) Judgment of non pros. (from non prosequitur) is one given against the plaintiff for a neglect to take any of those steps which it is incumbent on him to take in due time.

A judgment by default is just as conclusive between the parties of whatever is essential to support it as one rendered after answer and contest; 157 U. S. 683.

(2) Judgment of non suit (from non sequitur, or ne suit pas) is where the plaintiff, after giving in his evidence, finds that it will not sustain his case, and therefore voluntarily makes default by absenting himself when he is called on to hear the verdict. The court give judgment against him for this default; but the proceeding is really for his benefit, because after a nonsuit he can institute another action for the same cause, which is not the case—except in ejectment, in some states—after a verdict and judgment against him.

Judgments are further classified with reference to the stage of the cause at the time they are rendered.

1. Interlocutory judgments are such as are given in the middle of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate, and does not finally determine or complete the suit. Any judgment leaving something to be done by the court, before the rights of the parties are determined, and not putting an end to the action in which it is entered, is interlocutory; Freem. Judg. § 12; 3 Bla. Com. 396. A judgment which is not final is called "interlocutory"; that is, an interlocutory judgment is one which determines some preliminary or subordinate point or plea, or settles some step, question, or default arising in the progress of the cause, but does not adjudicate the ultimate rights of the parties, or finally put the case out of court. Thus, a judgment or order passed upon any provisional or accessory claim or contention is, in general, merely interlocutory, although it may finally dispose of that particular matter; 1 Black, Judgm. 21.

Such is a judgment for the plaintiff upon a plea in abatement, which merely decides that the cause must proceed and the defendant put in a better plea. But, in the ordinary sense, interlocutory judgments are those incomplete judgments whereby the right of the plaintiff is indeed established, but the quantum of damages sustained by him is not ascertained. This can only be the case where the plaintiff recovers; for judgment for the defendant is always complete as well as final. The interlocutory judgments of most common occurrence are where a demurrer has been determined for the plaintiff, or the defendant has made default, or has by cognovit actionem acknowledged the plaintiff's demand to be just. After interlocutory judgment in such case, the plaintiff must ordinarily take out a writ of inquiry, which is addressed to the sheriff, commanding him to summon a jury and assess the damages, and upon the return of the writ of inquiry final judgment may be entered for the amount ascertained by the jury. It is not always necessary to have a writ of inquiry upon interlocutory judgment; for it is said that "this is a mere inquest of office to inform the conscience of the court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages;" 3 Wils. 62, per Wilmot, C. J.; and accordingly, if the damages are matter of mere computation, as, for instance, interest upon a bill of exchange or promissory note, it is usual for the court to refer it to the master or prothonotary, to ascertain what is due for principal, interest, and costs, whose report supersedes the necessity of a writ of inquiry; 4 Term 275; 1 H. Bla. 541; 4 Price 134. But in actions where a specific thing is sued for, as in actions of debt for a sum certain, the judgment upon demurrer, default, or confession is not interlocutory, but is absolutely complete and final in the first instance.

2. Final judgments are such as at once put an end to the action by determining the right and fixing the amount in dispute. Such are a judgment for defendant at any stage of the suit, a judgment for plaintiff after verdict, a judgment for a specific amount confessed upon warrant of attorney, and a judgment signed upon the return of a writ of inquiry, or upon the assessment of damages by the master or prothonotary. Judgment for plaintiff is final also in an action brought for a specific sum, as debt for a sum certain, although entered upon a demurrer or default, because here, the amount being ascertained at the outset, the only question at issue is that respecting the right, and when that is determined nothing remains to be done. The question what is a final judgment becomes material in many cases where as to such there is a right of review on error or appeal, but not as to interlocutory judgments, as under the constitution and laws of the United States the final judgment of a state court of last resort, in which there is a federal question, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The term final judgment has been variously defined. A judgment which puts an end to the action by declaring that the plaintiff has either entitled himself, or has not, to recover the remedy he sues for. 3 Bla. Com. 398. A judgment which determines a particular cause and terminates all litigation on the same right. 1 Kent, Com. 316. A judgment which cannot be appealed from, but is perfectly conclusive as to the matter adjudicated upon. 24 Pick. 300; 2 Pet. 294; 6 How. 201, 209. A judgment is final which completely settles the rights of the parties. 86 Ky. 381.

When by any direction of a supreme court of a state, an entire cause is determined, the decision, when reduced to form and entered in the records of the court, constitutes a final judgment, whatever may be its technical designation, and is subject to review in the supreme court of the United States; 93 U. S. 108; but when the state court remands a cause for further proceedings in the lower court it is not a final judgment; 91 U. S. 1; 124 id. 320; 130 id. 167; 144 id. 197; 146 id. 354.

3. When an issue in fact, or an issue in law arising on a peremptory plea, is determined for the plaintiff, the judgment is "that the plaintiff do recover," etc., which is called a judgment quod recuperet; Steph. Pl. 126; Comyn, Dig. Abatement (I 14, I 15); 2 Archb. Pr. 3. When the issue in law arises on a dilatory plea, and is determined for the plaintiff, the judgment is only that the defendant "do answer over," called a judgment of respondeat ouster. In an action of account, judgment for the plaintiff is that the defendant "do account," quod computet. Of these, the last two, quod computet and quod respondeat ouster, are interlocutory only; the first, quod recuperet, is either final or interlocutory, according as the quantum of damages is or is not ascertained at the rendition of the judgment.

4. Judgment in error is either in affirmance of the former judgment; in recall of it for error in fact; in reversal of it for error in law; that the plaintiff be barred of his writ of error, where a plea of release of errors or of the statute of limitations is found for the defendant; or that there be a venire facias de novo, which is an award of a new trial; Smith, Act. 196. A venire facias de novo will always be awarded when the plaintiff's declaration contains a good cause of action, and judgment in his favor is reversed by the court of error; 24 Pa. 470. Frequently, however, when judgment is reversed, the court of error not merely overturns the decision of the court below, but will give such a judgment as the court below ought to have given; Smith, Act. 196.

NATURE OF THE OBLIGATION. The question whether a judgment is a contract is an old one very much discussed, and in some cases it was held to be such, chiefly upon the authority of Blackstone, who rested his opinion as to the propriety of this classification upon the doctrine of the social compact. The relations of a judgment to the idea of a contract or a quasi-contract have of late received much attention, in connection with the more careful investigation and accurate understanding of that class of obligations known as quasi-contracts. Blackstone said, "Upon showing the judgment, once obtained, still in full force and yet unsatisfied, the law immediately implies that, by the original contract of society, the defendant hath contracted a debt, and is bound to pay it;" 3 Bla. Com. 160. Of this expression it has been said, "This is certainly a very remarkable statement, and involves large assumptions in regard to 'an original contract of society' and its supposed binding force upon a judgment debtor of the nineteenth century;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 188. This early theory of an "original contract of society" has been long since abandoned, and after the time of Blackstone's Commentaries Lord Mansfield, in a carefully considered case, said, "A judgment is no contract, nor can it be considered in the light of a contract, as judicium redditur in invitum;" 3 Burr. 1545. The same view of the question was taken by the United States supreme court, which held that a judgment was not a "contract within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of a contract;" 113 U. S. 452. That court has, in two other important cases, discussed the question of the nature of a judgment and the obligation which is created by it, and in both cases it strongly dissents from the view of Blackstone and the earlier text-writers. In Louisiana v. Mayor, 108 U. S. 285, 288, the court said: "A judgment for damages, estimated in money, is sometimes called, by text-writers, a specialty or contract of record, because it establishes a legal obligation to pay the amount recovered, and, by a fiction of law, a promise to pay is implied where such legal obligation exists. It is on this principle that an action ex contractu will lie upon a judgment. But this fiction cannot convert a transaction, wanting the assent of the parties, into one which necessarily implies it. Judgments for torts are usually the result of violent contests, and, as observed by the court below, are imposed on the losing party, by a higher authority, against his will and protest. The prohibition of the federal constitution was intended to secure the observance of good faith, in the stipulation of parties, against state action. Where a transaction is not based upon any assent of parties, it cannot be said that any faith is pledged with respect to it, and no case arises for the operation of the prohibition." In this case it was held that the conversion of a statutory right to demand compensation for damages caused by a mob into a judgment does not make it a contract within the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of a contract. In the more recent case of Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, in referring to the doctrine of Blackstone, with reference to a foreign judgment, the court held that the idea that such judgment imposed or created an obligation or duty was a remnant of an ancient fiction, and "while the theory in question would serve to explain rules of pleading which originated while the fiction was believed in, it is hardly a sufficient guide at the present day in dealing with questions of international law; and it might be safer to adopt the maxim applied to foreign judgments by Chief Justice Weston, speaking for the supreme judicial court of Maine, judicium redditur in invitum, or as given by Lord Coke, in præsumptione legis judicium redditur in invitum; 15 Me. 167; Co. Lit. 248 b." In New York it is held that a judgment is in no sense a contract or agreement; 1 Cow. 316; even a judgment founded upon a contract; 50 N. Y. 176; and the same doctrine is asserted with great vigor in a later case; 95 id. 428; this is also the prevailing doctrine in other states; 35 Cal. 155; 38 Ala. N. S. 706; 56 id. 56; 13 Me. 168; 87 N. C. 404; 15 Ohio St. 364; 2 S. C. N. S. 226; 3 G. Greene 489; (and see 30 Ia. 283); 17 Ill. 572; some cases are cited contra: 3 Gray 411; 19 Vt. 43; 4 Keyes 335; S. C. 4 Abb. N. Y. App. Cas. 382. The last case alone was relied on as the authority for the proposition that a judgment is a contract by Harlan, J., dissenting, in Louisiana v. Mayor, supra, but the case so relied upon is in a collection omitted from the regular reports and is in direct contradiction to cases cited supra, in which the opposing doctrine is emphatically stated by the same court, one decided four and the other sixteen years later. See also 9 Kan. 658. The most recent text books concur in supporting the statement already made as to the weight of authority. In one a judgment is said to be not under any circumstances a contract (1 Black, Judgt. § 10), and in another it is said that though a judgment is not a contract, it may be treated in some cases as a contract or as included in that term in certain statutes; 1 Freem. Judgt. § 4. Cases in which the contrary has been held will usually be found within this classification. See CONTRACT.

The civil law conception of the judgment is said to be correctly represented by the Louisiana case of Gustine v. Bank, 10 Rob. La. 412, in which it was held that "a judgment does not create, add to, nor detract from, the indebtedness of a party; it only declares it to exist, fixes its amount, and secures to the suitor the means of enforcing payment, and it is therefore necessary to look to the obligation upon which the judgment is based and ascertain whether it has arisen from contract or quasi-contract, from a delict or quasi-delict, or merely from the operation of law; the obligation is simply enforced and increased or diminished by the decree of the court. "It is declared to exist; it is interpreted; it is applied; it is put in the way of enforcement by the judicial power of the state;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 190.

In an interesting criticism upon the terminology adopted by Prof. Keener, in his work on quasi-contracts, a writer in the Harvard Law Review objects very seriously to the use of the term quasi-contract as an expression of the obligation of a judgment, which he says is "founded upon the mandate of the court, and depends for its validity upon the right of a court to adjudicate between contending parties;" 10 Harv. L. Rev. 213.

REQUISITES AND VALIDITY. To be valid, a judicial judgment must be given by a competent judge or court, at a time and place appointed by law, and in the form it requires. A judgment would be null if the judge had not jurisdiction of the matter, or, having such jurisdiction, he exercised it when there was no court held, or out of his district, or if he rendered a judgment before the cause was prepared for a hearing.

"The fact that one judge presided when the cause was heard and another when judgment was rendered, does not invalidate the judgment;" 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 380.

The judgment must confine itself to the question raised before the court, and cannot extend beyond it. For example, where the plaintiff sues for an injury committed on his lands by animals owned and kept carelessly by defendant, the judgment may be for damages, but it cannot command the defendant for the future to keep his cattle out of the plaintiff's land. That would be to usurp the power of the legislature. A judgment declares the rights which belong to the citizen, the law alone rules future actions. The law commands all men, it is the same for all because it is general; judgments are particular decisions, which apply only to particular persons, and bind no others; they vary like the circumstances on which they are founded.

"The validity of a judgment is to be determined by the laws in force when it is rendered, and is not affected by subsequent changes therein;" 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 269. "A judgment is not void merely because it is not dated;" 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 380. Courts should not render judgments which cannot be enforced by any process known to the law; 74 Cal. 430. "In an action at law the court cannot render a conditional judgment;" 2 Mo. App. 1191.

The jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject-matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry, and in this respect a court of another state is to be regarded as a foreign court; 137 U. S. 287; and a judgment in a state court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, is binding upon the parties thereto in a suit in another state between the same parties, where the subject-matter and the issues are the same as in the former suit; 147 U. S. 87.

OPERATION AND EFFECTS. The judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is presumed to have been rendered in the due exercise of that jurisdiction over person and subject-matter, unless the contrary be shown; 60 Ill. App. 309; and after twenty years the presumption of due notice to the parties becomes conclusive; 161 Ill. 76.

Final judgments are commonly said to conclude the parties; and this is true in general, but does not apply to judgments for defendant on non suit, as in case of non suit, by nolle prosequi, and the like, which are final judgments in one sense, because they put an end to all proceedings in the suit, but which nevertheless do not debar the plaintiff from instituting another suit for the same cause. With this qualification, the rule as to the effect of a judgment is as follows: The judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is, as a plea, a bar, or, as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court. The judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction directly upon the point is in like manner conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question in another court for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent nor exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. Duchess of Kingston's case, 20 Howell, St. Tr. 538; 2 Smith, L. C. 424; Harr. Cont. 295. See, also, 2 Gall. 229; 4 Watts 183. The rule above given relates to the effect of a judgment upon proceedings in another court; if the court is the same, of course the rule holds a fortiori. Moreover, all persons who are represented by the parties, and claim under them or in privity with them, are equally concluded by the proceedings. All privies whatever in estate, in blood, or in law, are, therefore, estopped from litigating that which is conclusive upon him with whom they are in privity; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 523, 536. A decree or judgment on a matter outside of the issue raised by the pleading is a nullity; 45 N. J. Eq. 77; and so is the judgment of a court which is without jurisdiction; 124 U. S. 200.

A further rule as to the conclusiveness of judgments is sometimes stated thus: "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be impeached or set aside in any collateral proceeding except on the ground of fraud." See, generally, 1 Greenl. Ev. pt. 3, ch. 5; 84 Ky. 14; 85 Tenn. 171; 24 Neb. 490; 97 Mo. 406; 130 U. S. 565; 161 Pa. 455. A judgment of a court having jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and the parties, however erroneous it may be, is a valid, binding, and conclusive judgment, as to the matter in controversy, upon the parties thereto and those claiming under them; 82 Ga. 168; 86 Ky. 614; 118 Ind. 345; 83 Va. 129; 29 W. Va. 794; 130 U. S. 565; 144 id. 610; 146 id. 279; 152 id. 327.

This does not prevent a judgment from being attacked directly by writ of error or other proceeding in the nature of an appeal; and its validity may be impeached in other direct proceedings, as by motion to open or set it aside, and in contests between creditors in regard to the validity of their respective judgments; in this latter class of cases the court will sometimes award a feigned issue to try questions of fact affecting the validity of the judgment.

If the record of a judgment show that it was rendered without service of process or appearance of the defendant, or if that fact can be shown without contradicting the recitals of the record, it will be treated as void in any other state; 97 Mass. 538; 46 N. Y. 30; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 299; 48 Ga. 50; s. c. 15 Am. Rep. 660. But this fact cannot be shown in contradiction of the recitals of the record; Rorer, Int. St. L. 128; 17 Vt. 303; 2 McLean 511; 65 Pa. 105; contra, 46 N. Y. 30; 24 Tex. 551; 18 Wall. 457. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 27. Nor will it be presumed to be void because of the absence of the return of service on the summons; 82 Va. 690. A judgment is not less conclusive because rendered by default; 122 U. S. 306; but a default judgment is void unless service has been had according to law; 7 Mont. 100, 288; 17 Or. 204; 31 W. Va. 364; and a money judgment against a non-resident defendant who is not personally served within the jurisdiction, and who does not voluntarily appear, is void; 73 Tex. 547; 70 id. 588; 147 Mass. 536. In the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff. it was held that a personal judgment is without any validity, if it be rendered by a state court in an action upon a money demand against a non-resident of the state, who was served by a publication of summons, but upon whom no personal service of process within the state was made and who did not appear; no title to property passes by a sale under an execution issued upon such a judgment; 95 U. S. 714.

Matters of defence arising since the judgment may be taken advantage of by a writ of audita querela, or, which is more usual, the court may afford summary relief on motion.

Although a judgment is vitiated by fraud it is not thereby rendered absolutely void; it is valid as between the parties to the fraud, and can be avoided only by a person injured by it; 1 Morr. (Ia.) 467; as where one holding a judgment against a railroad brought a suit to have another judgment, and a lease of the road to secure it, declared void for fraud, and obtained a decree accordingly, it was held, that the decree did not affect the validity of the judgment and the lease as between the parties thereto; 3 Wall. 704.

All the judgments, decrees, or other orders of courts, however conclusive in their character, are under the control of the court which pronounced them during the term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and may then be set aside, vacated, or modified by the court; 24 Neb. 803; 140 U. S. 25; but after the term has ended, unless proceedings to correct the errors alleged have been taken before its close, they can only be corrected by writ of error or appeal, as may be allowed in a court which by law can reverse the decision; 14 Cent. L. J. 250; 102 U. S. 107; 9 Wall. 103. To this rule there is an exception founded on the common-law writ of coram nobis, which brought before the court where the error was committed certain mistakes of fact not put in issue or passed upon by the court, such as the death of one of the parties when the judgment was rendered, coverture if a female party, infancy and failure to appoint a guardian, error in the process, or mistake of the clerk. But if the error was in the judgment itself, the writ did not lie. What was formerly done by this writ is now attained by motion and affidavits when necessary; 14 Cent. L. J. 258; 7 Pet. 147. See 128 Ill. 595; 86 Ky. 128. A judge has the power to amend a record at any time, so as to make it speak the truth; 100 N. C. 297; 84 Ala. 36.

A joint judgment which is void as to one of the parties is void as to all; 6 Mackey 548. A judgment against several persons, one of whom dies before its rendition, is voidable as to all; 129 Ill. 241. See RES JUDICATA.

MERGER. The question how far the cause of action is merged in a judgment sometimes becomes very material, as affecting the right to sue on the former in another jurisdiction. The general principle has been thus stated with respect to the operation of the judgment with both parties to it. "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction discharges the obligation which the action is brought to enforce. The judgment may operate either to merge the original obligation, in so far as judgment is rendered for the plaintiff; or to estop the plaintiff from subsequently setting up his original claim, in so far as judgment is rendered for the defendant." Harr. Cont. 295.

The effect of the merger of the cause of action is often very serious; one having a right of action against two or more persons may, by recovering judgment against one of them, lose his remedy against the others. As where the plaintiff, in an action upon a joint contract obligation elected to enter judgment against one defendant, in default of plea or answer, the judgment was held a bar to a subsequent action against the other, the debt being merged in the judgment; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1015; 89 Hun 44; but the cause of action does not merge in a void judgment; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 378.

Where the cause of action has arisen in a foreign country, the plaintiff has the option to sue on a judgment obtained there, or ignoring the judgment to proceed upon the original cause of action, in both cases subject to certain exceptions, as where the judgment is to enforce a penalty or for a tort on which there is no action here; 2 Curt. C. C. 559. This choice of remedy does not exist in the case of judgments in sister states; a cause of action in such case is merged and the remedy is confined to an action on the judgment; Freeman, Judgments § 241; 105 Mass. 504; 31 N. J. L. 317; 16 Pa. 241; contra, 2 Gratt. 532. The rule as stated is subject to the exception that there is no merger of the cause of action in the judgment unless the latter is general. Where the judgment was in a penal action, the action was held not to abate on the death of a party, because the judgment having been entered, the action thereafter had the attributes of a contract; 119 N. Y. 117.

It has been held that in an action of tort, the tort merges in the judgment, so as to allow an attachment as on the contract; 2 Ia. 535; although a tort cannot be set up as a counter-claim, the judgment upon it may, as constituting a contract; 4 Keyes 335; so it was held that a judgment so far extinguished the original debt that a set-off available in the suit on the debt by reason of a claim against an assignor of said debt was no longer available after judgment; 38 Ind. 429.

Although a contract could have been attacked as usurious, it was not so after judgment, and a mortgage given to secure the latter could not be objected to on account of the original usury: 12 Mass. 268.

The doctrine of the merger of the cause of action is not carried to such extreme as to defeat the equities or just rights of the defendant or plaintiff. Thus it has been held with some frequency that it can be shown against a judgment that the same was obtained upon a debt which was provable against defendant in proceedings in insolvency, and being so provable was barred by the discharge in insolvency, and as the discharge barred the debt, it barred the judgment resting on the debt; 3 N. Y. 216; 3 Barb. Ch. 360; 3 Barb. 429.

Where the defendant was sued in Massachusetts, in debt on a judgment, he pleaded a discharge under the New York insolvency law, and it was held that the court would look behind the judgment and see whether under the facts giving rise to it, it was so discharged; 12 Pick. 572; and, on the other hand, a judgment apparently discharged by insolvency proceedings, but found to be based on notes executed before the passage of the insolvent law was held not affected by the latter and enforceable; 1 Cow. 316; 3 id. 147; so it was held that a judgment does not prevent a creditor from taking an attachment as a non-resident creditor; 2 Md. 457.

In this case the principle is very well stated thus: Though a judgment is to some purposes a merger of the original contract, and constitutes a new debt, yet when the essential rights of the parties are influenced by the nature of the original contract, the court will look into the judgment for the purpose of ascertaining what the original contract was.

The principle of the cases last cited has been frequently enunciated. In the case in 3 N. Y. 216, Hurlbert, J., said, that "a judgment, instead of being regarded strictly as a new debt, is sometimes held to be merely the old debt, in a new form, so as to prevent a technical merger from working injustice." In the case in 12 Pick. 572, Shaw, C. J., said: "Although a judgment, to some purposes, is considered as a merger of the former, and as constituting a new cause of action, yet when the essential rights of parties are influenced by the nature of the original contract, the court will look into the judgment for the purpose of ascertaining what the nature of such original cause of action was. Any other decision would carry the technical doctrine of merger to an inconvenient extent and cause it to work injustice."

FORM. The form of the judgment varies according to the nature of the action and the circumstances, such as default, verdict, etc., under which it is obtained. Anciently great particularity was required in the entries made upon the judgment roll; but now, even in the English practice, the drawing up the judgment roll is generally neglected, except in cases where it is absolutely necessary, as where it is desirable to give the proceedings in evidence on some future occasion; Smith, Act. 169. In this country the roll is rarely if ever drawn up, the simple entry on the trial list and docket, "judgment for plaintiff," or "judgment for defendant," being all that is generally considered necessary; and though the formal entries are in theory still required to constitute a complete record, yet if such record should subsequently be needed for any purpose, it may be made up after any length of time from the skeleton entries upon the docket and trial list. See 11 Pa. 399. When the record is thus drawn up in full, the ancient formalities must be observed, at least in a measure.

Judgments on Verdict. A judgment on a verdict virtually overrules all demurrers to the declaration; 37 W. Va. 645. The form of such verdicts varies according to the action and frequently also with the character in which a party sues or is sued.

In account, judgment for the plaintiff is interlocutory in the first instance, that the defendant do account, quod computet; 4 Wash. C. C. 84; 2 Watts 95; 1 Pa. 138.

In assumpsit, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover the damages assessed by the jury, and full costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 100. Judgment for the defendant is that he recover his costs. For the form, see Tidd, Pr. Forms 165.

In case, trover, and trespass, the judgment is the same in substance, and differs but slightly in form from that of assumpsit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 100, 147.

A judgment in trover passes title to the goods in question; 53 Mo. App. 652; 16 So. Rep. (Ala.) 704; but only where the value of the thing converted is included in the judgment; 5 H. & N. 288; and it is held that an unsatisfied judgment does not pass the property; L. R. 6 C. P. 584; 3 Wall. 1, 16; 27 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 327. In a somewhat analogous case it was held that a judgment for the value of horses lost to the owner by negligence of the defendant, of itself passes title to the horses to the defendant becoming liable for their value; 78 Tex. 298. But see 1 Rawle 121. Where personal property had been sold and partly paid for, title being retained by the vendor, and he recovered in trover both the property and instalments due, on appeal it was directed that the judgment be discharged on payment within a time limited of purchase money, interest, and cost, otherwise the original judgment below to stand of full force; 87 Ga. 230.

In covenant, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover the amount of his damages as found which he has sustained by reason of the breach or breaches of the defendant's covenant, together with costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 116. Judgment for defendant is for costs.

In debt, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover his debt, and in general nominal damages for the detention thereof; and in cases under the 8th & 9th Will. III. c. 11, for successive breaches of a bond conditioned for the performance of a covenant, it is also awarded that he have execution for such damages, and likewise full costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 108. But in some penal and other actions the plaintiff does not always recover costs; Esp. Pen. Act. 154; Hull, Costs 200; Bull. N. P. 333; 5 Johns. 251. Judgment for defendant is generally for costs; but in certain penal actions neither party can recover costs; 5 Johns. 251. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 176.

In detinue, judgment for the plaintiff is in the alternative that he recover the goods or the value thereof if he cannot have the goods themselves, with damages for the detention, and costs; 1 Chitty, Pl. 121, 122; 1 Dall. 458. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 187.

If judgment in any of the above personal actions is against the defendant in the character of executor, it confines the liability of the defendant for the debt or damages to the amount of assets of the testator in his hands, but leaves him personally liable for costs. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 168. If the executor defendant has pleaded plene administravit, judgment against him confines his liability to such amount of the assets as shall hereafter come to his hands. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 174. A general judgment for costs against an administrator plaintiff is against the estate only.

A judgment against an executor or heir where the plea is false, to the defendant's own knowledge, may be a general judgment as if the recovery was for his own debt, but in other cases a judgment against an executor is generally special, to be levied of the goods or land of his testator; 7 Taunt. 580; 5 id. 554.

A judgment on a covenant of a married woman against her separate estate may be entered as a personal judgment against her; 20 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 917; such judgment must be entered in a special form; 14 Ch. D. 837; but the record need show no special fact fixing her liability; 2 Pa. Dist. R. 690.

In dower, judgment for demandant is interlocutory in the first instance with the award of a writ of habere facias seisinam, and inquiry of damages, on the return of which final judgment is rendered for the value of the land detained, as ascertained by the jury, from the death of the husband to the suing out of the inquisition, and costs of suit. See the form, 3 Chitty, Pl. 583.

In ejectment, judgment for plaintiff is final in the first instance, that he recover the term, together with the damages assessed by the jury, and the costs of suit, with award of the writ of habere facias possessionem, directing the sheriff to put him in possession. See the form, 3 Bla. Com. App. xii.; Tidd, Pr. Forms 188. A judgment in ejectment is conclusive as to title between the parties thereto, unless the jury find for the plaintiff less than the fee; 78 Ga. 142. A consent verdict in ejectment is conclusive on the parties and their privies; 78 Ga. 142.

In partition, judgment for plaintiff is also interlocutory in the first instance; quod partitio fiat with award of the writ de partitione facienda, on the return of which final judgment is rendered,—"therefore it is considered that the partition aforesaid be held firm and effectual forever," quod partitio facta firma et stabilis in perpetuam teneatur; Co. Litt. 169. See the form, 2 Sell. Pr. 319, 2d ed. 222.

In replevin. If the replevin is in the detinuit, i. e. where the plaintiff declares that the chattels "were detained until replevied by the sheriff," judgment for plaintiff is that he recover the damages assessed by the jury for the taking and unjust detention, or for the detention only where the taking was justifiable, and also his costs; 5 S. & R. 133; Hamm. N. P. 488. If the replevin is in the detinet, i. e. where the plaintiff declares that the chattels taken are "yet detained," the jury in giving a verdict for plaintiff find, in addition to the above, the value of the chattels each separately; for the defendant will perhaps restore some, in which case the plaintiff is to recover the value of the remainder; Hamm. N. P. 489; Fitzh. N. B. 159 b; 5 S. & R. 130.

If the replevin be abated, the judgment is that the writ or plaint abate, and that the defendant, having avowed, have a return of the chattels.

If the plaintiff is nonsuited, the judgment for defendant, at common law, is that the chattels be restored to him, and that without his first assigning the object of the taking, because by abandoning his suit the plaintiff admits that he had no right to dispossess the defendant by prosecuting the replevin. The form of this judgment is simply "to have a return," pro retorno habendo, without adding the words "to hold irreplevisable;" Hamm. N. P. 490. For the form of judgments of nonsuit under the statutes 21 Hen. VIII. c. 19, and 17 Car. II. c. 7, see Hamm. N. P. 490; 2 Chitty, Pl. 161; 8 Wentw. Pl. 116; 5 S. & R. 132; 1 Saund. 195, n. 3; 2 id. 286, n. 5. In these cases the defendant has the option of taking his judgment pro retorno habendo at common law; 5 S. & R. 132; 1 Lev. 255; 3 Term 349.

When the avowant succeeds upon the merits, the common-law judgment is that he "have return irreplevisable;" for it is apparent that he is by law entitled to keep possession of the goods; 5 S. & R. 145; Hamm. N. P. 493; 1 Chitty, Pl. 162. For the form of judgment in such case under the statutes last mentioned, see Hamm. N. P. 494.

After Verdict. the general form of judgment for plaintiff in actions on contracts sounding in damages, and in actions founded on torts unaccompanied with violence, is this: "Therefore it is considered that the said A B do recover against the said C D his damages aforesaid, and also —— for his said costs and charges, by the court now here adjudged of increase to the said A B, with his assent; which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to ——. And the said C D in mercy, etc." In debt for a sum certain, the general form is "—— that the said A B do recover against the said C D his said debt, and also —— for his damages which he has sustained, as well on occasion of detaining the said debt as for his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended, by the court now here adjudged to the said A B, and with his assent. And the said C D in mercy, etc." In actions founded on torts accompanied with violence, the form of judgments for plaintiff is, "—— that the said A B do recover against the said C D his damages aforesaid, and also —— for his said costs and charges by the court now here adjudged of increase to the said A B, and with his consent; which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to ——. And let the said C D be taken, etc."

Final judgment for the defendant is in these words: "Therefore it is considered that the said A B take nothing by his writ but that he be in mercy, etc. (or that he and his pledges to prosecute be in mercy, etc.), and that the said C D do go thereof without day, etc. And it is further considered ——." Then follows the award of costs and of execution therefor. See Tidd, Pr. Forms 189.

This is the general form of judgment for defendant, whether it arise upon interlocutory proceedings or upon verdict, and whatever be the form of action. This is sometimes called judgment of nil capiat per breve or per billam; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

The words "and the said —— in mercy, etc., or, as expressed in Latin, quod sit in misericordia pro falso clamore suo, were formerly an operative part of the judgment, it being an invariable rule of the common law that the party who lost his cause was punished by amercement for having unjustly asserted or resisted the claim. And on this account pledges of prosecution were required of the plaintiff before the return of the original, who were real and responsible persons and liable for these amercements. But afterwards the amercements ceased to be exacted,—perhaps because the payment of costs took their place,—and, this portion of the judgment becoming mere matter of form, the pledges returned were the fictitious names John Doe and Richard Roe. Bacon, Abr. Fines, etc. (C 1); 1 Ld. Raym. 273.

The words "and let the said —— be taken," in Latin, capiatur pro fine, which occur above in the form of judgment in actions founded on torts accompanied with violence, were operative at common law, because formerly a defendant adjudged to have committed a civil injury with actual violence was obliged to pay a fine to the king for the breach of the peace implied in the act, and was liable to be arrested and imprisoned till the fine was paid. This was abolished by stat. 5 W. & M. c. 12; but the form was still retained in entering judgment against defendant in such actions. See Gould, Pl. §§ 38, 82; Bacon, Abr. Fines, etc. (C 1); 1 Ld. Raym. 273; Style 346.

These are called, respectively, judgments of misericordia and of capiatur.

Judgments in Other Cases. On a plea in abatement, either party may demur to the pleading of his adversary or they may join issue.

On demurrer, judgment for the plaintiff is that the defendant have another day to plead in chief, or, as it is commonly expressed, that he answer over; quod respondeat ouster; and judgment for defendant is that the writ be quashed; quod cassetur billa or breve. But if issue be joined, judgment for plaintiff is quod recuperet, that he recover his debt or damages, and not quod respondeat; judgment for defendant is the same as in the case of demurrer, that the writ be quashed. But the plaintiff may admit the validity of the plea in abatement, and may himself pray that his bill or writ may be quashed, quod cassetur billa or breve, in order that he may afterwards sue or exhibit a better one; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97; Lawes, Civ. Pl. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 195. Judgment on demurrer in other cases, when for the plaintiff, is interlocutory in assumpsit and actions sounding in damages, and recites that the pleading to which exception was taken by defendant appears sufficient in law, and that the plaintiff ought, therefore, to recover; but the amount of damages being unknown, a court of inquiry is awarded to ascertain them. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 181. In debt it is final in the first instance. See the form, id. p. 181. Judgment on demurrer when for the defendant is always final in the first instance, and is for costs only. See the form, id. 195.

Judgment by default, whether by nil dicit or non sum informatus, is in these words, in assumpsit or other actions for damages, after stating the default: "wherefore the said A B ought to recover against the said C D his damages on occasion of the premises; but because it is unknown to the court, etc., now hear what damages the said A B hath sustained by means of the premises, the sheriff is commanded, etc." Then follows the award of the writ of inquiry, on the return of which final judgment is signed. See the forms, Tidd. Pr. Forms 165. In debt for a sum certain, as on a bond for the payment of a sum of money, the judgment on default is final in the first instance, no writ of inquiry being necessary. See the form, id. 169.

Plaintiff cannot take a default where there is no declaration on file; 55 Ill. App. 350; and a default cannot be entered after defendant has interposed a plea in bar; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 630; but the mere filing of an answer will not prevent a judgment by default, there must also be a subsequent appearance by defendant to protect his rights; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 490.

It is error to enter judgment by default while a plea to part and a demurrer to the rest of the declaration are on file; 50 Ill. App. 131; but the rendition of a judgment by default, where the petition states the facts sufficient to maintain the cause of action, is within the discretion of the trial judge; 3 Ohio, Dec. 57; and so is the opening of a judgment by default; 39 Pac. Rep. (Okl.) 281; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 824; 17 Misc. Rep. 339; where an answer failed to reach the court in time through the fault of the postmaster, it was held that a default should be set aside; 55 Ill. App. 668.

Judgment by cognovit actionem is for the amount admitted to be due, with costs, as on a verdict. See the form, id. 176. In Pennsylvania by statute, the plaintiff may take judgment for an amount admitted to be due and proceed to trial for the remainder of his claim.

Judgment of non pros. or non suit is final, and is for defendant's costs only, which is also the case with judgment on a discontinuance or nolle prosequi. See id. 189.

Matters of Practice. Of docketing the judgment. By the stat. 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, all final judgments are required to be regularly docketed: that is, an abstract of the judgment is to be entered in a book called the judgment-docket; 3 Bla. Com. 398. And in these states the same regulation prevails. See 37 Minn. 533. Besides this, an index is required to be kept in England of judgments confessed upon warrant of attorney, and of certain other sorts of judgments; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 396, n. In most of the states this index is required to include all judgments. The effect of docketing the judgment is to notify all interested persons, including purchasers or incumbrancers of land upon which the judgment is a lien, and subsequent judgment creditors, of the existence and amount of the judgment. Freem. Judg. § 343. Judgments only become liens from the time they are rendered, or notice thereof is filed in the register's office of the county where the property is situated; 133 U. S. 594. In Pennsylvania, the judgment index is for this purpose conclusive evidence of the amount of a judgment in favor of a purchaser of the land bound thereby, but not against him: if the amount indexed is less than the actual amount, the purchaser is not bound to go beyond the index; but if the amount indexed is too large, he may resort to the judgment-docket to correct the mistake; 1 Pa. 408. A failure to index the abstract of a judgment is fatal to the lien; 70 Tex. 434, 458; 77 Ia. 381.

Now, in England, judgments, in order to affect purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, must be registered in the common pleas, and renewed every five years. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, s. 5.

Of the time of entering the judgment. After verdict a brief interval is allowed to elapse before signing judgment, in order to give the defeated party an opportunity to apply for a new trial, or to move in arrest of judgment, if he is so disposed. This interval, in England, is four days; Smith, Actions 150. In this country it is generally short; but, being regulated either by statute or by rules of court, it of course may vary in the different states, and even in different courts of the same state.

JUDGMENT BOOK. A book which is required to be kept by a clerk among the records of the court, for the entry of judgments. Code N. Y. § 279.

JUDGMENT CREDITOR. See CREDITOR, JUDGMENT.

JUDGMENT DEBT. See DEBT.

JUDGMENT IN PERSONAM. See JUDGMENT INTER PARTES; IN PERSONAM.

JUDGMENT IN REM. An adjudication pronounced upon the status of some particular subject-matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose. 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2015.

An adjudication against some person or thing, or upon the status of some subject-matter; which, wherever and whenever binding upon any person, is equally binding upon all persons. 10 Mo. App. 78.

The universal effect of a judgment in rem depends upon the principle that it is a solemn declaration, proceeding from an accredited quarter, concerning the status of the thing adjudicated upon; which very declaration operates accordingly upon the status of the thing adjudicated upon, and ipso facto, renders it such as it is thereby declared to be; 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2015–16, 2032, 2043.

The most frequent cases of such judgment are found in the courts exercising jurisdiction of cases in admiralty. So also a foreign court in a case of divorce which is recognized as establishing the status of a person is a judgment in rem.

In the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, the United States supreme court said: "It is true that, in a strict sense, a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but, in a larger and more general sense, the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage, or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in this state, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned." 95 U. S. 734. A judgment against a railway company in favor of an assignee of claims for labor performed for a subcontractor, which forecloses a statutory lien on the property of the company for debt, and orders a sale of the property, cannot be construed as a judgment in personam; 12 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 258; 59 Tex. 587. See IN REM.

JUDGMENT INTER PARTES or IN PERSONAM. One which operates only upon those who have been duly made parties to the record and their privies, being against a person merely, and not settling the status of any person or thing. See 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2016; JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT IN REM.

JUDGMENT NISI. A judgment entered on the return of the nisi prius record with the postea indorsed, which will become absolute according to the terms of the "postea" unless the court out of which the nisi prius record proceeded shall, within the first four days of the following term, otherwise order.

Under the compulsory arbitration law of Pennsylvania, on filing the award of the arbitrators, judgment nisi is to be entered, which judgment is to be valid as if it had been rendered on a verdict of a jury, unless an appeal is entered within the time required by law.

JUDGMENT NOTE. A promissory note given in the usual form, and containing, in addition, a power of attorney to appear and confess judgment for the sum therein named. On this account it is not negotiable; 77 Pa. 131; but see 19 Ohio 130.

It usually contains a number of stipulations as to the time of confessing the judgment; 11 Ill. 623; against appeal and other remedies for setting the judgment aside; see 9 Johns. 80; 20 id. 296; 2 Cowp. 465; 2 Pa. 501; 15 Ill. 356; an attorney's commission for collection, waiver of exemption, and other conditions.

JUDGMENT PAPER. In English Practice. An incipitur of the pleadings, written on plain paper, upon which the master will sign judgment. 1 Archb. Pr. 229, 306, 343.

JUDGMENT RECORD. In English Practice. A parchment roll on which are transcribed the whole proceedings in the cause, deposited and filed of record in the treasury of the court, after signing of judgment. 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 601. See JUDGMENT ROLL. In American practice, the record is signed, filed, and docketed by the clerk, all of which is necessary to suing out execution; Graham, Pr. 341.

JUDGMENT RECOVERED. A plea by a defendant that the plaintiff has already recovered that which he seeks to obtain by his action. This was formerly a species of sham plea, often put in for the purpose of delaying a plaintiff's action. M. & W.

JUDGMENT ROLL. In English Law. A record made of the issue roll (which see), which, after final judgment has been given in the cause, assumes this name. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97; 3 Chitty, Stat. 514; Freem. Judg. § 75. The Judicature Act of 1875 requires every judgment to be entered in a book by the proper officer.

JUDICARE. To judge; to decide or determine judicially; to give judgment or sentence.

JUDICATIO. In Civil Law. Judging; the pronouncing of sentence; after hearing a cause. Halifax, Civil Law b. 3, c. 8, no. 7.

JUDICATORES TERRARUM. Certain tenants in Chester, who were bound by their tenures to perform judicial functions. In case of an erroneous judgment being given by them, the party aggrieved might obtain a writ of error out of Chancery, directing them to reform it. They then had a month to consider of the matter. If they declined to reform their judgment, the matter came on writ of error before the king's bench; and if the court of king's bench held the judgment to be erroneous they forfeited £100 to the king by the custom. Jenk. Cent. (ii. 34), p. 71.

JUDICATURE. The state of those employed in the administration of justice; and in this sense it is nearly synonymous with judiciary. This term is also used to signify a tribunal; and sometimes it is employed to show the extent of jurisdiction: as, the judicature is upon writs of error, etc. Comyn, Dig. Parliament (L 1). And see Comyn, Dig. Courts (A).

JUDICATURE ACTS. The English acts under which the present system of courts was organized and is continued.

The statutes of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77, which went into force Nov. 1, 1875, with amendments in 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 78, and 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 68, made most important changes in the organization of, and methods of procedure in, the superior courts of England, consolidating them together so as to constitute one Supreme Court of Judicature, consisting of two divisions: Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, having chiefly original jurisdiction, and Her Majesty's Court of Appeal, whose jurisdiction is chiefly appellate. To the former was transferred the jurisdiction of the courts of chancery (both at common law and equity), queen's bench, common pleas (at Westminster, Lancaster, and Durham), exchequer (as a court of revenue as well as a common-law court), admiralty, probate, divorce, and the assize court, with certain exceptions, of which the most important is the appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeal in chancery. The London court of bankruptcy was included in this list by the act of 1873, but excluded by that of 1875. To Her Majesty's Court of Appeal is transferred the jurisdiction exercised by the lord chancellor and lords justices of the court of appeal in chancery, the court of exchequer chamber, the judicial committee of the privy council on appeal from the high court of admiralty, or from any order in lunacy made by the lord chancellor, or any other person having jurisdiction in lunacy. This was the transfer, by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, of the appellate jurisdiction, theretofore exercised by the lord chancellor, to the court of appeal, consisting of the lord chancellor and two lords justices, with an appeal, "only on matters of law or equity, or on the admission or rejection of evidence." By the act of 1873, no appeals were to be brought from the High Court or Court of Appeal to the house of lords or the privy council, but by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59, the house of lords retains for all practical purposes here, its powers and functions to hear appeals from Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in England, and from the courts of Scotland and Ireland. (See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.) Her Majesty's Court of Appeal practically takes the place of the exchequer chamber in appeals in common-law actions, and also hears appeals in chancery, previously heard by the chancellor or by the court of appeal in chancery, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, and of the same court as a court of appeal in bankruptcy. It consists of five ex-officio judges, viz., the lord chancellor as president, the lord chief justice of England, the master of the rolls, the president for the time being of the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the High Court of Justice, and five ordinary judges of the court of appeal, to be styled, by the act of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, lords justices of appeal, the first three of whom are to be made by the transfer of three judges from the High Court of Justice.

The High Court of Justice originally consisted of five divisions as follows: 1. The chancery division consisted of the lord chancellor, the master of the rolls (but by the act of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 68, the master of the rolls ceases to belong to the high court, and provision is made for a judge in his place, who shall be in the same position as a puisne judge under the acts of 1873 and 1875), and such of the vice chancellors of the court of chancery as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the court of appeal. The Judicature Act of 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, provides for the appointment of a new judge, to be attached to the chancery division, and entitles the puisne judges, justices of the high court. The lord chancellor is not to be deemed a permanent judge of the High Court of Justice.

2. The queen's bench division, consisting of the lord chief justice of England, and such other of the judges of the court of queen's bench as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal.

3. The common pleas division, consisting of the lord chief justice of the common pleas, and such other judges of the court of common pleas as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal.

4. The exchequer division, consisting of the lord chief baron of the exchequer, and certain other barons of the court of exchequer.

5. The probate, divorce, and admiralty division, consisting of two judges, one of whom shall be the judge of the court of probate and of the court for divorce and matrimonial causes, and the judge of the high court of admiralty.

Crown cases reserved were decided by the judges of the High Court of Justice, or at least five of them, of whom the lord chief justice of England, the lord chief justice of the common pleas, and the lord chief baron of the exchequer, or one of them, should sit. Their determination was final, save for some error of law upon the record, as to which no question should have been reserved for their decision, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78.

By an Order in Council of Dec. 16, 1880, the offices of lord chief baron of the exchequer and lord chief justice of the common pleas were abolished, and the common pleas and exchequer divisions were merged in the queen's bench division, to which the judges of the other two divisions were attached. The court therefore now consists of three divisions only, chancery, queen's bench, and probate, divorce, and admiralty.

Any judge of any of the above divisions may be transferred by Her Majesty from one to another of the said divisions. Divisional courts of the high courts of justice may be held for the transaction of special business, consisting usually of two judges.

The reports of the adjudicated cases were, under the first division of the court, arranged thus:—

Appeal cases. Cases decided by the house of lords and privy council, cited as App. Cas. They are reported with the cases of the division from which the appeal was taken, and are indicated as, "In the court of appeal," or "C. A.;" chancery division, cited as Ch. Div.; common pleas division, cited as C. P. Div.; exchequer division, cited as Ex. Div.

Probate division. Cases decided by the probate, divorce, and admiralty divisions, cited as P. Div.

Queen's bench division, cited as Q. B. Div.

There are now four series: Appeal cases, Chancery, Queen's Bench, Probate. In citing cases since January 1, 1891, the year of the report precedes the reference to the court, as: [1895] 1 Q. B. 476; [1894] 2 Ch. 302, and a new series of volumes is begun each year.

These acts provide for a concurrent administration of legal and equitable remedies, according to seven rules, which substantially provide that any one of the courts, included in the acts shall give the same equitable relief to any plaintiff or defendant claiming it as would formerly have been granted by chancery; equitable relief will be granted against third persons, not parties, who shall be brought in by notice; all equitable estates, titles, rights, duties, and liabilities will be taken notice of as in chancery; no proceeding shall be restrained by injunction, but every matter of equity on which an injunction might formerly have been obtained may be relied on by way of defence, and the courts may in any cause direct a stay of proceedings. Subject to these and certain other provisions of the act, effect shall be given to all legal claims and demands, and all estates, titles, rights, duties, obligations, and liabilities, existing by the common law, custom, or statute, as before the acts; the new courts shall grant, either absolutely or on terms, all such legal or equitable remedies as the parties may appear entitled to; so that all matters may be completely and finally determined, and multiplicity of legal proceedings avoided.

Eleven new rules of law are established, which will be found in the act of 1873, c. 66, § 25, amended by the act of 1875, c. 77, § 10, of the following nature; 1. In the administration of insolvent estates, the same rules shall prevail as may be in force under the law of bankruptcy; 2. No claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee, for property held on an express trust, shall be barred by any statute of limitations; 3. A tenant for life shall have no right to commit equitable waste, unless such right is expressly conferred by the instrument creating the estate; 4. There shall be no merger by operation of law only, of any estate, the beneficial interest in which would not be deemed merged in equity; 5. A mortgagor entitled for the time being to the possession of the profits of land, as to which the mortgagee shall have given no notice of his intention to take possession, may sue for such possession, or for the recovery of such profits, or to prevent or recover damages in respect of any trespass, or other wrong relative thereto, in his own name only, unless the cause of action arises upon a lease or other contract made jointly with any other person; 6. Any absolute assignment of a chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, shall pass the legal right thereto from the date of notice, and all remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge: provided, that if the debtor, etc., shall have had notice of any conflicting claims to such debt, he shall be entitled to call upon such claimants to interplead; 7. Stipulations as to time or otherwise, which would not have been deemed of the essence of the contract in equity, shall receive the same construction as formerly in equity; 8. A mandamus or an injunction may be granted, or a receiver appointed by an interlocutory order, which may be made either unconditionally or on terms; and an injunction may be granted to prevent threatened waste or trespass, whether the estates be legal or equitable, or whether the person against whom the injunction is sought is or is not in possession under any claim of title, or does or does not claim a right to do the act sought to be restrained under color of title; 9. In proceedings arising from collisions at sea, where both ships are in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the court of admiralty shall prevail; 10. In questions relating to the custody of infants, the rules of equity shall prevail; 11. Generally, in all matters in which there is any conflict between the rules of common law and the rules of equity, the latter shall prevail. As to discovery under the Judicature Acts, see 11 Harv. L. Rev. 137, 205.

By the act of 1891, c. 53, to settle doubts said to exist on the subject, it was enacted that the high court should be a prize court within the meaning of the Naval Prize Act of 1864, and the jurisdiction was assigned to the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the court. An appeal was given only to the queen in council. By the same act the house of lords was authorized to call in the aid of assessors in admiralty cases.

The act of 1894, c. 16, was directed mainly to the restricting the right of appeal.

The division of the legal year into terms is abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice, but where they are used as a measure for determining the time at or within which any act is required to be done, they may continue to be referred to. Numerous other regulations are established for the arrangement of business and course of procedure under the new system for which reference must be had to the acts. We will merely note that nothing is to affect the law relating to jury trials, and the existing forms of procedure are to be used as far as consistent with these acts. It was provided that nothing should affect the practice or procedure in—1. Criminal proceedings; 2. Proceedings on the crown side of the queen's bench division; 3. Proceedings on the revenue side of the exchequer division; 4. Proceedings for divorce and matrimonial causes. The Chancery Procedure Acts and the Common Law Procedure Acts remain in full force, except so far as impliedly or expressly repealed by the Judicature Acts. Many sections of the former Acts are repealed by subsequent legislation, all which may be found in Chitty's English Statutes, where the acts are published together as amended.

A recent writer on the English courts, in summing up the results of the present system, considers that much advantage has accrued to the public through the rearrangement of the business of the courts; pleading and practice have been been assimilated and simplified, and the power of each court to dispose, in one action, of all differences between parties has lessened the cost and delay of litigation. It has not accomplished what was expected to be the result of the change in the direction of the fusion of law and equity. This, it is thought, results largely from the fact that English law is very much of a customary nature, without statutory sanction, and that there is no code or corpus juris to which disputes may be referred, and, aside from which, there are no legal rights or obligations. Nevertheless, the dividing line between the two jurisdictions, simplified and improved in their course of procedure, has thus become once more clear and accentuated, and there is every indication that the present working of those courts is satisfactory to the public and to all branches of the legal profession; Inderwick, King's Peace 226.

JUDICATURE ACTS (IRELAND).

The act of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57, which went into operation Jan. 1, 1878, established a supreme court of judicature in Ireland, under which acts and subsequent ones a system essentially similar in its constitution to that in England is in force.

JUDICES. See JUDEX.

JUDICIAL ACT. See ACT.

JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS. Admissions of the party which appear of record in the proceedings of the court. See ADMISSIONS.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL. In English Law. A tribunal formerly composed of members of the privy council, established by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92, and subsequent acts, for hearing appeals from colonial and ecclesiastical courts and the courts of admiralty, and from certain orders in lunacy. By 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91, provision was made for the appointment of four additional members; no one was qualified who was not, when appointed, or had not been a judge of the superior courts at Westminster, or a chief justice of the High Court in Calcutta, Madras, or Bombay. The qualification now required is that the appointee must be one who has held "high judicial office," as to the definition of which see JUDICIAL OFFICE.

Much of this jurisdiction, including admiralty and lunacy appeals, has been transferred to the court of appeals. See JUDICATURE ACT; LUNACY ACTS. But the changes under the Judicature and Appellate Jurisdiction Acts do not seem to have disturbed the jurisdiction of the judicial committee over appeals from India and the colonies, which was, and still is, the principal function of that body. It has been said that "as the house of lords is the supreme court of appeal for Great Britain and Ireland, so also is the judicial committee of the privy council and supreme court of appeal for India, the colonies, and the Channel Islands, and as the area of British sovereignty extends, so also is extended the right of appeal to her majesty in council;" 2 Brett, Com. Present Laws, Eng. 775. Recent orders in council extend this right of appeal to include Fiji, Cyprus, and Zululand.

The committee is also empowered upon reference by her majesty in council to hear appeals in ecclesiastical matters, appeals from vice-admiralty courts, petitions against schemes of the charity commissioners, and petitions for the extension of letters patent; id.

See also Macpherson's Practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the introduction of which contains an extract from Lord Brougham's eloquent description of the jurisdiction.

JUDICIAL CONFESSIONS. See CONFESSIONS; PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

JUDICIAL CONVENTIONS. Agreements entered into in consequence of an order of court; as, for example, entering into a bond on taking out a writ of sequestration. 6 Mart. La. N. S. 494.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS. The opinions or determinations of the judges in causes before them. Hale, Hist. Cr. Law 63; Willes 666; 3 B. & Ald. 122; 1 H. Bla. 63; 5 M. & S. 185. See DICTUM; JUDGE-MADE LAW; PRECEDENTS.

JUDICIAL DECLARATION. In Scotch Law. The statement made by one of the parties to a suit, when judicially examined as to the particular facts on which the case rests. The term corresponds with admissions (q. v.) in English law.

JUDICIAL DISCRETION. See DISCRETION.

JUDICIAL DOCUMENTS. The papers and proceedings which constitute or become part of the record of a litigation. They include the writs, pleadings, documentary proofs, verdicts, inquisitions, judgment, and decrees incident to a cause or judicial proceeding.

Inquisitions, examinations, depositions, affidavits, and other written papers, when they have become proofs of its proceedings and are found remaining on the files of a judicial court, are judicial documents. A deposition after being received and filed as such is a judicial document and can only be proved as such, and is not admissible as a written statement or confession of deponent. It cannot be received in part and excluded in part; 27 Me. 308.

Judicial documents are thus classified by Starkie: 1. Judgments, decrees, and verdicts. 2. Depositions, examinations, and inquisitions, taken in the course of a legal process. 3. Writs, warrants, pleadings, bills, and answers, etc., which are incident to judicial proceedings.

As to the admissibility and effect of such documents, see, generally, Stark. Ev., Sharsw. ed. [316].

JUDICIAL DUTY. Within the meaning of a constitution, such a duty as legitimately pertains to an officer in a department designated by the constitution as judicial. 115 Mo. 36.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. In Scotch Law. An administrator or steward appointed by the court of session for the management of an estate which for any reason is in custodia legis. See Ersk. Pr. 253.

JUDICIAL FUNCTION. The exercise of the judicial faculty or office.

The capacity to act in the specific way which appertains to the judicial power, as one of the powers of government.

The term is used to describe generally those modes of action which appertain to the judiciary as a department of organized government, and through and by means of which it accomplishes its purposes and exercises its peculiar powers.

JUDICIAL LEGISLATION. See JUDGE-MADE LAW.

JUDICIAL LIABILITY. See JUDGE; 6 Am. Dec. 333.

JUDICIAL MORTGAGE. In Louisiana. The lien resulting from judgments, whether these be rendered on contested cases, or by default, whether they be final or provisional, in favor of the person obtaining them.

JUDICIAL NOTICE. A term used to express the doctrine of the acceptance by a court for the purposes of the case, of the truth of certain notorious facts without requiring proof.

The classes of facts of which judicial notice will be taken are judicial, legislative, political, historical, geographical, commercial, scientific, and artistic, in addition to a wide range of matters arising in the ordinary course of nature or the general current of human affairs which rest entirely upon acknowledged notoriety for their claims to judicial recognition; Wade, Notice 1403.

If unacquainted with such fact, the court may refer to any person or any document or book of reference for his satisfaction in relation thereto; or may refuse to take judicial notice thereof unless and until the party calling upon him to take such notice produces any such document or book of reference; Steph. Ev. Art. 59.

S. 37 (if they are intelligible without extrinsic proof; 23 Beav. 370); military orders of a general character within the district in which the courts are held, when such orders affect judicial proceedings, and are issued by officers of recognized authority, will be noticed; 20 La. It has been said that the courts should exercise this power with caution. Care must be taken that the requisite notoriety exists. Every reasonable doubt upon the subject should be solved promptly in the negative ; per Swayne, J., in 91 U. S. 43. In that case the court took judicial notice, in a patent case, of the principle of operation of an ice-cream freezer, and the subject of judicial notice was there fully discussed.

JUDICIAL OFFICE. A term used to define qualifications of additional members of the judicial committee of the Privy Council (q. v.) provided for by 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91. By the later acts the phrase "high judicial office" is defined to mean the office of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, judge of the high courts in England or Ireland, judge of the court of appeal of England, judge of the court of session in Scotland, paid judge of the judicial committee, lord of appeal in ordinary, or member of the judicial committee. 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59, § 25 ; 50 & 51 Vict. c. 70, § 5.

JUDICIAL POWER. The authority vested in the judges.

The authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the declaration of what the law is and its construction so far as it is written law.

The power to construe and expound the law as distinguished from the legislative and executive functions.

The use of the term judicial power in sec. 2, Art. III. of the Constitution of the United States furnished an occasion to Mr. Justice Miller for a comment upon the difficulty of defining the term ; he says, "It will not do to answer that it is the power exercised by the courts, because one of the very things to be determined is what power they may exercise. It is, indeed, very difficult to find any exact definition made to hand. It is not to be found in any of the old treatises, or any of the old English authorities or judicial decisions, for a very obvious reason. While in a general way it may be true that they had this division between legislative and judicial power, yet their legislature was, nevertheless, in the habit of exercising a very large part of the latter. The house of lords was often the court of appeals; and parliament was in the habit of passing bills of attainder as well as enacting convictions for treason and other crimes.

"Judicial power is, perhaps, better defined in some of the reports of our own courts than in any other place, and especially so in the Supreme Court of the United States, because it has more often been the subject of comment there, and its consideration more frequently necessary to the determination of questions arising in that court than anywhere else. It is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision." Miller, Const. U. S. 314.

Another writer directs attention to the absence of a real and just boundary line between judicial and legislative power in the early English jurisprudence. "In the early ages of the English system, however, the line between the judiciary and the legislature was not distinctly marked, and Parliament, consisting of one great chamber, in which sat both lords and commons, not only made but also interpreted the laws. But it has now long been settled in England that the interpretation of statute law belongs to the judiciary alone, and in this country they have claimed and obtained an equal control over the construction of constitutional provisions." Sedg. Const. L. 18.

"The power conferred upon courts in the strict sense of that term ; courts that compose one of the great departments of the government ; and not power in its judicial nature, or quasi judicial, invested from time to time in individuals, separately or collectively, for a particular purpose and limited time." 1 Blatch. 635 ; 65 Barb. 444, 448.

"Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge ; always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature ; or, in other words, to the will of the law." 9 Wheat. 738.

Nevertheless, leaving out of question the greater necessity of real definition and separation of the legislative and judicial power in American constitutional law there is a distinction between judicial power and political power which was fully recognized in English law, continues to be so in American law, and is entirely independent of the case growing out of the constitutional delimitation and separation of the three powers of government.

The distinction between judicial and political questions was fully considered in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen. 444, and it was held by Lord Hardwicke, L. C., that while the dispute as to original boundaries between provinces was a political question to be determined by the king and council, yet where the case arose under an agreement between the parties it was a judicial question.

In The Nabob of Carnatic v. East India Co. (1 Ves. Jr. 371) a plea that the defendant was invested with sovereign powers, and therefore not answerable with respect to the exercise of them in a court of justice, was overruled; but after the case came to hearing the bill was dismissed upon the ground that the case involved a treaty between persons acting as independent states, and the circumstance that the defendants were subjects merely with relation to England had nothing to do with the matter which was not a subject of private municipal jurisdiction; 2 id. 56.

The Cherokee nation was held to be a state but not a foreign state in the sense of the constitution, and therefore could not maintain an action against the state of Georgia in the courts of the United States; 5 Pet. 1. In this case Chief Justice Marshall said that the propriety of interposition by the court to control the state legislature "savors too much of the exercise of political power to be within the province of the judicial department." Mr Justice Thompson in a dissenting opinion which upheld the jurisdiction was careful to say, "I do not claim for this court the exercise of jurisdiction upon any matter properly following under the denomination of political power, and again I do not claim as belonging to the judiciary the exercise of political power. That belongs to another branch of the government. The protection and enforcement of many rights secured by treaties most certainly do not belong to the judiciary. It is only where the rights of persons or property are involved, and when such rights can be presented under some judicial form of proceedings, that courts of justice can interpose relief." 5 Pet. 51. See also 4 Dall. 4.

It was very earnestly discussed in one of the early cases concerning the boundary between two states, whether the jurisdiction in such cases, now so well established, was included in the judicial power as understood by the constitution of the United States, and it was held that although the constitution did not in terms extend the judicial power to all controversies between two or more states, yet it in terms excluded none, whatever might be their nature or object; 12 Pet. 657. In this case the court recognized the distinction between political and civil controversies and held that the case in question was the latter because it depended first upon a fact, and second upon the question whether an agreement between the states was void or valid, both of these presenting not a political but a judicial controversy. And it was said that where there was submission by sovereigns or states of a controversy between them, from that moment the question ceased to be a political one but comes immediately within the judicial power for determination by a court.

In Georgia v. Stanton (6 Wall. 50, 71) it was said that the distinction between judicial and political power is so generally acknowledged in the jurisprudence both of England and of this country that we need do no more than refer to some of the authorities on the subject. The suit invoked the power of the court to restrain the Secretary of War and his subordinates from executing acts of congress which, it was alleged, would annul and abolish the existing state government. In refusing the injunction the court said that it could hardly be denied that the case called for the judgment of the court upon political questions and upon rights, not of persons or property, but of a political character. "For the rights for the protection of which our authority is invoked, are the rights of sovereignty, of political jurisdiction, of government, of corporate existence as a state, with all its constitutional powers and privileges. No case of private rights or private property infringed, or in danger of actual or threatened infringement, is presented by the bill, in judicial form, for the judgment of the court." 6 Wall. 77.

The separation of the three departments among which, in modern systems, the sovereign powers of government are distributed, and to some extent the difficulty involved in the effort to distribute those powers, are discussed in the title EXECUTIVE POWER, which, with the title LEGISLATIVE POWER, should be read and referred to in connection with the present title.

Separation of powers, though generally adopted, does not always rest upon a constitutional basis. Whether it does or does not do so affects very materially the judicial power with respect to its stability and independence. In England, not only the supreme legislative authority, but the power of deciding upon the constitutionality of its acts, is vested in parliament, there being no fundamental law in the nature of a written constitution to which that body must conform. The phrase English constitution is one of constant use, and there is, undoubtedly, a body of fundamental principles which are recognized as having been finally accepted as inviolable and which are grouped under that name. A recent writer says that it "is made up of certain views which have been read out of or read into English history and embodied in certain governmental acts,"—"it is in a large part a matter of theory and opinion," and "the substance of it may be summed up in one sentence. All the powers of government are in the hands of parliament." Macy, Eng. Const. 14, 16.

Practically modern opinion is undivided as to this omnipotence of parliament, and under no form of law can its action be restrained or reviewed. Such restraint as is imposed upon it is a moral one which exists only in the potency of certain principles which, in the United States, have been crystallized into constitutional safeguards, while in England they remain, as it were, in solution, affecting, however, and giving form and tone to the government and the body politic. The highest judicial power in England is subordinate to the legislative power, and bound to obey any law that parliament may pass, although it may, in the opinion of the court, be in conflict with the principles of Magna Charta, or the Petition of Rights. Taney, C. J., in 117 U. S. 699, appendix.

It is doubtless true that the parliament could, as a matter of law, abolish all courts and assume to itself the administration of justice, but even in that case there would still exist the judicial power now administered by courts, and it would be equally distinct as now from the legislative function, even if both were exercised by the same agency of government.

The French constitution of Sept. 3, 1791 (the first written constitution in Europe), recited that the judicial power cannot in any case be exercised by the legislative body or by the king, and that tribunals cannot interfere with the exercise of the legislative power nor suspend the execution of the laws, nor encroach upon administrative functions, nor cite any administrators to appear before them on account of their functions. This comprehensive limitation is attributed by a thoughtful writer on this subject to the French historical associations, which were hostile to any judicial competency to criticise legislation for unconstitutionality. It is to this influence that the writer referred to attributes the different views on this subject which are found in the French constitution referred to and that of the United States. Coxe, Jud. Pow. 78. From a historical review on the subject the author last cited concludes that in France long before 1787 the French judicial power had been used to declare legislation to be void because contrary to the views of right entertained by the court; and that, by the further contrast to American views, the judicial power in question existed under an unwritten constitution and was expressly prohibited under a subsequent written constitution.

Under the Swiss constitution the federal government is organized to some extent upon the idea of the separation of powers; but as it has been observed, "the separation of powers is not very strictly observed between the federal assembly and the federal council, nor indeed . . . between the judicial authority and the political federal authorities;" Adams and Cunningham on the Swiss Confederation 48. The Swiss federal tribunal is bound by all laws passed by the federal assembly without qualification; which is not competent to decide whether the federal law be constitutional or unconstitutional; this is declared not to be a judicial question, nor is it such a question whether a constitution or a law of a canton contains anything contrary to the constitution of the confederation, such a question is extra-judicial and is decided by the federal assembly; Vincent, Swiss Government 34, 142. Another writer says that the Swiss federal court, although instituted in imitation of the American, differs from it in an essential point, while in the United States judicial power alone extends to declaring a law unconstitutional, under the Swiss constitution some points of cantonal law are reserved and the federal legislature is made the sole judge of its own powers and the authorized interpreter of the constitution; 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 354.

In Germany it is said that the law of a state must yield in case of conflict between it and constitutional law of the empire, and that the judicial tribunal must decide between them, but that it was uncertain whether such tribunal can decide upon a question of the constitutionality of a law of the empire; Coxe, Jud. Pow. 96.

In Canada it is said that the supreme court and the privy council in England have concurred in recognizing the rights of provincial courts to pass upon the constitutionality of the laws enacted by the provincial legislatures and the Dominion parliament; Doutre, Const. of Canada, preface.

For an extended historical commentary on previous systems of law, with respect to the limitations of judicial power in passing upon the validity or effect of legislation, see Coxe, Jud. Pow. pt. 1.

The English doctrine of the absolute inviolability of a legislative act never did acquire a footing in this country. It was repudiated by James Otis nearly a quarter of a century before the framing of the American constitution. He contended before the superior court of judicature for the province of Massachusetts, that the validity of statutes must be determined by courts of justice. This doctrine afterwards became the principle of American constitutional law. Before 1787, the colonial courts refused to grant writs of assistance, on the ground that general writs of assistance were unconstitutional; Quin. 504; and see 1 Bay 252, where an act passed by the colonial legislature was declared void; Mart. (N. C.) 49. Judicial questions of a national character were, under the confederation, determined by a court; Articles of Confederation, Art. 9; and the framers of the constitution ordained and established a judicary as a necessary department, and used in it the phrase judicial power as one well understood and not needing definition in the instrument itself. Federalist, Nos. 22, 28, 80, 81; 3 Elliott's Deb. 142, 143.

It is the settled law in this country that the judicial power extends to and includes the determination of the constitutionality and validity of legislative acts, although the propriety of this conclusion is still sometimes challenged. For a discussion of the subject, its history, and the authorities, see CONSTITUTIONAL.

But a court has no power to declare a duly enacted statute unconstitutional simply because it may seem to the court that such legislation does not conform to the general theory upon which the government is founded; 51 Fed. Rep. 774.

The constitution of the United States declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Art. 3, s. 1.

It has been remarked that the essential character of its judiciary is a distinct recognition by the constitution of the nationality of the federal government; Pom. Const. L. § 108.

By the constitutions of the several states, the judicial power is vested in such courts as are enumerated in each respectively. See the articles on the several states. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States to forbid or prevent the legislature of a state from exercising judicial functions; 2 Pet. 413; but even in the absence of special limitations in the state constitutions, legislatures cannot exercise powers in their nature essentially judicial; 13 N. Y. 391. The different classes of power have been apportioned to different departments, and as all derive their authority from the same instrument, there is an implied exclusion of each department from exercising the functions conferred upon the others; Cooley, Const. Lim. 106. The legislative power cannot from its nature be assimilated to the judicial; the law is made by the one, and applied by the other; 1 N. H. 204; 11 Pa. 494; 19 Ill. 282; 1 Ohio St. 81; 13 N. Y. 391; 54 N. J. L. 288; 29 Fla. 1. In the oft-repeated phrase of Chief Justice Marshall, "the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes, the law." 10 Wheat. 1, 46.

Two capital distinctions have been noted between the judicial power in England and in the United States,—the first grows out of the existence in the latter country of a written constitution restricting the power of the legislature, from which springs the duty of the courts to declare invalid any act which is expressly prohibited by or which is not authorized by the constitution, either expressly or by implication. The other results from the power of construction imposed upon the American judge by the brevity of the constitution. Continuing the last thought, it is said:

"The words of that instrument are general, laying down a few large principles. The cases which will arise as to the construction of these general words cannot be foreseen until they arise. When they do arise the generality of the words leaves open to the interpreting judges a far wider field than is afforded by ordinary statutes, which, since they treat of one particular subject, contain enactments comparatively minute and precise. Hence, although the duty of a court is only to interpret, the considerations affecting interpretations are more numerous than in the case of ordinary statutes, more delicate, larger in their reach and scope. They sometimes need the exercise not merely of legal acumen and judicial fairness but of a comprehension of the nature and methods of government which one does not demand from the European judge who walks in the narrow path traced for him by ordinary statutes. It is therefore hardly an exaggeration to say that the American constitution, as it now stands, with the mass of fringing decisions which explain it, is a far more complete and finished instrument than it was when it came fire-new from the hands of the Convention. It is not merely their work but the work of the judges, and most of all one man, the great Chief Justice Marshall." Bryce, Am. Com. 268.

The American system of leaving constitutional questions to be settled by the courts is considered by the author quoted to secure very great advantages over the theory which was advanced at the time of the formation of the federal government of subjecting the acts of the state legislature to the veto of congress. The result is, as he puts it, that "the court does not go to meet the question; it waits for the question to come to it. When the court acts, it acts at the instance of a party, sometimes the plaintiff or the defendant may be the national government or a state government, but far more frequently both are private persons, seeking to enforce or defend their private rights." He illustrates this by the fact that the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck, 9 Cra. 87, that a repeal of a grant by the state to an individual impairs the obligation of the contract, was determined in an action between individuals, the result being that the decision upon the validity of the action of the state is relieved from those opinions which might affect its determination, if the state itself were a party; 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 252. A more far-reaching case which might be used as an illustration is the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 518, in which an action between an individual and a private corporation, resulted in placing upon the states a limitation of power second to few if any contained in their constitutions.

Under the American constitutional system, there is to be found no force more potent, effective, and far-reaching than this power of constitutional construction which is now unquestionably vested in the courts. Through it the judicial power, in a way, approaches much more nearly to the absolute ultimate authority of the English Parliament than does the legislative power. It has recently been said: "We proceed upon the theory that our constitution is written; and in our written constitutions, state and national, we have provided courts for the purpose of passing upon the laws enacted by the legislatures and determining their constitutionality. We do not know, therefore, whether a governmental act is valid or not until a court of competent jurisdiction has passed upon it. We depend upon our courts to tell us what our constitution means. Our real constitutions are thus found not wholly in the written documents bearing the name, but in the decisions of the supreme court of the United States and in those of the highest courts in the various states. The study of the American constitution is in large part, from beginning to end, a study of judicial decisions." Macy, Eng. Const. 89.

Mr. Bryce considers it a weak point in the federal constitution that a decision of the supreme court may be obtained in reversal of a former one by the appointment of judges to fill vacancies favorable to such reversal, or in case there be no vacancy, by the joint action of congress and the executive in increasing the number of judges. Of the former method, he instances the Legal Tender Cases, 1 Am. Const. 264, 269, 297. This reference served to put in a very definite form the somewhat widespread impression that appointments of judges were made for the purpose of reversing the previous decision of the court. The possibility of such action in any case by the executive is so serious a contingency that this particular charge has been recently made the subject of critical examination by Senator Hoar, whose brother was then attorney general of the United States. His pamphlet is a valuable historical document, and shows by the dates that the appointments in question were made prior to the decision, and from the testimony of members of the cabinet, that they had been agreed upon long before, neither the president nor any member of the cabinet having any knowledge as to the probable decision; see 5 Am. Lawy, 4.

The fact that the suggestion of any motive in the appointment of judges has so rarely been made may be considered strong evidence that the danger alluded to is not a serious one. But even if it were, it is a danger necessarily incident to all human institutions. No system of checks and balances has ever been devised, and probably none ever will be, so perfect as to dispense with the need of integrity and good faith in the administration of government.

It may be noted here, as already stated under CONSTITUTIONAL, that Chief Justice Gibson, in 12 S. & R. 345 (1825), ably contended, after the decision in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. 176, that a state court is bound to execute an act repugnant to the constitution of a particular state, but not one repugnant to the federal constitution; though in 2 Pa. 281, he said to counsel that he had modified his opinion on this subject.

A state legislature cannot annul the judgments nor determine the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; 5 Cra. 115; 2 Dall. 410; nor authoritatively declare what the law is or has been, but what it shall be; 2 Cra. 272; 4 Pick. 23; 3 Mart. La. 248; 10 id. 1; 3 Mart. La. N. S. 551; 5 id. 519.

Congress cannot interfere with or control state courts except in so far as the federal courts have appellate jurisdiction.

Congress cannot without the consent of the state constrain the state courts to entertain or act upon applications for naturalization; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 743.

The judicial powers of the United States, first under the constitution as originally adopted, extended to cases "between a state and citizens of another state," but the very early case of Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, in which the plaintiff as executor brought an action of assumpsit against the state, which was sustained by the court, resulted in the adoption of the 11th amendment. As a consequence it was held that cases past or present in which the state was a party were removed from the jurisdiction of the court; 3 Dallas 378; but the mere fact that a state may be interested does not oust the jurisdiction; 9 Wheat. 738; in a comparatively late case the soundness of the opinion in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia was doubted, the suggestion being that the clause of the constitution giving jurisdiction in such cases was properly limited to cases cognizable in the courts of a state or suits by a state against citizens of another state; 134 U. S. 1. The grant of judicial power in all cases in law and equity, etc., was held not to authorize a writ of error in the circuit court of the District of Columbia in a criminal case; 3 Cra. 159; but this provision is held generally to include criminal as well as civil proceedings, and the power so vested in the federal courts is independent of the judiciary of the states; 100 U. S. 257.

In the United States v. Smith (1 South. N. J. 33) the action was to recover a penalty under the provisions of an act of congress. The question was raised by plea whether under the act jurisdiction would properly be given to a state court. A demurrer to the plea was overruled, and in a dissenting opinion Southard, J., discusses at length the question, what is the judicial power of the United States.

The distinctive features which characterize the three great departments of government are in the main easily recognized. There is little difficulty in determining whether a power is judicial or executive, and the questions arising with respect to those distinctions result not so much from inherent difficulty in the subject as from a tendency in modern constitutions and legislation to confuse the functions of the two departments in the classes of cases of which illustrations have been already cited. So it may be said that ordinarily there ought to be little difficulty in distinguishing legislative and judicial powers. Properly understood, the two functions are entirely different, and yet there are points of contact from which spring disputed cases, such, for example, as the regulation of procedure, the application of rules of evidence, the attempt to regulate judicial discretion, and many others. This may involve, on the one hand, an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, or, on the other, the assumption by the legislature of some portion of the authority which belongs to the courts. The cases in which it is a question whether a certain power is legislative or judicial are mainly considered under the title of LEGISLATIVE POWER, to which reference should be made. As a reason why there is naturally found much debatable ground between the judiciary and the legislature, it has been suggested that:

"In most countries the courts have grown out of the legislature; or rather, the sovereign body, which, like parliament, was originally both a law and a legislature, has delivered over most of its judicial duties to other persons, while retaining some few to be still exercised by itself." 1 Bryce, Amer. Com. 235. The author just quoted enumerates the points in which America has followed the English practice. There are no separate administrative tribunals, but officials are sued or indicted in the regular courts; judges are secure in their tenure; judicial proceedings are recognized in law and not set aside by a statute within the competence of the legislature. He considers that America has improved on England in forbidding the legislature to exercise the powers of a criminal court, by acts of attainder, etc., and stands behind England in continuing to use a legislative body as a court of impeachment, the trial of disputed election cases by committees, and the disposition of public franchises, or the appropriation of private property, by legislative rather than judicial methods. Thus three pieces of ground debatable between the legislature and the judiciary, which all originally belonged to the legislature, and in America still do, have been in England made the subject of judicial power and method; id. 235–6. The judicial power extends to and includes only such acts as are in their nature judicial. Upon judges, as such, no functions can be imposed except those of a judicial nature." 118 Ind. 83.

It is not a judicial function to entertain appeals from county commissioners upon the propriety of annexing territory to a city, and the act authorizing such appeals is invalid; 71 Fed. Rep. 443; nor to make an arrangement for the business intercourse of common carriers such as in the opinion of the court they ought to make for themselves; 46 Neb. 682; nor to prevent the submission to the people, as directed by the legislature, of a question involving an amendment to the constitution, by enjoining the secretary of state from certifying a question; 68 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 202.

An act authorizing a court to appoint a municipal board of review to consist of members of different political parties was held to impose political and not judicial powers, and it was not binding on the court; 27 Wkly. L. Bul. 334.

An act of congress of 1792 devolved upon the circuit courts the duty of examining pension claims and certifying them to the secretary of war. In 2 Dall. 409, the attorney general moved for a mandamus to compel the judges to proceed to hear the cases under the act, but the case was not decided, as the act was repealed. The reasons given by the circuit judges for refusing to perform the duties imposed upon them by the act are set forth in 2 Dall. 410, n. Under an act of 1793 the nature of the duties assigned to the judges were somewhat changed. This act came before the supreme court in U. S. v. Yale Todd. Both of these decisions are set forth in a note of Taney, C. J., in 13 How. 52, where it is said that the result of the opinions in these two cases is that the power thus conferred was not a judicial power, and therefore could not be exercised by the courts, and that as the act intended to confer the power on the court as a judicial function, it could not authorize the judges to exercise it out of court as commissioners, and this decision has ever since been regarded as constitutional law.

Acts held valid as not conferring powers other than judicial are, requiring a certificate by the court as to the value of the services of an informer; 70 Fed. Rep. 310; conferring on the court the power to establish towns; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1112; to establish county boundaries; 35 S.W. Rep. (Tex.) 1020; but merely ministerial powers in relation to committing inebriates cannot be assigned to the judiciary; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 207. The court has jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of an act apportioning the state into legislative districts; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 929.

An act authorizing judges to appoint a bridge committee is not a violation of a constitutional provision prohibiting the judicial department from exercising executive functions; 29 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 356; nor is an act providing for the appointment of jury commissioners by the court in violation of the provision of an express constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from conferring on the court or judge any power of appointment to an office; 14 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 407; in this case it was considered that jury commissioners were not public officers, but officers of the court.

Power may be conferred upon a judge to appoint justices of the peace; 90 Va. 679.

Where the constitution forbids the legislature to create or enlarge municipal bodies by special act, it is competent to confer upon the courts the power to determine whether the conditions prescribed by general law for such creation or enlargement have been complied with; 68 Fed. Rep. 774.

It is within the scope of judicial power to inquire whether rates of compensation, fixed by municipalities and corporations for the use of appropriated water in California, operated to deprive the owner of his property without just compensation; 74 Fed. Rep. 79.

An act authorizing a court on appeal from county commissioners to fix the salary of the county attorney is not unconstitutional as imposing legislative functions and duties on the judiciary; 47 Minn. 219.

The legislature cannot constitute the court a board to try contested elections, that power not being essentially judicial; 51 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 137.

But while the courts are not permitted to have non-judicial duties imposed upon them, so, on the other hand, are the other departments of the government forbidden to invade or usurp the judicial power. And this is held to extend to and include everything necessarily or even properly incident to the exercise of their jurisdiction.

The power to punish contempts is strictly judicial and cannot be abridged by the legislature; 45 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 199; 17 Col. 252; 37 Pac. Rep. (Okl.) 829; but reasonable regulations by the legislature touching the exercise of this power are binding; id.; but the power cannot be conferred upon an executive board; 131 Ind. 471; and an order directing a sheriff to commit a person to jail until he answers questions propounded to him by commissioners appointed to take his examination before trial is erroneous as an attempted delegation of judicial power in allowing the sheriff to determine what is compliance with the order; 17 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 69.

Where an act provided for filling vacancies in municipal offices by a person elected by the council to serve until "the next city election," it was held that a subsequent act providing that the words quoted should be construed to mean the election at which the voters would have elected the successor without respect to the vacancy, was an invasion of judicial power as seeking to compel the courts to construe the previous act in a way contrary to its letter and spirit; 172 Pa. 140. In this case, however, Mitchell, J., filed an able dissenting opinion in which he maintained that the judgment was an "unprecedented and unwarranted invasion by the judiciary of the legislative authority," that expository acts had been in use in Pennsylvania from colonial days, and that they were "a legislative formula never heretofore questioned." See also 122 Pa. 627; where they are held to be a common form of legislative expression to which future effect must be given. In 2 Pa. 22, it was held that "explanatory acts must be construed as operating on future cases alone, except where they are designed to explain a doubtful statute."

A statute providing that certain corporations should be accepted by courts as "sole security" was void as an attempt to control the discretion of the court; 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 274.

Wherever a power is given to examine, hear, and punish, it is a judicial power, and they in whom it is reposed act as judges; Holt, C. J., 1 Salk. 200. In this case the censors of the College of Physicians under their charter fined and imprisoned a physician for administering unwholesome pills and noxious medicines, and it was held that a certiorari would lie.

An act declaring that a failure of assessors to comply with certain provisions of the law shall not invalidate the tax is invalid, as an invasion of the judicial function; 46 Wis. 163; but an act making properly certified tax bills prima facie evidence of the validity of charges against the property is not; 106 Mo. 137.

The power to hear and decide proceedings for the summary disposition of tenants was held to be a judicial power, and, as such, included in the powers of the recorder conferred on the city judge of New York, and a writ of prohibition will not lie to restrain him from proceeding; 19 Abb. Pr. 136; 29 How. Pr. 176.

The phrase judicial power, as adopted in American constitutional law, includes the determination of questions of fact in equity cases. The term must be construed as vesting such power as the courts under the English and American system of jurisprudence always exercised in that class of actions, and it is not competent for the legislature to withdraw from the courts invested by the constitution with judicial power, as to matters in equity, the determination of questions in fact, as one of the established elements of that power; 23 Wis. 343, 349.

The power of laying out or altering streets vested in the mayor and aldermen of the city, whenever in their opinion the safety or convenience of the inhabitants shall require it, is judicial, and certiorari lies to remove their proceedings in such a case; 8 Pick. 218.

The court may determine whether a particular regulation of a useful business is a reasonable restriction on the consititutional right of citizens to engage in such business; 98 Cal. 73.

It frequently happens that the courts are concluded by the result of an inquiry, quasi-judicial in its character, which under some very general definitions, such as that of Lord Holt, supra, might be referred to the judicial power, but is required in this particular case and by the legislature or executive as a guide to their own action.

In cases where the existence of certain facts is necessary to be ascertained as a basis for determining whether it is wise to enact a statute, the ascertainment of the fact by the legislature will be considered conclusive, and its decision will not be reviewed by the courts in a collateral proceeding. As where the establishment of a court depended upon the fact that the county had a population exceeding fifty thousand, the court refused to question the action of the legislature, although it appeared by the United States census that the population of the county was less that the required amount; 112 Mo. 591; and where the legislature prohibited parents from procuring or consenting to the employment of a female child under the age of fourteen years as a dancer, the court would not review its decision that such legislation was necessary to protect the health and morals of children on the ground that the law infringed the rights of parents in some particular cases; 8 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 383.

Where a reapportionment of representatives, based upon relative changes of population, was made by act of congress to take effect two years later, it was held to be a political and not a judicial question, and the courts could not give redress for any injustice resulting therefrom; 36 Neb. 181; but with respect to apportionment of the acts of a legislature, it was held that mandamus proceedings to test their validity presented a judicial question of which the courts had jurisdiction, and not a political question with which they would not interfere; 133 Ind. 178; 33 Wis. 90; 19 N. Y. Supp. 978.

The decision of congress recognizing a claim as an equitable obligation of the government and appropriating money for its payment can rarely be the subject of review by the courts; 163 U. S. 427.

A court or judge cannot be authorized to perform legislative duties; 68 Cal. 194.

An act of the legislature provided that before any railway company should construct its roads in the streets of a city, the city authorities, or the superior court, or a judge thereof, on appeal, should approve the plan of construction. It was held that the power which the superior court or a judge thereof was required to exercise was legislative and not judicial, and therefore could not be exercised by them; 37 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 1080.

The case discusses the question fully.

An act authorizing the court or judge allowing a mandamus to direct the manner of serving it is not a delegation of legislative powers; 68 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1085.

The act of July 25, 1882, authorizing judges and clerks of United States courts to issue subpœnas upon the application of the commissioner of pensions for the examination of witnesses concerning pension claims, is constitutional and under it the courts can compel witnesses to appear and testify on that subject; 78 Fed. Rep. 107. A statute authorizing judges to fix salaries of deputies or assistants employed by county officers is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power to a judicial tribunal; 39 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 49, overruling 26 id. 581.

Questions frequently arise as to the validity of legislative acts requiring of executive officers duties quasi-judicial in their character, the propriety of which is challenged upon the ground that they impose judicial functions upon executive officers. Such are provisions of law authorizing the removal of subordinate officers, the constitution of boards for taxation, assessment, and the like. It is a well-settled principle that "judicial functions or duties can be conferred only upon courts and judicial officers;" 118 Ind. 361; 39 Wis. 390; 83 Cal. 111. But it has been held that there is no invasion of the judicial power in making state executive officers ex officio of a state board of taxation: 133 Ind. 513; id. 609; or charging them with the duty of assessing property or serving on a board of equalization; 21 Nev. 390. So it was held that the act, authorizing the establishment of a public park in the District of Columbia, or providing that in case of disagreement between the land owner and the park commissioners the appraisement should be submitted to the president, if his approval did not impose a judicial function upon the president whose duty was merely to decide whether the United States would have the land at the appraised value, and not to decide whether such value was reasonable as respects the property owner: 147 U. S. 282; such an act merely makes the president the agent of congress to decide whether the proceedings shall be completed or abandoned; 20 D. C. 104.

A constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from creating other courts than those mentioned in the constitution does not prevent it from authorizing appeals to a court from the decision of a license board; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 96; and where the judicial power was vested by the constitution in certain named courts, it was still competent for the legislature to provide for the removal of administrative officers in cities by the board of aldermen "sitting as a court," such power being held not strictly judicial; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 524.

The fact that the law confers on jury commissioners judicial powers in the selection of citizens for jury services does not involve a conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the constitution; 168 U. S. 101.

Judicial powers were not conferred on the governor by authorizing him to investigate charges of official misconduct of state officers with a view to their removal; 56 Kan. 231; or by an act authorizing him to remove any officer appointed by him; 2 Okl. 277; and the action of a governor in removing an officer under such act will not be reviewed by the courts; id; 47 La. Ann. 53.

The power to remove city officers for cause is administrative, not judicial, and may therefore be conferred on a non-judicial body; 90 Wis. 612;

Questions of power between the judiciary and the executive have generally arisen upon applications for a mandamus to compel or an injunction to prevent action of an executive officer.

The question of power to issue a mandamus in such cases is discussed under the title EXECUTIVE POWER, and the authorities are there collected. A discussion of the subject, not strictly in a suit at law, but as the result of one, the participants in which were a judge and a quasi-judicial officer, may be referred to here.

In Gilcrist v. The Collector of Charleston it was held that the circuit court has no power to issue a mandamus to a collector, commanding him to grant a clearance, and that all instructions from the executive which are not supported by law are illegal, and no inferior officer is bound to obey them; 4 Hall, Am. L. J. 429. This decision was the subject of a letter from Caesar A. Rodney, attorney general, to the president criticising the action of the court and challenging its jurisdiction; id. 433. In reply to this letter Mr. Justice Johnson, who presided at the trial, made some remarks, in the course of which he says: "Jurisdiction in a case is one thing; the mode of exercising that jurisdiction is quite another;" the jurisdiction of the court must be derived from the constitution, and he expressly disclaims "any other origin of our jurisdiction, especially the unpopular grounds of prerogative and analogy to the king's bench."

In asserting the necessity of the recognition of the right of the courts to coerce an executive officer by a judicial order, he insists that such authority is necessarily involved in the use of the term power in the constitution: "The term judicial power conveys the idea both of exercising the faculty of judging and of applying physical force to give effect to a decision. The term power could with no propriety be applied, nor could the judiciary be denominated a department of government, without the means of enforcing its decrees. In a country where laws govern, courts of justice necessarily are the medium of action and reaction between the government and the governed. The basis of individual security and the bond of union between the ruler and the citizen must ever be found in a judiciary sufficiently independent to disregard the will of power, and sufficiently energetic to secure to the citizen the full enjoyment of his rights. To establish such a one was evidently the object of the constitution." He contends that the establishment of a judiciary without power to enforce its decrees would have been to no purpose, and that where a jurisdiction is conferred and no forms prescribed for its exercise, there is an inherent power in the court to adopt a mode of proceeding adapted to the exigency of each case; 4 Hall, Am. L. J. 446.

In Missouri it is held that by reason of the division of the power of government into three departments and the prohibition of the exercise by the one department of powers belonging to another, a mandamus will not lie to compel the governor to perform any duty pertaining to his office, ministerial or political, and whether commanded by the constitution or by law; 25 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 876. But the mayor of a city is not such an executive officer as is exempt from judicial control; 59 Mo. App. 524.

It has been a subject of controversy how far the decisions of the court of claims control the executive departments of the government of the United States in their action on similar cases. It was said by Richardson, C. J., that the decisions of the court of claims in general, not appealed from, are guides to the executive officers of the government, and furnish precedents for the executive departments in all like cases; 18 Wash. L. Rep. 122. This decision was thus criticised by Comptroller Lawrence: The court of claims undoubtedly had a right (1) to lay down law for itself, but it has no authority to lay down law (2) for the executive officers of the government, yet the opinion referred to assumes to do so. This is the necessary effect of the words employed by it, and whether so intended or not, it is their logical effect. For if the court of claims can prescribe not only its own duties and the rules and principles of law governing its own action, but also the same for accounting officers in the executive administration of the executive business of the government, it may for like reasons do the same for heads of executive departments and even the president himself; 6 Dec. First Comp. 238.

The federal courts will not interfere with the pension officers in the exercise of their discretion; 14 Pet. 499; 7 Wall. 347; 116 U. S. 423.

Questions purely political or arising out of international relations the courts do not assume to determine, but leave them to what they term the political departments of the government and follow the decisions of the executive. Such a question is the recognition of independence or belligerency which is discussed at length under the title of EXECUTIVE POWER.

The power of the courts to enjoin executive officers rests upon the same principles as those applicable to a mandamus. It is the general rule that the official action of the executive department of the government or of the state cannot be controlled by a writ of injunction; 32 W. Va. 1; 8 Pickle 319; 109 Ind. 1. The execution of orders of the president for removing intruders from government land will not be interfered with by injunction; 1 Okl. 454.

An injunction may be obtained to protect a de facto officer whose title is disputed as well as that of one de jure, but it is not an appropriate means of determining a title to an office; 124 U. S. 210; 44 La. Ann. 333. In neither of these cases, however, is there involved any question of conflict between the executive and judicial power, inasmuch as the latter legitimately extends to and includes proceeding for the trial of title to office by quo warranto, which title see.

The power of staying the execution of a death sentence pending an appeal conferred by law on a court is not the granting of a reprieve within the meaning of a constitutional grant of executive power, but is a judicial power included in the separation of government into three independent departments; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 179. See 97 Ind. 373.

In State ex rel. Drake v. Doyle, Sec. of State (40 Wis. 175), which was an application for a mandamus against the state officer seeking to require him to revoke the license of an insurance company, return was made pleading an injunction of the circuit court of the United States to restrain the Secretary of State from revoking the license, and it was held that "where a suit is prosecuted in a federal court by a private party against a state officer who has no personal interest or liability in the action, but is sued in his official capacity only, to affect a right of the state only, the state is the real defendant, within the prohibition of the 11th amendment to the federal constitution. A circuit court of the United States has therefore no jurisdiction of a suit by a foreign corporation to restrain a state officer from revoking (as required by the law of the state) a license granted the plaintiff corporation to do business in the state,"

So also the power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the government and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of congress and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute or is required by the paramount law of the constitution to intervene; 149 U. S. 698.

Of all the instances of what appears to an American legal mind the confusion of powers under the English system, none is more striking than the commingling of executive and judicial duties found in the office of the lord chancellor.

In commenting upon the alteration in his customary position by the powers of an administrative character conferred upon him by the Judicature Acts, a recent writer says, "It would appear, to the independent observer, that the tenure, the power of appointments, and the administrative duties of the chancellor, though necessarily pertinent to his high office, are inconsistent with his position as chief judge, co-equal and co-ordinate with the others, and that if the intention of the statute was to confer that position upon him, it was contrary to English usage, if not unconstitutional." Inderwick, King's Peace 232.

There has been much recent discussion as to whether the courts, in late decisions dealing with labor strikes and public commotion arising out of them, have extended their jurisdiction beyond recognized principles. In this discussion the phrase "government by injunction" has been constantly used. The cases are cited under the titles: INJUNCTION; CONTEMPT; LABOR UNION; CONSPIRACY; COMBINATION; BOYCOTT; STRIKES; and do not require further discussion here. See also, 13 Law Quart. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS. Proceedings relating to, practised in, or proing from, a court of justice.

Conclusive presumptions are made in favor of judicial proceedings. Thus, it is an undoubted rule of pleading that nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which is so expressly alleged; 1 Saund. 74; 10 Q. B. 411, 455–459. So also, it is presumed, with respect to such writs as are actually issued by the superior courts at Westminster, that they are duly issued, and in a case in which the courts have jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the face of them; and all such writs will of themselves, and without any further allegation, protect all officers and others in their aid acting under them; and this, too, although they are on the face of them irregular, or even void in form; 6 Co. 54 a; 10 Q. B. 411, 455.

The rule is well settled by the authorities, that words spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, though they are such as impute crime to another, and therefore if spoken elsewhere would import malice and be actionable in themselves, are not actionable if they are applicable and pertinent to the subject of inquiry. And this extends not merely to regular courts of justice, but to all inquiries before magistrates, referees, municipal, military, and ecclesiastical bodies; and they are only restrained by this rule, viz., that they shall be made in good faith to courts or tribunals having jurisdiction of the subject, and power to hear and decide the matter of complaint or accusation, and that they are not resorted to as a cloak for private malice. The question, therefore, in such cases is, not whether the words spoken are true, not whether they are actionable in themselves, but whether they were spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, and whether they were relevant and pertinent to the cause or subject of inquiry; Newell, Def. Lib. & Slan. 424; Heard, Lib. & S. § 101. The rule that no action will lie for words spoken or written in the course of any judicial proceeding has been acted upon from the earliest times. In 4 Co. 14 b, it was adjudged that if one exhibits articles to justices of the peace, "in this case the parties shall not have, for any matter contained in such articles, any action upon the case, for they had pursued the ordinary course of justice in such cases; and if actions should be permitted in such cases, those who have just cause for complaint would not dare to complain, for fear of infinite vexation." And it has been more recently decided, that, though an affidavit made in a judicial proceeding is false, slanderous, and malicious, no action will lie against the party making it; 18 C. B. 126; 4 H. & N. 568.

The general rule is subject to this qualification: that in all cases where the object or occasion of the words or writing is redress for an alleged wrong, or a proceeding in a tribunal or before some individual or associated body of men, such tribunal, individual, or body must be vested with authority to render judgment or make a decision in the case, or to entertain the proceeding, in order to give them the protection of privileged communications. This qualification of the rule runs through all the cases where the question is involved; Odg. Lib. & Sl. 188, n; Heard, Lib. & S. § 104.

Statements made extra-judicially to a magistrate with a view to asking his advice are not a judicial proceeding; 3 B. & C. 24.

Official Records of the States. The constitution provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. This applies as well to the judgments and records of the courts of the several territories; 48 Minn. 108. Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof. The term records includes all executive, judicial, legislative, and ministerial acts, constituting the public records of the state; Desty, Fed. Const. 203; 20 How. 250; 16 Tex. 509.

Legislative acts must be authenticated by the seal of the state; 4 Dall. 412.

JUDICIAL RATIFICATION. In Scotch Law. The declaration by a married woman before a judge that a disposition or deed of alienation of her heritable property has been made voluntarily and without fear or coercion on her part. See ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

JUDICIAL SALE, A sale, by authority of some competent tribunal, by an officer authorized by law for the purpose. The term includes sales by sheriffs, marshals, masters, commissioners, or by trustees, executors, or administrators, where the latter sell under the decree of a court.

A sale, whether public or private, made by a receiver, pursuant to the direction or authority given by the court, is a judicial sale. 114 N. Y. 621.

It is premature and erroneous to decree a sale of property to satisfy incumbrances thereon before ascertaining the amounts and priorities of the liens binding such property; 22 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 110, reversing 27 id. 838.

A decree confirming a master's sale, and declaring that the title be vested in the purchaser "upon the payment of the purchase money," vests no title in such purchaser until the purchase money is paid; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 1078.

The officer who makes the sale conveys all the rights of the defendant, and all other persons legally affected by the proceedings, in the property sold. Under such a sale there is no warranty, either express or implied, of the thing sold; 9 Wheat. 616; 51 N. J. Eq. 135; 104 Ind. 185. A sale of real estate does not conclude one not a party to those proceedings; and whatever title he had to the property so sold remains unaffected by the sale; 147 U. S. 431. Where the property sold under a decree is correctly represented by a plat, referred to in the advertisement and exhibited at the sale, which discloses an encroachment on a street, the purchaser cannot plead ignorance thereof; 91 Va. 114. A purchaser at a judicial sale, not made under compulsory process, can set up eviction of a paramount title as a defence in an action for the purchase money, but where land is sold in equity to pay the debts of an estate, and a judgment has to be rendered against the purchaser for the purchase money, he cannot enjoin its collection because of eviction; 41 S. C. 508.

The doctrine of caveat emptor applies, to a sale under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, and the purchaser cannot rely upon statements made by the officer conducting the sale that he will get a title free from incumbrance; 58 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 953, aff. 35 Neb. 466.

The purchaser of a leasehold interest at a sheriff's sale is charged with notice of the lease and subject to its covenants and conditions; 158 Pa. 401; and a purchaser at such sale of an heir's interest is bound by notice given at the sale by decedent's heirs that the interest was subject in the purchaser's hands to the right, if any, of decedent's estate to charge the heir's indebtedness against his share; id. 292. Where a conveyance from a life tenant is procured by fraud and the property sold under a judgment against a vendee, a purchaser at that sale with knowledge of the fraud can hold against the devisees in remainder; 94 Ga. 664. The title of a purchaser of land at judicial sale duly confirms any rendered invalid by fraud in prior transfer of a decree of sale if the sale itself was free from fraud; 42 Neb. 156. A decree homologating proceedings at a family meeting to sell a child's property will protect a purchaser in good faith; 47 La. Ann. 882. Equity will not relieve a purchaser from complying with the terms of sale because of a defect in the title, rendering the title unmarketable, of which the purchaser was cognizant; 81 Md. 525. Where land is sold under a condition not authorized by the decree of sale, the purchaser will not be compelled to take the title although his son signed the condition without apprehending its effect; 71 Hun 54. It is well settled that "the title of an innocent purchaser of land at a judicial sale under a mortgage is not affected by the usurious character of such mortgage." Saulsbury, Ch., in 5 Del. Ch. 302; 1 Johns. Cas. 158; 10 Johns. 185; 53 Barb. 285. See as to bona fide purchaser, 21 L. R. A. 38. When real estate is sold by the sheriff or marshal, the sale is subject to the confirmation of the court, or it may be set aside. See 4 Wash. C. C. 45, 322.

An officer at a sale on execution conducted by himself cannot act as agent, with full discretionary powers of an absent person in the purchase of property, since the law casts on him the duty of fidelity to the execution debtor, and such purchase by the officer is void, and confers no title on his principal; 65 Vt. 457.

Any statements made with a purpose to deter bidding may avoid the sale; 88 Mich. 144; 161 Pa. 418; 38 S. C. 357; 88 Ga. 696.

It is generally said to be a rule that mere inadequacy of price is not of itself sufficient ground for setting aside a judicial sale; 49 N. J. Eq. 356; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 325; 21 Nev. 291; 145 U. S. 349; and that there must be shown in addition to inadequacy some fraud, accident, mistake, or other special circumstance to warrant rescission of the contract; 89 Va. 836. But the general rule as stated is not sustained without qualifications, since the inadequacy may be so gross as to shock the conscience of the court, as it is frequently expressed, and to be regarded as of itself sufficient ground for setting aside the sale; 36 W. Va. 598; 51 N. J. Eq. 304; as where land valued at $8,000, with incumbrances amounting to $2,700, was sold at $2,000; 56 Minn. 12; or where the same land brought at a subsequent sale $1,500; 60 id. 262. Where the price is grossly inadequate, the court will be quick to seize upon any other circumstance impeaching the fairness of the transaction; 161 U. S. 334; or the least irregularity in the proceeding; 63 Mo. App. 456. See as to inadequacy, 2 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 556.

A sale of property as a whole may be confirmed if the decree that it be so sold is not objected to, and there is no offer of a better bid in case the bidding be reopened; 60 Fed. Rep. 9. The objection that different parcels of real estate were sold together cannot be made by one who has suffered no injury therefrom; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 938.

Combinations to prevent competitive bidding, and any conduct at the sale upon the part of interested parties which is fraudulent in fact, or the circumstances attending which induce the court to treat it as fraudulent, will make the sale void, as where there was an agreement between judgment creditors without knowledge of the debtor that one should refrain from bidding, in consideration of a promise to pay his judgment, made by the other, the sale was held void for fraud; 161 Pa. 418; and where a mortgagor publicly announced at the sale that she was a widow dependent upon the premises for support, that she intended to bid, and that she requested no one to bid against her, the sale was set aside; 38 S. C. 357. One intending to purchase commits fraud by hiring another not to bid against him; 43 Neb. 49; 48 Ohio 554; and on disclosure of the facts after sale, payment of purchase money, and conveyance, an administrator's sale may be set aside; 88 Ga. 696; and to show such fraud evidence is admissible of the amount intended to be bid by the competitor who was hired not to bid; id.; but where the competitor is induced by an execution creditor under a secret agreement to refrain from bidding, it is incompetent for the creditor to show on a petition for subrogation that the property brought less than its market value; 24

Pittsb. Leg. J. (Pa.) N. S. 92. Where during an administrator's sale, one of the bidders arranged with the others for a consideration to stop bidding, and he thereby obtained the property for less than its market value, the sale was void; 149 Ill. 163; but where there is an agreement between two persons to prevent bidding, and one of them purchases the land, the sale will not be set aside at the instance of the other on the ground that he was prevented from bidding by reason of inducement offered by the purchaser; 108 N. C. 97. An agreement between five lien holders, any one of whom was financially unable to bid for himself, that one should bid on the property as trustee for them all, was not invalid as a combination to discourage bidding; 41 Neb. 706.

An agreement between parties interested in a judicial sale of land, that one of them shall bid enough to cover certain liens on which the other might be collaterally liable, and that the other shall not bid against him, no plan being formed or means used to procure for either an unjust advantage over third persons, or to prevent bidding by them, is not unlawful.

Upon the refusal of a purchaser at a judicial sale to fulfil his contract, the estate may be resold and such purchaser held liable for any deficiency in price arising upon the second sale; 127 U. S. 518. But it has been held that to be held liable he must be served with a rule, awarded after the sale was reported, to show cause why he should not complete his purchase, or in default, the property to be resold; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 571. See as to defaulting purchaser, 27 Alb. L. J. 508.

See an unusually elaborate and valuable note on the subject of injunctions against judicial sales in 30 L. R. A. 98–143; and a similar note upon the protection accorded to purchasers and who is a bona fide purchaser, in 21 id. 33–54.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS. Statistics, published by authority, of the civil and criminal business of the United Kingdom, and matters appertaining thereto. Annual reports are published separately for (1) England and Wales, (2) Ireland, (3) Scotland. The statistics for England and Wales contain statements of the police establishments and expenses, and the number of offences committed and offenders apprehended; statements of the number of inquests held by coroners; of the number of persons committed for trial at assizes and sessions, with the result of the proceedings; of the state of prisons, with returns of reformatory and industrial schools, and of criminal lunatics; of the causes in the superior courts of common law and equity, etc., and the county courts; also of the appeals to the Privy Council, and the judicial proceeding of the House of Lords. The same matters, though with some difference in the arrangement, form the bulk of the report for Ireland. Kindred matters are dealt with in the report for Scotland, though there is a wider divergence, rendered necessary by the variation between the laws of Scotland and England; Moz. & W.

JUDICIAL WRITS. In English Practice. The capias and all other writs subsequent to the original writ not issuing out of chancery, but from the court to which the original was returnable.

Being grounded on what had passed in that court in consequence of the sheriff's return, they are called judicial writs, in contradistinction to the writs issued out of chancery, which were called original writs; 3 Bla. Com. 282.

JUDICIARY. The system of courts of justice in a country. The department of government charged or concerned with the administration of justice. The judges taken collectively; as, the liberties of the people are secured by a wise and independent judiciary. The term is in very current use in designating the method of selecting judges in a state or country,—as, an elective judiciary.

As an adjective: Of or pertaining to the administration of justice or the courts; judicial,—the judiciary act, the judiciary amendment, the judiciary question, etc. See COURT; JUDGE; 3 Story, Const., 5th ed. § 1578.

JUDICIARY ACT. The act of congress of Sept. 24, 1789, establishing the federal courts of the United States.

This act, of which the authorship is attributed to Oliver Ellsworth, has remained in force without substantial change, save in the extension of the system as required by the growth of the nation. Its provisions are embodied in the Revised Statutes.

This act, "considering the complex and highly artificial nature of the federal jurisdiction, is justly regarded as 'one of the most remarkable instances of wise, sagacious, and thoroughly considered legislative enactments in the history of the law.'" 66 Ga. 371, 373.

"The wisdom and forethought with which it was drawn have been the admiration of succeeding generations. And so well was it done that it remains to the present day, with a few unimportant changes, the foundation of our system of judicature, and the law which confers, governs, controls, and limits the powers of all the federal courts, except the Supreme court, and which largely regulates the exercise of its powers." 3 Wall. 407, 414.

JUDICIO SISTI. The caution judicio sisti, given in a Scotch court, is a security to abide judgment within the jurisdiction of the court. By the ordinary form of the bond the surety undertakes that the principal shall appear to answer any action to be brought within six months. Bell. See Ersk. Prin. III. iii. 28.

JUDICIUM. In Roman Law. The proceeding before a judge or judex (q. v.) to obtain his decision of the legal issue, presented as the result of the proceedings in jure. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 34. See IN JUDICIO; IN JURE.

JUDICIUM CAPITALE. In English Law. Judgment of death; capital judgment. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 39, § 2. Called also "judicium vitæ amissionis," judgment of loss of life. Id. lib. 2, c. 1, § 5.

JUDICIUM DEI (Lat. the judgment or decision of God).

In Old English Law. A term applied to trials by ordeal; for, in all trials of this sort, God was thought to interfere in favor of the innocent, and so decide the cause. These trials are now all abolished.

JUDICIUM PARIUM. In English Law. Judgment of the peers; judgment of one's peers; trial by jury. Magna Charta, c. 29. See JURY.

JUGE D'INSTRUCTION. In French Law. An officer subject to the Procureur-General, who in cases of criminal offences receives the complaints of the parties injured, and who summons and examines witnesses upon oath, and after communication with the procureur-general draws up the forms of accusation. They have also the right, subject to the approval of the same superior officer, to admit the accused to bail. They are appointed for three years, but are re-eligible for a further period of office. They are usually chosen from among the regular judges. The criminal procedure as administered by these officers has been characterized by the most inquisitorial methods, opposed in every sense to English and American ideas on the subject. By the act of December 8, 1897, promulgated while this title is in press, changes of the most radical character have been introduced. Under the new law, within twenty-four hours of his arrest, an accused person must be conducted before the procureur de la république, who must require the juge d'instruction to question him immediately. In case of his refusal, absence, or other obstacle, the accused must be examined without delay by the official designated by the public minister. In default of examination within the time prescribed, the public prosecutor must order him to be set at liberty, and any person kept confined for more than twenty-four hours in the place of detention without examination, or without being brought before the public prosecutor shall be considered as arbitrarily detained, and all violations of this law by officials are to be prosecuted as outrages against liberty. At the examination the magistrate having verified the identity of the accused, is required to make known to him the facts charged against him and receive his declaration, first having warned him that he is free not to make any. Mention of this warning must be made in the procés-verbal. If the accusation is sustained, the magistrate shall inform the accused of his right to choose a counsel, and if he makes no choice, shall himself appoint one, if the accused demands it. Mention of this formality must be made in the procés-verbal. If the accused has been found outside of the arrondissement where the warrant was issued, and at a distance of more than ten myriameters (about 60 miles) from the principal place of the arrondissement, he is conducted before the public prosecutor of the one in which he was found and by him examined. The accused is not removed from this jurisdiction against his consent, and if when the inquiry is made of him, that is refused, information is sent to the officer who signed the warrant, with a statement of facts bearing on the identity of the person. The warning must be given to the accused at this examination that he is free not to make any declarations, and it must be mentioned in the procés-verbal. The juge d'instruction charged with the matter decides immediately upon the receipt of this message whether there is reason to order the transfer. In case of flagrant crime the juge d'instruction can proceed to examine him immediately if there is urgency resulting from the condition of a witness in danger of death, or the existence of indications likely to disappear, or even if he is taken away from the place. If the accused remains in custody, he can immediately have the first examination and communicate freely with his counsel. Provisions of the law of July 14, 1865, amending article 613 of the code of criminal instruction are abrogated in all that concerns places of detention subjected to the cell régime. There may be an interdiction of communication ordered by the juge d'instruction for ten days, which may be once only renewed for ten days more. In each case the interdiction of communication shall not apply to the counsel of the accused. He must make known the name of his counsel, and whether detained or set free, cannot be examined unless with his express consent except in the presence of his counsel. The counsel can only act for him after having been authorized by the magistrate, and in case of refusal, a note should be made of the incident in the procès-verbal. The counsel should be summoned by letter at least twenty-four hours in advance. The counsel is entitled to be informed by the recorder of the inquiries to which the accused is to be subjected and of every order made by the judge. Journal Officiel de la République Francaise, Dec. 10, 1897.

JUICIO. In Spanish Law. A trial or suit. White, New Recop. b. 3, tit. 4, c. 1.

JUICIO DE APEO. In Spanish Law. The decree of a competent tribunal directing the determining and marking the boundaries of lands or estates.

JUICIO DE CONCURSO DE ACREEDORES. In Spanish Law. The decree obtained by a debtor against his creditors, or by the creditors against their debtor, for the payment of the amount due, according to the respective rank of each creditor, when the property of the debtor is insufficient to pay the whole of his liabilities.

JUMPING BAIL. A colloquial expression describing the act of the principal in a bail bond in violating the condition of the obligation by failing to do the thing stipulated, as, not appearing in court on a particular day to abide the event of a suit or the order of court, but instead, withdrawing or fleeing from the jurisdiction. Anderson's L. Dict.

JUNIOR. Younger. This has been held to be no part of a man's name, but an addition by use, and a convenient distinction between a father and son of the same name. 10 Paige, Ch. 170; 7 Johns. 549; 1 Pick. 388; 17 id. 200; 3 Metc. Mass. 330. See 131 Mass. 184.

Any matter that distinguishes persons renders the addition of junior or senior unnecessary; 1 Mod. Ent. 35; Salk. 7. But if the father and son have both the same name, the father shall be prima facie intended, if junior be not added, or some other matter of distinction; Salk. 7; 6 Co. 20; 11 id. 39; Hob. 330. If father and son have the same name and addition, and the former sue the latter, the writ is abatable unless the son have the further addition of junior, or the younger. But if the father be the defendant and the son the plaintiff, there is no need of the further addition of senior, or the elder, to the name of the father; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 187; Laws of Women 380.

JUNIOR BARRISTER. A barrister under the rank of queen's counsel. Moz. & W. Also the junior of two counsel employed on the same side in a case.

JUNIPERUS SABINA (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. This plant is commonly called savin.

It is used for lawful purposes in medicine, but too frequently for the criminal purpose of producing abortion, generally endangering the life of the woman. It is usually administered in powder or oil. The dose of oil for lawful purposes, for a grown person, is from two to four drops. Parr, Med. Dict. Sabina. Foderé mentions a case where a large dose of powdered savin had been administered to an ignorant girl in the seventh month of her pregnancy, which had no effect on the fœtus. It, however, nearly took the life of the girl. Foderé, tome iv. p. 431. Given in sufficiently large doses, four or six grains, in the form of powder, it kills a dog in a few hours; and even its insertion into a wound has the same effect. 3 Orfila, Traité des Poisons 42. For a form of indictment for administering savin to a woman quick with child, see 3 Chit. Cr. L. 796. See 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 316.

JUNK-SHOP. A place where odds and ends are purchased and sold. 12 Rich. L. 470. In this case it was said that "it is perfectly immaterial whether it is a large or a small shop," and a person was properly indicted and convicted for keeping such a house without license who bought from other shops, and also from persons bringing to his shop the articles which make a junk-shop. Where a tax was laid upon "stores" in which the stock never exceeds in value $2,000, the term was held to cover a store kept by a dealer in old iron and other metals, old glass, old rope, and old paper stock; 72 Miss. 181.

Acts prohibiting the keeping of such shops without license and prescribing a fine for violation of the act are constitutional; 45 Ohio St. 63; although they impose different licenses upon dealers in general merchandise and those who sell specified articles; 29 La. Ann. 283; but such a tax was held invalid when a municipal ordinance clearly showed that it was for revenue, an act for raising revenue not being an exercise of police power; 72 Miss. 181.

See as to Pawnbrokers, Junk-dealers, etc., 32 L. R. A. 116; PAWNBROKERS.

JURA. As to titles based on this word, see the corresponding titles under JUS.

JURA FISCALIA (Lat.). Rights of the exchequer. 3 Bla. Com. 45.

JURA IN RE (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rights in a thing, as opposed to rights to a thing (jura ad rem). Rights in a thing which are not gone upon loss of possession, and which give a right to an action in rem against whoever has the possession. These rights are of four kinds: dominium, hereditas, servitus, pignus. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 333. See JUS IN RE.

JURA PERSONARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rights which belong to men in their different characters or relations, as father, apprentice, citizen, etc. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 122, n.

JURA REGALIA (Lat.). Royal rights. 1 Bla. Com. 117, 119, 240; 3 id. 45. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 45.

JURAMENTÆ CORPORALES (Lat.). Corporal oaths, q. v.

JURAMENTUM CALUMNIÆ (Lat. oath of calumny). In Civil and Canon Law. An oath required of plaintiff and defendant, whether the parties themselves insist on it or not, that they are not influenced in seeking their right by malice, but believe their cause to be just. It was also required of the attorneys and procurators of the parties. Called, also, juju-randum or sacramentum calumniæ. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.; Clerke, Pr. tit. 42.

JURAMENTUM JUDICIALE (Lat.). In Civil Law. An oath which the judge, of his own accord, defers to either of the parties.

It is of two kinds: first, that which the judge defers for the decision of the cause, and which is understood by the general name juramentum judiciale, and is sometimes called suppletory oath, juramentum suppletorium; second, that which the judge defers in order to fix and determine the amount of the condemnation which he ought to pronounce, and which is called juramentum in litem. Pothier, Obl. p. 4, c. 3, s. 3, art. 3.

JURAT. In Practice. That part of an affidavit where the officer certifies that the same was "sworn" before him.

The jurat is usually in the following form, viz.: "Sworn and subscribed before me, on the —— day of ——, 1842. J. P., justice of the peace."

In some cases it has been holden that it was essential that the officer should sign the jurat, and that it should contain his addition and official description; 3 Cai. 128; 2 Disn. 472. But see 2 Wend. 283; 12 id. 223; 2 Cow. 552; 2 Johns. 479; 17 Ind. 294; Proff. Not; 136 Ind. 630. A jurat being no part of an affidavit, a general demurrer to the sufficiency of the affidavit will not reach a failure to add to the name of the person who administered the oath his official designation; 93 Ga. 252.

An officer in some English corporations, chiefly in certain towns in Kent and Sussex, whose duties are similar to those of aldermen in others; stat. 1 Edw. IV.; 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 30; 13 Edw. I. c. 26.

Officers in the island of Jersey, of whom there are twelve, members of the royal court, and elected for life; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 103; L. R. 1 P. C. 94.

JURATA (Lat.). In Old English Law. A jury of twelve men sworn. Especially, a jury of the common law, as distinguished from the assiza, or jury established or re-established by stat. Hen. II.

The jurata, or common-law jury, was a jury called in to try the cause, upon the prayer of the parties themselves, in cases where a jury was not given by statute Hen. II., and as the jury was not given under the statute of Henry II., the writ of attaint provided in that statute would not lie against a jurata for false verdict. It was common for the parties to a cause to request that the cause might be decided by the assiza, sitting as a jurata, in order to save trouble of summoning a new jury, in which case "cadit assiza et vertitur in juratam," and the cause is said to be decided non in modum assizæ, but in modum juratæ. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 335, 336; Glanville, lib. 13, c. 20; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 30. But this distinction has been long obsolete.

Juratæ were divided into: first, jurata dilatoria, which inquires out offenders against the law, and presents their names, together with their offences, to the judge, and which is of two kinds, major and minor, according to the extent of its jurisdiction; second, jurata judicaria, which gives verdict as to the matter of fact in issue, and is of two kinds, civilis, in civil causes, and criminalis, in criminal causes. Du Cange.

A clause in nisi prius records called the jury clause, so named from the word jurata, with which its Latin form begins. This entry, jurata ponitur in respectu, is abolished. Com. Law Proc. Act, 1852, § 104; Whart. Law Lex.; 9 Co. 32; 59 Geo. III. c. 46; 4 Bla. Com. 342. Such trials were usually held in churches, in presence of bishops, priests, and secular judges, after three days fasting, confession, communion, etc. Du Cange.

A certificate placed at the bottom of an affidavit, declaring that the witness has been sworn or affirmed to the truth of the facts therein alleged. Its usual form is, "Sworn (or affirmed) before me, the —— day of ——, 18—." A jurat.

JURATORY CAUTION. A security sometimes taken in Scotch proceedings, when no better can be had, viz.: an inventory of effects given up upon oath, and assigned in security of the sums which may be found due. Bell, Dict.

JURE DIVINO (Lat.). By divine right. Divine Right is the name generally given to the theory of government which holds monarchy to be the only legitimate form of government. The monarch and his legitimate heirs being, by divine right, entitled to the sovereignty, cannot forfeit that right by any misconduct, or any period of dispossession. But where the knowledge of the right heir is lost, the usurper, being in possession by the permission of God, is to be obeyed as the true heir. Sir Robert Filmer, the most distinguished exponent of the theory, died about 1650.

JURE REPRESENTATIONIS (Lat.). By right of representation. See PER STIRPES. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 219, n. 14, 224.

JURE UXORIS (Lat.). By right of a wife.

JURIDICAL. Relating to administration of justice, or office of a judge. Webster, Dict.

Regular; done in conformity to the laws of the country and the practice which is there observed.

JURIS ET DE JURE (Lat.). Of right and by law. A presumption is said to be juris et de jure when it is conclusive, i. e. when no evidence will be admitted to rebut it, in contradistinction to a presumption, which is simply juris, i. e. rebuttable by evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 15, note; Wills, Circ. Ev. 29; Best, Pres. 20, § 17; Best, Ev. 43.

JURIS ET SEISINÆ CONJUNCTIO (Lat.). The union of seisin, or possession, and the right of possession, forming a complete title. 2 Bla. Com. 199, 311.

JURIS CONSULTUS (Lat. skilled in the law). In Civil Law. A person who has such knowledge of the laws and customs which prevail in a state as to be able to advise, act, and to secure a person in his dealings. Cicero.

The early jurisconsults gave their opinions gratuitously, and were also employed in drawing up written documents. From Augustus to Adrian, only those allowed by the emperor could be jurisconsults; before and after those emperors, any could be jurisconsults who chose. If their opinion was unanimous, it had the force of law: if not, the prætor could follow which opinion he chose. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.

There were two sects of jurisconsults at Rome, the Proculeians and Labinians. The former were founded by Labeo, and were in favor of innovation; the latter by Capito, and held to the received doctrines. Cushing, Int. Rom. Law. §§ 5, 6.

JURISDICTION (Lat. jus, law, dicere, to say). The authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide causes. 60 Vt. 618. The power to hear and determine a cause. 3 Ohio 494; 6 Pet. 709; 2 How. 338. The right of a judge to pronounce a sentence of the law, on a case or issue before him, acquired through due process of law. It includes power to enforce the execution of what is decreed. 9 Johns. 239; 3 Metc. Mass. 460; Thach. 202.

The right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in the given case. To constitute this there are three essentials: First, the court must have cognizance of the class of cases to which the one to be adjudicated belongs; second, the proper parties must be present; and third, the point decided upon must be, in substance and effect, within the issue; 1 Black, Judg. § 242; 55 Ark. 200.

Ancillary jurisdiction. Where one court of chancery entertains a bill in aid of a suit commenced in another chancery jurisdiction, both being designed to operate upon the same subject-matter or property right, but where the first suit is inadequate to give complete relief for want of territorial jurisdiction over the entire subject of litigation, the subsequent suits are said to be ancillary to the first. A familiar illustration is a bill to foreclose a mortgage on a railroad passing through two or more states, in which ancillary bills are filed in states other than that in which the first suit is brought, without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

Appellate jurisdiction is that given by appeal or writ of error from the judgment of another court.

Assistant jurisdiction is that afforded by a court of chancery in aid of a court of law: as, for example, by a bill of discovery, or for the perpetuation of testimony, and the like.

Auxiliary jurisdiction is another name given to this jurisdiction in aid of a court of law.

Jurisdiction of the cause is the power over the subject-matter given by the laws of the sovereignty in which the tribunal exists.

Civil jurisdiction is that which exists when the subject-matter is not of a criminal nature.

Concurrent jurisdiction is that which is possessed over the same parties or subject-matter at the same time by two or more separate tribunals.

Consultative jurisdiction. Where one court aids another by giving an opinion on a matter which the latter has under consideration, the court which gives the opinion is said to exercise a consultative jurisdiction. 4 App. Cas. 30.

Criminal jurisdiction is that which exists for the punishment of crimes.

Exclusive jurisdiction is that which gives to one tribunal sole power to try the cause.

General jurisdiction is that which extends to a great variety of matters. General jurisdiction in law and equity is jurisdiction of every kind that a court can possess, of the person, subject-matter, territorial, and generally the power of the court in the discharge of its judicial duties. 63 Hun 367.

Limited jurisdiction (called, also, special and inferior) is that which extends only to certain specified causes.

Original jurisdiction is that bestowed upon a tribunal in the first instance.

Jurisdiction of the person is that obtained by the appearance of the defendant before the tribunal. 9 Mass. 462.

Territorial jurisdiction is the power of the tribunal considered with reference to the territory within which it is to be exercised. 9 Mass. 462.

Cooley speaks of "courts of general jurisdiction, by which is meant that their authority extends to a great variety of matters, while others are only of special and limited jurisdiction," that is, have authority extending only to certain specified cases; Const. Lim., 5th ed. 502. The inferior federal courts, though of limited jurisdiction, are not technically inferior courts; 10 Wheat. 192. There are courts which are competent to decide on their own jurisdiction and to exercise it to a final judgment without setting forth in their proceedings the facts and evidence on which it is rendered, whose record is absolute verity, which can be questioned only in an appellate court; other courts are so constituted that their judgments "can be looked through for the facts and evidence which are necessary to sustain them," whose decisions are not evidence of themselves to show jurisdiction and its lawful exercise; 2 How. 341.

Jurisdiction is given by the law; 22 Barb. 323; 3 Tex. 157; and cannot be conferred by consent of the parties; 5 Mich. 331; 23 Conn. 112; 2 Ohio St. 223; 23 Ala. N. S. 155; 34 Me. 223; 4 Cush. 27; 4 Gilm. 131; 6 Ired. 189; 4 Yerg. 579; 3 M'Cord 280; 12 Miss. 549; 32 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1025; 82 Wis. 644; 65 Hun 489; 52 Fed. Rep. 770: nor can silence or positive consent of parties confer on a federal court jurisdiction denied by statute; 58 Fed. Rep. 18. Where the jurisdiction of a court as to the subject-matter is limited, the consent of parties cannot confer it; 91 Ill. 319. Where under a contract parties agree that in case of a breach one might be served with a writ in Scotland, the court refused to allow service on the defendant domiciled there; no agreement between individuals can empower a court to do an act which it is, by rules made under a statute, forbidden to do; [1896] 1 Q. B. 35. But a privilege defeating jurisdiction may be waived if the court has jurisdiction over the subject-matter; 14 Ga. 589; 6 Tex. 379; 13 Ill. 432; 1 Ia. 94; 1 Barb. 449; 7 Humphr. 209; 4 Mass. 593; 4 M'Cord 79; 3 McLean 587; 5 Cra. 288; 8 Wheat. 699; see 76 Hun 543; and parties may admit facts which show jurisdiction; 22 Wall. 322, where the files of the record were lost and the court thereupon presumed that they contained all necessary jurisdictional facts.

Jurisdiction given by the law of the sovereignty of the tribunal is held sufficient everywhere, at least as to all property within the sovereignty; 2 Blatchf. 427; 10 Rich. Eq. 19; 27 Mo. 594; 1 R. I. 285; and as to persons on whom process is actually and personally served within the territorial limits of jurisdiction, or who appear and by their pleadings admit jurisdiction; 6 Tex. 275; 4 N. Y. 375; 8 Ga. 83. See 11 Barb. 309; 50 Kan. 732. But the appearance of a person on whom no personal service of process has been made, merely to object to the jurisdiction is not such an admission; 37 N. H. 9; 9 Mass. 462. And see 2 Sandf. 717.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage brought against the sultan of a Malay state, it appeared that the contract had been made in England and the sultan had resided there under an assumed name. It was held that the court would take judicial notice of the status of a foreign sovereign; that the court would accept as conclusive the certificate of the proper department of the government that the sultan was an independent sovereign; that the courts of England would not take jurisdiction over any foreign sovereign, unless he elected to submit to their jurisdiction; that a foreign sovereign does not waive his right by going to England incognito, nor by any act short of submission in court to the jurisdiction. Such submission would be by notice when sued that he would not claim his privilege or by suing in an English court, in which case he must submit to a counter claim; Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, [1894] 1 Q. B. 149.

Jurisdiction must be either of the subject-matter, which is acquired by exercising powers conferred by law over property within the territorial limits of the sovereignty, or of the person, which is acquired by actual service of process or personal appearance of the defendant. The question as to the possession of the former is to be determined according to the law of the sovereignty; Dav. 407; of the latter, as a simple question of fact. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

Jurisdiction in a personal action cannot be obtained by service on a defendant outside of the jurisdiction; 95 U. S. 714. The courts of one state have no jurisdiction over persons of other states unless found within their territorial limits; 18 Wall. 367.

Jurisdiction in rem over a non-resident's property can be obtained by proceedings against it, of which notice should be given in order to give a binding effect to the proceedings; such notice may be actual or constructive; 95 U. S. 714; see 70 Tex. 588. Any judgment obtained in such proceedings has no effect beyond the property in question; no other property can be reached under it; nor can any suit be maintained on it, either in the same court or elsewhere; 10 Wall. 317.

Where the jurisdiction of a court is based upon the amount in controversy, some cases hold that the test is in the amount alleged in the pleadings to be due; 81 Cal. 599; 13 Md. 314; 6 W. & S. 66; but not if the amount is so alleged in bad faith; 83 Mich. 561; it will be determined by the allegations of the complaint and not on ex parte affidavits; 82 Fed. Rep. 209. Where, on an appeal from a justice of the peace, it appears by testimony at the trial that the plaintiff's demand exceeded the statutory jurisdiction, there is no jurisdiction; 37 Pa. 387. Where the amount in controversy appeared by the pleadings to be sufficient to give jurisdiction, but the jury found for a sum less than the jurisdictional amount, it was held that the court did not have jurisdiction; 67 Ind. 546; 42 Wis. 478; but it is also held that in such cases the judgment will stand, but without costs; 13 Md. 314. Where a defence is made to a part of a claim and the jury find for less than the full claim, the jurisdiction is not affected; 42 Fed. Rep. 652.

"By matter in dispute is meant the subject of litigation—the matter for which the suit is brought—and upon which issue is joined, and in relation to which jurors are called and witnesses examined;" 1 Wall. 339. In an action upon a money demand, where the general issue is pleaded, the matter in dispute is the debt claimed; 97 U. S. 565. In actions sounding in damages, the damages claimed give jurisdiction; 116 U. S. 550; in cases impeaching the right to an office, the amount of the salary attached to the office is the criterion; 130 U. S. 175; in ejectment the value of the land claimed determines the jurisdiction; 135 id. 195; and so it is in a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance as a cloud on the title; 46 Fed. Rep. 317. In all cases facts on which the jurisdiction of a federal court depends must in some form appear on the face of the record; its jurisdiction is limited, and the presumption is that a cause is without its jurisdiction unless the contrary affirmatively appear; 119 U. S. 237; until it is in some way shown by the record that the sum demanded is not the matter in dispute, that sum will govern in all questions of jurisdiction, but when it is shown that the sum demanded is not the real matter in suit, the sum shown and not the sum demanded will prevail; 108 U. S. 174; the amount of damages laid in the declaration is not conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction; if the court find that the amount of damages stated in the declaration is colorable for the purpose of creating a case within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, the jurisdiction is defeated, and it is the duty of the court to dismiss the proceedings; this may be shown by evidence or depositions taken in the cause; however done it should be upon due notice to the parties to be affected by the dismissal; 129 U. S. 326. If this be made to appear "to the satisfaction of the circuit court at any time after suit has been brought," the court must dismiss the suit; Act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L. 472). It seems that if, from plaintiff's evidence at the trial, the amount laid in the complaint appears to have been beyond reasonable expectation of recovery, the action should be dismissed; 82 Fed. Rep. 209.

A plea of set-off will not deprive the court of jurisdiction, though, if established, it would reduce the plaintiff's recovery below the jurisdictional amount; 9 W. & S. 66; 81 Cal. 599.

In a creditor's bill several judgments held by different creditors cannot be added to make up the jurisdictional amount in the circuit court; 154 U. S. 556. But it is otherwise where several plaintiffs are interested collectively under a common title, the validity of which is before the court; 143 id. 42. A reasonable attorney's fee, stipulated by the parties in case of a suit, may be added to the debt to make up its jurisdictional amount; 80 Fed. Rep. 759. Where the judgment in the supreme court of a territory exceeded $5,000 the supreme court of the United States has jurisdiction though the judgment in the trial court was for a less sum, and the amount is reached by adding interest to that judgment; 145 U. S. 428. On the appeal it must be shown that the amount in controversy in the appellate court is sufficient; 33 W. Va. 60; the plaintiff in error must show this fact; 119 U. S. 387.

A court of general jurisdiction is presumed to be acting within its jurisdiction till the contrary is shown; Brown, Jur. § 202; 10 Ga. 371; 10 Barb. 97; 3 Ill. 269; 15 Vt. 46; 2 Dev. 431. A court of limited jurisdiction, or a court acting under special powers, has only the jurisdiction expressly delegated; 27 Ala. N. S. 291; 26 Mo. 65; 1 Dougl. Mich. 384; 7 Hill, S. C. 39; and it must appear from the record that its acts are within its jurisdiction; 5 Harr. Del. 387; 1 Dutch. 554; 2 Ill. 554; 27 Mo. 101; 22 Barb. 823; 28 Miss. 737; 26 Ala. N. S. 568; 5 Ind. 157; 21 Me. 340; 16 Vt. 246; 2 How. 319; see 128 U. S. 586; unless the legislature, by general or special law, remove this necessity; 24 Ga. 245; 7 Mo. 373; 1 Pet. C. C. 36. See 1 Salk. 414; Bac. Abr. Courts (C, D).

When the record of a court of general jurisdiction in another state discloses nothing in regard to the method of process or notice, and there is no evidence on the subject, there is a presumption of jurisdiction over the person, the record itself importing sufficient proof of jurisdiction without disclosing the different steps by which it was acquired; 18 N. Y. L. J. 575.

Where one of two courts of concurrent jurisdiction has taken cognizance of a cause, the other will not entertain jurisdiction of the same cause; Brown, Jur. § 95; 16 Ohio 378; 27 Vt. 518; 25 Barb. 513; 8 Md. 254; 4 Tex. 242; 19 Ala. N. S. 438; 1 Fla. 198; 6 McLean 355; 86 Fed. Rep. 337; 93 U. S. 199; 116 Mass. 84. See 4 U. S. App. 438.

The leading general principle as to concurrent jurisdiction is that whichever court of those having such jurisdiction first acquires possession of a cause will retain it throughout; Wells, Jurisd. § 156; 19 Ala. 438; 25 Barb. 513; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 351. A court which has acquired rightful jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter will retain it for all purposes within the general scope of the equities to be enforced; 93 U. S. 199; 47 Ind. 274; where concurrent jurisdiction may be exercised by the federal and state authorities, the court which first takes jurisdiction can be interfered with by no other court, state or federal. It is a subversion of the judicial power to take a cause from a court having jurisdiction, before its final decision is given; 6 McLean 355; 107 Ill. 554. The supreme court and the common pleas have concurrent jurisdiction in matters of equity; and pending a bill in the common pleas, the supreme court will not entertain jurisdiction for the same cause; 1 Grant 212.

The jurisdiction of the court thus first exercising jurisdiction extends to the execution of the judgment rendered; 10 Bush 431. Courts have no power to interfere with the judgments and decrees of other courts of concurrent jurisdiction; 8 Cal. 26, 66.

The rule that among courts of concurrent jurisdiction, that one which first obtains jurisdiction of a case has the exclusive right to decide every question arising in the case, is subject to some limitations; and is confined to suits between the same parties or privies, seeking the same relief or remedy, and to such questions or propositions as arise ordinarily and properly in the progress of the suit first brought, and does not extend to all matters which may by possibility become involved with it; 3 Wall. 334; 4 Biss. 368.

Where the first court, because of its limited jurisdiction or mode of proceeding, is not capable of determining the whole controversy, another court may take jurisdiction and accomplish it; 19 Ala. 438.

At common law the rule is well established that the pendency of a prior suit in personam in a foreign court, between the same parties for the same cause of action, is no sufficient cause for stay or bar of a suit instituted in a local court. This rule obtains in regard to actions pending in another state of the Union; 1 Curtis 494; 2 W. & S. 129; 44 Pa. 326; but see 3 McLean 221, where it was held that the pendency of a suit between the same parties and respecting the same subject-matter in another state, may be pleaded in abatement in the federal courts, but to make such plea effectual it must show that the court where suit is has jurisdiction.

The pendency of an action in a state court will not bar an action in a United States court to determine the same question between the same parties; 50 Fed. Rep. 656, which was a mortgage foreclosure proceeding, with an oral opinion by Hanford, J.

It is provided by federal statute that "every person who commits murder within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district of the county under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States . . . shall suffer death." 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5339. Under this provision the criminal jurisdiction of the United States was held exclusive under an act of cession of land for forts in Nebraska, which provided "that the jurisdiction of the State of Nebraska in and over the military reservation known as Fort Robinson and Fort Niobrara be and the same is hereby ceded to the United States." It was also provided that the jurisdiction ceded should continue no longer than the premises concerned were occupied and used by the federal government; 74 Fed. Rep. 31. So it was held by Tenney, J., that the federal court had jurisdiction in a case of homicide on the battleship Indiana, while she was lying within territory used for naval purposes, under an act ceding "jurisdiction over all the lands used and occupied by the United States as a navy yard and naval hospital, according to the plans furnished by the Navy Department." 18 N. Y. L. J. 518; s. c. 30 Chic. Leg. N. 114, distinguishing 3 Wheat. 336, where the naval vessel was in state waters.

But it has been recently held by the supreme court of New York, appellate division, that the provision of the federal constitution giving to congress exclusive jurisdiction over lands purchased by consent of the state legislature for such purposes (Art. I. § 8, subs. 17), does not oust the jurisdiction of state courts to try civil actions of tort, since congress has not provided for them; 47 N. Y. Supp. 757. The court said further:

"Although the injury to recover damages for which the plaintiff brought this action was sustained on land over which the national government had exclusive jurisdiction, it had no more exclusive jurisdiction over such territory than the respective legislatures of the neighboring States of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, or Ohio have over their respective territories. Had the injury of which the plaintiff complains occurred within the limits of either of said states, an action could have been maintained in the supreme court of this state to recover damages therefor (8 Hun 70; 12 N. Y. Supp. 310; 54 Barb. 31; 6 Abb. Prac. 165; 45 Barb. 327; 17 Wend. 328; 9 Johns. 67; 14 Johns. 134; 1 Cow. 543), although it has been held that our courts may, in their discretion, refuse to entertain jurisdiction of an action between citizens of a foreign state for acts committed within their state (120 N. Y. 420). If an action can be maintained in the courts of this state, by a citizen thereof, for a personal injury suffered in another state or country, we can see no good reason why such an action cannot be maintained when the injury was committed in this state on land purchased by, and ceded to, the United States. The effect of such cession and purchase is merely to create, so to speak, within our territory, a foreign state or territory."

The court of appeals of that state held that jurisdiction of such actions unquestionably remained in the state in the absence of legislation by congress; 135 N. Y. 336. And in reference to the effect of legislation by congress the court said:

"We are not disposed to hold that even then the judicial power of the courts of this state would be powerless to redress private injuries committed thereon, or that the injured party would be compelled to seek justice in some other jurisdiction. The state did cede such political jurisdiction to the federal government with respect to the lands in question, with certain reservations. Congress has not, however, made any new regulations touching the administration of justice in civil cases, with respect to actions arising therein; and, until some such regulations have been made, the municipal laws of the state for the protection and enforcement of private rights through the courts remain unchanged (114 U. S. 542; 114 U. S. 525). The cession of territory by one sovereignty to another does not abrogate the laws in force at the time of the cession for the administration of private justice. Not, at least, until the new sovereignty has abrogated or changed them, do such laws cease to operate, except, possibly, so far as they may be in conflict with the political character, institutions, and constitution of the government to which the territory is ceded."

In the same case the United States supreme court upheld the judgment on the ground that the federal jurisdiction had lapsed under the terms of the cession and declined to determine the other question; 162 U. S. 399. See 18 N. Y. L. J. 740.

In another class of cases it has been held that a jurisdiction executed by the state courts may be entirely ousted by the interposition of congress by a statute conferring on the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. An action against a foreign consul may be so brought in the state court; 50 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 758.

Any act of a tribunal beyond its jurisdiction is null and void, and of no effect whatever; 38 Me. 414; 13 Ill. 432; 21 Barb. 9; 26 N. H. 232; whether without its territorial jurisdiction; 21 How. 506; 15 Ga. 457; or beyond its powers; 22 Barb. 271; 13 Ill. 432; 1 Dougl. Mich. 390; 5 T. B. Monr. 261; 16 Vt. 246.

Illegality in the service of process by which jurisdiction is to be obtained is not waived by the special appearance of the defendant to move that the service be set aside; nor after such motion is denied, by his answering to the merits; such illegality is waived only when, without having insisted upon it, he pleads in the first instance to the merits; 98 U. S. 476. The filing of a general appearance is not a waiver of defendant's right to move to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, where that was based on diverse citizenship and the action was brought in the wrong district; 82 Fed. Rep. 337. But where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and service was made in the jurisdiction, a defence on the merits after a motion to quash the service of summons had been overruled was held to waive the objection to the jurisdiction ; 49 id. 807.

It is held that the question must be raised before making any plea to the merits, if at all, when it arises from formal defects in the process, or when the want is of jurisdiction over the person ; 7 Cal. 584 ; 19 Ark. 241 ; 28 Mo. 319 ; 22 Barb. 323 ; 6 Cush. 560 ; 13 Ga. 318 ; 20 How. 541 ; 87 Ga. 193 ; 45 Ill. App. 374 ; 76 Hun 543. See 2 R. I. 450 ; 30 Ala. N. S. 63 ; 16 Colo. 529 ; 4 U. S. App. 247 ; 36 Mo. App. 234 ; 89 Tenn. 304.

Objection to jurisdiction may be taken by motion to dismiss ; 37 Pa. 387 ; 71 Ind. 417 ; at common law, by a plea in abatement ; 144 U. S. 653 ; 18 Ill. 292 ; 3 Johns. 105 ; it can be raised in the federal courts by a plea in abatement ; 46 Fed. Rep. 317 ; and under the codes, by demurrer, if the want of jurisdiction appear in the complaint ; Works, Courts and Juris. 106 ; or if it be in a court of special jurisdiction, by demurrer, answer, or motion in arrest of judgment ; id. 109.

Where the subject-matter is not within the jurisdiction, the court may dismiss the proceedings of its own motion ; 22 Barb. 271 ; 4 Ill. 133 ; 109 Ind. 79 ; and a remedy may be had by a writ of prohibition ; 3 Bla. Com. 12. See PROHIBITION.

If the objection is only to a defective service, it must be raised in the court below ; 95 U. S. 714.

Where the citizenship of the parties appears in the petition, defect of jurisdiction on that ground may be raised by demurrer, in the absence of a general appearance ; 41 Fed. Rep. 65.

It is rarely, if ever, too late to object to the jurisdiction of a court where the want of power to hear and determine appears on the face of the proceedings ; per Bronson, J., 2 Hill, N. Y. 159. Thus, an appellant from chancery to the court of errors may avail himself in the latter court of an objection to the chancellor's jurisdiction, though it was not made before him, when the objection, if valid, is of such a kind that it could not have been obviated, had it been started at an earlier stage in the proceedings ; id. See 18 Civil Proc. R. 98. The objection that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law when made for the first time in an appellate court is looked upon with supreme disfavor ; 4 U. S. App. 336. See 60 Fed. Rep. 322.

The judgment of a court of another state is always subject to impeachment for the want of jurisdiction, either as to subject-matter or parties. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action or judicial proceeding is the power to decide the general question involved therein, and does not depend upon the facts of a particular case, or the ultimate existence of a good cause of action ; 18 N. Y. L. J. 575.

Courts of dernier resort are conclusive judges of their own jurisdiction ; 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 360 ; 1 Bail. 294.

It is a general principle of law that an agreement in advance in which an attempt is made to oust the ordinary jurisdiction of the court is illegal and void ; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7466. Parties cannot by contract oust the courts of their jurisdiction ; 79 Pa. 480 ; nor can individuals or corporations create judicial tribunals for the final and conclusive settlement of controversies ; 102 Ind. 269 ; but any person may covenant that no right of action shall accrue till a third person has decided on any difference that may arise between himself and the other party to the covenant ; 5 H. L. Cas. 811 ; 4 App. Cas. 674 ; 10 App. Cas. 229 ; but it has been held that a provision for submitting the whole question of liability to arbitrators as a condition precedent to a right of action is invalid ; L. R. 1 Q. B. D. 563. But this case is said not to be in harmony with the other English authorities, though it follows the doctrine of Coleridge, J., in 8 Exch. 497, a case which was affirmed in 5 H. L. Cas. 811, but upon broader grounds. See 11 Harv. L. Rev. 289. In Massachusetts, the decisions appear to distinguish between agreements to arbitrate all disputes and those for the submission of the question of damages only, or questions of that kind which do not go to the root of the action ; the former are invalid ; the latter valid ; see 135 Mass. 216 ; 100 id. 117 ; 153 id. 143. In Maine, parties may, by agreement, impose conditions with respect to preliminary and collateral matters, such as do not go to the root of the action, but cannot be compelled, even by their own agreements, to refer the whole cause of action to arbitration, and thus oust the courts of jurisdiction ; 79 Me. 221 ; see 88 id. 435. It is said that the rule that a general covenant to submit any differences is a nullity, is too well settled to be questioned ; 50 N. Y. 250. See 33 Wis. 331. An agreement that the decision of an engineer, in case of any dispute, shall be obligatory, is binding ; 4 W. & S. 205 ; 3 Wall. Jr. 243; contra, 1 Cliff. 439. The subject is ably treated in 11 Harv. L. Rev. 234.

Stipulations in a policy of marine insurance, that any dispute in relation to loss shall be referred to referees ; that no policyholder shall maintain any claim thereon until he shall have offered to submit to such reference ; and that in case any suit shall be begun without such offer, the claim shall be dismissed and the company exempted from liability under it, are void ; 54 Me. 55, 70. A clause in an insurance policy providing for arbitration of any dispute as to loss, and that no action should be maintained till such arbitration was had, does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts ; the condition is revocable, though its breach may subject the party to an action for a breach of it ; 79 Pa. 478.

A by-law of a mutual fire insurance corporation, to which their policies are expressed to be subject, that any suit on a policy shall be brought in the courts where the company is established, is not binding on the assured ; 6 Gray 174.

An agreement by a foreign insurance company, in conformity with a state statute, that if sued in a state court, it will not remove the suit to a federal court, is invalid; 20 Wall. 445.

An Iowa statute which requires that every foreign corporation named in it shall, as a condition for obtaining a permit to transact business in Iowa, stipulate that it will not remove into the federal court certain suits which it would by the laws of the United States have a right to remove, is void because it makes the right to a permit dependent upon the surrender by the foreign corporation of a privilege secured to it by the constitution and laws of the United States; 121 U. S. 186; the state might as well pass an act to deprive a citizen of another state of his right of removal; id. 200. See INSURANCE.

Mutual benefit societies may prescribe regulations as to procedure in enforcing claims, and may require appeals to superior bodies before instituting suit, but they cannot entirely take away the right to invoke the aid of the courts in enforcing claims existing in favor of its members upon contracts; 102 Ind. 269.

An agreement by which the members of an association undertake to confer judicial powers, in respect to the common property, upon its officers, selected out of the association, as a tribunal having general authority to adjudicate upon alleged violations of the rules, and to decree a forfeiture of the rights, to such property, of the parties, is void. The court will not aid in enforcing the judgment of a tribunal sought to be created by private compact, except in case of submission to arbitration of specific matters of controversy; 16 N. Y. 112.

The powers both of courts of equity and of law over their own process to prevent abuse, oppression, and injustice are inherent and equally extensive and efficient; as is also their power to protect their own jurisdiction and officers in the possession of property that is in the custody of the law; 110 U. S. 276.

When a prisoner after pleading guilty is allowed to go out of custody without bail, the court has no further jurisdiction over him, and cannot, at a subsequent term, order his rearrest, and pronounce sentence upon him; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 568.

As to jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, see that title.

JURISDICTION CLAUSE. In Equity Practice. That part of a bill which is intended to give jurisdiction of the suit to the court, by a general averment that the acts complained of are contrary to equity and tend to the injury of the plaintiff, and that he has no remedy, or not a complete remedy, without the assistance of a court of equity, is called the jurisdiction clause. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 43.

This clause is unnecessary; for if the court appear from the bill to have jurisdiction, the bill will be sustained without this clause; and if the court have not jurisdiction, the bill will be dismissed though the clause may be inserted. Story, Eq. Pl. § 34.

JURISPRUDENCE. The science of the law. The practical science of giving a wise interpretation to the laws and making a just application of them to all cases as they arise.

By science, in the first definition, is understood that connection of truths which is founded on principles either evident in themselves or capable of demonstration,—a collection of truths of the same kind, arranged in methodical order. In the latter sense, it is the habit of judging the same questions in the same manner, and by this course of judgments forming precedents. 1 Ayliffe, Pand. 3. See Austin, Amos, Markby, Heron, Phillimore, Lorimer, Lindley, on Jurisprudence.

JURIST. One versed in the science of the law. One skilled in the civil law. One skilled in the law of nations.

JURO. In Spanish Law. A certain pension granted by the king on the public revenues, and more especially on the saltworks, by favor, either in consideration of meritorious services or in return for money loaned the government or obtained by it through forced loans. It is a portion of the yearly revenue of the state, assigned as a rightful indemnity, either in perpetuity or as an annuity.

JUROR (Lat. juro, to swear). A man who is sworn or affirmed to serve on a jury.

Any person selected and summoned according to law to serve in that capacity, whether the jury has been actually impanelled and sworn or not. 43 La. Ann. 907.

JURY (Lat. jurata, sworn). A body of men who are sworn to declare the facts of a case as they are proven from the evidence placed before them.

The term "jury," as used in the constitution, means twelve competent men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin nor personal dependents of either of the parties, having their homes within the jurisdictional limits of the court, drawn and selected by officers free from all bias in favor of or against either party; duly impanelled, and sworn to render a true verdict, according to the law and the evidence; 11 Nev. 39.

A late writer considers that the best theory regards the jury system as having been derived from Normandy, where, as in the rest of France, it had existed since its establishment under the Carlovingian kings. It made its appearance in England soon after the Norman Conquest. No trace of it is to be found in Anglo-Saxon times, nor was it, as is often supposed, established by Magna Charta; 10 Harv. L. Rev. 150, by J. E. R. Stephens. The same writer finds the idea of unanimity re-established in the time of Edward IV., a majority verdict having previously sufficed; in the Year Books of 23 Edward III. is the first indication of the jury deciding on evidence produced before them in addition to their own knowledge. Early in the reign of Henry IV. evidence was required to be given at the bar of the court, and the modern practice or method of jury trials had its origin; id. 159.

Prof. J. B. Thayer finds the origin of the jury in the Frankish inquisition; it existed in Normandy and went thence to England in the eleventh century; 5 Harv. L. Rev. 249. The use of a jury both for civil and criminal cases is mentioned for the first time in English statute law in the Constitutions of Clarendon; id. 156.

The origin of trial by jury is said by another recent writer to be rather French than English, rather royal than popular, rather a livery of conquest than a badge of freedom. Originally juries were called in, not to hear, but to give, evidence. They were the neighbors of the parties and were presumed to know when they came into court the facts about which they were to testify. They were chosen by the sheriff to represent the neighborhood. The verdict was the sworn testimony of the countryside. By slow degrees the jury acquired a new character. Sometimes when the jurors knew nothing of the facts, witnesses who did know the facts would be called in to supply the requisite information. They became more and more dependent on the evidence given in their presence by those witnesses who were summoned by the parties. In the fifteenth century the change had taken place, though in yet later days a man who had been summoned as a juror and sought to escape on the ground that he already knew something of the facts, might be told that he had given a very good reason for his being placed in the jury box. It may well be said therefore that trial by jury, though it had its roots in the Frankish inquest, grew up on English soil; 1 Social England 255, 290. So also 1 Poll. & Maitl. 117-121.

Another writer finds its foundation in Norman institutions and its establishment by positive legislation in the time of Henry II. Lesser, Hist. of Jury Syst. 172.

A common jury is one drawn in the usual and regular manner.

A grand jury is a body organized for certain preliminary purposes.

A jury de medietate linguæ is one composed half of aliens and half of denizens.

Such juries might formerly be claimed, both in civil and criminal cases, where the party claiming the privilege was an alien born, by virtue of 28 Edw. III. c. 13, and by an earlier statute, where one party was a foreign merchant; 27 Edw. III. c. 8. Such a jury was provided in criminal cases by a statute of Edward I. It was abolished by 33 Vict. c. 14. The right has been recognized in this country; 1 Dall. 73; 2 Johns. 381; 11 Leigh 690; contra, 4 Cra. C. C. 573; 4 Hawks 200. It has been generally abolished by statute; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 19; excepting in Kentucky, where it still exists; id.

A petit or traverse jury is a jury who try the question in issue and pass finally upon the truth of the facts in dispute. The term jury is ordinarily applied to this body distinctively.

A special jury is one selected by the assistance of the parties.

This is granted in some cases upon motion and cause shown, under various local provisions. The method at common law was for the officer to return the names of forty-eight principal freeholders to the proper officer. The attorneys of the respective parties, being present, strike off each twelve names, and from the remaining twenty-four the jury is selected. A similar course is pursued in these states where such juries are allowed. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 357. The earliest rule of court on the subject was made in 8 Will. III.; 1 Salk. 405. It formerly was granted only in cases of special consequence or great difficulty; but later, a special jury has usually been granted in ordinary cases. In some states such a jury is of course; in New York, statutes provide for such only in cases of special importance or intricacy, as to which the court must decide.

A struck jury is a special jury. See 4 Zabr. 843.

Trial by jury is guaranteed by the constitution of the United States in all criminal cases except upon impeachments, and in all suits at common law where the subject-matter of the controversy exceeds twenty dollars in value. The right to such a trial is also provided in many of our state constitutions. It has been held, however, not to be an infringement of this federal constitutional right, where a statute provides that in all criminal prosecutions the party accused, if he shall so elect, may be tried by the court instead of by a jury; Miller, Const. U. S. 494; 5 Ohio St. 57; 30 Mich. 116; 46 Conn. 349; see 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 705. It was held by the United States supreme court that a jury trial may be waived when there is a positive legislative enactment giving the right to do so: 146 U. S. 314. This clause of the constitution does not apply to state courts; Hare, Am. Const. L. 860; 134 U. S. 31; 7 Pet. 247; 21 Wall. 557; Cooley, Const. Lim. 410; and therefore the states may in their own constitutions dispense with trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases; Ordron. Const. Leg. 261, and cases supra. It does not apply to cases in the court of claims; 102 U. S. 426; nor to proceedings for disbarring an attorney; 107 U. S. 265; nor for assessing damages; Baldw. 202; nor to equity cases in the federal courts; 104 U. S. 726; nor to cases where the right is antecedently and voluntarily relinquished; 4 Wheat. 235; nor does a like provision in a state constitution apply to any proceedings in which a jury was not required at common law; e. g., a justice's court; 30 Mo. 600; 62 Barb. 16; nor to any court which exercised its functions without the aid of a jury prior to the adoption of a constitution; Thomps. & Merr. Juries 11; 74 N. Y. 406.

A jury trial is not guaranteed by a state constitution providing for "due process of law"; 13 N. Y. 378; nor even by the provision for it in the fourteenth amendment; 92 U. S. 90; "due process of law" simply requires that there shall be a day in court, and the legislature may take away or change a remedy; 70 N. Y. 228; but it has been held in some cases that the expression does guarantee a jury trial; 37 Me. 165; 63 N. H. 406; 8 Gray 329; 110 U. S. 516, opinion of Harlan, J., dissenting.

An act providing for the trial of a contested election to a public office which deprives the party of a trial of disputed facts by jury is not unconstitutional; 43 Pa. 384.

In the Delaware constitution of 1897, provision is made for the trial of criminal offences against the election laws, by the court without a jury. See DELAWARE.

The number of jurors must be twelve; and it is held that the term jury in a constitution imports, ex vi termini, twelve men; 20 Ohio 81; 74 N. Y. 406; 6 Metc. 231; 4 Ohio St. 177; 2 Wis. 22; 3 id. 219; whose verdict is to be unanimous; 13 N. Y. 190. See 11 Nev. 39, supra.

Where a constitution preserves the right of trial by jury inviolate, the legislature cannot change the number of jurors in either civil or criminal cases; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 10; 35 Mo. 408; 51 Ga. 264.

The question whether the common law requirement of twelve jurors may be changed has in recent years received much attention in the courts. There has been a growing tendency, at least, towards the serious consideration of changes in the jury system as administered at common law and secured by the state and federal constitutions. See GRAND JURY. The decided weight of authority is that, where the right to trial by jury is secured by the constitution, the legislature cannot authorize a verdict by a less number than twelve; that the constitutional reservation implies a right to the concurrent judgment of that number, and any statute limiting it is unconstitutional and void; 41 N. H. 550; 33 Fla. 608; 1 Okl. 366; 36 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 499. It is held contra in all civil cases in Utah; 37 Pac. Rep. 262; 39 id. 541; 9 Utah 61. In the last case the question is considered in an elaborate opinion, which argues that the requirement is no more an essential part of the jury system than those common-law qualifications of jurymen which have not been continued in force. The court say: "Wherever this provision has been tried, it has been found to be a distinct benefit. Such a provision is simply a change in the procedure of applying legal remedies. It is general in its application; it is fair and just to all. No man's property rights are injured by it, and no man can be said to have a vested right in the unanimous action of a jury, any more than in the fact that a juror was anciently required to be a freeholder. All litigants could waive in civil trials at common law and under our constitution this unanimity of verdict. If they could waive it, then it was not one of the requisites which must be preserved in order to preserve a jury trial in civil actions. For these reasons because society progresses, and modes and legal procedure must change with that progress, because this enactment is a just and reasonable expression of the public will, because it is calculated to be a great benefit to all classes of litigants, because it reaches justly, fairly, and impartially all classes of men, because it is claimed only to be an infringement of a broad and general statement in the constitution which ought not to be so narrowly construed as to be a bulwark against progress, we hold that this law was a rightful subject of legislation." But see 166 U. S. 464, reversing the supreme court of Utah (10 Utah 147), where it was held that litigants in common-law actions in the courts of the territory of Utah, while it remained a territory, had a right to trial by jury which involved unanimity of verdict, and this right could not be taken away by territorial legislation. As to unanimity of a verdict in a state court see infra. See also 36 Cent. L. J. 437; 89 Ga. 393.

There would seem to be no legal objection to permitting this change by constitutional provision, but even that, it has been held, will not sustain a statute providing that in certain contingencies, at the discretion of the trial court, a jury may consist of less than twelve men; 93 Mich. 399. In California, in civil cases and misdemeanors, the jury may consist of twelve or any number less than twelve upon which the parties may agree in open court. And the number of jurors may be limited in Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming. See 36 Cent. L. J. 437.

Unanimity in giving a verdict was not universal in the early days of the common law; at times eleven sufficed; in some cases a majority. Probably it was only in the second half of the fourteenth century that unanimity became an established principle; 5 Harv. L. Rev. 296, by Prof. J. B. Thayer. The requirement of unanimity of twelve jurors arose from the custom which taught men to regard it as the proper amount of evidence to establish the credibility of a person accused of an offence; Forsyth, Trial by Jury 240. At common law, except as above stated, unanimity was essential to a verdict, so that it has been held that a conviction by eleven jurors, even where the accused waived a trial by twelve jurors, would be set aside; 18 N. Y. 128. "Unanimity was one of the peculiar and essential features of trial by jury at common law;" 166 U. S. 464, in which case while the court considered it a matter of dispute as to whether the seventh amendment alone invalidated a statute dispensing with unanimity it was held that, under the constitution and a law that no person shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury, a statute of Utah authorizing a verdict in civil cases on the concurrence of nine jurors was invalid; but the court expressly said that the power of a state to change the rule as to unanimity was not before them, and cited 92 U. S. 90; 110 U. S. 516. Changes in this respect have been made in many states. In civil actions in California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, Texas, and Washington, three-fourths may render a verdict; two-thirds in Montana in civil actions and crimes less than felonies, and five-sixths in Idaho, in all cases of misdemeanor. In Iowa the legislature may authorize a verdict by less than twelve in inferior courts.

Unanimity is still required in England. In a late case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, where a British subject was convicted of murder in Japan, the court being comprised of a British judge and five jurors, established under a British treaty, it was argued by Sir Frank Lockwood that the British government could not establish such a court with a jury of less than twelve, but the court held that the conviction was lawful. [1897] App. Cas. 719.

A modification of the jury system, much considered and quite generally adopted, is the provision authorizing the parties to waive a jury and elect to have the facts tried by the court. This course in civil cases is authorized in most of the states, as well as in the federal courts. It is provided for in the constitutions of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Wisconsin, Washington, and West Virginia. By statute a like practice obtains in Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, and Wyoming, and also by the bill of rights in Arizona and by statute in New Mexico. There can be a waiver in civil cases and in criminal cases not amounting to felony in Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, and California.

The general principle is, however, that in criminal cases, the accused can neither waive his right to a trial by a jury of twelve nor be deprived of it by the legislature; 18 N.Y. 128; 54 Ind. 461; 63 Ia. 130 (contra, 51 Ia. 578); 41 N. H. 550; 66 Mo. 684; 44 Ala. 393; 12 Ohio St. 622; 1 Mont. 118; 43 Mich. 443. Judge Cooley, after stating that less than twelve would not be a common-law jury, or such as the constitution guarantees, adds, "And the necessity of a full panel could not be waived—at least in case of felony—even by consent." Const. Lim., 4th ed. 395. It was held that where one juror was an alien the failure to challenge him was not a waiver of the objection, and on the refusal of the court to set aside the judgment, it would be reversed, on error; 16 Mich. 356; contra, 2 Bay 150.

As to waiver of full panel, see 12 Cr. L. Mag. 13; by criminal; 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 402; 21 Cent. L. J. 280. On the trial of a misdemeanor, a full jury may be waived; 12 Cush. 80, per Shaw, C. J.; 2 Metc. (Ky.) 1; 59 Fed. Rep. 110; or where the penalty is only a fine; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 365; 41 Mo. 470. A jury may be waived in all civil cases, without any statute; 89 Va. 767.

The fact that a court of chancery may summon a jury to try an issue of fact is not equivalent to the right of trial by jury under the seventh amendment of the constution; 149 U. S. 451. And the constitutional right does not relate to suits over which equity exercised jurisdiction when the constitution was adopted; 26 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 557; but the right cannot be defeated by giving equity jurisdiction over an action in which the right applies; id. It is not impaired by an act giving the appellate court authority to reverse for excessive damages; 36 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 296; s. c. 178 Pa. 481. In that case it was held that this act which gives the supreme court "power in all cases to affirm, reverse, amend, or modify a judgment, order, or decree appealed from and to enter such judgment," etc., as it may deem proper and just, does not infringe upon the right of trial by jury and is constitutional; and in a later case, this decision was adhered to, and it was further held that where the supreme court had reversed a judgment, without awarding a new venire, it might subsequently amend the judgment of reversal by adding thereto a formal judgment in favor of defendant; 183 Pa. 142.

Qualifications. Jurors must possess the qualifications which may be prescribed by statute, must be free from any bias caused by relationship to the parties or interest in the matter in dispute, and in criminal cases must not have formed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

"1. They are to be good and lawful men. 2. Of sufficient freeholds, according to the provisions of several acts of parliament. 3. Not convict of any notorious crime. 4. Not to be of the kindred or alliance of any of the parties. 5. Not to be such as are prepossessed or prejudiced before they hear their evidence." Cond. Gen. 297. As to bias by reason of opinion, see 15 Wkly. L. Bul. 305; 20 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 117; impressions; 8 Cr. L. Mag. 559.

At common law there was a freehold qualification, but to no certain amount; by 2 Hen. V. it was 40*s.*; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 20; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 115. See 20 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 436, 497.

An alien may serve as a juror, that is, a foreigner intending to be naturalized; 56 Mich. 154; contra, 3 Ala. 546, and see Proffatt, Jury Trial § 116; 6 Cr. L. Mag. 336. An atheist has been held to be disqualified; 3 Harr. & McH. 301. Women could not serve as jurors at common law, except upon a jury to try an issue under a writ de ventre inspiciendo (q. v.); 3 Bla. Com. 362. They are now qualified in some states.

The federal constitution provides that in criminal trials the jury shall be taken "from the state and district where the crime shall have been committed." State constitutions usually confine the selection to the county or district, except where, in some states, a provision is made in case jurors cannot conveniently be found in the county. The right to a trial by a jury of the vicinage is an essential part of trial by jury.

In some states the qualifications of jurors are regulated by the constitution; e. g., Florida requires them to be taken from the registered voters. Georgia requires that jurors shall be upright and intelligent persons. Subject to the constitutional provisions as to impairing the right of trial by jury, the legislature has power to define the qualifications of jurors. It may dispense with the freehold qualification required by common law; 96 Ill. 206; 103 Mass. 412; but see 20 Am. L. Reg. 436; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 115.

In some states conviction for certain high crimes disqualifies; some states require citizenship; others that jurors shall be selected from the qualified voters; others impose tests of integrity, or intelligence or education. Freehold or property tests are required in some states. That the jurors shall be over twenty-one years of age is probably a universal requirement; while in some states those past a certain age cannot serve; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 117.

In the federal courts the qualifications are the same as those relating to the highest courts of law in the respective states; U. S. Rev. St. § 800; but this does not require a minute adherence to the state practice; 1 Woods 499, per Bradley, J. A statute confining the selection of jurors to white citizens is invalid under the fourteenth amendment; the right to serve on a jury is an incident of citizenship; 100 U. S. 303; 103 id. 370.

The intelligence and ability of a juror are matters within the sound discretion of the court, and it is sufficient if he knows the English language and can understand the testimony and the argument of counsel; 44 La. Ann. 969. It rests with each state to prescribe such qualifications as it seems proper for jurymen, taking care only that no discrimination in respect to such service be made against any class of citizens solely because of their race; 140 U. S. 291.

As to qualifications generally, see 3 L. Mag. & Rev. N. S. 165; 24 Wkly. L. Bul. 438; disqualifications; 3 Alb. L. J. 81.

The selection of jurors is to be made impartially; and elaborate provisions are made to secure this impartiality. In general, a sufficient number are selected, from among the qualified citizens of the county or district, by the sheriff, or a similar executive officer of the court, and, in case of his disqualification, by the coroner, or, in some cases, by still other designated persons. See ELISORS. From among these the requisite number is selected at the time of trial, to whom objection may be made by the parties.

Sir Matthew Hale says that the writ to return a jury issues to the sheriff who is entrusted to elect and return the jury without the nomination of either party. The jurors were to be such persons as for estate and quality were fit to serve on that employment. They were to be of the neighborhood of the fact to be inquired, or at least of the county. Cond. Gen.

At common law jurors were selected, usually, by the sheriff or coroner. It is done in this country in various ways; by judges of election; by town authorities or by various officials or special boards or commissions. Statutory provisions as to the time and mode of selecting jurors are said to be usually directory only and need not be strictly complied with; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 44; but this is not the case with all such requirements.

In the federal courts the panel of jurors is selected by the clerk of the court and a commissioner appointed by the court, who must be taken from the opposite political party to that to which the clerk belongs; the clerk and the commissioner place names in the jury box alternately without regard to party affiliations. Any judge may order the names to be drawn from the boxes used by the state authorities in selecting jurors in the highest court of the state; no person may serve as a petit juror more than once in a year. See CHALLENGE.

Exemption. Usually public officials are exempt; and persons engaged in various classes of occupations are often exempt; thus in New York, clergymen, physicians, lawyers, professors, and teachers, persons engaged in certain kinds of manufacturing, canal officials, those employed on steam vessels, employes of railroad and telegraph companies, members of the militia and fire department, etc. Exemption is only during actual employment; 79 N. C. 660; and the right of exemption is a personal privilege and usually not a ground of challenge; 10 Kan. 288; 90 Ill. 221; or a disqualification; 11 Tex. 257; 52 Maine 328; 43 N. H. 89.

The members of an association formed to aid in the prosecution of a particular class of offences, and those who are in sympathy with the association, and contribute money for the purposes of its organization, are not competent to sit as jurors on the trial of an indictment for an offence of the class for the prosecution of which the association is formed and the money contributed; 19 So. Rep. (La.) 285. A juror was disqualified at common law by openly declaring his opinion that the party was guilty; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. ch. 43, § 27. Yet if such declaration was made from his knowledge of the case and not out of any ill-will to the party, it is no cause of challenge; 2 id. § 28.

Where a statute disqualifies persons related within certain degrees of affinity from serving as jurors on the trial of a cause to which their affinities are parties, husbands whose wives are second cousins are not affinities; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 549.

In Tennessee it has been held that a statute disqualifying from service, either on grand or petit juries, persons engaged in a conspiracy against law and order is not unconstitutional: 32 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 363. In this case the statute in question was for the suppression of what are known as White Caps, and disqualified for jury duty all persons who had been guilty of any offence under the statute. So also a similar disqualification of all persons violating the act for the suppression of polygamy was held valid; 114 U. S. 477.

Swearing the jury. At common law it appears to have been the practice to swear each juryman as he is drawn and accepted; Joy, Conf. 220; 18 Conn. 166. The present practice is to swear the entire jury after the panel is completed. Either practice is lawful; 18 Cal. 128. It is not irregular to swear all the jurors when the court opens, to try all the issues that may be brought before them; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 318; 6 Wend. 548. But this practice has been disapproved of in criminal cases on the ground of the salutary effect both on the prisoner and the jury of the formality of administering an oath in the presence of the prisoner; 22 Ill. 160. It is also considered the better practice in criminal cases to have the panel full before the oath is administered; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 319; 9 Fla. 215.

The impanelling and final acceptance of a jury by a court is a judicial determination that the jurors are competent; and if any objection to the qualifications of a juror is known to a party before such determination, it cannot be raised afterwards, unless on exception to the overruling of a challenge; 56 Mich. 154.

Influencing the jury. An attempt to influence a jury corruptly by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainments, and the like is a misdemeanor at common law; 95 N. C. 685; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 384; 2 Nev. 268; 5 Cow. 503. Arguments of counsel in open court at the trial of a cause are a legitimate use of influence and are not within this rule, but it would be a crime to take advantage of the opportunity afforded in order to influence the jurors corruptly; 70 Cal. 582. Where an attempt to influence a jury, amounting to embracery, is made, it is immaterial whether they give any verdict or not, and if they give a verdict, it is no defence that it is a true one. This crime may be committed by a juror if he corruptly attempts to influence other jurors; Cl. Cr. L. 326; or if he by indirect practices gets himself sworn on the tales to serve on one side; 1 Litt. 578.

As to the effect of improper influence on, or misconduct of, the jury, see NEW TRIAL.

"If they eat and drink before or after they are agreed of their verdict, they are to be fined; only with this difference, that if they eat at their own charge, the verdict shall stand; but if at the charge of the party, it shall be set aside; 1 Leon. 133; some of them have been fined for having figs and pippins in their pockets, though they did not eat them; id.; Moor 599.

Separation during trial. At common law the jury was kept together until they had agreed upon their verdict. Even the right to adjourn a trial from day to day was doubted; 24 How. St. Tr. 414. At present jurors in civil cases are allowed to separate each day: and so in trials for misdemeanors, at the discretion of the court. In some cases also in trials for felony, even in capital cases. But in an able work the opinion is maintained that in cases of capital felonies the jury should not be allowed to separate, as they were not at common law; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 367; but absolute isolation is not required; they may be kept under the charge of a sworn officer who shall exercise a reasonable oversight; id. 370. The officer in charge must be sworn; 2 Hale, P. C. 296; although if he be a sheriff or constable and ex officio in charge of the jury, he need not be specially sworn; 16 Wis. 294.

Affidavits of jurors will not be received to impeach a verdict; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 539, citing numerous cases; 6 Houst. 60; 39 Pac. Rep. (Cal). 59; 50 Cal. 428; 15 Ark. 403; 45 Ill. 37. Nor will statements of third parties who derived their information from a member of the jury; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 547; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 43; 22 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 447. The court may question the jury as to the grounds upon which they based their verdict, if there was more than one ground; 12 Metc. 281. A juryman may be heard to show misconduct on the part of third parties; 7 S. & R. 458; and jurymen should report to the court any attempt to influence them; 45 Ill. 37. But affidavits appear to be admissible to impeach the verdict, in Tennessee; 7 Baxt. 273; and to a certain extent in Iowa; 20 Ia. 195; and Kansas; 22 Kan. 277; and to show that a verdict was decided by lot; 35 Ark. 109.

The province of the jury is to determine the truth of the facts in dispute in civil cases, and the guilt or innocence of the person accused in criminal cases. Thorn. Jur. § 133. See CHARGE. If they go beyond their province, their verdict may be set aside; 4 Maule & S. 192; 3 B. & C. 357; 2 Price 282; 2 Cow. 479; 10 Mass. 39.

The question whether the jury are judges of the law as well as of the fact, or whether it is the function of the court conclusively to instruct the jury upon the law, particularly in criminal cases, has been very much discussed from the earliest times and has recently been the subject of critical examination by the United States supreme court. See infra.

Coke says: "As the jury may, as often as they think fit, find a general verdict, I therefore think it unquestionable that they so far may decide upon the law as well as fact, such a verdict naturally involving both. In this I have the authority of Littleton himself, who hereafter writes, 'that if the inquest will take upon themselves the knowledge of the law upon the matter, they may give their verdict generally.'"

He further says in substance: "Questions of law generally and more properly belong to the judges. The immediate and direct right of declaring upon questions of law is entrusted to the judges; that in the jury is only incidental." Co. Litt. 156 a, n. (5).

Though the question had not, until recently, been the subject of a direct decision of the United States supreme court, it had frequently arisen in England and America. In the former country, in the case of the Dean of St. Asaph, the court alluded to the admission by both parties of an ancient rule of the common law, that the law should be determined by the court and the facts by the jury; but they differed as to what was law and what fact, it being contended on one side that the question of guilt in a libel case, after the fact of publication and truth of the innuendoes are found by the jury, was a question of law, and on the other side that the guilt of the defendant was a question of fact. This concurrence of views on the point in question "affords strong proof that, up to the period of our separation from England, the fundamental definition of trials by jury depended on the universal maxim, without an exception, ad quæstionem facti respondent juratores, ad quæstionem juris respondent judices."

The doctrine that a jury may disregard the law as declared by the court finds its principal, original support in Bushell's case, Vaughan 135, where the question was on habeas corpus whether jurors were liable to be fined and imprisoned for non-payment of fine for having found a general verdict in opposition to the instructions of the court. Vaughan, C. J., held that because a general verdict of necessity resolves "both law and fact complicately and not the fact by itself," it could not be proved that the jurors did not proceed upon their view of the evidence. This line of argument is implicitly relied upon by the advocates of the extreme right of the jury, but has been rightly characterized as narrow; though conclusive in the case to which it related; 1 Curt. C. C. 23; Hallam, Const. Hist. c. 13; 5 Gray 185. The line of argument in the English case, taken together with the criticisms upon it, well illustrate the difficulties of the subject which arise necessarily in every case which is submitted to a jury upon mixed questions of law and fact. However frankly it may be stated that the jury are bound by the views of the law delivered to them by the court, the obligation to accept those views is rather moral than susceptible of rigid practical enforcement. Early English cases supporting the doctrine that the jury are judges of the fact and not of the law are, 1 Plowd. 111; id. 233; 2 id. 493; 2 Stra. 766; Lord Hardwicke said:—"The thing that governs greatly in this determination is, that the point of the law is not to be determined by juries; juries have a power by law to determine matters of fact only; and it is of the greatest consequence to the law of England and to the subject, that these powers of the judge and the jury are kept distinct; that the judge determine the law, and the jury the fact; and if ever they come to be confounded, it will prove the confusion and destruction of the law of England." Cas. temp. Hardwicke 23. Foster, after stating the rule that the ascertainment of all the facts is the province of the jury, says:—"For the construction the law putteth upon facts stated and agreed, or found by a jury is in this, as in all other cases, undoubtedly the proper province of the court." And he adds that in cases of difficulty, a special verdict is usually found, but, where the law is clear, the jury, under the direction of the court as to the law, may and, if well advised, always will find a general verdict conformably to such direction; Fost. Cr. L., 3d ed. 255. To the same effect, it has been urged, is the settled current of English authority; Wynne's Eunomus, Dial. III. §§ 53, 523; 1 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 551; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 23, § 21; 3 Term. 428; 4 Bing. 195; 8 C. & P. 94; contra, Vaughan 135; 4 B. & Ald. 145.

The question arose most frequently in England in connection with prosecutions for libel, and it was contended that Fox's Libel Act changed the common-law rule, but this was not the case. In a leading case arising under that act, it was held that it was for the judge to define the offence and then for the jury to say whether the publication under consideration was within that definition; 6 M. & W. 104 (see as to this case, 156 U. S. 97; 1 Curt. C. C. 55); 2 Jur. 137. In the House of Lords the unanimous opinion of the judges was given by Tindal, C. J., in answer to a question whether, if a fine were received in evidence, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether it barred an action of quare impedit, that "the judge who tried the cause should state to the jury whether in point of law the fine had that effect, or what other effect on the rights of the litigant parties, upon the general and acknowledged principle ad quæstionem juris non respondent juratores." 4 Cl. and Fin. 445.

In state courts it has been held to be "a well-settled principle, lying at the foundation of jury trials, admitted and recognized ever since jury trial had been adopted as an established and settled mode of proceeding in courts of justice, that it was the proper province and duty of judges to consider and decide all questions of law, and the proper province and duty of the jury to decide all questions of fact;" 10 Metc. 263; 5 Gray 185; 13 N. H. 536; 29 Mich. 173; 6 R. I. 33; 44 Cal. 65; 65 Vt. 1, 34 (overruling 23 id. 14, and every case which followed it); 3 J. J. Marsh. 132. The citations include both civil and criminal cases. There undoubtedly exists a power in the jury to override the law as declared by the court and to make their action effective by an acquittal in a criminal case which cannot be set aside. This has received frequent expression from judges and courts of great authority. "The unquestionable power of juries to find general verdicts, involving both law and fact, furnishes the foundation for the opinion that they are judges of the law, as well as of the facts, and gives some plausibility to that opinion. They are not, however, compelled to decide legal questions, having the right to find special verdicts, giving the facts, and leaving the legal conclusions, which result from such facts, to the court. When they find general verdicts, I think it is their duty to be governed by the instructions of the court as to all legal questions involved in such verdicts. They have the power to do otherwise, but the exercise of such power cannot be regarded as rightful, although the law has provided no means, in criminal cases, of reviewing their decisions whether of law or fact, or of ascertaining the grounds upon which their verdicts are based;" 26 N. Y. 588; see also 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 147; id. 474. In Pennsylvania there has been, in some cases, a very strong expression of the idea that in criminal cases the juries are judges of the law as well as of the fact. This was very earnestly stated by Sharswood, C. J., who said that the power of the jury to judge of the law in a criminal case was one of the most valuable securities guaranteed by the bill of rights of Pennsylvania; 89 Pa.

523; but this unqualified statement is not sustained by the leading cases in that state. In Commonwealth v. Sherry, reported in Whart. Hom. (App.) 481, Rogers, J., said: "You are, it is true, judges in a criminal case, in one sense, of both law and fact; for your verdict, as in civil cases, must pass on law and fact together. If you acquit, you interpose a final bar to a second prosecution, no matter how entirely your verdict may have been in opposition to the views expressed by the court. . . . It is important for you to keep this distinction in mind, remembering that, while you have the physical power, by an acquittal, to discharge a defendant from further prosecution, you have no moral power to do so against the law laid down by the court. . . . For your part, your duty is to receive the law, for the purposes of this trial, from the court. If an error injurious to the prisoner occurs, it will be rectified by the revison of the court in banc. But an error resulting from either a conviction or acquittal, against the law, can never be rectified. In the first case, an unnecessary stigma is affixed to the character of a man who was not guilty of the offence with which he is charged. In the second case, a serious injury is effected by the arbitrary and irremediable discharge of a guilty man. You will see from these considerations the great importance of the preservation, in criminal as well as in civil cases, of the maxim that the law belongs to the court and the facts to the jury."

Other expressions substantially to the same effect are: "If the evidence on these points fail the prisoner, the conclusion of his guilt will be irresistible, and it will be your duty to draw it;" Gibson, C. J., in 4 Pa. 269.

"The court had an undoubted right to instruct the jury as to the law, and to warn them as they did against finding contrary to it. This is very different from telling them that they must find the defendant guilty, which is what is meant by a binding instruction in criminal cases;" 96 Pa. 503. In 143 Pa. 64, it was held "that the statement by the court was the best evidence of the law within the reach of the jury, and that the jury should be guided by what the court said as to the law," and this, Paxson, C. J., speaking for the court, declared to be in harmony with the case in which is found the expression of Sharswood, C. J., supra.

In this case Mr. Justice Mitchell filed a vigorous and very able concurring opinion in which he says: "Upon one point I would go further and put an end once for all to a doctrine that I regard as unsound in every point of view, historical, logical, or technical. . . . The jury are not judges of the law in any case, civil or criminal; neither at common law, nor under the constitution of Pennsylvania, is the determination of the law any part of their duty or their right. The notion is of modern growth and arises undoubtedly from a perversion of the history and results of the right to return a general verdict, especially in libel cases, which ended in Fox's Bill." He then considers the question historically, and on the authorities, and says that there is not a single respectable English authority for the doctrine, and that, against a "solid phalanx" of American authorities, there is but a single authority in its favor (28 Vt. 14), which was by a divided bench (and which has been since overruled; 65 Vt. 1, supra). He concludes that "the jury were never judges of the law in any case, civil or criminal, except as involved in the mixed determination of law and fact by a general verdict." In an annotation of the case in 65 Vt. 1, which overruled what is here characterized as practically the only authority in support of the doctrine, it is said: "The ghost of the doctrine that juries in criminal cases are to judge of the law as well as the facts would seem to be effectually laid by the above decision. . . . That solitary authority (28 Vt. 14), which has often been attacked and discredited, is now by the case above reported completely overruled." 19 L. R. A. 145.

In the United States courts, prior to the direct decision of the supreme court already referred to, the question had been frequently examined. The most elaborate discussion of the subject was by Mr. Justice Curtis, whose opinion is very much relied upon by the supreme court. His conclusion was "that when the constitution of the United States was founded, it was a settled rule of the common law that, in criminal as well as in civil cases, the court decided the law, and the jury the facts; and it cannot be doubted that this must have an important effect in determining what is meant by the constitution when it adopts a trial by jury." 1 Curt. C. C. 23. Following in a much later case, also by the supreme court justices, sitting on circuit, the principle was clearly laid down: "There prevails a very general, but an erroneous, opinion that in all criminal cases the jury are the judges as well of the law as of the fact—that is, that they have the right to disregard the law as laid down by the court, and to follow their own notions on the subject. Such is not the right of the jury." "It is their duty to take the law from the court and apply it to the facts of the case. It is the province of the court, and of the court alone, to determine all questions of law arising in the progress of a trial; and it is the province of the jury to pass upon the evidence and determine all contested questions of fact. The responsibility of deciding correctly as to the law rests solely with the court, and the responsibility of finding correctly the facts rests solely with the jury." Field, J., in 4 Sawy. 457; and to the same effect are, 2 Sumn. 240; 5 Blatch. 204; 5 Cra. C. C. 573; 19 Fed. Rep. 633.

The authorities which have been sometimes relied upon to support the contrary view are, 3 Dall. 1; 1 Burr's Trial 470; 2 id. 422; Whart. St. Tr. 48, 84; Chase's Trial App. 44. These authorities received a very critical examination both by Mr. Justice

Curtis in 1 Curt. C. C. 23, and by Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the court in Sparf et al. v. United States, 156 U. S. 51; and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Gray (and except by the latter) they were not considered, when properly read, as sustaining the view in support of which they are usually cited. The opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, last referred to, contains a full discussion of the subject, and in it will be found most of the authorities herein cited. It was held that where there was no evidence upon which the jury could properly find the defendant guilty of an offence included in it less than the one charged, it is not error to instruct them that they cannot return the verdict of any lesser offence. In support of the rule laid down in this decision, see also Cooley, Const. Lim. 323; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49; Thomp. Tr. § 1016; and the valuable note by Dr. Wharton in 1 Crim. Law Mag. 51. By way of explanation of some of the expressions so much relied upon in support of a contrary view, Mr. Justice Harlan in his opinion referred to, supra, says: "The language of some judges and statesmen in the early history of the country, implying that the jury were entitled to disregard the law as expounded by the court, is, perhaps, to be explained by the fact that that 'in many of the states the arbitrary temper of the colonial judges, holding office directly from the crown, had made the independence of the jury in law as well as in fact of much popular importance.' Wharton's Cr. Pl. & Pr., 8th ed. § 806; Williams v. State, 32 Miss. 389, 396."

The argument for the right of the jury to decide the law in criminal cases has been most recently fully presented in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Gray, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Shiras, in Sparf et al. v. United States. In this opinion from a long and careful examination of the authorities, the conclusion is thus stated: "It is our deep and settled conviction, confirmed by a re-examination of the authorities under the responsibility of taking part in the consideration and decision of the capital case now before the court, that the jury, upon the general issue of guilty or not guilty in a criminal case, have the right, as well as the power, to decide, according to their own judgment and consciences, all questions, whether of law or of fact, involved in that issue." It may be noted that of three cases cited in this opinion as containing the ablest discussion of the subject on both sides, and taking the same view as that advocated by Mr. Justice Gray, two opinions, those of Chancellor Kent and Mr. Justice Thomas in favor of the right, were also dissenting opinions and that of Judge Hall, of Vermont, on the other side, the only one of the three which was an authority, has lately been overruled, as stated supra. The English authorities are very fully discussed, and much attention is given to cases which are claimed as authorities in favor of the views presented which have already been cited, supra, and of which those who argue against the right of the jury to decide the law, question either the authority or the application. The contention of this dissenting opinion is that the result of the English authorities is in favor of the ultimate right of the jury to decide the law, notwithstanding the instructions of the court, and that the earlier American authorities are to the same effect. It is admitted that in the later American cases, "the general tendency of decision in this country has been against the right of the jury, as well as in the courts of the several states, including many states where the right was once established, as in the circuit courts of the United States. The current has been so strong, that in Massachusetts, where counsel are admitted to have the right to argue the law to the jury, it has yet been held that the jury have no right to decide it, and it has also been held, by a majority of the court, that the legislature could not constitutionally confer upon the jury the right to determine, against the instructions of the court, questions of law involved in the general issue in criminal cases; and in Georgia and in Louisiana, a general provision in the constitution of the state, declaring that 'in criminal cases the jury shall be judges of the law and fact,' has been held not to authorize them to decide the law against the instructions of the court" (156 U. S. 168); to those urged with the late constitutional construction should "have far less weight than the almost unanimous voice of earlier and nearly contemporaneous judicial declarations and practical usage." These cases contain all the learning on the subject on both sides and may be referred to for the full statement and full criticism of authorities which is not practicable within the limits of this title.

Directing the verdict. The most frequent expression of the rule is that, where there is no evidence tending to prove the facts set up by the party who sustains the burden of proof, the court is bound, on request, to direct the jury to return a verdict for the opposite party; 15 Ga. 91; 36 Mo. 484; 87 id. 462. On the other hand, where there is any evidence tending to prove such facts, the court cannot so direct the verdict, but must submit the evidence to the jury and leave it to them to determine whether it is sufficient to that end; 63 Mo. 397; 85 id. 247; Thomp. Tr. § 2245.

When the testimony is all in one direction, or when all the evidence for the plaintiff has been given, and it has no tendency whatever to prove the particular issue relied on to recover, and there is no question in regard to the credibility of the witnesses who have given the evidence, the court may determine the whole case as a question of law; 36 Mo. 491; 32 Vt. 612.

It is only where the evidence, with all fair and legitimate inferences, and viewed in the most favorable light, is insufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, that the court may direct a verdict for the defendant; 143 Ill. 242; 147 id. 120; 52 Fed. Rep. 87; 42 Ill. App. 536; 95 Wis. 4; see 141 N. Y. 514. A federal court may direct a verdict for either party whenever, under the state of the evidence, it would be compelled to set aside one returned the other way; 3 C. C. App. 280. Where, from the testimony before the jury, different minds might draw different conclusions, it is error to direct a verdict; 35 Neb. 372; 95 Ala. 397; 98 id. 157; 67 Hun 518; 95 Mich. 140; 8 Misc. Rep. 512. Where the right of recovery depends on questions of fact, there must be a submission to the jury; 160 Pa. 314. A direction to find for the defendant was held proper, in an action against a railroad for interference with the plaintiff's business, where no evidence was offered showing the injury caused by such interference; 154 Pa. 468. Where it is shown by an open statement of counsel for the plaintiff that the contract on which the suit is brought is void, the court may direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant; 103 U. S. 261. There can be no serious doubt but that the court can at any time direct the jury when the facts are undisputed, and that the jury should follow such direction; id.

Insufficiency of the evidence to convict; 2 Stra. 984; 8 Blackf. 540; 2 Park. Cr. Cas. 676; 2 McLean 114; and sickness or other incapacity of a witness; 1 Crawf. & D. 151; 1 Mood. 186; Jebb 270; are not sufficient necessities to warrant the discharge of a jury. See 17 Pick. 399; 2 Gall. 364; 2 Benn. & H. L. Cr. Cas. 337; JEOPARDY.

It is within the discretion of the trial judge to refuse to discharge the jury until they arrive at a verdict; 2 Misc. Rep. 127. A jury may be discharged from giving any verdict, whenever the court is of the opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and may even order a trial before another jury, and a defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy; 155 U. S. 271.

When a jury in a criminal case is discharged during the trial, and the defendant subsequently put on trial before another jury, he is not thereby twice put in jeopardy within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the United States constitution; 142 U. S. 148.

Duties and privileges of. Qualified persons may be compelled to serve as jurors under penalties prescribed by law. They are exempt from arrest in certain cases. See PRIVILEGE. They are liable to punishment for misconduct in some cases.

The federal constitution provides (Am. vii.) that "no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." This includes only a new trial or proceedings in an appellate court; it applies to the facts tried by a jury in a state court, and renders invalid an act providing for the removal of a cause from a state to a federal court after it has been tried in the former; 9 Wall. 274.

A frequent variation from the common-law jury system is to permit the jury to impose the punishment (this being formerly considered a matter for judicial discretion), or, as in some states, to divide the responsibility between the judge and jury; and such legislation is held constitutional; 7 Ind. 332; 70 Ia. 442; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 934.

In criminal cases, in Scotland, a jury consists of fifteen and a majority may convict. In Belgium, criminal and political charges and offences of the press are tried before a jury. Trial by jury has existed in Greece since 1834. In Sweden it exists in cases of offences of the press; and in Italy, in criminal cases, and a majority may convict. In Norway, it was established in 1887, and there also a majority may convict. In Russia, since 1864, all criminal cases involving severe penalties, except political offences, are tried by juries. Hawaii has a jury of twelve, both in civil and criminal cases, of whom nine may render a verdict. In South America, all the states have the jury system. In France, trial by jury exists in cases of felony, and it is provided in Germany, by the imperial code, in all criminal cases except treason, political crimes and offences of the press.

JURY BOX. A place set apart for the jury to sit in during the trial of a cause.

JURY LIST. A paper containing the names of jurors impanelled to try a cause, or it contains the names of all the jurors summoned to attend court.

JURYMAN. A juror; one who is impanelled on a jury. Webster, Dict.

JURY PROCESS. In Practice. The writs for summoning a jury, viz.: in England, venire juratores facias, and distringas juratores, or habeas corpora juratorum. These writs are now abolished, and jurors are summoned by precept. 1 Chitty, Archb. 344; Com. Law Proc. Act, 1852, § 104; 3 Chitty, Stat. 519.

JURY OF WOMEN. A jury of women is given in two cases; viz.: on writ de ventre inspiciendo, which was a writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him that, in the presence of twelve men and as many women, he cause examination to be made whether a woman therein named is with child or not, and if with child, then about what time it will be born, and that he certify the same. It is granted in a case when a widow, whose husband had lands in fee-simple, marries again soon after her husband's death, and declares herself pregnant by her first husband, and, under that pretext, withholds the lands from the next heir; Cro. Eliz. 506; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 15. In that case, although the jury was made up of men and women, the examination was made by the latter; 1 Madd. Ch. 11; 2 P. Wms. 591. Such a writ was issued in the case of In re Blackburn, 14 L. J. N. S. Ch. 336. In New York it is said that an application was made for such a jury in the Rollwagen will case and denied upon the ground that "as the lady was not going to be hanged and did not herself solicit the investigation, there was no power to compel her to submit to it;" 10 Alb. L. J. 3. In the opinion of the court in 141 U. S. 250 the statement is made by Mr. Justice Gray that this writ has never been used in this country. The authorities cited in this title show that this statement is too broad both as to the use of the common-law writ and as to physical examination, which title see further as to this case.

Where pregnancy is pleaded by a condemned woman, in delay of execution, a jury of twelve discreet matrons was called from those in court, who were impanelled to try the fact and report to the court. They chose a fore-matron from their own number. On their returning a verdict of "enceinte," the execution was delayed until the birth, and in some cases the punishment was commuted to perpetual exile. When the criminal was merely privement enceinte, and not quick (see QUICKENING), there was no respite. See 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 412; Taylor, Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 520; Archb. Cr. Pl. 187. The proceeding has been said to be obsolete, though it has been recognized in America; and at a very recent date in England, in Reg. v. Webster, tried before Lord Denman at the Old Bailey in London in July, 1879. The plea of pregnancy was interposed before sentence, and immediately "a jury of matrons selected from a crowd of females in the gallery were impanelled" and sworn, and the inquisition was held forthwith before the judge. The result was a verdict that the prisoner was not quick with child and she was sentenced. The verbatim report of the proceedings may be found in 9 Cent. L. J. 94. In State v. Arden, 1 Bay 487, the plea was allowed and an inquisition held, but the prisoner was found not pregnant and sentenced to death. In State v. Holeman, 13 Ark. 105, the plea was overruled in a larceny case where a woman was convicted of a penitentiary offence. In the case of Mrs. Bathsheba Spooner, who was tried in Massachusetts in 1778 for the murder of her husband, she being under sentence of death, petitioned the governor and council for a respite on account of pregnancy. A writ de ventre inspiciendo was issued by the council to the sheriff directing him to summon a jury of two men midwives and twelve discreet and lawful matrons "to ascertain the truth of her plea." The verdict was that she "is not quick with child," and she was executed, but a post mortem examination proved that her assertion was true; 3 Harv. L. Rev. 44; 39 Alb. L. J. 326.

It is difficult to see by what reason or authority this proceeding can be assumed not to be available, according to the course of the common law, in jurisdictions in which that system of jurisprudence is in force, particularly where, as in some states, it is imbedded in the constitution. It has been said on this point: "While the cases are very rare, there is no evidence (or authority, it might be added) that a jury of women is not a part of the machinery of the law in those states in which the common law prevails." 12 A. & E. Encyc. of L. 331.

It may be safely affirmed that no woman who pleads pregnancy in delay of execution will in any common-law jurisdiction be sentenced to death without examination into the truth of the fact pleaded, and in the absence of other statutory provision, it is difficult to see how she could be deprived of this common-law right. It is undoubtedly true that the proceeding is antiquated and ill adapted to the purpose, and therefore the subject is well worthy of legislative attention. Doubtless the rarity of such legislation is due to the infrequency of capital trials of women. In one state at least the contingency is provided for. In New York it is provided by statute that if there is reasonable ground to believe that a female defendant sentenced to death is pregnant, a jury of six physicians shall be impanelled to inquire into the fact, and if it is found by the inquisition that she is "quick with child," the execution is to be suspended until the governor issues a warrant directing it, which he may do as soon as he is satisfied that she is no longer "quick with child," or he may commute her punishment to imprisonment for life; N. Y. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 501-2. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO; REPRIEVE.

JURY WHEEL. A mechanical contrivance, usually a circular box revolving on a crank, in which the names of persons subject to jury duty are placed, by the officers, and at the times and places prescribed by law, and from which the proper number to constitute the jury panels for any particular term of court are drawn by lot.

JUS (Lat.). Law; right; equity. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1. In the Roman law the word had two distinct meanings. It was either a body of law, as the jus honorarium, or an individual right, as the jus suffragii. See Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 7, where this distinction is developed in the course of a discussion of fundamental conceptions. A third use of the word was in apposition to judicium, as to which see IN JUDICIO; IN JURE; JUDEX; LEX.

JUS ABUTENDI (Lat.). The right to abuse. By this phrase is understood the right to abuse property, or having full dominion over property. 3 Toullier, n. 86. The right of destruction or consumption, and free disposition. Morey, Rom. L. 283. See DOMINIUM JUS UTENDI.

JUS ACCRESCENDI (Lat.). The right of survivorship. See SURVIVOR.

In Roman Law. The right of accretion. This exists in two cases: According to the general rule a person could not die partly testate and partly intestate, and if any part of the estate was unprovided for, either by the oversight of the testator or any of the heirs, it was ratably distributed among the heirs; Morey, Rom. L. 325; so if the same thing were left to two or more persons each took an equal share; if one of them should die before he had received the legacy, the share of the one so dying passed to the remaining joint legatee or legatees by this right; id. 334. It has been suggested that the germ of this right is to be found in the succession by necessity; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 100.

JUS ACTUS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person a passage for carriages, or for cattle.

JUS AD REM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to a thing. It is generally treated as a right to property not in possession, as distinguished from jus in re, which implies the absolute dominion. In English law, this distinction is illustrated by Blackstone, by reference to ecclesiastical promotions, where, although the freehold passes to the person promoted, corporal possession is required to vest the property completely in the new proprietor, who acquires jus ad rem, an inchoate, or imperfect, right of nomination and institution, but not the jus in re, or complete and full right, unless by corporal possession; 2 Bla. Com. 312. The distinction expressed by these terms in the Roman law is analogous to the common-law distinction between the effect of a right of entry and that of actual entry, which in English real property law is expressed in the maxim non jus, sed seisina, facit stipitem; id. Jus ad rem is said to be merely an abridged expression for jus ad rem acquirendam, and it properly denotes the right to the acquisition of a thing, Austin, Jur. Lect. 14; Moz. & W.

"On this distinction between claims to things advanced against all men, and those advanced primarily against particular men, is based the division of rights into real and personal expressed by writers of the middle ages, on the analogy of terms found in the writings of the Roman jurists, by the phrases jura in re and jura ad rem. A real right, a jus in re, or, to use the equivalent phrase preferred by some later commentators, jus in rem, is a right to have a thing to the exclusion of all other men. A personal right, jus ad rem, or, to use a much more correct expression, jus in personam, is a right in which there is a person who is the subject of right, as well as a thing as its object, a right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give, or procure, or do, or do not do, something." Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. xlviii.

A right which belongs to a person only mediately and relatively, and has for its foundation an obligation incurred by a particular person.

The jus in re, by the effect of its very nature, is independent and absolute, and is exercised per se ipsum, by applying it to its object; but the jus ad rem is the faculty of demanding and obtaining the performance of some obligation by which another is bound to me ad aliquid dandum vel faciendum, vel præstandum. Thus, if I had the ownership of a horse, the usufruct of a flock of sheep, the right of habitation of a house, a right of way over your land, etc., my right in the horse, in the flock of sheep, in the house, or the land, belongs to me directly, and without any intermediary; it belongs to me absolutely, and independently of any particular relation with another person; I am in direct and immediate relation with the thing itself which forms the object of my right, without reference to any other relation. This constitutes a jus in re. If, on the other hand, the horse is lent to me by you, or if I have a claim against you for a thousand dollars, my right to the horse or to the sum of money exists only relatively, and can only be exercised through you; my relation to the object of the right is mediate, and is the result of the immediate relation of debtor and creditor existing between you and me. This is a jus ad rem. Every jus in re, or real right, may be vindicated by the actio in rem against him who is in possession of the thing, or against any one who contests the right. It has been said that the words jus in re of the civil law convey the same idea as thing in possession at common law. This is an error, arising from a confusion of ideas as to the distinctive characters of the two classes of rights. Nearly all the common-law writers seem to take it for granted that by the jus in re is understood the title or property in a thing in the possession of the owner; and that by the jus ad rem is meant the title or property in a thing not in the possession of the owner. But it is obvious that possession is not one of the elements constituting the jus in re; although possession is generally, but not always, one of the incidents of this right, yet the loss of possession does not exercise the slightest influence on the character of the right itself, unless it should continue for a sufficient length of time to destroy the right altogether by prescription. In many instances the jus in re is not accompanied by possession at all; the usuary is not entitled to the possession of the thing subject to his use; still, he has a jus in re. So with regard to the right of way, etc. See DOMINIUM.

A mortgage is considered by most writers as a jus in re; but it is clear that it is a jus ad rem: it is granted for the sole purpose of securing the payment of a debt or the fulfilment of some other personal obligation. In other words, it is an accessory to a principal obligation and corresponding right: it can have no separate and independent existence. The immovable on which I have a mortgage is not the object of the right, as in the case of the horse of which I am the owner, or the house of which I have the right of habitation, etc.: the true object of my right is the sum of money due to me, the payment of which I may enforce by obtaining a decree for the sale of the property mortgaged. 2 Marcadè 350.

JUS ÆLIANUM. A body of laws upon the same plan as the jus flavianum (q. v.) though more complete. It was published about B. C. 200 by Sextus Ælius and consisted of three parts: (1) The law of the XII. Tables; (2) The interpretation of the same; (3) The description of the legis actiones or forms of procedure. Morey, Rom. L. 85.

JUS ÆSNECIÆ. The right of the eldest-born to inherit; primogeniture.

JUS ALBINATUS. The right of the king by confiscation or escheat to the property of a deceased foreigner unless he had a peculiar exemption. This prerogative was abolished in 1790. Moz. & W.; 1 Bla. Com. 372; 2 Steph. Com. 409, n. It was the Droit d'Aubaine of the French law, which title see.

JUS ANGLORUM. The laws and customs of the West Saxons, in the time of the Heptarchy, by which the people were for a long time governed, and which were preferred before all others. Wharton.

JUS AQUÆDUCTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which gives to the owner of land the right to bring down water through or from the land of another, either from its source or from any other place.

Its privilege may be limited as to the time when it may be exercised. If the source fails, the servitude ceases, but revives when the water returns. If the water rises in, or naturally flows through, the land, its proprietor cannot by any grant divert it so as to prevent it flowing to the land below; 2 Rolle, Abr. 140, l. 25; Lois des Bat. part 1, c. 3, s. 1, art. 1. But if it had been brought into his land by artificial means, it seems it would be strictly his property, and that it would be in his power to grant it; Dig. 8. 3. 1. 10; 3 Burge, Confl. Laws 417. See Washb. Easem.; RIVER; WATER-COURSE.

JUS AQUÆHAUSTUS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person a right of watering cattle on another's field, or of drawing water from another's well.

JUS ÆQUUM. Equitable law. A term used by the Romans to express the adaptation of the law to the circumstances of the individual case as opposed to jus strictum (q. v.).

JUS BELLI. So much of international law as regulates the relations of nations to each other with respect to a state of war, including belligerency and neutrality, which several titles see.

The right of war so far as it concerns the treatment which may be properly accorded to an enemy; Grot. De Bell. et Pac. I. 1, § 3.

JUS BELLUM DICENDI. The right of making a declaration of war.

JUS CIVILE (Lat.). In Roman Law. The private law, in contradistinction to the public law, or jus gentium. 1 Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 1, § 1.

The local law of the city of Rome.

It is said that the twelve tables marked the starting-point in the development of the Roman law so far as it can be historically authenticated, and that its development advanced steadily in uninterrupted progression until it culminated in the corpus juris civilis of Justinian; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 10. It is, however, rather more accurate to say that the culmination of the Roman law, as a system, was not reached until the period of the development side by side of the jus civile and jus gentium. For an interesting discussion of the origin and growth of this system, see Morey, Rom. L. 14, 24. See JUS GENTIUM.

JUS CIVITATIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. The full franchise of citizenship, comprising, on the one hand, public rights, including the right of holding office and the right of voting; and on the other hand, private rights, including the right to hold and dispose of property, according to the forms of the civil law, and the right of marriage, and all domestic relations Morey, Rom. L. 48.

The collection of laws which are to be observed among all the members of a nation. It is opposed to jus gentium, which is the law which regulates the affairs of nations among themselves. 2 Lepage, El. du Dr. c. 5, 1. It was very much what is understood in modern terminology by municipal law.

JUS CLOACÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which requires the party who is subject to it to permit his neighbor to conduct the waters which fall on his grounds over those of the servient estate.

JUS COMMUNE. The common law, applicable to all persons alike. The ordinary law, as opposed to jus singulare (q. v.).

JUS CORONÆ. The right of succession to the throne of Great Britain. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

JUS CURIALITATIS ANGLIÆ. The right of curtesy. See CURTESY.

JUS DARE (Lat.). To enact or to make the law. Jus dare belongs to the legislature; jus dicere, to the judge.

JUS DELIBERANDI (Lat.). The right of deliberating, given to the heir, in those countries where the heir may have benefit of inventory (q. v.), in which to consider whether he will accept or renounce the succession.

In Louisiana he is allowed ten days before he is required to make his election. La. Civ. Code art. 1028.

JUS DEVOLUTUM. A phrase formerly used in Scotch ecclesiastical law to designate the right which devolved on the presbytery to present a minister to a vacant parish or benefice, in case the patron should neglect to exercise his right within the time limited by law, by presenting within six months a properly qualified person. Int. Cyc.

JUS DICERE (Lat.). To declare the law. It is the province of the court jus dicere, to declare what the law is.

JUS DISPONENDI (Lat.). The right to dispose of a thing.

In a general sense it means the right of alienation, and is frequently applied in the case of a married woman with respect to her separate estate. In a special or limited sense, it is applied to the reservation by a vendor of chattels or the ultimate ownership of goods with the possession of which he has parted. It is said to be often a matter of great nicety to determine upon a contract of sale, whether or not the vendor's purpose or intention was to reserve a jus disponendi. Benj. Sales, Ch. VI. § 382. See SALE.

The reservation of this right is essential where the property in the thing sold is reserved as a security for deferred payments or purchase-money, and it is permitted in many cases in which it is not permissible at common law. The great increase in the number of transactions in which such reservation is customary, as car trusts, instalment sales, etc., makes the subject one of increased importance and interest.

JUS DISTRAHENDI. The right of sale of goods pledged in case of non-payment. See PLEDGE; DISTRESS.

JUS DIVIDENDI. The right of testamentary disposition of real estate.

JUS DUPLICATUM (Lat. double right). When a man has the possession as well as the property of anything, he is said to have a double right, jus duplicatum. Bracton, l. 4, tr. 4, c. 4; 2 Bla. Com. 199.

JUS EDICERE, JUS EDICENDI. The right to issue edicts. It belonged to all the higher magistrates, but special interest is attached to the prætorian edicts in connection with the history of Roman law. See PRÆTOR.

JUS EX NON SCRIPTO. Law constituted by custom or such usage as indicates the tacit consent of the community.

The definition of Ulpian was: "Diuturna consuetudo pro jure et lege in his quæ non ex scripto descendunt, observari solet;" D. 1, 3, 33. This is well, though freely, translated thus: "Whatever has existed for a long period of time, and is in harmony with the moral judgment of the community is regarded as having the force of law, and the judicial authority is bound to recognize it as such, even though it has never been expressed in a legal enactment." Morey, Rom. L. 223. The same author says with respect to such law: "It was also a maxim of the Romans, that not only can laws be established by custom; they can also be abrogated by custom—that is, by contrary usage. It is unnecessary to consider here the objections raised by some modern jurists, such as Austin, to this view of customary, or unwritten, law. It is enough for our present purpose to say that this was the conception of the Roman jurists regarding the origin of a portion of the positive law, and a conception which has been adopted by the majority of modern civilians;" id. Another phrase by which this law was known was jus moribus constitutum. See LAW.

JUS FECIALE (Lat.). In Roman Law. Fecial law (q. v.). It has been termed that species of international law which had its foundation in the religious belief of different nations: such as the international law which now exists among the Christian people of Europe. Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 2, § 11. But the earlier writers on the civil law gave to it more of a characterization as international law than is attributed to it by the more thoughtful modern writers. See FECIAL LAW; INTERNATIONAL LAW.

JUS FIDUCIARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to something held in trust. For this there was a remedy in conscience. 2 Bla. Com. 328. See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

JUS FLAVIANUM. A publication of the legis actiones or a practical manual of the procedure, including a list of dies fasti (q. v.).

Of this publication it is said: "The first step which led to the decline of the legis actiones was due to their publication. As long as the knowledge of legal forms was restricted to the patrician class, the people at large were helpless in their efforts to obtain an impartial administration of justice." Morey, Rom. L. 85. The author was Cnæus Flavius, who was a scribe or clerk of Appius Claudius. His publication was B. C. 304. It was followed about a century later by the Jus Ælianum (q. v.). See also Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 14, n. 2.

JUS FODIENDI. In Civil Law. The name of a rural servitude which permits digging on the land of another. Inst. 2, 3, 2; Dig. 8, 3, 1, 1. A similar right was recognized in early English law; Bract. 222.

JUS GENTIUM (Lat.). The law of nations. It has been said that although the Romans used these words in the sense we attach to law of nations, yet among them the sense was much more extended. Falck, Encyc. Jur. 102, n. 42. It has been termed a system made up by the early Roman lawyers of the common ingredients in the customs of the old Italian tribes, for the purpose of adjudicating questions arising in Rome between foreigners or natives and foreigners. Maine, Anc. Law 49.

The jus gentium is differently characterized by the later writers on the civil law from the meaning given to the phrase by the earlier writers who treated it, as more identical with the idea of modern international law than it is now considered to have been.

The distinction between the jus gentium and the jus civile is thus admirably expressed: "The jus gentium, on the other hand, came to be regarded as a universal law of all mankind, common to all nations, because resting on the nature of things and the general sense of equity which obtains among all men, the 'jus gentium quod apud omnes gentes perœque custoditur,' a sort of natural law, exacting recognition everywhere in virtue of its inherent reasonableness. It would, however, be erroneous to suppose that the Romans attempted to introduce a code of nature such as the philosophers had devised. The jus gentium was, and never had been anything else but a portion of positive Roman law, which commercial usage and other sources of law, more especially the prætorian edict (q. v.), had clothed in a concrete form. Nor again must it be imagined that the Romans simply transferred a portion of foreign (Hellenic) law bodily into their own system. In the few quite exceptional cases where they did so (as e. g. in the case of hypotheca), they did not fail to impress their institutions with a national Roman character. The antithesis between jus civile and jus gentium was merely the outward expression of the growing consciousness that Roman law, in absorbing the element of greater freedom, was commencing to discard its national peculiarities and transform itself from the special local law of a city into a general law for the civilized world. The jus gentium was that part of the private law of Rome which was essentially in accordance with the private law of other nations, more especially with that of the Greeks, which would naturally predominate along the seaboard of the Mediterranean. In other words, jus gentium was that portion of the positive law of Rome which appeared to the Romans themselves in the light of a 'ratio scripta,' of a law which obtains among all nations and is common to all mankind." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 13.

The origin of the jus gentium was undoubtedly to be found in the adjustment of the Roman law to the relations existing between Roman citizens and foreigners, and between foreigners themselves. The growth of a different system was a not unnatural result of the administration of law in cases where both parties were not Roman citizens, by the foreign prætors, who were not bound by the strict rules of the jus civile, but from going about from place to place, and administering a kind of equitable jurisdiction in the settlement of disputes, they might not inaptly be termed peripatetic or itinerant arbitrators. The growth of a system of law administered by them alongside of the jus civile was not unlike the growth of the equity jurisprudence alongside of the common law. Then, too, the fact that these officers were constantly engaged in settling disputes, to which at least one party was a foreigner, naturally led to their becoming familiar with the principles of other systems of law, and in applying them to the case in hand, so far as they commended themselves to their sense of justice. The new system was afterwards extended to the whole non-citizen class. And while in the first instance it was treated as an entirely distinct system from the jus civile, it gradually supplanted the latter, and by a process which was originally the absorption of much of the jus gentium into the jus civile, it subsequently became recognized as a constituent part of Roman Law, and was gradually welded into a complete system of jurisprudence. See Morey, Rom. L. 59–71; INTERNATIONAL LAW; JUS CIVILE; JUS NATURALE.

JUS GLADII (Lat. the right of the sword). Supreme jurisdiction. The right to absolve from or condemn a man to death.

JUS HABENDI (Lat.). The right to have a thing. The right to be put into actual possession of property to which one is entitled.

JUS HABENDI ET RETINENDI. The right to have and retain the offerings, tithes, and profits of a parsonage or rectory. Toml.; Moz. & W.

JUS HÆREDITATIS. The right of succession as an heir, or of inheritance. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; HÆRES; HEIR.

JUS HONORARIUM. In Civil Law. A name applied to the prætorian edicts and also to the edicts of the curule ædiles, when on certain occasions they were published. Inst. 1, 2, 7.

This system of law was simply the usual development of an expanding and elastic jurisprudence, which naturally resulted from the increase in Rome of population and power, and the greater complication of her civilization; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 10; it was spoken of as having a distinct place by the side, and as the complement, of the jus civile; Sand. Introd. Inst. Just. xxi. It was a system of judge-made law (q. v.) in the proper sense. Its vigorous development was coincident with the formulary procedure, which was well adapted to give it scope and effect; Sohm, Introd. Rom. L. 178.

Its place and function in the Roman jurisprudence are thus described: "The prætorian law, being a law made by officials, 'jus honorarium,' was opposed to the jus civile, i. e. law, in the strict and proper sense of the term, the law made by the people, developed by popular enactments and popular customs. Thus both the jus civile and the jus honorarium contained elements of jus gentium, but in the jus honorarium, the influence of the jus gentium predominated. The prætorian edict was, in the main, the instrument by means of which the free principles of jus æquum gained their victory over the older jus strictum. Though at first the edict may merely have served the purpose of giving fuller effect to the jus civile, and then of supplementing the jus civile, nevertheless, in the end, borne along by the current of the times, it boldly assumed the function of reforming the civil law." Id. 54. See JUDEX; PRÆTOR.

JUS HONORUM. In Roman Law. The right of holding offices. See JUS SUFFRAGII.

JUS IMAGINIS. In Roman Law. The right of displaying the pictures and statues of one's ancestors, somewhat as in the English law of Heraldry, there is a right to the coat-of-arms.

JUS IMMUNITATIS. The law of exemption from the liability to hold public office.

JUS IN PERSONAM. A personal right. Considered by some writers as a more correct expression for jus ad rem, which see. According to the Roman law, property could not be transferred by mere agreement. The latter, even though in form a legal contract, had the effect only of expressing the intention of the parties and creating a personal right against the one making the agreement in a real right to the property itself. Morey, Rom. L. 307. See JUS AD REM.

JUS IN RE (Lat.). A right which belongs to a person, immediately and absolutely, in a thing, and which is the same against the whole world,—idem erga omnes. See JUS AD REM.

"The objection to using the term jus in re is that the expression occurs in the classical jurists as meaning an interest in a thing short of ownership, as the interest of a mortgagee in the thing pledged, and on this ground the term jus in rem, which in this sense is not found in the classical jurists, but is supported by the analogy of the familiar term actio in rem, seems preferable." Sand. Inst. Just. xlix. See JUS AD REM.

JUS IN RE ALIENA. An easement on servitude, or right in, or arising out of, the property of another.

JUS IN RE PROPRIA. The right of enjoyment which appertains to full and complete ownership of property. Frequently, by relation, the full ownership or property itself.

JUS INCOGNITUM (Lat.). An unknown law. This term is applied by the civilians to obsolete laws, which, as Bacon truly observes, are unjust; for the law to be just must give warning before it strikes. Bacon, Aph. 8, s. 1; Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law 33. But until it has become obsolete no custom can prevail against it. See OBSOLETE.

JUS ITALICUM. In Roman Law. A right bestowed upon a community by which it acquired "the privileges of a colonia Italica (i. e. an old colony of Roman citizens endowed with full legal rights), that its soil is therefore exempt from the land-tax and capable of quiritary ownership, in other words, is placed on the same footing as the fundus Italicus." Heisterbergk, Name und Begriff des jus Italicum (1885). Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 22, n. 2.

JUS ITINERIS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person the right to pass over an adjoining field, on foot or horseback.

JUS LATII. The right or privilege conferred upon the various communities of Latium.

This has been termed a "kind of qualified citizenship (civitas sine suffragio), such as Rome had, in early times, granted to the inhabitants of Cære." Morey, Rom. L. 50. These rights originally included the rights of intermarriage and of commercial intercourse between Rome and the inhabitants of the Latin towns. The author last cited says: "The possession of these rights formed the essential feature of the early jus Latii, or Latinitas. In later times, however, the right which went under this name and which was bestowed upon the Latin colonies outside of Latium, included the commercium only;" id. Sohm says that from the earliest times the members of the town communities of Latium who were the original Latins had the same private marriage law as the Romans. It was, in fact, their original law, and it was because they were allies governed by the same law that they enjoyed the jus commercii and the jus connubii of the Romans. They did not, of course, possess the public rights of a Roman until the powerful interest attaching to those rights resulted in the granting of Roman citizenship first to the Latin allies then to all the Italian communities; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 22. There were two forms of the jus latii, latium minus which was the older and usual one, and the latium majus. In communities in the former, only officials acquired Roman civitas. In those which had the latter it was extended to the decuriones. See DECURIONES; id. § 22, n. 2. Another authority confines the two forms to magistrates and defines them thus: "The latium majus raising to the dignity of Roman citizens not only the magistrate himself, but also his wife and children; the latium minus raising to that dignity only the magistrate himself." Bro. L. Dict.

JUS LEGITIMUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A legal right which might have been enforced by due course of law. 2 Bla. Com. 328.

JUS LIBERORUM. In Roman Law. The privilege conferred upon a woman who had three or four children. In order that she should be able to take all the property given her by will, she must have had this privilege conferred upon her. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 86. In the time of Hadrian, a decree was made conferring upon a mother, as such, who, being an ingenua, had the jus trium liberorum, or being a libertina, the jus quatuor liberorum, a civil law right to succeed her intestate children; id. § 98.

Another author defines this privilege as one by which exemption was given from all troublesome offices. Brown, L. Dict. And still another ascribes to it exemption from guardianship, priority of office-holding and a treble proportion of corn. Ad. Rom. Ant. 227.

JUS MARITI (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The right of the husband to administer, during the marriage, his wife's goods and the rents of her heritage.

In the common law, by jus mariti is understood the rights of the husband, as jus mariti cannot attach upon a bequest to the wife, although given during coverture, until the executor has assented to the legacy. 1 Bail. Eq. 214.

JUS MERUM (Lat.). A simple or bare right; a right to property in land, without possession, or the right of possession.

JUS MORIBUS CONSTITUTUM. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTO.

JUS NATURALE. The name given to those rules of conduct which are universally binding upon men and which are sanctioned by the dictates of right reason, as opposed to rules of conduct prescribed and enforced by the sovereign power of the state which are called positive law, known to the Romans as jus civile, and in modern jurisprudence as municipal law.

A much quoted definition of Ulpian was that which nature attaches to animals. Of this it has been said that it was peculiar, and the conception exercised little or no influence upon the judicial thought of Rome. Morey, Rom L. 111, where also are collected many definitions of the Roman jurists.

Sandars considers the passage from Ulpian unfortunately borrowed by Justinian and thereby removed from the connection in which it was used, which was a subsidiary and divergent line of thought, and had nothing to do with the main theory. Accordingly "in considering what the Roman jurists meant by jus naturale this fragment of Ulpian may be dismissed almost entirely from our notice." Sand. Inst. Just. 7.

The conception of the jus naturale came from the Stoics and has been termed "by far the most important addition to the system of Roman law, which the jurists introduced from Greek philosophy." Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. xxii. And Maine says of it that "the importance of this theory to mankind has been very much greater than its philosophical deficiencies would lead us to expect." Anc. L. 71.

While it is undoubtedly true that the highest conception of law is that natural law and positive law should be entirely harmonious, it is in the domain of international law that this conception more nearly approaches realization. The jus gentium was a system largely based upon the jus naturale, and it is due to that fact that the Roman system so largely formed the basis upon which Grotius commenced to build, the system which has developed into modern international law. It has been said that while he "rejected Ulpian's definition of the jus naturale, he accepted the idea of natural law expressed in the later jus gentium of the Romans as a body of principles based upon the common reason of mankind. It was therefore possible for him to extend the equitable principles already developed in the Roman jus gentium to the relations existing between sovereign states. States were looked upon as moral persons—subjects of the natural law, and as equal to each other in their moral rights and obligations." Morey, Rom. L. 208. See JUS GENTIUM; LAW OF NATURE; LAW.

JUS NON SACRUM. In Roman Law. That portion of the jus publicum which regulated the duties of magistrates.

Non-sacred law; that which dealt with the duties of civil magistrates, the preservation of public order, and the rights and duties of persons in their relation to the state. Morey, Rom. L. 223. It was analogous to that which would now be called the police power.

JUS NON SCRIPTUM. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTO.

JUS ONERIS FERENDI. An urban servitude in the Roman Law, the owner of which had the right of supporting and building upon the house wall of another.

JUS PAPIRIANUM. A collection of leges regia said to have been collected from the early periods of Roman history in the time of Romulus, Numa, and other kings.

They were a private compilation described as "fragments of a collection," which, though clearly showing the religious spirit of the early law, are yet meagre and unsatisfactory." Morey, Rom. L. 25. Though a private collection, it is suggested that they received the name of royal laws merely because the regulations which they contained were placed under the immediate protection of the kings. They were concerned in the main with sacred matters, i.e. they were essentially of a religious and moral character, and bear clear testimony to the closeness of the original connection between law and religion; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 11, n. 2.

JUS PASCENDI. In Roman Law. The rural servitude giving the right of pasturage on another's land.

JUS PATRONATUS (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. A commission from the bishop, directed usually to his chancellor and others of competent learning, who are required to summon a jury, composed of six clergymen and six laymen, to inquire into and examine who is the rightful patron. 3 Bla. Com. 246.

JUS PERSONARUM (Lat.). The right of persons. See JURA PERSONARUM.

JUS PISCANDI. See JUS VENANDI ET PISCANDI.

JUS POSSESSIONIS. The simple right of possession which may exist independently of ownership.

"Possession and ownership may, and generally do, coincide. But as a person may be the owner of a thing and not possess it, so a person may be the possessor of a thing and not be the owner. It is when the possessor is not the legal owner that it becomes important to consider to what rights he is entitled by virtue of his possession." Morey, Rom. L. 285. See JUS POSSIDENDI.

JUS POSSIDENDI. The right of possessing, which is the legal consequence of ownership. It is to be distinguished from the jus possessionis (q. v.), which is a right to possess which may exist without ownership,

JUS POSTLIMINII (Lat.). The right to claim property after recapture. See POSTLIMINY.

JUS PRÆTORIUM. A body of laws developed from the exercise of discretion by the prætors, as distinguished from the leges or positive law. See PRÆTOR.

JUS PRECARIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to a thing held for another, for which there was no remedy. 2 Bla. Com. 328.

JUS PRESENTATIONIS. The right of presentation.

JUS PRIVATUM. The municipal law of the Romans as distinguished from the jus publicum.

"The relations of power subsisting between persons and the world of things, or the equivalents of things, are the subject-matter of private law. Private law, in other words, has to do with the dominion of persons over things. Its pith is, therefore, contained in the law of property. The subject-matter of public law are the relations of power which subsist between persons and persons. Here, the power is ideal, in the sense that its object is the free-will of another, i. e. something invisible and outwardly intangible. Public law, then, has to do with the dominion of persons over persons. The rights of control with which such private law is concerned are reducible to a money value; the rights of control with which public law is concerned are not thus reducible. In private law, again, the subject of a right appears in his individual capacity, as commanding the world of material things. In public law, on the other hand, the subject of a right appears in his capacity as a member of a community, which it is his part to serve in order that he may share in the benefits it confers. Finally, as against their object, the rights of private law merely confer a power, the rights of public law, on the other hand, impose, at the same time, a duty on the person to whom the right pertains. The distinction is clearly exemplified in the case of the right of ownership in a thing, on one side, and the right of a sovereign over his people on the other." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 7.

JUS PROJICIENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude by which the owner of a building has a right of projecting a part of his building towards the adjoining house, without resting on the latter. It is extended merely over the ground. Dig. 50. 16. 242; 8. 2. 25; 8. 5. 8. 5.

JUS PROPRIETATIS. The right of property, as Blackstone phrases it: "the mere right of property without either possession or even the right of possession. This is frequently spoken of in our books under the name of mere right," jus merum (q. v.); 2 Bla. Com. 197. See RIGHT OF PROPERTY.

JUS PROTEGENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude: it is a right by which a part of the roof or tiling of one house is made to extend over the adjoining house. Dig. 50. 16. 243. 1; 8. 2. 25; 8. 5. 8. 5.

JUS PROTIMESEOS. The right of pre-emption of a landlord in case the tenant wishes to dispose of his rights as a perpetual lessee. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 57.

JUS PROVINCIARUM. A franchise conferred upon provincials much more limited that that conferred upon the people of Italy.

It has been described as "equivalent to the jus italicum minus the freedom from land taxation which the latter right involved. In short, the provincials possessed no status as Roman citizens; and even their capacity of ownership in their own land was qualified by their tributary obligations to Rome. The civil incapacity of the provincials had reference, however, merely to their exclusion from the strictly legal rights sanctioned by the jus civile." Morey, Rom. L. 52.

JUS PUBLICUM. See JUS PRIVATUM.

JUS QUÆSITUM (Lat.). A right to ask or recover: for example, in an obligation there is a binding of the obligor, and a jus quæsitum in the obligee. 1 Bell, Com. 323.

JUS QUIRITIUM. Quiritarian ownership, so called under the ancient jus civile, because, strictly speaking, there was recognized but this one form of ownership. It could be acquired only through the technical forms of civil law, and never by a foreigner. The strictness which was observed in this respect was due to the fact that this was the form of private ownership, which, under Roman law, was as developed from the general right of dominion and ownership by the state. To prevent hardships and injustice in the strict application of the rules of law, it was permitted to the prætor to issue possessory interdicts to protect the possession of those who had not complied with all the technical conditions of ownership. In this way, legal sanction was given to the right of possession which amounted substantially to a right of property. This affords another illustration of the many points in which the Roman system presents a strict similarity to the English equity jurisprudence as long afterwards developed. Morey, Rom. L. 21, 74, 283; Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. xx.

JUS RECUPERANDI, INTRANDI, Etc. The right of recovering and entering upon land.

JUS RELICTÆ (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The right of a wife, after her husband's death, to a third of movables if there be children, and to one-half if there be none. See Ersk. Prin. III. IX. 6.

JUS RELICTI (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The right of the husband in his wife's estate, which is divided in the same manner as that of the husband, in case of his predecease; one third each to the jus relicti, legitim, and dead man's part (q. v.).

JUS RERUM (Lat.). The right of things. Its principal object is to ascertain how far a person can have a permanent dominion over things, and how that dominion is acquired.

JUS SACRUM. In Roman Law. That portion of the public law which was concerned with matters relating to public worship and including the regulation of sacrifices and the appointment of priests. There was a general division of the jus publicum into jus sacrum and jus non sacrum (q. v.).

JUS SANGUINIS. The right of blood. Under the Scotch law there was a rule that no right could be lost by prescription unless it had the effect to establish it in another. Hence it was said to be a rule juri sanguinis nunquam præscribitur; Ersk. Prin. III. VII. 17.

JUS SCRIPTA. Written law. After stating that the Roman law was written and unwritten just as it was among the Greeks, Justinian adds: "The written part consists of laws, plebiscita, senatus-consulta, enactments of emperors, edicts of magistrates, and answers of jurisprudents." Sand. Inst. Just. 1, 2, 3. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTA.

JUS SINGULARE. A law which is an exception to the ordinary law. A special rule applicable to an individual case or class of cases. Where it benefits particular classes of persons, it is called privilege, in an objective sense; privilege in a subjective sense is a particular right conferred upon a definite person by leges speciales.

JUS STILLICIDII VEL FLUMINUS RECIPIENDI. In Roman Law. An urban servitude giving the owner a right to project his roof over the land of another or to open a house drain upon it.

JUS STRICTUM (Lat.). A Latin phrase, which signifies law interpreted without any modification, and in its utmost rigor. JUS ÆQUUM.

JUS SUFFRAGII. In Roman Law. The right of voting. This and the jus honorum (q. v.) were the public rights of the Roman citizen.

JUS TERTII. The right of a third person. This is set up by way of defence in many actions where it is sought to establish relations of landlord and tenant, or bailor and bailee, by the plea of setting up the jus tertii.

JUS TIGNI IMMITTENDI. In Roman Law. An urban servitude which gave the right of inserting a beam into the wall of another.

JUS TRIPERTITUM. A threefold right. The term is used by Justinian who says that the requisites of the Roman testament seem to have had a triple origin (ut hoc jus tripertitum esse videatur). Sand. Inst. Just. 2, 10, 3. "It is out of regard to this threefold derivation from the prætorian edict, from the civil law, and from the imperial constitutions, that Justinian speaks of the law of wills in his own days as jus tripertitum." Maine, Anc. L. 207.

JUS UTENDI (Lat.). The right to use property without destroying its substance. It is employed in contradistinction to the jus abutendi. 3 Toullier, n. 86.

JUS VENANDI ET PISCANDI. The right of hunting and fishing.

JUS VITÆ NECISQUE. The right of life and death. Under the ancient Roman law in the time of the XII. Tables, this was included in the absolute power of another.

JUST. This word is frequently used in legal phraseology in combination with other words, such as reasonable, equitable, convenient.

Where, as a foundation for an attachment, an affidavit was required that the plaintiff's claim is just, it is not sufficient if it does not state positively, but only inferentially, that his claim is just, and it does not amount to the same thing to say that the plaintiff "ought justly to recover the amount," or that "said several sums are justly due;" 5 Kan. 293.

In the English Traffic Act, in the phrase "just and reasonable," it was said to mean, to the advantage of the customer; 51 L. J. Q. B. 601.

Where conditions of traffic companies are to be just and reasonable, the reasonableness is a question of law, not of fact; 18 C. B. 805, 829.

It is a "just and reasonable" provision in by-laws to disqualify by reason of bankruptcy or notorious insolvency; 10 H. L. Cas. 404.

An agreement to pay what an individual (who was a taxing officer of the court of chancery) should say was a just and reasonable compensation for the services rendered by the complainant's solicitor in a suit commenced in that court, and settled before decree, obliges the party so agreeing to pay the bill of costs regularly taxed by the individual named in the agreement; 1 Den. 508. The terms "just and reasonable," as employed by the legislature in the Practice Act, obviously have reference to the rules of practice then existing by the common law, and contemplate no other or different terms than would be just and reasonable, as judged of by that practice; 1 Bradw. 39.

The words "just and fair" within the meaning of the New York statute, authorizing the imprisonment of a fraudulent debtor, were thus construed: "Where the debtor has procured from the creditor, at whose suit he is imprisoned, property by fraud, even if he has spent the proceeds in any way that would be unobjectionable, if they were his own, and if by loss or accident he is deprived of them, his proceedings are not just and fair, and where the debtor has combined or united with others to fraudulently obtain the property of the creditor, at whose suit he is imprisoned, even if such others got the proceeds of the fraud, and he kept none, his proceedings are not 'just and fair' within the meaning of the statute," authorizing the examination of an imprisoned debtor, in proceedings for his discharge from imprisonment, if it appear that his proceedings have not been "just and fair" towards the creditor under whose judgment he is imprisoned; 59 How. Pr. 136, 145.

Just and equitable may as well apply to authorized as unauthorized expenditures, and a claim for services and materials might be so overcharged, both as to the amount rendered, as well as the price for the same, as to make the aggregate of the demand unjust and inequitable, under an act which permits the credit of so much thereof as is just and equitable; 23 Hun 50.

In the English Companies Act, 1862, it is "just and equitable" to wind up a company when the whole substratum of the business which was the object of the company had become strictly impossible; 1 Cox 213; 3 K. & J. 78; 20 Ch. Div. 169; Buckley, Comp. Act 215.

In the phrase a "just cause" for a court to do anything, the word just "does not add much weight, though it may add a little; it means some substantial reason must be shown;" Jessel, M. R., in 21 Ch. Div. 397.

To be "just and convenient" to appoint a receiver or grant an injunction or mandamus, respect must be given to what is just according to settled principles, as well as to what is convenient; 9 Ch. Div. 89.

"All my just debts" includes all debts; Wms. Ex. 1719; L. R. 4 H. L. 506. A direction to pay debts or just debts included a mortgage debt in exoneration of the property, but 30 and 31 Vict. c. 69, § 1, did away with that reasoning; 9 Ch. Div. 12, per Jessel, M. R. A direction to pay just debts did not include a note of the testator made before he was of age, and therefore voidable; 9 Mass. 62. See also 1 Binn. 209; 1 Denio 508; 9 N. Y. 398.

JUST BEFORE. "At the time when," was the construction of these words in a plea to justify the killing of a dog; Ir. C. L. 156.

JUST COMPENSATION. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

JUSTICE. The constant and perpetual disposition to render every man his due. Justinian, Inst. b. 1, tit. 1; Co. 2d Inst. 56. The conformity of our actions and our will to the law. Toullier, Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 5.

Commutative justice is that virtue whose object it is to render to every one what belongs to him, as nearly as may be, or that which governs contracts. To render commutative justice, the judge must make an equality between the parties, that no one may be a gainer by another's loss.

Distributive justice is that virtue whose object it is to distribute rewards and punishments to each one according to his merits, observing a just proportion by comparing one person or fact with another, so that neither equal persons have unequal thing nor unequal persons things equal. Tr. Eq. 3; and Toullier's learned note, Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 7, note.

In the most extensive sense of the word, it differs little from virtue; for it includes within itself the whole circle of virtues. Yet the common distinction between them is, that that which considered positively and in itself is called virtue, when considered relatively and with respect to others, has the name of justice. But justice, being in itself a part of virtue, is confined to things simply good or evil, and consists in a man's taking such a proportion of them as he ought.

Toullier exposes the want of utility and exactness in this division of distributive and commutative justice, adopted in the compendium or abridgments of the ancient doctors, and prefers the divisions of internal and external justice,—the first being a conformity of our will, and the latter a conformity of our actions, to the law, their union making perfect justice. Exterior justice is the object of jurisprudence; interior justice is the object of morality. Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 6, 7.

According to the Frederician Code, part 1, book 1, tit. 2, s. 27, justice consists simply in letting every one enjoy the rights which he has acquired in virtue of the laws. And, as this definition includes all the other rules of right, there is properly but one single general rule of right, namely: Give every one his own.

In Norman French. Amenable to justice. Kelham, Dict.

In Feudal Law. Feudal jurisdiction, divided into high (alta justitia), and low (simplex inferior justitia), the former being a jurisdiction over matters of life and limb, the latter over smaller causes. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 26; Du Cange. Sometimes high, low, and middle justice or jurisdiction were distinguished.

An assessment; Du Cange; also, a judicial fine. Du Cange.

At Common Law. A title given in England and America to judges of common-law courts, being a translation of justitia, which was anciently applied to common-law judges, while judex was applied to ecclesiastical judges and others; e. g. judex fiscalis. Leges Hen. I. §§ 24, 63; Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Index; Co. Litt. 71 b.

The judges of king's bench and common pleas, and the judges of almost all the supreme courts in the United States, are properly styled "justices."

The term justice is also applied to the lowest judicial officers: e. g. a trial justice; a justice of the peace.

JUSTICE AYRES. In Scotch Law. The circuits through the kingdom made for the distribution of justice. Erskine, Inst. 1. 3. 25.

JUSTICE, DEPARTMENT OF. The act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. L.

92), organized the judicial business of the United States, made provision for an attorney-general, and charged him with the duty of prosecuting all suits in the supreme court in which the United States was in anywise interested, and of furnishing advice and opinions upon all questions of law when called upon to do so by the president or the heads of the other executive departments of the government. The federal constitution provides that "the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States," and although it does not specify any subordinate ministerial or administrative officers, yet there is an inferential recognition of such officers in the provision that the president may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of his department, and in the provision for the appointment of certain inferior officers "by the heads of departments." The organization of these departments is by the constitution left to the congress, and it was for the purpose of providing for a department which should administer the legal branch of the government that the above act was passed; 6 Op. Att. Gen. 327.

The Department of Justice as it now exists was created by the act of June 22, 1870; 16 U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 162; Rev. Stats. U. S. Title VIII., passim. See also 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 778, 916, 403, 472, and 560. By this act the attorney-general is made the head of this department. He is the chief law officer of the government. He represents the United States in matters involving law questions; gives his advice and opinion when they are required by the president or by the heads of the other executive departments on questions of law arising in the administration of their respective departments; he exercises a general superintendency and direction over all United States district attorneys and marshals in all judicial districts in the states and territories; he is authorized to provide for special counsel for the United States whenever required by any department of government; he is directed to supervise and direct the defence of actions against officers of either house of congress for official acts; he designates penitentiaries for convicts in United States courts; and has general supervision and control over all United States jails and penitentiaries. In the performance of his duties he is assisted by the solicitor-general, four assistant attorneys-general, and six assistant attorneys, as well as by a certain clerical force for the routine work of the office.

By the act of June 22, 1870, provision was made for "an officer learned in the law to assist the attorney-general in the performance of his duties, called the solicitor-general." He assists the attorney-general in the performance of his general duties, and by special provision of law, in the case of a vacancy in the office of attorney-general or in his absence, exercises all of the duties of that officer. Except when the attorney-general otherwise directs, the solicitor-general conducts and argues all cases in the supreme court and in the court of claims in which the United States is interested; and when he so directs, any such case in any court of the United States may be conducted and argued by the solicitor-general, and in the same way the solicitor-general may be sent by the attorney-general to attend to the interests of the United States in any state court or elsewhere.

By the act of 1870, provision is also made for three officers learned in the law called assistant attorneys-general, who assist the attorney-general and solicitor-general in the performance of their duties. By the act of March 3, 1891, an additional assistant attorney-general was created for the purpose of defending the United States in suits brought in the court of claims under that act, for Indian depredations. Of these assistant attorneys-general, one is charged with the defence of the United States in suits brought against the government in the court of claims under its special and general jurisdiction. And he is assisted in the performance of his duties by six assistant attorneys, who, under his general supervision and direction, represent the interests of the United States in the preparation and argument of all cases in that court. The solicitor-general and assistant attorneys-general are appointed by the president of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the senate, while the assistant attorneys are appointed by the attorney-general.

The act creating the Department of Justice also provides for a solicitor of the treasury, an assistant solicitor of the treasury, solicitor of internal revenue, a naval solicitor, and an examiner of claims for the Department of State, commonly called the Solicitor of the Department of State. They are appointed by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and exercise their functions under the supervision and control of the head of the Department of Justice, although they are assigned to duty in the respective departments for which they are appointed. There is also provided an assistant attorney-general for the Department of the Interior and for the Post Office Department, who likewise perform their duties under the general supervision and control of the attorney-general.

The opinions of the attorney-general are reported and have authority the same in kind, if not in degree, with the decisions of courts of justice; 6 Op. Att. Gen. 333.

JUSTICE, FLEEING FROM. In order to come within the exception of "fleeing from justice" in R. S. 1045, it is sufficient that there is a flight with the intention of avoiding prosecution whether a prosecution has or has not been begun. It is not necessary that there should be an intent to avoid the justice of the United States; it is enough that there is an intent to avoid the justice of the state which has jurisdiction over the same act; 160 U. S. 128. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; EXTRADITION; RENDITION.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE. A public officer invested with judicial powers for the purpose of preventing breaches of the peace and bringing to punishment those who have violated the laws.

These officers, under the constitution of some of the states, are appointed by the executive; in others, they are elected by the people and commissioned by the executive. In some states they hold their office during good behavior; in others, for a limited period.

Justices of the peace were created by 36 Edw., cap. 12. By 12 Rich. 2, cap. 10, it was provided that there should be no more than six in every county. They were said to be judges of record. They were required to be men of the best reputation, the most prevalent men in the county, together with some lawyers; substantial persons dwelling in the county, men of good governance. They were "not qualified unless they have £12 per annum, except Men of the Law;" Cond. Gen. 145.

In People ex rel. Burley v. Howland, it was held by the New York appellate division of the supreme court that the legislature could not abolish the office of justice of the peace; 55 Alb. L. J. 319. The court said: "The office of justice of the peace is one of the oldest known to the English law. Originally it was merely a peace office, with no civil jurisdiction, but from a time long antedating the constitution (of New York) it was an office with both civil and criminal jurisdiction. Its most important functions are those of conservators of the peace, and administrators of the criminal law. The statutes conferring the powers and duties of the office date so far back in the history of English law that they may be said to be common-law powers, adopted by us with the office and inseparable therefrom."

At common law justices of the peace have a double power in relation to the arrest of wrong-doers: when a felony or breach of the peace has been committed in their presence, they may personally arrest the offender, or command others to do so, and, in order to prevent the riotous consequences of a tumultuous assembly, they may command others to arrest affrayers when the affray has been committed in their presence. If a magistrate be not present when a crime is committed, before he can take a step to arrest the offender an oath or affirmation must be made, by some person cognizant of the fact, that the offence has been committed, and that the person charged is the offender, or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed the offence.

Probably the most important function of justices of the peace, in the administration of criminal law, is their power of committing magistrates. This they have always, and in most states they have also jurisdiction, either sole or concurrent, with some criminal court of petty offences.

The constitution of the United States directs that "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." Amendm. IV. After his arrest, the person charged is brought before the justice of the peace, and after hearing he is discharged, held to bail to answer to the complaint, or, for want of bail, committed to prison.

In some states it is held that where there are criminal courts of record in the county, justices of the peace have no trial jurisdiction in criminal cause, but can act only as committing magistrates; 33 Fla. 620; 45 La. Ann. 1012.

A justice who erroneously and in good faith excludes persons from a criminal case as spectators is not liable therefor; 86 Me. 80.

In some of the United States, justices of the peace have jurisdiction in civil cases, given to them by local regulations. The jurisdiction is usually confined to actions of contract, express or implied, replevin, and the like, where a small amount is involved. The limit ranges from $100 to $300, and usually torts and actions for unliquidated damages are not included. The local statutes must be consulted, but the statutes regulating the jurisdiction are sufficiently similar to make the citation of a few cases fairly illustrative of the principles generally applied.

In Philadelphia, under the constitution of 1873, police magistrates take the place of justices of the peace.

The civil jurisdiction of a justice of the peace did not exist by the common law, but depends upon the constitutional warrant or statutory enactment, and there are no intendments in favor of his jurisdiction; 90 Ala. 480.

Where a justice of the peace has been appointed by the proper authorities, his qualifications cannot be questioned before him; 44 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 270; but where one elected a justice before his term begins files his bond but does not take the oath or perform any official function, a writ of replevin by him before his term actually begins is void; 8 So. Rep. (Miss.) 545. Where a justice has no jurisdiction the filing of an answer by defendant after the overruling of a motion to dismiss will not give him jurisdiction; 51 Ia. 41. Where the appointment was void the consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction to the justice; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 102.

Where an action would lie in either contract or tort and suit is begun before a justice, in order to sustain the jurisdiction the action will be presumed to have been brought upon the contract; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 709.

Jurisdiction is sufficiently shown if it appears from the entire record of the proceeding; 53 Mo. App. 44.

It is no objection to the jurisdiction that plaintiff remitted a part of his claim to bring it within the jurisdiction; 60 Ark.

146; 115 N. C. 298; 20 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 91; even where unliquidated damages are claimed; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 527. But where the sum claimed is in excess of the amount limited by statute the defect cannot be cured and jurisdiction given by a stipulation that the justice may render judgment for the amount to which his jurisdiction is limited; 50 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 961.

And where lumber was delivered by instalments and the total amount exceeded the jurisdiction, the claim could not be split up into separate actions for the different deliveries in order to bring it within the jurisdictional amount; 109 N. C. 571.

Where a stipulated attorney's fee would increase the amount beyond the jurisdiction the fee may be considered in estimating the amount in controversy; 17 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1085; even if the stipulation for the fee is void; 64 N. E. Rep. (S. D.) 525.

Justices of the peace have been held to have no jurisdiction in trespass for the negligent killing of an animal; 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 548; or negligently allowing a dangerous animal to go at large; 2 Lack. Leg. N. Pa. 143; or for injuries to a horse by a defective culvert; 5 Pa. Dist. R. 78; or in a suit on a foreign judgment; 7 Houst. 327; in an action on the case for nuisance; 4 Pa. Dist. 290; or for consequential damages due to negligence; id. 88. But the jurisdiction was sustained in an action for the destruction of fruit in baskets, run over and crushed by the wheels of defendant's wagon, consequential damages not being involved; 8 Houst. 19; so also there was jurisdiction of an action for killing a horse by a railroad company, because of a breach of contract to maintain cattle guards; 38 W. Va. 711.

The jurisdiction of a justice in a garnishment proceeding does not depend upon the amount the garnishee may owe; 59 Ill. App. 329; in an attachment the jurisdiction is determined by the amount in controversy, not the value of the property attached; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 214; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 671. Where the justice has jurisdiction in "matters of contract," it will cover an action for unliquidated damages for breach of contract within the jurisdiction; 55 Ark. 547.

A justice of the peace has no power to vacate a judgment unless it be one of default or non-suit; 61 Mo. App. 288; nor to settle a bill of exceptions; 44 Neb. 10; for the purpose of preserving testimony on a hearing of a motion to discharge the attachment; 43 id. 260; nor to grant a nonsuit where a case is on trial before a jury; 24 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 407.

The court of a justice of the peace has been held a court of record; 57 Ind. 56; 12 Conn. 49; for the reason that it is bound to keep a record of its proceedings and has power to fine and imprison; 7 Blackf. 272. But it has also been held contra; 1 Pa. 307; 10 id. 157; Hempst. 20; Ga. Dec. pt. II. 50.

Justices of the peace are within the principle that judicial officers are not liable for damages for judicial acts, and only on ministerial acts in cases of intentional violation of law or gross negligence; 7 D. C. 264; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 982. It was held that he is not liable for rendering a judgment and issuing an order of sale in an action on which he had no jurisdiction, unless he knowingly acted outside of it; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 416; or unless he did not act in good faith; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1004.

The refusal of a justice to approve an appeal is a ministerial act, for which an action will lie against him if he acted corruptly or maliciously; 8 Houst. 154.

Though magistrates and other quasi-judicial and sometimes ministerial officers are within the principle that an error of judgment or mistake of law is not punishable, in proceedings against them for acting corruptly in their office, their misapprehensions of the law may be set up in answer to the charge of corruption; 1 Term 653; 13 Q. B. 240; 4 Harring. 555, 556; 75 N. C. 281; 2 Bay 1, 385; 36 Ia. 499; 1 Mass. 227; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 299.

If the action of a justice of the peace is strictly judicial and he has jurisdiction, he is not liable to a civil action, however, it may be as to criminal prosecution, though corruption is alleged; 8 Cow. 178; 38 Me. 530; 21 Barb. 207; 11 Allen 31; 22 Ill. 100; 7 Jones N. C. 525; 65 Ind. 106.

All the acts of a justice of the peace from the commencement to the close of a suit seem to be considered judicial, rather than ministerial, so far as concerns questions of his responsibility; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 463, n. 3; 30 Mo. 420; see 12 Md. 340; but he is liable for exercising authority where he has none; 3 A. K. Marsh. 70; where he acts upon inadequate allegation, but has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, he is not liable; 21 Wend. 552.

JUSTICES COURTS. In American Law. Inferior tribunals, with limited jurisdiction, both civil and criminal. There are courts so called in the states of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and probably other states.

JUSTICES IN EYRE. Certain judges established, if not first appointed, A. D. 1176, 22 Hen. II.

England was divided into certain circuits, and three justices in eyre—or justices itinerant, as they were sometimes called—were appointed to each district, and made the circuit of the kingdom once in seven years, for the purpose of trying causes. They were afterwards, when the judicial functions assumed greater importance, directed, by Magna Charta, c. 12, to be sent into every county once a year. The itinerant justices were sometimes more justices of assize or dower, or of general jail delivery, and the like.

Speaking of the 12th century it is said that "the visitation of the counties by itinerant justices has been becoming systematic." The holding of the assize on circuit was evidently committed to judges of great prominence. "From the early years of the reign (Henry II.) we hear of pleas held on circuit by Richard Lucy the chief justiciar, by Henry of Essex the constable, and by Thomas Becket the chancellor. . . . In 1176, to execute the assize of Northampton, eighteen justices were employed, and the country was divided into six circuits; in 1179, twenty-one justices were employed, and the country was divided into four circuits; indeed from 1176 onwards hardly a year went by without there being a visitation of some part of England. These itinerant justices seem to have been chiefly employed in hearing the pleas of the crown (for which purpose they were equipped with the power of obtaining accusations from the local juries), and in entertaining some or all of the new possessory actions. The court that they held was, as already said, curia regis, but it was not capitalis curia regis, and probably their powers were limited by the words of a temporary commission. They were not necessarily members of the central court, and they might be summoned before it to bear record of their doings; still it was usual that each party of justices should include some few members of the permanent tribunal." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 134.

These justices in eyre in the reign of Henry III. are thus described: "But we may distinguish the main types of these commissions. What seems treated as the humblest is the commission to deliver a jail. This . . . is done very frequently; generally it is done by some three or four knights of the shire, and thus long before the institution of justices of the peace, the country knights had been accustomed to do high criminal justice. In order to dispose of the possessory assizes of novel disseisin and mort d'ancestor, a vast number of commissions were issued in every year. Early in Henry's reign this work was often entrusted to four knights of the shire; at a later time one of the permanent justices would usually be named and allowed to associate some knights with himself. Apparently a justice of assize had often to visit many towns or even villages in each county; he did not do all his work at the county town. It must have been heavy work, for these actions were extremely popular. In the second year of Edward's reign some two thousand commissions of assize were issued. Just at that time the practice seems to have been to divide England into four circuits and to send two justices of assize round each circuit; but a full history of the circuits would be intricate and wearisome. Above all the other commissions rank the commission for an iter ad omnia placita, or more briefly for an iter, or eyre. An eyre had come to be a long and laborious business. In the first place, if we suppose an eyre in Cambridgeshire announced, this has the effect of stopping all Cambridgeshire business in the bench. Litigants who have been told to appear before the justices at Westminster will now have to appear before the justices in eyre at Cambridgeshire. There is no business before the bench at Westminster if an eyre has been proclaimed in all the counties. Then again the justices are provided with a long list of interrogatories (capitula itineris) which they are to address to local juries. Every hundred, every vill in the county must be represented before them. These interrogatories—their number increases as time goes on—ransack the memories of the jurors, and the local records for all that has happened in the shire since the last eyre took place some seven years ago; every crime, every invasion of royal rights, every neglect of police duties must be presented. The justices must sit in the county town from week to week and even from month to month before they will have got through the tedious task and inflicted the due tale of fines and amercements. Three or four of the permanent judges will be placed in the commission; with them will be associated some of the magnates of the district; bishops and even abbots, to the scandal of strict churchmen, have to serve as justices in eyre. Probably it was thought expedient that some of the great freeholders of the country should be commissioned, in order that no man might say that his judges were not his peers. An eyre was a sore burden; the men of Cornwall fled before the face of the justices; we hear assertions of a binding custom that an eyre shall not take place more than once in seven years. Expedients are being adopted which in course of time will enable the justices of assize to preside in the country over the trial of actions which are pending before the benches; thus without the terrors of an eyre, the trial of civil actions can take place in the counties and jurors need no longer be ever journeying to Westminster from their remote homes. But these expedients belong for the most part to Edward's reign; under his father a jury wearily travelling from Yorkshire or Devonshire towards London must have been no very uncommon sight." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 179, 180, 181.

See 3 Bla. Com. 58; Crabb, Eng. Law 108; Co. Litt. 293.

JUSTICES OF THE JEWS. See JEWS.

JUSTICES OF THE PAVILION (justiciarii pavilionis). Certain judges of a pyepouder court, of a most transcendent jurisdiction, authorized by the bishop of Winchester, at a fair held at St. Giles Hills near that city, by virtue of letters-patent granted by Edw. IV. Prynne's Animadv. on Coke's 4th Inst. fol. 191.

JUSTICES OF TRAIL BASTON. Justices appointed by Edward I. during his absence in the Scotch and French wars, about the year 1305. They were so styled, it is said, from trailing or drawing the baston (q. v.), or staff of justice. They were a sort of justices in eyre, with large and summary powers. Their office was to make inquisition, throughout the kingdom, of all officers, and others, touching extortion, bribery, and such like grievances of intruders into other men's lands, barrators, robbers, breakers of the peace, and divers other offenders; Cowel; Toml.; Holt; Old. N. B. fol. 53; 12 Co. 25.

JUSTICIAR, JUSTICIER. In Old English Law. A judge or justice. Baker, fol. 118; Mon. Angl. One of several persons learned in the law, who sat in the aula regis, and formed a kind of court of appeal in cases of difficulty.

The chief justiciar (capitalis justiciarius totius Angliæ) was a special magistrate, who presided over the whole aula regis, who was the principal minister of state, the second man in the kingdom, and by virtue of his office, guardian of the realm in the king's absence. 3 Bla. Com. 37; Spelman, Gloss. 330; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 6. The last who bore this title was Philip Basset, in the time of Hen. III.

JUSTICIARII ITINERANTES (Lat.). Justices in eyre (q. v.).

JUSTICIARII RESIDENTES (Lat.). Justices or judges who usually resided in Westminster: they were so called to distinguish them from justices in eyre. Co. Litt. 293.

JUSTICIARY. Another name for a judge. In Latin, he was called justiciarius, and in French, justicier. Not used. Bacon, Abr. Courts (A).

JUSTICIES (from verb justiciare, 2d pers. pres. subj., do you do justice to).

In English Law. A special writ, in the nature of a commission, empowering a sheriff to hold plea in his county court of a cause which he could not take jurisdiction of without this writ: e. g. trespass vi et armis for any sum, and all personal actions above forty shillings. 1 Burn, Just. 449. So called from the Latin word justicies, used in the writ, which runs, "præcipimus tibi quod justicies A B," etc.; we command you to do A B right, etc. Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 6, c, 13; Kitch. 74; Fitzh. N. B. 117; 3 Bla. Com. 3, 6.

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE. That which is committed with the intention to kill, or to do a grievous bodily injury, under circumstances which the law holds sufficient to exculpate the person who commits it. A judge who, in pursuance of his duty, pronounces sentence of death, is not guilty of homicide; for it is evident that, as the law prescribes the punishment of death for certain offences, it must protect those who are intrusted with its execution. A judge, therefore, who pronounces sentence of death, in a legal manner, on a legal indictment, legally brought before him, for a capital offence committed within his jurisdiction, after a lawful trial and conviction of the defendant, is guilty of no offence; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 496.

Magistrates, or other officers intrusted with the preservation of the public peace, are justified in committing homicide, or giving orders which lead to it, if the excesses of a riotous assembly cannot be otherwise repressed; 4 Bla. Com. 178, 179. So a homicide is justifiable, when committed by an officer in defending a judge of the United States, engaged in the discharge of his judicial duties; 135 U. S. 1.

An officer intrusted with a legal warrant, criminal or civil, and lawfully commanded by a competent tribunal to execute it, will be justified in committing homicide, if in the course of advancing to discharge his duty he be brought into such perils that without doing so he cannot either save his life or discharge the duty which he is commanded by the warrant to perform. And when the warrant commands him to put a criminal to death, he is justified in obeying it; Cl. Cr. L. 134. See 113 N. C. 722. In endeavoring to make an arrest an officer has the right to use all the force that is necessary to overcome all resistance, even to the taking of life; 96 Mo. 666.

A soldier on duty is justified in committing homicide, in obedience to the command of his officer, unless the command was something plainly unlawful.

A man may be justified in killing another to prevent the debauching of his wife; 90 Ga. 472.

A private individual will, in many cases, be justified in committing homicide while acting in self-defence; 134 Ind. 46; 30 Fla. 142; 97 Ala. 32; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 56. If a trespass on the person or property of another amounts to a felony, the killing of the trespasser will be justifiable, if necessary in order to prevent it; 90 Ga. 701. It is not true as a general proposition that one who is assaulted by another with a dangerous weapon is justified in taking the life of the party so assaulting him; 45 La. Ann. 14. The same circumstances that will justify or excuse the homicide where the assault is upon one's self, will also excuse or justify the slayer if the killing is done in defence of his family or servant; 32 Fla. 56. See 86 Ky. 440. See DEFENCE.

An instruction to a jury requiring a justification of homicide to be established beyond a reasonable doubt is erroneous; 65 Hun 420.

To establish a case of justifiable homicide it must appear that the assault upon the prisoner was such as would lead a reasonable person to believe that his life was in peril; 164 U. S. 492.

See, generally, 4 Bla. Com. 178; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 496; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 219; 1 Russ. Cr. 538; 2 Wash. C. C. 515; Mass. 391; 1 Hawks 210; 1 Coxe, N. J. 424; 5 Yerg. 459; 9 C. & P. 22; ARREST; HOMICIDE; JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTIFICATION. In Pleading. The allegation of matter of fact by the defendant, establishing his legal right to do the act complained of by the plaintiff.

Justification admits the doing of the act charged as a wrong, but alleges a right to do it on the part of the defendant, thus denying that it is a wrong. Excuse merely shows reasons why the defendant should not make good the injury which the plaintiff has suffered from some wrong done. See AVOWRY.

Trespasses. A warrant, regular on its face, and issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete justification to the officer to whom it is directed for obeying its command, whether it be really valid or not. But where the warrant is absolutely void, or apparently irregular in an important respect, or where the act done is one which is beyond the power conferred by the warrant, it is no justification. See ARREST; TRESPASS. So, too, many acts, and even homicide committed in self-defence, or defence of wife, children, or servants, are justifiable; Archb. Cr. P. by Pom. 681, n.; see SELF-DEFENCE; DEFENCE; JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE; or in preserving the public peace; see ARREST; TRESPASS; or under a license, express or implied; 3 Cai. 261; 2 Bail. 4; 3 McLean 571; see 13 Me. 115; including entry on land to demand a debt, to remove chattels; 2 W. & S. 225; 12 Vt. 273; see 2 Humphr. 425; to ask lodgings at an inn, the entry in such cases being peaceful; to exercise an incorporeal right; 21 Pick. 272; or for public service in case of exigency, as pulling down houses to stop a fire; Year B. 13 Hen. VIII. 16 b; destroying the suburbs of a city in time of war; Year B. 8 Edw. IV. 35 b; entry on land to make fortifications or in preservation of the owner's rights of property; 14 Conn. 255; 4 D. & B. 110; 7 Dana 220; Wright, Ohio 333; 25 Me. 453; 6 Pa. 318; 12 Metc. 53.

Libel and slander may be justified in a civil action, in some cases, by proving the truth of the matter alleged, and generally by showing that the defendant had a right upon the particular occasion either to write and publish the writing or to utter the words: as, when slanderous words are found in a report of a committee of congress, or in an indictment, or words of a slanderous nature are uttered in the course of debate in the legislature by a member, or at the bar by counsel when properly instructed by his client on the subject. Comyns, Dig. Pleader. See SLANDER.

Matter in justification must be specially pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence under the general issue. See LICENSE. A plea of justification to an action for slander, oral or written, should state the charge with the same degree of certainty and precision as is required in an indictment. The object of the plea is to give the plaintiff, who is in truth an accused person, the means of knowing what are the matters alleged against him. It must be direct and explicit. It must in every respect correspond with, and be as extensive as the charge in, the declaration.

The justification, however, will be complete if it covers the essence of the libel. But it must extend to every part which could by itself form a substantive ground of action. Where the slander consists in an imputation of crime, the plea of justification must contain the same degree of precision as is requisite in an indictment for the crime, and must be supported by the same proof that is required on the trial of such an indictment. It is a perfectly well-established rule that where the charge is general in its nature, yet the plea of justification must state specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff. And, even for the purpose of avoiding prolixity, a plea of justification cannot make a general charge of criminality or misconduct, but must set out the specific facts in which the imputed offence consists, and with such certainty as to afford the plaintiff an opportunity of joining issue precisely upon their existence. Heard, Lib. & Sl. § 240. See LIBEL.

When established by evidence, it furnishes a complete bar to the action.

In Practice. The proceeding by which bail establish their ability to perform the undertaking of the bond or recognizance.

It must take place before an authorized magistrate; 5 Binn. 461; 6 Johns. 124; 13 id. 422; and notice must, in general, be given by the party proposing the bail, to the opposite party, of the names of the bail and the intention to justify; 3 Harr. N. J. 503. See 3 Halst. 369.

It is a common provision that bail must justify in double the amount of the recognizance if exceptions are taken; 2 Hill, N. Y. 379; otherwise, a justification in the amount of the recognizance is, in general, sufficient.

It must be made within a specified time, or the persons named cease to be bail; 1 Cow. 54. See Baldw. 148.

JUSTIFICATORS. A kind of compurgators, or those who, by oath, justified the innocence or oaths of others, as in the case of wages of law.

JUSTIFYING BAIL. In Practice. The production of bail in court, who there justify themselves against the exception of the plaintiff. See BAIL; JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTITIUM. In Civil Law. A suspension or intermission of the administration of justice in courts; vacation time. Calv. Lex.

JUSTIZA. In Scotch Law. The name anciently given to a high judicial magistrate, or supreme judge, who was the ultimate interpreter of the laws, and possessed other high powers.

JUSTLY. The words "to act justly" or "do justice" to relatives do not create a precatory trust; 4 Ch. Div. 238.

JUSTS or JOUSTS. Exercises between martial men and persons of honor, with spears, on horseback; different from tournaments, which were military exercises between many men in troops. 24 Hen. VIII. c. 13.

KANSAS. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

The state was carved out of a portion of the Louisiana purchase, and a small portion of the territory ceded to the United States by Texas.

The territory of Kansas was organized by an act of congress, dated May 30, 1854.

The constitution was adopted at Wyandotte July 29, 1859, and Kansas was admitted into the Union as a state, by an act of the congress, approved, January 20, 1861.

Under the constitution, the powers of the state government are divided into three departments, viz.: executive, legislative, and judicial.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.—The executive department consists of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor, treasurer, attorney general, and superintendent of public instruction, who are chosen by the electors of the state, at the time and place of voting for members of the legislature, and hold their offices for two years from the second Monday in January next after their election, and until their successors are elected and qualified.

The secretary of state, lieutenant-governor, and attorney general constitute a board of state canvassers of election, whose duty it is to meet on the second Tuesday of December succeeding each election for state officers, and proclaim the result of such election.

No member of congress, or officer of the state, or of the United States, shall hold the office of governor, except as herein provided.

In all cases of the death, impeachment, resignation, removal, or other disability of the governor, the power and duties of the office, for the residue of the term, or until the disability shall be removed, shall devolve upon the president of the senate.

The lieutenant-governor shall be president of the senate, and shall vote only when the senate is equally divided.

The senate shall choose a president pro tempore, to preside in case of his absence or impeachment, or when he shall hold the office of governor.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.—The legislative power of this state shall be vested in a house of representatives and senate.

The number of representatives is regulated by law, but shall never exceed one hundred and twenty-five representatives and forty senators.

A majority of all the members elected to each house, voting in the affirmative, shall be necessary to pass any bill or joint resolution.

No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, and no law shall be revived or amended, unless the new act contain the entire act revived, or section or sections amended, and the section or sections so amended shall be repealed.

All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the state; and in all cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted.

The legislature may confer upon tribunals transacting the county business of the several counties, such powers of local legislation and administration as it shall deem expedient.

For any speech or debate in either house, the members shall not be questioned elsewhere. No member of the legislature shall be subject to arrest, except for felony or breach of the peace, in going to or returning from the place of meeting, or during the continuance of the session; neither shall he be subject to the service of any civil process during the session, nor for fifteen days previous to its commencement.

All sessions of the legislature shall be held at the state capital, and, beginning with the session of eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, all regular sessions shall be held once in two years, commencing on the second Tuesday of January each alternate year thereafter.

The house of representatives has the sole power to impeach. All impeachments are tried by the senate. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the senators elected.

JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT. The judicial power of this state is vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts, inferior to the supreme court, as may be provided by law.

The supreme court consists of one chief justice and two associate justices, who are elected by the electors of the state at large, and whose term of office, after the first, shall be six years. At the first election a chief justice shall be chosen for six years, one associate justice for four years, and one for two years.

The supreme court has original jurisdiction in proceedings in quo warranto, mandamus, and habeas corpus; and such appellate jurisdiction as may be provided by law.

The state is divided into thirty-five judicial districts, in each of which there is elected a district judge, who holds his office for four years.

The district courts have such jurisdiction in their respective districts as may be provided by law.

There is a probate court in each county, which is a court of record and has such probate jurisdiction and care of estates of deceased persons, minors, and persons of unsound mind, as may be prescribed by law, and shall have jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus. This court consists of one judge, who is elected and holds his office for two years.

Two justices of the peace are elected in each township.

Justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts may be removed from office by resolution of both houses, if two-thirds of the members of each house concur, but no such removal shall be made except upon complaint, the substance of which shall be entered upon the journal, nor until the party charged shall have had notice and opportunity to be heard.

Elections.—All elections by the people shall be by ballot, and all elections by the legislature shall be viva voce.

Suffrage.—Every person who shall give or accept a challenge to fight a duel, or who shall, knowingly, carry to another person such challenge, or shall go out of the state to fight a duel, shall be ineligible to any office of trust or profit.

Every person who shall have given or offered a bribe to procure his election, shall be disqualified from holding office during the term for which he may have been elected.

Education.—The legislature shall encourage the promotion of intellectual, moral, scientific, and agricultural improvement, by establishing a uniform system of common schools and schools of a higher grade, embracing normal, preparatory, collegiate, and university departments.

No religious sect or sects shall ever control any part of the common school or university funds of the state.

Corporations.—The legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers. Corporations may be created under general laws; but such laws may be amended or repealed.

The term corporation, as used in this article, includes all associations and joint stock companies having powers and privileges not possessed by individuals or partnerships; and all corporations may sue and be sued in their corporate name.

Miscellaneous.—Lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets are forever prohibited.

The legislature shall provide for the protection of the rights of women in acquiring and possessing property, real, personal, and mixed, and separate and apart from the husband; and shall also provide for their equal rights in the possession of their children.

A homestead to the extent of one hundred and sixty acres of farming land, or of one acre within the limits of an incorporated town or city, occupied as a residence by the family of the owner, together with all the improvements on the same, is exempted from forced sale, and shall not be alienated without the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation exists; but no property shall be exempt from sale for taxes, or for the payment of obligations contracted for the purchase of said premises, or for the erection of improvements thereon; Provided, the provisions of this section shall not apply to any process of law obtained by virtue of a lien given by the consent of both husband and wife.

The manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors shall be forever prohibited in this state, except for medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes.

No distinction shall ever be made between citizens and aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property.

There are no common-law crimes in this state. All crimes are defined and punished by statute.

The common law, as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions, and the conditions and wants of the people, shall remain in force in aid of the general statutes in this state; but the rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof shall be strictly construed, shall not be applicable to any general statute in this state, but all such statutes shall be liberally construed to promote their object.

"The body of the laws of England as they existed in the fourth year of the reign of James I. (1607) constitutes the common law of this state." 9 Kan. 252.

KEEP. To heed; observe; regard; attend to.

Neither a single act of play at a gaming-table, called a sweat cloth, at the races, nor even a single day's use of it on the race-field, is a keeping of a common gaming-table, within the Penitentiary Act for the District of Columbia; 4 Cr. C. C. 659. When it is said that a certain man keeps a woman, the popular inference is, that the relation is one which involves illicit intercourse; 36 Ala. 717. See 3 Allen 101; 52 N. H. 368. IV.; Stat. 34 Hen. VIII. c. 4; 4 Inst. 55; 2 Bla. Com. 347.

KEEPING. KEEPING HOUSE. In English Law. As an act of bankruptcy, it is when a man absents himself from his place of business and retires to his private residence, so as to evade the importunity of creditors. The usual evidence of "keeping house" is denial to a creditor who has called for money. Robson, Bkcy.; 6 Bing. 363.

KENTUCKY. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

This state was formerly a part of Virginia, which by an act of its legislature, passed December 18, 1789, consented that the district of Kentucky within the jurisdiction of the said commonwealth, and according to its actual boundaries at the time of passing the act aforesaid, should be formed into a new state. By the act of congress of February, 1791, 1 Story, Laws 168, congress consented that, after the first day of June, 1792, the district of Kentucky should be formed into a new state, separate from and independent of the commonwealth of Virginia. And by the second section it is enacted, that upon the aforesaid first day of June, 1792, the said new state, by the name and style of the state of Kentucky, shall be received and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America.

The present constitution of this state was adopted September 28, 1891. The powers of government are divided into three distinct departments, legislative, executive, and judicial.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.—The legislative power is vested in a house of representatives and a senate, which together constitute the general assembly. The house of representatives consists of one hundred members, elected for a term of two years. They must have attained the age of twenty-four years, and have resided in the state two years preceding the election, the last year thereof in the county, town, or city for which they are chosen. Voters for representatives shall be male citizens of the age of twenty-one years, who have resided in the state two years, or in the county, town, or city one year next preceding the election.

The senate consists of thirty-eight senators, who are elected for four years, and half of the senate is chosen every second year. Senators must be citizens of the United States, of the age of thirty years, and have resided in the state six years preceding the election, the last year thereof in the district for which they are chosen.

The general assembly convenes biennially on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in January.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.—The executive power is vested in the chief magistrate, who is styled the governor of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and has the constitutional powers usually incident to the office. He is elected for a term of four years by the qualified voters of the state, and is ineligible for the succeeding four years after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been elected. He must be at least thirty years of age, a citizen of the United States, and must have been an inhabitant of the state six years next preceding his election. No member of congress, or person holding any office under the United States, or minister of any religious society, is eligible to this office.

A lieutenant-governor is chosen at every regular election for governor in the same manner and for the same term. He must have the same qualifications, and he is, by virtue of his office, speaker of the senate: has a right in committee of the whole to debate and vote on all subjects, and when the senate is equally divided, to give the casting vote. Should the governor be impeached, removed from office, die, refuse to qualify, resign, or be absent from the state, the lieutenant-governor shall exercise all the power and authority appertaining to the office of governor, until another be duly elected and qualified, or the governor, if absent or impeached, shall return or be acquitted.

The governor has a veto which may be overcome by a majority of each house of the general assembly voting by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for and against the bill entered in the journal. Any bill not returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) shall become a law, as if signed, unless adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law unless sent back within three days after the next meeting of the legislature. Every order, resolution, or vote, in which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor and be approved by him before it shall take effect, or, being disapproved, shall be repassed as before provided. Contested elections for governor and lieutenant-governor shall be determined by both houses of the general assembly, according to such regulations as may be established by law.

JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT.—The judicial power of the commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, is vested in one supreme court, styled the court of appeals, and a circuit court in each county, and such courts inferior to the supreme court as the general assembly may from time to time recommend and establish. The court of appeals consists of not less than five nor more than seven judges, who hold their offices eight years and until their successors are duly qualified, but for any reasonable cause the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly. There are now seven judges of this court. The judges are elected; and for the purpose of electing judges the state is by law divided into districts, in each of which the qualified voters elect one judge of the court of appeals. One judge is elected every two years. A judge of this court must have been for five years a resident of the state, and resident in the district for which he may be a candidate two years next preceding his election. He must be at least thirty-five years of age, and have been a practising lawyer, or a practising lawyer and judge, for eight years.

The circuit courts have original general jurisdiction of suits both at common law and equity and of criminal cases, but in Louisville and Jefferson counties a concurrent common-law jurisdiction is vested in a court of common pleas, and concurrent equity jurisdiction in a chancery court.

In each county there is a county court with jurisdiction, for probate of wills, administration of estates, supervision of guardians, and accounts of trustees, bastardy, partition, dower, roads, ferries, mills and dams, and appellate jurisdiction of certain minor appeals from magistrates. The county court is, at stated times, organized as a levy court composed of the presiding judge of the county court and the magistrates of the county, which has the power of a local legislature for county matters.

The quarterly courts have jurisdiction in cases involving not more than two hundred dollars, not including interest, and concurrent jurisdiction of all matters within the cognizance of justices of the peace; also appellate jurisdiction from the latter, of judgments of more than ten and less than twenty-five dollars.

The county judge may hold inquisitions in lunacy. There are also justices of the peace.

The justices' courts have jurisdiction concurrent with the quarterly courts and exclusive of the circuit court, of actions to recover money on personal property up to the limit of one hundred dollars, exclusive of interest and costs. All judges are elected for terms provided by law, by the qualified voters of the district in which they hold office.

KEROSENE. A rock or earth oil. 69 N. Y. 26; 30 Wis. 534.

It is, in a commercial sense, a refined coal or earth oil, and is embraced within those terms as used in an insurance policy. 81 N. Y. 372.

It is not petroleum, but made from the latter by a process of a distillation and refinement; 69 N. Y. 26; 81 id. 278.

A court will not take judicial notice that kerosene is an "inflammable fluid" within the meaning of an insurance policy, it must be proved as a fact; 46 N. Y. 421; nor that it comes under the words "burning fluid"; 24 Hun 565. See 30 Wis. 534.

It is a question for the jury whether kerosene is a burning fluid or chemical oil; 92 Pa. 15; or a drug; 53 Vt. 418; where the court, after quoting Webster's definition of a drug, as "any mineral substance used in chemical operations," declined to say as matter of law that benzine is not included in that term. See RISKS AND PERILS; OIL.

KEY. An instrument made for shutting and opening a lock.

The keys of a house are considered as real estate, and descend to the heir with the inheritance; Mitch. R. P. 21; 11 Co. 50 b; 20 E. L. & Eq. 598; but although they follow the inheritance, they are not fixtures, so far as that the taking of them is not larceny; 5 Blackf. 417; 5 Taunt. 518.

When the keys of a warehouse are delivered to a purchaser of goods locked up there, with a view of effecting a delivery of such goods, the delivery is complete. The doctrine of the civil law is the same; Dig. 41. 1. 9. 6; 18. 1. 74; Benj. Sales, 6th Am. ed. § 1043; 1 East 192; 3 Term 464. See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA; GIFT.

Keys are implements of housebreaking within statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, § 1; for, though commonly used for lawful purposes they are capable of being employed for purposes of housebreaking; and it is a question for the jury whether the person found in possession of them by night had them without lawful excuse, with the intention of using them as implements of housebreaking; 3 C. & K. 250; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 472; and the statute was held to include skeleton, or any other kind of key used for purposes of housebreaking; id. Entering by a key left in the door locked on the outside is not housebreaking; 1 Swint. Jus. Cas. 433. See BURGLARY.

KEYAGE. A toll paid for loading and unloading merchandise at a quay or wharf.

KEYS. The twenty-four chief commoners in the Isle of Man who form the local legislature. 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 100.

KIDEL or KIDDLE. An open weir whereby fish are caught. 2 Inst. 38.

"Weirs (kidelli or gurgites) were the means usual in ancient times for appropriating and enjoying several fisheries in tidal waters." Lord Selborne, L. C., in 8 App. Cas. 144.

KIDNAPPING. The forcible abduction or stealing away of a man, woman, or child from their own country and sending them into another. 4 Bla. Com. 219. At common law it is a misdemeanor; Comb. 10.

There is no wide difference in meaning between kidnapping, false imprisonment, and abduction. The better view seems to be that kidnapping is a false imprisonment, which it always includes, aggravated by the carrying of the person to some other place; Archb. Cr. P. by Pom. 984; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 750. See 85 Cal. 309. It has been held that transportation to a foreign country is not necessary, though this conflicts with Blackstone's definition, supra; 8 N. H. 550. See 1 East, P. C. 429. The consent of a mature person of sound mind prevents any act from being kidnapping; otherwise as to a young child; a child of nine years has been held too young to render his consent available as a defence; Cl. Cr. L. 221; 41 N. H. 53; 5 Allen 518; Thach. Cr. Cas. 488; 74 Ga. 191; 17 Blatchf. 423; but a female fourteen years of age is not kidnapped, if taken away with her consent for the purpose of marriage, and she actually marries; 91 Ga. 763; so, going away by previous arrangement with an unmarried woman who, becoming intoxicated, remained for some days, in illicit intercourse, and was then brought back at her request, was not kidnapping; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1023. Physical force need not be applied, threats will suffice; 3 Allen 69; or fraudulently acquiring consent; 109 N. Y. 226; 88 id. 192. The crime may be effected by means of menaces; 20 Ill. 315; or by getting a man drunk; 25 N. Y. 373. Where the custody of a child is assigned to one of two divorced parents, and the other, or a third person employed for the purpose, carries it off, it is kidnapping; 41 N. H. 53; 5 Allen 518. It was held that within the meaning of the statute against kidnapping, any place where a child has a right to be is its residence; Wallace v. State, 47 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 13. In this case two children who were acrobats had been sent away from home for the purpose of giving exhibitions to raise money with which to relieve the necessities of the family. While absent from their parents they were decoyed away by defendant, who was indicted for kidnapping under the Indiana statute. The court held that they had not acquired a permanent residence, but they were at a place they had a right to be—to which they had been sent by their parents, engaged in the business for which they had been sent. "The purpose of the statute here under consideration certainly was not that a child might be kidnapped at its father's house, but not if it were on a visit at a friend's in a near or distant city. The evident purpose was rather to provide against the kidnapping of a person from any place where he has a right to be, whether that be the place of his 'temporary sojourn or permanent domicile.' A child may be kidnapped, not only from its domicile or the home of its parents, but likewise from a neighbor's house, from church, or school, or hotel, from a hall of public entertainment, or, in fact, from any place where it has a right to be; and it is in that sense that the word 'residence' is here used." 17 N. Y. L. J. 842.

One who takes his child of tender years out of the state, with its consent and with the consent of the mother to whom its custody has been awarded in divorce proceedings, to prevent its presence at a criminal trial in which it had been subpœnaed as a witness, is not guilty of kidnapping; 44 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 51. New York, Illinois, and other states have passed statutes on kidnapping. See ABDUCTION: 1 Russ. Cr. 962; 3 Tex. 282; 12 Metc. 56; 2 Park. Cr. Ca. 590; 47 Hun 308; 146 Pa. 24. Where defendant procured an adjudication that the person alleged to have been kidnapped was insane, and, without using force, publicly conveyed her to a lunatic asylum, though she was not insane at the time, he was not guilty of the offence of kidnapping; 139 N. Y. 87.

The indictment must be found in the county in which the person was seized and not in one through which he was carried; 3 Harring. 538.

It has been held, however, that the carrying away is not essential; 8 N. H. 550. The crime includes a false imprisonment; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 671. See 1 Russ. Cr. 716; 2 Harr. Del. 588; 3 Tex. 282; 12 Metc. 56; ABDUCTION.

It has been held that in order to rescue a kidnapped person his friends may use such force as will be necessary, and that where there is an attack upon the rescuers, a killing of the kidnapper in self-defence is excusable homicide; 25 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 830.

Kidnapping Act, 1872. The stat. 35 & 36 Vict. c. 19, for the prevention and punishment of criminal outrages upon natives of the islands of the Pacific Ocean. Amended by the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 51.

KILDERKIN. A measure of capacity, equal to eighteen gallons.

KILL (Dutch). Originally the bed of a river or creek, and by relation used to mean the stream itself. It is so used in Delaware and New York, but has been said to have no distinct legal signification. 1 N. Y. 96.

KIN. Legal relationship; properly relations by blood, but often including those by marriage. It has been held to include a son-in-law under a statute disqualifying a justice of the peace, in cases to which his kin were parties; 16 Wis. 635; and a second cousin, of a mother under a statute disqualifying jurors in cases where persons of kin were parties; 74 Mo. 271. See NEXT OF KIN.

KIND. The agreement that a collector of taxes was to receive his commission "in kind" means the same kind of funds in which the tax is collected; 51 Ark. 213.

Another kind quoted is not synonymous with another quality quoted; 3 Q. B. D. 341. In this case the reference was to seed. As to loans of property to be repaid "in kind," see IN KIND; LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

KINDRED. Relations by blood. 2 Jarm. Wills 643; 62 Ga. 144; quoting 2 Wms. Ex. 815. It is in some cases, however, used to include relations in law, as children by adoption in a statute; 85 Ky. 671; but not a grandson adopted as a son, so as to make kindred include the adopting parent; 148 Mass. 619. It was held that as the word kindred in the statute of descents means lawful kindred, that term did not include the mother of a bastard, when the right accrued prior to the act enabling illegitimate children to inherit; 38 Me. 153. See 100 Ind. 280; 50 Ia. 532; 129 id. 243; 144 Ill. 40. See BASTARD; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

Nature has divided the kindred of every one into three principal classes. 1. His children, and their descendants. 2. His father, mother, and other ascendants. 3. His collateral relations; which include, in the first place, his brothers and sisters, and their descendants; and, secondly, his uncles, cousins, and other relations of either sex, who have not descended from a brother or sister of the deceased. All kindred, then, are descendants, ascendants, or collaterals. A husband or wife of the deceased, therefore, is not his or her kindred; 14 Ves. 372. See Wood. Inst. 50; Ayliffe, Parerg. 425; Dane, Abr.; Toullier, Ex. 382, 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 516, n.; Pothier, Des Successions, c. 1, art. 3.

KING. The chief magistrate of a kingdom, vested usually with the executive power. See REGNAL; SOVEREIGN.

KING CAN DO NO WRONG. This maxim means that the king is not responsible legally for aught he may please to do, or for any omission. Aust. Jur. sect. VI. It does not mean that everything done by the government is just and lawful, but that whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the king; 2 Steph. Com., 11th. ed. 486; Moz. & W.

This maxim has no place in the system of constitutional law of the United States, as applicable either to the government or any of its officers, or of the several states or any of their officers; 101 U. S. 343. Our government is not liable for the wrongful and unauthorized acts of its officers, however high their place, and though done under a mistaken zeal for the public good; 21 Alb. L. J. 397; 2 Wall. 561; 7 id. 122; 8 id. 269. See, generally, 114 U. S. 290.

KING'S BENCH. See COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

KING'S or QUEEN'S COUNSEL. Barristers or serjeants who have been called within the bar and selected to be the king's counsel. They answer in some measure to the advocati fisci, or advocates of the revenue, among the Romans. They must not be employed against the crown without special leave, which was, however, always granted, at a cost of about nine pounds; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 27, note.

KING'S EVIDENCE. An accomplice in a felony, who, on an implied promise of pardon if he fully and fairly discloses the truth, is admitted as evidence for the crown against his accomplices. 1 Phill. Ev. 81. A jury may, if they please, convict on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice; Tayl. Ev. 880; 4 Steph. Com. 398. On giving a full and fair confession of truth, the accomplice has a strong claim to a recommendation to mercy. He cannot be admitted to testify as king's evidence after judgment against him; 2 Russ. Cr. 956. In the United States, this is known as state's evidence. See ACCOMPLICE.

KING'S PEACE. See CONSERVATOR OF THE PEACE; PEACE.

KING'S SILVER. A fine or payment due to the king for leave to agree in order to levy a fine (finalis concordia). 2 Bla. Com. 350; Dy. 320, pl. 19; 1 Leon. 249, 250; 2 id. 56, 179, 233, 234; 5 Co. 39.

KING'S WIDOW. A widow of the king's principal tenant, who was obliged to take oath in chancery not to marry without the king's consent. Whart. Lex.

KINGDOM. A country where an officer called a king exercises the powers of government, whether the same be absolute or limited. Wolff. Inst. Nat. § 994. In some kingdoms, the executive officer may be a woman, who is called a queen.

KINSBOTE (from kin, and bote, a composition). In Saxon Law. A composition for killing a kinsman. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Index, Bote.

KINSMAN. A man of the same race or family; one related by blood. Webster.

KIRBY'S QUEST. An ancient record remaining with the remembrancer of the English exchequer; so called from being the inquest of John de Kirby, treasurer to Edward I.

KISSING THE BOOK. A ceremony used in taking the corporal oath, the object being, as the canonists say, to denote the assent of the witness to the oath in the form it is imposed. The witness kisses either the whole Bible, or some portion of it; or a cross in some countries. See the ceremony explained in Oughton's Ordo. tit. lxxx.; Consitt. on Courts, part 3, sect. 1, § 3; Junkin, Oath 173, 180; 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 234. In Pennsylvania, by act of 1895, the witness places his right hand on the Bible, but does not kiss it.

KLEPTOMANIA. Insanity in the form of an irresistible propensity to steal. Wharton. See 10 Tex. Cr. App. 520. A form of insanity which is said to manifest itself by a propensity to acts of theft; Tayl. Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 766. It is said to be often shown in cases of women, laboring under their peculiar diseases or of those far advanced in pregnancy. There have been instances of well-educated persons who have taken articles of no value and without apparent motive. If it appears that the accused was incompetent to know that the act was wrong, the facts may establish a plea of insanity; id., quoting Tindal, C. J.

A sharp distinction is made between kleptomania and the tendency to steal so commonly observed in the well defined forms of insanity; the former is a defective mental characteristic approaching the confines of insanity on one subject alone, while the individual, on all other subjects, is perfectly sane. It differs from shoplifting in that the shoplifter steals for a purpose, and only those articles which are of value, while the kleptomaniac takes goods of any description, often of no use to herself and with no motive for their possession; 4 Am. Lawy. 533.

In determining the responsibility of such persons for their acts, the principal subjects to be considered are the absence of any real motive, the knowledge of previous acts of a similar character, the history of hereditary taint, and the presence of a neurotic condition; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 279.

Kleptomania is regarded as similar to homicidal insanity; 18 Tex. App. 287; 10 id. 520; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 388; and it has been held a valid defence; 18 Tex. App. 287; but when it was rejected as a defence, the court would not disturb the verdict; 9 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 164.

As to irresistible impulse as a defence in criminal cases, see INSANITY.

In an English case, tried in 1875, a clergyman charged with stealing, had taken goods when the shopkeeper's back was turned and concealed them in his pocket. He at first denied taking them, then offered to pay for them, and then attempted to leave. At the trial there was medical evidence that he had suffered from brain disease, and had been quite deranged at times. The opinion of medical experts was that the accused did not know the nature or quality of the act he had committed, at the time he had committed it, and he was acquitted. Tayl. Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 767.

KNAVE. A false, dishonest, or deceitful person. This signification of the word has arisen by a long perversion of its original meaning, which was merely servant or attendant.

To call a man a knave has been held to be actionable; 1 Rolle, Abr. 52; 1 Freem. 277; 5 Pick. 244.

KNAVESHIP. In Scotch Law. A certain quantity of grain or meal to which the servant of the mill was entitled as of right. See SEQUEL.

KNEEL. To bend the knees in worship without resting on them is to kneel. 36 L. J. Ecc. 10.

KNIGHT. In English Law. The next personal dignity after the nobility.

In the administration of royal justice, much of the work was formerly done by the knights; as for the more solemn, ancient, and decisive processes. To swear to a question of possession, free and lawful men were required, but to give the final and conclusive verdict about a matter of right, knights were necessary. In administrative law, therefore, knights were liable to special burdens, but in no other respect did he differ from the mere free man; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 394. Of knights there are several orders and degrees. The first in rank are knights of the Garter, instituted by Edward III. in 1344; next follows, a knight banneret; then come knights of the Bath instituted by Henry IV., and revived by George I.; and they were so called from a custom of bathing the night before their creation. The last order are knights bachelors, who, though the lowest, are yet the most ancient, order of knighthood; for we find that King Alfred conferred this order upon his son Athelstan. 1 Bla. Com. 403. These are sometimes called knights of the chamber, being such as are made in time of peace, and so called because knighted in the king's chamber, and not in the field. Co. 2d Inst. 666. Knights were called equites, because they always served on horseback; aurati, from the gilt spurs they wore; and milites, because they formed the royal army, in virtue of their feudal tenures.

KNIGHT-MARSHAL. See MARSHALSEA.

KNIGHT'S FEE was anciently so much of an inheritance in land as was sufficient to maintain a knight; and every man possessed of such an estate was obliged to be knighted, and attend the king in his wars, or pay a pecuniary sum in lieu thereof, called escuage. In the time of Henry II. the estate was estimated at twenty pounds a year; but Lord Coke, in his time, states it to be an estate of six hundred and eighty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. 232.

KNIGHT'S SERVICE. Upon the Norman conquest, all the lands in England were divided into knight's fees, in number above sixty thousand; and for every knight's fee, a knight was bound to attend the king in his wars forty days in a year, in which space of time a campaign was generally finished. If a man only held half a knight's fee, he was only bound to attend twenty days; and so in proportion. But this personal service, in process of time, grew into pecuniary commutations, or aids; until at last, with the military part of the feudal system, it was abolished at the restoration, by the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24. 1 Bla. Com. 410; 2 id. 62; Will. Real Pr. 144; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 230.

KNOCKED DOWN. A phrase used with reference to an auction, when the auctioneer by the fall of his hammer, or by any other audible or visible announcement, signifies to the bidder that he is entitled to the property on paying the amount of his bid, according to the terms of the sale. 7 Hill 439.

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS. See PRESENTS.

KNOW. To have knowledge; to possess information, instruction, or wisdom. 106 Mo. 135.

"It may fairly be assumed that one who has reason to believe a fact exists, knows it exists. Certainly if he be a reasonable being." Strong, J., in 101 U. S. 557.

KNOWINGLY. In a statute imposing a penalty upon any one who shall knowingly sell, supply, etc., actual personal knowledge. 4 Lans. 17. In an indictment, a charge that one wilfully testified falsely, includes the assertion that he knowingly so testified; 51 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 474. The word "knowingly," or "well knowing," will supply the place of a positive averment, in an indictment or declaration, that the defendant knew the facts subsequently stated; if notice or knowledge be unnecessarily stated, the allegation may be rejected as surplusage. See Comyns, Dig. Indictment (G 6); 2 Cush. 577; 2 Stra. 904; 2 East 452; 1 Chitty, Pl. 367.

KNOWLEDGE. Information as to a fact.

The act of knowing: clear perception of the truth; firm belief; information. Knowledge "is not confined to what we have personally observed or to what we have evolved by our own cognitive faculties." 106 Mo. 135. Where in a charge in a homicide case the court used the expression "knowledge to explain," circumstances proven "tending to show that the defendant was connected with the homicide," it was held to be synonymous with "ability to explain"; 28 Fla. 511.

"Knowledge is information and information knowledge." 1 Heming, 1; 5 Esp. 58.

"Absolute knowledge can be had of but few things." 8 Allen, 35.

"In a legal sense it may be classified as positive and imputed—imputed, when the means of knowledge exist, known and accessible to the party, and capable of communicating positive information. When there is knowledge, notice, as legally and technically understood, becomes immaterial. It is only material when, in the absence of knowledge, it produces the same results. However closely actual notice may, in many instances, approximate knowledge and constructive notice may be its equivalent in effect, there may be actual notice without knowledge; and when constructive notice is made the test to determine priorities of right, it may fall far short of knowledge and be sufficient." 81 Ala. 145.

Many acts are perfectly innocent when the party performing them is not aware of certain circumstances attending them; for example, a man may pass a counterfeit note, and be guiltless, if he did not know it was so; he may receive stolen goods, if he were not aware of the fact that they were stolen. In these and the like cases it is the guilty knowledge which makes the crime.

Such guilty knowledge is made by the statute a constituent part of the offence; and therefore it must be averred and proved as such. But it is in general true, and may be considered as a rule almost necessary to the restraint and punishment of crimes, that when a man does that which by the common law or by statute is unlawful, and in pursuing his criminal purpose does that which constitutes another and different offence, he shall be held responsible for all the legal consequences of such criminal act. When a man, without justifiable cause, intends to wound or maim another, and in doing it kills him, it is murder, though he had no intention to take life. It is true that in the commission of all crimes a guilty purpose, a criminal will and motive, are implied. But, in general, such bad motive or criminal will and purpose, that disposition of mind and heart which is designated by the generic and significant term "malice," is implied from the criminal act itself. But if a man does an act, which would be otherwise criminal, through mistake or accident, or by force or the compulsion of others, in which his own will and mind do not instigate him to the act or concur in it, it is matter of defence, to be averred and proved on his part, if it does not arise out of the circumstances of the case adduced on the part of the prosecution. Per Shaw, C. J., in 2 Metc. Mass. 192. Thus, it is not necessary, in an indictment against an unmarried man for adultery with a married woman, to aver that he knew, at the time when the offence was committed, that she was a married woman; nor is it necessary to prove such knowledge at the trial; 2 Metc. Mass. 190. See, as to the proof of guilty knowledge, 1 B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 185-191. See INTENTION; IGNORANCE OF LAW. As to the doctrine of imputed knowledge, see NOTICE.

KNOWN HEIRS. In a statute relating to the sale of property of unknown heirs, it has been held to mean those persons who are known, and whose right to inherit, or the extent of whose right, to inherit, is dependent on the non-existence of other persons nearer or as near as the ancestor in the line of descent. 65 Hun 175.

L.

L. The twelfth letter of the alphabet. As a Roman numeral it stands for 50. In the English money the small l is the sign for pounds. It is also an abbreviation for liber (book), law, lord. L. 5. means Long Quinto, which is the designation of one of the parts of the Year Books.

LA CHAMBRE DES ESTEILLES. The Star chamber. See COURT OF STAR CHAMBER.

LABES REALIS, or VITIUM REALE, in the law of Scotland, is an inherent vice or defect in the title by which anything has been acquired, which affects even the rights of purchasers and creditors who have obtained it innocently. Bell; Moz. & W.

LABEL. A slip of ribbon, parchment, or paper, attached to a deed or other writing to hold the appended seal.

In the ordinary use of the word, it is a slip of paper attached to articles of manufacture for the purpose of describing them or specifying their quality, etc., or the name of the maker. The use of a label has been distinguished from a trade-mark proper; Browne, Trade-Marks §§ 133, 537, 538. The use of labels will be protected by a court of equity under some circumstances; id. 538. See TRADE-MARK; INFRINGEMENT; UNION LABEL LAWS.

A copy of a writ in the English Exchequer. Tidd, Pr. *156.

LABOR. Work requiring exertion or effort, either physical or mental; toil.

Labor and business are not synonymous; labor may be business, but it is not necessarily so, and business is not always labor. Making an agreement for the sale of a chattel is not within a prohibition of common labor on a Sunday, though it is (if by a merchant in his calling) within a prohibition against business; 2 Ohio St. 387. See SUNDAY.

The labor and skill of one man are frequently used in a partnership, and valued as equal to the capital of another.

The act of February 26, 1885, forbids any person or corporation to prepay transportation or in any way assist or encourage the importation of aliens into the United States, under contract of any kind made previous to their importation, to perform labor or service therein; such contracts are declared void. The penalty is $1,000, which may be sued for by the United States or any person (including the alien) who may first bring his action therefor, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the circuit court, the proceeds to go to the treasury. The district attorney is required to prosecute the suit at the expense of the United States. Masters of vessels knowingly infringing the act are made liable to fine and imprisonment. The act does not extend to foreigners temporarily resident here who may employ servants or clerks; nor to skilled workmen imported to carry on some new industry not at present established, if such cannot be obtained here; nor to actors, artists, lecturers, or singers, nor to strictly domestic servants; nor to persons who may assist relations or friends to emigrate here. The amendment of Feb. 23, 1887, provides for the detention and return of such aliens.

The act is a constitutional exercise of the power to regulate commerce; 28 Fed. Rep. 795; it was passed to protect the health, morals, and safety of the people of this country; 5 U. S. App. 656. It must appear that the alien did in fact emigrate, and that the person who assisted him knew that he was under contract; 41 Fed. Rep. 751; there must have been a contract made previous to the importation, to perform labor here; 13 U. S. App. 472. Where an alien writes to a resident proposing to come here and enter the service of the resident and the latter accepts the offer and pays his passage, it is not within the act; 4 U. S. App. 41. A laborer on a dairy farm is not a domestic servant; 32 Fed. Rep. 75; a milliner is not a professional artist; 41 Fed. Rep. 28; a clergyman brought to this country under contract to take charge of a church as a rector is not within the act; 143 U. S. 457. One is not liable to deportation as a laborer who at the time of the passage of the act requiring alien laborers to register was a merchant and who subsequently became a laborer on a fruit farm which he leased; 71 Fed. Rep. 680: nor is a chemist on a sugar plantation, though his expenses are paid; 163 U. S. 258.

A clause in the constitution of California forbidding the employment by a corporation of any Chinese or Mongolian has been held in conflict with the treaty of the United States with China and void; 1 Fed. Rep. 481; so in New York a statute forbidding a contractor on public work to employ an alien was held a violation of the treaty with Italy and unconstitutional; 34 N. Y. Suppl. 942. See ALIEN; CITIZEN. As to new industries, see 53 Fed. Rep. 554, where the court, in charging the jury, held that the manufacture of lace, in which two or three concerns were "struggling for existence, experimenting, hoping," was a new industry, within the meaning of the act, and that it was a question of law for the court, and directed an acquittal. See LABORER; MASTER AND SERVANT; WAGES.

LABOR ARBITRATION. The investigation and determination of disputed matters between employers and employes.

In many of the states, state boards of arbitration have been provided by statute for the hearing and adjustment of differences between employers and their employes, and a recent federal statute applying only to railroad and transportation companies authorizes the executive to appoint commissioners for such investigation and to determine the best methods of righting the grievances of the employes; U. S. Laws, 1888, ch. 1063.

In Missouri, Colorado, and North Dakota the functions of the state board of arbitration are filled by the labor commissioner, and in New York, Ohio, New Jersey, California, Maryland, Texas, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and Montana, there are statutory provisions for private boards of arbitration. The constitution of Wyoming provides that appeals from the decisions of compulsory boards of arbitration may be taken to the supreme court of the state, and the manner of taking such appeals must be prescribed by law; Const. Wyo. ch. 19, sec. 2.

Objections to bringing labor troubles before the state board of arbitration must be urged before such board before application to the courts; 47 La. Ann. 874; and it devolves on the board in the first instance to pass on questions of regularity and compliance with statutory provisions in the steps taken to bring the matter to its notice; id. See Stimson, Lab. L. §§ 67, 68.

It is a curious fact that during the struggle in this country to devise some effective system of labor arbitration, little or no attention seems to have been paid to some very successful efforts in that direction in England which long antedated any American legislation. At a very early period the regulation of wages was controlled by two masters and two journeymen, or, in default of agreement, by a magistrate after hearing both sides, but this was terminated by the separation of the masters and journeymen into two classes, and thereafter wages were fixed either by the employers or the magistrates. The latter system prevailed under the apprenticeship law of Elizabeth, and this continued until early in the eighteenth century, except in the cotton factories, which were not within the law. In this industry, there was satisfactory regulation by a joint committee of laborers and employers, but towards the latter end of the eighteenth century, the latter obtained general control and the apprentice law was repealed. From then until about 1860, this condition remained undisturbed except by frequent petitions to parliament, although in the book printing business the trades unions secured an arrangement for settling price lists by a joint committee of employers and laborers, which was in operation with good success since 1805.

In 1860 the system of arbitration and agreement originated by a manufacturer, Mr. Mundella, successfully dealt with the labor problem in the various branches of trade involved in the stocking weaving and glove industries of the three counties of Nottingham, Leicestershire, and Derbyshire. The system, in brief, provided for a court of arbitration and agreement to decide every question relative to wages. It consisted of nine employers and nine laborers, selected respectively by an assembly of their own class for one year. The court had a regular organization with a standing executive committee by which all disputes were disposed of so far as practicable, the final judgment, however, being entered by the court. The two interests involved negotiated with each other on perfect equality and the decisions were binding. Under this system, there was no umpire and no provision for the execution of the judgment, the reliance being entirely upon the moral force of the statute, conscience, and the pressure of public opinion. The practical working of these courts was very successful and, quoting Mr. Mundella, July 4, 1868, "during eight years we had not a single strike, and never in the history of our city and our industry did there exist such a hearty good understanding between employers and laborers as now." The rules may be found in detail in chap. 18 of The Relation of Labor to the Law of To-day, by Brentano, translated by Porter Sherman, from which the historical facts here stated are mainly taken.

Another system of courts of arbitration and agreement was that of Rupert Kettle, a judge of the county court of Worcestershire; the statutes drawn by him were adopted by the employers and laborers in the building trades in Wolverhampton. They were in their main features similar to the Mundella courts, but differed from the latter in the fundamental point of providing an impartial umpire, and through legal provisions, the judgments were made binding in law. These provisions, however, were but seldom required in practice, as the presence of an impartial umpire had a tendency to produce an agreement without calling upon him; id. The result of the actual working of these two systems for many years is that they have approached each other, in that those of Kettle have become mere courts of agreement and those of Mundella have in most cases elected an impartial umpire who decides in case of a tie. The relation between the trades unions and the courts of arbitration in many districts has become very intimate, the former making provision in their organization for the labor representation in the latter, paying the laborer's share of the expenses of the courts and enforcing the judgments by expelling members who do not obey them. The courts are similarly supported by societies of employers; id.

The work cited sums up the result:—"And from those industries at Nottingham and Wolverhampton since that time the organization of peace has extended from industry to industry and from city to city, until the system has been adopted in a greater or less degree in the most important centres of British industry. But everywhere, where in an industry a court of arbitration according to one or the other of the two systems has been established, there has been since that time neither a strike nor a lockout."

LABOR A JURY. To tamper with a jury; to persuade jurymen not to appear. It seems to come from the meaning of labor, to prosecute with energy, to urge: as to labor a point. Dy. 48; Hob. 294; Co. Litt. 157 b; 14 & 20 Hen. VII. 30, 11. The first lawyer that came from England to practise in Boston was sent back for laboring a jury. Washb. Jud. Hist.

LABOR UNION. A combination or association of laborers for the purpose of fixing the rate of their wages and hours of work, for their mutual benefit and protection, and for the purpose of righting grievances against their employers.

In England when the rate of wages was fixed by law or by the determination of a magistrate, and when there was a statutory provision that all conspiracies and covenants among workmen not to make or do their work except at a certain rate or price, it was held a criminal conspiracy for a combination of workmen to refuse to work for so much per diem, though the matter about which they conspired might be lawful for one of them or for any of them to do had they not conspired to do it; 8 Mod. 11; but in the United States, though this decision was followed in the case of the Boot and Shoemakers of Philadelphia; Pamphlet 1806; The Pittsburg Cordwainers; Pamphlet, 1816; and in 14 Wend. 9, and 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 262; yet they were decided by inferior courts, and in the first case before the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Com. v. Carlisle) that court held that a combination of employers to reduce the wages of their employes was not unlawful; Bright. 36. In the case of the Master Stevedores v. Walsh, Daly, J., upheld this principle and denied the authority of the English case; 2 Daly 1; as did Shaw, J., in 4 Metc. 111; and these cases may be considered as having definitely settled the law in this country that a combination of laborers for a lawful purpose does not amount to a conspiracy.

In England, however, the Journeymen Tailors case, 8 Mod. 11, was followed as late as 1855, when it was held that a bond signed by eighteen employers to conduct their business as to rates of wages, time of work, etc., was a combination in restraint of trade and null and void at common law; 6 El. & Bl. 47; and in 1869 the court was divided as to whether a labor union whose by-laws countenanced strikes was not thereby rendered illegal; L. R. 4 Q. B. 602. In 1824 the first act was passed in England which legalized the combination of workmen; 5 Geo. IV. c. 99; but this was repealed the following year, and by the repealing act the combination of workmen was made lawful for the purpose of agreeing upon the prices which they might demand and the hours during which they would work, but making punishable any attempt to enforce the laws of the combining workmen by violence and intimidation; 6 Geo. IV. c. 129. In 1871 two acts were passed for the purpose of consolidating and settling the law; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 31; and these were supplemented by the Trades Union Amendment Act of 1876; these statutes going so far as to declare such combinations lawful even when acting (peaceably) in restraint of trade.

The right of entering and leaving the service of an employer is one that every man possesses and is one of the corollaries of personal liberty, and it has almost uniformly been held that the same right might be exercised by any number of men jointly, if conducted in a peaceable and orderly manner and attended with no infringement of the rights of others; 23 Fed. Rep. 748; 106 Mass. 1; 54 Minn. 223; 2 Daly 1; 38 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 547; contra, 32 N. J. L. 151; and labor unions have been recognized by act of congress authorizing their incorporation; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Suppl. 498; and by the statutes of most of the states. It has been held that such unions have an entire right to seek to compel employers to deal solely with men belonging to their union by all proper means, as by persuasion or even by a properly conducted strike; 60 How. Pr. 163; that if the means are not unlawful, they have a right to endeavor to persuade those who have been accustomed to deal with an employer to withdraw their trade; 77 Hun 215; that they may agree not to teach their trade to others; 113 Mass. 179; and that where the combination is peaceable and without intimidation, employes may peacefully assemble to argue and persuade concerning a reduction of wages with the expectation of a strike, and the employes will not be charged with any loss resulting from their quitting work; 24 U. S. App. 240; and they may lawfully pay the expenses of those who leave their employment and may post in their places of assembly the names of those who have contributed to the fund for the support of the workmen who have left; 17 N. Y. S. 264.

But other cases have held differently: A labor union may not prevent an employer from employing certain workmen; 59 Vt. 273; or from obtaining workmen; 54 Fed. Rep. 40; or prevent workmen from obtaining work; 5 Cox, C. C. 162; 110 N. Y. 633; or threaten a boycott; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 881; 55 Conn. 46; 45 Fed. Rep. 135; 3 R. & Corp. L. J. 561; or carry out a boycott; 62 Fed. Rep. 803; 147 Mass. 212; or strike with the intention of forcing others to join the union; 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 730; or picket the premises of an employer during a strike with the usual accompaniments of insulting and threatening words and gestures to those who work for him; 10 Cox, C. C. 592; 84 L. T. N. S. 58; 152 Pa. 595; [1896] 1 Ch. 811; but the illegality of the action and the irreparable nature of the injury must be clearly alleged; 144 N. Y. 189; 26 Ore. 527. Leaders of a labor union who receive money from an employer for ending a boycott are guilty of extortion; 133 N. Y. 649; 137 id. 29; and it has been held unlawful for an officer of a labor union to order the members thereof not to work for an employer; [1893] 1 Q. B. 715 (but in this case the officer was supplying the employer with goods, and his action was for the purpose of forcing his customer to refrain from acts which he had a right to do, and the action of the officer was held induced for malice); or for a delegate (requested by some of the members of the union) to induce an employer to discharge workmen; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21. If, by threats and intimidation, a labor union drives away the customers of an employer and destroys his trade, it thereby injures him by an unlawful act and is liable for damages to him whether the action was malicious or not; 13 Tenn. 521; and if such union compels a non-union man to leave his employment and prevents him from securing another situation, it is civilly liable for damages to him; 77 Md. 396.

An officer of a labor union may be enjoined from ordering the members to carry out one of the rules of the union; 54 Fed. Rep. 730; and equity may compel a labor union to recall an order to its members; id.

A district delegate appointed by the members of a labor union to confer with and advise them in disputes is not the servant or agent of the officers or of the members of the union; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21; and the chairman and secretary of a labor union will not be liable for the action of the district delegate in causing non-union men to be discharged from employment, or for threats of calling upon all union men to strike; id.

In a recent English case a trades-union district delegate notified a corporation that if it did not discharge certain of its employes, certain other employes would strike; the former were thereupon discharged and sued the district delegate. The jury found for the plaintiffs and also that the defendant maliciously induced the company to discharge the plaintiffs. Judgment thereon was affirmed by the court of appeals, but was reversed by the house of lords, by a majority of six to three; it was held that malice does not constitute a cause of action in such a case, unless there is some act of actual unlawfulness; and that the gist of this action is procuring a breach of contract, which was not present in this case; Allen v. Flood, 42 Sol. Journ. 108 (Dec. 18, 1897). Few legal decisions have been awaited with more interest than this one. Sir Frederick Pollock says of it: "The House of Lords never deserved better of the Common Law;" 14 Law Quart. Rev. 1. And another English law journal says that the decision "is accepted by the profession as sound. . . . In spite of numbers, the weight of judicial opinion is preponderatingly in favor of the law as now stated. The two ablest judges in courts of first instance agreed with the four greatest lawyers in the House of Lords—perhaps we should say of our generation. This is enough. It is curious that politics took sides—perhaps involuntarily; and it is also curious that trades unionism should have to be thankful that there is a House of Lords." 104 Law Times 143 (Dec. 18, 1897).

Under recent acts of congress (the Interstate Commerce Act and the Anti-trust Act of 1887 and 1890 respectively), a labor union may be guilty of criminal conspiracy or forming a combination in restraint of trade if their actions tend to obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, though they consist in merely quitting the service of an employer or preventing others from working for him; 54 Fed. Rep. 994; 55 id. 149; 62 id. 801, 824; 64 id. 27; or in delaying a train carrying the mails; 65 id. 210; 67 id. 698; 62 id. 834, 840; and equity will interfere to compel striking railroad employes to perform their duties "so long as they remain in the employment of the company;" 62 Fed. Rep. 796. That a labor union was in its origin lawful was held no ground of defence; 54 id. 994. But in the circuit court for the District of Massachusetts, it was held that it is not sufficient for an indictment to allege a purpose to drive certain competitors out of the field; it must show a conspiracy in restraint of trade by engrossing or monopolizing the market: 55 id. 605; but see 62 id. 801, where the former case was expressly disapproved.

Where the action of a labor union becomes a criminal conspiracy, the remedy is by injunction; and the equitable jurisdiction to prevent conspiracies by combinations of organized labor is justified upon the ground that, though equity will not interfere to prevent the commission of a crime, as such, yet where the acts complained of amount to an infringement of a property right, the court may act; 3 De G. F. & J. 232; or to a nuisance; 147 Mass. 212; or to a boycott; 45 Fed. Rep. 130; or to an intimidation; 51 Fed. Rep. 260. One apprehending injury from such a combination may bring a bill against one or more persons, and obtain at once without waiting for any hearing, or answer by the defendant, a preliminary injunction against not only the defendants named, but all other agents, servants, and subordinates named or unnamed; and, finally, against any person whatever who may have knowledge that such injunction has been granted; 64 Fed. Rep. 320. A disregard of such an injunction amounts to a contempt and subjects the offender to fine and imprisonment, and such offender is not entitled to a jury trial; 58 N. H. 60; 93 Ind. 239; 134 U. S. 31; and from an order in contempt there is no appeal from the court issuing it to a higher court; 71 Wis. 64; although it has been held in some jurisdictions that there may be an appeal where the injunction was issued to protect private interests and not the public; 13 Stew. (N. J.) 672; but even this appeal only goes so far as to give the appellate court the right to investigate and see whether the court below had jurisdiction of the subject-matter; 82 Mich. 75. The person in contempt may, in some jurisdictions, take the matter up by writ of certiorari; 34 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 39; he may not have a writ of habeas corpus; 158 U. S. 564; 64 Fed. Rep. 724. Jurisdiction was expressly conferred upon the United States circuit court by the Anti-Trust Act of 1890.

A receiver appointed to take charge of property is an officer of the court; any interference with his possession is an interference with the possession of the court and is a contempt, so that a strike by a labor union which tends to interfere with the traffic of a railroad in the hands of a receiver is a contempt; 23 Fed. Rep. 544, 748; 24 id. 217; and it was further held that while the employes of receivers may freely quit their employment, they cannot do it in such a way as intentionally to disable the property, nor can they combine nor conspire to quit without notice, with the object and intent of crippling the property and its operation; 27 Fed. Rep. 443, where the object of the strike was to compel recognition of a secret labor organization and the right of its officers to control the operations of a railroad, the officers being not even employes; Pardee, J., said: "This intolerable conduct goes beyond criminal contempt of court into the domain of felonious crimes."

Statutes pronouncing a penalty against an employer for discharging an employe for being a member of a labor union have been passed in Massachusetts, 1892; California, Illinois, Indiana, Idaho, Missouri, and New York, 1893; Ohio and New Jersey, 1894; Wisconsin, 1895; Kansas and Pennsylvania, 1897; England, 1874; and they have been held constitutional; 30 Wkly. L. Bul. 342; but contra in Missouri on the grounds that such statutes are in contravention of the fifth and of the fourteenth amendments to the constitution of the United States and of the state constitution which provide that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and also because it is special legislation in that it does not relate to persons and things as a class—to all workmen, etc.—but only to those who belong to some lawful organization or society, evidently referring to a labor union; and the court said further: "It has none of the elements or attributes which pertain to a police regulation, for it does not in terms or by implication promote or tend to promote the public health, welfare, comfort, or safety, and if it did the state would not be allowed, under the guise and pretence of the police regulation, to encroach or trample upon any of the first rights of the citizen which the constitution intended to secure against diminution or abridgment." 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 781.

Under statutes giving a preference to laborers, servants, and employes against insolvent corporations, the word laborer is defined to include all persons doing labor or service of whatever character for or as employes in the regular employ of such corporation; N. A superintendent of a natural gas company is a laborer under the act preferring claims of laborers; 124 Ind. 159; an assistant bookkeeper; 52 Hun 151; a head miller; 83 Mich. 513; a drayman and the services of his horses; 30 N. LABORERS, STATUTES OF. 1. Stat. 23 Edw. III. passed in 1349 by the king in council. After reciting in the preamble that many of the operative class had died of the plague, and the survivors seeing the necessity to which the masters were reduced for want of servants, refused to work unless for excessive wages, it was enacted that all able-bodied persons (free or bond) under the age of three-score years, not exercising any craft, nor having the means of living or land of his own, should if required to serve in a station suiting his condition be bound to serve for the wages usual in the 20th year of the king under penalty of imprisonment. It was also provided that victuals should be sold at reasonable rates, and that no person should give to a beggar who was able to work and preferred to live in idleness, under pain of imprisonment. This statute was partially repealed by stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4; see infra; and finally repealed by stat. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125, passed in 1863. 2. Stat. 12 Rich. 2, which was passed at Cambridge in 1388, forbidding a servant at the end of his term to go out of his district without a letter under the king's seal, on pain of being put in the stocks. The amount of wages was regulated and penalties inflicted on masters who gave more than the legal amount. There was also provision for the punishment of beggars except religious people and approved hermits, who had testimonial letters from their ordinaries. 3. Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4, passed 1562, repealing most of the before mentioned statutes, and regulating workmen and apprentices. The justices of the peace were required to hold special sessions for fixing rates of wages, and a justice absenting himself without any lawful excuse was to be fined £10. For giving more wages than the legal amount masters were to be imprisoned for ten days and to forfeit £5. This statute was substantially repealed by subsequent ones; Moz. & W. See FACTORY ACTS.

LAC or LAKH. One hundred thousand. It is used in India, as—a lac of rupees is 100,000 rupees, or about £10,000 or $50,000; Wils. Glos. Ind.; Moz. & W.

LACHES (Fr. lacher). Unreasonable delay; neglect to do a thing or to seek to enforce a right at a proper time.

The neglect to do that which by law a man is obliged or in duty bound to do. 30 Fla. 612.

The neglect to do what in law should have been done, for an unreasonable and unexplained length of time and under circumstances permitting diligence. 21 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 277.

Unlike a limitation, it is not a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced; an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relation of the property of the parties; 10 U. S. App. 227; 145 U. S. 368. It has been said to involve the idea of negligence; the neglect or failure to do what ought to have been done under the circumstances to protect the rights of the parties to whom it is imputed, or involving injury to the opposite party through such neglect to assert rights within a reasonable time; 88 Mich. 177.

Courts of equity withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time, and the mere fact that suit was brought within a reasonable time does not prevent the application of the doctrine of laches when there is a want of diligence in the prosecution; 5 Col. App. 391; 155 U. S. 449; 160 id. 171. The question of laches depends not upon the fact that a certain definite time has elapsed since the cause of action accrued, but upon whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff is chargeable with want of due diligence in not instituting the proceedings sooner; 160 U. S. 171; it is not measured by the statute of limitations; 155 U. S. 449; but depends upon the circumstances of the particular case; 141 U. S. 260. Where injustice would be done in the particular case by granting the relief asked, equity may refuse it and leave the party to his remedy at law; 158 U. S. 41; or where laches is excessive and unexplained; 34 U. S. App. 50. In the absence of negligence by the plaintiff, in the prosecution of his claim, no period short of the legal statute of limitations will bar an action on an equitable claim; 28 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 238; and see 78 Fed. Rep. 155, where it was held that "mere delay, for the full period of four years allowed by a state statute of limitations, in bringing a suit in rem to recover damages to a cargo, is not of itself, and in the absence of exceptional circumstances from which laches would be imputable, sufficient to justify the court in declining to entertain the suit;" but where the complainant has remained silent for a longer time, after the discovery of the material facts than the time limited by the statute of limitations, it is laches; 12 U. S. App. 137. Where a statute provides that no claim is barred until the limitation of the statute has accrued, a complainant cannot be denied relief because the action lacks but a few days of being barred by limitation, on the ground of gross laches; 19 So. Rep. (Miss.) 707. Where an equitable right of action is analogous to a legal right of action, and there is a statute of limitations fixing a limit of time for bringing an action at law to enforce such claims, a court of equity will, by analogy, apply the same limit of time to proceedings taken to enforce the equitable right; L. R. 6 H. L. 384. One in possession of land may wait until his title and possession are attacked before setting up equitable demands, without being chargeable with laches; 71 Fed. Rep. 618; as where an unauthorized franchise in a street is given, adjoining property owners are not required to attack the validity of the franchise until their rights are actually invaded; 2 U. S. App. 488. Mere lapse of time not sufficient to bar the corresponding legal remedy will not constitute laches barring a suit, there having been no change in the condition or relation of the property or parties which renders the enforcement of the claim inequitable; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 154.

Laches in seeking to enforce a right will, in many cases in equity, prejudice such right, for equity does not encourage stale claims nor give relief to those who sleep upon their rights; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 472; 9 Pet. 405; 91 U. S. 512; 124 id. 183; 130 id. 43; 142 id. 236; 150 id. 193; 1 App. D. C. 36; 157 Mass. 46; this doctrine is based upon the grounds of public policy which requires for the peace of society, the discouragement of stale claims; 137 U. S. 556. The question whether one is precluded from equitable relief by the staleness of his demand is for the court and not for the jury; 27 Ore. 219.

It has been held to be inexcusable for 36 years; 16 U. S. App. 391; 27 years, unexplained · 145 U. S. 317; 23 years; 146 U. S. 102; 22 years during which the defendant company spent much labor and money in improvements; 161 U. S. 573; 22 years after knowledge of the facts; 152 U. S. 412; 19 years, on a bill to establish a trust; 7 U. S. App. 481; 14 years, in the assertion of title to lands which meantime had been sold to settlers; 4 U. S. App. 160; 10 years, in proceedings to enforce a trust in lands; 158 U. S. 416; 10 years, after the foreclosure and sale of a railroad in a bill by a stockholder to set aside the sale for collusion and fraud which were patent on the face of the proceedings; 146 U. S. 88; 9 years in a suit to have a deed declared a mortgage on the ground that it was obtained by taking advantage of the grantor's destitute condition; 7 U. S. App. 233; 8 years' acquiescence in a trade-mark for metallic paint, during which the defendant had built up an extended market for his product; 17 U. S. App. 145; 8 years in proceedings where complainant in consideration of $10,000 had released certain claims and sought to set the release aside on the ground that it was entitled to a much larger sum than it received; 159 U. S. 243; 3 years, where a person bought property of uncertain value and after three years brought suit to rescind the contract on the ground of fraudulent representation; 31 U. S. App. 102.

To constitute laches to bar a suit there must be knowledge, actual or imputable, of the facts which should have prompted action or, if there were ignorance, it must be without just excuse; 38 Minn. 197; see 173 Pa. 1; 148 U. S. 360; but where there is ignorance of the party's right, laches may be excused; 2 Mer. 362; 2 Ball & B. 104; 48 Fed. Rep. 35; 66 id. 834; 146 U. S. 88; 152 id. 412; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 253. Evidence that complainant had arranged to dispose of land bequeathed to her, is evidence that she knew of the existence of a will, and a delay of twenty years in bringing an action to set aside its probate is laches; 68 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 139. Defence of laches on the ground that one might by inquiry have learned the facts relied on and filed his bill accordingly, is not available to one who is under obligation to disclose such facts without inquiry; 62 Fed. Rep. 869.

One who seeks to impeach a transaction on the ground of fraud must seek redress promptly; 173 Pa. 1; 2 Del. Ch. 247; 58 Fed. Rep. 460; 180 Pa. 529; 169 id. 359. Mere lapse of time will sometimes render a fraudulent transaction unimpeachable; 9 Pet. 405; 83 Va. 451; 37 W. Va. 215; 142 Ill. 409; 153 id. 293; but when the fraud is secret and suit is begun within a reasonable time after its discovery, laches is not a defence; 37 U. S. App. 61. Laches was held not imputable to a delay of more than ten years in filing a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance; 62 Ill. App. 193. See 61 Ark. 527. It is not so much the duty of a suitor in equity to be diligent in discovering his rights as to be prompt in asserting them after they become known; 27 U. S. App. 594; and a delay of eleven months in asking for the reformation of a mortgage on the ground of mutual mistakes was held not such laches as to bar the right of a subsequent mortgagee with knowledge of the mistake; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 259. Laches in assailing a fraud will not be imputed until the discovery of the fraud by the party affected thereby; 34 Fla. 149; and it has been held that delay will not defeat the right to relief in case of fraud, unless the fraud is known or ought by due diligence to have been known; 22 U. S. App. 12. Ignorance of facts complained of as fraud has been held no excuse for laches when the facts were evidenced by public records accessible to all, unless some affirmative act of deception be shown or some misleading device intended to prevent inquiry and exclude suspicion; 71 Fed. Rep. 7.

Laches may also be excused from the obscurity of the transaction; 2 Sch. & L. 487; see 93 Mich. 285; by the pendency of a suit; 1 Sch. & L. 413; and where the party labors under a legal disability, as insanity; 2 Yerg. 193; infancy; 80 Ala. 402; 71 Mo. 358; 55 Ark. 85; 17 R. I. 519; or coverture; 55 Md. 277; 9 N. J. Eq. 572; 19 Ves. 640; poverty is no excuse for laches; 71 Fed. Rep. 21; 149 U. S. 287; nor are ignorance and absence from the country; 4 U. S. 642; and no laches can be imputed to the public; 4 Mass. 522; 143 id. 424; 3 S. & R. 291; 97 Ill. 91; 92 Ind. 107; 85 Ky. 198. Laches on the part of its officers cannot be imputed to the government and no period of delay on the part of the sovereign power will serve to bar its right either in a court of law or equity when it sees fit to enforce it for the public benefit; 9 Wheat. 720; 97 U. S. 584; 130 id. 263; 15 C. C. A. 117; 67 Fed. Rep. 969; but though not ordinarily a defence to a suit brought by the government, where such suit is brought solely to benefit a private individual or where the government sues to enforce a right of its own, growing out of some ordinary commercial transaction, it may be set up as a defence; 127 U. S. 338; 91 id. 389; 67 Fed. Rep. 975; 71 id. 250. It is not a rule of universal application that laches cannot be set up in defence of a suit to enforce a charitable trust; 71 Fed. Rep. 259. Laches of a testator will be imputed to his executor; 34 U. S. App. 50.

The defence of laches may be raised by a general demurrer; 82 Md. 459; 3 App. D. C. 219; 33 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 876; 157 Ill. 462; 160 id. 563; or by plea or answer, or presented by argument either upon a preliminary or final hearing; 37 U. S. App. 109. That the defence to laches must be made by answer and not by demurrer, see 147 N. Y. 241. Even though laches is not pleaded or the bill demurred to, courts of equity may withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time; 164 U. S. 502. See INJUNCTION.

LACTA. A lack of weight; deficiency in the weight of money. The verb lactare said to have been used in an assize of statute in the 6th year of King John. Spel. Gloss.

LACUS. In Old English Law. An alloy of silver with base metal. Fleta l. 22, § 6. In Civil Law. A lake, a receptacle for water which is never allowed to get dry. Dig. 43, 14, 1, 3.

LADA. A method of trial by purgation. In vogue among the Saxons by which a person was purged of an accusation, as of an oath or ordeal. Spel. Gloss.

In Old English Law. A lade or load. A water course, a trench or canal for draining marshy lands. Spel. Gloss.

A court of justice. A lade or lath. Cow.

LADEN IN BULK. In Maritime Law. Having the cargo loose in the hold, and not enclosed in boxes, bales, bags, or casks.

LADY. In England, the proper title of any woman whose husband is higher in rank than baronet or knight, or who is the daughter of a nobleman not lower than an earl, though the title is given by courtesy also to the wives of baronets and knights. Cent. Dict.

The word lady is derived from hloef dig (loaf day), which being applied to the mistress of a house came to be softened into the familiar term lady. On that day, it was the custom for the mistress of the manor to distribute bread to her poorer neighbors. Townsend, Manual of Dates, title Lady; 1 Chamb. Book of Days 154.

LADY-DAY. The 25th of March, the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. In parts of Ireland, however, they so designate the 15th of August, the festival of the Assumption of the Virgin.

Upon a parol demise, rent to take place from the following Lady day, evidence of the custom of the country is admissible to show that by Lady day the parties meant Old Lady Day; 4 B. & Ald. 588.

LADY'S FRIEND. Previous to the act of 1857, abolishing parliamentary divorces, a functionary in the British house of commons. When the husband sued for a divorce, or asked the passage of an act to divorce him from his wife, he was required to make a provision for her before the passage of the act; it was the duty of the lady's friend to see that such a provision was made. Macq. H. & W. 213.

LÆNLAND. Land held of a superior whether much or little. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 38.

Land given to the lessee and to two or three successive heirs of his; synonymous with loan land. This species of tenure seems to have been replaced by that of holding by book or bocland. See Maitl. Doomsday Book and Beyond 318. See FOLCLAND.

LÆSA MAJESTAS (Lat.). Lese-majesty, or injured majesty; high treason. It is a phrase taken from the civil law, and anciently meant any offence against the king's person or dignity, defined by 25 Edw. III. c. 6. See Glanv. lib. 5, c. 2; 4 Bla. Com. 75; Br. 118; CRIMEN LÆSÆ MAJESTATIS.

LÆSIO ENORMIS. The injury sustained by a party to an owner's contract who is overreached by the other to the extent of more than one-half the value of the thing sold. A rescript of Diocletian permitted a rescission of the sale by a vendor unless the purchaser agreed to the additional amount required to make up the value of the thing sold. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 69.

It was sometimes called læsio ultra dimidium. Colq. C. L. § 2094.

LÆSIONE FIDEI, SUITS PRO. Proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts for spiritual offences against conscience, for non-payment of debts, or breaches of civil contracts. This attempt to turn the ecclesiastical courts into courts of equity was checked by the Constitution of Clarendon, A. D. 1164, q. v., 3 Bla. Com. 52; Whart. Lex.

LAET. In Old English Law. One of a class between servile and free. 1 Palg. Rise & Prog. 334.

Of this class a very recent work says: "Thus degrees of servility are possible. A class may stand, as it were, half-way between the class of slaves and the class of free men. The Kentish law of the seventh century as it appears in the dooms of Æthelbert, like many of its continental sisters, knows a class of men who perhaps are not free men and yet are not slaves; it knows the laet as well as the theow. From what race the Kentish laet has sprung, and how, when it comes to details, the law will treat him—these are obscure questions, and the latter of them cannot be answered unless we apply to him what is written about the laeti, liti, and lidi of the continent. He is thus far a person that he has a small wergild but possibly he is bound to the soil. Only in Æthelbert's dooms do we read of him. From later days, until Domesday Book breaks the silence, we do not obtain any definite evidence of the existence of any class of men who are not slaves but none the less are tied to the land." Maitl. Domesd. 27. The laete were afterwards termed by the Normans buiri, burs or coliberti; id. 36. "His services, we are told, vary from place to place; in some districts he works for his lord two days a week and during harvest-time three days a week; he pays gafol in money, barley, sheep, and poultry; also he has ploughing to do besides his week-work; he pays hearth-penny; he and one of his fellows must between them feed a dog. It is usual to provide him with an outfit of two oxen, one cow, six sheep, and seed for seven acres of his yardland, and also to provide him with household stuff; on his death all these chattels go back to his lord. Thus the boor is put before us as a tenant with a house and a yardland or virgate, and two plough oxen. He will therefore play a more important part in the manorial economy than the cottager who has no beasts. But he is a very dependent person; his beasts, even the poor furniture of his house, his pots and crocks, are provided for him by his lord. Probably it is this that marks him off from the ordinary villanus or 'townsman' and brings him near the serf. In a sense he may be a free man." id. 37.

In an earlier work of the same author it is said: "Once and only once, in the earliest of our Anglo-Saxon text (Æthelb. 26), we find mention, under the name of laet, of the half-free class of persons called litus and other like names in continental documents. To all appearance there had ceased to be any such class before the time of Alfred: it is therefore needless to discuss their condition or origin." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 13.

LAGA. The Law.

The word was also extensively used to designate loss; observed in particular districts as Mercen lage, West Saxon lage, Dane lage.

LAGAN (Sax. liggan, cubare). See LIGAN.

LAIRWITE (from the Sax. legan, to lie together, and wite, a fine, etc.). A fine for the offence of adultery and fornication which the lords of some manors had the privilege of imposing on their tenants. Co. 4 Inst. 206; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47.

LAIS GENTS (O. Fr.). Secular people; laymen; a jury.

LAITY. Those persons who do not make a part of the clergy. They are divided into three states: 1. Civil, including all the nation, except the clergy, the army, and navy, and subdivided into the nobility and the commonalty. 2. Military. 3. Maritime, consisting of the navy. Whart. Lex. In the United States the division of the people into clergy and laity is not authorized by law, but is merely conventional.

LAIZ, LEEZ (O. Fr.). A legate. Kelh.

LAKE. A body of water surrounded by land, or not forming part of the ocean, and occupying a depression below the ordinary drainage level of the religion. Cent. Dict.

The fact that there is a current from a higher to a lower level does not make that a river which would otherwise be a lake; and the fact that a river swells out in broad pond-like sheets with a current does not make that a lake which would otherwise be a river; 14 N. H. 477.

The earlier decisions of the courts in this country tended to support the doctrine that no riparian owner could acquire title to the bed of any lake however small; 7 Allen 158; 13 Pick. 261; 30 Me. 47; 13 id. 198; but they were based upon the Massachusetts ordinance of 1647 (when the territory of Maine was a part of Massachusetts) which provided that all lakes more than ten acres in extent should be the property of the state for the benefit of the public. Other state courts followed these decisions, however, and while it is a recognized principle in this country that the title to the soil below the waters of a navigable lake is in the state and not in the owner of the abutting soil; 92 N. Y. 463; 34 Ohio St. 492; 34 La. Ann. 838; 19 Barb. 484; 45 Vt. 215; it has been also held that this principle applies to the bed of a non-navigable lake; 42 Wis. 248; 76 Ind. 302; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 250; 54 N. Y. 377; 120 Ill. 509; but see as to the last case, 140 U. S. 371, which held that the Illinois case did not establish in that state the doctrine that the bed of small lakes does not belong to riparian owners, there being another ground on which the decision was also based; therefore, although it is the practice of the federal courts to follow the decisions of the state courts, they refused in this instance so to do, reversing 16 Fed. Rep. 823. Later decisions in New York also overruled the case of Wheeler v. Spinola, 54 N. Y. 377; and hold that the bed of a non-navigable inland lake belongs to the abutting riparian owner; 134 N. Y. 355, reversing 11 N. Y. S. 87; and see in support of this doctrine, 62 Mich. 626; 32 N. J. L. 369; 58 Ind. 248; 61 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 479; 47 Ohio St. 326.

Where a non-navigable inland lake is the subject of private ownership, neither the public nor an adjacent land owner has a right to boat upon it or to fish in its waters; 24 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 686; and such an owner may lease his interest in the bed of the lake for a term of years, reserving to himself the right of fishing therein during such term; 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 508.

In North Carolina it has been held that the bed of a lake may be the subject of private ownership, but if the waters are navigable in their natural state, the public have an easement of navigation in them which cannot be obstructed; 100 N. C. 477. The riparian proprietor upon a navigable lake has the exclusive right of access to and from the lake in front of his land and of building wharves in aid of navigation not interfering with the public easement; 42 Wis. 214; 10 Mich. 125. See 45 Vt. 215. In England, a non-tidal lake is the subject of private ownership; L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641.

Where the ownership of the bed of the lake is in the state it has no power to arbitrarily destroy the rights of the riparian owner on such lake without his consent and without due process of law, for the sole purpose of benefiting some other riparian owner or for any other merely private purpose; and an act authorizing the drainage of such a lake without the consent of a riparian owner is unconstitutional; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 918; nor have a board of supervisors, in the absence of a statute directly conferring it, the right to construct a bridge over such a lake; 42 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 506.

In the case of a meandered lake the riparian proprietor is held entitled to the middle thereof; 61 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 479; but in Illinois the title to such waters and the land covered by them is held to be in the state in trust for the people; 161 Ill. 462. Meander lines do not cut off land between such lines and the waters of a meandered lake; 121 Ind. 51; 42 Wis. 233; 44 Mich. 408; 65 Miss. 46; 140 U. S. 371; and derelict land left by the receding waters of a meandered lake is held to belong to the riparian owners; 25 Ark. 120; 32 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 690; but not where the lake is artificially drained; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 250; and in Illinois, gradual recession of the waters of a meandered lake is held to give the riparian proprietors the right to the new land by following the recession of the waters to their edge; but a considerable body of new land suddenly or perceptibly formed by reliction is held to belong to the state; 161 Ill. 462.

LAMBETH DEGREE. A degree given by the archbishop of Canterbury. 1 Bla. Com. 381, n. Although he can confer all degrees given by the two universities, the graduates have many privileges not shared by the recipients of his degrees.

LAMMAS DAY. The 1st of August. Cowel. It is one of the Scotch quarter days, and is what is called a "conventional term." Moz. & W.

"This was one of the four great pagan festivals of Britain, the others being on 1st November, 1st February, and 1st May. The festival of the Gule of August, as it was called, probably celebrated the realization of the first fruits of the earth, and more particularly that of the grain-harvest. When Christianity was introduced, the day continued to be observed as a festival on these grounds, and, from a loaf being the usual offering at church, the service, and consequently the day, came to be called Hlaf-mass, subsequently shortened into Lammas. . . . This we would call the rational definition of the word Lammas. There is another, but in our opinion utterly inadmissible, derivation, pointing to the custom of bringing a lamb on this day, as an offering to the cathedral church of York. Without doubt, this custom, which was purely local, would take its rise with reference to the term Lammas, after the true original signification of that word had been forgotten." Chamb. Book of Days.

LAMMAS LANDS. Open, arable, and meadow land which was kept open and by many owners in severalty during so much of the year as was necessary to receive and remove the crop of the several owners, after which they were held and used in common, not only to the owners, but to inhabitants of the parish, manor, or borough. Since Sept. 2, 1752, such lands are open August 12th, under 24 Geo. II. c. 23, § 5; but their name was derived from the earlier practice of keeping them open from Lammas Day to Lady Day. See Cooke, I. A. 47; Elton, Commons 36; 6 Ch. D. 500.

These lands were thus recently defined: "Lands belonging to the owner in fee simple who is absolutely the owner in fee simple, to all intents and purposes for half the year; and the other half of the year he is still the owner in fee simple, subject to a right of pasturage over the land by other people." Jessel, M. R., in 46 L. J. Ch. 721; 6 Ch. D. 507.

LANNS MANNUS (O. Fr.). A lord of the manor. Kelh.

LAND. Any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever: as, meadows, pastures, woods, waters, marshes, furzes, and heath. 45 N. H. 313.

An estate of frank tenement at the least. Shepp. Touch. 92.

In a technical sense, freeholds are not included in the term lands; 3 Madd. 585. The term terra in Latin was used to denote land from terendo quia vomere teritur (because it is broken by the plough), and accordingly, in fines and recoveries, land, i. e. terra, was formerly held to mean arable land. Salk. 256; Cowp. 346; Co. Litt. 4 a. But see Cro. Eliz. 476; 4 Bingh. 90; Burt. R. P. 196. See also 2 P. Wms. 458, n.; 5 Ves. 476; 20 Vin. Abr. 203.

At common law the term land has a two-fold meaning. In its more general sense, it includes any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadows, pastures, woods, marshes, furze, etc.; 1 Inst. 4 a; 2 Bla. Com. 18. In its more limited sense, the term land denotes the quantity and character of the interest or estate which the tenant may hold in land. The land is one thing, and the estate in land is another thing, for an estate in land is a time in land or land for a time. Plowd. 555.

Generally, in wills, "land" is used in its broadest sense; Schoul. Wills § 498; 1 Jarm. Wills 604, n.; 1 Pow. Dev. 186; 10 Paige 140. A freehold estate in reversion or remainder will pass under the term; 2 Vern. 461; 3 P. Wms. 55; 17 Barb. 86; or in a deed; 10 Paige, Ch. 156. But as the word has two senses, one general and one restricted, if it occur in connection with other words which either in whole or in part, supply the difference between the two senses, that is a reason for taking it in its less general sense: e. g. in a grant of lands, meadows, and pastures, the former word is held to mean only arable land. Cro. Eliz. 476, 659; 5 Johns. 440.

If one be seized of some lands in fee, and possessed of other lands for years, all in one parish, and he grant all his lands in that parish (without naming them), in fee-simple, or for life, by this grant shall pass no more but the lands he hath in fee-simple; Shepp. Touchst. 92. But if a man have no freehold estate, "lands," in a will, will pass his leasehold; and now, by statute, leasehold will pass if no contrary intent is shown, and the description is applicable even if he have freehold; 1 Vict. c. 26; 2 B. & P. 303; Cro. Car. 292; 1 P. Wms. 286; 11 Beav. 237, 250.

Incorporeal hereditaments will not pass under "lands," if there is any other real estate to satisfy the devise; but if there is no other such real estate they will pass, by statute; Moore 359, pl. 49. See REAL PROPERTY; FIXTURES. Incorporeal hereditaments have been held not land; 2 Sandf. Sup. Ct. N. Y. 552. See 39 N. Y. 87; contra, 46 N. Y. 46; 82 id. 459; 101 id. 322. The word land does not comprehend rents which are incorporeal, which are not lands, but mere rights or profits issuing out of lands and tenements corporeal; 4 Watts 109; 5 Denio 324. In a statute the term has been held to include an easement, if such construction appears to have been in accordance with the intention of the legislature; 15 L. J. Chan. 306. Land has been held to include servitudes, easements, rents, and other incorporeal hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, equitable as well as legal; 51 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 18; 19 N. Y. S. 890; and to be synonymous with the terms real estate and real property; 49 Fed. Rep. 549; and to include leases for years, remainders, reversions, rent-charges, tithes, advowsons, and titles of honor; 30 Ch. Div. 136.

Land has an indefinite extent upward as well as downward; therefore, land legally includes all houses or other buildings standing or built on it, and whatever is in a direct line between the surface and the centre of the earth; 3 Kent 378, n. See Co. Litt. 4 a; 37 Minn. 4; 9 Day 374; Wood, Inst. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 18; 1 Cruise, Dig. 58; REAL PROPERTY.

The right to develop the natural resources of land. All land is held subject to the right, in the state, of taxation and eminent domain. The right to put his land to the most profitable use for his own benefit is one of the landowner's privileges, but how far this right extends has been the subject of much adjudication by the courts. He may develop its natural resources by mining, even if by so doing he injure the property of an adjacent landowner; 8 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 620; 113 Pa. 126 (overruling 86 id. 401; and see 24 id. 298, where Black, C. J., laid down the rule that "the necessities of one man's business cannot be the standard of another's rights in a thing belonging to both"); he may make use of springs on his land, even if he thereby drain a stream in which others have a property right; 25 id. 528; he may increase the volume of water in such a stream by draining his own swamp land; 26 id. 407; and if by any of these methods, he injure another, it is a damnum absque injuria.

He may not collect upon his land or suffer to accumulate there anything which, if it escape, may do injury to others, without being liable for all the damage it may do; L. R. 3 H. L. 330; he may not erect upon his land a manufacturing establishment, which is not intended to develop its natural resources, without being liable for any nuisance it may create to others; 28 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 845; 62 Hun 306; 145 Pa. 324; and he may be enjoined from maintaining a nuisance on his land, where such nuisance can be avoided, without proof of damage to plaintiff or negligence on the part of defendant. See FIRE.

He may not divert the water of a stream to an unusual course, even if the quantity of water is not diminished thereby; 43 N. Y. S. 29.

He may not obstruct a passway over his land which has been continuously used by the public for more than 15 years; 38 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 690.

He may explode nitro-glycerine for the purpose of increasing the flow of natural gas, although by so doing he draw gas from the land of another; 31 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 57, 61; but he is held liable in damages where he uses for that purpose an explosive so powerful as to injure the property of an adjoining owner; 17 N. Y. S. 22; and he may be enjoined from so doing where he can obtain the same result, although at an increased cost to himself; 43 N. Y. Suppl. 1.

As to acts by an adjoining owner, whereby the right of vertical and lateral support to one's land by the subjacent or adjacent soil is interfered with, see LATERAL SUPPORT.

As to acts by an adjoining owner interfering with light and air, see ANCIENT LIGHTS.

As to what covenants run with the land, see COVENANTS.

LAND BOOK. See LANDBOC.

LAND CEAP, LAND CHEAP (land, and Sax. ceapan. to buy). A fine payable in money or cattle, upon the alienation of land, within certain manors and liberties. Cowel, Gloss.

LAND CERTIFICATE. A certificate given to a registered proprietor of freehold land under the English Land Transfer Act of 1875. A similar certificate is given to the transferee on every subsequent transfer. It contains a description of the land as it appears on the register and the name and address of the proprietor, and is prima facie evidence of the truth of the matters therein set forth.

LAND COP. The sale of land which was evidenced in early English law by the transfer of a rod or festuca (q. v.) as a symbol of possession which was handed by the seller to the reeve and by the reeve to the purchaser. The conveyance was made in court, it is supposed, for securing better evidence of it, and barring the claims of expectant heirs: Maitl. Domesd. B. 328.

LAND COURT. In American Law. The name of a court which formerly existed in the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, having sole jurisdiction in St. Louis county in suits respecting lands, and in actions of ejectment, dower, partition. As to the United States courts for the determination of land claims, see UNITED STATES COURTS.

LAND GABEL. A tax or duty on land. See GABEL. It is said to have been originally a penny for a house; Spel. Gloss.; and by another authority, in Domesday Book it was a quit-rent for a house site similar to the modern ground rent. Whart. L. Dict. Spelled also Land Gable. Moz. & W.

LAND GABLE. See LAND GABEL.

LAND GRANT. A legislative appropriation of a portion of the public domain either for charitable or eleemosynary purpose, or for the promotion of the construction of a railroad or other public work.

Although the public lands of the United States and of the various states have been to a great extent conveyed by deeds or patents issued in virtue of general laws, many specific grants have also been made, and were the usual method of transfer during the colonial period. See 3 Wash. R. P. 181; 4 Kent 450, 494; 8 Wheat. 543; 6 Pet. 548; 16 id. 367.

It is always to be borne in mind in construing a congressional grant that the act by which it is made is a law as well as a conveyance, and that such effect must be given to it as will carry out the intent of congress; and this intent should not be defeated by applying to the grant the common-law rule making grants applicable only to transfers between private parties; 97 U. S. 491. Followed in 10 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 552. To ascertain that intent courts will look to the condition of the country at the time of making the grants, as well as the purpose of the grants as expressed on their face; 26 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 513; 113 U. S. 618.

All government grants are to be strictly construed against the grantees. Nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit language, and nothing can be implied; 23 How. 66; 23 N. J. Eq. 441.

The provisions of various acts of congress that the land-grant railroads "shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the government, free from all toll or other charge for transportation of any property or troops of the United States," mean that the government may use the roads, with all fixtures and appurtenances, but not that it may compel the roads to transport property and troops without compensation; 12 Ct. of Cl. 35. Such a railroad is under a perpetual contract made by the Land Grant Act of May 17, 1856, to carry the mails at such rates as congress may by law direct or the post-master-general determine; 21 Ct. of Cl. 155.

Priority of grant settles the title of the railroad where the claims conflict and not the priority in filing maps of definite location; 146 U. S. 570; and when grants are made to two railroads, none of the land passes to the second which comes within the prospective rights of the first; id. 615.

Title does not vest until the lands are actually selected and set apart under the direction of the secretary of the interior; 141 U. S. 358; 52 Minn. 397.

In case of conflict between railroad land grants the elder title must prevail. So held, where the Northern Pacific Railroad claimed land in Minnesota under a grant of July 2, 1864, and the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad claimed part of the same lands under acts of congress of March 3, 1865, and March 3, 1871; 139 U. S. 1.

Where lands are granted by acts of congress of the same date, or by the same act, in aid of two railroads that must necessarily intersect, each grantee takes an undivided moiety of the lands within the conflicting limits; 159 id. 349, 372.

Where congress grants the odd-numbered sections of land for a given distance on each side of a railroad, before the road is located, the title does not pass to any particular sections until the line of the road is made certain, which makes certain also the sections granted: 9 Wall. 95.

Where an act of congress makes a grant of land of the odd-numbered sections within a certain distance of a railroad, the title of the corporation to the land vests at once, and can only be thereafter divested by the government for a failure to perform conditions imposed, or upon a proper proceeding instituted to revest the title in the government; 32 Fed. Rep. 457.

The revocation of a land grant to a corporation which has become dormant, and the transfer thereof to another corporation by an act of the state legislature, is not an invasion of private rights and does not, unless so expressed or clearly implied, burden the transfer with the debts of the dormant corporation; 163 U. S. 31.

Where land is granted to a railroad company before its tract is located, the title to the specific land attaches by a location of the road, and takes effect by relation as of the date of the grant, so as to cut off intervening claims of other roads, claiming under other grants, unless the lands are specially reserved in the statute; 97 U. S. 491.

The grant to the Northern Pacific R. R. of certain public lands is a grant in præsenti. Yet it is in the nature of a float, and the title does not attach to any specific section until capable of identification; but when once identified, the title attaches as of the date of the grant; 15 U. S. App. 279. A railroad company takes title to the land upon complying with the act and not before; 15 id. 359.

In acts making land grants to railroad companies, conditions are usually imposed which must be complied with to make the grant operative. Among such conditions are frequently named such as make the grant dependent upon the amount of net earnings, and accordingly, the phrase has been frequently the subject of construction in that connection. "Net earnings," within the meaning of such a law, are ascertained by deducting from gross earnings all ordinary expenses of organization and of operating the road, and expenditures bona fide made in improvements, and paid out of earnings, and not by the issue of bonds or stock; but not deducting interest paid on any of the bonded debt of the company; 99 U. S. 402. Followed in 20 Ct. of Cl. 70; 29 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 384; 27 Fed. Rep. 1. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

LAND-MARK. A monument set up in order to ascertain the boundaries between two contiguous estates. For removing a land-mark an action lies. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 787. See MONUMENTS.

LAND OFFICE. A government bureau established in 1812, originally connected with the treasury, but since 1849 forming a division of the department of the interior.

The commissioner of the general land office performs, under direction of the secretary of the interior, all executive duties appertaining to the surveying and sales of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private grants of land, and the issuing of patents for all land under the authority of the government; Rev. Stats. U. S. secs. 446–461; he has absolute jurisdiction of any particular grant of public land; 158 U. S. 155; he has the power to supervise the action of the officers of a local land office and to annul a fraudulent entry, but his action is not conclusive; 4 U. S. App. 332; and the courts are not concluded by the decision of the land department on a question of law; 159 U. S. 46.

The general land office has charge of the record of title to the vast area known as the public domain, and all business pertaining to the survey, disposition, and patenting of the public lands of the United States is transacted through it or under its order and supervision. All questions of fact decided by the general land office are binding everywhere, and injunctions and mandamus proceedings will not lie against its officers; 9 Wall. 575; 7 id. 347; 9 id. 298; but a court of equity, after the title has passed from the United States, may relieve against mistakes of law in collateral proceedings, but it must be clear that a mistake of law has been committed; 96 U. S. 535; and if the alleged mistake be a mixed one of law and fact so that the court cannot separate it so as to see clearly where the mistake of law is, the decision is conclusive; 101 id. 476.

Decisions of the land office upon questions of fact within their jurisdiction cannot be reviewed in a collateral proceeding; 158 U. S. 240. Its construction upon an act of congress and its usage for eighteen years is entitled to considerable weight; 148 U. S. 562. Its decisions upon questions of fact are conclusive; 158 U. S. 155. Its rules and regulations have the effect and force of law on the due observance of which all citizens have the right to rely; 19 U. S. App. 10.

In all matters confided by law to their examination and decision the United States land officers act judicially, and their decisions are as final as those of other courts; 5 Minn. 223; and although such action is generally conclusive, the land office, up to the issuing of the patent in their divestiture of title, cannot by its subsequent action upon a fictitious claim defeat rights already vested. See LAND PATENT.

In a bill which seeks to show that a decision of the land department was procured by fraud, it must be shown that some trick or deceit was practised on the officers of the department. Where such a bill attacks such a decision on the ground that the officers of the department have misconstrued and misapplied the law, it must set out the evidence and what the department found the facts to be, so that the court can separate the department's finding of facts from its conclusions of law. It is not necessary to give notice of a contest before the land department to the predecessors in title of a claimant; 80 Fed. Rep. 425.

LAND PATENT. A muniment of title issued by a government or state for the conveyance of some portion of the public domain.

The issue of a land patent is the conveyance of public lands to the person or persons who, by compliance with the law, have become entitled thereto under a land grant (q. v.). It is a conveyance by the government when it has any interest to convey. 121 U. S. 488.

A patent issued under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, to settle land titles, under the Mexican grant, "is not only the deed of the United States, but it is a solemn record of the government, of its action and judgment with respect to the title of the claimant existing at the date of the cession. By it the sovereign power, which alone could determine the matter, declares that the previous grant was genuine; that the claim under it was valid and entitled to recognition and confirmation by the law of nations and the stipulations of the treaty; and that the grant was located, or might have been located, by the former government, and is correctly located by the new government, so as to embrace the premises as they are surveyed and described. Whilst this declaration remains of record, the government itself cannot question its verity, nor can parties claiming through the government by title subsequent." Field, C. J., in 18 Cal. 11, 26.

Nature and effect of patents generally. A grant of land is a public law standing on the statute books of the state, and is notice to every subsequent purchaser under any conflicting sale made afterward; 2 U. S. App. 581. The final certificate or receipt acknowledging the payment in full by a homesteader or pre-emptor is not in legal effect a conveyance of the land; 4 id. 332. It transfers the full equitable title; 159 U. S. 66. A patent alone passes land from the United States to the grantee; 13 Pet. 498; 20 Mo. 108; 1 Ohio 281; not only as it was at the time of the survey, but as it is at the date of the patent; 134 U. S. 178; and nothing passes a perfect title to public lands but a patent, except where congress grants lands in words of present grant; 13 Pet. 498; though its delivery to the patentee is not essential to pass the title; 103 U. S. 378; and the United States cannot by authority of its own officers invalidate that patent by the issuing of a second one for the same property; 135 U. S. 286; see 21 Wall. 660; 9 Cra. 87; 5 Wheat. 293; 11 id. 380; or divest the title by giving a patent to another; 8 Mo. 526. Its office is to define the land; 9 Cal. 322; it has been said to be equivalent to a deed; 20 id. 387. After land has been sold by certificate, the United States holds the legal title until the patent issues, but only in trust for the purchaser; and the officers can only act ministerially and issue it to him, and cannot act judicially and determine that another claimant is entitled to it; 2 Ia. 1. A patent is conclusive against all whose rights commence subsequently to its date; 7 Wheat. 212; it conveys the legal title and leaves the equities open; 15 Pet. 96. It relates back to the date of purchase, and title to real estate, acquired under an execution sale, cannot be defeated by the issuing of a patent to the execution defendant, bearing date subsequent to the sale by the sheriff; 5 Ia. 157. But a patent for public land will not be held to take effect by virtue of the doctrine of relation, as of the date of the initial step taken by the patentee, where it appears that the rights by him acquired under such initial step were lost by his lack of diligence, and third parties' rights had intervened; 80 Fed. Rep. 433.

Where the United States has parted with title by a patent legally issued, and upon surveys legally made by itself and approved by the proper department, the title so granted cannot be impaired by any subsequent survey made by the government for its own purposes; 13 La. Ann. 128. A patent founded on a void entry and survey nevertheless passes the legal title from the government to the patentee, but the commencement of the title is the patent; 2 Ohio 216. It passes to the patentee everything connected with the soil, forming any portion of its bed, or fixed to its surface; in short, everything connected with the term "land"; 17 Cal. 199.

A patent for land is the highest evidence of title and is conclusive as against the government, and all claiming under junior patents or titles, until set aside or annulled, unless it is absolutely void on its face; 2 Wall. 525; 13 id. 72; id. 92; 19 id. 646; 23 How. 235; 104 U. S. 636; the presumption being that it is valid and passes the legal title; 18 How. 87. When issued upon confirmation of a claim or a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record of the existence of that title or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation; 121 U. S. 488; it must be interpreted as a whole: its various provisions in connection with each other, and the legal deduction drawn therefrom must be conformable with the document; 21 How. 305.

A patent for unimproved lands, no part of which was in the possession of any one at the time it was issued, gives a legal seisin and constructive possession of all the lands within the survey; 5 Pet. 485. The identity of the land must be ascertained by a reasonable construction of the patent, but if rendered wholly unnecessary by inaccurate description the grant is void; 6 id. 328.

Government documents are not evidence of titles as against parties claiming pre-existing adverse and paramount title; 124 U. S. 261. A patent issued by the United States cannot be avoided or impeached for fraud in a collateral action; 26 Ia. 493; but it may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation and conveyance defeated, by showing that the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; 121 U. S. 488. Where issued by mistake, inadvertence, or other cause, to parties not entitled to it, they will be declared trustees of the true owner and decreed to convey the title to him; 147 id. 242. A patent is void at law, if the grantor state had no title to the premises embraced in it, or if the officer who issued the patent had no authority to do so; 142 id. 161. In cases of ejectment, where the question is who has the legal title, the patent of the government is unassailable; 139 id. 642.

The patent is conclusive evidence that the patentee has complied with the act of congress as concerns improvements on the land, etc.; 3 La. Ann. 203; it is prima facie evidence that all legal requirements have been complied with; 7 U. S. App. 507; but a patent fraudulently obtained by illegal issue is void; 4 La. Ann. 262; 2 How. 284; 5 Har. & J. 223.

Patents for mines. The fee of all mineral lands remains in the United States until patent issues therefor; 24 Cal. 339; 1 Mont. 410; Copp's Mining Law 37. The locator possesses only the right to purchase until the payment of the purchase money and the issuance of a receipt by the register and receiver of the local land office; 33 Fed. Rep. 562.

The method of procedure for the application for patent is provided for in U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2325. It requires that the applicant shall file under oath in the proper land office an application showing a compliance with the above-mentioned statute, together with a plat and field notes made by or under the direction of a United States surveyor general, and shall post a copy of the plat, together with a notice of the application, on the land, and then file an affidavit of the posting of such notice and copy in the land office. The act also requires that the register of the land office shall post said notice in his office for sixty days, and shall publish it for the same period in a newspaper nearest to the claim. If at the expiration of the said sixty days no adverse claim shall have been filed with the register and receiver of the local land office, the applicant shall be entitled to a patent upon the payment of $5.00 per acre for a lode location, and $2.50 per acre for a placer location, and after the expiration of said sixty days third persons cannot be heard to make objection to the issuance of the patent; see 9 Colo. 208; 4 Sawyer 302; 12 Nev. 320.

The issuance of such a patent is conclusive as to title of land described therein upon a court of law and in controversies between individuals: 3 Mont. 282; 6 id. 397; 8 Fed. Rep. 300; 34 id. 515. By the act of March 3, 1881, Rev. Stats. 1 Supp. p. 324, it is provided that if in any action brought pursuant to section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, title to the ground in controversy shall not be established by either party, the jury shall so find, and judgment shall be entered according to verdict. In such case no costs shall be allowed, and the claimant shall not proceed in the land office or be entitled to a patent for the land in controversy until he shall have perfected his title.

Where an application is pending for a patent to mineral lands, any adverse claim must be filed within the sixty days granted by the statute, and must be under the oath of the adverse claimant; Rev. Stat. §§ 2325–2326; 21 Pac. Rep. 492. If such adverse claim be filed, proceedings upon the patent shall be stayed until the controversy shall have been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim is waived; 33 Fed. Rep. 562; 114 U. S. 576. This procedure in the court must be begun by the adverse claimant within thirty days after filing his adverse claim, or his claim will be deemed to have been waived; U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2326; 114 U. S. 576; 2 Mont. 421. The person in whose favor a decision is rendered in such a proceeding is entitled to the patent upon compliance with the provisions of law; U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2326; and it is given to the party establishing the better title, the only question before the court being one of the right of possession of the premises; 21 Fed. Rep. 167. It is necessary for an adverse claimant in such a procedure to prove right of possession as against the United States, as well as against the applicant for a patent; 115 U. S. 45; and where neither party shows title neither can receive a patent; 21 Fed. Rep. 167; 9 Colo. 589.

How cancelled and annulled. It is not permissible for courts of law to inquire into the validity of a patent or into any question of fraud in connection with its issuance; 16 Fed. Rep. 829; see 104 U. S. 636. This, of course, applies only to the cases where the department has jurisdiction to act. If such jurisdiction was wanting or if the patent be void upon its face, it may, of course, be collaterally impeached; 104 U. S. 636; 8 Colo. 179. The United States may bring an action to set aside a patent upon allegations of fraud, and such action is triable under the same principles and rules which would obtain between individuals; 114 U. S. 233; 128 id. 673; 16 Fed. Rep. 810; id. 829, that is when the question arises as to patenting the land to the wrong person; in which case the government merely becomes the instrument by which the right of the individuals can be established and is merely a formal complainant; but if the patent has been obtained from the government by fraud or covers lands which were not subject to patent, the government sues in its sovereign capacity; U. S. v. Amer. Bell Tel. Co. (Berliner Case), where the subject is fully discussed and all the cases cited. See PATENT.

It may proceed by bill in equity for a decree of nullity, and an order of cancellation of a patent issued by the government itself, ignorantly, or in mistake, for lands reserved from sale by law, and a grant of which by a patent was therefore void; 2 Wall. 525; or where a patent issued in mistake, and the government has a direct interest or is under an obligation respecting the relief invoked; 141 U. S. 358; or when the patent was issued by mistake or obtained by fraud; 146 id. 120; the initiation and control of such a suit lies with the attorney-general; 125 id. 273; 127 id. 338.

Misrepresentations knowingly made by the applicant for a patent will justify the government in proceeding to set it aside, as it has a right to demand a cancellation of a patent obtained by false and fraudulent representations; 128 id. 673; see 137 id. 161; but courts of equity cannot set aside, annul, or correct patents or other evidence of title obtained from the United States by fraud or mistake, unless on specific averments of the mistake or fraud, supported by clear and satisfactory proof; 121 id. 325. A bill in equity is the proper remedy; 11 How. 552; although a patent fraudulently obtained by one knowing at the time that another person has a prior right to the land may be set aside by an information in the nature of a bill in equity filed by the attorney of the United States for the district in which the land lies; id. A court of equity, upon a bill filed for that purpose, will vacate a patent of the United States for a tract of land obtained by mistake from the officers of the land office, in order that a clear title may be transferred to the previous purchaser; 4 Wall. 232; but a patent for land of the United States will not be declared void merely because the evidence to authorize its issue is deemed insufficient by the court; 16 Ohio 61. A state can impeach the title conveyed by it to a grantee only by a bill in chancery to cancel it, either for fraud on the part of the grantee or mistake of law; and until so cancelled, it cannot issue to any other party a valid patent for the same land; 149 U. S. 79.

After the issue of a patent, assignment and transfers of the pre-emption right will not be inquired into; 4 McLean 366. The issue of a patent of public lands to a person not equitably entitled to it does not preclude the owner of the equitable title from enforcing it in a court of equity; 147 U. S. 47; and fraud on the part of a grantee under a patent does not prevent the legal title from passing to a bona fide purchaser; 7 U. S. App. 128; unless the purchaser had sufficient information to put him on inquiry of fraud, in which case he is not a bona fide purchaser; 146 U. S. 120. A patent to a deceased person is void; 12 Pet. 264; 7 Ohio 288. On the acquisition of the territory from Mexico, the United States acquired the title to lands under tidewater, in trust for future states that might be erected out of the territory; but this doctrine does not apply to lands that had been previously granted to other parties by the former government; 142 U. S. 161. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND WARRANT; LAND GRANT.

LAND POOR. A phrase used to indicate the possession of a large quantity of unproductive lands, the payment of taxes and loss of interest on which keeps the owner poor. "A man land-poor may be largely responsible;" 46 Mich. 397; s. c. 9 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 445.

LAND REEVE. One whose business it is to overlook parts of an estate. Mos. & W.

LAND REGISTRY. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER; REGISTRATION; RECORDING.

LAND REVENUES. An income derived from crown lands in Great Britain. These lands have been so largely granted away to subjects that they are now contracted within very narrow limits. The crown was so much impoverished in this manner by William III. that the stat. 1 Anne, c. 7, § 5, was passed, with the stat. 34 George III. c. 75, which amends and continues it, makes void all grants or leases from the ground of royal manors or other possessions connected with land for a period exceeding thirty-one years, or three lives. Long prior to this a Scottish stat. 1455, c. 41, had made necessary the consent of parliament in case of the alienation of crown property. It is said that none of these statutes have succeeded in checking the practice. Early at the beginning of the reign of George III. the hereditary crown revenues derived from escheats, manors held in capite, estrays, fines, etc., were surrendered by the king to the general funds, and in the place of them he received a specified sum annually for the civil list.

The supervision of such property as still belongs to the crown is vested in commissioners appointed for the purpose, called the commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenues.

LAND STEWARD. An agent who has the management and control of landed estate belonging to an individual or state.

LAND TAX. A tax on the beneficial proprietor of land such as is imposed in many of the states; so far as a tenant is beneficial proprietor, and no farther, does it rest on him. It was first imposed in 1693, a new valuation of the lands in the kingdom having been made in 1692, which has not since been changed. In 1798 it was made perpetual, at a rate of four shillings in a pound of valued rent. Under the provisions of the stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 74; this tax is now generally redeemed. See Encyc. Brit. Taxation.

LAND TENANT (commonly called terre tenant, q. v.). He who actually possesses the land.

LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER. The existing system of land transfer is a long and tedious process involving the observance of many formalities and technicalities, a failure to observe any one of which may defeat title. Even where these have been most carefully complied with, and where the title has been traced to its source, the purchaser must buy at his peril, there always being, in spite of the utmost care and expenditure, the possibility that his title may turn out bad. Yeakle, Torrens System 209.

For the past 50 years the project of simplifying land titles and transfer has been agitated in England. For the purpose of considering the best method of so doing, a royal commission was appointed in 1854, and its report in 1857 recommended a limited plan of registration of title. In 1862 the Lord Westbury Act, 25 & 26 Vict. cc. 53, 57, provided for the registration of indefeasible titles, but they were confined to good marketable titles. In 1875 the Lord Cairns bill was passed, which provided for the permissive use of a scheme for the registration of title, and was a modified form of the Torrens system, but, as the friends of that system pointed out, the provisions of the bill were not stringent enough, and comparatively little use has been made of it.

This act was amended in several particulars by the Land Transfer Act, 1897. In addition to these changes this amendatory act of 1897 makes some very vital changes in the real estate law of England; it provides as follows: "Where real estate is vested in any person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, it shall, on his death, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to and become vested in his personal representative or representatives from time to time as if it were a chattel real vesting in them or him." This applies to any real estate over which the testator "has a general power of appointment." Probate and letters of administration may be granted in respect of real estate only, although there is no personal estate. Subject to the powers, rights, duties, and liabilities imposed in the act, the "personal representatives hold the real estate as trustee for the persons by law beneficially entitled thereto, and those persons shall have the same power of requiring a transfer of real estate as persons beneficially entitled to personal estate have of requiring a transfer of such personal estate." "All enactments and rules of law relating to the effect of probate or letters of administration as respects chattels real, and as respects the dealing with chattels real before probate or administration, and as respects the payment of costs of administration, etc., of personal estate and the powers, rights, etc., of personal representatives in respect of personal estate, shall apply to real estate so far as the same are applicable, as if that real estate were a chattel real, etc., save that some or one only of such joint personal representatives" cannot sell or transfer the real estate without the authority of court.

"In the administration of the assets of a person dying after the commencement of the act, his real estate shall be administered in the same manner, subject to the same liabilities for debts, costs, and expenses, etc., as if it were personal estate, provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the order in which real and personal assets respectively are now applicable in and towards the payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, or legacies, or the liability of real estate to be charged with the payment of legacies." In granting letters of administration the court "shall have regard to the rights and interests of the persons interested in the real estate, and his heir-at-law, if not one of the next-of-kin, shall be equally entitled to the grant with the next of kin."

At any time after the death of the owner "his personal representative may assent to any devise contained in his will, or may convey the land to any person entitled thereto as heir, devisee, or otherwise, . . . either subject to a charge for the payment of any money which the personal representatives are liable to pay, or without any such charge; and on such assent or conveyance, subject to a charge for all moneys (if any) which the personal representatives are liable to pay, all liabilities of the personal representatives in respect of the land shall cease, except as to any acts done or contracts entered into by them before such assent or conveyance." After the expiration of a year from the owner's death, "if the personal representatives have failed on the request of the person entitled to the land to convey the land to that person, the court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of that person and after notice to the personal representatives, order that the conveyance be made, or in case of registered land, that the person so entitled be registered as proprietor of the land, either solely or jointly, with the personal representatives. The production of an assent by the personal representatives to the registrar is authority to him to register the transfer. The personal representatives, etc., may, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary . . . with the consent of the person entitled to any legacy . . . or to a share in his residuary estate, etc., appropriate any part of the residuary estate in or towards satisfaction of that legacy or share," placing their own valuation on "the whole or any part of the property of the deceased person," first giving notice to all persons interested in the residuary estate. In case of registered land such appropriation is authority to the registrar to register the person to whom the property is appropriated as proprietor. The act provides that the title to registered land, adverse to or in derogation of the title of the register proper, shall not be acquired by any length of possession."

It also repeals the act of 32 Hen. 8, c. 9, which prohibits sales and other dispositions of land of which the grantor or his predecessor in title had not been in possession for one whole year previously to the dispossession's being made.

It provides that the queen may, by an order in council, as respects any county or part of a county, declare registration of title to be compulsory on sale.

Six months' notice before the order in council is made is required to be given to the council of the county in question, and if within three months after receipt of notice with a draft of the proposed order, two-thirds of the members of the county council notify the Privy Council that, in their opinion, compulsory registration of title would not be desirable, the order in council shall not be made. The first order in council made under this act shall not affect more than one county. The act reserves to parliament certain rights to disapprove of any order in council by which it shall become void. The act makes provision for an indemnity payable thereunder by setting apart a portion of the receipts from fees taken in the land register. If the indemnity fund is insufficient the deficiency is charged to the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom.

Provision is made for regulations by the lord chancellor, with the advice and assistance of certain officials, for the conduct of official searches, and for enabling the registered proprietor to apply for such searches, etc., by telegraph and to receive reply by telegraph.

The act went into effect January 1st, 1898, and is to be cited as the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and construed with the Land Transfer Act, 1875, and the two together are to be cited as Land Transfer Acts, 1875 and 1897.

The system of registration of deeds prevails in Scotland, in Middlesex and Yorkshire, in Ireland, France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, part of Switzerland, and the British colonies, excepting Australasia and most of Canada, and in the South American republics, as well as in the United States. The system of registration of title prevails in Germany, Austria-Hungary, Australasia, part of Switzerland, and the greater part of Canada; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. The Torrens system, so called from its author, Sir Robert Torrens, has been in use in New South Wales and Victoria since 1862; in South Australia, 1858; Queensland, 1861; Tasmania, 1863; New Zealand and British Columbia, 1870; Western Australia, 1874; Ontario, 1884; Manitoba, 1883; Duffy & Eggleston, Land Transfer Act, 1890, 3.

The essential point of this system is an official guarantee of title; it is the registration of title as distinct from the registration of deeds. The latter ascertains the deeds which must be examined under every transfer, while the former renders such examination unnecessary; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. Under the Torrens system the registrar holds the same relation to the landowner that a company or bank holds to the shareholder.

In Germany the state keeps what may be called a ledger account for each property, and pledges itself to keep it correctly and in such plain fashion that any person of ordinary intelligence can at once, and without examining any deed of any kind, ascertain who stands as owner of the property (which means that his title is perfect), and what debts or other incumbrances exist. In Prussia all transfers are made by word of mouth, without any deed or conveyance. The simplest way is to have both parties to appear before the registrar, and declare their contract, and the purchaser is then entered as owner; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. For a detailed account of the system of registration of title in Central Europe, see 2 Jour. Com. Leg. 112 (June, 1897).

In the United States the subject of registration of land titles has been considered in many of the states. In New York city the accumulation of record books has become so great in the registry of deeds that searches of title can no longer be carried on by private persons. In that state an attempt was made to simplify and classify these records, by adopting what is known as a block system of registration by which deeds and other instruments are classified and indexed according to the location of the property. While this is a partial relief, it by no means remedies the evils due to a lengthening chain of title, where no part is stronger than its weakest link; Yeakle, Torrens System 215. See Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1890) 265.

With some modifications, in order to obviate the constitutional questions which might arise under it in this country, the Torrens system was recently adopted in California, Illinois, and Ohio, but in the last two states it has been adjudged unconstitutional, in that it attempts to confer judicial power upon the registration officer; 47 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 551; 165 Ill. 527; 29 Chic. Leg. N. 93.

In 1897 Illinois passed an act to remedy these defects in the statute, and California passed an amendatory act to the effect that the original act shall be liberally construed by the court. Massachusetts indicated a disposition favorable to this system by providing for the appointment of a committee to draft and prepare an act and report to the next legislature.

LAND TRANSFER ACT. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER.

LAND WAITER. In English Law. A custom-house officer who superintends the landing of goods, and who examines, measures, tastes, or weighs them and takes account of it. They are also sometimes required to superintend the shipment of goods where drawbacks are allowed, and to certify the shipping of them on the debentures. They are sometimes called Coast Waiters or Landing Waiters.

LAND WARRANT. A negotiable government certificate entitling its holder to be put in possession of a designated quantity of public land, under a land grant or other appropriation of land by congress.

The possession of a warrant at the land office is sufficient authority to make locations under it, and letters of attorney are unnecessary; 4 Pet. 332. The locator of a warrant undertakes himself to find waste and unappropriated land, and his patent issues under his information to the government and at his own risk; he cannot be considered as a purchaser without notice: 5 Cra. 234. A power of attorney given by the holder of a land warrant from the general court authorities, the attorney to locate the land for his own sole use and benefit, and to sell the same and receive payment therefor, is manifestly designed to transfer the interest of the holder of the warrant in violation of the act of congress in that respect, and is void; 3 Chand. 189. Evidence of the payment of the purchase money due the state of Pennsylvania on a land warrant clothes the person paying it with the ownership of the warrant and with the right to maintain ejectment for the land; 152 U. S. 398. Land warrants are not to be regarded as real estate in a probate settlement; 44 Me. 57. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND PATENT.

LANDBOC. A charter or deed whereby lands or tenements were given under early English law. Cow.; Moz. & W. See BOCLAND.

Occasionally it is said a bishop or abbot in support of claims of the highest jurisdictional powers "would rely on the vague large words of some Anglo-Saxon land book. But to do this was to make a false move; the king's lawyers were not astute palæographers or diplomatists, but any charter couched in terms sufficiently loose to pass for one moment as belonging to the age before the conquest could be met by the doctrine that the king was not to be deprived of his rights by 'obscure and general words.'" 1 Poll. & Maitl. 571.

LANDEA. In Old English Law. A ditch to drain marshy land. Spel. Gloss.; Du Cange.

LANDED. As used in a revenue act levying tolls on goods, the clear meaning and purport is "substantially imported," and stones shot from boats to the shore below high-water mark, there to remain until shipped for exportation, were not landed. L. R. 4 Ex. 260.

Timber, floated into a salt water creek, where the tide ebbs and flows, leaving the ends resting in mud at low water and prevented from floating away at high water by booms, is landed; 8 Cra. 110.

When merchandise is sent on shore, and afterwards being in the ship's boat for the purpose of being re-shipped, it is violently seized and detained, either by the orders of a sovereign or by thieves, it is not safely landed, under an insurance on the goods, until the same should be discharged and safely landed; 6 Mass. 197, 204.

LANDED ESTATE OR PROPERTY. A colloquial or popular phrase to denote real property (q. v.). Landed estate ordinarily means an interest in and pertaining to lands. 10 La. Ann. 676. In a tax law it "clearly embraces not only the land, but all houses, fixtures, and improvements of every kind thereon, and all machinery, neat cattle, horses, and mules, when attached to and used on a plantation or farm." Id.

A person holding such an estate is termed a landed proprietor, and it is immaterial whether the lands are improved or not; 10 La. Ann. 676. A devise of "all my landed property" carries the fee; 1 N. H. 163; and so does "my landed estate"; 12 Wend. 602; but a devise of "all my landed estate," followed by a particular description of tracts devised, does not include a lot not enumerated, which descends to the heir at law, though excluded from all testator's estate with a shilling legacy; 2 McCord, Ch. 214, 264.

Landed securities are mortgages or other incumbrances affecting land, and this is what must be implied from the direction in a will to lay out a fund in some real security: 3 Atk. 805, 808.

LANDED ESTATES COURT. In English Law. Tribunals established by statute for the purpose of disposing more promptly and easily than could be done through the ordinary judicial machinery, of incumbered real estate. These courts were first established in Ireland by the act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 48, which being defective was followed by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 77. The purpose of these was to enable the owner, or a lessee for any less than 63 years unexpired, of land subject to incumbrance, to apply to commissioners who constituted a court of record to direct a sale. This court was called the Incumbered Estates Court. A new tribunal called the Landed Estates Court was created by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 72, which abolished the former court and established a permanent tribunal. It is said that these statutes facilitated a great revolution in the tenure of land in Ireland, supplying the means by which a great part of the soil passed rapidly from cottier tenants and an embarrassed and non-resident gentry to capitalist farmers and to landlords who cultivated the soil themselves. The result was agricultural prosperity, but great hardship to the tenants, upon whom in Ireland rested the burden of permanent improvements which elsewhere would be borne by the landlord. The sales under the Landed Estates Act deprived the tenants of opportunity to make claim for compensation in the adjustment of rent. Demands for increased rent under penalty of eviction compelled small farmers to emigrate, move to the towns, or remain as servants on their old farms. The acts of retaliation for these changes led to the passage of the Irish Land Act of 1870, followed by that of 1881. Under the latter the tenant farmers obtained very unexampled privileges, and a new court was created for fixing rent. See Int. Cyc., tit. Incumbered Estates Court, and authorities there cited.

A similar court was established for West Indian estates by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 117, the sittings of which were held at Westminster.

LANDEFRICUS, LANDAGENDE. The lord of the soil; landlord (q. v.).

LANDEGANDMAN. An inferior tenant of a manor. Spel. Glos.

LANDGRAVE. In Germany, in the middle ages a graf or count entrusted with special judicial functions, extending over a large extent of territory; later, the title of sovereign princes of the empire who inherited certain estates called land-gravates, of which they were invested by the emperor. Cent. Dict.; Lond. Encyc.

LANDHLAFORD. A proprietor of land; lord of the soil. Anc. Inst. Eng. See LANDFRICUS.

LANDIMERS. Measures of land. Cow.

In Scotch Law. Measurers of land. Skene.

LANDING. A place for loading or unloading boats, but not a harbor for them. 74 Pa. 378.

LANDING PLACE. A place laid out by a town as a common landing place and used as such, but not designated as for the particular benefit of the town, is a public landing place. It is not, however, a townway and liable to be discontinued as such by the town. If a public landing place is no longer of use the power to discontinue it is in the legislature; 2 Pick. 44.

The public use of the land of an individual, adjoining navigable waters, as a landing place, for a period of twenty years, with the knowledge of the owner, will not confer a right, nor raise a presumption of a dedication; 20 Wend. 111; 22 id. 425, 559; 1 Greenl. 111. When a highway is extended to navigable waters, the riparian owner has no exclusive right of landing; 19 Barb. 204.

Under authority to regulate landings and watering places, commissioners of highways have no right to lay out and establish a new landing place; 17 Wend. 9; but when a road has been laid out and used as a highway to a public landing place for twenty years prior to March 21, 1797, but not sufficiently described, they may ascertain, describe, and enter of record such road, if it was constantly worked and used for six years next preceding; id. The selectmen of a town have no authority to lay out a public landing; 1 Greenl. 111.

LANDIRECTA. Rights charged upon land. Toml. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

LANDLOCKED. Wholly surrounded by land of some other person or persons, as when the owner of a close surrounded by his own land grants the land and reserves the close. L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 798. In that case it was held that the implied right to a way of necessity operated by way of a regrant from the grantor of the land, and was limited by the necessity which created it; it was not a way of necessity for all purposes, but only such as the close was used for in the condition it happened to be at the time of the grant. Semble, the same rule applies if the grant is of the landlocked close with an implied grant of a way of necessity over the surrounding land; id.

LANDLORD. The lord or proprietor of land, who, under the feudal system, retained the dominion or ultimate property of the feud, or fee of the land; while his grantee, who had only the possession and use of the land, was styled the feudatory, or vassal, which was only another name for the tenant or holder of it. In the popular meaning of the word, however, it is applied to a person who owns lands or tenements which he rents out to others.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. A term used to denote the relation which subsists by virtue of a contract, express or implied, between two or more persons, for the possession or occupation of lands or tenements either for a definite period, from year to year, for life, or at will.

When this relation is created by an express contract, the instrument made use of for the purpose is called a lease. See LEASE. But it may also arise by necessary implication from the circumstances of the case and the relative position of the parties to each other; for the law will imply its existence in many cases where there is an ownership of land on the one hand and an occupation of it by permission on the other; and in such cases it will be presumed that the occupant intends to compensate the owner for the use of the premises; 4 Pet. 84; 89 Ill. 578; 60 N. Y. 102. In an action for possession of land and damages for holding over after expiration of a term, proof that plaintiff was owner, that defendant paid rent to him, and that he was duly notified to surrender possession, establishes the relation of landlord and tenant; 3 Ind. App. 207. A tenancy is created by the occupation or temporary possession of land, the title to which is in another; 34 Ill. App. 357.

The intention to create. This relation may be inferred from a variety of circumstances; but the most obvious acknowledgment of its existence is the payment of rent; and this principle applies even after the expiration of a lease for a definite term of years; for if a tenant continues to hold over, after his term has run out, the landlord may, if he chooses, consider him a tenant, and he is, in fact, understood to do so, unless he proceeds to eject him at once. If the landlord suffers him to remain, and receives rent from him, or by any other act acknowledges him still as tenant, a new tenancy springs up, usually from year to year, regulated by the same covenants and stipulations entered into between the parties at the creation of the original term in so far as they are applicable to the altered nature of the tenancy; 15 Johns. 505; 4 M'Cord 59; 2 C. & P. 348; 42 Ind. 212; 43 Md. 446; 42 Cal. 316.

The payment of money, however, is only a prima facie acknowledgment of the existence of a tenancy; for if it does not appear to have been paid as rent, but has been paid by mistake or stands upon some other consideration, it will not be evidence of a subsisting tenancy; 4 Bingh. 91; 3 B. & C. 413; 4 M. & G. 143. Neither does a mere participation in the profits of land, where the owner is not excluded from possession, nor the letting of land upon shares, unless the occupant expressly agrees to pay a certain part of the crop as rent, in either case amount to a tenancy; 1 Gill & J. 266; 3 Zabr. 390; 2 Rawle 11; 42 Vt. 94; 60 N. Y. 221; 21 Ill. 200. The relation of landlord and tenant did not exist where the occupancy was simply by military force during the war of the rebellion; 23 Ct. Cls. 188.

But the relation of landlord and tenant will not be implied when the acts and conduct of the parties are inconsistent with its existence; 142 U. S. 396; nor will it be inferred from the mere occupation of land, if the relative position of the parties to each other can, under the circumstances of the case, be referred to any other distinct cause: as, for instance, between a vendor and vendee of land, where the purchaser remains in possession after the agreement to purchase falls through. For the possession in that case was evidently taken with the understanding of both parties that the occupant should be owner, and not tenant; and the other party cannot without his consent convert him into a tenant, so as to charge him with rent; Wood. L. & T. 12; 6 Johns. 46; 21 Me. 525; 8 M. & W. 118; 10 Cush. 259; 16 Vt. 257; 11 N. H. 148; 60 Barb. 463; 46 Me. 456; 12 B. Monr. 504; 16 Pet. 25; 17 Ind. 509; under such a contract the fact that a note given for the first instalment recites that it is given in part payment for rent, does not imply that in default of payment at maturity the relation of landlord and tenant becomes substituted for it; 54 Ark. 16. Where one entered on land under a bond for title, proof of declarations that he had agreed to pay rent is not evidence of abandonment, when he subsequently refused to surrender the bond for his notes, as a condition to renting the premises for another year; 112 N. C. 27. Where, by the terms of a trust deed, the grantor sold and delivered the possession to the trustee, and the latter leased to the grantor at a given rate until sale thereof, the grantor binding himself to surrender possession within ten days of that sale, it was held that the instrument created the relation of landlord and tenant; 45 Mo. App. 339. But see 75 Cal. 342.

The same principle applies to a mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as to that of a mortgagor and an assignee of the mortgagee; for no privity of the estate exists in either case; and, as a general rule, a tenancy by implication can never arise under a party who has not the legal estate of the premises in question; 2 M. & R. 303; 6 Ad. & E. 265; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 25; 16 Vt. 371.

Where mortgagees gave notice of the existence of the mortgage to the tenant of the mortgagor, and required him to pay them the rent thereafter, and the tenant remained in possession after the receipt of the notice, these circumstances alone were not sufficient to support an inference of an agreement that he should become tenant to the mortgagees; 2 Q. B. 484.

The question whether a transaction is a sale on instalments, with a pledge or mortgage to secure purchase money, or a tenancy, is one which frequently arises under the multiplicity of sales on instalments which are now made of both real and personal property. As, where real estate was mortgaged for a sum payable in instalments, with interest, and there was a provision that "the mortgagees lease to the mortgagor the said lands," the rent to be paid precisely as to amounts and times as was appointed for payment of the money secured, and to be in satisfaction thereof, with no clause authorizing distress or possession by the mortgagor until default, and the instrument was not executed by the mortgagees, it was held not to create the relation of landlord and tenant; 18 Can. S. C. R. 483. See SALE.

The relation of landlord and tenant has been held to exist, where a ranch was let, by a written covenant for a term of years, for a share of the produce, with provision for the sale of stock and produce, and division of profits; 96 Cal. 95; also under an agreement between the owner of stone quarry and another person that the latter shall work the quarry, sell the stone, and pay one-fifth of the proceeds to the former; 1 Misc. Rep. 240; 69 Hun 88; where a husband and wife live separately and he is in possession of her land with her knowledge; 38 Neb. 756; under a contract for a number of years at a certain rental per year, provided that all crops that may be made on said land are bound for said rent; 113 N. C. 444; where an occupant of land who without dissent hears the owner say that he would be considered as a tenant for a year at a specified rental unless he vacated immediately; 50 Mo. App. 80; where one had purchased land under a power of sale in a mortgage, which provided that the completion of the sale shall entitle the purchaser to immediate possession of the premises, and any holding of the same thereafter should be as tenant; 36 S. C. 274. The relation of landlord and tenant exists, so as to authorize a forcible detainer against a tenant in possession, whose lease was not enforceable because the premises were leased knowingly for immoral purposes; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 312. So where mortgagees of a stock of goods in a leased store building took possession of the goods therein, by permission of the mortgagors, and used the building to display and sell the goods, and kept the usual accounts of a retail store, they took possession of and occupied the building as tenants of its owner, and not as licensees of the mortgagors; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 988.

But a riparian owner holding the lease of a water-right of another riparian proprietor is not a tenant; 70 Cal. 103. Nor does the relation exist where a father deeds lands in fee-simple to his son, who is to give the father one-third of his crops until the latter should be in better financial condition, the son meanwhile to go ahead and improve the land as his own; 136 Ind. 349. Where the owner of a farm rented a house for one year for the use of his tenant who farmed on shares, and at the end of his term held over for a few weeks and then rented the farm under a new lease from the grantee, the latter was held not liable for the rent of the tenant-house for the new year; 34 Ill. App. 306. Occupation of lands by a person without recognizing the owner as his landlord, or any agreement to hold under and in subordination to him, is merely a trespass and does not create the relation of landlord and tenant; 21 Nev. 65. One in possession and use of premises under an agreement to keep off trespassers is practically a tenant; 79 Mich. 86. Where the crop growing on leased premises was sold under execution, the purchaser, who was also assignee of the judgment for rent under which the crop was sold, did not become a tenant of the lessor and could go upon the land to harvest the crop without incurring any liability to the lessor for the use of the land while the crop was ripening; 43 Kan. 216. One who rented from a mere occupant (the title being in a third person), could recover possession against the lessor who had entered upon the premises under proceedings for forcible entry and detainer; 8 Houst. 507.

Where a husband leased his wife's land for one year, with the option to the tenant for a further term of four years without authority from her, the receipt by the wife of the share of the farm products reserved by the lease for the first year did not operate by way of estoppel to create a five-years' term, not being an assent in writing as required by the statute of frauds; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 619.

The possessor of real estate under an unrecorded lease has no rights as against an attaching creditor; 45 La. Ann. 853. One who takes a secret lease from a third party without the knowledge of his landlord will not thereby change his possession; 33 W. Va. 236.

One who, when applying to lease a building, pays one month's rent which is returned to him upon the termination of negotiations for said rent without any lease being signed, has no rights in the premises; 148 Ill. 192.

A tenant who rents his half of the premises to his co-tenant is his landlord and entitled to a preference lien on the tenant's goods for his rent; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 436.

A tenant for life may lease his estate for the term of his life, and so retain his landlord's rights, on the lessee's default in an annual payment, to sue to remove him as a tenant holding over, and to recover the rent due; 90 Ga. 482.

Generally, the rights and obligations of the parties will be considered as having commenced from the date of the lease, if there be one, and no other time for its commencement has been agreed upon; or, if there be no date, then from the delivery of the papers. If, however, there be no writings, it will take effect from the day the tenant entered into possession, and not with reference to any particular quarter-day; 4 Johns. 230; 15 Wend. 656; 3 Camp. 510; Tayl. Landl. & T. 135 (11th ed.). And these rights and duties attach to each of the parties, not only in respect to each other, but also with reference to other persons who are strangers to the contract. The landlord retains certain rights over the property, although he has parted with its possession, while the tenant assumes obligations with respect to it which continue so long as he is invested with that character.

After the making of a lease, the right of possession, in legal contemplation, remains in the landlord until the contract is consummated by the entry of the lessee. When the tenant enters, this right of possession changes, and he draws to himself all the rights incident to possession. Where in a store building the lofts above were unconnected with the store and the access to them was by a separate door, the delivery of the store key with the continued use and occupation of the store was not a symbolical delivery of the lofts above, the separate keys of the door leading to them not being delivered; 3 App. Div. N. Y. 511. The landlord's rights in the premises during the term of the lease are confined to those expressly or impliedly derived from the contract of lease and to the protection of his reversionary interest. And he would have no right, in the nature of an easement, to use a sewer under the premises leased, in such manner as to make the latter untenantable; 147 N. Y. 248. He may maintain actions for such injuries as would, in the ordinary course of things, continue to affect his interest after the determination of the lease. But such injuries must be of a character permanently to affect the inheritance; such are breaking the windows of a house, cutting timber, or damming up a rivulet, whereby the timber on the estate becomes rotten; Woodf. L. & T. 973; 11 Mass. 519; 1 M. & S. 234; 3 Me. 6; 5 Duer 494; 26 How. Pr. 105.

The landlord usually reserves the right to go upon the premises peaceably, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any waste or injury has been committed by the tenant or other persons, first giving notice of his intention. But he has no such right unless he reserves it in the lease. He may also use all ways appurtenant thereto, and peaceably enter the premises to demand rent, to make such repairs as are necessary to prevent waste, or to remove an obstruction; 1 B. & C. 8; 7 Pick. 76; 5 Harr. 378. The entry of a landlord into demised premises for the purpose of rebuilding does not operate as an eviction, where it was with the tenant's assent and not to his entire exclusion; 151 Pa. 101. But if the rent is payable in hay or other produce, to be delivered to him from the farm, he is not entitled to go upon the land and take it, until it is delivered to him by the tenant, or until after it has been severed and set apart for his use: 9 Me. 137; 5 Blackf. 317.

Where the tenant abandoned the land, and executed a bill of sale of the crops, and the landlord entered before the delivery of the bill of sale, the latter passed no title as against the landlord, whose entry was held justified by the abandonment; 1 Marvel, Del.

The landlord's responsibilities in respect to possession, also, are suspended as soon as the tenant commences his occupation; 4 Term 318; 2 Sandf. 301; 2 Mo. App. 66. But if a stranger receive injuries from the ruinous state of the premises at the time of the demise, or from any fault in their construction, or from any nuisance thereon, even though it be created by a tenant's ordinary use of the premises, the landlord remains liable; 43 Barb. 482; L. R. 2 C. P. 311; 116 Mass. 67; 4 Hun 24; 20 Pa. 387; 2 Colo. App. 534; and if the landlord has undertaken to keep the premises in repair, and the injury be occasioned by his neglect to keep up the repairs, or if he renew the lease with a nuisance upon it, he will be likewise liable; 2 H. Bla. 350; 1 Ad. & E. 822; 67 Ill. 47. See 65 Hun 625. The landlord may be liable for not disclosing a concealed source of danger not discoverable by the tenant, if he not only knows the source of danger but also knows, or common experience shows, that it is dangerous; 147 Mass. 471. In an action by lessee for breach of covenant in a lease to repair, the measure of damages is the difference between the rent the lessee agreed to pay and the rental value of the premises without the repairs having been made; 76 Md. 409.

The principal obligation on the part of the landlord, which is, in fact, always to be implied from the operative words of the lease, but is also usually inserted as a distinct covenant, is that the tenant shall enjoy the quiet possession of the premises, —which means, substantially, that he shall not be turned out of possession of the whole or any material part of the premises by one having a title paramount to that of landlord, or that the landlord shall not himself disturb or render his occupation uncomfortable by the erection of a nuisance on or near the premises, which the law holds tantamount to an eviction; Jack. & Gr. L. & T. § 935; 8 Co. 80 b; 13 N. Y. 151; 5 Day 282; 29 Md. 35; 10 Gray 258; 3 Duer 464; 6 Dowl. & R. 349. But express covenants for quiet enjoyment are framed usually only against eviction by a paramount title and against the lessor, his heirs, and those claiming under them; implied covenants have a similar effect. So that if the tenant be ousted by a stranger, that is, by one having no title, or if the molestation proceeds from the acts of a third person, the landlord is in neither case responsible for it; 1 Term 671; 5 Hill, N. Y. 599; 13 East 73; 25 Barb. 594; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 304. See 160 Mass. 421.

Another obligation which the law imposes upon the landlord, in the absence of any express stipulation in the lease, is the payment of all arrears of ground-rent, or interest upon mortgages to which the property leased may be subject. The tenant of property subject to ground-rent is not personally liable unless by express contract in writing he has assumed payment of it; 86 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 923. The same rule applies as regards all taxes chargeable on the premises, though, as regards these, statutes, both in England and in almost all the United States, have been passed expressly imposing the duty of paying them on the landlord. Sometimes covenants to that effect are inserted in the lease. In general, every landlord is bound to protect his immediate tenant against all paramount claims; and if a tenant is compelled, in order to protect himself in the enjoyment of the land in respect of which his rent is payable, to make payment which ought, as between himself and his landlord, to have been made by the latter, he may call upon the landlord to reimburse him, or he may set off such payment against the rent due or to become due; 3 B. & Ald. 647; 3 M. & W. 312; 19 Mo. 501.

There is no implied warranty on the part of the landlord that the premises are safe or reasonably fit for habitation, for the purpose for which they are intended; 25 Wend. 669; 71 Pa. 383; 3 Gray 323; 48 Me. 316; 147 Mass. 471; 70 Tex. 727; 147 U. S. 413 (but see 3 Rob. La. 52). In the absence of fraud or deceit the landlord is not liable for damages suffered by the lessee because of the unfitness of the premises; 65 Vt. 478; and a railroad company letting a house on a mountain side where snow-slides sometimes occurred, was held not bound to notify the tenant of the danger, although the company knew of it, but the tenant did not and had never lived in a region where snow-slides occurred, and, in the absence of deceit or misrepresentation, the company was not liable for injuries to the tenant or death of members of her family, by the destruction of the house by snow-slide; 147 U. S. 413; but where a building is let to different tenants, the landlord is charged with the duty of keeping the halls and those portions of the building which are for the common use of the tenants in safe condition, and properly furnished with light at night; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 886. So the landlord is charged with the duty of guarding an elevator shaft for the protection of persons properly in and about the premises, if he rents the building to different tenants; 13 Misc. Rep. 496; or retains control of a portion of the premises himself; 40 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 950; and where the premises were let with a nuisance on them, which was the cause of an injury to a third person, the owner was liable; 31 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 507; 64 Hun 179. So the owner is liable to one injured by the falling of a fire wall and cornice when the building was leased to several tenants, the portions falling not being in the control of any one of them and there being no agreement for repairs by the tenants; 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 953. But where the owner of an apartment house failed to light the hall in which were two adjacent doors, one opening on the stairs and the other into a water-closet used by all the occupants of the house, and a visitor opened the wrong door, and fell downstairs, it was held that the owner was not negligent in failing to light the hall and to keep the stair door locked; 131 N. Y. 674. And the owner of an apartment house was held not liable for injuries, caused by defective steps, received by a visitor going from a wake held in the house to which she had neither an express invitation nor one by implication as a relative or friend of the deceased; 156 Mass. 475; nor was a landlord liable for injuries received by a third person by falling into a coal-hole where there was no fault in its construction, and it was not out of repair; 17 R. I. 137.

Subject to such expressions as those indicated above, it has been the rule that the occupant and not the owner of premises is liable for injuries caused by failure to keep them in repair; 156 Mass. 84; and accordingly, the landlord is not liable to third persons, rightfully upon the premises, for injuries caused by the defective condition thereof unless charged with notice, or by reasonable diligence he could have acquired knowledge; 87 Ill. App. 160; 44 id. 105; whether such third persons be in a hotel kept by the tenant; 82 Wis. 839; 156 Mass. 329; or persons visiting the tenant socially; 66 Hun 633; or servants of the tenant; 3 Wash. 722; 156 Mass. 511; but where the landlord is in control of machinery within the leased building and furnishes the power for it, and is negligent in that regard, an employe of the tenant is entitled to recover: 154 Mass. 539. See APARTMENT; FLAT.

The English court of appeal has recently laid down two rules. One is "that the landlord of a house let on a weekly tenancy is under no liability to the tenant to let or to maintain it in good repair." The other is, "that such landlord is not responsible to a person who is in the house on the tenant's business for injuries caused by a structural defect in the premises which existed at the time of the letting." The landlord may be held liable for an injury to a passer-by due to a defect which dates from the time the house was let; [1894] 1 Q. B. 164; and he is liable to a stranger on the highway for injuries caused by a defect in a coalplate, which was not proved to have existed at the beginning of the tenancy; 57 L. J. Q. B. 507; but the ground of this decision has been questioned; 55 Alb. L. J. 27.

The landlord is, in the absence of any express covenant or agreement, under no obligation to make any repairs; 42 Neb. 376; 152 Pa. 626; and a promise to repair, made by the landlord during the tenancy without any other consideration than the existence of such tenancy, is without consideration and cannot be enforced; 16 Misc. Rep. 528; but a provision in the lease by which the lessee is "to keep the fences in repair, the material for which to be furnished by the lessor" creates an express covenant of the lessee to repair, performance of which was not excused by the lessor's failure to furnish the material; 174 Pa. 588.

Where the lease provides that repairs shall be made at the tenant's expense "unless by special agreement the lessor undertakes to pay for the same," a subsequent agreement by lessor to pay for repairs is binding upon him; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 166. Where the lessor covenants to keep the outside of the building in good repair, he is obliged to put it in good repair where that is needed at the time of the execution of the lease; 33 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 445. In Philadelphia, by custom, certain substantial repairs are to be made by the landlord; 7 Phila. 472; and it is said that a covenant by the lessor to repair includes the duty of rebuilding in case of fire; 58 Ill. App. 87 And it is not in the power of a tenant to make repairs at the expense of his landlord, unless there be a special agreement between them authorizing him to do so; for the tenant takes the premises for better or for worse, and cannot involve the landlord in expense for repairs without his consent; 6 Cow. 475; 1 Ry. & M. 357; 7 M. & G. 576; 52 N. Y. 512; 51 Ill. 492; 33 Cal. 341; 1 Sandf. 321; 22 Ind. 114; 36 Vt. 40; 7 Ind. App. 561; 26 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 193. Even if the premises have become uninhabitable by fire, and the landlord, having insured them, has recovered the insurance money, the tenant cannot compel him to expend the money so recovered in rebuilding, unless he has expressly engaged to do so; nor can he, in such an event, protect himself from the payment of rent during the unexpired balance of the term; Jack. & Gr. L. & T. § 1049; 8 Paige 437; 1 Sim. 146; 1 E. & E. 474; 52 N. Y. 512; 81 Ill. 607; 85 Ala. 99. See 40 La. Ann. 264; 134 N. Y. 349; 3 Misc. Rep. 237.

It has been held that even where the owner of a building had recovered on a fire policy the full loss sustained by the burning of his building caused by the storage of cotton by his tenants in violation of their lease, he may sue and recover from the lessees for the damage to the building; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 615.

On the part of the tenant, we may observe that on taking possession he is at once invested with all the rights incident to possession, and is entitled to the use of all privileges and easements appurtenant to the premises.

A tenant has an implied right to use appurtenances of a building, a portion of which is rented by him; 125 Mass. 287; 145 id. 1; 158 id. 577. Where the lease of a salesroom provided that the lessee should be allowed the use of the elevator to bring goods from an upper floor in an adjoining estate connecting with the elevator, and subsequent leases were made letting rooms in an upper part of the building to the same lessee, with "one-horse power only," and no lease gave the express right to use the elevator to carry goods from the basement to the sidewalk or vice versa, it was held that there was no evidence from which the right to such use could be implied, although the lessor permitted it; 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 618. The tenant may also maintain an action against any person who disturbs his possession or trespasses upon the premises, though it be the landlord himself; 2 B. & Ad. 97; 1 Den. 91; 17 C. B. N. S. 678; 8 Cush. 119; 1 Ohio 251; 4 Wash. 749; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 483; he is entitled to an injunction to restrain a nuisance affecting health and comfort in the use of the premises; 46 La. Ann. 78; and may sue for damages to his crops by the overflow of his lands caused by the wrongful construction of a railroad bank; 55 Ill. App. 251; and even after the expiration of his term may recover for injuries done during the period of his tenancy; 2 Rolle, Abr. 551; Holt, N. P. C. 553. One who enters upon land by the permission, sufferance, or consent of the tenant, is at once charged by the law with the allegiance due from the tenant to his lessor; 99 N. C. 551. As occupant, he is also answerable for any neglect to repair highways, fences, or party-wall. He is liable for all injuries produced by the mismanagement of his servants, or by a nuisance kept upon the premises, or by an obstruction of the highway adjacent to them, or the like; for, as a general rule, where a man is in possession of property, he must so manage it that other persons shall not be injured thereby; 3 Q. B. 449; 2 Ld. Raym. 792; 22 N. Y. 355; 65 Ill. 160; 1 M. & W. 435; 51 Pa. 429; 3 Hun 708.

Another obligation which the law imposes upon every tenant, independent of any agreement, is to treat the premises in such a manner that no substantial injury shall be done to them, and so that they may revert to the landlord at the end of the term, unimpaired by any wilful or negligent conduct on his part. In the language of the books, he must keep the buildings wind-and-water-tight, and is bound to make fair and tenantable repairs, such as the keeping of fences in order, or replacing doors and windows that are broken during his occupation. Except where the lease contains a special exemption from that duty, the tenant is responsible for any waste committed on the demised premises; 57 Ill. App. 659. If it is a furnished house, he must preserve the furniture, and leave it, with the linen, etc., clean and in good order; 5 C. & P. 239; 4 M. & G. 95; 12 M. & W. 827; 55 Md. 71.

Where he had a covenant to keep the premises in a cleanly and healthy condition, he was justified in abandoning them where the landlord constantly rendered them uninhabitable by filling up an open sewer under the premises after the tenant had cleaned it out; 147 N. Y. 248. A covenant to keep in repair imposed on the tenant is ordinarily one to keep the premises in as good repair as they were when the lease was made; 36 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 602.

But he is not bound to rebuild premises which have accidentally become ruinous during his occupation; nor is he answerable for ordinary wear and tear, nor for an accidental fire, nor to put a new roof on the building, nor to make what are usually called general or substantial repairs. Neither is he bound to do painting, whitewashing, or papering, except so far as they may be necessary to preserve exposed timber from decay. In general he need do nothing which will make the inheritance better than he found it; 6 C. & P. 8; 12 Ad. & E. 476; 1 Marsh. 567; 10 B. & C. 299; 2 Daly 140; 10 Q. B. 135; Jack. & Gr. L. & T. § 965.

There is no implied contract binding the lessee to restore buildings which have been destroyed by accident; 180 Pa. 409. Under a covenant by the lessee to deliver up the premises in as good condition as when the lease was made, unavoidable (or inevitable) accident excepted, the landlord is not liable for the repairs to a window broken by a storm; 42 Neb. 376; or for one broken by a stone kicked by a passing horse; 43 Ill. App. 360. If there be an express covenant by the tenant to repair, he must do so though the premises be destroyed by fire; 91 Pa. 88; contra, if there is no express covenant to repair; 94 U. S. 53. Where the lease required the tenant to "cash any repairs" on the leased premises to a specified amount, the landlord acquires no right to charge the tenant with repairs made by himself; 44 Neb. 818. Under a covenant that the tenant shall "make the necessary repairs," he is liable for the breaking of a plate glass in the building, though without his fault; 9 Misc. Rep. 326. Where an explosion occurred in a leased building, the landlord was not relieved of the burden of showing negligence of the lessee; 36 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 923.

Where the tenant had covenanted to make the repairs but the landlord authorized his agent to do some repairing in the course of which, by reason of unskilful workmanship, the wall fell upon a tenant's goods, the landlord was liable; 28 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1017.

With respect to farming leases, a tenant is under a similar obligation to repair; but it differs from the general obligation in this, that it is confined to the dwelling-house which he occupies,—the burden of repairing and maintaining the out-buildings and other erections on the farm being sustained either by the landlord, or the tenant, in the absence of any express provision in the lease, by the particular custom of the country in which the farm is situated. He is always bound, however, to cultivate the farm in a good and husband-like manner, to keep the fences in repair, and to preserve the timber and ornamental trees in good condition; and for any violation of any of these duties he is liable to be proceeded against by the landlord for waste, whether the act of waste be committed by the tenant or, through his negligence, by a stranger; Co. Litt. 53; 1 Taunt. 198; 1 Denio 104; 55 Pa. 347; 70 Ill. 527; 94 U. S. 53; 5 Term 373. As to what constitutes waste, see WASTE.

The tenant's general obligation to repair also renders him responsible for any injury a stranger may sustain by his neglect to keep the premises in a safe condition; as, by not keeping the covers of his vaults sufficiently closed, so that a person walking in the street falls through, or is injured thereby. If he repairs or improves the building, he must guard against accident to the passers-by in the street, by erecting a suitable barricade, or stationing a person there to give notice of the danger; 109 Mass. 398; 22 N. Y. 366; 65 Barb. 214; L. R. 2 C. P. 311; L. R. 5 Q. B. 501. For any unreasonable obstruction which he places in the highway adjoining his premises, he may be indicted for causing a public nuisance, as well as rendered liable to an action for damages, at the suit of any individual injured. Nor may the tenant keep dangerous animals on the premises; 4 Den. 500; 15 Vt. 404. At common law, if a fire began in a dwelling-house and spread to neighboring buildings, the tenant of the house where the fire began was liable in damages to all whose property was injured. But by a statute of Queen Anne, amended by stat. 14 Geo. III. c. 78, this right of action has been taken away. The statute is generally re-enacted in the United States; vide Tayl. L. & T. § 196.

The tenant's chief duty, however, is the payment of rent, the amount of which is either fixed by the terms of the lease, or, in the absence of an express agreement, is such a reasonable compensation for the occupation of the premises as they are fairly worth. If there has been no particular agreement between the parties, the tenant pays rent only for the time he has had the beneficial enjoyment of the premises; but if he has entered into an express agreement to pay rent during the term, no casualty or injury to the premises by fire or otherwise, nothing, in fact, short of an eviction, will excuse him from such payment; Woodf. L. & T. 819; 4 Paige, Ch. 355; 1 H. & J. 42; 16 Mass. 240; 7 Gray 560; 10 M. & W. 321; 6 Phila. 457; 72 Pa. 685; 61 N. Y. 356; 80 Ill. 532; 4 Harr. & J. 564. See 1 App. D. C. 447; 8 Misc. Rep. 307. But this is not the law in South Carolina; 1 Bay 499; 4 McCord 447. But, if he has been deprived of the possession of the premises by the landlord, or by a third person, under a title paramount to that of the landlord, or if the latter annoys his tenant, or erects or causes the erection of such a nuisance upon or near the premises as renders the tenant's occupation so uncomfortable as to justify his removal, he is in either case discharged from the payment of rent; 4 N. Y. 217; 4 Rawle 339; Co. Litt. 148 b; 75 Ill. 536; 117 Mass. 262; 106 Mass. 201; 18 N. Y. 509; 63 Ill. 430; 2 Ired. Eq. 350; 17 C. B. 30. If, however, part only of the premises be recovered by paramount title, the rent is apportioned, and the tenant remains liable in proportion to the part from which he has not been evicted; Woodf. L. & T. 1115; 2 East 575; 39 Barb. 59; 1 Allen 489. See RENT. A tenant's liability for rent is not affected by condemnation of part of the demised premises, but it ceases where the estate in the entire premises is extinguished; 136 Ill. 37; 144 id. 537.

The obligation to pay rent may be apportioned; for, as rent is incident to the reversion, it will become payable to the assignees of the respective portions thereof whenever that reversion is severed by an act of the parties or of the law. But the tenant's consent is necessary for an apportionment when made by the landlord, unless the proportion of rent chargeable upon each portion of the land has been settled by the intervention of a jury; 22 Wend. 121; 5 B. & Ald. 876; 1 M. & G. 577; 6 Halst. 262; 22 Pick. 569. A tenant, however, cannot get rid of or apportion his rent by transferring the whole or a part of his lease; for if he assigns it, or underlets a portion of it, he still remains liable to his landlord for the whole; Cro. Eliz. 633; 24 Barb. 333. Instances of an apportionment by act of law occur where there is a descent of the reversion among a number of heirs, or upon a judicial sale of a portion of the premises; for in such cases the tenant will be bound to pay rent to each of the parties for the portion of the premises belonging to them respectively. So, if a man dies, leaving a widow, she will have a right to receive one-third of the rent, while the remaining two-thirds will be payable to his heirs; so, if a part of the demised premises be taken for public purposes, the tenant is entitled to an apportionment; Co. Litt. 148 a; 25 Wend. 456; 13 Ill. 625; 20 Mo. 24; 57 Pa. 271; 3 Whart. 357. At common law rent could not be apportioned as to time; 2 Ves. Sr. 672; 3 Watts 394. But various statutes, such as 11 Geo. II. c. 19, both in England and the United States, have mitigated the hardships resulting from an enforcement of this rule. See Tayl. L. & T. § 389; Mitch. R. P. 69.

A tenant is estopped to deny the validity of his landlord's title; 8 U. S. App. 149; 38 W. Va. 607; 8 Misc. Rep. 268; 147 Ill. 269; 113 N. C. 410; 4 App. Div. N. Y. 523; 3 Okl. 223, 260; 16 So. Rep. (Ala.) 14; 89 Wis. 394; 107 Cal. 107; unless he first surrender to him the possession; 98 id. 422. Under this rule one who goes into possession under the guardian of minor heirs cannot question their title; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 174; even after the expiration of the lease, the tenant is bound by the same rule, unless he surrender possession or give notice that he will thereafter claim under another and valid title; 26 Or. 494; this applies to persons who have entered by the owner's permission, and while in possession never denied his title, and their assignees are likewise estopped; 8 Wash. 603. After the termination of the lease, the lessee may, without a surrender of possession, assert a claim to a superior title; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 441; but a tenant in possession under a lease, who afterwards obtains an outstanding title to an undivided interest in the premises, cannot sue the lessor for partition without first surrendering the possession to the lessor; 97 Ala. 414. Where a widow joined in a lease with heirs, who conveyed to the tenant, the latter was still estopped to deny the tenancy as to the widow and was liable to her for her share of the rents; 6 Misc. Rep. 413. A lessee who takes a lease from an adverse claimant to the title is estopped to deny the title of the latter when sued for rent; 158 Pa. 457. The tenant is not estopped from showing that the title under which he entered has expired or been extinguished by operation of law; 34 Fla. 610; 32 id. 304; or that the landlord has parted with his title; 24 Ore. 475; although one who enters under a tenant cannot deny the title of the landlord without surrendering possession, yet if he enters under a valid lease, he is not estopped from defending his possession under it, but the landlord is estopped in such a case from denying the right of the lessee to possession under a lease expressly conferring such a right; 107 Cal. 455; nor is the lessee estopped to deny the lessor's title where the land was public domain, not the subject of lease without right from the state; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 822.

The fact that by inadvertence or mistake the tenant paid rent to the landlord after his interest terminated does not constitute a continuance of the tenancy: 55 Mo. App. 662. Where there was a fraudulent agreement between the landlord and tenant to evade the homestead laws, it was held that a general rule did not apply, and that the tenant might set up and prove the fraudulent agreement in an action of ejectment by the landlord; 55 Kan. 259; so where the landlord has induced one to become his tenant by fraud or mistake the latter may contest the title of the former; 118 Mo. 286. A third person having brought goods upon the land by permission of the tenant, and not claiming possession, is not estopped from disputing the title of the landlord; [1893] 2 Q. B. 168.

One who is a tenant of the grantee by a dower right, and as such in possession of lands, will be, after the death of the doweress, a tenant at sufferance of the reversioners, and if he permits the lands to be sold for taxes, he cannot purchase them and set up the title against the reversioners without notice, but his purchase is to be considered a redemption in favor of the landlord; 19 So. Rep. (Miss.) 348.

These rights and liabilities are not confined to the immediate parties to the contract, but will be found to attach to all persons to whom the estate may be transferred, or who may succeed to the possession of the premises, either as landlords or tenants. This principle follows as a necessary consequence of that privity of estate which is incident to the relation of landlord and tenant. A landlord may not violate his tenant's rights by a sale of the property; neither can a tenant avoid his responsibilities by substituting another tenant in his stead without the landlord's consent. The purchaser of the property becomes in one case the landlord, and is entitled to all the rights and remedies against the tenant or his assignee which the seller had; while in the other case the assignee of the lessee assumes all the liabilities of the latter, and is entitled to the same protection which he might claim from the assignee of the reversion; in the case of express covenants, the original lessee is not by the transfer discharged from his obligations; 24 Barb. 365; 19 N. Y. 68; 1 Ves. & B. Ch. 11; 4 Term 94; 17 Vt. 626; 2 W. & S. 556; 12 Miss. 43; 3 Misc. Rep. 95; 47 Mo. App. 45; 155 Pa. 38; 34 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 840. In case of implied covenants he is discharged if the landlord specially accept the assignee as his tenant; 9 Vt. 191; 3 Rep. 22; 1 Sm. L. Cas. *176; and the liability of the assignee may be at any time terminated by him, by a transfer of the estate assigned, even if the transfer be made to a pauper with express intent to evade liability; 3 Y. & C. 96; 9 Cow. 88; 9 Vt. 181. A tenant who accepts a lease from and attorns to one who succeeds to the ownership of the land, is estopped, in an action to recover possession, from setting up any defence under a lease from a former owner, under which he had entered; 167 Ill. 564, aff'g 68 Ill. App. 361. And it has been held that a tenant is under a legal obligation to pay rent to one to whom the lease is assigned by the landlord, without any formal act of attornment; 71 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 836. A lessor who accepts rent from an assignee of the lease thereby waives a provision of the lease that it shall be void if assigned without the lessor's consent; 78 Hun 443.

The relation of landlord and tenant may be terminated in several ways. If it is a tenancy for life, it will of course terminate upon the decease of him upon whose life the lease depends; 6 Misc. Rep. 377; but if it be for life, or for a certain number of years, and depend upon some particular event, the happening of that event will determine the tenancy. So if it be for a certain number of years, independent of any contingency, it will expire at the last moment of the last day of the tenancy. See 55 N. J. L. 217; 76 Hun 67. And in all these cases depending upon the express conditions of the lease, no notice to quit will be necessary in order to dissolve the relation of the parties to each other; Co. Litt. 216; 9 Ad. & E. 879; 5 Johns. 128; 1 Pick. 43; 2 S. & R. 49; 18 Me. 264; 7 Halst. 99. A tenant after the expiration of his term becomes a trespasser, though his holding is in good faith under a color and reasonable claim of right; and the landlord without legal process may forcibly enter, therefore, and eject him; 16 R. I. 524; 17 id. 731; and by holding over after the expiration of the term, a tenant for years does not become a tenant for another year, unless the landlord so elects; 157 Ill. 90; if he holds over after a notice of increase of rent, the effect is to make him a tenant for another year upon the terms of the old lease with the single exception of the increased rent; 58 Ill. App. 228; and a tenant for one year, with the privilege of three, is bound for the latter if he elected to hold over; 2 Mo. App. 1047.

But a tenancy from year to year, or at will, can only be terminated on the part of the landlord by a notice to quit. This notice might at common law be by parol, but by statute in England and in most of the United States must now be in writing; 3 Burr. 1603; 2 Brewst. 528; it must be explicit, and require the tenant to remove from the premises; 2 Clark, Pa. 219; 2 Gray 335; Dougl. 175; 5 Ad. & E. 850; it must be served upon the tenant, and not upon an under tenant; it must run in the name of the landlord, and not of his agent; 10 Johns. 270. But personal service of the notice on the tenant is not absolutely essential, and it is sufficient if the notice be left at the tenant's usual residence with his wife or servant; 4 Tenn. 464; L. R. 5 H. L. 134; 103 Mass. 154; 44 Mo. 581. An estate at will must be mutual; if one party can terminate the lease at any time, so can the other; 83 Va. 547. Such a tenancy is terminated by the alienation of the premises, without notice to the tenant; 38 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 540. Whether a tenant from year to year is in any event bound to give notice to determine the tenancy seems doubtful. See the authorities collected in Bright. Pa. 463. At common law this notice was required to be one of half a year, ending with the period of the year at which the tenancy commenced; 1 W. Bla. 596; 7 Q. B. 638; 4 Bing. 362; and this rule prevails in Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, Vermont, Illinois, and New Jersey as to tenancies from year to year; 1 Johns. 322; 22 Vt. 88; 4 Ired. 291; 3 Green, N. J. 181; 4 Kent 113; 6 Yerg. 431; 8 Cow. 13; 39 Ill. 378. In Delaware, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Michigan, three months' notice is required; Del. Rev. Code Ch. 120, § 4; 4 Fost. 219; 2 Rich. S. C. 346; 11 Pa. 472; 34 id. 96; 113 Mass. 214; while the New York statutes provide for its termination by giving one month's notice wherever there is a tenancy at will or by sufferance, created by the tenant holding over after the term or otherwise; 1 R. S. 745, § 7; 3 Misc. Rep. 99.

In case of such a tendency, in default of notice, the landlord has no right of entry until the term granted has terminated by legal notice, and in default of such notice, the tenant may hold over; 8 Houst. 507. The subject is in general governed by statutory rules too numerous and complicated to set forth. Where a lease provides for the termination of a tenancy upon the tenant's ceasing to work for the landlord and the tenant voluntarily ceases so to work, no notice of the termination of the lease to the tenant is necessary; 8 U. S. App. 149.

The relation of landlord and tenant will also be dissolved when the tenant incurs a forfeiture of his lease by the breach of some covenant or condition therein contained. At common law a forfeiture was incurred if the tenant did any act which was inconsistent with his relation to his landlord; as if he impugned the title of his lessor by affirming by matter of record the fee to be in a stranger, claimed a greater estate than he was entitled to, or undertook to alienate the estate in fee; Co. Litt. 251 b, 252 a; 12 East 444. But these causes of forfeiture, founded upon strict feudal principles, have been generally abolished in the United States; and a forfeiture of a term of years now only occurs in consequence of a breach of some express stipulation contained in the lease, as for the commission of waste, non-payment of rent, or the like; 7 Paige, Ch. 350; 5 B. & C. 855; 22 Md. 122; 20 Ill. 125; 32 Mich. 315. In order to work a forfeiture for non-payment of rent, a demand must be made for the rent, though such demand may be in the form of a notice to quit; 35 Neb. 766; 140 U. S. 25. A delay of a few days in declaring a lease forfeited for non-payment of rent does not constitute a waiver of the right of forfeiture; 145 Ill. 238. A provision of a lease that failure of the lessee to make a payment when due should render the lease null and void, and not binding on either party, does not make the lease void, except at the option of the lessor; 159 Pa. 184. A forfeiture may be waived by an acceptance of, or distraining for, rent which became due after a breach committed by the tenant, or by giving a notice to quit, or by any other act which acknowledges the continuance of the tenancy; 8 Watts 51; 2 N. H. 163; 3 H. & M. 436; 1 M. & W. 408; 6 Wisc. 323; L. R. 7 Q. B. 344; 21 Wend. 537; 40 Mo. 449; 96 Cal. 95; 6 Misc. Rep. 408; and will be relieved against by the courts in all cases where it happened accidentally, or where the injury is capable of compensation, the damages on equitable principles being a mere matter of computation; 12 Ves. Ch. 475; 2 Price 206; 9 Mod. 22; Story, Eq. § 1314; 62 N. Y. 486; 44 Vt. 285; and it is always at the election of the lessor to avail himself of his right of re-entry for conditions broken or not as he pleases; 6 B. & C 519; and vide 7 W. & S. 41; 38 Pa. 346; 12 Barb. 440; 5 Cush. 281; 29 Conn. 331; 1 Wall. 64.

Another means of dissolving a tenancy is by an operation of law, termed a merger,—which happens where a tenant purchases the fee of the reversion, or the fee descends to him as heir at law, the lease becoming thereby merged in the inheritance, the lesser estate being absorbed in the greater. To produce this result, however, it is necessary that the two estates should meet in the same person and in the same right; for if he who has the reversion in fee marries the tenant for years, or if a tenant makes the landlord his executor, the term of years is in neither case merged, because in either case he holds the fee for his own benefit, while the term of years is taken in one case for his wife's use, and in the other for the benefit of the estate he represents as executor; Woodf. L. & T. 1188; 12 N. Y. 526; Co. Litt. 288 b; 1 Washb. R. P. 354; 13 Pa. 16; 35 N. Y. 279. See 86 Tenn. 642. But the universal current of opinion now sets against the operation of the doctrine of merger wherever a result will be produced contrary to the intentions of the parties or prejudicial to the interests of third parties; 34 N. Y. 320; 4 Gray 385; 4 De G. M. & G. 474; 3 Hill 96; 4 Paige 408.

In addition to the several methods of putting an end to a tenancy already mentioned, we may add that it is, of course, competent for a tenant at any time to surrender his lease to the landlord; 117 Mass. 357; 16 Johns. 28; 19 Cal. 354; but a mere agreement to surrender a lease, is inoperative unless accompanied by the act; 41 Ill. App. 223. An express surrender can only be made by deed in England, since the Statute of Frauds, and this provision is in some of the states re-enacted; 8 Taunt. 270; 11 Wend. 616; 8 Allen 202; 8 Wisc. 141. But a surrender by operation of law is a case excepted out of the statute; as, for example, where, during the period of the old lease, a new one, inconsistent with it in its terms, is accepted, the old lease is at an end; 8 Johns. 394; 99 Mass. 18; Tayl. L. & T. 512; 117 Mass. 357; 53 Minn. 480. If the subject-matter of the lease wholly perishes; 26 N. Y. 498; 118 Mass. 125; 38 Cal. 259; or is required to be taken for public uses; 38 Mo. 143; 20 Pick. 159; 57 Pa. 271; 119 Mass. 28; 43 N. Y. 377; or the tenant disclaims to hold under his landlord, and therefore refuses to pay his rent, asserts the title to be in himself or unlawfully attorns to another, the tenancy is at an end, and the landlord may forthwith resume the possession; 3 Pet. 43; 4 Wend. 633; 21 Cal. 342; 8 Watts 55; 5 Dana 101; 23 Gratt. 332.

Where the tenant, by consent of his landlord, continues in possession after the expiration of his term, in the absence of a new agreement, the law will imply a tacit renewal of the former one; 41 Ill. App. 209; 88 Ga. 610: [1893] 1 Q. B. 736. See 49 Mo. App. 631; 38 W. Va. 607.

After the tenancy has ended, the right of possession reverts to the landlord, who may re-enter upon the premises if he can do so without violence. But if the tenant holds over and the landlord takes possession forcibly, so as to endanger a breach of the peace, he runs the risk of being punished criminally for a forcible entry (see FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER) as well as of suffering the consequences of an action of trespass; 121 Mass. 309; 59 Me. 568; 4 Am. Law Rev. 429; 1 M. & G. 644; 1 W. & S. 90. The landlord should, therefore, in all such cases, call in the law to his assistance, and receive possession at the hands of the sheriff.

The tenant, on his part, is bound quietly to yield up the possession of the entire premises; 148 Ill. 192. And for refusal to perform this duty he will be liable for rent; 51 N. Y. 509; 84 Ill. 62; 62 Me. 248; E. B. & E. 326.

If the tenant, after surrendering possession, resumed it under any agreement with his landlord or his agent, though made by the latter without authority, he is not liable for holding over; 1 App. Div. N. Y. 449; and where a tenant vacated a building and delivered up the key, leaving a press on the premises, which was used by his employes, who had entered the building some days after without his knowledge, he did not hold over; 5 id. 124. Where the lessee holds over, he may be treated by the landlord at his option as a tenant or a trespasser; 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 243; 12 Misc. Rep. 348. The tenant cannot avoid his responsibility for the rent of another term by notice that he is going to quit, and then not doing it; 169 Pa. 460. Where the agent of the lessor failed to make an answer to the tenant's proposition to hold over as tenant by the month, he was not thereby relieved from the consequences of holding over; 168 Pa. 541. The burden is on the tenant to relieve himself from an action for unlawful detainer by showing the agreement for the renewal of the tenancy; 56 Mo. App. 440.

But where a tenant for years had planted a crop, after a decree foreclosing a mortgage on the leased land under which the land was sold before the crop matured, and the purchaser having notified the tenant that he would expect rent in money or in kind, the latter was held entitled to the crop; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 32. Upon the abandonment of a farm by a tenant before the end of the term, the possessory right in whatever property is on the farm, including harvested crops, reverts to the lessor; 9 Houst. 281.

The tenant has a reasonable right of egress and regress for the purpose of removing his goods and chattels; 2 Bla. Com. 14; 24 Me. 424; L. R. 5 C. P. 334. He may, also, in certain cases, take such estovers as are attached to the estate and the emblements or annual profits of the land after his tenancy is ended, as to which his rights are largely affected by local customs (see ESTOVERS; EMBLEMENTS); 86 Ala. 508; 56 Conn. 374; but a tenant for years is not entitled to them; 48 Mo. App. 430: nor where the landlord re-enters and takes possession because of the failure of the tenant to pay rent; 69 Hun 588: and, unless restricted by some stipulation to the contrary, may remove such fixtures as he has erected during his occupation for his comfort and convenience, particularly if for trade purposes. As between landlord and tenant, whatever is affixed to the land by the tenant for the purpose of trade, whether it be made of wood or brick, is removable at the end of the term; 142 U. S. 396; 139 N. Y. 432. See FIXTURES.

The ordinary common-law remedy by which a landlord proceeds to recover the possession of his premises is by an action of ejectment, and in these cases it is a general rule that the tenant is never permitted, for reasons of sound public policy, to controvert his landlord's title, or to set up against him a title acquired by himself during his tenancy which is hostile in its character to that which he acknowledged in accepting the demise: 3 B. & C. 413; 2 Denio 481; 3 Ad. L. & E. 188; 15 N. Y. 327; 61 Me. 590; 54 Pa. 196; 42 Md. 81; 72 N. C. 294; 18 Wall. 431; 133 Ind. 14. But to this rule there are some exceptions: of these the chief are cases where the landlord's interest has expired during the lease; 2 Zab. 261;

Tayl. L. & T. § 706; or where he has sold and conveyed the land; 10 Md. 333; 50 Ill. 232; 99 Mass. 15; or where the tenant has been evicted by title paramount, and accepted a new lease under the real owner of the premises; 69 Pa. 316; 66 Me. 167; 32 Mich. 285.

But the slow and measured progress of the action of ejectment in most cases affords a very inadequate remedy to the landlord; and in order, therefore, to obviate the evils arising from its delays, the statutes of the different states provide a summary proceeding, by which a landlord may be speedily reinstated, upon short notice, in cases where a tenant abandons the premises before the end of the term without surrendering the lease, leaving rent in arrear, continues to hold over after the expiration of his term, or has become unable or unwilling to pay rent for the use of the premises; 22 Wend. 611; Tayl. L. & T. § 713.

LANDLORD'S WARRANT. A warrant of distress. A written authority from a landlord to a constable or bailiff authorizing him to make a distress upon the tenant's goods and chattels in order to force the payment of rent or some covenant in a lease. See DISTRESS; LANDLORD & TENANT.

LANDS. See LAND; LANDS, PUBLIC.

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACTS. Important acts, beginning in 1845, and last amended by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 18, the object of which was to provide legislative clauses in a convenient form for incorporation, by reference in future special acts of parliament, for taking lands, with or without the consent of their owners, for the promotion of railways, and other public undertakings. Moz. & W.

These statutes or some designated part thereof are incorporated in all acts of parliament, authorizing public works which require the acquisition of land, and they correspond to the grant of the delegated right of eminent domain in legislative charters in the United States. The scope of these acts of parliament includes provision for the purchase of lands by agreement between the promoters of an undertaking of a public nature and the owners of the land required; and also for the acquisition of the land otherwise than by agreement, in which contingency the compensation to be paid is settled either by the verdict of a jury or by arbitrators. In the case of persons under disability or absent from England, provision is made for the valuation of their compensation. Forms of covenants are prescribed, and upon their execution the fee-simple of the lands is vested free of all terms for years and other qualifications; or in case of copyholds, the covenants must be enrolled on the court rolls, and must be thereafter enfranchised. Mortgages on the lands purchased may be redeemed and released of rent charges, and the surrender of leases may be procured upon such terms as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement as may be settled by the verdict of a jury or by arbitration. The acts also authorize the sale of superfluous lands by the promoters, the original owner having the option to repurchase them, and next after him the nearest adjoining owners unless the land is built upon, suitable for building, or situated within a town. It is usually provided that the costs are borne by the promoters. See 2 Brett, Com. 661; PROMOTER.

LANDS, PUBLIC. Under the title public lands of the United States is comprised such land as is open to sale or other disposition under general laws. 145 U. S. 538; 92 id. 763; 10 Nev. 260. In a statute authorizing location of script, it does not include tidelands; 158 U. S. 273. Nor does the term include lands to which any claims or rights of others have attached; 145 id. 538.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP. The public domain embraces lands known in the United States as "public lands," lying in certain states and territories known as "land states and territories," and was acquired by the government of the United States by treaty, conquest, cession by states or other nations, and purchase, and is disposed of under and by authority of the national government, when the Indian title thereto (which is one of possession merely) has been extinguished by treaty stipulations or otherwise.

The fee in unsold lands is either in the federal or state governments. The Indians have only a right of use, which, however, cannot be divested, except by purchase or war; 2 McLean 412.

They have the unquestionable right to the lands which they occupy until extinguished by a voluntary cession to the government; 92 U. S. 733; id. 760; while the claim of the government extends to the complete ultimate title, charged with the right of possession by the Indians, and to the exclusive power of acquiring that title of possession; 8 Wheat. 603; 6 Cra. 87; 17 Wall. 211; 95 U. S. 517.

The English possessions in America were not claimed by right of conquest, but by right of discovery. The discoveries were made by persons acting under the authority of the government for the benefit of the nation; and the crown, according to the principles of the British constitution, was the proper organ to dispose of the public domain; 16 Pet. 409. See also 8 Wheat. 595. The United States hold the public lands within the new states by force of the deeds of cession and the statutes connected with them and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess or have reserved by compact with the new states, for that particular purpose; 3 How. 224.

The interest of the United States in lands held by it within state boundaries is simply proprietary, the sovereignty residing within the state, and its rights differ from those of any ordinary land-holder in the state, only as provided in the constitution of the United States, and by the terms of the compact between the general and the state government at the time of the admission of the latter into the Union; 5 Minn. 223.

All lands in the territories not appropriated by competent authority before they were acquired are, in the first instance, the exclusive property of the United States, to be disposed of to such persons, at such times and in such modes and by such titles, as the government may deem most advantageous to the public; 20 How. 561.

The United States is the sole owner of the soil, and has entire and complete jurisdiction over it. Through congress, it provides the methods of disposition under grants, settlement laws, or sales, public or private; may prevent trespasses, and in all methods retain the entire control over it until sold or otherwise disposed of. Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States, and this power is vested in congress without any limitation; 6 McLean 517; 13 Wall. 92; 20 How. 558; 14 Pet. 526; 13 id. 436; and any change of political condition, as in a territory becoming a state, or change of boundary of a territory or state, in no wise affects the absolute and complete proprietary power of the national government over the public domain. It remains until the last acre is disposed of. It cannot be taxed by a state; 4 How. 169; nor can a state exercise any power or control over the public lands which may lie within its limits; 5 McLean 344; 14 Pet. 526; 4 How. 169; 6 McLean 517.

The control of the United States over their own property is independent of locality, and no state or territory can interfere with their control, enjoyment, or disposal of such property; nor are the contracts of the government with respect to subjects within its constitutional competency, local, or confined in their effect and operation strictly to the situs of the subjects to which they relate; 20 How. 558.

For the amount of the public lands and the manner in which it was acquired by the national government, see Donaldson's History of the Public Domain, p. 10; H. R. Misc. Docs. No. 45, part 4, 2d Sess. 47th Cong., vol. 10.

NATIONAL CONTROL AND DISPOSITION. The constitution of the United States (Article 4, section 3, par. 2) provides that: "The congress shall have the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," the word property in the above quotation meaning lands; 6 McLean 517. Under the authority thus conferred upon it, the congress has provided a complete system for the regulation and disposal of the public domain. In the early stages of the history of the government the public domain was put within the jurisdiction and control of the secretary of the treasury, but on March 3, 1849, congress created the home, now the interior department, and by section 3 of that law provided that "the secretary of the interior shall perform all the duties in relation to the general land office of supervision and appeal now discharged by the secretary of the treasury." Thereafter the general land office became and still continues to be a bureau in the interior department. The secretary of the interior is now charged with the supervision of the public business relating to the public lands, including mines and pension and bounty lands. Rev. Stats. chaps. 2 and 3, pp. 74–78. See LAND OFFICE.

Under the supreme control which has been vested in it by the constitution, the congress has divided the public domain into various land districts, and has provided for the appointment of a surveyor general for the states and territories, and of certain deputy surveyors; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2207–2233. It has also provided for the appointment of various registers and receivers, and the creation of what is known as local land offices in the various land districts. The duties of these officers is to receive applications to enter the public lands under the various land laws, and to hear contests concerning the same, with rights of appeal to the general land office and from thence to the secretary of the interior. See U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2234–2247. For the various land districts and their creation, see U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2248.

KINDS OF LAND AND METHODS OF ACQUIRING SAME. The public lands may be divided with respect to their character into, first, agricultural lands, which are acquired under the various laws, such as pre-emption, homestead, etc., at the price of $1.25 per acre when they lie without, and $2.50 per acre when they lie within, the limits of any grant made by congress in aid of the construction of a railroad; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2357; 160 U. S. 136; second, mineral lands, which are sold at $5.00 per acre, under which term we include lands containing placer deposits of minerals, which are sold at $2.50 per acre; third, coal lands, which are sold at $20.00 per acre when situated within 15 miles of any completed railroad, otherwise at $10.00 per acre; fourth, desert lands, which are sold at $1.25 per acre, provided they do not lie within the limits of a railroad grant; 160 U. S. 136; and fifth, saline lands, sold at $1.25 per acre.

Various methods for the sale or other disposition of the public domain have been enacted from time to time, a very interesting history of which may be found in Donaldson's History of the Public Domain 196, 208, 676. The provisions of law which formerly existed relative to the acquisition of public lands by private entry and public sale and through the timber culture laws have been repealed; R. S. 1 Supp. pp. 682, 940. The methods of acquiring the agricultural lands of the United States are now, through the operation of the pre-emption law, superseded by the provisions of the amended homestead law and the desert land act.

Pre-emptions. The provisions of the law formerly existing with relation to the acquisition of title under the pre-emption laws were repealed and superseded by the act of March 3, 1891; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 939, 940, especially section 3 of said act, p. 942. The acts of March 3, 1877, 19 Stat. L. 404, May 27, 1878, and June 14, 1878, 20 Stat. L. 63–113, permitting pre-emptioners who have changed to homestead entries to credit their time from original settlement, are superseded as to future permanent operations by the act of March 3, 1891, supra. See also act of March 2, 1889; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. p. 682. Various other acts contain provisions common to pre-emption and homestead entry, and are by this act superseded as to the former. This act, however, does not affect entries made under the pre-emption laws prior to its passage. See sec. 4 of said act, and 15 Land Decisions 483.

Desert Land Act. Desert lands are such as will not, without artificial irrigation, raise an agricultural crop. These lands are confined to what is known as the arid regions which are situated in certain western states and territories. Provision is made for the acquisition of lands of this character by conducting water thereon, and performing certain other requirements, as provided in the act of March 3, 1877; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. p. 137. For sections 4 and 8 added to this act, see act of March 3, 1891, Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 940, 941.

Saline lands. Provision for the sale of land of this character is made by the act of January 12, 1877; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 127. Under its provisions a hearing is ordered and witnesses are examined as to the character of the land in question, and the testimony taken at the hearing is transmitted to the general land office for its decision. Should the tract be adjudged agricultural, it will be subject to disposition as such. Should the tract be adjudged to be of saline character it will be offered at public sale to the highest bidder for cash at a price of not less than $1.25 per acre. In case it is not sold, it is subject to private sale at a price not less than $1.25 per acre, in the same manner as other public lands are sold. Quære: Whether this act is repealed by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1891? U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 943.

Coal lands. For the provisions relating to the acquisition of lands of this character, see Rev. Stat. U. S. § 2347. See also Donaldson's History of the Public Domain 1277, 1278.

MINERAL LANDS, RESOURCES, AND CLAIMS; location of, under U. S. Laws. The existing provisions and regulations relative to the acquisition of mineral lands, the title of which is in the government, are to be found in United States Revised Statutes, §§ 2318–2352, and in 1 Supp. Rev. Stats. pp. 166–7; 276, 62, 324, 948, 950. For a history of the attempted legislation prior to the passage of the act of 1866 (the first mining law), see Yale on Mining Claims 340–350; and Weeks on Mineral Lands, Addenda, chap. 1. for the act of 1866.

Requisites of location. All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, are "free and open to exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such" (Rev. Stats. § 2319), and citizenship or declared intention is a condition precedent to the right of location; 19 Fed. Rep. 82; 12 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 904. A state corporation is a citizen for this purpose, provided the members thereof are citizens and qualified to make the location; 21 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 1019; 13 Colo. 105; 130 U. S. 630. Upon declaring his intention to become a citizen, an alien may have advantage of work previously done, and of a record previously made; 19 Fed. Rep. 78; and an alien locator may convey to a citizen so as to give title from date of conveyance, provided no third person acquires rights prior to such conveyance; 1 Fed. Rep. 537. See 6 Wall. 122. A location made jointly by aliens and citizens is a good location by the citizens; 1 Fed. Rep. 537.

A mineral location can only be made on the unsold, unappropriated and unoccupied lands of the United States; 3 Wall. 304; 24 Cal. 562; 67 Cal. 656; 14 Cal. 461; 6 Colo. 393; but the right to possession is derived solely from a valid location; 4 Mont. 370; 4 id. 527; and cannot be held as "occupied" so as to defeat a subsequent location unless all the laws, including the yearly assessment work, etc., are complied with; 104 U. S. 284; 115 id. 408; 59 Cal. 613; 6 Mont. 53. The act describes mineral lands as "valuable mineral deposits." This means lands which may be profitably mined in the usual manner; Copp's Mining Lands 324. Lands containing minerals, but not in profitable quantities, are not mineral lands; 115 U. S. 392; 28 Fed. Rep. 482; 45 Cal. 482. But non-mineral lands, to the extent of 5 acres, may be located as mill sites, when in connection with a lode location or separately; Rev. Stats. § 2337. Title to mineral lands can only be acquired in the precise manner provided by the laws relating to such lands; and a patent obtained under the provisions of any other law is void; Rev. Stats. § 2318; 21 Wall. 660; 115 U. S. 392, 408. If a patent issue for agricultural land on which there is a known lode, title to such lode does not pass; 5 Oreg. 104; but contra if subsequently discovered; Copp's Min. Lands 124; 17 Cal. 199. The right to locate is initiated by discovery and appropriation, which forms the source of title; development being the requisite of continued possession; 113 U. S. 537; 116 id. 418; 22 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 304. A location before an actual discovery confers no rights upon the locator; 1 Fed. Rep. 530; 11 id. 676.

No specific time is designated by the statutes within which the location must be completed; but if one begin a location and then depart he cannot return and complete the location so as to hold it against one who, during such absence, has made a complete location; 65 Cal. 419. A location is dependent, primarily, upon what is found in the discovery shaft, the discovery of ore elsewhere being, as a rule, unavailing; 8 Fed. Rep. 725: but see 3 Utah 94; 6 Colo. 581; 15 Nev. 383, where evidence was admitted in proof of discovery to show the existence of a vein other than at the location point. The work leading up to the discovery need not have been done by the locator, provided the existence of the vein was known to him at the time of location; 7 Mont. 30.

It is not priority of discovery, but priority of compliance with the various requirements of the law that gives the right to the mine; 13 Nev. 455. As to the proper manner of staking out a claim so as to conform to the lode or vein, see 98 U. S. 463. See also 6 Colo. 393; 13 Nev. 442. Laws and regulations for the location, development, and working of mines may be made by the states and by the miners themselves; Rev. Stats. §§ 2319–2324.

As to the extent of ground open to location and the method of staking it off, see Rev. Stats. § 2320, and for the provisions relating to placer locations, see Rev. Stats. §§ 2329, 2333. See 128 U. S. 673; Copp's Min. Lands 52.

The term "placer claim," as used in Rev. Stats. § 2329, means "ground between defined boundaries which contains mineral in its earth, sand, or gravel; ground that includes valuable deposits not in piece, that is, not fixed in rock, but which are in a loose state, and may, in most cases, be collected by washing or amalgamation, without milling." 128 U. S. 679.

It is incumbent upon one in possession of a placer claim whereon is a vein or lode, to state that fact in his application for a patent, or the patent will not carry such vein or lode. If discovered subsequent to the issuance of the patent, however, such vein or lode is covered by the placer patent; Rev. Stats. § 2333; 67 Cal. 286; 116 U. S. 687.

The statutory requirements concerning the description of the location, Rev. Stats. §§ 2318, 2324, are: (1) that the location shall be along the vein or lode; (2) that it shall be distinctly marked on the ground so that the boundaries can be readily traced and that such description shall be by reference to some permanent object for the identification of the claim; (3) that all the lines shall be parallel—the last requirement being directory only, the object being to prevent a party from claiming more width of vein outside his surface lines than within them; 83 Cal. 203. All other details of location are governed by the rules and regulations of miners and state laws; Rev. Stats. § 2324.

Although the federal laws do not require the posting of any notice of location on the claim, but only require the recording of such notice in the mining district, yet the posting of a notice is almost universally required by the miners' regulations, and by state laws; 113 U. S. 537; 10 Cal. 446; 40 Fed. Rep. 787. See LODE; VEIN.

Re-location. A mining claim is subject to re-location where the owner has failed to comply with the statutory requirements, or has failed to observe local rules; Rev. Stats. § 2324; 73 Cal. 520; 12 Nev. 312; 1 Mont. 325. But the forfeiture must have actually occurred before re-location, otherwise the re-location is invalid and the re-locator a trespasser; 11 Fed. Rep. 680; 1 Idaho 107: 21 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 413; 104 U. S. 279. A re-location is made in the same manner and carries the same rights as original location; 6 Colo. 393; 9 id. 339; 20 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 798.

Annual work. It is provided by federal statute that during each year, after location and until a patent issues, there shall be performed on the claim not less than $100 worth of labor on improvements; Rev. Stats. § 2324; and this provision is applicable alike to placer claims and to lode claims; 65 Cal. 40. The work may be done anywhere upon the surface of the claim within its surface lines or below the surface within the lines extended vertically downward, but it must be done as a necessary means of extracting ore; 5 Sawy. 439; 6 Mont. 138. See also 109 U. S. 440; 104 id. 655. By act of February 11, 1875, U. S. Rev. Stats. 1 Supp. 62, it is provided that where a tunnel has been run for the purpose of developing a lode, the tunnel shall be considered as expended on said lode, and that it shall not be required to perform work on the surface of the lode as required in § 2324 Rev. Stats. See 111 U. S. 355.

This work may be done by any party in interest, whether such party have a legal or equitable claim; 11 Fed. Rep. 680. The amount of work required by the statute cannot be decreased by any state law or miners' regulation; 7 Colo. 443; 60 Cal. 631; and may be done at any time within the year; 104 U. S. 279; 8 Colo. 41.

Failure to perform the work will be excused if brought about by actual existing fear of bodily harm, or prevented by coercion or duress actually and presently existing; 7 Fed. Rep. 331; 113 U. S. 527.

Where claims are held in common, this annual work may be done on any one claim; Rev. Stats. § 2324; 111 U. S. 350; 109 id. 440.

The apex rule. Ordinarily the locator would be confined to the limits of his surface measurements both as to surface possession and beneath it, but by the apex rule the locator is entitled not only to the surface included within the lines of his location, but also to all of the veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extending downward vertically, albeit such veins, lodes, or ledges may depart from a perpendicular course in such wise as to extend outside of the side lines of the location, provided such right shall not extend beyond the entire lines of the location projecting in their own line or until they intersect the veins or ledges; Rev. Stats. § 2322; 11 Fed. Rep. 670; 23 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 547; 42 Fed Rep. 626. But this right does not carry with it power to follow into the lands of an adjoining proprietor holding title to agricultural lands; 36 Fed. Rep. 668. But see 42 Fed. Rep. 98. This rule of the apex has been a fruitful source of litigation, the following being a few of the more important cases: 118 U. S. 196; 75 Cal. 78; 3 Fed. Rep. 868; 8 id. 725; id. 297; 42 id. 98; 2 McCrary 121; 114 U. S. 576; 98 id. 463; 42 Fed. Rep. 98; 8 id. 297; 1 Ari. 426; 2 Utah 355.

PRIVATE ACQUISITION. The rule is well settled, that when public lands have been surveyed and placed in the market, or otherwise opened to private acquisition, a person who complies with all the requisites necessary to entitle him to a patent in a particular tract or lot is to be regarded as the equitable owner thereof, and the land is no longer open to location. Any subsequent grant of the same land to another party is void, unless the first location or entry be vacated and set aside; 98 U. S. 121; see 13 Pet. 498; and when different grants cover the same premises, the earlier takes the title; 139 U. S. 1.

Public lands of the United States may be granted by statute or by treaty, as well as by patent; 1 Doug. Mich. 546. As to the latter method, see LAND PATENT.

After public lands have been entered at the land office and a certificate of entry obtained, they are private property, the government agreeing to make a conveyance as soon as it can, and in the meantime holding the naked legal fee in trust for the purchaser, who has the equitable title; 133 U. S. 496; 128 id. 456; and they cease to be public; 132 id. 357.

Courts have power to protect the private rights of a party who has purchased in good faith from the government, against the interference or appropriations of corrective resurveys made by the land department subsequently to such purchase; 128 U. S. 699. The power to make and correct surveys of the public lands belongs to the political department of the government, and while the lands are subject to the supervision of the General Land Office, its decisions in such cases are unassailable by the courts, except by a direct proceeding; 128 U. S. 699; 142 id. 161.

Persons entering on lands, whether "vacant" or "public land," or land acquired by the government of the United States under a foreign grant, are to be deemed trespassers; 1 McAll. 119; and an agreement to sell and transfer their possession and improvements is an illegal and void agreement to continue the trespass, and a note given for the purchase money of an improvement on vacant lands of the United States is for an illegal consideration, and no action will lie upon it; 2 Miss. 150; 8 Fla. 34; and a trespasser of land from the government is entitled to improvements thereon at the time of the purchase, and if the party who made them should afterwards remove them he is liable in an action of trespass; 32 Miss. 138. The occupancy of the public lands of the United States constitutes, at least so far as trespasses by a stranger are concerned, a tenancy at will, and not a tenancy from year to year; 5 Stew. & P. 82. A person cultivating public lands to which he has no title is not protected by the doctrine of emblements, and a purchaser from the United States is entitled to all crops growing upon the land at the time; 5 Mo. 335; but a person by entry upon such land acquires no title to timber cut prior to, and lying upon the land at the time of his entry; 19 id. 362.

In addition to the methods of disposing of the public domain to actual purchasers or settlers upon it, congress has disposed of immense quantities of land in various other ways. For example, grants made in aid of the construction of railroads, either granted directly to the road itself or to a state as a trustee for the use of the road. Large quantities of land have also been granted to the states as they were admitted into the Union, for educational, charitable, and other purposes. A large amount of the public domain has also been taken up under land bounties for military and naval services prior to 1861 and subsequent, and also by the granting of lands for town sites and county seat purposes. An interesting account of all this legislation will be found in Donaldson's History of the Public Domain. LANDS, TENEMENTS, AND HEREDITAMENTS. A phrase used in early English law to express all sorts of property of the immovable class, as goods and chattels did the movable class. Wms. R. P. 5.

LANGUAGE. The medium for the communication of perceptions and ideas.

Spoken language is that wherein articulate sounds are used. See 90 Ga. 456.

Written language is that wherein written characters are used, and especially the system of characters called letters and figures.

By conventional usage, certain sounds and characters have a definite meaning in one country, or in certain countries, and this is called the language of such country or countries: as, the Greek, the Latin, the French, or the English language. The law, too, has a peculiar language. See Eunom. Dial. 2.

On the subjugation of England by William the Conqueror, the French-Norman language was substituted in all law proceedings for the ancient Saxon, which, according to Blackstone, 3 Com. 317, was the language of the records, writs, and pleadings until the time of Edward III. Mr. Stephen thinks Blackstone has fallen into an error, and says the record was, from the earliest period to which that document can be traced, in the Latin language. Plead. Appx. note 14. The history of legal language in England is further stated by Blackstone as follows: By the statute 36 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 15, it was enacted that for the future all pleas should be pleaded, shown, defended, answered, debated, and adjudged in the English tongue, but be entered and enrolled in Latin. The Norman or law French, however, being more familiar as applied to the law than any other language, the lawyers continued to employ it in making their notes of the trial of cases, which they afterwards published in that barbarous dialect under the name of Reports.

After the enactment of this statute, on the introduction of paper pleadings, they followed, in the language as well as in other respects, the style of the records, which were drawn up in Latin. This technical language continued in use till the time of Cromwell, when by a statute the records were directed to be in English; but this act was repealed at the restoration by Charles II., the lawyers finding it difficult to express themselves as well and as concisely in the vernacular as in the Latin tongue; and the language of the law continued as before till about the year 1730, when the statute of 4 Geo. II. c. 26, was passed. It provided that both the pleadings and the records should thenceforward be framed in English. The ancient terms and expressions which had been so long known in French and Latin were now literally translated into English. The translations of such terms and phrases were found to be exceedingly ridiculous. Such terms as nisi prius, habeas corpus, fieri facias, mandamus, and the like, are not capable of an English dress with any degree of seriousness. They are equally absurd in the manner they are employed in Latin; but use, and the fact that they are in a foreign language, have made the absurdity less apparent.

By statute of 6 Geo. II. c. 14, passed two years after the last-mentioned statute, the use of technical words was allowed to continue in the usual language,—which defeated almost every beneficial purpose of the former statute. In changing from one language to another, many words and technical expressions were retained in the new, which belonged to the more ancient language; and not seldom they partook of both. This, to the unlearned student, has given an air of confusion and disfigured the language of the law. It has rendered essential, also, the study of the Latin and French languages. This, perhaps, is not to be regretted, as they are the keys which open to the ardent student vast stores of knowledge. In the United States, the records, pleadings, and all law proceedings are in the English language, except certain technical terms which retain their ancient French and Latin dress. 3 Bla. Com. 317.

From the Conquest until 1731, says Prof. F. W. Maitland, the solemnest language of the law was Latin, and even in the Anglo-Saxon time, though English was the language in which the laws were published and causes pleaded, Latin was the language in which the kings made grants of land. In 1016 the learned men of both races could write and speak in Latin. French was then little more than a vulgar dialect of Latin, and a language in which the people could not write anything. The Conqueror used both Latin and English in his laws, charters, and rights, but Latin soon got the upper hand and became for a while the one written language of the law. In Chancery there was nothing but Latin, and the judgments of the courts were in that language. This continued until 1731. Meantime in the twelfth or early in the thirteenth century, ordinances and statutes written in French began to appear. Under Edward I. French became the language in which laws were published and law books written and continued to be the language of the statute books until the end of the middle ages. Under Henry VII. English became the speech in which English lawgivers addressed their subjects. As the oral speech of litigants and their advisers, French prevailed from the Conquest onwards, but in the local courts a great deal of English must long have been spoken. The jurisprudence of a French-speaking court became the common law, the measure of all rights and duties, and was carried throughout the land by the journeying justices. In the thirteenth century French was used in pleading and the professional lawyer wrote and thought in French. In 1362 a statute endeavored to make English instead of French the spoken language of the law courts, but law writing was still in French. Gradually in the sixteenth century the lawyers began to write in English, though many French law terms still continued to be used; 1 Soc. Eng. 278; and see 1 Poll. & Maitl. 58.

The effect of the Norman conquest of England is still apparent in the technical, legal words in ordinary use. "At the present day," says a recent writer, "it would hardly be too much to say that all our words having a definite legal import are in a certain sense French words. A German jurist is able to expound the doctrines of Roman law in genuinely German words. On many a theme an English man of letters may by way of exploit write a paragraph or a page and use no word that is not in every sense a genuinely English word; but an English lawyer who attempted a similar puritanical feat would find himself doomed to silence. . . . It is worthy of remark that within the sphere of public law we have some old terms that have come down to us from unconquered England. Earl was not displaced by count, sheriff was not displaced by viscount, our king, our queen, our lords, our knights of the shire are English; our aldermen are English if our mayors are French: but our parliament and its statutes, our privy council and its ordinances, our peers, our barons, the commons of the realm, the sovereign, the state, the nation, the people are French; our citizens are French and our burgesses are more French than English. So too a few of the very common legal transactions of daily life can be described by English verbs. A man may give, sell, buy, let, hire, borrow, bequeath, make a deed, a will, a bond, and even be guilty of manslaughter or of theft, and all this is English. But this is a small matter. . . . Let us look elsewhere and observe how widely and deeply the French influence has worked. Contract, agreement, covenant, obligation, debt, condition, bill, note, master, servant, partner, guarantee, tort, trespass, assault, battery, slander, damage, crime, treason, felony, misdemeanor, arson, robbery, burglary, larceny, property, possession, pledge, lien, payment, money, grant, purchase, devise, descent, heir, easement, marriage, guardian, all are French. We enter a court of justice; court, justices, judges, jurors, counsel, attorneys, clerks, parties, plaintiff, defendant, action, suit, claim, demand, indictment, count, declaration, pleadings, evidence, verdict, conviction, judgment, sentence, appeal, every one and every thing, save the witnesses, writs and oaths, have French names. In the province of justice and police with its fines, its gaols, and its prisons, its constables, its arrests, we must, now that outlawry is a thing of the past, go as far as the gallows if we would find an English institution. Right and wrong we have kept, and though we have received tort we have rejected droit but even law probably owes its salvation to its remote cousin the French lei." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 58.

Agreements, contracts, wills, and other instruments may be made in any language, and will be enforced. Bac. Abr. Wills (D 1). An English court, having to construe a contract made in a foreign country and foreign language, must obtain a translation of the instrument and an explanation of the terms of art, if any; 10 H. L. C. 624. And a slander spoken in a foreign language, if understood by those present, or a libel published in such language, will be punished as if spoken or written in the English language; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 231; Bac. Abr. Slander (D 3); 1 Rolle, Abr. 74; 6 Term 163. See FOREIGN LANGUAGES. For the construction of language, see articles CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; Jacob, Intr. to the Com. Law Max. 46.

At an early period, the Latin was the diplomatic language in use in Europe. Towards the end of the fifteenth century that of Spain gained the ascendency, in consequence of the great influence which that country then exercised in Europe. The French, since the age of Louis XIV., has become the almost universal diplomatic idiom of the civilized world; though some states use their national language in treaties and diplomatic correspondence. It is usual in these cases to annex to the papers transmitted a translation in the language of the opposite party, wherever it is understood this comity will be reciprocated. This is the usage of the Germanic Confederation, of Spain, and of the Italian courts. When nations using a common language, as the United States and Great Britain, treat with each other, such language is used in their diplomatic intercourse.

It is believed that the first departure from the rule that the French language should be used in all diplomatic conferences and congresses was in the Berlin conference of 1889, held between the representatives of Germany, Great Britain, and the United States, with reference to the affairs of Samoa. As appears by a protocol of the first session, the proposal was made by the representatives of the United States, and assented to by those of Germany and Great Britain, that the proceedings of the conference should be conducted in the English language. The president of the conference, however, though a German, reserved to himself the right to use the French language at any time if he should find difficulty in expressing himself satisfactorily in the English, but he did not find it necessary to avail himself of that right. Accordingly, the protocols of the first of these sittings were in French, and after that in English.

LANGUIDUS (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a return made by the sheriff when a defendant, whom he has taken by virtue of process, is so dangerously sick that to remove him would endanger his life or health. 3 Chit. Pr. 249, 358; T. Chitty, Forms 753.

LANIS DE CRESCENTIA WALLIÆ TRADUCENDIS ABSQUE CUSTUMA, etc. An ancient writ that lay to the customer of a port to permit one to pass wool without paying custom, he having paid it before in Wales. Reg. Orig. 279.

LANO NIGER. A sort of base coin, formerly current in England. Cow.

LANZAS. In Spanish Law. A certain contribution in money paid by the grandees and other high officers in lieu of the soldiers they ought to furnish government in time of war.

LAPIDATION. The act of stoning a person to death. Webster.

LAPSE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The transfer, by forfeiture, of a right to present or collate to a vacant benefice from a person vested with such right to another in consequence of some act of negligence by the former. Ayl. Par. 331.

Upon six months' neglect of the patron, the right lapses to the bishop; upon six months' neglect of bishop, to archbishop; upon his six months' neglect, to king. The day on which the vacancy occurs is not counted, and the six months are calculated as a half-year. 2 Burn, Ec. L. 355.

To glide; to pass slowly, silently, or by degrees. To slip; to deviate from the proper path. Webster, Dict. See LAPSED DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY.

LAPSE PATENT. A patent issued to a petitioner for land. A patent for which land to another party has lapsed through neglect of patentee. The lapse patent relates to date of original patent, and makes void all mesne conveyances. 1 Wash. Va. 39. See LAND PATENT.

LAPSED DEVISE. A devise which has lapsed, or does not take effect because of the death of the devisee before that of the testator.

The subject-matter of the lapsed devise will, if no contrary intention appear, be included in the residuary clause (if any) contained in the will. In England, by stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, §§ 25, 26, 32, 33, if the devise be to children or other issue of the devisor, and the issue of the devisee be alive, the devise will not lapse, if no such intention appear in the will. A devise always lapses at common law if the devisee dies before the testator, and such was the general rule in this country; 37 N. Y. 54; 2 Yeates 525; but in many if not all the states, if made to a son or grandson of the testator, it takes effect, by force of statute, in favor of his heirs, if he die before the testator. In North Carolina, a devise to a child dying before the testator does not lapse, but goes to the issue of such child; 107 N. C. 507; so in Massachusetts, in the case of a devise to a child or other relative; 3 Washb. R. P. *523; 101 Mass. 38.

In Maryland, the provision against lapse goes much further, and it is provided that no devise or bequest shall fail by reason of the death of the devisee or legatee before the testator, and it takes effect in like manner as if they had survived him; 6 Har. & J. 54. See 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *307, n.; 4 Kent 541. In regard to a lapsed devise where the devisee dies during the life of the testator, the heir of the devisee will not take; 1 Dana 201; but the estate will go to the testator's heir, notwithstanding a residuary devisee. But if the devise be void, as where the devisee is dead at the date of the will, or is made upon a condition precedent which never happens, the estate will go to the residuary devisee, if the words are sufficiently comprehensive; 2 Vern. 394; 15 Ves. 589; 3 Whart. 477; 1 Harring. 524; 4 Kent 541. But some of the courts hold in that case even, that the estate goes to the heir; 6 Conn. 292; 3 Jones, Eq. 141; 4 Ired. Eq. 320; 13 Md. 415, where it was said that there was no solid distinction between a lapsed and a void devise, and that in both cases the heir at law should take, and not the residuary devisee.

When the devise is to the person deceased, with such words as "and his heirs" added, they are generally held to be words of limitation, and not of description. So a devise of the proceeds of land to three persons, one-third to each, and to "their heirs respectively for ever," lapsed on the death of one as to his share, the word heirs designating the estate, not the takers; 36 W. N. C. Pa. 247; so where a residuary devise was to two persons, "their heirs and assigns"; 162 Mass. 448. The rule that devises lapse by the death of the devisee is not changed by adding to the devise the words "to have and to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns for ever"; 113 N. Y. 396. And where land was devised to a daughter for life and then to be "equally divided among the lawful heirs of" another daughter, it was held that the word heirs must be taken in a technical sense, and as the last mentioned daughter was alive at the death of the first, the devise to the heirs lapsed; 1 Rich. Eq. 396.

In case of gifts to a class, the rule is that there is no lapse, but they go to the other members of the class; Theobald, Wills 643. It is, however, held that the gift is not to a class if the members of the class are named; 11 Sim. 397; 2 J. & H. 656; nor if to "five daughters of A." or "my nine children"; 9 Ch. D. 117; 15 Ch. D. 84; and where the residue was given to sons named, there being nothing to show that testator intended otherwise, they took as individuals and not as a class, and the share of the son who died before his father's death lapsed, and passed as intestate real estate; 15 R. I. 138. See LAPSED LEGACY.

In case of a devise to two as joint tenants, if one die before the testator, where survivorship in a joint tenancy has been abolished, his share has been held to fall in the residue; Wms. Eq. 89. Where land was devised to a son who was also appointed executor, and he died and the testator by codicil appointed another executor, referring to the death of his son, it was held that the devise did not lapse, and should be construed as a devise to the son's heirs; 6 Dana 51.

A devise to one for life with a remainder does not lapse by the death of the first taker before that of the remainderman; 15 Ark. 682. The refusal or incapacity of the first taker of a devise or legacy to several in succession does not cause it to lapse, but it passes to the next; 28 N. H. 459; 43 id. 17. If one is appointed by will to take in case of the death of the first devisee, and on that event, the appointee can take as contemplated by the will, there will be no lapse, although the devisee dies before the testator, but the ulterior gift will take effect immediately on testator's decease as a direct unconditional gift; 14 B. Mon. 333.

A devise in trust for a son, and "in the event of the son dying childless" then over, lapsed by the death of the son in the lifetime of the testatrix, and the devise over did not take effect; 152 Mass. 24.

A devise made to a wife for life, with remainder to the daughter, and with power to the wife to sell and invest the proceeds for the benefit of the daughter, does not lapse during the lifetime of the wife, being for the benefit of the latter as well as the former; 142 N. Y. 160.

In England, by the Wills Act § 32, a devise of an estate tail does not lapse, if at the death of the testator there is any issue who would inherit under the entail, and it was held that the section applies to a gift to a child dead at the date of will; 2 Sm. & G. 396.

With a single important exception, the same principles apply to devises and legacies with respect to lapse, and as to that difference, and also for other cases on the subject, see LAPSED LEGACY.

LAPSED LEGACY. A legacy which, on account of the death of the legatee before the period arrives for the payment of the legacy, lapses or deviates from the course prescribed by the testator, and falls into the residuum. 1 Wms. Ex., 7th Am. ed. *1071; 10 S. & R. 351.

A legacy which has never vested or taken effect; one which, originally valid, afterwards fails, because the capacity or willingness of the donee to take has ceased to exist before he obtained a vested interest in the gift. 126 N. Y. 615.

A distinction exists between a lapsed devise and a lapsed legacy. A devise which lapses does not fall into the residue unless so provided by the will, but descends to the heir at law; on the contrary, personal property passes by the residuary clause, where it is not otherwise disposed of; Beach, Wills 316; 2 Bouv. Inst. 2158, 2116; 15 Ves. 709; 2 Mer. 393; 3 Whart. 477. See LAPSED DEVISE.

A lapsed legacy passes by a general residuary clause; 27 Abb. N. C. 437; so also did a legacy which lapsed because it was void; 63 Hun 352. A lapsed or void legacy goes to the residuary legatee unless an intention to the contrary clearly appear; 1 Sm. & M. 589; 3 Edw. Ch. 79; 2 Tayl. 815; 2 Root 487.

The reason assigned for this difference is that a bequest of personal property refers to the state of the property at the time of the death of the testator, and that a devise operates only on land of which the testator was seised when he made his will; and it is not to be presumed he intended to devise by a residuary clause, a contingency which he could not have foreseen, nor to embrace in it lands contained in a lapsed devise; 1 Dana 207; Willes 293; 6 Conn. 292; 3 Harr. & McH. 333. "How far the alteration of the law of those states where after-acquired lands may be devised will destroy this distinction, it is difficult to say." 1 Bouv. Inst. 2150.

The Pennsylvania act of 1879, June 4, P. L. 88, made the law respecting the devolution of a lapsed devise the same as that of a lapsed legacy, but it was held that this applied only to lapsed specific devises in the body of the will, and that as to lapsed shares of the residue no change was intended; 15 W. N. C. Pa. 417. And the same provision exists, except where the will requires a different construction, in Virginia, North Carolina, West Virginia; but in the last state, if there is no residuary devisee, it goes to the heir at law.

The common-law distinction between lapsed devises and lapsed legacies with reference to falling into the residuum has been abrogated by statute in New York, and lapsed devises as well as lapsed legacies fall into the residuum; 152 N. Y. 475.

In Kentucky, in case of lapse, neither real nor personal property passes as part of the residue, but both are intestate property, unless the contrary intention appear in the will.

Where a testator gave a share of his residuary personal estate to his widow who took under the will, and another share to a daughter who died before him without issue, it was held that the testator died intestate as to the share given to the daughter, and that the widow was entitled to one-third of it under the intestate laws; 82 Pa. 428.

Where the rent of a house was given for life to testator's daughter, and at her death to be sold, the proceeds to go to her children when twenty-one years of age, and the income meanwhile to be applied to their maintenance, it was held that the legacy to the children was vested, and on their death in the lifetime of the mother there was no lapse, but the property vested in the life-tenant in fee as the heir of her children as against the heir at law of the original testator; 19 Wall. 167, reversing 7 D. C. 226.

If a legacy is payable out of real estate in consequence of a deficiency of personal property, it will go to the heir at law in case of lapse, and if the personal estate is sufficient to pay debts and legatees, it will go to the residuary legatee; 9 Paige 94. A legacy to one for life with remainder to another does not lapse upon the death of the first taker during the testator's life; 4 Desaus. 305; 3 Ired. Eq. 581. If a legacy is payable out of a particular debt due the testator, it does not fail on failure of payment of the debt; 6 Watts 473.

Unless the legatee survive the testator, as a rule neither he nor his representatives have any claim to the legacy; 2 W. & S. 450; 18 Pick. 41; 4 Strobh. Eq. 179; 64 Me. 366; 62 Conn. 140; and the same rule applies where a legacy is given to a man and his executors, etc.; 1 P. Wms. 83; 3 Bro. C. C. 128; 108 Mass. 382; 39 Conn. 219; though the testator may expressly provide otherwise; 1 Bro. C. C. 84; L. R. 14 Eq. 343. A declaration that a legacy shall not lapse is not sufficient to prevent it unless the intention is clear that it shall go to the estate of the legatee; 3 Ves. 493; 4 Beav. 318; 27 id. 418; 4 D. M. & G. 633; but gifts to A and his executors and administrators with the direction that it shall not lapse is sufficient; 2 Atk. 572. A direction that a legacy should vest from the date of the will is not sufficient to prevent lapse; 14 Eq. 343. From a devise of the remainder of an estate in distinct parcels there arises an inference that the testator did not intend that lapsed legacies should fall into the residue; 24 Ga. 84.

A gift to A, and in case of his death to his executors and administrators, will go to A's executors in the event of his death before the testator; 54 L. J. Ch. 648, aff'g 32 W. R. 516 and overruling 1 Myl. & K. 470.

Where a testator bequeathed his estate to several legatees, and having learned of their death, interlined in his will between the words "as follows" and the list of the legatees the words "or to their heirs," and after the names added words signifying their decease and republished the will, the legacies did not lapse; 154 Pa. 523, distinguishing 2 Rawle 28 and 104 Pa. 342. Where a legacy was given to one in trust for his wife, the income for her life, with power of appointment by will, and in default thereof "it shall be equally divided among my children or their legal representatives," the words legal representatives meant executors and administrators, and not next of kin, and the legacy to any child who died without issue in the lifetime of the testator lapsed; 1 Ohio N. P. 314. A bequest of personal property to one and "heirs and assigns" are words of limitation, and the legacy lapsed on the death of the legatee before that of the testator; 159 Mass. 280; so also to one and "his heirs"; 27 Abb. N. C. 437.

Where a legacy is given to a class it is generally held that the death of one of the class before the testator does not create a lapse, but simply reduces the number of the class; 2 Bradf. 172; in such a case, when one in whom the right is vested dies before distribution, his interest goes to his representatives; 2 Dev. & B. L. 125; 3 Metc. (Ky.) 463. See LAPSED DEVISE.

Where a residue was devised in trust for four sons, the intention was clear that their enjoyment was to be several and not joint, and the share of one who died before the testator was held not to go to the survivors, but to be disposed of as intestate real estate; 5 Allen 249; but where an estate was bequeathed to all the children in a family by name, the tenor of the whole will indicating that they were intended to take as a class, the share of one who died without issue before the testator went to the survivors; 14 id. 528. It was early provided by statute in Alabama that the death of a devisee or legatee, leaving a descendant, before the testator, should not cause a lapse, but the gift would vest in the descendant; 37 Ala. 646.

Under a Maine statute making an adopted child the same as a lawful child, such child is a lineal descendant of its adopting parents within the meaning of the statute to prevent the lapse of legacies to such descendants; 84 Me. 483.

Where there was a legacy to executors in trust for a person for life, afterwards to be divided into four equal parts for four named residuary legatees, the title to the residue vested subject to the trust estate, and the share of a residuary legatee did not lapse on his death before the time of distribution; 140 N. Y. 122.

Where separate sums are bequeathed to two named persons who take also the residuary estate, no intention appearing on the will to make them joint tenants, the separate estate and the share of the residue of the one who died before the testator were held to lapse; 84 Me. 366.

Where property is bequeathed to collateral relatives named, shares of those who died during the lifetime of the testator lapse; 62 Conn. 140.

The doctrine of lapse applies to an appointment by will; 2 Ves. Sen. 61; L. R. 3 Eq. 658; 47 L. J. Ch. 65; or an appointment under a covenant; 3 Ch. 182; or a gift to a debtor of his debt,—whether the debt be given or forgiven; 1 P. Wms. 83; 3 Ves. 231; 2 Pr. 34.

If there is a gift to a charitable society by name and it has existed, but at the time of the testator's death has ceased to do so, the legacy fails; 1 Drew 642; 29 Ch. Div. 560; [1895] 1 Ch. 19. If the charity existed at the death of the testator and expired before administration of the estate, the cy pres doctrine is applied; 5 Russ. 113; [1891] 2 Ch. 236. A gift for a clearly defined and particular charitable use will fail if the subject becomes impossible; 1 Myl. & C. 123; 56 L. T. 147; and see as to the limits of the doctrine, L. R. 6 P. C. 96; 35 Ch. 460; 58 L. T. 538. See, generally, as to failure of charitable bequests, Theobald, Wills 304; and see CHARITABLE USE.

By the English law a residuary bequest operates upon all the personal estate which the testator is possessed of at the time of his death, and will include such as would have gone to pay specific legacies which lapse or are void; 4 Ves. Jr. 708, 732; 4 Paige 115; 4 Hawks 215; 1 Dana 206; 1 D. & B. Eq. 115; 82 Pa. 428; 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *716.

See LAPSED DEVISE; LEGACY; WILL.

LARBOARD. The left side of a ship or boat when one stands with his face towards the bow. The opposite term is starboard, which is the right-hand side looking forward. The word is now, however, no longer used, the term port having been substituted for it. The change was made by order of the English admiralty, for the very obvious reason that larboard was apt to be confused with the opposite term.

LARCENOUS. Thieving; pertaining to, characterized by, or tainted with, larceny; as a larcenous taking.

Larcenous purpose, an intention to commit larceny. See LARCENY.

LARCENY. The felonious taking of the property of another without his consent and against his will, with the intent to convert it to the use of the taker. 2 Leach 1089.

The felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. 4 Bla. Com. 299.

The appropriation, either to the use of the taker or to that of any other person, of money or personal property with intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of its use and benefit, or the withholding or secreting of the same. 71 Hun 72.

The wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away by one person of the mere personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his, the taker's, use, and make them his property without the consent of the owner. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 553; 4 Wash. C. C. 700; 37 Mo. 463.

This definition was criticised by Parke, B., who said: "Perhaps this was the more accurate definition; but it needed some addition; the taking should be not only wrongful and fraudulent, but also 'without any color of right';" 1 Den. C. C. 370; but the words "felonious intent" are considered by an authoritive text writer to exclude any color of right; 2 Russ. Cr., 9th Am. ed. 146.

That this offence is the most technical in its distinctions of all the common-law felonies is, perhaps, to be found in the fact that inasmuch as the higher grade of the offence was, until Blackstone's time, punishable capitally, the courts were inclined to find technical reasons to avoid the infliction of that penalty for mere wrong done with reference to the property. By reason of the depreciation of money and the consequent appreciation of the money value of property which took place within two centuries and a half after the passage of the Statute of Westminster I. (A.D. 1275), ch. 15; which made grand larceny to consist of the stealing of property above the value of twelve pence, cases of larceny became capital which would not have been such at the time the statute was passed; and therefore Lord Coke suggests that the valuation of property in determining whether the offence was grand larceny ought to be reasonable; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 534.

Larceny was formerly in England, and still is, perhaps, in some states, divided into grand and petit or petty larceny, according as the value of the property taken was great or small; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 736; 3 M'Cord 187; 3 Hill, N. Y. 395; 1 Hawks 463; 8 Blackf. 498. In England this distinction is now abolished, by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, § 2; and the same is true of many of the United States, although in some a difference is made, similar in theory, between cases where the amount stolen is more and where it is less than one hundred dollars or some fixed sum.

Compound larceny is larceny under circumstances which, in view of the law, aggravate the crime. The law in relation to this branch of larceny is to a great extent statutory.

The property of the owner may be either general; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 449; or special; 10 Wend. 165; 14 Mass. 217; 13 Ala. N. S. 153; 21 Me. 14; 8 Tex. 115; 4 Harring. 570; 6 Hill 144; 9 C. & P. 44.

There must be an actual removal of the article; 1 Leach 236, n. 320; 7 C. & P. 552; 9 Yerg. 198; 63 Miss. 58; and at least a temporary possession in the thief; 94 Ala. 534; 65 N. C. 305; 88 Mo. 354; 35 Ga. 207; 16 Tex. App. 435; 64 Miss. 77; 71 Hun 72; 75 Cal. 383; but the having the property under control even for a short space of time is sufficient, though it is abandoned before being effectually appropriated by the wrong-doer; 106 N. C. 734; 22 W. Va. 779; 1 Moody 14; 20 Ohio St. 508; 30 Mo. 92; 88 id. 354. The taking and carrying away may be committed by setting in motion an agency, innocent or otherwise, by which the property is asported from the possession of the owner to that of the thief or his accomplice; 125 Mass. 390; 4 Allen 308; 11 Q. B. D. 21; 2 C. & B. 423; 45 Ia. 678.

A person who is seen to thrust his hand into the pocket of another and withdraw it empty can be convicted of an attempt to commit larceny, even though the pocket is empty; 123 N. Y. 54, reversing 7 N. Y. S. 582. See ATTEMPT.

The mere unlawful taking and carrying away of the property of another is not larceny unless it is done with criminal intent or animo furandi; 44 Ala. 396; 55 Ill. 334; 108 Mo. 611; 34 Neb. 250; 24 Tex. App. 85; 95 Cal. 227; but see 38 S. C. 348. The question whether the goods were taken animo furandi is one of fact for the jury; [1895] 2 Q. B. 484. If the taking is under a bona fide claim of right, there can be no larceny; 4 Col. 182; as where the purpose of taking is to test a right; 2 Doug. 517; or to protect one's own property; 4 B. & S. 189; 9 Tex. App. 164. One is not guilty of larceny in selling an article under the belief that it is his own property, though it belong to another; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 606. See 11 Fla. 295; 47 Ia. 684; 62 Miss. 108; or in taking property in the belief that he has a right so to do; 25 Tex. App. 333; 79 Ga. 564; 25 Neb. 444; 24 Fla. 358; but the belief of ownership of right which will constitute a defence must be an honest belief and not a mere impression or pretence; 8 Ia. 540; 9 Tex. App. 70; 95 N. C. 596; 77 Ala. 71. Secrecy is not such an essential accompaniment of larceny that an attempt to conceal the taking must be shown; 114 N. C. 780; 103 id. 424.

An intent to convert to the thief's own use is not necessary; all that is required is the intent to deprive the owner of his property; 28 Cal. 380; 17 Tex. 521; 4 Dutch. 28; 35 Miss. 214; 10 Gratt. 758; 14 Ind. 36; but see 1 McAll. 196, where the accused took and carried away muskets to prevent others from using them against himself and his friends, and it was held larceny.

It is not an essential element of the crime that the taking should be lucri causa, for the sake of gain; 35 W. Va. 73.

The property must be of some value, though but slight; 4 Rich. 356; 3 Harring. 563; 7 Metc. 475. See 8 Pa. 260; 6 Johns. 103; 9 C. & P. 347; 39 Ill. 233; 20 Fla. 841; 68 Mo. 98; but the fact that the thief treated the property as of value will amount to proof of such value by inference; 64 N. C. 127; 3 Heisk. 120; 13 Ark. 66. Any intrinsic value whatever is sufficient; 1 Bailey 330; 14 Gray 376; and it is not necessary that the value should be of some particular coin; 75 Va. 909.

There must be a taking against the consent of the owner; 8 C. & P. 291; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 381; 9 Yerg. 198; 20 Ala. N. S. 428; 1 Rich. 30; 2 N. & M'C. 174; Coxe, N. J. 439; 106 Mo. 635; 36 Kan. 416; 18 Tex. App. 358; and the taking will not be larceny if consent be given, though obtained by fraud; 15 S. & R. 93; 9 C. & P. 741; 7 Cox, Cr. Cas. 289; but see 85 Ala. 17. But where one retains money paid by mistake, it is larceny, for the consent of the owner in parting with his property was only apparent, not real; 8 Ore. 394; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 590; 6 Hun 121.

Whenever the defendant can be regarded in the light of the servant or agent of the owner, he is guilty of larceny; 1 Den. 120; Whart. Cr. Law, 9th ed. §§ 956-970; 86 Ala. 64; 94 Cal. 573. Where a master paid his servant a £10 note, thinking it was a £1 note, and the servant took it innocently, but afterwards discovered the mistake and made up his mind to appropriate the note, it was held by a divided court that this was not larceny; [1895] 2 I. R. 709.

By stat. 24 and 25 Vict. c. 96, a bailee who fraudulently converts the property entrusted to him to his own use is guilty of larceny; Cox & Saunders, Cr. L. 26. The possession of the bailee is the possession of the owner, and a larceny thereof from the former is a larceny from the owner; 101 Mo. 316. When the possession of an article is entrusted to a person, who carries it away and appropriates it, this is no larceny; 4 C. & P. 545; 1 Pick. 375; 20 Ala. N. S. 428; 17 N. Y. 114; see 2 M'Mull. 382; 4 Mo. 461; 33 Me. 127; 11 Cush. 483; 13 Gratt. 803; 11 Tex. 769; but when the custody merely is parted with, such misappropriation is a larceny; 6 T. B. Monr. 130; 1 Den. 120; 11 Q. B. 929. One who obtains possession of property by fraud, from one who intends to retain the ownership, and subsequently carries it away, is guilty of larceny, though he would not be if he obtained both possession and ownership by fraud; 49 La. Ann. 1337. The crime of larceny may be committed by a finder of lost money or goods, who, knowing or having reason to know who is the owner of the same, instead of restoring them to him, conceals or fraudulently appropriates them to his own use; 6 Houst. 46; 87 Va. 554. See 116 Mass. 42; 28 Minn. 104; 16 Tex. App. 122. Abandoned property having no owner cannot be the subject of larceny; 6 Sawy. 640; 36 Tex. 375; 43 id. 650. See FINDER.

The decisions have not been entirely uniform as to whether the fraudulent retention of money delivered to be changed is larceny. It has been held in England not to be so, but here the contrary view has been taken; 56 N. Y. 394; 25 Minn. 66; s. c. 33 Am. Rep. 455, n. See 9 C. & P. 741; 11 Cox, Cr. Cas. 32.

The taking must be in the county where the criminal is to be tried; 9 C. & P. 29. But when the taking has been in the county or state, and the thief is caught with the stolen property in another county than that where the theft was committed, he may be tried in the county where arrested with the goods; as, by construction of law, there is a fresh taking in every county in which the thief carries the stolen property; 7 Metc. 175; 42 La. Ann. 228; 48 Ill. 397; 76 Mo. 236; and the circuit court of the latter county has jurisdiction of the offence; 15 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 861. One who steals property in a foreign country, and brings it into this, is guilty of larceny here, on the ground that as the legal possession remains in the owner when the first taking is felonious, every asportation of the property is a fresh taking; and on a prosecution for such an offence the courts will presume that the laws of the foreign country are the same as our own, and that the original taking there was criminal, upon proofs of acts which would make it criminal here; 33 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 1070. Whether an indictment for larceny can be supported where the goods were proved to have been originally stolen in another state, and brought thence into the state where the indictment was found, is a point on which the decisions are contradictory. Where property was stolen in one of the British Provinces and brought by the thief into Massachusetts, it was held not larceny there; 3 Gray 434. See contra, 11 Vt. 650.

The property must be personal, and there can be no larceny of things fixed to the soil; 1 Hale, P. C. 510; but as the taking and carrying away would necessarily terminate the character of the property as realty even if it were such, the important point of this distinction is that if the severance from the realty of anything which is a part thereof, or annexed thereto so as to go with the realty by descent, or in case a conveyance is made by the wrong-doer himself, so that the taking and carrying away is a continuous act, the offence is not larceny, because the taking and carrying away is not of the personal property of another, that which was severed not having been in his possession as a chattel, but only as the portion of a realty; and ore which has not been mined or otherwise severed, so as to convert it into a chattel, is not the subject of larceny; 64 N. C. 619; 8 Nev. 262; nor is water or ice, unless the ice is cut or stored in an ice-house; 6 Hill 144; 33 Ind. 402; or the water is pumped into supply pipes; 11 Q. B. D. 21; sea-weed lying ungathered on the shore is part of the realty and not the subject of larceny; 4 Ir. R. C. L. 6 (but see 156 Pa. 400, where waste coal was carried upon land by a stream and deposited there and the appropriator was held guilty of larceny). It is not larceny to detach any portion of a building and carry it away; 5 Harr. 492; 14 Bush 31; 22 La. Ann. 77; 96 Ala. 44; 3 Taunt. 48; but the courts have expressed their disapproval of a doctrine so technical even while compelled to follow it; 35 Cal. 671; and in many cases of constructive annexation have held the taking and carrying away to be larceny, such as window sashes not permanently annexed to the building; 1 Leach 20; chandeliers; 14 Bush 31; doors taken from their hinges; 34 Tex. 155; rails in a fence; 4 Tex. App. 26; belts belonging to a mill; 11 Ohio St. 104; valves in a portable pump; 96 Ala. 44; the key of a door; 5 Blackf. 417; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 536.

If once severed by the owner, a third person, or the thief himself, as a separate transaction, any part of the realty becomes the subject of larceny; Cl. Cr. L. 245; 11 Ired. 70; 3 Hill, N. Y. 395; 7 Taunt. 188. The common-law rule has been modified from time to time in England, so as to afford protection to things fixed to the freehold. The rule was never satisfactory, and the courts in modern times have been inclined to confine it within the narrowest limits; 30 Am. Rep. 159, n.; s. c. 4 Tex. Ct. App. 26; 11 Ohio 104. At common law there can be no larceny of animals, in which there is neither an absolute nor a qualified property, as beasts ferœ naturœ; 1 Greene 106; 7 Johns. 16; 1 C. & K. 494; 9 Pick. 15; 78 N. C. 481; but otherwise of animals reclaimed or confined, as deer, or rabbits in a park, fish in a tank, pheasants, etc., in a mew; 65 N. C. 315; all valuable domestic animals, and all animals domitœ naturœ, which serve for food. But all other animals which do not serve for food, as dogs, unless taxed, are not subjects of larceny. But oysters, when planted for use, are so, as is the flesh of dead animals; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 864. But under statute in some of the states there may be a larceny of dogs, and actions may be maintained for injury to them; 4 Parker, C. C. 386; 27 Ala. 480; 11 Kan. 480; s. c. 15 Am. Rep. n.; 84 Ky. 681; a horse is a subject of larceny, although at the time he has been removed or strayed from the premises of his owner; 88 Ala. 36. By statutes passed in 1897, stealing electric currents from wires is made a crime in Connecticut, Montana, New Jersey, Tennessee, and Washington.

See Hale; Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown; Wharton; Bishop; Gabbett; Clarke; McClain, Criminal Law; Roscoe, Criminal Evidence; 14 Crim. Law Mag. 705; 2 Alb. L. J. 101; 6 Harv. Law Rev. 244; Russell, Crimes.

LARD. The clarified semi-solid oil of hog's fat. Cent. Dict. The pure fat of healthy swine. 81 Ia. 642.

An act making a regulation for the sale of lard by which the public may know by inspection of the package the ingredients used in its preparation is not an unwarranted interference with trade and does not violate the constitutional provisions as to due process of law; id. See HEALTH.

LARDING MONEY. A small yearly rent paid by the tenants in the manor of Bradford in Wilts, for liberty to feed their hogs with the masts (acorns) of the lord's wood. Also a commutation for some customary service in connection with the word larder as carrying salt or meat. Whart. Lex.

LARGE (L. Fr.). Broad; having much size; complete; ample; at large, free from restraint or confinement; at liberty. It was formerly written at his large.

LAS PARTIDAS. The name of a code of Spanish law. It is sometimes called las siete partidas, or the seven parts, from the number of its principal divisions. It is a compilation of the civil law, the customary law of Spain, and the canon law. It was compiled by four Spanish jurisconsults. by the direction of Alfonso X., A. D. 1250, and published in Castile in 1263, but first promulgated as the law by Alfonso XI., A. D. 1348. The maritime law contained in it is given in vol. 6 of Pardess. Col. of Mar. Law. He follows the editions of 1807, at Paris. It has been translated into English. Such of its provisions as are applicable are in force in Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. 1 Bla. Com. 66; 1 White, Rec. 354.

LASCIVIOUS CARRIAGE. A term including those wanton acts between persons of different sexes, who are not married to each other, that flow from the exercise of lustful passions, and which are not otherwise punished as crimes against chastity and public decency. 2 Swift, Dig. 343; 2 Swift, Syst. 331. It includes, also, indecent acts by one against the will of another. 5 Day 81.

LASCIVIOUS COHABITATION. The act or state of a man and woman, not married, who dwell together in the same house, behaving themselves as man and wife.

In statutes forbidding unlawful cohabitation that term involves the idea of habitual sexual intercourse, or living together in such a way as to hold out the appearance of being husband and wife, and it is the scandal resulting therefrom which constitutes the mischief against which the statutes are directed; 23 Fla. 339; and proof of occasional acts of illicit intercourse is not sufficient; 82 Va. 115; 42 W. Va. 215; 8 So. Rep. (Miss.) 257; but it has been held that such occasional acts may constitute the offence, unless there was no intention of continuing the intercourse, as desire and opportunity might arise; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 941. To constitute the offence there must be both lewd and lascivious intercourse and living together; 80 Va. 20; 28 Fla. 735; though it is said that there need not be actual assertion of the existence of marriage; 57 Miss. 132; 32 Ark. 187; and where the dwelling together is a lawful relation, as that of master and servant, the offence is not established; 39 Mo. App. 372. It is not sustained by evidence of acts of secret adultery or mere familiarity; 49 Mo. App. 325; nor where a man and woman stopped for one night only at a house and assumed marital relations; 60 Ark. 259; 10 Mass. 153; 56 Mo. 147; but it is said that it is not necessary that the cohabitation should be notorious; 2 Humph. 414. General reputation in the neighborhood is not admissible to prove the fact of cohabitation; 3 How. 328. Whether the facts proved constituted a living together in such relation is a question for the jury; 28 Fla. 735.

There must be averment and proof of habitual sexual intercourse which is the gist of the offence; 69 Miss. 393. In Massachusetts, the words "abide and cohabit" are sufficient where the statute used the word "associated"; 159 Mass. 61. An indictment alleging fornication and adultery, and that the parties lived together and were not married, was held sufficient, the language of the statute that they should "lewdly and lasciviously associate" being implied; 106 N. C. 774. The offence may be proved by admission made out of court, and proved by two witnesses; 6 Utah 381. Evidence of previous lascivious cohabitation is sometimes admitted in support of other crimes, as on prosecution for incest; 96 Mich. 449; 102 Cal. 229; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 86. It is not essential in a prosecution against one to prove that both parties had a guilty intent; 109 N. C. 764. When the charge is of such cohabitation of a married man with an unmarried woman, the marriage must be strictly proved, and it cannot be established by reputation; 89 Mo. App. 56. It has been held that a man and woman living together as man and wife, in the belief that they are married, cannot be convicted of "open lewdness"; 127 Mass. 459; 57 N. J. L. 209. See 111 U. C. 725.

Under the United States anti-polygamy act of March 22, 1882, Stat. L. p. 31, § 33, on prosecution for cohabitation with two women as wives, proof of the existence of the marriage relation is pertinent, and it may be proved by general reputation; 46 Fed. Rep. 750; 5 Utah 436; but evidence of general repute of guilt is not sufficient; the facts must be proved, and inferences left to the jury; 21 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 409. In an indictment under the act it is sufficient to use the word cohabit and not to set out its meaning; id. 407, 409; it need not allege that defendant was a male person; 4 Utah 122.

LASCIVIOUS LEWDNESS. Lewd and lascivious conduct in public, or at least practised with such publicity as to be punishable as contra bonos mores.

It is an offence sometimes distinguished from lascivious cohabitation (q. v.), and is described as open and lascivious lewdness; McClain, Cr. L. § 1185. The specific characterization of the offence is the openness and publicity of the act as distinct from a secret act; 128 Mass. 52; 88 Wis. 180. The offence need not be a joint one,—one person only may be guilty therein; 8 Baxt. 576; and when two are charged so that both must have been guilty if one was, one may be convicted and the other acquitted; 81 Ia. 72.

An indictment should follow the statute; 4 Allen 313; and it must be averred that the parties were not married to each other and that the offence was open and public; 1 Swan 136. The crime cannot be established by general reputation; 4 Coldw. 171; but it may be by circumstantial evidence; 10 Humph. 98; and proof has been admitted of similar acts proved at a previous trial for the same offence; 8 Lea 47.

LASCIVIOUSNESS. Lascivious desires or conduct; lustfulness; wantonness; lewdness.

That form of immorality which has reference to sexual impurity; 51 Fed. Rep. 41. See the titles next preceding.

Lasciviousness and lewdness are generally treated as interchangeable if not synonymous terms. In both cases the principal use of the two words is now in each case in a secondary or derived meaning. The primary meaning of lascivus, from which the first is derived, is sportiveness, and its use in a bad sense is said to be post-Augustine, and never by Cicero; the other is derived from the Anglo-Saxon laewed, lay or unlearned.

LASHBITE. The ordinary Danish forfeiture, which was twelve ores, every ore being about 16 pence. M. & W. Also written Lashite, Lashlite. Encyc. Lond.

LAST. The same as last court (q. v.). Cent. Dict. A burden; and a measure of weight for bulky commodities, such as leather, wool, corn. Whart. L. Lex.

Where the plaintiff added new defendants after answer, the last answer was held to mean the last answer of the original defendants; 13 L. J. Ch. 99; 2 Hare 632.

LAST COURT. A court held by the twenty-four jurats in the marshes of Kent and summoned by the bailiffs. It made orders for levying taxes, and imposing penalties for the preservation of marshes. M. & W.; Ency. Lond.

LAST HEIR. He to whom the lands come if they escheat for want of lawful heirs: viz., sometimes the lord of whom the lands are held, sometimes the king. Bract. lib. 5, c. 17.

LAST RESORT. The highest court in any jurisdiction, beyond which there is no appeal, is termed court of last resort.

LAST SICKNESS. That of which a person dies.

The expenses of this sickness are generally entitled to a preference in payment of debts of an insolvent estate; La. Civ. Code, art. 3166.

To prevent impositions, the statute of frauds requires that nuncupative wills shall be made during the testator's last sickness. Roberts, Frauds 556; 20 Johns. 502.

LAST WILL (Lat. ultima voluntas). A disposition of real estate to take effect after death.

Generally speaking, last will means the one latest in date, though there may be two or more wills, all speaking from the death of the testator; 35 L. J. Ch. 389; L. R. 1 Eq. 510; 55 Bea. 321. The phrase "This is my last will, and testament" does not, of itself, revoke a former will; 9 Moo. P. C. 131; but may be confirmatory proof of an intention to revoke; 16 Bea. 173; 22 L. J. Ch. 185; 1 W. R. 3. "My last will dated," etc., giving the date of the first will, was held to mean the last will in fact, the date given been rejected as a mistake; 46 L. J. P. D. & A. 30; 2 P. D. 111; 37 L. J. P. & M. 72, n.

It is strictly distinguishable from testament, which is applied to personal estate; 1 Wms. Exec., 7th Am. ed. *4, n.; but the words are generally used together, "last will and testament," in a will, whether real or personal estate is to be disposed of. See WILL.

LASTAGE. A custom anciently exacted in some fairs and markets to carry things where one will; also a custom paid for goods sold by the last (a certain weight or measure); the ballast of a ship. Cow. Stowage room for goods in a vessel. Young, Naut. Dict.

LATA CULPA. Gross neglect. See BAILMENT.

LATCHING. An underground survey. Whart. L. Lex.

LATE. "Existing not long ago, but now departed this life." 17 Ala. 190. See 7 Cal. 215; 16 N. J. L. 47; 3 Pa. 328.

LATELY. This word has come to have "a very large retrospect," as we say, lately deceased of one dead ten or twenty years; 2 Show. 294.

LATENS (Lat.). Latent (q. v.).

LATENT. Hidden; concealed; not appearing on the surface or face of a thing.

LATENT AMBIGUITY. One which does not appear on the face of the instrument. A latent ambiguity is where words apply equally to two different things or subject-matters; 15 M. & W. 561; but where the parties may have intended either of the two things in dispute, the term does not apply. 10 Ohio 534.

It is settled both in England and in this country that extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain a latent ambiguity, but there has been some difficulty in defining precisely when and under what circumstances such evidence may be introduced to show the intention. Two rules are laid down in 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 718, 726, as illustrated by two leading English cases. The first rule is: "Where a determinate intention appears to be expressed by the written instrument, extrinsic evidence is admissible to show that the description of an object contained in the instrument is applicable with legal certainty to either of two objects; and, a latent ambiguity having been thus disclosed, evidence of the surrounding circumstances is admissible to show which of the objects was meant by the description; and if, on this evidence, one of the objects is indicated with sufficient certainty, direct evidence of declarations of intention is not admissible." 9 L. J. Ex. 27; S. C. 5 M. & W. 363. In that case the language of the court was: "If, therefore, by looking at the surrounding facts to be found by the jury, the court can clearly see, with the knowledge which arises from those facts alone, that the testator meant either the lessor of the plaintiff or the defendant, it may so decide, and direct the jury accordingly; but we think that, for this purpose, they cannot receive declarations of the testator of what he intended to do in making his will." A good illustration of the uncertainty as to the person was, "where a testatrix gave a share of her residue to her 'cousin, Harriet Cloak,' and the testatrix had no cousin of that name, but had a married cousin, Harriet Crane, whose maiden name was Cloak, and a cousin T. Cloak, whose wife's name was Harriet; evidence was admitted to show the testatrix's knowledge of an intimacy with the members of the Cloak family. In the event 'cousin' was read in the secondary sense of 'wife of a cousin,' and the claim of Harriet, the wife of T. Cloak, allowed." 34 Ch. D. 255; 56 L. J. Ch. 171. Cited in the American note to the above case as "a good type of the American doctrine," was a devise to "the four boys," where the testator had seven sons, of whom three were shown to be minors living at home; 113 Ill. 327. And in the case of Hardy v. Warren reported, Browne, Parol Evidence 461, there was a bequest by a woman to her "husband" when she had obtained a void divorce and was living with another man as his wife. These were held to be cases of latent ambiguity to explain which extrinsic evidence was admissible to determine the persons who were to take.

The other rule laid down by the work referred to is: "Assuming that the intention appears on the face of the instrument to be determinate, if, after exhausting such evidence of the surrounding circumstances as is necessary to place the court at the point of view of the maker of the instrument, there is still an ambiguity as to which of two objects is meant,—the description being sufficient to point with legal certainty to either if there were no other,—the intention as between those objects may be proved by direct evidence outside the instrument." 2 M. & W. 129; s. c. 6 L. J. Ex. 59. It is said that courts of law are very jealous of the admission of extrinsic evidence to explain the intention of the testator, and that it should be permitted only where an ambiguity is introduced by extrinsic circumstances; 4 Dow 65; in this case illustrations are given of ambiguity both as to person and subject-matter, as a devise of an estate called Blackacre when the testator had two estates so called; or if a devise be given to a son, naming him, and there are two sons by that name; or to a nephew "William" where the testator had no nephew of that name. The rule as laid down by the American cases has been stated to be that where the terms describing the object of the testator's bounty apply indifferently to more than one person or thing, evidence may be introduced of any material fact relating to the property claimed, and the circumstances and affairs of the testator, his family, and of the claimant, "and the testator's declarations made before, at, or after the making of the will, are admissible in this view, but no evidence of mere mistake on the part of the testator or the draftsman is admissible." Browne, Par. Ev. § 126; 124 Mass. 314; 2 Dall. 70; 43 Pa. 102; 45 Wis. 211; 1 Wend. 549.

It was held by the United States supreme court that a bequest "to be equally divided between the board of foreign and the board of home missions," may be shown by parol to have been intended for the Presbyterian boards thus named, there being similar boards controlled by other religious denominations; 120 U. S. 586. See also, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to show intention, LEGACY.

LATENT DEED. One kept for twenty years or more in a person's strong box. See 7 N. J. L. 177.

LATENT DEFECT. A defect or blemish in any article sold, known to the seller but not apparent to the purchaser, and which cannot be discovered by mere observation, which, not being discoverable from mere observation, was concealed from the purchaser. See 21 N. Y. 552.

LATENT FAULT. Latent defect (q. v.).

LATERAL RAILROAD. A branch railroad. One running from some point on a main line intended as a connecting line or feeder.

A lateral road is said to be "one proceeding from some point on the main trunk between its termini." 14 Ill. 273. "The general route of the lateral road must lie at an acute angle with the main trunk;" id. "A lateral road is another name for a branch road;" id. The definition of such a structure does not depend on its length or direction, it may be a "direct extension" from the terminus as well as "merely an offshoot of the main road;" 107 Pa. 548; and it may run in the same direction as the main line so as to be in effect an extension; 66 Mo. 228; it may be an elevated road over a wharf; 107 Pa. 548. When authorized, the necessity and the location are in the discretion of the directors; id.; but the lateral railroad cannot be constructed without authority expressly granted or necessarily implied from the charter; 48 Pa. 355. When it is authorized, the right to acquire lands by the exercise of the power of eminent domain is implied as on the main line; 14 Ill. 273; 72 Mich. 206; 59 Ia. 563. Where there is a limitation of time for completing the main line, it does not apply to a branch road, certainly not to one for which the land has been acquired within the time limited; 66 Mo. 228.

The power is as large as the power granted for construction of the main line; 48 Pa. 355; and a power to construct such roads in the discretion of the directors is a continuing one, not to be abridged by a subsequent act giving to the company a time limited for completing the main line with sidings, appurtenances, etc.; 159 id. 331. The word appurtenances does not include branches; id.

The same reasonable rules as to furnishing, and having proper switches, turnouts, etc., apply to lateral roads as to other railroads; 2 Pittsb. 444; so also the same statutory requirements apply as to crossing highways; 1 B. & Ad. 441.

Words permitting the construction of such lines are not obligatory; 2 Macq. H. L. Cas. 514; and impose no duty which will be enforced by mandamus; 1 El. & Bl. 874. A charter power to construct branch or lateral roads includes the right to build one running in the same general direction and connecting the main line with another railroad; 86 Va. 618. When a railroad company has power to construct lateral or branch roads and purchases another road under an act authorizing its use under the charter of the purchaser, the latter may extend the purchased road; 94 Pa. 435. The mere fact that the building of a lateral railroad may add to the earnings of the main line will not authorize its construction in the absence of power in the charter; 116 Ill. 449; 138 id. 453.

A power "to construct such roads from the main line to other points or places in the several counties through which said road may pass," is limited to such as begin and end in the same county; 5 McLean 425. A lateral railroad may cross an ordinary railroad to reach a navigable river to which its construction is authorized and the continuity of the lateral road is not thereby destroyed; 74 Pa. 373. A statute authorizing a railroad company to subscribe to and acquire an interest not exceeding one-fifth, in any lateral or connecting road, confers a distinct privilege or franchise which renders the gross receipts derived from such interest liable to a state tax, notwithstanding an exemption of the principal company from such tax on its own gross receipts; 48 Md. 49. Branch railroads, under the Missouri act of March 21, 1868, are practically independent lines and not included in an exemption from taxation in the charter of the main line; 120 U. S. 569; 99 Mo. 30. Reduction of the number of trains on a branch road of which the business is lessened by charter of a competing line, will not operate as a forfeiture of the charter of the main line; 12 Gray 180.

The Pennsylvania acts of 1832, May 5, and 1865, April 18, limit the width of lateral railroads to 20 feet, whether single or double track, and under these acts the width has been held to be a jurisdictional fact, which may be taken advantage of at any stage of the proceedings; 111 Pa. 95. See RAILROAD; EMINENT DOMAIN.

LATERAL SUPPORT. The right of having one's land and the structures erected thereon supported by the land of a neighboring proprietor.

Each of two adjoining land-owners is entitled to the support of the other's land. The right of lateral support exists only with respect to the soil in its natural condition; 90 U. S. 635; and it is an incident to the land in that condition; 19 Barb. 383. If any excavation cause damage whilst the soil remains in this condition, an action will lie, but in the absence of negligence in excavating, or prescription, or grant, in favor of the neighbor, no action will lie for injury occasioned to the latter if he has increased the lateral pressure by building on the land; 122 Mass. 207; 2 Thomp. & C. 277; 10 H. L. Cas. 333; 22 Mo. 566; 58 Mo. App. 586; 37 Vt. 99. A land-owner has a right to assume that the soil will be permitted to remain in its natural state, and for a violation of this right, an action will lie independently of the question of negligence; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; 25 Vt. 465; 25 N. J. L. 362. But see 47 La. Ann. 814, where it was held that an adjoining land-owner was liable for weakening his neighbor's wall, by the construction of a building on his own land.

A person's right to the support of the land immediately around his house is not so much an easement, as it has been called, as it is the ordinary right of enjoyment of property. Professor Washburn characterizes the right as "of a nature somewhat akin to the easement of light."

The doctrine of lateral support has been thus carefully stated by this eminent author: "This right exists independently of grant or prescription, and is also an absolute right; so that, if his neighbor excavates the adjoining land, and in consequence A's land falls, he may have an action, although A's excavation was not carelessly or unskilfully performed. This natural right does not extend to any buildings A may place upon his land; and therefore, if A builds his house upon the verge of his own land, he does not thereby acquire the right to have it derive its support from the land adjoining it until it shall have stood and had the advantage of such support for twenty years. In the meantime such adjacent owner may excavate his own land for such purposes as he sees fit, provided he does not dig carelessly or recklessly; and if, in so doing, the adjacent earth gives way, and the house falls by reason of the additional weight thereby placed upon the natural soil, the owner of the house is without remedy. It was his own folly to place it there. But if it shall have stood for twenty years with the knowledge of the adjacent proprietor, it acquires the easement of a support in the adjacent soil. . . . But this right of a land-owner to support his land against that of the adjacent owner does not, as before stated, extend to the support of any additional weight or structure that he may place thereon. If, therefore, a man erect a house upon his own land, so near the boundary line thereof as to be injured by the adjacent owner's excavating his land in a proper manner, and so as not to have caused the soil of the adjacent parcel to fall if it had not been loaded with an additional weight, it would be damnum absque injuria,—a loss for which the person so excavating would not be responsible in damages;" 2 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 380.

It is settled law that "the unquestionable right of a land-owner to remove the earth from his own premises adjacent to another's building is subject to the qualification that he shall use ordinary care to cause no unnecessary damage to his neighbor's property in so doing." 110 Mo. 234; 25 N. Y. 334; 2 Allen 131; 76 Ill. 240; and as it is put by another author: "In exercising his rights over his land, the owner is bound to use ordinary care and skill for the purpose of avoiding injury to his neighbor. Thus, while, as a general rule, he is not bound to continue the support his land gives to a structure upon, or other artificial arrangement of, adjoining land, and is, therefore, not liable for the natural consequences of his withdrawing this support, yet in doing so, he must act with such care and caution that (as nearly as by reasonable exertion it is possible to secure such a result) his neighbor shall suffer no more injury than would have accrued if the structure had been put where it is without ever having had the support of his land."

The principle underlying this rule is that "if a man in the exercise of his own rights of property do damage to his neighbor, he is liable if it might have been avoided by the use of reasonable care;" 23 Mo. 573; 54 Kan. 323. In the absence of a statutory rule it is said that "the care required of a party so excavating is that of a man of ordinary prudence in the circumstances of the particular situation. . . . The particular circumstances so largely shape and indicate the duty that any attempt to reduce the rule to greater certainty would probably tend to impede rather than to promote the administration of justice;" 110 Mo. 234. It has been recently held that prior notice to the neighbor whose property may be endangered by the excavation is an essential part of the ordinary care referred to; 53 N. J. L. 442; 13 L. R. A. 569. In this case there was so emphatic a dissent that, standing alone, it could hardly be considered sufficient authority for the proposition. On this point it is said that "one who digs away land which affords support to an adjoining house ought to give the owner reasonable notice of his intention to do so, and he must allow the latter all reasonable facilities for obtaining artificial support, including a temporary privilege of shoring up the house by supports based upon the former owner's land;" 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg., 4th ed. § 701. A more recent text writer says: "Thus the authorities are agreed that one who proposes to excavate, or make other alterations or improvements upon his own land, which may endanger the land or house of his neighbor, is bound to give the latter reasonable notice of what he proposes to do, to enable him to take the necessary measures for the preservation of his own property. But, after giving such notice, he is bound only to reasonable and ordinary care in the prosecution of the work." 1 Thomp. Neg. 276. In many cases it is held that after notice from the owner who proposes to excavate, it is the duty of his neighbor to shore up his own building; 44 Md. 268; 4 Paige 169; 9 B. & C. 725. And where a neighbor has no right to support by grant or by prescription, it is said that he must shore up his own house; 8 B. Monr. 353; but there is no obligation on the part of the owner of a building about to be removed to shore up the other buildings; Goddard, Easem., Bennett's ed. 43.

The owner of land cannot be deprived of his right to excavate his own land by the action of his neighbor in building at or near the boundary line, and if he conduct his operations with due care, and no right by grant or prescription has been acquired by his neighbor, he is not liable, even though the building of the latter be ruined; 3 B. & Ad. 871; 76 Ill. 237; 18 Pick. 117; 4 N. Y. 201; 20 Conn. 533.

In the case of a party wall (q. v.) the joint owners of it have no easement of reciprocal support from each other's buildings, and if one proposes to remove the building, and injury to his neighbor is liable to result from it, he must notify him of his intention that he may look to his own protection, at the same time using reasonable care and precaution to protect the neighbor, and if this is done, and still injury results, no action will lie; 98 Ky. 284.

With respect to a right by prescription for the support of buildings, there is a difference between the tendency of judicial opinion in England and the United States. In the former country the tendency, "as in the case of all rights affecting real estate, is strongly in favor of the recognition of this right as acquired by prescription;" L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740; 19 Ch. Div. 281; 2 C. & K. 250. See 1 El. Bl. & El. 622; 9 H. L. Cas. 503. The American doctrine, after some fluctuation, is now considered as settled that an easement for the support of a building cannot be acquired by prescription; 98 Cal. 346; 42 Mo. App. 551 (overruling 13 id. 575); 49 Ga. 19; 7 Watts 460; 80 Va. 1 (overruling 27 Gratt. 77); 12 Mass. 230. See note on this branch of the subject, 20 L. R. A. 780.

The measure of damages in actions for removing the lateral support of another's land is the amount required to restore the property to its former condition with as good, means of lateral support, and special damages must be specially pleaded; 7 Houst. 219; or the diminution of the value of the land by falling, caving, or washing, as the natural result of the excavation; 25 N. J. L. 356; 57 Minn. 493; 64 id. 123; 149 Pa. 155; 155 id. 256; 3 S. Dak. 44; 3 Sutherland, Damages 417. See 121 Ind. 195; s. c. 6 L. R. A. 449.

The right of lateral support may be asserted as well against a municipal corporation's making excavations in changing the grade of a street as against private individuals; 88 Va. 992. But see 28 Abb. N. C. 154. So where a city built a sewer in a public street opposite land, under which and the street was a stratum of silt and quicksand which flowed into the sewer trench so that a building on the land was damaged, the city was held liable; 44 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 344. In this case three judges dissented on the authority of 4 L. R. Exch. 244, in which it was held that there is no right of recovery for damages occasioned by the sinking in of land, and that this doctrine extended to a quicksand flowing so freely as to be raised by a pump.

Where a house is injured as an indirect effect of the improper working of mines, the right of action arises at the time the mischief is felt, and the statute of limitations runs from that time; 9 H. L. Cas. 503.

For a collection of cases depending on particular facts and illustrating the right of lateral support, see 67 Vt. 630.

In California it is made unlawful by statute for a land-owner to remove the lateral support of adjoining land without taking reasonable precautions to support it; Cal. Civ. Code § 832. It was held that this liability was not avoided by proof that the work was done by a contractor, but that where the excavation was done under contract, and no precaution was taken with respect to lateral support, both the owner and the contractor were liable to the owner of adjoining land which fell in; 105 Cal. 52.

LATERAN COUNCILS. The general name given to the numerous councils held in the Lateran Church at Rome.

The first of these was convened A. D. 649 to consider the doctrine of the Monothelites. This council held five sessions, during which the writings of the leading advocates of the theory were examined and condemned, and all persons anathematized who did not confess their belief in the existence of both the divine and the human will in the person of Jesus Christ. The second of the councils, held in the years 1105, 1112, 1116, and 1123, settled the controversy between the pope and the emperor as to the investiture of bishops, prescribed the methods of ordinations and elections, by which, although the pope apparently made large concessions to the emperor, he was, in fact, able to practically control the elections, and passed additional decrees to enforce the celibacy of the clergy. The third council, convened in 1139, condemned the antipope and deposed all who received office under him and promulgated thirty canons of discipline among which were several against simony, marriage, and immorality among the clergy. The fourth council (1179) decreed that the election of the popes should be confined to the college of cardinals, two-thirds of the votes of which should be requisite for an election, instead of a majority, as had previously been necessary. It condemned the Albigenses and the Waldenses. The fifth council convened in the year 1215. It is usually called the fourth Lateran and was the most important as marking the summit of the papal power. It decreed that the doctrine of transubstantiation be one of the articles of faith, required all persons who had reached the age of discretion to confess once a year, arranged for the place of assembly and the time for the next crusade, and anathematized all heretics whose belief was opposed to the faith, decreeing that after their condemnation they should be handed over to the secular authorities, excommunicating all who received, protected, or maintained them, and threatening all bishops with deposition who did not use their utmost endeavors to clear their dioceses of them. The sixth council (1512–17) abolished the Pragmatic Sanction and substituted a concordat agreed upon by Leo X. and Francis I. in which the liberties of the Church were greatly restricted.

Some authorities recognize five only, omitting the first above stated and numbering the others from one to five.

LATHE, LATH (L. Lat. laestrum or leda. Law Fr. and Eng. Dict.). A division of certain counties in England, intermediate between a county or shire and a hundred, sometimes containing three or four hundreds, as in Kent and Sussex. Cowel. But in Sussex the word used for this division is rape. 1 Bla. Com. 116. There was formerly a lathe-reeve or bailiff in each lathe. Id. This division into lathes continues to the present day. In Ireland, the lathe was intermediate between the tything and the hundred. Spencer, Ireland. See T. L.

LATIN UNION. A monetary alliance of France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy for the establishment of a mutual and uniform monetary policy and the maintenance of a uniform and interchangeable coinage of gold and silver based on the French franc. Greece and Roumania joined the association in April, 1867.

The convention was made at Paris, Dec. 23, 1865, and provided that certain named gold and silver coins and no others should be used by each state, and that they should be received interchangeably when not worn to one-half per cent. or the devices effaced. Silver coins were made a legal tender between individuals of the state which issued them to the sum of fifty francs; but the state itself should receive them in any amount and the public banks of each country to the sum of one hundred francs. The contracting governments agreed to redeem the small coins in gold or five-franc silver pieces, when presented in sums of not less than one hundred francs. It was agreed that of silver coins of two francs and less there should not be issued more than six francs for each inhabitant, the amount for each country being specified according to the estimated population in 1855. Provision was made for any other nation to join the convention by accepting its obligations and adopting the monetary system of the union. The treaty was limited to remain in force till Jan. 1, 1880.

January 30th, 1874, a supplementary treaty was made, further limiting the coinage of 1874, and the same limitations were made for 1875 and 1876. In the conference of 1877 the coinage of five-franc pieces was suspended except nine million francs for Italy. In 1873 Belgium passed a law to suspend the coinage of silver entirely, and France did the same in 1876, and the law of Switzerland was to the same effect. Separate legislation to limit the coinage was permissible, as the treaty of 1865 only limited the maximum but did not make any coinage obligatory.

In 1878 through a conference in Paris the same nations renewed the monetary treaty as it was "in all that relates to fineness, weight, denomination, and currency of their gold and silver coin." The free coinage of gold (excepting five-franc pieces, of which the coinage was suspended) was guaranteed each state, and the coinage of silver five-franc pieces was provisionally suspended to be resumed only by unanimous agreement. This treaty was in force, by its terms, until January 1st, 1886.

In November, 1885, France, Greece, Italy, and Switzerland renewed the convention for five years, absolutely, with the further agreement that after Jan. 1, 1891, it should be subject to termination on one year's notice. Belgium after some hesitation gave her assent. Silver coinage was made redeemable and no addition to it permitted.

See, generally, Int. Cyc. tit. Latin Union.

Another group of European nations acting under a joint monetary convention includes Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, which have had a treaty known as the Scandinavian Monetary Convention, dated in 1873, for the mutual regulation of their coinage. In addition to the countries named as belonging to the Latin Union, Spain, Austria-Hungary, Finland, Roumania, Servia, Bulgaria, and Monaco have also coined large amounts of either or both gold and silver into money of weight, fineness, and value exactly proportionate to or identical with that of the countries included in the Latin Union.

LATINER. An interpreter. Co. 2 Inst. 515.

LATINI COLONIARII. The free inhabitants of a colony founded with the jus latii, or of a country upon which the jus latii had been conferred. By the constitutio Antoniana, Caracalla extended to them the privilege of full Roman citizenship.

LATINI JUNIANI. Such freedmen as enjoyed their liberty tuitione prætoris, and who, under the lex junia norbana, were made legally free, their freedom, however, being only of the kind enjoyed by the latini coloniarii. They possessed only the jus commercii and not the jus connubii, and even in regard to the former they were restricted, in that they had the commercium inter vivos, but not the commercium mortis causa. They could neither make a will nor take anything under a will, and when a latinus junianus died, his property reverted to his master as though he had remained a slave all his life. The privilege of Roman citizenship conferred upon the latini coloniarii did not include the latini juniani. See Sohm, Rom. L. § 22.

LATINS. See JUS LATII.

LATITAT (Lat. he lies hid). In English Law. The name of a writ calling a defendant to answer to a personal action in the king's bench. It derives its name from a supposition that the defendant lurks and lies hid, and cannot be found in the county of Middlesex (in which the said court is holden) to be taken there, but is gone into some other county, and therefore requiring the sheriff to apprehend him in such other county. Fitz. N. B. 78. Abolished by stat. 2 Wm. IV. c. 39.

LATTER-MATH. A second mowing; the aftermath.

LATOR. A bearer; a messenger. Whart. L. Lex.

LAUDARE. To advise or persuade; to arbitrate. Whart.

In Civil Law. To cite or quote; to name; to show one's title or authority. Calv. Lex.

Laudamentum. The finding or award of a jury. 2 Bla. Com. 285.

LAUDATIO. Testimony delivered in court concerning an accused person's good behavior and integrity of life. It resembled the practice which prevails in our trials, of calling persons to speak to a prisoner's character. Wharton.

LAUDATOR. A witness to character. A person to decide some point at issue between others.

LAUDEMEO. In Spanish Law. Taxes paid by possessors of land held by quit-rent or emphyteusis to the owner of the estate when the tenant alienates his right in the property. Escriche.

It was provided that "the tenant may aliene the land, acquanting the lord who has the right of preemption (tanteo), with the price that another has offered; and he not giving that price, or being silent with respect thereto, for two months the tenant may sell, but to a person from whom the lord may recover the rent, in order that he shall execute a new deed of lease, and for which he is entitled to a relief (laudemio), which is the fiftieth part of the price or value." L. 29, tit. 8 p. 5; 1 White, Rec., 87; Schmidt, Civil Law of Spain and Mexico 74.

LAUDEMIUM (Lat. a laudando domino). In Roman Law. A fiftieth part of the purchase-money or (if no sale) of the value of the estate paid to the landlord (dominus) by a new emphyteuta on his succession to the estate, not as heir, but as singular successor. Voetius, Com. ad Pand. lib. 6, tit. 3, §§ 26–35; Mack. R. L. § 328.

In Old English Law. The tenant paid a laudimium or acknowledgment-money to the new landlord on the death of the old. Called also laudativum. See Blount, Acknowledgment-Money.

A vessel already in the water cannot be launched; 70 Me. 352.

A large, long, low, flat-bottomed boat. Mar. Dict. The long boat of a ship. R. H. Dana. A small vessel employed to carry the cargo of a large one to and from the shore.

The goods on board of a launch are at the risk of the insurers till landed; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 387. The duties and rights of the master of a launch are the same as those of the master of a lighter.

When the master of a vessel agreed to take cotton on board his vessel from the cotton-press, and employed a steam-lighter for that purpose, and the cotton was lost by an explosion of the steam-boiler of the lighter, it was held that his vessel was liable in rem for the loss; 23 Bost. L. Rep. 277.

LAUREATE or LAUREAT. An officer of the English sovereign. His duty formerly consisted only in composing an ode annually, on the sovereign's birthday, and on the New Year; sometimes also, though rarely, on occasions of any remarkable victory. The annual birthday ode has been discontinued since the conclusion of the reign of George III. The title has been said to be derived from the circumstance that in classical times and in the middle ages, the most distinguished poets were solemnly crowned with laurel. Out of this association of ideas sprang the custom of the presentation of a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and versification at the English universities, the king's laureate simply meaning a rhetorician in his service. In allusion to this custom Selden, in his Titles of Honor, speaks of the laurel crown as an ensign of the degree of mastership in poetry. A relic of the old university practice of crowning distinguished students of poetry exists in the term "laureation," which is still used at one of the Scotch universities (St. Andrews), to signify the taking of the degree of Master of Arts.

LAUREL. An English gold coin worth twenty shillings, or about five dollars, coined in 1619 by James I., so-called because the head of the king was wreathed with laurel, and not crowned as on English coins.

LAW. That which is laid down; that which is established. A rule or method of action, or order of sequences.

The rules and methods by which society compels or restrains the action of its members.

The aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the conduct of its members.

The aggregate of rules set by men as politically superior or sovereign, to men as politically subject. Aust. Jur., Campbell's ed. 86.

A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in the state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. 1 Bla. Com. 44.

A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state. 1 Steph. Com. 25.

The general body of rules which are addressed by the rulers of a political community to the members of that society, and which are generally obeyed. Markby, Elements of Law 3.

A rule of conduct contained in a command of a sovereign addressed to the subject. Encyc. Brit.

A general rule of human action, taking cognizance of external acts only, enforced by a definite authority, which authority is human, and among human authorities is that which is paramount in a political society. More briefly, a general rule of external human action enforced by a sovereign political authority. Holland, Jur. 37.

All other rules for the guidance of human action are called laws merely by analogy; and any propositions which are not rules for human action are called laws by metaphor only. Id.

A rule or enactment promulgated by the legislative authority of a state; a long-established local custom which has the force of such an enactment. 10 Pet. 18.

The doctrines and procedure of the common law of England and America, as distinguished from those of equity.

An oath. So used in the old English practice, by which wager of law was allowed. See WAGER OF LAW.

Perhaps few terms whose use requires equal precision serve in so many diverse meanings as the term law. In its root it signifies that which is laid down; that which is established. "In the largest sense," says Montesquieu (Esprit des Lois, b. 1, ch. 1), "laws are the necessary relations which arise from the nature of things; and, in this sense, all beings have their laws, God has his laws, the material universe has its laws, intelligences superior to man have their laws, animals have their laws, man has his laws. In this sense, the idea of a command proceeding from a superior to an inferior is not necessarily involved in the term law. It is frequently thus used to denote simply a statement of a constant relation of phenomena. The laws of science, thus, are but generalized statements of observed facts." "It is a perversion of language," says Paley, "to assign any law as the efficient operative cause of anything. A law presupposes an agent: this is only the mode according to which an agent proceeds."

It has been said that "the one idea that is common to all meanings of the word law is that of order or regularity in the happening of events. Starting from this, the meanings divide into two groups which may be distinguished as law in the scientific and in the jural sense." Terry, Anglo-Am. L. 1. The author cited continues that "the former seems to contain no elements in addition to the one above mentioned. A scientific law can be expressed as a mere formula," but law in the jural sense involves the further ideas that the regularity manifested is the result of an act or omission of a rational being, produced by an attempt to conform his conduct to some standard or ideal more or less clearly conceived. The result of this process is the evolution in any community of individuals of common principles of action, which as soon as reason takes cognizance of them become laws in the most general, jural sense of the word. With the advance of civilization new elements come into being: (1) The idea of force is added to that of order and is applied to compel obedience, or, going one step further, to change, modify, or add to these rules of action. (2) The primitive law becomes differentiated from other bodies of rules with which it is at first confounded, so that in the end what is termed law in the stricter sense may conflict with other recognized principles of action which are termed laws in the more general sense, as the natural or the moral law. Id.

In its relation to human affairs there is a broad use of the term, in which it denotes any of those rules and methods by which a society compels or restrains the action of its members. Here the idea of a command is more generally obvious, and has usually been thought an essential element in the notion of human law.

A distinction is to be observed in the outset between the abstract and the concrete meaning of the word. That which is usually intended by the term "laws" is not coextensive with that which is intended by the term "law." In the broadest sense which it bears when used in the abstract, law is a science. It treats of the theory of government, the relation of states to each other and to individuals, and the rights and obligations of states, of individuals, and of artificial persons and local communities among themselves and to each other.

An analysis of the science of law presents a view, first, of the rights of persons, distinguishing them as natural persons and artificial persons, or bodies politic or corporations. These rights are deemed either absolute, as relating to the enjoyment of personal security, liberty, and of private property, or, on the other hand, as relative,—that is, arising out of the relation in which several persons stand. These relations are either (1) public or political, viz.: the relation of magistrates and people; or, (2) private, as the relations of master and servant, husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, to which might be added relations arising out of private contracts, such as partnership, principal and agent, and the like. Under the head of the rights of persons as arising out of public relations may be discussed the constitution and polity of the state, the distribution of powers among the various departments of the government, the political status of individuals, as aliens, citizens, and the like.

In the second place, the analysis presents the rights of property, which is divided into personal property or chattels, viz., that which is movable, and real property, or that which is immovable, viz., lands, including nearly all degrees of interest therein, as well as such chattels as by a peculiar connection with land may be deemed to have lost their character as legally movable: these rights of property are viewed in respect to the origin of title, the transmission of title, and the protection of the enjoyment thereof.

In the third place, the analysis presents a view of private wrongs, or those injuries to persons for which the law provides a redress for the aggrieved party; and under this head may be considered the tribunals through which the protection of rights or the redress of wrongs may be obtained, and the various modes of procedure to those ends.

Lastly, the analysis presents a view of public wrongs, or crimes and misdemeanors, in which may be considered the theory of crime and punishment, the persons capable of committing crimes, the several degrees of guilt of principals and accessaries, the various crimes of which the law takes cognizance,—as, those against religion, those against the state and its government, and those against persons and property,—with the punishment which the law affixes to each, and also the tribunals and procedure by which crimes threatened may be prevented, and crimes committed may be punished. Bla. Com.

In a stricter sense, but still in the abstract, law denotes the aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the conduct of members of the community.

It is the aggregate of legal rules and principles, as distinguished from any particular rule or principle. No one statute, nor all statutes, constitute the law of the state; the principles laid down by the courts and the regulations of municipal bodies, as well as, to some extent, the universal principles of ethics, go to make up the body of the law. It includes principles, which rest in the common sense of justice and right, as well as positive rules or regulations, which rest in ordinance. It is the aggregate of the rules or principles only which the governing power in the community recognizes, because that power, whether it be deemed as residing in a monarch, an aristocracy, or in the people at large, is the source of the authority and the sanction of those rules and principles. It is the aggregate of those rules and principles which are recognized as the law by that power, rather than those which are actually enforced in all cases; for a statute is none the less a law because the community forbear to enforce it, so long as it is officially recognized by them as that which, in theory at least, should be enforced; nor does a departure from the law by the governing power in itself abrogate the law. It comprises not only those rules and principles which are to be enforced, but also those which are simply permissive; for a very large part even of modern statute-law —which is commonly defined as a rule commanding or prohibiting—in reality neither commands nor prohibits, except in the most distant and indirect sense, but simply authorizes, permits, or sanctions; and this is much more generally true of those principles of the law which rest in custom and the adjudications of the courts. It is only those which relate to the members of the community in question; for laws, as such, have no extra-territorial operation.

The state has in general two, and only two, articulate organs for law-making purposes—the legislature and the tribunals. The first organ makes new law; the second attests and confirms old law, though under cover of doing so it introduces many new principles. Holland, Jur. 65. "The statute law is the fruit of the conscious power of society, while the unwritten and customary law is the product of its unconscious effort. The former is indeed to a certain extent a creative work; but, as we have already seen, the condition of its efficacy is that it must limit itself to the office of aiding and supplementing the unconscious development of the unwritten law." Address of James C. Carter, Rep. (1890) Am. Bar Assn. 236.

The earliest notion of law was not an enunciation of a principle but a judgment in a particular case. When pronounced in the early ages, by a king, it was assumed to be the result of direct divine inspiration. Afterwards came the notion of a custom which a judgment affirms or punishes its breach. In the outset, however, the only authoritative statement of right and wrong is a judicial sentence rendered after the fact has occurred. It does not presuppose a law to have been violated, but is enacted for the first time by a higher form into the judge's mind at the moment of adjudication. Maine, Anc. Law (Dwight's ed.) pp. xv, 5. See PRECEDENT. As to Primitive Notions of Law, see 10 Am. L. Rev. 422.

The idea of law has commonly been analyzed as composed of three elements: (1) a command of the lawgiver, which command must prescribe not a single act merely, but a series or class of acts; (2) an obligation imposed thereby on the citizen; (3) a sanction threatened in the event of disobedience; Benth. Frag. on Gov.; Austin, Prov. Jur.; Maine, Anc. Law. Hamilton declared a sanction essential to the idea of law. Federalist, No. 15.

The latter clause of Blackstone's definition has been much criticised. Mr. Chitty modifies it to "commanding what shall be done or what shall not be done"; 1 Bla. Com. 44, note; and Mr. Stephen omits it in his definition. See supra. As to Law and Command, see 1 Law Mag. & Rev. N. S. 189.

These definitions, though more apt in reference to statutes and edicts than to the law in general, seem, even in reference to the former sort of law, to look rather at the usual form than the invariable essence of the thing. The principle of law, that a promise without a consideration is void, neither commands men to provide a consideration for every promise nor forbids them to promise without consideration, for this is lawful; nor does it forbid them to fulfil such promises. It simply amounts to this, that if men choose to break such promises, society will not interfere to enforce them. And even many statutes have no form of a command or prohibition; and, moreover, some that are such in form are not in reality. An enactment that no action shall be brought on a simple contract after the lapse of six years from the time the cause of action accrued cannot aptly be said to command men to bring actions within six years, nor even, in fact, to forbid them to bring such actions after that time; for it is still lawful to sue on an outlawed demand, and, if the defendant do not object, the plaintiff may succeed. It may be deemed a command in so far as it is a direction to the court to dismiss such actions; but as a rule of civil conduct it amounts simply to this, that when an obligation has become stale to a certain degree, society will sanction the debtor in repudiating it.

A recent work on legal history disclaims philosophical analysis and definition of law, as belonging neither to the historical nor to the dogmatic science of law, but to the theoretical part of politics. Legal science is said to be "not an ideal or ethical result of political analysis; it is the actual result of facts of human nature and history." Accordingly, "law may be taken for every purpose save that of strictly philosophical inquiry to be the sum of the rules administered by courts of justice." When, therefore, "a man is acquainted with the rules which the judges of the land will apply to any subject of dispute between citizens or to any act complained of as against the common weal, and is further acquainted with the manner in which the decisions of the common court can be enforced, he must be said to know the law to that extent." It is not necessary that he should "have opinions on the metaphysical analysis of laws or legal duty in general, or the place of the topic in hand in a scientific arrangement of legal ideas." 1 Poll. & Maitl. Introd.

As to philosophy of the law, see 1 Law Mag. & Rev. N. S. 577.

The difficulty of defining law is nowhere more clearly shown than in a late work on English and American law, in which the leading definitions are enumerated and criticised. It is truly said that the expression "our law," adopted by the author, does not mean moral law, although rules regulating civil conduct may "be imported by the tribunals when necessary for the purposes of the actual decision of causes, from the field of morality," when they become invested with the quality of law to the extent that they are recognized and enforced by the judges. The author referred to agrees with Mr. Justice Markby (Elem. of Law § 12) that no greater service was rendered by Austin than the definition of the boundaries of jurisprudence which separate it from ethics or morality. This separation was too much overlooked by continental jurists, with the result, particularly in Germany, of merging "the scientific treatment of law in the larger region of ethical inquiry." (Amos, Science of Law ch. i., ii., iii.) Nor does the law include the science of politics or government, which falls "within the domain of the statesman or legislator" (see also Pollock, Hist. Science of Politics). So law and legislation are not synonymous; the latter is the usual and effective instrument for changing and amending the former or making additions to it. Leaving behind him what the law is not and pausing before undertaking to define what it is, the author remarks, "It requires a bolder man than I to propound a definition of the law of the land which is both comprehensive and accurate." He criticises the definitions of Blackstone, Markby, and Austin (supra) as being defective in that the words "prescribed," "command," "addressed," "set," would require an elasticity not consonant with their general or appropriate use. These definitions are apt and accurate as describing the ordained or enacted law of a state, but would exclude a large body of what is, unquestionably, law. He adopts Holland's as sufficiently accurate for his purpose, "although with a conscious sense of its inadequacy." It answers the purpose because "law, as the lawyer has to deal with it, is concerned only with the legal rights . . . coercion by the state is the essential quality of the law, distinguishing it from morality or ethics." The conclusion is, "If you ask me to define law, I can, speaking as a lawyer, do no better than to adopt Professor Holland's definition already given. If you ask me to enumerate all the ultimate sources whence legal rights and duties originate and how these are evolved, I hide my diminished head and confess my inability to satisfactorily formulate an answer." Dillon, Laws and Jur. Lect. I.

This emphatic statement gathers added force when the thoroughness of the author's research, as shown by his notes, is considered. Among them is found a reference to the elaborate and learned examination of the subject by Professor Clark, who devotes sixteen chapters each to "The Definition and Origin of Law" and "The Form of Law" in his "Practical Jurisprudence: A Comment on Austin." See, as to definition of law, 10 L. Quart. Rev. 228.

This criticism of the most frequently quoted definitions leads naturally up to a reference to the clear and forcible views of Mr. James C. Carter in his address upon The Ideal and The Actual in the Law. Reference has already been made to another address of Mr. Carter in the title International Law (q. v.), to which subject much of what is here said is particularly applicable. Concluding his discussion of the sources of law generally, he thus states the result of his argument against the conception of Austin: "Law is not a body of commands imposed upon society from without, either by an individual sovereign or superior, or by a sovereign body constituted by representatives of society itself. It exists at all times as one of the elements of society springing directly from habit and custom. It is, therefore, the unconscious creation of society or a growth. For the most part it needs no interpreter or vindicator. The members of society are familiar with its customs and follow them, and in following custom they follow the law. It is only for the exceptional instances that judicial tribunals or legislative enactments are needed. In those cases where the customs are doubtful or conflicting, the expert is needed to ascertain or reconcile them, and hence the origin of the judicial establishment. . . . New customs, new modes of dealing, must be contrived to meet new exigencies, and society by the unconscious exercise of its ordinary forces proceeds to furnish itself with them. But this is a gradual and slow process attended with difficulty and loss. Another agency is needed to supplement and assist the work of society, and legislation springs into existence to supply the want." Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1890) 217.

It has been very truly said that much of the obscurity involving the origin of law and the mutual relations and proportions of customary, statute, and case law is caused by ambiguous uses of the term source. It is employed (1) to indicate whence we obtain our knowledge of the law; (2) the mode in which or the person through whom have been formulated rules which have acquired the force of law; (3) the authority which gives them that force. The last two uses are most frequently confused. Recognition by the state is the sole source of laws in the sense of that which impresses upon them their legal character. Their sources, in the sense of the causes to which they owe their existence as rules, are thus classified: (1) usage which becomes law at the moment at which it receives the imprimatur of the state; (2) religion, the influence of which cannot be left out of account in studying the development of any secular system of law; (3) adjudication, whatever theory be accepted as to its nature as a source of law; (4) scientific discussion; (5) equity, as particularly exemplified in the administrations of law by the Roman prætor and the English chancellor; (6) legislation, whether by the supreme power of the state or by subordinate authorities exercising a delegated function. Holland, Jur. Ch. 5.

When used in the concrete, the term law usually has reference to statutes or expressions of the legislative will. "The laws of a state," observes Mr. Justice Story, "are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws." 16 Pet. 18. Hence, he argues, "in the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws." In the Civil Code of Louisiana they are defined to be "the solemn expression of the legislative will." See 145 U. S. 454.

The constitution of a state is a law of the state, within the meaning of the United States constitution; 148 U. S. 137; but a municipal ordinance is not; 146 U. S. 258.

But, as has already been said, "law" in the abstract involves much more. Thus, a reference in a statute to "the cases provided by law" includes not only those cases provided by former statutes, but also those contemplated by the common or unwritten law; 18 N. Y. 115.

The law of the land, an expression used in Magna Charta and adopted in most of the earlier constitutions of the original states, means, however, something more than the legislative will; it requires the due and orderly proceeding of justice according to the established methods. See 8 Gray 329; 21 Cent. L. J. 147; DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

When the term law is used to denote enactments of the legislative power, it is frequently confined, especially by English writers, to permanent rules of civil conduct, as distinguished from other acts, such as a divorce act, an appropriation bill, an estates act. Report of Eng. Stat. L. Com., March, 1856.

In the United States, the organic law of a state is termed the constitution, and the term "laws" generally designates statutes or legislative enactments, in contradistinction to the constitution. See STATUTES.

Law, as distinguished from equity, denotes the doctrine and procedure of the common law of England and America, from which equity is a departure. As to where separate courts of law and equity are maintained, see EQUITY.

Law is also used in contradistinction to fact. Questions of law are, in general, for the decision of the court; while it is for the jury to pass upon questions of fact. See JURY; JUDICIAL POWER.

In respect to the ground of the authority of law, it is divided as natural law or the law of nature or of God, and positive law.

The classification and arrangement of the law is a subject as to which the lack of systematic discussion is in striking contrast to the measureless volume of treatises upon particular legal topics. The extent to which the latter overlap each other, and thus add to the labor of the patient investigator of any given title, has been frequently suggested, but there is to be found in legal literature little more than the merest recognition of the necessity of a remedy. As to Legal Chaos, see 2 Pol. Sci. Quart. 91.

The familiar analysis based on the arrangement of Blackstone's Commentaries remains after the lapse of more than a century without the recognition of a substitute which warrants the omission of its substance from the place heretofore assigned to it in this title, inadequate as it is.

Like the classification of Blackstone, of much suggestive interest, but inadequate for modern purposes, is Sir Matthew Hale's Analysis of the Law, a posthumous tract frequently bound with the History of the Common Law.

The subject of classification forms a large part of the able work on jurisprudence by Professor Holland, but it is there dealt with in sections, and without any attempt to present as a whole a comprehensive analysis or classification. The work does furnish most valuable material to be used in making one. Of value for similar use will be found Digby's Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property, appendix to Part I. with tables; papers by O. W. Holmes, Jr., 5 Am. L. Rev. 1; 7 id. 46; Hammond's Blackstone, notes on Book I. Ch. I., and Introduction to Sandars' Justinian. See also an article by Sir Frederick Pollock, "Divisions of Law," 8 Harv. L. Rev. 188, in which he contends that "it is not possible to make any clear-cut division of the subject-matter of legal rules." He discusses some of the more obvious general divisions of the law, but his view as to a complete classification is thus expressed: "Ambitious writers have sometimes gone to work as if it were possible to reduce the whole contents of a legal system to a sort of classified catalogue where there would be no repetition or cross references, and the classification would explain itself. Ambition on that scale is destined to disappointment by the nature of things." The subject was brought to the attention of the American Bar Association in 1888 by a letter of Professor Henry T. Terry, which is printed in the annual report of 1889, p. 327. A committee was appointed, and made a report in 1891, which discussed with much ability the importance of the subject and the difficulty of its practical accomplishment. The conclusion reached was that a classification could only be successfully attempted with respect to one legal system, and that it must be made in harmony with the spirit of the law as it grows and in the light of legal history. The objects are, first, arrangement to enable the mind to comprehend the law as a whole; second, the cataloguing of topics, to the end that authorities may be collected under a well recognized title of each principal topic of the law. The two methods are not consistent, one being required for the jurist and the scholar and the other for the judge and the lawyer. Both, therefore, are needed, but the last is of more general importance. The committee reported a tentative classification under the first head only, leaving the other for a further report, which has not yet been made. Rept. Am. Bar Assn. (1891) 379–402. In 1896, the subject was revived, and a brief report expressed the belief that it was possible "to determine more definitely the sphere of each of the ordinary topics of the law and determine where each subject may be looked for." Rept. Am. Bar Assn. (1896) 405. Nothing further has been done by the committee, which has been continued with the promise of further attention to the subject. Report (1897) 53.

For more elaborate discussions of the subject, see, generally, Austin Lect. Jur. outline of the course; Amos, Science of Jurisprudence; Terry, Anglo-American Law, Ch. XVI.; 24 Am. L. Rev. 211, 874, 1027; 25 id. 317, 322.

Arbitrary law. A law or provision of law so far removed from consideration of abstract justice that it is necessarily founded on the mere will of the law-making power, so that it is rather a rule established than a principle declared. The principle that an infant shall not be bound by his contract is not arbitrary; but the rule that the limit of infancy shall be twenty-one years, not twenty nor twenty-two, is arbitrary.

The term is also sometimes used to signify an unreasonable law,—one that is in violation of justice.

Irrevocable laws. All laws which have not in their nature or in their language some limit or termination provided are, in theory, perpetual: but the perpetuity is liable to be defeated by subsequent abrogation. It has sometimes been attempted to secure an absolute perpetuity by an express provision forbidding any abrogation. But it may well be questioned whether one generation has power to bind their posterity by an irrevocable law. See this subject discussed by Bentham, Works, vol. 2, 402–407; and see Dwarris, Stat. 479.

Municipal law is a system of law proper to any single state, nation, or community. See MUNICIPAL LAW.

A penal law is one which inflicts a penalty for its violation.

Positive law is the system naturally established by a community, in distinction from natural law. See POSITIVE LAW.

Private law is a term used to indicate a statute which relates to private matters which do not concern the public at large.

A prospective law or statute is one which applies only to cases arising after its enactment, and does not affect that which is already past.

A public law is one which affects the public, either generally or in some classes.

A retrospective law or statute is one that turns backward to alter that which is past or to affect men in relation to their conduct before its enactment. These are also called retroactive laws. In general, whenever a retroactive statute would take away vested rights or impair the obligation of contracts, it is in so far void, because opposed to the constitution of the United States; 3 Dall. 391. But laws which only vary the remedies, or merely cure a defect in proceedings otherwise fair, are valid; 10 S. & R. 102, 103; 15 id. 73; 2 Pet. 380, 627; 8 id. 88; 11 id. 420. See RETROSPECTIVE.

As used in the 5th amendment to the constitution, it embraces all legal and equitable rules defining human rights and duties, and providing for their enforcement; not only as between man and man, but also between the state and its citizens; 30 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 760.

LAW AGENTS. In Scotch Law. Solicitors whose qualifications are provided for by 36 and 37 Vict. and several acts of sederunt.

A law agent has a right to retain his client's papers (not being part of a process), which have come lawfully into his possession in the course of his employment, in security of his business account, though incurred before the possession. This is the only case in which writs may be held in pledge as things distinct from the property to which they relate. It gives no active right. The purpose of the possession is immaterial, unless there be an express obligation to surrender the writs when that purpose has been accomplished. They are no security for payment of cash advances or salary or commissions. If the client becomes bankrupt, the agent must surrender the documents to the trustee or liquidator under reservation of his lien. The right gives a preference against all and sundry—the client, his successors, universal and singular, his trustee in bankruptcy, or an inhibitor, but not as against one who has a better title to the writs than the client. A law agent is subject like a counsel to certain unwritten rules of the legal profession. One of these is that in the conduct of a cause he shall follow the directions of counsel, with the resulting benefit of escaping personal liability.

The courts are so jealous of the purity of this important and powerful class of men that they will direct a return of a gift made by a client in excess of the sums fixed for professional charges; and will demand proof of the utmost independence and freedom from undue influence before allowing a testator's legacy to his solicitor to pass. Ersk. Prin. pp. 272, 283, 576.

LAW AND ORDER ASSOCIATIONS. Societies formed for the preservation of the public health and morals and the prosecution of those who offend against them.

Knowledge and approval of the members of such a league that one of its officers had retained counsel to prosecute violations of the law, will not render them personally liable for his services, if they believed the expenses incurred would be paid from a fund contributed for that purpose and placed at the disposal of the officers; 133 N. Y. 89.

LAW BORGH. In Old Scotch Law. A pledge or surety for appearance.

LAW-BURROWS. In Scotch Law. Security for the peaceful behavior of a party; security to keep the peace. This process was much resorted to by the government of Charles II. for political purposes.

The action for contravention of law-burrows is penal. It proceeds on a decree of law-burrows (from borgh, a cautioner). The decree is obtained in the sheriff's or justice of the peace court, after service of a petition setting forth dread of bodily harm, and after proof taken—in which parties are competent witnesses. Failing caution, the decree orders imprisonment for not more than six months or fourteen days, according as the case is brought before a sheriff or a justice. The complainer does not require to aliment the defender in prison. Instead of caution being ordered, the defender may be directed, on pain of imprisonment, to give his own bond. So that the old rules are annulled whereby letters of law-burrows (not now issued) did not require the previous citation of the party complained upon, on the ground that the caution which the law required was only for doing what was every man's duty; and that before the letters were executed against him the complainer had to make oath that he dreaded bodily harm from him. These proceedings can only be quashed by suspension or by suspension and liberation on proof of malice and want of probable cause. Ersk. Prin. p. 492.

LAW CHARGES. Costs incurred in court in the prosecution of a suit, to be paid by the party cast. 17 La. 206; 11 Rob. La. 28. See 3 Mart. La. 282.

LAW COURT OF APPEALS. In American Law. An appellate tribunal, formerly existing in the state of South Carolina, for hearing appeals from the courts of law.

LAW DAY. The day fixed in a mortgage or defeasible deed for the payment of the debt secured. 24 Ala. N. S. 149; 10 Conn. 280; 21 N. Y. 345. This does not occur now until foreclosure, and the use of the term is confusing; 21 N. Y. 348.

In Old English Law. A leet or sheriff's tourne. Termes de la Ley. Law day or lage day denoted a day of open court; especially the more solemn courts of a county or hundred. The court-leet, or view of frankpledge.

LAW FRENCH. See LANGUAGE.

LAW LATIN. See LANGUAGE.

LAW LIBRARY. A collection of books, manuscripts, pamphlets, etc., relating to legal subjects. Under a bequest of "Law Library and books of antiquity," Dugdale's Monasticon, Domesday Book, and State Trials were held to pass. 4 L. J. O. S. Ch. 74.

LAW LIST. In English Law. An annual publication of a quasi-official character, comprising various statistics of interest in connection with the legal profession. The present law list is prima facie evidence that the persons therein named as solicitors or certified conveyancers are such. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127.

LAW LORDS. In English Law. Peers who have held high judicial office, or have been distinguished in the legal profession. Moz. & W.

LAW MARTIAL. See MILITARY LAW.

LAW MERCHANT. The general body of commercial usages in matters relative to commerce. Blackstone calls it the custom of merchants, and ranks it under the head of the particular customs of England, which go to make up the great body of the common law. 1 Bla. Com. 75. Since, however, its character is not local, nor its obligation confined to a particular district, it cannot with propriety be considered as a custom in the technical sense; 1 Steph. Com. 54. It is a system of law which does not rest exclusively on the positive institutions and local customs of any particular country, but consists of certain principles of equity and usages of trade which general convenience and a common sense of justice have established, to regulate the dealings of merchants and mariners in all the commercial countries of the civilized world. 3 Kent 2.

These usages, being general and extensive, partake of the character of rules and principles of law, not of matters of fact, as do usages which are local or special. They constitute a part of the general law of the land, and, being a part of that law, their existence cannot be proved by witnesses, but the judges are bound to take notice of them ex officio; Winch 24; and this application is not confined to merchants, but extends to all persons concerned in any mercantile transaction. See Beawes, Lex Mercatoria Rediviva; Caines, Lex Mercatoria Americana; Comyns, Dig. Merchant (D); Chitty, Com. LAW OF ARMS. Ordinances which regulated proclamations of war, leagues, treaties, etc. Cowel.

LAW OF CITATIONS. In the Civil Law. The most important of the laws of citation were those enacted by Valentinian III. A. D. 426, which enacted that the writings of the jurists Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Gaius, and Modestinus, as well as of all those who were cited by these writers (the limits of classic literature being thus determined), should possess quasi-statutory force so that their opinions should be binding on the judge. If the opinions differed on the same question, that opinion should prevail which was supported by the largest number of the jurists; if the numbers were equal, Papinian's opinion should prevail, or, if Papinian had expressed no opinion on the subject, the judge was to exercise his discretion. Valentinian the Third's law of citations marks the completion, for the time being, of that development which had commenced with the responsa of the old pontifices and the jus respondendi of Augustus. See Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 84.

LAW OF MARQUE. See LETTER OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL.

LAW OF NATIONS. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

LAW OF NATURE. That law which God, the sovereign of the universe, has prescribed to all men, not by any formal promulgation, but by the internal dictate of reason alone. It is discovered by a just consideration of the agreeableness or disagreeableness of human actions to the nature of man; and it comprehends all the duties which we owe either to the Supreme Being, to ourselves, or to our neighbors: as, reverence to God, self-defence, temperance, honor to our parents, benevolence to all, a strict adherence to our engagements, gratitude, and the like; Erskine, Pr. Sc. Law 1. 1. 1. See Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 2, p. 2; Cicero, de Leg. lib. 1.

The divine will, or the dictate of right reason, showing the moral deformity or moral necessity there is in any act, according to its suitableness or unsuitableness to a reasonable nature. Sometimes used of the law of human reason, in contradistinction to the revealed law, and sometimes of both, in contradistinction to positive law.

They are independent of any artificial connections, and differ from mere presumptions of law in this essential respect, that the latter depend on and are a branch of the particular system of jurisprudence to which they belong; but mere natural presumptions are derived wholly by means of the common experience of mankind, without the aid or control of any particular rule of law, but simply from the course of nature and the habits of society. These presumptions fall within the exclusive province of the jury, who are to pass upon the facts. 3 Bouv. Inst. n. 3064; Greenl. Ev., 15th ed. § 44.

The primitive laws of nature may be reduced to six, namely: comparative sagacity, or reason; self-love; the attraction of the sexes to each other; the tenderness of parents towards their children; the religious sentiment; sociability.

When man is properly organized, he is able to distinguish moral good from moral evil; and the study of man proves that man is not only an intelligent but a free being, and he is, therefore, responsible for his actions. The judgment we form of our good actions produces happiness; on the contrary, the judgment we form of our bad actions produces unhappiness.

Every animated being is impelled by nature to his own preservation, to defend his life and body from injuries, to shun what may be hurtful, and to provide all things requisite to his existence. Hence the duty to watch over his own preservation. Suicide and duelling are, therefore, contrary to this law; and a man cannot mutilate himself, nor renounce his liberty.

The attraction of the sexes has been provided for the preservation of the human race; and this law condemns celibacy. The end of mariage proves that polygamy and polyandry are contrary to the law of nature. Hence it follows that the husband and wife have a mutual and exclusive right over each other.

Man from his birth is wholly unable to provide for the least of his necessities; but the love of his parents supplies for this weakness. This is one of the most powerful laws of nature. The principal duties it imposes on the parents are to bestow on the child all the care its weakness requires, to provide for its necessary food and clothing, to instruct it, to provide for its wants, and to use coercive means for its good, when requisite.

The religious sentiment which leads us naturally towards the Supreme Being is one of the attributes which belong to humanity alone; and its importance gives it the rank of the moral law of nature. From this sentiment arise all the sects and different forms of worship among men.

The need which man feels to live in society is one of the primitive laws of nature whence flow our duties and rights; and the existence of society depends upon the condition that the rights of all shall be respected. On this law are based the assistance, succors, and good offices which men owe to each other, they being unable to provide each every thing for himself. See JUS NATURALE; INTERNATIONAL LAW.

LAW OF THE FLAG. See FLAG.

LAW OF THE LAND. The general law; a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty and property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. 4 Wheat. 518; 49 Fed. Rep. 833. LAW STUDENT. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

LAW TERMS. Those periods of the year during which the law courts sit in banc or in full court. See TERM.

LAWFUL. Legal. That which is not contrary to law. That which is sanctioned or permitted by law. That which is in accordance with law. The terms "lawful," "unlawful," and "illegal" are used with reference to that which is in its substance sanctioned or prohibited by the law. The term "legal" is occasionally used with reference to matter of form alone: thus, an oral agreement to convey land, though void by law, is not properly to be said to be unlawful, because there is no violation of law in making or in performing such an agreement; but it is said to be not legal, or not in lawful form, because the law will not enforce it, for want of that written evidence required in such cases.

LAWFUL AGE. Majority. This usually means twenty-one years, but in some of the states, for certain purposes, a woman attains lawful age at eighteen. 4 Md. Ch. 228.

LAWFUL AUTHORITIES. The expression "lawful authorities," used in our treaty with Spain, refers to persons who exercised the power of making grants by authority of the crown. 9 Pet. 711.

LAWFUL CAUSE. Under a statute forbidding a priest to deny the communion without lawful cause, that the person was an open and notorious evil liver was held such a cause. 45 L. J. P. C. 1; 1 P. D. 80.

Whether a coroner's absence is from any lawful or reasonable cause is a question for the judge. Such a cause was his taking a vacation, even though part of it was spent in shooting; 42 L. J. M. C. 41; L. R. 2 C. C. R. 15.

LAWFUL DISCHARGE. Such a discharge in insolvency as exonerates the debtor from his debts. 12 Wheat. 370.

LAWFUL GOODS. Whatever is not prohibited to be exported by the positive law of the country, even though it be contraband of war, for a neutral has a right to carry such goods at his own risk. 1 Johns. Cas. 1; 2 id. 77; id. 120.

LE ROI S'AVISERA, or LA REINE S'AVISERA. The king will consider of it. This phrase is used by the English monarch when he gives his dissent to an act passed by the lords and commons. This power was last exercised in the year 1707, by Queen Anne ; May, P. L. ch. 18. The same formula was used by the king of the French for the same purpose. 1 Toullier, n. 52. See VETO.

LE ROI LE VEUT. The king assents. This is the formula used in England, and formerly in France, when the king approved of a bill passed by the legislature. 1 Toullier, n. 52.

LEADING CASE. A case decided by a court of last resort, which decides some particular point in question, and to which reference is constantly or frequently made, for the purpose of determining the law in similar questions.

Many elements go to the constitution of a case as a leading case : among which are, the priority of the case, the character of the court, the amount of consideration given to the question, the freedom from collateral matters or questions. The term is applied to cases as leading either in a particular state or at common law. A very convenient means of digesting the law upon any subject is found to be the selection of a leading case upon the subject, and an arrangement of authorities illustrating the questions decided. See B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 2 v.; Sm. Lead. Cas.; Sm. L. Cas. Comm. L.; Hare & W. Sel. Dec. 2 v.; Tudor, Cas. R. P. 1 v.; Tudor, L. Cas. Merc. L. 1 v.; Sedgwick, Damages; Bigelow, L. C. LEADING COUNSEL. That one of two or more counsel employed on the same side in a cause who has the principal management of the cause. Sometimes called the leader. So called as distinguished from the other, who is called the junior counsel.

LEADING QUESTION. In Practice. A question which puts into the witness' mouth the words to be echoed back, or plainly suggests the answer which the party wishes to get from him. 7 S. & R. 171; 4 Wend. 247. In that case the examiner is said to lead him to the answer. It is not always easy to determine what is or is not a leading question.

Such questions cannot, in general, be put to a witness in his examination in chief; 3 Binn. 130; 1 Phill. Ev. 221; 1 Stark. Ev. 123; unless he is a hostile witness; 43 Ill. App. 180. But, in an examination in chief, questions may be put to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of inquiry; and they are allowed when it appears that the witness wishes to conceal the truth or to favor the opposite party, or where from the nature of the case the mind of the witness cannot be directed to the subject of inquiry without a particular specification of such subject; 1 Campb. 43; 1 Stark. 100; 49 Ill. App. 357; 58 Mo. App. 383. The permitting of such questions is within the discretion of the trial court; 35 Neb. 351; 97 Ala. 681; 75 Hun 17; 85 Wis. 615; 91 Ga. 319; 154 U. S. 134; 52 Mo. App. 102. Where the answers of a witness have taken by surprise the party calling him, the court may permit such party to put leading questions to the witness; 154 U. S. 134.

In cross-examinations, the examiner has generally the right to put leading questions; 1 Stark. Ev. 132; Whart. Ev. § 501; but not perhaps when the witness has a bias in his favor; Best, Ev. 805. See WITNESS.

As the allowance of leading questions to a witness is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, the appellate court will reverse for such cause only where it appears that this discretion has been abused; 91 Mich. 611; 189 Ill. 644.

While it cannot be safely said that in no case can a court of errors take notice of an exception of the trial court in permitting leading questions, such conduct must appear to be a plain case of the abuse of discretion; 158 U. S. 271.

LEAGUE. A measure of length, which consists of three geographical miles. The jurisdiction of the United States extends into the sea a marine league. See Acts of Congress of June 5, 1794, 1 Story, Laws 352; and April 20, 1818, 3 Story, Laws 1694; 1 Wait, State Papers 195.

A conspiracy to do an unlawful act. The term is but little used.

An agreement or treaty between states. Leagues between states are of several kinds: First, leagues offensive and defensive, by which two or more nations agree not only to defend each other, but to carry on war against their common enemies. Second, defensive, but not offensive, obliging each to defend the other against any foreign invasion. Third, leagues of simple amity, by which one contracts not to invade, injure, or offend the other: this usually includes the liberty of mutual commerce and trade, and the safeguard of merchants and traders in each other's domain. Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 4). See CONFEDERACY; CONSPIRACY; PEACE; TRUCE; WAR.

LEAKAGE. The waste which has taken place in liquids, by their escaping out of the casks or vessels in which they were kept. See 107 Mass. 140, 145.

By the act of March 2, 1799, s. 59, it is provided that there be an allowance of two per cent. for leakage on the quantity which shall appear by the gauge to be contained in any cask of liquors subject to duty by the gallon, and ten per cent. on all beer, ale, and porter in bottles, and five per cent. on all other liquors in bottles, to be deducted from the invoice quantity, in lieu of breakage; or it shall be lawful to compute the duties on the actual quantity, to be ascertained by tale, at the option of the importer, to be made at the time of entry.

Where in a bill of lading a clause is inserted exempting the owner of the ship from loss caused by "rust, leakage, or breakage," he will be liable if damage from these causes be occasioned by the negligence of himself or his servants in stowing; L. R. 2 A. & E. 375; 38 L. J. Adm. 63; 37 L. J. C. P. 3; L. R. 3 C. P. 14; 52 L. J. Q. B. 230; 10 Q. B. D. 521. The primary and natural meaning of the stipulation is that the shipowner will not be answerable if the thing comprised in the bill of lading shall itself rust, leak, or break, and therefore it furnishes him no protection against his liability to compensate for consequential damage happening to that thing by reason of some other thing's rusting, leaking, or breaking; 46 L. J. C. P. 402; 2 C. P. D. 432.

LEAL. Loyal; that which belongs to the law.

LEAP YEAR. See BISSEXTILE.

LEARNING. Doctrine. 1 Leon. 77.

LEASE. A species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements either for life or for a certain period of time, or during the pleasure of the parties.

A conveyance by way of demise, always for a less term than the party conveying has in the premises. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 16; 47 Minn. 189.

One of its essential properties is, that its duration must be for a shorter period than the duration of the interest of the lessor in the land; for if he disposes of his entire interest it becomes an assignment, and is not a lease. In other words, the granting of a lease always supposes that the grantor reserves to himself a reversion in the leased premises.

And a distinction is to be noted between a lease and a mere agreement for a lease. The whole question, however, resolves itself into one of construction, and an instrument is to be considered either a lease or an agreement for a lease, according to what appears to be the intention of the parties; 26 Pick. 401; 16 Barb. 621; 9 Ad. & E. 644; 81 Me. 56; 75 N. C. 154; though, generally, if there are apt words of demise followed by possession, the instrument will be held a lease; 8 N. Y. 44; 3 C. & P. 441; 102 Mass. 392; 4 Ad. & E. 225; otherwise, if a fuller lease is to be prepared and executed before the demise is to take effect and possession to be given; 21 Vt. 172; 24 Wend. 201; 3 Stor. 325; 4 Conn. 238; 75 Ill. 44; L. R. 2 Ex. Div. 355; 5 B. & C. 41.

The party who leases is called the lessor, he to whom the lease is made the lessee, and the compensation or consideration of the lease is the rent. The words lease and demise are frequently used to signify the estate or interest conveyed; but they properly apply to the instrument of conveyance. When a lessee parts with the estate granted to him, reserving any portion thereof, however small, he makes an underlease; Tayl. L. & T. § 16; 5 Den. 454; 36 N. Y. 569; 12 Iowa 319; 16 Johns. 159.

The estate created by a lease, when for years, is called a term (terminus), because its duration is limited and determined,—its commencement as well as its termination being ascertained by an express agreement of the parties. And this phrase signifies not only the limitation of time or period granted for the occupation of the premises, but includes also the estate or interest in the land that passes during such period. A term, however, is perfected only by the entry of the lessee; for previous to this the estate remains in the lessor, the lessee having a mere right to enter, which right is called an interesse termini; 1 Washb. R. P. 292, 297; 5 Co. 123 b; Co. Litt. 46 b; 1 B. & Ald. 593.

Any thing corporeal or incorporeal lying in livery or in grant may be the subject-matter of a lease; and therefore not only lands and houses, but commons, ways, fisheries, franchises, estovers, annuities, rent charges, and all other incorporeal hereditaments, are included in the common-law rule; Shepp. Touchst. 268; 110 Mass. 175; 24 Mich. 279; 33 N. Y. 251; 66 Me. 229; 17 C. E. Green 130; 27 Conn. 164. Rent cannot properly be said ever to issue out of chattels; 3 H. & M. 470; 35 Barb. 295; 15 Ohio, N. S. 186; 5 Rep. 16; but goods, chattels, or live stock upon or about real property may be leased with it and a rent contracted for, to issue from the whole, upon which an action for rent in arrear may be maintained as upon such lease; Co. Litt. 57 a; 31 Pa. 20; 24 Wend. 76; 9 Paige 310.

Leases are made either by parol or by deed. The former mode embraces all cases where the parties agree either orally or by a writing not under seal. The technical words generally made use of in the written instrument are, "demise, grant, and to farm let;" but no particular form of expression is required in any case to create an immediate demise; 9 Ad. & E. 650; 15 Wend. 379; 111 Mass. 30; 71 Ill. 317; 7 Blackf. 403; 12 Me. 135; 6 Watts 362; 1 Den. 602; Will. R. P. 327; 83 Ind. 536; see 72 Pa. 286; 66 Mo. 430. An ordinary receipt expressing the nature and terms of the tenancy may be considered a lease; 111 Mass. 30; 78 Ill. 317. Any permissive holding is, in fact, sufficient for the purpose, and it may be contained in any written memorandum by which it appears to have been the intention of one of the parties voluntarily to dispossess himself of the premises for any given period, and of the other to assume the possession for the same period; Tayl. L. & T. § 26; 1 Washb. R. P. 300.

By the English statute of frauds of 29 Car. II. c. 3, §§ 1, 2, 3, it is declared that "all leases, estates, or terms of years, or any uncertain interest in lands, created by livery only, or by parol, and not put in writing and signed by the party, should have the force and effect of leases or estates at will only, except leases not exceeding the term of three years, whereupon the rent reserved during the term shall amount to two third parts of the full improved value of the thing demised." "And that no lease or estate, either of freehold or term of years, should be assigned, granted, or surrendered unless in writing." The principles of this statute have been adopted, with some modifications, in nearly all the states of the Union. 4 Kent 95; 1 Hill, Abr. 130. For a summary of the provisions of the statutes in the various states, see Browne, Frauds, App.; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 4143, 1471; and for the provisions as to a particular state, reference should be made to its statutes. See STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

It has been held that a lease to take effect in futuro is not within the statute of frauds; 5 N. Y. 463; 64 id. 518; 52 Mich. 462; contra, 19 Ill. 576; 78 id. 125; 8 Ore. 251; and see note on these authorities, 23 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 387. A tenancy from year to year is not a lease or a "term" exceeding one year within the statute; 60 Wis. 1.

As to the surrender or assignment of parol leases for less than three years, it is said that with the exception of Connecticut, perhaps, Pennsylvania stands alone in denying the English rule which holds such parol assignments invalid: Browne, Frauds § 46. See also 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 641, where both the English and Pennsylvania cases are collected.

A lease signed by an agent who had no written authority to do so, and also executed by the lessee, was held void within the statute of frauds; 2 Cal. 603; and such a lease cannot be effective as evidence until the agency is shown by evidence of equal dignity; 19 La. Ann. 158.

A written agreement is generally sufficient to create a term of years. But in England, by statute, all leases that are required to be in writing must also be under seal; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. See 77 Cal. 286. In Massachusetts and Maryland, leases for more than seven years must be by deed. So in Virginia, of those for more than five, and in Delaware, Rhode Island, and Vermont, of those for more than one. A letting by parol for a sum certain per month, without anything being said about a year, constitutes a lease from month to month, and not a lease from year to year; 100 Pa. 206. A lease is valid and binding on the lessee, who has signed the same and occupied the premises under it, though it is not signed by the lessor; 71 Hun 536.

All persons seized of lands or tenements may grant leases of them, unless they happen to be under some legal disability: as, of unsound mind, immature age, or the like; 8 C. & P. 679. See as to infants, 10 Pet. 65; 7 Cow. 179; 11 Johns. 539; 3 Mod. 310. Contracts by them are voidable only and not void, and may be affirmed or disaffirmed by them on attaining their majority; 17 Wend. 119; 29 Vt. 465; 11 Johns. 539; 6 Conn. 494. As to persons of unsound mind, see 3 Camp. 126; 51 N. Y. 384; 11 Pick. 304; 8 C. & P. 679; intoxicated persons, 2 Paige 30; 18 Ves. 16; 4 Harring. 285; married women, Sm. L. & T. 48; 1 Tayl. L. & T. § 101. The execution of a lease by an authorized agent of a corporation is valid and effectual to create a term without the use of the corporate seal; 43 N. J. L. 329; 87 Ind. 505. A lease made by one railroad corporation to another, neither of which is expressly authorized by law to enter into the lease, is ultra vires and void; 131 U. S. 371; 130 id. 1. See PARTIES; CONTRACTS. But it is essential to the validity of a lease that the lessor has, at the time he undertakes to make the grant, possession of the premises; otherwise, whatever he does will amount to nothing more than the assignment of a chose in action; Cro. Car. 109; Shep. Touchst. 269. But possession is always presumed to follow the title unless there is a clearly marked adverse possession.

And although a lease may not be sufficient to authorize a lessee to demand possession for the want of a possessory title in his lessor, it will still operate by way of estoppel, and enure to his benefit if the lessor afterwards comes into possession of the land before the expiration of the lease; Bacon, Abr. Leases (I 4); 61 N. Y. 6; 7 M. & G. 701; 3 Pick. 52: 18 How. 82; 6 Watts 60; 2 Hill N. Y. 554; 16 Johns. 110, 201; 5 Ark. 693. See 8 Wash. 603.

The power to lease will, of course, depend upon the extent of the lessor's estate in the premises; and if he has but an estate for life, his lease can only be coextensive therewith; when for a term of years, its commencement as well as its termination must be ascertained, for certainty in these respects is of the essence of a term of years. But although this term may not at first appear to be certain, it may be rendered so by reference to some fact or event; id certum est quod certum reddi potest. Thus, if a lease be made to a man for so many years as he has in the manor of Dale, and he happens to have a term of two years in that manor, the lease will be good for that period; Co. Litt. 45 b; 1 M. & W. 533; 3 Co. 346; 97 Mass. 206; 102 id. 93; 10 R. I. 355.

Lord Coke states that, originally, express terms could not endure beyond an ordinary generation of forty years, lest men might be disinherited; but the doctrine had become antiquated even in his day, and at the present time there is no limitation to a term of years except in the state of New York, where land cannot be leased for agricultural purposes for a longer period than twelve years; see Co. Litt 45 b, 46 a; 13 Ohio 334; 1 Washb. R. P. 310; 41 N. Y. 480; 62 N. Y. 524.

In all leases of uncertain duration, or if no time has been agreed upon for the continuation of the term, or if after the expiration of a term the tenant continues to hold over, without any effort on the part of the landlord to remove him, the tenancy is at the will of either party. And it remains at will until after the payment and receipt of rent on account of a new tenancy, or until the parties concur in some other act which recognizes the existence of a tenancy, from which event it becomes a tenancy from year to year, invested with the qualities and incidents of the original tenancy. After this, neither party has a right to terminate it before the expiration of the current year upon which they have entered, nor then without having first given due notice to the other party of his intention to do so. See 126 Pa. 390; 85 Ky. 260; 62 Mich. 141. The length of this notice is regulated by the statutes of the different states; 11 Wend. 616; 4 Ired. 294; 3 Zabr

111. Where a person enters in possession under a verbal lease for one month and continues in possession thereafter, paying rent monthly, in contemplation of law a new letting commences with each monthly term; 37 Ill. App. 160. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

When leases provide for the renewal of the term, such renewal is a mere continuance of the old term, for the preservation and protection of rights acquired therein; 49 N. J. Eq. 619. See 61 Hun 521. A lease for a term exceeding the period prescribed by the statute against perpetuities is not void on that account, as it does not suspend the power of alienation; 81 Hun 566.

The formal parts of a lease by deed are: first, the date, which will fix the time for its commencement, unless some other period is specified in the instrument itself for that purpose; but if there is no date, or an impossible one, the time will be considered as having commenced from the delivery of the deed; 2 Johns. 230; 4 B. & C. 908; 17 Wend. 103; 12 N. H. 52. Second, the names of the parties, with respect to which the law knows but one Christian name; and therefore the middle letter of the name of either party is immaterial, and a person may always show he is as well known by one name as another; 14 Pet. 322; 36 Ill. 362; 55 N. Y. 380. The entire omission of the lessee's name from a lease will render the instrument simply void; 8 Md. 118; 24 N. Y. 336; 6 Allen 305; 19 Iowa 290; 2 Wall. 24. See 25 Hun 136; 116 Mass. 155; 33 Ind. 94; 40 Conn. 522. Third, recitals of title or other circumstances of the case. Fourth, some consideration must appear, although it need not be what is technically called rent, or a periodical render of compensation for the use of the premises: but it may be a sum in gross, or the natural affection which one party has for the other. It may also consist of grain, animals, or the personal services of the lessee; 3 Hill N. Y. 345; 1 Spears 408; Tayl. L. & T. § 152; 29 Barb. 171: or a promise to pay rent; 107 Ill. 33; and when the lease does not stipulate for the cessation of rent upon the destruction of a building by fire, or that the lessor shall repair, a tenant is not relieved from the payment of rent by a partial destruction of the building; 85 Ala. 99. See LANDLORD AND TENANT. Fifth, the operative words of the lease are usually "demise, grant, lease, and to farm let;" 50 N. Y. 414; 53 N. H. 518; 27 Md. 173. Sixth, the description of the premises need not specify all the particulars of the subject-matter of the demise, for the accessories will follow the principal thing named: thus, the garden is parcel of a dwelling-house, and the general description of a farm includes all the houses and lands appertaining to the farm; 9 Conn. 374; 11 C. E. Green 82; 4 Rawle 330; 9 Cow. 747; 72 Mich. 438; 41 N. H. 337; and a building includes the land on which it stands; 37 Minn. 4. But whether certain premises are parcel of the demise or not is always matter of evidence; 14 Barb. 434; 3 B. & C. 870; 14 B. Mon. 8. Seventh, the rights and liabilities of the respective parties are regulated by law in the absence of any particular agreement in respect thereto; but express covenants are usually inserted in a lease, for the purpose of limiting or otherwise defining their rights and duties in relation to repairs, taxes, insurance renewals, residence on the premises, modes of cultivation, fixtures, and the like. Certain covenants are also implied in law from the use of certain technical terms in leases. The intention of the parties to a lease must be gathered from the instrument taken as a whole; 83 Va. 319.

In every well-drawn lease, provision is made for a forfeiture of the term in case the tenant refuses to pay rent, commits waste, or is guilty of a breach of the covenant to repair, insure, reside upon the premises, or the like. This clause enables the lessor or his assigns to re-enter in any such event upon the demised premises and eject the tenant, leaving both parties in the same condition as if the lease were a nullity; but in the absence of a proviso for re-entry the lessor would possess no such power, the mere breach of a covenant enabling him to sue for damages only; 3 Wils. 127; 2 Cow. 591; 2 Overton 233; 1 Dutch. 285; 15 Cal. 233. The forfeiture will generally be enforced by the courts, except where the landlord's damages are a mere matter of computation and can be readily compensated by money; 7 Johns. 235; 4 Munf. 332; 2 Price 200; 44 Vt. 285; 9 Hare 688; 5 R. I. 144; 60 Pa. 131; 20 Vt. 415; 31 Conn. 468; 40 N. H. 434. One condition essential to the forfeiture of a lease by the lessor is a demand of the rent; 140 U. S. 25; 35 Neb. 766. But in case of a forfeiture for the non-payment of rent, the proviso is allowed to operate simply as a security for rent, and the tenant will be relieved from its effects at any time by paying the landlord or bringing into court the amount of all arrears of rent, with interest and costs. The right to terminate the lease for the non-payment of rent will not give the lessee any right to avoid the lease or his liability for agreed rent; 150 U. S. 665; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 701.

Where under a provision in a lease that if the lessee keeps all its conditions he may purchase the land, the acceptance of the landlord of the rent after it is due, without objection, waives a breach of the condition as to the time of its payment; 30 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 686.

A lease may be surrendered by any agreement between the parties that the term shall be terminated, which is irrevocably acted upon by both; 34 Neb. 455; but a mere agreement, unless accompanied by the act, is inoperative; 41 Ill. App. 223.

A lease may also be terminated before the prescribed period if the premises are required to be taken for public uses or improvements, or the subject-matter of demise wholly perishes or is turned into a house of ill-fame; 29 Barb. 116; 119 Mass. 28; 46 N. Y. 297; 38 Mo. 143; 58 Pa. 271; 118 Mass. 125; 38 Cal. 259; 5 Ohio 303. A lessor who knows that the premises are to be used for gambling cannot recover rent; 62 Ill. App. 134. The same result will follow when the tenant purchases the fee, or the fee descends to him as heir at law; for in either case the lease is merged in the inheritance; since there would be a manifest inconsistency in allowing the same person to hold two distinct estates immediately expectant on each other, while one of them includes the time of both, thus uniting the two opposite characters of landlord and tenant; 2 C. & P. 347; 26 Ill. 19; 6 Johns. Ch. 417; 13 Pa. 16; Tayl. L. & T. § 502. A lease of land is not terminated by the death of the lessee, but an action will lie against his administrator for rent during the remainder of the term; 68 Miss. 664.

A provision in a lease that the lessee may buy the land "at the option of the parties" means that the lessee may buy at his own option; 30 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 686.

The general rule that a deed cannot be varied by parol applies to leases, and it has been enforced with respect to their date; 3 Scott, N. R. 48; the amount of the rent; 1 Man. & Gr. 589; the contemporaneous grant of rights and privileges inconsistent with the terms of the lease; 19 Cal. 354; 17 La. Ann. 153; time of payment of rent; 7 Blackf. 308; that the lessee agreed to pay taxes; 6 Ves. Jr. 334, n.; or that the lessor, at the time of the lease, agreed to repair; 2 E. D. Sm. 248; though a subsequent agreement for a consideration may be proved; 5 Sandf. 542; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1026; but an allegation that the lessee was induced to occupy the premises by the lessor's promise to put in fixtures, made after the execution of the lease, does not show such consideration; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 426. See as to this rule, generally, and the exceptions to it, PAROL EVIDENCE; CONTRACT; DEED. It was held that the question whether there had been a modification, as between lessor and lessee, was for the jury unless it was admitted by the pleadings; 57 Mo. App. 454.

An assignment of a lease does not become complete and valid until there is consent by the proposed assignee: 7 Mont. 320.

An agreement not to assign without the written consent of the lessor does not bind the lessee where he signs the lease, and at the request of the lessor assigns it to a third person, to whom it is never, in fact, delivered; 114 Cal. 511.

There is no implied warranty on the part of a landlord that a building is adapted for the purposes for which it is leased; 70 Tex. 727; 182 N. Y. 306; 156 Mass. 348.

A corporation authorized to hold real estate may lease its real estate, to be used in a business different to that which the corporation is authorized to carry on; 6 A. & E. Corp. Cas. N. S. (Mass.) 247. A corporation may lease a portion of its real estate to its directors subject to ratification by the stockholders; id. See also 122 N. Y. 91; 49 Minn. 488. As to the nature of the interest and liability for rent under gas and oil leases, see GAS; OIL. See, generally, LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Lease of railroad. A lease by a railroad company of all its road, rolling stock, and franchises, for which no authority is given in its charter, is ultra vires and void; 101 U. S. 71, the leading case. The decision is based upon the ground that such a company exercises its functions in a large measure for the public good, and that it is forbidden by public policy to disable itself to perform its duties to the public without the consent of the state; id. The ordinary clause in a charter authorizing the company to contract with other transportation companies for the mutual transfer of goods and passengers over each other's roads does not authorize a lease of the road and its franchises; id. Unless specially authorized by its charter or some legislative action, a railroad company cannot, by lease or other contract, turn over to another company for a long period of time its road and appurtenances or the use of its franchises and the exercise of its powers, nor can any other railroad company make a contract to run and operate such road, property, and franchises. Such a contract is not among the ordinary powers of a railroad company; 118 U. S. 290. See also 130 id. 1; 88 Ala. 572; 115 Mass. 347; 24 Neb. 143; 24 N. J. Eq. 455; 63 Me. 68; 93 N. Y. 609; 68 Tex. 49. If it were otherwise, a railroad company, by leasing its road to irresponsible persons, might enjoy all the benefits conferred by its charter and practically leave the public generally, as well as individuals, without any of the protection which the obligations imposed by its charter, as well as the general law of the state, were designed to afford; 28 S. C. 401. The authority to the lessee company to make such lease is not authority to the lessor company for that purpose; 130 U. S. 1. Where a railroad company of New Jersey leased its franchises and roads to a railway corporation of another state, the lease being not only not authorized, but expressly forbidden by law, and its effect being to combine coal producers and carriers of anthracite coal, it was held to be an excess of corporate power which tended to monopoly and the public injury; 51 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 1; 24 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 964; and the lessor road is subject to forfeiture; 32 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 388.

A valid lease will not release the lessor from the obligation to discharge its charter obligations, unless the law authorizing it contains a provision to this effect; 63 Me. 68; 28 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 50.

Power under the law to mortgage or sell property, or lease it for a term, does not extend to the franchises of a corporation, including the right of way and other property essential to such franchises; 1 Tex. App. 163.

A corporation of one state lawfully leasing a railroad in another state is, as to it, subject to local legislation to the extent to which the lessee would have been subject had there been no lease; 116 U. S. 347.

The laws of a state granting to a railroad company authority to lease its roads do not authorize a lease of a part of it which runs in the Indian country, without the consent of the United States expressly given; 40 Fed. Rep. 280.

A lease is not necessarily void because it extends beyond the time of the lessor's corporate existence, it may be valid for the period of the company's corporate existence; 19 Abb. N. C. 193. The fact that the majority of the directors of a lessor company are personally interested in the lessee company will not make the lease void, but merely voidable at the election of the lessor, or at the suit of stockholders brought within a reasonable time; 43 Fed. Rep. 483.

Where the rental was reduced by directors who were substantially the same in both companies, it was held that this action was voidable at the election of either company, so far as the power of the directors was concerned, but that as their act had been approved by the stockholders, it was valid; 11 N. Y. S. R. 732. But where the rental was reduced on account of the financial embarrassment of the lessee, it was held within the power of the board of directors; 39 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 199.

A lessee is not estopped to deny the validity of a lease by the fact that he has paid rental under it for three years; 145 U. S. 52; but see 93 N. Y. 609; but a stockholder who has waited nineteen years cannot then object; 33 Fed. Rep. 440.

Two railroads contracted that one should operate the other for a term of years, the operating road to receive 65 per cent. of the gross earnings of the line so operated, and out of the remaining 35 per cent. pay interest on the road's bonds, and pay the residue to the company owning the road; this was held not to be a lease; 7 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 249; 102 Ill. 492.

A corporation in debt cannot transfer its entire property by lease so as to prevent the application of the property at its full value to the satisfaction of its debts; 134 U. S. 276; where a company which was in debt had transferred its entire property by lease so as to prevent the application of it to the satisfaction of its debts, equity may decree the payment by the lessee of a judgment debt of the lessor; 118 U. S. 116; 118 id. 276; 26 Fed. Rep. 320.

A lease requires the consent of a majority of the stockholders, which must be expressed at a stockholders' meeting; 12 Fed. Rep. 513; 37 id. 307; 138 Mass. 122; 14 Abb. N. C. 103; 15 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 1; so also does a modification of a lease; id.; and the action of a majority of the stockholders in favor of a lease will not be upheld where it appears that the interests of the minority will be seriously prejudiced by it; 41 N. J. Eq. 1. But it has been held that if power to lease its railroad is conferred upon a corporation by its charter or by statute, the board of directors may execute a lease thereof; 39 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 199. Where one company owns substantially all the stock and bonds of another, a lease of the latter's line is not void for want of consideration; 51 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 162; 51 Fed. Rep. 309. The mere fact that the same persons were directors of both corporations is not of itself sufficient to avoid the lease at the instance of stockholders against the will of the corporation. The fact alone might entitle either corporation to avoid the lease, but does not give the right to a stockholder; 12 Hun 460. The lease of a railroad does not dissolve the corporation, and it remains liable for debts incurred prior to the lease; 1 Fed. Rep. 700. A lessee assumes all the duties of the lessor in relation to the property as well as its rights and privileges, but this would not include the payment of the debts of lessor; 131 U. S. 371; 35 Fed. Rep. 444.

Where a lease of a railroad provided for the payment of the net earnings to mortgage bondholders who were creditors of the lessor, the agreement between the lessor and lessee, having been assented to by the bondholders, operated as an irrevocable assignment to them of the net earnings; 78 Fed. Rep. 690.

Without a law authorizing it, railroads cannot guarantee the performance of a lease of a road entered into by two other roads, the leased road being outside of the states creating the guaranteeing roads, and not connecting with their lines; 24 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 58; 118 U. S, 290.

Where, under a void lease, the property had been used for a time, the railroad company may recover compensation for the use of its property; 2 Fed. Rep. 117; 118 U. S. 290; see 139 U. S. 24; but a lessee, who had received nothing, but had been paying out money under a void contract, cannot be compelled to pay more money under the same contract; 118 U. S. 290; but relief in such case must be based on the invalidity of the contract, and not in aid of its enforcement; 118 U. S. 290. The lessee of a railroad under a lease which all parties admit to be illegal, cannot be compelled by mandamus to operate the road; 42 Fed. Rep. 638.

Where a railroad lease for ninety-nine years contained covenants for monthly instalments of rent to keep the road in repair, etc., a bill which shows failure to pay rent, depreciation of the road, and a combination between the guarantors of the lease and the lessee to divert the earnings of the road to the benefit of the guarantors, presents a case of equitable jurisdiction when it prays for the specific performance of the obligations of the lease. A suit at law on each instalment of rent is not an adequate remedy; 118 U. S. 290.

A lease does not vest in the lessee the right of eminent domain as to the lessor company; 109 Mass. 103; 14 Neb. 389; 117 Ill. 611.

A receiver does not become liable upon the covenants of a lease because of his position of receiver, but only by virtue of an election to adopt the lease, if he sees fit to make such election; and even if the lessee is solvent, the lessor cannot force upon the receiver the adoption of the lease; 77 Fed. Rep. 700. It is well settled that a receiver may take and retain possession of leasehold interests for such period as will enable him to elect intelligently whether it is best to adopt the lease or return the property; 74 Fed. Rep. 91; 142 U. S. 331; 145 id. 82; 150 id. 287; 58 Fed. Rep. 257, 268; and he is not required to pay rental for a depot property as stipulated by the railway company, and is liable only for a reasonable rental if he occupies the property; 74 Fed. Rep. 88; 145 U. S. 82. He takes possession of leasehold property and holds for the court; id. The appointment of a receiver is not an eviction of a lessee; 8 Biss. 456.

As to the relative liability of the lessor and lessee for injuries committed in the operation of the road, the following rules have been laid down in a recent work on the law of railroads: 1. The lessee is liable for all injuries resulting from the negligent operation of the road. 2. Where the lease is void the liability of the lessor continues. 3. Where the lease is valid, some authorities hold that the lessor is relieved from liability for injuries resulting from the negligent operation of the road; 86 Va. 629; 14 Ore. 436; 63 Tex. 549; 14 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 346. But the last rule admits of serious question, unless the lease contains a specific provision for the lessor's exemption from liability; 70 Ga. 464; 119 Ill. 68; 26 Neb. 159; 145 Mass. 64. Some of the cases hold that the lessor cannot be relieved from liability unless there is express authority in the statute; 57 Fed. Rep. 165; 21 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 226; 25 id. 497; 119 Ill. 68; 26 Neb. 159. See also Wood, Railroads 2054. In 80 Me. 62, the rule was thus laid down: "An unauthorized lease without any exemption clause absolves the lessor from the torts of the lessee resulting from negligence in the general management of the leased road over which the lessor could have no control. But for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of some duty owing to the public, such as the proper construction of its road, station-houses, etc., the charter company cannot, in the absence of statutory exemption, discharge itself of legal responsibility," and a covenant in the lease to save the lessor harmless does not affect the case. The lessee is liable whether the lease is valid or invalid; 49 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 603. But it has been held that though the lease is void, a servant of the lessee company cannot recover against the lessor company for injuries sustained in the operation of the road; 72 Fed. Rep. 745; 80 N. Y. 27; 72 Tex. 375; 88 Tenn. 310. While the lessor may be liable to a party injured by the negligence of its lessee's servants, the lessee is also liable; 35 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 440.

In some states statutes provide for the joint and several liability of both lessor and lessee; 43 Ind. 354; 36 Ia. 327; 46 Me. 95; 145 Mass. 64; 27 Mo. App. 394.

See Patterson, Railw. Acc. Law § 1301, which lays down the rule that where the lease is valid, the lessor is not liable for the lessee's torts in the operation of the road.

LEASE AND RELEASE. A species of conveyance much used in England, consisting theoretically of two instruments, but which are practically united in the same instrument.

It was invented by Sergeant Moore, soon after the enactment of the statute of uses. It is thus contrived: a lease, or rather bargain and sale upon some pecuniary consideration for one year, is made by the tenant of the freehold to the lessee or bargainee. This, without any enrolment, makes the bargainor stand seised to the use of the bargainee, and vests in the bargainee the use of the term for one year, and then the statute immediately annexes the possession. Being thus in possession, he is capable of receiving a release of the freehold and reversion, which must be made to the tenant in possession, and accordingly the next day a release is granted to him.

The lease and release, when used as a conveyance of the fee, have the joint operation of a single conveyance; 2 Bla. Com. 339; 4 Kent 482; Co. Litt. 207; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 11.

LEASEHOLD. The estate held by virtue of a lease. In practice the word is generally applied to an estate for a fixed term of years. A lease of chattels is not a leasehold interest; 48 L. J. Ex. 35.

LEASING-MAKING. In Scotch Law. Verbal sedition, viz.: slanderous and untrue speeches to the disdain, reproach, and contempt of his majesty, his council and proceedings, etc. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. 29.

LEAVE AND LICENSE. A defence to an action of trespass setting up the consent of the plaintiff to the trespass complained of. Whart. Lex.

LEAVE OF COURT. Permission granted by the court to do something which, without such permission, would not be allowable.

The statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 4. provides that it shall be lawful for any defendant or tenant in any action or suit, or for any plaintiff in replevin, in any court of record, with leave of the court, to plead as many several matters thereto as he shall think necessary for his defence. The principles of this statute have been adopted by most of the states of the Union.

When the defendant, in pursuance of this statute, pleads more than one plea in bar to one and the same demand or thing, all of the pleas except the first should purport to be pleaded with leave of the court. But the omission is not error nor cause of demurrer; Lawes, Pl. 132; 2 Chitty, Pl. 421; And. Steph. Pl. 167; Story, Eq. Pl. 72, 76; Gould, Pl. c. 8, § 21; Steph. Pl. 272; 3 N. H. 523.

Asking leave of court to do any act is an implied admission of jurisdiction of the court, and in those cases in which the objection to the jurisdiction must be taken, if at all, by plea to the jurisdiction, and it can be taken in no other way, the court, by such asking leave, becomes fully vested with the jurisdiction. Bacon, Abr. Abatement (A); Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (E 2); Lawes, Pl. 91; 6 Pick. 391. But such admission cannot aid the jurisdiction except in such cases.

LEAVE TO DEFEND. The bills of exchange act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67) allowed actions on bills and notes commenced within six months after being due to be by writ of summons in a form provided by the act, and unless the defendant should within twelve days obtain leave to appear and defend the action, allowed the plaintiff to sign judgment on proof of service. This procedure was retained by the judicature act, but abolished in 1880. It is now provided that in all actions where the plaintiff seeks merely to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money or possession where a tenancy has expired or been determined by notice to quit, the writ of summons may be specially indorsed with the particulars of the amount sought to be recovered after giving credit for any payment or set-off; in which case, if the defendant fail to appear, judgment may be signed for the amount claimed; and it is further provided that where the defendant appears on a writ of summons especially indorsed, the plaintiff may, on affidavit verifying the cause of action and swearing that in his belief there is no defence to the action, call on the defendant to show cause before the court or a judge why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to sign final judgment for the amount so indorsed, together with interest, if any, and costs; and the court or judge may, unless the defendant, by affidavit or otherwise, satisfy the court or judge that he has a good defence on the merits or disclose sufficient facts to entitle him to be permitted to defend the action, make an order empowering the plaintiff to sign judgment accordingly. Whart. Lex.

LECCATOR. A debauched person. Cowel.

LECTOR DE LETRA ANTIQUA. In Spanish Law. The person duly authorized by the government to read and decipher ancient documents and titles, in order to entitle them to legal effect in courts of justice.

LECTRINUM. A pulpit. Mon. Ang. iii. p. 243.

LECTURER. An instructor; a reader of letters who has the copyright in them if he be an author by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 65. See COPYRIGHT.

A clergyman who assists rectors in preaching. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 59; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127. Whart. Lex.

Assistants appointed to the rectors of churches. They are chosen by the vestry or chief inhabitants. Within the meaning of the term a readership is not an ecclesiastical preferment; 4 D. & R. 726; 3 B. & C. 49; nor is it included under the definition of benefice given by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. The power of the bishop over the lecturer is limited to the right to judge of his qualification and fitness for the office; he may not determine his right to a particular lectureship; 13 East 419; 3 Salk. 87. In the absence of a custom to employ a lecturer, and where the lectureship is to be supported by voluntary contributions, and where the rector has refused his consent to the person applying for the lectureship, the ordinary is the proper judge as to whether or not a lecturer should be admitted; 1 Wils. 11; 1 Term 331; 4 id. 125. In the language of Lord Mansfield, "No person can use the pulpit of another unless he consents. But if there has been an immemorial usage, the law supposes a good foundation for it; and if the lectureship be endowed, that furnishes a strong argument to support the custom." 1 Term 331.

The court will not grant a mandamus to compel a bishop to grant a licence to a clergyman to preach as lecturer to a parish; 1 Wils. 11; 2 Str. 1192. Trustees of a lecture to be preached at a convenient hour may appoint any hour they please and vary their appointment; 1 W. Bla. 210. As to the right of and qualification for voting in the nomination of a lecturer, the usage of the parish is, if consistent with the deed of trust, a safe criterion; 1 Ves. 43; 14 id. 7; 3 Atk. 599; 2 Vern. 387; but no person can be a lecturer, although elected by the parishioners, without the rector's consent, unless there be an immemorial custom to such effect; 1 Add. 97; 4 B. & C. 569. See 2 Burn, Eccl. L. 398.

LEDGER. In Commercial Law. A book in which are inscribed the names of all persons dealing with the person who keeps it, and in which there is a separate account, composed generally of one or more pages for each. There are two parallel columns, on one of which the party named is the debtor, and on the other the creditor, and presents a ready means of ascertaining the state of the account. As this book is a transcript from the day-book or journal, it is not evidence per se.

LEDGER BOOK. In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a book kept in the prerogative courts in England. It is considered as a roll of the court, but, it seems, it cannot be read in evidence. Bacon, Abr.

LEEMAN'S ACTS. Acts 30 Vict. c. 29 and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 91, by which contracts for the sale of bank shares are void unless the number of the shares are set forth in the contract; 9 Q. B. D. 546; and by which are authorized the application of the funds of municipal corporations and other governing bodies under certain conditions towards promoting or opposing parliamentary and other proceedings for the benefit or protection of the inhabitants.

LEGA or LACTA. The alloy of money. Spelman.

LEGACY. A gift of personal property by last will and testament.

A gift or disposition in one's favor by a last will. Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 459. The term is more commonly applied to a bequest of money or chattels, although sometimes used with reference to a charge upon real estate; 2 Wms. Ex. 1051; see 9 Cush. 397; 13 Ired. Eq. 450; 7 Ves. 391, 522. A direction to the executor to support and maintain a person during his life gives him a legacy; 4 Mass. 634; but a recommendation "to give from time to time some little assistance to A" does not; 5 La. Ann. 390. It is said that the word legacy in a will may include real as well as personal property; 1 Law Repos. N. C. 107.

An absolute legacy is one given without condition, to vest immediately; 1 Vern. 254; 19 Ves. 86; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (I 4); they are usually absolute; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 466; 19 Ves. 86; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (I 4).

An additional, or, more technically, a cumulative legacy is one given to a legatee to whom a legacy has already been given. It may be given by the same will in which a legacy has already been bequeathed, or by a codicil thereto; 1 Bro. C. C. 90; 17 Ohio 597; 22 Conn. 371.

An alternate legacy is one by which the testator gives one of two or more things without designating which.

A conditional legacy is a bequest the existence of which depends upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event; 1 Rop. Leg. 645. The condition may be either precedent; 2 Conn. 196; 9 W. & S. 103; 17 Wend. 393; 14 N. H. 315; 10 Cush. 129; or subsequent; 25 Me. 529; 33 N. H. 285; 3 Pet. 376; 55 Md. 575.

A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of a certain sum of money, stock, or the like, payable out of a particular fund or security; Wms. Ex. 860; 23 N. H. 154; 19 Gratt. 438; 10 Pa. 387; 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 453; 16 N. Y. 365. See DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY.

A general legacy is one so given as not to amount to a bequest of a particular thing or money, of a particular fund, distinguished from all others of the same kind; 1 Rop. Leg. 170; 8 N. Y. 516; 6 Madd. 92.

An indefinite legacy is a bequest of things which are not enumerated or ascertained as to numbers or quantities: as, a bequest by a testator of all his goods, all his stocks in the funds; Lownd. Leg. 84; Swinb. Wills 485; Ambl. 641; 1 P. Wms. 697; of this class are generally residuary legacies.

A lapsed legacy is one which, in consequence of the death of the legatee before the testator or before the period for vesting, has never vested. See LAPSED LEGACY.

A legacy for life is one in which the legatee is to enjoy the use of the legacy for life.

A modal legacy is a bequest accompanied with directions as to the mode in which it should be applied for the legatee's benefit: for example, a legacy to Titius to put him an apprentice; 2 Vern. Ch. 431; Lownd. Leg. 151.

A pecuniary legacy is one of money. Pecuniary legacies are in most cases general legacies, but there may be a specific pecuniary legacy, for example, of the money in a certain bag; 1 Rop. Leg. 150, n. In Maryland pecuniary legacies are by statute to be paid out of the real estate if the personal is insufficient; Laws 1894, ch. 438.

A residuary legacy is a bequest of all the testator's personal estate not otherwise effectually disposed of by his will; Lownd. Leg. 10; Bacon, Abr. Legacies (I); 6 H. L. Cas. 217. An ordinary residuary bequest cannot be treated as specific, but from its very nature must be considered as a general legacy; L. R. 3 Ch. D. 309; even though some of its particulars are enumerated in the will; 4 Hare 628; but a bequest of the remainder of a particular thing or fund after the payment of other legacies or of all one's estate in a particular locality may be specific so long as the identity of the thing or fund is not destroyed; 5 Ves. 150; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 462.

A specific legacy is a bequest of a specified part of the testator's personal estate, distinguished from all others of the same kind; 3 Beav. 349; 20 Me. 105; 3 Rawle 237; 23 N. H. 154; 49 id. 107; L. R. 20 Eq. 304; 35 N. J. Eq. 461; 128 Mass. 433; 13 Pa. 189. Such a legacy may be the undistributed balance of a partnership or a goodwill; Amb. 309; 31 Beav. 602; or debt due testator; 2 Del. Ch. 200; 122 Mass. 282; 15 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 285; in such case it is rendered worthless by insolvency; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 461. A specific legacy may be of animals or inanimate things, provided they are specified and separated from all other things, as money in a bag, or money marked and so described: as, I give two eagles to A B, on which are engraved the initials of my name. Such a legacy may also be given out of a general fund; Ambl. 310; 4 Ves. 565; 3 V. & B. 5. If the specific article given be not found among the assets of the testator, the legatee loses his legacy.

All natural persons and all corporations are capable of becoming legatees, unless prohibited by statute or alien enemies. The statute under which it is created must be resorted to in order to ascertain whether a corporation has legal capacity to take a legacy, but the act of incorporation or legislative confirmation of the rights may be secured after the legacy takes effect; 53 Md. 466; 4 Dem. 271; 6 W. & S. 218. The right of a corporation to take by will is subject to the general laws of the state passed after the incorporation; 79 N. Y. 327. See CORPORATION; FOREIGN CORPORATION. A bequest to the United States from which came the Smithsonian Institute was held valid in the English chancery court; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 460, note; but under the terms of the state statute a devise of lands in New York to the United States was held void; 94 U. S. 315; 52 N. Y. 530. As to the difference of the law applicable to real and personal property, see CONFLICT OF LAWS. Legacies to the subscribing witnesses to a will are by statute often declared void. See 2 Wms. Ex. 1053; Rop. Leg. 201; 3 Russ. 437; L. R. 13 Eq. 381; 106 Mass. 474; 1 Moo. & R. 288. It was held in England that a subscribing witness to whom a legacy was given was incompetent by reason of interest, and that the will would fail unless there was enough witnesses without him; 2 Stra. 1253. To save the will it was enacted that the legacy should be void; 25 Geo. II. c. 6. Similar statutes have been enacted in most of the states; Schoul. Wills § 357 and note; 1 Stims. Am. St. L. § 2650. In most of these, if there are enough witnesses without the legatee, the legacy is saved, but in a few states it is said that it seems that it may be void in any case; id. Bequests to superstitious uses are prohibited by many of the English statutes; 2 Beav. 151; 5 Myl. & C. 11. But in the United States the free toleration of all religious opinions would seem to make it almost impossible to hold any use superstitious; 1 Watts 218; 2 Dana 170. Legacies by Roman Catholics for masses for the repose of the soul were held in England void as for superstitious uses; 2 Myl. & K. 684; but in this country have been held valid; 2 Dem. 87; 134 Mass. 426; contra, McHugh will case, Wis. Sup. Ct. Oct. 22, 1897. But the courts will not intervene to support and maintain a legacy for any purpose which is illegal or subversive of public policy; 63 Pa. 465. Bequests to charitable uses are favored both in England and the United States. See CHARITABLE USE.

Construction of legacies. First, the technical import of words is not to prevail over the obvious intent of the testator; 6 Ad. & E. 167; 7 M. & W. 1, 481; 1 M. & K. 571; L. R. 11 Eq. 280; 11 Pick. 257, 375; 1 Root 332; 1 Nott & M'C. 69; 12 Johns. 389; 36 Me. 216; 58 Pa. 427; 51 N. H. 443; 64 Me. 490; 86 Tenn. 81; 70 Tex. 522. Second, where technical words are used by the testator, or words of art, they are to have their technical import, unless it is apparent they were not intended to be used in that sense; 3 Brown, Ch. 68; 1 Younge & J. 512; 5 Mass. 500; 2 M'Cord 66; 5 Denio 646; 75 Pa. 220; 3 Green 218; 1 Sumn. 239; 18 N. Y. 417; 25 Wend. 119. Words are to be construed with reference to the surrounding of the testator when the will was made; 70 Tex. 522. The particular intent will always be sacrificed to the general intent; 11 Gray 469; 70 Pa. 335; 106 Mass. 24; 26 Mo. 590; 6 Pet. 68. Third, the intent of the testator is to be determined from the whole will; 1 Coll. Ch. 681; 3 Pet. 377; 4 Rand. 213; 8 Blackf. 387; 100 Mass. 342; 51 N. H. 83; 78 Pa. 40; 35 Ind. 198; 52 N. Y. 450; 22 Me. 413; 83 Va. 343. In ascertaining this intention, courts should not seek it in particular words and phrases, or confine it by technical objections, but should find it by construing the provisions of the will with the aid of the context and by considering what seems to be the entire scheme of the will; 113 N. Y. 115; 69 Tex. 227; 84 Ky. 206; 86 id. 354; and should put itself in the position occupied by a testator; 134 U. S. 572. See 3 C. C. App. 649. Fourth, every word shall have effect, if it can be given without defeating the general purpose of the will, which is to be carried into effect in every reasonable mode; 2 B. & Ald. 448; 3 Pick. 360; 7 Ired. Eq. 267; 10 Humphr. 368; 2 Md. 82; 6 Pet. 68; 9 H. L. Cas. 420; 40 N. H. 500; 53 Pa. 106; 12 Gratt. 196; 19 N. Y. 348. But where it is impossible to form a consistent whole the latter part will prevail; 5 Beav. 100; 52 Me. 287; 52 N. Y. 12; 29 Pa. 234; 78 id. 484; 73 Iowa 564; 40 La. Ann. 284. Fifth, the will will be favorably construed to effectuate the testator's intent, and to this end words may be transposed, supplied, or rejected; 21 Beav. 143; 7 H. L. Cas. 68; 8 Sim. 184; 80 Iowa 294: 4 Rich. Eq. 22; 63 N. C. 381; 105 Mass. 338; 22 Me. 429; L. R. 14 Eq. 54; 10 Wheat. 204; 35 Md. 198; 54 Pa. 245; 20 Ohio St. 416; 84 Va. 523; 50 N. J. Eq. 547; it will be so construed when not inconsistent with rules of law; 127 U. S. 300; 74 Cal. 98; 77 Ga. 636; 24 Neb. 215. Sixth, in the case of a will of personalty made abroad, the lex domicilii must prevail, unless it appear the testator had a different intent; Story, Confl. Laws § 479 a, 490; 1 De G. F. & J. 404; L. R. 1 H. L. 401; 99 Mass. 136; 52 Me. 165; 34 N. Y. 584; 14 How. 426. Seventh, a will of personalty speaks from the time of testator's death; 8 De G. M. & G. 391; 34 N. Y. 201; 22 N. H. 434; 21 Conn. 610; 41 Barb. 50. In interpreting a will several of the states provide by statute that they are to be construed and take effect, as of the date of the death of testator, with respect to both real and personal property, unless a contrary intention appear in the will. It is so provided in Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee. And in Georgia words of survivorship refer to the death of the testator in order to vest remainders. In Louisiana a legacy must be delivered with everything appertaining to it in the condition in which it was on day of testator's decease. In some states where death or survivorship are referred to, the words relate to the time of testator's death unless possession is actually postponed, in which case they refer to time of possession. Such is the statute law in California, the Dakotas, Montana, and Utah; Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 2806.

In interpreting a will, the true inquiry is not what the testator meant to express, but what the words used express; 29 W. Va. 784; 83 Va. 724; and effect cannot be given to unexpressed intention; 11 Ky. L. Rep. 87; 84 Va. 880. As to the weight to be given to previous decisions upon the construction of certain words, it may be said that if the words are identical they are not strictly binding, much less so if the words are only similar; L. R. 10 Ch. 397; 22 Ch. D. 488; and this is true even of the decision of the appeal court; 23 Ch. D. 111.

The general policy of the law and the rules of interpretation require that legacies in all cases, unless clearly inconsistent with the intention of the testator, should be held to be vested rather than contingent; 45 N. J. Eq. 473; 124 Pa. 10; 84 Ky. 317.

Whether cumulative or repeated. Where a testator has twice bequeathed a legacy to one person it becomes a question whether the legatee is entitled to both or one only. Where there is internal evidence of the intention of the testator, that intention is to be carried out; 2 Beav. 215; 7 id. 107; 3 Hare 620; 2 Drur. & W. 133; 3 Ves. 462; 5 id. 369; 2 Sim. & S. 145; 4 Hare 219; L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 788; 10 Johns. 156; 4 Harr. N. J. 127; 1 Zabr. 573; and evidence will be received in support of the apparent intention, but not against it; 5 Madd. 351; 2 Beav. 115; 1 My. & K. 589; 2 Bro. Ch. 528; 4 Hare 216; 1 Drur. & W. 94, 118. Where there is no such internal evidence, certain presumptions are recognized; 10 Sim. 453; and the following positions of law appear to be established. First, if the same specific thing is bequeathed twice to the same legatee in the same will, or in the will and again in a codicil, in that case he can claim the benefit of only one legacy; Toll. Ex. 335; 2 Hare 432. Second, where two legacies of quantity of equal amount are bequeathed to the same legatee in one and the same instrument, there also the second bequest is considered a mere repetition, and he is entitled to one legacy only; 1 Bro. C. C. 30; 4 Ves. 75; 3 Myl. & K. 29; 10 Johns. 156. See 4 Gill 280: 1 Zabr. 573; 16 Pa. 127; 5 De G. & S. 698; 16 Sim. 423. Third, where two legacies of quantity of unequal amount are given to the same person in the same instrument, the one is not merged in the other, but the latter shall be regarded as cumulative, and the legatee entitled to both; Finch 267; 2 Bro. C. C. 225; 3 Hare 620. Legacies not of the same kind are presumed to be cumulative; 2 Russ. 257; otherwise the presumption is slight and easily shaken; 17 Ves. 34, 41. Fourth, where two legacies are given simpliciter to the same legatee by different instruments, in that case also the latter shall be cumulative, whether its amount be equal; 1 Cox 392; 17 Ves. Ch. 34; 1 Coll. Ch. 495; 4 Hare 216; or unequal to the former; 1 Ch. Cas. 801; 1 P. Wms. 423; 5 Sim. 431; 1 Myl. & K. 589; 4 H. L. Cas. 396; 1 De G. F. & J. 183; L. R. 12 Eq. Cas. 525; 7 Ch. App. 448. And see 1 Bro. Ch. 272; 2 Beav. 215; 2 Drur. & W. 133; 1 Bligh, N. S. 491; 1 Phil. 294. For recent cases where they were held cumulative, see 63 N. H. 129; 55 Vt. 317; 107 Pa. 95. See, generally, on this subject notes to Hooley v. Hatton, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. *846; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 468, n. 3.

Description of legatee.—Children. This may have reference to the time of the testator's death, or that of making the will. The former is the presumed intention, unless from the connection or circumstances the latter is the apparent intent, in which case it must prevail; 2 Cox 191; 11 Sim. 42; 2 Wms. Ex. 1089; 11 Gill & J. 185; 21 Conn. 16; 59 Me. 325; 2 Dev. & B. 30; 101 Mass. 132; 54 N. Y. 83; 110 Mo. 164; 44 La. Ann. 605; 2 Jarm. Wills 154, 156, and Bigelow's notes. And this rule extends to grandchildren, issue, brothers, nephews, and cousins; 3 De G. M. & G. 649; 1 Houst. 561; 146 Mass. 345; Schoul. Wills § 529. The judicial disposition to let in subsequent issue and near relations of a class as generously as possible has resulted in a rule thus stated by the author last cited: "Hence the English rule, confirmed by many American precedents, that the devise or bequest of a corpus or aggregate fund to children as a class, where the gift is not immediate, vests in all the children in existence at the testator's death, but so as to open and let in children who may come into existence afterwards, at any time before the fund is distributable." Id. § 530; 1 Bro. C. C. 537; 2 Madd. 129; 72 Md. 67; 5 R. I. 129; 37 Miss. 65; 38 Ill. 206. This rule also extends to grandchildren, issue, brothers, nephews, and cousins; 3 De G. M. & G. 649.

This term will include a child en ventre sa mère; 2 H. Bla. 399; 1 Sim. & S. 181; 1 Meigs 149; 15 Pick. 255; 30 Pa. 173; 124 id. 10; L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 460; 84 Ala. 48; 80 Ga. 681; see 109 N. C. 675. Such a child is included in a devise by a father to his children "living" at his death; 2 Ired. Eq. 226. The rule of construction by which a child en ventre sa mère is in law considered as a child in esse is not confined to cases in which the unborn child is benefited by its application; [1895] 2 Ch. 497; 13 Reports 689.

Where the division of a fund to legatees is postponed until a certain event or period, the word "child" will apply to all those answering that description when the fund is to be divided; 8 Ves. 38; 9 Leigh 79; 1 Hill, Ch. 322; 1 McCart. 159; 4 Sandf. 86; 101 Mass. 138; 19 So. Rep. (Ala.) 435. But it will sometimes have a more restricted application, and thus be confined to children born before the death of the testator. But children born after the period of distribution take no share; L. R. 12 Eq. 427; 45 N. H. 270; 8 Conn. 49; 5 Jones Eq. 208; 1 Houst. 561. See 147 Pa. 121. And it will make no difference that the bequest is to children begotten, or to be begotten, or which "may be born"; 2 Myl. & K. 46; 14 Beav. 453; 5 R. I. 318; 1 Rop. Leg. 51; unless such be the testator's clear intent; 19 Ves. 566; 16 Gray 305; 4 Sneed 254; 4 R. I. 121; 3 Head 493; 3 Jones Eq. 490; 2 Jarm. Wills 84.

"Children," when used to designate one's heirs, may include grandchildren; 12 B. Monr. 115, 121; 5 Pa. 365; 37 N. Y. 42; 63 Mass. 289; 33 Me. 464; Rop. Leg. 68; 5 Binn. 606; 73 Cal. 594; 28 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 319; but see 71 Md. 175. But if the word children is used, and there are persons to answer it, then grandchildren cannot be comprehended under it; 4 My. & C. 60; L. R. 11 Eq. 91; 29 Md. 443; 14 Allen 205; 6 C. E. Green 85; 2 Whart. 376; 5 Ired. Eq. 421. The general rule is, that a bequest to a man and his children, he having children living at the time the will takes effect, creates a joint estate in the father and children; but if he have no children, he takes an absolute estate; 5 Sim. 548; L. R. 12 Eq. 316; L. R. 14 Eq. 415; L. R. 7 Ch. App. 253; 5 Gray 336. But in both cases slight circumstances will warrant the court in holding the limitation to be for life to the father, with remainder over to the children; 4 Madd. 361; 13 S. & R. 68; 16 B. Mon. 309; 1 Bailey Eq. 357; 5 Jones Eq. 219; 23 Ala. 705.

The term children will not include illegitimate children, if there are legitimate to answer the term; 98 Pa. 479; 14 N. J. Eq. 159; 2 Russ. & M. 336; see 2 Wms. Ex. 1100 (but see 117 Ind. 380; 113 N. C. 301); otherwise, it may or may not, according to circumstances; 1 Ves. & B. 422; 1 Bail. Eq. 351; 6 Ired. Eq. 135; 9 Paige 88; 2 Sneed 625; 31 N. J. Eq. 398; L. R. 10 Eq. 160; L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 644; 37 Conn. 429; L. R. 7 H. L. 576; L. R. 4 P. C. 164. See Schoul. Wills § 534 and notes. Nor will it include a child adopted after the will was made; 84 Ala. 48. In a recent English case it is said that although, prima facie, the word "children" in a will means legitimate children, there may be sufficient explanation, in the light of surrounding circumstances, that the word is not used in its primary meaning, and the word was held to mean stepchildren; 18 Reports 627. But a legacy to a natural child of a certain man still en ventre sa mère was held void, as contravening public morals and decency; 1 P. Wms. 529; 2 My. & R. 769; contra, L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 773; 5 Harr. & J. 10. It is said that the term grandchildren will not usually include great-grandchildren; 3 Ves. & B. 59; 4 My. & C. 60; 8 Beav. 247; but it has been held otherwise in the absence of anything to show a contrary intent; 2 Pittsb. L. J. Pa. N. S. 403. See CHILD. The same rule applies to adopted children who are not prima facie included; 54 Pa. 304.

It is held that a bequest to "my beloved wife," not mentioning her by name, applies exclusively to the wife at the date of the will, and is not to be extended to an after-taken wife; 8 Hare 131; L. R. 8 Eq. Cas. 65; 31 Beav. 398. One not lawfully married may, nevertheless, take a legacy by the name or description of the wife of the one to whom she is reputed to be married; 9 Sim. 615; 1 De G. J. & S. 177; 11 W. R. 614; but not if the reputed relation is the motive for the bequest; 4 Ves. 802; 5 My. & C. 145; L. R. 2 Ex. 319. But see 1 Keen 685.

Nephew and niece are terms which, in the description of a legatee, will receive their strict import, unless there is something in the will to indicate a contrary intention; 14 Sim. 214; 27 Beav. 480; 2 Yeates 196; 3 Barb. 475; 3 Halst. Ch. 462; 10 Hare 63; 7 De G. M. & G. 494; L. R. 6 Ch. App. 351; 2 Jones Eq. 302. "All my nephews and nieces" was held to include only those of the testatrix and not those of her husband; 42 Pa. 25; but "nephews and nieces on both sides" was held to include those by marriage; 3 De G. F. & J. 466; and such was the inference where a testator had no nephews or nieces of his blood; L. R. 8 Ch. 928; L. R. 15 Eq. 305; great-nephews and great-nieces are not usually included; 43 Ch. D. 569; but may be if such intention is shown by the context; 57 Conn. 24. A provision that the residue was to be divided among the testator's grand-nephews and grand-nieces does not include the nephews and nieces; 27 Abb. N. C. 437.

The term cousins will be restricted in its signification, where there is something in the will to limit its meaning; 9 Sim. 457. A rule of convenience limits the term to first cousins only, if there be such, or if there are cousins of different degrees, to the nearer rather than the more remote; 6 De G. M. & G. 68; 31 Beav. 305; and "first cousins" does not include first cousins once removed; 4 Myl. & C. 56; but "all the first and second cousins" embraced equally first cousins once removed and first cousins twice removed; 2 Bro. C. C. 125; 1 Sim. & Stew. 301; 3 Russ. 140.

Terms which give an estate tail in lands will be construed to give the absolute title to personalty; 8 H. L. Cas. 571; 3 Md. Ch. 36; 10 Yerg. 287; 23 Pa. 9; 4 Dev. & B. 478; L. R. 5 Eq. Cas. 383.

A legacy to one and his heirs, although generally conveying a fee-simple in real estate and the entire property in personalty, may, by the manner of its expression and connection, be held to be a designation of such persons as are the legal heirs of the person named, and thus they take as purchasers by name; 4 Bro. C. C. 542; 10 B. Mon. 104; 108 Mass. 579; 64 Me. 490; 15 N. J. 404; 15 Ohio 559. But the authority of these cases is doubtful. The word "heirs," when used to denote succession or substitution, is understood in the case of a legacy to mean persons entitled under the intestate law; 63 Me. 368; 59 N. Y. 151; 9 Pet. 483; L. R. 9 Eq. 258; 100 Mass. 348; 3 Pa. 305. But if not so used, the word heir is construed in its ordinary and legal sense; 63 Me. 379; 59 N. Y. 149; 37 Pa. 9; 108 Mass. 579; 3 H. L. Cas. 557; L. R. 7 Eq. Cas. 151; see 51 N. J. Eq. 1; 26 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 187; 87 Ga. 239; the words heir and heirs are interchangeable, and embrace all legally entitled to partake of the inheritance; 83 Va. 724. See HEIR.

The word "issue," used as a word of purchase, comprises all descendants of him to whose issue the bequest is made; 23 Beav. 40; 7 Allen 76; 63 Pa. 484; 103 Mass. 288; 26 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 38; 65 Hun 155. It may mean heirs at law; 3 Misc. Rep. 192; children and not descendants generally; 69 Hun 228. See 155 Pa. 628. See ISSUE.

The word descendants cannot be construed to include any but lineal heirs without clear indications in the will of a different purpose; Schoul. Wills § 535; 2 Bradf. 413; 8 Gray 101; a sister's child is not a descendant; 1 Bradf. 314; this word, like issue, is very general, but is said to be less flexible in construction, requiring a stronger context to confine it to such;

School. Wills § 535; 2 Jarm. Wills 98–100. See DESCENDANTS.

The term "relations" includes those only who would otherwise be entitled under the statute of distributions; 1 Bro. C. C. 31; 54 Me. 291; 20 N. H. 481; 8 S. & R. 45; and so of the word "family"; 9 Ves. 323; 19 Beav. 580; L. R. 9 Eq. Cas. 623; 9 R. I. 412; see 63 Conn. 324. The term family is very flexible and may mean, according to circumstances, a man's household, consisting of himself, his wife, children, and servants; it may mean his wife and children, or his children, excluding the wife; or if he has no wife and children, it may mean his brothers and sisters, or his next of kin; or it may mean the genealogical stock from which he sprung, since all these applications of the word and even others are found in common parlance; 1 Keen 181. The word family may include an illegitimate child; L. R. 6 Ch. 597. See FAMILY; RELATIONS. Nearest relations means brothers and sisters to the exclusion of nephews and nieces: 45 N. J. Eq. 97. "Poor relations, equally," was held to include testator's brothers and sisters, and the mother of his wife per capita, as if the word "poor" were not used; 8 S. & R. 43.

A legacy to A and his executors and administrators, legal representatives or personal representatives (which titles see), gives A an absolute interest in the legacy; 15 Ves. 537; 118 Mass. 198; 18 Gratt. 529; L. R. 4 Eq. 359. But in some instances these words will be taken as words not of limitation but of purchase; L. R. 4 Eq. 359; 2 Beav. 67; 25 Md. 401. Generally when persons take under this description they will be bound to apply the legacy as the personal estate of the testator or intestate; 3 Bro. C. C. 224; 2 Yeates 587; 8 Sim. 328.

Mistakes in the name or description of legatees may be corrected whenever it can be clearly shown by the will itself what was intended; 10 Hare 345; 8 Md. 496; 15 N. H. 317; 4 Johns. Ch. 607; 23 Vt. 336; 7 Ired. Eq. 201; 15 Gray 347; 59 N. Y. 441; L. R. 10 Eq, 29.

The only instances in which parol evidence is admissible to show the intention of the testator as to a legatee imperfectly described, is that of a strict equivocation: that is, where it appears from extraneous evidence that two or more persons answer the description in the will; 5 M. & W. 363; L. R. 2 P. & D. 8; L. R. 11 Eq. Cas. 578; 15 N. H. 330; 49 Me. 288; 24 Pa. 199; 59 N. Y. 441; 133 U. S. 216; see 120 id. 586; and to explain names in the will, which the testator has used and which are peculiar or incomprehensible owing to testator's idiosyncrasies or other reasons; 2 P. Wms. 141; 4 John. Ch. 607; 5 H. L. Cas. 168. See 50 N. J. Eq. 554. Extrinsic evidence is admissible to remove latent ambiguity in a will: but as to the character and extent of such evidence see LATENT AMBIGUITY.

By statute in Massachusetts legacies may be distributed by order of court to such persons as seem indicated by will. Laws 1895, ch. 134.

Interest of legatee. Property given specifically to one for life, and remainder over, must be enjoyed specifically during the life of the first donee, although that may exhaust it; 4 My. & Cr. 299; 2 My. & K. 703; L. R. 11 Eq. 80; 45 N. H. 261; 6 Gill & J. 171; 17 S. & R. 293; 2 Md. Ch. 190. But where the bequest is not specific, as where personal property is limited to one for life, remainder over, it is presumed that the testator intended the same property to go over, and if any portion of it be perishable, it shall be sold and converted into permanent property, for the benefit of all concerned; 2 My. & K. 699; 7 Ves. 137; 4 My. & C. 298; L. R. 4 Eq. Cas. 295. See 76 Iowa 336.

In personal property there cannot be a remainder in the strict sense of the word, and therefore every future bequest of personal property, whether it be preceded or not by any particular bequest, or limited on a certain or uncertain event, is properly an executory bequest, and falls under the rules by which that mode of limitation is regulated; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 401, n. An executory bequest cannot be prevented or destroyed by any alteration whatsoever in the estate, out of which or after which it is limited; 8 Co. 96 a; 10 id. 476. And this privilege of executory bequests, which exempts them from being barred or destroyed, is the foundation of an invariable rule, that the event on which a limitation of this sort is permitted to take effect must be such that the estate will necessarily vest in interest from the time of its creation within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years thereafter and the fraction of another year, allowing for the period of gestation, afterwards; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 431.

Where the legacy is payable at a future time a question often arises as to when the legacy vests. The rule seems to be that if a legacy is payable or to be paid at a future time, then a vested interest is conferred on the legatee eo instanti the testator dies, transmissible to his executors or administrators; 31 Beav. 425; 44 N. H. 281; 1 Ves. 217; 2 Sim. & S. 505; 48 Me. 257; 9 Cush. 516; 2 Edw. Ch. 156. But if it be payable at, if, when, in case, or provided a certain time comes or contingency arrives, then the legatee's right depends upon his being alive at the time fixed for payment; 62 Me. 449; 37 Pa. 105; 3 R. I. 226; 106 Mass. 28; 4 Dana 572; 5 Beav. 391. For exceptions to this rule see 2 Will. Ex. 1224.

No particular form of words is requisite to constitute one a residuary legatee. It must appear to be the intention of the testator that he shall take the residue of the estate, after paying debts and meeting all other appointments of the will; 2 Jac. & W. 399; 44 N. H. 255; 9 Leigh 361; 40 Conn. 264. The right of the executor to the residue of the estate when there is no residuary legatee is well established, both at law and in equity, in England, except so far as it is controlled by statute; 2 P. Wms. 340; 3 Atk. 228; 7 Ves. 288; but the rule has been controlled in equity by aid of slight presumptions in favor of the next of kin; 1 Bro. C. C. 201; 14 Sim. 8, 12; 2 Sm. & G. 241; 14 Ves. 197; and is now altered by stat. 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 40. The rule never obtained in this country, it is believed, to any great extent; 3 Binn. 557; 9 S. & R. 424; 6 Mass. 153; 2 Hayw. 298; 4 Leigh 163; 1 Penning. 44.

A general residuary clause carries property, a gift of which has failed by reason of misdescription; 53 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 345; and though a general residuary clause carries lapsed or void legacies, it does not include any part of the residue itself which fails; 15 R. I. 138. See, generally, 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 200, n.

The assent of the executor to a legacy is requisite to vest the title in the legatee; 1 Bail. 504; 4 Fla. 144; 19 Ala. 666; 11 Humphr. 559; 11 Gratt. 724; 8 How. 170; 2 Dev. & B. 254. But this seems to be merely a necessary requirement to adjust the matter to the reasonable convenience of the executor; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 488. This will often be implied or presumed; 23 Ala. 326; 6 Pick. 126; 1 Bail. Ch. 517; 10 Hare 177; 9 Exch. 680; as where the legatee was in possession of the thing at the decease of the testator, and the executor acquiesces in his right; 47 Fed. Rep. 250. See 6 Call 55. The premature assent of an executor named where another qualifies will not avail; 4 Dev. & B. 401; nor will an assent before the issue of letters testamentary; 19 Ala. 666; otherwise in England where the doctrine was that the authority of the executor was derived from the will; Wms. Exrs. 303, 1378. If the assent is unreasonably withheld, it may be compelled by a court of equity; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 162; 6 Dana 148; 1 Ind. 570; 3 Redf. 514; Crosw. Ex. & Ad. 491.

A legatee cannot sue for his legacy until the time given to the executor for payment has expired. This time is commonly one year; 16 Beav. 398; 15 Ala. 507; 2 Edw. Ch. 202. So also the assent of the legatee is required to complete the gift, although it is presumed, after the will is proved, unless the legacy is actually declined, and in that case the bequest is subject to distribution as intestate property; 15 Me. 207; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 489. Of cumulative legacies one onerous and the other beneficial, the latter cannot be accepted and the former declined; 3 Myl. & K. 254; but an intention will control if expressed in the will; 11 Jur. N. S. 824; Wms. Ex. 1448.

Abatement. The general pecuniary legacies are subject to abatement whenever the assets are insufficient to answer the debts and specific legacies. The abatement must be upon all pro rata; 4 Bro. Ch. 349, 350; 106 Mass. 100; 71 Pa. 333; but a residuary legatee has no right to call upon general legatees to abate proportionally with him; 1 Dr. & S. 623; L. R. 3 Ch. App. 537; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 555. And, generally, among general legatees there is a preference of those who have relinquished any right in consideration of their legacy over mere volunteers; 106 Mass. 100; L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 714. Specific legatees must abate, pro rata, when all the assets are exhausted except specific devises, and prove insufficient to pay debts; 1 P. Wms. 679; 2 Bla. Com. 513; but in ordinary cases of a deficiency of assets, the specific legacy will not be liable to abate with the general legacies; 1 Vern. 31; 1 P. Wms. 422; 3 id. 365; 3 Bro. C. C. 160; 3 Wms. Ex. 436. See 1 Rop. Leg. 150; 1 Belt, Supp. Ves. 209, 231; 2 id. 112. Specific bequests and devises cannot be forced to abate in relief of a pecuniary legacy by contributing to payment of costs of administration and funeral expenses; Moore's Estate (O. Ct.), 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 459. A bequest to a widow in lieu of dower is not subject to abatement in case of a deficiency of assets, but will be preferred to other general legacies; 5 Misc. Rep. 123. Demonstrative legacies will not abate with general legacies; 11 Ves. 607; 11 Cl. & F. 509; 25 N. Y. 128. Where an estate is insufficient to pay all the legacies, the general will abate before the specific legacies; 115 N. C. 398. Demonstrative legacies are subject to abatement, but specific legacies are not; 40 W. Va. 349. Demonstrative legacies are a prior claim on the fund out of which they are payable, but if it is insufficient the legacies must be reduced proportionally; 22 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 853. In default of special provision the following order is observed in calling upon the estate to supply a deficiency of assets; (1) General residuary estate; (2) Estate devised for payment for debts; (3) Real estate descended; (4) Real estate devised subject to debts; (5) General legacies; (6) Specific legacies and devises pro rata; 11 Pa. 72. Legacies given by a codicil are on the same footing as legacies in the original will, when the estate is insufficient to pay them all in full; 16 R. I. 98. See ABATEMENT; DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY.

Ademption of legacies. A specific legacy is revoked by the sale or change of form of the thing bequeathed: as, by converting a gold chain into a cup, or wool into cloth, or cloth into garments; 2 Bro. C. C. 110; 7 Johns. Ch. 262; see 113 N. Y. 560; so if a debt specifically bequeathed be received by the testator the legacy is adeemed; 3 Bro. C. C. 431; 7 Johns. Ch. 262; 23 N. H. 218; 10 Ohio 64; 48 La. Ann. 278; and so of stock, which is partially or wholly disposed of by testator before his death; 6 Pick. 212; 28 Pa. 363; 1 Ves. Sen. 426; 7 Johns. Ch. 258.

A demonstrative legacy is not adeemed by the sale or change of the fund; 15 Ves. 384; 6 H. L. Cas. 883; 11 Cl. & F. 509; 16 Pa. 275; 25 N. Y. 128; 13 Allen 256; 118 Ind. 147.

The doctrine of ademption does not apply to demonstrative legacies inasmuch as they are payable out of the general estate, if the fund out of which they are payable fail; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1131; 2 Wms. Ex. 632. Where a legacy is given for a specified purpose, it is in the nature of a specific legacy, and if such purpose is accomplished by the testator in his lifetime there is an ademption of the legacy; 38 N. J. Eq. 91; so where a legacy was given expressly to pay a debt, the legacy was held adeemed or satisfied; 39 Barb. 507; 6 Ch. App. 136. Where the payment made by the testator subsequent to the execution of a will is equal to or exceeds the amount of the legacy, it will be deemed a satisfaction or an ademption thereof, but where it is less than the amount of the legacy, it is deemed a satisfaction pro tanto, and if the difference between the amounts be slight, it may be deemed a complete satisfaction or ademption; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1111; 47 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 376. A bequest to a son of a certain sum payable out of the shares of the daughter's children, and providing that on such payment the son shall surrender an agreement of the daughter to pay him the amount of such legacy, is a bequest for a particular purpose, and hence is adeemed by payment by the testator, during his life of the daughter's debt to the son; 47 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 376. See ADEMPTION.

A legacy to a child is regarded in courts of equity as a portion for such child: hence, when the testator, after giving such a legacy, settles the child and gives a portion, it is regarded as an ademption of the legacy. And it will make no difference that the portion given in settlement is less than the legacy: it will still adeem the legacy pro tanto; 5 My. & C. 29; L. R. 14 Eq. 286; 16 N.Y. 9; 15 Pa. 212; 5 Rand. 577; 2 Story Eq. Jur. § 1111. See 81 Ga. 734; 126 Ill. 37. The principle of the ademption of legacies by gifts made during testator's life is applicable to a residuary legacy, where such appears to be the clear intent; 1 Misc. Rep. 58.

Payment of legacies. A legacy given generally, if no time of payment be named, is due at the death of the testator, although not payable until the executor has time to settle the estate in due course of law. See DEVISE. Legacies are not due by the civil law or the common law until one year after the decease of the testator and from that time interest is chargeable on them. The same term is generally allowed the executor in the American states to dispose of the estate and pay debts, and sometimes, by special order of the probate court, this is extended, from time to time, according to circumstances; 12 N. Y. 474; 41 N. H. 391; 21 Md. 156; 105 Mass. 431; Rop. Leg. 856; 4 Cl. & F. 276; 5 Binn. 475.

The great rule in legacies is, that if the testator's estate is not sufficient for paying all his debts and legacies, first, the debts must be paid in full; secondly, the specific legacies are to be paid; thirdly, general legacies are to be paid, in full if possible, if not, pro rata.

If given by will, an annuity is a legacy; 61 Miss. 372; and under a charge of legacies, an annuity will be included unless the testator expressly distinguishes between annuitants and legatees; 8 App. Cas. 989; 3 De G. & G. 601; 2 Ves. Jr. 216. See CHARGE.

An annuity given by will shall commence at the death of the testator, and the first payment fall due one year thereafter; 3 Madd. 167; 1 Sumn. 19; 42 Barb. 533; 5 W. & S. 30.

In the civil law a distinction is made between an annual legacy and the legacy of a usufruct in that whereas the legacy of a usufruct was only one legacy of a right to enjoy as long as it shall last, an annual legacy contained as many legacies as it may last years; Dom. Civ. L. § 3572; Mack. Rom. L. § 763; and a similar distinction is made between gifts of the income and profits of particular funds and annuities payable from time to time, in that the latter are at each time of payment gross sums to be regarded as separate legacies at each recurring period. In this respect it is often difficult to determine to which particular class a gift belongs. A bequest of the income of certain shares of bank stock during life was held not an annuity, and the devisee was required to pay the tax on the stock, the court admitting the difficulty and citing 18 Pick. 128, as an authority for the opposite view; 10 R. I. 455.

The importance of the distinction is evident when it is remembered that the gift of the produce of a fund, without limit as to time, has been held to amount to a gift of the fund itself whether the gift be made directly or through a trustee; 44 N. J. Eq. 450; 50 id. 522; 151 Mass. 241; while an annuity charged upon personalty is usually dependent on the legatee's life, the fund reverting to the residuary legatee; 6 Johns. Ch. 70; 125 Mass. 83.

It has been held that there is no substantial difference between the gift of an annuity for life and of the interest or income of a fund for life; nor between the gift simply of interest and of interest payable annually; 136 Pa. 374; 170 id. 242.

A distinction is taken between an annuity and a legacy, in the matter of interest. In the latter case, no interest begins to accumulate until the end of one year from the death of the testator; 1 Sch. & L. 301; 17 S. & R. 396; 2 Rop. Leg. 1253; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 652. In cases where a legacy is given a child as a portion, payable at a certain age, this will draw interest from the death of the testator; L. R. 1 Eq. 369; 11 Ves. 2; 5 Binn. 477, 479; 4 Rawle 118; but this rule does not apply when any other provision is made for the child; 9 Beav. 164; 19 Pa. 49; 16 N. J. Eq. 243; 41 N. H. 393; 14 Allen 239. The qualified recognition of a legacy by an executor will not carry with it the right to interest thereon, prior to demand for its delivery; 45 La. Ann. 962. See INTEREST.

Where legatees are under disabilities, as infancy or coverture, the executor cannot discharge himself by payment, except to some party having a legal right to receive the same on the part of the legatee, which in the case of an infant is the legally-appointed guardian; 1 Johns. Ch. 3; 106 Mass. 586; 1 P. Wms. 285; and, at common law, in the case of a married woman, the husband; 1 Vern. 261; but in the latter case the executor may decline to pay the legacy until the husband make a suitable provision out of it for the wife, according to the order of the court of chancery; 8 Bligh 224; Bisph. Eq. § 109. By statute in England and in some of the United States the executor is allowed in such cases to deposit the money on interest, subject to the order of the court of chancery; 2 Will. Ex. 1407.

The executor is liable for interest upon legacies, whenever he has realized it by investing the amount; L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233; 114 Mass. 404; 16 How. 542; and usually with annual rests; 29 Beav. 586; 23 N. J. Eq. 192; 109 Mass. 541. Where an executor was compelled to pay money out of his own funds on account of the devastavit of a co-executor, and the matter had lain along for many years on account of the infancy of the legatees, no interest was allowed under the special circumstances until the filing of the bill; 9 Vt. 41.

The better opinion is that at common law no action lay against an executor for a general legacy; 5 Term 690. But in case of a specific legacy it will lie after the assent of the executor; 5 Gray 67; 114 Mass. 26; and in the United States assumpsit will generally lie for all legacies even before assent by the executor; 30 N. H. 505; 6 N. J. L. 432; 12 Pa. 341; 2 Johns. 243; 6 Conn. 176; 2 Hayw. 153; 63 Me. 537.

The proper remedy for the recovery of a legacy is in equity; 5 Term 690; 35 N. H. 349; 71 N. C. 281; 35 N. H. 339; Wms. Ex. 2005. See 64 Vt. 598. In most of the United States statutory proceedings to recover legacies are provided in the orphans' or probate courts. As to federal jurisdiction over the administration of estates, see EXECUTOR.

By a recent statute in Louisiana it is provided that a legatee who has paid a debt for which bequeathed realty was mortgaged has no recourse against heirs or legatees under universal title; Laws 1896, ch. 72.

Doubtful points in the settlement of an estate are sometimes settled by mutual agreement of all parties interested, if sui juris; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 475. This right is sometimes extended by legislation permitting the executor, etc., in cases deemed proper by a court of equity, to bind future contingent interests of persons not capable of acting for themselves; id. See FAMILY ARRANGEMENT.

Satisfaction of debt by legacy. In courts of equity, if a legacy equal or exceed the debt, it is presumed to have been intended to go in satisfaction; but if the legacy be less than the debt, it shall not be deemed satisfaction pro tanto; 16 Vt. 150; 12 Mass. 391; 3 S. & R. 54; 8 Cow. 246; 1 Lowell 418. This rule, founded on a series of equity precedents, was said by Judge Redfield to maintain "a kind of dying existence;" 2 Redf. Wills 185, 186; and it is termed by a later author "whimsical and unsatisfactory"; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 469. See Bronson, J., in 2 Hill 576; Wms. Ex. 1297. The courts allow very slight circumstances to rebut this presumption of payment: as, where the debt was not contracted until after the making of the will; 2 P. Wms. 343; 3 P. Wms. 353; 4 Madd. 325; or the debt is unliquidated; 1 P. Wms. 299; or due upon a bill or note negotiable; 3 Ves. 561; 1 Root 159; 1 Allen 129; where the legacy is made payable after the debt falls due; 3 Atk. 96; where the intention appears otherwise; 2 Ves. 635; 2 G. & J. 185; 1 P. Wms. 410; or where the legacy is of a different nature from the debt; 1 Atk. 428; 3 id. 65; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1110. Satisfaction is not favored in America.

Release of debt by a legacy. If one leave a legacy to his debtor, it is not to be regarded as a release of the debt unless that appears to have been the intention of the testator; 4 Bro. C. C. 226; 15 Sim. Ch. 554; 5 Ala. 245; 153 Pa. 402; and parol evidence is admissible to prove this intention; 5 Ves. 341; 23 Beav. 404; 2 Dev. Ch. 488.

Where one appoints his debtor his executor, it is at law regarded as a release of the debt; Co. Litt. 264; 8 Co. 136 a; but this is now controlled by statute in England and in many of the United States; 116 Mass. 552; 15 Pa. 533; 9 Conn. 470; 7 Cow. 781. But in equity it is considered that the executor is still liable to account for the amount of his own debt; 13 Ves. Ch. 262, 264.

Where one appoints his creditor executor, and he has assets, it operates to discharge the debt, but not otherwise; 2 Will. Ex. 1316; 1 Salk. 304. See CHARGE; DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY; WILL.

LEGACY DUTY. A legacy tax in Great Britain, the rate of which rises according to the remoteness of the relationship of the legatee, and reaches its maximum where he is not related to the testator. See 53 L. J. Ch. 645; 26 Ch. Div. 538; COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX; TAX.

LEGAL. That which is according to law. It is used in opposition to equitable: as, the legal estate is in the trustee, the equitable estate in the cestui que trust.

LEGAL ASSETS. Such property of a testator in the hands of his executor as is liable to debts in temporal courts and to legacies in the spiritual, by course of law; equitable assets are such as are liable only by help of a court of equity. 2 Will. Ex. 1408–1431. The distinction is not important in the United States; 1 Ashm. 347. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 551; 2 Jarm. Wills, 543; Crosw. Ex. & Ad. 421, 423.

LEGAL CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

LEGAL CRUELTY. Such conduct on the part of a husband as will endanger the life, health, or limb of his wife, or create a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt; such acts as render cohabitation unsafe, or are likely to be attended with injury to the person or to the health of the wife; 36 Ga. 286; 2 Curt. Eccl. 281; 19 Cal. 626; 44 Ala. 698; 103 Ill. 477; 50 Wis. 254; 60 How. Pr. 151; 73 N. Y. 369; 33 N. J. Eq. 458. That which merely wounds the feelings without being accompanied by bodily injury or actual menace does not amount to legal cruelty; 30 Gratt. 307; 3 Metc. 257; 9 C. E. Greene 338; 10 Neb. 144; as the infliction of mental suffering cannot constitute cruelty unless it endangers the life or health of the person injured; [1895] Prob. 315; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 566; 48 La. Ann. 1194; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 328; but it has been held that there may be such legal cruelty as to endanger the health of the wife without threats of bodily injury; as where a husband subjected his wife to a severe course of what he deemed to be affectionate moral discipline, and by so doing broke down her health and rendered a serious malady imminent; L. R. 2 P. & M. 31; 111 Mass. 327; so compelling a wife to live at times in an attic without any conveniences whatever, leaving her for a period of six weeks without means to pay her board, and using insulting and abusive language to her is legal cruelty; 106 Mich. 646; and falsely accusing her of unchastity; 8 Ore. 100; 45 Mich. 150; 60 How. Pr. 151 (but contra where the husband has reason to suspect his wife of infidelity; 73 N. Y. 369). A public accusation of unchastity, either in or out of the presence of the wife, is a greater degree of legal cruelty than one made in private; 76 Ind. 136; 34 La. Ann. 611; 45 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 761; and it is legal cruelty for a wife to accuse her husband constantly, publicly, and without cause, of unfaithfulness to her, thereby disgracing him and endangering his means of livelihood; 49 Mich. 417; but it has been held that adultery itself is not cruelty; 54 Cal. 262. Where acts of violence have been condoned, wilfully depriving a wife of her proper position in the household, neglecting her, degrading her to the level of a servant, and compelling her to do the menial work of the house, and to take her meals and to sleep apart from the rest of the household, was held, in itself, legal cruelty; 72 L. T. 295. The husband is responsible for the ill-treatment of his wife by persons whom he supports in his house in spite of her remonstrances, and where she is justified in apprehensions of personal violence from them, she is entitled to a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and personal indignities; 9 Ore. 452; excessive sexual intercourse is legal cruelty, and it may be shown by the wife's testimony; 58 N. H. 569. See 32 N. J. Eq. 475. A husband who unreasonably and brutally effects sexual intercourse with his wife to the injury of her health, when he knows that it will cause her injury and suffering, is guilty of intolerable cruelty such as will authorize a divorce; 61 Conn. 233. The refusal of a husband to have sexual intercourse with his wife is not cruel and inhuman treatment or ground for a divorce à vinculo; 83 Wis. 553.

Desertion and failure to support a wife when during the time she had been seriously ill and greatly in need of the assistance, and of the society, nursing, and comfort of her husband, was held legal cruelty on the ground that it inflicted on her mental suffering and public disgrace; 79 Ind. 363. A wife is entitled to a divorce for legal cruelty where the acts complained of are the result of insane delusion; 33 N. J. Eq. 458. But it has been held that a single act of personal violence does not constitute cruelty; 51 Md. 72; and that insulting and degrading language to her is not ground for a divorce, although in case of actual cruelty it may be shown in aggravation; 69 Ala. 84; and misunderstandings and difficulties between husband and wife will not afford a foundation for a divorce; 34 La. Ann. 135; nor will a succession of petty annoyances, complaints, fault-finding, and disparagement of the husband's common sense constitute legal cruelty to him; 49 Mich. 639. In the case of Russell v. Russell the English court of appeal held that: (1) A false charge of having committed an unnatural crime circulated by a wife against her husband, although published to the world and persisted in after she did not believe its truth, is not sufficient evidence of legal cruelty to entitle the husband to a judicial separation; (2) but was enough to justify the court in refusing a petition of the wife for a restitution of conjugal rights; [1895] Prob. 315. This case had been tried before Pollock, B., and a special jury in April, 1895, and on questions put by the court to the jury, the latter found that Lady Russell had been guilty of cruelty, and that in her conduct and correspondence she had not acted bona fide. The judge (1) made a decree for judicial separation in favor of the husband and (2) dismissed the petition of the wife for restitution. On appeal of Lady Russell the decision was as stated supra, reversing on (1) and affirming on (2). Both parties appealed to the House of Lords, when the appeal of the countess was withdrawn and a motion for reinstatement denied, leaving the refusal of restitution by the court of appeal the final decision; while the decision that a judicial separation was not warranted was affirmed by the Lords; [1897] App. Cas. 395. See 23 Am. L. Reg. 640; CRUELTY; DIVORCE.

LEGAL DUTY. That which the law requires to be done or forborne to a determinate person, or to the public at large, and is correlative to a right vested in such determinate person. 111 N. C. 94. See DUTY.

LEGAL ESTATE. One the right to which may be enforced in a court of law.

It is distinguished from an equitable estate, the right to which can be established only in a court of equity.

The party who has the legal title has alone the right to seek a remedy for a wrong to his estate, in a court of law, though he may have no beneficial interest in it. The equitable owner is he who has not the legal estate, but is entitled to the beneficial interest.

The person who holds the legal estate for the benefit of another is called a trustee; he who has the beneficiary interest and does not hold the legal title is called the beneficiary, or, more technically, the cestui que trust.

When the latter has a claim, he must enforce his right in a court of equity, for he cannot sue any one at law in his own name; 1 East 497; 8 Term 322; 1 Saund. 158, n. 1; 2 Bingh. 20; still less can he in such court sue his own trustee; 1 East 497.

LEGAL FRAUD. See FRAUD.

LEGAL HEIRS. See HEIR, LEGAL.

LEGAL INCAPACITY. See INCAPACITY; LIMITATIONS.

LEGAL INTEREST. See INTEREST.

LEGAL IRREGULARITY. See IRREGULARITY.

LEGAL MALICE. An expression used as the equivalent to constructive malice or malice in law. 52 Me. 502. See MALICE.

LEGAL MERCHANDISE. Under the words "other legal merchandise" in a charter party, the charterer is at liberty to ship any lawful article he pleases, but is bound to pay the same amount of freight the vessel would have earned if loaded within the terms of the charter. 18 L. J. C. P. 74; 6 C. B. 791.

LEGAL MORTGAGE. A first mortgage. This is unquestionably so as regards land, because it is only the first mortgage which can grant the legal estate in land; and it has been held that where there was an agreement to give a legal mortgage of a ship, the expression signified a first mortgage. 11 W. R. 23.

LEGAL NEGLIGENCE. See NEGLIGENCE.

LEGAL NOTICE. Such notice as is adequate in point of law, such notice as the law requires to be given for the specific purpose or in the particular case. A legal notice to quit is a notice provided by law as distinguished from one provided by contract. 57 L. J. Q. B. 225; 20 Q. B. D. 374.

LEGAL OBLIGATION. See DUTY; OBLIGATION.

LEGAL PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES. See LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES.

LEGAL PROCESS. See PROCESS.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES. The primary meaning of the terms "representatives," "legal representatives," "personal representatives," or "legal personal representatives," is executors and administrators in their official capacity; 36 L. J. Ch. 793; L. R. 4 Eq. 359; and it cannot be construed as excluding them; 99 Mass. 342; see 45 N. Y. 563; 83 Me. 295; but the meaning may be controlled by the context; 32 Mo. App. 211. It may mean the next of kin; 8 W. N. C. Pa. 209; 4 De G. & J. 477; 26 Beav. 26; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 331; 28 L. J. Ch. 835; 16 Sim. 329. It has been held to mean next of kin according to the statute of distribution; 13 L. J. Ch. 147; Willard, Ex.; and heirs or legal descendants; 71 Ill. 91; and heirs, assignees or receivers; 26 Cal. 23; 78 Md. 59; 15 Ill. 574; 45 Ohio St. 133; 92 U. S. 724; see 117 U. S. 591, where the term was said to be not necessarily restricted to the personal representatives of the deceased, but is sufficiently broad to cover all persons who with respect to his property stand in his place and represent his interests, whether transferred to them by his act or by operation of law, reversing 11 Fed. Rep. 573. When used with reference to land, it ordinarily means those to whom the land descends; 130 Ind. 251. See PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES; LAPSED LEGACY.

Within the meaning of a life insurance policy it has been held to mean wife and children rather than administrators; 125 N. Y. 411, reversing 56 Hun 12; 28 Ill. App. 608; and the widow, orphan, heir, assign, or legatee of the member; 2 Mackey 70; but it has been held, where nothing shows that the words were used with a different meaning, the words legal representatives make the proceeds a part of the assets of the insured; 78 Ill. 147. The words families, heirs, or legal representatives are held to include those who would take property as in cases of intestacy; 112 N. Y. 627, reversing 43 Hun 472; and where the benefit appears to have been intended for the family it may mean heirs or next of kin; 41 Mo. 583.

The rule that devises lapse by the death of the devisee is not changed by adding to the devise the words "to have and to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns forever;" 113 N. Y. 396. See LAPSED DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY.

LEGAL TENDER. That currency which has been made suitable by law for the purposes of a tender in the payment of debts.

The following descriptions of money are legal tender in the United States:—

All the gold coins of the United States are a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, and, when reduced in weight below such standard tolerance, they are a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Treasury notes and standard silver dollars for all payments.

Silver coins of a smaller denomination than one dollar, for all sums not exceeding ten dollars.

The minor coins, five, three, two, and one cent pieces, for all amounts not exceeding twenty-five cents.

As to trade dollars, see DOLLAR. See EAGLE; HALF EAGLE.

By acts of Feb. 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, congress authorized the issue of notes of the United States, declaring them a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. 12 Stat. L. 345, 532, 709. These notes are obligations of the United States, and are exempt from state taxation; 7 Wall. 26; but where a state requires its taxes to be paid in coin, they cannot be discharged by a tender of these notes. A debt created prior to the passage of the legal tender acts, and payable by the express terms of the contract in gold and silver coins, cannot be satisfied by a tender of treasury notes; 7 Wall. 229, 258; 12 id. 687. The legal tender acts are constitutional as applied to pre-existing contracts, as well as to those made subsequent to their passage; 12 Wall. 457, per Strong, J., overruling the previous opinion of the court in 8 Wall. 604, per Chase, C. J. See 17 Am. L. Reg. 193; 19 id. 78; 25 id. 601. Congress has the constitutional power to make the treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, in time of peace as well as in time of war; 110 U. S. 421.

A postage currency has also been authorized, which was receivable in payment of all dues to the United States less than five dollars. They were not, however, a legal tender in payment of private debts. (Act of Congress, approved July 17, 1862.) See GOLD; MONEY; SILVER.

LEGALIS HOMO (Lat.). A person who stands rectus in curia, who possesses all his civil rights. A lawful man. One who stands rectus in curia, not outlawed nor infamous. In this sense are the words probi et legales homines.

LEGALIZATION. The act of making lawful.

By legalization is also understood the act by which a judge or competent officer authenticates a record, or other matter, in order that the same may be lawfully read in evidence.

LEGALIZE. To confirm acts already done, not to authorize new proceedings in the future. 102 Mass. 128.

LEGANTINE CONSTITUTIONS. The name of a code of ecclesiastical laws, enacted in national synods, held under legates from Pope Gregory IX. and Clement IV., in the reign of Hen. III., about the years 1220 and 1268. 1 Bla. Com. 83. Burn says, 1237 and 1268. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 30 d.

LEGATARY. One to whom anything is bequeathed; a legatee. This word is sometimes though seldom, used to designate a legate or nuncio.

LEGATEE. The person to whom a legacy is given.

The court will apply the popular rather than the technical meaning to the term "legatee" in a will, and read it as if it were "distributee," when, after looking at all the circumstances, and all the clauses of the will, the alternative is between this disposition and a total failure of the dispository scheme for want of certainty, and that seems to have been the testator's meaning; 23 Ga. 571. See LEGACY.

LEGATES. Legates are extraordinary ambassadors sent by the pope to catholic countries to represent him and to exercise his jurisdiction. They are distinguished from the ambassadors of the pope who are sent to other powers.

Legates à latere hold the first rank among those who are honored by a legation; they are always chosen from the college of cardinals, and are called à latere, in imitation of the magistrates of ancient Rome, who were taken from the court or side of the emperor.

Legati missi are simple envoys.

Legati nati are those who are entitled to be legates by birth.

Legati dati are those who have authority from the pope by special commissions. See A LATERE.

LEGATION. An embassy; a mission. All persons attached to a foreign legation, lawfully acknowledged by the government of this country, whether they are ambassadors, envoys, ministers, or attachés, are protected by the act of April 30, 1790, from violence, arrest, or molestation; 1 Dall. 117; 1 Wash. C. C. 232; 11 Wheat. 467; 1 Miles 366; 1 N. & M'C. 217; 1 Baldw. 240. See AMBASSADOR; ARREST; PRIVILEGE.

LEGATORY. The third part of a freeman's personal estate, which by the custom of London, in case he had a wife and children, the freeman might always have disposed of by will. Bacon, Abr. Customs of London (D 4). See DEAD MAN'S PART.

LEGATUM. A legacy given to the church or an accustomed mortuary. Cowel.

LEGEM HABERE. Capable of giving evidence upon oath.

LEGEM SCISCERE (Lat.). To give consent or authority to a proposed law.

LEGES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Laws proposed by a magistrate of the senate and adopted by the whole people in comitia centuriata. See POPULISCITUM; LEX.

In English Law. Laws.

Leges scriptæ, written or statute laws.

Leges non scriptæ, unwritten or customary laws; the common law, including general customs, or the common law properly so called; and also particular customs of certain parts of the kingdom, and those particular laws that are, by custom, observed only in certain courts and jurisdictions. 1 Bla. Com. 67. "These parts of law are therefore styled leges non scriptæ, because their original institution and authority are not set down in writing, as acts of parliament are, but they receive their binding force from long and immemorial usage." 1 Steph. Com. 40, 46. See LAW; JUS; LEX.

LEGES JULIÆ. Laws enacted during the reign of Augustus or of Julius Cæsar which, with the lex abutia, effectually abolished the legis actiones.

Lex Julia Ambitus, A law to repress illegal methods of seeking office. Inst. 4, 18.

Lex Julia cessio Bonorum. A law allowing debtors to make a voluntary assignment of their property. Inst. 3, 12; Sohm, Rom. L. 211.

Lex Julia de Adulteriis. The law relating (1) to divorce, requiring the presence of seven witnesses and a libellus repudii to show the fact of repudiation and (2) prohibiting the husband from alienating or mortgaging any fundus italicus comprised in the dos. This provision was extended by Justinian to any fundus dotalis whatever. Sohm, Rom. L. 374, 382.

Lex Julia de Annona. A law to repress combinations for heightening the price of provisions.

Lex Julia de Maritandis Ordinibus. A law forbidding senators and their children to intermarry with freedmen or infames, and freedmen to marry infames. Inst. 2, 9.

Lex Julia de Residuis. A law punishing those who gave an incomplete account of public money committed to their charge. Inst. 4, 18.

Lex Julia et Papia Poppæ. See LEX PAPIA POPPÆ.

Lex Julia Majestatis. A law which inflicted the punishment of death on all who attempted anything against the emperor or state, and condemning the wrongdoer after his death. Inst. 4, 18.

Lex Julia Peculatus. A law punishing those who had stolen public money or property or anything sacred or religious. Magistrates and those who had aided them in stealing public money during their administration were punished capitally; other persons were deported. Inst. 4, 18, 9.

Lex Julia Repetundarum. A law for the punishment of magistrates and judges who received bribes. Inst. 4, 18.

LEGIOSUS. Subjected to a course of the law. Cow.

LEGIS ACTIO. Actio represented a right of the plaintiff not only as against the defendant, but also against the magistrate—a right to have a judicium placed at his disposal or to have a private individual appointed for the purpose of deciding by his judgment the question at issue between him and his adversary. The actio rested in early times on lex or on custom with the force of lex, and for this reason it was called legis actio.

There were five of the legis actiones: (1) the legis actio sacramenti, (2) the legis actio per judicis postulationem, (3) the legis actio per condictionem, (4) the legis actio per manus injectionem, (5) the legis actio per pignoris capionem. Private law granted a legis actio either directly or indirectly, and a private right which was not directly enforceable by the ordinary civil procedure could nevertheless secure a trial or actio by a solemn affirmation or a solemn act of execution, which latter could be either personal or real. The general form of action was actio sacramenti, the other forms being restricted to such cases as were determined by statute (lex) or ancient custom with statutory force. The special legis actiones were all modes of enforcing obligatory rights, or, in other words, they were forms of so-called personal actions. But whenever the claim was not personal, but real, the legis actio sacramenti was the sole form available. Sohm, Rom. L. 153.

The procedure in these actions was open only to Roman citizens and the parties were almost always obliged to appear personally, but an assertor libertatis could appear to claim the freedom of a person wrongfully treated as a slave. The necessity of adherence to the prescribed forms was so rigid that if, in an action for damage to a vineyard, the plaintiff used the word vites instead of the general word arbores employed in the law of the Twelve Tables, he lost his action, and if an action failed, even on the most technical ground, the plaintiff had no further legal remedy. The sentence was ordinarily to give the thing demanded, not a pecuniary equivalent. Sand. Just. Introd. § 96.

LEGISLATION. The act of giving or enacting laws. See STATUTE; CONSTITUTIONAL; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

LEGISLATIVE POWER. Authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the enactment of laws as distinguished from the executive and judicial functions. The law-making power of a sovereign state.

The authority conferred by or exercised under the constitution of a state or of the United States, to make new laws or to alter or repeal existing ones.

A law in the sense in which the word is implied in these definitions is a rule of civil conduct, or a statute described by the legislative will, and not law in the more general sense in which the term is applicable to that which owes its origin, either wholly or in part, to the judicial power. See LAW; JUDGE-MADE LAW; JUDICIAL POWER. The separation of the three powers of government which underlie all modern civilized government has been discussed under the title EXECUTIVE POWER, in which, as well as in the title JUDICIAL POWER, many of the questions arising in connection with the difference of the spheres of action of these three powers have been discussed, and to these titles reference should be made and they should be read in connection with this title.

"Legislation is essentially an act of sovereign power; . . . the very definition of law, . . . shows the intrinsic superiority of the legislature. It may be said, the power of the legislature, also, is limited by prescribed rules. It is so. But it is nevertheless the power of the people and sovereign as far as it extends." Gibson, J., in 12 S. & R. 330.

"Plenary power in the legislature for all the purposes of civil government is the rule. A prohibition to exercise a particular power is the exception." 15 N. Y. 532.

"The legislative power of a state extends to everything within the sphere of such power, except as it is restricted by the Federal Constitution or that of the state." Swayne, J., in 19 Wall. 576.

"The state does not act by its people in their collective capacity, but through such political agencies as are duly constituted and established. The legislative power is the supreme authority except as limited by the constitution of the state, and the sovereignty of the people is exercised through their representatives in the legislature, unless, by the fundamental law, power is elsewhere reposed." Fuller, C. J., in 146 U. S. 25. "Irrespective of the operation of the Federal Constitution and restrictions asserted to be inherent in the nature of American institutions, the general rule is that there are no limitations upon the legislative power of the legislature of a state, except those imposed by its written constitutions." Fuller, C. J., in 148 U. S. 661.

It is in the legislative department that the supreme and absolute authority is vested; 1 Bla. Com. 52, 142; Locke, Govt. ch. xii. xiii. par. 153.

"The legislative power is that which has the right to direct how the force of the community shall be employed for preserving the community and the members of it." Locke, Govt. ch. xii. par. 143. But it was only upon the ruins of the royal prerogative, so far as concerned the right to dispense with any statute, that the foundations were laid on which by a steady, if at times an interrupted growth, was built up the final omnipotence of parliament. The power of the king was defined by the decision in Godden v. Hales, Comb. 21; S. C. Show. 475. See also 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 29, n.

A state constitution, adopted before that of the United States, is a result of all the plenary legislative power of the people untrammelled by any higher law; 154 N.Y. 61.

It has always been understood that the sovereignty of the federal government is in congress, though limited to specified objects. "The wisdom and the discretion of congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied, to secure them from its abuse." 9 Wheat. 187, per Marshall, C. J.

Legislative discretion is of two kinds, legal and political. "Legal discretion is limited. It is thus defined by Lord Coke: Discretio est discernere per legem quid sit justum. Political discretion has a wider range. It embraces, combines, and considers all circumstances, events, and projects, foreign or domestic, that can affect the national interests. Legal discretion has not the means of ascertaining the grounds on which political discretion may have proceeded." Hall, Am. L. J. 255.

While each of the three departments of government is essential to the existence of a state, as modern government is understood, it is undoubtedly true that the strongest is the legislative. That would result from its control of the public purse, if from nothing else; but notwithstanding this fact, the judiciary which is in theory the weakest of the departments has held its own place as a co-equal and co-ordinate department, and after the lapse of a century it is said "that the three departments still retain their balance, each with its prerogatives unimpaired." 1 Fost. Const. § 45.

Besides the vantage ground which the legislative department naturally occupies as contrasted with the other two by reason of the character of its functions, it has been said that it is the branch of the government which has grown the most. And it is suggested, that coming as it does from the people, much is tolerated which would not be permitted in the other departments; Miller, Const. U. S. 95. It has been maintained by some writers that congress has encroached permanently upon the other departments, but this opinion is controverted; 1 Fost. Const. § 45, n. 11. There is no question as to the importance of the constitutional restraint upon the power of congress. Montesquieu said that the English constitution would perish if the legislative power should become more corrupt than the executive; and a later writer considered that while it was important to restrain the executive power, it was still more important to restrain the legislative; De Lolme, Const. 190.

It has been said that: "in the United States, all legislative power exists in two forms, viz.:—1st. As political or sovereign power, the nation as a whole embodying the political sovereignty supreme and unlimited; 2d. As civil or delegated power, the legislature representing the legal sovereignty as bounded by constitutional limitations. Political legislation, therefore, being among the powers of sovereignty, belongs exclusively to the people as a nation.

Civil legislation, being morally an act of agency performed by the delegates or representatives of the people, belongs to the legislature proper, and indirectly to the judiciary in the exercise of a supervisory power arising out of actual controversy. In the hierarchy of government the people frame the constitution, the constitution creates the legislature, and the legislature enacts the laws." Ordron. Const. Leg. 15.

The legislative institutions of England are considered by the best constitutional historians to have been of Teutonic origin; id. 62; Freeman, Eng. Const. 18.

The ancient Teutonic assembly in its twofold operation is thus described by Tacitus: "About minor matters the chiefs deliberate; about the more important, the whole tribe. Yet even when the formal decision rests with the people, the affair is always thoroughly discussed by the chiefs. They assemble, except in the case of sudden emergency, on certain fixed days, either at new or at full moon, for this they consider the most auspicious season for the transaction of business. Their freedom has this disadvantage, that they do not meet simultaneously, or as they are bidden, but two or three days are wasted in the delays of assembling. When the multitude think proper, they sit down armed. Silence is proclaimed by the priests, who have on these occasions the right of keeping order. Then the king or the chief, according to age, birth, distinction in war, or eloquence, is heard, more because he has influence to persuade, than because he has power to command. If his sentiments displease them, they reject them with murmurs; if they are satisfied, they brandish their spears. The most complimentary form of assent is to express approbation with their weapons." Church and Brodribb's translation of Agricola and Germania, 95, 96.

"Such," it is said, "was the earliest form of our racial legislature of which there is record. And in it were the germs of all that came after it. The essential features of Saxon markmoot, shiremoot, folkmoot and witenagemot; of Norman great council; of parliament; of colonial and state legislature; and of the American congress, were historically derived from this ancient and original Teutonic source." Stevens, Sources of the Constitution 60.

The same view of the origin of our legislative institutions is taken by another writer on the subject who says: "The present congress of the United States is a national legislature, and its source may be traced through the British parliament to the meetings in the woods described by Tacitus." 1 Fost. Const. 307. So also it was said by the great Frenchman by whom first was given verbal expression to the modern system of government: "Ce beau système a été trouvé dans les bois." (This splendid system was found in the forest.) Montesquieu, L'Esprit des Lois, xi. ch. vi. Foster gives an interesting account of some primitive legislative assemblies of a whole people which are still in existence; of which probably no more perfect democracy has ever existed than the town meeting of New England. See 1 Fost. Const. § 47; Spencer, Pol. Inst. § 491; TOWN MEETING.

Going back still further it is said that the Aryan instinct of popular government finds expression in representative government, and confides the law-making power to a legislature rather than to a personal sovereign, the latter system being always adhered to among the Oriental nations and those of Europe not affected by Aryan origin or admixture: Ordronaux, Const. Leg. 5.

The legislative system of America is undoubtedly derived from that of England; the senate being a development from the house of lords and the privy council, and the house of representatives confessedly from the house of commons. The earliest impressions which were received of legislative authority in England, reflected the characteristic powers "of ancient Teutonic assemblies,—the exercise of authority over tribal or national affairs, and the combining of judicial with legislative functions." Stevens, Sources of the Constitution 86. This authority gives an interesting and instructive sketch of the growth of legislative power as it is known in England and America. Prior to Edward the Confessor, the powers of the witenagemot were very great, extending to the making and unmaking of kings; including lease, taxation, treaties, land grants, control of military and naval forces, and ecclesiastical officers, including also the functions of a supreme court of justice. It survived the Norman conquest theoretically with the same powers, but practically they were minimized by the conqueror and his successors at the same time that they observed the formality of professing to act by its counsel and advice. With the Plantagenets the legislative power increased, and under Edward I. parliament attained the perfected organization of the two houses, and the essentials of its subsequent authority which was subject to fluctuations. Subsequent alternations of power and weakness led up to the contest with the Stuarts and the final overthrow both of the throne and the lords, which, it is said, was "so disastrous that neither has since fully recovered the place once held in the fabric of the state." After a partial reaction, the revolution of 1688 finally established the legislative power in England, and through the opposing forces of the rise of the cabinet system, the feebleness of the first two Georges, and on the other hand, the assertion of the royal power by George III., there happened to be at the period of colonial growth in America, and the establishment of American independence, that condition of distinct and independent executive and legislative power which left its impress upon the American constitutions; although in England the result of the cabinet system was the development of the final domination of the crown by parliament; id. ch. 4.

The same author finds several points in which the legislative procedure in the United States is traced naturally to that of England. The system of originating legislation by bills passed by both houses and submitted to the approval or veto of the executive, he traces back to the period when parliament began to take the initiative, and legislation arose from its petitions to the king. A like origin is attributed to certain privileges possessed by each house, such as, on the one hand, the judicial rights of the senate and the power of impeachment and of initiating money bills in the house. So also the privileges of members of both houses of freedom of speech, freedom from arrest, and the provision that each house is the judge of the election and qualification of its members; id.

Most of the American constitutions provide, in express though in different terms, for the separation of the three powers of government. See EXECUTIVE POWER. The constitutions of the United States, and a few of the states, do not have such a formal provision, but simply vest in the legislature, the legislative power; in the courts, the judicial power; in the executive, the executive power. These various constitutional provisions are collected in Stimson, Am. Stat. L. § 200. In most of them there is not only an express separation of powers, but also a prohibition against the assumption or discharge of the functions of any one department by a person or persons exercising the functions of another. And the Ohio constitution, Art. 2, § 32, provides that the legislature can exercise no judicial power not expressly conferred by the constitution. It is generally conceded, however, that those constitutions which simply vest the three powers in three distinct departments operate as clearly and distinctly as enjoining the separation of the departments as those in which there is an express provision, and this may be accepted as a settled principle of American constitutional law. In an early case it was said that "no power can be properly a legislative and properly a judicial power at the same time; and as to mixed powers, the separation of the departments in the manner prescribed by the constitution precludes the possibility of their existence." 2 D. Chip. 77. It is true, as suggested by another court, that there are many minor duties devolving upon a government which cannot be assigned, strictly speaking, to any one of the three departments; 34 Cal. 520. A suggestion has been made to characterize these nondescript duties as "administrative," but it is very truly remarked that this "does not much mend the matter, for it is at once obvious that this does not make a fourth department, but merely gives a name to a group of duties taken from the legislative and executive departments." 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 438. It might be added that the term administrative in this sense might have an application under the systems of continental Europe, where the executive exercises certain legislative functions not belonging to the office as we understand it. See EXECUTIVE POWER. The three departments are not merely equal, but exclusive, in respect to their duties, and absolutely independent of each other; 109 Ind. 8; one cannot inquire into the motives underlying the action of another; 8 id. 298. The executive power is much more easily defined than the other two. The greater difficulty of determining the boundary line between legislative and judicial power has been already alluded to under the latter title, as also have some of the reasons why the legislature has continued to exercise some powers which in their nature are judicial, even after the general acceptance of the theory that they should be separated. The difficulties of the subject arise more particularly in the determination of what are legislative and what are judicial acts, rather than in the scientific definition of the distinctive powers. The statement of the principles upon which the definitions rest is comparatively easy, and the cases abound in statements which in varying terms express the difference with sufficient accuracy; some of these cases have been cited in the other titles referred to. A terse expression is that of Mr. Justice Field: "The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of the parties are, with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it." 99 U. S. 761. Another early statement of the distinction is: "A marked difference exists between the employment of judicial and legislative tribunals. The former decide upon the legality of claims and conduct, and the latter make rules upon which, in connection with the constitution, those decisions should be founded. It is the province of judges to determine what the law is upon existing cases. In fine, the law is applied by the one and made by the other. To do the first, therefore, to compare the claims of the parties with the law of the land before established, is, in its nature, a judicial act. But to do the last, to pass new rules for the regulation of new controversies, is, in its nature, a legislative act." 1 N. H. 204. "The distinction between legislative and judicial acts is that the former establishes a rule regulating and governing matters occurring after its passage, while the latter determines rights and obligations concerning matters which already exist, and have transpired before the judicial power is invoked to pass upon them." 68 Cal. 197; 4 Ill. 238; 1 N. H. 204. In cases where the doubt can be otherwise resolved, probably the best solution of the difficulty may be found in the suggestion that: "Since the legislative department is the broadest in scope, and perhaps corresponds most nearly to the original depositary of all the powers," or, it might be added, of the ultimate sovereignty, "it seems logical to leave to it the residuum, and say that everything not clearly executive or clearly judicial is legislative." 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 438. "And, in general, it is to be borne in mind that the question always is, not what is the etymological meaning of legislative and judicial, but what were in fact the functions of legislature and courts, respectively, at the time the constitution in question was framed." Id.; 30 W. Va. 482; 55 N. H. 179.

It is of course to be borne in mind that this question is to be dealt with, so far as the states are concerned, solely with reference to the state constitution. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States which forbids the legislature of a state to exercise judicial functions; 2 Pet. 413.

In the earlier development of constitutional government in the United States the separation of the powers of government was less strictly observed than has been necessarily done under the later constitutions, in which it is expressly provided for and insisted upon; it may be remarked that the provisions of later constitutions on this subject are directed more particularly to the restraint of the legislative power within what are considered its proper bounds, with the view to abolish or avoid the abuses thought to attend the exercise of it in the past.

Mr. Justice Miller, in alluding to the settlement of the principle that the courts under the United States constitution are purely judicial bodies, observes that, under United States laws, the converse of this proposition does not hold good as to legislative bodies. He illustrates this by a case in which it was held that a territorial statute of Oregon divorcing a husband and wife, the former being a resident of Oregon and the latter with her children residents of Ohio, where they had been left by the husband under a promise to return or send for them, was a legitimate exercise of legislative power according to the then prevailing judicial opinion of the country, and the understanding of the legal profession at the date of the act creating the territorial government; 125 U. S. 190; and he adds by way of comment: "So extreme a case as this, where manifest injustice was done under the form of law, shows that legislatures ought not to exercise judicial powers; or, at least, if they do exercise them, should be required to cite in all interested parties before they do it." Miller, Const. U. S. 356. The passage of divorce bills by legislatures has, at times, been very frequent in some states; but the tendency of public opinion is decidedly in the line of the comment of Mr. Justice Miller above cited. It is undoubtedly the most extreme case of exercise of legislative power which verges nearly upon the judicial.

In many of the later state constitutions the legislature is expressly prohibited from passing divorce bills, but in the absence of such provision it has been held that the legislature has the power; 2 Kelly 191; 8 Yerg. 77; 125 U. S. 190. The recognition of this power in the United States was simply a continuance of the rule which was in force in England at the time of our independence; and it was treated as a matter of history that the power existed. The English parliament has always passed such bills, and may do so at the present time, except so far as the power may be considered modified by the divorce act of 1857; L. R. 11 App. Cas. 294; 12 id. 312, 361, 364; 13 id. 741.

In states where there was an express division of governmental powers the question has arisen in several cases whether the power to grant a divorce was so far judicial as to make its exercise by the legislature unconstitutional. It has been so held in several cases; 4 Mo. 147; 12 id. 498; 17 id. 590; 28 id. 192; 4 Fla. 23; see 12 Pa. 351. In some cases it has been held that a legislative divorce was valid where the court had no jurisdiction; 51 Me. 480; 2 G. Greene 604; but not otherwise, under a constitution separating the powers; 16 Me. 479. On the other hand it has been held that such action by the legislature is not an invasion of the judicial power; 8 Conn. 547; 2 Md. 429; 2 Wash. Ter. 3; and the United States supreme court in a case cited supra held that the separation of governmental powers, and the implied prohibitions resulting therefrom were not intended to exclude the legislative power over the marriage relation; 125 U. S. 190.

In Delaware, where the practice of legislative divorces has always prevailed, while as an original question it was considered that the power might be doubted, it was considered that too many rights of person and property would be disturbed to warrant the court in doing otherwise than to uphold legislative divorces; 4 Harring. 442. And in Kentucky there have been a number of intimations on the subject, the result of which seems to be that the separation of the governmental powers would be violated by legislative divorces; 3 B. Monroe 90; at least after the commencement of a suit in the courts; 9 id. 295; that where it was founded on the application of one party for breach of contract by the other, it was judicial; 7 Dana 184; but not where it was for the benefit of and acquiesced in by both parties; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 319. The theory of the last case would seem to violate the doctrine which underlies divorce as a judicial proceeding, that no divorce should be obtainable by collusion. It is very well understood that this principle is constantly violated, but usually sub silentio and certainly without formal recognition by the court. See also 18 L. R. A. 95, where cases arising under different constitutional provisions are collected; DIVORCE.

In some early cases efforts were made to obtain legislative relief from what were considered "hard cases" in the courts, and acts granting an appeal in a special case were held to be an encroachment upon the judicial power; 2 D. Chip. 77; 3 Greenl. 298; but in a similar case from Connecticut it was held an act of judicial and not legislative authority, but was sustained upon the ground that under the then existing constitution of Connecticut, judicial power was not forbidden to the legislature; 3 Dall. 398. Though the idea of the effect of the constitutional separation of powers was not at first easily understood, it was made apparent as cases were passed upon by the courts that their judgments were subject to no control by the other departments of the government except such as might be given to them by constitutional provisions concerning pardons; 31 Gratt. 105; nor is interference by the legislature permissible "to change the decision of cases pending before the courts, or to impair or set aside their judgments, or to take cases out of the general courts of judicial proceedings;" 2 Allen 361. It has been held that the legislature cannot regulate the issuing of injunctions; 5 Cal. 73; interpret such existing laws as do not apply to its own duties; 43 Mo. 410; 16 N. Y. 424; grant a new trial, or direct the court to order it; 15 Pa. 18; open a judgment to let in garnishees to amend and set aside a verdict obtained against them; 4 R. I. 324; make a judgment of a justice of the peace final and conclusive (under the constitution of the state); 5 Ark. 358; authorize the sale and conversion into personalty of land devised in perpetuity for a charitable use; 1 Houst. 580; give construction to a charter; 64 Miss. 378; legalize defective pleadings without first requiring them to be amended; 31 Cal. 196; remit fines and forfeitures; 26 Ala. 439; provide by resolution that a criminal should be discharged by a court; 7 Humph. 152; validate a transaction which the courts have held void; 129 Mass. 559; or ascertain indebtedness and direct payment between parties; 10 Yerg. 59; 4 Ill. 238. In short, the determination of a question of right, or obligation, or of property as the foundation of a proceeding is a judicial act and not within the legislative power; 68 Cal. 197; 99 U. S. 761. The legislature cannot declare what the law was, but what it will be; 2 Cra. 272.

"It is perhaps true that the lines which separate the legislative and the judicial power are sometimes not very clearly defined, but they are becoming more and more so. That is a judicial power which, in a controversy, decides the right to property between citizens or proper parties. Such a determination is not a legislative power. If a legislature, or at least such a body acting within the dominion of the government of the United States, should undertake to declare that certain property which belonged to A should become the property of B, it would be an invasion of the judicial function, and therefore wholly inoperative and void. No court would hesitate to declare that such a determination was within the province of the courts alone; that the legislature could not effect it, because of this separation of the judicial and legislative powers which is made by the constitution." Miller, Const. U. S. 348. See 1 De Tocqueville, Dem. in America 83.

The legislature has power when unrestrained by a constitutional provision to make a void thing valid by a curative statute; 18 Ind. 258; to declare that executions provisionally issued by justices of the peace, more than two and less than five years after the judgments on which they were issued were rendered, shall not be invalid on that account; 19 Miss. 17; or to authorize the reopening of judgments in which the state is plaintiff for the purpose of setting up a new defence; 26 Cal. 135. But it cannot overthrow judgments by legislative mandate, curative statutes, or otherwise; 107 Ind. 31; nor render valid a judgment which would otherwise be void, since the effect would be the rendition of a judgment by the legislature which is beyond its power; 58 Mich. 364; 40 N. J. L. 383; even if expository statutes be held effective from their date, being practically a new enactment to give them retroactive effect would reverse decisions already made, and they cannot control the interpretation of the courts in dealing with causes of action already accrued; 2 Cra. 194; 11 Mass. 396; 11 Pa. 489; Cooley, Const. Lim. [94]; 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 440. See RETROSPECTIVE; STATUTE; EX POST FACTO.

In most of the cases above referred to the distinction between judicial and legislative power is sharply defined, but the cases which present difficulty are of a different character. Cases of a class presenting more difficulty arise under statutes authorizing the organization of municipal corporations and the change of their boundaries by the courts. Such acts have been held to present judicial questions; 43 Ia. 252; 23 Neb. 426; 42 Kan. 627; 44 id. 577; 46 id. 738; 5 id. 673. A critical examination of these cases and the authorities upon which they were based results in the conclusion that they did not "afford a very secure foundation for a decision that needs authority to rest on and . . . will be generally regarded as out of harmony with the principles heretofore laid down as settled." The real nature of the proceedings it is said are "more apparent in the Kansas cases because they masquerade less in the guise of an ordinary lawsuit." 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 443. The writer just cited suggests that the mere necessity of determining facts does not constitute a judicial act, nor is a question judicial simply because it calls for judgment and discretion. The subdivision of a state for the purpose of local government is preeminently a subject for legislative action. The practical effect of the Kansas statute was said by the court to be the submission to a judge in advance of its enactment the question of the legality of a city ordinance; 43 Kan. 633; and this it is suggested was sufficient to cast doubt upon its validity.

The decision of questions of public policy relating to the organization of municipal corporations cannot be exercised by a judge, but properly belongs to the legislative department; 54 N. J. L. 288; in this case it was held that a justice of the supreme court could not be authorized by an act of assembly to decide within what territory resident voters should be permitted to assume municipal existence and authority. It is well settled that mere abstract questions or moot cases cannot be submitted for the decision of the court; Cooley, Const. L. 139; 1 Ind. 21; 8 Mo. 313; accordingly it has been held that: "Whether cities, towns or villages should be incorporated, whether enlarged or contracted in their boundaries, presents no question of law or fact for judicial determination. It is purely a question of policy to be determined by the legislative department." 75 Ill. 152; 32 Minn. 540; 29 Mich. 451; 24 N. Y. 86; 70 Cal. 461. Upon the same principle it was held that the division of a state into drainage districts and their organization was a legislative function and could not be delegated to executive officers if it could be delegated at all; 58 Cal. 624. So an act authorizing a court upon petition of taxpayers to supersede, revoke, and annul municipal ordinances was a grant of legislative power and void; 30 W. Va. 479; there is no legislative power to confer upon the judiciary the power of taxation; 43 N. J. L. 348; or to require courts to state in writing the reasons of their decisions; 13 Cal. 24; or to appoint surveyors; 58 Mich. 364; or judges to write headnotes for their opinions; 118 Ind. 88; or to fix railroad rates of transportation; 72 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 713.

But courts have no power to inquire into the necessity for an act creating a new judicial district, as that is purely a legislative question; 32 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 850.

The question whether a law is wise or just is a legislative and not a judicial question; 130 U. S. 581. So congress can determine whether claims upon the public treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations, and upon principles of right and justice; and having decided such questions in the affirmative, and having appropriated public money for the payment of such claims, its decision can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the government; 163 U. S. 427.

The courts have no power to inquire whether notice of an application to the legislature for local or special legislation required by the state constitution, and legislation defining it, has been given. But the legislature is the sole judge of that, and the passage of an act is a legislative judgment that it was properly done; 29 Fla. 1.

The provision of the Chinese Deportation Act of May 6, 1892, which puts the burden of proof upon a Chinese laborer arrested for having no certificate, and requires proof by one capable white witness that he was a resident of the United States at the time of the passage of the act, is within the legislative power to prescribe rules with respect to the admissibility and effect of evidence; 149 U. S. 698.

Legislative power to pass a statute is not established by the enactment of previous statutes of the same character, unless such legislation has been uniform and its validity acquiesced in; 6 App. Div. N. Y. 277.

The legislative power has been held to authorize acts—to make conspiracy to do an act punishable more severely than the doing of the act itself; 159 U. S. 590; to prohibit the removal into a court of errors and appeals of cases of contested elections; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 380; to provide that courts shall be open at any place in the district where the judge may be; 42 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 167; to deprive individuals of the right to engage in liquor traffic, though such power is not expressly granted by the constitution, and there is a general reservation to the people of all rights not enumerated; 42 S. C. 222; to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; 123 U. S. 623; to authorize a particular person to act as guardian without bond; 116 N. C. 795; to convert real into personal estate for purposes beneficial to those interested, not sui juris; 16 Mass. 326; but not for those who are qui juris; 53 N. Y. 245; 2 Seld. 358.

A provision in the charter of a railroad company authorizing the guardian of a minor to agree upon the amount of damages for taking the land of a minor is not an invasion of the judicial power but is an exercise of legislative power only; 69 Miss. 939.

The legislature has no power to reimburse a public officer for money lost in his official capacity, particularly where the money belonged to the state school fund, and was not raised by taxation; and the officer repaid the money lost out of his private funds; 138 Ind. 321.

A question which has given rise to much discussion is the authority of the legislature to require what are known as advisory opinions from courts or judges upon general questions submitted as distinguished from the questions naturally arising in a litigated case. As to the effect of such opinions as precedents, see PRECEDENT. It was early settled as to the federal judges that their judicial duties did not require or empower them to answer such questions; see 4 Am. Jur. 293: 2 Dall. 410, n.; 13 How. 52, n. In some states there are constitutional provisions authorizing the request for such opinions, and in other states there are statutes merely, at least one of which has been held unconstitutional; 10 Minn. 78; s. c. 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 181–3, and notes; and it has been said, "one would expect the same decision with regard to the others if they were contested;" 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 456.

In Massachusetts, where there is a constitutional authority for such questions (with reference to a statute making education compulsory), the justices declined to give an opinion when "required" to do so by the legislature, assigning the reason that the legislature had power to ask for such opinions only "upon important questions of law and upon solemn occasions;" 148 Mass. 623. This decision is criticised in an elaborate article, which discusses the power historically and reviews the opinions given by judges in all the states having constitutional provisions on the subject; 24 Am. L. Rev. 369. See also 126 Mass. 557; Thayer, Legal Effect of Opinions of Judges (Pamphlet).

Not only is it beyond the power of the legislature to confer non-judicial functions upon courts and judges, but also, to vest judicial power in any one else. Hence a statute authorizing the election, by agreement of parties, of a member of the bar to try a case in which a judge is interested, was held void; 39 Wis. 390.

Congress can neither withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which from its nature is the subject of a suit at common law, or in equity, or admiralty, nor bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination; 18 How. 272.

As to the legislative power to provide for taking private property for public use, and the legislative function of determining what is a public use, see EMINENT DOMAIN.

As to the authority of the courts to declare statutes unconstitutional and invalid, see CONSTITUTIONAL and JUDICIAL POWER. In the former is also discussed the theory sometimes advanced, but having no substantial basis of authority, that upon some higher ground than that of constitutionality the acts of the legislature may be reviewed by the courts. In a line with the authorities there cited on this subject, and speaking upon the point that the legislative power operating upon proper subject-matter is uncontrolled otherwise than by constitutional restriction, it was said by Storrs, J., speaking for the supreme court of Connecticut: "The defendant insists that we should pronounce the law now in question to be void, on the ground that it is opposed to natural right, and the fundamental principles of civil liberty. We are by no means prepared to accede to the doctrine involved in this claim, that, under a written constitution like ours, in which the three great departments of government, the executive, legislative, and judicial, are confided to distinct bodies of magistracy, the powers of each of which are expressly confined to its own proper department, and in which the powers of each are unlimited in its appropriate sphere, except so far as they are abridged by the constitution itself, it is competent for the judicial department to deprive the legislature of powers which they are not restricted from exercising by that instrument. It would seem to be sufficient to prevent us from thus interposing, that the power exercised by the legislature is properly legislative in its character, which is unquestionably the case with respect to the law we have been considering, and that the constitution contains no restriction upon its exercise in regard to the subject of it." 25 Conn. 290. "I am opposed to the judiciary attempting to set bounds to legislative authority, or declaring a statute invalid upon any fanciful theory of higher law or first principles of natural right outside the constitution. If the courts may imply limitation, there is no bound to implication except judicial discretion, which must place the courts above the legislature and also the constitution itself. This is hostile to the theory of the government. The constitution is the only standard for the courts to determine the question of statutory validity." Hubbard, J., in 13 N. Y. 378; 13 N. Y. 430; Iredell, J., in 3 Dall. 386.

It is well settled that the validity of an exercise of legislative power is presumed, and must be sustained by the court unless it can be clearly shown to be in conflict with the constitution. The principle is thus well stated: "But it is to be borne in mind, that in determining the question whether a statute is within the legitimate sphere of legislative action, it is the duty of courts to make all reasonable presumptions in favor of its validity. It is not to be supposed that the law-making power has transcended its authority, or committed, under the form of law, a violation of individual rights. When an act has been passed with all the requisites necessary to give it the force of a binding statute, it must be regarded as valid, unless it can be clearly shown to be in conflict with the constitution. It is therefore incumbent on those who deny the validity of a statute, to show that it is a plain and palpable violation of constitutional right." 16 Gray 417. It is a well-settled principle of American constitutional law that the legislative power of the state is unlimited except by constitutional prohibition, while that of the Federal congress, though equally unlimited within the scope of its granted powers, is limited to the exercise of these powers. "The distinction between the United States constitution and our state constitution is, that the former confers upon congress certain specified powers only, while the latter confers on the legislature all legislative power. In the one case the powers specifically granted can only be exercised. In the other, all legislative powers not prohibited may be exercised." Church, C. J., in 46 N. Y. 401, 404.

"With as full respect for the authority of former decisions as belongs, from teaching and habit, to judges trained in the common-law system of jurisprudence, we think that there may be questions touching the powers of legislative bodies, which can never be finally closed by the decisions of a court, and that the one that we have here considered is of this character." 16 How. 369.

Among the administrative rules laid down by Judge Cooley and quoted with great approval by Professor Thayer, is this: "When a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it; contracts which depend upon it for their consideration are void; it constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it, and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made. And what is true of an act void in toto is true also as to any part of an act which is found to be unconstitutional, and which, consequently, is to be regarded as having never, at any time, been possessed of any legal force." Cooley, Const. Lim. 188 and cases cited; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 175. Other authorities, however, have taken a different view, and the expression that a law is declared by the courts to be unconstitutional and void has been characterized as a common misapprehension as to the effect of a judicial decision upon the constitutionality of a law. It is said that what the court really does in such a case is to ignore the statute and decide the case in hand as if it did not exist; 30 W. Va. 479; the question is simply whether the act furnishes the rule to govern the particular case, and the general abstract question of the constitutionality of an act cannot be directly presented; 9 Ohio St. 548; "The act is not stricken from the statute book, and it is not superseded, revoked, or annulled. If the courts afterwards change their minds, as did the Supreme Court of the United States in the legal tender cases, the statute is just as effective as if it had never been pronounced unconstitutional." 81 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 448. The latter view is undoubtedly correct. It was an early custom for the legislature to repeal laws which had been held to be unconstitutional; 19 Am. L. Rev. 188. It is nevertheless true that the practice of the government would rather have seemed to have settled down to the view expressed by Judge Cooley as it is customary where serious doubt is expressed regarding the constitutionality of a law, to have presented to a court a test case and when a decision has been rendered by the court of last resort adverse to the statute, it is acquiesced in by the other departments of the government. Familiar and recent instances of this were the decisions adverse to the federal income tax law and the Pennsylvania alien tax law, each of which were held to be unconstitutional and thereupon no further attempt was made to enforce them.

It is a familiar principle that one legislature cannot limit or control the legislative actions of its successors and needs no citation to support it; 5 Cow. 588. In a late case this principle was reiterated and it was said to be necessary that each successive body should be left untrammelled except by the restraints of the fundamental law; 111 N. Y. 132; 153 U. S. 628.

The legislature has power to make a contract binding on the state; it is a necessary attribute of sovereignty; 16 How. 369; and it may by such contract, based on a consideration, exempt the property of an individual or corporation from taxation, either for a specified period or permanently; 8 Wall. 430, 439; see also 8 How. 183. In these cases there was a line of very vigorous dissenting opinions in one of which Mr. Justice Miller said: "We do not believe that any legislative body sitting under a state constitution of the usual character has a right to sell, to give, or to bargain away forever the taxing power of the state." 8 Wall. 441.

Nor can the police power be bartered away or shackled by any one legislature. It may, for example, create a corporation with power to do the business of handling and slaughtering live stock, but it cannot continue that right so that no future legislature can repeal or modify it, or grant similar privileges to others; it cannot by contract with an individual restrain the power of a subsequent legislature to legislate for the public welfare and to that end to suppress practices tending to corrupt public morals; 111 U. S. 746; 48 Miss. 147; 84 N. Y. 657, 663; 97 U. S. 25, 28; 101 id. 814; 197 U. S. 659.

When its power has not been exceeded and the state is bound by its action, a legislature has no power to revoke its own grants; 6 Cra. 87; 8 Wheat. 1.

Some of the most important questions under this title relate to the subject of the delegation of power. The general doctrine as to delegation of governmental powers has been briefly stated, and some authorities cited, elsewhere. See DELEGATION.

The general principle that the legislative power cannot be delegated is thus tersely expressed by Chief Justice Gibson: "Under a well-balanced constitution the legislature can no more delegate its proper function than can the judiciary." 5 W. & S. 283. And see Locke, Civ. Govt. § 142.

It has very often been said,—that legislative power cannot be delegated is elementary law. The difficulty is in determining what authority or discretion may be conferred on a body other than the legislature without contravening constitutional principle. The general question was the subject of extended discussion in a case sustaining the validity of an act conferring upon railroad commissioners the power to determine what are reasonable rates for transportation; 38 Minn. 281.

In that case the court quotes from a previous decision (29 Minn. 474) the general rule against the delegation of legislative power, as requiring the legislature to pass upon two things, the authority to make, and the expediency of, the enactment. The court then proceeds to lay down a limitation for the rule growing out of the necessity of the exercise of discretion and judgment in the exercise of certain powers. Attention is directed to the difficulty in many cases of discriminating between what is properly legislative and what may be executive or administrative duty, and it is said that, while still recognizing the difference between the departments of government, "the maker of the law may commit something to the discretion of the other departments, and the precise boundary of this power is a subject of delicate and difficult inquiry into which a court will not necessarily enter. (10 Wheat. 1, 46.) The principle is repeatedly recognized by all courts that the legislature may authorize others to do things which it might properly, but cannot conveniently or advantageously, do itself. All laws are carried into execution by officers appointed for the purpose; some with more, others with less, but all clothed with power sufficient for the efficient execution of the law. These powers often necessarily involve in a large degree the exercise of discretion and judgment even to the extent of investigating and determining the facts, and acting upon and in accordance with the facts as thus found. In fact, this must be so, if the legislature is to be permitted effectually to exercise its constitutional powers. If this was not permissible, the wheels of government would often be blocked and the sovereign state find itself hopelessly entangled in the meshes of its own constitution." A number of examples are given of statutes granting discretionary powers to officers charged with the execution of the laws; power given to boards in control of public institutions to make contracts, adopt rules, etc.; the assessment of property for the purpose of taxation; the exercise of the police power in requiring and granting licenses, and the conclusion is stated in the exact words of Judge Ranney, quoted infra.

The decision of the Minnesota case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon grounds not affecting this general statement of the doctrine of the delegation of legislative power; 134 U. S. 418.

This question was elaborately considered by the supreme court in Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649. In this case it was held that the authority conferred by a tariff act upon the president to suspend by proclamation the free introduction of sugar, etc., when he should be satisfied that any country producing such articles imposed duties or other exactions upon agricultural or other products of the United States, did not conflict with the recognized principle that congress could not delegate its legislative power to the president. The law was complete when it was declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency, the president was the mere agent to ascertain the event upon which the legislative will was to take effect. The court quotes with approval the language, often cited, of Ranney, J., in 1 Ohio St. 88: "The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made." Two Pennsylvania cases are quoted with approval as follows: "Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it cannot be said that the exercise of such discretion is the making of the law." 21 Pa. 188, 202. "To assert that a law is less than a law, because it is made to depend on a future event or act, is to rob the legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed, or to things future and impossible to fully know." The proper distinction, the court said, was this: "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the law-making power, and must, therefore, be subject to inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation." 72 Pa. 491, 498.

The authority given by congress to the secretary of war to prescribe rules and regulations for the use, administration, and control of canals, etc., owned or operated by the United States, is held not to be a delegation of legislative power, and rules made pursuant thereto have the force of law; 74 Fed. Rep. 207. So also an act is valid which authorizes the secretary of war in his discretion to require the alteration of bridges which are obstructions to navigation; 82 Fed. Rep. 592.

A very important branch of this subject is the question of legislative power to make the enactment of a law depend in one form or another upon the result of a submission to a popular vote. There have been many cases upon the subject and some conflict of opinion, but the right of the legislature to refer to the voters of a district or territory, such as a county or municipality, a question local in its nature would seem to be quite well settled. Such questions are the division of a county or township and the formation of a new one; 5 Gill 1; see also 24 Wis. 149; 55 Mo. 295; the reuniting of two separate ones which were formerly one; 8 Pa. 391; 51 Ill. 94; 46 Me. 206; 49 Cal. 478; whether a general school law shall be operative in a particular municipality; 45 Mo. 458; as to the location of a county seat; 10 Pa. 214; 38 Wis. 504; 51 Ill. 37; or its removal; 82 Md. 526; so whether a municipality may make an improvement or incur a debt; 8 Leigh 120; 45 Ala. 696; 23 N. Y. 439; 12 Ohio N. S. 596, 624; 21 How. 539, 547; 23 id. 381; 3 Wall. 327, 654; 44 Mo. 504; 17 Cal. 23; 24 Ill. 75; or have a revision of its charter; 54 Ga. 317; or the regulation of live stock in a subdivision of a county; 87 Tex. 598. Such questions as these, it is said, may always with propriety be referred to the voters of a municipality for decision; Cooley, Const. Lim. [120], where a very large number of cases are collected.

Upon the question whether this principle may be applied to the state at large and the operation of a law be made to depend upon the result of a popular vote, the weight of judicial opinion is decidedly to the effect that it is an unlawful delegation of legislative power; 2 Ia. 165; 9 id. 203; 48 Cal. 279, 313; 26 N. Y. 470; 17 Mo. 529; 45 id. 458; 93 id. 606; 17 Tex. 441; 4 Ore. 132; 73 Ga. 604; 25 Md. 562; 73 id. 428.

Earlier cases, however, have maintained this view more strongly than later ones. The ground upon which the doctrine of the invalidity of such legislation is based is very well stated in the leading case of Bartow v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 489. In that case it was said by Ruggles, C. J., that the exercise of such power by the people is forbidden by necessary implication. The entire power of legislation is vested in the legislature, and it has no power to submit a proposed law to the people who voluntarily surrendered the power of direct legislation when they adopted as a form of government a representative democracy.

There are, however, opposing opinions expressed with much force. Redfield, C. J., considers the arguments by which the doctrine is sustained to be "the result of false analogies and so founded upon a latent fallacy," though he admits that he was "at first, without much examination, somewhat inclined to the same opinion." 26 Vt. 357.

The argument pressed as against the prevailing doctrine is that it is competent for the legislature to pass a law which shall only take effect upon the happening of a contingency and that it is no extension of this principle to provide that the contingency shall be a popular vote in its favor; Dixon, C. J., in 26 Wis. 291. In the Vermont case the act held valid was to take effect in any contingency; but in case of a popular vote being against it, the time when it should take effect was postponed to a later day; and in the Wisconsin case an act taxing shares in national banks was to take effect only after approval of a majority of the electors voting on the subject at a general election. In another case similar to that in Vermont the court was equally divided; 3 Mich. 343.

This question of the submission of the legislation to a popular vote has been specially considered in connection with so-called local option laws as to which there has been strong pressure of public opinion tending towards the relaxation of the strictness of the earlier rule and the tendency to hold that the question, whether a general police regulation should be of force in a particular locality, might be submitted to the voters of the district. As to cases on this subject, see DELEGATION; LIQUOR LAWS; LOCAL OPTION.

With respect to any subject matter proper to be submitted to a popular vote it is held that the expression of the sovereign will of the legislature that a particular proposition or question be so submitted need not take the form of a law, but it may be in the form of a joint resolution; the secretary of state must certify to the proper officers of the various counties in the state a joint resolution passed by the legislature, that the question whether a constitutional convention should be held should be submitted to the people; and in case of his refusal he may be compelled by mandamus to do so; 68 N. W. Rep. (N. Dak.) 418.

Acts held invalid as an improper delegation by the legislature of the police power are a provision that a boiler inspector's act shall not apply to boilers inspected by insurance companies and certified by their authorized inspectors to be safe; 68 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 77; an act providing that hogs shall not run at large in a county, if the county courts on petition of voters direct that the act be enforced therein: 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 666; an act directing the insurance commissioner to prescribe a standard policy and forbidding the use of any other; 166 Pa. 72; acts authorizing insurance commissioners to adopt a printed form of fire policy with conditions indorsed thereon, which, as nearly as possible, in type and form shall conform to that adopted by another state; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 788; 59 Minn. 182. In the last case it was admitted that an act similar to that of Pennsylvania would be invalid, but it was unsuccessfully contended that the legislative direction to conform as nearly as possible to a specified policy would take the case out of the principle laid down by the Pennsylvania court. So also was an act permitting a justice to put a person charged with drunkenness as a disorderly person under recognizance to take the treatment of a private corporation administering a cure for drunkenness, and providing that on reports showing compliance, he should be acquitted and discharged; 99 Mich. 117.

A law providing for the adjustment of state bonds, and authorizing judges to decide which of two sections of the act should take effect, gives them legislative power and is void; 29 Minn. 474; in this case the subject was very elaborately argued, and the distinction between legislative and judicial power is very clearly stated by the court. See supra.

The legislature cannot leave to commissioners the power to decide in what proportion the expense of laying out and opening a public avenue should be imposed on townships of a county or wards of a city; 37 N. J. L. 12.

Acts held not to be a delegation of legislative power and therefore valid, are authorizing the fish commissioners to give permits to take fish for propagation at times and by methods otherwise prohibited; 101 Mich. 98; requiring carriers of passengers to furnish their agents with certificates of authority to sell tickets, on which a license shall be issued by the state; 57 Minn. 347; authorizing a court to issue certificates of incorporation to municipalities; 39 W. Va. 179; permitting the board of supervisors of counties to determine whether a county shall come within or remain without the provisions of an act to establish law libraries; 99 Cal. 571; providing that an act in relation to public roads shall not go into effect until recommended by the grand jury; 91 Ga. 770; authorizing railroad and warehouse commissioners to make a schedule of a maximum rate of charges for each railroad company in the state; 149 Ill. 361; authorizing the union of two railroad companies and that the united company may discontinue such operations of the road as the directors deem necessary; 66 N. H. 569; authorizing railroad commissioners to regulate freights; 70 Ga. 694; or to make reasonable regulations for the prevention of excessive charges and unjust discrimination; 111 N. C. 463; or to order a company to remove grade crossings and on its failure to do so to determine the portion of the expense thereof which is to be paid by the company; 62 Conn. 527; to provide that the mayors of cities of a certain class may be elected by the people or appointed by the council as provided by ordinance; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 629; to authorize park commissioners to determine where and of what material sidewalks and road beds shall be constructed; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 405; to authorize a state medical board to exercise powers of registration and examination; 38 Ohio L. J. 239; s. c. 47 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 1041.

Authority to transfer cases pending in a territorial court to the federal courts may be delegated to a constitutional convention, upon the admission of the territory as a state; 82 Fed. Rep. 340.

The legislature cannot delegate its lawmaking power, but it has the power to create municipal corporations and to invest them with the powers of local government, including particularly local taxation and police regulation; Cooley, Const. Lim. [191]. Judge Cooley considers that local self-government being a part of the English and American system, it is to be understood that even if it is not expressly recognized in a constitution, the instrument is presumed to contemplate its existence and continuance; id. [35]; 28 Mich. 228; 55 N. Y. 50. It is a legitimate exercise of sovereignty belonging to the legislative power of a state to create corporate bodies for municipal purposes with the means of self-government; 8 Humph. 1; or to delegate to municipal assemblies the power of enacting ordinances relating to local matters; 164 U. S. 471. This is not regarded as a delegation of legislative power, because the local board or municipal body which is invested with such powers is regarded as exercising them as an agency for local legislation of the sovereign power of the state. The settled judicial opinion is thus well expressed: "It seems to be generally conceded that powers of local legislation may be granted to cities, towns, and other municipal corporations. And it would require strong reasons to satisfy us that it could have been the design of the framers of our constitution to take from the legislature a power which has been exercised in Europe by governments of all classes from the earliest history, and the exercise of which has probably done more to promote civilization than all other causes combined; which has been constantly exercised in every part of our country from its earliest settlement, and which has raised up among us many of our most valuable institutions." Bell, J., in 10 Fost. 292; 114 Mass. 214; 65 Pa. 76; 29 Wis. 415; 15 N. Y. 532; 45 Mo. 458; 50 Ala. 486. The creation of such corporations and the grant to them of powers of local legislation do not divest or impair the general legislative power and control of the state legislature, which may increase, diminish, or take away such powers, amend the charter, overrule their legislative action, or abolish them altogether. There can be acquired by the municipal corporation as against the state no vested right in the rights and franchises granted to it, and the municipal charter does not constitute a contract, so that such legislation would be considered in violation of the constitutional provision protecting the obligation of contracts; Cooley, Const. Lim. [192]. This principle is recognized in the Dartmouth College case; 4 Wheat. 518; Dillon, Municipal Corporations §§ 24, 30, 37; see 24 Mich. 87; and it may be affirmed that it is supported by a uniform current of authority. It is true that here and there may be found expressions by courts and judges, which, to the casual reader, would give the impression that there may be some inviolable character attached to a grant of municipal franchises, but an examination of such cases will usually, if not invariably, disclose the fact that the expressions referred to go beyond the proper consideration of the case in question, and in any case are unsupported by authority. The true principle is thus stated: "Public corporations are but parts of the machinery employed in carrying on the affairs of the state; and they are subject to be changed, modified, or destroyed as the exigencies of the public may demand. The state may exercise a general superintendence and control over them and their rights and effects, so that their property is not diverted from the uses and objects for which it was given or purchased;" 13 Ill. 30. The complete legislative control over municipal corporations is said to be subject to some limits, of which some are "expressly defined; others spring from the usages, customs, and maxims of our people; they are a part of its history, a part of the system of local self-government, in view of the continuance and perpetuity of which all our institutions are framed, and of the right to which the people can never be deprived through express renunciation on their part." Cooley, Const. Lim. [230]. See IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

Such is the right of choosing under forms and restrictions prescribed by the legislature, officers of local administration, and the determination by the local administration of the pecuniary burdens it will assume; Cooley, Const. Lim. [230]; so it has been held that the legislature cannot divest a municipal corporation, of property legally acquired by it; R. M. Charlt. 342. As the rule is sometimes expressed, municipal powers may be changed by the legislature if vested rights acquired thereunder are saved; 13 Cal. 343; 27 How. Pr. 342.

Where the legislature uses its power to change or modify the political rights and privileges of municipal corporations, a distinction is drawn between those rights and mere property rights acquired by the corporation, which are protected for the same reasons and upon the same principle as are similar rights in individuals; Cooley, Const. Lim. [237], where the cases are collected.

In any state the legislative power must spend its force within its own territorial limits. It cannot make laws by which people outside of the jurisdiction must govern their actions except as they choose to resort to the remedies provided by the state or deal with property situated within it. See FOREIGN CORPORATIONS; LEX FORI. It can have no authority upon the high seas beyond state lines because that is the point of contact with other nations and brings into operation and consideration the principles of international law with which the federal government alone can deal. See FISHERY; SEA. As a general rule the state cannot provide for the punishment of acts committed beyond the state boundary, because such acts, if offences at all, are such only against the sovereignty within whose limits they have been done; Cooley, Const. Lim. [128]. In some cases, however, where "the consequences of an unlawful act committed outside the state, have reached their ultimate and injurious result within it, it seems that the perpetrator may be punished as an offender against such state." Id. Such cases arise most frequently where property is stolen in one jurisdiction and carried into another, or where a homicide is committed by a mortal blow in one jurisdiction while death results in another; see 8 Mich. 320; 11 id. 327; 2 Park. Cr. R. 590; 36 Miss. 593; 16 Wis. 398; 85 N. C. 603.

The legislative power over a place purchased by the United States with the consent of the legislature of the state, is transferred from the state to the federal government, except as restrained by some qualification in the expression of state consent; 53 Pa. 482. See JURISDICTION.

LEGITIMACY. The state of being born in lawful marriage. See BASTARD; PRESUMPTION; INTENDMENT OF LAW; CHILD.

LEGITIMACY DECLARATION ACTS. English statutes which provide that any natural born subject of the queen, being domiciled in England or Ireland, or claiming any real or personal estate in England, may apply to the high court of justice for a decree declaring that the petitioner is the legitimate child of his parents, and that the marriage of his father and mother, or of his grandfather and grandmother, was a valid marriage, or for a decree declaring that his own marriage was valid. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 93.

LEGITIMATE. That which is according to law.

To make lawful; to confer legitimacy; to place a child born before marriage on the same footing as those born in lawful wedlock. 26 Vt. 653.

LEGITIMATION. The act of giving the character of legitimate children to those who were not so born.

Legitimation is a fiction of the law, whereby one born out of lawful wedlock is considered the offspring of the marriage between the parents. 24 La. Ann. 580.

In Louisiana, the Civil Code, art. 217, enacts that "children born out of marriage, except those who are born of an incestuous or adulterous connection, may be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their father and mother, whenever the latter have legally acknowledged them for their children, either before their marriage, or by the contract of marriage itself."

The legitimation of natural children was permitted in none of the earlier German codes, except the Lombard, and was strongly opposed to the whole spirit of German family law, but that the father could, by symbolic forms, acknowledge his natural child and give him a place and protection within his household is proved from German and Scandinavian sources. Among the Anglo-Saxons, a child born in unlawful marriage had no rights of inheritance, and it may be inferred that all other rights of kindred were denied to it except that of protection, even when acknowledged by the father. Essays, Ang.-Sax. L. 126. In the conflict between the church and the law at the Merton parliament in regard to the question whether a bastard could be legitimized, the barons declared with one voice that they would not change the laws of England, and that nothing could make a bastard legitimate, although it was contended that the old English custom authorized legitimation by allowing the parents on the occasion of their marriage to place such children beneath the cloak under which they stood whilst the marriage ceremony was performed, the children thereby becoming "mantle children," but this practice the king's court of Henry II. had rejected and that of Henry III. refused to retreat from the precedent. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 395.

In Maine, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, the Dakotas, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, marriage of the parents legitimatizes an illegitimate child.

In Massachusetts, Vermont, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arizona, in addition to the marriage of the parents the father must have acknowledged or recognized the child as his.

In New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Louisiana, both parents must acknowledge, but in the last named state the acknowledgment is made either by an authentic act before marriage or by the contract of marriage, and an exception is made of those children born of an incestuous or adulterous connection. In California, Nevada, the Dakotas, and Idaho, a public acknowledgment by the father of an illegitimate child, receiving such child (with the consent of his wife, if married) into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were legitimate, thereby renders it legitimate for all purposes. Acknowledgment by either or both parents, or by the father with the consent of his wife, or by the mother with the consent of her husband, will legitimatize a child. In Michigan, if the father, by writing executed, acknowledged, and recorded like deeds of real estate, but with the judge of probate, acknowledge such child, he is legitimate for all purposes. In North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, and New Mexico the putative father of a bastard has a process in court by which he may legitimatize the child.

A question considerably discussed in England is where one who is domiciled in a country sustaining the doctrine legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium marries a woman who had before the marriage a child by him, the husband having been domiciled prior thereto in a country where the doctrine does not prevail. In one case the exact question arose where the husband domiciled in England went to France, and before changing his domicile cohabited with a French woman who had by him a daughter, and afterwards becoming domiciled in France, he married the woman at the British Embassy in English form, and later in French form with recognition of the child, but the latter was held not to be legitimate; 2 K. & J. 595; s. c. 25 L. J. Ch. 621. This case is the subject of severe criticism in an article in 22 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th. 171, where the English cases touching upon the subject are carefully reviewed, with the conclusion that "it is not rash to say that before the case last mentioned such authority as existed on the point was in favor of the legitimacy." See 7 Cl. & F. 817, 842; 11 Eq. 474; 17 Ch. Div. 266; 24 Ch. Div. 637; [1892] 3 Ch. 88; L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 441. See BASTARD; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; CHILD.

LEGITIME. In Civil Law. That portion of a parent's estate of which he cannot disinherit his children without a legal cause.

The civil code of Louisiana declares that donations inter vivos or mortis causa cannot exceed two-thirds of the property of the disposer, if he leaves at his decease a legitimate child; one-half if he leaves two children; and one-third if he leaves three or a greater number. Under the name of children are included descendants of whatever degree they may be: it must be understood that they are only counted for the child they represent.

In Holland, Germany, and Spain, the principles of the Falcidian law, more or less limited, have been generally adopted; Coop. Just. 516.

In the United States, other than Louisiana, and in England, there is no restriction, except as to the widow's rights, on the right of bequeathing. But this power of bequeathing did not originally extend to all a man's personal estate: on the contrary, by the common law, as it stood in the reign of Henry II., a man's goods were to be divided into three equal parts, one of which went to his heirs or lineal descendants, another to his wife, and the third was at his own disposal; or, if he died without a wife, he might then dispose of one moiety, and the other went to his children; and so e converso if he had no children, the wife was entitled to one moiety, and he might bequeath the other; but if he died without either wife or issue, the whole was at his own disposal; Glanville, l. 2, c. 5; Bracton, l. 2, c. 26; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 346. The shares of the wife and children were called their reasonable part; 2 Bla. Com. 491. See DEAD MAN'S PART; BAIRN'S PART; FALCIDIAN LAW.

kept together until C arrived at 21 years, when it was to be equally divided among the children, their heirs and assigns forever, the word lend was held not to tie up the estate to the time of the death of the children. 5 Ired. L. 361.

LENDER. He from whom a thing is borrowed. The bailor of an article loaned. See BAILMENT; LOAN.

LESION. In Civil Law. A term used to signify the injury suffered, in consequence of inequality of situation, by one who does not receive a full equivalent for what he gives in a commutative contract.

The remedy given for this injury is founded on its being the effect of implied error or imposition; for in every commutative contract equivalents are supposed to be given and received. Persons of full age, however, are not allowed in point of law to object to their agreements as being injurious, unless the injury be excessive; Pothier, Obl. p. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 3, § 4. But minors are admitted to restitution, not only against any excessive inequality, but against any inequality whatever; Pothier, Obl. p. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 3, § 5; La. Code. art. 1858. See FRAUD; GUARDIAN; SALE.

A writer of letters has a special property in them to prevent their publication or communication to other persons; 50 How. Pr. 194; 2 Story 100; 6 McLean 128; 5 Blatchf. 285. See 7 Alb. L. J. 19.

Letters written to a wife by a former husband belong to her and not to his estate, or to her second husband; 2 Bush 480; see 64 Vt. 450; and the recipient of a letter has no such property in it as passes to his executor as an asset of the estate; 22 How. Pr. 198.

Where a bill in equity charged that the defendant surreptitiously and illegally took from the trunk of the plaintiff's son and from the plaintiff's own bureau certain letters written by the plaintiff to her son, and by her son to her, it was held that the special right in the letters written by plaintiff was one that could only be adequately protected in equity, and that the court having jurisdiction for discovery should go on and order all the letters to be restored; 180 Pa. 14. See INJUNCTION; PRIVACY.

Letters in evidence. A letter is not admissible in evidence without proof of its being genuine, and such proof cannot be supplied solely by what appears on its face, as its contents, the letter head, etc.; 93 Ga. 648; but letters received in the regular course of business responsive to letters on the same subject, with proper letter-heads, envelopes, etc., are presumably authentic, according to their purport; 61 Fed. Rep. 804. In order to prove a memorandum, under the statute of frauds, a letter and envelope are considered as one document; 76 L. T. Rep. 441.

Letters in themselves inadmissible are so if they communicate any fact to the party against whom they are read which either affects the right in question or explains his subsequent conduct; 22 E. C. L. R. 273, 845. A letter stating particular facts cannot be read in evidence merely because it was sent, but if the party to whom it was addressed wrote an answer, such answer might be read as evidence against the party who wrote it, and the letter to which it was an answer would be admissible for the purpose of explaining such answer. A letter and answers thereto are subject to the same rule as applies to a conversation; if part is given in evidence by one party, the other party is entitled to have the whole produced; 4 Rob. 12; 41 Miss. 81. Failure to answer a letter is not generally deemed an admission of its contents; 97 N. Y. 1.

Letters in evidence fall within the general rule as to written documents; 27 L. J. C. P. 193; their construction is for the court unless extrinsic circumstances be capable of explaining them; 27 L. J. Ex. 34; but if they are written in so dubious a manner as to be capable of different constructions, or to be unintelligible without the aid of extrinsic circumstances, their meaning becomes a question for the jury; 1 Term 182; 8 C. B. 44; so the jury must deal with the whole question, where a contract is made partly by letter and partly oral; 17 C. B. N. S. 107.

It is a general prima facie presumption that all documents were made on the day they bear date, and this presumption obtains where the document is a letter; 2 Ex. 191, 196; 6 Bing. N. C. 301; 2 B. & Ad. 502; 2 M. & H. 853; but the date of a letter is not evidence that it was forwarded on that day; 53 Fed. Rep. 485; 102 Mass. 177; nor can the date of the receipt of a letter be established by witnesses who base their calculations upon its date; the date of a letter does not prove the date of its receipt, or the time of mailing it, or that it was ever mailed; 53 Fed. Rep. 485. In an action for criminal conversation, where the letters offered are those of a wife to a husband, to show the terms on which they lived; evidence must show when they were written; 1 B. & Ald. 90; 9 C. & P. 198; 2 Stark. 196.

Postmarks on letters are prima facie evidence that the letters were in the post at the time and place specified; 3 Stark. 64; 7 East 65; 29 How. St. Tr. 103; 3 Fed. Rep. 484; 1 Camp. 215; 2 id. 620; 7 M. & W. 515; 7 H. L. Cas. 646; although it be shown that in aid of justice, postmasters sometimes furnish empty envelopes bearing the post-office stamp, where they have never in fact been in the mail; 1 Fed. Rep. 126. Postmarks are evidence that the letter was mailed and sent, rather than that it was merely put in the post office; 15 Conn. 206; 16 Vt. 63; 4 R. I. 525; 3 Dill. 571.

The burden of proving the receipt of a letter rests upon the party who asserts it; 105 Mass. 391; 111 U. S. 185. If a letter properly directed is proved to have been either put in the post office or delivered to the postman, it is presumed to have reached its destination at the regular time, and to have been received by the person to whom it is addressed; 2 H. Bla. 509; 16 M. & W. 124; 1 H. L. Cas. 381; 48 L. J. Ex. 577; 6 Wheat. 102; see 4 R. I. 525, where it is held that any further evidence of the receipt of a letter than that it was properly directed and mailed would be wholly unnecessary, always difficult and often impossible. But this presumption is not one of law, but solely one of fact; 148 Pa. 405; 45 Me. 50; founded upon the probability that the officers of the government will do their duty, and the usual course of business; 105 Mass. 391; 111 U. S. 185. It may be rebutted by evidence showing that it was not received; 69 N. Y. 571; 93 Ala. 215; 12 Col. 539; 148 Pa. 405. But the fact of non-return of a letter bearing a request for return in case of failure to deliver so strengthens the presumption of receipt from mailing that it becomes well-nigh conclusive; 154 Pa. 323. On proof of the posting of a letter, properly addressed, the fact that it was not returned to the dead letter office is evidence of its receipt; 16 M. & W. 124. The facts that all letters put in a certain place were in the proper course of business put in the mail, and that a particular letter was put in such place, are evidence that it was despatched; 4 Campb. 193. See L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 574; 61 N. Y. 362; 58 N. H. 97.

In the absence of evidence that a letter was stamped before mailing, no presumption arises as to its receipt; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 938; but when one alleges that he duly mailed a letter, the court will presume that the requirements of the law as to stamping, etc., were complied with; 80 Fed. Rep. 337. The question of the receipt of the letter is for the jury; 115 Pa. 539; 148 id. 405; 130 Mass. 186; 138 N. Y. 473. See Taylor, Ev., Chamberlayne ed. 183. See PRESUMPTION.

Contract by letter. The rule that a contract is complete at the instant when the minds of the parties meet is subject to modification where the negotiation is carried on by letter, for it is in that case impossible that both parties should have knowledge of the moment it becomes complete. The offer and acceptance cannot occur at the same moment of time; nor can the meeting of the minds of the parties on the subject be known by each at the moment of concurrence. The acceptance must succeed the offer after the lapse of some interval of time, and if the process is to be carried further in order to complete the bargain, a notice of the acceptance must be received; the only effect is to reverse the position of the parties, changing the knowledge of the completion from one party to the other; Benj. Sales § 69. When an offer is made by letter, it is presumed to continue during such period as is determined by, or is reasonable with regard to, the terms of the offer, or until notice of its recall has reached him to whom the offer is made; 1 B. & Ald. 681; 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 80; even if, through fault of the sender, the letter containing the offer is delayed; 6 Wend. 103; 12 Conn. 436; provided the offer is standing at the time of the acceptance; 6 Wend. 104; and where a proposal is made by letter, the mailing of a letter containing an acceptance of the proposal completes the contract; 6 Wend. 104; 1 B. & Ald. 681; 1 H. L. Cas. 381; 5 Pa. 339; 9 How. 390; 149 U. S. 411; 63 Ia. 484; 55 Ga. 438; 32 Md. 196; 67 Tex. 163; 42 Wis. 152; 15 R. I. 380; 16 Fed. Rep. 646; L. R. 7 Ch. 587; 20 Q. B. Div. 640; although the acceptance may be delayed or may not be received through fault of the mail; 9 How. 390; 36 N. Y. 307; 48 N. H. 14; 3 Metc. (Ky.) 80; 4 Ga. 1; 31 Md. 99; 161 Mass. 496; and this seems to be the general rule both in this country and in England, although it has been held that the contract is not complete until the letter of acceptance has been received by the party who makes the offer; 1 Pick. 281; L. R. 6 Ex. 108, overruled in 4 Ex. D. 216; but if undue delay or failure of delivery of the letter of acceptance is caused by the acceptor, there is no contract; 10 Pick. 326; 55 Ga. 438. Placing the acceptance in a letter box at the defendant's place of business completes the contract; 61 N. Y. 362; but entrusting it to a messenger for delivery is not sufficient, where there is no evidence that it was received; 4 Misc. Rep. 614.

The acceptance must be unconditional and in accordance with the terms of the offer and within the time prescribed by the offer; 21 Minn. 155; 53 Me. 20; 3 Johns. 534; 4 Wheat. 225; 48 N. Y. 240; 37 Ia. 186; 59 Wis. 315; 159 Pa. 612; even where the offer called for reply by return mail, compliance was held essential; 90 Ill. 525; 67 Ia. 678; and where in answer to a letter of proposal, the accepting party merely writes that he is willing to make arrangements on the terms proposed, it was held to be not an unconditional acceptance; 47 Hun 494; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 40; 22 Fed. Rep. 596.

Where there is no limitation as to time in the offer, the acceptance must be within a reasonable time; 63 Ia. 484; 50 Am. Rep. 752; the following day will suffice; 1 H. L. Cas. 381; but four months will not; 48 N. Y. 240. See 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 91.

In the leading case of Cooke v. Oxley the rule was laid down that one who gives time to another to accept or reject an offer is not bound to wait until the specified time expires, if no consideration has been given for the offer: 3 Term 783; see Pothier, Contrat de Vérité, No. 32; 3 Cush. 158; 5 Stew. & P. 264; 48 N. H. 16; but in this case the offer was not by letter, and the question as to the revocation of such an offer (when the offer was made by mail) was for a long time unsettled. In 1 Pick. 278 it was held that a revocation of an offer not then accepted takes effect from the time it is posted, although not received by the other party until after he had mailed his acceptance, and that no contract existed because, at the moment the acceptance was sent, the mind of the party offering had changed; in L. R. 6 Ex. 108; the same doctrine is laid down, but this case was doubted in 7 Ch. App. 592; and the English and American rule is now well settled that the offer cannot be withdrawn, unless the withdrawal reaches the party to whom it is addressed before the letter of acceptance has been mailed; 9 How. 390; 49 L. J. C. P. 316; 5 Q. B. D. 351. The withdrawal of the offer after the acceptance has been posted is inoperative; as a state of mind not notified cannot be regarded in dealings between man and man, and an uncommunicated revocation is, for all practical purposes, no revocation at all; 5 C. P. D. 344; 5 Q. B. D. 346; 2 App. Cas. 666; 46 N. Y. 467. The posting a letter of withdrawal is not a communication to the person to whom it is sent; 5 C. P. D. 344. See Wald, Poll. Contr. 26; Benj. Sales § 65; 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 80. A revocation of an offer is not complete till it is brought to the mind of the offeree; merely mailing a letter of revocation is not a revocation; [1892] 2 Ch. 27, C. A. Nor is the mere posting of a letter allotting shares in a company to an applicant such a communication as to bind the applicant; L. R. 11 Eq. 86; 20 L. T. R. N. S. 729.

It is said to be an open question in England as to the effect of a revocation of an accepting letter communicated to the other party before the accepting letter is received by him; Chit. Contr., 13th ed. 15, where it is submitted that in such case there should be no contract; see also, 4 Ex. D. 235; 9 Shaw & Dun. 109. Other writers are of opinion that the mailing of an accepting letter fixes the contract, and that a revocation by telegram or a messenger, outstripping the accepting letter, would have no effect; Poll. Contr. 35; see, also, Ans. Contr. 27; Story, Contr. § 198; and it was so held in 2 Dutch. N. J. 268.

Contracts by telegraph, under most of the authorities, obey the same rule as contracts by mail; Hare, Contr.; 3 Dill. 571.

Payments may be made by letter at the risk of the creditor, when the debtor is authorized, expressly or impliedly, from the usual course of business, and not otherwise; Peake 67; 1 Ex. 477; Ry. & M. 149; 3 Mass. 249.

See, generally, as to contracts by letter, 32 Am. Rep. 40, n.; Wald, Poll. Contr. 26; 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 80, n.; Benj. Sales §§ 44, 69; 9 Jurid. Rev. 291; 3 Add. Contr. App. 4–13; Smith, Contr. 164; 9 L. Quart. Rev. 185, 265, n.; Langd. Contr. 15; Story, Contr. § 198. See SALE; DECOY LETTER; MAIL; OFFER.

LETTER BOOK. A book containing the copies of letters written by a merchant or trader to his correspondents.

A press copy in a letter book stands in the same relation to the original as a copy taken from the letter book; both are secondary evidence, and are receivable on the loss of, or after notice to produce, the original; but the decisions are not entirely uniform on this point; 3 Camp. 305; 37 Conn. 555; 102 Mass. 362; see 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 72, 93, 133; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 116; 44 N. Y. 116; 35 Md. 123; 73 Ill. 161. See COPY; EVIDENCE; PRESS COPY.

LETTER CARRIER. A person employed to carry letters from the post-office to the persons to whom they are addressed. See various provisions in U. S. Rev. Stat.

Eight hours constitute a day's labor for letter carriers; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 587. For time employed in excess of eight hours a day, he is entitled to extra pay; 148 U. S. 124; and time worked in excess of eight hours in one day cannot be set off against a deficiency on another when he worked less than eight hours; 148 U. S. 134. See EIGHT-HOUR LAWS.

LETTER CLAUS. See LETTERS CLOSE.

LETTER MISSIVE. In English Law. A letter from the king or queen to a dean or chapter, containing the name of the person whom he would have them elect as bishop. 1 Steph. Com. 666. See CONGE D'ELIRE. A request addressed to a peer, peeress, or lord of parliament, against whom a bill has been filed, desiring the defendant to appear and answer to the bill. It is issued by the lord chancellor, on petition, after the filing of the bill; and a neglect to attend to this places the defendant, in relation to such suit, on the same ground as other defendants who are not peers, and a subpœna may then issue; 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 196; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 366–369.

LETTER OF ADVICE. A letter containing information of any circumstances unknown to the person to whom it is written; generally informing him of some act done by the writer of the letter.

It is usual and perfectly proper for the drawer of a bill of exchange to write a letter of advice to the drawee, as well to prevent fraud or alteration of the bill, as to let the drawee know what provision has been made for the payment of the bill. Chitty, Bills 185.

LETTER OF ADVOCATION. In Scotch Law. The decree or warrant of the supreme court or court of sessions, discharging the inferior tribunal from all further proceedings in the matter and advocating the action to itself. This proceeding is similar to a certiorari issuing out of a superior court for the removal of a cause from an inferior.

LETTER OF ATTORNEY. In Practice. A written instrument, by which one or more persons, called the constituents, authorize one or more other persons, called the attorneys, to do some lawful act by the latter for or instead, and in the place, of the former; 1 Moody, 52, 70. It may be parol or under seal. See POWER OF ATTORNEY.

LETTER OF CREDENCE. In International Law. A written instrument addressed by the sovereign or chief magistrate of a state to the sovereign or state to whom a public minister is sent, certifying his appointment as such, and the general object of his mission, and requesting that full faith and credit may be given to what he shall do and say on the part of his court.

When it is given to an ambassador, envoy, or minister accredited to a sovereign, it is addressed to the sovereign or state to whom the minister is delegated; in the case of a chargé d'affaires, it is addressed by the secretary or minister of state charged with the department of foreign affairs to the minister of foreign affairs of the other government; Whart. Int. L. §§ 217–321; Picquefort, de l'Ambassadeur, l. 1, § 15.

LETTER OF CREDIT. An open or sealed letter, from a merchant or bank or banker, in one place, directed to another, in another place or country, requiring him, if a person therein named, or the bearer of the letter, shall have occasion to buy commodities, or to want money to any particular or unlimited amount, either to procure the same, or to pass his promise, bill, or other engagement for it, the writer of the letter undertaking to provide him the money for the goods, or to repay him by exchange, or to give him such satisfaction as he shall require, either for himself or the bearer of the letter. Pars. N. & B. 108; Byles, Bills, Wood's ed. 173; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 336.

These letters are either general or special: the former is directed to the writer's correspondents generally, wherever the bearer of the letter may happen to go; the latter is directed to some particular person. When the letter is presented to the person to whom it is addressed, he either agrees to comply with the request, in which case he immediately becomes bound to fulfil all the engagements therein mentioned; or he refuses, in which case the bearer should return it to the giver without any other proceeding, unless, indeed, the one to whom the letter is directed is a debtor of the one who gave the letter, in which case he should procure the letter to be protested; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 337; 1 Beaw. Lex Mer. 607; Hall, Adm. Pr. 14; 4 Ohio 197.

A letter requesting one person to make advances to a third person on the credit of the writer is a letter of credit; 4 Duer 480; 13 N. Y. 599; 5 Hill 634; 7 L. R. A. 209.

In England it seems questionable whether an action can be maintained by one who advances money on a general letter of credit; 2 Story 214; 11 M. & W. 383; the reason given being that there is no privity of contract between the mandant and the mandatory. But in this country the contrary doctrine is well settled; 3 N. Y. 214; 5 Hill, N. Y. 643; 58 Pa. 102; 54 Miss. 1; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 347, n. In England, a letter of credit is not negotiable; 1 Macq. 513; Grant, Bank. ch. 15; except when it relates to bills of exchange; L. R. 3 Ch. App. 397; 3 id. 154. The same rule has been generally followed here, but it has been held that a general letter of credit, if it authorize more than a single transaction with the party to whom it is granted, may be honored by several persons successively, keeping within the specified aggregate; 3 N. Y. 203; 23 Vt. 160. A telegram authorizing the use of a person's name for a certain sum of money is not in the nature of a general or continuing letter of credit, and does not extend the right to use the name beyond the amount specified; 139 Ill. 633.

The debt which arises on such letter, in its simplest form, when complied with, is between the mandatory and the mandant; though it may be so conceived as to raise a debt also against the person who is supplied by the mandatory. First, when the letter is purchased with money by the person wishing for the foreign credit, or is granted in consequence of a check on his cash account, or procured on the credit of securities lodged with the person who granted it, or in payment of money due by him to the payee, the letter is, in its effects, similar to a bill of exchange drawn on the foreign merchant or banker. The payment of the money by the person on whom the letter is granted raises a debt, or goes into account between him and the writer of the letter, but raises no debt to the person who pays on the letter, against him to whom the money is paid. Second, when not so purchased, but truly an accommodation, and meant to raise a debt on the person accommodated, the engagement generally is, to see paid any advances made to him, or to guaranty any draft accepted or bill discounted; and the compliance with the mandate, in such case, raises a debt both against the writer of the letter and against the person accredited; 1 Bell, Com. 371, 5th ed. The bearer of the letter of credit is not considered bound to receive the money; he may use the letter as he pleases, and he contracts an obligation only by receiving the money; Pothier, Contr. de Change, 237.

LETTER OF EXCHANGE. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

LETTER OF LICENSE. An instrument or writing made by creditors to their insolvent debtor by which they bind themselves to allow him a longer time than he had a right to, for the payment of his debts, and that they will not arrest or molest him in his person or property till after the expiration of such additional time. Since the general abolition of imprisonment for debt, and under the modern system of laws for settling insolvents' estates, it is seldom, if ever, used.

LETTER OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL. A commission granted by the government to a private individual, to take the property of a foreign state, or of the citizens or subjects of such state, as a reparation for an injury committed by such state, its citizens or subjects. The prizes so captured are divided between the owners of the privateer, the captain, and the crew. A vessel loaded with merchandise, on a voyage to a friendly port, but armed for its own defence in case of attack by an enemy, is also called a letter of marque. 1 Boulay-Paty, tit. 3, § 2, p. 300.

Letter of marque is now used to signify the commission issued to a privateer in time of war.

By the constitution, art. 1, § 8, cl. 11, congress has power to grant letters of marque and reprisal. And by another section of the same instrument this power is prohibited to the several states. The granting of letters of marque is not always a preliminary to war or necessarily designed to provoke it. It is a hostile measure for unredressed grievances, real or supposed; Story, Const. § 1356. This is a means short of actual war, well recognized in international law, for terminating differences between nations; Wheat. Int. Law § 290. Special reprisals are when letters of marque are granted in time of peace, to particular individuals who have suffered an injury from the government or subjects of another nation; they are to be granted only in case of clear and open denial of justice; id. § 291. As the constitution empowers congress to grant letters of marque and reprisal, it has been doubted whether it could abrogate this provision by joining in a treaty by which privateering is abolished; 24 Am. L. Rev. 902; 28 id. 615; 19 L. Mag. & Rev. (4th ser.) 35. See REPRISAL; PRIVATEER; DECLARATION OF PARIS.

LETTER OF RECALL. A written document addressed by the executive of one government to the executive of another, informing the latter that a minister sent by the former to him has been recalled.

LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION. In Commercial Law. An instrument given by one person to another, addressed to a third, in which the bearer is represented as worthy of credit. 1 Bell, Com., 5th ed. 371; 3 Term 51; 7 Cra. 69; Fell, Guar. c. 8; 6 Johns. 181; 13 id. 224; 1 Day Conn. 22. See 13 How. 198; RECOMMENDATION.

LETTER OF RECREDENTIALS. A document delivered to a minister by the secretary of state of the government to which he was accredited. It is addressed to the executive of the minister's country. This is in reply to the letter of recall.

LETTER PRESS COPIES. See PRESS COPIES.

LETTERS CLOSE. Those letters commonly sealed with the royal signet, or privy seal, so called in contradistinction to letters patent which were left open and sealed with the broad seal. They are sometimes called Letters Claus. Whart. Lex. See CLOSE ROLL.

LETTERS AD COLLIGENDUM BONA DEFUNCTI. In Practice. In default of the representatives and creditors to administer to the estate of an intestate, the officer entitled to grant letters of administration may grant to such person as he approves, letters to collect the goods of the deceased, which neither make him executor nor administrator; his only business being to collect the goods and keep them in his safe custody. 2 Bla. Com. 505.

LETTERS OF ABSOLUTION. Letters whereby, in former times, an abbot released a monk ab omni subjectione et obedientia, etc., and enabled him to enter some other religious order. Jacob.

LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION. An instrument in writing, granted by the judge or officer having jurisdiction and power of granting such letters, thereby authorizing the person or persons to whom they are granted to administer upon the personal estate of an intestate. According to the usual form there is given to the administrator (naming him) "full power to administer the goods, chattels, rights, and credits, which were of the said deceased," in the county or district in which the said judge or officer has jurisdiction; "as also to ask, collect, levy, recover, and receive the credits whatsoever of the said deceased, which at the time of his death were owing, or did in any way belong, to him, and to pay the debts in which the said deceased stood obliged, so far forth as the said goods and chattels, rights and credits, will extend, according to the rate and order of law." Original and general administration granted by a probate court corresponds to letters testamentary issued to an executor. As to the various limited and special forms of administration, see that title.

Generally in England the crown claimed the right of administering the personal property of intestates, and the ecclesiastical persons who were entrusted with the duty, appropriated large portions of them upon the pretext of pious uses, until they were required by stat. 31 Edw. III. c. 11, § 1, to grant administration to "the next and most lawful friends of the person intestate," who were held accountable in the common law court as executors were. The administration of personal estates then became assimilated to the exclusion of wills, and the function of the ecclesiastical courts was merely the grant of letters and the supervision of their execution. The jurisdiction in England was taken away from the ecclesiastical court by stat. 20 & 21 Vic. c. 77, and in the United States, what is known as probate jurisdiction of letters of administration is exercised generally by courts known as probate courts.

The method of procuring letters of administration is similar to that by which letters testamentary are issued to executors. Application is made by the person claiming the right to administer (see ADMINISTRATION) to the probate officer, and in most of the states this application is made by a petition and is followed by a citation to be served upon parties interested or published according to law; any person interested in the estate may appear and show cause against the appointment of the applicant, who is required to show the facts essential to the grant of letters. In England, parties contesting the right must proceed pari passu, and propound their several interests. Before letters are granted a satisfactory bond is usually required from the person selected. The grant of letters is entered as a judicial record, and the letters themselves should be duly authenticated under the seal of the court; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 118. For the form of letters, see Smith, Prob. Pract. App.; 22 Ga. 112. The grant of letters has been held to be prima facie evidence of all the essential jurisdictional facts; 56 Ala. 31; but it is generally considered that the probate court, in granting letters of administration does not adjudicate that the person is dead, but that letters shall be granted to the applicant; 60 N. Y. 121; 10 Pick. 515; and the letters are not legal evidence of the death; 91 U. S. 238. Letters of administration upon the estate of a person who is in fact alive have no validity or effect as against him; 154 U. S. 34. A statute authorizing the grant of letters of administration upon the estate of a person who has not been heard from for seven years is held to deprive a living person of property without due process of law, and therefore unconstitutional; 38 L. R. A. (R. I.) 294.

A grant of letters which includes two estates under one administration would be irregular and objectionable, but it has been held not to be void; 15 Tex. 333; the letters should be signed by the judge or other probate officer; 26 La. Ann. 329; but see 85 N. C. 258; and they are not void if the seal of the court is affixed in the wrong place; 64 Cal. 9. The effect of letters of administration, and the powers and duties of those to whom they are issued are similar to those arising under letters testamentary, which title see. See also ADMINISTRATION.

LETTERS OF BAILERY. In Scotch Law. Commissions by which a heritable proprietor appointed a baron-bailie, to hold courts, appoint officers under him, etc.

LETTERS OF CAPTION. See CAPTION.

LETTERS OF COLLECTION. Letters issued for the temporary purpose of enabling some one to collect and hold the assets pending a controversy as to the right to have letters of administration or letters testamentary.

LETTERS OF EJECTION. In Scotch Law. Letters under the royal signet authorising a sheriff to eject a tenant who had been decreed to remove, and who had disobeyed the charge to remove, proceeding on letters of horning on the decree. Cent. Dict.

LETTERS OF FIRE AND SWORD. See FIRE AND SWORD.

LETTERS OF HORNING. See HORNING.

LETTERS OF INTERCOMMUNING. In Scotch Law. Letters from the privy council prohibiting all persons from holding any kind of intercourse or communication with those therein denounced.

LETTERS OF REQUEST. In English Ecclesiastical Law. An instrument by which a judge of an inferior court waives or remits his own jurisdiction in favor of a court of appeal immediately superior to it.

Letters of request, in general, lie only where an appeal would lie, and lie only to the next immediate court of appeal, waiving merely the primary jurisdiction to the proper appellate court, except letters of request from the most inferior ecclesiastical court, which may be direct to the court of arches, although one or two courts of appeal may by this be ousted of their jurisdiction as courts of appeal; 2 Add. Eccl. 406. The effect of letters of request is to give jurisdiction to the appellate court in the first instance. See a form of letters of request in 2 Chitty, Pr. 498, note h; 3 Steph. Com. 306. The same title was also given to letters formerly granted by the Lord Privy Seal preparatory to granting letters of marque.

LETTERS OF SAFE CONDUCT. See SAFE CONDUCT.

LETTERS PATENT. The name of an instrument granted by the government to convey a right to the patentee: as, a patent for a tract of land; or to secure to him an exclusive right to a new invention or discovery. Letters patent are matter of record. They are so called because they are not sealed up, but are granted open. See PATENT.

LETTERS ROGATORY. An instrument sent in the name and by the authority of a judge or court to another, requesting the latter to cause to be examined, upon interrogatories filed in a cause depending before the former, a witness who is within the jurisdiction of the judge or court to whom such letters are addressed.

They are sometimes denominated commissions sub mutuæ vicissitudinis obtentu, ac in juris subsidium, from a clause which they generally contain. Where the government of a foreign country, in which witnesses purposed to be examined reside, refuses to allow commissioners to administer oaths to such witnesses, or to allow the commission to be executed unless it is done by some magistrate or judicial officer there, according to the laws of that country, letters rogatory must issue.

These letters are directed to any judge or tribunal having jurisdiction of civil causes in the foreign country, recite the pendency of the suit in court, and state that there are material witnesses residing there, whose names are given, without whose testimony justice cannot be done between the parties, and then request the said judge or tribunal to cause the witnesses to come before them and answer to the interrogatories annexed to the letters rogatory, to cause their depositions to be committed to writing and returned with the letters rogatory; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 320. In letters rogatory there is always an offer, on the part of the court whence they issued, to render a mutual service to the court to which they may be directed, whenever required. The practice of such letters is derived from the civil law, by which these letters are sometimes called letters requisitory. A special application must be made to court to obtain an order for letters rogatory, and it will be granted in the first instance without issuing a commission upon satisfactory proof that the authorities abroad will not allow the testimony to be taken in any other manner; 1 Hoffman, Ch. Pr. 482; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 3d Am. ed. 953.

Though formerly used in England in the courts of common law; 1 Rolle, Abr. 530, pl. 13; they have been superseded by commissions of dedimus protestatem, which are considered to be but a feeble substitute. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 223, n.; Hall, Adm. Pr. 37. The courts of admiralty use these letters; and they are recognized by the law of nations. See Fœlix, Droit Intern. liv. 2, t. 4, p. 300; Denisart; Dunlap, Adm. Pr. 221; Bened. Adm. § 533; 1 Hoffm. Ch. 482.

In Nelson v. United States, 1 Pet. C. C. 236, will be found a copy of letters rogatory, issued to the courts of Havana, according to the form and practice of the civil law, on an occasion when the authorities there had prevented the execution of a commission, regarding any attempts to take testimony under it as an interference with the rights of the judicial tribunals of that place. See also, 8 Paige 446; 2 Ves. Sr. 336; 6 Wend. 475.

The United States revised statutes provide for the taking of testimony of witnesses residing within the United States to be used in any suit for the recovery of money or property depending in any court, in any foreign country, with which the United States are at peace, and in which the government of such foreign country shall be a party or shall have an interest. Where a commission of letters rogatory to take such testimony upon interrogatories has been issued from the court in which such suit is pending, it may be produced before the district judge of the district in which the witness resides or is found, and on proof to the judge that the testimony of a witness is material, he shall issue summons to the witness requiring him to appear before the officer or commissioner named in the commission or letters rogatory. The summons must specify the time and place, which shall be within one hundred miles of the place where the witness resides or is served. In case of neglect of a witness to attend and testify he is liable to the same penalties incurred for the like offence in the trial of a suit in the district court of the United States, and he is entitled to the same fees and mileage as are allowed to witnesses in that court. No witness shall be required to criminate himself on such examination; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4072–4. When letters rogatory are addressed from a foreign court to any circuit court of the United States the commissioner appointed by the latter court shall have power to compel witnesses to appear and testify; id. § 875, as amended by U. S. Stat. 1 Supp. 266.

When a commission or letter rogatory is issued to take testimony of a witness in a foreign country, in a suit in which the United States are parties or have any interest, after being executed by the commissioner it is to be returned to the minister or consul of the United States nearest the place where it is executed, and by him transmitted to the clerk of the court from which it was issued; and when so taken and returned the testimony shall be read as evidence, without objection to the method of returning the same; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 875.

Among the class of cases held not to be within the statutes are criminal proceedings; 1 Ben. 225; and proceedings relating to an investigation as to the smuggling of some cases of cotton; 36 Fed. Rep. 306. See, generally, 1 Fost. Fed. Prac., 2d ed. § 290, in the notes to which will be found a great deal of interesting matter relating to the diplomatic correspondence on this subject. See, also, 1 Gall. 166; 1 Hall, Adm. Pr. 37, 38, 55–60; Clerke, Praxis, tit. 27; 3 Whart. Int. L. § 413; 1 Oughton, Ordo Judiciorum 150–152; 1 Rolle, Abr. 530, pl. 15.

LETTERS TESTAMENTARY. An instrument in writing granted by the judge or officer having jurisdiction of the probate of wills, after the probate of a will, to an executor, authorizing him to act as such.

It is issued by the probate officer under his hand and official seal, making known that at a certain date the last will and testament of A B (naming the testator) was duly proved before him; that the probate and grant of administration was within his jurisdiction, and certifying accordingly "that the administration of all and singular the goods, chattels, and credits of the said deceased, and any way concerning his will, was granted" to C D, "the executor named in the said will," "he having been already sworn well and faithfully to administer the same, and to make a true and perfect inventory, etc., and to exhibit the same, etc., and also to render a just and true account thereof."

In England, the original will is deposited in the registry of the ordinary or metropolitan, and a copy thereof made out under his seal; which copy and the letters testamentary are usually styled the probate. This practice has been followed in some of the United States; but where the will needs to be proved in more than one state, the impounding of it leads to much inconvenience. In other states, the original will is returned to the executor, with a certificate that it has been duly proved and recorded, and the letters testamentary are a separate instrument. The letters are usually general; but may be limited as to the locality within which the executor is to act, as to the subject-matter over which he is to have control, or otherwise, as the exigencies of the case or the express directions of the testator may require.

Letters testamentary are granted in case the decedent dies testate; letters of administration, in case he dies intestate, or fails to provide an executor; see ADMINISTRATION, EXECUTOR; but in regard to all matters coming properly under the heads of letters of administration or letters testamentary, there is little or no difference in the law relating to the two instruments.

Letters testamentary and of administration are, according to their terms and extent, conclusive as to personal property while they remain unrevoked. They cannot be questioned in a court of law or of equity, and cannot be impeached, even by evidence of fraud or forgery. Proof that the testator was insane, or that the will was forged, is inadmissible; 12 Ves. 298; 21 Wall. 503; 27 Me. 17; 49 N. H. 295; 75 Pa. 503; 16 Mass. 433; 19 Johns. 386; 10 Ala. 977; 18 Cal. 499; 60 N. Y. 123; 14 Ga. 185; 33 Neb. 509; 113 N. Y. 511; 24 Fla. 237. But if the nature of the plea raise the issue, it may be shown that the court granting the supposed letters had no jurisdiction, and that its action is therefore a nullity; 3 Term 130; see 77 Hun 230; or that the seal attached to the supposed probate has been forged, or that the letters have been revoked, or that the testator is alive; 15 S. & R. 42; 9 Dana 41; 8 Cra. 9; 3 Allen 87; 25 Ala. 408; 70 Tex. 538. Where an executor qualified and acted for many years under his appointment, he will not be allowed to dispute the recitation in his appointment that citation to the heirs was issued and served; 95 Cal. 34.

At common law the executor or administrator has no power over real estate; nor is the probate even admissible as evidence that the instrument is a will, or is an execution of a power to charge land; Wms. Ex. 562. By statute, in some states, the probate is made prima facie or conclusive evidence as to realty; 17 Mass. 68; 23 Conn. 1; 10 Wheat. 470; 3 Pa. 498; 8 B. Monr. 340; 5 La. 388. In some states the probate is made after the lapse of a certain time conclusive as to realty; 9 Pet. 180; 75 Pa. 512; 8 Ohio 246; 26 Ala. 524; 6 Gratt. 564; 8 Wright 189. Land in England under the Land Title and Transfer Act of 1897 goes to the executor or administrator. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER.

Though the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction of the grant of letters, yet where a legacy has been obtained by fraud, or the probate has been procured by fraud on the next of kin, a court of equity would hold the legatee or wrong-doer as bound by a trust for the party injured; Wms. Ex. 552. While a court of equity cannot remove an executor, it may restrain him from acting, and even take the estate out of his hands and place it in the custody of a receiver; 44 N. J. Eq. 385.

Letters may be revoked by the court which made the grant, or an appeal to a higher tribunal, reversing the decision by which they were granted. Special or limited administration will be revoked on the occasion ceasing which called for the grant. An executor or administrator will be removed when the letters were obtained improperly; Wms. Ex. 571.

Of their effect in a state other than that in which legal proceedings were instituted.

In view of the rule of the civil law, that personalia sequuntur personam, certain effect has been given by the comity of nations to a foreign probate granted at the place of the domicil of the deceased, in respect to the personal assets in other states. At common law, the lex loci rei sitæ governs as to real estate, and the foreign probate has no validity; but as to personalty the law of the domicil governs both as to testacy and intestacy. It is customary, therefore, on a due exemplification of the probate granted at the place of domicil, to admit the will to probate, and issue letters testamentary, without requiring original or further proof.

A foreign probate at the place of domicil has in itself no force or effect beyond the jurisdiction in which it was granted, but on its production fresh probate will be granted thereon in all other jurisdictions where assets are found. This is the general rule, but is liable to be varied by statute, and is so varied in some of the states of the United States.

Letters testamentary or of administration confer no power beyond the limits of the state in which they are granted, and do not authorize the person to whom they are issued to maintain any suit in the state or federal courts in any other state; 139 U. S. 156; 108 id. 256; the executor or administrator has therefore, as such, no right of control over property in another state or country; 32 Ga. 260; 27 Ind. 432; 4 McLean 577; 41 Barb. 431; 5 Ired. Eq. 365; he cannot interfere with assets, collect or discharge debts, control lands, sue or be sued; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 173, and cases cited. The principle is, that a grant of power to administer the estate of a decedent operates only as of right within the jurisdiction which grants the letters, and in order that a foreign representative may exercise any such function he must be clothed with authority from the jurisdiction into which he comes, and conform to the requirements imposed by local law; id.; 42 Pa. 467; 64 N. C. 464; 5 McLean 4; 38 Ala. 678; 25 S. C. 1; 143 U. S. 215; 41 Fed. Rep. 68; 55 Mich. 568. In most, probably all, of the American states there is statutory provision, either for the grant of ancillary letters or for authorizing and regulating suits by foreign executors and administrators. In many of them these officers properly qualified abroad are permitted to sue for and recover local assets without other qualification, within the new jurisdiction, than putting on record their authority as conferred by the home jurisdiction, and such authority must be strictly followed. In many of the states there is authority to sue and defend without ancillary administration; 147 U. S. 557; 15 N. J. Eq. 97; 91 Ky. 88; 70 Cal. 403; 32 S. C. 598; and this right to sue has been extended to a foreign corporation duly authorized to act in its own jurisdiction; 5 Houst. 416; in some statutes there is express authority to defend suits; 3 Bush 505; but it has been held that statutory authority to sue does not imply capacity to be sued; 77 Ga. 149; nor to sue for intestate lands where they were made by statute assets in the hands of a domestic administrator; 54 Ark. 324; but to sue for the grant of local administration; 40 id. 195; where no suit is necessary a foreign executor or administrator has been permitted to remove personal property and carry it away for the purpose of administration; 32 N. Y. 21; 45 Minn. 242; 62 Ga. 200; 46 Conn. 370; and in the absence of local administration payment to a foreign representative is recognized; 108 U. S. 256; 109 id. 656; 20 N. Y. 103.

The latter may assign choses in action belonging to the estate, and the assignee may sue thereon in his own name in another state, unless prevented by its laws respecting assignments from so doing; 108 U. S. 256; 64 Ia. 425; 82 Tex. 244; 32 N. Y. 21; he may also sue in another state on a judgment there recovered; 16 Mass. 71; 1 Pet. 686; 4 Mason 16; 41 Md. 539; or he may sue in his individual capacity in another state, on a judgment recovered by him in his official capacity in his own state; 107 Mo. 500; 33 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 555; upon a contract made with himself as such a foreign executor or administrator may sue; 8 Greenl. 346; 30 Ark. 230; Sto. Confl. L. §§ 513–516. The term foreign as applied to executors and administrators refers to the jurisdiction from which their authority is derived and not to residence; 86 Va. 1045; 125 N. Y. 400. The estate of a deceased person is substantially one estate, in which those entitled to the residue are interested as a whole, even though situated in various jurisdictions, and though each distinct part of it must be settled in the jurisdiction by which letters were granted whether for the purpose of ancillary or principal administration; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 174; ordinarily it is the practice to recognize the person appointed executor or administrator at the domicil of the deceased as the person to whom ancillary letters will be granted; 4 Redf. 151; Whart. Confl. L. § 608; but there is no privity between persons appointed in different jurisdictions whether they be different or the same, and the executor or administrator in one state is not concluded in a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff in another state against a person having administration on the estate of the deceased; 139 U. S. 156; 143 Ill. 367; 36 Pac. Rep. (Mon.) 38; 39 S. C. 247. But a different rule has been applied where different executors are appointed by the will in different states, and they are held to be in privity with each other, and a judgment against those in one state is evidence against those in another; 13 How. 458, 469.

When any surplus remains in the hands of a foreign or ancillary appointee after the discharge of all debts in that jurisdiction, it is usually, as a matter of comity, ordered to be paid over to the domiciliary appointee; 56 Ala. 69; 50 L. J. Ch. 740; and in his hands becomes applicable to debts, legacies, and expenses; Schoul. Ex. & Ad, § 174, note 2. It is the policy of the law with respect to these matters to encourage the spirit of comity in subordination to the rights of local creditors who are considered to be entitled to the benefit of assets within their own jurisdiction, rather than to be driven to the assertion of their claims in a foreign state or country; id.; but see LEX FORI.

As a general rule it is the duty of the principal personal representative to collect and make available to the estate all such assets as are available to him consistently with foreign law; 4 M. & W. 171; 1 Cr. & J. 157; even to the extent of seeing that foreign letters are taken out for the collection of foreign assets; or of collecting and realizing upon property and debts so far as it may be done by him, without resort to a foreign jurisdiction; 4 Mason 33; 38 N. Y. 397; 12 Metcalf 421; 103 Mass. 245; but the domestic representative is not to be held in this respect to too onerous a responsibility with respect to foreign property which he cannot realize by virtue of his appointment. See Sto. Confl. L. § 514 a; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 175.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether a voluntary surrender of assets to the domiciliary representative protects the debtor against claims made by virtue of an administration within his own jurisdiction. The United States supreme court, supported by the current of American authority, maintains that, as between the states such payment or delivery of assets is sufficient to discharge the local debtor in the absence of local administration; 18 How. 104; 9 Wall. 741; 108 U. S. 256; 65 Ala. 39; 20 N. Y. 103.

The English doctrine is otherwise; Whart. Confl. L. § 626; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 176; Sto. Confl. L. § 515 a. See Dicey, Confl. L. ch. X. (c), ch. XVII. (B) with Moore's American notes.

See, generally, Williams; Crosswell, Executors; Wharton; Story, Confl. L.; LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION; EXECUTOR; ADMINISTRATOR; CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX LOCI; ADMINISTRATION.

LETTING OUT. In American Law. The act of awarding a contract.

This term is much used in the United States, and most frequently in relation to contracts to construct railroads, canals, or other commercial works. When such an undertaking has reached the point of actual construction, a notice is generally given that proposals will be received until a certain period, and thereupon a letting out, or award of portions of the work to be performed according to the proposals, is made. See 35 Ala. N. S. 55.

LEVANDÆ NAVIS CAUSA (Lat.). In Civil Law. For the sake of lightening the ship. See Leg. Rhod. tit. de Jactu. Goods thrown overboard with this purpose of lightening the ship are subjects of a general average.

LEVANT AND COUCHANT (Lat. Levantes et cubantes). A term applied to cattle that have been so long on the ground of another that they have lain down, and are risen up to feed, until which time they cannot be distrained by the owner of the lands, if the land were not sufficiently fenced to keep out cattle. 3 Bla. Com. 8, 9; Mozl. & W.

LEVARI FACIAS (Lat. that you cause to be levied). In Practice. A writ of execution directing the sheriff to cause to be made of the lands and chattels of the judgment debtor the sum recovered by the judgment.

Under this writ the sheriff was to sell the goods and collect the rents, issues, and profits of the land in question. It has been generally superseded by the remedy by elegit, which was given by statute Westm. 2d (13 Edw. I.), c. 18. In case, however, the judgment debtor is a clerk, upon the sheriff's return that he has no lay fee, a writ in the nature of a levari facius goes to the bishop of the diocese, who thereupon sends a sequestration of the profits of the clerk's benefice, directed to the churchwardens, to collect and pay them to the plaintiff till the full sum be raised. The same course is pursued upon a fi. fa.; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 329. See Comyns, Dig. Execution (c. 4); Finch, Law, 471; 3 Bla. Com. 471; Tr. & H. Pr. 967.

In American Law. A writ used to sell lands mortgaged after a judgment has been obtained by the mortgagee, or his assignee, against the mortgagor, under a peculiar proceeding authorized by statute.

LEVATO VELO (Lat.). An expression used in the Roman law, Code, 11. 4. 5, and applied to the trial of wreck and salvage. Commentators disagree about the origin of the expression; but all agree that its general meaning is that these causes shall be heard summarily. The most probable solution is that it refers to the place where causes were heard. A sail was spread before the door and officers employed to keep strangers from the tribunal. When these causes were heard, this sail was raised, and suitors came directly to the court, and their causes were heard immediately. As applied to maritime courts, its meaning is that causes should be heard without delay. These causes required despatch, and a delay amounts practically to a denial of justice. Emerigon, Des Assurances c. 26, sect. 3.

LEVEES. Embankments to prevent overflow in rivers. See RIVERS.

LEVITICAL DEGREES. Those degrees of kindred set forth in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus, within which persons are prohibited to marry. 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 737.

LEVY. To raise. Webster, Dict. To levy a nuisance, i. e. to raise or do a nuisance, 9 Co. 55; to levy a fine, i. e. to raise or acknowledge a fine, 2 Bla. Com. 357; 1 Steph. Com. 236; to levy a tax, i. e. to raise or collect a tax: to levy war, i. e. to raise or begin war, to take arms for attack, 4 Bla. Com. 81; to levy an execution, i. e. to raise or levy so much money on execution. Reg. Orig. 298.

In Practice. A seizure; the raising of the money for which an execution has been issued.

In order to make a valid levy on personal property, the sheriff must have it within his power and control, or at least within his view; and if, having it so, he makes a levy upon it, it will be good if followed up afterwards within a reasonable time by his taking possession in such manner as to apprise everybody of the fact of its having been taken into execution. See 84 Wis. 80; 99 N. C. 21; 83 Va. 459. To constitute a levy, a seizure is necessary, if from the nature of the property that is possible, but if not, then some act as nearly equivalent as practicable must be substituted for it; 97 N. C. 286. It is not necessary that an inventory should be made, nor that the sheriff should immediately remove the goods or put a person in possession; 3 Rawle 405; 1 Wash. C. C. 29; 46 Pa. 294. See 51 N. J. L. 148. A levy of an attachment effected in the night time by opening a window, or forcing an outer door of the house containing the goods, is valid; 85 Tenn. 368. A levy on a leasehold need not be in view of the premises if sufficiently descriptive; 77 Pa. 103. The usual mode of making levy upon real estate is to describe the land which has been seized under the execution, by metes and bounds, as in a deed of conveyance; 1 T. & H. Pr. § 1216. See 23 Neb. 736. The lien of an attachment on real estate levied upon, dates from the time the officer indorses the levy on the writ; 69 Tex. 198.

It is the duty of the sheriff, in Illinois, to notify the defendant in execution, before making the levy, and to apply to him for the payment of the execution; 129 Ill. 180. Property cannot be placed in custodia legis by an unauthorized levy; 36 Fed. Rep. 770. Retaining possession under a levy is not necessary to preserve the lien of the levy against a subsequent deed of assignment by the debtor; 102 N. C. 79; where the debt and costs are paid before seizure there is no levy; 9 L. J. Q. B. 232; 3 P. & D. 511; or where the fi. fa. was, after seizure but before sale, set aside for irregularity: 31 L. J. C. P. 361; or where the sale was prevented by a compromise between the parties; 5 Term 470. See POUNDAGE; EXECUTION.

It is a general rule that when a sufficient levy has been made the officer cannot make a second; 12 Johns. 208; 8 Cow. 192.

If an officer violates his duty, by making an excessive levy on property pointed out, he is liable for such special damages as the defendant may incur thereby; 77 Ga. 83; and when damages result from the wrongful seizure under judicial process of property exempt, not only the officer making the seizure but those for whom it was made and who ratified the act, as well as those who direct it, are liable in damages: 70 Tex. 661. See ATTACHMENT.

LEVYING WAR. In Criminal Law. The assembling of a body of men for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object; and all who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are leagued in the general conspiracy, are considered as engaged in levying war, within the meaning of the constitution; 4 Cra. 473, 474; Const. art. 3, s. 3. See TREASON; Fries Trial, Pamphl. This is a technical term, borrowed from the English law, and its meaning is the same as it is when used in stat. 25 Ed. III.; 4 Cra. 471; U. S. v. Fries, Pamphl. 167; Hall, Am. L. J. 351; Burr's Trial; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 62; 9 C. & P. 129. Where war has been levied, all who aid in its prosecution by performing any part in furtherance of the common object, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, are guilty of treason; 2 Abbott 304. See INSURRECTION.

LEWDNESS. That form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity. 51 Fed. Rep. 41. See LASCIVIOUSNESS.

LEX (Lat.). A rule of law which magistrates and people had agreed upon by means of a solemn declaration of consensus. Sohm, Inst. R. L. 28.

In the later empire, which dates from the fourth century, there were two groups of the sources of the law, jus (q. v.), i. e. the old traditional law, and leges which had sprung from imperial legislation. Jus was based upon the law of the Twelve Tables, plebiscite, senatus-consulta, the prætorian edict, and the ordinances of the earlier emperors, which, partly owing to their language and partly on account of the bald sententiousness, and the pregnant phraseology in which they were couched, came to be mainly used, both by the prætor and by the parties, through the classic literature where their results were set forth and worked out. This resulted in identifying jus with jurist-made law, and on the edict of the Law of Citations (q. v.) by Valentinian III., the distinction between jus and lex was practically lost. See Inst. 1. 2. 3; Sohm, Inst. R. L. 82; JUS SCRIPTA.

In England there was no careful discrimination between jus, and lex, and consuetudo, although they were not, in all contexts, used with exactly similar meaning. Leges was sometimes applied by both Glanville and Bracton to the unwritten laws of England, and although Bracton contrasts consuetudo with lex, there was no general definite theory as to the relation between enacted and unenacted law—the relation between law and custom, and the relation between law as it was and law as it ought to be. The king's justices claimed a certain power of improving the law, but they might not change the law, and the king might issue new writs without the consent of a national assembly, but not where such writs were contrary to the law. Jus commune was used by the canonists to distinguish the general and ordinary law of the universal church from any rules peculiar to a particular national or provincial church, and from the papal privilegia, and the phrase was also used in the dialogue on the Exchequer, but it was not until the time of Edward I. that it was superseded by lex communis, or that the common law could be contrasted with the statute law, the royal prerogative or local custom. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 154.

LEX ÆBUTIA. The law which, with the leges Juliæ, in part abolished the legis actiones. It was confined to legal proceedings before the prætor urbanus, i. e. to those cases where a judicium was appointed to try a cause between Roman citizens within the first milestone from Rome. It provided that a judicium could be instituted in a city court without legis actio, merely by means of the formula or prætorian decree of appointment, and placed the legis actio and the formula, so far as the civil law was concerned, on a footing of equality. In cases falling under the jurisdiction of the centumviral court, cases of voluntary jurisdiction, and damnum infectum, the legis actio remained in use; as, according to the prætorian law in such cases, no judex was appointed, and consequently no formula was granted, and it was only in cases where there was no formula and no decree of appointment that the legis actio survived. Sohm, Rom. L. 173. See JUDEX; FORMULÆ.

LEX ÆLIA SENTIA. The law restraining the manumission of slaves. Morey, R. L. 99. See MANUMISSION.

LEX AGRARIA. See AGRARIAN LAW.

LEX AMISSA. The law concerning outlaws.

LEX ANASTASIANA. The law admitting as agnati the children of emancipated brothers and sisters. Inst. 3. 5.

LEX APULEIA. A law establishing a kind of partnership between the different sponsores or fide promissors, and allowing any one of them who had paid the whole debt to recover from the others what he had paid in excess of his own share by an action pro socio. Inst. 3. 20.

LEX AQUILIA. The law, superseding the earlier portions of the Twelve Tables, providing a remedy for wilful and negligent damage to corporeal property.

Although an action founded upon the text of this law could only be brought when the damage was caused by actual contact of the offending party with the body of the injured thing, the prætor subsequently extended it in the shape of an actio utilis, to cases where the damage was merely the indirect result of the act of the defendant, and in certain cases, he even granted an actio in factum after the pattern of the lex aquilia in cases where there was not, strictly speaking, any damage to the thing, but where the owner was deprived of it in such a manner as to make it tantamount to a destruction of the thing.

By this law, if the slave or animal were wrongfully killed, the owner could recover from the slayer, not the actual value of the property at the time of the death, but the greatest value that it had possessed during the previous year, and when the damage consisted of any other injury to corporeal things, he was obliged to pay the highest value of such property within the month immediately preceding. If the wrongdoer denied his liability and judgment was against him, he was obliged to pay double damages. This law also provided for an action against adstipulators who abused their formal rights, but this portion of it fell into disuse because the recognition by the civil law of the obligation by mandatum enabled the injured party to sue the fraudulent adstipulator by the actio mandati directa for full damages. See Sohm, Rom. L. 238; Morey, Rom. L. 261.

LEX ATILIA. The law which conferred upon the magistrate the right of appointing guardians. It applied only to the city of Rome; Sohm. Inst. Rom. L. 400.

LEX ATINIA. A plebiscitum named after its proposer, Atinius Labeo, 557. It provided that things stolen or seized by violence could not be acquired by use, although they have been possessed bona fide during the length of time prescribed by usucapion (q. v.). Inst. 2. 6. 3.

LEX BREHONIA. The Brehon law, which see.

LEX BRETOISE. The law of the Ancient Britons or Marches of Wales. Cowel.

LEX CALPURNIA. The law which extended the scope of the action allowed by the lex Silia, q. v., to all obligations for any certain definite thing.

LEX CANULEIA. The law which conferred upon the plebeians the connubium, or the right of intermarriage with Roman citizens. Morey, Rom. L. 48.

LEX CINCIA. The law which prohibited certain kinds of gifts.

LEX CLAUDIA. The law abolishing agnatic guardianship over women of free birth.

LEX COMMISSORIA. The law which provided that the debtor and creditor might agree that if the debtor did not pay at the day, the pledge should become the absolute property of the creditor. This law was abolished by a law of the Emperor Constantine as unjust and oppressive, and having a growing asperity in practice. 2 Kent 583.

LEX CORNELIA DE ÆDICTIS. The law forbidding a prætor to depart during his term of office from the edict he had promulgated at its commencement. Sohm, Rom. L. 51. See PRÆTOR.

LEX CORNELIA DE INJURIIS. The law providing a civil action for the recovery of a penalty in certain cases of bodily injury. Sohm, R. L. 329.

LEX CORNELIA DE FALSIS. The law which provided that the same penalty should attach to the forgery of a testament of a person dying in captivity as to that of a testament made by a person dying in his own country. Inst. 2. 12. 5.

LEX CORNELIA DE SPONSU. A law prohibiting one from binding himself for the same debtor to the same creditor in the same year for more than a specified amount. Inst. 2. 20.

LEX CORNELIA DE SICARIIS. The law respecting assassins and poisoners, and containing provisions against other deeds of violence. It made the killing of the slave of another person punishable by death or exile, and the provisions of this law were extended by the Emperor Antoninus Pius to the case of a master killing his own slave. Inst. 1. 8.

LEX DE RESPONSIS PRUDENTUM. The law of citations (q. v.).

LEX DOMICILII. See DOMICIL; LEX LOCI.

LEX FABIA DE PLAGIARIUS. The law providing for the infliction of capital punishment in certain cases. Inst. 4. 18. 10.

LEX FALCIDIA. See FALCIDIAN LAW.

LEX FORI (Lat. the law of the forum). The law of the country to the tribunal of which appeal is made. 5 Cl. & F. 1.

The local or territorial law of the country to which a court, wherein an action is brought, or other legal proceeding is taken, belongs. Dicey, Confl. Laws 66.

The forms of remedies, modes of procedure; 112 U. S. 452; and execution of judgments are regulated solely and exclusively by the laws of the place where the action is instituted; 8 Cl. & F. 121; 11 M. & W. 877; 1 B. & A. 284; 5 La. 295; 2 Rand. 308; 6 Humphr. 45; 2 Ga. 158; 13 N. H. 321; 4 Zabr. 333; 9 Gill 1; 17 Pa. 91; 4 McLean 540; 11 Ind. 385; 12 Vt. 48; 91 U. S. 406; 36 Conn. 39; 2 Woods, C. C. 244; 26 Ark. 368; 83 Ill. 365; 27 Ia. 251; 42 Miss. 444; 52 N. Y. 429; 135 U. S. 309; 143 id. 187; 83 Ala. 462; Rorer, Int.-St. Law 69. See 44 Ill. App. 535; PARTIES.

A cause of action arising in one state, under the common law as there understood, may be enforced in another state where it would not constitute a cause of action, if the variance in these laws does not amount to a fundamental difference of policy; 160 Mass. 571.

The lex fori is to decide who are proper parties to a suit; 11 Ind. 485; 33 Miss. 423; Merlin, Rép. Etrang. § II.; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 409.

The lex fori governs as to the nature, extent, and character of the remedy; 17 Conn. 500; 37 N. H. 86; 2 Pat. & H. 144; as, in case of instruments considered sealed where made, but not in the country where sued upon; 5 Johns. 239; 1 B. & P. 360; 3 Gill & J. 284; 3 Conn. 523; 27 Ia. 251; 91 U. S. 406; 9 Mo. 56, 157.

Arrest and imprisonment may be allowed by the lex fori, though they are not by the lex loci contractus; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 14 Johns. 346; 3 Mass. 88; 10 Wheat. 1.

For the law of interest as affected by the lex fori, see CONFLICT OF LAWS. For the law in relation to damages, see DAMAGES.

The forms of judgment and execution are to be determined by the lex fori; 8 Mass. 88; 4 Conn. 47; 14 Pet. 67.

The lex fori decides as to deprivation of remedy in that jurisdiction.

Where a debt is discharged by the law of the place of payment, such discharge will, it is said, amount to a discharge everywhere; 12 Wheat. 360; 1 W. Bla. 258; 13 Mass. 1; 16 Mart. La. 297; 7 Cush. 15; 1 Woodb. & M. 115; 23 Wend. 87; 5 Binn. 332; 16 Me. 206; 2 Blackf. 366; see 6 Dak. 91; LEX LOCI; unless such discharge is held by courts of another jurisdiction to contravene natural justice; 13 Mass. 6; 1 South. 192. It must be a discharge from the debt, and not an exemption from the effect of particular means of enforcing the remedy; 14 Johns. 346; 8 B. & C. 479; 7 Me. 337; 11 Mart. La. 730; 15 Mass. 419; 5 Mass. 387.

The insolvent laws of the various states which purport to discharge the debt are, at most, allowed that effect only as against their own citizens; as between their own citizens and strangers, where the claims of the latter have not been proved, they only work a destruction in the remedy; 5 Mas. 375; 4 Conn. 47; 14 Pet. 67; 12 Wheat. 213, 358, 369; 8 Pick. 194; 3 Ia. 299; 71 Wis. 350; 128 Ill. 222; 123 Pa. 452; at least, if there be no provision in the contract requiring performance in the state where the discharge is obtained; 9 Conn. 314; 13 Mass. 18, 20; 7 Johns. Ch. 297; 1 Breese 16; 4 Gill & J. 509. In the United States and some state courts, the discharge of a citizen of the state, granting a discharge from an obligation, is not a bar against a citizen of another state, although the contract creating the obligation was to be performed in the state granting the discharge; 1 Wall. 223; 3 Keyes 30; 5 Md. 1; 25 Conn. 603; 48 Me. 9; 2 Blackf. 394; but see 2 Gray 43. If claims are proved, the submission to the jurisdiction may work a discharge; 3 Johns. Ch. 435; 3 Pet. 411; 5 How. 295, 299; 7 Cush. 45; 2 Blackf. 394. See INSOLVENCY.

Statutes of limitation affect the remedy only; and hence the lex fori will be the governing law; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 8 id. 121, 140; 11 Pick. 36; 7 Ind. 91; 2 Paine 437; 36 Me. 362; 83 Ill. 365; 68 N. Y. 33; 51 Fed. Rep. 188; 77 Ga. 202; 65 Hun 17; 111 U. S. 31; L. R. 4 Q. B. 653; 72 Tex. 306. But these statutes restrict the remedy for citizens and strangers alike; 10 B. & C. 903; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 3 Johns. Ch. 190; 6 Wend. 475; 9 Mart. La. 526. For the effect of a discharge by statutes of limitation, where they are so drawn as to effect a discharge, in a foreign state, see Story, Confl. Laws § 582; 11 Wheat. 361; 2 Bingh. N. C. 202; 6 Rob. La. 15; 3 Hen. & M. 57. The restriction applies to a suit on a foreign judgment; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 13 Pet. 312; 4 Cow. 528; 1 Gall. 371; 9 How. 407. If a statute in force in the place where the cause of action arose extinguishes the obligation, and does not merely bar the remedy, no action can be maintained in another jurisdiction after it has taken effect; 148 Pa. 146; 6 Dak. 91. In some states, by statute, where suit is brought on a contract made in another state, the statute of limitations in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose is made to apply.

The right of set-off is to be determined by the lex fori; 2 N. H. 296; 6 B. Monr. 301; 18 Oreg. 57; 88 Ill. 365; 3 Johns. 263. See 13 N. H. 126. Liens, implied hypothecations, and priorities of claim, generally, are matters of remedy; 12 La. Ann. 289; but only, it would seem, where the property affected is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the forum; Whart. Confl. L. § 317; 5 Cra. 289. See L. R. 3 Ch. App. 484. A prescriptive title to personal property, acquired in a former domicil, will be respected by the lex fori; 17 Ves. 88; 3 Hen. & M. 57; 5 Cra. 358; 11 Wheat. 361; 1 Coldw. 43; 5 B. Monr. 521; 16 Hun 80.

Questions of the admissibility and effect of evidence are to be determined by the lex fori; 12 La. Ann. 410; 12 Barb. 631; 7 Ohio St. 134; 106 U. S. 124; 115 Mass. 304; also questions of costs; 36 Neb. 507. Exemption laws are ordinarily governed by the lex fori; 31 Kan. 180; 70 Miss. 344. See 97 Ala. 275; EVIDENCE.

The administration of a deceased person's movables is governed wholly by the law of the country where the administrator acts and from which he derives his authority to collect them (lex fori); and without regard to the domicil of the deceased; but the distribution of the distributable residue is governed by the lex domicilii; Dicey, Confl. Laws 674, 677; 28 Ch. D. 175; 72 Ala. 311; 70 Ga. 528; 152 Mass. 74; 31 W. Va. 790; 143 Ill. 25. Usually the distributable residue is remitted to the administration of the domicil for distribution; 88 Pa. 131; but it is in the discretion of the court of the ancillary administration to distribute such residue; 152 Mass. 74; 25 S. C. 1; 161 Pa. 218. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

An action in tort for an act done in a foreign country will not lie in England unless the act was a tort both in such foreign country and in England; Dicey, Confl. Laws 660. So in the United States; 86 Tex. 68; 126 N. Y. 10; 50 Ark. 155; 72 Md. 144. But it is ordinarily assumed that the laws of the two countries are the same; 160 Mass. 571.

Whether an act constitutes an actionable wrong in England which is tortious by the law of England, and not strictly justifiable under the law of the country where it was done, though not actionable there, is doubtful; Dicey, Confl. Laws 661; 10 Q. B. D. (C. A.) 521; 1 H. & C. 219. An action lies in one state on a wrong done in another state, which is actionable there, although it would not be actionable in the state where suit is brought unless it be contrary to its own public policy; 146 U. S. 643; 81 Fed. Rep. 294.

The damages recoverable from an employer for the death of his employe, caused by the negligence of the former, are controlled by the law of the place where the contract of employment was made and the accident occurred, though the death took place and the action was brought in another state; 154 U. S. 190. The statutes of one state giving an action for wrongful death may be enforced in the federal courts of another state, if not inconsistent with the statutes and policy thereof; 145 U. S. 593. An action of tort will lie in England to be tried under the rules of the maritime law, in case of a collision on the high seas between two foreign ships; 10 Q. B. D. (C. A.) 521. See, also, the Merchants Shipping Act, 1894. In the United States, in case of a collision on the high seas between ships of different nationalities, the general maritime law governs, as administered in the courts of the country in which the action is brought, except that if the maritime law, as administered by both nations to which the respective ships belong, be the same in both in respect to any matter of liability or obligation, such law, if shown to the court, should be followed, although different from the maritime law of the country of the forum; 114 U. S. 355. See also 14 Wall. 170; 105 U. S. 24.

The law of the forum as to the validity of a bequest will be applied to a gift by will to a foreign corporation, especially when this carries out and does not frustrate the testator's intention, although the law of the state which created the corporation may be different; 35 L. R. A. (Md.) 693.

As to the proof of foreign law, see FOREIGN LAW.

LEX FURIA CANINIA. The law which fixed the limit of testamentary manumissions within certain limits. It was repealed by Justinian, as invidiously placing obstacles in the way of liberty. Sohm, Rom. L. 114; Inst. 7.

LEX FURIA DE SPONSU. The law limiting the liability of sponsors and fidepromissors to two years, and providing that as between several co-sponsors or co-fidepromissors, the debt should be ipso jure, divided according to the number of the sureties without taking the solvency of individual sureties into account. It applied only to Italy. Sohm, Rom. L. 299, n.; Inst. 3. 20.

LEX FURIA TESTAMENTARIA. A law enacting that a testator might not bequeath as a legacy more than one thousand asses.

LEX GERNICIA. A law declaring interest illegal. Inst. 3. 13.

LEX HORTENSIA. The law giving the plebeians a full share in the jus publicum and the jus sacrum. Sand. Just. Introd. § 9.

LEX JULIA. See LEGES JULIÆ.

LEX JUNIA NORBANA. The law conferring legal freedom on all such freedmen as were tuitione prætoris. See LATINI JUNIANI. Lex Junia Villejani conferred the same right on posthumous children born in the lifetime of the testator, but after the execution of the will, as were enjoyed by those born after the death of the testator. Sohm. Rom. L. 463.

LEX KANTIÆ. The body of customs prevailing in Kent during the time of Edward I. A written statement of these customs was sanctioned by the king's justices in eyre. They were mainly concerned with the maintenance of a form of land tenure known as gavelkind (q. v.). 1 Poll. & Maitl. 166.

LEX LÆTORIA. See LEX PLÆTORIA.

LEX LOCI (Lat.). The law of the place. This may be either lex loci contractus (the law of the place of making a contract); lex loci rei sitæ or lex situs (the law of the place where a thing is situated); lex loci actus, or lex actus (the law of the place where a legal transaction takes place); lex loci celebrationis (the law of the place where a contract is made); lex loci solutionis (the law of the place where a contract is to be performed); lex loci delicti commissi (the law of the place where a tort is committed).

In general, however, lex loci is only used for lex loci contractus. As will appear infra, lex loci contractus is used in a double sense in many of the cases. It is used sometimes to denote the law of the place where the contract was made, and at other times to denote the law by which the contract is to be governed, which may or may not be the same as that of the place where it was made. The earlier cases do not regard the distinction, and are to be read with this fact in mind. See infra, where the distinction is made clear by Dicey, Confl. of Laws.

CONTRACTS. In the older cases it is held that it is a general principle applying to contracts made, rights acquired, or acts done relative to personal property, that the law of the place of making the contract, or doing the act, is to govern it and determine its validity or invalidity, as well as the rights of parties under it, in all matters touching the modes of execution and authentication of the form or instruments of contract; and also in relation to the use and meaning of the language in which it is expressed, the construction and interpretation of it, the legal duties and obligations imposed by it and the legal rights and immunities acquired under it; 8 Cl. & F. 121; 1 Pet. 317; 2 N. H. 42; 6 Vt. 102; 7 Cush. 30; 3 Conn. 253, 472; 14 id. 583; 22 Barb. 118; 17 Pa. 91; 2 H. & J. 193; 3 Dev. 161; 8 Mart. La. 95; 4 Ohio St. 241; 14 B. Monr. 556; 19 Mo. 84; 4 Fla. 404; 23 Miss. 42; 12 La. Ann. 607; 3 Stor. 465; Ware 402; 91 U. S. 406; 24 N. J. L. 319; 36 Conn. 39; 2 Woods, C. C. 244; 65 Barb. 265.

This principle, though general, does not, however, apply where the parties at the time of entering into the contract had the law of another country in view, or where the lex loci is in itself unjust, contra bonos mores (against good morals), or contrary to the public law of the state, as regarding the interest of religion or morality, or the general well-being of society; 9 N. H. 271; 6 Pet. 172; 1 How. 169; 17 Johns. 511; 13 Mass. 23; 5 Cl. & F. 11; 8 id. 121; 6 Whart. 331; 1 B. Monr. 32; 5 Ired. 590; Story, Confl. Laws § 280; see 38 W. Va. 390; 58 Fed. Rep. 796; or the rights of citizens of the forum; 12 Barb. 631; 13 Mass. 6. And where the place of performance is different from the locus contractus, it is presumed the parties had the law of the former in mind; 55 Fed. Rep. 223; App. Cas. D. C. 277.

Where an oral promise was made in South Carolina to accept a draft payable in New York, it was held that matters bearing on the execution, interpretation, and validity of the contract are determined by the law of the place where it is made; those connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance, and that the contract in question was governed by the law of South Carolina; 26 U. S. App. 133.

Where residents of two different states enter into a contract which would be invalid in one state, but valid in the other, and by its terms make it a contract of the latter state, and to be there performed, it will be presumed that they intended it to be governed by the laws of such state; 83 Fed. Rep. 403.

The validity or invalidity of a contract as affected by the lex loci may depend upon the capacity of the parties or the legality of the act to be done.

The capacity of the parties as affected by questions of minority or majority, incapacities incident to coverture, guardianship, emancipation, and other personal qualities or disabilities, is, it has been said, to be decided by the law of the place of making the contract; Story, Confl. Laws § 103; 1 Grant 51. See infra.

The question of disability to make a contract on account of infancy is to be decided by the lex loci; 3 Esp. 163, 597; 17 Mart. La. 597; 8 Johns. 189; 1 Grant 51; 2 Kent 233. So, also, as to contracts made by married women; 8 Johns. 189; 13 La. 177; 5 East 31.

Personal disqualifications not arising from the law of nature, but from positive law, and especially such as are penal, are strictly territorial, and are not to be enforced in any country other than that where they originate; Story, Confl. Laws §§ 91, 104, 620; 2 Kent 459. See Whart. Confl. L. § 101; 67 Barb. 9.

Natural disabilities, such as insanity, imbecility, etc., are everywhere recognized, so that the question whether they are controlled by the lex loci or lex domicilii seems to be theoretic rather than practical. On principle there seems to be no good reason why they should come under a different rule from the positive disabilities.

It is said that the weight of American authority is in favor of holding that a contract which by the law of the place is recognized as lawfully made by a capable person, is valid everywhere, although the person would not, under the law of his domicil, be deemed capable of making it; 125 Mass. 374; see 84 N. Y. 393; 69 Me. 105. But Dicey (Confl. Laws) is of opinion that the capacity to contract is governed by the lex domicilii; and in 112 U. S. 452, it is said that "as a general rule the law of the dom-icil governs the status of a person." See, also, 87 Tenn. 445, 644.

The legality or illegality of the contract will be determined by the lex loci, unless it affects injuriously the public morals or rights, contravenes the policy, or violates a public law of the country where a remedy is sought; 2 Kent 458.

A contract illegal by the law of the place of its making and performance will generally be held so everywhere; 1 Gall. 375; 2 Mass. 88; 2 N. H. 42; 2 Mas. 459; 13 Pet. 65, 78; 2 Johns. Cas. 355; 1 N. & M'C. 173; 2 H. & J. 193, 221, 225; 17 Ill. 328; 16 Tex. 344; 2 Burr. 1077; 2 Kent 458; Story, Confl. Laws § 243. See 38 Fed. Rep. 800; 42 Ch. D. (C. A.) 321; but see 112 N. C. 59; but Dicey, Confl. Laws 560, is of opinion that this rule, though sound in principle, does not rest, in England, upon an unassailable foundation of authority.

An exception is said to exist in case of contracts made in violation of the revenue laws; Cas. t. Hardw. 85; 2 C. Rob. 6; 2 Cr. M. & R. 311; 2 Kent 458.

A contract legal by the lex loci will be so everywhere; 13 La. Ann. 117; 146 Ill. 523; unless—

It is injurious to public rights or morals; 2 C. & P. 347; 1 B. & P. 340; 6 Mass. 379; 2 H. & J. 193; or contravenes the policy; 23 Ark. 523; 60 Ala. 380; 2 Sim. Ch. 194; 16 Johns. 438; 5 Harring. 31; 1 Green, Ch. 326; 17 Ga. 253. See 82 Ga. 142; 112 N. C. 59; or violates a positive law of the lex fori; or, in England, violates any English rule of procedure; Dicey, Confl. Laws 542. The application of the lex loci is a matter of comity; and that law must, in all cases, yield to the positive law of the place of seeking the remedy; 18 Pick. 193; 1 Green, Ch. 326; 12 Barb. 631; 17 Miss. 247. See 10 N. Y. 53.

It is held generally that the claims of citizens are to be preferred to those of foreigners. Assignments, under the insolvent laws of a foreign state, are often held inoperative as against claims of a citizen of the state, in regard to personal property in the jurisdiction of the lex fori; 1 Green, Ch. 326; 5 Harring. 31; 32 Miss. 246; 13 La. Ann. 280; 21 Barb. 198; but see 12 Md. 54. But there appears to be a distinction. This rule is well settled in all cases where the assignment of the property of an insolvent is made, in invitum, by a court in a foreign jurisdiction, to a receiver, assignee, etc.; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7338; 14 Allen 355; 123 Ind. 477; 81 Cal. 551. But where a voluntary assignment is made, if good where made and made in conformity with the law where the property is situated, it is valid in the latter state, ex proprio vigore; 117 Pa. 30; 10 Mo. App. 7; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7347; Story, Confl. L. § 111.

A contract made with a view to violate the law at the place of performance is invalid; 14 R. I. 398; 62 Ind. 587. An immoral contract, e. g. to bribe or corruptly influence the officers of a foreign government, will not be enforced wherever made; 103 U. S. 261; or one that violates good morals; 42 Miss. 444; 37 N. J. L. 28; but Sunday laws are not considered as rules of positive morality; 67 Miss. 405; nor, ordinarily, are usury laws; 103 Mass. 328; 77 N. Y. 578. See Moore's note to Dicey, Confl. Laws 582. It was said, in a case of usury, that if a contract is valid by the law of the state where it is made, and is not immoral, the courts of another state will enforce it, although its own laws prohibit such a contract; 31 Fed. Rep. 516.

In an action in Pennsylvania on a promissory note governed as to the contract by the law of New Jersey, the question of whether parol evidence will be admitted to vary the contract must depend upon the law of New Jersey, and not upon the lex fori. It was said that the right to introduce proof dehors the instrument for the purpose of showing what, in fact, the contract was, is an essential part of the contract itself, and not a mere incident to the remedy; 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 115, citing 110 Pa. 478; 148 Pa. 146; and 154 Mass. 213.

A statute requiring a foreign corporation, as a condition of doing business within the state, to stipulate not to remove suits into the federal court, is void because it makes the right to a permit dependent on the surrender by the foreign corporation of a privilege secured to it by the constitution and laws of the United States; 121 U. S. 186; 20 Wall. 445. See JURISDICTION.

The interpretation of contracts is to be governed by the law of the country where the contract was made; 2 B. & Ad. 746; 10 B. & C. 903; 2 Hagg. Cons. 60, 61; 8 Pet. 361; 30 Ala. N. S. 253; 4 McLean 540; 2 Bla. Com. 141; Story, Confl. Laws § 270.

The lex loci governs as to the formalities and authentication requisite to the valid execution of contracts; Story, Confl. Laws §§ 123, 260; 11 La. 14; 2 Hill N. Y. 227; 37 N. H. 86; 30 Vt. 42. But in proving the existence of, and seeking remedies for, the breach, as well as in all questions relating to the competency of witnesses, course of procedure, etc., the lex fori must govern; 11 Ind. 385; 9 Gill 1; 17 Pa. 91; 18 Ala. N. S. 248; 4 McLean 540; 5 How. 83; 6 Humphr. 75; 17 Conn. 500; 9 Mo. 56, 157; 4 Gilm. 521; 26 Barb. 177; Story, Confl. Laws §§ 567, 634. See LEX FORI.

The lex loci governs as to the obligation and contruction of contracts; 11 Pick. 32; 8 Vt. 325; 12 N. H. 520; 12 Wheat. 213; 2 Keen 293; 1 B. & P. 138; 12 Wend. 439; 13 Mart. La. 202; 14 B. Monr. 556; 15 Miss. 798; unless, from their tenor, it must be presumed they were entered into with a view to the laws of some other state; 13 Mass. 1; 11 Colo. 118. This presumption arises where the place of performance is different from the place of making; 31 E. L. & Eq. 433; 17 Johns. 511; 13 Pet. 65; 9 La. Ann. 185; 13 Mass. 23; 91 U. S. 406; 2 Woods 244.

It has been held that a lien or privilege affecting personal estate, created by the lex loci, will generally be enforced wherever the property may be found; 8 Mart. 95; 5 La. 295; Story, Confl. Laws § 402; but not necessarily in preference to claims arising under the lex fori, when the property is within the jurisdiction of the court of the forum; 5 Cra. 289, 298; 12 Wheat. 361; Whart. Confl. L. § 324. It is said that the former rule that the assignment of a movable is invalid unless it be made in accordance with the lex domicilii, is now rejected by the English courts, which now hold that a transfer of goods in accordance with the lex situs gives a good title in England; Dicey, Confl. Laws 532. But it is held in this country that a transfer of movables made in the place of the owner's domicil and in accordance with its laws will be enforced by the courts of the place where the movables are situated, although the method of transfer be different from that prescribed by the latter country; but not when the statutes of the place where they are situate or the policy of its laws prescribe a different rule; Moore's note to Dicey, Confl. Laws 538; 7 Wall. 139; 147 U. S. 476. See supra.

A discharge from the performance of a contract under the lex loci is a discharge everywhere; 5 Mass. 509; 7 Cush. 15; 4 Wheat. 122, 209; 12 id. 213; 2 Mas. 161; 2 Blackf. 394; 24 Wend. 43; 2 Kent 394. A distinction is to be taken between discharging a contract and taking away the remedy for a breach; 3 Mas. 88; 4 Conn. 47; 12 Wheat. 347; 8 Pick. 194; 9 Conn. 314; 2 Blackf. 394; 9 N. H. 478.

As to the effect of a discharge from an obligation by a state insolvent law upon a debt due a citizen of another state, see LEX FORI.

Statutes of limitations ordinarily apply to the remedy, but do not discharge the debt; 9 How. 407; 20 Pick. 310; 2 Paine 437; 2 Mas. 751; 6 N. H. 557; 6 Vt. 127; 8 Port. (Ala.) 84. See LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF; LEX FORI.

A question of some difficulty often arises as to what the locus contractus is, in the case of contracts made partly in one country or state and partly in another, or made in one state or country to be performed in another, or where the contract in question is accessory to a principal contract.

Where a contract is made partly in one country and partly in another, it is a contract of the place where the assent of the parties first concurs and becomes complete; 2 Parsons, Contr. 94; 27 N. H. 217, 244; 11 Ired. 303; 3 Strobh. 27; 1 Gray 336.

As between the place of making and the place of performance, where a place of performance is specified, the law of the place of performance governs as to the obligation, interpretation, etc.; 5 East 124; 1 Gall. 371; 12 Vt. 648; 12 Pet. 456; 1 How. 182; 8 Paige, Ch. 261; 5 McLean 448; 27 Vt. 8: 14 Ark. 189; 7 B. Monr. 575; 9 Mo. 56, 157; 4 Gilm. 521; 21 Ga. 135; 30 Miss. 59; 7 Ohio 134; 4 Mich. 450; 62 N. Y. 151; 24 Ia. 412; 150 Pa. 466. Contracts made in one place to be performed in another are, as a general rule, to be governed by the law of the place of performance: 142 U. S. 101; 38 W. Va. 390. Where there is nothing to show that the parties had in view, in respect to the execution of a contract, any other law than that of the place of performance, that law must determine the rights of the parties; 142 U. S. 115. See 81 Ga. 522.

Where the contract is to be performed generally, the law of the place of making governs; 2 B. & Ald. 301; 5 Cl. & F. 12; 1 Metc. Mass. 82; 6 Cra. 221; 6 Ired. 107; 17 Miss. 220.

If the contract is to be performed partly in one state and partly in another, it will be affected by the law of both states; 91 U. S. 406; 14 B. Monr. 556; 22 Barb. 118. But see 2 Woods 244; 24 Ia. 412. A contract of affreightment made in one country between citizens or residents thereof, and the performance of which begins there, must be governed by the law of that country, unless the parties, when entering into the contract, clearly manifested a mutual intention that it should be governed by the laws of some other country; 129 U. S. 397.

In cases of indorsement of negotiable paper, every indorsement is a new contract, and the place of each indorsement is in its locus contractus; 2 Kent 460; 17 Johns. 511; 9 B. & C. 208; 13 Mass. 1; 25 Ala. N. S. 139; 19 N. Y. 436; 17 Tex. 102.

The place of payment is the locus contractus, however, as between indorsee and drawer. See 19 N. Y. 436; 53 Fed. Rep. 474; 9 C. C. App. 261.

The place of acceptance of a draft is regarded as the locus contractus; 3 Gill 430; 1 Q. B. 43; 4 Pet. 111; 8 Metc. 107; 4 Dev. 124; 6 McLean 622; 9 Cush. 46; 13 N. Y. 290; 18 Conn. 138; 17 Miss. 220; 142 U. S. 116.

A bill of exchange drawn in Indiana, accepted in Michigan, to be discounted in Indiana and paid in Michigan, is an Indiana contract; 52 Fed. Rep. 291.

A note made in one state and payable in another, is not subject to the usury laws of the latter state, if it was valid in that respect in the state where it was made; 60 id. 730. A note executed in one state and payable in another is governed, as to defences against an indorsee, by the law of the latter state, though sued on in the state where made; id. 730. See PROMISSORY NOTES; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; as to what is presumed to be lex loci, see FOREIGN LAWS; LEX FORI.

Dicey, in his recent and very able work on the Conflict of Laws, defines lex loci contractus merely as the law of the place where the contract is entered into, and uses it only in that sense. To designate the law by which the contract is governed, he uses the phrase, "the proper law of the contract," which may be, and usually is, the lex loci contractus, or may be, by the express will of the parties, or by inference, the law of some other place. He maintains that the capacity to contract is governed by the law of the domicil (except, probably, in the case of ordinary mercantile contracts which are governed by the law of the place where the contract is made; and except, of course, contracts relating to land). The formal validity of the contract is governed by the law of the place where it is made, except contracts relating to land and contracts made in one country in accordance with the local form in respect of a movable situated in another country, which, he thinks, may possibly be invalid if they do not comply with the special formalities (if any) required by the law of the country where the movable is situated at the time of the making of the contract, and except, possibly, a contract made in one country, but intended to operate wholly in, and to be subject to the law of, another country, even though not made according to the local form, if made in accordance with the form required, or allowed by the law of the country where the contract is to operate. This last exception is not, however, in his opinion, supported by adequate authority.

The essential validity of a contract is governed by what he terms the "proper law of the contract," which he defines as the law, or laws, by which the parties to a contract intended, or may fairly be presumed to have intended, the contract to be governed. This may be the law of the place where the contract was made, or it may be the place of performance. But there are, he says, wide exceptions to this rule. The contract must not be opposed to English interests, or the policy of English law, or to the moral rules upheld by English law. The contract must not be unlawful by the law of the country where it is made; and its performance must not be unlawful by the law of the country where it is to be performed; and it must not form part of a transaction which is unlawful by the law of the country where the transaction is to take place, though this probably does not apply to contracts in violation of the revenue laws of a foreign country.

The interpretation of a contract, and the rights and obligations under it of the parties thereto, are to be determined by the "proper law of the contract." This law may be designated by the express words of the contract, indicating the intention of the parties, which, in general, governs; or their intention may be inferred from the terms and nature of the contract, and from the general circumstances of the case. In the absence of counteracting considerations, the proper law of the contract is, prima facie, presumed to be the law of the country where the contract is made; especially when the contract is to be performed in the country where it is made, or may be performed anywhere, but it may apply to a contract partly, or even wholly, to be performed in another country. Where the contract is to be performed wholly or partly in another country, the proper law of the contract, especially as to the mode of performance, may be presumed to be the law of the country where the performance is to take place. These presumptions are said to be grounded on the probable intention of the parties.

The validity of the discharge of a contract (otherwise than by bankruptcy) depends upon the proper law of the contract, that is, the law to which the parties, when contracting, intended to submit themselves. But this writer says there is a lack of decided authority on this point.

The same writer, after saying that the reports and text books of authority reiterate the rule that a contract is governed by the law of the place where it is made, points out that when English courts first began to deal with the conflict of laws, they referred everything, except matters of procedure, to the lex loci contractus, by which they meant the law of the place where the contract was actually entered into. When they subsequently found it necessary to give effect to other laws than those of the place where the contract was made, and especially to the laws of the place of performance, the change of doctrine was combined with a verbal adherence to an old formula not really consistent with the new theory. They retained the expression lex loci contractus, but reinterpreted it to mean the law of the country with a view to the law whereof the contract was made. This might be the law of the country where the contract was made, or it might be the law of some other country, and was frequently the law of the country where the contract was to be performed. The same result was sometimes attained by another method of reasoning. It was laid down that a person must be assumed to have contracted at the place where his contract was to be performed. By either method of interpretation an actual reference to the law contemplated by the parties was masked under a nominal reference to the law of the place of the contract. This adherence to the term lex loci contractus has produced two effects. It has until recent years concealed from English lawyers the principle that the interpretation, as contrasted with the formal validity, of a contract is governed by the law (of whatever country) contemplated by the parties, and that this law is constantly the law of the place of performance, and it has led English judges to give a preference to the lex loci contractus, upon which the English courts fall back in doubtful cases. But English judges, as well as foreign courts and writers, both adopt the principle that the interpretation of a contract and the obligation arising under it are, in so far as they depend on the will of the parties, to be determined in accordance with the law contemplated by the parties; Dicey, Confl. Laws 726.

The phrase lex loci contractus is used in a double sense, to mean, sometimes the law of a place where a contract is entered into; sometimes that of the place of its performance. And when it is employed to designate the law of the seat of the obligation, it is, on that account, confusing. The law we are in search of, which is to decide upon the nature, interpretation, and validity of the engagement in question, is that which the parties have either expressly or presumptively incorporated into their contract, as constituting their obligation; 106 U. S. 124. "In every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it was made;" 10 Wheat. 1.

It is said by an able writer that the cases often fail to distinguish between formal validity and essential validity, or between the making and the performance of the contract; and not infrequently it is held, in respect of matters of essential validity, that the validity of a contract is to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made; J. B. Moore's note to Dicey, Confl. Laws 580, citing as instances 154 Mass. 213; 55 Minn. 509.

The form of the contract is regulated by the law of the place of its celebration; 106 U. S. 124. The presumption is that a contract is to be performed at the place where it is made and to be governed by its laws, if there is nothing in its terms, or in the explanatory circumstances of its execution, inconsistent with that intention; id. 137. See, also, 39 S. C. 484.

In a contract the foreign law may, by the act and will of the parties, become part of their agreement; 106 U. S. 129. It is the will of the contracting parties and not the law which fixes the place of performance —whether by express words or by tacit implication—as the place to the jurisdiction of which the contracting parties elected to submit themselves; 4 Phil. Int. L. 469; approved in 106 U. S. 137. But it has been held that a stipulation in a bill of lading which would substitute the English law for our own as to the question of limited liability is invalid; 57 Fed. Rep. 403; and that stipulations which are held void, because against the public policy of the United States, are not made valid by the stipulation of the parties; 56 id. 602, 124; 168 U. S. 118, and cases cited; and that a clause in a shipping contract providing that all questions arising under the contract shall be settled according to English law, is a nullity, as an attempt to impress upon the contract a construction which our law rejects as contrary to publicpolicy; 50 id. 561. See FLAG, LAW OF.

A policy of life insurance which was delivered, and the first premium thereon paid in the state in which the assured resided, is governed by the laws of that state; 58 id. 541; though the policy contained a clause that it was to be a contract under the laws of the domicil of the insurer, such clause being invalid when it sought to avoid the force of statutes of the state in which the insurance was taken; 54 id. 580; and though signed by the insurer at the company's office in its home state; 50 id. 511; and a policy issued by a New York company upon an application signed in Missouri, where the first premium was paid, is subject to the Missouri statutes which cannot be waived by any stipulation of the contract: 140 U. S. 226. A domiciled Englishman effected three policies of insurance on his life in a New York company in favor of his wife and children. It was held that the intention of the parties must determine the law applicable, and that it was clearly intended here that the interests of the beneficiaries should be decided by the law of the domicil of the party insuring; 73 L. T. R. 60.

The validity of a contract cannot be secured by apparently subjecting it to a law by which it is not properly governed; 69 Miss. 770; 96 Mich. 243.

A contract executed in England, whereby an English corporation agrees to transport a citizen of the United States to this country, is to be construed according to English law; 60 Fed. Rep. 624.

A federal court assuming jurisdiction of a controversy between the master and the seaman of a foreign vessel, under a foreign flag, growing out of a contract made in their own country, will administer relief, by comity, in accordance with the law of the flag of the vessel; 35 id. 668. The question concerning the ultimate responsibility of the owner for the master's acts and engagements, arising out of sea damages, as one of the incidents of the voyage in the prosecution of foreign commerce, is to be determined by the law of the ship's home; id. 767. See FLAG, LAW OF.

It is said by a learned writer that the failure to comply with local requirement as to form, not affecting the obligation of the agreement, will not invalidate the contract; Whart. Confl. L. § 685.

A contract valid by the laws of the place where it was made, although not in writing, will not be enforced in the courts of a country where the Statute of Frauds prevails. But where the law of the forum and that of the place of the execution of the contract coincide, it will be enforced, although required to be in writing by the law of the place of performance, because the form of the contract is regulated by the law of the place of its celebration, and the evidence of it by that of the forum; 106 U. S. 135.

The general rule is that a defence or discharge, good by the law of the place where the contract is made or is to be performed, is to be held of equal validity in every place where the question may come to be litigated; 106 U. S. 132, citing Story, Confl. L. § 331.

TORTS. Damages for the commission of a tortious act are to be measured by the law of the place where the act is done; 1 P. Wms. 395; 1 Pet. C. C. 225; Story, Confl. Laws, § 307.

An action for a tort committed in a foreign country will lie only when it is based upon an act which will be considered as tortious both in the place where committed and in the locus fori; in such case the law of the place where the tort was committed governs; L. R. 1 P. D. 107; id. 6 Q. B. 1; id. 2 P. C. 193. See 1 H. & C. 219; Whart. Confl. L. § 478; 54 Barb. 31. See LEX FORI.

It is the universal rule of the common law that any title or interest in land, or in other real estate, can only be acquired or lost agreeably to the law of the place where the same is situated: 6 Pick. 286; 1 Paige, Ch. 220; 2 Ohio 124; 5 B. & C. 438; 6 Madd. Dowl. & C. 349; 1 Pick. 81; 1 Paige, Ch. 220; 11 Wheat. 465; 11 Tex. 755; 18 Pa. 170; 12 E. L. & Eq. 206. So as to the amount of property or extent of interest which can be acquired, held, or transferred; 3 Russ. Ch. 328; 2 Dow. & C. 393; and the question of what is real property; 1 W. Bla. 234; 6 Paige, Ch. 630; 3 Deac. & C. 704. The law of a country where a thing is situate determines whether the thing itself, or any right, obligation, or document connected with the thing is to be considered an immovable (land), or a movable; Dicey, Confl. Laws 513.

And, generally, the lex rei sitæ governs as to the validity of any such transfer; 4 Sandf. 352; 23 Miss. 42; 11 Mo. 314; 2 Bradf. Surr. 339; 138 Ill. 559. As to the disposition of the proceeds, see 12 E. L. & Eq. 206.

The validity, construction, and effect of wills of movables depend upon the lex rei sitæ: 1 N. Dak. 216; 50 Fed. Rep. 310; 112 N. C. 798; but the law of the state where the will was made may be considered by the court of the situs in determining the meaning of certain words in it; 73 Ga. 506. The validity of a charitable devise; 107 U. S. 174; and a direction for accumulation; 95 N. Y. 508; depend upon the lex rei sitæ, and so does the execution of a power of appointment of lands under a will; 132 Mass. 131; and the devolution of land, whether in case of intestacy or under a will; Dicey, Confl. Laws 519.

The acquisition of a title to land by lapse of time (prescription) must be determined by the same law, except so far as the limitation to an action to recover land depends on the lex fori; id. 525; and see Whart. Confl. Laws § 378.

As to whether mere contracts with regard to immovables or land are determined by the lex rei sitæ, as to their material validity, or by the "proper law of the contract," is doubtful; Dicey, Confl. Laws 769; but the capacity of the parties thereto and the formalities necessary to the validity of such a contract are, almost certainly, governed by the law of the situs; id. As to the "proper law of the contract," see LEX LOCI.

A contract for the conveyance of land, valid by the lex fori, will be enforced in equity by a decree in personam for a conveyance valid under the lex rei sitæ; 1 Ves. 144; 2 Paige, Ch. 606; Wythe 135; 6 Cra. 148.

An executory foreign contract for the conveyance of lands not repugnant to the lex rei sitæ will be enforced in the courts of the latter country by personal process; 8 Paige, Ch. 201; 23 E. L. & Eq. 288; 4 Bosw. 266.

As to the transfer of movables, while, if made at the place of the owner's domicil and in accordance with its laws, they are valid in the courts of the place where the property is situated, yet it is otherwise when the statutes, or the general policy of the law, of the latter place prescribes a different rule; 7 Wall. 139; 147 U. S. 476; 155 Mass. 112; 140 N. Y. 230. Where a special form of transfer of a movable is prescribed by the law of the situs a transfer not made in accordance therewith is invalid; 96 N. Y. 248; see Dicey, Confl. L. 551.

Courts of the situs may refuse to enforce foreign assignments for creditors as against domestic creditors; 122 Ill. 551; 96 N. Y. 248; but see supra, for contrary decisions.

All simple contract debts are assets at the domicil of the testator; 109 U. S. 654; but a bond is said to be assets for the purpose of administration at the place where it is found; 73 N. Y. 292. A ship at sea is presumed to be situated in the state where it is registered; 16 Wall. 610. As to the English rules relating to the situs of movables, see Dicey, Confl. Laws 818.

LEX ROMANA. See CIVIL LAW; ROMAN LAW.

LEX SCRIBONIA. The law abolishing the usucapio servitutis. Sohm. Rom. L. 265.

LEX SCRIPTA. Written or statute law. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTA.

LEX SEMPRONIA. The law forbidding senators from being judges and allowing the office to the knights. Sand. Just. Introd. § 12.

LEX SILIA. A law concerning personal actions. Sohm, Rom. L. 155.

LEX SITUS. See LEX REI SITÆ.

LEX TALIONIS (Lat.). The law of retaliation: an example of which is given in the law of Moses, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, etc.

Amicable retaliation includes those acts of retaliation which correspond to the acts of the other nation under similar circumstances.

Jurists and writers on international law are divided as to the right of one nation punishing with death, by way of retaliation, the citizens or subjects of another nation. In the United States no example of such barbarity has ever been witnessed; but prisoners have been kept in close confinement in retaliation for the same conduct towards American prisoners. See Rutherforth, Inst. b. 2, c. 9; Martens, Law of Nat. b. 8, c. 1, s. 3, note; 1 Kent 93; Wheaton, Int. Law, pt. 4, c. 1, § 1.

Vindictive retaliation includes those acts which amounts to war. See RETORSION.

LEX TERRÆ (Lat.). The law of the land. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

LEX VOCONIA. A plebiscitum forbidding a legatee to receive more than each heir had. Inst. 2. 22.

LEY (Old French; a corruption of loi). Law. For example, Termes de la Ley, Terms of the Law. In another, and an old technical, sense, ley signifies an oath, or the oath with compurgators; as, il tend sa ley aiu pleyntiffe. Britton, c. 27.

LEY GAGER. Wager of law. An offer to make an oath denying the cause of action of the plaintiff, confirmed by compurgators (q. v.), which oath used to be allowed in certain cases. When it was accomplished, it was called the "doing of the law," "fesans de ley." Termes de la Ley; 2 B. & C. 538; 3 B. & P. 297; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 16.

LEYES DE ESTILLO. In Spanish Law. Laws of the age. A book of explanations of the Fuero Real, to the number of two hundred and fifty-two, formed under the authority of Alonzo X. and his son Sancho, and of Fernando el Emplazado, and published at the end of the thirteenth century or beginning of the fourteenth; some of them are inserted in the New Recopilacion. See 1 New Recop. 354.

LIABILITY. Responsibility; the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action; 36 Ia. 226; 57 Cal. 209; 36 N. J. L. 145. This liability may arise from contracts either express or implied, or in consequence of torts committed.

The state of being bound or obliged in law or justice. 36 N. J. L. 145; 36 Ia. 226.

LIBEL (Lat. liber). In Practice. The plaintiff's written statement of his cause of action and of the relief which he seeks, made and exhibited in a judicial process, with some solemnity of law.

A written statement by a plaintiff of his cause of action, and of the relief he seeks to obtain in a suit. Law, Eccl. Law 17; Ayliffe, Par. 346; Shelf. Marr. & D. 506; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 111. It performs substantially the same office in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts as the bill in chancery does in equity proceedings and the declaration in common-law practice; Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 572–587. In the United States the practice of the ecclesiastical courts has been continued in the use of the terms libel and libellant in divorce proceedings.

The libel should be a narrative, specific, clear, direct, certain, not general nor alternative; Law, Eccl. Law 147; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 113. It should contain, substantially, the following requisites: (1) the name, description, and addition of the party, who makes his demand by bringing his action; (2) the name, description, and addition of the party against whom it is brought; (3) the name of the judge, with a respectful designation of his office and court; (4) the thing or relief, general or special, which is demanded in the suit; (5) the grounds upon which the suit is founded.

The form of a libel is either simple or articulate. The simple form is when the cause of action is stated in a continuous narration, when the cause of action can be briefly set forth. The articulate form is when the cause of action is stated in distinct allegations or articles; 3 Law, Eccl. Law 148; Hall, Adm. Pr. 123; 7 Cra. 394. The material facts should be stated in distinct articles in the libel, with as much exactness and attention to times and circumstances as in a declaration at common law; 4 Mas. 541.

Although there is no fixed formula for libels, and the courts will receive such an instrument from the party in such form as his own skill or that of his counsel may enable him to give it, yet long usage has sanctioned forms, which it may be most prudent to adopt. The parts and arrangement of libels commonly employed are:

First, the address to the court.

Second, the names and descriptions of the parties. Persons competent to sue at common law may be parties libellants. The same regulations obtain in the admiralty courts and the common-law courts respecting those disqualified from suing in their own right or name. Married women prosecute by or with their husbands, or by prochein ami, when the husband has an adverse interest to hers; minors, by guardians, tutors, or prochein ami; lunatics and persons non compos mentis, by tutor, guardian ad litem, or committee; the rights of deceased persons are prosecuted by executors or administrators; and corporations are represented and proceeded against as at common law.

Third, the averments or allegations setting forth the cause of action. These should be conformable to the truth, and so framed as to correspond with the evidence. Every fact requisite to establish the libellant's right should be clearly stated, so that it may be directly met by the opposing party by admission, denial, or avoidance: this is the more necessary, because no proof can be given, or decree rendered, not covered by and conformable to the allegations; 1 Law, Eccl. Law 150; Hall, Pr. 126; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 113; 7 Cra. 394. But the requirements upon these points are not so strict as in cases of declarations at common law; 7 Cra. 389; 9 Wheat. 386, 401. In no case is it necessary to assert anything which amounts to matters of defence to the claimant; 2 Gall. 485.

Fourth, the conclusion, or prayer for relief and process: the prayer should be for the specific relief desired; for general relief, as is usual in bills in chancery; the conclusion should also pray for general or particular process; 3 Law, Eccl. Law 149; 3 Mas. 503.

Interrogatories are sometimes annexed to the libel; when this is the case, there is usually a special prayer, that the defendant may be required to answer the libel, and the interrogatories annexed and propounded. This, however, is a dangerous practice, because it renders the answers of the defendant evidence, which must be disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness corroborated by very strong circumstances.

The libel is the first proceeding in a suit in admiralty in the courts of the United States; 3 Mas. 504.

"The requirement that a libel in rem must state that the property is in the district does not prevent the court from acquiring jurisdiction in the case of a vessel which, being within the district at the time the libel is verified, departs before it is filed, but, returning after the filing, is then seized on alias monition." 78 Fed. Rep. 155. (61 Fed. Rep. 213, reaffirmed.)

No mesne process can issue in the United States admiralty courts until a libel is filed; 1st Rule in admiralty of the U. S. supreme court. The twenty-second and twenty-third rules require certain statements to be contained in the libel; and to those, and the forms in 2 Conkling, Adm. Pract., the reader is referred. And see Parsons, Marit. Law; Dunl. Adm. Pr.; Hall, Adm. Pr.; Ben. Adm.

In Torts. That which is written or printed, and published, calculated to injure the reputation of another by bringing him into ridicule, hatred, or contempt. 15 M. & W. 344.

Everything, written or printed, which reflects on the character of another and is published without lawful justification or excuse, is a libel, whatever the intention may have been. 15 id. 435.

A malicious defamation, expressed either in printing or writing, and tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead or the reputation of one who is alive, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Bac. Abr. tit. Libel; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 73, § 1; 4 Mass. 168; 2 Pick. 115; 9 Johns. 214; 1 Den. 347; 9 B. & C. 172; 4 M. & R. 127; 85 Ala. 519; 18 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1134; 76 Ga. 280; 91 id. 494; 84 Wis. 129; 68 Hun 467; 2 Kent 13; Poll. Torts § 286.

A censorious or ridiculous writing, picture, or sign, made with a malicious or mischievous intent towards government, magistrates, or individuals. 3 Johns. Cas. 354; 9 Johns. 215; 5 Binn. 340; 68 Me. 295.

A written statement published without lawful justification or excuse, calculated to convey to those to whom it is published an imputation on the plaintiff, injurious to his trade, or holding him up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule. 7 App. Cas. 741.

There is a great and well-settled distinction between verbal slander and written, printed, or pictured libel; and this not only in reference to the consequences, as subjecting the party to an indictment, but also as to the character of the accusations or imputations essential to sustain a civil action to recover damages. To write and publish maliciously anything of another, which either makes him ridiculous or holds him out as an unworthy man, is held to be actionable, or punishable criminally, when the speaking of the same words would not be so; 1 Saund., 6th ed. 247 a; 4 Taunt. 355; 5 Binn. 219; Heard, Lib. & S. § 74; 6 Cush. 71; 19 Johns. 349; 6 Vt. 489.

The reasons for this distinction between libel and slander are thus stated: (1) a libel is permanent and may circulate through many hands; (2) it shows greater malignity on the part of its author than a slander; (3) it is more likely to lead to a breach of the peace; Brett, Eng. Com. 453.

The presumption that words are defamatory arises much more readily in cases of libel than in cases of slander; 152 Pa. 187.

The reduction of the slanderous matter to writing or printing is the most usual mode of conveying it. The writing may be on any substance and made with any instrument. The exhibition of a libellous picture is equally criminal; 2 Campb. 512; 5 Co. 125 b; 2 S. & R. 91; Odg. L. & Sl. 6, 20, 22. Fixing a gallows at a man's door, burning him in effigy, or exhibiting him in any ignominious manner, is a libel; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 73, s. 2; 11 East 226; 14 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 495. So a libel may be published by speaking or singing it in the presence of others; 7 Ad. & E. 233; or by a caricature, a chalk mark on a wall, or a statue; Brett, Eng. Com. 452.

The publication of a libel subjects the person who is legally responsible for it to both civil and criminal liability. The party may bring an action to recover damages and the offender is indictable at common law.

Publication. It must be shown by evidence that there was a writing and that it was published; 7 App. Cas. 741. To constitute a publication the writer must communicate the matter complained of to at least one third person; [1891] 1 Q. B. 527; and a communication to a wife containing reflections on her husband is a publication; 13 C. B. 836; but not where the communication is from her husband; 20 Q. B. Div. 635. The plaintiff must prove the publication; 4 B. & Ald. 143. To read a libellous letter to another is a publication; 16 Misc. Rep. 453; or to dictate it to a stenographer who gives it to another clerk to be copied; [1891] 1 Q. B. 524; (contra, 32 App. Div. N. Y. 465;) but sending a writing in an unsealed envelope is not a publication, if not shown to have been read by others; 95 Tenn. 678. The communication of libellous matter to another, requesting or intending that the latter should publish it, renders one liable as the publisher of a libel; 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 16; see 36 L. J. Ex. 105; and a client who communicates defamatory facts to his attorney is responsible; 16 So. Rep. (La.) 856.

Where the defendant kept a pamphlet shop and the libel was sold by the defendant's servant in her absence and without her knowledge of its contents, it was held that the defendant was guilty of publishing a libel; 1 Barnardiston, K. B. 306; 2 Sessions Cases 33; see also 5 Burrows 2686, where Mansfield, C. J., said in a like case that proof of such facts was prima facie evidence of publication of the matter, but liable to be contradicted; see also Lofts 776.

Where the action was against news venders for publishing libel by selling a copy of a newspaper containing it, and the jury found that the defendant did not know that it contained any libel and were not negligent in failing to have such knowledge, it was held that they were not liable; 16 L. R. Q. B. Div. 354; 80 Wis. 455; so of a porter who delivers parcels containing libellous handbills in ignorance of the contents of the parcel and in performance of his ordinary occupation; 2 M. & R. 54.

It is well settled that the sale of a newspaper is, prima facie, the publication of a libel contained in it, but not if it is shown that the vendor did not know that the paper contained a libel, and that his ignorance was not due to any negligence on his part, that he had no ground for supposing that the paper was likely to contain libellous matter; 80 Wis. 455. An action against the seller of a newspaper containing a libel is not maintainable without proof that some one read the libel; 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. R. 12.

Every repetition of defamatory words is a new publication and constitutes a new cause of action. In publishing a libel one is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act; 57 Conn. 73; 7 App. Cas. 741. It is not the law of the place where libellous articles are printed but where they are published which makes the words actionable; 25 U S. App. 99. If a sovereign of a foreign state be the subject of a libel on his character or be defamed, he is entitled to the same redress in the municipal courts of the country of the libeller as any subject of that country; but he cannot complain if the judgment, after a fair trial according to the laws of the country, be adverse to him; 2 Phill. Int. L. 135. See LEX LOCI. And an action can be sustained under a statute though the words were also actionable at common law; 25 U. S. App. 99.

Evidence of publication in order to sustain an indictment upon a libel must be to the same effect as in case of a civil action brought thereon. The publication of the libel in order to warrant either civil action or indictment must be malicious; evidence of the malice may be either express or implied. Express proof is not necessary; for where a man publishes a writing which on the face of it is libellous, the law presumes he does so from that malicious intention which constitutes the offence, and it is unnecessary, on the part of the prosecution, to prove any circumstance from which malice may be inferred; 4 B. & C. 247; 18 Md. 177; 3 How. 266; 12 Conn. 262; 16 Mich. 447. See 77 Ga. 172; 81 Wis. 358; 48 Ill. App. 294. Malice need not be shown, and absence of it will only go in mitigation of damages; 68 Hun 474.

What constitutes a libel. One is not liable for words not in their nature defamatory, though special damage result from their publication; 37 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 637; 17 R. I. 388; 117 Ind. 105. The words must be defamatory in their nature and must in fact disparage the character; 17 N. Y. 57; and if they do not, no action will lie, no matter what the author intended; 119 Ind. 244; see 40 Minn. 291. If the matter is understood as scandalous, and is calculated to excite ridicule and abhorrence against the party intended, it is libellous and indictable as such, however it may be expressed; 13 Metc. 68; 9 N. H. 34; 7 Conn. 266; 10 S. & R. 173; 82 Me. 530; 1 Den. 41; 6 Houst. 52; 76 Hun 314; but wherever the words sued on are susceptible of two meanings, it is a question for the jury to decide what meaning was in fact conveyed to the readers; 7 App. Cas. 741; Newell, Slan. & L. 769.

When suit is brought on words not in themselves actionable, an allegation must be made that they contain a libellous meaning, and where the claim fails to show what that meaning was, there is a failure to show any cause of action; 7 App. Cas. 748.

Any publication which has a tendency to disturb the public peace or good order of society is indictable as a libel. "This crime is committed," says Professor Greenleaf, "by the publication of writings blaspheming the Supreme Being, or turning the doctrines of the Christian religion into contempt and ridicule; or tending by their immodesty to corrupt the mind and to destroy the sense of decency, morality, and good order; or wantonly to defame or indecorously to calumniate the economy, order, and constitution of things which make up the general system of law and government of the country; to degrade the administration of government or of justice; or to cause animosities between our own and any foreign government, by personal abuse of its sovereign, its ambassadors, or other public ministers; and by malicious defamations expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the reputation of one who is living, and thereby to expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. This descriptive catalogue embraces all the several species of this offence which are indictable at common law; all of which it is believed are indictable in the United States, either at common law or by virtue of particular statutes." 3 Greenl. Ev. § 164. See 4 Mass. 163; 9 Johns. 214; 4 M'Cord 317; 4 Mass. 115; 34 Me. 223; 8 How. 266; 5 Co. 125; 4 Term 126; 5 Binn. 281; 81 Wis. 120; 49 Kan. 42.

Libels have been classified according to their objects: (1) libels which impute to a person the commission of a crime; (2) libels which have a tendency to injure him in his office, profession, calling, or trade; (3) libels which hold him up to scorn and ridicule and to feelings of contempt or execration, impair him in the enjoyment of general society, and injure those imperfect rights of friendly intercourse and mutual benevolence which man has with respect to man. Newell, Slan. & L. 67.

In the following cases the publications have been held to be actionable: to write to a person soliciting relief from a charitable society, that she prefers unworthy claims, which it is hoped the members will reject forever, and that she has squandered away money, already obtained by her from the benevolent, in printing circulars abusive of the secretary of the society; 12 Q. B. 624; to publish of the plaintiff, that, although he was aware of the death of a person occasioned by his improperly driving a carriage, he had attended a public ball in the evening of the same day; 1 Chit. Bail. 480; to publish of a Protestant archbishop that he endeavors to convert Roman Catholic priests by promises of money and preferment; 5 Bingh. 17; to charge in a publication that persons have confederated to mismanage the affairs of a company, so as to destroy the value of its stock and injure the other shareholders; 73 Tex. 8; to publish a ludicrous story of an individual in a newspaper, if it tend to render him the subject of public ridicule, although he had previously told the same story of himself; 6 Bingh. 409; to publish of a candidate for congress that he is a "pettifogging shyster"; 40 Mich. 241; or to write and publish of any man that he is "thought no more of than a horse thief and a counterfeiter"; 10 Mo. 648; or that he is slippery; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 646; or that he is a dangerous, able, and seditious agitator; 64 id. 921; or to publish of a member of congress, "He is a fawning sycophant, a misrepresentative in congress, and a grovelling office seeker;" 9 Johns. 214; or to charge one with joining the Mormons; 17 N. Y. S. 491; or in a newspaper article to call a person named Buckstaff, Bucksniff, because of its similitude to "Pecksniff"; 84 Wis. 129; or for a notary public falsely and maliciously to protest for non-payment the acceptance of a manufacturer and then send the draft with such protest to the source from whence it came; 88 Ga. 308; but see 83 Tex. 452; publications that a party was arrested and ledged in jail charged with theft; 84 Tex. 450; or words imputing want of chastity; 152 Pa. 187; 6 Ind. App. 510. See 3 Cra. 8; 42 Vt. 252; 17 Gratt. 250; 47 Cal. 307; 105 Mass. 394; 13 L. R. A. 97, note.

A declaration which alleges that the defendant charged the plaintiff, an attorney, with being guilty of "sharp practice," which is averred to mean disreputable practice, charges a libellous imputation; 4 M. & W. 446.

An advertisement describing a horse as stolen and naming the supposed thief is libellous; 32 Minn. 249; so a newspaper article setting forth that the plaintiff was living in extreme poverty and destitution was held a libel; 3 Hun 26; so words which tend to impeach the honesty and integrity of jurors in their office are libellous; 2 Col. Ter. 605; and the publication of false and malicious statements about a church member, accusing him of disturbing the peace of the church and censuring him therefor, is actionable in itself; 92 Ind. 19; and the publication of the suicide of a man falsely charging that it was induced by the actions of his wife; 59 Wis. 309.

A publication in a newspaper of symptoms of a patient who had taken a certain patent medicine, such article being used as an advertisement, is libellous where it tended to hold the person up to contempt and ridicule; 76 Ga. 280; a letter from the publisher of a newspaper, or an article published in a newspaper in the form of a letter from the publisher to the proprietor of a medicine, saying: "Your advertisement will not be received in the columns of the L. although you offer us big pay. We have repeatedly advised our readers that by the manufacture and sale of such medicines the public are swindled out of their money," was held libellous per se; 95 Wis. 164; a publication stating that a man has been arrested on account of his criminal evidence in a certain case is libellous; 23 W. N. C. Pa. 541; or that he would be an anarchist if he thought it would pay; 32 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 246; and a publication charging that a breach of promise suit was about to be brought against a person is libellous, the plaintiff having been at the time and a number of years before a married man with a family; 123 N. Y. 207.

An editor copying a libellous article from another paper, giving his authority but expressing his disbelief of some of the charges, although neither affirming nor denying the libellous charges, may be guilty of libel, whether malice be shown or not; 2 Hill 510. The headlines of a publication are important in determining the question of a libel, and they cannot be disregarded, for they often render a publication libellous on its face, which without them would not necessarily be so; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 615.

Libel or slander against a patent right is actionable; 20 Fed. Rep. 501; 65 Ga. 452; 119 Mass. 484; and a public denial of a patent right, if malicious, is also actionable; Big. Lead. Cas. Torts 42; but not unless special damage is caused; 5 Q. B. 624; L. R. 9 Ex. 218. A public denial that the patentee or his assignor was a true inventor is actionable if it be malicious and cause special damage to the owner of the patent; L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 514; 34 Fed. Rep. 46. But an assertion of title in such cases by way of warning or defence, if made in good faith, is not actionable; Webb's Poll. Torts 389.

A patentee may warn the public not to buy patented articles except from him; 33 Sup. Ct. N. Y. 523; 59 How. Pr. 356; and it is not a libel to issue a circular forbidding persons to buy articles claimed to be an infringement, if it is done in good faith; L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 1. There must be malice or that want of good faith which is, by legal intendment, equivalent thereto; 19 Ch. Div. 386; L. R. 4 Q. B. 730, in which it was termed "an action of a new kind." But see L. R. 9 Ex. 218, in which a declaration was held good where the disparagement was a statement that the goods were inferior, and alleging special damage. In that case Bramwell, B., said that the gist of the action which makes it maintainable is the publication of an untrue statement productive of special damage. The nature of the action was thus characterized in [1892] 2 Q. B. 527: "Such an action is not one of libel or slander, but an action on the case for damage wilfully and intentionally done without just occasion or excuse, analogous to an action for slander of title." The latter, it is said, having been formerly confined to real estate, has been extended "to the protection of title to chattels and of exclusive interests analogous to property, though not property in the strict sense, like patent-rights and copyright." Webb's Poll. Torts 389. The suggestion that these rights are not property in any sense is liable to provoke criticism in this country, and it may be suggested that it is their full recognition as property which affords the basis of their protection by right of action at law in such cases.

But not alone are patents within the protection of this principle. It is a general rule that for false and malicious statements respecting his personal property the owner may have an action if he show (1) that statements were made (2) which were untrue (3) to the special damage of the plaintiff; 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 130; 5 Q. B. 624; L. R. 9 Ex. 218; 122 Mass. 235; 144 id. 258; 146 id. 219; 4 Wend. 537; 63 Pa. 46; 4 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 24; Townsh. Sl. & Lib. § 204; Newell, Defamation 216.

The rule has been applied in case of disparaging statements as to a public dinner served at a hotel; 144 Mass. 258; the "Cardiff Giant"; 122 id. 235; a race-horse; 35 Minn. 471; milk sold by plaintiff; 91 N. Y. 83; copyrighted books; 5 Cush. 104.

Defences. When publication is proved, the defendant may show either that the words complained of are true or that they are not malicious. These two defences are known as justification and privilege.

In prosecutions the common-law rule was that the person charged may not justify by pleading the truth in evidence; 11 Mod. 99; because, if the publication is malicious, it is equally to the public interest to punish the publisher of it, whether it was true or not.

By Lord Campbell's Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, § 6, it is provided that in an indictment for libel, the truth may be inquired into, but shall not amount to a defence unless it is for the public benefit that the matters charged should be published. This statute does not apply to blasphemous, obscene, or seditious publications; 9 Ir. L. R. 329; 2 Cox, C. C. 45; 15 id. 180; 12 L. R. Ir. 29; and where the statute does not apply, truth is no defence; 10 Cox, C. C. 356; 5 Q. B. D. 1; 4 F. & F. 1089; 49 L. J. M. C. 1; 28 W. R. 133. In this country it has been held that on an indictment for libel the truth is a justification and may be given in evidence; 4 Wend. 114; 3 Johns. Cas. 336; 1 Va. Cas. 175; 30 Ohio St. 115; and that though ordinarily not a defence, it may be given to negative malice where justifiable purpose is shown; 3 Pick. 304; but the law in Massachusetts was subsequently changed by statute so that the truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, is a complete justification; 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 194. As to statutes in other states, see infra.

In a criminal prosecution, it is sufficient publication if the libel has been shown to the prosecutor and to no other person, as such a publication tends to a breach of the peace; Hob. 215; 1 Stark. 471; 7 Cox, C. C. 25.

By the Libel Law Amendment Act, 1888, § 8, the permission of a judge has to be obtained previously to the institution of criminal proceedings against a libellor, and such permission is only given when, from the circumstances of the case, a remedy by civil action will not be sufficient; [1892] 1 Q. B. 86; 61 L. J. M. C. 91; 40 W. R. 175; 17 Cox, C. C. 464. See 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 185; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

Justification. In civil actions for libel the defendant may justify by pleading the truth in evidence; 1 R. I. 263; 6 La. Ann. 254; 5 Sandf. 54; 4 Sneed 520; 15 Wash. 542; but the truth must be as broad as the defamatory accusation in order to constitute a complete defence; 37 Minn. 285. It is not sufficient merely to allege that the charge is true; 29 Mo. 429; 5 Blatch. 332; 13 W. Va. 158; and the plea of justification is that the whole statement is substantially true; 7 Moo. 200; 3 B. & Ald. 673; gross exaggeration destroys the plea; 6 Bing. 266. The existence of a rumor to the same effect as a libel is not admissible as evidence on a plea of justification; 8 Q. B. D. 491.

It has been held that if the defendant fails to plead a complete justification, he will not be allowed to prove his defence; 1 Abb. N. C. 268; although the rule is generally established that a defendant may justify part of a libel containing several distinct charges; 7 East 493; 2 Bing. N. C. 664. Either party is entitled to a bill of particulars of any charge not set forth with sufficient detail in the pleadings to enable the party to meet it; 59 N. Y. 176; 15 Pick. 321; 126 Ill. 150; 91 Pa. 493; but see 1 Abb. N. C. 268, where it was held that the proper practice to obtain particulars of a justification is by motion to make the answer more definite.

A plea of justification is no evidence of malice; 7 Q. B. 68; 14 L. J. Q. B. 196; 18 Law Times 527. In an action for libel, under plea of not guilty, evidence is admissible in mitigation of damages that there was a general suspicion and belief of the truth of the charge, and under the plea of privileged publication such evidence is admissible as pertinent to the question of express malice; 23 Fla. 595.

Privilege. Publications considered privileged in actions for libel are divided into those which are absolutely privileged and those which are conditionally or qualifiedly privileged; 38 Fla. 240. All charges made before a proper church tribunal are privileged, whether made as the foundation for action or during the course of the proceedings; 51 Vt. 501; 88 Ga. 620 (but slanderous words spoken to a former pastor of a church are not privileged; 26 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 488). A plea that an accusation against a clergyman (otherwise lebellous per se) is a good plea of qualified privilege when it asserts that it was preferred according to the usage and discipline of the church; 61 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 588; and the collecting of evidence against a school principal and sending a copy of charges against her to the board of education and to her, is privileged and not a publication; 31 N. Y. Supp. 561. Pleadings filed in a proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission are privileged; 72 Fed. Rep. 806. Communications between a stockholder and the managing agent of a corporation concerning an employe are privileged; 78 Fed. Rep. 460. A commercial agency which makes it its business to pry into the affairs of another to give information thereof to others must see to it that it communicates nothing that is false, and if it does, it will be liable in damages to the party injured; 77 Ga. 172; publications of such agencies issued to their subscribers generally are not privileged communications; 72 Tex. 115; a false publication that a business house is insolvent is libellous per se; 116 Mo. 226. The publication of a railroad company in a monthly circular to their servants of the name of a former employe and the reason of his dismissal was held to be privileged; 2 Q. B. (1891) 189. No allegation, however false and malicious, contained in answers to interrogatories in affidavits duly made, or any other proceedings in courts of justice, or petitions to the legislature, are indictable; 4 Co. 14 b; 2 Burr. 807; 1 Saund. 131, n. 1; 2 S. & R. 23; 81 Ga. 288; 76 Ia. 593; 73 Tex. 585; 46 Ill. App. 313; see 97 Mo. 122; 1 Q. B. 65; 61 L. J. Q. B. 21, 727; 83 Ky. 375; 104 N. C. 575; 43 La. Ann. 454; 64 Hun 118.

In all cases of libels published confidentially, and other privileged communications, express malice must be shown, or inferred from circumstances, and this is always a question for a jury; 8 B. & C. 578; 30 Me. 466; 3 Pick. 379; 1 Hawks 472; 87 Pa. 385. See 73 Mich. 445; 40 Minn. 475; 83 Va. 106.

Libels in special cases. The public acts of public men may be lawfully made the subject of comment and criticism, not only by the press but also by the public; but while criticism, if in good faith, is privileged, however severe, false allegations of fact are not privileged, and if the charges are false, good faith and probable cause are no defence, though they may mitigate the damages; 16 U. S. App. 613; 4 Mass. 169; 81 N. Y. 116; 40 Mich. 307.

The freedom of criticism upon public men is confined to fair comment on their official acts and does not permit an assault on their private character; 55 Fed. Rep. 456. The imputation of base, unworthy, or corrupt motives is not privileged; for the falseness of the charge is prima facie evidence of malice, and malice will render even the truth actionable; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 921; nor does the right of criticism embrace any right to make a false statement of his acts, involving his integrity or faithfulness in the discharge of his duties; 48 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 507. Memorials or petitions addressed to those in authority praying for the removal of inferior officers, or the redress of fancied grievances, are prima facie privileged, and express malice must be shown before that privilege can be taken away; 1 Lev. 140; 6 C. & P. 548; 5 El. & Bl. 844; 3 How. 266; 17 N. Y. 190; 15 R. I. 72; if presented to the wrong party under a bona fide mistake, it will still be privileged; 5 B. & Ald. 642; 13 U. C. Q. B. 534; contra, 10 Q. B. 899; but if malice be shown, the mere fact that it is vented through a petition will not privilege the publication; 21 Wend. 319; 2 S. & R. 23. Malice may be inferred when it is printed and circulated but never presented before the legislature; 9 N. H. 34; the publication of falsehood and calumny against public officers or candidates for public office is an offence most dangerous to the people and deserves punishment, because the people may be deceived and reject the best citizens to their great injury; 151 Mass. 50; 79 Mich. 266; 74 Tex. 89; 93 Ky. 347; 105 Cal. 114; 117 Pa. 620; 5 Johns. 1.

With regard to candidates for public office, a somewhat broader license is allowed, as it is claimed that the very fact of candidacy puts the character of the candidate in issue, so far as his qualifications and fitness for the office are concerned, and that the public have a right to be informed as to the character of those who seek their votes; 4 Mass. 168; 1 N. & McC. 347. In some cases it is held that where there is an honest belief in the truth of the charges made, and the publication is in good faith, one is not responsible, even for publishing an untruth; 46 Ia. 533; 60 id. 251; 64 Tex. 354; 111 Pa. 404; but the weight of authority tends to uphold the principle that false allegations are not privileged, and good faith and probable cause constitute no defence; 59 Fed. Rep. 530; 8 C. & P. 222; 21 Fla. 431; 136 Mass. 164; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 765; 66 Mich. 307; 17 Wend. 63; 16 Lea 176; 69 Pa. 103; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 270. See JUDGE. Charging a candidate for office with having violated the laws and taken unlawful fees is libellous per se. Although the charge was made on a proper occasion and from a proper motive, the defendant is liable when he not only fails to show the truth of the statement, but also that it was based on probable cause. It is not enough to show that the defendant had information which led him to believe it to be true; the circumstances leading to that belief must be shown in order that it may appear whether or not his belief was well founded; 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 253.

In criticising a publication one may make use of ridicule however poignant, as every man who publishes a book commits himself to the judgment of the public; 1 Campb. 355; 66 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 225; but a critic may not attack the private character of the author; 7 Car. & P. 621; 3 id. 311; 2 Moo. & R. 3.

If the author's writings are ridiculous he may be ridiculed; if they show him to be vicious his reviewer may say so; 24 Wend. 434; but to accuse one of writing and disseminating works calculated to debauch and demoralize the public mind is libellous; 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 9; and it is a question for the jury, whether a criticism of a dramatic work is such as might be pronounced by any fair man, however prejudiced and however obstinate his views; L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 275; and so where the criticism concerns an artistic production it is held that any man may express his opinion, however mistaken that opinion may be, and however unfavorable to the merits of the artist or architect, if fairly reasonably and temperately expressed, even though through the medium of ridicule 1 Moo. & M. 741, 187.

International law forbids a libel on a state for the same reason that municipal law forbids a libel on an individual. This right of the state is not invaded by a free discussion of, and criticism upon, the external acts of the state. A state has no complaint if it has the same protection as the individual. And courts of justice are open in both cases for the vindication of the offended party; 2 Phill. Int. L. 48.

Extent of the liability of newspapers for libellous articles. The proprietor of a newspaper is responsible for a libel therein, although inserted without his knowledge by the editor; 104 Pa. 408; and where the proprietor is also the editor he is liable for a libel inserted by his assistant editor; 19 N. Y. 175; the mere fact that he was absent, although he had left instructions not to insert libellous matter, will not exonerate him; 1 Ind. 345; see 121 N. Y. 199. The general principal is well established that the publisher is civilly liable for all that appears in his paper, whether with or without his knowledge; 60 Ill. 51; 25 La. Ann. 170; 35 Mich. 371; 48 Mo. 152; even where it is the result of mistake; L. R. 10 C. P. 502; but not where the mistake was caused innocently by the compositor in setting up illegible copy; 46 Mich. 408. The secretary and treasurer of a public corporation who is also one of the stockholders is not personally liable for a publication in the absence of anything to show that he knew of or consented to it; 10 Daly 202; but if the stockholder is also the general manager of the paper he will be liable if the publication is unjustifiable: 3 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 301. This liability is not affected by the fact that he does not know of the publication of the article, for it is his business to know, and mere want of knowledge is no defence; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 744; one of the partners is liable for what is done by the others in publishing libellous matter; 2 Dill. 244; and the malicious intent of one partner renders his co-partner liable; 133 Mass. 471. Where the libellous matter is inserted by a reporter without the knowledge or consent of the proprietor, the latter is liable only to the extent of compensatory damages and he will be visited with punitive damages only upon proof by which his approval of his employes' conduct can be legally inferred; 50 N. J. L. 481.

In Massachusetts when the truth of the publication is established there must be shown, in order to render the proprietor liable, that he, in a legal sense, actually participated in or authorized the publication with an actual malicious intent; 136 Mass. 441.

During the present decade there has been a tendency towards legislation mitigating the rigor of the common-law liability for libel on the part of publishers of newspapers, and the agitation on this subject has resulted in the passage of statutes in several states having this purpose in view. The demand for this legislation has been in no sense the result of popular recognition of a general grievance, but an effort on the part of the newspaper press to escape liability for the natural results of the modern tendency to the violation of the most ordinary rights of privacy.

Utah provides in behalf of newspapers of that state, that if it appears that the libel was published in good faith or by mistake, and a retraction was published in full as conspicuously and in the same place as the libel, within a specified time, the plaintiff can recover only actual damages; but this does not apply to a statement about a candidate for public office unless retraction is made by an editorial a certain time before election. Laws 1896, ch. 32. By a statute of Indiana the publisher is protected against punitive damages by a full retraction; it also requires that before bringing action a notice must be served upon the publisher specifying the matter complained of; Laws 1895, ch. 45. A Michigan statute makes the granting of punitive damages dependent on a request for retraction; Laws 1895, ch. 216. In New York the delivery of a libellous statement for publication is constituted a misdemeanor. Laws 1890, ch. 340. A statute in Missouri requires that in actions of libel justification and mitigation shall be stated separately by the defendant. Laws 1891, ch. 70. Georgia limits the common-law liability of newspaper publishers in actions of libel by enacting that "a fair and honest report of the proceedings of legislative or judicial bodies, or court proceedings, or a truthful report of information received from any arresting officer or police authorities, shall be deemed privileged communication, and in any action brought for newspaper libel the rule of the law as to privileged communications shall apply." Laws 1894, ch. 131.

By the Pennsylvania Libel Act of July 1, 1897, it is enacted: § 1. That in criminal prosecutions for libel "if the matter charged as libellous is in the opinion of the court proper for public information, the truth may be given in evidence." § 2. That no defendant can be convicted of the same libel upon the same individual in more than one county. § 3. A plea of justification shall be adequate when it alleges "that the publication is substantially true in every material respect and is proper for public information; and if such plea shall be established to the satisfaction of the court and jury there shall be no recovery. Damages in a civil action are limited to just restitution actually sustained." Laws 1897, ch. 204.

It is for the jury to say what the defendant charged against the plaintiff, and what the reading public might reasonably suppose he intended to charge; 59 Fed. Rep. 530. Where the purport of the publication is plain and not ambiguous, the question in a civil action whether it is libel or not is a question for the court; 60 Fed. Rep. 592.

On a plea of justification, evidence is admissible to prove that the character of the plaintiff is bad; 4 Watts 347; this testimony is admissible for the purpose of establishing a measure of justice between the parties, because the extent of the injury, if any, which the plaintiff sustains, depends in some degree at least upon the goodness or badness of his general character before the publication of the libel, and the amount of compensation ought to be commensurate with, and bear some proportion to, the extent of the injury; 178 Pa. 481; but evidence as to reputation upon the question of damages must be confined to the reputation for that particular trait of character which is involved in the libellous charge; 16 U. S. App. 613.

A publisher cannot be charged with the personal malice of his employe; 2 Moo. & R. 101; and he is not liable for exemplary damages for the actual malice of his subordinate unless he participated in or ratified and confirmed the act; 57 Wis. 570. Express malice in libel cases may be shown not only in the existence of animosity against the plaintiff, but also by a reckless and wanton carelessness,—a wanton neglect to ascertain the truth of the publication. In a newspaper the means of ascertaining are readily attainable, and in such cases punitive damages may be awarded; 26 U. S. 167. Evidence that plaintiff had recovered judgment against another newspaper for the publication of the same libel is immaterial and inadmissible; 78 Fed. Rep. 769, citing the following: Printing Association v. Smith, 14 U. S. App. 173; s. c. 5 C. C. A. 91; 55 Fed. Rep. 240.

An offer to publish an interview with or a letter from the plaintiff is not a retraction; 38 U. S. App. 394.

Injunction to restrain libels. The power to restrain by injunction, or even by interlocutory injunction, the publication of an alleged libel, on the ground of injury to character and reputation, was a jurisdiction considered unknown to the law of England. Recently, however, it has been held that jurisdiction was conferred by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to prevent by injunction the publication of "atrocious" libels. This alleged jurisdiction has shared with the use of the equitable remedy in connection with labor troubles the credit of giving rise to the phrase, lately so much in vogue,—"government by injunction." Under the English decisions, it is said to be conceded that the power exists, and that prior to 1882, except in cases where there was injury to property alleged, no such power was ever claimed or exercised; 22 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th ser. 67; Folkhard, Lib. & Sl., ed. 1897, 579; 3 Va. Law Reg. 629; 13 Law Quart. Rev. 361. Speaking with precision, the only case in which an injunction had been granted to restrain the publication of a libel as such was that by Chief Justice Scroggs, in 1680, in a decision which was one of the grounds of his impeachment. See 8 How. St. Tr. 198. In 2 Campb. 511, a dictum of Lord Ellenborough states that an injunction would have been granted against the exhibition of a libellous picture, but it was expressly disapproved in 20 How. St. Tr. 799.

The nearest later approach to it was in the decisions of Malins, V. C., in Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551, and Dixon v. Holden, 7 id. 488, so much discussed in connection with labor troubles (see STRIKE), and which were distinctly overruled by the court of appeal as in conflict with settled equity practice, in Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 142.

It was five years after this that Jessel, M. R., gave expression to his opinion that the Procedure Act gave jurisdiction to the common-law courts to enjoin the publication of libels, an opinion which in that case has been characterized as a dictum, but later the court of appeal held that the power did exist, and the same judge, then sitting, said that an interlocutory injunction might be granted against the publication of a libel however atrocious it might be, and for injuring only character and reputation. The reasoning by which this conclusion was supported was that the Procedure Act, 1854, and the Judicature Act, 1873, transferred all the jurisdiction of the separate courts to the high court and authorized an interlocutory injunction in any case in which it should appear to the court "just or convenient." This he considered gave "unlimited power to grant an injunction in any case where it would be right or just to do so, according to settled legal reasons, or on any legal, settled principle." 20 Ch. Div. 501. The court of appeal again declared in favor of the jurisdiction, but said that it was such "as to require exceptional caution in its use;" [1891] 2 Ch. 269. And this expression was emphasized not only by the refusal of the injunction but also by a quotation from Lord Esher, M. R., that "the jurisdiction is of a delicate nature and should only be exercised in the clearest cases, where, if the jury did not find the matter libellous, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable." 3 Times L. R. 846; see, also, 37 Ch. Div. 170.

These cases are examined and the doctrine, admitted to have been declared in them, severely criticised by Folkhard, who concludes: That the jurisdiction introduces an undesirable and inconvenient degree of uncertainty into the practice and procedure of the courts; that the cautious language with which the courts have dealt with the subject is sufficient of itself to raise doubt; that the injunction is inappropriate and unconstitutional because it would deprive a defendant of a right secured by Fox's libel act to move in arrest of judgment when tried or convicted of libel. The opinion is further expressed that the manner in which the courts have dealt with the subject indicates a caution which is likely to result in making the new jurisdiction a dead letter; 22 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th ser. 63. This view is thought by him to be justified by the refusal of an injunction in a recent case where he thinks the exercise of the new jurisdiction would have seemed proper if it ever could be so, as after a verdict for heavy damages and judgment against him for libel, the defendant persisted in repetitions of it; [1891] 2 Ch. 294. But in that case the decision was that an interlocutory injunction will not be granted to restrain the publication of a libel unless the court is of the opinion that injury will be caused to the plaintiff's person or property by a continuance of the publication, and hence when the libel, though unjustifiable, is of such a character that no one would attach the slighest weight to it, the injunction would be refused. In another case an action of libel was brought in the Chancery Division and an interlocutory injunction asked which the court refused; [1891] W. N. 64. And it is said that, with the exception of a case of trade libel, the court will not grant an injunction to restrain a libel before the case has been submitted to a jury; 67 Law T. N. S. 263.

An interlocutory injunction was granted to restrain the continuance of the publication of a poster headed "A Black List," which gave the names of non-union men employed by A, it being considered that the motive was to inflict a continuous injury from day to day upon A and his men, and the order was affirmed by court of appeal; 72 L. T. 342; S. C. 11 Times L. R. 228, 180. In this case it was held that the trade union having done more than was necessary for their own protection, the injunction was properly granted.

In this country the subject has been dealt with as it originally stood in England before it was complicated by the question of statutory construction and the resulting decisions. The question in the United States is more or less affected by considerations growing out of the constitutional guaranty of liberty of the press. See infra. There is no authority to support the doctrine that a libel may be enjoined except in cases where some right of property is involved, and a large majority of the cases have arisen in connection with statements made or circulars issued concerning patent rights.

It has been held by authorities of great weight that equity will not enjoin the publication of a libel on a patent right; 29 Fed. Rep. 95; 28 Fed. Rep. 778. This latter case was an ancillary bill to enjoin the defendant in pending proceedings on certain patent rights from uttering libellous or slanderous statements concerning the business of the plaintiff, or the validity of their said letters patent or their title thereto. It was filed during the trial of the principal suit, which was brought to restrain the infringement of the patents. Bradley, J., in denying the injunction, said that the application was a novel one. The following cases were cited by him as ruling against it: 114 Mass. 69; 119 Mass. 484; 7 Daly 188; 8 Paige 24; 55 How. Pr. 132; 50 Ga. 70; 3 Mo. App. 173. He did not consider the contrary decision in 59 How. Pr. 356 as a sufficient authority to counteract these cases. He further said that the English authorities (L. R. 7 Eq. 488; 14 Ch. Div. 763, 864; 26 Ch. Div. 306) were based upon statutes and not upon general principles of equity jurisprudence. He cites the case in 10 Ch. App. 142, Cairns, C., as in line with the American cases referred to by him. As to the English cases, see supra.

This decision by Bradley, J., went so far as to hold expressly that even if malice were shown an injunction would not be granted against the wrong threatened.

This case was undoubtedly in accord with the view prevailing at the time it was decided, and there are later cases which hold that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a publication which is a libel on the plaintiff's business; 1 Ohio N. P. 266; or to restrain one who believes that he is the owner of a patent, and that no other person has title thereto, from stating his claim as a mere belief; 60 Ill. App. 372; or to restrain slander of title to property on the mere allegation of defendant's insolvency; 36 Fla. 99. So an interlocutory injunction restraining the publication of a libel until the trial of the action was refused where there were conflicting affidavits as to whether the plaintiff had or had not consented to the publication; [1894] 1 Q. B. 671, where it is considered under what circumstances an interlocutory injunction will be granted in cases of libel.

It was held that an injunction will not be granted against the circulation of a slander or libel, even where it appeared that it might tend to injure the business or employment of the person affected; 47 N. J. Eq. 519; 110 Mo. 492; nor even interlocutory until trial: id. The power to grant injunctions has also been denied in cases of libel or trade-mark; 55 How. Pr. 132; 56 N. Y. 115; 19 Ch. Div. 386.

But the doctrine upon which these decisions rest, that in no case would an injunction issue to restrain such publication, has not been uniformly followed, and an instructive note in which many cases are collected concludes that "the weight of authority as shown by the later cases is to the effect that such an injunction may be granted if the threats to prosecute for infringement are not made in good faith, and only in such cases;" 16 L. R. A. 243; 59 How. Pr. 356; 57 N. Y. 119; 38 Barb. 210; 45 N. J. L. 167. Where false circulars were issued for the purpose of intimidation, threatening suits for infringement, and a collusive decree was obtained purporting to be an adjudication on the merits, an injunction was granted against the use or publication of such decree; 92 Mich. 558; but equity will not restrain the plaintiff in a patent case from publishing a notice that the defendant therein had been enjoined; 32 Fed. Rep. 345.

And where the defendant issued circulars threatening to bring suits for infringement against persons dealing in plaintiff's patented article, and the charges of infringement were not made in good faith, but with malicious intent to injure plaintiff's business, the court distinguished the case from that in 28 Fed. Rep. 773, supra, because the defendant appeared to have threatened suits which he did not intend to bring, and an injunction was granted; 34 Fed. Rep. 46, per Blodgett, J.

In a still later case Mr. Justice Brown thus states the limits within which equity will permit the use of an injunction:

"It is sufficient to say that, even if it be conceded that a court of equity has power upon petition of a defendant to enjoin the plaintiff from publishing libellous statements concerning his business, there would seem to be no good reason why a patentee may not notify persons using his device of his claim, and call attention to the fact that, by selling or using it, they are making themselves liable to a prosecution. There is undoubtedly authority for holding that, if the language of such letters or circulars be false, malicious, offensive, or opprobrious, or used for the wilful purpose of inflicting an injury, the party is entitled to his remedy by injunction; and this is the extent to which the authorities go. Upon the other hand, it would seem to be an act of prudence, if not of kindness, upon the part of the patentee, to notify the public of his invention, and to warn persons dealing in the article of the consequence of purchasing from others, and in such cases an injunction has been uniformly denied." 44 Fed. Rep. 19; see, also, 81 Fed. Rep. 904.

As to whether an injunction against a publication is an interference with the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of speech and of the press, the decisions, although apparently conflicting, support the doctrine that where property rights are involved, this provision is no bar to equitable interference, where the question of libel has been determined in an action at law; 7 Daly 188; 13 Weekly L. Bul. (Ohio) 335; 8 Paige 24; 110 Mo. 892; 13 Mo. App. 173. In the last case an injunction was refused, although the statements were injurious to a property right, and it was held "that courts of justice can do nothing by way of judicial sentence which the general assembly has no power to sanction," and as the general assembly can pass no law abridging the liberty of speech or of the press, that the right to speak, write, or print cannot be suspended by the court. In 135 Ind. 471, it was expressly decided that the constitutional guaranty of freedom of the press and of speech is not a protection against equitable interference with the publication of false and injurious statements, accompanied by threats.

Where a publication is in violation of a contract it will be enjoined, and the liberty of the press will not protect the wrongdoer; 31 Mich. 490; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 212. See 32 L. R. A. 829, n. See LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

The question what are the respective powers and duties of court and jury in trials of indictments for libel has given rise to one of the most interesting of legal controversies. For the history of the controversy upon the right of the jury to determine both law and fact in criminal cases, and the American and English authorities, see JURY.

Lord Mansfield, in 5 Burr. 2661, and in 20 How. St. Tr. 892, and Mr. Justice Buller, in the Dean of St. Asaph's case, 21 How. St. Tr. 847, charged the jury that the only questions for them were whether the defendants had printed and published the paper in question, and whether the innuendoes therein were truly intended as avowed in the indictment, and that it was for the court alone to say whether the paper was a libel or not. This was stoutly denied to be the true state of the law, and accordingly an act known as "Fox's Libel Act" was passed in 1792, declaring that the jury may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty in all such cases upon the whole matter put at issue, and shall not be required to find defendant guilty on mere proof of publication, and of the sense ascribed to the same in the indictment.

This statute is now generally conceded to be declaratory of the common law. The judge should instruct the jury as to what a libel is, and then leave it to them to say whether the facts necessary to constitute the offence have been proved to their satisfaction; 63 Pa. 253; 18 id. 489; 1 Minn. 156; 23 Vt. 14; 2 Campb. 478; 13 Metc. 120; 29 Me. 323; 21 How. And as if to qualify this caution, it was added that it should be liberal; 9 Otto 659.

LIBERTI, LIBERTINI. In Roman Law. The condition of those who, having been slaves, had been made free. 1 Brown, Civ. Law 99.

There is some distinction between these words. By libertus was understood the freedman when considered in relation to his patron, who had bestowed liberty upon him; and he was called libertinus when considered in relation to the state he occupied in society subsequent to his manumission. Lec. El. Dr. Rom. § 93. See Morey, Rom. L. 236.

LIBERTIES. In colonial times this term was used as meaning laws or legal rights resting upon them. The early colonial ordinances in Massachusetts were termed laws and liberties, and the code of 1641 the "Body of Liberties"; 7 Cush. 70.

The term is also used in the expression, rights, liberties, and franchises, as a word of the same general class and meaning with those words and privileges. This use of the term is said to have been strictly conformable to its sense as used in Magna Charta and in English declarations of rights, statutes, grants, etc.; 7 Cush. 70.

It was intended to secure to corporations as well as to individuals the rights enumerated in the bill of rights; 1 Murphy 58.

LIBERTY (Lat. liber, free; libertas, freedom, liberty). Freedom from restraint. The faculty of willing, and the power of doing what has been willed, without influence from without.

A privilege held by grant or prescription, by which some men enjoy greater privileges than ordinary subjects.

The place within which certain privileges or immunities are enjoyed, or jurisdiction is exercised, as the liberties of a city. See FREEDOM OF THE CITY.

Liberty, "on its positive side, denotes the fullness of individual existence; on its negative side it denotes the necessary restraint on all, which is needed to promote the greatest possible amount of liberty for each." Amos, Science of Law p. 90.

Civil liberty is the greatest amount of absolute liberty which can in the nature of things be equally possessed by every citizen in a state.

The right to do everything permitted by the laws. Ordr. Const. Leg. 37.

The term is frequently used to denote the amount of absolute liberty which is actually enjoyed by the various citizens under the government and laws of the state as administered. 1 Bla. Com. 125.

The fullest political liberty furnishes the best possible guarantee for civil liberty.

Lieber defines civil liberty as guaranteed protection against interference with the interests and rights held dear and important by large classes of civilized men, or by all the members of a state, together with an effectual share in the making and administration of the laws, as the best apparatus to secure that protection, including Blackstone's divisions of civil and political under this head.

Under the Roman law, civil liberty was the affirmance of a general restraint, while in our law it is the negation of a general restraint; Ordr. Const. Leg.

Natural liberty is the right which nature gives to all mankind of disposing of their persons and property after the manner they judge most consistent with their happiness, on condition of their acting within the limits of the law of nature and so as not to interfere with an equal exercise of the same rights by other men. Burlam. c. 3, § 15; 1 Bla. Com. 125. It is called by Lieber social liberty, and is defined as the protection or unrestrained action in as high a degree as the same claim of protection of each individual admits of.

Personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, of removing one's person to whatever place one's inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint unless by due course of law. 1 Bla. Com. 134; Hare, Const. L. 777.

Political liberty is an effectual share in the making and administration of the laws. Lieber, Civ. Lib.

Liberty, in its widest sense, means the faculty of willing, and the power of doing what has been willed without influence from without. It means self-determination, unrestrainedness of action. Thus defined, one being only can be absolutely free,—namely, God. So soon as we apply the word liberty to spheres of human action, the term receives a relative meaning, because the power of man is limited; he is subject to constant influences from without. If the idea of unrestrainedness of action is applied to the social state of man, it receives a limitation still greater, since the equal claims of unrestrained action of all necessarily involves the idea of protection against interference by others. We thus come to the definition, that liberty of social man consists in the protection of unrestrained action in as high a degree as the same claim of protection of each individual admits of, or in the most efficient protection of his rights, claims, interests, as man or citizen, or of his humanity, manifested as a social being. (See RIGHT.) The word liberty, applied to men in their political state, may be viewed with reference to the state as a whole, and in this case means the independence of the state, of other states (see AUTONOMY); or it may have reference to the relation of the citizen to the government, in which case it is called political or civil liberty; or it may have reference to the status of a man as a political being, contradistinguished from him who is not considered master over his own body, will, or labor—the slave. This is called personal liberty, which, as a matter of course, includes freedom from prison.

For purposes of convenience and justice alike, in all well governed communities, the natural right of citizens are held in abeyance and subject to conditional limitations as having lost some portion of their absolute character. This is but an affirmance of the doctrine that every individual in order to live peacefully in society must submit to some abridgment of his natural right; for any acknowledgment of government, says Brownson, implies that the citizen consents to submit his will to that of a governing will located in the administration of the state; Am. Republic; Ord. Const. Leg.

Constitutional guarantees are the last and best fruits of civil liberty. The bulwarks of civil liberty consist of public acts passed for the purpose of defining and regulating the exercise of the sovereign powers of the state. It is only in this way that the personal rights of the citizen can be secured against invasion by the supreme authority. These acts are the guarantees of the good faith of the citizens towards each other and towards the common sovereignty under which they are united. They consist of grants of power together with limitations upon its exercise. Part of these rules being unwritten form the common law of the land, and part consist of positive laws known as constitutional provisions which may be enforced in competent tribunals; Ord. Const. Leg. 168.

Liberties are nothing until they have become rights—positive rights formally recognized and consecrated. Rights, even when recognized, are nothing so long as they are not entrenched within guarantees. And guarantees are nothing so long as they are not maintained by forces independent of them in the limit of their right. Convert liberties into rights—surround rights by guarantees—entrust the keeping these guarantees to forces capable of maintaining them. Such are the successive steps in the progress of free government. 1 Guizot, Rep. Gov. Lect. 6.

"As soon as any part of a person's conduct affects prejudicially the interests of others, society has jurisdiction over it." Mill, Liberty, c. 4.

Lieber, in his work on Civil Liberty, calls that system which was evolved in England, and forms the basis of liberty in the countries settled by English people, Anglican liberty. The principal guarantees, according to him, are:—

1. National independence. There must be no foreign interference. The country must have the right and power of establishing the government it thinks best.

2. Individual liberty, and, as belonging to it, personal liberty, or the great habeas corpus principle, and the prohibition of general warrants of arrest. The right of bail belongs also to this head.

3. A well-secured penal trial, of which the most important is trial for high treason.

4. The freedom of communion, locomotion, and emigration.

5. Liberty of conscience. The United States constitution and the constitutions of all the states have provisions prohibiting any interference in matters of religion.

6. Protection of individual prorerty, which requires unrestrained action in producing and exchanging, the prohibition of unfair monopolies, commercial freedom, and the guarantee that no property shall be taken except in the course of law, the principle that taxation shall only be with the consent of the tax-payer, and shall be levied for short periods only, and the exclusion of confiscation.

7. Supremacy of the law. The law must not, however, violate any superior law or civil principle, nor must it be an ex post facto law. The executive must not possess the power of declaring martial law, which is merely a suspension of all law. In extreme cases, parliament in England and congress in the United States can pass an act suspending the privilege of habeas corpus.

8. Every officer must be responsible to the person affected for the legality of his act; and no act must be done for which some one is not responsible.

9. It has been deemed necessary in the Bill of Rights and the American constitution specially to refer to the quartering of soldiers as a dangerous weapon in the hands of the executive.

10. The military force must be strictly submitted to the law, and the citizen should have the right to bear arms.

11. The right of petitioning, and the right of meeting and considering public matters, and of organizing into associations for any lawful purposes, are important guarantees of civil liberty.

The following guarantees relate more especially to the government of a free country and the character of its polity:—

12. Publicity of public business in all its branches, whether legislative, judicial, written, or oral.

13. The supremacy of the law, or the protection against the absolutism of one, of several, or of the majority, requires other guarantees. It is necessary that the public funds be under close and efficient popular control; they should therefore be chiefly in the hands of the popular branch of the legislature, never of the executive. Appropriations should also be for distinct purposes and short times.

14. It is further necessary that the power of making war reside with the people, and not with the executive. A declaration of war in the United States is an act of congress.

15. The supremacy of the law requires, also, not only the protection of the minority, but the protection of the majority against the rule of a factious minority or cabal.

16. The majority, and through it the people, are protected by the principle that the administration is founded on party principles.

17. A very important guarantee of liberty is the division of government into three distinct functions,—legislative, administrative, and judicial. The union of these is absolutism or despotism on the one hand, and slavery on the other.

18. As a general rule, the principle prevails in Anglican liberty that the executive may do what is positively allowed by fundamental or other law, and not all that which is not prohibited.

19. The supremacy of the law requires that, where enacted constitutions form the fundamental law, there be some authority which can pronounce whether the legislature itself has or has not transgressed it. This power must be vested in courts of law.

20. There is no guarantee of liberty more important and more peculiarly Anglican than the representative government. See Lieber, Civ. Lib. p. 168.

In connection with this, a very important question is, whether there should be direct elections by the people, or whether there should be double elections. The Anglican principle favors simple elections; and double elections have often been resorted to as the very means of avoiding the object of a representative government.

The management of the elections should also be in the hands of the voters, and government especially should not be allowed to interfere.

Representative bodies must be free. They must be freely chosen, and, when chosen, act under no threat or violence of the executive or any portion of the people. They must be protected as representative bodies; and a wise parliamentary law and usage should secure the rights of each member and the elaboration of the law.

A peculiar protection is afforded to members of the legislature in England and the United States by their freedom from arrest, except for certain specified crimes.

Every member must possess the right to propose any measure or resolution.

Not only must the legislature be the judge of the right each member has to his seat, but the whole internal management belongs to itself. It is indispensable that it possess the power and privileges to protect its own dignity.

The principle of two houses, or the bicameral system, is an equally efficient guarantee of liberty, by excluding impassioned legislation and embodying in the law the collective mind of the legislature.

21. The independence of the law, of which the independence of the judiciary forms a part, is one of the main stays of civil liberty. It requires "a living common law, a clear division of the judiciary from other powers, the public accusatorial process, the independence of the judge, the trial by jury, and an independent position of the advocate." See Lieber, Civil Liberty and Self-Government 208–250.

22. Another constituent of our liberty is local and institutional self-government. It arises out of a willingness of the people to attend to their own affairs, and an unwillingness to permit of the interference of the executive, and administration with them beyond what it necessarily must do, or which cannot or ought not to be done by self-action. A pervading self-government, in the Anglican sense, is organic; it consists in organs of combined self-action, in institutions, and in a systematic connection of these institutions. It is, therefore, equally opposed to a disintegration of society and to despotism.

American liberty belongs to the great division of Anglican liberty, and is founded upon the checks, guarantees, and self-government of the Anglican race. The following features are, however, peculiar to American liberty: republican federalism, strict separation of the state from the church greater equality and acknowledgment of abstract rights in the citizen, and a more popular or democratic cast of the whole polity. With reference to the last two may be added these further characteristics:—

We have everywhere established voting by ballot. The executive has never possessed the power of dissolving or proroguing the legislature. The list of states has not been closed. We admit foreigners to the rights of citizenship, and we do not believe in inalienable allegiance.

There is no attainder of blood. We allow no ex post facto laws. American liberty possesses, also, as a characteristic, the enacted constitution,—distinguishing it from the English polity, with its accumulative constitution. Our legislatures are, therefore, not omnipotent, as the British parliament theoretically is; but the laws enacted by them may be declared by the courts to conflict with the constitution.

The liberty sought for by the French, as a peculiar system, was founded chiefly, in theory, on the idea of equality and the abstract rights of man. Rousseau's Social Contract. See FREEDOM; PERSONAL LIBERTY, and titles here following.

LIBERTY OF CONTRACT. Liberty of contract consists in having the ability at will, to make or abstain from making, a binding obligation enforced by the sanctions at the law. Judson, Liberty of Contract, Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1891) 233. Whilst closely allied with property and essential to its use and enjoyment, liberty of contract is really broader in its scope. Ownership of property is a right residing in a person, and property is any right of a person over a thing (in rem) indefinite in point of user. It is through the abridgment of the right of free contract by denying or restraining the use of property that so-called property rights are invaded in the exercise of the police power; id. 232.

The term liberty is used in the fourteenth amendment of the constitution to comprehend in one the right of freedom from physical restraint, and also the right in one to pursue any livelihood or calling, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper; 165 U. S. 578; 71 Fed. Rep. 931; and to have their contracts enforced; 115 Mo. 307.

The privilege of contract is both a liberty and a property right of which one cannot be deprived without due process of law; 154 Ill. 98. And the right of individuals to contract cannot be limited by arbitrary legislation which rests on no reason on which it can be defended, since this would subvert the right to enjoy liberty; 58 Ark. 407; but whenever a statute can be seen to be in the substantial interest of public health, safety, and morals, it may legitimately be upheld even though it incidentally interfere with liberty of contract; 46 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 756.

Among the statutes which, although interfering with the right to contract, have been held constitutional either under the police power of a state or under the power vested in the legislature for the public welfare, are: fixing the maximum of charges for the storage of grain; 94 U. S. 113; 117 N. Y. 1; giving a city power to regulate the price of bread; 8 Ala. 140; prohibiting the manufacture and sale of any article in imitation of the substance of butter; 105 N. Y. 123; 127 U. S. 678; or of oleomargarine colored to imitate butter; 50 N. J. L. 534; or of oleomargarine unless stamped; 68 Md. 592; or of any article designed to take the place of butter or cheese; 12 Mo. App. 214; prohibiting the sale of cotton in the seed between the hours of sunset and sunrise; 68 Ala. 58; 76 id. 60; 104 N. C. 714; forbidding the sale of baking powder containing alum without a label so stating; 44 Minn. 271; making it unlawful for the vendor of personal property, sold on condition that the title should remain in him until payment in full had been made, to take possession of such property without tendering or refunding to the purchaser the sums already paid by him, after deducting a reasonable compensation for the use; 46 Ohio St. 450; forbidding the sale of stamped and registered bottles without the consent of the person whose stamp it thereon; 139 N. Y. 132; forbidding any one not authorized by law to issue a note, check, or ticket to circulate as money; 63 Mo. 570; reducing the rate of interest on judgments; 145 U. S. 162 (Harlan, Field, and Brewer, JJ., dissenting); giving priority to a mechanic's lien over a mortgage of an earlier date; 62 Mo. 433; limiting the amount of property which incorporated colleges might take by devise, grant, etc.; 156 U. S. 152, affirming 111 N. Y. 66; forbidding the importation of foreign labor; 28 Fed. Rep. 795; 36 id. 303; or the employment of Chinese labor; 85 Cal. 274; providing that a failure to perform any condition of an insurance policy shall not be a valid defence of an action unless such condition is printed in type as large as or larger than that known as long primer, or is written with pen and ink in or on the policy; 63 Fed. Rep. 680; restricting insurance business to corporations; 164 Pa. 306; prohibiting foreign insurance companies from carrying on business within its limits; 155 U. S. 648; but see 165 U. S. 578, where a provision in a statute forbidding the insurance of property within the state in a foreign insurance company which has not complied with the laws of such state was held a violation of the right of the individual to contract; the contract having been made in another state; prohibiting citizens from selling intoxicating liquors; 42 S. C. 222; or forbidding the selling or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians; 105 Cal. 344; or a prohibition act; 123 U. S. 623. Making it a misdemeanor for an attorney to receive more than a specified amount for prosecuting a claim for a pension is valid, as a pension is a bounty over which congress has control; 157 id. 60.

Much of the legislation which has been questioned as interfering with the liberty of contract secured to the citizens of the United States under the fourteenth amendment to the constitution, is in relation to the acts passed which aimed to benefit the laborer in his relations to his employer. Although lacking the powers vested in the courts in this country to declare an act unconstitutional, yet the principle on which much of this class of legislation on the liberty of contract rests in the United States is clearly stated by an English court, "When two classes of persons are dealing together and one class is, generally speaking, weaker than the other, and liable to oppression either from natural or incidental causes, the law should as far as possible redress the inequality by protecting the weak against the strong." 2 B. & S. 66. Obviously, the intention of the legislature in passing this class of acts was to protect the employes against fraud and oppression on the part of employers. but the objection to statutes prescribing a limitation upon hours of labor and regulating the mode of payment for it are (1) that they interfere with the right secured to every citizen of acquiring and possessing property or with the right to pursue happiness; (2) they are in conflict with that clause of the bill of rights which declares that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; 27 Am. L. Rev. 857.

In many cases the restriction by statute of contracts between employers and employes is held unconstitutional; 58 Ark. 407; 41 Neb. 187; 154 Ill. 198; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 658; 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 328; 115 Mo. 307; 162 Pa. 153; 113 id. 431; and the liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as the laborer may deem most beneficial and to others to employ such labor is held to be necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty of the right to property; 147 Ill. 66, where the act prescribed that wages be paid weekly. But in Massachusetts a statute requiring manufacturers to pay the wages of their employes weekly is held within the power of the legislature, as the constitution of that state extends legislative power to "all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances," and does not, in terms, make any provisions as to liberty of contract; 163 Mass. 589; so in Rhode Island a weekly payment law; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 246; and in Indiana a bi-weekly payment law, were held constitutional; 22 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 253.

In New York a law forbidding city contractors to accept more than eight hours for a day's work except in cases of necessity is held not to abridge the privileges or rights of any citizens; 30 N. Y. Sup. 473 (White, J., dissenting); so with a law limiting hours of service on railroads; 136 N. Y. 554; and one forbidding the employment of women and children for more than ten hours a day; 120 Mass. 383; and an act providing that ten hours in twelve consecutive hours shall be a day's labor for railroad laborers and that an employe shall receive proportionate compensation for extra time was held constitutional where the rate of wages was not prescribed by the act and contracts other than by the day were not prohibited by it; 20 N. Y. Supp. 461. But an act prescribing a limit of ten hours for a day's work has been held unconstitutional; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 658; 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 328; as is an ordinance prescribing eight hours; 85 Cal. 274; 41 Neb. 187; 154 Ill. 198 (where the act limited the restriction of hours to women); and an act forbidding the execution of a contract between a corporation and an employe whereby the latter agrees in consideration of certain benefits from the company, that if he elect to accept benefits when injured he will not look to the company for damages; 1 Ohio N. P. 213.

A statute providing that corporations engaged in manufacturing or in operating a railroad should pay the wages of their employes in legal tender money of the United States, was held valid on the ground that such legislation was necessarily incident to the power of the legislature to amend or alter the corporate charter; 55 Md. 74; and a similar statute regarding payment of wages otherwise than by paper redeemable in lawful money, and prescribing a method of weighing coal at the mouth of the mine, was upheld on the ground that the business of the defendants was one over which the state had supervision, and that the state had power to protect laborers against fraud on the part of employers in the payment of wages and in the mode of ascertaining the amount of the wages earned; 36 W. Va. 802; contra as to the last point, 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 431, on the ground that the act attempted to deprive persons of the right to fix by contract the manner of ascertaining compensation, and contra as to the payment of wages by any order or script not negotiable and redeemable in lawful money of the United States, 115 Mo. 307; 113 Pa. 431; 33 W. Va. 179, 188; 147 Ill. 66. A statute forbidding the waiving of payment of money in contracts between employer and employe was held constitutional on the ground that it protected and maintained the medium of payment established by the sovereign power of the United States; 123 Ind. 365.

As to the constitutionality of acts forbidding an employer to discharge his employe on account of his membership in a labor union, see LABOR UNION.

LIBERTY OF SPEECH. The right to speak facts and express opinions. Whart. Dict.

The liberty of speech which both the federal and state constitutions protect is (1) Liberty of speech of legislators in public assemblies, and while engaged in discussing public matters, or in writing reports, or in the exercise of the functions of their office. This is an official privilege: 4 Mass. 1. (2) Liberty of speech of counsel in judicial proceedings, and while confining himself to matters that are strictly pertinent to the issue. This is also an official privilege: 3 Metc. 194; 1 Binn. 178.

In the discharge of his professional duty, counsel may use strong epithets, however derogatory to other persons they may be, if pertinent to the cause, and stated in his instructions, whether the thing were true or false. But if he were maliciously to travel out of his case for the purpose of slandering another, he would be liable to an action, and amenable to a just, and often more efficacious, punishment, inflicted by public opinion; 3 Chitty, Pr. 887.

No action will lie against a witness at the suit of a party aggrieved by his false testimony, even though malice be charged; 50 N. Y. 309; 21 La. Ann. 375; 28 Ia. 51. The remedy against a dishonest witness is confined to the criminal prosecution for perjury; but false accusations, contained in affidavits or other proceedings by which a prosecution is commenced for supposed crime, render the party liable to action if actual malice be averred and proven; 4 Cal. 624; Cooley, Const. Lim. 523.

An act forbidding the use of profane language is not an undue interference with free speech; 113 N. C. 683; 50 Fed. Rep. 921; 16 Blatch. 338; or one taxing itinerant venders of a drug; 60 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 486; or an ordinance prohibiting a public address upon any of the public grounds of a city; 162 Mass. 510; but an act which makes it unlawful for certain specified officers to participate in politics by making political speeches or participate in political meetings is unconstitutional; 79 Va. 196.

Maliciously enticing employes of a receiver to leave his employ in pursuance of a combination to prevent the operation of the road is not protected by the constitutional guaranty of free speech; 62 Fed. Rep. 803. Congress has no power to punish individuals for disturbing the assemblies of peaceful citizens. That is a police power belonging to the state alone; 92 U. S. 524. See 32 L. R. A. 829, n.; Cooley, Const. Lim.; Ord. Const. Leg.; LABOR UNION; MALICE; SLANDER; LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

LIBERTY OF THE PERSON. See PERSONAL LIBERTY.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS. The right to print and publish the truth, from good motives and for justifiable ends. 3 Johns. Cas. 394.

The right in the publisher of a newspaper to print whatever he chooses without any previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor to exactly the same extent that any one else would be responsible. 13 W. Va. 182.

The right to print without any previous license, subject to the consequences of the law. 3 Term 431.

The right to publish in the first instance as the publisher pleases, and without control; but for proceeding to unwarrantable lengths he is answerable both to the community and to the individual. 4 Yeates 267. Liberty of the press means not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character, when tested by such standards as the law affords; Cooley, Const. Lim. [422]. See Story, Const. §§ 1870, 1888, 1891. It is said to consist in this "that neither courts of justice nor any judges whatever are authorized to take notice of writings intended for the press, but are confined to those which are actually printed." De Lome, Const. 254.

At common law liberty of the press was neither well protected nor well defined, and not until after many struggles was it so far recognized in England as to permit the publication of current news without the permission of government censors. May, Const. Hist. c. 7, 9, 10. The general publication of parliamentary debates dates only from the American revolution, and even then was considered a technical breach of privilege; Cooley, Const. Lim. [418]. A fair publication of a debate is now held to be privileged, and comments on public legislative proceedings are not actionable, so long as a jury shall think them honest and made in a fair spirit, and such as are justified by the circumstances; L. R. 4 Q. B. 73.

In the colonial period the English practice was followed in this country. In 1649 the general laws were published for the first time in Massachusetts under protest by the magistrates, and in Virginia and New York printing was specially prohibited. The constitutional convention of 1787 sat with closed doors, as did the senate until 1793. By the constitution liberty of the press is secured against restraint in the United States, but he who uses it is responsible for its abuse. Like the right to keep firearms, it will not protect the user from annoyance and destruction caused by him; 3 Pick. 313. The Sedition Act, July 14, 1798, attempted a restriction upon the freedom of the press, but by its terms it was self-limited; its constitutionality was always doubted by a large party, and its impolicy was beyond question. See Whart. St. Tr. 333, 659, 688; 2 Rand. Life of Jefferson 417; 5 Hildr. Hist. U. S. 247; Ord. Const. Leg.

Liberty of the press is allowed in publishing (1) naked and impartial statements of judicial proceedings involving a trial and not a mere ex parte examination; and when the nature of the case does not render it improper that the same should be published, or constitute such a publication an offence at law; 4 Sandf. 21, 120; 5 id. 256; 10 Ohio St. 548; 4 Wend. 188; 2 Hill 513; (2) in publishing news; Ord. Const. Leg. 239. Acts which have been held not in conflict with the constitutional guaranty of liberty of the press are:—An act making the publication of a grossly false and inaccurate report of the proceedings of any court a criminal offence and a contempt; 17 Mont. 140; an act taxing the selling of Sunday papers; 17 Tex. App. 253; an act forbidding the use of the mails for obscene matter; 45 Fed. Rep. 414; or for printed matter deemed by the government to be injurious to the people; 143 U. S. 110; 96 id. 727; or for sending threatening letters; 135 Mo. 450 (see LIBEL); an act forbidding the publication and sale of a newspaper devoted to the publication of scandal and immorality; 136 Mo. 227; an act directed against blasphemy; 20 Pick. 206; and a by-law of the Associated Press of New York, prohibiting a member from receiving or publishing the regular news despatches of any other news organization covering a like territory; 136 N. Y. 333, aff'g 15 N. Y. Suppl. 887.

A city cannot pass an ordinance declaring a certain named newspaper a public nuisance and forbidding its sale; 22 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 923; nor can the advertisement of a dramatic production be prevented where the play is based upon the facts of a pending trial, as disclosed at a preliminary hearing and the coroner's inquest; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 458; and the constitutional guaranty of liberty of the press will not protect one who breaks a contract with a purchaser not to publish or be connected with another paper in the same locality; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 212.

As to whether an injunction may be issued to restrain the publication of an alleged libel, see LIBEL.

LIBERUM MARITAGIUM (Lat.). In Old English Law. Frank-marriage (q. v.). 2 Bla. Com. 115; Littleton § 17; Bract. fol. 21.

LIBERUM SERVITIUM. Free service. Service of a warlike sort by a feudatory tenant; sometimes called servitium liberum armorum. Somner, Gavelk. p. 56; Jacob, Law Dict.; 4 Co. 9.

Service not unbecoming the character of a freeman and a soldier to perform: as, to serve under the lord in his wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. 2 Bla. Com. 60. The tenure of free service does not make a villein a free man, unless homage or manumission precede, any more than a tenure by villein services makes a freeman a villein. Bract. fol. 24.

LIBERUM TENEMENTUM. Freehold. Frank-tenement. 2 Bouv. Inst. n. 1690; 1 Washb. R. P. 46.

In Pleading. A plea in justification by the defendant in an action of trespass, by which he claims that he is the owner of the close described in the declaration, or that it is the freehold of some third person by whose command he entered. 2 Salk. 453; 7 Term 355; 1 Wms. Saund. 299 b, note.

It has the effect of compelling the plaintiff to a new assignment, setting out the abuttals where he has set forth the locus in quo only generally in his declaration; 11 East 51, 72; 16 id. 343; 1 B. & C. 489; or to set forth tenancy in case he claims as tenant of the defendant, or the person ordering the trespass; 1 Saund. 299 b. It admits possession by the plaintiff, and the fact of the commission of a trespass as charged; 2 M'Cord 226; McKel. Pl. 2033; see Greenl. Ev. § 626.

LIBLAC. Witchcraft, particularly that kind which consisted in the compounding and administering of drugs and philters. Leg. Athel. 6; Wharton.

LIBRA PENSA. A pound of money by weight.

LIBRIPENS. A neutral person or balance holder, who was present at a conveyance of real property. He held in his hand the symbolic balance, which was struck by the purchaser with a piece of bronze as a sign of the completion of the conveyance. The bronze was then transferred to the seller as a sign of the purchase money. Morey, Rom. L. 21, 80.

LICENCIADO. In Spanish Law. Lawyer or advocate. By a decree of the Spanish government of 6th November, 1843, it was declared that all persons who have obtained diplomas of "Licentiates in Jurisprudence" from any of the literary universities of Spain are entitled to practice in all the courts of Spain without first obtaining permission by the tribunals of justice.

LICENSE (Lat. licere, to permit).

In Real Property Law. A permission. A right, given by some competent authority to do an act, which without such authority would be illegal, or a tort or trespass.

A permission to do some act or series of acts on the land of the licensor, without having any permanent interest in it; it is founded on personal confidence, and not assignable. It may be given in writing or by parol; it may be with or without consideration, but in either case it is usually subject to revocation, though constituting a protection to the party acting under it until the revocation takes place. 24 Mich. 282; 89 id. 315; 3 Wyo. 513.

An authority to do a particular act or series of acts on another's land without possessing any estate therein. 11 Mass. 533; 4 Sandf. Ch. 72; 60 Vt. 702; 1 Washb. R. P. *398.

The written evidence of the grant of such right.

An executed license exists when the licensed act has been done.

An executory license exists where the licensed act has not been performed.

An express license is one which is granted in direct terms.

An implied license is one which is presumed to have been given from the acts of the party authorized to give it.

It may be granted by the owner, or, in many cases, by a servant; Cro. Eliz. 246; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 427.

The distinction between an easement and a license is often so metaphysical, subtle, and shadowy as to elude analysis. The adjudications upon this subject are so numerous and discordant that taken in the aggregate they cannot be reconciled. But there are certain fundamental principles underlying most cases which enable courts to distinguish an easement from a license when construed in the light of surrounding circumstances; 32 N. J. Eq. 254; 94 Tenn. 397. An easement implies an interest in land which can only be created in writing or constructively its equivalent—prescription; 1 Washb. R. P. 629. A license may be created by parol; 13 M. & W. 838; 4 M. & S. 562; 7 Barb. 4; 61 Me. 422; 60 Tex. 267; by specialty; Pars. Con. 222; or by implication of circumstances; Hob. 62; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 427.

Licenses are of two kinds, simple or revocable, and coupled with a grant or irrevocable. Simple licenses are revocable at the will of the grantor; 11 Mass. 433; 15 Wend. 380; 81 Ga. 461; 78 Cal. 95; 24 N. H.

364; they are revoked ipso facto by the grantor's conveying the land to another; 4 M. & W. 538; 119 U. S. 561; or by his doing any other act preventing the user; 13 M. & W. 838; although the licensee has incurred expense; 10 Conn. 378; 24 N. H. 364; 4 Johns. 418; 37 E. L. & Eq. 489; 3 Wis. 117; 2 Gray 302; 1 Dev. & B. 492; 41 Minn. 56; 40 Ill. App. 641; 111 Mo. 387; 63 Hun 634; 90 Mich. 234; but see 14 S. & R. 267; and it is not so with a license closely coupled with a transfer of title to personal property; 8 Metc. 34; 11 Conn. 525.

A license is irrevocable when it is coupled with a grant or when the licensee has on the faith of the license spent money in executing works of a permanent character on the land; 2 B. & Ald. 724; 11 A. & E. 84; 8 East 302; 33 Ala. 600; 7 N. H. 237; 13 M. & W. 838 (but see comments on this case in 4 Del. Ch. 195, note); and in some states even parol licenses without consideration are held irrevocable when executed, on the ground of equitable estoppel; 33 Pa. 169; 59 Ill. 337; 45 Ga. 33; 60 Vt. 702; 40 Mo. App. 134.

The nature of the interest in the land of another which might be created by a parol license is thus stated by Bates, Ch., in Jackson & Sharp Co. v. P. W. & B. R. R. Co., 4 Del. Ch. 180, where the subject is carefully considered and the authorities collected: "It must be admitted that a license or permission to exercise some privilege upon the land of the licensor can create no estate or interest in the land, such as binds the land and is transmissible from the licensee, the utmost effect of a license being to confer a personal privilege, which is not assignable or transmissible, and is revocable at the licensor's pleasure. Nor does it matter whether the license be oral or in writing, so long as it remains a mere license, not converted into a conveyance, grant, or contract, nor rendered irrevocable by estoppel, as under some circumstances . . . it may be in equity though not at law. Few points have undergone more discussion, and have at length come to be better settled, than the insufficiency of a license at law to create or transfer an interest in land." It was also said that "at law a license can under no circumstances become irrevocable by estoppel when the effect would be to create an interest in land," there not having been "such conduct as would render the assertion of the legal right a fraud." See an extended note to this case, id. 195–8. See also 94 Tenn. 428, where it was held that the privilege to discharge water from an ore wash into a stream, given without words of grant by a lower proprietor to an iron company, with an agreement to accept a certain sum as the full amount of damages done by such water, is a license, not an easement, and does not extend to the grantees of the iron company.

The revocation of a license will not be permitted where such a revocation will amount to a fraud upon the licensee; 166 Pa. 507; 67 Vt. 272; 27 Ore. 349; but revocation may be presumed from a long period of non-user; 125 Mo. 647. Courts of equity will interfere to restrain the exercise of a legal right to revoke a license on the ground of preventing fraud; 4 Del. Ch. 180; and will do so on no other ground; id.; but in such case they will construe the license as an agreement to give the right and compel specific performance by deed; 4 C. E. Green 153; 66 N. C. 546; 1 Washb. R. P. 400; but this does not give the licensee an unqualified right to treat the license as unrevoked; 1 H. & C. 593; 23 Ex. 87; 11 W. R. 119. An occupancy of land under a contract void as against public policy cannot be treated as a possession under a license for the purpose of obtaining relief in equity; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1003. An executed license which destroys an easement enjoyed by the licenser in the licensee's land cannot be created without deed; 5 B. & C. 221; and the rule that an executed license cannot be revoked; 2 Gill 221; 3 Duer 255; 7 Bingh. 682; 129 Ind. 475; is not applicable to licenses which, if given by deed, would create an easement, but to those which, if so given, would extinguish or modify an easement; 2 Gray 302. See 47 Ill. App. 296. A license must be established by proof and is not to be inferred by equivocal declarations of a land owner; 31 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 310.

The effect of an executed license, although revoked, is to excuse the licensee from liability for acts done properly in pursuance thereof and their consequences; 22 Barb. 336; 2 Gray 302; 10 Conn. 378; 13 N. H. 264; 7 Taunt. 374; 5 B. & C. 221.

In Contracts. A permission to do some act which, if lawful, would otherwise be a trespass or tort; the evidence of such permission when it is in writing.

A covenant not within the statute of frauds may be released or discharged wholly or in part by a parol license; 10 Ad. & E. 65; 2 Add. Cont. [1218].

A license by a debtor to a creditor to seize and sell a specific chattel in discharge of a debt not paid at maturity. This is what is termed in civil law imperfect hypothecation. Such license is confined to the parties and is terminated when rights of third parties intervene; and it is not assignable. It gives no title to the chattel until executed, but possession taken under the license clothes the creditor with the ownership. It is annulled by bankruptcy; 2 Add. Cont., 8th Am. ed. [637]. See HYPOTHECATION.

Under a license in a lease to a lessor to enter and eject the lessee, he was authorized as between themselves to eject the tenant by main force, and the license was a good plea in bar of an action of trespass; 7 Man. & G. 316; 7 Sc. N. R. 1025.

In International Law. Permission granted by a belligerent state to its own subjects, or to the subjects of the enemy, or to neutrals to carry on a trade interdicted by war. 2 Hall. Int. Law 343.

Licenses operate as a dispensation of the rules of war, so far as their provisions extend. They are stricti juris, but are not to be construed with pedantic accuracy. 2 Hall. Int. Law 343; 1 Kent 163, n.; 4 C. Rob. 8. They can be granted only by the sovereign authority, or by those delegated for the purpose by special commission; 1 Dods. 226; Stew. Adm. 367; 8 Term 548; 1 C. Rob. 196; and they must be granted or assented to by both belligerents; Snow. Int. L. xxxi. The Act of Congress, authorizing the president to license certain commercial intercourse with the states in rebellion, did not contemplate the exercise of that authority by subordinate officers of the executive department without the express order of the president; 5 Wall. 580. Licenses constitute a ground of capture and confiscation per se by the adverse belligerent party; Wheat. Int. Law 475. They legalize the commerce, and the alien licensee may sue and be sued in respect thereto as a natural-born subject: 2 Add. Cont. 134, 8th Am. ed. [1156]; 15 East 426; 12 id. 340, 3 Taunt. 568. See 2 Halleck, Int. L., Sir S. Baker's ed. ch. xxx.

In Pleading. A plea of justification to an action of trespass, that the defendant was authorized by the owner of the freehold to commit the trespass complained of.

A license must be specially pleaded to an action of trespass; 2 Term 166; but may be given in evidence in an action on the case; 2 Mod. 6; 8 East 308. See JUSTIFICATION.

In Governmental Regulation. Authority to do some act or carry on some trade or business, in its nature lawful but prohibited by statute, except with the permission of the civil authority or which would otherwise be unlawful.

A license to carry on a business or trade is an official permit to carry on the same or perform other acts forbidden by law except to persons obtaining such permit; 85 Tex. 228.

A license of this sort is a personal privilege, and one issued to a partner individually does not extend to his co-partner or to the firm; 27 Ala. 32. It has been held that even the servant of the licensee is not protected by his master's license; 63 Pa. 168; 4 B. Monr. 37; 7 Dana 337; its terms cannot be varied or extended by the licensee, although he may do every thing that is necessary and proper for his enjoyment of it; 3 Lea 328; 30 La. Ann. 1094; 31 id. 210; 78 Va. 438.

In some cases it is held that where a license is for the protection of the public and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business, and the license is for revenue merely, a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of an act is void; 64 Miss. 221; 4 C. B. N. S. 405; 103 Pa. 501; 27 Ill. App. 270. An innkeeper who fails to secure a license cannot establish a lien upon the goods of his guest; 38 Mo. 92; an attorney cannot recover for his services; 61 Ill. 189; or a surgeon; 37 Eng. L. & Eq. 475; or a physician; 81 Cal. 370 (where a statute made the failure to procure a license a misdemeanor); 105 N. C. 95; L. R. 10 Q. B. 66. But the contracts of unlicensed persons have, in some cases, been held valid; 85 Pa. 329; 23 N. H. 209; 45 Me. 402. See 65 Miss. 365.

A license fee is a tax; 41 La. Ann. 665; which a state may impose upon all citizens within its borders; 16 S. C. 47; but it cannot discriminate between residents and non-residents of the state; 57 Md. 251; or of a city or county; 182 Pa. 630; 5 Coldw. 554; 52 Cal. 606; 107 Ind. 502. Subject to this restriction, a license tax may be imposed upon particular classes of business men; 49 Tex. 279; 6 Sawy. 295; 12 Nev. 263; 9 Baxt. 518; 97 Ga. 114; but a fixed and definite license fee must be named, which all persons engaged in the business specified shall pay; 117 Ind. 221. An occupation tax must be levied only as a means of regulation not of revenue; 42 Neb. 223. Where an act authorizes the granting of licenses, but provides that they may be revoked at the pleasure of the authority granting them, a license granted under the act is not such a contract between the state and the individual that a revocation of it deprives the licensee of any property, immunity, or privilege within the meaning of the constitution; 133 Mass. 579; but in some cases it has been held that a license cannot be revoked without refunding the fee for the unexpired time; 27 N. H. 289; 3 Harring. 441.

The repeal of the act under which the license was granted does not thereby revoke the license; 46 Ala. 329; 1 Ohio St. 15; 119 Pa. 417; but an act prohibiting the business operates at once to revoke the license; 5 Gray 597.

When the power is exercised by municipal corporations, a license is the requirement, by the municipality, of the payment of a certain sum by a person for the privilege of pursuing his profession or calling, whether harmful or innocent, for the general purpose of producing a reliable source of revenue; Tied. Lim. Pol. Pow. 271.

If the occupation is harmful, the sum paid for its prosecution may be said to be a license fee; but if innocent, it is a license tax; 25 Minn. 248; 11 Mich. 49. See 32 N. Y. 261; 26 N. J. L. 298; 60 Pa. 445; 50 Ga. 475; 1 Ohio St. 268. Mere taxation of an unlawful business does not legalize it; 8 L. R. A. Tenn. 280. Where the occupation is not dangerous to the public, either directly or incidentally, it cannot be subjected to any police regulation which does not fall within the power of taxation; Tied. Lim. Pol. Pow. 273. In the regulation of occupations harmful to the public, it is constitutional to require those who apply for a license to pay a reasonable sum to defray the expense of issuing the license and maintaining the proper supervision. What is a reasonable sum must be determined by the facts of each case; but where it is a plain case of police regulation, the courts are not compelled to be too exact in determining the expense of regulation and supervision, so long as the sum demanded is not altogether unreasonable; Tied. Lim. Pol. Pow. 374; 9 Pick. 415; 39 Conn. 140; 60 Pa. 445; 11 Mich. 347; 31 Ia. 102.

A police regulation is not necessarily invalid because in its incidental operations the receipts of the municipality are augmented; 60 Pa. 445; an ordinance which does not fix a definite fee for the pursuit of any occupation, and permit all persons to engage therein, upon payment of such fee, is invalid; 3 L. R. A. 261.

The fact that the income derived from a license is not directly applied to payment of the municipal expenses of regulation and supervision of the business, does not affect the validity of the license, if the amount is not disproportionate to the cost of issuing the license and regulating the business; 42 Neb. 223.

Revenue derived from licensing a harmful occupation with a view to its partial suppression, in excess of that required to maintain proper supervision of it, is not a tax, since its primary object is to restrict an occupation and not to raise revenue; 32 Mich. 406; 16 Wis. 566.

The courts are said by Tiedman, Lim. Police Power, to be not harmonious as to the grounds justifying a license for all kinds of employment; yet the right to impose a license is generally recognized; 9 Pick. 415; 57 N. Y. 591; 42 N. J. L. 364; 60 Pa. 445; 7 Md. 1; 50 Ga. 530; 27 Ala. 55; 15 Ohio 625; 11 Mich. 43; 29 Ia. 123; 101 Ill. 475. The same author cites the following cases: licensing of hucksters has been held unreasonable; 5 Cow. 462; 42 N. J. L. 364; 29 Wis. 307; 25 Minn. 248; and a license tax upon lawyers and physicians is held to be reasonable; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 580; 12 Mo. 268; 5 Ohio 21; 36 Ga. 460; 17 Fla. 169; on bakers; 3 Ala. 137; on places of public amusement; 2 La. Ann. 550; 7 Md. 1; on hacks and draymen; 57 N. Y. 324; 100 Ill. 57; on auctioneers; 68 Ill. 372; 88 Ia. 96; on selling liquor; 22 Minn. 312; 21 Vt. 456; 19 Fla. 563; 39 Ind. 429; 11 Neb. 547; 10 Ia. 441; 25 Md. 541; 20 Ohio St. 308; 78 Mo. 302; 92 Ill. 669; 32 Mich. 406; on bicycles; 19 C. C. A. R. 491; on street railway cars; 60 Pa. 445; and on book canvassers; 31 Cent. L. J. 8.

A city ordinance imposing a pole and wire tax upon a telegraph company doing interstate business, in excess of the reasonable expense to the city in the supervision and regulation thereof, is void; 82 Fed. Rep. 797, following 40 Fed. Rep. 615, between the same parties; see 48 Pa. 117; 167 Pa. 406; but an ordinance compelling a telegraph company to pay five dollars per annum "for the privilege of using the streets, alleys and public places," was upheld in 148 U. S. 92. See 156 U. S. 210; 71 Wis. 560. See PRECEDENT, for comments on these federal cases.

A license tax upon an agent of a railroad company doing interstate business is unlawful; 136 U. S. 104, diss. Fuller, C. J., Gray and Brewer, JJ.; 136 U. S. 114; and so is one upon drummers soliciting orders for firms in another state; 120 U. S. 489; 128 U. S. 129; 9 L. R. A. Ky. 556; 129 U. S. 141; and upon a telegraph company doing interstate business; 127 U. S. 640. A license can be imposed upon peddlers if there is no discrimination as to residents or products of the state and other states; 156 U. S. 296, where the subject of licenses is fully discussed (by Gray, J.). An office license tax upon a foreign corporation is not a tax upon the business or property of the corporation and is constitutional; 114 Pa. 256; and licensing transient, non-resident merchants is not a discrimination against them merely because there may be no resident merchants who are compelled to pay the license; 29 L. R. A. Ia. 734.

LICENTIA CONCORDANDI (Lat. leave to agree). One of the formal steps in the levying a fine. When an action is brought for the purpose of levying a fine, the defendant, knowing himself to be in the wrong, is supposed to make overtures of accommodation to the plaintiff, who accepts them, but, having given pledges to prosecute his suit, applies to the court, upon the return of the writ of covenant, for leave to make the matter up: this, which is readily granted, is called the licentia concordandi. 5 Co. 39; Cruise, Dig. tit. 35, c. 2, 22.

LICENTIA LOQUENDI. Imparlance.

LICENTIA SURGENDI. In Old English Law. Liberty of rising. A liberty or space of time given by the court to a tenant, who is essoined, de malo lecti, in a real action, to arise out of his bed. Also, the writ thereupon. If the demandant can show that the tenant was seen abroad before leave of court, and before being viewed by the knights appointed by the court for that purpose, such tenant shall be taken to be deceitfully essoined, and to have made default. Bract. lib. 5; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 10.

LICENTIA TRANSFRETANDI. A writ or warrant directed to the keeper of the port of Dover, or other seaport, commanding him to let the person who has this license of the king pass over sea. Reg. Orig. 93.

LICENTIOUSNESS. The doing what one pleases, without regard to the rights of others.

It differs from liberty in this, that the latter is restrained by natural or positive law, and consists in doing whatever we please not inconsistent with the rights of others, whereas the former does not respect those rights. Wolff, Inst. § 84.

Lewdness. 28 Fla. 303. See LEWDNESS; LASCIVIOUSNESS.

LICET (Lat.). It is lawful; not forbidden by law.

Id omne licitum est, quod non est legibus prohibitum, quamobrem, quod, lege permittente, fit, pœnam non meretur. Licere dicimus quod legibus, moribus, institutisque conceditur. Cic. Philip. 13.

Although. Calvinus, Lex. An averment that, "although such a thing is done or not done," is not implicative of the doing or not doing, but a direct averment of it. Plowd. 127.

LICET SÆPIUS REQUISITUS (although often requested). In Pleading. A formal allegation in a declaration that the defendant has been often requested to perform the acts the non-performance of which is complained of.

It is usually alleged in the declaration that the defendant, licet sæpius requisitus, etc., did not perform the contract the violation of which is the foundation of the action. This allegation is generally sufficient when a request is not parcel of the contract. Indeed, in such cases it is unnecessary even to lay a general request; for the bringing of the suit is itself a sufficient request; 1 Saund. 33, n. 2; 2 id. 118, note 3; 2 H. Bla. 131; 1 Johns. Cas. 99, 319; 3 M. & S. 150. See DEMAND.

LICITACION. In Spanish Law. The sale made at public auction by co-proprietors, or co-heirs, of their joint property which is not susceptible of being advantageously divided in kind.

LIEGE (from liga, a bond, or litis, a man wholly at command of his lord. Blount).

In Feudal Law. Bound by a feudal tenure; bound in allegiance to the lord paramount, who owned no superior.

The term was applied to the lord, or liege lord, to whom allegiance was due, since he was bound to protection and a just government, and also to the feudatory, liegeman, or subject bound to allegiance, for he was bound to tribute and due subjection. 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. So lieges are the king's subjects. Stat. 8 Hen. VI. c. 10; 14 Hen. VIII. c. 2. So in Scotland. Bell, Dict. But in ancient times private persons, as lords of manors, had their lieges. Jacob, Law Dict.; 1 Bla. Com. 367.

Liege, or ligius, was used in old records for full, pure, or perfect: e. g. ligia potestas, full and free power of disposal. Paroch. Antiq. 280. So in Scotland. See LIEGE POUSTIE.

LIEGE POUSTIE (Legitima Potestas). In Scotch Law. That state of health which gives a person full power to dispose of, mortis causa or otherwise, his heritable property. Bell, Dict.

A deed executed at time of such state of health, as opposed to a death-bed conveyance. Id. A person is in liege poustie, or in legitima potestati, who is in health and capacity, and sui juris. 1 Bell, Com. 85; 6 Cl. & F. 540; Ersk. Prin. III. VIII. 46.

LIEN. A hold or claim which one person has upon the property of another as a security for some debt or charge.

The right which one person possesses, in certain cases, of detaining property placed in his possession belonging to another, until some demand which the former has be satisfied. 2 East 235.

A qualified right which, in certain cases, may be exercised over the property of an other. 6 East 25, n.

A right to hold. 2 Campb. 579.

A right, in regard to personal property, to detain the property till some claim or charge is satisfied. Metc. Yelv. 67, n.

The right of retaining or continuing possession till the price is paid. 1 Parsons, Mar. Law, 144.

A lien is defined by statute in California, Utah, New Mexico, and the Dakotas, to be a charge imposed upon specific property by which it is made security for the performance of an act.

In its most extensive signification, the term lien includes every case in which real or personal property is charged with the payment of a debt or duty; every such charge being denominated a lien on the property. It differs from an estate in or title to the property, as it may be discharged at any time by payment of the sum for which the lien attaches. It differs from a mortgage in the fact that a mortgage is made and the property delivered, or otherwise, for the express purpose of security; while the lien attaches as incidental to the main purpose of the bailment, or, as in case of the lien of a judgment, by mere act of the law, without any act of the party. In this general sense the word is commonly used by English and American law writers to include those preferred or privileged claims given by statute or by admiralty law, and which seem to have been adopted from the civil law, as well as the security existing at common law, to which the term more exactly applies. In its more limited as well as commoner sense, the word lien indicates a mere right to hold the property of another as security until some claim is satisfied.

The civil law embraces, under the head of mortgage and privilege, the peculiar securities which, in common and maritime law, and equity, are termed liens. See MORTGAGE; PRIVILEGE; HYPOTHECATION.

In Scotch law what corresponds to the common law lien is included under the rights termed hypothec and retention, though certain rights of retention are also called liens; Ersk. Prin. 374. See RETENTION; HYPOTHECATION.

Common Law Lien. As distinguished from the other classes, a lien at common law consists in a mere right to retain possession until the debt or charge is paid. 2 Story 131; 24 Me. 214; 5 Ohio 88; 10 Barb. 626; 43 Ill. 424; 66 Tex. 159.

In the case of a factor an apparent exception exists, as he is allowed a lien on the proceeds of goods sold, as well as on the goods themselves. But this seems to result from the relation of the parties and the purposes of the bailment; to effectuate which, and at the same time give a security to the factor, the law considers the possession, or right to possession, of the proceeds, the same thing as the possession of the goods themselves; 1 Wall. 166; 9 Bosw. 660; Story, Ag. § 111.

A particular lien is a right to retain the property of another on account of labor employed or money expended on that specific property.

A general lien is a right to retain the property of another on account of a general balance due from the owner. 3 B. & P. 494.

Of course, where a general lien exists, a particular lien is included.

Particular liens constitute the oldest class of liens, and the one most favored by the common law; 4 Burr. 2221; Dougl. 97; 3 B. & P. 126. But courts ceased to originate liens at an early period; 9 East 496; while general liens have been looked upon with jealousy, being considered encroachments upon the common law and founded solely in the usage of and for the benefit of trade; 3 B. & P. 42, 26, 494.

Liens either exist by law, arise from usage, or are created by express agreement.

Liens which exist by the common law generally arise in cases of bailment. Thus, a particular lien exists when goods are delivered to a handicraftsman of any sort for the execution of the purposes of his trade upon them; see infra; or where a person is, from the nature of his occupation, under a legal obligation to receive and be at trouble or expense about the personal property of another; 3 B. & P. 42; 3 Vt. 245; 5 B. & Ald. 350.

A lien sometimes arises where there is no bailment, as the maritime liens such as salvage, and a finder's lien for a reward, as to both of which, see infra. But this principle does not apply, generally, it is said, to the preservation of things found upon land, where no reward is offered; 2 H. Bl. 254; 2 W. Bl. 1107; 7 Barb. 113; 4 Watts 63; 10 Johns. 102; Story, Bailm. § 621, note a.

Liens which arise by usage are usually general liens, and the usage is said to be either the general usage of trade, or the particular usage of the parties; 3 B. & P. 119; 4 Burr. 2222; 1 Atk. 228; Ambl. 252.

The usage must be so general that the party delivering the goods may be presumed to have known it, and to have made the right of lien a part of the contract; 4 C. & P. 152; 3 B. & P. 50. And it is said that the lien must be for a general balance arising from similar transactions between the parties, and the debt must have accrued in the business of the party claiming the lien; 1 W. Bla. 651; and it seems that more decisive proof of general usage is required in those occupations in which the workmen are required to receive their employment when offered them, such as carriers; 6 Term 14; 6 East 519. But where a general lien has been once established, the courts will not allow it to be disturbed; 1 Esp. 109.

A general lien from particular usage between the parties is presumed from proof of their having before dealt upon that basis; 6 Term 19. If a debtor, who has already pledged property to secure a loan, borrow a further sum, the lien is for the whole debt; 2 Vern. 691.

Liens, general or particular, may be created by express agreement of parties; Cro. Car. 271; 6 Term 14; as when property is delivered under such agreement for repair or the execution of any purpose upon it or in case of pawns; 2 Kent 637. And an agreement among tradesmen to require such lien; if known to the bailor, will bind him as by a lien of this kind. A tradesman obliged to accept employment from all comers cannot by mere notice create such lien by implication; express assent must be proved; 3 B. & P. 42; 5 B. & Ald. 350.

LIENS EXISTING BY THE COMMON LAW, IN THE ABSENCE OF ANY SPECIAL AGREEMENT. Every bailee for hire who has, by his labor or skill, conferred value on specific chattels bailed to him for that purpose has a particular lien upon them; 2 W. & S. 392; 3 Selw. N. P. 1163; 6 Term 14; 86 Pa. 486; 95 id. 345; 26 Miss. 182; 4 Wend. 292; 60 Wis. 26; 44 N. J. L. 105; so also have wharfingers; 7 B. & C. 212; 43 N. Y. 554; 2 Gall. 483; warehousemen; 18 Ill. 286; 13 Ark. 437; 1 Minn. 408; 31 Miss. 261; 34 E. L. & Eq. 116; see 26 Abb. N. C. 134; who are entitled to a lien on goods remaining in the warehouse for a general balance of storage due on all goods stored under a single contract; 53 Fed. Rep. 401; dyers and tailors; Cro. Car. 271; 9 East 433; 4 Burr. 2214; but a tailor making cloth into clothing as a sub-contractor, under a contract with one who received the cloth from the owner, has no lien on the clothing for his services; 174 Pa. 119; the finder of lost property for which a reward is offered; 3 Metc. 352; 8 Gill 213; 7 Barb. 113; 52 Pa. 484; a vendor of goods, for the price, so long as he retains possession; 1 H. Bla. 363; 8 H. L. Cas. 338; 6 McLean 472; 83 Wis. 388; 36 W. Va. 391; 131 U. S. 287; Benj. Sales, § 796; pawnees, from the very nature of their contract; 15 Mass. 408; 2 Vt. 309; 9 Wend. 345; 3 Mo. 219; 39 Me. 45; but only where the pawner has authority to make such pledge; 2 Campb. 336, n. A pledge, even where the pawnee is innocent, does not bind the owner, unless the pawner has authority to make the pledge; 1 Mas. 440; 4 Johns. 103; 1 M. & S. 140; 20 How. 343; 98 Mass. 303; 57 Ga. 274; see, as to stock, 4 Allen 272; 100 Mass. 382; 48 Cal. 99. The pawnee does not have a general lien; 15 Mass. 490; 27 La. Ann. 110; 37 N. Y. 540; and he does not lose his particular lien by a re-delivery for a special and limited purpose; 47 Ill. 198; 18 C. B. N. S. 315; 12 Gray 465. Other liens recognized with respect to the particular property which is the subject matter of the dealings between the parties are as follows:

Common carriers, for transportation of goods; 6 East 519; Wr. Ohio 216; 25 Wis. 241; 1 Minn. 301; 51 Ala. 512; 10 Wall. 15; 104 Mass. 156; 42 Me. 438; but not if the goods are taken tortiously from the owner's possession, where the carrier is innocent; 1 Dougl. Mich. 1; 5 Cush. 137; 6 Whart. 418; 1 B. & Ad. 450; nor if the carrier transport them for a mere hire; 107 Mass. 126. Part of the goods may be detained for the whole freight of goods belonging to the same person; 6 East 622. A carrier has a lien on baggage for the fare of the passenger, which includes the transportation of both; Sto. Bailm. § 604; Hutch. Car. § 719; 2 Campb. 631; 30 Fed. Rep. 94. In the last case it was held by Deady, J., that this lien extended so far as to warrant the detention of the baggage to enforce the payment of an additional fare for the last part of the journey, covered by the ticket, charged by the conductor after the passenger had stopped over without permission; but this decision is challenged by Professor Ewell, in a note which collects and reviews cases considered as bearing upon the question; 26 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 293. If property is damaged while in charge of a common carrier to a greater amount than the bill for freight, his lien is extinguished; 38 S. C. 78. The lien of a carrier and warehouseman for keeping property is superior to that of a pledgee who has secured the property to be transported and stored; 53 Minn. 327. Where a company refuses to deliver freight to the proper owner or consignee, on the ground that it has a lien thereon for freight charges and storage, and the owner resorts to a suit to recover possession of the property, it cannot claim judgment on the ground that it has a lien for storage, where it has been decided that it had no lien for freight charges; 15 Blatchf. 525.

The carriers' common law lien did not include any right of sale; 6 East 21; 20 Wend. 267; but the right to the lien is recognized and a power of sale given by statute in most states. In some states this right of sale is given to other bailees, as innkeepers, factors, etc. For the statutes on this subject see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 4353–6.

Innkeepers may detain a horse for his keep; 6 Term 141; 9 Pick. 280, 316, 332; though, perhaps, not if the person leaving him be not a guest; 68 Me. 489; 11 Barb. 41; but not sell him; Bacon, Abr. Inns (D); 8 Mod. 173; 3 Gray 382; Schoul. Bail. 294; except by custom of London and Exeter; F. Moo. 876; but see supra; and cannot retake the horse or any other goods on which he has a lien, after giving them up; 8 Mod. 173; Metc. Yelv. 67; L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 484. They may detain the goods of a traveller, but not of a boarder; 43 Vt. 30; 27 Misc. 202; L. R. 7 Q. B. 711; 36 Ia. 651; 8 Rich. S. C. 423; 52 Minn. 516. See, generally, 1 Smith, L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 253, 259. The innkeeper's common law lien is now generally regulated by statutes, many of which also confer on boarding-house keepers all the privileges of innkeepers; 43 N. H. 332; 42 Barb. 623; 27 Wis. 406; 110 Mass. 158. See 52 N. J. L. 277. For reference to these statutes see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 4393. An innkeeper's lien is a particular lien; 9 East 433; Cro. Car. 271; 2 E. D. Sm. 195; it attaches to goods in the possession of his guest, though they belong to a stranger, provided the innkeeper has no notice of such fact; 52 Minn. 516; 13 Or. 482; but if he owes the guest for labor more than she does for board, he has no lien; 3 Colo. App. 519. Where a husband and wife were guests at a hotel, although credit was given to the husband who made payments on account, yet the wife's luggage which was her separate property, was subject to a lien for the balance of the hotel bill; 25 Q. B. Div. 491. See a full note on the innkeeper's lien, 21 L. R. A. 229. In holding that an innkeeper has a lien on goods which a traveller brings to the inn as luggage, the English court of appeal said that it would not disturb a well-known and very large business carried on in England for centuries, by holding otherwise; [1895] 2 Q. B. 501.

Agistors of cattle and livery-stable keepers have no lien; Cro. Car. 271; 7 Gray 183; 35 Me. 153; 23 Cal. 364; 36 Vt. 220; 78 N. C. 96; 6 East 509; except by statute; 3 Colo. App. 335; 66 Hun 627; 34 Neb. 482; 19 Or. 217; 62 Vt. 436.

An agistor's lien cannot be based upon a breach of the contract of agistment; 58 Mo. App. 1; and when the owner of stock allows it to remain in the hands of the agistor longer than the contract time, the latter may claim a lien for their keeping during such term; id. One who boards a horse under contract with a person not the owner thereof has no right to a lien unless it is shown that such person had authority to act for the owner; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 525. Persons who have been held entitled to a lien for keeping animals are: ranchmen; 7 Mont. 385; stable keeper; 155 Mass. 481; 23 Mo. App. 598; but not a groom merely employed to take charge of the horse; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 203. Such lien accrues only to one in possession; 57 Conn. 547; s. c. 6 L. R. A. 82; 46 Ohio St. 560; 12 Wash. 46; 43 Minn. 148; 89 Ia. 350; 26 Ill. App. 315; contra, see 23 Mo. App. 617. One wrongfully converting an animal to his own use has no lien; 44 Kan. 543; nor one receiving from a bailee with notice; 41 Mo. App. 416. A liveryman's lien, under the Pennsylvania act, 1807, for boarding a horse does not extend to a carriage and harness kept with it; 14 Lanc. L. Rev. Pa. 255. This lien depends solely upon statutes; 64 Minn. 472.

Factors, brokers, and commission agents, on goods and papers; 3 Term 119; 1 Johns. Cas. 437, n.; 8 Wheat. 268; 28 Vt. 118; 34 Me. 582; 150 Pa. 481; 38 W. Va. 158; on part of the goods for the whole claim; 6 East 622; or on the proceeds of sale of the goods; 5 B. & Ald. 27; 72 Ill. 226; 15 Mass. 389; but only for such goods as come to them as factors; 11 E. L. & Eq. 528; but not such as are delivered directly by the owner to the purchaser and do not come into possession of the factor; 149 Ill. 9; s. c. 25 L. R. A. 746. If a factor disobey instructions he loses his lien upon money deposited with him as security; 40 Ill. 313; 114 id. 196.

Bankers, on all securities left with them by their employers; 5 Term 488; 1 How. 234; 8 Ill. 233; see 130 U. S. 354. But see also 11 Pa. 291. But not on securities collateral to a specific loan; L. R. 4 App. Cas. 413; 47 Barb. 395; 137 Mass. 262; or for debts not due; 96 Ill. 558; 74 N. Y. 467; or on the account of a firm for the debt of a partner; 35 N. Y. 320; 11 Beav. 546

The lien of mechanics and material men upon a building or improvement in the construction of which labor or material is used, exists only by virtue of the statutes creating it; 22 Neb. 126. See Mechanics' Lien, infra.

As to the lien of attorneys and other court officers for fees, see Attorneys' Lien, infra.

As to liens on the assets of insolvent persons or corporations for wages of labor or service, which are purely statutory, having no relation to the common law idea of lien, see LABORER.

REQUISITES. There must have been a delivery of the property into the possession of the party claiming the lien, or his agent; 3 Term 119; 6 East 25, n.

Where a person, in pursuance of the authority and directions of the owner of property, delivers it to a tradesman for the execution of the purposes of his trade upon it, the tradesman will not have a general lien against the owner for a balance due from the person delivering it, if he knew that the one delivering was not the real owner; 1 East 335; 2 Campb. 318. Thus, a carrier, who, by the usage of trade, is to be paid by the consignor, has no lien for a general balance against the consignee; 5 B. & P. 64. Nor can a claim against the consignee destroy the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu; 3 B. & P. 42. But a particular lien may undoubtedly be derived through the acts of agents acting within the scope of their employment; 9 East 233; 3 B. & P. 119. And the same would be true of a general lien against the owner for a balance due from him.

No lien exists where the party claiming it acquires possession by wrong; 2 Term 485; or by misrepresentation: 1 Campb. 12; or by his unauthorized and voluntary act; 8 Term 310, 610; 2 H. Bla. 254; 3 W. Bla. 1117 (but see 4 Burr. 2218).

Or where the act of the servant or agent delivering the property is totally unauthorized, and the pledge of it is tortious against the owner, whether delivered as a pledge or for the execution of the purposes of a trade thereupon; 5 Ves. 111; 6 East 17.

A delivery by a debtor for the purpose of preferring a creditor will not be allowed to operate as a delivery sufficient for a lien to attach; 4 Burr. 2239; 3 Ves. 85; 2 Campb. 579; 11 East 356.

A mere creditor happening to have in his possession specific articles belonging to his debtor, has no lien upon them; 15 Mass. 490: nor is a lien created by advancing money to enable a purchaser of land to complete his purchase; 3 Johns. Ch. 56; 6 G. & J. 4; nor by an advancement of money to an administrator to pay debts of the intestate; 4 Ohio 495; the owner of land has no lien on property cast upon it by drift; 16 Pa. 393. A lien cannot be created upon a mere right of action for a personal tort; 53 Minn. 249. No lien upon a particular fund is acquired by a creditor by reason of a promise to pay a debt out of it; 18 Wend. 319; nor upon land by the promise to pay out of the proceeds of its sale; 46 Ill. App. 541. Nor can parties contract to extend the area of property to be covered by a lien; 149 U. S. 574. A mere loan or advancement of money to pay the debt of another creates no lien; 72 Ia. 550; 47 Ark. 111; 124 Ind. 545. See 9 L. R. A. 173, note; SUBROGATION. At common law a corporation has no lien upon the stock of one of its nembers for an indebtedness due to it by him; 50 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 575; 15 Ore. 413; but see 99 Pa. 513; 75 Va. 327; 77 id. 445, in which cases such lien seems to have been enforced under general statutes. By-laws creating such lien are common and are valid; 23 N. J. Eq. 325; 61 Mo. 319; 58 Miss. 421; 48 Ia. 339; 9 R. I. 308; 2 Sawy. 108; 3 Cliff. 429; not, however, against innocent purchasers; 18 Wall. 589; 59 N. Y. 96; 102 Pa. 488; 63 Cal. 359; 8 Mo. App. 249; 33 La. Ann. 1286. A statutory lien of a corporation on its stock for debts due by a stockholder is good against all the world. A sale of the stock to an innocent third party does not discharge it; 73 N. W. (Minn.) 635. Such is declared to be "the weight of authority" by a work which is itself an authority; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 1082.

WAIVER. Possession is a necessary element of common-law liens; and if the creditor once knowingly parts with it after the lien attaches, the lien is gone; 5 Ohio 88; 6 East 25, n.; 42 Me. 50; 2 Edw. Ch. 181; 5 Binn. 398; 4 Denio 498; 42 Me. 50; 11 Cush. 231; 2 Swan 561; 23 Vt. 217; 48 Fed. Rep. 480; Benj. Sales § 799; Trick. Liens 11, 16, 616; the abandonment of his privilege by a vendor need not be in absolute terms, but it is enough if it can be inferred from the acts of the parties; 40 La. Ann. 615. Parting with possession, if consistent with the contract, the course of business, and the intention of the parties, will not discharge a lien created by a contract; 32 Me. 211. There may be a special agreement extending the lien, though not to affect third persons; 36 Wend. 467. Delivery may be constructive; Ambl. 252; and so may possession; 5 Ga. 153. A lien cannot be transferred; 8 Pick. 73; but property subject to it may be delivered to a third person, as to the creditor's servant, with notice, so as to preserve the lien of the original creditor; 2 East 529. But it must not be delivered to the owner or his agent; 2 East 529; 4 Johns. 103. But if the property be of a perishable nature, possession may be given to the owner under proper agreements; 8 Term 199. Generally a delivery of part of goods sold is not equivalent to a delivery of the whole, so as to destroy the vendor's lien, but the lien will remain on the part retained for the price of the whole, if the intention to separate the goods delivered from the rest is manifest; Benj. Sales § 805. A grantor's lien on the premises conveyed for the purchase price is a personal privilege not assignable with the debt, nor can the creditor of the grantor be subrogated to the same; 39 Fed. Rep. 89; 78 Ga. 173; 128 Ill. 178. See 84 Ala. 281.

Neglect to insist upon a lien, in giving reasons for a refusal to deliver property on demand, has been held a waiver; 1 Campb. 410, n.; 7 Ind. 21; 13 Ark. 437.

Where there is a special agreement made, or act done, inconsistent with the existence of the lien, such as an agreement to give credit, or where a distinct security is taken, or the possession of the property is acquired for another distinct purpose, and for that only, or where the property is attached by the creditor, no lien arises; 2 Marsh. 339; 5 M. & S. 180; 8 N. H. 441; 17 Pick. 140; 4 Vt. 549; 10 Conn. 103. But such agreement must be clearly inconsistent with the lien; 1 Dutch. 443; 32 Me. 319. See 109 U. S. 702.

The only remedy or use of the lien at common law is to allow the creditor to retain possession of the goods; 33 Me. 438; 1 Mas. 319. And he may do this against assignees of the debtor: 1 Burr. 489.

A waiver of exemption by a debtor as to any lien will enure to the benefit of all prior liens, on the principle that a debtor cannot alter the precedence settled by law; 124 Pa. 347.

ATTORNEY'S LIEN. This, under English law, was a lien for costs taxed in the cause. In the early cases the attorney or solicitor was put upon the same footing as other court officers, such as clerks who had a lien on papers; 2 Ves. 25; Beames, Costs 311. The doctrine of attorney's lien as originally held was that it was confined to costs, and the plaintiff might settle the case in the absence of notice from the attorney; 4 Term 124; 13 Ves., Sumn. ed. 59, n.; there was also a lien on papers; 6 Madd. 66; but none on the fund; 4 id. 391. There were two classes of liens recognized, active and passive, the former being on the fund for costs, and the latter a right to retain papers; 4 Myl. & Cr. 354. The attorney was not dominus litis; 12 M. & W. 440; and his lien would not prevail over a garnishment; 1 H. & M. 171. In the United States many cases sustain the lien upon the fruits of the judgment for fees; 66 Ala. 29; 42 Ark. 402; 6 Fla. 214; 51 Conn. 105; 14 Ga. 89; 17 Kan. 20; 39 Minn. 373; 1 Heisk. 503; 16 W. Va. 378; 10 Wis. 112. Some cases sustain the lien for a fee agreed upon as being within the principle of the common law lien for costs; 51 N. Y. 140; 70 id. 98; but the lien is waived by consent to a payment to the client; 112 id. 157. Others recognize a retaining lien on papers; 128 Ill. 631; 10 Wall. 483; and as between solicitor and client for reasonable compensation on money collected; 105 U. S. 527; 71 Ia. 32; but none, in either of these cases, upon a judgment, or unliquidated damages; 5 Bush 601; or in an action of tort; 66 Me. 237.

In some states the cases sustain a statutory lien for fees; 10 Col. 228; paramount to set off; 86 Ind. 172; 10 Neb. 574; 15 Johns. 406; 1 Rich. 207; 40 Mich. 218; the lien binds money or papers in possession of the attorney for all professional services, but for them only; 56 id. 135.

In others, statutory liens are held to apply only to taxable fees; 69 Me. 381; 11 Mass. 238; and only after final judgment and execution issued; 108 id. 83. So in New York prior to the code, the common law lien was confined to taxed costs; 1 Paine & Duer, Prac. 190; and did not affect damages recovered until they came into his hands; 12 Wend. 261.

Some cases sustain a lien on papers for a general balance; 11 N. H. 163; and on the recovery in the cause, but not those due in other causes; 4 id. 847; 48 Fed. Rep. 145; others, for costs, but subordinate to set-off; 14 Vt. 247; and ineffective as against an assignment; id. 485.

Liens may be defeated by settlement: 39 Ga. 5; 21 Ia. 523; if there is no collusion; 41 Ill. 136.

The lien is denied absolutely in some states; 1 Bland 98; 43 Md. 46, 212; 44 Miss. 530; 18 Mo. 18; 35 Ohio St. 581; 3 Watts 357; though some cases, denying the lien, hold that fees may be deducted from money in hand; 19 Pa. 95; 30 Tex. 180; see 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 216; but in another case it was said that in the absence of an express agreement, an attorney's lien is not acquired upon a judgment rendered in a suit prosecuted by him, nor upon the money recovered by means of his legal services; 163 Ill. 384.

An attorney has a lien on land for sums expended for his client's benefit in obtaining full title; 48 La. Ann. 54; but not for fees in maintaining title; 40 id. 135; also on a judgment in favor of defendant for costs; 16 Misc. Rep. 515; and the attorney of a stockholder in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by the officers of the corporation, has a lien for his fees on the property recovered; 93 Tenn. 691; also on money collected for his client until paid the general balance due him for his services; 66 Vt. 510. An attorney for plaintiff in an action by an administrator to recover damages for the death of his intestate has a lien on the amount recovered; 78 Hun 575; but one retained by a legatee to procure the establishment of a will has none, for his services, on the legacy to his client; 29 Fla. 476. In proceedings to compel an attorney to deliver up property where his claim is indefinite, a reference is properly ordered to ascertain the amount, giving plaintiff the option of making a deposit sufficient to secure whatever amount may be established on the reference, and he is not deprived of his lien simply because his claim is indefinite; 66 Hun 626; 137 N. Y. 605. An equitable lien is acquired by an attorney where, by an agreement with the owner of property condemned for a city street, he procures an increase in the amount of damages awarded; 66 Hun 626. He has a lien upon the cause of action for agreed compensation, which attaches to the judgment and the proceeds thereof, superior to the rights of a receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings; 11 App. Div. N. Y. 286.

It has been held that an attorney has no lien, at common law, on his client's cause of action; 72 Fed. Rep. 565; or, independently of a statute, for services; 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 413; or in a proceeding by a guardian for the removal of funds of his ward to a foreign state, for fees incurred in the proceeding; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 188. The lien cannot be asserted against money appropriated by a legislative act, while it is in the hands of the state treasurer; 40 Neb. 854. The attorney employed by a pledgee of notes, impounded in an equity suit, to sue on them at law, has no lien upon the fund realized, as against the other parties to the equity suit; 67 Fed. Rep. 857. An agreement on the settlement of certain cases that the fees of an attorney should be included in the fees to be paid in another case, if a judgment be recovered, does not create a lien on the judgment for fees on the cases settled; 59 Fed. Rep. 750. Where an attorney received money for bail, to be returned on final disposition of the charge, it was held that an attorney's lien did not exist on the money, his agreement being to return it on receiving it back from the magistrate; 24 Ore. 168.

An attorney's lien for services in procuring a judgment is limited to the attorney of record and does not extend to attorneys employed to assist him; 59 Fed. Rep. 750; nor does it extend to prospective services; 48 id. 145.

An attorney whose services are employed merely in defending the title to land has no lien upon the land for his services; 56 Ark. 324; nor is there a lien on land recovered; 36 W. Va. 200. The attorney for defendant is not entitled to any lien so as to prevent a settlement by defendant, where the answer simply sets up a defence and not a counterclaim; 16 App. Div. N. Y. 70. And the right of an attorney to a lien on his client's papers is lost by the substitution of another attorney in his place on his refusal to go on with the case without the payment of fees which he claims to have already earned; 16 App. Div. N. Y. 126. No lien can accrue in favor of the attorney for plaintiff where the action is settled by plaintiff before defendant has notice of the attorney's claim for a lien; 50 Neb. 373. But acceptance of a client's note for his fee is not a waiver of his statutory lien; 86 Ga. 138.

Where an attorney having a lien on a judgment takes an assignment thereof to himself, and claims the absolute ownership of the judgment, he relinquishes whatever rights he might have been entitled to by virtue of his lien; 43 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 1042; and taking an independent security to secure payment of his fee waives his lien, even though the security proves unavailable; 7 Houst. 182.

It has been held that, where a judgment requires the claim of an intervening creditor of the plaintiff to be first paid out of the amount for which the plaintiff has judgment, the right of the creditor is superior to the lien of an attorney; 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 413. An attorney's lien is subordinate to the right of the adverse party to any proper set-off, or other available defences; 44 Neb. 900; 3 S. D. 477.

See, generally, Weeks, Attys.; Beames, Costs; Cross, Liens; 26 Alb. L. J. 271; 31 Am. Dec. 755–9; 20 Am. L. Rev. 727, 821; 21 id. 70; 10 Am. L. Rec. 200; 18 Abb. N. C. 23; 19 Centr. L. J. 394; 27 id. 194; 23 Ir. L. T. 351; 12 Fed. Rep. 518; 17 Wkly. L. Bul. 16; 2 Silvern. N. Y. 159–211.

Equitable Liens are such as exist in equity, and of which courts of equity alone take cognizance.

A court of equity will raise equitable liens for the purpose of justice, and if a lien could not be created otherwise, could even make a company execute a conveyance for that purpose; 3 Hughes 320.

A lien is neither a jus in re nor a jus ad rem; it is not property in the thing, nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing. It more properly constitutes a charge upon the thing. In regard to these liens, it may be generally stated that they arise from constructive trusts. They are, therefore, wholly independent of the possession of the thing to which they are attached as an incumbrance; and they can be enforced only in courts of equity; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1215.

An equitable lien on a sale of realty is very different from a lien at law; for it operates after the possession has been changed, and is available by way of charge instead of detainer. Ad. Eq. 127.

Every express executory agreement in writing, whereby the contracting party sufficiently indicates an intention to make some particular property, real or personal, or fund therein identified, a security for a debt or other obligation, or whereby the party promises to convey, assign, or transfer the property as security, creates an equitable lien upon the property so indicated which is enforceable against the property; 30 W. Va. 790.

Vendor's Lien. First in importance among equitable liens is the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money. The principle upon which it rests is that where a conveyance is made prematurely before payment of the price, the purchase money is a charge on the estate in the hands of the vendee; 4 Kent 151; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1217; Bisph. Eq. 353; 15 Ves. 329; 1 Bro. C. C. 420, 424, n. There has been some discussion as to its exact nature and whether it is to be classed in any sense as an implied trust, but the more reasonable view seems to be that it is not, at least in such sense as to carry with it the idea of any title, but that it is strictly a mere charge, the true nature of which perhaps cannot be better expressed than by the use of the term equitable lien. "The principle upon which such a lien rests has been held to be that one who gets the estate of another ought not, in conscience, to be allowed to keep it without paying the consideration." 147 U. S. 133. As to the nature and origin of the lien see also 1 Bisph. Eq. 354; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1219; 2 Sugd. Vend. & P. 376; 1 Mas. 191; 1 Pingr. Mort. 319; 1 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. 366; 118 Mass. 261; 22 Am. St. Rep. 279.

"No other single topic belonging to the equity jurisprudence has occasioned such a diversity and even discord of opinion among the American courts as this of the grantor's lien. Upon nearly every question that has arisen as to its operation, its waiver or discharge, the parties against whom it avails, and the parties in whose favor it exists, the decisions in the different states and even sometimes in the same state, are directly conflicting." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1251.

Unless waived the lien remains till the whole purchase money is paid; 15 Ves. 329; 1 Vern. 267.

In order to create a vendor's lien there must be a fixed amount of unpaid purchase money due to the vendor. A vendee's obligation to a vendor on a collateral covenant made at the time of a purchase will not give rise to a vendor's lien, unless the vendor expressly reserves such a lien in his deed; 36 Fed. Rep. 577.

A grantor's lien on the premises conveyed, for the purchase price, is a personal privilege not assignable with the debt; nor can the creditor of the grantor be subrogated to the same; 39 Fed. Rep. 89; 78 Ga. 173; 128 Ill. 178; but see 84 Ala. 281; 4 N. Mex. 347; 70 Tex. 132; 87 Tenn. 41. The lien exists against all the world except bona fide purchasers without notice; 1 Johns. Ch. 308; 9 Ind. 490; 12 R. I. 92; it is good against the land in the hands of heirs or subsequent purchasers with notice; 3 Russ. 488; 1 Sch. & L. 135; against assignees in bankruptcy; 2 B. R. 183; 1 Bro. Ch. 420; and whether the estate is actually conveyed or only contracted to be conveyed; 2 Dick. Ch. 730; 12 Ad. & E. 632. But as a general rule the lien does not prevail against the creditors of the purchaser; 7 Wheat. 46; 10 Barb. 626; 2 Sudg. Vend. & P. [681] n.; but whether it will do so it is said "depends upon the relative equities and rights of the disputants in comparison with one another." 1 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. 374; and see 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1228. See as to assignability, 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 393, where the cases are collected by states. The question is involved in too much confusion for any successful effort to state a general rule.

The doctrine of vendor's lien, firmly settled in England, has been received with varying degrees of favor in the United States, some of them refusing to accept it. This would be in accord with the disfavor shown in this country to secret liens which has naturally resulted from the universal habit of requiring title papers and charges on real estate to be matters of record. In a general way the American cases may be grouped as follows: (1) Those which follow the English doctrine of Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, sustaining the lien as already defined. In this class are included a majority of the states, though it is to be noted that in the classification of states frequently made with reference to this subject, there is a failure to note an important distinction between those states where the lien is recognized before a conveyance, and those in which the English doctrine is carried to its fullest extent and a grantor's lien sustained. A careful examination of the cases would probably leave the states which go to this extent in a considerable minority, as the lien is frequently recognized in favor of a vendor who has only executed a contract of sale and put the vendee in possession; 29 Neb. 672; 3 Ired. Eq. 117; while the lien is not recognized after a deed; id. 182. So in a state usually included among those recognizing the lien; 14 Ore. 268; it has been recently held that "where real estate is granted by absolute deed, followed by delivery of possession to the grantee, no implied equitable lien for the unpaid purchase money remains in the grantor:" 45 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 290. (2) The implied vendor's lien is abolished by statute in Vermont, Iowa, Virginia, West Virginia, and Georgia. It is recognized and process provided for it in Tennessee, California, the Dakotas, Louisiana, and Arizona. And in Arkansas and Alabama the lien passes to an assignee of the note or bond for purchase money; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1950. (3) The doctrine has been expressly disavowed in several states; 29 Me. 410; 13 Kan. 245; 49 Pa. 9; 2 Dessaus. 509; 10 R. I. 334; 118 Mass. 261; 44 N. H. 102; 17 Conn. 575. In Delaware the question remains without direct decision but with judicial expressions strongly adverse; 1 Harring. 69; 3 Del. Ch. 189; 36 Fed. Rep. 860. (4) The federal courts recognize and enforce the lien "if in harmony with the jurisprudence of the state in which the case is brought;" 147 U. S. 133. Classifications of cases in the state courts on this subject may be found in Bisph. Eq. § 353, notes; 1 Pingr. Mortg. 318, notes; Tiedm. R. P. 292, notes; 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 393.

In a rather unusual case, it was held that where a vendee, as a consideration, assumes debts of the vendor and settles them at a compromise, the vendor has a lien for the amount of the rebate; 150 Ill. 212.

Waiver. The lien may be waived by agreement; but postponement of the day of payment is not a waiver, not being inconsistent with the nature of the lien; nor taking personal security; Ad. Eq. 128; 1 Johns. Ch. 308; 2 Humphr. 248; 1 Mas. 192; 2 Ohio 388; 1 Blackf. 246; 8 Ga. 333; 1 Ball & B. 514. An acknowledgment of the payment of the purchase-money in the body of the deed, or by a receipt, will not operate as a waiver or discharge of the vendor's lien if the purchase-money has not in fact been paid; 30 N. J. Eq. 569; 50 Ala. 228; 29 Ark. 357. Taking the note or other personal security of the vendee payable at a future day is generally held merely a means of payment, and not a security destroying the lien; 1 Sch. & L. 185; 2 V. & B. 306; 12 W. Va. 575; 50 Ala. 34; 26 N. J. Eq. 311; 44 Miss. 508; 25 Ark. 510; 21 Vt. 271; 1 Johns. Ch. 308. Where notes were taken of which part were not due and of those due payment had been made or tendered there was no vendor's lien; 24 Ore. 212. And if it be the note of a third party, or an independent security on real estate, it would generally be a waiver; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1226, n.; 4 Kent 151; 4 Wheat. 290; 1 Mas. 212; 4 Mo. App. 292; 67 Ill. 599; 10 R. I. 334; 10 Heisk. 477; 43 Miss. 570; 46 Texas 204; 30 Md. 422; 20 Ohio 546; 15 Ind. 435; 16 N. H. 592; 17 Cal. 70; 2 Mich. 243; 4 N. Y. 312; 66 Mo. 44. And, generally, the question of relinquishment will turn upon the facts of each case; 3 Russ. Ch. 488; 3 Sugd. Vend. c. 18; 8 J. J. Marsh. 553. As to waiver see 4 West. Rep. 780; extinguishment, see 14 Am. St. Rep. 61; estoppel, 5 Cent. L. J. 221.

See, generally, Herman, Mortg.; Miller, Eq. Mortg.; Perry, Trusts § 232; 2 Washb. R. P. 509, n. 6; EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

OTHER EQUITABLE LIENS. In a case analogous to the vendor's lien, where money has been paid prematurely before conveyance made, the purchaser and his representatives have a lien; 3 Y. & J. 264; 11 Price 58; 1 P. Wms. 278.

So where the purchase money has been deposited in the hands of a third person, to cover incumbrances; 1 T. & R. 469; 1 Ves. 478. Yet a lien will not be created for a third party, who was to receive an annuity under a covenant as a part of the consideration for the conveyance; 3 Sim. 499; 1 M. & K. 297; 2 Keen 81.

The deposit of the title-deeds of an estate gives an equitable lien on the estate; 4 Bro. C. C. 269; s. c. 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 931; L. R. 3 P. C. C. 299; Bisph. Eq. 357; without any express agreement either by parol or in writing. But not when the circumstances of the deposit were such as to show that no such lien was intended; 36 Beav. 27. This equitable lien has been recognized in 2 Sandf. Ch. 9; 2 Hill, Ch. 166; 12 Wisc. 413; 10 Sm. & M. 418; but denied in 2 Disn. 9; 1 Rawle 325. See 8 B. Monr. 435; 18 N. J. Eq. 104. This lien is not favored, and is confined strictly to an actual, immediate, and bona fide deposit of the title-deeds with the creditor, as a security, in order to create the lien; 12 Ves. 197; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; 4 Kent 150. It would not be valid under the recording acts as against a bona fide purchaser from the owner of the title, without notice.

One who has a lien for the same debt on two funds, on one only of which another person has a lien, may be compelled in equity by the latter to resort first to the other fund for satisfaction; 8 Ves. 388; 1 Johns. Ch. 318; 1 Story, Eq. § 633; but not where there are prior liens on both funds; 184 Pa. 318.

When a single lien covers several parcels of land, such of them as still belong to the real debtor will be primarily charged, to the exoneration of lands transferred to third parties; and if the purchasers are called upon to pay, they will be charged successively in the reverse order of time of transfers to them; 5 Johns. Ch. 440; 1 Pa. 275; but see contra, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1233.

One joint tenant has, in many cases, a lien on the common estate for repairs put on by himself above his share of the liability; 1 Ball & B. 199; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1236; Sugd. Vend. 611.

And equity applies this principle even to cases where a tenant for life makes permanent improvements in good faith; 1 Sim. & S. 552. So where a party has made improvements under a defective title; 6 Madd. 2; 9 Mod. 11.

An agreement between two legatees whereby one purchases the interest of the other and agrees that the executor shall hold his own interest in the estate as security for the payment of the consideration, and shall pay to the vendor any sum due under the will to the vendee, creates an equitable lien on the personal property or its proceeds, to which the vendee is entitled under the will, but not on the real estate; 20 S. Rep. (Ala.) 456.

So, too, there is a lien where property is conveyed inter vivos, or is bequeathed or devised by last will and testament, subject to a charge for the payment of debts; or to other charges in favor of third persons; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1244. A distinction must be kept in mind between a devise in trust to pay certain sums, and a devise subject to charges.

An equitable lien may be given by express contract upon future property; 50 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 546; but it is not created by a mere promise to pay a debt from a particular fund if it should ever come into existence; 78 Fed. Rep. 417.

An acknowledgment in a deed to a firm that a judgment in favor of the grantor against a member of the firm is to stand against a fractional portion of the property conveyed, creates a lien by deed; 38 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 519.

A covenant to convey and settle lands does not give the covenantee a lien; but was held to do so in case of a covenant to settle lands in lieu of dower; 3 Bro. Ch. 489; 1 Ves. 451; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 471.

A court of equity cannot create a lien upon lands to secure a party for a breach of contract, whether under seal or not, when there is no agreement for a lien between the parties; 74 Mich. 57.

A bargain and sale of personal property, accompanied by delivery, divests the vendor of any lien for payment, unless such lien is secured by chattel mortgage or by agreement between the parties; 131 U. S. 287.

An equitable lien upon real estate does not result from the sale of personal property, even though it is used in the erection of buildings thereon; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 910. As to equitable liens on personalty, see 14 Cent. L. J. 42; on chattels, 19 id. 2, 24.

Where the owner of an equity of redemption in mortgaged lands agreed to charge a certain lot with the payment of two mortgages held upon other property, and agreed to execute proper mortgages on said land, or to pay off the mortgage already given, the agreement created an equitable charge in favor of the mortgagees named in the instrument; 26 Can. S. C. R. 41.

The holder of a mere equitable lien cannot compel the owner of the legal estate to account for the rents and profits received by him while occupying the premises; 88 Me. 479.

The holder of the legal title to land cannot, by private sale to a corporation having the right of eminent domain, defeat inchoate liens which would otherwise attach as the result of legal proceedings; 109 Ala. 448.

As to equitable liens generally, see Jones, Liens; 38 Alb. L. J. 188; 4 L. R. A. 247.

Maritime Liens. Maritime liens do not include or require possession. The word lien is used in maritime law, not in the strict legal sense in which we understand it in courts of common law, in which case there could be no lien where there was no possession, actual or constructive; but to express, as if by analogy, the nature of claims which neither presuppose nor originate in possession; 22 E. L. & Eq. 62. See 15 Bost. Law Rep. 555; 16 id. 1, 264; Ben. Adm. § 271. A distinction is made in the United States between qualified maritime liens, which depend upon possession, and absolute maritime liens, which do not require nor depend upon possession; 7 How. 729; 21 Am. Law Reg. 1. The sole essentials of admiralty jurisdiction in a suit in rem for breach of contract are that the contract is maritime and that the property proceeded against is within the lawful custody of the court. The existence of a maritime lien is not jurisdictional, but is a matter going to the merits; 168 U. S. 137. To sustain a maritime lien there must be, either in fact or by presumption of law, a credit of the ship; 60 Fed. Rep. 766.

The shipper of goods has a lien upon the ship, for the value of the goods sent, which can be enforced in admiralty; 1 Blatchf. & H. 300; 22 How. 491; 3 Blatchf. 271, 289; and, generally, every act of the master binds the vessel, if it be done within the scope of his authority; 1 W. Rob. 392; 18 How. 182; where the possession of the master is not tortious, but under a color of right; 6 McLean 484. This does not apply to contracts of material men with the master of a domestic ship; 1 Conkl. Adm. 73; and the act must have been within the scope of the master's employment; 18 How. 182. See 1 C. Rob. 84. This lien follows the ship even in the hands of a purchaser, without notice, before the creditor has had a reasonable opportunity to enforce his lien; 1 Ware 188. If the master borrow money for the ship's necessity, the lender has a lien on the ship for the amount; 4 Dall. 225; 8 Me. 298; 36 Fed. Rep. 197. A sale of the vessel by the master through necessity cuts out the lien of the shipper of the cargo in the vessel; 6 Wall. 18.

The owner of a ship has a lien on the cargo carried for the freight earned, whether reserved by a bill of lading or not; 4 B. & Ald. 630; 6 Pick. 248; 5 Sandf. 97; 5 Ohio 88; 8 Wheat. 605; 2 W. & M. 178.

Where freight has been earned for the transportation of goods before the United States declares them forfeited for a fraudulent custom house entry, and sells them, the freight has a lien on the proceeds, if the vessel owners were innocent; 9 Fed. Rep. 595.

This lien is, at most, only a qualified maritime lien; see 1 Pars. Mar. Law 174, n. The lien exists in case of a chartered ship; 4 Cow. 470; 1 Paine 358; 4 B. & Ald. 630; 8 Wheat. 605; to the extent of the freight due under the bill of lading; 1 B. & Ald. 711; 1 Sumn. 551. But if the charterer takes possession and management of the ship, he has the lien; 8 Cra. 39; 6 Pick. 248; 4 Cow. 470; 4 M. & G. 502. No lien for freight attaches before the ship has broken ground; 1 B. & P. 634; 5 Binn. 392; 3 Gray 92. But see, as to the damages for removing goods from the ship before she sails, 28 E. L. & Eq. 210; 2 C. & P. 334; 2 Gray 92.

No lien exists for dead freight; 3 M. & S. 205. The lien attaches only for freight earned; 3 M. & S. 205; Ware 149. The lien is lost by a delivery of the goods; 38 Fed. Rep. 528; 34 id. 909; 6 Hill 43; but not if the delivery be involuntary or procured by fraud; id. So it is by stipulations inconsistent with its exercise; 17 How. 53; 10 Conn. 104; 6 Pick. 248; 4 B. & Ald. 50; as, by an agreement to receive the freight at a day subsequent to the entire delivery of the goods,—a distinction being, however, taken between the unloading or arrival of the ship, and the delivery of the goods; 18 Johns. 157; 14 M. & W. 794; 2 Sumn. 589; 10 Mass. 510.

A third person cannot take advantage of the existence of such lien; 3 East 85. A vendor, before exercising the right of stoppage in transitu, must discharge this lien by payment of freight; 15 Me. 314; 3 B. & P. 42.

Master's lien. In England, the master had no lien, at common law, on the ship for wages, nor disbursements; 4 De Gex & J. 334; 1 B. & Ald. 575; 6 How. 112; 15 U. S. App. 229; but by the act of 1854 he has the same lien for his wages as a seaman; and this may be enforced in the admiralty courts of the United States; 22 Bost. L. Rep. 150; 9 Wall. 435; 3 Fed. Rep. 577; 7 id. 247, 674. The district court may, but is not bound to exercise jurisdiction in favor of a British subject against a British ship; 22 Bost. L. Rep. 150. Its enforcement is only a question of comity; 9 Wall. 435.

In the United States, he has no lien for his wages; 2 Paine 201; 14 Pa. 84; 18 Pick. 530; 36 Fed. Rep. 493. This does not apply to one not master in fact; Bee 198. As to lien for disbursements, see 2 Curt. C. C.

427; 14 Pa. 34; 11 Pet. 175. He may be substituted if he discharge a lien; 1 Pet. Adm. 223; Bee 116; 3 Mas. 255. But he has a lien on the freight for disbursements; 4 Mass. 91; 5 Wend. 315; for wages in a peculiar case; Ware 149; and on the cargo, where it belongs to the ship-owners; 14 Me. 180. He may, therefore detain goods against the shipper or consignee, even after payment to owner, if the master give reasonable notice; 11 Mass. 72; 5 Wend. 315. But see 5 D. & R. 552. The master may retain goods till a contribution bond is signed; 11 Johns. 23; 11 Me. 150.

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a libel in rem by a master for his wages, where that lien is given by a state statute; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114.

The seamen's lien for wages attaches to the ship and freight, and the proceeds of both, and follows them into whosesoever hands they come; 2 Sumn. 443; and lies against a part, or the whole, of the fund; 3 Sumn. 50, 286; but not the cargo; 5 Pet. 675. It applies to proceeds of a vessel sold, under attachment in a state court; 2 Wall. C. C. 592, overruling 1 Newb. 215; and to a vessel while in the hands of a receiver of a state court, for wages accruing during the receivership; 168 U. S. 437.

Seamen discharged by the breaking up of a voyage are entitled to no lien for services not performed, when they could have obtained other employment of like character and at as good or better wages; 37 Fed. Rep. 696.

This lien of a seaman is of the nature of the privilegium of the civil law, does not depend upon possession, and takes precedence of a bottomry bond or hypothecation; 2 Pars. Mar. Law 62, and cases cited; 15 Bost. L. Rep. 555; Ware 134; or over subsequent collision liens; 35 Fed. Rep. 665. Taking the master's order does not destroy the lien; Ware 185. And see 2 Hagg. Adm. 136. For services for bringing a vessel into port, moving her about, drying her sails, etc., there is a lien; 59 Fed. Rep. 299; but not for services of a watchman in the home port; 65 Fed. Rep. 236; nor for men hired to watch the cargo of a vessel, by a contractor; 58 Fed. Rep. 908. Generally, all persons serving in a way directly and materially useful to the navigation of the vessel have a lien for their services; Gilp. 505; 3 Hagg. Adm. 376; Ware 83; 1 Blatchf. & H. 423; 1 Sumn. 384. A woman has it if she performs seaman's service; 1 Hagg. Adm. 187; 18 Bost. L. Rep. 672; 1 Newb. 5. Men hired for service on a barge without sails, masts, or rudder, with no duties upon land except in loading and unloading, have a lien on the vessel; 36 Fed. Rep. 607. The lien exists against ships owned by private persons, but not against government ships employed in the public service; 9 Wheat. 409; 3 Sumn. 308. See as to lien for seamen's wages, 4 Can. L. T. 153, 213.

Under the law of England no maritime lien is recognized for personal injuries received by a seaman on board ship; 36 Fed. Rep. 773. The question is unsettled in America, as to whether admiralty has jurisdiction over actions for personal injuries, either in rem or even against the owner; Bened. Adm. § 309 a. See 119 U. S. 199.

A ship broker, who obtains a crew, has been held to have a lien for his services and advances for their wages; 1 Blatchf. & H. 189. One who performs towage service on the navigable waters of the United States acquires a lien, which may be enforced by proceedings in rem, and cannot be destroyed by the sale of the vessel under a state law; 9 Fed. Rep. 777.

Stevedores are said to have no lien; Olcott 120; 1 Wall. Jr. 370. A stevedore would not have it, for services on a vessel in the home port; 37 Fed. Rep. 209; id. 696; 36 id. 493; 81 id. 216; and see 35 id. 916; 58 id. 908; 6 C. C. App. 313; s. c. 57 Fed. Rep. 224; but would in other than the home port; 2 U. S. App. 349; it is said to be a maritime contract when the service is rendered in a foreign port. Benedict is of the opinion that the tendency of the authorities is now to favor a stevedore's lien. See Bened. Adm. § 285; but the latest decision is that in the home port they have not. See a critical review of the cases "incorporated" by the court in its opinion; 81 Fed. Rep. 216.

Material men. By the civil law those who build, repair, or supply a ship have a lien upon the ship for the debt thus contracted, but the courts of the common law do not recognize the lien as a maritime lien, but only recognize the common law lien of the mechanic who by virtue of his possession, and not otherwise, was allowed a lien; Bened. Adm. § 271. It is well settled that material men furnishing supplies and materials to a vessel in her home port do not thereby acquire any lien upon the vessel by the general maritime laws in the United States; 21 Wall. 558; 89 Me. 512; 42 U. S. App. 267; but admiralty will enforce a lien given by a state law; 21 Wall. 558; 52 Fed. Rep. 652. The supreme court has decided, 4 Wheat. 438, that unless the local law of the particular state where the supplies are furnished gives a lien, there is no lien in the case of domestic vessels; 94 U. S. 520. Material men are those whose trade it is to build, repair, or equip ships, or to furnish them with tackle and provisions necessary of any kind; see Bened. Adm. § 268; 3 Hagg. Adm. 129; 49 Fed. Rep. 383. In regard to foreign ships, it has been held that material men have a lien on the ship only when the supplies were necessary and could be obtained only on the credit of the ship; 19 How. 359; 13 Wall. 329; 61 Fed. Rep. 514; 79 Fed. Rep. 365; which must appear either in fact or by presumption of law; 60 id. 766. The lien for repairs continues only as long as possession is retained, on domestic ships; Wright (Ohio) 669; 4 Wheat. 438; 1 Story 68; and is gone if possession is lost; 14 Conn. 404; 4 Wheat. 438; 4 Wash. C. C. 453. When the supplies are furnished to a vessel in a foreign port by order of her master, a lien is implied, but for work done by order of the owner no lien will be held to exist unless proved by the agreement of the parties; 50 Fed. Rep. 944. Necessary supplies furnished to a vessel which has not obtained a registry in any port, at a port other than that which is the owner's residence, on the credit of the vessel, and not of the owner, are supplies furnished at a foreign port, for which a lien lies in admiralty; 31 Fed. Rep. 964; 9 Am. L. Rev. 638. There is a maritime lien for coal furnished to a foreign steamer at the wharf for daily use in the presence of the master; 75 Fed. Rep. 684; but not when supplied on the order of a charterer who was required by the charter to provide and pay for the coal and had an office at the port of supply; 165 U. S. 264.

The several states of the United States are foreign to each other in this respect. Where repairs are made at the home port of the owner, the maritime law of the United States gives no maritime lien, the rights of the parties being altogether governed by the local law. The liens given by the state laws have, however, been enforced by the federal courts, not as rights which they were bound to enforce, but as discretionary powers which they might lawfully exercise, when the controversies were within the admiralty jurisdiction; 1 Black 522; 21 Wall. 558; 95 U. S. 69; 1 Fed. Rep. 218; 2 id. 364; 8 id. 366. The state legislatures cannot create a maritime lien, nor can they confer jurisdiction upon a state court to enforce such a lien by a proceeding in rem; but they can authorize their enforcement by common-law remedies; Bened. Adm. 270; 4 Wall. 430, 571; 16 id. 534; 9 Am. L. Rev. 638; 24 Ia. 192; 43 N. Y. 554; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 88; 7 Am. L. Rev. N. S. 193. A lien under a state statute for repairs or supplies, furnished to a vessel in a home port is a right of property in the vessel and enforceable by process in rem exclusively in the federal district courts; 167 U. S. 606, reversing 157 Mass. 525. When a right, maritime in its nature and to be enforced by process in the nature of admiralty, has been given by the statute of a state, the admiralty courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction to enforce that right according to their own rules of procedure; 148 U. S. 1. When a lien is created by a general maritime law for repairs or supplies in a foreign port, the admiralty jurisdiction in rem of the courts of the United States is exclusive; 4 Wall. 411. That there is admiralty jurisdiction to enforce liens given by a state statute was also held in 36 Fed. Rep. 197; 40 id. 253; 46 id. 797; but see id. 136; 53 id. 599; 61 id. 860. And it is said that if a maritime lien upon a foreign vessel can be conferred by a state statute, a statute giving a lien for repairs, not furnished upon the credit of the vessel, cannot be enforced in a federal court of admiralty; 45 U. S. App. 16.

It is held by the Circuit Court of Appeals that a court of admiralty may entertain jurisdiction in rem against a vessel for the death of a passenger caused by a maritime collision; 70 Fed. Rep. 874. This right is based on a state statute giving not only a right of action for death, but a lien and preference over other demands in favor of such cause of action. This statutory provision distinguishes the case from 145 U. S. 335, where the right to a libel in rem in such case is denied, although the local law gave a right of action for death, but did not expressly create any lien on the vessel. See 1 L. R. A. 505.

As to the order of precedence of these liens, see Daveis 199; Ware 565; 2 Curt. C. C. 421; 8 Fed. Rep. 331, 333. In the distribution of funds to pay liens, wages claims will rank first; claims for materials and supplies next; and claims under contracts of affreightment thereafter; 36 Fed. Rep. 493. Maritime liens for necessary advances made or supplies furnished to keep a vessel fit for sea, take precedence of all prior claims upon her, unless for seaman's wages or salvage; 148 U. S. 1. They take priority over a mortgage on the vessel, although it has been duly recorded; 36 Fed. Rep. 501. Liens for damages arising from collision take precedence of the lien for a seaman's wages accruing prior to the collision; 40 Fed. Rep. 331; 49 id. 577; 50 id. 224. Among the holders of liens equal in dignity, the one who first instituted proceedings to enforce his claim is preferred; 48 Fed. Rep. 835.

Giving credit will not be a waiver of a lien on a foreign ship, unless so given as to be inconsistent with the right to a lien; 7 Pet. 324; 1 Sumn. 73; 5 Sandf. 342; 4 Ben. 151. A delay of nine months after midsummer repairs before proceeding to enforce a lien therefor, is not laches, but a year's delay is; 35 Fed. Rep. 665; see 48 id. 839. A lien for repairs is in the nature of a proprietary right and is not lost by merely delivering the vessel to the owner before payment; 49 Fed. Rep. 383. A note does not extinguish the lien of the claim for which it is given, unless such is the understanding of the parties at the time; 20 Fed. Rep. 923; 50 id. 703; 60 id. 926; 3 U. S. App. 109.

Builders' liens may be placed on the common-law ground that a workman employing skill and labor on an article has a lien upon it; 2 Rose 91; 4 B. & Ald. 341; Wright (Ohio) 660; 4 Wheat. 438; 1 Stor. 68; also a lien for the purpose of finishing the ship, where payments are made by instalments; 5 B. & Ald. 942.

Collision. In case of collision the injured vessel has a lien upon the one in fault for the damage done; 22 E. L. & Eq. 62; Crabb 580; and the lien lasts a reasonable time; 18 Bost. L. Rep. 91; 1 Pars. Sh. & Ad. 531.

A salvage lien exists when a ship or goods come into the possession of a person who preserves them from peril at sea, to be reimbursed his expenses and compensated; Sprague 57; Daveis 20; Edw. Adm. 175.

A salvage service carries with it a maritime lien on the things saved, whether the vessel is foreign or domestic; 38 Fed. Rep. 671.

A part-owner, merely as such, has no lien whatever, but acquires such a lien when any of the elements of partnership or agency, with bailment upon which his lien may rest, enter into his relation with the other part-owners; 1 Pars. Sh. & Ad. 115. See 35 Fed. Rep. 785.

A part-owner who has advanced more than his share towards building a vessel has no lien on her for such surplus; 6 Pick. 46; and none, it is said, for advances on account of a voyage; 4 Pick. 456; 7 Bingh. 709. The relation of partners must exist to give the lien; 20 Johns. 61; 4 B. Monr. 458; 8 B. & C. 612; 6 Pick. 120; 5 Mann. & R. 25. And part-owners of a ship may become partners for a particular venture; 1 Ves. Sr. 497; 3 W. & M. 193; 10 Mo. 701; 9 Pick, 334. But see 14 Pa. 34.

The ship's husband, if a partner, has a partner's lien; if not, he may have a lien on the proceeds of the voyage; 8 B. & C. 612; 16 Conn. 12, 23; 3 W. & M. 193; or of the ship herself, if sold, or on her documents, if any of these have come into his actual possession. And the lien applies to all disbursements and liabilities for the ship. But it is doubtful if his mere office gives him a lien; 2 Curt. C. C. 427; 2 V. & B. 242.

Under the general maritime law, there is no lien on a vessel for marine insurance premiums due from her owner; 49 Fed. Rep. 279; but there is for wharfage for a foreign vessel; 56 Fed. Rep. 609. See 60 id. 766.

Deposit of a bill of lading gives a lien for the amount advanced on the strength of the security; 5 Taunt. 558; 2 Wash. C. C. 283.

These liens of part-owners and by deposit of a bill of lading are not maritime liens, however, and could not be enforced in admiralty.

See ADMIRALTY; SALVAGE; JETTISON; BOTTOMRY; RESPONDENTIA; IN REM; COLLISION; SEAMEN; MARSHALLING OF ASSETS; MASTER; MARITIME CAUSE; MARITIME CONTRACT; CAPTAIN; PRIVILEGE.

Statutory Liens. Under this head it is convenient to consider some of those liens which subsist at common law, but have been extensively modified by statutory regulations, as well as those which subsist entirely by force of statutory regulations.

The principal liens of this class are judgment liens, and liens of material men and builders, but there have also been provided by legislation in recent years in many states, liens specially designed for the protection of leading local business interests, such as logging liens, and various agricultural liens intended to facilitate the obtaining of money or credit on the faith of crops unmatured.

JUDGMENT LIEN. At common law, a judgment is merely a general security and not a specific lien on land; 2 Sugd. Vend. *517; but by stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, it is made a charge upon all lands, tenements, etc., of which the debtor is owner or in which he is in any way interested, and it binds all persons claiming under him after such judgment, including his issue, and other persons whom he could bar; id. *523. By stat. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, judgments are not liens upon lands until such lands have been actually delivered in execution.

In the United States generally judgments are liens on lands within the county from the date on which they are docketed or entered. In New Jersey a judgment of the supreme court is a lien throughout the state. In a few of the states the lien attaches immediately when the judgment is recovered. In others it is necessary, in order to make a judgment a lien in any county, that a transcript of the judgment be recorded.

In many states, it requires an execution to create a lien by judgment, which, in some states, must issue within a specific period after judgment, e. g. one year in Virginia, and two years in West Virginia, while in Delaware the common-law rule that an execution must issue within a year and a day is enforced by the systematic entry on the judgment docket by the prothonotary of the issue of an execution vice comes (q. v.), which is, in fact, never issued and is a fiction in all respects except as to the prothonotary's fee.

Judgments in the federal courts have the same lien as those in the respective state courts wherein they are held, except that they extend to all lands of defendant in the district. Judgments in the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania have been decided to be liens against land in both the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania.

The time during which a judgment lien continues in force varies in the several states; it is one year in Tennessee; two years in Idaho and Nevada; three years in Arkansas and Missouri; four years in Georgia; five years in Kansas, Nebraska, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Utah, Washington, California, Wyoming and Oklahoma Territory; six years in Colorado and Montana; seven years in Illinois; ten years in Alabama, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin, South Dakota, Virginia and West Virginia; twelve years in Maryland; twenty years in New Jersey. There is no statutory limitation in Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico and the District of Columbia, and in Delaware, except in New Castle County, where there is a limitation of ten years. In these latter states the only limitation of the lien is the presumption of payment. In Delaware a judgment is presumed to be paid in twenty years, that being the period which bars proceedings affecting land or actions on specialties. Judgments are no lien in Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, Arizona and Indian Territory. A verdict is a lien in Pennsylvania.

MECHANICS' LIENS. The lien of mechanics and material men on buildings and for work done and materials furnished is unknown either at common law or in equity; 13 Pa. 167; 6 Wall. 561; but it exists in all of the United States by statute, to a greater or less extent. Each state has its own mechanic's lien law, differing often in minor particulars, but alike in the general provisions. These statutes are remedial and should be liberally construed; 22 Neb. 656, 126. In most of the states, this lien is equal to that of a judgment or mortgage, and can be assigned and enforced in a similar manner; 26 Conn. 317. The lien affects only real estate, and attaches to the materials only when they become real estate by being erected into a building and attached to the land; 2 Vroom 477; but should the building be removed or destroyed, the lien does not remain upon the land; 26 Pa. 246; nor upon any portion of the materials of which the building was composed; 28 Pa. 161.

In many cases a single lien is allowed upon separate buildings; 148 Mass. 104; 76 Md. 337; 120 Mo. 38; 96 Mich. 175; 101 U. S. 721; contra, 61 Conn. 578; 167 Pa. 614; 153 id. 293; but see 151 Pa. 153; 158 id. 238. Two owners of contiguous lots may by their acts connect them so as to constitute one lot and make them subject to lien for work or material; 51 Minn. 364. See note on this subject 17 L. R. A. 314, and a later collection of cases, 3 Gen. Dig. N. S. 891.

The benefits of the statute apply only to the class of persons named therein. The contractor seems to be universally secured by the lien, and in most of the states the sub-contractor and material man are also protected by a lien. In some states these provisions extend to workmen, but generally they do not; Phill. Mech. Liens, 53. A contractor's lien is not defeated by the fact that the work was only partly performed, where such part performance has been accepted; 85 Ala. 211; 74 Wis. 163. A contract by which a contractor agrees that he will not suffer or permit to be filed any mechanics' lien or liens against a building waives the right to file a lien in his own favor; 121 Pa. 593.

Mechanics' lien laws extend to non-residents as well as residents; 2 Swan 130; 17 Minn. 353.

A New York statute giving a lien to "any person" who has furnished materials for a building in the state is available under a contract made and payable in another state; 38 L. R. A. (N. Y.) 410.

Where the statute was silent on the subject of assigning a mechanic's lien, it was held that an assignee could not prosecute in his own name and avail himself of its privileges; 10 Wisc. 331; 36 Me. 384; but in other states it has been held that the lien may be assigned precisely as any other chose in action, the assignee taking subject to the equities of the parties; 15 Gratt. 83; 12 Pa. 339; 14 All. 139; 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 281. The right of lien survives to an executor or administrator; 14 Minn. 145.

A mechanic's lien is not released by taking a note on account of it, to be credited when paid, even if the note be discounted; 68 Fed. Rep. 778; 32 U. S. App. 435; but taking a note which will mature after the expiration of the statutory period for enforcing a lien, operates as a waiver of it even under a statute providing that the taking of a note shall not discharge the lien; 64 Minn. 269. Taking a note as security has been held in many cases to affect the right to a lien; 42 N. J. Eq. 282; 85 Ga. 109; 78 Wis. 150; 121 Ill. 571; 21 Can. S. C. 406; 2 N. Dak. 53; 94 Mich. 299; see 96 id. 113; in others it has been held that the lien is not affected; 76 Md. 337; 7 Misc. Rep. 79, 609; 91 Ga. 651; 6 S. Dak. 160; 67 Hun 109; 157 Mass. 584; 83 Fed. Rep. 593.

A lien cannot be acquired against certain classes of property which are exempted on the ground of public policy. See 38 Fed. Rep. 565. Thus public school-houses; 37 How. Pr. 520; 10 Pa. 275; 13 Utah 211; 13 Ore. 283; 51 Ia. 70; 89 Cal. 160; court-houses, public offices, or jails, are exempt; 7 W. & S. 197; 47 N. Y. 666; 112 N. C. 335; 38 W. Va. 691; 70 Ia. 479; 89 Wis. 264; 105 N. Y. 139; 110 Ala. 539; 83 Tex. 202, 291; but see 52 Kan. 250; so also are graveyards; 3 Pa. L. J. 343; but a church has been held subject to a mechanic's lien; 44 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 354. Such a lien cannot extend to the valves constituting part of the water works of a corporation organized to furnish a city with water; 89 Wis. 264; 142 Pa. 610; 60 id. 27; or to the plant of such corporation; 89 Wis. 264; or a street railway; 68 Fed. Rep. 966; 29 U. S. App. 698; 2 Wash. 112; but see 10 Lanc. L. Rev. Pa. 73; or a power house connected with the same; 29 U. S. App. 698; 16 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 13; or to the property of an electric light company having a franchise to occupy streets; 48 Kan. 187; 19 Ore. 61. Some question has arisen whether mechanics' lien laws apply to railroads. When the statute gives a lien on "buildings" they are said not to be covered; 2 Jones, Liens § 1618; otherwise if the word used is "structure," "erection," "improvement"; id. § 1624; and a lien has been upheld against ties used in construction; 44 Ia. 71.

The same doctrine of public policy which forbids mechanics' liens on public buildings, etc., has been said to apply to railroads, so far that such a lien, if given by statute, is generally held to attach only to the entire line and not to a section of it; 2 Jones, Liens § 1619 and cases cited; but Deady, J., challenges this statement; 42 Fed. Rep. 470; s. c. 8 L. R. A. 700, where will be found a collection of cases by states on mechanics' liens on railroads; see also 101 U. S. 443. Railroad depots are not exempt; 11 Wis. 214; 10 Ohio St. 372; 37 N. H. 410.

As to mechanic's lien on vessels under state statutes see subtitle Maritime Liens, supra.

In some cases it is held that the equitable title of a purchaser of land, who has not fully acquired the title, may be subject to a statutory lien; 38 Fla. 305; 118 Pa. 634; 52 Fed. Rep. 32; 46 Kan. 24, 543; 3 S. Dak. 440; contra, 160 Mass. 48; 45 N. J. Eq. 494; 148 N. Y. 673. In such case the lien has been held to be subordinate to the right of the vendor for unpaid purchase money; 48 Neb. 138. A mechanic's lien in such case attaches only to the interest of the purchaser; 46 Kan. 24. That the lien attaches on the completion of the contract of sale was held in 52 Minn. 484.

On the foreclosure of a mortgage, the fund raised takes the place of the land and is subject to a lien; 17 Abb. Pr. 256; so also is a balance in court on the sale of a lessee's interest in land and buildings; 62 Pa. 405.

The remedy is by scire facias in some states; 14 Ark. 370; 14 Tex. 87; 22 Mo. 140; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 186; 14 How. 434; 12 Pa. 45; by petition, in others; 11 Cush. 308; 4 Wis. 451; 14 Ala. N. S. 33; 11 Ill. 519; 1 Ia. 75. When the proceeding is by scire facias, obviously it can have no more effect than belongs to that writ, which is substantially a proceeding in rem.

Questions constantly arise under the statutes giving liens to mechanics and material men as to the respective priority of their liens over those of mortgagees. Questions as to the respective priority, as between such liens and mortgage liens, must be considered with reference to the statutes. Such liens have been held entitled to priority over a previous mortgage so far as a building is concerned; 15 Ind. App. 392; 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 19; and also where the labor and materials were furnished upon the mortgagee's agreement that his lien should be subordinated; 49 Neb. 485; but the mere fact that the mortgagee told the contractor to go ahead with the work of building upon the mortgaged premises is not a waiver of priority; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 430. As between mortgages and subsequently filed mechanics' liens, the mortgage was held superior in 92 Ia. 732; 94 Ala. 240; 51 N. J. Eq. 605; 42 Hun 465; and the mechanic's lien was held superior in 109 N. C. 658; 152 Pa. 621; 30 Fed. Rep. 332; 155 Mass. 549; 106 Cal. 224; 53 N. J. L. 445. For collections of cases upon this question of priority see 3 Gen. Dig.; 14 L. R. A. 305.

For statutes relating to mechanics' liens see Stimson, Am. Stat. Law art. 196. See Houck; Nott; Phillips; Richey; Sergeant; Snyder, Mech. Liens.

LOGGING LIENS. In some states, persons employed in logging have a lien for services. It exists in favor of a cook and his assistant at a logging camp; 64 Minn. 420; a blacksmith employed in shoeing horses and mending tools at the camp; id.; persons contracting to cut, skid, and haul logs and to peel bark to be paid for by the thousand; 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 367; one who blasts rocks to make a passage for logs; 10 Wash. 84; one who furnishes supplies; 78 Wis. 14; a rafter of logs; 101 Mich. 267; a mill owner; 105 N. Y. 234. But mere contractors have not a lien; 77 Mich. 45; or one who furnishes a horse, harness, and sleds at a specified price per month; 90 Me. 227; or one who employs men to do the work but does not directly labor himself; 11 Wash. 204; or one cutting without right; 70 Mich. 309; or the owner of an ox hired to haul the logs; 87 Wis. 227. Such liens have been held to include not only manual labor of the lienor, but also that performed by his teams and servants, under a contract for a gross sum per month for both; 64 Minn. 420.

The amount of the lien is a question for the jury; 65 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 235; and so is the question whether a levy under such lien is excessive; id. 379; and the lien is not vitiated by an excessive levy; id.

The lien of a boom company attaches to part of a single bailment for charges on logs previously delivered, but it is confined to logs of the same mark and not a general lien upon all logs of the same owner; 64 Minn. 108; recording is not required to bind an innocent purchaser, possession being equivalent to notice; id. It may be waived either by contract or a course of dealing inconsistent with its existence, or by an extension of time for payment of charges; id.

One who cuts and rafts logs under a contract which, by reasonable construction, entitles him to retain possession until paid for his services, has a common-law lien thereon; 101 Mich. 267; but one with whom the owner of timber contracts for its cutting and delivery in his mill-pond has not; 162 Pa. 118.

The execution and performance of a contract for the sale of standing timber at so much per acre, to be cut and hauled by the purchaser who owns a sawmill, is held under the Georgia Civil Code, not to give the seller a lien on the sawmill and products; 27 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 730.

AGRICULTURAL LIENS. Among these are, a lien of laborers upon crops for their wages, which is held superior to the lien of a mortgage of the crop, executed prior to the laborer's lien; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1108; 16 So. Rep. (Miss.) 678; such a lien applies in favor of the overseer of a farm; 71 Miss. 933. Of a similar character is a statutory lien, given in some states, to persons furnishing agricultural supplies; such liens are held to be superior to a conveyance of the property in payment of debt; 47 La. Ann. 742; or to the claim of a mortgage; 114 N. C. 284; or a chattel mortgage on the crop previously executed; 57 Minn. 84.

A statutory lien on crops for advances to a farmer may be secured by agreement recorded, in Florida, Virginia, North Carolina, and Alabama; it has priority in the first named state against all except laborers' liens, and in the two last named on all except a landlord's claim for rent, and in Alabama advances by landlord. An agreement merely in writing is sufficient in Tennessee, South Carolina, and Georgia; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1954.

The order of liens on crops in Louisiana is as follows: (1) labor; (2) lessor; (3) overseer; (4) pledges, in the order of record; (5) furnisher of supplies or money, and physician; Laws, 1887, § 89. In Washington, farm laborers have a lien on crops superior to the landlord, who also has a lien on crops for rent; Laws, 1886, 115.

In North Dakota a person furnishing grain for seed, or potatoes for planting, has a lien on the crop.

As to the landlord's lien for rent, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, and for special statutory provisions, see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 2034–39.

For various special liens created by statute, see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. art. 464.

See Cross; Jones; Overton; Whittaker, Liens; MORTGAGE; JUDGMENT; RECOGNIZANCE; IN REM; INNKEEPER; BAILMENT; BAILEE.

LIEUTENANT. This word has now a narrower meaning than it formerly had: its true meaning is a deputy, a substitute, from the French lieu (place or post) and tenant (holder). Among civil officers we have lieutenant-governors, who in certain cases perform the duties of governors (see the names of the several states), lieutenants of police, etc. Among military men, lieutenant-general was formerly the title of a commanding general, but now it signifies the degree above major-general. Lieutenant-colonel is the officer between the colonel and the major. Lieutenant, simply, signifies the officer next below a captain. In the navy, a lieutenant is the second officer, next in command to the captain of a ship.

LIFE. "The sum of the forces by which death is resisted." Bichat.

A state in which energy of function is ever resisting decay and dissolution.

It commences, for many legal purposes, at the period of quickening, when the first motion of the fœtus in utero is perceived by the mother. 1 Bla. Com. 129; Co. 3d Inst. 50. It ceases at death. See DEATH.

But physiology pronounces life as existing from the period of conception, because fœtuses in utero do die prior to quickening, and then all the signs of death are found to be perfect; Dean, Med. Jur. 129, 130.

For many important purposes, however, the law concedes to physiology the fact that life commences at conception, en ventre sa mère. See FŒTUS. Thus, it may receive a legacy, have a guardian assigned to it, and an estate limited to its use; 1 Bla. Com. 130. It is thus considered as alive for all beneficial purposes; 1 P. Wms. 329.

But for the transfer of civil rights the child must be born alive. The ascertainment of this, as a fact, depends upon certain signs which are always attendant upon life; the most important of these is crying. As to conditions of live birth, see BIRTH; INFANTICIDE.

Life is presumed to continue for one hundred years; 9 Mart. La. 257. As to the presumption of survivorship in case of the death of two persons, at or about the same time, see 14 Cent. L. J. 367, a full article reprinted from the Irish L. Times; DEATH.

LIFE-ANNUITY. See ANNUITY.

LIFE-ASSURANCE. See INSURANCE; POLICY; LOSS.

LIFE-ESTATE. See ESTATE FOR LIFE; TENANT FOR LIFE.

LIFE-PEERAGE. See PEERS.

LIFE-RENT. In Scotch Law. A right to use and enjoy a thing during life, the substance of it being preserved. See FEE AND LIFE RENT; TERCE; CURTESY.

LIFE-RENTER. In Scotch Law. A tenant for life without waste. Bell, Dict.

LIFE TABLES. Statistical tables exhibiting the probable proportion of persons who will live to reach different ages. Cent. Dict.

Such tables are used for many purposes, such as the computation of the present value of annuities, dower rights, etc., and for the computation of damages resulting from injuries which destroy the earning capacity of a person, or those resulting from the death of a person to those who are dependent upon him.

The principal mortality tables in ordinary use are:

(1) The Carlisle Table, which takes its name from the city of Carlisle and the calculations for which were made by Joshua Milne in 1815. (2) The Northampton Table, based on statistics of that town, in England. This shows a higher rate of mortality than any other, and it has been said that it more nearly shows the mortality of the negro race in the United States than any other life table; G. & McC. Tables 187, n. 1. (3) The Farr Tables, prepared by Dr. Wm. Farr, of the English registrar general's office, from the census returns of England and Wales. A synopsis of the results of these tables may be found in 2 Ins. Cyc. 516–36. (4) Combined Experience, or actuaries' seventeen office experience tables of mortality, prepared by a committee from 62,537 risks, and published in 1843 by Jenkins Jones. This has been characterized as very accurate; Willey, Life Ins., 4th ed. 35, 73. As the calculations of this table are made upon actual life insurance risks its accuracy would have relation rather to that subject than to dower and annuities, and purposes involving merely the average expectation of sound life. (5) The American Experience tables of mortality by Sheppard Homans, an insurance actuary. This is a legal standard in several states for valuations of life insurance policies, having been adopted in New York in 1868. (6) The Thirty Offices Experience table of mortality published in 1878: "Not yet accepted as a standard table"; G. & McC. Tables 190.

Courts can take judicial notice of the Carlisle Tables, and can use them in estimating the probable length of life, whether they were introduced in evidence or not; 151 U. S. 436. Standard life and annuity tables showing probable duration of life and present value of a life annuity are competent evidence; 91 Ga. 87; or as bearing on the question of compensation for permanent injury, or in case of death to show the deceased's expectation of life at the time of accident; 32 Minn. 125; 66 N. Y. 50; 62 Ia. 487. The Carlisle tables have been admitted; 76 id. 310; 74 Ga. 737; and also Johnson's Encyclopedia, to show these tables; 78 Ia. 509. The fact that the deceased was in poor health only affects the weight to be given them; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 955; they ought not absolutely to control the jury; 118 U. S. 545, citing approvingly judicial utterances strongly deprecating the use of them by a jury, from 49 L. J. Q. B. 237. In a recent case it was said that they are admissible in actions for personal injuries, but the court should instruct the jury that their value in a particular case depends very much on the plaintiff's state of health, habits, and social condition; 172 Pa. 205.

See Glauque & McClure, Present Value Tables, which also contains Bowditch's Table and Chisholm's Commutation Tables; Jones, Value of Annuities and Reversionary Payments; Lawton & Griffiths, Life Tables.

LIGAN, LAGAN. Goods cast into the sea tied to a buoy, so that they may be found again by the owners. When goods are cast into the sea in storms or shipwrecks, and remain there, without coming to land, they are distinguished by the barbarous names of jetsam, flotsam, and ligan. 5 Co. 108; Hargr. St. Tr. 48; 1 Bla. Com. 292. See 38 Fed. Rep. 509.

LIGEANCE. The true and faithful obedience of a subject to his sovereign, of a citizen to his government. It signifies, also, the territory of a sovereign. See ALLEGIANCE.

LIGHT AND AIR. See ANCIENT LIGHTS; AIR. See, also, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 1.

LIGHTERMAN. The owner or manager of a lighter. A lighterman is considered a common carrier. See LIGHTERS.

LIGHTERS. Small vessels employed in loading and unloading larger vessels.

Boats plying for hire and carrying passengers or goods. 23 L. J. M. C. 156; 3 E. & B. 889.

The owners of lighters are liable like other common carriers for hire. It is a term of the contract on the part of the carrier or lighterman, implied by law, that his vessel is tight and fit for the purpose or employments for which he offers and holds it forth to the public; it is the immediate foundation of the contract that it is so: the law presumes a promise to that effect on the part of the carrier, without actual proof; and every principle of sound policy and public convenience requires it should be so; 5 East 428; Abb. Sh. 225; Bened. Adm. § 284.

If a vessel, to earn greater freight, gets the shipper to furnish, at a deeper anchorage, cargo in addition to that furnished at the agreed place, the cost of lightering must be borne by the vessel. Delivery to the lighter is delivery to the vessel; 48 Fed. Rep. 921. See LAUNCH; VESSEL.

LIGHTHOUSE. An act authorizing the secretary of the treasury to acquire lands for a lighthouse by condemnation is constitutional; 160 U. S. 499. See NAVIGATION RULES; EMINENT DOMAIN.

LIGHTNING. A sudden discharge of electricity from a cloud to the earth or from the earth to a cloud or from one cloud to another, or from a body positively charged to one negatively charged. 54 Wis. 433.

Any sudden and violent discharge of electricity occurring in nature. Id.

A stroke of lightning is an act of God; 26 Me. 181; 26 L. R. A. (Wis.) 101; but one cannot be excused on that ground from the consequences of his own negligence in causing lightning to be conveyed to a building by a wire; 26 L. R. A. (Wis.) 101. See WIRES.

In a policy of insurance against loss by lightning, it is the province of the jury, not reviewable on appeal, to decide how much damage is caused by lightning and how much by other forces; 47 N. Y. S. R. 406; 54 Wis. 433. Where the insurance was against loss by fire and lightning, damages caused by wind accompanying the storm were held not within it; 15 Ins. L. J. 478; nor was damage caused by lightning without combustion covered by a clause against fire by lightning; 4 N. Y. 326. See 87 Me. 256. Where the damage was caused by an explosion of powder resulting from a stroke of lightning, the loss was held to be protected by a fire insurance policy which covered damage by lightning but stipulated against loss by explosion; 36 L. R. A. (Ohio) 236. See INSURANCE.

LIGHTS. Those openings in a wall which are made rather for the admission of light than to look out of. 6 J. B. Moore 47; 9 Bingh. 305. See ANCIENT LIGHTS.

Lamps carried on board vessels, under statutory regulations or otherwise, for the purpose of preventing collisions at night.

Lamps or lights placed in lighthouses, or other conspicuous positions, as aids to navigation at night. See NAVIGATION RULES.

LIGNAGIUM (from the Lat. lignor, to get fuel). The right which a person has to cut or gather fuel out of the woods; sometimes it is said to signify a pecuniary payment due for the same. Cowel.

LIKE. Equal in quantity, quality, or degree, exactly corresponding. 79 N. C. 387. Like does not necessarily mean the same in all parts; 2 Cush. 145. Like offence. Sameness in all the essential parts. 147 Mass. 452.

LIKEWISE. In like manner; also; moreover; too. 17 Ind. 71. When used at the beginning of a sentence in a will the word sometimes denotes a severance of what follows from a contingency previously expressed, but the context of the will may rebut this presumption; 1 Jarm. Wills 832. See 5 De G., M. & G. 122; 24 Beav. 105.

LIMIT. A bound, a restraint, a circumscription, a boundary. 22 N. Y. 429. See 11 C. B. N. S. 637. In a deed the words limit and appoint may operate as words of grant so as to pass a reversion; 5 Term 124.

LIMITATION IN LAW. A limitation in law, or an estate limited, is an estate to be holden only during the continuance of the condition under which it was granted, upon the determination of which the estate vests immediately in expectancy. 2 Bla. Com. 155.

LIMITATIONS. Of Civil Remedies. In general, by the theory and early practice of the common law, a party who had any legal ground of complaint against another might call the latter to answer in court at such time as suited his convenience; 13 East 449. This privilege, however, it was soon found, might be productive of great inconvenience, and not unfrequently of great injustice. Parties might, and often did, wait till witnesses were dead or papers destroyed, and then proceeded to enforce claims to which at an earlier date a successful defence might have been made. Titles were thus rendered uncertain, the tenure of property insecure, and litigation fostered. To prevent these evils, statutes were passed limiting the time within which a party having a cause of action should appeal to the courts for redress,—hence called statutes of limitation. The doctrine of fines, of very great antiquity in the history of the common law, the purpose of which was to put an end to controversies, grew out of the efforts to obviate these evils, and frequent attempts, prior to the accession of James I., by statutes of restricted application, were made to the same end. But till the reign of that prince no general enactment applicable alike to personal and real actions had been passed.

In 1623, however, by stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 16, entitled "An Act for Limitation of Actions, and for avoiding of Suits in Law," known and celebrated ever since as the Statute of Limitations, the law upon this subject was comprehensively declared substantially as it exists at the present day in England, whence our ancestors brought it with them to this country; and it has passed, with some modifications, into the statute-books of every state in the Union except Louisiana, whose laws of limitation are essentially the prescriptions of the civil law, drawn from the Partidas, or Spanish Code.

In 1 Bla. 287, Wilmot, J., declared it to be a "noble beneficial act," which should be construed liberally; quoted in 1 Yeates 331.

The similarity between the statutes of the several states and those of England is such that the decisions of the British courts and those of this country are for the most part illustrative of all, and will be cited indiscriminately in this brief summary of the law as it now stands. Vide 5 B. & Ald. 204; 4 Johns. 317; 2 Caines, Cas. 143. One preliminary question, however, has arisen in this country, growing out of the provision of the national constitution prohibiting states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, for which there is no English precedent. Upon this point the settled doctrine is that unless the law bars a right of action already accrued without giving a reasonable time within which to bring an action, it pertains to the remedy merely, and is valid; 4 Wheat. 122; 3 Dall. 386; 11 Pet. 420; 3 Whart. 15; 2 Gall. 141; 19 Pick. 578; 2 Mas. 169. Subject to this qualification, a law may extend or reduce the time already limited. But a cause of action already barred by pre-existing statutes will not be revived by a statute extending the time; 7 Pa. 292; 25 Vt. 41; 8 Blackf. 506; 2 Sandf. Ch. 61; 18 Pick. 532; 2 Greene Ia. 181; 11 Wisc. 432; 1 Oreg. 176; though if it be not already barred, a statute extending the time will apply; 21 Ark. 95; 24 Vt. 620; 1 T. B. Monr. 424. The fact that a statute continues in force a previous period of limitation for past contracts, and provides a different period for future contracts, does not render it invalid, as lacking a uniform operation, or as being in the nature of special legislation; 52 Fed. Rep. 791.

Whatever may have been the disposition in the past, the courts are now inclined to construe these statutes liberally, so as to effectuate their intent; they are little inclined to fritter away their effect by refinements and subtleties; 1 Pet. 360; 8 Cra. 84; Ang. Lim. § 23. The statute of limitations is a statute of repose and does not rest merely on presumption of payment; 122 U. S. 231.

Courts of equity, though not within the terms of the statute, have nevertheless uniformly conformed to its spirit, and have, as a general rule, been governed by its provisions, unless special circumstances of fraud or the like require, in the interests of justice, that they should be disregarded; 12 Pet. 56; 7 Johns. Ch. 90; 9 Pick. 242; 17 Ves. 96; 10 Wheat. 152; 10 Ohio 424; 9 N. J. Eq. 425; 28 Ill. 44; 3 R. I. 237; 7 C. C. App. 308; 133 Ind. 169; 12 U. S. App. 137; 130 U. S. 43; 82 Va. 518; 111 N. Y. 214. Courts of equity will apply the statute by analogy; 1 App. D. C. 44; 36 Fed. Rep. 722; 136 U. S. 386; and in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, they are bound by the statute which governs actions at law; 149 U. S. 436; 169 id. 189. Some claims, not barred by the statute, a court of equity will not enforce because of public policy, and the difficulty of doing full justice when the transaction is obscured by lapse of time and loss of evidence. This is termed the doctrine of laches (q. v.); 94 U. S. 806; Bisph. Eq. § 260.

But in a proper case where there are no laches and where there is fraud undiscovered till the statute has become a bar, or it is the fault and wrong of the defendant that the plaintiff did not enforce his legal rights within the limited time, courts of equity will not hesitate to interfere in the interest of justice, and entertain suits long since barred at law; 4 How. 503; 11 Cl. &

F. 714; 23 Ia. 467; 12 Minn. 522; Bisph. Eq. § 203; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 398; 11 Wall. 443. See 21 Neb. 413; 28 id. 479; 10 U. S. App. 519. But here, again, courts of equity will proceed with great caution; 7 How. 819; and hold the complainant to allegation and proof of his ignorance of the fraud and when and how it was discovered; 1 Curt. C. C. 390; 1 Watts 401.

And courts of admiralty are governed by substantially the same rules as courts of equity; 3 Mas. 91; 3 Sumn. 286; 2 Gall. 477; Sprague 163; 3 Salk. 227; 36 Fed. Rep. 560; 1 U. S. App. 101. And, although the statute does not apply in terms to probate courts, there seems to be no reason why it should not be applied according to the principles of equity; 1 Bradf. Surr. 1. It is so applied in Pennsylvania by the orphans' court.

State statutes of limitation do not apply to a libel in rem to enforce a maritime lien for breach of a contract of affreightment; 57 Fed. Rep. 608.

As to Personal Actions. Generally personal actions must be brought within a certain specified time—usually six years or less—from the time when the cause of action accrues, and not after; 3 Binn. 374; 3 T. B. Mon. 113; 13 La. Ann. 161; and hereupon, the question at once arises when the cause of action in each particular case accrues.

Cause of action accrues when. The rule, that the cause of action accrues when and so soon as there is a right to apply to the court for relief, by no means solves the difficulty. When does the right itself so to apply accrue? Upon this point the decisions are so numerous and so conflicting, or, perhaps more accurately speaking, so controlled by particular circumstances, that no inflexible rule can be extracted therefrom. In general, it may be said that in actions of contract the cause of action accrues when there is a breach of the contract. It is also said that whenever there is a plaintiff who can sue and a defendant who can be sued, the statute begins to run; 30 S. C. 291.

When a note is payable on demand, the statute begins to run from its date; 2 M. & W. 467; 9 Pick. 488; 10 N. H. 489; 5 Jones N. C. 139; 39 Me. 492; 7 Halst. 247; 50 Barb. 334; 17 Ohio 9; 3 Rich. S. C. 182; 32 W. Va. 387; 113 N. Y. 243. If payable immediately or when requested or called for, it commences to run immediately; 81 Me. 434. The deposit of securities as collateral to demand notes does not prevent the running of the statute from the date of maturity of such notes; 153 Pa. 530. The rule is the same if the note is payable "at any time within six years;" 39 Me. 492; or borrowed money is to be paid "when called on;" 1 Harr. & G. 439. But this is not true of a premium note payable in such portions and at such times as may be necessary to cover losses. There the statute only runs from the time of loss, and the assessment thereof: 40 N. Y. 320: and the statute runs in the case of an ordinary bank note only from demand and refusal; 2 Sneed 482. Until a demand is made for funds deposited in a bank the statute does not begin to run: 19 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 225; and so a demand must first be made by the owner of bank stock for dividends; 84 Ky. 565. If a note be payable in certain days after demand, sight, or notice, the statute begins to run from the demand, sight, or notice; 13 Wend. 267; 8 Dowl. & Ry. 374; 5 Halst. 114; 4 Harring. 246; 24 Am. Rep. 605; s. c. 36 Mich. 487; demand of a note payable on demand should be made within the time limited for bringing the action on the note; else a note limited to six years might be kept open indefinitely by a failure to make a demand; 10 Pick. 120. Demand of a bill payable "after sight" or "after notice" should be within a reasonable time; 4 Mas. 336; 9 M. & W. 506. And when the note is on interest, this does not become barred by the statute till the principal, or some distinct portion of it, becomes barred; 2 Cush. 92. Demand upon a note or due bill, payable on demand, is not a condition precedent to a right of action; 11 W. N. C. (Pa.) 294. The rule, that a promissory note payable on demand with interest, is a continuing security, does not apply between holder and maker; 41 N. Y. 581; s. c. 1 Am. Rep. 461. If the note be entitled to grace, the statute runs from the last day of grace; 1 Shepl. 412; 13 La. Ann. 602. The indorsement of a promissory note past due, for a valuable consideration, is a new contract, and the statute begins to run in favor of the indorser only from the date of the indorsement; 79 Ga. 72. The statute begins to run in favor of the drawer of a check at latest after the lapse of a reasonable time for the presentment of the check; 37 Neb. 644. Where money is deposited with a person for safe custody, a right of action does not accrue until demand is made therefor: [1893] 3 Ch. 154.

Where money is payable in instalments the statute runs as to each instalment from the time of the failure to pay it; 10 Shepl. 400; 71 Pa. 208. But if the contract provides that on failure to pay one instalment the whole amount shall fall due, the statute runs as to the whole from such failure; 3 G. & D. 402.

Where money is paid by mistake, the statute begins to run from the time of payment; 9 Cow. 674; 25 Pa. 164; see 7 Misc. Rep. 444; also in case of usury; 6 Ga. 228; 35 Vt. 503; 98 N. C. 244 (but a shorter time is frequently limited by statute); and where money is paid for another as surety; 45 N. Y. 268; 110 Mass. 245. Where money is paid by a bank on a forged check, the right of action to recover the same accrued immediately upon such payment; 128 U. S. 26. An action to recover overpayments made on a contract to deliver logs accrues when the amount delivered was ascertained, rather than at the date of payment; 94 Mich. 223.

The limitation of a right of action for compensation for trespass in removing coal from the mine of another by an adjoining land owner, does not begin to run until the trespass is discovered or its discovery is reasonably possible; 166 Pa. 536.

Where a contract takes effect upon some condition or contingency, or the happening of some event, the statute runs from the performance of the condition; 17 Pick. 407; Ang. Lim. § 113; or the happening of the contingency or event; 3 Pa. 149; 9 Wend. 287; 22 Ct. Cls. 284; and not from the date of the contract. On an agreement to devise, the statute runs from the death of the promissor; 9 Pa. 260. When money is paid, and there is afterwards a failure of consideration, the statute runs from the failure; 14 Mass. 425; 9 Bing. 748.

Where continuous services are rendered, as by an attorney in the conduct of a suit, or by a mechanic in doing a job; 7 Allen 274; 55 Pa. 434; 36 N. Y. 255; 16 Ill. 341; 1 B. & Ad. 15; the statute begins to run from the completion of the service. On a promise of indemnity, when the promissee pays money or is damnified, the statute begins to run; 12 Metc. 130; 8 M. & W. 680; 14 Johns. 368; 3 Rawle 275; 7 Pet. 113.

As to torts quasi ex contractu, the rule is that in cases of negligence, carelessness, unskilfulness, and the like, the statute runs from the time when these happen respectively, and not from the time when damages accrue therefrom; 4 Pet. 172; 4 Ala. 495; 36 Md. 501; 61 Barb. 136; 2 Strobh. 344; 44 Ill. App. 132. Thus, where an attorney negligently invests money in a poor security, the statute runs from the investment; 2 Brod. & B. 73; so, where a party neglected to remove goods from a warehouse, whereby the plaintiff was obliged to pay damages, the statute runs from the neglect, and not from the payment of damages; 3 Johns. 137; so, where the defendant agreed to go into another state and collect some money, and on his return to pay off a certain judgment, the statute was held to run from the return and demand upon him; 3 Ired. 481. A cause of action for an act which is in itself lawful, as to the person who bases thereon an action for injury subsequently accruing, from and consequent upon the act, does not accrue until the injury is sustained; 70 Tex. 233.

The breach of a contract is the gist of the action, and not the damages resulting therefrom; 5 B. & C. 259; 1 Sandf. 98; 3 B. & Ald. 288. Thus, where the defendant had contracted to sell the plaintiff a quantity of salt, but was unable, by reason of the destruction of the salt, to deliver on demand, and prolonged negotiations for settlement till the statutory limitation had expired, and then refused, the statute was held to run from the demand, the non-delivery being a breach of the contract; 1 E. L. & Eq. 44. So, where a notary public neglects to give seasonable notice of non-payment of a note, and the bank employing him was held responsible for the failure, upon suit brought by the bank against the notary to recover the damages it had been obliged to pay, the action was held to be barred, it not being within six years of the notary's default, though within six years of the time when the bank was required to pay damages; 6 Cow. 278.

So, where an attorney makes a mistake in a writ, whereupon, after prolonged litigation, non-suit follows, but not till an action against the indorser on the note originally sued has become barred, the mistake is held to set the statute in motion; 4 Pet. 172; 4 Ala. 495. Where he collects money for a client and uses no fraud or falsehood in regard to its receipt, the statute runs from the time of its collection; 46 Ohio St. 349. When the attorney dies before the legal proceedings are terminated the statute runs from his death; 145 Pa. 531. The statute does not begin to run against an attorney's claim for services until the termination of the action in which they are rendered; 25 N. Y. S. 134.

A captain who barratrously loses his vessel is freed from his liability to the underwriter in six years after the last act in the barratrous proceeding; 1 Campb. 539. Directors of a bank liable by statute for mismanagement are discharged in six years after the insolvency of the bank is made known; 16 Mass. 68.

In some states a distinction has been taken in cases where a public officer has neglected duties imposed on him by law, and the statute is in such cases said to run only from the time when the injury is developed; 26 Conn. 324; but see 8 Shepl. 314; 97 Pa. 47; and it has been held that if a sheriff make an insufficient return, and there is in consequence a reversal of judgment, the statute runs from the return, and not from the reversal of judgment; 16 Mass. 456. So where a sheriff collects money and makes due return but fails to pay over, the statute runs from the return; 11 Ala. 679; or from the demand by the creditor; 10 Metc. 244. If he suffers an escape, it runs from the escape; 2 Mod. 212; if he takes insufficient bail, from the return of non est inventus upon execution against the principal debtor; 17 Mass. 60; 20 Me. 93; if he receive money on a scire facias, from its reception; 9 Ga. 413; if he neglects to attach sufficient property, on the return of the writ, and not from the time when the insufficiency of the property is ascertained; 27 Me. 443. The statute runs on a cause of action for wrongful attachment from the time thereof; 77 Cal. 208; 78 Ia. 115; 45 La. Ann. 1221. An action by a sheriff upon the bond of his deputy for a default accrues when the sheriff has paid the debt occasioned by the default; 38 W. Va. 519, 557.

The same principle applies in cases of torts pure and simple; 24 Pa. 186; 16 Pick. 241; 1 Rawle 27; 4 Ohio 331; 6 Ohio St. 276.

An action against a recorder of deeds for damages caused by a false certificate of search against incumbrances on real property, must be brought within six years from the date of the search, and not from the date of the discovery of the lien overlooked, or of the loss suffered by the plaintiff; 97 Pa. 47; 54 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 212; 95 Cal. 317.

The statute only begins to run as against a surety claiming contribution when his own liability is ascertained; [1893] 2 Ch. 514.

In cases of nuisance, the statute begins to run from the injury to the right, without reference to the question of the amount of the damage, the law holding the violation of a right as some damage; 8 East 4; 16 Pick. 241; 1 Rawle 27; 10 Wend. 260; 73 Tex. 95. And so when a party having a right to use land for a specific purpose puts it to other uses, or wrongfully disposes of property rightfully in possession, the statute begins to run from the perversion; 24 Pa. 186. In trover, the statute runs from the conversion; 4 H. & J. 393; 21 Ga. 454; 15 Mass. 82; 5 B. & C. 149; in replevin, from the unlawful taking or detention. The limitation, in the statute of James, of actions for slander to two years next after the words spoken, applies only to cases where the words are actionable in themselves, and not when they become actionable by reason of special damage arising from the speaking thereof; 1 Salk. 206; 10 Wend. 167; 5 Watts 308; 32 Wkly. Law Bul. 52. The limitation extends neither to slander of title; Cro. Car. 140; nor to libel; Arch. Pl. 29. In cases of trespass, crim. con., etc., the statute runs from the time the injury was committed; 5 N. H. 314.

Adverse possession of personal property gives title in six years after the possession becomes adverse; 16 Vt. 124; 1 Brev. 111; 16 Ala. N. S. 696; 3 Metc. 137; 17 Tex. 206. But one who holds by consent of the true owner is not entitled to have the statute run in his favor until denial of the true owner's claim; 34 Ala. 188; Ang. Lim. 304, n.; 55 N. H. 61. But different adverse possessions cannot be linked together to give title: 3 Strobh. 31; 11 Humphr. 369. The statute acts upon the title to property, and, when the bar is perfect, transfers it to the adverse possessor; but in contracts for payment of money there is no such thing as adverse possession, the statute simply affects the remedy, and not the debt; 18 Ala. N. S. 248.

Computation of time. In computing the time limited, much discussion has been had in the courts whether the day when the statute begins to run is to be included or excluded, but without any satisfactory result. It is most generally held that when the computation is from an act done, the day upon which the act is done is to be included, and when it is from the date simply, then if a present interest is to commence from the date, the day of the date is included; but if merely used as a terminus from which to compute time, then the day of the date is excluded; 9 Cra. 104; 3 Term 623; 17 Pa. 48; 15 Mass. 193; 2 Cow. 605. This rule, however, of including the day upon which an act is done, is subject to so many exceptions and qualifications that it can hardly be said to be a rule, and many of the cases are wholly irreconcilable with it. It has been well said that whether the day upon which an act is done or an event happens is to be included or excluded, depends upon the circumstances and reasons of the thing, so that the intention of the parties may be effected; and such a construction should be given as will operate most to the ease of the party entitled to favor, and by which rights will be secured and forfeitures avoided; 1 Tex. 107; Ang. Lim. c. VI. Fractions of a day are not regarded, unless it becomes necessary in a question of priority; 2 Story 571; 4 Gilm. (Ill.) 499; 8 Ves. 33; 3 Den. 12; 6 Gray 316; and then only in some cases, usually in questions concerning private acts and transactions; 20 Vt. 653. See FRACTION OF A DAY; DAY; TIME.

Exceptions to general rule. If, when the right of action would otherwise accrue and the statute begin to run, there is no person who can exercise the right, the statute does not begin to run till there is such a person; 8 Cra. 84; for this would be contrary to the intent of the various statutes. Thus, if a note matures after the decease of the promisee, and prior to the issue of letters of administration, the statute runs from the date of the letters of administration unless otherwise specified in the statute; 5 B. & Ald. 204; 13 Wend. 267; 9 Leigh 79; 7 H. & Johns. 14; 4 Whart. 130; 32 Vt. 176; 15 Conn. 145; and there must be a person in being to be sued, otherwise the statute will not begin to run; 12 Wheat. 129.

But the courts will not recognize exemptions, where the statute has once begun to run; 126 Pa. 643; 16 Or. 178. So where the statute begins to run before the death of the testator or intestate, it is not interrupted by his death; 4 M. & W. 43; 3 M. & C. 455; 4 Edw. Ch. 733; 3 McLean 568; 30 W. Va. 195; 24 Neb. 670; nor by the death of the administrator; 17 Ala. N. S. 291; nor by his removal from the state; 15 Ala. N. S. 545; nor by the subsequent mental incapacity of a party; 151 U. S. 483. So an insolvent's discharge as effectually removes him from pursuit by his creditor as absence from the state; but it is not an exception within the statute, and cannot avail; 1 Whart. 106; 1 Cow. 356; 6 Gray 517. See 85 Tenn. 278. A creditor's absence makes it inconvenient for him to return and sue; but as he can so do, he must, or be barred; 17 Ves. Ch. 87; 1 Johns. 165. And it has ever been held that a statutory impediment to the assertion of title will not help the party so impeded; 2 Wheat. 25; but when a state of war exists between the governments of the debtor and creditor, the running of the statute is suspended; 22 Wall. 576; Chase, Dec. 286; 29 Ark. 238; 55 Ga. 274; 62 Mo. 140; 11 Bush 191; 13 Wall. 158; and it revives in full force on the restoration of peace. See 103 N. C. 159. The courts cannot create an exception to the operation of the statute not made by the statute itself, where the party designedly eludes the service of process; 130 U. S. 320.

There are many authorities, however, to show that if, by the interposition of courts, the necessity of the case, or the provisions of a statute, a person cannot be sued for a limited time, the running of the statute is suspended during that period. In other words, if the law interposes to prevent suit, it will see to it that he who has a right of action shall not be prejudiced thereby; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 368; 5 Ga. 66; 3 McLean 568; 12 Wheat. 129. But see 21 Pa. 220. Thus, an injunction suspends the statute; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 182; 12 Gratt. 579; 2 Stockt. 347; 10 Humphr. 365; 31 N. Y. 345; 13 La. Ann. 57; 106 Mass. 347; as does the presentation of a claim against the United States to the treasury department for examination and allowance; 75 Fed. Rep. 648. And so does an assignment of an insolvent's effects, as between the estate and the creditors; 7 Metc. 435; 7 Rich. S. C. 43; 12 La. Ann. 216; though not, as has just been said, as between the debtor and his creditor; 6 Gray 517. But when the statute does not in terms exclude and limit a particular case, the court will not extend it, although the case comes within the reason of the statute; 15 Ala. 194; 2 Curt. 480; 17 Ohio St. 548; 53 Pa. 382. See 31 W. Va. 571.

By the special provisions of the statute, infants, married women, persons non compos mentis, those imprisoned, and those beyond seas, out of the state, out of the realm, or out of the country, are regarded as affected by the incapacity to sue, or, in other words, as being under disability, and have, therefore, the right of action secured to them until the expiration of the time limited, after the removal of the disability. The statute of limitations cannot be pleaded in bar to an action by a wife against a husband to recover present and future maintenance; 6 Ind. App. 377. But these personal exceptions have been strictly construed, and the party alleging the disability has been very uniformly held to bring himself exactly within the express words of the statute to entitle himself to the benefit of the exception. To bring himself within the spirit or supposed reason of the exception is not enough; 1 Cow. 356; 3 Green, N. J. 171; 2 Curt. C. C. 480; 17 Ves. Ch. 87; 4 Ben. 459. And this privilege is accorded although the person laboring under the statute disability might in fact bring suit. Thus, an infant may sue before he arrives at his majority, but he is not obliged to, and his right is saved if he does not; 2 Saund. 117. The time during which a negro was held as a slave should not be counted in determining whether an action by him is barred by the statute; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 654. The disability must, however, be continuous and identical. One disability cannot be superadded to another so as to prolong the time; 37 U. S. App. 129; and if the statute once begins to run, whether before a disability exists or after it has been removed, no intervention of another and subsequent disability can stop it; 29 Pa. 495; 15 B. Mon. 30; 54 Ill. 101; 2 McCord 269; 24 Neb. 670; 87 Tenn. 172; 117 Ind. 539; 147 U. S. 647. When, however, there are two or more coexisting disabilities at the time the right of action accrues, suit need not be brought till all are removed; Plowd. 375; 20 Mo. 530; 1 Atk. Ch. 610; 1 Shepl. 397; 3 Johns. Ch. 129.

The time during which a debtor is absent residing out of the state of his own free will and accord, is to be deducted in estimating the time in which an action must be brought against him; 74 Mich. 235; 52 Kan. 706; notwithstanding that he continues to have a usual place of residence in the state where service of the summons could be made on him; 147 U. S. 647; but a foreign corporation is a person out of the state; 86 Wis. 285. See BEYOND SEAS.

The word return, as applied to an absent debtor, applies as well to foreigners, or residents out of the state coming to the state, as to citizens of the state who have gone abroad and have returned; 3 Johns. 267; 11 Pick. 36; 3 R. I. 178. And in order to set the statute in motion the return must be open, public, and such and under such circumstances as will give a party, who exercises ordinary diligence, an opportunity to bring his action; 1 Pick. 263; 3 Gill & J. 158; 15 Vt. 727; 26 Barb. 208. Such a return, though temporary, will be sufficient; 8 Cra. 174. But if the return is such and under such circumstances as to show that the party does not intend that his creditor shall take advantage of his presence, or such, in fact, that he cannot without extraordinary vigilance avail himself of it,—if it is secret, concealed, or clandestine,—it is insufficient. The absence of one of several joint-plaintiffs does not prevent the running of the statute; 4 Term 516; but the absence of one of several joint-defendants does; 29 E. L. & Eq. 271. This at least seems to be the settled law of England; but the cases in the several states of the Union are conflicting upon these points. See 1 Dutch. 219; 18 N. Y. 567; 18 B. Mon. 312; 4 Sneed 99. If a claimant beyond seas when the claim accrued returned to this country, the statute began to run and was not suspended by his departure to foreign parts; 23 Ct. Cls. 255.

Commencement of process. The question sometimes arises as to what constitutes the bringing an action or the commencement of process, and this is very uniformly held to be the delivery or transmission by mail in due course of the writ or process to the sheriff, in good faith, for service; 14 Wend. 649; 15 Mass. 859; 1 S. & R. 236; 26 Md. 479; 8 Greenl. (Mo.) 447; 1 W. Chip. 94. The date of the writ is prima facie evidence of the time of its issuance; 17 Pick. 407; 7 Me. 370; but is by no means conclusive; 2 Burr. 950; 15 Mass. 364. The suit is not "brought" or "commenced" in a federal court, to stop the running of the statute, until there is a bona fide attempt to serve the process; 80 Fed. Rep. 309.

If the writ or process seasonably issued fail of a sufficient service or return by any unavoidable accident, or by any default or neglect of the officer to whom it is committed, or is abated, or the action is otherwise avoided by the death of any party thereto, or for any matter of form, or judgment for plaintiff be arrested or reversed, the plaintiff may, either by virtue of the statutory provision or by reason of an implied exception to the general rule, commence a new action within a reasonable time; and that reasonable time is usually fixed by the statute at one year, and by the courts in the absence of statutory provision at the same period; 1 Ld. Raym. 434; 2 Pa. 883; 1 Bail. S. C. 542; 10 Wend. 278. See 78 Ga. 790. Irregularity of the mail is an inevitable accident within the meaning of the statute; 8 Me. 447. And so is a failure of service by reason of the removal of the defendant, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, from the county in which he had resided and to which the writ was seasonably sent; 12 Metc. 15. But a mistake of the attorney as to time of the sitting of the court, and consequent failure to enter, is not; 29 Me. 458. An abatement by the marriage of the female plaintiff is no abatement within the statute; it is rather a voluntary abandonment; 8 Cra. 84. And so, generally, of any act of the party or his attorney whereby the suit is abated or the action fails; 3 M'Cord 452; 29 Me. 458; 1 Mich. 252; 6 Cush. 417. The statute cannot be pleaded to an amended count when it contains only a restatement of the case as contained in the original counts; 42 Ill. App. 126. The filing of a petition will bar the running of the statute, though stricken out because it does not contain the formal allegations required, where it was subsequently amended; 86 Tex. 560. In Pennsylvania a citation to an executor to file an account is equivalent to the commencement of process.

A nonsuit is in some states held to be within the equity of the statute; 13 Ired. 123; 4 Ohio St. 172; 12 La. Ann. 672; see 47 Mo. App. 218; but generally otherwise; 1 S. & R. 236; 3 M'Cord 452; 3 Harr. N. J. 269; 6 Cush. 417. If there are two defendants, and by reason of a failure of service upon one an alias writ is taken out, this is no continuance, but a new action, and the statute is a bar; 6 Watts 528. So of an amending bill introducing new parties; 6 Pet. 61; 10 B. Mon. 84; 3 Me. 535. A dismissal of the action because of the clerk's omission seasonably to enter it on the docket is for matter of form, within the Massachusetts statute, and a new suit may be instituted within one year thereafter; 7 Gray 165; and so is a dismissal for want of jurisdiction, where the action is brought in the wrong county; 1 Gray 580. In Maine, however, a wrong venue is not a matter of form; 38 Me. 217. The statute is a bar to an action at law after a dismissal from chancery for want of jurisdiction; 1 Vern. 74; 16 Wend. 573; 2 Munf. 181. Upon the dismissal of an action the court cannot extend the statutory period of limitation for bringing a new action; 39 Minn. 115.

Lex fori governs. Questions under the statute are to be decided by the law of the place where the action is brought, and not by the law of the place where the contract is made or the wrong done. If the statute has run against a claim in one state, the remedy is gone, but the right is not extinguished; and therefore the right may be enforced in another state where the remedy is still open, the time limited by the statute not having expired; 15 East 439; 11 Pick. 36, 522; 7 Md. 91; 23 How. 132; 13 Gray 535. So if the statute of the place of the contract is still unexpired, yet an action brought in another place is governed by the lex fori, and may be barred; 1 Cai. 402; 5 Cl. & F. 1. But statutes giving title by adverse possession are to be distinguished from statutes of limitation. Adverse possession gives title; lapse of time bars the remedy only. And a right acquired by adverse possession in the place where the adverse possession is had is good elsewhere; 11 Wheat. 361; 9 How. 407; Story, Confl. Laws 582. In Pennsylvania, by a recent statute an action is barred whenever it is so by the law of the state where the cause of action accrued. See LEX FORI.

Public rights not affected. Statutes of limitation do not, on principles of public policy, run against the state or the United States, unless it is expressly so provided in the statute itself; 130 U. S. 263; 147 id. 508; 38 Fed. Rep. 1; but the United States is entitled to take the benefit of them; 147 U. S. 508. No laches is to be imputed to the government; 2 Mas. 312; 18 Johns. 228; 4 Mass. 528. But this principle has no application when a party seeks his private rights in the name of the state; 4 Ga. 115; but see 6 Pa. 290; 127 U. S. 338; 132 id. 239; 142 id. 510. Counties, towns, and municipal bodies not possessed of the attributes of sovereignty have no exemption; 4 Dev. 568; 22 Me. 445; 12 Ill. 38; 13 Wall. 62; 38 W. Va. 1; 41 Ark. 45; 133 Ind. 700; but see 8 Ohio 298. And it is held that municipalities are excluded from the operation of the statute, in regard to the title to land, 101 Pa. 27; 51 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 950; but it is said that municipalities may be estopped from disputing title where justice and equity so require; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 675. If, however, the sovereign becomes a party in a private enterprise, as, for instance, a stockholder in a bank, it subjects itself to the operation of the statute; 3 Pet. 30; 2 Brock. 393. See, generally, 147 U. S. 508.

Particular classes of actions. Actions of trespass, trespass quare clausum, detinue, account, trover, replevin, and upon the case (except actions for slander), and actions of debt for arrearages of rent, and of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty, or simple contract debt, are usually limited to six years. Actions for slander, libel, assault, and the like, are usually limited to a less time, generally two years. Judgments of courts not of record, as courts of justices of the peace and county commissioners' courts, are in some states, either by statute or the decisions of the highest courts, included in the category of debts founded on contract without specialty, and accordingly come within the statute; 13 Metc. 251; 2 Bail. 58; 37 Me. 29; 2 Grant. Cas. 353; 6 Barb. 583; 3 Living. 367. In others, however, they are excluded upon the ground that the statute applies only to debts founded on contracts in fact, and not to debts founded on contracts implied by law; 14 Johns. 480.

Actions of assumpsit, though not specifically named in the original statute of James I. as included within the limitation of six years, were held in England, after much discussion, to be fairly embraced in actions of "trespass"; 4 Mod. 105; 4 B. & C. 44; 4 Ad. & E. 912. The same rule has been adopted in this country; 5 Ohio 444; 3 Pet. 270; 1 Morr. Ia. 59. 8 Cra. 98; but see 12 M. & M. 141; and, in fact, assumpsit is expressly included in most of the statutes. And it has also been held in this country that statutes of limitation apply as well to motions made under a statute as to actions; 11 Humphr. 423. Such statutes are in aid of the common law, and furnish a general rule for cases that are analogous in their subject-matter, but for which a remedy unknown to the common law has been provided by statutes; as where compensation is sought for land taken for a railroad; 23 Pa. 371; 32 Conn. 521.

But it must be remembered that in all such cases the debt is not discharged, though the right of action to enforce it may be gone; 13 U. S. App. 57. So, where a creditor has a lien on goods for a balance due, he may hold them, though the statute has run against his debt; 3 Esp. 81; 11 Conn. 160; 26 Me. 330; 28 Ill. 44. And an acceptor may retain funds to indemnify him against his acceptances, though the acceptances may have been outstanding longer than the time limited by statute; 3 Campb. 418.

A set-off of a claim against which the statute has run cannot usually be pleaded in bar; 5 East 16; 3 Johns. 261; 5 Gratt. 360; 14 Pa. 531; though when there are cross-demands accruing at nearly the same time, and the plaintiff has saved the statute by suing out process, the defendant will be allowed to set off his demand; 2 Esp. 569; 2 Green, N. J. L. 545; and, generally, when there is any equitable matter of defence in the nature of set-off, or which might be the subject of a cross-action, growing out of the subject-matter for which the action is brought, courts will permit it to be set up although a cross-action or an action on the claim in set-off might be barred by the statute; 8 Rich. S. C. 113; 9 Ga. 398; 11 E. L. & Eq. 10; 8 B. Monr. 580; 3 Stockt. 44. A set-off is barred by the statute only when the original claim is barred; 134 Ind. 494.

Debts by specialty, as contracts under seal, judgments of courts of record (except foreign judgments, and judgments of courts out of the state, upon which the decisions are very discordant), liabilities imposed by statute, awards under seal, or where the submission is under seal, indentures reserving rent, and actions for legacies, are affected only by the general limitation of twenty years; Ang. Lim. § 77. But a mortgage, though under seal, does not take the note, not witnessed, secured thereby, with it, out of the limitation of simple contracts; 7 Wend. 94. And though liabilities imposed by statute are specialties, a liability under a by-law made by virtue of a charter is not; 6 E. L. & Eq. 309; on the ground that by becoming a member of the company enacting the by-laws, the party consents and agrees to assume the liabilities imposed thereby.

In Massachusetts, Vermont, and Maine, the statute is regulated in its application to witnessed promissory notes. In Massachusetts an action brought by the payee of a witnessed promissory note, his executor or administrator, is excepted from the limitation of simple contracts, and is only barred by the lapse of twenty years. But the indorsee of such a note must sue within six years from the time of the transfer to him; 4 Pick. 384; though he may sue after that time in the name of the payee, with his consent; 1 Gray 261; 2 Curt. C. C. 448. If there are two promissees to the note, and the signature of only one is witnessed, the note as to the other is not a witnessed note; 115 Mass. 599; 18 Shepl. 49. And the attestation of the witness must be with the knowledge and consent of the maker of the note; 8 Pick. 246; 1 Williams Vt. 26. An attested indorsement signed by the promissee, acknowledging the note to be due, is not a witnessed note; 23 Pick. 282; but the same acknowledgment for value received, with a promise to pay the note, is; 1 Metc. Mass. 21. If the note be payable to the maker's own order, witnessed and indorsed by the maker in blank, the indorsement being without attestation, an action by the first indorsee is barred in six years; 4 Metc. Mass. 219. And even if the indorsement be attested, a second indorsee or holder by delivery, not being the original payee, is barred; 13 Metc. 128.

Statute bar avoided, when. Trusts in general are not within the operation of the statute, where they are direct and exclusively within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and the question arises between the trustees and the cestui que trust; 7 Johns. Ch. 90; 23 Pa. 472; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 53; 5 R. I. 79; 9 Pick. 212. See 31 W. Va. 810; 149 Mass. 253. And of this character are the trusts of executors, administrators, guardians, assignees of insolvents, and the like. The claim or title of such trustees is that of the cestui que trust; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 608; 2 Sch. & L. 607, 633; 4 Whart. 177; 71 Pa. 106; 1 Johns. Ch. 314; 4 Pick. 283. The relation between directors and a corporation has the elements of an express trust, to which the statute does not apply; 20 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 671. Special limitations to actions at law are made in some states in favor of executors and administrators, modifying or abrogating the rule in equity: and as these laws are made in the interest of the trust funds, it is the duty of the executor or administrator to plead the special statute which applies to him as such, and protects the estate he represents, though he is not bound to plead the general statute; 13 Mass. 203; 15 N. H. 6; 15 S. & R. 231; 2 Dessaus. 577; 4 Wash. C. C. 639.

If, however, the trustee deny the right of his cestui que trust, and claim adversely to him, and these facts come to the knowledge of the cestui que trust, the statute will begin to run from the time when the facts become known; 9 Pick. 212; 10 Pet. 223; 22 Md. 142; 52 Mo. 182; 11 Pa. 207; 32 W. Va. 184; 142 U. S. 326. See 77 Cal. 330. Long lapse of time will defeat the enforcement of a resulting trust; 32 W. Va. 14. The rule exempting trusts from the operation of the statute does not apply to a resulting trust in favor of creditors; 39 Minn. 330; 116 Ind. 78.

Principal and agent. The relation of an agent to his principal is a fiduciary one, and the statute does not begin to run so long as there is no breach of the trust or duty; 85 Ky. 322. When, however, there is such a breach, and the principal has knowledge of it, the statute will begin to run; 3 Gill & J. 389; 5 Cra. 560; 4 Jones N. C. 155; 12 Barb. 293; 32 Conn. 520. In many cases a lawful demand upon the agent to perform his duty, and neglect or refusal to comply, are necessary to constitute a breach. As when money is placed in the hands of an agent with which to purchase property, and the agent neglects to make the purchase, there must be a demand for the money before the statute will begin to run; 5 Ired. 507; 6 Cow. 376; 24 Pa. 52; so where property is placed in the hands of an agent to be sold, and he neglects to sell; 2 Gill & J. 389. If, however, the agent's conduct is such as to amount to a declaration on his part that he will not perform his duty, or if he has disabled himself from performing it, it is tantamount to a repudiation of the trust, or an adverse claim against the cestui que trust, and the same consequences follow. No demand is necessary; the right of action accrues at once upon the declaration, and the statute then begins to run; 10 Gill & J. 422.

But where a demand is necessary, it should itself be made within the limited time; otherwise an agent might be subject all his lifetime to demands, however stale; 15 Wend. 302; 17 Mass. 145; 66 Pa. 192; unless the agent, by his own act, prevents a demand; 6 Cush. 501. The rendering an untrue account by a collection or other agent would seem to be such a breach of duty as to warrant an action without demand, and would therefore set the statute in motion; 17 Mass. 145. If the custom of trade or the law makes it the clear duty of an agent to pay over money collected without a demand, then if the principal has notice, the statute begins to run from the time of collection; and when there is no such custom or law, if the agent having funds collected gives notice to his principal, the statute will begin to run after the lapse of a reasonable time within which to make the demand, though no demand be made; 4 Sandf. 590.

In equity, as has been seen, fraud practised upon the plaintiff so that the fact of his right to sue does not come to his knowledge till after the expiration of the statute of limitations, is held to open the case so that he may bring his action within the time limited, dating from the discovery of the fraud; Bisph. Eq. 203; 83 Va. 451. But herein the courts proceed with great caution, and require not only a clear case of fraudulent concealment, but the absence of negligence on the part of the party seeking to obviate the statute limitation by the replication of fraud; 7 How. 819; 12 Pa. 49; 1 Curt. C. C. 390; 2 Denio 577; 11 Ohio 194; 20 N. H. 187. See 130 U. S. 505. The concealment must be something more than silence or mere general declarations or speeches; it must appear that some trick or artifice has been employed to prevent inquiry or elude investigation, or calculated to mislead or hinder the party from obtaining information by the use of ordinary diligence; or it must appear that the facts were misrepresented to or concealed from the party by some positive act or declaration when inquiry was made; 116 Ind. 78; 145 U. S. 317. In some states, fraudulent concealment of the cause of action is made by statute a cause of exemption from its effect in courts of law as well as of equity. And the courts construe the saving clause with great strictness, and hold that means of knowledge of the concealment are equivalent to knowledge in fact; 8 Allen 130; 39 Me. 404. In the absence of statutory provision, the admissibility of the replication of fraud in courts of law has been the subject of contradictory decisions in the different states. In New York (20 Johns. 30), in Virginia (4 Leigh 474), and in North Carolina (3 Murph. 115), it is inadmissible. But in the United States courts (1 McLean 185; 130 U. S. 684), Pennsylvania (12 S. & R. 128), Indiana (4 Blackf. 85), New Hampshire (8 Fost. 26), South Carolina (8 Rich. Eq. 130), Virginia (83 Va. 451), it is held to be admissible; 5 Mas. 143; and this is the rule generally prevalent in the United States.

Running accounts. Such accounts as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant were by the original statute of James I. exempted from its operation. The earlier statutes of limitation in this country contained the same exception. But it has been very generally omitted in late revised codes. Among the accounts excepted from the operation of the statute all accounts current were early held to be included; 6 Term 189; if they contained upon either side any item upon which the right of action accrued within six years, whether the accounts were between merchant and merchant or other persons. And this construction of the law, based, as is said in some cases, upon the ground that such accounts come within the equity of the exception in respect to merchants' accounts, and in others upon the ground that every new item and credit in an account given by one party to another is an admission of there being some unsettled account between them, and as an acknowledgment, sufficient to take the case out of the statute, has taken the form of legislative enactment in many states in this country, and, in the absence of such enactment, has been generally followed by the courts; 20 Johns. 576; 6 Pick. 364; 6 Me. 308; 6 Conn. 246; 4 Rand. 488; 12 Pet. 300; 11 Gill & J. 212; 4 M'Cord 215; 3 Harr. N. J. 266; 5 Cra. 15; 1 Md. 333; 25 Pa. 296; 30 Cal. 126.

But there must be a reciprocity of dealing between the respective parties, and the accounts must be such that there may be a fair implication that it is understood that the items of one account are to be a set-off so far as they go, against the items of the other account; 2 Sumn. 410; 40 Mo. 244; 2 Halst. 357; 4 Cra. 696; 1 Edw. Ch. 417; 25 Pa. 296. Where the items of account are all on one side, as between a shopkeeper and his customer, or where goods are charged and payments credited, there is no mutuality, and the statute bars the account; 4 M'Cord 215; 1 Sandf. 220; 17 S. & R. 347; 18 Ala. 274. See 37 Fed. Rep. 394. And where, in the case of mutual account, after a statement, the balance has been struck and agreed upon, the statute at once applies to such balance as a distinct demand; 2 Saund. 125; 6 Me. 308; 1 Daveis 294; 12 Pet. 300; 7 Cra. 147; unless it was made the first item of a new mutual account; 3 Pick. 96; 8 Cl. & F. 121; but see 54 Mo. App. 543.

The statute begins to run against mutual accounts from the date of the last credit and not from the last debit; 65 Vt. 287; and if the last item on either side of a mutual account is not barred, the whole account is saved from the operation of the statute; 115 Mo. 581; 27 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 214.

A closed account is not a stated account. In order to constitute the latter, an account must have been rendered by one party, and expressly or impliedly assented to by the other; 8 Pick. 187; 6 Me. 308; 12 Pet. 300. Accounts between merchant and merchant are exempted from the operation of the statute, if current and mutual, although no item appears on either side within six years; 19 Ves. 180; 2 Saund. 124; 8 Bligh 352; 6 Pick. 364; 5 Cra. 15; 13 Pa. 310; 1 Smith (Ind.) 217. A single transaction between two merchants is not within the exception; 17 Pa. 238; nor is an account between partners; 3 R. I. 87; 75 Cal. 566; nor an account between two joint-owners of a vessel; 10 B. Monr. 112; nor an account for freight under a charter-party, although both parties are merchants; 6 Pet. 151.

Surety. The statute begins to run against a surety paying a debt only from the time of payment; 99 N. C. 559; 82 Va. 751.

As to limitation in patent cases, see PATENTS.

New promise to pay debt barred. There is another important class of exceptions, not made by the statute, but by the courts, wherein, although the statutory limitation may have expired, parties bringing themselves within the exception have always been allowed to recover. In actions of assumpsit, a new express promise to pay, or an acknowledgment of existing indebtedness made under such circumstances as to be equivalent to a new promise and within six years before the time of action brought, will take the case out of the operation of the statute, although the original cause of action accrued more than six years before that time; Poll. Contr. 625; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 445. And this proceeds upon the ground that as the statutory limitation merely bars the remedy and does not discharge the debt, there is something more than a merely moral obligation to support the promise,—to wit, a pre-existent debt, which is a sufficient consideration for the new promise; 2 Mas. 151; 8 Gill 155; 19 Ill. 109; 26 Vt. 230; Ans. Contr. 100; 9 S. & R. 128; 85 Tenn. 561. The new promise upon this sufficient consideration constitutes, in fact, a new cause of action; 4 East 399; 6 Taunt. 210; 1 Pet. 351; Hare, Contr. 259.

This was undoubtedly a liberal construction of the statute; but it was early adopted, and has maintained itself, in the face of much adverse criticism, to the present time. While, however, at an early period there was an inclination of the courts to accept the slightest and most ambiguous expressions as evidence of a new promise, the spirit and tendency of modern decisions are towards greater strictness, and seem to be fairly expressed in the learned judgment of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351. "It has often been matter of regret, in modern times, that, in the construction of the statute of limitations, the decisions had not proceeded upon principles better adapted to carry into effect the real objects of the statute; that, instead of being viewed in an unfavorable light, as an unjust and discreditable defence, it had [not] received such support as would have made it, what it was intended to be, emphatically a statute of repose. It is a wise and beneficial law, not designed merely to raise a presumption of payment of a just debt from lapse of time, but to afford security against stale demands after the true state of the transactions may have been forgotten, or be incapable of explanation, by reason of the death or removal of witnesses. It has a manifest tendency to produce speedy settlement of accounts, and to suppress those prejudices which may rise up at a distance of time and baffle every honest effort to counteract or overcome them. Parol evidence may be offered of confessions (a species of evidence which, it has been often observed, it is hard to disprove and easy to fabricate) applicable to such remote times as may leave no means to trace the nature, extent, or origin of the claim, and thus open the way to the most oppressive charges. If we proceed one step further, and admit, that loose and general expressions, from which a probable or possible inference may be deduced of the acknowledgment of a debt by a court or jury, that, as the language of some cases has been, any acknowledgment, however slight, or any statement not amounting to a denial of the debt, that any admission of the existence of an unsettled account, without any specification of amount or balance, and however indeterminate and casual, are yet sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations, and let in evidence, aliunde, to establish any debt, however large and at whatever distance of time; it is easy to perceive that the wholesome objects of the statute must be in a great measure defeated, and the statute virtually repealed." . . . "If the bar is sought to be removed by the proof of a new promise, that promise, as a new cause of action, ought to be proved in a clear and explicit manner, and be in its terms unequivocal and determinate; and, if any conditions are annexed, they ought to be shown to be performed."

And to the same general purport are the following cases, although it is undeniable that in the application of the rule there seems in some cases to be a looseness and liberality which hardly comport with the rule: 32 Me. 260; 14 N. H. 422; 7 Hill N. Y. 45; 121 Pa. 649; 12 Ill. 146; 4 Fla. 481; 5 Ga. 486; 79 id. 700; 9 B. Monr. 614; 10 Ark. 134; 11 Ired. 445; 8 Gratt. 110; 20 Ala. N. S. 687; 4 Zabr. 427; 12 Ill. 146; 4 Gray 606: 33 Vt. 9; 5 Nev. 206; 54 Pa. 172; 11 How. 493; 8 Fost. 26; 51 Minn. 482; 159 Mass. 245; 7 Misc. Rep. 264; 86 Tex. 560; 32 Va. 518.

The promise must be made to the party in interest or his agent, in order to toll the statute; 122 Pa. 358; as an acknowledgment to a third person and not intended to be communicated to the creditor will not suffice; 6 Mackey 485.

A new promise to pay the principal only does not except the interest from the operation of the statute; 29 Pa. 189. Nor does an agreement to refer take the claim out of the statute; 1 Sneed 464; nor the insertion, by an insolvent debtor, of an outlawed claim in a schedule of his creditors required by law; 10 Pa. 129; 7 Gray 274 (but this is not so in Louisiana; 14 La. Ann. 612); 12 Metc. 470; nor an agreement not to take advantage of the statute; 29 Me. 47; 17 Pa. 232; 8 Md. 374; 9 Leigh 381. If such an agreement were valid, it might be made part of the contract, and thus the object of the law would be defeated; 32 Me. 169. Nor will a devise of property to pay debts exempt debts upon which the statute has run prior to the testator's death; 13 Ala. 611; 4 Pa. 56; 13 Gratt. 329; 4 Sandf. 427.

Nor, in general, will any statement of a debt, made officially, in pursuance of special legal requirement, or with another purpose than to recognize it as an existing debt; 12 E. L. & Eq. 191; 9 Cush. 390; 30 Me. 425; 32 Ala. 134. Nor will a deed of assignment made by the debtor for the payment of certain debts, and of his debts generally, and a partial payment by the assignor to a creditor; 1 R. I. 81; 6 E. L. & Eq. 520; nor the entry of a debt in an unsigned schedule of the debtor's liabilities, made for his own use; 30 Me. 425; nor an undelivered mortgage to secure a debt against which the statute has run, though duly executed, acknowledged and recorded; 6 Cush. 151. But if the mortgage be delivered, it will be a sufficient acknowledgment to exempt the debt secured thereby from the operation of the statute; 4 Cush. 559; 18 Conn. 257; 14 Tex. 672. And so will the answer to a bill in chancery which expressly sets forth the existence of such a debt; 4 Sandf. 427; 3 Gill 166. An acknowledgment by a mortgagor to a stranger of the existence of the debt secured by the mortgage, without an express promise to pay the debt, will not prevent the bar of the statute; 64 Cal. 354.

If there is any thing said to repel the inference of a promise, or inconsistent therewith, the statute will not be avoided; 1 Harr. & J. 219; 23 Pa. 452; 6 Pet. 86; 5 Blackf. 436; 11 La. Ann. 712; 14 Me. 300; 4 Mo. 100; 15 Wend. 137. A promise to pay is implied from an acknowledgment of a debt as an existing debt; 159 Mass. 245. "The account is due, and I supposed it had been paid, but did not know of its being ever paid," is no new promise; 8 Cra. 72. If the debtor admits that the debt is due, but intimates his purpose to avail himself of the bar of the statute, the acknowledgment is insufficient; 2 Dev. & B. 82; 2 Browne 35; 29 Conn. 457. So if he says he will pay if he owes, but denies that he owes; 3 Me. 97; 2 Pick. 368; 70 Tex. 327. So if he states his inability to pay; 22 Pick. 291; 13 N. H. 486. So if he admits the claim to have been once due, but claims that it is paid by an account against the claimant; 3 Fairf. 72; 5 Conn. 480; 11 Conn. 160. See 84 Wis. 240; 65 Vt. 287. "I am too unwell to settle now; when I am better, I will settle your account;" held insufficient; 9 Leigh 381. So of an offer to pay a part in order to get the claim out of the hands of the creditor; 2 Bail. So. C. 283; and of an admission that the account is right; 4 Dana 505. An indorsement on a note dated the day before it would outlaw, that "the within note shall not be outlawed," written and signed by the party thereto, will take it out of the statute; 67 Mich. 243; 94 id. 411; 85 Tenn. 678. Letters which merely acknowledge an indebtedness, but do not refer to any particular account, or mention the amount of the debt, and which are not written to serve as an acknowledgment, are not sufficient; 69 Miss. 225.

If the new promise is subject to conditions or qualifications, is indefinite as to time or amount, or as to the debt referred to, or in any other way limited or contingent, the plaintiff will be held to bring himself strictly within the terms of the promise, and to show that the condition has been performed, or the contingency happened, and that he is not excluded by any limitation, qualification, or uncertainty; 11 Wheat. 309; 8 Metc. 432; 15 Johns. 511; 3 Bingh. 638; 3 Hare 299; 85 Tenn. 214. If the promise be to pay when able, the ability must be proved by the plaintiff; 4 Esp. 36; 13 N. H. 486; 9 Pa. 410; 11 Barb. 254. But see 19 Vt. 308; 30 Ill. 429; 7 Hill 45; 15 Ga. 395; 85 Tenn. 214; 70 Tex. 718. So if it be to pay as soon as convenient, the convenience must be proved; 2 Cr. & M.; or, "if E will say that I have had the timber," the condition must be complied with; 1 Pick. 370.

And if there be a promise to pay in specific articles, the plaintiff must show that he offered to accept them; 8 Johns. 318. The vote of a town to appoint a committee to "settle the dispute" was held to be a conditional promise, requiring, to give it force as against the statute, proof that the committee reported something due; 11 Mass. 452. If the original promise be conditional, and the new promise absolute, the latter will not alter the former; 3 Wash. C. C. 404. But where the promise by A was to pay if the debtor could not prove that B had paid it, it was held that the onus was upon A to prove that B had paid it; 11 Ired. 445. The offer must be accepted altogether or rejected altogether. The liability of the defendant is to be tried by the test he has himself prescribed; 4 Leigh 603; 10 Johns. 35; 1 Gill & J. 497.

It must appear clearly that the promise is made with reference to the particular demand in suit; 6 Pet. 86; 6 Ga. 21; 1 Kay 650; 11 Ired. 86; though a general admission would seem to be sufficient, unless the defendant show that there were other demands between the parties; 4 Gray 606; 8 Gill 82; 19 Pa. 388; 23 Conn. 453. If the admission be broad enough to cover the debt in suit, according to some authorities, the plaintiff can prove the amount really due aliunde. But the authorities are not at one on this point; 12 C. & P. 104; 6 N. H. 367; 22 Pick. 291; 27 Me. 433; 1 Pet. 351; 9 Leigh 381; 2 Dev. & B. 390; 23 Pa. 413.

Part payment of a debt is evidence of a new promise to pay the remainder; 2 Dougl. 552; 19 Vt. 28; 6 Barb. 583; 23 Or. 106. See 65 Hun 625. It is, however, but prima facie evidence, and may be rebutted by other evidence; 28 Vt. 642; 27 Me. 370; 4 Mich. 508; L. R. 7 Q. B. 493; 13 Wall. 254; 53 N. Y. 442; 33 Miss. 41; 5 Ark. 638; 7 Ind. App. 417. The payment must be voluntary and made with the intent that it should be applied upon the debt; 60 Vt. 453. Payment of the interest has the same effect as payment of part of the principal; 8 Bingh. 309; 7 Blackf. 537; 17 Cal. 574; 14 Pick. 387; 60 Vt. 566. And the giving a note for part of a debt; 2 Metc. 168; 40 Kan. 1; or for accrued interest, is payment; 13 Wend. 267; 6 Metc. 553; and so is a second mortgage given as payment of interest on the first mortgage; 75 Mich. 167; and so is the credit of interest in an account stated; 6 Johns. 267; and the delivery of goods on account; 4 Ad. & E. 71; 30 Me. 253; 11 How. 498. But the payment of a dividend by the assignee of an insolvent debtor is no new promise to pay the remainder; 7 Gray 387; 6 E. L. & Eq. 520; and it has been held by respectable authorities that new part payment is no new promise, but that in order to take the case out of the statute, the payment must be made on account of a sum admitted to be due, accompanied with a promise to pay the remainder; 6 M. & W. 824; 6 E. L. & Eq. 520; 20 Miss. 663; 7 Gray 274. Payments of part of the sum sued for do not take the case out of the statute, when the evidence does not show that at the time of such payment, the party knew that he owed the sum in suit and the payments were apparently made on account of bills that accrued after the accrual of the debt in suit; 141 N. Y. 489. And a payment intended to cover the whole amount due is ineffectual as part payment to defeat the operation of the statute; 5 Misc. Rep. 213.

Part payment by a surety in the presence of his principal, and without dissent, is payment by the principal; 2 Fost. 219; but part payment by the surety after the statute has barred the debt, is not a new promise to pay the other part; 18 B. Monr. 643. A payment by the maker of a note cannot be relied on to take the note out of the statute as to the surety; 43 Ill. App. 301. A general payment on account of a debt for which several notes were given, without direction as to the application of the payment, may be applied by the creditor to either of the notes, so as to take the note to which the payment is applied out of the statute; but the payment cannot be apportioned to the several notes with the same effect; 19 Vt. 26; 31 E. L. & Eq. 55; 1 Gray 630. With respect to promissory notes and bonds, the general proof of part payment or of interest is the indorsement thereon; 1 Ad. & E. 102; 9 Pick. 42; 42 Barb. 18; 17 Johns. 182. But it must be made bona fide, and with the privity of the debtor; 2 Campb. 321; 7 Wend. 408; 45 Mass. 578; 4 Leigh 519.

The payment may be made to an agent, or even a stranger not authorized to receive it, but erroneously supposed to be authorized. It is as much an admission of the debt as if made to the principal himself; 1 Bingh. 480; 10 B. & C. 122. And so with reference to acknowledgments or new promises; 4 Pick. 110; 11 Me. 152; 21 Barb. 351; 36 Iowa 576; 19 Ill. 189. And the weight of authority is in favor of the rule that part payment of a witnessed note or bond will avoid the statute; 30 Me. 164; 9 B. Monr. 438; 12 Mo. 94; 18 Ark. 521. Whether the new promise or payment, if made after the debt is barred by the statute, will remove the bar, is also a mooted point, the weight of authority perhaps being in favor of the negative; 14 Pick. 387; 10 Ala. N. S. 959; 13 Miss. 564; 2 Comst. 523; 2 Kern. 635; 13 La. Ann. 353, 635; 14 Ark. 199. In Ohio it is so, by statute; 17 Ohio 9. For the affirmative, see 18 Vt. 440; 20 Me. 176; 5 Ired. 341; 2 Tex. 501; 8 Humphr. 656; 47 Pa. 333; 6 Barb. 583.

It was long held that an acknowledgment or part payment by one of several joint-contractors would take the claim out of the statute as to the other joint-contractors; Steph. Ev. § 17; 2 Greenl. Ev. 438; 2 H. Bla. 340; and such is the law in some parts of the Union; 4 Pick. 382; 25 Vt. 390; 19 Conn. 37; 1 R. I. 88; 3 Munf. 240; 1 M'Cord 541; 7 Ired. 513; 30 Me. 310; 45 Miss. 367;

18 N. Y. 559. See 85 Wis. 328. But in other courts the contrary rule prevails; 1 Pet. 351; 6 N. H. 124; 7 Yerg. 534; 1 M'Mullin 297; 12 Md. 223; 17 S. & R. 126; 41 Ala. 222. See 69 Md. 499.

An acknowledgment or part payment made by an agent acting within the scope of his authority is, upon the familiar maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, an acknowledgment or part payment by the principal; see Tayl. Ev. 606; and hence if a partner has been appointed specially to settle the affairs of a dissolved partnership, his acknowledgment or part payment by virtue of his authority as such agent will take the claim out of the statute; 6 Johns. 267; 1 Pet. 351; 20 Me. 347; 3 S. & R. 345; as will part payment by a partner without special authority; 156 Mass. 314. A written acknowledgment to take a barred demand out of the statute must be made to the creditor or his agent, and it must be made with knowledge of his agency; 50 Mo. App. 194. And the wife may be such agent as to a claim for goods sold to her during the absence of her husband; 3 Bing. 119; but a wife during coverture, not made specially or by implication of law an agent, cannot make a new promise effectual to take a claim to which she was a party dum sola out of the statute; 1 B. & C. 248; 24 Vt. 89; 12 E. L. & Eq. 398; not even though the coverture be removed before the expiration of six years after the alleged promise; 2 Pa. 490.

Nor is the husband an agent for the wife for such a purpose; 15 Vt. 471; but he is an agent for the wife, payee of a note given to her dum sola, to whom a new promise or part payment may be made; 6 Q. B. 937; nor is the widow of the maker of notes, although she made payments before the cause of action was barred; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 458. So a new promise to an executor or administrator is sufficient; 8 Mass. 134; 17 Johns. 330; 7 Comst. 179; and the weight of authority seems to be in favor of the binding force of a promise or part payment made by an executor or administrator; 12 Cush. 324; 12 B. Monr. 408; 9 Ala. 502; 17 Ga. 96; 9 E. L. & Eq. 80; 10 Md. 342; 4 B. Monr. 36; particularly if the promise be express; 15 Johns. 3; 15 Me. 360; 36 N. J. L. 44. But see contrary; 7 Ind. 442; 9 Md. 317; 14 Tex. 312; 35 Pa. 259; 11 Sm. & M. 9; 7 Conn. 172; see 12 Wheat. 565. A promise by the life tenant to pay taxes may be relied upon as against a remainderman, to remove the bar of the statute; 77 Md. 582.

To put an end to all litigation in England as to the effect of a new promise or acknowledgment, it was enacted by stat. 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, commonly known as Lord Tenterden's Act, that the new promise or acknowledgment by words only, in order to be effectual to take a case out of the statute of limitations, should be in writing, signed by the party chargeable thereby; and this statute has been substantially adopted by most of the states in this country. This statute affects merely the mode of proof. The same effect is to be given to the words reduced to writing as would, before the passage of the statute, have been given to them when proved by oral testimony; 7 Bingh. 163. See 76 Ga. 371. If part payment is alleged, "words only," admitting the fact of payment, though not in writing, are admissible to strengthen the proof of the fact of payment; 2 Gale & D. 59. See Ang. Lim. § 298.

In construing these statutes it has been held that the return, under citation, by an administrator of the maker of a note, showing the note as one of his intestate's debts, is in writing within the meaning of this statute; 12 Sim. 17; and so is the entry by an insolvent debtor of the debt in his schedule of liabilities; 12 Metc. 470. It was held in the last case that the mere entry was not in itself a sufficient acknowledgment, but being in writing, within the meaning of the statute, it might be used with other written evidence to prove a new promise. But the making one note and tendering it in payment of another is not a new promise in writing; 3 Cush. 355; not even if the note be delivered, if it be redelivered to the maker for the purpose of restoring matters between the parties to the state they were in before the note was given; 1 Metc. 394. An entry in a ledger of a balance due the owner's wife, made by the husband or under his direction, is such an admission that the amount is due as will raise an implied promise to pay the same and will bar the statute; 47 Ill. App. 20; but see 140 N. Y. 150.

A and B had an unsettled account. In 1845, A signed the following: "It is agreed that B, in his general account, shall give credit to A for £10, for books delivered in 1834." Held, no acknowledgment in writing, so as to give B a right to an account against A's estate more than six years before A's death; 35 E. L. & Eq. 195. The writing must be signed by the party himself. The signature of the husband's name by the wife, though at his request, is not a signing by the party to be charged; 2 Bingh. N. C. 776. Nor is the signature by a clerk sufficient; 8 Scott 147. Nor is a promise in the handwriting of the defendant sufficient; it must be signed by him; 12 Ad. & E. 493. And a request by the defendant to the plaintiff to get certain moneys due the defendant from third parties, does not charge the party making the request, because it is not apparent that the defendant intended to render himself personally liable; 8 Ad. & E. 221; 5 C. & P. 209. Since this statute, mutual accounts will not be taken out of the operation of the statute by any item on either side, unless the item be the subject of a new promise in writing; 2 Cr. M. & R. 45; 116 Mass. 529. The effect of part payment is left by the statute as before; 10 B. & C. 122. And the fact of part payment, it is now held, contrary to some earlier cases, may be proved by unsigned written evidence; 4 E. L. & Eq. 514; or by oral testimony; 9 Metc. 482.

AS TO REAL PROPERTY AND RIGHTS. The general if not universal limitation of the right to bring an action or to make entry, is to twenty or twenty-one years after the right to enter or to bring the action accrues, i. e. to twenty or twenty-one years after the cause of action accrues. As the rights and interests of different parties in real property are various, and attach at different periods, and successively, it follows that there may be a right of entry in a particular person, accruing after the expiration of antecedent rights at a period from the beginning of the adverse possession, much exceeding twenty or twenty-one years.

Thus, if an estate be limited to one in tail, and the tenant in tail be barred of his remedy by the statute, yet, as the statute only affects the remedy, and the right or estate still exists, the right of entry in the remainder man does not accrue until the failure of the issue of the tenant in tail, which may not happen for many years. The estate still existing in the tenant in tail or his issue supports and keeps alive the remainder man's right of action till the expiration of twenty years after his right of entry accrues; 1 Burr. 60; 3 Binn. 374; 5 Bro. P. C. 689; 15 Mass. 471.

The laches of the owner of a prior right in an estate cannot prejudice the owner of a subsequently accruing right in the same estate; 4 Johns. 390; 3 Cruise, Dig. 403; 2 Stark. Ev. 887. And where there exist two distinct rights of entry in the same person, he may claim under either. He is not obliged to enter under his earlier right; 1 Pick. 318; 5 C. & P. 563; 29 Ga. 355; 2 Gill & J. 173.

Where it is necessary to prove that an actual entry has been made upon the land within a certain time before bringing suit, such entry must be proved to have been made upon the land in question; 3 Me. 316; Doug. 477; 4 Cra. 367; 11 Gill & J. 283; unless prevented by force or fraud, when a bona fide attempt is equivalent; 4 Johns. 389. If the land lie in two counties, there must be an entry in each county; though if the land be all in one county an entry upon part, with a declaration of claim to the whole, is sufficient; Co. Litt. 419; 3 Johns. Cas. 115. The intention to claim the land is essential to the sufficiency of the entry; and whether this intention has existed is to be left in each case to the jury; 9 Watts 567; 4 Wash. C. C. 367; 21 Ga. 113; 27 Ala. 364. An entry may be made by the guardian for his ward, by the remainder man or reversioner for the tenant, and the tenant for the reversioner or remainder man, being parties having privity of estate; 9 Co. 106; 2 Pa. 180. So a cestui que trust may enter for his trustee; 1 Ld. Raym. 716; and an agent for his principal; 11 Pa. 212; even without original authority, if the act be adopted and ratified; 9 Pa. 40. And the entry of one joint-tenant, coparcener, or tenant in common will inure to the benefit of the other; 10 Watts 296.

Adverse possession for the necessary statutory period gives title against the true owner; but it must be open, uninterrupted, and with intent to claim against the true owner. The possession must be an actual occupation, so open that the true owner ought to know it and must be presumed to know it, and in such manner and under such circumstances as amount to an invasion of his rights, thereby giving him cause of action; 11 Gill & J. 371; 5 Cow. 219; 2 Pa. 438; 9 Cush. 476; 5 Pet. 438; 4 Wheat. 230; 149 Mass. 201; in Pennsylvania this rule has been announced with special distinctness. "The owner of land," says the supreme court in 1 Watts 341, "can only be barred by such possession as has been actual, continued, visible, notorious, distinct, and hostile or adverse." See 95 Mich. 410; 97 Ala. 588; 144 U. S. 533; 69 Tex. 375; 39 Kan. 706; 84 Ky. 124; 23 Neb. 75.

Title by adverse possession for a period such as is required by statute to bar an action is a fee simple title, and is as effective as any otherwise acquired; 7 Mackey 1. See 144 U. S. 533.

A possession not actual, but constructive, not exclusive, but in participation with the owner or others, falls short of that kind of adverse possession which deprives the true owner of his title; 150 U. S. 597.

Adverse possession must be open, so that the owner may know it or might know of it. Many acts of occupation would be unequivocal, such as fencing the land or erecting a house on it; 7 Wheat. 59; 5 Pet. 402; 42 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 915; actual improvement and cultivation of the soil 1 Johns. 156; building on land and putting a fence around it; 6 Pick. 172; digging stones and cutting timber from time to time; 14 East 332; 6 S. & R. 21; driving piles into the soil covered by a mill-pond, and thereon erecting a building; 6 Mass. 229; cutting roads into a swamp, and cutting trees and making shingles therefrom; 1 Ired. 56; and setting fish-traps in a non-navigable stream, building dams across it, and using it every year during the entire fishing-season for the purpose of catching fish; 1 Ired. 535. But entering upon uninclosed flats, when covered by the tide, and sailing over them with a boat or vessel for the ordinary purposes of navigation, is not an adverse possession; 1 Cush. 395; though the filling up the flats, and building a wharf there, and using the same, would be if the use were exclusive; 1 Cush. 313; 10 Bosw. 249; nor is the entering upon a lot and marking its boundaries by splitting the trees; 14 N. H. 101; nor the getting rails and other timber for a few weeks each year from timber-land; 4 Jones 295; nor the overflowing of land by the stoppage of a stream; 4 Dev. 158; nor the survey, allotment, and conveyance of a piece of land, and the recording of the deed; unless there is open occupation; 22 Me. 29. As a rule the nature of the acts necessary to constitute adverse possession varies with the region and character of the ground. If the latter is uncultivated and the region sparsely populated, much less unequivocal acts are necessary on the part of the adverse holder.

It must be continuous for the whole period. If one trespasser enters and leaves, and then another trespasser, a stranger to the former and without purchase from or respect to him, enters, the possession is not continuous; 34 Pa. 38; 17 How. 601; 4 Md. 143; 30 Mo. 99; 20 Pick. 465; 10 Johns. 475; 71 Tex. 438; 38 Minn. 122. But a slight connection of the latter with the former trespasser, as by a purchase by parol contract, will be sufficient to give the possession continuity; 6 Pa. 355; 1 Meigs 613; 31 Me. 583; 22 Ohio St. 42; 1 Term 448. And so will a purchase at a sale or execution; 5 Pa. 126; 24 How. 284. To give continuity to the possession by successive occupants, there must be privity of estate; 5 Metc. Mass. 15; Ang. Lim. § 414; and such a privity that each possession may be referred to one and the same entry: as that of a tenant to his landlord, or of the heir of a disseisor to his ancestor; 1 Rice 10. It is not essential that one and the same person shall have been all the while the adverse holder, if the latter succeeds to the asserted rights of the preceding holders or occupants as grantee or transferee; 85 Ala. 504.

An administrator's possession may be connected with that of his intestate; 11 Humphr. 457; and that of a tenant holding under the ancestor, with that of the heir; Cheeves 200. In some states, however, it is held that whether the possession be held uniformly under one title, or at different times under different titles, can make no difference, provided the claim of title is always adverse; as in Connecticut; 3 Day 269; and in Kentucky; 1 A. K. Marsh 4.

The possession must be adverse. If it be permissive; 2 Jac. & W. 1; or by mistake; 3 Watts 280; or unintentional; 11 Mass. 296; or confessedly in subordination to another's right; 5 B. & Ald. 233; 9 Wheat. 241; 4 Wend. 558; 6 Pa. 210; 9 Metc. 418; 8 Shepl. 240; 2 Ad. & E. 520; it does not avail to bar the statute. The possession of a life tenant and those claiming under him, or subject to his control, is not adverse to those entitled in remainder; 37 W. Va. 634. If the occupation is such and by such a person that it may be for the true owner, it will be presumed to be for him, unless it be shown that the adverse claimant gave notice that he held adversely and not in subordination; 1 Batt. Ch. 378; 5 Burr. 2604. And this notice must be clear and unequivocal. If the act of the tenant or adverse claimant may be a trespass as well as a disseisin, the true owner may elect which he will consider it, regardless of the wishes of the trespasser, who cannot be allowed to qualify his own wrong; 1 Burr. 60; 3 Pick. 575; 12 Mass. 325; 4 Mas. 329. So that if the adverse claimant sets up his trespasses as amounting to adverse possession, the owner may reply they are no disseisin, but trespasses only; while, on the other hand, the true owner may elect, if he please, for the sake of his remedy, to treat them as a disseisin; 19 Me. 383; 8 N. H. 67. This is called a disseisin by election, in distinction from a disseisin in fact, —a distinction which was taken for the benefit of the owner of the land. Whenever the act done of itself necessarily works an actual disseisin, it is a disseisin in fact: as, when a tenant for years or at will conveys in fee. On the other hand, those acts which are susceptible of being made a disseisin by election are no disseisin till the election of the owner makes them so; 1 Johns. Cas. 36.

Evidence of adverse possession must be strictly construed and every presumption is in favor of the true owner; 73 Wis. 463. The statute does not begin to run in favor of the possession of public land until the title passes from the United States; 97 Mo. 524; 50 Ark. 141; there is no adverse possession against the state; 84 Va. 701.

The claim by adverse possession must have some definite boundaries; 1 Metc. Mass. 528; 10 Johns. 447; 10 S. & R. 334; 4 Vt. 155; 3 H. & S. 13. There ought to be something to indicate to what extent the adverse possessor claims. A sufficient inclosure will establish the limits, without actual continued residence on the land; 3 S. & R. 291; 14 Johns. 405; 3 H. & M'H. 595; 10 Mass. 93; 4 Wheat. 213. But it must be an actual, visible, and substantial inclosure; 7 N. H. 436; 2 Aik. 364; 4 Bibb 455. An inclosure on three sides, by a trespasser as against the real owner, is not enough; 8 Me. 239; 5 Md. 256; nor is an unsubstantial brush fence; 10 N. H. 397; 39 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 747; nor one formed by the lapping of fallen trees; 3 Metc. Mass. 125; 2 Johns. 230. Natural barriers may be a sufficient enclosure; 75 Cal. 584. And where the claim is by possession only, without any color or pretence of title, it cannot extend beyond the actual limits of the inclosure; 3 H. & M'H. 621; 5 Conn. 305; 28 Vt. 142; 6 Ind. 273. And this must be fixed, not roving from part to part; 11 Pet. 53. Possession and occupancy of land not enclosed by a fence may be adverse; 71 Mich. 391.

Extension of the inclosure within the time limited will not give title to the part included in the extension; 2 H. & J. 391; 8 Ill. 238. Where, however, the claim rests upon color of title as well as possession, the possession will be regarded as coextensive with the powers described in the title-deed; 11 Pet. 41; 3 Mas. 330; 3 Ired. 578; 2 Ill. 181; 13 Johns. 406; 5 Dana 232; 4 Mass. 416; 23 Cal. 431; unless the acts or declarations of the occupant restrict it. But the constructive possession of land arising from color of title cannot be extended to that part of it whereof there is no actual adverse possession; 28 Pa. 124; 16 B. Monr. 472; 7 Watts 442; nor will a subsequent conflicting possession, whether under color of title or not, be extended by construction beyond the limits of the actual adverse possession for the purpose of defeating a prior constructive possession; 6 Cow. 677; 11 Vt. 521. Nor can there be any constructive adverse possession against the owner when there has been no actual possession which he could treat as a trespass and bring suit for; 3 Rich. 101. A trespasser who afterwards obtains color of title can claim constructively only from the time when the title was obtained; 16 Johns. 293. If one by mistake enclose the land of another, and claim it as his own to certain fixed monuments or boundaries, his actual and uninterrupted possession as owner for the statutory period will work a disseisin, and his title will be perfect; 25 Neb. 764; 75 Cal. 610; 87 Tenn. 575.

This doctrine of constructive possession, however, applies only to land taken possession of for the ordinary purpose of cultivation and use, and not to a case where a few acres are taken possession of in an uncultivated township for the mere purpose of thereby gaining title to the entire township; 22 Vt. 388; 1 Cow. 286; 6 B. Monr. 463; 14 Vt. 400.

In fine, with a little relaxation of strictness in the case of wild, remote, and uncultivated lands, the sort of possession necessary to acquire title is adverse, open, public, and notorious, and not clandestine and secret; possession, exclusive, uninterrupted, definite as to boundaries, and fixed as to its locality.

Color of title is anything in writing, however defective, connected with the title, which serves to define the extent of the claim; 2 Cai. 183; 21 How. 493; 30 Ill. 279; 34 Wis. 425; 16 N. H. 374; 19 Ga. 8; 17 Or. 532; and it may exist even without writing, if the facts and circumstances show clearly the character and extent of the claim; 17 Ill. 498; Ang. Lim. § 404.

It exists wherever there is a reasonable doubt regarding the validity of an apparent title, whether such doubt arises from the circumstances under which the land is held, the identity of the land conveyed, or the construction of the instrument under which the party in possession claims title; 148 U. S. 301.

A fraudulent deed, if accepted in good faith, gives color of title; 8 Pet. 244; so does a defective deed; 4 H. & M'H. 222; 6 Wisc. 527; unless defective in defining the limits of the land; 1 Cow. 276; so does an improperly executed deed, if the grantor believes he has title thereby; 6 Metc. 337; so does a sheriff's deed; 7 B. Monr. 236; 22 Ga. 56; 7 Hill 476; and a deed from a collector of taxes; 4 Ired. 164; 24 Ill. 577; 143 id. 265; 37 Neb. 353; 7 Wash. 617; 132 U. S. 239; unless defective on its face; 29 Wisc. 256; 97 Mo. 356; but see 77 Cal. 485; and a deed from an attorney who has no authority to convey; 2 Murph. 14; 28 N. Y. 9; and a deed founded on a voidable decree in chancery; 1 Meigs 207; and a deed, by one tenant in common, of the whole estate, to a third person; 4 D. & B. 54; 2 Head 674; and a deed by an infant; 4 D. & B. 289; And a deed made by a husband and wife of the wife's interest in a former husband's estate; 132 Ind. 546.

So possession, in good faith, under a void grant from the state, gives color of title; 4 Ga. 115. And if A purchases under an execution against B, takes a deed, and on the same day conveys to B, though the purchase and conveyance be at the request of B, and no money is paid, B has a colorable title; 4 D. & B. 201; 7 Humphr. 367. A will gives color of title; but if it has but one subscribing witness, and has never been proved, it does not; 5 Ired. 711. Nor does the sale by an administrator of the land of his solvent intestate, under a license of the probate court, unless accompanied by a deed from the administrator; 34 N. H. 544; 13 Md. 105. Nor does the sale of property by an intestate to his son, of which the possession is held by the wife, who is administratrix, while the son lives in the family, as against the intestate's creditors; 30 Miss. 472. A person taking possession under a judicial sale has color of title, though the judicial proceedings were void; 134 Ind. 238; 37 W. Va. 215.

If there is no written title, then the possession must be under a bona fide claim to a title existing in another; 3 Watts 72. Thus, if under an agreement for the sale of land the consideration be paid and the purchaser enter, he has color of title; 5 Metc. Mass. 173; 10 Fost. 531; 37 Miss. 138; 36 Ala. 308; 2 Strobh. 24; 12 Tex. 195; 17 Ga. 600; though if the consideration be not paid, or be paid only in part, he has not; 2 Bail. 59; 11 Ohio 455; 20 Ga. 311; 2 Dutch. 351; because the fair inference in such case is that the purchaser is in by consent of the grantor, and holds subordinately to him until the payment of the full consideration. There is, in fact, a mutual understanding, and a mutual confidence, amounting to an implied trust; 9 Wheat. 241; 12 Mass. 325; 1 Wash. C. C. 207; 1 Spear 291.

In New York, a parol gift of land is said not to give color of title; 1 Johns. Cas. 36; but it is at least doubtful if that is the law of New York; 6 Cow. 677; see also 5 id. 346; 8 id. 589; 9 id. 530. In a later case it is said that to avoid a deed given by one out of possession, the party in possession must hold adversely, "claiming under a title" and not "under a claim of title"; 39 Barb. 513. In some other states, a parol gift is held to give color of title if accompanied by actual entry and possession. It manifests, equally with a sale, the intent of the donee to enter, and not as tenant; and it equally proves an admission on the part of the donor that the possession is so taken; 13 Conn. 227; 2 B. Monr. 282; 39 Conn. 98; 52 Mo. 108; 37 Miss. 138; 15 Ark. 1; 4 Allen 425; 32 N. J. L. 239; but see, contra, 24 Ga. 494. The element of good faith, and the actual belief on the part of the claimant that he has title, give the claimant by color of title his advantage over the mere trespasser, who, as we have seen, is restricted carefully to his actual occupation; and it may be said, generally, that whenever the facts and circumstances show that one in possession, in good faith and in the belief that he has title, holds for himself and to the exclusion of all others; his possession must be adverse, and according to his assumed title, whatever may be his relations in point of interest or priority, to others; 5 Pet. 440; 1 Paine 467; 11 Pet. 41. When a man enters under such a claim of title, his entry on a part is an entry on the whole; but if he claims no such title he has no seisin by his entry but by the ouster of him who was seised, which can only be by the actual and exclusive occupation of the land; 4 Mass. 416. See Wood. Lim. § 259.

In cases of mixed possession, or a possession at the same time by two or more persons, each under a separate colorable title, the seisin is in him who has the better or prior title; 4 Wheat. 213; 20 How. 235; 3 Wend. 149; for, though there may be a concurrent possession, there cannot be a concurrent seisin; and, one only being seised, the possession must be adjudged to be in him, because he has the better right; 10 Mass. 151; 3 S. & R. 509; 1 D. & B. 5. Of course, in such a case, if one has color of title, and the other is a mere trespasser or intruder, the possession is in him who has color of title; 2 Harr. & J. 112; 4 S. & R. 465; 5 Du. 272. The possession of the true owner must prevail over the claim by constructive possession by one who holds under mere color of title; 69 Tex. 346. No length of possession of one partner of real estate paid for with partnership funds and conveyed to him, bars the other partners; 135 U. S. 621.

But, with all the liberality shown by the courts in giving color of title, it has been denied that a grant from a foreign government confers it, on the ground that the possession under such a title was rather a question between governments than individuals; 3 H. & McH. 621. Thus, the courts of New York have refused to recognize claims under a grant of the French government in Canada, made prior to the treaty between Great Britain and France in 1763; 4 Johns. 163; 12 id. 365; as conferring color of title. But the soundness of the exception has since been questioned in the same court; 8 Cow. 589; and the grant of another state has been expressly held to give color of title in Pennsylvania, even as against one claiming under her own grant; 2 Watts 37. For political reasons, it has been held that a grant from the Indians gives no color of title; 8 Wheat. 571; nor does a grant by an Indian in contravention of a statute; 41 Fed. Rep. 705; but a sheriff's deed for land in the Southern Confederacy was held to give color of title; 10 Fed. Rep. 531. See COLOR OF TITLE.

One joint-tenant, tenant in common, or coparcener cannot dismiss another but by actual ouster, as the seisin and possession of one are the seisin and possession of all, and inure to the benefit of all; 2 Salk. 422; 7 Wheat. 59; 12 Metc. 357; 11 Gratt. 505; 3 S. & R. 381; 4 Day 478; 116 Ind. 103; 16 Or. 173; actual ouster implies exclusion or expulsion. No force is necessary; but there must be a denial of the right of the cotenant; 5 Burr. 2604; 9 Cow. 530; 22 Tex. 668; 1 Me. 89; 12 Wend. 404; and, like a grant, after long lapse of time it may be presumed; 1 East 568; 3 Metc. 101; 29 Wisc. 226; and inferred from acts of an unequivocal character importing a denial; 3 Watts 77; 1 Me. 89; 3 A. K. Marsh. 77; 97 Mo. 426; 16 Or. 173; 37 Minn. 388; 82 Va. 759; 98 N. C. 307; 78 Ga. 142; 74 Iowa 359; but the possession of the grantee of one tenant in common is adverse to all; 13 B. Monr. 436; 4 Paige 178.

The possession of the tenant is likewise the possession of his landlord, and cannot be adverse unless he distinctly renounce his landlord's title; 2 Campb. 11; 2 Binn. 468; 10 N. Y. 9; 3 Pet. 43; 6 Watts 500; 7 Mont. 288; 84 Ala. 598; id. 208; 112 N. Y. 263; 40 La. Ann. 633; 70 Tex. 547.

Mere non-payment of rent during the time limited, there having been no demand, does not prejudice the landlord's right to enter and demand it, even though the lease contains a clause giving the right of reentry in case of non-payment of rent; 5 Cow. 123; 7 East 299; see 110 N. Y. 537; and payment of rent is conclusive evidence that the occupation of the party paying was permissive and not adverse; 3 B. & C. 135; 12 L. J. N. S. Q. B. 236. The defendant in execution after a sale is a quasi tenant at will to the purchaser; and his possession is not therefore adverse; 1 Johns. Cas. 153; 3 Mass. 128. And a mere holding over after the expiration of a lease does not change the character of the possession; 2 Gill & J. 173; nor does the assignment of the lease, or a sub-letting. The assignee and sub-lessees are still tenants, so far as the title by adverse possession is concerned; 4 S. & R. 467; 3 Pet. 43; 6 Cow. 751.

If the tenant convey the premises, as we have before seen, the landlord may treat the grantee as a disseisor by election; but the grantee cannot set up the act as the basis of a title by adverse possession; 5 Cow. 123; unless in the case where the relation of landlord and tenant subsists by operation of law; as where one makes a grant and by the omission of the word "heirs" an estate for life only passes. In such case, after the death of the tenant for life an adverse possession may commence; 7 Cow. 323. So in case the tenant has attorned to a third person and the landlord has assented to the attornment; 6 Cow. 133; 4 How. 289; 10 Sm. & M. 440; 4 Gilm. 336. But a mere parol disclaimer, by the lessor, of the existence of the relationship, and of all right in the premises, is not equivalent to an attornment. To admit such disclaimer would lead to fraud and perjury, and is in direct violation of the principles of the statute of frauds; 7 Johns. 186; 5 Cow. 74; but see 13 S. & R. 133.

The possession of one's agent is, within the purview of the statute of limitation, the possession of his principal; 37 Neb. 353. See 112 Mo. 527; 147 U. S. 508.

The possession of the mortgagor is not adverse to the mortgagee (the relation being in many respects analogous to that of landlord and tenant); 3 Pet. 43; 4 Cra. 415; 11 Mass. 125; 30 Miss. 49; 27 Pa. 504; Dougl. 275; see 112 Mo. 527; not even if the possession be under an absolute deed, if intended as a mortgage; 19 How. 289. The relation of mortgagor and mortgagee is very peculiar and sui generis. It is sometimes like a tenancy for years; Cro. Jac. 659; sometimes like a tenancy at will; Dougl. 275; and sometimes like a tenancy on sufferance; 1 Salk. 245; but, whatever it may be like, it is always presumed to be by permission of the mortgagee until the contrary be shown. The assignee of the mortgagor, with notice, is in the same predicament as the mortgagor; but if he purchase without notice, and particularly if the mortgage be forfeited at the date of his purchase, his possession will be adverse; 19 Vt. 526; 6 B. Mon. 479; 2 Sandf. 686; 34 Mo. 285; 32 Miss. 312; 19 How. 289.

But, although the possession of the mortgagor be not adverse so as to give title under the statute against the mortgagee, the courts have nevertheless practically abrogated this rule, by holding that where the mortgagor has held during the statutory limit, and has meantime paid no interest nor otherwise recognized the rights of the mortgagee, this raises a presumption that the debt has been paid, and is a good defence in an action to foreclose; 12 Johns. 242; 9 Wheat. 497; 8 Metc. 87. And the reasons for so holding seem to be equally cogent with those upon which rests the well-settled rule that, with certain exceptions, the mortgagee's possession for the time limited bars the mortgagor's right to redeem; 2 J. & W. 434; 6 E. L. & Eq. 355; 1 Johns. Ch. 385; 9 Wheat. 489; 3 Harr. & M'H. 328; 2 Sumn. 401; 13 Ala. 246; 20 Me. 269.

The exceptions to this rule are—first, where an account has been settled within the limited time; 2 Vern. 377; 5 Bro. C. C. 187; 5 Johns. Ch. 522; second, where within that time the mortgagee, by words spoken or written, or by deed, has clearly and unequivocally recognized the fact that he held as mortgagee; 2 Bro. 397; 1 Sim. & Stu. 347; 1 Johns. Ch. 594; 10 Wheat. 152; 3 Sumn. 160; by which recognition a subsequent purchaser, with actual or constructive notice of the mortgage, is barred; 7 Paige Ch. 465; third, where no time is fixed for payment, as in the case of a mortgage where the mortgagee is by agreement to enter and hold till he is paid out of the rents and profits; 1 Vt. 418; fourth, where the mortgagor continues in possession of the whole or of any part of the premises; Sel. Cas. Ch. 55; 1 Johns. Ch. 594; 1 Neb. 342; and, fifth, where there is fraud on the part of the mortgagee, or at the time of the inception of the mortgage he has taken advantage of the necessities of the mortgagor; 1 Johns. Cas. 402, 595; 2 Cruise 161.

The trustee of real estate, under an express trust, as well as of personal, as we have seen, holds for his cestui que trust, and the latter is not barred of his right unless it be denied and repudiated by the trustee; in which case the statute will begin to run from the denial or repudiation; 5 How. 233; 3 Gray 1; 2 M'Lean 376; 32 W. Va. 184; 126 Ill. 58. In cases of implied, constructive, and resulting trusts, the rule is also the same as with reference to personal property. The statute is a bar even in cases where the conduct of the trustee was originally fraudulent; 5 Johns. Ch. 184; 17 Ves. 151; 2 Bro. C. C. 488.

Where a trustee who holds the legal title to the trust property, permits his right to bring an ejectment for a certain part thereof to become barred, the beneficiary is also barred; 113 Mo. 188.

The lapse of time does not bar a defense resting upon an equitable title and possession; 38 Fed. Rep. 65; and staleness of demand cannot be urged against a right to relief in equity where plaintiff has been in continuous possession of the land; 99 N. C. 436.

The same general rules as regards persons under disabilities apply in cases of real estate as have already been described as applicable to personalty at the time the right descends or the cause of action accrues, and prevent the running of the statute, till their removal; but only such as existed at that time. When the statute once begins to run, no subsequent disability can stop it; 1 How. 37; 4 Mass. 182; 16 Johns. 513; 1 Wheat. 292; 2 Binn. 374; 126 Pa. 643; and there is no distinction in this respect between voluntary and involuntary disabilities; 4 Term 301; 3 Brev. 286. The disability of one joint-tenant, tenant in common, or co-parcener does not inure to the benefit of the other tenants; 8 Johns. 262, 265; 2 Taunt. 441; 10 Ohio 11; 10 Ga. 218; 5 Humphr. 117; 4 Strobh. Eq. 167; 13 S. & R. 350.

It is impracticable here to give a compend, or even an analysis, of the different statutes of the several states. Nor, indeed, would such an analysis be of much service because of the frequent revision, changes, and modifications. The state statutes are substantially the same, differing only in details, and all are derived directly or indirectly from the English statutes.

The English Statutes of Limitations, 21 James I. c. 16 and 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, and a synopsis of that of 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 27, are printed in the last preceding edition of this work but are now necessarily omitted. A collection of the American and English statutes may be found in Wood, Limitations 2d ed. App'x.

Of Criminal Proceedings. The time within which indictments may be found, or other proceedings commenced, for crimes and offences varies considerably in the different jurisdictions. In general, in all jurisdictions, the length of time is adjusted in some proportion to the gravity of the offence. Indictments for murder, in most, if not all, of the states, may be found at any time during the life of the criminal after the death of the victim. Proceedings for less offences are to be commenced within periods varying from ten years to sixty days. See Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 316.

Although an offence on the face of the indictment is barred, yet the prosecution may prove, without averring it in the indictment, that the defendant, having fled the state, was without the statute. But the better practice is to aver in the indictment the facts relied upon to toll the statute; 23 W. N. C. Pa. 464 (S. C. of Pa.).

Of Estates. A description either by express words or by intendment of law of the continuance of time for which the property is to be enjoyed, marking the period at which the time of enjoyment is to end. Prest. Est. 25.

The definition or circumscription, in any conveyance, of the interest which the grantee is intended to take.

The term is used by different writers in different senses. Thus, it is used by Coke to denote the express definition of an estate by the words of its creation, so that it cannot endure for any longer time than till the contingency happens upon which the estate is to fail; Co. Litt. 23 b. In Sanders on Uses, 68, the term is used, however, in a broader and more general sense, as given in the second definition above. And, indeed, the same writers do not always confine themselves to one use of the term; see Fearne, Cont. Rem. Butler's note n, 9th ed. 10; 1 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 364, 527. For the distinctions between limitations and remainders, see CONDITIONAL LIMITATIONS; CONTINGENT REMAINDER.

In instruments. A limitation in an instrument is a provision that restricts the interest or property one may have in the subject-matter of such instrument. A. & E. Encyc.

LIMITED ADMINISTRATION. An administration of a temporary character, granted for a particular period, or a special or a particular purpose. 1 Wms., Ex., 8th ed. 486.

LIMITED COMPANY. A company in which the liability of each shareholder is limited by the number of shares he has taken, so that he cannot be called on to contribute beyond the amount of his shares. See 1 Lindl. Part. 383; Mozl. & W. Dict.; JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

LIMITED LIABILITY. A principle of modern statutory law whereby those interested in a partnership or joint stock company are held liable only to the extent of their own interest in the business. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY; PARTNERSHIP.

The phrase is also used in a less technical and more colloquial sense as applied to restrictions of the liability of certain classes of common carriers, such as steamship, express, or telegraph companies, either by statute or contract.

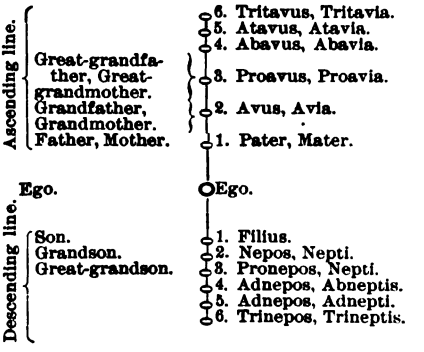
LIMITED OWNER. A tenant for life, in tail, or by the curtesy. The Limited Owner's Residences Acts, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 56 and 34 & 35 Vict. c. 84, enable the tenant for life of a settled estate to charge the estate with the expense of building a mansion house. Whart. Lex.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIP. A form of partnership created by statute in many of the United States, wherein the liability of certain special partners, who contribute a specific amount of capital, is limited to the amount so contributed, while the general partners are jointly and severally responsible as in ordinary partnership. All the partners are liable as general partners, unless the statutes upon the subject are strictly, or as some cases say, substantially complied with; 5 Allen 91; 39 Barb. 283; 3 Col. 342; 67 Pa. 330; 62 N. Y. 513; 28 Abb. N. C. 89. See 151 Pa. 79; 1 Lindl. Partn. 383, n., 2d Am. ed. (Ewell) 201, n.; Pars. Part. 424.

One who aids and assists in the organization of a limited partnership cannot thereafter hold the members liable as general partners, upon the ground that such organization was defective; 147 Pa. 111. See PARTNERSHIP.

LINCOLN'S INN. See INNS OF COURT.

LINE. In Descents. The series of persons who have descended from a common ancestor, placed one under the other, in the order of their birth. It connects successively all the relations by blood to each other. See CONSANGUINITY; DEGREE.



The line is either direct or collateral. The direct line is composed of all the persons who are descended from each other. If, in the direct line, any one person is assumed as the propositus, in order to count from him upwards and downwards, the line will be divided into two parts, the ascending and descending lines. The ascending line is that which, counting from the propositus, ascends to his ancestors, to his father, grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. The descending line is that which, counting from the same person, descends to his children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, etc. The preceding table is an example.

The collateral line, considered by itself and in relation to the common ancestor, is a direct line; it becomes collateral when placed alongside of another line below the common ancestor, in whom both lines unite. For example:—

These two lines are independent of each other; they have no connection except by their union in the person of the common ancestor. This reunion is what forms the relation among the persons composing the two lines.

A line is also paternal or maternal. In the examination of a person's ascending line, the line ascends first to his father, next to his paternal grandfather, his paternal great-grandfather, etc., so on from father to father; this is called the paternal line. Another line will be found to ascend from the same person to his mother, his maternal grandmother, and so from mother to mother; this is the maternal line. These lines, however, do not take in all the ascendants; there are many others who must be imagined. The number of ascendants is double at each degree, as is shown by the following diagram:—

See 2 Bla. Com. 200, b.; Pothier, Des Successions, c. 1, art. 3, § 2; ASCENDANTS; CONSANGUINITY.

In Real Property Law. The division between two tracts or parcels of land. Limit; border; boundary.

When a line is mentioned in a deed as ending at a particular monument (q. v.), it is to be extended in the direction called for, without regard to distance, till it reaches the boundary: 1 Tayl. 110, 303; 2 Hawks 219. See 106 Mo. 231; 109 N. C. 417. And a marked line is to be adhered to although it depart from the course; 7 Wheat. 7; 4 T. B. Monr. 29; 2 Bibb 261. A crooked line is just as much a line as a straight one; 7 Halst. 308. Ordinarily, if a boundary runs to or by the line of an object, the exterior limit of the object is intended; 141 Mass. 56.

Where a number of persons settle simultaneously or at short intervals in the same neighborhood, and their tracts, if extended in certain directions, would overlap each other, the settlers sometimes by agreement determine upon dividing lines, which are called consentible lines. These lines, when fairly agreed upon, have been sanctioned by the courts; and such agreements are conclusive upon all persons claiming under the parties to them, with notice, but not upon bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, actual or constructive; 3 S. & R. 323; 17 id. 57; 9 W. & S. 66. See PARALLEL LINES.

Lines fixed by compact between nations are binding on their citizens and subjects; 11 Pet. 209; 1 Ves. Sen. 450; 1 Atk. 2; 2 id. 592; 1 Ch. Cas. 85; 1 P. Wms. 723; 3 S. & R. 331. See BOUNDARIES.

Measures. A line is a lineal measure, containing the one-twelfth part of an inch.

LINE OF DUTY. Where a statute provides for a pension for disability or death from wound or injury received, casualty occurring, or disease contracted in the line of duty, "the performance of duty must have relation, or causation, or consociation, mediate or immediate, to the wound, injury, casualty, or disease." Opinion of Atty. Gen. Cushing, 2 Dec. Dept. Int. on Pensions 401, where the meaning of the phrase and the whole subject are very fully discussed.

LINES AND CORNERS. In deeds and surveys. Boundary-lines and their angles with each other. 17 Miss. 459; 21 Ala. 66; 10 Gratt. 445; 16 Ga. 141.

LINEA RECTA (Lat.). The perpendicular line; the direct line. The line of ascent, through father, grandfather, etc., and of descent, through son, grandson, etc. Co. Litt. 10, 158; Bract. fol. 67; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 1, § 11. This is represented in a diagram by a vertical line.

Where a person springs from another immediately, or mediately through a third person, they are said to be in the direct line (linea recta), and are called ascendants and descendants. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 129.

LINEA TRANSVERSALIS (Lat.). A line crossing the perpendicular lines. See COLLATERAL KINSMAN.

LINEAGE. Race; progeny; family, ascending or descending.

LINEAL. In a direct line.

Lineal descent would be as from father or grandfather to son or grandson. 6 Pet. 112.

LINEAL WARRANTY. See WARRANTY.

LINEN. A thread or cloth made of flax or hemp. 38 Fed. Rep. 98. See 1 Blatch. 501. In an insurance policy where one insures his stock in trade, household furniture, linen, wearing apparel, and plate, linen in the policy is confined to household linen or linen used by way of apparel; 3 Camp. 422. In a bequest the clause "all my clothes and linen" passes body linen only; 3 Bro. Ch. 311. A bequest of "some of my best linen" was held void for uncertainty; 2 P. Wms. 387.

LINK. A single constituent part of a continuous and connected series, as a casual or logical sequence; as a link in a chain of evidence. Stand. Dict.

LIQUIDATE. To pay; to settle; to adjust and gradually extinguish all indebtedness. See 8 Wheat. 322.

LIQUIDATED ACCOUNT. One the amount of which is agreed upon by the parties, or fixed by operation of law. 23 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 924; 15 Ga. 321; 43 Conn. 469; 20 id. 562.

LIQUIDATED DAMAGES. In Practice. Damages the amount of which has been determined by anticipatory agreement between the parties.

Damages for a specific sum stipulated or agreed upon as part of a contract, as the amount to be paid to a party who alleges and proves a breach of it.

Where there is an agreement between parties for the doing or not doing particular acts, the parties may, if they please, estimate beforehand the damages to result from a breach of the agreement, and prescribe in the agreement itself the sum to be paid by either by way of damages for such breach. See 1 H. Bla. 282; 2 B. & P. 335, 350; 2 Bro. P. C. 431; 4 Burr. 2225; 2 Term 32. The civil law appears to recognize such stipulations; Inst. 3. 16. 7; Toullier l. 3, n. 809; La. Civ. Code Art. 1928, n. 5; Code Civile 1152, 1153.

Such a stipulation on the subject of damages differs from a penalty in this, that the parties are holden by it: whereas a penalty is regarded as a forfeiture, from which the defaulting party can be relieved.

It is settled both at law and in equity that the courts will not go behind an agreement for liquidated damages, but that a penalty is only security for the sum due or damages actually sustained; 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 394. The word penalty in this contradistinction is not used according to its exact definition, but has acquired a settled technical meaning; id. note.

The sum named in an agreement as damages to be paid in case of a breach will, in general, be considered as liquidated damages, or as a penalty, according to the intent of the parties; and the mere use of the words "penalty" or "liquidated damages" will not be decisive of the question, if on the whole the instrument discloses a different intent; 6 B. & C. 216; 6 Ired. 186; 78 Me. 32; 2 Ala. N. S. 425; 8 Mo. 467; 69 N. Y. 45; 4 H. & N. 511; 47 Kan. 126; 47 Ill. App. 153; 76 Ala. 418; 86 Ill. 107; 64 Ia. 308; 58 Md. 261; 58 N. H. 326; 45 N. J. L. 525. See 68 Law T. 857; 125 N. Y. 200. It has been said, however, that if the parties use the word "penalty," it will control the interpretation of the contract; 3 B. & P. 630; 7 Wheat. 13; 38 N. Y. 75; 13 N. H. 275; but in 16 N. Y. 469, the sum named was stated to be "liquidated damages," but was held to be a penalty. Whether the sum mentioned in the agreement to be paid for a breach is to be treated as a penalty or as liquidated damages is a question of law, to be determined by the court upon a consideration of the whole instrument; 7 C. B. 716. The construction must be the same in law and equity; 5 H. L. C. 105. The tendency of the court is to regard the sum named as a penalty rather than liquidated damages; 5 Metc. Mass. 57; 2 B. & P. 346; 97 Mass. 445; yet courts seek to ascertain the intent and are governed by it; id. As to the distinction, see also 6 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 470; 30 Am. Rep. 28.

Such a stipulation in an agreement will be considered as a penalty, in the following cases:—

Where the parties in the agreement have expressly declared it or described it as a "penalty," and no other intent is clearly to be deduced from the instrument; 2 B. & P. 340, 350, 630; 7 Wheat. 14; 1 M'Mull. 106; 2 Ala. N. S. 425; 1 Pick. 451; 3 Johns. Cas. 297; 24 Vt. 97; 164 Mass. 457.

Where it is doubtful from the language of the instrument whether the stipulation was intended as a penalty or as liquidated damages; 3 C. & P. 240; 6 Humph. 186; 5 Sandf. 192; 24 Vt. 97; 16 Ill. 475.

Where the agreement was evidently made for the attainment of another object or purpose, to which the stipulation is wholly collateral; 11 Mass. 488; 1 Bro. C. C. 418; 11 App. Div. N. Y. 378.

Where the agreement imposes several distinct duties, or obligations of different degrees of importance, and yet the same sum is named as damages for a breach of either indifferently; 6 Bingh. 141; 7 Scott 364; 5 Sandf. 192; 21 Ore. 194; 77 Ill. 452; 41 Minn. 522; 40 Wis. 503. But see 7 Johns. 72; 15 id. 200; 9 N. Y. 551; 77 Ill. 452; 7 Nev. 339; L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 731; and see 19 Centr. L. J. 282, 302; where many authorities are collected.

Where the agreement is not under seal, and the damages are capable of being certainly known and estimated; 2 B. & Ald. 704; 6 B. & C. 216; 4 Dall. 150; 5 Cow. 144; 33 Neb. 126. See 95 Ill. 190; 90 U. S. 471.

Where the instrument provides that a larger sum shall be paid upon default to pay a lesser sum in the manner prescribed; 5 Sandf. 192, 640; 16 Ill. 400; 47 id. 41; 14 Ark. 329; 2 B. & P. 346. This case is said to be considered as settling the doctrine of liquidated damages in England; 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 398; and it is cited approvingly in 6 Ves. 815, and the doctrine applied in 6 Bingh. 141, 147. In the latter case, Tindal, C. J., said, "that a very large sum should become immediately payable in consequence of the non-payment of a very small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty, appears to be a contradiction in terms; the case being precisely that in which courts of equity have always relieved, and against which courts of law have in modern times endeavored to relieve by directing juries to assess the real damages sustained by the breach of the agreement." See also 12 U. C. C. P. 9; 1 Bond 319.

Where the stipulation is made in respect of a matter certain in value, as the payment of a debt or liquidated money demand, and the sum fixed upon is greater than the debt or demand; L. R. 8 Ch. 1022. If a debt be secured by a stipulation that in case of its not being paid at the appointed time, a larger sum shall become payable, the stipulation for the larger sum is in the nature of a penalty; L. R. 4 H. L. 1; Leake, Contr. 3d ed. 939.

Where a sum named is evidently to evade usury laws or statutory prohibitions, it will be treated as a penalty; 10 Mich. 188; 26 Ga. 403; but see 35 Ill. 324.

Where, by a clause in a building contract, the builder, in default of the completion of the work at a certain time, agreed to pay the owner of the property a stipulated sum for every day the building was delayed after that time, it was held to be a penalty and not an agreement to pay liquidated damages; 113 Mo. 359; but see 55 N. J. L. 132; 57 Ark. 168.

The plaintiff as well as the defendant may show that a stipulated sum is to be considered a penalty and not liquidated damages, and he may prove the actual damages even if greater than the penalty; 60 N. Y. 408.

The stipulation will be sustained as liquidated damages in the following cases:—

Where the agreement is of such a nature that the damages are uncertain, and are not capable of being ascertained by any satisfactory and known rule; 13 M. & W. 702; 1 Ex. 665; 8 Mass. 223; 87 id. 304; 101 id. 334; 12 Barb. 137, 366; 14 Ark. 315; 2 Ohio St. 519; L. R. 15 Eq. 36; 85 Ala. 552; 91 Tenn. 154; Add. Contr. 267; 36 Wis. 277; 14 Me. 250; 76 Ill. 157; 13 N. H. 351; 147 Pa. 416.

Where, under the contract, a deposit is made of a sum to be forfeited in case of default, it will be considered liquidated damages; 21 Ch. Div. 243; 99 Pa. 560; 70 Tex. 442; but this was held to be so only if the deposit was a part performance and not as security; 122 N. Y. 397.

Under contracts not to carry on a particular business within specified limits of time and place, a sum named to be paid on default is liquidated damages; 79 Pa. 336; 100 Ind. 466; 97 Mass. 445; 49 Vt. 392; 40 Ch. Div. 112; 69 Ga. 764; 110 Cal. 674; but not where the contract describes it as a "penalty"; 164 Mass. 584.

Where, in contracts for government work, provision was made for the retention of percentages, to be forfeited on non-completion, it was treated as a provision for liquidated damages; 30 Ct. Cl. 31; and so were such provisions in a building contract; 13 Wash. 364; and in one for refitting a barge $50 for each day's delay, designated in the contract a "fine," where the fair rental value of the boat was $40 per day; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 863; and generally under contracts for the payment of such daily sum upon failure of completion; 163 Mass. 10; 87 Tex. 440; 56 Ark. 405; 28 Ont. 195; 55 N. J. L. 132; but a similar provision in a contract for railroad ties was held a penalty; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 328; and see 29 Neb. 385.

Where, from the tenor of the agreement or from the nature of the case, it appears that the parties have ascertained the amount of damages by fair calculation and adjustment; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1318; 2 Greenl. Ev. 259; 1 Bingh. 302; 7 Conn. 291; 11 N. H. 234; 6 Blackf. 206; 13 Wend. 507; 10 Mass. 459; 2 Ala. N. S. 425; 14 Me. 250; 49 Mo. 406.

Where a bond was given in the penal sum of $10,000 upon condition not to practise as a physician and in case of breach, to pay $500 for every month in which he practised, the $10,000 was held to be a penalty and the $500 stipulated damages; 4 Wend. 468. See 21 N. J. L. 463.

See, as to the distinguishing tests of liquidated damages and penalty, 5 Sandf. 192.

The following has been suggested as a general rule governing the whole subject: "Whenever the damages were evidently the subject of calculation and adjustment between the parties and a certain sum was agreed upon and intended as compensation, and is in fact reasonable in amount, it will be allowed by the court as liquidated damages." 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 405. To establish a liquidation of damages there must concur all the necessary elements of a valid contract, assent of parties, consideration and performance of the condition, if any; 37 N. J. L. 23. The intent of the parties must be clear, but it must appear from the contract; 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 406. The question of penalty or liquidated damages is a matter of law for the court; 1 Tayl. Ev. Chamb. ed. § 40; 7 C. B. 713. The liquidation must be reasonable; 40 Mich. 517; 13 Abb. N. S. 427; 12 Bush 249; 106 Pa. 237; hence the contract is not conclusive so far as that it would be permitted to violate this principle; 5 Mich. 123.

The penal sum in a bond is usually a penalty, but if a sum be agreed upon in the condition of a bond to be payable upon a breach, the question may arise whether it is liquidated damages or a penalty, and it will be subject to the same principles of construction as in any other forms of contract; Leake, Contr. 3d ed. 938, 1091; 2 Ves. Sen. 530. See 5 H. L. C. 105.

Where the language used is explicit, the extravagance of the sum named as liquidated damages will not be considered; 5 Sandf. 192; 11 Rich. 550. See 145 Pa. 606; 5 Sandf. 192; 75 Pa. 157; 70 Tex. 442; [1892] 1 Q. B. 127.

Some discussion has arisen as to whether the question of liquidated damages is involved in alternative contracts to do a certain thing or pay a certain sum. In such cases what is known as the rule of least beneficial alternative is applied and damages are given upon the theory that the defendant, if he performed, would have chosen the least onerous obligation; L. R. 8 C. P. 475; but in such a case it has been held that a defendant, having failed to exercise his option, must pay the sum as stipulated damages; 24 Wend. 244; 26 id. 630; 58 Md. 261; 7 Metc. 583. But see 47 Kan. 146 and note to it, 13 L. R. A. 671.

See, generally, 12 Am. L. Rev. 287; 1 Am. Dec. 331; Sedgw. Dam. ch. XII.; 13 L. R. A. 671, note; Sutherland; Mayne, Damages; 18 Myer, Fed. Dec. 744; 18 Cent. L. J. 143; 4 Silvern. Sup. Ct. N. Y. 579.

LIQUIDATED DEBT. A debt is such when it is certain what is due and how much is due. 20 Ga. 561.

LIQUIDATED DEMAND. A demand the amount of which has been ascertained or settled by agreement of the parties, or otherwise. 20 Ga. 53.

LIQUIDATION. A fixed and determinate valuation of things which before were uncertain.

LIQUOR LAWS. Laws regulating, prohibiting, or taxing the sale of intoxicating liquors.

The term liquor, when used in a statute prohibiting its sale, refers only to spirituous or intoxicating liquors; 18 N. J. L. 311; 20 Barb. 246; 3 Den. 407. Alcohol is held not an intoxicating liquor; 39 Ark. 216; contra, 81 Ga. 753. Within the meaning of a statute restricting the sale of ardent or vinous spirits of any kind, alcohol is included; 34 Ark. 340; contra, 70 Miss. 241. Where a statute defines intoxicating liquor as including alcohol, etc., its sale is unlawful, however much it may be diluted; 76 Ia. 243; and so where no liquor is sold except alcohol, it being sold in the shape of toddy, punch, etc., and drunk on the premises; 43 Ark. 151.

Ale is held an intoxicating liquor; 12 Mo. 407; 2 Coldw. 323; 63 N. Y. 277; 53 Ind. 162 (contra, 20 Barb. 246; 44 N. H. 511); see 30 Conn. 55; 105 Mass. 480; beer; 14 Ohio 586; 16 Mo. 389; 21 N. Y. 473; 73 Ia. 98; 38 Ark. 656; 55 Ala. 159; 11 R. I. 592; 90 Ill. 218. (See BEER; JUDICIAL NOTICE.) Whisky; 23 Fla. 267; 25 Kan. 751; brandy; 30 Conn. 55; 12 Mo. 407; blackberry brandy; 100 Ind. 598; rum and gin; 30 Conn. 55; 12 Mo. 407; 2 Gray 514; toddy or sling made with brandy or gin mixed with sugar and water; 10 Metc. 14; cocktails; 23 Fla. 398; wine; 28 Ia. 467; 4 Hun 520; 12 Mo. 407; 120 Pa. 395. Champagne is included within a statute forbidding credit for liquors; 50 N. C. 428.

Medicated bitters producing intoxication are intoxicating liquors where the compound is reasonably liable to be used as an intoxicating beverage; 21 Tex. App. 353; 36 Ark. 258; 103 Mass. 452; 25 Kan. 757; 80 Mo. 303; but not where their use as a beverage is rendered practically impossible by reason of other ingredients; 87 Ala. 17; or where made and sold in good faith for medicinal purposes; 33 Vt. 656.

The test whether roots and tinctures change liquor into medicine is whether liquor loses its distinctive character by their introduction so that it is no longer desirable as a beverage; 38 Ia. 426. See 20 L. R. A. 645. The question what are vinous, spirituous, malt, or brewed liquors is one of fact for the jury; 122 Pa. 299.

The legislature of a state has plenary power over the matter of licensing the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and it may, in its discretion, fix the terms on which the license shall be granted; 64 Miss. 59; 93 Mo. 606. The intendment of law which grants such discretionary powers to license boards is that the discretionary decision shall be the result of examination and consideration; that it shall constitute a discharge of official duty and not a mere expression of personal will; 8 Mackey 99. The discretion must be a sound, legal one according to the requirements of the people, having regard to the location and the requirements of the public; 89 N. C. 171; it must be based upon the circumstances of each particular case as presented to the court, and not biased by general opinions as to the propriety of such licenses; 72 Pa. 200; favoritism and monopoly must be avoided; 103 Ill. 552; and it must not be used in an arbitrary manner; 3 Bush 147; 2 Duv. 546; 138 Ill. 401; 59 Mich. 78; 33 Fed. Rep. 117; 138 Pa. 116. It will not be assumed that the court acted in such a manner; 61 Conn. 39. Discretion cannot be used to grant licenses to act retrospectively in order to condone an offence previously committed; 22 Ark. 253. Where no discretion is given by a municipal ordinance as to the number and locality of liquor shops, it is held that the authorities can exercise none; 138 Ill. 401; see 33 Fed. Rep. 117; but where discretion is conferred, a license may be refused where the locality is already overcrowded with liquor shops; 16 N. Y. Supp. 498. Such a board must, however, consider all the merits before it can legally refuse a license; 4 Misc. Rep. 6.

A license court may not bargain with an applicant and exact a promise as a condition; nor refuse a license to one because "he made a promise last year not to apply for a license this year"; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 1.

A statute authorizing county councils to create excise boards, which, when created, shall be vested with certain well defined powers, is not a delegation of powers, as such powers are vested by the statute in the board to be created; 42 N. J. L. 74; but when the licensing power is expressly conferred upon the council, it cannot be delegated to the mayor by ordinance; 72 Ill. 462; nor can county commissioners with statutory authority to license a saloon, confer that power on a county attorney; 16 Minn. 381; or upon the clerk of the board; 77 Ga. 662.

When the performance of an act rests, by statute, on the discretion of a person or depends on the exercise of personal judgment, mandamus will not lie to compel its performance; 59 Md. 283; 29 La. Ann. 264; 64 Mich. 597; 21 Fla. 1; 43 Ohio St. 652; 78 Ga. 120; 34 Ark. 394; and where there is no ordinance rendering it a legal obligation to grant a license, a mandamus will not lie to compel its issuance; 3 Ill. App. 465; see 119 Ind. 194; 141 Mass. 23 (distinguishing 136 id. 50); 93 Mo. 499; 12 Neb. 54; 1 Hill 655; 107 N. C. 335; 72 Pa. 200; a court will not review on certiorari the refusal of a board of excise commissioners to grant a license, where its action was not upon illegal grounds; 23 N. Y. S. 695.

A license to sell liquors is a privilege and not property, and the forfeiture of a license does not deprive the licensee of property without due process of law; 13 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 197; it cannot be levied upon by the sheriff and sold; 6 Dist. Rep. Pa. 408; nor can it be transferred unless such transfer is approved by the authorities empowered to grant licenses; 125 Pa. 412.

Within the meaning of an act prescribing the qualifications of the person licensed, the word person is held not to embrace an incorporated club, and the sales of liquor by a bona fide social club with limited membership, the property of which is actually owned by its members, and admission to which cannot be obtained by persons at pleasure, are held not illegal, within the prohibition against sales by unlicensed persons; 28 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 604; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 113; 15 Va. L. J. 226; the general rule seems to be that clubs are not subject to the license laws; 55 Md. 566; L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 373; 146 Mass. 139; as the furnishing of liquors to the members and their friends at a club house is no more a violation of the law than it would be if such entertainment were given at a private house; 20 N. Y. S. R. 409; citing 145 Mass. 119. In Pennsylvania it is held that in view of the fact that clubs had openly and notoriously furnished liquors to the members thereof for a long period of years before the license law was passed, the supposition is that if the legislature had intended to prohibit the practice, it would have done so in direct terms; 177 Pa. 224. But other cases have held that clubs are subject to the license laws; 48 Ind. 21; 74 Mich. 250; 115 N. Y. 427; 79 Ill. 85; 7 Lea 291; 59 Ala. 34, where the steward was punished as an unlicensed seller of intoxicating liquor. And they have been required to pay the license tax imposed upon retailers; 92 Ky. 309; 41 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 908; 12 So. Rep. (Ala.) 895; 69 Miss. 218. Any sale by a club to its members in violation of a prohibition or local option law is illegal; 73 Md. 97; 95 N. C. 633; and the club is subjected to the annulment of its charter; 73 Md. 97. Even a bona fide social club cannot sell on Sunday to persons not members; 153 Pa. 502.

The steward of a social club which is run as a cover for the sale of liquor without license may be punished in the same manner as the bar-tender of an unlicensed saloon; 148 Pa. 552.

A sale of intoxicating liquor to a habitual drunkard, after notification from his wife, in violation of a statute making such sale a misdemeanor, is such negligence as to enable the wife to maintain an action for injuries to him resulting from such sale; 97 Tenn. 220. Under the Illinois statutes all who furnish intoxicating liquors which contribute to the habit of drunkenness are liable for injuries resulting from habitual intoxication; 67 Ill. App. 404; and it was held that a parent had a right of action against a liquor seller and his bondsmen, both for the death of a minor son caused by intoxication resulting from the sale of liquor to him, and also for loss of his services; 48 Neb. 852. A mother who is injured in her means of support by the death of her son through intoxication may recover from the owner of the premises on which the liquor was sold, the premises having been leased for the purpose of liquor-selling; 90 Hun 43. See CIVIL DAMAGE ACTS.

Where there are statutory provisions against the sale of liquor to minors, it is no excuse that the vendor is ignorant that the buyer is a minor, even if he attempts to ascertain the truth before furnishing the liquor; 127 Pa. 330; 4 Dist. Rep. (Pa.) 461; or if the minor made affidavit that he was of age; 60 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 853; but it is held that the vendor's knowledge of the purchaser's minority must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 23.

Where the minor brings a written order from an adult by whom he is employed, the sale is to the adult; 49 Mo. App. 398, contra, where the order is verbal only; id.; and the latter is so, even if the minor has been in the habit of bringing bona fide orders and if he once drink the liquor himself, the sale is to him; 89 Ga. 785. It has even been held that the sale is to the minor when he actually delivered the liquor to his employer, where such sale was on a verbal order; 30 Tex. App. 391; but see 16 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 571, where the sale is held to be to the adult if the minor is known to be doing an errand. The fact that a minor has no parent or guardian to give their written consent will not justify a sale without it; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 490.

That a state may, under its police power, regulate or even prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is settled by many state and federal cases; 123 U. S. 623; 80 Fed. Rep. 786; 165 U. S. 58; it may, by statute, prohibit the gift of such liquor to one visibly affected by it though the recipient be a friend and the gift made in a social manner; 126 Pa. 602. It may prohibit the manufacture of liquor even though intended for exportation and not for use within the state; 72 Ia. 348; 128 U. S. 1.

Prior to the fourteenth amendment, no question was raised as to this right of the states; 18 Wall. 129; it is justified by the rule that while power does not exist with the whole people to control rights which are exclusively private, government may require each citizen so to conduct himself and use his own property as not necessarily to injure another; 94 U. S. 113; 123 id. 623.

But a state in the exercise of its police power may not interfere with commerce between the states; 116 U. S. 446; and it cannot forbid the importation of intoxicating liquors; 135 U. S. 100; 140 id. 564; 67

Fed. Rep. 854; 80 id. 786; 82 id. 199; nor can it by statute impose a tax or duty on persons who, not having their principal place of business within the state, engage in the business of selling liquors therein; 116 U. S. 446; or forbid common carriers from bringing them into the state without having been furnished with a certificate that the consignee was authorized to sell liquors; 125 U. S. 465.

Under the prohibition law in Iowa, it was held that sales of liquor in the original packages were prohibited; 70 Ia. 271; but the supreme court held in the case of Leisy v. Hardin that, in the absence of congressional permission, a state had no right to interfere with the sale, by an importer, of liquors imported from another state in original packages, as such an action interfered with the right of congress to regulate commerce; 135 U. S. 100. This case induced the passage of the act of August 8, 1890 (the Wilson Bill); 165 U. S. 58, which provides that all fermented, distilled, or intoxicating liquors transported into any state for use therein, regardless of whether they are in the original packages or not, shall be subject to the police laws of such state. This act was held constitutional as a valid exercise of the police powers vested in congress; 43 Fed. Rep. 556; 140 U. S. 545; by it congress has declared when imported property shall be subject to state laws, but the states are not authorized to declare when such goods become the subject of their control; 43 Fed. Rep. 653. Under the South Carolina dispensary act, the state itself engages in the business of importing liquors for the purpose of profit, to the state, and thus recognizes that their use is lawful. She cannot, therefore, under her constitutional obligations to other states, control, hinder, and burden commerce in such articles between their citizens and her own; 67 Fed. Rep. 854, affirmed in 165 U. S. 58.

In this case the question whether a state could, under the constitution, confer upon certain officers or agents the sole power to buy all liquors sold in the state, and allow no other liquor to be sold, was reserved for future decision, it not being necessary to decide it at that time. And in 80 Fed. Rep. 786, under a subsequent amended statute, it was held that such officers could not seize original packages shipped into the state in violation of a provision of such statute that a sample of the contents should be first furnished to the state inspector, as such a provision could not be justified as an inspection law and was an interference with interstate commerce and in itself void. Affirmed as to this point in the supreme court; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674; but reversed as to the right of the state to prohibit and regulate the sale of liquors even in the original package. (Fuller C. J., Shiras and McKenna, JJ., dissenting as to the point reversed.) See ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

In its general provisions, the dispensary act does not conflict with the constitution of the United States; 54 Fed. Rep. 969; but in so far as its provisions conflict with interstate commerce, it is void; 57 id. 570; 82 id. 19. But when once a sale has been made of an original package and it has been delivered within the state, it cannot be again sold by its recipient or by any one else without violation of the law; 82 Fed. Rep. 19.

Property used for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor may be declared a common nuisance, and as such abated; 128 U. S. 1; 123 id. 623; and the abatement of such a nuisance is not a taking of property without due process of law; 123 U. S. 623; 128 id. 1. See NUISANCE.

A right of property in whisky cannot shield one from the consequences of his unlawful acts in keeping such whisky for illegal sale; 7 L. R. A. 295.

In a few of the states there are constitutional provisions respecting the liquor traffic. In Maine, Iowa, and Kansas the manufacture and sale are prohibited except for medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes; cider being excepted in the first named state. In Louisiana and West Virginia there are provisions authorizing its regulation, or, in the last named state, its prohibition. In Texas and Delaware there are constitutional provisions for local option (q. v.).

Acts have been passed, mainly in 1895, by which provision is made for the instruction of children in the schools as to the physiological effects of alcohol and narcotics. Such provisions are in force in New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, New Jersey, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Indiana. Of the same character are statutes prohibiting the employment of women where liquor is sold in New York, Washington, and Louisiana. They are held to be constitutional; 88 Fed. Rep. 157. So in Maryland and Arkansas clubs are prohibited from furnishing liquors without a license. Similar statutes prohibit the sale of liquor near schoolhouses in Minnesota and Georgia; or charitable institutions in Connecticut; or at the capitol in Nevada. There are acts forbidding the sale of liquor to inmates of soldiers' homes in Kansas, or within one and one half miles of same in Ohio, California, and Wisconsin, or to Indians in Nebraska, Arizona, and California. Police officers are forbidden to be interested in the manufacture or sale of liquors in New York. In Maine, Rhode Island, Illinois, and Alabama houses used for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor are declared by statute to be nuisances for which the landlord may terminate the lease. In Connecticut a contract, part of the consideration of which is the illegal sale of liquor, is void.

See Rep. Am. Bar Ass'n (1897) 230; LOCAL OPTION; DELEGATION.

LIRA. The name of a foreign coin.

In all computations at the custom-house, the lira of Sardinia shall be estimated at eighteen cents and six mills; Act of March 22, 1846; the lira of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and the lira of Tuscany at sixteen cents; Act of March 22, 1846.

LIS. A controversy; an action at law.

LIS ALIBI PENDENS. A suit pending elsewhere. Where proceedings are pending in one court between plaintiff and defendant in respect to a given matter, it has been used as a ground for preventing the plaintiff from entering proceedings in another court against the same defendant and for the same cause of action. See AUTER ACTION PENDANT.

LIS MOTA (Lat.). A controversy begun, i. e. on the point at issue, and prior to commencement of judicial proceedings.

The arising of that state of facts on which the claim is founded. 6 C. & P. 552.

Such a controversy is taken to arise on the advent of the state of facts on which the claim rests; and after such controversy has arisen (post litem motam) no declarations of deceased members of the family as to matters of pedigree are admissible; Steph. Ev. § 31; Tayl. Ev. 554; 6 C. & P. 560; 4 Campb. 417; 2 Russ. & M. 161; Greenl. Ev. § 131; 4 M. & S. 497; 1 Pet. 337; 26 Barb. 177.

There is no lis mota till a dispute has arisen; it is not enough that a right of action has arisen or a cause of action accrued; 2 Sw. & Tr. 170. The dispute need not be between the same parties; 15 Q. B. D. 114.

LIS PENDENS (Lat.). A pending suit. Suing out a writ and making attachment (on mesne process) constitute a lis pendens at common law. 21 N. H. 570.

The doctrine of lis pendens, as usually understood, is the control which a court has over the property involved in a suit, during the continuance of the proceedings, and until its final judgment has been rendered therein.

"The established rule is that a lis pendens, duly prosecuted and not collusive, is notice to a purchaser so as to effect and bind his interest by the decree; and the lis pendens begins from the service of the subpœna after the bill is filed." 1 Johns. Ch. 566. This was said to be the "fundamental proposition" of the doctrine; 97 U. S. 106.

The purpose of the rule is to keep the subject-matter of the litigation within the power of the court until the judgment or decree shall be entered; otherwise by successive alienations pending the litigation, its judgment or decree could be rendered abortive and thus make it impossible for the court to execute its judgment or decree; 17 Or. 499. The rule will be applied even in a case where it is a physical impossibility that the purchaser could have known of the existence of the suit; 2 Rand. Va. 93. It was formulated in Lord Bacon's twelfth ordinance. There were earlier cases, the first being reported in Cro. Eliz. 677. See Bennett, Lis Pendens.

An alienee, during the pendency of a suit, is bound by the proceedings therein subsequent to the alienation, though before he became a party; 4 Beav. 40; 5 Mich. 456; 22 Barb. 166; 27 Pa. 418; 7 Blackf. 242.

Purchasers during the pendency of a suit are bound by the decree in the suit without being made parties; 4 Russ. 372; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 375; Story, Eq. Pl. § 351 a; 32 Ala. N. S. 451; 11 Mo. 519; 96 id. 271; 30 Miss. 27; 12 La. An. 776; 6 Barb. 133; 27 Pa. 418; 16 Ill. 225; 9 B. Monr. 220; 11 Ind. 443; see 130 U. S. 565; 78 Cal. 152; and will not be protected because they paid value and had no actual notice of the suit; 35 Conn. 250; 6 Ia. 258; 86 Ky. 240; 131 Ind. 455. A purchaser pendente lite cannot litigate, over again in an original independent suit, the matters determined in a suit to which his vendor was a party; 131 U. S. 352; a purchaser is only chargeable with notice when the purchase is from a party to the suit; 121 Pa. 130.

So also is the doctrine applied to a purchaser during a suit to avoid a conveyance as fraudulent; 5 T. B. Monr. 373; 6 B. Monr. 18.

A citizen of the United States residing in a different state from that in which the suit is pending, is bound by the rule regarding purchasers pendente lite; 9 Pet. 86; and actual notice of the pendency of the suit is not necessary; 9 Dana 372. See 12 Cent. L. J. 101. It is said that the doctrine has no force or operation beyond the boundaries of the state where the suit is pending; 96 Mo. 149; but this does not, of course apply to a case where the court has jurisdiction of the res and of the party. The doctrine cannot be made applicable by state laws or decisions to negotiable instruments so as to affect persons not residing and not being within the state; 119 U. S. 680.

Lis pendens by a mortgagor under a prior unrecorded mortgage is notice to a second mortgagee; 9 Ala. N. S. 921. But see 2 Rand. 93. One taking a mortgage on property while a proceeding to foreclose a vendor's lien thereon is pending, is bound by a decree in such proceedings as if a party thereto, and has no right of redemption other than that given by statute; 96 Ala. 421.

The rule does not apply where a title imperfect before suit brought, is perfected during its pendency; 4 Cow. 667; 14 Ohio 323.

The doctrine of lis pendens has been said to be an equitable doctrine only; 28 Conn. 593; but when one comes into possession of the subject of litigation, during proceedings in ejectment, he will be bound by the judgment, though not a party, and may be ejected under the judgment against his grantor; Wade, Notice; 1 McLean 87; 9 Cow. 233.

In law, the same effect is produced by the rule that each purchaser takes the title of his vendor only; 11 Md. 519; 27 Pa. 418; 6 Barb. 133; 30 Miss. 27; 5 Mich. 456. This doctrine was originally confined to controversies over real estate; 22 Ala. 760; 30 Mo. 462; 2 Johns. Ch. 444; but a purchaser of securities pendente lite has been decreed to surrender them upon receiving the sum he had paid for them; 1 Desaus. 167; and the principle has been extended to a bond and mortgage, assigned by a trustee, pending a suit by the cestui que trust; 2 Johns. Ch. 441. It is now applied, in some cases to personal property; Freem. Judg. § 194; as stocks; 20 Johns. 554; 48 Barb. 649, reversed in 48 N. Y. 585. See 57 N. Y. 617; furniture; 2 Edw. Ch. 31; steamboats; 15 Mo. App. 551; choses in action, such as a bond and mortgage; 2 Johns. Ch. 441, approved in 97 U. S. 106. Some cases hold that it does not apply to personalty; 60 La. 168; 22 Ala. 760. The question is said to be unsettled as to cash and movable personalty; 2 Johns. Ch. 441; 97 U. S. 96. It does not apply to negotiable instruments; 97 U. S. 96; 119 id. 680; 100 id. 589; 147 id. 59; 22 Ala. 760; 38 Ga. 18; including municipal bonds; 97 U. S. 96; 111 id. 556; 119 id. 692; 54 Fed. Rep. 759; but see 37 Pa. 355 as to the latter. "Rights to real property and personal chattels, within the jurisdiction of the court, and subject to its power, may be affected by lis pendens, but not those acquired by the transfer of negotiable securities, or by the sale of articles in market overt in the usual course of trade;" 119 U. S. 693.

In divorce there is no lis pendens before decree as to the property included in the marriage settlement; 7 P. D. 228.

The doctrine does not apply to negotiable paper; 50 Fed. Rep. 155; a bona fide holder of which is not subject to it, even if purchased during the pendency of a suit in which its issue was finally declared invalid; 54 Fed. Rep. 759.

The proceedings must relate directly to the specific property in question; 1 Strobh. Eq. 180; 7 Blackf. 242; 7 Md. 537; Story, Eq. 13th ed. § 405; 1 Hill. Vend. 411; and the rule applies to no other suits; 1 M'Cord Ch. 252.

Lis pendens is said to be general notice to all the world; see Story, Eq. Jur. § 405; Ambl. 676; 2 P. Wms. 282; 3 Atk. 343; 1 Vern. 286; 3 Hayw. 147; 1 Johns. Ch. 556 (a leading case); but it has been said that it is not correct to speak of it as a part of the doctrine of notice; the purchaser pendente lite is affected, not by notice, but because the law does not allow litigating parties to give to others, pending the litigation, rights to the property in dispute so as to prejudice the opposite party. Per Cranworth, C., in 1 De G. & J. 566. The doctrine rests upon public policy, not notice; 2 Rand. 93; 10 W. N. C. (Pa). 389; Beach, Eq. Jur. § 374; Bisph. Eq. 274; 1 Johns. Ch. 566.

Filing a judgment creditor's bill constitutes a lis pendens; 4 Edw. Ch. 29. A petition by heirs to sell real estate is not a lis pendens; 14 B. Monr. 164. Generally, suit is not pending till service of process; 57 Mo. 362; 14 Pet. 322; 1 Sandf. 731; Wade, Notice 152; but see 30 Tex. 494; 10 Ark. 479; 64 Mo. 519. Where service is by advertising, lis pendens does not attach till the completion of the advertising; 4 Kan. 282.

Only unreasonable and unusual negligence in the prosecution of a suit will take away its character as a lis pendens; 18 B. Monr. 230; 11 id. 297; 10 Ky. Law. R. 750; but it is held that there must be an active prosecution to keep it alive; 1 Vern. 286; 1 Russ. & M. 617; 30 Mo. 432; 9 Paige 512; 21 Ia. 421. But as long as the court retains jurisdiction, the doctrine applies; Benn. Lis Pend. 172.

The court must have jurisdiction over the property involved; Benn. Lis Pend. 153; and the property must be sufficiently described to establish its identity; id.; and the party who holds the title must be before the court as a party; id. 162. But this would not be required in proceedings to enforce a lien on property within the jurisdiction of the court.

Filing the bill and serving a subpœna creates a lis pendens in equity; Tiedm. Eq. Jur. § 95; 1 Vern. 318; 7 Beav. 444; 27 Mo. 560; 4 Sneed 672; 26 Miss. 397; 9 Paige Ch. 512; 22 Ala N. S. 743; 7 Blackf. 242; 130 U. S. 565; 2 Rand. Va. 93; see 155 Pa. 10; which the final decree terminates; 1 Vern. 318. Amendment of the bill after demurrer has been sustained thereto relates back to the filing of the bill, so far as the doctrine of lis pendens is concerned; 61 Fed. Rep. 481. In the civil law, an action is not said to be pending till it reaches the stage of contestatio litis.

In equity, the lis pendens relates to the service of the subpœna, and not to the day on which it was issued; 30 W. Va. 687; 130 U. S. 565.

A voluntary assignment during the pendency of a suit does not affect the rights of other parties, if not disclosed, except so far as the alienation may disable the party from performing the decree of the court; Story, Eq. Pl. § 351; 15 Tex. 495; 22 Barb. 666; as in the case of mortgage by a tenant in common of his undivided interest, and subsequent partition; 2 Sandf. Ch. 98.

An involuntary assignment by a plaintiff, as under the bankrupt or insolvent laws, renders the suit so defective that it cannot be prosecuted if the defendant objects; 7 Paige Ch. 287; 4 Ves. 387; 9 Wend. 649; 1 Hare 621; Story, Eq. Pl. § 349. Not if made under the bankrupt law of 1841; 27 Barb. 252.

The same may be said of a voluntary assignment of all his interest by a sole complainant: 5 Hare 223; Story, Eq. Pl. § 349.

A debtor need not pay to either party pendente lite; 1 Paige 490.

The doctrine of lis pendens is modified in many of the states of the United States, and by statutes requiring records of the attachment to preliminary proceedings to be made, and constituting such records notice. See stat. 2 and 3 Vict. c. 11, § 7; and statutes of the various states.

The phrase is sometimes incorrectly used as a substitute for auter action pendant, (q. v.). See 1 La. An. 46; 21 N. H. 570.

"It is part of our fast decaying real property system; it belongs to the palmy days of conveyancing." 11 Law. Quart. Rev. 6.

LIST. A table of cases arranged for trial or argument; as, the trial list, the argument list.

A list may consist of a single item; 14 N. H. 85. See 83 Ky. 162. Where a notice is required to be directed to a person at his abode as described in a list of voters, it must be at the place therein mentioned, even if erroneous; L. R. 9 C. P. 233. LISTERS. This word is used in some of the states to designate the persons appointed to make lists of taxables. See Vt. Rev. Stat.

LITE PENDENTE. Pending suit.

LITERÆ. Letters. A term which in old English law was applied to instruments in writing, public and private.

LITERÆ MORTUÆ. Read letters; fulfilling words of a statute. Bacon, Works IV. 189.

LITERÆ PATENTES. Letters patent. Literally, open letters.

LITERÆ PROCURATORIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Letters procuratory. A written authority, or power of attorney (litera attornati), given to a procurator. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.; Bracton, fol. 40–43.

LITERAL. According to the language; following the exact words. Literal construction of a document, adheres closely to the words, making no difference for extrinsic circumstances.

LITERAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. A contract the whole of the evidence of which is reduced to writing, and binds the party who subscribed it, although he has received no consideration. Lec. Elém. § 887.

LITERAL PROOF. In Civil Law. Written evidence.

LITERARY PROPERTY. The general term which describes the interest of an author in his works, or of those who claim under him, whether before or after publication, or before or after a copyright has been secured. 9 Am. LITERIS OBLIGATIO. In Roman Law. An obligation created by an entry made in one of the books kept by the head of a Roman family, called the codex accepti et expensi. The creditor made an entry to the effect that a certain sum had been paid by him to the debtor, and the debtor made a corresponding entry indicating such a payment to him by the creditor; but it was sufficient if the creditor's entry was made by direction of the debtor, in which case an entry by the debtor was unnecessary. The effect was to constitute an obligation under which the debtor was liable, whether the money was actually paid or not. He was said to be bound literis, i. e. by the writing in the codex as such. The entry itself created the obligation to pay. It was immaterial whether it was based upon an obligation to pay existing in fact.

The item in the codex was called the nomen, and this species of contract might either create an obligation or transform one, i. e. operate as a novation, in which case it was called nomen transcripticium. The literis obligatio was distinguished from the nomen arcarium, another species of entry in the codex accepti et expensi. This has been termed a mere cash item. It was an entry of a concrete or existing ground of obligation, in which case the obligation continued to be based on the loan or depositum, or whatever might be its original character, and was not converted into literis obligatio. In the time of the empire the literal contract fell into disuse.

The three classes of books kept by the paterfamilias were: (1) the liber patrimonii, or libellus familiæ, in which was kept inventories of the property, and liber kalendarii, which was a list of capital sums let out at interest; (2) the codex rationum, which was the regular account book in which were entered receipts and expenses; (3) the codex accepti et expensi, designed not merely to afford evidence of, but also to affect, changes in the state of a person's property.

Gaius, Inst. III. §§ 128–31, describes the literis obligatio as being made in two ways: (1) A re in personam, where the obligation was entered in the form of a debt under the name of the original purchaser or debtor; (2) a persona in personam, where a debt already standing under one nomen was transferred by novation from that one to another. Some writers lay great stress upon the fact that the obligation a re in personam was first entered as a memorandum in a day book or waste book (adversaria ephemeris), but it has been truly remarked that this fact, although indisputable, has no legal importance; and this is apparent from the nature of the two transactions.

There is some difference in the statement of these obligations by different authors, but that which is here given is the result of the more recent investigations, having been established by Voigt, Abhandl. der Koen. Saechs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, vol. 10, 515.

See Sohm., Inst. Rom. L. § 68 and note 1, where reference may be found to the authors on the subject.

LITHOGRAPH. A print from a drawing on stone. Chromo lithographs are dutiable as printed matter and not as manufactures of paper. See 97 U. S. 368; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 12, s. 14.

LITIGANT. One engaged in a suit.

LITIGATION. A contest, authorized by law, in a court of justice, for the purpose of enforcing a right.

In order to prevent injustice, courts of equity formerly restrained a party from further litigation, by a writ of injunction: for example, after two verdicts on trials at bar, in favor of the plaintiff, a perpetual injunction was decreed; Stra. 404. And not only between two individuals will a court of equity grant this relief, as in the above case of several ejectments, but also, when one general legal right, as a right of fishery, is claimed against several distinct persons, in which case there would be no end of bringing actions, since each action would only bind the particular right in question between the plaintiff and defendant in such action, without deciding the general right claimed; 2 Atk. 484; 2 Ves. 587.

LITIGIOSITY. In Scotch Law. The pendency of a suit: it is an implied prohibition of alienation, to the disappointment of an action, or of diligence, the direct object of which is to obtain possession, or to acquire the property of a particular subject. The effect of it is analogous to that of inhibition. 2 Bell, Com., 5th ed. 152.

LITIGIOUS. That which is the subject of a suit or action; that which is contested in a court of justice. In another sense, litigious signifies a disposition to sue; a fondness for litigation. See VEXATIOUS ACTIONS ACT.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A church is said to be litigious, when two rival presentations are offered to the bishop upon the same avoidance of the living. Moz. & W.; 3 Steph. Com. 417.

LITIGIOUS RIGHTS. In French Law. Those which are or may be contested either in whole or in part, whether an action has been commenced, or when there is reason to apprehend one. Pothier, Vente, n. 584; 9 Mart. La. 188; Troplong, De la Vente, n. 984 à 1008; Eva. Civ. Code, art. 2628; id. 3522, n. 22. See CONTENTIOUS JURISDICTION.

LITIS ÆSTIMATIO. The measure of damages (q. v.).

LITIS CONTESTATIO. In Civil Law. The process by which a suit is contested by the opposing statements of the respective parties, to attain an issue: the issue itself.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The issue of an action; the general answer of the defendant denying matter charged against him in a libel. Hallifax, Civ. L. b. 3, c. 11, No. 9.

LITIS DOMINIUM. In Civil Law. Direction of a suit. A fiction of law authorizing the appointment of an attorney, by which appointment he was supposed to become dominus litis.

LITISPENDENCIA. In Spanish Law. Litispendency. The condition of a suit pending in a court of justice.

In order to render this condition valid, it is necessary that the judge be competent to take cognizance of the cause; that the defendant has been duly cited to appear, and fully informed, in due time and form, of the nature of the demand, or that, if he has not, it has been through his own fault or fraud.

The litispendencia produces two effects: the legal impossibility of alienating the property in dispute during the pendency of the suit; the accumulation of all the proceedings in the cause, in the tribunal where the suit is pending, whether the same be had before the same judge or other judges or notaries. This cumulation may be required in any stage of the cause, and forms a valid exception to the further proceeding, until the cumulation is effected. Escriche, Dict.

LITRE. A French measure of capacity. It is of the size of a cubic décimètre, or the cube of one-tenth part of a metre. It is equal to 61.027 cubic inches, or a little more than a quart. See MEASURE.

LITTORAL (littus). Belonging to shore: as of sea and great lakes. Webst. Corresponding to riparian proprietors on a stream or small pond are littoral proprietors on a sea or lake. But riparian is also used coextensively with littoral. 7 Cush. 94. See 17 How. 426.

LITURA. In Civil Law. An obliteration or blot in a will or other instrument.

LITUS. In Old European Law. A person who surrendered himself into another's power; a kind of servant.

LITUS MARIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Shore; beach. Qua fluctus eluderet. Cic. Top. c. 7. Qua fluctus adludit. Quinct. lib. 5, c. ult. Quousque maximus fluctus a mari pervenit. Celsus; said to have been first so defined by Cicero, in an award as arbitrator. L. 92, D, de verb signif. Qua maximus fluctus exæstuat. L. 112, D, eod. tit. Qua tenus hibernus fluctus maximus excurrit. Inst. lib. 2, de rer. divis. et qual. § 3. That is to say, as far as the largest winter wave runs up. Vocab. Jur. Utr.

At Common Law. The shore between common high-water mark and low-water mark. Hale, de Jure Maris, cc. 4, 5, 6; 3 Kent 427; 2 Hill. R. P. 90.

Shore is also used of a river. 5 Wheat. 385; 20 Wend. 149. See 18 How. 381; 28 Me. 180; 14 Pa. 171. See SHORE.

LIVE. "Live animals" has been held to include singing birds. 7 Blatchf. 235. "Live stock" has been held not to include live fowls. 5 Blatchf. 520.

LIVE AND RESIDE. Where, in the gift of a house, there was a condition that the donee should "live and reside" therein, it was held that the word "live" added nothing to its point. T. & R. 530.

LIVELIHOOD. Means of subsistence or maintaining life; means of living. 3 Atk. 399; 1 Yeates 432. See 16 East 147; 5 L. J. Ex. 268.

LIVERY. In English Law. The delivery of possession of lands to those tenants who hold of the king in capite or by knight's service.

The name of a writ which lay for the heir of age to obtain possession of the seisin of his lands at the king's hands; abolished by stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24. Fitzh. N. B. 155; 2 Bla. Com. 68.

The distinguishing dress worn by the servants of a gentleman or nobleman, or by the members of a particular guild. "Livery or clothing." Say. 274. By stat. 1 Rich. II. c. 7, and 16 Rich. II. c. 4, none but the servants of a lord, and continually dwelling in his house, or those above the rank of yeomen, should wear the lord's livery.

The clothes supplied by a master for his servants' use belong to the master; 3 C. & P. 470. See Stubbs, Const. Hist. 470.

Privilege of a particular company or guild. The members of such company are called liverymen. Whart. Lex.

LIVERY IN CHIVALRY. In Feudal Law. The delivery of the property of a ward in chivalry out of the guardian's hands, upon the heir's attaining the required age. 2 Bla. Com. 68.

LIVERY OF SEISIN. In Estates. A delivery of possession of lands, tenements, and hereditaments unto one entitled to the same. This was a ceremony used in the common law for the conveyance of real estate; and livery was in deed, which was performed by the feoffor and the feoffee going upon the land and the latter receiving it from the former; or in law, where the same was not made on the land, but in sight of it; 2 Bla. Com. 315.

In America livery of seisin is unnecessary, it having been dispensed with either by express law or by usage. The delivery and recording of the deed have the same effect; 1 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. *14, 34. In Maryland, until more recent times, it seems that a deed could not operate as a feoffment without livery of seisin; but under the Rev. Code of 1878, art. 44, § 6, neither livery of seisin nor indenting is necessary; 5 H. & J. 158. See 4 Kent 381; 1 Mo. 553; 1 Pet. 508; 1 Bay 107; 5 H. & J. 158; 11 Me. 318; 8 Cra. 229; Dane, Abr.; Bingh. Act. and Def. 96; SEISIN.

LIVERY OFFICE. In Old English Law. An office for the delivery of lands.

LIVERY STABLE. A place where horses are groomed, fed, and hired, and where vehicles are let. 30 La. Ann. 1095.

A liveryman who lets a horse does not warrant that it is free from defects which he does not know of, and could not have discovered by the exercise of due care; and where a person is injured through such defects, the liveryman is not liable; 157 Mass. 558.

Under the contract of bailment he is required to exercise ordinary care over the property entrusted to him. He is liable for the negligence of his servants in the performance of any duty in regard to the care and custody of the property, within the general scope of his own employment; 79 Me. 480. See LIEN.

LIVING CHILD. A term, it is said, less broad than "issue living." 153 Mass. 527.

LLOYDS. An association in the city of London, the members of which underwrite each other's policies. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 138, n.

The name is derived from Lloyd's coffee house, the great resort for seafaring men and those doing business with them in the time of William III. and Anne. The affairs of the association are managed by a committee called Lloyd's Committee, who appoint agents in all the principal ports of the world, whose business it is to forward all such maritime news as may be of importance in guiding the judgment of the underwriters. These accounts, which arrive almost hourly from some part of the world, are at once posted up, and are called Lloyd's Shipping Lists. They are subsequently copied into three books, called Lloyd's Book. Lloyd's shipping list, stating the time of a vessel's sailing, is prima facie evidence of what it contains; 11 M. & W. 116; 35 Neb. 888; 67 Ga. 697; 89 Mass. 561; 31 Ark. 373; 124 Ill. 572; 21 Md. 550; 11 Beav. 283. See Moz. & W.; Arn. Ins.

LLOYD'S BONDS. See BOND.

LLOYD'S INSURANCE. A system of insurance similar to the English Lloyds, which is carried on in the United States by unincorporated associations of individuals. It originated in connection with marine risks, but has now been extended to other kinds of insurance. The principal features of the system are, that each individual assumes a liability for a specific amount; that attorneys or managers are appointed by a power of attorney authorizing them to be sued; that suits are brought against such attorneys or managers: and that each underwriter is bound by the fundamental agreement to accept the result of such suit. Such action may be maintained against the attorneys in fact; 17 App. Div. N. Y. 38; and the agreement is not repugnant to public policy; 20 Misc. Rep. 297; it is valid to prevent the institution of separate suits where the attorney is an underwriter; 19 id. 239. One who signs such policy as attorney for the underwriters is a "trustee of an express trust," within New York Code Civ. Proc. § 449; 19 Misc. Rep. 239. Proofs of loss are properly served at the office of the association on one acting as its attorney, even if irregularly appointed; 21 Misc. Rep. 285. The provision for simultaneous contribution and making the liability several, not joint, does not prevent the collection of the full proportion from each where only a portion are served; 76 Fed. Rep. 1000.

Such associations have been held subject to prosecution for unlawfully exercising a public franchise; 19 Misc. Rep. 248; 51 Ohio St. 163, where the forms of organization, power of attorney, and policy may be referred to. They are not companies; 163 Pa. 287; 118 Mo. 388; 92 Ga. 8; and unincorporated persons may be prohibited from being insurers; 164 Pa. 306; 118 id. 249, three judges dissenting.

LOAD-LINE. The depth to which a ship is loaded so as to sink in salt water.

Every owner of a British ship before entering his ship outwards from any port of the United Kingdom shall mark, in white or yellow on a dark ground, a circular disc, twelve inches in diameter, with a horizontal line eighteen inches long, through its centre, and the centre of this disc is to indicate the maximum load-line in salt water, to which the owner intends to load the ship for that voyage; Moz. & W. Coasters under eighty tons burden, fishing ships, and yachts are excepted.

LOADMANAGE. See LODEMANAGE.

LOAN. A bailment without reward. A bailment of an article for use or consumption without reward. The thing so bailed.

A loan, in general, implies that a thing is lent without reward; but, in some cases, a loan may be for a reward: as, the loan of money. 7 Pet. 109.

It would be an inquiry too purely speculative, whether this use of the term loan originated in the times when taking interest was considered usury and improper, the bailment of money which was to be returned in kind. The supposition would furnish a reasonable explanation of the exception to the general rule that loan includes properly only those bailments where no reward is given or received by the bailee.

Within the statutory and constitutional prohibition against the loaning of public funds, with or without interest, a general deposit of such funds by a public officer subject to check is not a loan; 68 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 165. See BUILDING ASSOCIATIONS; USURY.

LOAN CERTIFICATES. See CLEARING HOUSE.

LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION. A contract by which the owner of a personal chattel, called the lender, delivers it to the bailee, called the borrower to be returned in kind.

For example, if a person borrows a bushel of wheat, and at the end of a month returns to the lender a bushel of equal value. This class of loans is commonly considered under the head of bailments; but it lacks the one essential element of bailment, that of a return of the property; it is more strictly a barter or an exchange: the property passes to the borrower; 4 N. Y. 76; 8 id. 483; 4 Ohio St. 98; 3 Mas. 478; 1 Blackf. 353; Story, Bailm. § 439. Those cases, sometimes called ventuum (the corresponding civil law term), such as where corn is delivered to a miller to be ground into wheat, are either cases of hiring of labor and service, as where the miller grinds and returns the identical wheat ground into flour, retaining a portion for his services, or constitute a mere exchange, as where he mixes the wheat with his own, undertaking to furnish an equivalent in corn. It amounts to a contract of sale, payment being stipulated for in a specified article instead of money. See IN GENERE; IN KIND; MUTUUM.

LOAN FOR EXCHANGE. A contract by which one delivers personal property to another, and the latter agrees to return to the lender a similar thing, without reward for its use. Cal. Civ. Code § 1902.

LOAN FOR USE (called, also, commodatum). A bailment of an article to be used by the borrower without paying for the use. 2 Kent 573.

An agreement by which a person delivers a thing to another, to use it according to its natural destination, or according to the agreement, under the obligation on the part of the borrower, to return it after he shall have done using it. La. Civ. Code (1889) Art. 2893.

Loan for use (called commodatum in the civil law) differs from a loan for consumption (called mutuum in the civil law) in this, that the commodatum must be specifically returned, the mutuum is to be returned in kind. In the case of a commodatum, the property in the thing remains in the lender; in a mutuum, the property passes to the borrower.

The loan, like other bailments, must be of some thing of a personal nature; Story, Bailm. § 223; it must be gratuitous; 2 Ld. Raym. 913; for the use of the borrower, and this as the principal object of the bailment; Story, Bailm. § 225; 13 Vt. 161; and must be lent to be specifically returned at the determination of the bailment; Story, Bailm. § 228.

The general law of contracts governs as to the capacities of the parties and the character of the use; Story, Bailm. §§ 50, 162, 302, 380. He who has a special property may loan the thing, and this even to the general owner, and the possession of the general owner still be that of a borrower; 1 Atk. 235; 8 Term 199; 2 Taunt. 268.

The borrower may use the thing himself, but may not, in general, allow others to use it; 1 Mod. 210; 4 Sandf. 8; during the time and for the purposes and to the extent contemplated by the parties; 5 Mass. 104; 1 Const. S. C. 121; 3 Bingh. N. C. 468. He is bound to use extraordinary diligence; 3 Bingh. N. C. 468; 14 Ill. 84; 4 Sandf. 8; Story, Bailm. § 237; is responsible for accidents, though inevitable, which injure the property during any excess of use; 5 Mass. 194; 16 Ga. 25; see 34 Neb. 426; must bear the ordinary expenses of the thing; Jones, Bailm. 67; and restore it at the time and place and in the manner contemplated by the contract; 16 Ga. 25; 12 Tex. 373; Story, Bailm. § 99; including, also, all accessories; 16 Ga. 25; 2 Kent 566. As to the place of delivery, see 9 Barb. 189; 1 Me. 120; 1 N. H. 295; 1 Conn. 255; 16 Mass. 458. He must, as a general rule, return it to the lender; 7 Cow. 278; 1 B. & Ad. 450; 11 Mass. 211.

The lender may terminate the loan at his pleasure; 9 East 49; 8 Johns. 432; 16 Ga. 25; is perhaps liable for expenses adding a permanent benefit; Story, Bailm. § 274. The lender still retains his property as against third persons, and, for some purposes, his possession; 11 Johns. 285; 13 id. 141, 561; 5 Mass. 303; 1 B. & Ald. 59; 2 Cr. M. & R. 659. As to whether the property is transferred by a recovery of judgment for its value, see 26 E. L. & Eq. 328; 5 Me. 147; 1 Pick. 62. See, generally, Edwards; Jones; Story, Bailments; Kent, Lect. 46. BAILMENT.

LOAN SOCIETIES. In English Law. A kind of club formed for the purpose of advancing money on loan to the industrial classes. They are authorized and regulated by 3 & 4 Vict. ch. 110, and 21 Vict. ch. 19.

LOBBYIST. One who makes it a business to procure the passage of bills pending before a legislative body.

One "who makes it a business to 'see' members and procure, by persuasion, importunity, or the use of inducements, the passing of bills, public as well as private, which involve gain to the promoters." 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 156.

A contract for the employment of personal influence or solicitation to procure the passage of a public or private law is void; 21 Barb. 361; 16 How. 314; 34 Vt. 274; 15 Ore. 330; as contrary to sound morals and tending to inefficiency in the public service; 93 Wis. 393; if by its terms or by necessary implication, it stipulates for, or tends to, corrupt action or personal solicitations; 69 U. S. 45; 98 Ind. 238; 36 N. Y. 235; 40 id. 543; 127 id. 370; 18 Ohio St. 469; 149 Pa. 375. And if the contract is broad enough to cover services of any kind, either secret or open, honest or dishonest, the law pronounces a ban upon the contract itself; 2 McArth. 268. It is not required that it tends to corruption. If its effect is to mislead, it is decisive against the claimant. It may not corrupt all, but if it corrupt or tend to corrupt some, or if it deceive or tend to deceive some, that is sufficient to stamp its character with the seal of reprobation before a judicial tribunal; 5 W. & S. 315; 7 id. 152; 59 Pa. 19; 100 id. 561. But it has been held that though the contract contemplates the use of personal solicitation, yet if no personal influence is brought to bear upon the members, and no dishonest, secret, or unfair means employed, to accomplish the object, it is not illegal; 86 Cal. 542.

Where the agreement is for compensation contingent upon success, it suggests the use of sinister and corrupt means for the accomplishment of the desired end. The law meets the suggestion of evil and strkes down the contract from its inception; 69 U. S. 45; 98 Ind. 238; and see 60 Minn. 26. But if the contract does not by its terms or by necessary implication contain anything illegal or tend to any violation of sound morals, the fatal element should not, through an overzealous desire to fortify against the deplorable effects of lobbying contracts, be injected into it by mere suspicion and conjecture that the party intended to do an illegal act or a legal act by illegal means. Presumptions in human affairs are in favor of innocence rather than of guilt, and this rule applies in testing a contract; 93 Wis. 393. In the last two cases, brought by the same plaintiff, the contracts were somewhat similar; but in the first the decision was based mainly on what was done under and before the contract was entered into, whilst that of the latter was upon the construction of the contract.

A contract for services as an attorney before a legislative body is valid; 22 Kan. 692; and where it contains an agreement to labor faithfully before such body to effect the desired end, it is not necessarily illegal; 34 Vt. 275. It is allowable to employ counsel to appear before a legislative committee or the legislature itself to advocate or oppose a measure in which the individual has an interest; 36 N. Y. 241, followed in 52 How. Pr. 144; and an agent may be authorized by the legislature to prosecute claims on behalf of the state which require the procurement of legislation, for a contingent fee; 164 Mass. 241. Services which are intended to reach only the reason of those sought to be influenced rest on the same principles of ethics as professional services and are no more exceptionable. They include drafting the petition which sets forth the claim, attending to the taking of testimony, collecting facts, preparing arguments and submitting them orally or in writing to a committee, and other services of a like character; but such services are separated by a broad line of demarcation from personal solicitation, and though compensation can be recovered for them when they stand alone, yet when they are blended and confused with those which are forbidden, the whole is a unit and indivisible, and that which is bad destroys the good; 21 Wall. 441.

In Massachusetts by statute lawyers or agents endeavoring to secure the passage of a bill must file written authority from their principal; in California, lobbying, openly practised, is declared by the constitution a felony, and in Georgia, a crime.

LOCAL. Relating to place. A particular place.

LOCAL ACTION. In Practice. An action the cause of which could have arisen in some particular county only.

All local actions must be brought in the county where the cause of action arose.

In general, all actions are local which seek the recovery of real property; 2 W. Bla. 1070; 4 Term 504; 7 id. 589; 81 Tex. 382; whether founded upon contract or not; or damages for injury to such property, as waste, under the statute of Gloucester, trespass quare clausum fregit, trespass or case for injuries affecting things real, as for nuisances to houses or lands, disturbance of rights of way or of common, obstruction or diversion of ancient watercourses; 1 Chitty, Pl. 271; Gould, Pl. § 105; 130 Ind. 137; but not if there was a contract between the parties on which to ground an action; 15 Mass. 284; 1 Day Conn. 263.

Many actions arising out of injuries to local rights are local: as, quare impedit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 241. The action of replevin is also local; 1 Wms. Saund. 247, n. 1; Gould, Pl. § 111. See Gould; Chitty, Pleading; Comyns, Dig. Action; TRANSITORY ACTION.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. The government of a particular locality; the governmental authority of a municipal corporation over its individual affairs by virtue of power delegated to it by the general government.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD. A department of State in Great Britain created in 1871 to concentrate in one department of the government the supervision of the laws relating to public health, the relief of the poor, and local government. The president is usually a member of the cabinet and has a staff of permanent assistants. The lord president of the council, all the secretaries of state, the lord privy seal, and the chancellor of the exchequer are ex officio members. It has the power of making regulations which have the effect of statutes. It has complete control in poor law matters; very important powers relating to the pollution of streams; the adulteration of food, etc.; vaccination; the supervision of loans by local authorities and auditing their accounts. Local authorities may ask its advice; it may investigate as to the outbreak of diseases; and must report specially as to all bills relating to public matters. See 7 Encyc. of the Laws of England.

LOCAL LAW. See STATUTE.

LOCAL OPTION. A term often used to designate a right granted by legislative enactments to the inhabitants of particular districts, to determine by ballot whether or not licenses shall be issued for the sale of intoxicating liquors within such districts.

An act of this character passed in Delaware, in 1847, was declared unconstitutional as an attempted delegation of the power to make laws, confided to the legislature; 4 Harr. 479; so, also, in Indiana and Iowa; 4 Ind. 342; 42 Ind. 547; 5 Ia. 495. This kind of legislation has been supported, however, as falling within the class of police regulations; 108 Mass. 27. In Pennsylvania, Agnew, J., in a leading opinion on this subject, says, the true distinction is this: "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend;" 72 Pa. 491. At this time the weight of authority is in favor of the constitutionality of local option laws; 36 N. J. L. 720; 42 Conn. 364; 42 Md. 71; 96 Mo. 44; 111 id. 553; 91 Mich. 504. See 12 Cent. L. J. 123; 12 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 133; Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 145. See DELEGATION; LIQUOR LAWS; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

LOCAL STATUTES. See STATUTE.

LOCAL VENUE. In Pleading. A venue which must be laid in a particular county.

LOCATION. At Common Law. The act of selecting and designating lands which the person making the location is authorized by law to select.

It is applied among surveyors who are authorized by public authority to lay out lands by a particular warrant. The act of selecting the land designated in the warrant and surveying it is called its location. In Pennsylvania, it is an application made by any person for land, in the office of the secretary of the late land office of Pennsylvania, and entered in the books of said office, numbered and sent to the surveyor-general's office. Act June 25, 1781, § 2. It is often applied to denote the act of selecting and marking out the line upon which a railroad, canal, or highway is to be constructed.

In Mining Law. A parcel of land appropriated according to certain established rules, such as placing on the ground, in a conspicious position, a notice setting forth the name of the locator, the fact that it is thus taken or located, with the requisite description of the extent and boundaries of the parcel according to the local custom. 104 U. S. 649. See also U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324.

LOCUS DELICTI. The place where the tort, offence, or injury has been committed.

LOCUS IN QUO (Lat. the place in which). In Pleading. The place where anything is alleged to have been done. 1 Salk. 94.

LOCUS PARTITUS. In Old English Law. A division made between two towns or counties to make trial where the land or place in question lies. Fleta, l. 4, c. xv.

LOCUS PŒNITENTIÆ (Lat. a place of repentance). The opportunity of withdrawing from a projected contract, before the parties are finally bound; or of abandoning the intention of committing a crime, before it has been completed. 2 Bro. C. C. 569. Until an offer is accepted by the offeree the party making it may withdraw it at any time. So of a bid at auction. "An auction is not inaptly called locus pœnitentiæ." 3 Term 148. See ATTEMPT; CONTRACT; REFUSAL.

LOCUS REI SITÆ. See LEX REI SITÆ.

LOCUS SIGILLI (Lat.). The place of the seal.

In many of the states, instead of sealing deeds, writs, and other papers or documents requiring it, a scroll is made, in which the letters L. S. are printed or written, which is an abbreviation of Locus sigilli. This, in some of the states, has all the efficacy of a seal, but in others it has no such effect. See SCROLL; SEAL.

LOCUS STANDI (a place of standing). A right of appearance in a court of justice or before a legislative body, on a given question. A right to be heard.

It is commonly used in England in reference to parliamentary practice and usually as to the passage of private bills. There is a series of reports called Locus Standi Reports in the Court of Referees. See May, Parl. Pr. 761; 9 Jurid. Rev. 47, 206; REFEREES.

LODE. A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock located within defined boundaries within the general mass of the mountain. 1 McCrary 480.

A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock in the general mass, so far as it may continue unbroken and without interruption, whatever the boundaries may be. 143 U. S. 394; 116 id. 529.

Veins or lodes as used in the statutes mean lines or aggregations of metal embedded in quartz or other rock in piece; 128 U. S. 679.

"It is difficult to give any definition of the term, as understood and used in the acts of congress, which will not be subject to criticism. A fissure in the earth's crust, an opening in its rocks, a strata made by some force of nature, in which a mineral is deposited, was said to be essential to a lode in the judgment of geologists. But to the practical miner, the fissure and its walls are only of importance as indicating the boundaries within which he may look for and reasonably expect to find the ore he seeks. A continuous body of mineralized rock lying within any other well defined boundaries on the earth's surface and under it, would equally constitute in his eyes a lode. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the term as used in the acts of congress is applicable to any zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rock." 116 U. S. 529, citing 4 Sawy. 302.

By act of congress the owner of a mineral vein or lode is entitled not only to that which is covered by the surface lines of his established claim, as those lines are extended vertically, but also to the right to possess and enjoy that lode or vein by following it when it passes outside of those vertical lines laterally; 116 U. S. 529; but this right is dependent upon its being the same vein as that within those limits; and for its exercise, it must appear that the vein outside is identical with and a continuation of the one within these lines; id. See 73 Cal. 169; 58 Fed. Rep. 106; LANDS, PUBLIC.

LODE MANAGE. The hire of a pilot, for conducting a ship from one place to another. Cowel.

The Lodesmen had a monopoly of pilotage in the Cinque Ports (q. v.). Their society was controlled by the court of lodemanage, which was transferred to the trinity house in 1853. See Lyons, Cinque Ports.

LODGE. To make, prefer, as to lodge a complaint or information; to deposit or file with.

LODGER. One who inhabits a portion of a house of which another has the general possession and custody.

It is difficult to state exactly the distinctions between a lodger, a guest, and a boarder. A person may be a guest at an inn without being a lodger; 1 Salk. 388; 9 Pick. 280; 25 Wend. 653, 242; 16 Ala. N. S. 666; 8 Blackf. 535; 14 Barb. 193; 6 C. B. 132. And boarder includes one who regularly takes his meals with, and forms in some degree a part of, the householder's family; 25 E. L. & Eq. 76. A lodger does not take meals in the house as lodger; but the duration of the inhabitancy is of no importance as determining his character. The difficulty in this respect is in deciding whether a person is an under-tenant, entitled to notice to quit, or merely a lodger, and not entitled to such notice. See Woodf. L. & T., 2d ed. 132, 177; 7 M. & G. 87; BOARDER; GUEST; INN; INNKEEPER.

LODGING HOUSE ACTS. Various acts for the well ordering of common lodging houses, beginning in 1851 with the stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 28.

An act for the regulation and licensing of public lodging houses is a legitimate exercise of the police power; 180 Pa. 47.

LODS ET RENTES. A fine payable to the seigneur upon every sale of lands within his seigniory. 1 Low. C. 59.

Any transfer of lands for a consideration gives rise to the claim; 1 Low. C. 79; as, the creation of a rente viagire (life-rent); 1 Low. C. 84; a transfer under bail emphyteotique; 1 Low. C. 295; a promise to sell, accompanied by transfer of possession; 9 Low. C. 272. It does not arise on a transfer by a father to his son subject to a payment by the son of a life-rent to the father, and of the father's debts; 8 Low. C. 5, 84, 324; nor where property is required for public uses; 1 Low. C. 91.

LOG-BOOK. A ship's journal. It contains a minute account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage. 1 Marsh. Ins. 408.

The part of the log-book relating to transactions in the harbor is termed the harbor log; that relating to what happens at sea, the sea log. Young, Naut. Dic.

When a log-book is required by law to be kept, it is an official register so far as regards the transactions required by law to be entered in it, but no further. Abbott, Shipp., 13th ed. 984; 1 Sumn. 373; 4 Mas. 544; 1 Dods. 9; 2 Hagg. Eccl. 159; Gilp. 147.

All vessels making foreign voyages from the United States, or, of the burden of seventy-five tons or more, from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, must have an official log-book; Rev. Stat. § 4290; in which must be entered:—Every offence committed by a member of the crew for which it is intended to prosecute or to enforce a forfeiture; every offence for which punishment is inflicted on board, and the punishment inflicted; a statement of the character, conduct, and qualifications of each member of the crew, or a statement that the master declines to give such particulars; every case of illness or of injury to any member of the crew, the nature thereof, and the medical treatment; every death on board and the cause thereof; every birth, with the sex of the infant, and the name of the parents; every marriage, with the names and ages of the parties; the name of any seaman who ceases to be a member of the crew, and the place, time, manner, and cause thereof; a statement of the wages due any seaman or apprentice who dies during the voyage and the gross amount of all deductions to be made; the sale of the effects of the deceased seaman, including a statement of each article sold and the sum received for it. Id. §§ 4290–4292.

In suits for seamen's wages, the log-book is to be produced if required, or otherwise the plaintiff may state its contents. The neglect of a seaman to render himself on board, and his absence without leave, are also to be entered on the log-book in certain cases, or the sailor's fault will not forfeit his wages. Acts 20 July, 1790, §§ 2, 5, & 6; 7 June, 1872; 27 Feb. 1877.

In collision actions log-books are not evidence for the ship in which they are kept, though they are against them; L. R. 1 P. C. 378; though the master and mate were both dead; 10 P. D. 31.

For the English law on the subject, see Merch. Shipp. Act 1894; Maude & Poll. Merch. Shipp.

It is the duty of the mate to keep the log-book. Dana, Seaman's Friend 145, 200.

Every entry shall be signed by the master and mate or some other one of the crew, and shall be made as soon as possible after the occurrence to which it relates. For keeping the log in an improper manner the master is punishable by fine; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4291, 4292.

LOGS. The stems or trunks of trees cut into convenient lengths for the purpose of being afterwards manufactured into lumber of various kinds. 52 Wis. 398.

When logs are driven in a navigable stream in an ordinarily skilful and prudent manner, the owner is not liable for damages sustained by a riparian owner; 67 Wis. 569.

Such logs floating down a stream may be moored to the shore for a reasonable length of time for the purpose of making them into rafts, or for breaking up the rafts, or to enable the owner to sell them; 23 Minn. 430; 8 Ore. 445; 50 Cal. 129; 51 Me. 264. But they may not be so stored as to prevent another from entering with a drive of logs from a tributary; 78 Me. 329; nor may they be run upon adjacent lands or cause water to overflow, to the injury of the riparian proprietor; 14 Ore. 319; 81 Ala. 284; or obstruct a landing place on a navigable river; 145 Mass. 261; and where a boom obstructs navigation or interferes with the use of a dock built in aid of navigation it is a nuisance; 66 Wis. 476.

Boom companies are not insurers of the logs collected by their booms, nor are they liable for logs which escape by inevitable accident; 109 Pa. 57; except where they fail to exercise due care; 90 Me. 125. Where logs drift from a raft broken by a storm without fault of the owner, he is not obliged to re-capture and remove them, when by so doing he must resort to extraordinary methods and unreasonable expense, in order to escape liability caused by a subsequent storm, although he has not abandoned them; 49 La. Ann. 1184. See LIEN; RIVERS; NAVIGABLE WATERS; RIPARIAN RIGHTS; TIMBER; BOOM COMPANIES.

LOG ROLLING. Mutual compacts between members of a legislature by which one assists the passage of a bill in which he has no interest in consideration of like assistance from the interested member.

LONGEVITY PAY. Extra compensation for longevity in actual service in the army or navy. 18 Ct. Cl. 111.

Its introduction was intended (1) to induce men to enter the service and remain in it for life; (2) to remove the depressing influence of long years of service in one grade without increase of pay; (3) to compensate for increased professional knowledge and efficiency of officers by increasing their pay in advance of promotion. Id.

The act relating to longevity pay deals with credit for length of service and the additional pay which arises therefrom, and not with the matter of regular salary, and it has no reference to benefits derived from promotion to different grades, but is confined to the lowest grade having graduated pay; 129 U. S. 249; 151 id. 362, 366.

Service as midshipman at a naval academy is service as an officer in the navy as respects longevity pay; 125 U. S. 646; 128 id. 254; 124 id. 309; so is that of a cadet at West Point; 112 U. S. 1; a private in the marine corps who was one of the members of the marine band is entitled to the benefit of the act; 124 U. S. 301; and officers retired from active service; 124 U. S. 391. It is not necessary that one should have entered the service more than once; 123 U. S. 186; but service in a volunteer regiment will not be included in computing the time of service of an officer; 157 U. S. 281.

In a suit for longevity pay, a sum previously paid the claimant for such pay to which he was not entitled, may be deducted from the sum found to be due him; 151 U. S. 366.

LOSS. When used in a statute with reference to a loss of goods by common carriers, loss means injury or damage to the goods, as well as their destruction or disappearance, 71 Ga. 40; 88 id. 805.

In Insurance. The destruction of or damage to the insured subject by the perils insured against, according to the express provisions and construction of the contract.

These accidents, or misfortunes, or perils, as they are usually denominated, are all distinctly enumerated in the policy. And no loss, however great or unforeseen, can be a loss within the policy unless it be the direct and immediate consequence of one or more of these perils. Marsh. Ins. 1, c. 12.

Loss under a life policy is the death of the subject by a cause the risk of which is not expressly excepted in the policy, and where the loss is not fraudulent, as where one assured, who insures the life of another for his own benefit, procures the death.

Loss in insurance against fire must, under the usual form of policy, be by the partial or total destruction or damage of the thing insured by fire.

In maritime insurance, in which loss by fire is one of the risks usually included, the loss insured against may be absolutely or constructively total, or a partial or general average loss, or a particular average. See AVERAGE.

In other forms of insurance what constitutes a loss is determined by the risks or perils insured against as specified in the policy. As to the various kinds of which see the sub-titles of INSURANCE.

A partial loss is any loss or damage short of, or not amounting to, a total loss: for if it be not the latter it must be the former. See 4 Mass. 374; 6 id. 102, 122, 317; 12 id. 170, 288; 8 Johns. 237; 10 id. 487; 5 Binn. 595; 2 S. & R. 553.

Partial losses are sometimes denominated average losses, because they are often in the nature of those losses which are the subject of average contributions; and they are distinguished into general and particular averages. See AVERAGE.

A total loss is such destruction of, or damage to, the thing insured that it is of little or no value to the owner.

Total losses, in maritime insurance, are absolutely such when the entire thing perishes or becomes of no value. Constructively, a loss may become total where the value remaining is of such a small amount that the whole may be surrendered. See 2 Phill. Ins. ch. xvii.; 2 Johns. 266; Beach, Ins. § 916; 66 Tex. 103; 44 La. Ann. 714; ABANDONMENT.

It is under marine policies that questions of constructive total loss most frequently arise. Such loss may be by capture or seizure by unlawful violence, as piracy; Arn. Ins., 6th ed. 951; 1 Phil. Ins. § 1106; 2 E. L. & E. 85; or damage to ship or goods over half of the value at the time and place of loss; 1 Curt. C. C. 148; 9 Cush. 415; 5 Den. 342; 19 Ala. N. S. 108; or loss of the voyage; 4 Me. 431; 24 Miss. 461; 19 N. Y. 272; 1 Mart. La. 221; though the ship or goods may survive in specie, but so as not to be fit for use in the same character for the same service or purpose; 2 Caines, Cas. 324; Valin, tom. 2, tit. Ass. a. 46; or by jettison; 1 Caines 196; or by necessity to sell on account of the action and effect of the peril insured against; 5 Gray 154; 1 Cra. 202; or by loss of insured freight consequent on the loss of cargo or ship; 18 Johns. 208.

There may be a claim for a total loss in addition to a partial loss; 17 How. 595. A total loss of the ship is not necessarily such of cargo; 3 Binn. 287; nor is submersion necessarily a total loss; 7 East 38; nor is temporary delay of the voyage; 5 B. & Ald. 597.

A constructive total loss, and an abandonment thereupon of the ship, is a constructive total loss of freight; and a constructive total loss and abandonment of cargo has a like effect as to commissions or profits thereon; and the validity of the abandonment will depend upon the actual facts at the time of the abandonment, as the same may subsequently prove to have been; 2 Phillips, Ins. § 1630; 3 Johns Cas. 93. See ABANDONMENT.

An insured cannot recover for a total loss of a vessel, in the absence of proof of abandonment and of notice of the same on the insurer; 40 La. Ann. 553.

In determining the proportion which the cost of repairing a vessel must bear to its value, so as to justify its abandonment to the insurers as a constructive total loss, its value as stated in the policy controls, and not its actual value immediately before the accident; 25 N. Y. S. 414.

Under a fire insurance policy it is not necessary to show that all the material of the building was destroyed, to sustain a finding of total loss, and where it is such a loss, a provision of the policy limiting the amount to less than the sum written is invalid; 44 Neb. 549; 90 Tex. 170. The loss has been held to be total where the building was so injured as to lose its identity; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 98; 93 Wis. 526; or so that it was unsafe and was condemned by the municipal authorities; 47 La. Ann. 1563. But where the roof and interior woodwork of a building were destroyed, leaving the walls standing, it was a question for the jury whether it was a total loss within the meaning of the policy; 85 Hun 250.

PROOFS OF LOSS. It is a usual condition in all policies in insurance that immediate notice of loss shall be given by the insured, and generally some time is named within which the proofs of loss shall be given in writing to the company. Compliance with such is a condition precedent, and notice, or waiver of it, must be shown; 48 Kan. 239; 40 Neb. 700; 60 Mo. App. 673; though there is a mortgage clause; 99 Ga. 65; but where there is such clause, a mortgagee is not required to make proofs; 5 Kan. App. 137.

Failure to make proof is not excused by refusal of the company to furnish blanks; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. 620. A statement mailed within the time is rendered to the company; 168 Ill. 286; and notice duly addressed, stamped, and mailed is presumed to have been received, if not denied; 3 Ind. App. 332. Where a statute requires notice "accompanied by an affidavit" of the circumstances, they need not be attached together or delivered at the same moment; 84 Ia. 93. Notice is conclusively shown when the company sends an adjuster; 151 Pa. 607; or telegraphs an adjuster to give it attention; 48 Mo. App. 65. A new proof of loss made long afterwards under promise of settlement if the claim was reduced, was mere surplusage and did not affect the rights of the insured; 137 N. Y. 389; and where the policy required duplicate bills, vouchers, etc., it was only necessary to show reasonable effort to obtain them; 162 Pa. 357. An itemized estimate of the cost of rebuilding is sufficient compliance with a requirement of a verified certificate of the value of the building destroyed; 65 Fed. Rep. 292; contra, 96 Ia. 224. A false statement in the affidavit of loss, made by mistake, will not vitiate a policy which provides that it shall be void in case of any false swearing by the insured in relation to the insurance; 107 Mich. 328; and formal defects or irregularities which cannot be obviated will not prevent recovery; 26 Ins. L. J. 695.

Formal or preliminary proofs may be waived by parol; 40 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 670. A waiver of proofs results from a denial of all liability; 16 Ind. App. 160; 10 App. D. C. 277; 16 Wash. 155; or a denial on other grounds; 97 Tenn. 1; 69 Mo. App. 126; 13 App. Div. N. Y. 444; as from the defence that the policy was never in force; 49 Neb. 811; or the omission to object to the form; 153 Pa. 398; but they are not waived by careful investigation; 42 U. S. App. 81; s. c. 74 Fed. Rep. 507; or by reason of an irresistible conclusion that the company had determined to defend the suit, resulting from assertions made during the negotiations; id.; or by an offer of compromise; 42 W. Va. 426; or by a refusal after insufficient proofs are furnished to consider the loss unless a specified claim should be eliminated; 57 Kan. 576; or by the mere denial of liability on the ground that the property destroyed was not covered; 90 Me. 385; 151 Pa. 607; 96 U. S. 572; 88 N. Y. 168; or mere silence; 86 Ala. 558; or a promise by local agents, without authority to adjust, that the loss would be paid; 77 Ia. 376. The act relied on to establish a waiver must occur within the time fixed by the policy; 58 Mo. App. 225. The insured does not lose the benefit of a waiver by making proofs, and he may plead both compliance and the waiver; 98 Ia. 221. The proofs should ordinarily be made by the insured, but where he is not in a position to make them in person, they may be made by an agent; 166 Ill. 400; or mortgagee to whom the policy is made payable; 56 Hun 399; or the company's adjuster; 131 Ind. 572; 85 Wis. 229; and they may be in the name of a firm; 122 N. Y. 545. Where the policy requires proofs "as soon as possible," what is reasonable time is a mixed question of law and fact; 110 Pa. 530; 70 Ia. 704.

ARBITRATION. A common provision in policies for all kinds of insurance is one for compulsory arbitration in case of difference between the parties as to the amount of loss. Such a provision has been held void as ousting the court of its jurisdiction; 21 Misc. Rep. 124; contra, 112 Ala. 318; 50 N. J. L. 453. An award is not required as a condition precedent to a right of action, but a refusal for a demand of appraisal may be set up as a bar; 16 Wash. 232, in which rehearing was denied; 47 Pac. Rep. 885; but it has been held a condition precedent; 69 Mo. App. 232; 71 Tex. 5; but not unless requested in writing; 96 Ia. 70; and it is inoperative where no arbitrators are agreed upon; 57 Kan. 95; and is not applicable to a case of total loss; 50 Hun 172; or to the portion of the insured property totally destroyed; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 39; or where the insurer denies liability; 120 N. C. 302; or in case of total loss under valued policy acts; 74 Wis. 67; 36 Neb. 461; 61 Mo. App. 572. Formal notice of the proceedings of appraisers is not necessary to a party who has knowledge of them; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 218. A valuation by the company's adjuster and builders selected by the insured is an appraisal within the policy, without previous effort to agree upon the loss; 36 U. S. App. 327; s. c. 71 Fed. Rep. 120.

Appraisers cannot determine the construction of the policy; 17 App. Div. N. Y. 87; and the award may be set aside where it is grossly below the actual loss; 12 Tex. Civ. App. 572; but not for a mere mistake, not appearing on its face; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 218; and it need not state the manner of arriving at the result; id.

LOST INSTRUMENT. A document or paper which has been so mislaid that it cannot be found after diligent search.

Suits to establish lost instruments are within the jurisdiction of equity, but the proof as to the contents must be clear and satisfactory; 35 Fla. 212; and such a suit will not be entertained to establish the lost instrument merely as a piece of written evidence to sustain an action of tort; 66 Fed. Rep. 799.

This equitable jurisdiction extends to ordering the issue of bonds to replace those lost, where the loss or destruction was without fault of the party seeking relief; and it can be done without derogating from positive agreement or violating equal or superior equities in other parties. Such relief has been given in case of bonds stolen and hidden in the ground at the evacuation of Petersburg by the Confederate forces; 45 Md. 102; and for bonds stolen from the vault of a bank; 27 N. J. Eq. 408.

A copy of a deed by joint makers cannot be established without proof of execution by all; 96 Ga. 197; and wherever it is sought to establish title to real property under a lost unrecorded deed, the rule as to the amount of evidence required is very strict; 89 Me. 462.

Formerly in such cases a resort to equity was compelled by the want of any remedy at law, resulting from the necessity of making profert; 1 Ch. Cas. 77; but after profert was dispensed with, the courts of law acquired concurrent jurisdiction and the loss of a paper would not prevent recovery; 1 Ves. 341; 7 id. 19; 3 V. & B. 54. Nevertheless a court of equity still has jurisdiction to establish a lost deed; 142 U. S. 417.

The fact that interest on a bond is payable upon "presentation and delivery of the coupon" will not prevent recovery on a lost coupon; 21 Misc. Rep. 439. Where a note is lost pending an action while in the hands of the justice, indemnity is not required; 43 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 904; and an allegation of loss after maturity of a note sued on, dispenses with the necessity of tender of indemnity; 141 Ind. 322. An action may be brought on a lost official bond; 57 Ill. App. 674. In an action for the breach of a lost contract, where the fact of its existence is controverted, it is a question for the jury; 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 241.

It is held that an action will lie upon a lost negotiable instrument; 10 Ad. & E. 616; 2 Spear, L. 193. The weight of authority seems to be that an action would not lie on a lost negotiable note; 1 Exch. 167; 9 id. 604; 21 Gratt. 556; 46 N. C. 78; 17 Me. 9; 20 D. C. 191 (distinguishing id. 26, where the action was maintained on a note accidentally lost after being in evidence in that court); contra, 2 Bay 495; 18 Ga. 65; 1 R. I. 401; 3 Yeates 442, but see comments on these cases, 16 L. R. A. 305, n. In some courts the suit has been permitted upon giving indemnity; 34 Conn. 546; 4 Martin La. N. S. 4; 16 Pick. 315.

In some states and in England it is provided by statute that an action may be maintained on a lost negotiable instrument. Under such statutes it is held that they may be maintained without showing the absolute destruction of the instrument; 52 Ind. App. 216; but judgment cannot be recovered without indemnity; 60 Mo. App. 671: 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 248.

Where the remedy at law is denied in the case of a lost negotiable instrument and there is no statute, relief must be sought by a bill in equity to compel payment after tender of indemnity; 7 B. & C. 90; 35 Neb. 693; Pars. N. & B. 262. The loss of a bond is no objection to its payment by the company which issued it, upon indemnity; 40 Vt. 399. The title of the true owner of a lost certificate of stock may be asserted against a subsequent owner even though he be a bona fide purchaser; 148 N. Y. 441.

The contents of a lost deed, will, agreement, etc., may be proved by secondary evidence after proof of its existence; 150 Pa. 538; and that diligent search has been made and that it cannot be found; Tayl. Ev. 402; 147 Pa. 447; the party's own evidence is sufficient for this purpose; 1 Atk. 446; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 349; or that of any one who knows the facts; 90 Ga. 731. See WILL.

Even a will proved to be lost may be admitted to probate upon secondary evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 84, 509, 575; 1 P. & D. 154; s. c. 17 Eng. Rep. 45, note; but this case has been characterized as going to the "verge of the law"; 11 App. Cas. 474. The fact of the loss must be proved by the clearest evidence; 8 Metc. 487; 2 Add. Eccl. 223; 6 Wend. 173; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 115. Where it has been in the custody of the testator and is not found at his death, it is presumed to have been destroyed, animo revocandi; 17 Moak's Engl. Rep. 511; 6 Wend. 173; 11 Biss. 265; especially where the testator knew of the loss while alive and did not produce it; 140 Pa. 242. Its absence is said to be prima facie evidence of cancellation; 1 Bay 457; but where no revocation is proved or presumed, declarations, written or oral, made by a testator, both before and after the execution of the will, are admissible as secondary evidence; id.; Steph. Ev. § 29; Beach, Wills § 73; 97 Mich. 49; Schoul. Wills § 402. And see 28 W. Va. 113, for an extended historical discussion of the subject. It is also said that chancery, on a bill suitably filed, has exercised a similar jurisdiction; id.

The "copy" of a lost instrument intended by the act of congress of January 23, 1874 (for stamping unstamped instruments), is a substantial copy, or such a draft of the original instrument as will identify the subject of the tax; 82 Pa. 280.

LOST, OR NOT LOST. A phrase in policies of insurance, signifying the contract to be retrospective and applicable to any loss within the specified risk, provided the same is not already known to either of the parties, and that neither has any knowledge or information not equally obvious or known to the other. The clause has been adopted only in maritime insurance; though a fire or life policy is not infrequently retrospective, or, under a different phraseology, by a provision that the risk is to commence at some time prior to its date. 1 Phill. Ins. § 925. Such policy on a vessel building "to take effect as soon as water-borne," takes effect at once if she is already water-borne; 6 Gray 192.

LOST PAPERS. See LOST INSTRUMENT.

LOST PROPERTY. See FINDER, where the subject is treated, and see also 33 Ch. D. 566, where a prehistoric boat found by a gas company while excavating on land leased by it was held to belong to the lessor.

LOT. That which fortuitously determines what we are to acquire.

When it can be certainly known what are our rights, we ought never to resort to a decision by lot; but when it is impossible to tell what actually belongs to us, as if an estate is divided into three parts and one part given to each of three persons, the proper way to ascertain each one's part is to draw lots; Wolff, Dr. etc., de la Nat. § 669.

Verdicts reached by a jury by drawing lots will be set aside; 1 Ky. L. J. 500. See JURY. See also 1 Wash. Ty. 329; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 808, n.

LOT AND SCOT. Duties to be paid by persons exercising the elective franchise in certain cities before being allowed to vote.

LOT OF GROUND. A small piece of land in a town or city, usually employed for building, a yard, a garden, or such other urban use. Lots are in-lots, or those within the boundary of the city or town, and out-lots, those which are out of such boundary and which are used by some of the inhabitants of such town or city.

LOTHERWITE or LEYERWIT. A liberty or privilege to take amends for lying with a bondwoman without license. See LAIRWITE.

LOTTERY. A scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance. 7 N. Y. 228; 59 Ill. 160.

A scheme by which a result is reached by some action or means taken, in which result man's choice or will has no part, and which human reason, foresight, sagacity, or design cannot enable him to know or determine, until the same has been accomplished. 74 Mich. 264.

A scheme by which, on one's paying money or some other thing of value, he obtains the contingent right to have something of greater value, if an appeal to chance, by lot or otherwise, under the direction of the manager of the scheme, should decide in his favor. Bish. St. Crimes § 952.

The word lottery "embraces the elements of procuring, through lot or chance, by the investment of a sum of money or something of value, some greater amount of money or thing of greater value." 58 Fed. Rep. 942. It includes policy-playing, gift-exhibitions, prize concerts, raffles at fairs, etc., and various forms of gambling; id.

Where a pecuniary consideration is paid, and it is to be determined by chance, according to some scheme held out to the public, as to what and how much he who pays the money is to receive for it, that is a lottery; 56 N. Y. 424. It is well settled that every scheme for the division of property or money by chance is prohibited by law; 61 Ind. 39. Lotteries were formerly often resorted to as a means of raising money, by states as well as individuals, and are still authorized in many foreign countries, but have been abolished as immoral in England, and throughout this country. They were declared a nuisance and prohibited by 10 & 11 Will. III. c. 17, and foreign lotteries were forbidden to be advertised in England by the 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 66.

Selling boxes of candy, each box being represented to contain a prize, the purchaser selecting his box in ignorance of its contents, is a lottery; 2 Tex. App. 610; so in 89 N. C. 572; 137 Mass. 250; 11 Q. B. Div. 207. Where money was subscribed which was to be invested in funds which were to be divided amongst the subscribers by lot, and divided unequally, it was held a lottery; 11 Ch. Div. 170. Although every ticket in a drawing represents a prize of some value, yet if those prizes are of unequal values, the scheme of distribution is a lottery; 40 Ill. 465.

A scheme for increasing the circulation of a newspaper, whereby all subscribers receive numbered tickets corresponding to numbered coupons, which are drawn from a box by a blindfolded person, prizes to be given to the holders of certain tickets, is a lottery under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3894, prohibiting carrying through the mails of any newspaper containing any advertisement of any lottery, etc., 58 Fed. Rep. 942; so it was held that an issue of bonds of the Austrian government, payable at a specified time, but with a provision that bonds, as drawn, should be redeemed with a bonus, which was to increase year by year, was within that act, which related to all lotteries, the word "illegal" having been omitted from the original act by amendment in 1890; 147 U. S. 456.

A lottery for the disposal of land is within the prohibition of the Pennsylvania act, where the lots drawn are of very unequal value; 4 S. & R. 151; so when there is a contract for the sale of several lots of land, of unequal value, to several subscribers, which provides that each one's lot shall be determined "by lot" and a certain "prize" lot is to be given to one of the subscribers by "lot"; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 103. So where one furnished a cigar to every person who placed a five-cent piece in a slot machine, and the one after whose play the machine indicated the highest card hand was to receive all the cigars; 22 So. Rep. (Ala.) 138; and where every purchaser of dry goods received a key and was told that one key would be given out which would unlock a certain box containing twenty-five dollars, which would go to the person who received this key; 54 Kan. 711. So where every subscriber to a newspaper received a ticket which entitled him to participate in a distribution of prizes by lot; 73 Mo. 647; and of a bond investment scheme, where bonds were issued at a specified price and the value of each bond was determined by its number, the bonds being numbered in the order of application for them; 63 Fed. Rep. 426.

A "missing word" competition, in which the winners are to be those who, upon sending a shilling to the promoter of the competition, select, to fill up a named sentence, a particular word also selected by the promoter, is a lottery within the English act; [1896] 2 Ch. 154.

Raffles at fairs, etc., are as clearly violations of the criminal law as the most elaborate and carefully organized lotteries; 8 Phila. 457. Thus the American Art Union is a lottery; 8 N. Y. 228, 240; so a "gift-sale" of books; 33 N. H. 329; so "prize-concerts"; 97 Mass. 583; and "gift-exhibitions"; 32 N. J. L. 398; 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 210; 59 Ill. 160; 62 Ala. 334; 74 N. Y. 63. The payment of prizes need not be in money; 7 N. Y. 228; as where a suit of clothing was given at a weekly drawing in a merchant tailor's club; 48 Minn. 555.

On the other hand, where the scheme affords room for the exercise of skill and judgment, it is not a lottery; 60 L. J. M. C. 116. So of a coupon competition in a newspaper, where purchasers of copies of the newspapers fill in on coupons the horses selected by them as likely to come in first, second, third, and fourth in a given race, the purchaser to receive a penny for every coupon filled up after the first, and a money prize to be given to the holder of the coupon who should name the first four horses correctly; [1895] 2 Q. B. 474; where a soap-dealer offered a prize to be drawn by lot, to the person who should most nearly guess the weight of a certain cake of soap, it was held not to be a lottery; 56 Alb. L. J. 95, S. C. of New Brunswick.

The mere determination by lot where there is no giving of prizes, is not a lottery; 8 Phila. 457. Merely determining by lot the time at which certain bonds are to be paid, is not a lottery; 30 Fed. Rep. 499; but it is otherwise if a prize is offered on the bonds so drawn; id. To constitute a lottery something of value must be parted with, directly or indirectly, by him who has the chance; 88 Ala. 196; 16 Am. St. Rep. 38 and note. Therefore, where every customer of a shoe store and every applicant received a ticket gratuitously, and a piano was allotted by chance among the holders, it was held not to be a lottery; 18 Colo. 321. Where the element of certainty goes hand in hand with the element of chance in an enterprise offering prizes, the former element does not destroy the existence or effect of the latter; 147 U. S. 449.

The act which forbids conveying in the mails newspapers containing anything relating to a lottery is within the power of congress to establishing postoffices, and does not abridge the freedom of the press; 143 U. S. 110. The right to operate a lottery is not a fundamental right; id. Under this act it is an offence to deliver in Illinois a prohibited circular mailed in the city of New York, and such an offence is triable in Illinois; 143 U. S. 207.

It is a valid exercise of power in a state to protect the morals and advance the welfare of the people by prohibiting any scheme bearing any semblance to a lottery or gambling; 74 Md. 565.

"A lottery grant is not, in any sense, a contract within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, but is simply a gratuity and license, which the state, under its police powers, and for the protection of the public morals, may at any time revoke and forbid the further conduct of the lottery; and no right acquired during the life of the grant, on the faith of, or by agreement with, the grantee, can be exercised after the revocation of such grant and the forbidding of the lottery, if its exercise involves a continuance of the lottery as originally authorized;" 168 U. S. 488, 502, following 101 U. S. 814, where it was said, referring to lotteries:—"Certainly the right to suppress them is governmental, to be exercised at all times by those in power at their discretion." A lottery charter is "in legal effect nothing more than a license. . ."

The fact that one government authorizes lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets, cannot authorize their sale in another government which forbids their sale; 147 U. S. 462.

A purchase of a ticket in a foreign lottery outside the state, is a valid contract; 13 Pa. 328. An ordinance which makes it unlawful "for any person to have in his possession, unless it be shown that such possession is innocent, any lottery ticket, "is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it places on the person accused of its violation, the burden of showing the innocence of his possession; 41 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 693.

Where it was undisputed that the defendant was engaged in the lottery business, evidence that he received an order for lottery tickets such as were subsequently mailed with the letter; that the name used in the address of the letter was the same as that signed to the order; that the tickets bore his stamp, and that the letter enclosed his business card, would justify the conclusion that the defendant deposited the letter in the post-office for mailing; 1 Fed. Rep. 426.

A court of equity will not grant relief where letters addressed to the secretary of a lottery company are detained by a postmaster under the direction of the postmaster-general, if the pleadings fail to show that the letters had no connection with the lottery business; 1 Fed. Rep. 417. The act of June 8, 1872, Rev. S. § 4041, authorizes the postmaster-general to forbid the payment by any postmaster of a money order to any person engaged in the lottery business. But this does not authorize any person to open any letter not addressed to himself.

The act of March 2, 1895, provides that any person who shall cause to be brought within the United States from abroad, for the purpose of disposing of the same, or deposited in or carried by the mails from one state to another, any paper, etc., purporting to be or represent a ticket, etc., in a lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon chance, or shall cause any advertisement of such lottery, etc., to be brought into the United States, etc., shall be punishable, for the first offence, by imprisonment or fine, or both, and, for further offences, by imprisonment. See 164 U. S. 676.

LOUAGE. In French Law. The contract of hiring and letting. It may be of things or of labor. (1) Letting of things. (a) Bail à loyer, the letting of houses; (b) Bail à ferme, the letting of land; (2) Letting of labor,—(a) Loyer, the letting of personal service; (b) Bail à cheval, the letting of a horse.

LOUISIANA. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

It was first explored by the French in 1682, under Robert Chevalier de la Salle, and named Louisiana, in honor of Louis XIV. In 1699, a French settlement was begun at Biloxi by Lemoyne d'Iberville. His efforts were followed up in 1712 by Anthony Crozat, a man of wealth, who upheld the trade of the country for several years. About 1717 all his interest in the province was transferred to the "Western Company," a chartered corporation, at the head of which was the celebrated John Law, whose speculations involved the ruin of one-half the French nobility. In 1732 the "Company" resigned all their rights to the crown, by whom the whole of Louisiana was ceded to Spain in 1762. By the treaty of St. Ildefonso, signed October 1, 1800, Spain re-conveyed it to France, from whom it was purchased by the United States, April 30, 1803, for $15,000,000. Louisiana was admitted into the Union by an act of congress, approved April 8, 1812.

The first constitution was adopted January 22, 1812, and was substantially copied from that of Kentucky. This constitution was superseded by that of 1845, which was in its turn replaced by the one adopted July 11, 1852. Next in order came the constitution of 1864, which yielded to that of 1868, which in turn was succeeded by the constitution adopted July 21, 1879.

A new constitution was adopted May 11, 1898, and promulgated by the convention without submission to the people, to go into effect May 12, 1898. The instrument is very long and contains a great deal of general legislation; it provides educational and property qualifications in the alternative for suffrage, and in addition the right of suffrage is specifically conferred upon every male person who was on Jan. 1, 1867, or at any date prior thereto, entitled to vote under the constitution or statutes of any state of the United States wherein he then resided, and also upon any son or grandson of such person not less than twenty-one years of age at the date of the adoption of the constitution; and it is also provided that no person of foreign birth naturalized prior to Jan. 1, 1898, shall be denied the right to vote by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications prescribed, provided he shall have resided in the state five years next preceding the date of his application for registration. This exceptional right of suffrage can only be exercised by persons registered prior to September 1, 1898.

The Legislative Power is vested in a general assembly which consists of a senate and house of representatives elected for four years. Senators must be twenty-five years of age. A person elected to either house must have been a citizen of the state for five years, and an actual resident of the district or parish, for two years immediately preceding his election. Representation in the house of representatives is equal and uniform according to population, with an additional representative for any fraction exceeding one-half the representative number. The number of representatives cannot be more than one hundred and sixteen nor less than ninety-eight; but each parish and each ward of the city of New Orleans must have at least one representative. The state is divided into senatorial districts. The number of senators cannot be more than forty-one nor less than thirty-six, and they are apportioned by the constitution among the senatorial districts according to the total population of the several districts.

The sessions are biennial on the second Monday of May in the even years.

The Executive Power is vested in a governor, lieutenant-governor, auditor, treasurer, and secretary of state

The supreme executive power of the state is vested in the governor, who is elected for four years. In case of a tie between two candidates, a selection is to be made between these by the joint vote of the general assembly. The governor has the usual powers and duties, that of granting pardons, being upon the recommendation in writing of the lieutenant-governor, attorney-general, and presiding judge of the court before which conviction was had, or any two of them. The senate must confirm his appointments, and he has the veto power, which may be overcome if the bill is passed over the veto, by a vote of two-thirds of the members of each house.

The lieutenant-governor is elected by the people at the same time, for the same term, and must possess the same qualifications as the governor. He is president of the senate by virtue of his office, but has only a casting vote therein. In case of a vacancy in the office of governor or his disability, or absence from the state, his powers and duties devolve upon the lieutenant-governor for the residue of the term, or until the governor absent or impeached shall return or be acquitted, or the disability be removed. After the lieutenant-governor the succession to the office of governor is to the president pro tempore of the senate, or if none, the secretary of state shall act until one is elected.

The treasurer, auditor, secretary of state, and also the attorney-general, are elected by the qualified electors of the state for the term of four years.

The Judicial Power is vested in a supreme court, in courts of appeal, in district courts, and in justices of the peace and in such other courts as may be established by law.

The supreme court is composed of one chief justice and four associate justices, appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, for the term of twelve years, a vacancy being filled for the unexpired term. The state is divided into four supreme court districts, and the court is composed of judges appointed from those districts. The supreme court has appellate jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute or fund to be distributed, whatever may be the amount therein claimed, exceeds two thousand dollars exclusive of interest; to suits for divorce and separation from bed and board, and to all cases in which the constitutionality or legality of any tax, toll, or impost whatever, or of any fine, forfeiture, or penalty imposed by a municipal corporation, is in contestation, whatever may be the amount thereof, and in such cases, the appeal on the law and the facts shall be directly from the court in which the case originated to the supreme court; and to criminal cases on questions of law alone, whenever the punishment of death or imprisonment at hard labor may be inflicted, or a fine exceeding three hundred dollars or imprisonment exceeding six months is actually imposed. Its jurisdiction extends to questions of fact affecting its own jurisdiction. It has appellate jurisdiction only, but exercises control and general supervision over all inferior courts; and may issue writs of habeas corpus, certiorari, prohibition, mandamus, quo warranto, and other remedial writs.

This court is also invested with the exclusive original jurisdiction touching professional misconduct of members of the bar, with power to disbar under such rules as may be adopted by the court.

Courts of Appeal.—The state, with the exception of the Parish of Orleans, is divided into five circuits, in each of which there is a court of appeals, composed of two judges elected by the two houses of the general assembly in joint session—one judge for eight years, and one for four years. This court has appellate jurisdiction which extends to all cases civil or probate, when the matter in dispute or fund to be distributed exceeds one hundred dollars exclusive of interest, and does not exceed two thousand dollars exclusive of interest. This jurisdiction is appellate only, but the judges have power to grant writs of habeas corpus within their circuits, and may also issue remedial writs in aid of their appellate jurisdiction.

No judgment shall be rendered without the concurrence of two judges. In case of disagreement the court shall appoint a district judge, or lawyer having the qualifications of a judge, to sit in the case; and this may also be done in case of the recusation, absence, or disability of one of the judges. Courts of appeal throughout the rural districts after July 1, 1900, will be composed of district judges sitting in banc. Provision is made for certifying questions or taking up cases on certiorari from the courts of appeal to the supreme court, by the same system as that under which such writs are issued by the supreme court of the United States to the circuit courts of appeal, the object being to keep this jurisprudence of the courts of appeal in touch with that of the supreme court.

District Courts.—The state (with the exception of the Parish of Orleans) is divided into twenty-nine judicial districts, in each of which there is a district court, presided over by one judge. The number may be reduced by law to twenty. The district judges are elected for the term of four years by the people of their respective districts, where they must have resided for two years next preceding their election. The district courts have original jurisdiction in all civil matters where the amount in dispute exceeds fifty dollars, exclusive of interest. They have unlimited and exclusive original jurisdiction in all criminal, probate, and succession matters, and when a succession is a party defendant, and in all cases where the state or parish or any municipality or other political corporation is a party defendant, regardless of the amount in dispute, and of all proceedings for the appointment of receivers, or liquidators of corporations, or partnerships, and to issue all writs, process, and orders necessary or proper for the purposes of their jurisdiction, and also to issue writs of habeas corpus in their districts. They have also jurisdiction of appeals from justices of the peace in all civil matters, and also of appeals of persons sentenced to fines or imprisonment by mayors or recorders, and in such cases trials shall be de novo and without juries.

By article 116 of the new constitution important changes are made in the jury system, viz.: "All cases in which the punishment may not be at hard labor shall, until otherwise provided by law, which shall not be prior to 1904, be tried by the judge without a jury. Cases in which the punishment may be at hard labor shall be tried by a jury of five, all of whom must concur to render a verdict; cases in which the punishment is necessarily at hard labor by a jury of twelve, nine of whom concurring may render a verdict; cases in which the punishment may be capital by a jury of twelve, all of whom must concur to render a verdict."

Courts of the Parish and City of New Orleans.—There are in the Parish of Orleans:—

1. A court of appeals, of three judges, the jurisdiction of which is of the same nature as, and coextensive with that of the courts of appeal in the other parishes. The appeals to this court are upon questions of law alone in all cases involving less than five hundred dollars exclusive of interest, and upon the law and the facts in other cases.

2. Two district courts, the civil district court of five judges and the criminal district court of two judges. The civil district court has exclusive and general probate, and exclusive civil jurisdiction in all cases where the amount in dispute exceeds one hundred dollars exclusive of interest. The criminal district court has general criminal jurisdiction only.

There are two inferior criminal courts known as the First City Criminal Court and the Second City Criminal Court, each having territorial jurisdiction over a specific portion of the city, for the trial and punishment without juries, and subject to appeal to the criminal district court, of all offences where the penalty does not exceed six months' imprisonment or a fine of three hundred dollars or both.

Justices of the Peace.—In each parish (that of Orleans excepted) there are justices of the peace who are elected for the term of four years. They have exclusive original jurisdiction in all civil matters when the amount in dispute does not exceed fifty dollars exclusive of interest, and original jurisdiction concurrent with the district court when the amount in dispute exceeds fifty dollars, and does not exceed one hundred dollars exclusive of interest. They have, also, criminal jurisdiction as committing magistrates, with power to bail or discharge in cases not capital, or necessarily punishable at hard labor.

They have no jurisdiction in succession or probate matters, or when a succession is a defendant, or when the state, parish, or any municipality or other political corporation is a party defendant, or when title to real estate is involved.

The justices of the peace ceased to exist in the parish of Orleans with the adoption of the constitution of 1879.

SYSTEM OF LAWS. Louisiana is governed by the civil law, unlike the other states of the Union. The first body of civil laws was adopted in 1808, and was substantially the same as the Code Napoleon, with some modifications derived from the Spanish law. It was styled the "Digest of the Civil Law," and has been afterwards frequently revised and enlarged to suit the numerous statutory changes in the law, and since 1825 has become known as the "Civil Code of Louisiana." There is no criminal offence in this state but such as is provided for by statute; the law does not define crimes, but prescribes their punishment by reference to their name; for definitions we turn to the common law of England. The civil code lays down the general leading principles of evidence, and the courts refer to treatises on that branch of the law for the development of those principles in their application to particular cases, as they arise in practice. Most of these rules have been borrowed from the English law, as having a more solid foundation in reason and common sense. The usages of trade sanctioned by courts of different countries at different times, or the lex mercatoria, also exist entirely distinct and independent of the civil code, and are recognized and duly enforced. When Louisiana was ceded to the United States, some of the lawyers from the old states spared no efforts to introduce the laws with which they were familiar, and of which they sought to avail themselves, rather than undergo the toil of learning a new system in a foreign language. But of those conversant with the common law, the most eminent did not favor its introduction as a general system to the exclusion of the civil law. 7 Ann. 395. The laws of the state on public and personal rights, criminal and commercial matters were assimilated to those of the other states; but in relation to real property and its tenures, the common law or English equity system has never had place in Louisiana.

LOW BOTE. A recompense for the death of a man killed in a tumult. Cow.

LOWERS. In French Maritime Law. Wages. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, t. 14, Art. 16.

LOW-WATER MARK. That part of the shore of the sea to which the waters recede when the tide is lowest; i. e. the line to which the ebb-tide usually recedes, or the ordinary low-water mark unaffected by drought. 26 Me. 384; 60 Pa. 339. It has been said to be the point to which a river recedes at its lowest stage; 55 Fed.

T. Jones 24. Also spelled loayl. Dyer 36, § 38; Law Fr. & Lat. Dict. The Norman spelling is "loyse." Kelh. Norm. Dict.

Faithful to a prince or superior; true to plighted faith or duty. Webster, Dict.

LOYALTY. Adherence to law. Faithfulness to the existing government.

LUCID INTERVALS. In Medical Jurisprudence. Periods in which an insane person is so far free from his disease that the ordinary legal consequences of insanity do not apply to acts done therein.

A lucid interval is not a perfect restoration to reason, but a restoration so far as to be able, beyond doubt, to comprehend and do the act with such perception, memory, and judgment as to make it a legal act. 2 Del. Ch. 263; Whart. & Stillé, Med. Jur. § 2.

Lucid intervals were regarded as more common and characterized by greater mental clearness and vigor, by earlier medical writers than the later ones. This view was shared by legal authorities, who treated a lucid interval as a complete, though temporary, restoration. D'Aguesseau, in the case of the Abbé d'Orléans, concludes: "It must not be a mere diminution, a remission, of the complaint, but a kind of temporary cure, an intermission so clearly marked as in every respect to resemble the restoration of health." Pothier, Obl., Evans' ed. 579. And Lord Thurlow characterized it as "an interval in which the mind, having thrown off the disease, had recovered its general habit." 3 Bro. C. C. 234. Possibly there may be such intermissions of absolute restoration but they are of rare occurrence. Usually, with apparent clearness, there is a real loss of mental force and acuteness,—not necessarily apparent to a superficial observer, but, upon critical examination, showing confusion of ideas and singularity of behavior indicative of serious though latent disease. In this condition the patient may hold some correct notions, even on a matter of business, and yet be quite incompetent to embrace all the relations connected with a contract or a will, even though no delusion was present to warp his judgment. This conclusion is aided by the recorded experiences of patients after entire recovery. See Georget, Des Mal. Men. 46; Reid, Essays on Hypochondriacal Affections, Essay 21; Combe, Men. Derang. 241; Ray, Med. Jur. 376.

Of late years the interest of the courts in connection with lucid intervals both in civil and criminal cases is confined to the ascertainment of the mental capacity of the person concerned with relation to the transaction in question. This idea has even been carried to the excess of treating the reasonableness of the act itself as the test of the capacity of the individual, or the existence of a lucid interval; 1 Phill. Lect. 90; 2 C. & P. 415. But this has been said to be a mere begging of the question, inasmuch as persons undeniably insane constantly do and say things which appear perfectly rational; 2 Hagg. 433, where two wills, both perfectly reasonable, were set aside because within a short time prior to their execution there had been admitted insanity. And it was said: "When there is not actual recovery, and a return to the management of himself and his concerns . . . the proof of a lucid interval is extremely difficult."

In criminal cases this difficulty is intensified, since the very term lucid interval implies that the disease has not disappeared, but only that its outward manifestations have ceased and there remains an abnormal condition of the brain, by whatever name it may be called, whereby the power of the mind to sustain provocations, resist temptations, or withstand any other causes of excitement, is greatly weakened. Being in their nature, as temporary and of uncertain duration, there is no presumption that they will continue; 104 Ala. 642; 30 id. 237; contra, 59 Wis. 569; and see 28 Ill. 306.

Lucid intervals are not to be confounded with periods of apparent recovery between two successive attacks of mental disorder, nor with transitions from one phase of insanity to another. These are said to be equivocal conditions during which persons subjected to them labor under a degree of nervous irritability, which renders them peculiarly susceptible to many of those incidents and influences which lead to crime; Ray, Med. Jur. ch. Luc. Int.

Both in civil and criminal cases the burden rests upon the party who contends for a lucid interval to prove it, since a person once insane is presumed so until it is shown that he had a lucid interval or has recovered; Co. Litt. 185, n.; 3 Bro. Ch. 441; 1 Pet. 163; 15 N. J. Eq. 243; 46 Ill. 258; 8 Can. S. C. 335. This presumption may be rebutted by proof of a change of mental condition and a lucid interval at the time; 41 Miss. 291; and it arises only where habitual insanity is shown, and in cases of temporary or recurrent insanity, no burden is thrown upon the party seeking to take advantage of the lucid interval; 35 L. R. A. (Miss.) 118; 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 207; 30 Fla. 170; 116 Mo. 96; 1 Brews. (Pa.) 356.

A contract made during a lucid interval is valid; 92 Ga. 295; 139 Mass. 177. And the same is true of deeds, wills, and of the performances of any civil act. But where a lucid interval is relied upon, it must appear to have been of such a character as to enable the person to comprehend intelligently the nature and character of the transaction; 104 Ala. 642. Proof of a lucid interval, where it is required, must be made to the satisfaction of the jury; 66

Tex. 476. There is no presumption of continuance of a lucid interval, it is temporary in its nature; 104 Ala. 642.

Insane persons, during a lucid interval, are competent witnesses, but the question of their competency is for the court to determine when the witness is produced to be sworn; 3 Abb. N. C. 329, which see for a note on the practice in such cases.

The general rule "is that a lunatic, or person affected with insanity, is admissible as a witness, if he have sufficient understanding to apprehend the obligation of an oath, and to be capable of giving a correct account of the matters which he has seen or heard in reference to the questions at issue; and whether he have that understanding is a question to be determined by the court upon examination of the party himself, and any competent witnesses who can speak to the nature and extent of his insanity;" 107 U. S. 519; 10 Allen 64; 158 Ill. 326; L. R. 11 Eq. 420; 97 Ala. 85; 30 Tex. App. 487; 25 Gratt. 865; 28 Conn. 177; 36 W. Va. 563. In State v. Brown, 36 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 458 (to be reported in 2 Marvel Del.), the witness was an inmate of an insane asylum and was admitted by an equally divided court to testify in a case of homicide in the asylum. The modern doctrine is that the fact of insanity goes to the credibility rather than to the competency of the witness; 5 Eng. L. & Eq. 547; 2 Den. C. C. 254; 5 Cox, C. C. 259; 4 Heisk. 565. See Clevenger, Med. Jur. of Insan. 607.

See 35 L. R. A. 117, n.; INSANITY.

LUCRATIVE OFFICE. One for which "pay, supposed to be an adequate compensation, is fixed to the performance of" its "duties." 8 Blackf. 329, where, under the Indiana constitution forbidding the holding of more than one lucrative office at one time, the offices of county commissioners and county recorder were held such. So also were prison director; 35 Ind. 111; mayor of a city; 35 id. 111; colonel of volunteers and reporter of the supreme court; 19 id. 351; otherwise as to the office of councilman in a city; 44 id. 405.

LUCRATIVE SUCCESSION. In Scotch Law. The passive title of præceptio hæreditatis, by which, if an heir apparent receive gratuitously a part, however small, of the heritage which would come to him as an heir, he is liable for all the grantor's precontracted debts. Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 87–89; Stair, Inst. 3. 7.

LUCRI CAUSA (Lat. for the sake of gain). In Criminal Law. A term descriptive of the intent with which property is taken in cases of larceny.

Under modern decisions this ingredient is generally considered immaterial. In many English cases there is shown a tendency to resort to sophistical reasoning to avoid directly overruling the doctrine; 1 Den. C. C. 180; id. 193; Russ. & R. 307. In this country these cases have not been considered as authority; 18 Ala. 461. But the question has not been much discussed and the rule is generally considered well settled that it is sufficient if the taking be fraudulent and with the intent wholly to deprive the owner of his property. See LARCENY.

LUCRUM. A small slip or parcel of land.

LUCRUM CESSANS. In Civil Law. A cession of gain. The amount of profit lost as distinguished from damnum emergens, an actual loss.

The actual loss sustained for the breach of contracts other than the mere non-payment of money which was covered by interest. Damages could be recovered in particular cases for both. Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 215.

LUGGAGE. Such articles of personal comfort and convenience as travellers usually find it desirable to carry with them. This term is synonymous with baggage: the latter being in more common use in this country, while the former seems to be almost exclusively used in England. 70 Cal. 169. See BAGGAGE.

LUMEN. In Civil Law. Light of the sun or sky.

LUMINA. Openings to obtain light in a building.

LUMINARE. A lamp or candle set burning on the altar of any church or chapel, for the maintenance whereof lands and rent-charges were frequently given to parish churches. Kenn. Glos.

LUNACY. See INSANITY; MANIA.

LUNAR. Belonging to or measured by the moon.

LUNAR MONTH. See MONTH.

LUNATIC. One who is insane. See INSANITY; DE LUNATICO INQUIRENDO.

LUPINUM CAPUT GENERE. See CAPUT LUPINUM.

LYEF-GELD. In Saxon Law. Leave-money. A small sum paid by customary tenants for leave to plough, etc. Cowel; Somn. on Gavelk. p. 27.

LUXURY. Excess and extravagance, formerly an offence against public economy. Whart.

LYING. Saying that which is false, knowing or not knowing it to be so. Every deceit comprehends a lie, but a deceit is more than a lie on account of the view with which it is practised. 3 Term 56. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION.

LYING ABOUT. An owner is liable to a penalty for cattle found lying about a highway; 3 Q. B. 345; but not where cattle being driven along a highway lie down for a short time and are then driven on again; id.

LYING AT ANCHOR. A vessel is lying at anchor when floating upon the water but held by her cable and anchor; 19 Hun 285; but not where beached with a cable attached to an anchor sunk in the bank; id.; or fastened to a pier; 77 N. Y. 453; 32 Ind. 453.

LYING IN GRANT. Incorporeal rights and things which cannot be transferred by livery of possession, but which exist only in idea, in contemplation of law, are said to lie in grant, and pass by the mere delivery of the deed. See GRANT; LIVERY OF SEISIN; SEISIN.

LYING IN PORT. Where a vessel has been lying in port for a long time a policy "at and from" the port attaches as soon as preparations for the voyage are commenced, but if she changes ownership in port, it attaches only when the assured becomes owner; 1 Mas. 127; 2 Johns. Cas. 10; 1 Cai. 75; 2 Cai. Cas. 158.

LYING IN WAIT. Being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another.

Lying in wait is evidence of deliberation and intention. Where murder is divided into degrees, as in Pennsylvania, lying in wait is such evidence of malice that it makes the killing, when it takes place, murder in the first degree. See Dane, Abr. Index.

To constitute lying in wait, three things must concur: to wit, waiting, watching, and secrecy. 9 Humph. 651.

LYING ON. Where this term is used in the description of metes, bounds, and location of land, it imports in law as well as in fact that it extends to borders upon the boundary designated in the description. 4 Houst. 337.

LYING UP. A vessel insured against perils on the voyage or while lying up, was held to be within the meaning of this clause while she was being towed into the harbor; 5 Robt. 473.

LYNCH LAW. A common phrase used to express the vengeance of a mob inflicting an injury and committing an outrage upon a person suspected of some offence. In England this is called Lidford Law; in Scotland, Cowper Law, Jedburgh Justice.

The Ohio act (see infra) defines lynching and mob as follows: "That any collection of individuals, assembled for any unlawful purposes intending to do damage or injury to any one, or pretending to exercise correctional power over persons by violence, and without authority of law, shall for the purposes of this act be regarded as a 'mob,' and any act of violence exercised by them upon the body of any person, shall constitute a 'lynching.'" 92 Ohio Laws 136.

There are various theories as to the person from whom lynch law derived its name. That most generally accepted credits it to Col. James Lynch, a Virginian, who, in 1780, administered such law to the extent of whipping but not the death penalty against Tory conspirators. For the protection of himself and his associates an act of amnesty was passed by the Virginia legislature in October, 1782, in which their action was described as "not strictly warranted by law, although justified by the imminence of the danger." Another person mentioned in this connection was the founder of the town of Lynchburg, Virginia, and another, an Englishman, sent out in the seventeenth century under a commission to suppress pirates whom he summarily executed without trial. Another account ascribes the term to James Fitz-Stevens Lynch, mayor of Galway in 1493, who tried his son for murder and when prevented from publicly executing him, hanged him from the window of his own house. See Int. Cyc. Ht.; 5 Green Bag 116; 4 id. 561; 2 Inter-coll. L. J. 163.

All who consent to the infliction of capital punishment by lynch law are guilty of murder in the first degree when not executed in hot blood. The act strikingly combines the distinctive features of deliberation and intent to take life; 38 Conn. 126; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 399.

Lynch law differs from mob law in disregarding the forms of ordinary law, while intending to maintain its substance; while mob law disregards both.

In Ohio the act for the suppression of mob violence (supra) provided that any person assaulted by a mob and suffering lynching should be entitled to recover from the county $500; or, if the injury was serious, $1,000; or if it resulted in permanent disability of earning a livelihood $5,000. It also gave the county the right of recovering the amount of any judgment rendered against it from any of the parties composing the mob. This provision was held unconstitutional in specifying a definite recovery regardless of the actual damages suffered, being an encroachment of the legislature upon the judicial power, and so far as the damages awarded exceeded the actual damages suffered, it taxed the county for private interests; 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. 167, affirming 4 Ohio N. P. 249. This decision was followed in another county; 39 Wkly. L. Bul. 103.

LYON KING OF ARMS. In Scotch Law. An officer whose duty it formerly was to carry public messages to foreign states.

LYTÆ. In Old Roman Law. A name given to students of civil law in the fourth year of their course. Tayl. Civ. L. 39.

M.

M. The thirteenth letter of the alphabet.

Persons convicted of manslaughter, in England, were formerly marked with this letter on the brawn of the thumb.

This letter was sometimes put on the face of treasury notes of the United States, and signifies that the treasury note bears interest at the rate of one mill per dollar, and not one per centum interest.

MACE BEARER. In English Law. One who carries the mace, an ornamented staff, before certain functionaries. In Scotland an officer attending the court of session, and usually called a macer.

MACE-GREFF. In Old English Law. One who willingly bought stolen goods, especially food. Brit. c. 29.

MACE-PROOF. Secure against arrest. Wharton.

MACEDONIAN DECREE. In Roman Law. A decree of the Roman senate, which derived its name from that of a certain usurer, who was the cause of its being made, in consequence of his exactions.

It was intended to protect sons who lived under the paternal jurisdiction from the unconscionable contracts which they sometimes made on the expectations after their fathers' deaths; another, and perhaps the principal object, was to cast odium on the rapacious creditors. It declared such contracts void. Dig. 14, 6, 1; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 1, tit. 6, § 4; Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 12, note. See CATCHING BARGAIN; POST OBIT.

MACHECOLLARE. A warlike device made over a gate or other passageway through which hot water or offensive things may be cast upon the assailants. Co. Litt. 5 a.

MACHINATION. The act by which some plot or conspiracy is set on foot.

MACHINE. See PATENT.

MACHINE AND REPAIR SHOP. These words do not include woodwork; 23 U. C. C. P. 278.

MACHINERY. A more comprehensive term than machine, including the appurtenances necessary to the working of a machine; 111 Mass. 540; 108 id. 78; as the mains of a gas company; 12 Allen 75; or even a rolling-mill. 2 Sandf. 202.

Parts of a machine considered collectively; also the combination of mechanical means to a given end, such as the machinery of a locomotive, or of a canal lock, or of a watch; 44 La. Ann. 793. Those devices and parts of a car which have no physical operation and connection with the locomotive, except by means of the cars of a train, and the couplers between them are not within the meaning of the word as used in the exemption clause of a bill of lading; 47 U. S. App. 744; 81 Fed. Rep. 289. The mains or pipes laid in streets to distribute gas are "part of the machinery by means of which the corporate business (is) carried on;" 161 U. S. 316, 325. A saw is part of the machinery of a saw-mill; 44 Vt. 629; and iron and steel dies used in the manufacture of tinware are machinery; 111 Mass. 540.

The question of what machinery will pass under a mortgage of realty has been variously decided and will be found discussed under FIXTURES. The cases are collected in 11 Am. Rep. 314, note, and 24 id. 726, note. See 108 Mass. 81; 44 Ia. 64.

MACTATOR. A murderer.

MADMAN. See INSANITY.

MADE KNOWN. Words used as a return to a writ of scire facias when it has been served on the defendant.

MÆG. A kinsman. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 241.

The larger group of individuals into which the Anglo-Saxon family were divided was called the mægth or mægburh. At her marriage the wife did not become a member of her husband's mægth but remained in her own. If she committed a wrong her own kindred were responsible therefor, and the wergild of the husband was paid to his mægth as was that of the wife to hers. The mægth of the wife entrusted to her husband the guardianship over her, but constantly watched over his administration of the trust and interfered to protect her if necessary. The children belonged to both the mægth of the father and to that of the mother. The organization of the mægth offered a natural means to the mutual guaranty of personal safety, but as civilization became more advanced both the church and the state encouraged every tendency to weaken the tie of kinship as it became so strong as to threaten the rights of the king. See Essays, Ang. Sax. Fam. L. 121; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 241.

MÆGBOTE. A recompense for the slaying of a kinsman. Cowel. See WERGILD.

MÆRE. Famous; great; noted.

MAGIC. Witchcraft and sorcery.

MAGISTER AD FACULTATES (Lat.). In English Ecclesiastical Law. The title of an officer who grants dispensations: as, to marry, to eat flesh on days prohibited, and the like. Bacon, Abr. Eccles. Courts (A 5).

MAGISTER CANCELLARIÆ. In Old English Law. A master in chancery.

MAGISTER LIBELLORUM. Master of requests.

MAGISTER LITIS. Master of a suit.

MAGISTER NAVIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Master of a ship; he to whom the whole care of a ship is given up, whether appointed by the owner, or charterer. L. 1, ff. de exercit.; idem § 3; Calvinus, Lex.; Story, Ag. § 36.

MAGISTER PALATII. Master of the palace, an officer similar to the modern lord chamberlain. Tayl. Civ. L. 37.

MAGISTER SOCIETATIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Managing partner. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calv. Lex. Especially used of an officer employed in the business of collecting revenues, who had power to call together the tything-men (decumands), as it were a senate, and lay matters before them, and keep account of all receipts, etc. He had, generally, an agent in the province, who was also sometimes called magister societatis. Id.; Story, Partn. § 95.

MAGISTRACY. In its most enlarged signification, this term includes all officers, legislative, executive, and judicial. For example, in some of the state constitutions will be found this provision: "the powers of the government are divided into three distinct departments, and each of these is confided to a separate magistracy, to wit: those which are legislative, to one; those which are executive, to another; and those which are judicial, to another." In a more confined sense, it signifies the body of officers whose duty it is to put the laws in force; as, judges, justices of the peace, and the like. In a still narrower sense, it is employed to designate the body of justices of the peace. It is also used for the office of a magistrate.

MAGISTRALIA BREVIA (Lat.). Writs adapted to special cases, and so called because drawn by the masters in chancery. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 239. For the difference between these and judicial writs, see Bracton 413 b.

MAGISTRATE. A public civil officer, invested with some part of the legislative, executive, or judicial power given by the constitution. In a narrower sense this term includes only inferior judicial officers, as justices of the peace.

The president of the United States is the chief magistrate of this nation; the governors are the chief magistrates of their respective states.

It is the duty of all magistrates to exercise the power vested in them for the good of the people, according to law, and with zeal and fidelity. A neglect on the part of a magistrate to exercise the functions of his office, when required by law, is a misdemeanor. See 15 Viner, Abr. 144; Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 22; Dig. 30. 16. 57; Merlin, Rép.; 13 Pick. 523.

A federal law requiring an affidavit sworn to before a magistrate, is complied when "sworn to before me, J. M., Clerk of the Municipal Court," it being presumed that it was taken in the court; 36 Fed. Rep. 684. See JUDGE; JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

MAGISTRATE'S COURT. In American Law. See COURT OF MAGISTRATES AND FREEHOLDERS.

MAGNA ASSISA ELIGENDA. See GRAND ASSIZE.

MAGNA CENTUM. The great hundred or six score. Whart.

MAGNA CHARTA. The Great Charter of English liberties, so called (but which was really a compact between the king and his barons, and almost exclusively for the benefit of the latter, though confirming the ancient liberties of Englishmen in some few particulars), was wrung from king John by his barons assembled in arms, on the 19th of June, 1215, and was given by the king's hand, as a confirmation of his own act, on the little island in the Thames, within the county of Buckinghamshire, which is still called "Magna Charta Island."

The struggle to secure from the king some recognition of the rights of p rson and property and some settled administration of law had been going on for nearly two centuries. In fact it had begun soon after the time of William the Conqueror. That monarch had overthrown the laws he found prevailing in England and had distributed to his followers the lands of the conquered people. But the same arbitrary power which gave these estates could, at a moment's caprice, take them away, and the barons were anxious for a more stable system. The ancient baronial laws of Edward the Confessor contained all that was needed to secure their rights, and these ancient laws they petitioned to have restored. They renewed their efforts from time to time with William I., William Rufus, Henry I., and Stephen, all of whom, except Henry I., succeeded in putting them off with promises. From Henry a charter was extorted about the year 1100 declaring that the church should be free heirs, should receive their possessions unredeemed, and evil customs should be abolished. In fact it gave most of the privileges which were afterwards embodied in Magna Charta. But in the course of a hundred years nearly all the copies of it were lost and its provisions were forgotten. It was not until John came to the throne in 1199 that the barons had their best opportunity. John's right to assume the crown was weak, and in order to gain the support of the barons he had to promise them the privileges for which they clamored, and with arms in their hands they compelled him to keep his word. Thomson, Magna Charta 2.

The preliminary interview was held in the meadow of Running Mede, or Runny Mede (fr. Sax. rune, council), that is, council meadow, which had been used constantly for national assemblies, and which was situated on the southwest side of the Thames, between Staines and Windsor. Though such formalities were observed, the provisions of the charter were disregarded by John and succeeding kings, each of whom, when wishing to do a popular thing, confirmed this charter. There were thirty-two confirmations between 1215 and 1416, the most celebrated of which were those by Hen. III. (1225) and Edw. I., which last confirmation was sealed with the great seal of England at Ghent, on the 5th November, 1297. Confirmatio Chartarum. The Magna Charta printed in all the books as of 9 Hen. III. is really a transcript of the roll of parliament of 25 Edw. I. There were many originals of Magna Charta made, two of which are preserved in the British Museum.

An original was found early in the 17th century by Sir Robert Cotton, the antiquary, in the hands of a tailor, who was just on the point of cutting it into measuring strips, having bought it in a lot of old papers out of an apartment anciently used as a scrivener's office; 11 Am. L. Rec. 624.

It is a misunderstanding to regard the Charter either as containing new principles or as terminating a struggle. On the contrary its character is eminently conservative, setting up "the laws of Henry I." as its standard. At the same time "confirmation of the Charter" was the rallying cry of the three next generations, and the constitutional progress up to 1340 is little more than the working out of the Charter's main clauses. 1 Soc. Eng. 267.

The Magna Charta of our statute-book is not exactly the charter that John sealed at Runnymede. It is a charter granted by his son and successor, Henry III., the text of the title of the original document having been modified on more than one occasion. 1 Soc. Eng. 410.

Magna Charta consists of thirty-seven chapters, the subject-matter of which is very various. C. 1 provides that the Anglican church shall be free and possess its rights unimpaired, probably referring chiefly to immunity from papal jurisdiction. C. 2 fixes relief which shall be paid by king's tenants, of full age. C. 3 relates to heirs and their being in ward. C. 4: guardians of wards within age are by this chapter restrained from waste of ward's estate, "vasto hominum et rerum," waste of men and of things, which shows that serfs were regarded as slaves even by this much-boasted charter; and as serfs and freemen were at this time the divisions of society, and as freemen included, almost without exception, the nobility alone, we can see somewhat how much this charter deserves its name. C. 5 relates to the land and other property of heirs, and the delivering them up when the heirs are of age. C. 6: the marriage of heirs. C. 7 provides that a widow shall have quarantine of forty days in her husband's chief house, and shall have her dower set out to her at once, without paying anything for it, and in meanwhile to have reasonable estovers; the dower to be one-third of lands of the husband, unless the wife was endowed of less at the church-door; widow not to be compelled to marry, but to find surety that she will not marry without consent of the lord of whom she holds.

C. 8: the goods and chattels of crown-debtor to be exhausted before his rents and lands are distrained; the surety not to be called upon if the principal can pay; if sureties pay the debt, they to have the rents and lands of debtor till the debt is satisfied. C. 9 secures to London and other cities and boroughs and town barons of the five ports, and all other ports, to have their ancient liberties. C. 10 prohibits excessive distress for more services or rent than was due. C. 11 provides that the courts of common pleas should not follow the court of the king, but should be held in a certain place. They were, accordingly, located at Westminster. C. 12 declares the manner of taking assizes of novel desseisin and mort d'ancestor. These were actions to recover lost seisin (q. v.), now abolished. C. 13 relates to assizes darrein presentment brought by ecclesiastics to try right to present to ecclesiastical benefices. Abolished. C. 14 provides that amercement of a freeman for a fault shall be proportionate to his crime, and not excessive, and that the villein of any other than the king shall be amerced in the same manner, his farm, utensils, etc., being preserved to him. For otherwise he could not cultivate the lord's land. C. 15 and c. 16 relate to making of bridges and keeping in repair of sewers and seawalls. This is now regulated by local parochial law.

C. 17 forbids sheriffs and coroners to hold pleas of the crown. Pleas of the crown are criminal cases which it is desirable should not be tried by an inferior and perhaps ignorant magistrate. C. 18 provides that if any one holding a lay fee from the crown die, the king's bailiff, on showing letters patent of summons for debt from the king, may attach all his goods and chattels, so that nothing be moved away till the debt to the crown be paid off clearly, the residue to go to the executors to perform the testament of the dead; and if there be no debt owing to the crown, all the chattels of the deceased to go to the executors, reserving, however, to the wife and children their reasonable parts. C. 19 relates to purveyance of the king's house; C. 20, to the castle-guard; C. 21, to taking horses, carts, and wood for use of royal castles. The last three chapters are now obsolete. C. 22 provides that the lands of felons shall go to the king for a year and a day, afterwards to the lord of the fee. The day is added to prevent dispute as to whether the year is exclusive or inclusive of its last day. C. 23 provides that the wears shall be pulled down in the Thames and Medway, and throughout England, except on the sea-coast. These wears destroyed fish, and interrupted the floating of wood and the like down stream. C. 24 relates to the writ of præcipe in capite for lords against their tenants offering wrong, etc. Now abolished. C. 25 provides a uniform measure. See 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 63. C. 26 relates to inquisitions of life and member, which are to be granted freely. Now abolished. C. 27 relates to knight-service and other ancient tenures, now abolished.

C. 28 relates to accusations, which must be under oath. C. 29 provides that "no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseised from his freehold, or liberties, or immunities, nor outlawed, nor exiled, nor in any manner destroyed, nor will we come upon him or send against him, except by legal judgment of his peers or the law of the land. We will sell or deny justice to none, nor put off right or justice." This clause is very much celebrated, as confirming the right to trial by jury. C. 30 relates to merchant-strangers, who are to be civilly treated, and, unless previously prohibited, are to have free passage through, and exit from, and dwelling in, England, without any manner of extortions, except in time of war. If they are of a country at war with England, and found in England at the beginning of the war, they are to be kept safely until it is found out how English merchants are treated in their country, and then are to be treated accordingly. C. 31 relates to escheats; C. 32, to the power of alienation in a freeman, which is limited. C. 33 relates to patrons of abbeys, etc. C. 34 provides that no appeal shall be brought by a woman except for the death of her husband. This was because the defendant could not defend himself against a woman in single combat. The crime of murder or homicide is now inquired into by indictment. C. 35 relates to rights of holding county courts, etc. Obsolete. C. 36 provides that a gift of lands in mortmain shall be void, and lands so given go to the lord of fee. C. 37 relates to escuage and subsidy. C. 38 confirms every article of the charter.

The object of this statute was to declare and reaffirm such common-law principles as, by reason of usurpation and force, had come to be of doubtful effect, and needed therefore to be authoritatively announced, that king and subject might alike authoritatively observe them. Cooley, Const. Lim. 30.

Magna Charta is said by some to have been so called because larger than the Charta de Foresta (q. v.), which was given about the same time. Spelman, Gloss. But see Cowel. Magna Charta is mentioned casually by Bracton, Fleta, and Britton. Glanvill is supposed to have written before Magna Charta. The Mirror of Justices (q. v.) has a chapter on its defects. See Co. 2d Inst.; Barringt. Stat.; 4 Bla. Com. 423. See a copy of Magna Charta in 1 Laws of South Carolina, edited by Judge Cooper, p. 78. In the Penny Magazine for the year 1833, p. 229, there is a copy of the original seal of King John affixed to this instrument; a specimen of a fac-simile of the writing of Magna Charta, beginning at the passage, Nullus liber homo capietur vel imprisonetur, etc. A fac-simile has been published by Chatto & Windus, London. A copy of both may be found in the Magasin Pittoresque for the year 1834, pp. 52, 53. Magna Charta was published for the first time in America in a tract issued by William Penn called "The excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property," printed by Bradford at Philadelphia in 1687. Besides extensive extracts from Magna Charta and Coke's comments thereon, the tract contains the confirmation of the charters of the liberties of England and of the forest made in the 25 Edward I., the Statute de Tallagio, the royal charter of Pennsylvania, and Penn's charter of liberties to the freemen of the province. This tract having become very scarce, has been reprinted by the Philobiblion Club of Philadelphia, with an historical introduction by Dr. Frederick D. Stone. See 8 Encyc. Brit., 9th ed. 306, 308; 5 id., 9th ed. 432; Wharton, Lex.; Thomson; Wells, Magna Charta.

MAINE. The name of one of the states of the United States of America, formed out of that part of the territory of Massachusetts called the district of Maine.

The territory embraced in the new state was not contiguous to that remaining in the state from which it was taken, and was more than four times as large. The legislature of Massachusetts, by an act passed June 19, 1819, gave its consent for the people of the district to become a separate and independent state. They met in convention, by delegates elected for the purpose, and formed a separate state, by the style of the State of Maine, and adopted a constitution for the government thereof, October 19, 1819, and applied to congress, at its next session, for admission into the Union.

The petition was presented in the house of representatives of the United States, December 8, 1819, and the state was admitted into the Union by the act of congress of March 3, 1820, from and after the fifteenth day of March, 1820. The constitution of 1819 is still in force but has been frequently amended.

The election of governor, senators, and representatives is on the second Monday of September.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is vested in a senate and a house of representatives.

The House of Representatives consists of one hundred and fifty-one members, apportioned among the counties according to law, elected biennially for two years.

The legislature convenes on the first Wednesday of January biennially in the odd years.

The Senate consists of not less than twenty nor more than thirty-one members, elected, at the same time, and for the same term, as the representatives, from districts into which the state shall from time to time be divided. A senator must be at least twenty-five years old, and a representative twenty-one, and each must have been five years a citizen of the United States, one year a resident of the state and three months of the district, immediately preceding his election, and such residence must continue during his term of office.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor holds his office for two years. He must, at the commencement of his term, be no less than thirty years of age, a natural-born citizen of the United States, five years a resident of the state, and at the time of his election, and during his term, be a resident of the state.

A Council consisting of seven persons, citizens of the United States, and resident within the state, to advise the governor in the executive part of government, is to be chosen biennially by joint ballot of the senators and representatives in convention.

The governor has the powers usually incident to the office, but his exercise of the appointing and pardoning powers is with the advice and consent of the council. He has a veto power which is overcome by a vote of two-thirds of each house.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Judicial Court is composed of one chief and seven assistant judges, appointed by the governor and council for the term of seven years. It is the court of last resort, and also the court of general original jurisdiction,—having the jurisdiction of the former district court. It has exclusive civil jurisdiction in law and equity, except over cases involving small amounts, of which jurisdiction is given to trial justices. It is the supreme court of probate, and an appeal lies to it from the decision of the judge of probate. Five judges are necessary to constitute a quorum for the decision of questions of law. Annual law terms are held in each of the three districts into which the state is divided for the purpose. For purposes of jury trials, including civil and criminal cases, the court is held by a single judge. Two or more terms are held annually in each county in the state, as provided by statute, from time to time. The justices receive a stated salary, and are to give their opinions upon important questions of law upon solemn occasions when required by the governor, senate, or house of representatives.

Superior Courts are established in the counties of Cumberland and Kennebec with an exclusive criminal and a limited civil jurisdiction.

Probate Courts are held in each county by judges elected for four years They have jurisdiction to appoint guardians; of probate and administration; the settlement of estates of persons in state prison, under sentence of death or imprisonment for life; and generally for these and similar purposes.

Justices of the Peace and Quorum are appointed by the governor and council for seven years. They may administer oaths, etc.; take the disclosures of poor debtors arrested on reissue process or execution; and have certain other powers of less general interest.

Trial justices are appointed in the same manner as justices of the peace and quorum, and have ex-officio all the powers of those officers and also have jurisdiction over all civil cases (except those involving the title to land) where the amount involved does not exceed twenty dollars. They have a limited criminal jurisdiction.

Municipal Courts are created by special enactment in the larger towns, with a jurisdiction substantially that of the trial justices, and exclusive thereof, except in specified cases.

County Commissioners are chosen by the people, three in each county, to attend to the internal police of the county. They have the care of roads, bridges, etc., the public buildings of the county, and the control of the county money. One is elected annually for the term of three years.

No city or town can create any liability exceeding five per centum of its last regular valuation.

MAINOUR. In Criminal Law. The thing stolen found in the hands of the thief who has stolen it. See LARCENY.

MAINOVER or MAINOEUVRE. A trespass committed by hand. See 7 Rich. II. c. 4.

MAINPERNABLE. Capable of being bailed; one for whom bail may be taken; bailable.

MAINPERNORS. In English Law. Those persons to whom a man is delivered out of custody or prison, on their becoming bound for his appearance.

Mainpernors differ from bail; a man's bail may imprison or surrender him up before the stipulated day of appearance; mainpernors can do neither; but are merely sureties for his appearance at the day; bail are only sureties that the party be answerable for all the special matter for which they stipulate; mainpernors are bound to produce him to answer all charges whatsoever. 6 Mod. 231; 7 id. 77, 85, 98; 3 Bla. Com. 128. See Dane, Abr.; BAIL.

MAINPRISE. In English Law. The taking a man into friendly custody, who might otherwise be committed to prison, upon security given for his appearance at a time and place assigned. Wood, Inst. b. 4, c. 4. The writ of mainprise is now obsolete. See BAIL; Bish. Cr. L. Proc. § 248.

MAINSWORN. Forsworn, by making a false oath with hand (main) on book. Used in the North of England. Brownl. 4; Hob. 125.

MAINTAINED. In Pleading. A technical word indispensable in an indictment for maintenance. 1 Wils. 325.

MAINTAINORS. In Criminal Law. Those who maintain or support a cause depending between others, not being retained as counsel or attorney. For this they may be fined and imprisoned. 2 Swift, Dig. 328; 4 Bla. Com. 124; Bacon, Abr. Barrator.

MAINTENANCE. Aid; support; assistance; the support which one person, who is bound by law to do so, gives to another. See FATHER; CHILD; HUSBAND.

Where by the constitution it is made the duty of the state legislature to make sufficient appropriations for the maintenance of the state militia, such a constitutional provision is not intended to make the entire expense of the militia a general state charge, and a provision in the military code making the compensation of certain armorers and others a county charge is not in violation of such a provision; 46 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 851.

In Criminal Law. A malicious, or, at least, officious, interference in a suit in which the offender has no interest, to assist one of the parties to it against the other, with money or advice to prosecute or defend the action, without any authority of law. 1 Russ. Cr. 176; Archb. Cr. Pr. & Pl. 1859. See 4 Kent 446; Whart. Cr. L. § 1854.

An unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels or sides to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. 51 Me. 63.

An officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by assisting either party to the disturbing of the community by stirring up suits. 49 Ohio St. 475.

At common law it signifies an unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels, or sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. The maintenance of one side, in consideration of some bargain to have part of the thing in dispute, is called champerty. Champerty, therefore, is a species of maintenance; 40 Conn. 570.

The intermeddling of a stranger in a suit for the purpose of stirring up strife and continuing the litigation. 2 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. *766. See 4 Term 340; 4 Q. B. 883.

But there are many acts in the nature of maintenance which become justifiable from the circumstances under which they are done. They may be justified, first, because the parties have a common interest recognized by the law in the matter at issue in the suit; Bacon, Abr. Maintenance; 11 M. & W. 675; 9 Metc. 489, 262; 11 Me. 111; [1895] 1 Q. B. 339; second, because the party is of kindred or affinity, as father, son, or heir apparent, or husband or wife; 3 Cow. 633; 90 Tenn. 673; third, because the relation of landlord and tenant or master and servant subsists between the party to the suit and the person who assists him; fourth, because the money is given out of charity; 1 Bail. 401; fifth, because the person assisting the party to the suit is an attorney or counsellor; the assistance to be rendered must, however, be strictly professional, for a lawyer is not more justified in giving his client money than another man; 1 Russ. Cr. 179; Bacon, Abr. Maintenance; Brooke, Abr. Maintenance. This offence is punishable criminally by fine and imprisonment; 4 Bla. Com. 124; 2 Swift, Dig. 328. Contracts growing out of maintenance are void; 11 Mass. 549; 5 Humphr. 379; 20 Ala. N. S. 521; 5 T. B. Monr. 413; 5 Johns. Ch. 44; 4 Q. B. 883. See 1 Me. 292; 11 Mass. 553; 3 Cow. 647; 4 Wend. 306; 3 Johns. Ch. 508; 7 Dowl. & R. 846; 5 B. & C. 188; 2 Bish. Cr. Law 122; 61 Hun 623; 70 N. H. Rep. (Minn.) 806; 22 Can. S. C. R. 437. See 14 L. R. A. 785, n.; CHAMPERTY.

MAJESTAS. In Roman Law. The supreme authority of the state or prince.

MAJOR. One who has attained his full age and has acquired all his civil rights; one who is no longer a minor; an adult. See MAJORITY.

In Military Law. The officer next in rank above a captain.

For the use of the word in Latin maxims, see MAXIMS.

MAJOR-GENERAL. In Military Law. An officer next in rank above a brigadier-general. He commands a division consisting of several brigades, or even an army.

MAJORA REGALIA. The king's dignity, power, and royal prerogative, as opposed to his revenue, which is comprised in the minora regalia. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 483; 1 Bla. Com. 240.

MAJORES (Lat.). The male ascendants beyond the sixth degree. The term was used among the Romans, and is still retained in making genealogical tables.

MAJORITY. The state or condition of a person who has arrived at full age. He is then said to be a major, in opposition to minor, which is his condition during infancy. See FULL AGE.

The greater number. More than all the opponents.

Some question exists as to whether a majority of any body is more than one-half the whole number or more than the number acting in opposition. Thus, in a body of one hundred voters, in which twenty did not vote on any particular question, on the former supposition fifty-one would be a majority, on the latter forty-one. The intended signification is generally denoted by the context, and where it is not, the second sense is generally intended; a majority on a given question being more than one-half the number of those voting.

In every well-regulated society, the majority has always claimed and exercised the right to govern the whole society, in the manner pointed out by the fundamental laws; and the minority are bound whether they have assented or not, for the obvious reason that opposite wills cannot prevail at the same time, in the same society, on the same subject; 1 Tuck. Bla. Com. Appx. 168; 9 Dane, Abr. 37; 1 Story, Const., 5th ed. § 207.

As to the rights of the majority of part-owners of vessels, see 3 Kent 114; Pars. Marit. Law; PART-OWNERS. As to the majority of a church corporation, see 16 Mass. 488.

In the absence of all stipulations, the general rule in partnerships is that each partner has an equal voice, and a majority acting bona fide have the right to manage the partnership concern and dispose of the partnership property notwithstanding the dissent of the minority; but in every case when the minority have a right to give an opinion, they ought to be notified. See PARTNER.

As to the conflict of laws relating to majority, see 19 Am. Dec. 180.

In corporations, in the absence of any provision in the charter or constitution, the general rule is that, within the scope of the corporate affairs, the acts of a majority bind the corporation; 30 Pa. 42; 4 Biss. 78; 33 Conn. 396; see 18 Fed. Rep. 283. It is not necessary that those present at a meeting constitute a majority of all the members; 7 Cow. 42; a majority of those who appear may act; 88 Pa. 42; 104 Mass. 378; 5 Blatch. 525; 57 Ill. 416; s. c. 11 Am. Rep. 24; 33 Beav. 595. When, however, an act is to be performed by a select and definite body, such as a board of directors, a majority of the entire body is required to constitute a meeting; 9 Wend. 394; 16 Ia. 284; but if a quorum is present, a majority of such quorum may act; 23 N. H. 555; 13 Ind. 58. The minority of a committee to which a corporate power has been delegated cannot bind the majority, or do any valid act, in the absence of any special provision otherwise; 127 U. S. 579.

In political elections, a majority of the votes cast at an election on any question means the majority of those who voted on that question; 10 Minn. 107; 1 Sneed 637; 20 Ill. 159; 56 id. 414; 20 Wis. 544; 95 U. S. 369. "All qualified voters who absent themselves from an election duly called are presumed to assent to the express will of the majority of those voting, unless the law providing for the election otherwise declares. Any other rule would be productive of the greatest inconvenience, and ought not to be adopted unless the legislative will to that effect is clearly expressed." Id. (Miller and Bradley, JJ., dissenting); but the opposite view is held in 35 Mo. 103; 16 Minn. 249; 69 Ind. 505. In the last case an amendment to the constitution received less than a majority of all those who voted at the election, but had a majority of the votes cast for or against the adoption of the amendment; and it was held (two judges dissenting) that the amendment had been neither ratified nor rejected. See 22 Alb. L. J. 44.

The United States House of Representatives has power to transact business when a majority of its members is present, and may prescribe any method which is reasonably certain to determine the presence of a majority; 144 U. S. 1. See ELECTION; MEETING; QUORUM; REORGANIZATION.

MAJUS JUS. A writ proceeding in some customary manors to try a right to land. Cow.

MAKE. To perform or execute: as, to make his law, is to perform that which a man had bound himself to do; that is, to clear himself of an action commenced against him, by his oath and the oath of his neighbors. Old Nat. Brev. 161.

To make default is to fail to appear in proper trial; to fail in a legal duty.

To make oath is to swear according to the form prescribed by law. It is also used intransitively of persons and things, to have effect; to tend. See Hardr. 133.

MAKER. A term applied to one who makes a promissory note and promises to pay it when due.

He who makes a bill of exchange is called the drawer; and frequently in common parlance and in books of reports we find the word drawer inaccurately applied to the maker of a promissory note. See PROMISSORY NOTE.

MAKING HIS LAW. A phrase used to denote the act of a person who wages his law. Bacon, Abr. Wager of Law.

MAL. A prefix meaning wrong or fraudulent.

MAL-TOLTE. In Old French Law. A term supposed to have arisen from the usurious gains of the Jews and Lombards in their management of the public revenue. Steph. Lect. 372.

MALA IN SE. Acts morally wrong; offences against conscience. 1 Bla. Com. 57, 58; 4 id. 8. See MALA PROHIBITA.

MALA FIDES (Lat.). Bad faith. It is opposed to bona fides, good faith.

MALA PRAXIS (Lat.). Bad or unskilful practice in a physician or other professional person, whereby the health of the patient is injured. Present usage adopts rather the English term malpractice. See PHYSICIAN.

MALA PROHIBITA (Lat.). Those things which are prohibited by law, and therefore unlawful.

Crimes, made such, only by reason of statutory prohibition. 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 23.

The distinction was formerly made with respect to the right to recover upon a contract for doing an unlawful act between mala prohibita and mala in se, but it has been said that this "has been long since exploded," and that "it was not founded upon any sound principle,"—that it makes no difference whether an act is forbidden because it is against good morals or against the interest of the state; 5 B. & Ald. 335, 340; 13 Pick. 519; 12 Q. B. Div. 121; and "it is now well settled that every contract to do a thing made penal by statute is void as unlawful;" Sharsw. note, 1 Bla. Com. 58.

In the criminal law the distinction is important with reference to the intent with which a wrongful act is done. Thus, a man in the execution of one act, by chance, does another one for which, if he had wilfully committed it, he would be liable to punishment,—if the act that he is doing were lawful or merely malum prohibitum, he is not punishable for the act arising from chance; but if malum in se, it is otherwise. For instance, if a person unauthorized to kill game in England, contrary to the statutes, in unlawfully shooting at game, accidentally kills a man, it is no more criminal than if he were authorized; but if the accidental killing be the result of wantonly shooting at another's fowls, which is malum in se, as a trespass, it is manslaughter; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 332; citing 1 East, P. C. 260; and see 37 Conn. 424; 114 Mass. 323; 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 25.

Mr. Bishop also considers that the rule that ignorance of the law is no excuse for crime is particularly harsh when applied to what is only malum prohibitum; but that at the same time this is less important because most indictable wrongs are mala in se; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 295.

It is said that "offences which are mala in se attract no additional turpitude from being declared unlawful by human legislation," while "mala prohibita are such acts as are in themselves indifferent," and become right or wrong, just or unjust, duties or misdemeanors, as the municipal legislature sees proper for protecting the welfare of society and more adequately carrying on the purposes of civil life; Anderson, Law Dict. In 22 Pick. 476, the court speak of offences "of a high and aggravated character, tending to breaches of the peace or other great disorder and violence, being what are usually considered mala in se, or criminal in themselves, in contradistinction to mala prohibita, or acts otherwise indifferent than as they are restrained by positive law."

"The substance of the distinction between malum in se and malum prohibitum is that the former is more intensely evil than the latter." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 658. Offences which have been judicially characterized in this country as mala prohibita are, violations of statutes against gambling and lotteries; 101 U. S. 814, 821; carrying concealed weapons; 90 Mo. 302.

Blackstone mentions as examples, game laws and laws against exercising certain trades without having served a certain apprenticeship, for not performing the statute-work on the public roads, and "for innumerable other positive misdemeanors," the subject of discussion being more particularly the effect of the mere prohibition of an act and affixing a penalty; he adds—"Now these prohibitory laws do not make the transgression a moral offence or sin; the only obligation in conscience is to submit to the penalty, if lawful. It must, however, here be observed that we are speaking of laws that are merely penal where the thing forbidden or enjoined is wholly a matter of indifference and where the penalty involved is an adequate compensation for the small inconvenience supposed to arise from the offence, but where disobedience to the law involves also indirect or public mischief or private injury, there it falls within our former distinction and is also an offence against conscience." 1 Bla. Com. 57. His "former distinction" is as to mala in se which we are in conscience bound to abstain from, apart from their being criminal. These views of Blackstone have been the subject of much criticism and are controverted in the notes of Christian, Sharswood, and Chase.

Aside from the considerations suggested by Bishop as above stated, the distinction between mala prohibita and mala in se is of little, if any, practical utility, and some crimes usually relegated to the former class are so generally recognized as such by statute as to be considered as covered by the criminal law in the same sense as malum in se; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 23. Judicial notice is taken of them in a country where the common law prevails; 11 Mich. 327. See CRIME; MALUM IN SE.

MALADMINISTRATION. A term in law used interchangeably with mis-administration and meaning "wrong administration." 14 Neb. 183.

MALANDRINUS. A thief or pirate. Wals. 338.

MALBERGE. A hill where the people assembled at a court, similar to the English assizes. Du Cange.

MALE. Of the masculine sex; of the sex that begets young; the sex opposed to the female.

MALEDICTION (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. A curse which was anciently annexed to donations of lands made to churches and religious houses, against those who should violate their rights.

MALEFACTOR (Lat.). He who has been guilty of some crime; in another sense, one who has been convicted of having committed a crime.

MALEFICIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Waste; damage; tort; injury. Dig. 5. 18. 1.

MALFEASANCE. The unjust performance of some act which the party had no right, or which he had contracted not, to do. It differs from misfeasance and nonfeasance, which titles see. See 1 Chitty, Pr. 9; 1 Chitty, Pl. 134.

MALICE. In Criminal Law. The doing a wrongful act intentionally without just cause or excuse. 4 B. & C. 255; 9 Metc. 104. A wicked and mischievous purpose which characterizes the perpetration of an injurious act without lawful excuse. 4 B. & C. 255; 9 Metc. 104.

A conscious violation of the law, to the prejudice of another. 9 Cl. & F. 32.

That state of mind which prompts a conscious violation of the law to the prejudice of another. 9 Cl. & F. 32.

In a legal sense malice is never understood to denote general malevolence or unkindness of heart, or enmity towards a particular individual, but it signifies rather the intent from which flows any unlawful and injurious act committed without legal justification. 15 Pick. 337; 90 Ga. 95; 33 Me. 331; 7 Ala. N. S. 728; 2 Dev. 425; 4 Mas. 115; R. & R. 26. 465; 1 Mood. C. C. 93; 30 Fla. 142. It is not confined to the intention of doing an injury to any particular person, but extends to an evil design, a corrupt and wicked notion against some one at the time of committing the crime; Bacon, Max. Reg. 15; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 727; 3 id. 1104; 90 Ga. 441.

Any formed design of mischief may be called malice. Malice is a wicked, vindictive temper, regardless of social duty, and bent on mischief. There may be malice, in a legal sense, in homicide, where there is no actual intention of any mischief, but the killing is the natural consequence of a careless action; Add. 156: 11 Ired. 261; 3 Cr. Law Mag. 216.

Express malice exists when the party evinces an intention to commit the crime; 3 Bulstr. 171.

Implied malice is that inferred by law from the facts proved; 11 Humphr. 172; 6 Blackf. 299; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 371. See 24 Neb. 838. In cases of murder this distinction is of no practical value; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 675.

Malice is implied in every case of intentional homicide; and where the fact of killing is proved, all the circumstances of accident or necessity are to be satisfactorily established by the accused, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him to prove the homicide and the circumstances attending it. If there are, in fact, circumstances of justification, excuse, or palliation, such proof will naturally indicate them. But where the fact of killing is proved by satisfactory evidence, and there are no circumstances disclosed tending to show justification or excuse, there is nothing to rebut the natural presumption of malice. It is material to the just understanding of this rule that it applies only to cases where the killing is proved and nothing further is shown; for if the circumstances disclosed tend to extenuate the act, the prisoner has the full benefit of such facts; 9 Metc. 93; 3 Gray 463.

Malice in fact is synonymous with "express malice," as distinguished from implied malice; 5 Ind. App. 78; 109 N. C. 270.

Malice in law is synonymous with implied malice; 5 Ind. App. 109; it is an act done wrongfully and wilfully, without reasonable or probable cause, and not necessarily an act done from ill feeling or spite, or a desire to injure another; 32 Neb. 444.

It is a general rule that when a man commits an act, unaccompanied by any circumstances justifying its commission, the law presumes he has acted with an intent to produce the consequences which have ensued. And therefore the intent to kill is conclusively inferred from the deliberate violent use of a deadly weapon; 5 Cush. 305. See 3 M. & S. 15; 1 R. & R. Cr. Cas. 207; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 223, 232, 340; 15 Viner, Abr. 506; 98 Ala. 1; 95 id. 5; 89 Va. 379.

In Torts. A malicious act is a wrongful act, intentionally done without cause or excuse. 48 Mo. 152.

A malevolent motive for action without reference to any hope of a remoter benefit to oneself to be accomplished by the intended harm to another. 148 Mass. 368.

Malice "is improper and indirect motive;" but a better definition is said to be, "A wish to injure the party, rather than to vindicate the law." Poll. Torts 303.

The evil mind that is regardless of social duty and the rights of others. 98 Tenn. 48.

In a libel. In connection with a privileged communication, malice is any direct and wicked motive which induces the writer to defame the other party. 109 N. C. 270. See 27 Alb. L. J. 134, 149: LIBEL.

In slander it is the absence of legal excuse; 81 Ind. 527; 5 Ind. App. 78. See SLANDER.

This term, as applied to torts, does not necessarily mean that which must proceed from a spiteful, malignant, or revengeful disposition, but a conduct injurious to another, though proceeding from an ill-regulated mind not sufficiently cautious before it occasions an injury to another; 11 S. & R. 39.

Malice consists in one's wilful doing of an act or wilful neglect of an obligation which he knows is liable to injure another, regardless of the consequences, and a malignant spirit or a specific intention to hurt an individual is not an essential element; 86 Fed. Rep. 308, per Brown, J. See 15 S. C. 409; 5 B. & A. 594; 51 Neb. 301.

It has been held that an act done in the exercise of a lawful right and without negligence may be unlawful if done with express malice; 25 Pa. 522; 113 id. 126; 7 H. L. Cas. 387; as persuading another to do, to the prejudice of a third person, something which he has a right to do, may give that third person a cause of action if the persuasion be malicious; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21, but this decision was reversed by the house of lords; [1898] A. C. 1; and the majority of the decisions tend to support the rule that an act in itself lawful is not converted by a malicious motive into an unlawful act, so as to make the doer liable to a civil action; id.; 24 Pa. 308; 72 N. Y. 39; 28 Vt. 49; and that no use of property which would be legal if due to a proper motive, can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious; [1895] A. C. 587; and see 8 Harv. L. Rev. 1. Pecuniary dishonesty is held malicious; 101 Ill. 391.

A corporation may be liable civilly for that class of torts in which a specific malicious intention is an essential element; 86 Fed. Rep. 306. See 21 How. 202. See FALSE IMPRISONMENT; LIBEL; MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

MALICE AFORETHOUGHT. A technical phrase employed in indictments, which with the word murder must be used to distinguish the felonious killing called murder from what is called manslaughter. Yelv. 205; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 242; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 429. In the description of murder the words do not imply deliberation, or the lapse of considerable time between the malicious intent to take life and the actual execution of that intent, but rather denote purpose and design in contradistinction to accident and mischance; 5 Cush. 306; 116 Mo. 96; and the intent necessary to constitute malice aforethought need not have existed for any particular time before the act of killing, but it may spring up at the instant and may be inferred from the fact of killing; 164 U. S. 492; but premeditation may be an element showing malice when otherwise it would not sufficiently appear; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 677. See 8 C. & P. 616; 2 Mas. 60; 1 D. & B. 121, 163; 6 Blackf. 299; 3 Ala. N. S. 497.

MALICIOUS ABANDONMENT. The forsaking without a just cause a husband by the wife, or a wife by her husband. See ABANDONMENT; DIVORCE.

MALICIOUS ARREST. A wanton arrest made without probable cause by a regular process and proceeding. See MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

MALICIOUS INJURY. An injury committed wilfully and wantonly, or without cause. 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 136. See Whar. Cr., 9th ed. § 126 as to malice. See 4 Bla. Com. 143, 198, 206; 2 Russ. Cr. 544.

MALICIOUS MISCHIEF. An expression applied to the wanton or reckless destruction of property, and the wilful perpetration of injury to the person. Washb. Cr. L. 73.

The term is not sufficiently defined as the wilful doing of any act prohibited by law, and for which the defendant has no lawful excuse. To sustain to a conviction of the offence of malicious mischief, the jury must be satisfied that the injury was done either out of a spirit of wanton cruelty or of wicked revenge. Jacob, Law Dict. Mischief, Malicious; Alison, Sc. Law 448; 3 Cush. 558; 2 Metc. 21; 3 Dev. & B. 130; 5 Ired. 364; 8 Leigh 719; 3 Me. 177. See 72 Mich. 172; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 621; 49 Kan. 584.

This is a common-law offence; 19 Wend. 419; 1 Dall. 335; 9 Pick. 1; 48 Ark. 56; contra, 29 N. J. L. 96; 5 Den. 277; but there are in many states statutes on the subject, and it is now considered rather with reference to statutes; 2 McCl. Cr. L. § 811, where will be found an excellent classified collection of the statutes and cases under them. One may be convicted of maliciously injuring the property of another, without knowing who the owner is; 95 Ia. 491: but it is necessary to allege that the rightful possession of the property was in some person other than the defendant; 33 Tex. Cr. Rep. 554. In Georgia the statute is held applicable only to inanimate property and not to the case of a dog killed; 93 Ga. 111; but see 35 Neb. 638. The destruction of a boat by order of the owner of a pond, in an effort to protect his possession of the latter from trespasses of the owner of the boat who had repeatedly taken the boat back to the water after the defendant had hauled it away, is not malicious mischief; 142 N. Y. 366; and see S. C. 131 id. 111, where the advice of counsel was held no defence.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION. A wanton prosecution made by a prosecutor in a criminal proceeding, or a plaintiff in a civil suit, without probable cause, by a regular process and proceeding, which the facts did not warrant, as appears by the result. Actions for malicious prosecution are not favored by the law; they are to be carefully guarded and their true principles strictly adhered to; 1 Ld. Raym. 374; 79 Mass. 201; 20 Ill. 354; Newell, Mal. Pros. 21.

Where the defendant commences a criminal prosecution wantonly, and in other respects against law, he will be responsible; 12 Conn. 219. The prosecution of a civil suit, when malicious, is a good cause of action, even when there has been no arrest; 11 Conn. 582; 1 Wend. 345. See 106 Mass. 300; Big. Torts 71; 65 Hun 365; 53 Minn. 439; Newell, Mal. Pros. 43. But see 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 261; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 287;

64 Ia. 741; 64 Pa. 289; 27 Ill. 489. In such cases the want of probable cause must be very palpable; very slight grounds will not justify an action; Big. Torts 71. See L. R. 4 Q. B. 730. On the whole the weight of authority seems to be against the maintenance of an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit in which no process other than the summons was issued; 66 Cal. 123; Newell, Mal. Pros. 37; 66 Ill. App. 516. The bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause, will not support an action for malicious prosecution; 11 Q. B. D. 690, contra, 42 Vt. 209; otherwise of bankruptcy proceedings maliciously instituted, without probable cause; 11 Q. B. D. 674; brought after the adjudication in bankruptcy has been set aside; 10 App. Cas. 210; and of civil proceedings begun by attachment, or by arrest; Poll. Torts 303; also, probably, of bringing and prosecuting an action maliciously and without probable cause in the name of a third person; id.

The action lies against the prosecutor, and even against a mere informer, when the proceedings are malicious; 9 Ala. 367. But grand jurors are not liable for information given by them to their fellow-jurors, on which a prosecution is founded; Hard. 556. Such action lies against a plaintiff in a civil action who maliciously sues out the writ and prosecutes it; 16 Pick. 453; but an action does not lie against an attorney at law for bringing the action, when regularly retained; 16 Pick. 478. See 6 Pick. 193. The attorney, however, must act in good faith. If an attorney knows that there is no cause of action, and dishonestly and with some sinister view, for some purpose of his own, or for some other ill purpose which the law calls malicious, causes the plaintiff to be arrested and imprisoned, he is liable; 34 Eng. C. L. R. 276; Newell, Mal. Pros. 23.

The action lies against a corporation aggregate if the prosecution be commenced and carried on by its agents in its interest and for its benefit, and they acted within the scope of their authority; 6 Q. B. D. 287; 9 Phila. 189; 22 Conn. 530; 130 Mass. 443; 73 Ind. 430; Poll. Torts 301, contra, 11 App. Cas. 250 (a dictum, see id. 244, 256). See also Cooley, Torts 121; 7 C. B. N. S. 290; 55 J. P. 264.

The proceedings under which the original prosecution or action was held must have been regular, in the ordinary course of justice, and before a tribunal having power to ascertain the truth or falsity of the charge and to punish the supposed offender, the now plaintiff; 3 Pick. 379. When the proceedings are irregular, the prosecutor is a trespasser; 3 Blackf. 210.

The burden is on the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that he was prosecuted, that he was exonerated or discharged, and that the prosecution was both malicious and without probable cause; 11 Q. B. D. 440. Webb, Poll. Torts 392; Bish. Non-contr. L. §§ 218-250; 35 Md. 194; 48 Barb. 30; 3 Gill & J. 377; 12 Conn. 219; 3 Mass. 112.

Malice is a question of fact for the jury, and is generally inferred from a want of probable cause; 65 Hun 623; but it is not evidence of malice when the prosecutor honestly believes in the charge; [1891] 2 Q. B. 718; and such presumption is only prima facie and may be rebutted; 86 Ala. 250; see 41 La. Ann. 303; 45 Ill. App. 458; 65 Hun 625. Although absence of reasonable and probable cause is sometimes evidence of malice, yet it is not when the prosecutor actually believes in the charge; [1891] 2 Q. B. 718. From the most express malice, however, want of probable cause cannot be inferred; 35 Md. 194; 37 id. 282. Both malice and want of probable cause must concur in order to constitute a cause of action; 20 Nev. 290; 40 La. Ann. 374; 41 id. 311; 69 Tex. 167; 79 Ga. 637; 51 N. J. L. 391; 120 U. S. 141. The plaintiff must show total absence of probable cause, whether the original proceedings were civil or criminal; 1 Camp. 199; 7 Cra. 339; 1 Mas. 24; 11 Ad. & E. 483; 24 Pick. 81; 2 Wend. 424; 1 Hill S. C. 82; 3 G. & J. 377; 9 Conn. 309; 3 Blackf. 445; 47 Kan. 396; 158 Pa. 545.

Probable cause means the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief in a reasonable mind that the plaintiff was guilty of the offence for which he was prosecuted; 37 Md. 282; 86 Ala. 250. It is such conduct on the part of the accused as may induce the court to infer that the prosecution was undertaken from public motives; 1 Greenl. 135; s. c. 10 Am. Dec. 48. See, also, 72 Ill. 262; 83 id. 548; 4 Vt. 363; 62 N. Y. 525; 32 Neb. 444. Where there are grounds of suspicion that a crime has been committed and the interests of public justice require an investigation, there is said to be probable cause, however malicious the intention of the accuser may have been; Cro. Eliz. 70; 2 Term 231; 1 Wend. 140, 345; 5 Humph. 357; 3 B. Monr. 4; 55 Fed. Rep. 217. See 1 Pa. 234; 6 W. & S. 236; 1 Meigs 84; 3 Brev. 94; 37 Ill. App. 28. It is a reasonable ground of suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the accused is guilty of the offence with which he is charged; 14 U. S. App. 297. And probable cause will be presumed until the contrary appears; circumstances sufficient merely to warrant a belief by a cautious man are not sufficient, but the belief must be that also of a reasonable and prudent man; 151 Pa. 86. The plaintiff must prove affirmatively the absence of probable cause and the existence of malice, and where the defendant had a very treacherous memory, and went on with the prosecution under the impression that the plaintiff had committed perjury, yet if that was an honest impression, the result of a fallacious memory, and acting upon it, he honestly believed the plaintiff had sworn falsely, the English court of appeals held that the jury would not be justified in finding that the defendant had prosecuted the plaintiff maliciously and without probable cause; 8 Q. B. D. 174. It makes no difference how malicious may have been the private motives of the party in prosecuting; he is protected if there was probable cause; 55 Fed. Rep. 217.

Whether the circumstances relied on are true is a question for the jury; but whether if true they amount to probable cause is a question of law for the court; 2 Q. B. 169; 93 Cal. 222; 27 Me. 266; 10 N. Y. 240; 20 Ohio 119; 10 Q. B. 272; 47 Pa. 94; 93 Cal. 222; 21 Can. S. C. 588. Evidence that the prosecution was to obtain possession of goods, is proof of want of probable cause; 47 Pa. 194; so is evidence that the plaintiff began the prosecution for the purpose of collecting a debt. See 144 Ill. 83; 86 Tex. 497. Probable cause depends upon the prosecutor's belief of guilt or innocence; 48 Barb. 30; see supra; rumors are not, but representations of others are, a foundation for belief of guilt; 52 Pa. 419. The foreman of the grand jury, who has testified that the criminal prosecution was dismissed, cannot be asked why it was dismissed, because his testimony merely proves that the prosecution is at an end and has no bearing on the question of probable cause; and evidence that the prosecution was dismissed at the instance of the defendant without the plaintiff's knowledge is irrelevant either in bar of suit or in mitigation of damages; 81 Md. 518. When the defendant, in instituting the prosecution, went before a magistrate with his counsel, expecting to make the complaint in writing and that the warrant would be issued in the usual manner, he is not liable for the act of the magistrate in directing the arrest of the defendant without a warrant; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 301.

A warrant for the arrest of a person issued upon an affidavit which charged such person with being "guilty of lying and misrepresentation" is void as a criminal prosecution, and it has been held that it cannot serve as the basis of an action for malicious prosecution; 27 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 680.

Malice may be inferred from the zeal and activity of the prosecutor conducting the prosecution; 36 Md. 246. The advice of counsel who has been fully informed of the facts is a complete justification; 25 Pa. 275; 125 id. 453; 151 id. 86; 61 N. W. Rep. 390; 37 Minn. 147; 40 id. 413; otherwise, where it does not appear that a full disclosure of all the facts was made; 41 La. Ann. 303; 35 Fed. Rep. 466; 39 Minn. 107; 2 Misc. Rep. 303; and where the defendant acts on the advice of a magistrate or one not learned in the law; 36 Md. 246; 159 Pa. 374; 81 Ga. 668; but see 84 Me. 261; 96 Mich. 408. Where he acted on the advice of a public prosecuting officer, probable cause is established if he shows a disclosure to such officer of all the facts within his knowledge, or which he had reasonable ground to believe, though there were exculpatory facts which he might have ascertained by diligent inquiry; 49 Pac. Rep. (Oreg.) 803.

A waiver of preliminary examination by the defendant in a criminal prosecution raises a presumption of probable cause; 49 Pac. Rep. (Oreg.) 803.

The advice of counsel is not, however, conclusive of want of malice; 69 Tex. 167; and while a full and complete statement of facts to a reputable attorney is a complete defence, yet though the facts may be established beyond doubt the question of good faith is for the jury, when different minds might draw different conclusions from the evidence; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 49.

The fact that an attorney was consulted before prosecuting the plaintiff for opening his mail, is not admissible as proof of probable cause, when it also appears that the attorney gave defendant no advice, but referred him to the United States officers; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 390. See 33 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 391.

The malicious prosecution or action must be ended, and the plaintiff must show it was groundless, either by his acquittal or by obtaining a final judgment in his favor in a civil action; 1 Root 553; 7 Cow. 715; 2 Dev. & B. 492; 17 Or. 447. But see contra, as to civil suits; Big. Torts 73; 14 East 216; because the plaintiff in a civil suit can terminate it whenever he wishes to do so. The finding by the examining court that there was probable cause to believe the plaintiff guilty and the binding him over for trial is only prima facie evidence of probable cause, and probable cause cannot be shown by admission of the plaintiff after his arrest nor by the finding of property on his premises, similar to that stolen, if that fact was not known to the defendant when he began his prosecution; 13 Ind. App. 10; 63 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 848. Any act which is tantamount to a discontinuance of a civil suit has the same effect; as where the plaintiff had been arrested in a civil suit, and the defendant had failed to have the writ returned, and to appear and file a declaration at the return term; 109 Mass. 158.

In criminal cases also, when the prosecuting officer enters a dismissal of the proceedings before the defendant is put in jeopardy, this act, in some jurisdictions, gives no right to the prisoner against the prosecutor; for instance, where, in a prosecution for arson, the prosecuting officer enters a nolle prosequi before the jury is sworn; 4 Cush. 217. See 56 Conn. 493; 151 Pa. 86; 73 Hun 547; 7 Ind. App. 581; 117 N. C. 31. The law on this point is unsettled. But it would seem that where the entry of the nolle prosequi is the mere act of the prosecuting attorney and no action of the court is had on it, the entry will not be an end of the proceedings, and for that reason would not warrant any action which could not be had before the proceedings were at an end. But when the court enters a judgment of discharge upon a nolle prosequi it seems to be a sufficient termination of the prosecution.

The remedy for a malicious prosecution is an action on the case to recover damages for the injury sustained; 5 Stew. & P. 367; 2 Conn. 700; 11 Mass. 500; 6 Me. 421; 3 Gill & J. 377. See CASE. The elements of damage in this action are very vague. The jury may consider the natural effect of the prosecution on reputation and feelings, the consequences of arrest, loss of time, injury to property, and expense; 57 Ia. 474; 52 Ill. 35; Newell, Mal. Pros. 494. If the prosecution was begun without probable cause, and persisted in for some private end, punitive damages may be given; 37 Md. 282. See full article in 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 281. To be relieved from an action the defendant must rebut the prima facie proof of implied malice against him, by showing honest belief, grounded on probable and reasonable cause; 41 La. Ann. 303. It is sufficient if the facts or appearances are sufficient to induce a reasonable probability that the acts which constitute the crime have been done; 35 Fed. Rep. 261.

MALICIOUSLY. With deliberate intent to injure. 30 Conn. 85.

MALIGNARE. To malign or slander; also to maim.

MALITIA PRÆCOGITATA. Malice aforethought.

MALLEABLE. Capable of being drawn out and extended by beating; capable of extension by hammering; reducible to laminated form by beating. 46 Fed. Rep. 845.

MALLUM. In Old English Law. A court of the higher kind in a county in which the more important business was dispatched by the count or earl.

MALO ANIMO. With an evil intention; with malice.

MALO GRATO. In spite; unwillingly.

MALT-TAX. An excise duty imposed upon malt in England. 1 Bla. Com. 313.

MALPRACTICE. See PHYSICIAN.

MALUM IN SE (Lat.). Evil in itself. A crime by reason of its inherent nature. 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 23.

An offence malum in se is one which is naturally evil, as murder, theft, and the like; offences at common law are generally mala in se. An offence malum prohibitum, on the contrary, is not naturally an evil, but becomes so in consequence of its being forbidden, as playing at games which, being innocent before, have become unlawful in consequence of being forbidden. See Bacon, Abr. Assumpsit (a); 1 Kent 468; MALA PROHIBITA.

MALVEILLES. Ill will. In some ancient records this word signifies malicious practices, or crimes and misdemeanors.

MALVEIS PROCURORS. Such as used to pack juries, by the nomination of either party in a cause, or other practice. Cow.

MALVERSATION. In French Law. This word is applied to all punishable faults committed in the exercise of an office, such as corruptions, exactions, extortions, and larceny. Merlin, Répert.

MAN. A human being. A person of the male sex. A male of the human species above the age of puberty.

In its most extended sense the term includes not only the adult male sex of the human species, but women and children: examples: "of offences against man, some are more immediately against the king, others more immediately against the subject." Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 2, s. 1. "Offences against the life of man come under the general name of homicide, which in our law signifies the killing of a man by a man." Id. book 1, c. 8, s. 2.

It was considered in the civil or Roman law that although man and person are synonymous in grammar, they had a different acceptation in law; all persons were men, but all men—for example, slaves—were not persons, but things. See Barringt. Stat. 216.

MANACLE. See FETTERS.

MANAGE. Direct; control; govern; administer; oversee. 144 Pa. 377.

MANAGEMENT. In the Harter Act, relates to management on the voyage and not to the master's acts in stowing the ship with reference to her stability and seaworthiness; 81 Fed. Rep. 665.

MANAGER. A person appointed or elected to manage the affairs of another. A term applied to those officers of a corporation who are authorized to manage its affairs.

One who has the conduct or direction of anything. 144 Pa. 377.

One of the persons appointed on the part of the house of representatives to prosecute impeachments before the senate.

In banking corporations these officers are commonly called directors, and the power to conduct the affairs of the company is vested in a board of directors. In some private corporations, such as railroad companies, canal and coal companies, and the like, these officers are called managers. Being agents, when their authority is limited, they have no power to bind their principal beyond such authority; 17 Mass. 29; 1 Me. 81.

In England and Canada the chief executive officer of a branch bank is called a manager. His duties are those of our presidents and cashiers combined. His signature is necessary to every contract binding on the bank, except entries in the pass-books of customers. He indorses bills, signs bills of exchange and drafts, and conducts the correspondence of the bank. He is under the control of the board of directors of the bank, and there is usually a local or branch board of directors, at which he acts as presiding officer. Sewell, Bank.

MANBOTE. A compensation paid the relations of a murdered man by the murderer or his friends.

MANCHE PRESENT. A bribe; a present from the donor's own hand.

MANCIPATE. To enslave; to bind up; to tie.

MANCIPATIO. In Roman Law. The legal form of conveyance and of fixing the relations between parties. Morey, R. L. 2. See MANUMISSION; MANCIPIUM.

MANCIPATORY WILL. In Civil Law. A form of testamentary disposition of property.

"The testator, in the presence of five witnesses and a libripens, mancipates (i. e. sells) his estate (familia pecuniaque) to a third party, the so-called familiæ emtor, with a view to imposing upon the latter, in solemn terms (nuncupatio), the duty of carrying out his last wishes as contained and expressed in the tabulæ testamenti. The object of the transaction is to make the familæ emtor not the material, but only the formal owner of the estate. His actual duties consist in the carrying out of the testator's intentions and the handing over of the property to the persons named in the tabulæ testamenti, the familæ emtor is neither more nor less than the executor of the testator." Sohm, Rom. L. 450.

This is said by the same author to be the oldest form of the Roman contract of mandatum "a juristic act validly concluded, not indeed consensu, but re (viz. by a formal conveyance of ownership), and a juristic act giving rise to a rigorously binding obligation. The mandatum and the conveyance of ownership are not mutually incompatible. The familæ emtor is the mandatory of the testator, because he is, formally speaking, the owner of the familia." Sohm, Rom. L. 451.

MANCIPIUM. The power acquired over a freeman by the mancipatio.

To form a clear conception of the true import of the word in the Roman jurisprudence, it is necessary to advert to the four distinct powers which were exercised by the pater familias, viz.; the manus, or martial power; the mancipium, resulting from the mancipatio, or alienatio per æs et libram, of a freeman; the dominica potestas, the power of the master over his slaves, and the patria potestas, the paternal power. When the pater familias sold his son, venum dare, mancipare, the paternal power was succeeded by the mancipium, or the power acquired by the purchaser over the person whom he held in mancipio, and whose condition was assimilated to that of a slave. What is most remarkable is, that on the emancipation from the mancipium he fell back into the paternal power, which was not entirely exhausted until he had been sold three times by the pater familias. Si pater filium ter venum dat, filius a patre liber esto. Gaius speaks of the mancipatio as imaginaria quædam venditio, because in his times it was only resorted to for the purpose of adoption or emancipation. See 1 Ortolan, 112; Morey, Rom. L. 23, 32; Sohm, Inst. R. L. 124, 390; ADOPTION; PATER FAMILIAS.

MANCOMUNAL. In Spanish Law. A term applied to an obligation when one person assumes the contract or debt of another. Schmidt, Civ. L. 120.

MANDAMIENTO. In Spanish Law. Commission; power of attorney. A bona fide contract by which one person commits his affairs to the charge of another, and the latter accepts the charge. White, New Recop. b. 2, tit. 12, c. 1.

MANDAMUS. In Practice. This is a high prerogative writ, usually issuing out of the highest court of general jurisdiction in a state, in the name of the sovereignty, directed to any natural person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature within its jurisdiction, requiring them to do some particular thing therein specified, and which appertains to their office or duty. 3 Bla. Com. 110; 4 Bacon, Abr. 495; per Marshall, C. J., in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. 137, 168. See 3 Wyo. 588. It is a common-law writ with which equity has nothing to do; 76 Ga. 725.

It is an extraordinary remedy in cases where the usual and ordinary modes of proceeding are powerless to afford remedies to the parties aggrieved, and when, without its aid, there would be a failure of justice; 88 Va. 942. It confers no new authority and the party to be coerced must have the power to perform the act; 129 U. S. 493. Mandamus has been termed a "criminal process relative to civil rights;" 3 Brev. 264.

Its use is well defined by Lord Mansfield in Rex. v. Barker, 3 Burr. 1265: "It was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and defect of police. Therefore it ought to be used upon all occasions when the law has established no specific remedy, and where, in justice and good government there ought to be one." "If there be a right, and no other specific remedy, this should not be denied." The same principles are declared by Lord Ellenborough, in Rex v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 8 East 219. See 6 Ad. & E. 321. The writ of mandamus is the supplementary remedy when the party has a clear right, and no other appropriate redress, in order to prevent a failure of justice. 12 Petersd. Abr. 438 (309). It is the absence of a specific legal remedy which gives the court jurisdiction; 2 Selw. N. P. Mandamus; 29 Pa. 131; 34 id. 496; 41 Me. 15; 2 Pat. & H. 385; but the party must have a perfect legal right; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1559; 27 Mo. 225; 11 Ind. 205; 20 Ill. 525; 25 Barb. 73; 2 Dutch. 135; 3 Cal. 167; and there must be a positive ministerial duty to be performed and no other appropriate remedy; 31 S. C. 81; 126 U. S. 246; 85 Ky. 177; 23 Neb. 641.

Under the English system this writ acquired, and may probably be still said to retain, its prerogative character; but in the United States it is becoming more and more assimilated to an ordinary remedy, to the use of which the parties are entitled as of right. It was in this sense that Taney, C. J., characterized it in modern practice as "nothing more than an action at law between the parties"; 24 How. 66; see, also, 33 Conn. 298; High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 4. There is a tendency, however, in some states to adhere to the prerogative idea; 26 N. Y. 316; 33 Ill. 134; 48 id. 240. Though in the last named state, the prerogative idea seems to have been lost under the statutory use of the writ, while the discretionary character remains; 86 id. 283. It may be said to remain in this country an extraordinary remedy at law in the same sense that injunction is an extraordinary remedy in equity; High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 5. The injunction is preventive and conservative, its object being to preserve matters in statu quo. Mandamus is remedial, tending to compel action and redress past grievances; id. § 6, and cases cited. Mandamus cannot be used as a preventive remedy to take the place of an injunction; 42 Md. 203.

Mandamus is a remedial process, and is not available to compel the performance of an act that will work public or private mischief, or to compel compliance with the strict letter of the law in disregard of its spirit, or in aid of a palpable fraud, or to evade the payment of a just portion of a tax by taking advantage of a confessed mistake; 137 N. Y. 201.

The remedy extends to the control of all inferior tribunals, corporations, public officers, and even private persons in some cases. But more generally, the English court of king's bench, from which our practice on the subject is derived, declined to interfere by mandamus to require a specific performance of a contract when no public right was concerned; Ang. & A. Corp. 761; 6 East 356; Bacon, Ab. Mandamus; 28 Vt. 587.

Mandamus may be granted by an appellate court to require a judge of the court to settle and allow a bill of exceptions; 16 Or. 219; 30 W. Va. 58; 128 U. S. 544. See 129 Ill. 218. It will also lie to compel an inferior court to exercise a discretion; 44 La. Ann. 1031; but not to compel the court below to decide in a particular way, or to operate as a substitute for an appeal or writ of error, even if none is given by law; 155 U. S. 396.

It is a proper remedy to compel the performance of a specific act where the act is ministerial in its character; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 15; 12 Pet. 524; 34 Pa. 293; 26 Ga. 665; 7 Ia. 186, 390; but where the act is of a discretionary; 6 How. 92; 12 Cush. 403; 20 Tex. 60; 10 Cal. 376; 5 Harring. 108; 12 Md. 329; 145 N. Y. 253; 4 Mich. 187; 5 Ohio St. 528; or judicial nature; 14 La. Ann. 60; 7 Cal. 130; 18 B. Monr. 423; 7 E. & B. 366; it will lie only to compel action generally; 11 Cal. 42; 30 Ala. N. S. 49; 28 Mo. 259; 96 id. 75; 31 W. Va. 781; 85 Ala. 226; 40 La. Ann. 818; 119 Ind. 444; 85 Ky. 177; 51 N. J. L. 479; 120 Pa. 518; and where the necessity of acting is a matter of discretion, it will not lie even to compel action; 6 How. 92; 5 Ia. 380. A class of cases in which this distinction is constantly drawn into question is where a mandamus is applied for to control the letting of public or municipal contracts, and it is the general rule that the remedy will not be applied to compel a municipal corporation to enter into a contract with one who shows himself to have been the lowest bidder; 9 Wash. 518. The provision that the contract shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder is mandatory, but the municipal board has a discretion in determining the question of responsibility, and their decision will not be reviewed on mandamus even though erroneous; 108 Pa. 559; 62 Ill. 279; 16 Nev. 217; 91 Mo. 386, contra, 21 Ohio 311; 4 Neb. 150; in other cases it is held that where the contract has been entered into with another and expense incurred, a mandamus will not be issued; 27 N. Y. 378 (and see 72 id. 496; 46 Barb. 254); 47 Mich. 135; 91 id. 262; others, again, hold that, the statutes being for the public benefit, the relators have not a clear legal right; 24 Wis. 683; 76 Md. 395; 45 Vt. 7; 23 Ia. 203. The writ is also refused where the matter is left entirely to the discretion of the authorities, with no provision about the lowest bidder; 141 Mass. 74; 35 Neb. 346; 78 Ia. 97; 49 Barb. 259. Where before the application the work was readvertised and the same person made a lower bid, under which he obtained the contract, a mandamus was refused; 155 U. S. 303. See 33 Am. L. Reg. 899.

Writs of mandamus have been issued from very early times to the ecclesiastical courts to compel them to absolve an excommunicated person who wished to conform to the orders of the church; 1 Palmer 50; to compel the Dean of Arches to hear an appeal; 7 E. & B. 315; but a mandamus is refused where the judge has absolute discretion, and it is said that a mandamus has never been granted to deprive one of office; Shortt, Mand. & Pro. 289; in such cases the remedy is by quo warranto.

This remedy will be applied to compel a corporation or public officer; 14 La. Ann. 265; 41 Me. 15; 3 Ind. 452; see 7 Gray 280; to pay money awarded against them in pursuance of a statute duty, where no other specific remedy is provided; 6 Ad. & E. 335; 34 Pa. 496; see 69 Tex. 589; 16 Or. 355; or where the money is in an officer's official custody, legally subject to the payment of such demand; 76 Cal. 269; but if debt will lie, and the party is entitled to execution, mandamus will not be allowed; Redf. Railw. § 158; 6 C. B. 70; 13 M. & W. 628; 4 B. & A. 360; 1 Q. B. 288. But mandamus will not be granted to enforce a matter of contract or right upon which an action lies in the common-law courts, as to enforce the duty of common carriers; 7 Dowl. P. C. 566; 31 Fla. 482; or where the proper remedy is in equity; 16 M. & W. 451. But where compensation is claimed for damages done partly under the powers of a statute and partly not, mandamus is the proper remedy; 2 Railw. & C. Cas. 1; Redf. Railw. § 158. Mandamus will not issue to compel the secretary of state to pay money in his hands to one party, which is claimed by another party, and the right to which is in litigation; 127 U. S. 246. Nor will the supreme court of the United States interfere by mandamus with the executive officers of the government in the exercise of their ordinary official duties;

128 U. S. 40; but it will issue where the law requires them to act, or when they refuse to perform a mere ministerial duty; 135 U. S. 200; 137 id. 636; 139 id. 306. It lies to compel the performance of a statutory duty only when it is clear and indisputable and there is no other legal remedy; 127 U. S. 246.

Mandamus is the appropriate remedy to compel corporations to produce and allow an inspection of their books and records, at the suit of a corporator, where a controversy exists in which such inspection is material to his interests; 2 Stra. 1223; 3 Term 141; 4 Maule & S. 162; 7 Houst. 338; s. c. 25 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 594.

It lies to compel the performance by a corporation of a variety of specific acts within the scope of its duties; 34 Pa. 496; 26 Ga. 665; 2 Metc. Ky. 56; 84 Ill. 303; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 461; 39 Minn. 219; 31 Fla. 482; 142 U. S. 492.

But in order to permit the use of this remedy to compel corporate action, there must be a clear legal obligation on the part of the corporation to act in the manner suggested, and the coincidence of the other conditions required to warrant the issuing of the writ, such as the absence of any other adequate legal remedy. Accordingly a mandamus has been refused to compel street car companies to operate an abandoned portion of a line where the charter did not clearly require its operation; 90 Tex. 520; or to keep cars running during the whole year, as that would involve the performance of a long series of continuing acts involving personal service, and extending over an indefinite time; 28 Ont. 399. So a railroad company as purchaser of a branch railroad at a foreclosure sale, will not be compelled to maintain and operate it at a loss where the business can be otherwise handled; 26 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 943.

The general rule on this subject is, that, if the inferior tribunal or corporate body has a discretion, and acts and exercises it, this discretion cannot be controlled by mandamus; but if the inferior body refuse to act when the law requires it to act, and the party has no other legal remedy, and where in justice there ought to be one, a mandamus will lie to set them in motion, and to compel action, and in proper cases, the court will settle the legal principles which should govern, but without controlling the discretion of the subordinate jurisdiction; Dill. Mun. Corp., 4th ed. § 828; 52 Ala. 87. The writ may be issued where an inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction when by law it ought to do so, or where, having obtained jurisdiction, it refuses to proceed in its exercise; 131 U. S. 221; 147 id. 14; id. 486; 150 id. 150.

It is the common remedy for restoring persons to corporate offices of which they are unjustly deprived: Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 194, 1587; 41 Kan. 122; the title to the office having been before determined by proceeding by quo warranto; but it will not lie to try the title to an office of which there is a de facto incumbent; 52 Ala. 87; 1 Burr. 402; 1 Ld. Raym. 426; 1 Salk. 314; 2 Head 650; 54 Me. 95; 17 Or. 640; see 83 Wis. 416; 49 Neb. 755; 58 N. J. L. 541; unless quo warranto does not lie; 3 Johns. Cas. 79; but see 20 Barb. 302; 9 Md. 83; 15 Ill. 492. And see the cases fully reviewed in Redf. Railw. § 159. Mandamus will lie to compel acceptance of municipal office by one who, possessing the requisite qualifications, has been duly appointed to the same; 145 Ill. 573. It will issue out of the supreme court to restore to his office an attorney at law illegally disbarred by the judgment of a circuit court; 30 Fla. 302.

This remedy must be sought at the earliest convenient time in those cases where important interests will be affected by the delay; 12 Q. B. 448. But it is often necessary to delay in order to determine definitely the rights and injuries of the several parties concerned, as until public works are completed; 9 Dowl. P. C. 614; 4 Q. B. 877.

It is no sufficient answer to the application that the party is also liable to indictment for the act complained of; 2 Railw. Cas. 599; 3 Q. B. 528. And where a railway company attempted to take up their rails, they were required by mandamus to restore them, notwithstanding they were also liable to indictment, that being regarded as a less efficacious remedy; 2 B. & Ald. 646. But mandamus will always be denied when there is other adequate remedy; 11 Ad. & E. 69; 1 Q. B. 288; Redf. Railw. § 159. See 97 Ala. 107; 98 Cal. 602.

It is not a proper proceeding for the correction of errors of an inferior court; 13 Pet. 279, 404; 18 Wend. 79; 13 La. Ann. 481; 7 Dowl. & R. 334; but see 140 U. S. 91; or where there is adequate remedy by appeal; 97 Mich. 620; 98 Cal. 602; 148 U. S. 107; id. 14; or by certiorari; 97 Mich. 637; 38 W. Va. 485. Indeed, by statute 6 & 7 Vict. ch. 67, § 2, the decisions of the English courts upon proceedings in mandamus may be revised on writ of error, and upon principle a writ of error will lie when the decision is made to turn upon a question of law and not upon discretion merely; Redf. Railw. § 159.

The writ is not demandable, as matter of right, but it is to be awarded in the discretion of the court; 1 Term 331, 396, 404, 425; 49 Barb. 259; 95 Cal. 450; Redf. Railw. § 159. But where a clear legal right to a writ is shown, the court has no discretion about granting it; 143 Ill. 434.

A petition for a mandamus to a public officer abates by his resignation of his office; 165 U. S. 28, where it was said that this principle has for years been considered as so well settled in that court "that in some of the cases no opinion has been filed and no official report published;" 9 Wall. 298, 313; 102 U. S. 378, 408; 155 id. 303, 306; 164 id. 701. The writ does not reach the office, but is against the officer as a person; 17 Wall. 604.

The power of granting this writ in England seems originally to have been exercised by the court of chancery, as to all the inferior courts, but not as to the king's bench; 1 Vern. 175; Ang. & A. Corp. § 697. But see 2 B. & Ald. 646; 2 M. & S. 80; 164 3 Ad. & E. 416. But for a great number of years the granting of the prerogative writ of mandamus has been confined in England to the court of king's bench.

In the United States the writ is generally issued by the highest court of judicature having jurisdiction at law; 34 Pa. 496; 20 Ill. 525; as relief by mandamus cannot be granted in equity; 127 U. S. 105.

The thirteenth section of the Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789, gives the supreme court power to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the authority of the United States. The issuing of a mandamus to courts is the exercise of an appellate jurisdiction, and, therefore, constitutionally vested in the supreme court; but a mandamus directed to a public officer belongs to original jurisdiction, and by the constitution, the exercise of original jurisdiction by the supreme court is restricted to certain specified cases, which do not comprehend a mandamus. The latter clause of the above section, authorizing this writ to be issued by the supreme court, to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, is, therefore, not warranted by the constitution, and void; 1 Cra. 175; see 5 Pet. 190; 13 id. 279, 404; 5 How. 103.

The supreme court of the United States has no power to control by mandamus the discretion of the circuit court in granting or refusing a supersedeas upon an appeal to the circuit court of appeals from an interlocutory order granting or continuing an injunction; 147 U. S. 525; nor can it compel the circuit court of appeals to receive and consider new proofs in an admiralty appeal in a cause within the legitimate jurisdiction of that court; 147 U. S. 486; but it will issue to compel compliance with a mandate of the supreme court of the United States, without regard to the value of the matter in dispute; 152 U. S. 512.

The circuit courts of the United States may also issue writs of mandamus; but their power in this particular is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction; 7 Cra. 504; 8 Wheat. 598; 1 Paine 453.

The mode of proceeding in obtaining the writ is: first, to demand of the party to perform the act. And it would seem that the party should be made aware of the purpose of the demand; 3 Ad. & E. 217, 477. The refusal must be of the thing demanded, and not of the right merely; 5 B. & Ad. 978. The refusal should be absolute and unqualified; but it may be by silence only. But the party should understand that he is required to perform the duty upon pain of the legal redress being resorted to without further delay; 4 Railw. Cas. 112. But any exception to the demand should be taken as a preliminary question; 10 Ad. & E. 531; Redf. Railw. § 190. A formal demand and refusal have been held not a necessary preliminary to the filing of a petition for mandamus to compel the performance of a public duty which the law requires to be done; 127 Ill. 613.

The application for a mandamus may be by motion in court, and the production of ex parte affidavits, in support of the facts alleged; in which case an alternative writ issues, as matter of course, generally, and the case is heard upon the excuse alleged in the return to the alternative writ; see 2 Metc. Ky. 56. Or the party may apply for the writ by formal petition, setting forth the grounds in detail, in which case the merits of the question are determined upon the traverse of the petition, instead of the traverse of the return to the alternative writ; 9 Ohio St. 599. In the latter case a rule is granted to show cause why a mandamus shall not issue; upon the decision of this rule an alternative writ would issue at common law and upon failure to obey this or make return of an adequate legal excuse, the peremptory writ followed. This practice is entirely changed by statute, see infra, but the rule to show cause is in many states the usual proceeding. And in either form, if the application prevails, a peremptory mandamus issues; the only proper or admissible return to which is a certificate of compliance with its requisitions, without further excuse or delay; 1 Q. B. 616; 1 Ia. 179. See Ang. & A. Corp. § 715. The peremptory writ need not precisely follow the alternative writ in matters of detail; 39 Minn. 426. The return to an alternative writ should be made with the greatest possible certainty, as at common law the return cannot be traversed; 127 Pa. 523; 77 Cal. 34. The practice varies greatly in different jurisdictions, though resting in all cases upon the same general principles, as to all which see generally, High, Extr. Leg. Rem. ch. 8.

The English practice is, if the first writ is denied, even on the ground of defects in the affidavits, not to permit a second application to be made; 8 Ad. & E. 413; so also, if it fail for other defects of form. But a more liberal practice obtains in the American courts; Redf. Railw. § 190.

By the Common-Law Procedure Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, provision is made for statutory mandamus, incidental to an action, brief in form and enforceable by attachment, which, if awarded, will issue peremptorily in the first instance. It has been held that a plaintiff could not under this act enforce specific performance of a contract; but that the act contemplated a public duty in which the plaintiff among others was interested, and not a private obligation which the plaintiff alone could enforce; but under the judicature acts, it is allowable for the court by an interlocutory order to grant a mandamus in any cases in which it shall appear just and convenient; Mozl. & W. The prerogative writ of mandamus is still retained in the English practice; but it is obvious that the foregoing statute must have very essentially abridged its use, as well as that of decrees in chancery for specific performance. See 8 E. & B. 512; Redf. Railw. § 190, pl. 8.

Controverted questions of fact, arising in the trial of applications for mandamus in the English practice, are referred to the determination of a jury; 1 Railw. Cas. 377; 2 id. 714; 8 El. & B. 512; 1 East 114. By the American practice, questions of fact, in applications for mandamus, are more commonly tried by the court; 2 Metc. Ky. 56. See Angell & Ames. Corp.; High, Extra. Leg. Rem.; 16 N. J. L. J. 138.

Costs rest in the discretion of the court. In the English courts they are allowed when the application fails, but not always when it prevails; Redf. Railw. § 159. The more just rule in such cases is to allow costs to the prevailing party, unless there is some special reason for denying them; and this rule now generally prevails; 8 Ad. & E. 901, 905; 5 id. 804; 1 Q. B. 636, 751; 6 E. L. & Eq. 267.

MANDANT. The bailor in a contract of mandate.

MANDATARY, MANDATARIUS. One who undertakes to perform a mandate. Jones, Bailm. 53. He that obtains a benefice by mandamus. Cowel.

MANDATE. A direction or request. Thus a check is a mandate by the drawer to his banker to pay the amount to the transferee or holder of the check; 1 Q. B. Div. 33; Rapalje & Lawrence.

A power of attorney to receive payment in the extinguishment of an obligation. It may be express or implied. See Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 152.

In Practice. A judicial command or precept issued by a court or magistrate, directing the proper officer to enforce a judgment, sentence, or decree.

The decision of an appellate court sent down to the court whose proceedings have been reviewed.

In some jurisdictions the court of last resort is authorized to enter final judgment upon which execution may issue without further proceedings, but neither of the federal appellate courts has such power; 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 701; Fost. Fed. Pr. § 495. Accordingly in these courts, and in appellate courts generally, it is the practice to send down a mandate embodying the decision. In the supreme court of the United States the mandates are sent down before the February recess, and also before the conclusion of the term; but for proper cause shown a special mandate may be ordered. A mandate may be recalled from the inferior court and set aside or corrected at the term at which it is issued; 15 Pet. 119; 111 U. S. 798; but an application to recall and correct the mandate cannot be made after the close of the term; id.; 107 id. 629.

Where there is a reversal of a judgment or decree which has been executed pending the appeal, a direction of the court below to compel restitution should be included in the mandate; 6 Cra. 329; 8 Wall. 507; even where the reversal is for want of jurisdiction; 139 U. S. 216. Restitution may be enforced by contempt proceedings; 9 Wall. 605; and it may be compelled even where a third person has received the funds or property, if he is within the jurisdiction and no superior equities in his favor have intervened; id.; but duties or charges paid by the party from whom restitution is required may be allowed; id. Restitution from the United States cannot be compelled; 10 Wheat. 431.

Interest should be included in the mandate, otherwise it cannot be awarded after the affirmance; 9 Pet. 275; but after affirmance the defendant is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the date of judgment until payment; 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1010; Supr. Ct. Rule 23; Cir. Ct. App. Rule 30; 14 How. 328.

When the mandate is filed in the court below, that court again acquires the jurisdiction of the case. It has been held that in some cases a state court may act upon an affirmance without awaiting the mandate; 140 U. S. 291; but it is clearly the better practice to have the proceedings below await the mandate, which may always be specially applied for if circumstances require it; see supra. It was held that the statute of limitations against the right of the purchaser to sue for breach of warranty of title would run from the decision of the appellate court that his title was invalid, and not from the time of filing the mandate; 42 Fed. Rep. 757.

The court below is bound by the decree of the appellate court as set forth in the mandate; 12 Pet. 488; which must be interpreted according to its subject-matter, with due consideration to the decree below as well as that above; 15 Pet. 52; 116 U. S. 45. After the case has been sent back by a mandate it has been held too late to question the jurisdiction; 6 Cra. 267; 20 How. 541; to grant a new trial; 1 Wall. 69 (except in ejectment; 143 U. S. 99); to permit the filing of a supplemental answer; 12 Pet. 339; to grant leave to file a supplemental bill suggesting new defences; 116 U. S. 45; to review the case below on its merits; 3 How. 611; 138 U. S. 595; 101 id. 555; 10 Wheat. 431. See, generally, Fost. Fed. Pr. § 495.

Royal mandates to judges for interfering in private causes constituted a branch of the royal prerogative, which was given up by Edward I. And the 1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2, declared that the pretended power of suspending or dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal. Whart.

In Contracts. A bailment of property in regard to which the bailee engages to do some act without reward. Story, Bailm. § 137. A contract whereby one party agrees to execute gratuitously a commission received from the other. Sohm, Rom. L. 314.

In the early Roman law (before the doctrines of agency were developed), it was a trust or commission by which one person, called the mandator, requested another, the mandatarius, to act in his own name and as if for himself in a particular transaction (special mandate), or in all the affairs of the former (general mandate). The mandatarius was the only one recognized as having legal rights and responsibilities as toward third persons in the transactions involved. As between him and the mandator, however, the latter was entitled to all benefit, and bound to indemnify against losses, etc.; but the service was gratuitous. Cent. Dict.

The contract of mandate in the civil law is not limited to personal property, nor does it require a delivery of personal property when it relates to that. Pothier, de Mand. n. 1; La. Civ. Code, 2954-64. It is, however, restricted to things of a personal nature at common law, and of these there must be a delivery, actual or constructive. Story, Bailm. § 142; 3 Strobh. 343.

Mandates and deposits closely resemble each other; the distinction being that in mandates the care and service are the principal, and the custody the accessory; while in deposits the custody is the principal thing, and the care and service are merely accessory. Story, Bailm. § 140; 2 Kent 569.

For the creation of a mandate it is necessary,—first, that there should exist something, which should be the matter of the contract; secondly, that it should be done gratuitously; and, thirdly, that the parties should voluntarily intend to enter into the contract. Pothier, Pand. l. 17, t. 1, p. 1, § 1; Pothier, de Mandat, c. 1, § 2; Ersk. Prin. 319.

There is no particular form or manner of entering into the contract of mandate prescribed either by the common law or by the civil law, in order to give it validity. It may be verbal or in writing; it may be express or implied; it may be in solemn form or in any other manner. Story, Bailm. § 160. The contract may be varied at the pleasure of the parties. It may be absolute or conditional, general or special, temporary or permanent. Wood. Civ. Law 242; 1 Domat, b. 1, t. 15, §§ 1, 6, 7, 8; Pothier, de Mandat, c. 1, § 3.

In Louisiana it is generally gratuitous, but not so when a contrary intention is implied from conduct of parties or nature of business; 7 La. Ann. 207; a right to compensation may be inferred from nature of services without express agreement; 5 id. 672.

The mandatary, upon undertaking his trust and receiving his article, is bound to perform it as agreed upon; 5 B. & Ald. 117; 1 Sneed 248; 6 Binn. 308; 5 Fla. 38; 41 Fed. Rep. 152; and is responsible only for gross negligence; 2 Kent 571; 4 B. & C. 345; 2 Ad. & E. 256; 16 How. 475; 3 Mas. 132; 17 Mass. 459; 2 Hawks 146; 34 Neb. 426; 154 Pa. 296; but in considering the question of negligence, regard is to be had to any implied undertaking to furnish superior skill arising from the known ability of the mandatary; Story, Bailm. §§ 177, 182; 20 Mart. La. 68. The fact that a gratuitous bailee has given bond for the faithful performance of his duties as such does not increase his liability; 154 Pa. 296. Whether a bank is liable for neglect of its agent in collecting notes, see 8 N. Y. 459; 4 Rawle 384; 2 Gall. 565; 10 Cush. 583; 12 Conn. 303; 6 H. & J. 146; 1 Pet. 25; 89 Mo. 240. He must render an account of his proceedings, and show a compliance with the condition of the bailment; Story, Bailm. § 191.

The dissolution of the contract may be by renunciation by the mandatary before commencing the execution of the undertaking; 2 M. & W. 145; 22 E. L. & Eq. 501; 8 B. Monr. 415; 3 Fla. 38; Story, Bailm. 192; by revocation of authority by the mandator; 6 Pick. 198; 5 Binn. 316; 5 Term 213; by the death of the mandator; 2 V. & B. 51; 2 Mass. 244; 8 Wheat. 174; by death of the mandatary: 2 Kent 504; 8 Taunt. 403; and by change of state of the parties; Story, Ag. § 481; and in some cases by operation of law; Story, Ag. § 500. The question of gross negligence is one for the jury; 2 Ad. & E. 256; 11 Wend. 25; and the plaintiff must show it; 2 Ad. & E. 80; 10 Watts 335. See 3 Johns. 170; 2 Wheat. 100; 7 B. Monr. 661; 8 Humphr. 430.

In Civil Law. The instructions which the emperor addressed to a public functionary, and which were to serve as rules for his conduct. These mandates resembled those of the proconsuls, the mandata jurisdictio, and were ordinarily binding on the legatees or lieutenants of the emperor of the imperial provinces, and there they had the authority of the principal edicts. Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 3, § 42, n. 4.

In the Canon Law. A rescript of the pope, by which he commands some ordinary collator, or precentor, to put the person there nominated in possession of the first benefice vacant in his collation. As to their abuses, see 2 Hall. Mid. Ages 212; Rapalje & Lawrence.

MANDATOR. The person employing another to perform a mandate. Story, Bailm. § 138; 1 Brown, Civ. L. 382; Halif. Anal. Civ. L. 70.

MANDATORY. In the construction of statutes, this word is applied to such as require to be obeyed, under penalty of having proceedings under them declared void. Directory statutes must be obeyed, but, if not, do not invalidate the act. See STATUTE.

MANDATORY INJUNCTION. One that compels the defendant to restore things to their former condition and virtually directs him to perform an act. Bisph. Eq. § 400. See INJUNCTION, and an extended note there cited from 20 Am. Dec. 389.

MANDATUM. See BAILMENT; MANDATE.

MANDAVI BALLIVO. In English Practice. The return made by a sheriff when he has committed the execution of a writ of a liberty to a bailiff, who has the right to execute the writ.

MANHOOD. In Feudal Law. A term denoting the ceremony of doing homage by the vassal to his lord. The formula used was devenio vester homo, I become your man. 2 Bla. Com. 54; 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 585. See HOMAGE.

MANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. The most common of all forms of insanity, consisting of one or both of the following conditions, viz.: intellectual aberration, and morbid or affective obliquity.

A chronic affection of the brain, ordinarily without fever, characterized by the perturbation and exaltation of the sensibilities, the intelligence, and will. Esquirol.

A condition of exaltation which affects the emotions and the intellect, and expresses itself by increased activity,—mental and physical. 3 Witth. & B. Med. Jur. 250.

A condition in which the perversion of the understanding embraces all kinds of objects and is accompanied with a general mental excitement. 2 Misc. Rep. 329.

It is in one form mere excitement, or this may have developed into the other,—frenzy. It is the reverse of melancholia, and as well developed as the depression of the latter, is the opposite feeling which characterizes the former; id.

An insanity in which there is general exaltation of the mental, sensory, and motor functions. 1 Clevenger, Med. Jur. of Insan. 953.

It would appear to be of easy diagnosis, but the excitement of other forms of insanity is constantly mistaken for that of simple mania. The beginning is very gradual, and weeks, months, or even years of bad health may precede an outbreak, and the mental explosion is usually unexpected, Id.

The maniac either misapprehends the true relations between persons and things, in consequence of which he adopts notions manifestly absurd, and believes in occurrences that never did and never could take place, or his sentiments, affections, and emotions are so perverted that whatever excites their activity is viewed through a distorting medium, or, which is the most common fact, both these conditions may exist together, in which case their relative share in the disease may differ in such degree that one or the other may scarcely be perceived at all. According as the intellectual or moral element prevails, the disease is called intellectual or moral mania. Whether the former is ever entirely wanting has been stoutly questioned, less from any dearth of facts than from some fancied metaphysical incongruity. The logical consequence of the doubt is that in the absence of intellectual disturbance there is really no insanity,—the moral disorders proceeding rather from unbridled passions than from any pathological condition. Against all such reasoning it will be sufficient here to oppose the very common fact that in every collection of the insane may be found many who exhibit no intellectual aberration, but in whom moral disorders of the most flagrant kind present a marked contrast to the previous character and habits of life.

Both forms of mania may be either general or partial. In the latter, the patient has adopted some notion having a very limited influence upon his mental movements, while outside of that no appearance of impairment or irregularity can be discerned. Pure monomania, as this form of insanity has been often called,—that is, a mania confined to a certain point, the understanding being perfectly sound in every other respect,—is, no doubt, a veritable fact, but one of very rare occurrence. The peculiar notions of the insane, constituting insane belief, are of two kinds: delusions and hallucinations, which titles see. See also MONOMANIA.

In general intellectual mania, excepting that form of it called raving, it is not to be understood that the mind is irrational on every topic, but rather that it is the sport of vague and shifting delusions, or, where these are not manifest, has lost all nicety of intellectual discernment, and the ability to perform any continuous process of thought with its customary steadiness and correctness. It is usually accompanied by feelings of estrangement or indifference towards those who at other times were objects of affection and interest. A common feature of the disease is either more or less nervous exaltation, manifested by loquacity, turbulence, and great muscular activity, or depression, indicated by silence, gloom, painful apprehensions, and thoughts of self-destruction.

In moral or affective mania, the disorder is manifested chiefly, if not entirely, in the sentiments or propensities, which are essential parts of our mental constitution, and, of course, as liable to disease as the intellectual faculties. In modern classification what is termed affective insanity is a form in which the feelings and emotions are chiefly involved; it concerns the desires and the ethical side of human nature. 3 Witth. & B. 265. It may be partial or general. In the former, a single propensity is excited to such a degree of activity as to impel the person to its gratification by an irresistible force, while perfectly conscious of the nature of the act and deploring the necessity that controls him. Our limits allow us to do but little more than to indicate the principal of these morbid impulses:—propensity to kill, homicidal monomania; propensity to steal, kleptomania; sexual propensity, by various names such as sidoiomania, erotomania, nymphomania; propensity to burn, pyromania; propensity to drink, dipsomania; propensity to use opium, morphiomania. In the first, the patient is impelled by an inward necessity to take life, without provocation, without motive. The victim is often the patient's child, or some one to whom there has been a tender attachment. In most cases there has been some derangement of health, or some deviation from the ordinary physiological condition, such as delivery, or suppressed menstruation; but occasionally no incident of this kind can be detected; the patient has been, apparently, in the ordinary condition, both bodily and mental. See DIPSOMANIA; EROTIC MANIA; KLEPTOMANIA; PYROMANIA.

In general moral mania, it is not to be supposed that the sentiments and propensities are all and equally disordered. On the contrary, the propensities may not be excessively active, though occasionally one may crave unusual indulgence. The essential features of general moral mania is that the moral relations, whereby the conduct is governed, more than by the deductions of reason, are viewed through a distorting medium. This condition is usually accompanied by a perversion of some of the sentiments that inspire hope, fear, courage, self-reliance, self-respect, modesty, veracity, domestic affection. The patient is eager and sanguine in the pursuit of whatever strikes his fancy, ready with the most plausible reasons for the success of the wildest projects, viewing every prospect through a rose-colored medium, and regardless of the little proprieties and amenities of life. Love for others is replaced by aversion or indifference; the least contradiction or check is met by anger or impatience; he is restless, insensible to fatigue, and sleeps comparatively little. In some cases, and often at different periods in the same case, the very opposite moral condition occurs. Without cause, true or delusive, the person is completely wretched. The past affords him no pleasure, the future reveals not a single gleam of hope, and the ordinary sources of comfort and joy only serve to darken the cloud of doubt, apprehension, and despair in which he is enveloped.

Mania is usually a growth, rather than a sudden development (though sometimes the latter), and its incipient stages are characterized by more or less of morbid depression, or, in some cases, irritability. Then follows a period of restless but undirected and unconcentrated activity. Delusions and hallucinations are common, and may extend to an entire change of personality.

The physical condition, like the mental, indicates early an appearance of vigor with excessive appetite; and the use of alcoholic stimulants, while not in itself a cause, may hasten the attack, so that in many cases which resemble alcoholic mania it is found that the mental disorder preceded the drinking. It is said that "there is always, however, finally a failure of nutrition with loss of flesh, the tongue becomes coated and the bowels are constipated. The pulse may be somewhat rapid, but frequently, even during great excitement, there is little change, it often being slow and small. Insomnia is a marked symptom, days passing without sleep despite the ceaseless activity. There is one peculiarity about this constant activity, in that there seems to be no sense of fatigue accompanying it. There is, in fact, apparently a cerebral anæsthesia. This applies also to pain perception, as exposure to cold does not seem to be recognized, and even painful operations can be carried on without apparent suffering. Acts of self-mutilation, which are especially common where sexual disturbance is associated with the mania, are often done, which are harrowing in the extreme and yet are not appreciated by the patient." 3 Witth. & B. Med. Jur. 251.

This form of mental disorder may be acute with frenzy and raving, in which case there is entire mental confusion and delirium; or it may be chronic in which case there is usually some more or less settled delusion with periodic excitability easily aroused and liable quickly to subside. "There is almost always associated with this condition a generally happy-go-lucky state of mind. There is in fact more or less dementia (q. v.), the state toward which all cases tend which do not end in recovery." Id. 253.

With respect to the effect of this form of mental disorder, whether general or partial, upon criminal responsibility and civil incapacity, see INSANITY.

MANIA A POTU. See DELIRIUM TREMENS; Whart. & St. Med. Jur.

MANIFEST. In Commercial Law. A written instrument containing a true account of the cargo of a ship or a commercial vessel. It must contain a list of all packages or separate items of freight with their distinguishing marks, numbers, etc. By the United States statute it must also designate the ports of lading and of destination, a description of the vessel and the designation of its owners, and must contain the names of the consignees and passengers with a list of their baggage and an account of the sea stores remaining; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2807. The manifest should be made out, dated, and signed by the captain at places where the goods or any part of them are taken on board.

The want of a manifest where one is required and also the making a false manifest, are grave offences.

In Evidence. Clear and requiring no proof; notorious; apparent by examination; open; palpable; incontrovertible. It is synonymous with evident, visible, or plain. 71 N. Y. 486.

MANIFESTO. A solemn declaration, by the constituted authorities of a nation, which contains the reasons for its public acts towards another.

On the declaration of war, a manifesto is usually issued, in which the nation declaring the war states the reasons for so doing. Vattel, l. 3, c. 4, § 64; Wolffius § 1187. It differs from a proclamation in that it is issued to the other belligerent and to neutral nations.

MANKIND. Persons of the male sex; the human species. The statute of 25 Hen. VIII. c. 6, makes it felony to commit sodomy with mankind or beast. Females as well as males are included under the term mankind. Fortescue 91; Bac. Abr. Sodomy.

MANNER. Mode of performing or exercising; method; custom; habitual practice. 139 Ill. 629.

MANNER AND FORM. In Pleading. After traversing any allegation in pleading, it is usual to say, "in manner and form as he has in his declaration in that behalf alleged," which is as much as to include in the traverse not only the mere fact opposed to it, but that in the manner and form in which it is stated by the other party. These words, however, only put in issue the substantial statement of the manner of the fact traversed, and do not extend to the time, place, or other circumstances attending it, if they were not originally material and necessary to be proved as laid. See MODO ET FORMA.

MANNING. A day's work of a man. Cowel. A summoning to court. Spelman, Gloss.

MANNIRE. To cite any person to appear in court and stand in judgment there. Du Cange.

MANNOPUS (Lat.). An ancient word, which signifies goods taken in the hands of an apprehended thief.

MANOR (French, manoir). A house, residence, or habitation. It includes not only a dwelling-house, but also lands. See Co. Litt. 58, 108; 2 Rolle, Abr. 121; Merlin, Répert, Manoir; Serg. Land Laws of Penn. 195; 11 H. L. Cas. 83.

Manor is also said to be derived originally either from Lat. manendo, remaining, or from Brit. maer, stones, being the place marked out or inclosed by stones. Webst.

In English Law. A tract of land originally granted by the king to a person of rank, part of which (terræ tenementales) was given by the grantee or lord of the manor to his followers. The rest he retained under the name of his demesnes (terræ dominicales). That which remained uncultivated was called the lord's waste, and served for public roads, and commons of pasture for the lord and his tenants. The whole fee was called a lordship, or barony, and the court appendant to the manor the court-baron. The tenants, in respect to their relation to this court and to each other were called pares curiæ; in relation to the tenure of their lands, copyholders (q. v.), as holding by a copy of the record in the lord's court.

Originally a manor was a "highly complex and organized aggregate of corporeal and incorporeal things. It usually involved the lordship over villeins and the right to seize their chattels. It was not a bare tract of land, but a complex made up of land and of a great part of the agricultural capital that worked the land, men and beasts, ploughs and carts, forks and flails." 2 Poll. & M. 143, 148.

The franchise of a manor; i. e. the right to jurisdiction and rents and services of copyholders. Cowel. No new manors were created in England after the prohibition of sub-infeudation by stat. Quia Emptores, in 1290. 1 Washb. R. P. 30.

In American Law. A manor is a tract held of a proprietor by a fee-farm rent in money or in kind, and descending to the oldest son of the proprietor, who in New York was called a patroon. 9 Seld. 291.

MANQUELLER. In Saxon Law. A murderer.

MANSE. Habitation; farm and land. Spelman, Gloss. Parsonage or vicarage house. Paroch. Antiq. 431; Jacob, Law Dict. So in Scotland. Bell, Dict.

MANSION-HOUSE. Any house of dwelling, in the law of burglary, etc. Co. 3d Inst. 64.

The term "mansion-house," in its common sense, not only includes the dwelling-house, but also all the buildings within the curtilage, as the dairy-house, the cow-house, the stable, etc.; though not under the same roof nor contiguous. Burn, Inst. Burglary, 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 215, 216; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 558; 4 Bla. Com. 225. See 3 S. & R. 199; 4 Strobh. 372; 4 Call 409; 14 M. & W. 181; 4 C. B. 105; 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 783.

MANSLAUGHTER. In Criminal Law. The unlawful killing of another without malice either express or implied. 4 Bla. Com. 190; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 466.

Any unlawful and wilful killing of a human being, without malice, is manslaughter, and thus defined, it includes a negligent killing which is also wilful. 37 Fed. Rep. 875. See 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 737.

The distinction between manslaughter and murder consists in the following. In the former, though the act which occasions the death be unlawful, or likely to be attended with bodily mischief, yet the malice, either express or implied, which is the very essence of murder, is presumed to be wanting in manslaughter; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 218; Foster 290; 5 Cush. 304.

It also differs from murder in this, that there can be no accessaries before the fact, there having been no time for premeditation; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 437; 1 Russ. Cr. 485; but see 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 678.

In a recent work, cases of manslaughter are divided into three classes: (1) Where there was an intent to take life and the killing would be murder but for mitigating circumstances. (2) Where death results from unintentionally doing an unlawful act. (3) Where it results from the negligent doing or omission of an act which, though not itself wrongful, was attended by circumstances which endangered life; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 335.

There is a not uncommon division of manslaughter into two degrees, voluntary and involuntary; and these degrees are distinctly recognized by statute in several states; in other states several distinct degrees of the crime are created by statute; in some as many as four.

Involuntary manslaughter is such as happens without the intention to inflict the injury.

Voluntary manslaughter is such as happens voluntarily or with an intention to produce the injury.

It has been said that the distinction between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter is now obsolete, and unless where the terms are used in statutes defining the crimes, they are not used in indictment, verdict, or sentence. But where the distinction is made by statute, there can be no conviction of involuntary manslaughter on an indictment for voluntary; 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 307. It would seem however that it is incorrect to characterize as obsolete what is literally recognized by statute in several jurisdictions. See supra. It is more accurate to say that the division is purely statutory in its origin, not entering into the common-law definitions.

Homicide may become manslaughter in consequence of provocation; mutual combat; in case of resistance to public officers, etc.; killing in the prosecution of an unlawful or wanton act; or killing in the prosecution of a lawful act improperly performed, or performed without lawful authority.

The provocation which reduces the killing from murder to manslaughter is an answer to the presumption of malice, which the law raises in every case of homicide: it is, therefore, no answer when express malice is proved; 1 Russ. Cr. 440; Foster 132; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 239. And to be available the provocation must have been reasonable and recent; for no words or slight provocation will be sufficient, and if the party has had time to cool, malice will be inferred; Washb. Cr. L. 81; 4 Pa. 264; 2 N. Y. 193; 25 Miss. 383; 3 Gratt. 594; 6 Blackf. 299; 8 Ired. 344; 18 Ala. N. s. 720; 15 Ga. 223; 10 Humphr. 141; 5 C. & P. 324; 6 How. St. Tr. 769; 17 id. 57; 1 Leach 151; 26 Tex. App. 221, 322; 150 U. S. 62; 114 Ill. 86; it is on the assumption that passion disturbs the sway of reason and makes one regardless of its admonition; 83 Ala. 26. Words alone, however provoking or insulting, will not reduce killing to manslaughter; 98 Mo. 150; 85 Ala. 326; 26 Tex. App. 624; 64 Cal. 369; 116 Mo. 1; 147 Ill. 310. Intent to kill cannot be an element of involuntary manslaughter; 76 Ga. 478. It does not necessarily follow that homicide was not murder because done in sudden passion; 45 La. Ann. 1036.

In case of mutual combat, it is generally manslaughter only, when one of the parties is killed; 4 D. & B. 191; 1 Jones N. C. 280; 2 C. & K. 814. When death ensues from duelling, the rule is different; and such killing is murder.

The killing of an officer by resistance to him while acting under lawful authority is murder; Whart. Cr. L. § 413; but see 57 Conn. 307; but if the officer be acting under a void or illegal authority, or out of his jurisdiction, the killing will be manslaughter, or excusable homicide, according to the circumstances of the case; Washb. Cr. L. 81; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 80, 132; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 458; 84 Ky. 103; 26 Tex. App. 1.

Killing a person while doing an act of mere wantonness is manslaughter: as, if a person throws down stones in a coal-pit, by which a man is killed, although the offender was only a trespasser; Lew. Cr. Cas. 179; MALA PROHIBITA; or where a person in another's charge, too feeble to take care of herself, dies from lack of proper food, nursing, and medical attention, the latter is guilty of manslaughter; [1893] 1 Q. B. 450.

When death ensues from the performance of a lawful act, it may, in consequence of the negligence of the offender, amount to manslaughter. For instance, if the death had been occasioned by negligent driving; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 263; 1 C. & P. 320; 6 id. 129; or by negligently running an engine and thereby causing a collision by which a passenger is killed; 118 Ind. 167. Again, when death ensues from the gross negligence of a medical or a surgical practitioner, it is manslaughter.

It is no crime for any one to administer medicine; but it is a crime to administer it so rashly and carelessly, or with such criminal inattention, as to produce death; Whart. Cr. L. § 346; and in this respect there is no difference between the regular practitioner and the quack; 1 F. & F. 519, 521; 4 C. & P. 440; 1 B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 46; 8 Wash. 12. And see 6 Mass. 134; 3 C. & P. 632.

MANU BREVI. With a short hand.

MANU FORTI (Lat. with strong hand). A term used in pleading in cases of forcible entry. No other words are of equal import. It implies greater force than the words vi et armis; 10 Ired. 39; 8 Term 362; 4 Cush. 141; Dane, Abr. c. 132, a. 6, c. 208, a. 12.

MANUFACTURE. To make or fabricate raw materials by hand, art, or machinery, and work into forms convenient for use; and, when used as a noun, anything made from raw materials by hand, or by machinery, or by art. 61 Hun 53.

Making fish lines, ropes, etc., from raw material is a manufacture; 36 La. Ann. 98; as is the making of cordage, rope, and twine; 42 id. 728. Cutting ice and storing it in a building is not; 135 Mass. 258.

As to its signification in patent law, see PATENT.

A cooper; 34 La. Ann. 596; a pork packer; 41 Ohio St. 691; a gas company; 12 Allen 75; 89 N. Y. 409; one who prepares for market and sells lumber which is the growth of his own land; 1 Low. 478; a publisher of a newspaper; 6 Bankr. Reg. 238 (contra, 3 McArth. 405); are manufacturers. An ice cream confectioner is not; 82 La. Ann. 1075; nor is one engaged in cutting and making coats and trousers out of cloth which is already manufactured by another; 41 id. 894; or a dry-dock company; 92 N. Y. 487; or an aqueduct corporation; 100 Mass. 183; or a mining company; 106 id. 131.

MANUFACTURING CORPORATION. A corporation engaged in the production of some article, thing or object, by skill or labor, out of raw material, or from matter which has already been subjected to artificial forces, or to which something has been added to change its natural condition. 99 N. Y. 181. The term does not include a mining corporation; 106 Mass. 135; nor one engaged in mixing teas and in roasting, mixing, and grinding coffee; 145 N. Y. 375.

MANUMISSION. The act of releasing from the power of another. The act of giving liberty to a slave.

The modern acceptation of the word is the act of giving liberty to slaves. But in the Roman law it was a generic expression, equally applicable to the enfranchisement from the manus, the mancipium, the dominica potestas, and the patria potestas. Manumittere signifies to escape from a power,—manus. Originally, the master could only validly manumit his slave when he had the dominium jure quiritium over him: if he held him merely in bonis, the manumission was null, according to the civil law; but by the jus honorarium the slave was permitted to enjoy his liberty de facto, but whatever he acquired belonged to his master. The status of these quasi-slaves was fixed by the Lex Junia Norbana under which they became Latini Juniani, both which titles see. At first there were only three modes of manumission, viz.: 1. vindicta; 2. census; and, 3. testamentum. The vindicta consisted in a fictitious suit, in which the assertor libertatis, as plaintiff, alleged that the slave was free; the master not denying the claim, the prætor rendered a decision declaring the slave free. In this proceeding figured a rod,—festuca vindicta,—a sort of lance (the symbol of property), with which the assertor libertatis touched the slave when he claimed him as free: hence the expression vindicta manumissio. Census, the second mode, was when the slave was inscribed at the instance of his master, by the censor, in the census as a Roman citizen. Testamento was when the testator declared in express terms that the slave should be free,—servus meus Cratinus liber esto,—or by a fideicommissum,—heres meus rogo te ut Sanum vicini mei servum, manumittas, fideicommitto heredis mei ut iste eum servum manumittat.

Afterwards, manumission might take place in various other ways; in sacrosanctis ecclesiis, of which we have a form: Ex beneficis S. ✠ per Joannem episcopum et per Albertum S. ✠ Casatum, factus est liber Lemlbertus, teste hac sancta ecclesia. Per epistolam. Justinian required the letter containing the manumission to be signed by five witnesses. Inter amicas, a declaration made by the master before his friends that he gave liberty to his slave: five witnesses were required, and an act was drawn up in which it was stated that they had heard the declaration. Per codicillum, by a codicil, which required to be signed by five witnesses. There were many other modes of manumission, which were enumerated in a Constitution of Justinian. C. 76, 3-12; 1 Ortolan 35 et seq.; 1 Etienne 78 et seq.; Lagrange 101 et seq.

Direct manumission may be either by deed or will, or any other act of notoriety done with the intention to manumit. A variety of these modes are described as used by ancient nations.

Indirect manumission was either by operation of law, as the removal of a slave to a non-slaveholding state animo morandi, or by implication of law, as where the master by his acts recognized the freedom of his slave.

Manumission being merely the withdrawal of the dominion of the master, in accordance with the principles of the common law the right to manumit existed everywhere, unless forbidden by law. No formal mode or prescribed words were necessary to effect manumission; it could be by parol; and any words were sufficient which evinced a renunciation of dominion on the part of the master; 2 Humphr. 189; 3 Halst. 275. No one but the owner could manumit; 4 J. J. Marsh. 103; 10 Pet. 568; and the effect was simply to make a freeman, not a citizen. But mere declarations of intention were insufficient unless subsequently carried into effect; Coxe 259; 8 Mart. La. 149; 14 Johns. 324; 19 id. 53. Manumission could be made to take effect in future; Coxe 4; 2 Root 364. In the meantime the slaves were called statu liberi.

As to the emancipation of slaves in the United States by proclamation of the president, see BONDAGE. See Cobb, Law of Slavery.

MANURE. Manure made upon a farm in the ordinary manner, from the consumption of its products, is a part of the realty; 1 Washb. R. P. 18; 68 Me. 204; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 36, n.; 15 Wend. 169; 13 Gray 53; 11 Conn. 525; 44 N. H. 120; see 38 Fed. Rep. 911. It has been also held to be personalty; 4 Dutch. 581; 2 Ired. 326; especially if it be made from hay purchased and brought upon the land by the tenant; 48 N. H. 147; and where a teamster owning a house and stable sold them with a small lot on which they stood, it was held that manure in the stable was personalty; 49 N. H. 62. Manure in heaps has been held to be personalty; 11 Conn. 525; and where the owner of land gathered manure into heaps and sold it, and then the land, the manure did not pass with the land; 43 Vt. 93; 110 Mass. 94. In 1 Cr. & M. 809, a custom for a tenant to receive compensation for manure left by him on the farm was recognized. Manure dropped in the street belongs originally to the owners of the animals that dropped it, but, if abandoned by them, the first taker has a right to it; 37 Conn. 500; s. c. 9 Am. Rep. 350. See EMBLEMENTS.

MANUS (Lat. hand), anciently, signified the person taking an oath as a compurgator. The use of this word probably came from the party laying his hand on the New Testament.

Manus signifies, among the civilians, power, and is frequently used as synonymous with potestas. Lec. El. Dr. Rom. § 94. Manus mariti, marital power. Manus injectio, an executory judgment.

MANUSCRIPT. An unpublished writing. A writing of any kind as distinguished from any thing that is printed. Cent. Dict. The term does not include pictures and paintings; 3 Cliff. 537.

In every writing the author has a property at common law, which descends to his representative, but is not liable to seizure by creditors so that they can publish it; 1 Bell, Dict. 68; 5 McLean 32. And an unauthorized publication will be restrained in equity; 4 Burr. 2320, 2408; 2 Bro. P. C. 138; 2 Edw. Ch. 329; 2 Mer. 434; 1 Ball & B. 207; 2 Stor. 100. The passage of the copyright acts has not abrogated the common-law rights of an author to his unpublished manuscript, and for a wanton infringement of his rights, exemplary damages may be given; 73 Fed. Rep. 196. Letters are embraced within this principle; for, although the receiver has a qualified property in them, the right to object to their publication remains with the writer. It is held, however, that the receiver may publish them for the purposes of justice publicly administered, or to vindicate his character from an accusation publicly made; 2 V. & B. 19; 2 Stor. 100; 2 Atk. 342; 2 Bush 480; 1 Mart. La. 297; 4 Du. N. Y. 379. The receiver may destroy or give away the letters, as soon as received; 2 Bush 480. The latter proposition has been doubted; see Drone, Copyr. 137. In the United States, the Copyright Act recognizes the right of property in "any manuscript whatever," which includes private letters; 5 McLean 32; and gives a remedy for the unauthorized publication. These rights will be considered as abandoned if the author publishes his manuscripts without securing the copyright under the acts of congress. See Curtis; Copinger; Drone, Copyright; LETTER; PRIVACY; COPYRIGHT.

MANUTENENTIA. A writ which lay against persons for the offence of maintenance. Reg. Orig. 182.

MANY. Denotes multitude, but not majority. 87 Ala. 708.

MAP. A transcript of the region which it portrays, narrowed in compass so as to facilitate an understanding of the original. 3 Minn. 103.

When a deed conveys a lot as indicated on a recorded plat, the latter may be consulted in aid of the description in the deed; 114 Mo. 13. A map in a deed should be treated as a part of the description, when evidently intended to be so treated, though it is not expressly referred to therein; 64 Conn. 78.

Where the owner of land lays it out in lots and streets, and in the map thereof filed with the public records designates certain portions as a park and afterwards conveys lots with reference to such map, it operates as a dedication of the land for a park; 23 Or. 176. The mere recording by public authority of a map of a proposed system of highways does not of itself entitle the owner of the land to damages; 167 U. S. 548; so with reference to the streets on such a map; 44 La. Ann. 931; 96 Ala. 272; 17 R. I. 799; 133 Ind. 331; 33 Fla. 470; but see 67 Hun 546. Maps and surveys are not competent evidence unless their accuracy is shown by other evidence; 1 Black 209; as by the testimony of the surveyors who prepared them; 5 Thomp. & C. 611; but a map of public land, made by a public surveyor and duly certified and filed in a public office under a statute, is admissible for that purpose; 17 Wend. 312; and so are ancient maps to show matters of public and general right; 11 Wall. 395; but an ancient map of partition among private owners is not evidence; 2 Johns. 180.

In an action for the recovery of real estate, a map not dated or signed but shown to have been made in 1818 by a skilful surveyor long since dead, as to which other surveyors testified that they had tested it in their own work and that it was the earliest known survey of the district in question, and which was shown to have related to an actual transaction, was held admissible as an ancient map. Other maps made in 1820 and 1823 by the same surveyor and showing in detail certain of the lots in the vicinity of those in dispute were admissible as showing accuracy of the ancient map. The testimony of other surveyors as to the use of the map in their own work was admissible for the purpose of showing general accuracy of the map and deeds executed shortly after the map was made conveying the tracts described therein were admissible as ancient deeds to show that the map was made in an actual transaction; 44 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 333.

A map or plan of land referred to in making conveyances thereof is evidence to show boundaries or location, or to explain the contract; 64 N. Y. 33; and so in dedicating land to the public; 40 Conn. 410.

MARAUDER. One who, while employed in the army as a soldier, commits a larceny or robbery in the neighborhood of the camp, or while wandering away from the army. Merlin, Répert. See Halleck, Int. Laws; Lieber, Guerrilla Parties.

MARC-BANCO. The name of a coin. The marc-banco of Hamburg, as money of account, at the custom-house, is deemed and taken to be of the value of thirty-five cents. Act of March 3, 1843.

MARCHERS. In Old English Law. Nobles who lived on the Marches, and had their own laws, and power over life and death, as if they were petty princes. Camden; Jacob, Law. Dict. Abolished by stat. 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26, 1 Edw. VI. c. 10, and 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 15. They were also called Lords Marchers (q. v.).

MARCHES. Limits; confines; borders. Especially used of the limits between England and Wales and between England and Scotland. Ersk. Inst. 2. 6. 4.

MARCHETA. Maiden rents (q. v.).

MARE. See HORSE.

MARE CLAUSUM. The sea closed. It was formerly contended that a nation could in some cases claim jurisdiction over certain parts of the open sea even beyond the immediate vicinity of its own coast; but the contention has been abandoned. There has been an attempt to extend the principle to certain inland seas not entirely enclosed within the limits of a single state. When Turkey included the shores of the Black Sea, it was mare clausum. But when it lost part of its shore, Russia and other nations became entitled to participate in the commerce of the Black Sea, a right which was recognized by treaty in 1820. The great inland lakes and their outlets fall under the same principle; 16 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 170. See 1 Kent 27; SEA.

MARE LIBERUM. The sea free. The title of a work by Grotius against the Portuguese claims to an exclusive trade to the Indies through the South Atlantic and Indian oceans. 1 Kent 27.

MARESCALLUS (fr. Germ. march, horse, and schalch, master. Du Cange). A groom of the stables, who also took care of the diseases of the horse. Du Cange.

An officer of the imperial stable; magister equorum. Du Cange.

A military officer, whose duty it was to keep watch on the enemy, to choose a place of encampment, to arrange or marshal the army in order of battle, and, as master of the horse, to commence the battle. This office was second to that of comes stabuli or constable. Du Cange.

An officer of the court of exchequer. 51 Hen. III. 5.

An officer of a manor, who oversaw the hospitalities (mansionarius). Du Cange; Fleta, lib. 2, 74.

Marescallus aulæ. An officer of the royal household, who had charge of the person of the monarch and the peace of the palace. Du Cange.

MARETUM (Lat.). Marshy ground overflowed by the sea or great rivers. Co. Litt. 5.

MARGIN. A sum of money, or its equivalent, placed in the hands of a stock broker, by the principal, or person on whose account the purchase is to be made, as a security to the former against losses to which he may be exposed by a subsequent depression in the market value of the stock. 49 Barb. 462.

A sale on margin is a sale on time, of stock retained as security and not delivered until final payment is made. If the stock falls in value before the time of final payment, the buyer is called upon to advance more margin.

The effect of the contract is that the broker, upon the performance of certain conditions by the customer, will buy and hold a certain number of shares. and in case any advance accrues and is realized by a sale, made under the direction or authority of the customer, he shall enjoy the benefit of it, and in case a loss ensues, the broker having performed the contract on his part, the customer shall bear it; 49 Barb. 464; 66 N. Y. 518.

The circumstances attending ordinary speculations in stocks on a margin are described by Hunt, C. J., in 41 N. Y. 235; and also more fully in Dos Passos, Stock Brokers 102.

Stock purchased on a margin instantly becomes the property of the customer, with all future dividends and earnings, and the client is entitled to the possession of it upon paying the purchase money with commissions; 41 N. Y. 235, 247, 257, 258; 53 id. 211, 216. It was settled in New York by the leading case of Markham v. Jaudam that a purchase of stock on margin by brokers to be carried for the customer in their own name and with their own funds, creates the legal relation of pledgor and pledgee, and that a sale, not judicial, or upon notice and demand for payment of advances and commissions is a wrongful conversion; 41 N. Y. 23. This doctrine was finally distinctly reaffirmed in New York; 81 N. Y. 25; and in other states; 25 Md. 242, 269; 48 Cal. 99; 5 Pa. 41; 71 id. 76; and apparently in England; 5 Bligh N. S. 165, affirming 3 Sim. 153. See Dos Passos, Stock Brokers 112, where many other cases are cited. The pledgee is not liable for neglect to sell the stock where it depreciates in his hands or even becomes worthless, if he has not been requested to sell or refused to transfer the stock for that purpose; 87 Pa. 394; 98 Mass. 133; nor is he liable if the pledge be stolen without negligence on his part; 56 How. Pr. 68; and a stock broker is not liable where spurious securities are purchased for a customer in the regular course of business, and if he sells such and in consequence refunds the purchase money, he can recover it from his customer; 15 M. & W. 308, 486; 8 C. B. 373. It thus appears that one purchasing stock on a margin is in all essential parts the owner of the stock, entitled to the advantages and subject to the responsibilities of that relation.

The provision of the California constitution invalidating contracts for the sale of futures is held to apply to a sale of stock on margin; 89 Cal. 373. See FUTURES.

MARGINAL NOTE. An abstract of a reported case; a summary of the facts, or brief statement of the principle decided which is prefixed to the report of the case.

The marginal notes which appear in the statute books have not the authority of the legislature, and cannot alter the interpretation of the text; L. R. 3 C. P. 522; 22 Ch. D. 573.

In Scotch Law. A note inserted on the margin of a deed embodying either some clause which was omitted in transcribing or some change in the agreement of the parties. Bell; Ersk. Prin. 274.

MARINARIUS (L. Lat.). An ancient word which signified a mariner or seaman. In England, marinarius capitaneus was the admiral or warden of the ports.

MARINE. Belonging to the sea; relating to the sea; naval.

A soldier employed, or liable to be employed, on vessels of war, under the command of an officer of marines, who acts under the direction of the commander of the ship. See MARINE CORPS.

It is also used as a general term to denote the whole naval power of a state or country.

MARINE CONTRACT. One which relates to business done or transacted upon the sea and in seaports, and over which the courts of admiralty have jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of common law. See Parsons, Marit. Law; 2 Gall. 398; MARITIME CONTRACT.

MARINE CORPS. A body of officers and soldiers under an organization separate and distinct from that of the army, and intended for service, in detached portions, on board of ships of war.

A military body primarily, belonging to the navy under the control of the secretary of the navy, but liable to be ordered to service in connection with the army. 120 U. S. 249.

MARINE COURT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK. A local court originally established for the determination of controversies between seamen, but now a court of record, possessing general jurisdiction of controversies involving not more than $2,000, and special jurisdiction of civil actions for injuries to person or character, without regard to the amount of damages claimed. Rap. & L. Law Dict.

The name of this court was changed to city court by Laws 1883, ch. 26. See NEW YORK.

MARINE INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

MARINE INTEREST. A compensation paid for the use of money loaned on bottomry or respondentia. Provided the money be loaned and put at risk, there is no fixed limit to the rate which may be lawfully charged by the lender; but courts of admiralty, in enforcing the contract, will mitigate the rate when it is extortionate and unconscionable. See BOTTOMRY; MARITIME LOAN; RESPONDENTIA.

MARINE LEAGUE. A measure equal to the twentieth part of a degree of latitude. Boucher, Inst. n. 1845. It is generally conceded that a nation has exclusive territorial jurisdiction upon the high seas for a marine league from its own shores. 1 Kent 29. See The Franconio, 2 Ex. Div. 63; TERRITORIAL WATERS; SEA.

MARINE RISK. See INSURANCE; RISKS AND PERILS.

MARINER. One whose occupation it is to navigate vessels upon the sea. Surgeons, engineers, clerks, stewards, cooks, porters, and chambermaids, on passenger-steamers, when necessary for the service of the ship or crew, are also deemed mariners, and permitted as such to sue in the admiralty courts for their wages. 1 Conkl. Adm. 107. See Gilp. 505; 80 N. Y. 71; 1 Hagg. Adm. 187.

The term includes masters, mates, sailors, surveyors, carpenters, coopers, stewards, cooks, cabin boys, kitchen boys, engineers, pilots, firemen, deck hands, and waiters—women as well as men. Bened. Adm. § 278. Those employed upon a vessel in any capacity, however humble, and whose labor contributes in any degree, however slight, to the accomplishment of the main object in which the vessel is engaged, are clothed by the law with the legal rights of mariners, "no matter what be their sex, character, station, or profession;" 77 Fed. Rep. 476 (C. C. of A.). See 7 How. 89; 3 Sumn. 115; 80 N. Y. 80; SEAMEN; LIEN; SHIPPING ARTICLES.

MARISCHAL. An officer in Scotland, who, with the lord high constable, possessed a supreme itinerant jurisdiction in all crimes committed within a certain space of the court, wherever it might happen to be. Wharton.

MARITAGIO AMISSO PER DEFALTAM. An obsolete writ for the tenant in frank marriage to recover lands, etc., of which he was deforced.

MARITAGIUM (Lat.). A portion given with a daughter in marriage. See FEUDAL LAW.

MARITAGIUM HABERE. To have the free disposal of an heiress in marriage.

MARITAL. That which belongs to marriage; as marital rights, marital duties. See HUSBAND; MARRIED WOMAN.

MARITAL PORTION. The name given to that part of a deceased husband's estate to which the widow is entitled. 3 Mart. La. N. S. 1.

MARITIMA ANGLIÆ. Profits and emoluments received by the king from the sea. They were anciently collected by sheriffs but were afterwards granted to the Lord High Admiral; Par. 8 Hen. III. m. 4.

MARITIMA INCREMENTA. Lands gained from the sea. See ALLUVION.

MARITIME. Pertaining to navigation or commercial intercourse upon the seas, great lakes, and rivers.

"The word maritime is also to have its appropriate meaning relating to the sea. The words admiralty and maritime, as they are used in the constitution and acts of congress, are by no means synonymous, although able lawyers, on the bench, as well as at the bar, seem sometimes to have so considered them. They were evidently both inserted to preclude a narrower construction which might be given to either word, had it been used alone. The English admiralty had jurisdiction of all cases arising beyond sea, although not maritime in their character. These are excluded by the use of both terms." Bened. Adm. § 40.

MARITIME CAUSE. A cause arising from a maritime contract, whether made at sea or on land.

In all cases of contract the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts depends upon the nature or subject-matter of the contract; but in cases of maritime tort and salvage their jurisdiction depends upon the place in which the cause of action accrued; 1 Conkl. Adm. 19, 32. In general, the courts of common law have a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of admiralty in those cases which are prosecuted on the instance side of the court. But the admiralty also has jurisdiction of prize cases, and that jurisdiction is exclusive, except where affected by special statutes; 6 Wall. 759. See PRIZE

COURTS. The jurisdiction of the district courts in civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is exclusive of all others; nor can a state legislature confer jurisdiction upon a state court; 4 Wall. 411; 7 id. 624.

The admiralty jurisdiction has been held not to extend to preliminary contracts, merely leading to the execution of maritime contracts; 3 Mas. 6; 3 Sumn. 144; nor to trusts, although they may relate to maritime affairs; Daveis 71; nor to enforcing a specific performance of a contract relating to maritime affairs; nor to a contract not maritime in its character, although the consideration for it may be maritime services; 4 Mas. 380; nor to questions of possession and property between owner and mortgagee; 17 How. 399; nor to contracts of affreightment from one port of the great lakes to another port in the same state; 21 How. 244. In the following cases (cited in Bened. Adm. § 214 a) actions have been sustained in admiralty: On an insurance policy; 10 Wall. 1; against an owner of cargo in general average; 12 id. 341; for weighing, inspecting, and measuring cargo; 2 Fed. Rep. 731; for coopering cargo; 13 id. 703; for compressing cargo; 26 id. 927; for the services of a watchman; 7 id. 235; a diver; 28 id. 429; an average adjuster; 7 id. 236; for the use of a dry dock; 12 id. 207; for removing ballast; 2 id. 722; for lockage in a river; 1 id. 218; for wharfage; 95 U. S. 75; for insurance premiums; 40 Fed. Rep. 603; for launching a vessel which had been driven ashore; 5 Hughes 125; for repairing a scow; 3 Fed. Rep. 207; on a contract to supply nets to a fishing vessel; 33 id. 297; for the charter of a vessel yet to be built; 44 id. 102; for services as watchman; 32 id. 300; actions to try the title to a ship; Bened. Adm. § 276; but not to enforce a merely equitable title; 135 U. S. 599.

The following cases are cited by the same author as not being within the maritime jurisdiction: For storage of sails; 2 Fed. Rep. 393 (contra, 2 Gall. 483); for services of a ship broker; 10 Fed. Rep. 848; for wharfage while laid up in the winter; 28 id. 429; for receiving and storing cargo on board a vessel during the winter; 33 id. 383; for obtaining a concession to dig guano; 15 id. 385; for lease of a "bar" on board a vessel; 2 Flipp. 427; on a contract to navigate a raft; 1 id. 543; a contract to store wheat for the winter; 33 Fed. Rep. 383; a contract by a master to carry cargo, sell it, and account for the proceeds; 37 id. 369; for services in purchasing a vessel; 39 id. 40.

As to passengers, it has been a question whether contracts for their transportation were within the jurisdiction; Gilp. 184; but the contrary view is now established; 4 Wall. 411.

Stevedores were formerly not considered as rendering marine services, but the contrary view appears now to obtain; Bened. Adm. § 285; 37 Fed. Rep. 209, 367; 51 id. 954.

As to jurisdiction over foreign ships, all persons in time of peace have the right to resort to the tribunals of the nation where they may happen to be, for the protection of their rights, unless the jurisdiction is excluded by treaty, though sometimes, as in the case of foreign seamen, they will refuse, from considerations of expediency, to exercise their jurisdiction; Bened. Adm. § 282; thus, admiralty jurisdiction does not apply to claims of bad treatment suffered by an American serving as a seaman on a Norwegian vessel; 55 Fed. Rep. 80.

As to the jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral of England, see "A Water Court," 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 142, by Sir S. Baker; another article on "The Water Court of Saltash"; 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 195.

MARITIME CODES. See CODE. Much learning in relation thereto and certain lesser maritime codes not referred to under that title will be found in Bened. Adm. ch. xi.

MARITIME CONTRACT. One which relates to the business of navigation upon the sea, or to business appertaining to commerce or navigation to be transacted or done upon the sea, or in sea-ports, and over which courts of admiralty have jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of common law.

Such contracts, according to civilians and jurists, include, among others, charter-parties, bills of lading, and other contracts of affreightment, marine hypothecations, contracts for maritime service in building, repairing, supplying, and navigating ships or vessels, contracts and quasi contracts respecting averages, contributions, and jettisons. See 2 Gall. 398, in which Judge Story gave a very elaborate opinion on the subject; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 182. See 3 Mas. 27; 2 Story 176; 2 Curt. C. C. 323; 7 How. 729.

The contract for building a vessel is not a maritime contract; 20 How. 393; 7 Am. Law Reg. 5; 22 How. 129; contra, 21 Law Rep. 281.

The fact that contracts of affreightment are personal contracts between the shipper and ship owner does not prevent them from being maritime contracts on which a libel in rem against the ship may be maintained; 61 Fed. Rep. 213; 61 id. 860. See MARITIME CAUSE.

MARITIME COURT. See ADMIRALTY.

MARITIME INTEREST. See MARINE INTEREST.

MARITIME LAW. That system of law which particularly relates to the affairs and business of the sea, to ships, their crews and navigation, and to the marine conveyance of persons and property.

Whilst the general maritime law is the basis of the maritime law of the United States, as well as of other countries, it is only so far operative in this, or any country, as it is adopted by the laws and usages thereof. It has no inherent force of its own. 21 Wall. 558.

In particular matters, especially such as approach a merely municipal character, the received maritime law may differ in different countries without affecting the integrity of the system as a harmonious whole.

The general system of maritime law which was familiar to the lawyers and statesmen of this country when the constitution was adopted, was intended, and referred to, when it was declared in that instrument that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Thus adopted, it became the maritime law of the United States, operating uniformly in the whole country.

The question as to the true limits of maritime law and admiralty jurisdiction is exclusively a judicial question, and no state law or act of congress can make it broader or narrower than the judicial power may determine those limits to be. But what the law is within those limits, assuming the general maritime law to be the basis of the system, depends on what has been received as law in the maritime usages of this country, and on such legislation as may have been competent to effect it.

The decisions of this court illustrative of these sources, and giving construction to the laws and constitution, are especially to be considered; and when these fail us, we must resort to the principles by which they have been governed.

In Bened. Adm. § 214 a it is said:—The maritime law is a law common to all nations which are engaged in maritime commerce; it consists of certain principles of equity and usages of trade which general convenience and a common sense of justice have established in all the commercial countries of the world, to regulate the dealing and intercourse of merchants and mariners, in matters relating to the sea.

"This maritime law does not in the least depend upon the court in which it is to be administered, but furnishes the proper rule of decision in cases to which it applies, no matter in what court they may be brought; and it has, in fact, been administered in different countries, in different courts, each constituted in its own manner In England, the court of admiralty and the court of chancery especially enforced it, while truth was required in pleading; but when, by the use of a fictitious venue, the facts might be laid as occurring in London, the king's bench took jurisdiction and prohibited the admiralty; and thus, in the king's bench more than in the court of admiralty, and especially under Lord Mansfield, the maritime law was built up and extended." Bened. Adm. § 42.

"The jurisdiction of the admiral, and the administration of the admiralty law proper—the local maritime law,—as it became a judicial function, has thus passed into the hands of the courts, and they now administer the admiralty law and the maritime law, both of which are sometimes called the admiralty law, sometimes the maritime law, and sometimes the admiralty and maritime law; and cases arising under them are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Bened. Adm. § 43. See 2 Gall. 398.

The law of limited liability was enacted by congress as a part of the maritime law of the United States, and, in its operation, extends wherever public navigation extends; 130 U. S. 527; the act of congress of 1886, § 4, extending the limited liability act to vessels used on a river in inland navigation, is a constitutional and valid law; 141 U. S. 1. See ABANDONMENT. See ADMIRALTY; MARITIME CAUSE, and the various titles in regard to which information is sought.

MARITIME LIEN. See LIEN.

MARITIME LOAN. A contract or agreement by which one, who is the lender, lends to another, who is the borrower, a certain sum of money, upon condition that if the thing upon which the loan has been made should be lost by any peril of the sea, or vis major, the lender shall not be repaid unless what remains shall be equal to the sum borrowed; and if the thing arrive in safety, or in case it shall not have been injured but by its own defects or the fault of the master or mariners, the borrower shall be bound to return the sum borrowed, together with a certain sum agreed upon as the price of the hazard incurred. Emerigon, Mar. Loans, c. 1, s. 2. See BOTTOMRY; MARINE INTEREST; RESPONDENTIA.

MARITIME PROFIT. A term used by French writers to signify any profit derived from a maritime loan.

MARITIME SERVICE. A service rendered upon water in connection with some vessel, the preservation of her cargo or crew. 16 Fed. Rep. 924.

MARITIME TORT. A tort which by reason of the place where it is committed is within the jurisdiction of admiralty.

A tort committed upon water and which comes within the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty. 17 Fed. Rep. 387.

Admiralty courts have always had jurisdiction of torts committed upon the high seas, and there is also no question as to injuries upon waters of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows, but in the United States, where that is not the test, the jurisdiction would extend to any waters which for other purposes are held to be within the general admiralty jurisdiction. Civil jurisdiction of torts has been said to depend solely upon the place where the cause of action arises; 66 U. S. 574; but a doubt is suggested whether it does not also "depend upon the relation of the parties to a ship or vessel, embracing only those tortious violations of maritime right and duty which occur in vessels, to which the admiralty jurisdiction in cases of contract applies." Bened. Adm. § 308 and cases cited. This maritime jurisdiction of civil injuries has been held to extend to all cases of personal injuries committed by the master or his officers against passengers or seamen; id. § 309. The jurisdiction has been held not to survive the death of the person injured even if aided by a state statute enabling an administrator to sue for such injuries in ordinary cases; Sprague 184. It was held by the supreme court that no action would lie for the death of a person killed by a marine tort; 119 U. S. 199, where the decisions are collected. In that case the question whether an action in rem would lie was left undetermined. A personal action in such case has been maintained against the owner at common law; 77 N. Y. 546; and also in admiralty; 55 Fed. Rep. 98. Every violent dispossession of property at sea is prima facie a maritime tort; 1 Wheat. 238. An injury to a vessel from negligence in operating a drawbridge is a maritime tort, and a suit in admiralty will lie against the town therefor; 60 Fed. Rep. 560; 45 id. 260; 27 id. 230; 38 id. 202. In actions for torts arising from negligence courts of admiralty do not confine themselves within the limits of mere municipal law, but deal with the question of damage upon enlarged principles of equity and justice, to the extent of dividing the damages in cases of mutual fault; 60 Fed. Rep. 560, 578; 137 U. S. 1. See MARITIME CAUSE.

MARITUS. A husband; a married man.

MARK. A sign, traced on paper or parchment, which stands in the place of a signature; usually made by persons who cannot write. The use of the mark in ancient times was not confined to illiterate persons; among the Saxons the mark of the cross, as an attestation of the good faith of the person signing, was required to be attached to the signature of those who could write, as well as to stand in the place of the signature of those who could not write. It was the symbol of an oath. It is most often the sign of the cross, made in a little space left between the Christian name and surname; 2 Bla. Com. 305; 12 Pet. 150; 2 Ves. Sen. 455; 1 V. & B. 362. The word his is usually written above the mark, and the word mark below it; Schoul. Wills 303, 305. But it is not essential that these words shall be attached to the mark made or adopted by a person unable to write, in the execution of a deed, as it is sufficient if it appears that he in fact made the mark or adopted it; 98 N. C. 13. A mark is a signature; 12 Pet. 151; 47 N. H. 205; 93 N. C. 624; 132 Mass. 105. And it may be proved as handwriting: by one who has seen the person make his mark; 17 Ala. 706; 3 Humph. 47; 5 Johns. 144; contra, 17 Pa. 159. A mark is now held to be a good signature though the party was able to write; 8 Ad. & E. 94; 3 Curt. 752; 5 Johns. 144; 2 Bradf. Surr. 385; 24 Pa. 502; 19 Mo. 609; 18 Ga. 396; 16 B. Monr. 102; 1 Jarm. Wills 69, 112; 1 Will. Exec. 63. The signature of a subscribing witness to a deed may be made by a cross mark; 102 N. C. 284.

It is not necessary in the execution of a note, that the person executing, if unable to write, touch the pen while the person authorized signs his name; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 925. See SIGNATURE.

The sign, writing, or ticket put upon manufactured goods to distinguish them from others; 3 B. & C. 541; 2 V. & B. 218; also to indicate the price; and if one use the mark of another to do him damage, an action on the case will lie, or an injunction may be had from chancery; 2 Cro. 47. This mark may consist of the name of the manufacturer, printed, branded, or stamped in a mode peculiar to itself, or a seal, a letter, a cipher, a monogram, or any sign or symbol, to so distinguish it as his product; 31 Fed. Rep. 280. See TRADE-MARKS; UNION LABEL LAWS.

By the act of July 8, 1870, patentees are required to mark patented articles with the word patented and the day and year when the patent was granted, and in any suit for infringement by the party failing so to mark, no damages can be recovered by the plaintiff, except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement, and continued, after such notice, to make, use, or vend the article patented.

Marks and brands are admissible in evidence to prove ownership of animals, whether recorded or not, unless prohibited by statute; 26 Tex. App. 466.

MARK (spelled, also, Marc). A weight used in several parts of Europe, and for several commodities, especially gold and silver. When gold and silver are sold by the mark, it is divided into twenty-four carats. A money of accounts in England, and in some other countries a coin. The English mark is two-thirds of a pound sterling, or 13*s.* 4*d.*; and the Scotch mark is of equal value in Scotch money of account. Encyc. Amer.

MARKET. A public place and appointed time for buying and selling. A public place, appointed by public authority, where all sorts of things necessary for the subsistence or for the convenience of life are sold. All fairs are markets, but not vice versa; Bract. l. 2, c. 21; Co. Litt. 22; Co. 2d Inst. 401; Co. 4th Inst. 272. Markets are generally regulated by local laws. A city may establish public markets and confine the sale of commodities therein, where the regulations are reasonable and in consideration of public health; 84 Ala. 17; 17 Wend. 265; 44 La. Ann. 809; 11 Ia. 407; 6 H. & S. 269. See 33 Ga. 229; and ordinances are valid, prohibiting sales in markets by non-producers without license; 11 Pick. 168; 9 Metc. 253; requiring a small fee for stalls; 10 Ohio 257; prohibiting produce wagons from standing within the limits of a market; 109 Mass. 355; or the keeping a private market within six squares of a public market (where the ordinance was authorized by statute); 41 La. Ann. 887; 139 U. S. 621; and prohibiting the sale of specified provisions except at a public market; 30 Ala. 540; 76 Tex. 559; 44 Mo. 549; 10 Wend. 100; 8 Johns. 418; 106 N. C. 664; 11 Mich. 347; 53 Ga. 613. See 24 L. R. A. 584, n.

The franchise by which a town holds a market, which can only be by royal grant or immemorial usage.

By the term market is also understood the demand there is for any particular article: as, the cotton market in Europe is dull. See 15 Viner, Abr. 41; Comyns, Dig. Market; MARKET STALLS.

MARKET OVERT. An open or public market; that is, a place appointed by law or custom for the sale of goods and chattels at stated times in public. "An open, public, and legally constituted market." Jervis, C. J., 9 J. Scott 601; 18 C. B. 599. As to what is a legally constituted market overt, see 5 C. B. N. S. 299. In 5 B. & S. 313, the doctrine of market overt was much discussed by Cockburn, C. J., and the opinion expressed that a sale could not be considered as made in market overt, "unless the goods were exposed in the market for sale, and the whole transaction begun, continued, and completed in the open market; so as to give the fullest opportunity to the man whose goods have been taken to make pursuit of them, and prevent their being sold."

The market-place is the only market overt out of London, but in London every shop is a market overt; 5 Co. 83; F. Moore 300. Where a sale took place in a showroom above a store, access to which was only obtainable by special permission, it was not a sale in market overt; [1892] 1 Q. B. 25. In London, every day except Sunday is market-day. In the country, particular days are fixed for market-days by charter or prescription; 2 Bla. Com. 449.

All contracts for any thing vendible, made in market overt, shall be binding; and sales pass the property, though stolen, if it be an open and proper place for the kind of goods, there be an actual sale for valuable consideration, no notice of wrongful possession, no collusion, parties able to contract, a contract originally and wholly in the market overt, toll be paid, if requisite, by statute, and the contract be made between sun and sun; 5 Co. 83 b. But sale in market overt does not bind the king, though it does infants, etc.; Co. 2d Inst. 713; 3 Bla. Com. 449; Comyns, Dig. Market (E); Bacon, Abr. Fairs and Markets (E); 5 B. & Ald. 624. A sale by sample is not a sale in market overt; 5 B. & S. 313; but a sale to a shop-keeper in London is; 11 Ad. & E. 326; but see 5 B. & S. 313. Under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, upon the conviction of a thief, at the prosecution of a person from whom he has stolen goods, summary restitution of the stolen goods is provided for. The English Sale of Goods Act, 1893, provides that a bona fide buyer in market overt acquires a good title, but horses are excepted from the act.

There is no law recognizing the effect of a sale in market overt in the United States; 5 S. & R. 130; 1 Johns. 480; 52 N. H. 158; 59 Me. 111; 8 Mass. 521; 5 Ohio 203; 1 Tyl. 341; 10 Pet. 161; 2 Kent 324; 2 Tud. Lead. Cas. 734, where the subject is fully treated.

MARKET PRICE. When referring to the value of an article at the place of exportation, it means the price at which such articles are sold and purchased, clear of every charge, but such as is laid upon it at the time of sale. 2 Wash. C. C. 499.

MARKET STALLS. The right acquired by a purchaser of a market stall is in the nature of an easement in, not a title to, a freehold in the land, and such right or easement is limited in duration to the existence of the market, and is to be understood as acquired subject to such changes and modifications in the market during its existence, as the public needs may require. The purchase confers an exclusive right to occupy the particular stalls, with their appendages, for the purposes of the market, and none other, and subject to the regulation of the market. So held in a case in 2 Md. Law Rec. 81, a case of a public market in Baltimore. In 33 Pa. 202, the court refused to enjoin the city of Philadelphia from demolishing the old market house with a view to building a new one on other property. See, also, 18 Ohio 563; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 9.

MARKET VALUE. A price established by public sales, or sales in the way of ordinary business, as of merchandise. 99 Mass. 348; 69 N. Y. 448.

The market value is to be determined by the general market value of goods without regard to special advantages which the importer may enjoy; and in ascertaining that value, it is proper in some instances to consider the cost of production, including such items of expense as designs, salary of buyer, clerk hire, rent, interest, and percentage on the aggregate cost of the business in tariff law cases; 155 U. S. 240.

MARKETABLE TITLE. A title which a reasonable purchaser, well informed as to the facts and their legal bearings, willing and anxious to perform his contract, would, in the exercise of that prudence which business men ordinarily bring to bear in such transactions, be willing and ought to accept; and which one is entitled to have. 128 N. Y. 636. A title by adverse possession for forty years is a marketable title: 138 Ind. 103. In equity a marketable title is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as law or fact; 158 Pa. 424. See TITLE.

MARLBRIDGE, STATUTE OF. An important English statute, 52 Hen. III. (1267), relating to wrongful distress. It derived its name from the town in Wiltshire in which parliament sat when it was enacted, now known as Marlborough. See 6 Chitty, Eng. Stat.; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 62; Crabb, Com. Law 156; 1 Soc. Eng. 410.

MARQUE AND REPRISAL. See LETTERS OF MARQUE.

MARQUIS. A title of nobility. In England the rank of a marquis is below that of a duke and above an earl. It is also a title of dignity in France, Italy, and Germany.

MARRIAGE. A contract made in due form of law, by which a man and woman reciprocally engage to live with each other during their joint lives, and to discharge towards each other the duties imposed by law on the relation of husband and wife. For the laws of the Hebrews and Romans and the canon or ecclesiastical law of the Middle Ages on the subject of marriage, see Fulton's Laws of Marriage.

Marriage, in our law, as distinguished from the agreement to marry and from the act of becoming married, is the civil status of one man and one woman united in law for life, for the discharge to each other and the community of the duties legally incumbent on those whose association is founded on the distinction of sex. 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 8.

It does not mean a mere temporary agreement to dwell together for a time for the gratification of sexual desires, but it is essential that the contract be entered into with a view to its continuance through life and then be followed by celebration and cohabitation, with the apparent object of continuing such cohabitation through life; 50 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 155.

The better opinion appears to be that marriage is something more than a mere civil contract. It has been variously said by different writers to be a status, or a relation, or an institution. This view is supported by the following: Story, Confl. Laws § 108 n.; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 12; 4 R. I. 87; 9 Ind. 37; 3 P. D. 1; s. c. 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 80; 4 P. D. 1; 5 id. 94; 5 Law Mag. & Rev. 4 ser. 26. But see contra, 22 S. E. Rep. 178. In New York it has been held to be merely a civil contract; 7 Abb. N. C. 98. Marriage is not a contract within the federal constitutional provision as to impairment of contracts; 125 U. S. 190.

All persons are able to contract marriage unless they are under the legal age, or unless there be other disability. The age of consent at common law is fourteen in males and twelve in females; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 236; 2 Kent 78; 1 N. Chipm. 254; 10 Humphr. 61; 1 Gray 119; 55 Ala. 111. This is still the rule in the older states; but in Ohio, Indiana, and other western states, the age of consent is raised to eighteen for males, and fourteen for females; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 24. When a person under the age marries, such person can, when either he or she arrives at lawful age, avoid the marriage, or such person or both may, if the other is of legal age, confirm it. It has been held that the one who is of legal age may also disaffirm the marriage; Co. Litt. 79; East, P. C. 468; but see 15 Mich. 193. The disaffirmance may be either with or without a judicial sentence; 1 Bish. Marr. & D. § 150. If either of the parties is under seven, the marriage is void; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 436; 5 Ired. Eq. 487. As to the age for contracting marriage in different countries, see 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. App.

If either party is non compos mentis, or insane, the marriage is void. See INSANITY.

If either party has a husband or wife living the marriage is void; 4 Johns. 53; 22 Ala. N. S. 86; 1 Salk. 120; 1 Bla. Com. 438; 45 La. Ann. 419; although the woman may have thought her first husband was dead; 124 Pa. 646. See 40 La. Ann. 10; 156 Mass. 578; INTENTION.

A man may contract marriage before entry of a decree declaring his former marriage to have been void; 36 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 11. See NULLITY OF MARRIAGE.

Consanguinity and affinity within the rules prescribed by law in this country render a marriage void. In England they rendered the marriage liable to be annulled by the ecclesiastical courts; 10 Metc. 451; 2 Bla. Com. 434. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

If either party acts under compulsion, or is under duress, the marriage is voidable; 2 Hagg. Cons. 104, 246; 75 Hun 56; 12 P. & D. 21; [1891] P. 369. Where one of the parties answers "no" to every question of the magistrate which should have been answered "yes," and thereafter refused to cohabit with the man, the marriage is not valid; 73 Mich. 133.

The parties must each be willing to marry the other. Where a woman silently withholds her consent to a formal marriage, but subsequently treats it as a good marriage, she is estopped from saying it was not real and binding on her; 69 Hun 146. Where one of the parties is mistaken in the person of the other, the requisite of consent is wanting. But a mistake in the qualities or character of the other party will not avoid the marriage; Poynt. Marr. & D. c. 9. If a man marries the woman he intends to marry, the marriage is valid, though she passes under an assumed name; 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 204; 3 Curt. Ec. 185; see Burke's Trials 63.

If the apparent willingness is produced by fraud, the marriage will be valid till set aside by a court of chancery or by a decree of divorce; 5 Paige, Ch. 43. See 94 Mich. 559; 6 Misc. Rep. 355. A ceremony of marriage without license and performed by an unauthorized person, and imposed on a woman by false pretences, but believed by her to be lawful and bona fide, is valid for all civil purposes, unless and until avoided by the deceived person; 94 Ala. 501. Fraud is sometimes said to render a marriage void; but this is incorrect, as it is competent for the party injured to waive the tort and affirm the marriage. Impotency in one of the parties is sometimes laid down as rendering the marriage void, as being a species of fraud on the other party: but it is only a ground for annulling the contract by a court, or for a divorce. Schoul. Husb. & W. § 22.

A prohibition, imposed by the laws of a state against a subsequent marriage by a husband against whom a decree of divorce has been rendered, can have no extra-territorial effect; and therefore such person may contract a subsequent marriage in another state where the law imposes no such prohibition; 83 Ala. 528; but at his death the second wife is not entitled to letters of administration on his estate, in the state which imposed the prohibition against his re-marriage; 39 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 16.

Dr. Wharton (Confl. Laws) gives three distinct theories as to the law which is to determine the question of matrimonial capacity.

It is determined by the law of the place of solemnization of the marriage. This view is supported by Judge Story (Confl. Laws §§ 110, 112), and Mr. Bishop (Mar. & D. § 390); 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 219; 76 Ga. 177; but it is objected to this theory that it is subject to exceptions which destroy its applicability to the majority of litigated cases. Thus marriages which by our law are incestuous, are not validated by being performed in another land, where they would be lawful, and so the converse is true, that the marriage, in England, of an American with his deceased wife's sister, would be recognized as valid in such of our states as hold such a marriage to be legal, nor is it believed that an American court will ever hold a marriage of American citizens, solemnized abroad, to be illegal, simply because the consent of parents was withheld or because one of the parties, though of age at home, was a minor at the place of celebration. Further, to make the lex loci celebrationis supreme enables parties to acquire for themselves any kind of marital capacity they want, by having the marriage solemnized in a state where this kind of marital capacity is sanctioned by law. See 87 Tenn. 244; 59 Fed. Rep. 682.

A second theory of matrimonial capacity is that it is determined by the lex domicilii; Wheat. Int. Law (Lawr.) 172; 4 Phill. Int. Law 284; 2 Cl. & F. 488; 9 H. L. C. 193. There are two serious objections to this theory. First it would make the validity of the marriages in the United States of natives of other countries depend upon the question whether such persons had acquired a domicil in the United States; for if they had not, they would be governed by the laws of their foreign domicil. Few aliens, who marry in this country, could be sure they were legally married. Second, it would be necessary upon this theory to sustain the polygamous marriages of Chinese; see, as sustaining this theory, L. R. 2 P. & M. 440; 4 P. D. 13; 3 P. D. 1; 29 L. J. P. & M. 97; Westl. 56; but see 125 Mass. 374. According to Savigny, all questions of capacity are to be determined by the husband's domicil, which, as the true seat of the marriage, absorbs that of the wife. It has been conceded that the law of domicil does not extend to the direction of the ceremonial part of the marriage rite, and that the lex domicilii is the law of the country in which the parties are domiciled at the time of the marriage, and in which their matrimonial residence is contemplated; Lord Campbell in 9 H. L. C. 193.

The third theory is that matrimonial capacity is a distinctive national policy, as to which judges are obliged to enforce the rules of the state of which they are the officers. So far as concerns the United States, our national policy in this respect is to sustain the matrimonial capacity in all classes of persons arrived at puberty, and free from the impediments of prior ties. This view is approved by Dr. Wharton, Confl. Laws §§ 160–165. See 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 76, 219; 31 Am. L. Rev. 524.

At common law, no particular form of words or ceremony was necessary. Mutual assent to the relation of husband and wife was sufficient. Any words importing a present assent to being married to each other were sufficient evidence of the contract. If the words imported an assent to a future marriage, if followed by consummation, this established a valid marriage by the canon law, but not by the common law; 10 Cl. & F. 534; 15 N. Y. 345; 2 Rop. Husb. & W. 445; 1 How. 219; 2 N. H. 268. But a betrothal followed by copulation does not make the common-law marriage per verba de futuro cum copula when the parties looked forward to a formal ceremony, and did not agree to become husband and wife without it; 12 R. I. 485. An agreement made per verba de præsenti between a man and a woman to become husband and wife, followed by consummation thereof, either secret or public, is a valid marriage and is not invalidated by an agreement of one of the parties not to make the marriage known until a specified time, unless with the consent of the other; 75 Cal. 1; 17 Wash. L. Rep. 328. The question has been raised of the validity of a marriage at sea, and it has been held in California that outside of the three-mile limit there is no law governing marriage, and that if persons go to sea to escape the conditions attached to the ceremony within a state the state cannot be expected to recognize the ceremony as valid; 55 Alb. L. J. 208. But a formal marriage on a British man-of-war on the high seas has been held valid in England; [1896] P. 116.

At common law the consent might be given in the presence of a magistrate or of any other person as a witness, or it might be found by a court or jury from the subsequent acknowledgment of the parties, or from the proof of cohabitation, or of general reputation resulting from the conduct of the parties. In the original United States the common-law rule prevails, except where it has been changed by legislation; 6 Binn. 405; 4 Johns. 52. See 10 N. H. 383; 4 Burr. 2058; 1 How. 219, 234; 1 Gray 119; 2 Me. 102.

In civil cases a marriage can generally be proved by showing that the parties have held themselves out as husband and wife, and by general reputation founded on their conduct. This is sufficient, too, for purposes of administration; 2 Redf. 456. There is an exception, however, in the case of such civil suits as are founded on the marriage relation, such as actions for the seduction of the wife, where general reputation and cohabitation will not be sufficient; 4 N. Y. 230; 183 Pa. 210; 3 Bradf. Surr. 369, 373; 6 Conn. 446; 29 Me. 323; 14 N. H. 450.

Marriage may be proved by the witnesses to its solemnization, by presumption, from a record, or from cohabitation and repute, and by declaration, or admissions of the parties to it, when against their interest or a part of the res gestæ, or by conduct from which such admission may be implied; 49 N. J. Eq. 520; see 65 Vt. 482; or by circumstantial evidence; 76 Hun 200. Eyewitnesses and records are not essential; 103 U. S. 311.

Documentary evidence is not the best proof of marriage; a witness who swears to having seen a marriage ceremony performed, intended to be in good faith, by a person acting as a clergyman or magistrate, testifies to a valid marriage, unless it is clearly illegal by statute; 72 Mich. 184.

In most of the states, the degrees of relationship within which marriages may not be contracted are prescribed by statute. This limit in cases of consanguinity is generally, though not always, that of first cousins. In some of the states, a violation of the rule renders, by statute, the marriage absolutely void. In others, no provision of this kind is made. Various statutes have been passed to guard against abuse of the marriage ceremony. Such of them as require license, or the publication of bans, or the consent of parents or guardians, are regarded as directory, and, unless explicitly declaring the marriage to be void, if not complied with, do not render it void. See 4 Ia. 449; 26 Mo. 260; 2 Watts 9; 1 How. 219; 2 Halst. 138; 2 N. H. 268; 103 Mo. 183; 43 Ala. 57; 30 Ga. 173; 25 N. Y. 390. But see 2 Yerg. 589; 9 H. L. C. 274; 155 Mass. 425; 29 W. Va. 732; 30 Pac. Rep. 65. See Nelson, Divorce.

In England Lord Hardwicke's Act, 1753, nullified all marriages (except those of Quakers and Jews) celebrated otherwise than in a church and according to the rites of the church of England, and this continued to be the law up to the passing of the Marriage Act, 1836, by which provisions were made for civil marriages at a register office, and for legalizing all marriages in duly registered dissenting places of worship, if celebrated in the presence of a civil official called a registrar of marriages. Foreign marriages are regulated in England by the act of 1892. See LEX LOCI, as to foreign marriages.

As to rights of married women, see HUSBAND; MARRIED WOMAN.

MARRIAGE ARTICLES. Articles of agreement between parties contemplating marriage, in accordance with which the marriage settlement is afterwards to be drawn up; they are to be binding in case of marriage. They must be in writing, by the Statute of Frauds; Burt. R. P. 484; Crabb, R. P. § 1809; 4 Cruise, Dig. 274, 328.

MARRIAGE BROKAGE. The act by which a person interferes, for a consideration to be received by him, between a man and a woman, for the purpose of promoting a marriage between them. The money paid for such service is also known by this name.

Such contracts are illegal at common law; Show. P. C. 76; 3 P. Wms. 76; 3 Lev. 411; and in equity they are utterly void, as against public policy; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 4, 10, note s; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 263; 1 Ves. 503.

It is said that such contracts were good at the civil law and that "matchmakers (proxenetæ) were allowed to receive a reward for their services." Bisph. Eq. § 224, note.

MARRIAGE LICENSE. See MARRIAGE.

MARRIAGE PORTION. That property which is given to a woman on her marriage. See DOWER.

MARRIAGE, PROMISE OF. See PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT. An agreement made by the parties in contemplation of marriage, by which the title to certain property is changed, and the property to some extent becomes inalienable. 1 Rice, Eq. 315. See 2 Hill, Ch. 3; 8 Leigh 29; 1 D. & B. Eq. 389; Baldw. 344; 15 Mass. 106; 139 id. 144; 7 Pet. 348; 37 Ill. App. 145; 93 Mich. 274; 112 Mo. 442. See 2 Washb. R. P. Appx.; Atherly, Marr. Settl.

Such settlements are valid, the marriage being at law a valuable consideration; 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 213; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 560; and payments made in pursuance thereof cannot be set aside by creditors; 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 213. The property covered passes, on the death of the wife, to her devisees under the settlement; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 560; and is free from any claim by the husband to curtesy; 20 Misc. Rep. 481. It is sufficient to change the course of inheritance and authorize each party to dispose of his or her own property by deed or devise without consent of the other; 5 Kan. App. 341. See 42 Ia. 600. It is not affected by a subsequent statute respecting married women; 109 Ala. 689.

In Quebec a gift of future property between future consorts by marriage contract is illegal and void; Rap. Jud. Quebec 11 C. S. 404. See ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACT.

MARRIED WOMAN. A woman who has a husband.

The relation confers upon her certain rights, imposes on her certain obligations, and deprives her of certain powers and privileges.

At Common Law. A wife has a right to share the bed and board of her husband. She can call upon him to provide her with necessary food and clothing according to her position in life, and if he neglects or refuses to do it she can procure them on his account. See NECESSARIES. She is entitled, on his death, to dower in all the real estate of which he is seised at any time during coverture. See DOWER.

She is bound to follow him wherever in the country he may choose to go and establish himself, provided it is not, for other causes, unreasonable. She is under obligation to be faithful in chastity to her marriage vow; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 50. See DIVORCE; ADULTERY.

A married woman can acquire rights of a political character: these rights stand on the general principles of the law of nations; 2 Hard. Ky. 5; 3 Pet. 242. See WOMAN.

When she commits a crime in the presence of her husband, unless it is of a very aggravated character, she is presumed to act by his coercion, and, unless the contrary is proved, she is irresponsible. Under other circumstances she is liable, criminally, as if she were a feme sole. See COERCION; DURESS; HUSBAND; WILL.

Her property rights were put by the marriage very much under the control of the husband. He could manage his own affairs in his own way, buy and sell all kinds of personal property, without her control, and he might buy any real estate he might deem proper; but, as the wife acquired a right in the latter, he could not sell it, discharged of her dower, except by her consent, expressed in the manner prescribed by the laws of the state where such lands lay. Her personal property in possession was vested in him, and he could dispose of it as if he had acquired it; this arose from the principle that they were considered one person in law; 2 Bla. Com. 433; 83 Ala. 202; and he was entitled to all her property in action, provided he reduced it to possession during her life; 2 Bla. Com. 434. If the wife died before the claims were collected, the husband received them as her administrator, in which case, after payment of her debts, the surplus belonged to him absolutely. He was also entitled to her chattels real, but these vested in him not absolutely, but sub modo: as, in the case of a lease for years, the husband was entitled to receive the rents and profits of it, and could, if he pleased, sell, surrender, or dispose of it during the coverture, and it was liable to be taken in execution for his debts; and, if he survived her, it was to all intents and purposes his own. In case his wife survived him, it was considered as if it had never been transferred from her, and it belonged to her alone. In his wife's freehold estate he had a life estate during the joint lives of himself and wife; and when he had a child by her who could inherit, he had an estate by the curtesy. See CURTESY.

At common law a married woman could not bind herself by contract, express or implied, by parol or under seal, even for necessaries, nor, though living apart from her husband, could she make a binding contract except for necessaries or for the benefit of her separate estate; 9 Col. 291; and a contract made by her being invalid would be no consideration for a subsequent promise during widowhood; 49 N. J. L. 53. Her husband might be bound by her acts as his agent, duly authorized; 2 Freem. 178; 4 Man. & G. 253; but where payment to her was pleaded, her authority must be stated; 2 id. 173. By her own act her authority could not be enlarged; 101 U. S. 240; and she could not execute a conveyance, even in release of dower, otherwise than by joining with her husband in a deed to a third person; 4 Paige 448. No promise of a wife could at common law be enforced against her unless she had a separate estate, and then not by a personal decree but only by treating it as an appointment out of such estate; 49 N. J. L. 53; and then only for her or its benefit; 48 Ark. 220; and no implied promise could be raised against her; 58 Vt. 337. The common-law disabilities of a married woman could not be avoided by any false representations with respect to her capacity, and no estoppel would be raised thereby; 39 Pa. 299; 53 N. Y. 96; 2 Gray 161; but in the management of her separate property she would be answerable for the frauds of her agent, within the scope of his agency, though she were ignorant of it; 47 N. Y. 577. The disabilities of a married woman are her personal privilege, and must be pleaded; 7 Gray 338; 99 Mass. 199. See COVERTURE. And no one but the husband can object to a suit against him by the wife, so that a judgment against a firm of which he is a member is good if he do not himself raise the defence; 126 Pa. 470. Her common-law disability is not removed by the so-called married woman's acts which operate only to give her such capacity as is expressed in them; 22 Mo. App. 554; 4 Sawy. 604; 99 U. S. 325; 41 Miss. 125; 25 W. N. C. (Pa.) 218; 1 Biss. 64; and where such statutes authorize her to contract as though single, she is bound by estoppel arising from her misrepresentation or concealment; 77 N. C. 437; 46 Wis. 677; or by the acts of her husband; 86 Ill. 74; 53 Miss. 344. Where such estoppel operates, it is only in respect to her personal estate; 30 Ark. 393; but the weight of authority is against sustaining estoppel against her; 2 L. R. A. 345. n., where are collected cases of common-law disabilities of a married woman and estoppel against her. The rigor of the common-law disabilities of a married woman and the merger of her individual and property rights in her husband gave rise to certain equitable remedies against her husband, intended to secure at least a portion of her property to the use of herself and her children. As to the character and extent of these rights, see WIFE'S EQUITY.

As a general rule, a contract made between parties who subsequently intermarry is, both at law and in equity, extinguished by the marriage; 1 Bla. Com. 442; but when articles are entered into or a settlement is executed whereby the wife is to have a certain provision in lieu of her fortune, the husband becomes virtually a purchaser of her fortune, and she becomes entitled to her provision, though there may be no intervention of trustees, and equity will enforce the contract; 2 Ves. Sen. 675; Husbands, on Married Women 125; MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

At common law a married woman was personally liable jointly with her husband for her torts unless committed under the coercion of her husband; 115 Pa. 534; 58 Vt. 337. The death of the wife terminated the liability of the husband, but if the husband died the wife might be sued alone; 115 Pa. 534.

It has been remarked by the recent historians of early English law that "the main idea which governs the law of husband and wife is not that of a 'unity of person,' but that of the guardianship, the mund, the profitable guardianship, which the husband has over the wife and over her property;" 1 Poll. & M. 468.

In Equity. The difficulties arising from the common-law doctrine of a married woman's incapacity, and her practical non-existence as a legal person, resulted in a qualified recognition by courts of equity of the individuality and existence of a married woman as such. This, however, was only granted in cases where she had what was termed a separate estate. This gave rise to two great doctrines of the law, the separate use and restraint on anticipation.

The latter was an invention of the court of equity and an exception to the general law of inalienability of property. It was justified as the most satisfactory method of giving property to a married woman so that it should not be practically given to her husband, to prevent which the "condition was allowed to be imposed restraining her from anticipating her income and thus fettering the free alienation of her property;" Jessel, M. R., in 11 Ch. D. 644. By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the court was authorized, where it appeared to be for the benefit of a married woman, by judgment or order with her consent, to bind her interest in any property, notwithstanding that she was restrained from anticipation; 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, §§ 39, 40. This was held to be not "a general power of removing the restraint upon anticipation, but only a power to make binding a particular disposition of property by a married woman if it be for her benefit;" 52 L. J. Ch. 928. See as to this doctrine, Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 104. The separate use was also originally a creation of the court of chancery, but in recent years it has been adopted in statutes with the effect of abolishing the common-law marital rights of the husband, to the same extent that they were avoided by a trust, in equity, to her sole and separate use.

The separate property of a feme covert as to which equity considers her as a feme sole, is that property alone which is settled to her sole and separate use by some will, writing, or deed of settlement with a power expressly or impliedly given her of managing it without the concurrence of her husband; 5 Day 174. This estate may be created by any form of settlement, written or oral (as to personalty), by deed or will, to her directly or in trust for her; or, it may be by antenuptial agreement (q. v.). It may be settled by the husband; 68 Ala. 405; herself; L. R. 16 Eq. 29; or a stranger; 2 S. C. N. S. 122, 129, 133. The one essential ingredient required for its creation is a sufficient indication of an intention to bar or exclude the marital rights; 2 Bush 112; 49 Conn. 52; 24 Gratt. 250; of the husband contemplated by the settlement; 4 Myl. & C. 877; 1 Beav. 1. See Stew. H. & W. §§ 198, 199. No particular form of words is required, but any which sufficiently indicate this intention will be sufficient. For a great variety of phrases which have been judicially passed upon as sufficient or insufficient, see Stew. H. & W. § 200. Where a wife purchases land in her own name and with her own money it will be presumed to be her separate property; 11 Wash. 390.

To an ordinary equitable estate of a married woman the marital rights of the husband attach; 35 Ark. 84, 88; but the effort to mitigate the severity of the common-law doctrine gave rise to the equitable creations of the wife's equity (q. v.) and the equitable separate estate; 1 Bro. C. C. 16; 27 Gratt. 491, 507; 1 L. Cas. Eq. 481; Stew. H. & W. § 197; 2 Perry, Trusts § 625.

In England a married woman's capacity to dispose of property of whatever kind settled to her separate use, by deed or will, is absolute, unless she be expressly restrained by the settlement; and, generally speaking, it is bound by her contracts, written or verbal; 3 Bro. C. C. 347; 1 id. 20. See, also, 13 Ves. 190; 14 id. 542. But it was contended by Chancellor Kent that this was not always so held, and that the English cases were too contradictory to afford a safe guide, and he held (practically the converse of the English rule) that she could exercise only such power, to be exercised in such manner as was prescribed by the instrument creating the estate; 3 Johns. Ch. 77. But this decision was reversed; 17 Johns. 548, in which the English doctrine substantially was adopted.

The course of subsequent New York decisions is neither clear nor consistent, but may, probably, on the whole, be considered as following the last cited case with a qualification that the married woman is not to be charged unless her intention to charge her separate estate is sufficiently indicated in the contract or implied from some benefit to be derived by her separate estate from the consideration. See 18 N. Y. 265; 22 id. 451; 58 id. 80; 63 id. 639; 64 id. 217; 68 id. 329.

Most of the states adopt, in the main, the English doctrine of power to charge the separate estate, but many jurisdictions follow what is known as the American doctrine—that a married woman, as to her separate estate, is feme sole in so far as the instrument has expressly conferred on her the power to act as such, and that she is confined to the particular mode of disposition prescribed in the instrument, if any, and the estate is not liable for her contracts, bonds, and notes, unless the instrument expressly declares that it shall be charged. It was first established in South Carolina and adhered to, as above stated, by Chancellor Kent. See 1 Rawle 231; 65 Pa. 430; 2 R. I. 355; 1 Swan. 489; 8 Humph. 209; 7 Ired. Eq. 311; 74 N. C. 442; id. 458; 26 Miss. 275; id. 585. See Kelly, Cont. M. W. 259, n. 5, and a critical annotation by the same author; 23 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 321; Stew. H. & W. § 208.

An instrument creating such an estate is excepted from the rule which makes void clauses in restraint of alienation, provided only that the rule against perpetuities is not violated; id. § 204.

Under Statutes. Superimposed upon this complex combination of common-law disability and equitable protection for separate estate, there is now, both in England and in the United States, a mass of statute law, as to most of which a classification to be relied on is impossible, and of which it has been truly said that, "To attempt a useful summary of laws so incongruous, so purely local, and so constantly changing, is useless." Schoul. H. & W. 254. For questions arising under the statutes of any state they should be resorted to directly, it being only possible here (and nothing more is intended) to give an impression of the general course of legislation which has so changed the status and rights of married women.

The course of legislation in the United States has been such as almost entirely to remove the common-law disabilities of a married woman, and to secure to her the management and control of her own property with power to contract concerning it, and also largely to increase both her individual rights and liabilities. It has been said that the protection and the disability of marriage have been linked together, and the wife when deprived of the one has been released from the other; 66 Tex. 494; but this broad statement does not seem to express the rule of construction generally adopted; see supra. The first tendency of the married woman's acts was to emancipate her property both from control and from any liability for obligations naturally springing from the marriage relation. In this country, however, there has been lately a strong current in the direction of creating and enforcing liability for such debts against both husband and wife.

In all the states and territories and the District of Columbia the real property of a married woman remains her separate property, generally free from the control or interference of her husband or liability for his debts; and in most of the states her personal property is equally so. In Connecticut, however, her personal property acquired either before or after marriage, and the proceeds, if sold, vest in the husband in trust to receive the income or so much as may be necessary to be expended for the support of the wife and children, and on the death of the husband to pass to the wife or subject to her will. In Maine, Connecticut, and Iowa the husband acquires no rights in property of the wife, and in Connecticut the wife none in that of the husband, while in California, Nevada, and the Dakotas neither husband nor wife has an interest in the property of the other, and in Missouri the husband may acquire title to personal property reduced to his possession with his wife's written assent. As to property acquired after the marriage independently of the husband, both real and personal property is usually secured to the wife for her separate use, the statutes varying in the specification in the different states; some states including that acquired by devise or descent, others by purchase or gift or as the result of her own labor. For a classification of the statutes on this point both as to real and personal property, see Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6422.

In New York and West Virginia special protection is given to the property of a woman in patents for her own inventions; in Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Kansas, Nebraska, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas, Alabama, and Delaware, in the proceeds of stocks sold, and in the last named state, of any separate estate sold.

In Minnesota and Missouri, savings from the income of her separate estate, and in several states the rents and profits of her real estate are separate property. In some states, including New York, the Dakotas, California, and Nevada, a husband and wife may hold property as joint tenants or tenants in common, or in the two last named states as community property. As to Louisiana, see COMMUNITY.

For reference to the statutes of the several states on this general subject, see Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 6410-34.

As to the statutory liability of a married woman and her property for necessaries and family expenses and also for her own torts, see infra. The separate property of a married woman is not liable in most states for the debts of the husband, nor bound by judgment or execution against him, and in Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Tennessee his curtesy or other interest in her real estate is not affected. Generally under the state statutes debts of the wife contracted before marriage are enforceable against her separate property after marriage. For these in Maine and Delaware a judgment may be recovered against her in her own name, but in Rhode Island, New York, Indiana, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Colorado, and Wyoming the action must be against husband and wife jointly. Debts contracted by the wife after marriage may generally be enforced against her and her separate property. A judgment may be recovered against her individually in Rhode Island, Ohio, and Maine, and in the last named state, Rhode Island, Maryland, and Alabama she may be sued jointly with the husband. In Vermont, Ohio, and Arkansas a judgment against a married woman may be enforced against her own property as if she were sole.

By legislation since 1890: In New Jersey if the husband and wife have lived apart seven years either may convey separate real estate without the other. In Rhode Island married women may contract as if single. In Louisiana they may keep bank accounts. In Virginia their real estate is liable on their contracts, but cannot be sold if the rents and profits will discharge the debt in five years. In New Jersey insurance, if payable to a married woman, is free from any claim of the husband, his representatives or creditors, except as to amount of premiums paid in fraud of creditors. In Wisconsin a married woman may receive from any person inheritances, gifts, or bequests as if unmarried, and conveyances between the husband and wife are valid. So in New York she may contract with the husband as to all matters except the alteration or dissolution of the marriage relation or to relieve the husband from liability for her support. In California the debts of a married woman are made and acknowledged as if unmarried. In Arkansas she may make executory contracts, and in that state, as also in California and West Virginia, she may give a power of attorney to sell land. In Alabama contracts of a non-resident married woman have the same force as those of residents. In South Dakota her liability for necessaries is the same as the husband's, and in New Jersey she may become liable upon indorsement, guarantee, or promise to pay the debt of another; but in South Carolina she cannot contract as surety for the debt of another. In Missouri her separate property is not subject to levy for debt. In Vermont she may be appointed executrix, administratrix, guardian, or trustee, and the marriage of a single woman will not affect the authority of her previous appointment. In Texas limitation does not run against her until she becomes twenty-one. In Delaware married women abandoned by their husbands may sell real estate held in their own right. In West Virginia married women living separate and apart from their husbands may carry on business, and separate property of the wife acquired by the husband is subject to the payment of her debts. In Pennsylvania husband and wife may sue and testify against each other in certain cases, and by the act of 1893 her capacity to acquire and dispose of property and to sue and be sued is practically absolute. In North Carolina the wife loses her interest in her husband's property when she abandons him, or if divorce is granted on his application; and he may then convey his real estate as if unmarried, and the same provisions apply conversely to the husband in like cases.

English legislation has been much more according to a definite plan, commencing with 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, which enabled a married woman deserted or judicially separated from her husband to obtain orders of protection against his creditors. Married Women's Property Acts of 1870, 1874, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 93, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 50, secured to married women several specific property rights, but these acts were repealed and supplied by the Married Women's Property Act of 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 75, under which a married woman could acquire and hold separate property in her own name, and sue and be sued severally, the husband, however, remaining liable for her torts. The purpose of this act was thus stated by Wills, J., to be, not destructive of the "doctrine of the common law by which there was what has been called a unity of person between husband and wife, but to confer in certain specified cases new powers upon the wife, and in others new powers upon the husband, and gives them in certain specified cases new remedies against one another." 14 Q. B. Div. 835. This act is still the married woman's property law of England, the only subsequent act of importance being 49 & 50 Vict. c. 52, under which women who were deserted may summon their husbands for maintenance.

For provisions of the English statute in detail, see an interesting comparison between English and American legislation on the subject, 22 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 761; Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 96; 1 Brett, Com. ch. 18, at the end of which may be found a list of the English statutes; 7 So. L. Rev. 68; 11 Cent. L. J. 41; 27 id. 279.

While the legislation of England and the United States with respect to married women has been mainly in the direction of giving to her property interests such a legal status as had been secured to her in equity in spite of her common law footing, there has, at the same time, been secured to her in both countries, by judicial action, emancipation of the person to the extent of practically abrogating the common-law rule on that subject. An interesting review by Edward Manson of the cases on the marital authority of the husband shows that the right to beat a wife was a part of the common law (see 17 Law Mag. & Rev. 1), though chancery early intervened for her protection; still later there remained the husband's control over his wife's person; but this theory ceased to be acted upon early in the eighteenth century, and Jackson's case is said to have simply emphasized the recognition of the wife's right to her personal liberty; even to compel them to live together is beyond the reach of the law, and the policy of compelling cohabitation was abandoned in the Matrimonial Clauses Act, 1884. The conclusion reached is: "Moulded by the social forces of successive centuries, the law of England as to married women is rapidly following the course of Roman law. They began in subjugation, they end in entire emancipation. The protection of a wife's person is amply assured, so is the protection of her property (though we still cling to the absurdity of making her capacity to control depend on her possession of separate property). The advocates of women's rights have really hardly a grievance left. Whether all this is for good or evil, whether woman is destined to realize her highest ideal in subjection or in freedom, is a matter on which opinions will differ, and which time only can solve. Jurisprudence, as such, has nothing to do with it. It has only to do with the law as it is, and the law in its most recent interpretation (1891) proclaims the wife's freedom with no uncertain sound." 7 L. Quar. Rev. 244. As to the right of custody of the wife, see 25 Ir. L. T. 186.

The effect of this modern legislation is to create what has been termed a statutory separate estate, which is not to be confused with the equitable separate estate; Stew. H. & W. § 217; the two may exist side by side; id.; 51 Miss. 172. The word property in these acts has been held to include money; 35 Miss. 108; choses in action ex contractu; 16 N. J. Eq. 512; 75 Va. 390; 32 Md. 212; and ex delicto; 34 Ohio St. 621; 37 id. 10; 27 Mich. 145; 54 Me. 156; 43 Wis. 23; corporeal and incorporeal interests; 69 Pa. 424; 35 Ala. 88; animate and inanimate; 62 Ala. 41 (but not mere contingent interests; L. R. 6 Eq. 210); a mining interest in a lead; 4 G. Greene 231. In England married woman's property does not include a general power of appointment under a deed or will of which she is donee; 17 Q. B. Div. 521. Most of the acts define the mode of acquisition of property which shall be affected by it, and such specification excludes all others; 2 Bish. M. W. § 17. The most common methods of acquisition are, purchase, gift or grant, devise, bequest, descent, distribution, exchange, increase, trade or service, contract, and tort; Stew. H. & W. §§ 223–230, where the cases, as to each, are collected.

Where a husband employs his wife and pays her wages otherwise payable to some other employe, she cannot be deprived of the money or of her property in which she has invested it; 42 N. J. L. 198; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 867; 44 N. Y. 298; 27 Miss. 830; 37 Me. 94.

The marriage of a woman to a man to whom she is indebted does not extinguish the debt; 49 Ill. App. 163.

A grant or devise to a married woman and her husband as tenants by entireties, is not abrogated by the married women's property acts even where they provide that she shall hold real estate as if sole; 92 N. Y. 152; 156 Pa. 628; 159 Mass. 415; 92 Tenn. 707; 23 Ore. 4; 38 S. C. 34, contra, 56 N. H. 105; 88 Me. 17; but a married woman may, under those acts, without joining her husband, sue for and recover land conveyed to her and him in fee; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 342; and the husband is not exclusively entitled to the use and benefit of lands held in entirety or as joint tenant with his wife; 144 N. Y. 306. In England, since the married women's property act, a conveyance to both creates the same estate as if they were not married; L. R. 39 Ch. D. 148; 27 id. 166; 1 Brett, Com. 62. In some states a conveyance to a married woman and her husband is unaffected by these statutes, either because tenancy by entireties and joint tenancy have not been adopted; 11 Conn. 337; or not recognized by the courts; 13 Ohio 68; 28 Ia. 302; or are abolished by statute; 69 Miss. 795. Where a married woman was a tenant by entirety it has been held that a divorce changed it into a tenancy in common; 118 Ind. 36; 80 Tex. 645; 80 Ill. 197; 92 Tenn. 697; 122 Mo. 235. See 22 L. R. A. 594; 30 id. 305.

In most of the states the deed of a married woman is ineffectual to pass a title, unless when her husband is a party; and generally a separate acknowledgment and private examination of the wife is required; and if signed by her alone without her husband it is absolutely void; 112 Pa. 99; 88 Ala. 318; and so by statute is a mortgage; 117 Ind. 9. For the statutory requirements with respect to acknowledgments in the several states, see ACKNOWLEDGMENT. See, also, as to separate acknowledgment, 30 Cent. L. J. 515. The deed of a married woman without the separate examination will pass neither her interest nor that of the husband; 94 Mo. 511. Where her acknowledgment is not made in compliance with the statute she is presumed to have acted under the coercion of her husband; 12 Pet. 345; 94 Mo. 511.

In Indiana the deed of a married woman to which her husband is not joined gives color of title; 104 Ind. 223. If the deed of a married woman be void by reason of a defective acknowledgment it may be ratified by her after her husband's death, and such ratification may be shown by parol evidence; 9 S. & R. 268.

A deed purporting to be an absolute conveyance of lands of a married woman will not be construed as a release of dower because her husband's name appears first therein; 155 Ill. 514. The common-law disability, incident to the relation of husband and wife with respect to conveyances of real property, still exists in so far as it has not been swept away by express legislative enactments; 119 N. Y. 540. Where a married woman, at the time an infant, had excuted a note and a mortgage intended to convey her separate estate, the mortgage being void, because not executed in accordance with the statutes, she was not estopped to assert the invalidity of the mortgage, by representations at the time of its execution that she was twenty-one years of age, although such representations were material inducements towards the making of the loan; 25 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 975.

Mere silence by a married woman who knows her conveyance to be void does not estop her from asserting it; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 444; but in that state it is held that by statute a married woman may be bound by an estoppel in pais; 140 Ind. 256. The wife joining her husband in conveyances of his land is not bound by his covenants in the deed and is not estopped to assert a paramount lien in favor of herself; 107 Ala. 429.

Where the husband leased his wife's lands for a year with a privilege of four years more, the receipt of a share of the farm products reserved did not estop her from asserting that the lease was void, because not assented to in writing by her; 57 N. J. L. 242

Where a married woman is unable to convey her separate estate without a deed in which her husband is joined, she cannot make a valid deed to him of such property; 85 Ala. 342. Gifts by a wife to a husband are to be closely scrutinized, but if fairly made and free from coercion and undue influence they ought to be sustained; 39 N. J. Eq. 216. The evidence must be clear and unequivocal, and the intention free from doubt; 82 Ga. 329; 124 Ind. 105. A conveyance by the husband directly to the wife creates in her an equitable estate, but is inoperative to pass a legal title; and he is left a trustee for her; 83 Ala. 408; 84 id. 193; 35 Fed. Rep. 677; 17 Or. 423. He may settle property upon his wife if it does not impair the claims of existing creditors and is not intended as a cover for future schemes of fraud; 122 U. S. 446.

An assignment by a married woman of her separate estate to pay a note in which she has been joined with her husband for his debt has been held void; 30 S. C. 159. Mortgages by a wife of her separate estate for the husband's benefit have been held null and void; 94 U. S. 767; 11 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 351; contra, 3 MacArthur 118; 128 U. S. 236; 64 N. H. 585; 112 Pa. 284.

In the absence of an enabling act the contracts of a married woman are cognizable only in equity, and cannot be enforced at law, except as affected by the so-called Married Women's Acts; 95 Wis. 381. The right to contract conferred by these acts has been held to give her not a general contractual capacity, but only ability to make such contracts as have direct relation to the improvement of her separate property; 22 Mich. 255; 44 id. 80; and her property must not merely be incidentally benefited, but there must be a direct relation between it and the contract; 39 id. 671. See 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 727. Such is the general construction of such statutes destroying the common-law rights of the husband in his wife's property; 18 Wall. 141; 99 U. S. 325; 26 N. J. Eq. 504; 33 N. J. L. 266; 1 Marvel Del. —. Generally her contracts are binding when necessary or convenient to the use and enjoyment of her separate estate; 10 Wis. 380. A paper indorsed to enable her husband to raise money does not charge her property; 30 Ohio St. 147, where there is an exhaustive examination of the subject. For extreme cases, see 8 Kan. 525; 9 id. 80; 62 Mo. 338. See a full discussion of the effect of these statutes conferring contractual power upon a married woman; Stew. H. & W. §§ 369, 378 a.

Where a married woman performs her part of a contract, she may enforce performance against the other party, though she could not have been compelled to perform her part of the agreement; 127 Mo. 232; and if she make a contract, not enforceable against her, to purchase real estate and fail to pay for the same, it may be sold for the unpaid purchase money: 95 Tenn. 87. In some states provision is made for a conveyance of land by a married woman abandoned by her husband, under permission of court or otherwise; and under such statute it has been held that, having conveyed without compliance with the statute, she may not rescind the deed long afterwards on account of coverture without returning the consideration; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 402.

Threats of prosecution and imprisonment against her husband constitute duress sufficient to make void the deed or contract of a married woman; 18 Md. 305; 62 Ia. 42; 98 Mich. 163; 59 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 564; 62 L. T. N. S. 376.

Generally it is held that a married woman cannot become a partner with her husband, even under statutes which would authorize her to enter into partnership with any one else; 67 How. Pr. 292; 65 Tex. 131; 14 Abb. N. C. 341; 31 Ind. 113; 44 Ohio St. 192; 4 Wash. 263, contra, 3 Biss. 405; 90 Ala. 525; 122 N. Y. 308 (see as to conflicting New York cases 16 L. R. A. 526, n.); nor ordinarily with any one else; 23 Fla. 83; 41 Md. 19; if she have no separate estate; 87 Mo. 282. If, without capacity to become a partner, she does so, the property remains hers and the husband cannot assign it; 52 Miss. 239; nor can his creditors; 15 Wis. 195; 11 Paige 9. Where her partnership is a nullity the other partner may be sued alone; 20 W. Va. 571. Where her husband borrows her separate property and uses it in a firm, she is the creditor of the firm; 86 Ind. 224; 4 Del. Ch. 580; and her debt is provable in bankruptcy; 11 Paige 9. If a married woman carries on a business under the assumed name of a partnership she may be sued in that name, and cannot plead her coverture; 81 Ala. 123; nor can her co-partners deny her capacity to sue alone for a dissolution; 61 N. Y. 512. As to married women as partners, see, generally, 2 L. R. A. 343; 32 Cent. L. J. 128; 31 Am. St. Rep. 934; and as to partnerships between husband and wife, see 16 id. 526, n.; 35 Cent. L. J. 328; 24 Am. L. Reg. 659.

The capacity of a married woman to become surety or guarantor will depend upon the construction of the state statutes, and the questions most frequently arise with respect to efforts to become surety for the husband. In some states this is expressly forbidden, and the prohibition has been held to prevent her from mortgaging her real estate to one who is surety for her husband or co-surety with him; 105 Ala. 657. In other states she may bind her separate estate as surety for her husband; 40 W. Va. 194; 42 Neb. 869; and where she makes a valid contract as surety she is entitled to all the rights of a surety; 91 Va. 458.

A married woman is frequently held to have certain rights growing out of the insanity of her husband, as, to be regarded as the head of the family and to control the domicil of the husband; 54 Vt. 105; 32 Tex. 195; to receive income belonging to him; 4 Bro. C. C. 100; 2 McN. & G. 134. In such case it has also been held that the wife is entitled to act with respect to her separate property as if her husband were civilly dead; 51 Vt. 585; 37 N. H. 437. The husband's insanity does not affect her right to bar her dower by joining in a deed with her husband which by reason of his insanity is invalid; 99 Mo. 19; 84 Wis. 381; 111 Mass. 308; but in some states, as Delaware, this contingency is provided for by statute; 14 Del. Laws, ch. 78.

A married woman has been held authorized to dispose of community property to supply the necessary wants of herself and children; 32 Tex. 195; and see 63 id. 287. With respect to the property and rights of the husband the relation of the wife to it appears not to be changed by the insanity of the husband; L. R. 5 Q. B. 51; she may bind the estate of the husband for necessaries; 4 E. L. & Eq. 523; 1 DeG. J. & S. 465; 3 J. J. Marsh. 658; but not for the payment of debts generally; 23 Vt. 486; 16 Pa. 215; nor can she sue for a debt due to him; 7 Dowl. P. C. 22.

A personal judgment against a married woman at common law was void; 66 Mo. 617; 18 Md. 457; 29 W. Va. 385; 80 Ky. 368; if rendered by default it is in some jurisdictions held absolutely void; 121 Pa. 248; 73 Mo. 53; 83 Ky. 305; 41 Cal. 78; 52 Miss. 921; in others merely voidable; 8 B. & C. 421; 61 Ga. 512; 43 Ohio St. 78; 42 Mich. 112; 55 Ind. 419; and she is not estopped by a failure to plead coverture; 83 Ky. 305. In the absence of fraud a consent decree is binding on a married woman; 79 Ala. 481; 126 Mo. 39; and a judgment might be obtained against her for a debt contracted dum sola; 2 Cow. 581; 28 Ga. 71; 4 East 521; 55 Miss. 557. Generally provision is made for such suits in the married woman's acts, and in some the husband and wife must be sued jointly, and in others, judgment may be recovered against her separately to bind her separate estate.

In Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Oregon, Washington, Alabama, and New Mexico, the husband and wife are equally liable for expenses and children's education, and a married woman is liable for necessaries for herself and children in Montana (see infra); and such a debt is enforceable against her property after execution against the husband unsatisfied in Pennsylvania and Alabama, while in Vermont, Missouri, and Arkansas a judgment for necessaries against the husband may be enforced against the separate property of the wife, and for expenses incurred in the improvement of her separate property in Vermont and Missouri. Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6410 (c).

In many states there are statutory provisions authorizing the assumption of liability by a married woman for the family expenses; and in others, such liability has been held to arise under the statutes without her express consent; thus, in Illinois, Iowa, and Oregon such expenses are made a charge upon the property of the husband and wife, or either of them, either jointly or severally. This is held to be a personal liability and not merely a property charge; 52 Ia. 725; 22 Ill. App. 557; but her property may be pursued without obtaining a personal judgment against her; 65 Ia. 180; and her liability is not dependent upon consent; 15 Ore. 574. Within these statutes family expenses include whatever is actually used in the family; 55 Ia. 702; rent of a house; 33 Ill. App. 394; medical attendance; 63 Ia. 22; whether necessary or not; 80 id. 243; the servants' wages; 11 Ill. App. 637; a piano; 41 Ia. 588; an organ; 65 id. 180; a cook stove and crockery; 12 id. 565; the husband's clothing; 23 Ill. App. 118; jewelry purchased by the husband and presented to the wife; 60 Ia. 148. The wife has been held not liable for money borrowed by the husband for household supplies; 55 Ia. 719; a reaping machine; 49 id. 536; a breaking plough; 52 id. 250; a light farm wagon occasionally used by the family to ride to church and other places; 24 Ill. App. 423; payments for the care of an insane husband; 46 Ia. 170.

Where the separate estate of the wife is made liable for necessaries by statute she must be a party to the suit to enforce payment; 30 Mo. App. 464. In Alabama a constitutional provision is not violated by a statute making the separate estate of the wife liable for necessaries; 55 Ala. 576; see 2 Bish. Mar. W. § 610. In suits under such statute the existence of the separate estate must be alleged; 30 Mo. App. 464; 53 Ala. 161. The separate estate of a married woman is liable for medical service to herself and children but not to children of her husband by a former marriage, though all live together; 48 Ala. 485.

A married woman and her separate property are liable for her torts in Maine, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Washington, and New Mexico, and in Connecticut if not under her husband's coercion. When so committed in Indiana they are jointly liable, and in Pennsylvania and Wyoming a judgment against the husband for the wife's tort must be first enforced against her separate property. Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6414. See as to liability for torts, 55 Conn. 397; 74 Ia. 589; 29 S. C. 108; 42 Fed. Rep. 317; 25 Fla. 927; 103 Ind. 328; 29 Mich. 260; 61 Tex. 458, 471; 16 West. Jur. 425. Such is also the tendency with respect to fraud, in view of the statutes authorizing married women to transact business independently; 45 N. J. Eq. 330. In New York the husband must be joined in an action for the tort of the wife unless it is in relation to her separate property; 109 N. Y. 441. See 7 L. R. A. 640, n.

As to a married woman's liability connected with the use of premises owned by her there is a difference of opinion. Where the husband and wife resided on the premises she could not be convicted of keeping a gambling house; 16 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 207; but under similar circumstances the husband was held liable for violation of liquor laws; 124 Mass. 30; 126 id. 462; and for keeping a brothel; 97 id. 225. In New York the wife was held liable for injuries resulting from harboring a vicious dog belonging to her husband; 135 N. Y. 201, contra, 101 Ala. 667. In other cases they have been held jointly liable; 4 Colo. App. 92; and in Massachusetts it was held to be a question for the jury of the ownership of the animal; 152 Mass. 7. Where a married woman set fire to a house owned by her and let to a tenant, the husband was not liable; 58 How. Pr. 449; and where the husband and wife were domiciled on premises which were the separate property of the latter, he was held not to be in control of the premises so as to be responsible for injury to a stranger resulting from carelessly leaving a pit uncovered; 45 N. Y. 230. The husband was also held not liable for torts committed on his wife's premises in 118 Mass. 58, and 65 Mich. 31.

A husband is not entitled to alimony. The latter is based upon the common-law requirement, to which the husband was subject, of providing his wife with necessaries, and there is no reciprocal obligation on her; 30 Kan. 132; 66 N. W. Rep. 947. In some states there are statutes providing that alimony, or an allowance out of the wife's estate, in the nature of alimony, may be granted the husband. In Kansas alimony was denied the husband because no authority could be found to authorize it; 30 Kan. 132; 68 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 947. See on this subject, 55 Alb. L. J. 15.

The estate of a married woman is primarily liable for her funeral expenses, and where her husband pays them, he may recover them from her executor; 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 407. See 146 Mass. 281.

As to the citizenship of married women, the effect of marriage upon the status of a woman as an alien, or her expatriation see ALIEN; CITIZEN; NATURALIZATION. See also an annotation on the subject in 22 L.R. A. 148.

As to the effect of ante-nuptial agreements, see that title. See MacQueen; Clancy; Bright; Roper; Bell; Stewart, Husband and Wife; Bish. Law M. W.; Cord, M. W.; Ewell, L. Cas. MARSHAL. An officer of the United States, whose duty it is to execute the process of the courts of the United States. His duties within the district for which he is appointed are very similar to those of a sheriff. See Serg. Const. Law, ch. 25; 2 Dall. 402; Burr's Trial 365; 1 Mas. 100; 2 Gall. 101; 4 Cra. 96; 7 id. 276; 9 id. 86, 212; 6 Wheat. 194; 9 id. 645. He is authorized to protect a federal judge from assault and murder; 135 U. S. 1. See JUDGE.

A marshal who has process in his hands against one person and seizes the goods of another, is liable by virtue of his office and his sureties are bound; 111 U. S. 17, 181; though the authorities differ; 84 Fed. Rep. 409. He is liable in damages where he refuses to surrender property which he has taken unlawfully; 124 U. S. 131.

MARSHAL. To arrange; put in proper order; e. g. "the law will marshal words, ut res magis valeat." Hill, B., Hardr. 92.

MARSHAL OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH. An officer who had the custody of the queen's bench prison. Abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22 and an officer called keeper of the queen's prison substituted.

MARSHALLING ASSETS. An equitable principle upon which the legal rights of creditors are controlled in order to accomplish an equitable distribution of funds in accordance with the superior equities of different parties entitled to share therein. It springs from the principle that one who is entitled to satisfaction of his demand from either of two funds shall not so exercise his election as to exclude a party who is entitled to resort to only one of the funds. For example, where one creditor has a mortgage upon two parcels of land upon one of which there is a junior incumbrance not otherwise secured, the first mortgagee may be compelled to exhaust in the first instance that parcel of land which is otherwise unencumbered in order that the security of the junior incumbrancer may not be entirely destroyed. In such case, however, the indisposition of equity to interfere with the legal rights of a creditor results in working out the equity of the junior incumbrancer through a substitution to the right of the paramount mortgagee as against the other property; Bisph. Eq. § 27, 340; 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 739.

Marshalling assets is a pure equity and does not rest at all upon contract, and will not be enforced to the prejudice of either the dominant creditor or third persons, or even so as to do an injustice to the debtor; 85 Tenn. 597. See 1 Johns. Ch. 409; 7 W. & S. 269; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 260; 51 Neb. 146; 114 Cal. 537.

The equity of marshalling seems capable of being carried into effect in one of two ways: either, first, by restraining the parties against whom it exists from using a security to the injury of another; or, secondly, by giving the party entitled to the protection of this equity the benefit of another security in lieu of the one of which he has been disappointed. In other words, the right might be enforced either by injunction against the paramount creditor, or by subrogation in favor of the junior creditor. In practice, however, the latter of these two methods is the one usually employed, and the sounder doctrine seems to be that the first of the two ought not to be resorted to except under very peculiar circumstances. But there are decisions to the contrary; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 280. Of course, when both funds are in court or under its immediate control, the case is different.

One whose securities have been re-hypothecated by a pledgee, together with securities belonging to the latter, has a right to compel the application of the latter securities to the payment of the debt before resort is had to those wrongfully re-hypothecated; 78 Fed. Rep. 216.

A common application of this doctrine is where mortgaged real property is subject to sale under the mortgage in the inverse order of alienation. The leading English case was Barnes v. Racster, 1 Y. & C. Ch. 401, and the rule in that country has been termed the rule of ratable contribution; Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1233; while the American rule was first settled by Kent, Ch., in Clowes v. Dickenson, 5 Johns. Ch. 235, where the doctrine of exoneration in the inverse order of conveyance was adopted. It has been noted that in this case a statement in fact obiter has been generally adopted and followed in the United States. See a valuable article by J. M. Gest in 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 739, for a critical view of the English and American authorities.

In a recent case the rule was held not to apply to a purchase merely of the equity of redemption in a portion of the mortgaged premises so as to relieve the purchaser upon taking an assignment of the mortgage from his proportion of it and entitling him to enforce the law against the remaining portion; 68 Mo. App. 67. See 20 Pa. 222; 62 Ala. 271; 2 Johns. Ch. 125; 11 Paige 30. It is said that on a sale of a part of mortgaged lands the unsold portion is primarily liable to the mortgage debt; 38 Fla. 257.

The term marshalling liens has been used to express the application of the particular equity just referred to, being said to mean "the ranking or ordering of several estates or parcels of land, for the satisfaction of a judgment or mortgage to which all are liable, though successively conveyed away by the debtor." 1 Black, Judgm. § 440. It would seem, however, that the phrase is not an apt one in the application made of it, as the case put is the most ordinary one of marshalling assets, though as a matter of course there is always a marshalling of liens, in a certain sense, whenever a fund is distributed to lien creditors, as, even in an ordinary case of the application of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale. This is not, however, to be confused with the great equitable doctrine under consideration.

Another phrase, sometimes used, is marshalling securities, which is an expression for the same practice of equity to secure a class of creditors having but one fund available from having their security exhausted by another class who have two.

This equitable doctrine cannot be invoked as against those who have superior equities, and in this light the right of a wife to her own property is superior to that of her husband's creditors; 15 Conn. 504; 11 Md. 465; 119 N. C. 450; nor is it applied in favor of a creditor of the debtor; 4 Johns. Ch. 17; 13 Ill. 41; 17 Ves. 529; unless the creditor is a mere surety; 3 Sandf. Ch. 192; 13 Ill. 41; but it does not apply where the exclusive fund is the property of the surety for the debt for which such fund is bound; 53 Ohio St. 256. The doctrine cannot be made available to create a fund, the two must exist; L. R. 3 Eq. 668; but once existing it cannot be affected by the intervention of subsequent creditors; 2 Watts 205; 4 Gratt. 407. A mortgagee having double security for his debt is not required by the existence of subsequent judgments against the mortgagor, of which he has no knowledge, to shape his action in the collection of his demand in accordance with the principle of marshalling the assets; 85 Md. 505.

The doctrine of marshalling is applied to an infinite variety of cases, and is liable to be resorted to wherever there is necessity for the distribution of two funds among creditors, some of whom have claims on both. In the settlement of decedents' estates, five classes of persons are sometimes mentioned to whom it may be applied: (1) Creditors, (2) Legatees, (3) Between creditors and legatees, (4) Between legatees and vendors, (5) Between widows and legatees.

As to its application in cases of successive purchasers, see 27 Am. L. Reg. 739; partnership; 20 id. 465; 21 id. 800; 24 Alb. L. J. 305; 34 id. 344, 364; devisees and legatees; 24 Ir. L. T. 239; homestead cases; 16 W. Jurist 28; 9 Ins. L. J. 677. See generally, 2 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. Eq. 228; Bisph. Eq. §§ 341–350 and cases cited; Tied. Eq. Jur. 532. See ASSETS; LIEN.

MARTIAL LAW. That military rule and authority which exists in time of war, and is conferred by the laws of war, in relation to persons and things under and within the scope of active military operations, in carrying on the war, and which extinguishes or suspends civil rights and the remedies founded upon them, for the time being, so far as it may appear to be necessary in order to the full accomplishment of the purposes of the war. Prof. Joel Parker, in N. A. Rev., Oct. 1861.

Martial law is not mentioned by that name in the constitution or statutes of the United States; practically the essence of martial law is the suspension of the privilege of habeas corpus, and the two have been practically regarded as the same thing. See 1 Halleck, Int. L. 549; HABEAS CORPUS.

The instructions for the government of the United States army, 1863, define martial law as "simply military authority exercised in accordance with the laws and usages of war." It is proclaimed by the presence of a hostile army, and is the immediate and direct effect of occupation or conquest; suspending the civil and criminal law and the domestic government of the occupied place.

It supersedes all civil proceedings which conflict with it; Benet, Mil. Law; but does not necessarily supersede all such proceedings.

It extends, at least, to the camp, environs, and near field of military operations; 7 How. 83; 3 Mart. La. 530; 6 Am. Arch. 186; and see, also, 2 H. Bla. 165; 1 Term 549; 1 Knapp, P. C. 316; 13 How. 115; but does not extend to a neutral country; 1 Hill 377; 25 Wend. 483, 512, n. Nor in time of insurrection can it be applied to citizens in states in which the courts are open and their process unobstructed; 4 Wall. 2. It is founded on paramount necessity, and imposed by a military chief; 1 Kent 377, n. For any excess or abuse of the authority, the officer ordering and the person committing the act are liable as trespassers; 13 How. 115, 154; 1 Cowp. 180.

Martial law must be distinguished from military law. The latter is a rule of government for persons in military service only, but the former, when in force, is indiscriminately applied to all persons whatsoever; De Hart, Mil. Law. 17. MARYLAND. One of the thirteen original states of the Union.

The territory of Maryland was included in the grants previously made to companies formed for the settlement of Virginia. Out of these Virginia grants Maryland was granted by Charles the First, on the 20th of June, 1632, to Cecilius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore. The first settlement under the authority of Lord Baltimore was made on the 27th of March, 1634, in what is now St. Mary's county. Some settlements were previously made on Kent Island, under the authority of Virginia.

During its colonial period, Maryland was governed, with slight interruptions, by the lord proprietary, under its charter.

In Cromwell's time the government of Maryland was assumed by commissioners acting under the commonwealth of England; but in a few years Lord Baltimore was restored to his full powers, and remained undisturbed until the revolution of 1688, when the government was seized by the crown, and not restored to the proprietary till 1715. From this period there was no interruption to the proprietary rule until the revolution.

The territorial limits of Maryland were somewhat obscurely described in the charter; and long disputes arose about the boundaries, in the adjustment of which this state was reduced to her present limits.

The lines dividing Maryland from Pennsylvania and Delaware were fixed under an agreement between Thomas and Richard Penn and Lord Baltimore. See DELAWARE.

By this agreement, the rights of grantees under the respective proprietaries were saved, and provision made for confirming the titles by the government in whose jurisdiction the lands granted were situated. The boundary between Maryland and Virginia has never been finally settled. Maryland claimed to the south branch of the Potomac; but Virginia has held to the north branch, and exercised jurisdiction up to that line. The rights of the citizens of the respective states to fish and navigate the waters which divide Maryland and Virginia were fixed by compact between the two states in 1785.

The first constitution of this state was adopted on the eighth day of November, 1776. Subsequent constitutions were adopted in 1851 and 1864. The present constitution was adopted in 1867 and went into operation on the fifth of October in that year.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—This is vested in "the general assembly of Maryland," composed of a senate and a house of delegates.

The senate is composed of members elected one from each county (the city of Baltimore also electing three, one from each legislative district therein) for the term of four years. One-half of the senate is elected every two years.

The house of delegates consists of members elected from the various counties, apportioned according to population; but the smallest county is not to have less than two. Each legislative district of the city of Baltimore is entitled to the number of delegates to which the largest county shall be entitled under the apportionment. A senator must be twenty-five and a delegate must be twenty-one years of age, and each must be a citizen of the United States, have resided three years next before election in the state, and the last year thereof in the county or city from which he is elected.

The general assembly meets on the first Wednesday in January every even year, and the session lasts for a period not longer than ninety days. It can grant no act of incorporation which may not be repealed.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The governor is elected every fourth year from 1867, for four years. He must be at least thirty years old, ten years a citizen of the state, and for five years next preceding his election a resident of the state. The governor has the usual powers, but no veto, and his appointments to office must be confirmed by the senate.

He may not appoint to an office a person who has been rejected by the senate. He must reside at Annapolis. If a vacancy occurs in the office of governor, the legislature, if in session, appoints a substitute; and if not in session, the president of the senate shall act as governor; and if there is no such president, the speaker of the house is to act.

A secretary of state is appointed by the governor, with the advice of the senate.

A treasurer is appointed by the two houses of the legislature every second year.

A comptroller of the treasury is elected by the voters of the state at the same time as members of the house of delegates.

A commissioner of the land office is appointed by the governor for the term of four years. He is judge and clerk of the land office.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The court of appeals consists of eight judges, one from each judicial district, one of whom is designated by the governor, with the approval of the senate, as chief judge. It has appellate jurisdiction only.

There are seven circuit courts, one in each of the seven districts of the state (Baltimore city forming the eighth district); each court has one chief and two associate judges. The judge of the court of appeals from the circuit (or district) is ex officio chief judge of the circuit court in his circuit, except in the city of Baltimore. The term of office of the judges is fifteen years.

An orphans' court exists in each county, and in the city of Baltimore, composed of three judges, elected for the term of four years by the people of the county or city.

The city of Baltimore constitutes a judicial circuit and has six courts, the judges of which are elected for fifteen years. They are twelve in number and are designated judges of the supreme bench of Baltimore city, and make annual assignments to the six courts.

The superior court has civil jurisdiction in all common-law cases.

The circuit courts, numbers one and two, have exclusive equity jurisdiction.

The court of common pleas has civil jurisdiction in all common-law cases and all cases under the state insolvent law.

The city court has civil jurisdiction in all common-law cases, and appellate jurisdiction in all appeals from justices of the peace.

The criminal court has jurisdiction of all crimes and offences committed in the city.

Justices of the peace are appointed by the governor, and have civil jurisdiction in all cases when the debt or amount of damages claimed does not exceed $100.

The governor, comptroller of the treasury, and the treasurer constitute the board of public works.

The comptroller, sheriffs, county commissioners, etc., are elected every second year.

MASON AND DIXON'S LINE.

The boundary line between Pennsylvania on the north and Maryland on the south, celebrated before the extinction of slavery as the line of demarcation between the slave and the free states. See DELAWARE.

MASSACHUSETTS.

One of the original thirteen states of the United States of America.

The first important settlement on the territory of Massachusetts was made by the sect of Brownists or Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth in 1620. On March 4, 1628, Charles I. granted a charter to the Puritans under the name of "The Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England." This charter did not include the Plymouth colony which remained separate until 1691. The charter of 1628 continued till 1684, when it was adjudged forfeited. From this time till 1691, governors appointed by the king ruled the colony. In 1691, William and Mary granted a new charter, by which the colonies of Massachusetts Bay and New Plymouth, the province of Maine, and the territory called Nova Scotia, and the tract lying between Nova Scotia and Maine were incorporated into one government, by the name of the Province of Massachusetts Bay. 1 Story, Const. § 71. This charter, amended in 1726, continued until the adoption of the state constitution in 1780, which was drafted by John Adams. 4 Adams, Life and Works 213. It contained a provision for calling a convention for its revision or amendment in 1795, if two-thirds of the voters at an election held for this purpose should be in favor of it. Const. Mass. c. 6, art. x. But at that time a majority of the voters opposed any revision; Bradford's Hist. Mass. 294; and the constitution continued without amendment till 1820, when a convention was called for revising or amending it. Mass. Stat. 1820, c. 15. This convention proposed fourteen amendments, nine of which were accepted by the people. Since then, sixteen additional articles of amendment have been adopted at different times, making twenty-five in all. In 1853, a second convention for revising the constitution was held, which prepared an entirely new draft of a constitution. This draft, upon submission to the people, was rejected.

The constitution, as originally drafted, consists of two parts, one entitled A Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the other The Frame of Government.

The name of the state is the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.—The Senate is composed of forty members, elected from single senatorial districts, each containing as nearly as possible the same number of legal voters. A senator must be an inhabitant of the district for which he is chosen, and must have been an inhabitant of the state for five years next preceding his election, and ceases to be a senator on leaving the commonwealth.

The House of Representatives consists of two hundred and forty members, chosen in each of the representative districts into which the counties are divided for the purpose. The number of representatives sent by any district depends on the number of legal voters in it; but no district can send more than three representatives. A representative must have been an inhabitant of the district for which he is chosen for at least one year next preceding his election, and ceases to represent his district on leaving the commonwealth.

The two houses together constitute the "General Court of Massachusetts." The members of both houses are elected annually.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.—The Governor is the supreme executive magistrate, and is elected annually. He is styled the "Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," and his title is "His Excellency." Seven years' residence in the commonwealth, and the possession of a freehold of the value of a thousand pounds, are the necessary qualifications for the office of governor or lieutenant-governor. He, with the council, administers the executive department of the government, which has the usual powers.

The Lieutenant-Governor is elected at the same time, for the same term, and must have the same qualifications as the governor. His title is "His Honor." He is a member of the council, and, in the absence of the governor, its president. In case of a vacancy in the office of governor, the lieutenant-governor acts as governor.

The Council consists of eight councillors, each chosen annually from a separate councillor district. The state is re-districted every ten years. Five councillors constitute a quorum, and their duty is to advise the governor in the executive part of the government. In case of vacancies in both the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor, the council, or the major part of them, shall have and exercise the powers of the governor. Vacancies in the council are filled by concurrent vote of the two branches of the legislature; or, if the legislature is not in session, by the governor's appointment.

The Secretary of the Commonwealth, the Treasurer, Auditor, and Attorney-General, are chosen annually at the state election, and no man is eligible as treasurer more than five successive years. Every councillor, the secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general, must have been an inhabitant of the state for the five years immediately preceding his election or appointment. Sheriffs, registers of probate, clerks of courts, and district attorneys are chosen by the people of the several counties.

THE JUDICIAL POWER.—The Supreme Judicial Court consists of one chief and six associate justices. Four justices constitute a quorum. This court has original and concurrent jurisdiction with the superior court of civil actions except actions of tort in which the amount involved exceeds four thousand dollars in Suffolk county or one thousand dollars elsewhere, the jurisdictional amount being stated in the affidavit of the plaintiff. Jury terms are held by a single justice, and either party may require a jury. Otherwise the facts are tried by the judge who has power to direct issues. Questions of law arising at the jury terms may be reported to the full bench. The court has original jurisdiction in equity and in some special proceedings. It is the appellate court of last resort in civil and criminal cases, with general superintendence over any inferior courts, and may issue writs of error, certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, and quo warranto.

This court has also a general superintendence and jurisdiction of cases arising under the insolvent act as a court of equity; and is the supreme court of probate with appellate jurisdiction of all matters determinable by the probate courts, and by the judges thereof, except in cases in which other provisions are specially made.

The Superior Court is composed of one chief justice and ten associate justices. It is to be held at the times and places prescribed, being at least two terms annually in each county. The court has exclusive original jurisdiction of capital and other crimes, misdemeanors and offences, divorce and nullity of marriage, complaints for flowing land, of claims against the commonwealth, of actions of tort except those of which the inferior courts or trial justices have concurrent original jurisdiction, and original jurisdiction of all civil actions except those of which the supreme judicial court, or inferior courts or trial justices have exclusive original jurisdiction. It has appellate jurisdiction of all civil actions and proceedings legally brought before it, by appeal or otherwise, from trial justices, police, district, or municipal courts, or courts of insolvency, and from the decisions of commissioners of insolvent estates of deceased persons; and of all offences tried and determined before a police, district, or municipal court or trial justice. In criminal cases legally brought before it, its jurisdiction is final, except as otherwise provided. It has concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme court, as stated supra.

All the judicial officers are appointed by the governor, with the advice of the council. Every nomination for a judicial appointment must be made by the governor to the council at least seven days before the council can approve it. The judges hold office during good behavior, but may be removed by the governor, with the consent of the council, upon the address of both branches of the legislature. The governor and council, and either branch of the legislature, may require the opinion of the justices of the supreme judicial court upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions.

Judges of Probate and Insolvency are appointed to hold office according to the tenor of their commissions, so that there may be one judge for each county. They may interchange services or perform each other's duties when necessary or convenient. Their courts are courts of record, and have original jurisdiction in their respective counties in all cases of insolvency, probate, and administration; appointment of trustees, and guardians for minors, insane persons, and spendthrifts; petitions for the adoption of children and the change of names; petitions of married women relative to their separate estate, and for protection and support, and partition.

The courts are to be held at such times and places as the statutes prescribe. They are held at other places as well as at the shire towns; and sessions occur very frequently.

Justices of the Peace are appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the council, for seven years, but any commission may be renewed. A certain number in each county are designated as trial justices, who have jurisdiction over petty criminal offences, and who have original jurisdiction exclusive of the superior court of all actions of replevin for beasts distrained or impounded, and of all actions of contract, tort, or replevin where the debt or damages demanded or value of the property alleged to be detained does not exceed one hundred dollars. They also have original and concurrent jurisdiction with the superior court where the amount involved is more than one hundred and not more than three hundred dollars. Pub. Stat. ch. 155, § 12 et seq.

Police and District Courts, consisting of one justice and two "special" justices, are established in many cities and large towns, of less than ten thousand inhabitants. They have substantially the same jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters, as trial justices, and their jurisdiction, when both plaintiff and defendant reside in the district, is exclusive of that of other police and district courts and of trial-justices.

Municipal Courts are established in the city of Boston, the principal one having original concurrent civil jurisdiction with the superior court where the amount involved exceeds one hundred and does not exceed one thousand dollars.

MASSES. Religious ceremonials or observances of the Roman Catholic Church. Under a will devising the residue of an estate for charitable purposes, masses were held to come within the religious or pious uses which are upheld as public charities. [1897] 2 I. R. 426; 134 Mass. 427; 14 Allen 553; but see 108 N. Y. 316, where a bequest to be applied for the purpose of having prayers offered in any Roman Catholic church selected by the executors was held void because there was no defined beneficiary. See, generally, 32 Alb. L. J. 367.

MASTER AND SERVANT. The relation of master and servant exists between one who not only prescribes to the workman the end of his work, but directs, or at any moment may direct the means also, or retains the power of controlling the work; 4 E. & B. 570; 24 L. J. Q. B. 138; and one who is engaged, "not merely in doing work or service for him, but who is in his service, usually upon or about the premises of his employer, and subject to his direction and control therein, and who is, generally, liable to be dismissed;" 59 Ala. 51; for misconduct or disobedience of orders; 50 Ill. App. 513.

Where the hiring is for a definite term of service the master is entitled to the labor of the servants during the whole term, and may recover damages against any one who entices them away or harbors them knowing them to be in his service; Sm. M. & S. 156; 6 Term 221; 13 Johns. 322; 2 E. & B. 216; 107 Mass. 555. See ENTICE.

A master may justify an assault in defence of his servant and a servant of his master; the master because he has an interest in his servant not to be deprived of his service; the servant because it is a part of his duty, for which he receives his wages, to stand by and defend his master; 1 Bla. Com. 429; Lofft 215. A master may give moderate corporal punishment to his menial servant while under age; 2 Kent 261. See ASSAULT; APPRENTICESHIP; CORRECTION.

The master may dismiss a servant before the expiration of the term for which he is hired, for immoral conduct, wilful disobedience, or habitual neglect, and the servant will not in such case be entitled to his wages; 4 C. & P. 518; 155 Pa. 67; 159 id. 579; 82 Mo. 599; 7 Fed. Rep. 642; 11 Q. B. 742; 34 La. Ann. 426; 42 Wis. 311; 63 Ga. 755; but if the dismissal be without reasonable cause, the servant may recover damages from his master therefor, to such an amount as will indemnify him for the loss of wages during the time necessarily spent in obtaining a fresh situation, and for the loss of the excess of any wages contracted for above the usual rate; 2 H. L. 607; 20 E. L. & Eq. 157; 110 N. C. 356; see 13 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 72. Any adequate cause for the dismissal of an employe known to the employer at the time thereof will justify the same, whether assigned or not, or though a different cause is assigned; 40 Ill. App. 340; or the cause may not have been known at the time of discharge; 70 Miss. 234. The statute 5 Eliz. c. 4, required a master, in certain cases, to satisfy two justices of the peace that he had reasonable and sufficient cause for putting away his servant. It was repealed by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, s. 17.

Where a servant, after being discharged, sues for a breach of the contract of hiring before the termination of the period covered thereby, he can recover damages, up to, but not after, the time of the trial; 139 Ill. 67; see 81 Fed. Rep. 284; and such recovery will be a bar to any subsequent action upon the same contract; 33 Mo. 212.

When a servant becomes disabled from performing the duties of his contract, such contract is dissolved and the master may discharge him; 13 Misc. Rep. 115; 29 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 522. An express agreement in the contract of employment that the work must be done to the satisfaction of the master, entitles him to discharge the servant for bad work at his discretion and constitutes the master the sole judge of the sufficiency or the quality of the work; 94 Mich. 496; 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1156; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 362; and the testimony of the master that he is dissatisfied is decisive against evidence that he should be satisfied; 29 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 219; but see 16 N. Y. Suppl. 853. The retention of the servant after his work becomes unsatisfactory is not a condonation and will not prevent a subsequent discharge for the same cause; 59 Ill. App. 226; and where such improperly performed services are accepted by the master as not in full compliance with the contract, but as the best he can get toward a performance, he may in a subsequent action by the employe for services recoup damages for breach of the contract; 21 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 430. The question whether such services are accepted as a full compliance with the contract is for the jury; id.; as is the question whether the discharge of the servant is for a reasonable cause; 42 Ill. App. 230. Where the servant was discharged for conduct which did not justify his dismissal, but there was other sufficient ground therefor, not known to the master at the time, it was held that the dismissal could be justified by proof of the after-discovered fact; 39 Ch. Div. 339.

Where the facts are undisputed, the right of the master to discharge his servant is a question of law; 83 Hun 168. A contract of employment for an indefinite period may be terminated by either party at any time; 23 N. Y. Suppl. 1009; 27 id. 351; but one employed for a definite period cannot be discharged through a mere caprice, but only on fair and reasonable grounds; 23 id. 119; 143 Pa. 408; 44 Ill. App. 359. Merely because business was dull was held not to be a just cause for dismissal when the services were properly performed; 18 N. Y. Suppl. 586; nor were slight deviations from the master's instructions in immaterial matters after the master had retained his servant for a considerable length of time thereafter without complaint; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 873; nor was the destruction by fire of the master's factory; 63 L. T. 756 Where a servant was illegally discharged and voluntarily sent in a written resignation which was accepted by his employer, it was held that he could not afterwards sue on the contract of service, even though his resignation were solely because of his illegal discharge; 53 N. J. L. 607. One cannot by a decree of court be compelled to retain another in his service; 62 Ill. App. 334; and equity will not compel a master to keep a servant in his employment who for any cause is not acceptable to him, nor will it compel employes to continue in the employment of their master; 24 U. S. App. 239.

When the employment contract requires notice before leaving, under penalty of forfeiture of wages, the return of the employe on the day following does not oblige the master to restore the employment and will not enable the servant to recover the forfeited wages; 18 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 262; and the master has been held entitled to substantial damages for a refusal of his servants to perform their duties under a contract providing for two weeks' notice on either side; 70 L. T. R. 116. By statute in many of the states it is enacted that where the contract of employment requires notice by the employe under penalty of forfeiture of wages, the employer shall be liable for a like amount for dismissal of the servant without the same notice, unless in case of a general suspension of labor in his shop or factory, and in Massachusetts by act of 1895 the latter clause has been stricken out of the law. See FORFEITURE; WAGES.

Where four partners agreed to employ the plaintiff as manager for a certain time and before the end of the period two of the partners retired and the other two were not willing to continue the employment, it was held that the dissolution of the partners amounted to a wrongful dismissal of the servant but that he was only entitled to nominal damages; [1895] 2 Q. B. 253.

In Minnesota and Wyoming a master may not require the surrender of any of the rights of citizenship of his servants, or discharge them because of their nomination for an election, or interfere in the matter of their nomination in any way; and in nearly all of the states it is a criminal offence for the master to threaten to discharge his servant, or to reduce his wages, or to promise to give him higher wages, or otherwise to attempt to influence a voter to give or withhold his vote. In Tennessee absence for voting is declared no violation of the employment contract for personal services, and every contract designed to keep employes from the polls is declared void; Stimson, Lab. L. 117 and statutes there cited.

The master is bound to provide necessaries for an infant servant unable to provide for himself; 2 Campb. 650; 1 Leach 137; 1 Bla. Com. 427, n.; but not to furnish him with medical attendance and medicines during the illness; 4 C. & P. 80; 7 Vt. 76.

The master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed by him in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved; L. R. 2 Ex. 259; 36 L. J. Ex. 147. Such liability springs out of the relation itself and does not depend on the stipulations of their contract. Within the scope of his authority, the servant may be said to be the medium through which the master acts; it follows, as a general rule, that for the tortious acts of the servant, the master is liable; 42 Ark. 453; 116 U. S. 624; 2 Wheat. 345; 11 Bush 465; 25 Ill. App. 521; 19 Wend. 345; 40 E. L. & Eq. 329; 26 Vt. 178; 155 Mass. 104; 75 Hun 68; 160 Pa. 300; 63 Conn. 155; 98 Mich. 1; although contrary to his express orders, if not done in wilful disobedience of those orders; 14 How. 468; 7 Cush. 385; 10 Ill. 509; 132 U. S. 518; see 65 Hun 619.

The reason for this rule has been ably expounded by Shaw, C. J., in the leading American case on this subject: "Every man, in the management of his own affairs, whether by himself or by his agents or servants, shall so conduct them as not to injure another; and if he does not, and another thereby sustains damage, he must answer for it." 4 Metc. 49; followed in 3 Macq. 316. But this case was decided on another point involving the question of the liability of a master for the negligence of a fellow servant, as to which see infra.

The master is not liable for acts committed out of the course of his employment; 20 Conn. 284; 17 Mass. 508; 156 id. 319; 69 Miss. 723; 37 W. Va. 606; 16 E. L. & Eq. 448; 63 Hun 8; nor for the wilful trespasses of his servants; 1 East 106; 24 Conn. 40; 1 Sm. Ind. 455; 2 Mich. 519; unless committed by his command or with his assent; 8 Ind. 312; 2 Stra. 885.

The master is bound to furnish suitable means and resources to accomplish the work; 73 Wis. 406; 126 Ind. 445; 79 Me. 404; 110 Mass. 240; 129 id. 268; 95 Pa. 211; 89 N. Y. 376; 31 Ohio St. 479; 72 N. Y. 607; 53 Tex. 206; 65 Mo. 225; 100 U. S. 213; 37 E. L. & Eq. 281; to exercise ordinary care to provide his servants a reasonably safe place for work; 35 Fed. Rep. 353; 81 id. 679; 31 Kan. 586; 68 Wis. 520; 84 Minn. 321; 60 Mich. 501; 143 Mass. 197; 48 N. Y. Supr. Ct. 156; 84 Wis. 418; to use ordinary care to keep machinery in a safe condition, and he is not relieved from that obligation by delegating the management of a machine to a servant; 146 Mass. 586. But it has been held that he is only bound to furnish means and resources which to his own knowledge are not defective; 16 C. B. N. S. 669; 33 L. J. C. P. 329; and that he is not bound to furnish the newest, safest, and best appliances for the use of his employes, nor is he an insurer of their safety; he may furnish such appliances as are ordinarily sufficient for the purpose intended, and such as can, with reasonable care, be used without danger; 79 Me. 404; 50 Conn. 433; 74 Ind. 440; 84 Mich. 289; 65 Cal. 96; 132 N. Y. 278; 92 Pa. 276; 171 id. 581; 109 Ill. 314; 136 Mass. 1. He is not liable for hidden defects of which he had no knowledge; 4 Ill. App. 533; nor for known defects, unless they are such as, by the exercise of due care, he might have known to be dangerous; 1 id. 510; and the mere fact of injury received by the servant raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the master; 36 W. Va. 232; see 113 Mo. 170; 69 Miss. 848; but it has been held that an employe has a right to suppose that his master has used reasonable care in guarding against defects in appliances furnished for his use; 88 W. Va. 546; and see 128 Pa. 294, where it was held that though better machinery existed, yet, if the machine by which the servant was injured was in general use and if reasonably safe when prudently used, the master was not liable; 92 id. 276. In order to hold an employer liable for injuries caused by the dangerous condition of a building, the servant must allege distinctly both that the master knew of the danger and the servant was ignorant of it; 13 Q. B. D. 259; 18 id. 685; 56 L. J. Q. B. 340. In an action by an employe for damages resulting from the negligence of his employer in furnishing defective appliances, it is no defence to show that he might have been injured in the same manner if the appliances had been in good condition; 48 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 681. If the servant knows that he is running a risk, through defective machinery or otherwise, he cannot recover for injuries; 39 Ill. App. 642; 58 id. 83, 250; 59 id. 260; 112 U. S. 377; 71 Fed. Rep. 143; 148 N. Y. 372, reversing 26 N. Y. S. 1010, Vann, J., dissenting; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 961; 34 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 872; 46 Neb. 556; 34 S. W. (Tex.) 298; 72 Fed. Rep. 250; 165 Mass. 267, 368; 164 id. 282; 91 Wis. 208; 65 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 667; 142 Ind. 596; 165 Mass. 233; 38 N. Y. Supp. 591; 74 Fed. Rep. 186; but see 21 Can. S. C. R. 581; 98 Ala. 578. An employe assumes the ordinary risks of his employment; 68 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1058; 89 Ga. 318; and also risks arising from unsafe premises which are known to him or apparent and obvious to persons of his experience and understanding if he voluntarily enters into the employment or after he enters makes no complaint or objection; 68 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1058. "The adult servant is presumed to possess ordinary intelligence, judgment, and discretion to appreciate such dangers incident to his employment as are open and obvious, and knowledge of them on his part will be presumed or imputed to him as matter of law; 88 Wis. 443; and the master is not bound to warn him of such danger;" 47 N. Y. S. 521.

This presumption is strengthened when the servant is also an expert in his employment; 76 Wis. 136, where the whole subject is considered and the authorities collected. An employe who under such circumstances is injured by reason of a defect in a tube easily discoverable, is guilty of contributory negligence; 88 id. 442; if he have a thorough knowledge of the risk and voluntarily undertakes it; 63 L. T. 287.

Where a person without fault is placed in a situation of danger, he is not to be held to the exercise of the same care and caution that prudent persons would exercise where no danger was present, nor is he guilty of contributory negligence because he fails to make the most judicious choice between hazards presented; the question is not what a careful person would do under ordinary circumstances, but what he might reasonably be expected to do in the presence of the peril, and is for the jury; 45 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 559; as is the question of contributory negligence and of whether one had assumed the risk who is injured whilst obeying the order of a foreman; 12 U. S. App. 534.

The mere knowledge and assent of an immediate superior, to a violation by an employe of a known rule of a company, will not as a matter of law relieve the employe from the consequences of such violation; 19 U. S. App. 586. See 63 Fed. Rep. 231; but one obeying orders of a superior does not assume the risk of the latter's negligence; 21 S. W. Rep. (Ala.) 440. If the servant, knowing a defect existed, gave notice to his employer of it, and was promised that it would be remedied, and continued his work in reliance on this promise, he is not, in law, guilty of contributory negligence; 100 U. S. 213; 17 Col. 280; 1 U. S. App. 96; 7 id. 359; 44 Ill. App. 466. See 135 U. S. 554; 55 Ark. 483.

Fellow Servant. The relation of the fellow servant has been defined thus: "Those who engage in the same common pursuit under the same general control." Cooley, Torts 541, n. 1. All who serve the same master; work under the same control; derive authority and compensation from the same common source; are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it. 32 Ind. 411; L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 326; 39 N. Y. 468; 2 Thomp. Negl. 1026. "All servants in the employ of the same master, subject to the same general control, paid from a common fund, and engaged in promoting or accomplishing the same common object." Beach, Contrib. Neg. 338. Those who have in view a general common object. L. R. 1 Q. B. 149, 155; 35 L. J. Q. B. 23. By the Texas act of 1893 the essential requirements are: 1, That they be engaged in the common service; 2, in the same grade of employment; 3, be working together at the same time and place; 4, be working for a common purpose.

Where a master uses due diligence in the selection of competent and trusty servants, and furnishes them with suitable means to perform the service in which he employs them, he is not answerable to one of them for an injury received by him in consequence of the carelessness of another while both are engaged in the same service; 4 Metc. 49; 3 M. & W. 1; 100 U. S. 213; 154 Pa. 130; 88 N. Y. 146; 46 N. Y. Supp. 137; 59 Fed. Rep. 626; 84 Ky. 79; 56 Ga. 645; 27 W. Va. 145; 59 Tex. 334; 68 Cal. 225; 46 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 624; 3 Col. 499. The reasons for the rule have been thus stated: "In considering the rights and obligations arising out of particular relations, it is competent for courts of justice to regard considerations of policy and general convenience, and to draw from them such rules as will, in their practical application, best promote the safety and security of all parties concerned. Where several persons are employed in the conduct of one common enterprise or undertaking, and the safety of each depends to a great extent on the care and skill with which each other shall perform his appropriate duty, each is generally an observer of the conduct of the others, can give notice of any misconduct, incapacity, or neglect of duty, and leave the service if the common employer will not take such precautions and employ such agents as the safety of the whole party may require. By these means the safety of each will be more effectually secured than could be done by a resort to the common employer for indemnity in case of loss by the negligence of each other." 4 Metc. 49. The rule does not extend to the exemption of the servants from liability to a fellow servant for his negligence; 22 Minn. 185; 58 Ind. 121; 130 Mass. 102; 11 Ex. 832; L. R. 3 Exch. D. 341. See 112 U. S. 377, for a review of the origin of the doctrine as to fellow servants.

If the master is negligent, the concurring negligence of a fellow servant is no defence; 40 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1060. Where the employer knew, or ought to have known, that a servant was incompetent, the former is liable to a fellow servant for the negligence of the incompetent servant; 181 Pa. 497.

Vice Principal. If the master entrusts the entire supervision of his business, or of a distinct department, to his employe, such an employe may be termed a general vice principal, for whose negligence the master is liable; but if he entrusts only the discharge of his absolute personal duties, such as to employ competent co-workers, to an employe, the latter may be termed a special vice principal, for whose negligence only in the discharge of these absolute personal duties the master becomes liable; 19 U. S. App. 245.

The "shift boss" in a mine whose business it is to direct miners where to work, when performing that duty, acts in the capacity of master or vice principal and if he knows of a concealed danger, such as an unexploded blast, at the place where he sets a miner to work, of the existence of which the latter is ignorant and unable with ordinary care to ascertain and does not inform him thereof, the master is liable; 95 Wis. 308.

The test in determining what is a vice principal seems to be not from the grade or rank of the service, but from the character of the act performed; 53 N. Y. 549; 110 Mass. 240; McKenney, Fellow Serv. § 23. It has been held by some courts that a servant who is a vice principal, or who acts in the place of the master, is not a fellow servant with those beneath him, or, in other words, that the master is responsible to inferior servants for the act of their superiors; 19 U. S. App. 245; 88 Mo. 360; 85 Tenn. 227; 84 N. C. 309; 36 Ohio St. 221; 3 id. 201; 78 Va. 745; 69 Ga. 137; 44 Ia. 134; 108 Ill. 288; 9 Bush 81; 93 Ill. 302; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 168; 19 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 652; 59 Fed. Rep. 394; 65 Vt. 553; 6 C. C. App. 205, 636; 100 U. S. 214; 112 id. 377; 48 Fed. Rep. 62; 51 id. 182. On the other hand this broad doctrine has been denied in some jurisdictions; 98 N. Y. 511; 78 Me. 217; 96 Pa. 246; 112 id. 72; 129 Mass. 268; 48 Kan. 120; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 326; L. R. 10 Q. B. 62; 20 Md. 212; 98 Ind. 282; 42 Mich. 34; 32 Minn. 54; 51 Cal. 255. Another rule, established in some jurisdictions, is that in any extensive business, divided into distinct departments, a laborer in one department is not a fellow servant with a laborer in another and separate department; 30 Ga. 150; 9 Heisk. 37; 77 Ill. 391. And this rule has also been denied by some courts, except in cases where the master has surrendered the oversight of the department and put it in the hands of an agent; 67 Tex. 597; 129 Mass. 268; 112 Pa. 400; 65 Md. 438; 42 Mich. 34; 14 Minn. 360.

The rule as to fellow servants depends on the law of the place where the accident occurs; 79 Fed. Rep. 934; 82 id. 893; 41 id. 667; but see 51 id. 182. The decisions on the whole subject are said to be in inextricable confusion; 30 Am. L. Rev. 840.

Who are fellow servants. The following are held to be fellow servants: Baggage master and switch tender; 33 Minn. 218; boatswain and stevedore; 30 Fed. Rep. 878; brakeman and car inspector; 46 Ark. 555; brakeman and conductor taking engineer's place on a locomotive; 55 Mich. 57; laborer in a tunnel and an employe who provided him with tools; 39 N. J. L. 117; brakeman and fireman; 49 Mich. 497; director of brakeman and brakeman; 71 Mo. 164; brakeman and station master; 119 Mass. 419; brakeman and station agent; 69 Wis. 188; fireman and switch tender; 88 N. Y. 481; brakeman and train despatcher; 78 Ind. 77, brakeman and conductor; 136 Mass. 1 (contra, 71 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 776); 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 70; mate and common sailor; 17 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 517; captain and the crew; [1892] 1 Q. B. 58; snow shoveller and conductor; 54 Wis. 226; tunnel repairer and trainman; 103 Ind. 305; agent and manager of express company and an ordinary employe; 55 Wis. 453; mine boss and a driver boy; 112 Pa. 567; mine boss and miner; id. 72; runner of an hoisting engine and men in shaft; 14 Fed. Rep. 833; engineer and brakeman; 15 Lea 145; brakeman on a regular train and the conductor on a wild train; 167 U. S. 48; a winchman and a man working in the hold of a vessel; 79 Fed. Rep. 972; conductor and engineer of a railroad train and an employe of the same company riding on a hand car; 80 id. 260; conductor and train hand; 27 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 278; a section hand unloading ties from a train and a section foreman temporarily in charge of a train; 71 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 464; gang boss on a railroad and those employed under him; 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843 (reversing 51 Fed. Rep. 182, Fuller, C. J., and Field and Harlan, JJ., dissenting); a motorman and a track repairer; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1006; motor man and track foreman; 26 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 923; an engineer and a switchman; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 564; though employed and discharged by different superiors; id.

Where a mining corporation is under the control of a manager, and is divided into three departments, each with a superintendent under the general manager, and in one of the departments there are several gangs of workmen, the foreman of one of these gangs, whether he has or has not authority to engage and discharge the men under him, is a fellow servant with them; 168 U. S. 86.

The following have been held not to be fellow servants: Wheel-inspector and baggage man and train hands; 34 Fed. Rep. 616; engineer and boiler repairer; 109 Pa. 296; brakeman and road master; 31 Kan. 197; brakeman and track repairer; 4 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 339; captain and sailor; 47 Wis. 602; pilot and servants on a vessel; 10 Q. B. 125; mate and deck hand; 18 Fed. Rep. 625; pilot and deck hand; 23 id. 413; mining captain and laborer; 50 Mich. 179; superintendent and employe; 57 Cal. 20; general manager and train despatcher and brakeman; 23 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 453; train despatcher and conductor; 8 id. 162; a floor man in charge of work and a man working under him; 45 N. Y. Supp. 234; a conductor and train hand; 7 Ohio Dec. 206; an engineer and a porter; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 199; engineer and brakeman; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 70; the foreman of a section crew and an engineer of a train not connected with the work of the section men; 67 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 447; the trainmen of a railroad company and the employes of another company over whose road the train is run; 32 N. Y. Supp. 627; the conductor of a train and trainmen; 112 U. S. 377; conductor and engineer; id., Bradley, Matthews, Gray, and Blatchford, JJ., dissenting.

The sending of one's servant to work for another and to be under the immediate control of the latter's foreman, does not thereby make him a fellow servant of the other employes, and he can have no recovery for injuries occasioned by their negligence; 44 N. Y. Supp. 234.

See 30 Am. L. Rev. 840; 2 Harv. L. Rev. 212; 40 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 766.

The English "Employers Liability Act" of 1880 has been a model for many similar acts in America, and is as follows:

"Where, after the commencement of this act, personal injury is caused to a workman—

(1) By reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant, connected with or used in the business of the employer; or (2) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence; or (3) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed; or (4) By reason of the act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to the rules or by-laws of the employer, or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf; or (5) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, points, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway, the workman, or in case the injury results in his death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman, or in the service of the employer, or engaged in his work."

The statutes passed in many of the states are usually not so sweeping as the English Act. Such acts are now in force in Alabama, Arkansas, California, the Dakotas, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Rhode Island, Texas, Wisconsin, Wyoming. There are also provisions to the same effect in the Constitutions of Mississippi and South Carolina.

The Prussian law up to June, 1881, recognized the doctrine of the non-liability of the employer, but the commercial code has made the employer liable in case of carriage by land or water. As to the liability of the master on the continent of Europe, generally, see 9 Jurid. Rev. 249.

MASTER IN CHANCERY. An officer of a court of chancery, who acts as an assistant to the chancellor. 3 Edw. Ch. 458; 19 Ill. 131.

A master in chancery is an officer appointed by a court to assist it in various proceedings incidental to the progress of the case before it, and is usually employed to take and state accounts, to take and report testimony, and to perform such duties as require computation of interest, the value of annuities, the amount of damages in particular cases, the auditing and ascertaining of liens upon property involved, and similar services. The information which he may communicate by his findings in such cases, upon the evidence presented to him, is merely advisory to the court, which it may accept and act upon, or disregard in whole or in part, according to its own judgment as to the weight of the evidence; 104 U. S. 420.

The masters were originally clerks associated with the chancellor, to discharge some of the more mechanical duties of his office. They were called preceptores, and gradually increased in number until there were twelve of them. They obtained the title of masters in the reign of Edw. III. Their office was mainly judicial in its character, but sometimes included ministerial offices. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 360–367; 1 Harr. Ch. 436; 1 Bail. Ch. 77; 1 Des. Ch. 587. The office was abolished in England by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80. In the United States, officers of this name exist in many of the states, with similar powers to those exercised by the English masters, but variously modified, restricted, and enlarged by statute, and in some of the states similar officers are called commissioners and by other titles.

The master's office is a branch of the court and he has power to control the proceedings of parties before him; 3 Edw. Ch. 458.

It is not within the general province of a master to pass upon all the issues in an equity case, nor is it competent for the court to refer the entire decision of a case to him without the consent of the parties. It cannot, of its own motion, or upon the request of one party, abdicate its duty to determine by its own judgment the controversy presented, and devolve that duty upon any of its officers; Field, J., in 129 U. S. 524. But when the parties consent to the reference of a case to a master to hear and decide all the issues therein and such reference is entered as a rule of the court, the determinations of the master are not subject to be set aside and disregarded at the mere discretion of the court. A reference by consent of parties of an entire case, though not strictly a submission of the controversy to arbitration—a proceeding which is governed by special rule—is a submission of the controversy to a tribunal of the parties' own selection, to be governed in its conduct by the rules applicable to the administration of justice in tribunals established by law. Its findings, like those of an independent tribunal, are to be taken as presumptively correct, to be reviewed under the reservation contained in the consent and order of the court, when there has been manifest error in the consideration given to the evidence, or in the application of the law, but not otherwise; id.

The reference of a whole case to a master has become in late years a matter of more common occurrence than formerly, though it has always been within the power of a court of chancery, with the consent of both parties, to order such a reference. The power is incident to all courts of superior jurisdiction, and is covered in most of the states by statutes; 129 U. S. 525, followed in 144 U. S. 585; 145 U. S. 132; 155 U. S. 637. See 97 U. S. 581.

In most jurisdictions, where an action is properly in equity, the court has a right to refer it to a master, without consent of parties; 25 Ia. 280; and such was the regular practice in Pennsylvania until recent rules, made by the supreme court, required equity cases to be tried by the judges in open court on viva voce testimony.

The duties of the masters are, generally; first, to take accounts and make computations; 18 How. 295; 2 Munf. 129; 14 Vt. 501; Walk. Ch. 532; second, to make inquiries and report facts; 3 W. & M. 258; 3 Paige 305; 23 Conn. 529; 1 Stockt. Ch. 309; 2 Jones, Eq. 238; 5 Gray 423; 5 Cal. 90; third, to perform some special ministerial acts directed by the court, such as the sale of property; 11 Humphr. 278; 25 Barb. 440; settlement of deeds; see 1 Cow. 711; appointment of new trustees, and the like; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 468; fourth, to discharge such duties as are specially charged upon them by statute.

In the federal courts the judges are prohibited by statute from appointing as masters any relation within the degree of first cousin; 1 Fed. Rep. 91; or except when special reasons exist therefor, a clerk of a federal court; 20 Stat. L. ch. 415; but consent of parties is held to be sufficient special reason; 3 Cliff. 146; 1 Fed. Rep. 91; Rule 75.

Cases in which reference to the master should be ordered are: Where inquiries as to compensation or damages do not involve such complexity of facts or amounts as to require an issue; 17 Ala. 295; to ascertain what are "usual covenants" according to local usages; 17 N. J. Eq. 216; where plaintiff in a bill for specific performance, shows his right to a conveyance, but the defendant by sale or otherwise, has put it out of his power to convey; 1 Cow. 711; to settle the account in cases involving mixed questions of law and fact; 1 Hall 560; to inquire into the true value of the property at the time of sale, where an application was to reform a deed made by trustees in relation to trust property where the rights of infants were concerned; 18 How. Pr. 512; to ascertain the damages suffered by defendant by reason of an injunction, where the plaintiff failed to maintain his cause or discontinued it; 19 How. Pr. 413; to ascertain whether property given to a child on marriage was intended as an advancement in marriage, or as payment of a legacy; 2 M'Cord, Ch. 268; to ascertain the intention of the parties where the main issue was a latent ambiguity in a lease of coal lands, and a decree was reversed after but little inquiry below upon this point; 18 Gratt. 304. Where a controversy in equity turns upon facts and involves a variety of circumstances, it should be referred to a master to sift the testimony and collate and report the facts; 58 Pa. 186; and a court of chancery ought not to decide upon accounts mutually existing and controverted between the parties without reference to a master; 1 Hen. & M. 543.

A court of chancery may direct the reference of a case to the master with authority to examine the defendant on oath, and such an examination will have the effect of an answer; 3 Rand. 434.

Cases which should not be referred to a master are: Where, on the settlement of a long account between the parties, the court has facts enough before it to strike the true balance, and both parties do not agree to or ask for reference; 3 Woodb. & M. 277; where the evidence is all written, and a decree can be rendered without difficulty; 9 Port. 79; where it was sought to charge the heirs with a debt of their father, and it was necessary to decide whether the heirs had received assets; 18 Ark. 118; to ascertain the amount due on a promissory note; 3 Ill. 545; where the issue is distinctly raised by the pleadings and testimony taken; 1 Hoffm. Ch. 312; on a bill for a specific performance of a contract of sale where the nature of the title distinctly appears; 4 Dessaus. 536.

Orders of reference to a master should specify the principles on which the accounts are to be taken, or the inquiry proceeds, so far as the court shall have decided thereon; and the examinations before the master should be limited to such matters within the order as the principles of the decree or order shall render necessary; 2 Johns. Ch. 495. In an order of reference to a master, the defendant may be directed to produce before the master "all books, papers and writings, in his custody or power," and may be examined on oath upon such interrogatories as the master may direct, relative to the subject-matters of the reference; 2 Johns. Ch. 513. Where upon an order to deliver over books, papers, etc., the court intends to permit it to be done upon his own ex parte affidavit merely, he is directed, generally, "to produce and deliver the same on oath," but when the party is directed to produce and deliver them on oath "before a master" or "under the direction of a master," it is that all parties interested may examine as to the full and fair compliance with the order; 2 Paige 432. And the master should, in such a case, afford reasonable time for such examination to be made, and interrogatories to the party to be framed; id. Where an order of reference to make preliminary inquiries preparatory to a hearing upon the merits is not an order of course, under some rule of court, and is not assented to by all parties interested, such order can be obtained only by special application to the court upon due notice to all parties who have appeared and have an interest in the subject-matter; 6 Paige 178.

Where a case has been referred to a master, the consent of parties will not confer upon him authority to examine into a matter not charged in the bill; 2 Stor. 243; and if he report as to a matter not referred to him the report quoad hoc is a nullity; 5 Fla. 478.

It is his duty to report the facts, and not the mere evidence of facts, it being the province of the court to apply the law to the facts found and not to draw inferences of facts from the evidence; 26 Conn. 264. A master appointed to report the sum due on a mortgage is not authorized to decide on the title; 36 Me. 115.

A report of a master on facts submitted to him will be presumed to be true, and will not be reconsidered or set aside for an alleged mistake or abuse of authority, unless it is clearly shown and the correction is required in equity; 36 Me. 115.

It is improper for a master to perform any official act, as master, in a cause in which he is solicitor or a partner of the solicitor; Walk. Ch. Cas. 453. Where a question before the master is as to the value of certain property, he should form an independent judgment of his own, and the method of taking an average of estimates as a conclusion is tolerated only from necessity; 2 Jones, Eq. 238.

A master cannot reopen a cause for further testimony after the closing of the proofs and the submission of his draft report to the parties, without special order from the court, which will be granted only on the ground of surprise, and under the same circumstances that would induce the court to make such an order before the hearing; 7 R. I. 81. Where a master has reported back a case in which he was ordered to take testimony, it is res adjudicata and the case will not be recommitted unless specific errors can be designated; 3 Woodb. & M. 157.

After the report is prepared, it is proper for the master to hear exceptions and correct his report, or if he disallows them, to report them to the court with the evidence; 12 Ill. 277; but he need not report all the testimony where the decretal order under which he acts does not require it; 52 Me. 132, 147. As to reporting evidence, see 6 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 372.

A matter may be referred to a master and his report received and confirmed all at the same term of the court; 8 Ala. 83; but the general practice is to permit the report to lie over to the term following on motion of either party; 1 Brock. 529.

A court of equity is not bound by the report of a master, but may confirm, modify, or reject it, as the issues in the suit must be decided by the court itself; 19 U. S. App. 477; but this finding both of fact and of law will be presumed to be correct; 155 U. S. 631; and will stand unless there is some obvious error in the application of the law or serious mistake in the consideration of the evidence; 144 U. S. 585; id. 104; 36 W. Va. 454. See 151 U. S. 285.

In practice it is not usual for the court to reject the report of a master, with his findings upon the matter referred to him, unless exceptions are taken to them and brought to its attention, and, upon examination, the findings are found unsupported or defective in some essential particular; 128 U. S. 617.

The court will not interfere with a report of a master upon a question of fact depending upon the credibility of witnesses, unless an error is clearly made to appear; 9 N. J. Eq. 309, 659; the report has not the position of a verdict on a motion for a new trial at law, but on exceptions on a question of fact it is only necessary to review and weigh the evidence; 18 N. J. Eq. 144; and it will not be overruled because the evidence is vague and conflicting, unless the conclusion is unwarranted by the evidence; id. The theory that it stands as a verdict obtains only when the findings are deductions from incorporated facts; 152 Pa. 42.

As to sales by masters, see 7 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 63, note.

As to when a decree founded on a master's report will be opened, see 4 Edw. Ch. 249; 6 Allen 457; and when reviewed, 6 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 527, note.

MASTER OF A SHIP. In Maritime

Law. The commander or first officer of a merchant-ship; a captain.

Under the English Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the term master includes "every person (except a pilot) having command or charge of any ship."

A distinction is noted between the two-fold duties and functions of the master, those in which as shipmaster he is entrusted with the management and navigation of the ship, either as the co-partner of the owners or their confidential agent; Maclachlan, Merch. Ship. 134-186; and those in which as master mariner he is the officer in command on board; id. 203, 215.

The master of an American ship must be a citizen of the United States; 1 Stat. L. 287; and a similar requirement exists in most maritime states. In some countries their qualifications in point of skill and experience must be attested by examination by proper authorities. This is provided for in England under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, but in the United States the civil responsibility of the owners for their acts is deemed sufficient, although a license is required for the master of a steam vessel; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 438.

A vessel sailing without a competent master is deemed unseaworthy, and the owners are liable for any loss of cargo which may occur, but cannot recover on a policy of insurance in case of disaster; 21 How. 7, 23; 6 Cow. 270; 12 Johns. 128, 136; 21 N. Y. 378; Desty, Sh. & Adm. § 232. One to whom the navigation, discipline, and control of a vessel is entrusted, must be considered as master, although another is registered as such; 59 Fed. Rep. 630. The owner of one half the legal title of a steamboat, who is the master in possession, and who is by written agreement entitled to such possession as master, is not liable to removal from his position as master; 135 U. S. 599.

The master is selected by the owners and is their confidential agent; 1 Wheat. 96; in case of his death or disability during the voyage, the mate succeeds; if he also dies in a foreign country, the consignee of the vessel, or the consul of the nation, may, in a case of necessity and in the absence of other authority, appoint a master; 49 Fed. Rep. 463. The master himself may, in similar circumstances of necessity and distance from the owners, appoint a substitute; 1 Pars. Mar. Law 387; 2 Sumn. 206; 13 Pet. 387. See 34 Barb. 419. During a temporary absence of the master, the mate succeeds; 2 Sumn. 588.

He must, at the commencement of the voyage, see that his ship is seaworthy and fully provided with the necessary ship's papers, and with all the necessary and customary requisites for navigation, as well as with a proper supply of provisions, stores, etc.; Bee 80; 2 Paine 291; 1 Pet. Adm. 219; Ware 454; for the voyage; 1 Pet. Adm. 407; 1 W. & M. 338. He must also make a contract with the seamen, if the voyage be a foreign one from the United States; 1 U. S. Stat. at L. 131; 2 id. 203. He must store safely under deck all goods shipped on board, unless by well-established custom or by express contract they are to be carried on deck; and he must stow them in the accustomed manner in order to prevent liability in case of damage. In respect to the lading or carriage of goods shipped as freight, he is required to use the greatest diligence; and his responsibility attaches from the moment of their receipt, whether on board, in his boat, or at the quay or beach; 3 Kent 206; Abb. Shipp. 423. He should acquaint himself with the laws of the country with which he is trading; 22 How. 491.

He must proceed on the voyage in which his vessel may be engaged by direction of the owners, must obey faithfully his instructions, and by all legal means promote the interest of the owners of the ship and cargo; 3 Cra. 242. On his arrival at a foreign port, he must at once deposit, with the United States consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, his ship's papers, which are returned to him when he receives his clearance; U. S. R. S. § 4309. This does not apply, however, to those vessels merely touching for advice; 9 How. 372. He must govern his crew and prevent improper exercise of authority by his subordinates; 2 Sumn. 1, 584; 14 Johns. 19. He must take all possible care of the cargo during the voyage, and, in case of stranding, shipwreck, or other disaster, must do all lawful acts which the safety of the ship and the interest of the owners of the ship and cargo require; Fland. Shipp. 190; 19 How. 150; 13 Pet. 387. It is proper, but not indispensable, in case of an accident, to note a protest thereof at the first port afterwards reached; 6 McLean 76; and to give information to the owners of the loss of the vessel as soon as he reasonably can; 4 Mas. 74. After stranding he must take all possible care of the cargo; 9 Wall. 682. In a port of refuge, he is not authorized to sell the cargo as damaged unless necessity be shown; but where it is so much injured as to endanger the ship, or will become utterly worthless, it is his duty to sell it at the place where the necessity arises; 1 Blatch. 357; 1 Story 342. When possible, he is bound to notify the owners before selling; 30 Me. 302; but he cannot sell after the completion of the voyage, when the owners of the cargo can be communicated with or readily reached: 38 Fed. Rep. 330. He may contract for definite salvage in case of emergency; 48 Fed. Rep. 925. And under certain circumstances he may even sell the vessel where she is in danger of destruction; 37 Fed. Rep. 371; but vessel and cargo can only be sold in case of urgent necessity; 13 Moo. P. C. 144; L. R. 6 C. P. 319. He should consult the owners if possible; failing that he should consult disinterested persons of skill and experience whose advice to sell would be strong evidence in justification of a sale; 6 Hall 27. While the master of a stranded vessel may, in case of urgent necessity, throw overboard or otherwise sacrifice his cargo to obtain the release of his vessel, he has no right to give it away; if he does, the donee takes no title to the property, but is liable therefor as bailee, and is bound to surrender it upon demand; 44 Fed. Rep. 431.

In time of war, he must avoid acts which will expose his vessel and cargo to seizure and confiscation, and must do all acts required for the safety of the vessel and cargo and the interests of their owners. In case of capture, he is bound to remain by the vessel until condemnation, or until recovery is hopeless; 3 Mas. 161. He must bring home from foreign ports destitute seamen; Act of Congr. Feb. 28, 1803, § 4; R. S. § 4578; and must retain from the wages of his crew hospital-money; Act of Congr. Mar. 3, 1875; R. S. § 4585. He is personally liable to seamen for their wages; 123 Mass. 125.

He is liable to the owners, and he and they to all others whose interests are affected by his acts, for want of reasonable skill, care, or prudence in the navigation or management of the vessel; 1 Wash. C. C. 142; including injuries done to the cargo by the crew; 1 Mas. 104; and this rule includes the improper discharge of a seamau; Ware 65.

His authority on shipboard is very great; Ware 506; but is of a civil character. He has a right to control and direct the efforts of the crew, and to use such force as may be necessary to enforce obedience to his lawful commands. He may even take life, if necessary, to suppress a mutiny. He may degrade officers: 1 Blatchf. & H. 195, 366; 1 Pet. Adm. 244; 4 Wash. C. C. 338; 2 C. Rob. 261. He may punish acts of insolence, disobedience, and insubordination, and such other offences, when he is required to do so for the safety and discipline of the ship. Flogging is, however, prohibited on merchant vessels; R.S. § 4611; and for any unreasonable, arbitrary, or brutal exercise of authority towards a seaman or passenger he is liable, criminally and in a civil suit; 4 U. S. Stat. L. 776, 1235. In all cases which will admit of the proper delay for inquiry, due inquiry should precede the act of punishment; 1 Hagg. 274, per Lord Stowell. He has a right to exact from his officers and crew not only a strict observance of all his lawful orders, but also a respectful demeanor towards himself; 22 Fed. Rep. 927. He may also restrain or even confine a passenger who refuses to submit to the necessary discipline of the ship; 3 Mas. 242; but, without conferring with the officers and entering the facts in the log-book, he can inflict no higher punishment on a passenger than a reprimand; 7 Pa. L. J. 77; 6 C. & P. 472; 1 Conkl. Adm. 430; 14 Johns. 119; Desty, Adm. § 129.

If the master has not funds for the necessary supplies, repairs, and uses of his ship when abroad, he may borrow money for that purpose on the credit of his owners; 3 Wash. C. C. 484; and if it cannot be procured on his and their personal credit, he may take up money on bottomry, or in extreme cases may pledge his cargo; 3 Mas. 255. His authority to act as the owner's agent is based on necessity and ceases when the latter is within reach of instructions; [1893] A. C. 38; 67 Mich. 264. He cannot bind owners to pay for repairs done at the home port without special authority; 47 Me. 254; 19 How. 22; nor when they or their agents are so near that communication can be had with them without delay; 31 Conn. 51; Abb. Shipp. 162; 3 Kent 49. The extent of his contracts must be confined to the necessities of the case; 38 Fed. Rep. 447. He has no authority to execute bottomry or any express hypothecation of the ship for differences in freights in favor of the charterer, or for his advances of charter money; 37 id. 436; 36 id. 919. See BOTTOMRY; RESPONDENTIA.

Generally, when contracting within the ordinary scope of his powers and duties, he is personally responsible, as well as his owners, when they are personally liable. On bottomry loans, however, there is ordinarily no personal liability in this country or in England, beyond the funds which comes to the hands of the master or owners from the subject of the pledge; 6 Ben. 1; Abb. Sh. 90; Story, Ag. §§ 116, 123, 294. See 37 Fed. Rep. 436.

In most cases, too, the ship is bound for the performance of the master's contract; Ware 322; but all contracts of the master in chartering or freighting his vessel do not give such a lien; 19 How. 82.

Where the master of a ship is without fault during a period of detention resulting from seizure of the ship by legal process against the owner, he is entitled to wages on the terms of his contract, unless it stipulate to the contrary; 89 Ga. 660.

MASTER OF THE CROWN OFFICE. The queen's coroner and attorney in the criminal department of the court of queen's bench, who prosecutes at the relation of some private person or common informer, the crown being the nominal prosecutor. Stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20; Whart. Dict.

MASTER OF THE FACULTIES. An officer under the archbishop, who grants licenses, dispensations, etc. See COURT OF ARCHES.

MASTER OF THE HORSE. The third great officer of the royal household of England. He has the privilege of making use of any horses, footmen, or pages belonging to the royal stables.

MASTER OF THE MINT. In English Law. An officer who superintends everything belonging to the mint.

MASTER OF THE ORDNANCE. An officer, in England, to whose care all the royal ordnance and artillery were committed.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS. In English Law. An officer of chancery, who has the keeping of the rolls and grants which pass the great seal and the records of the chancery. He formerly exercised extensive judicial functions in a court ranking next to that of the lord chancellor.

An officer with this title existed in the time of the Conqueror. He had from most ancient times an office in chancery, with distinct clerks. In early times no judicial authority was conferred by an appointment as master of the rolls. In the reigns of Hen. VI. and Edw. IV. he was found sitting in a judicial capacity, and from 1623 to 1873, had the regulation of some branches of the business of the court. He was the chief of the masters in chancery; and his judicial functions, except those specially conferred by commission, appear to have properly belonged to him in this character. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 100, 357.

All orders and decrees made by him, except those appropriate to the great seal alone, were valid, unless discharged or altered by the lord chancellor; but had to be signed by him before enrolment; and he was especially directed to hear motions, pleas, demurrers, and the like. Stat. 3 Geo. II. c. 30; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 94; 3 Bla. Com. 442.
