PREFACE.

The purpose of this dictionary is to present, within one volume of convenient size, every legal definition or other appropriate matter which is requisite to any probable need of the student or the practitioner. It is believed that, on the one hand, both convenience and economy require that a work designed to be primarily a dictionary of the law should not exceed a single volume. On the other hand, no law dictionary is complete if it fails to define every word or phrase, ancient or modern, which the searcher may reasonably expect to find therein. Moreover, while a mere general definition is ordinarily sufficient as to foreign and obsolete terms, yet in respect to those terms of jurisprudence which in themselves describe recognized topics of the law, or are of present interest, or are in a formative state, a bare definition is of no particular value.

These topical terms the authors have endeavored to treat encyclopedically, avoiding the comprehensiveness of a treatise or commentary, but exhibiting all the elements of a subject in a complete and logical manner. They realize that only by those having legislative authority can definitions of such terms be framed which will be in every particular correct, and, like all writers dealing with modern law, they can do no more than present the result of a critical examination of the adjudged cases. In addition to this, it has been the aim to make the work exhaustive as a glossary, covering all matters within the research, not only of the practitioner and the student of the law, but of the lay student of ancient laws and history. The principal terms of the Saxon, Norman, and Old Scotch law, and of International and Feudal law, with many titles from other foreign systems, and the great variety of entire and fragmentary phrases in various languages to be met with in old law books and records, are defined and explained. Particular attention has been given to the Civil Law, long explanatory articles being devoted to the more important Roman customs and institutions.

There has been considerable discussion in the past as to the propriety of including in a law dictionary terms and phrases no longer in current use. To the authors it seems that a dictionary which does not include such terms fulfills but a small part of its essential purpose. The law of the present day is rooted in the antiquities of the English common law, and that, in its turn, is inextricably interwoven with the law of the civilians. No questi of law can be exhaustively investigated without bringing the searcher contact with a multitude of legal terms and phrases now regarded as solete. The authors are unwilling to believe that the modern tendency towa codification and superficial case-learning has progressed so far that there no longer a demand for the definitions and explanations which will enal the student to trace the doctrines of the law to their head-waters, and t practitioner to investigate particular questions with equal thoroughness.

A considerable collection of the terms of Spanish law has been inserte in the belief that the annexation and close political relation to the Unit States of countries lately under Spanish rule will make a definition of su terms desirable to the practitioner.

The collection of maxims of the law is believed to be the most comple ever given in a single work. These maxims are placed throughout the book their proper alphabetical order.

While it has been the effort to make the treatment as nearly exhausti as possible within the realm of the terms of jurisprudence, this very exhau tiveness precludes any excursion beyond the scope of a law dictionary prope The so-called "adjudged words and phrases," that is to say, the judicial i terpretation of words having no distinctive legal meaning, but interprete solely in the light of their context or use in particular connections, have bee omitted, as have the ordinary terms of our language having no technical si nificance. The technical terms of commerce and of the stock exchange for a well-defined exception, and it is thought that the collection of these is tl most extensive ever attempted in a work of this character.

The known and settled habits of the profession in associating particula principles with certain terms have been regarded, and therefore the definitio have, wherever practicable, been given under the specific words deemed mo likely to suggest themselves to the searcher, instead of being grouped unde some broad generic head. In the interest of space, some few exceptions t this rule have been made: (1) Where a word has several forms, it is d fined under that best known or most correct, and from the others a cross-refe ence made to such definition. (2) Where the treatment of a general hea necessarily includes the statement and definition of a number of terms in cluded therein as elements or classes, cross-references are usually made to suc general head for such definition, though in many cases a brief definition i given under the specific title, and a reference to the general title for furthe discussion.

As to the sources from which the matter herein contained was obtained the basis of the work was the edition of 1867 of Bouvier's Law Diction ary, the original work of Mr. Bouvier, so far as it was consistent wit the scope of the present dictionary, being so far classic as to be incapable o improvement, and presenting an element of authority which no new produc tion could assume. To this, however, matter was added, more than doublin the number of terms defined, and developing, in the light of modern author ties, the discussion and definition of modern terms, which have been largely reformulated by the authors. The English dictionaries of Sweet, Wharton, and Stroud have been principally resorted to for the explanation of distinctively English terms and institutions, while for the terms of ancient law, free use has been made of the dictionaries of Cowell, Spelman, and Jacob, and the treatises of Bracton, Britton, Viner, Coke, Littleton, Bacon, Blackstone, Chitty, Stephen, and Maine, as well as the American classics of Story, Greenleaf, and Kent.

The terms of the civil law are mainly derived from the Novels, Digest, Institutes, and Code of Justinian, the Lexicon of Calvin, and the treatises of Mackeldey, Heineccius, and Pothier. The scholarly work of Mr. Burrill has been of great assistance. In formulating the definitions of modern terms, reference has always been had to the standard text books dealing with the subject, and the number of these is too great for enumeration, due credit being given in the body of the work for all definitions derived from such sources.

The more modern dictionaries of Anderson, Abbott, Black, and Rapalje & Lawrence have been used for reference and comparison.

The materials collected would have made two volumes of the size of the present work, but by diligent revision and condensation, it is believed that all that was useful and within its scope has been preserved.

A

——In Latin Phrases. A preposition, denoting from, by, in, on, of, at.

——In French Phrases. A preposition, denoting of, at, to, for, in, with.

——In Citation of Reported Decisions. Used for adversus (versus) in some law reports. See Abb. Prac. (N. Y.; O. S.)

——In Roman Criminal Law. The judges were furnished with small tables covered with wax, and each one inscribed on it the initial letter of his vote,—"A." (the initial letter of absolvo) when he voted to absolve the party on trial; "C." (the initial letter of condemno) when he was for condemnation; and "N. L." (the initial letters of non liquet) when the matter did not appear clearly, and he desired a new argument.

——In Roman Elections. It was used in elections as the initial letter of antiquo (for the old law), being a vote against the proposed law; an affirmative vote being indicated by "U. R." (ut rogas, as you propose).

——Among the Puritans. An "A" of red cloth was hung upon the dress of a convicted adulteress.

A CANCELLIS (Law Lat.) A chancellor. See "Chancellor."

A COELO USQUE AD CENTRUM (Lat.) From the heavens to the center of the earth.

A COMMUNI OBSERVANTIA NON EST recedendum. There should be no departure from common observance (or usage). Co. Litt. 186; Wingate, Max. 203; 2 Coke, 74.

A CONSILIIS (Lat. consilium, advice). A counsellor. The term is used in the civil law by some writers instead of a responsis. Spelman, voc. "Apocrisiarius."

A DATU, or A DATO (Law Lat.) From the date. 2 Salk. 413; Cro. Jac. 135.

——A Die Datus. From the day of the date. 2 Salk. 413; 2 Crabb, Real Prop. p. 248, § 1301; 1 Ld. Raym. 84, 480; 2 Ld. Raym. 1242.

A DIGNIORI FIERI DEBET DENOMInatio et resolutio. The denomination and explanation of a person or thing ought to be derived from the more worthy. Wingate, Max. 265; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 10, § 12.

A FORFAIT ET SANS GARANTIE (Fr.) A phrase used in the indorsement of negotiable instruments; substantially the same as "without recourse."

A FORTIORI. By (or from) the stronger reason. Applied to the argument that, because of the concession or establishment of a given proposition, another included in it is by the greater reason true.

A GRATIA. By grace; not of right. Also written ex gratia.

A LATERE (Lat. latus, side).

——In Respect to Property Rights. (1) Collateral. Used in this sense in speaking of the succession to property. Bracton, 20b, 62b. (2) Without right. Bracton, 42b.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. Apostolic. A legate a latere is one having full powers to represent the pope as if he were present. Du Cange; 4 Bl. Comm. 306.

A LIBELLIS (Law Lat.) An officer who had charge of the libelli or petitions addressed to the sovereign. Calv. Lex.

A name sometimes given to a chancellor (cancellarius) in the early history of that office. Spelman, voc. "Cancellarius." See "Chancellor."

A L'IMPOSSIBLE NUL N'EST TENU. No one is bound to do what is impossible.

A MANIBUS (Law Lat.) An officer who wrote for the emperor; one whose hand (manus) was used for writing; an amanuensis. Calv. Lex.

A ME (Lat. ego, I). A term denoting, in the feudal law, direct tenure of the superior lord. 2 Bell, H. L. Sc. 133.

To withhold a me (from me) is to obtain possession of my property unjustly. Calv. Lex.

To pay a me, is to pay from my money.

A MENSA ET THORO. See "Divorce."

A NON POSSE AD NON ESSE SEQUITUR argumentum necessarie negative licet non affirmative. From impossibility to nonexistence, the inference follows necessarily in the negative, though not in the affirmative. Hob. 336b.

A PIRATIS AUT LATRONIBUS CAPTI liberi permanent. Those captured by pirates or robbers remain free. Dig. 49. 15. 19. 2; Grotius de Jure Belli, lib. 3, c. 3. § 1.

A PIRATIS ET LATRONIBUS CAPTA dominium non mutant. Things captured by pirates and robbers do not change ownership. 1 Kent, Comm. 108, 184; 2 Wooddeson, Lect. 258, 259.

A POSTERIORI (Lat. by the later reason). In logic. An argument proceeding from effects to causes.

A PRENDRE (Fr. to take, to seize). Rightfully taken from the soil. 5 Adol. & E. 764; Nev. & P. 172; 4 Pick. (Mass.) 145. See "Profit a Prendre."

A PRIORI (Lat. by the prior reason). In logic. An argument proceeding from causes to effects.

A QUO (Lat.) From which.
——Terminus a Quo. The point from which distance is reckoned.
——Court a Qua. The court from which a cause is removed.
——Judge a Quo. The judge of such court.
——Ad Quem. To which; the correlative.

A RENDRE (Fr. to render, to yield). Which are to be paid or yielded. Profits a rendre comprehend rents and services. Hammond, N. P. 192.

A RESCRIPTIS VALET ARGUMENTUM. An argument from rescripts (i. e., original writs in the register) is valid.

A RESPONSIS (Law Lat.) In ecclesiastical law. One whose office it was to give or convey answers; otherwise termed responsalis and apocrisiarius. One who, being consulted on ecclesiastical matters, gave answers, counsel, or advice; otherwise termed a consiliis. Spelman, voc. "Apocrisiarius."

A RETRO (Lat.) In arrear. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 55, § 2.

A RUBRO AD NIGRUM (Lat. from red to black). As a rule of interpretation, to refer from the (red) title or rubric to the (black) body of the statute. It was anciently the custom to print statutes in this manner. Ersk. Inst. 1. 1. 49.

A SUMMO REMEDIO AD INFERIOREM actionem non habetur regressus neque auxilium. From the highest remedy to an inferior action there is no return or assistance. Fleta, lib. 6, c. 1; Bracton, 104a, 112b; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 193, 194.

A TEMPORE CUJUS CONTRARII MEmoria non existet. From time of which memory to the contrary does not exist.

A TERME (Law Fr.) For a term.
——A Terme de sa Vie. For the term of his life. Y. B. T. 1 Edw. II. 16; Y. B. M. 3 Edw. II. 55, 57.
——A Terme Que Passe Est. For a term which is past. Y. B. M. 4 Edw. III. 59.

A TORT (Law Fr.) Of or by wrong; wrongfully. De ses avers a tort pris, of his beasts wrongfully taken. Y. B. M. 3 Hen. VI. 20.

A TOUT LA COMMUNE D'ENGLETERRE. To all the people of England. St. Articuli sup. Chartas, c. 1.

A VERBIS LEGIS NON EST RECEDENdum. From the words of the law there should be no departure. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 555; Wingate, Max. 25; 5 Coke, 119.

A VINCULO MATRIMONII. See "Divorce."

AB. In Latin phrases. A preposition having the same significance as "A" (q. v.) "A" is used before words beginning with consonants, and "Ab" before those beginning with vowels.

AB ABUSU AD USUM NON VALET CONsequentia. A conclusion as to the use of a thing from its abuse is invalid. Broom, Leg. Max. 17.

AB ACTIS (Lat. actus, an act). A notary; one who takes down words as they are spoken; a name anciently applied to the chancellor. Du Cange, "Acta;" Spelman, voc. "Cancellarius." See "Chancellor."
A reporter who took down the decisions or acta of the court as they were given.

AB AGENDO. Disabled; unable to act.

AB ANTE (Lat. ante, before). In advance.

AB ANTECEDENTE (Lat. antecedens). Beforehand. 5 Maule & S. 110.

AB ANTIQUO (Lat.) Of old.

AB ASSUETIS NON FIT INJURIA. No injury is done by things long acquiesced in. Jenk. Cent. Cas. Introd. viii.

AB EPISTOLIS (Lat.) An officer having charge of the correspondence (epistolae) of his superior or sovereign; a secretary. Calv. Lex.

AB EXTRA (Lat. extra, beyond, without). From without. 14 Mass. 151.

AB INCONVENIENTI (Lat. inconveniens). From hardship; from what is inconvenient. An argument ab inconvenienti is an argument drawn from the hardship of the case.

AB INITIO (Lat. initium, beginning). From the beginning; entirely; as to all the acts done; in the inception. An estate may be said to be good, an agreement to be void, an act to be unlawful, a trespass to have existed, ab initio. Plowd. 6a; 11 East, 395; 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 253, 369; 1 Bl. Comm. 440.
Before. Contrasted in this sense with ex post facto (2 Bl. Comm. 308), or with postea (Calv. Lex. voc. "Initium").

AB INITIO MUNDI (Lat.) From the beginning of the world.

AB INTESTAT. Intestate. 2 Lower Can. 219.

AB INTESTATO (Lat. testatus, having made a will). From an intestate. Used both in the common and civil law to denote an inheritance derived from an ancestor who died without making a will. 2 Bl. Comm. 490; Story, Confl. Laws, 480.

AB INVITO (Lat. invitum). Unwillingly. See "In Invitum."

AB IRATO (Lat. iratus, an angry man). By one who is angry A devise or gift made by a man adversely to the interests of his heirs, on account of anger or hatred against them, is said to be made ab irato. A suit to set aside such a will is called an action ab irato. Merlin, Repert.

AB OLIM (Law Lat.) Of old. 3 Bl. Comm. 96.

ABACTOR (Lat. ab and agere, to lead away). One who stole cattle in herds. Jacob. Abigeus (q. v.) was the term more commonly used to denote such an offender.

ABADENGO. In Spanish law. Lands, towns, and villages belonging to an abbot, and under his jurisdiction. All lands belonging to ecclesiastical corporations, and as such exempt from taxation. Escriche, Dic. Raz. Lands of this kind were usually held in mortmain, and hence a law was enacted declaring that no land liable to taxation could be given to ecclesiastical institutions "ningun realengo non pase a abadengo," which is repeatedly insisted on.

ABALIENATIO (Lat. alienatio). The most complete method of transferring lands, used among the Romans. It could take place only between Roman citizens. Calv. Lex.

ABANDONEE. A party to whom a right or property is abandoned or relinquished by another. Applied to the insurers of vessels and cargoes. Lord Ellenborough, C. J., 5 Maule & S. 82; Abbott, J., Id. 87; Holroyd, J., Id. 89.

ABANDONMENT. Relinquishment; surrender; desertion; waiver.

——Of Property. The relinquishment of property or right with intent not to reclaim the same. It implies a relinquishment to the public generally, or to the next comer; a surrender to a particular person not being an abandonment. 11 Cal. 363. To constitute an abandonment there must be (1) an intent to abandon (21 Cal. 291; 49 Minn. 148; 49 N. Y. 346), and (2) an unequivocal act of abandonment (77 N. C. 186; 42 Conn. 377; 116 Mo. 123). Mere nonuser is not sufficient (61 Mo. 178; 15 N. H. 412); but abandonment may be presumed from long-continued nonuser (43 Pa. St. 427; 34 Me. 394).

——Of Invention. Either a relinquishing of a contemplated invention before it is perfected, or a permitting of the use of an invention by the public, constitutes an abandonment of the invention to the public, and prevents the inventor from enforcing any exclusive claim to the same. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. (U. S.) 300.

——Of Duties. The willful and unauthorized desertion or forsaking of a duty, as a contract or a service, or of a person as to whom the abandoner is charged with a duty, as of a child by its parents, or of a wife by her husband. In case of abandonment of domestic relations, an intent to cause a permanent separation is necessary. See "Desertion."

——To Underwriters. The right of an insured, who has suffered a loss, to relinquish the residue to the underwriters, and claim for a total loss, though the insured property is capable of recovery and repair. This right is confined to marine insurance, unless specially given by the policy. May, Ins. § 421.

——For Torts. The ancient right of the owner of an animal or of a slave which had committed an injury for which the owner was civilly liable to surrender it to the injured person in satisfaction. The doctrine has been applied to vessels, and authorizes the owner to surrender the vessel in satisfaction of a debt contracted by the master. By Rev. St. U. S. § 4285, the right to surrender a vessel and exonerate the owner from personal liability was extended to damages by collision.

ABANDUN, or ABANDUM. Anything sequestered, proscribed, or abandoned. Abandon, i. e., in bannum res missa, a thing banned or denounced as forfeited or lost; whence to abandon, desert, or forsake, as lost and gone. Cowell. Pasquier thinks it a coalition of a ban donner, to give up to a prescription, in which sense it signifies the ban of the empire. Wharton.

ABARNARE (Lat.) To discover and disclose to a magistrate any secret crime. Leges Canuti, c. 10.

ABATAMENTUM (Lat. abatare). An entry by interposition. Co. Litt. 277. An abatement. Yelv. 151.

ABATARE. To abate. Yelv. 151.

ABATEMENT (Fr. abattre, Law Fr. abater, signifying to throw down).

——In Practice. A suspension of all proceedings in a suit, from the want of proper parties capable of proceeding therein, as on the death of a party pending the suit. 2 Paige (N. Y.) 211.

In modern practice the term signifies generally the suspension of a suit by any matter arising after its commencement.

Abatement in chancery differs from an abatement at law in this: That in the latter the action is entirely dead, and cannot be revived in the absence of statute (3 Bl. Comm. 168), but in the former the right to proceed is merely suspended, and may be revived by a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of revivor (21 N. H. 246; Story, Eq. Pl. § 354; Mitf. Eq. Pl. [by Jeremy] 57).

——In Pleading. The overthrow of an action caused by the defendant pleading some matter of fact tending to impeach the correctness of the writ or declaration, and which defeats the action for the present, but does not debar the plaintiff from recommencing it in a better way. Steph. Pl. 47; 3 Bl. Comm. 168; 1 Chit. Pl. (6th London Ed.) 446; Gould, Pl. c. 5, § 65.

It has been applied rather inappropriately as a generic term to all pleas of a dilatory nature; whereas the word "dilatory" would seem to be the more proper generic term, and the word "abatement" applicable to a certain portion of dilatory pleas. Comyn, Dig. "Abatement" (B); 1 Chit. Pl. (6th London Ed.) 440; Gould, Pl. c. 5, § 65. In this general sense it has been used to include pleas to the jurisdiction of the court.

——In Contracts. A reduction made by the creditor for the prompt payment of a debt due by the payer or debtor. Weskett, Ins. 7.

——Of Customs Duties. The deduction from, or the refunding of, duties sometimes made at the custom house, on account of damages received by goods during importation or while in store. See Act Cong. March 2, 1799, § 52; 1 Story, U. S. Laws, 617; Andrews, Rev. Laws, §§ 113, 162.

——Of Legacies. The reduction of a legacy, general or specific, on account of the insufficiency of the estate of the testator to pay his debts and legacies. When the estate of a testator is insufficient to pay both debts and legacies, it is the rule that the general legacies must abate proportionably to an amount sufficient to pay the debts. See "Ademption."

——Of Nuisances. The prostration or removal of a nuisance, whether by action, or summarily by an individual. 3 Bl. Comm. 5. See "Nuisance."

——Of Taxes. A diminution or decrease in the amount of tax imposed upon any person. The provisions for securing this abatement are entirely matters of statute regulation (5 Gray [Mass.] 365; 4 R. I. 313; 30 Pa. St. 227; 18 Ark. 380; 18 Ill. 312), and vary in the different states.

ABATEMENT OF FREEHOLD. A wrongful entry by a stranger on lands of a decedent before the heir or devisee has taken possession. 3 Bl. Comm. 167. See, also, "Amotion;" "Intrusion;" "Disseisin."

ABATOR. One who abates or destroys a nuisance.

One who, having no right of entry, gets possession of the freehold to the prejudice of an heir or devisee, after the time when the ancestor died, and before the heir or devisee enters. Litt. § 397; Perk. § 383; 2 Prest. Abstr. 296, 300. See Adams, Ej. 43; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 225.

ABATUDA. Anything diminished; as, moneta abatuda, which is money clipped or diminished in value. Cowell.

ABBACY. The government of a religious house, and the revenues thereof, subject to an abbot, as a bishopric is to a bishop. Cowell.

ABBREVIATE. In Scotch law. An abstract. Ersk. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 12, § 43.

ABBREVIATE OF ADJUDICATION. In Scotch law. The recorded abstract of an adjudication (q. v.)

ABBREVIATIO PLACITORUM. An abstract of ancient judicial records, prior to the Year Books. See Steph. Pl. (7th Ed.) 410.

ABBREVIATION. A shortened form of a word obtained by the omission of one or more letters or syllables from the middle or end of the word.

The abbreviations in common use in modern times consist of the initial letter or letters, syllable or syllables, of the word. Anciently, also, contracted forms of words, obtained by the omission of letters intermediate between the initial and final letters, were much in use These latter forms are now more commonly designated by the term "contraction." Abbreviations are of frequent use in referring to text books, reports, etc., and in indicating dates, but should be very sparingly employed, if at all, in formal and important legal documents. See 4 Car. & P. 51; 9 Coke, 48. No part of an indictment should contain any abbreviations except in cases where a fac simile of a written instrument is necessary to be set out. 1 East, 180, note. The variety and number of abbreviations is as nearly illimitable as the ingenuity of man can make them, and the advantages arising from their use are, to a great extent, counterbalanced by the ambiguity and uncertainty resulting from the usually inconsiderate selection which is made.

ABBREVIATIONUM ILLE NUMERUS ET sensus accipiendus est, ut concessio non sit inanis. Such a number and sense is to be given to abbreviations that the grant may not fail. 9 Coke, 48.

ABBREVIATORS. In ecclesiastical law. Officers whose duty it is to assist in drawing up the pope's briefs, and reducing petitions into proper form, to be converted into papal bulls.

ABBROCHMENT. In old English law. The forestalling of a market or fair.

ABDICATION. A renunciation; a putting away; a renunciation of the sovereignty by an incumbent thereof.

James II. of England, Charles V. of Germany, and Christiana, Queen of Sweden, are said to have abdicated. When James II. of England left the kingdom, the commons voted that he had abdicated the government, and that thereby the throne had become vacant. The house of lords preferred the word "deserted," but the commons thought it not comprehensive enough, for then the king might have the liberty of returning.

Also applied to the renunciation or surrender of any office, and in this sense it has been distinguished from "resignation," the latter being the giving up of an office to the appointing power from whom it was received, or who has the power to fill the vacancy, while abdication is the renunciation of an office which was conferred by act of law. See, however, 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 487.

ABDUCTION.

——In England. By St. 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, the taking of any woman having property, or being heir apparent thereto, to be married or defiled.

Under the present statute (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), the taking of any woman, having certain property or expectancies, to be married or defiled; the taking of such a woman, being under the age of twenty-one years, out of the possession of the person having lawful charge of her; the taking of any woman of any age by force, with intent to cause her to be married or defiled; the taking of any unmarried girl, under the age of sixteen years, out of possession of the person having lawful possession of her; or the taking of any child, under the age of fourteen years, with intent to deprive its lawful guardian of its custody.

——In the United States. In most, if not all, of the United States, the crime is regulated by statute; but allowing for statutory variations, the elements may be stated as: (1) The taking, which must be by some affirmative act of force or persuasion. 6 Park. Cr. R. 129, 86 N. Y. 369. (2) From the custody of a parent or guardian; but a mere enticing for the forbidden purpose to a place near her home, to which she is shortly permitted to return, is sufficient. 90 Ill. 274. In some states this is not essential. (3) For the purpose of making the female a prostitute or concubine, or of procuring her to be forcibly married or defiled. The purposes inhibited vary with the statutes, some of the above being omitted, and in some states that of fornication being added. The purpose need not be accomplished. 4 N. Y. Cr. R. 306; 5 N. Y. Cr. R. 61. (4) In some states, the female is required to have been of previous chaste character, or to be below a given age. Where these elements actually exist, defendant's ignorance of them is no defense. 115 Mo. 480.

ABEARANCE. Behavior; as, a recognizance to be of good abearance signifies to be of good behavior. 4 Bl. Comm. 251, 256.

ABEREMURDER. In old English law. An apparent, plain, or downright murder. It was used to distinguish a willful murder from chance-medley, or manslaughter. Spelman; Cowell; Blount. See "Homicide."

ABESSE (Lat.) In the civil law. To be absent; to be away from a place. Said of a person who was extra continentia urbis, beyond the suburbs of the city.

ABET. In criminal law. To encourage or set another on to commit a crime. This word is always applied to aiding the commission of a crime. To abet another to commit a murder is to command, procure, or counsel him to commit it. Old Nat. Brev. 21; Co. Litt. 475. See "Accessary."

ABETMENT (Law Lat. abettum, abbettum; Law Fr. abette). In old criminal law. An encouraging or instigation. Staund. P. C. 10r; Cowell; Blount.

ABETTATOR. See "Abettor."

ABETTOR. An instigator, or setter on; one that promotes, procures, or assists in, the commission of a crime; a principal in the second degree.

The distinction between abettors and accessaries is the presence or absence at the commission of the crime. Co. Litt. 475; 81 Ill. 333; 44 Iowa, 104. Presence and participation are necessary to constitute a person an abettor. 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 33; 1 Hall (N. Y.) 446; Russ. & R. 99; 9 Bing. N. C. 440; 13 Mo. 382; 1 Wis. 159; 10 Pick. (Mass.) 477.

ABEYANCE (Fr. abbayer, to expect). In expectation, remembrance, and contemplation of law; the condition of a freehold when there is no person in being in whom it is vested.

In such cases, the freehold has been said to be in nubibus (in the clouds), and in gremio legis (in the bosom of the law). It has been denied by some that there is such a thing as an estate in abeyance. Fearne, Cont. Rem. 513. See, also, the note to 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 107.

ABIDING BY. In Scotch law. A judicial declaration that the party abides by the deed on which he founds, in an action where the deed or writing is attacked as forged. Unless this is done, a decree that the deed is false will be pronounced. Paterson, Comp. It has the effect of pledging the party to stand the consequences of founding on a forged deed. Bell, Dict.

ABIGEAT. A particular kind of larceny, which is committed not by taking and carrying away the property from one place to another, but by driving a living thing away with an intention of feloniously appropriating the same.

ABIGEATUS (Lat.) In the civil law. The offense of stealing or driving away cattle. Dig. 47. 14. 2. See "Abigeus."

ABIGEUS (Lat. abigere). One who steals cattle in numbers.

This is the common word used to denote a stealer of cattle in large numbers, which latter circumstance distinguishes the abigeus from the fur, who was simply a thief. He who steals a single animal may be called fur; he who steals a flock or herd is an abigeus. The word is derived from abigere, to lead or drive away, and is the same in signification as abactor, abigeatores, abigatores, abigei. Du Cange; Guyot, Rep. Univ.; 4 Bl. Comm. 239.

A distinction is also taken by some writers depending upon the place whence the cattle are taken; thus, one who takes cattle from a stable is called fur. Calv. Lex, "Abigei."

ABILITY. In divorce law. Power of husband to provide, as element of wife's right to alimony. It is sometimes called "faculty."

ABISHERSING. Quit of amercements. It originally signified a forfeiture or amercement, and is more properly mishering, mishersing, or miskering, according to Spelman. It has since been termed a liberty of freedom, because, wherever this word is used in a grant, the persons to whom the grant is made have the forfeitures and amercements of all others, and are themselves free from the control of any within their fee.

ABJUDICATIO (Lat. abjudicare). A removal from court. Calv. Lex. It has the same signification as foris judicatio, both in the civil and canon law. Co. Litt. 100b; Calv. Lex.

ABJURATION (Lat. abjuratio, from abjurare, to abjure, to forswear or renounce on oath). A renunciation of allegiance, upon oath. Sometimes loosely used in the sense of "abandonment."

ABLEGATI. Papal ambassadors of the second rank, who are sent with a less extensive commission to a court where there are no nuncios. This title is equivalent to "Envoy" (q. v.)

ABLOCATIO, or ABLOCATION. A letting out to hire for money. Wharton.

ABODE. Dwelling place. See "Residence."

ABOLITION (Lat. abolitio, from abolere, to utterly destroy). The extinguishment, abrogation, or annihilation of a thing.

In the civil, French, and German law, abolition is used nearly synonymously with pardon, remission, grace. Dig. 39. 4. 3. 3. There is, however, this difference: Grace is the generic term; pardon, according to those laws, is the clemency which the prince extends to a man who has participated in a crime, without being a principal or accomplice; remission is made in cases of involuntary homicides and self-defense. Abolition is different,—it is used when the crime cannot be remitted. The prince then may, by letters of abolition, remit the punishment, but the infamy remains, unless letters of abolition have been obtained before sentence. Enc. D'Alembert.

ABONDANCE (Law Fr.) In old practice. Surplusage. Y. B. P. 7 Hen. VI. 12.

ABORDAGE (Fr.) The collision of vessels.

ABORTION. The expulsion of the foetus at a period of utero gestation so early that it has not acquired the power of sustaining an independent life.

It may be either innocent, as when accidental, or criminal. Criminal abortion is the willful production of the miscarriage of a pregnant woman, whether by the administration of drugs, or the use of instruments, or other means, the same not being necessary to save her life. At common law, the woman must have been quick with child (78 Ky. 204; 63 Mich. 229), but this is no longer necessary (49 Iowa, 260; 33 Me. 48; 83 N. C. 360; 45 Ark. 333). It is an aggravation of the offense, and in some states constitutes manslaughter, if the death of the woman is produced.

ABORTIVE TRIAL. A term descriptive of the result when a case has gone off, and no verdict has been pronounced, without the fault, contrivance, or management of the parties. Jebb & B. 51.

ABORTUS. The fruit of an abortion; the child born before its time, incapable of life.

ABOUTISSEMENT (Fr.) An abuttal or abutment. See Guyot, Rep. Univ. "Aboutissans."

ABRIDGE. In practice. To shorten a declaration or count by taking away or severing some of the substance of it. Brooke, Abr. "Abridgment;" Comyn, Dig. "Abridgment;" 1 Viner, Abr. 109.

To abridge a plaint is to strike out a part of the demand, and pray that the tenant answer to the rest. This was allowable generally in real actions where the writ was de libero tenemento, as assize, dower, etc., where the demandant claimed land of which the tenant was not seized. See 1 Wm. Saund. 207, note 2; 2 Wm. Saund. 24, 330; Brooke, Abr. "Abridgment;" 1 Pet. (U. S.) 74; Stearns, Real Actions, 204.

To abridge damage is to reduce the same after the rendition of the verdict.

ABRIDGMENT. An epitome or compendium of another and larger work, wherein the principal ideas of the larger work are summarily contained.

ABROGATION. The destruction of or annulling a former law by an act of the legislative power, or by usage.

It is a total annulment, as distinguished from derogation, which is a repeal of part. Abrogation may be express or implied.

——Express Abrogation. That literally pronounced by the new law either in general terms, as when a final clause abrogates or repeals all laws contrary to the provisions of the new one, or in particular terms, as where it abrogates certain preceding laws, which are named.

——Implied Abrogation. That which takes place when the new law contains provisions which are positively contrary to the former laws, without expressly abrogating such laws; for it is a maxim, Posteriora derogant prioribus (10 Mart. [La.] 172, 560); and also when the order of things for which the law had been made no longer exists, and hence the motives which had caused its enactment have ceased to operate, Ratione legis omnino cessante cessat lex. Toullier, Dr. Civ. tit. prel. § 11, note 151; Merlin, Repert.

ABSCOND. To go in a clandestine manner out of the jurisdiction of the courts, or to lie concealed, in order to avoid their process.

ABSCONDING DEBTOR. One who absconds from his creditors.

The statutes of the various states, and the decisions upon them, have determined who shall be treated in those states, respectively, as absconding debtors, and liable to be proceeded against as such. A person who has been in a state only transiently, or has come into it without any intention of settling therein, cannot be treated as an absconding debtor (2 Caines [N. Y.] 318; 15 Johns. [N. Y.] 196; 4 Watts [Pa.] 422); nor can one who openly changes his residence (3 Yerg. [Tenn.] 414; 5 Conn. 117). For the rule in Vermont, see 2 Vt. 489; 6 Vt. 614. It is not necessary that the debtor should actually leave the state. 7 Md. 209.

ABSENCE. The state of being away from one's domicile or usual place of residence.

In its specific applications, particular qualifications are usually added. Thus, to toll the statute of limitations, the absence must generally be from the jurisdiction. To raise a presumption of death, the whereabouts of the absent person must be unknown, and the absence must continue a certain time,—usually seven years.

——In Scotch Law. Default of appearance.

ABSENTE (Lat. ablative of absens). Being absent. A common term in the old reports. "The three justices, absente North, C. J., were clear of opinion." 2 Mod. 14.

ABSENTEE. One who absents himself from a state, from his residence, or from an office or place where official duty is to be performed. Applied to a landlord who resides in a country other than that from which he draws his rents. McCulloch, Polit. Econ.

——In Louisiana Practice. Either a nonresident or a resident who has departed from the state, leaving no one to represent him. 14 La. 447; 15 La. 81; 16 La. Ann. 390.

A resident temporarily absent, but retaining his domicile, so that service may be made on him there, is not an absentee. 16 La. Ann. 390; 18 La. Ann. 695.

A curator ad hoc (q. v.) may be appointed for an absentee.

ABSENTEES, or DES ABSENTEES. The name of a parliament held at Dublin, 10th May, 8 Hen. VIII.

ABSENTEM ACCIPERE DEBEMUS EUM qui non est eo loci in quo petitur. We must call him absent who is not in that place in which he is sought. Dig. 50. 16. 199.

ABSENTIA EJUSQUI REIPUBLICAE cause abest, neque ei neque alii damnosa esse debet. The absence of him who is employed in the service of the state ought not to be prejudicial to him nor to others. Dig. 50. 17. 140.

ABSOILE. To pardon; to deliver from excommunication. Stamford, P. C. 72; Kelham. Sometimes spelled assoile (q. v.)

ABSOLUTA SENTENTIA EXPOSITORE non indiget. An absolute, unqualified sentence (or proposition) needs no expositor. 2 Inst. 533.

ABSOLUTE (Lat. absolvere). Complete; perfect; final; without any condition or incumbrance; as an absolute bond (simplex obligatio), in distinction from a conditional bond.

——Absolute Estate. One that is free from all manner of condition or incumbrance. See "Condition."

——Absolute Rule. One which, on the hearing, has been confirmed and made final.

——Absolute Conveyance. One conveying unconditional title, as distinguished from a mortgage or other conditional conveyance. 1 Powell, Mortg. 125.

——Absolute Rights. Such as appertain and belong to particular persons merely as individuals or single persons, as distinguished from relative rights, which are incident to them as members of society. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 123; 1 Chit. Pl. 364; 1 Chit. Prac. 32.

——Absolute Property. Where a man hath solely and exclusively the right and also the occupation of movable chattels; distinguished from a qualified property, as that of a bailee. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 388; 2 Kent, Comm. 347. It includes not only the property, but the right to an immediate and unqualified possession. 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 590.

——Absolute Covenant. One which is unconditional or unqualified.

——Absolute Interest. One which is so completely vested in the individual that he can by no contingency be deprived of it without his own consent.

——Absolute Law. The law of nature, which alone is immutable in theory. 1 Steph. Comm. 21 et seq.

——Absolute Warrandice. In Scotch law. A warranty against all incumbrances whatever. 1 Kames, Eq. 290, 293.

ABSOLUTION.

——In Civil Law. A sentence whereby a party accused is declared innocent of the crime laid to his charge.

——In Canon Law. A juridical act, whereby the clergy declare that the sins of such as are penitent are remitted. The formula of absolution in the Roman Church is absolute; in the Greek Church it is deprecatory; in the Reformed Churches, declaratory. Among Protestants it is chiefly used for a sentence by which a person who stands excommmunicated is released or freed from that punishment. Enc. Brit.

——In French Law. The dismissal of an accusation.

The term "acquitment" is employed when the accused is declared not guilty, and "absolution" when he is recognized as guilty, but the act is not punishable by law, or he is exonerated by some defect of intention or will.

ABSOLUTISM. That government in which public power is vested in some person or persons, unchecked and uncontrolled by any law or institution.

The word was first used at the beginning of this century, in Spain, where he who was in favor of the absolute power of the king, and opposed to the constitutional system introduced by the Cortes during the struggle with the French, was called absolutista.

ABSQUE. In Latin phrases. A preposition denoting without, or except for.

ABSQUE TALI CAUSA (Lat. without such cause). In pleading. A form of replication in an action ex delicto, which works a general denial of the whole matter of the defendant's plea of de injuria. Gould, Pl. c. 7, § 10.

ABSQUE IMPETITIONE VASTI (Lat. without impeachment of waste). A term indicating freedom from any liability on the part of the tenant or lessee to answer in damages for the waste he may commit. See "Waste."

ABSQUE CONSIDERATIONE CURIAE (Lat.) In old practice. Without the consideration of the court; without judgment. St. Marlb., cited in Fleta, lib. 2, c. 47, § 13.

ABSQUE ALIQUO INDE REDDENDO (Lat. without reserving any rent therefrom). A term used of a free grant by the crown. 2 Rolle, Abr. 502.

ABSQUE HOC (Lat.) Without this. See "Traverse."

ABSTENTION. In French law. The tacit renunciation of a succession by an heir. Merlin, Repert.

ABSTRACT. An abridgment or synopsis. In appellate practice. A condensed statement of the evidence or record.

——Of a Fine. An abstract of the writ of covenant and the concord; naming the parties, the parcel of land, and the agreement. 2 Bl. Comm. 351.

——Of a Title. A brief account of all the deeds upon which the title rests. A synopsis of the distinctive portions of the various instruments which constitute the muniments of title. See Prest. Abstr.; Wharton.

ABUNDANS CAUTELA NON NOCET. Abundant caution does no harm. 11 Coke, 6; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 28, § 1.

ABUSE. Everything which is contrary to good order established by usage. Merlin, Repert.

Among the civilians, abuse has another signification, which is the destruction of the substance of a thing in using it. For example, the borrower of wine or grain abuses the article lent by using it, because he cannot enjoy it without consuming it.

——Of Distress. The using an animal or chattel distrained, which makes the distrainer liable as for a conversion.

——Of Female Child. Carnal knowledge. See "Rape."

——Of Process. There is an abuse of process when an adversary, through the malicious and unfounded use of some regular legal proceeding, obtains some advantage over his opponent. Wharton. See 63 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 326; 15 App. Div. (N. Y.) 205.

ABUT. To reach; to touch. In old law, the ends were said to abut, the sides to adjoin. Cro. Jac. 184.

To take a new direction; as where a bounding line changes its course. Spelman, voc. "Abuttare." In the modern law, to bound upon. 2 Chit. Pl. 660.

ABUTTALS (Fr.) The buttings or boundings of lands, showing to what other lands, highways, or places they belong or are abutting. Termes de la Ley.

ABUTTER. The owner of land abutting on a public street, in the bed of which the owner has no title or private right except such as are incident to a lot so situated. 122 N. Y. 1; 130 N. Y. 14.

An abutter has two distinct kinds of rights in a highway,—those which he enjoys in common with all citizens, and those which arise from his ownership of contiguous property. 130 N. Y. 618.

He may or may not own the fee in the street, and his rights of the second class vary according to this fact. 131 N. Y. 293.

AC ETIAM (Lat. and also). The introduction to the statement of the real cause of action, used in those cases where it was necessary to allege a fictitious cause of action to give the court jurisdiction, and also the real cause in compliance with the statutes. It was first used in the king's bench, and was afterwards adopted by Lord C. J. North in addition to the clausum fregit writs of his court upon which writs of capias might issue. He balanced a while whether he should not use the words nec non instead of ac etiam. See Burgess, Ins. 149-157; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 288.

AC ETIAM BILLAE (Law Lat. and also to a bill). The initial words of a clause inserted in a writ of capias ad respondendum, where bail is required, in order to express the true cause of action; the writ requiring the defendant "to answer the plaintiff of a plea of trespass, and also to a bill of the plaintiff" against the defendant, for whatever the real cause of action may be. 3 Bl. Comm. 288; Id. Append. No. 3, § 3. See "Capias ad Respondendum." This clause is now dispensed with, in the process of the English courts. St. 2 Wm. IV. c. 39. See "Bill."

AC SI (Lat.) As if. Towns. Pl. 23, 27. These words frequently occur in old English statutes. Lord Bacon expounds their meaning in the statute of uses: "The statute gives entry, not simpliciter, but with an ac si." Bac. Read. Uses, Works, iv. 195.

ACAPTE. In French feudal law. A species of relief; a seignorial right due on every change of a tenant. A feudal right which formerly prevailed in Languedoc and Guyenne, being attached to that species of heritable estates which were granted on the contract of emphyteusis. Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 5, § 12.

ACCAPITARE, ACAPITARE, or ACAPtare (Law Lat.) From caput, head, or chief.

(1) To pay homage to a chief lord, on becoming his vassal. Bracton, fol. 78a; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 16, § 6.

(2) To acknowledge the sovereignty of a chief lord in special cases, as against a mesne; to attorn (acapitare et se atturnare). Bracton, fol. 389a; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 16, § 38; Id. lib. 6, c. 28, § 1.

(3) To attorn to another person than the chief lord, and in derogation of his rights. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 50, § 16.

ACCEDAS AD CURIAM (Lat. that you go to court). In English law. An original writ issuing out of chancery and directed to the sheriff, for the purpose of removing a replevin suit from the hundred court or court baron before one of the superior courts of law. It directs the sheriff to go to the lower court, and there cause the plaint to be recorded, and to return, etc. See Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 18; Dyer, 169.

ACCEDAS AD VICE COMITEM (Lat. that you go to the sheriff). In English law. A writ directed to the coroner, commanding him to deliver a writ to the sheriff, who suppresses a pone which has been delivered to him, which commands the latter officer to return the pone.

ACCELERATION. An estate is said to be accelerated when it is reduced to possession by the extinguishment of the precedent estate sooner than it would have been in the due course of events.

ACCEPTANCE (Lat. accipere).

——Of Property. The receipt of a thing offered by another with an intention to retain it, indicated by some act sufficient for the purpose. 2 Pars. Cont. 221.

The element of receipt must enter into every acceptance, though receipt does not necessarily mean, in this sense, actual manual taking. To this element there must be added an intention to retain. This retention may exist at the time of the receipt, or subsequently; it may be indicated by words, or acts, or any medium understood by the parties; and an acceptance of goods will be implied from mere detention, in many instances.

An acceptance involves very generally the idea of a receipt in consequence of a previous undertaking, on the part of the person offering, to deliver such a thing as the party accepting is in some manner bound to receive. It is through this meaning that the term "acceptance," as used in reference to bills of exchange, has a relation to the more general use of the term. As distinguished from "assent," acceptance would denote receipt of something in compliance and satisfactory fulfillment of a contract to which assent has been previously given. See "Assent."

——Of Bills of Exchange. An engagement to pay the bill in money when due. 4 East, 72; 19 Law J. 297.

Acceptances of bills of exchange are:

(1) Absolute, being a positive engagement to pay the bill according to its tenor.

(2) Conditional, being an undertaking to pay the bill on a contingency.

(3) Partial, being one varying from the tenor of the bill.

(4) Qualified, being either conditional or partial.

(5) Supra protest, being the acceptance of the bill after protest for nonacceptance by the drawee, for the honor of the drawer, or a particular indorser.

They are also either:

(6) Express, being an undertaking in direct and express terms to pay the bill.

(7) Implied, being an undertaking to pay the bill inferred from acts of a character fairly to warrant such an inference.

ACCEPTANCE AU BESOIN. In French law. Acceptance in case of need. See "Au Besoin."

ACCEPTARE (Lat.)

——In Old Pleading. To accept. Acceptavit, he accepted. 2 Strange, 817. Non acceptavit, he did not accept. 4 Man. & G. 7.

——In the Civil Law. To accept; to assent; to assent to a promise made by another. Grotius de Jure Belli, lib. 2, c. 11, § 14.

ACCEPTILATION. In civil law. A release made by a creditor to his debtor of his debt, without receiving any consideration. Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 26, p. 570. It is a species of donation, but not subject to the forms of the latter, and is valid unless in fraud of creditors. Merlin, Repert.

ACCEPTOR. The party who accepts a bill of exchange. 3 Kent, Comm. 75.

The party who undertakes to pay a bill of exchange in the first instance.

ACCEPTOR SUPRA PROTEST. A party who accepts a bill which has been protested, for the honor of the drawer or any one of the indorsers.

ACCESS. Approach, or the means or power of approaching. The right of the occupant of land to pass from his premises to a highway.

Sometimes by access is understood sexual intercourse; at other times, the opportunity of communicating together, so that sexual intercourse may have taken place, is also called access. In this sense, a man who can readily be in company with his wife is said to have access to her, and in that case her issue are presumed to be his issue; but this presumption may be rebutted by positive evidence that no sexual intercourse took place. 1 Turn. & R. 141.

ACCESSARY. In criminal law. He who is not the chief actor in the perpetration of the offense, nor present at its performance, but is some way concerned therein, either before or after the fact committed.

——Before the Fact. One who, being absent at the time of the crime committed, yet procures, counsels, or commands another to commit it. 1 Hale, P. C. 615.

The essentials are:

(1) Absence from the scene of the crime. 9 Pick. (Mass.) 496.

(2) Actual procurement, counsel, or command; bare permission (1 Hale, P. C. 616) or failure to disclose a known intent to commit crime (7 Tex. App. 549) not being enough.

(3) A criminal intent. 157 Pa. St. 13.

——After the Fact. One who, knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon. 4 Bl. Comm. 37. The essentials are:

(1) The commission of a crime by the principal. 39 Miss. 702.

(2) Knowledge thereof by the alleged accessary. 42 Ga. 22.

(3) Assistance rendered to the principal personally. 26 Grat. (Va.) 952.

ACCESSARY TO ADULTERY. In divorce law. A spouse who directly commands or procures the commission of adultery by the other. It is a stronger term than "conniver," which implies mere acquiescence, but is practically unused in America, "connivance" being used to denote all non-collusive participation.

ACCESSIO (Lat. an accession). An increase or addition; that which lies next to a thing, and is supplementary and necessary to the principal thing; that which arises or is produced from the principal thing. Calv. Lex.

A manner of acquiring the property in a thing which becomes united with that which a person already possesses.

The doctrine of property arising from accessions is grounded on the rights of occupancy. It is said to be of six kinds in the Roman law:

(1) That which assigns to the owner of a thing its products, as the fruit of trees, the young of animals.

(2) That which makes a man the owner of a thing which is made of another's property, upon payment of the value of the material taken. See, also, Civ. Code La. art. 491. As where wine, bread, or oil is made of another man's grapes, olives, or wheat. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 404; 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 288.

(3) That which gives the owner of land new land formed by gradual deposit. See "Alluvion."

(4) That which gives the owner of a thing the property in what is added to it by way of adorning or completing it; as, if a tailor should use the cloth of B. in repairing A.'s coat, all would belong to A., but B. would have an action against both A. and the tailor for the cloth so used. This doctrine holds in the common law. Moore, 20; Poph. 38; Brooke, Abr. "Propertiae," 23.

(5) That which gives islands formed in a stream to the owner of the adjacent lands on either side.

(6) That which gives a person the property in things added to his own so that they cannot be separated without damage. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

An accessary obligation, and sometimes also the person who enters into an obligation as surety in which another is principal. Calv. Lex.

ACCESSION.

——To Property. The right to all which one's own property produces, whether that property be movable or immovable, including the increase of animals, and the right to that which is so united to it, either naturally or artificially, as not to be readily separable. See 45 Vt. 4; 2 Kent, Comm. 360; 2 Bl. Comm. 404. See "Confusion of Goods."

It is sometimes used in a narrower sense, as including only the acquirement by the owner of property of that which is added to or incorporated with it, as by the erection of additions to a building, the setting out of trees, etc., and in this sense is to be distinguished from "specification," which is the transformation of property into another species by the labor of another, as by the sawing of trees into lumber. See 2 Bl. Comm. 404.

Distinction between "accession" and "confusion," see "Confusion of Goods."

——In International Law. The absolute or conditional acceptance, by one or several states, of a treaty already concluded between other sovereignties. Merlin, Repert.

ACCESSION, DEED OF. In Scotch law. A deed executed by the creditors of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor, by which they approve of a trust given by their debtor for the general behoof, and bind themselves to concur in the plans proposed for extricating his affairs. Bell, Dict.

ACCESSORIUM NON DUCIT SED SEQUItur suum principale. The principal draws after it the accessory, not the accessory the principal. Co. Litt. 152a, 389a; 5 El. & Bl. 772; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 433. Literally, the accessory does not draw, but follows, its principal.

ACCESSORIUS SEQUITUR NATURAM sui principalis. An accessory follows the nature of his principal. Coke, 3d Inst. 139; 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 36; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 440.

ACCESSORY. Anything which is joined to another thing as an ornament, or to render it more perfect. For example, the halter of a horse, the frame of a picture, the keys of a house, and the like, each belong to the principal thing. The sale of the materials of a newspaper establishment will carry with it, as an accessory, the subscription list (2 Watts [Pa.] 111); but a bequest of a house would not carry the furniture in it, as accessory to it (Domat, Civ. Law, p. 2, liv. 4, tit. 2, § 4, note 1). Accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur principale. Co. Litt. 152a.

Used, also, in the same sense as "Accessary" (q. v.)

ACCESSORY ACTIONS. In Scotch law. Those which are in some degree subservient to others. Bell, Dict.

ACCESSORY CONTRACTS. Those made for assuring the performance of a prior contract, either by the same parties or by others; such as suretyship, mortgages, and pledges.

ACCESSORY OBLIGATIONS. In Scotch law. Obligations to antecedent or primary obligations, such as obligations to pay interest, etc. Ersk. Inst. lib. 3, tit. 3, § 60.

ACCIDENT (Lat. accidere,—ad, to, and cadere, to fall). An event which, under the circumstances, is unusual and unexpected by the person to whom it happens.

The happening of an event without the concurrence of the will of the person by whose agency it was caused; or the happening of an event without any human agency. 32 Conn. 85. See "Inevitable Accident."

——In Equity Practice. Such an unforeseen event, misfortune, loss, act, or omission as is not the result of any negligence or misconduct in the party. Story, Eq. Jur. § 78; 35 Conn. 198.

An occurrence in relation to a contract which was not anticipated by the parties when the same was entered into, and which gives an undue advantage to one of them over the other in a court of law. Jeremy, Eq. 358. This definition is objected to, because, as accidents may arise in relation to other things besides contracts, it is inaccurate in confining accidents to contracts; besides, it does not exclude cases of unanticipated occurrences resulting from the negligence or misconduct of the party seeking relief. See, also, 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 628.

An unforeseen or unexpected event occurring external to the party affected by it, and of which his own agency is not the proximate cause, whereby, contrary to his own intention and wish, he loses some right which it would be a violation of good conscience for the person obtaining to retain. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 823.

It differs from "mistake" in that the latter is based on a voluntary action of the person affected under a mistaken impression.

ACCION, or ACCYOUN (Law Fr.) An action. Kelham. Accion sur le cas, an action on the case.

ACCIPERE QUID UT JUSTITIAM FACIAS, non est tam accipere quam extorquere. To accept anything as a reward for doing justice is rather extorting than accepting. Lofft, 72.

ACCIPITARE. To pay relief to lords of manors. Capitali domino accipitare, i. e., to pay a relief, homage, or obedience to the chief lord on becoming his vassal. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 50.

ACCO (Law Lat.) An abbreviation of actio. Towns. Pl. 26.

ACCOLA.

——In the Civil Law. One who inhabits or occupies land near a place, as one who dwells by a river, or on the bank of a river. Dig. 43. 13. 3. 6.

——In Feudal Law. A husbandman; an agricultural tenant; a tenant of a manor. Spelman. A name given to a class of villeins in Italy. Barr. Obs. St. 302.

ACCOMENDA. A contract which takes place when an individual intrusts personal property with the master of a vessel, to be sold for their joint account. In such case, two contracts take place,—the contract called mandatum, by which the owner of the property gives the master power to dispose of it, and the contract of partnership, in virtue of which the profits are to be divided between them. One party runs the risk of losing his capital; the other his labor. If the sale produces no more than first cost, the owner takes all the proceeds; it is only the profits which are to be divided. Emerig. Mar. Loans, § 5.

ACCOMMODATION. A contract or obligation made or assumed as a favor, and not on a consideration.

ACCOMMODATION LANDS. A name given in England to lands obtained or improved for the purpose of augmenting the value of other lands.

ACCOMMODATION PAPER. A negotiable instrument made or indorsed without consideration for the benefit of another.

ACCOMMODATION PARTY. One who has signed the instrument as maker, drawer, acceptor, or indorser without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person. Neg. Inst. Law N. Y. § 55.

ACCOMMODATION ROAD. One constructed to give access to a particular tract of land.

ACCOMMODATION WORKS. The name given to the facilities, such as gates and culverts, which a railroad company in England, which has acquired property by eminent domain, is required by section 68 of the act of 1845 to construct for the benefit of the adjoining owners.

ACCOMPLICE (Lat. ad and complicare,—con, with, together; plicare, to fold, to wrap,—to fold together).

——In Criminal Law. One who is in some way concerned in the commission of a crime, though not as a principal.

The term in its fullness includes in its meaning all persons who have been concerned in the commission of a crime, all participes criminis, whether they are considered in strict legal propriety as principals in the first or second degree, or merely as accessaries before or after the fact. 1 Russ. Crimes, 21; 4 Bl. Comm. 331; 1 Phil. Ev. 28.

ACCORD. Abbreviation of the French "accordant," and English "accordingly;" frequently used in the books, especially in the reports, to denote the accordance or agreement between one adjudged case and another, in establishing or confirming the same doctrine, and sometimes the accordance of judges in opinion in the same case. See "Accordant." The disagreement or opposition of cases is denoted by "contra."

——In Contracts. A satisfaction agreed on between the party injuring and the party injured, which, when performed, is a bar to all actions upon this account. Generally used in the phrase "accord and satisfaction," satisfaction being the performance of the accord. 2 Greenl. Ev. 28; 3 Bl. Comm. 16; 4 Denio (N. Y.) 418; 83 Va. 397; 78 Wis. 682; 5 Md. 170.

Something of legal value, to which the creditor before had no right, agreed on in full satisfaction of the debt, without regard to the magnitude of the satisfaction. 43 Conn. 462.

The substitution of an agreement in lieu of a right of action between the parties.

A part payment is not a good accord and satisfaction, though received in full. 20 Conn. 559; 99 Mich. 247; 64 Barb. (N. Y.) 215; 8 R. I. 381; 23 Wis. 471; 79 N. C. 585.

ACCORDANT (Fr. and Eng.) Agreeing; concurring. "Baron Parker, accordant," Hardr. 93; "Holt, C. J., accordant," 6 Mod. 298, 299; "Powys, J., accord.," "Powell, J., accord.," Id.

ACCOUCHEMENT. The act of giving birth to a child.

ACCOUNT. A detailed statement of mutual demands in the nature of debt and credit between the parties, arising out of contract or some fiduciary relation. 45 Mo. 573.

A written statement of pecuniary transactions. Abbott.

It is to be distinguished from "balance," which is but the conclusion or result of the account. 45 Mo. 574.

——Stated Account. One which has been approved by the parties, and the balance shown by it agreed to either (1) expressly, or (2) impliedly, as by retaining an account rendered without objection.

——Open Account. One which has not been closed or stated.

——Current Account. One kept open in expectation of further dealings.

——Book Accounts. Those evidenced by entries in books of account.

——Account Rendered. An account presented by the creditor to the debtor.

ACCOUNT, ACTION OF (sometimes called "Account," or "Account Render"). An action or writ which lay against one who was required, by his official or fiduciary position, to render an account.

ACCOUNT BOOK. A book kept by a merchant, trader, mechanic, or other person, in which are entered from time to time the transactions of his trade or business. Such books, when regularly kept, may be admitted in evidence. Greenl. Ev. §§ 115-118.

ACCOUNT IN BANK. See "Bank Account."

ACCOUNT STATED. See "Account."

ACCOUNTABLE RECEIPT. An acknowledgment of the receipt of money to be accounted for by the person receiving it, as distinguished from a receipt for money paid in discharge of a debt. 1 Exch. 138.

ACCOUNTANT. One who is versed in accounts. A person or officer appointed to keep the accounts of a public company.

He who renders to another or to a court a just and detailed statement of the property which he holds as trustee, executor, administrator, or guardian. See 16 Viner, Abr. 155.

ACCOUNTANT GENERAL, or ACCOMPTANT GENERAL. An officer of the English court of chancery, by whom the moneys paid into court are received, deposited in bank, and disbursed. The office appears to have been established by an order of May 26, 1725, and 12 Geo. I. c. 32, before which time the effects of the suitors were locked up in the vaults of the Bank of England, under the care of the masters and two of the six clerks. 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 22. It is now abolished. 35 & 36 Vict. 44.

ACCOUNTING. The making and rendering of an account. Usually, but not necessarily, applied to accountings under order of court.

ACCOUPLE. To marry; married.

ACCREDIT. In international law. To acknowledge. Used of the act by which a diplomatic agent is acknowledged by the government near which he is sent, which makes his public character known, and becomes his protection, and also of the act by which his sovereign commissions him.

ACCREDITULARE, or ACCREDULITARE (Lat.) To purge one's self of an offense by oath. Whishaw; Blount.

ACCRESCERE (Lat. to be added to). The term is used in speaking of islands which are formed in rivers by deposit. Calv. Lex.; 3 Kent, Comm. 428.

——In Scotch Law. To pass to any one. Bell, Dict.

It is used in a related sense in the common-law phrase jus accrescendi, the right of survivorship. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 426.

——In Pleading. To commence; to arise; to accrue. Quod actio non accrevit infra sex annos, that the action did not accrue within six years. 3 Chit. Pl. 914.

ACCRETION (Lat. accrescere, to grow to). The increase of real estate by the addition of portions of soil by gradual deposition through the operation of natural causes, to that already in possession of the owner. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 451. It is immaterial whether the stream be navigable or not, or whether artificial causes contribute. 64 Ill. 56.

"Alluvion" comprises both soil and other things, such as seaweed, etc. Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 686; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 313.

The term "alluvion" is applied to the deposit itself, while "accretion" rather denotes the act.

Sometimes, however, alluvion is used to denote the act of increase also, and accretion as a generic term including, also, reliction and avulsion (q. v.)

ACCROACH. To attempt to exercise royal power. 4 Bl. Comm. 76.

A knight who forcibly assaulted and detained one of the king's subjects till he paid him a sum of money was held to have committed treason on the ground of accroachment. 1 Hale, P. C. 80.

——In French Law. To delay. Whishaw.

ACCRUE. To grow to; to be added to, as the interest accrues on the principal. Accruing costs are those which become due and are created after judgment; as the costs of an execution.

To arise, to happen, to come to pass; as the statute of limitation does not commence running until the cause of action has accrued. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 861; 2 Rawle (Pa.) 277; 10 Watts (Pa.) 363; Bac. Abr. "Limitation of Actions" (D 3); 59 Hun (N. Y.) 145; 159 Pa. St. 556.

ACCRUER, CLAUSE OF. See "Survivorship, Clause of."

ACCUMULATIONS.

(1) The income of a trust fund, when reinvested as a new capital by the trustee.

(2) The suspension of absolute ownership in the rents and profits of personalty, which is, in many states, limited by statute. See 1 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 773, §§ 2-4.

ACCUMULATIVE JUDGMENT (or SENTENCE). See "Cumulative Sentence."

ACCUMULATIVE LEGACY. A double or additional legacy; a legacy given in addition to another given by the same instrument, or by another instrument. 4 Ves. 90; 1 P. Wms. 424.

ACCUSARE NEMO DEBET SE, NISI coram deo. No one is obliged to accuse himself unless before God. Hardr. 139.

ACCUSATION. In criminal law. A charge made to a competent officer against one who has committed a crime, so that he may be brought to justice and punishment.

ACCUSATOR POST RATIONABILE tempus non est audiendus, nisi se bene de omissione excusaverit. An accuser is not to be heard after a reasonable time, unless he excuse himself satisfactorily for the omission. Moore, 817.

ACCUSED. One who is charged with a crime.

ACCUSER. One who makes an accusation.

ACEPHALI (Graeco-Lat.) Persons without a head or superior.

——In Civil Law. A sect of religious persons enumerated among the heretics. Otherwise called acephalitae. So termed, according to Calvin, because their head or founder was unknown, and they acknowledged no religious superiors. Calv. Lex.

——In Feudal Law. Persons without a feudal superior; who held of no one as their lord. Baronorum homines et acephalos. LL. Hen. I. c. 22. This is thought by Burrill to be the passage referred to in Cowell as descriptive of a class of levelers who acknowledged no head or superior.

ACHATE, ACHAT, ACHATA, or ACHET (Law Fr.) In old English law. Purchase; a purchase, contract, or bargain. Per colour de achate, by color of purchase. St. Westminster I. c. 1. Bought. Achate arere, bought back. Dyer (Fr. Ed.) 35b.

ACHERSET. An ancient English measure of grain, supposed to be the same with their quarter, or eight bushels.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT. The act of one who has executed a deed, in going before some competent officer or court, and declaring it to be his act or deed.

The acknowledgment is certified by the officer or court; and the term "acknowledgment" is sometimes used to designate the certificate.

Sometimes loosely used for "admission" (q. v.)

ACKNOWLEDGMENT MONEY. In English law. A sum paid by tenants of copyhold in some parts of England, as a recognition of their superior lords. Cowell; Blount. Called a fine by Blackstone. 2 Bl. Comm. 98.

ACOLYTE. An inferior church servant, who, next under the deacon, followed and waited upon the priest and deacons, and performed the meaner offices of lighting the candles, carrying the bread and wine, and paying other servile attendance.

ACQUEST. An estate acquired by purchase.

ACQUETS. In civil law. Property which has been acquired by purchase, gift, or otherwise than by succession.

Immovable property which has been acquired otherwise than by succession. Merlin, Repert.

The profits of all the effects of which the husband has the administration and enjoyment, either of right or in fact, of the produce of the reciprocal industry and labor of both husband and wife, and of the estates which they may acquire during the marriage, either by donations, made jointly to them both, or by purchase, or in any other similar way, even although the purchase be only in the name of one of the two, and not of both. Civ. Code La. art. 2371.

ACQUIESCENCE. A silent appearance of consent. Worcester.

It is to be distinguished from avowed consent, on the one hand, and from open discontent or opposition, on the other. It amounts to a consent which is impliedly given by one or both parties to a proposition, a clause, a condition, a judgment, or to any act whatever.

It imports an assent which, though implied, is to some extent active, and is to be distinguished from laches, which is mere passive neglect. 69 Cal. 255.

ACQUIETANDIS PLEGIIS. A writ of justices, formerly lying for the surety against a creditor who refuses to acquit him after the debt has been satisfied. Reg. Writs, 158; Cowell; Blount.

ACQUIRE (Lat. ad, for, and quaerere, to seek). To make property one's own.

It is regularly applied to a permanent acquisition. A man is said to obtain or procure a mere temporary acquisition.

ACQUISITION. The act by which a person procures the property of a thing.

The thing the property in which is secured.

Original acquisition is that by which a man secures a property in a thing which is not at the time he acquires it, and in its then existing condition, the property of any other individual. It may result from occupancy (1 Bouv. Inst. note 490; 2 Kent, Comm. 289), accession (1 Bouv. Inst. note 499; 2 Kent, Comm. 293), intellectual labor,—namely, for inventions, which are secured by patent rights,—and for the authorship of books, maps, and charts, which is protected by copyrights (1 Bouv. Inst. note 508).

Derivative acquisition is that by which property is procured from others, either by act of law or by act of the parties. Goods and chattels may change owners by act of law in the cases of forfeiture, succession, marriage, judgment, insolvency, and intestacy, or by act of the parties, as by gift, will, or sale.

An acquisition may result from the act of the party himself, or those who are in his power acting for him, as his children while minors. 1 N. H. 28. See Dig. 41. 1. 53; Inst. 2. 9. 3.

ACQUITTAL.

——In Contracts. A release or discharge from an obligation or engagement. 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 283.

According to Lord Coke, there are three kinds of acquittal, namely, by deed, when the party releases the obligation; by prescription; by tenure. Co. Litt. 100a.

——In Criminal Practice. The absolution of a party charged with a crime or misdemeanor.

The absolution of a party accused on a trial before a traverse jury. 1 Nott & McC. (S. C.) 36; 3 McCord (S. C.) 461.

Acquittals in fact are those which take place when the jury, upon trial, finds a verdict of not guilty.

Acquittals in law are those which take place by mere operation of law; as where a man has been charged merely as an accessary, and the principal has been acquitted. 2 Inst. 364.

Effect on subsequent prosecution, see "Jeopardy."

ACQUITTANCE. In contracts. An agreement in writing to discharge a party from an engagement to pay a sum of money. It is evidence of payment, and differs from a release in this, that the latter must be under seal, while an acquittance need not be under seal. Poth. Obl. note 781. See 3 Salk. 298; Co. Litt. 212a, 273a; 1 Rawle (Pa.) 391.

ACRE (Ger. aker; perhaps Lat. ager, a field). A quantity of land containing one hundred and sixty square rods of land, in whatever shape. Sergeant, Land Laws Pa. 185; Cro. Eliz. 476, 665; 6 Coke, 67; Poph. 55; Co. Litt. 5b. The word formerly signified an open field; whence acre-fight, a contest in an open field. Jacob.

The measure seems to have been variable in amount in its earliest use, but was fixed by statute at a remote period. As originally used, it was applicable especially to meadow lands. Cowell.

ACT (Lat. agere, to do; actus, done). Something done or established.

In its general legal sense, the word may denote something done by an individual, as a private citizen, or as an officer; or by a body of men, as a legislature, a council, or a court of justice; including not merely physical acts, but also decrees, edicts, laws, judgments, resolves, awards, and determinations. Some general laws made by the congress of the United States are styled "joint resolutions," and these have the same force and effect as those styled "acts."

An instrument in writing to verify facts. Webster. It is used in this sense to signify published acts of assembly, congress, etc. In a sense approaching this, it has been held in trials for treason that letters and other written documents were acts. 1 Fost. C. C. 198; 2 Starkie, 116.

——In Civil Law. A writing which states in a legal form that a thing has been done, said, or agreed. Merlin, Repert.

Private acts are those made by private persons as registers in relation to their receipts and expenditures, schedules, acquittances, and the like. Code, 7. 32. 6; Id. 4. 21; Dig. 22. 4; Civ. Code La. arts. 2231-2254; 8 Toullier, Dr. Civ. 94.

Acts under private signature are those which have been made by private individuals, under their hands. An act of this kind does not acquire the force of an authentic act by being registered in the office of a notary (11 Mart. [La.] 243; 5 Mart. [La.; N. S.] 693; 8 Mart. [La.] 568; 3 Mart. [La.; N. S.] 396; 3 La. Ann. 419), unless it has been properly acknowledged before the officer by the parties to it (5 Mart. [La.; N. S.] 196).

Public acts are those which have a public authority, and which have been made before public officers, are authorized by a public seal, have been made public by the authority of a magistrate, or which have been extracted and been properly authenticated from public records.

——In Legislation. A statute or law made by a legislative body.

General or public acts are those which bind the whole community. Of these the courts take judicial cognizance.

Private or special acts are those which operate only upon particular persons and private concerns.

——In Scotch Practice. As a noun, an abbreviation of actor (proctor or advocate, especially for a plaintiff or pursuer), used in records. "Act. A. Alt. B." an abbreviation of Actor, A. Alter, B.; that is, for the pursuer or plaintiff, A., for the defender, B. 1 Brown, 336, note; 2 Brown, 144, note; Id. 507, note.

As a verb, to do or perform judicially; to enter of record. Surety "acted in the books of adjournal." 1 Brown, 4.

ACT BOOK. In Scotch practice. The minute book of a court. 1 Swinb. 81.

ACT IN PAIS. An act performed out of court, and which is not a matter of record.

A deed or an assurance transacted between two or more private persons in the country, that is, according to the old common law, upon the very spot to be transferred, is matter in pais. 2 Bl. Comm. 294. See "In Pais."

ACT OF ATTAINDER. See "Bill of Attainder."

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY. An act which subjects a person to be proceeded against as a bankrupt.

The acts of bankruptcy enumerated in the bankruptcy act of 1898, § 3, are (1) concealment, transfer, or removal of property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors; (2) transfer of property while insolvent, with intent to give a preference; (3) permitting, while insolvent, a creditor to obtain a preference by legal proceedings, and not vacating such preference within five days; (4) making a general assignment for the benefit of creditors; (5) admitting, in writing, inability to pay debts, and willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt.

ACT OF CURATORY. In Scotch practice. The act extracted by the clerk, upon any one's acceptance of being curator. Forbes, Inst. pt. 1, bk. 1, c. 2, tit. 2; 2 Kames, Eq. 291. Corresponding with the order for the appointment of a guardian, in English and American practice.

ACT OF GOD. A natural cause which operates without interference or aid from man. 1 Pars. Cont. 635.

That which proceeds from the violence of nature; by that kind of force of the elements which human ability could not have foreseen or prevented. 6 Grat. (Va.) 189.

The term is sometimes defined as equivalent to inevitable accident, but incorrectly, as there is a distinction between the two, although Sir William Jones proposed the use of "inevitable accident" instead of "act of God." Jones, Bailm. 104. See Story, Bailm. § 25; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 122; 2 Crabb, Real Prop. § 2176; 4 Doug. 287; 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 190; 2 Ga. 349; 10 Miss. 572; 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 222.

All acts of God are inevitable accidents, but not all inevitable accidents are the act of God, i. e., caused by the forces of nature. 29 N. Y. 115.

See, also, "Vis Major."

ACT OF GRACE. In Scotch law. A statute by which the incarcerating creditor is bound to aliment his debtor in prison, if such debtor has no means of support, under penalty of a liberation of his debtor if such aliment be not provided. Paterson, Comp.

ACT OF HONOR. An instrument drawn up by a notary public, after protest of a bill of exchange, when a third party is desirous of paying or accepting the bill for the honor of any or all of the parties to it.

ACT OF INSOLVENCY. An act indicating insolvency, and subjecting the party to insolvency proceedings. See "Insolvency."

ACT OF LAW. A result, like the devolution of a title, produced by operation of law without the design of the parties concerned.

ACT OF SETTLEMENT. The statute of 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, limiting the English crown to the Princess Sophia, of Hanover, and the heirs of her body being Protestants.

ACT OF STATE. An act done by the sovereign power of a country, or by its delegate, within the limits of the power vested in him. An act of state cannot be questioned or made the subject of legal proceedings in a court of law.

ACT OF SUPREMACY. The statute of 1 Eliz. c. 1, declaring the supremacy of the crown over the ecclesiastical authorities.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY. The statute of 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4, enacting that the book of common prayer, as then recently revised, should be used in every parish church and other place of public worship, and otherwise ordaining a uniformity in religious services, etc. 3 Steph. Comm. 104.

ACT OF UNION. The statute of 5 Anne, c. 8, by which the articles of union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland were ratified and confirmed. 1 Bl. Comm. 97.

ACT ON PETITION. A form of summary proceeding formerly in use in the high court of admiralty, in England, in which the parties stated their respective cases briefly, and supported their statements by affidavit. 2 Dods. Adm. 174, 184; 1 Hagg. Adm. 1, note.

ACTA DIURNA (Lat.) A formula often used in signing, in the sense of "done on this day." Du Cange.

Daily transactions, chronicles, journals, registers. I do not find the thing published in the acta diurna (daily records of affairs). Tacitus, Ann. 3, 3; Ainsworth, Lex.; Smith, Lex.

ACTA EXTERIORA INDICANT INTERIora secreta. Outward acts indicate the inward intent. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 270; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (4th Am. Ed.) 115; 8 Coke, 291; 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 414; 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 401.

ACTA IN UNO JUDICIO NON PROBANT in alio nisi inter easdem personas. Things done in one action cannot be taken as evidence in another, unless it be between the same parties. Tray. Lat. Max. 11.

ACTA PUBLICA (Lat.) Things of general knowledge and concern; matters transacted before certain public officers. Calv. Lex.

ACTE. In French law. Denotes a document, or formal, solemn writing, embodying a legal attestation that something has been done, corresponding to one sense or use of the English word "act." Thus, actes de naissance are the certificates of birth, and must contain the day, hour, and place of birth, together with the sex and intended Christian name of the child, and the names of the parents and of the witnesses. Actes de mariage are the marriage certificates, and contain names, professions, ages, and places of birth and domicile of the two persons marrying, and of their parents; also the consent of these latter, and the mutual agreements of the intended husband and wife to take each other for better and worse, together with the usual attestations. Actes de deces are the certificates of death, which are required to be drawn up before any one may be buried. Les actes de l'etat civil are public documents. Brown.

ACTIO. In civil law. A specific mode of enforcing a right before the courts of law, e. g., legis actio; actio sacramenti. In this sense we speak of actions in our law, e. g., the action of debt. The right to a remedy, thus: Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio, no right of action can arise upon a naked pact. In this sense we rarely use the word "action." 3 Ortolan, Inst. § 1830; 5 Savigny, System. 10; Mackeld. Civ. Law (13th Ed.) § 193.

The first sense here given is the older one. Justinian, following Celsus, gives the well-known definition: Actio nihil aliud est, quan jus persequendi in judicio, quod sibi debetur, which may be thus rendered: An action is simply the right to enforce one's demand in a court of law. Inst. 4. 6. "De Actionibus." See "Action."

Divisions:

——According to Nature. In the sense of a specific form of remedy, there are various divisions of actiones. Actiones civiles are those forms of remedies which were established under the rigid and inflexible system of the civil law, the jus civiles. Actiones honorariae are those which were gradually introduced by the praetors and aediles, by virtue of their equitable powers, in order to prevent the failure of justice which too often resulted from the employment of the actiones civiles. These were found so beneficial in practice that they eventually supplanted the old remedies, of which, in the time of Justinian, hardly a trace remained. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 194; 5 Savigny, System. Directae actiones, as a class, were forms of remedies for cases clearly defined and recognized as actionable by the law. Utiles actiones were remedies granted by the magistrate in cases to which no actio directa was applicable. They were framed for the special occasion, by analogy to the existing form, and were generally fictitious; that is, they proceeded upon the assumption that a state of things existed which would have entitled the party to an actio directa, and the cause was tried upon this assumption, which the other party was not allowed to dispute. 5 Savigny, System, § 215.

——According to Subject-Matter. Again, there are actiones in personam and actiones in rem. The former class includes all remedies for the breach of an obligation, and are considered to be directed against the person of the wrongdoer. The second class comprehends all remedies devised for the recovery of property, or the enforcement of a right not founded upon a contract between the parties, and are therefore considered as rather aimed at the thing in dispute than at the person of the defendant. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 195; 5 Savigny, System, §§ 206-209; 3 Ortolan, Inst. § 1952 et seq.

——According to Object. In respect to their object, actions are either (a) actiones rei persequendae causa comparatae, for the recovery of property or damages, to which class belong all actiones in rem; and those of the actiones in personam, which were directed merely to the recovery of the value of a thing, or compensation for an injury; or (b) actiones poenales (called, also, actiones ex delicto), in which a penalty was recovered of the delinquent; or (c) actiones mixtae, in which were recovered both the actual damages and a penalty in addition. Actiones poenales and actiones mixtae comprehended cases of injuries for which the civil law permitted redress by private action, but which modern civilization universally regards as crimes; that is, offenses against society at large, and punished by proceedings in the name of the state alone. Thus, theft, receiving stolen goods, robbery, malicious mischief, and the murder or negligent homicide of a slave (in which case an injury to property was involved), gave rise to private actions for damages against the delinquent. Inst. 4. 1. De obligationibus quae ex delicto nascuntur. Id. 2. De bonis vi raptis. Id. 3. De lege aquilia. And see Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 196; 5 Savigny, System, §§ 210-212.

——According to Procedure. In respect to the mode of procedure, actiones in personam are divided into stricti juris, and bonae fidei actiones. In the former, the court was confined to the strict letter of the law; in the latter, something was left to the discretion of the judge, who was governed in his decision by considerations of what ought to be expected from an honest man under circumstances similar to those of the plaintiff or defendant. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 197a.

Besides this classification, the different actions had specific names, the principal of which follow.

ACTIO AD EXHIBENDUM. In civil law. An action instituted for the purpose of compelling the person against whom it was brought to exhibit some thing or title in his power.

It was always preparatory to another action, which lay for the recovery of a thing movable or immovable. 1 Merlin, Quest. de Droit, 84.

ACTIO ARBITRARIA. In the civil law. An arbitrary action; one depending upon the discretion of the judge (ex arbitrio judicis pendens); or in which the judge was allowed to determine, according to equity and the circumstances of the particular case, how satisfaction should be made to the plaintiff (permittitur judici ex bono et aequo, secundum cujusque rei de qua actum est naturam, aestimare quemadmodum actori satisfieri oporteat). If the defendant refused to conform to the decision of the judge, he might be condemned at discretion (nisi arbitrio judicis actori satisfaciat,—condemnari debeat). Inst. 4. 6. 31.

ACTIO BONAE FIDEI. See "Actio" (4).

ACTIO CALUMNIAE. In the civil law. An action to restrain the defendant from prosecuting a groundless proceeding or trumped-up charge against the plaintiff. Hunter, Rom. Law, 859.

ACTIO CIVILIS. See "Actio" (1).

ACTIO COMMODATI CONTRARIA. In civil law. An action by the borrower against the lender, to compel the execution of the contract. Poth. Pret. a Usage, note 75.

ACTIO COMMODATI DIRECTA. In civil law. An action by a lender against a borrower, the principal object of which is to obtain a restitution of the thing lent. Poth. Pret. a Usage, notes 65, 68.

ACTIO COMMUNI DIVIDUNDO. In civil law. An action for a division of the property held in common. Story, Partn. (Bennett Ed.) § 352.

ACTIO COMMUNIS. A common action. A term applied by Bracton to an action where the thing demanded was common, and not several. Bracton, fol. 103.

ACTIO CONDICTIO INDEBITATI. In civil law. An action by which the plaintiff recovers the amount of a sum of money or other thing he paid by mistake. Poth. Promutuum, note 140.

ACTIO CONFESSORIA. In the civil law. An affirmative action; an action founded upon the affirmative allegation of some right in the plaintiff in another's land, as a right of way, etc., and not upon the denial of the right of another in his land. Inst. 4. 6. 2. Confessoria dicitur, quia constituta est verbis affirmativis. Bracton, fol. 103. See "Actio Negatoria."

ACTIO CONTRARIA. In the civil law. A contrary or cross action, as distinguished from actio directa. Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 3, tit. 15, §§ 805, 816, 826; Bracton, fol. 103.

ACTIO CRIMINALIS. In the common law. A criminal action. Bracton, fol. 102b.

ACTIO DE DOLO MALO. In the civil law. An action of fraud; an action which lay for a defrauded person against the defrauder and his heirs, who had been enriched by the fraud, to obtain the restitution of the thing of which he had been fraudulently deprived, with all its accessions (cum omni causa); or, where this was not practicable, for compensation in damages. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 221, § 217; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 6, § 1152; Dig. 4. 3; Code, 2. 21; Bracton, fol. 103b.

ACTIO DE IN REM VERSO. In the civil law. An action concerning a thing converted to the profit of another; an action granted to one who had contract with a son or slave, in order to recover whatever the father or master, by means of such contract, had converted to their own advantage. Inst. 4. 7. 4; Dig. 15. 3; Code, 4. 26; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 7, § 1222; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 2, note 7.

ACTIO DE PECULIO. In the civil law. An action concerning or against the peculium or separate property of a party. An action to which fathers and masters were liable on the contracts of their children and servants, to the extent of the latter's peculium, patrimony, or separate estate. Inst. 4. 6. 10; Id. 4. 7. 4; Dig. 15. 1; Code, 4. 26; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 7, § 1219.

ACTIO DE PECUNIA CONSTITUTA. In the civil law. An action for money engaged to be paid; an action which lay against any person who had engaged to pay money for himself, or for another, without any formal stipulation (nulla stipulatione interposita). Inst. 4. 6. 9; Dig. 13. 5; Code, 4. 18.

ACTIO DEPOSITI CONTRARIA. In civil law. An action which the depositary has against the depositor, to compel him to fulfill his engagement toward him. Poth. du Depot, note 69.

ACTIO DEPOSITI DIRECTA. In civil law. An action which is brought by the depositor against the depositary, in order to get back the thing deposited. Poth. du Depot, note 60.

ACTIO DIRECTA. See "Actio" (1).

ACTIO EMPTI. See "Actio ex Empto."

ACTIO EX CONDUCTO. In civil law. An action which the bailor of a thing for hire may bring against the bailee, in order to compel him to redeliver the thing hired. Poth. du Contr. de Louage, note 59.

ACTIO EX CONTRACTU. See "Action."

ACTIO EX DELICTO. See "Action."

ACTIO EX EMPTO. In the civil law. An action of purchase, or upon purchase; an action which a buyer is entitled to maintain against a seller, in order to cause him to deliver possession of the thing sold, with its titles and fruits, and everything dependent upon it. Poth. Cont. pt. 2, c. 1, art. 5; Inst. 4. 6. 28. Otherwise called actio empti, or emti. Dig. 19. 1; Code, 4. 49; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 3, tit. 24, § 912.

ACTIO EX LOCATO. In the civil law. An action upon letting; an action which the person (locator) who let a thing for hire to another might have against the hirer (conductor). Dig. 19. 2; Code, 4. 65. See "Actio Locati."

ACTIO EX STIPULATU. In the civil law. An action to enforce a stipulation.

ACTIO EX VENDITO. In the civil law. An action upon sale; an action which a seller is entitled to maintain against a buyer to recover the price of a thing sold and delivered. Inst. 4. 6. 28; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 3, tit. 24, § 915. Called actio venditi. Id.; Dig. 19. 1; Code, 4. 49.

ACTIO EXERCITORIA. In the civil law. An action against the exercitor or employer of a vessel. See "Exercitoria Actio."

ACTIO FAMILIAE ERCISCUNDAE. In civil law. An action for the division of an inheritance. Inst. 4. 6. 20; Bracton, 100b.

ACTIO FINIUM REGUNDORUM. In the civil law. An action for the determination of boundaries between adjoining lands. Inst. 4. 17. 6; Id. 4. 6. 20. Enumerated by Bracton and Fleta among mixed actions. Bracton, fol. 444; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 9, § 3. See "Finium Regundorum Actio."

ACTIO FURTI. In the civil law. An action of theft; an action founded upon theft. Inst. 4. 1. 13-17; Bracton, fol. 444. This could only be brought for the penalty attached to the offense (tantum ad poenae persecutionem pertinet), and not to recover the thing stolen itself, for which other actions were provided. Inst. 4. 1. 19.

ACTIO HONORARIA. See "Actio" (1).

ACTIO IN FACTUM. In civil law. An action adapted to the particular case which had an analogy to some actio in jus, which was founded on some subsisting acknowledged law. Spence, Eq. Jur. 212. The origin of these actions is strikingly similar to that of actions on the case at common law. See "Case."

ACTIO IN PERSONAM (Lat.) an action against the person. See "Actio" (2).

A personal action.

This is the term in use in the civil law to denote the actions which in the common law are called "personal." In modern usage it is applied in English and American law to those suits in admiralty which are directed against the person of the defendant, as distinguished from those in rem, which are directed against the specific thing from which (or rather the proceeds of the sale of which) the complainant expects and claims a right to derive satisfaction for the injury done to him.

ACTIO IN QUADRUPLUM. In the civil law. An action for the quadruple value of a thing. Inst. 4. 6. 21; Bracton, fol. 103a.

ACTIO IN REM. An action against the thing. See "Actio" (2).

ACTIO IN SIMPLUM. In the civil law. An action for the single value of a thing. Inst. 4. 6. 21. 22; Bracton, fol. 103a.

ACTIO IN TRIPLUM. In the civil law. An action for the triple value of a thing. Inst. 4. 6. 21. 24; Bracton, fol. 103a.

ACTIO INDIRECTA. An indirect action. A species of action mentioned by Bracton, probably the reverse of the actio directa. Bracton, fol. 103a.

ACTIO INJURIARUM, or DAMNI INJURIA. In the civil law. An action for injuries done by beating, wounding, slanderous language, libel, and the like. Inst. 4. 4. pr. 1, 12; Bracton, fol. 103b.

ACTIO JUDICATI. In civil law. An action instituted, after four months had elapsed after the rendition of judgment, in which the judge issued his warrant to seize, first, the movables, which were sold within eight days afterwards, and then the immovables, which were delivered in pledge to the creditors, or put under the care of a curator, and if, at the end of two months, the debt was not paid, the land was sold. Dig. 42. 1; Code, 8. 34.

According to some authorities, if the defendant then utterly denied the rendition of the former judgment, the plaintiff was driven to a new action, conducted like any other action, which was called actio judicati, and which had for its object the determination of the question whether such a judgment had been rendered. The exact meaning of the term is by no means clear. See Savigny, System, 305, 411; 3 Ortolan, Just. § 2033.

ACTIO LEGIS. In the Roman law. A legal or lawful action; an action of or at law. Dig. 1. 2. 2. 6.

One of the sources of the unwritten law of Rome. Butler, Hor. Jur. 47. So called, according to Gaius, either because they were expressly given by the laws, or because they were expressed in the words of the laws. Gaius, Inst. iv. § 11.

ACTIO LEGIS AQUILLE. In the civil law. An action under the Aquilian law; an action to recover damages for maliciously or injuriously killing or wounding the slave or beast of another, or injuring in any way a thing belonging to another. Otherwise called damni injuriae actio. Inst. 4. 3; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 3; Halifax, Anal. bk. 2, c. 24; Bracton, fol. 103b.

ACTIO LOCATI. In the civil law. An action which lay for the letter (locator) of a thing against the hirer, where the terms of the contract were not complied with by the latter. Inst. 3. 25. pr.; Dig. 19. 2; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 3, tit. 25, § 928. See "Actio ex Locato."

ACTIO MANDATI. In civil law. An action founded upon a mandate.

ACTIO MIXTA (or MISTA). See "Actio" (3).

An action in which each party is actor, or plaintiff; such as the actions finium regundorum, familiae erciscundae, communi dividundo, and others. Dig. 47. 7. 37. 1.

ACTIO NEGATORIA (or NEGATIVA). In the civil law. A negatory or negative action; an action founded on the denial (negatio) of another's right; as where a right of way or other servitude in a particular estate is denied. Inst. 4. 6. 2; Bracton, fol. 103a; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 6, § 1136; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 1, note 8. See "Actio Confessoria."

ACTIO NEGOTIORUM GESTORUM. In the civil law. An action upon, or on account of, business done. An action given in cases where a person transacted the business of another during his absence (cum quis negotia absentis gesserit), or without a commission or authority (sine mandato). Inst. 3. 28. This was of two kinds—a direct action, which lay for the person whose business had been transacted, against him who had transacted it (domino rei gestae adversus eum qui gessit), and a cross action, which lay for the negotiorum gestor, as he was called, against the other. Id.; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 3, tit. 28, §§ 973, 974. See "Negotiorum Gestio."

This action is enumerated by Bracton and Fleta among actions arising quasi ex contractu, or ex quasi contractu. Bracton, fol. 100b; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60, § 1.

ACTIO NON. In pleading. The declaration in a special plea "that the said plaintiff ought not to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against" the defendant (in Latin, actio non habere debet).

It follows immediately after the statement of appearance and defense. 1 Chit. Pl. 531; 2 Chit. Pl. 421; Steph. Pl. 394.

ACTIO NOMINATAE (Lat. a named action). In English law. A writ for which there was a precedent in the English chancery prior to St. 13 Edw. 1. (Westminster II.) c. 34.

The clerks would make no writs except in such actions prior to this statute, according to some accounts. 17 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 195. See "Action;" "Case."

ACTIO NON ACCREVIT INFRA SEX annos (Lat.) The action did not accrue within six years.

——In Pleading. A plea of the statute of limitations, by which the defendant insists that the plaintiff's action has not accrued within six years. It differs from non assumpsit in this: Non assumpsit is the proper plea to an action on a simple contract, when the action accrues on the promise; but when it does not accrue on the promise, but subsequently to it, the proper plea is actio non accrevit, etc. Lawes, Pl. 733; 5 Bin. (Pa.) 200, 203; 2 Salk. 422; 1 Saund. 33, note 2; 2 Saund. 63b.

ACTIO NON DATUR NON DAMNIFICO. An action is not given to one who is not injured. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 69.

ACTIO NON FACIT REUM, NISI MENS sit rea. An action does not make one guilty unless the intention be bad. Lofft, 37.

ACTIO NON ULTERIUS (Lat.) In English pleading. A name given to the distinctive clause in the plea to the further maintenance of the action, introduced in place of the plea puis darrein continuance; the averment being that the plaintiff ought not further (ulterius) to have or maintain his action. Steph. Pl. 64, 65, 401.

ACTIO NOXALIS. In the civil law. A noxal action; an action which lay against a master for a crime committed or injury done by his slave, and in which the master had the alternative either to pay for the damage done or to deliver up the slave to the complaining party. Inst. 4. 8. pr.; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 8; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 2. So called from noxa, the slave or offending person, or noxia, the offense or injury itself. Inst. 4. 8. 1.

ACTIO PERPETUA. In the civil law. A perpetual or unlimited action; one not limited to any particular period within which it should be brought. Inst. 4. 12. pr. The opposite of the actio temporalis (q. v.)

ACTIO PERSONALIS. A personal action. The proper term in the civil law is actio in personam.

ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM persona (Lat.) A personal action dies with the person.

——In Practice. A maxim which formerly expressed the law in regard to the surviving of personal actions.

ACTIO PIGNORATICIA. In the civil law. An action of pledge; an action founded on the contract of pledge (pignus). Dig. 13. 7; Code, 4. 24.

ACTIO POENAE PERSECUTORIA. In the civil law. An action prosecuted for a penalty only, and not for a specific thing. Inst. 4. 6. 16. 18.

ACTIO POENALIS. In the civil law. A penal action; an action brought to enforce the payment of a private penalty. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 193, § 196.

ACTIO POENALIS IN HAEREDEM NON datur, nisi forte ex damno locupletior haeres factus sit. A penal action is not given against an heir, unless, indeed, such heir is benefited by the wrong.

ACTIO PRAEJUDICIALIS. In the civil law. A preliminary or preparatory action; an action brought for the determination of some point or question arising in another or principal action, and so called from its being determined before (prius, or prae judicari) the principal action could proceed. Bracton, 104a; Cowell. Of this nature were actions for determining a man's civil state or condition, as whether he was a freeman or a slave, legitimate or illegitimate. Inst. 4. 6. 13; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 6, § 1142; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 1, note 14.

ACTIO PRAESCRIPTIS VERBIS. In civil law. A form of action which derived its force from continued usage or the responsa prudentium, and was founded on the unwritten law. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 212.

The distinction between this action and an actio in factum is said to be that the latter was founded, not on usage or the unwritten law, but by analogy to or on the equity of some subsisting law. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 212.

ACTIO PRAETORIA. In the civil law. A praetorian action; one introduced by the praetor, as distinguished from the more ancient actio civilis. Inst. 4. 6. 3; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 189, § 194.

ACTIO PRO SOCIO. In the civil law. An action for a copartner; an action which one copartner (socius) might have against another. Dig. 17. 2; Code, 4. 37.

ACTIO PROPRIA. An action brought for the recovery of a several thing (res propria), as distinguished from a thing held in common. Bracton, fol. 103a.

ACTIO PUBLICIANA. In the civil law. An action which lay for one who had lost a thing of which he had bona fide obtained possession before he had gained a property (dominium) in it, in order to have it restored, under color that he had obtained a property in it by prescription. Inst. 4. 6. 4; Dig. 6. 2.; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 6, § 1131; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 1, note 9. It was an honorary action, and derived its name from the praetor Publicius, by whose edict it was first given. Inst. 4. 6. 4.

ACTIO QUAELIBET IT SUA VIA. Every action proceeds in its own course. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 77.

ACTIO QUANTI MINORIS. In the civil law. An action given to a purchaser who had paid more for a thing than it was intrinsically worth, to recover back so much of the price as the thing was of less value (quanti minoris), or fell short in value, by reason of the defect. Poth. Cont. pt. 2, c. 1, § 4, art. 5; 1 Kames, Eq. 271.

ACTIO QUOD JUSSU. In the civil law. An action given against a master, founded on some business done by his slave, acting under his order (jussu). Inst. 4. 7. 1; Dig. 15. 4; Code, 4. 26.

ACTIO QUOD METUS CAUSA. In the civil law. An action granted by unlawful force, or fear (metus causa) that was not groundless (metus probabilis or justus), to deliver, sell, or promise a thing to another. Bracton, fol. 103b; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 120, § 216.

ACTIO (or INTERDICTUM) QUOD VI aut clam. In the civil law. An action which lay where one forcibly or clandestinely (vi aut clam) erected or demolished a building on his own or another's ground, and thereby unlawfully injured another; its object being to get everything restored to its former condition, and to obtain damages. Dig. 43. 24. 1. Bracton gives this action a place in his system of remedies, defining it as one which lay against him who had erected or prostrated a building on another's land, and concealed himself in order to avoid being prevented from doing it (et se occultavit, ne sibi prohiberetur), and observes that the offender might by this action be compelled to restore everything to its former state, at his own expense. Bracton, fols. 103b, 104a.

ACTIO REALIS (Lat.) A real action. The proper term in the civil law was rei vindicatio.

ACTIO REDHIBITORIA. In civil law. An action to compel a vendor to take back the thing sold, and return the price paid.

ACTIO REI PERSECUTORIA. In the civil law. An action for the recovery of a specific thing (rei persequendae cause comparata) or damages; as distinguished from the actio poenae persecutoria, and the actio mixta. Inst. 4. 6. 16, 17; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 192, § 196.

ACTIO RERUM AMOTARUM. In the civil law. An action for things removed; an action which, in cases of divorce, lay for a husband against a wife, to recover things carried away by the latter, in contemplation of such divorce (divortii consilio). Dig. 25. 2; Id. 25. 2. 25. 30. It also lay for the wife against the husband in such cases. Id. 25. 2. 7. 11; Code, 5, 21.

ACTIO RESCISSORIA. In civil law. An action for rescinding a title acquired by prescription in a case where the party bringing the action was entitled to exemption from the operation of the prescription.

ACTIO SEPULCHRI VIOLATI. In the civil law. An action for violating a grave. Dig. 47. 12; Code, 9. 19.

ACTIO SERVIANA. In the civil law. An action which lay for the lessor of a farm, or rural estate, to recover the goods of the lessee or farmer, which were pledged or bound for the rent. Inst. 4. 6. 7; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 6, § 1139; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 1, note 12.

ACTIO SPECIALIS. In the civil law. A special action; an action brought to enforce the delivery of one of several single things. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 193, § 196; Dig. 6. 1. 1.

ACTIO STRICTI JURIS (Lat. an action of strict right). An action in which the judge followed the formula that was sent to him closely, administered such relief only as that warranted, and admitted such claims as were distinctly set forth by the pleadings of the parties. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 218.

ACTIO TEMPORALIS. In the civil law. A temporary action; an action limited to a certain time, within which it was to be instituted, on pain of losing it; the opposite of actio perpetua (q. v.) Inst. 4. 12.

ACTIO TRIBUTORIA. In the civil law. An action for distribution (Lat. tribuere, to distribute); an action which lay for the creditor of a son or slave, who had traded upon his peculium, with the knowledge of his father or master, to obtain from the latter a distributive or proportionate share of the goods traded in (peculiares merces), or their proceeds. Inst. 4. 7. 3; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 7, § 1217; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 2, note 6.

ACTIO TUTELAE. In the civil law. An action of tutelage.

ACTIO (or INTERDICTUM) UNDE VI. In the civil law. An action or interdict which lay to recover possession of an immovable thing, as land, of which one had been deprived by force. So called from the formal words in it,—unde tu illum vi dejecisti, from which you have ejected him by force. Gaius, Inst. iv. 154; Inst. 4. 15. 6; Dig. 43. 16. It resembled the modern action of ejectment, and is adopted by Bracton in his system of actions. Bracton, fol. 103b.

ACTIO UTILIS. An action for the benefit of those who had the beneficial use of property, but not the legal title; an equitable action. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 214.

It was subsequently extended to include many other instances where a party was equitably entitled to relief, although he did not come within the strict letter of the law and the formulae appropriate thereto.

ACTIO VENDITI. See "Actio ex Venditio."

ACTIO VI BONORUM RAPTORUM. In the civil law. An action for goods taken by force; a species of mixed action, which lay for a party whose goods or movables (bona) had been taken from him by force (vi), to recover the things so taken, together with a penalty of triple the value. Inst. 4. 2; Id. 4. 6. 19. Bracton describes it as lying de rebus mobilibus vi ablatis sive robbatis, for movable things taken away by force, or robbed. Bracton, fol. 103b.

ACTIO VULGARIS. In civil law. A legal action; a common action.

ACTION (Lat. agere, to do; to lead; to conduct). A doing of something; something done.

The term is, in legal usage, confined to practice, having no technical meaning, in the substantive law, except in the French law, in which it denotes shares in a company, or stock in a corporation.

It signifies the formal demand of one's right from another person or party made and insisted on in a court of justice.

In Justinian's Institute, "action" was defined as the right of pursuing in a court of justice what was due one's self. Inst. 4. In the Digest, however, it was defined as the right of pursuing, the pursuit itself, or exercise of this right, or the form of proceedings by which it was exercised. Dig. 50. 16. 16; Id. 1. 2. 10. This definition is adopted by Mr. Taylor (Tayl. Civ. Law, p. 50). In modern usage, the signification of the right of pursuing has been generally dropped, though it is recognized by Bracton (98b), Coke (2d Inst. 40), and Blackstone (3 Comm. 116), while the two latter senses, of the exercise of the right, and the means or method of its exercise, are in general use.

The vital idea of an action is a proceeding on the part of one person as actor against another, for the infringement of some right of the first, before a court of justice, in the manner prescribed by the court or the law. Subordinate to this is now connected in a quite common use the idea of the answer of the defendant or person proceeded against; the adducing evidence by each party to sustain his position; the adjudication of the court upon the right of the plaintiff; and the means taken to enforce the right, or recompense the wrong done, in case the right is established and shown to have been injuriously affected. 3 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 318.

All proceedings in the court up to the final termination of the litigation, whether instituted by a party, by a third person, or by the court of its own motion, are part of the action, if incidental; the principal remedy constituting the action, and founded on its existence. Even when regulated by special statute, such proceedings are considered proceedings in the action, and not special proceedings, except where the statutes otherwise declare, or the papers are so entitled as to forbid their being so treated.

As distinguished from "suit," the word "action" is generally applied to proceedings at law, and "suit" to proceedings in equity. 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 300. See "Suit."

Actions are to be distinguished from those proceedings, such as writ of error, scire facias, mandamus, and the like, where, under the form of proceedings, the court, and not the plaintiff, appears to be the actor. 6 Bin. (Pa.) 9.

Actions are classified as (1) in the civil law, or (2) in the common law.

——(1a) Civil Actions in the Civil Law. Those personal actions which are instituted to compel payments, or do some other thing purely civil. Poth. Introd. Gen. aux Coutumes, 110.

——(1b) Criminal Actions in the Civil Law. Those personal actions in which the plaintiff asks reparation for the commission of some tort or injury which he or those who belong to him have sustained.

——(1c) Mixed Actions in the Civil Law. Those which partake of the nature of both real and personal actions; as actions of partition; actions to recover property and damages. Inst. 4. 6. 18-20; Domat, Supp. Civ. Law, liv. 4, tit. 1, note 4.

——(1d) Mixed Personal Actions in the Civil Law. Those which partake of both a civil and a criminal character.

——(1e) Personal Actions in the Civil Law. Those in which one person (actor) sues another as defendant (reus) in respect of some obligation which he is under to the actor, either ex contractu or ex delicto, to perform some act or make some compensation.

——(1f) Real Actions in the Civil Law. Those by which a person seeks to recover his property, which is in the possession of another.

——(2a) Civil Actions in the Common Law. Those actions which have for their object the recovery of private or civil rights, or of compensation for their infraction.

——(2b) Criminal Actions in the Common Law. Those actions prosecuted in a court of justice, in the name of the government, against one or more individuals accused of a crime. See 1 Chit. Crim. Law.

——(2c) Local Actions in the Common Law. Those civil actions the cause of which could have arisen in some particular place or county only. See "Local Action."

——(2d) Mixed Actions in the Common Law. Those which partake of the nature of both real and personal actions. See "Mixed Action."

——(2e) Personal Actions in the Common Law. Those civil actions which are brought for the recovery of personal property, for the enforcement of some contract, or to recover damages for the commission of an injury to the person or property. See "Personal Action."

——(2f) Real Actions in the Common Law. Those brought for the specific recovery of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. Steph. Pl. 3. See "Real Action."

——(2g) Transitory Actions in the Common Law. Those civil actions the cause of which might have arisen in one place or county as well as another.

ACTION FOR POINDING OF THE ground. See "Poinding."

ACTION IN PERSONAM. See "Actio in Personam."

ACTION IN REM. See "Actio in Rem."

ACTION OF A WRIT. A phrase used when a defendant pleads some matter by which he shows that the plaintiff had no cause to have the writ sued upon, although it may be that he is entitled to another writ or action for the same matter. Cowell.

ACTION OF ABSTRACTED MULTURES. In Scotch law. An action for multures or tolls against those who are thirled to a mill, i. e., bound to grind their corn at a certain mill, and fail to do so. Bell, Dict.

ACTION OF ADHERENCE. In Scotch law. An action competent to a husband or wife, to compel either party to adhere in case of desertion. It is analogous to the English suit for restitution of conjugal rights. Wharton.

ACTION OF BOOK DEBT. A form of action resorted to in the states of Connecticut and Vermont for the recovery of claims, such as usually evidenced by a book account. 1 Day (Conn.) 105; 4 Day (Conn.) 105; 2 Vt. 366. See 1 Conn. 75; 11 Conn. 205.

ACTION ON THE CASE. See "Case."

ACTION ORDINARY. In Scotch law. All actions which are not rescissory.

ACTION REDHIBITORY. See "Redhibitory Action."

ACTION RESCISSORY. See "Rescissory Actions."

ACTIONABLE. For which an action will lie. 3 Bl. Comm. 23.

ACTIONARY. A commercial term used in Europe to denote a proprietor of shares or actions in a joint-stock company.

ACTIONES. Actions. Plural of actio (q. v.), and is used in combination in the same manner.

ACTIONUM GENERA MAXIME SUNT servanda. The kinds of actions are especially to be preserved. Lofft, 460.

ACTIVE. That which requires action. Thus, an active trust is one requiring action by the trustee to execute the donor's will.

ACTON BURNELL. An ancient English statute, so called because enacted by a parliament held at the village of Acton Burnell.

It is otherwise known as statutum mercatorum or de mercatoribus, the statute of the merchants. It was a statute for the collection of debts, the earliest of its class, being enacted in 1283.

A further statute for the same object, and known as De Mercatoribus, was enacted 13 Edw. I. c. 3. See "Statute Merchant."

ACTOR (Lat. agere). In civil law.

(1) A patron, pleader, or advocate. Du Cange; Cowell; Spelman.

Actor ecclesiae was an advocate for a church; one who protects the temporal interests of a church. Actor villae was the steward or head bailiff of a town or village. Cowell.

(2) One who takes care of his lord's lands. Du Cange.

(3) A guardian or tutor; one who transacts the business of his lord or principal; nearly synonymous with "agent," which comes from the same word.

The word has a variety of closely related meanings, very nearly corresponding with "manager." Thus, actor dominae, manager of his master's farms; actor ecclesiae, manager of church property; actores provinciarum, tax gatherers, treasurers, and managers of the public debt.

(4) A plaintiff; contrasted with reus, the defendant. Actores regis, those who claimed money of the king. Du Cange; Spelman; Cowell.

ACTOR QUI CONTRA REGULAM QUID adduxit, non est quidiendus. A pleader ought not to be heard who advances a proposition contrary to the rules of law.

ACTOR SEQUITUR FORUM REI. The plaintiff must follow the forum of the thing in dispute. Kames, Law Tr. 232; Story, Confl. Laws, § 325k; 2 Kent, Comm. 462.

ACTORE NON PROBANTE REUS ABsolvitur. If the plaintiff does not prove his case, the defendant is absolved. Hob. 103.

ACTORI INCUMBIT ONUS PROBANDI. The burden of proof lies on the plaintiff. Hob. 103.

ACTUAL OCCUPATION. See "Occupation."

ACTUAL OUSTER. See "Ouster."

ACTUAL POSSESSION. See "Possession."

ACTUAL TOTAL LOSS. In marine insurance the complete destruction of the insured vessel, so that it cannot be recovered or repaired, as distinguished from constructive total, which authorizes an abandonment to the underwriters. 25 Ohio St. 64. See "Abandonment."

ACTUARIUS (Lat.) One who drew the acts or statutes; one who wrote in brief the public acts.

An officer who had charge of the public baths; an officer who received the money for the soldiers, and distributed it among them; a notary.

An actor (q. v.) Du Cange.

ACTUARY. The manager of a joint-stock company, particularly an insurance company. Penny, Cyc.

A clerk, in some corporations vested with various powers.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. A clerk who registers the acts and constitutions of the convocation.

ACTUM (Lat. agere). A deed; something done.

Datum relates to the time of the delivery of the instrument; actum, the time of making it; factum, the thing made. Gestum denotes a thing done without writing; actum, a thing done in writing. Du Cange, "Actus."

ACTUS (Lat. agere, to do; actus, done).

——In Civil Law. A thing done. See "Actum."

——In Roman Law. A servitude which carried the right of driving animals and vehicles across the lands of another.

It included also the iter, or right of passing across on foot or on horseback.

——In English Law. An act of parliament. 8 Coke, 40.

A foot and horse way. Co. Litt. 56a.

ACTUS CURIAE NEMINEM GRAVABIT. An act of the court shall prejudice no man. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 118; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 115; 1 Strange, 126; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 245-255; 12 C. B. 415.

ACTUS DEI NEMINEM FACIT INJURIam. The act of God does wrong to no one,—that is, no one is responsible in damages for inevitable accidents. 2 Bl. Comm. 122; 1 Coke, 97b; 5 Coke, 87; Co. Litt. 206a; 4 Taunt. 309; 1 Term R. 33. See "Act of God."

ACTUS INCEPTUS CUJUS PERFECTIO pendet ex voluntate partium, revocari potest; si autem pendet ex voluntate tertiae personae, vel ex contingenti, revocari non potest. An act already begun, whose completion depends upon the will of the parties, may be recalled; but if it depend on the consent of a third person, or on a contingency, it cannot be recalled. Bac. Max. reg. 20. See Story, Ag. § 424.

ACTUS JUDICIARIUS CORAM NON JUdice irritus habetur; de ministeriali autem a quocunque provenit ratum esto. A judicial act before one not a judge is void; as to a ministerial act, from whomsoever it proceeds, let it be valid. Lofft, 458.

ACTUS LEGIS NEMINI EST DAMNOSUS. The act of the law is hurtful to no one; an act in law shall prejudice no man. 2 Inst. 287.

ACTUS LEGIS NEMINI FACIT INJURIam. The act of the law does no one wrong. 5 Coke, 116; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 123.

ACTUS LEGITIMI NON RECIPIUNT MOdum. Acts required by law admit of no qualification. Hob. 153; Branch, Princ.

ACTUS ME INVITO FACTUS, NON EST meus actus. An act done by me against my will is not my act. Bracton, 101b.

ACTUS NON REUM FACIT NISI MENS rea. The act does not make a person guilty unless the intention be guilty also. This maxim applies only in criminal cases; in civil matters it is otherwise. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 270, 275, 329; 7 Term R. 514; 3 Bing. N. C. 34, 468; 5 Man. & G. 639; 3 C. B. 229; 5 C. B. 380; 9 Clark & F. 531; 4 N. Y. 159, 163, 195; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2211.

ACTUS REPUGNUM NON POTEST IN esse produci. A repugnant act cannot be brought into being, i. e., cannot be made effectual. Plowd. 355.

ACTUS SERVI IN IIS QUIBUS OPERA ejus communiter adhibita est, actus domini habetur. The act of a servant in those things in which he is usually employed is considered the act of his master. Lofft, 227.

AD. In Latin phrases. A preposition denoting at, by, for, near, on account of, to, until, upon.

AD ABUNDANTIOREM CAUTELAM (Lat.) For greater caution.

AD ADMITTENDUM CLERICUM. For the admitting of the clerk. A writ commanding the bishop to admit his clerk, upon the success of the latter in a quare impedit.

AD ALIUD EXAMEN (Lat.) To another tribunal. Calv. Lex.

AD ALIUM DIEM. At another day. A common phrase in the old reports. Y. B. P. 7 Hen. VI. 13.

AD ASSISAS CAPIENDAS. To take assizes; to take or hold the assizes. Bracton, fol. 110a; 3 Bl. Comm. 185. Ad assisam capiendam, to take an assize. Bracton, fol. 110b.

AD AUDIENDUM ET TERMINANDUM. To hear and determine.

AD BARRAM (Lat.) To the bar; at the bar. 3 How. St. Tr. 112.

AD CAMPI PARTEM. For a share of the field or land (ut particeps fiat) for champert. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 36, § 4.

AD CAPTUM VULGI. Adapted to the common understanding.

AD COLLIGENDUM BONA DEFUNCTI. To collect the goods of the deceased. Special letters of administration granted to one or more persons, authorizing them to collect and preserve the goods of the deceased, are so called. 2 Bl. Comm. 505; 2 Steph. Comm. 241. These are otherwise termed "letters ad colligendum," and the party to whom they are granted, a "collector." 2 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 19, §§ 38, 39.

AD COMMUNEM LEGEM. At common law. The name of a species of writ of entry, now obsolete.

Formerly, when tenants for life in dower or by the curtesy aliened the land which they held, the reversioner might, after their death, have the writ to recover possession. 3 Bl. Comm. 183, note (z); 1 Rosc. Real Actions, 93, 94.

AD COMPARENDUM. To appear. Reg. Orig. 60a. Ad comparendum, et ad standum juri, to appear and to stand to the law, or abide the judgment of the court. Cro. Jac. 67.

AD QUAERIMONIAM. On complaint of.

AD QUAESTIONEM FACTI NON RESpondent judices; ad quaestionem legis non respondent juratores. Judges do not answer to a question of fact; jurors do not answer to a question of law. Co. Litt. 295b; 8 Coke, 308 (155). Or, as the converse is sometimes affirmatively stated: Ad quaestionem juris respondent judices; ad quaestionem facti respondent juratores, judges answer to a question of law; jurors, to a question of fact; or ad quaestiones legis judices, et non juratores respondent, judges, and not jurors, respond to questions of law. 7 Mass. 279.

AD QUEM (Lat.) To which.

The correlative term to a quo (q. v.), used in the computation of time, definition of a risk, etc., denoting the end of the period or journey.

The terminus a quo is the point of beginning or departure; the terminus ad quem, the end of the period, or point of arrival.

AD QUOD CURIA CONCORDAVIT. To which the court agreed.

AD QUOD DAMNUM (Lat.) What injury.

A writ issuing out of and returnable into chancery, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to inquire by a jury what damage it will be to the king, or any other, to grant a liberty, fair, market, highway, or the like.

The name is derived from the characteristic words denoting the nature of the writ, to inquire how great an injury it will be to the king to grant the favor asked. Whishaw; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 221; Termes de la Ley.

AD QUOD NON FUIT RESPONSUM (Law Lat.) To which there was no answer. A phrase used in the reports, where a point advanced in argument by one party was not denied by the other; or where a point or argument of counsel was not met or noticed by the court; or where an objection was met by the court, and not replied to by the counsel who raised it. 3 Coke, 9; 4 Coke, 40.

AD RATIONEM PONERE. To cite a person to appear.

AD RECOGNOSCENDUM. To recognize. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 65, § 12. Formal words in old writs.

AD RECTE DOCENDUM OPORTET, primum inquirere nomina, quia rerum cognitio a nominibus rerum dependet. In order rightly to comprehend a thing, inquire first into the names, for a right knowledge of things depends upon their names. Co. Litt. 68.

AD REPARATIONEM ET SUSTENTAtionem. For repairing and keeping in suitable condition.

AD RESPONDENDUM. See "Capias ad Respondendum;" "Habeas Corpus."

AD SATISFACIENDUM. See "Capias ad Satisfaciendum."

AD SECTAM. At the suit of.

It is commonly abbreviated. It is used where it is desirable to put the name of the defendant first, as in some cases where the defendant is filing his papers; thus, Roe ads. Doe, where Doe is plaintiff and Roe defendant. It is found in the indexes to cases decided in some of our older American books of reports, but has become pretty much disused.

AD STUDENDUM ET ORANDUM. For studying and praying; for the promotion of learning and religion. A phrase applied to colleges and universities. 1 Bl. Comm. 467; T. Raym. 101.

AD TERMINUM ANNORUM. For a term of years.

AD TERMINUM QUI PRAETERIT. A writ of entry which formerly lay for the lessor or his heirs, when a lease had been made of lands and tenements, for term of life or years, and, after the term had expired, the lands were withheld from the lessor by the tenant, or other person possessing the same. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 201.

The remedy now applied for holding over is by ejectment, or under local regulations, by summary proceedings.

AD TRISTEM PARTEM STRENUA EST suspicio. Suspicion lies heavy on the unfortunate side.

AD TUNC ET IBIDEM. In pleading. The technical name of that part of an indictment containing the statement of the subject-matter's "then and there being found." Bac. Abr. "Indictment" (G 4); 1 N. C. 93.

AD ULTIMAM VIM TERMINORUM. To the utmost import of the terms.

AD USUM ET COMMODUM. To the use and benefit.

AD VALENTIAM. See "Ad Valorem."

AD VALOREM (Lat.) According to the valuation.

Duties may be specific or ad valorem. Ad valorem duties are always estimated at a certain per cent. on the valuation of the property. 3 U. S. St. at Large, 732; 24 Miss. 501.

AD VENTREM INSPICIENDUM. To inspect the womb. A writ for the summoning of a jury of matrons to determine the question of pregnancy.

AD VIM MAJOREM VEL AD CASUS fortuitos non tenetur quis, nisi sua culpa intervenerit. No one is held to answer for the effects of a superior force, or of an accident, unless his own fault has contributed. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 72, § 16.

AD VITAM. For life.

AD VITAM AUT CULPAM. For life, or until misbehavior.

Words descriptive of a tenure of office "for life or good behavior," equivalent to quamdiu bene se gesserit.

AD VOLUNTATEM. At will.

AD WARACTUM. See "Waractum."

ADCORDABILIS DENARII. Money paid by a vassal to his lord upon the selling or exchanging of a feud. Enc. Lond.

ADDICERE (Lat.) In civil law. To condemn. Calv. Lex.

Addictio denotes a transfer of the goods of a deceased debtor to one who assumes his liabilities. Calv. Lex. The giving up to a creditor of his debtor's person by a magistrate; also the transfer of the debtor's goods to one who assumes his liabilities.

Also used of an assignment of the person of the debtor to the successful party in a suit.

ADDITIO PROBAT MINORITATEM. An addition proves inferiority. Coke, 4th Inst. 80; Wingate, Max. 211, max. 60; Litt. § 293; Co. Litt. 189a.

ADDITION (Lat. additio, an adding to).

Whatever is added to a man's name by way of title or description, as additions of mystery, place, or degree. Cowell; Termes de la Ley; 10 Wentw. Pl. 371; Salk. 5; 2 Ld. Raym. 988; 1 Wils. 244.

Additions are:

(1) Additions of estate, as "esquire," "gentleman," and the like. These titles can, however, be claimed by none, and may be assumed by any one. In Nash v. Battersby, 2 Ld. Raym, 986, 6 Mod. 80, the plaintiff declared with the addition of gentleman. The defendant pleaded in abatement that the plaintiff was no gentleman. The plaintiff demurred, and it was held ill; for, said the court, it amounts to a confession that the plaintiff is no gentleman, and then not the person named in the count. He should have replied that he is a gentleman.

(2) Additions of mystery, as scrivener, painter, printer, manufacturer, etc.

(3) Additions of places, descriptions by the place of residence, as "A. B., of Philadelphia," and the like. See Bac. Abr.; Doct. Plac. 71; 2 Viner, Abr. 77; 1 Lilly, Reg. 39; 1 Metc. (Mass.) 151.

——In French Law. A supplementary process to obtain additional information. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

ADDITIONALES. Additional terms or propositions to be added to a former agreement.

ADDONE, or ADDONNE (Law Fr.) Given to. Kelham.

ADDRESS.

——In Legislation. A formal request addressed to the executive by one or both branches of the legislative body, requesting him to perform some act.

ADEEM. To recall or revoke. See "Ademption."

ADELANTADO. In Spanish law. The military and political governor of a frontier province. His powers were equivalent to those of the president of a Roman province. He commanded the army of the territory which he governed, and, assisted by persons learned in the law, took cognizance of the civil and criminal suits that arose in his province. This office has long since been abolished.

ADELING, or ATHELING. Noble; excellent. A title of honor among the Saxons, given to the king's children and heirs to the crown. Clito; Spelman.

ADEMPTION. The extinction of a specific legacy by the testator's parting with the subject thereof during his life. Also applied to the payment by the testator during his life of a general legacy; but this is more properly known as "satisfaction." 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 35; 3 Duer (N. Y.) 477.

The term is not applied to devises. 108 N. Y. 535.

ADEO (Lat.) So; as. Adeo plene et integre, as fully and entirely. 10 Coke, 65.

ADEQUATE CONSIDERATION. One which is a fair equivalent in value for the benefit obtained.

ADEQUATE REMEDY. A legal remedy, to be "adequate," so as to exclude the jurisdiction of equity, must be "as practical and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity." 8 Pet. (U. S.) 210. See 134 U. S. 338.

ADESSE. In the civil law. To be present; the opposite of abesse. Calv. Lex.

To advocate, to undertake the management of a cause. Calv. Lex.; Brissonius.

ADEU. See "Adieu."

ADFERRUMINATIO. In the civil law. The welding together of iron; a species of adjunction (q. v.) Called, also, ferruminatio. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 268.

ADHERENCE. In Scotch law. The name of a form of action by which the mutual obligation of marriage may be enforced by either party. Bell, Dict.

ADHERING (Lat. adhaerere, to cling to). Cleaving to, or joining; as, adhering to the enemies of the United States.

The constitution of the United States, (article 3, § 3) defines treason against the United States to consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

A citizen's cruising in an enemy's ship, with a design to capture or destroy American ships, would be adhering to the enemies of the United States. 4 How. St. Tr. 328; Salk. 634; 2 Gilb. Ev. (Lofft Ed.) 798.

ADHIBERE (Lat.) In the civil law. To apply; to employ; to exercise; to use. Adhibere diligentiam, to use care. Adhibere vim, to employ force. Dig. 4. 2. 12. 2.

ADIATION. A term used in the laws of Holland for the application of property by an executor. Wharton.

ADIEU (Law Fr. without day). A common term in the Year Books, implying final dismissal from court. Literally, "to God." Frequently written "Adeu." Y. B. T. 5 Edw. II. 173.

ADIRATUS. Lost; strayed; a price or value set upon things stolen or lost, as a recompense to the owner. Cowell.

ADIT. Approach or access. As used in mining law, a horizontal opening by which a mine is entered, or by which water and ores are carried away. Also called "drift."

ADITUS (Lat. adire). An approach; a way; a public way. Co. Litt. 56a.

ADJACENT. Next to or near.
Two of three lots of land might be described as adjacent to the first, while only the second could be said to be adjoining. 1 Cooke (Tenn.) 128.

ADJECTIVE LAW. That which regulates procedure; so called from its function to aid the substantive. Holland, Jur. 78.

ADJOINING. Touching or contiguous, as distinguished from lying near or adjacent. 52 N. Y. 395.

ADJOURN. In strictness, to put off to a day specified. Also to suspend business for a time; to defer or delay. 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 54. See "Postponement."

ADJOURNAL. In Scotch practice. A term applied to the records of criminal courts. Books of Adjournal (old Scotch, "Bukis of Adiornale") were the original records of criminal trials, most of which are now lost. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 2, p. 225. An act of adjournal is an order of the court of justiciary, entered on its minutes. Shaw, Rep., Appendix.

ADJOURNAMENTUM EST AD DIEM dicere seu diem dare. An adjournment is to appoint a day or give a day. 4 Inst. 27. Hence the formula "eat sine die."

ADJOURNATUR (Law Lat. from adjournare, to adjourn). It is adjourned. A word with which the old reports very frequently conclude a case. 1 Ld. Raym. 602; 1 Show. 7; 1 Leon. 88.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS. In English practice. A summons or citation issued in chambers, and adjourned into court for argument.

ADJOURNED TERM. A continuation of a previous or regular term. 4 Ohio St. 473; 22 Ala. (N. S.) 27. Gen. St. Mass. c. 112, § 26, provides for holding an adjourned law term from time to time.

ADJOURNMENT. The dismissal by some court, legislative assembly, or properly authorized officer, of the business before them, either finally, which, as popularly used, is called an adjournment sine die, without day, or to meet again at another time appointed, which is called a temporary adjournment. See "Postponement."

——In Civil Law. A calling into court; a summoning at an appointed time. Du Cange.

ADJOURNMENT DAY. In English practice. A day appointed by the judges at the regular sittings for the trial of causes at nisi prius.

ADJOURNMENT DAY IN ERROR. In English practice. A day appointed some days before the end of the term, at which matters left undone on the affirmance day are finished. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1224.

ADJOURNMENT IN EYRE. The appointment of a day when the justices in eyre mean to sit again. Cowell; Spelman; Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 186.

ADJUDICATAIRE. In Canadian law. A purchaser at a sheriff's sale. See 1 Low (U. S.) 241; 10 Low. (U. S.) 325.

ADJUDICATION.

——In Practice. A judgment; giving or pronouncing judgment in a case. See "Former Adjudication."

——In Scotch Law. A process for transferring the estate of a debtor to his creditor. Ersk. Inst. lib. 2, tit. 12, §§ 39-55; Bell, Dict. (Shaw Ed.) 944.

It may be raised not only on a decree of court, but also where the debt is for a liquidated sum. The execution of a summons and notice to the opposite party prevents any transfer of the estate. Every creditor who obtains a decree within a year and a day is entitled to share with the first creditor, and, after ten years' possession under his adjudication, the title of the creditor is complete. Paterson, Comp. 1137, note. The matter is regulated by St. Feb. 26, 1684, p. 1672, c. 19. See Ersk. Inst. lib. 2, c. 12, §§ 15, 16.

ADJUDICATION CONTRA HAEREDITATem jacentem. In Scotch law. Adjudication against a renouncing heir. Brought by the ancestor's creditor to establish his debt against the realty when the heir apparent renounces his right of inheritance.

ADJUDICATION IN IMPLEMENT. In Scotch law. An action to enforce a contract to convey.

ADJUNCTION (Lat. adjungere, to join to). In civil law. The attachment or union permanently of a thing belonging to one person to that belonging to another. This union may be caused by inclusion, as if one man's diamond be set in another's ring; by soldering, as if one's guard be soldered on another's sword; by sewing, as by employing the silk of one to make the coat of another; by construction, as by building on another's land; by writing, as when one writes on another's parchment; or by painting, as when one paints a picture on another's canvas. Inst. 2. 1. 34; Dig. 41. 1. 9. 2. See 2 Bl. Comm. 404; 1 Bouv. Inst. note 499.

ADJUNCTS. Additional judges sometimes appointed in the high court of delegates. See Shelf. Lun. 310.

ADJUNCTUM ACCESSORIUM. An accessory or appurtenance.

ADJURATION. A swearing or binding upon oath.

ADJUSTMENT. In insurance. The determining of the amount of a loss by fire or marine disaster. 2 Phil. Ins. §§ 1814, 1815.

ADJUVARI QUIPPE NOS, NON DECIPI, beneficio oportet. We ought to be favored, not injured, by that which is intended for our benefit. The species of bailment called "loan" must be to the advantage of the borrower, not to his detriment. Story, Bailm. § 275. See 8 El. & Bl. 1051.

ADLEGIARE. To purge one's self of a crime by oath.

ADMANUENSIS. A person who swore by laying his hands on the Book.

ADMEASUREMENT OF DOWER. A remedy which lay for the heir, on reaching his majority, to rectify an assignment of dower made during his minority, by which the doweress had received more than she was legally entitled to. 2 Bl. Comm. 136; Gilb. Uses, 379.

The remedy is still subsisting, though of rare occurrence. See 1 Washb. Real Prop. 225, 226; 1 Pick. (Mass.) 314; 2 Ind. 336.

In some of the states, the special proceeding which is given by statute to enable the widow to compel an assignment of dower is termed an "admeasurement of dower."

ADMEASUREMENT OF PASTURE. A remedy which lay in certain cases for surcharge of common of pasture.

It lay where a common of pasture appurtenant or in gross was certain as to number; or where one had common appendant or appurtenant, the quantity of which had never been ascertained. The sheriff proceeded, with the assistance of a jury of twelve men, to admeasure and apportion the common as well of those who had surcharged as those who had not, and, when the writ was fully executed, returned it to the superior court. Termes de la Ley.

The remedy is now abolished in England (3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 239, note); and in the United States (3 Kent, Comm. 419).

ADMEZATORES (from Ital. mezzatura, middle). In old Italian law. Persons chosen by the consent of contending parties to decide questions between them. Literally, mediators. Spelman.

ADMINICLE.

——In Scotch Law. Any writing or deed introduced for the purpose of proof of the tenor of a lost deed to which it refers. Ersk. Inst. lib. 4, tit. 1, § 55; Stair, Inst. lib. 4, tit. 32, §§ 6, 7.

——In Civil Law. Imperfect proof. Merlin, Repert.

ADMINICULAR (from adminiculum, q. v.) Auxiliary to. "The murder would be adminicular to the robbery," i. e., committed to accomplish it. Story, J., 3 Mason (U. S.) 121.

ADMINICULAR EVIDENCE. In ecclesiastical law. Evidence brought in to explain and complete other evidence. 2 Lee, Ecc. 595.

ADMINICULATE. To give adminicular evidence.

ADMINICULATOR. An officer in the Romish church, who administered to the wants of widows, orphans, and afflicted persons. Spelman.

ADMINICULUM (Lat.) In the civil and old English law. Aid or support; sometimes rendered adminicle (q. v.) Juris adminiculum, the support of the law. Dig. 26. 7. 39. 9. Cum juris adminiculo concurrente, with the support of right concurring. Bracton, fol. 38b.

Cumulative or corroborative testimony.

That which belongs to a thing as accessory. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 347, note(d).

Whatever pertains to judicial proceedings, writs, records, etc. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 3, § 4.

ADMINISTRATION (Lat. administrare, to assist in). Management or control.

——Of Government. The management of the executive department of the government. Those charged with the management of the executive department of the government.

——Of Estates. The management of the estate of an intestate, or of a testator who has no executor. 2 Bl. Comm. 494. The term is applied broadly to denote the management of an estate by an executor, and also the management of estates of minors, lunatics, insolvents, etc., in those cases where trustees have been appointed by authority of law to take charge of such estate in place of the legal owners.

The species of administration are:

——Ad Colligendum. That which is granted for collecting and preserving goods about to perish (bona peritura). The only power over these goods is under the form prescribed by statute.

——Ancillary. That which is subordinate to the principal administration, for collecting the assets of foreigners. It is taken out in the country where the assets are locally situate. Kent, Comm. 43 et seq.; 1 Williams, Ex'rs, Am. Notes; 14 Ala. 829.

——Cum Testamento Annexo. That which is granted where no executor is named in the will, or where the one named dies, or is incompetent or unwilling to act. Such an administrator must follow the statute rules of distribution, except when otherwise directed by the will. Williams, Ex'rs; 2 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 22. The residuary legatee is appointed such administrator, rather than the next of kin. 1 Vent. 217; 4 Leigh (Va.) 152; 2 Add. (Pa.) 352.

——De Bonis non. That which is granted when the first administrator dies before having fully administered. The person so appointed has in general the powers of a common administrator. Bac. Abr. "Executors" (B 1); Rolle, Abr. 907; 22 Miss. 47; 27 Ala. 273; 9 Ind. 342; 4 Sneed (Tenn.) 411; 31 Miss. 519; 29 Vt. 170; 11 Md. 412.

——De Bonis non cum Testamento Annexo. That which is granted when an executor dies leaving a part of the estate unadministered. Comyn, Dig. "Administrators" (B 1).

——Durante Absentia. That which subsists during the absence of the executor, and until he has proved the will. It is generally granted when the next of kin is beyond sea, lest the goods perish, or the debts be lost. In England, it is not determined by the executor's dying abroad. 4 Hagg. Ecc. 360; 3 Bos. & P. 26.

——Durante Minori Aetate. That which is granted when the executor is a minor. It continues until the minor attains his lawful age to act, which, at common law, is seventeen years. Godolph. Orph. Leg. 102; 5 Coke, 29.

——Pendente Lite. That which is granted pending the controversy respecting an alleged will or the right of appointment. An officer of the court is appointed to take care of the estate only till the suit terminates. 2 P. Wms. 589; 2 Atk. 286; 2 Cas. temp. Lee, 258; 1 Hagg. Ecc. 313; 26 N. H. 533; 9 Tex. 13; 16 Ga. 13. He may maintain suits, but cannot distribute the assets. 1 Ves. Sr. 325; 2 Ves. & B. 97; 1 Ball & B. 192; 7 Md. 282.

——Public. That which the public administrator performs. This happens in many of the states by statute in those cases where persons die intestate, not leaving any who are entitled to apply for letters of administration. 3 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 151; 4 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 252.

——Special. That which is limited either in time or in power. Such administration does not come under the statutes of 31 Edw. III. c. 11, and 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5, on which the modern English and American laws are founded.

——Domestic. That had at the residence of the decedent.

——Foreign. An administration under the sanction and jurisdiction of a different state or nation. It may be domiciliary or ancillary.

ADMINISTRATION SUIT. In English practice. A suit usually by a creditor for the administration of the insolvent estate of a decedent.

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW. That branch of the criminal law which regulates the manner in which the different agencies of the governing body are set in motion to punish crime, as opposed to the penal law, which describes offenses, and prescribes punishments.

ADMINISTRATOR. A person authorized to manage and distribute the estate of an intestate, or of a testator who has no executor. See "Administration."

In English law, administrators are the officers of the ordinary appointed by him in pursuance of the statute, and their title and authority are derived exclusively from the ecclesiastical judge, by grants called "letters of administration." Williams, Ex'rs, 331. At first the ordinary was appointed administrator under the statute of Westminster II. Next, St. 31 Edw. III. c. 11, required the ordinary to appoint the next of kin and the relations by blood of the deceased. Next, under 21 Hen. VIII., he could appoint the widow, or next of kin, or both, at his discretion.

ADMIRALTY.

——In England. A court which has a very extensive jurisdiction of maritime causes, civil and criminal.

A court of admiralty exists in Ireland, but the Scotch court was abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 69. See "Vice Admiralty Courts."

——In American Law. A tribunal exercising jurisdiction over all maritime contracts, torts, injuries, or offenses. 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 508.

The court of original admiralty jurisdiction in the United States is the United States district court. From this court causes may be removed, in certain cases, to the circuit, and ultimately to the supreme court.

ADMISSION (Lat. ad, to; mittere, to send).

——In Evidence. Concession or voluntary acknowledgment made by a party of the existence or truth of certain facts.

As distinguished from a confession, the term is applied to civil transactions, and to matters of fact in criminal cases where there is no criminal intent. See "Confession."

As distinguished from consent, an admission may be said to be evidence furnished by the party's own act of his consent at a previous period.

Direct, called also "express," admissions, are those which are made in direct terms.

Implied admissions are those which result from some act or failure to act of the party.

Incidental admissions are those made in some other connection, or involved in the admission of some other fact. See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 194.

——In Pleading. The acknowledgment or recognition by one party of the truth of some matter alleged by the opposite party.

number of specific transactions, as payments made to the owner of goods by a factor or agent, who has or is to have possession of the goods for the purpose of selling them, payments by a guardian to the ward out of the latter's funds, etc.

ADVANTAGIUM. In old pleading. An advantage. Co. Entr. 484; Towns. Pl. 50.

ADVENA (Lat. venire). In Roman law. One of foreign birth, who has left his own country and settled elsewhere, and who has not acquired citizenship in his new locality; often called albanus. Du Cange.

ADVENT. The period commencing on Sunday falling on St. Andrew's day (30th of November), or the first Sunday after, and continuing till Christmas.

It took its name from the fact that it immediately preceded the day set apart to commemorate the birth or coming (advent) of Christ. Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

Formerly, during this period, "all contentions at law were omitted." But, by statute 13 Edw. I. (Westminster II.) c. 48, certain actions were allowed.

ADVENTITIOUS (Lat. adventitius). That which comes incidentally, or out of the regular course.

Adventitia bona are goods which fall to a man otherwise than by inheritance.

Adventitia dos is a dowry or portion given by some friend other than the parent.

ADVENTURA (Lat. an adventure). Flotsam, jetsam, and ligan are styled adventurae maris, adventures of the sea. Hale de Jur. Mar. pt. 1, c. 7.

ADVENTURE. Sending goods abroad under charge of a supercargo or other agent, which are to be disposed of to the best advantage for the benefit of the owners.

The goods themselves so sent.

——In Marine Insurance. The risk or peril insured against. See 14 Fed. 233.

ADVERSE ENJOYMENT. The possession or exercise of an easement or privilege under a claim of right against the owner of the land out of which the easement is derived. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 42.

ADVERSE POSSESSION. The enjoyment of land, or such estate as lies in grant, under such circumstances as indicate that such enjoyment has been commenced and continued under an assertion or color of right on the part of the possessor. 3 East, 394; 1 Pick. (Mass.) 466; 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 527; 3 Pa. St. 132; 8 Conn. 440; 2 Aik. (Vt.) 364; 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 174; 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 40, 355; 5 Pet. (U. S.) 402; 4 Bibb (Ky.) 550.

There must be actual possession. 45 Ill. 388; 36 Minn. 525; 78 N. C. 354; 1 Grat. (Va.) 211. But what constitutes such possession varies with the nature and situation of the premises. 11 Grat. (Va.) 420; 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 253. Cultivation, improvement, or inclosure always constitutes occupation, and, if the occupant holds under a paper title, a use for supply of fuel, etc., or a use as subservient to land actually occupied, will constitute an occupation. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. §§ 370, 371.

The possession must be open and notorious (42 Mass. 95; 16 Wis. 594), distinct and exclusive (150 U. S. 597; 6 Md. 201), hostile (15 Ill. 271; 13 Ohio St. 42; 89 Wis. 551), and continuous in the occupant or those claiming under him for the period prescribed by statute (47 U. S. 550; 5 Md. 256; 36 W. Va. 445).

ADVERSE WITNESS. A witness who manifests a bias against the party calling him. A party may be allowed to propound leading questions to such a witness.

ADVERSUS (Lat.) Against.

ADVERTISEMENT (Lat. advertere, to turn to).

Information or knowledge communicated to individuals or the public in a manner designed to attract general attention.

A notice published either in handbills or in a newspaper. A posting of notice on a signboard is an advertisement within a statute making the advertising of lottery tickets penal. 5 Pick. (Mass.) 42. And see 8 Watts & S. (Pa.) 373; 16 Pa. St. 68; 38 Ill. App. 400.

ADVERTISEMENTS OF QUEEN ELIZABETH. Certain articles or ordinances drawn up by Archbishop Parker and some of the bishops in 1564, at the request of Queen Elizabeth, the object of which was to enforce decency and uniformity in the ritual of the church. The queen subsequently refused to give her official sanction to these advertisements, and left them to be enforced by the bishops under their general powers. Phil. Ecc. Law, 910; 2 Prob. Div. 276; Id. 354.

ADVICE. Information given by letter by one merchant or banker to another in regard to some business transaction which concerns him.

ADVICE OF COUNSEL. The opinion of an attorney at law on facts stated to him. If given on a full and fair statement of the facts, it relieves the client of any imputation of malice in acting in it, and hence is a defense in all actions to which malice is essential.

ADVISARE, or ADVISARI (Lat.) To advise; to consider; to be advised; to consult.

Occurring often in the phrase curia advisari vult (usually abbreviated cur. adv. vult), the court wishes to consider of the matter.

ADVISEMENT. Consideration; deliberation; consultation.

ADVISORY. By way of counsel. The verdict on a feigned issue is said to be advisory because the chancellor may, in his discretion, disregard it.

ADVOCASSIE (Law Fr.) The office of an advocate; advocacy. Kelham.

ADVOCATA. In old English law. A patroness; a woman who had the right of presenting to a church. Liber Ramesiens, § 140, cited in Spelman, voc. "Advocatus."

ADVOCATE. An assistant; adviser; a pleader of causes.

Derived from advocare, to summon to one's assistance. Advocatus originally signified an assistant or helper of any kind, even an accomplice in the commission of a crime. Cicero, pro Caecina, c. 8; Livy, lib. ii. 55; iii. 47; Tertullian de Idolatr. c. 23; Petron. Satyric, c. 25. Secondarily, it was applied to one called in to assist a party in the conduct of a suit. Inst. 1. 11; Dig. 50. 13. Hence, a pleader, which is its present signification.

——In Civil and Ecclesiastical Law. An officer of the court, learned in the law, who is engaged by a suitor to maintain or defend his cause. Advocates, like counsellors, have the exclusive privilege of addressing the court either orally or in written pleadings; and, in general, in regard to duties, liabilities, and privileges, the same rules apply mutatis mutandis to advocates as to counsellors. See "Counsellor."

Lord advocate was an officer in Scotland appointed by the crown, during pleasure, to take care of the king's interest before the courts of session, judiciary, and exchequer. All actions that concern the king's interest, civil or criminal, must be carried on with concourse of the lord advocate. He also discharges the duties of public prosecutor, either in person or by one of his four deputies, who are called advocates depute. Indictments for crimes must be in his name as accuser. He supervises the proceedings in important criminal cases, and has the right to appear in all such cases. He is, in fact, secretary of state for Scotland, and the principal duties are connected directly with the administration of the government.

Inferior courts have a procurator fiscal, who supplies before them the place of the lord advocate in criminal cases. See 2 Bankt. Inst. 492.

College or faculty of advocates was a corporate body in Scotland, consisting of the members of the bar in Edinburgh. A large portion of its members are not active practitioners, however. 2 Bankt. Inst. 486.

Church or ecclesiastical advocates were pleaders appointed by the church to maintain its rights.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. A patron of a living; one who has the advowson, advocatio. Tech. Dict.; Ayliffe, Par. 53; Dane, Abr. c. 31, § 20; Ersk. Inst. 79. 9.

ADVOCATE, QUEEN'S (or KING'S). See "Queen's Advocate."

ADVOCATI (Lat.) In Roman law. Patrons; pleaders; speakers.

Anciently, any one who lent his aid to a friend, and who was supposed to be able in any way to influence a judge, was called advocatus.

Causidicus denoted a speaker or pleader merely; advocatus resembled more nearly a counsellor; or, still more exactly, causidicus must be rendered "barrister," and advocatus "attorney," though the duties of an advocatus were much more extended than those of a modern attorney. Du Cange; Calv. Lex.

A witness.

ADVOCATI ECCLESIAE. Advocates of the church.

These were of two sorts; those retained as pleaders to argue the cases of the church and attend to its law matters, and advocates, or patrons of the advowson. Cowell; Spelman.

ADVOCATI FISCI. In civil law. Those chosen by the emperor to argue his cause whenever a question arose affecting his revenues. Calv. Lex.; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 27.

ADVOCATIA. In civil law. The function, duty, or privilege of an advocate. Du Cange.

ADVOCATION. In Scotch law. The removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior court by virtue of a writ or warrant issuing from the superior court. See "Bill of Advocation;" "Letter of Advocation."

ADVOCATOR.

——In Old Practice. One who called on or vouched another to warrant a title; a voucher. Advocatus, the person called on, or vouched; a vouchee. Spelman; Towns. Pl. 45.

——In Scotch Practice. An appellant. 1 Brown, 67.

ADVOCATUS. A pleader; a narrator. Bracton, fols. 372b, 412a.

ADVOCATUS DIABOLI. The devil's advocate; a person designated to present to the college of cardinals matter in opposition to a canonization.

ADVOCATUS EST, AD QUEM PERTINENT JUS ADVOCATIONIS ALICUJUS ECCLESIAE, UT AD ECCLESIAM, NOMINE PROPRIO, NON ALIENO, POSSIT PRAESENTARE. A patron is he to whom appertains the right of presentation to a church, in such a manner that he may present to such a church in his own name, and not in the name of another. Co. Litt. 119.

ADVOWEE. In English ecclesiastical law. A patron; one who has a right to present to a benefice. Cowell; Britt. c. 95.

ADVOWEE PARAMOUNT. The sovereign, who was the highest advowee.

ADVOWSON. A right of presentation to a church or benefice.

He who possesses this right is called the "patron" or "advocate." When there is no patron, or he neglects to exercise his right within six months, it is called a "lapse," and a title is given to the ordinary to collate to a church. When a presentation is made by one who has no right, it is called a "usurpation."

Advowsons are of different kinds:

——Advowson Appendant. When it depends upon a manor, etc.

——Advowson in Gross. When it belongs to a person and not to a manor.

——Advowson Presentative. Where the patron presents to the bishop.

——Advowson Donative. Where the king or patron puts the clerk into possession without presentation.

——Advowson Collative. Where the bishop himself is patron.

——Advowson of the Moiety of the Church. Where there are two several patrons and two incumbents in the same church.

——A Moiety of Advowson. Where two must join the presentation of one incumbent.

——Advowson of Religious Houses. That which is vested in the person who founded such a house.

See 2 Bl. Comm. 21; Mireh. Advow. "Advowson;" Comyn, Dig. "Advowson, Quare Impedit;" Bac. Abr. "Simony;" Burns, Ecc. Law.

AFFINES (Lat. finis). In civil la Connections by marriage, whether of t persons or their relatives. Calv. Lex.

From this word we have affinity, den ing relationship by marriage. 1 Bl. Com 434.

The singular, affinis, is used in a variety of related significations,—a boundary (Du Cange); a partaker or sharer, affinis culpae (an aider or one who has knowledge of a crime) (Calv. Lex.)

AFFINIS MEI AFFINIS NON EST MIHI affinis. A connection (i. e., by marriage) of my connection is not a connection of mine. Shelf. Mar. & Div. 174.

AFFINITAS. In civil law. Affinity.

AFFINITAS AFFINITATIS. That connection between parties arising from marriage which is neither consanguinity nor affinity.

This term intends the connection between the kinsmen of the two persons married, as, for example, the husband's brother and the wife's sister. Ersk. Inst. 1. 6. 8.

AFFINITY. The connection existing, in consequence of marriage, between each of the married persons and the kindred of the other. The relation contracted on marriage between a husband and his wife's kindred, and between the wife and her husband's kindred, as distinguished from consanguinity or relationship by blood. 1 Denio (N. Y.) 25.

The relations of the wife, her brothers, her sisters, her uncles, are allied to the husband by affinity; and his brothers, sisters, etc., are allied in the same way to the wife. 1 Denio (N. Y.) 186. But the brother and the sister of the wife are not allied by the ties of affinity. 2 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 331.

AFFIRM (Lat. affirmare, to make firm; to establish).

To ratify or confirm a former law or judgment. Cowell.

Especially used of confirmations of the judgments of an inferior by an appellate tribunal.

To ratify or confirm a voidable act of the party.

To make a solemn religious asseveration in the nature of an oath. See "Affirmation."

AFFIRMANCE. The confirmation of a voidable act by the party acting, who is to be bound thereby.

The term is in accuracy to be distinguished from "ratification," which is a recognition of the validity or binding force, as against the party ratifying, of some act performed by another person, and from "confirmation," which would seem to apply more properly to cases where a doubtful authority has been exercised by another in behalf of the person ratifying; but these distinctions are not generally observed with much care. 1 Pars. Cont. 243.

Express affirmance takes place where the party declares his determination of fulfilling the contract. Dud. (Ga.) 203.

Implied affirmance arises from the acts of the party without any express declaration. 15 Mass. 220. See 10 N. H. 194; 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 305; 1 Pars. Cont. 243; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 466, note 10.

AGAINST THE FORM OF THE STATUTE. Technical words which must be used in framing an indictment for a breach of the statute prohibiting the act complained of.

The Latin phrase is contra formam statuti.

AGAINST THE PEACE. See "Contra Pacem."

AGAINST THE WILL. Technical words which must be used in framing an indictment for robbery from the person. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 244.

In the statute of 13 Edw. I. (Westminster II.) c. 34, the offense of rape is described to be ravishing a woman "where she did not consent," and not ravishing against her will. Per Tindal, C. J., and Parke, B., in the addenda to 1 Den. C. C. 1. And in a very recent case this statute definition was adopted by all the judges. Bell, C. C. 63, 71.

AGALMA. An impression or image of anything on a seal. Cowell.

AGARD. An award.

AGARDER (Law Fr.) To award, adjudge, or determine; to sentence, or condemn.

AGE. Years of life; that period of life at which the law allows persons to do acts or discharge functions which, for want of years, they were prohibited from doing or undertaking before.

——At Common Law. Males, before fourteen, are said not to be of discretion; at that age they may consent to marriage, and choose a guardian. Twenty-one years is full age for all private purposes, and they may then exercise their rights as citizens by voting for public officers, and are eligible to all offices, unless otherwise provided for in the constitution.

Females, at twelve, arrive at years of discretion, and may consent to marriage; at fourteen, they may choose a guardian; and twenty-one, as in males, is full age, when they may exercise all the rights which belong to their sex. The age of puberty for both sexes is fourteen.

——In French Law. A person must have attained the age of forty to be a member of the legislative body; twenty-five, to be a judge of a tribunal de premiere instance; twenty-seven to be its president, or to be judge or clerk of a cour royale; thirty, to be its president or procureur-general; twenty-five, to be a justice of the peace; thirty, to be judge of a tribunal of commerce, and thirty-five to be its president; twenty-five, to be a notary public; twenty-one, to be a testamentary witness; thirty, to be a juror. At sixteen, a minor may devise one-half of his property as if he were a major. A male cannot contract marriage till after the eighteenth year, nor a female before full fifteen years. At twenty-one, both males and females are capable to perform all the acts of civil life. Toullier, Dr. Civ. liv. 1, Introd. note 188.

——In Roman Law. Infancy (infantia) extended to the age of seven; the period of childhood (pueritia), which extended from seven to fourteen, was divided into two periods,—the first, extending from seven to ten and a half, was called the period nearest childhood (aetas infantiae proxima); the other from ten and a half to fourteen, the period nearest puberty (aetas pubertati proxima); puberty (pubertas) extended from fourteen to eighteen; full puberty extended from eighteen to twenty-five; at twenty-five, the person was of legal age (aetas legitima), sometimes expressed as full age (aetas perfecta). See Tayl. Civ. Law, 254; Lec. Elem. Civ. 22.

AGE PRAYER. A statement made in a real action, to which an infant is a party, of the fact of infancy, and a request that the proceedings may be stayed until the infant becomes of age.

It is now abolished. St. 11 Geo. IV.; 1 Wm. IV. c. 37, § 10; 1 Lilly, Reg. 54; 3 Bl. Comm. 300.

AGENCY. A relation between two or more persons, by which one party, usually called the "agent" or "attorney," is authorized to do certain acts for, or in relation to the rights or property of, the other, who is denominated the "principal," "constituent," or "employer." Prof. Joel Parker, MSS. Lect. 1851. See "Agent."

AGENCY, DEED OF. A revocable and voluntary trust for payment of debts. Wharton.

AGENFRIDA (Saxon). The true lord or owner of a thing. Spelman.

AGENHINL, AGENHINA, or AWNHINE. In Saxon law. A domestic or inmate. One who stayed three nights at an inn was counted an agenhine. Laws Edw. Conf. c. 17.

AGENS (Lat. agere, to do; to conduct). A conductor or manager of affairs. Distinguished from factor, a workman.

A plaintiff. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 15, § 8.

AGENT (Lat. agens, from agere, to do). One who undertakes to transact some business, or to manage some affair, for another, by the authority and on account of the latter, and to render an account of it. 1 Livermore, Ag. 67; 2 Bouv. Inst. 3.

The term is one of a very wide application, and includes a great many classes of persons to which distinctive appellations are given; as, factors, brokers, attorneys, cashiers of banks, auctioneers, clerks, supercargoes, consignees, ships' husbands, masters of ships, and the like. The terms "agent" and "attorney" are often used synonymously. Thus, a letter or power of attorney is constantly spoken of as the formal instrument by which an agency is created. Paley, Ag. (Dunl. Ed.) 1, note.

Agents are "general" or "special;" a general agent being one authorized to represent his principal in all matters, in which case he is sometimes called a "universal agent" (q. v.), or in all matters of a particular class; a special agent one authorized to act only on one occasion, or in one transaction.

The distinction between an "agent" and a "servant" is that the former acts as a substitute for his principal, i. e., represents him in some transaction with third persons, while the latter merely performs the master's work.

——In International Law. The agents of a state in international affairs are (a) the persons to whom are delegated the management of the foreign affairs of the state by the constitution, and (b) all persons directly subordinate to them, the latter being generally designated as "diplomatic agents." Glenn, Int. Law, 105.

——In English Parliamentary Practice. Persons acting as solicitors in appealed cases in the privy council and house of lords are known as "agents," or "law agents." Macph. Privy Council, 65.

AGENT AND PATIENT. A phrase indicating the state of a person who is required to do a thing, and is at the same time the person to whom it is done; as, when a man is indebted to another, and he appoints him his executor, the latter is required to pay the debt in his capacity of executor, and entitled to receive it in his own right; he is then agent and patient. Termes de la Ley.

AGENTES ET CONSENTIENTES PARI poena plectentur. Acting and consenting parties are liable to the same punishment. 5 Coke, 80.

AGER (Lat.) In civil law. A field; land generally.

A portion of land enclosed by definite boundaries.

Used like the word acre in the old English law, denoting a measure of undetermined and variable value. Spelman; Du Cange; 3 Kent, Comm. 441.

AGGER (Lat.) In the civil law. A dam, bank, or mound. Code, 9. 38; Towns. Pl. 48.

AGGRAVATED ASSAULT. An assault attended by circumstances of aggravation, as the use of a weapon, or disparity of age or sex between the assailant and person assaulted.

AGGRAVATION (Lat. ad, to, and gravis, heavy; aggravare, to make heavy). That which increases the enormity of a crime or the injury of a wrong.

——In Criminal Law. One of the rules respecting variances is that cumulative allegations, or such as merely operate in aggravation, are immaterial, provided that sufficient is proved to establish some right, offense, or justification included in the claim, charge, or defense specified on the record. This rule runs through the whole criminal law, that it is invariably enough to prove so much of the indictment as shows that the defendant has committed a substantive crime therein specified. Per Lord Ellenborough, 2 Campb. 583; 4 Barn. & C. 329; 21 Pick. (Mass.) 525; 4 Gray (Mass.) 18; 7 Gray (Mass.) 49, 331; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 215. Thus, on an indictment for murder, the prisoner may be convicted of manslaughter, for the averment of malice aforethought is merely matter of aggravation. Co. Litt. 282a.

——In Pleading. The introduction of matter into the declaration which tends to increase the amount of damages, but does not affect the right of action itself. Steph. Pl. 257; 12 Mod. 597. See 3 Am. Jur. 287-313.

An example of this is found in the case where a plaintiff declares in trespass for entering his house, and breaking his close, and tossing his goods about. The entry of the house is the principal ground and foundation of the action, and the rest is only stated by way of aggravation (3 Wils. 294), and this matter need not be proved by the plaintiff, or answered by the defendant.

AGGREGATE. A collection of particular persons or items, formed into one body. See "Corporation."

AGGREGATIO MENTIUM. A meeting of minds. See "Agreement."

AGGRESSOR. He who begins a quarrel or dispute, either by threatening or striking another. No man may strike another because he has been threatened, or in consequence of the use of any words.

AGGRIEVED. Injuriously affected.

AGILD. In Saxon law. Free from penalty (sine mulcta vel compensatione), not subject to the payment of gild, or weregild; that is, the customary fine or pecuniary compensation for an offense. Spelman; Cowell.

AGILER. In Saxon law. An observer or informer.

AGILLARIUS (Law Lat.) In old English law. A hayward, herdward, or keeper of the herd of cattle in a common field. Cowell.

AGIO. A term used in commercial transactions to denote the difference of price between the value of bank notes or other nominal money and the coin of the country. 5 Mees. & W. 535.

AGIOTAGE. From agis. Speculation in public securities.

AGISTER. See "Agistment."

AGISTMENT. The taking of another person's cattle into one's own ground to be fed, for a consideration to be paid by the owner. The person so taking cattle to pasture is called an "agister." Schouler, Bailm. § 96; Story, Bailm. § 443; 68 Cal. 290.

——In Old English Law. The taking of the cattle of strangers to pasture on the king's land, and collecting fees therefor to the use of the king. Spelman.

AGNATES. In Scotch law. Relations on the father's side.

AGNATI. In civil law. The members of a Roman family who traced their origin and name to a common deceased ancestor through the male line, under whose paternal power they would be if he were living.

They were called adgnati,—adcnati, from the words ad eum nati. Ulpianus says: "Adgnati autem sunt cognati virilis sexus ab eodem orti: nam post suos et consanguineos statim mihi proximus est consanguinei mei filius, et ego ei; patris quoque frater qui patruus appellatur; deinceps ceteri, si qui sunt, hinc orti in infinitum." Dig. 38. 16; De Suis 2, § 1. Thus, although the grandfather and father be dead, the children become sui juris, and the males may become the founders of new families, still they all continue to be agnates; and the agnatio spreads and is perpetuated not only in the direct, but also in the collateral, line. Marriage, adoption, and adrogation also create the relationship of the agnatio. In the Sentences of Paulus, the order of inheritance is stated as follows: Intestatorum hereditas, lege Duodecim Tabularum primum suis heredibus, de inde adgnatis et aliquando quoque gentibus deferebatur.

They are distinguished from the cognati, those related through females. See "Cognati."

AGNATIC. Derived from or through males. 2 Bl. Comm. 236.

AGNATIO (Lat.) In civil law. A relationship through males; the male children.

Especially spoken of the children of a free father and slave mother. The rule in such cases was agnatio sequitur ventrem. Du Cange.

AGNATION. Relationship on the father's side. See "Agnates."

AGNOMEN (Lat.) A name or title which a man gets by some action or peculiarity; the last of the four names sometimes given a Roman. Thus, Scipio Africanus (the African), from his African victories. Ainsworth; Calv. Lex. See "Nomen."

AGRARIAN LAWS. In Roman law. Those laws by which the commonwealth disposed of its public land, or regulated the possession thereof by individuals, were termed "Agrarian Laws."

The greater part of the public lands acquired by conquest were laid open to the possession of any citizen, but the state reserved the title and the right to resume possession. The object of many of the agrarian laws was to limit the area of public land of which any one person might take possession. The law of Cassius, B. C. 486, is the most noted of these laws.

Until a comparatively recent period, it has been assumed that these laws were framed to reach private property, as well as to restrict possession of the public domain, and hence the term "agrarian" is, in legal and political literature, to a great degree fixed with the meaning of a confiscatory law, intended to reduce large estates, and increase the number of landholders. Harrington, in his "Oceana," and the philosophers of the French Revolution, have advocated agrarian laws in this sense. The researches of Heyne (Op. 4. 351), Niehbuhr (Hist. vol. 2, trans.), and Savigny (Das Recht des Besitzes), have redeemed the Roman word from the burden of this meaning.

AGRARIUM. A tax upon or tribute payable out of land.

AGREAMENTUM. Agreement.

Spelman says that it is equivalent in meaning to aggregatio mentium, though not derived therefrom.

AGREEMENT (from Lat. aggretio mentium). A coming together of parties in opinion or determination; the union of two or more minds in a thing done or to be done; a mutual assent to do a thing. Comyn, Dig. "Agreement" (A 1); Plowd. 5a, 6a.

The consent of two or more persons concurring, the one in parting with, the other in receiving, some property, right, or benefit. Bac. Abr.

A mutual contract in consideration between two or more parties. 5 East, 10; 4 Gill & J. (Md.) 1; 12 How. (U. S.) 126.

Agreement is seldom applied to specialties; contract is generally confined to simple contracts; and promise refers to the engagement of a party without reference to the reasons or considerations for it, or the duties of other parties. Pars. Cont. 6.

An agreement ceases to be such by being put in writing under seal, but not when put in writing for a memorandum. Dane, Abr. c. 11.

A promise or undertaking. This is a loose and inaccurate use of the word. 3 Conn. 335.

The writing or instrument which is evidence of an agreement. This is a loose and evidently inaccurate use of the term. The agreement may be valid, and yet the written evidence thereof insufficient.

Agreements are:

(1) Conditional, being those which are to have full effect only in case of the happening of certain events, or the existence of a given state of things.

(2) Absolute, being dependent on no contingency.

They are also:

(3) Executed, being those where nothing further remains to be done by the parties, or

(4) Executory, being such as rest on articles, memorandums, parol promises or undertakings, and the like, to be performed in the future, or which are entered into preparatory to more solemn and formal alienations of property. Powell, Cont. An executed agreement always conveys a chose in possession, while an executory one conveys a chose in action only.

They are also:

(5) Express, being those in which the terms are openly uttered and avowed by the parties at the time of making, or

(6) Implied, being those which the law supposes the parties to have made, although the terms were not openly expressed.

AGREEMENT FOR INSURANCE. An agreement often made in short terms preliminary to the filling out and delivery of a policy with the specific stipulations.

Such an agreement, specifying the rate of premium, the subject and risk, and amount to be insured, in general terms, and being assented to by the parties, is binding. 1 Phil. Ins. c. 1, § 3; 2 Curt. C. C. (U. S.) 277; 19 N. Y. 305.

AGREER, or AGGREER (Law Fr.)

——In Old Practice. To agree.

——In French Marine Law. To rig or equip a vessel. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 2, art. 1.

AGREZ (Fr.) In French marine law. The rigging or tackle of a vessel. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 2, art. 1; Id. tit. 11, art. 2; Id. liv. 3, tit. 1, art. 11.

AGRI. Arable lands in common fields.

AGRI LIMITATI. In Roman law. Lands belonging to the state by right of conquest, and granted or sold in plots. Sandars, Just. Inst. (5th Ed.) 98.

AHTEID.

——In Old European Law. A kind of oath among the Bavarians. Spelman.

——In Saxon Law. One bound by oath, (q. v.); "oath-tied." From ath, oath, and tied. Spelman.

AID AND COMFORT. Help; support; assistance; counsel; encouragement.

The constitution of the United States (article 3, § 3) declares that adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort, shall be treason. These words, as they are to be understood in the constitution, have not received a full judicial construction. They import, however, help, support, assistance, countenance, encouragement. The word "aid," which occurs in St. Westminster I. c. 14, is explained by Lord Coke (2 Inst. 182) as comprehending all persons counseling, abetting, plotting, assenting, consenting, and encouraging to do the act (and he adds, what is not applicable to the crime of treason), who are not present when the act is done. See, also, 1 Burn, Just. 5, 6; 4 Bl. Comm. 37, 38.

AID BONDS. Public (usually municipal or county) bonds issued in aid of a private enterprise operating for the benefit of the community generally.

AID OF THE KING. Intervention prayed by the king's tenant when another questioned his tenure, or demanded rent of him.

AID PRAYER. In English law. A petition to the court calling in help from another person who has an interest in the matter in dispute. For example, a tenant for life, by the curtesy, or for years, being impleaded, may pray aid of him in reversion; that is, desire the court that he may be called by writ, to allege what he thinks proper for the maintenance of the right of the person calling him, and of his own. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 50; Cowell.

AIDER BY VERDICT. In pleading. The presumption which arises after verdict, whether in a civil or criminal case, that those facts, without proof of which the verdict could not have been found, were proved, though they are not distinctly alleged in the record; provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend them in reasonable intendment.

AIDING AND ABETTING. In criminal law. The offense committed by those persons who, although not the direct perpetrators of a crime, are yet present at its commission, doing some act to render aid to the actual perpetrator thereof. 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 34; Russ. & R. 363, 421; 9 Ired. (N. C.) 440; 1 Woodb. & M. 221; 10 Pick. (Mass.) 477; 12 Whart. (Pa.) 460; 26 Miss. 299.

A principal in the second degree is he who is present aiding and abetting the fact to be done. 1 Hale, P. C. 615. See "Principal."

AIDS. In English law. A species of tax payable by the tenant of lands to his superior lord on the happening of certain events.

They were originally mere benevolences granted to the lord in certain times of danger and distress, but soon came to be claimed as a right. They were originally given in three cases only, and were of uncertain amount. For a period they were demanded in additional cases, but this abuse was corrected by Magna Charta (of John) and St. 25 Edw. I. (confirmatio chartarum), and they were made payable only,—to ransom the lord's person, when taken prisoner; to make the lord's eldest son a knight; to marry the lord's eldest daughter, by giving her a suitable portion. The first of these remained uncertain; the other two were fixed by act of parliament (25 Edw. III. c. 11) at twenty shillings each, being the supposed twentieth part of a knight's fee. 2 Bl. Comm. 64. They were abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 77, note.

AIR. That fluid transparent substance which surrounds our globe. See "Easement."

AIRE. In old Scotch law. The court of the justices itinerant, corresponding to the English eyre. Skene de Verb. Sign. voc. "Iter."

Heir. "His airis and assignais." Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 2, p. 342.

AISMENTUM, AISIAMENTUM, or ESAmentum. An easement. Spelman.

AISNE, or EIGNE. In old English law. Eldest or first born. Aisne is the opposite of puisne. Spelman, "Aesnecia."

AJUAR. In Spanish law. The jewels and furniture which a wife brings in marriage.

AJUTAGE, or ADJUTAGE. A conical tube used in drawing water through an aperture, by the use of which the quantity of water drawn is much increased.

When a privilege to draw water from a canal, through the forebay or tunnel, by means of an aperture, has been granted, it is not lawful to add an ajutage, unless such was the intention of the parties. 2 Whart. (Pa.) 477.

AKIN. In old English law. Of kin. "Next-a-kin." 7 Mod. 140.

AL (Law Fr.) At; to. Al huis d'esglise, at the church door. Litt. § 38. Al contrary, to the contrary. Dyer, 5b.

ALAE ECCLESIAE. The wings or side aisles of a church. Blount.

ALANERARIUS. A manager and keeper of dogs for the sport of hawking; from alanus, a dog known to the ancients. A falconer. Blount.

ALBA FIRMA. White rents; rents reserved payable in silver, or white money. They were so called to distinguish them from reditus nigri, which were rents reserved payable in work, grain, and the like. 2 Inst. 19.

ALBANAGIUM. In old French law. The state of alienage; of being a foreigner or alien.

ALBANUS. See "Advena."

ALBINATUS (Law Lat.) In old French law. The state or condition of an alien or foreigner.

ALBINATUS JUS. In old French law. The right of albanage. A right formerly existing in France, entitling the king, on the death of an alien, to all his property, unless he had a peculiar exemption. Spelman; Bl. Comm. 372; 2 Kent, Comm. 69.

ALBUM BREVE. A blank writ; a writ with a blank or omission in it, as, where it is returned with the sheriff's surname omitted. Hob. 113b; Yelv. 110.

ALBUS LIBER. An ancient book containing a compilation of the law and customs of the city of London. Wharton.

ALCABALA (Spanish). A duty of a certain per cent. paid to the treasury on the sale or exchange of property. Schmidt, Civ. Law, 81, note 1.

ALCALDE. In Spanish law. A judicial officer in Spain, and in those countries which have received the body of their laws from those of Spain. His powers and duties are similar to those of a justice of the peace.

ALDERMAN (equivalent to "senator" or "senior").

——In English Law. An associate to the chief civil magistrate of a corporate town or city.

The word was formerly of very extended signification. Spelman enumerates eleven classes of aldermen. Their duties among the Saxons embraced both magisterial and executive power, but would seem to have been rather an appellation of honor, originally, than a distinguishing mark of office.

Aldermannus civitatis burgi seu castellae (alderman of a city, borough, or castle). 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 475, note.

Aldermannus comitatus (alderman of the county), who is thought by Spelman to have held an intermediate place between an earl and sheriff; by others, held the same as the earl. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 116.

Aldermannus hundredi seu wapentachii (alderman of a hundred or wapentake). Spelman.

Aldermannus regis (alderman of the king) was so called, either because he was appointed by the king, or because he gave the judgment of the king in the premises allotted to him.

Aldermannus totius Angliae (alderman of all England). An officer of high rank, whose duties cannot be precisely determined. See Spelman.

The aldermen of the city of London were probably originally the chiefs of guilds. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 54, 56.

——In American Cities. The aldermen are generally a legislative body, having limited judicial powers as a body, as in matters of internal police regulation, laying out and repairing streets, constructing sewers, and the like; though in many cities they hold separate courts, and have magisterial powers to a considerable extent. Consult Spelman; Cowell; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 116; Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law; Spence, Eq. Jur.

ALE CONNER (also called "ale taster"). An officer appointed by the court leet, sworn to look to the assize and goodness of ale and beer within the precincts of the leet. Kitch. Cts. 46; Whishaw. An officer appointed in every court leet, and sworn to look to the assize of bread, ale, or beer within the precincts of that lordship. Cowell. This officer is still continued in name, though the duties are changed or given up. 1 Crabb, Real Prop. 501.

ALEATOR (Lat. alea, dice). A dice player; a gambler.

ALEATORY CONTRACT. In civil law. A mutual agreement, of which the effects, with respect both to the advantages and losses, whether to all the parties or to some of them, depend on an uncertain event. Civ. Code La. art. 2951.

The term includes contracts, such as insurance, annuities, and the like.

ALER A DIEU (Law Fr.) In old practice. To be dismissed from court; to go quit. Literally, "to go to God." Y. B. H. 2 Edw. III. 6; Y. B. T. 5 Edw. II. 173; Y. B. H. 3 Edw. II. 75.

ALER SANS JOUR (Fr. aller sans jour, to go without day). In practice. A phrase formerly used to indicate the final dismissal of a case from court. The defendant was then at liberty to go, without any day appointed for his subsequent appearance. Kitch. Cts. 146.

ALEU (Fr.) In French feudal law. An allodial estate, as distinguished from a feudal estate or benefice. Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 28, § 2.

ALFET. The vessel in which hot water was put, for the purpose of dipping a criminal's arm in it up to the elbow in the ordeal by water. Cowell.

ALGARUM MARIS. Probably a corruption of laganum maris; lagan being a right, in the middle ages, like jetsam and flotsam, by which goods thrown from a vessel in distress became the property of the king, or the lord on whose shores they were stranded. Spelman; Jacob; Du Cange.

ALIA ENORMIA (Lat. other wrongs). In pleading. A general allegation, at the end of a declaration, of wrongful acts committed by the defendant to the damage of the plaintiff. In form it is, "and other wrongs then and there did against the peace," etc. Under this allegation, damages and matters which naturally arise from the act complained of may be given in evidence (2 Greenl. Ev. § 678), including battery of servants, etc., in a declaration for breaking into and entering a house (6 Mod. 127; 2 Term R. 166; 7 Har. & J. [Md.] 68), and all matters in general which go in aggravation of damages merely, but would not of themselves be ground for an action (Buller, N. P. 89; 3 Mass. 222; 6 Munf. [Va.] 308). But matters in aggravation may be stated specially (15 Mass. 194; Gilm. [Va.] 227), and matters which of themselves would constitute a ground of action must be so stated (1 Chit. Pl. 348; 17 Pick. [Mass.] 284). See, generally, 1 Chit. Pl. 648; Buller, N. P. 89; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 268, 273, 278; 2 Salk. 643; Peake, Ev. 505.

ALIAS (Lat. alius, another). In practice. Before; at another time.

An alias writ is a writ issued where one of the same kind has been issued before in the same cause. The second writ runs, in such case, "We command you, as we have before commanded you" (sicut alias), and the Latin word alias is used to denote both the writ and the clause in which it or its corresponding English word is found. It is used of all species of writs.

ALIAS DICTUS (Lat. otherwise called). A description of the defendant by adding to his real name that by which he is known in some writing on which he is to be charged, or by which he is known. 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 118; 2 Caines (N. Y.) 362; 3 Caines (N. Y.) 219.

ALIBI (Lat. elsewhere). Presence in another place than that described.

When a person, charged with a crime, proves (se eadem die fuisse alibi) that he was, at the time alleged, in a different place from that in which it was committed, he is said to prove an alibi, the effect of which is to lay a foundation for the necessary inference that he could not have committed it. See Bracton, 140.

ALIEN (Lat. alienus, belonging to another; foreign). A foreigner; one of foreign birth.

——In England. One born out of the allegiance of the king.

——In the United States. One born out of the jurisdiction of the United States, and who has not been naturalized under their constitution and laws. 2 Kent, Comm. 50. The children of ambassadors and ministers at foreign courts, however, are not aliens. And see 10 U. S. St. at Large, 604.

ALIEN AMY. An alien friend; i. e., a subject of a friendly nation.

ALIEN ENEMY. One who owes allegiance to the adverse belligerent. 1 Kent, Comm. 73.

He who owes a temporary, but not a permanent, allegiance, is an alien enemy in respect to acts done during such temporary allegiance only, and when his allegiance terminates, his hostile character terminates also. 1 Bos. & P. 163.

ALIENABLE. Subject of alienation.

ALIENAGE. The condition or state of an alien.

ALIENATE. To convey; to transfer. Co. Litt. 118b. "Alien" is very commonly used in the same sense. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 53. See "Alienation."

ALIENATIO LICET PROHIBEATUR, consensu tamen omnium, in quorum favorem prohibita est, potest fieri, et quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. Although alienation be prohibited, yet, by the consent of all in whose favor it is prohibited, it may take place, for it is in the power of any man to renounce a right introduced for his own benefit. Co. Litt. 98; 9 N. Y. 291.

ALIENATIO REI PRAEFERTUR JURI accrescendi. Alienation is favored by the law, rather than accumulation. Co. Litt. 185a, 381a, note; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 393, 409; Wright, Ten. 154 et seq.; 1 Cruise, Dig. (4th Ed.) 77, 78.

ALIENATION.

——Of Property. The transfer of property and possession of lands, tenements, or other things from one person to another. Termes de la Ley. It is particularly applied to absolute conveyances of real property. A transfer of less than the whole title is not, in the United States, an alienation. 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 624.

Alienation is either by deed, or by matter of record.

(1) Alienations by deed are:

(a) Original or primary alienations are those by which a benefit or estate is created or first arises. They are feoffment, gift, grant, lease, exchange, and partition.

(b) Derivative or secondary alienations are those by which the benefit or estate originally created is enlarged, restrained, transferred, or extinguished; or they may be made by conveyances under the statute of uses. They are release, confirmation, surrender, assignment, and defeasance. Those deriving their force from the statute of uses are covenant to stand seized, bargain and sale, lease and release, deeds to declare the uses of other more direct conveyances, and deeds of revocation of uses.

(2) Alienation by matter of record may be by private act of the legislature, by patents and other public grants, by fine, by common recovery.

——In Medical Jurisprudence. A generic term, denoting the different kinds of aberration of the human understanding. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 535.

ALIENATION OFFICE. In English law. An office to which all writs of covenants and entries were carried for the recovery of fines levied thereon.

ALIENEE. One to whom an alienation is made.

ALIENI GENERIS (Lat.) Of another kind.

ALIENI JURIS (Lat.) Subject to the authority of another. An infant who is under the authority of his father or guardian, and a wife under the power of her husband, are said to be alieni juris. See "Sui Juris."

ALIENIGENA (Lat.) One of foreign birth; an alien. 7 Coke, 31.

ALIENOR. He who makes a grant or alienation.

ALIENUS (Lat.) That which belongs to another.

ALIMENT.

——In Scotch Law. To support; to provide with necessaries. Paterson, Comp. §§ 845, 850.

Maintenance; support; an allowance from the husband's estate for the support of the wife. Paterson, Comp. § 893.

——In Civil Law. Food and other things necessary to the support of life; money allowed for the purpose of procuring these. Dig. 50. 16. 43.

——In Common Law. To supply with necessaries. 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 194.

ALIMENTA (Lat.) In the civil law. Aliments; means of support, including food (cibaria), clothing (vestitus), and habitation (habitatio). Dig. 34. 1. 6.

ALIMONY. Money paid for aliment or support.

The allowance which a husband, by order of court, pays to his wife, living separate from him, for her maintenance. Bish. Mar. & Div. § 549.

The term is sometimes restricted to an allowance for a wife's support, made either pending an action for divorce, or after a decree of divorce.

Alimony pendente lite is that ordered during the pendency of a suit.

Permanent alimony is that ordered for the use of the wife after the termination of the suit, during their joint lives, or until the further order of the court.

ALIO INTUITU (Lat.) Under a different aspect. See "Diverso Intuitu."

ALIQUID CONCEDITUR NE INJURIA remaneat impunita, quod alias non concederetur. Something is conceded lest a wrong should remain unpunished which otherwise would not be conceded. Co. Litt. 197.

ALIQUID POSSESSIONIS ET NIHIL juris (Law Lat.) Somewhat of possession, and nothing of right (but no right). A phrase used by Bracton to describe that kind of possession which a person might have of a thing as a guardian, creditor, or the like, and also that kind of possession which was granted for a term of years, where nothing could be demanded but the usufruct. Bracton, fols. 39a, 160a.

ALIQUIS NON DEBET ESSE JUDEX IN propria causa, quia non potest esse judex et pars. A person ought not to be judge in his own cause, because he cannot act both as judge and party. Co. Litt. 141a; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 112; Litt. § 212; 13 Q. B. 327; 17 Q. B. 1; 15 C. B. 769; 1 C. B. (N. S.) 329.

ALITER (Lat.) Otherwise; otherwise held or decided.

ALIUD EST CELARE; ALIUD TACERE. To conceal is one thing; to be silent another. 3 Burrows, 1910. See 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 176; 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 631; 3 Bing. 77; 4 Taunt. 851; 2 Car. & P. 341; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 701.

ALIUD EST DISTINCTIO; ALIUD SEPAratio. Distinction is one thing; separation another. Bacon's arg. Case of Postnati of Scotland, Works, iv. 351.

ALIUD EST POSSIDERE; ALIUD ESSE in possessione. It is one thing to possess; it is another to be in possession. Hob. 163; Bracton, 206.

ALIUD EST VENDERE; ALIUD VENdenti consentire. To sell is one thing; to give consent to him who sells, another. Dig. 50. 17. 160.

ALIUD EXAMEN (Lat.) A different or foreign mode of trial. 1 Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 38 (30).

ALIUNDE (Lat.) From another place. Evidence aliunde (i. e. from without the will) may be received to explain an ambiguity in a will. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 291.

ALL FOURS. A metaphorical expression, signifying that a case agrees in all its circumstances with another.

ALL THE ESTATE. The name given in England to the short clause in a conveyance or other assurance which purports to convey "all the estate, right, title, interest, claim, and demand" of the grantor, lessor, etc., in the property dealt with. Dav. Prec. Conv. 93.

ALLEGANS CONTRARIA NON EST audiendus. One making contradictory allegations is not to be heard. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 16; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 160, 268; 4 Term R. 211; 3 Exch. 446, 527, 678; 4 Exch. 187; 11 Exch. 493; 3 El. & Bl. 363; 5 El. & Bl. 502; 5 C. B. 195, 886; 10 Mass. 163; Coke, 4th Inst. 279.

ALLEGANS SUAM TURPITUDINEM non est audiendus. One alleging his own infamy is not to be heard. Coke, 4th Inst. 299; 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 339, 350.

ALLEGARI NON DEBUIT QUOD PRObatum non relevat. That ought not to be alleged which, if proved, is not relevant. 1 Ch. Cas. 45.

ALLEGATA. A word which the emperors formerly signed at the bottom of their rescripts and constitutions; under other instruments they usually wrote signata or testata. Enc. Lond.

ALLEGATA ET PROBATA (Lat. things alleged and proved). The allegations made by a party to a suit, and the proof adduced in their support.

ALLEGATIO CONTRA FACTUM NON est admittenda. An allegation contrary to the deed (or fact) is not admissible.

ALLEGATION. The assertion, declaration, or statement of a party of what he can prove.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. The statement of the facts intended to be relied on in support of the contested suit. It is applied either to the libel, or to the answer of the respondent, setting forth new facts, the latter being, however, generally called the defensive allegation. See 1 Browne, Civ. Law, 472, 473, note.

ALLEGATION OF FACULTIES. A statement made by the wife of the property of her husband, in order to her obtaining alimony. 11 Ala. (N. S.) 763; 3 Tex. 168.

ALLEGIANCE. The tie which binds the citizen to the government, in return for the protection which the government affords him.

——Natural Allegiance. That which results from the birth of a person within the territory, and under the obedience of the government. 2 Kent, Comm. 42.

——Acquired Allegiance. That binding a citizen who was born an alien, but has been naturalized.

——Local Allegiance. That which is due from an alien while resident in a country, in return for the protection afforded by the government. 16 Wall. (U. S.) 154.

ALLEGIARE. To defend and clear one's self; to wage one's own law.

ALLEGING DIMINUTION. The allegation in an appellate court of some error in a subordinate part of the record below.

ALLEVIARE (Law Lat.) In old records. To levy or pay an accustomed fine or composition. Cowell. To redeem by such payment. Burrill.

ALLIANCE (Lat. ad, to, ligare, to bind). The union or connection of two persons or families by marriage; affinity.

——In International Law. A contract, treaty, or league between two sovereigns or states, made to insure their safety and common defense.

Alliances are defensive, or offensive.

(1) Defensive alliances are those in which a nation agrees to defend her ally in case she is attacked.

(2) Offensive alliances are those in which nations unite for the purpose of making an attack, or jointly waging the war against another nation. Alliances may be at the same time offensive and defensive; and most offensive alliances are of this character. Vattel, bk. 3, c. 6, § 79; 2 Dall. (Pa.) 15.

ALLISION. Running one vessel against another. To be distinguished from collision, which denotes the running of two vessels against each other. The distinction is not very carefully observed, but collision is used to denote cases strictly of allision.

ALLOCATION. An allowance upon an account in the English exchequer. Cowell. Placing or adding to a thing. Enc. Lond.

ALLOCATIONE FACIENDA. In English law. A writ directed to the lord treasurer and barons of the exchequer, commanding that an allowance be made to an accountant for such moneys as he has lawfully expended in his office.

ALLOCATO COMITATU. In old English practice. In proceedings in outlawry, when there were but two county courts holden between the delivery of the writ of exigi facias to the sheriff and its return, a special exigi facias, with an allocato comitatu issued to the sheriff in order to complete the proceedings. Bac. Abr. "Outlawry."

ALLOCATUR (Lat. it is allowed). A Latin word formerly used to denote that a writ or order was allowed.

A word denoting the allowance by a master or prothonotary of a bill referred for his consideration, whether touching costs, damages, or matter of account. Lee, Dict.

ALLOCATUR EXIGENT. A writ of exigent which issued in a process of outlawry, upon the sheriff's making return to the original exigent that there were not five county courts held between the teste of the original writ and the return day. 1 Tidd, Prac. 128.

ALLOCUTUS. In criminal procedure. When a prisoner is convicted on a trial for treason or felony, the court is bound to demand of him what he has to say as to why the court should not proceed to judgment against him. This demand is called the "allocutus," and is entered on the record. Archb. Crim. Pl. 173.

ALLODARII. Those who own allodial lands.

Those who have as large an estate as a subject can have. Co. Litt. 1; Bac. Abr. "Tenure" (A).

ALLODIUM (Sax. a, privative, and lode or leude, a vassal; that is, without vassalage). An estate held by absolute ownership, without recognizing any superior to whom any duty is due on account thereof. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 16; 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 513.

It is used in opposition to feodum or fief, which means property the use of which was bestowed upon another by the proprietor, on condition that the grantee should perform certain services for the grantor, and upon the failure of which the property should revert to the original possessor.

ALLOGRAPH. A document not written by any of the parties thereto; opposed to autograph.

ALLONGE (Fr.) A piece of paper annexed to a bill of exchange or promissory note, on which to write indorsements for which there is no room on the instrument itself. Pardessus, note 343; Story, Prom. Notes, §§ 121, 151.

ALLOTMENT NOTE. In English law. An assignment by a seaman of future wages. Such assignments are regulated by law as to form and amount, and as to the persons to whom they may be made. Mozley & W.

ALLOTMENT SYSTEM. A system in force in England, by which the borough sanitary authorities are required to obtain, by condemnation, if necessary, lots of land, and to allot them among the laboring classes at a rent charged not to exceed what is necessary to protect the public from loss.

ALLOTMENT WARDEN. By the English general inclosure act of 1845 (section 108), when an allotment for the laboring poor of a district has been made on an inclosure under the act, the land so allotted is to be under the management of the incumbent and church warden of the parish, and two other persons elected by the parish, and they are to be styled "the allotment wardens" of the parish. Sweet.

ALLOTTEE. One to whom an allotment is made.

ALLOY, or ALLAY. An inferior metal used with gold and silver in making coin. The amount of alloy to be used is determined by law, and is subject to changes from time to time.

ALLOYNOUR (Law Fr.) One who conceals, steals, or carries off a thing privately. Britt. c. 17.

ALLUVIO MARIS (Lat.) Soil formed by the washing up of earth from the sea. Schultes, Aq. Rights, 138.

ALLUVION. That increase of the earth on a shore or bank of a river by the force of the water, as by a current or by waves, which is so gradual that no one can judge how much is added at each moment of time. Inst. 1. 2, tit. 1, § 20; 3 Barn. & C. 91; Code Civil Annote, note 556. See "Accretion;" "Reliction."

ALLY. A nation which has entered into an alliance with another nation. 1 Kent, Comm. 69.

A citizen or subject of one of two or more allied nations. 4 C. Rob. Adm. 251; 6 C. Rob. Adm. 205; 2 Dall. (Pa.) 15; Dane, Abr., Index.

ALMESFEOH. In Saxon law. Alms fee; alms money. Otherwise called "Peter-pence." Cowell.

ALMOIGN (Law Fr.) Alms; a tenure of lands by divine service. See "Frankalmoigne."

ALMOXARIFAZGO. In Spanish law. A general term, signifying both export and import duties, as well as excise. Derived from the Arabic, and said to signify the same as portorium in Latin. Schmidt, Civ. Law, 81, note 2.

ALMS. Any species of relief bestowed upon the poor.

That which is given by public authority for the relief of the poor. Shelf. Mortm. 802, note x; Hayw. Elect. 263; 1 Doug. Elect. 370; 2 Doug. Elect. 107.

ALNAGER, or ULNAGER. A public sworn officer of the king, who, by himself or his deputy, looks to the assize of woolen cloth made throughout the land, and to the putting on the seals for that purpose ordained. St. 17 Rich. II. c. 2; Cowell; Blount; Termes de la Ley.

ALNETUM. A place where alder trees grow. Domesday Book; Cowell; Blount.

ALODE, ALODES, or ALODIS (Law Lat.) In feudal law. Old forms of alodium or allodium (q. v.) Spelman.

ALT (Law Fr.) In Scotch practice. An abbreviation of alter, the other; the opposite party; the defender. 1 Brown, 336, note.

High. Kelham.

ALTA PRODITIO. High treason.

ALTA VIA. The highway.

ALTARAGE. In ecclesiastical law. Offerings made on the altar; all profits which accrue to the priest by means of the altar. Ayliffe, Par. 61; 2 Croke, 516.

ALTERATION. A change in the terms of a contract, made by the agreement of the parties thereto.

An act done upon an instrument in writing by a party entitled under it, without the consent of the other party, by which its meaning or language is changed.

The term is properly applied to the change in the language of instruments, and is not used of changes in the contract itself; and it is in strictness to be distinguished from the act of a stranger in changing the form or language of the instrument, which is called a "spoliation." This latter distinction is not always observed in practice, however.

ALTERIUS CIRCUMVENTIO ALII NON praebet actionem. Dig. 50. 17. 49. A deception practiced upon one person does not give a cause of action to another.

ALTERNAT. A usage among diplomatists by which the rank and places of different powers, who have the same right and pretentions to precedence, are changed from time to time, either in a certain regular order, or one determined by lot. In drawing up treaties and conventions, for example, it is the usage of certain powers to alternate, both in the preamble and the signatures, so that each power occupies, in the copy intended to be delivered to it, the first place. Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 3, § 4.

ALTERNATIM (Law Lat.) Interchangeably. Litt. § 371; Towns. Pl. 37.

ALTERNATIVA PETITIO NON EST audienda. An alternative petition is not to be heard. 5 Coke, 40.

ALTERNATIVE. Allowing a choice between two or more things or acts to be done.

In contracts, a party has often the choice which of several things to perform. A writ is in the alternative which commands the defendant to do the thing required, or show the reason wherefore he has not done it. Finch, 257; 3 Bl. Comm. 273. The first mandamus is an alternative writ. 3 Bl. Comm. 111. See "Nisi."

ALTERNATIVE REMEDY. One of several remedies between which one must elect. See "Cumulative Remedy."

ALTERNATIVE WRIT. A writ commanding the person against whom it is issued to do a specified thing, or show cause to the court why he should not be compelled to do it.

ALTERNIS VICIBUS (Law Lat.) By alternate turns; at alternate times; alternately. Co. Litt. 4a; Shep. Touch. 206.

ALTERUM NON LAEDERE. Not to injure another. One of Justinian's three principles, basis of all law. Inst. 1. 1. See "Honeste Vivere," and "Suam Cuique Tribuere."

ALTIUS NON TOLLENDI. In civil law. A servitude by which the owner of a house is restrained from building beyond a certain height.

ALTIUS TOLLENDI. In civil law. A servitude which consists in the right, to him who is entitled to it, to build his house as high as he may think proper. In general, every one enjoys this privilege, unless he is restrained by some contrary title.

ALTO ET BASSO. High and low. This phrase is applied to an agreement made between two contending parties to submit all matters in dispute, alto et basso, to arbitration. Cowell.

ALTUM MARE. The high sea.

ALUMNUS. A foster child.

ALVEUS (Lat.) The bed or channel through which the stream flows when it runs within its ordinary channel. Calv. Lex.

Alveus derelictus, a deserted channel. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 280.

AMALPHITAN TABLE. A code of sea laws compiled for the free and trading republic of Amalphi toward the end of the eleventh century. 3 Kent, Comm. 9. It consists of the laws on maritime subjects which were or had been in force in countries bordering on the Mediterranean, and, on account of its being collected into one regular system, it was for a long time received as authority in those countries. 1 Azuni, Mar. Law, 376.

AMBACTUS (Lat. ambire, to go about). A servant sent about; one whose services his master hired out. Spelman.

AMBASCIATOR. A person sent about in the service of another; a person sent on a service. A word of frequent occurrence in the writers of the middle ages. Spelman.

AMBASSADOR. In international law. A public minister sent abroad by some sovereign state or prince, with a legal commission and authority to transact business on behalf of his country with the government to which he is sent.

Ambassadors extraordinary are those employed on particular or extraordinary occasions, or residing at a foreign court for an indeterminate period. Vattel, lib. 4, c. 6, §§ 70-79.

Ambassadors ordinary are those sent on permanent missions.

An ambassador is a minister of the highest rank.

The United States were formerly represented by ministers plenipotentiary, sending no person of the rank of an ambassador, in the diplomatic sense. 1 Kent, Comm. 39, note. Ambassadors are now sent by the United States to England, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy under Act Cong. March 1, 1893.

AMBIDEXTER (Lat.) Skillful with both hands.

Applied anciently to an attorney who took pay from both sides, and subsequently to a juror guilty of the same offense. Cowell.

AMBIGUA RESPONSIO CONTRA PROferentem est accipienda. An ambiguous answer is to be taken against the party who offers it. 10 Coke, 58.

AMBIGUIS CASIBUS SEMPER PRAEsumitur pro rege. In doubtful cases the presumption is always in favor of the king. Lofft, 248.

AMBIGUITAS VERBORUM LATENS verificatione suppletur; nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur. A latent ambiguity may be supplied by evidence, for an ambiguity which arises out of a fact may be removed by proof of the fact. Bac. Max. reg. 23; 8 Bing. 247. See 1 Powell, Dev. 477; 2 Kent, Comm. 557; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 541; 13 Pet. (U. S.) 97; 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 90; 3 Halst. (N. J.) 71.

AMBIGUITAS VERBORUM PATENS nulla verificatione excluditur. A patent ambiguity is never holpen by averment. Lofft, 249; Bac. Max. 25; Cowen, J., 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 651, 659; 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 71, 78; Story, J., 1 Mason (U. S.) 11; Lipscomb, J., 1 Tex. 377, 383.

AMBIGUITY (Lat. ambiguitas, indistinctness; duplicity). Duplicity, indistinctness, or uncertainty of meaning of an expression used in a written instrument.

The term does not include mere inaccuracy, or such uncertainty as arises from the use of peculiar words, or of common words in a peculiar sense (Wigram, Wills, 174; 3 Sim. 24; 3 Man. & G. 452; 8 Metc. [Mass.] 576; 13 Vt. 36. See 21 Wend. [N. Y.] 651), and intends such expressions as would be found of uncertain meaning by persons of competent skill and information (1 Greenl. Ev. § 298).

It has also been confined to duplicity of meaning, and thus distinguished from general uncertainty. 2 Pars. Cont. 557, note.

Latent ambiguity is that which arises from some collateral circumstance or extrinsic matter in cases where the instrument itself is sufficiently certain and intelligible. 1 Gray (Mass.) 134.

Patent ambiguity is that which appears on the face of the instrument; that which occurs when the expression of an instrument is so defective that a court of law which is obliged to put a construction upon it, placing itself in the situation of the parties, cannot ascertain therefrom the parties' intention. 4 Mass. 205; 4 Cranch (U. S.) 167; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 292-300.

AMBIGUUM PLACITUM INTERPRETARI debet contra proferentem. An ambiguous plea ought to be interpreted against the party pleading it. Co. Litt. 303b; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 535; Steph. Pl. (5th Ed.) 415; Bac. Max. reg. 3; 2 H. Bl. 531; 2 Mees. & W. 444.

AMBIT. A boundary line.

AMBITUS (Lat.) A space beside a building, two and a half feet in width, and of the same length as the building; a space two and a half feet in width between two adjacent buildings; the circuit, or distance around. Calv. Lex.

AMBRA. In Saxon law. A vessel or measure, the capacity of which is now unknown. Spelman.

AMBULATORIA EST VOLUNTAS DEfuncti usque ad vitae supremum exitum. The will of a deceased person is ambulatory until the last moment of life. Dig. 34. 4. 4; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 445; 2 Bl. Comm. 502; Co. Litt. 322b; 1 Vict. c. 26, § 24; 3 El. & Bl. 572; 1 Jarm. Wills (2d Ed.) 11; 1 Mylne & K. 485; 2 Mylne & K. 73.

AMBULATORY (Lat. ambulare, to walk about). Movable; changeable; that which is not fixed.

Ambulatoria voluntas (a changeable will) denotes the power which a testator possesses of altering his will during his lifetime.

AMELIORATIONS. Betterments. 6 Low. (U. S.) 294; 9 Low. (U. S.) 503.

AMENABLE. Responsible; subject to answer in a court of justice; liable to punishment.

AMENDE HONORABLE.

——In English Law. A penalty imposed upon a person by way of disgrace or infamy, as a punishment for any offense, or for the purpose of making reparation for any injury done to another, as the walking into church in a white sheet, with a rope about the neck and a torch in the hand, and begging the pardon of God, or the king, or any private individual, for some delinquency.

——In French Law. A punishment somewhat similar to this, and which bore the same name, was common in France. It was abolished by the law of the 25th of September, 1791. Merlin, Repert.

AMENDMENT.

——In Practice. The correction, by allowance of the court, of an error committed in the progress of a cause, whether in process, pleading, proceedings, or judgment. It has been held not to include the substitution of a new pleading. 31 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 164; but see 4 Daly (N. Y.) 494.

——In Legislation. An alteration or change of something proposed in a bill or established as law.

AMENDS. A satisfaction given by a wrongdoer to the party injured for a wrong committed. 1 Lilly, Reg. 81.

By St. 24 Geo. II. c. 44, in England, and by similar statutes in some of the United States, justices of the peace, upon being notified of an intended suit against them, may tender amends for the wrong alleged or done by them in their official character, and, if found sufficient, the tender debars the action. 5 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 209, 517; 4 Bin. (Pa.) 20; 6 Bin. (Pa.) 83.

AMERALIUS (Law Lat.) A naval commander, under the eastern Roman empire, but not of the highest rank; the origin, according to Spelman, of the modern title and office of admiral. Spelman.

AMERCEMENT. In practice. A pecuniary penalty imposed upon an offender by a judicial tribunal.

The judgment of the court is that the party be at the mercy of the court (sit in misericordia), upon which the affeerors—or, in the superior courts, the coroner—liquidate the penalty. As distinguished from a fine, at the old law an amercement was for a lesser offense, might be imposed by a court not of record, and was for an uncertain amount until it had been affeered, while the amount of a fine was regulated by statute. Either party to a suit who failed was to be amerced pro clamore falso (for his false claim), but these amercements have been long since disused. 4 Bl. Comm. 379; Bac. Abr. "Fines and Amercements."

The officers of the court, and any person who committed a contempt of court, was also liable to be amerced.

AMESUREMENT (Law Fr.) In old English law. Admeasurement. Britt. c. 58; Reg. Orig. 155, "Regula."

AMI, or AMY (Fr.) A friend. See "Prochein Ami."

AMICABLE ACTION. In practice. An action entered by agreement of parties on the dockets of the courts.

AMICABLE COMPOUNDERS. "There are two sorts of arbitrators,—the arbitrators properly so called, and the amicable compounders. The arbitrators ought to determine as judges, agreeably to the strictness of law. Amicable compounders are authorized to abate something of the strictness of the law in favor of natural equity. Amicable compounders are in other respects subject to the same rules which are provided for the arbitrators by the present title." Civ. Code La. arts. 3109, 3110.

AMICUS CURIAE (Lat. a friend of the court). One who, for the assistance of the court, gives information of some matter of law in regard to which the court is doubtful or mistaken. Coke, 2d Inst. 178; 2 Viner, Abr. 475. The information may extend to any matter of which the court takes judicial cognizance. 8 Coke, 15.

AMITTERE CURIAM (Lat. to lose court). To be excluded from the right to attend court. St. Westminster II. c. 44.

AMITTERE LIBERAM LEGEM. Lose all rights under the law.

AMNESTY. An act of oblivion of past offenses, granted by the government to those who have been guilty of any neglect or crime, usually upon condition that they return to their duty within a certain period.

Express amnesty is one granted in direct terms.

Implied amnesty is one which results when a treaty of peace is made between contending parties. Vattel, lib. 4, c. 2, §§ 20-22.

Amnesty and pardon are very different. The former is an act of the sovereign power, the object of which is to efface and to cause to be forgotten a crime or misdemeanor; the latter is an act of the same authority, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment the law inflicts for the crime he has committed. 7 Pet. (U. S.) 160. Amnesty is the abolition and forgetfulness of the offense; pardon is forgiveness. A pardon is given to one who is certainly guilty, or has been convicted; amnesty, to those who may have been so.

Their effects are also different. That of pardon is the remission of the whole or a part of the punishment awarded by the law,—the conviction remaining unaffected when only a partial pardon is granted. An amnesty, on the contrary, has the effect of destroying the criminal act, so that it is as if it had not been committed, as far as the public interests are concerned.

Their application also differs. Pardon is always given to individuals, and properly only after judgment or conviction. Amnesty may be granted either before judgment or afterwards, and it is in general given to whole classes of criminals, or supposed criminals, for the purpose of restoring tranquility in the state; but sometimes amnesties are limited, and certain classes are excluded from their operation. See Phil. (N. C.) 247.

AMORTISE. To alien lands in mortmain.

AMORTIZATION. An alienation of lands or tenements in mortmain.

The reduction of the property of lands or tenements to mortmain.

AMOTION (Lat. amovere, to remove; to take away). An unlawful taking of personal chattels out of the possession of the owner, or of one who has a special authority in them.

A turning out the proprietor of an estate in realty before the termination of his estate. 3 Bl. Comm. 198, 199.

——In Corporations. A removal of an official agent of a corporation from the station assigned to him before the expiration of the term for which he was appointed. 6 Conn. 532.

The term is distinguished from disfranchisement, which deprives a member of all rights as a corporator. The term seems in strictness not to apply properly to cases where officers are appointed merely during the will of the corporation, and are superseded by the choice of a successor, but as commonly used includes such cases. 4 Abb. Pr. (N. S.; N. Y.) 192.

AMOUNT COVERED. In insurance. The amount that is insured, and for which underwriters are liable for loss under a policy of insurance.

AMOUNT OF LOSS. In insurance. The diminution, destruction, or defeat of the value of, or of the charge upon, the insured subject to the assured, by the direct consequence of the operation of the risk insured against, according to its value in the policy, or in contribution for loss, so far as its value is covered by the insurance. 2 Phil. Ins. cc. 25-27; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, c. 10, § 1, cc. 11, 12; 9 Cush. (Mass.) 415; 1 Gray (Mass.) 371; 26 N. H. 389; 31 N. H. 238; 5 Duer (N. Y.) 1; 1 Dutch. (N. J.) 506; 6 Ohio St. 200; 5 R. I. 426; 2 Md. 217; 7 El. & Bl. 172.

AMOVEAS MANUS (Lat. that you remove your hands). After office found, the king was entitled to the things forfeited, either lands or personal property. The remedy for a person aggrieved was by "petition," or "monstrans de droit," or "traverses," to establish his superior right. Thereupon a writ issued, quod manus domini regis amoveantur. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 260.

AMPARO (Spanish). A document protecting the claimant of land till properly authorized papers can be issued. 1 Tex. 790.

AMPLIATION.

——In Civil Law. A deferring of judgment until the cause is further examined. In this case, the judges pronounced the word amplius, or by writing the letters N. L. for non liquet, signifying that the cause was not clear. It is very similar to the common-law practice of entering cur. adv. vult in similar cases.

——In French Law. A duplicate of an acquittance or other instrument.

A notary's copy of acts passed before him, delivered to the parties.

AMPLIUS (Lat.) In the Roman law. More; further; more time. A word which the praetor pronounced in cases where there was any obscurity in a cause, and the judices were uncertain whether to condemn or acquit, by which the case was deferred to a day named. Adam, Rom. Ant. 287.

AMY (Fr.) Friend. See "Prochein Ami."

AN, JOUR, ET WASTE. See "Year, Day, and Waste."

ANACRISIS. In the civil law. An investigation of truth, interrogation of witnesses, and inquiry made into any fact, especially by torture.

ANAGRAPH. A register, or inventory.

ANALOGY. The similitude of relations which exist between things compared.

ANARCHY. The absence of all political government; by extension, confusion in government.

ANATHEMA. In ecclesiastical law. A punishment by which a person is separated from the body of the church, and forbidden all intercourse with the faithful. It differs from excommunication, which simply forbids the person excommunicated from going into the church and communicating with the faithful.

ANATOCISM. In civil law. Taking interest on interest; receiving compound interest.

ANCESTOR. One who has preceded another in a direct line of descent; an ascendant.

A former possessor; the person last seised. Termes de la Ley; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 201.

In the common law, the word is understood as well of the immediate parents as of those that are higher; as may appear by St. 25 Edw. III., De natis ultra mare, and by St. 6 Rich. II. c. 6, and by many others. But the civilians' relations in the ascending line, up to the great-grandfather's parents, and those above them, they term majores, which common lawyers aptly expound antecessors, or ancestors, for in the descendants of like degree they are called posteriores. Cary, Litt. 45. The term "ancestor" is applied to natural persons. The words "predecessors" and "successors" are used in respect to the persons composing a body corporate. See 2 Bl. Comm. 209; Bac. Abr.; Ayliffe, Pand. 58; Reeve, Descents.

ANCESTRAL. What relates to or has been done by one's ancestors; as homage ancestral, and the like.

That which belonged to one's ancestors.

Ancestral estates are such as come to the possessor by descent. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 411, 412.

ANCHOR. A measure containing ten gallons.

ANCHOR WATCH. The lookout required to be kept on the deck of a vessel riding at anchor. See 102 U. S. 200; 29 Fed. 601.

ANCHORAGE. A toll paid for every anchor cast from a ship in a port.

ANCIENT DEMESNE. Manors which, in the time of William the Conqueror, were in the hands of the crown, and are so recorded in the Domesday Book. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 14, 56.

Tenure in ancient demesne may be pleaded in abatement to an action of ejectment. 2 Burrows, 1046.

Tenants of this class had many privileges. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 99.

ANCIENT HOUSE. One which has stood long enough to acquire an easement of support. 3 Kent, Comm. 437; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 74, 76. See "Easement."

ANCIENT LIGHTS. Windows or openings which have remained in the same place and condition twenty years or more. 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 477; 12 Mass. 157, 220.

——In England. A right to unobstructed light and air through such openings is secured by mere user.

——In the United States. Such right is not acquired without an express grant, in most of the states. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 62, 63; 3 Kent, Comm. 446, note. See 11 Md. 1. See "Air."

ANCIENT READINGS. Essays on the early English statutes. Co. Litt. 280.

ANCIENT RENT. The rent reserved at the time the lease was made, if the building was not then under lease. 2 Vern. 542.

ANCIENT SERJEANT. In English law. The eldest of the queen's serjeants.

Serjeants were distinguished as ancient and puisne.

ANCIENT WRITINGS. Deeds, wills, and other writings, more than thirty years old.

ANCIENTS. Gentlemen in the Inns of Courts who are of a certain standing.

In the Middle Temple, all who have passed their readings are termed "ancients." In Gray's Inn, the ancients are the oldest barristers; besides which, the society consists of benchers, barristers, and students. In the Inns of Chancery, it consists of ancients and students or clerks.

ANCIENTY. Eldership; seniority. Used in St. Ir. 14 Hen. VIII. Cowell.

ANCILLARY (Lat ancilla, a handmaid). Auxiliary; subordinate.

ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATION. See "Administration."

ANCIPITIS USUS (Lat.) Useful for various purposes.

As it is impossible to ascertain the final use of an article ancipitis usus, it is not an injurious rule which deduces the final use from its immediate destination. 1 Kent, Comm. 140.

ANDROCHIA. In old English law. A dairy woman. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 87.

ANDROGYNOUS. Hermaphroditical.

ANDROGYNUS, or ANDROGYNE. An hermaphrodite. Johnson.

ANDROLEPSY. The taking by one nation of the citizens or subjects of another, in order to compel the latter to do justice to the former. Wolff. Inst. § 1164; Molloy de Jur. Mar. 26.

ANECIUS, AESNECIUS, ENITIUS, AENeas, or eneyus (Lat.) The eldest born; the first born; senior, as contrasted with the puisne (younger). Spelman, "Aesnecia."

ANGARIA.

——In Roman Law. A service or punishment exacted by government. They were of six kinds, viz., maintaining a post station where horses are changed; furnishing horses or carts; burdens imposed on lands or persons; disturbance, injury, anxiety of mind; the three or four day periods of fasting observed during the year; saddles or yokes borne by criminals from county to county, as a disgraceful mode of punishment among the Germans or Franks. Du Cange.

——In Feudal Law. Any troublesome or vexatious personal service paid by the tenant to his lord. Spelman.

ANGEL. An ancient English coin, of the value of ten shillings sterling. Jacob.

ANGILD, ANGYLDE, or ANGELD (Sax. from an, one, and gild, a payment or satisfaction). The single value of a man or other thing; the compensation for a thing according to its single value or estimation." See "Trigild;" Spelman. The rate fixed by law at which injuries to person or property were to be paid for. Also the fixed price at which cattle and other goods were received as currency. Wharton.

ANGLESCHERIA. In old English law. Englishery; the fact of being an Englishman. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 30; Bracton uses "Englesheria" (fol. 135).

Under Canute and William the Conquerer, for the protection of their subjects from assassination, a heavier fine was imposed on the vill or hundred for the killing of a Dane or Norman than for the killing of a native. It was an object, therefore, for the hundred to prove Anglescheria to relieve itself from the added penalty. Anglescheria was abolished by St. 14 Edw. III. c. 4. 4 Bl. Comm. 195.

ANGLIAE JURA IN OMNI CASU LIBERtati dant favorem. The laws of England are favorable in every case to liberty. Halk. Max. 12.

ANGLICE. In English. A term formerly used in pleading when a thing is described both in Latin and English, inserted immediately after the Latin, and as an introduction of the English translation.

ANGYLDE. See "Angild."

ANHLOTE (Saxon). The sense is that every one should pay, according to the custom of the country, his respective part and share. Spelman.

ANIENS, or ANIENT. Void; of no force. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 214.

ANIMAL. Any animate being which is not human, endowed with the power of voluntary motion.

Domitae are those which have been tamed by man; domestic.

Ferae naturae are those which still retain their wild nature.

Mansuetae naturae, those which are tame by nature.

ANIMALIA FERA, SI FACTA SINT mansueta et ex consuetudine eunt et redeunt, volant et revolant, ut cervi, cygni, etc., eo usque nostra sunt, et ita intelliguntur quamdiu habuerunt animum revertendi. Wild animals, if they be made tame, and are accustomed to go out and return, fly away and fly back, as stags, swans, etc., are considered to belong to us so long as they have the intention of returning to us. 7 Coke, 16.

ANIMALS OF A BASE NATURE. Those animals which, though they may be reclaimed, are not such that at common law a larceny may be committed of them, by reason of the baseness of their nature. Some animals which are now usually tamed come within this class, as dogs and cats; and others which, though wild by nature, and often reclaimed by art and industry, clearly fall within the same rule, as bears, foxes, apes, monkeys, ferrets, and the like. Coke, 3d Inst. 109; 1 Hale, P. C. 511, 512; 1 Hawk. P. C. 33, § 36; 4 Bl. Comm. 236; 2 East, P. C. 614. See 1 Wm. Saund. 84, note 2.

ANIMO (Lat.) With intention.

Animo is used in combination in the same manner as animus (q. v.) Thus, animo furandi, with intent to steal, etc.

ANIMO ET CORPORE (Lat.) By the mind and by the body; by intent and act.

ANIMUS (Lat. mind). The intention with which an act is done.

——Animus Cancellandi. An intention to destroy or cancel. See "Cancellation."

——Animus Capiendi. The intention to take. 4 C. Rob. Adm. 126, 155.

——Animus Dedicandi. The intention of donating or dedicating.

——Animus Defamandi. The intention of defaming.

——Animus Derelinquendi. The intention of abandoning. 4 C. Rob. Adm. 216.

——Animus Differendi. The intention of delaying.

——Animus Donandi. The intention of giving.

——Animus Felonico. Felonious intent.

——Animus Furandi. The intention to steal.

In order to constitute larceny, the thief must take the property animo furandi; but this is expressed in the definition of larceny by the word "felonious." 3 Inst. 107; Hale, P. C. 503; 4 Bl. Comm. 229. See 2 Russ. Crimes, 96; 2 Tyl. Comm. 272. When the taking of property is lawful, although it may afterwards be converted animo furandi to the taker's use, it is not larceny. Bac. Abr. "Felony" (C); 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 294; Ryan & M. 137, 160; Principles of Penal Law, c. 22, § 3, pp. 279, 281.

——Animus Lucandi. The intent to gain a profit. 3 Kent, Comm. 357.

——Animus Manendi. The intention of remaining.

To acquire a domicile, the party must have his abode in one place, with the intention of remaining there; for, without such intention, no new domicile can be gained, and the old will not be lost. See "Domicile."

——Animus Morandi. The intention to remain, or to delay.

——Animus Possidendi. The intention of possessing.

——Animus Quo. The intent with which.

——Animus Recipiendi. The intention of receiving.

A man will acquire no title to a thing unless he possesses it with an intention of receiving it for himself; as, if a thing be bailed to a man, he acquires no title.

——Animus Recuperandi. The intention of recovering. Locc. de Jur. Mar. lib. 2, c. 4, § 10.

——Animus Republicandi. The intention to republish.

——Animus Restituendi. The intention of restoring.

——Animus Revertendi. The intention of returning.

A man retains his domicile if he leaves it animo revertendi. 3 Rawle (Pa.) 312; 4 Bl. Comm. 225; 2 Russ. Crimes, 18; Poph. 42, 52; 4 Coke, 40. See "Domicile."

——Animus Testandi. An intention to make a testament or will.

This is required to make a valid will; for, whatever form may have been adopted, if there was no animus testandi, there can be no will. An idiot, for example, can make no will, because he can have no intention.

ANIMUS AD SE OMNE JUS DICIT. It is to the intention that all law applies.

ANIMUS HOMINIS EST ANIMA SCRIPti. The intention of the party is the soul of the instrument. 3 Bulst. 67; Pitman, Prin. & Sur. 26.

ANN, or ANNAT. In Scotch law. Half a year's stipend, over and above what is owing for the incumbency, due to a minister's relict, or child, or next of kin, after his decease. Whishaw; Bell, Dict. See Ersk. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 10, §§ 65-67.

ANNALES (Lat.) Annuals; a title formerly given to the Year Books. 9 London, Leg. Obs. 323.

——In Old Records. Yearlings; cattle of the first year. Cowell.

ANNALY. In Scotch law. To alienate; to convey.

ANNATES. In ecclesiastical law. First fruits paid out of spiritual benefices to the pope, being the value of one year's profit.

ANNEXATION (Lat. ad, to, nexare, to bind). The union of one thing to another.

It conveys the idea, properly, of fastening a smaller thing to a larger; an incident to a principal. It has been applied to denote the union of Texas to the United States.

Actual annexation includes every movement by which a chattel can be joined or united to the freehold.

Constructive annexation is the union of such things as have been holden parcel of the realty, but which are not actually annexed, fixed, or fastened to the freehold. Shep. Touch. 469; Amos & F. Fixt. 2. See "Fixtures."

ANNI ET TEMPORA. (Lat.) Years and terms. An old title of the Year Books. 9 London, Leg. Obs. 323.

ANNI NUBILES. (Lat. marriageable years). The age at which a girl becomes by law fit for marriage; the age of twelve.

ANNICULUS (Lat.) A child a year old. Calv. Lex.

ANNICULUS TRECENTESIMO SEXAgesimo quinto die dicitur, incipiente plane non exacto die, quia annum civiliter non ad momenta temporum sed ad dies numeramur. We call a child a year old on the three hundred and sixty-fifth day, when the day is fairly begun, but not ended, because we calculate the civil year not by moments, but by days. Dig. 50. 16. 134; Id. 132; Calv. Lex.

ANNIENTED (Fr. aneantir). Abrogated, or made null. Litt. § 741.

ANNO DOMINI (Lat. the year of our Lord; abbreviated A. D.) The computation of time from the incarnation of Jesus Christ.

The Jews began their computation of time from the creation; the Romans, from the building of Rome; the Mohammedans, from the Hegira, or flight of the prophet; the Greeks reckoned by Olympiads; but Christians everywhere reckon from the birth of Jesus Christ.

In a complaint, the year of the alleged offense may be stated by means of the letters "A. D.," followed by words expressing the year. 4 Cush. (Mass.) 596. But an indictment or complaint which states the year of the commission of the offense in figures only, without prefixing the letters "A. D.," is insufficient. 5 Gray (Mass.) 91. The letters "A. D.," followed by figures expressing the year, have been held sufficient in several states. 3 Vt. 481; 1 G. Greene (Iowa) 418; 35 Me. 489; 1 Bennett & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 512.

ANNONA (Lat.) Barley; corn; grain; a yearly contribution of food, of various kinds, for support.

Annona porcum, acorns; annona frumentum hordeo admixtum, corn and barley mixed; annona panis, bread, without reference to the amount. Du Cange; Spelman; Cowell.

The term is used in the old English law, and also in the civil law quite generally, to denote anything contributed by one person towards the support of another; as, si quis mancipio annonam dederit, if any shall have given food to a slave. Du Cange; Spelman.

ANNONAE CIVILES. Yearly rents issuing out of certain lands, and payable to monasteries.

ANNOTATION. In civil law.

(1) The answers of the prince to questions put to him by private persons respecting some doubtful point of law. See "Rescript."

(2) Summoning an absentee. Dig. 1. 5.

(3) The designation of a place of deportation. Dig. 32. 1. 3.

ANNUA NEC DEDITUM JUDEX NON separat ipse. Even the judge divides not annuities or debt. 8 Coke, 52. See Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 480, 517; 1 Salk. 36, 65.

ANNUA PENSIONE. See "De Annua Pensione."

ANNUAL ASSAY. An annual trial of the gold and silver coin of the United States, to ascertain whether the standard fineness and weight of the coinage is maintained.

ANNUAL PENSION. In Scotch law. Annual rent or profit.

ANNUAL RENT. In Scotch law. Interest.

To avoid the law against taking interest, a yearly rent was purchased, hence the term came to signify interest. Bell, Dict.; Paterson, Comp. §§ 19, 265.

ANNUITIES OF TIENDS. In Scotch law. Annuities of tithes.

The yearly tax or allowance to the crown on tithes not set apart for pious uses.

ANNUITY (Lat. annuus, yearly). A yearly sum stipulated to be paid to another in fee, or for life, or years, and chargeable only on the person of the grantor. Co. Litt. 144b; 2 Bl. Comm. 40; Lumley, Ann. 1; 5 Mart. (La.) 312; Dav. Ir. 14.

An annuity is different from a rent charge, with which it is sometimes confounded,—the annuity being chargeable on the person merely, and so far personalty, while a rent charge is something reserved out of realty, or fixed as a burden upon the estate in land. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 40; Rolle, Abr. 226; 10 Watts (Pa.) 127. An annuity in fee is said to be a personal fee; for, though transmissible, as is real estate of inheritance (Amb. 782), liable to forfeiture as a hereditament (7 Coke, 34a), and not constituting assets in the hands of an executor, it lacks some other characteristics of realty. The husband is not entitled to curtesy, nor the wife to dower, in an annuity. Co. Litt. 32a. It cannot be conveyed by way of use (2 Wils. 224), is not within the statute of frauds, and may be bequeathed and assigned as personal estate (2 Ves. Sr. 70; 4 Barn. & A. 59; Roscoe, Real Actions, 35, 68; 3 Kent, Comm. 460).

ANNUITY TAX. An impost levied annually in Scotland for the maintenance of the ministers of religion. Abolished 33 & 34 Vict. c. 87.

ANNULUS (Lat.) In old English law. A ring; the ring of a door. Per haspam vel annulum hostii exterioris, by the hasp or ring of the outer door. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 15, § 5.

ANNULUS ET BACULUS (Lat. ring and staff). The investiture of a bishop was per annulum et baculum, by the prince's delivering to the prelate a ring and pastoral staff, or crozier. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 378; Spelman.

ANNUM, DIEM, ET VASTUM. See "Year, Day, and Waste."

ANNUS (Lat.) In civil and old English law. A year; the period of three hundred and sixty-five days. Dig. 40. 7. 4. 5; Bracton, fol. 359. See "Year."

ANNUS DELIBERANDI (Lat.) In Scotch law. A year of deliberating; a year to deliberate. The year allowed by law to the heir to deliberate whether he will enter and represent his ancestor. It commences on the death of the ancestor, unless in the case of a posthumous heir, when the year runs from his birth. Bell, Dict.

ANNUS, DIES, ET VASTUM. See "Year, Day, and Waste."

ANNUS EST MORA MOTUS QUO SUUM planeta pervolat circulum. A year is the duration of the motion by which a planet revolves through its orbit. Dig. 40. 7. 4. 5; Calv. Lex.; Bracton, 359b.

ANNUS LUCTUS (Lat.) The year of mourning. Code, 5. 9. 2.

It was a rule among the Romans, and also the Danes and Saxons, that the widows should not marry infra annum luctus (within the year of mourning). 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 457.

ANNUS UTILIS. A year made up of available or serviceable days. Brissonius; Calv. Lex.

ANNUUS REDITUS (or REDDITUS). A yearly rent; annuity. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 41; Reg. Orig. 158b.

ANONYMOUS. Without name. Books published without the name of the author are said to be anonymous. Cases in the reports of which the names of the parties are not given are said to be anonymous.

ANSEL, ANSUL, or AUNCEL. In old English law. An ancient mode of weighing by hanging scales or hooks at either end of a beam or staff, which, being lifted with one's finger or hand by the middle, showed the equality or difference between the weight at one end and the thing weighed at the other. Termes de la Ley, 66.

ANSWER.

——In Equity Pleading. A defense in writing, made by a defendant to the charges contained in a bill or information filed by the plaintiff against him in a court of equity.

——In Code Pleading. The defendant's pleading in any civil action.

——In Practice. The statement of a witness in response to a question.

ANTAPOCHA (Lat.) An instrument by which the debtor acknowledges the debt due the creditor, and binds himself. A copy of the apocha, signed by the debtor, and delivered to the creditor. Calv. Lex.

ANTE EXHIBITIONEM BILLAE. Before the exhibition of the bill; before suit begun.

ANTE FACTUM, or ANTE GESTUM. Done before. A Roman law term for a previous act, or thing done before.

ANTE JURAMENTUM, or JURAMENtum calumniae (Lat.) The oath formerly required of the parties previous to a suit,—of the plaintiff that he would prosecute, and of the defendant that he was innocent. Jacob; Whishaw.

ANTE LITEM MOTAM. Before suit brought.

ANTECESSOR. An ancestor (q. v.)

ANTEDATE. To put a date to an instrument of a time before the time it was written.

ANTENATI (Lat. born before). Those born in a country before a change in its political condition such as to affect their allegiance.

The correlative term is postnati.

——In the United States. It ordinarily denotes those born in this country prior to the Declaration of Independence. See 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 535.

——In England. It ordinarily denotes those born before the union with Scotland.

ANTENUPTIAL. Before marriage; before marriage, with a view to entering into marriage.

ANTI MANIFESTO. The declaration of the reasons which one of the belligerents publishes, to show that the war as to him is defensive. Wolffius, § 1187.

ANTICHRESIS (Lat.) In civil law. An agreement by which the debtor gives to the creditor the income from the property which he has pledged, in lieu of the interest on his debt. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

It is analogous to the Welsh mortgage of the common law. In the French law, if the income was more than the interest, the debtor was entitled to demand an account of the income, and might claim any excess. Civ. Code La. art. 2085. See Dig. 20. 1. 11; Id. 13. 7. 1; Code, 8. 28, 1; 11 Pet. (U. S.) 351; 1 Kent, Comm. 137.

ANTICIPATION (Lat. ante, before, capere, to take). The act of doing or taking a thing before its proper time.

In deeds of trust there is frequently a provision that the income of the estate shall be paid by the trustee as it shall accrue, and not by way of anticipation. A payment made contrary to such provision would not be considered as a discharge of the trustee.

ANTIGRAPH. A copy.

ANTIGRAPHUS. In the Roman law. An officer whose duty it was to keep an eye over the money which the tax gatherers collected for the use of the state.

A controller or supervisor of public moneys.

ANTINOMIA. In Roman law. A real or apparent contradiction or inconsistency in the laws. Merlin, Repert.

It is sometimes used as an English word, and spelled "Antinomy."

ANTIQUA CUSTUMA (Law Lat. ancient custom). The duty due upon wool, woolfells, and leather, under St. 3 Edw. I.

The distinction between antiqua and nova custuma arose upon the imposition of a new and increased duty upon the same articles, by the king, in the twenty-second year of his reign. Bac. Abr. "Smuggling" (C 1).

ANTIQUA STATUTA. English statutes from the time of Richard I. to Edward III.

ANTIQUARE. In the Roman law. To restore a former law or practice; to reject or vote against a new law; to prefer the old law. Those who voted against a proposed law wrote on their ballots the letter "A," the initial of antiquo, I am for the old law. Calv. Lev.

ANTIQUUM DOMINICUM. In old English law. Ancient demesne, contrasted with novum perquisitum, new purchase or acquest. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 71, § 15.

ANTITHETARIUS. In old English law. A man who endeavors to discharge himself of the crime of which he is accused, by retorting the charge on the accuser. He differs from an approver in this, that the latter does not charge the accuser, but others. Jacob.

ANTRUSTIO, or AMTRUSTIO. In early feudal law. A confidential vassal. A term applied to the followers of the ancient German chiefs, and of the kings and counts of the Franks. Spelman.

ANUELS LIVRES (Law Fr.) The Year Books (q. v.) Kelham.

APANAGE. In French law. A portion set apart for the use and support of the younger ones, upon condition, however, that it should revert, upon failure of male issue, to his original donor and his heirs. Spelman.

APARTMENT. A part of a house occupied by a person, while the rest is occupied by another, or others. 7 Man. & G. 95; 6 Mod. 214; Woodfall, Landl. & Ten. 178. As to what is not an apartment, see 10 Pick. (Mass.) 293.

APATISATIO. An agreement or compact. Du Cange.

APERTA BREVIA. Open, unsealed writs.

APERTUM FACTUM. An overt act.

APERTURA TESTAMENTI. A form of proving a will, in the civil law, by the witnesses acknowledging before a magistrate their having sealed it. 1 Williams, Ex'rs, 329.

APEX JURIS (Lat. the summit of the law). A rule of law of extreme refinement. A term used to denote a stricter application of the rules of law than is indicated by the phrase summum jus. 2 Caines (N. Y.) 117; 2 Story (U. S.) 143; 5 Conn. 334; 2 Pars. Notes & Bills, c. 25, § 11. See, also, Co. Litt. 3046; Wingate, Max. 19.

APICES JURIS NON SUNT JURA. Legal niceties are not laws. Co. Litt. 304; 3 Scott, 773; 10 Coke, 126; Broom, Leg. Max. 142. See "Apex Juris."

APICES LITIGANDI (Lat.) Subtleties of law; extreme technicalities.

APOCAE (Lat.) A writing acknowledging payments; acquittance.

It differs from "acceptilation" in this, that acceptilation imports a complete discharge of the former obligation, whether payment be made or not; apocha, discharge only upon payment being made. Calv. Lex.

APOCHAE ONERATORIAE (Law Lat.) In old commercial law. Bills of lading. Casaregis, disc. 1, note 111; Id. disc. 10, note 25; Id. disc. 25, note 5.

APOCRISARIUS (Lat.) In civil law. A messenger; an ambassador.

Applied to legates or messengers, as they carried the messages of their principals. They performed several duties distinct in character, but generally pertaining to ecclesiastical affairs.

A messenger sent to transact ecclesiastical business, and report to his superior; an officer who had charge of the treasury of a monastic edifice; an officer who took charge of opening and closing the doors. Du Cange; Spelman; Calv. Lex.

Apocrisarius cancellarius, an officer who took charge of the royal seal, and signed royal despatches.

Called, also, secretarius consiliarius (from his giving advice); referendarius; a consiliis (from his acting as counsellor); a responsis, or responsalis.

APOGRAPHA. In civil law. An examination and enumeration of things possessed; an inventory. Calv. Lex.

APOSTASY. The total renunciation of Christianity, by embracing either a false religion, or no religion at all. This offense can only take place in such as have once professed Christianity. 4 Bl. Comm. 43.

APOSTATA. In civil and old English law. An apostate. Code 1. 7; Reg. Orig. 71b.

APOSTATA CAPIENDO. An obsolete English writ which issued against an apostate, or one who had violated the rules of his religious order. It was addressed to the sheriff, and commanded him to deliver the defendant into the custody of the abbot or prior. Reg. Orig. 71, 267; Jacob; Wharton.

APOSTILLE, or APPOSTILLE (Law Fr.) An addition; note or observation. Kelham. A marginal note. Rich. Dict.

APOSTLES. Brief letters of dismissal granted to a party who takes an appeal from the decision of an English court of admiralty, stating the case, and declaring that the record will be transmitted. 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 438; Dig. 49. 6.

This term was used in the civil law. It is derived from apostolis, a Greek word, which signifies "one sent," because the judge from whose sentence an appeal was made sent to the superior judge these letters of dismission, or apostles. Merlin, Repert. mot "Apotres;" 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 745; 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 663.

APOSTOLI. In civil law. Certificates of the inferior judge from whom a cause is removed, directed to the superior. Dig. 49. 6. See "Apostles."

Those sent as messengers. Spelman.

APOSTOLUS. A messenger; an ambassador, legate, or nuncio. Spelman.

APOTHECA. In the civil law. A repository; a place of deposit, as of wine, oil, books, etc. Calv. Lex.

APPARATOR (Law Lat.) One who furnishes or provides. A sheriff was formerly styled in England apparator comitatus, as having charge of certain county arrangements and expenditures. Cowell.

APPARENT DANGER. That degree of peril of death or great bodily harm which will justify the killing of an assailant in self-defense. The danger need not be real, but must be sufficient to cause a reasonably prudent and courageous man to believe himself in imminent peril.

APPARENT DEFECTS. In a thing sold, those which can be discovered by simple inspection. Code La. art. 2497.

APPARENT (or CONTINUOUS) EASEment. One depending on some artificial structure or natural formation permanent in character and obvious. One which is at all times known to the owner of the subservient tenement by apparent signs. 18 N. J. Eq. 262; 1 Hurl. & N. 916.

APPARENT HEIR. One whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided he outlive the ancestor. 2 Bl. Comm. 208.

——In Scotch Law. One who is entitled to enter heir to a deceased ancestor, before actual entry. Ersk. Inst. bk. 3, tit. 8, § 54.

APPARENT MATURITY. Of a negotiable instrument. The time when, by its face, it will fall due.

APPARITIO. An appearance.

APPARITOR (Lat.) An officer or messenger employed to serve the process of the spiritual courts in England, and summon offenders. Cowell.

APPARLEMENT. In old English law. Resemblance; likelihood; as apparlement of war. St. 2 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 6; Cowell.

APPARURA (Lat.) In old English law. Furniture or implements.

Carucariae apparura, plough tackle. Cowell; Jacob.

APPEAL (Fr. appeler, to call).

——In Practice. The removal of a cause from a court of inferior to one of superior jurisdiction, for the purpose of obtaining a review and retrial. Ellsworth, C. J., 3 Dall. (U. S.) 321; 7 Cranch (U. S.) 110; 10 Pet. (U. S.) 205; 14 Mass. 414; 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 78; 1 Bin. (Pa.) 219; 3 Bin. (Pa.) 48.

It is sometimes used as meaning generally the removal of a cause to a higher court (4 N. J. Eq. 137), and in this sense it includes writ of error (1 Ill. 334).

It is a civil-law proceeding in its origin, and differs from a writ of error in this, that it subjects both the law and the facts to a review and a retrial, while a writ of error is a common-law process which removes matter of law only for re-examination. 7 Cranch (U. S.) 111.

On an appeal, the whole case is examined and tried, as if it had not been tried before; while on a writ of error, the matters of law merely are examined, and judgment reversed if any errors have been committed. Dane, Abr. "Appeal." The word is used in the sense here given both in chancery and in common-law practice (16 Md. 282; 20 How. [U. S.] 198), and in criminal as well as in civil law (9 Ind. 569; 6 Fla. 679); and in many states the writ of error has been abolished, and appeal established as the ordinary method of review in all cases, the scope of the review varying in the different states.

——In Old Criminal Practice. A formal accusation made by one private person against another of having committed some heinous crime. 4 Bl. Comm. 312.

——In Legislation. The act by which a member of a legislative body who questions the correctness of a decision of the presiding officer, or "chair," procures a vote of the body upon the decision.

APPEARANCE. In practice. A coming into court as party to a suit, whether as plaintiff or defendant.

The formal proceeding by which a defendant submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court.

"'Appearance' in the law has several significations, and the word must always be understood in reference to the particular business or subject-matter to which it relates. In some cases it means to appear in person; in others, by attorney. Sometimes an obligation to appear can only be satisfied by actually coming into court, while in others it will be sufficient to put in special bail, or enter an appearance in the common rule book. In one case it may be necessary for the party to appear on the specified day, while in another it will be sufficient if done within ten or twenty days thereafter. The purpose or end to be answered by the appearance is also important. In most, if not all, cases where a party is bound to a personal appearance in court to answer any charge or action against him, he must not only appear, but must remain in court until discharged by due course of law, and how long he must attend depends on the nature of the proceedings and the course and practice of the court." 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 459.

It may be of the following kinds:

(1) Compulsory. That which takes place in consequence of the service of process.

(2) Voluntary. That which is made in answer to a subpoena or summons, without process. 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 77.

(3) General. A simple and absolute submission to the jurisdiction of the court.

(4) Special. That which is made for certain purposes only, and does not extend to all the purposes of the suit.

(5) Conditional. One which is coupled with conditions as to its becoming general.

(6) De bene esse. One which is to remain an appearance, except in a certain event. See "De Bene Esse."

(7) Gratis. One made before the party has been legally notified to appear.

(8) Optional. One made where the party is not under any obligation to appear, but does so to save his rights. It occurs in chancery practice, especially in England.

(9) Subsequent. An appearance by the defendant after one has already been entered for him by the plaintiff. See Daniell, Ch. Pr.

APPEARANCE DAY. The day on which an appearance is required.

APPEARAND HEIR. An apparent heir (q. v.)

APPEL (Law Fr.; Law Lat. appellum). In old English law. An appeal. Britt. c. 22. See "Appeal."

APPELLANT. In practice. He who makes an appeal from one jurisdiction to another.

APPELLATE. In practice. Pertaining to appeals; having cognizance of appeals.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION. In practice. The jurisdiction which a superior court has to rehear causes which have been tried in inferior courts. See "Jurisdiction."

APPELLATIO (Lat.) An appeal.

APPELLE (Law Fr.) In old practice. The party accused by the process of appeal. Britt. c. 23. See "Appeal."

APPELLEE. In practice. The party in a cause against whom an appeal has been taken.

APPELLO (Lat.) In the civil law. I appeal. The form of making an appeal apud acta. Dig. 49. 1. 2.

APPELLOR. A criminal who accuses his accomplices; one who challenges a jury.

APPELLOUR (Law Fr.) In old practice. The party who brought an appeal; the plaintiff in an appeal. Britt. c. 22.

APPENDANT (Lat. ad, to, pendere, to hang). Annexed or belonging to something superior; an incorporeal inheritance belonging to another inheritance.

Appendant in deeds includes nothing which is substantial corporeal property, capable of passing by feoffment and livery of seisin. Co. Litt. 121; 4 Coke, 86; 8 Barn. & C. 150; 6 Bing. 150. A matter appendant must arise by prescription, while a matter appurtenant may be created at any time. 2 Viner, Abr. 594; 3 Kent, Comm. 404.

APPENDITIA (Lat. appendere, to hang at or on). The appendages or pertinances of an estate; the appurtenances to a dwelling, etc.; thus, penthouses are the appenditia domus.

APPENSURA. Payment of money by weight instead of by count. Cowell.

APPERTINANCES. An old form of appurtenances (q. v.) Cowell.

APPLICARE (Lat.) In old English law. To fasten to; to moor (a vessel).

Anciently rendered, "to apply." Hale de Jure Mar. par. 2, c. 3. This sense of the word seems to have been derived from the civil law. Dig. 1. 8. 5.

APPLICATIO EST VITA REGULAE. Application is the life of a rule. 2 Bulst. 79.

APPLICATION (Lat. applicare). The act of making a request for something.

A written request.

The use or disposition made of a thing.

——In Insurance. The preliminary statement made by a party applying for an insurance on life, or against fire.

——Of Purchase Money. The use or disposition made of the funds received by a trustee on a sale of real estate held under the trust.

——Of Payment. See "Appropriation."

APPOINTEE. A person who is appointed or selected for a particular purpose; as, the appointee under a power is the person who is to receive the benefit of the trust of power.

APPOINTMENT. The designation of a person, by the person or persons having authority therefor, to discharge the duties of some office or trust.

As distinguished from an election, it seems that an appointment is generally made by one person, or a limited number acting with delegated powers, while an election is made by all of a class.

The word is sometimes used in a sense quite akin to this, and apparently derived from it as denoting the right or privilege conferred by an appointment. Thus, the act of authorizing a man to print the laws of the United States by authority, and the right thereby conveyed, are considered such an appointment, but the right is not an office. 17 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 29, 233. And see 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 157; Cooper, Just. 599, 604.

The exercise of a right to designate the person or persons who are to take the use of real estate. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 302.

APPOINTOR. One authorized by the donor, under the statute of uses, to execute a power. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1923. Also called "donee."

APPORT (Law Fr.) In old English law. Tax; tallage; tribute; imposition; payment; charge; expenses. Kelham.

APPORTIONMENT. The division or distribution of a subject-matter in proportionate parts. Co. Litt. 147; 1 Swanst. 37, note; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 475a.

——Of Contracts. The allowance, in case of the partial performance of a contract, of a proportionate part of what the party would have received as a recompense for the entire performance of the contract.

——Of Incumbrances. Determining the amounts which each of several parties interested in an estate shall pay towards the removal or in support of the burden of an incumbrance.

——Of Rent. The allotment of their shares in a rent to each of several parties owning it.

The determination of the amount of rent to be paid when the tenancy is terminated at some period other than one of the regular intervals for the payment of rent.

——Of Corporate Shares. The distribution pro rata among the shareholders when there has been an oversubscription.

——Of an Annuity. Pro rata allowance for part of a year; not allowed at common law, but allowed as to some classes by 11 Geo. II.

——Of Representatives. The fixing of the number of representatives in congress allowed to each state, made on the basis of population as shown by each United States census. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 2.

APPORTUM. In old English law. The revenue, profit, or emolument which a thing brings to the owner. Commonly applied to a corody or pension. Blount.

APPOSAL OF SHERIFFS. In English law. The charging them with money received upon account of the exchequer. 22 & 23 Car. II.; Cowell.

APPOSER. In English law. An officer of the exchequer, whose duty it was to examine the sheriffs in regard to their accounts handed in to the exchequer. He was also called the "foreign apposer."

APPOSTILLE. In French law. An addition or annotation made in the margin of a writing. Merlin, Repert.

APPRAISEMENT. A just valuation of property.

A valuation under public authority as of the goods of a decedent, or of property taken for public use.

Appraisal for taxation is called "assessment" (q. v.)

APPRAISER. In practice. A person appointed by competent authority to appraise or value goods or real estate.

APPREHENSIO (Lat.) In the civil and old English law. A taking hold of a person or thing; apprehension; the seizure or capture of a person. Calv. Lex.

One of the varieties or subordinate forms of occupatio, or the mode of acquiring title to things not belonging to any one. Fleta applies it to the finding of things on the seashore. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 2, § 5.

APPREHENSION.

——In Practice. The capture or arrest of a person on a criminal charge.

The term "apprehension" is applied to criminal cases, and "arrest" to civil cases; as, one having authority may arrest on civil process, and apprehend on a criminal warrant. See "Arrest."

——In the Civil Law. A physical or corporal act (corpus) on the part of one who intends to acquire possession of a thing, by which he brings himself into such a relation to the thing that he may subject it to his exclusive control, or by which he obtains the physical ability to exercise his power over the thing whenever he pleases. One of the requisites to the acquisition of judicial possession, and by which, when accompanied by intention (animus), possession is acquired. Mackeld. Civ. Law, §§ 248-250.

APPRENDRE. See "A Prendre."

APPRENTICE. A person bound in due form of law to a master, to learn from him his art, trade, or business, and to serve him during the time of his apprenticeship. 1 Bl. Comm. 426; 2 Kent, Comm. 211; 3 Rawle (Pa.) 307; 61 N. Y. 274. A mere agreement by a father that his son should work for three years for wages to be paid the father, and should be taught the employer's trade, does not constitute the son an apprentice. 3 N. J. Law, 413. See 90 N. Y. 213.

APPRENTICE EN LA LEY. An ancient name for students at law, and afterwards applied to counsellors, apprentici ad barras, from which comes the more modern word "barrister."

APPRENTICESHIP. A contract by which one person who understands some art, trade, or business, and called the "master," undertakes to teach the same to another person, commonly a minor, and called the "apprentice," who, on his part, is bound to serve the master, during a definite period of time, in such art, trade, or business.

The term during which an apprentice is to serve. Pardessus, Dr. Com. note 34.

APPRENTICIUS AD LEGEM. An apprentice to the law; a law student; a counsellor below the degree of serjeant; a barrister. See "Apprentice en la Ley."

APPRIZING. In Scotch law. A form of process by which a creditor formerly took possession of the estates of the debtor in payment of the debt due.

It is now superseded by "adjudication."

APPROACH. The right of visit or visitation to determine the national character of the ship approached for that purpose only. 1 Kent, Comm. 153.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. In Scotch law. To approve and reject.

The doctrine of approbate and reprobate is the English doctrine of election. A party cannot both approbate and reprobate the same deed. 4 Wils. & S. H. L. 460; 1 Ross, Lead. Cas. 617; Paterson, Comp. 710; 1 Bell, Comm. 146.

APPROPRIATION.

——Of Payments. The application of a payment made to a creditor by his debtor, to one or more of several debts. In the absence of an agreement, the application is presumed to be that most favorable to the debtor.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. The perpetual annexation of an ecclesiastical benefice which is the general property of the church to the use of some spiritual corporation, either sole or aggregate. It corresponds with "impropriation," which is setting apart a benefice to the use of a lay corporation. The name came from the custom of monks in England to retain the churches in their gift, and all the profits of them in proprio usus to their own immediate benefit. 1 Burn, Ecc. Law, 71.

——Of Government Money. No money can be drawn from the treasury of the United States but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Const. art. 1, § 9. Under this clause of the constitution it is necessary for congress to appropriate money for the support of the federal government, and in payment of claims against it, and this is done annually by acts of appropriation, some of which are for the general purposes of government, and others special and private in their nature.

APPROVE. To increase the profits upon a thing. Used of common or waste lands which were inclosed and devoted to husbandry. 3 Kent, Comm. 406; Old Nat. Brev. 79.

While confessing crime one's self, to accuse another of the same crime. It is so called because the accuser must prove what he asserts. Staundf. P. C. 142; Cromp. Jus. Peace, 250.

To vouch; to appropriate; to improve. Kelham.

APPROVED ENDORSED NOTES. Notes

endorsed by another person than the maker, for additional security. See 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 431.

APPROVER. In English criminal law. One confessing himself guilty of felony, and accusing others of the same crime to save himself. Cromp. Inst. 250; 3 Inst. 129. Such an one was obliged to maintain the truth of his charge, by the old law. Cowell. The approvement must have taken place before plea pleaded. 4 Bl. Comm. 330.

Certain men sent into the several counties to increase the farms (rents) of hundreds and wapentakes, which formerly were let at a certain value to the sheriffs. Cowell.

Sheriffs are called the "king's approvers." Termes de la Ley.

Approvers in the Marches were those who had license to sell and purchase beasts there.

APPRUARE (Law Lat.) To improve land; to obtain a profit by improvement. St. Westminster II. c. 46.

APPULSUS (Lat.) In the civil law. A driving to, as of cattle to water. Dig. 8. 3. 1. 1.

APPURTENANCES. Things belonging to another thing as principal, and which pass as incidents to such principal thing. 10 Pet. (U. S.) 25; 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 169; 117 Mo. 61; 61 N. Y. 390; 53 N. H. 508.

Appurtenance must be of an inferior nature to the principal (16 Conn. 260), and must not only be appendant in utility, but there must be unity of right to both in the same person (29 Ohio St. 649).

Appurtenances are distinguished from appendages in that the latter are those appendant things which become so by prescription, while the latter are those otherwise acquired. 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 291; 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 498.

APPURTENANT. Pertaining to. See "Appurtenances."

APT WORDS. Correct technical words, requiring no latitude of construction to give them the meaning intended.

APTA VIRO. A marriageable woman; sometimes used to denote that she is of legal age, and discovert, but oftener with respect to physical capacity.

APUD ACTA (Lat.) Among the recorded acts. This was one of the verbal appeals (so called by the French commentators), and was obtained by simply saying, appello.

AQUA (Lat.) Water. It is a rule that water belongs to the land which it covers when it is stationary. Aqua cedit solo, water follows the soil. 2 Bl. Comm. 18; Co. Litt. 4.

AQUA AESTIVA. Water that was drawn in summer only.

AQUA CEDIT SOLO. The water yields or accompanies the soil. The grant of the soil or land carries the water. Hale, de Jur. Mar. pt. 1, c. 1; 2 Bl. Comm. 18.

AQUA COOPERTA. Covered with water. 2 P. Wms. 128.

AQUA CURRENS. Running water. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 6, § 3.

AQUA CURRIT ET DEBET CURRERE ut currere solebat. Water runs and ought to run as it has used to run. 3 Rawle (Pa.) 84, 88; 26 Pa. St. 413; 3 Kent. Comm. 439; Angell, Watercourses, 413; Gale & W. Easem. 182.

AQUA FONTANEA. Spring water. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 27, § 8.

AQUA PLUVIA. Rain water. Dig. 39. 3. 1. pr.

AQUA PROFLUENS. Flowing or running water. Dig. 1. 8. 2.

AQUA QUOTIDIANA. Water which might be drawn at all times of the year.

AQUA SALSA. Salt water. Reg. Orig. 97.

AQUA TRESTORNATA. A stream turned out of its course.

AQUAE DUCTUS. In civil law. A servitude which consists in the right to carry water by means of pipes or conduits over or through the estate of another. Dig. 8. 3. 1; Inst. 2. 3; Lalaure des Serv. c. 5, p. 23.

AQUAE HAUSTUS. In civil law. A servitude which consists in the right to draw water from the fountain, pool, or spring of another. Inst. 2. 3. 2; Dig. 8. 3. 1. 1.

AQUAE IMMITTENDAE. In civil law. A servitude which frequently occurs among neighbors.

It is the right which the owner of a house, built in such a manner as to be surrounded with other buildings, so that it has no outlet for its waters, has to cast water out of his windows on his neighbor's roof, court, or soil. Lalaure des Serv. 23. It is recognized in the common law as an easement of drip. 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 96; Gale & W. Easem. See "Easement."

AQUAGIUM (Lat.) A watercourse. Cowell. Canals or ditches through marshes. Spelman. A signal placed in the aquagium to indicate the height of water therein. Spelman.

AQUATIC RIGHTS. Rights which individuals have to the use of water, and to lands under water. Includes rights of fishing, navigation, etc.

ARABANT (Lat.) They ploughed. Applied to vassals who were bound to plough and harrow the lands of the lord within his manor. Spelman.

ARAHO. In feudal law. To make oath in the church or some other holy place. Cowell; Spelman.

ARAHUM (Law Lat. from Saxon ar, reverence). A consecrated place.

ARALIA (Lat. arare). Land fit for the plough. Denoting the character of land, rather than its condition. Spelman. Kindred in meaning, arare, to plough; arator, a ploughman; aratrum terrae, as much land as could be cultivated by a single arator; araturia, land fit for cultivation.

ARATURA TERRAE. The plowing of land by the tenant, or vassal, in the service of his lord. Whishaw.

ARATURIA. Land suitable for the plow; arable land. Spelman.

ARBITER. A person bound to decide according to the rules of law and equity, as distinguished from an arbitrator, who may proceed wholly at his own discretion, so that it be according to the judgment of a sound man. Cowell. This distinction between arbiters and arbitrators is not observed in modern law. Russ. Arb. 112. See "Arbitrator."

One appointed by the praetor to decide by the equity of the case, as distinguished from the judex, who followed the law. Calv. Lex.

One chosen by the parties to decide the dispute; an arbitrator. Bell, Dict.

ARBITRAMENT AND AWARD. A plea to an action brought for the same cause which had been submitted to arbitration, and on which an award had been made. Watson, Arb. 256.

ARBITRARY PUNISHMENT. In practice. That punishment which is left to the decision of the judge, in distinction from those defined by statute.

ARBITRATION (Lat. arbitratio). In practice. The investigation and determination of a matter or matters of difference between contending parties, by one or more unofficial persons, chosen by the parties, and called "arbitrators," or "referees." Worcester; 3 Bl. Comm. 16; 17 How. (U. S.) 344.

It is either:

(1) Compulsory arbitration, being that which takes place when the consent of one of the parties is enforced by statutory provisions; or

(2) Voluntary arbitration, being that which takes place by mutual and free consent of the parties. It usually takes place in pursuance of an agreement (commonly in writing) between the parties, termed a "submission," and the determination of the arbitrators or referee is called an "award."

At common law it was also either

(3) In pais, that is, by simple agreement of the parties; or

(4) By rule of court, that is by the intervention of a court of law or equity. 3 Bl. Comm. 16.

ARBITRATION OF EXCHANGE. Where a merchant pays his debts in one country by a bill of exchange upon another. 2 Mill. Pol. Econ. 168.

ARBITRATOR. In practice. A private extraordinary judge, to whose decision matters in controversy are referred by consent of the parties. Worcester.

"Referee" is of frequent modern use as a synonym of "arbitrator," but is in its origin of broader signification, and less accurate than arbitrator.

ARBITRIMENTUM AEQUUM TRIBUIT cuique suum. A just arbitration renders to every one his own. Noy, Max. 248.

ARBITRIUM (Lat.) Decision; award; judgment.

For some cases the law does not prescribe an exact rule, but leaves them to the judgment of sound men. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 61. The decision of an arbiter is arbitrium, as the etymology indicates, and the word denotes, in the passage cited, the decision of a man of good judgment who is not controlled by technical rules of law, but is at liberty to adapt the general principles of justice to the peculiar circumstances of the case.

ARBITRIUM EST JUDICIUM. An award is a judgment. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 137; 3 Bulst. 64.

ARBITRIUM EST JUDICIUM BONI VIRI, secundum aequum et bonum. An award is the judgment of a good man, according to justice. 3 Bulst. 64.

ARBOR (Lat). A tree; a plant; something larger than an herb; a general term including vines, osiers, and even reeds. The mast of a ship. Brissonius; Ainsworth; Calv. Lex.

Arbor civilis. A genealogical tree. Co. Inst.

A common form of showing genealogies is by means of a tree representing the different branches of the family. Many of the terms in the law of descent are figurative, and derived hence. Such a tree is called, also, arbor consanguinitatis.

ARBOR DUM CRESCIT; LIGNUM DUM crescere nescit. A tree while it is growing; wood when it cannot grow. Cro. Jac. 166; 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 239, 241.

ARBOR FINALIS. In old English law. A boundary tree; a tree used for making a boundary line. Bracton, fols. 167, 207b.

ARCANA IMPERII. State secrets. 1 Bl. Comm. 337.

ARCARIUS (Lat. arca). A treasurer; one who keeps the public money. Spelman.

ARCHAIONOMIA. The name of a collection of Saxon laws published during the reign of the English Queen Elizabeth, in the Saxon language, with a Latin version, by Mr. Lambard. Dr. Wilkins enlarged this collection in his work entitled "Leges Anglo-Saxonicae," containing all the Saxon laws extant, together with those ascribed to Edward the Confessor, in Latin; those of William the Conqueror, in Norman and Latin; and of Henry I., Stephen, and Henry II., in Latin.

ARCHBISHOP. In ecclesiastical law. The chief of the clergy of a whole province. He has the inspection of the bishops of that province, as well as of the inferior clergy, and may deprive them on notorious cause. The archbishop has also his own diocese, in which he exercises episcopal jurisdiction, as in his province he exercises archiepiscopal authority. 1 Bl. Comm. 380; 1 Ld. Raym. 541.

ARCHDEACON. In ecclesiastical law. A ministerial officer subordinate to the bishop.

In the primitive church, the archdeacons were employed by the bishop in the more servile duties of collecting and distributing alms and offerings. Afterwards they became, in effect, "eyes to the overseers of the church." Cowell. His jurisdiction is ecclesiastical, and immediately subordinate to that of the bishop, throughout the whole or a part of the diocese. He is a ministerial officer. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 383.

ARCHDEACON'S COURT. In English law. The lowest court of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in England. It is held before a person appointed by the archdeacon, called his "official." Its jurisdiction is limited to ecclesiastical causes arising within the archdeaconry. It had until recently, also, jurisdiction of matters of probate and granting administrations. In ordinary cases, its jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the bishop's court, but in some instances cases must be commenced in this court. In all cases, an appeal lies to the bishop's court. 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12; 3 Bl. Comm. 64.

ARCHERY. A service of keeping a bow for the lord's use in the defense of his castle. Co. Litt. 157.

ARCHES' COURT. See "Court of Arches."

ARCHETYPE. The original copy.

ARCHICAPELLANUS (Law Lat.) In old European law. A chief or high chancellor (summus cancellarius). Spelman.

ARCHIVES (Lat. archivum, arcibum). The rolls; any place where ancient records, charters, and evidences are kept. In libraries, the private depositary. Cowell; Spelman. The records need not be ancient to constitute the place of keeping them the "archives."

ARCHIVIST. One to whose care the archives have been confided.

ARCTA ET SALVA CUSTODIA (Lat.) In safe and close custody or keeping.

When a defendant is arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum (ca. sa.), he is to be kept arcta et salva custodia. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 415.

ARDOUR. In old English law. An incendiary; a house burner.

ARE. A French measure of surface. This is a square the sides of which are of the length of ten metres. The are is equal to 1076.441 square feet.

AREA. An inclosed yard or opening in a house; an open place adjoining to a house. 1 Chit. Prac. 176.

ARENALES. In Spanish law. Sandy beaches.

ARENIFODINA (from arena, sand, and fodire, to dig). In the civil law. A sand pit. Dig. 7. 1. 13. 5.

ARENTARE (Lat.) To rent; to let out at a certain rent. Cowell.

Arentatio, a renting.

AREOPAGITE. In ancient Greek law. A lawyer or chief judge of the Areopagus in capital matters in Athens; a tribunal so called after a hill or slight eminence, in a street of that city dedicated to Mars, where the court was held in which those judges were wont to sit. Wharton.

ARETRO. See "A Retro."

ARG. An abbreviation of arguendo, much used in the reports.

ARGENT. In heraldry. Silver.

ARGENTARII (Lat. argentum). Moneylenders. Called, also, nummularii (from nummus, coin) mensarii (lenders by the month). They were so called, whether living in Rome or in the country towns, and had their shops or tables in the forum. Argentarius is the singular. Argentarium denotes the instrument of the loan, approaching in sense to our note or bond.

Argentarius miles was the servant or porter who carried the money from the lower to the upper treasury to be tested. Spelman.

ARGENTEUS (Law Lat.) An old French coin, answering nearly to the English shilling. Spelman.

ARGENTUM. Silver; silver plate. 1 Ld. Raym. 20.

Uncoined silver; money paid by weight. Spelman.

Money paid by tale or counted (pecunia numerata). Spelman.

Goods generally. Spelman.

ARGENTUM ALBUM (Lat.) Unstamped silver; bullion. Spelman; Cowell.

ARGENTUM DEI (Lat.) God's money; God's penny; money given as earnest in making a bargain. Cowell.

ARGUMENT AB INCONVENIENTI. See "Ab Inconvenienti."

ARGUMENTATIVE. By way of reasoning.

A plea must be (among other things) direct and positive, and not argumentative. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 308.

ARGUMENTUM A COMMUNITER ACcidentibus in jure frequens est. An argument drawn from things commonly happening is frequent in law. Broom, Leg. Max. 44.

ARGUMENTUM A DIVISIONE EST fortissimum in jure. An argument arising from a division is most powerful in law. 6 Coke, 60; Co. Litt. 213b.

ARGUMENTUM A MAJORI AD MINUS negative non valet; valet e converso. An argument from the greater to the less is of no force negatively; conversely it is. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 281.

ARGUMENTUM A SIMILI VALET IN lege. An argument drawn from a similar case, or analogy, avails in law. Co. Litt. 191.

ARGUMENTUM AB AUCTORITATE est fortissimum in lege. An argument drawn from authority is the strongest in law. Co. Litt. 254.

ARGUMENTUM AB IMPOSSIBILI PLUrimum valet in lege. An argument deduced from impossibility greatly avails in law. Co. Litt. 92.

ARGUMENTUM AB INCONVENIENTI est validum in lege; quia lex non permittit aliquod inconveniens. An argument drawn from what is inconvenient is good in law, because the law will not permit any inconvenience. Co. Litt. 66a, 258; 7 Taunt. 527; 3 Barn. & C. 131; 6 Clark & F. 671.

ARGUMENTUM AB INCONVENIENTI plurimum valet (est validum) in lege. An argument drawn from inconvenience is of the greatest weight (is forcible) in law. Co. Litt. 66a, 97a, 152b, 258b; Broom, Leg. Max. 184. If there be in any deed or instrument equivocal expressions, and great inconvenience must necessarily follow from one construction, it is strong to show that such construction is not according to the true intention of the grantor; but where there is no equivocal expression in the instrument, and the words used admit only of one meaning, arguments of inconvenience prove only want of foresight in the grantor. 3 Madd. 540; 7 Taunt. 496.

ARGYLDE. Not compensated for.

ARIBANNUM, or ARRIBANNUM (Law Lat.) In Old European law. A fine for not joining the army, when called out by public summons. Spelman.

The summons or proclamation itself. Spelman. Spelman thinks the proper form of this word was heribannum, unless it be considered a contraction of arrieribannum (q. v.) See "Herebannum."

ARIMANNI (Lat.) The possessors of lands holden or derived from their lords. Clients joined to some lord for protection. By some, said to be soldiers holding lands from the lord; but the term is also applied to women and slaves. Spelman.

ARISTOCRACY. A government in which a class of men rules supreme.

ARISTODEMOCRACY. A form of government where the power is divided between the great men of the nation and the people.

ARLES. Earnest. Used in Yorkshire in the phrase arles-penny. Cowell. In Scotland it has the same signification. Bell, Dict.

ARM OF THE SEA. A portion of the sea projecting inland, in which the tide ebbs and flows.

It includes bays, roads, creeks, coves, ports, and rivers where the water flows and reflows. An arm of the sea is considered as extending as far into the interior of a country as the water of fresh rivers is propelled backward by the ingress and pressure of the tide. Angell, Tide Waters (2d Ed.) 73; 7 Pet. (U. S.) 324; 2 Conn. 484; 8 N. Y. 199; Olc. Adm. 21.

"But it does not follow that every creek or rivulet in which the tide ebbs and flows, and which may be used at certain tides by small boats for individual convenience, is to be dignified by the appellation of an 'arm of the sea.'" 10 N. J. Eq. 223.

ARMA (Lat.) Arms; weapons, offensive and defensive. Co. Litt. 161b, 162a.

——In the Civil Law. It included not only arms of warfare, but any weapon, as a club or a stone.

Armor, arms, or cognizances of families. Spelman.

ARMA DARE. To dub or make a knight. Cowell. Arma capere or suscipere, to take upon one the order of knighthood. 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law, 288.

ARMA IN ARMATOS SUMERE JURA sinunt. The laws permit the taking up of arms against armed persons. 2 Inst. 574.

ARMA MOLUTA (Lat.) Sharp weapons; weapons which cut, as distinguished from those which bruise. Cowell; Blount.

ARMATA VIS (Lat.) In the civil law. Armed force. Dig. 43. 16. 3; Fleta, lib. 4. c. 4.

ARMIGER (Lat.) An armor bearer; an esquire; a title of dignity belonging to gentlemen authorized to bear arms. Kennett, Par. Ant.; Cowell.

In its earlier meaning, a servant who carried the arms of a knight. Spelman.

A tenant by scutage; a servant or valet; applied, also, to the higher servants in convents. Spelman; Whishaw.

ARMISCARA. An ancient mode of punishment, which was to carry a saddle at the back as a token of subjection. Spelman.

A kind of fine. Spelman.

ARMISTICE. A cessation of hostilities between belligerent nations for a considerable time.

It is either partial and local, or general. It differs from a mere suspension of arms, which takes place to enable the two armies to bury their dead, their chiefs to hold conferences or pourparlers, and the like. Vattel, Droit des Gens, lib. 3, c. 16, § 233. The terms "truce" and "armistice" are sometimes used in the same sense. See "Truce."

ARMORUM APPELLATIONE, NON SOlum scuta et gladii et galeae, sed et fustes et lapides continentur. Under the name of "arms" are included not only shields and swords and helmets, but also clubs and stones. Co. Litt. 162.

ARMS. Anything that a man wears for his defense, or takes in his hands, or uses in his anger, to cast at or strike at another. Co. Litt. 161b, 162a; Cromp. Jus. Peace, 65; Cunningham. Every description of weapon, offensive and defensive. 4 Ark. 21.

The constitution of the United States (Amend. art. 2) declares that, "a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." This has been held to mean only such arms as are adapted to military purposes. 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 179; 35 Tex. 476.

Signs of arms, or drawings, painted on shields, banners, and the like. The arms of the United States are described in the resolution of congress of June 20, 1782.

ARMY. The military forces of a nation intended for service on land. It does not include the marine corps. 2 Sawy. (U. S.) 200; 21 N. Y. Supp. 104. Contra, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 635.

As used in the United States constitution and laws it does not include the state militia. 16 Grat. (Va.) 475.

AROMATARIUS. In old pleadings. A grocer. But see 1 Vent. 142.

ARPENNUS. A measure of land, of uncertain amount. It was called "arpent," also. Spelman; Cowell.

——In French Law. A measure of different amount in each of the sixty-four provinces. Guyot, Rep. Univ. "Arpenteur."

The measure was adopted in Louisiana. 6 Pet. (U. S.) 763.

ARPENT, or ARPEN. A quantity of land containing a French acre. 4 Hall, Law J. 518.

ARPENTATOR. A measurer or surveyor of land.

ARRA. In civil law. Earnest; evidence of a completed bargain. Used of a contract of marriage, as well as any other. Spelled, also, arrha, arrae. Calv. Lex.

ARRAGE (Law Fr.) Mad or insane. Home arrage, a madman or lunatic. Britt. c. 26.

ARRAIGN. To call a prisoner to the bar of the court to answer the matter charged in the indictment. 2 Hale, P. C. 216. To set in order. An assize may be arraigned. Litt. § 242; 3 Mod. 273; Termes de la Ley; Cowell.

ARRAIGNMENT. In criminal practice. Calling the defendant to the bar of the court, to answer the accusation contained in the indictment.

The first step in the proceeding consists in calling the defendant to the bar by his name, and commanding him to hold up his hand. This is done for the purpose of completely identifying the prisoner as the person named in the indictment. The holding up his hand is not, however, indispensable, for, if the prisoner should refuse to do so, he may be identified by any admission that he is the person intended. 1 W. Bl. 33. See Archb. Crim. Pl. (1859 Ed.) 128.

The second step is the reading the indictment to the accused person. This is done to enable him fully to understand the charge to be produced against him. The mode in which it is read is, after saying, "A. B. hold up your hand," to proceed, "You stand indicted by the name of A. B., late of, etc., for that you, on," etc., and then go through the whole of the indictment.

The third step is to ask the prisoner: "How say you [A. B.], are you guilty, or not guilty?" Upon this, if the prisoner confesses the charge, and it appears to the satisfaction of the judge that he rightly comprehends the effect of his plea, the confession is recorded, and nothing further is done till judgment. If, on the contrary, he answers, "Not guilty," that plea is entered for him, and the clerk or attorney general replies that he is guilty; when an issue is formed. 1 Mass. 95.

If the defendant, when called upon, makes no answer, and it is a matter of doubt whether or not he is mute of malice, the court may direct a jury to be forthwith impaneled and sworn, to try whether the prisoner is mute of malice or ex visitatione Dei: and such jury may consist of any twelve men who may happen to be present. If a person is found to be mute ex visitatione Dei, the court, in its discretion, will use such means as may be sufficient to enable the defendant to understand the charge and make his answer; and if this is found impracticable, a plea of not guilty will be entered, and the trial proceed. But if the jury return a verdict that he is mute fraudulently and willfully, the court will pass sentence as upon a conviction. 1 Mass. 103; 13 Mass. 299; 9 Mass. 402; 10 Metc. (Mass.) 222; Archb. Crim. Pl. (14th London Ed.) 129; Car. Crim. Law, 57; 3 Car. & K. 121; Roscoe, Crim. Ev. (4th London Ed.) 215. See the case of a deaf person who could not be induced to plead (1 Leach, C. C. [4th Ed.] 451); of a person deaf and dumb (1 Leach, C. C. [4th Ed.] 102; 14 Mass. 207; 7 Car. & P. 303; 6 Cox, C. C. 386; 3 Car. & K. 328). See "Peine et Forte Dure."

ARRAIGNS, CLERK OF. An assistant to the clerk of assise.

ARRAMEUR. An ancient officer of a port, whose business was to load and unload vessels.

ARRAS. In Spanish law. The donation which the husband makes to his wife, by reason or on account of marriage, and in consideration of the dote, or portion, which he receives, from her. Aso & M. Inst. bk. 1, tit. 7, c. 3.

The property contributed by the husband ad sustinenda onera matrimonii (for bearing the expenses).

The husband is under no obligation to give arras, but it is a donation purely voluntary. He is not permitted to give in arras more than a tenth of his property. The arras is the exclusive property of the wife, subject to the husband's usufruct during his life. Burge, Confl. Laws, 417.

ARRAY. In practice. The whole body of jurors summoned to attend a court, as they are arrayed or arranged on the panel. See "Challenge;" Dane, Abr. Index; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 536; Comyn, Dig. "Challenge" (B).

ARREARAGES. Arrears.

ARREARS (Fr.) The remainder of an account or sum of money in the hands of an accountant. Any money due and unpaid at a given time. Cowell; Spelman.

ARRECT. To accuse. Arrectati, those accused or suspected.

ARRENDAMIENTO (Spanish). In Spanish law. The contract of letting and hiring an estate or land (heredad). White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 14, c. 1.

ARREST OF INQUEST. Pleading in arrest of taking the inquest on a former issue, and showing cause why an inquest should not be taken. Wharton.

ARREST (Fr. arreter, to stay, to stop, to detain). To deprive a person of his liberty by legal authority. The seizing a person and detaining him in the custody of the law.

As ordinarily used, the terms "arrest" and "attachment" coincide in meaning to some extent; though in strictness, as a distinction, an arrest may be said to be the act resulting from the service of an attachment. And in the more extended sense which is sometimes given to attachment, including the act of taking, it would seem to differ from arrest in that it is more peculiarly applicable to a taking of property, while arrest is more commonly used in speaking of persons. The terms are, however, often interchanged when speaking of the taking a man by virtue of legal authority. Arrest is also applied in some instances to a seizure and detention of personal chattels, especially of ships and vessels, but this use of the term is not common in modern law.

——In Civil Practice. The apprehension of a person by virtue of a lawful authority to answer the demand against him in a civil action.

——In Criminal Practice. The apprehending of a person to answer for an alleged or suspected crime. The word "arrest" is said to be more properly used in civil cases, and "apprehension" in criminal.

——In Admiralty Practice. The seizure of a vessel on process in an action in rem.

ARRESTANDIS BONIS NE DISSIPENtur. In English law. A writ for him whose cattle or goods, being taken during a controversy, are likely to be wasted and consumed.

ARRESTANDO IPSUM QUI PECUNIAM recepit. In old English law. A writ which issued for apprehending a person who had taken the king's prest money to serve in the wars, and then hid himself in order to avoid going. Reg. Orig. 24.

ARRESTEE. In Scotch law. He in whose hands a debt, or property in his possession, has been arrested by a regular arrestment.

If, in contempt of the arrestment, he make payment of the sum or deliver the goods arrested to the common debtor, he is not only liable criminally for breach of the arrestment, but he must pay the debt again to the arrestor. Ersk. Inst. 3. 6. 6.

ARRESTER. In Scotch law. One who sues out and obtains an arrestment of his debtor's goods or movable obligations. Ersk. Inst. 3. 6. 1.

ARRESTMENT. In Scotch law. Securing a criminal's person till trial, or that of a debtor till he gives security judicio sisti. The order of a judge, by which he who is debtor in a movable obligation to the arrester's debtor is prohibited to make payment or delivery till the debt due to the arrester be paid or secured. Ersk. Inst. 3. 6. 1; Id. 1. 2. 12.

Where arrestment proceeds on a depending action, it may be loosed by the common debtor's giving security to the arrester for his debt, in the event it shall be found due. Ersk. Inst. 3. 6. 7.

ARRESTMENT JURISDICTIONIS FUNdandae causa. In Scotch law. A process to bring a foreigner within the jurisdiction of the courts of Scotland. The warrant attaches a foreigner's goods within the jurisdiction, and these will not be released unless caution or security be given. Wharton.

ARRESTO FACTO SUPER BONIS MERcatorum alienigenorum. A writ against the goods of aliens found within this kingdom, in recompense of goods taken from a denizen in a foreign country, after denial of restitution. Reg. Orig. 129. The ancient civilians called it "clarigatio," but by the moderns it is termed "reprisalia." Wharton.

ARRET (Fr.) A judgment, sentence, or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

The term is derived from the French law, and is used in Canada and Louisiana.

Saisie arret is an attachment of property in the hands of a third person. Code Prac. La. art. 209; 2 Low. (U. S.) 77; 5 Low. (U. S.) 198, 218.

ARRETTED (arrectatus, i. e., ad rectum vocatus). Convened before a judge and charged with a crime.

Ad rectum malefactorem is, according to Bracton, to have a malefactor forthcoming to be put on his trial.

Imputed, or laid to one's charge; as, no folly may be arretted to any one under age. Bracton, lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 10; Cunningham.

ARRHABO (Lat.) In the civil law. Earnest; money given to bind a bargain. Calv. Lex; Brissonius, voc. "Arra."

ARRHAE. In the civil law. Money or other valuable things given by the buyer to the seller, for the purpose of evidencing the contract; earnest.

There are two kinds of arrhae: One kind given when a contract has only been proposed; the other when a sale has actually taken place. Those which are given when a bargain has been merely proposed, before it has been concluded, form the matter of the contract, by which he who gives the arrhae consents and agrees to lose them, and to transfer the title to them in the opposite party, in case he should refuse to complete the proposed bargain; and the receiver of arrhae is obliged on his part to return double the amount to the giver of them in case he should fail to complete his part of the contract. Poth. Vente, note 498. After the contract of sale has been completed, the purchaser usually gives arrhae as evidence that the contract has been perfected. Arrhae are therefore defined quod ante pretium datur, et fidem fecit contractus, facti totiusque pecuniae solvendae. Id. note 506; Code, 4. 45. 2.

ARRIAGE AND CARRIAGE. Services of an indefinite amount formerly exacted from tenants under the Scotch law. Bell, Dict.

ARRIER BAN. A second summons to join the lord, addressed to those who had neglected the first. A summons of the inferiors or vassals of the lord. Spelman.

To be distinguished from aribannum.

ARRIERE FIEF (Fr.) An inferior fee granted out of a superior.

ARRIERE VASSAL. In feudal law. The vassal of a vassal. One who held of a vassal of the crown.

ARRIVE. To come to a particular place; to reach a particular or certain place. See 1 Brock. (U. S.) 411; 2 Cush. (Mass.) 439; 8 Barn. & C. 119.

ARROGATION. The adoption of a person sui juris. 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 119; Dig. 1. 7. 5; Inst. 1. 11. 3.

ARRONDISSEMENT. One of the subdivisions of a department (q. v.) in France.

ARSAE ET PENSATAE (Law Lat.) Burnt and weighed. A term formerly applied to money melted and then weighed to test its purity.

ARSENALS. Storehouses of arms and other military supplies.

ARSER IN LE MAIN. Burning in the hand. The punishment inflicted on those who received the benefit of clergy. Termes de la Ley.

ARSON (Lat ardere, to burn). At common law. The malicious burning of the house of another. Coke, 3d Inst. 66; Bish. Crim. Law, § 415; 4 Bl. Comm. 220; 2 Pick. (Mass.) 320; 10 Cush. (Mass.) 479; 7 Grat. (Va.) 619; 9 Ala. 175; 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 168; 1 Leach, C. C. (4th Ed.) 218. By statute in most, if not all, the states, the house need not be that of another.

The house, or some part of it, however small, must be consumed by fire. 9 Car. & P. 45; 16 Mass. 105; 110 Mass. 403; 5 Ired. (N. C.) 350; 25 Ired. (N. C.) 570; 62 N. Y. 117.

At common law, the building must have been a dwelling house, but this included all buildings within the curtilage. By statute the offense has been extended to other buildings.

ARSURA. The trial of money by heating it after it was coined. Now obsolete.

ART. A principle put in practice, and applied to some art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter. 4 Mason (U. S.) 1. See Act Cong. July 4, 1836, § 6.

Copper-plate printing on the back of a banknote is an art for which a patent may be granted. 4 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 9.

ART AND PART. In Scotch law. The offense committed by one who aids and assists the commission of a crime, but who is not the principal or chief actor in its actual commission. An accessary; a principal in the second degree. Paterson, Comp.

ART, WORDS OF. Words used in their technical sense; sometimes words which bear such a sense, without regard to the correctness of their use.

ARTHEL (properly ARDDELW or ARDdel). In Welsh and old English law. To avouch. Cowell.

Used, also, as a substantive. Thus, in the laws of Hoel Dha it was provided that if a man were taken with stolen goods, he must be allowed a lawful arddelw (vouchee) to clear him of his felony. This was abolished by St. 26 Hen. VIII. c. 6. Blount.

ARTICLE. A distinct part of an instrument, consisting of two or more particulars. Hence systems of rules and instruments composed of various particulars, or arranged in several divisions, are called "articles." The term was anciently applied to statutes drawn in this form.

——In French Law. A point.

——In English Ecclesiastical Law. A charge or libel. The introductory part of such a pleading is: "We article and object," etc.

——In Scotch Practice. A subject or matter. "Article of dittay." 1 Brown, 62.

ARTICLED CLERK. One who binds himself by articles to serve in the office of a solicitor, in consideration of receiving instruction.

ARTICLES APPROBATORY. In Scotch law. That part of the proceedings which corresponds to the answer to the charge in an English bill in chancery. Paterson, Comp.

ARTICLES IMPROBATORY. In Scotch law. Articulate averments setting forth the facts relied upon. Bell, Dict.

That part of the proceedings which corresponds to the charge in our English bill in chancery to set aside a deed. Paterson, Comp. The answer is called "articles approbatory."

ARTICLES, LORDS OF. A committee of the Scotch parliament, which, in the mode of its election, and by the nature of its powers, was calculated to increase the influence of the crown, and to confer upon it a power equivalent to that of a negative before debate. This system appeared inconsistent with the freedom of parliament, and at the revolution the convention of estates declared it a grievance, and accordingly it was suppressed by Act 1690, c. 3. Wharton.

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT. A written memorandum of the terms of an agreement.

ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. The title of the compact which was made by the thirteen original states of the United States of America.

ARTICLES OF FAITH. See "Articles of Religion."

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT. A written allegation of the causes for impeachment.

They are called by Blackstone a kind of bill of indictment, and perform the same office which an indictment does in a common criminal case. They do not usually pursue the strict form and accuracy of an indictment, but are sometimes quite general in the form of the allegations. Wooddeson, Lect. 605; Comyn, Dig. "Parliament" (L 21); Story, Const. § 806.

ARTICLES OF PARTNERSHIP. A written agreement by which the parties enter into a partnership upon the conditions therein mentioned. These are to be distinguished from agreements to enter into a partnership at a future time.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION. The "Thirty-Nine Articles" of religious dogma drawn up in the reign of James I., and approved by him.

ARTICLES OF ROUP. In Scotch law. The conditions under which property is offered for sale at auction. Paterson, Comp.

ARTICLES OF SET. In Scotch law. An agreement for a lease. Paterson, Comp.

ARTICLES OF THE CLERGY. See "Articuli Cleri."

ARTICLES OF THE NAVY. A system of rules for the government of the navy.

ARTICLES OF THE PEACE. A complaint made before a court of competent jurisdiction by one who has just cause to fear that an injury to his person or property is about to be committed or caused by the party complained of, alleging the causes of his belief, and asking the protection of the court.

The object of articles is to compel the party complained of to find sureties of the peace.

ARTICLES OF UNION. Articles, twenty-five in number, adopted by the parliaments of England and Scotland in 1707, and taking effect May 1st of that year, for the union of the two countries. 1 Bl. Comm. 96.

ARTICLES OF WAR. The code of laws established for the government of the army.

The term is used in this sense both in England and the United States. The term also includes the code established for the government of the navy. See Acts April 23, 1800, and April 10, 1806, and 22 Geo. II. c. 33; 19 Geo. III. c. 17; 37 Geo. III. cc. 70, 71; 47 Geo. III. c. 71. See "Martial Law."

ARTICULATE ADJUDICATION. In Scotch law. Separate adjudication for each of several claims of a creditor. It is so made in order that a mistake in accumulating one debt need not affect the proceedings on other claims which are correctly accumulated.

ARTICULI (Lat.) Articles; items or heads. A term applied to some old English statutes, and occasionally to treatises.

ARTICULI CLERI. Articles of the clergy; the title of a statute passed in the ninth year of Edw. II. to adjust questions of cognizance between the ecclesiastical and temporal courts. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 291; 2 Inst. 599.

ARTICULI DE MONETA. Articles concerning money, or the currency. The title of a statute passed in the twentieth year of Edward I. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 228; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law (Am. Ed.) 167.

ARTICULI MAGNAE CHARTAE. The preliminary articles, forty-nine in number, upon which the Magna Charta was founded.

ARTICULI SUPER CHARTAS. St. 28 Edward I. st. 3, confirming and enlarging Magna Charta, and the Charta de Foresta. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 103, 233.

ARTICULO MORTIS. See "In Articulo Mortis."

ARTIFICER. One by whom something is made. 4 Strobh. (S. C.) 365.

A skilled workman. 13 Q. B. Div. 832.

ARTIFICIAL. Having its existence in the given manner by virtue of or in consideration only of the law.

An artificial person is a body, company, or corporation considered in law as an individual.

ARTIFICIAL PRESUMPTIONS. In the law of evidence. Presumptions (otherwise termed "legal") which derive from the law a technical or artificial operation and effect beyond their mere natural tendency to produce belief. 3 Starkie, Ev. 1235.

ARURA. Days' work at ploughing.

AS (Lat.) A pound. It was composed of twelve ounces. The parts were reckoned, as may be seen in the law, servum de haeredibus (Inst. lib. 13, Pandect) as follows: Uncia, 1 ounce; sextans, 2 ounces; triens, 3 ounces; quadrans, 4 ounces; quincunx, 5 ounces; semis, 6 ounces; septunx, 7 ounces; bes, 8 ounces; dodrans, 9 ounces; dextans, 10 ounces; deunx, 11 ounces.

The whole of a thing, solidum quid. Thus, as signified the whole of an inheritance, so that an heir ex asse was an heir of the whole inheritance. An heir ex triente, ex semisse, ex besse, or ex deunce was an heir of one-third, one-half, two-thirds, or eleven-twelfths.

ASCENDANTS (Lat. ascendere, to ascend, to go up to, to climb up to). Those from whom a person is descended, or from whom he derives his birth, however remote they may be.

Every one has two ascendants at the first degree, his father and mother; four at the second degree, his paternal grandfather and grandmother, and his maternal grandfather and grandmother; eight at the third. Thus, in going up we ascend by various lines, which fork at every generation. By this progress, sixteen ascendants are found at the fourth degree; thirty-two at the fifth; sixty-four, at the sixth; one hundred and twenty-eight, at the seventh; and so on. By this progressive increase, a person has at the twenty-fifth generation thirty-three million five hundred and fifty-four thousand four hundred and thirty-two ascendants. But, as many of the ascendants of a person have descended from the same ancestor, the lines which were forked reunite to the first common ancestor, from whom the other descends; and this multiplication, thus frequently interrupted by the common ancestors, may be reduced to a few persons.

ASCENDIENTES. In Spanish law. Ascendants; ascending heirs; heirs in the ascending line. White, New Recop. bk. 1, tit. 7, c. 3, note; Schmidt, Civ. Law, 259.

ASCRIPTITIUS. One enrolled; foreigners who have been enrolled. Among the Romans, ascriptitii were foreigners who had been naturalized, and who had in general the same rights as natives. Nov. 22, c. 17; Code, 11. 47. Ascriptitii is the plural.

ASPECT. View or possibility. A pleading "with a double aspect" is one based on alternative hypotheses of fact.

ASPHYXIA. In medical jurisprudence. A temporary suspension of the motion of the heart and arteries; swooning; fainting.

ASPORTATION. Carrying away. A common-law ingredient of larceny. "There must be such a caption that the accused acquires dominion over the property, followed by such an asportation or carrying away as to supersede the possession of the owner for an appreciable period of time." 94 Ala. 535.

Thus it has been held not larceny to merely set a package of goods on end, with intent to steal it in the future (1 Leg. C. C. 237), or to touch a pocketbook in another's pocket without removing it (99 Mass. 431), or to attempt to carry away property which is attached by a chain to the person of the owner (1 Leg. C. C. 321). On the other hand, the slightest asportation is sufficient, and it has been held larceny to remove a package from one end of a wagon to the other (1 Leg. C. C. 236), or to partly lift money from a pocket, though it was dropped before being entirely removed (1 Moody, C. C. 78; 20 Ohio St. 508).

The asportation need not be by the hand of the trespasser; a carrying away by an innocent agent (125 Mass. 390), or by mechanical means, as by fraudulently connecting a private pipe with gas mains (1 Cox, C. C. 213), being sufficient.

ASPORTAVIT. He carried away. See "Asportation."

ASSACH, or ASSATH. In old Welsh law. An oath made by compurgators. Applied in St. 1 Hen. V. c. 6, to the Welsh custom of clearing one accused of homicide by the oaths of three hundred persons.

The origin and exact meaning of the term is uncertain, and Mr. Barrington could only collect its meaning from the above statute. Barr. Obs. St. 382.

ASSART, or ESSART. In English forest and ecclesiastical law. The offense of pulling up by the roots the woods that are thickets and coverts for the deer, and making them clear as arable land. Manw. For.

Law, p. 2, c. 9, note 1; Cowell; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. pp. 486, 487, § 627.

Written, in the law Latin, assartum, in Bracton and Fleta, and essartum, in the Charta de Foresta and the Black Book of the Exchequer.

ASSASSINATION. Murder committed for hire, without provocation or cause of resentment given to the murderer by the person upon whom the crime is committed. Ersk. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 4, note 45.

A murder committed treacherously, with advantage of time, place, or other circumstances.

In modern usage, at least, it is not a technical term of the law of homicide.

ASSATH, or ASSAITH. See "Assach."

ASSAULT. An unlawful offer or attempt with force or violence to do a corporal hurt to another. It may consist of any act tending to such injury, and accompanied by such circumstances as denote an intention and a present ability of personal violence. 1 Hill (N. Y.) 351.

Force unlawfully directed or applied to the person of another under such circumstances as to cause a well-founded apprehension of immediate peril.

Aggravated assault is one committed with the intention of committing some additional crime, or under circumstances of peculiar turpitude.

Simple assault is one committed with no intention to do any other injury.

Assault is generally coupled with battery, and for the excellent practical reason that they generally go together; but the assault is rather the initiation or offer to commit the act of which the battery is the consummation. An assault is included in every battery. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 62, § 1.

Mere words do not constitute an assault (59 Ind. 300), but some overt act is required (55 Hun [N. Y.] 214).

ASSAY. The proof or trial of the purity or fineness of metals, particularly the precious metals, gold and silver.

ASSAY OFFICE. An establishment, or department, in which the manipulations attending the assay of bullion and coins are conducted. See "Assay."

ASSAYER OF THE KING. An officer of the royal mint, appointed by St. 2 Hen. VI. c. 12, who received and tested the bullion taken in for coining. Also called assayator regis. Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

ASSECURARE (Lat.) To assure; to make secure by pledges, or any solemn interposition of faith. Spelman; Cowell.

ASSECURATION. In European law. Assurance; insurance of a vessel, freight, or cargo. Opposition to the decree of Grenoble. Ferriere.

ASSECURATOR. An insurer.

ASSEDATION. In Scotch law. An old term, used indiscriminately to signify a lease or feu-right. Bell, Dict.; Ersk. Inst. lib. 2, tit. 6, § 20.

ASSEMBLY. The meeting of a number of persons in the same place.

——Political Assemblies. Those required by the constitution and laws. For example, the general assembly, which includes the senate and house of representatives. The meeting of the electors of the president and vice president of the United States may also be called an assembly.

——Popular Assemblies. Those where the people meet to deliberate upon their rights. These are guarantied by the constitution. Const. U. S. Amend. art. 1.

——Unlawful Assembly. The meeting of three or more persons to do an unlawful act, although they may not carry their purpose into execution. It differs from a riot or rout because in each of the latter cases there is some act done besides the simple meeting. See 1 Ired. (N. C.) 30; 9 Car. & P. 91, 431; 5 Car. & P. 154; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 395; 2 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 1039, 1040.

ASSEMBLY GENERAL. The supreme ecclesiastical court in Scotland.

ASSENT. Approval of something done. An undertaking to do something in compliance with a request.

In strictness, "assent" is to be distinguished from "consent," which denotes a willingness that something about to be done be done; "acceptance," compliance with, or receipt of, something offered; "ratification," rendering valid something done without authority; and "approval," an expression of satisfaction with some act done for the benefit of another besides the party approving. But in practice the term is often used in the sense of acceptance and approval. Thus, an offer is said to be assented to, although properly an offer and acceptance complete an agreement. It is apprehended that this confusion has arisen from the fact that a request, assent, and concurrence of the party requesting complete a contract as fully as an offer and acceptance. Thus, it is said there must be a request on one side, and assent on the other, in every contract (5 Bing. N. C. 75), and this assent becomes a promise enforceable by the party requesting, when he has done anything to entitle him to the right. Assent thus becomes in reality (so far as it is assent merely, and not acceptance) an offer made in response to a request. Assent and approval, as applied to acts of parliament and of congress, have become confounded, from the fact that the bills of parliament were originally requests from parliament to the king. See 1 Bl. Comm. 183.

Express assent is that which is openly declared.

Implied assent is that which is presumed by law.

ASSERTORY COVENANT. One which asserts or warrants the existence of a particular state of facts.

ASSESS. To rate or fix the proportion which every person has to pay of any particular tax.

To tax.

To adjust the shares of a contribution by several towards a common beneficial object, according to the benefit received.

To fix the value of; to fix the amount of.

ASSESSMENT. Determining the value of a man's property or occupation for the purpose of levying a tax.

Determining the share of a tax to be paid by each individual.

Laying a tax.

Adjusting the shares of a contribution by several towards a common beneficial object, according to the benefit received. The term is used in this latter sense in New York, distinguishing some kinds of local taxation, whereby a peculiar benefit arises to the parties, from general taxation. 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 77; 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 263; 4 Hill (N. Y.) 76; 4 N. Y. 419.

——Of Damages. Fixing the amount of damages to which the prevailing party in a suit is entitled. It may be done by the court through its proper officer, the clerk or prothonotary, where the assessment is a mere matter of calculation, but must be by a jury in other cases. See "Damages."

——In Insurance. An apportionment made in general average upon the various articles and interests at risk, according to their value at the time and place of being in safety, for contribution for damage and sacrifices purposely made, and expenses incurred for escape from impending common peril. 2 Phil. Ins. c. 25.

ASSESSORS. Those appointed to make assessments.

——In Civil and Scotch Law. Persons skilled in law, selected to advise the judges of the inferior courts. Bell, Dict.; Dig. 1. 22; Code, 1. 51.

ASSETS (Fr. assez, enough). All the stock in trade, cash, and all available property belonging to a merchant or company.

Equivalent to "property." 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 202.

The property in the hands of an heir, executor, administrator, or trustee, which is legally or equitably chargeable with the obligations which such heir, executor, administrator, or other trustee is, as such, required to discharge.

——Equitable Assets. Such as can be reached only by the aid of a court of equity, and which are to be divided, pari passu, among all the creditors. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 401 et seq.; Willis, Trustees, 118.

——Legal Assets. Such as constitute the fund for the payment of debts according to their legal priority.

——Assets per Descent. That portion of the ancestor's estate which descends to the heir, and which is sufficient to charge him, as far as it goes, with the specialty debts of his ancestors. 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 1011.

——Personal Assets. Goods and personal chattels to which the executor or administrator is entitled.

——Real Assets. Such as descend to the heir, as, an estate in fee simple.

ASSETS ENTRE MAINS (Law Fr.) Assets in hand; assets in the hands of executors or administrators, applicable for the payment of debts. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bl. Comm. 510; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. p. 23, § 31. Called, in modern law, "personal assets."

ASSEVERATION. The proof which a man gives of the truth of what he says, by appealing to his conscience as a witness. It differs from an oath in this, that by the latter he appeals to God as a witness of the truth of what he says, and invokes him, as the avenger of falsehood and perfidy, to punish him if he speaks not the truth. See "Affirmation;" "Oath."

ASSEWIARE (Law Lat.) In old records. To draw or drain out water from marshy grounds. Cowell; Blount.

ASSIGN. To make or set over to another. Cowell; 2 Bl. Comm. 326; 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 391.

To appoint; to select; to allot. 3 Bl. Comm. 58.

To set forth; to point out; as, to assign errors. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 19.

ASSIGNATION. In Scotch law. Assignment (q. v.)

ASSIGNATUR UTITUR JURE AUCTORis. An assigner is clothed with the rights of his principal. Halk. Max. 14; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 415, 416, 423, 425; Wingate, Max. p. 56; 1 Exch. 32; 18 Q. B. 878.

ASSIGNAY, or ASSIGNEY. In Scotch law. An assignee. "Airis and Assignais," 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. p. 342; "Aires or Assigneys," 5 Bell, App. Cas. 83. "Assignay" (Law Fr.) occurs in Y. B. M. 7 Edw. III. 5.

ASSIGNEE. One to whom an assignment has been made.

Assignee in fact is one to whom an assignment has been made in fact by the party having the right.

Assignee in law is one in whom the law vests the right; as, an executor or administrator. See "Assignment."

ASSIGNMENT (Law Lat. assignatio, from assigno,—ad and signum,—to mark for; to appoint to one; to appropriate to). At common law. "The transferring and setting over to another of some right, title, or interest in things in which a third party, not a party to the assignment, has a concern and interest." 1 Bac. Abr. 329; 1 Iowa, 582.

It is more loosely used to indicate any transfer or making over to another of the whole of any property, real or personal, in possession or in action, or of any estate or right therein. 35 Fed. 436; 78 Iowa, 101; 3 Minn. 389 (Gil. 282); 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 580.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDitors. An assignment by an insolvent debtor of his property, in trust for the distribution of such property among the assignor's creditors.

ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER. The act by which the share of a widow in her deceased husband's real estate is ascertained and set apart to her.

The assignment may be made in pais by the heir or his guardian, or the devisee or other persons seised of the lands subject to dower (19 N. H. 240; 23 Pick. [Mass.] 80, 88; 4 Ala. [N. S.] 160; 4 Me. 67; 2 Ind. 388; White & T. Lead. Cas. 51), or it may be made after a course of judicial proceedings, where a voluntary assignment is refused. In this case, the assignment will be made by the sheriff, who will set off her share by metes and bounds. 2 Bl. Comm. 136; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 229. The assignment should be made within forty days after the death of the husband, during which time the widow shall remain in her husband's capital mansion house.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS. In practice. The statement of the case of the plaintiff in error on a writ of error setting forth the errors complained of. It corresponds with the declaration in an ordinary action. 2 Tidd, Prac. 1168; 3 Steph. Comm. 644.

In those states in which the remedy by appeal is extended to actions at law and criminal prosecutions, the assignment of errors is a schedule of the errors complained of, filed by appellant, and usually prefixed to his brief.

ASSIGNOR. One who makes an assignment; one who transfers property to another.

ASSIGNS. Assignees; those to whom property shall have been transferred. Now seldom used except in the phrase, in deeds, "heirs, administrators, and assigns."

ASSISA (Lat. assidere). A kind of jury or inquest. Assisa vertitur in juratum, the assize has been turned into a jury. See "Assize."

A writ, as, an assize of novel disseisin, assize of common pasture.

An ordinance, as assisa panis. Spelman; Litt. § 234; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 402.

A fixed specific time, sum, or quantity; a tribute; tax fixed by law; a fine. Spelman.

ASSISA ARMORUM. A statute ordering the keeping arms.

ASSISA CADERE. To be nonsuited. Cowell; 3 Bl. Comm. 402.

ASSISA CONTINUANDA. A writ for the continuation of the assize to allow the production of papers. Reg. Orig. 217.

ASSISA DE FORESTA. Assize of the forest (q. v.)

ASSISA MORTIS D'ANCESTORIS. Assize of mort d'ancestor (q. v.)

ASSISA DE CLARENDON. The statute of Clarendon, passed 10 Hen. II., allowing an additional time for preparation to persons compelled to abjure the realm. See "Abjuration."

ASSISA DE MENSURIS (Law Lat.) Assize of measures. A common rule for weights and measures, established throughout England by Richard I., in the eighth year of his reign. Hale, Hist. Com. Law, c. 7.

ASSISA DE NOCUMENTO. Assize of nuisance. In old English practice, a writ which lay to remove a nuisance, and recover damages. 3 Bl. Comm. 221, 222; Reg. Orig. 197b. Now abolished with the other real actions.

ASSISA DE UTRUM (assize of Utrum). In old English practice. An assize, otherwise called a writ of juris utrum, which lay for a parson or prebendary at common law, and for a vicar by St. 14 Edw. III. c. 17, to recover lands and tenements belonging to the church, which were alienated by the predecessor, or of which he was disseised, or which were recovered against him by verdict, confession, or default, without praying in aid of the patron and ordinary, or on which any person had intruded since the predecessor's death. 3 Bl. Comm. 253; Roscoe, Real Actions, 74; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 5; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 20. It derived its name from the emphatic word in the writ by which the jury were required to determine "whether" (utrum) the tenements in question were frankalmoign belonging to the church of the demandant, or the lay fee of the defendant. Bracton, fol. 286; Reg. Orig. 32b. The writ has long been obsolete, principally because of the restraining statute of 13 Eliz. c. 10. 3 Bl. Comm. 253.

ASSISA FRISCAE FORTIAE. Assize of fresh force (q. v.)

ASSISA MORTIS ANTECESSORIS (Law Lat.) Assise of mort d'ancestor (q. v.) Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 3; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 1; Id. lib. 5, c. 1. Called, also, assisa de morte antecessoris.

ASSISA NOVAE DISSEYSINAE. Assize of novel disseisin (q. v.)

ASSISA PANIS ET CEREVISLAE (Law Lat.) Assize of bread and ale, or beer. The name of a statute passed in the fifty-first year of Henry III., containing regulations for the sale of bread and ale; sometimes called the "statute of bread and ale." Co. Litt. 159b; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 56; Cowell; Bracton, fol. 155; Barr. Obs. St. 52. The particular provisions of this statute, which are very minute, may be found in Britton and Fleta. Britt. c. 30; Fleta, lib. 2, cc. 9, 11. Spelman considers the statutes passing under the names of assisa panis, assisa vini et cervisiae, etc., to belong to an earlier period.

The power or privilege of assising or adjusting the weights and measures of bread and beer. Cowell.

ASSISA PROROGANDA. A writ to stay proceedings where one of the parties is engaged in a suit of the king. Reg. Orig. 208.

ASSISA ULTIMAE PRAESENTATIONIS. Assize of darrein presentment.

ASSISA VENALIUM. Statutes regulating the sale of certain articles. Spelman.

ASSISORS. In Scotch law. Jurors.

ASSISTANCE. See "Writ of Assistance."

ASSISUS (Lat. from assidere, to fix or settle). In old English law. Fixed or certain. Assisus reditus, a fixed, certain, or standing rent. Kennett, Par. Ant. 314, 335. Called "rent of assize." 2 Bl. Comm. 42. Terra assisa, land let or farmed out for a certain assessed rent. Cowell.

ASSITHMENT. Compensation by a pecuniary mulct. Cowell.

ASSIZE (Lat. assidere, to sit by or near, through the Fr. assisa, a session).

——In English Law. A writ directed to the sheriff for the recovery of immovable property, corporeal or incorporeal. Cowell; Litt. § 234.

The action or proceedings in court based upon such a writ. Magna Charta, c. 12; St. 13 Edw. I. (Westminster II.) c. 25; 3 Bl. Comm. 57, 252; Sellon, Prac. Introd. xii.

Such actions were to be tried by special courts, of which the judicial officers were justices of assize. See "Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius." This form of remedy is said to have been introduced by the parliament of Northampton (or Nottingham, A. D. 1176), for the purpose of trying titles to land in a more certain and expeditious manner before commissioners appointed by the crown than before the suitors in the county court or the king's justiciars in the aula regis. The action is properly a mixed action, whereby the plaintiff recovers his land and damages for the injury sustained by the disseisin. The value of the action as a means for the recovery of land led to its general adoption for that purpose; those who had suffered injury not really amounting to a disseisin alleging a disseisin to entitle themselves to the remedy. The scope of the remedy was also extended so as to allow the recovery of incorporeal hereditaments, as franchises, estovers, etc. It gave place to the action of ejectment, and is now abolished, having been previously almost, if not quite, entirely disused. St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, § 36. Stearns, Real Actions, 187.

A jury summoned by virtue of a writ of assize.

The verdict or judgment of the jurors or recognitors of assize. 3 Bl. Comm. 57, 59.

A court composed of an assembly of knights and other substantial men, with the baron or justice, in a certain place, at an appointed time. Grand Coutum. cc. 24, 25.

An ordinance or statute. Litt. § 234; Reg. Orig. 239. Anything reduced to a certainty in respect to number, quantity, quality, weight, measure, etc. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 42; Cowell; Spelman, "Assisa." See the articles immediately following.

——In Scotch Law. The jury, consisting of fifteen men, in criminal cases tried in the court of justiciary. Paterson, Comp.; Bell, Dict.

ASSIZE OF DARREIN PRESENTMENT. A writ of assize which formerly lay for a person who had himself, or whose ancestors had upon the last preceding avoidance, presented a clerk to a benefice where a stranger presented a clerk for the purpose of obtaining a writ commanding the bishop to institute the patron's clerk, and to obtain damages for the interference. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 245; St. 13 Edw. I. (Westminster II.) c. 5. It has given way to the remedy by quare impedit.

ASSIZE OF FRESH FORCE. A writ of assize which lay where the disseisin had been committed within forty days. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 7.

ASSIZE OF MORT D'ANCESTOR. A writ of assize which lay to recover possession of lands against an abator or his alienee. It lay where the ancestor from whom the claimant derived title died seised. Cowell; Spelman; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 185.

ASSIZE OF NOVEL DISSEISIN. A writ of assize which lay where the claimant had been lately disseised. The action must have been brought subsequent to the next preceding session of the eyre or circuit of justices which took place once in seven years. Co. Litt. 153; Booth, Real Actions, 210.

ASSIZE OF NUISANCE. A writ of assize which lay where a nuisance had been committed to the complainant's freehold.

The complainant alleged some particular fact done which worked an injury to his freehold (ad nocumentum liberi tenementi sui), and, if successful, recovered judgment for the abatement of the nuisance, and also for damages. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 183; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 221; 9 Coke, 55.

ASSIZE OF THE FOREST. A statute or ordinance concerning the royal forests passed in the thirty-third year of Edw. I. Otherwise called Ordinatio Forestae. Another statute of the same title was passed in the thirty-fourth year of Edw. I. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 104, 106; Co. Litt. 159b.

ASSIZE OF UTRUM. A writ of assize which lay for a parson to recover lands which his predecessor had improperly allowed the church to be deprived of. 3 Bl. Comm. 257.

ASSIZE RENT. The fixed or established rent of the freeholders and ancient copyholders of a manor, which cannot be departed from or varied. 2 Bl. Comm. 42.

ASSIZES. Sessions of the justices or commissioners of assize. These assizes are held twice in each year in each of the various shires of England, with some exceptions, by virtue of several commissions, for the trial of matters of fact in issue in both civil and criminal cases. They still retain the ancient name in popular language, though the commission of assize is no longer issued. 3 Steph. Comm. 424, note. See "Assize;" "Nisi Prius;" "Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius."

ASSIZES DE JERUSALEM. A code of feudal law prepared at a general assembly of lords after the conquest of Jerusalem. It was compiled principally from the laws and customs of France. It was reduced to form by Jean d'Iblin, Comte de Japhe et Ascalon, about the year 1290. 1 Fournel, Hist. des Av. 49; 2 Dupin, Prof. des Av. 674-680; Steph. Pl. Append. xi.

ASSOCIATION. The act of a number of persons in uniting for some purpose, whether social, business or benevolent.

The persons so joining, or the organization by them formed.

Though the term covers any united action, however temporary, it is generally applied to a formal union under an associate name, and by an agreement known as "articles of association." The organization resembles a corporation, but the powers and liabilities of its members and representatives are more nearly related to those of a partnership, from which they differ in having no delictus personarum, and in the fact that the authority as to the public is in officers, and not in the members generally. See "Joint-Stock Company."

——In English Law. A writ directing certain persons (usually the clerk and his subordinate officers) to associate themselves with the justices and sergeants for the purpose of taking the assizes. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 59.

ASSOIL, ASSOILE, or ASSOILYIE. To set free; to deliver from excommunication. St. 1 Hen. IV. c. 7; Cowell.

ASSOILZIE. In Scotch law. To acquit.

ASSOYL (Law Fr.) To forgive; to pardon; to absolve. Que Dieu assoyl, whom God assoil; on whom God have mercy. Kelham.

ASSUME. To take on; to undertake. 90 Cal. 147. To take in appearance. See 75 Cal. 73.

ASSUMPSIT (Lat. assumere, to assume, to undertake; assumpsit, he has undertaken).

——In Contracts. An undertaking, either express or implied, to perform a parol agreement. 1 Lilly, Reg. 132.

Express assumpsit is an undertaking made orally by writing not under seal, or by matter of record, to perform an act, or to pay a sum of money to another.

Implied assumpsit is an undertaking presumed in law to have been made by a party, from his conduct, although he has not made any express promise.

——In Practice. A form of action which lies for the recovery of damages for the nonperformance of a parol or simple contract. 7 Term R. 351; 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 60.

It differs from debt, since the amount claimed need not be liquidated (see "Debt"), and from covenant, since it does not require a contract under seal to support it (see "Covenant"). See 4 Coke, 91; 4 Burrows, 1008; 14 Pick. (Mass.) 428; 2 Metc. (Mass.) 181. Assumpsit is one of the class of actions called "actions upon the case," and in the older books is called "action upon the case upon assumpsit." Comyn, Dig.

Special assumpsit is an action of assumpsit brought upon an express contract or promise.

General assumpsit, sometimes called indebitatus assumpsit, is an action of assumpsit brought upon the promise or contract implied by law in certain cases. See 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. (5th Am. Ed.) 14.

See "Common Counts."

ASSURANCE.

——In Conveyancing. Any instrument which confirms the title to an estate.

Legal evidence of the transfer of property. 2 Bl. Comm. 294.

The term "assurances" includes, in an enlarged sense, all instruments which dispose of property, whether they be the grants of private persons, or not; such are fines and recoveries, and private acts of the legislature. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 5.

——In Commercial Law. A term formerly used in English maritime law, in the sense of the modern term "insurance," and still retained in policies, but otherwise obsolete. Molloy de Jur. Mar. 287. Latterly however, its use has been revived in its application to contracts of indemnity against life contingencies, which are now frequently termed "assurances upon lives," by way of distinction from indemnity against losses by fire or at sea, etc., to which the term "insurance" is particularly appropriated. 3 Kent, Comm. 365. The word "assured" has always been retained in its ancient sense. See "Assure." "Assurance" is the term used in French law. Ord. Mar. liv. 3, tit. 6; Emerig. Tr. des Assur.

ASSURE (Fr. assurer; law Lat. assecurare, assurare). To make sure, or secure; to confirm or establish; to insure. The party in whose favor a contract or policy of insurance has been executed is still called the "assured;" the other party being termed the "insurer." 2 Steph. Comm. 172.

To convey. "If one be obliged to assure twenty acres of land," etc. Cro. Eliz. 665. See "Assurance."

ASSURED. A person who has been insured by some insurance company or underwriter against losses or perils mentioned in the policy of insurance.

ASSURER. An insurer; an underwriter.

ASSYTHEMENT. In Scotch law. Damages awarded to the relative of a murdered person from the guilty party, who has not been convicted and punished. Paterson, Comp.

The action to recover it lies for the personal representatives (26 Scott. Jur. Sc. 156), and may be brought by collateral relations (27 Scott. Jur. Sc. 450).

ASTIPULATION. A mutual agreement.

ASTITRARIUS HAERES. An heir apparent who hath been, by conveyance of his ancestor, placed in a dwelling house in the ancestor's lifetime. Co. Litt. 8.

ASTITUTION. Arraignment (q. v.)

ASTRARIUS (from astre, a hearth). A householder.

ASTRER. In old English law. A householder, or occupant of a house or hearth. Britt. 59.

ASTRICT. In Scotch law. To assign to a particular mill.

Used of lands the occupants of which were bound to grind at a certain mill. Bell, Dict.; Paterson, Comp. note 290; Ersk. Inst. 2. 9. 18. 32.

ASTRIHILTET. In Saxon law. A penalty for a wrong done by one in the king's peace. The offender was to replace the damage twofold. Spelman.

ASTRUM. A house, or place of habitation. Bracton, fol. 367b; Cowell.

ASYLUM. An institution for the protection or relief of the unfortunate, as an asylum for the poor, for the deaf and dumb, or for the insane. Webster.

——In International Law. Refuge to a fugitive from justice.

——In Old English Law. A sanctuary (q. v.)

AT ARM'S LENGTH. As applied to dealings, formality and vigilance on both sides; absence of confidence or personal influence.

AT BAR. Before the court; under consideration; as the case at bar.

AT LARGE.

(1) Not limited to any particular question or matter.

(2) Free; unrestrained; not under corporal control; as a ferocious animal so free from restraint as to be liable to do mischief.

(3) Representing no particular place or district; as delegate at large.

(4) In extenso.

AT LAW. According to the course of the common law; in the law.

AT SEA. Outside of port. In opposition to being "in port;" not in opposition to being "at home." 3 Hill (N. Y.) 118.

ATHA, ATTA, ATHE, or ATTE. In Saxon law. An oath. Cowell; Spelman.

Athes, or athaa, a power or privilege of exacting and administering an oath in certain cases. Cowell; Blount.

ATHEIST. One who does not believe in the existence of a God.

ATIA. See "De Odio et Atia."

ATILIUM (Lat.) Tackle; the rigging of a ship; plough tackle. Spelman.

ATTACH. See "Apprehension."

ATTACHE. One attached to the suite of an ambassador; one attached to a foreign legation.

ATTACHIAMENTA DE SPINIS ET boscis. A privilege granted to the officers of a forest to take to their own use thorns, brush, and windfalls, within their precincts. Kennett, Par. Ant. 209.

ATTACHIAMENTUM. In old English law. An attachment. Attachiamenta bonorum, attachment of goods. Spelman; Reg. Orig. 18. Solemnitas attachiamentorum, the formality of attachments; the practice of issuing them one after another in a regular series. Bracton, fol. 437.

ATTACHMENT. Taking into the custody of the law the person or property of one already before the court, or of one whom it is sought to bring before it.

A writ for the accomplishment of this purpose. This is the more common sense of the word.

——Of Persons. A writ issued by a court of record, commanding the sheriff to bring before it a person who has been guilty of contempt of court.

——Of Property. A writ issued at the institution or during the progress of an action, commanding the sheriff or other proper officer to attach the property, rights, credits, or effects of the defendant to satisfy the demands of the plaintiff.

The original design of this writ was to secure the appearance of one who had disregarded the original summons, by taking possession of his property as a pledge. 3 Bl. Comm. 280.

By an extension of this principle, in the New England states, property attached remains in the custody of the law after an appearance, until final judgment in the suit. See 7 Mass. 127.

In some states, attachments are distinguished as foreign and domestic,—the former issued against a nonresident of the state, the latter against a resident. Where this distinction is preserved, the foreign attachment inures solely to the benefit of the party suing it out; while the avails of the domestic attachment may be shared by other creditors, who come into court and present their claims for that purpose.

ATTACHMENT OF PRIVILEGE. In English law. A process by which a man, by virtue of his privilege, calls another to litigate in that court to which he himself belongs, and who has the privilege to answer there.

A writ issued to apprehend a person in a privileged place. Termes de la Ley.

ATTACHMENT OF THE FOREST. One of the three courts formerly held in forests. The highest court was called "justice in eyre's seat;" the middle, the "swainmote;" and the lowest, the "attachment." Manw. For. Law, 90, 99.

ATTAINDER. That extinction of civil rights and capacities which takes place whenever a person who has committed treason or felony receives sentence of death for his crime. 1 Steph. Comm. 408; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 641.

Attainder by confession is either by pleading guilty at the bar before the judges, and not putting one's self on one's trial by a jury, or before the coroner in sanctuary, when, in ancient times, the offender was obliged to abjure the realm.

Attainder by verdict is when the prisoner at the bar pleads not guilty to the indictment, and is pronounced guilty by the verdict of the jury.

Attainder by process or outlawry is when the party flies, and is subsequently outlawed. Co. Litt. 391.

The effect of attainder upon a felon is, in general terms, that all his estate, real and personal, is forfeited; that his blood is corrupted, and so nothing passes by inheritance to, from, or through him (1 Wm. Saund. 361, note; 6 Coke, 63a, 68b; 2 Rob. Ecc. 547; 24 Eng. Law & Eq. 598); that he cannot sue in a court of justice (Co. Litt. 130a). See 2 Gibbett, Crim. Law; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 641.

ATTAINDER, BILL OF. See "Bill of Attainder."

ATTAINT. Attainted, stained, or blackened.

A writ which lies to inquire whether a jury of twelve men gave a false verdict. Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 1, c. 134; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 22, § 8.

This latter was a trial by jury of twenty-four men impanelled to try the goodness of a former verdict. 3 Bl. Comm. 351; 3 Gilb. Ev. (Lofft Ed.) 1146. See "Assize."

ATTAINT D'UNE CAUSE. In French law. The gain of a suit. Estre attaint en uncan cas, to be overcome in any case. Cowell.

ATTEMPT. In criminal law. An endeavor to accomplish a crime carried beyond mere preparation for it, but falling short of the ultimate design. 5 Cush. (Mass.) 367. The elements are (1) intent to commit a crime; (2) an affirmative act in pursuance of that intent, but falling short of the crime intended. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 510. Such act need not be "the last proximate act to the consummation of the crime in contemplation, but it is sufficient if it be an act apparently adapted to produce the result intended. It must be more than mere preparation." 86 Va. 382.

ATTENDANT. One who owes a duty or service to another, or in some sort depends upon him. Termes de la Ley.

ATTENDANT TERMS. Long leases or mortgages so arranged as to protect the title of the owner. Thus, to raise a portion for younger children, it was quite common to make a mortgage to trustees. The powers of these trustees were generally to take possession of the estate, or to sell a part of the term if the portions were not duly paid. If the deed did not become ipso facto void, upon payment of the portion, a release was necessary from the trustees to discharge the mortgage. If this was not given, the term became an outstanding satisfied term. The purchaser from the heir then procured an assignment of the term to trustees for his benefit, which then became a satisfied term to attend the inheritance, or an attendant term. These terms were held attendant by the courts, also, without any assignment, and operated to defeat intermediate alienations to some extent. There were other ways of creating outstanding terms besides the method by mortgage, but the effect and general operation of all these were essentially the same. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 311; 4 Kent, Comm. 86-93.

ATTENTAT. In the civil and canon law. Anything whatsoever wrongfully innovated or attempted in the suit by the judge a quo, pending an appeal. 1 Add. Ecc. 22, note; Ayliffe, Par. 100.

ATTERMINARE (Lat.) To put off to a succeeding term; to prolong the time of payment of a debt. St. Westminster II. c. 4; Cowell; Blount.

ATTERMINING. The granting a time or term for the payment of a debt.

ATTERMOIEMENT. In canon law. A making terms; a composition, as with creditors. 7 Low. (U. S.) 272, 306.

ATTESTATION (Lat. ad, to, testari, to witness). The act of witnessing an instrument in writing, at the request of the party making the same, and subscribing it as a witness. 3 P. Wms. 254; 2 Ves. Jr. 454; 1 Ves. & B. 362; 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 146; 17 Pick. (Mass.) 373.

ATTESTATION CLAUSE. That clause wherein the witnesses certify that the instrument has been executed before them, and the manner of the execution of the same.

ATTESTING WITNESS. One who, upon being required by the parties to an instrument, signs his name to it to prove it, and for the purpose of identification. 3 Campb. 232.

ATTESTOR OF A CAUTIONER. In Scotch practice. A person who attests the sufficiency of a cautioner, and agrees to become subsidiarie liable for the debt. Bell, Dict.

ATTILE. In old English law. Rigging; tackle. Cowell.

ATTORN. To turn over; to transfer to another money or goods; to assign to some particular use or service. Kennett, Par. Ant. 283.

——In Feudal Law. Used of a lord's transferring the homage and service of his tenant to a new lord. Bracton, 81, 82; 1 Sullivan, Lect. 227.

——In Modern Law. For the tenant of one to acknowledge or agree that the fee is in another, or that such other is his landlord. 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 611.

A valid attornment may be made to one in privity with the landlord, as to the vendee on sale of the premises, but an attornment to a stranger is void.

ATTORNARE. In the feudal law. To attorn.

ATTORNARE REM. To attorn or turn over a thing, as money and goods, i. e., to assign or appropriate them to some particular use and service. Kennett, Par. Ant. 283; Cowell.

ATTORNATO FACIENDO VEL RECIPIendo. An obsolete writ, which commanded a sheriff or steward of a county court or hundred court to receive and admit an attorney to appear for the person who owed suit of court. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 156.

ATTORNE (Law Fr.) In old English law. An attorney. Britt. c. 126.

ATTORNEY. One put in the place, turn, or stead of another, to manage his affairs; one who manages the affairs of another by direction of his principal. Spelman; Termes de la Ley.

One who acts for another by virtue of an appointment by the latter.

——Attorney in Fact. A person to whom the authority of another, who is called the "constituent," is by him lawfully delegated.

——Attorney at Law. A person licensed to manage causes in court for the parties thereto.

In England, attorneys at law are divided into barristers or counsel, who are advocates admitted to plead at the bar, and solicitors or attorneys who engage in the drawing of pleadings, preparation of evidence, etc. These latter are called "attorneys" in courts of law, "solicitors" in courts of equity, and "proctors" in admiralty. The distinction between barristers and attorneys or solicitors obtained for a time in some of the United States, but is now obsolete.

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

——In English Law. A great officer, under the king, made by letters patent, whose office is to exhibit informations, and prosecute for the crown in matters criminal; to file bills in the exchequer in any matter concerning the king's revenue. Others may bring bills against the king's attorney. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 27; Termes de la Ley.

——In American Law. In each state there is an attorney general, or similar officer, who appears for the people, as in England he appears for the crown.

ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED States. A member of the president's cabinet. His duties are to prosecute and conduct all suits in the supreme court in which the United States shall be concerned, and give his advice upon questions of law when required by the president, or when requested by the heads of any of the departments, touching matters that may concern their departments. Act Sept. 24, 1789.

ATTORNEY OF THE WARDS AND liveries. The third officer of the Duchy court. Bac. Abr. tit. "Attorney."

ATTORNEY'S CERTIFICATE. In English law. A certificate of the commissioners of stamps that the attorney therein named has paid the annual duty. This must be renewed yearly, and the penalty for practising without such certificate is fifty pounds. St. 37 Geo. III. c. 90, §§ 26, 28, 30. See, also, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 73, §§ 21-26; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63.

ATTORNMENT. See "Attorn."

AU BESOIN (Fr. in case of need). "Au besoin chez Messieurs —— a ——." "In case of need, apply to Messrs. —— at ——."

A phrase used in the direction of a bill of exchange, pointing out the person to whom application may be made for payment in case of failure or refusal of the drawee to pay. Story, Bills, § 65.

AUBAINE. See "Droit d'Aubaine."

AUCTION. A public sale of property to the highest bidder.

The manner of conducting an auction is immaterial, whether it be by public outcry, or by any other manner. The essential part is the selection of a purchaser from a number of bidders. In a case where a woman continued silent during the whole time of the sale, but whenever any one bid she gave him a glass of brandy, and, when the sale broke up, the person who received the last glass of brandy was taken into a private room and he was declared to be the purchaser, this was adjudged to be an auction. 1 Dowl. Bailm. 115.

AUCTIONARIUS (Lat.) A seller; a regrator; a retailer; one who bought and sold; an auctioneer, in the modern sense. Spelman. One who buys poor, old, worn-out things to sell again at a greater price. Du Cange.

AUCTIONEER. A person authorized by law to sell the goods of others at public sale; one who conducts a public sale or auction.

AUCTOR.

——In Roman Law. An auctioneer.

In auction sales, a spear was fixed upright in the forum, beside which the seller took his stand; hence goods thus sold were said to be sold sub hasta under the spear. The catalogue of goods was on tablets called auctionariae.

——In Old French Law. A plaintiff. See "Actor."

AUCTORITAS.

——In Civil Law. Authority. Brissonius.

——In Old European Law. A diploma, or royal charter. A word frequently used by Gregory of Tours and later writers. Spelman.

AUCTORITATES PHILOSOPHORUM, medicorum, et poetarum, sunt in causis allegandae et tenendae. The opinions of philosophers, physicians, and poets are to be alleged and received in causes. Co. Litt. 264.

AUCUPIA VERBORUM SUNT JUDICE indigna. Catching at words is unworthy of a judge. Hob. 343.

AUDI ALTERAM PARTEM. Hear the other side; hear both sides. No man should be condemned unheard. Broom, Leg. Max. 113. See L. R. 2 P. C. 106.

AUDIENCE (Lat. audire, to hear). A hearing or interview.

It is usual for the executive of a country to whom a minister has been sent to give such minister an audience; and after a minister has been recalled, an audience of leave usually takes place.

AUDIENCE COURT. In English law. A court belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury, and held by him in his palace for the transaction of matters of form only, as the confirmation of bishops, elections, consecrations, and the like. This court has the same authority with the court of arches, but is of inferior dignity and antiquity. The dean of the arches is the official auditor of the audience. The archbishop of York has also his audience court. Termes de la Ley.

AUDIENDO ET TERMINANDO. A writ or commission to certain persons to appease and punish any insurrection or great riot. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 110.

AUDIT. To examine, adjust, settle, etc., an account, and then allow it. 3 Denio (N. Y.) 381; 5 Daly (N. Y.) 200; 24 Hun (N. Y.) 419.

AUDITA QUERELA (Lat.) A form of action which lies for a defendant to recall or prevent an execution, on account of some matter occurring after judgment amounting to a discharge, and which could not have been, and cannot be, taken advantage of otherwise. 12 Mass. 270.

It is a regular suit, in which the parties appear and plead (17 Johns. [N. Y.] 484; 12 Vt. 56, 435; 30 Vt. 420; 8 Miss. 103), and in which damages may be recovered if execution was issued improperly (Brooke, Abr. "Damages," 38), but the writ must be allowed in open court, and is not of itself a supersedeas (2 Johns. [N. Y.] 227).

It is a remedial process, equitable in its nature, based upon facts, and not upon the erroneous judgments or acts of the court. 2 Wm. Saund. 148, note; 10 Mass. 103; 14 Mass. 448; 17 Mass. 159; 1 Aik. (Vt.) 363; 24 Vt. 211; 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 227; 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 425. And see 7 Gray (Mass.) 206.

In modern practice, the same relief is usually granted on motion, and the writ is dismissed.

AUDITOR (Lat. audire, to hear). An officer of the government, whose duty it is to examine the accounts of officers who have received and disbursed public moneys by lawful authority. Acts Cong. April 3, 1817, and Feb. 24, 1819; 3 Story, U. S. Laws, 1630, 1722; 4 Inst. 107; 46 Geo. III. c. 1.

——In Practice. An officer (or officers) of the court, assigned to state the items of debit and credit between the parties in a suit where accounts are in question, and exhibit the balance. 1 Metc. (Mass.) 218.

They may be appointed by courts either of law or equity. They are appointed at common law in actions of account (Bac. Abr. "Accompt" [F]), and in many of the states in other actions, under statute regulations (6 Pick. [Mass.] 193; 14 N. H. 427; 3 R. I. 60).

AUDITORS OF THE IMPREST. Officers in the English exchequer, who formerly had the charge of auditing the accounts of the customs, naval and military expenses, etc., now performed by the commissioners for auditing public accounts. Wharton.

AUGMENTATION. The increase arising to the crown's revenues from the suppression of monasteries and religious houses, and the appropriation of their lands and revenues.

A court erected by Henry VIII., which was invested with the power of determining suits and controversies relating to monasteries and abbey lands. The court was dissolved in the reign of Mary; but the office of augmentations remained long after. Cowell.

A share of the great tithes temporarily granted to the vicars by the appropriators, and made perpetual by St. 29 Car. II. c. 8. The word is used in a similar sense in the Canadian law.

AUGUSTA LEGIBUS SOLUTA NON est. The empress or queen is not privileged or exempted from subjection to the laws. 1 Bl. Comm. 219; Dig. 1. 3. 31.

AULA, HAULA, or HALLA. In old English law. A hall, or court; the court of a baron, or manor; a court baron; a hall or chief mansion house; the usual appanage of a manor. Whitshaw; Spelman.

AULA REGIA, or AULA REGIS. In English law. The king's hall or palace. A court established in England by William the Conqueror in his own hall.

AULNAGE or ALNAGE. A duty collected on the putting on of the seals on the assise of woolen cloth. The officer charged with such duty was caled "aulnage," "alnager," or "ulnager."

AUMONE, SERVICE IN. Where lands are given in alms to a church or religious house, upon condition that masses, service, or prayers shall be offered at certain times for the repose of the donor's soul. Britt. 164.

AUNCEL WEIGHT. An ancient manner of weighing by means of a beam held in the hand. Termes de la Ley; Cowell.

AURES. In Saxon law. The punishment of cutting off the ears.

AURUM REGINAE. Queen's gold (q. v.) 1 Bl. Comm. 219, 220.

AUTER (Law Fr.) Another. This word is frequently used in composition, as, auter droit, auter vie, auter action, etc.

AUTER ACTION PENDANT (Law Fr. another action pending). In pleading. A plea that another action is already pending. This plea may be made either at law or in equity. 1 Chit. Pl. 393; Story, Eq. Pl. § 736.

AUTHENTIC ACT. In civil law. An act which has been executed before a notary or other public officer authorized to execute such functions, or which is testified by a public seal, or has been rendered public by the authority of a competent magistrate, or which is certified as being a copy of a public register. Nov. 73, c. 2; Code, 7. 52; Id. 6. 4. 21; Dig. 22. 4.

An act which has been executed before a notary public or other officer authorized to execute such functions, in presence of two witnesses, free, male, and aged at least fourteen years; or of three witnesses, if the party be blind. Civ. Code La. art. 2231. If the party does not know how to sign, the notary must cause him to affix his mark to the instrument. Id. art. 2231. The authentic act is full proof of the agreement contained in it, against the contracting parties and their heirs or assigns, unless it be declared and proved to be a forgery. Id. art. 2233. See Merlin, Repert.

AUTHENTICATION. In practice. A proper or legal attestation.

Acts done with a view of causing an instrument to be known and identified.

Under the constitution of the United States, congress has power to provide a method of authenticating copies of the records of a state with a view to their production as evidence in other states. For the various statutes on the subject, see "Foreign Judgment;" "Record."

AUTHENTICS. A collection of the Novels of Justinian, made by an unknown person. They are entire, and are distinguished by their name from the epitome made by Julian. See 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 72.

A collection of extracts made from the Novels by a lawyer named Irnier, and which he inserted in the Code at the places to which they refer. These extracts have the reputation of not being correct. Merlin, Repert. "Authentique."

AUTHENTICUM (Lat.) In the civil law. An original instrument or writing; the original of a will or other instrument, as distinguished from a copy. Dig. 22. 4. 2; Id. 29. 3. 12.

AUTHORITIES. Enactments and opinions relied upon as establishing or declaring the rule of law which is to be applied in any case.

The opinion of a court, or of counsel, or of a text writer upon any question, is usually fortified by a citation of authorities.

AUTHORITY. Power.

——In Contracts. The power lawfully delegated to a person by another.

Authority coupled with an interest is an authority given to an agent for a valuable consideration, or which forms part of a security.

Express authority is that given explicitly, either in writing or verbally.

General authority is that which authorizes the agent to do everything connected with a particular business. Story, Ag. § 17. It empowers him to bind his employer by all acts within the scope of his employment, and it cannot be limited by any private order or direction not known to the party dealing with him. Paley, Ag. 199-201.

Limited authority is that where the agent is bound by precise instructions.

Special authority is that which is confined to an individual transaction. Story, Ag. § 19; 15 East, 400, 408; 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 354. Such an authority does not bind the employer, unless it is strictly pursued, for it is the business of the party dealing with the agent to examine his authority, and therefore, if there be any qualification or express restriction annexed to it, it must be observed; otherwise, the principal is discharged. Paley, Ag. 202.

Naked authority is that where the principal delegates the power to the agent wholly for the benefit of the former. A naked authority may be revoked; an authority coupled with an interest is irrevocable.

Unlimited authority is that where the agent is left to pursue his own discretion.

——In Governmental Law. The right and power which an officer has, in the exercise of a public function, to compel obedience to his lawful commands. A judge, for example, has authority to enforce obedience to his lawful orders.

AUTO ACORDADO. In Spanish colonial law. An order emanating from some superior tribunal, promulgated in the name and by the authority of the sovereign. Schmidt, Civ. Law, 93.

AUTOCRACY. A government where the power of the monarch is unlimited by law.

AUTONOMY. The state of independence. The autonomos was he who lived according to his own laws,—who was free. The term was chiefly used of communities or states, and meant those which were independent of others. It was introduced into the English language by the divines of the seventeenth century, when it and its translation—self-government—were chiefly used in a theological sense. Gradually its translation received a political meaning, in which it is now employed almost exclusively. Of late the word "autonomy" has been revived in diplomatic language in Europe, meaning "independence," the negation of a state of political influence from without or foreign powers. See Lieber, Civ. Lib.

AUTOPSY. Dissection of a dead body for the purpose of ascertaining the cause, seat, or nature of a disease; a post mortem examination.

AUTRE, AUTRY, AUTRI, or AUTER (Law Fr.) Other; another. Britt. c. 54; Kelham.

AUTRE (or AUTER) VIE (Law Fr. another's life). A person holding an estate for or during the life of another is called a tenant "pur autre vie," or "pur terme d'autre vie." Litt. § 56; 2 Bl. Comm. 120.

AUTREFOIS. Formerly; heretofore.

AUTREFOIS ACQUIT (Fr. formerly acquitted). A plea made by a defendant indicted for a crime, that he has formerly been tried and acquitted of the same offense. See "Jeopardy."

AUTREFOIS ATTAINT (Fr. formerly attainted). In criminal pleading. A plea that the defendant has been attainted for one felony, and cannot, therefore, be criminally prosecuted for another. 4 Bl. Comm. 336. Now obsolete.

AUTREFOIS CONVICT (Fr. formerly convicted). In criminal pleading. A plea made by a defendant indicted for a crime or misdemeanor, that he has formerly been tried and convicted of the same. This plea is substantially the same in form as the plea of autrefois acquit, and is grounded on the same principle, viz., that no man's life or liberty shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 651-680; 1 Green (N. J.) 362; 1 McLean (U. S.) 429; 7 Ala. 610; 2 Swan (Tenn.) 493.

A plea of autrefois convict, which shows that the judgment on the former indictment has been reversed for an error in the judgment, is not a good bar to another indictment for the same offense. 3 Car. & K. 190. But a prior conviction by judgment before a justice of the peace, and a performance of the sentence pursuant to the judgment, constitute a bar to an indictment for the same offense, although the complaint on which the justice proceeded was so defective that his judgment might have been reversed for error. 3 Metc. (Mass.) 328; 8 Metc. (Mass). 532. See "Jeopardy."

AUXILA AD FILIUM MILITEM FACIENdum vel ad filiam maritandam. Aids to make the lord's son a knight, or to marry his daughter. See "Aids." Bracton, fol. 36b.

AUXILIUM (Lat.) An aid; tribute or services paid by the tenant to his lord.

AUXILIUM CURIAE. An order of the court summoning one party, at the suit and request of another, to appear and warrant something. Kennett, Par. Ant. 477.

AUXILIUM REGIS. A subsidy paid to the king. Spelman.

AUXILIUM VICE COMITI. An ancient duty paid to sheriffs. Cowell; Whishaw.

AVAIL OF MARRIAGE.

——In Scotch Law. A certain sum due by the heir of a deceased ward vassal, when the heir became of marriageable age. Ersk. Inst. lib. 2, tit. 5, § 18.

——In Feudal Law. The right of a guardian in chivalry to dispose of the hand of his ward in marriage. 2 Bl. Comm. 88.

AVAILS. In wills, the net proceeds of the estate; that which remains after paying debts. See 3 N. Y. 276.

AVAL. In Canadian law. An act of suretyship or guaranty on a promissory note. 1 Low. (U. S.) 221; 9 Low. (U. S.) 360.

AVANTURE (Law Fr.) Chance; hazard; mischance. Kelham.

AVARIA, or AVARIE. Average; the loss and damage suffered in the course of a navigation. Poth. du Contr. de Louage, 105.

AVENGE (Law Lat.) In old English law. A certain quantity of oats paid to a landlord in lieu of some other duties, or as a rent from the tenant. Cowell. A rent paid in oats.

AVENTURE, or ADVENTURE. A mischance causing the death of a man, as by drowning, or being killed suddenly without felony. Co. Litt. 391; Whishaw.

AVER. To assert. See "Averment."

To make or prove true; to verify. The defendant will offer to aver. Cowell; Co. Litt. 362b.

Cattle of any kind. Cowell; Kelham.

AVER ET TENIR (or TENER). To have and to hold. See "Habendum."

AVER CORN. A rent reserved to religious houses, to be paid in corn; corn drawn by the tenant's cattle. Cowell.

AVER LAND. Land ploughed by the tenant for the proper use of the lord of the soil. Blount.

AVER PENNY. Money paid to the king's averages to be free therefrom. Termes de la Ley.

AVER SILVER. A rent formerly so called. Cowell.

AVERAGE. In marine insurance. Loss or damage to a part of the vessel or cargo insured.

The contribution due from one owner to another, on a partial loss.

——General Average. General (also called "gross") average consists of expense purposely incurred, sacrifice made, or damage sustained for the common safety of the vessel, freight, and cargo, or the two of them, at risk, and is to be contributed for by the several interests in the proportion of their respective values exposed to the common danger, and ultimately surviving, including the amount of expense, sacrifice or damage so incurred in the contributory value. 2 Phil. Ins. § 1269 et seq.; and see 2 Curt. C. C. (U. S.) 59; 9 Cush. (Mass.) 415; 93 Ky. 102; 5 Ohio, 307; 3 Wall. (U. S.) 370; 3 Kent, Comm. 232.

——Particular Average. Particular average (also called "partial loss") is an accidental loss on the ship, cargo, or freight, to be borne by the owner of the subject on which it happens, and is so called in distinction from general average, and, if not total, it is also called a partial loss. 2 Phil. Ins. c. 16; 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 395; 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 164.

AVERIA (Lat.) Cattle; working cattle. Averia carucae (draft cattle) are exempt from distress. 3 Bl. Comm. 9; 4 Term R. 566.

AVERIA CARUCAE. Beasts of the plow, which, at common law, were privileged over other cattle.

AVERIA OTIOSA. Idle beasts; as distinguished from averia carucae, beasts of the plow.

AVERIIS CAPTIS IN WITHERNAM. In English law. A writ which lies in favor of a man whose cattle have been unlawfully taken by another, and driven out of the county where they were taken, so that they cannot be replevied.

It issues against the wrongdoer to take his cattle for the plaintiff's use. Reg. Brev. 82.

AVERMENT. In pleading. A positive statement of facts, as opposed to an argumentative or inferential one. Cowp. 683; Bac. Abr. "Pleas"(B).

Averments must contain not only matter, but form.

In old pleading, the conclusion of a plea, whereby the pleader alleged his readiness to verify the foregoing.

Averments were formerly said to be general and particular; but only particular averments are found in modern pleading. 1 Chit. Pl. 277.

——Particular Averments. The assertions of particular facts. There must be an averment of every substantive material fact on which the party relies, so that it may be replied to by the opposite party.

——Negative Averments. Those in which a negative is asserted. Generally, under the rules of pleading, the party asserting the affirmative must prove it; but an averment of illegitimacy (2 Selw. N. P. 709), or criminal neglect of duty, must be proven (2 Gall. [U. S.] 498; 19 Johns. [N. Y.] 345; 1 Mass. 54; 10 East, 211; 3 Campb. 10; 3 Bos. & P. 302; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 80; 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3089).

——Immaterial and Impertinent Averments. Those which need not be made, and, if made, need not be proved. They are synonymous. 5 Dowl. & R. 209. The allegation of deceit in the seller of goods in action on the warranty is such an averment (2 East, 446; 17 Johns. [N. Y.] 92).

——Unnecessary Averments. Statements of matters which need not be alleged, but which, if alleged, must be proved. Carth. 200.

AVERRARE, or AVERARE. In feudal law. To carry goods upon loaded horses or in a wagon; a duty formerly required of some customary tenants. Spelman. To drive cattle (averia) to some fair or market. Cowell.

AVERSIO (Lat.) An averting; a turning away; a sale in gross or in bulk.

Letting a house altogether, instead of in chambers. 4 Kent, Comm. 517.

AVERSIO PERICULI. An averting or turning away of peril. A name given to the contract of insurance (marine) because one of the parties undertakes to avert from the other the peril of the sea. According to Emerigon, the words signify that the insurer charges himself with, and takes upon himself, the peril which the things insured run upon the sea. Tr. des Assur. c. 1, pr. See 3 Kent, Comm. 263; Locc. de Jur. Mar. lib. 2, c. 5, § 1.

AVERUM (Lat.) Goods; property; a beast of burden. Spelman.

AVET. In Scotch law. To abet or assist. Tomlin.

AVIZANDUM. In Scotch law. To make avizandum with a process is to take it from the public court to the private consideration of the judge. Bell, Dict.

AVOCAT (Fr.) Advocate; an advocate. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 3.

AVOIDANCE. A making void, useless, or empty.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. It exists when a benefice becomes vacant for want of an incumbent.

——In Pleading. Repelling or excluding the conclusions or implications arising from the admission of the truth of the allegations of the opposite party. See "Confession and Avoidance."

AVOIRDUPOIS. The name of a weight. This kind of weight is so named, in distinction from the Troy weight. One pound avoirdupois contains seven thousand grains Troy; that is, fourteen ounces, eleven pennyweights and sixteen grains Troy; a pound avoirdupois contains sixteen ounces; and an ounce, sixteen drachms. Thirty-two cubic feet of pure spring water, at the temperature of fifty-six degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, make a ton of two thousand pounds avoirdupois, or two thousand two hundred and forty pounds net weight. Dane. Abr. c. 211, art. 12, § 6. The avoirdupois ounce is less than the Troy ounce in the proportion of 72 to 79, though the pound is greater. Enc. Amer. "Avoirdupois." For the derivation of this phrase, see Barr. Obs. St. 206. See the Report of Secretary of State of the United States to the Senate, February 22, 1821, pp. 44, 72, 76, 79, 81, 87, for a learned exposition of the whole subject.

AVOUCHER. See "Voucher."

AVOUE.

——In Old French Law. A feudal chief who acted as protector of a church or monastery; the suzerain of the fief.

——In Modern French Law. A barrister; advocate; attorney. Duverger.

AVOW. To acknowledge the commission of an act, and claim that it was done with right. 3 Bl. Comm. 150.

To make an avowry. For example, when replevin is brought for a thing distrained, and the party taking claims that he had a right to make the distress, he is said to avow. See Fleta, lib. 1, c. 4, § 4; Cunningham. See "Avowry;" "Justification."

AVOWANT. One who makes an avowry.

AVOWEE, or AVOWE. See "Advowee."

AVOWRY. In pleading. The answer of the defendant in an action of replevin brought to recover property taken in distress, in which he acknowledges the taking, and, setting forth the cause thereof, claims a right in himself or his wife to do so. 4 Bouv. Inst. note 3571; 3 Bl. Comm. 149.

A justification is made where the defendant shows that the plaintiff had no property, by showing either that it was the defendant's or some third person's, or where he shows that he took it by a right which was sufficient at the time of taking, though not subsisting at the time of answer. The avowry admits the property to have been the plaintiff's, and shows a right which had then accrued, and still subsists, to make such caption. See Gilb. Distr. 176-178; 2 W. Jones, 25.

AVOWTERER. In English law. An adulterer with whom a married woman continues in adultery. Termes de la Ley.

AVOWTRY. In English law. The crime of adultery.

AVULSION (Lat. avellere, to tear away). The removal of a considerable quantity of soil from the land of one man, and its deposit upon or annexation to the land of another, suddenly and by the perceptible action of water. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 452. In such case, the property belongs to the first owner. Bracton, 221; Hargrave, Tract. de Jure Mar.; Schultes, Aq. Rights, 115-138. The perceptible character of the deposit distinguishes it from accretion (q. v.) See also, "Reliction."

AWAIT. To lay in wait; to waylay.

AWARD (Law Lat. awarda, awardum; old French, agarda, from a garder). To keep, preserve; to be guarded, or kept. So called because it is imposed on the parties to be observed or kept by them. Spelman.

The judgment or decision of arbitrators or referees on a matter submitted to them.

The writing containing such judgment. Cowell; Termes de la Ley; 3 Bouv. Inst. note 2402.

AWAY-GOING CROP. A crop sown before the expiration of a tenancy, which cannot ripen until after its expiration, to which, however, the tenant is entitled. Broom, Leg. Max. 306. See "Emblements."

AWM, or AUME. An ancient measure used in measuring Rhenish wines. Termes de la Ley. Its value varied in the different cities. Cowell.

AYANT CAUSE. In French law. This term, which is used in Louisiana, signifies one to whom a right has been assigned, either by will, gift, sale, exchange, or the like; an assignee. An ayant cause differs from an heir who acquires the right by inheritance. 8 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 245.

AYRE. In old Scotch law. Eyre; a circuit, eyre, or iter. Bell, Dict. voc. "Justice Ayres."

AYUNTAMIENTO. In Spanish law. A congress of persons; the municipal council of a city or town. 1 White, New Coll. 416; 12 Pet. (U. S.) 442, note.

B

B. F. Bonum factum, a good deed. A form of approval among the civilians.

BACEREND, or BACKBEREND. An old English law term for a thief caught with the stolen goods in his possession (upon his back). Spelman; Bracton, 150b.

BACHELERIA. Commonalty or yeomanry, in contradistinction to baronage. Wharton.

BACHELOR.

(1) The holder of the first or lowest degree conferred by a college or university, e. g., a bachelor of arts, bachelor of law, etc.

(2) A kind of inferior knight; an esquire.

(3) A man who has never been married.

BACK BOND. A bond of indemnification given to a surety.

——In Scotch Law. A declaration of trust; a defeasance; a bond given by one who is apparently absolute owner, so as to reduce his right to that of a trustee or holder of a bond and disposition in security. Paterson, Comp.

BACK WATER. That water in a stream which, in consequence of some obstruction below, is detained or checked in its course, or reflows.

The term is usually employed to designate the water which is turned back, by a dam erected in the stream below, upon the wheel of a mill above, so as to retard its revolution.

BACKADATION, or BACKWARDATION. A consideration given to keep back the delivery of stock when the price is lower for time than for ready money. Wharton.

BACKBEAR. In forest law. Carrying on the back. One of the cases in which an offender against vert and venison might be arrested, as being taken with the mainour, or manner, or found carrying a deer off on his back. Manw. For. Law; Cowell.

BACKBEREND (Saxon). See "Bacerend."

BACKING. Indorsement; indorsement by a magistrate.

Backing a warrant becomes necessary when it is desired to serve it in a county other than that in which it was first issued. In such a case the indorsement of a magistrate of the new county authorizes its service there as fully as if first issued in that county. The custom prevails in England, Scotland, and some of the United States.

BACKSIDE. A yard at the back part of or behind a house, and belonging thereto.

The term was formerly much used both in conveyances and in pleading, but is now of infrequent occurrence, except in conveyances which repeat an ancient description. Chit. Prac. 177; 2 Ld. Raym. 1399.

BACULUS (Lat.) In old English practice. A staff, rod, or wand, anciently used in the ceremony of making livery of seisin, where there was no building on the land. Fiat seysina per fustim et per baculum, seisin should be made by rod and staff. Bracton, fol. 40; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 15, § 5. Baculus nuntiatorius, a warning or summoning stick. A white stick or wand, by erecting which on the grounds of a defendant in real actions he was anciently warned or summoned to appear in court at the return of the original writ. 8 Bl. Comm. 379.

A baton, such as combatants fought with in the duellum. Frangitur eorum baculus, their baton is broken.

A term anciently applied to persons convicted of a felony on their own confession, signifying that they could not bring an appeal against any one. Bracton, fol. 152. See Fleta, lib. 1, c. 38, § 16; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 43. See "Baston."

BADGE OF FRAUD. A circumstance attending a transaction tending to throw upon it suspicion of fraud, though not in itself constituting fraud. 64 N. C. 374.

An act which, from the common experience of mankind, is regarded as ground of suspicion.

BADGER (Fr.) Baggage, a bundle, and thence is derived bagagier, a carrier of goods.

One who buys corn or victuals in one place, and carries them to another to sell and make profit by them. And such a one is exempted in St. 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 14, from the punishment of an ingrosser within that statute. But by 5 Eliz. c. 12, badgers are to be licensed by the justices of the peace in the sessions, whose licenses will be in force for one year, and no longer, and the persons to whom granted must enter into a recognizance that they will not, by color of their licenses, forestall, or do anything contrary to the statutes made against forestallers, ingrossers, and regrators. If any person shall act as a badger without license, he is to forfeit £5, one moiety to the king, and the other to the prosecutor, leviable by warrant from justices of the peace, etc. Jacob.

BAGA (Law Lat.) In old English law. Bag; a bag. Et d'denvers eux unam bagam, ore C. l. in ead' baga content'. Y. B. M. 18 Hen. VI. 5. See "Petty Bag Office."

BAGGAGE. Whatever, connected with the objects of the journey, and not exceeding the limits of reason and custom, a traveller takes with him for his personal use, whether during actual travel, or in intervals between trips, or upon the termination of the journey. Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 1156.

It does not include samples of merchandise (98 Mass. 83), money not necessary for travelling (22 Ill. 278), jewelry intended for presents (17 N. Y. Super. Ct. 225).

It includes weapons (22 Ill. 278), books (121 Ind. 226), tools (14 Pa. St. 129), opera glasses (33 Ind. 379), bedding for use on the trip (1 Whit. & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. [Tex.] § 1253).

BAHADUM. A chest or coffer. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 21.

BAIL (Fr. bailler, to deliver). Those persons who become sureties for the appearance of the defendant in court.

The delivery of the defendant to persons who, in the manner prescribed by law, become security for his appearance in court.

The word is used both as a substantive and a verb, though more frequently as a substantive, and in civil cases, at least, in the first sense given above. In its more ancient signification, the word includes the delivery of property, real or personal, by one person to another.

——Bail Above. Sureties who bind themselves either to satisfy the plaintiff his debt and costs, or to surrender the defendant into custody, provided judgment be against him in the action, and he fail to do so. Sellon, Prac. 137.

——Bail to the Action. Bail above.

——Bail Below. Sureties who bind themselves to the sheriff to secure the defendant's appearance, or his putting in bail to the action on the return day of the writ. It may be demanded by the sheriff whenever he has arrested a defendant on a bailable process, as a prerequisite to releasing the defendant.

——Bail to the Sheriff. Bail below.

——Civil Bail. That taken in civil actions.

——Common Bail. Fictitious sureties formally entered in the proper office of the court. It is a kind of bail above, similar in form to special bail, but having fictitious persons, John Doe and Richard Roe, as sureties. Filing common bail is tantamount to entering an appearance.

——Special Bail. Responsible sureties who undertake as bail above.

——Bail in Error. The bond given to secure a stay of proceedings on writ of error.

——In Canadian Law. A lease. See Merlin, Repert. "Bail." Bail emphyteotique, a lease for years, with a right to prolong indefinitely. 5 Low. (U. S.) 381. It is equivalent to an alienation. 6 Low. (U. S.) 58.

BAIL BOND. In practice. A specialty by which the defendant and other persons become bound to the sheriff in a penal sum proportioned to the damages claimed in the action, and which is conditioned for the due appearance of such defendant to answer to the legal process therein described, and by which the sheriff has been commanded to arrest him.

BAIL PIECE. A certificate given by a judge or the clerk of a court, or other person authorized to keep the record, in which it is certified that the bail became bail for the defendant in a certain sum, and in a particular case.

BAILABLE ACTION. An action in which the defendant is entitled to be discharged from arrest only upon giving bond to answer.

BAILABLE PROCESS. Process under which the sheriff is directed to arrest the defendant, and is required by law to discharge him upon his tendering suitable bail as security for his appearance. A capias ad respondendum is bailable; not so a capias ad satisfaciendum.

BAILEE. Contracts. One to whom goods are bailed. See "Bailment."

BAILIE. In Scotch law. An officer appointed to give infeftment.

In certain cases it is the duty of the sheriff, as king's bailie, to act. Generally, any one may be made bailie by filling in his name in the precept of sasine.

A magistrate possessing a limited criminal and civil jurisdiction. Bell, Dict.

BAILIFF. A person to whom some authority, care, guardianship, or jurisdiction is delivered, committed, or intrusted. Spelman.

A sheriff's officer or deputy. 1 Bl. Comm. 344.

A magistrate, who formerly administered justice in the parliaments or courts of France, answering to the English sheriffs as mentioned by Bracton.

There are still bailiffs of particular towns in England; as, the bailiff of Dover Castle, etc.; otherwise, bailiffs are now only officers or stewards, etc.; as, bailiffs of liberties, appointed by every lord within his liberty, to serve writs, etc.; bailiffs errant or itinerant, appointed to go about the country for the same purpose; sheriff's bailiffs, sheriff's officers to execute writs; these are also called "bound bailiffs," because they are usually bound in a bond to the sheriff for the due execution of their office; bailiffs of court baron, to summon the court, etc.; bailiffs of husbandry, appointed by private persons to collect their rents and manage their estates; water bailiffs, officers in port towns for searching ships, gathering tolls, etc. Bac. Abr.

——In Account Render. A person who has by delivery the custody and administration of lands or goods for the benefit of the owner or bailor, and is liable to render an account thereof. Co. Litt. 271; 2 Leon. 245; Story, Eq. Jur. § 446.

BAILIFF ERRANT. A deputy bailiff.

BAILIFFS OF FRANCHISES. In English law. Officers who perform the duties of sheriffs within liberties or privileged jurisdictions, in which formerly the king's writ could not be executed by the sheriff. Spelman, voc. "Balivus."

BAILIFFS OF HUNDREDS. In English law. Officers appointed over hundreds, by the sheriffs, to collect fines therein, and summon juries; to attend the judges and justices at the assizes and quarter sessions; and also to execute writs and process in the several hundreds. 1 Bl. Comm. 345; 3 Steph. Comm. 29; Bracton, fol. 116.

BAILIFFS OF MANORS. In English law. Stewards or agents appointed by the lord (generally by an authority under seal) to superintend the manor, collect fines and quitrents, inspect the buildings, order repairs, cut down trees, impound cattle trespassing, take an account of wastes, spoils, and misdemeanors in the woods and demesne lands, and do other acts for the lord's interest. Cowell; Fleta, lib. 2, cc. 72, 73.

BAILIVIA. A bailiwick (q. v.) Wharton.

BAILIWICK. The jurisdiction of a sheriff or bailiff. 1 Bl. Comm. 344.

A liberty or exclusive jurisdiction which was exempted from the sheriff of the county, and over which the lord appointed a bailiff, with such powers within his precinct as the under sheriff exercised under the sheriff of the county. Whishaw.

BAILLEW DE FONDS. In Canadian law. The unpaid vendor of real estate.

BAILLI. In old French law. A person to whom judicial authority and jurisdiction were assigned or delivered by a superior.

BAILMENT (Fr. bailler, to put into the hands of; to deliver). A delivery of something of a personal nature by one party to another, to be held according to the purpose or object of the delivery, and to be returned or delivered over when that purpose is accomplished. Prof. Joel Parker, MSS. Lect. Dane Law School, Harvard Coll. 1851.

The right to hold may terminate, and a duty of restoration may arise, before the accomplishment of the purpose, but that does not necessarily enter into the definition, because such duty of restoration was not the original purpose of the delivery, but arises upon a subsequent contingency. The party delivering the thing is called the "bailor;" the party receiving it, the "bailee." It is distinguished from a sale by the fact that in a bailment only the right of possession, and not the title, is transferred. Benj. Sales, §§ 1, 2.

Various attempts have been made to give a precise definition of this term, upon some of which there have been elaborate criticisms. See Story, Bailm. (4th Ed.) § 2, note 1, exemplifying the maxim, Omnis definitio in lege periculosa est.

Some of these definitions are here given as illustrating more completely than is possible in any other way the elements considered necessary to a bailment by the different authors cited.

A delivery of a thing in trust for some special object or purpose, and upon a contract, express or implied, to conform to the object or purpose of the trust. Story, Bailm. § 2. See Merlin, Repert. "Bail."

A delivery of goods in trust upon a contract, either expressed or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully executed on the part of the bailee. 2 Bl. Comm. 451. See Id. 395.

A delivery of goods in trust upon a contract, expressed or implied, that the trust shall be duly executed, and the goods restored by the bailee as soon as the purposes of the bailment shall be answered. 2 Kent, Comm. 559.

A delivery of goods on a condition, express or implied, that they shall be restored by the bailee to the bailor, or according to his directions, as soon as the purpose for which they are bailed shall be answered. Jones, Bailm. 1.

A delivery of goods in trust on a contract, either expressed or implied, that the trust shall be duly executed, and the goods redelivered as soon as the time or use for which they were bailed shall have elapsed or be performed. Jones, Bailm. 117.

According to Story, the contract does not necessarily imply an undertaking to redeliver the goods; and the first definition of Jones here given would seem to allow of a similar conclusion. On the other hand, Blackstone, although his definition does not include the return, speaks of it in all his examples of bailments as a duty of the bailee; and Kent says that the application of the term to cases in which no return or delivery or redelivery to the owner or his agent is contemplated, is extending the definition of the term beyond its ordinary acceptation in the English law. A consignment to a factor would be a bailment for sale, according to Story, while according to Kent it would not be included under the term "bailment."

Sir William Jones has divided bailments into five sorts, namely, depositum, or deposit; mandatum, or commission without recompense; commodatum, or loan for use without pay; pignori acceptum, or pawn; locatum, or hiring, which is always with reward. This last is subdivided into locatio rei, or hiring, by which the hirer gains a temporary use of the thing; locatio operis faciendi, when something is to be done to the thing delivered; locatio operis mercium vehendarum, when the thing is merely to be carried from one place to another. Jones, Bailm. 36.

Lord Holt divides them into six classes: Depositum, or deposit for keeping for the benefit of the bailor; commodatum, or gratuitous loan; locatio rei, or letting for hire; vadium, pledge or pawn; locatio operis faciendi, or delivery that something may be done upon the chattels by the bailee for hire; mandatum, or mandate, a delivery that something may be done upon the chattels by the bailee gratuitously. 2 Ld. Raym. 909.

A better general division, however, for practical purposes, suggested, but not adopted, by Story (Bailm. §§ 4-8), and first adopted by Schouler (Bailm. § 14), is into three kinds: First, those bailments which are for the benefit of the bailor, or for some person whom he represents; second, those for the benefit of the bailee, or some person represented by him; third, those which are for the benefit of both parties.

BAILOR. He who bails a thing to another. See "Bailment."

BAIR-MAN. In Scotch law. A poor debtor.

BAIRNS. In Scotch law. A known term, used to denote one's whole issue. Ersk. Inst. 3. 8. 48. But it is sometimes used in a more limited sense. Bell, Dict.

BAIRNS' PART. In Scotch law. Children's part; a third part of the defunct's free movables, debts deducted, if the wife survive, and a half if there be no relict.

BALAENA. A large fish, called by Blackstone a "whale." Of this the king had the head and the queen the tail as a perquisite whenever one was taken on the coast of England. Prynne, Ann. Reg. 127; 1 Bl. Comm. 221.

BALANCE. The amount which remains due by one of two persons, who have been dealing together, to the other, after the settlement of their accounts.

"There is a broad distinction between an account and the mere balance of an account, resembling the distinction in logic between the premises of an argument and the conclusions drawn therefrom. A balance is but the conclusion or result of the debit and credit sides of an account. It implies mutual dealings and the existence of debit and credit, without which there could be no balance." 45 Mo. 573.

The word is sometimes used in the sense of "residue."

BALANCE SHEET. A statement made by merchants and others to show the true state of a particular business. A balance sheet should exhibit all the balances of debits and credits, also the value of merchandise, and the result of the whole.

BALCANIFER, or BALDAKINIFER. The standard bearer of the Knights Templar. Wharton.

BALDIO. In Spanish law. Vacant land having no particular owner, and usually abandoned to the public for the purposes of pasture. The word is supposed to be derived from the Arabic balt, signifying a thing of little value. For the legislation on this subject, see Escriché, Dic. Raz.

BALIUS. In civil law. A teacher; one who has the care of youth; a tutor; a guardian. Du Cange, "Bajultis;" Spelman.

BALIVA, or BALLIVA. Equivalent to balivatus. Balivia, a bailiwick; the jurisdiction of a sheriff; the whole district within which the trust of the sheriff was to be executed. Cowell. Occurring in the return of the sheriff, non est inventus in balliva mea, he has not been found in my bailiwick; afterwards abbreviated to the simple non est inventus. 3 Bl. Comm. 283.

BALIVO AMOVENDO (Law Lat. for removing a bailiff). A writ to remove a bailiff out of his office.

BALLAST. Heavy substance carried in the hold of a ship to trim her, and bring her to a safe and proper draft. It differs from "dunnage" (q. v.) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 674.

BALLASTAGE. A toll paid for the privilege of taking up ballast from the bottom of the port. This arises from the property in the soil. 2 Chit. Com. Law, 16.

BALLOT. A paper bearing the names of candidates for designated offices, and delivered by electors to the election officers in expressing their choice for such offices. It is usually printed, and is in various prescribed forms, especially in states which have adopted the Australian ballot system, or modifications of it.

BALNEARII (Lat.) Those who stole the clothes of bathers in the public baths. 4 Bl. Comm. 239; Calv. Lex.

BAN.

——In Old English and Civil Law. A proclamation; a public notice; the announcement of an intended marriage. Cowell. An excommunication; a curse, publicly pronounced; proclamation of silence made by a crier in court before the meeting of champions in combat. Cowell. A statute, edict, or command; a fine, or penalty.

An open field; the outskirts of a village; a territory endowed with certain privileges.

A summons, as, arriere ban. Spelman.

——In French Law. The right of announcing the time of mowing, reaping, and gathering the vintage, exercised by certain seignorial lords. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

BANAL, or BANNAL (Fr.) In old French and Canadian law. Having qualities derived from a ban or privileged space; privileged. A banal mill is one to which the seignior or lord may require his tenant to carry his grain to be ground. Dunkin's Address, 89.

BANALITY. In Canadian law. The right by virtue of which a lord subjects his vassals to grind at his mill, bake at his oven, etc. Used also of the region within which this right applied. Guyot, Rep. Univ. It prevents the erection of a mill within the seignorial limits (1 Low. [U. S.] 31), whether steam or water (3 Low. [U. S.] 1).

BANC (Fr. bench). The seat of judgment; as, banc le roy, the king's bench; banc le common pleas, the bench of common pleas; the full bench.

BANCI NARRATORES. In old English law. Advocates; countors; serjeants. Applied to advocates in the common pleas courts. 1 Bl. Comm. 24; Cowell.

BANCUS (Lat.) A bench; the seat or bench of justice; a stall or table on which goods are exposed for sale. Often used for the court itself.

A full bench, when all the judges are present. Cowell; Spelman.

The English court of common pleas was formerly called "bancus." Viner, Abr. "Courts." See "Bench;" "Common Bench."

BANCUS REGINAE (Law Lat.) The queen's bench.

BANCUS REGIS (Lat.) The king's bench; the supreme tribunal of the king after parliament. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 41.

In banco regis, in or before the court of king's bench.

The king has several times sat in his own person on the bench in this court, and all the proceedings are said to be coram rego ipso, before the king himself. Still, James I. was not allowed to deliver an opinion, although sitting in banco regis. Viner, Abr. "Courts" (H, L); 3 Bl. Comm. 41; Co. Litt. 71 (C).

BANCUS SUPERIOR (Lat.) Abbreviated banc. sup. The upper bench; the king's bench was so called during the Protectorate.

BAND. In old Scotch law. A proclamation calling out a military force. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 205.

BANDIT. A man outlawed; one under ban.

BANE. A malefactor. Bracton, lib. 1, tit. 8, c. 1.

BANI. Forfeited goods; deodand (q. v.)

BANISHMENT. A punishment inflicted upon criminals, by compelling them to quit a city, place, or country for a specified period of time, or for life. See 4 Dall. (Pa.) 14. It is to be distinguished from "transportation," which implies a confinement in some place beyond the realm.

BANK (Anglicised form of bancus, a bench). The bench of justice.

A session in bank is one held by more than one judge of the court to determine matters of law.

Distinguished from nisi prius sittings to determine facts. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 28, note.

Bank le roy, the king's bench. Finch, Law, 198.

——In Commercial Law. A place for the deposit of money.

An institution, generally incorporated, authorized to receive deposits of money, to lend money, and to issue promissory notes, —usually known by the name of "bank notes,"—or to perform some one or more of these functions.

It was the custom of the early money changers to transact their business in public places, at the doors of churches, at markets, and, among the Jews, in the temple (Mark xi. 15). They used tables or benches for their convenience in counting and assorting their coins. The table so used was called banche, and the traders themselves, "bankers," or "benchers." In times still more ancient, their benches were called cambii, and they themselves were called cambiators. Du Cange, "Cambii."

Banks are said to be of three kinds, viz., of deposit, of discount, and of circulation. They generally perform all these operations, but an institution performing but one is a bank. 17 Wall. (U. S.) 118; but see 52 Cal. 196. A corporation loaning its own funds on note and mortgage is not a bank. 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 32.

BANK ACCOUNT. A fund deposited by a customer of a bank into its common cash, to be drawn out by checks from time to time, as the depositor may require.

The statement of the amount deposited and drawn, which is kept in duplicate, one in the depositor's bank book, and the other in the books of the bank.

BANK BILLS. Demand notes of a bank, designed to circulate as money. See 3 Scam. (Ill.) 328.

BANK NOTE. A promissory note, payable on demand to the bearer, and intended to circulate as money, made and issued by a person or persons acting as bankers, and authorized by law to issue such notes.

BANKABLE. Bank notes, checks, and other securities for money which will be received as cash by the banks in the place where the word is used.

BANKEROUT. Old English. Bankrupt.

BANKER'S NOTE. A promissory note given by a private banker or banking institution not incorporate, but resembling a bank note in all other respects. 6 Mod. 29; 3 Chit. Com. Law, 590; 1 Leigh, N. P. 338.

BANKRUPT. A person against whom an involuntary petition or an application to set a composition aside has been filed, or who has filed a voluntary petition, or who has been adjudged a bankrupt. U. S. Bankrupt Act 1898, § 1. Loosely used for "insolvent" (q. v.)

BANKRUPTCY. The state or condition of a bankrupt. See "Insolvency."

BANLEUCA. A certain space surrounding towns or cities, distinguished by peculiar privileges. Spelman. It is the same as the French banlieue.

BANLIEU. In Canadian law. See "Banleuca."

BANNERET, or BANERET. One knighted on the field. So called, according to Wharton, from the formula of cutting off the point of his standard, so as to make it a banner.

BANNI NUPTIARUM (Law Lat.) In old English law. The bans of matrimony. Spelman; Cowell. Bracton uses the singular, bannum. Bracton, fol. 307b. Fleta uses bannus. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 30, § 3. See "Bannum;" "Bannus."

BANNIRE AD PLACITA, AD MOLENdinum. To summon tenants to serve at the lord's courts, to bring corn to be ground at his mill.

BANNITUS. One outlawed or banished. Calv. Lex.

BANNUM. A ban (q. v.)

BANNUS. In old English law. A proclamation. Bannus regis, the king's proclamation, made by the voice of a herald, forbidding all present at the trial by combat to interfere, either by motion or word, whatever they might see or hear. Bracton, fol. 142; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 34, § 1.

The bans of marriage. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 30, § 3.

BANQUE. A bench; the table or counter of a trader, merchant, or banker. Banque route, a broken bench or counter; bankrupt, or, in old English, bankerout.

BANS OF MATRIMONY. Public notice or proclamation of a matrimonial contract, and the intended celebration of the marriage of the parties in pursuance of such contract, to the end that persons objecting to the same may have an opportunity to declare such objections before the marriage is solemnized. Poth. du Mariage, p. 2, c. 2.

BAR.

(1) A particular part of the court room. As thus applied, and secondarily in various ways, it takes its name from the actual bar, or inclosing rail, which originally divided the bench from the rest of the room, as well as from that bar, or rail, which then divided, and now divides, the space including the bench, and the place which lawyers occupy in attending on and conducting trials, from the body of the court room. Those who, as advocates or counsellors, appeared as speakers in court, were said to be "called to the bar," that is, called to appear in presence of the court, as barristers, or persons who stay or attend at the bar of court. Rich. Dict. "Barrister." By a natural transition, a secondary use of the word was applied to the persons who were so called, and the advocates were, as a class, called "the bar." And in this country, since attorneys, as well as counsellors, appear in court to conduct causes, the members of the legal profession, generally, are called the "bar."

(2) The court, in its strictest sense, sitting in full term.

Thus, a civil case of great consequence was not left to be tried at nisi prius, but was tried at the "bar of the court itself," at Westminster. 3 Bl. Comm. 352. So a criminal trial for a capital offense was had "at bar" (4 Bl. Comm, 351), and in this sense the term "at bar" is still used. It is also used in this sense, with a shade of difference (as not distinguishing nisi prius from full term, but as applied to any term of the court), when a person indicted for crime is called "the prisoner at the bar," or is said to stand at the bar to plead to the indictment. See Merlin, Repert. "Barreau;" 1 Dupin, Prof. d'Av. 451.

(3) An obstacle or opposition. Thus, relationship within the prohibited degrees, or the fact that a person is already married, is a bar to marriage.

(4) A perpetual destruction of the action of the plaintiff. 1 Ore. 47.

(5) Bar in the old books is sometimes used for "plea in bar." Co. Litt. 303b.

BAR FEE. In English law. A fee taken by the sheriff, time out of mind, for every prisoner who is acquitted. Bac. Abr. "Extortion."

BARAGARIA (Spanish). A concubine.

BARATRIAM COMMITTIT QUI PROPter pecuniam justitiam baractat. He is guilty of barratry who for money sells justice. Bell, Dict. Barratry at common law has a different signification. See "Barratry."

BARBANUS. In old Lombardic law. An uncle (patruus). Spelman.

BARBICANAGE. Money paid to support a barbican or watch tower.

BARE TRUSTEE. See "Trustee."

BARET (Law Fr.) A wrangling suit. Britt. c. 92; Co. Litt. 368b.

BARGAIN AND SALE. A contract or bargain by the owner of land, in consideration of money or its equivalent paid, to sell land to another person, called the "bargainee," whereupon a use arises in favor of the latter, to whom the seisin is transferred by force of the statute of uses. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 128.

A real contract, whereby a person bargains and sells his lands to another for a pecuniary consideration, in consequence of which a use arises to the bargainee, and by the statute of uses the legal estate and actual possessions are immediately transferred to the cestui que use without any entry or other act on his part, thus dispensing with livery of seisin. Devl. Deeds, § 23.

BARGAINEE. The grantee of an estate in a deed of bargain and sale; the person to whom property is tendered in a bargain.

BARGAINOR. The person who makes a bargain; he who is to deliver the property and receive the consideration.

BARLEYCORN. The third of an inch. Wharton.

BARMOTE COURTS. Courts held in certain mining districts belonging to the Duchy of Lancaster, for regulation of the mines, and for deciding questions of title and other matters relating thereto. 3 Steph. Comm. 347, note (b); St. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 94.

BARNARD'S INN. An inn of chancery. See "Inns of Chancery."

BARO. A man, whether slave or free.

Si quis homicidium perpetraverit in barone libro seu servo, if any one shall have perpetrated a murder upon any man, slave or free. A freeman or freedman; a strong man; a hired soldier; a vassal; a feudal client.

Those who held of the king immediately were called "barons of the king."

A man of dignity and rank; a knight.

A magnate in the church.

A judge in the exchequer (baro scaccarii).

The first-born child.

A husband.

The word is said by Spelman to have been used more frequently in its latter sense.

It is quite easy to trace the history of baro, from meaning simply "man," to its various derived significations. Denoting a man, one who possessed the manly qualities of courage and strength would be desirable as a soldier, or might misuse them as a robber. One who possessed them in an eminent degree would be "the" man; and hence baro, in its sense of a title of dignity or honor, particularly applicable in a warlike age to the best soldier. See, generally, Bac. Abr.; Comyn, Dig.; Spelman.

BARON. A general title of nobility (1 Bl. Comm. 398); a particular title of nobility, next to that of viscount; a judge of the exchequer (Cowell; 1 Bl. Comm. 44).

A husband. In this sense it occurs in the phrase baron et feme, husband and wife (1 Bl. Comm. 432), and this is the only sense in which it is used in the American law, and even in this sense it is now but seldom found.

A freeman. Especially applied to the inhabitants of the Cinque Ports,—Romney, Sandwich, Hastings, Rotherhithe, and Dover, and the two laterly constituted ports of Winchelsea and Rye.

It has essentially the same meanings as baro (q. v.)

BARON ET FEME. Man and woman; husband and wife. It is doubtful if the words had originally in this phrase more meaning than man and woman. The vulgar use of man and woman for husband and wife suggest the change of meaning which might naturally occur from man and woman to husband and wife. Spelman; 1 Bl. Comm. 442.

BARONAGE. The nobility generally; the collective body of barons.

BARONET. An English title of dignity. It is an hereditary dignity, descensible, but not a title of nobility. It is of very early use. Spelman; 1 Bl. Comm. 403.

BARONS OF THE CINQUE PORTS. Members of parliament from these ports; freemen resident in these ports, viz., Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, Hithe, and Dover, Winchelsea, and Rye.

BARONS OF THE EXCHEQUER. The judges of the exchequer. See "Exchequer."

BARONY. The dignity of a baron; a species of tenure; the territory or lands held by a baron. Spelman.

BARONY OF LAND. A quantity of land amounting to fifteen acres. In Ireland, a subdivision of a county.

BARRA, or BARRE. In old practice. A plea in bar. Dyer, 56. The bar of the court; a barrister. Co. Litt. 372a; 1 Ld. Raym. 595.

BARRATOR. One who commits barratry.

BARRATRY (Fr. barat, baraterie, robbery, deceit, fraud).

——In Criminal Law. Common barratry is the offense of frequently exciting and stirring up quarrels and suits, either at law or otherwise. 4 Bl. Comm. 134; Co. Litt. 368. Sometimes called "barretry."

An attorney is not liable to indictment for maintaining another in a groundless action. 1 Bailey (S. C.) 379. See 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 401, 645, 646; 2 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 57-61; Bac. Abr.; 8 Coke, 36b; 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 587; 15 Mass. 229; 11 Pick. (Mass.) 432; 13 Pick. (Mass.) 362.

——In Maritime Law and Insurance. An unlawful or fraudulent act, or very gross and culpable negligence, of the master or mariners of a vessel, in violation of their duty as such, and directly prejudicial to the owner, and without his consent. 1 Phil. Ins. c. 13; Abb. Shipp. 167, note; 2 Caines (N. Y.) 67, 222; 3 Caines (N. Y.) 1; 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 229; 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 40; 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 451; 2 Bin. (Pa.) 274; 8 Cranch (U. S.) 139; 5 Day (Conn.) 1; 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 163; 4 Dall. (U. S.) 294.

——In Scotch Law. The crime of a judge who receives a bribe for his judgment. Skene de Verb. Sign.

BARREN MONEY. A debt which bears no interest.

BARRENNESS. Sterility in a female; the incapacity to produce a child.

BARRISTER. In English law. A counsellor admitted to plead at the bar.

——Inner Barrister. A serjeant or king's counsel who pleads within the bar.

——Ouster Barrister. One who pleads ouster, or without the bar.

——Vacation Barrister. A counsellor newly called to the bar, who is to attend for several long vacations the exercise of the house.

Barristers are called apprentices, apprentitii ad legem, being looked upon as learners, and not qualified until they obtain the degree of serjeant. Edmund Plowden, the author of the Commentaries, a volume of elaborate reports in the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, Philip and Mary, and Elizabeth, describes himself as an apprentice of the common law. See "Attorney."

BARTER. A contract by which parties exchange goods for goods. It differs from a sale in that a barter is always of goods for goods; a sale is of goods for money, or for money and goods. In a sale there is a fixed price; in a barter there is not.

There must be a delivery of goods to complete the contract.

BARTON. In old English law. The demesne land of a manor; a farm distinct from the mansion.

BAS CHEVALIERS. Knights by tenure of a base military fee, as distinguished from bannerets, who were the chief or superior knights. Kennett, Par. Ant.; Blount.

BASE COURT. In English law. Any inferior court that is not of record, as a court baron, etc. Kitch. Cts. 95, 96; Cowell.

BASE ESTATE. The estate which "base tenants" (q. v.) have in their land. Cowell.

BASE FEE. A fee which has a qualification annexed to it, and which must be determined whenever the annexed qualification requires.

A grant to A. and his heirs, tenants of Dale, continues only while they are such tenants. 2 Bl. Comm. 109.

The proprietor of such a fee has all the rights of the owner of a fee simple until his estate is determined. Plowd. 557; 1 Washb. Real. Prop. 62; 1 Prest. Est. 431; Co. Litt. 1b.

BASE INFEFTMENT (Scotch). A disposition of land by a vassal, to be held of himself.

BASE RIGHT. In Scotch law. A subordinate right; the right of a subvassal in the lands held by him. Bell, Dict.

BASE SERVICES. Such services as were unworthy to be performed by the nobler men, and were performed by the peasants and those of servile rank. 2 Bl. Comm. 62; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 25.

BASE TENANTS.

(1) Tenants who held their lands at the will of their superior lord, as distinguished from "frank tenants" (q. v.), who were freeholders.

(2) Tenants who rendered to their lords services in villeinage. Cowell.

BASE TENURE. A tenure by villeinage, or other customary service, as distinguished from tenure by military service, or from tenure by free service. Cowell.

BASILEUS. The title of the Emperor Justinian in Novs. 2. 3. 4. 6. et seq., and sometimes applied to the king of England, in charters prior to the Norman conquest. 1 Bl. Comm. 242.

BASILICA. An abridgment of the Corpus Juris Civilis of Justinian, translated into Greek, and first published in the ninth century.

BASILS (Lat. basilli). In old English law. A kind of money or coin abolished by Henry II. Spelman; Cowell.

BASKET TENURE. Lands held by the service of making the king's baskets.

BASSE JUSTICE. In feudal law. Low justice; the right of a feudal lord to try persons accused of petty offenses or trespasses.

BASTARD (bas or bast, abject, low, base; aerd, nature).

One born of an illicit connection. It includes children begotten and born out of lawful wedlock, whose parents do not subsequently marry, and children born in wedlock, but begotten of an adulterous intercourse.

A child begotten out of wedlock, but whose parents marry before its birth, is legitimate (62 Iowa, 343; 43 Ohio St. 473; 75 Pa. St. 433), and, by the weight of authority, a marriage after the birth renders the child legitimate (9 Ala. 965; 85 Ind. 357; 38 Ky. 170; 20 Tex. 731).

The child of a voidable marriage is legitimate (13 Iowa, 198), but, at common law, the issue of a void marriage is a bastard (22 Md. 468; 1 N. J. Eq. 96); but by statute in many states, such issue is made legitimate if the marriage was in good faith.

BASTARD EIGNE. Bastard elder.

By the old English law, when a man had a bastard son, and he afterwards married the mother, and by her had a legitimate son, the first was called a bastard eigne, or, as it is now spelled, aine, and the second son was called puisne, or since born, or sometimes he was called mulier puisne. See 2 Bl. Comm. 248.

BASTARDA. A female bastard. Calv. Lex.

BASTARDUS NON POTEST HABERE haeredem nisi de corpore suo legitime procreatum. A bastard can have no heir unless it be one lawfully begotten of his own body. Tray. Lat. Max. 51.

BASTARDUS NULLIUS EST FILIUS, aut filius populi. A bastard is nobody's son, or the son of the people.

BASTARDY. The offense of begetting a bastard child; the condition of a bastard.

BASTARDY PROCESS (or PROCEEDings). The statutory mode of proceeding against the putative father of a bastard to secure a proper maintenance for the bastard.

BASTON. In old English law. A staff or club.

In some old English statutes, the servants or officers of the wardens of the fleet are so called, because they attended the king's courts with a red staff.

BATABLE GROUND. Land that is in controversy, or about the possession of which there is a dispute, as the lands which were situated between England and Scotland before the union. Skene de Verb. Sign.

BATAILLE. In old English law. Battel; the trial by combat or duellum. Britt. c 25; Y. B. M. 4 Edw. III. 12.

BATH, KNIGHTS OF THE. In English law. A military order of knighthood, instituted by Richard II. The order was newly regulated by notifications in the London Gazette of 25th May, 1847, and 16th August, 1850. Wharton.

BATIMENT. In French marine law. A vessel. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 14, art. 2.

BATTEL. Trial by combat.

It was called also "wager of battel" or "battaile," and could be claimed in appeals of felony. It was of frequent use in affairs of chivalry and honor, and in civil cases upon certain issues. Co. Litt. § 294. It was not abolished in England till the enactment of St. 59 Geo. III. c. 46. See 1 Barn. & Ald. 405; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 339; 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 347. See "Appeal." This mode of trial was not peculiar to England. The emperor Otho, A. D. 983, held a diet at Verona, at which several sovereigns and great lords of Italy, Germany, and France were present. In order to put a stop to the frequent perjuries in judicial trials, this diet substituted in all cases, even in those which followed the course of the Roman law, proof by combat for proof by oath. Henrion de Pansey, Auth. Judic. Introd. c. 3. And for a detailed account of this mode of trial, see Herbert, Inns of Court, 119-145.

BATTERY. Any unlawful beating, or other wrongful physical violence or constraint, inflicted on a human being without his consent. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 62; 17 Ala. 540; 9 N. H. 491. It includes every touching of another in a rude, angry, or hostile manner. 65 Ala. 520; 53 Ill. 111; 67 Ind. 304.

BATTURE (Fr. shoals, shallows). An elevation of the bed of a river under the surface of the water; but it is sometimes used to signify the same elevation when it has risen above the surface. 6 Mart. (La.) 19, 216.

The term "battures" is applied principally to certain portions of the bed of the river Mississippi, which are left dry when the water is low, and are covered again, either in whole or in part, by the annual swells.

BAWD. A procurer; one who procures for other persons opportunities for illicit cohabitation. 4 Mo. 216.

BAWDY HOUSE. A house of ill fame, kept for the resort and unlawful commerce of lewd people of both sexes.

BAY. An inclosure, or other contrivance, to keep in the water for the supply of a mill, so that the water may be able to drive the wheels of such mill. St. 27 Eliz. c. 19.

BAYLEY. In old English law. Bailiff. This term is used in the laws of the colony of New Plymouth, Mass., A. D. 1670, 1671.

BAYOU. A stream which is the outlet of a swamp near the sea. Applied to the creeks in the lowlands lying on the Gulf of Mexico.

BEACONAGE. Money paid for the maintenance of a beacon. Comyn, Dig. "Navigation" (H).

BEADLE (Saxon, beodan, to bid). A church servant chosen by the vestry, whose business it is to attend the vestry, to give notice of its meetings, to execute its orders, to attend upon inquests, and to assist the constables.

BEARER. One who bears or carries a thing.

If a bill or note be made payable to bearer, it will pass by delivery only, without indorsement, and whoever fairly acquires a right to it may maintain an action against the drawer or acceptor.

BEARERS. Such as bear down or oppress others; maintainers.

BEARING DATE. Words frequently used in pleading and conveyancing to introduce the date which has been put upon an instrument.

When, in a declaration, the plaintiff alleges that the defendant made his promissory note on such a day, he will not be considered as having alleged that it bore date on that day, so as to cause a variance between the declaration and the note produced bearing a different date. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 160; 2 Dowl. & L. 759.

BEASTS. Four-footed animals. They were anciently divided into "beasts of the plow," —those used in husbandry; "beasts of the chase,"—the buck, doe, fox, marten, and roe; "beasts of the forest,"—the hart, hind, hare, boar, and wolf; and "beasts of the warren,"—the hare and coney. 2 Bl. Comm. 39; Co. Litt. 233.

BEASTGATE. In Suffolk, England, imports land and common for one beast. 2 Strange, 1084; Rosc. Real Actions, 485.

BEAT. See "Assault."

BEAUPLEADER (Law Fr. fair pleading). A writ of prohibition directed to the sheriff or other, directing him not to take a fine for beaupleader.

There was anciently a fine imposed called a "fine for beaupleader," which is explained by Coke to have been originally imposed for bad pleading. Coke, 2d Inst. 123. It was set at the will of the judge of the court, and reduced to certainty by consent, and annually paid. Comyn, Dig. "Prerogative" (D 52). St. Marlebridge (52 Hen. III.) c. 11, enacts that neither in the circuit of justices, nor in counties, hundreds, or courts baron, any fines shall be taken for fair pleading, namely, for not pleading fairly or aptly to the purpose. Upon this statute, this writ was ordained, directed to the sheriff, bailiff, or him who shall demand the fine, and it is a prohibition or command not to do it. New Nat. Brev. 596; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 270a; Hall, Hist. Com. Law, c. 7. Mr. Reeve explains it as a fine paid for the privilege of a fair hearing. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 70. This latter view would perhaps derive some confirmation from the connection in point of time of this statute with Magna Charta, and the resemblance which the custom bore to the other customs against which the clause in the charter of nulli vendemus, etc., was directed. See Comyn, Dig. "Prerogative" (D 51, 52); Cowell; 2 Inst. 122, 123; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 150.

BED OF JUSTICE (Fr.) The seat or throne upon which the king sat when personally present in parliament; hence it signified the parliament itself.

BEDEL. In English law. A crier or messenger of court, who summons men to appear and answer therein. Cowell. An inferior officer in a parish or liberty. See "Beadle."

BEDELARY. The jurisdiction of a bedel, as a bailiwick is the jurisdiction of a bailiff. Co. Litt. 234b; Cowell.

BEDEREPE. A service which certain tenants were anciently bound to perform, as to reap their landlord's corn at harvest. Said by Whishaw to be still in existence in some parts of England. Blount; Cowell; Whishaw.

BEGGAR. One who obtains his livelihood by asking alms. The laws of several of the states punish begging as an offense. Words of solicitation are not necessary, but the solicitation may be by attitude or gesture. 3 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 65.

BEHAVIOR. Manner of having, holding, or keeping one's self; carriage of one's self, with respect to propriety, morals, and the requirements of law. Surety to be of good behavior is a larger requirement than surety to keep the peace. Dalton, c. 122; 4 Burns, Just. 355.

A "breach of good behavior," for which an official can be removed, is not confined to misbehavior in office. 2 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 700.

BEHETRIA (Arabic, without nobility or lordship). In Spanish law. Lands situated in districts and manors in which the inhabitants had the right to select their own lords.

Behetrias were of two kinds: Behetrias de entre parientes, when the choice was restricted to a relation of the deceased lord, and behetrias de mar a mar, when the choice was unrestricted.

The lord, when elected, enjoyed various privileges, called yantar, conducho, martiniego, marzadga, infurcion, etc. These contributions were intended for his maintenance, the construction of his dwelling, the support of his family and his followers, etc. Escriche, Dic. Raz.; Sempere y Guarinos, Vinculos y Mayarazgos, p. 67, note. See, also, on this subject, Fuero Viejo de Castilla, bk. 1, tit. 8; Las Partidas, tit. 25, p. 4; El Ordenamiento de Acala in different laws in title 32. See, likewise, book 6, tit. 1, of the Novisima Recopilacion.

BEHOFF (Saxon). Use; service; profit; advantage. It occurs in conveyances.

BELIEF. Conviction of the mind, arising not from actual perception or knowledge, but by way of inference, or from evidence received or information derived from others. It differs from "knowledge" only in degree. 9 Gray (Mass.) 274. It is said to be a stronger word than "imagination" (4 Ga. 37), or suspicion (5 Cush. [Mass.] 374), but has been held to be substantially synonymous with "supposition" (102 Ill. 277).

Belief may evidently be stronger or weaker, according to the weight of evidence adduced in favor of the proposition to which belief is granted or refused, and so "firm belief" in a statute means more than "belief." 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 137; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 7-13. See 1 Starkie, Ev. 41; 2 W. Bl. 881; 8 Watts (Pa.) 406.

BELLIGERENT. Actually at war. Applied to nations. Wheat. Int. Law, 380 et seq.; 1 Kent, Comm. 89.

BELLO PARTA CEDUNT REIPUBLICAE. Things acquired in war go to the state. Cited 2 Russ. & M. 56; 1 Kent, Comm. 101; 5 C. Rob. Adm. 155, 163; 1 Gall. (U. S.) 558.

BELOW. Inferior; preliminary. The court below is the court from which a cause has been removed. See "Bail."

BENCH. A tribunal for the administration of justice.

The judges taken collectively, as distinguished from counsellors and advocates, who are called the "bar."

The term, indicating originally the seat of the judges, came to denote the body of judges taken collectively, and also the tribunal itself. The jus banci, says Spelman, properly belongs to the king's judges, who administer justice in the last resort. The judges of the inferior courts, as of the barons, are deemed to judge plano pede, and are such as are called in the civil law pedanei judices. The Romans used the words sellae and tribunalia to designate the seats of their higher judges, and subsellia to designate those of the lower. See Spelman, "Bancus;" 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law (4th Ed.) 40.

"The court of common pleas in England was formerly called bancus, the bench, as distinguished from bancus regis, the king's bench. It was also called communis bancus, the common bench; and this title is still retained by the reporters of the decisions in the court of common pleas. Mention is made in the Magna Charta 'de justiciariis nostris de banco,' which all men know to be the justices of the court of common pleas, commonly called the common bench, or the bench." Viner, Abr. "Courts," note 2.

BENCH WARRANT. An order issued by or from a bench, for the attachment or arrest of a person. It may issue either in case of a contempt, or where an indictment has been found. It is so called because issued by order of a court or bench, as distinguished from warrant issued by a magistrate.

BENCHER. A senior in the Inns of Court, intrusted with their government or direction.

The benchers have the absolute and irresponsible power of punishing a barrister guilty of misconduct, by either admonishing or rebuking him, by prohibiting him from dining in the hall, or even by expelling him from the bar, called "disbarring." They might also refuse admission to a student, or reject his call to the bar. Wharton.

BENE (Lat.) In old English law. Well; sufficiently; in due form; safely. Bene et in pace, well and in peace, Magna Cart. Johan. c. 63. See "Biens."

BENEDICTA EST EXPOSITIO QUANDO res redimitur a destructione. Blessed is the exposition when the thing is saved from destruction. 4 Coke, 26.

BENEFICE. An ecclesiastical preferment. In its more extended sense, it includes any such preferment; in a more limited sense, it applies to rectories and vicarages only. See "Beneficium."

BENEFICE DE DISCUSSION. Benefit of discussion (q. v.)

BENEFICE DE DIVISION. In French law. The right of contribution between sureties.

BENEFICE D'INVENTAIRE. This, in French, corresponds to the beneficium inventarii of Roman law, and substantially to the English-law doctrine that the executor properly accounting is only liable to the extent of the assets received by him. Brown.

BENEFICIAL ENJOYMENT. The enjoyment of an estate in one's own right, and for his own benefit, and not as trustee for another. 3 Hurl. & C. 1030.

BENEFICIAL INTEREST. Profit, benefit, or advantage resulting from a contract, or the ownership of an estate, as distinct from the legal ownership or control.

A cestui que trust has the beneficial interest in a trust estate, while the trustee has the legal estate. If A. makes a contract with B. to pay C. a sum of money, C. has the beneficial interest in the contract.

BENEFICIAL POWER. "A power is beneficial when no person other than the grantee has, by the terms of its creation, any interest in its execution." Rev. St. N. Y. § 79.

A power is beneficial if, by the terms of its creation, no interest in its execution is given to a person other than the grantee, though no such interest is especially given to the grantee. 73 N. Y. 234.

BENEFICIARY. A term suggested by Judge Story as a substitute for cestui que trust (q. v.) (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 321), and to some extent adopted.

BENEFICIO PRIMO (more fully, beneficio primo ecclesiastico habendo). A writ directed from the king to the chancellor, commanding him to bestow the benefice which shall first fall in the king's gift, above or under a certain value, upon a particular and certain person. Reg. Orig. 307.

BENEFICIUM (Lat. beneficere). A portion of land or other immovable thing granted by a lord to his followers for their stipend or maintenance.

A general term applied to ecclesiastical livings. 4 Bl. Comm. 107; Cowell.

In the early feudal times, grants were made to continue only during the pleasure of the grantor, which were called munera, but soon afterwards these grants were made for life, and then they assumed the name of beneficia. Dalr. Feud. Prop. 199. Pomponius Laetus, as cited by Hotoman (De Feudis, c. 2), says "that it was an ancient custom, revived by the Emperor Constantine, to give lands and villas to those generals, prefects, and tribunes who had grown old in enlarging the empire, to supply their necessities as long as they lived, which they called 'parochial,'—parishes, etc. But between fiefs or feuds (feuda) and parishes (parochias) there was this difference, that the latter were given to old men, veterans, etc., who, as they deserved well of the republic, were sustained the rest of their life (publico beneficio) by the public benefaction; or, if any war afterwards arose, they were called out not so much as soldiers as leaders (magistri militum). Feuds (feuda), on the other hand, were usually given to robust young men who could sustain the labors of war. In later times, the word parochia was appropriated exclusively to ecclesiastical persons, while the word beneficium (militare) continued to be used in reference to military fiefs or fees."

——In Civil Law. Any favor or privilege.

BENEFICIUM ABSTINENDI. In Roman law. The power of an heir to abstain from accepting the inheritance. Sandars, Just. Inst. (5th Ed.) 214; Cum. Com. Law, 156.

BENEFICIUM CEDENDARUM ACTIONum. The privilege by which a surety could, before paying the creditor, compel him to make over to him the actions which belonged to the stipulator, so as to avail himself of them. Sandars, Just. Inst. (5th Ed.) 332, 351.

BENEFICIUM CLERICALE. Benefit of clergy (q. v.)

BENEFICIUM COMPETENTIAE.

——In Scotch Law. The privilege of retaining a competence belonging to the obligor in a gratuitous obligation. Such a claim constitutes a good defense in part to an action on the bond. Paterson, Comp.

——In Civil Law. The right which an insolvent debtor had, among the Romans, on making cession of his property for the benefit of his creditors, to retain what was required for him to live honestly according to his condition. 7 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 258.

BENEFICIUM DIVISIONIS. In Scotch and civil law. A privilege whereby a cosurety may insist upon paying only his share of the debt along with the other sureties. In Scotch law this is lost if the cautioners (sureties) bind themselves "conjunctly and severally." Ersk. Inst. lib. 3. tit. 3, § 63.

BENEFICIUM INVENTARII. Benefit of inventory (q. v.)

BENEFICIUM NON DATUM NISI PROPter officium. A remuneration not given unless on account of a duty performed. Hob. 148.

BENEFICIUM ORDINIS. In Scotch and civil law. The privilege of the surety allowing him to require that the creditor shall take complete legal proceedings against the debtor to exhaust him before he calls upon the surety. 1 Bell, Comm. 347.

BENEFICIUM SEPARATIONIS. In the civil law. The right to have the goods of an heir separated from those of the testator in favor of creditors.

BENEFIT OF CESSION. In civil law. The release of a debtor from future imprisonment for his debts, which the law operates in his favor upon the surrender of his property for the benefit of his creditors. Pothier, Proced. Civ. 5eme part. c. 2, § 1. This was something like a discharge under the insolvent laws, which releases the person of the debtor, but not the goods he may acquire afterwards. See "Bankrupt;" "Cessio Bonorum;" "Insolvent."

BENEFIT OF CLERGY. In English law. An exemption of the punishment of death, which the laws impose on the commission of certain crimes, on the culprit demanding it. By modern statutes, benefit of clergy was rather a substitution of a more mild punishment for the punishment of death.

A clergyman was exempt from capital punishment toties quoties, as often as, from acquired habit, or otherwise, he repeated the same species of offense. The laity, provided they could read, were exempted only for a first offense; for a second, though of an entirely different nature, they were hanged. Among the laity, however, there was this distinction: Peers and peeresses were discharged for their first fault without reading, or any punishment at all; commoners, if of the male sex, and readers, were branded in the hand. Women commoners had no benefit of clergy.

Benefit of clergy was latterly granted, not only to the clergy, as was formerly the case, but to all persons. The benefit of clergy seems never to have been extended to the crime of high treason, nor to have embraced misdemeanors inferior to felony. See 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 667, 668; 4 Bl. Comm. c. 28; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 622-624. But this privilege, improperly given to the clergy, because they had more learning than others, was abolished by St. 7 Geo. IV. c. 28, § 6.

By the act of congress of April 30, 1790, it is provided (section 30) that the benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed upon conviction of any crime for which, by any statute of the United States, the punishment is, or shall be declared to be, death.

In some early state decisions, the right was recognized in the United States (1 Murph. [N. C.] 147; 4 Strobh. [S. C.] 372), while in others it is held to be obsolete (1 Blackf. [Ind.] 66; 3 Minn. 246).

BENEFIT OF DISCUSSION. In civil law. The right which a surety has to cause the property of the principal debtor to be applied in satisfaction of the obligation in the first instance. Civ. Code La. arts. 3014-3020.

BENEFIT OF DIVISION. In civil law. The right of one of several joint sureties, when sued alone, to have the whole obligation apportioned amongst the solvent sureties, so that he need pay but his share. Civ. Code La. arts. 3014-3020. See 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1414.

BENEFIT OF INVENTORY. In civil law. The privilege which the heir obtains of being liable for the charges and debts of the succession, only to the value of the effects of the succession, by causing an inventory of these effects within the time and manner prescribed by law. Civ. Code La. art. 1025; Poth. des Success. c. 3, § 3a. 2. See, also, Paterson, Comp., as to the Scotch law upon this subject.

BENERTH. A feudal service rendered by the tenant to his lord with plow and cart. Cowell; Spelman.

BENEVOLENCE. Good will; kindness; humanity. It is a broader word than "charity." 19 N. J. Eq. 307; 44 Conn. 60; 11 Mass. 267.

——In Old English Law. A voluntary gratuity given by the subjects to the king. Cowell. Benevolences were first granted to Edward IV.; but under subsequent monarchs they became anything but voluntary gifts, and in the Petition of Rights (3 Car. I.) it is made an article that no benevolence shall be extorted without the consent of parliament. The illegal claim and collection of these benevolences was one of the prominently alleged causes of the rebellion of 1640. 1 Bl. Comm. 140; 4 Bl. Comm. 436; Cowell.

BENEVOLENT. A term of wider and more indefinite meaning than "charitable," and generally held too indefinite to uphold a bequest for such purposes. 19 N. J. Eq. 307; 5 Beav. 300; 107 U. S. 184.

BENIGNAE FACIENDAE SUNT INTERpretationes chartarum, ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Constructions of documents are to be made favorably, that the instrument may rather avail than perish.

BENIGNE FACIENDAE SUNT INTERpretationes chartarum, ut res magis valeat quam pereat, et quaelibet concessio fortissime contra donatorem interpretanda est. Liberal interpretations are to be made of deeds, so that more may stand than fall, and every grant is to be taken most strongly against the grantor. 4 Mass. 134; 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 258, 268; compare 275, 277.

BENIGNE FACIENDAE SUNT INTERpretationes propter simplicitatem laicorum, ut res magis valeat quam pereat; et verba intentione, non e contra, debent inservire. Constructions should be liberal, on account of the ignorance of the laity, or nonprofessional persons, so that the subject-matter may avail rather than perish; and words must be subject to the intention, not the intention to the words. Co. Litt. 36a; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 481, 5^4; 11 Q. B. 852, 856, 868, 870; 4 H. L. Cas. 556; 1 Bulst. 175; Hob. 304.

BENIGNIOR SENTENTIA, IN VERBIS generalibus seu dubiis, est preferanda. The more favorable construction is to be placed on general or doubtful expressions. 4 Coke, 15; Dig. 50. 17. 192. 1; 2 Kent, Comm. 557.

BENIGNIUS LEGES INTERPRETANdae sunt quo voluntas earum conservetur. Laws are to be more favorably interpreted, that their intent may be preserved. Dig. 1. 3. 16.

BEQUEATH. To give personal property by will to another. 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 106. The word may be construed "devise," so as to pass real estate. 36 Me. 216; 119 Mass. 525.

BEQUEST. A gift by will of personal property. It is synonymous with "legacy" (q. v.)

BERCARIA. A sheep fold; a tan house or heath house, where barks or rinds of trees are laid to tan. Domesday Book; Co. Litt. 56.

BERCARIUS, or BERCATOR. A shepherd.

BEREWICA, BEREWICHA, BEREWICHus, berewita, or berwita (Law Lat.) In old English law. A manor, or rather a part of a manor, separated from the main body; a smaller manor, belonging to a larger one (manerium minus ad majus pertinens). Spelman.

A hamlet, or small village, appurtenant to some town or manor (villula, manerii vicus). Spelman; Blount, voc. "Berwica." A word of frequent occurrence in Domesday Book. Id. According to Lord Coke, it signifies a town. Co. Litt. 116a.

A corn farm. Spelman.

BERGHMAYSTER (from Saxon berg, a mountain). An officer having charge of a mine. A bailiff or chief officer among the Derbyshire miners, who, in addition to his other duties, executes the office of coroner among them. Blount; Cowell.

BERGHMOTE, or BERGMOTH. In old English law. A court for deciding controversies among the Derbyshire miners. Blount; Cowell.

BERNET. In Saxon law. Burning; the crime of house burning, now called "arson." Cowell; Blount.

BERRA (Law Lat.) In old law. A plain; open heath. Cowell; Spelman.

BERRY, or BURY (from Saxon beorg, a hill or castle). A villa or seat of habitation of a nobleman; a dwelling or mansion house; a sanctuary.

BERTON. A large farm; the barnyard of a large farm.

BES (Lat.; pl. besses). In the Roman law. A division of the as, or pound, consisting of eight unciae, or duodecimal parts, and amounting to two-thirds of the as. 2 Bl. Comm, 462, note (m).

Two-thirds of an inheritance. Inst. 2. 14. 5.

Eight per cent. interest. 2 Bl. Comm. ubi supra.

BESAYLE, BESAYEL, BESAILE, or BEsaiel (Law Fr.) In old English law. A great-grandfather. 1 Bl. Comm. 186.

A writ (law Lat. brev de proavo) which lay where a great-grandfather died seised of lands and tenements in fee simple, and on the day of his death a stranger abated, or entered and kept out the heir. Reg. Orig. 226; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 221 (D); 3 Bl. Comm. 186. Now abolished with other real actions.

BEST EVIDENCE. The best evidence of which the nature of the case admits, not the highest or strongest evidence which the nature of the thing to be proved admits of; e. g., a copy of a deed is not the best evidence; the deed itself is better. Gilb. Ev. 15; Starkie, Ev. 437; 2 Campb. 605; 3 Campb. 236; 1 Esp. 127; 1 Pet. (U. S.) 591; 6 Pet. (U. S.) 352; 7 Pet. (U. S.) 100. The term is confined to cases where the law has divided evidence into primary and secondary. 33 Mich. 53. The rule requiring the best evidence does not exclude a witness on the ground that another is more credible, but merely excludes such evidence as is substitutionary in its character, if the original evidence can be had. 65 Me. 467.

BESTIALITY. Carnal connection between a human being and a beast. 10 Ind. 356. See "Buggery."

BET. An agreement that some valuable thing or sum of money, in contributing which all the parties take part, shall become the property of some one or more of them on the happening of some event which is at present uncertain. 81 N. Y. 539. See, also, 7 Port. (Ala.) 465. "If one of the parties may gain, but cannot lose, and the other may lose, but cannot gain, and there must be either a gain by the one, or a loss by the other, according to the happening of the contingency, it is as much a bet or wager as if the parties had shared equally the chances of gain or loss." 15 Grat. (Va.) 661.

The words "bet" and "wager" are synonymous. 11 Ind. 16.

BETROTHMENT, or BETROTHAL. A contract between a man and a woman that at a future time they will intermarry.

BETTER EQUITY. The right which, in a court of equity, a second incumbrancer has who has taken securities against subsequent dealings to his prejudice, which a prior incumbrancer neglected to take, although he had an opportunity. 1 Chanc. Prec. 470, note; 4 Rawle (Pa.) 144. See 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2462.

BETTERMENTS. Improvements made to an estate. It signifies such improvements as have been made to the estate which render it better than mere repairs. 11 Me. 482; 23 Me. 110; 24 Me. 192; 13 Ohio, 308; 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 477; 13 Vt. 533; 17 Vt. 109. The term is also applied to denote the additional value which an estate acquires in consequence of some public improvement, as laying out or widening a street, etc.

BEWARED (Old English). Expended. Before the Britons and Saxons had introduced the general use of money, they traded chiefly by exchange of wares. Wharton.

BEYOND SEA. Out of the kingdom of England; out of the state; out of the United States.

——In England. By St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, no island under the English dominion, and lying adjacent to the United Kingdom, is to be regarded as "beyond the seas."

——In the United States. It is commonly held to mean outside the state in whose statute it is used (13 N. H. 86; 1 Har. & J. [Md.] 353; 26 Ga. 182; 8 Blackf. [Ind.] 515; 23 Ala. 486; 14 Pet. [U. S.] 145); but it has been held to mean outside the limits of the United States (71 N. C. 176; 24 Ill. 159; 14 Mo. 433; 9 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 291).

BI-SCOT. In old English law. A fine imposed for not repairing banks, ditches, and causeways. Blount; Whishaw.

BIAS. A particular influential power which sways the judgment; the inclination or propensity of the mind towards a particular object. "Bias is not synonymous with 'prejudice.' A man cannot be prejudiced against another without being biased, but he may be biased without being prejudiced." 12 Ga. 444.

BID.

(1) An offer to pay a specified price for an article about to be sold at auction.

(2) An offer to do work or furnish materials for some public or municipal body at a specified price.

BIDALE, or BIDALL. An invitation of friends to drink ale at the house of some poor man, who thereby hopes charitable contribution for his relief. Something like this seems to be what we call "house-warming," when persons are invited in this manner on their first beginning housekeeping. Jacob.

BIDDER. One who offers to purchase an article offered for sale at a public auction (11 Ill. 254), or to furnish materials or services at a price submitted.

BIELBRIEF (Ger.)

——In European Maritime Law. A document furnished by the builder of a vessel, containing a register of her admeasurement, particularizing the length, breadth, and dimensions of every part of the ship. It sometimes also contains the terms of agreement between the parties for whose account the ship is built, and the shipbuilder. It has been termed in English the "grand bill of sale;" in French, "contrat de construction ou de la vente d'un vaisseau," and corresponds in a great degree with the English, French, and American "register" (q. v.), being an equally essential document to the lawful ownership of vessels. Jac. Sea Laws, 12, 13, and note.

——In the Danish Law. Used to denote the contract of bottomry.

BIENS (Fr. goods). Property of every description, except estates of freehold and inheritance. Sugd. Vend. 495; Co. Litt. 118b; Dane, Abr.

——In French Law. This term includes all kinds of property, real and personal. Biens are divided into biens meubles, movable property, and biens immeubles, immovable property. This distinction between movable and immovable property is recognized by them, and gives rise, in the civil as well as in the common law, to many important distinctions as to rights and remedies. Story, Confl. Laws, § 13, note 1.

BIGA, or BIGATA. A cart or chariot drawn with two horses, coupled side by side; but it is said to be properly a cart with two wheels, sometimes drawn by one horse, and in the ancient records it is used for any cart, wain, or wagon. Jacob.

BIGAMUS. In civil law. One who had been twice married, whether both wives were alive at the same time or not; one who had married a widow.

Especially used in ecclesiastical matters as a reason for denying benefit of the clergy. Termes de la Ley.

BIGAMY.

——At Common Law. The willfully contracting a second marriage when the contracting party knows that the first is still subsisting.

The state of a man who has two wives, or of a woman who has two husbands, living at the same time.

When the man has more than two wives, or the woman more than two husbands, living at the same time, then the party is said to have committed polygamy; but the name of "bigamy" is more frequently given to this offense in legal proceedings. 1 Russ. Crimes, 187; Clark & Marshall, Crimes, 1103. "But as the substance of the offense is marrying a second time while having a lawful husband or wife living, without regard to the number of marriages that may have taken place, 'bigamy' seems not an inappropriate term. The objection to its use urged by Blackstone (4 Bl. Comm. 163) seems to be founded not so much upon considerations of the etymology of the word, as upon the propriety of distinguishing the ecclesiastical offense, termed 'bigamy' in the canon law, and defined below, from the offense known as 'bigamy' in the modern criminal law. The same distinction is carefully made by Lord Coke. 4 Inst. 88. But the ecclesiastical offense being now obsolete, this reason ceases to have weight." Abbott.

——In the Canon Law. According to canonists, bigamy is threefold, viz., vera interpretativa, et similitudinaria, real, interpretative, and similitudinary. The first consisted in marrying two wives successively (virgins they may be), or in once marrying a widow; the second consisted, not in a repeated marriage, but in marrying (e. g., meretricem vel ab alio corruptam) a harlot; the third arose from two marriages, indeed, but the one metaphorical or spiritual, the other carnal. This last was confined to persons initiated in sacred orders, or under the vow of continence. Deferriere's Tract. Juris Canon. tit. 21. See, also, Bac. Abr. "Marriage."

BILAGINES (Lat.) By-laws of towns; municipal laws.

BILAN. A book in which bankers, merchants, and traders write a statement of all they owe and all that is due to them. A balance sheet. 3 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 446.

The term is used in Louisiana, and is derived from the French. 5 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 158.

BILANCIIS DEFERENDIS. In English law. A writ addressed to a corporation for the carrying of weights to such a haven, there to weigh the wool that persons, by our ancient laws, were licensed to transport. Reg. Orig. 270.

BILATERAL CONTRACT. A contract in which both the contracting parties are bound to fulfill obligations reciprocally towards each other. Lec. Elm. § 781. See "Contract."

BILINE. Collateral.

BILINGUIS. Using two languages. A term formerly applied to juries half of one nation and half of another. Plowd. 2.

BILL (Lat. billa). A formal written statement, account, or declaration.

The principal legal significations of the term are:

——In Old English Practice. The original petition by which an action in the court of king's bench was begun. 3 Bl. Comm. 43.

——In Chancery Practice. A complaint in writing, addressed to the chancellor, containing the names of the parties to the suit, both complainant and defendant, a statement of the facts on which the complainant relies, and the allegations which he makes, with an averment that the acts complained of are contrary to equity, and a prayer for relief and proper process.

——In Legislation. A special act passed by the legislature in the exercise of a quasi judicial power. Thus, bills of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, are spoken of.

The draft of a law submitted to the consideration of a legislative body for its adoption. 26 Pa. St. 450. After a bill has been adopted, it is properly known as an "act."

——In Mercantile Law. The creditor's written statement of his claim, specifying the items. It differs from an account stated in this, that a bill is the creditor's statement, and an account stated is a statement which has been assented to by both parties.

The term is also sometimes used for "bill of exchange," "bill of exceptions," "bill of costs," etc. (q. v.)

BILL CHAMBER. In Scotch law. A department of the court of session, in which petitions for suspension, interdict, etc., are entertained. It is equivalent to sittings in chambers in the English and American practice. Paterson, Comp.

BILL FOR A NEW TRIAL. In equity practice. One filed in a court of equity praying for an injunction after a judgment at law when there is any fact which renders it against conscience to execute such judgment, and of which the injured party could not avail himself in a court of law, or, if he could, was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence of himself or his agents. Mitf. Eq. Pl. (Jeremy Ed.) 131; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 887. Of late years, bills of this description are not countenanced. 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 432; 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 479.

BILL FOR FORECLOSURE. In equity practice. One which is filed by a mortgagee against the mortgagor, for the purpose of having the estate sold, thereby to obtain the sum mortgaged on the premises, with interest and costs. 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 528. See "Foreclosure."

BILL IMPEACHING A DECREE FOR fraud. In equity practice. This must be an original bill, which may be filed without leave of court. 1 Schoales & L. 355; , 2 Schoales & L. 576; 1 Ves. Jr. 120; 3 Brown, 74; 1 Turn. & R. 178.

BILL IN NATURE OF A BILL IN REview. One which is brought by a person not bound by a decree, praying that the same may be examined and reversed; as where a decree is made against a person who has no interest at all in the matter in dispute, or had not an interest sufficient to render the decree against him binding upon some person claiming after him.

The term is used in two senses: (1) A bill brought by one not a party to a decree, to obtain the reversal thereof. Adam, Eq. 419. (2) A bill to set aside a decree on the ground of fraud. 48 Mich. 375.

BILL IN NATURE OF A BILL OF REvivor. One which is filed when the death of a party, whose interest is not determined by his death, is attended with such a transmission of his interest that the title to it, as well as the person entitled, may be litigated in the court of chancery; as, in the case of a devise of real estate, the suit is not permitted to be continued by bill of revivor. In such cases, an original bill, upon which the title may be litigated, must be filed, and this bill will have so far the effect of a bill of revivor that, if the title of the representative by the act of the deceased party is established, the same benefit may be had of the proceedings upon the former bill as if the suit had been continued by bill of revivor. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 378-380; 2 Paige (N. Y.) 358; 3 Atk. 217.

BILL IN NATURE OF A SUPPLEMENTAL bill. One which is filed when the interest of the plaintiff or defendant, suing or defending, wholly determines, and the same property becomes vested in another person not claiming under him. The principal difference between this and a supplemental bill seems to be that a supplemental bill is applicable to such cases only where the same parties or the same interests remain before the court; whereas an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill is properly applicable where new parties, with new interests, arising from events occurring since the institution of the suit, are brought before the court. Story, Eq. Pl. § 345.

BILL OBLIGATORY. A bond absolute for the payment of money. It is called, also, a single bill, and differs from a promissory note only in having a seal. 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 115. See Read, Pl. 236; West, Symb.

BILL OF ADVENTURE. A writing signed by a merchant, ship owner, or master to testify that goods shipped on board a certain vessel are at the venture of another person, he himself being answerable only for the produce.

BILL OF ADVOCATION. In Scotch law. A petition in writing, by which a party to a cause applies to the supreme court to call the action out of the inferior court to itself.

BILL OF APPEAL. An abolished, criminal prosecution. Wharton. See "Battel."

BILL OF ATTAINDER. A special act of the legislature pronouncing judgment of treason or felony on one who has not been tried in the courts, and passing sentence of death and attainder upon him. If the act inflicts a less punishment than death, it is called a "bill of pains and penalties."

BILL OF CERTIORARI. A bill praying for a writ of certiorari. See "Certiorari."

BILL OF CONFORMITY. In equity practice. One filed by an executor or administrator, who finds the affairs of the deceased so much involved that he cannot safely administer the estate except under the direction of a court of chancery. This bill is filed against the creditors generally, for the purpose of having all their claims adjusted, and procuring a final decree settling the order of payment of the assets. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 440.

BILL OF COSTS. A statement of the items which form the total amount of the costs of a suit or action. See "Costs."

BILL OF CREDIT.

——In Constitutional Law. Paper issued by the authority of a state on the faith of the state, and designed to circulate as money. 11 Pet. (U. S.) 257.

Promissory notes or bills issued by a state government, exclusively, on the credit of the state, and intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes as money, redeemable at a future day, and for the payment of which the faith of the state is pledged. 4 Kent, Comm. 408.

The constitution of the United States provides that no state shall emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. Article 1, § 10. This prohibition, it seems, does not apply to bills issued by a bank owned by the state, but having a specific capital set apart (11 Pet. [U. S.] 257; 13 How. [U. S.] 12; but see 4 Pet. [U. S.] 410), nor does it apply to notes issued by corporations or individuals which are not made legal tender (4 Kent, Comm. 408, and note).

——In Mercantile Law. A letter desiring the addressee to give credit to the bearer for goods or money. More commonly called "letter of credit." Comyn, Dig. "Merchant" (F 3); 3 Burrows, 1667; 13 Miss. 491; 4 Ark. 44; R. M. Charlt. (Ga.) 151.

BILL OF DEBT. An ancient term, including promissory notes and bonds for the payment of money. Comyn, Dig. "Merchant" (F 2).

BILL OF DISCOVERY. In equity practice. One which prays for the discovery of facts resting within the knowledge of the person against whom the bill is exhibited, or of deeds, writings, or other things in his custody or power. It does not seek for relief in consequence of the discovery (and this constitutes its characteristic feature), though it may ask for a stay of proceedings till discovery is made (2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1483), and such relief as does not require a hearing before the court, it is said, may be part of the prayer (2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1557; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 191). See "Discovery."

BILL OF ENTRY. A statement required by the revenue laws of the consignor, consignee, origin, destination, and character of goods entered at the custom house for export or import.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS. A written statement of objections to the decision of the court upon a point of law, made by a party to the cause, and properly certified by the judge or court who made the decision. Powell, App. Proc. 211. It contains only the facts on which the adjudication complained of is founded. 10 Mo. 660. But where the sufficiency of the evidence is questioned, all the evidence must be set out. 13 Ind. 412.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. A written order from one person to another, directing the person to whom it is addressed to pay to a third person a certain sum of money therein named. Byles, Bills, 1.

An unconditional order in writing addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, and requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to order or to bearer. N. Y. Neg. Inst. Law, § 210.

A bill of exchange may be negotiable or nonnegotiable. If negotiable, it may be transferred either before or after acceptance.

The person making the bill, called the drawer, is said to draw upon the person to whom it is directed, and undertakes impliedly to pay the amount with certain costs if he refuse to comply with the command. The drawee is not liable on the bill till after acceptance, and then becomes liable as principal to the extent of the terms of the acceptance; while the drawer becomes liable to the payee and indorsees conditionally upon the failure of the acceptor to pay. The liabilities between indorsers and indorsees are subject to the same rules as those of indorsers and indorsees on promissory notes. Regularly, the drawee is the person to become acceptor; but other parties may accept, under special circumstances.

BILL OF GROSS ADVENTURE. In French maritime law. Any written instrument which contains a contract of bottomry, respondentia, or any other kind of maritime loan. There is no corresponding English term. Hall, Mar. Loans, 182, note. See "Bottomry;" "Gross Adventure;" "Respondentia."

BILL OF HEALTH.

——In Commercial Law. A certificate, properly authenticated, that a certain ship or vessel therein named comes from a place where no contagious distempers prevail, and that none of the crew at the time of her departure were infected with any such distemper. It is generally found on board ships coming from the Levant, or from the coasts of Barbary, where the plague prevails (1 Marsh. Ins. 408), and is necessary whenever a ship sails from a suspected port, or where it is required at the port of destination (Holt, 167; 1 Bell. Comm. [5th Ed.] 553).

——In Scotch Law. An application of a person in custody to be discharged on account of ill health. Where the health of a prisoner requires it, he may be indulged, under proper regulations, with such a degree of liberty as may be necessary to restore him. 2 Bell, Comm. (5th Ed.) 549; Paterson, Comp. § 1129.

BILL OF INDEMNITY. An act of parliament frequently passed in England for the relief of officers who have not properly qualified, as by failure to take the oath of office, etc. Abbott; Wharton.

BILL OF INDICTMENT. In practice. A written accusation of one or more persons of a crime or misdemeanor, lawfully presented to a grand jury. See "Indictment."

BILL OF INFORMATION. In equity practice. One which is instituted by the attorney general or other proper officer in behalf of the state, or of those whose rights are the objects of its care and protection. If the suit immediately concerns the right of the state, the information is generally exhibited without a relator. If it does not immediately concern those rights, it is conducted at the instance and under the immediate direction of some person whose name is inserted in the information, and is termed the "relator." In case a relator is concerned, the officers of the state are not further concerned than as they are instructed and advised by those whose rights the state is called upon to protect and establish. 3 Bl. Comm. 261; Story, Eq. Pl. 5.

BILL OF INTERPLEADER. One in which the person exhibiting it claims no right in opposition to the rights claimed by the person against whom the bill is exhibited, but prays the decree of the court touching the rights of those persons, for the safety of the person exhibiting the bill. 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 154; 19 Ga. 513.

A bill exhibited by one who, not knowing to whom he ought of right to render a debt or duty, fears he may be hurt by some of the claimants, and therefore prays he may interplead, so that the court may judge to whom the thing belongs, and he be thereby safe on the payment. 2 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 199, 570; 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 445; 3 Jones (N. C.) 83.

BILL OF LADING. The written evidence of a contract for the carriage and delivery of goods sent by sea for a certain freight. Loughborough, J., 1 H. Bl. 359.

"A formal acknowledgment of the receipt of goods, and an engagement to deliver them to the consignee." 1 Rawle (Pa.) 203.

"A written acknowledgment, signed by the master, that he has received the goods therein described from the shipper, to be transported on the terms therein expressed to the prescribed destination, and there to be delivered to the consignee or parties therein designated." 14 Wall. (U. S.) 579.

The term is commonly applied, as well, to similar acknowledgments by carriers by land.

A bill of lading partakes of the nature of both a receipt and a contract. 30 Ala. 608; 13 Ind. 519. So much of it as is a mere receipt for goods may be contradicted or varied by parol (34 Me. 554; 74 Mass. 281), but so much of it as is a contract is governed by the rules applying to other contracts in writing (26 Ala. 487; 4 Ohio, 334; 61 Mo. App. 204).

BILL OF MIDDLESEX. An old form of process similar to a capias, issued out of the court of kings bench in personal actions, directed to the sheriff of the county of Middlesex (hence the name), and commanding him to take the defendant and have him before the king at Westminster on a day named, to answer the plaintiff's complaint.

Once, when the court sat at Oxford, it was termed a "Bill of Oxfordshire." 3 Steph. Comm. 404, note (l). It was abolished by St. 2 Wm. IV. c. 39.

BILL OF MORTALITY. A written statement or account of the number of deaths which have occurred in a certain district during a given time, usually spoken of in the plural. In some places, as in London, births, as well as deaths, are included.

BILL OF OXFORDSHIRE. See "Bill of Middlesex."

BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES. A special act of the legislature which inflicts a punishment less than death upon persons supposed to be guilty of high offenses, such as treason and felony, without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. 2 Wooddeson, Lect. 625. It differs from a bill of attainder in this, that the punishment inflicted by the latter is death. It has been thought by some that the clause in the constitution prohibiting bills of attainder includes bills of pains and penalties. 6 Cranch (U. S.) 138; Story, Const. § 1338.

BILL OF PARCELS. An account containing in detail the names of the items which compose a parcel or package of goods. It is usually transmitted with the goods to the purchaser, in order that, if any mistake have been made, it may be corrected.

BILL OF PARTICULARS. In practice. A detailed informal statement of a plaintiff's cause of action, or of the defendant's set-off, furnished by one party to the other in compliance with a statute, rule or special order of court. It may be required in actions of tort, as well as on contract.

BILL OF PEACE. One brought to restrain repeated attempts to litigate the same right. Bispham, Eq. § 415; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1532.

BILL OF PRIVILEGE. In English law. The form of proceeding against an attorney of the court, who is not liable to arrest. Brooke, Abr. "Bille;" 12 Mod. 163; 3 Bl. Comm. 289.

BILL OF PROOF. In English practice. The claim made by a third person to the subject-matter in dispute between the parties to a suit in the court of the mayor of London. 2 Chit. Prac. 492; 1 Marsh. 233.

BILL OF REVIEW. One which is brought to have a decree in equity of the court reviewed, altered, or reversed. The object of the bill is to reverse the decree as far as it is erroneous, and to retry the cause. 69 Ala. 65.

BILL OF REVIVOR. A bill in equity brought to continue a suit which has abated before its final consummation, as, for example, by death, or marriage of a female plaintiff. Story, Eq. Pl. § 20.

BILL OF REVIVOR AND SUPPLEMENT. In equity practice. One which is a compound of a supplemental bill and bill of revivor, and not only continues the suit, which has abated by the death of the plaintiff, or the like, but supplies any defects in the original bill arising from subsequent events, so as to entitle the party to relief on the whole merits of his case. 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 334; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 32, 74.

BILL OF RIGHTS. In constitutional law. A formal and public declaration or assertion, in writing, of popular rights and liberties, usually expressed in the form of a statute, or promulgated on occasions of revolution, or the establishment of new forms of government, or new constitutions. The English statute of 1 Wm. & Mary, st. 2, c. 2, is denominated the "Bill of Rights." 1 Bl. Comm. 128. Several of the United States have incorporated formal bills of rights into their constitutions. See 2 Kent, Comm. 1-11.

BILL OF SALE. A written agreement, often under seal, by which one person transfers his right to or interest in goods and personal chattels to another, but a seal is not essential. 14 Wall. (U. S.) 244. It is in frequent use in the transfer of personal property, especially that of which immediate possession is not or cannot be given.

In England, a bill of sale of a ship at sea or out of the country is called a "grand bill of sale," but no distinction is recognized in this country between grand and ordinary bills of sale. 4 Mass. 661. The effect of a bill of sale is to transfer the property in the thing sold.

BILL OF SIGHT. A written description of goods, supposed to be inaccurate, but made as nearly exact as possible, furnished by an importer or his agent to the proper officer of the customs, to procure a landing and inspection of the goods. It is allowed by an English statute where the merchant is ignorant of the real quantity and quality of goods consigned to him, so as to be unable to make a proper entry of them. The entry must be perfected within three days after landing the goods. St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52, § 24.

BILL OF STORE. In English law. A kind of license granted at the custom house to merchants to carry such stores and provisions as are necessary for their voyage, custom free. Jacob.

BILL OF SUFFERANCE. In English law. A license granted to a merchant, permitting him to trade from one English port to another without paying customs.

BILL PAYABLE. In mercantile law. A bill of exchange accepted, or a promissory note made, by a merchant, whereby he has engaged to pay money. It is so called as being payable by him. An account is usually kept of such bills in a book with that title, and also in the ledger. See Pars. Notes & Bills.

BILL PENAL. In contracts. A written obligation, by which a debtor acknowledges himself indebted in a certain sum, and binds himself for the payment thereof in a larger sum.

Bonds with conditions have superseded such bills in modern practice. Steph. Pl. 265, note. They are sometimes called "bills obligatory," and are properly so called, but every bill obligatory is not a bill penal. Comyn, Dig. "Obligations" (D); Cro. Car. 515. See 2 Vent. 106, 198.

BILL QUIA TIMET. In equity practice. A remedy by bill in equity to protect rights against possible future injuries or impairment. One which is filed when a person is entitled to property of a personal nature after another's death, and has reason to apprehend it may be destroyed by the present possessor; or when he is apprehensive of being subjected to a future inconvenience, probable or even possible, to happen or be occasioned by the neglect, inadvertence, or culpability of another.

Upon a proper case being made out, the court will, in one case, secure the property for the use of the party (which is the object of the bill), by compelling the person in possession of it to give a proper security against any subsequent disposition or willful destruction, and, in the other case, they will quiet the party's apprehension of future inconvenience by removing the causes which may lead to it. 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 218; Blake, Ch. Pr. 37, 47; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 825, 851. See 9 Grat. (Va.) 398; 11 Ga. 570; 8 Tex. 337; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 157, 442; 4 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 228; Bouv. Inst.

BILL RECEIVABLE. In mercantile law. A promissory note, bill of exchange, or other written security for money payable at a future day, which a merchant holds. So called because the amounts for which they are given are receivable by the merchant. They are entered in a book so called, and are charged to an account in the ledger under the same title, to which account the cash, when received, is credited. See Pars. Notes & Bills.

BILL RENDERED. See "Account."

BILL, SINGLE. In contracts. A written unconditional promise by one or more persons to pay to another person or other persons, therein named, a sum of money at a time therein specified. It is usually under seal, and may then be called a "bill obligatory." 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 115. It has no condition attached, and is not given in a penal sum. Comyn, Dig. "Obligation" (C).

BILL TO CARRY A DECREE INTO EXecution. In equity practice. One which is filed when, from the neglect of parties, or some other cause, it may become impossible to carry a decree into execution without the further decree of the court. Hinde, Ch. Pr. 68.

BILL TO MARSHAL ASSETS. See "Marshaling Assets."

BILL TO MARSHAL SECURITIES. See "Marshaling Securities."

BILL TO PERPETUATE TESTIMONY. In equity practice. One which is brought to secure the testimony of witnesses with reference to some matter which is not in litigation, but is liable to become so. It differs from a bill to take testimony de bene esse, inasmuch as the latter is sustainable only when there is a suit already depending. It is demurrable if it contain a prayer for relief. 1 Dickens, 98; 2 P. Wms. 162; 2 Ves. Jr. 497; 2 Madd. Ch. 37. And see 1 Schoales & L. 316.

BILL TO SUSPEND A DECREE. In equity practice. One brought to avoid or suspend a decree under special circumstances. See 1 Ch. Cas. 3, 61; 2 Ch. Cas. 8; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 85, 86.

BILL TO TAKE TESTIMONY DE BENE esse. In equity practice. One which is brought to take the testimony of witnesses to a fact material to the prosecution of a suit at law which is actually commenced, where there is good cause to fear that the testimony may otherwise be lost before the time of trial. See 1 Sim. & S. 83; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1813, note.

It lies, in general, where witnesses are aged or infirm (Coop. Eq. Pl. 57; Ambl. 65; 13 Ves. 56, 261), propose to leave the country (2 Dickens, 454; Story, Eq. Pl. § 308), or there is but a single witness to a fact (1 P. Wms. 97; 2 Dickens, 648).

BILLA CASSETUR (Lat. that the bill be quashed or made void). A plea in abatement concluded, when the pleadings were in Latin, quod billa cassetur, that the bill be quashed. 3 Bl. Comm. 303; Graham, Prac. 611.

BILLA EXCAMBII (or ESCAMBII). A bill of exchange.

BILLA EXONERATIONIS. A bill of lading.

BILLA VERA (Lat. a true bill). The form of words indorsed on a bill of indictment, when proceedings were conducted in Latin, to indicate the opinion of the grand jury that the person therein accused ought to be tried.

BILLET DE CHANGE. In French law. A contract to furnish a bill of exchange; a contract to pay the value of a bill of exchange already furnished. Guyot, Rep.Univ.

Where a person intends to furnish a bill of exchange (lettre de change), and is not quite prepared to do so, he gives a billet de change, which is a contract to furnish a lettre de change at a future time. Guyot, Rep. Univ.; Story, Bills, § 2.

BILLETA (Law Lat.) In old English law. A bill or petition exhibited in parliament. Cowell.

BILLETING SOLDIERS. Quartering them in the houses of citizens.

BIND OUT. To engage as an apprentice.

BIND OVER. The order of a magistrate in requiring one to give bail to appear for hearing in a higher court, or to keep the peace.

BINDING OUT. A term applied to the contract of apprenticeship.

BINDING OVER. The act by which a magistrate or court hold to bail a party accused of a crime or misdemeanor. The binding over may be to appear at a court having jurisdiction of the offense charged, to answer, or to be of good behavior, or to keep the peace.

BIPARTITE. Of two parts. This term is used in conveyancing; as, this indenture bipartite, between A., of the one part, and B., of the other part.

BIRRETUM, or BIRRETUS. A cap or coif used formerly in England by judges and sergeants at law. Spelman; Cunningham.

BIRTH. The act of being wholly brought into the world.

The conditions of live birth are not satisfied when a part only of the body is born. The whole body must be brought into the world, and detached from that of the mother, and after this event the child must be alive. 5 Car. & P. 329; 7 Car. & P. 814. The circulating system must also be changed, and the child must have an independent circulation. 5 Car. & P. 539; 9 Car. & P. 154. But it is not necessary that there should have been a separation of the umbilical cord. That may still connect the child with its mother, and yet the killing of it will constitute murder. 7 Car. & P. 814; 9 Car. & P. 25. See 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 478; 1 Chit. Med. Jur. 438.

BIS. (Lat.) Twice.

BIS DAT QUI CITO DAT. He gives twice who gives quickly.

BIS IDEM EXIGI BONA FIDES NON PATITUR, et in satisfactionibus, non permittitur amplius fieri quam semel factum est. Good faith does not suffer the same thing to be exacted twice, and, in making satisfaction, it is not permitted that more should be done after satisfaction is once made. 9 Coke, 53; Dig. 50. 17. 57.

BISANTIUM, BESANTINE, or BEZANT. An ancient coin, first issued at Constantinople. It was of two sorts,—gold, equivalent to a ducat, valued at 9s. 6d., and silver, computed at 2s. They were both current in England. Wharton.

BISHOP. An ecclesiastical officer, who is the chief of the clergy of his diocese, and is the archbishop's assistant. No such officer is recognized by law in the United States.

BISHOPRIC. In ecclesiastical law. The extent of country over which a bishop has jurisdiction; a see; a diocese.

BISHOP'S COURT. In English law. An ecclesiastical court held in the cathedral of each diocese, the judge of which is the bishop's chancellor.

BISSEXTILE. The day which is added every fourth year to the month of February, in order to make the year agree with the course of the sun.

It was called "bissextile" because in the Roman calendar it was fixed on the sixth day before the calends of March (which answers to the twenty-fourth day of February), and this day was counted twice. The first was called bissextus prior, and the other bissextus posterior, but the latter was properly called "bissextile" or "intercalary" day.

BLACK ACRE and WHITE ACRE. Terms used by the old writers to distinguish one parcel of land from another, to avoid ambiguity, as well as the inconvenience of a full description.

They are mere names of convenience, adoped, as "A." and "B." are, to distinguish persons or things under similar circumstances.

BLACK ACT. In English law. The act of parliament 9 Geo. II. c. 22. This act was passed for the punishment of certain marauders, who committed great outrages disguised and with faces blackened. It was repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 11. See 4 Bl. Comm. 245.

BLACK ACTS. Old Scotch statutes passed in the reigns of the Stuarts, and down to the year 1586 or 1587. So called because printed in black letter. Bell, Dict.; Wharton.

BLACK BOOK OF HEREFORD. In English law. An old record frequently referred to by Cowell and other early writers.

BLACK BOOK OF THE ADMIRALTY. An ancient book compiled in the reign of Edward III. It has always been deemed of the highest authority in matters concerning the admiralty. It contains the laws of Oleron, at large, a view of the crimes and offenses cognizable in the admiralty, ordinances and commentaries on matters of prize and maritime torts, injuries, and contracts. 2 Gall. (U. S.) 404. It is said by Selden to be not more ancient than the reign of Henry VI. Selden, de Laud. Leg. Ang. c. 32. By other writers it is said to have been composed earlier.

BLACK BOOK OF THE EXCHEQUER. The name of a book kept in the English exchequer, containing a collection of treaties, conventions, charters, etc.

BLACK CAP. It is a vulgar error that the headdress worn by the judge in pronouncing the sentence of death is assumed as an emblem of the sentence. It is part of the judicial full dress, and is worn by the judges on occasions of especial state. Wharton.

BLACK GAME. Heath fowl, in contradistinction to red game, as grouse.

BLACK MAIL. Rents reserved, payable in work, grain, and the like. Such rents were called "black mail" (reditus nigri), in distinction from white rents (blanche firmes), which were rents paid in silver.

A yearly payment made for security and protection to those bands of marauders who infested the borders of England and Scotland about the middle of the sixteenth century, and laid the inhabitants under contribution. Hume, Hist. Eng. vol. 1, p. 473; Id. vol. 2, App. No. 8; Cowell.

In common usage the term signifies the obtaining of money by a demand accompanied by threats of prosecution, exposure or injury in case of nonpayment. The corrupt taking under color of office is "extortion," (q. v.)

BLACK RENTS. Rents reserved in work, grain, or baser money than silver. Whishaw.

BLACK ROD, GENTLEMAN USHER OF. A chief officer of the king, deriving his name from the black rod of office, on the top of which reposes a golden lion, which he carries. During the session of parliament he attends on the peers, and to his custody all peers impeached for crime or contempt are first committed.

BLACK WARD. A subvassal, who held ward of the king's vassal.

BLADA. Growing crops of grain. Spelman. Any annual crop. Cowell. Used of crops, either growing or gathered. Reg. Orig. 94b; Coke, 2d Inst. 81.

BLADARIUS. In old English law. A corn monger; meal man or corn chandler; a bladier, or engrosser of corn or grain. Blount; 2 Inst. 81.

BLANC SEIGN. Carte blanche (q. v.) See 6 Mart. (La.) 718.

BLANCH HOLDING. In Scotch law. A tenure by which land is held. The duty is generally a trifling one, as a peppercorn. It may happen, however, that the duty is of greater value, and then the distinction received in practice is founded on the nature of the duty. Stair, Inst. sec. iii. lib. 3, § 33. See Paterson, Comp. 15; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 42.

BLANCHE FIRME. A rent reserved, payable in silver.

BLANCUS (Law Lat.) In old law and practice. White, as paper or parchment is when there is no writing or other mark upon it; otherwise called albus. See "Album Breve." Hence the modern term "blank."

Plain or smooth, as silver money that has no impression, or from which the impression has been worn.

BLANK. A space left in writing, to be filled up with one or more words to complete sense.

A skeleton document, in which the formal words are printed, and blanks left for the insertion of words necessary to adapt the same to the particular case.

BLANK ACCEPTANCE. An acceptance written on the paper before the bill is made, and delivered by the acceptor. In England it will charge the acceptor to the extent warranted by the stamp.

BLANK BAR. See "Common Bar."

BLANK BONDS. Scotch securities, in which the creditor's name was left blank, and which passed by mere delivery, the bearer being at liberty to put in his name, and sue for payment. Declared void by Act 1696, c. 25.

BLANK INDORSEMENT. An indorsement which does not mention the name of the person in whose favor it is made. Such an indorsement is generally effected by writing the indorser's name merely on the back of the bill. Chit. Bills, 170.

BLANKET POLICY. A fire insurance policy not on particular goods, but on whatever there may be at a certain time, of a varying quantity, as on a stock of goods subject to sale and replenishing. See 93 U. S. 541.

BLANKS. A kind of white money (value 8d.) coined by Henry V. in those parts of France which were then subject to England; forbidden to be current in that realm by 2 Hen. VI. c. 9. Wharton.

BLASARIUS. An incendiary. Blount.

BLASPHEMY. In criminal law. To attribute to God that which is contrary to his nature, and does not belong to him, and to deny what does. A false reflection uttered with a malicious design of reviling God. Emlyn's Pref. to 8 St. Tr.

To willfully revile the Deity or sacred things.

Malicious reproach of God, his name, attributes, or religion. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 76.

In general, blasphemy may be described as consisting in speaking evil of the Deity with an impious purpose to derogate from the divine majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God. It is purposely using words concerning God calculated and designed to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to him as the intelligent creator, governor, and judge of the world. It embraces the idea of detraction, when used towards the Supreme Being; as "calumny" usually carries the same idea when applied to an individual. It is a willful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence of God by denying his existence, or his attributes as an intelligent creator, governor, and judge of men, and to prevent their having confidence in him as such. 20 Pick. (Mass.) 211, 212, per Shaw, C. J.

BLENCH, or BLENCH HOLDING. See "Blanch Holding."

BLENDED FUND. In England, where a testator directs his real and personal estate to be sold, and disposes of the proceeds as forming one aggregate, this is called a "blended fund." The expression is chiefly used in cases where part of the testator's disposition fails, by lapse or otherwise, so that it becomes a question whether so much of the undisposed-of portion as consists of or arises from land goes to the testator's heir at law or next of kin. 1 Brown, 503; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. 783; 1 Mylne & K. 665.

BLINKS. In old English law. Boughs broken down from trees and thrown in a way where deer are likely to pass. Jacob.

BLOCKADE. Blockade is where a belligerent power maintains such a naval force near the shore or ports of the other belligerent as to prevent access to them, or, as it is sometimes put, the vessels must be so disposed that there is an evident danger in entering the port, or approaching the shore, notwithstanding that the blockading squadron may be accidentally absent for a time, e. g., from being blown off by the wind. Under the Declaration of Paris (q. v.), a blockade is not effective unless maintained by an adequate force.

A blockade de facto is where the blockade has not been notified (as is usually done) by the belligerent to neutral governments, so that every approaching vessel has to be warned off by the squadron. Vessels attempting to pass a blockade are liable to confiscation.

It is not necessary that the place should be invested by land as well as by sea; but a blockade by sea does not impair the right of neutrals to carry on a trade by land. 1 Kent, Comm. 147.

BLOOD. Relationship; stock; family. 1 Rop. Leg. 103; 1 Belt, Supp. Ves. 365. Kindred. Bac. Max. reg. 18.

Brothers and sisters are said to be of the whole blood if they have the same father and mother, and of the half-blood if they have only one parent in common. 5 Whart. (Pa.) 477.

BLOOD MONEY. Money paid to the relatives of one killed by another.

Money paid as a reward for the conviction of one charged with a capital offense.

BLOODWIT. An amercement for bloodshed. Cowell. The privilege of taking such amercements. Skene de Verb. Sign. A privilege or exemption from paying a fine or amercement assessed for bloodshed. Cowell; Kennett, Par. Ant.; Termes de la Ley.

BLOODY HAND. In forest law. The having the hands or other parts bloody, which, in a person caught trespassing in the forest against venison, was one of the four kinds of circumstantial evidence of his having killed deer, although he was not found in the act of chasing or hunting. Manw. For. Law; Cowell. See "Backbear." Corresponds to the Scotch "Red Hand." Blount.

BLUE LAWS. A name applied to certain laws of extreme rigor, supposed to have been anciently in force in Connecticut. Rigorous puritanical laws, generally.

BOARD. The governing body of officers of a corporation or municipality. The members are usually called directors, trustees, aldermen, or supervisors.

Also, the body or commission invested with control or supervision of particular functions and matters of government, as public health, charities, or improvements.

BOARD OF HEALTH. An executive or administrative body organized as part of the government or of its local divisions, like cities, to regulate and supervise matters affecting the public health or sanitation.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS. A county board, under a system existing in some of the northern states, to whom the fiscal affairs of the county are intrusted, composed of delegates representing the several organized towns or townships of the county. This system originated in the state of New York, and has been adopted in Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa. The board, when convened, forms a deliberative body, usually acting under parliamentary rules.

BOARD OF TRADE. See "Chamber of Commerce."

BOARD OF WORKS. The name of a board of officers appointed for the better local management of the English metropolis. They have the care and management of all grounds and gardens dedicated to the use of the inhabitants in the metropolis; also the superintendence of the drainage; also the regulation of the street traffic, and, generally, of the buildings of the metropolis. Brown.

BOARDER. One who, by a special contract, obtains food, with or without lodging, in the house of another. To be distinguished from a guest (q. v.) Story, Bailm. § 477; 26 Vt. 343; 26 Ala. (N.S.) 371; 7 Cush. (Mass.) 417.

BOARDING HOUSE. A quasi public house where boarders are habitually kept, and which is held out and known as a place of entertainment of that kind. 1 Lans. (N. Y.) 484, 486; 3 Abb. Pr. (N. S.; N. Y.) 26. The characteristic of a boarding house is that accommodation is furnished for a definite period. 24 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 62.

BOC (Saxon). A writing; a book. Used of the land bocs, or evidences of title among the Saxons, corresponding to modern deeds. These bocs were destroyed by William the Conqueror. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 22; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 17, 21.

BOC HORDE. A place where books, evidences, or writings are kept. Cowell. These were generally in monasteries. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 22.

BOC LAND. Allodial lands held by written evidence of title. Such lands might be granted upon such terms as the owner should see fit, by greater or less estate, to take effect presently, or at a future time, or on the happening of any event. In this respect they differed essentially from feuds. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 17; 4 Kent, Comm. 441.

BOCERAS (Saxon). A scribe, notary, or chancellor among the Saxons. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 28; Barr. Obs. St. 404, note (l).

BODMERIE, BODEMERIE, or BODDEmerey (Belg. and Ger.) Bottomry (q. v.) Locc. de Jur. Mar. lib. 2, c. 6, § 1.

BODY. A person. Used of a natural body, or of an artificial one created by law, as a corporation.

The main part or frame of anything, as distinguished from its subordinate parts. 22 N. Y. 147; 5 Mason (U. S.) 300.

A collection of individuals united for a common purpose. See 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 141.

BODY CORPORATE. A corporation. This is an early and undoubtedly correct term to apply to a corporation. Co. Litt. 250a; 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 141; 81 Pa. St. 389.

BODY OF A COUNTY. A county at large, as distinguished from any particular place within it. See 25 Wis. 364.

BODY OF AN INSTRUMENT. The main and operative part; the substantive provisions, as distinguished from the recitals, title, jurat, etc. Wharton.

BODY POLITIC (or POLITIQUE). The old term for a corporation. Statute of Uses, § 1; Co. Litt. 95a, 250a.

Applied generally to the state or nation.

BOILARY. Water rising from a salt well belonging to a person who is not the owner of the soil.

BOIS, BOYS, or BOYES (Law Fr.; Lat. boscus), Wood; haut bois, high timber; sub bois, underwood. Cowell.

BOLHAGIUM, or BOLDAGIUM. A little house or cottage. Blount.

BOLTING. In English practice. A term formerly used in the English inns of court, but more particularly at Gray's Inn, signifying the private arguing of cases, as distinguished from mooting, which was a more formal and public mode of argument. Cowell; Tomlin; Holthouse.

The deserting by one or more persons from the political party to which they belong, or the permanent withdrawal of a portion of the delegates in a political convention.

BON (Fr.)

——In Old French Law. A royal order or check on the treasury, invented by Francis I. Bon pour mille livres, good for a thousand livres. Steph. Lect. 387.

——In Modern Law. The name of a clause (bon pour ——, good for so much) added to a cedule or promise, where it is not in the handwriting of the signer, containing the amount of the sum which he obliges himself to pay. Poth. Obl. pt. 4, c. 1, art. 2, § 1.

BONA (Lat. bonus). Goods; personal property; chattels, real or personal; real property.

Bona et catalla (goods and chattels) includes all kinds of property which a man may possess. In the Roman law it signified every kind of property, real, personal, and mixed; but chiefly it was applied to real estate, chattels being distinguished by the words "effects," "movables," etc. Bona were, however, divided into bona mobilia and bona immobilia. It is taken in the civil law in nearly the sense of biens in the French law.

BONA CONFISCATA. Goods confiscated or forfeited to the imperial fisc or treasury. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 299.

BONA ET CATALLA. Goods and chattels; movable property of every description. See 16 Mees. & W. 68.

BONA FELONUM (Lat.) In English law. Goods of felons; the goods of one convicted of felony. 5 Coke, 110.

BONA FIDE POSSESSOR FACIT FRUCtus consumptos suos. By good faith, a possessor makes the fruits consumed his own. Tray. Lat. Max. 57.

BONA FIDE PURCHASER. One who buys property without notice, actual or constructive, that some third person has a right to or interest in it, and pays a full and fair price for it at the time of such purchase, or before he has notice of the claim or interest of such third person. 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 227. If he has paid but a part of the consideration, he is a bona fide purchaser pro tanto only. 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 498.

There must be (a) absence of notice or of suspicious circumstances tending to put a reasonably cautious man on inquiry (12 Barb. [N. Y.] 605), and (b) a present valuable consideration, a good consideration (49 N. Y. 286), or one that is past (52 N. Y. 138) or executory (14 Mich. 514), being insufficient. The term implies an actual reliance in good faith on the apparent right of the seller. 28 Ga. 170.

BONA FIDES. Good faith, honesty, as distinguished from mala fides, bad faith.

Bona fide, in good faith.

BONA FIDES EXIGIT UT QUOD CONvenit fiat. Good faith demands that what is agreed upon shall be done. Dig. 19. 20. 21; Id. 19. 1. 50; Id. 50. 8. 2. 13.

BONA FIDES NON PATITUR, UT BIS idem exigatur. Good faith does not allow us to demand twice the payment of the same thing. Dig. 50. 17. 57.

BONA FORISFACTA. Forfeited goods. 1 Bl. Comm. 299.

BONA FUGITIVORUM (Lat.) In English law. Goods of fugitives; the proper goods of him who flies for felony. 5 Coke, 109b.

BONA GESTURA. Good behavior.

BONA GRATIA. Voluntarily; by mutual consent. Used of a divorce obtained by the agreement of both parties.

BONA MEMORIA. Good memory. Used chiefly in respect to testamentary capacity. Abbott.

BONA MOBILIA. In civil law. Movables. Those things which move themselves or can be transported from one place to another; which are not intended to make a permanent part of a farm, heritage, or building.

BONA NOTABILIA. Chattels or goods of sufficient value to be accounted for.

Where a decedent leaves goods of sufficient amount (bona notabilia) in different dioceses, administration is granted by the metropolitan, to prevent the confusion arising from the appointment of many different administrators. 2 Bl. Comm. 509; Rolle, Abr. 908; Williams, Ex'rs, Index. The value necessary to constitute property bona notabilia has varied at different periods, but was finally established at £5, in 1603.

BONA PATRIA. In Scotch law. An assize or jury of countrymen or good neighbors. Bell, Dict.

BONA PERITURA. Perishable goods.

An executor, administrator, or trustee is bound to use due diligence in disposing of perishable goods, such as fattened cattle, grain, fruit, or any other article which may be worse for keeping. Bac. Abr. "Executors;" 1 Rolle, Abr. 910; 5 Coke, 9; Cro. Eliz. 518, 3 Munf. (Va.) 288; 1 Beatty, 5, 14; Dane, Abr. Index.

BONA UTLAGATORUM. In English law. Goods of outlaws. Hale, Anal. § VIII.

BONA VACANTIA. Goods to which no one claims a property, as shipwrecks, treasure trove, etc.; vacant goods. These bona vacantia belonged, under the common law, to the finder, except in certain instances, when they were the property of the king. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 298, note.

BONA WAVIATA. Goods waived or thrown away by a thief in his fright for fear of being apprehended. Such goods belong to the sovereign. 1 Bl. Comm. 296.

BONAE FIDEI (Lat.) In good faith.

BONAE FIDEI EMPTOR. A bona fide purchaser (q. v.)

BONAE FIDEI POSSESSOR IN ID TANtum quod ad se pervenerit tenetur. A bona fide possessor is bound for that only which has come to him. Coke, 2d Inst. 285; Grotius, de Jure Belli, lib. 2, c. 10, § 3 et seq.

BOND. A sealed obligation to pay money, either absolutely or conditionally. 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 502; 11 Ala. 19; 1 Harp. (S. C.) 434; 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 241; 6 Vt. 40; 1 Baldw. (U. S.) 129; 110 Mass. 454.

It may be single,—simplex obligatio,—as where the obligor obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay a certain sum of money to another at a day named, or it may be conditional (which is the kind more generally used), that if the obligor does some particular act, the obligation shall be void, or else shall remain in full force, as payment of rent, performance of covenants in a deed, or repayment of a principal sum of money borrowed of the obligee, with interest, which principal sum is usually one-half of the penal sum specified in the bond. The term is usually applied only to the latter class. 3 Redf. Sur. (N. Y.) 459.

Certificates of indebtedness issued by corporations and municipal and governmental bodies, are also known as "bonds."

BOND TENANTS. In English law. Copyholders and customary tenants are sometimes so called. 2 Bl. Comm. 148.

BONDAGE. Is a term which has not obtained a juridical use distinct from the vernacular, in which it is either taken as a synonym with "slavery," or as applicable to any kind of personal servitude which is involuntary in its continuation.

BONDSMAN. A surety on a bond.

BONES GENTS. In old English law. Good men.

BONI HOMINES (Law Lat.) In old European law. Good men; a name given, in early European jurisprudence, to the tenants of the lord, who judged each other in the lord's courts. 3 Bl. Comm. 349. Blackstone, speaking of the origin of juries, says that all the nations which adopted the feudal system, as Germany, France, and Italy, had a tribunal composed of twelve good men and true (boni homines), usually the vassals or tenants of the lord, being the equals or peers of the parties litigant. Esprit des Lois, liv. 30, c. 18. This term has survived in the courts to the present day.

BONI JUDICIS EST AMPLIARE JURISditionem; justitiam in. It is the part of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction; that is, his remedial authority. 1 Burrows, 304; Chanc. Prec. 329; 1 Wils. 284; 9 Mees. & W. 818; 1 C. B. (N. S.) 255; 4 Bing. N. C. 233; 4 Scott, N. R. 229; 17 Mass. 310.

BONI JUDICIS EST CAUSAS LITIUM dirimere. It is the duty of a good judge to remove causes of litigation. 2 Inst. 306.

BONI JUDICIS EST JUDICIUM SINE dilatione mandare executioni. It is the duty of a good judge to cause execution to issue on a judgment without delay. Co. Litt. 289.

BONI JUDICIS EST LITES DIRIMERE, ne lis ex lite oritur, et interest reipublicae ut sint fines litium. It is the duty of a good judge to prevent litigations, that suit may not grow out of suit, and it concerns the welfare of a state that an end be put to litigation. 4 Coke, 15; 5 Coke, 31a.

BONIS CEDERE (Lat.) In the civil law. To make a transfer or surrender of property, as a debtor did to his creditors. Code, 7. 71.

BONIS NON-AMOVENDIS. A writ addressed to the sheriff, when a writ of error has been brought, commanding that the person against whom judgment has been obtained be not suffered to remove his goods till the error be tried and determined. Reg. Orig. 131.

BONITARIAN. In the Roman law. Right of possession. Hence bonitarian ownership was an equitable title or special property, as distinguished from quiritarian ownership, that in accordance with the strict forms of law.

BONO ET MALO. A special writ of jail delivery, which formerly issued of course for each particular prisoner. 4 Bl. Comm. 270.

BONUM DEFENDENTIS EX INTEGRA causa; malum ex quolibet defectu. The good of a defendant arises from a perfect case; his harm from some defect. 11 Coke. 68.

BONUM NECESSARIUM EXTRA TERminos necessitatis non est bonum. A thing good from necessity is not good beyond the limits of the necessity. Hob. 144.

BONUS. A premium paid to a grantor or vendor.

A consideration given for what is received. Extraordinary profit accruing in the operations of a stock company or private corporation. 10 Ves. 185; 7 Sim. 634; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 569.

An additional premium paid for the use of money beyond the legal interest. 2 Pars. Cont. 391.

In its original sense of "good," the word was formerly much used. Thus, a jury was to be composed of twelve good men (boni homines) (3 Bl. Comm. 349), bonus judex (a good judge) (Co. Litt. 246).

An extra or donated sum beyond strict legal right.

BONUS JUDEX SECUNDUM AEQUUM et bonum judicat, et aequitatem stricto juri praefert. A good judge decides according to justice and right, and prefers equity to strict law. Co. Litt. 24; 4 Term R. 344; 2 Q. B. 837; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 77.

BOOK. A general name given to every literary composition which is printed, but appropriately to a printed composition bound in a volume. A book may consist of but one page, and need not be bound. 2 Campb. 30, 32.

BOOK DEBT. A statutory remedy existing in several states for the collection of a debt evidenced by entries in books of account.

BOOK LAND. In English law. Land, also called charter land, which was held by deed under certain rents and fee services, and differed in nothing from free socage land. 2 Bl. Comm. 90. See 2 Spelman, English Works, 233, tit. "Of Ancient Deeds and Charters;" "Boc Land."

BOOK OF ACTS. The records of a surrogate's court.

BOOK OF ADJOURNAL. In Scotch law. The records of the court of justiciary.

BOOK OF RATES. An account or enumeration of the duties or tariffs authorized by parliament. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 316; Jacob.

BOOK OF RESPONSES. In Scotch law. An account which the director of the chancery keeps particularly to note a seizure when he gives an order to the sheriff in that part to give it to an heir whose service has been returned to him. Wharton.

BOOKS OF SCIENCE. In evidence. Medical books, even of received authority, are not admissible in evidence. 12 Cush. (Mass.) 193; 1 Gray (Mass.) 337; 5 Car. & P. 74. See 2 Ind. 617; 1 Jones (N. C.) 386; 1 Chand. (Wis.) 178; 1 Cox, C. C. 94; 1 Towns. St. Tr. 357, 358.

BOON DAYS. Certain days in the year on which copyhold tenants were bound to perform certain services for the lord. Called, also, "due days." Whishaw.

BOOT, or BOTE. An old Saxon word, equivalent to "estovers." Brownl. & G. 170.

BOOTING (or BOTING) CORN. Certain rent corn, anciently so called. Cowell; Blount.

BOOTY. Personal property captured by a public enemy on land, in contradistinction to "prize," which is such property captured by such an enemy on the sea.

After booty has been in eomplete possession of the enemy for twenty-four hours, it becomes absolutely his, without any right of postliminy in favor of the original owner, particularly when it has passed bona fide into the hands of a neutral. 1 Kent, Comm. 110. The right to the booty, Pothier says, belongs to the sovereign; but sometimes the right of the sovereign, or of the public, is transferred to the soldiers, to encourage them. Poth. Dr. de Propriete, p. 1, c. 2, a. 1, § 2; 2 Burlam. Nat. Law, pt. 4, c. 7, note 12.

BORD. An old Saxon word, signifying a cottage; a house; a table.

BORD-HALFPENNY. A customary small toll paid to the lord of a town for setting up boards, tables, booths, etc., in fairs or markets.

BORD LANDS. Lands held in bordage.

The demesnes which the lords keep in their hands for the maintenance of their bord or table. Cowell.

BORDAGE. A species of base tenure by which bord lands were held. The tenants were called bordarii (q. v.)

BORDARII, or BORDIMANNI. In old English law. Tenants of a less servile condition than the villani, who had a bord or cottage, with a small parcel of land, allowed to them, on condition they should supply the lord with poultry and eggs, and other small provisions for his board or entertainment. Spelman.

BORDBRIGCH, BORGHBRECH, or burghbrech. In Saxon law. Breach or violation of pledge (fide jussionis violatio); pledge-breach (plegii fractio). Spelman. The offense of violating the borg, or pledge given by the inhabitants of a tithing. See "Borg."

BORDER WARRANT. A process granted by a judge ordinary, on either side of the border between England and Scotland, for arresting the person or effects of a person living on the opposite side, until he find security, judicio sisti. Bell, Dict.

BORDLODE. The rent or quantity of food which the bordarii paid for their lands. Cowell.

BORDSERVICE. A tenure of bord lands. Blount.

BOREL FOLK. Country people; derived from the French bourre (Lat. floccus), a lock of wool, because they covered their heads with such stuff. Blount.

BORG (Saxon). Suretyship.

Borgbriche (violation of a pledge or suretyship) was a fine imposed on the borg for property stolen within its limits.

A tithing in which each one became a surety for the others for their good behavior. Spelman; Cowell; 1 Bl. Comm. 115.

BORGESMON (Saxon). The head of each family composing a tithing.

BORGH OF HAMHALD. In old Scotch law. A pledge or surety given by the seller of goods to the buyer, to make the goods forthcoming as his own proper goods, and to warrant the same to him. Skene de Verb. Sign.

BOROUGH. In the old sense of the word, borough is "an ancient towne, holden of the king or any other lord, which sendeth burgesses to the parliament." Litt. § 164; Co. Litt. 109a. Many of these boroughs, however, having been disfranchised in modern times, are now only boroughs to this extent, that the land within them is held by tenure in burgage or subject to the custom of borough English (q. v.) At the present day, "borough" almost always means either a borough corporate, or municipal borough, or a parliamentary borough (see 1 Bl. Comm. 115; 1 Steph. Comm. 125), most, if not all, municipal boroughs being also parliamentary.

A parliamentary borough is a town which returns one or more members to parliament. See Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878, § 4. Some of these towns are ancient boroughs; others are towns on which the right of returning members has been conferred by statute. St. 2 Wm. IV. c. 45; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102.

——In Scotch Law. A corporation organized under a royal charter. Bell, Dict.

——In American Law. The word is little used. In Pennsylvania and Connecticut, however, it is in common use, and denotes an incorporated town or village. Bright. Purd. Dig. 115; 23 Conn. 128.

Borough, synonymous with "town." 1 Bl. Comm. 114. Borough, synonymous with "village." 18 Ohio St. 496.

BOROUGH COURTS. In English law.

Private courts of limited jurisdiction held in particular districts by prescription, charter, or act of parliament, for the prosecution of petty suits. 19 Geo. III. c. 70; 3 Wm. IV. c. 74; 3 Bl. Comm. 80.

BOROUGH ENGLISH. A custom prevalent in some parts of England, by which the younger son inherits the estate in preference to his older brothers. 1 Bl. Comm. 75.

The custom is said by Blackstone to have been derived from the Saxons, and to have been so called in distinction from the Norman rule of descent. 2 Bl. Comm. 83. A reason for the custom is found in the fact that the elder children were usually provided for during the life of the parent as they grew up, and removed, while the younger son usually remained. See, also, Bac. Abr.; Comyn, Dig.; Termes de la Ley; Cowell. The custom applies to socage lands. 2 Bl. Comm. 83.

BOROUGH-HEAD, or BOROW-HEAD. The chief man or head of a borough. Cowell. See "Headborow."

BOROUGH-REEVE. The chief municipal officer in towns unincorporated before the municipal corporations act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76).

BOROUGH SESSIONS. Courts established in boroughs under the municipal corporations act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, amended by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 105, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 89). They are held by the recorders of the respective boroughs once a quarter, or oftener if they think fit, and at times to be fixed by them. The jurisdiction is over such offenses as are cognizable by the country sessions, whose powers extend to all boroughs which may not have petitioned for a separate court by virtue of section 103 of the municipal corporations act. Wharton.

BORROW. To obtain the use of the property of another, with an agreement to return the same, ordinarily in specie, but where, as in case of money, the nature of the case does not admit of it, to return in kind. See 14 Neb. 381.

BORROWE. In old Scotch law. A pledge. Skene de Verb. Sign. voc. "Forensis."

BORROWER. He to whom a thing is lent at his request.

As used in usury laws, it includes any person who is a party to the original contract, or in any way liable to pay the loan. 64 N. Y. 247; 65 N. Y. 432; 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 329; 7 Hill (N. Y.) 391; 75 N. Y. 516, 523, 31 Am. Rep. 484, reversing 10 Hun, 468.

In general, he has the right to use the thing borrowed, himself, during the time and for the purpose intended between the parties. He is bound to take extraordinary care of the thing borrowed; to use it according to the intention of the lender; to restore it in proper condition at the proper time. See "Bailment;" Story, Bailm. § 268; 2 Kent, Comm. 446-449; 1 Bouv. Inst. 1078-1090.

BORSHOLDER. A corruption of borhesalder, another form of borhealder. Spelman.

——In Saxon Law. The borough's ealder, or head borough, supposed to be the most discreet man in the borough, town, or tithing. 1 Bl. Comm. 114, 355.

BOSCAGE. That food which wood and trees yield to cattle.

To be quit of boscage is to be discharged of paying any duty of wind-fall wood in forest. Whishaw; Manw. For. Law.

BOSCARIA (from Lat. bos). Woodhouses, or ox-houses.

BOSCUS. Wood growing; wood; both high wood or trees, and underwood or coppice. The high wood is properly called saltus. Cowell; Spelman; Co. Litt. 5a.

BOTE. A recompense or compensation. The common word "boot" comes from this word. Cowell. The term is applied as well to making repairs in houses, bridges, etc., as to making a recompense for slaying a man or stealing property. House bote, materials which may be taken to repair a house; hedge bote, to repair hedges; brig bote, to repair bridges; man bote, compensation to be paid by a murderer. Bote is known to the English law also under the name of "estover." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 99; 2 Bl. Comm. 35.

BOTELESS. In old English law. Without amends; without the privilege of making satisfaction for a crime by a pecuniary payment; without relief or remedy. Cowell; Blount. The word (written "bootless") is still retained in the sense of "vain" or "useless." Cowell.

BOTHA. In old English law. A booth, stall, or tent to stand in, in fairs or markets. Cowell; Blount.

BOTHAGIUM, or BOOTHAGE. Customary dues paid to the lord of a manor or soil for the pitching or standing of booths in fairs or markets.

BOTHNA, BUTHNA, or BOTHENA. In old Scotch law. A park where cattle are inclosed and fed. Bothna also signifies a barony, lordship, etc. Skene de Verb. Sign.

BOTTOMAGE (Law Fr.) Bottomry. Latch. 252.

BOTTOMRY. A contract in the nature of a mortgage, by which the owner of a ship, or the master, as his agent, borrows money for the use of the ship, and for a specified voyage, or for a definite period, pledges the ship (or the keel or bottom of the ship, pars pro toto) as a security for its payment, with maritime or extraordinary interest on account of the marine risks to be borne by the lender; it being stipulated that if the ship be lost in the course of the specified voyage, or during the limited time, by any of the perils enumerated in the contract, the lender shall also lose his money. 2 Hagg. Adm. 48. 53; 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 157; Abb. Shipp. 117-131. Where the loan is made on the credit of the cargo alone, the contract is called respondentia (q. v.)

BOUCHE (Fr. mouth). Ne gist en le bouche, it does not lie in the mouth, i. e., it is not for one to say. Litt. § 58. A phrase still used. En bouch del lay gents, in the mouth of the common people. Cro. Jac. 700. Il port meate en son bouche, it supports itself. Dyer, 28 (Fr. Ed.) Said of a deed.

An allowance of provision. Avoir bouche a court, to have an allowance at court; to be in ordinary at court; to have meat and drink scot-free there. Blount; Cowell, "Munitions de Bouche;" Ord. Mar. liv. 3, tit. 8, art. 11.

BOUCHE OF COURT, or BUDGE OF court. A certain allowance of provision from the king to his knights and servants that attended him in any military expedition. The French avoir bouche a court, is to have an allowance at court of meat and drink. From bouche, a mouth. But sometimes it extended only to bread, beer, and wine, and this was anciently in use as well in the houses of noblemen as in the king's court. Jacob.

BOUGH OF A TREE. A symbol which gave seisin of land, to hold of the donor in capite.

BOUGHT NOTE. A written memorandum of a sale, delivered by the broker who effects the sale, to the vendee. Story, Ag. § 28; 11 Adol. & E. 589; 8 Mees. & W. 834.

Bought and sold notes are made out usually at the same time; the former being delivered to the vendee, the latter to the vendor.

BOULEVARD. A public drive, adapted and set aside for purposes of ornament, exercise, and amusement. It is not technically a street, avenue, or highway, though a carriage way over it be a chief feature. 52 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 440.

BOUND BAILIFF. A sheriff's officer, who serves writs and makes arrests. He is so called because bound to the sheriff for the due execution of his office. 1 Bl. Comm. 345.

BOUNDARY. Any separation, natural or artificial, which marks the confines or line of two contiguous estates. Hunt, Boundaries.

The term is applied to include the objects placed or existing at the angles of the bounding lines, as well as those which extend along the lines of separation.

A natural boundary is a natural object remaining where it was placed by nature.

An artificial boundary is one erected by man.

BOUNDED TREE. A tree marking or standing at the corner of a field or estate.

BOUNDERS. Visible marks or objects at the ends of the lines drawn in surveys of land, showing the courses and distances.

BOUNTY. An additional benefit conferred upon, or a compensation paid to, a class of persons. It differs from a reward, which is usually applied to a sum paid for the performance of some specific act to some person or persons. It may or may not be part of a contract. Thus, the bounty offered a soldier would seem to be part of the consideration for his services. The bounty paid to fishermen is not a consideration for any contract, however.

BOUNTY LANDS. Lands given away by the government by way of bounty.

BOUNTY OF QUEEN ANNE. A royal charter confirmed by St. 2 Anne, c. 11, providing for the forming a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor ecclesiastical livings. Wharton.

BOURG (Fr.) In old French law. An assemblage of houses surrounded with walls; a fortified town or village. Steph. Lect. 118.

Originally, any aggregation of houses. Id.

A corporate town. Id.

BOURGEOIS. In old French law. The inhabitant of a bourg (q. v.) Steph. Lect. 118.

A person entitled to the privileges of a municipal corporation; a burgess. Id.

BOURSE DE COMMERCE. In the French law. An aggregation, sanctioned by government, of merchants, captains of vessels, exchange agents, and courtiers, the two latter being nominated by the government, in each city which has a bourse. Brown.

BOUWERYE, or BOUWERIE (Dutch). A farm.

BOUWMEESTER, or BOUWMASTER (Dutch). A farmer.

BOVATA TERRAE. As much land as one ox can cultivate. Said by some to be thirteen, by others eighteen, acres in extent. Skene de Verb. Sign.; Spelman; Co. Litt. 5a.

BOW-BEARER. An under officer of the forest, whose duty it is to oversee and true inquisition make, as well of sworn men as unsworn, in every bailiwick of the forest, and of all manner of trespasses done, either to vert or venison, and cause them to be presented, without any concealment, in the next court of attachment, etc. Cromp. Jur. 201.

BOWYERS. Manufacturers of bows and shafts. An ancient company of the city of London. 12 Edw. IV. c. 2; 33 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

BOYCOTT. A conspiracy to injure the business of any person by inducing others to abstain from business relations with him. The methods are so diverse as not to be comprehended by any definition. For illustrations, see 84 Va. 927; 45 Fed. 135; 55 Conn. 79.

If force or intimidation is resorted to, such combinations are unlawful. As to their legality in the absence of such measures, see 15 Q. B. Div. 476.

BOZERO. In Spanish law. An advocate; one who pleads the causes of others, either suing or defending. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. v. 1, 1-6.

Called, also, abogadas. Amongst other classes of persons excluded from this office are minors under seventeen, the deaf, the dumb, friars, women, and infamous persons. White, New Recop. 274.

BRANCH. A portion of the descendants of a person, who trace their descent to some common ancestor, who is himself a descendant of such person.

The whole of a genealogy is often called the "genealogical tree," and sometimes it is made to take the form of a tree, which is in the first place divided into as many branches as there are children, afterwards into as many branches as there are grandchildren, then great-grandchildren, etc. If, for example, it be desired to form the genealogical tree of Peter's family, Peter will be made the trunk of the tree; if he has had two children, John and James, their names will be written on the first two branches, which will themselves shoot out into as many smaller branches as John and James have children; from these others proceed, till the whole family is represented on the tree. Thus the origin, the application, and the use of the word "branch" in genealogy will be at once perceived. See "Line."

BRANDING. An ancient mode of punishment by inflicting a mark on an offender with a hot iron. It is generally disused in civil law, but is a recognized punishment for some military offenses.

BRANKS. An instrument of punishment formerly made use of in some parts of England for the correction of scolds, which it was said to do so effectually and so very safely that it was looked upon by Dr. Plotts, in his History of Staffordshire (page 389), "as much to be preferred to the ducking-stool, which not only endangered the health of the party, but also gives the tongue liberty 'twixt every dip, to neither of which is this liable. It brings such a bridle for the tongue as not only quite deprives them of speech, but brings shame for the transgression and humiliation thereupon before it is taken off."

BRASS KNUCKLES (or KNUCKS). A weapon consisting of metal covering part of the hand, and used to strike with. It was originally made of brass, and the name is now used as that of the weapon, without regard to the metal used. 3 Lea (Tenn.) 575; 3 S. W. 477.

BRAWL. Tumult; loud angry contention. See 42 N. H. 464.

Originally used in connection with disturbances in churches or churchyards. 4 Bl. Comm. 146; Steph. Cr. Dig. 102.

BREACH.

——In Contracts. The violation of an obligation, engagement, or duty.

Breach may be either by renunciation,—that is, by the declaration of the party that he does not intend to perform (32 Iowa, 409; 61 N. Y. 362; 52 Wis. 240), by such acts as will render performance impossible (82 N. Y. 108; 22 Fed. 522; 16 Mass. 161),—or by actually failing to perform any or all the terms of the contract; the two first mentioned being constructive breaches, and the last, actual breach.

A continuing breach is one where the condition of things constituting a breach continues during a period of time, or where the acts constituting a breach are repeated at brief intervals. F. Moore, 242; 1 Leon. 62; 1 Salk. 141; Holt, 178; 2 Ld. Raym. 1125.

——In Pleading. That part of the declaration in which the violation of the defendant's contract is stated.

BREACH OF CLOSE. Every unwarrantable entry upon the soil of another is a breach of his close. 3 Bl. Comm. 209.

BREACH OF COVENANT. A violation of, or a failure to perform the conditions of, a bond or covenant. The remedy is in some cases by a writ of covenant; in others, by an action of debt. 3 Bl. Comm. 156.

BREACH OF POUND. See "Pound Breach."

BREACH OF PRISON. An unlawful breaking out of prison. This is of itself a misdemeanor. 1 Russ. Crimes, 378; 4 Bl. Comm. 129; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 18, § 1; 7 Conn. 752. The remedy for this offense is by indictment. The climbing of a wall is not a breaking out, but if loose bricks be thrown from the wall it is. Russ. & R. 458. See "Escape."

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE. An act in violation of the privilege of a legislative body.

BREACH OF THE PEACE. A violation of public order; the offense of disturbing the public peace. 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 283. An act of public indecorum is also a breach of the peace.

BREACH OF TRUST.

(1) The willful misappropriation, by a trustee, of a thing which had been lawfully delivered to him in confidence.

The distinction between larceny and a breach of trust is to be found chiefly in the terms or way in which the thing was taken originally into the party's possession; and the rule seems to be that whenever the article is obtained upon a fair contract not for a mere temporary purpose, or by one who is in the employment of the deliverer, then the subsequent misappropriation is to be considered as an act of breach of trust.

(2) Any wrongful act of a trustee in violation of his duty as such, though not amounting to a crime.

BREAKING. Parting or dividing, by force and violence, a solid substance, or piercing, penetrating, or bursting through the same.

In cases of burglary and housebreaking, the removal of any part of the house, or of the fastenings provided to secure it, with violence and a felonious intent, is a breaking, as the raising of a closed window (107 N. C. 905), or the opening of a closed door (68 Ill. 271; 20 Iowa, 413), but an entry by an open door or window (85 Pa. St. 66; 25 Neb. 780) is not, though an entry through a chimney is a breaking into the house, for that is as much closed as the nature of things will permit (52 Ala. 376; 13 Ired. [N. C.] 244).

A constructive breaking is the procuring of an entry for felonious purpose by fraud or covin, as by pretending to have business with the owner (9 Ired. [N. C.] 463), or by collusion with an inmate (98 N. C. 629).

BREAKING OF ARRESTMENT. The contempt of the law committed by an arrestee who disregards the arrestment used in his hands, and pays the sum or delivers the goods arrested to the debtor. The breaker is liable to the arrester in damages. See "Arrestment."

BREAST OF THE COURT. The judgment or conscience of the court. A record is in the breast of the court, subject to correction, until the term is closed, after which it imports verity.

BREATH. In medical jurisprudence. The air expelled from the chest at each expiration.

BREDWITE. In Saxon and old English law. A fine, penalty, or amercement imposed for defaults in the assize of bread. Kennett, Par. Ant. 114; Cowell.

BREHON LAW. The ancient system of Irish law; so named from the judges, called "Brehons," or "Breitheamhuin." Its existence has been traced from the earliest period of Irish history down to the time of the Anglo Norman invasion. It is still a subject of antiquarian research. An outline of the system will be found in Knight's English Cyclopaedia.

BRENAGIUM. A payment in bran, which tenants anciently made to feed their lord's hounds. Blount.

BREPHOTROPHI. In civil law. Persons appointed to take care of houses destined to receive foundlings. Clef des Lois Rom. "Administrateurs."

BRETHWALDA, or BRETTWALDA. The leader of the Saxon heptarchy. Steph. Lect. 696.

BRETTS AND SCOTTS, LAWS OF THE. A code or system of laws in use among the Celtic tribes of Scotland down to the beginning of the fourteenth century, and then abolished by Edward I. of England. A fragment only is now extant. See Acts Parl. Scotland, vol. 1, pp. 299-301, Edin. 1844. It is interesting, like the Brehon laws of Ireland, in a historical point of view.

BREVA INNOMINATA. See "Breve Innominatum."

BREVE (Law Lat.) In old English law. A writ; properly an original writ (breve originale), by which all actions in the superior courts of England were once required to be commenced. Non potest quis sine brevi agere, no man can sue without a writ. Bracton, fols. 413b, 112; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 13, § 4; Steph. Pl. 5, 6; 3 Bl. Comm. 272, 273.

BREVE DE RECTO. A writ of right. The writ of right patent is of the highest nature of any in the law. Cowell; Fitzh. Nat. Brev.

BREVE INNOMINATUM. A writ containing a general statement only of the cause of action.

BREVE ITA DICITUR, QUIA REM DE qua agitur, et intentionem petentis, paucis verbis breviter enarrat. A writ is so called because it briefly states, in few words, the matter in dispute, and the object of the party seeking relief. 2 Inst. 39.

BREVE JUDICIALE DEBET SEQUI suum originale, et accessorium suum principale. A judicial writ ought to follow its original, and an accessory its principal. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 292.

BREVE JUDICIALE NON CADIT PRO defectu firmae. A judicial writ fails not through defect of form. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 43.

BREVE NOMINATUM. A writ containing a statement of the circumstances of the action.

BREVE ORIGINALE. An original writ.

BREVE PERQUIRERE. To purchase a writ or license of trial, in the king's courts, by the plaintiff, qui breve perquisivit; whence the usage of paying 6s. 8d. fine to the crown where the debt is £40, and of 10s. where the debt is £100, etc., in suits and trials for money due upon bond, etc. Wharton.

BREVE TESTATUM. A written memorandum introduced to perpetuate the tenor of the conveyance and investiture of lands. 2 Bl. Comm. 307. It was prepared after the transaction, and depended for its validity upon the testimony of witnesses, as it was not sealed. Spelman.

——In Scotch Law. A similar memorandum made out at the time of the transfer, attested by the pares curiae, and by the seal of the superior. Bell, Dict.

BREVET.

——In French Law. A warrant granted by government to authorize an individual to do something for his own benefit.

Brevet d'invention. A patent.

——In American Law. A commission conferring on a military officer a degree of rank specified in the commission, without, however, conveying a right to receive corresponding pay.

BREVIA (Lat.) Writs. The plural of breve (q. v.)

BREVIA ADVERSARIA. Adversary writs; those brought adversely to recover land.

BREVIA AMICABILIA. Amicable or friendly writs; writs brought by agreement or consent of the parties.

BREVIA ANTICIPANTIA. Anticipating writs; writs of prevention. See Termes de la Ley.

BREVIA DE CURSU. Formal writs issuing as of course. See "Brevia Formata."

BREVIA FORMATA (Lat.) Certain writs of approved and established form which were granted of course in actions to which they were applicable, and which could not be changed but by consent of the great council of the realm. Bracton, 413b.

BREVIA INNOMINATA. See "Breve Innominatum."

BREVIA JUDICIALIA (Lat.) Judicial writs. Subsidiary writs issued from the court during the progress of an action, or in execution of the judgment.

BREVIA MAGISTRALIA. Writs framed and issued by masters in chancery, not following any established form, but varying in accordance with the peculiarities of the particular case. Bracton, 413b.

BREVIA NOMINATA. See "Breve Nominatum."

BREVIA SELECTA. Choice or selected writs or processes. Often abbreviated to brev. sel.

BREVIA, TAM ORIGINALIA QUAM JUdiciali, patiuntur Anglica nomina. Writs, as well original as judicial, bear English names. 10 Coke, 132.

BREVIA TESTATA. See "Breve Testatum."

BREVIARIUM ALARICIANUM (or ANIAni) (Lat.) A code of law compiled by order of Alaric II., king of the Visigoths, for the use of the Romans living in his empire, published A. D. 506. It was collected by a committee of sixteen Roman lawyers, from the Codex Gregorianus, Hermogenianus, and Theodosianus, some of the later novels, and the writings of Gaius, Paulus, and Papinianus. In the middle ages, it is commonly referred to, under the titles Corpus Theodosianum, Lex Theodosiana, Liber Legum, or Lex Romana. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 49, § 59.

BREVIATE. An abstract or epitome of a writing. Holthouse.

BREVIBUS ET ROTULUS LIBERANDIS. A writ or mandate directed to a sheriff, commanding him to deliver to his successor the county and the appurtenances, with all the briefs, rolls, remembrances, and other things belonging to his office.

BRIBE. The gift or promise, which is accepted, of some advantage as the inducement for some illegal act or omission; or of some illegal emolument, as a consideration for preferring one person to another, in the performance of a legal act.

BRIBERY. At common law. The receiving or offering any undue reward by or to any person whomsoever, whose ordinary profession or business relates to the administration of public justice, in order to influence his behavior in office, and to incline him to act contrary to his duty and the known rules of honesty and integrity. Coke, 3d Inst. 149; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 67, § 2; 4 Bl. Comm. 139; 1 Russ. Crimes, 156.

The term "bribery" now extends further, and includes the offense of giving a bribe to many other officers. The offense of the giver and of the receiver of the bribe has the same name. For the sake of distinction, that of the former—viz., the briber—might be properly denominated "active bribery;" while that of the latter—viz., the person bribed—might be called "passive bribery."

"The voluntary giving or receiving of anything of value in corrupt payment for an official act done or to be done." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 85.

BRIBOUR. One that pilfers other men's goods; a thief. See St. 28 Edw. II. c. 1.

BRICOLIS. An engine by which walls were beaten down. Blount.

BRIDEWELL. A house of correction in England.

BRIDGE. A structure erected over a river, creek, stream, ditch, ravine, or other place, to facilitate the passage thereof; including, by the term, both arches and abutments. 3 Har. (N. J.) 108; 15 Vt. 438.

The common-law definition, flumen vel cursus aquae, etc., has a more enlarged significance in modern usage, and the term "bridge" in statutes signifies also crossings over public ways on land. 37 Me. 451.

Bridges are either public or private. Public bridges are such as form a part of the highway, common, according to their character, as foot, horse, or carriage bridges, to the public generally, with or without toll (2 East, 342); though their use may be limited to particular occasions, as to seasons of flood or frost (2 Maule & S. 262; 4 Campb. 189).

BRIDGE MASTERS. Persons chosen by the citizens to have the care and supervision of bridges, and having certain fees and profits belonging to their office, as in the case of London Bridge. Lex. Lond. 283.

BRIEF (Lat. brevis; Law Fr. briefe, short). A short or condensed statement.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. A papal rescript sealed with wax. See "Bull."

——In Old Practice. A writ. It is found in this sense in the ancient law authors. 2 Co. Litt. 73b.

——In English Practice. A statement by a solicitor to counsel, containing the facts and issues, the names of the witnesses, etc., to obtain the advice of counsel on a point of law, or to enable him to prepare for trial.

——In American Practice. The written or printed points, authorities, and argument furnished to the court by counsel. It must contain some statement of the case and argument therein; a mere copy of part of the assignments of error being insufficient. 12 Ind. 654. And see 43 Ind. 356.

BRIEF A L'EVESQUE. A writ to the bishop which, in quare impedit, shall go to remove an incumbent, unless he recover or be presented pendente lite. 1 Keb. 386.

BRIEF OF TITLE. An abstract of title (q. v.)

BRIEF (or BRIEVE) OUT OF THE chancery. A writ issued in Scotland in the name of the sovereign in the election of tutors to minors, the cognoscing of lunatics or of idiots, and the ascertaining the widow's terce; and sometimes in dividing the property belonging to heirs-portioners. In these cases, only brieves are now in use. Bell, Dict.

BRIEF, PAPAL. The pope's letter upon matters of discipline.

BRIEVE (from breve, q. v.) In Scotch law. A writ. 1 Kames, Eq. 146; 1 Forbes, Inst. pt. 4. bk. 2, c. 1, tit. 2, § 1.

BRIGA (Law Lat.) In old European law. Strife; contention; litigation; controversy. Spelman; Cowell; Blount.

BRIGANDINE. A coat of mail or ancient armor, consisting of numerous jointed scale-like plates, very pliant and easy for the body.

BRIGBOTE (Saxon). A contribution to repair a bridge.

BRINGING MONEY INTO COURT. The act of depositing money in the hands of the proper officer of the court for the purpose of satisfying a debt or duty, or of an interpleader. "See "Payment into Court."

BRIS. In French maritime law. Literally, breaking; wreck. Distinguished from naufrage (q. v.) Ord. Mar. liv. 2, tit. 9.

BRISTOL BARGAIN. A contract by which A. lends B. £1,000 on good security, and it is agreed that £500, together with interest, shall be paid at a time stated, and, as to the other £500, that B., in consideration thereof, shall pay to A. £100 per annum for seven years. Wharton.

BROCAGE. See "Brokerage."

BROCARIUS, or BROCATOR. A broker; a middle-man between buyer and seller; the agent of both transacting parties. Used in the old Scotch and English law. Bell, Dict.; Cowell.

BROCELLA. A thicket, or covert, of bushes and brushwood. "Browse" is said to be derived hence. Cowell.

BROKERAGE, or BROCAGE. The trade or occupation of a broker; the commissions paid to a broker for his services.

BROKERS. Those who are engaged for others in the negotiation of contracts relative to property, with the custody of which they have no concern. Paley, Ag. 13. See 16 Gray (Mass.) 436; 45 Ill. 79; 16 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 440.

One who receives a commission for making a bargain for another. 6 Bing. 702.

A salaried agent is not a broker. 1 Ore. 218.

A broker differs from a factor in that he has no possession of the property he sells. 47 Cal. 213; 41 N. Y. 235; 104 Mass. 259.

——Bill and Note Brokers. Those who negotiate the purchase and sale of bills of exchange and promissory notes.

——Exchange Brokers. Those who negotiate bills of exchange drawn on foreign countries, or on other places in this country.

——Insurance Brokers. Those who procure insurance, and negotiate between insurers and insured.

——Merchandise Brokers. Those who negotiate the sale of merchandise without having possession or control of it, as factors have.

——Pawnbrokers. Those who lend money in small sums, on the security of personal property, at usurious rates of interest. They are licensed by the authorities, and excepted from the operation of the usury laws.

——Real-Estate Brokers. Those who negotiate the sale or purchase of real property. They are a numerous class, and, in addition to the above duty, sometimes procure loans on mortgage security, collect rents, and attend to the letting and leasing of houses and lands.

——Ship Brokers. Those who negotiate the purchase and sale of ships, and the business of freighting vessels. Like other brokers, they receive a commission from the seller only.

——Stock Brokers. Those employed to buy and sell shares of stock in incorporated companies, and the indebtedness of governments. These brokers have possession of the certificates and other written evidences of title.

BROSSUS. Bruised, or injured with blows, wounds, or other casualty. Cowell.

BROTHEL. A bawdy house; a common habitation of prostitutes.

BROTHER. He who is born from the same father and mother with another, or from one of them only.

Brothers are of the whole blood when they are born of the same father and mother, and of the half-blood when they are the issue of one of them only. In the civil law, when they are the children of the same father and mother, they are called "brothers germain;" when they descend from the same father, but not the same mother, they are "consanguine brothers;" when they are the issue of the same mother, but not the same father, they are "uterine brothers." A "half-brother" is one who is born of the same father or mother, but not of both; one born of the same parents before they were married, a "left-sided brother;" and a bastard born of the same father or mother is called a "natural brother." See "Blood;" "Half-Blood;" "Line;" Merlin, Repert. Frere; Dict. de Jurisp. Frere; Code, 3. 28. 27; Nov. 84, praef.; Dane, Abr. Index.

BROTHER-IN-LAW. The brother of a wife, or the husband of a sister.

There is no relationship, in the former case, between the husband and the brother-in-law, nor in the latter, between the brother and the husband of the sister; there is only affinity between them. See Vaughan, 302, 329.

BRUARIUM, BRUERA, BRUERIA, or bruerum. In old English law. A heath ground; ground where heath grows. Spelman; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 71, § 7; Id. lib. 2, c. 41, § 2; Id. lib. 4, c. 27, § 16. Bracton, fol. 229b, 231; Co. Litt. 4b; Reg. Orig. 1b, 2.

BRUGBOTE. See "Brigbote."

BRUILLUS. A wood or grove; a thicket or clump of trees in a park or forest. Jacob.

BRUISE. In medical jurisprudence. An injury done with violence to the person, without breaking the skin. It is nearly synonymous with "contusion" (q. v.) 1 Chanc. Prac. 38. See 4 Car. & P. 381, 487, 558, 565.

BRUKBARN. In old Swedish law. The child of a woman conceiving after a rape, which was made legitimate. Literally, the child of a struggle. Barr. Obs. St.

BRUTUM FULMEN. An empty noise; an empty threat.

BUBBLE ACT. The name given to the statute 6 Geo. I. c. 18, which was passed in 1719, and was intended "for restraining several extravagant and unwarrantable practices therein mentioned." See 2 P. Wms. 219.

BUCKSTALL. A toil to take deer. 4 Inst. 306.

BUGGERY. Includes both "bestiality," or carnal connection between a human being and a beast, and "sodomy," or carnal connection between human beings against the order of nature. 3 Inst. 58.

BUILDING. An edifice, erected by art and fixed upon or over the soil, composed of stone, brick, marble, wood, or other proper substance, connected together, and designed for use in the position in which it is so fixed.

Taken in its broadest sense, it can mean only an erection intended for use and occupation as a habitation, or for some purpose of trade, ornament, or use. 13 Gray (Mass.) 312.

A bridge (11 Wis. 119), a floating dock (2 Vroom [N. J.] 477), seats or platforms in a park (55 Cal. 159; 39 Conn. 41) have been held not to be buildings, while an unfinished house (L. R. 1 C. C. 338), a stable (94 Ill. 456), a church (10 Pa. 413) are buildings.

BUILDING LEASE. A lease of the soil for the purpose of erecting buildings thereon, usually for a long term. See "Ground Rent."

BULK. Merchandise which is neither counted, weighed, nor measured.

A sale by bulk is a sale of a quantity of goods such as they are, without measuring, counting, or weighing. Civ. Code La. art. 3522, note 6.

BULL. A letter from the pope of Rome, written on parchment, to which is attached a leaden seal impressed with the images of Saint Peter and Saint Paul.

There are three kinds of apostolical rescripts,—the "brief," the "signature," and the "bull," which last is most commonly used in legal matters. Bulls may be compared to the edicts and letters patent of secular princes. When the bull grants a favor, the seal is attached by means of silken strings; and when to direct execution to be performed, with flax cords. Bulls are written in Latin, in a round and Gothic hand. Ayliffe, Par. 132; Ayliffe, Pand. 21; Merlin. Repert.

BULLA (Lat.) A seal used by the Roman emperors during the lower empire, and which was of four kinds,—gold, silver, wax, and lead. These are described by Spelman in detail.

A letter, brief, or charter, sealed with such a seal (literae bullatae). Spelman.

A brief, mandate, or bull of the pope, having usually a leaden, but sometimes a golden, seal. Spelman; Blount; Cowell; Burrill.

BULLETIN. An official account of public transactions on matters of importance. In France, it is the registry of the laws.

BULLION. The term "bullion" is commonly applied to uncoined gold and silver, in the mass or lump.

BULLION FUND. A deposit of public money at the mint and its branches. The object of this fund is to enable the mint to make returns of coins to private depositors of bullion without waiting until such bullion is actually coined. If the bullion fund is sufficiently large, depositors are paid as soon as their bullion is melted and assayed, and the value ascertained. It thus enables the mint to have a stock of coin on hand to pay depositors in advance. Such bullion becomes the property of the government, and, being subsequently coined, is available as a means of prompt payment to other depositors. Act May 23, 1850 (9 U. S. St. at Large, 436).

BUM-BAILIFF. A person employed to dun one for a debt; the bailiff employed to arrest a debtor. Black thinks it a vulgar corruption of "bound-bailiff" (q. v.) Hall says that, from the notion of a humming or droning noise, the word "bum" was applied to dunning for a debt.

BUNDA, BONDA, or BONNA. In old English law. A bound, boundary, border, or limit (terminus, limes). Spelman, voc. "Bannum;" "Bonna." 4 Inst. 318; Bracton, fol. 166b; 2 Crabb, Real Prop. 146; Reg. Orig. 263b.

BUOY. A piece of wood, or an empty barrel, or other thing, moored at a particular place, and floating on the water, to show the place where it is shallow, to mark the channel, or to indicate the danger there is to navigation.

BURDEN OF PROOF. The duty of proving the facts in dispute on an issue raised between the parties in a cause. See 16 N. Y. 66; 1 Gray (Mass.) 500; 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 481.

Burden of proof is to be distinguished from prima facie evidence or a prima facie case. Generally, when the latter is shown, the duty imposed upon the party having the burden will be satisfied, but it is not necessarily so. 6 Cush. (Mass.) 364; 11 Metc. (Mass.) 460; 22 Ala. 20; 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 427; 1 Gray (Mass.) 61; 7 Boston Law Rep. 439.

BUREAUCRACY. A government by departments, each under a chief; a word to describe the system used in an invidious sense. Wharton.

BURG, or BURGH. A term anciently applied to a castle or fortified place; a borough (q. v.) Spelman.

BURGAGE. A species of tenure, described by old law writers as but tenure in socage, where the king or other person was lord of an ancient borough, in which the tenements were held by a rent certain.

Such boroughs had, and still have, certain peculiar customs connected with the tenure, which distinguished it from the ordinary socage tenure. These customs are known by the name of "Borough English" (q. v.), and they alter the law in respect of descent, as well as of dower, and the power of devising. By it the youngest son inherits the lands of which his father died seised. A widow, in some boroughs, has dower in respect to all the tenements which were her husband's; in others, she has a moiety of her husband's lands so long as she remains unmarried; and with respect to devises, in some places, such lands only can be devised as were acquired by purchase; in others, estates can only be devised for life. 2 Bl. Comm. 82; Glanv. bk. 7, c. 3; Litt. § 162; Cro. Car. 411; 1 Salk. 243; 2 Ld. Raym. 1024; 1 P. Wms. 63; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 150; Cro. Eliz. 415.

BURGAGE HOLDING. A tenure by which lands in royal boroughs in Scotland were held of the sovereign. The service was watching and warding, and was done by the burgesses within the territory of the borough, whether expressed in the charter or not. See 31 & 32 Vict. c. 101.

BURGAGE TENURE. In English law. A tenure by which houses, or lands which were formerly the site of houses, in ancient boroughs, are held of the king, or other lord of the borough, at a certain yearly rent. Glanv. lib. 7, c. 3; Litt. §§ 162, 163; Co. Litt. 108b; 2 Bl. Comm. 82; Blount; 1 Steph. Comm. 198; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. p. 593, § 749.

BURGATOR. One who breaks into houses or inclosed places, as distinguished from one who committed robbery in the open country. Spelman, voc. "Burglaria."

BURGBOTE. A term applied, in the old English law, to a contribution towards the repair of castles or walls of defense, or of a borough.

BURGENSES. In old English law. The inhabitants of a borough.

BURGERISTH. A word used in Domesday, signifying a breach of the peace in a town. Jacob.

BURGESS. A magistrate of a borough. Blount. An officer who discharges the same duties for a borough that a mayor does for a city. The word is used in this sense in Pennsylvania.

An inhabitant of a town; a freeman; one legally admitted as a member of a corporation. Spelman. A qualified voter. 3 Steph. Comm. 192. A representative in parliament of a town or borough. 1 Bl. Comm. 174.

BURGESS ROLL. A list of those entitled to new rights under the act of 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 74; 3 Steph. Comm. 192 et seq.

BURGH ENGLISH. See "Borough English."

BURGH ENGLOYS. Borough English (q. v.) Y. B. P. 1 Edw. III. 38.

BURGHBRECH, or BURGHBRECHE. A fine imposed on the community of a town for a breach of the peace, etc.

BURGHMAILS. Yearly payments to the crown of Scotland, introduced by Malcolm III., and resembling the English fee-farm rents. Enc. Lond.

BURGHMOTE. In Saxon law. A court of justice held twice a year, or oftener, in a burg. All the thanes and free owners above the rank of ceorls were bound to attend without summons. The bishop or lord held the court. Spence, Eq. Jur.

BURGLAR. One who commits burglary (q. v.)

BURGLARIOUSLY. In pleading. A technical word which must be introduced into an indictment for burglary at common law. No other word at common law will answer the purpose, nor will any circumlocution be sufficient. 4 Coke, 39; 5 Coke, 121; Cro. Eliz. 920; Bac. Abr. "Indictment" (G, C). But there is this distinction: When a statute punishes an offense, by its legal designation, without enumerating the acts which constitute it, then it is necessary to use the terms which technically charge the offense named, at common law. But this is not necessary when the statute describes the whole offense, and the indictment charges the crime in the words of the statute. Thus, an indictment which charges the statute crime of burglary is sufficient, without averring that the crime was committed "burglariously." 4 Metc. (Mass.) 357.

BURGLARITER. In old criminal pleading. Burglariously.

BURGLARY. At common law, the breaking and entering the house of another in the nighttime, with intent to commit a felony therein, whether the felony be actually committed or not. Coke, 3d Inst. 63; 1 Hale, P. C. 549; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 38, § 1; 4 Bl. Comm. 224; 2 East, P. C. c. 15, § 1, p. 484; 2 Russ. Crimes, 2; Rosc. Crim. Ev. 252; 1 Coxe (N. J.) 441; 7 Mass. 247.

The elements of the offense are:

(1) The breaking (105 Mass. 588); but a constructive breaking is sufficient (9 Ired. [N. C.] 463). See "Breaking."

(2) The entry. 111 Mass. 395.

(3) The building broken and entered must be the dwelling house of another (43 Ala. 17); but an outstanding building within the curtilage is regarded as part of the dwelling (26 Ala. 45).

(4) Both breaking and entry must be in the nighttime. 10 N. H. 105.

(5) And both must be with intent to commit a felony in the house (12 N. H. 42); but the felony need not have been committed (29 Ind. 80).

The offense has been enlarged by statute both as to the buildings broken into, and as to the time of the breaking and entry.

BURGOMASTER. In Germany, this is the title of an officer who performs the duties of a mayor.

BURGWHAR. A burgess (q. v.)

BURIAL. The act of interring the dead. No burial is lawful unless made in conformity with the local regulations; and when a dead body has been found, it cannot be lawfully buried until the coroner has held an inquest over it. In England it is the practice for coroners to issue warrants to bury, after a view. The leaving unburied the corpse of a person for whom the defendant is bound to provide Christian burial, as a wife or child, is an indictable misdemeanor, if he is shown to have been of ability to provide such burial. 2 Den. C. C. 325.

BURKING, or BURKISM. Committing murder in order to sell the body for dissection. So called from the first perpetrator. See 4 Redf. Sur. (N. Y.) 540.

BURLAW (BYRLAW, or BIRLAW) courts. In Scotch law. Assemblages of neighbors to elect burlaw men, or those who were to act as rustic judges in determining disputes in their neighborhood. Skene de Verb. Sign.; Bell, Dict.

BURLAWS, BIRLAWS, or BYRLAWS. In Scotch law. Laws made by neighbors elected by common consent in the birlaw courts. Skene de Verb. Sign.

Laws made by husbandmen, etc., concerning neighborhood (rusticorum leges). Spelman, voc. "Bellagines," considers this word essentially the same with "by-laws" (q. v.)

BURNING. See "Accident;" "Fire."

BURNING IN THE HAND. When a layman was admitted to benefit of the clergy he was burned in the hand, "in the brawn of the left thumb," in order that he might not claim the benefit twice. This practice was finally abolished by St. 19 Geo. III. c. 74, though before that time the burning was often done with a cold iron. 12 Mod. 448; 4 Bl. Comm. 267 et seq.

BURROCHIUM. A burroch, dam, or small wear over a river, where fish traps are laid. Cowell.

BURROWMEALIS. A term in the Scotch law, used to designate the rents paid into the king's private treasury by the burgesses or inhabitants of a borough.

BURSA, or BURSE. A purse. Spelman; Bracton, fol. 84; Britt, c. 29.

BURSARIA. The bursery or exchequer of collegiate and conventual bodies; or the place of receiving and paying and accounting by the bursarii, or bursers, A. D. 1277. But the word "bursarii" did not only signify the bursers of a convent or college, but formerly stipendiary scholars were called by the name of "bursarii," as they lived on the burse or fund, or public stock of the university. At Paris, and among the Cisterian monks, they were particularly termed by this name. Jacob.

BURYING ALIVE. In English law. The ancient punishment of sodomites, and those who contracted with Jews. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 27, § 3.

BURYING GROUND. A place appropriated for depositing the dead; a cemetery. In Massachusetts, burying grounds cannot be appropriated to roads without the consent to the owners. Gen. St. Mass. 244.

BUSCARL, or BUTSECARL. In Saxon and old English law. Seamen or marines; milites nautici. Spelman.

BUSHEL. The Winchester bushel, established by 13 Wm. III. c. 5 (1701), was made the standard of grain. A cylindrical vessel, eighteen and a half inches in diameter, and eight inches deep inside, contains a bushel. The capacity is 2,145.42 cubic inches. The bushel established by 5 & 6 Geo. IV. c. 74, is to contain 2,218.192 cubic inches. This measure has been adopted in many of the United States. In New York the heaped bushel is allowed, containing 2,815 cubic inches. The exceptions, as far as known, are Connecticut, where the bushel holds 2,198 cubic inches; Kentucky, 2,150.66; Indiana, Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri, where it contains 2,150.4 cubic inches. Dane, Abr. c. 211, a. 12, § 4. See the whole subject discussed in Report of the Secretary of State of the United States to the Senate, Feb. 22, 1821.

In accordance with a joint resolution of congress, adopted in June, 1836, a uniform scale of weights and measures has been adopted in many states, by which the bushel shall contain 2,150 cubic inches. See Dom. Commerce Act N. Y. § 2.

It is further provided that, where any commodity is sold by the bushel, and no special agreement is made as to the mode of measuring, the bushel shall consist of 70 pounds of lime; 60 pounds of wheat, peas, potatoes, clover seed, or beans; 57 pounds of onions; 56 pounds of Indian corn or rye; 55 pounds of flaxseed; 54 pounds of sweet potatoes; 50 pounds of corn meal, rye meal, or carrots; 48 pounds of barley, apples, or buckwheat; 45 pounds of beard grass, timothy seed, or rice; 33 pounds of dried peaches; 32 pounds of oats; 25 pounds dried apples; 20 pounds bran or shorts. Id. § 8.

BUSINESS CORPORATION. A stock corporation other than insurance, banking, and transportation corporations. Gen. Corp. Law N. Y. § 2.

BUSINESS HOURS. The time of the day during which business is transacted. In respect to the time of presentment and demand of bills and notes, business hours generally range through the whole day down to the hours of rest in the evening, except when the paper is payable at a bank, or by a banker. 2 Hill (N. Y.) 835. See 15 Me. 67; 17 Me. 230.

BUSONES. A word found only in Bracton (folio 115b). From the context, it means the principal persons of the county, and is thought to have been synonymous with "barons." 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 2, note; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 161.

BUSSA, or BUSCIA. In old English law. A ship of large size and clumsy construction. Spelman.

BUTLERAGE. A certain portion of every cask of wine imported by an alien, which the king's butler was allowed to take. Called also "prisage." 2 Bulst. 254. Anciently, it might be taken also of wine imported by a subject. 1 Bl. Comm. 315; Termes de la Ley; Cowell.

BUTLER'S ORDINANCE. In English law. A law for the heir to punish waste in the life of the ancestor. "Though it be on record in the parliament book of Edward I., yet it never was a statute, nor ever so received; but only some constitution of the king's council, or lords in parliament, which never obtained the strength or force of an act of parliament." Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 18.

BUTT. A measure of capacity, equal to one hundred and eight gallons. See "Measure."

BUTTALS. The bounding lines of land at the end; abuttals.

BUTTED AND BOUNDED. A phrase sometimes used in conveyancing, to denote the boundaries of lands. See "Butts and Bounds."

BUTTS. The ends or short pieces of arable lands left in ploughing. Cowell.

Butt also denotes a measure of land (Jacob; Cowell), and a measure of quantity, equal to one hundred and eight gallons. See "Measure."

BUTTS AND BOUNDS. The lines bounding an estate; the angles or points where these lines change their direction. Cowell; Spelman.

BUTTY. A local term in the north of England, for the associate or deputy of another; also of things used in common.

BUYING TITLES. The purchase of the rights of a disseisee to lands of which a third person has the possession.

BY, or BYE. A habitation. Co. Litt.; 18 App. Div. (N. Y.) 142.

BY-BIDDING. Bidding on property offered for sale at auction, by or in behalf of the owner, for the mere purpose of raising the price, or inducing others to bid higher. Sometimes called "puffing." By-bidding by the owner, or caused by the owner, or ratified by him, has often been held to be a fraud, and avoids the sale. 8 How. (U. S.) 153.

BY BILL, or BY BILL WITHOUT WRIT. These terms were anciently applied to actions commenced by original bill, instead of by original writ. 1 Archb. Pr. pp. 2, 337; 5 Hill (N. Y.) 213. They were later used to denote actions commenced by capias.

BY ESTIMATION. A term used in conveyances. In sales of land it not unfre-quently occurs that the property is said to contain a certain number of acres "by estimation," or so many acres, "more or less." When these expressions are used, if the land fall short by a small quantity, the purchaser will receive no relief. In one case of this kind, the land fell short two-fifths, and the purchaser received no relief. 2 Freem. 106. See 1 Call. (Va.) 301; 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 184; 6 Bin. (Pa.) 106; 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 166; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 37; 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 508; 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 471; 3 Mass. 380; 5 Mass. 355; 1 Root (Conn.) 528. The meaning of these words has never been precisely ascertained by judicial decision. See Sugd. Vend. 231-236; Wolff. Inst. § 658; and the cases cited under the articles "Constitution;" "More or Less;" "Subdivision."

BY GOD AND MY COUNTRY. In old English criminal practice. The established formula of reply by a prisoner, when arraigned at the bar, to the question, "Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?" Mr. Barrington thinks the correct formula must originally have been, "By God or my country," i. e., by ordeal (the judicium Dei), or by jury, for the reason that the question asked supposes an option in the prisoner, and the answer is meant to assert his innocence by declining neither sort of trial. Barr. Obs. St. 84, note (i). But it is clear that, in answering the question, the prisoner was expected to select one particular mode of trial, which the alternative expression contended for would not amount to. That the expression "By God" did not necessarily and exclusively import the ordeal appears from the form of issue in cases of trial by the grand assize, which always was that the party put himself "on God and on the grand assize." See Britt. c. 48; Y. B. T. 20 Hen. VI. 4. That every word of this formula was deemed essential appears from several cases on record, in which the prisoner's replies, "By God and my good country," "By God and honest men," were severally rejected, and he was compelled to use the precise words of the form. 1 How. St. Tr. 1143; 3 How. St. Tr. 520; 6 How. St. Tr. 75; 7 How. St. Tr. 831. On the trial of John James for high treason (13 Car. II. 1661), and the prisoner requesting an explanation of the form, the judge said that "By God" meant "by the law of God," and "by the country," twelve Middlesex men of truth, that would judge impartially between the king and him. 6 How. St. Tr. 75.

BY-LAW MEN. In an ancient deed, certain parties are described as "yeomen and by-law men for this present year in Easinguold." 6 Q. B. 60. They appear to have been men appointed for some purpose of limited authority by the other inhabitants, as the name would suggest, under by-laws of the corporation appointing.

BY-LAWS.

——In Old English Law. The ordinances of a town or village. See "By."

——In Modern Usage. Rules and ordinances made by a corporation for its own government. See 18 App. Div. (N. Y.) 142.

BY-ROAD. "There are three kinds of roads known to our law: (1) Public roads; (2) private roads; (3) by-roads. All these differ from a mere right of way. A by-road is, as its name imports, an obscure or neighborhood road in its earlier existence, not used to any great extent by the public, yet so far a public road that the public have of right free access to it at all times." 34 N. J. Law, 89; 46 N. J. Law, 509.

BY THE BYE. In practice. Without process. A declaration is said to be filed by the bye when it is filed against a party already in the custody of the court under process in another suit. This might have been done, formerly, where the party was under arrest, and technically in the custody of the court; and even giving common bail was a sufficient custody in the king's bench. 1 Sellon, Prac. 228; 1 Tidd. Prac. 419. It is no longer allowed. Archb. New Prac. 293.

C

C. The third letter of the alphabet. It was used on the ballots of Roman jurors to denote condemnation, being the initial letter of condemno. See "A."

"C" is sometimes used for "t" in old records, as "tercia" for "tertia," and "tocius" for "totius." Mag. Cart. 9 Hen. III. c. 7.

C. A. V. An abbreviation for curia advisari vult (q. v.).

C. O. D. Collect on delivery. The abbreviation has acquired an established meaning (39 Ill. 312), but judicial notice will not be taken thereof (55 N. Y. 200).

C. T. A. Cum testamento annexo. A species of administration (q. v.)

CABAL (Hebrew, cabala, tradition; or Fr. cabale, intrigue).

(1) A hidden or imaginary art practiced by the Jews. 1 Hall. Lit. Hist. 205. The Jews believed that Moses received in Sinai not only the law, but also certain unwritten principles of interpretation, called "cabala" or "tradition," which were handed down from father to son, and in which mysterious and magical powers were supposed to reside.

(2) A junto or private meeting of small parties. This name was given to that ministry in the reign of Charles II., formed by Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, who concerted for the restoration of popery.

CABALLERIA. In Spanish law. A portion of spoils taken or lands conquered in a war, granted to a horse soldier. Dict. Span. Acad.; 12 Pet. (U. S.) 444, note.

A quantity of land, varying in extent in different provinces. In those parts of the United States which formerly belonged to Spain, it is a lot of one hundred feet front, two hundred feet depth, and equivalent to five peonias. 2 White, New Recop. 49; 12 Pet. (U. S.) 444, note; Escriche, Dic. Raz.

CABALLERO (Spanish; from Latin caballus, a horse). In Spanish law. A knight. So called on account of its being more honorable to go on horseback (a caballo) than on any other beast. White, New Recop. bk. 1, tit. 5, c. 3, § 3; Id. bk. 1, tit. 5, c. 1; Id. bk. 4, tit. 10, c. 1, § 6.

CABINET. Certain officers who, taken collectively, form a council or advisory board; as the cabinet of the president of the United States, which is composed of the secretary of state, the secretary of the treasury, the secretary of the interior, the secretary of war, the secretary of the navy, the secretary of agriculture, the attorney general, and the postmaster general.

CABINET COUNCIL. A private and confidential assembly of the most considerable ministers of state, to concert measures for the administration of public affairs; first established by Charles I. Wharton.

CABLISH. In forest law. Brush-wood. According to Spelman, windfallen wood. Spelman, voc. "Cablicia."

CACHEPOLUS, or CACHERELLAS. An inferior bailiff, or catchpoll. Jacob.

CACICAZGOS. In Spanish law. Lands held in entail by the caciques in Indian villages in Spanish America.

CADASTRE. In Spanish law. The official statement of the quantity and value of real property in any district, made for the purpose of justly apportioning the taxes payable on such property. 12 Pet. (U. S.) 428, note; 3 Am. St. Papers, 679.

CADASTU. In French law. Same as cadastre (q. v.)

CADERE (Lat.) To fall; to fail; to end; to terminate.

The word was generally used to denote the termination or failure of a writ, action, complaint, or attempt; as, cadit actio, the action fails, cadit assisa, the assise abates, cadere causa, or a causa, to lose a cause. Abate will translate cadere as often as any other word; the general signification being, as stated, to fail or cease. Cadere ab actione (literally, to fall from an action), to fail in an action; cadere in partem, to become subject to a division.

To become; to be changed to; cadit assisa in juratum, the assize has become a jury. Calv. Lex.; Smith.

CADI. A Turkish civil magistrate.

CADUCA (Lat. cadere, to fall). In civil law. An inheritance; an escheat; everything which falls to the legal heir by descent.

By some writers, bona caduca are said to be those to which no heir succeeds, equivalent to escheats. Du Cange.

CAEDUA (Lat. from caedere, to cut). In the civil and old common law. Kept for cutting; intended or used to be cut. A term applied to wood. Silva caedua est quae in hoc habetur ut caederetur, sylva caedua is that kind of wood which is kept for the purpose of being cut. Dig. 50. 16. 30. According to Servius, it was that kind which, when cut down, grew up again from the trunks or roots. Id. See Dig. 7. 1. 10. 11; Id. 43. 24. 18.

CAETERIS PARIBUS. Other things being equal.

CAETERIS TACENTIBUS (Lat.) The others being silent; the other judges expressing no opinion. Comb. 186. A phrase in the old reports.

CAETERORUM (Lat.) Of the rest.

Administration granted as to the residue of an estate, which cannot be administered under the limited power already granted. 1 Williams, Ex'rs, 357; 2 Hagg. Ecc. 62; 4 Hagg. Ecc. 382, 386; 4 Man. & G. 398; 1 Curt. Ecc. 286.

It differs from administration de bonis non in this, that in caeterorum the full power granted is exercised and exhausted, while in the other the power is, for some cause, not fully exercised. See "Administration."

CAHIER (Fr.) In old French law. A list of grievances prepared for deputies in the states general. Steph. Lect. 254. A petition for the redress of grievances enumerated. Id. 257.

CAIRNS' ACT. So called from the solicitor general by whom it was introduced. Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, enabling the court of chancery to award damages in addition to, or in substitution for, an injunction or decree for specific performance. Per Jessel, M. R., in 7 Ch. Div. 551.

CALCETUM (Law Lat.) In old English law. A causeway. Reg. Orig. 154; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 52, § 33.

CALE (Fr.) In old French law. A species of punishment inflicted upon sailors, by plunging into the water, and drawing up again. Ord. Mar. liv. 2, tit. 1, art. 22. The modern keel hauling.

CALEFAGIUM. A right to take fuel yearly. Blount.

CALENDAR. An almanac.

Julius Caesar ordained that the Roman year should consist of three hundred and sixty-five days, except every fourth year, which should contain three hundred and sixty-six,—the additional day to be reckoned by counting the 24th day of February (which was the 6th of the calends of March) twice. See "Bissextile." This period of time exceeds the solar year by eleven minutes, or thereabouts, which amounts to the error of a day in about one hundred and thirty-one years. In 1582 the error amounted to eleven days or more, which was corrected by Pope Gregory. Out of this correction grew the distinction between Old and New Style. The Gregorian or New Style was introduced into England in 1752; the 2d day of September (O. S.) of that year being reckoned as the 14th day of September (N. S.)

——In Criminal Law. A list of prisoners, containing their names, the time when they were committed, and by whom, and the cause of their commitments. 4 Bl. Comm. 403.

——In Practice. A list of cases arranged for trial or argument in court.

CALENDAR MONTH. A month as measured by the calendar, as distinguished from a business month (thirty days), or a lunar month (twenty-eight days).

CALENDS. Among the Romans, the first day of every month, being spoken of by itself, or the very day of the new moon, which usually happen together. And if pridie, the day before, be added to it, then it is the last day of the foregoing month, as pridie calend. Septemb. is the last day of August. If any number be placed with it, it signifies that day in the former month which comes so much before the month named, as the tenth calends of October is the 20th day of September; for if one reckons backwards, beginning at October, that 20th day of September makes the 10th day before October. In March, May, July, and October, the calends begin at the sixteenth day, but in other months at the fourteenth; which calends must ever bear the name of the month following, and be numbered backwards from the first day of the said following months. Jacob. See "Ides" for table of calends, nones, and ides.

CALL.

——In Conveyancing. The designation in a survey of landmarks, courses, or distances is denominated a "call."

——In Corporation Law. A demand or assessment by the corporation on the stockholders due on their stock for the purposes of the corporation.

——In the Parlance of Stock and Grain Exchanges. An option to purchase stock or grain from another on a certain day at a given price. The opposite transaction to a "put" (q. v.)

CALLING THE JURY. The calling in court of the names on the jury list when a jury is to be selected and impanelled.

CALLING THE PLAINTIFF. A formal method of causing a nonsuit to be entered, the plaintiff absenting himself from the courtroom, and the case being dismissed for his nonappearance after he has been called by the crier.

CALLING TO THE BAR. Conferring the degree or dignity of barrister upon a member of the Inns of Court. Holthouse.

CALPE, or CAUPE. In old Scotch law. A gift of a horse, or other thing, made by a man in his lifetime and liege poustie (lawful power), to the chief of his clan or other superior, for his maintenance and protection, and which was delivered immediately after his decease. Skene de Verb. Sign. voc. "Caupes." A species of herezeld (q. v.)

CALUMNIA (Lat.) In the civil law. Calumny, malice, or ill design; a false accusation; a malicious prosecution. Inst. 4. 16. 1, Cooper's Notes; Dig. 3. 6; Code, 9. 46.

CALUMNIA, or CALUMPNIA (Law Lat.)

——In Old English Law and Practice. A claim or demand (vindicatio; law Lat. clameus). Spelman. The demand of a right in anything (juris in re aliqua postulatio). Id. A challenge. Spelman; Reg. Orig. 223, 224; Co. Litt. 155b; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 299.

——In Feudal Law. An objection. Feud. lib. 2, tit. 1.

CALUMNIAE JURAMENTUM. See "Calumniae Jusjurandum."

CALUMNIAE JUSJURANDUM (Lat.) The oath against calumny.

Both parties at the beginning of a suit, in certain cases, were obliged to take an oath that the suit was commenced in good faith, and in a firm belief that they had a good cause. Bell, Dict. The object was to prevent vexatious and unnecessary suits. It was especially used in divorce cases, though of little practical utility. Bish. Mar. & Div. § 353. A somewhat similar provision is to be found in the requirement made in some states that the defendant shall file an affidavit of merits.

CALUMNIATORS. In civil law. Persons who accuse others, whom they know to be innocent, of having committed crimes.

CALUMNY. Defamation. In old practice. The unjust prosecution or defense of a suit. See 30 Ohio St. 117.

CAMARA. In Spanish law. A treasury. Las Partidas, pt. 6, tit. 3, lib. 2.

The exchequer. White, New Recop. bk. 3, tit. 8, c. 1.

CAMBELLANUS, or CAMBELLARIUS (Lat.) In old law. A chamberlain. Spelman.

CAMBIATOR. In old English law. An exchanger. Cambiatores monetae, exchangers of money; money changers. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 22, § 7.

CAMBIO. Exchange.

CAMBIPARTIA. Champerty.

CAMBIPARTICEPS. A champertor.

CAMBIST. A person skilled in exchange; one who deals or trades in promissory notes or bills of exchange; a broker.

CAMBIUM. Change; exchange. Applied in the civil law to exchange of lands, as well as of money or debts. Du Cange.

Cambium reale or manuale was the term generally used to denote the technical common-law exchange of lands; cambium locale, mercantile, or trajectitium was used to designate the modern mercantile contract of exchange, whereby a man agrees, in consideration of a sum of money paid him in one place, to pay a like sum in another place. Poth. de Change, note 12; Story, Bills, § 2 et seq.

CAMERA (Law Lat.; Lat. camera, a vault or arched roof; an upper gallery; Spanish, camara).

——In Old European Law. A chamber; an apartment in a dwelling house.

A treasure chamber, or treasury; a chamber with a vaulted roof, for the keeping of the public treasure.

A private treasury; a place for keeping private funds or moneys; a coffer; personal funds, as distinguished from land.

——In Old English Practice. A judge's chamber. Dyer, 59b (Fr. Ed.); Id. 140b.

CAMERA REGIS. (Lat. the chambers of the king). A term formerly applied especially to harbors, and generally to all the harbors or ports of the kingdom. Cowell.

CAMERA SCACCARII. The exchequer chamber. Spelman.

CAMERA STELLATA. The star chamber.

CAMERALISTICS. The science of finance or public revenue, comprehending the means of raising and disposing of it. Wharton.

CAMERARIUS. A chamberlain; a keeper of the public money; a treasurer. Spelman, voc. "Cambellarius;" 1 Per. & D. 243.

CAMPANA. In old European law. A bell. Spelman.

CAMPANA BAJULA. A small hand bell used in the ceremonies of the Romish church, and, among Protestants, by sextons, parish clerks, and criers. Cowell.

CAMPANARIUM, or CAMPANILE. A belfry, bell tower or steeple; a place where bells are hung. Spelman; Towns. Pl. 191, 213.

CAMPARTUM. A part or portion of a larger field or ground, which would otherwise be in gross or in common; champerty.

CAMPBELL'S ACT. The popular name for Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, by which (as amended by St. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 115) an action for damages is given for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, grandparent, stepparent, child, grandchild and stepchild of a person whose death has been caused by a wrongful act, neglect, or default for which he himself could, if death had not ensued, have recovered damages from the wrongdoer. Underh. Torts, 143; Campb. Neg. 20. Similar statutes of recent enactment exist in nearly all of the states, some of which permit the personal representatives of the person killed to sue.

CAMPERS, or CAMPIPARS (Law Lat.; Fr. champert). In old English statutes. A share or division of land, or other thing; champerty.

CAMPERTUM. A cornfield; a field of grain. Cowell; Whishaw.

CAMPFIGHT. In old English law. The fighting of two champions or combatants in the field (campus); the judicial combat, or duellum. 3 Inst. 221.

CAMPUS (Lat. a field). A share or division of land; a division of that which would otherwise be in gross; champerty. Blount; Cowell.

CAMPUS MAII (Law Lat.) The field of May. An anniversary assembly of the Saxons, held on May Day, when they confederated for the defense of the kingdom against all its enemies. Wharton.

CAMPUS MARTII (Law Lat.) The field of March. A national assemblage of the Franks held in that month.

CANAL. An artificial cut or trench in the earth, for conducting and confining water to be used for transportation.

CANCELLARIA. Chancery; the court of chancery. Curia cancellaria is also used in the same sense. See 4 Bl. Comm. 46; Cowell.

CANCELLARIUS (Law Lat.) A chancellor anciently so called from the cancelli (lattices, or latticed inclosure) within which he performed his office. Cassiodorus Variar. lib. 11, form 6; Spelman, voc. "Cancellarius."

A janitor, or one who stood at the door of the court, and was accustomed to carry out the commands of the judges; so called from his position as keeper of the gate or lattice. A scribe; a notary. Du Cange.

CANCELLATION. The act of crossing out a writing; the manual operation of tearing or destroying a written instrument. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 409; Roberts, Wills, 367, note.

Revocation or annulment of an instrument in any manner. See 58 Pa. St. 238.

CANCELLATURA. In old English law. A cancelling. Bracton, 398b; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 34, § 5.

CANCELLI. The rails or balusters inclosing the bar of a court of justice or the communion table; also the lines drawn on the face of a will or other writing, with the intention of revoking or annulling it. Wharton.

CANDIDATE (Lat. candidus, white). Said to be from the custom of Roman candidates to clothe themselves in a white tunic.

One who offers himself for an office. One must offer himself either directly, or by consenting to the presentation of his name by others to be a candidate. 2 Maule & S. 212.

It has been held to include persons seeking a nomination for office. 112 Pa. St. 624.

CANDLEMAS DAY. A festival appointed by the church to be observed on the second day of February in every year, in honor of the purification of the Virgin Mary, being forty days after her miraculous delivery. At this festival, formerly, the Protestants went, and the Papists now go, in procession with lighted candles. They also consecrate candles on this day for the service of the ensuing year. It is the fourth of the four cross quarter days of the year. Wharton.

CANFARA. A trial by hot iron, formerly in use in England. Jacob.

CANON.

(1) A prebendary, or member of a chapter of the Church of England. All members of chapters except deans are now to be entitled "canons," in England. 3 Steph. Comm. 67, note; 1 Bl. Comm. 382.

(2) A rule, maxim, or precept of law, as the "canons of construction," or the "canons of descent." Most commonly a rule of ecclesiastical law. See "Canon Law."

(3) In Spanish law. The annual charge or rent paid on recognition of the dominium utile by holder thereof. 15 Cal. 556.

CANON LAW. A body of ecclesiastical law, which originated in the church of Rome, relating to matters of which that church has or claims jurisdiction.

A canon is a rule of doctrine or of discipline, and is the term generally applied to designate the ordinances of councils and decrees of popes. The position which the canon law obtains beyond the papal dominions depends on the extent to which it is sanctioned or permitted by the government of each country; and hence the system of canon law as it is administered in different countries varies somewhat.

Though this system of law is of primary importance in Catholic countries alone, it still maintains great influence and transmits many of its peculiar regulations down through the jurisprudence of Protestant countries which were formerly Catholic. Thus, the canon law has been a distinct branch of the profession in the ecclesiastical courts of England for several centuries; but the recent modifications of the jurisdiction of those courts have done much to reduce its independent importance.

The Corpus Juris Canonici is drawn from various sources,—the opinions of the ancient fathers of the church, the decrees of councils, and the decretal epistles and bulls of the holy see, together with the maxims of the civil law and the teachings of the Scriptures. These sources were first drawn upon for a regular ecclesiastical system about the time of Pope Alexander III., in the middle of the twelfth century, when one Gratian, an Italian monk, animated by the discovery of Justinian's Pandects, collected the ecclesiastical constitutions also into some method in three books, which he entitled Concordia Discordantium Canonum. These are generally known as Decretum Gratiani.

The subsequent papal decrees to the time of the pontificate of Gregory IX. were collected in much the same method, under the auspices of that pope, about the year 1230, in five books, entitled Decretalia Gregorii Noni. A sixth book was added by Boniface VIII., about the year 1298, which is called Sextus Decretalium. The Clementine Constitution, or decrees of Clement V., were in like manner authenticated in 1317 by his successor, John XXII., who also published twenty constitutions of his own, called the Extravangantes Joannis, so called because they were in addition to, or beyond the boundary of, the former collections, as the additions to the civil law were called Novels. To these have since been added some decrees of later popes, down to the time of Sixtus IV., in five books, called Extravagantes Communes. And all these together—Gratian's Decrees, Gregory's Decretals, the Sixth Decretals, the Clementine Constitutions, and the Extravagants of John and his successors—form the Corpus Juris Canonici, or body of the Roman law. 1 Bl. Comm. 82; Encyclopedie, Dr. Canon. Dr. Pub. Ecc.; Dict. de Jur. Dr. Canon.; Ersk. Inst. bk. 1, tit. 1, § 10.

CANON RELIGIOSORUM (Lat.) In ecclesiastical records. A book wherein the religious of every greater convent had a fair transcript of the rules of their order, frequently read among them as their local statutes. Kennett; Cowell.

CANONICUS (Law Lat.) A canon.

CANONRY. An ecclesiastical benefice attaching to the office of canon. Holthouse.

CANONS OF INHERITANCE, or CANONS of descent. The legal rules by which inheritances are regulated, and according to which estates are transmitted by descent from the ancestor to the heir. 2 Bl. Comm. 208; 1 Steph. Comm. 359.

CANT. In the civil law. A judicial sale at the request of tenants in common for the purpose of dividing the property. See 9 Mart. (La.) 87.

CANTEL (Law Lat. cantellum velut quantillum). In old English law. That which is added above measure; heaped measure. Spelman; Blount.

CANTRED. A hundred; a district containing a hundred villages. Used in Wales in the same sense as "hundred" in England. Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

CANUM (Law Lat. from Celt. can, chan, or kain, a head). In old Scotch law. A tribute or duty paid by the tenant of land to the lord, especially to ecclesiastical superiors. According to Skene, it was payable either in the produce of the land, or in money. Skene de Verb. Sign. But it seems to have been generally paid in produce, such as wheat, oats, poultry, etc. The Scotch word was cane or kain; and the expressions "cane fowls," "cane cheese," "cane oats" are frequently made use of. See "Kain."

CANVASS. The act of examining the returns of votes for a public officer.

CAP OF MAINTENANCE. One of the regalia or ornaments of state belonging to the sovereigns of England, before whom it is carried at the coronation and other great solemnities. Caps of maintenance are also carried before the mayors of several cities in England. Enc. Lond.

CAPACITY. Ability, power, qualification, or competency of persons, natural or artificial. 2 Comyn, Dig. 294; Dane, Abr.

(1) Natural power or competency to perform an act, as capacity to contract, capacity to commit crime.

(2) Official, or representative power or character. As to when one is acting in an official, and not a personal, capacity, see 3 Story (U. S.) 87; 6 Robt. (N. Y.) 502.

CAPAX DOLI (Lat. capable of committing crime). The condition of one who has sufficient mind and understanding to be made responsible for his actions.

CAPAX NEGOTII. Capacity to contract.

CAPE. A judicial writ touching a plea of lands and tenements. The writs which bear this name are of two kinds, namely, cape magnum, or grand cape, and cape parvum, or petit cape. The petit cape is so called, not so much on account of the smallness of the writ as of the letter. Fleta, lib. 6, c. 55, § 40. For the difference between the form and the use of these writs, see 2 Wm. Saund. 45c, 45d; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 55, § 40.

CAPE AD VALENTIAM. A species of cape magnum. See "Cape."

CAPELLA.

——In Old Records. A box, cabinet, or repository in which were preserved the relics of martyrs. Spelman. A small building in which relics were preserved; an oratory or chapel. Id.

——In Old English Law. A chapel. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 12, § 1; Spelman; Cowell.

CAPERS. Vessels of war owned by private persons, and different from ordinary privateers only in size, being smaller. Beawes, Lex. Merc. 230.

CAPIAS (Lat. capere, to take; capias, that you take). A writ directing the sheriff to take the person of the defendant into custody.

It is a judicial writ, and issued originally only to enforce compliance with the summons of an original writ, or with some judgment or decree of the court. It was originally issuable as a part of the original process in a suit only in case of injuries committed by force or with fraud, but was much extended by statutes. Being the first word of distinctive significance in the writ, when writs were framed in Latin, it came to denote the whole class of writs by which a defendant's person was to be arrested. It was issuable either by the court of common pleas or king's bench, and bore the seal of the court.

CAPIAS AD AUDIENDUM JUDICIUM. A writ issued, in a case of misdemeanor, after the defendant has appeared and is found guilty, to bring him to judgment if he is not present when called. 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 368.

CAPIAS AD COMPUTANDUM. A writ which issued in the action of account render upon the judgment quod computet, when the defendant refused to appear in his proper person before the auditors and enter into his account.

According to the ancient practice, the defendant might, after arrest upon this process, be delivered on mainprize, or, in default of finding mainpernors, was committed to the Fleet prison, where the auditors attended upon him to hear and receive his account. The writ is now disused.

CAPIAS AD RESPONDENDUM. A writ commanding the officer to whom it is directed "to take the body of the defendant, and keep the same to answer the plaintiff," etc.

This is the writ of capias which is generally intended by the use of the word capias, and was formerly a writ of great importance. For some account of its use and value, see "Arrest;" "Bail."

According to the course of the practice at common law, the writ bears teste, in the name of the chief justice, or presiding judge of the court, on some day in term time, when the judge is supposed to be present, not being Sunday, and is made returnable on a regular return day.

If the writ has been served, and the defendant does not give bail, but remains in custody, it is returned C. C. (cepi corpus); if he have given bail, it is returned C. C. B. B. (cepi corpus, bail bond); if the defendant's appearance have been accepted, the return is, "C. C., and defendant's appearance accepted." See 1 Archb. Prac. 67.

CAPIAS AD SATISFACIENDUM. A writ directed to the sheriff or coroner, commanding him to take the person therein named, and him safely keep, so that he may have his body in court on the return day of the writ, to satisfy (ad satisfaciendum) the party who has recovered judgment against him.

It is a writ of execution issued after judgment, and might have been issued against a plaintiff against whom judgment was obtained for costs, as well as against the defendant in a personal action. As a rule at common law, it lay in all cases where a capias ad respondendum lay as a part of the mesne process. Some classes of persons were, however, exempt from arrest on mesne process who were liable to it on final. It was a very common form of execution until within a few years, in many of the states, but its efficiency has been destroyed by statutes facilitating the discharge of the debtor in some states, and by statutes prohibiting its issue in others, except in specified cases. See "Arrest;" "Privilege." It is commonly known by the abbreviation ca. sa.

CAPIAS EXTENDI FACIAS. A writ of execution issuable in England against a debtor to the crown, which commands the sheriff to "take" or arrest the body, and "cause to be extended" the lands and goods of the debtor. Man. Exch. Prac. 5. It seems to be practically obsolete.

CAPIAS IN WITHERNAM. A writ directing the sheriff to take other goods of a distrainor equal in value to a distress which he has formerly taken and still withholds from the owner beyond the reach of process.

When chattels taken by distress were decided to have been wrongfully taken, and were by the distrainor eloigned, that is, carried out of the county or concealed, the sheriff made such a return. Thereupon this writ issued, thus putting distress against distress.

Goods taken in withernam are irreplevisable till the original distress be forthcoming. 3 Bl. Comm. 148.

CAPIAS PRO FINE. A writ which issued against a defendant who had been fined, and did not discharge the fine according to the judgment.

The object of the writ was to arrest a defendant against whom a plaintiff had obtained judgment, and detain him until he paid to the king the fine for the public misdemeanor, coupled with the remedy for the private injury sustained, in all cases of forcible torts (11 Coke, 43; 5 Mod. 285), falsehood in denying one's own deed (Co. Litt. 131; 8 Coke, 60), unjustly claiming property in replevin, or contempt by disobeying the command of the king's writ, or the express prohibition of any statute (8 Coke, 60). It is now abolished. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 398.

CAPIAS UTLIGATUM. A writ directing the arrest of an outlaw.

If general, it directs the sheriff to arrest the outlaw, and bring him before the court on a general return day.

If special, it directs the sheriff, in addition, to take possession of the goods and chattels of the outlaw, summoning a jury to determine their value.

It was a part of the process subsequent to the capias, and was issued to compel an appearance where the defendant had absconded, and a capias could not be served upon him. The outlawry was readily reversed upon any plausible pretext, upon appearance of a party in person or by attorney, as the object of the writ was then satisfied. The writ issued after an outlawry in a criminal as well as in a civil case. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 284; 4 Bl. Comm. 320.

CAPIATUR PRO FINE. Let him be taken for the fine. In English practice. A clause inserted at the end of old judgment records in actions of debt, where the defendant denied his deed, and it was found against him upon his false plea, and the jury were troubled with the trial of it. Cro. Jac. 64.

CAPITA (Lat.) By heads. An expression of frequent occurrence in laws regulating the distribution of the estates of persons dying intestate. When all the persons entitled to shares in the distribution are of the same degree of kindred to the deceased person (e. g., when all are grandchildren), and claim directly from him in their own right, and not through an intermediate relation, they take per capita, that is, equal shares, or share and share alike. But when they are of different degrees of kindred (e. g., some the children, others the grandchildren or the great-grandchildren, of the deceased), those more remote take per stirpem, or per stirpes, that is, they take respectively the shares their parents (or other relation standing in the same degree with them of the surviving kindred entitled, who are in the nearest degree of kindred to the intestate) would have taken had they respectively survived the intestate. Reeve, Descent, Introd. xxvii. Also, 1 Rop. Leg. 126, 130. See "Per Capita;" "Per Stirpes;" "Stirpes."

CAPITAL.

(1) The amount of money invested in a business; the fund dedicated to a business to support its credit, to provide for contingencies, to suffer diminution from losses, and to derive accretion from gains and profits. 30 Fed. 410.

As used in the revenue act it does not include money temporarily borrowed. 21 Wall. (U. S.) 284.

(2) "The actual estate, whether in money or property, which is owned by an individual or a corporation. In reference to a corporation it is the aggregate of the sum subscribed and paid in by the shareholders, with the addition of all gains or profits realized in the use or investment of those sums." 23 N. Y. 219.

(3) Affecting human life. See "Capital Crime;" "Capital Punishment."

CAPITAL CRIME. One for which the punishment of death is inflicted.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. The punishment of death.

CAPITAL STOCK. The sum, divided into shares, which is raised by mutual subscription of the members of a corporation. It is said to be the sum upon which calls may be made upon the stockholders, and dividends are to be paid. 1 Sandf. Ch. (N.Y.) 280; Walford, Rys. 252; 4 Zab. (N. J.) 195; Angell & A. Corp. §§ 151, 556.

"The sums due by virtue of the subscriptions or collected from the subscribers, and invested for the benefit of the corporation." 30 Conn. 290.

It is never used to indicate the value of the property of the corporation. 3 Zab. (N. J.) 195.

The phrase is used as synonymous with "Capital." 23 N. Y. 222.

It is to be distinguished from "stock," which is the shareholder's individual interest in the capital stock. 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 490.

CAPITALE. A thing which is stolen, or the value of it. Blount.

A beast or other animal considered as property; hence, according to Spelman, the term "chattel."

CAPITALE VIVENS. Live cattle. Blount.

CAPITALIS. In old English law. Chief, principal; at the head. A term applied to persons, places, judicial proceedings, and some kinds of property.

CAPITALIS BARO. In old English law. Chief baron. Capitalis baro scaccarii domini regis, chief baron of the exchequer. Towns. Pl. 211.

CAPITALIS CUSTOS. Chief warden or magistrate; mayor. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 64, § 2.

CAPITALIS DEBITOR. The chief or principal debtor, as distinguished from a surety (plegius). Called principalis. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 63, § 5.

CAPITALIS DOMINUS. Chief lord. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 12, § 4; Id. c. 28, § 5.

CAPITALIS JUSTICIARIUS. The chief justiciary; the principal minister of state, and guardian of the realm in the king's absence.

This office originated under William the Conqueror, but its power was greatly diminished by Magna Charta, and finally distributed among several courts by Edward I. Spelman; 8 Bl. Comm. 38.

CAPITALIS JUSTICIARIUS AD PLACITA CORAM REGE TENENDA. Chief justice for holding pleas before the king. The title of the chief justice of the king's bench, first assumed in the latter part of the reign of Henry III. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 91, 285.

CAPITALIS JUSTICIARIUS BANCI (or de banco). Chief justice of the bench. The title of the chief justice of the (now) court of common pleas, first mentioned in the first year of Edward I. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 48. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 146.

CAPITALIS JUSTICIARIUS TOTIUS ANGLIAE. Chief justice of all England. The title of the presiding justice in the court of aula regis. 3 Bl. Comm. 38; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 48.

CAPITALIS PLEGIUS. A chief pledge; a head borough. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 52, § 5.

CAPITALIS REDDITUS. A chief rent (q. v.)

CAPITALIS TERRA. A headland; a piece of land lying at the head of other land.

CAPITANEUS. He who held his land or title directly from the king himself.

A commander or ruler over others, either in civil, military, or ecclesiastical matters.

A naval commander. This latter use began A. D. 1264. Spelman, voc. "Capitaneus;" "Admiralius."

CAPITARE. In old law and surveys. To head, front, or abut; to touch at the head, or end. Cowell, voc. "Laterare."

CAPITAS DEMINUTIO (or DIMINUTIO) (Lat.) In the civil law. The loss of a status or civil qualification; the change of a man's former condition (prioris status mutatio). Inst. 1. 16. pr. 1; Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 131, § 121. Sometimes called capitis minutio. Dig. 4. 5. 1. This was of three kinds. See "Caput;" "Status."

CAPITATIM (Lat.) By the head; to each individual. 4 Maule & S. 206.

CAPITATION (Lat. caput, head). A poll-tax. An imposition yearly laid upon each person.

The constitution of the United States provides that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census, or enumeration, thereinbefore directed to be taken." Article 1, § 9, note 4. See 3 Dall. (Pa.) 171; 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 317. An income tax is a direct or capitation tax, within this provision. 158 U. S. 601.

CAPITE. See "Capita."

CAPITE MINUTUS. In the civil law. One who had suffered the capitis diminutio. Dig. 4. 5.

CAPITIS DIMINUTIO MAXIMA. The highest or most comprehensive loss of status. This occurred when a man's condition was changed from one of freedom to one of bondage, when he became a slave. It swept away with it all rights of citizenship, and all family rights.

CAPITIS DIMINUTIO MEDIA. A lesser or medium loss of status. This occurred where a man lost his rights of citizenship, but without losing his liberty. It carried away also the family rights.

CAPITIS DIMINUTIO MINIMA. The lowest or least comprehensive degree of loss of status. This occurred where a man's family relations alone were changed. It happened upon the arrogation of a person who had been his own master (sui juris), or upon the emancipation of one who had been under the patria potestas. It left the rights of liberty and citizenship unaltered. See Inst. 1. 16. pr.; Id. 1. 2. 3; Dig. 4. 5. 11; Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 144.

CAPITITIUM. A covering for the head, mentioned in St. 1 Hen. IV., and other old statutes, which prescribed what dresses shall be worn by all degrees of persons. Jacob.

CAPITULA. Collections of laws and ordinances drawn up under heads or divisions. Spelman.

The term is used in the civil and old English law, and applies to ecclesiastical law also. Du Cange.

CAPITULA CORONIS. Specific and minute schedules, or capitula itineris.

CAPITULA DE JUDAEIS. A register of mortgages made to the Jews. 2 Bl. Comm. 343; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 130 et seq.

CAPITULA ITINERIS. Schedules of inquiry delivered to the justices in eyre before setting out on their circuits, and which were intended to embrace all possible crimes.

CAPITULA RURALIA. Assemblies or chapters, held by rural deans and parochial clergy, within the precinct of every deanery, which at first were every three weeks, afterwards once a month, and more solemnly once a quarter. Cowell.

CAPITULARY.

——In French Law. A collection of laws and ordinances orderly arranged by divisions. The term is especially applied to the collections of laws made and published by the early French emperors. The execution of these capitularies was intrusted to the bishops, courts, and missi regis, and many copies were made. The best edition of the Capitularies is said by Butler to be that of Baluze, 1677. Co. Litt. 191a, Butler's note 77.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. A collection of laws and ordinances, arranged by divisions. A book containing the beginning and end of each Gospel which is to be read every day in the ceremony of saying mass. Du Cange.

CAPITULATION.

(1) The treaty which determines the conditions under which a fortified place is abandoned to the commanding officer of the army which besieges it.

(2) In civil law. An agreement by which the prince and the people, or those who have the right of the people, regulate the manner in which the government is to be administered. Wolffius, § 989.

CAPITULI AGRI. Head fields; lands lying at the head or upper end of furrows, etc.

CAPITULUM EST CLERICORUM CONgregatio sub uno decano in ecclesia cathedrali. A chapter is a congregation of clergy under one dean in a cathedral church. Co. Litt. 98.

CAPITUR PRO FINE. See "Capias pro Fine."

CAPPA. In old records. A cap. Cappa honoris, the cap of honor. One of the solemnities or ceremonies of creating an earl or marquis. Bacon's Works, v. 474.

CAPTAIN (Lat. capitaneus; from caput, head). The commander of a company of soldiers. The term is also used of officers in the municipal police in a somewhat similar sense; as, captain of police; captain of the watch.

The master or commander of a merchant vessel, or a vessel of war.

A subordinate officer having charge of a certain part of a vessel of war.

In the United States, the commander of a merchant vessel is, in statutes and legal proceedings and language, more generally termed "master" (q. v.) In foreign laws and languages he is frequently styled "patron."

The rank of captain in the United States navy is next above that of commander, and captains are generally appointed from this rank in the order of seniority. The president has the appointing power, subject to the approval and consent of the senate.

CAPTATION. In French law. Undue influence; the act of one who succeeds in controlling the will of another, so as to become master of it. It is generally taken in a bad sense.

Captation takes place by those demonstrations of attachment and friendship, by those assiduous attentions, by those services and officious little presents, which are usual among friends, and by all those means which ordinarily render us agreeable to others.

CAPTATOR. A person who obtains a gift or legacy through artifice. Rapalje & L.

CAPTIO (Lat. from capere, to take). In old English law and practice. A taking or seizure of a thing, as an animal. Bracton, fol. 156. Est omnis captio justa vel injusta. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 44, § 1. Bene cognoscit captionem, (he) well avows the taking. 1 Salk. 3.

A taking or seizure of land. Dies captionis indorsari debet in tergo brevis, the day of the taking ought to be indorsed on the back of the writ. Bracton, fol. 365b.

A taking or arrest of a person. Reg. Orig. 278b; Bracton, fol. 145b. Injusta captio et injusta detentio. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 42, § 1.

A taking or holding of a court. Captio assisae, the taking of the assize. Bracton, fol. 111, 202b.

A taking or receiving. Homagii captio, taking of homage. Bracton, fol. 16.

CAPTION.

(1) A taking, or seizing; an arrest. The word is no longer used in this sense.

(2) The heading of a legal instrument, in which is shown when, where, and by what authority it was taken, found, or executed. Principally used in respect to indictments. See, as to requisites, 3 Gray (Mass.) 454; 1 South. (N. J.) 46. This meaning, now the general one, is not justified by the derivation, which is from capere, to take, and not from caput, a head.

In the English practice, when an inferior court, in obedience to the writ of certiorari, returns an indictment into the king's bench, it is annexed to the caption, then called a "schedule," and the caption concludes with stating that "it is presented in manner and form as appears in a certain indictment thereto annexed," and the caption and indictment are returned on separate parchments. 1 Wm. Saund. 309, note 2.

CAPTIVE. A prisoner of war.

CAPTOR. One who has taken property from an enemy. This term is also employed to designate one who has taken an enemy.

CAPTURE. The taking of property by one belligerent from another. See 6 Allen (Mass.) 373. It is a taking by the military power, as distinguished from a taking by the civil power, which is known as "seizure." 35 Ga. 344. It originally included only a taking by one belligerent from another, but has been enlarged in usage to include taking by pirates, or the taking by a belligerent of neutral goods. 6 Allen (Mass.) 373; 6 Wall. (U. S.) 10.

CAPUT.

——In Civil Law. Status; a person's civil condition.

According to the Roman law, three elements concurred to form the status or caput of the citizen, namely, liberty, libertas, citizenship, civitas, and family, familia.

——At Common Law. A head. Chiefly used in phrases, thus: Caput comitatis, the head of the county; the sheriff; the king. Spelman. Caput anni, the beginning of the year. Cowell. Caput legis, a head of the law; caput villae, the chief man of a town; caput feudi vel terrae, the head or chief lord of lands held by feudal tenure; caput baroniae, the castle, manor house, or chief seat of a baron. Bracton, fol. 76b.

CAPUT LUPINUM (Lat.) Having a wolf's head.

Outlaws were anciently said to have caput lupinum, and might be killed by any one who met them. 4 Bl. Comm. 320. In the reign of Edward III. this power was restricted to the sheriff when armed with lawful process, and this power, even, has long since disappeared, the process of outlawry being resorted to merely as a means of compelling an appearance. Co. Litt. 128b; 3 Bl. Comm. 284.

CAPUT MORTUUM. A dead head; a thing void for all purposes. See 96 U. S. 195.

CAPUT PORTUS. In old English law. The head of a port. The town to which a port belongs, and which gives the denomination to the port, and is the head of it. Hale, de Jure Mar. pt. 2, c. 2; 4 Taunt. 660.

CAPUT, PRINCIPIUM, ET FINIS. The head, beginning, and end. A term applied in English law to the king, as head of parliament. 4 Inst. 3; 1 Bl. Comm. 188.

CAPUTAGIUM. Head money; the payment of head money. Spelman; Cowell.

CAPUTIUM. In old English law. A head of land; a headland. Cowell, voc. "Buttum."

CARABUS. In old English law. A kind of raft or boat. Spelman.

CARAT. A weight equal to three and one-sixth grains, in diamonds and the like. Jacob.

CARCAN. In French law. An instrument of punishment, somewhat resembling a pillory. It sometimes signifies the punishment itself. Biret, Vocab.

CARCANNUM. In old English law. A prison or workhouse.

CARCARE. In old English law. To load; to load a vessel (in navibus carcare). Reg. Orig. 279.

CARCATA. Loaded; freighted. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 25, § 9.

CARCELAGE. Prison fees.

CARCER. A prison or gaol. Strictly, a place of detention and safe-keeping, and not of punishment. Burrill.

CARCER AD HOMINES CUSTODIENdos, non ad puniendos, dari debet. A prison ought to be given to the custody, not the punishment, of persons. Co. Litt. 260. See Dig. 48. 19. 8. 9.

CARCER NON SUPPLICII CAUSA SED custodiae constitutus. A prison is ordained not for the sake of punishment, but of detention and guarding. Lofft, 119.

CARDINAL. In ecclesiastical law. The title given to one of the highest dignitaries of the court of Rome.

Cardinals are next to the pope in dignity, and he is elected by them. There are cardinal bishops, cardinal priests, and cardinal deacons. See Fleury, Hist. Eccles. liv. 25, note 17; note 19; Thomassin, pt. 2, liv. 1, c. 53; Id. pt. 4, liv. 1, cc. 79, 80; Loiseau, Traite des Ordres, c. 3, note 31; Andre, Droit Canon.

CARDS. In criminal law. Small rectangular pasteboards, generally of a fine quality, on which are painted figures of various colors, and used for playing certain games. See 4 Pick. (Mass.) 251.

CARE. Charge or oversight; diligence. See "Negligence."

CARENA, CARINA, or CARRENA (Law Lat.; from Fr. quarante, forty). In old ecclesiastical law. A period of forty days. Of the same meaning as quarentena (Fr. quarantaine), quarantine. Spelman. See "Quarantine."

CARETA, CARRETA, or CARECTA. A cart; a cartload.

In Magna Charta (9 Hen. III. c. 21) it is ordained that no sheriff shall take horses or carts (careta) without paying the ancient livery therefor.

CARGA. In Spanish law. An incumbrance; a charge. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 13, c. 2, § 2.

CARGARE. In old English law. To charge. Spelman.

CARGO. In maritime law. The entire load of a ship or other vessel. 1 Mason (U. S.) 142. "Not the property on board belonging exclusively to the shipowner, but all the property constituting the ship's lading; all the property on which freight and profits were to accrue. 4 Mason (U. S.) 264.

The products of a whaling voyage are "cargo," but the implements used in whaling are not. 11 Pick. (Mass.) 230.

As used in policies of marine insurance, the term has a restricted meaning, derived from usage, which does not include deck load or live stock. 4 Pick. (Mass.) 433; 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 136.

The term is usually applied to goods only, but in a more extensive and less technical sense it includes persons. See 7 Man. & G. 729, 744.

CARISTIA. Dearth or scarcity.

CARLISLE TABLES. Tables of life expectancy, compiled in about 1780, at Carlisle, England. They are admissible in evidence on questions of expectancy.

CARMEN. In the Roman law. Literally, a verse or song; a formula or form of words used on various occasions, as of divorce. Tayl. Civ. Law, 349.

CARNAL KNOWLEDGE. Sexual connection. The term is generally, if not exclusively, applied to the act of the male.

The term is a technical one, and has been always held adequate to express the idea of sexual bodily connection. 22 Ohio St. 541; 97 Mass. 61.

CARNALITER. In old criminal law. Carnally. Carnaliter cognovit, carnally knew. Technical words in indictments for rape, and held essential. 1 Hale, P. C. 637-639; 3 Inst. 60.

CARNALLY KNEW. A technical phrase essential in an indictment to charge the defendant with the crime of rape. No other words nor circumlocution will answer. 1 Hale, P. C. 632; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 243; Co. Litt. 137.

CARNO. An immunity or privilege. Cowell.

CARRICLE, or CARRACLE. A ship of great burden.

CARRIER. One who undertakes to transport goods from one place to another. 1 Pars. Cont. 632.

They are either "common" or "private." Private carriers incur the responsibility of the exercise of ordinary diligence only, like other bailees for hire. Story, Bailm. § 495; 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 481; 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 272; 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 14; 2 Dana (Ky.) 430; 4 Taunt. 787; 6 Taunt. 577; 2 Bos. & P. 417; 2 C. B. 877. See "Common Carriers."

CARRYING AWAY. See "Asportation."

CARRYING COSTS. A verdict or decision "carrying costs" is one entitling the party in whose favor it is made to tax costs thereon.

CART. A carriage for luggage or burden, with two wheels, as distinguished from a wagon, which has four wheels. Worcester.

The term has been held to include four-wheeled vehicles, to carry out the intent of a statute. 22 Ala. (N. S.) 621.

CART BOTE. An allowance to the tenant of wood sufficient for carts and other instruments of husbandry. 2 Bl. Comm. 35.

CARTA. A charter (q. v.) Any written instrument.

——In Spanish Law. A letter; a deed; a power of attorney. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 18, lib. 30.

CARTA DE FORESTA. See "Charta de Foresta."

CARTE. In French marine law. A chart. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 8, arts. 2, 3.

CARTE BLANCHE. A white card signed at the bottom with a person's name, and sometimes sealed, giving another person power to superscribe what conditions he pleases. Applied, generally, in the sense of unlimited authority being granted. Wharton.

CARTEL. An agreement between two belligerent powers for the delivery of prisoners or deserters, and also a written challenge to a duel.

Cartel ship is a ship commissioned in time of war to exchange prisoners, or to carry any proposals between hostile powers. She must carry no cargo, ammunition, or implements of war, except a single gun for signals.

CARTMEN. Persons who carry goods and merchandise in carts, either for great or short distances, for hire.

CARUCAGE. A taxation of land by the caruca or carue.

The caruca was as much land as a man could cultivate in a year and a day with a single plough (caruca). Carucage, carugage, or caruage was the tribute paid for each caruca by the carucarius, or tenant. Spelman; Cowell.

CARUCATA. A certain quantity of land, used as the basis for taxation. As much land as may be tilled by a single plough in a year and a day. Skene de Verb. Sign. A team of cattle; a cartload.

It may include houses, meadow, woods, etc. It is said by Littleton to be the same as soca, but has a much more extended signification. Spelman; Blount; Cowell.

CAS FORTUIT (Fr.) In the law of insurance. A fortuitous event; an inevitable accident. 3 Kent, Comm. 300; 120 U. S. 727. Same as the Latin casus fortuitus (q. v.)

CASATA, or CASSATA. In old European law. A house with land sufficient for the support of one family. Otherwise called "hida," a hide of land, and by Bede, "familia." Spelman, voc. "Casa."

CASATUS. In old European law. A vassal or feudal tenant possessing a casata (q. v.), that is, having a house, household, and property of his own. The cassati embraced both bond and free tenants. Spelman.

CASE. A question contested before a court of justice; an action or suit at law or in equity. 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 352; 4 Iowa, 152.

A case arising under a treaty (Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2) is a suit where is drawn in question the construction of a treaty, and the decision is against the title set up by either party under such treaty. Story, J., 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 356. And see, also, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 286; 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 819; 11 How. (U. S.) 529; 12 How. (U. S.) 111.

A form of action which lies to recover damages for injuries for which the more ancient forms of action will not lie. Steph. Pl. 15.

"Case," or, more fully, "action upon the case," or "trespass on the case," includes in its widest sense assumpsit and trover, and distinguishes a class of actions in which the writ is framed according to the special circumstances of the case, from the ancient actions, the writs in which, called brevia formata, are collected in the Registrum Brevium.

Sometimes used for "case stated" (q. v.)

CASE AGREED ON. A statement of facts agreed upon by the parties, and submitted to the court, in order to obtain a decision upon the points of law involved, without going through the forms of a regular trial. 3 Whart. (Pa.) 143.

CASE FOR MOTION. In English divorce and probate practice, when a party desires to make a motion, he must file, among other papers, a case for motion, containing an abstract of the proceedings in the suit or action, a statement of the circumstances on which the motion is founded, and the prayer, or nature of the decree or order desired. Browne, Div. 251; Browne, Prob. Prac. 295.

CASE LAW. The law evidenced by or derived from the reported decisions. The law established by the force of such decisions as precedents, as distinguished from the reasons or philosophy of the law.

CASE ON APPEAL.

——In American Practice. Especially in states having reformed Codes of Procedure, a printed document prepared by an appellant, containing the substance of the evidence and proceedings on the trial in the court below.

——In English Practice. In the house of lords and privy council: (1) A statement prepared and printed by each party to an appeal, showing the facts on which he relies, and containing references to the evidence contained in the appendix. (2) A written statement by an inferior court or judge, raising a question of law for the opinion of a superior court.

CASE RESERVED. A statement in writing of the facts proved on the trial of a cause, drawn up and settled by the attorneys and counsel for the respective parties under the supervision of the judge, for the purpose of having certain points of law, which arose at the trial, and could not then be satisfactorily decided, determined upon full argument before the court in banc. This is otherwise called a "special case;" and it is usual for the parties, where the law of the case is doubtful, to agree that the jury shall find a general verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon such a case to be made, instead of obtaining from the jury a special verdict. Burrill.

CASE STATED. In practice. A statement of all the facts of a case, with the names of the witnesses, and a detail of the documents which are to support them; a brief.

An agreement in writing, between a plaintiff and defendant, that the facts in dispute between them are as there agreed upon and mentioned. 3 Whart. (Pa.) 143.

CASE TO MOVE FOR NEW TRIAL. In practice. A case prepared by the party against whom a verdict has been given, upon which to move the court to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial. Graham, Prac. 330; 1 Burrill, Prac. 469.

CASH. That which circulates as money. It is generally held to include bank notes. 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 120; 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 347. But see 3 Halst. (N. J.) 172. Treasury notes (3 Conn. 534) and gold dust (1 Cal. 49) have been held not to be cash. See, also, 6 Md. 37; 44 Ala. 402.

Money at command; ready money. 28 Grat. (Va.) 175.

A sale for cash is a sale for money in hand (24 N. J. Law, 101), but a local custom may give the phrase another meaning (3 Mo. App. 149).

CASH BOOK. A book in which a merchant enters an account of all the cash he receives or pays. An entry of the same thing ought to be made, under the proper dates, in the journal. The object of the cash book is to afford a constant facility to ascertain the true state of a man's cash. Pardessus, note 87.

CASHIER. An officer of a moneyed institution, or of a private person or firm, who is entitled by his office to take care of the cash or money of such institution, person, or firm.

——In Military Law. To deprive a military officer of his office. See Articles of War, art. 14.

CASSARE. To quash; to render void; to break.

CASSATION. In French law. A decision emanating from the sovereign authority, by which a decree or judgment in the court of last resort is broken or annulled. See "Cour de Cassation."

CASSETUR BILLA, or QUOD BILLA cassetur (Lat. that the bill be quashed). In practice. The form of the judgment for the defendant on a plea in abatement, where the action was commenced by bill (billa). 3 Bl. Comm. 303; Steph. Pl. 128. 131. The form of an entry made by a plaintiff on the record, after a plea in abatement, where he found that the plea could not be confessed and avoided, nor traversed, nor demurred to; amounting in fact to a discontinuance of the action. 2 Archb. Prac. K. B. 3, 236; 1 Tidd, Prac. 683.

CASSETUR BREVE (Lat. that the writ be quashed). In practice. A judgment sometimes entered against a plaintiff, at his request, when, in consequence of allegations of the defendant, he can no longer prosecute his suit with effect. The effect of such entry is to stop proceedings, and exonerate the plaintiff from liability for future costs, leaving him free to sue out new process. 3 Bl. Comm. 340. See Gould, Pl. c. 5, § 139; 3 Bouv. Inst. notes 2913, 2914; 5 Term R. 634.

CAST (Law Fr. jecter, getter; Lat. projicere). In old English practice. To allege, offer, or present; to put forward. To cast an essoign was to allege an excuse for the failure of a party to appear in court, on the return of the original writ. 3 Steph. Comm. 659; 3 Bl. Comm. 278; Roscoe, Real Actions, 156. To cast a protection was to present or allege it as an excuse. Co. Litt. 128a, 130, 131; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 406.

This word is now used as a popular, rather than a technical, term, in the sense of to overcome, overthrow, or defeat in a civil action at law. Webster.

CASTELLAIN, or CASTELLANUS. The keeper or captain of a fortified castle; the constable of a castle. Spelman; Termes de la Ley; Blount.

CASTELLARIUM, or CASTELLATUS. In old English law. The precinct or jurisdiction of a castle. Blount.

CASTELLORUM OPERATIO. In old English law. Service or labor done by inferior tenants for the building and upholding of castles and public places of defense. Towards this some gave their personal service, and others, a contribution of money or goods. This was one branch of the trinoda necessitas (1 Bl. Comm. 263), from which no lands could be exempted under the Saxons, though immunity was sometimes allowed after the conquest. Kennett, Par. Ant. 114; Cowell.

CASTIGATORY. An engine used to punish women who have been convicted of being common scolds. It is sometimes called the trebucket, tumbrel, ducking-stool, or cucking-stool. This barbarous punishment has perhaps never been inflicted in the United States. 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 225.

CASTING. In old English practice. Offering, alleging; thus, casting an essoin was alleging an excuse for nonappearance.

CASTING VOTE. The deciding vote in a deliberative or parliamentary body, cast by the presiding officer in the event of a tie. It sometimes signifies only such a vote, and sometimes the double vote of one who first votes as a member, and afterwards votes to cast off the tie, if one results. 1 Bl. Comm. 181, note; Jacob, "Parliament" (7).

CASTLEGUARD, CASTELGARD, or CASTLEWARD (Law Lat. castelgardum, castelli guardia, wardum castri, custodia castri). In feudal and old English law. The defense or guard of a castle; otherwise called "watch" and "ward." A species of feudal service or tenure; a kind of tenure by knight's service. Spelman, voc. "Castelgardum;" Termes de la Ley; Litt. § 111; Co. Litt. 82b. The service was sometimes changed into an annual rent, and then the tenure became a tenure in socage. 4 Coke, 88. See 3 How. St. Tr. 866.

An imposition anciently laid upon such persons as lived within a certain distance of any castle, towards the maintenance of such as watched and warded the castle. Magna Charta, c. 20; St. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 48; Cowell.

The circuit itself, inhabited by such as were subject to this service. Cowell; Blount; Termes de la Ley.

CASTRATION. In criminal law. The act of gelding. When this act is maliciously performed upon a man, it is a mayhem, and punishable as such, although the sufferer consented to it. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 842, 847.

CASU CONSIMILI. See "Consimili Casu."

CASU PROVISO (Lat. in the case provided for). In practice. A writ of entry framed under the provisions of the statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. I.) c. 7, which lay for the benefit of the reversioner when a tenant in dower aliened in fee or for life. It seems to have received this name to distinguish it from a similar writ framed under the provisions of St. Westminster II. (13 Edw. I.) c. 24, where a tenant by curtesy had alienated as above, and which was known emphatically as the writ in consimili casu.

The writ is now practically obsolete. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 205; Dane, Abr. Index.

CASUAL EJECTOR. In practice. The person supposed to perform the fictitious ouster of the tenant of the demandant in an action of ejectment. See "Ejectment."

CASUAL EVIDENCE. A phrase used to denote (in contradistinction to "preappointed evidence") all such evidence as happens to be adducible of a fact or event, but which was not prescribed by statute or otherwise arranged beforehand to be the evidence of the fact or event. Brown.

CASUAL PAUPER. A poor person who, in England, applies for relief in a parish other than that of his settlement. The ward in the workhouse to which they are admitted is called the "casual ward." Rapalje & L.

CASUALTIES OF SUPERIORITY. In Scotch law. Certain emoluments arising to the superior lord in regard to the tenancy.

They resemble the "incidents" to the feudal tenure at common law. They take precedence of a creditor's claim on the tenant's land, and constitute a personal claim also against the vassal. Bell, Dict. They have very generally disappeared. Paterson, Comp. 29.

CASUALTY. Inevitable accident. Unforeseen circumstances not to be guarded against by human agency, and in which man takes no part. Story, Bailm. § 240; 1 Pars. Cont. 543-547.

CASUS BELLI. An occurrence giving rise to or justifying war.

CASUS FOEDERIS (Lat.) In international law. A case within the stipulations of a treaty.

The question whether, in case of a treaty of alliance, a nation is bound to assist its ally in war against a third nation, is determined in a great measure by the justice or injustice of the war. If manifestly unjust on the part of the ally, it cannot be considered as casus foederis. Grotius de Jure Belli, bk. 2, c. 25; Vattel, bk. 2, c. 12, § 168. See 1 Kent, Comm. 49.

CASUS FORTUITUS (Lat.) An inevitable accident; a loss happening in spite of all human effort and sagacity. 3 Kent, Comm. 217, 300.

It includes such perils of the sea as strokes of lightning, etc. A loss happening through the agency of rats was held an unforeseen, but not an inevitable, accident. 1 Curt. C. C. (U. S.) 148. The happening of a casus fortuitus excuses ship owners from liability for goods conveyed. 3 Kent, Comm. 216.

CASUS FORTUITUS NON EST SPERANdus, et nemo tenetur divinare. A fortuitous event is not to be foreseen, and no person is held bound to divine it. 4 Coke, 66.

CASUS FORTUITUS NON EST SUPponendus. A fortuitous event is not to be presumed. Hardr. 82, arg.

CASUS MAJOR (Lat.) An unusual accident. Story, Bailm. § 240.

CASUS OMISSUS (Lat.) A case which is not provided for. When such cases arise in statutes which are intended to provide for all cases of a given character which may arise, the common law governs. 5 Coke, 38; 11 East, 1; 2 Bin. (Pa.) 279; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 260; Brown, Max. 37. A casus omissus may occur in a contract as well as in a statute. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 260.

CASUS OMISSUS ET OBLIVIONI DATUS dispositioni communis juris relinquitur. A case omitted and forgotten is left to the disposal of the common law. 5 Coke, 37; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 45; 1 Exch. 476.

CATALLA (Law Lat.) In old English law. Chattels, or catals, as anciently written. A term including all property movable and immovable, except fees and freeholds.

This word is considered by Spelman as derived, by contraction, from capitalia. The singular, catallum (q. v.), rarely occurs, although Bracton uses it in several places. Catalla, according to the same writer, had nearly or quite the sense of averia (beasts or cattle), being demandable under that name. Bracton, fol. 159b. See "Averia." It seems to have been, from a very early period, united with the word bona, in the phrase bona et catalla, of which the familiar modern phrase "goods and chattels" is a translation. Bracton, fol. 60b; Reg. Orig. 140, 141.

CATALLA JUSTE POSSESSA AMITTI non possunt. Chattels justly possessed cannot be lost. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 28.

CATALLA OTIOSA (Lat.) Dead goods, and animals other than beasts of the plough, averia carucae, and sheep. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 9; Bracton, 217b.

CATALLA REPUTANTUR INTER MINima in lege. Chattels are considered in law among the minor things. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 52.

CATALLIS CAPTIS NOMINE DISTINCtionis. A writ which lay for rent of a house in a borough, and authorized distress of windows, doors, etc.

CATALLUM. A chattel. See "Catalla." The word is used more frequently in the plural, catalla, but has then the same signification, denoting all goods, movable or immovable, except such as are in the nature of fees and freeholds. Cowell; Du Cange.

CATALS. Goods and chattels. See "Catalla." Rapalje & L.

CATANEUS. A tenant in capite; a tenant holding immediately of the crown. Spelman.

CATCHING BARGAIN. An agreement made with an heir expectant for the purchase of his expectancy at an inadequate price. Any agreement, whether by sale, mortgage, or post obit bond, on insufficient consideration, to be performed by the heir on the vesting of his expectancy. 47 Mich. 94; 7 Mass. 112; 63 Pa. St. 448; 34 Me. 447.

CATCHLAND. Land in Norfolk, so called because it is not known to what parish it belongs, and the minister who first seizes the tithes of it, by right of preoccupation, enjoys them for that year. Cowell.

CATCHPOLE, or CATCHPOLL. A name formerly given to a sheriff's deputy, or to a constable, or other officer whose duty it is to arrest persons. He was a sort of sergeant. The word is not now in use as an official designation. Minshew.

CATER COUSIN. A very distant relation. Bl. Law Tracts, 6.

CATHEDRAL. In ecclesiastical law. A tract set apart for the service of the church. The church of the bishop; so called from the fact that his cathedra or official chair is therein located.

CATHOLIC CREDITOR. In Scotch law. A creditor whose debt is secured on several parts or all of his debtor's property. Such a creditor is bound to take his payment with reference to the rights of the secondary creditors, or, if he disregards their rights, must assign over to them his claims. This rule applies where he collects his debts of a cautioner (surety). Bell, Dict.

CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION ACT. Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 7. This act relieves from disabilities and restores all civil rights to Catholics, except that of holding ecclesiastical offices and certain high state offices. 3 Steph. Comm. 109.

CATONIANA REGULA. In Roman law. The rule which is commonly expressed in the maxim, Quod ab initio non valet tractu temporis non convalebit, meaning that what is at the beginning void by reason of some technical (or other) legal defect will not become valid merely by length of time. The rule applied to the institution of haeredes, the bequest of legacies, and such like. The rule is not without its application also in English law; e. g., a married woman's will (being void when made) is not made valid merely because she lives to become a widow. Brown.

CATTLE. From law Latin capitalia. Beasts subject of ownership at common law; domestic animals, useful as food or for labor.

CATTLE GATE. A customary proportionate right of pasture enjoyed in common with others. The right is measured not by the number of cattle to be pastured, but by reference to the rights of others and the whole amount of pasture. 34 Eng. Law & Eq. 511; 1 Term R. 137.

CAUDA TERRAE. A land's end, or the bottom of a ridge in arable land. Cowell.

CAULCEIS (Law Fr.) A word used in old statutes (6 Hen. VI. c. 5) to signify causeways, or causeys. From the latin calcetum (q. v.) Cowell; Blount.

CAUPO (pl. caupones). In the civil law. An innkeeper. Dig. 4. 9. 4. 5; Story, Ag. § 458.

CAUPONA. In the civil law. An inn or tavern. Inst. 4. 5. 3; Dig. 4. 9. 1. 5.

CAURSINES. Italian merchants who came into England in the reign of Henry III., where they established themselves as money lenders, but were soon expelled for their usury and extortion. Cowell; Blount; Spelman. They seem to have been Lombards, deriving their name from a town in Lombardy.

CAUSA (Lat.) A cause; a reason.

A condition; a consideration. Used of contracts, and found in this sense in the Scotch law also. Bell, Dict.

A suit; an action pending. Used in this sense in the old English law.

Property. Used thus in the civil law in the sense of res (a thing). Non porcellum, non agnellum, nec aliam causam, not a hog, not a lamb, nor other thing. Du Cange.

By reason of. Causa proxima, the immediate cause. Causa remota, a cause operating indirectly by the intervention of other causes. In its general sense, causa denotes anything operating to produce an effect. 4 Gray (Mass.) 398; 4 Campb. 284.

CAUSA CAUSAE EST CAUSA CAUSATI. The cause of a cause is the cause of the effect. Freem. 329; 12 Mod. 639.

CAUSA CAUSANS. The immediate cause; the last link in the chain of causation. Rapalje & L.

CAUSA DATA ET NON SECUTA. In the civil law. Consideration given and not followed, that is, by the event upon which it was given. The name of an action by which a thing given in the view of a certain event was reclaimed if that event did not take place. Dig. 12. 4; Code, 4. 6.

CAUSA ECCLESIAE PUBLICIS AEQUIparatur; et summa est ratio quae pro religione facit. The cause of the church is equal to public cause; and paramount is the reason which makes for religion. Co. Litt. 341.

CAUSA ET ORIGO EST MATERIA NEgotii. Cause and origin is the material of business. 1 Coke, 99; Wingate, Max. 41, max. 21.

CAUSA HOSPITANDI. For the purpose of being entertained as a guest. 4 Maule & S. 310.

CAUSA JACTITATIONIS MARITAGII (Lat.) A form of action which anciently lay against a party who boasted or gave out that he or she was married to the plaintiff, whereby a common reputation of their marriage might ensue. 3 Bl. Comm. 93.

CAUSA MATRIMONII PRAELOCUTI (Lat.) A writ lying where a woman has given lands to a man in fee simple, with the intention that he shall marry her, and he refuses so to do within a reasonable time, upon suitable request. Cowell. Now obsolete. 3 Bl. Comm. 183, note.

CAUSA MORTIS. In anticipation of death. See "Donatio Causa Mortis."

CAUSA PATET. The reason is open, obvious, plain, clear, or manifest. A common expression in old writers. Perk. c. 1, §§ 11, 14, 97. Causa patet ex praemissis, the reason is plain from the premises. Id. c. 3, § 226.

CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECtatur (Lat.) The direct and not the remote cause is considered. See "Proximate Cause."

CAUSA REI (Lat.) In civil law. Things accessory or appurtenant. All those things which a man would have had if the thing had not been withheld. Du Cange; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 55.

CAUSA REMOTA. A remote cause.

CAUSA SCIENTIAE PATET. The reason of the knowledge is evident. A technical phrase in Scotch practice, used in depositions of witnesses.

CAUSA SINE QUA NON. A necessary case; one without which the effect would not have been produced.

CAUSA TURPIS. An immoral cause.

CAUSA VAGA ET INCERTA NON EST causa rationabilis. A vague and uncertain cause is not a reasonable cause. 5 Coke, 57.

CAUSAE DOTIS, VITAE, LIBERTATIS, fisci sunt inter favorabilia in iege. Causes of dower, life, liberty, revenue are among the things favored in law. Co. Litt. 341.

CAUSAM NOBIS SIGNIFICES QUARE. You signify to us the reason. In old English practice. A writ addressed to a mayor of a town, etc., who was by the king's writ commanded to give seisin of lands to the king's grantee, on his delaying to do it, requiring him to show cause why he so delayed the performance of his duty. Blount; Cowell.

CAUSARE (Lat. to cause). To be engaged in a suit; to litigate; to conduct a cause. Used in the old English and in the civil law.

CAUSATOR (Lat.) A litigant; one who takes the part of the plaintiff or defendant in a suit.

CAUSE (Lat. causa). That which supplies the motive, or constitutes the reason, for any act. See "Probable Cause."

——In Civil Law. The consideration or motive for making a contract. Dig. 2. 14. 7; Toullier, Dr. Civ. liv. 3, tit. 3, c. 2, § 4.

——In Pleading. Reason; motive.

In a replication de injuria, for example, the plaintiff alleges that the defendant of his own wrong and without the cause by him, etc., where the word "cause" comprehends all the facts alleged as an excuse or reason for doing the act. 1 Chit. Pl. 585.

——In Practice. A suit or action; any question, civil or criminal, contested before a court of justice. Wood, Civ. Law, 301. It does not include a quo warranto proceeding (5 El. & Bl. 1), but includes a criminal prosecution (3 Q. B. 901).

CAUSE BOOKS. Books kept in the central office of the English supreme court, in which are entered all writs of summons issued in the office. Rules of Court, v. 8.

CAUSE LIST. An official list of actions, demurrers, petitions, appeals, etc., set down for trial or argument in open court. Similar to the American "calendar" or "docket" (q. v.)

CAUSE OF ACTION. In practice. Matter for which an action may be brought; the right to maintain an action. 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 231.

A cause of action is said to accrue to any person when that person first comes to a right to bring an action. There is, however, an obvious distinction between a cause of action and a right, though a cause of action generally confers a right. Thus, statutes of limitation do not affect the cause of action, but take away the right. It is synonymous with "right of action" (26 How. Pr. [N. Y.] 108), but not with "chose in action" (10 How. Pr. [N. Y.] 1).

CAUSIDICUS. In the civil law. A pleader; one who argued a cause ore tenus. Code, 2. 6. 6. There was a distinction between causidicus and advocatus (q. v.)

CAUTELA (Lat.) Care; precaution; vigilance.

CAUTI JURATORIA. Security given by the oath of the party. Inst. 4. 11. 2; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 176, § 184; T. Raym. 226, arg.

CAUTIO, or CAUTION.

——In Civil Law. Security given for the performance of anything. A bond whereby the debtor acknowledges the receipt of money, and promises to pay it at a future day.

——In French Law. The person entering into an obligation as a surety.

——In Scotch Law. A pledge, bond, or other security for the performance of an obligation, or completion of the satisfaction to be obtained by a judicial process. Bell, Dict.

CAUTIO FIDEJUSSORIA. Security by means of bonds or pledges entered into by third parties. Du Cange.

CAUTIO PIGNORATITIA. A pledge by deposit of goods.

CAUTIO PRO EXPENSIS. Security for costs or expenses.

This term is used among the civilians (Nov. 112, c. 2), and generally on the continent of Europe. In nearly all the countries of Europe, a foreign plaintiff, whether resident there or not, is required to give caution pro expensis, that is, security for costs. In some states this requisition is modified, and, when such plaintiff has real estate or a commercial or manufacturing establishment within the state, he is not required to give such caution. Foelix, Droit Int. Prive, note 106.

CAUTIO USUFRUCTUARIA. Security, which tenants for life give, to preserve the property rented free from waste and injury. Ersk. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 9, § 59.

CAUTION JURATORY. Security given by oath; that which a suspender swears is the best he can afford in order to obtain a suspension. Ersk. Prac. 4. 3. 6; Paterson, Comp.

CAUTIONARY. In Scotch law. The obligation by which a party becomes surety for another, answering to the English guarantee. It is defined by Stair: "The promise or contract of a man, not for himself, but another." Brande. See Ersk. Inst. bk. 3, tit. 7, § 22. See "Cautionry."

CAUTIONE ADMITTENDA. In English ecclesiastical law. A writ that lies against a bishop who holds an excommunicated person in prison for contempt, notwithstanding he offers sufficient caution or security to obey the orders and commandment of the church for the future. Reg. Orig. 66; Cowell.

CAUTIONER. A surety; a bondsman. One who binds himself in a bond with the principal for greater security. He is still a cautioner, whether the bond be to pay a debt, or whether he undertake to produce the person of the party for whom he is bound. Bell, Dict.

CAUTIONNEMENT. In French law. The same as becoming surety in English law.

CAUTIONRY. In Scotch law. Suretyship. The obligation of suretyship.

CAVEAT (Lat. let him beware).

——In Practice. A notice not to do an act, given to some officer, ministerial or judicial, by a party having an interest in the matter.

It is a formal caution or warning not to do the act mentioned, and is addressed frequently to prevent the admission to probate of wills, the granting letters of administration, etc. 1 Bouv. Inst. 71, 534; 3 Bl. Comm. 246; 2 Chit. Prac. 502, note b; 3 Bin (Pa.) 314; 3 Halst. (N. J.) 139.

It is also used to prevent the issuance of a patent for lands. See 9 Grat. (Va.) 508.

——In Patent Law. A legal notice not to issue a patent of a particular description to any other person without allowing the caveator an opportunity to establish his priority of invention.

It is filed in the patent office under statutory regulations. The principal object of filing it is to obtain for an inventor time to perfect his invention without the risk of having a patent granted to another person for the same thing. Rev. St. U. S. § 4902.

CAVEAT EMPTOR (Lat. let the buyer beware.) A maxim employed in the law to signify that a purchaser, whether of realty or personalty, is not only bound to discover obvious defects for himself, but is confined to the warranties which he has required, and cannot, in the absence of fraud, rely on the statements of the seller. Benj. Sales, 611; 17 Pick. (Mass.) 475; 10 Ga. 311; 9 N. Y. 36; 10 Wall. (U. S.) 383; 53 N. Y. 515.

As an exception to the rule, there is, however, an implied warranty of title. 88 Ga. 629.

CAVEAT EMPTOR; QUI IGNORARE non debuit quod jus alienum emit. Let a purchaser beware; who ought not to be ignorant that he is purchasing the rights of another. Hob. 99; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 690; Co. Litt. 102a; 3 Taunt. 439; 1 Bouv. Inst. 383; Sugd. Vend. (13th Ed.) 272 et seq.; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (6th Ed.) c. 6.

CAVEAT VENDITOR. Let the seller beware. Lofft, 328; 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 449, 453; 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 353; 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 323; 5 N. Y. 73, 82.

CAVEATOR. One who files a caveat.

CAVENDUM EST A FRAGMENTIS. Beware of fragments. Bac. Aph. 26.

CAVERE (Lat.) In the civil and common law. To take care; to exercise caution. See "Caveat Emptor."

To take care or provide for; to prove by law. Cavetur, provision is made, a remedy is given. Inst. 4. 3. 13. Cautum est, it is provided or enacted. Inst. 3. 8. 2; Id. 4. 3. pr.

To provide against; to forbid by law. Inst. 1. 25. 13.

To give security. Nisi caveant tutores et curatores, etc. Inst. 1. 24. 3. Cautum, secured. Dig. 50. 16. 188. 1.

To give caution or security on arrest. Clerke, Prax. tit. 4.

CAVERS. Offenders with respect to the mines in Derbyshire, who are punishable in the Berghmote or miners' court. Jacob.

CAYA. In old English law. A quay, kay, key, or wharf. Cowell.

CAYAGIUM. A toll or duty paid the king for landing goods at some quay or wharf. The barons of the Cinque Ports were free from this duty. Cowell.

CEAP. A bargain; anything for sale; a chattel; also cattle, as being the usual medium of barter. Sometimes used instead of ceapgild (q. v.).

CEAPGILD. Payment of an animal. An ancient species of forfeiture. Cowell; Spelman.

CEDE. To assign; to transfer. Applied to the act by which one state or nation transfers territory to another.

CEDENT. An assignor; the assignor of a chose in action. Kames, Eq. 43.

CEDULA. In Spanish law. A written obligation, under private signature, by which a party acknowledges himself indebted to another in a certain sum, which he promises to pay on demand or on some fixed day.

In order to obtain judgment on such an instrument, it is necessary that the party executing it should acknowledge it in open court, or that it be proved by two witnesses who saw its execution.

The citation affixed to the door of an absconding offender, requiring him to appear before the tribunal where the accusation is pending.

CEDULE (Fr.) In French law. A note in writing. Poth. Obl. pt. 4, c. 1, art. 2, § 1.

CELATION. In medical jurisprudence. Concealment of pregnancy or delivery. Dungl. Med. Dict.

CELEBRATION OF MARRIAGE. The solemn act by which a man and woman take each other for husband and wife, conformably to the rules prescribed by law.

CELLERARIUS. A butler in a monastery; sometimes in universities called "manciple" or "caterer."

CENDULAE. Small pieces of wood laid in the form of tiles to cover the roof of a house; shingles. Cowell.

CENEGILD. In Saxon law. A pecuniary mulct or fine paid to the relations of a murdered person by the murderer or his relations. Spelman.

CENELLAE. In old records. Acorns.

CENNINGA. A notice given by a buyer to a seller that the things which had been sold were claimed by another, in order that he might appear and justify the sale. Blount; Whishaw.

The exact significance of this term is somewhat doubtful. It probably denoted "notice," as defined above. The finder of stray cattle was not always entitled to it; for Spelman says: "As to strange (or stray) cattle, no one shall have them but with the consent of the hundred of tithingmen; unless he have one of these, we cannot allow him any cenninga (I think notice)." Spelman.

CENS. In Canadian law. An annual payment or due reserved to a seignior or lord, and imposed merely in recognition of his superiority. Guyot, Inst. c. 9.

The land or estate so held is called a censive; the tenant is a censitaire. It was originally a tribute of considerable amount, but became reduced in time to a nominal sum. It is distinct from the rentes. The cens varies in amount and in mode of payment. Payment is usually in kind, but may be in silver. 2 Low. (U. S.) 40.

CENSARIA. A farm, or house and land, let at a standing rent. Cowell.

CENSARII. In old English law. Farmers, or such persons as were liable to pay a census (tax). Blount; Cowell.

CENSERE. In the Roman law. To ordain; to decree. Dig. 50. 16. 111.

CENSITAIRE. See "Cens."

CENSIVE. See "Cens."

CENSO. In Spanish and Mexican law. An annuity; a ground rent; the right which a person acquires to receive a certain annual pension, for the delivery which he makes to another of a determined sum of money or of an immovable thing. Civ. Code Mex. art. 3206. See Schmidt. Civ. Law, 149, 309; White, New Recop. bk. 2, c. 7, § 4; 13 Tex. 655.

CENSO CONSIGNATIVO. In Spanish and Mexican law. A censo (q. v.) is called "consignativo" when he who receives the money assigns for the payment of the pension (annuity) the estate the fee in which he reserves. Civ. Code Mex. art. 3207.

CENSO ENFITEUTICO. In Spanish and Mexican law. An emphyteutic annuity.

That species of censo (annuity) which exists where there is a right to require of another a certain canon or pension annually, on account of having transferred to that person forever certain real estate, but reserving the fee in the land. The owner who thus transfers the land is called the "censualisto," and the person who pays the annuity is called the "censatario." Hall, Mex. Law, § 756.

CENSUALES. In old European law. A species of oblati or voluntary slaves of churches or monasteries; those who, to procure the protection of the church, bound themselves to pay an annual tax or quit-rent only of their estates to a church or monastery.

CENSUERE. In Roman law. They have decreed. The term of art, or technical term for the judgment, resolution, or decree of the senate. Tayl. Civ. Law, 566.

CENSUMETHIDUS, or CENSUMORTHIdus. A dead rent, like that which is called "mortmain." Blount; Cowell.

CENSUS (Lat. censere, to reckon). An official reckoning or enumeration of the inhabitants and wealth of a country.

The census of the United States is taken every tenth year, in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, and many of the states have made provisions for a similar decennial reckoning at intervening periods. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 2; 1 Story, U. S. Laws, 73, 722, 751; 2 Story, U. S. Laws, 1134, 1139, 1169, 1194; 3 Story, U. S. Laws, 1776; 4 Sharswood, U. S. Laws, 2179.

——In Old European Law. A tax or tribute. Montesq. liv. 30, c. 14.

CENSUS REGALIS. In English law. The royal revenue. 1 Bl. Comm. 306.

CENT (Lat. centum, one hundred). A coin of the United States, weighing seventy-two grains, and composed of eighty-eight per centum of copper and twelve of nickel. Act Feb. 21, 1857, § 4. See 11 U. S. St. at Large, 163, 164.

CENTENA (Law Lat. from centum, a hundred). A hundred; a district or division containing originally a hundred freemen, established among the Goths, Germans, Franks, and Lombards, for military and civil purposes, and answering to the Saxon hundred. Spelman; 1 Bl. Comm. 115; Esprit des Lois, liv. 30, c. 17. The Saxon division is also sometimes called centena, but is more commonly rendered in law Latin, hundredum, or hundredus. Spelman. See "Hundred;" "Centenarius;" "Centeni."

——In Old Records and Pleadings. A hundred weight. Centena piscium, a hundred weight of fish. Pryn. 303. Centena cerae zucarii, piperis, cumini, etc., continet tredecim petras et dimidium, the hundred weight of wax, sugar, pepper, cummin, etc., contains thirteen stone and a half. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 12, 4. See Cro. Eliz. 754.

CENTENARIUS (Law Lat.; Fr. centenier, from centena, q. v.) In old European law. One of a centena, or hundred; the head or chief of a centena (praefectus centenae), among the Goths, Germans, Franks, and Lombards; an inferior judge.

CENTENI (Lat. from centum, a hundred). A hundred men; the number of men enrolled for military service from each district, among the ancient Germans, and which afterwards became their distinctive name.

CENTESIMA (Lat. centum). In Roman law. The hundredth part.

Usuriae centesimae. Twelve per cent. per annum, that is, a hundredth part of the principal, was due each month, the month being the unit of time from which the Romans reckoned interest. 2 Bl. Comm. 462, note.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT. In English law. A court which has jurisdiction of all cases of treason, murder, felony, or misdemeanor committed within the city of London and county of Middlesex, and certain parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, and also of all serious offenses within the former jurisdiction of the admiralty court.

The court consists of the lord mayor, the lord chancellor, the judges of the three superior courts at Westminster, the judges in bankruptcy, the judges of the admiralty, the dean of the arches, the aldermen, recorder, and common serjeant of London, and the judges of the sheriff's court.

CENTRAL OFFICE. The central office of the supreme court of judicature in England is the office established in pursuance of the recommendation of the legal department's commission (2d Rep. 23, 47) in order to consolidate the offices of the masters and associates of the common-law divisions, the crown office of the queen's bench division, the record and writ clerk's report, and enrollment offices of the chancery division, and a few others. Judicature Act 1879, § 4 et seq. The central office is divided into the following departments, and the business and staff of the office are distributed accordingly (Rules of Court Dec. 1879, April, 1880): (1) Writ, appearance, and judgment; (2) summons and order, for the common-law divisions only; (3) filing and record, including the old chancery report office; (4) taxing, for the common-law divisions only; (5) enrollment; (6) judgments, for the registry of judgments, executions, etc.; (7) bills of sale; (8) married women's acknowledgments; (9) queen's remembrancer; (10) crown office; and (11) associates.

CENTUMVIRI (Lat. one hundred men). The name of a body of Roman judges. Their exact number was one hundred and five, there being selected three from each of the thirty-five tribes comprising all the citizens of Rome. They constituted, for ordinary purposes, four tribunals, but some cases (called centumvirales causas) required the judgment of all the judges. 3 Bl. Comm. 515.

CENTURY. One hundred; one hundred years.

One hundred men. The Romans were divided in "centuries," as the English were formerly divided into "hundreds."

CEORL. A tenant at will of free condition, who held land of the thane on condition of paying rent or services.

A freeman of inferior rank occupied in husbandry. Spelman.

Those who tilled the outlands paid rent; those who occupied or tilled the inlands, or demesne, rendered services. Under the Norman rule, this term, as did others which denoted workmen, especially those which applied to the conquered race, became a term of reproach, as is indicated by the popular signification of churl. Cowell; Spelman.

CEPI (Lat. I have taken). It was of frequent use in the returns of sheriffs when they were made in Latin; as, for example, cepi corpus et B. B., I have taken the body, and discharged him on bail bond; cepi corpus et est in custodia, I have taken the body, and it is in custody; cepi corpus et est languidus, I have taken the body, and he is sick.

CEPI CORPUS (Law Lat. I have taken the body). In practice. The technical name of the return made by a sheriff to a capias, that he has taken the body of the party. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 26; 3 Bl. Comm. 288; 1 Tidd, Prac. 308-310. See "Capias." It is derived from the two emphatic words of the return which was anciently indorsed in law Latin on the writ.

Cepi corpus properly is the return where the defendant is out on bail. Where he is in actual custody, the return is cepi corpus in custodia. 1 Tidd, Prac. 308, 309. Sewell, Sheriffs, 387. Cepi corpus et paratum habeo, I have taken the body, and have it ready, is another form of this return, which anciently implied that the party was in actual custody, but is now the proper return where the defendant has been arrested and discharged on bail. Id.; 1 Tidd, Prac, ubi supra.

CEPIT (Lat. capere, to take; cepit, he took, or has taken).

——In Civil Practice. A form of replevin which is brought for carrying away goods merely. 3 Hill (N. Y.) 282. Non detinet is not the proper answer to such a charge. 17 Ark. 85. And see 3 Wis. 399. Success upon a non cepit does not entitle the defendant to a return of the property. 5 Wis. 85. A plea of non cepit is not inconsistent with a plea showing property in a third person. 8 Gill (Md.) 133.

——In Criminal Practice. Took. A technical word necessary in an indictment for larceny. The charge must be that the defendant took the thing stolen with a felonious design. Bac. Abr. "Indictment" (G 1).

CEPIT ET ABDUXIT (Lat. he took and led away). Applicable in a declaration in trespass or indictment for larceny, where the defendant has taken away a living chattel.

CEPIT ET ASPORTAVIT (Lat. he took and carried away). Applicable in a declaration in trespass or an indictment for larceny, where the defendant has carried away goods without right. 4 Bl. Comm. 231.

CEPIT IN ALIO LOCO (Lat. he took in another place). In pleading. A plea in replevin, by which the defendant alleges that he took the thing replevied in another place than that mentioned in the declaration. 1 Chit. Pl. 490; 2 Chit. Pl. 558; Rast. Entr. 554, 555; Willes, 475. It is the usual plea where the defendant intends to avow or justify the taking to entitle himself to a return. 4 Bouv. Inst. note 3569.

CEPPAGIUM. In old English law. The stumps or roots of trees which remain in the ground after the trees are felled. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 41, § 24.

CERA, or CERE. In old English law. Wax; a seal of wax. St. Westminster II. c. 10.

CERAGRUM. In old English law. A payment to provide candles in the church. Blount.

CEREVISIA. Ale or beer. Rapalje & L.

CERT MONEY. The head money given by the tenants of several manors yearly to the lords, for the purpose of keeping up certain inferior courts. Called in the ancient records certum letae (leet money). Cowell.

CERTA DEBET ESSE INTENTIO, ET narratio et certum fundamentum, et certa res quae deducitur in judicium. The intention, count, foundation, and thing, brought to judgment, ought to be certain. Co. Litt. 303a.

CERTA RES. In old English law. A certain thing. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60, §§ 24, 25.

CERTAIN SERVICES. In feudal and old English law. Such services as were stinted (limited or defined) in quantity, and could not be exceeded on any pretense; as to pay a stated annual rent, or to plow such a field for three days. 2 Bl. Comm. 61.

CERTAINTY.

——In Contracts. Distinctness and accuracy of statement.

A thing is certain when its essence, quality, and quantity are described, distinctly set forth, etc. Dig. 12. 1. 6. It is uncertain when the description is not that of an individual object, but designates only the kind. Civ. Code La. art. 3522, No. 8; 5 Coke, 121.

——In Pleading. Such clearness and distinctness of statement of the facts which constitute the cause of action or ground of defense that they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain the truth of the allegations, and by the court who are to give the judgment. 1 Chit. Pl. 257; Cowp. 682; Hob. 295; 13 East, 107; 2 Bos. & P. 267; Co. Litt. 303; Comyn, Dig. "Pleader," c. 17.

Certainty is said to be of three sorts:

(1) "Certainty to a common intent," which is attained by a form of statement in which words are used in their ordinary meaning, though by argument or inference they may be made to bear a different one. See 2 H. Bl. 530.

(2) "Certainty to a certain intent in general," which is attained when the meaning of the statute may be understood upon a fair and reasonable construction, without recurrence to possible facts which do not appear. 1 Wm. Saund. 49; 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 317; 5 Conn. 423.

(3) "Certainty to a certain intent in particular," which is attained by that technical accuracy of statement which precludes all argument, inference, and presumption against the party pleading. When this certainty is required, the party must not only state the facts of his case in the most precise way, but add to them such as show that they are not to be controverted, and, as it were, anticipate the case of his adversary. 1 Chit. Pl. 258; Lawes, Pl. 54, 55.

CERTIFICATE. In practice. A writing made in any court, and properly authenticated, to give notice to another court of any thing done therein.

A written statement, by a person having an official or public status, concerning some matter within his knowledge or authority. 3 Pet. (U. S.) 29; 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 324.

CERTIFICATE INTO CHANCERY. In English practice. The certificate by the common-law judges of their opinion on a question referred to them by the chancellor.

CERTIFICATE OF ASSIZE. A writ granted for the re-examination or retrial of a matter passed by assize before justices. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 181. It is now entirely obsolete. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 389. Consult, also, Comyn, Dig. "Assize" (B 27, 28).

CERTIFICATE OF COSTS. See "Judge's Certificate."

CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT. A certificate issued by a bank that the person named has a specified sum on deposit to his order in the bank.

CERTIFICATE OF REGISTRY. A certificate that a ship has been registered as the law requires. 3 Kent, Comm. 149. Under the United States statutes, "every alteration in the property of a ship must be indorsed on the certificate of registry, and must itself be registered." Unless this is done, the ship or vessel loses its national privileges as an American vessel. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 48. The English statute makes such a transfer void. St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 54.

CERTIFICATE OF STOCK. A certificate that a person named is the owner of a specified number of shares of stock in a corporation.

CERTIFICATE, TRIAL BY. This is a mode of trial now little in use. It is resorted to in cases where the fact in issue lies out of the cognizance of the court, and the judges, in order to determine the question, are obliged to rely upon the solemn averment or information of persons in such a station as affords them the clearest and most competent knowledge of the truth. Steph. Pl. 112, 113; Co. Litt, 74; Brown.

CERTIFICATION. In Scotch law. A notice to a party in a suit that, if he fail to do something, certain consequences will follow. Paterson, Comp.

CERTIFIED CHECK. A check which has been recognized by the proper officer as a valid appropriation of the amount of money therein specified to the person therein named, and which bears upon itself the evidence of such recognition.

Certification of a check is usually accomplished by writing the name of the officer authorized to bind the bank in that manner across the face of the check. See "Check." Sewell, Bank.

CERTIORARI. In practice. A writ issued by a superior to an inferior court of record, requiring the latter to send in to the former some proceeding therein pending, or the records and proceedings in some cause already terminated in cases where the procedure is not according to the course of the common law. 112 Mass. 206.

The office of the writs of certiorari and mandamus is often much the same. It is the practice of the United States supreme court, upon a suggestion of any defect in the transcript of the record sent up into that court upon a writ of error, to allow a special certiorari, requiring the court below to certify more fully. 3 Dall. (U. S.) 411; 7 Cranch (U. S.) 288; 3 How. (U. S.) 553. The same result might also be effected by a writ of mandamus. The two remedies are, when addressed to an inferior court of record, from a superior court, requiring the return of a record, much the same. But where diminution of the record is suggested in the inferior court, and the purpose is to obtain a more perfect record, and not merely a more perfect copy or transcript, it is believed that the writ of mandamus is the appropriate remedy.

In many of the states, the writ produces the same result in proceedings given by statute, such as the proceedings for obtaining damages under the mill acts, highway acts, pauper laws, etc., as the writ of error does when the proceedings are according to the course of the common law. Where the lower court is to be required to proceed in a cause, a writ of procedendo or mandamus is the proper remedy.

CERTUM EST QUOD CERTUM REDDI potest. That is sufficiently certain which can be made certain. Noy, Max. 481; Co. Litt. 45b, 96a, 142a; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 143; 2 Maule & S. 50; Broom, Leg. Max. (2d London Ed.) 555-558; 3 Term R. 463; 4 Cruise, Dig. (4th Ed.) 269; 3 Mylne & K. Ch. 353; 11 Cush. (Mass.) 380.

CERVISARII (cervisiae, ale). Among the Saxons, tenants who were bound to supply drink for their lord's table. Cowell; Domesday Book.

CERVISIA. Ale. Cervisarius, an ale-brewer; an ale-house keeper. Cowell; Blount.

CERVUS (Lat.) A stag or deer.

CESIONARIO. In Spanish law. An assignee. White, New Recop. 304.

CESS. An assessment or tax. In Ireland, it was anciently applied to an exaction of victuals, at a certain rate, for soldiers in garrison. Wharton.

——In Old English Law. To cease. Hale, Anal. § 38c.

CESSA REGNARE, SI NON VIS JUDICare. Cease to reign if you wish not to adjudicate. Hob. 155.

CESSANTE CAUSA, CESSAT EFFECtus. The cause ceasing, the effect must cease. 1 Exch. 430; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 151.

CESSANTE RATIONE LEGIS CESSAT, et ipsa lex. Reason is the soul of the law, and when the reason of any particular law ceases, so does the law itself. 4 Coke, 38; 7 Coke, 69; Co. Litt. 70b, 122a; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 151, 152; 4 Rep. 38; 13 East, 348; 4 Bing. N. C. 388.

CESSANTE STATU PRIMITIVO, CESsat derivativus. The primary state ceasing, the derivative ceases. 8 Rep. 34; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) p. 438; 4 Kent, Comm. 32.

CESSAVIT PER BIENNIUM (Lat. he has ceased for two years). In practice. An obsolete writ, which could formerly have been sued out when the defendant had for two years ceased to perform such service or to pay such rent as he was bound to do by his tenure, and had not upon his lands sufficient goods or chattels to be distrained. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 208. It also lay where a religious house held lands on condition of performing certain spiritual services, which it failed to do. 3 Bl. Comm. 232.

CESSE. An assessment or tax; a tenant of land was said to cesse when he neglected or ceased to perform the services due to the lord. Co. Litt. 373a, 380b.

CESSER, or CESSURE. Neglect; a ceasing from, or omission to do, a thing. 3 Bl. Comm. 232. "A substantial dismission and cesser." 6 Mod. 232.

The determination of an estate. 1 Coke, 84; 4 Kent, Comm. 33, 90, 105, 295.

CESSET EXECUTIO (Lat. let execution stay). In practice. The formal order for a stay of execution, when proceedings in court were conducted in Latin. See "Execution."

CESSET PROCESSUS (Lat. let process stay). In practice. The formal order for a stay of process or proceedings, when the proceedings in court were conducted in Latin. See 2 Doug. 627.

CESSIO BONORUM (Lat. a transfer of property). In civil law. An assignment of his property by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors. Such an assignment discharged the debtor to the extent of the property ceded only, but exempted him from imprisonment. Dig. 2. 4. 25; Id. 48. 19. 1; Nov. 4. 3. And see Civ. Code La. art. 2166; 2 Mart. (La.) 112; 2 La. 354; 11 La. 531; 2 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 108; 5 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 299; 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 122.

CESSIO IN JURE. In Roman law. A fictitious suit, in which the person who was to acquire the thing claimed (vindicabat) the thing as his own, the person who was to transfer it acknowledged the justice of the claim, and the magistrate pronounced it to be the property (addicebat) of the claimant. Sandars, Just. Inst. (5th Ed.) 89, 122.

CESSION (Lat. cessio, a yielding).

——In Civil Law. An assignment. The act by which a party transfers property to another.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. A surrender. When an ecclesiastic is created bishop, or when a parson takes another benefice, without dispensation, the first benefice becomes void by a legal cession or surrender. Cowell.

——In Governmental Law. The transfer of land by one government to another.

CESSION DES BIENS. In French law. The surrender which a debtor makes of all his goods to his creditors when he finds himself in insolvent circumstances. It is of two kinds,—either voluntary or compulsory (judiciaire), corresponding very nearly to liquidation by arrangement and bankruptcy in English and American law.

CESSIONARY. In Scotch law. An assignee. Bell, Dict.

CESSIONARY BANKRUPT. One who gives up his estate to be divided amongst his creditors. Wharton.

CESSMENT. An assessment.

CESSOR. One who ceases or neglects so long to perform a duty that he thereby incurs the danger of the law. Old Nat. Brev. 136.

CESSURE (Law Fr.) A receiver; a bailiff. Kelham.

C'EST ASCAVOIR (Law Fr.) That is to say, or to wit. Generally written as one word, cestascavoir, cestascavoire.

Another form was cest asaver, and in one word, cestasaver.

C'EST LE CRIME QUI FAIT LA HONTE, et non pas l'echafaud. It is the crime which causes the shame, and not the scaffold.

CESTUI, or CESTUY (Law Fr.) He.

CESTUI QUE TRUST. He for whose benefit another person is seized of lands or tenements, or is possessed of personal property.

He who has a right to a beneficial interest in and out of an estate the legal title to which is vested in another. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 163.

Judge Story suggests (1 Eq. Jur. § 321) that the word "beneficiary" be substituted for cestui que trust, and this term has come into very general use as such a substitute.

CESTUI QUE USE. He for whose benefit land is held by another person.

He who has a right to take the profits of lands of which another has the legal title and possession, together with the duty of defending the same, and to direct the making estates thereof. White & T. Lead. Cas. 252; 2 Bl. Comm. 330. See 2 Washb. Real Prop. 95. See "Use."

CESTUI QUE VIE. He whose life is the measure of the duration of an estate. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 88.

CESTUY QUE DOIT INHERITER AL pere doit inheriter al fils. He who would have been heir to the father of the deceased shall also be heir of the son. Fitzh. Abr. "Descent" (2); 2 Bl. Comm. 239, 250.

CF. Abbreviation of conferre, compare.

CHACE (Law Fr.) A chase or hunting ground. Chacra, a chase or hunting.

CHACEA. A station for game, more extended than a park, less so than a forest; the liberty of hunting within such limits. Cowell.

The driving or hunting animals; the way along which animals are driven. Spelman.

CHACEA EST AD COMMUNEM LEGEM. A chace is by common law. Reg. Brev. 806.

CHACEABLE (Law Fr.) That which may be chased or hunted.

CHAFEWAX. An officer in chancery who fits the wax for sealing to the writs, commissions, and other instruments there made to be issued out. He is probably so called because he warms (chaufe) the wax.

CHAFFERS. Anciently signified wares and merchandise. Hence the word chaffering, which is yet used for buying and selling, or beating down the price of an article. The word is used in St. 3 Edw. III. c. 4.

CHAFFERY. Traffic; the practice of buying and selling. Rapalje & L.

CHAIRMAN. (1) The presiding officer of a deliberative body, legislative or otherwise; e. g. the speaker of a house of assembly, or of the house of representatives, or the presiding member of a board of directors of a corporation or association. (2) The president or senior member of a committee.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE whole house. In the English house of commons, this officer, always a member, is elected by the house on the assembling of every new parliament. When the house is in committee on bills introduced by the government, or in committee of ways and means, or supply, or in committee to consider preliminary resolutions, it is his duty to preside. He sits, not in the speaker's chair, but at the table in the seat of the clerk of the house. On divisions, when the numbers happen to be equal, he gives the casting vote (q. v.), but in committees he never otherwise votes. In August, 1853, it was, by resolution of the house, decided that, during the unavoidable absence of the speaker, this officer should preside in his stead, being only so appointed, however, from day to day. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 84. In the house of lords the chairman of committees of the whole house is elected by the house every session. He usually holds in addition the office of deputy speaker of the house of lords. Dod. Parl. Comp.

In American legislative assemblies, the practice is to select a member as presiding officer for the particular session of the committee on resolving to go into committee of the whole.

CHALDRON. A measure of capacity, equal to fifty-eight and two-thirds cubic feet, nearly.

CHALLENGE. An objection to the capacity or right of a person.

——In Practice. An exception to the jurors who have been arrayed to pass upon a cause on its trial.

An exception to those who have been returned as jurors. Co. Litt. 155b.

The most satisfactory derivation of the word is that adopted by Webster and Crabb, from "call," challenge implying a calling off. The word is also used to denote exceptions taken to a judge's capacity on account of interest (2 Bin. [Pa.] 454; 4 Bin. [Pa.] 349), and to the sheriff for favor as well as affinity (Co. Litt. 158a; 10 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 336; 11 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 303).

Challenges are of the following classes:

(1) To the array. Those which apply to all the jurors as arrayed or set in order by the officer upon the panel. Such a challenge is, in general, founded upon some error or manifest partiality committed in obtaining the panel, and which, from its nature, applies to all the jurors so obtained. These are not allowed in the United States generally (Colby, Prac. 235; 2 Blatchf. [U. S.] 435), the same end being attained by a motion addressed to the court, but are in some states (33 Pa. St. 338; 12 Tex. 252; 24 Miss. 445; 1 Mann. [Mich.] 451; 20 Conn. 510; 1 Zab. [N. J.] 656).

(2) To the poll. Those made separately to each juror to whom they apply.

Challenges to the poll are either:

(a) For cause,—those for which some reason sanctioned by law is assigned.

(b) Peremptory,—those made without assigning any cause, and which must be allowed as of course.. The number of these is variously limited by statute.

A challenge for cause lies also to the array. Challenge for cause was anciently divided into challenges:

(i) For principal cause,—being for such cause as, if substantiated, was sufficient to show bias or disqualification. The grounds of principal challenge were propter defectum, for disability, as infancy or mental unsoundness; propter affectum, for partiality, as where the juror was of kin to the party, or bore some confidential relation to him; propter delictum, on account of crime committed by the juror, whereby he was disqualified. 3 Bl. Comm. 361. To these was sometimes added propter honoris respectum, from respect to a party's rank or nobility.

(ii) To the favor,—those which are founded on reasonable ground to suspect that the jury is partial, though the cause be not so evident as to warrant a principal challenge.

Challenges for principal cause were tried by the court; those to the favor by triors.

The distinction between challenges to the favor and for principal cause is now obsolete.

Several other divisions of challenges for cause have been suggested by American statute or text writers, as that into challenge grounded on general disqualification, and challenges grounded on disqualification in respect of the particular case (Thomp. Trials, § 40), or that into challenges for actual bias, being for actual partiality as to the cause or the parties; and for implied bias, being such relationship towards a party or the cause as will, in contemplation of law, necessarily give rise to an implication of partiality, such as consanguinity to a party; confidential relation with a party; service on a previous jury in the cause, etc. Gen. St. Minn. 1878, c. 116, §§ 18, 19.

——In Election Law. Formal objection to the right of a person to vote at a particular election, or in a particular precinct. Generally made at the time the vote is offered.

——In Criminal Law. A request by one person to another to fight a duel. It may be oral or written.

CHAMBER OF ACCOUNTS. In French law. A sovereign court, of great antiquity, in France, which took cognizance of and registered the accounts of the king's revenue. Nearly the same as the English court of exchequer. Enc. Brit.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE. A society of the principal merchants and traders of a city, who meet to promote the general trade and commerce of the place. Similar societies exist in all the large commercial cities, and are known by various names, as, "board of trade," etc.

CHAMBERDEKINS, or CHAMBER DEACONS. In old English law. Certain poor Irish scholars, clothed in mean habit, and living under no rule; also beggars banished from England. 1 Hen. V. cc. 7, 8; Wharton.

CHAMBERLAIN (Law Lat. camerarius, cambellarius, cambalarius, chamberlanus, chamberlingus; from Fr. chambellan). Keeper of the chamber. Originally the chamberlain was the keeper of the treasure chamber (camera) of the prince or state; otherwise called "treasurer." Cowell. voc. "Chamberlain." See "Camerarius." Sir William Cavendish was treasurer of the chamber in the 24th year of Edward III. 3 Coke, 12; Spelman; Cowell.

The receiver of the rents and revenues of a city. Cowell; Blount. This is the modern meaning of the word in various cities of England and America.

The name of several high officers of state in England, as the lord great chamberlain of England, lord chamberlain of the household, chamberlain of the exchequer. See Cowell; Blount; Holthouse; Wharton. In modern times, the court officer styled "chamberlain" has the charge of the private apartments of the sovereign or noble to whom he is attached. Brande.

CHAMBERLARIA. Chamberlainship; the office of a chamberlain. Cowell.

CHAMBERS. Rooms or apartments.

The private room of the judge. Any hearing before a judge which does not take place during a term of court, or while the judge is sitting in court, or an order issued under such circumstances, is said to be "in chambers." The act may be an official one, and the hearing may be in the court room; but if the court is not in session, it is still said to be done "in chambers."

——In England. The office of a barrister.

An association of persons habitually meeting together, as a chamber of commerce.

CHAMBERS, WIDOW'S. A portion of the effects of a deceased person, reserved for the use of his widow, and consisting of her apparel and the furniture of her bed chamber, is called in London the "widow's chamber." 2 Bl. Comm. 518.

CHAMBIUM. In old English law. Change, or exchange. Bracton, fols. 117, 118.

Thought by Burrill to be another form of cambium.

CHAMP DE MAI. See "Campus Maii."

CHAMP DE MARS. See "Campus Martii."

CHAMPART. In French law. The grant of a piece of land by the owner to another, on condition that the latter would deliver to him a portion of the crops. 18 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 182.

CHAMPERTOR. In criminal law. One who makes pleas or suits, or causes them to be moved, either directly or indirectly, and sues them at his proper costs, upon condition of having a part of the gain. St. 33 Edw. I. st. 2.

CHAMPERTY. A bargain with a plaintiff or defendant, in a suit for a portion of the land or other matter sued for, in case of a successful termination of the suit which the champertor undertakes to carry on at his own expense. 4 Bl. Comm. 435.

"The unlawful maintenance of a suit in consideration of part of the debt or other thing in dispute." Hawk. P. C. c. 84, § 1.

The gist of the offense consists in the mode of compensation, irrespective of the particular manner in which the suit is to be maintained. 4 Kern. (N. Y.) 289; 1 Hawk. P. C. 455, §§ 5-11.

There must be an actual assistance, and not merely an offer to assist. 1 Hempst. 300.

On the other hand, it has been held, following the definition of Blackstone, that a promise to pay the expenses or costs is essential. 57 Ga. 263; 13 Ohio, 167.

It is not essential that there be a suit commenced at the time of making the agreement. 14 Ky. 412.

Champerty differs from maintenance chiefly in this, that in champerty the compensation to be given for the service rendered is a part of the matter in suit, or some profit growing out of it (16 Ala. 488; 24 Ala. [N. S.] 472; 9 Metc. [Mass.] 489; 1 Jones, Eq. [N. C.] 100; 5 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.] 44; 4 Litt. [Ky.] 117), while in simple maintenance the question of compensation does not enter into the account (2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 111). See 4 Bl. Comm. 134, note.

CHAMPION. In old English law. He who fights for another, or takes his place in a quarrel; one who fights his own battles. Bracton, lib. 4, tit. 2, c. 12.

CHAMPION OF THE KING OR QUEEN. An ancient officer, whose duty it was to ride armed cap-a-pie, into Westminster Hall at the coronation, while the king was at dinner, and, by the proclamation of a herald, make a challenge "that, if any man shall deny the king's title to the crown, he is there ready to defend it in single combat." The king drank to him, and sent him a gilt cup covered, full of wine, which the champion drank, retaining the cup for his fee. The ceremony has been discontinued. Wharton.

CHANCE. "Pure chance consists in the absence of all means of calculating results." Morris (Iowa) 169. It is to be distinguished from "accident," which is "the unusual prevention of an effect naturally resulting from the means employed." Id.

CHANCE-MEDLEY. In criminal law. A sudden affray. This word is sometimes applied to any kind of homicide by misadventure, but in strictness it is applicable to such killing only as happens in defending one's self. 4 Bl. Comm. 184.

CHANCELLOR.

——In the United States. The presiding judge of a court of chancery.

——In England. A judicial officer of the king; a bishop or other high dignitary. See "Chancellor of the Exchequer," etc.

CHANCELLOR OF A CATHEDRAL. One of the quatuor personae, or four chief dignitaries of the cathedrals of the old foundation. The duties assigned to the office by the statutes of the different chapters vary, but they are chiefly of an educational character, with a special reference to the cultivation of theology. Rapalje & L.

CHANCELLOR OF DIOCESE. A judicial officer who acts as the delegate of the bishop in hearing ecclesiastical causes, etc. The office generally includes in it two other offices,—that of official principal, and that of vicar general (q. v.; and see "Court of Arches"). Phillim. Ecc. Law, 1208; 1 Bl. Comm. 382.

CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF Lancaster. In English law. An officer before whom, or his deputy, the court of the duchy chamber of Lancester is held. This is a special jurisdiction concerning all manner of equity relating to lands holden of the king in right of the duchy of Lancaster. Hob. 77; 3 Bl. Comm. 78.

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER. A minister of state who presides in the exchequer, and takes care of the interests of the crown, in addition to his other parliamentary duties. With the lord treasurer, he leases the crown lands, and the two offices are often granted to the same person. Wharton. In addition to his duties in reference to the treasury of the king, the chancellor also sat as one of the judges in the equity court. 3 Bl. Comm. 45.

CHANCELLOR, THE LORD HIGH. The lord high chancellor of Great Britain is "created by the mere delivery of the king's great seal into his custody, whereby he becomes, without writ or patent, an officer of the greatest weight and power of any now subsisting in the kingdom, and superior in point of precedency to every temporal lord. He is a privy councillor by his office, and, according to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, prolocutor (or speaker) of the house of lords by prescription. To him (under the crown) belongs the appointment of all justices of the peace throughout the kingdom. Being formerly usually an ecclesiastic (for none else were then capable of an office so conversant in writings), and presiding over the royal chapel, he became keeper of the king's conscience, visitor (in right of the king) of all hospitals and colleges of the king's foundation, and patron of all the king's livings under the value of twenty marks per annum in the king's books. Twelve canonries and 650 livings are now in the gift of the lord chancellor. Second Rep. Leg. Dep. Comm. 34. He is the general guardian of all infants, idiots, and lunatics, and has the general superintendence of all charitable uses in the kingdom." 3 Bl. Comm. 47. See Butler's note to Co. Litt. 290b. He was formerly the principal judge of the court of chancery, and is now president of the court of appeal, of the high court of justice, and of the chancery division of the high court, and acts as president of the house of lords when sitting as a court of appeal. He is therefore, of course, a barrister, and, as a rule, has previously either been attorney or solicitor general, or held some judicial office. He is also a cabinet minister, and has charge.

in the house of lords, of all legal measures brought forward by the government. See "Chancery;" "Vice Chancellor."

CHANCELLORS' COURTS IN THE TWO universities. In English law. Courts of local jurisdiction in and for the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge in England. These courts have jurisdiction of all civil actions or suits, except those in which a right of freehold is involved, and of all criminal offenses and misdemeanors, under the degree of treason, felony, or mayhem, at Oxford when a scholar or privileged person is one of the parties, and at Cambridge when both parties are scholars or privileged persons, and the cause of action arose within the town of Cambridge or its suburbs. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 83, note; St. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 17, § 18; Id. c. 88; Rep. temp. Hardw. 241; 2 Wils. 406; 12 East, 12; 13 East, 635; 15 East, 634.

CHANCERY. See "Court of Chancery."

CHANGER. Now obsolete. An officer of the English mint, whose duty was to exchange coin for bullion.

CHANNEL. The entire body of a stream from bank to bank, rather than the deep or navigable thread of it (55 Iowa, 558), the latter being more accurately the "main channel."

CHANTRY. A church or chapel endowed with lands for the maintenance of priests to say mass daily for the souls of the donors. Termes de la Ley; Cowell.

CHAPEL OF EASE. One which is used only for the ease of the parishioners in prayers and preaching, while the sacraments and burial are received and performed at the mother church. The curate of such a chapel is generally removable at the pleasure of the parochial minister.

CHAPELRY. The precinct of a chapel; the same thing for a chapel that a parish is for a church. Termes de la Ley; Cowell.

CHAPELS. Places of worship. They may be either "private" chapels, such as are built and maintained by a private person for his own use and at his own expense, or "free" chapels, so called from their freedom or exemption from all ordinary jurisdiction, or chapels "of ease," which are built by the mother church for the ease and convenience of its parishioners, and remain under its jurisdiction and control.

CHAPERON. A hood or bonnet anciently worn by the Knights of the Garter, as part of the habit of that order. Also a little escutcheon fixed in the forehead of horses drawing a hearse at a funeral. Wharton.

CHAPITRE. A summary of matters to be inquired of or presented before justices in eyre, justices of assize, or of the peace, in their sessions. Also articles delivered by the justice in his charge to the inquest. Britt. c. iii.

CHAPLAIN.

(1) An ecclesiastic who performs divine service in a chapel; but it more commonly means one who attends upon a king, prince, or other person of quality, for the performance of clerical duties in a private chapel. 4 Coke, 90; Wharton.

(2) A clergyman officially attached to a ship of war, to an army or regiment, or to some public institution, for the purpose of performing divine service. Webster.

CHAPMAN (said to be from German copeman). A trader who trades from place to place. Ryder, C. J., construing St. 5 Anne, c. 14.

CHAPTER. In ecclesiastical law. A congregation of clergymen. Such an assembly is termed capitulum, which signifies a little head; it being a kind of head, not only to govern the diocese in the vacation of the bishopric, but also for other purposes. Co. Litt. 103.

CHARACTER. In evidence. The opinion generally entertained of a person derived from the common report of the people who are acquainted with him. 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 336; 3 Mass. 192; 3 Esp. 236; 40 Neb. 810.

In its technical use, the word has lost its ordinary significance, and in such use is synonymous with "repute."

The moral character and conduct of a person in society may be used in proof before a jury in three classes of cases: First, to afford a presumption that a particular party has not been guilty of a criminal act (17 Mich. 9; 14 Mo. 502); second, to affect the damages in particular cases, where their amount depends on the character and conduct of any individual (30 N. Y. 285; 8 Iowa, 29; 4 Cush. [Mass.] 217); and, third, to impeach or confirm the veracity of a witness (16 Ohio St. 218; 7 N. Y. 378).

CHARGE. A duty or obligation imposed upon some person; a lien, incumbrance, or claim which is to be satisfied out of the specific thing or proceeds thereof to which it applies.

To impose such an obligation; to create such a claim.

To accuse.

The distinctive significance of the term rests in the idea of obligation directly bearing upon the individual thing or person to be affected, and binding him or it to the discharge of the duty or satisfaction of the claim imposed. Thus, charging an estate with the payment of a debt is appropriating a definite portion to the particular purpose; charging a person with the commission of a crime is pointing out the individual who is bound to answer for the wrong committed; charging a jury is stating the precise principles of law applicable to the case immediately in question. In this view, a charge will, in general terms, denote a responsibility peculiar to the person or thing affected and authoritatively imposed, or the act fixing such responsibility.

——In Contracts. An obligation, binding upon him who enters into it, which may be removed or taken away by a discharge. Termes de la Ley.

An undertaking to keep the custody of another person's goods.

An obligation entered into by the owner of an estate, which binds the estate for its performance. Comyn, Dig. "Rent," c. 6; 2 Ball & B. 223.

——In Devises. A duty imposed upon a devisee, either personally, or with respect to the estate devised.

——In Equity Pleading. An allegation in the bill of matters which disprove or avoid a defense which it is alleged the defendant is supposed to pretend or intend to set up. Story, Eq. Pl. § 31.

——In Practice. The instructions given by the court to the grand jury or inquest of the county, at the commencement of their session, in regard to their duty.

The exposition by the court to the petit jury of those principles of the law which the latter are bound to apply in order to render such a verdict as will, in the state of facts proved at the trial to exist, establish the rights of the parties to the suit.

CHARGE AND DISCHARGE. In equity practice. The mode or form of accounting before a master. Where a decree or order of the court directs an account to be taken and examined before a master, in such case the plaintiff delivers in an account before the master, in the form of a charge (q. v.) against the defendant, which being examined and gone through, the defendant or adverse party must bring in his discharge (q. v.) against such charge, which being likewise examined and gone through, the master will exercise his judgment upon the evidence, and allow or disallow the charge, or any part of it, as he thinks proper; and so, e contra, as to the discharge, after which the report is made. Cunningham; Whishaw; 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1420-1422; Hoffman, Master in Chancery, 36-39.

CHARGE DES AFFAIRES, or CHARGE d'affaires. In international law. The title of a diplomatic representative or minister of an inferior grade, to whose care are confided the affairs of his nation.

He has not the title of minister, and is generally introduced and admitted through a verbal presentation of the minister at his departure, or through letters of credence addressed to the minister of state of the court to which he is sent. He has the essential rights of a minister. 1 Kent, Comm. 39, note; 4 Dall. (Pa.) 321; 2 Story, U. S. Laws, 1171.

CHARGE TO ENTER HEIR. In Scotch law. A writ commanding a person to enter heir to his predecessor within forty days; otherwise, an action to be raised against him as if he had entered.

The heir might appear and renounce the succession, whereupon a decree cognitionis causa passed, ascertaining the creditor's debt. If the heir did not appear, he then became personally liable to the creditor. A charge was either general, or special, or general special. Charges are now abolished, by 10 & 11 Vict. c. 48, § 16, and a summons of constitution against the unentered heir substituted.

CHARGEANT. Weighty; heavy; penal; expensive. Kelham.

CHARGES. The expenses which have been incurred in relation either to a transaction or to a suit. It is a larger term than "costs."

CHARGING ORDER. By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, §§ 14-16, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, when judgment has been recovered in an action, a judge at chambers may make an order that any government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares in a public company in England, standing in the name of the judgment debtor in his own right, or in the name of any person as trustee for him, shall stand charged with the payment of the judgment debt. Smith, Actions, 211; Rules of Court, xlvi, 1. The effect is to prevent the transfer of the stock, and to give the judgment creditor all the remedies which he would have been entitled to if the charge had been made in his favor by the judgment debtor, but he cannot enforce it until six months from the date of the order. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, § 14; Fish. Mortg. 113 et seq.

CHARITABLE USES, or CHARITIES. Gifts to general public uses, which may extend to the rich as well as the poor. Ambl. 651; 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 305.

Gifts to such purposes as are enumerated in Act 43 Eliz. c. 4, or which, by analogy, are deemed within its spirit or intendment. Boyle, Charity, 17.

"Whatever is given for the love of God, or for the love of your neighbor, in the catholic or universal sense, free from the stain or taint of every consideration that is personal, private or selfish," is a gift for charitable uses. 2 How. (U. S.) 127. The essentials are (1) that the gift be for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons (14 Allen [Mass.] 556; 107 U. S. 182); (2) that it be free from contractual obligation in or consideration to the donor (33 Pa. St. 419); (3) that the purpose be humanitarian in the broadest sense, whether it be religious (12 Mass. 537), educational (35 N. H. 445; 34 N. J. Eq. 101), benevolent (91 Mass. 442; 54 Ind. 549), or public (163 Mass. 509; 5 Del. Ch. 51).

CHARRE, or CHARRUS. A weight of lead, consisting of thirty pigs at seventy pounds each. Cowell.

CHARTA. A charter or deed in writing; any signal or token by which an estate was held.

——Charta Chyrographata. An indenture. The two parts were written on the same sheet, and the word "chyrograph" written between them in such a manner as to divide the word in the separation of the two parts of the indenture.

——Charta Communis. An indenture.

——Charta Partita. A charter party.

——Charta de Una Parte. A deed poll; a deed of one part.

Formerly this phrase was used to distinguish a deed poll—which is an agreement made by one party only; that is, only one of the parties does any act which is binding upon him—from a deed inter partes. Co. Litt. 229. See "Deed Poll."

CHARTA DE FORESTA. A collection of the laws of the forest, made in 9 Hen. III., and said to have been originally a part of Magna Charta.

CHARTA DE NON ENTE NON VALET. A charter or deed of a thing not in being is not valid. Co. Litt. 36.

CHARTAE LIBERTATUM. Magna Charta and Charta de Foresta (q. v.)

CHARTARUM SUPER FIDEM, MORTUIS testibus, ad patriam de necessitudine, recurrendum est. The witnesses being dead, the truth of charters must, of necessity, be referred to the country. Co. Litt. 36.

CHARTE PARTIE (Fr.) In French marine law. A charter party. Ord. Mar. liv. 3, tit. 1.

CHARTEL. A challenge to single combat. Used at the period when trial by single combat existed. Cowell.

CHARTER. A grant made by the sovereign, either to the whole people, or to a portion of them, securing to them the enjoyment of certain rights. 1 Story, Const. § 161; 1 Bl. Comm. 108.

Formerly included all deeds relating to hereditaments, especially deeds of feoffment (Co. Litt. 7a, 9b), but in this sense the term is now obsolete, and is now confined to grants by the government, the principal ones being grants of power to form corporations, either municipal or private.

CHARTER HOUSE. Formerly a convent of Carthusian monks in London; now a college founded and endowed by Thomas Sutton. The governors of the charter house are a corporation aggregate without a head, president, or superior, all the members being of equal authority. 3 Steph. Comm. (7th Ed.) 14, 97.

CHARTER LAND. In English law. Land formerly held by deed under certain rents and free services. It differed in nothing from free socage land; and it was also called "bookland." 2 Bl. Comm. 90.

CHARTER OF PARDON (Law Lat. charta, or carta perdonationis). In English criminal law. A charter or instrument under the great seal, by which a man is forgiven a felony, or other offense committed against the king's crown and dignity. Brown, Abr. "Charter of Pardon;" Dyer, 34; Cowell; 4 Bl. Comm. 400, 402. See the old form, Reg. Orig. 288, 308. And see 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 437.

CHARTER PARTY. A contract of affreightment, by which the owner of a ship or other vessel lets the whole or a part of her to a merchant or other person for the conveyance of goods, on a particular voyage, in consideration of the payment of freight. 3 Kent, Comm. 201.

The term is derived from the fact that the contract which bears this name was formerly written on a card, and afterwards the card was cut into two parts from top to bottom, and one part was delivered to each of the parties, which was produced when required, and by this means counterfeits were prevented; the card so cut being called charta parteta.

CHARTER ROLLS (Law Lat. rotuli cartarum). Rolls preserved amongst the ancient English records, containing the royal charters from the year 1199 to 1516. They comprise grants of privileges to cities, towns, bodies corporate, and private trading companies; grants of markets, fairs, and free warrens, of creations of nobility, of privileges to religious houses, etc. Hubback, Ev. Success. 616, and notes.

CHARTERER. One who engages a ship for a voyage.

CHARTIS REDDENDIS (Lat. for returning charters). A writ which lay against one who had charters of feoffment intrusted to his keeping which he refused to deliver. Reg. Orig. 159. It is now obsolete.

CHARTOPHYLAX. In old European law. A keeper of records or public instruments; a chartulary; a registrar. Spelman.

CHARUE. In old English law. A plow. Bestes des charues, beasts of the plow. Artic. Sup. Chart. c. 12; Britt. c. 21.

CHASE. The liberty or franchise of hunting one's self and keeping protected against all other persons beasts of the chase within a specified district, without regard to the ownership of the land. 2 Bl. Comm. 414-416.

The district within which such privilege is to be exercised.

A chase is a franchise granted to a subject, and hence is not subject to the forest laws. 2 Bl. Comm. 38. It differs from a park, because it may be another's ground, and is not inclosed. It is said by some to be smaller than a forest, and larger than a park. Termes de la Ley. But this seems to be a customary incident, and not an essential quality.

The act of acquiring possession of animals ferae naturae by force, cunning, or address.

CHASTITY. That virtue which prevents the unlawful commerce of the sexes. Content without lawful venery is continence; without unlawful is chastity. Webster.

CHATTEL (Norman Fr.) Goods of any kind; every species of property, movable or immovable, which is less than a freehold.

In the grand coustumier of Normandy it is described as a mere movable, but is set in opposition to a fief or feud; so that not only goods, but whatever was not a feud or fee, were accounted chattels, and it is in this latter sense that our law adopts it. 2 Bl. Comm. 385.

Real chattels are interests which are annexed to or concern real estate, as, a lease for years of land; and the duration of the lease is immaterial, whether it be for one or a thousand years, provided there be a certainty about it, and a reversion or remainder in some other person. A lease to continue until a certain sum of money can be raised out of the rents is of the same description; and so in fact will be found to be any other interest in real estate whose duration is limited to a time certain beyond which it cannot subsist, and which is, therefore, something less than a freehold.

Personal chattels are properly things movable, which may be carried about by the owner, such as animals, household stuff, money, jewels, corn, garments, and everything else that can be put in motion, and transferred from one place to another, and the incorporeal hereditaments that grow out of movables. 2 Kent, Comm. 340; Co. Litt. 48a; 4 Coke, 6; 5 Mass. 419; 1 N. H. 350; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1021, 1040. See "Personal Property."

CHATTEL INTEREST. An interest in corporeal hereditaments less than a freehold. 2 Kent, Comm. 342.

There may be a chattel interest in real property, as in case of a lease. Stearns, Real Actions, 115. A term for years, no matter of how long duration, is but a chattel interest, unless declared otherwise by statute. See the subject fully treated in 1 Washb. Real Prop. 310 et seq.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE. At common law, a sale of a chattel on a condition subsequent, upon performance of which the title revests in the mortgagor, and upon breach of which the mortgagee's title becomes absolute.

It differs from a pledge, in that the title to the property, rather than the possession thereof, constitutes the security. 87 N. Y. 209; 37 Mich. 484.

It differs from a vendor's lien in that a lienor has no title to the property. 23 Ohio St. 114; 40 Me. 412.

It differs from a sale wherein the title is retained by the seller until the performance of some condition, in that no title passes from the debtor to the creditor, but the creditor simply retains a title which the debtor never had. 88 Ill. 447; 16 Ind. 380.

It differs from a sale with a right of repurchase in that the latter transaction is not a security for an obligation.

It differs from an assignment for the benefit of creditors, which is not a security, but implies an absolute appropriation of the property to the payment of the indebtedness. Hammon, Chat. Mortg. §§ 1-7.

CHAUD-MEDLEY (Fr. chaud). The killing of a person in the heat of an affray.

It is distinguished by Blackstone from chance-medley, an accidental homicide. 3 Bl. Comm. 184. The distinction is said to be, however, of no great importance. 1 Russ. Crimes, 660. Chance-medley is said to be the killing in self-defense, such as happens on a sudden rencounter, as distinguished from an accidental homicide. Id.

CHAUNTRY RENTS. Money paid to the crown by the servants or purchasers of chauntry or chantry lands. 22 Car. II. c. 6. See "Chantry."

CHEAT. "Deceitful practices in defrauding or endeavoring to defraud another of his known right, by some willful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty." Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 23, § 1. "The fraudulent obtaining the property of another by any deceitful and illegal practice or token (short of felony) which affects or may affect the public." It did not include mere false pretenses. East, 818.

In order to constitute a cheat or indictable fraud, there must be a use of false tokens, false weights, or such other devices, or a prejudice received, and such injury must affect the public welfare, or have a tendency so to do. 2 East, P. C. 817; 1 Gabbett, Crim. Law, 199; 1 Deac. Crim. Law, 225.

CHEATERS, or ESCHEATORS. Officers appointed to look after the king's escheats, a duty which gave them great opportunities of fraud and oppression, and in consequence many complaints were made of their misconduct. Hence it seems that a "cheater" came to signify a fraudulent person, and thence the verb to "cheat" was derived. Rapalje & L.

CHECK. Contracts. A written order or request, addressed to a bank or persons carrying on the business of banking, by a party having money in their hands, on deposit, desiring them to pay, on presentment, to a person therein named, or bearer, or to such person, or order, a named sum of money.

The chief differences between checks and bills of exchange are: First, a check is not due until presented, and, consequently, it can be negotiated any time before presentment, and yet not subject the holder to any equities existing between the previous parties. 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 5, 9; 9 Barn. & C. 388; Chit. Bills (8th Ed.) 546. Secondly, the drawer of a check is not discharged for want of immediate presentment with due diligence, while the drawer of a bill of exchange is. The drawer of a check is only discharged by such neglect when he sustains actual damage by it, and then only pro tanto. 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 484; Kent, Comm. lect. 44 (5th Ed.) p. 104, note; 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 5, 259; 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 306; 2 Hill (N. Y.) 425. Thirdly, the death of the drawer of a check rescinds the authority of the banker to pay it, while the death of the drawer of a bill of exchange does not alter the relations of the parties. 3 Man. & G. 571-573. Fourthly, checks, unlike bills of exchange, are always payable without grace. 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 672; 6 Hill (N. Y.) 174.

CHECK BOOK. A book containing blanks for checks.

CHECK ROLL. A list or book, containing the names of such as are attendants on, or in the pay of, the queen or other great personages, as their household servants. 19 Car. II. c. 1. Rapalje & L.

CHECKER. The old Scotch form of exchequer. Skene de Verb. Sign.

CHEFE. In Anglo-Norman law. Were or weregild; the price of the head or person (capitis pretium). Laws Gul. Conq. 11.

CHEMERAGE. In old French law. The privilege or prerogative of the eldest. See "Chemier."

CHEMIER (Fr.) In old French law. The eldest born. A term used in Poitou and other places. Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 18, § 4.

CHEMIN (Fr.) The road wherein every man goes; the king's highway. Called in law Latin via regia. Often spelled chimin. Termes de la Ley; Cowell; Spelman.

CHEMIS. In old Scotch law. A mansion house.

CHEVAGE. A sum of money paid by villeins to their lords in acknowledgment of their villeinage. It was paid to the lord in token of his being chief or head. It was exacted for permission to marry, and also for permission to remain without the dominion of the lord. When paid to the king, it was called "subjection." Termes de la Ley; Co. Litt. 140a; Spelman.

CHEVANTIA. A loan, or advance of money on credit. See "Chevisance."

CHEVISANCE (Fr. agreement). A bargain or contract; an unlawful bargain or contract.

CHEVITIAE (Lat.) In old records. Pieces of ground, or heads at the end of plowed lands. 2 Mon. Angl. 116; Cowell; Blount.

CHEZE. A homestead or homesfall which is accessory to a house. Rapalje & L.

CHICANE. The use of tricks and artifice.

CHIEF. One who is put above the rest; principal; the best of a number of things.

——Declaration in Chief. A declaration for the principal cause of action. 1 Tidd, Prac. 419.

——Examination in Chief. The first examination of a witness by the party who produces him. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 445.

——Tenant in Chief. One who held directly of the king. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 19.

CHIEF BARON. The title of the chief justice of the English court of exchequer. 3 Bl. Comm. 44.

CHIEF JUSTICE. The presiding or principal judge of a court.

CHIEF JUSTICIAR. Under the early Norman kings, the highest officer in the kingdom next to the king.

He was guardian of the realm in the king's absence. His power was diminished under the reign of successive kings, and, finally, completely distributed amongst various courts in the reign of Edward I. 3 Bl. Comm. 28. The same as capitalis justiciarius.

CHIEF LORD. The immediate lord of the fee. Burton, Real Prop. 317.

CHIEF PLEDGE. The borsholder or chief of the borough. Spelman.

CHIEF RENTS (Law Lat. reditus capitales). In English law. Rents of the freeholders of a manor. 2 Bl. Comm. 42. Called also "quit rents" (quieti reditus), because thereby the tenant goes quit and free of all other services. Id.

CHIEFRIE. A small rent paid to the lord paramount.

CHILD. The son or daughter, in relation to the father or mother; the correlative of "parent."

A young person of either sex. The age limit of childhood is undefined. 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 392.

It is not synonymous with "minor." 7 Tex. App. 298. And in a classification of females subject of rape, "child" has been held to mean one not arrived at puberty. 22 Ohio St. 102.

CHILDNIT (Saxon). A power to take a fine from a bondwoman gotten with child without the lord's consent.

By custom in Essex county, England, every reputed father of a bastard child was obliged to pay a small fine to the lord. This custom is known as childnit. Cowell.

CHILDREN. Legitimate offspring. L. R. 7 H. L. 568; 23 Hun (N. Y.) 260; 14 N. J. Eq. 159. But see 42 Conn. 491. It includes only the first generation, and does not embrace grandchildren (21 N. J. Eq. 84; 19 Ohio St. 30; 104 Mass. 193), but it has been given that meaning in instruments where the context or the necessity of effectuating the instrument required it (15 N. J. Eq. 174; 37 N. Y. 42; 88 Pa. St. 478). It does not include stepchildren (8 Paige [N. Y.] 375), nor adopted children (54 Pa. St. 304. But see 115 Mass. 262).

CHILTERN HUNDREDS. A range of hills in England, formerly much infested by robbers.

To exterminate the robbers, a steward of the chiltern hundreds was appointed. The office long since became a sinecure, and is now used to enable a member of parliament to resign, which he can do only by the acceptance of some office within the gift of the chancellor. 2 Steph. Comm. 403; Wharton.

CHIMIN. See "Chemin."

CHIMINAGE. A toll for passing on a way through a forest; called in the civil law pedagium. Cowell. See Co. Litt. 56a; Spelman; Termes de la Ley.

CHIMINUS. The way by which the king and all his subjects and all under his protection have a right to pass, though the property of the soil of each side where the way lieth may belong to a private man. Cowell.

CHIMNEY MONEY, or HEARTH MONEY. A tax upon chimneys or hearths; an ancient tax or duty upon houses in England, now repealed. Cowell.

CHIPPINGAVEL. A toll for buying and selling; a tax imposed on goods brought for sale. Whishaw; Blount.

CHIRGEMOTE, CHIRCHGEMOTE, CIRCgemote, or kirkmote (Saxon, circgemote, from circ, ciric, or cyric, a church, and gemot, a meeting or assembly). In Saxon law. An ecclesiastical court or assembly (forum ecclesiasticum); a synod; a meeting in a church or vestry. Blount; Spelman; LL. Hen. I. cc. 4, 8; 4 Inst. 321; Cunningham.

CHIROGRAPH.

——In Old Conveyancing. A deed or public instrument in writing.

Chirographs were anciently attested by the subscription and crosses of witnesses. Afterwards, to prevent frauds and concealments, deeds of mutual covenant were made in a script and rescript, or in a part and counterpart, and in the middle, between the two copies, they drew the capital letters of the alphabet, and then tallied, or cut asunder in an indented manner, the sheet or skin of parchment, one of which parts, being delivered to each of the parties, were proved authentic by matching with and answering to one another. Deeds thus made were denominated "syngrapha" by the canonists, because that word, instead of the letters of the alphabet or the word "chirographum," was used. 2 Bl. Comm. 296.

The last part of a fine of land.

It is called, more commonly, the foot of the fine. It is an instrument of writing, beginning with these words: "This is the final agreement," etc. It concludes the whole matter, reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom the fine was acknowledged and levied. Cruise, Dig. tit. 35, c. 2, § 52.

——In Civil and Canon Law. An instrument written out and subscribed by the hands of the king or prince. An instrument written out by the parties, and signed by them. Du Cange; Cowell.

——In Scotch Law. A written voucher for a debt. Bell, Dict. The possession of this instrument by the debtor raises a presumption of payment by him. Bell, Dict.; Ersk. Inst. lib. 2, tit. 4, § 5.

CHIROGRAPHER OF FINES (Law Lat. chirographus, or chirographarius finium et concordiarum). In old English law. An officer of the court of common pleas, who engrossed the fines acknowledged in that court after they were examined, and fully passed by other officers, and who wrote and delivered the indentures of them to the parties. 2 Bl. Comm. 351; 2 Inst. 468; Cowell; Blount. See "Fine."

CHIROGRAPHUM. In Roman law. A handwriting; that which was written with a person's own hand; an obligation which a person wrote or subscribed with his own hand; an acknowledgment of debt, as of money received, with a promise to repay. For forms of such a acknowledgments, see Dig. 22. 1. 41. 2; Id. 2. 14. 47. 1.

An evidence or voucher of debt; a security for debt. Dig. 26. 7. 57. pr.

A right of action for debt. Dig. 32. 59. And see Id. 34. 3. 31. 3; Id. 46. 3. 89. pr.; Code, 4. 2. 17.

CHIROGRAPHUM APUD DEBITOREM repertum presumitur solutum. An evidence of debt found in possession of the debtor is presumed to be paid. Halk. Max. 30. See 14 Mees. & W. 379.

CHIROGRAPHUM NON EXTANS PRESumitur solutum. An evidence of debt not existing is presumed to have been discharged. Tray. Lat. Max. 73.

CHIVALRY. In feudal law. Knight service. Tenure in chivalry was the same as tenure by knight service. 2 Bl. Comm. 61, 62. See "Tenure."

CHIVALRY, COURT OF. This court was anciently held as a court of honor merely, before the earl marshal, and as a criminal court before the lord high constable, jointly with the earl marshal. It had jurisdiction as to contracts and other matters touching deeds of arms or war, as well as pleas of life or member. It also corrected encroachments in matters of coat armor, precedency, and other distinctions of families. It is now grown entirely out of use, on account of the feebleness of its jurisdiction and want of power to enforce its judgments, as it could neither fine nor imprison, not being a court of record. 3 Bl. Comm. 68; 4 Broom & H. Comm. 360, note; Wharton.

CHIVALRY, TENURE BY. Tenure by knight service. Co. Litt.

CHOP-CHURCH. A word mentioned in a statute of 9 Hen. VI., by the sense of which it was in those days a kind of trade, and by the judges declared to be lawful. But Brooke, in his Abridgment, says it was only permissible by law. It was, without doubt, a nickname given to those who used to change benefices, as to "chop and change" is a common expression. 9 Hen. VI. c. 65; Jacob.

CHORAL. In ancient times, a person admitted to sit and worship in the choir; a chorister.

CHOREPISCOPI. Bishops of the country in the early times of the church.

CHOSE (Fr.) thing. Personal property.

——Choses in Possession. Personal things of which one has possession.

——Choses in Action. Personal things of which the owner has not the possession, but merely a right of action for their possession. 2 Bl. Comm. 389, 397; 1 Chit. Prac. 99.

A right to receive or recover a debt, or money, or damages for breach of contract, or for a tort connected with contract, but which cannot be enforced without action. Comyn, Dig. "Biens;" Chit. Eq. Dig.

In modern usage, the phrase is broader, and includes rights of action for tort (4 Ala. 350; 12 N. Y. 622), and rights enforceable only in equity (Wms. 6).

——Chose Local. A local thing; a thing annexed to a place, as a mill. Kitch. Cts. fol. 18; Cowell; Blount. Answering probably to the res immobilis of the civil law.

——Chose Transitory. A thing which is movable, and may be taken away or carried from place to place. Cowell; Blount.

CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS. In New Jersey. A board of county officers, having charge of the finances of the county, and composed of persons chosen by and representing the several towns or townships of the county. In some states, similar officers are called "county commissioners" (q. v.), and in others, the "board of supervisors" (q. v.)

CHRENECRUDA (Law Lat.) A singular ceremony among the Salians, by which a poor person applied to a rich relative to pay his debt or fine. It consisted (after certain preliminaries) in throwing green herbs upon the party, the effect of which was to bind him to pay the whole demand. L. Salic. tit. 61. Spelman, who describes it, finds the elements of the word in the Belgian groen, green, and cruid, herb.

CHRISTIANITATIS CURIA (Law Lat.) The court of Christianity; the court Christian, or ecclesiastical judicature, as opposed to the civil court, or lay tribunal. Cowell. See "Courts Christian."

CHURCH. A society of persons who profess the Christian religion. 7 Halst. (N. J.) 206, 214; 10 Pick. (Mass.) 193; 3 Pa. St. 282; 31 Pa. St. 9; 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 95.

The place where such persons regularly assemble for worship. 3 Tex. 288; 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 95.

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS. Statutes passed in England in and since the year 1818, with the object of extending the accommodation afforded by the national church, so as to make it more commensurate with the wants of the people. 3 Steph. Comm. 152-164.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT. St. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86, containing regulations for trying clerks in holy orders charged with offenses against ecclesiastical law, and for enforcing sentences pronounced in such cases. Phillim. Ecc. Law, 1314.

CHURCH RATE. A tribute by which the expenses of the church are to be defrayed. They are to be laid by the parishioners, in England, and may be recovered before two justices, or in the ecclesiastical court. Wharton.

CHURCH REEVE. A church warden.

CHURCH SCOT. Customary obligations paid to the parish priest; from which duties the religious sometimes purchased an exemption for themselves and their tenants. Wharton.

CHURCH WARDEN. An officer whose duty it is to take care of or guard the church.

They are taken to be a kind of corporation in favor of the church for some purposes. They may have, in that name, property in goods and chattels, and bring actions for them for the use and benefit of the church, but may not waste the church property, and are liable to be called to account. 3 Steph. Comm. 90; 1 Bl. Comm. 394; Cowell.

CHURCHESSET, CHURCHSET, CIRSET, kirkset, or chirset. In old English law. A certain portion or measure of wheat, anciently paid to the church on St. Martin's day, and which, according to Fleta, was paid as well in the time of the Britons as of the English. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47, § 28. An annual tribute paid to the church in grain or other product, census vel tributum ecclesiae, frumenti tributum. Spelman, voc. "Cirset;" Lindenbrog; Domesday Book. Sometimes written chirchsed, and translated "churchseed," semen ecclesiae. Fleta, ubi supra; Co. Litt. 88b. But the proper spelling, according to Spelman, is ciricset, or ciricsceat.

CHURL. See "Ceorl."

CI, CY, or SI (Law Fr.) So. Pur ceo que fine est ci hault barre, et de ci graund force, et de ci puissant nature, because a fine is so high a bar, and of so great force, and of so powerful a nature. St. Modus Lev. Fin.; 2 Inst. 510.

CIBARIA (Lat. pl. of cibarium, from cibes, food). In the civil law. Food; victuals. Dig. 34. 1.

CINQUE PORTS. The five ports of England which lie towards France.

These ports, on account of their importance as defenses to the kingdom, early had certain privileges granted them, and in recompense were bound to furnish a certain number of ships and men to serve on the king's summons once in each year. "The service that the barons of the Cinque Ports acknowledge to owe, upon the king's summons, if it shall happen, to attend with their ships fifteen days at their own cost and charges, and so long as the king pleases, at his own charge." Cowell, "Quinque Portus." The Cinque Ports are Dover, Sandwich, Hastings, Hithe, and Romney. Winchelsea and Rye are reckoned parts of Sandwich; and the other of the Cinque Ports have ports appended to them in like manner. The Cinque Ports have a lord warden, who had a peculiar jurisdiction, sending out writs in his own name, and who is also constable of Dover Castle. The jurisdiction was abolished by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 1. The representatives in parliament and the inhabitants of the Cinque Ports are each termed "barons." Brande; Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

CIPPI. The stocks. Reg. Orig. 96b. Bracton and Fleta used in cippo. Bracton, fol. 145b; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 42, §§ 1, 2.

CIRC BRYCE. A violation of ecclesiastical privilege.

CIRC SCEAT. Church scot; an ecclesiastical due.

CIRCADA. In old English law. A tribute anciently paid to the bishop or archbishop for visiting the churches. Du Fresne; Whishaw.

CIRCUIT. A division of the country, appointed for a particular judge to visit for the trial of causes, or for the administration of justice. See 3 Bl. Comm. 58; 3 Bouv. Inst. note 2532.

In England the term is oftener applied, perhaps, to the periodical journeys of the judges through their various circuits. The judges, or, in England, commissioners of assize and nisi prius, are said "to make their circuit." 3 Bl. Comm. 57.

In England there are eight judicial circuits, viz., the North and South Wales, northern, northeastern, southeastern, western, Midland, and Oxford. See 3 Bl. Comm. 58; 3 Steph. Comm. 221.

For the purposes of federal jurisdiction, the United States is divided into nine circuits, designated by number. Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 604. See "Circuit Courts."

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS. A federal court created in 1891 in each circuit (q. v.), consisting of three judges, and having final appellate jurisdiction of cases from the circuit and district courts except in certain cases. The court was designed to relieve the supreme court of the United States. See Act Cong. March 3, 1891.

CIRCUIT COURTS. In American law. Courts whose jurisdiction extends over several counties or districts, and of which terms are held in the various counties or districts to which their jurisdiction extends.

The term is applied in several states to courts of general original jurisdiction, terms of which are held in the various counties or districts of the state. It is unknown in the classification of English courts, and conveys a different idea in the various states in which it is adopted.

In the federal jurisprudence of the United States, the circuit courts are a system of federal courts, holding terms in several places in each of the several judicial circuits. See "Circuit."

They have original jurisdiction of substantially all civil cases which, by reason of the citizenship of the parties, or the nature of the subject-matter, are of federal cognizance. See "District Courts." 1 Kent, Comm. 301-303; Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 605 et seq.

CIRCUITUS EST EVITANDUS. Circuity is to be avoided. Co. Litt. 384a; Smith, Lead. Cas. (4th Am. Ed.) 20; Wingate, Max. 179; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 309; 5 Coke, 34; 15 Mees. & W. 208; 5 Exch. 829.

CIRCUITUS EST EVITANDUS; ET BONI judices est lites dirimere, ne lis ex lite oriatur. Circuity is to be avoided; and it is the duty of a good judge to determine litigations, lest one lawsuit arise out of another. 5 Coke, 31.

CIRCUITY OF ACTION. Indirectly obtaining, by means of a subsequent action, a result which may be reached in an action already pending.

This is particularly obnoxious to the law, as tending to multiply suits. 1 Term R. 441; 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 682.

CIRCULAR NOTES. Similar instruments to "letters of credit." They are drawn by resident bankers upon their foreign correspondents, in favor of persons traveling abroad. The correspondents must be satisfied of the identity of the applicant before payment, and the requisite proof of such identity is usually furnished, upon the applicant's producing a letter with his signature, by a comparison of the signatures. Brown.

CIRCULATING MEDIUM. This term is more comprehensive than the term "money," as it is the medium of exchanges, or purchases and sales, whether it be gold or silver coin, or any other article. Rapalje & L.

CIRCUMDUCTION. In Scotch law. A closing of the period for lodging papers, or doing any other act required in a cause. Paterson, Comp.

——Circumduction of the Term. The sentence of a judge, declaring the time elapsed within which a proof ought to have been led, and precluding the party from bringing forward any further evidence. Bell, Dict.

CIRCUMSPECTE AGATIS. Act circumspectly. The title of a statute passed 13 Edw. I. A. D. 1285, and so called from the initial words of it, the object of which was to ascertain the boundaries of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in some particulars, or, in other words, to regulate the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical and temporal courts. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 215.

CIRCUMSTANCES. The particulars which accompany an act; the surroundings at the commission of an act.

Though sometimes used in the sense of "fact," a circumstance is a "relative" fact, as distinguished from the "principal" fact, which it may corroborate or disprove.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. That which is applied to the principal fact indirectly, or through the medium of other facts, by establishing certain circumstances or minor facts from which the principal fact is gathered by a process of inference. See 3 Benth. Jud. Ev. 2, 5.

The process by which a fact not directly known is inferred from known facts or circumstances. 1 Starkie, Ev. 18.

The terms "circumstantial" and "presumptive" are often used interchangeably to denote the same kind of evidence, but in strictness this is not correct. Presumptive evidence is a species of circumstantial evidence, though so large a species as to be almost coextensive with its genus.

Evidence may be circumstantial without being presumptive, either because it fails to raise a presumption, or because the inference to which it gives rise is stronger than mere presumption. Burrill, Circ. Ev. 76.

CIRCUMSTANTIBUS. See "Tales."

CIRCUMVENTION. In Scotch law. Any act of fraud whereby a person is reduced to a deed by decreet. Tech. Dict. It has the same sense in the civil law. Dig. 50. 17. 49. 155; Id. 12. 6. 6. 2; Id. 41. 2. 34.

CIRLISCUS. A ceorl (q. v.) Spelman.

CITACION. In Spanish law. The order of a legal tribunal directing an individual against whom a suit has been instituted to appear and defend it within a given time. It is synonymous with the term emplazamiento in the old Spanish law, and the in jus vocatio of the Roman law.

CITATIO. A citation or summons to court. Skene de Verb. Sign. voc. "Adjurnatus."

CITATIO AD REASSUMENDAM CAUSam. In civil law. The name of a citation, which issued when a party died pending a suit, against the heir of the defendant, or, when the plaintiff died, for the heir of the plaintiff. Our bill of revivor is probably borrowed from this proceeding.

CITATIO EST DE JURI NATURALI. A summons is by natural right. Cases in Banco Regis Wm. III. 453.

CITATION (Lat. citare, to call, to summon).

——In Practice. A writ issued out of a court of competent jurisdiction, commanding a person therein named to appear on a day named, and do something therein mentioned, or show cause why he should not. Proctor, Prac.

The act by which a person is so summoned or cited.

It is applied particularly to process from probate and ecclesiastical courts, and to notices issued in special proceedings in some states.

It is usually the original process in any proceeding, and is in that respect analogous to the writ of capias or summons at law, and the subpoena in chancery.

In the ecclesiastical law, the citation is the beginning and foundation of the whole cause, and is said to have six requisites, namely, the insertion of the name of the judge, of the promovert, of the impugnant, of the cause of suit, of the place, and of the time of appearance; to which may be added the affixing the seal of the court, and the name of the register or his deputy. 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 453, 454; 3 Bl. Comm. 100.

——In Scotch Practice. The calling of a party to an action done by an officer of the court under a proper warrant.

The service of a writ or bill of summons. Paterson, Comp.

——Of Authorities. The production of or reference to the text of acts of legislatures, treatises, or cases of similar nature decided by the courts, in order to support propositions advanced.

CITATIONES NON CONCEDANTUR PRIusquam exprimatur super qua re fieri debet citatio. Citations should not be granted before it is stated about what matter the citation is to be made. (A maxim of ecclesiastical law.) 12 Coke, 44.

CITIZEN.

——In English Law. An inhabitant of a city. 1 Rolle, Abr. 138. The representative of a city, in parliament. 1 Bl. Comm. 174.

——In American Law. One who, under the constitution and laws of the United States, has a right to vote for public officers, and who is qualified to fill offices in the gift of the people.

One of the sovereign people; a constituent member of the sovereignty, synonymous with the people. 19 How. (U. S.) 404.

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." Const. U. S. Amend. XIV.

CITY.

——In England. An incorporated town or borough which is or has been the see of a bishop. Co. Litt. 108; 1 Bl. Comm. 114; Cowell.

A large town incorporated with certain privileges; the inhabitants of a city; the citizens. Worcester.

Although the first definition here given is sanctioned by high authority, it is questionable if it is essential to its character as a city, even in England, that it has been at any time a see; and it certainly retains its character of a city after it has lost its ecclesiastical character (1 Steph. Comm. 115; 1 Bl. Comm. 114), and in the United States it is clearly unnecessary that it should ever have possessed this character. Originally, this word did not signify a town, but a portion of mankind who lived under the same government,—what the Romans called civitas, and the Greeks polis; whence the word politeia, civitas seu reipublicae status et administratio. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. lib. 1, tit. 1, note 202; Henrion de Pansey, Pouvoir Municipal, pp. 36, 37.

——In the United States. The highest class of municipal corporation, having extensive municipal powers, required by the presence of a large population.

CITY OF LONDON COURT. A court having a local jurisdiction within the city of London. It is to all intents and purposes a county court, having the same jurisdiction and procedure. St. 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, § 35. It has exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty matters within the city. Rosc. Adm. 75; St. 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71. See "Mayor's Court."

CIVIL.

Pertaining to a citizen, as civil rights (q. v.)

In contradistinction to "barbarous" or "savage," indicates a state of society reduced to order and regular government. Thus, we speak of civil life, civil society, civil government and civil liberty.

In contradistinction to "criminal," to indicate the private rights and remedies of men, as members of the community, in contrast to those which are public and relate to the government. Thus, we speak of civil process and criminal process, civil jurisdiction and criminal jurisdiction.

It is also used in contradistinction to "military" or "ecclesiastical," to "natural" or "foreign." Thus, we speak of a civil station, as opposed to a military or an ecclesiastical station; a civil death, as opposed to a natural death; a civil war, as opposed to a foreign war. Story, Const. § 789; 1 Bl. Comm. 6, 125, 251; Montesquieu, Sp. Laws, bk. 1, c. 3; Rutherforth, Inst. bk. 2, c. 2; Id. c. 3; Id. c. 8, p. 359; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. b. 2, c. 6.

CIVIL ACTION.

——In Civil Law. A personal action which is instituted to compel payment, or the doing some other thing which is purely civil. Poth. Introd. Gen. aux Cont. 110.

——At Common Law. An action which has for its object the recovery of private or civil rights or compensation for their infraction.

All actions which are not criminal are said to be civil.

In states where there has been partial codification, it is generally enacted in effect that the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity is abolished, and that there shall be but one form of action for the enforcement of private rights, and the redress of private wrongs, which shall be known as the "civil action." Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. § 69; Gen. St. Minn. 1878, c. 66, § 1. See "Action."

CIVIL BILL COURT. A tribunal in Ireland with a jurisdiction analogous to that of the county courts in England. The judge of it is also chairman of quarter sessions (where the jurisdiction is more extensive than in England), and performs the duty of revising barrister. The procedure of the civil bill courts is regulated by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 99; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 1; and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 66. Wharton.

CIVIL COMMOTION. An insurrection of the people for general purposes, though it may not amount to rebellion where there is an usurped power. 2 Marsh. Ins. 793.

CIVIL CORPORATIONS. One of the two classes into which lay corporations are divided; the other division embracing what are termed "eleemosynary" corporations. 3 Steph. Comm. 170. Municipal corporations (as counties, cities, towns, and villages), incorporated manufacturing, banking, insurance, and trading companies, and the like, are examples of civil corporations. Id.; 2 Kent, Comm. 275. See "Eleemosynary Corporations."

CIVIL DAMAGE ACTS. A name given to statutes rendering the seller of intoxicating liquors civilly liable to the wife or family of a purchaser of liquor for damage sustained by them by reason of the sale to him.

CIVIL DEATH. That change of state of a person which is considered in the law as equivalent to death. See "Death."

CIVIL INJURY. An infringement or privation of some civil right, and which is a subject for civil redress or compensation, as distinguished from a crime, which is a subject for punishment. 3 Steph. Comm. 556. See "Civil Rights."

CIVIL LAW. This term is generally used to designate the Roman jurisprudence, jus civile Romanorum.

In its most extensive sense, the term "Roman law" comprises all those legal rules and principles which were in force among the Romans, without reference to the time when they were adopted. But in a more restricted sense we understand by it the law compiled under the auspices of the Emperor Justinian, and which are still in force in many of the states of modern Europe, and to which all refer as authority or written reason.

The ancient leges curiatae are said to have been collected in the time of Tarquin, the last of the kings, by a pontifex maximus of the name of Sextus or Publius Papirius. This collection is known under the title of Jus Civile Papirianum; its existing fragments are few, and those of an apocryphal character. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 21.

After a fierce and uninterrupted struggle between the patricians and plebeians, the latter extorted from the former the celebrated law of the Twelve Tables, in the year 300 of Rome. This law, framed by the decemvirs, and adopted in the comitia centuriata, acquired great authority, and constituted the foundation of all the public and private laws of the Romans, subsequently, until the time of Justinian. It is called Lex Decemviralis. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 21. From this period, the sources of the jus scriptum consisted in the leges, the plebiscita, the senatusconsulta, and the constitutions of the emperors, constitutiones principum; and the jus non scriptum was found partly in the mores majorum, the consuetudo, and the res judicata, or auctoritas rerum perpetua similiter judicatorum. The edicts of the magistrates, or jus honorarium, also formed a part of the unwritten law; but by far the most prolific source of the jus non scriptum consisted in the opinions and writings of the lawyers,—responsa prudentium.

The few fragments of the Twelve Tables that have come down to us are stamped with the harsh features of their aristocratic origin. But the jus honorarium established by the praetors and other magistrates, as well as that part of the customary law which was built up by the opinions and writings of the prudentes, are founded essentially on principles of natural justice.

Many collections of the imperial constitutions had been made before the advent of Justinian to the throne. He was the first after Theodosius who ordered a new compilation to be made. For this purpose he appointed a committee of ten lawyers, with very extensive powers. At their head was the exquaestor sacri palatii, Johannes, and among them the afterwards well-known Tribonian. His instructions were to select, in the most laconic form, all that was still of value in the existing collections, as well as in the later constitutions; to omit all obsolete matter; to introduce such alterations as were required by the times; and to divide the whole into appropriate titles. Within fourteen months, the committee had finished their labors. Justinian confirmed this new code, which consisted of twelve books, by a special ordinance, and prohibited the use of the older collections of rescripts and edicts. This Code of Justinian, which is now called Codex Vetus, has been entirely lost.

After the completion of this code, Justinian ordered Tribonian, in 530, who was now invested with the dignity of quaestor sacri palatii, and sixteen other jurists, to select all the most valuable passages from the writings of the old jurists which were regarded as authoritative, and to arrange them, according to their subjects, under suitable heads. These commissioners also enjoyed very extensive powers. They had the privilege, at their discretion, to abbreviate, to add, and to make such other alterations as they might consider adapted to the times; and they were especially ordered to remove all the contradictions of the old jurists, to avoid all repetitions, and to omit all that had become entirely obsolete. The natural consequence of this was that the extracts did not always truly represent the originals, but were often interpolated and amended in conformity with the existing law. Alterations, modifications, and additions of this kind are now usually called Emblemata Triboniani. This great work is called the "Pandects," or "Digest," and was completed by the commissioners in three years. Within that short space of time, they had extracted from the writings of no less than thirty-nine jurists all that they considered valuable for the purpose of this compilation. It was divided into fifty books, and was entitled Digesta sive Pandectae Juris Enucleati ex Omni Vetere Jure Collecti. The Pandects were published on the 16th December, 533, but they did not go into operation until the 30th of that month. In confirming the Pandects, Justinian prohibited further reference to the old jurists; and, in order to prevent legal science from becoming so diffuse, indefinite, and uncertain as it had previously been, he forbade the writing of commentaries upon the new compilation, and permitted only the making of literal translations into Greek.

In preparing the Pandects, the compilers met very frequently with controversies in the writings of the jurists. Such questions, to the number of thirty-four, had been already determined by Justinian before the commencement of the collection of the Pandects, and before its completion the decisions of this kind were increased to fifty, and were known as the "fifty decisions of Justinian." These decisions were at first collected separately, and afterwards embodied in the new code.

For the purpose of facilitating the study of the law, Justinian ordered Tribonian, with the assistance of Theophilus and Dorotheus, to prepare a brief system of law under the title of "Institutes," which should contain the elements of legal science. This work was founded on, and to a great extent copied from, the commentaries of Gaius, which, after having been lost for many centuries, were discovered by the great historian Niebuhr, in 1816, in a palimpsest, or rewritten manuscript of some of the homilies of St. Jerome, in the Chapter Library of Verona. What had become obsolete in the commentaries was omitted in the Institutes, and references were made to the new constitutions of Justinian so far as they had been issued at the time. Justinian published his Institutes on the 21st November, 533, and they obtained the force of law at the same time with the Pandects, December 30, 533. Theophilus, one of the editors, delivered lectures on the Institutes in the Greek language, and from these lectures originated the valuable commentaries known under the Latin title, Theophili Antecessoris Paraphrasis Graeca Institutionum Caesarearum. The Institutes consist of four books, each of which contains several titles.

After the publication of the Pandects and the Institutes, Justinian ordered a revision of the Code, which had been promulgated in the year 529. This became necessary on account of the great number of new constitutions which he had issued, and of the fifty decisions not included in the old Code, and by which the law had been altered, amended, or modified. He therefore directed Tribonian, with the assistance of Dorotheus, Menna, Constantinus, and Johannes, to revise the old Code, and to incorporate the new constitutions into it. This revision was completed in the same year; and the new edition of the Code, Codex Repetitae Praelectionis, was confirmed on the 16th November, 534, and the old Code abolished. The Code contains twelve books, subdivided into appropriate titles.

During the interval between the publication of the Codex Repetitae Praelectionis, in 535, to the end of his reign, in 565, Justinian issued, at different times, a great number of new constitutions, by which the law on many subjects was entirely changed. The greater part of these constitutions were written in Greek, in obscure and pompous language, and published under the name of Novellae Constitutiones, which are known to us as the "Novels of Justinian." Soon after his death, a collection of one hundred and sixty-eight Novels was made, one hundred and fifty-four of which had been issued by Justinian, and the others by his successors.

Justinian's collections were, in ancient times, always copied separately, and afterwards they were printed in the same way. When taken together, they were indeed called, at an early period, the Corpus Juris Civilis; but this was not introduced as the regular title comprehending the whole body. Each volume had its own title until Dionysius Gothofredus gave this general title in the second edition of his glossed Corpus Juris Civilis, in 1604. Since that time this title has been used in all the editions of Justinian's collections.

It is generally believed that the laws of Justinian were entirely lost and forgotten in the Western Empire from the middle of the eighth century until the alleged discovery of a copy of the Pandects at the storming and pilage of Amalfi, in 1135. This is one of those popular errors which had been handed down from generation to generation without question or inquiry, but which has now been completely exploded by the learned discussion, supported by conclusive evidence, of Savigny, in his History of the Roman Law during the Middle Ages. Indeed, several years before the sack of Amalfi, the celebrated Irnerius delivered lectures on the Pandects in the University of Bologna. The pretended discovery of a copy of the Digest at Amalfi, and its being given by Lothaire II. to his allies, the Pisans, as a reward for their services, is an absurd fable. No doubt, during the five or six centuries when the human intellect was in a complete state of torpor, the study of the Roman law, like that of every other branch of knowledge, was neglected; but on the first dawn of the revival of learning, the science of Roman jurisprudence was one of the first to attract the attention of mankind; and it was taught with such brilliant success as to immortalize the name of Irnerius, its great professor.

Even at the present time the Roman law exercises dominion in every state in Europe except England. The countrymen of Lycurgus and Solon are governed by it, and in the vast empire of Russia it furnishes the rule of civil conduct. In America, it is the foundation of the law of Louisiana, Canada, Mexico, and all the republics of South America. Its influence in the formation of the common law of England cannot be denied by the impartial inquirer. It was publicly taught in England, by Roger Vacarius, as early as 1149; and all admit that the whole equity jurisprudence prevailing in England and the United States is mainly based on the civil law. See "Code;" "Digest;" "Institute;" "Novels."

CIVIL LIABILITY. Amenability to a civil action, as distinguished from amenability to criminal prosecution.

CIVIL LIBERTY. The liberty of a member of society, being a man's natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws (and no further) as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public. 1 Bl. Comm. 125; 2 Steph. Comm. 487. The power of doing whatever the laws permit. 1 Bl. Comm. 6; Inst. 1. 3. 1.

Blackstone's definition is substantially that of the civilians; that of Justinian being: "The natural power of doing whatever one pleases, except what is prohibited by force or law." Inst. 1. 3. 1. This is adopted by Bracton almost in terms. Bracton, fol. 46b. Blackstone's amendment, as will be seen, consists in the elimination of the idea of restraint by force.

CIVIL LIST. An annual sum granted by the English parliament at the commencement of each reign, for the expenses of the royal household and establishment, as distinguished from the general exigencies of the state. It is the provision for the crown made out of the taxes in lieu of its proper patrimony, and in consideration of the assignment of that patrimony to the public use. Wharton.

CIVIL OBLIGATION. One which binds in law, and which may be enforced in a court of justice. Poth. Obl. 173, 191.

CIVIL OFFICER. Any officer of the United States who holds his appointment under the national government, whether his duties are executive or judicial, in the highest or lowest departments of the government, with the exception of officers of the army and navy. Rawle, Const. 213; 2 Story, Const. § 790.

The term occurs in the constitution of the United States (article 2, § 4), which provides that the president, vice president, and civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. It has been decided that a senator of the United States is not a civil officer, within the meaning of this clause in the constitution. Senate Journal, 10th Jan. 1799; 4 Tucker, Bl. Comm. Append. 57, 58; Rawle, Const. 213; Serg. Const. Law, 376; Story, Const. § 791.

CIVIL REMEDY. In practice. The remedy which the party injured by the commission of a tortious act has by action against the party committing it, as distinguished from the proceeding by indictment, by which the wrongdoer is made to expiate the injury done to society.

CIVIL RESPONSIBILITY. See "Civil Liability."

CIVIL RIGHTS. The rights of a citizen; the rights of an individual as a citizen; the rights due from one citizen to another, the privation of which is a civil wrong, for which redress may be sought in a civil action.

Also sometimes applied to the rights secured by the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the United States constitution and the statutes pursuant thereto.

CIVIL SERVICE. Governmental service other than military or naval; administrative functions. More commonly used to signify those offices in the federal, state or municipal governments which are filled by appointment of persons competitively examined and passed for merit and ability, irrespective of partisan affiliations.

CIVIL SIDE. Civil proceedings in a court having both civil and criminal jurisdiction are said to be on the "civil side" of the court, whether heard by the same judge as tries the criminal cases or not.

CIVIL WAR. An internecine war in which the opposing forces both belong to the same country or nation, e. g. the Revolutionary War prior to the Declaration of Independence, or the late Rebellion prior to the president's proclamation of August 16, 1861.

CIVILIAN. A doctor, professor, or student of the civil law.

CIVILIS (Lat. from civis, a citizen). Civil, as distinguished from criminal. Civilis actio, a civil action. Bracton, fols. 101b, 102. Civilis causa, a civil cause. Id. Placita civilia, civil pleas. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 1, § 25. Injuriae civiles, civil injuries. Id. § 5.

Civil, belonging to a civitas or state; jus civile, civil law, the particular law of a state, as distinguished from jus gentium, the common law of nations. Inst. 1. 2. 1. 2.

CIVILISTA. In old English law. A civil lawyer, or civilian. Dyer, 267.

CIVILITER. Civilly; opposed to criminaliter, or criminally.

When a person does an unlawful act injurious to another, whether with or without an intention to commit a tort, he is responsible civiliter. In order to make him liable criminaliter, he must have intended to do the wrong; for it is a maxim, actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. 2 East, 104.

CIVILITER MORTUUS. Civilly dead; in a state of civil death.

CIVIS (Lat.) In the Roman law. A citizen; as distinguished from incola (an inhabitant); origin or birth constituting the former, domicile the latter. Code, 10. 40. 7.

CIVITAS (Lat.) In the Roman law. Any body of people living under the same laws; a state. Jus civitatis, the law of a state; civil law. Inst. 1. 2. 1. 2. Civitates foederatae, towns in alliance with Rome, and considered to be free. Butler, Hor. Jur. 29.

Citizenship; one of the three status, conditions, or qualifications of persons. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 131.

CIVITAS ET URBS IN HOC DIFFERunt, quod incolae dicuntur civitas, urbs vero compiectitur aedificia. A city and a town differ in this, that the inhabitants are called the "city," but "town" includes the buildings. Co. Litt. 409.

CLAIM. A challenge of the ownership of a thing which is wrongfully withheld from the possession of the claimant. Plowd. 359. See 1 Dall. (Pa.) 444; 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 179.

The owner of property proceeded against in admiralty by a suit in rem must present a claim to such property, verified by oath or affirmation, stating that the claimant by whom or on whose behalf the claim is made, and no other person, is the true and bona fide owner thereof, as a necessary preliminary to his making defense. 2 Conkl. Adm. 201-210.

A demand entered of record of a mechanic or materialman for work done or material furnished in the erection of a building, in certain counties in Pennsylvania.

The assertion of a liability to the party making it to do some service or pay a sum of money. See 16 Pet. (U. S.) 539.

The possession of a settler upon the wild lands of the government of the United States; the lands which such a settler holds possession of.

CLAIM OF CONUSANCE. In practice. An intervention by a third person demanding jurisdiction of a cause which the plaintiff has commenced out of the claimant's court. Now obsolete. 2 Wils. 409; 3 Bl. Comm. 298.

CLAIM OF LIBERTY. A suit or petition to the crown, in the court of exchequer, to have liberties and franchises confirmed there by the attorney general. Wharton.

CLAIM, VI, AUT PRECARIO. By force, stealth, or importunity.

CLAIMANT.

——In Admiralty Practice. A person authorized and admitted to defend a libel brought in rem against property; thus, for example, thirty hogsheads of sugar. 9 Cranch (U. S.) 191.

——In Old English Law. The plaintiff in ejectment.

CLAM. In the civil law. Covertly; secretly.

CLAM DELINQUENTES MAGIS PUNIuntur quam palam. Those sinning secretly are punished more severely than those sinning openly. 8 Coke, 127.

CLAMEA ADMITTENDA IN ITINERE per attornatum. An ancient writ, by which the king commanded the justices in eyre to admit the claim by attorney of a person who was in the royal service, and could not appear in person. Reg. Orig. 19.

CLAMOR (Lat.) A suit or demand; a complaint. Du Cange; Spelman.

——In Civil Law. A claimant; a debt; anything claimed from another; a proclamation; an accusation. Du Cange.

CLARE CONSTAT (Lat.) It is clearly evident.

——In Scotch Law. A deed given by a mesne lord (subject superior) for the purpose of completing the title of the vassal's heir to the lands held by the deceased vassal under the grantor. Bell, Dict.

CLAREMETHEN. In old Scotch law. The warranty of stolen cattle or goods; the law regulating such warranty. Skene de Verb. Sign.

CLARENDON, CONSTITUTIONS OF. The constitutions of Clarendon were certain statutes made in the reign of Henry II., of England, at a parliament held at Clarendon, by which the king checked the power of the pope and his clergy, and greatly narrowed the exemption they claimed from secular jurisdiction.

Previous to this time, there had been an entire separation between the clergy and laity, as members of the same commonwealth. The clergy, having emancipated themselves from the laws as administered by the courts of law, had assumed powers and exemptions quite inconsistent with the good government of the country.

CLARIFICATIO (Lat.) In old Scotch law. A making clear; the purging or clearing (clenging) of an assize. Skene de Verb. Sign. Clarificatio debiti, the clearness of a debt which is sufficiently proved and verified.

CLASS. A number of persons or things ranked together for some common purpose, or as possessing some attribute in common.

The term is used of legatees (3 McCord [S. C.] 440), of obligees in a bond (3 Dev. [N. C.] 284; 4 Dev. [N. C.] 382), and of other collections of persons (17 Wend. [N. Y.] 52; 16 Pick. [Mass.] 132).

CLASSIARIUS. A seaman or soldier serving at sea.

CLASSICI. In the Roman law. Persons employed in servile duties on board of vessels. Code, 11. 12.

CLASSIFICATION. In English practice. In the English chancery division, where there are several parties to an administration action, including those who have been served with notice of the decree or judgment, and it appears to the judge (or chief clerk) that any of them form a class having the same interests (e. g. residuary legatees), he may require them to be represented by one solicitor, in order to prevent the expense of each of them attending by separate solicitors. This is termed "classifying the interests of the parties attending," or, shortly, "classifying" or "classification." In practice, the term is also applied to the directions given by the chief clerk as to which of the parties are to attend on each of the accounts and inquiries directed by the judgment. Consol. Orders, 20; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1088. See, also, Rules of Court, xvi. 12b (April, 1880). Special regulations on this head are in force in the master of the roll's chambers.

CLAUSE. A part of a treaty; of a legislative act; of a deed; of a will, or other written instrument; a part of a sentence.

As used in a statute relating to wills, a clause is "some collocation of words in a will which, when removed out of the will, will leave the rest intelligible." The clause need not "be capable of being read as a document by itself, if taken alone." L. R. 4 App. Cas. 77.

CLAUSE IRRITANT. By this clause, in a deed or settlement, the acts or deeds of a tenant for life or other proprietor, contrary to the conditions of his right, become null and void, and, by the "resolutive" clause, such right becomes resolved and extinguished. Bell, Dict.

CLAUSE ROLLS. Contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs. These rolls are preserved in the Tower. Rapalje & L.

CLAUSULA. A clause; a sentence or part of a sentence in a written instrument or law. So called as inclosing or including certain words.

CLAUSULA GENERALIS DE RESIDUO non ea complectitur quae non ejusdem sint generis cum iis quae speciatim dicta fuerant. A general clause of remainder does not embrace those things which are not of the same kind with those which had been specially mentioned. Lofft, 419.

CLAUSULA GENERALIS NON REFERtur ad expressa. A general clause does not refer to things expressed. 8 Coke, 154.

CLAUSULA QUAE ABROGATIONEM EXcludit ab initio non valet. A clause in a law which precludes its abrogation is invalid from the beginning. Bac. Max. reg. 19, p. 89; 2 Dwar. St. 673; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 27.

CLAUSULA VEL DISPOSITIO INUTILIS per praesumptionem remotam vel causam, ex post facto non fulcitur. A useless clause or disposition, i. e., one which the law would have implied, is not supported by a remote presumption, or by a cause arising afterwards. Bac. Max. reg. 21; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 599.

CLAUSULAE INCONSUETAE SEMPER inducunt suspicionem. Unusual clauses always excite a suspicion. 3 Coke, 81; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 264.

CLAUSUM. Close; closed.

A writ was either clausum (close) or apertum (open). Grants were said to be by literae patentae (open grant) or literae clausae (close grant). 2 Bl. Comm. 346.

A close; an inclosure.

CLAUSUM FREGIT. See "Quare Clausum Fregit."

CLAUSURA. An inclosure.

CLAVES CURIAE. The keys of the court. A figurative term applied in Scotch law to the officers of court.

CLAVIA. A mace.

CLEAR DAYS. A specified number of clear days is to be reckoned, exclusive of both the first and last days. 1 Dowl. (N. S.) 767.

CLEARANCE. A certificate given by the collector of a port, in which it is stated that the master or commander (naming him) of a ship or vessel named and described, bound for a port named, and having on board goods described, in case the master requires the particulars of his cargo to be stated in such clearance, has entered and cleared his ship or vessel according to law.

CLEARING HOUSE. In commercial law. An office where bankers settle daily with each other the balances of their accounts. Morse, Banks, 450.

CLEMENTINES. In ecclesiastical law. The collection of decretals or constitutions of Pope Clement V., which was published, by order of John XXII., his successor, in 1317.

CLERGY. The name applicable to ecclesiastical ministers as a class.

CLERGYABLE. In English law. Allowing of, or entitled to, the benefit of clergy (privilegium clericale). Used of persons or crimes. 4 Bl. Comm. 371 et seq.

CLERICAL ERROR. An error made by a clerk in transcribing or otherwise. A mistake in writing or copying any document.

CLERICALE PRIVILEGIUM. Benefit of clergy (q. v.)

CLERICI DE CANCELLARIA. Clerks of chancery. See "Six Clerks in Chancery."

CLERICI PRAENOTARII. The six clerks in chancery. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 251. Fleta calls them sex clerici praenotarii.

CLERICO ADMITTENDO. See "De Clerico, etc."

CLERICO CAPTO PER STATUTUM mercatorum. See "De Clerico, etc."

CLERICO CONVICTO COMMISSO GAOlae in defectu ordinarii deliberando. See "De Clerico, etc."

CLERICO INFRA SACROS ORDINES constituto, non eligendo in officium. See "De Clerico, etc."

CLERICUS (Lat.)

——In Civil Law. Any one who has taken orders in church, of whatever rank; monks. A general term including bishops, subdeacons, readers, and cantors. Du Cange. Used, also, of those who were given up to the pursuit of letters, and who were learned therein. Also of the amanuenses of the judges or courts of the king. Du Cange.

——In English Law. A secular priest, in opposition to a regular one. Kennett, Par. Ant. 171. A clergyman or priest; one in orders. Nullus clericus nisi causidicus. no clerk but what is a pleader. 1 Bl. Comm. 17. A freeman, generally. One who was charged with various duties in the king's household. Du Cange.

CLERICUS ET AGRICOLA ET MERCAtor, tempore belli, ut oret, colat, et commutet, pace fruuntur. Clergymen, husbandmen, and merchants, in order that they may preach, cultivate, and trade, enjoy peace in time of war. 2 Inst. 58.

CLERICUS MERCATI. In old English law. Clerk of the market. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 8; 2 Inst. 543.

CLERICUS NON CONNUMERETUR IN duabus ecclesiis. A clergyman should not be appointed to two churches.

CLERICUS PAROCHIALIS. In old English law. A parish clerk. Towns. Pl. 213.

Otherwise called clericus sacerdotis. Cowell.

CLERIGOS. In Spanish law. Clergy; men chosen for the service of God. White, New Recop. bk. 1, tit. 5, c. 4.

CLERK.

——In Commercial Law. A person in the employ of a merchant, who attends only to a part of his business, while the merchant himself superintends the whole. He differs from a factor in this, that the latter wholly supplies the place of his principal in respect to the property consigned to him. Pardessus, Dr. Com. note 38; 1 Chit. Prac. 80; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1287.

A general name for salesmen, bookkeepers, amanuenses, and other employes of that class.

A person employed in an office, public or private, for keeping records or accounts.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. Any individual who is attached to the ecclesiastical state, and has submitted to the tonsure. One who has been ordained. 1 Bl. Comm. 388. A clergyman. 4 Bl. Comm. 367.

CLERK OF ARRAIGNS. Officers attached to the central criminal court in England, and to each circuit. The clerk of arraigns "has to discharge, for the judge sitting on the crown side (i. e. in criminal cases), the duties which are discharged for him by a master on the civil side. Taxation of costs, allowance to witnesses, the business connected with jurors, their excuses and fines, the custody of documents, the duty of recording verdicts and making out warrants after sentence are, in addition to advising the court upon points of criminal procedure, among the duties of the clerk of arraigns." Second Rep. Leg. Dep. Comm. (1874) 22.

CLERK OF ASSIZE. The officer who is responsible for the due performance of the administrative duties of the courts of assizes on each circuit. He performs the same duties on circuit which the associate formerly performed, and which the masters now perform at the sittings of nisi prius at London and Middlesex.

CLERK OF COURT. An officer of a court of justice, having the custody of its records and seals, and whose duty it is, among other things, to certify to the correctness of transcripts from such record.

CLERK OF ENROLLMENTS. In English law. The former chief officer of the English enrollment office. He formed part of the staff of the central office (q. v.), but the office is now abolished.

CLERKS OF INDICTMENTS. Officers attached to the central criminal court in England, and to each circuit. They prepare and settle indictments against offenders, and assist the clerk of arraigns.

CLERK OF THE CROWN IN CHANcery. See "Crown Office in Chancery."

CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS. One of the chief officers of the lower house of the English parliament. He is appointed by the crown as under clerk of the parliaments, to attend upon the commons. He makes a declaration, on entering upon his office, to make true entries, remembrances, and journals of the things done and passed in the house. He signs all orders of the house, indorses the bills sent or returned to the lords, and reads whatever is required to be read in the house. He has the custody of all records and other documents. May, Parl. Prac. 289.

CLERK OF THE PEACE. An officer appointed by the custos rotulorum (q. v.) to assist the justices of the peace in quarter sessions in drawing indictments, entering judgments, issuing process, etc. Pritch. Quar. Sess. 49.

CLERK OF THE PETTY BAG. See "Petty Bag Office."

CLERK OF THE PRIVY SEAL. There are four of these officers, who attend the lord privy seal, or, in the absence of the lord privy seal, the principal secretary of state. Their duty is to write and make out all things that are sent by warrant from the signet to the privy seal, and which are to be passed to the great seal, and also to make out "privy seals," as they are termed, upon any special occasion of his majesty's affairs, as for the loan of money, and such like purposes. 27 Hen. VIII. c. 11. Cowell.

CLERK OF THE SIGNET. An officer in England, whose duty it is to attend on the king's principal secretary, who always has the custody of the privy signet, as well for the purpose of sealing his majesty's private letters, as also grants which pass his majesty's hand by bill signed. There are four of these officers. 27 Hen. VIII. c. 11. Cowell.

CLERKS OF RECORDS AND WRITS. Officers formerly attached to the English court of chancery, whose duties consisted principally in sealing bills of complaint and writs of execution, filing affidavits, keeping a record of suits, and certifying office copies of pleadings and affidavits. They were three in number, and the business was distributed among them according to the letters of the alphabet. Second Rep. Leg. Dep. Comm. 43. By the judicature acts of 1873, 1875, they were transferred to the chancery division of the high court. Now, by the judicature (officers') act of 1879, they have been transferred to the central office of the supreme court, under the title of "Masters of the Supreme Court," and the office of clerk of records and writs has been abolished.

CLERKS OF SEATS. In the principal registry of the probate division of the English high court, clerks of seats discharge the duty of preparing and passing the grants of probate and letters of administration, under the supervision of the registrars. There are six seats, the business of which is regulated by an alphabetical arrangement, and each set has four clerks. They have to take bonds from administrators, and to receive caveats against a grant being made in a case where a will is contested. They also draw the "acts," i. e., a short summary of each grant made, containing the name of the deceased, amount of assets, and other particulars. Second Rep. Leg. Dep. Comm. 79.

CLERKSHIP. The period which must be spent by a law student in the office of a practicing attorney before admission to the bar. 1 Tidd, Prac. 61 et seq.

CLIENT. One who employs and retains an attorney or counsellor to manage or defend a suit or action to which he is a party, or to advise him about some legal matters. See "Attorney at Law."

CLIENTELA. In old English law. The state of a client; clientship; protection; patronage; guardianship. Applied to the relation of a church to its patron. 2 Bl. Comm. 21.

CLIFFORD'S INN. An inn of chancery. See "Inns of Chancery."

CLITO. In Saxon law. The son of a king or emperor; the next heir to the throne; the Saxon adeling. Spelman.

CLOERE. A prison or dungeon.

CLOSE. An interest in the soil (Doctor & Stud. 30; 6 East, 154; 7 East, 207; 1 Burrows, 133), or in trees or growing crops (4 Mass. 266; 9 Johns. [N. Y.] 113).

An inclosed tract of land. 3 Bl. Comm. 209.

In every case where one has a right to exclude another from his land, the law encircles it, if not actually inclosed, with an imaginary fence, and entitles him to a compensation in damages for the injury he sustains by the act of another passing through his boundary, denominating such land a "close." Hammond, N. P. 151; Doctor & Stud. dial. 1, c. 8, p. 30; 2 Whart. (Pa.) 430.

CLOSE COPIES. Copies which might be written with any number of words on a sheet. Office copies were to contain only a prescribed number of words on each sheet.

CLOSE ROLLS. Rolls containing the record of the close writs (literae clausae) and grants of the king, kept with the public records. 2 Bl. Comm. 346.

CLOSE WRITS. Writs directed to the sheriff instead of to the lord. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 45. Writs containing grants from the crown to particular persons, and for particular purposes, which, not being intended for public inspection, are closed up and sealed on the outside, instead of being open and having the seal appended by a strip of parchment. 2 Bl. Comm. 346; Sewell, Sheriffs, 372.

CLOUD ON TITLE. A proceeding or instrument, such as a deed or mortgage, or a tax or assessment, judgment or decree, which, if valid, would apparently, and on its face, impair the title of a person to land, but which is in fact invalid, such invalidity being demonstrable by proof of extrinsic facts. Equity has jurisdiction of actions brought to remove clouds on title by cancellation of instruments creating them.

CLOUGH. A valley. An allowance of two pounds in every hundred weight for the turn of the scale, on buying goods wholesale by weight.

CLUBS. A name applied loosely to voluntary organizations of persons for a common purpose, usually either social, recreative, political, or educative. The form of the organization is not essential, and, though usually unincorporated, a club may be incorporated. See "Association."

CLYPEUS, or CLIPEUS. In old English law. A shield; metaphorically one of a noble family. Clypei prostrati, noble families extinct. Mat. Paris, 463.

COADJUTOR. The assistant of a bishop; an assistant.

COADMINISTRATOR. One who is administrator with one or more others. See "Administrator."

COADUNATIO. A conspiracy. 9 Coke, 56.

COAL NOTE. In English law. A species of promissory note authorized by St. 3 Geo. II. c. 26, §§ 7, 8, which, having these words expressed therein, namely, "value received in coals," are to be protected and noted as inland bills of exchange.

COALITION. In French law. An unlawful agreement among several persons not to do a thing except on some conditions agreed upon; a conspiracy.

COASSIGNEE. One who is assignee with one or more others. See "Assignment."

COAST. The margin of a country bounded by the sea. This term includes the natural appendages of the territory which rise out of the water, although they are not of sufficient firmness to be inhabited or fortified. Shoals perpetually covered with water are not, however, comprehended under the name of "coast." 5 C. Rob. Adm. 385c.

COASTING TRADE. Domestic trade between port and port in the United States, as distinguished from foreign trade between a port in the United States and a port in a foreign country. 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 557; 10 Cal. 504. It is said to include trade between places in the same district on a navigable river (3 Cow. [N. Y.] 713), but not to the mere crossing of a river (1 Newb. 24).

COCKET. A seal appertaining to the king's custom house. Reg. Orig. 192.

A scroll or parchment sealed and delivered by the officers of the custom house to merchants, as an evidence that their wares are customed. Cowell; Spelman. See 7 Low. (U. S.) 116.

The entry office in the custom house itself.

A kind of bread said by Cowell to be hard-baked; sea biscuit.

COCKPIT. A name which used to be given to the judicial committee of the privy council, the council room being built on the old cockpit of Whitehall Place. Wharton.

CODE. A body of law established by the legislative authority of the state, and designed to regulate completely, so far as a statute may, the subjects to which it relates.

The idea of a code involves that of the exercise of the legislative power in its promulgation; but the name has been loosely applied also to private compilations of statutes. The subject of codes and the kindred topics of legal reform have received great attention from the jurists and statesmen of the present century. When it is considered how rapidly statutes accumulate as time passes, it is obvious that great convenience will be found in having the statute law in a systematic body, arranged according to subject-matter, instead of leaving it unorganized, scattered through the volumes in which it was from year to year promulgated. But when the transposition of the statutes from a chronological to a scientific order is undertaken, more radical changes immediately propose themselves. These are of two classes: First, amendments for the purpose of harmonizing the inconsistencies which such an arrangement brings to notice, and supplying defects; second, the introduction into the system of all other rules which are recognized as the unwritten or common law of the state. The object of the latter class of changes is to embody in one systematic enactment all that is thenceforth to be regarded as the law of the land. It is this attempt which is usually intended by the distinctive term "codification."

The first two of the questions thus indicated may be deemed as settled, by general concurrence, in favor of the expediency of such changes; and the process of the collection of the statute law in one general code, or in a number of partial codes or systematic statutes, accompanied by the amendments which such a revision invites, is a process which for some years has been renovating the laws of England and the United States. Although at the same time something has been done, especially in this country, towards embodying in these statutes principles which before rested in the common or report law, yet the feasibility of doing this completely, or even to any great extent, must be deemed an open question. It has been discussed with great ability by Bentham, Savigny, Thibaut, and others. It is undeniable that, however successfully a code might be supposed to embody all existing and declared law, so as to supersede previous sources, it cannot be expected to provide prospectively for all the innumerable cases which the diversity of affairs rapidly engenders, and there must soon come a time when it must be studied in the light of numerous explanatory decisions.

These discussions have called attention to a subject formerly little considered, but which is of fundamental importance to the successful preparation of a code,—the matter of statutory expression. There is no species of composition which demands more care and precision than that of drafting a statute. The writer needs not only to make his language intelligible, he must make it incapable of misconstruction. When it has passed to a law, it is no longer his intent that is to be considered, but the intent of the words which he has used; and that intent is to be ascertained under the strong pressure of an attempt of the advocate to win whatever possible construction may be most favorable to his cause. The true safeguard is found not in the old method of accumulating synonyms, and by an enumeration of particulars, but rather—as is shown by those American codes of which the Revised Statutes of New York and the revision of Massachusetts are admirable specimens—by concise but complete statement of the full principle in the fewest possible words, and the elimination of description and paraphrase by the separate statement of necessary definitions. One of the rules to which the New York revisors generally adhered, and which they found of very great importance, was to confine each section to a single proposition. In this way, the intricacy and obscurity of the old statutes were largely avoided. The reader who wishes to pursue this interesting subject will find much that is admirable in Coode's treatise on Legislative Expression (London, 1845). The larger work of Gael (Legal Composition, London, 1840) is more especially adapted to the wants of the English profession.

——Austrian. The Civil Code was promulgated in 1811,—the code of Joseph II. (1780) having been found wholly unsuited to the purpose and by his successor abrogated. It is founded in a great degree upon the Prussian. The Penal Code (1852) is said to adopt to some extent the characteristics of the French Penal Code.

——Burgundian. Lex Romana, otherwise known in modern times as the Papiniani Responsorum. Promulgated A. D. 517.

It was founded on the Roman law, and its chief interest is the indication which, in common with the other Barbaric codes, it affords of the modifications of jurisprudence under the changes of society amidst which it arose.

——Consolato del Mare. A code of maritime law of high antiquity and great celebrity.

Its origin is not certainly known. It has been ascribed to the authority of the ancient kings of Arragon; but there is some reason for maintaining the theory that it was gradually collected and handed down as a digest of all the principal rules and usages established among the maritime nations of Europe from the twelfth to the fourteenth century. Since it was first printed at Barcelona in the fourteenth century, it has been enlarged from time to time by the addition of various commercial regulations. Its doctrines are founded to a large extent on the Greek and Roman law. It seems to have been originally written in the dialect of Catalonia; but it has been translated into every language of Europe, except English. It is referred to at the present day as an authority in respect to the ownership of vessels, the rights and obligations thereto, to the rights and responsibilities of master and seamen, to the law of freight, of equipment and supply, of jettison and average, of salvage, of ransom, and of prize. The edition of Pardessus, in his Collection de Lois Maritimes (volume 2), is deemed the best.

——French Codes. The chief French codes of the present day are five in number, sometimes known as Les Cinq Codes. They were in great part the work of Napoleon, and the first in order bears his name. They are all frequently printed in one duodecimo volume. These codes do not embody the whole French law, but minor codes and a number of scattered statutes must also be resorted to upon special subjects.

(1) Code Civil, or Code Napoleon, is composed of thirty-six laws, the first of which was passed in 1803, and the last in 1804, which united them all in one body, under the name of Code Civil des Francais.

The first steps towards its preparation were taken in 1793, but it was not prepared till some years subsequently, and was finally thoroughly discussed in all its details by the court of Cassation, of which Napoleon was president, and in the discussions of which he took an active part throughout. In 1807 a new edition was promulgated, the title Code Napoleon being substituted. In the third edition (1816) the old title was restored; but in 1852 it was again displaced by that of Napoleon.

Under Napoleon's reign, it became the law of Holland, of the Confederation of the Rhine, Westphalia, Bavaria, Italy, Naples, Spain, etc. It has undergone great amendment by laws enacted since it was established. It is divided into three books: Book 1, "Of Persons and the Enjoyment and Privation of Civil Rights." Book 2, "Property and Its Different Modifications." Book 3, "Different Ways of Acquiring Property." Prefixed to it is a preliminary title, "Of the Publication, Effects, and Application of Laws in General."

One of the most perspicuous and able commentators on this code is Toullier, frequently cited in this work.

(2) Code de Procedure Civil. That part of the code which regulates civil proceedings.

It is divided into two parts: Part 1 consists of five books, the first of which treats of justices of the peace; the second, of inferior tribunals; the third, of royal (or appellate) courts; the fourth, of extraordinary means of proceeding; the fifth, of the execution of judgments. Part 2 is divided into three books, treating of various matters and proceedings special in their nature.

(3) Code de Commerce. The code for the regulation of commerce.

This code was enacted in 1807. Book 1 is entitled, "Of Commerce in General." Book 2, "Maritime Commerce." The whole law of this subject is not embodied in this book. Book 3, "Failures and Bankruptcy." This book was very largely amended by the law of 28th May, 1838. Book 4, "Of Commercial Jurisdiction,"—the organization, jurisdiction, and proceedings of commercial tribunals. This code is, in one sense, a supplement to the Code Napoleon, applying the principles of the latter to the various subjects of commercial law. The two contain much that is valuable upon commercial subjects. Pardessus is one of the most able of its expositors.

(4) Code d'Instruction Criminelle. The code regulating procedure in criminal cases, taking that phrase in a broad sense.

Book 1 treats of the police; book 2, of the administration of criminal justice. It was enacted in 1808 to take effect with the Penal Code in 1811.

(5) Code Penal. The penal or criminal code.

Enacted in 1810. Book 1 treats of penalties in criminal and correctional cases, and their effects; book 2, of crimes and misdemeanors, and their punishment; book 3, offenses against the police regulations, and their punishment. Important amendments of this code have been made by subsequent legislation.

(6) There is also a Code Forestier; and the name "code" has been inaptly given to some private compilations on other subjects.

——Gregorian. An unofficial compilation of the rescripts of the Roman emperors. It was made in the fourth century, and is not now extant.

The Theodosian Code, which was promulgated nearly a century afterwards, was a continuation of this, and of the collection of Hermogenes. The chief interest of all of these collections is in their relation to their great successor, the Justinian Code.

——Hanse Towns, Laws of the. A code of maritime law established by the Hanseatic towns.

It was first published in German, at Lubec, in 1597. In an assembly of deputies from the several towns, held at Lubec, May 23, 1614, it was revised and enlarged. The text, with a Latin translation, was published with a commentary by Kuricke; and a French translation has been given by Cleirac in Us et Coutumes de la Mer. It is not infrequently referred to on subjects of maritime law.

——Henri (French). The best-known of several collections of ordinances made during the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, the number of which in part both formed the necessity and furnished the material for the Code Napoleon.

——Henri (Haytien). A very judicious adaptation from the Code Napoleon for the Haytiens. It was promulgated in 1812 by Christophe (Henri I.)

——Hermogenian. An unofficial compilation, made in the fourth century, supplementary to the Code of Gregorius. It is not now extant.

——Institutes of Menu. A code of Hindu law, of great antiquity, which still forms the basis of Hindu jurisprudence (Elphinstone's History of India, p. 83), and is said also to be the basis of the laws of the Burmese and of the Laos (Buckle, History of Civilization, vol. 1, p. 54, note 70).

The Institutes of Menu are ascribed to about the ninth century B. C. A translation will be found in the third volume of Sir William Jones' Works. See "Hindu Law."

——Justinian Code. A collection of imperial ordinances compiled by order of the emperor Justinian.

All the judicial wisdom of the Roman civilization which is of importance to the American lawyer is embodied in the compilations to which Justinian gave his name, and from which that name has received its lustre. Of these, first in contemporary importance, if not first in magnitude and present interest, was the Code. In the first year of his reign, he commanded Tribonian, a statesman of his court, to revise the imperial ordinances. The first result, now known as the Codex Vetus, is not extant. It was superseded a few years after its promulgation by a new and more complete edition. Although it is this alone which is now known as the Code of Justinian, yet the Pandects and the Institutes which followed it are a part of the same system, declared by the same authority; and the three together form one codification of the law of the Empire. The first of these works occupied Tribonian and nine associates fourteen months. It is comprised in twelve divisions or books, and embodies all that was deemed worthy of preservation of the imperial statutes from the time of Hadrian down. The Institutes is an elementary treatise prepared by Tribonian and two associates upon the basis of a similar work by Gaius, a lawyer of the second century.

The Pandects, which were made public about a month after the Institutes, were an abridgment of the treaties and the commentaries of the lawyers. They were presented in fifty books. Tribonian and the sixteen associates who aided him in this part of his labors accomplished this abridgment in three years. It has been judged to bear obvious marks of the haste with which it was compiled; but it is the chief embodiment of the Roman law, though not the most convenient resort for the modern student of that law.

Tribonian found the law, which for fourteen centuries had been accumulating, comprised in two thousand books, or—stated according to the Roman method of computation—in three million sentences. It is probable that this matter, if printed in law volumes such as are now used, would fill from three to five hundred volumes,—a library perhaps as large as that which would be composed by a collection of the Federal statutes and reports and those of the state of Pennsylvania. The comparison, to be more exact, should take into account treatises and digests, which would add to the bulk of the collection more than to the substance of the material. The commissioners were instructed to extract a series of plain and concise laws, in which there should be no two laws contradictory or alike. In revising the imperial ordinances, they were empowered to amend in substance as well as in form.

The codification being completed, the emperor decreed that no resort should be had to the earlier writings, nor any comparison be made with them. Commentators were forbidden to disfigure the new with explanations, and lawyers were forbidden to cite the old. The imperial authority was sufficient to sink into oblivion nearly all the previously existing sources of law; but the new statutes which the emperor himself found it necessary to establish in order to explain, complete, and amend the law, rapidly accumulated throughout his long reign. These are known as the "Novels." The Code, the Institutes, the Pandects, and the Novels, with some subsequent additions, constitute the Corpus Juris Civilis. Though the Code has lost its sanction, and the Pandects are of secondary value to the present age, the Institutes stand an undisturbed monument of the science. The masterly arrangement of the outline of the law there adopted is to this day a model for digests and commentaries. The familiar classification employed by Blackstone is based on this. So far as translation and modern illustration go, it is through the Institutes that the civil law is most accessible to the student.

Among English translations of the Institutes are that by Cooper (Phila. 1812; N. Y. 1841),—which is regarded as a very good one,—and that by Sanders (Lond. 1853), which contains the original text also, and copious references to the Digests and Code. Among the modern French commentators are Ortolan and Pasquiere.

——Livingston's Code. Mr. Edward Livingston, one of the commissioners who prepared the Louisiana Code, prepared and presented to congress a draft of a penal code for the United States, which, though it was never adopted, is not infrequently referred to in the books as stating principles of criminal law.

——Mosaic Code. The code proclaimed by Moses for the government of the Jews, B. C. 1491.

One of the peculiar characteristics of this code is the fact that whilst all that has ever been successfully attempted in other cases has been to change details without reversing or ignoring the general principles which form the basis of the previous law, that which was chiefly done here was the assertion of great and fundamental principles in part contrary and in part perhaps entirely new to the customs and usages of the people. These principles, thus divinely revealed and sanctioned, have given the Mosaic Code vast influence in the subsequent legislation of other nations than the Hebrews. The topics on which it is most frequently referred to as an authority in our law are those of marriage and divorce, and questions of affinity, and of the punishment of murder and seduction. The commentaries of Michaelis and of Wines are valuable aids to its study.

——Ordonnance de la Marine. A code of maritime law enacted in the reign of Louis XIV.

It was promulgated in 1681, and with great completeness embodied all existing rules of maritime law, including insurance. Kent pronounces it a monument of the wisdom of the reign of Louis, "far more durable and more glorious than all the military trophies won by the valor of his armies." Its compilers are unknown. An English translation is contained in the appendix to Peters' Admiralty Reports, vol. 1. The ordinance has been at once illustrated and eclipsed by Valin's commentaries upon it.

——Oleron, Laws of. A code of maritime law, which takes its name from the island of Oleron.

Both the French and the English claim the honor of having originated this code,—the former attributing its compilation to the command of Queen Eleanor, Duchess of Guienne, near which province the island of Oleron lies; the latter ascribing its promulgation to her son, Richard I. The latter monarch, without doubt, caused it to be improved, if he did not originate it, and he introduced it into England. Some additions were made to it by King John. It was promulgated anew in the reign of Henry III., and again confirmed in the reign of Edward III. It is most accessible to the American profession in the translation contained in the appendix to the first volume of Peters'

Admiralty Reports. The French version, with Cleirac's commentary, is contained in Us et Coutumes de la Mer. The subjects upon which it is now valuable are much the same as those of the Consolato del Mare.

——Ostrogothic. The code promulgated by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, at Rome, A. D. 500. It was founded on the Roman law.

——Prussian. Allgemeines Landrecht. The former code of 1751 was not successful; but the attempt to establish one was resumed in 1780, under Frederic II.; and, after long and thorough discussion, the present code was finally promulgated in 1794. It is known also as the "Code Frederic."

——Rhodian Laws. A maritime code adopted by the people of Rhodes, and in force among the nations upon the Mediterranean nine or ten centuries before Christ. There is reason to suppose that the collection under this title in Vinnius is spurious, and, if so, the code is not extant. See Marsh. Ins. bk. 1, c. 4, p. 15.

——Theodosian. A code compiled by a commission of eight, under the direction of Theodosian the Younger.

It comprises the edicts and rescripts of sixteen emperors, embracing a period of one hundred and twenty-six years. It was promulgated in the Eastern empire in 438, and quickly adopted, also, in the Western empire. The great modern expounder of this code is Gothofredus (Godefroi). The results of modern researches regarding this code are well stated in the Foreign Quarterly Review (volume 9, p. 374).

——Twelve Tables. Laws of ancient Rome, compiled on the basis of those of Solon and other Greek legislators.

They first appeared in the year of Rome 303, inscribed on ten plates of brass. In the following year, two others were added, and the entire code bore the name of the "Laws of the Twelve Tables." The principles they contained were the germ of the body of the Roman law, and enter largely into the modern jurisprudence of Europe. See a fragment of the law of the Twelve Tables, in Cooper's Justinian, 656; Gibbon's Rome, c. 44.

——Visigothic. The Lex Romani; now known as Breviarum Alaricianum. Ordained by Alaric II. for his Roman subjects, A. D. 506.

——Wisbuy, Laws of. A concise but comprehensive code of maritime law, established by the "merchants and masters of the magnificent city of Wisbuy."

The port of Wisbuy, now in ruins, was situated on the northwestern coast of Gottland, in the Baltic sea. It was the capital of the island, and the seat of an extensive commerce, of which the chief relic and the most significant record is this code. It is a mooted point whether this code was derived from the Laws of Oleron, or that from this; but the similarity of the two leaves no doubt that one was the offspring of the other. It was of great authority in the northern parts of Europe. "Lex Rhodia navalis," says Grotius, "pro jure gentium in illo mare Mediterraneo vigebat; sicut apud Gallium leges Oleronis, et apud omnes transrhenanos, legis Wisbuenses." De Jure Belli, lib. 2, c. 3. It is still referred to on subjects of maritime law. An English translation will be found in the appendix to the first volume of Peters' Admiralty Reports.

CODEX (Lat.) A volume or roll. The Code of Justinian.

CODICIL. Some addition to, or qualification of, a last will and testament. 1 Redf. Wills, 287.

This term is derived from the Latin codicillus, which is a diminutive of codex, and in strictness imports a little code or writing,—a little will. In the Roman civil law, codicil was defined as an act which contains dispositions of property in prospect of death, without the institution of an heir or executor. Domat, Civ. Law, pt. ii. bk. iv. tit. i. § 1; Just. de Codic. art. i. § 2. So, also, the early English writers upon wills define a codicil in much the same way. "A codicil is a just sentence of our will touching that which any would have done after their death, without the appointing of an executor." Swinb. Wills, pt. i. § v. pl. 2.

COEMPTIO (Lat.) In civil law. The ceremony of celebrating marriage by solemnities.

The parties met and gave each other a small sum of money. They then questioned each other in turn. The man asked the woman if she wished to be his mater-familias. She replied that she so wished. The woman then asked the man if he wished to be her pater-familias. He replied that he so wished. They then joined hands; and these were called nuptials by coemptio. Boethius, Coemptio; Calv. Lex.; Taylor.

COEMPTION. The act of purchasing the whole quantity of any commodity. Wharton.

COERCION. Constraint; compulsion; force.

Direct or positive coercion takes place when a man is by physical force compelled to do an act contrary to his will. For example, when a man falls into the hands of the enemies of his country, and they compel him, by a just fear of death, to fight against it.

Implied coercion exists where a person is legally under subjection to another, and is induced, in consequence of such subjection, to do an act contrary to his will. See "Duress."

COEXECUTOR. One who is executor with one or more others. See "Executor."

COFFERER OF THE QUEEN'S (or king's) household. In English law. A principal officer of the royal establishment, next under the controller, who, in the countinghouse, and elsewhere, had a special charge and oversight of the other officers, whose wages he paid. Wharton.

COFRADIA. The congregation or brotherhood entered into by several persons for the purpose of performing pious works. No society of this kind can be lawfully formed without license from the king and the bishop of the diocese.

COGITATIONIS POENAM NEMO PATItur. No one is punished for his thoughts. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 279.

COGNATES. In civil and Scotch law. Relations through females. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 137; Bell, Dict.

COGNATI. In civil law. Collateral heirs through females; relations in the line of the mother. 2 Bl. Comm. 235.

The term is not used in the civil law as it now prevails in France. In the common law it has no technical sense; but as a word of discourse in English it signifies, generally, allied by blood, related in origin, of the same family.

COGNATION. In civil law. Signifies generally the kindred which exists between two persons who are united by ties of blood or family, or both.

Civil cognation is that which proceeds alone from the ties of families, as the kindred between the adopted father and the adopted child.

Mixed cognation is that which unites at the same time the ties of blood and family, as that which exists between brothers the issue of the same lawful marriage. Inst. 3. 6; Dig. 38. 10.

Natural cognation is that which is alone formed by ties of blood. Such is the kindred of those who owe their origin to an illicit connection, either in relation to their ascendants or collaterals.

COGNISANCE. See "Cognizance."

COGNITIO.

——In Old English Law. The acknowledgment of a fine; the certificate of such acknowledgment.

Cognizance or jurisdiction. Bracton, fol. 302b.

——In the Roman Law. The judicial examination or hearing of a cause. Plin. Epist. vii. 33.

COGNITIONIBUS MITTENDIS. An obsolete writ requiring a justice or other qualified person, who has taken a fine and neglects to certify it in the court of common pleas, to do so.

COGNITIONIS CAUSAE (Lat.) For the purpose of ascertaining. In Scotch practice. A name given to a judgment or decree pronounced by a court, ascertaining the amount of a debt against the estate of a deceased landed proprietor, on cause shown, or after due investigation. Bell, Dict.

COGNITOR.

——In Old English Law. One who acknowledges.

——In Roman Law. An advocate or defender in a private cause; one who defended the cause of a person who was present. Brissonius; Calv. Lex.

COGNIZANCE, CONUSANCE, or COGNIsance (Lat. cognitio, recognition, knowledge). Acknowledgment; recognition; jurisdiction; judicial power; hearing a matter judicially.

——In Pleading. The answer of the defendant in an action of replevin who is not entitled to the distress of goods which are the subject of the action, acknowledging the taking, and justifying it as having been done by the command of one who is so entitled. Lawes, Pl. 35, 36; 4 Bouv. Inst. note 3571. An acknowledgment made by the deforciant, in levying a fine, that the lands in question are the right of the complainant. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 350.

——Cognizance of Pleas. Jurisdiction of causes. A privilege granted by the king to a city or town to hold pleas within the same. Termes de la Ley. It is in frequent use among the older writers on English law in this latter sense, but is seldom used, if at all, in America, except in its more general meaning. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford possess this franchise. Willes, 233; 1 Sid. 103; 11 East, 543; 1 W. Bl. 454; 10 Mod. 126; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 298.

——Claim of Cognizance (or Conusance). An intervention by a third person, demanding judicature in the cause against the plaintiff, who has chosen to commence his action out of claimant's court. 2 Wils. 409; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 350, note.

It is a question of jurisdiction between the two courts (Fortesque, 157; 5 Viner, Abr. 588), and not between the plaintiff and defendant, as in the case of plea to the jurisdiction, and must be demanded by the party entitled to conusance, or by his representative, and not by the defendant or his attorney (1 Chit. Pl. 403).

There are three sorts of conusance: Tenere placita, which does not oust another court of its jurisdiction, but only creates a concurrent one. Cognitio placitorum, when the plea is commenced in one court, of which conusance belongs to another. A conusance of exclusive jurisdiction; as, that no other court shall hold plea, etc. Hardr. 509; Bac. Abr. "Courts" (D).

COGNIZEE. The party to whom a fine was levied. 2 Bl. Comm. 351.

COGNIZOR. In old conveyancing. The party levying a fine. 2 Bl. Comm. 350, 351.

COGNOMEN (Lat.) A family name.

The praenomen among the Romans distinguished the person, the nomen the gens, or all the kindred descended from a remote common stock through males, while the cognomen denoted the particular family. The agnomen was added on account of some particular event, as a further distinction. Thus, in the designation Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, Publius is the praenomen, Cornelius is the nomen, Scipio the cognomen, and Africanus the agnomen. Vicat. These several terms occur frequently in the Roman laws. See Cas. temp. Hardw. 286; 6 Coke, 65; 1 Tayl. (N. C.) 148.

COGNOVI ACTIONEM (Lat.) He has confessed the action. Cognovit alone is in common use with the same significance.

——In Pleading. A written confession of an action by a defendant, subscribed, but not sealed, and authorizing the plaintiff to sign judgment and issue execution, usually for a sum named.

It is given after the action is brought, to save expense, and differs from a warrant of attorney, which is given before the commencement of any action, and is under seal. 3 Chanc. Prac. 664; 3 Bouv. Inst. 3229.

COHABIT. (Lat. con and habere). To live together in the same house, claiming to be married. The word does not include in its signification, necessarily, the occupying the same bed (1 Hagg. Consist. 144; 4 Paige, Ch. [N. Y.] 425; 116 U. S. 55), though the word is popularly, and sometimes in statutes, used in this latter sense (20 Mo. 210; Bish. Mar. & Div. § 506, note). It does not include mere sexual intercourse, without a habitual dwelling together. 36 Ark. 84; 10 Mass. 153.

To live together in the same house. Used without reference to the relation of the parties to each other as husband and wife, or otherwise. Used of sisters or other members of the same family, or of persons not members of the same family, occupying the same house. 2 Vern. 323; Bish. Mar. & Div. 506, note.

COHAEREDES, or COHAERES. Coheirs; a term applied to coparceners who constitute, as it were, but one heir or body. Bracton, fols. 76b, 67b.

COHAEREDES UNA PERSONA CENsentur, propter unitatem juris quod habent. Coheirs are deemed as one person, on account of the unity of right which they possess. Co. Litt. 163.

COHUAGIUM. A tribute made by those who meet promiscuously in a market or fair. Du Cange.

COIF. A headdress.

In England there are certain serjeants at law who are called serjeants of the coif, from the lawn coif they wear on their heads under their thin caps when they are admitted to that order. It was anciently worn as a distinguishing badge. Spelman.

COJUDICES (Lat.) In old English law. Associate judges having equality of power with others.

COLD-WATER ORDEAL. The trial which was anciently used for the common sort of people, who, having a cord tied about them under their arms, were cast into a river. If they sank to the bottom until they were drawn up, which was in a very short time, then were they held guiltless; but such as did remain upon the water were held culpable, being, as they said, of the water rejected. Wharton.

COLIBERTUS. One who, holding in free socage, was obliged to do certain services for the lord. A middle class of tenants between servile and free, who held their freedom of tenure on condition of performing certain services. Said to be the same as the conditionales. Cowell.

COLLATERAL (Lat. con, with, latus, the side). That which is by the side, and not the direct line; that which is additional to or beyond a thing.

COLLATERAL ACT. In old practice. The name "collateral act" was given to any act (except the payment of money) for the performance of which a bond, recognizance, etc., was given as security.

COLLATERAL ANCESTORS. A phrase sometimes used to designate uncles and aunts, and other ascending collateral relatives, who are not strictly ancestors.

COLLATERAL ASSURANCE. That which is made over and above the deed itself.

COLLATERAL CONSANGUINITY. That relationship which subsists between persons who have the same ancestors, but not the same descendants; who do not descend one from the other. 2 Bl. Comm. 203.

The essential fact of consanguinity (common ancestral blood) is the same in lineal and collateral consanguinity, but the relationship is aside from the direct line. Thus, father, son, and grandson are lineally related; uncle and nephew, collaterally.

COLLATERAL DESCENT. Descent in a transverse or zigzag line, i. e., up through the common ancestor, and then down from him; descent to collaterals.

COLLATERAL ESTOPPEL. The collateral determination of a question by a court having general jurisdiction of the subject. See 26 Vt. 209.

COLLATERAL FACTS. Facts not directly connected with the issue or matter in dispute. Such as afford no reasonable inference as to the principal fact. Greenl. Ev. § 52.

COLLATERAL IMPEACHMENT. A term frequently used in respect of the conclusiveness of judgments, the general rule being that a judgment of a court of record cannot be collaterally impeached, i. e., in an action other than that in which it was rendered, except upon proof of fraud or want of jurisdiction.

COLLATERAL ISSUE. An issue taken upon some matter aside from the general issue in the case. Thus, for example, a plea by the criminal that he is not the person attainted, when an interval exists between attainder and execution, a plea in abatement, and other such pleas, each raise a collateral issue. 4 Bl. Comm. 396. And see 4 Bl. Comm. 338.

COLLATERAL KINSMEN. Those who descend from one and the same common ancestor, but not from one another. Thus, brothers and sisters are collateral to each other; the uncle and nephew are collateral kinsmen, and cousins are the same. All kinsmen are either "lineal" or "collateral."

COLLATERAL LIMITATION. A limitation in the conveyance of an estate, giving an interest for a specified period, but making the right of enjoyment depend upon some collateral event, as, an estate to A. till B. shall go to Rome. Park, Dower, 163; 4 Kent, Comm. 128; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 215.

COLLATERAL SECURITY. A separate obligation attached to another contract to guaranty its performance. The transfer of property or of other contracts to insure the performance of a principal engagement. 38 Ga. 292; 9 Iowa, 331.

The property or securities thus conveyed are also called collateral securities. 1 Powell, Mortg. 393; 2 Powell, Mortg. 666, note 871; 3 Powell, Mortg. 944, 1001.

COLLATERAL WARRANTY. Warranty as to an estate made by one who was ancestor to the heir thereof, either actually or by implication of law, in respect to other property, but who could not have been so in respect to the estate in question.

Warranty made where the heir's title to the land neither was nor could have been derived from the warranting ancestor. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bl. Comm. 301; 4 Kent, Comm. 469.

COLLATERALES ET SOCII. The former title of masters in chancery.

COLLATIO BONORUM. A collation of goods. See "Collation."

COLLATIO SIGNORUM. The ancient mode of testing the genuineness of a seal, by comparing it with another known to be genuine. Bracton, fols. 389b, 398b; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 34, § 5.

COLLATION.

——In Civil Law. The bringing together of property into a common fund; hotchpot. 2 Bl. Comm. 517. Particularly applied to the supposed or real return to the mass of the succession, which an heir makes of the property he received in advance of his share, or otherwise, in order that such property may be divided together with the other effects of the succession. Civ. Code La. art. 1305.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. The act by which the bishop who has the bestowing of a benefice gives it to an incumbent.

——In Practice. The comparison of a copy with its original, in order to ascertain its correctness and conformity. The report of the officer who made the comparison is also called a collation.

COLLATION OF SEALS. When, upon the same label, one seal was set on the back or reverse of the other. Wharton.

COLLATION TO A BENEFICE (Law Lat. collatio beneficii). In English ecclesiastical law. The conferring or bestowing of a benefice by the bishop, where he has himself the advowson, or right of patronage, and which single act of collation effects all that is done in common case by the acts of presentation and institution. 2 Bl. Comm. 22. Or, in other words, the presentation and institution are one and the same act, and, taken together, are called a "collation." 1 Bl. Comm. 391; 1 Wooddeson, Lect. 193. The advowson, in such cases, is termed an "advowson collative." 2 Bl. Comm. 22.

COLLATIONE FACTA UNI POST MORtem alterius. A writ directed to justices of the common pleas, commanding them to issue their writ to the bishop, for the admission of a clerk in the place of another presented by the crown, where there had been a demise of the crown during a suit; for judgment once passed for the king's clerk, and, he dying before admittance, the king may bestow his presentation on another. Reg. Orig. 31.

COLLATIONE HEREMITAGII. In old English law. A writ whereby the king conferred the keeping of an hermitage upon a clerk. Reg. Orig. 303, 308.

COLLECTOR. One appointed to receive taxes or other impositions, as, collector of taxes, collector of militia fines, etc. A person appointed by a private person to collect the credits due him.

COLLECTOR OF THE CUSTOMS. An officer of the United States, appointed for the term of four years, but removable at the pleasure of the president. Act May 15, 1820, § 1; 3 Story, U. S. Laws, 1790.

The duties of a collector of the customs are to receive the entries of all ships or vessels, and of the goods, wares, and merchandise imported in them, estimate the amount of duties payable thereupon, and receive all moneys paid for duties. Act March 2, 1779, § 21; 1 Story, U. S. Laws, 590.

COLLEGA. In the civil law. A colleague; an associate; one having the same power with another, qui sunt ejusdem potestatis. Dig. 50. 16. 173.

COLLEGATARIUS (Lat.; Eng. colegatory). In the civil law. A colegatee. Inst. 2. 20. 8.

COLLEGE. An organized collection or assemblage of persons; a civil corporation, society, or company, having, in general, some literary object.

The assemblage of the cardinals at Rome is called a "college." The body of presidential electors is called the "electoral college," although the whole body never come together.

An educational institution of the highest class.

COLLEGIA. The guild of a trade.

COLLEGIALITER. In a corporate capacity. 2 Kent, Comm. 296.

COLLEGIATE CHURCH. In English ecclesiastical law. A church built and endowed for a society or body corporate of a dean or other president, and secular priests, as canons or prebendaries in the said church, such as the churches of Westminster, Windsor, and others. Cowell.

COLLEGIUM (Lat. colligere, to collect). In civil law. A society or assemblage of those of the same rank or honor; an army; a company, in popular phrase; the whole order of bishops. Du Cange.

Collegium illicitum is one which abused its right, or assembled for any other purpose than that expressed in its charter.

Collegium licitum is an assemblage or society of men united for some useful purpose or business, with power to act like a single individual.

All collegia were illicita which were not ordained by a decree of the senate or of the emperor. 2 Kent, Comm. 269.

COLLEGIUM ADMIRALITATIS. The college or society of the admiralty. See a description in Locc. de Jur. Mar. lib. 1, c. 2.

COLLEGIUM EST SOCIETAS PLURIUM corporum simul habitantium. A college is a society of several persons dwelling together. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 229.

COLLIGENDUM BONA DEFUNCTI. See "Ad Colligendum, etc."

COLLISION. In maritime law. The act of ships or vessels striking together, or of one vessel running against or foul of another.

As ordinarily used, it includes "allision" (q. v.)

COLLISTRIGIUM. The pillory.

COLLITIGANT. A litigant.

COLLOBIUM. A hood or covering for the shoulders, formerly worn by serjeants at law. Spelman.

COLLOCATION. In French law. The act by which the creditors of an estate are arranged in the order in which they are to be paid according to law.

The order in which the creditors are placed is also called collocation. 2 Low. (U. S.) 9, 139.

COLLOQUIUM. In actions for libel or slander, the averment that the language in question was published or uttered of and concerning the plaintiff. It is, however, frequently used in practice to denote both the inducement (q. v.), and the colloquium proper. Towns. Libel & Slander, § 323.

It is to be distinguished from "innuendo," which is an explanation by reference to that which has been already sufficiently explained, and cannot extend the meaning of words unless there be something before averred, to which the innuendo may refer. 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 220.

COLLUSION. An agreement between two or more persons to defraud a person of his rights by the forms of law, or to obtain an object forbidden by law.

The act of married persons in procuring a divorce by mutual consent, whether by the preconcerted commission, by one, of a matrimonial offense, or by failure, in pursuance of agreement, to defend divorce proceedings. It is distinguished from "connivance," which is the abetting by a spouse of a matrimonial offense in order to procure a divorce therefor, but without previous agreement as to its commission. Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 500.

COLLYBISTA. In the civil law. A money changer.

COLLYBUM. In the civil law. Exchange, cambium. Grotius de Jure Belli, lib. 2, c. 12, § 3, par. 4.

COLNE, or CONE. In Saxon and old English law. An account or calculation. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 284, note.

COLONIAL LAWS. The laws of a colony.

——In the United States. The term is used to designate the body of law in force in the colonies of America at the time of the commencement of our independence, which was, in general, the common law of England, with such modifications as the colonial experience had introduced. The colonial law is thus a transition state, through which our present law is derived from the English common law.

——In England. The term "colonial law" is used with reference to the present colonies of that realm.

COLONUS (Lat.) In civil law. A freeman of inferior rank, corresponding with the Saxon ceorl, and the German rural slaves.

COLONY. A union of citizens or subjects who have left their country to people another, and remain subject to the mother-country. 3 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 287.

The country occupied by the colonists.

A colony differs from a possession or a dependency.

COLOR. In pleading. An apparent but legally insufficient ground of action admitted to subsist in the opposite party by the pleading of one of the parties to an action. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 309; 4 Barn. & C. 547; 1 Moore & P. 307. To give color is to give the plaintiff credit for having an apparent or prima facie right of action, independent of the matter introduced to destroy it, in order to introduce new matter in avoidance of the declaration. It was necessary that all pleadings in confession and avoidance should give color. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 309, note; 1 Chit. Pl. 531.

Express color is a feigned matter, pleaded by the defendant, from which the plaintiff seems to have a good cause, whereas he has in truth only an appearance or color of cause. Bac. Abr. "Trespass" (I 4); 1 Chit. Pl. 530. It was not allowed in the plaintiff to traverse the colorable right thus given, and it thus became necessary to answer the plea on which the defendant intended to rely.

Implied color is that which arises from the nature of the defense, as where the defense consists of matter of law, the facts being admitted, but their legal sufficiency denied, by matters alleged in the plea. 1 Chit. Pl. 528; Steph. Pl. 206.

By giving color, the defendant could remove the decision of the case from before a jury, and introduce matter in a special plea, which would otherwise oblige him to plead the general issue. 3 Bl. Comm. 309.

The colorable right must be plausible, or afford a supposititious right, such as might induce an unlearned person to imagine it sufficient, and yet it must be in legal strictness inadequate to defeat the defendant's title as shown in the plea. Comyn. Dig. "Pleading;" Keilw. 1036; 1 Chit. Pl. 531; 4 Dane. Abr. 552; Archb. Pl. 211.

COLOR OF OFFICE (Lat. colore officii). A pretense of official right to do an act made by one who has no such right. 9 East, 364. It implies an illegal claim of authority to do an act by virtue of one's office (23 Wend. [N. Y.] 606; 1 N. Y. 365; 16 N. Y. 439, 442), and is distinguished from by "virtue of office," implying lawful power (4 N. Y. 173).

COLOR OF TITLE. That which in appearance is title, but in reality is no title. 18 How. (U. S.) 50; 56 Mich. 337.

Anything in writing connected with the title which serves to define the extent of the claim. 70 Ga. 809.

A deed void on its face is not color of title. 27 Minn. 449; 2 Pet. (U. S.) 241; 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 152. But see, contra, 94 Ala. 135; 68 Iowa, 507. But defects in the execution (112 N. C. 223; 27 Ill. 224), or lack of title in the grantor (53 N. Y. 287; 71 Ill. 38), will not impair the effect of a deed to give color of title.

COLORABLE ALTERATION. An alteration made only for the purpose of evading the law,—of copyright, for instance.

COLORABLE IMITATION. As applied to trademark (q. v.), colorable imitation is such a close or ingenious imitation as to be calculated to deceive ordinary persons. L. R. 5 H. L., at page 519.

COLORABLE PLEADING. The practice of giving color in pleading. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 438.

COLORE OFFICII. Color of office.

COLPINDACH. In old Scotch law. A young beast or cow, of the age of one or two years; in later times called a "cowdach," or "quoyach."

Skene says it is an Irish word, and properly signifies "foot follower."

COMBARONES. In old English law. Fellow barons; fellow citizens. The citizens or freemen of the Cinque Ports, being anciently called "barons;" the term "combarones" is used in this sense in a grant of Henry III. to the barons of the port of Fevresham. Cowell.

COMBAT. The form of a forcible encounter between two or more persons or bodies of men; an engagement or battle; a duel.

COMBATERRAE. A valley or piece of low ground between two hills. Kennett, Par. Ant.

COMBINATION.

——In Criminal Law. A union of men for the purpose of violating the law; a conspiracy (q. v.) ——In Patent Law. A union of different elements. A patent may be taken out for a new combination of existing machines. 2 Mason (U. S.) 112.

COMBUSTIO. In old English law. The punishment of burning.

COMBUSTIO DOMORUM. Arson. 4 Bl. Comm. 272.

COMBUSTIO PECUNIAE (Law Lat.) In old English law. The burning (that is, melting) of money; the old way of trying mixed and corrupt money, by melting it down upon payments into the exchequer. Cowell.

COMES (Lat. comes, a companion). An earl; a companion, attendant, or follower.

COMINUS. Hand-to-hand; in personal contact.

COMITAS (Lat.) Courtesy; comity; an indulgence or favor granted another nation, as a mere matter of indulgence, without any claim of right made.

COMITATU COMMISSO. A writ or commission, whereby a sheriff is authorized to enter upon the charges of a county. Reg. Orig. 295.

COMITATU ET CASTRO COMMISSO. A writ by which the charge of a county, together with the keeping of a castle, is committed to the sheriff.

COMITATUS (Lat. from comes). A county; a shire; the portion of the country under the government of a comes or count. 1 Bl. Comm. 116.

An earldom. Earls and counts were originally the same as the comitates. 1 Ld. Raym. 13.

The county court, of great dignity among the Saxons. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 42, 66.

COMITES. Persons who are attached to a public minister. As to their privileges, see 1 Dall. (Pa.) 117; Baldw. (U. S.) 240. See "Ambassador."

COMITES PALEYS. Counts or earls palatine; those who had the government of a county palatine. Bracton, fol. 122b. Other copies of Bracton have it comites palentynes.

COMITIA (Lat.) The public assemblies of the Roman people, at which all the most important business of the state was transacted, including, in some cases, even the trial of persons charged with the commission of crime. Anthon, Rom. Ant. 51. The votes of all citizens were equal in the comitiae. 1 Kent, Comm. 518.

——Comitia Calata. A session of the comitia curiata for the purposes of adrogation, the confirmation of wills, and the adoption by an heir of the sacred rites which followed the inheritance.

——Comitia Centuria, or Comitia Majora. An assemblage of the people voting by centuries. The people acting in this form elected their own officers, and exercised an extensive jurisdiction for the trial of crimes. Anthon, Rom. Ant. 52.

——Comitia Curiata. An assemblage of the populus (the original burgesses) by tribes. In these assemblies no one of the plebs could vote. They were held for the purpose of confirming matters acted on by the senate, for electing certain high officers, and for carrying out certain religious observances.

——Comitia Tributa. Assemblies to create certain inferior magistrates, elect priests, make laws, and hold trials. Their power was increased very materially subsequently to their first creation, and the range of subjects acted on became much more extensive than at first. Anthon, Rom. Ant. 62; 1 Kent, Comm. 518.

COMITISSA. In old English law. A countess; an earl's wife. Towns. Pl. 149.

COMITIVA (Law Lat. from comes, q. v.) In old English law. The dignity and office of a comes (count or earl); the same with what was afterwards called comitatus. Spelman.

Used in the Register, in the sense of comitatus, a train, suite, following, attendance, or household. Reg. Orig. 23, 24.

COMITY. Courtesy; a disposition to accommodate.

Courts of justice in one state will, out of comity, enforce the laws of another state, when by such enforcement they will not violate their own laws, or inflict an injury on some one of their own citizens; as, for example, the discharge of a debtor under the insolvent laws of one state will be respected in another state, where there is a reciprocity in this respect.

COMMANDERY, or COMMANDRY (Lat. praeceptoria). In English law. An establishment belonging to the priory of St. John of Jerusalem, consisting usually of a manor, or chief messuage, with lands and tenements appertaining thereto, under the government of an officer called a "commander," who received a part of the income thence arising for his own use, and accounted for the rest. Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

COMMANDITAIRES. Special partners; partners en commandite. See "Commandite."

COMMANDITE. In French law. A partnership in which some furnish money, and others furnish their skill and labor in place of capital. A special or limited partnership.

Those who embark capital in such a partnership are bound only to the extent of the capital so invested. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

COMMANDMENT.

——In Practice. An act of authority, as of a magistrate or judge, in committing a person to prison. Cowell.

——In Old Criminal Law. The act or offense of one who commands another to transgress the law, or do anything contrary to law, as theft, murder, or the like. Bracton, fols. 138, 139; Termes de la Ley; St. Westminster I. c. 14. Particularly applied to the act of an accessory before the fact, in inciting, procuring, setting on, or stirring up another to do the fact or act. 2 Inst. 128.

COMMARCHIO. A boundary, or border; a common boundary.

COMMENDA.

——In French Law. The delivery of a benefice to one who cannot hold the legal title, to keep and manage it for a time limited, and render an account of the proceeds. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

——In Mercantile Law. An association in which the management of the property was intrusted to individuals. Troubat, Lim. Partn. c. 3, § 27.

COMMENDA EST FACULTAS RECIPIendi et retinendi beneficium contra jus positivum a suprema potestate. A commendam is the power of receiving and retaining a benefice contrary to positive law, by supreme authority. Moore, 905.

COMMENDAM.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. The appointment of a suitable clerk to hold a void or vacant benefice or church living until a regular pastor be appointed. Hob. 144; Latch, 236.

——In Louisiana. A species of limited partnership.

It is formed by a contract, by which one person or partnership agrees to furnish another person or partnership a certain amount, either in property or money, to be employed by the person or partnership to whom it is furnished, in his or their own name or firm, on condition of receiving a share in the profits in the proportion determined by the contract, and of being liable to losses and expenses to the amount furnished, and no more. Civ. Code La. art. 2810. A similar partnership exists in France. Code de Comm. 26, 33; Sirey, 12, pt. 2. p. 25. He who makes this contract is called, in respect to those to whom he makes the advance of capital, a partner in commendam. Civ. Code La. art. 2811.

COMMENDATIO. In the civil law. Commendation; praise; that recommendation of his wares by a seller which does not bind him as a warranty.

COMMENDATION. In feudal law. Commendation was where an owner of land placed himself and his land under the protection of a lord, so as to constitute himself his vassal or feudal tenant. Commendation, and the grant of beneficia or feuds, were the two principal modes by which the feudal system was established. See 1 Stubbs, Const. Hist. 153.

COMMENDATORY. He who holds a church living or preferment in commendam. Rapalje & L.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS. Letters written by one bishop to another on behalf of any of the clergy, or others of his diocese traveling thither, that they may be received among the faithful, or that the clerk may be promoted, or necessaries administered to others, etc. Wharton.

COMMENDATUS. In feudal law. One who, by voluntary homage, put himself under the protection of a superior lord. Cowell; Spelman.

COMMENDATORS. In ecclesiastical law. Secular persons upon whom ecclesiastical benefices are bestowed. So called because they are commended and intrusted to their oversight. They are merely trustees.

COMMERCE. The various agreements which have for their object facilitating the exchange of the products of the earth or the industry of man, with an intent to realize a profit. Pardessus, Dr. Com. note 1. Any reciprocal agreements between two persons, by which one delivers to the other a thing, which the latter accepts, and for which he pays a consideration. If the consideration be money, it is called a "sale;" if any other thing than money, it is called "exchange" or "barter." Domat, Dr. Pub. liv. 1, tit. 7, § 1, note 2.

Congress has power, by the constitution, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes. 1 Kent, Comm. 431; Story, Const. § 1052 et seq. The sense in which the word "commerce" is used in the constitution seems not only to include traffic, but intercourse and navigation (Story, Const. § 1057; 9 Wheat. [U. S.] 190, 191, 215, 229; 12 Wheat. [U. S.] 419; 102 U. S. 691; 4 Biss. [U. S.] 156; 31 Iowa, 187), but only such intercourse as consists in trade or traffic (1 Stew. & P. [Ala.] 327).

COMMERCIA BELLI. Compacts entered into by belligerent nations to secure a temporary and limited peace. 1 Kent, Comm. 159.

Contracts made between citizens of hostile nations in time of war. 1 Kent, Comm. 104.

COMMERCIAL LAW. A phrase employed to denote those branches of the law which relate to the rights of property and relations of persons engaged in commerce.

This term denotes more than the phrase "maritime law," which is sometimes used as synonymous, but which more strictly relates to shipping and its incidents. See "Law Merchant."

COMMERCIAL PAPER. Bills, notes, checks, etc.; negotiable instruments.

COMMERCIUM (Lat.) In the civil law. Commerce; business; trade; dealings in the way of purchase and sale; a contract. Dig. 49. 15. 16.

The right to purchase or sell. Inst. 3. 20. 2.

COMMERCIUM JURE GENTIUM COMmune esse debet, et non in monopolium et privatum paucorum quaestum convertendum. Commerce, by the law of nations, ought to be common, and not to be converted into a monopoly and the private gain of a few. Coke, 3d Inst. 181, in marg.

COMMINALTY (Law Fr.) The commonalty or the people. St. Westminster I. 1. pr.

COMMINATORIUM (from commonari, to threaten). In old practice. A clause sometimes added at the end of writs, admonishing the sheriff to be faithful in executing them. Bracton, fol. 398.

COMMISE. In old French law. Forfeiture; the forfeiture of a fief; the penalty attached to the ingratitude of a vassal. Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 12.

COMMISSARIA LEX. A principle of the Roman law relative to the forfeiture of contracts. It was not unusual to restrict a sale upon credit, by a clause in the agreement that if the buyer should fail to make due payment the seller might rescind the sale. In the meantime, however, the property was the buyer's, and at his risk. A debtor and his pledgee might also agree that, if the debtor did not pay at the day fixed, the pledge should become the absolute property of the creditor. 2 Kent, Comm. 583. This was abolished by law of Constantine. Code, 8. 35. 3.

COMMISSARY.

——In Military Law. An officer whose principal duties are to supply an army, or some portion thereof, with provisions.

——In English Ecclesiastical Law. A title formerly applied to an officer who exercised spiritual jurisdiction in distant places of the bishop's diocese; being specially ordained for the purpose of supplying the bishop's jurisdiction and office in the outplaces of his diocese, or else in such places as were peculiar to the bishop, and exempted from the jurisdiction of the archdeacon. Termes de la Ley; Cowell; Lyndewode, Prov. c. 1.

COMMISSARY COURT. In Scotch law. A court of general ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was held before four commissioners, appointed by the crown from among the faculty of advocates. It had a double jurisdiction: First, that exercised within a certain district; second, another, universal, by which it reviewed the sentences of inferior commissioners, and confirmed the testaments of those dying abroad, or dying in the country without having an established domicile. Bell, Dict. It has been abrogated, its jurisdiction in matters of confirmation being given to the sheriff, and the jurisdiction as to marriage and divorce to the court of session. Paterson, Comp. See 4 Geo. IV. c. 47; 1 Wm. IV. c. 69; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 41; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 36.

COMMISSION (Lat. commissio; from committere, to intrust to).

An undertaking without reward to do something for another, with respect to a thing bailed. Rutherforth, Inst. 105.

A body of persons authorized to act in a certain matter. 5 Barn. & C. 859.

The act of perpetrating an offense. An instrument issued by a court of justice, or other competent tribunal, to authorize a person to take depositions, or do any other act by authority of such court or tribunal, is called a "commission." For a form of a commission to take depositions, see Gresl. Eq. Ev. 72.

Letters patent granted by the government, under the public seal, to a person appointed to an office, giving him authority to perform the duties of his office. The commission is not the appointment, but only evidence of it, and, as soon as it is signed and sealed, vests the office in the appointee. 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137; 2 Nott & McC. (S. C.) 357; 1 McCord (S. C.) 233, 238. See 1 Pet. (U. S.) 194; 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 299; 8 Conn. 109; 1 Pa. St. 297; 2 Const. (S. C.) 696; 2 Tyler (Vt.) 235.

——In Common Law. A sum allowed, usually a certain per cent. upon the value of the property involved, as compensation to a servant or agent for services performed. See "Commissions."

——Of Array. This commission issued to send into every county officers to muster or set in military order the inhabitants. The introduction of commissions of lieutenancy, which contained, in substance, the same powers as these commissions, superseded them. 2 Steph. Comm. (7th Ed.) 582.

——Of Assize. In English practice. A commission which formerly issued from the king, appointing certain persons as commissioners or judges of assize to hold the assizes in association with discreet knights during those years in which the justices in eyre did not come.

Other commissions were added to this, which has finally fallen into complete disuse. See "Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius."

——Of Bankrupt. A commission or authority formerly granted by the lord chancellor to such discreet persons as he should think proper, to examine the bankrupt in all matters relating to his trade and effects, and to perform various other important duties connected with bankruptcy matters. These persons were thence called "commissioners of bankruptcy," and had in most respects the powers and privileges of judges in their own courts; but regularly constituted courts and judges in bankruptcy have now superseded such commissions and commissioners. Brown.

——Of Charitable Uses. This commission issues out of chancery to the bishop and others, where lands given to charitable uses are misemployed, or there is any fraud or dispute concerning them, to inquire of and redress the same, etc. 43 Eliz. c. 4. Wharton.

——Of Delegates. When any sentence was given in any ecclesiastical cause by the archbishop, this commission, under the great seal, was directed to certain persons, usually lords, bishops, and judges of the law, to sit and hear an appeal of the same to the king, in the court of chancery; but latterly the judicial committee of the privy council has supplied the place of this commission. Brown.

——Of Lunacy. A writ issued out of chancery, or such court as may have jurisdiction of the case, directed to a proper officer, to inquire whether a person named therein is a lunatic or not. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 382 et seq.

——Of Partition. Formerly a partition was fected in England by issuing a commission to commissioners, to divide the property, and, on their return coming in, the parties were ordered to execute mutual conveyances to carry out the division. Haynes, Eq. 153. Similar commissions are still issued in some of the states. See "Partition."

——Of Rebellion. In English law. A writ formerly issued out of chancery to compel an attendance. It was abolished by the order of August 8, 1841.

——Of Review. In English ecclesiastical law. A commission formerly sometimes granted in extraordinary cases, to revise the sentence of the court of delegates. 3 Bl. Comm. 67. Now out of use; the privy council being substituted for the court of delegates, as the great court of appeal in all ecclesiastical causes. 3 Steph. Comm. 432.

——Of the Peace. In English law. A commission from the crown, appointing certain persons therein named, jointly and severally, to keep the peace, etc. Justices of the peace are always appointed by special commission under the great seal, the form of which was settled by all the judges, A. D. 1590, and continues with little alteration to this day. 1 Bl. Comm. 351; 3 Steph. Comm. 39, 40.

——Of Treaty with Foreign Princes. Leagues and arrangements made between states and kingdoms, by their ambassadors and ministers, for the mutual advantage of the kingdoms in alliance. Wharton.

——Of Unlivery. In an action in the English admiralty division, where it is necessary to have the cargo in a ship unladen in order to have it appraised, a commission of unlivery is issued and executed by the marshal. Williams & B. Adm. Jur. 233.

——To Take Answers in Equity. When a defendant in a suit lived more than twenty miles from London, there might have been a commission granted to take his answer in the country, where the commissioners administered to him the usual oath, and then the answer being sealed up, either one of the commissioners carried it up to court or it was sent by a messenger, who swore that he received it from one of the commissioners, and that the same had not been opened or altered since he received it. But latterly such an answer might be sworn in the country before any solicitor of the court who has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in chancery. The present answer in chancery, and at common law, is a mere affidavit, and is not a pleading. It is sworn anywhere before a solicitor who is a commissioner to administer oaths. Brown.

COMMISSION DAY. In English practice. The opening day of the assizes. Wharton.

COMMISSION MERCHANT. A factor (q. v.)

COMMISSION DEL CREDERE. See "Del Credere Commission."

COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS. The title given by law to the head of the patent office bureau.

COMMISSIONERS OF BAIL. Officers appointed by some courts to take recognizances of bail in civil cases.

COMMISSIONERS OF BANKRUPT. In English law. Commissioners appointed under the great seal, and whose duties are to take proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading and act of bankruptcy, to examine the bankrupt in all matters relating to his trade and effects, assign his property to assignees, and to perform various other important duties connected with bankruptcy matters. 1 Bl. Comm. 480-486; Eden, Bankr. Law, 79, et passim.

These commissioners now compose permanent courts of bankruptcy. St. 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 56; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 29, § 21; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122; 2 Steph. Comm. 199, 200; 3 Steph. Comm. 425, 426.

COMMISSIONERS OF HIGHWAYS. Officers having certain powers and duties concerning the highways within the limits of their jurisdiction. They are usually three in number. In some of the states they are county officers, and their jurisdiction is coextensive with the county. In others, as in New York, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, they are town or township officers. They have power to establish, alter, and vacate highways, and it is their duty to cause them to be kept in repair.

COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.

——In English Law. A court of record of special jurisdiction in England.

It is a temporary tribunal, erected by virtue of a commission under the great seal, which formerly was granted pro re nata at the pleasure of the crown, but now at the discretion and nomination of the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, and chief justices, pursuant to the statute of sewers. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5. Its jurisdiction is to overlook the repairs of the banks and walls of the seacoast and navigable rivers and the streams communicating therewith, and is confined to such county or particular district as the commission shall expressly name. The commissioners may take order for the removal of any annoyances, or the safeguard and conservation of the sewers within their commission, either according to the laws and customs of Romney Marsh, or otherwise, at their own discretion. They are also to assess and collect taxes for such repairs and for the expenses of the commission. They may proceed with the aid of a jury or upon their own view. Consult 7 Anne, c. 10; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 45; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 50; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. cc. 10, 19-22; 3 Bl. Comm. 73, 74; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 469.

——In American Law. Commissioners have been appointed for the purpose of regulating the flow of water in streams. Their duties are discharged in the different states by county courts, county commissioners, etc.

COMMISSIONS. In practice. Compensation allowed to agents, factors, executors, trustees, receivers, and other persons who manage the affairs of others, in recompense for their services.

COMMITMENT. In practice. The warrant or order by which a court or magistrate directs a ministerial officer to take a person to prison. See 1 Metc. (Mass.) 504.

The act of sending a person to prison by means of such a warrant or order. 9 N. H. 204.

COMMITTEE. A person or body of persons to whom a matter is committed for superintendence, action, or recommendation.

——In Legislation. One or more members of a legislative body, to whom is specially referred some matter before that body, in order that they may investigate and examine into it, and report to those who delegated this authority to them.

——In Practice. A guardian appointed to take charge of the person or estate of one who has been found to be non compos.

COMMITTITUR PIECE. In English law. An instrument in writing, on paper or parchment, which charges a person already in prison, in execution at the suit of the person who arrested him.

COMMIXTION. In civil law. A term used to signify the act by which goods are mixed together.

The commixtion of liquids is called "confusion" (q. v.), and that of solids a "mixture." Lec. Elm. §§ 370, 371; Story, Bailm. § 40; 1 Bouv. Inst. note 506.

COMMODATE. In Scotch law. A loan for use. Ersk. Inst. bk. 3, tit. 1, § 20; 1 Bell, Comm. 225.

COMMODATI ACTIO (Lat.) See "Actio Commodatio," etc.

COMMODATO. In Spanish law. A contract by which one person lends gratuitously to another some object not consumable, to be restored to him in kind at a given period.

COMMODATUM. A species of bailment, by which one of the parties binds himself to return to the other certain personal chattels which the latter delivers to him to be used by him without reward; loan for use. Story, Bailm. § 221. See "Bailment."

COMMODUM EX INJURIA SUA NON habere debet. No man ought to derive any benefit of his own wrong. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 161; Finch, Law, bk. 1, c. 3, note 62.

COMMON. As an adjective,—owned by several; usual; habitual. As a noun,—an incorporeal hereditament, which consists in a profit which one man has in connection with one or more others in the land of another. 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 32; 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 647; 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 498; 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 14, 30; 10 Pick. (Mass.) 364; 3 Kent, Comm. 403.

——Common of Estovers. The liberty of taking necessary wood, for the use of furniture of a house or farm, from another man's estate. This right is inseparably attached to the house or farm, and is not apportionable. If, therefore, a farm entitled to estovers be divided by the act of the party among several tenants, neither of them can take estovers, and the right is extinguished. 2 Bl. Comm. 34; Plowd. 381; 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 639; 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 592. It is to be distinguished from the right to estovers which a tenant for life has in the estate which he occupies. See "Estovers."

——Common of Pasture. The right of feeding one's beasts on another's land. It is either appendant, appurtenant because of vicinage, or in gross.

——Common of Piscary. The liberty of fishing in another man's water. 2 Bl. Comm. 34. See "Fishery."

——Common of Shack. The right of persons occupying lands lying together in the same common field to turn out their cattle after harvest to feed promiscuously in that field. Wharton; 2 Steph. Comm. 6; 1 Barn. & Ald. 710.

——Common of Turbary. The liberty of digging turf in another man's ground. Common of turbary can only be appendant or appurtenant to a house, not to lands, because turves are to be spent in the house. 4 Coke, 37; 3 Atk. 189; Nov. 145; 7 East, 127.

——Common Appendant. A right annexed to the possession of land, by which the owner thereof is entitled to feed his beasts on the wastes of the manor. It can only be claimed by prescription, so that it cannot be pleaded by way of custom. 1 Rolle, Abr. 396; 6 Coke, 59.

——Common Appurtenant. This differs from common appendant in the following particulars, viz.: It may be claimed by grant or prescription, whereas common appendant can only arise from prescription; it does not arise from any connection of tenure, nor is it confined to arable land, but may be claimed as annexed to any kind of land; it may be not only for beasts usually commonable, such as horses, oxen, and sheep, but likewise for goats, swine, etc.; it may be severed from the land to which it is appurtenant; it may be commenced by grant; and an uninterrupted usage for twenty years is evidence of a grant. In most other respects, commons appendant and appurtenant agree. 2 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 5; Bouv. Inst. note 1650; 30 Eng. Law & Eq. 176; 15 East, 108.

——Common Because of Vicinage. The right which the inhabitants of two or more contiguous townships or villas have of intercommoning with each other. It ought to be claimed by prescription, and can only be used by cattle levant and couchant upon the lands to which the right is annexed, and cannot exist except between adjoining townships, where there is no intermediate land. Co. Litt. 122a; 4 Coke, 38a; 7 Coke, 5; 10 Q. B. 581, 589, 604; 19 Q. B. 620; 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 523.

It is, indeed, only a permissive right, intended to excuse what, in strictness, is a trespass in both, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and therefore either township may inclose and bar out the other, though they have intercommoned time out of mind. 2 Bl. Comm. 33; Co. Litt. 12a; Bracton, fol. 222.

Dr. Wooddeson observes that Blackstone's account of common pur cause de vicinage is not properly a definition, but rather a descriptive example or illustration, there being other occasions when the excuse for trespass may be used. 2 Wooddeson, Lect. 50.

——Common in Gross. A right of common which must be claimed by deed or prescription. It has no relation to land, but is annexed to a man's person, and may be for a certain or an indefinite number of cattle. It cannot be aliened so as to give the entire right to several persons to be enjoyed by each in severalty. And where it comes to several persons by operation of law, as by descents, it is incapable of division among them, and must be enjoyed jointly. Common appurtenant for a limited number of cattle may be granted over, and by such grant becomes common in gross. Co. Litt. 122a, 164a; 5 Taunt. 244; 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 30; 2 Bl. Comm. 34.

See, generaly, Viner, Abr.; Bac. Abr.; Comyn, Dig.; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 34 et seq.; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 4.

COMMON ASSURANCES. Deeds which make safe or assure to a man the title to his estate, whether they are deeds of conveyance, or to charge or discharge.

COMMON BAIL. Fictitious sureties entered in the proper office of the court. See "Bail."

COMMON BAR. In pleading. A plea to compel the plaintiff to assign the particular place where the trespass has been committed. Steph. Pl. 256. It is sometimes called a "blank bar."

COMMON BARRATRY. See "Barratry."

COMMON BARRETOR. In criminal law. One who frequently excites and stirs up suits and quarrels, either at law or otherwise. See "Barratry."

COMMON BENCH. The ancient name for the court of common pleas.

COMMON CARRIERS. Such as carry goods for hire indifferently for all persons.

The definition includes carriers by land and water.

One who plies between certain termini, and openly professes to carry for hire the goods of all such persons as may choose to employ him. Redf. Carr. 1.

One undertaking to carry for hire the goods of all persons indifferently. 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 161; 22 N. J. Law, 372.

"The test [of whether one is a common carrier] is not whether he is carrying as a public employment, or whether he carries to a fixed place, but whether he holds out, either expressly or by a course of conduct, that he will carry for hire, so long as he has room, the goods of all persons, indifferently, who send him goods to be carried." L. R. 1 C. P. 19, 423.

——Common Carriers of Passengers. Such as carry persons for hire, and are bound to carry all who offer. 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 239; 10 N. H. 486; 15 Ill. 472; 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 221; 3 Brod. & B. 54; 9 Price, 408.

COMMON CHASE (Law Fr. comon chace). In old English law. A place where the right of hunting wild animals (touts beasts chaceables) was common to all (a toutzgents). Y. B. P. 10 Edw. III. 28.

COMMON COUNCIL. The more numerous house of the municipal legislative assembly in some American cities.

The English parliament is the common council of the whole realm.

COMMON COUNTS. Certain general counts, not founded on any special contract, which are introduced in a declaration for the purpose of preventing a defeat of a just right by the accidental variance of the evidence.

These are, in an action of assumpsit, counts founded on express or implied promises to pay money in consideration of a precedent debt, and are of four descriptions,—the indebitatus assumpsit, the quantum meruit, the quantum valebant, and the account stated.

COMMON DAY (Law Lat. dies communis). In old English practice. An ordinary day in court (St. 13 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 17), such as octabis Michaelis (the octave of St. Michael), quindena Paschae (the quinzime of Easter), etc. (St. 51 Hen. III. sts. 2, 3; Cowell; Termes de la Ley).

COMMON DEBTOR. In Scotch law. A debtor whose effects have been arrested by several creditors. In regard to these creditors, he is their common debtor, and by this term is distinguished in the proceedings that take place in the competition. Bell, Dict.

COMMON DRUNKARD. See "Drunkard."

COMMON ERROR (Lat. communis error). An error for which there are many precedents. "Common error goeth for a law." Finch, Law, bk. 1, c. 3, No. 54.

COMMON FINE (Law Lat. finis communis). In old English law. A certain sum of money which the residents in a leet paid to the lord of the leet, otherwise called head silver, cert money (q. v.), or certum letae. Termes de la Ley; Cowell. A sum of money paid by the inhabitants of a manor to their lord, towards the charge of holding a court leet. Bailey. See "Leet."

A fine or amercement imposed upon a county at large. Bracton, fol. 36b; St. Westminster I. c. 18; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 14, § 9; 2 Inst. 197.

COMMON FISHERY. A fishery to which all persons have a right, such as the cod fisheries off Newfoundland. A "common fishery" is different from a "common of fishery," which is the right to fish in another's pond, pool, or river. See "Fishery."

COMMON HALL. A court in the city of London, at which all the citizens, or such as are free of the city, have a right to attend. Wharton.

COMMON HIGHWAY. By this term is meant a road to be used by the community at large for any purpose of transit or traffic. Hammond, N. P. 239. See "Highway."

COMMON INFORMER. One who, without being specially required by law or by virtue of his office, gives information of crimes, offenses, or misdemeanors which have been committed, in order to prosecute the offender; a prosecutor.

COMMON INTENT. The natural sense given to words.

It is the rule that when words are used which will bear a natural sense and an artificial one, or one to be made out by argument and inference, the natural sense shall prevail. It is simply a rule of construction, and not of addition. Common intent cannot add to a sentence words which have been omitted. 2 H. Bl. 530. In pleading, certainty is required; but certainty to a common intent is sufficient,—that is, what, upon a reasonable construction, may be called certain, without recurring to possible facts. Co. Litt. 203a; Doug. 163. See "Certainty."

COMMON JURY. An ordinary petit jury, as distinguished from a special or struck jury.

COMMON LAW. That system of law or form of the science of jurisprudence which has prevailed in England and in the United States of America, in contradistinction to other great systems, such as the Roman or civil law.

As distinguished from statute law, those principles, usages, and rules of action applicable to the government and security of persons and of property, which do not rest for their authority upon any express and positive declaration of the will of the legislature. 1 Kent, Comm. 492.

The body of rules and remedies administered by courts of law, technically so called, in contradistinction to those of equity, and to the canon law. 3 Pet. (U. S.) 446.

The law of any country, to denote that which is common to the whole country, in contradistinction to laws and customs of local application.

As used in the United States, it includes both the unwritten law of England and the statutes passed before the settlement of the United States. 5 Pet. (U. S.) 241; 18 Wis. 147.

The common law is not fixed in its scope, but develops new principles by analogy as new conditions arise. 42 Ala. 597.

COMMON-LAW PROCEDURE ACTS. Three acts of parliament, passed in the years 1852, 1854, and 1860, respectively, for the amendment of the procedure in the common-law courts. The common-law procedure act of 1852 is St. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, that of 1854, St. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, and that of 1860, St. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126. Mozley & W.

COMMON LAWYER. A lawyer learned in the common law.

COMMON LEARNING. Familiar law or doctrine. Dyer, 27b, 33.

COMMON NUISANCE. One which affects the public in general, and not merely some particular person. 1 Hawk. P. C. 197. See "Nuisance."

COMMON OPINION IS GOOD AUTHORity in law. Co. Litt. 186a; 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 528, 577.

COMMON PLEAS. The name of a court having jurisdiction generally of civil actions.

Such pleas or actions as are brought by private persons against private persons, or by the government, when the cause of action is of a civil nature. In England, whence we derived this phrase, common pleas are so called to distinguish them from pleas of the crown.

COMMON RECOVERY. A judgment recovered in a fictitious suit, brought against the tenant of the freehold, in consequence of a default made by the person who is last vouched to warranty in the suit, which recovery, being a supposed adjudication of the right, binds all persons, and vests a free and absolute fee simple in the recoveror.

A common recovery is a kind of conveyance, and is resorted to when the object is to create an absolute bar of estates tail, and of the remainders and reversions expectant on the determination of such estates. 2 Bl. Comm. 357. Though it has been used in some of the states, this form of conveyance is nearly obsolete, easier and less expensive modes of making conveyances, which have the same effect, having been substituted. 2 Bouv. Inst. notes 2092, 2096; 7 N. H. 9; 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 390; 2 Rawle (Pa.) 168; 4 Yeates (Pa.) 413; 1 Whart. (Pa.) 151; 6 Mass. 328.

COMMON SANS NOMBRE. Common without number, that is, without limit as to the number of cattle which may be turned on; otherwise called "common without stint." Bracton, fols. 53b, 222b; 2 Steph. Comm. 6, 7; 2 Bl. Comm. 34; 3 Bl. Comm. 238; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. 269.

COMMON SCHOOLS. Schools for general elementary instruction, free to all the public. 2 Kent, Comm. 195-202.

COMMON SCOLD. One who, by the practice of frequent scolding, disturbs the neighborhood. Bish. Crim. Law, § 147.

The offense of being a common scold is cognizable at common law. It is a particular form of nuisance, and was punishable by the ducking stool at common law, in place of which punishment fine and imprisonment are substituted in the United States. 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 220; 3 Cranch, C. C. (U. S.) 620. See 1 Term R. 748; 6 Mod. 11; 4 Rog. (N. Y.) 90; 1 Russ. Crimes, 302; Rosc. Crim. Ev. 665.

COMMON SEAL. The seal of a corporation.

It was an ancient and technical rule of the common law that a corporation could not manifest its intentions by any personal act or oral discourse, and that it spoke and acted only by its common seal. 4 Kent, Comm. 288. This is said to be no longer law in the United States. 7 Cranch (U. S.) 299; 9 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 188; 21 Vt. 343; 21 Miss. 408; 1 Smith (Ind.) 98; 6 Ga. 166; 2 Kent, Comm. 289.

COMMON SERJEANT. A judicial officer of the city of London, who aids the recorder in disposing of the criminal business of the Old Bailey Sessions. Holthouse.

COMMON, TENANTS IN. See "Tenant."

COMMON TRAVERSE. See "Traverse."

COMMON VOUCHEE. In common recoveries, the person who is vouched to warranty. In this fictitious proceeding, the crier of the court usually performs the office of a common vouchee. 2 Bl. Comm. 358; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2093.

COMMON WEAL. The public good.

COMMONABLE. Entitled to common. Commonable beasts are either beasts of the plow, as horses and oxen, or such as manure the land, as kine and sheep. Beasts not commonable are swine, goats, and the like. Co. Litt. 122a; 2 Bl. Comm. 33.

COMMONAGE. In old conveyancing. The right of common. See "Common."

COMMONALTY. The common people of England, as distinguished from the king and nobles.

The body of a society or corporation, as distinguished from the officers. 1 Per. & D. 243. Charters of incorporation of the various tradesmen's societies, etc., in England are usually granted to the master, wardens, and commonalty of such corporation.

COMMONANCE, or COMMUNANCE. The commoners, or tenants and inhabitants, who have the right of common or commoning in open field. Cowell.

COMMONER. One possessing a right of common.

COMMONS. Those subjects of the English nation who are not noblemen. They are represented in parliament by the house of commons.

COMMONTY. In Scotch law. Land possessed in common by different proprietors, or by those having acquired rights of servitude. Bell, Dict.; 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 20.

COMMONWEALTH. A free state or republic having a republican form of government.

The English nation during the time of Cromwell was called a commonwealth. It is the legal title of the states of Kentucky, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

Used sometimes as denoting the public; the common welfare of the people.

COMMORANCY. The dwelling in any place as an inhabitant, which consists in usually lying there. 4 Bl. Comm. 273. In American law it is used to denote a mere temporary residence. 19 Pick. (Mass.) 247, 248.

COMMORANT. One residing in a particular town, city, or district. Barnes, 162.

COMMORIENTES. Those who perish at the same time in consequence of the same calamity.

COMMORTH, or COMORTH. A contribution which was gathered at marriages, and when young priests said or sung the first masses. Prohibited by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 6. Cowell.

COMMOTE (Law Lat. commotum, from Brit. cymbod; cym. together, bod, being or dwelling; or from cwmmwd, a province). Half a cantred or hundred in Wales, containing, properly, fifty villages. St. Walliae, 12 Edw. I. 21 Hen. VIII. c. 26. Spelman, voc. "Commotum." The fourth part of a hundred, according to Mr. Barrington, who cites Girald. Camb. c. 2. Barr. Obs. St. 125, note (h).

A great seigniory or lordship, including one or more manors. Co. Litt. 5a. Part of a seigniory. Thel. Dig. lib. 8, c. 2, § 18.

COMMUNE. A self-governing town or village. The name given to the committee of the people in the French revolution of 1793; and again, in the revolutionary uprising of 1871, it signified the attempt to establish absolute self-government in Paris, or the mass of those concerned in the attempt. In old French law, it signified any municipal corporation; and in old English law, the commonalty or common people.

COMMUNE CONCILIUM REGNI. The common council of the realm. One of the names of the English parliament.

COMMUNE FORUM. The common place of justice; the seat of the principal courts, especially those that are fixed. 7 Bell, App. Cas. 169.

COMMUNE PLACITUM. In old English law. A common plea or civil action, such as an action of debt. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 61, § 18.

COMMUNE VINCULUM. A common or mutual bond. Applied to the common stock of consanguinity, and to the feodal bond of fealty, as the common bond of union between lord and tenant. 2 Bl. Comm. 250; 3 Bl. Comm. 230.

COMMUNI CUSTODIA. An obsolete writ which anciently lay for the lord, whose tenant, holding by knight's service, died, and left his eldest son under age, against a stranger that entered the land, and obtained the ward of the body. Reg. Orig. 161.

COMMUNI DIVIDENDO. In civil law. An action which lies for those who have property in common, to procure a division. It lies where parties hold land in common, but not in partnership. Calv. Lex.

COMMUNIA. In old English law. Common. Bracton, fol. 222.

Common things (res communes), such as running water, the air, the sea, etc. Id. 7b.

COMMUNIA, or COMMUNIAE (Lat.) In old European law. Communities. Towns enfranchised by the crown, in most of the feudal kingdoms of Europe, about the twelfth century, and formed into free corporations, by what were termed "charters of community." 1 Robertson, Hist. Charles V. 24-29, and notes in Appendix.

COMMUNIA PLACITA. Actions between citizens, as distinguished from placita coronae, pleas of the crown, or criminal prosecutions.

COMMUNIA PLACITA NON TENENDA in scaccario. An ancient writ directed to the treasurer and barons of the exchequer, forbidding them to hold pleas between common persons (i. e., not debtors to the king, who alone originally sued and were sued there) in that court, where neither of the parties belonged to the same. Reg. Orig. 187. Since superseded by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 39.

COMMUNIA PLACITUM. In old English law. A common plea or action, such as an action of debt.

COMMUNIBUS ANNIS. In ordinary years; on the annual average. 2 Bl. Comm. 322.

COMMUNICATION. Information; consultation; conference. A letter is a communication. 49 N. J. Law, 256. But see 4 Metc. (Mass.) 459.

——In French Law. Discovery and inspection of books and papers. Arg. Fr. Merc. Law, 552.

COMMUNINGS. In Scotch law. The negotiations preliminary to a contract.

COMMUNIO BONORUM (Lat.) In civil law. A community of goods.

COMMUNION OF GOODS. In Scotch law. The right enjoyed by married persons in the movable goods belonging to them. Bell, Dict.

COMMUNIS ERROR FACIT JUS. A common error makes law. What was at first illegal, being repeated many times, is presumed to have acquired the force of usage; and then it would be wrong to depart from it. Hilliard, Real Prop. 268; 1 Ld. Raym. 42; 6 Clark & F. 172; 3 Maule & S. 396; 4 N. H. 458; 2 Mass. 357. The converse of this maxim is communis error non facit jus, a common error does not make law. Coke, 4th Inst. 242; 3 Term R. 725; 6 Term R. 564.

COMMUNIS OPINIO. Common opinion; general professional opinion. Co. Litt. 186a.

COMMUNIS PARIES. In the civil law. A common or party wall. Dig. 8. 2. 8. 13.

COMMUNIS RIXATRIX. In old English law. A common scold (q. v.). 4 Bl. Comm. 168.

COMMUNIS SCRIPTURA. In old English law. A common writing; a writing common to both parties; a chirograph. Glanv. lib. 8, c. 1.

COMMUNIS STIPES (Lat.) In old English law. A common stock; the common or root stock of descent; a common ancestor. Bl. Law Tr. 6.

COMMUNITAS REGNI ANGLIAE (Lat.) The general assembly of the kingdom of England. One of the ancient names of the English parliament. 1 Bl. Comm. 148. According to Cowell, it signified the barons and tenants in capite of the kingdom. But in St. Cart. Conf. 49 Hen. III., it is used in the sense of "commonalty," as distinguished from the prelates, earls, and barons (prelatorum, comitum, baronum et communitatis regni).

COMMUNITY (Lat. communis, common).

——In Civil Law. A corporation or body politic. Dig. 3. 4.

——In French Law. A species of partnership which a man and woman contract when they are lawfully married to each other.

Conventional community is that which is formed by express agreement in the contract of marriage. By this contract, the legal community which would otherwise subsist may be modified as to the proportions which each shall take, and as to the things which shall compose it. Civ. Code La. 2393.

Legal community is that which takes place by virtue of the contract of marriage itself.

COMMUNITY PROPERTY. Property acquired during the existence of the matrimonial relation, which in some states (Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Idaho, and Washington) belongs equally to the spouses. The doctrine is of Spanish origin. See Schmidt, Civ. Law, p. 28; White, New Recop. p. 60.

The husband, as head of the community (q. v.), has control of the property during the existence of the marriage relation (101 Cal. 563; 3 Wash. 592); but on dissolution of the community by death or divorce, it is divided equally between the parties (63 Cal. 77); the testamentary power of the deceased spouse being limited to the testator's moiety (18 Cal. 291).

COMMUTATION. The change of a punishment to which a person has been condemned into a less severe one. This can be granted only by the executive authority in which the pardoning power resides.

Not a conditional pardon, but "the substitution of one punishment known to the law for another and different punishment, also known to the law." 1 Nev. 321.

COMMUTATIVE CONTRACT. In civil law. One in which each of the contracting parties gives and receives an equivalent. The contract of sale is of this kind. The seller gives the thing sold, and receives the price, which is the equivalent. The buyer gives the price, and receives the thing sold, which is the equivalent. Such contracts are usually distributed into four classes, namely: Do ut des, I give that you may give; facio ut facias, I do that you may do; facio ut des, I do that you may give; do ut facias, I give that you may do. Poth. Obl. note 13. See Civ. Code La. art. 1761.

COMMUTATIVE JUSTICE. See "Justice."

COMPACT. An agreement; a contract between parties, which creates obligations and rights capable of being enforced, and contemplated as such between the parties, in their distinct and independent characters. Story, Const. bk. 3, c. 3; Rutherforth, Inst. bk. 2, c. 6, § 1.

The parties may be nations, states, or individuals, but it is commonly applied to the former, and in this sense is a broader term than "treaty." 14 Pet. (U. S.) 572.

As applied to individuals, it is synonymous with "contract." 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 92.

COMPANION OF THE GARTER. A knight of the Order of the Garter. See "Knights of the Garter."

COMPANIONS. In French law. A general term, comprehending all persons who compose the crew of a ship or vessel. Poth. Mar. Cont. note 163.

COMPANY. An association of a number of individuals for the purpose of carrying on some legitimate business.

This term is not synonymous with "partnership," though every such unincorporated company is a partnership. Usage has reserved the term to associations whose members are in greater number, their capital more considerable, and their enterprises greater, either on account of their risk or importance.

When these companies are authorized by the government, they are known by the name of "corporations."

Sometimes the word is used to represent those members of a partnership whose names do not appear in the name of the firm. See 12 Toullier, Dr. Civ. 97.

COMPARATIO LITERARUM (Lat.) In the civil law. Comparison of writings, or handwritings. A mode of proof allowed in certain cases. Code, 4. 21. 20; Nov. 49, c. 2; Bell, Dict.

COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE. A doctrine whereby negligence is classified as "slight," "ordinary," or "gross." In such case, if the negligence of a defendant be gross, there may be a recovery, notwithstanding slight contributory negligence (96 Ill. 47); but not where the negligence of the parties is of the same class, or the defendant's "ordinary," and the plaintiff's "slight" (72 Ill. 351).

The doctrine is now abandoned in the only state where it prevailed as a common-law doctrine. 153 Ill. 165.

COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING. A mode of deducing evidence of the authenticity of a written instrument, by showing the likeness of the handwriting to that of another instrument proved to be that of the party whom it is sought to establish as the author of the instrument in question. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 578.

"This is as distinct and separate a thing from that comparison which a witness called to testify to handwriting makes between the writing in question and the exemplar in his mind as an external, visible, and tangible object is distinct from a mental impression or memory." 43 Pa. St. 12.

COMPASCUUM. Belonging to commonage. Jus compascuum, the right of common of pasture.

COMPASSING. Imagining or contriving.

COMPATERNITAS (Eng. compaternity). In the canon law. A kind of spiritual relationship (cognatio spiritualis) contracted by baptism. It was a ground of divorce. Bracton, fol. 298b.

COMPATIBILITY. Capability of harmony or accord.

——Of Offices. Such harmony between the duties of two offices that they may be discharged by one person.

——In Divorce Law. Incompatibility of temper is a ground of divorce in one or two states.

COMPEAR, or COMPEIR. In Scotch law. To appear. 1 Forbes, Inst. pt. 4, bk. 2, c. 2, tit. 2.

COMPEARANCE, or COMPEIRANCE. In Scotch practice. Appearance; an appearance made for a defendant; an appearance by counsel. Bell, Dict.

COMPELLATIVUM. In old records. An adversary or accuser. Whishaw.

COMPENDIA SUNT DISPENDIA. Abridgments are hindrances. Co. Litt. 305.

COMPENSACION. In Spanish law. The extinction of a debt by another debt of equal dignity between persons who have mutual claims on each other.

COMPENSATIO. In the civil law. Compensation, or set-off. A proceeding resembling a set-off in the common law, being a claim on the part of the defendant to have an amount due to him from the plaintiff deducted from his demand. Dig. 16. 2; Inst. 4. 6. 30. 39; 3 Bl. Comm. 305; 1 Kames, Eq. 395.

COMPENSATIO CRIMINIS. The compensation or set-off of one crime against another. For example, in questions of divorce, where one party claims the divorce on the ground of adultery of his or her companion, the latter may show that the complainant has been guilty of the same offense, and, having himself violated the contract, cannot complain of its violation on the other side. This principle is incorporated in the codes of most civilized nations. See 1 Hagg. Consist. 144; 1 Hagg. Ecc. 714; 2 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 108; 2 Dev. & B. (N. C.) 64; Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 393, 394.

COMPENSATION (Lat. compendere, to balance). Indemnification; recompense. Something to be done for or paid to another of equal value with something of which he has been deprived by the act or negligence of the party so doing or paying.

As compared with "consideration" and "damages," "compensation," in its most careful use, seems to be between them. Consideration is amends for something given by consent, or by the owner's choice. Damages is amends exacted from a wrongdoer for a tort. Compensation is amends for something which was taken without the owner's choice, yet without commission of a tort. Thus, one should say, consideration for land sold; compensation for land taken for a railway; damages for a trespass. But such distinctions are not uniform. "Land damages" is a common expression for compensation for lands taken for public use. Abbott.

In a statute providing for compensation for property taken for public use, compensation means an equivalent for the value of the land. 17 N. J. Law, 47.

It is applied to the remuneration of officers, fiduciaries, etc., but is not synonymous with "salary." 76 Ill. 548.

——In Civil Law. A reciprocal liberation between two persons who are both creditors and debtors of each other. Est debiti et crediti inter se contributio. Dig. 16. 2. 1.

It resembles in many respects the common-law set-off. The principal difference is that a set-off must be pleaded to be effectual; whereas compensation is effectual without any such plea. See 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1407.

It may be legal, by way of exception, or by reconvention. 8 La. 158; Dig. 16. 2; Code, 4. 31; Inst. 4. 6. 30; Burge, Sur. bk. 2, c. 6, p. 181.

It takes place by mere operation of law, and extinguishes reciprocally the two debts as soon as they exist simultaneously, to the amount of their respective sums. It takes place only between two debts having equally for their object a sum of money, or a certain quantity of consumable things of one and the same kind, and which are equally liquidated and demandable. It takes place, whatever be the cause of the debts, except in case, first, of a demand of restitution of a thing of which the owner has been unjustly deprived; second, of a demand of restitution of a deposit and a loan for use; third, of a debt which has for its cause aliments declared not liable to seizure. Civ. Code La. arts. 2203-2208.

——In Old Criminal Law. Recrimination (q. v.)

COMPERENDINATIO. In the Roman law. The adjournment of a cause, in order to hear the parties or their advocates a second time; a second hearing of the parties to a cause. Calv. Lex.; Brissonius.

COMPERTORIUM. In the civil law. A judicial inquest made by delegates or commissioners to find out and relate the truth of a cause. Cowell.

COMPERUIT AD DIEM (Lat. he appeared at the day). In pleading. A plea in bar to an action of debt on a bail bond. The usual replication to this plea is nul tiel record, that there is not any such record of appearance of the said ———. For forms of this plea, see 5 Wentw. 470; Lilly, Entr. 114; 2 Chit. Pl. 527.

COMPETENCY. Qualification to act; capacity.

——In the Law of Evidence. The legal fitness or ability of a witness to be heard on the trial of a cause; that quality of written or other evidence which renders it proper to be given on the trial of a cause, if it be relevant to the issues therein. See "Relevancy."

There is a difference between competency and credibility. A witness may be competent, and, on examination, his story may be so contradictory and improbable that he may not be believed; on the contrary, he may be incompetent, and yet be perfectly credible if he were examined.

——In French Law. The right in a court to exercise jurisdiction in a particular case, as where the law gives jurisdiction to the court when a thousand francs shall be in dispute, the court is competent if the sum demanded is a thousand francs or upwards, although the plaintiff may ultimately recover less.

COMPETENT. Fit; qualified; lawful. Thus, "competent authority" is held to mean lawful authority (8 Pet. [U. S.] 449).

A "competent court," one having jurisdiction. 1 C. P. Div. 176.

COMPETENT AND OMITTED. In Scotch practice. A term applied to a plea which might have been urged by a party during the dependence of a cause, but which had been omitted. Bell, Dict.

COMPETENT WITNESS. One who is legally qualified to be heard to testify in a cause.

COMPETITION. In Scotch practice. The contest among creditors claiming on their respective diligences, or creditors claiming on their securities. Bell, Dict.

COMPILATION. A literary production, composed of the works of others, and arranged in a methodical manner.

When a compilation requires in its execution taste, learning, discrimination, and intellectual labor, it is an object of copyright: as, for example, Bacon's Abridgment. Curtis, Copyright, 186.

COMPLAINANT. One who makes a complaint. A plaintiff in a suit in chancery is so called.

COMPLAINT.

——In Criminal Law. The allegation made to a proper officer that some person, whether known or unknown, has been guilty of a designated offense, with an offer to prove the fact, and a request that the offender may be punished. It is a technical term, descriptive of proceedings before a magistrate. 11 Pick. (Mass.) 436.

——In Code Pleading. The plaintiff's first pleading in a civil action.

COMPLICE. An accomplice.

COMPOS MENTIS. See "Non Compos Mentis."

COMPOS SUI (Lat.) Having power of one's self; having the use of one's limbs, or the power of bodily motion. Si fuit ita compos sui quod itinerare potuit de loco in locum, if he had so far the use of his limbs as to be able to travel from place to place. Bracton, fol. 14b.

COMPOSITIO MENSURARUM. The ordinance of measures; the title of an ancient ordinance, not printed, mentioned in St. 23 Hen. VIII. c. 4, establishing a standard of measures. 1 Bl. Comm. 275.

COMPOSITIO ULNARUM ET PERTICArum. The statute of ells and perches. The title of an English statute establishing a standard of measures. 1 Bl. Comm. 275.

COMPOSITION. An agreement, made upon a sufficient consideration, between a debtor and creditor, by which the creditor accepts part of the debt due to him in satisfaction of the whole.

Generally applied to agreements between a debtor and several or all of his creditors.

——In Ancient Law. Compensation for crime; weregild.

COMPOSITION IN BANKRUPTCY. An agreement by the creditors of a bankrupt to receive a certain percentum of their claims in full satisfaction.

The national bankrupt act provides for such compositions, requiring a formal offer of composition by the bankrupt, a creditors' meeting to consider the same, and, if accepted by a majority both in number and amount of claims, an application for confirmation by the court. Loveland, Bankr. §§ 241-253.

COMPOSITION OF TITHES. Sometimes called "real composition." An agreement by a land owner with the incumbent, whereby the land is discharged from liability for tithes in consideration of some land or other real recompense given in lieu thereof. 2 Steph. Comm. 727.

COMPOTARIUS. In old English law. A party accounting. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 71, § 17.

COMPOUNDING A FELONY. The act of a party immediately aggrieved, who agrees with a thief or other felon that he will not prosecute him, on condition that he return to him the goods stolen, or who takes a reward not to prosecute.

It is not necessary that the person with whom the composition was made should be guilty of the alleged felony (42 Ohio St. 405; 13 Wend. [N. Y.] 592), nor that the consideration for the compounding was received for the benefit of another (58 Iowa, 151).

Though, at common law, the offense was restricted to the composition of felonies, the composition of misdemeanors is made penal in most of the United States.

COMPRA Y VENTA (Spanish). Buying and selling. The laws of contracts arising from purchase and sale are given very fully in Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. xviii. 11. 56 et seq.

COMPRINT. The surreptitious printing of the copy of another to the intent to make a gain thereby. Strictly, it signifies to print together. There are several old statutes prohibiting this act. Jacob; Cowell.

COMPRIRIGUI (Lat.) Step-brothers or step-sisters; children who have one parent, and only one, in common. Calv. Lex.

COMPRIVIGNI. In the civil law. Children by a former marriage (individually called "privigni," or "privignae"), considered relatively to each other. Thus, the son of a husband by a former wife, and the daughter of a wife by a former husband, are the comprivigni of each other. Inst. 1. 10. 8.

COMPROMISARIUS. In civil law. An arbitrator.

COMPROMISE. An agreement made between two or more parties as a settlement of matters in dispute between them.

——In Civil Law. An agreement between two or more persons, who, wishing to settle their disputes, refer the matter in controversy to arbitrators, who are so called because those who choose them give them full powers to arbitrate and decide what shall appear just and reasonable, to put an end to the differences of which they are made the judges. 1 Domat, Civ. Law, liv. 1, tit. 14.

COMPROMISSARII SUNT JUDICES. Arbitrators are judges. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 128.

COMPROMISSARIUS. In the civil law. An arbitrator. Dig. 4. 9. 41.

COMPROMISSUM. In the civil law. A submission to arbitration. Dig. 4. 8; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 13.

COMPROMISSUM AD SIMILITUDINEM judiciorum redigitur. A compromise is brought into affinity with judgments. 9 Cush. (Mass.) 571.

COMPTER. In Scotch law. An accounting party. Skene de Verb. Sign.

The name of a prison in London.

COMPTROLLER. An officer of a state, or of the United States, who has certain duties to perform in the regulation and management of the fiscal matters of the government under which he holds office.

COMPULSION. Forcible inducement to the commission of an act.

COMPULSORY. In ecclesiastical procedure. A compulsory is a kind of writ to compel the attendance of a witness, to undergo examination. Phillim. Ecc. Law, 1258.

COMPURGATOR. One of several neighbors of a person accused of a crime, or charged as a defendant in a civil action, who appeared and swore that they believed him on his oath. 3 Bl. Comm. 341.

COMPUTUS (Lat. computare, to account). A writ to compel a guardian, bailiff, receiver, or accountant to yield up his accounts. It is founded on St. Westminster II. c. 12; Reg. Orig. 135.

COMTE (Fr.; Lat. comes). Count. A title of office in the ancient law of France, denoting a governor of a particular territory or district, who united the characters of a military leader and a judge. As a judge, he had an equal jurisdiction with the missus dominicus, or king's commissary. Esprit des Lois, liv. 28, c. 28; Id. liv. 30, c. 18. As a military officer, he commanded the freemen, and led them to the field. Id. liv. 30, cc. 17, 18. Montesquieu says he was at the head of all the freemen of the monarchy. Id. liv. 31, c. 23. See, also, Id. liv. 30, c. 18; Id. liv. 31, c. 1. The comte was subordinate to the duc (duke). Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 1, § 8. See "Comes;" "Count."

In later times, a title of nobility. Boulainvilliers Etat de la France, iii. 56; Barr. Obs. St. 31.

CON BUENA FE. In Spanish law. With good faith; in good faith; bona fide. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 2, c. 8.

CONACRE. In Irish practice. The payment of wages in land, the rent being worked out in labor at a money valuation. Wharton.

CONATUS QUID SIT, NON DEFINITUR in jure. What an attempt is, is not defined in law. 2 Bulst. 277.

CONCEALERS. Such as find out concealed lands; that is, lands privily kept from the king by common persons having nothing to show for them. They are called "a troublesome, disturbant sort of men; turbulent persons." Cowell.

CONCEALMENT. The improper suppression of any fact or circumstance by one of the parties to a contract from the other, which in justice ought to be known.

The omission by an applicant for insurance preliminarily to state facts known to him, or which he is bound to know, material to the risk proposed to be insured against, or omission to state truly the facts expressly inquired about by the underwriters to whom application for insurance is made, whether the same are or are not material to the risk. See 12 Cush. (Mass.) 416.

CONCEPTUM. In the civil law. A theft (furtum) was called "conceptum" when the thing stolen was searched for, and found upon some person in the presence of witnesses. Inst. 4. 1. 4.

CONCESSI (Lat. I have granted). A term formerly used in deeds.

It is a word of general extent, and is said to amount to a grant, feoffment, lease, release, and the like. 2 Saund. 96; Co. Litt. 301, 302; Dane, Abr. Index; 5 Whart. (Pa.) 278.

It has been held in a feoffment or fine to imply no warranty. Co. Litt. 384; 4 Coke, 80; Vaughan's Argument in Vaughan, 126; Butler's Note, Co. Litt. 384. But see 1 Freem. 339, 414.

CONCESSIMUS (Lat. we have granted). A term used in conveyances. It created a joint covenant on the part of the grantors. 5 Coke, 16; 3 Keb. 617; Bac. Abr. "Covenant."

CONCESSIO. In old English law. A grant; one of the old common assurances, or forms of conveyance, being properly of things incorporeal which cannot pass by deed. 2 Bl. Comm. 317.

CONCESSIO PER REGEM FIERI DEBET de certitudine. A grant by the king ought to be a grant of a certainty. 9 Coke, 46.

CONCESSIO VERSUS CONCEDENTEM latam interpretationem habere debet. A grant ought to have a liberal interpretation against the grantor. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 279.

CONCESSION. A grant. The word is frequently used in this sense when applied to grants made by the French and Spanish governments in Louisiana.

CONCESSIT SOLVERE. A form of action of debt on simple contract which lies by custom in the mayor's courts of London and Bristol. The declaration is to the effect that the defendant on a fictitious date, in consideration of divers fictitious sums of money before that time due and owing from him to the plaintiff, and then in arrear and unpaid, granted and agreed to pay (concessit solvere) to the plaintiff the sum sued for, but has not done so.

CONCESSOR. A grantor.

CONCESSUS. A grantee.

CONCILIABULUM. A council house. Towns. Pl. 184.

CONCILIUM. A council.

——Concilium Ordinarium. In Anglo-Norman times, an executive and residuary judicial committee of the aula regis (q. v.)

——Concilium Regis. A tribunal which existed in England during the times of Edward I. and Edward II., composed of the judges and sages of the law. To them were referred cases of great difficulty. Co. Litt. 304.

CONCLUSION (Lat. con claudere, to shut together). The close; the end.

——In Pleading. In declarations, that part which follows the statement of the cause of action. In personal or mixed actions, where the object is to recover damages, the conclusion is, properly, to the damage of the plaintiff, etc. Comyn, Dig. "Pleader," c. 84; 10 Coke, 1156.

The form was anciently, in the king's bench, "To the damage of the said A. B., and thereupon he brings suit;" in the exchequer, "To the damage," etc., "whereby he is the less able to satisfy our said lord the king the debts which he owes his said majesty at his exchequer, and therefore he brings his suit." 1 Chit. Pl. 356-358.

In pleas, the conclusion is either to the country,—which must be the case when an issue is tendered, that is, whenever the plaintiff's material statements are contradicted,—or by verification, which must be the case when new matter is introduced. Every plea in bar, it is said, must have its proper conclusion. All the formal parts of pleadings have been much modified by statute in the various states and in England within the last few years.

——In Practice. Making the last argument or address to the court or jury. The party on whom the onus probandi is cast, in general, has the conclusion.

——In Remedies. An estoppel; a bar; the act of a man by which he has confessed a matter or thing which he can no longer deny. For example, the sheriff is concluded by his return to a writ, and therefore, if upon a capias he return cepi corpus, he cannot afterwards show that he did not arrest the defendant, but is concluded by his return. See Plowd. 276b; 3 Thomas, Co. Litt. 600.

CONCLUSION TO THE COUNTRY. In pleading. The tender of an issue for trial by a jury. When the issue is tendered by the defendant, it is as follows: "And of this the said C. D. puts himself upon the country." When tendered by the plaintiff, the formula is, "And this the said A. B. prays may be inquired of by the country." It is held, however, that there is no material difference between these two modes of expression, and that if the one be substituted for the other the mistake is unimportant. 10 Mod. 166.

CONCLUSIVE EVIDENCE. That which cannot be controlled or contradicted by any other evidence.

CONCLUSIVE PRESUMPTION. A rule of law determining the quantity of evidence requisite for the support of a particular averment which is not permitted to be overcome by any proof that the fact is otherwise. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 15. Thus, for example, the possession of land under claim of title for a certain period of time raises a conclusive presumption of a grant.

In the civil law, such presumptions are said to be juris et de jure.

CONCORD. An agreement, or supposed agreement, between the parties in levying a fine of lands, in which the deforciant (or he who keeps the other out of possession) acknowledges that the lands in question are the right of the complainant, and from the acknowledgment or admission of right thus made, the party who levies the fine is called the "cognizor," and the person to whom it is levied, the "cognizee." 2 Bl. Comm. 350; Cruise, Dig. tit. 35, c. 2, § 33; Comyn, Dig. "Fine" (E 9).

CONCORDARE LEGES LEGIBUS EST optimus interpretandi modus. To make laws agree with laws is the best mode of interpreting them. Halk. Max. 70.

CONCORDAT. A convention; a pact; an agreement. The term is generally confined to the agreements made between independent governments, and most usually applied to those between the pope and some prince.

CONCORDIA (Lat.) In old English law. An agreement, or concord. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 3, § 5. The agreement or unanimity of a jury, compellere ad concordiam. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 9, § 2.

CONCORDIA DISCORDANTIUM CANONUM. The harmony of the discordant canons. A collection of ecclesiastical constitutions made by Gratian, an Italian monk, A. D. 1151; more commonly known by the name of decretum gratiani. 1 Bl. Comm. 82.

CONCORDIA PARVAE RES CRESCUNT et opulentia lites. Small means increase by concord, and litigations by opulence. Coke, 4th Inst. 74.

CONCUBARIA. A fold, pen, or place where cattle lie. Cowell.

CONCUBEANT. Lying together.

CONCUBINAGE. A species of marriage which took place among the ancients, and which is yet in use in some countries. See "Concubinatus."

The act or practice of cohabiting, in sexual commerce, without the authority of law or a legal marriage. See 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 80; Merlin, Repert.; Dig. 32. 49. 4; Id. 7. 1. 1; Code, 5. 27. 12.

CONCUBINATUS. A natural marriage, as contradistinguished from the justae nuptiae, or justum matrimonium, the civil marriage.

The concubinatus was the only marriage which those who did not enjoy the jus connubii could contract. Although this natural marriage was authorized and regulated by law, yet it produced none of those important rights which flowed from the civil marriage, such as the paternal power, etc.; nor was the wife entitled to the honorable appellation of mater-familias, but was designated by the name of concubina. After the exclusive and aristocratic rules relative to the connubium had been relaxed, the concubinatus fell into disrepute and the law permitting it was repealed by a constitution of the Emperor Leo, the Philosopher, in the year 886 of the Christian era. See "Pater-Familias."

CONCUBINE. A woman who cohabits with a man as his wife, without being married.

CONCUR. In Louisiana. To claim a part of the estate of an insolvent along with other claimants (6 Mart. [La.; N. S.] 460); as "the wife concurs with her husband's creditors, and claims a privilege over them."

CONCURRENCE. In French law. The equality of rights, or privilege which several persons have over the same thing; as, for example, the right which two judgment creditors, whose judgments were rendered at the same time, have to be paid out of the proceeds of real estate bound by them. Dict. de Jur.

CONCURRENT. Running together; having the same authority. Thus, we say, a concurrent consideration occurs in the case of mutual promises; such and such courts have concurrent jurisdiction,—that is, each has the same jurisdiction.

CONCURRENT SENTENCES. Such as, being passed on a conviction for several crimes, are computed as beginning simultaneously and running concurrently. See "Cumulative Sentences."

CONCURRENT WRIT. In English practice. A copy of the original writ of summons issued in an action, the very date being the same, the seal bears the word "concurrent" on it, and shows the date when the concurrent seal was impressed, i. e., issued.

A concurrent writ is frequently issued for service out of the jurisdiction. Brown.

CONCURSUS (Lat. from concurrere). In the civil law. A running together; a meeting or concurrence. Concursus creditorum, the conflict or conflicting rights of creditors, in relation to their liens, privileges, and priorities, in cases of insolvency and other cases. Story, Confl. Laws, 325c, 433a.

CONCUSS. In Scotch law. To coerce. Shaw, 322.

CONCUSSIO. In civil law. The offense of extortion by threats of violence. Dig. 47. 13.

CONCUSSION. In civil law. The unlawful forcing of another by threats of violence to give something of value. It differs from robbery in this, that in robbery the thing is taken by force, while in concussion it is obtained by threatened violence. Heinec. Lec. Elm. § 1071.

CONDEDIT. In ecclesiastical law. The name of a plea entered by a party to a libel filed in the ecclesiastical court, in which it is pleaded that the deceased made the will which is the subject of the suit, and that he was of sound mind. 2 Ecc. 438; 6 Ecc. 431.

CONDEMN. To sentence; to adjudge. 3 Bl. Comm. 291.

To declare a vessel a prize; to declare a vessel unfit for service. 1 Kent, Comm. 102; 5 Esp. 65.

To take by exercise of the power of eminent domain.

CONDEMNATION.

——In Admiralty. The sentence of a competent tribunal which declares a ship unfit for service. This sentence may be re-examined and litigated by the parties interested in disputing it. 5 Esp. 65; Abb. Shipp. 4.

The judgment, sentence or decree by which property seized and subject to forfeiture for an infraction of revenue, navigation, or other laws is condemned or forfeited to the government. See "Captor."

The sentence or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, that a ship or vessel taken as a prize on the high seas was liable to capture, and was properly and legally captured and held as prize.

——In Civil Law. A sentence or judgment which condemns some one to do, to give, or to pay something, or which declares that his claim or pretensions are unfounded.

——In Criminal Law. The word is used in this sense by common-law lawyers also, though it is more usual to say "conviction." 3 Bl. Comm. 291. It is a maxim that no man ought to be condemned unheard, and without the opportunity of being heard.

CONDEMNATION MONEY. In practice. The damages which the party failing in an action is adjudged or condemned to pay; sometimes simply called the "condemnation." 3 Bl. Comm. 291. It answers to the judicatum of the civil law. Id. 291, 292.

CONDESCENDENCE. In the Scotch law. A part of the proceedings in a cause, setting forth the facts of the case on the part of the pursuer or plaintiff.

CONDICTIO (Lat. from condicere). In civil law. An assignment; a summons.

A personal action; an action arising from an obligation to do or give some certain, precise, and defined thing. Inst. 3. 15. pr.

Condictio is a general name given to personal actions, or actions arising from obligations, and is distinguished from vindicatio (real action), an action to regain possession of a thing belonging to the actor, and from mixed actions (actiones mixtae). Condictio is also distinguished from an action ex stipulatu, which is a personal action which lies where the thing to be done or given is uncertain in amount or identity. See Calv. Lex.; Halifax, Anal. 117.

——Condictio Certi. An action which lies upon a promise to do a thing, where such promise or stipulation is certain, si certa sit stipulatio. Inst. 3. 16. pr.; Id. 3. 15. pr.; Dig. 12. 1; Bracton, fol. 103b; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60, § 23.

——Condictio ex Lege. An action arising where the law gave a remedy, but provided no appropriate form of action. Calv. Lex.

——Condictio Indebitati. An action which lies to recover that which the plaintiff has paid to the defendant, by mistake, and which he was not bound to pay, either in fact or in law.

This action does not lie if the money was due ex aequitate, or by a natural obligation, or if he who made the payment knew that nothing was due; for qui consulto dat, quod non debetat, praesumitur donare. Bell, Dict.; Calv. Lex.; 1 Kames, Eq. 307.

——Condictio Rei Furtivae. An action against the thief or his heir to recover the thing stolen.

——Condictio Sine Causa. An action by which anything which has been parted with without consideration may be recovered. It also lay in case of failure of consideration, under certain circumstances. Calv. Lex.

CONDITIO (Lat.) A condition. Bracton, fols. 19, 47.

CONDITIO BENEFICIALIS, QUAE STATum, construit, benigne, secundum verborum intentionem est interpretanda; odiosa autem, quae statum destruit, stricte, secundum verborum proprietatem, accipienda. A beneficial condition, which creates an estate, ought to be construed favorably, according to the intention of the words; but an odious condition, which destroys an estate, ought to be construed strictly, according to the letter of the words. 8 Coke, 90; Shep. Touch. 134.

CONDITIO DICITUR, CUM QUID IN casum incertum qui potest tendere ad esse aut non esse, confertur. It is called a condition when something is given on an uncertain event, which may or may not come into existence. Co. Litt. 201.

CONDITIO ILLICITA HABETUR PRO non adjicta. An unlawful condition is deemed as not annexed.

CONDITIO PRAECEDENS ADIMPLERI debet priusquam sequatur effectus. A condition precedent must be fulfilled before the effect can follow. Co. Litt. 201.

CONDITION.

——In Civil Law. The situation of every person in some one of the different orders of persons which compose the general order of society, and allot to each person therein a distinct, separate rank. Domat, Civ. Law, tom. ii. lib. 1, tit. 9, § i. art. viii.

A paction or agreement which regulates that which the contractors have a mind should be done if a case which they foresee should come to pass. Domat, Civ. Law, tom. i. lib. 1, tit. 1, § 4.

Domat says conditions are of three sorts. The first tend to accomplish the covenants to which they are annexed. The second dissolve covenants. The third neither accomplish nor avoid, but create, some change. When a condition of the first sort comes to pass, the covenant is thereby made effectual. In case of conditions of the second sort, all things remain in the condition they were in by the covenant, and the effect of the condition is in suspense until the condition comes to pass and the covenant is void. Domat, Civ. Law, lib. i. tit. 1, § 4, art. 6 et seq. See Poth Obl. pt. 1, c. 2, art. 1, § 1; Id. pt. ii. c. 3, art. 2.

(1) Casual conditions are such as depend upon accident, and are in no wise in the power of the person in whose favor the obligation is entered into.

(2) Mixed conditions are such as depend upon the joint wills of the person in whose favor the obligation is contracted, and of a third person; as, "If you marry my cousin, I will give," etc. Poth. Obl.

(3) Potestative conditions are those which are in the power of the person in whose favor the obligation was contracted; as, if I contract to give my neighbor a sum of money in case he cuts down a tree.

(4) Resolutory conditions are those which are added not to suspend the obligation till their accomplishment, but to make it cease when they are accomplished.

(5) Suspensive obligations are those which suspend the obligation until the performance of the condition. They are casual, mixed, or potestative.

——In Common Law. The status or relative situation of a person in the state arising from the regulations of society. Thus, a person under twenty-one is an infant, with certain privileges and disabilities. Every person is bound to know the condition of the person with whom he deals.

A qualification, restriction, or limitation modifying or destroying the original act with which it is connected.

A clause in a contract or agreement intended to suspend, rescind, or modify the principal obligation, or, in case of a will, to suspend, revoke, or modify the devise or bequest. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 730.

A modus or quality annexed by him that hath an estate, or interest or right to the same, whereby an estate, etc., may either be defeated, enlarged, or created upon an uncertain event. Co. Litt. 201a.

A qualification or restriction annexed to a conveyance of lands, whereby it is provided that in case a particular event does or does not happen, or in case the grantor or grantee does or omits to do a particular act, an estate shall commence, be enlarged, or be defeated. Greenl. Cruise, Dig. tit. xiii. c. i. § 1.

A future uncertain event, on the happening or the nonhappening of which the accomplishment, modification, or rescission of a testamentary disposition is made to depend.

(1) Affirmative conditions are positive conditions. Affirmative conditions implying a negative are spoken of by the older writers, but no such class is now recognized. Shep. Touch. 117.

(2) Collateral conditions are those which require the doing of a collateral act. Shep. Touch. 117.

(3) Compulsory conditions are such as expressly require a thing to be done.

(4) Repugnant or insensible conditions are those inconsistent with the original act.

(5) Consistent conditions are those which agree with the other parts of the transaction.

(6) Copulative conditions are those which are composed of distinct parts or separate conditions, all of which must be performed. They are generally conditions precedent, but may be subsequent. Powell, Dev. c. 15.

(7) Disjunctive conditions are those which require the doing of one of several things. If a condition become impossible in the copulative, it may be taken in the disjunctive. Viner, Abr. "Condition" (S b) (Y b 2).

(8) Single conditions are those which require the doing of a single act only.

(9) Restrictive conditions are such as contain a restraint, as that a lessee shall not alien.

(10) Lawful conditions are those which the law allows to be made.

(11) Unlawful conditions are those which the law forbids.

(12) Independent conditions are those, each of which must be performed without regard to the performance of the others.

(13) Dependent conditions are those the failure of performance of one of which excuses performance of the others.

(14) Express conditions are those which are created by express words. Co. Litt. 328. Express conditions are also known as "conditions in deed."

(15) Implied conditions are those which the law supposes the parties to have had in mind at the time the transaction was entered into, though no condition was expressed. Implied conditions are also known as "covert conditions," or "conditions in law," but the latter term is little used by modern writers. 2 Bl. Comm. 155.

(16) Impossible conditions are those which cannot be performed in the course of nature.

(17) Possible conditions are those which may be performed.

(18) Inherent conditions are such as are annexed to the rent reserved out of the land whereof the estate is made. Shep. Touch. 118.

(19) Precedent conditions are those which are to be performed before the estate or the obligation commences, or the bequest takes effect. Powell, Dev. c. 15. A bond to convey land on the payment of the purchase money furnishes a common example of a condition precedent. 9 Cush. (Mass.) 95. They are distinguished from conditions subsequent.

(20) Subsequent conditions are those whose effect is not produced until after the vesting of the estate or bequest, or the commencement of the obligation.

"Where a condition must be performed before the estate can commence, it is called a 'condition precedent;' but when the effect of the condition is to enlarge or defeat the estate already created, it is then called a 'condition subsequent.'" 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 440.

A condition subsequent determines an estate after breach upon entry or claim by the proper person; as, limitation marks the period which ipso facto determines an estate. 3 Gray (Mass.) 143.

CONDITIONAL FEE. A fee which, at the common law, was restrained to some particular heirs, exclusive of others. It was called a conditional fee by reason of the condition, expressed or implied in the donation of it, that, if the donee died without such particular heirs, the land should revert to the donor. For this was a condition annexed by law to all grants whatsoever, that, on failure of the heirs specified in the grant, the grant should be at an end, and the land return to its ancient proprietor. 2 Bl. Comm. 110.

CONDITIONAL LEGACY. A bequest whose existence depends upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, by which it is either to take place or to be defeated. 1 Rop. Leg. (3d Ed.) 645.

CONDITIONAL LIMITATION. A condition followed by a limitation over to a third person in case the condition be not fulfilled, or there be a breach of it.

A condition determines an estate after breach, upon entry or claim by the proper person. A limitation marks the period which determines an estate without any act on the part of him who has the next expectant interest. A conditional limitation is therefore of a mixed nature, partaking of that of a condition and a limitation. Bigelow, J., 3 Gray (Mass.) 143. The limitation over need not be to a stranger. 2 Bl. Comm. 155; 11 Metc. (Mass. 102; Watk. Conv. 204.

It is distinguished from an estate on condition subsequent by the fact that, on breach of a conditional limitation, the estate terminates ipso facto. 1 Steph. Comm. 310.

CONDITIONAL OBLIGATION. An obligation subject to a condition.

——In Louisiana. An implied obligation. See 2 La. Ann. 989, 991.

CONDITIONAL STIPULATION. A stipulation on condition.

CONDITIONES QUAELIBET ODIOSAE; maxime autem contra matrimonium et commercium. Any conditions are odious, but especially those against matrimony and commerce. Lofft, 644.

CONDITIONS OF SALE. The terms upon which the vendor of property by auction proposes to sell it.

The instrument containing these terms, when reduced to writing or printing.

CONDOMINIA. In civil law. Co-ownerships or limited ownerships, such as emphyteusis, superficies, pignus, hypotheca, usus-fructus, usus, and habitatio. These were more than mere jura in re aliena, being portion of the dominium itself, although they are commonly distinguished from the dominium strictly so called. Brown.

CONDONACION. A Spanish law term, signifying the remission of a debt.

CONDONATION. The conditional forgiveness or remission, by a husband or wife, of a matrimonial offense which the other has committed.

Condonation is the remission by one of the named parties of an offense which he knows the other has committed, on the condition, implied where it is not expressed, of being continually afterwards treated by the other with conjugal kindness. 2 Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. § 269.

Condonation may be either express or implied (27 Ind. 186), as by continued matrimonial cohabitation after knowledge of the offense (13 N. J. Eq. 81).

CONDUCT MONEY. In English practice. Money paid to a witness who has been subpoenaed on a trial, sufficient to defray the reasonable expenses of going to, staying at, and returning from the place of trial. Lush, Com. Law Prac. 460; Archb. New Prac. 639.

CONDUCTI ACTIO. See "Actio ex Conducto."

CONDUCTIO (Lat.) A hiring; a bailment for hire.

It is the correlative of locatio, a letting for hire. Conducti actio, in the civil law, is an action which the hirer of a thing or his heir had against the latter or his heir to be allowed to use the thing hired. Conducere, to hire a thing. Conductor, a hirer, a carrier; one who undertakes to perform labor on another's property for a specified sum. Conductus, the thing hired. Calv. Lex.; Du Cange; 2 Kent, Comm. 586.

CONE. See "Colne."

CONE AND KEY. A woman at fourteen or fifteen years of age may take charge of her house, and receive cone and key,—that is, keep the accounts and keys. Cowell. Said by Lord Coke to be "cover and keye," meaning that at that age a woman knew what in her house should be kept under lock and key. Coke, 2d Inst. 203.

CONFARREATIO. In Roman law. A sacrificial rite resorted to by marrying persons of high patrician or priestly degree, for the purpose of clothing the husband with the manus over his wife; the civil modes of effecting the same thing being coemptio (formal), and usus mulieris (informal). Brown.

CONFECTIO (Lat. from conficere). The making and completion of a written instrument. 5 Coke, 1.

CONFEDERACY.

——In Criminal Law. An agreement between two or more persons to do an unlawful act, or an act which, though not unlawful in itself, becomes so by the confederacy. The technical term usually employed to signify this offense is " conspiracy."

——In Equity Pleading. An improper combination alleged to have been entered into between the defendants to a bill in equity.

A general charge of confederacy is made a part of a bill in chancery, and is the fourth part, in order, of the bill, but it has become merely formal, except in cases where the complainant intends to show that such a combination actually exists or existed, in which case a special charge of such confederacy must be made. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 29, 30; Mitf. Eq. Pl. (Jeremy Ed.) 41; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 9.

——In International Law. An agreement between two or more states or nations, by which they unite for their mutual protection and good. This term is applied to such an agreement made between two independent nations, but it is also used to signify the union of different states of the same nation, as, the confederacy of the states.

CONFEDERATION. The name given to that form of government which the American colonies during the Revolution devised for their mutual safety and government.

CONFERENCE.

——In French Law. A similarity between two laws or two systems of laws.

——In International Law. Verbal explanations between the representatives of at least two nations, for the purpose of accelerating matters by avoiding the delays and other difficulties necessarily attending written communications.

——In Legislation. Mutual consultations by two committees appointed, one by each house of a legislature, in cases where the houses cannot agree in their action.

CONFESSIO FACTA IN JUDICIO OMNI probatione major est. A confession made in court is of greater effect than any proof. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 102.

CONFESSION. In criminal law. The voluntary declaration, made by a person who has committed a crime or misdemeanor, to another, of the agency or participation which he had in the same.

An admission or acknowledgment by a prisoner, when arraigned for an offense, that he committed the crime with which he is charged.

A confession is an admission of the criminal act, and is to be distinguished from "admissions" or "declarations" by the defendant of facts from which guilt may be inferred. 53 Iowa, 69; 17 Ill. 427.

Judicial confessions are those made before a magistrate or in court in the due course of legal proceedings.

Extrajudicial confessions are those made by the party elsewhere than before a magistrate or in open court. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 216.

CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE. In pleading. The admission in a pleading of the truth of the facts as stated in the pleading to which it is an answer, and the allegation of new and related matter of fact which destroys the legal effect of the facts so admitted. The plea and any of the subsequent pleadings may be by way of confession and avoidance, or, which is the same thing, "in" confession and avoidance. Pleadings in confession and avoidance must give color. See "Color;" 1 East, 212. They must admit the material facts of the opponent's pleading, either expressly in terms (Dyer, 171b), or in effect. They must conclude with a verification. 1 Saund. 103, note. For the form of statement, see Steph. Pl. 72, 79.

Pleas in confession and avoidance are either in justification and excuse, which go to show that the plaintiff never had any right of action, as, for example, son assault demesne, or in discharge, which go to show that his right has been released by some matter subsequent.

CONFESSOR. A priest of some Christian sect, who receives an account of the sins of his people, and undertakes to give them absolution of their sins. The common law does not recognize any such relation, at least so as to exempt or prevent the confessor from disclosing such communications as are made to him in this capacity, when he is called upon as a witness in a court of justice.

CONFESSORIA ACTIO. See "Actio Confessoria."

CONFESSUS IN JUDICIO PRO JUDIcato habetur et quodammodo sua sententia damnatur. A person who has confessed in court is deemed as having had judgment passed upon him, and, in a manner, is condemned by his own sentence. 11 Coke, 30. See Dig. 42. 2. 1.

CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS. Those statements with regard to any transaction made by one person to another during the continuance of some relation between them which calls for or warrants such communications.

At law, certain classes of such communications are held not to be proper subjects of inquiry in courts of justice, and the persons receiving them are excluded from disclosing them when called upon as witnesses, upon grounds of public policy; as communications between husband and wife, between attorney and client, or between priest and penitent.

CONFIRMARE EST ID QUOD PRIUS INfirmum fuit simul firmare. To confirm is to make firm what was before infirm. Co. Litt. 295.

CONFIRMARE NEMO POTEST PRIUSquam jus ei acciderit. No one can confirm before the right accrues to him. 10 Coke, 48.

CONFIRMATIO (Lat. confirmare). The conveyance of an estate, or the communication of a right that one hath in or unto lands or tenements, to another that hath the possession thereof, or some other estate therein, whereby a voidable estate is made sure and unavoidable, or whereby a particular estate is increased or enlarged. Shep. Touch. 311; 2 Bl. Comm. 325.

Confirmatio crescens tends and serves to increase or enlarge a rightful estate, and so to pass an interest.

Confirmatio diminuens tends or serves to diminish and abridge the services whereby the tenant holds.

Confirmatio perficiens tends and serves to confirm and make good a wrongful and defeasible estate, by adding the right to the possession or defeasible seisin, or to make a conditional estate absolute, by discharging the condition.

CONFIRMATIO CHARTARUM (Lat. confirmation of the charters). A statute passed in 25 Edw. I., whereby the Great Charter is declared to be allowed as the common law; all judgments contrary to it are declared void; copies of it are ordered to be sent to all cathedral churches, and read twice a year to the people; and sentence of excommunication is directed to be as constantly denounced against all those that, by word or deed or counsel, act contrary thereto, or in any degree infringe it. 1 Bl. Comm. 128.

CONFIRMATIO EST NULLA, UBI DONum praecedens est invalidum. A confirmation is null where the preceding gift is invalid. Co. Litt. 295; F. Moore, 764.

CONFIRMATIO OMNES SUPPLET DEfectus, licet id quod actum est ab initio non valuit. Confirmation supplies all defects, though that which has been done was not valid at the beginning. Co. Litt. 295b.

CONFIRMATIO PERFICIENS (Law Lat.) In old English law. A perfecting confirmation; a confirmation which tends and serves to confirm and make good a wrongful and defeasible estate, by adding the right to the possession, or defeasible seisin, or to make a conditional estate absolute, by discharging the condition. Shep. Touch. (by Preston) 311.

CONFIRMATION. A contract by which that which was voidable is made firm and unavoidable.

A conveyance, whereby a voidable estate previously granted is made firm.

Ratification of an official act by a person or body having a supervisory jurisdiction; as confirmation of a referee's report by the court; confirmation of a sheriff's sale; confirmation by the legislative body of an appointment by the executive.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. Ratification by the archbishop of the election of a bishop by the dean and chapter. Wharton.

CONFIRMAT USUM QUI TOLLIT ABUSum. He confirms a use who removes an abuse. F. Moore, 764.

CONFIRMAVI (Lat.) I have confirmed. Used in ancient deeds of confirmation.

CONFIRMEE. He to whom a confirmation is made.

CONFIRMOR. He who makes a confirmation to another.

CONFISCARE. To confiscate.

CONFISCATE. To appropriate to the use of the state. Especially used of the goods and property of alien enemies found in a state in time of war. 1 Kent, Comm. 52 et seq. Bona confiscata and forisfacta are said to be the same (1 Bl. Comm. 299), and the result to the individual is the same whether the property be forfeited or confiscated; but, as distinguished, an individual forfeits, a state confiscates, goods or other property. Used also as an adjective,—forfeited. 1 Bl. Comm. 299.

Confiscation is to be distinguished from a proceeding in prize. "Confiscation is the act of the sovereign against a rebellious subject; condemnation as prize is the act of a belligerent against another belligerent." 14 Ct. Cl. Rep. 48.

CONFISK. An old form of confiscate. Finch, Law, bk. 3, c. 17.

CONFITENS REUS. An accused person who admits his guilt.

CONFLICT OF LAWS. A contrariety or opposition in the laws of states in those cases where, from their relations to each other, or to the subject-matter in dispute, the rights of the parties are liable to be affected by the laws of both jurisdictions.

An opposition or inconsistency of domestic laws upon the same subject.

As a term of art, it also includes the deciding which law is in such cases to have superiority. It also includes many cases where there is no opposition between two systems of law, but where the question is how much force may be allowed to a foreign law with reference to which an act has been done, either directly or by legal implication, in the absence of any domestic law exclusively applicable to the case.

CONFLICT OF PRESUMPTIONS. In this conflict, certain rules are applicable, viz.:

(1) Special take precedence of general presumptions; (2) constant of casual ones; (3) presume in favor of innocence; (4) of legality; (5) of validity; and, when these rules fail, the matter is said to be "at large." Brown.

CONFORMITY. In English ecclesiastical law. Adherence to the doctrines and usages of the Church of England.

CONFORMITY, BILL OF. See "Bill of Conformity."

CONFRAIRIE (Fr.) A fraternity, brotherhood, or society. Cowell.

CONFRONTATION. In practice. The act by which a witness is brought into the presence of the accused, so that the latter may object to him, if he can, and the former may know and identify the accused, and maintain the truth in his presence. No man can be a witness unless confronted with the accused, except by consent.

CONFUSIO (Lat. confundere). In civil law. A pouring together of liquids; a melting of metals; a blending together of an inseparable compound.

It is distinguished from commixtis by the fact that in the latter case a separation may be made, while in a case of confusio there cannot be. Bowyer, Comm. 88; 2 Bl. Comm. 405.

CONFUSION.

——In Common Law. The intermixture of the goods of two persons, so that the several portions can be no longer distinguished. 2 Bl. Comm. 405. The term, and, in a great degree, the doctrine, are borrowed from the confusio of the civil law. The meaning of the former, however, has been so far modified as to include not only the intermixture or interfusion of liquids and metals (the confusio proper of the civil law), but also that of dry articles (properly expressed in the same law by the term commixtio). The doctrines, also, of the two systems so far differ that, while the civil law allows a party who willfully intermixes his property with that of another, without his approbation or consent, a satisfaction for what he has so improvidently lost, the common law allows him nothing, but gives the entire property to the other party. 2 Bl. Comm. 405; Inst. 2. 1. 28; 2 Steph. Comm. 85; 2 Kent, Comm. 364; U. S. Dig. It is the admixture of goods of the same kind, as distinguished from "accession," which is the union of materials of different kinds.

——In Civil Law. The blending or union of the characters of debtor and creditor in the same person; the union of the obligation of the debtor with the right of the creditor, which dissolves or extinguishes the former. Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. bk. 3, tit. 30, § 1006; Ersk. Inst. lib. e, tit. 4, § 23. Thus, where a woman obligee marries the obligor, the debt is extinguished. 1 Salk. 306.

CONFUSION OF RIGHTS. A union of the qualities of debtor and creditor in the same person. The effect of such a union is generally to extinguish the debt. 1 Salk. 306; Cro. Car. 551; 1 Ld. Raym. 515. See 5 Term R. 381; Comyn, Dig. "Baron et Feme" (D).

CONGE. In French law. A clearance; a species of passport or permission to navigate.

CONGE D'ACCORDER (Fr. leave to accord). A phrase used in the process of levying a fine. Upon the delivery of the original writ, one of the parties immediately asked for a conge d'accorder, or leave to agree with the plaintiff. Termes de la Ley; Cowell. See "Licentia Concordandi;" 2 Bl. Comm. 350.

CONGE D'EMPARLER (Fr. leave to imparl). The privilege of an imparlance (licentia loquendi). 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 299.

CONGE D'ESLIRE (Fr.) The king's permission royal to a dean and chapter in time of vacation to choose a bishop, or to an abbey or priory of his own foundation to choose the abbot or prior.

Originally, the king had free appointment of all ecclesiastical dignities whensoever they chanced to be void. Afterwards he made the election over to others, under certain forms and conditions, as, that at every vacation they should ask of the king conge d'eslire. Cowell; Termes de la Ley; 1 Bl. Comm. 379, 382.

CONGEABLE (Fr. conge, permission, leave). Lawful, or lawfully done, or done with permission; as, entry congeable, and the like. Litt. § 279.

CONGILDONES. In Saxon law. Fellow members of a guild. Spelman, voc "Geldum."

CONGIUS. An ancient measure containing about a gallon and a pint. Cowell; Blount.

CONGREGATION. A society of a number of persons who compose an ecclesiastical body.

In the ecclesiastical law, this term is used to designate certain bureaus at Rome, where ecclesiastical matters are attended to.

In the United States, by congregation is meant the members of a particular church who meet in one place to worship. See 2 Russ. 120.

It is a broader term than "communicants," including all who habitually meet together for worship. 11 N. Y. 243.

CONGRESS. An assembly of deputies convened from different governments to treat of peace or of other international affairs.

The name of the legislative body of the United States, composed of the senate and house of representatives. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 1.

CONJECTIO. In the civil law of evidence. A throwing together; presumption; the putting of things together, with the inference drawn therefrom. Matt. Pr. c. 1, note 43.

CONJECTIO CAUSAE. In civil law. A statement of the case; a brief synopsis of the case given by the advocate to the judge in opening the trial. Calv. Lex.

CONJECTURE. A slight degree of credence, arising from evidence too weak or too remote to cause belief. 1 Mascardus de Prob. quaest. 14, note 14.

An idea or notion founded on a probability, without any demonstration of its truth.

CONJOINTS. Persons married to each other. Story, Confl. Laws, § 71. Wolff. Dr. Nat. § 858.

CONJUGAL RIGHTS. Rights arising from the relation of husband and wife.

In England, a writ lies for restitution to conjugal rights in case of intentional desertion, including, perhaps, a refusal to consummate marriage, under some circumstances, but this remedy has never been adopted in the United States. Bish. Mar. & Div. § 503 et seq.; 3 Bl. Comm. 94.

CONJUGIUM. One of the names of marriage, among the Romans. Tayl. Civ. Law, 284.

CONJUNCT. In Scotch law. Joint, as applied to rights. Ersk. Inst. bk. 3, tit. 8, § 34; Bell, Dict.

Connected, as applied to persons. Bell, Dict.

CONJUNCTA. In civil law. Things joined together or united; as distinguished from disjuncta, things disjoined or separated. Dig. 50. 16. 53.

CONJUNCTIM (Lat.) In old English law. Jointly. Inst. 2. 20. 8; Bracton, fol. 19.

CONJUNCTIM ET DIVISIM (Law Lat.)

——In Old English Law. Jointly and severally. Bracton, fol. 19.

——In the Civil Law. Conjunctim et disjunctim and conjunctim et separatim were used.

CONJUNCTIO. In civil law. Conjunction; connection of words in a sentence. See Dig. 50. 16. 29. 142.

CONJUNCTIO MARITI ET FEMINAE est de jure naturae. The union of a man and a woman is of the law of nature.

CONJUNCTIVE. Connecting in a manner denoting union.

CONJURATIO.

——In Old English Law. A swearing together; an oath administered to several together; a combination or confederacy under oath. Cowell; Blount; Tomlin.

——In Old European Law. A compact of the inhabitants of a commune, or municipality, confirmed by their oaths to each other, and which was the basis of the commune. Steph. Lect. 119.

CONJURATION (Lat. a swearing together). A plot, bargain, or compact, made by a number of persons under oath, to do some public harm.

Personal conference with the devil or some evil spirit, to know any secret or effect any purpose.

CONJURATOR. In old English law. One who swears or is sworn with others; one bound by oath with others; a compurgator; a conspirator. Britt. 27, 120; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 47, § 6.

CONNIVANCE. An agreement or consent, indirectly given, that something unlawful shall be done by another.

A married party's corrupt consenting to evil conduct, of which afterwards he complains. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 203.

Connivance differs from condonation, though the same legal consequences may attend it. Connivance necessarily involves criminality on the part of the individual who connives; condonation may take place without imputing the slightest blame to the party who forgives the injury. Connivance must be the act of the mind before the offense has been committed; condonation is the result of a determination to forgive an injury which was not known until after it was inflicted. 3 Hagg. Ecc. 350.

An error of judgment not involving a willingness to have the delinquency committed is not connivance. 10 Jur. 829. Nor is a watching of the guilty parties, without interference. 109 Mass. 408.

CONNOISSEMENT. In French law. An instrument, signed by the master of a ship or his agent, containing a description of the goods loaded on a ship, the persons who have sent them, the persons to whom they were sent, and the undertaking to transport them. A bill of lading. Guyot, Rep. Univ.; Ord. de la Mar. lib. 3, tit 2, art. 1.

CONNUBIUM (Lat.) A lawful marriage.

CONOCIAMENTO. In Spanish law. A recognizance. White, New Recop. bk. 3, tit. 7, c. 5, § 3.

CONOCIMIENTO. In Spanish law. A bill of lading. In the Mediterranean ports it is called poliza de cargamiento. For the requisites of this instrument, see Code Comm. Spain, arts. 799-811.

CONPOSSESSIO. In modern civil law. A joint possession. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 245.

CONQUEREUR. In Norman and old English law. The first purchaser of an estate; he who first brought an estate into his family. 2 Bl. Comm. 243.

CONQUEROR. In old English and Scotch law. Same as "conquereur."

CONQUEST (Lat. conquiro, to seek for).

——In Feudal Law. Purchase; any means of obtaining an estate out of the usual course of inheritance.

The estate itself so acquired.

According to Blackstone and Sir Henry Spelman, the word in its original meaning was entirely dissociated from any connection with the modern idea of military subjugation, but was used solely in the sense of purchase.

——In International Law. The acquisition of the sovereignty of a country by force of arms, exercised by an independent power which reduces the vanquished to the submission of its empire.

CONQUETS. In French law. The name given to every acquisition which the husband and wife, jointly or severally, make during the conjugal community. Thus, whatever is acquired by the husband and wife, either by his or her industry or good fortune, inures to the extent of one-half for the benefit of the other. Merlin, Repert; Merlin, Quest. In Louisiana, these gains are called aquets. Civ. Code La. art. 2369. The conquets by a former marriage may not be settled on a second wife to prejudice the heirs. 2 Low. (U. S.) 175.

CONQUISITIO. In feudal and old English law. Acquisition. Spelman, voc. "Conquestus;" 2 Bl. Comm. 242.

CONQUISITOR. In feudal law. A purchaser, acquirer, or conqueror. 2 Bl. Comm. 242, 243.

CONSANGUINEOUS FRATER. A brother who has the same father. 2 Bl. Comm. 231.

CONSANGUINEUS. One within the degrees of consanguinity.

CONSANGUINEUS EST QUASI EODEM sanguine natus. A person related by consanguinity is, as it were, sprung from the same blood. Co. Litt. 157.

CONSANGUINITY (Lat. consanguis, blood together). The relation subsisting among all the different persons descending from the same stock or common ancestor.

——Collateral Consanguinity. The relation subsisting among persons who descend from the same common ancestor, but not one from the other. It is essential, to constitute this relation, that they spring from the same common root or stock, but in different branches.

The mode of computing degrees of collateral consanguinity at the common and by the canon law is to discover the common ancestor, to begin with him to reckon downwards, and the degree the two persons, or the more remote of them, is distant from the ancestor, is the degree of kindred subsisting between them. For instance, two brothers are related to each other in the first degree, because from the father to each of them is one degree. An uncle and a nephew are related to each other in the second degree, because the nephew is two degrees distant from the common ancestor; and the rule of computation is extended to the remotest degrees of collateral relationship.

The method of computing by the civil law is to begin at either of the persons in question, and count up to the common ancestor, and then downwards to the other person, calling it a degree for each person, both ascending and descending, and the degrees they stand from each other is the degree in which they stand related. Thus, from a nephew to his father is one degree; to the grandfather, two degrees; and then to the uncle, three; which points out the relationship.

The mode of the civil law is preferable, for it points out the actual degree of kindred in all cases. By the mode adopted by the common law, different relations may stand in the same degree. The uncle and nephew stand related in the second degree by the common law, and so are two first cousins, or two sons of two brothers; but by the civil law the uncle and nephew are in the third degree, and the cousins are in the fourth. The mode of computation, however, is immaterial, for both will establish the same person to be the heir. 2 Bl. Comm. 202. See "Descent;" "Line."

——Lineal Consanguinity. That relation which exists among persons where one is descended from the other, as between the son and the father, or the grandfather, and so upwards in a direct ascending line, and between the father and the son, or the grandson, and so downwards in a direct descending line.

In computing the degree of lineal consanguinity existing betwen two persons, every generation in the direct course of relationship between the two parties makes a degree, and the rule is the same by the canon, civil, and common law.

CONSCIENCE. Internal or self knowledge or judgment of right or wrong. It is not identical with "principle." An "objection on principle" to the death penalty is not the same as a conscientious scruple. 7 Cal. 140.

CONSCIENCE, COURTS OF. Courts, not of record, constituted by act of parliament in the city of London, and other towns, for the recovery of small debts; otherwise and more commonly called "Courts of Requests." 3 Steph. Comm. 451.

CONSCIENTIA DICITUR A CON ET scio, quasi scire cum Deo. Conscience is called from con and scio, to know, as it were, with God. 1 Coke, 100.

CONSECRATIO EST PERIODUS ELECtionis; electio est praeambula consecrationis. Consecration is the termination of election; election is the preamble of consecration. 2 Rolle, Abr. 102.

CONSEIL DE FAMILLE. A council of the family. In French law, certain acts require the sanction of this body. For example, a guardian can neither accept nor reject an inheritance to which the minor has succeeded without his authority (Code Nap.

461); nor can he accept for the child a gift inter vivos without the like authority (Id. 463). So, also, in bringing or compromising a suit on behalf of the child, or generally in compounding claims, and in numerous personal relations, e. g., consent to marriages of orphans, the authority of this body is necessary.

CONSEIL JUDICIAIRE. In French law. When a person has been subjected to an interdiction on the ground of his insane extravagance, but the interdiction is not absolute, but limited only, the court of first instance, which grants the interdiction, appoints a council, called by this name, with whose assistance the party may bring or defend actions, or compromise the same, alienate his estate, make or incur loans, and the like. Brown.

CONSENSUAL CONTRACT. In civil law. A contract completed by the consent of the parties merely, without any further act.

The contract of sale, among the civilians, is an example of a consensual contract, because the moment there is an agreement between the seller and the buyer as to the thing and the price, the vendor and the purchaser hase reciprocal actions. On the contrary, on a loan, there is no action by the lender or borrower, although there may have been consent until the thing is delivered, or the money counted. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, § 1. art. 2; 1 Bell, Comm. (5th Ed.) 435.

CONSENSUS EST VOLUNTAS PLURium ad quos res pertinet, simul juncta. Consent is the conjoint will of several persons to whom the thing belongs. Lofft, 514.

CONSENSUS FACIT LEGEM. Consent makes the law. A contract is law between the parties having received their consent. Branch, Princ.

CONSENSUS, NON CONCUBITUS, FACIT matrimonium. Consent, not coition, constitutes marriage. Co. Litt. 33a; Dig. 50. 17. 30. See 10 Clark & F. 534; 1 Bouv. Inst. 103; Broom. Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 129.

CONSENSUS, NON CONCUBITUS, FAcit nuptias vel matrimonium, et consentire non possunt ante annos nubiles. Consent, and not cohabitation, constitutes nuptials or marriage, and persons cannot consent before marriageable years. 6 Coke, 22; 1 Bl. Comm. 434.

CONSENSUS TOLLIT ERROREM. Consent removes or obviates a mistake. Co. Litt. 126; Coke, 2d Inst. 123; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 129; 1 Bing. N. C. 68; 6 El. & Bl. 338; 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 611.

CONSENSUS VOLUNTAS MULTORUM ad quos res pertinet, simul juncta. Consent is the united will of several interested in one subject-matter. Dav. 48; Branch, Princ.

CONSENT (Lat. con, with, together, sentire, to feel). A concurrence of wills.

Express consent is that directly given, either viva voce or in writing.

Implied consent is that manifested by signs, actions, or facts, or by inaction or silence, which raise a presumption that the consent has been given.

Consent supposes a physical power to act, a moral power of acting, and a serious, determined, and free use of these powers. Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 2, § 1. See "Agreement;" "Contract."

CONSENT RULE. An entry of record by the defendant, confessing the lease, entry, and ouster by the plaintiff, in an action of ejectment. This was, until recently, used in England and in those of the United States in which the action of ejectment is still retained as a means of acquiring possession of land.

CONSENTIENTES ET AGENTES PARI poena plectentur. Those consenting and those perpetrating shall receive the same punishment. 5 Coke, 80.

CONSENTIRE MATRIMONIO NON POSsunt infra annos nubiles. Persons cannot consent to marriage before marriageable years. 5 Coke, 80; 6 Coke, 22.

CONSEQUENTIAE NON EST CONSEquentia. A consequence ought not to be drawn from another consequence. Bac. Aph. 16.

CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES. Those damages or those losses which arise not from the immediate act of the party, but in consequence of such act. Those produced naturally, but not directly.

CONSERVATOR (Lat. conservare, to preserve). A preserver; one whose business it is to attend to the enforcement of certain statutes.

A delegated umpire or standing arbitrator, chosen to compose and adjust difficulties arising between two parties. Cowell.

A guardian. So used in Connecticut. 3 Day (Conn.) 472; 5 Conn. 280; 3 Conn. 228; 12 Conn. 376.

CONSERVATOR OF THE PEACE. He who hath an especial charge, by virtue of his office, to see that the king's peace be kept.

Before the reign of Edward III., who created justices of the peace, there were sundry persons interested to keep the peace, of whom there were two classes; one of which had the power annexed to the office which they held; the other had it merely by itself, and were hence called "wardens" or "conservators of the peace." Lambard, Eiren. lib. 1, c. 3. This latter sort are superseded by the modern justices of the peace. 1 Bl. Comm. 349.

The judges and other similar officers of the various states, and also of the United States, are conservators of the public peace, being entitled "to hold to the security of the peace and during good behavior." 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 349.

CONSERVATOR TRUCIS (Lat.) An officer whose duty it was to inquire into all offenses against the king's truces and safeconducts upon the main seas out of the liberties of the Cinque Ports.

Under St. 2 Hen. V. st. 1, c. 6, such offenses are declared to be treason, and such officers are appointed in every port, to hear and determine such cases, "according to the ancient maritime law then practised in the admiral's court, as may arise upon the high seas, and with two associates to determine those arising upon land." 4 Bl. Comm. 69, 70.

CONSERVATORS OF RIVERS. In English law. Commissioners who are, by act of parliament, given the control of a certain river.

CONSIDERATIO CURIAE. The consideration of the court; that is, the judgment of the court implying consideration or study.

CONSIDERATION (Law Lat. consideratio). The material cause which moves a contracting party to enter into a contract. 2 Bl. Comm. 443.

The price, motive, or matter of inducement to a contract,—whether it be the compensation which is paid, or the inconvenience which is suffered by the party from whom it proceeds. A compensation or equivalent. A cause or occasion meritorious, requiring mutual recompense in deed or in law. Viner, Abr. "Consideration" (A).

The quid pro quo, that which the party to whom a promise is made does or agrees to do in exchange therefor. 120 U. S. 197.

Mutuality of obligation, as to each party, is the obligation imposed by the contract on the other party.

As applied to contracts, "consideration" and "obligation" are really convertible terms, though frequently used as correlatives. The essence of every contract is its mutuality, and, in necessary consequence, the obligation of each party is the consideration running to the other, while the entire obligation of the contract is the mutual considerations.

"The motive for entering into a contract, and the consideration of the contract, are not the same. Nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties. It is the price voluntarily paid for the promisor's undertaking. Expectation of results will not constitute a consideration." Beach, Cont. § 147.

Consideration is the very life and essence of a contract, and a contract or promise for which there is no consideration cannot be enforced at law. Such a promise is called a nudum pactum (ex nudo pacto non oritur actio), or nude pact, because a gratuitous promise to do or pay anything on the one side, without any compensation on the other, could only be enforced, in the Roman law, when made (or clothed) with proper words or formalities,—pactum verbis prescriptis vestitum. 7 Watts & S. (Pa.) 317; Plowd. 308; Smith, Lead. Cas. 456; Doctor & Stud. 2, c. 24; 3 Call (Va.) 439; 7 Conn. 57; 1 Stew. (Ala.) 51; 5 Mass. 301; 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 235; 6 Yerg. (Tenn.) 418; Cooke (Tenn.) 467; 6 Halst. (N. J.) 174; 4 Munf. (Va.) 95; 11 Md. 281; 25 Miss. 66; 30 Me. 412.

Considerations, according to their general nature, are:

(1) Valuable, being one which confers some benefit on the party at whose instance it is made, or upon a third party, at his request, or some detriment sustained at the instance of the party promising by the party to whom the promise is made.

(2) Good, being one of blood, natural affection, or the like. Beach, Cont. § 148; Chit. Cont. 7; Doctor & Stud. 179; 1 Selw. N. P. 39, 40; 2 Pet. (U. S.) 182; 5 Cranch (U. S.) 142, 150; 1 Litt. (Ky.) 183; 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 100; 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 466; 8 N. Y. 207; 6 Mass. 58; 2 Bibb (Ky.) 30; 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 222; 2 N. H. 97; Wright (Ohio) 660; 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 427; 13 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 29; 12 Ga. 52; 24 Miss. 9; 4 Ill. 33; 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 19; 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 388; 3 C. B. 321; 4 East, 55.

Valuable considerations are divided by the civilians into four classes, which are given, with literal translations: Do ut des, I give that you may give, facio ut facias, I do that you may do, facio ut des, I do that you may give, do ut facias, I give that you may do.

They are also:

(3) Executed or past, being those done or received before the obligor made the promise.

(4) Executory, being those by which it is undertaken to do something in the future. 95 U. S. 683; 6 Colo. 318.

They are also:

(5) Concurrent, being those which arise at the same time, or where the promises are simultaneous.

(6) Continuing, being those which are executed only in part.

(7) Equitable, being moral considerations.

(8) Moral, being such as, though not valuable, are of moral obligation, and are sufficient to support an executed contract. 18 S. E. 421.

(9) Gratuitous, being those which are not founded on such a deprivation or injury to the promisee as to make the consideration valid at law. 2 Mich. 381.

(10) Illegal, being agreements to do things in contravention of the common or of statute law.

(11) Impossible, being those which cannot be performed.

Considerations have been further classified as "express" or "implied," accordingly as they are stated in the contract, or left to be inferred by law, but the distinction is based rather on the manner of contracting than on the nature of the consideration. See "Contract."

CONSIDERATUM EST PER CURIAM (Lat. it is considered by the court). A formula used in giving judgments.

A judgment is the decision or sentence of the law, given by a court of justice, as the result of proceedings instituted therein for the redress of an injury. The language of the judgment is not, therefore, that "it is decreed," or "resolved," by the court, but that "it is considered by the court," consideratum est per curiam, that the plaintiff recover his debt, etc. 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3298.

CONSIDERATUR (Law Lat. it is considered). Held to mean the same with consideratum est. 2 Strange, 874.

CONSIGN. To send goods to a factor or agent.

——In Civil Law. To deposit in the custody of a third person a thing belonging to the debtor, for the benefit of the creditor, under the authority of a court of justice. Poth. Obl. pt. 3, c. 1, art. 8.

The term "to consign," or "consignation," is derived from the Latin consignare, which signifies to seal; for it was formerly the practice to seal up the money thus received in a bag or box. Aso & M. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 11, c. 1, § 5.

Generally, the consignation is made with a public officer. It is very similar to our practice of paying money into court.

CONSIGNATIO. See "Consign."

CONSIGNATION. From consignare, to seal up.

——In Scotch Law. The payment of money into the hands of a third party, when the creditor refuses to accept of it. The person to whom the money is given is termed the "consignatory." Bell, Dict.

——In French Law. A deposit which a debtor makes of the thing that he owes into the hands of a third person, and under the authority of a court of justice.

It is not properly a payment, but it is equivalent to a payment, and extinguishes the debt no less than if an actual payment had been made. Code, 8. 43. 9; Poth. Obl. pt. 3, c. 1, art. 8.

CONSIGNEE. One to whom a consignment is made.

CONSIGNMENT. The goods or property sent by means of a common carrier by one or more persons, called the "consignors," in one place, to one or more persons, called the "consignees," who are in another. The goods sent by one person to another, to be sold or disposed of by the latter for and on account of the former. The act of consigning goods.

——In French Law. "A deposit which the debtor makes of the thing that he owes into the hands of a third person, and under the authority of a court of justice." 1 Poth. Obl. 376.

CONSIGNOR. One who makes a consignment.

CONSILIA MULTORUM REQUIRUNTUR in magnis. The advice of many persons is requisite in great affairs. Coke, 4th Inst. 1.

CONSILIARIUS (Lat. consiliare, to advise). In civil law. A counsellor, as distinguished from a pleader or advocate; an assistant judge; one who participates in the decisions. Du Cange.

CONSILIUM, or DIES CONSILII. A day appointed to hear the counsel of both parties. A case set down for argument.

It is commonly used for the day appointed for the argument of a demurrer, or errors assigned. 1 Tidd, Prac. 438; 2 Tidd, Prac. 684, 1122; 1 Sellon, Prac. 336; 2 Sellon, Prac. 385; 1 Archb. Prac. 191, 246.

CONSIMILI CASU (Lat. in like case). In practice. A writ of entry, framed under the provisions of St. Westminster II. (13 Edw. I.) c. 24, which lay for the benefit of the reversioner, where a tenant by the curtesy aliened in fee or for life.

Many other new writs were framed under the provisions of this statute, but this particular writ was known emphatically by the title here defined. The writ is now practically obsolete. See "Case;" "Assumpsit;" 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 51; 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3482.

CONSISTORIUM. The state council of the Roman emperors. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 58.

CONSISTORY. In ecclesiastical law. An assembly of cardinals convoked by the pope.

The consistory is either public or secret. It is public when the pope receives princes or gives audience to ambassadors; secret when he fills vacant sees, proceeds to the canonization of saints, or judges and settles certain contestations submitted to him.

CONSISTORY COURT. In English law. The courts of diocesan bishops held in their several cathedrals before the bishops' chancellor, or commissary, who is the judge, for the trial of all ecclesiastical causes arising within their respective dioceses, and also for granting probates and administrations. From the sentence of these courts an appeal lies to the archbishop of each province respectively. 2 Steph. Comm. 230, 237; 3 Steph. Comm. 430, 431; 3 Bl. Comm. 641; 1 Wooddeson, Lect. 145; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 10, note 12.

CONSOLATO DEL MARE. A code of sea laws, compiled by order of the ancient kings of Arragon. It comprised the ancient ordinances of the Greek and Roman emperors, and of the kings of France and Spain, and the laws of the Mediterranean islands and of Venice and Genoa. See "Admiralty." It was originally written in the dialect of Catalonia, as its title indicates, and it has been translated into every language of Europe. This code has been reprinted in the second volume of the Collection de Lois Maritimes Anterieures au XVIII Siecle, par J. M. Pardessus, Paris, 1831,—a collection of sea laws which is very complete. See, also, Riddu's Hist. Mar. Comm. 171; Marvin, Leg. Bibl.

CONSOLIDATED FUND. In England. Usually abbreviated to consols. A fund for the payment of the public debt.

CONSOLIDATED ORDERS. The orders regulating the practice of the English court of chancery, which were issued, in 1860, in substitution for the various orders which had previously been promulgated from time to time. Some of the consolidated orders have been abrogated by the judicature act, but others are still in force.

CONSOLIDATION.

——In Civil Law. The union of the usufruct with the estate out of which it issues, in the same person, which happens when the usufructuary acquires the estate, or vice versa. In either case the usufruct is extinct. Lec. Elm. 424.

It may take place in two ways: First, by the usufructuary surrendering his right to the proprietor, which in the common law is called a "surrender;" secondly, by the release of the proprietor of his rights to the usufructuary, which in our law is called a "release."

——In Ecclesiastical Law. The union of two or more benefices in one. Cowell.

——In Practice. The union of two or more pending actions in the same court between the same parties, and involving the same issues.

——Of Corporations. The merger of the franchises, rights, and effects of two or more corporations into one, whether the single corporation, known as the "consolidated company," be a new one then created, or one of the original companies continuing in existence with only larger rights, capacities, and property. 64 Ala. 656.

CONSOLIDATION RULE. In practice. An order of the court requiring the plaintiff to join in one suit several causes of action against the same defendant which may be so joined consistently with the rules of pleading, but upon which he has brought distinct suits. 1 Dall. (Pa.) 147; 1 Yeates (Pa.) 5; 4 Yeates (Pa.) 128; 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 264; 2 Archb. Prac. 180. The matter is regulated by statute in many of the states.

CONSOLS. Funds formed by the consolidation (of which word it is an abbreviation) of different annuities, which had been severally formed into a capital. See "Consolidated Fund."

CONSORTIO MALORUM ME QUOQUE malum facit. The company of wicked men makes me also wicked. Moore, 817.

CONSORTIUM.

——In Civil Law. A union of fortunes; one of the names of lawful marriage among the Romans. Tayl. Civ. Law, 284.

A union of several persons as parties in one action. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 197.

——In Old English Law. Company; society. It occurs in this last sense in the phrase per quod consortium amisit, by which he has lost the companionship, used when the plaintiff declares for any bodily injury done to his wife by a third person. 3 Bl. Comm. 140.

——In Pleading. The company or society of a wife.

CONSPIRACY (Lat. con, together, spiro, to breathe). In criminal law. A combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose, not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means. 2 Mass. 337, 538; 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111; 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 229; 15 N. H. 396; 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 317; 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 220; 12 Conn. 101; 11 Clark & F. 155; 4 Mich. 414.

CONSPIRATIONE. An ancient writ that lay against conspirators. Reg. Orig. 134; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 114.

CONSPIRATORS. Persons guilty of a conspiracy.

CONSTABLE. An officer whose duty it is to keep the peace in the district which is assigned to him.

The most satisfactory derivation of the term and history of the origin of this office is that which deduces it from the French comestable (Lat. comes-stabuli), who was an officer second only to the king. He might take charge of the army, wherever it was, if the king were not present, and had the general control of everything relating to military matters, as the marching troops, their encampment, provisioning, etc. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

The same extensive duties pertained to the constable of Scotland. Bell, Dict.

The duties of this officer in England seem to have been first fully defined by St. Westminster (13 Edw. I.), and question has been frequently made whether the office existed in England before that time. 1 Bl. Comm. 356. It seems, however, to be pretty certain that the office in England is of Norman origin, being introduced by William, and that subsequently the duties of the Saxon tithing men, borsholders, etc., were added to its other functions. See Cowell; Willcock, Const.; 1 Bl. Comm. 356.

High constables were first ordained, according to Blackstone, by the statute of Westminster, though they were known as efficient public officers long before that time. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 356. They are to be appointed for each franchise or hundred by the leet, or, in default of such appointment, by the justices at quarter sessions. Their first duty is that of keeping the king's peace. In addition, they are to serve warrants, return lists of jurors, and perform various other services enumerated in Coke, 4th Inst. 267; 3 Steph. Comm. 47; Jacob, Law Dict. In some cities and towns in the United States there are officers called "high constables," who are the principal police officers in their jurisdiction.

Petty constables are inferior officers in every town or parish, subordinate to the high constable. They perform the duties of head borough, tithing man, or borsholder, and, in addition, their more modern duties appertaining to the keeping the peace within their town, village, or tithing.

In England, however, their duties have been much restricted by Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, which deprives them of their power as conservators of the peace. 3 Steph. Comm. 47.

In the United States, generally, petty constables only are retained, their duties being generally the same as those of constables in England prior to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, including a limited judicial power as conservators of the peace, a ministerial power for the service of writs, etc., and some other duties not strictly referable to either of these heads.

CONSTABLE OF A CASTLE. The warden or keeper of a castle; the castellain. St. Westminster I. c. 7 (3 Edw. I.); Spelman.

The constable of Dover Castle was also warden of the Cinque Ports. There was besides a constable of the Tower, as well as other constables of castles of less note. Cowell; Lambard, Const.

CONSTABLE OF ENGLAND (called, also, "Marshal"). His office consisted in the care of the common peace of the realm in deeds of arms and matters of war. Lambard, Const. 4. He was to regulate all matters of chivalry, tournaments, and feats of arms which were performed on horseback. 3 Steph. Comm. 47. He held the court of chivalry, besides sitting in the aula regis. 4 Bl. Comm. 92.

The office is disused in England, except on coronation days and other such occasions of state, and was last held by Stafford, duke of Buckingham, under Henry VIII. His title is Lord High Constable of England. 3 Steph. Comm. 47; 1 Bl. Comm. 355.

CONSTABLE OF SCOTLAND. An officer who was formerly entitled to command all the king's armies, in the absence of the king, and to take cognizance of all crimes committed within four miles of the king's person or of parliament, the privy council, or any general convention of the states of the kingdom. The office was hereditary in the family of Errol, and was abolished by 20 Geo. III. c. 43. Bell, Dict.; Ersk. Inst. 1. 3. 37.

CONSTABLE OF THE EXCHEQUER. An officer spoken of in 51 Hen. III. st. 5, cited by Cowell.

CONSTABLEWICK. The territorial jurisdiction of a constable. 5 Nev. & M. 261.

CONSTABULARIUS (Lat.) An officer of horse; an officer having charge of foot or horse; a naval commander; an officer having charge of military affairs generally. Spelman.

The titles were very numerous, all derived, however, from comes-stabuli, and the duties were quite similar in all the countries where the civil law prevailed. His powers were second only to those of the king in all matters relating to the armies of the kingdom.

In England his power was early diminished and restricted to those duties which related to the preservation of the king's peace. The office is now abolished in England, except as a matter of ceremony, and in France. Guyot, Rep. Univ.; Cowell.

CONSTAT (Lat. it appears). A certificate by an officer that certain matters therein stated appear of record. See 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 410.

An exemplification under the great seal of the enrollment of letters patent. Co. Litt. 225.

A certificate which the clerk of the pipe and auditors of the exchequer make at the request of any person who intends to plead or move in the court for the discharge of any thing, and the effect of it is the certifying what constat (appears) upon record touching the matter in question.

CONSTATE. To constitute or establish. "Constating instruments" is used to denote the charter, etc., of a corporation. See 37 N. J. Eq. 363.

CONSTITUENT (Lat. constituo, to appoint). He who gives authority to another to act for him. The constituent is bound by the acts of his attorney, and the attorney is responsible to his constituent.

CONSTITUERE. In old English law. To establish; to appoint; to ordain.

Used in letters of attorney, and translated "constitute." Applied generally, also, to denote "appointment." Reg. Orig. 172; Du Cange.

CONSTITUTED AUTHORITIES. The officers properly appointed under the constitution for the government of the people. Those powers which the constitution of each people has established to govern them, to cause their rights to be respected, and to maintain those of each of its members.

They are called "constituted," to distinguish them from the "constituting" authority which has created or organized them, or has delegated to an authority, which it has itself created, the right of establishing or regulating their movements.

CONSTITUTIO.

——In Civil Law. An establishment or settlement. Used of controversies settled by the parties without a trial. Calv. Lex.

A sum paid according to agreement. Du Cange.

An ordinance or decree having its force from the will of the emperor. Dig. 1. 4. 1, Cooper's notes.

——In Old English Law. An ordinance or statute; a provision of a statute.

CONSTITUTIO DOTIS. Establishment of dower.

CONSTITUTION. The fundamental law of a free country, which characterizes the organism of the country, and secures the rights of the citizen, and determines his main duties as a freeman. 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 198.

The written instrument defining the powers, limitations, and functions of the United States of America.

It has been said to be a tripartite instrument, the parties being the state, the people, and the United States. 3 Wis. 96.

——In Old English Law. A statute.

CONSTITUTIONAL. That which is consonant to, and agrees with, the constitution.

CONSTITUTIONES. Laws promulgated, i. e., enacted, by the Roman emperor. They were of the following kinds: (1) Edicta; (2) decreta; (3) rescripta, called, also, "epistolae." Sometimes they were general, and intended to form a precedent for other like cases. At other times they were special, particular, or individual (personales), and not intended to form a precedent. The emperor had this power of irresponsible enactment by virtue of a certain lex regia, whereby he was made the fountain of justice and of mercy. Brown.

CONSTITUTIONES TEMPORE POSTERIORES potiores sunt his quae ipsas praecesserunt. Later laws prevail over those which preceded them. Dig. 1. 4. 4.

CONSTITUTIONS OF CLARENDON. See "Clarendon, Constitutions of."

CONSTITUTOR. In civil law. He who promised by a simple pact to pay the debt of another; and this is always a principal obligation. Inst. 4. 6. 9.

CONSTITUTUM (Lat.) An agreement to pay a subsisting debt which exists without any stipulation, whether of the promisor or another party. It differs from a stipulation in that it must be for an existing debt. Du Cange.

A day appointed for any purpose; a form of appeal. Calv. Lex.

CONSTITUTUM ESSE EAM DOMUM unicuique nostrum debere existimari, ubi quisque sedes et tabulas haberet, suarumque rerum constitutionem fecisset. It is settled that that is to be considered the home of each one of us where he may have his habitation and account books, and where he may have made an establishment of his business. Dig. 50. 16. 203.

CONSTRAINT. In Scotch law. Duress.

It is a general rule that when one is compelled into a contract there is no effectual consent, though, ostensibly, there is the form of it. In such case, the contract will be declared void. The constraint requisite thus to annul a contract must be a vis aut metus qui cadet in constantem virum, such as would shake a man of firmness and resolution. Ersk. Inst. 3. 1. 16; Id. 4. 1. 26; 1 Bell, Comm. bk. 3, pt. 1, c. 1, § 1, art. 1, p. 295.

CONSTRUCTIO LEGIS NON FACIT INjuriam. The construction of law does not work an injury. Co. Litt. 183; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 537.

CONSTRUCTION (Lat. construere, to put together). In practice. Determining the meaning and application as to the case in question of the provisions of a constitution, statute, will, or other instrument, or of an oral agreement.

Drawing conclusions respecting subjects that lie beyond the direct expressions of the term. Lieber, Leg. & Pol. Herm. 20.

"Interpretation," if an exact synonym, is a preferable term, since it has but a single significance; while "construction" is used also in a mechanical sense, but see "Interpretation" for an attempted distinction.

CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS. Contracts for works of permanent improvement to realty, whether by the erection of buildings, filling, excavating, digging wells, etc.

CONSTRUCTION, COURT OF. A court of equity or of common law, as the case may be, is called the "court of construction" with regard to wills, as opposed to the "court of probate," whose duty is to decide whether an instrument be a will at all. Now, the court of probate may decide that a given instrument is a will, and yet the court of construction may decide that it has no operation, by reason of perpetuities, illegality, uncertainty, etc. Wharton.

CONSTRUCTIVE. That which amounts, in the view of the law, to an act, although the act itself is not really performed. For words under this head, such as "constructive fraud," etc., see the various titles, "Fraud," etc.

CONSUETUDINARIUS (Lat.) In old English law. A ritual or book containing the rites and forms of divine offices, or the customs of abbeys and monasteries.

A record of the consuetudines (customs). Blount; Whishaw.

CONSUETUDINARY LAW. Customary or traditional law.

CONSUETUDINES FEUDORUM (Lat. feudal customs). A compilation of the law of feuds or fiefs in Lombardy, made A. D. 1170.

It is called, also, the "Book of Fiefs," and is of great and generally received authority. The compilation is said to have been ordered by Frederic Barbarossa (Ersk. Inst. 2. 3. 5), and to have been made by two Milanese lawyers (Spelman), but this is uncertain. It is commonly annexed to the Corpus Juris Civilis, and is easily accessible. See 3 Kent, Comm. (10th Ed.) 665, note; Spelman.

CONSUETUDO (Lat.) A custom; an established usage, or practice. Co. Litt. 58. Tolls; duties; taxes. Id. 58b. This use of consuetudo is not correct. Custuma is the proper word to denote duties, etc. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 313, note. An action formerly lay for the recovery of customs due, which was commenced by a writ de consuetudinibus et servitiis, of customs and services. This is said by Blount to be "a writ of right close which lies against the tenant that deforceth the lord of the rent and services due him." Blount; Old Nat. Brev. 77; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 151.

There were various customs; as, consuetudo Anglicana, custom of England (as distinguished from lex, the Roman or civil law), consuetudo curiae, practice of a court, consuetudo mercatorum, custom of merchants. See "Custom."

CONSUETUDO CONTRA RATIONEM introducta, potius usurpatio quam consuetudo appellari debet. A custom introduced against reason ought rather to be called an usurpation than a custom. Co. Litt. 113.

CONSUETUDO CURIAE. The custom or practice of a court. Hardr. 141.

CONSUETUDO DEBET ESSE CERTA. A custom ought to be certain. Dav. 33.

CONSUETUDO EST ALTERA LEX. Custom is another law. 4 Coke, 21.

CONSUETUDO EST OPTIMUS INTERpres legum. Custom is the best expounder of the law. Coke, 2d Inst. 18; Dig. 1. 3. 37; Jenk. Cent. Cas. 273.

CONSUETUDO ET COMMUNIS ASSUEtudo vincit legem non scriptam, si sit specialis, et interpretatur legem scriptam, si lex sit generalis. Custom and common usage overcome the unwritten law, if it be special, and interpret the written law, if the law be general. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 273.

CONSUETUDO EX CERTA CAUSA RAtionabili usitata privat communem legem. Custom observed by reason of a certain and reasonable cause supersedes the common laws. Litt. § 169; Co. Litt. 33b. See 5 Bing. 293; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) p. 825.

CONSUETUDO, LICET SIT MAGNAE auctoritatis, nunquam tamen praejudicat manifestae veritati. A custom, though it be of great authority, should never, however, be prejudicial to manifest truth. 4 Coke, 18.

CONSUETUDO LOCI OBSERVANDA EST. The custom of the place is to be observed. 4 Coke, 28b; 6 Coke, 67; 10 Coke, 139; 4 C. B. 48.

CONSUETUDO MANERII ET LOCI OBservanda est. A custom of a manor and place is to be observed. 6 Coke, 67.

CONSUETUDO MERCATORUM (Lat.) The custom of merchants; the same with lex mercatoria (q. v.)

CONSUETUDO NEQUE INJURIA ORITI, neque tolli potest. A custom can neither arise nor be abolished by a wrong. Lofft, 340.

CONSUETUDO NON HABITUR IN CONsequentiam. Custom is not to be drawn into a precedent. 3 Keb. 499.

CONSUETUDO NON TRAHITUR IN CONsequentiam. Custom is not drawn into consequence. 3 Keb. 499; 4 Jur. (N. S.) 139.

CONSUETUDO PRAESCRIPTA ET LEgitima vincit legem. A prescriptive and legitimate custom overcomes the law. Co. Litt. 113.

CONSUETUDO REGNI ANGLIAE EST lex Angliae. The custom of the kingdom of England is the law of England. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 119.

CONSUETUDO SEMEL REPROBATA non potest amplius induci. Custom once disallowed cannot again be produced. Dav. 33; Grounds and Rudiments of Law, 53.

CONSUETUDO TOLLIT COMMUNEM legem. Custom takes away the common law. Co. Litt. 33b.

CONSUETUDO VINCIT COMMUNEM legem. Custom overrules common law. 1 Roper, Husb. & Wife, 351; Co. Litt. 33b.

CONSUETUDO VOLENTES DUCIT; LEX nolentes trahit. Custom leads the willing; law compels or draws the unwilling. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 274.

CONSUL. A commercial agent of a country residing in a foreign seaport, whose duty is to promote the commerce of the state commissioning him. 83 Tex. 88. He is not a diplomatic agent, and has no authority to represent his country in diplomatic negotiations. 1 Kent, Comm. 43.

CONSULAR COURTS. Courts wherein, pursuant to treaty, the consul exercises judicial powers in cases involving the rights of citizens of the country by which he is commissioned. 1 Kent, Comm. 42.

CONSULTA ECCLESIA. In ecclesiastical law. A church full or provided for. Cowell.

CONSULTARY RESPONSE. The opinion of a court of law on a special case. Wharton.

CONSULTATION. The name of a writ whereby a cause, being formerly removed by prohibition out of an inferior court into some of the king's courts in Westminster, is returned thither again; for, if the judges of the superior court, comparing the proceedings with the suggestion of the party, find the suggestion false or not proved, and that, therefore, the cause was wrongfully called from the inferior court, then, upon consultation and deliberation, they decree it to be returned, whereupon this writ issues. Termes de la Ley; 2 Bl. Comm. 114.

——In French Law. The opinion of counsel upon a point of law submitted to them.

CONSUMMATE. Complete; finished; entire.

A marriage is said to be consummate. A right of dower is inchoate when coverture and seisin concur, consummate upon the husband's death. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 250, 251. A tenancy by the curtesy is initiate upon the birth of issue, and consummate upon the death of the wife. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 140; 13 Conn. 83; 2 Me. 400; 2 Bl. Comm. 128.

A contract is said to be consummated when everything to be done in relation to it has been accomplished. It is frequently of great importance to know when a contract has been consummated, in order to ascertain the rights of the parties, particularly in the contract of sale. See "Delivery," where the subject is more fully examined. It is also sometimes of consequence to ascertain where the consummation of the contract took place, in order to decide by what law it is to be governed. See "Conflict of Laws;" "Lex Loci."

CONTANGO. In English law. The commission received for carrying over or putting off the time of execution of a contract to deliver stocks or pay for them at a certain time. Wharton.

CONTEK (Law Fr.) A contest; dispute; disturbance; opposition. Britt. c. 42; Kelham. Conteckours; brawlers; disturbers of the peace. Britt. c. 29.

CONTEMNER. A person guilty of contempt of court.

CONTEMPLATION OF BANKRUPTCY. As applied to transfers of property by an insolvent. In contemplation of committing an act in bankruptcy (q. v.), or of applying for the benefits of the bankrupt law. 13 How. (U. S.) 167; Fed. Cas. No. 3,317.

CONTEMPORANEA EXPOSITIO (Lat.) Contemporaneous exposition, or construction; a construction drawn from the time when, and the circumstances under which, the subject matter to be construed, as a statute or custom, originated.

CONTEMPORANEA EXPOSITIO EST OPtima et fortissima in lege. A contemporaneous exposition is the best and most powerful in the law. Coke, 2d Inst. 11; 3 Coke, 7; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 608.

CONTEMPT. A willful disregard or disobedience of a public authority, whether judicial or legislative.

Contempts are either (1) civil or (2) criminal.

(1) Civil contempts are those quasi contempts which consist in failing to do something which the contemnor is ordered to do for the benefit of another party to a proceeding before the court; while

(2) Criminal contempts are all acts in disrespect of the court or of its process obstructing the administration of justice generally, and tending to bring the court into disrepute. Rapalje, Contempt, § 21; 11 Fla. 184; 4 Keyes (N. Y.) 46.

Contempts are also classified as

(3) Direct contempts, being those committed in the presence of the court or so near as to disturb its proceedings; and

(4) Constructive contempts, being those arising from matters not transpiring in court. Rapalje, Contempt, § 23.

CONTEMPTIBILITER. Contemptuously.

CONTENEMENTUM (Law Lat. from con, together, and tenementum, a tenement, or thing holden). Countenance; appearance; credit or reputation.

CONTENTIOUS JURISDICTION. In ecclesiastical law. That which exists in cases where there is an action or judicial process, and matter in dispute is to be heard and determined between party and party. It is to be distinguished from voluntary jurisdiction, which exists in cases of taking probate of wills, granting letters of administration, and the like. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 66.

CONTERMINOUS. Adjacent or adjoining; having common boundaries. Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 98.

CONTESTATIO LITIS.

——In Civil Law. The statement and answer of the plaintiff and defendant, thus bringing the case before the judge, conducted usually in the presence of witnesses. Calv. Lex.

This sense is retained in the canon law. 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 205. A cause is said to be contestata when the judge begins to hear the cause after an account of the claims, given not through pleadings, but by statement of the plaintiff and answer of the defendant. Calv. Lex.

——In Old English Law. Coming to an issue; the issue so produced. Steph. Pl. 39; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 216.

CONTESTATIO LITIS EGET TERMINOS contradictarios. An issue requires terms of contradiction; that is, there can be no issue without an affirmative on one side and a negative on the other. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 117.

CONTESTATION OF SUIT. In an ecclesiastical cause, that stage of the suit which is reached when the defendant has answered the libel by giving in an allegation (q. v.) If he confesses the libel, he is said to contest the suit affirmatively; if he denies it, he is said to contest the suit negatively; or he may give a qualified affirmative or negative by confessing the whole or part of the libel, and adding other facts. Phillim. Ecc. Law, 1255; Rog. Ecc. Law, 720. See "Confession and Avoidance." The term is a translation of contestatio litis, and is taken from the Roman law.

CONTEXT (Lat. contextum,—con, with, tigere, to weave,—that which is interwoven). Those parts of a writing which precede and follow a phrase or passage in question; the connection.

CONTIGUOUS. In close proximity. 69 N. Y. 191, 25 Am. Rep. 168; affirming 7 Hun (N. Y.) 455.

CONTINENCIA. In Spanish law. Continency or unity of the proceedings in a cause. White, New Recop. bk. 3, tit. 6, c. 1.

CONTINENS. In the Roman law. Continuing; holding together; joined together. Applied to buildings in the suburbs of Rome. Dig. 50. 16. 2.

CONTINENTIA. In old English practice. Continuance or connection. Applied to the proceedings in a cause. Bracton, fol. 362b.

Countenance. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 48, § 2.

CONTINGENCY WITH DOUBLE ASpect. If there are remainders so limited that the second is a substitute for the first in case it should fail, and not in derogation of it, the remainder is said to be in a contingency with double aspect. Fearne, Cont. Rem. 373.

CONTINGENT DAMAGES. Those given where the issues upon counts to which no demurrer has been filed are tried before demurrer to one or more counts in the same declaration has been decided. 1 Strange, 431.

CONTINGENT ESTATE. A contingent estate depends for its effect upon an event which may or may not happen; as, an estate limited to a person not in esse, or not yet born. Crabb, Real Prop. § 946.

CONTINGENT LEGACY. A legacy made dependent upon some uncertain event. 1 Rop. Leg. 506.

A legacy which has not vested. Williams, Ex'rs.

CONTINGENT REMAINDER. An estate in remainder which is limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious and uncertain event, by which no present or particular interest passes to the remainderman, so that the particular estate may chance to be determined, and the remainder never take effect. 2 Bl. Comm. 169.

A remainder limited so as to depend upon an event or condition which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding estate. Fearne, Cont. Rem. 3; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 155. See "Remainder."

CONTINGENT USE. A use limited in a deed or conveyance of land which may or may not happen to vest, according to the contingency expressed in the limitation of such use.

Such a use as by possibility may happen in possession, reversion, or remainder. 1 Coke, 121; Comyn, Dig. "Uses" (K 6). A use limited to take effect upon the happening of some future contingent event; as where lands are conveyed to the use of A. and B. after a marriage had between them. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 234.

A contingent remainder limited by way of uses. Sugd. Uses, 175. See, also, 4 Kent, Comm. 237 et seq.

CONTINUAL CLAIM. In old English law. A formal claim made by a party entitled to enter upon any lands or tenements, but deterred from such entry by menaces, or bodily fear, for the purpose of preserving or keeping alive his right. It was called "continual," because it was required to be repeated once in the space of every year and day. It had to be made as near to the land as the party could approach with safety, and, when made in due form, had the same effect with, and in all respects amounted to, a legal entry. Litt. §§ 419-423; Co. Litt. 250a; 3 Bl. Comm. 175.

Lord Coke calls it an "entry in law," and says that it is as strong as an "entry in deed" (fact). Co. Litt. 256b.

It is now abolished. St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, § 11.

CONTINUANCE (Lat. continuere, to continue). In practice. The adjournment of a cause from one day to another of the same or a subsequent term.

The postponement of the trial of a cause.

CONTINUANDO (Lat. continuare, to continue; continuando, continuing). In pleading. An averment that a trespass has been continued during a number of days. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 212. It was allowed to prevent a multiplicity of actions (2 Rolle, Abr. 545) only where the injury was such as could, from its nature, be continued (1 Wm. Saund. 24, note 1).

The form is now disused, and the same end secured by alleging divers trespasses to have been committed between certain days. 1 Saund. 24, note 1. See, generally, Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 86; Hammond, N. P. 90, 91; Bacon, Abr. "Trespass" (I 2, note 2).

CONTINUING CONSIDERATION. See "Consideration."

CONTINUING DAMAGES. See "Damages."

CONTINUOUS EASEMENT. See "Easement."

CONTRA (Lat.) Over; against; opposite; per contra, in opposition.

CONTRA BONOS MORES. Against sound morals.

Contracts which are incentive to crime, or of which the consideration is an obligation or engagement improperly prejudicial to the feelings of a third party, offensive to decency or morality, or which has a tendency to mischievous or pernicious consequences, are void, as being contra bonos mores. 2 Wils. 447; Cowp. 729; 4 Campb. 152; 1 Barn. & Ald. 683; 16 East, 150.

CONTRA FORMAM COLLATIONIS. In old English law. A writ that issued where lands given in perpetual alms to lay houses of religion, or to an abbot and convent, or to the warden or master of an hospital and his convent, to find certain poor men with necessaries, and do divine service, etc., were alienated, to the disherison of the house and church. By means of this writ the donor or his heirs could recover the lands. Reg. Orig. 238; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 210.

CONTRA FORMAM DONI. Against the form of the grant. See "Formedon."

CONTRA FORMAM FEOFFAMENTI. A writ that lay for the heir of a tenant, enfeoffed of certain lands or tenements, by charter of feoffment from a lord to make certain services and suits to his court, who was afterwards distrained for more services than were mentioned in the charter. Reg. Orig. 176; Old. Nat. Brev. 162.

CONTRA FORMAM STATUTI (Lat. against the form of the statute). In pleading. The formal manner of alleging that the offense described in an indictment is one forbidden by statute.

CONTRA JUS BELLI (Lat.) Against the law of war. Grotius, de Jure Belli, lib. 3, c. 11, § 15; 1 Kent, Comm. 6.

CONTRA JUS COMMUNE. Against common right or law; contrary to the rule of the common law. Bracton, fol. 48b.

CONTRA LEGEM FACIT QUI ID FACIT quod lex prohibet; in fraudem vero qui, salvis verbis legis, sententiam ejus circumvenit. He does contrary to the law who does what the law prohibits; he acts in fraud of the law who, the letter of the law being inviolate, uses the law contrary to its intention. Dig. 1. 3. 29.

CONTRA LEGEM TERRAE. Against the law of the land. Mag. Ch. Johan. c. 55.

CONTRA NEGANTEM PRINCIPIA NON est disputandum. There is no disputing against one who denies principles. Co. Litt. 43; Grounds & Rudiments of Law, 57.

CONTRA NON VALENTEM AGERE nulla currit praescriptio. No prescription runs against a person unable to act. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 810; Evans, Poth. 451.

CONTRA OMNES GENTES. Against all people; formal words in old covenants of warranty. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 14, § 11.

CONTRA PACEM (Lat. against the peace). In pleading. An allegation in an action of trespass or ejectment that the actions therein complained of were against the peace of the king. Such an allegation was formerly necessary, but has become a mere matter of form, and not traversable. 4 Term R. 503; 1 Chit. Pl. 375; Archb. Civ. Pl. 169. See "Trespass."

CONTRA TABULAS. In civil law. Against the will (testament). Dig. 37. 4.

CONTRA VADIUM ET PLEGIUM. In old English law. Against gage and pledge. Bracton, fol. 15b; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 42, § 2.

CONTRA VERITATEM LEX NUNQUAM aliquid permittit. The law never suffers anything contrary to truth. Coke, 2d Inst. 252. But sometimes it allows a conclusive presumption in opposition to truth. See 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3061.

CONTRABAND OF WAR. In international law. Goods which neutrals may not carry in time of war to either of the belligerent nations without subjecting themselves to the loss of the goods, and formerly the owners, also, to the loss of the ship and other cargo, if intercepted. 1 Kent, Comm. 138, 143.

"The classification of goods as contraband has much perplexed text writers and jurists. A strictly accurate and satisfactory classification is, perhaps, impracticable; but that which is best supported by American and English decisions may be said to divide all merchandise into three classes: (1) Articles manufactured and primarily or ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war; (2) articles which may be, and are, used for purposes of war or peace, according to circumstances; (3) articles exclusively used for peaceful purposes. Merchandise of the first class destined to a belligerent country or place occupied by the army or navy of belligerent is always contraband. Merchandise of the second class is contraband only when destined to the military or naval use of the belligerent. While merchandise of a third class is not contraband at all, though liable to seizure and condemnation for violation of blockade or siege." 5 Wall. 58.

CONTRACAUSATOR. A criminal; one prosecuted for a crime.

CONTRACT (Lat. contractus, from con, with, and traho, to draw). An agreement between two or more parties to do or not to do a particular thing. Taney, C. J., 11 Pet. (U. S.) 420, 572. An agreement in which a party undertakes to do or not to do a particular thing. Marshall, C. J., 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 197. An agreement between two or more parties for the doing or not doing of some specified thing. 1 Pars. Cont. 5.

It has been variously defined as follows:

A compact between two or more parties. 6 Cranch (U. S.) 87, 136.

An agreement or covenant between two or more persons, in which each party binds himself to do or forbear some act, and each acquires a right to what the other promises. Enc. Amer.; Webster.

A contract or agreement is where a promise is made on one side and assented to on the other; or where two or more persons enter into an engagement with each other by a promise on either side. 2 Steph. Comm. 108, 109.

An agreement upon sufficient consideration to do or not to do a particular thing. 2 Bl. Comm. 446; 2 Kent, Comm. 449.

A covenant or agreement between two parties with a lawful consideration or cause. West. Symb. lib. 1, § 10; Cowell; Blount.

A deliberate engagement between competent parties upon a legal consideration to do or to abstain from doing some act. Story, Cont. § 1.

A mutual promise upon lawful consideration or cause which binds the parties to a performance.

The writing which contains the agreement of parties with the terms and conditions, and which serves as a proof of the obligation. The last is a distinct signification. 2 Hill (N. Y.) 551.

We have not included "consideration" in our definition of contract, because it does not seem to be essential to a contract, although it is necessary to its enforcement. See "Consideration." Mr. Stephen, whose definition of contract is given above, thus criticizes the definition of Blackstone, which has been adopted by Chancellor Kent and other high authorities: First, that the word "agreement" itself requires definition as much as "contract;" second, that the existence of a consideration, though essential to the validity of a parol contract, forms properly no part of the idea; third, that the definition takes no sufficient notice of the mutuality which properly distinguishes a contract from a promise. 2 Steph. Comm. 109.

The use of the word "agreement" (aggregatio mentium) seems to have the authority of the best writers in ancient and modern times (see above) as a part of the definition of contract. It is probably a translation of the civil-law conventio (con and venio), a coming together, to which (being derived from ad and grego) it seems nearly equivalent. We do not think the objection that it is a synonym (or nearly so) a valid one. Some word of the kind is necessary as a basis of the definition. No two synonyms convey precisely the same idea. "Most of them have minute distinctions," says Reid. If two are entirely equivalent, it will soon be determined by accident which shall remain in use, and which become obsolete. To one who has no knowledge of a language, it is impossible to define any abstract idea; but to one who understands a language, an abstraction is defined by a synonym properly qualified. By pointing out distinctions and the mutual relations between synonyms, the object of definition is answered. Hence we do not think Blackstone's definition open to the first objection.

As to the idea of consideration, Mr. Stephen seems correct, and to have the authority of some of the first legal minds of modern times. Consideration, however, may be necessary to enforce a contract, though not essential to the idea. Even in that class of contracts (by specialty) in which no consideration is in fact required, one is always presumed by law; the form of the instrument being held to import a consideration. 2 Kent, Comm. 450, note.

A contract without consideration is called a nudum pactum (nude pact), but it is still a pactum, and this implies that consideration is not an essential. The third objection of Mr. Stephen to the definition of Blackstone does not seem one to which it is fairly obnoxious.

There is an idea of mutuality in con and traho, to draw together, but we think that mutuality is implied in agreement as well. An aggregatio mentium seems impossible without mutuality. Blackstone, in his analysis, appears to have regarded agreement as implying mutuality; for he defines it (2 Bl. Comm. 442): "A mutual bargain or convention." In our definition, however, all ambiguity is avoided by the use of the words "between two or more parties" following agreement.

In its widest sense, "contract" includes records and specialties; but this use as a general term for all sorts of obligations, though of too great authority to be now doubted, seems to be an undue extension of the proper meaning of the term, which is much more nearly equivalent to "agreement," which is never applied to specialties. Mutuality is of the very essence of both,—not only mutuality of assent, but of act. As expressed by Lord Coke, actus contra actum. 2 Coke, 15; 7 Man. & G. 998, argument, and note.

This is illustrated in contracts of sale, bailment, hire, as well as partnership and marriage; and no other engagements but those with this kind of mutuality would seem properly to come under the head of contracts. In a bond there is none of this mutuality, no act to be done by the obligee to make the instrument binding. In a judgment there is no mutuality either of act or of assent. It is judicium redditum in invitem. It may properly be denied to be a contract, though Blackstone insists that one is implied. Per Mansfield, 3 Burrows, 1545; 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 316; per Story, J., 1 Mason (U. S.) 288. Mr. Chitty uses "obligation" as an alternative word of description when speaking of bonds and judgments. Chit. Cont. 2, 4. An act of legislature may be a contract. So may a legislative grant with exemption from taxes. 5 Ohio St. 361. So a charter is a contract between a state and a corporation, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States (article 1, § 10, cl. 1). 27 Miss. 417. See "Obligation of Contracts."

(1) Accessory contracts are those made for assuring the performance of a prior contract, either by the same parties or by others, such as suretyship, mortgage, and pledges. Civ. Code La. art. 1764; Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, § 1, art. 2, note 14.

(2) Contracts of beneficence are those by which only one of the contracting parties is benefited; as loans, deposit, and mandate. Civ. Code La. art. 1767.

(3) Certain contracts are those in which the thing to be done is supposed to depend on the will of the party, or when, in the usual course of events, it must happen in the manner stipulated.

(4) Commutative contracts are those in which what is done, given, or promised by one party is considered as an equivalent to or in consideration of what is done, given, or promised by the other. Civ. Code La. art. 1761.

(5) Gratuitous contracts are those of which the object is the benefit of the person with whom it is made, without any profit or advantage received or promised as a consideration for it. It is not, however, the less gratuitous if it proceed either from gratitude for a benefit before received, or from the hope of receiving one hereafter, although such benefit be of a pecuniary nature. Civ. Code La. § 1766.

(6) Hazardous contracts are those in which the performance of that which is one of its objects depends on an uncertain event. Civ. Code La. art. 1769.

(7) Consensual contracts are those which are formed by mere consent of the parties, such as all contracts of hiring and mandate.

(8) Executed contracts are those in which nothing remains to be done by either party, and where the transaction has been completed, or was completed at the time the contract or agreement was made; as where an article is sold and delivered, and payment therefor is made on the spot.

(9) Executory contracts are those in which some act remains to be done; as when an agreement is made to build a house in six months, to do an act before some future day, to lend money upon a certain interest payable at a future time.

A contract "executed" (which differs in nothing from a grant) conveys a chose in possession; a contract "executory" conveys a chose in action. 2 Bl. Comm. 443. As to the importance of grants considered as contracts, see "Obligation of Contracts."

(10) Express contracts are those in which the terms of the contract or agreement are openly and fully uttered and avowed at the time of making; as, to pay a stated price for certain specified goods; to deliver an ox, etc. 2 Bl. Comm. 443.

(11) Implied contracts are such as reason and justice dictate, and which, therefore, the law presumes that every man undertakes to perform. Thus, if I employ a person to do any business for me or perform any work, or take up wares with a tradesman, the law implies that I understood or contracted to pay the real value of the services or wares. 2 Bl. Comm. 443. These contracts form the web and woof of actual life. 1 Pars. Cont. 4.

There is one species of implied contract which runs through and is annexed to all other contracts, conditions, and covenants, viz., that if I fail in my part of the agreement, I shall pay the other party such damages as he has sustained by my neglect or refusal. See "Quantum Meruit;" "Quantum Valebat;" "Assumpsit;" Comyn, Dig. "Action upon the Case upon Assumpsit" (A 1); "Agreement."

(12) Independent contracts are those in which the mutual acts or promises have no relation to each other either as equivalents or as considerations. Civ. Code La. art. 1762.

(13) Mixed contracts are those by which one of the parties confers a benefit on the other, receiving something of inferior value in return, such as a donation subject to a charge.

(14) Contracts of mutual interest are such as are entered into for the reciprocal interest and utility of each of the parties; as sales, exchange, partnership, and the like.

(15) Entire contracts are those whose consideration is entire; divisible if the consideration is apportioned, or if an apportionment may be implied by law as to each item to be performed. 40 Cal. 251.

(16) Severable (or separable) contracts are those the considerations of which are by their terms susceptible of apportionment or division on either side, so as to correspond to the several parts or portions of the consideration on the other side.

A contract to pay a person the worth of his services as long as he will do certain work, or so much per week as long as he shall work, or to give a certain price per bushel for every bushel of so much corn as corresponds to a sample, would be a severable contract. If the part to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law, such a contract will generally be held to be severable. So when the price to be paid is clearly and distinctly apportioned to different parts of what is to be performed, although the latter is in its nature single and entire. But the mere fact of sale by weight or measure—i. e., so much per pound or bushel—does not make a contract severable.

(17) Simple contracts are those not of specialty or record. They are the lowest class of express contracts, and answer most nearly to our general definition of contract.

To constitute a sufficient parol agreement to be binding in law, there must be that reciprocal and mutual assent which is necessary to all contracts. They are by parol, which includes both oral and written. The only distinction between oral and written contracts is in their mode of proof. And it is inaccurate to distinguish verbal from written; for contracts are equally verbal whether the words are written or spoken,—the meaning of "verbal" being, "expressed in words." See 3 Burrows, 1670; 7 Term R. 350, note; 11 Mass. 27, 30; 5 Mass. 299, 301; 7 Conn. 57; 1 Caines (N. Y.) 386.

(18) Specialties are those which are under seal, as deeds and bonds.

Specialties are sometimes said to include also contracts of record (1 Pars. Cont. 7), in which case there would be but two classes at common law, viz., specialties and simple contracts. The term "specialty" is always used substantively.

They are the second kind of express contracts, under the ordinary common-law division. They are not merely written, but signed, sealed, and delivered by the party bound. The solemnities connected with these acts, and the formalities of witnessing, gave in early times an importance and character to this class of contracts which implied so much caution and deliberation (consideration) that it was unnecessary to prove the consideration even in a court of equity. Plowd. 305; 7 Term R. 477; 4 Barn. & Adol. 652; 3 Bing. 111; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 342, note. Though little of the real solemnity now remains, except witnessing, and a scroll is substituted in most of the states for the seal, the distinction with regard to specialties has still been preserved intact. See "Consideration."

When a contract by specialty is changed by a parol agreement, the whole contract becomes parol. 2 Watts (Pa.) 451; 9 Pick. (Mass.) 298; 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 71.

(19) Unilateral contracts are those in which the party to whom the engagement is made makes no express agreement on his part. They are so called even in cases where the law attaches certain obligations to his acceptance. Civ. Code La. art. 1758. A loan for use and a loan of money are of this kind. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, § 1, art. 2.

(20) Onerous contracts are those in which something is given or promised as a consideration for the engagement or gift, or some service, interest, or condition is imposed on what is given or promised, although unequal to it in value.

(21) Principal contracts are those entered into by both parties on their own accounts, or in the several qualities or characters they assume.

(22) Real contracts are those in which it is necessary that there should be something more than mere consent, such as a loan of money, deposit, or pledge, which, from their nature, require a delivery of the thing (res).

(23) Reciprocal contracts are those by which the parties expressly enter into mutual engagements, such as sale, hire, and the like.

(24) Contracts of record are those which are evidenced by matter of record, such as judgments, recognizances, and statutes staple. These are the highest class of contracts. Statutes merchant and staple, and other securities of the like nature, are confined to England. They are contracts entered into by the intervention of some public authority, and are witnessed by the highest kind of evidence, viz., matter of record. 4 Bl. Comm. 465.

(25) Verbal contracts are simple contracts.

(26) Written contracts are those evidenced by writing.

——In the Civil Law. Pothier's treatise on Obligations, taken in connection with the Civil Code of Louisiana, gives an idea of the divisions of the civil law. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, § 1, art. 2, makes the five following classes: Reciprocal and unilateral; consensual and real; those of mutual interest, of beneficence and mixed; principal and accessory; those which are subjected by the civil law to certain rules and forms, and those which are regulated by mere natural justice.

It is true that almost all the rights of personal property do in great measure depend upon contracts of one kind or other, or at least might be reduced under some of them, which is the method taken by the civil law. It has referred the greatest part of the duties and rights of which it treats to the head of obligations ex contractu or quasi ex contractu. Inst. 3. 14. 2; 2 Bl. Comm. 443.

CONTRACTION (Lat. con, together, traho, to draw). A form of a word abbreviated by the omission of one or more letters. This was formerly much practiced, but in modern times has fallen into general disuse. Much information in regard to the rules for contraction is to be found in the Instructor Clericalis.

CONTRACTOR. One who enters into a contract. Those who undertake to do public work, or the work for a company or corporation on a large scale, at a certain fixed price, or to furnish goods to another at a fixed or ascertained price. 2 Pardessus, note 300. See 5 Whart. (Pa.) 366.

CONTRACTUS BONAE FIDEI. In Roman law, those contracts (e. g., emptio venditio) which admitted of equitable defenses and other equitable consideration. They were opposed to contracts stricti juris (e. g., stipulatio), which admitted no such equitable defenses or considerations, at least until their original character was compelled by statute to admit them. All the praetorian contracts were contractus bonae fidei, but some of the civiles contractus were also bonae fidei.

CONTRACTUS CIVILES. In Roman law. Those contracts (e. g., venditio) which were actionable either in virtue of the old common law, or by virtue of any particular statute. They were opposed to the contractus praetorii which were actionable only through the aid of the praetor, who, for that purpose, had to adopt the existing legal forms of actions.

CONTRACTUS EST QUASI ACTUS CONtra actum. A contract is, as it were, act against act. 2 Coke, 15.

CONTRACTUS EX TURPI CAUSA, VEL contra bonos mores nullus est. A contract founded on a base and unlawful consideration, or against good morals, is null. Hob. 167; Dig. 2. 14. 27. 4.

CONTRACTUS LEGEM EX CONVENtione accipiunt. The agreement of the parties makes the law of the contract. Dig. 16. 3. 1. 6.

CONTRADICT. In practice. To prove a fact contrary to what has been asserted by a witness.

CONTRADICTION IN TERMS. Express, patent, inconsistent between parts of a clause or of an instrument.

CONTRAESCRITURA. In Spanish law. Counter letter. An instrument, usually executed in secret, for the purpose of showing that an act of sale, or some other public instrument, has a different purpose from that imported on its face. Acts of this kind, though binding on the parties, have no effect as to third persons.

CONTRAFACTIO (Lat.) Counterfeiting; as, contrafactio sigilli regis, counterfeiting the king's seal. Cowell; Reg. Orig. 42. See "Counterfeit."

CONTRAINTE PAR CORPS. In French law. The civil process of arrest of the person, which is imposed upon vendors falsely representing their property to be unincumbered, or upon persons mortgaging property which they are aware does not belong to them, and in other cases of moral heinousness. Brown.

CONTRALIGATIO. In old English law. Counter obligation. Literally, counter binding. Est enim obligatio quasi contraligatio. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 56, § 1.

CONTRAMANDATIO. A countermanding. Contramandatio placiti, in old English law, was the respiting of a defendant, or giving him further time to answer, by countermanding the day fixed for him to plead, and appointing a new day; a sort of imparlance. Cowell.

CONTRAMANDATUM. A lawful excuse, which a defendant in a suit by attorney alleges for himself to show that the plaintiff has no cause of complaint. Blount.

CONTRAPLACITUM. In old English law. A counter plea. Towns. Pl. 61.

CONTRAPOSITIO. In old English law. A plea or answer. Blount. A counter position.

CONTRARIENTS. This word was used in the time of Edw. II. to signify those who were opposed to the government, but were neither rebels nor traitors. Jacob.

CONTRARIORUM CONTRARIA EST RATIO. The reason of contrary things is contrary. Hob. 344.

CONTRAROTULATOR (Fr. contrerouleur, a controller). One whose business it was to observe the money which the collectors had gathered for the use of the king or the people. Cowell.

CONTRAROTULATOR PIPAE. An officer of the exchequer that writeth out summons twice every year to the sheriffs to levy the farms (rents) and debts of the pipe. Blount.

CONTRAT. In French law. Contracts. Contracts are of the following varieties:

(1) Bilateral, or synallagmatique, where each party is bound to the other to do what is just and proper.

(2) Unilateral, where the one side only is bound.

(3) Commutatif, where one does to the other something which is supposed to be an equivalent for what the other does to him.

(4) Aleatoire, where the consideration for the act of the one is a mere chance.

(5) Contrat de bienfaisance, where the one party procures to the other a purely gratuitous benefit.

(6) Contrat a titre onereux, where each party is bound under some duty to the other. Brown.

CONTRATALLIA. In old English law. A counter tally. A term used in the exchequer. Mem. in Scacc. M. 26 Edw. I.

CONTRATENERE. To hold against; to withhold. Whishaw.

CONTRAVENTION. In French law. An act which violates the law, a treaty, or an agreement which the party has made. That infraction of the law punished by a fine which does not exceed fifteen francs, and by an imprisonment not exceeding three days.

CONTRE MAITRE. In French law. The second officer in command of a ship; the officer next in command to the master, and under him. His business is said to relate to providing fit things for the navigation of the vessel before the voyage,—ropes, sails, anchors, etc.; to attending to its condition through the voyage, reporting each day to the master, and attending to the anchoring and security of the vessel at the end of the voyage. Ord. de la Marine de 1681, liv. 2. He is always to execute, day or night, the commands of the master, and represents the master in his sickness or absence. Guyot, Rep. Univ.

CONTRECTARE (Lat.)

——In Civil Law. To handle; to take hold of; to meddle with.

——In Old English Law. To treat. Vel male contrectet, or shall ill treat. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 17, § 4.

CONTRECTATIO. In civil law. The removal of a thing from its place, amounting to a theft. The offense is purged by a restoration of the thing taken. Bowyer, Comm. 268.

CONTRECTATIO REI ALIENAE ANIMO furandi, est furtum. The touching or removing of another's property, with an intention of stealing, is theft. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 132.

CONTREFACON. In French law. The offense of those who print or cause to be printed, without lawful authority, a book of which the author or his assigns have a copyright. Merlin, Repert.

CONTRIBUTION.

——At Common Law. The payment by each or any one of several parties who are liable, in company with others, of his proportionate part of the whole liability or loss, to one or more of the parties so liable upon whom the whole loss has fallen, or who has been compelled to discharge the whole liability. 1 Bibb (Ky.) 562; 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 545; 4 Bouv. Inst. note 3935.

——In Civil Law. A partition by which the creditors of an insolvent debtor divide among themselves the proceeds of his property proportionably to the amount of their respective credits. Civ. Code La. art. 2522, note 10. It is a division pro rata. Merlin, Repert.

——In Maritime Law. Average (q. v.)

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE. Failure of one injured by the negligence of another to use ordinary care, which failure is a concurrent cause with that of such other person in producing the injury.

CONTROLLER. A comptroller (q. v.)

CONTROLMENT. In old English law. The controlling or checking of another officer's account; the keeping of a counter roll. Sometimes called "contra rollment."

CONTROVER. One who invents false news. Coke, 2d Inst. 227.

CONTROVERSY. A dispute arising between two or more persons. It differs from case, which includes all suits, criminal as well as civil; whereas controversy is a civil, and not a criminal, proceeding. 2 Dall. (U. S.) 419, 431, 432; 1 Tucker, Bl. Comm. App. 420, 421; Story, Const. § 1668.

CONTUBERNIUM. In civil law. A marriage between persons of whom one or both were slaves. Poth. Cont. pt. 1, c. 2, § 4.

CONTUMACY (Lat. contumacia, disobedience). The refusal or neglect of a party accused to appear or answer to a charge preferred against him in a court of justice. Chiefly used in ecclesiastical courts; "contempt" being used in the civil courts.

Actual contumacy is the refusal of a party actually before the court to obey some order of the court.

Presumed contumacy is the act of refusing or declining to appear upon being cited. 3 Curt. Ecc. 1.

CONTUMAX. One accused of a crime who refuses to appear and answer to the charge; an outlaw.

CONTUSION. In medical jurisprudence. An injury or lesion, arising from the shock of a body with a large surface, which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of a contused wound. See 1 Chanc. Prac. 38; 4 Car. & P. 381, 487, 558, 565; 6 Car. & P. 684; 2 Beck, Med. Jur. 178.

CONTUTOR (Lat.) In civil law. A cotutor, or co-guardian. Inst. 1. 24. 1.

CONUSANCE, CLAIM OF. See "Cognizance."

CONUSANT. One who knows; as, if a party knowing of an agreement in which he has an interest makes no objection to it, he is said to be conusant. Co. Litt. 157.

CONUSOR. A cognizor.

CONVENABLE. In old English law. Suitable; agreeable; convenient; fitting. Litt. § 103; Cowell.

CONVENE. In civil law. To bring an action.

CONVENTICLE. A private assembly of a few folks under pretense of exercise of religion. The name was first given to the meetings of Wickliffe, but afterwards applied to the meetings of the nonconformists. Cowell. The meetings were made illegal by 16 Car. II. c. 4, and the term, in its later signification, came to denote an unlawful religious assembly.

CONVENTIO (Lat. a coming together).

——In Canon Law. The act of summoning or calling together the parties by summoning the defendant. When the defendant was brought to answer, he was said to be convened, which the canonists called conventio, because the plaintiff and defendant met to contest. Story, Eq. Pl. 402; 4 Bouv. Inst. note 4117.

——In Contracts. An agreement; a covenant. Cowell. Often used in the maxim conventio vincit legem, the express agreement of the parties supersedes the law. Story, Ag. § 368. But this maxim does not apply, it is said, to prevent the application of the general rule of law. Broom, Leg. Max. 808.

CONVENTIO PRIVATORUM NON POtest publico juri derogare. An agreement of private persons cannot derogate from public right. Wingate, Max. p. 746, max. 201; Co. Litt. 166a; Dig. 50. 17. 45. 1.

CONVENTIO VINCIT LEGEM. The agreement of the parties overcomes or prevails against the law. Story, Ag. § 368; 6 Taunt. 430. See Dig. 16. 3. 1. 6.

CONVENTION.

——In Civil Law. A general term which comprehends all kinds of contracts, treaties, pacts, or agreements. The consent of two or more persons to form with each other an engagement, or to dissolve or change one which they had previously formed. Domat, Civ. Law; Dig. 2. 14. 1. 1; 1 Bouv. Inst. note 100.

——In Legislation. This term is applied to a meeting of the delegates elected by the people for other purposes than usual legislation. It is mostly used to denote an assembly to make or amend the constitution of a state; but it sometimes indicates an assembly of the delegates of the people to nominate officers to be supported at an election.

CONVENTIONAL. Arising from, and dependent upon, the act of the parties, as distinguished from "legal," which is something arising from act of law. 2 Bl. Comm. 120.

CONVENTIONAL ESTATES. Those estates for life which are expressly created by the act of the parties, as distinguished from legal estates, or those which are created by operation of law. 2 Bl. Comm. 120.

CONVENTIONE. The name of a writ for the breach of any covenant in writing, whether real or personal. Reg. Orig. 115; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 145.

CONVENTUAL CHURCH. In ecclesiastical law. That which consists of regular clerks, professing some order or religion; or of dean and chapter; or other societies of spiritual men.

CONVENTUALS. Religious men united in a convent or religious house. Cowell.

CONVENTUS (Lat. convenire). An assembly; conventus magnatum vel procerum, an assemblage of the chief men or nobility; a name of the English parliament. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 148.

——In Civil Law. A contract made between two or more parties.

A multitude of men, of all classes, gathered together.

A standing in a place to attract a crowd.

A collection of the people by the magistrate to give judgment. Calv. Lex.

CONVENTUS JURIDICUS. A Roman provincial court for the determination of civil causes.

CONVERSANT. One who is in the habit of being in a particular place is said to be conversant there. Barnes, 162.

Acquainted; familiar.

CONVERSANTES. In old English law. Conversant or dwelling; commorant. 2 Inst. 122.

CONVERSION (Lat. con, with, together, vertere, to turn; conversio, a turning to, with, together).

——In Equity. The exchange of one species of property for another, which takes place under some circumstances in the consideration of the law, although no such change has actually taken place.

Land is held to be converted into money, in equity, when the owner has contracted to sell; and if he die before making a conveyance, his executors will be entitled to the money, and not his heirs. 2 Vern. 52; 1 W. Bl. 129.

Money may be held to be converted into land under various circumstances; as where, for example, a man dies before a conveyance is made to him of land which he has bought. 10 Pet. (U. S.) 563; Bouv. Inst. Index.

——At Law. An unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition, or the exclusion of the owner's rights. 44 Me. 197; 36 N. H. 311.

A constructive conversion takes place when a person does such acts in reference to the goods or personal chattels of another as amount, in view of the law, to appropriation of the property to himself. 1 Kelly (Ga.) 381.

A direct conversion takes place when a person actually appropriates the property of another to his own beneficial use and enjoyment, or to that of a third person, or destroys it, or alters its nature. 27 Mich. 454.

CONVEYANCE. The transfer of the title of land from one person or class of persons to another.

The instrument for effecting such transfer. It is a general term, and comprehends the several modes of passing title to real estate. 54 Miss. 90.

Every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in land is created, aliened, or mortgaged, or by which the title to land may be affected at law or in equity, except lost wills and testaments, leases for not to exceed three years, and executory contracts for the purchase or sale of land. 1 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 762, § 38.

CONVEYANCE OF VESSELS. The transfer of the title to vessels.

CONVEYANCER. One who makes it his business to draw deeds of conveyance of lands for others. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 2422. They frequently act as brokers for the sale of estates and obtaining loans on mortgage.

CONVEYANCING. A term including both the science and act of transferring titles to real estate from one man to another. It includes the examination of the title of the alienor, and also the preparation of the instruments of transfer. It is, in England and Scotland, and, to a greatly inferior extent, in the United States, a highly artificial system of law, with a distinct class of practitioners. A profound and elaborate treatise on the English law of conveyancing is Mr. Preston's. Geldart and Thornton's works are important works; and an interesting and useful summation of the American law is given in Washburn on Real Property.

CONVEYANCING COUNSEL. By Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, § 41, the lord chancellor is empowered to appoint not less than six barristers, who have practiced as conveyancing counsel for ten years at least, to be conveyancing counsel of the court of chancery, and the opinion of any of them may be received and acted on by the court or by a judge at chambers in the investigation of the title to an estate, or in the settlement of a draft, conveyance, mortgage, etc. Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1046. By the judicature act of 1873 (section 77) they were transferred to the supreme court.

CONVICIA SI IRASCARIS TUA DIVULGAS; spreta exolescunt. If you be moved to anger by insults, you publish them; if despised, they are forgotten. 3 Inst. 198.

CONVICIUM. In civil law. The name of a species of slander or injury uttered in public, and which charged some one with some act contra bonos mores. Vicat; Bac. Abr. "Slander."

CONVICT. One who has been condemned by a competent court; one who has been convicted of a crime or misdemeanor.

To condemn; to find guilty of a crime or misdemeanor. 4 Bl. Comm. 362.

CONVICTION (Lat. convictio; from con, with, and vincere, to bind). In practice. That legal proceeding of record which ascertains the guilt of the party, and upon which the sentence or judgment is founded. 7 Man. & G. 504.

Finding a person guilty by verdict of a jury. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 223.

A record of the summary proceedings upon any penal statute before one or more justices of the peace or other persons duly authorized, in a case where the offender has been convicted and sentenced. Holthouse.

The first of the definitions here given undoubtedly represents the accurate meaning of the term, and includes an ascertainment of the guilt of the party by an authorized magistrate in a summary way, or by confession of the party himself, as well as by verdict of a jury. The word is also used in each of the other senses given. It is said to be sometimes used to denote final judgment. Dwarr. St. (2d Ed.) 683. And a final judgment is usually held essential to conviction. 69 N. Y. 107; 99 Mass. 420.

Summary conviction is one which takes place before an authorized magistrate or inferior court, without the intervention of a common-law jury, or not according to the course of a common-law prosecution.

CONVIVIUM. A lay tenure, whereby a tenant is bound to provide meat and drink for his lord once or oftener in the year.

The same as procuratio with the clergy. Blount.

CONVOCATION (Lat. con, together, voco, to call). In ecclesiastical law. The general assembly of the clergy to consult upon ecclesiastical matters.

The clergy were always summoned at the commencement of each parliament. They themselves constituted a parliament, with a higher and lower house of convocation; the higher including the bishops and archbishops; the lower, the rest of the clergy. It is still summoned before each parliament pro forma, preserving the ancient custom, but adjourns without transacting any business. 2 Steph. Comm. 542; 2 Burn, Ecc. Law, 18 et seq.

CONVOY. A naval force, under the command of an officer appointed by government, for the protection of merchant ships and others, during the whole voyage, or such part of it as is known to require such protection. Marsh. Ins. bk. 1, c. 9, § 5; Park, Ins. 388.

Warranties are sometimes inserted in policies of insurance that the ship shall sail with convoy. To comply with this warranty, five things are essential: First, the ship must sail with the regular convoy appointed by the government; secondly, she must sail from the place of rendezvous appointed by the government; thirdly, the convoy must be for the voyage; fourthly, the ship insured must have sailing instructions; fifthly, she must depart and continue with the convoy till the end of the voyage, unless separated from it by necessity. Marsh. Ins. bk. 1, c. 9. § 5.

CO-OBLIGOR. One who is bound together with one or more others to fulfill an obligation. As to suing co-obligors, see "Parties;" "Joinder, etc."

COOL BLOOD. Tranquillity, or calmness; the condition of one who has the calm and undisturbed use of his reason. In cases of homicide, it frequently becomes necessary to ascertain whether the act of the person killing was done in cool blood or not, in order to ascertain the degree of his guilt.

COOLING TIME. In criminal law. Time for passion to subside and reason to interpose. Cooling time destroys the effect of provocation, leaving homicide murder, the same as if no provocation had been given. 1 Russ. Crimes, 525; Whart. Hom. 179; 3 Grat. (Va.) 594.

CO-OPERTIO (Law Lat. from co-operire, to cover). In old English law. A covering, or exterior coat, as the bark of a tree. Cowell. Quercus discooperta, an oak stripped of its bark, or debarked. Id.

CO-OPERTUM, or CO-OPERTURA. (Law Lat. from co-operire, to cover). In forest law. A covert; a thicket (dumetum) or shelter for wild beasts in a forest. Cart. de Foresta, c. 12; Reg. Orig. 258; Spelman. Extra co-opertum forestae, without the covert of the forest. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 41, § 2.

COPARCENARY, ESTATES IN. Estates of which two or more persons form one heir. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 414.

The title to such an estate is always by descent. The shares of the tenants need not be equal. The estate is rare in America, but sometimes exists. 3 Ind. 360; 4 Grat. (Va.) 16; 17 Mo. 13; 3 Md. 190. See Watkins, Conv. (Coventry Ed.) 145.

COPARCENERS. Persons to whom an estate of inheritance descends jointly, and by whom it is held as an entire estate. 2 Bl. Comm. 187.

In the old English and the American sense, the term includes males as well as females, but in the modern English use is limited to females. 4 Kent, Comm. 462; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1781.

COPARTICEPS. In old English law. A coparcener. Co. Entr. 377, 711.

COPARTNER. One who is a partner with one or more other persons; a member of a partnership (q. v.)

COPARTNERSHIP. A partnership (q. v.)

COPARTNERY. In Scotch law. The contract of copartnership; a contract by which the several partners agree concerning the communication (sharing) of loss or gain, arising from the subject of the contract. Bell, Dict.

COPE, or COPPE (Saxon). A hill. Co. Litt. 4b.

The top or summit of a thing, as of a house. Cowell.

A tribute paid out of lead mines in England. Blount.

COPEMAN, or COPESMAN. A chapman (q. v.)

COPESMATE. A merchant; a partner in merchandise.

COPIA (Lat.) In civil and old English law. Opportunity or means of access.

COPIA VERA. In Scotch practice. A true copy; words written at the top of copies of instruments. 3 How. St. Tr. 427, 430, 432.

COPPA. In English law. A crop or cock of grass, hay, or corn, divided into titheable portions, that it may be more fairly and justly tithed. Wharton.

COPPICE, or COPSE. A small wood, consisting of underwood, which may be cut at twelve or fifteen years' growth for fuel.

COPULA. Sexual intercourse; the consummation of marriage.

COPULATIO VERBORUM INDICAT ACceptationem in eodem sensu. Coupling words together shows that they ought to be understood in the same sense. Bac. Max. reg. 3; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 523.

COPULATIVE TERM. One which is placed between two or more others to join them together.

COPY. A true transcript of an original writing.

Exemplifications are copies verified by the great seal or by the seal of a court. 1 Gilb. Ev. 19.

Examined copies are those which have been compared with the original, or with an official record thereof.

Office copies are those made by officers intrusted with the originals, and authorized for that purpose.

COPYHOLD. A tenure by copy of court-roll; any species of holding by particular custom of the manor; the estate so held.

COPYHOLDER. A tenant by copyhold tenure (by copy of court roll). 2 Bl. Comm. 95.

COPYRIGHT. The exclusive privilege, secured according to certain legal forms, of printing, publishing, and vending copies of writings or drawings. 14 How. (U. S.) 530.

CORAAGIUM. Measures of corn. An unusual and extraordinary tribute, arising only on special occasions. They are thus distinguished from services. Mentioned in connection with hidage and carvage. Blount.

CORAM IPSO REGE (Lat.) Before the king himself. Proceedings in the court of king's bench are said to be coram rege ipso. 3 Bl. Comm. 41.

CORAM NOBIS. A writ of error on a judgment in the king's bench is called a coram nobis, before us. So called because the record and proceedings were stated in the writ to remain "before us." 1 Archb. Prac. 234.

——In Modern Practice. A writ of error for a review before the same court which is alleged to have committed the error.

CORAM NON JUDICE. Acts done by a court which has no jurisdiction either over the person, the cause, or the process, are said to be coram non judice. 1 Conn. 40. Such acts have no validity. If an act is required to be done before a particular person, it would not be considered as done before him if he were asleep or non compos mentis. 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 42; 8 Cranch (U. S.) 9; Paine (U. S.) 55; 1 Prest. Conv. 266.

CORAM PARIBUS. Before the peers or freeholders. The attestation of deeds, like all other solemn transactions, was originally done only coram paribus. 2 Bl. Comm. 307. Coram paribus de vicineto, before the peers or freeholders of the neighborhood. Id. 315.

CORAM SECTATORIBUS. Before the suitors. Cro. Jac. 582.

CORAM VOBIS. A writ of error on judgments of other courts than the king's bench. 2 Tidd, Prac. 1056, 1137. So called because the record was stated to remain "before you," i. e., before the justices of king's bench.

——In Modern Practice. A writ of error for a review in a higher court than that alleged to have committed error.

CO-RESPONDENT. In England, where a husband brings a suit against his wife charging her with adultery, the alleged adulterer must, as a rule, be made a party to the petition as a co-respondent. If the adultery is proved, the court may order him to pay damages to the husband. The term is sometimes applied in the United States to the alleged adulterer, though the practice of joining him does not obtain. Browne, Div. 143, 204; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, §§ 28, 33. See "Adultery;" "Dissolution."

CORIUM FORFISFACERE. To forfeit one's skin; applied to a person condemned to be whipped; the ancient punishment of a servant.

CORN LAWS. Laws regulating the trade in breadstuffs.

The object of corn laws is to secure a regular and steady supply of the great staples of food; and for this object the means adopted in different countries and at different times widely vary, sometimes involving restriction or prohibition upon the export, and sometimes, in order to stimulate production, offering a bounty upon the export. Of the former character was the famous system of corn laws of England, initiated in 1773 by Mr. Burke, and repealed in 1846 under Sir Robert Peel.

CORN RENTS. Rents reserved in corn,—that is, in wheat or malt. Proportions of rents on college leases (being one-third), directed by St. 18 Eliz. c. 6, to be reserved in wheat or malt. 3 Steph. Comm. 141, 142; 2 Bl. Comm. 322.

CORNAGE. A species of tenure in England, by which the tenant was bound to blow a horn for the sake of alarming the country on the approach of an enemy. Bac. Abr. "Tenure" (N).

CORNET. A commissioned officer in a regiment of cavalry.

CORODIUM. In old English law. A corody.

CORODY. An allowance of meat, drink, money, clothing, lodging, and such like necessaries for sustenance. 1 Bl. Comm. 282; 1 Chit. Prac. 225. An allowance from an abbey or house of religion, to one of the king's servants who dwells therein, of meat and other sustenance. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 230.

An assize lay for a corody. Cowell. Corodies are now obsolete. Coke, 2d Inst. 630; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 40.

CORONA MALA. In old English law. The clergy who abuse their character were so called. Blount.

CORONARE. In old records. To give the tonsure, which was done on the crown, or in the form of a crown; to make a man a priest. Cowell.

CORONARE FILIUM. To make one's son a priest. Homo coronatus was one who had received the first tonsure, as preparatory to superior orders, and the tonsure was in form of a corona, or crown of thorns. Cowell.

CORONATOR (Lat.) A coroner (q. v.) Spelman.

CORONER. An officer whose principal duty it is to hold an inquisition, with the assistance of a jury, over the body of any person who may have come to a violent death, or who has died in prison.

It is his duty also, in case of the death of the sheriff, or his incapacity, or when a vacancy occurs in that office, to serve all the writs and processes which the sheriff is usually bound to serve. 20 Ga. 336; 11 Tex. 284; 14 Ala. (N. S.) 326; 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 346; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 349.

The chief justice of the king's bench is the sovereign or chief coroner of all England, though it is not to be understood that he performs the active duties of that office in any one county. 4 Coke, 57b; Bac. Abr.; 3 Comyn, Dig. 242; 5 Comyn, Dig. 212.

It is also his duty to inquire concerning shipwreck, and to find who has possession of the goods; concerning treasure trove, who are the finders, and where the property is. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 349.

The office has lost much of the honor which formerly appertained to it, but the duties are of great consequence to society, both for bringing murderers to punishment, and protecting innocent persons from accusation. It may often happen that the imperfections of the early examination enable one who is undoubtedly a criminal to escape. It is proper, in most cases of homicide, to procure the examination to be made by a physician, and in many cases it is his duty. 4 Car. & P. 571.

CORPORAL (Lat. corpus, body). Bodily; relating to the body; as, corporal punishment.

A noncommissioned officer of the lowest grade in an infantry company.

——Corporal Oath. An oath which the party takes, laying his hand on the Gospels. Cowell. It is now held to mean solemn oath. 1 Ind. 184.

——Corporal Touch. Actual, bodily contact with the hand.

It was once held that, before a seller of personal property could be said to have stopped it in transitu, so as to regain the possession of it, it was necessary that it should come to his corporal touch, but the contrary is now settled. These words were used merely as a figurative expression. 3 Term R. 464; 5 East, 184.

CORPORALE SACRAMENTUM. In old English law. A corporal oath.

CORPORALIS INJURIA NON RECIPIT aestimationem de futuro. A personal injury does not receive satisfaction from a future course of proceeding. Bac. Max. reg. 6; 3 How. St. Tr. 71; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 254.

CORPORATION (Lat. corpus, a body). A franchise possessed by one or more individuals, who subsist as a body politic under a special denomination, and are vested, by the policy of the law, with the capacity of perpetual succession, and of acting in several respects, however numerous the association may be, as a single individual. 2 Kent, Comm. 267.

"A corporation is a body, or artificial person, consisting of one or more individuals, or sometimes of individuals and other corporations created by law, and invested by the law with certain legal capacities, as the capacity of succession, and the capacity to sue and be sued, to make contracts, to take, hold, and convey property, to commit torts and crimes, and to do other acts, however numerous its members may be, like a single individual." Clark & Marshall, Corp. 2.

A body, consisting of one or more natural persons, established by law, usually for some specific purpose, and continued by a succession of members.

It is this last characteristic of a corporation, sometimes called its immortality, prolonging its existence beyond the term of natural life, and thereby enabling a long-continued effort and concentration of means to the end which it was designed to answer, that constitutes its principal utility. A corporation is modelled upon a state or nation, and is to this day called a body politic, as well as corporate, thereby indicating its origin and derivation. Its earliest form was, probably, the municipality or city, which necessity exacted for the control or local police of the marts and crowded places of the state or empire. The combination of the commonalty in this form for local government became the earliest bulwark against despotic power, and a late philosophical historian traces to the remains and remembrance of the Roman municipia the formation of those elective governments of towns and cities in modern Europe, which, after the fall of the Roman empire, contributed so largely to the preservation of order, and to the protection of the rights of life and property as to become the foundation of modern liberty. McIntosh, Hist. Eng. pp. 31, 32.

——Aggregate Corporations. Those which are composed of two or more members at the same time.

——Sole Corporations. Those which by law consist of but one member at any one time.

——Civil Corporations. Those which are created to facilitate the transaction of business.

——Ecclesiastical Corporations. Those which are created to secure the public worship of God.

——Eleemosynary Corporations. Those which are created for the purposes of charities, such as schools, hospitals, and the like.

——Lay Corporations. Those which exist for secular purposes.

——Private Corporations. Those which are created wholly or in part for purposes of private emolument. 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 668; 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 907.

——Public Corporations. Those which are exclusively instruments of the public interest.

CORPORATOR. A member of a corporation.

CORPORE ET ANIMO. See "Animo et Corpore."

CORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS. Substantial, permanent objects which may be inherited. The term "land" will include all such. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 17.

CORPOREAL PROPERTY.

——In Civil Law. That which consists of such subjects as are palpable.

——In Common Law. The term to signify the same thing is "property in possession." It differs from incorporeal property, which consists of choses in action and easements, as a right of way, and the like.

CORPS DIPLOMATIQUE. The body of ambassadors and diplomatic persons. Wharton.

CORPSE. The dead body of a human being. 1 Russ. & R. 366, note; 2 Term R. 733; 1 Leach, C. C. 497; 8 Pick. (Mass.) 370; Dig. 47. 12. 3. 7; Id. 11. 7. 38; Code, 3. 44. 1.

CORPUS (Lat. a body). The substance. Used of a human body, a corporation, a collection of laws, etc.

CORPUS COMITATUS. In old English law. The body of a county. Cro. Jac. 514; 5 How. (U. S.) 453; 5 Mason (U. S.) 290. The county at large, as distinguished from any particular locality within it.

CORPUS CORPORATUM. A corporation; a corporate body, other than municipal. Burr. Sett. Cas. 143.

CORPUS CUM CAUSA. See "Habeas Corpus."

CORPUS DELICTI. The body of the offense. The offense itself, as distinguished from the participation of any person therein. Thus, the corpus delicti of homicide is that a person has died by violence, not merely that he has died (43 Miss. 472), though the weight of authority is that the mere fact that a building has been burned is the corpus delicti of arson (29 Ga. 105; 33 Miss. 347. Contra, 76 Ala. 42).

CORPUS HUMANUM NON RECIPIT AESTIMATIONEM. A human body is not susceptible of appraisement. Hob. 59.

CORPUS JURIS CANONICI (Lat. the body of the canon law). The name given to the collections of the decrees and canons of the Roman church. See "Canon Law."

CORPUS JURIS CIVILIS (Lat. the body of the civil law). The collection comprising the Institutes, the Pandects or Digest, the Code, and the Novels, of Justinian. See those several titles, and also "Civil Law," for fuller information. The name is said to have been first applied to this collection early in the seventeenth century.

CORPUS PRO CORPORE (Lat.) In old records. Body for body. A phrase expressing the liability of manucaptors. 3 How. St. Tr. 110.

CORRECTION, HOUSE OF. A reformatory.

CORREGIDOR. In Spanish law. A magistrate who took cognizance of various misdemeanors, and of civil matters. 2 White, New Recop. 53.

CORREI. In civil law. Two or more bound or secured by the same obligation.

Correi credendi are creditors secured by the same obligation.

Correi debendi are two or more persons bound as principal debtors to pay or perform. Ersk. Inst. 3. 3. 74; Calv. Lex.; Bell. Dict.

CORRESPONDENCE. The letters written by one person to another, and the answers thereto. See "Letter."

CORROBORATE. In evidence. To sustain by the introduction of other evidence to the same fact. Corroborative evidence is "such evidence as tends in some degree of its own strength, and independently to prove some allegation or issue." 6 N. M. 250.

CORRUPTIO OPTIMI EST PESSIMA. Corruption of the best is worst.

CORRUPTION. An act done with an intent to give some advantage inconsistent with official duty and the rights of others.

It includes bribery, but is more comprehensive, because an act may be corruptly done, though the advantage to be derived from it be not offered by another. Merlin, Repert.

Something against law; as a contract by which the borrower agreed to pay the lender usurious interest. It is said, in such case, that it was corruptly agreed, etc.

CORRUPTION OF BLOOD. The incapacity to inherit, or pass an inheritance, in consequence of an attainder to which the party has been subject.

CORSE-PRESENT. In old English law. A gift of the second-best beast belonging to a man at his death, taken along with the corpse, and presented to the priest. St. 21 Hen. VIII. c. 6; Cowell; 2 Bl. Comm. 425.

CORSNED. In old English law. A piece of barley bread, which, after the pronunciation of certain imprecations, a person accused of crime was compelled to swallow.

A piece of cheese or bread of about an ounce weight was consecrated, with an exorcism desiring of the Almighty that it might cause convulsions and paleness, and find no passage, if the man was really guilty, but might turn to health and nourishment if he was innocent. Spelman. It was then given to the suspected person, who at the same time received the sacrament. If he swallowed it easily, he was esteemed innocent. If it choked him, he was esteemed guilty. See 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 345.

CORTES. The name of the legislative assemblies of Spain and Portugal.

CORTEX. The bark of a tree; the outer covering of anything.

The letter of an instrument, as distinguished from its spirit.

CORTIS. In old records. A court or hall. Spelman.

CORTULARIUM, or CORTARIUM. In old records. A yard or court adjoining a country farm. Spelman.

CORVEE. In French law. Gratuitous labor exacted from the villages or communities, especially for repairing roads, constructing bridges, etc.

Corvee seigneuriale are services due the lord of the manor. Guyot, Rep. Univ.; 3 Low. (U. S.) 1.

COSA JUZGADA. In Spanish law. A cause or matter adjudged (res adjudicata). White, New Recop. bk. 3, tit. 8, note.

COSBERING. In feudal law. A prerogative or seignorial right of a lord, as to lie and feast himself and his followers at his tenants' houses. Cowell.

COSDUNA. In feudal law. A custom or tribute.

COSEN, or COZEN. In old English law. To cheat. "A cosening knave." 3 Leon. 171.

COSENING. In old English law. An offense whereby anything is done deceitfully, whether in or out of contracts, which cannot be fitly termed by any especial name. Called in the civil law stellionatus. West, Symb. pt. 2, "Indictment," § 68; Blount; 4 Bl. Comm. 158.

COSHERING. In old English law. A feudal prerogative or custom for lords to lie and feast themselves at their tenants' houses. Cowell.

COSINAGE, COUSINAGE, or COSENAGE. A writ which lay where the father of the great-grandfather of the demandant had been disseised, and the heir brought his writ to recover possession. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 221.

Relationship; affinity. St. 4 Hen. III. c. 8; 3 Bl. Comm. 186; Co. Litt. 160a.

COST. The price actually paid for goods. 18 N. Y. 337.

COSTIPULATOR. A joint promisor.

COSTS. A pecuniary allowance made by positive law to the successful party to a suit, or to some distinct proceeding in a suit in consideration of, and to reimburse, his probable expense. Abbott. See 4 N. M. 356.

At common law, there were no costs by name, but when the plaintiff failed, he was amerced for presenting a false claim, and, when judgment was rendered against defendant, he was fined for resisting the just claim of plaintiff.

Costs as allowed by statute in modern practice are the amount allowed the prevailing party in lieu of the common-law fines. The term is to be distinguished from "disbursements," which includes the amounts paid out by the prevailing party for certain purposes incident to the suit, and allowed to him as part of his recovery. 23 Ore. 451. See "Double Costs."

COSTS DE INCREMENTO. Increased costs; costs of increase; costs adjudged by the court in addition to those assessed by the jury. 13 How. (U. S.) 372.

The cost of the suit, etc., recovered originally under the statute of Gloucester, is said to be the origin of costs de incremento. Buller, N. P. 328a. Where the statute requires costs to be doubled in case of an unsuccessful appeal, costs de incremento stand on the same footing as jury costs. 2 Strange, 1048. Costs were enrolled in England in the time of Blackstone as "increase" of damages. 3 Bl. Comm. 299.

COSTS OF THE DAY (or TERM). Costs incurred in preparing for trial on a particular day or term. Adams, Eq. 343.

COSTUMBRE. In Spanish law. Custom; an unwritten law established by usage, during a long space of time. Las Partidas, pt. 1, tit. 2, lib. 4.

COSURETIES. Joint sureties; two or more sureties to the same obligation.

COTARIUS. In old English law. A cottager. Spelman.

COTERELLI. Anciently, a kind of peasantry who were outlaws; robbers. Blount.

COTERELLUS. A cottager.

Coterellus was distinguished from cotarius in this, that the cotarius held by socage tenure, but the coterellus held in mere villenage, and his person, issue, and goods were held at the will of the lord. Cowell.

COTESWOLD. A place where there is no wood.

COTLAND. Land held by a cottager, whether in socage or villenage. Cowell; Blount.

COTSETHLAND. In old English law. The seat of a cottage, including any land belonging to it.

COTSETUS. In old English law. A cottager or cottage holder who, by servile tenure, was bound to work for the lord. Cowell.

COTTAGE, COTA, or COTTAGIUM. In old English law. A small house without any land belonging to it, whereof mention is made in St. 4 Edw. I. But, by St. 31 Eliz. c. 7, no man may build such cottage for habitation unless he lay unto it four acres of freehold land, except in market towns, cities, or within a mile of the sea, or for the habitation of laborers in mines, shepherds, foresters, sailors, etc. Termes de la Ley. Twenty years' possession of cottage gives good title as against the lord. Buller, N. P. 103a, 104. By a grant of a cottage the curtilage will pass. 4 Viner, Abr. 582.

COTUCHANS. Boors; husbandmen. Domesday Book.

COUCHANT. Lying down. Animals are said to have been levant and couchant when they have been upon another person's land, damage feasant, one night at least. 3 Bl. Comm. 9.

COUCHER, or COURCHER. A factor who continues abroad for traffic (37 Edw. III. c. 16); also the general book wherein any corporation, etc., register their acts (3 & 4 Edw. VI. c. 10).

COUNCIL (Lat. concilium, an assembly). The legislative body in the government of cities or boroughs; an advisory body selected to aid the executive. See 14 Mass. 470; 3 Pick. (Mass.) 517; 4 Pick. (Mass.) 25.

A governor's council is still retained in some of the states of the United States. It is analogous in many respects to the privy council of the king of Great Britain, and of the governors of the British colonies, though of a much more limited range of duties. See "Privy Council."

COUNCIL OF CONCILIATION. By Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 105, power is given for the crown to grant licenses for the formation of councils of conciliation and arbitration, consisting of a certain number of masters and workmen in any trade or employment, having power to hear and determine all questions between masters and workmen which may be submitted to them by both parties, arising out of or with respect to the particular trade or manufacture, and incapable of being otherwise settled. They have power to apply to a justice to enforce the performance of their award. The members are elected by persons engaged in the trade. Davis, Bldg. Soc. 232; Sweet.

COUNCIL OF JUDGES. Under the English judicature act of 1873 (section 75), an annual council of the judges of the supreme court is to be held, for the purpose of considering the operation of the new practice, offices, etc., introduced by the act, and of reporting to a secretary of state as to any alterations which they consider should be made in the law for the administration of justice. An extraordinary council may also be convened at any time by the lord chancellor. Sweet.

COUNCIL OF THE NORTH. A court instituted by Henry VIII. in 1537, to administer justice in Yorkshire and the four other northern counties. Under the presidency of Stratford, the court showed great rigor, bordering, it is alleged, on harshness. It was abolished by 16 Car. I., the same act which abolished the star chamber. Brown.

COUNSEL. The counsellors who are associated in the management of a particular cause, or who act as legal advisers in reference to any matter requiring legal knowledge and judgment.

The term is used both as a singular and plural noun, to denote one or more, though it is perhaps more common, when speaking of one of several counsellors concerned in the management of a case in court, to say that he is "of counsel."

Knowledge. A grand jury is sworn to keep secret "the commonwealth's counsel, their fellows', and their own."

COUNSELLOR AT LAW. See "Counsel;" "Attorney at Law."

COUNSEL'S SIGNATURE. In equity pleading. The signature of counsel required to be appended to a bill to denote to the court that he had perused the draft of it, or been informed of the contents thereof in such manner as would satisfy him that he might certify that it stated a case entitling the complainant to the relief prayed, and that it set the same forth with such regard to the essential rules of pleading, and with such a prayer as would entitle the bill to the consideration of the chancellor. 19 N. J. Eq. 180. Though the drawing of a bill is properly the duty of the solicitor, yet in practice it is usually both drawn and signed by counsel. Daniell, Ch. Pr. 311.

COUNT (Fr. comte, from the Latin comes). An earl. It gave way as a distinct title to the Saxon earl, but was retained in countess, viscount, and as the basis of county. Termes de la Ley; 1 Bl. Comm. 398. See "Comes."

——In Pleading. The plaintiff's statement of his cause of action. This word, derived from the French conte, a narrative, is in our old law books used synonymously with "declaration;" but practice has introduced the following distinction: When the plaintiff's complaint embraces only a single cause of action, and he makes only one statement of it, that statement is called, indifferently, a "declaration" or "count," though the former is the more usual term; but when the suit embraces two or more causes of action, each of which, of course, requires a different statement, or when the plaintiff makes two or more different statements of one and the same cause of action, each several statement is called a "count," and all of them, collectively, constitute the "declaration." In all cases, however, in which there are two or more counts, whether there is actually but one cause of action or several, each count purports, upon the face of it, to disclose a distinct right of action, unconnected with that stated in any of the other counts.

COUNTEE. An earl. Litt. 61, 181, 335.

COUNTER, or COMPTER. The name of two prisons formerly standing in London, but now demolished. They were the Poultry Counter and Wood Street Counter. Cowell; Whishaw; Coke, 4th Inst. 248.

COUNTER AFFIDAVIT. An affidavit made in opposition to one already made. This is allowed in the preliminary examination of some cases.

COUNTER BOND. A bond to indemnify. 2 Leon. 90.

COUNTER FEASANCE. The act of forging.

COUNTER LETTER. An agreement to recovery where property has been passed by absolute deed with the intention that it shall serve as security only. A defeasance by a separate instrument. 11 Pet. (U. S.) 351.

COUNTER ROLL (Law Fr. contreroule, conterrolle; Law Lat. contra rotulus). In old English law and practice. A roll kept by an officer as a check upon another officer's roll. Sheriffs and coroners were anciently required to keep rolls or records of what was done before them. Bracton, fols. 121b, 140b; Britt. c. 1. Le vicont eit counterrolles ove les coroners, auxybien des appeals come des enquests, etc., the sheriff shall have counter rolls with the coroners, as well of appeals as of inquests, etc. St. Westminster I. c. 10.

COUNTER SECURITY. Security given to one who has become security for another, the condition of which is, that if the one who first became surety shall be damnified, the one who gives the counter security will indemnify him.

COUNTERCLAIM. See "Set-Off."

COUNTERFEIT. In criminal law. To make something false in the semblance of that which is true. It always implies a fraudulent intent. Generally applied to the imitation of coin of the realm.

COUNTERMAND. A change or recalling of orders previously given.

Express countermand takes place when contrary orders are given, and a revocation of the prior order is made.

Implied countermand takes place when a new order is given which is inconsistent with the former order.

COUNTERPART. Formerly, each party to an indenture executed a separate deed; that part which was executed by the grantor was called the "original," and the rest the "counterparts." It is now usual for all the parties to execute every part, and this makes them all originals. 2 Bl. Comm. 296.

COUNTERPLEA. In pleading. A plea to some matter incidental to the main object of the suit, and out of the direct line of pleadings. 2 Wm. Saund. 45h.

Thus, counterplea of oyer is the defendant's allegations why oyer of an instrument should not be granted.

Counterplea of aid prayer is the demandant's allegation why the vouchee of the tenant in a real action, or a stranger who asks to come in to defend his right, should not be admitted.

Counterplea of voucher is the allegation of the vouchee in avoidance of the warranty after admission to plead.

Counterpleas are of rare occurrence. Termes de la Ley; Doct. Plac. 300; Comyn, Dig. "Voucher" (B 1, 2); Dane, Abr.

COUNTEZ (Law Fr. count, or reckon). In old practice. A direction formerly given by the clerk of a court to the crier, after a jury was sworn, to number them, and which Blackstone says was given in his time, in good English, "count these." 4 Bl. Comm. 340, note (u).

COUNTOR, COUNTER, or COUNTOUR (Law Fr. contour, from counter or conter, to relate, recite, or state orally; Law Lat. narrator). In old English practice. An advocate or professional pleader; one who counted for his client, that is, related his case, recited his count, or orally pleaded his cause.

COUNTY. One of the civil divisions of a country for judicial and political purposes. 1 Bl. Comm. 113. Etymologically, it denotes that portion of the country under the immediate government of a count. Id. 116.

The United States are generally divided into counties. Counties are, in many of the states, divided into townships or towns. In the New England states, however, towns are the basis of all civil divisions, and the counties are rather to be considered as aggregates of towns, so far as their origin is concerned. In Pennsylvania, the state was originally divided into three counties by William Penn. See Proud, Hist. vol. 1, p. 234; Id. vol. 2, p. 258.

In the English law, this word signifies the same as "shire,"—county being derived from the French, and shire from the Saxon. Both these words signify a circuit or portion of the realm into which the whole land is divided, for the better government thereof, and the more easy administration of justice. There is no part of England that is not within some county; and the shire-reeve (sheriff) was the governor of the province, under the comes, earl or count.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS. Certain officers generally intrusted with the superintendence of the collection of the county taxes, and the disbursements made for the county. They are invested by the local laws with various powers.

COUNTY CORPORATE. A city or town, with more or less territory annexed, constituting a county by itself. 1 Bl. Comm. 120. Something similar to this exists in this country in regard to Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. They differ in no material points from other counties.

COUNTY COURT.

——In English Law. Tribunals of limited jurisdiction, originally established under St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. They had, at their institution, jurisdiction of actions for the recovery of debts, damages, and demands, legacies, and balances of partnership accounts, where the sum sued for did not exceed twenty pounds. It has since been much extended, especially in cases where the parties give assent in writing. They are chiefly regulated by St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 74. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 76.

Tribunals of limited jurisdiction in the county of Middlesex, established under St. 23 Geo. II. c. 33.

These courts are held once a month at least in every hundred in the county of Middlesex, by the county clerk and a jury of twelve suitors, or freeholders, summoned for that purpose. They examine the parties under oath, and make such order in the case as they shall judge agreeable to conscience. 3 Steph. Comm. 452; 3 Bl. Comm. 83.

The county court was a court of great antiquity, and originally of much splendor and importance. It was a court of limited jurisdiction incident to the jurisdiction of the sheriff, in which, however, the suitors were really the judges, while the sheriff was a ministerial officer. It had jurisdiction of personal actions for the recovery of small debts, and of many real actions prior to their abolition. By virtue of a justicies, it might entertain jurisdiction of personal actions to any amount. At this court, all proclamations of laws, outlawries, etc., were made, and the elections of such officers as sheriffs, coroners, and others took place. In the time of Edward I. it was held by the earl and bishop, and was of great dignity. It was superseded by the courts of requests to a great degree; and these, in turn, gave way to the new county courts, as they are sometimes called distinctively.

——In American Law. Courts in many of the states of the United States, and in Canada, of widely varying powers, in some states being courts of general original jurisdiction, and in others courts of probate or limited jurisdiction.

COUNTY PALATINE. A county possessing certain peculiar privileges. The owners of such counties have kingly powers within their jurisdictions, as the pardoning crimes, issuing writs, etc. These counties have either passed into the hands of the crown, or have lost their peculiar privileges to a great degree. 1 Bl. Comm. 117; 4 Bl. Comm. 431. The name is derived from palatium (palace), and was applied because the earls anciently had palaces, and maintained regal state. Cowell; Spelman; 1 Bl. Comm. 117.

COUNTY RATE. An imposition levied on the occupiers of lands in England, and applied to many miscellaneous purposes, among which the most important are those of defraying the expenses connected with prisons, reimbursing to private parties the costs they have incurred in prosecuting public offenders, and defraying the expenses of the county police. Wharton.

COUNTY SESSIONS. In England. The general quarter sessions of the peace for each county, which are held four times a year. Wharton; Warren, Law Stud. 367.

COUPONS. Those parts of a commercial instrument which are to be cut, and which are evidence of something connected with the contract mentioned in the instrument. They are generally attached to certificates of loan, where the interest is payable at particular periods, and, when the interest is paid, they are cut off and delivered to the payor.

COUR DE CASSATION. In French law. The supreme judicial tribunal and court of final resort. It is composed of forty-nine counsellors and judges, including a first president and three presidents of chamber, an attorney general and six advocates general, one head registrar and four deputy registrars appointed by the head registrar, and a certain number of ushers. Jones, Fr. Bar, 22; Guyot, Rep. Univ.

The jurisdiction of the court is only on error shown in the proceedings of the lower courts in matters of law, taking the facts as found by the lower courts.

COURSE. The direction of a line with reference to a meridian.

Where there are no monuments, the land must be bounded by the courses and distances mentioned in the patent or deed. 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 444; 3 Pet. (U. S.) 96; 3 Murph. (N. C.) 82; 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 267; 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 254. When the lines are actually marked, they must be adhered to, though they vary from the course mentioned in the deeds. 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 304; 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 7. See 3 Call (Va.) 239; 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 333. See "Boundary."

COURSE OF THE VOYAGE. By this term is understood the regular and customary track, if such there be, which a ship takes in going from one port to another, and the shortest way. Marsh. Ins. 185.

COURSE OF TRADE. What is usually done in the management of trade or business.

Men are presumed to act for their own interest, and to pursue the way usually adopted by men generally; hence it is presumed in law that men in their actions will pursue the usual course of trade.

COURT (Lat. cohors, an inclosure). A body in the government to which the public administration of justice is delegated.

A tribunal established for the administration of justice. 18 Mo. 570.

The presence of a sufficient number of the members of a judicial body regularly convened in an authorized place at an appointed time, engaged in the performance of its functions. It is to be observed, however, that a court does not come into being when it convenes, or pass out of existence when it adjourns.

The idea of place in the Latin word from which the term is derived is given too great prominence in some definitions, notably in that of Blackstone, that a court is "a place where justice is judicially administered" (3 Bl. Comm. 23); a court being a tribunal rather than a place.

The term is also used to signify the judge or judges themselves when duly convened, in contradistinction from the jury, and also in contradistinction from the judge or judges when not convened as a court.

It has been said that in every court there must be three constituent parts,—the plaintiff, the defendant, and the judicial power (actor, reus, and judex) (3 Bl. Comm. 25); but it is manifestly not essential to the idea of a court that it have a cause pending before it. See 1 Abb. Mich. Prac. § 2.

——Classification. Courts are divided into courts of record and courts not of record; a court of record being one whose acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled or recorded, and courts not of record being those inferior courts whose proceedings are not formally recorded or enrolled.

Courts are also divided, as to the extent of their jurisdiction, into courts of general jurisdiction, and courts of limited or special jurisdiction; the former being those courts whose jurisdiction extends to all cases comprised within a class or classes, especially to cases of a civil nature (109 U. S. 278), and the latter being those courts which are limited either as to the value or the nature of the pleas which they may entertain, or as to the territory over which their jurisdiction extends.

According to the nature of their jurisdiction, and the principles upon which it is exercised, courts are said to be of original jurisdiction, intermediate or appellate; civil or criminal; ecclesiastical; of law or of equity; of admiralty; courts martial.

COURT BARON. A domestic court, incident to every manor, to be held by the steward within the manor, for redressing misdemeanors and nuisances therein, and for settling disputes among the tenants relating to property. It is not a court of record.

Customary court baron is one appertaining entirely to copyholders. See "Customary Court Baron."

Freeholders' court baron is one held before the freeholders who owe suit and service to the manor. It is the court baron proper. These courts have now fallen into great disuse in England, and provision is made by St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, § 14, enabling the lord of any manor which has a court in which debts or demands are recoverable to surrender to the crown the right of holding such court, and, upon such surrender, the court is discontinued, and the right of holding it ceases. In the state of New York, such courts were held while the state was a province. See charters in Bolton's History of New Chester. The court has derived its name from the fact that it was the court of the baron or lord of the manor (3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 33, note. See Fleta, lib. 2, c. 53), though it is explained by some as being the court of the freeholders, who were in some instances called barons (Co. Litt. 58a).

COURT FOR CROWN CASES RESERVED. The court created by St. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, for the decision of questions of law arising on the trial of a person convicted of treason, felony, or misdemeanor (e. g., at the central criminal court, the assizes, or quarter sessions), and reserved by the judge or justices at the trial, for the consideration of the court. For this purpose, the judge or justices state and sign a case setting forth the question and the facts out of which it arises. Archb. Crim. Pl. 191. The jurisdiction is now exercised by the judges of the high court of justice, or five of them, at the least. Their decision is final. Judicature Act 1873, §§ 47, 100.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. In English law. A court which has the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the ecclesiastical courts in respect of divorces a mensa et thoro, suits of nullity of marriage, suits of jactitation of marriage, suits for restitution of conjugal rights, and all suits, causes, and matters matrimonial. It consists of the lord chancellor and the justices of the queen's bench, the common pleas, the exchequer, and the judge of the court of probate, who is entitled "Judge ordinary." The judge ordinary exercises all the powers of the court, except petitions for dissolving or annulling marriages, and applications for new trials of matters of fact, bills of exception, special verdict and special cases, for hearing which excepted cases he must be joined by two of the other judges. Provision is made for his absence by authorizing the lord chancellor to appoint one of certain judicial persons to act in such absence. Juries may be summoned to try matters of fact, and such trials are conducted in the same manner as jury trials at common law. See St. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85; St. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108; St. 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61.

COURT FOR THE RELIEF OF INSOLVENT DEBTORS IN ENGLAND. In English law. A local court which has its sittings in London only, which receives the petitions of insolvent debtors, and decides upon the question of granting a discharge. It is held by the commissioners of bankruptcy, and its decisions, if in favor of a discharge, are not reversible by any other tribunal. See 3 Steph. Comm. 426; 4 Steph. Comm. 287, 288.

COURT FOR THE TRIAL OF IMPEACHMENTS. A tribunal for determining the guilt or innocence of any person properly impeached. In England, the house of lords, and in this country, generally, the more select branch of the legislative assembly, constitutes a court for the trial of impeachments. See "Impeachment."

COURT HAND. In old English practice. The peculiar hand in which the records of courts were written from the ealiest period down to the reign of George II. Its characteristics were great strength, compactness, and undeviating uniformity, and its use undoubtedly gave to the ancient record its acknowledged superiority over the modern, in the important quality of durability. Sir James Burrows, speaking of St. 4 Geo. II. c. 26, thus forcibly contrasts this style of writing with that by which it was superseded: "A statute now took place for converting them [common-law pleadings] from a fixed dead language to a fluctuating living one, and for altering the strong, solid, compact hand, calculated to last for ages, wherein they were used to be written, into a species of handwriting so weak, flimsy and diffuse that many a modern record will hardly outlive its writer, and few perhaps will survive much above a century." 1 Burrows, pref. iv. Sir William Blackstone mentions another disadvantage attending the disuse of the old hand, "whereby the reading of any record that is fifty years old is now become the object of science, and calls for the help of an antiquarian." 3 Bl. Comm. 323.

The writing of this hand, with its peculiar abbreviations and contractions, constituted, while it was in use, an art of no little importance, being an indispensable part of the profession of clerkship, as it was called. Two sizes of it were employed,—a large and a small hand; the former, called "great court hand," being used for initial words or clauses, the placita of records, etc. Towns. Pl. passim; Instr. Cler. passim. See "Record."

COURT HOUSE. A building used for the holding of sessions of court, whether such use be permanent or temporary. 65 Ga. 165.

COURT LANDS. Domains or lands kept in the lord's hands to serve his family.

COURT LEET (Law Lat. curia letae, the court of the leet). A court of record in England, held once or twice in every year within a particular hundred, lordship, or manor, before the steward of the leet, for the preservation of the peace, and the punishment of all trivial misdemeanors. Kitch. Cts. Its original intent was to view the frank pledges,—that is, the freemen of the liberty who anciently were all mutually pledges for the good behavior of each other,—and hence it was called, by the Anglo-Normans, the "view of frank pledge," visus franci plegii. 4 Bl. Comm. 273; Spelman, voc. "Leta;" 4 Inst. 261; Mirr. c. 1, § 10; 2 Hawk. P. C. 72; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. 495, § 637 et seq.; Tomlin. It has, however, latterly fallen into almost total desuetude; its business having, for the most part, gradually devolved upon the quarter sessions. 4 Steph. Comm. 340. See "Leet;" "Frank Pledge;" "View of Frank Pledge."

COURT-MARTIAL. A military or naval tribunal, which has jurisdiction of offenses against the law of the service, military or naval, in which the offender is engaged.

The original tribunal, for which courts-martial are a partial substitute, was the court of chivalry (q. v.) These courts exist and have their jurisdiction by virtue of the military law, the court being constituted and empowered to act in each instance by authority from a commanding officer. The general principles applicable to courts-martial in the army and navy are essentially the same, and, for consideration of the exact distinctions between them, reference must be had to the works of writers upon these subjects. Courts-martial for the regulation of the militia are held in the various states under local statutes, which resemble in their main features those provided for in the army of the United States; and when in actual service, the militia, like the regular troops, are subject to courts-martial, composed, however, of militia officers.

As to their constitution and jurisdiction, these courts may belong to one of the following classes:

(1) General, which have jurisdiction over every species of offense of which courts-martial have jurisdiction. They are to be composed in the United States of not less than five nor more than thirteen commissioned officers of suitable rank, according to the exigencies of the service, and in England of not less than thirteen commissioned officers, except in special cases, and usually do consist of more than that number.

(2) Regimental, which have jurisdiction of some minor offenses occurring in a regiment or corps. They consist in the United States of not less than three commissioned officers; in England, of not less than five commissioned officers, when that number can be assembled without detriment to the service, and of not less than three, in any event. The jurisdiction of this class of courts-martial extends only to offenses less than capital committed by those below the rank of commissioned officers, and their decision is subject to revision by the commanding officer of the division, regiment, or detachment, by the officer who appointed them, or by certain superior officers.

(3) Garrison, which have jurisdiction of some minor offenses occurring in a garrison, fort, or barracks. They are of the same constitution as to number and qualifications of members as regimental courts-martial. Their limits of jurisdiction in degree are the same, and their decisions are in a similar manner subject to revision.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY. See "Admiralty."

COURT OF ANCIENT DEMESNE. In English law. A court of peculiar constitution, held by a bailiff appointed by the king, in which alone the tenants of the king's demesne could be impleaded. 2 Burrows, 1046; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 100; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 99; 1 Report Eng. Real Prop. Comm. 28, 29; 3 Steph. Comm. 211, 212.

COURT OF APPEALS. In American law. An appellate tribunal, which, in some states, as Kentucky, Maryland, and New York, is the court of last resort, and in others, as Illinois, is an intermediate appellate court.

COURT OF ARBITRATION OF THE chamber of commerce. A court of arbitrators, created for the convenience of merchants in the city of New York, by act of the legislature of New York. Laws 1874, c. 278; Laws 1875, c. 495. It decides disputes between members and outside merchants who voluntarily submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court.

COURT OF ARCHES (Law Lat. curia de arcubus). In English ecclesiastical law. A court of appeal, and of original jurisdiction.

The most ancient consistory court belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury for the trial of spiritual causes, the judge of which is called the "dean of the arches," because he anciently held his court in the church of St. Mary le Bow (Sancta Maria de Arcubus, —literally, "St. Mary of Arches"), so named from the style of its steeple, which is raised upon pillars built archwise, like so many bent bows. Termes de la Ley. It is now held, as are also the other spiritual courts, in the hall belonging to the College of Civilians, commonly called "Doctors' Commons."

Its proper jurisdiction is only over the thirteen peculiar parishes belonging to the archbishop in London; but, the office of dean of the arches having been for a long time united with that of the archbishop's principal official, the judge of the arches, in right of such added office, receives and determines appeals from the sentences of all inferior ecclesiastical courts within the province. 3 Bl. Comm. 64; 3 Steph. Comm. 431; Wharton, "Arches Court."

COURT OF ATTACHMENTS. The lowest of the three courts held in the forests. The highest court is called "Justice in Eyre's Seat;" the middle, the "Sweinmote;" and the lowest, the "Attachment." Sharswood, For. Laws, 90, 99; Wharton, "Attachment of the Forests."

The court of attachments is to be held before the verderors of the forest once in every forty days, to inquire of all offenders against vert and venison, by receiving from the foresters or keepers their attachments or presentments de viridi et venatione, enrolling them, and certifying them under their seals to the court of justice seat, or sweinmote; for this court can only inquire of offenders; it cannot convict them. 3 Bl. Comm. 439; Carta de Foresta, 9 Hen. III. c. 8; Termes de la Ley. But see "Forest Courts."

COURT OF AUDIENCE. Ecclesiastical courts, in which the primates once exercised in person a considerable part of their jurisdiction. They seem to be now obsolete, or at least to be only used on the rare occurrence of the trial of a bishop. Phillim. Ecc. Law, 1201, 1204.

COURT OF AUGMENTATION. A court established by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 27, for managing the revenues and possessions of all monasteries whose income was under two hundred pounds a year (which by an act of parliament of the same session had been given to the king), and for determining suits relating thereto. It was called the "Court of the Augmentations of the Revenues of the King's Crown," from the augmentation of the revenues of the crown derived from the suppression of the monasteries, and was a court of record, with one great seal and one privy seal; the officers being a chancellor, who had the great seal, a treasurer, a king's attorney and solicitor, ten auditors, seventeen receivers, with clerk, usher, etc.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY. A court of record, in England, with jurisdiction in bankruptcy, primary and appellate, and which is declared a court of law and equity for that purpose. The nature of its constitution may be learned from the early sections of the bankrupt law consolidation act of 1849.

COURT OF CHANCERY, or CHANCERY. A court existing in England and several of the United States, which possesses an extensive equity jurisdiction.

The name is said by some to be derived from that of the chief judge, who is called a "chancellor." Others derive both names directly from the cancelli (bars), which in this court anciently separated the press of people from the officers. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 46, note. See "Cancellarius."

——In American Law. A court of general equity jurisdiction.

The terms "equity" and "chancery," "court of equity" and "court of chancery," are constantly used as synonymous in the United States. It is presumed that this custom arises from the circumstance that the equity jurisdiction which is exercised by the courts of the various states is assimilated to that possessed by the English courts of chancery. Indeed, in some of the states it is made identical therewith by statute, so far as conformable to our institutions.

Separate courts of chancery or equity exist in a few of the states; in others, the courts of law sit also as courts of equity; in others, equitable relief is administered under the forms of the common law; and in others, the distinction between law and equity has been formally abolished, or never existed. The federal courts exercise an equity jurisdiction, whether the state courts in the district are courts of equity or not. 2 McLean (U. S.) 568; 15 Pet. (U. S.) 9; 11 How. (U. S.) 669; 13 How. (U. S.) 268, 519.

——In English Law. The highest court of judicature next to parliament.

The superior court of chancery, called, distinctively, the "High Court of Chancery," consists of six separate tribunals, viz.: The court of the lord high chancellor of Great Britain; the court of the master of the rolls, or keeper of the records in chancery; the court of appeal in chancery (q. v.); the three separate courts of the vice chancellors.

COURT OF CHIVALRY. In English law. An ancient military court, possessing both civil and criminal jurisdiction touching matters of arms and deeds of war.

As a court of civil jurisdiction, it was held by the lord high constable of England while that office was filled, and the earl marshal, jointly, and subsequently to the attainder of Stafford, duke of Buckingham, in the time of Henry VIII., by the earl marshal alone. It had cognizance, by St. 13 Rich. II. c. 2, "of contracts and other matters touching deeds of arms and war, as well out of the realm as within it." This jurisdiction was of importance while the English kings held territories in France.

As a court of criminal jurisdiction, it could be held only by the lord high constable and earl marshal jointly. It had jurisdiction over "pleas of life and member arising in matters of arms and deeds of war, as well out of the realm as within it."

It was not a court of record, could neither fine nor imprison (7 Mod. 127), and has fallen entirely into disuse (3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 68; 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 268).

COURT OF CLAIMS. This court, as originally created by the statute of February 24, 1855 (10 St. at Large, 12), consisted of three judges, with jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of congress, or regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States, and of all claims which might be referred to it by either house of congress.

The court had no power to render a judgment which it could execute, but reported to congress the cases upon which it had finally acted, the material facts it found established by the evidence, with its opinion in the case, and reasons therefor, or what was equivalent to an opinion in the nature of a judgment as to the rights of the parties upon the facts proved or admitted in the case. Bright. Dig. 198-200.

By an amendatory act of March 3, 1863, two judges were added. In addition to the jurisdiction previously conferred upon the court, it is now authorized to take jurisdiction of all set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the government against any person making claim against the government in said court. If the judgment of the court shall be in favor of the government, it shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the proper district or circuit court of the United States, and shall ipso facto become and be a judgment of such district or circuit court, and shall be enforced in like manner as other judgments are. If the judgment shall be in favor of the claimant, the sum thereby found due to the claimant shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment of private claims, on presentation to the secretary of the treasury of a duly-certified copy of said judgment.

Proceedings in the court of claims originate by petition filed; and testimony used in the hearing and determination of claims is taken by commissioners who are appointed by the court for the purpose.

COURT OF COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS. See "Commissioners of Sewers."

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

——In American Law. A court of original and general jurisdiction for the trial of issues of fact and law according to the principles of the common law.

Courts of this name still exist in some of the states of the United States, and frequently have a criminal as well as civil jurisdiction. They are, in general, courts of record, being expressly made so by statute in Pennsylvania. 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 246. In Pennsylvania they exercise an equity jurisdiction, also, as well as that at common law. Courts of substantially similar powers to those indicated in the definition exist in all the states, under various names; and for peculiarities in their constitution reference is made to the articles on the states in regard to which the question may arise.

——In English Law. One of the three superior courts of common law at Westminster.

This court, which is sometimes called, also, bancus communis, bancus, and common bench, is a branch of the aula regis, and was at its institution ambulatory, following the household of the king. In the eleventh clause of Magna Charta, A. D. 1214, it is provided that it shall be held at some fixed place, which is Westminster. The establishment of this court at Westminster, and the consequent construction of the Inns of Court, and gathering together of the common-law lawyers, enabled the law itself to withstand the attacks of the canonists and civilians. It derived its name from the fact that the causes of common people were heard there. It had exclusive jurisdiction of real actions as long as those actions were in use, and had also an extensive, and, for a long time, exclusive, jurisdiction of all actions between subjects. This latter jurisdiction, however, was gradually encroached upon by the king's bench and exchequer, with which it now has a concurrent jurisdiction in many matters. Formerly none but serjeants at law were admitted to practice before this court in banc (6 Bing. [N. C.] 235), but by St. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, § 61, and St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 54, all barristers at law have the right of "practice, pleading, and audience."

It consists of one chief and four puisne or associate justices.

It has a civil, common-law jurisdiction, concurrent with the king's bench and exchequer, of personal actions and actions of ejectment, and a peculiar or exclusive jurisdiction of real actions, actions under the railway and canal traffic act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), the registration of judgments, annuities, etc. (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; 18 Vict. c. 15); respecting fees for conveyances under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74; the examination of married women concerning their conveyances (11 & 12 Vict. c. 70; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, § 73); and of appeals from the revising barristers' court (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18). Wharton.

Appeals formerly lay from this court to the king's bench; but, by the statutes of 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, appeals for errors in law are now taken to the judges of the king's bench and barons of exchequer in the exchequer chambers, from whose judgment an appeal lies only to the house of lords. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 40.

COURT OF CONVOCATION. In English ecclesiastical law. A convocation or ecclesiastical synod, which is in the nature of an ecclesiastical parliament.

There is one for each province. They are composed, respectively, of the archbishop, all the bishops, deans, and archdeacons of their province, with one proctor, or representative, from each chapter, and, in the province of Canterbury, two proctors for the beneficed parochial clergy in each diocese, while in the province of York there are two proctors for each archdeaconry. In York the convocation consists of only one house; but in Canterbury there are two houses, of which the archbishop and bishops form the upper house, and the lower consists of the remaining members of the convocation. In this house a prolocutor, performing the duty of president, is elected. These assemblies meet at the time appointed in the queen's writ. The convocation has long been summoned pro forma only, but is still, in fact, summoned before the meeting of every new parliament, and adjourns immediately afterwards, without proceeding to the dispatch of any business.

The purpose of the convocation is stated to be the enactment of canon law, subject to the license and authority of the sovereign, and consulting on ecclesiastical matters.

In their judicial capacity, their jurisdiction extends to matters of heresy, schisms, and other mere spiritual or ecclesiastical causes; an appeal lying from their judicial proceedings to the queen in council, by St. 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92. Cowell; Termes de la Ley; Bac. Abr. "Ecclesiastical Courts" (A 1); 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 279.

COURT OF EQUITY. A court which administers justice according to the principles of equity.

As to the constitution and jurisdiction of such courts, see "Court of Chancery."

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

——In English Law. A superior court of record, administering justice in questions of law and revenue.

It is the lowest in rank of the three superior common-law courts of record, and had jurisdiction originally only of cases of injury to the revenue by withholding or nonpayment. The privilege of suing and being sued in this court in personal actions was extended to the king's accountants, and then, by a fiction that the plaintiff was a debtor of the king, to all personal actions. It had formerly an equity jurisdiction, and there was then an equity court; but, by St. 5 Vict. c. 5, this jurisdiction was transferred to the court of chancery.

It consists of one chief and four puisne judges or barons.

As a court of revenue, its proceedings are regulated by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 1, § 9.

As a court of common law, it administers redress between subject and subject in all actions whatever, except real actions.

The appellate jurisdiction from this court is to the judges of the king's bench and common pleas sitting as the court of exchequer chamber, and from this latter court to the house of lords. 3 Steph. Comm. 400-402; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 44-46.

——In Scotch Law. A court which formerly had jurisdiction of matters of revenue, and a limited jurisdiction over cases between the crown and its vassals, where no questions of title were involved.

This court was established by St. 6 Anne, c. 26, and its processes resembled those in the English court of exchequer. It is now merged in the court of sessions; but the name is still applied to this branch of the latter court, which is held by two of the judges acting in rotation. Paterson, Comp. 1055, note. The proceedings are regulated by St. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 56.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER. In English law. A court for the correction and prevention of errors of law in the three superior common-law courts of the kingdom.

A court of exchequer chamber was first erected by St. 31 Edw. III. c. 12, to determine causes upon writs of error from the common-law side of the exchequer court. It consisted of the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, and the justices of the king's bench and common pleas. A second court of exchequer chamber was instituted by St. 27 Eliz. c. 8, consisting of the justices of the common pleas and the exchequer, which had jurisdiction in error of cases commenced in the king's bench. By the statutes of 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, these courts were abolished, and the present court of exchequer chamber substituted in their place.

As a court of debate, it is composed of the judges of the three superior courts of law, to whom is sometimes added the lord chancellor. To this court, questions of unusual difficulty or moment are referred before judgment from either of the three courts.

As a court of appeals, it consists of the judges of two of the three superior courts of law (common bench, king's bench, and exchequer) sitting to decide questions appealed from the others. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 55. From the decisions of this court a writ of error lies to the house of lords.

COURT OF FACULTIES. In ecclesiastical law. A tribunal, in England, belonging to the archbishop.

It does not hold pleas in any suits, but creates rights to pews, monuments, and other mortuary matters. It has also various other powers under 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, in granting licenses, faculties, dispensations, etc., of different descriptions; as, a license to marry, a faculty to erect an organ in a parish church, to level a church yard, to remove bodies previously buried; and it may also grant dispensations to eat flesh on days prohibited, or to ordain a deacon under age, and the like. The archbishop's office in this tribunal is called magister ad facultates. Coke, 4th Inst. 337; 2 Chit. Gen. Prac. 507.

COURT OF GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS of the peace.

——In American Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction.

——In English Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction, in England, held in each county once in every quarter of a year. It is held before two or more justices of the peace, one of whom must be a justice of the quorum.

The stated times of holding sessions are fixed by St. 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, § 35. When held at other times than quarterly, the sessions are called "general sessions of the peace."

As to the jurisdiction of the various sessions, see 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25; 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 271.

COURT OF HUSTINGS.

——In English Law. The county court in the city of London. It is held nominally before the lord mayor, recorder, and aldermen, but the recorder is practically the sole judge. It has an appellate jurisdiction of causes in the sheriff's court of London. A writ of error lies from the decisions of this court to certain commissioners, usually five of the judges of the superior courts of law, from whose judgment a writ of error lies to the house of lords. No merely personal actions can be brought in this court. See 3 Bl. Comm. 80, note; 3 Steph. Comm. 449, note; Maddox, Hist. Exch. c. 20; Coke, 2d Inst. 327; Calth. 131.

——In American Law. A local court in some parts of the state of Virginia. 6 Grat. (Va.) 696.

COURT OF INQUIRY.

——In English Law. A court sometimes appointed by the crown to ascertain the propriety of resorting to ulterior proceedings against a party charged before a court-martial. See 2 Steph. Comm. 600, note (z); 1 Coleridge, Bl. Comm. 418, note; 2 Brod. & B. 130.

——In American Law. A court constituted by authority of the articles of war, invested with the power to examine into the nature of any transaction, accusation, or imputation against any officer or soldier. The said court shall consist of one or more officers, not exceeding three, and a judge advocate, or other suitable person, as a recorder, to reduce the proceedings and evidence to writing; all of whom shall be sworn to the performance of their duty. Rev. St. U. S. §§ 1342, 1624.

COURT OF JUSTICE SEAT. In English law. The principal of the forest courts.

It was held before the chief justice in eyre, or his deputy, to hear and determine all trespasses within the forest, and all claims of franchises, liberties, privileges, and all pleas and causes whatsoever, therein arising. It might also try presentments in the inferior courts of the forests, and give judgment upon conviction of the sweinmote. After presentment made or indictment found, the chief justice might issue his warrant to the officers of the forest to apprehend the offenders. It might be held every third year, and forty days' notice was to be given of its sitting.

COURT OF JUSTICIARY. In Scotch law. A court of general criminal and limited civil jurisdiction.

It consists of the lord justice general, the lord justice clerk, and five other members of the court of sessions. The kingdom is divided into three circuits, in each of which two sessions, of not less than three days each, are to be held annually. Any two of the justices, or the lord justice general alone, or, in Glasgow, a simple justice, may hold a term, except in Edinburgh, where three justices constitute a quorum, and four generally sit in important cases.

Its criminal jurisdiction extends to all crimes committed in any part of the kingdom; and it has the power of reviewing the sentences of all inferior criminal courts, unless excluded by statute. Alison, Prac. 25.

Its civil jurisdiction on circuits is appellate and final in cases involving not more than twelve pounds sterling. See Paterson, Comp. § 940, note, et seq.; Bell, Dict.; Alison, Prac. 25; 20 Geo. II. c. 43; 23 Geo. III. c. 45; 30 Geo. III. c. 17; 1 Wm. IV. c. 69, § 19; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 79, § 8.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH. In English law. The supreme court of common law in the kingdom.

It is one of the successors of the aula regis, and received its name, it is said, because the king formerly sat in it in person, the style of the court being coram rege ipso, before the king himself. During the reign of a queen it is called the "queen's bench," and during Cromwell's protectorate it was called the "upper bench." Its jurisdiction was originally confined to the correction of crimes and misdemeanors which amounted to a breach of the peace, including those trespasses which were committed with force (vi et armis), and in the commission of which there was, therefore, a breach of the peace. By aid of a fiction of the law, the number of actions which might be alleged to be so committed was gradually increased until the jurisdiction extended to all actions of the case, of debt upon statutes or where fraud was alleged, and, finally, included all personal actions whatever, and the action of ejectment. See "Assumpsit;" "Arrest;" "Attachment." It is, from its constitution, ambulatory, and liable to follow the king's person, all process in this court being returnable "ubicunque fuerimus in Anglia," wherever in England we, the sovereign, may be, but has for some centuries been held at Westminster.

It consists of a lord chief justice and four puisne or associate justices, who are, by virtue of their office, conservators of the peace and supreme coroners of the land.

It has general criminal jurisdiction, and also a considerable civil jurisdiction.

COURT OF MAGISTRATES AND FREEholders. In American law. The name of a court existing in South Carolina, before the abolition of slavery, for the trial of slaves and free persons of color for criminal offenses.

COURT OF NISI PRIUS. In American law. A court of original civil jurisdiction in the city and county of Philadelphia, held by one of the judges of the supreme court of the state. See, also, "Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius;" "Nisi Prius."

COURT OF ORDINARY. In American law. A court which has jurisdiction of the probate of wills, and the regulation of the management of decedents' estates. Such courts exist in Georgia, New Jersey, South Carolina, and Texas. See 2 Kent, Comm. 409; "Ordinary."

COURT OF ORPHANS. In English law. The court of the lord mayor and aldermen of London, which has the care of those orphans whose parent died in London, and was free of the city.

By the custom of London, this court is entitled to the possession of the person, lands, and chattels of every infant whose parent was free of the city at the time of his death, and who died in the city. The executor or administrator of such deceased parent is obliged to exhibit inventories of the estate of the deceased, and give security to the chamberlain for the orphan's part or share. 2 Steph. Comm. 343.

COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER. In American law. The name of courts of criminal jurisdiction in several of the states of the American Union, as in Georgia, New Jersey, and New York.

COURT OF PASSAGE. An inferior court, possessing a very ancient jurisdiction over causes of action arising within the borough of Liverpool. It appears to have been also called the "borough court of Liverpool." It has the same jurisdiction in admiralty matters as the Lancashire county court. Rosc. Adm. 75.

COURT OF PECULIARS. In English law. A branch of the court of arches, to which it is annexed.

It has jurisdiction of all ecclesiastical causes arising in the peculiars of Canterbury or other dioceses which are exempt from the ordinary's jurisdiction, and subject to that of the metropolitan only. The court of arches has an appellate jurisdiction of causes tried in this court. 3 Bl. Comm. 65; 3 Steph. Comm. 431, 432. See "Peculiar."

COURT OF PIEPOUDRE (Fr. pied, foot, and poudre, dust, or puldreaux, old Fr. pedlar). In English law. A court of special jurisdiction incident to every fair or market.

The word piepoudre, spelled also piedpoudre and pypowder, has been considered as signifying dusty feet, pointing to the general condition of the feet of the suitors therein (Cowell; Blount); or as indicating the rapidity with which justice is administered, —as rapidly as dust can fall from the foot (Coke, 4th Inst. 472); or pedlar's feet, as being the court of such chapmen or petty traders as resorted to fairs. It was not confined to fairs or markets, but might exist, by custom, in cities, boroughs, or vills for the collection of debts and the like. Cro. Jac. 313; Cro. Car. 46; 2 Salk. 604. It was held before the steward of him who was entitled to the tolls from the market. It has fallen into disuse.

The civil jurisdiction extended to all matters of contract arising within the precinct of the fair or market during the continuance of the particular fair or market at which the court was held, the plaintiff being obliged to make oath as to the time and place.

The criminal jurisdiction embraced all offenses committed at the particular fair or market at which the court was held. An appeal lay to the courts at Westminster. See Barr. Obs. St. 337; 3 Bl. Comm. 32; Skene de Verb. Sign. "Pede Pulverosus;" Bracton, 334.

COURT OF PLEAS. A court of the county palatine of Durham, having a local common-law jurisdiction. It was abolished by the judicature act, which transferred its jurisdiction to the high court. Judicature Act 1873, § 16; 3 Bl. Comm. 79.

COURT OF POLICIES OF INSURANCE. A court of special jurisdiction which took cognizance of cases involving claims made by those insured upon policies in the city of London.

COURT OF PROBATE.

——In American Law. A court which has jurisdiction of the probate of wills, and the regulation of the management and settlement of decedents' estates, as well as a more or less extensive control of the estates of minors and other persons who are under the especial protection of the law.

——In English Law. A court in England having exclusive jurisdiction of testamentary causes or proceedings relating to the validity of wills and the succession to the property of persons deceased intestate. See St. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77; St. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95.

COURT OF QUARTER SESSIONS OF the peace. In American law. A court of criminal jurisdiction in the state of Pennsylvania. There is one such court in each county of the state. Its sessions are, in general, held at the same time and by the same judges as the court of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery. See Purd. Dig. Pa. Laws (Stroud. & B. Ed.) 692.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH. See "Court of King's Bench."

COURT OF RECORD. A judicial, organized tribunal having attributes and exercising functions independently of the person of the magistrate designated generally to hold it, and proceeding according to the course of the common law.

A court where the acts and proceedings are enrolled in parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony. 3 Bl. Comm. 24.

A court which has jurisdiction to fine and imprison, or one having jurisdiction of civil causes above forty shillings, and proceeding according to the course of the common law. 37 Me. 29.

All courts are either "of record," or "not of record." The possession of the right to fine and imprison for contempt was formerly considered as furnishing decisive evidence that a court was a court of record (Co. Litt. 117b, 260a; 1 Salk. 144; 12 Mod. 388; 2 Wm. Saund. 101a; Viner, Abr. "Courts"), and it is said that the erection of a new tribunal with this power renders it by that very fact a court of record (1 Salk. 200; 12 Mod. 388; 1 Wooddeson, Lect. 98; 3 Bl. Comm. 24, 25); but every court of record does not possess this power (1 Sid. 145; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 25, note). The mere fact that a permanent record is kept does not, in modern law, stamp the character of the court, since many courts, as probate courts, and others of limited or special jurisdiction, are obliged to keep records, and yet are held to be courts not of record. See 11 Mass. 510; 22 Pick. (Mass.) 430; 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 212; 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 268; 10 Pa. St. 158; 5 Ohio, 545; 7 Ala. 351; 25 Ala. 540. The definition first given above is taken from the opinion of Shaw, C. J., in 8 Metc. (Mass.) 171, with an additional element not required in that case for purposes of distinction, and is believed to contain all the distinctive qualities which can be said to belong to all courts technically of record at modern law.

COURT OF REGARD. In English law. One of the forest courts, in England, held every third year, for the lawing or expeditation of dogs, to prevent them from running after deer. 3 Steph. Comm. 440; 3 Bl. Comm. 71, 72.

COURT OF SESSION.

——In Scotch Law. The supreme court of civil jurisdiction in Scotland.

The full title of the court is "council and session." It was established in 1425. In 1469 its jurisdiction was transferred to the king's council, which in 1503 was ordered to sit in Edinburgh. In 1532 the jurisdiction of both courts and the joint title were transferred to the present court. The regular number of judges was fifteen; but an additional number of justices might be appointed by the crown to an unlimited extent. This privilege was renounced by 10 Geo. I. c. 19.

It consists of fifteen judges, and is divided into an inner and an outer house.

The inner house is composed of two branches or chambers, of co-ordinate jurisdiction, each consisting of four judges, and called, respectively, the "first division" and the "second division." The first division is presided over by the lord president or lord justice general, the second by the lord justice clerk. The outer house is composed of five separate courts, each presided over by a single judge, called a "lord ordinary."

Actions commence before a lord ordinary [illegible]eneral, and the party may select the [illegible]e before whom he will bring his action, subject to a removal by the lord president in case of too great an accumulation before any one or more lords ordinary. See Bell, Dict.; Paterson, Comp. § 1055, note, et seq.

——In American Law. A court of criminal jurisdiction existing in some of the states of the United States. Courts of this name exist in California, New York, and, perhaps, other states.

COURT OF STAR CHAMBER. In English law. A court which was formerly held by divers lords, spiritual and temporal, who were members of the privy council, together with two judges of the courts of common law.

It was of very ancient origin, was new modelled by 3 Hen. VII. c. 1, and 21 Hen. VIII. c. 20, and was finally abolished, after having become very odious to the people, by 16 Car. I. c. 10. The name "star chamber" is of uncertain origin. It has been thought to be from the Saxon "steoran," to govern, alluding to the jurisdiction of the court over the crime of cosenage, and has been thought to have been given because the hall in which the court was held was full of windows (Lambard, Eiren. 148); or because the roof was originally studded with gilded stars (Coke, 4th Inst. 66); or, according to Blackstone, because the Jewish covenants (called starrs or stars, and which, by a statute of Richard I., were to be enrolled in three places, one of which was near the exchequer) were originally kept there. 4 Bl. Comm. 266, note. The derivation of Blackstone receives confirmation from the fact that this location (near the exchequer) is assigned to the star chamber the first time it is mentioned. The word "star" acquired at some time the recognized signification of inventory or schedule. St. Acad. Cont. 32; 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 266, note.

The legal jurisdiction of this court extended originally to riots, perjuries, misbehavior of sheriffs, and other notorious misdemeanors. It acted without the assistance of a jury, and its proceedings were in secret, by reason of which it fell into popular disrepute. See Hudson, Court of Star Chamber (printed at the beginning of the second volume of the Collectanea Juridica); 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 266, and notes.

COURT OF SWEINMOTE, SWAINMOTE, or swaingemote (Saxon swang, an attendant, a freeholder, and mote or gemote, a meeting). In English law. One of the forest courts, held before the verderors, as judges, by the steward, thrice in every year,—the sweins or freeholders within the forest composing the jury.

This court had jurisdiction to inquire into grievances and oppressions committed by the officers of the forest, and also to receive and try presentments certified from the court of attachments, certifying the cause, in turn, under the seals of the jury, in case of conviction, to the court of justice seat for the rendition of judgment. [redacted]ll; 3 Bl. Comm. 71, 72; 3 Steph. Com[redacted]

COURT OF THE CLERK OF THE MARket. In English law. A tribunal incident to every fair and market in the kingdom, to punish misdemeanors therein.

This is the most inferior court of criminal jurisdiction in the kingdom. The object of its jurisdiction is principally the recognizance of weights and measures, to try whether they are according to the true standard thereof, which standard was anciently committed to the custody of the bishop, who appointed some clerk under him to inspect the abuse of them more narrowly; and hence this officer, though usually a layman, is called the "clerk" of the market.

The jurisdiction over weights and measures formerly exercised by the clerk of the market has been taken from him by St. 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 63.

COURT OF THE CORONER. In English law. A court of record, to inquire, when any one dies in prison, or comes to a violent or sudden death, by what manner he came to his end. 4 Steph. Comm. 341; 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 274. See "Coroner."

COURT OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASter. In English law. A court of special jurisdiction, which has jurisdiction of all matters of equity relating to lands holden of the king in right of the duchy of Lancaster.

It is held by the chancellor or his deputy, is a court of equity jurisdiction, and not of record. It is to be distinguished from the court of the county palatine of Lancaster. 3 Bl. Comm. 78.

COURT OF THE LORD HIGH STEWARD. In English law. A court instituted for the trial of peers indicted for treason, felony, or misprision of either.

This court can be held only during a recess of parliament, since the trial of a peer for either of the above offenses can take place, during a session of that body, only before the high court of parliament. It consists of a lord high steward (appointed, in modern times, pro hac vice merely), and as many of the temporal lords as may desire to take the proper oath and act; and all the peers qualified to sit and vote in parliament are to be summoned at least twenty days before the trial. St. 7 Wm. III. c. 3.

COURT OF THE LORD HIGH STEWARD of the universities. In English law. A court constituted for the trial of scholars or privileged persons connected with the university at Oxford or Cambridge who are indicted for treason, felony, or mayhem.

COURT OF THE MARSHALSEA. In English law. A court which had jurisdiction of causes to which the domestic servants were parties.

It was held by the steward of the king's household, as judge, and the marshal was the ministerial officer, and held pleas of trespasses committed within twelve miles of the sovereign's residence (called the "verge of the court"), where one of the parties was a servant of the king's household, and of all debts, contracts, and covenants where both parties were servants as above. Where one of the parties only was of the king's household, a jury of the country was summoned; in the other case, the inquest was composed of men of the household only. This court was merged, in the time of Charles I., in the palace court, and abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, § 13. See "Palace Court."

COURT OF THE STEWARD AND MARshal. See "Court of the Marshalsea."

COURT OF THE STEWARD OF THE king's household. In English law. A court which had jurisdiction of all cases of treason, misprision of treason, murder, manslaughter, bloodshed, and other malicious strikings whereby blood is shed, occurring in or within the limits of any of the palaces or houses of the king, or any other house where the royal person is abiding.

It was created by St. 33 Hen. VIII. c. 12, but long since fell into disuse. 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 276, 277, and notes.

COURT OF WARDS AND LIVERIES. In English law. A court of record in England, which had the supervision and regulation of inquiries concerning the profits which arose to the crown from the fruits of tenure, and to grant to heirs the delivery of their lands from the possession of their guardians.

The court of the king's wards was instituted by St. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 46, to take the place of the ancient inquisitio post mortem, and the jurisdiction of the restoration of lands to heirs on their becoming of age (livery) was added by St. 33 Hen. VIII. c. 22, when it became the court of wards and liveries. It was abolished by St. 12 Car. II. c. 24.

The jurisdiction extended to the superintendence of lunatics and idiots in the king's custody, granting licenses to the king's widows to marry, and imposing fines for marrying without license. 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 259; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 468; 1 Steph. Comm. 183, 192; 4 Steph. Comm. 40; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 68, 77; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 258.

COURTESY. See "Curtesy."

COURTS CHRISTIAN. Ecclesiastical courts (q. v.)

COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS. In English law. Courts composed of two or more commissioners, called "judges of assize" (or of assize and nisi prius), who are twice in every year sent by the queen's (or king's) commission on circuits all round the kingdom, to try, by a jury of the respective counties, the truth of such matters of fact as are then under dispute in the courts of Westminster Hall; there being, however, as to London and Middlesex, this exception: That, instead of their being comprised within any circuit, courts of nisi prius are held there for the same purpose, in and after every term, before the chief or other judge of the superior court, at what are called the London and Westminster sittings.

These judges of assize came into use in the room of the ancient justices in eyre (justiciarii in itinere), who were regularly established, if not first appointed, by the parliament of Northampton, A. D. 1176 (22 Hen. II.), with a delegated power from the king's great court, or aula regis, being looked upon as members thereof; though the present justices of assize and nisi prius are more immediately derived from St. Westminster II. (13 Edw. I. c. 30), and consist principally of the judges of the superior courts of common law, being assigned by that statute out of the king's sworn justices, associating to themselves one or two discreet knights of each county. By St. 27 Edw. I. c. 4 (explained by 12 Edw. II. c. 3), assizes and inquests are allowed to be taken before any one justice of the court in which the plea is brought, associating with him one knight or other approved man of the county. By St. 14 Edw. III. c. 16, inquests of nisi prius may be taken before any justice of either bench (though the plea be not depending in his own court), or before the chief baron of the exchequer, if he be a man of the law, or, otherwise, before the justices of assize. so that one of such justices be a judge of the king's bench or common pleas, or the king's sergeant sworn. And, finally, by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 22, all justices of assize may, on their respective circuits, try causes pending in the court of exchequer, without issuing (as it had till then been considered necessary to do) a separate commission from the exchequer for that purpose. 3 Steph. Comm. 421-423; 3 Bl. Comm. 57, 58.

COURTS OF CONSCIENCE. See "Courts of Requests."

COURTS OF OYER AND TERMINER and general gaol delivery.

——In English Law. Tribunals for the examination and trial of criminals.

They are held before commissioners selected by the queen, among whom are usually two justices of the superior courts at Westminster, twice in every year in all the counties of England except the four northern, where they are held once only, and Middlesex and parts of other counties, over which the central criminal court has jurisdiction.

Under the commission of oyer and terminer, the justices try indictments previously found at the same assizes for treason, felony, or misdemeanors. Under the commission of general gaol delivery, they may try and deliver every prisoner who is in gaol when the judges arrive at the circuit town, whenever or before whomsoever indicted, or for whatsoever crime committed. These commissions are joined with those of assize and nisi prius and the commission of the peace. See "Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius."

——American Law. Courts of criminal jurisdiction in the state of Pennsylvania.

They are held at the same time with the court of quarter sessions, as a general rule, and by the same judges. See Purd. Dig. Pa. Laws (Stroud & B. Ed.) pp. 694, 1377.

COURTS OF PRINCIPALITY OF WALES. A species of private courts, of a limited though extensive jurisdiction, which, upon the thorough reduction of that principality, and the settling of its polity in the reign of Henry VIII., were erected all over the country. These courts, however, have been abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 70; the principality being now divided into two circuits, which the judges visit in the same manner as they do the circuits in England, for the purpose of disposing of those causes which are ready for trial. Brown.

COURTS OF REQUESTS, or COURTS OF conscience. In English law. Courts of special jurisdiction, constituted by act of parliament in the city of London and other towns, for the recovery of small debts.

They were courts not of record, and proceeded in a summary way to examine upon oath the parties and other witnesses, without the aid of a jury, and made such order as is consonant to equity and good conscience.

They had jurisdiction of causes of debt generally to the amount of forty shillings, but in many instances to the amount of five pounds sterling.

The courts of requests in London consisted of two aldermen and four common councilmen, and was formerly a court of considerable importance, but was abolished, as well as all other courts of requests, by the small debts act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), and the order in council of May 9, 1847, and their jurisdiction transferred to the county courts.

The court of requests before the king in person was virtually abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 10. 3 Steph. Comm. 449, and note (j); Bac. Abr. "Courts in London." See "County Court."

COURTS OF SURVEY. Courts for the hearing of appeals by owners or masters of ships, from orders for the detention of unsafe ships, made by the English board of trade under the merchant shipping act of 1876 (section 6), consisting of a judge summoned by the registrar from a list of wreck commissioners (q. v.), stipendiary magistrates, etc., which is provided for the purpose, and of two assessors; one appointed by the board of trade, and the other summonsed by the registrar out of a list of persons provided for the purpose (Id. § 7). Rules of Court of Survey 1876.

COURTS OF THE CINQUE PORTS. In English law. Courts of limited local jurisdiction, formerly held before the mayor and jurats (aldermen) of the Cinque Ports.

A writ of error lay to the lord warden in his court of Shepway, and from this court to the queen's bench. By 18 and 19 Vict. c. 48, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 1, the jurisdiction and authority of the lord warden of the Cinque Ports and constable of Dover Castle, in or in relation to the administration of justice in actions, suits, or other civil proceedings, at law or in equity, are abolished. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 79; 3 Steph. Comm. 447, 448. See "Cinque Ports."

COURTS OF THE COUNTIES PALATINE. In English law. A species of private court which formerly appertained to the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham.

They were local courts, which had exclusive jurisdiction in law and equity of all cases arising within the limits of the respective counties. The judges who held these courts sat by special commission from the owners of the several franchises, and under their seal, and all process was taken in the name of the owner of the franchise, though subsequently to 27 Hen. VIII. c. 24, it ran in the king's name. See "County Palatine."

COURTS OF THE TWO UNIVERSITIES. In English law. See "Chancellors' Courts in the Two Universities."

COURTS OF WESTMINSTER HALL. The superior courts, both of law and equity, were for centuries fixed at Westminster, an ancient palace of the monarchs of England. Formerly, all the superior courts were held before the king's capital justiciary of England, in the aula regis, or such of his palaces wherein his royal person resided, and removed with his household from one end of the kingdom to another. This was found to occasion great inconvenience to the suitors, to remedy which it was made an article of the great charter of liberties, both of King John and King Henry III., that "common pleas should no longer follow the king's court, but be held in some certain place," in consequence of which they have ever since been held (a few necessary removals in times of the plague excepted) in the palace of Westminster only. The courts of equity also sit at Westminster, nominally, during term time, although, actually, only during the first day of term, for they generally sit in courts provided for the purpose in, or in the neighborhood of, Lincoln's Inn. Brown.

COUSIN. The son or daughter of the brother or sister of one's father or mother.

The issue, respectively, of two brothers or two sisters, or of a brother and a sister.

Those who descend from the brother or sister of the father of the person spoken of are called "paternal cousins." "Maternal cousins" are those who are descended from the brothers or sisters of the mother. See 2 Brown, Ch. 125; 1 Sim. & S. 301; 3 Russ. 140; 9 Sim. 386, 457.

COUSINAGE. See "Cosinage."

COUSTUM (Fr.) Custom; duty; toll. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 314.

COUSTUMIER (Fr.) A collection of customs and usages in the old Norman law.

COUTHUTLAUGH. He that willingly receives an outlaw, and cherishes or conceals him. In ancient times he was subject to the same punishment as the outlaw. Blount.

COVENANT (Lat. convenire, to come together; conventio, a coming together). It is equivalent to the factum conventum of the civil law.

——In Contracts. An agreement between two or more persons, entered into by deed, whereby one of the parties promises the performance or nonperformance of certain acts, or that a given state of things does or shall, or does not or shall not, exist. It differs from an express assumpsit in that it must be by deed.

Covenants are classified on several lines of division, the principal ones being:

Affirmative or negative.

(1) Affirmative covenants are those in which the covenantor declares that something has been already done, or shall be done in the future. Such covenants do not operate to deprive covenantees of rights enjoyed independently of the covenants. Dyer, 19b; 1 Leon. 251.

(2) Negative covenants are those in which the party obligates himself not to do or perform some act. Courts are unwilling to construe a negative covenant a condition precedent, inasmuch as it cannot be said to be performed till a breach becomes impossible. 2 Wm. Saund. 156; 1 Mod. 64; 2 Keb. 674; 1 Sid. 87.

Inherent or collateral.

(3) Inherent covenants are those which relate directly to the land itself, or matter granted. Shep. Touch. 161. Distinguished from collateral covenants.

If real, they run with the land. Platt, Cov. 66.

(4) Collateral covenants are those which are entered into in connection with the grant of something, but which do not relate immediately to the thing granted; as, to pay a sum of money in gross, that the lessor shall distrain for rent on some other land than that which is demised, to build a house on the land of some third person, or the like. Platt, Cov. 69; Shep. Touch. 161; 4 Burrows, 2439; 3 Term R. 393; 2 J. B. Moore, 164; 5 Barn. & Ald. 7; 2 Wils. 27; 1 Ves. Jr. 56.

Dependent, concurrent, and independent.

(5) Dependent covenants are those in which the obligation to perform one is made to depend upon the performance of the other. Covenants may be so connected that the right to insist upon the performance of one of them depends upon a prior performance on the part of the party seeking enforcement. Platt, Cov. 71; 2 Selw. N. P. 443; Steph. N. P. 1071; 1 C. B. (N. S.) 646; 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 296; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 209; 2 Watts & S. (Pa.) 227; 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 268; 4 Conn. 3; 24 Conn. 624; 11 Vt. 549; 17 Me. 232; 3 Ark. 581; 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 175; 6 Ala. 60; 3 Ala. (N. S.) 330.

(6) Concurrent covenants are those which are to be performed at the same time. When one party is ready and offers to perform his part, and the other refuses or neglects to perform his, he who is ready and offers has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other, though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act. Platt, Cov. 71; 2 Selw. N. P. 443; Doug. 698; 18 Eng. Law & Eq. 81; 4 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 714; 16 Mo. 450.

(7) Independent covenants are those the necessity of whose performance is determined entirely by the requirements of the covenant itself, without regard to other covenants between the parties relative to the same subject-matter or transactions or series of transactions.

Covenants are generally construed to be independent (Platt, Cov. 71; 2 Johns. [N. Y.] 145; 10 Johns. [N. Y.] 204; 21 Pick. [Mass.] 438; 1 Ld. Raym. 666; 3 Bing. [N. S.] 355); unless the undertaking on one side is in terms a condition to the stipulation of the other, and then only consistently with the intention of the parties (3 Maule & S. 308; 10 East, 295, 530); or unless dependency results from the nature of the acts to be done, and the order in which they must necessarily precede and follow each other in the progress of performance (Willes, 496); or unless the nonperformance on one side goes to the entire substance of the contract, and to the whole consideration (1 Seld. [N. Y.] 247). If once independent, they remain so. 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 416.

Executed or executory.

(8) Executed covenants are those which relate to acts already performed. Shep. Touch. 161.

(9) Executory covenants are those whose performance is to be future. Shep. Touch. 161.

Express or implied.

(10) Express covenants are those which are created by the express words of the parties to the deed declaratory of their intention. Platt, Cov. 25. The formal word "covenant" is not indispensably requisite for the creation of an express covenant. 2 Mod. 268; 3 Keb. 848; 1 Leon. 324; 1 Bing. 433; 8 J. B. Moore, 546; 12 East, 182, note; 16 East, 352; 1 Bibb (Ky.) 379; 2 Bibb (Ky.) 614; 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 44; 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 170; 4 Conn. 508; 1 Har. (Del.) 233. The words "I oblige," "I agree" (1 Ves. Jr. 516; 2 Mod. 266), "I bind myself" (Hardr. 178; 3 Leon. 119), have been held to be words of covenant, as are the words of a bond (1 Chanc. Cas. 194). Any words showing the intent of the parties to do or not to do a certain thing raise an express covenant (13 N. H. 513); but words importing merely an order or direction that other persons should pay a sum of money are not a covenant (6 J. B. Moore, 202, note [a]).

(11) Implied covenants are those which arise by intendment and construction of law from the use of certain words in some kinds of contracts. Bac. Abr. "Covenant" (B); Rawle, Cov. 364; 1 C. B. 402. Thus, in a conveyance of lands in fee, the words "grant, bargain, and sell" imply certain covenants (see 4 Kent, Comm. 473), and the word "give" implies a covenant of warranty during the life of the feoffor (10 Cush. [Mass.] 134; 4 Gray [Mass.] 468; 2 Caines [N. Y.] 193; 9 N. H. 222; 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 63); and in a lease the use of the words "grant and demise" (Co. Litt. 384; 4 Wend. [N. Y.] 502; 8 Cow. [N. Y.] 36), "grant" (Freem. Ch. 367; Cro. Eliz. 214; 4 Taunt. 609; 1 Per. & D. 360), "demise" (4 Coke, 80; 10 Mod. 162; Hob. 12; 9 N. H. 222; 15 N. Y. 327), "demisement" (1 Show. 79; 1 Salk. 137), raises an implied covenant on the part of the lessor, as do "yielding and paying" (9 Vt. 151) on the part of the lessee. In regard to the covenants arising to each grantee by implication on sale of an estate with conditions, in parcels to several grantees, see 23 Barb. (N. Y.) 153.

Obligatory or declaratory.

(12) Obligatory covenants are those which are binding on the party himself. 1 Sid. 27; 1 Keb. 337.

(13) Declaratory covenants are those which serve to limit or direct uses. 1 Sid. 27; 1 Hob. 224.

Principal or auxiliary.

(14) Principal covenants are those which relate directly to the principal matter of the contract entered into between the parties. They are distinguished from auxiliary.

(15) Auxiliary covenants are those which do not relate directly to the principal matter of contract between the parties, but to something connected with it. Those the scope of whose operation is in aid or support of the principal covenant. If the principal covenant is void, the auxiliary is discharged. Anstr. 256; Prec. Chanc. 475.

Transitive or intransitive.

(16) Transitive covenants are those personal covenants the duty of performing which passes over to the representatives of the covenantor.

(17) Intransitive covenants are those the duty of performing which is limited to the covenantee himself, and does not pass over to his representative.

(18) Disjunctive or alternative covenants are those which are for the performance of one or more of several things, at the election of the covenantor or covenantee, as the case may be. Platt, Cov. 21; 1 Duer (N. Y.) 209.

(19) Covenants in deeds are express covenants.

(20) Covenants in gross are such as do not run with the land.

(21) Covenants in law are implied covenants.

(22) Illegal covenants are those which are expressly or impliedly forbidden by law. Covenants are absolutely void when entered into in violation of the express provisions of statutes (5 Har. & J. [Md.] 193; 5 N. H. 96; 6 N. H. 225; 1 Bin. [Pa.] 118; 6 Bin. [Pa.] 321; 4 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 159; 4 Halst. [N. J.] 252), or if they are of an immoral nature (3 Burrows, 1568; 1 Esp. 13; 1 Bos. & P. 340; 3 T. B. Mon. [Ky.] 35), against public policy (4 Mass. 370; 5 Mass. 385; 7 Me. 113; 5 Halst. [N. J.] 87; 3 Day [Conn.] 145; 7 Watts [Pa.] 152; 5 Watts & S. [Pa.] 315; 6 Miss. 769; 2 McLean [U. S.] 464; 4 Wash. C. C. [U. S.] 297; 11 Wheat. [U. S.] 258), in general restraint of trade (21 Wend. [N. Y.] 166; 7 Cow. [N. Y.] 307; 6 Pick. [Mass.] 206; 19 Pick. [Mass.] 51), or fraudulent between the parties (4 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 483; 7 Watts & S. [Pa.] 111; 5 Mass. 16), or third persons (3 Day [Conn.] 450; 14 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 214; 3 Caines [N. Y.] 213; 2 Johns. [N. Y.] 286; 12 Johns. [N. Y.] 306; 15 Pick. [Mass.] 49).

Covenants are also classified generally in the same manner as simple contracts. See "Contract."

——In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover damages for breach of a contract under seal. It is one of the brevia formata of the register, is sometimes a concurrent remedy with debt, though never with assumpsit, and is the only proper remedy where the damages are unliquidated in nature, and the contract is under seal. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 340; Chit. Pl. 112, 113; Steph. N. P. 1058.

COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES. One which has for its object security against those rights to, or interests in, the land granted which may subsist in third persons to the diminution of the value of the estate, though consistently with the passing of the fee by the deed of conveyance. For what constitutes an incumbrance, see "Incumbrance."

COVENANT COLLATERAL. A covenant which is conversant about some collateral thing that doth nothing at all, or not so immediately concern the thing granted; as to pay a sum of money in gross, etc. Shep. Touch. 161.

COVENANT FOR FURTHER ASSURance. One by which the covenantor undertakes to do such reasonable acts in addition to those already performed as may be necessary for the completion of the transfer made, or intended to be made, at the requirement of the covenantee. It relates both to the title of the vendor and to the instrument of conveyance to the vendee, and operates as well to secure the performance of all acts for supplying any defect in the former, as to remove all objections to the sufficiency and security of the latter. Platt, Cov. 341.

COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT. An assurance against the consequences of a defective title, and of any disturbances thereupon. Platt, Cov. 312. By it, when general in its terms, the covenantor stipulates at all events (11 East, 642; 1 Mod. 101) to indemnify the covenantee against all acts committed by virtue of a paramount title (Platt, Cov. 313; 1 Lev. 83; 8 Lev. 305; Hob. 34; 4 Coke, 80b; Cro. Car. 5; 3 Term R. 584; 6 Term R. 66; 3 Duer [N. Y.] 464; 2 Jones [N. C.] 203; Busb. [N. C.] 384; 3 N. J. 260), not including the acts of a mob (19 Miss. 87; 2 Strobh. [S. C.] 366), nor a mere trespass by the lessor (10 N. Y. 151). It most generally occurs in leases.

COVENANT IN DEED (called, also, "covenant in fact," French, covenant en fait, and "covenant expressed"). A covenant expressed in words, or inserted in a deed in specific terms. Termes de la Ley; Shep. Touch. 160. There is no set form of words necessary to constitute a covenant. The usual form is that the covenantor, "for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenants, promises, and agrees to and with (the covenantee), his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that," etc. 1 Archb. N. P. 250; U. S. Dig. "Covenant." The formal word "covenant" itself is not absolutely essential for this purpose. Bouvier, voc. "Covenant," pl. 10, and cases there cited; Hilliard, Real Prop. 364.

COVENANT INHERENT. A covenant which is conversant about the land, and knit to the estate in the land; as that the thing demised shall be quietly enjoyed, shall be kept in reparation, shall not be aliened, etc. Shep. Touch. 161.

COVENANT NOT TO SUE. One entered into by a party who has a cause of action at the time of making it, by which he agrees not to sue the party liable to such action.

A perpetual covenant not to sue is one by which the covenantor agrees not to sue the covenantee at any time. Such a covenant operates as a release to the covenantee, and may be pleaded as such. Cro. Eliz. 623; 1 Term R. 446; 8 Term R. 486; 2 Salk. 375; 3 Salk. 298; 12 Mod. 415; 7 Mass. 153; 16 Mass. 24; 17 Mass. 623; 3 Ind. 473. And see 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 149.

A limited covenant not to sue, by which the covenantor agrees not to sue for a limited time, does not operate a release; and a breach must be taken advantage of by action. Carth. 63; 1 Show. 46; 2 Salk. 573; 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 471; 5 Cal. 501. See 29 Ala. (N. S.) 322, as to requisite consideration.

COVENANT OF RIGHT TO CONVEY. An assurance by the covenantor that the grantor has sufficient capacity and title to convey the estate which he by his deed undertakes to convey.

COVENANT OF SEISIN. An assurance to the grantee that the grantor has the very estate, both in quantity and quality, which he professes to convey. Platt, Cov. 306. It has given place in English conveyancing to the covenant of right to convey, but is in use in several states of the United States. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 648.

COVENANT OF WARRANTY. An assurance by the grantor of an estate that the grantee shall enjoy the same without interruption by virtue of paramount title. 2 Jones (N. C.) 203; 3 Duer (N. Y.) 464.

It is not in use in English conveyances, but is in general use in the United States (2 Washb. Real Prop. 659), and in several states is the only covenant in general use (Rawle, Cov. 203, note; 4 Ga. 593; 8 Grat. [Va.] 353; 6 Ala. 60).

COVENANT REAL. A covenant in a deed binding the heirs of the covenantor, and passing to assignees, or to the purchaser. 2

Bl. Comm. 304; 4 Kent, Comm. 471, 472. A covenant which so runs with the land that he that hath the one hath or is subject to the other. Shep. Touch. 161. It is thus distinguished from a personal covenant, which affects only the covenantor, and the assets in the hands of his representatives after his death. 4 Kent, Comm. 470. The covenants in a deed that the grantor is lawfully seised, and has good right to convey, and that the land is free from incumbrance, are personal covenants, not running with the land; the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and the covenant of warranty, are in the nature of real covenants. Id. 471. But see Id. 472, and notes; 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 263.

In the old books, a covenant real is also defined to be a covenant by which a man binds himself to pass a thing real, as lands or tenements. Termes de la Ley; 3 Bl. Comm. 156.

COVENANT RUNNING WITH LAND. A covenant which goes with the land (conveyed by the deed in which it is expressed), as being annexed to the estate, and which cannot be separated from the land, and transferred without it. 4 Kent, Comm. 472, note. A covenant is said to run with the land when not only the original parties to the deed of conveyance, or their representatives, but each successive owner of the land, will be entitled to its benefit, or be liable, as the case may be, to its obligation. 1 Steph. Comm. 455, and note (r); Burton, Real Prop. 157. Or, in other words, it is so called when either the liability to perform it, or the right to take advantage of it, passes to the assignee of the land. 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 27, note; 5 Coke, 16a; 4 Kent, Comm. 470-473. See 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 136; U. S. Dig. "Covenant."

A covenant to pay rent, to produce title deeds, or for renewal, are covenants which run with the land. All covenants concerning title run with the land, with the exception of those that are broken, if at all, before the land passes. 4 Kent, Comm. 473.

COVENANT TO CONVEY. A covenant by which the covenantor undertakes to convey to the covenantee the estate described in the covenant, under certain circumstances.

This form of conditional alienation of lands is in frequent use in several of the United States. 14 Pa. St. 308; 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 639; 4 Md. 498; 11 Ill. 194; 19 Ohio, 347. Substantially the same effect is secured as by a conveyance and a mortgage back for the purchase money, with the important difference, however, that the title of course remains in the covenantor till he actually executes the conveyance.

The remedy for breach may be by action on the covenant (29 Pa. St. 264), but the better remedy is said to be in equity for specific performance (1 Grant Cas. [Pa.] 230).

It is satisfied only by a perfect conveyance of the kind bargained for (19 Barb. [N. Y.] 639); otherwise where an imperfect conveyance has been accepted (4 Md. 498).

COVENANT TO STAND SEISED TO uses. A covenant by means of which, under the statute of uses, a conveyance of an estate may be effected. Burton, Real Prop. §§ 136, 145.

Such a covenant cannot furnish the ground for an action of covenant broken, and in this respect resembles the ancient real covenants.

The consideration for such a covenant must be relationship either by blood or marriage. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 129, 130. See 2 Seld. (N. Y.) 342.

As a mode of conveyance it has fallen into disuse; though the doctrine is often resorted to by courts in order to give effect to the intention of the parties who have undertaken to convey lands by deeds which are insufficient for the purpose, under the rules required in other forms of conveyance. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 155, 156; 2 Sanders, Uses, 79, 83; 4 Mass. 136; 18 Pick. (Mass.) 397; 22 Pick. (Mass.) 376; 5 Me. 232; 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 351; 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 85; 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 249.

COVENANTEE. One in whose favor a covenant is made.

COVENANTOR. One who becomes bound to perform a covenant.

COVENANTS APPURTENANT. Those which run with the land.

COVENANTS FOR TITLE. Those in aid of the title to property, usually land, conveyed or sold. They are "covenant of seisin," "covenant against incumbrances," "covenant for further assurance," "covenant for quiet enjoyment," "covenant of warranty," and "covenant of right to convey" (q. v.)

COVENANTS PERFORMED. In pleading. A plea to an action of covenant, allowed in the state of Pennsylvania, whereby the defendant, upon informal notice to the plaintiff, may give anything in evidence which he might have pleaded. 4 Dall. (Pa.) 439; 2 Yeates (Pa.) 107; 15 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 105. And this evidence, it seems, may be given in the circuit court without notice, unless called for. 2 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 456.

COVENTION IN UNUM. The agreement between the two parties to a contract upon the sense of the contract proposed. It is an essential part of the contract, following the pollicitation or proposal emanating from the one, and followed by the consension or agreement of the other. If the second party does not assent to the proposal in the sense in which it is made, he is not bound by his assent unless his mistake is unreasonable.

COVENTRY ACT. The common name for St. 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1, against maiming by lying in wait, it having been enacted in consequence of an assault on Sir John Coventry in the street, and slitting his nose, in revenge, as was supposed, for some obnoxious words uttered by him in parliament.

COVERT. Covered; protected; sheltered. A pound covert is one that is close or covered over, as distinguished from pound overt, which is open overhead. Co. Litt. 47b; 3 Bl. Comm. 12. A feme covert is so called, as being under the wing, protection, or cover of her husband. 1 Bl. Comm. 442.

In the colony laws of New Plymouth, children are said to be "under the covert" of their parents.

COVERT BARON. A wife. So called from being under the protection of her husband, baron, or lord.

COVERTURE. The condition or state of a married woman.

During coverture, the civil existence of the wife is, for many purposes, merged in that of her husband. See "Abatement;" "Parties."

COVIN. A secret contrivance between two or more persons to defraud and prejudice another of his rights. Co. Litt. 357b; Comyn, Dig. "Covin" (A); 1 Viner, Abr. 473. See "Collusion;" "Fraud."

COWARDICE. Pusillanimity; fear; misbehavior through fear in relation to some duty to be performed before an enemy. O'Brien, Court-Martial, 142.

By both the army and navy regulations of the United States, this is an offense punishable in officers or privates with death, or such other punishment as may be inflicted by a court-martial. 1 Story, U. S. Laws, 761; Act Cong. April 10, 1806, art. 52.

CRANAGE. A toll paid for drawing merchandise out of vessels to the wharf. So called because the instrument used for the purpose is called a "crane." 8 Coke, 46.

CRASSA. Gross. Crassa negligentia, gross negligence; crassa ignorantia, gross ignorance.

CRASTINUM, or CRASTINO (Lat. tomorrow). On the day after. The return day of writs is made the second day of the term; the first day being some saint's day, which gives its name to the term. In the law Latin, crastino (the morning, the day after) would then denote the return day. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 56, 57.

CRATES. An iron gate before a prison. 1 Vent. 304.

CRAVE. To ask; to demand.

This word is frequently used in pleading; as, to crave oyer of a bond on which the suit is brought; and in the settlement of accounts the accountant general craves a credit or an allowance. 1 Chit. Prac. 520. See "Oyer."

CRAVEN, CRAVENT, or CRAVANT (from Saxon crafan, to crave, beg, or implore). In old English law. A word of obloquy and disgrace, in the ancient trial by battel, on the uttering of which by either champion, he was considered as yielding the victory to his opponent, and was condemned, as a recreant, amittere liberam legem, to lose his frank law, that is, to become infamous, and not to be accounted a free and lawful man, liber et legalis homo, being supposed by the court to be proved forsworn, and therefore never to be put on a jury or admitted as a witness in any cause. 3 Bl. Comm. 340; 4 Bl. Comm. 348; 4 Steph. Comm. 415. Called verbum recreantisae, the word of recreancy. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 38, § 18. The word is still popularly used in the same dishonorable sense. See "Battel;" "Champion;" "Recreant."

CREAMER. A foreign merchant; but generally taken for one who has a stall in a fair or market. Blount.

CREAMUS. We create. One of the words by which a corporation in England was formerly created by the king. 1 Bl. Comm. 473.

CREANCE (Law Fr. from creier, to believe). Belief; persuasion; trust; credit; faith. Law Fr. Dict.

A claim; a debt. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 1040.

CREANCER, or CREANSOR. One who trusts or gives credit; a creditor. Old Nat. Brev. 66; Britt. cc. 28, 78.

CREDENTIALS. Papers which give a title or claim to confidence.

——In International Law. The instruments which authorize and establish a public minister in his character with the state or prince to whom they are addressed. If the state or prince receive the minister, he can be received only in the quality attributed to him in his credentials. They are, as it were, his letter of attorney, his mandate patent, mandatum manifestum. Vattel, liv. 4, c. 6, § 76.

CREDIBILITY. In a witness. Worthiness of belief, as distinguished from competency or capacity to testify.

CREDIBLE WITNESS. One who, being competent to give evidence, is worthy of belief. 5 Mass. 219; 17 Pick. (Mass.) 154; 2 Curt. Ecc. 336.

CREDIT.

(1) The ability to borrow, on the opinion conceived by the lender that he will be repaid.

(2) A debt due in consequence of a contract of hire or borrowing of money.

(3) The time allowed by the creditor for the payment of goods sold by him to the debtor.

(4) That which is due to a merchant, as distinguished from "debit," that which is due by him.

(5) That influence connected with certain social positions. 20 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 19.

CREDITOR. He who has a right to require the fulfillment of an obligation or contract; he to whom a debt is owing.

CREDITORS' BILL. A bill in equity, filed by one or more creditors, by and in behalf of him or themselves, and all other creditors who shall come in under the decree, for an account of the assets and a due settlement of the estate of a decedent.

The usual decree against the executor or administrator is quod computet; that is to say, it directs the master to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors, and to cause the creditors, upon due public notice, to come before him to prove their debts at a certain place, and within a limited time; and it also directs the master to take an account of all the personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator, and the same to be applied in payment of the debts and other charges in a due course of administration. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 442.

CREDITORUM APPELLATIONE NON HI tantum accipiuntur qui pecuniam crediderunt, sed omnes quibus ex qualibet causa debetur. Under the head of creditors are included not alone those who have lent money, but all to whom, from any cause, a debt is owing. Dig. 50. 16. 11.

CREEK. In maritime law. Such little inlets of the sea, whether within the precinct or extent of a port or without, which are narrow passages, and have shore on either side of them. Callis, Sew. 56; 5 Taunt. 705.

Such inlets that, though possibly for their extent and situation they might be ports, yet they are either members of or dependent upon other ports.

The term imports a recess, cove, bay, or inlet in the shore of a river, and not a separate or independent stream, though sometimes used in the latter meaning. 38 N. Y. 103.

In England the name arose thus: The king could not conveniently have a customer and comptroller in every port or haven; but such custom officers were fixed at some eminent port, and the smaller adjacent ports became by that means creeks, or appendants of that port where these custom officers were placed. 1 Chit. Com. Law, 726; Hale, de Port. Mar. pt. 2, c. 1, vol. 1, p. 46; Comyn, Dig. "Navigation" (C); Callis, Sew. 34.

CREMENTUM COMITATUS. The increase of the county. The increase of the king's rents above the old vicontiel rents, for which the sheriffs were to account. Wharton.

CREPARE OCULUM. In Saxon law. To put out an eye; which had a pecuniary punishment of fifty shillings annexed to it. Wharton.

CREPUSCULUM. Daylight; twilight. The light which immediately precedes or follows the rising or setting of the sun. 4 Bl. Comm. 224. Housebreaking during the period in which there is sunlight enough to discern a person's face (crepusculum) is not burglary. Coke, 3d Inst. 63; 1 Russ. Crimes, 820; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 75.

CRESCENTE MALITIA CRESCERE DEbet et poena. Vice increasing, punishment ought also to increase. Coke, 2d Inst. 479.

CRETIO. Time for deliberation allowed an heir to decide whether he would or would not take an inheritance. Calv. Lex.; Taylor.

CREW. A ship's complement of men and officers. "In its general and popular sense, it is equivalent to 'company.' In the laws of the United States on maritime subjects, it is sometimes used to comprehend all persons composing the ship's company, including the master; sometimes to comprehend the officers as common seamen, excluding the master; and sometimes to include the common seamen only, excluding the master and officers. But in the last two classes it will be found that the context contains language which explains and limits the general to the particular use." 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 209.

CRIER. A bailiff or other attendant in court, whose duty is to make proclamations in court.

CRIEZ LA PEEZ. Rehearse the concord, or peace. A phrase used in the ancient proceedings for levying fines. It was the form of words by which the justice before whom the parties appeared directed the serjeant or countor in attendance to recite or read aloud the concord or agreement between the parties, as to the lands intended to be conveyed. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 224, 225; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 179.

CRIM. CON. An abbreviation for criminal conversation, of very frequent use, denoting adultery; unlawful sexual intercourse with a married woman. Buller, N. P. 27; Bac. Abr. "Marriage" (E 2); 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 157.

CRIME. Any act or omission prohibited by public law for the protection of the public, and made punishable by the state in a judicial proceeding in its own name. It is a public wrong, as distinguished from a mere private wrong or injury to an individual. 1 Clark & Marshall, Crimes, § 1.

A wrong which the government deems injurious to the public at large, and punishes through a judicial proceeding in its own name. 1 Bish. New Crim. Law, § 32.

An act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it. 4 Bl. Comm. 15. This definition has frequently been quoted with approval, but it is inaccurate. In the first place, it is not the "act omitted" that constitutes a crime, but the omission to act. In the second place, the term "public law" is too broad, for it includes many other laws besides those which define and punish crimes. An act is not necessarily a crime because it is prohibited by a public law. To constitute a crime, it must be punished to protect the public, and must be punished by the state or other sovereign. Clark & Marshall, Crimes, § 1.

Violations of municipal ordinances are generally held not to be crimes, for the reason that such ordinances are not public laws, and the punishment for their violation is imposed by a less authority than the state. 29 Minn. 445; 36 Ala. 261; 47 Ohio St. 481; 55 Wis. 487. Contra, see 75 Mich. 611; 27 Tex. App. 342.

"Crime" is a generic term, including treason, felonies, and misdemeanors (31 Wis. 383; 75 Mich. 611; 60 Ill. 168; 42 Minn. 258; 48 Ind. 123), though some earlier writers use the term as excluding misdemeanors (4 Bl. Comm. 5).

CRIME AGAINST NATURE. Sodomy.

CRIMEN (Lat.) A crime.

In the civil law. A charge of crime.

——Crimen Falsi. In civil law. A fraudulent alteration, or forgery, to conceal or alter the truth, to the prejudice of another. This crime may be committed in three ways, namely: by forgery; by false declarations or false oath,—perjury; by acts, as by dealing with false weights and measures, by altering the current coin, by making false keys, and the like. See Dig. 48. 10. 22; Id. 34. 8. 2; Code, 9. 22; Id. 2. 5. 9. 11. 16. 17. 23. 24; Merlin, Repert.; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 426; 1 Phil. Ev. 26; 2 Starkie, Ev. 715.

At common law. Any crime which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373.

The meaning of this term at common law is not well defined. It has been held to include forgery (5 Mod. 74), perjury, subornation of perjury (Co. Litt. 6b; Comyn. Dig. "Testmoigne" [A 5]), suppression of testimony by bribery or conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness (Ryan & M. 434), conspiracy to accuse of crime (2 Hale, P. C. 277; 2 Leach, C. C. 496; 3 Starkie, 21; 2 Dods. Adm. 191), barratry (2 Salk. 690). The effect of a conviction for a crime of this class is infamy, and incompetency to testify. Statutes sometimes provide what shall be such crimes.

——Crimen Furti. The offense of theft.

——Crimen Incendii. In old criminal law. The crime of burning, which included not only the modern crime of arson, or burning of a house, but also the burning of a man, beast, or other chattel. Britt. c. 9; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 308.

——Crimen Innominatum. The nameless crime; sodomy.

——Crimen Laesae-Majestatis. Injuring or violating the majesty of the king's person; any crime affecting the king's person. 4 Bl. Comm. 75.

——Crimen Raptus. Rape.

——Crimen Roberiae. Robbery.

——Crimen Trahit Personam. The crime carries the person; i. e., the commission of a crime gives the courts of the place where it is committed jurisdiction over the person of the offender. 3 Denio (N. Y.) 190, 210.

CRIMEN FALSI DICITUR, CUM QUIS ILLICITUR, cui non fuerit ad haec data auctoritas, de sigillo regis rapto vel invento brevia, cartasve consignaverit. The crimen falsi (crime of falsifying) is when any one illicitly, to whom power has not been given for such purposes, has signed writs or charters with the king's seal, which he has either stolen or found. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 23.

CRIMEN LAESAE MAJESTATIS OMNIA alia crimina excedit quoad poenam. The crime of treason exceeds all other crimes as far as its punishment is concerned. Coke, 3d Inst. 210.

CRIMEN OMNIA EX SE NATA VITIAT. Crime vitiates everything which springs from it. 5 Hill (N. Y.) 523, 531.

CRIMINA MORTE EXTINGUUNTUR. Crimes are extinguished by death.

CRIMINAL. As a noun, one who has been guilty of a crime.

As an adjective, violative of the criminal law; pertaining to crime, or to penal jurisprudence.

CRIMINAL ACT. A crime. Sometimes applied to the act of crime, as severed from the criminal intent.

CRIMINAL CONVERSATION. See "Crim. Con."

CRIMINAL INFORMATION. A criminal suit brought, without the interposition of a grand jury, by the proper officer of the king or state. Cole, Crim. Inf.; 4 Bl. Comm. 398.

CRIMINAL INTENT. See "Intent."

CRIMINAL LAW. That branch of jurisprudence which treats of crimes and offenses.

CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION ACTS. The English acts (24 & 25 Vict. cc. 94-100) whereby the criminal law of the country was practically codified.

CRIMINAL LETTERS. In Scotch law. A summons issued by the lord advocate or his deputies as the means of commencing a criminal process. It differs from an indictment, and is like a criminal information at common law.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. The course or system of proceedings established by law, whereby persons accused of crime are apprehended, tried, and their punishment fixed.

CRIMINALITER. Criminally; or criminal process.

CRIMINATE. To exhibit evidence of the commission of a criminal offense.

To charge with crime, or implicate in a charge of crime.

CRITICISM. The art of judging skillfully of the merits or beauties, defects or faults, of a literary or scientific performance, or of a production of art. When the criticism is reduced to writing, the writing itself is called a criticism.

CRO, CROO, or CROY. In old Scotch law. A composition, satisfaction, or assythment for the slaughter of a man. Same as weregild. Spelman.

CROCKARDS, or CROCARDS. A foreign coin of base metal, prohibited by St. 27 Edw. I. st. 3, from being brought into the realm. 4 Bl. Comm. 98; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 176.

CROFT. A little close adjoining a dwelling house, and inclosed for pasture and tillage, or any particular use. Jacob, Law Dict. A small space fenced off, in which to keep farm cattle. Spelman. The word is now entirely obsolete.

CROISES. Pilgrims; so called, as wearing the sign of the cross on their upper garments. Britt. c. 122. The knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, created for the defense of the pilgrims. Cowell; Blount.

CROITEIR. A crofter; one holding a croft.

CROPPER. One who, having no interest in the land, works it in consideration of receiving a portion of the crop for his labor. 2 Rawle (Pa.) 12.

CROPS. Grain or other cultivated plants or fruits; the product of the harvest thereof.

CROSS ACTION. An action by a defendant in an action, against the plaintiff in the same action, upon the same contract, or for the same tort. Thus, if Peter bring an action of trespass against Paul, and Paul bring another action of trespass against Peter, the subject of the dispute being an assault and battery, it is evident that Paul could not set off the assault committed upon him by Peter, in the action which Peter had brought against him; therefore a cross action becomes necessary.

CROSS APPEAL. Where both parties appeal, the appeals are sometimes called "cross appeals."

CROWN CASES. In English law. Criminal prosecutions.

CROWN CASES RESERVED. Questions of law reserved on the trial of criminal cases at assize for consideration of the court of criminal appeal.

CROSS BILL. A bill by a defendant to a bill in equity against the plaintiff or a codefendant for further relief in respect to the matters embraced in the suit.

It is an auxiliary suit or dependency on the original suit. 35 N. H. 251.

CROSS DEMANDS. Mutual demands; claim and counterclaim.

CROSS ERRORS. Errors being assigned by the respondent in a writ of error, the errors assigned on both sides are called "cross errors."

CROSS EXAMINATON. In practice. The examination of a witness by the party opposed to the party who called him, and who examined or was entitled to examine him in chief.

CROSS REMAINDER. Where a particular estate is conveyed to several persons in common, and, upon the termination of the interest of either of them, his share is to remain over to the rest, and the reversioner or remainder man is not to take till the termination of all the estates, the parties take as tenants in common, with cross remainders between them. 4 Cruise, Dig. 249; 1 Hilliard, Real Prop. 650. It is not an essential quality of cross remainders that the original estates should be held in common. 1 Prest. Est. 94; 2 Washb. Real Prop. Index.

CROSS RULES. These were rules where each of the opposite litigants obtained a rule nisi, as the plaintiff to increase the damages, and the defendant to enter a nonsuit. Wharton.

CROWN LAW. Criminal law; the crown being the prosecutor.

CROWN OFFICE. The criminal side of the court of king's bench. The king's attorney in this court is called "master of the crown office." 4 Bl. Comm. 308.

CROWN OFFICE IN CHANCERY. One of the offices of the English high court of chancery, now transferred to the high court of justice. The principal official, the clerk of the crown, is an officer of parliament, and of the lord chancellor, in his nonjudicial capacity, rather than an officer of the courts of law. Second Rep. Leg. Dep. Comm. 39. His principal duties are to make out and issue writs of summons and election for both houses of parliament, and to keep the custody of poll books and ballot papers. Nearly all patents passing the great seal, except those for inventions (Great Seal Act, 1880), are made out in his office, and he makes out the warrants for almost all letters patent under the great seal. See "Patent." He also does the duties formerly performed by the clerk of the Hanaper. They chiefly consisted in collecting fees, but have now ceased almost entirely. He is registrar of the lord high steward's court. Second Rep. Leg. Dep. Comm. 39; Rep. Comm. on Fees, 5; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 3; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 84; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 81.

CROWN PAPER. A paper containing the list of criminal cases which await the hearing or decision of the court, and particularly of the court of queen's bench; and it then includes all cases arising from informations quo warranto, criminal informations, criminal cases brought up from inferior courts by writ of certiorari, and cases from the sessions. Brown.

CROWN SIDE. The criminal side of the court of king's bench. Distinguished from the pleas side, which transacts the civil business. 4 Bl. Comm. 265.

CROWN SOLICITOR. In England, the solicitor to the treasury acts, in state prosecutions, as solicitor for the crown in preparing the prosecution. In Ireland there are officers called "crown solicitors" attached to each circuit, whose duty it is to get up every case for the crown in criminal prosecutions. They are paid by salaries. There is no such system in England, where prosecutions are conducted by solicitors appointed by the parish, or other persons bound over to prosecute by the magistrates on each committal; but in Scotland the still better plan exists of a crown prosecutor (called the "procurator-fiscal," and being a subordinate of the lord-advocate) in every county, who prepares every criminal prosecution. Wharton.

CROWNER, or CROUNER. In old Scotch law. Coroner; a coroner. Skene de Verb. Sign.

CROY. In old English law. Marsh land. Blount.

CRUCE SIGNATI. In old English law. Signed or marked with a cross. Pilgrims to the holy land, or crusaders. So called because they wore the sign of the cross upon their garments. Spelman, voc. "Crucifen."

CRUISE. A voyage or expedition in quest of vessels or fleets of the enemy which may be expected to sail in any particular track at a certain season of the year. The region in which these cruises are performed is usually termed the "rendezvous," or "cruising-latitude." When the ships employed for this purpose, which are accordingly called "cruisers," have arrived at the destined station, they traverse the sea backwards and forwards, under an easy sail, and within a limited space, conjectured to be in the track of their expected adversaries. Weskett, Ins.; Lex Merc. Rediv. 271, 284; Doug. 509; Park, Ins. 58; Marsh. Ins. 196, 199, 520; 2 Gall. (U. S.) 268.

CRY DE PAYS, or CRY DE PAIS. A hue and cry raised by the country. This was allowable, in the absence of the constable, when a felony had been committed.

CRYER. See "Crier."

CUCKING STOOL. An engine or machine for the punishment of scolds and unquiet women. Called, also, a "trebucket," "tumbrill," and "castigatory." Bakers and brewers were formerly also liable to the same punishment. Being fastened in the machine, they were immersed over head and ears in some pool. Blount; Coke, 3d Inst. 219; 4 Bl. Comm. 168.

CUI ANTE DIVORTIUM (Law Lat.) The full phrase was, cui ipsa ante divortium contradicere non potuit, whom she before the divorce could not gainsay.

——In Practice. A writ which anciently lay in favor of a woman who had been divorced from her husband to recover lands and tenements which she had in fee simple, fee tail, or for life, from him to whom her husband had aliened them during marriage, when she could not gainsay it. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 240; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 183, note; Stearns, Real Actions, 143; Booth, Real Actions, 188.

CUI IN VITA (Law Lat.) The full phrase was, cui in vita sua, ipsa contradicere non potuit, whom in his lifetime she could not gainsay.

——In Practice. A writ of entry which lay for a widow against a person to whom her husband had in his lifetime aliened her lands. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 193., The object of the writ was to avoid a judgment obtained against the husband by confession or default. It is now of no use in England, by force of the provisions of St. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 28, § 6. See 6 Coke, 8, 9; Booth, Real Actions, 186. As to its use in Pennsylvania, see 3 Bin. (Pa.); Rep. Comm. Pa. Civ. Code 1835, 90, 91.

CUI JURISDICTIO DATA EST, EA QUOque concessa esse videntur sine quibus jurisdictio explicari non potest. To whom jurisdiction is given, to him those things also are held to be granted without which the jurisdiction cannot be exercised. Dig. 2. 1. 2; 1 Wooddeson, Lect. introd. lxxi.; 1 Kent, Comm. 339.

CUI JUS EST DONANDI, EIDEM ET VENdendi et concedendi jus est. He who has a right to give has also a right to sell and to grant. Dig. 50. 17. 163.

CUI LICET QUOD MAJUS NON DEBET quod minus est non licere. He who has authority to do the more important act shall not be debarred from doing that of less importance. 4 Rep. 23; Co. Litt. 355b; 2 Inst. 307; Noy, Max. 26; Finch, Law, 22; 3 Mod. 382, 392; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 165; Dig. 50. 70. 21.

CUI PATER EST POPULUS NON HABET ille patrem. He to whom the people is father has not a father. Co. Litt. 123.

CUICUNQUE ALIQUIS QUID CONCEDIT concedere videtur et id, sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit. Whoever grants a thing is supposed also tacitly to grant that without which the grant itself would be of no effect. 11 Coke, 52; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 426; Hob. 234; Vaughan, 109; 11 Exch. 775; Shep. Touch. 89; Co. Litt. 56a.

CUILIBET IN ARTE SUA PERITO EST credendum. Credence should be given to one skilled in his peculiar art. Co. Litt. 125; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 75; Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. notes), pt. 1, p. 759; 11 Clark & F. 85.

CUILIBET LICET JURI PRO SE INTROducto renunciare. Any one may waive or renounce the benefit of a principle or rule of law that exists only for his protection.

CUIQUE IN SUA ARTE CREDENDUM est. Every one is to be believed in his own art. 9 Mass. 227.

CUJUS EST COMMODUM EJUS DEBET esse incommodum. He who receives the benefit should also bear the disadvantage. 1 Kames, Eq. 289; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 837.

CUJUS EST DARE EJUS EST DISPOnere. He who has a right to give has the right to dispose of the gift. Wingate, Max.

53; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 440; 2 Coke, 71.

CUJUS EST DIVISIO ALTERIUS EST electio. Whichever of two parties has the division, the other has the choice. Co. Litt. 166.

CUJUS EST DOMINIUM EJUS EST PERiculum. The risk lies upon the owner of the subject. Tray. Lat. Max. 114.

CUJUS EST INSTITUERE EJUS EST abrogare. Whose it is to institute, his it is also to abrogate. Sydney, Gov. 15; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 785.

CUJUS EST SOLUM EJUS EST USQUE ad coelum. He who owns the soil owns it up to the sky. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 309; Shep. Touch. 90; 2 Bouv. Inst. notes 15, 70; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 18; 9 Coke, 54; 4 Campb. 219; 11 Exch. 822; 6 El. & Bl. 76.

CUJUS JURIS (i. e., JURISDICTIONIS) est principale, ejusdem juris erit accessorium. He who has jurisdiction of the principal has also of the accessory. Coke, 2d Inst. 493; Bracton, 481.

CUJUS PER ERROREM DATI REPETItio est, ejus consulto dati, donatio est. That which, when given through mistake, can be recovered back, when given with knowledge of the facts, is a gift. Dig. 50. 17. 53.

CUJUSQUE REI POTISSIMA PARS PRINcipium est. The principal part of everything is the beginning. Dig. 1. 2. 1; 10 Coke, 49.

CUL DE SAC (Fr. the bottom of a sack). A blind alley; a street which is open at one end only.

CULAGIUM. The laying up a ship in a dock for repair. Cowell; Blount.

CULPA. A fault; negligence. Jones, Bailm. 8.

Culpa is to be distinguished from dolus, the latter being a trick for the purpose of deception, the former merely negligence. There are three degrees of culpa: Lata culpa, gross fault or neglect; levis culpa, ordinary fault or neglect; levissima culpa, slight fault or neglect; and the definitions of these degrees are precisely the same as those in our law. Story, Bailm. § 18.

CULPA CARET, QUI SCIT, SED PROHIbere non potest. He is clear of blame who knows, but cannot prevent. Dig. 50. 17. 50.

CULPA EST IMMISCERE SE REI AD SE non pertinenti. It is a fault to meddle with what does not belong to or does not concern you. Dig. 50. 17. 36; Coke, 2d Inst. 208.

CULPA LATA DOLO AEQUIPARATUR. Gross neglect is equivalent to fraud. Dig. 11. 6. 1.

CULPA TENET SUOS AUCTORES. A fault binds its own authors. Ersk. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 1, § 14; 6 Bell, App. Cas. 539.

CULPABILIS (Lat.) Guilty.

CULPAE POENA PAR ESTO. Let the punishment be proportioned to the crime. Branch, Princ.

CULPRIT. A person who is guilty, or supposed to be guilty, of a crime.

When a prisoner is arraigned, and he pleads not guilty, in English practice, the clerk, who arraigns him on behalf of the crown, replies that the prisoner is guilty, and that he is ready to prove the accusation. This is done by writing two monosyllabic abbreviations,—cul. prit. 4 Bl. Comm. 339; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 416. See Christian's note to Bl. Comm. cited. The technical meaning has disappeared, and the compound is used in the popular sense as above given.

CULRACH. In old Scotch law. A species of pledge or cautioner (Scottice, back borgh), used in cases of the replevin of persons from one man's court to another's. Skene de Verb. Sign.

CULTURA. A parcel of arable land. Blount. Called a "wrong."

CULVERTAGE. A base kind of slavery; the confiscation or forfeiture, which takes place when a lord seizes his tenant's estate. Blount; Du Cange.

CUM ACTIO FUERIT MERE CRIMINALis, institui poterit ab initio criminaliter vel civiliter. When an action is merely criminal, it can be instituted from the beginning, either criminally or civilly. Bracton, 102.

CUM ADSUNT TESTIMONIA RERUM, quid opus est verbis? When the proofs of facts are present, what need is there of words? 2 Bulst. 53.

CUM ALIQUIS RENUNCIAVERIT SOCIEtati, solvitur societas. When any partner renounces the partnership, the partnership is dissolved. Tray. Lat. Max. 118.

CUM CONFITENTE SPONTE MITIUS est agendum. One making a voluntary confession is to be dealt with more mercifully. Coke, 4th Inst. 66; Branch, Princ.

CUM DE LUCRO DUORUM QUAERITUR melior est causa possidentis. When the question of gain lies between two, the cause of the possessor is the better. Dig. 50. 17. 126.

CUM DUO INTER SE PUGNANTIA REperiuntur in testamento, ultimum ratum est. When two things repugnant to each other are found in a will, the last is to be confirmed. Co. Litt. 112; Shep. Touch. 451; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 518; 1 Jarm. Wills (2d Ed.) 394; 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 146; 1 Phil. 536.

CUM DUO JURA CONCURRUNT IN una persona aequum est ac si essent in duobus. When two rights meet in one person, it is the same as if they were in two persons.

CUM IN CORPORE DISSENTITUR, APparet nullam esse acceptionem. When there is a disagreement in the substance, it appears that there is no acceptance. 12 Allen (Mass.) 44.

CUM IN TESTAMENTO AMBIGUE AUT etiam perperam scriptum, est benigne interpretari, et secundum id quod credibile est cogitatum credendum est. When an ambiguous or even an erroneous expression occurs in a will, it should be construed liberally, and in accordance with the testator's probable meaning. Dig. 34. 5. 24; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 506; 3 Poth. ad Pand. (Ed. 1819) 46.

CUM LEGITIMAE NUPTIAE FACTAE sunt, patrem liberi sequuntur. Children born under a legitimate marriage follow the condition of the father.

CUM ONERE (Lat.) With the burden; subject to the incumbrance; subject to the charge. A purchaser with knowledge of an incumbrance takes the property cum onere. Co. Litt. 231a; 7 East, 164; Paley, Ag. 175.

CUM PAR DELICTUM EST DUORUM, semper oneratur petitor, et melior habetur possessoris causa. Where two parties are equally in fault, the claimant always is at a disadvantage, and the party in possession has the better cause. Dig. 50. 17. 154; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 644.

CUM QUOD AGO NON VALET UT AGO, valeat quantum valere potest. When that which I do is of no effect as I do it, it shall have as much effect as it can, i. e., in some other way. 4 Kent, Comm. 493.

CUM TESTAMENTO ANNEXO (Law Lat.) With the will annexed. A term applied to administration granted where a testator makes an incomplete will, without naming any executors, or where he names incapable persons, or where the executors named refuse to act. 2 Bl. Comm. 503, 504.

CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE. That which goes to prove what has already been established by other evidence.

CUMULATIVE LEGACY. See "Legacy."

CUMULATIVE REMEDY. A second or additional mode of procedure in addition to one already available, as opposed to alternative remedy. Wharton.

CUMULATIVE SENTENCES. Sentences on a trial and conviction of several crimes, each sentence being in addition to the others, and not for the same fine or concurrent terms of imprisonment. See "Concurrent Sentences."

CUMULATIVE VOTING. That by which the voter concentrates his ballots on one or more candidates, instead of voting for the full number to be elected. Thus, a stockholder holding fifty shares may, under such a system, if five directors are to be chosen, cast two hundred and fifty votes for one, or one hundred and twenty-five for each of two, instead of voting fifty votes for each of five.

CUNEATOR. A coiner. Du Cange. Cuneare, to coin; cuneus, the die with which to coin; cuneata, coined. Du Cange; Spelman.

CUR. A common abbreviation of curia. 1 Inst. Cler. 9.

CURA (Lat.) Care; charge; oversight; guardianship.

——In the Civil Law. A species of guardianship which commenced at the age of puberty, when the guardianship called "tutela" expired, and continued to the completion of the twenty-fifth year. Inst. 1. 23. pr.; Id. 1. 25. pr.; Halifax, Civ. Law, bk. 1, c. 9.

CURAGULOS. One who takes care of a thing.

CURATE. One who represents the incumbent of a church, parson, or vicar, and takes care of the church, and performs divine services in his stead. An officiating temporary minister in the English church, who represents the proper incumbent. Burn, Ecc. Law; 1 Bl. Comm. 393.

CURATIO (Lat.) In civil law. The power or duty of managing the property of him who, either on account of infancy or some defect of mind or body, cannot manage his own affairs; the duty of a curator or guardian. Calv. Lex.

CURATOR. One who has been legally appointed to take care of the interests of one who, on account of his youth, or defect of his understanding, or for some other cause, is unable to attend to them himself; a guardian.

There are curators ad bona (of property), who administer the estate of a minor, take care of his person, and intervene in all his contracts; curators ad litem (of suits), who assist the minor in courts of justice, and act as curators ad bona in cases where the interests of the curator are opposed to the interests of the minor. Civ. Code La. arts. 357-366. There are also curators of insane persons (Id. art. 31), and of vacant successions and absent heirs (Id. arts. 1105, 1125).

CURATOR AD HOC. A guardian for this special purpose; as one appointed to represent an absentee.

CURATOR AD LITEM (Lat.) Guardian for the suit. In English law, the corresponding phrase is "guardian ad litem."

CURATOR BONIS (Lat.)

——In Civil Law. A guardian to take care of the property. Calv. Lex.

——In Scotch Law. A guardian for minors, lunatics, etc. Halk. Tech. Terms; Bell, Dict.

CURATORSHIP. The office of a curator. Curatorship differs from tutorship (q. v.) in this, that the latter is instituted for the protection of property in the first place, and, secondly, of the person; while the former is intended to protect, first, the person, and, secondly, the property. 1 Lec. Elm. 241.

CURATRIX. A woman who has been appointed to the office of curator.

CURATUS NON HABET TITULUM. A curate has no title (to tithes). 3 Bulst. 310.

CURE BY VERDICT. See "Aider by Verdict."

CURE OF SOULS. The ordinary duties of an officiating clergyman.

"Curate" more properly denotes the incumbent in general who hath the cure of souls, but more frequently it is understood to signify a clerk not instituted to the cure of souls, but exercising the spiritual office in a parish under the rector or vicar. 2 Burn, Ecc. Law, 54; 1 H. Bl. 424.

CURFEW (French, couvre, to cover, and feu, fire). This is generally supposed to be an institution of William the Conqueror, who required, by ringing of the bell at eight o'clock in the evening, that all lights and fires in dwellings should then be extinguished. But the custom is evidently older than the Norman; for we find an order of King Alfred that the inhabitants of Oxford should, at the ringing of that bell, cover up their fires and go to bed. And there is evidence that the same practice prevailed at this period in France, Normandy, Spain, and probably in most of the other countries of Europe. Henry, Hist. Brit. vol. 3, 567. It was doubtless intended as a precaution against fires, which were very frequent and destructive when most houses were built of wood.

That it was not intended as a badge of infamy is evident from the fact that the law was of equal obligation upon the nobles of the court and upon the native-born serfs. And yet we find the name "curfew law" employed as a by-word denoting the most odious tyranny.

It appears to have met with so much opposition that in 1103 we find Henry I. repealing the enactment of his father on the subject; and Blackstone says that, though it is mentioned a century afterwards, it is rather spoken of as a time of night, than as a still subsisting custom. Shakespeare frequently refers to it in the same sense. This practice is still pursued, in many parts of England and in this country, as a very convenient mode of apprising people of the time of night.

CURIA.

——In Roman Law. One of the divisions of the Roman people. The Roman people were divided by Romulus into three tribes and thirty curiae. The members of each curia were united by the tie of common religious rites, and also by certain common political and civil powers. Dion. Hal. lib. 2, p. 82; Liv. lib. 1, c. 13; Plut. in Romulo, p. 30; Festus Brisson, in Verb.

In later times the word signified the senate or aristocratic body of the provincial cities of the empire. Festus Brisson, in Verb.; Ort. Histoire, No. 25, 408; Ort. Inst. No. 125.

The senate house at Rome; the senate house of a provincial city. Code, 10. 31. 2; Spelman.

——In English Law. The king's court; the palace; the royal household. The residence of a noble; a manor or chief manse; the hall of a manor. Spelman.

A court of justice, whether of general or special jurisdiction. Fleta, lib. 2, l. 72, § 1; Spelman; Cowell; 3 Bl. Comm. c. iv. See "Court."

A courtyard or inclosed piece of ground; a close. St. Edw. Conf. 1, 6; Bracton, 76, 222b, 335b, 356b, 358; Spelman. See "Curia Claudenda."

The civil or secular power, as distinguished from the church. Spelman.

CURIA ADVISARE VULT (Lat.) The court wishes to consider the matter.

——In Practice. The entry formerly made upon the record to vindicate the continuance of a cause until a final judgment should be rendered.

It is commonly abbreviated thus: Cur. adv. vult. Thus, from amongst many examples, in 2 Barn. & C. 172, after the report of the argument, we find "cur. adv. vult.," then, "on a subsequent day judgment was delivered," etc.

CURIA BARONIS (or BARONUM). In old English law. A court baron. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 53.

CURIA CANCELLARIAE OFFICINA JUSTITIAE. The court of chancery is the workshop of justice. 2 Inst. 552.

CURIA CHRISTIANITATIS. A court Christian.

CURIA CLAUDENDA (Lat.) In practice. A writ which anciently lay to compel a party to inclose his land. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 297.

CURIA COMITATUS (Law Lat.) In old English law. The court of the county; the county court, or court of the shire (Saxon, scyregemot), in the Saxon times. See "County Court."

CURIA CURSUS AQUAE. A court held by the lord of the manor of Gravesend for the better management of barges and boats plying on the river Thames between Gravesend and Windsor, and also at Gravesend bridge, etc. 2 Geo. II. c. 26.

CURIA DOMINI. In old English law. The lord's court, house, or hall, where all the tenants met at the time of keeping court. Cowell.

CURIA LEGITIME AFFIRMATA (Law Lat.) In old Scotch practice. Court lawfully opened, or opened in due form. A formal phrase used in the captions of records. 3 How. St. Tr. 654; 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 143.

CURIA MAGNA. In old English law. The great court; one of the ancient names of parliament. 1 Bl. Comm. 148.

The king's court, or aula regis. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 144.

CURIA MAJORIS. In old English law. The mayor's court. Calth. 144.

CURIA MILITUM. A court so called, anciently held at Carisbrook Castle, in the Isle of Wight. Cowell.

CURIA PALATII. In English law. The palace court.

CURIA PARLIAMENTI SUIS PROPRIIS legibus subsistit. The court of parliament is governed by its own peculiar laws. Coke, 4th Inst. 50; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 82; 12 C. B. 413, 414.

CURIA PEDIS PULVERIZATI. In old English law. The court of piedpoudre or piepoudres (q. v.) 3 Bl. Comm. 32.

CURIA PENTICIARUM. A court held by the sheriff of Chester, in a place there called the "Pendice." Cowell.

CURIA PERSONAE. In old records. A parsonage house, or manse. Kennett, Par. Ant. 205; Cowell.

CURIA REGIS (Lat. the king's court). A term applied to the aula regis, the bancus or communis bancus, and the iter or eyre, as being courts of the king, but especially to the aula regis (q. v.)

CURIALTY. In Scotch law. Curtesy.

CURIOSA ET CAPTIOSA INTERPRETATIO in lege reprobatur. A curious and captious interpretation in the law is to be reproved. 1 Bulst. 6.

CURNOCK. In old English law. A measure containing four bushels or half a quarter of corn. Cowell; Blount.

CURRENCY. Current money (q. v.)

CURRENT. Present; now in progress or transit.

CURRENT MONEY. Lawful money; whatever passes current for money, whether coin or paper money. 27 Ill. 501; 9 Mo. 701; 8 Minn. 329.

In commercial use, "currency" is confined to paper money, as distinguished from "specie" or coin money. 14 Mich. 379; 12 Wall. (U. S.) 657.

CURRIT QUATUOR PEDIBUS (Law Lat. it runs upon four feet; or, as sometimes expressed, it runs upon all fours). A phrase used in arguments to signify the entire and exact application of a case quoted. "It does not follow that they run quatuor pedibus." 1 W. Bl. 145.

CURRIT TEMPUS CONTRA DESIDES ET sui juris contemptores. Time runs against the slothful and those who neglect their rights. Bracton, fols. 100b, 101; Fleta, lib. 4. c. 5, § 12.

CURSITOR. A junior clerk in the court of chancery, whose business it formerly was to write out from the register those forms of writs which issued of course. Such writs were called writs de cursu (of course), whence the name, which had been acquired as early as the reign of Edward III. The body of cursitors constituted a corporation, each clerk having a certain number of counties assigned to him. Coke, 2d Inst. 670; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 238.

CURSITOR BARON. An officer of the court of exchequer, who is appointed by patent under the great seal to be one of the barons of the exchequer. The office is abolished by St. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 86. Wharton.

CURSOR. An inferior officer of the papal court.

CURSUS CURIAE EST LEX CURIAE. The practice of the court is the law of the court. 3 Bulst. 53; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 126; 12 C. B. 414; 17 Q. B. 86; 8 Exch. 199; 2 Maule & S. 25; 15 East, 226; 12 Mees. & W. 7; 4 Mylne & C. 635; 3 Scott, N. R. 599.

CURTESY. The estate to which, by common law, a man is entitled, on the death of his wife, in the lands or tenements of which she was seised in possession in fee simple or in tail during her coverture, provided they have had lawful issue born alive which might have been capable of inheriting the estate.

It is a freehold estate for the term of his natural life. 1 Washb. Real. Prop. 127. In the common law, the word is used in the phrases "tenant by curtesy," or "estate by curtesy," but seldom alone; while in Scotland of itself it denotes the estate. See "Estates."

Some considerable question has been made as to the derivation both of the custom and its name. It seems pretty clear, however, that the term is derived from curtis, a court, and that the custom, in England at least, is of English origin, though a similar custom existed in Normandy, and still exists in Scotland. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 128, note; Wright, Ten. 192; Co. Litt. 30a; 2 Bl. Comm. 126; Ersk. Inst. 380; Grand Cout. de Normandie, c. 119.

CURTILAGE. The inclosed space immediately surrounding a dwelling house, contained within the same inclosure.

It is defined by Blount as a yard, backside, or piece of ground near a dwelling house, in which they sow beans, etc., yet distinct from the garden. Blount; Spelman. By others it is said to be a waste piece of ground so situated. Cowell.

It has recently been defined as "a fence or inclosure of a small piece of land around a dwelling house, usually including the buildings occupied in connection with the dwelling house, the inclosure consisting either of a separate fence, or partly of a fence and partly of the exterior of buildings so within this inclosure." 10 Cush. (Mass.) 480.

The term is used in determining whether the offense of breaking into a barn or warehouse is burglary. See 4 Bl. Comm. 224; 1 Hale, P. C. 558; 2 Russ. Crimes, 13; 1 Russ. Crimes, 790; Russ. & R. 289; 1 Car. & K. 84; 10 Cush. (Mass.) 480.

In Michigan the meaning of curtilage has been extended to include more than an inclosure near the house. 2 Mich. 250.

CURTILES TERRAE. In old English law. Court lands. Cowell. See "Court Lands."

CURTILLUM. The area or space within the inclosure of a dwelling house. Spelman.

CURTIS. The area about a building; a garden; a hut or farmer's house; a farmer's house with the land enrolled with it.

A village or a walled town containing a small number of houses.

The residence of a nobleman; a hall or palace.

A court; a tribunal of justice. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 120; Spelman; 3 Bl. Comm. 320.

The similarity of the derivative meaning of this word and of aula is quite noticeable, both coming to denote the court itself, from denoting the place where the court was held.

CUSTA, or CUSTANTIA. Costs.

CUSTODES. Keepers; guardians; conservators.

Custodes pacis, guardians of the peace. 1 Bl. Comm. 349.

Custodes libertatis Angliae auctoritate parliamenti, guardians of the liberty of England by authority of parliament. The style in which writs and all judicial process ran during the grand rebellion, from the death of Charles I. till Cromwell was declared protector. Jacob.

CUSTODIA LEGIS. In custody of the law.

CUSTODIAM LEASE. In English law. A grant from the crown under the exchequer seal, by which the custody of lands, etc., seized in the king's hands, is demised or committed to some person as custodee or lessee thereof. Wharton.

CUSTODY. The detainer of a person by virtue of a lawful authority. 3 Chit. Prac. 355.

The care and possession of a thing.

CUSTOM. Such a usage as by common consent and uniform practice has become the law of the place, or of the subject-matter, to which it relates.

It differs from prescription, which is personal, and is annexed to the person of the owner of a particular estate; while the other is local, and relates to a particular district. An instance of the latter occurs where the question is upon the manner of conducting a particular branch of trade at a certain place; of the former, where a certain person and his ancestors, or those whose estates he has, have been entitled to a certain advantage or privilege, as to have common of pasture in a certain close, or the like. 2 Bl. Comm. 263.

General customs are such as constitute a part of the common law, and extend to the whole country.

Particular customs are those which are confined to a particular district.

CUSTOM HOUSE. A place appointed by law, in ports of entry, where importers of goods, wares, and merchandise are bound to enter the same, in order to pay or secure the duties or customs due to the government.

CUSTOM OF MERCHANTS. A system of customs acknowledged and taken notice of by all nations, and which are therefore a part of the general law of the land. See "Law Merchant;" 1 Chit. Bl. Comm. 76, note 9.

CUSTOMARY COURT BARON. A court baron, at which copyholders might transfer their estates, and where other matters relating to their tenures were transacted. 3 Bl. Comm. 33.

This court was held on the manor, the lord or his steward sitting as judge. 1 Crabb, Real Prop. § 633. It might be held anywhere in the manor, at the pleasure of the judge, unless there was a custom to the contrary. It might exist at the same time with a court baron proper, or even where there were no freeholders in the manor.

CUSTOMARY ESTATES. Estates which owe their origin and existence to the custom of the manor in which they are held. 2 Bl. Comm. 149.

CUSTOMARY FREEHOLD. A class of freeholds held according to the custom of the manor, derived from the ancient tenure in villein socage. Holders of such an estate have a freehold interest, though it is not held by a freehold tenure. 2 Bl. Comm. 149.

CUSTOMARY SERVICE. A service due by ancient custom or prescription only. Such is, for example, the service of doing suit at another's mill, where the persons resident in a particular place, by usage, time out of mind have been accustomed to grind corn at a particular mill. 3 Bl. Comm. 234.

CUSTOMARY TENANTS (Law Lat. custumarii tenentes). In English law. Such tenants as hold by the custom of the manor, as their special evidence. Termes de la Ley. Copyholders belong to this class. 2 Bl. Comm. 147, 148. See "Copyholder."

CUSTOME SERRA PRISE STRICTE. Custom must be taken strictly. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 83.

CUSTOMS. This term is usually applied to those taxes which are payable upon goods and merchandise imported or exported. Story, Const. § 949; Bac. Abr. "Smuggling."

The duties, toll, tribute, or tariff payable upon merchandise exported or imported. These are called customs from having been paid from time immemorial. Expressed in law Latin by custuma, as distinguished from consuetudines, which are usages merely. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 314.

CUSTOMS AND SERVICES (Law Lat. consuetudines et servitia). In old English law. Services which the tenants of lands, under the feudal law, owed to their lords, and which, if withheld, the lord might resort to the writ of customs and services (breve de consuetudinibus et servitiis) to compel them. Tomlin. See "De Consuetudinibus et Servitiis."

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT. St. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, which has been frequently amended. See 2 Steph. Comm. 563.

CUSTOMS OF LONDON. Particular regulations in force within the city of London, in regard to trade, apprentices, widows and orphans, etc., which are recognized as forming part of the English common law. 1 Bl. Comm. 75.

CUSTOS. A custodian, guard, keeper, or warden; a magistrate.

CUSTOS BREVIUM (Lat.) Keeper of writs. An officer of the court of common pleas, whose duty it is to receive and keep all the writs returnable to that court, and put them upon file, and also to receive of the prothonotaries all records of nisi prius, called posteas. Blount. An officer in the king's bench, having similar duties. Cowell; Termes de la Ley. The office is now abolished.

CUSTOS FERARUM. A gamekeeper. Towns. Pl. 265.

CUSTOS HORREI REGII. Protector of the royal granary. 2 Bl. Comm. 394.

CUSTOS MARIS (Lat.) Warden or guardian of the seas. Among the Saxons, an admiral. Spelman, "Admiralius."

CUSTOS MORUM. The guardian of morals. The court of queen's bench has been so styled. 4 Steph. Comm. 377.

CUSTOS PLACITORUM CORONAE (Lat.) Keeper of the pleas of the crown (the criminal records). Said by Blount and Cowell to be the same as the custos rotulorum.

CUSTOS ROTULORUM (Lat.) Keeper of the rolls. The principal justice of the peace of a county, who is the keeper of the records of the county. 1 Bl. Comm. 349. He is always a justice of the peace and quorum, is the chief civil officer of the king in the county, and is nominated under the king's sign manual. He is rather to be considered a minister or officer than a judge. Blount; Cowell; Lambard, Eiren. lib. 4, c. 3, p. 373; 4 Bl. Comm. 272; 3 Steph. Comm. 37.

CUSTOS SPIRITUALIUM. In English ecclesiastical law. Keeper of the spiritualities; he who exercises the spiritual jurisdiction of a diocese during the vacancy of the see. Cowell.

CUSTOS STATUM HAEREDIS IN CUSTODIA EXISTENTIS MELIOREM NON DETERIOREM, FACERE POTEST. A guardian can make the estate of an heir living under his guardianship better, not worse. 7 Coke, 7.

CUSTOS TEMPORALIUM (Law Lat.) In English ecclesiastical law. Keeper of the temporalities. He to whose custody a vacant see or abbey was committed by the king, as supreme lord; who, as a steward of the goods and profits, was to give account to the escheator, and he into the exchequer. Cowell.

CUSTOS TERRAE. In old English law. Guardian, warden, or keeper of the land. Mag. Chart. c. 4.

CUSTUMA ANTIQUA SIVE MAGNA (Lat. ancient or great duties). The duties on wool, sheepskin, or wool pelts and leather exported were so called, and were payable by every merchant stranger as well as native, with the exception that merchant strangers paid one-half as much again as natives. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 314.

CUSTUMA PARVA ET NOVA (Lat.) An impost of three pence in the pound sterling on all commodities exported or imported by merchant strangers. Called at first the "Alien's duty," and first granted by St. 31 Edw. I. Maddox, Hist. Exch. 526, 532; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 314.

CUTH, or COUTH (Saxon). Known; knowing. Uncuth, unknown. See "Couthutlaugh;" "Uncuth."

CUTHRED. A knowing or skillful counsellor.

CUTPURSE (Law Lat. bursarum scissor; Law Fr. cynsour de burse). In old criminal law. An offender answering to the modern pickpocket. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 36, § 11.

CUTTER OF THE TALLIES. In old English law. An officer in the exchequer, to whom it belonged to provide wood for the tallies, and to cut the sum paid upon them, etc.

CY PRES (Law Fr. as near as). The rule of construction applied to a will, but not to a deed, by which, where the testator evinces a particular and a general intention, and the particular intention cannot take effect, the words shall be so construed as to give effect to the general intention. 3 Hare, 12; 2 Term R. 254; 2 Bligh, 49; Sugd. Powers, 60; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 532.

The principle is applied to sustain wills in which perpetuities are attempted to be created, so that, if it can possibly be done, the devise is not regarded as utterly void, but is expounded in such a manner as to carry the testator's intention into effect as far as the law respecting perpetuities will allow. This is called a construction cy pres. Its rules are vague, and depend chiefly upon judicial discretion applied to the particular case. Sedgw. Const. Law, 265; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1169 et seq.

It is also applied to sustain devises and bequests for charity. Where there is a definite charitable purpose which cannot take place, the courts will not substitute another, as they once did; but if charity be the general substantial intention, though the mode provided for its execution fails, the English chancery will find some means of effectuating it, even by applying the fund to a different purpose from that contemplated by the testator, provided only it be charitable. Boyle, Char. 147, 155; Shelf. Mortm. 601; 3 Brown, Ch. 379; 4 Ves. 14; 7 Ves. 69, 82.

The doctrine is denied in Alabama (19 Ala. 814), Connecticut (22 Conn. 31), Delaware (2 Har. 18), Indiana (35 Ind. 198), Iowa (2 Iowa, 315), Maryland (5 Har. & J. 392), New York (23 N. Y. 298), North Carolina (37 N. C. 255), and Wisconsin (40 Wis. 276, 75 Wis. 431); but is in force in California (58 Cal. 457), Illinois (16 Ill. 225), Massachusetts (96 Mass. 539), Missouri (94 Mo. 459), Pennsylvania (51 Pa. St. 196), and Rhode Island (14 R. I. 412).

CYNEBOTE (Saxon, from cyn, kin, or relationship, and bot, a satisfaction). In Saxon law. A pecuniary composition for killing a relative; the same with cenegild (q. v.) Spelman, voc. "Cenegild."

CYPHONISM. A punishment used by the ancients, which some suppose to have been the smearing of the body with honey, and exposing the person to flies, wasps, etc. But the author of the notes on Hesychius says it is derived from the Greek to bend or stoop, and signifies that kind of punishment still used by the Chinese, called by Sir George Staunton "the wooden collar," by which the neck of the malefactor is bent or weighed down. Enc. Lond.; Wharton.

CYRCE (Saxon). A church.

CYRICBRYCE. In Saxon law. A breaking into a church. Blount.

CYROGRAPHARIUS. In old English law. A cyrographer; an officer of the common pleas court.

CYROGRAPHUM. A cirograph.

D

D. B. E. De bene esse (q. v.)

D. B. N. De bonis non, a species of administration.

D. E. R. I. C. De ea re ita consuere, concerning this matter have decreed. A phrase used in the record of decrees of the Roman senate.

D. S. B. Debitum sans (or sine) breve.

DA TUA DUM TUA SUNT, POST MORtem tunc tua non sunt. Give the things which are yours whilst they are yours; after death then they are not yours. 3 Bulst. 18.

DABIS? DABO (Lat. will you give? I will give). In the Roman law. One of the forms of making a verbal stipulation. Inst. 3. 15. 1; Bracton, fol. 15b.

DACION. In Spanish law. The real and effective delivery of an object in the execution of a contract.

DAILY. Every day. A newspaper published six days in each week, whether Sunday or Monday be the day omitted, is held to be a "daily newspaper." 45 Minn. 27.

DAKER, or DIKER. Ten hides. Blount.

DALE and SALE. Fictitious names of places, used in the English books as examples. Perk. c. 2, § 152. "The manor of Dale and the manor of Sale, lying both in Vale." Bac. Abr. "Case of Revocation of Uses;" Perk. c. 3, § 230.

DALUS, DAILUS, or DAILIA. A certain measure of land; such narrow slips of pasture as are left between the plowed furrows in arable land. Cowell.

DAM. A construction of wood, stone, or other materials, made across a stream of water for the purpose of confining it; a mole.

DAMAGE. The loss caused by one person to another, or to his property, either with the design of injuring him, or with negligence and carelessness, or by inevitable accident. See "Damages."

DAMAGE CLEER. The tenth part in the common pleas, and the twentieth part in the king's bench and exchequer courts, of all damages beyond a certain sum, which was to be paid the prothonotary or chief officer of the court in which they were recovered before execution could be taken out. At first it was a gratuity, and of uncertain proportions. Abolished by St. 17 Car. II. c. 6. Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

DAMAGE FEASANT (Fr. faisant dommage, doing damage). A term usually applied to the injury which animals belonging to one person do upon the land of another by feeding there, and treading down his grass, corn, or other production of the earth. 3 Bl. Comm. 6; Co. Litt. 142, 161.

DAMAGED GOODS. In maritime law. Goods, subject to duties, which have received some injury either in the voyage home, or while bonded in warehouse.

DAMAGES. The indemnity recoverable by a person who has sustained an injury, either in his person, property, or relative rights, through the act or default of another.

The sum claimed as such indemnity by a plaintiff in his declaration.

The injury or loss for which compensation is sought.

The sums allowed by law for tortious injury or losses from breach of contract. 1 Suth. Dam. 3.

——In Modern Law. The term is not used in a legal sense to include the costs of suit, though it was formerly so used. Co. Litt. 267a; Doug. 751.

Damages are either direct or consequential.

(1) Direct are those which result immediately from the act complained of.

(2) Consequential are more remote consequences of such act. See "Consequential Damages."

Compensatory or exemplary; the latter being also called "punitive" or "vindictive."

(3) Compensatory damages are those allowed as recompense for the injury suffered.

(4) Exemplary damages are those allowed as a punishment for torts committed with fraud or actual malice. See "Exemplary Damages."

General or special.

(5) General damages are those necessarily and by implication of law resulting from the act or default complained of.

(6) Special damages are those arising directly, but not necessarily or by implication of law.

Liquidated or unliquidated.

(7) Liquidated damages are those whose amount has been determined by anticipatory agreement between the parties.

(8) Unliquidated damages are those not so fixed, but determined after they have resulted.

Substantial or nominal.

(9) Substantial damages are those allowed as actual compensation.

(10) Nominal damages are a trifling sum allowed where an infraction of a right is shown, but no resultant damage is proved. See "Nominal Damages."

DAMAIOUSE. In old English law. Causing damage or loss, as distinguished from torcenouse, wrongful. Britt. c. 61.

DAMNA (Lat. damnum). Damages, both inclusive and exclusive of costs.

DAMNI INJURIAE ACTIO (Lat.) In civil law. An action for the damage done by one who intentionally injured the beast of another. Calv. Lex.

DAMNOSA HAEREDITAS. A name given by Lord Kenyon to that species of property of a bankrupt which, so far from being valuable, would be a charge to the creditors; for example, a term of years, where the rent would exceed the revenue.

The assignees are not bound to take such property; but they must make their election, and, having once entered into possession, they cannot afterwards abandon the property. 7 East, 342; 3 Campb. 340.

DAMNUM ABSQUE INJURIA (Lat. injury without wrong). A wrong done to a man for which the law provides no remedy. Broom, Leg. Max. 1.

Damage sustained without the infraction of a legal right. 25 Conn. 265; 103 Ind. 314.

Injuria is here to be taken in the sense of "legal injury;" and, where no malice exists, there are many cases of wrong or suffering inflicted upon a man for which the law gives no remedy. 2 Ld. Raym. 595; 11 Mees. & W. 755; 11 Pick. (Mass.) 527; 10 Metc. (Mass.) 371. Thus, if the owner of property, in the prudent exercise of his own right of dominion, does acts which cause loss to another, it is damnum absque injuria. 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 168; 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 79; 10 Metc. (Mass.) 371; 10 Mees. & W. 109. See "Nominal Damages."

DAMNUM FATALE. In civil law. Damages caused by a fortuitous event, or inevitable accident; damages arising from the act of God. Among these were included losses by shipwreck, lightning, or other casualty; also losses by pirates, or by vis major, by fire, robbery, and burglary; but theft was not numbered among these casualties. In general, bailees are not liable for such damages. Story, Bailm. 471.

DAMNUM INFECTUM. In Roman law. Damage not yet committed, but threatened or impending. A preventive interdict might be obtained to prevent such damage from happening; and it was treated as a quasi-delict, because of the imminence of the danger.

DAMNUM REI AMISSAE. A loss arising from a payment made by a party in consequence of an error of law.

DAMNUM SINE INJURI ESSE POTEST. There may be damage or injury inflicted without any act of injustice. Lofft, 112.

DAN. Anciently the better sort of men in England had this title; so the Spanish Don. The old term of honor for men, as we now say Master or Mister. Wharton.

DANEGELT. A tax or tribute imposed upon the English when the Danes got a footing in their island.

DANELAGE. The laws of the Danes which obtained in the eastern counties and part of the midland counties of England in the eleventh century. 1 Bl. Comm. 65.

DANGERIA. A money payment made by forest tenants, that they might have liberty to plow and sow in time of pannage, or mast feeding. Mann.

DANGEROUS WEAPON. A weapon calculated to cause death or great bodily harm. Guns, swords, knives, and the like, are dangerous weapons, as a matter of law. 110 N. C. 497; 1 Baldw. (U. S.) 78. Others are dangerous or not, according to their capability of causing great bodily harm in the manner in which they are used. Thus, a champagne bottle (33 Ga. 207), a chair (3 Tex. App. 13), a club (104 N. C. 786), a stone (10 Minn. 407) or a shovel (17 S. C. 55) may be a dangerous weapon.

DANGERS OF THE SEA. See "Perils of the Sea."

DANISM. The act of lending money on usury.

DANO. In Spanish law. Damage; the deterioration, injury, or destruction which a man suffers with respect to his person or his property by the fault (culpa) of another. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 19, c. 3, § 1; Id. bk. 2, tit. 10, c. 12.

DANS ET RETINENS, NIHIL DAT. One who gives and yet retains does not give effectually. Tray. Lat. Max. 129. Or, one who gives yet retains [possession] gives nothing.

DAPIFER. A steward either of a king or lord. Spelman.

DARE. In the civil law. To transfer property. When this transfer is made in order to discharge a debt, it is datio solvendi animo; when in order to receive an equivalent, to create an obligation, it is datio contrahendi animo; lastly, when made donandi animo, from mere liberality, it is a gift, dono datio.

DARE AD REMANENTIAM. To give away in fee, or forever.

DARRAIGN. To clear a legal account; to answer an accusation; to settle a controversy.

DARREIN (Fr. dernier). Last. Darrein continuance, last continuance.

DARREIN PRESENTMENT (Law Fr.) In old English law. The last presentment. See "Assize of Darrein Presentment."

DARREIN SEISIN (Law Fr. last seisin). A plea which lay in some cases for the tenant in a writ of right. 3 Metc. (Mass.) 184; Jackson, Real Actions, 285. See 1 Roscoe, Real Actions, 206; 2 Prest. Abstr. 345.

DATA (from Lat. dare, to give). In old practice and conveyancing. The date of a deed; the time when it was given; that is, executed. Bl. Comm. Append. 1.

The date of a writ; the time when it was issued. Bracton, fol. 176.

DATE. The designation or indication in an instrument of writing of the time and place when and where it was made.

When the place is mentioned in the date of a deed, the law intends, unless the contrary appears, that it was executed at the place of the date. Plowd. 7b. The word is derived from the Latin datum, given; because, when instruments were in Latin, the form ran datum, etc., given the —— day of, etc.

The date of an instrument is that stated therein as that of its execution, rather than the actual time of execution. 32 N. J. Law, 515.

DATE CERTAINE. In French law. A fixed date; one made certain by the registration of the instrument.

DATIO. In civil law. A giving, or act of giving. Datio in solutum, a giving in payment; a species of accord and satisfaction. Called, in modern law, "dation."

Appointment or assignment. Datio judicis, the appointment of a judge to hear and determine a cause.

DATION. In civil law. The act of giving something. It differs from donation, which is a gift; dation, on the contrary, is giving something without any liberality; as, the giving of an office.

DATION EN PAIEMENT. In civil law. A giving by the debtor and receipt by the creditor of something in payment of a debt instead of a sum of money.

It is somewhat like the accord and satisfaction of the common law. 16 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 45; Poth. Vente, note 601. Dation en paiement resembles in some respects the contract of sale; dare in solutum est quasi vendere. There is, however, a very marked difference between a sale and a dation en paiement. First, the contract of sale is complete by the mere agreement of the parties; the dation en paiement requires a delivery of the thing given. Second, when the debtor pays a certain sum which he supposed he was owing, and he discovers he did not owe so much, he may recover back the excess; not so when property other than money has been given in payment. Third, he who has in good faith sold a thing of which he believed himself to be the owner is not precisely required to transfer the property of it to the buyer; and, while he is not troubled in the possession of the thing, he cannot pretend that the seller has not fulfilled his obligations. On the contrary, the dation en paiement is good only when the debtor transfers to the creditor the property in the thing which he has agreed to take in payment; and if the thing thus delivered be the property of another, it will not operate as a payment. Poth. Vente, notes 602-604. See 1 Low. (U. S.) 53.

DATIVE.

——In Old English Law. In one's gift; that may be given and disposed of at will and pleasure. Applied to an officer in the sense of "removable," as distinguished from "perpetual." St. 9 Rich. II. c. 4; St. 45 Edw. III. cc. 9, 10; Cowell.

——In Civil Law. That which is given by the magistrate, as distinguished from that which is cast upon a party by the law or by a testator. Bouvier. A dative executor answers to the administrator of the common law. Code Louis, arts. 1671, 1672.

DATUM. A thing given.

DATUR DIGNIORI. It is given to the more worthy. 2 Vent. 268.

DAUGHTER. An immediate female descendant.

DAY. The space of time which elapses while the earth makes a complete revolution on its axis.

A portion of such space of time which, by usage or law, has come to be considered as the whole for some particular purpose.

The space of time which elapses between two successive midnights. 2 Bl. Comm. 141.

That portion of such space of time during which the sun is shining.

Generally, in legal signification, the term includes the time elapsing from one midnight to the succeeding one (2 Bl. Comm. 141), but it is also used to denote those hours during which business is ordinarily transacted, frequently called a "business" day (5 Hill [N. Y.] 437), as well as that portion of time during which the sun is above the horizon, called, sometimes, a "solar" day, and, in addition, that part of the morning or evening during which sufficient of his light is above for the features of a man to be reasonably discerned. Coke, 3d Inst. 63.

By custom, the word "day" may be understood to include working days only (3 Esp. 121), and, in a similar manner only, a certain number of hours less than the number during which the work actually continued each day (5 Hill [N. Y.] 437).

A day is generally, but not always, regarded in law as a point of time, and fractions will not be recognized. 15 Ves. 257; 2 Barn. & Ald. 586. And see 9 East, 154; 4 Campb. 397; 11 Conn. 17.

DAY BOOK. In mercantile law. An account book in which merchants and others make entries of their daily transactions. This is generally a book of original entries, and, as such, may be given in evidence to prove the sale and delivery of merchandise, or of work done.

DAY RULE, or DAY WRIT. A rule or order of the court by which a prisoner on civil process, and not committed, is enabled, in term time, to go out of the prison and its rule or bounds. Tidd, Prac. 961. Abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, § 12.

DAYLIGHT. The daytime; between sunrise and sunset. 4 Bl. Comm. 224. Sufficient light, of day, to distinguish a man's features. 11 Car. & P. 297; 11 E. C. L. 398.

An insurance policy requiring lamps to be filled by daylight was held to mean not that they must be filled in the daytime, but that they must not be filled by artificial light. 134 U. S. 110.

DAYS IN BANK. In English practice. Days of appearance in the court of common pleas, usually called bancum. They are at the distance of about a week from each other, and are regulated by some festival of the church.

DAYS OF GRACE. In mercantile law. Certain days (generally three) allowed to the acceptor of a bill or the maker of a note in which to make payment, in addition to the time contracted for by the bill or note itself.

DAYSMAN. An arbitrator, umpire, or elected judge. Cowell.

DAYTIME. See "Daylight."

DAYWERE. As much arable land as could be ploughed in one day's work. Cowell.

DE. Of; about; concerning; respecting.

DE ACQUIRENDO RERUM DOMINIO. Of (about) acquiring the ownership of things. Dig. 11. 1; Bracton, lib. 2, fol. 8b.

DE ADMENSURATIONE. Of admeasurement.

Used of the writ of admeasurement of dower, which lies where the widow has had more dower assigned to her than she is entitled to. It is said by some to lie where either an infant heir or his guardian made such assignment, at suit of the infant heir whose rights are thus prejudiced. 2 Bl. Comm. 136; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 348. It seems, however, that an assignment by a guardian binds the infant heir, and that, after such assignment, the heir cannot have his writ of admeasurement. 2 Ind. 388; 1 Pick. (Mass.) 314; 37 Me. 509; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 226.

Used also of the writ of admeasurement of pasture, which lies where the quantity of common due each one of several having rights thereto has not been ascertained. 3 Bl. Comm. 38. See "Admeasurement of Dower."

DE ADVISAMENTO CONSILII NOSTRI (Law Lat. with or by the advice of our council). A phrase used in the old writs of summons to parliament. Reg. Jud. Append. 7. 8; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 240.

DE AEQUITATE. In equity. De jure stricto, nihil possum vendicare, de aequitate tamen, nullo modo hoc obtinet, in strict law, I can claim nothing, but in equity this by no means obtains. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 2, § 10.

DE AESTIMATO. In Roman law. One of the innominate contracts, and, in effect, a sale of land or goods at a price fixed (aestimato) and guarantied by some third party, who undertook to find a purchaser.

DE AETATE PROBANDA (Law Lat.) Writ of (about) proving age. An old writ which lay to the escheator or sheriff of a county to summon a jury to inquire whether the heir of a tenant in capite, claiming his estate on the ground of full age, was, in fact, of age or not. Reg. Orig. 294; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 257.

DE ALEATORIBUS. About gamesters. Dig. 11. 5.

It was directed to the treasurer and barons of the exchequer.

DE ALTO ET BASSO. Of high and low. A phrase anciently used to denote the absolute submission of all differences to arbitration. Cowell; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 90.

DE AMBITU (Lat. concerning bribery). Ambitus (bribery) was the subject of several of the Roman laws; as, the Lex Aufidia, the Lex Pompeia, the Lex Tullia, and others. See "Ambitus."

DE ANNO BISSEXTILI. Of the bissextile or leap year. The title of a statute passed in the twenty-first year of Henry III., which in fact, however, is nothing more than a sort of writ or direction to the justices of the bench, instructing them how the extraordinary day in the leap year was to be reckoned in cases where persons had a day to appear at the distance of a year, as on the essoin de malo lecti, and the like. It was thereby directed that the additional day should, together with that which went before, be reckoned only as one, and so, of course, within the preceding year. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 266.

DE ANNUA PENSIONE (Lat. of annual pension). A writ by which the king, having due unto him an annual pension from any abbot or prior for any of his chaplains which he will name who is not provided with a competent living, demands it of the said abbot or prior for the one that is named in the writ. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 231; Termes de la Ley.

DE ANNUO REDITU (Lat. for a yearly rent). A writ to recover an annuity, no matter how payable. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 258.

DE BONIS NON ADMINISTRATIS (Law Lat. of the goods not administered). Where the administration of the estate of an intestate is left unfinished, in consequence of the death, removal, etc., of the administrator, and a new administrator is appointed, the latter is termed an administrator de bonis non; i. e., of the goods of the deceased not administered by the former administrator. 2 Steph. Comm. 243. An administrator of this kind is also sometimes appointed to succeed an executor. Id.

DE BONIS NON AMOVENDIS (Law Lat.) Writ for not removing goods. A writ anciently directed to the sheriffs of London, commanding them, in cases where a writ of error was brought by a defendant against whom a judgment was recovered, to see that his goods and chattels were safely kept without being removed, while the error remained undetermined, so that execution might be had of them, etc. Reg. Orig. 131b; Termes de la Ley. This seems to have been a local writ.

DE BONIS PROPRIIS (Lat. of his own goods). A judgment against an executor or administrator which is to be satisfied from his own property.

When an executor or administrator has been guilty of a devastavit, he is responsible for the loss which the estate has sustained de bonis propriis. He may also subject himself to the payment of a debt of the deceased de bonis propriis by his false plea when sued in a representative capacity; as, if he plead plene administravit, and it be found against him, or a release to him when false. In this latter case the judgment is de bonis testatoris si, et si non de bonis propriis. 1 Wm. Saund. 336b, note 10; Bac. Abr. "Executor" (B 3).

DE BONIS TESTATORIS (Lat. of the goods of the testator). A judgment rendered against an executor which is to be satisfied out of the goods or property of the testator. Distinguished from a judgment de bonis propriis.

DE CUSTODIA TERRAE ET HAEREDIS. Writ of ward, or writ of right of ward. A writ which lay for a guardian in knight's service or in socage, to recover the possession and custody of the infant, or the wardship of the land and heir. Reg. Orig. 161b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 139 (B); 3 Bl. Comm. 141.

DE DEBITO. Writ of debt. Reg. Orig. 139. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 119 (C), 121.

DE DEBITORE IN PARTES SECANDO. Of cutting a debtor in pieces. This was the name of a law contained in the Twelve Tables, the meaning of which has occasioned much controversy. Some commentators have concluded that it was literally the privilege of the creditors of an insolvent debtor (all other means failing) to cut his body into pieces and distribute it among them. Others contend that the language of this law must be taken figuratively, denoting a cutting up and apportionment of the debtor's estate.

The latter view has been adopted by Montesquieu, Bynkershoek, Heineccius, and Taylor. Esprit des Lois, liv. 29, c. 2; Bynk. Obs. Jur. Rom. lib. 1, c. 1; Heinec. Ant. Rom. lib. 3, tit. 30, § 4; Tayl. Comm. Leg. Dec. The literal meaning, on the other hand, is advocated by Aulus Gellius and other writers of antiquity, and receives support from an expression (semoto omni cruciatu) in the Roman code itself. Aul. Gel. Noctes Atticae, lib. 20, c. 1; Code, 7. 7. 8. This is also the opinion of Gibbon, Gravina, Pothier, Hugo, and Niehbuhr. 3 Gib. Rom. Emp. (Am. Ed.) p. 183; Grav. de Jur. Nat.

Gent. et XII. Tab. § 72; Poth. Introd. ad Pand.; Hugo, Hist. du Droit Rom. tom. i. p. 233, § 149; 2 Niehb. Hist. Rom. p. 597; 1 Kent, Comm. 523, note.

DE DONIS. See "Estates."

DE DONIS, THE STATUTE (more fully, de bonis conditionalibus, concerning conditional gifts). St. Edw. I. c. 1.

The object of the statute was to prevent the alienation of estates by those who held only a part of the estate in such a manner as to defeat the estate of those who were to take subsequently. By introducing perpetuities, it built up great estates, and strengthened the power of the barons. See Bac. Abr. "Estates Tail;" 1 Cruise, Dig. 70; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 271.

DE DOTE ASSIGNANDA (Lat. for assigning dower). A writ commanding the king's escheator to assign dower to the widow of a tenant in capite. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 263c.

DE DOTE UNDE NIHIL HABET (Lat. of dower in that whereof she has none). A writ of dower which lay for a widow where no part of her dower had been assigned to her. It is now much disused; but a form closely resembling it is still much used in the United States. 4 Kent, Comm. 63; Stearns, Real Actions, 302; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 230.

DE EJECTIONE CUSTODIAE (Law Lat.; Law Fr. ejectment de gard). Writ of ejectment of ward. A writ which lay where a guardian had been forcibly ejected from his wardship. Reg. Orig. 162.

DE EJECTIONE FIRMAE. A writ which lay at the suit of the tenant for years against the lessor, reversioner, remainderman, or stranger who had himself deprived the tenant of the occupation of the land during his term. 3 Bl. Comm. 199. Originally lying to recover damages only, it came to be used to recover the rest of the term, and then generally the possession of lands. Involving, in the question of who should have possession, the further question of who had the title, it gave rise to the modern action of ejectment. Brooke, Abr.; Adams, Ej.; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 199 et seq.

DE ESCAETA. A writ of escheat, which lay for the lord to recover the land where the tenant died without an heir. Reg. Orig. 194.

DE INCREMENTO (Lat. of increase). Costs de incremento, costs of increase,—that is, which the court assesses in addition to the damages established by the jury. See "Costs de Incremento."

DE INFIRMITATE. Of infirmity. The principal essoin in the time of Glanville; afterwards called "de malo." 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 115. See "De Malo;" "Essoin."

DE INGRESSU. A writ of entry. Bracton, fols. 318, 319. Reg. Orig. 227b, 231, 235-237; Cowell.

DE INJURIA (Lat.) The full form is de injuria sua propria absque tali causa, of his own wrong without such cause; or, where part of the plea is admitted, absque residuo causae, without the rest of the cause.

——In Pleading. The replication by which in an action of tort the plaintiff denies the effect of excuse or justification offered by the defendant.

It can only be used where the defendant pleads matter merely in excuse and not in justification of his act. It is confined to those instances in which the plea neither denies the original existence of the right which the defendant is charged with having violated, nor alleges that it has been released or extinguished, but sets up some new matter as a sufficient excuse or cause for that which would otherwise and in its own nature be wrongful. It cannot, therefore, be properly used when the defendant's plea alleges any matter in the nature of title, interest, authority, or matter of record. 8 Coke, 66; 1 Bos. & P. 76; 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 159, note; 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 112; 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 491; 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 126; 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 129; 25 Vt. 328; Steph. Pl. 276.

DE LUNATICO INQUIRENDO (Lat.) The name of a writ directed to the sheriff, directing him to inquire by good and lawful men whether the party charged is a lunatic or not. See 4 Rawle (Pa.) 234; 1 Whart. (Pa.) 52; 5 Halst. (N. J.) 217; 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 497.

DE MAGNA ASSISA ELIGENDA (Law Lat.) Writ of or for choosing the grand assize. A writ directed to the sheriff to summon four lawful knights, before the justices of assize, there upon their oaths, to choose twelve knights of the vicinage to be joined with them, which sixteen knights constituted the grand assize, or great jury, which was to try the matter of right in a writ of right. Reg. Orig. 8; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 4 (F); 3 Bl. Comm. 351. Abolished by St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27. See "Grand Assize."

DE MAJORI ET MINORI NON VARIANT jura. Concerning major and minor, laws do not vary. 2 Vern. 552.

DE MALO. Of illness. See "De Malo Lecti."

DE MALO LECTI (Law Lat.; Law Fr. de mal de lyt). Of infirmity or illness of (in) bed. Closely rendered, in old Scotch law, bed-evil (bedde-evill). A species of essoin or excuse for nonappearance in court, formerly allowed a defendant in England, and more anciently called de infirmitate de reseantisa; the excuse being that the defendant was confined to his house in bed (lectus) by infirmity or indisposition (malum). Glanv. lib. 1, c. 18, 19; Bracton, fol. 337, 344b; Britt. cc. 122, 123; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 10; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 115, 412; Skene de Verb. Sign. voc. "Reseantisa." This essoin commonly followed immediately upon that de malo veniendo (infra); for where a person, having been detained on the road by sickness, and having cast the essoin de malo veniendi, had found himself obliged to return home, the order of essoins, conformably with what was likely to be the real fact, led to the essoin de malo lecti. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 412; Bracton, fol. 344b.

DE MANUCAPTIARE (Lat. of mainprize). A writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to take sureties for the prisoner's appearance,—usually called mainpernors,—and to set him at large. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 250; 1 Hale, P. C. 141; Coke, "Bail & Mainprize," c. 10; Reg. Orig. 268b.

DE MANUTENENDO. Writ of maintenance. A writ which lay against a person for the offense of maintenance. Reg. Orig. 182b, 189.

DE MEDIETATE LINGUAE. See "Medietas Linguae."

DE MEDIO (Lat. of the mesne). A writ in the nature of a writ of right, which lies where, upon a subinfeudation, the mesne (or middle) lord suffers his under tenant or tenant paravail to be distrained upon by the lord paramount for the rent due him from the mesne lord. Booth, Real Actions, 136; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 135; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 234; Co. Litt. 100a.

DE MELIORIBUS DAMNIS (Lat.) Of the better damages. When a plaintiff has sued several defendants, and the damages have been assessed severally against each, he has the choice of selecting the best, as he cannot recover the whole. This is done by making an election de melioribus damnis.

DE MERCATORIBUS, THE STATUTE. The statute of Acton Burnell. See "Acton Burnell."

DE MINIMIS NON CURAT LEX. The law does not notice (or care for) trifling matters. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 134; Hob. 88; 5 Hill (N. Y.) 170.

DE MINIS. Writ of threats. A writ which lay where a person was threatened with personal violence, or the destruction of his property, to compel the offender to keep the peace. Reg. Orig. 88b, 89; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 79 (G), 80.

DE MITTENDO TENOREM RECORDI. A writ to send the tenor of a record, or to exemplify it under the great seal. Reg. Orig. 220b.

DE MODERATA MISERICORDIA CAPIENDA. Writ for taking a moderate amercement. A writ, founded on Magna Charta (c. 14), which lay for one who was excessively amerced in a court not of record, directed to the lord of the court, or his bailiff, commanding him to take a moderate amercement of the party. Reg. Orig. 86b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 75, 76.

DE MODO DECIMANDI (Lat. of a manner of taking tithes). A prescriptive manner of taking tithes, different from the general law of taking tithes in kind. It is usually by a compensation either in work or labor, and is generally called a modus. 1 Keb. 162; 1 Rolle, Abr. 649; 1 Lev. 179; Cro. Eliz. 446; Salk. 657; 2 P. Wms. 462; 2 Russ. & M. 102; 4 Younge & C. 269, 283; 12 East, 35; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 29 et seq.; 3 Steph. Comm. 130.

DE MOLENDINO DE NOVO ERECTO non jacet prohibitio. A prohibition lies not against a new-erected mill. Cro. Jac. 429.

DE MORTE HOMINIS NULLA EST cunctatio longa. When the death of a human being may be concerned, no delay is long. Co. Litt. 134. When the question is concerning the life or death of a man, no delay is too long to admit of inquiring into facts.

DE NATIVO HABENDO (Law Lat.; Law Fr. briefe de naife). Writ for having one's villein. A writ which lay for a lord whose villein had fled from him (fugitivo), directed to the sheriff, commanding him to apprehend the villein, and restore him, with all his chattels, to the lord. Reg. Orig. 87; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 77; Roscoe, Real Actions, 34.

DE NOMINE PROPRIO NON EST CUrandum cum in substantia non erretur; quia nomina mutabilia sunt, res autem immobiles. As to the proper name, it is not to be regarded when one errs not in substance; because names are changeable, but things are immutable. 6 Coke, 66.

DE NON APPARENTIBUS ET NON EXistentibus eadem est lex. The law is the same respecting things which do not appear and those which do not exist. 6 Ired. (N. C.) 61; 12 How. (U. S.) 253; 5 Coke. 6; 6 Bing. N. C. 453; 7 Clark & F. 872; 5 C. B. 53; 8 C. B. 286; 1 Term R. 404; Broom. Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 150.

DE NON DECIMANDO (Lat. of not taking tithes). An exemption by custom from paying tithes is said to be a prescription de non decimando. A claim to be entirely discharged of the payment of tithes, and to pay no compensation in lieu of them. Cro. Eliz. 511; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 31.

DE NON PROCEDENDO AD ASSISAM. Writ for not proceeding to take an issue. A writ, directed to the justices assigned to hold assizes, commanding them not to proceed to take an assize in a particular case. Reg. Orig. 221.

DE NON RESIDENTIA CLERICI REGIS. An ancient writ where a parson was employed in the royal service, etc., to excuse and discharge him of nonresidence. 2 Inst. 264.

DE NON SANE MEMORIE (Law Fr.) Of unsound memory or mind; a phrase synonymous with non compos mentis. Litt. § 405; Plowd. 368. Stock, Non Compos Mentis, 1.

DE NOVI OPERIS NUNCIATIONE (Lat.) In civil law. A form of injunction or interdict which lies in some cases for the party aggrieved, where a thing is intended to be done against his right. Thus, where one build a house contrary to the usual and received form of building, to the injury of his neighbor, there lies such an injunction, which, being served, the offender is either to desist from his work, or to put in sureties that he shall pull it down if he does not in a short time avow, i. e., show, the lawfulness thereof. Ridley, Civ. & Ecc. Law, pt. 1, c. 1, § 8.

DE NOVO (Lat.) Anew; afresh. When a judgment upon an issue in part is reversed on error for some mistake made by the court in the course of the trial, a venire de novo is awarded, in order that the case may again be submitted to a jury.

DE NULLO, QUOD EST SUA NATURA indivisibile, et divisionem non patitur, nullam partem habebit vidua, sed satisfaciat ei ad valentiam. A widow shall have no part from that which in its own nature is indivisible, and is not susceptible of division, but let the heir satisfy her with an equivalent. Co. Litt. 32.

DE NULLO TENEMENTO, QUOD TENEtur ad terminum, fit homagii, fit tamen inde fidelitatis sacramentum. In no tenement which is held for a term of years is there an avail of homage; but there is the oath of fealty. Co. Litt. 67b.

DE ODIO ET ATIA (Lat. of hatred and ill will). A writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to inquire whether a person charged with murder was committed upon just cause of suspicion, or merely propter odium et atiam, through hatred and ill will; and if, upon the inquisition, due cause of suspicion did not appear, then there issued another writ for the sheriff to admit him to bail. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 128.

DE OFFICE (Law Fr.) Of office; in virtue of office; officially; in the discharge of ordinary duty. Le court d'office est tenu, the court is bound in virtue of its office. Y. B. H. 4 Hen. VI. 16.

The phrase corresponds to the Latin virtute officii.

DE ONERANDO PRO RATA PORTIONE. Writ for charging according to a ratable proportion. A writ which lay for a joint tenant, or tenant in common, who was distrained for more rent than his proportion of the land came to. Reg. Orig. 182; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 234 (H).

DE PACE ET LEGALITATE TUENDA (Law Lat.) For keeping the peace, and for good behavior. Tradat fidejussores de pace et legalitate tuenda, he shall deliver or find sureties for keeping the peace and good behavior. LL. Edw. Conf. c. 18; 4 Bl. Comm. 252, 254; Spelman, voc. "Legalitas."

DE PARTITIONE FACIENDA (Lat. for making partition). The ancient writ for the partition of lands held by tenants in common.

DE PERAMBULATIONE FACIENDA (Lat. for making a perambulation). A writ which lay where there was a dispute as to the boundaries of two adjacent lordships or towns, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to take with him twelve discreet and lawful knights of his county, and make the perambulation, and set the bounds and limits in certainty. Fitzh. Nat. Brev.

DE PIGNORE SURREPTO FURTI, ACtio. In civil law. An action to recover a pledge stolen. Inst. 4. 1. 14.

DE PIPA VINI CARIANDA. A writ of trespass for carrying a pipe of wine so carelessly that it was stove, and the contents lost. Reg. Orig. 110. Alluded to by Sir William Jones in his remarks on the case of Coggs v. Barnard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909. Jones, Bailm. 59.

DE PLACITO (Law Lat. of a plea; of or in an action). Formal words used in declarations and other proceedings, as descriptive of the particular action brought. De placito debiti, of a plea of debt; de placito conventionis fractae, of a plea of breach of covenant; de placito transgressionis, of a plea of trespass; de placito transgressionis super casum, of a plea of trespass on the case. Towns. Pl. 162-165. See the older forms in Fleta, lib. 2, c. 65, § 12. See "Placitum."

DE PLAGIS ET MAHEMIO. Of wounds and mayhem. The name of a criminal appeal formerly in use in England in cases of wounding and maiming. Bracton, fol. 144b; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 34. See "Appeal."

DE PLANO (Lat.)

——In Civil Law. Without form; in a summary manner. The praetor was said to administer justice in this way (de plano cognoscere) when he did so standing on the ground, or on the same level with the suitors, instead of occupying a tribunal (pro tribunali) elevated seat, or "bench," as it was termed in the English law. See "Bench." The French de plain is derived from this.

——In Common Law. Clearly; manifestly. The phrase is used in this classical sense in the statute De Bigamis (4 Edw. I.)

By covin or collusion. St. Westminster II. c. 4. This did not mean by default. Id.; 2 Inst. 349. See 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 191; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 23, 34, 36.

——In Scotch Practice. Forthwith. 2 Alison, Prac. 650.

DE PLEGIIS ACQUIETANDIS (Lat. for clearing pledges). A writ which lay where one had become surety for another to pay a sum of money at a specified day, and the principal failed to pay it. If the surety was obliged to pay, he was entitled to this writ against his principal. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 37 (C); 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 65.

DE POST DISSEISINA. Writ of post disseisin. A writ which lay for him who, having recovered lands or tenements by praecipe quod reddat, on default, or reddition, was again disseised by the former disseisor. Reg. Orig. 208; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 190.

DE PRAEROGATIVA REGIS (Law Lat. of the king's prerogative). The title of St. 17 Edw. II. st. 1, defining the prerogatives of the crown on certain subjects, partly of a feudal and partly of a political or general nature. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 204 et seq.; Barr. Obs. St. 202; Hale, Hist. Com. Law, c. 8.

DE PRAESENTI. Of the present; in the present tense. See "Per Verba de Praesenti."

DE PROPRIETATE PROBANDA (Lat. for proving property). A writ which issues in a case of replevin, when the defendant claims property in the chattels replevied, and the sheriff makes a return accordingly. The writ directs the sheriff to summon an inquest to determine on the validity of the claim; and, if they find for the defendant, the sheriff merely returns their finding. The plaintiff is not concluded by such finding. He may come into the court above and traverse it. Hammond, N. P. 456.

DE QUIBUS SUR DISSEISIN. An ancient writ of entry.

DE QUO, or DE QUIBUS. Of which. Formal words in the simple writ of entry, from which it was called a writ of entry "in the quo," or "in the quibus." 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 33.

DE QUOTA LITIS (Lat.) In civil law. A contract by which one who has a claim difficult to recover agrees with another to give a part, for the purpose of obtaining his services to recover the rest. 1 Duv. note 201. See "Champerty."

DE RECTO. Writ of right. Reg. Orig. 1, 2; Bracton, fol. 327b.

DE RECTO DE ADVOCATIONE (Lat. of right of advowson; called, also, de droit de advocatione). A writ which lay to restore the right of presentation to a benefice, for him who had an advowson, to himself and heirs in fee simple, if he was disturbed in the presentation. Y. B. 39 Hen. VI. 20a; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 30 (B).

DE RECTO DE RATIONABILI PARTE. Writ of right, of reasonable part. A writ which lay between privies in blood, as between brothers in gavelkind, or between sisters or other coparceners for lands in fee simple, where one was deprived of his or her share by another. Reg. Orig. 3b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 9 (B). Abolished by St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

DE RECTO PATENS. Writ of right patent. Reg. Orig. 1.

DE REDISSEISINA. Writ of redisseisin. A writ which lay where a man recovered, by assize of novel disseisin, land, rent, or common, and the like, and was put in possession thereof by verdict, and afterwards was disseised of the same land, rent, or common by him by whom he was disseised before. Reg. Orig. 206b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 188 (B).

DE REPARATIONE FACIENDA (Lat.) The name of a writ which lies by one tenant in common against the other, to cause him to aid in repairing the common property. 8 Barn. & C. 269.

DE RESCUSSU. Writ of rescue. A writ which lay where cattle distrained, or persons arrested, were rescued from those taking them. Reg. Orig. 117, 118; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 101 (C), (G).

A writ which lay in case a man held lands of the king by knight's service, to which homage, fealty, and escuage were appendant, to recover the services or fee due in case the knight failed to accompany the king to the war. It lay also for the tenant in capite, who had paid his fee, against his tenants. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 83 (C).

DE SE BENE GERENDO. For behaving himself well; for his good behavior. Yelv. 90, 154.

DE SECTA AD MOLENDINUM (Lat. of suit to a mill). A writ which lies to compel one to continue his custom of grinding at a mill. 3 Bl. Comm. 235; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 122 (M); 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 55.

DE SIMILIBUS AD SIMILIA EADEM ratione procedendum est. From similars to similars we are to proceed by the same rule. Branch, Princ.

DE SIMILIBUS IDEM EST JUDICIUM. Concerning similars the judgment is the same. 7 Coke, 18.

DE SON TORT (Fr.) Of his own wrong. This term is usually applied to a person who, having no right to meddle with the affairs or estate of a deceased person, yet undertakes to do so by acting as executor of the deceased. See "Executor."

DE STATUTO MERCATORIO (Law Lat.) Writ of statute merchant. A writ which lay for imprisoning him who had forfeited a statute-merchant bond until the debt was satisfied. Reg. Orig. 146b. There are several writs under this head. Id. 148; Reg. Jud. 8. See "Statute Merchant."

DE STATUTO STAPULAE (Law Lat.) Writ of statute staple. A writ that lay to take the body to prison, and seize upon the lands and goods of one who had forfeited the bond called "statute staple." Reg. Orig. 151. See "Statute Staple."

DE SUPERONERATIONE PASTURAE (Lat. of surcharge of pasture). A writ lying where one who had been previously impleaded in the county court was again impleaded in the same court for surcharging common of pasture, and the cause was removed to Westminster Hall. Reg. Jur. 36b.

DE TABULIS EXHIBENDIS. Of showing the tablets of a will. Dig. 43. 5.

DE TALLAGIO NON CONCEDENDO (Lat. of not allowing talliage). The name given to St. 34 Edw. I., restricting the power of the king to grant talliage. Coke, 2d Inst. 532; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 104.

DE TEMPORE CUJUS CONTRARIUM memoria hominum non existat (Law Lat.) From time whereof the memory of man does not exist to the contrary. Litt. § 170.

DE TEMPORE IN TEMPUS, ET AD OMnia tempora. From time to time, and at all times. Towns. Pl. 17.

DE TEMPS DONT MEMORIE NE COURT (Law Fr.) From time whereof memory runneth not; time out of memory of man. Litt. §§ 143, 145, 170; Dyer, 70.

DE TESTAMENTIS. Of testaments. The title of the fifth part of the Digests or Pandects; comprising the twenty-eighth to the thirty-sixth books, both inclusive.

DE THEOLONIO. A writ which lay for a person who was prevented from taking toll. Reg. Orig. 103.

DE TRANSGRESSIONE. A writ of trespass. Reg. Orig. 92.

DE TRANSGRESSIONE, AD AUDIENdum et terminandum. A writ or commission for the hearing and determining any outrage or misdemeanor. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 170.

DE UNA PARTE (Lat.) A deed de una parte is one where only one party grants, gives, or binds himself to do a thing to another. It differs from a deed inter partes (q. v.) 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2001.

DE UXORE RAPTA ET ABDUCTA (Lat. of a wife ravished and carried away). A kind of writ of trespass. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 89 (O); 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 139.

DE VASTO. Writ of waste. A writ which might be brought by him who had the immediate estate of inheritance in reversion or remainder, against the tenant for life, in dower, by curtesy, or for years, where the latter had committed waste in lands; calling upon the tenant to appear and show cause why he committed waste and destruction in the place named, to the disinherison (ad exhaeredationem) of the plaintiff. Reg. Orig. 72-75; Reg. Jud. 17b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 55 (C); 3 Bl. Comm. 227, 228. Abolished by St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27; 3 Steph. Comm. 506.

DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO (Lat. of inspecting the belly). A writ to inspect the body, where a woman feigns to be pregnant, to see whether she is with child. It lies for the heir presumptive to examine a widow suspected to be feigning pregnancy in order to enable a supposititious heir to obtain the estate. 1 Bl. Comm. 456; 2 Steph. Comm. 308; Cro. Eliz. 556; Cro. Jac. 685; 2 P. Wms. 593; 21 Viner, Abr. 547.

It lay also where a woman sentenced to death pleaded pregnancy. 4 Bl. Comm. 495. This writ has been recognized in America. 2 Chand. Am. Crim. Tr. 381.

DE VERBO IN VERBUM. Word for word. Bracton, fol. 138b. Literally, from word to word. Fleta uses de verbo ad verbum. Lib. 1, c. 21, § 3.

DE VERBORUM SIGNIFICATIONE. Of the signification of words. An important title of the Digests or Pandects (Dig. 50. 16), consisting entirely of definitions of words and phrases used in the Roman law, compiled from the writings of the best jurists, such as Ulpian, Paulus, Pomponius, Gaius, Scaevola, Javolenus, Celsus, Alfenus, Florentinus, Callistratus, and others.

DE VI LAICA AMOVENDA. Writ of (or for) removing lay force. A writ which lay where two parsons contended for a church, and one of them entered into it with a great number of laymen, and held out the other vi et armis; then he that was holden out had this writ directed to the sheriff, that he remove the force. Reg. Orig. 59; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 54 (D).

DE VICINETO (Lat. from the neighborhood). The sheriff was anciently directed in some cases to summon a jury de vicineto. 3 Bl. Comm. 360.

DE WARRANTIA CHARTAE (Lat. of warranty of charter). This writ lieth properly where a man doth enfeoff another by deed, and bindeth himself and heirs to warranty. Now, if the defendant be impleaded in an assize, or in a writ of entry in the nature of an assize, in which actions he cannot vouch, then he shall have the writ against the feoffor or his heirs who made such warranty. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 134 (D); Cowell; Termes de la Ley; Blount; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 55.

DE WARRANTIA DIEI. A writ which lay for a party in the service of the king who was required to appear in person on a certain day, commanding the justices not to record his default, the king certifying to the fact of such service. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 36.

DEACON. In ecclesiastical law. A minister or servant in the church, whose office in some churches is to assist the priest in divine service, and in the distribution of the sacrament.

DEAD BODY. A corpse.

DEAD BORN. A dead-born child is to be considered as if it had never been conceived or born; in other words, it is presumed it never had life, it being a maxim of the common law that mortuus exitus non est exitus. Co. Litt. 29b. See 2 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 35; Domat, liv. prel. tit. 2, § 1, notes 4, 6; 4 Ves. 334.

This is also the doctrine of the civil law. Dig. 50. 16. 120. Non nasci, et natum mori, pari sunt, not to be born, and to be born dead, are equivalent. Mortuus exitus non est exitus, a dead birth is no birth. Civ. Code La. art. 28.

DEAD FREIGHT. The amount paid by a charterer for that part of the vessel's capacity which he does not occupy, although he has contracted for it.

When the charterer of a vessel has shipped part of the goods on board, and is not ready to ship the remainder, the master, unless restrained by his special contract, may take other goods on board, and the amount which is not supplied, required to complete the cargo, is considered dead freight. The dead freight is to be calculated according to the actual capacity of the vessel. 3 Chit. Com. Law, 399; 2 Starkie, 450.

DEAD LETTERS. Letters transmitted through the mails according to direction, and remaining for a specified time uncalled for by the persons addressed, are called "dead letters."

DEAD MAN'S PART. That portion of the personal estate of a person deceased which, by the custom of London, became the administrator's.

If the decedent left wife and children, this was one-third of the residue after deducting the widow's chamber. If only a widow, or only children, it was one-half. 1 P. Wms. 341; Salk. 246. If neither widow nor children, it was the whole. 2 Show. 175. This provision was repealed by St. 1 Jac. II. c. 17, and the same made subject to the statute of distributions. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 5, 8.

DEAD PLEDGE. A mortgage.

DEAD RENT. A rent payable on a mining lease in addition to a royalty. So called because it is payable, although the mine may not be worked. Wharton.

DEAD USE. A future use.

DEADHEAD. A term applied to persons other than the officers or employes of a railroad company who are permitted by the railroad to travel without payment of fare. Phil. Law (61 N. C.) 22.

DEADLY FEUD (Lat. faida mortalis, or mortifera). A profession of irreconcilable hatred against an enemy, until revenge were obtained even by his death. This was allowed by the ancient Saxon laws, where a man had been killed, and no pecuniary satisfaction had been made to his kindred. Spelman, voc. "Faida." The term was also applied to the predatory warfare carried on in the northern borders of England. St. 43 Eliz. c. 13; 4 Bl. Comm. 244. See "Faida."

DEADLY WEAPON. A dangerous weapon (q. v.)

DEAD'S PART. In Scotch law. The part remaining over beyond the shares secured to the widow and children by law. Of this the testator had the unqualified disposal. Stair, Inst. lib. iii. tit. 4, § 24; Bell, Dict.; Paterson, Comp. §§ 674, 848, 902.

DEAFFOREST. In old English law. To discharge from being forest; to free from forest laws.

DEALER. One who buys to sell again. 27 Pa. St. 495.

DEALINGS. Transactions in the course of business. Two sales of goods by one to a firm constitute "dealings" with it, so as to entitle one to notice of dissolution. 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 549.

DEAN. In ecclesiastical law. An ecclesiastical officer, who derives his name from the fact that he presides over ten canons, or prebendaries, at least.

There are several kinds of deans, namely, deans of chapters; deans of peculiars; rural deans; deans in the colleges; honorary deans; deans of provinces.

DEAN AND CHAPTER. In ecclesiastical law. The council of a bishop, to assist him with their advice in the religious and also in the temporal affairs of the see. 3 Coke, 75; 1 Bl. Comm. 382; Co. Litt. 103, 300; Termes de la Ley; 2 Burn. Ecc. Law, 120.

DEAN OF THE ARCHES. The presiding judge of the court of arches. He is also an assistant judge in the court of admiralty. 1 Kent, Comm. 371; 3 Steph. Comm. 727.

DEATH. The cessation of life; the ceasing to exist.

Civil death is the state of a person who, though possessing natural life, has lost all his civil rights, and as to them is considered as dead.

A person convicted and attainted of felony, and sentenced to the state prison for life, is, in the state of New York, in consequence of the act of March 29, 1799, and by virtue of the conviction and sentence of imprisonment for life, to be considered as civilly dead. 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 118; 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 228, 260; Laws N. Y. Sess. 24, c. 49, §§ 29, 30, 31. And a similar doctrine anciently prevailed in other cases at common law in England. See Co. Litt. 133; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 132, note.

Natural death is the cessation of life. It is also used to denote a death which occurs by the unassisted operation of natural causes, as distinguished from a violent death, or one caused or accelerated by the interference of human agency.

DEATH-BED DEED. A deed made by one who was at the time sick of a disease from which he afterwards died. Bell, Dict.

DEATH'S PART. See "Dead's Part;" "Dead Man's Part."

DEATHSMAN. The executioner; hangman; he who executes the extreme penalty of the law.

DEBAUCH. To entice or lead away. In modern usage it implies carnal knowledge. 97 Mo. 668. It has been held synonymous with "seduce." 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 384, 389. In early use it signified merely to draw away from duty, being derived from French d'e (from) and bauche (shop).

DEBENTURE (Lat. debentur, they [moneys] are due). The word with which certain obsolete bonds given by the exchequer began. Blount.

——In English Law. An instrument issued by a company or public body as security for a loan of money. It contains, either expressly or impliedly, a promise to pay the amount mentioned in it, and almost invariably creates a charge on the whole or part of the property of the company or public body. A debenture generally forms part of a series or issue of similar instruments, with a provision that they shall all rank pari passu in proportion to their amounts. As to debentures generally, see Cav. § 267 et seq.

——In American Law. A custom-house certificate given by the collector of the port to the exporter or importer of goods, entitling him, under certain circumstances, to a drawback of duties paid on exported or imported goods. See "Drawback."

DEBENTURE STOCK. A stock or fund representing money borrowed by a company or public body, in England, and charged on the whole or part of its property. It differs from debentures chiefly in these respects: The title of each original holder appears in a register, instead of being represented by an instrument complete in itself; and the stock is capable of being transferred in any amounts, unless the regulations of the company, etc., forbid the transfer of amounts or fractions less than £10, or the like. Provision is sometimes made for issuing to each holder a certificate representing the amount of his stock, transferable by delivery, so as to entitle the bearer for the time being to the stock in question. Such certificates generally have coupons for interest attached to them, and, while they are outstanding, the stock ceases to be transferable on the register. Perpetual debenture stock is stock which cannot be paid off. The principal statutes relating to debenture stock are the company clauses acts of 1845 and 1863, the commissioners clauses act of 1847, and the local loans act of 1875. Debenture stock issued under these acts is not within the mortmain or charitable uses act. 9 Ch. Div. 337.

DEBET ESSE FINIS LITIUM. There ought to be an end of lawsuits. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 61.

DEBET ET DETINET (Lat. he owes and withholds). In pleading. An action of debt is said to be in the debet et detinet when it is alleged that the defendant owes and unjustly withholds or detains the debt or thing in question.

The action is so brought between the contracting parties. See "Detinet."

DEBET ET SOLET (Lat. he owes and is used to). Where a man sues in a writ of right, or to recover any right of which he is for the first time disseised, as of a suit at a mill, or in case of a writ of quod permittat, he brings his writ in the debet et solet. Reg. Orig. 144a; Termes de la Ley; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 122 (M).

DEBET QUIS JURI SUBJACERE UBI DElinquit. Every one ought to be subject to the law of the place where he offends. 3 Inst. 34; Bracton, fol. 154b; Finch, Law, 14, 36; Wingate, Max. 113, 114; 3 Coke, 231; 8 Scott, N. R. 567.

DEBET SUA CUIQUE DOMUS ESSE perfugium tutissimum. Every man's house should be a perfectly safe refuge. 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 31, 54.

DEBILE FUNDAMENTUM, FALLIT opus. Where there is a weak foundation, the work falls. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2068; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 169, 171.

DEBITA FUNDI (Lat.) In Scotch law. Debts secured on land. Bell, Dict.

DEBITA LAICORUM (Lat.) Debts of the laity; those which may be recovered in civil courts.

DEBITA SEQUUNTUR PERSONAM DEbitoris. Debts follow the person of the debtor. Story, Confl. Laws, § 362; 2 Kent, Comm. 429; Halk. Max. 13.

DEBITOR NON PRAESUMITUR DOnare. A debtor is not presumed to make a gift. See 1 Kames, Eq. 212; Dig. 50. 16. 108; 1 P. Wms. 239.

DEBITORUM PACTIONIBUS, CREDItorum petitio nec tolli, nec minui potest. The right to sue of creditors cannot be taken away or lessened by the contracts of their debtors. Poth. Obl. 87, 108; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 622.

DEBITRIX. A female debtor.

DEBITUM ET CONTRACTUS SUNT NULlius loci. Debt and contract are of no particular place. 7 Coke, 61; 7 Man. & G. 1019, note; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (4th Am. Ed.) 528, note.

DEBITUM IN PRESENTI, SOLVENDUM in futuro. A present debt, to be discharged in the future. 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 457, 470; 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 171, 176; 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 442, 445.

DEBITUM SINE BREVI (Law Lat.) In old practice. Debt without writ. An action begun by original bill, instead of by writ.

DEBT. Any sum of money due under contract, express or implied. 20 Cal. 351.

Blackstone restricts the term to money due on express contract (3 Bl. Comm. 154), but it has been thought that he used the word "express" not so much in contradistinction to implied contracts, as to liabilities arising outside of contract. 2 Mo. App. 94.

The word includes not only debts of record or judgments and debts by specialty, but all that is due to a man under any form of promise. 3 Metc. (Mass.) 526.

In a strict sense, it is confined to sums fixed by agreement, and not dependent on after calculation (1 Yeates [Pa.] 70), but in common use, the absolute fixing of the amount is not necessary (2 Wash. C. C. [U. S.] 386).

"Debt" is a much narrower word than "demand." 2 Hill (N. Y.) 223.

Many qualifying terms are used with the word "debt," most of which are self-explanatory. A few of the more obscure may be given:

(1) Active debt is one due to a person. Used in the civil law.

(2) Doubtful debt is one of which the payment is uncertain. Clef des Lois Romaines.

(3) Hypothecary debt is one which is a lien upon an estate.

(4) Judgment debt is one which is evidenced by matter of record.

(5) Liquid debt is one which is immediately and unconditionally due.

(6) Passive debt is one which a person owes.

(7) Privileged debt is one which is to be paid before others, in case a debtor is insolvent.

(8) Debt of record is one proved to exist by the official records of a court of record, as a judgment or a recognizance.

——In Practice. A form of action which lies to recover a sum certain. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 279. It lies wherever the sum due is certain or ascertained in such a manner as to be readily reduced to a certainty, without regard to the manner in which the obligation was incurred or is evidenced. 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 145; 1 Dutch. (N. J.) 506; 26 Miss. 521; 3 McLean (U. S.) 150; 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 264; 1 Mason (U. S.) 243.

It is thus distinguished from "assumpsit," which lies as well where the sum due is uncertain as where it is certain, and from "covenant," which lies only upon contracts evidenced in a certain manner.

It is said to lie in the debet and detinet, when it is stated that the defendant owes and detains, or in the detinet, when it is stated merely that he detains. Debt in the detinet for goods differs from detinue, because it is not essential in this action, as in detinue, that the specific property in the goods should have been vested in the plaintiff at the time the action is brought. Dyer, 24b.

It is used for the recovery of a debt eo nomine and in numero, though damages, which are in most instances merely nominal, are usually awarded for the detention. 1 H. Bl. 550; Cowp. 588.

DEBT EX MUTUO. A species of debt or obligation mentioned by Glanville and Bracton, and which arose ex mutuo, out of a certain kind of loan. Glanv. lib. 10, c. 3; Bracton, fol. 99. See "Mutuum;" "Ex Mutuo."

DEBTEE. One to whom a debt is due; a creditor; as, debtee executor. 3 Bl. Comm. 18.

DEBTOR. One who owes a debt; he who may be constrained to pay what he owes.

DEBTORS' ACT 1869. St. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, relating to insolvent debtors. See L. R. Ch. 152; L. R. 10 Ch. 76; 13 Ch. Div. 338; Id. 815.

DEBTOR'S SUMMONS. A summons under the seal of a court of bankruptcy in England, giving notice to the person to whom it is addressed (the debtor) that, unless he pays or compounds for a debt (not less than £50) due by him to a person therein named (the creditor) within a certain time, he will be liable to be adjudicated a bankrupt, unless he disproves the debt. Bankr. Act 1869, §§ 6, 7, form 4.

A trade debtor's summons is one for service on a trader, and differs from a non-trader debtor's summons in giving the debtor a shorter time for compliance with its terms. Id. §§ 4, 5.

DECANATUS, DECANIA, or DECANA (Lat.) A town or tithing, consisting originally of ten families of freeholders. Ten tithings compose a hundred. 1 Bl. Comm. 114.

Decanatus, a deanery, a company of ten. Spelman; Calv. Lex.

Decania, or decana, the territory under the charge of a dean.

DECANUS (Lat.) A dean; an officer having charge of ten persons. In Constantinople, an officer who has charge of the burial of the dead. Nov. Jus. 43. 59; Du Cange. The term is of extensive use, being found with closely related meanings in the old Roman, the civil, ecclesiastical, and old European law. It is used of civil and ecclesiastical, as well as military, affairs. There were a variety of decani:

Decanus monasticus, the dean of a monastery.

Decanus in majori ecclesia, dean of a cathedral church.

Decanus militaris, a military captain of ten soldiers.

Decanus episcopi, a dean presiding over ten parishes.

Decanus friborgi, dean of a fribourg, tithing, or association of ten inhabitants. A Saxon officer, whose duties were those of an inferior judicial officer. Du Cange; Spelman; Calv. Lex.

DECEASE. As a noun, death; departure from life.

As a verb, to die; to depart life, or from life. This has always been a common term in Scotch law. "Gif ane man deceasis." Skene de Verb. Sign.

DECEDENT. A deceased person.

The signification of the word has become more extended than its strict etymological meaning. Strictly taken, it denotes a dying person, but is always used in the more extended sense given, denoting any deceased person, testate or intestate.

DECEIT. A fraudulent misrepresentation or contrivance, by which one man deceives another, who has no means of detecting the fraud, to the injury and damage of the latter.

It requires (1) a false representation; (2) inability of the person damaged to prevent the fraud; (3) resultant damage.

Deceit is a type of fraud (Bigelow, Frauds, § 1); fraud being the generic term, and deceit being active fraud by misrepresentation, or other positive contrivance.

DECEM TALES (Lat. ten such). In practice. A writ requiring the sheriff to appoint ten like men (apponere decem tales) to make up a full jury when a sufficient number do not appear.

DECEMVIRI LITIBUS JUDICANDIS. Ten judges (five being senators and five knights), appointed by Augustus to act as judges in certain cases. Calv. Lex.; Anthon, Rom. Ant.

DECENNARIUS (Lat.) One who held one-half a virgate of land. Du Cange. One of the ten freeholders in a decennary. Du Cange; Calv. Lex.

Decennier, one of the decennarii, or ten freeholders making up a tithing. Spelman; Du Cange, "Decenna;" 1 Bl. Comm. 114. See "Decanus."

DECENNARY (Lat. decem, ten). A district originally containing ten men with their families.

King Alfred, for the better preservation of the peace, divided England into counties, the counties into hundreds, and the hundreds into tithings or decennaries, the inhabitants whereof, living together, were sureties or pledges for each other's good behavior. One of the principal men of the latter number presided over the rest, and was called the chief pledge, borsholder, borrow's elder, or tything man.

DECEPTIS NON DECIPIENTIBUS, JURA subveniunt. The laws help persons who are deceived, not those deceiving. Tray. Lat. Max. 149.

DECERN. In Scotch law. To decree. "Decernit and ordainit." 1 How. St. Tr. 927. "Decerns." Shaw, 16.

DECESSUS (Lat. from decedere, to depart).
——In the Civil Law. Decease; death. Dig. 33. 2. 34. Rarely used.
——In Old English Law. Decease; death. Post meum decessum, after my decease. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 9, § 5; Id. c. 17, § 1.
Departure. 3 Salk. 123. See "Departure."

DECET TAMEN PRINCIPEM SERVARE leges, quibus ipse servatus est. It behooves, indeed, the prince to keep the laws by which he himself is preserved.

DECIES TANTUM (Lat.) An obsolete writ, which formerly lay against a juror who had taken money for giving his verdict. Called so because it was sued out to recover from him ten times as much as he took.

DECIMAE (Lat.) The tenth part of the annual profit of each living, payable formerly to the pope. There were several valuations made of these livings at different times. The decimae (tenths) were appropriated to the crown, and a new valuation established, by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 284.

DECIMAE DE DECIMATIS SOLVI NON debent. Tithes are not to be paid from that which is given for tithes.

DECIMAE DE JURE DIVINO ET CAnonica institutione pertinent ad personam. Tithes belong to the parson by divine right and canonical institution. Dal. 50.

DECIMAE DEBENTUR PAROCHO. Tithes are due to the parish priest.

DECIMAE NON DEBENT SOLVI, UBI non est annua renovatio, et ex annuatis renovantibus simul semel. Tithes ought not to be paid where there is not an annual renovation, and from annual renovations once only. Cro. Jac. 42.

DECIMATION. The punishing every tenth soldier by lot, for mutiny or other failure of duty, was termed "decimatio legionis" by the Romans. Sometimes only the twentieth man was punished (vicesimatio), or the hundredth (centesimatio).
Also tithing or tenth part.

DECIME. A French coin, of the value of the tenth part of a franc, or nearly two cents.

DECIPI QUAM FALLERE EST TUTIUS. It is safer to be deceived than to deceive. Lofft, 396.

DECISION. In practice. A judgment given by a competent tribunal. The French lawyers call the opinions which they give on questions propounded to them, decisions. See Inst. 1. 2. 8; Dig. 1. 2. 2.

DECISIVE OATH. In the civil law. Where one of the parties to a suit, not being able to prove his charge, offered to refer the decision of the cause to the oath of his adversary, which the adversary was bound to accept, or tender the same proposal back again, otherwise the whole was taken as confessed by him. Code, 4. 1. 12.

DECLARANT. One who makes a declaration.

DECLARATION.
——In Pleading. A specification, in a methodical and logical form, of the circumstances which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action. 1 Chit. Pl. 248; Co. Litt. 17a, 303a; Bac. Abr. "Pleas" (B); Comyn, Dig. "Pleader" (C 7); Lawes, Pl. 35; Steph. Pl. 36; 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 28.
In real actions, it is most properly called the "count;" in a personal one, the "declaration." Steph. Pl. 36; Doctrina Plac. 83; Lawes, Pl. 33. See Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 16a, 60d. The latter, however, is now the general term, being that commonly used when referring to real and personal actions without distinction. 3 Bouv. Inst. note 2815.
In an action at law, the declaration answers to the bill in chancery, the libel (narratio) of the civilians, and the allegation of the ecclesiastical courts.
It may be general or special. For example, in debt on a bond, a declaration counting on the penal part only is general. One which sets out both the bond and the condition, and assigns the breach, is special. Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 50.
——In Evidence. An unsworn statement made out of court by a party in interest.
——In Scotch Law. The statement made before the magistrate by one arrested for crime.

DECLARATION OF INTENTION. The act of an alien who goes before a court of record, and in a formal manner declares that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof at the time he may be a citizen or subject. Act Cong. April 14, 1802. § 1.

DECLARATION OF PARIS. The name given to an agreement announcing four important rules of international law effected between the principal European powers at the Congress of Paris in 1856. These rules are: (1) Privateering is and remains abolished; (2) the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, except contraband of war; (3) neutral goods, except contraband of war, are not liable to confiscation under a hostile flag; (4) blockades, to be binding, must be effective. Abbott.

DECLARATION OF TRUST. The act by which an individual acknowledges that a property, the title of which he holds, does in fact belong to another, for whose use he holds the same.

The instrument in which such an acknowledgment is made.

DECLARATION OF WAR. The public proclamation of the government of a state, by which it declares itself to be at war with a foreign power, which is named, and which forbids all and every one to aid or assist the common enemy.

The power of declaring war is vested in congress by the constitution (article 1, § 8). There is no form or ceremony necessary except the passage of the act. A manifesto stating the causes of the war is usually published; but war exists as soon as the act takes effect. It was formerly usual to precede hostilities by a public declaration communicated to the enemy, and to send a herald to demand satisfaction. Potter, Grec. Ant. bk. 3, c. 7; Dig. 49. 15. 24. But that is not the practice of modern times.

A state of war, known as "imperfect" or "unsolemn" war, may exist without a declaration. Grotius de Jure Belli, bk. 1, c. 3, § 4. See 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 577.

DECLARATOR. In Scotch law. An action whereby a party prays something to be declared in his favor. Scotch Dict.

DECLARATOR OF TRUST. In Scotch law. An action resorted to against a trustee who holds property upon titles ex facie for his own benefit. Bell, Dict.

DECLARATORY. Something which explains or ascertains what before was uncertain or doubtful; as, a declaratory statute, which is one passed to put an end to a doubt as to what the law is, and which declares what it is, and what it has been. 1 Bl. Comm. 86.

DECLARATORY ACTION. In Scotch law. An action in which the right of the pursuer (or plaintiff) is craved to be declared, but nothing claimed to be done by the defender (defendant). Bell, Dict.; Ersk. Inst. 5. 1. 46. Otherwise called an "action of declarator."

DECLARATORY JUDGMENT (or DECREE). In practice. One which declares the rights of the parties, without ordering anything to be done.

DECLARATORY PART OF A LAW. That which clearly defines rights to be observed and wrongs to be eschewed. 1 Bl. Comm. 53.

DECLINATION. In Scotch law. A preliminary plea objecting to the jurisdiction on the ground that the judge is interested in the suit.

DECLINATORY PLEA. In English practice. The plea of sanctuary, or of benefit of clergy, before trial or conviction. 2 Hale, P. C. 236; 4 Bl. Comm. 333. Now abolished. 4 Steph. Comm. 400, note; Id. 436, note.

DECLINATURE. In Scotch practice. An objection to the jurisdiction of the judge. Bell, Dict.

DECOCTION. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. The product of this operation.

In a case in which the indictment charged the prisoner with having administered to a woman a decoction of a certain shrub, called "savin," it appeared that the prisoner had administered an infusion, and not a decoction. The prisoner's counsel insisted that he was entitled to an acquittal on the ground that the medicine was misdescribed; but it was held that infusion and decoction are ejusdem generis, and that the variance was immaterial. 3 Campb. 74, 75.

DECOCTOR. In Roman law. A bankrupt; a person who squandered the money of the state. Calv. Lex.; Du Cange.

DECOLLATIO. Decollation; beheading.

DECONFES. In French law. A name formerly given to those persons who died without confession, whether they refused to confess, or whether they were criminals to whom the sacrament was refused. Droit de Canon, par M. l'Abbe Andre.

DECOY. A pond used for the breeding and maintenance of water fowl. 11 Mod. 74, 130; 3 Salk. 9; Holt, 14; 11 East, 571.

An article exposed for the purpose of affording an opportunity for the commission of a crime, and thereby detecting the perpetrator.

Particularly applied to letters sent through the mail to detect persons stealing or opening them in violation of the postal laws. Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) tit. "Decoys."

DECREE.

——In Practice. The judgment or sentence of a court of equity, or of admiralty. It corresponds to the judgment of a court of law. It is either interlocutory or final. The former is given on some plea or issue arising in the cause which does not decide the main question; the latter settles the matter in dispute; and a final decree has the same effect as a judgment at law. 2 Madd. 462; 1 Chanc. Cas. 27; 2 Vern. 89; 4 Brown, Parl. Cas. 287. See 7 Viner, Abr. 394; 7 Comyn. Dig. 445; 1 Belt, Supp. to Ves. 223; Bouv. Inst. Index.

——In Legislation. In some countries, as in France, some acts of the legislature or of the sovereign, which have the force of law, are called "decrees;" as, the Berlin and Milan decrees.

——In Scotch Law. A final judgment or sentence of court, by which the question at issue between the parties is decided.

DECREE DATIVE. In Scotch law. The order of a court of probate appointing an administrator.

DECREE IN ABSENCE. In Scotch law. Judgment by default or pro confesso.

DECREE OF CONSTITUTION. In Scotch law. Any decree by which the extent of a debt or obligation is ascertained.

The term is, however, usually applied especially to those decrees which are required to found a title in the person of the creditor in the event of the death of either the debtor or the original creditor. Bell, Dict.

DECREE OF FORTHCOMING. In Scotch law. The decree made after an arrestment, ordering the debt to be paid or the effects to be delivered up to the arresting creditor. Bell, Dict.

DECREE OF LOCALITY. In Scotch law. The decree of a teind court allocating stipend upon different heritors. It is equivalent to the apportionment of a tithe rent charge.

DECREE OF MODIFICATION. In Scotch law. A decree of the teind court modifying or fixing a stipend.

DECREE OF REGISTRATION. In Scotch law. A proceeding by which the creditor has immediate execution. It is somewhat like a warrant of attorney to confess judgment. 1 Bell, Comm. 1. 1. 4.

DECREET. In Scotch law. The final judgment or sentence of court by which the question at issue between the parties is decided.

Decreet absolutor is one where the decision is in favor of the defendant.

Decreet condemnator is one where the decision is in favor of the plaintiff. Ersk. Inst. 4. 3. 5.

Decreet absolvitor is one dismissing a claim, or acquitting a defendant. 2 Kames, Eq. 367; 1 Forbes, Inst. pt. 4, bk. 1, c. 2, tit. 1, § 3.

Decreet arbitral is the award of arbitration; the form of promulgating such award. Bell, Dict. "Arbitration;" 2 Bell, H. L. Sc. 49.

DECREMENTUM MARIS (Lat.) In old English law. Decrease of the sea; the receding of the sea from the land. Callis, Sew. (53), 65. See "Reliction."

DECRETA. In the Roman law. Judicial sentences given by the emperor as supreme judge.

DECRETA CONCILIORUM NON LIGANT reges nostros. The decrees of councils bind not our kings. Moore, 906.

DECRETAL ORDER. In chancery practice. An order made by the court of chancery, upon a motion or petition, in the nature of a decree. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 637.

DECRETALES BONIFACII OCTAVI. A supplemental collection of the canon law, published by Boniface VIII. in 1298. Called, also, liber sextus decretalium, sixth book of the decretals. 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 83, note. See "Decretals."

DECRETALES GREGORII NONI. The decretals of Gregory the Ninth. A collection of the laws of the church, published by order of Gregory IX. in 1227. It is composed of five books, subdivided into titles, and each title is divided into chapters. They are cited by using an X (or extra) thus: Cap. & X de Regulis Juris, etc. 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 83, note; Butler, Hor. Jur. 115.

DECRETALS. In ecclesiastical law. Canonical epistles, written by the pope alone, or by the pope and cardinals, at the instance or suit of one or more persons, for the ordering and determining some matter in controversy, and which have the authority of a law in themselves.

The decretals were published in three volumes. The first volume was collected by Raymundus Barcinius, chaplain to Gregory IX., about the year 1227, and published by him to be read in schools, and used in the ecclesiastical courts. The second volume is the work of Boniface VIII., compiled about the year 1298, with additions to and alterations of the ordinances of his predecessors. The third volume is called the "Clementines," because made by Clement V., and was published by him in the council of Vienna, about the year 1308. To these may be added the Extravagantes of John XXII. and other bishops of Rome, which, relatively to the others, are called Novellae Constitutiones. Ridley's View, etc., 99, 100; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, 194, 195.

The false decretals were forged in the names of the early bishops of Rome, and first appeared about A. D. 845-850. The author of them is not known. They are mentioned in a letter written in the name of the council of Quierzy, by Charles the Bald, to the bishops and lords of France. See Van Espen Fleury, Droit de Canon, by Andre.

The decretals constitute the second division of the Corpus Juris Canonici.

DECRETO. In Spanish colonial law. An order emanating from some superior tribunal, promulgated in the name and by the authority of the sovereign, in relation to ecclesiastical matters. Schmidt, Civ. Law, 93, note.

DECRETUM.

——In Civil Law. A species of imperial constitution, being a judgment or sentence given by the emperor upon hearing of a cause, quod imperator cognoscens decrevit. Inst. 1. 2. 6.

——In Canon Law. An ecclesiastical law.

in contradistinction to a secular law (lex). 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 81, § 93.

DECRETUM GRATIANI. A collection of ecclesiastical law made by Gratian, a Bolognese monk, in the year 1151. It is the oldest of the collections constituting the Corpus Juris Canonici. 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 81; 1 Bl. Comm. 82; Butler, Hor. Jur. 113.

DECRY. To cry down; to destroy the credit of. It is said that the king may at any time decry the coin of the realm. 1 Bl. Comm. 278.

DECURIO. In Roman law. One of the chief men or senators in the provincial towns. The decuriones, taken together, had the entire management of the internal affairs of their towns or cities, with powers resembling in some degree those of our modern city councils. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 54; Calv. Lex.

DEDBANA. An actual homicide or manslaughter.

DEDI (Lat. I have given). A word used in deeds and other instruments of conveyance when such instruments were made in Latin. The use of this word formerly carried with it a warranty in law, when in a deed; for example, if in a deed it was said, "dedi (I have given), etc., to A. B.," there was a warranty to him and his heirs. Brooke, Abr. "Guaranty," pl. 85. The warranty thus wrought was a special warranty, extending to the heirs of the feoffee during the life of the donor only. Co. Litt. 384b; 4 Coke, 81; 5 Coke, 17. Dedi is said to be the aptest word to denote a feoffment. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 310. The future, dabo, is found in some of the Saxon grants. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 44.

DEDI ET CONCESSI (Lat. I have given and granted). The aptest words to work a feoffment. They are the words ordinarily used, when instruments of conveyance were in Latin, in charters of feoffment, gift, or grant. These words were held the aptest, though others would answer. Co. Litt. 384b; 1 Steph. Comm. 114; 2 Bl. Comm. 53, 316.

DEDICATION. An appropriation of land to some public use, made by the owner, and accepted for such use by or on behalf of the public. Angell, Highways, c. 111, § 132.

There may be a dedication for pious and charitable purposes, as well as for public easements. 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 222.

Dedications are either—

(1) Statutory, being those in pursuance of a statute, or

(2) Common law, being that implied by acquiescence in the public user. It operates not by grant, but by estoppel. 9 Iowa, 451.

"In common-law dedication, no particular formality is necessary. It is not affected by the statute of frauds. It may be made, either with or without writing, by any act of the owner, such as throwing open his land to public travel, or platting it and selling lots bounded by streets designated in the plat, thereby indicating a clear intention to dedicate. Or an acquiescence in the use of his land for a highway, or his declared assent to such use, will be sufficient; the dedications being proved in most if not all of the cases by matter in pais, and not by deed. The vital principle of the dedication is the intention to dedicate; and whenever this is unequivocally manifested, the dedication, so far as the owner of the soil is concerned, has been made. Time, therefore, though often a very material ingredient in the evidence, is not an indispensable ingredient in the act of dedication. If accepted and used by the public in the manner intended, the dedication is complete, precluding the owner and all claiming in his right from asserting any ownership inconsistent with such use. Dedication, therefore, is a conclusion of fact to be drawn by the jury from the circumstances of each particular case; the whole question, as against the owner of the soil, being whether there is sufficient evidence of an intention on his part to dedicate the land to the public use as a highway." 14 Cal. 642.

DEDICATION DAY. The feast of dedication of churches, or rather the feast day of the saint and patron of a church, which was celebrated not only by the inhabitants of the place, but by those of all the neighboring villages, who usually came thither; and such assemblies were allowed as lawful. It was usual for the people to feast and to drink on those days. Cowell.

DEDIMUS ET CONCESSIMUS (Lat. we have given and granted). Words used by the king where there were more grantors than one, instead of dedi et concessi.

DEDIMUS POTESTATEM (Lat. we have given power). The name of a writ to commission private persons to do some act in the place of a judge; as, to administer an oath of office to a justice of the peace, to examine witnesses, and the like. Cowell; Comyn, Dig. "Chancery" (K 3), (P 2), "Fine" (E 7); Dane, Abr. Index; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 351.

DEDIMUS POTESTATEM DE ATTORNO faciendo (Lat.) The name of a writ which was formerly issued by authority of the crown in England to authorize an attorney to appear for a defendant.

By St. Westminster II. (13 Edw. I. c. 10), all persons impleaded may make an attorney to sue for them, in all pleas moved by or against them, in the superior courts there enumerated. 3 Man. & G. 184, note.

DEDITITII (Lat.) In Roman law. Criminals who have been marked in the face or on the body with fire or an iron so that the mark cannot be erased, and subsequently manumitted. Calv. Lex.

DEDUCTION FOR NEW. In maritime law. The allowance (usually one-third) on the cost of repairing a damage to the ship by the extraordinary operation of the perils of navigation, the renovated part being presumed to be better than before the damage.

In some ports, by custom or by express provision in the policy, the allowance is not made on a new vessel during the first year, or on new sheathing, or on an anchor or chain cables. 1 Phil. Ins. § 50; 2 Phil. Ins. §§ 1369, 1431, 1433; Benecke & S. Av. (Phil. Ed.) 167, note 238; 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 229; 1 Caines (N. Y.) 573; 18 La. 77; 2 Cranch, C. C. (U. S.) 218; 21 Pick. (Mass.) 456; 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 63.

DEED. A written instrument under seal, containing a contract or agreement which has been delivered by the party to be bound and accepted by the obligee or covenantee. Co. Litt. 171; 2 Bl. Comm. 295; Shep. Touch. 50.

A writing under seal, by which lands, tenements, or hereditaments are conveyed for an estate not less than a freehold. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 294.

Any instrument in writing under seal, whether it relates to the conveyance of real estate, or to any other matter,—as, for instance, a bond, single bill, agreement, or contract of any kind,—is as much a deed as is a conveyance of real estate, and, after delivery and acceptance, is obligatory. 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 504; 5 Dana (Ky.) 365; 2 Miss. 154. The term is, however, often used in the latter sense above given, and perhaps oftener than in its more general signification.

According to Sir William Blackstone (2 Comm. 313), deeds may be considered as conveyances at common law,—of which the original are feoffment, gift, grant, lease, exchange, partition; the derivative are release, confirmation, surrender, assignment, defeasance,—or conveyances which derive their force by virtue of the statute of uses, namely, covenant to stand seised to uses; bargain and sale of lands; lease and release; deed to lead and declare uses; deed of revocation of uses.

DEED INDENTED. See "Indenture."

DEED OF COVENANT. Covenants are sometimes entered into by a separate deed, for title, or for the indemnity of a purchaser or mortgagee, or for the production of title deeds. A covenant with a penalty is sometimes taken for the payment of a debt, instead of a bond with a condition, but the legal remedy is the same in either case. Rapalje & L.

DEED POLL. A deed which is made by one party only.

A deed in which only the party making it executes it, or binds himself by it as a deed. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 588.

The distinction between "deed poll" and "indenture" has come to be of but little importance. The ordinary purpose of a deed poll is merely to transfer the rights of the grantor to the grantee. It was formerly called charta de una parte, and usually began with these words: Sciant praesentes et futuri quod ego, A., etc.; and now begins, "Know all men by these presents that I, A. B., have given, granted, and enfeoffed, and by these presents do give, grant, and enfeoff," etc. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 1, § 23. See "Indenture."

DEED TO DECLARE USES. A deed made after a fine or common recovery, to show the object thereof.

DEED TO LEAD USES. A deed made before a fine or common recovery, to show the object thereof.

DEEMSTERS. Judges in the Isle of Man, who decide all controversies without process, writings, or any charges. These judges are chosen by the people, and are said by Spelman to be two in number. Spelman; Camden, Brit.; Cowell; Blount.

DEER FALD. A park or fold for deer.

DEER HAYES. Engines or great nets made of cord to catch deer. 19 Hen. VIII. c. 11.

DEFALCATION. The act of a defaulter. Embezzlement or misappropriation of public or trust funds.

The reduction of the claim of one of the contracting parties against the other, by deducting from it a smaller claim due from the former to the latter. See 1 Rawle (Pa.) 291; 3 Bin. (Pa.) 135.

DEFAMATION. The speaking or writing words of a person so as to hurt his good fame, de bona fama aliquid detrahere. Written defamation is termed "libel," and oral defamation "slander."

DEFAMES (Law Fr.) Infamous.

DEFAULT. The nonperformance of a duty, whether arising under a contract or otherwise. 2 Barn. & Ald. 516.

——In Practice. The nonappearance of a plaintiff or defendant at court within the time prescribed by law to prosecute his claim or make his defense.

DEFEASANCE (Fr. defaire, to defeat). An instrument which defeats the force or operation of some other deed or estate. That which is in the same deed is called a condition, and that which is in another deed is a defeasance. Comyn, Dig. "Defeasance."

A collateral deed made at the same time with a feoffment or grant, containing certain conditions, upon the performance of which the estate created by such feoffment or grant may be defeated. 43 Me. 371.

An instrument collateral to a bond, and containing the condition thereof. 2 Bl. Comm. 342.

DEFEASIBLE. An estate is defeasible when subject to be defeated by the operation of a condition subsequent, or conditional limitation.

DEFECT. The want of something required by law. See 20 N. Y. 355; 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 574.

DEFECTUM. See "Propter Defectum."

DEFECTUS SANGUINIS. Failure of issue.

DEFENDANT. A party sued in a personal action. The term does not in strictness apply to the person opposing or denying the allegations of the demandant in a real action, who is properly called the "tenant." The distinction, however, is very commonly disregarded; and the term is further frequently applied to denote the person called upon to answer, either at law or in equity, and as well in criminal as civil suits.

DEFENDANT IN ERROR. The distinctive term appropriate to the party against whom a writ of error is sued out.

DEFENDER.

——In French Law. To deny; to defend; to conduct a suit for a defendant; to forbid; to prevent; to protect.

——In Scotch and Canon Law. A defendant.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. A peculiar title belonging to the sovereign of England, as that of "Catholic" to the king of Spain, and that of "Most Christian" to the king of France. These titles were originally given by the popes of Rome; and that of Defensor Fidei was first conferred by Pope Leo. X. on King Henry VIII., as a reward for writing against Martin Luther; and the bull for it bears date quinto Idus Octob., 1521. Enc. Lond.

DEFENDERE SE PER CORPUS SUUM. To offer duel or combat as a legal trial and appeal. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. § 46. See "Battel."

DEFENDERE UNICA MANU. To wage law; a denial of an accusation upon oath. 3 Bl. Comm. 341; 3 Steph. Comm. 424.

DEFENDIT VIM ET INJURIAM. He defends the force and injury. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 39, § 1.

DEFENDOUR (Law Fr. a defender or defendant). The party accused in an appeal. Britt. c. 22.

DEFENERATION. The act of lending money on usury.

DEFENSA. A park or place fenced in for deer, and defended as a property, and peculiar for that use and service. Cowell.

DEFENSE.

——In Torts. A forcible resistance of an attack by force. See "Self-Defense."

——In Pleading and Practice. The denial of the truth or validity of the complaint. A general assertion that the plaintiff has no ground of action, which is afterwards extended and maintained in the plea. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 296; Co. Litt. 127.

In this sense it is similar to the contestatio litis of the civilians, and does not include justification. In a more general sense it denotes the means by which the defendant prevents the success of the plaintiff's action, or, in criminal practice, the indictment. The word is commonly used in this sense in modern practice.

Half defense was that which was made by the form "defends the force and injury, and says," defendit vim et injuriam, et dicit.

Full defense was that which was made by the form "defends the force and injury when and where it shall behoove him, and the damages and whatever else he ought to defend," defendit vim et injuriam quando et ubi curia consideravit, et damna et quicquid quod ipse defendere debet, et dicit, commonly shortened into "defends the force and injury when," etc. Gilb. C. P. 188; 8 Term R. 632; 3 Bos. & P. 9, note; Co. Litt. 127b; Willes, 41. It follows immediately upon the statement of appearance, "comes" (venit), thus: "comes and defends." By the general defense, the propriety of the writ, the competency of the plaintiff, and the jurisdiction of the court were allowed; by defending the force and injury, misnomer was waived; by defending the damages, all exceptions to the person of the plaintiff; and by defending either when, etc., the jurisdiction of the court was admitted. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 298.

The distinction between the forms of half and full defense was first lost sight of (8 Term R. 633; Willes, 41; 3 Bos. & P. 9; 2 Saund. 209c), and no necessity for a technical defense exists, under the modern forms of practice.

DEFENSE AU FOND EN DROIT (called, also, defence en droit). A demurrer. 2 Low. (U. S.) 278. See, also, 1 Low. (U. S.) 216.

DEFENSE AU FOND EN FAIT. The general issue. 3 Low. (U. S.) 421.

DEFENSIVA. In old English law. A lord or earl of the marches, who was the warden and defender of his country. Cowell.

DEFENSIVE ALLEGATION. In ecclesiastical practice. The answer of the party defending to the allegations of the party moving the cause.

DEFENSIVE WAR. A war in defense of national right,—not necessarily defensive in its operations. 1 Kent, Comm. 50.

DEFENSO. See "Defensum."

DEFENSOR.

——In Civil Law. A defender; one who takes upon himself the defense of another's cause, assuming his liabilities.

An advocate in court. In this sense the word is very general in its signification, including advocatus, patronus, procurator, etc. A tutor or guardian. Calv. Lex.

——In Old English Law. A guardian or protector. Spelman. The defendant; a warrantor. Bracton.

——In Canon Law. The advocate of a church. The patron. See "Advocatus." An officer having charge of the temporal affairs of the church. Spelman.

DEFENSOR CIVITATUS (Lat. defender of the state). In Roman law. An officer whose business it was to transact certain business of the state.

Those officers were so called who, like the tribunes of the people at first, were chosen by the people in the large cities and towns, and whose duty it was to watch over the order of the city, protect the people and the decuriones from all harm, protect sailors and naval people, attend to the complaints of those who had suffered injuries, and discharge various other duties. As will be seen, they had considerable judicial power. Du Cange; Schmidt, Civ. Law, Introd. 16.

DEFENSUM (Law Lat.) In old English law. An inclosure, or any fenced ground. 2 Mon. Ang. 114; 3 Mon. Ang. 306. Inclusum et positum in defensum, inclosed and put in defense or fence. Bracton, fol. 228. Rationabilia defensa. reasonable defenses. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 19, § 7.

A part of an open field, appropriated to a particular use, as for hay, which was hence said to be in defenso. Cowell.

A state of several occupancy or appropriation. Magna Charta, c. 16.

Defense, in the old sense of prohibition; a state of prohibition, or in which the use of a thing is prohibited by law. St. Westminster II. c. 47.

DEFICIENTE UNO SANGUINE NON potest esse haeres. One blood being wanted, he cannot be heir. 3 Coke, 41.

DEFINITIVE. That which terminates a suit; final. A definitive sentence or judgment is put in opposition to an interlocutory judgment.

DEFLORATION. The act by which a woman is deprived of her virginity.

When this is done unlawfully and against her will, it bears the name of "rape" (q. v.); when she consents, it is "fornication" (q. v.); or if the man be married, it is "adultery" on his part. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 48; 21 Pick. (Mass.) 509; 36 Me. 261; 11 Ga. 53; 2 Dall. (Pa.) 124.

DEFORCE.

——In English Law. To withhold wrongfully; to withhold the possession of lands from one who is lawfully entitled to them. 3 Bl. Comm. 172.

——In Scotch Law. To resist the execution of the law; to oppose by force a public officer in the execution of his duty. Bell, Dict.

DEFORCEMENT. The holding any lands or tenements to which another has a right.

In its most extensive sense, the term includes any withholding of any lands or tenements to which another person has a right (Co. Litt. 277); so that this includes as well an abatement, an intrusion, a disseisin, or a discontinuance, as any other species of wrong whatsoever, by which the owner of the freehold is kept out of possession. But, as contradistinguished from the former, it is only such a detainer of the freehold from him who has the right of property as falls within none of the injuries above mentioned. 3 Bl. Comm. 173; Archb. Civ. Pl. 13; Dane, Abr. Index.

——In Scotch Law. The opposition given, or resistance made, to messengers or other officers while they are employed in executing the law.

This crime is punished by confiscation of movables, the one half to the king and the other to the creditor at whose suit the diligence is used. Ersk. Prac. 4. 4. 32.

DEFORCIANT. One who wrongfully keeps the owner of lands and tenements out of the possession of them. 2 Bl. Comm. 350.

DEFORCIARE. To withhold lands or tenements from the rightful owner. This is a word of art which cannot be supplied by any other word. Co. Litt. 331b; 3 Thomas, Co. Litt. 3; Bracton, lib. 4, 238; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 11.

DEFOSSION. The punishment of being buried alive.

DEFRAUDACION. In Spanish law. The crime committed by a person who fraudulently avoids the payment of some public tax.

DEFUNCT. Deceased; a deceased person.

DEGASTER (Law Fr.) To waste. Degast, degaste, degata, wasted, destroyed. Kelham.

DEGRADATION. In ecclesiastical law. A censure by which a clergyman is deprived of the holy orders which he had as a priest or deacon.

DEGREE (Fr. degre, from Lat. gradus, a step in a stairway; a round of a ladder). A remove or step in the line of descent or consanguinity.

The state or civil condition of a person. The ancient English statute of additions, for example, requires that in process, for the better description of a defendant, his state, degree, or mystery shall be mentioned.

An honorable state or condition to which a student is advanced in testimony of proficiency in arts and sciences. They are of pontifical origin. See 1 Schmidt, Thesaurus, 144; Vicat, Doctores; Minshew, Dict. "Bacheler;" Merlin, Repert.; Van Espen. pt. 1, tit. 10; Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, lib. xi. c. 2, —for a full account of this matter.

DEHORS (Fr. out of; without). Something out of the record, agreement, will, or other thing spoken of; something foreign to the matter in question.

DEI GRATIA (Lat. by the grace of God). An expression used in the titles of sovereigns, and considered as one of the prerogatives of royalty, propria jura majestatis, although anciently a part of the titles of inferior officers and magistrates, ecclesiastical and civil. Spelman.

DEI JUDICIUM (Lat. the judgment of God). A name given to the trial by ordeal.

DEJACION. In Spanish law. A general term applicable to the surrender of his property to his creditors by an insolvent; the renunciation of an inheritance; the release of a mortgage upon payment, and the abandonment of the property insured to the insurer.

DEJERATION. A taking of a solemn oath.

DEL BIEN ESTRE (Law Fr.; Law Lat. de bene esse). In old English practice. Of well being; of form. Britt. c. 39.

DEL CREDERE COMMISSION. An additional commission received by a factor in consideration of his engaging to insure to his principal not only the solvency of the debtor, but the punctual discharge of the debt. 104 Mass. 497; 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 9; 33 Mo. 412.

He was formerly held to be a principal debtor, but it is now well settled that his liability is only as a guarantor. Story, Ag. (9th Ed.) § 215; 5 Hill (N. Y.) 458.

DELATE. In Scotch law. To accuse. Bell, Dict.

DELATIO. In civil law. An accusation or information. Du Cange; Calv. Lex.

DELATOR. An accuser or informer. Du Cange.

DELATURA. In old English law. The reward of an informer. Whishaw.

DELECTUS PERSONAE (or PERSONArum) (Lat. the choice of the person). A term applied to the doctrine that no new member can be introduced into a firm without the unanimous consent of the then partners. Shumaker, Partn. 9.

This doctrine excludes even executors and representatives of partners from succeeding to the state and condition of partners. 7 Pick. (Mass.) 237; 3 Kent, Comm. 55.

——In Scotch Law. The personal preference which is supposed to have been exercised by a landlord in selecting his tenant, by the members of a firm in making choice of partners, in the appointment of persons to office, and other cases. Nearly equivalent to personal trust, as a doctrine in law. Bell, Dict.

DELEGATA POTESTAS NON POTEST delegari. A delegated authority cannot be again delegated. Coke, 2d Inst. 597; 5 Bing. N. C. 310; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1300; Story, Ag. § 13; 11 How. (U. S.) 233.

DELEGATE (Lat. delegere, to choose from). One authorized by another to act in his name; an agent or attorney.

A person elected, by the people of an organized territory of the United States, to congress, who has a seat in congress, and a right of debating, but not of voting. Ord. July 13, 1787 (3 Story, U. S. Laws, 2076).

A person elected to any deliberative assembly. It is, however, in this sense generally limited to occasional assemblies, such as conventions, and the like, and does not usually apply to permanent bodies, as houses of assembly, etc.

DELEGATION.

——In Civil Law. A kind of novation by which the original debtor, in order to be liberated from his creditor, gives him a third person, who becomes obliged in his stead to the creditor or to the person appointed by him. See "Novation."

Perfect delegation exists when the debtor who makes the delegation is discharged by the creditor.

Imperfect delegation exists when the creditor retains his rights against the original debtor. 2 Duv. note 169.

——At Common Law. The transfer of authority from one or more persons to one or more others.

All persons, sui juris, may delegate to another authority to act for them in a matter which is lawful and otherwise capable of being delegated. Comyn, Dig. "Attorney," c. 1; 9 Coke, 75b; Story, Ag. § 6.

——In Legislation. The whole number of the persons who represent a district, a state, and the like in a deliberative assembly; as, the delegation from Ohio, the delegation from the city of Philadelphia.

DELEGATUS DEBITOR EST ODIOSUS in lege. A delegated debtor is hateful in law. 3 Bulst. 148.

DELEGATUS NON POTEST DELEGARE. A delegate or deputy cannot appoint another. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1936; Story, Ag. § 13; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 756-758; 9 Coke, 77; 2 Scott, N. R. 509; 12 Mees. & W. 712; 6 Exch. 156; 8 C. B. 627.

DELETE. In Scotch law. To erase; to strike out. 1 How. St. Tr. 1381.

DELIBERANDUM EST DIU QUOD STATuendum est semel. That which is to be resolved once for all should be long deliberated upon. 12 Coke, 74.

DELIBERATE. To examine, to consult, in order to form an opinion. Thus, a jury deliberate as to their verdict.

DELIBERATION. The act of the understanding by which a party examines whether a thing proposed ought to be done or not to be done, or whether it ought to be done in one manner or another.

The deliberation relates to the end proposed, to the means of accomplishing that end, or to both. It is a presumption of law that all acts committed are done with due deliberation,—that the party intended to do what he has done. But he may show the contrary. In contracts, for example, he may show that he has been taken by surprise (q. v.); and when a criminal act is charged, he may prove that it was an accident, and not with deliberation,—that, in fact, there was no intention or will. In relation to crime, it implies a weighing of the motives for the act and its consequences, with a view to decision thereon. 28 Iowa, 524.

——In Legislation. The council which is held touching some business in an assembly having the power to act in relation to it.

"Deliberation" is not synonymous with "premeditation." "Deliberation is prolonged premeditation." 74 Mo. 247. See "Malice Aforethought."

It does not mean brooded over, reflected upon for a week, a day, or an hour, but it means an intent executed, not under the influence of violent passion, but in the furtherance of a formed design. 66 Mo. 13.

DELICATUS DEBITOR EST ODIOSUS IN lege. A luxurious debtor is odious in law. 2 Bulst. 148. Imprisonment for debt has now, however, been generally abolished.

DELICT. In civil law. The act by which one person, by fraud or malignity, causes some damage or tort to some other.

In its most enlarged sense, this term includes all kinds of crimes and misdemeanors, and even the injury which has been caused by another, either voluntarily or accidentally, without evil intention. But more commonly by "delicts" are understood those small offenses which are punished by a small fine or a short imprisonment.

Private delicts are those which are directly injurious to a private individual.

Public delicts are those which affect the whole community in their hurtful consequences.

Quasi delicts are the acts of a person who, without malignity, but by an inexcusable imprudence, causes an injury to another. Poth. Obl. note 116; Ersk. Prac. 4. 4. 1.

DELICTUM (Lat.) A crime or offense; a tort or wrong, as in actions ex delicto. 1 Chit. Pl. A challenge of a juror propter delictum is for some crime or misdemeanor that affects his credit, and renders him infamous. 3 Bl. Comm. 363; 2 Kent, Comm. 241. Some offense committed, or wrong done. 1 Kent, Comm. 552; Cowp. 199. 200. A state of culpability. Occurring often, in the phrase "in pari delicto melior est conditio defendentis." So, where both parties to a broken contract have been guilty of unlawful acts, the law will not interfere, but will leave them in pari delicto. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 111.

DELIMIT. To mark or lay out the limits or boundary line of a territory or country.

DELINQUENS PER IRAM PROVOCATUS puniri debet mitius. A delinquent provoked by anger ought to be punished more mildly. 3 Inst. 55.

DELINQUENT. In civil law. He who has been guilty of some crime, offense, or failure of duty.

DELIRIUM FEBRILE. In medical jurisprudence. A form of mental aberration incident to febrile diseases, and sometimes to the last stages of chronic diseases.

DELIRIUM TREMENS (called, also, mania-a-potu). In medical jurisprudence. A form of mental disorder incident to habits of intemperate drinking, which generally appears as a sequel to a few days' abstinence from stimulating drink.

DELITO. In Spanish law. Crime; a crime, offense, or delict. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 19, c. 1, § 4.

DELIVERANCE. In practice. A term used by the clerk in court to every prisoner who is arraigned and pleads not guilty, to whom he wishes a good deliverance. In modern practice this is seldom used.

DELIVERY.

——Of Deed. The transfer of a deed from the grantor to the grantee, or some person acting in his behalf, in such a manner as to deprive the grantor of the right to recall it at his option. Delivery may be (1) absolute, which is complete upon the actual transfer of the instrument from the possession of the grantor; or (2) conditional, which passes the deed from the possession of the grantor, but is not to be completed by possession in the grantee, or a third person as his agent, until the happening of a specified event.

——Of Chattels. The tradition or transfer of the possession of a chattel from one person to another. It may be actual or symbolical, as of goods in a storehouse by delivery of the key (39 Me. 496), or goods in the hands of a carrier by delivery of the bill of lading (5 Ohio, 88).

The word "delivery," as applied to sales, has been used in several senses, viz.:

(1) Delivery sufficient to pass title.

(2) Delivery sufficient to allow the seller to sue for goods sold and delivered.

(3) Delivery sufficient to destroy the vendor's lien.

(4) Delivery sufficient to determine the right of stoppage in transitu.

(5) Delivery sufficient under the statute of frauds.

(6) Delivery sufficient as against creditors or subsequent purchasers.

Unless the particular sense in which the word is used in each case be borne in mind, confusion will follow in reading the decisions. Benj. Sales, p. 649, note.

——In Medical Jurisprudence. The act of a woman giving birth to her offspring.

DELIVERY ORDER. An order addressed, in England, by the owner of goods to a person holding them on his behalf, requesting him to deliver them to a person named in the order. Delivery orders are chiefly used in the case of goods held by dock companies, wharfingers, etc. Such an order is not a document of title, and therefore does not transfer the property, or divest the vendor's lien for the purchase money, until it is acted on by the holders obtaining either (1) actual delivery, (2) an entry of his title in the wharfinger's books, or (3) the issue of a dock warrant in his name; which last operation would apparently presuppose the second. Until he does one of these things, the original owner may obtain delivery to himself, or transfer the property in the goods to some one else. 2 H. L. Cas. 309; 5 Ch. Div. 195; Benj. Sales, 684. See "Dock Warrant."

DELUSION. In medical jurisprudence. A diseased state of the mind, in which persons believe things to exist which exist only, or in the degree they are conceived of only, in their own imaginations, with a persuasion so fixed and firm that neither evidence nor argument can convince them to the contrary.

DEM. An abbreviation for "demise;" Jackson ex dem. Wood v. Wood, Jackson on the demise of Wood, etc. 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 586.

DEMAIN. See "Demesne."

DEMAND. A claim; a legal obligation.

Demand is a word of art of an extent greater in its signification than any other word except "claim." Co. Litt. 291; 2 Hill (N. Y.) 220; 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 124; 6 Watts & S. (Pa.) 226.

——In Practice. A requisition or request to do a particular thing specified under a claim of right on the part of the person requesting.

DEMAND IN RECONVENTION. A demand which the defendant institutes in consequence of that which the plaintiff has brought against him. Used in Louisiana. Prac. Code La. art. 374.

DEMANDA (Law Lat.)

——In Old English Law. A demand. Bracton, fols. 17, 35; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 39, § 1. Si quis recuperaverit demandam suam, if one shall recover his demand. St. Westminster II. c. 44. See 8 Coke, 153.

——In Spanish Law. The petition of a plaintiff, setting forth his demand. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 10, lib. 3.

DEMANDANT. The plaintiff or party who brings a real action. Co. Litt. 127; Comyn, Dig.

DEMANDRESS. A female demandant.

DEMEASE. Death.

DEMEMBRATION. In Scotch law. Maliciously cutting off or otherwise separating one limb from another. 1 Hume, 323; Bell, Dict.

DEMENS (Lat.) One who has lost his mind through sickness or some other cause; one whose faculties are enfeebled. Dean, Med. Jur. 481. See "Dementia."

DEMENTENANT EN AVANT (Law Fr.) From this time forward. Kelham.

DEMENTIA. In medical jurisprudence. That form of insanity which is characterized by mental weakness and decrepitude, and by total inability to reason correctly or incorrectly.

DEMESNE. Lands of which the lord had the absolute property or ownership, as distinguished from feudal lands which he held of a superior. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 104; Cowell. Lands which the lord retained under his immediate control, for the purpose of supplying his table and the immediate needs of his household. Distinguished from that farmed out to tenants, called among the Saxons "bordlands." Blount; Co. Litt. 17a.

Own; original. Son assault demesne, his (the plaintiff's) original assault, or assault in the first place. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 633; 3 Bl. Comm. 120, 306.

DEMESNE AS OF FEE. A man is said to be seised in his demesne as of fee of a corporeal inheritance, because he has a property dominicum or demesne in the thing itself. 2 Bl. Comm. 106. But when he has no dominion in the thing itself, as in the case of an incorporeal hereditament, he is said to be seised as of fee, and not in his demesne as of fee. Litt. § 10; 17 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 196; Jones, Land Tit. 166.

Formerly it was the practice in an action on the case—e. g. for a nuisance to real estate—to aver in the declaration the seisin of the plaintiff in demesne as of fee; and this is still necessary, in order to estop the record with the land, so that it may run with or attend the title. Archb. Civ. Pl. 104; Coke, Entr. 9, pl. 8; Lilly, Entr. 62; 1 Saund. 346; Willes, 508. But such an action may be maintained on the possession as well as on the seisin, although the effect of the record in this case upon the title would not be the same. Steph. Pl. 322; 1 Lutw. 120; 2 Mod. 71; 4 Term R. 718; 2 Wm. Saund. 113b; Cro. Car. 500, 575.

DEMESNE LANDS. A phrase meaning the same as "demesne."

DEMESNE LANDS OF THE CROWN. That share of lands reserved to the crown at the original distribution of landed property, or which came to it afterwards by forfeiture or otherwise. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 286; 2 Steph. Comm. 550.

DEMESNIAL. Pertaining to a demesne.

DEMI-MARK. A sum of money (6s. 8d., 3 Bl. Comm. App. v.) tendered and paid into court in certain cases in the trial of a writ of right by the grand assize. Co. Litt. 294b; Booth, Real Actions, 98.

It was paid by the tenant to obtain an inquiry by the grand assize into the time of the demandant's seisin. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 429; Stearns, Real Actions, 378, and note. It compelled the demandant to begin. 3 Chit. Pl. 1373. It is unknown in American practice. 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 546; Stearns, Real Actions, 378.

DEMI-OFFICIAL. Partly official or authorized.

DEMI-SANGUE, or DEMY-SANGUE (Law Fr.) Half-blood.

DEMI-VILL. Half a tithing.

DEMIDIETAS. A word used in ancient records for a moiety, or one-half.

DEMIES. In some universities and colleges this term is synonymous with "scholars." Boyle, Char. 129.

DEMINUTIO. In civil law. A taking away; loss or deprivation. See "Capitas Deminutio."

DEMISE.

(1) A conveyance, either in fee for life or for years. A lease or conveyance for a term of years. According to Chief Justice Gibson, the term strictly denotes a posthumous grant, and no more. 5 Whart. (Pa.) 278. See 4 Bing. N. C. 678; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1774 et seq.

(2) A term nearly synonymous with "death," appropriated in England especially to denote the decease of the king or queen.

DEMISE AND RE-DEMISE. A conveyance by mutual leases made from one to another on each side of the same land, or of something issuing from it. A lease for a given sum,—usually a mere nominal amount,—and a release for a larger rent. Toullier, Dr. Civ.; Whishaw; Jacob.

DEMISE OF THE KING. The natural dissolution of the king.

The term is said to denote in law merely a transfer of the property of the crown. 1 Bl. Comm. 249. By demise of the crown, we mean only that, in consequence of the disunion of the king's natural body from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor, and so the royal dignity remains perpetual. Plowd. 117, 234.

A similar result, viz., the perpetual existence of the president of the United States, has been secured by the constitution and subsequent statutes. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 249.

DEMISI. I have demised or leased. Demisi, concessi, et ad firmam tradidi, have demised, granted, and to farm let. The usual operative words in ancient leases, as the corresponding English words are in the modern forms. 2 Bl. Comm. 317, 318.

DEMONSTRATIO. Description.

Falsa demonstratio non nocet, a false description does not injure.

DEMONSTRATION (Lat. demonstrare, to point out). Whatever is said or written to designate a thing or person.

Several descriptions may be employed to denote the same person or object; and the rule of law in such cases is that, if one of the descriptions be erroneous, it may be rejected, if, after it is expunged, enough will remain to identify the person or thing intended. For falsa demonstratio non nocet. The meaning of this rule is that, if there be an adequate description with convenient certainty of what was contemplated, a subsequent erroneous addition will not vitiate it. The complement of this maxim is, non accipi debent verba in demonstrationem falsam quae competent in limitationem veram; which means that if it stand doubtful upon the words whether they import a false reference or demonstration, or whether they be words of restraint that limit the generality of the former words, the law will never intend error or falsehood. If, therefore, there is some object wherein all the demonstrations are true, and some wherein part are true and part false, they shall be intended words of true limitation to ascertain that person or thing wherein all the circumstances are true. 4 Exch. 604, per Alderson, B.; 8 Bing. 244; Broom, Leg. Max. 490; Plowd. 191; 7 Cush. (Mass.) 460.

The rule that falsa demonstratio does not vitiate an otherwise good description applies to every kind of statement of fact. Some of the particulars in an averment in a declaration may be rejected if the declaration is sensible without them, and by their presence is made insensible or defective. Yelv. 182.

——In Evidence. That proof which excludes all possibility of error.

DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY. A pecuniary legacy, coupled with a direction that it be paid out of a specific fund.

DEMPSTER, or DEEMSTER. In Scotch law. A doomsman; one who pronounced the sentence of court. 1 How. St. Tr. 937.

DEMURRAGE. The delay of a vessel by the freighter beyond the time allowed for loading, unloading, or sailing. 3 Kent. Comm. 203.

Payment for such delay.

Demurrage is an extended freight or reward to the vessel in compensation for earnings she is compelled to lose. Abb. Adm. (D. C.) 548.

DEMURRANT. One who demurs to a pleading or indictment.

DEMURRER (Lat. demorari; old Fr. demorer, to stay; to abide).

——In Pleading at Law. An allegation that, admitting the facts of the preceding pleading to be true as stated by the party making it, he has yet shown no cause why the party demurring should be compelled by the court to proceed further. A declaration that the party demurring will go no further, because the other has shown nothing against him. 5 Mod. 232; Co. Litt. 71b. It imports that the objecting party will not proceed, but will wait the judgment of the court whether he is bound so to do. Co. Litt. 71b; Steph. Pl. 61.

A general demurrer is one which excepts to the sufficiency of a previous pleading in general terms; such a demurrer being sufficient if the objection is to matters of substance. Steph. Pl. 159.

A special demurrer is one which shows specifically the nature of the objection, and the ground of exception. Co. Litt. 72a.

——In Equity Pleading. An allegation of a defendant, which, admitting the matters of fact alleged by the bill to be true, shows that as they are therein set forth they are insufficient for the plaintiff to proceed upon or to oblige the defendant to answer; or that, for some reason apparent on the face of the bill, or on account of the omission of some matter which ought to be contained therein, or for want of some circumstances which ought to be attendant thereon, the defendant ought not to be compelled to answer to the whole bill, or to some certain part thereof. Mitf. Eq. Pl. (Jeremy Ed.) 107.

Demurrers are general, where no particular cause is assigned except the usual formulary that there is no equity in the bill; or special, where the particular defects are pointed out. Story, Eq. Pl. § 455. General demurrers are used to point out defects of substance; special, to point out defects in form.

In many states, the grounds of demurrer and the requisites of a demurrer are regulated by statute. Thus, in Minnesota a complaint may be demurred to for (1) absence of jurisdiction; (2) lack of legal capacity in plaintiff to sue; (3) another action pending; (4) defect of parties; (5) misjoinder of causes of action; (6) failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer must distinctly specify the ground of objection as being one of those enumerated by Gen. St. Minn. 1878, c. 66, §§ 92, 93.

——In Practice. Demurrer to evidence is a declaration that the party making it will not proceed, because the evidence offered on the other side is not sufficient to maintain the issue. 28 Ala. (N. S.) 637. Upon joinder by the opposite party, the jury is generally discharged from giving any verdict (1 Archb. Prac. 186); and the demurrer, being entered on record, is afterwards argued and decided by the court in banc; and the judgment there given upon it may ultimately be brought before a court of error. See 2 H. Bl. 187; 4 Chit. Prac. 15; Gould, Pl. c. 9, pt. 2, § 47. It admits the truth of the evidence given, and the legal deductions therefrom. 14 Pa. St. 275. As to the right so to demur, and the practice, see 4 Iowa, 63.

Demurrer to interrogatories is the reason which a witness tenders for not answering a particular question in interrogatories. 2 Swanst. Ch. 194. It is not, strictly speaking, a demurrer, except in the popular sense of the word. Gresl. Eq. Ev. 61. The court are judicially to determine its validity. The witness must state his objection very carefully, for these demurrers are held to strict rules, and are readily overruled if they cover too much. 2 Atk. 524; 1 Younge & J. 132.

See, generally, as to demurrer, Bouv. Inst. Index.

DEMURRER BOOK. In English practice. A transcript of all the pleadings that have been filed or delivered between the parties made upon the formation of an issue at law. Steph. Pl. 95.

DEMY SANKE, or DEMY SANGUE. Half-blood. A corruption of demi-sang.

DEN AND STROND. Liberty for ships and vessels to run aground or come ashore, —strand themselves. Cowell.

DENARIATE. As much land as is worth one penny per annum. Rapalje & L.

DENARII. An ancient general term for any sort of pecunia numerata, or ready money. The French use the word denier in the same sense, payer de ses propres deniers.

DENARII DE CARITATE. Customary oblations made to a cathedral church at Pentecost.

DENARII S. PETRI. Commonly called "Peter's Pence." An annual payment on St. Peter's feast of a penny from every family to the pope, during the time that the Roman Catholic religion was established in England.

DENARIUS (Law Lat.; Fr. denier). A penny; an English penny. By the statute called Compositio Mensurarum, 51 Edw. I. (Hen. III.), it was declared that the penny sterling of England, denarius Angliae qui nominatur sterlingus, should weigh 32 grains of corn from the middle of the ear, and 20 pennies (penny weights) should make an ounce, and 12 ounces a pound. Spelman; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 12. See 2 Inst. 575.

——In the Roman Law. A silver coin of the value of ten asses, or ten pounds of brass. Its value in modern money is estimated at 7¾d. sterling, or about 14½ cents. Enc. Am. Brande.

DENARIUS DEI. A certain sum of money which is given by one of the contracting parties to the other as a sign of the completion of the contract.

It differs from arrhae in this, that the latter is a part of the consideration, while the denarius Dei is no part of it. 1 Duv. note 132; 3 Duv. note 49; Repert. de Jur. "Denier a Dieu."

It does not bind the parties, as he who received it may return it in a limited time, or the other may abandon it, and avoid the engagement.

DENARIUS TERTIUS COMITATUS (Law Lat.) In old English law. The third penny of the county; the third part of the fines and profits arising from the county court, which anciently were reserved to the comes, or earl, as his official stipend. Spelman, voc. "Comes;" LL. Edw. Conf. c. 31; Cowell.

DENIAL. In pleading. A traverse of the statement of the opposite party; a defense.

It may be general of all the allegations in a pleading, or a particular part thereof, or special of certain stated facts.

DENIER (Law Fr.) In old English law. Denial; refusal. Denier is when the rent (being demanded upon the land) is not paid. Finch, Law, bk. 3, c. 5.

DENIER A DIEU. In French law. A sum of money which the hirer of a thing gives to the other party as evidence, or for the consideration of the contract, which either party may annul within twenty-four hours; the one who gave the denier a Dieu by demanding, and the other by returning, it. See "Denarius Dei.'

DENIZATION. The act by which a foreigner becomes a subject, but without the rights either of a natural-born subject, or of one who has become naturalized. Bac. Abr. "Aliens" (B).

DENIZE. To make a denizen.

DENIZEN. In English law. An alien born who has obtained, ex donatione legis, letters patent to make him an English subject.

He is intermediate between a natural-born subject and an alien. He may take lands by purchase or devise, which an alien cannot; but he is incapable of taking by inheritance. 1 Bl. Comm. 374.

In South Carolina, and perhaps in other states, this civil condition is well known to the law, having been created by statute.

The right of making denizens is not exclusively vested in the king, for it is possessed by parliament, but is scarcely ever exercised but by royal power. It may be effected by conquest. 7 Coke, 6a; 2 Ventr. 6; Comyn, Dig. "Alien" (D 1); Chit. Com. Law, 120.

DENMAN'S (LORD) ACT. St. 6 & 7 Vict. 85. For the amendment of the law of evidence, which provides that no person offered as a witness shall thereafter be excluded by reason of incapacity, from crime or interest, from giving evidence. Wharton.

DENMAN'S (MR.) ACT. St. 28 & 29 Vict. 18. For amendment of procedure in criminal trials, allowing counsel to sum up the evidence in criminal as in civil trials, provided the prisoner be defended by counsel Wharton.

DENOMBREMENT. In French feudal law. A minute or act drawn up, on the creation of a fief, containing a description of the fief, and all the rights and incidents belonging to it. Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 3.

DENOMINATIO FIERI DEBET A DIGNIoribus. Denomination should be made from the more worthy.

DENUMERATION. The act of present payment. Rapalje & L.

DENUNCIATION. In civil law. The act by which an individual informs a public officer, whose duty it is to prosecute offenders, that a crime has been committed. See 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 447; 2 Brown, Civ. Law, 389; Ayliffe, Par. 210; Poth. Proc. Cr. 2, § 2.

DENUNTIATIO. In old English law. A public notice or summons. Bracton, 202b.

DEODAND. Any personal chattel whatever which is the immediate cause of the death of a human creature, which is forfeited to the king, to be distributed in alms by his high almoner. 1 Bl. Comm. 301; 1 Hale, P. C. 422.

DEPART.

——In Pleading. To forsake or abandon the ground assumed in a former pleading, and assume a new one. See "Departure."

——In Old English Law. To divide or separate; to part. Cowell.

——In Maritime Law. To leave a port; to be out of a port. To depart imports more than to sail, or set sail. A warranty in a policy that a vessel shall depart on or before a particular day is a warranty not only that she shall sail, but that she shall be out of the port on or before that day. 3 Maule & S. 461; 3 Kent, Comm. 307, note. "To depart" does not mean merely to break ground, but fairly to set forward upon the voyage. 6 Taunt. 241.

DEPARTMENT. A portion of a country.

In France, the country is divided into departments, which are somewhat similar to the counties in this country. The United States have been divided into military departments, including certain portions of the country. 1 Pet. (U. S.) 293. These departments are, for the purposes for which they are created, under the immediate government of some officer, who is, in turn, responsible to his superior.

A portion of the agents employed by the executive branch of the United States government, to whom a specified class of duties is assigned.

DEPARTURE.

——In Maritime Law. A deviation from the course prescribed in the policy of insurance. It may be justifiable. See "Deviation."

——In Pleading. The statement of matter in a replication, rejoinder, or subsequent pleading, as a cause of action or defense, which is not pursuant to the previous pleading of the same party, and which does not support and fortify it. 3 Bl. Comm. 301.

Where a party quits or departs from the case or defense he has just made, and has recourse to another. 13 N. Y. 89.

DEPARTURE IN DESPITE OF COURT. This took place where the tenant, having once made his appearance in court upon demand, failed to reappear when demanded. Co. Litt. 139a. As the whole term is, in contemplation of law, but a single day, an appearance on any day, and a subsequent failure to reappear at any subsequent part of the term, is such a departure. 8 Coke, 62a; 1 Rolle, Abr. 583; Metc. Yelv. 211; Roscoe, Real Actions, 283.

DEPASTURE. In old English law. To pasture. "If a man depastures unprofitable cattle in his ground." Bunb. 1, case 1.

DEPECULATION. A robbing of the prince or commonwealth; an embezzling of the public treasure.

DEPENDENCY. A territory distinct from the country in which the supreme sovereign power resides, but belonging rightfully to it, and subject to the laws and regulations which the sovereign may think proper to prescribe.

It differs from a "colony," because it is not settled by the citizens of the sovereign or mother state; and from "possession," because it is held by other title than that of mere conquest. For example, Malta was considered a dependency of Great Britain in the year 1813. 3 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 286. See Act Cong. March 1, 1809, commonly called the "Nonimportation Law."

DEPENDENT CONTRACT. One which it is not the duty of the contractor to perform until some obligation contained in the same agreement has been performed by the other party. Hammond, Part. 17, 29, 30, 109.

DEPENDENT COVENANTS. Those in which the performance of one depends on the performance of the other.

DEPENDING. Sometimes used for "pending."

DEPESAS. In Spanish-American law. Spaces of ground in towns reserved for commons or public pasturage. 12 Pet. (U. S.) 443, note. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 1, c. 6.

DEPONE. In Scotch practice. To depose; to make oath in writing.

DEPONENT. One who gives information, on oath or affirmation, respecting some facts known to him, before a magistrate; strictly, he who makes a deposition; but sometimes used for "affiant."

DEPONER. In old Scotch practice. A deponent. 3 How. St. Tr. 695.

DEPOPULATIO AGRORUM. In old English law. The crime of destroying, ravaging, or laying waste a country. 2 Hale, P. C. 333; 4 Bl. Comm. 373.

DEPOPULATION. In old English law. A species of waste, by which the population of the kingdom was diminished. Depopulation of houses was a public offense. 12 Coke, 30, 31.

DEPORTATIO (Lat.) In the civil law. A kind of banishment, where a condemned person was sent or carried away to some foreign country, usually to an island, in insulam deportatur, and thus taken out of the number of Roman citizens, ex numero civium Romanorum tollitur, being treated as though he were dead. Inst. 1. 12. 1. It was banishment for life, attended with the loss of civil rights, and the forfeiture of property. Relegatio was banishment for years, without the loss of civil rights. Dig. 48. 22; Calv. Lex. Bracton uses the term deportatio as synonymous with "exile," "abjuration of the realm," and "outlawry." Bracton, fol. 136b.

DEPORTATION. In Roman law. A perpetual banishment, depriving the banished of his rights as a citizen. It differed from "relegation" (q. v.) and "exile" (q. v.) 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 125, note; Inst. 1. 12. 1. 2; Dig. 48. 22. 14. 1.

DEPOSE. To deprive an individual of a public employment or office against his will. Wolffius, Inst. § 1063. The term is usually applied to the deprivation of all authority of a sovereign.

To give a deposition.

DEPOSIT. A naked bailment of goods to be kept for the depositor without reward, and to be returned when he shall require it. Jones, Bailm. 36, 117; 9 Mass. 470.

A bailment of goods to be kept by the bailee without reward, and delivered according to the object or purpose of the original trust. Story, Bailm. § 41.

A contract by which one of the contracting parties gives a thing to another to keep, who is to do so gratuitously, and obliges himself to return it when he shall be requested.

To constitute a deposit, there must be (1) an actual delivery of the property; (2) the object must be to keep the property for the owner; (3) the custody must be gratuitous; (4) the deposit must be with another than the owner; and (5) there must be a voluntary undertaking by the bailee. Story, Bailm. §§ 55-60.

Deposits are divided in the civil law into necessary and voluntary.

(1) Necessary deposits are those made upon some sudden emergency, as of fire or shipwreck.

(2) Voluntary deposits are those made, in the absence of necessity, by contract of the parties. This distinction was unknown at common law.

Deposits are again divided in the civil law into simple deposits and sequestrations.

(3) Simple deposits are those made by one or more persons having a common interest.

(4) Deposits by sequestration are by persons having different or adverse interests in the property. Sequestrations are (a) conventional, by act of the parties, or (b) judicial, by order of a court in a judicial proceeding.

There are also certain contracts in the nature of deposits, and commonly regarded as such.

Irregular deposits, where money is deposited to be returned not in specie, but by an equal sum.

Quasi deposits, where one comes lawfully into the possession of goods of another by finding. Story, Bailm. §§ 41-85.

In modern usage, the term is most frequently used to denote the deposit of money in a banking institution. Deposits in bank are general if the money deposited becomes the property of the bank, and it undertakes to repay only an equal amount. Special, if the particular funds are to be returned.

DEPOSIT OF TITLE DEEDS. A pledge of land as security by giving the muniments of title to the pledgee. It is now seldom, if ever, used.

DEPOSITARY. One with whom anything is deposited (see "Deposit") or lodged in trust; as "depository" is the place where it is put. The obligation on the part of the depositary is that he keep the thing with reasonable care, and, upon request, restore it to the depositor, or otherwise deliver it, according to the original trust.

DEPOSITION. The testimony of a witness reduced to writing, in due form of law, by virtue of a commission or other authority of a competent tribunal, or according to the provisions of some statute law, to be used on the trial of some question of fact in a court of justice.

In some states it is applied to the testimony taken on a preliminary hearing, and reduced to writing by the committing magistrate.

In its generic sense, it embraces all written evidence verified by oath, and includes affidavits, but in legal language, a distinction is maintained between depositions and affidavits. 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 456.

In its technical sense, it is confined to the written testimony of a witness given in a judicial proceeding. 53 Am. Dec. 270.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of depriving a clergyman, by a competent tribunal, of his clerical orders, to punish him for some offense, and to prevent his acting in future in his clerical character. Ayliffe, Par. 206.

DEPOSITO. In Spanish law. A real contract by which one person confides to the custody of another an object on the condition that it shall be returned to him whenever he shall require it.

DEPOSITOR. He who makes a deposit.

DEPOSITUM (Lat. from deponere, to deposit). In the civil and common law. A naked bailment of goods, to be kept for the bailor without reward, and to be returned when he shall require it. Story, Bailm. §§ 4, 41; 2 Kent, Comm. 558, 559; Jones, Bailm. 36; Inst. 3. 15. 3; Bracton, fol. 100b; Dig. 16. 3; Code, 4. 34; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 56, § 7. Otherwise termed "deposit" (q. v.); the bailor being in this case termed the "depositor," and the bailee the "depositary." Bell, Dict.

DEPOT. In the French law. The depositum of the Roman, and the "deposit" of the English law. It is of two kinds, being either (1) depot simply so called, and which may be either voluntary or necessary, and (2) sequestre, which is a deposit made either under an agreement of the parties, and to abide the event of pending litigation regarding it, or by virtue of the direction of the court or a judge, pending litigation regarding it. Brown.

DEPRAVE. To defame; vilify; exhibit contempt for. In England, depraving the Lord's supper or the Book of Common Prayer is a criminal offense, punishable with fine and imprisonment. Steph. Crim. Dig. 99.

DEPREDATION. In French law. The pillage which is made of the goods of a decedent.

DEPRIVATION. In ecclesiastical law. A censure by which a clergyman is deprived of his parsonage, vicarage, or other ecclesiastical promotion or dignity. See Ayliffe, Par. 206; 1 Bl. Comm. 393.

DEPUTY. One authorized by an officer to exercise the office or right which the officer possesses, for and in place of the latter.

A deputy differs from an assignee in that an assignee has an interest in the office itself, and does all things in his own name, for whom his grantor shall not answer except in special cases, but a deputy has not any interest in the office, but is only the shadow of the officer in whose name he acts. And there is a distinction between doing an act by an agent or by a deputy. An agent can only bind his principal when he acts in the name of the principal. But a deputy may do the act, and sign his own name, and bind the principal, for a deputy has in law the whole power of his principal. Wharton.

DEPUTY STEWARD. A steward of a manor may depute or authorize another to hold a court; and the acts done in a court so holden will be as legal as if the court had been holden by the chief steward in person. So an under steward or deputy may authorize another as subdeputy, pro hac vice, to hold a court for him; such limited authority not being inconsistent with the rule delegatus non potest delegare. Wharton.

DERAIGN, DEREYN, or DEREINE (Law Lat. derationare, dirationare, or disrationare; Law Fr. dereiner, derener, disreigner, desrener, contra for deraisner or deraisoner). In old English law. To prove; to "deraign the warranty paramount." St. 31 Hen. VIII. c. 1; Cowell. See Glanv. lib. 2, c. 3; Id. c. 6, 20; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 123; Spelman, voc. "Dirationare."

In Texas, and perhaps other states, it is used to signify the assertion or proof of title from an ancestor or predecessor, e. g., "to deraign title from the original patentee or pre-emptor."

To disprove or refute the assertion of an adverse party. Spelman makes this to be the proper meaning, relying in particular upon the etymology of disrationare (from dis, contrary, and ratiocinari, to reason).

To deny or refuse. "He cannot deraign battel." Dyer, 137. See Barr. Obs. St. 328.

To put out of place or order; to displace or disarrange; to turn one out of his order; to degrade. Some of the old books give the words this sense, deriving it either from the French disarrayer, to confound, or derayer, desranger, to derange or displace. Termes de la Ley; Cowell; Co. Litt. 136; Perkins, c. 1, § 3 (G). This derivation, however, is not approved by Spelman.

DERECHO. In Spanish law. Law or right. White, New Recop. bk. 4, tit. 4. Derecho comun, common law. The civil law is so called. Id. bk. 2, tit. 13, c. 1, § 5. A right. Derechos, rights.

DERELICT. Abandoned; deserted; cast away.

Land left uncovered by the receding of water from its former bed. 2 Rolle, Abr. 170; 2 Bl. Comm. 262; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. 109.

When so left by degrees, the derelict land belongs to the owner of the soil adjoining; but when the sea retires suddenly, it belongs to the government. 2 Bl. Comm. 262; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 239; 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 328, 490; 1 Gall. (U. S.) 133; Bee, Adm. (U. S.) 62, 178, 260; Ware (U. S.) 332.

Personal property abandoned or thrown away by the owner in such manner as to indicate that he intends to make no further claim thereto. 2 Bl. Comm. 9; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 9; 1 C. B. 112; Broom, Leg. Max. 261.

DERELICTION (Lat. derelictio). The gaining of land from the water, in consequence of the sea shrinking back below the usual water mark; the opposite of alluvion (q. v.) 2 Rolle, Abr. 170; Dyer, 326b; 2 Bl. Comm. 262; 1 Steph. Comm. 419.

The abandonment of property. 2 Bl. Comm. 9.

DERIVATIVA POTESTAS NON POTEST esse major primitiva. The power which is derived cannot be greater than that from which it is derived. Wingate, Max. 36; Finch, Law, bk. 1, c. 3, p. 11.

DERIVATIVE. Coming from another; taken from something preceding; secondary: as, derivative title, which is that acquired from another person.

There is considerable difference between an original and a derivative title. When the acquisition is original, the right thus acquired to the thing becomes property, which must be unqualified and unlimited, and, since no one but the occupant has any right to the thing, he must have the whole right of disposing of it. But with regard to derivative acquisition it may be otherwise; for the person from whom the thing is acquired may not have an unlimited right to it, or he may convey or transfer it with certain reservations of right. Derivative title must always be by contract.

——Derivative Conveyances. Those which presuppose some precedent conveyance, and serve only to enlarge, confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by such original conveyance. 3 Bl. Comm. 324.

DEROGATON. The partial abrogation of a law. To derogate from a law is to enact something which impairs its utility and force; to abrogate a law is to abolish it entirely. See "Abrogation."

DEROGATORY CLAUSE. In a will, this is a sentence or secret character inserted by the testator, of which he reserves the knowledge to himself, with a condition that no will he may make thereafter should be valid, unless this clause be inserted word for word. This is done as a precaution to guard against later wills being extorted by violence, or otherwise improperly obtained. By the law of England such a clause would be void, as tending to make the will irrevocable. Wharton.

DEROGATUR LEGI, CUM PARS DETRAhitur; abrogatur legi, cum prorsus tollitur. To derogate from a law is to take away part of it; to abrogate a law is to abolish it entirely. Dig. 50. 16. 102. See 1 Bouv. Inst. note 91.

DESAFUERO. In Spanish law. An irregular action committed with violence against law, custom, or reason.

DESCENDANTS. Those who have issued from an individual, including his children, grandchildren, and their children to the remotest degree. Amb. 327; 2 Brown, 30, 230; 3 Brown, 367; 1 Rop. Leg. 115; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1956.

The descendants from what is called the "direct descending line." The term is opposed to that of "ascendants."

"Descendants" is a good term of description in a will, and includes all who proceed from the body of the person named; as grandchildren and great-grandchildren. Amb. 397; 2 Vern. 108, note 2; 2 Hilliard, Real Prop. 242.

There is a difference between the number of ascendants and descendants which a man may have. Every one has the same order of ascendants, though they may not be exactly alike as to numbers, because some may be descended from a common ancestor. In the line of descendants they fork differently, according to the number of children, and continue longer or shorter, as generations continue or cease to exist. Many families become extinct, while others continue. The line of descendants is, therefore, diversified in each family.

DESCENDER. Descent. See "Formedon."

DESCENT. Hereditary succession.

Title by descent is the title by which one person, upon the death of another, acquires the real estate of the latter as his heir at law. 2 Bl. Comm. 201; Comyn, Dig. "Discent" (A).

It was one of the principles of the feudal system that, on the death of the tenant in fee, the land should descend, and not ascend. Hence the title by inheritance is in all cases called descent, although by statute law the title is sometimes made to ascend.

The English doctrine of primogeniture, by which by the common law the eldest son and his issue take the whole real estate, has been universally abolished in this country. So, with few exceptions, has been the distinction between male and female heirs.

Descent is either "lineal," as from father to son, or "collateral," as from brother to brother.

DESCENT CAST. The same as what the older writers called a "descent which tolls entry." Where a person who had acquired land by disseisin, abatement, or intrusion died seised of the land, the descent of it to his heir took away or "tolled" the real owner's right of entry, so that he could only recover the land by an action. Litt. § 385 et seq.; Co. Litt. 237b. The doctrine of descent cast was abolished by St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27; Shelf. R. P. St. 228.

The term seems to have originally meant "the happening of any descent," because the law casts the land upon the heir. Litt. § 385; Watk. Desc. 33.

DESCRIPTIO PERSONAE. Description of the person. In wills, it frequently happens that the word "heir" is used as a descriptio personae. It is then a sufficient designation of the person. In criminal cases, a mere descriptio personae or addition, if false, can be taken advantage of only by plea in abatement. 1 Metc. (Mass.) 151.

The most common use of the term is in respect to designations as "agent," "executor," etc., attached to the name of one executing an instrument. If such designation is not sufficient to indicate that he is acting in an official or representative capacity, it is said to be descriptio personae, and he is bound personally. See 120 Mass. 92; 136 N. Y. 655; 5 Ill. 325; 19 Mo. 193.

DESCRIPTION. An account of the accidents and qualities of a thing. Ayliffe, Pand. 60.

A written account of the state and condition of personal property, titles, papers, and the like. It is a kind of inventory, but is more particular in ascertaining the exact condition of the property, and is without any appraisement of it.

——In Pleading. One of the rules which regulate the law of variance is that allegations of matter of essential description should be proved as laid. It is impossible to explain with precision the meaning of these words; and the only practical mode of understanding the extent of the rule is to examine some of the leading decisions on the subject, and then to apply the reasoning or ruling contained therein to other analogous cases. With respect to criminal law, it is clearly established that the name or nature of the property stolen or damaged is matter of essential description. Thus, for example, if the charge is one of firing a stack of hay, and it turns out to have been a stack of wheat, or if a man is accused of stealing a drake, and it is proved to have been a goose, or even a duck, the variance is fatal. 1 Tayl. Ev. § 233.

——Of Persons. Words identifying a person by reference to a fiduciary or official capacity, as "Executor," "Treasurer." Such a word, without more, is generally regarded as merely descriptio personis, and not as indicative of intention to act in the official or fiduciary capacity. See "Addition."

——Of Land. That part of a deed or other instrument that describes or identifies the property involved.

DESERTION. Abandonment; the abandonment of a duty or of a person as to whom the deserter is charged with a duty; as desertion by a seaman, or a soldier, or by a husband of his wife.

As a cause for divorce, is an unwarranted departure from the conjugal relation, intending not to return. The precise elements vary according to the statutes. In only one or two states is mere abstinence from sexual intercourse regarded as desertion.

DESIGNATIO PERSONAE. The description contained in a contract of the persons who are parties thereto.

DESIGNATIO UNIUS EST EXCLUSIO alterius, et expressum facit cessare tacitum. The appointment or designation of one is the exclusion of another; and that expressed makes that which is implied to cease. Co. Litt. 210.

DESIGNATION. The expression used by a testator to denote a person or thing, instead of the name itself.

A bequest of the farm which the testator bought of a person named, or of a picture which he owns, painted by a certain artist, would be a designation of the thing. A legacy "to the eldest son" of A. would be a designation of the person. See 1 Rop. Leg. c. 2.

DESLINDE. In Spanish law. The act of determining and indicating the boundaries of an estate, county, or province.

DESMEMORIADOS. In Spanish law. Persons without memory. White, New Recop. lib. 1, tit. 2, c. 1, § 4.

DESPACHEURS. The name given, in come countries, to persons appointed to settle cases of average. Ord. Hamb. tit. 21, art. 10.

DESPERATE. Of which there is no hope.

This term is used frequently in making an inventory of a decedent's effects, when a debt is considered so bad that there is no hope of recovering it. It is then called a desperate debt, and, if it be so returned, it will be prima facie considered as desperate. See Toller, Ex'rs, 248; 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 644; 1 Chit. Prac. 580; 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 361.

DESPITUS. A contemptible person. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 5, § 4.

DESPONSATION. The act of betrothing persons to each other.

DESPOSORIO. In Spanish law. Espousals; mutual promises of future marriage. White, New Recop. bk. 1, tit. 6, c. 1, § 1.

DESPOT. This word, in its original and most simple acceptation, signifies "master and supreme lord." It is synonymous with "monarch;" but taken in bad part, as it is usually employed, it signifies a "tyrant." In some states, "despot" is the title given to the sovereign, as king is given in others. Enc. Lond.

DESPOTISM. That abuse of government where the sovereign power is not divided, but united in the hands of a single man, whatever may be his official title. It is not, properly, a form of government. Rutherforth, Inst. bk. 1, c. 20, § 1.

DESRENABLE. Unreasonable. Britt. c. 121.

DESTINATION. The intended application of a thing.

For example, when a testator gives to a hospital a sum of money to be applied in erecting buildings, he is said to give a destination to the legacy. Mill stones taken out of a mill to be picked, and to be returned, have a destination, and are considered real estate, although detached from the freehold. Heirlooms, although personal chattels, are, by their destination, considered real estate; and money agreed or directed to be laid out in land is treated as real property. Newland, Cont. c. 3; 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 577; 2 Bell, Comm. 2; Ersk. Inst. 2. 2. 14; Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 6, § 9. See "Easement;" "Fixtures."

——In Common Law. The port at which a ship is to end her voyage is called her "port of destination."

The place for ultimate delivery of goods intrusted for carriage.

DESTRUCTION. A term used in old English law, generally in connection with "waste," and having, according to some, the same meaning. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 385; 3 Bl. Comm. 223. Britton, however, makes a distinction between waste of woods and destruction of houses. Britt. c. 66; St. Marlb. c. 17.

DESUBITO. To weary a person with continual barkings, and then to bite, provided against by old laws.

DESUETUDE. Disuse.

DETACHIARE. To seize or take into custody another's goods or person.

The word is given by Cowell, but seems a corruption of attachiare.

DETAINER. Detention; the act of keeping a person against his will, or of withholding the possession of goods or other personal or real property from the owner.

"Detainer" and "detention" are pretty much synonymous. If there be any distinction, it is perhaps that detention applies rather to the act considered as a fact; detainer to the act considered as something done by some person. Detainer is more frequently used with reference to real estate than in application to personal property.

——In Practice. A writ or instrument, issued or made by a competent officer, authorizing the keeper of a prison to keep in his custody a person therein named. A detainer may be lodged against one within the walls of a prison, on what account soever he is there. Comyn, Dig. "Process" (E) (3 B).

DETENTION. The act of retaining and preventing the removal of a person or property. See "Detainer."

DETERMINABLE. Liable to come to an end by the happening of a contingency: as, a determinable fee. See 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1695.

DETERMINABLE FEE (also called a "qualified" or "base" fee). One which has a qualification subjoined to it, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. A limitation to a man and his heirs on the part of his father affords an example of this species of estate. Litt. § 254; Co. Litt. 27a, 220; 1 Preston, Est. 449; 2 Bl. Comm. 109; Cruise, Dig. tit. 1, § 82; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1695.

DETERMINATE. That which is ascertained; what is particularly designated; as, if I sell you my horse Napoleon, the article sold is here determined. This is very different from a contract by which I would have sold you a horse, without a particular designation of any horse. 1 Bouv. Inst. notes 947, 950.

DETERMINATION. The decision of a court of justice.

The end, the conclusion, of a right or authority; as, the determination of a lease. Comyn, Dig. "Estates by Grant" (G 10, 11, 12).

The determination of an authority is the end of the authority given; the end of the return-day of a writ determines the authority of the sheriff; the death of the principal determines the authority of a mere attorney.

DETERMINE. To come to an end. To bring to an end. 2 Bl. Comm. 121; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 380.

DETESTATIO (Lat.) In the civil law. A summoning made, or notice given, in the presence of witnesses, denuntiatio facta cum testatione. Dig. 50. 16. 40.

DETINET (Lat. detinere, to detain; detinet, he detains). In pleading. An action of debt is said to be in the detinet when it alleged merely that the defendant withholds or unjustly detains from the plaintiff the thing or amount demanded, as distinguished from actions in the cepit where a wrongful taking is alleged.

DETINUE (Lat. detinere,—de, and tenere,—to hold from; to withhold). In practice. A form of action which lies for the recovery, in specie, of personal chattels from one who acquired possession of them lawfully, but retains it without right, together with damages for the detention. 3 Bl. Comm. 151.

It is generally laid down as necessary to the maintenance of this action that the original taking should have been lawful, thus distinguishing it from replevin, which lies in case the original taking is unlawful. Brooke, Abr. "Detinue," 21, 36, 63. It is said, however, by Chitty, that it lies in cases of tortious taking, except as a distress, and that it is thus distinguished from replevin, which lay originally only where a distress was made, as was claimed, wrongfully. 1 Chit. Pl. 112, 113. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 152, and notes. In England this action has yielded to the more practical and less technical action trover, but is much used in the slaveholding states of the United States for the recovery of slaves. 4 Munf. (Va.) 72; 4 Ala. 221; 3 Bibb (Ky.) 510; 16 Overt. (Tenn.) 187; 10 Ired. (N. C.) 124.

DETINUE OF GOODS IN FRANK MARriage. An obsolete writ, by which, after a divorce, the wife might obtain the goods which were given with her in marriage.

DETINUIT (Lat. he detained). In pleading. An action of replevin is said to be in the detinuit when the plaintiff acquires possession of the property claimed by means of the writ. The right to retain is, of course, subject in such case to the judgment of the court upon his title to the property claimed. Buller, N. P. 521.

DETRACTARE (Law Lat.) In old English law. To draw, or drag; to draw along; to draw or drag a convict to the gallows or stake. Detractentur et suspendentur, they shall be drawn and hanged. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 37, § 4. Detractari et comburi, to be drawn and burned. Id. § 2.

DETUNICARI. To discover or lay open to the world. Matt. Westminster, 1240.

DEUNX (Lat. pl. deunces). In the Roman law. A division of the as, containing eleven unciae or duodecimal parts; the proportion of eleven-twelfths. 2 Bl. Comm. 462, note: Tayl. Civ. Law, 492.

DEUS SOLUS HAEREDEM FACERE POtest, non homo. God alone, and not man, can make an heir. Co. Litt. 7b; cited 5 Barn. & C. 440, 454; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 457.

DEUTEROGAMY. A second marriage.

DEVADIATUS, or DIVADIATUS. An offender without sureties or pledges. Cowell.

DEVASTATION. Wasteful use of the property of a deceased person; as, for extravagant funeral or other unnecessary expenses. 2 Bl. Comm. 508.

DEVASTAVERUNT (Lat. pl. of devastavit). They have wasted. A term applied in old English law to waste by executors and administrators, and to the process issued against them therefor. Cowell. See "Devastavit."

DEVASTAVIT. A mismanagement and waste by an executor, administrator, or other trustee, of the estate and effects trusted to him as such, by which a loss occurs.

Devastavit may be:

(1) By direct abuse, as when the executor, administrator, or trustee sells, embezzles, or converts to his own use the goods intrusted to him (Comyn, Dig. "Administration" [I 1]), releases a claim due to the estate (3 Bac. Abr. 700; Hob. 266; Cro. Eliz. 43; 7 Johns. [N. Y.] 404; 9 Mass. 352), or surrenders a lease below its value (2 Johns. Cas. [N. Y.] 376; 3 P. Wms. 330).

(2) By maladministration, as by the payment of claims which were not due nor owing, or by paying others out of the order in which they ought to be paid, or by the payment of legacies before all the debts are satisfied. 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 394; 5 Rawle (Pa.) 266.

(3) By neglect, as by neglect to sell the goods at a fair price within a reasonable time, or, if they are perishable goods, before they are wasted; or a neglect to collect a doubtful debt which, by proper exertion, might have been collected. Bac. Abr. "Executors" (L).

DEVENERUNT (Lat. devenire, to come to). A writ directed to the king's escheators when any of the king's tenants in capite dies, and when his son and heir dies within age, and in the king's custody, commanding the escheat, or that by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men they shall inquire what lands or tenements by the death of the tenant have come to the king. Dyer, 360; Termes de la Ley; Keilw. 199a; Blount; Cowell.

DEVEST (Law Fr. devester, desvester; Law Lat. devestire).

——In Old English Law. To take away; to deprive of, as a possession, title, or estate; the opposite of "invest." Termes de la Ley; Cowell. Sometimes written "divest," but "devest" has the support of the best authority. Co. Litt. 15a, 15b; Hale, Anal. § 32. See "Invest."

——In Modern Law. To take or draw away. "The whose estate was devested and drawn out of the feoffees." 4 Kent, Comm. 240. "The feoffment made by the feoffees devested all the estates." Id.

To strip or deprive. "The statute devested the feoffees of all the estate." Id. 239. See "Vest."

DEVIATION.

——In Insurance. Varying from the risks insured against, as described in the policy, without necessity or just cause, after the risk has begun. 1 Phil. Ins. § 977 et seq.

——In Contracts. A change made in the progress of a work from the original plan agreed on.

DEVISAVIT VEL NON. In practice. The name of an issue sent out of a court of chancery, or one which exercises chancery jurisdiction, to a court of law, to try the validity of a paper asserted and denied to be a will, to ascertain whether or not the testator did devise, or whether or not that paper was his will. 7 Brown, Parl. Cas. 437; 2 Atk. 424; 5 Pa. St. 21.

DEVISE. A gift of real property by a person's last will and testament.

The term "devise," properly and technically, applies only to real estate. The object of the devise must, therefore, be that kind of property. 1 Hill, Abr. c. 36, notes 62-74. But it is also sometimes improperly applied to a bequest or legacy. See 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2095 et seq.; 4 Kent, Comm. 489; 8 Viner, Abr. 41; Comyn, Dig. "Estates by Devise."

DEVISEE. A person to whom a devise has been made.

DEVISOR. A testator; one who devises real estate.

DEVOIR. Duty. It is used in the statute of 2 Rich. II. c. 3, in the sense of "duties" or "customs."

DEVOLUTION. In ecclesiastical law. The transfer, by forfeiture, of a right and power which a person has to another, on account of some act or negligence of the person who is vested with such right or power; for example, when a person has the right of presentation, and he does not present within the time prescribed, the right devolves on his next immediate superior. Ayliffe, Par. 331.

In the law of decedents' estates, it comprehends the processes whereby title is transmitted on the death of the owner of property.

DEVOLVE. "To devolve means to pass from a person dying to a person living." 1 Mylne & K. 648.

DEVYER (Law Fr.) To die. Deoya, died. Y. B. I. 1 Edw. II. 11.

DEXTANS (Lat.) In Roman law. A division of the as, consisting of ten unciae; ten-twelfths, or five-sixths. 2 Bl. Comm. 462, note (m); Tayl. Civ. Law, 492.

DI. ET FI. (Law Lat.) In old writs. An abbreviation of dilecto et fideli, to his beloved and faithful. Reg. Orig. 17.

DI COLONNA. In maritime law. A contract between the owner of a ship, the captain, and the mariners, that the voyage shall be for the benefit of all. The term is used in the Italian law. Targa, cc. 36, 37; Emerig. Mar. Loans, § 5.

DIARIUM. Daily food, or as much as will suffice for the day. Du Cange.

DIATIM. In old records. Daily; every day; from day to day. Spelman.

DICA. In old English law. A tally for accounts, by number of cuts (taillees), marks or notches. Cowell. See "Tallia;" "Tally."

DICAST. An officer in ancient Greece answering nearly to our juryman.

DICTATOR. In Roman law. A magistrate at Rome invested with absolute power. His authority over the lives and fortunes of the citizens was without bounds. His office continued but for six months. Hist. de la Jur. Dig. 1. 2. 18. 1. 1. 1.

DICTUM. An opinion expressed by a court, but which, not being necessarily involved in the case, lacks the force of an adjudication. Usually given obiter dictum.

It frequently happens that, in assigning its opinion upon a question before it, the court discusses collateral questions, and expresses a decided opinion upon them. Such opinions, however, are frequently given without much reflection, or without previous argument at the bar; and as, moreover, they do not enter into the adjudication of the point before it, they have only that authority which may be accorded to the opinion, more or less deliberate, of the individual judge who announces it. It may be observed that in recent times, particularly in those jurisdictions where appeals are largely favored, the ancient practice of courts in this respect is much modified. Formerly, judges aimed to confine their opinion to the precise point involved, and were glad to make that point as narrow as it might justly be. Where appeals are frequent, however, a strong tendency may be seen to fortify the judgment given with every principle that can be invoked in its behalf,—those that are merely collateral, as well as those that are necessarily involved. In some courts of last resort, also, when there are many judges, it is not unfrequently the case that, while the court come to one and the same conclusion, the different judges may be led to that conclusion by different views of the law, so that it becomes difficult to determine what is to be regarded as the principle upon which the case was decided, and what shall be deemed mere dicta. According to the more rigid rule, an expression of opinion, however deliberate, upon a question, however fully argued, if not essential to the disposition that was made of the case, may be regarded as a dictum; but it is, on the other hand, said that it is difficult to see why, in a philosophical point of view, the opinion of the court is not as persuasive on all the points which were so involved in the cause that it was the duty of counsel to argue them, and which were deliberately passed over by the court, as if the decision had hung upon but one point. 1 Abb. N. Y. Dig. pref. iv. Consult 17 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 292; 1 Phillim. Ecc. Law, 406; 1 Eng. Ecc. 129; Ram, Judgm. c. 5, p. 36; Willes, 666; 1 H. Bl. 53-63; 2 Bos. & P. 375; 7 Pa. St. 287; 3 Barn. & Ald. 341; 2 Bing. 90. The doctrine of the courts of France on this subject is stated in 11 Toullier, Dr. Civ. 177, note 133. As to weight given to dicta in former decisions, see 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 399; 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 419.

——In French Law. The report of a judgment made by one of the judges who has given it. Poth. Proc. Civ. pl. 1, c. 5, art. 2.

DICTUM DE KENILWORTH. The edict or declaration of Kenilworth. An edict or award between King Henry III. and all the barons and others who had been in arms against him; and so called because it was made at Kenilworth Castle, in Warwickshire, in the fifty-first year of his reign, containing a composition of five years' rent for the lands and estates of those who had forfeited them in that rebellion. Blount; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 62; Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 10, and note.

DIEI DICTIO (Lat.) In the Roman law. The notice given by a magistrate that he intended to impeach a certain citizen, whom he mentioned by name, of a certain crime, before the people, on a certain day. Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 13, No. 40.

DIEM CLAUSIT EXTREMUM (Lat. he closed his last day,—died). A writ which lay on the death of a tenant in capite, to ascertain the lands of which he died seised, and reclaim them into the king's hands. It was directed to the king's escheators. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 251 (K); 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 327.

A writ of the same name, issuing out of the exchequer after the death of a debtor of the king, to levy the debt of the lands or goods of his heir, executor, or administrator. Termes de la Ley. This writ is still in force in England. 4 Steph. Comm. 47.

DIES (Lat.) A day; days; days for appearance in court; provisions or maintenance for a day. The king's rents were anciently reserved by so many days' provisions. Spelman; Cowell; Blount.

DIES A QUO (Lat.) In civil law. The day from which a transaction begins, the conclusion being the dies ad quem. Calv. Lex.; 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 168.

DIES AMORIS (Lat.) A day of favor. If obtained after a default by the defendant, it amounted to a waiver of the default. Co. Litt. 135a; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 60.

DIES CEDIT. The day begins; dies venit, the day has come. Two expressions in Roman law which signify the vesting or fixing of an interest, and the interest becoming a present one. Sandars, Just. Inst. (5th Ed.) 225, 232.

DIES COMMUNES IN BANCO (Lat.) Regular days for appearance in court; called, also, "common return days." 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 57.

DIES DATUS (Lat. a day given). A day or time given to a defendant in a suit, which is in fact a continuance of the cause. It is so called when given before a declaration. When it is allowed afterwards, it assumes the name of "imparlance" (q. v.)

Dies datus in banco, a day in bank. Co. Litt. 135. Dies datus partibus, a continuance; dies datus prece partium, a day given on prayer of the parties.

DIES DOMINICUS NON EST JURIDICUS. Sunday is not a day in law. Co. Litt. 135a; 2 Saund. 291; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 21; Finch, Law, 7; Noy, Max. 2; Plowd. 265; 3 Dowl. & L. 328; 13 Mass. 327. See "Sunday."

DIES EXCRESCENS. In old English law. The added or increasing day in leap year. Bracton, fols. 359, 359b.

DIES FASTI (Lat.) In Roman law. Days on which courts might be held, and judicial and other business legally transacted. Calv. Lex.; Anthon, Rom. Ant.; 3 Bl. Comm. 424.

DIES FERIATI (Lat.) In the civil law. Holidays. Dig. 2. 12. 2. 9.

DIES GRATIAE (Lat.) In old English law. Days of grace. Co. Litt. 134b.

DIES INCEPTUS PRO COMPLETO HABetur. A day begun is held as complete.

DIES INCERTUS PRO CONDITIONE habetur. A day uncertain is held as a condition. Bell, Dict. "Computation of Time."

DIES INTERCISI. In Roman law. Divided days; days on which the courts were open for a part of the day. Calv. Lex.; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 24, § 35, note.

DIES LEGITIMUS. In the civil and old English law. A lawful or law day; a term day; a day of appearance. Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 9, § 6; Bracton, fols. 334b, 359.

DIES MARCHIAE. In old English law. The day of meeting of English and Scotch, which was annually held on the marches or borders to adjust their differences and preserve peace. Cowell; Tomlin.

DIES NEFASTI (Lat.) In Roman law. Days on which it was unlawful to transact judicial affairs, and on which the courts were closed. Anthon, Rom. Ant.; Calv. Lex.; 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 24.

DIES NON (Lat.) An abbreviation of the phrase dies nonjuridicus, universally used to denote nonjudicial days. Days during which courts do not transact any business, as, Sunday, or the legal holidays. 3 Chit. Gen. Prac. 104; W. Jones, 156.

DIES NONJURIDICUS (Lat.) Nonjudicial days. See "Dies Non."

DIES PACIS (Lat. day of peace). The year was formerly divided into the days of the peace of the church, and the days of the peace of the king, including in the two divisions all the days of the year. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 35.

DIES SOLARIS. In old English law. A solar day, as distinguished from what was called "dies lunaris" (a lunar day), both composing an artificial day. Bracton, fol. 264. See "Day."

DIES SOLIS. In the civil and old English law. Sunday, literally, the day of the sun. So called in Code, 3. 12. 7.

DIES UTILES (Lat. useful or available days). Days in which an heir might apply to the judge for an inheritance. Cooper, Inst.; Calv. Lex.; Du Cange.

DIET, or DYET. In Scotch practice. The sitting of a court. 3 How. St. Tr. 654.

An appearance day. Bell, Dict.

A day fixed for the trial of a criminal cause. 2 Alison, Prac. 343; 2 Brown, 240.

A criminal cause as prepared for trial. 1 Brown, 268; 2 Brown, 141. "Deserting the diet." Arkley, 481.

DIETA (Lat.) A day's journey; a day's work; a day's expenses. A reasonable day's journey is said to be twenty miles, by an old computation. Cowell; Spelman; Bracton, 235b; 3 Bl. Comm. 218.

DIETS OF COMPEARANCE. In Scotch law. The days allowed in which to appear after citation.

DIEU SON ACTE (Law Fr.) In old law. God, his act; God's act. An event beyond human foresight or control. Termes de la Ley.

DIFFACERE, or DISFACERE (Law Lat.; old Fr. deffacer). In old European law. To disfigure or deface; to mutilate; to destroy. Spelman; LL. Longobard, lib. 1, tit. 25, 1, 68.

Diffactio, a mutilating or maiming. Whishaw.

DIFFICILE EST UT UNUS HOMO VIcem duorum sustineat. It is difficult that one man should sustain the place of two. 4 Coke, 118.

DIFFORCIARE. In old English law. To deny, or keep from one. Difforciare rectum, to deny justice to any one, after having been required to do it. Matt. Par. A. D. 1164. Perhaps the same with deforciare.

DIGAMA, or DIGAMY. Second marriage; marriage to a second wife after the death of the first, as "bigamy," in law, is having two wives at once. Originally, a man who married a widow, or married again after the death of his wife, was said to be guilty of bigamy. Co. Litt. 40b, note.

DIGEST. A compilation arranged in an orderly manner.

The name is given to a great variety of topical compilations, abridgments, and analytical indices of reports, statutes, etc. When reference is made to "Digest," the Pandects of Justinian are intended, they being the authoritative compilation of the civil law. As to this Digest, and the mode of citing it, see "Pandects." Other digests are referred to by their distinctive names. For some account of digests of the civil and canon law, and those of Indian law, see "Civil Law," "Code," and "Canon Law."

The digests of English and American law are for the most part deemed not authorities, but simply manuals of reference, by which the reader may find his way to the original cases which are authorities. 1 Burrows, 364; 2 Wils. 1, 2. Some of them, however, which have been the careful work of scholarly lawyers, possess an independent value as original repositories of the law. Bacon's Abridgment, which has long been deservedly popular in this country, and Comyn's Digest, also often cited, are examples of these.

DIGNITARY. In ecclesiastical law. An ecclesiastic who holds a dignity or benefice which gives him some pre-eminence over mere priests and canons, such as a bishop, archbishop, prebendary, etc. Swift; Burns.

DIGNITIES. In English law. Titles of honor.

They are considered as incorporeal hereditaments. The genius of our government forbids their admission into the republic.

DIJUDICATION. Judicial distinction.

DILACION. In Spanish law. The time granted by law or by the judge to parties litigant for the purpose of answering a demand, or proving some disputed fact.

DILAPIDATION. A species of ecclesiastical waste which occurs whenever the incumbent suffers any edifices of his ecclesiastical living to go to ruin or decay. It is either voluntary, by pulling down, or permissive, by suffering the church, parsonage houses, and other buildings thereunto belonging, to decay. And the remedy for either lies either in the spiritual court, where the canon law prevails, or in the courts of common law. It is also held to be good cause of deprivation if the bishop, parson, or other ecclesiastical person dilapidates buildings or cuts down timber growing on the patrimony of the church, unless for necessary repairs; and that a writ of prohibition will also lie against him in the common-law courts. 3 Bl. Comm. 91.

DILATIONES IN LEGE SUNT ODIOSAE. Delays in law are odious. Branch, Princ.

DILATORY DEFENSE. In chancery practice. One the object of which is to dismiss, suspend, or obstruct the suit, without touching the merits, until the impediment or obstacle insisted on shall be removed. See "Defense."

DILATORY PLEA. One which goes to defeat the particular action brought, merely, and which does not answer as to the general right of the plaintiff.

DILIGENCE. In Scotch law. Process; execution.

——Diligence against the Heritage. A writ of execution by which the creditor proceeds against the real estate of the debtor.

——Diligence Incident. A writ or process for citing witnesses and examining havers. It is equivalent to the English subpoena for witnesses, and rule or order for examination of parties and for interrogatories.

——Diligence to Examine Havers. A process to obtain testimony, equivalent to a bill of discovery in chancery, or a rule to compel oral examination and a subpoena duces tecum at common law.

——Diligence against the Person. A writ of execution, by which the creditor proceeds against the person of the debtor; equivalent to the English ca. sa.

——Second Diligence. Second letters issued where the first have been disregarded. A similar result is produced in English practice by the attachment for contempt.

——Summary Diligence. Diligence issued in a summary manner, like an execution of a warrant of attorney, cognovit actionem, and the like, in English practice.

——Diligence against Witnesses. Process to compel the attendance of witnesses; equivalent to the English subpoena. See Paterson, Comp.

DILIGIATUS (Law Lat. from di, away, and ligius, or ligiatus, under the protection of the law). In old English law. Cast out of the law's protection, ejectus e patrocinio legis; outlawed; an outlaw. Spelman; LL. Hen. I. c. 45.

DILLIGROUT. Pottage formerly made for the king's table on the coronation day. There was a tenure in serjeantry, by which lands were held of the king by the service of finding this pottage at that solemnity. 39 Hen. III.

DIMIDIETAS. The moiety or half of a thing.

DIMINUTIO. In the civil law. Diminution; a taking away; loss or deprivation. Diminutio capitis, loss of status or condition. See "Capitis Diminutio."

DIMINUTION OF THE RECORD. In practice. Incompleteness of the record of a case sent up from an inferior to a superior court.

DIMISI. In old conveyancing. I have demised. Dimisi, concessi, et ad firmam tradidi, have demised, granted, and to farm let. The usual words of operation in a lease. 2 Bl. Comm. 317, 318. Sometimes written demisi.

DIMISIT. In old conveyancing. He has demised. See "Dimisi."

DIMISSORIAE LITTERAE. In the civil law. Letters dimissory or dismissory, commonly called "apostles" (quae vulgo apostoli dicuntur). Dig. 50. 16. 106. See "Apostoli;" "Apostles."

DINARCHY. A government by two persons.

DINERO.

——In Spanish Law. Money. Dinero contado, money counted. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 13, c. 1, § 1.

——In Roman Law. A civil division of the Roman empire, embracing several provinces. Calv. Lex.

DIOCESAN COURTS. Ecclesiastical courts taking cognizance of all matters arising within the diocese of each bishop. They consist of the consistorial court, and the courts of archdeacons, exercising general or limited jurisdictions, according to the terms of their patents, or to local custom, or to the authority of recent legislation. Phillim. Ecc. Law, 1202.

DIOCESE. The territorial extent of a bishop's jurisdiction; the circuit of every bishop's jurisdiction. Co. Litt. 94; 1 Bl. Comm. 111; 2 Burn, Ecc. Law, 158.

DIPLOMA. An instrument of writing, executed by a corporation or society, certifying that a certain person therein named is entitled to a certain distinction therein mentioned.

It is usually granted by learned institutions to their members, or to persons who have studied in them.

This word, which is also written "duploma," in the civil law signifies letters issued by a prince. They are so called, it is supposed, a duplicatis tabellis, to which Ovid is thought to allude (1 Amor. 12. 2. 27) when he says, Tunc ego vos duplices rebus pro nomine sensi (Sueton. in Augustum, c. 26). Seals also were called "diplomata." Vicat.

DIPLOMATICS. The art of judging of ancient charters, public documents, or diplomas, and discriminating the true from the false. Enc. Lond.

DIPSOMANIA. In medical jurisprudence. A disease produced by drunkenness, and, indeed, other causes, which overmasters the will of its victim, and irresistibly impels him to drink to intoxication. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 304. How far the law will hold a party responsible for acts committed while the mind is overwhelmed by the effects of liquor so taken is an open question.

DIPTYCHA. Diptychs; tablets of wood, metal, or other substance, used among the Romans for the purpose of writing, and folded like a book of two leaves. The diptychs of antiquity were especially employed for public registers. They were used in the Greek, and afterwards in the Roman, church, as registers of the names of those for whom supplication was to be made, and are ranked among the earliest monastic records. Hubback, Ev. Success. 567; Enc. Am. See Calv. Lex.; Brissonius.

DIRECT. Straightforward; immediate; not collateral. The direct line of descent is formed by a series of relationships between persons who descend successively one from the other.

Evidence is termed "direct" which applies immediately to the fact to be proved, without any intervening process, as distinguished from "circumstantial," which applies immediately to collateral facts supposed to have a connection, near or remote, with the fact in controversy.

The examination in chief of a witness is called the "direct examination."

Interrogatories propounded to a deponent by the party by whom the deposition is taken are called "direct interrogatories."

DIRECT LINE. In the law of descent. Direct lineal succession.

DIRECT TAX. See "Tax."

DIRECTION. The order and government of an institution; the persons who compose the board of directors are jointly called the "direction." Direction, in another sense, is nearly synonymous with instruction (q. v.)

——In Practice. That part of a bill in chancery which contains the address of the bill to the court. This must, of course, contain the appropriate and technical description of the court. See "Bill."

DIRECTORS. Persons appointed or elected according to law, authorized to manage and direct the affairs of a corporation or company. The whole of the directors collectively form the board of directors.

DIRECTORY TRUST. One where, by the terms of the trust, the trust fund is directed to be vested in a particular manner until the period arrives when the trust is to be terminated. 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 272.

DIRIBITORES. In Roman law. Officers who distributed ballots to the people, to be used in voting. Tayl. Civ. Law, 192.

DIRIMANT IMPEDIMENTS. Those bars which annul a consummated marriage.

DISABILITY. The want of legal capacity. "Disability implies want of power, not want of inclination. It refers to incapacity, and not to disinclination." 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 473.

Disabilities were anciently classified as general and special.

(1) A disability is called general when it disables a person from performing all acts of a given kind, as in the case of an outlaw.

(2) A disability is special when it disables him from doing a specific act, as where one renders himself incapable of performing a contract which he has entered into.

They are also classified as personal and absolute.

(3) A personal disability is confined to the person affected.

(4) An absolute disability descends to his heirs. The absolute disabilities such as attainder have been all abolished.

They are also classified as civil and canonical.

This classification existed only as to disability to enter the marriage contract. Civil were such as to render the marriage void, as prior marriage, consanguinity, etc., while a canonical disability, such as sterility, rendered the marriage voidable only. 2 Steph. Comm. 240.

DISABLING STATUTES. The acts of 1 Eliz. c. 19, 13 Eliz. c. 10, 14 Eliz. cc. 11, 14, 18 Eliz. c. 11, and 43 Eliz. c. 29, by which the power of ecclesiastical or eleemosynary corporations to lease their lands was restricted. 2 Bl. Comm. 319, 321; Co. Litt. 44a; 3 Steph. Comm. 140. Also called the "Restraining Statutes."

DISADVOCARE. To disavow.

DISAFFIRMANCE. The act by which a person who has entered into a voidable contract, as, for example, an infant, disagrees to such contract, and declares he will not abide by it.

Disaffirmance is express or implied,—the former, when the declaration is made in terms that the party will not abide by the contract; the latter, when he does an act which plainly manifests his determination not to abide by it; as where an infant made a deed for his land, and on coming of age he made a deed for the same land to another. 2 Dev. & B. (N. C.) 320; 10 Pet. (U. S.) 58; 13 Mass. 371, 375.

DISAFFOREST. To restore to their former condition lands which have been turned into forest. To remove from the operation of the forest laws. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 416.

DISAGREEMENT. The refusal by a grantee, lessee, etc., to accept an estate, lease, etc., made to him; the annulling of a thing that had essence before. No estate can be vested in a person against his will, consequently no one can become a grantee, etc., without his agreement. The law implies such an agreement until the contrary is shown, but his disagreement renders the grant, etc., inoperative. If an infant purchase an estate, he may, on coming to full age, disagree thereto; and, if he agree thereto, his heirs, after his death, may waive it. If a person of unsound mind purchase an estate, he cannot afterwards disagree thereto himself; but if he does not recover, or, after recovery, dies without agreement, his heir may disagree to it. If a feme covert purchase an estate, her husband may disagree thereto; and, if he neither agrees nor disagrees, the purchase is good during the coverture, but after his death, notwithstanding his agreement, the wife may disagree thereto, and so, after her death, may her heirs, if she does not herself agree thereto. Persons who purchase an estate under duress may disagree thereto when the duress ceases. See Co. Litt. 2b, 3a, 380b; 3 Prest. Abstr. 104; 2 Bl. Comm. 292; Viner. Abr.; Wharton.

DISALT. To disable a person.

DISAPPROPRIATION. This is where the appropriation of a benefice is severed, either by the patron presenting a clerk, or by the corporation which has the appropriation being dissolved. 1 Bl. Comm. 385.

DISAVOW. To deny the authority by which an agent pretends to have acted, as when he has exceeded the bounds of his authority.

It is the duty of the principal to fulfill the contracts which have been entered into by his authorized agent; and when an agent has exceeded his authority, he ought promptly to disavow such act, so that the other party may have his remedy against the agent. See "Agent;" "Principal."

DISBAR.

——In English Law. To expel a barrister from the bar.

——In the United States. To debar an attorney from the right to practice.

DISBOCATIO. In old English law. A conversion of wood grounds into arable or pasture; an assarting. Cowell. See "Assart."

DISCARCARE, or DISCARGARE (Law Lat. from dis, priv., and carcare, to load or charge). In old English law. To discharge; to unload; as a vessel. Carcare et discarcare, to charge and discharge; to load and unload. Cowell; Plac. Parl. 18 Edw. I.

In the Salian law it is written discargare.

Discarcatio, a discharging or unloading of a vessel. Towns. Pl. 226.

DISCEPTATIO CAUSAE (Lat.) In Roman law and practice. The argument or disputation of a cause by the advocates on both sides. Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 9, No. 39.

DISCEPTIO CAUSAE (Lat.) In Roman law. The argument of a cause by the counsel on both sides. Calv. Lex.

DISCHARGE. To free from a charge or load; to remove; to satisfy or pay; to set free, dismiss, or absolve; to carry on or perform. The term has many applications, the principal being:

——Of Cargo. The unloading of a cargo from a ship. 5 Wall. (U. S.) 557.

——Of Debt or Obligation. Full and final release from and termination of the obligation in whatever manner; a receipt or other instrument acting as a discharge. 147 Mass. 585.

——Of Prisoner. The setting at liberty of one held in confinement under process of law. 68 Mich. 331.

——Of Jury. The dismissal of a jury when, for any cause, the rendition of a verdict becomes impossible.

DISCLAIMER. A disavowal; a renunciation; as, for example, the act by which a patentee renounces part of his title of invention.

——Of Estates. The act by which a party refuses to accept an estate which has been conveyed to him. Thus, a trustee is said to disclaim who releases to his fellow trustees his estate, and relieves himself of the trust. 1 Hilliard, Real Prop. 354.

——Of Tenancy. The act of a person in possession, who denies holding the estate of the person who claims to be the owner. 2 Nev. & M. 672. An affirmation, by pleading or otherwise, in a court of record, that the reversion is in a stranger. It works a forfeiture of the lease at common law (Co. Litt. 251; 1 Cruise, Dig. 109), but not, it is said, in the United States (1 Washb. Real Prop. 93). Equity, it is said, will not aid a tenant in denying his landlord's title. 1 Pet. (U. S.) 486.

——In Pleading. A renunciation by the defendant of all claim to the subject of the demand made by the plaintiff's bill. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 309; Mitf. Eq. Pl. (Jeremy Ed.) 318.

DISCLAMATION. In Scotch law. Disavowal of tenure; denial that one holds lands of another. Bell, Dict.; Skene de Verb. Sign.

DISCOMMON. To deprive commonable lands of their commonable quality, by inclosing and appropriating or improving them.

DISCONTINUANCE.

——Of Estates. An alienation made or suffered by the tenant in tail, or other tenant seised in autre droit, by which the issue in tail, or heir or successor, or those in reversion or remainder, are driven to their action, and cannot enter.

The term "discontinuance" is used to distinguish those cases where the party whose freehold is ousted can restore it only by action, from those in which he may restore it by entry. Co. Litt. 325a; 3 Bl. Comm. 171; Adams, Ej. 35-41; Comyn, Dig.; Bac. Abr.; Viner, Abr; Cruise, Dig. Index; 2 Saund. Index.

——In Pleading. The chasm or interruption which occurs when no answer is given to some material matter in the preceding pleading, and the opposite party neglects to take advantage of such omission. See Comyn, Dig. "Pleader" (W); Bac. Abr. "Pleas" (P). It is distinguished from insufficient pleading by the fact that the pleading does not profess to answer all the preceding pleading in a case of discontinuance. 1 Wm. Saund. 28, note.

——In Practice. The chasm or interruption in proceedings occasioned by the failure of the plaintiff to continue the suit regularly from time to time, as he ought. 3 Bl. Comm. 296.

DISCONTINUOUS SERVITUDE, or DISCONTINUOUS EASEMENT. An easement made up of repeated acts, instead of one continuous act, such as right of way, drawing water, etc.

DISCONVENABLE (Law Fr.) Improper; unfit. Kelham.

DISCOUNT.

——In Contracts. Interest reserved from the amount lent at the time of making a loan. An allowance sometimes made for prompt payment. As a verb, it is used to denote the act of giving money for a bill of exchange or promissory note, deducting the interest.

The taking legal interest in advance is not usurious; but it is only allowed for the benefit of trade, and where the bill or note discounted is meant for circulation, and is for a short term. 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 678, 712; 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 408.

There is a difference between "buying" a bill and "discounting" it. The former word is used when the seller does not indorse the bill, and is not accountable for its payment. See Poth. de l'Usure, note 128; 3 Pet. (U. S.) 40; Blydenburgh, Usury; Sewell, Banking.

——In Practice. A set-off or defalcation in an action. Viner, Abr.

DISCOVERT. Not covert; unmarried. The term is applied to a woman unmarried, or widow,—one not within the bonds of matrimony.

DISCOVERY (Fr. decouvrir, to uncover; to discover). The act of finding an unknown country.

The nations of Europe adopted the principle that the discovery of any part of America gave title to the government by whose subjects or by whose authority it was made, as against all European governments. This title was to be consummated by possession. 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 543; 16 Pet. (U. S.) 367; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 518.

An invention or improvement. Act Cong. July 4, 1836, § 6.

——In Practice. The disclosure of facts resting in the knowledge of the defendant, or the production of deeds, writings, or things in his possession or power, in order to maintain the right or title of the party asking it, in some suit or proceeding in another court.

It was originally an equitable form of procedure, and a "bill of discovery," strictly so called, was brought to assist parties to suits in other courts.

In modern practice, a statutory proceeding is generally substituted, by which an inspection of books and papers, or an examination of a party, may be had on motion.

DISCREDIT. To deprive one of credit or confidence.

The impeachment of a witness, as distinguished from a contradiction of his testimony. See "Impeachment."

DISCREPANCY. A difference between one thing and another; between one writing and another; a variance.

A material discrepancy exists when there is such a difference between a thing alleged and a thing offered in evidence as to show they are not substantially the same; as when the plaintiff in his declaration for a malicious arrest averred that "the plaintiff in that action did not prosecute his said suit, but therein made default," and the record was that he obtained a rule to discontinue.

An immaterial discrepancy is one which does not materially affect the cause; as where a declaration stated that a deed bore date in a certain year of our Lord, and the deed was simply dated "March 30, 1701." 2 Salk. 658; 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 49; 5 Taunt. 707; 2 Barn. & A. 301; 8 Miss. 428; 2 McLean (U. S.) 69; 1 Metc. (Mass.) 59; 21 Pick. (Mass.) 486.

DISCRETIO EST DISCERNERE PER legem quid sit justum. Discretion is to discern through law what is just. 5 Coke, 99, 100; 10 Coke, 140; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) p. 81; Coke, 4th Inst. 41; 1 W. Bl. 152; 1 Burrows, 570; 3 Bulst. 128; 6 Q. B. 700.

DISCRETIO EST SCIRE PER LEGEM quid sit justum. Discretion consists in knowing what is just in law. 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 352, 356.

DISCRETION.

——In Practice. The equitable decision of what is just and proper under the circumstances.

The power of a judge, in certain matters, to decide in accordance with his own judgment of the equities of the cases, unhampered by inflexible rules of law. The latitude allowed to judges as to the action to be taken on certain facts. See 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 291.

The discretion of a judge is said to be the law of tyrants. It is always unknown; it is different in different men; it is casual, and depends upon constitution, temper, and passion. In the best, it is oftentimes caprice; in the worst, it is every vice, folly, and passion to which human nature is liable. Optima lex quae minimum relinquit arbitrio judicis; optimus judex qui minimum sibi. Bac. Aph.; 1 Cas. (Pa.) 80, note; 1 Powell, Mortg. 247a; 2 Belt, Supp. to Ves. 391; Toullier, Dr. Civ. liv. 3, note 338; 1 Lilly, Abr. 447.

There is a species of discretion which is authorized by express law, and without which justice cannot be administered; for example, if an old offender, a man of much intelligence and cunning, whose talents render him dangerous to the community, induces a young man of weak intellect to commit a larceny in company with himself, they are both liable to be punished for the offense. The law, foreseeing such a case, has provided that the punishment should be proportioned so as to do justice, and it has left such apportionment to the discretion of the judge. It is evident that, without such discretion, justice could not be administered; for one of these parties assuredly deserves a much more severe punishment than the other.

And many matters relating to the trial, such as the order of giving evidence, granting of new trials, etc., are properly left mainly or entirely to the discretion of the judge.

As applied to executive officers, it means a power to decide on the propriety of certain actions, without any review by others.

——In Criminal Law. The ability to know and distinguish between good and evil, —between what is lawful and what is unlawful.

DISCRETIONARY TRUSTS. Those which cannot be duly administered without the application of a certain degree of prudence and judgment; as, when a fund is given to trustees to be distributed in certain charities to be selected by the trustees.

DISCUSSION. In civil law. A proceeding, on the part of a surety, by which the property of the principal debtor is made liable before resort can be had to the sureties. This is called the "benefit of discussion." This is the law in Louisiana. Civ. Code La. arts. 3014-3020. See Domat, 3. 4. 1-4; Burge, Sur. 329, 343, 348; 5 Toullier, Dr. Civ. 544; 7 Toullier, Dr. Civ. 93; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1414.

DISENTAILING DEED. An assurance by which a tenant in tail bars his estate tail, so as to convert it into an estate in fee, either absolute or base.

Disentailment is regulated by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

DISFRANCHISEMENT. The act of depriving a member of a corporation of his right as such, by expulsion. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 192.

It differs from amotion (q. v.), which is applicable to the removal of an officer from office, leaving him his rights as a member. Willcock, Corp. note 708; Angell & A. Corp. 237. And see "Expulsion."

DISGAVEL. In English law. To deprive lands of that principal quality of gavelkind tenure by which they descend equally among all the sons of the tenant. 2 Wooddeson, Lect. 76; 2 Bl. Comm. 85; Robinson, Gavelkind, 97, note.

DISGRACE. Ignominy; shame; dishonor. No witness is required to disgrace himself. 13 How. St. Tr. 17, 334; 16 How. St. Tr. 161.

DISGRADING. In old English law. The depriving of an order or dignity. Termes de la Ley; Blount.

DISHERISON. Disinheritance; depriving one of an inheritance. Obsolete. See "Disinherison."

DISHERITOR. One who disinherits, or puts another out of his freehold. Obsolete.

DISHONOR. A term applied to the nonfulfillment of commercial engagements. To dishonor a bill of exchange or a promissory note is to refuse or neglect to pay it at maturity.

The holder is bound to give notice to the parties to such instrument of its dishonor; and his laches will discharge the indorsers. Chit. Bills, 256-278, 394, 395.

DISINCARCERATE. To set at liberty; to free from prison.

DISINHERISON. In civil law. The act of depriving a forced heir of the inheritance which the law gives him.

In Louisiana, forced heirs may be deprived of their legitime, or legal portion, and of the seisin granted them by law, for just cause. The disinherison must be made in proper form, by name and expressly, and for a just cause; otherwise it is null. See Civ. Code La. arts. 1609-1616.

DISINHERITANCE. The act by which a person deprives his heir of an inheritance, who, without such act, would inherit.

By the common law, any one may give his estate to a stranger, and thereby disinherit his heir apparent. Cooper, Just. Inst. 495; 7 East, 106.

DISINTERESTED WITNESS. One who has no interest in the cause or matter in issue, and who is lawfully competent to testify.

DISJUNCTIVE ALLEGATIONS. In pleading. Allegations which charge a party disjunctively, so as to leave it uncertain what is relied on as the accusation against him.

An indictment, information, or complaint which charges the defendant with one or other of two offenses, in the disjunctive, as that he murdered "or" caused to be murdered, forged "or" caused to be forged, wrote and published "or" caused to be written and published, is bad for uncertainty. 8 Mod. 330; 1 Salk. 342, 371; 2 Strange, 900; Cas. temp. Hardw. 370; 5 Barn. & C. 251; 1 Car. & K. 243; 1 Younge & J. 22.

DISJUNCTIVE TERM. One which is placed between two contraries, by the affirming of one of which the other is taken away. It is usually expressed by the word "or." See 3 Ves. 450; 7 Ves. 454; 2 Rop. Leg. 290; 1 P. Wms. 433; 2 P. Wms. 283; 2 Cox, Ch. 213; 2 Atk. 643; 3 Atk. 83, 85; 2 Ves. Sr. 67; 2 Strange, 1175; Cro. Eliz. 525; Poll. 645; 1 Bing. 500; 3 Term R. 470; Ayliffe, Pand. 56; 2 Miles (Pa.) 49.

In the civil law, when a legacy is given to Caius "or" Titius, the word "or" is considered "and," and both Caius and Titius are entitled to the legacy in equal parts. 6 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 704.

DISMISS. To remove; to send out of court. Formerly used in chancery of the removal of a cause out of court without any further hearing. The term is now used in courts of law also.

DISMORTGAGE. To redeem from mortgage.

DISORDERLY HOUSE. In criminal law. A house the inmates of which behave so badly as to become a nuisance to the neighborhood.

One kept in such a way as to disturb or scandalize the public generally, or the inhabitants of a particular neighborhood, or the passers by. 93 W. C. 608.

The term has a wide meaning, and includes bawdy houses, gambling houses, and the like.

A place kept for general resort for purposes injurious to the public morals or safety is a "disorderly house," in the legal sense, though there be no noise or disorder. 48 Ark. 60; 30 N. J. Law, 104; 120 Mass. 356; 83 N. Y. 587.

DISORDERLY PERSONS. A class of offenders, subjects of police regulation, described in the statutes which punish them. See 4 Bl. Comm. 169.

DISPARAGATION (Law Fr. disparagement). The matching an heir, etc., in marriage, under his or her degree or condition, or against the rules of decency. Kelham.

DISPARAGE (Law Lat. disparagare). To connect unequally; to match unsuitably "The ward who is ward for knight's service land is accounted in law disparaged, if he be tendered a marriage of the burgher's parentage." Bac. Arg. Low's Case, Works, iv. 235. See "Disparagement."

DISPARAGEMENT. In old English law. An injury by union or comparison with some person or thing of inferior rank or excellence.

Marriage without disparagement was marriage to one of suitable rank and character.

2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 70; Co. Litt. 82b. The guardian in chivalry had the right of disposing of his infant ward in matrimony; and provided he tendered a marriage without disparagement or inequality, if the infant refused, he was obliged to pay a valor maritagii to the guardian.

Disparagare, to connect in an unequal marriage. Spelman. Disparagatio, disparagement. Used in Magna Charta (9 Hen. III.) c. 6. Disparagation, disparagement. Kelham. Disparage, to marry unequally. Used of a marriage proposed by a guardian between those of unequal rank, and injurious to the ward.

DISPARAGIUM. In old Scotch law. Inequality in blood, honor, dignity, or otherwise. Skene de Verb. Sign.

DISPARATA NON DEBENT JUNGI. Dissimilar things ought not to be joined. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 24.

DISPARK. To dissolve a park. Cro. Car. 59. To convert a park into ordinary ground.

DISPAUPER. In English law. To deprive a person of the privilege of suing in forma pauperis.

When a person has been admitted to sue in forma pauperis, and before the suit is ended it appears that the party has become the owner of a sufficient estate real or personal, or has been guilty of some wrong, he may be dispaupered.

DISPENSATIO EST VULNUS, QUOD vulnerat jus commune. A dispensation is a wound, because it wounds a common right. Dav. 69; Branch, Princ.

DISPENSATION. A relaxation of law for the benefit or advantage of an individual. In the United States, no power exists, except in the legislature, to dispense with law; and then it is not so much a dispensation as a change of the law.

DISPERSONARE. To scandalize or disparage. Blount.

DISPONE. In Scotch law. A technical word essential to the conveyance of heritable property, and for which no equivalent is accepted, however clear may be the meaning of the party. Paterson, Comp.

DISPOSING MIND. Testamentary capacity (q. v.)

DISPOSITION. In Scotch law. A deed of alienation by which a right to property is conveyed. Bell, Dict.

DISPOSITIVE FACTS. Such as originate, transfer, or extinguish rights, known respectively as investitive, translative, and divestitive facts. These terms were coined by Bentham, and have not found their way into general use. Holland, Jur. 131.

DISPOSSESSION. Ouster; a wrong that carries with it the amotion of possession. An act whereby the wrongdoer gets the actual occupation of the land or hereditament. It includes abatement, intrusion, disseisin, discontinuance, deforcement. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 167.

DISPUTABLE PRESUMPTION. A presumption of law, which may be rebutted or disproved. Best, Pres. § 25; Burr. Circ. Ev. 47.

DISPUTATIO FORI (Lat.) Argument in court. Du Cange.

DISRATIONARE (Law Lat.; Law Fr. desreigner). In old English law. To prove; to deraign; to establish or make good a claim, charge, or accusation. Bracton, fol. 138. Spelman considers this as merely another form of dirationare, and makes its proper signification to be to disprove or refute, from dis, priv, and ratiocinari, to prove. It is, however, never employed in this sense by Bracton, who uses it frequently, but only in the sense first given. Bracton, fol. 138. See Id. fols. 101b, 119, 372b, 373b; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 31, § 6; Id. lib. 1, c. 21, § 2.

DISSASINA. In old Scotch law. Disseisin; dispossession. Skene de Verb. Sign.

DISSEISEE. One who is wrongfully put out of possession of his lands; one who is disseised.

DISSEISIN. A privation of seisin; a usurpation of the right of seisin and possession, and an exercise of such powers and privileges of ownership as to keep out or displace him to whom these rightfully belong. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 283.

The act of divesting the owner of his seisin and possession of the land, and substituting in its place the ownership and possession of the disseisor. The change in the meaning of the word, and the distinction between it and "deforcement," stated. 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 530, 552.

An actual and wrongful expulsion from a freehold. Dispossession may be by right or wrong. 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 197. And see 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 189, 194.

DISSEISINAM SATIS FACIT, QUI UTI non permittit possessorem, vel minus commode, licet omnino non expellat. He makes disseisin enough who does not permit the possessor to enjoy, or makes his enjoyment less commodious, although he does not expel altogether. Co. Litt. 331; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 2.

DISSEISOR. One who puts another out of the possession of his lands wrongfully.

DISSEISORESS (Law Lat. disseisitrix). A woman that disseises another person. Litt. § 678; Co. Litt. 357b.

DISSENT. A disagreement to something which has been done. It is express or implied.

DISSIGNARE. In old law. To break open a seal. Whishaw.

DISSIMILIUM DISSIMILIS EST RATIO. Of dissimilars the rule is dissimilar. Co. Litt. 191.

DISSIMULATIONE TOLLITUR INJURIA. Wrong is wiped out by reconciliation. Ersk. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 4, § 108.

DISSOLUTION.

——In Contracts. The dissolution of a contract is the annulling thereof by the contracting parties.

——Of Corporations. The termination of the corporate existence in any manner, whether by expiration of the charter, decree of court, act of the legislature, etc.

——In Practice. The act of rendering a legal proceeding null, or changing its character; as, a foreign attachment in Pennsylvania is dissolved by entering bail to the action; injunctions are dissolved by the court.

DISSUADE. In criminal law. To induce a person not to do an act.

To dissuade a witness from giving evidence against a person indicted is an indictable offense at common law. Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 21, § 15. The mere attempt to stifle evidence is also criminal, although the persuasion should not succeed, on the general principle that an incitement to commit a crime is in itself criminal. 1 Russ. Crimes, 44; 2 East, 5, 21; 6 East, 464; 2 Strange, 904; 2 Leach, C. C. 925.

DISTINCTE ET APERTE. In old English practice. Distinctly and openly. Formal words in writs of error, referring to the return required to be made to them. Reg. Orig. 17.

DISTINGUENDA SUNT TEMPORA. The time is to be considered. 1 Coke, 16a; 14 N. Y. 380, 393.

DISTINGUENDA SUNT TEMPORA; ALiud est facere, aliud perficere. Times must be distinguished; it is one thing to do a thing, another to complete it. 3 Leon. 243; Branch, Princ.

DISTINGUENDA SUNT TEMPORA; DISTingue tempora, et concordabis leges. Times are to be distinguished; distinguish times, and you will attune laws. 1 Coke, 24.

DISTRACTED PERSON. A term used in the statutes of Illinois (Rev. Laws Ill. 1833, p. 332) and New Hampshire (Dig. N. H. Laws 1830, p. 339) to express a state of insanity.

DISTRACTIO. In civil law. The sale of a pledge by a debtor; the appropriation of the property of a ward by a guardian. Calv. Lex.

DISTRAHERE. To withdraw; to sell. Distrahere controversias, to diminish and settle quarrels; distrahere matrimoniam, to dissolve marriage; to divorce. Calv. Lex.

DISTRAIN. To take as a pledge property of another, and keep the same until he performs his obligation, or until the property is replevied by the sheriff. It was used to secure an appearance in court, payment of rent, performance of services, etc. 3 Bl. Comm. 231; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 32 (B). (C), 223. See "Distress."

DISTRESS (Fr. distraindre, to draw away from). The taking of a personal chattel out of the possession of a wrongdoer into the custody of the party injured, to procure satisfaction for the wrong done. 3 Bl. Comm. 6. It is generally resorted to for the purpose of enforcing the payment of rent, taxes, or other duties, as well as to exact compensation for such damages as result from the trespasses of cattle.

This remedy is of great antiquity, and is said by Spelman to have prevailed among the Gothic nations of Europe from the breaking up of the Roman empire. The English statutes since the days of Magna Charta have, from time to time, extended and modified its features to meet the exigencies of the times.

It was at one time generally in vogue in the United States, but is now generally abolished, the remedy of attachment taking its place.

DISTRESS INFINITE. In English practice. A process commanding the sheriff to distrain a person from time to time, and continually afterwards, by taking his goods by way of pledge to enforce the performance of something due from the party distrained upon. In this case, no distress can be immoderate, because, whatever its value may be, it cannot be sold, but is to be immediately restored on satisfaction being made. 3 Bl. Comm. 231. It was the means anciently resorted to to compel an appearance. See "Attachment;" "Arrest."

DISTRIBUTEE. One entitled to take a share of the estate of a decedent under the statute of distribution.

DISTRIBUTION. In practice. The division by order of the court having authority, among those entitled thereto, of the residue of the personal estate of an intestate, after payment of the debts and charges.

The term sometimes denotes the division of a residue of both real and personal estate, and also the division of an estate according to the terms of a will.

DISTRIBUTIVE FINDING OF THE ISsue. The jury are bound to give their verdict for that party who, upon the evidence, appears to them to have succeeded in establishing his side of the issue. But there are cases in which an issue may be found distributively, i. e., in part for plaintiff, and in part for defendant. Thus, in an action for goods sold and work done, if the defendant pleaded that he never was indebted, on which issue was joined, a verdict might be found for the plaintiff as to the goods, and for the defendant as to the work. Steph. Pl. (7th Ed.) 77d.

DISTRICT. A certain portion of the country, separated from the rest for some special purposes.

The United States are divided into judicial districts, in each of which is established a district court, these districts being subdivisions of the circuits (q. v.) They are also divided into election districts, collection districts, etc.

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS OF THE UNITED STATES. Officers appointed in each judicial district, whose duty it is to prosecute, in such district, all delinquents, for crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions in which the United States shall be concerned, except in the supreme court, in the district in which the court shall be holden.

DISTRICT PARISHES. Ecclesiastical divisions of parishes in England, for all purposes of worship, and for the celebration of marriages, christenings, churchings, and burials, formed at the instance of the queen's commissioners for building new churches. See 3 Steph. Comm. 744.

DISTRICTIO. A distress; a distraint. Cowell.

DISTRINGAS. A writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him to distrain a person of his goods and chattels to enforce a compliance with what is required of him.

It is used to compel an appearance where the party cannot be found, and in equity may be availed of to compel the appearance of a corporation aggregate. 4 Bouv. Inst. note 4191; Comyn, Dig. "Process" (D 7); Chit. Prac.; Sellon, Prac.

A form of execution in the actions of detinue and assize of nuisance. Brooke, Abr. pl. 26; 1 Rawle (Pa.) 44.

DISTRINGAS JURATORES (Lat. that you distrain jurors). A writ commanding the sheriff to have the bodies of the jurors, or to distrain them by their lands and goods, that they may appear upon the day appointed. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 354. It issues at the same time with the venire, though in theory afterwards, founded on the supposed neglect of the juror to attend. 3 Steph. Comm. 590.

DISTRINGAS NUPER VICE COMITUM (Lat. that you distrain the late sheriff). A writ to distrain the goods of a sheriff who is out of office, to compel him to bring in the body of a defendant, or to sell goods attached under a fi. fa., which he ought to have done while in office, but has failed to do. 1 Tidd. Prac. 313.

DISTRINGAS VICE COMITEM. A writ of distringas, directed to the coroner, may be issued against a sheriff if he neglects to execute a writ of venditioni exponas. Archb. Prac. 584.

DISTRINGERE (Lat.) In feudal and old English law. To distrain; to coerce or compel; literally, to bond fast, or strain hard. Spelman; Calv. Lex. Nec villa nec homo distringatur facere pontes, nor shall a vill nor a man be distrained to make bridges. Magna Charta (9 Hen. III.) c. 15; Id. (Johan.) c. 23. Constringere is used in this sense in old writs. Spelman.

DISTURBANCE. A wrong done to an incorporeal hereditament by hindering or disquieting the owner in the enjoyment of it. Finch, Law, 187; 3 Bl. Comm. 235; 1 Swift, Dig. 522; Comyn, Dig. "Action upon the Case," "Pleader" (3 I 6); 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 298; 41 Me. 104. The remedy for a disturbance is an action on the case, or, in some instances in equity, by an injunction.

——Disturbance of Common. Any act done by which the right of another to his common is incommoded or hindered. The remedy is by distress (where beasts are put on his common), or by action on the case, provided the damages are large enough to admit of his laying an action with a per quod. Cro. Jac. 195; Co. Litt. 122; 3 Bl. Comm. 237; 1 Saund. 546; 4 Term R. 71.

——Disturbance of Franchise. Any acts done whereby the owner of a franchise has his property damnified, or the profits arising thence diminished. The remedy for such disturbance is a special action on the case. Cro. Eliz. 558; 2 Saund. 113b; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 236; 28 N. H. 438.

——Disturbance of Patronage. The hindrance or obstruction of the patron to present his clerk to a benefice. 3 Bl. Comm. 242. The principal remedy was a writ of right of advowson; and there were also writs of darrein presentment and of quare impedit. Coke, 2d Inst. 355; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 31.

——Disturbance of Tenure. Breaking the connection which subsists between lord and tenant. 3 Bl. Comm. 242; 2 Steph. Comm. 513.

——Disturbance of Ways. This happens where a person who hath a right of way over another's ground by grant or prescription is obstructed by inclosures or other obstacles, or by ploughing across it, by which means he cannot enjoy his right of way, or at least in so commodious a manner as he might have done. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 242; 5 Gray (Mass.) 409; 7 Md. 352; 23 Pa. St. 348; 29 Pa. St. 22.

DISTURBER. If a bishop refuse or neglect to examine or admit a patron's clerk, without reason assigned or notice given, he is styled a "disturber" by the law, and shall not have any title to present by lapse; for no man shall take advantage of his own wrong. 2 Bl. Comm. 278.

DITES OUSTER (Law Fr. say over). The form of awarding a respondeas ouster, in the Year Books. Y. B. M. 6 Edw. III. 49.

DITTAY. In Scotch law. A technical term in civil law, signifying the matter of charge or ground of indictment against a person accused of crime. Taking up dittay is obtaining informations and presentments of crime in order to trial. Skene de Verb. Sign.; Bell, Dict.

DIVERSITE DES COURTS. A treatise on courts and their jurisdiction, written in French in the reign of Edward III., as is supposed, and by some attributed to Fitzherbert. It was first printed in 1525, and again in 1534. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 330, 483; 3 Bl. Comm. 53; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 152; 3 Steph. Comm. 414.

DIVERSITY. A plea by a convict, in bar of execution; of "diversity of person," i. e., that he is not the same person who was attainted. 4 Bl. Comm. 396.

DIVERSO INTUITU (Lat.) With a different view, purpose, or design; in a different view or point of view; by a different course or process. 1 W. Bl. 89; Cas. temp. Hardw. 132; 9 East, 311; 4 Kent, Comm. 211, note; 1 Pet. (U. S.) 500; 2 Gall. (U. S.) 318; Story, Bailm. § 57. See "Alio Intuitu."

DIVERSORIUM. In old English law. A lodging or inn. Towns. Pl. 38.

DIVES. In the practice of the English chancery division, "dives costs" are costs on the ordinary scale, as opposed to the costs formerly allowed to a successful pauper suing or defending in forma pauperis, and which consisted only of his costs out of pocket. Daniell, Ch. Pr. 43; Cons. Ord. xl. 5.

DIVEST. See "Devest."

DIVESTITIVE FACT. One which puts an end to a right or status. Thus, the right of a creditor is at an end when his debt is paid. Bentham divides divestitive facts into destitutive, abolishing rights, and exonerative, extinguishing duties. See "Dispositive Facts."

DIVIDE ET IMPERA, CUM RADIX ET vertex imperii in obedientium consensu rata sunt. Divide and govern, since the foundation and crown of empire are established in the consent of the obedient. 4 Inst. 35.

DIVIDEND. A portion of the principal or profits divided among several owners of a thing.

The term is usually applied to the division of the profits arising out of bank or other stocks, or to the division among the creditors of the effects of an insolvent estate.

In another sense, according to some old authorities, it signifies one part of an indenture.

DIVIDENDA. In old records. An indenture; one counterpart of an indenture.

DIVINARE (Lat.) To divine; to conjecture or guess; to foretell. Divinatio, a conjecturing or guessing.

DIVINATIO NON INTERPRETATIO EST, quae omnino recedit a litera. It is a guess, not interpretation, which altogether departs from the letter. Bac. Max. reg. 3, p. 47.

DIVINE SERVICE. A species of feudal tenure, by which the tenant was required to say masses, to distribute such a sum in alms, or the like. It differed from frankalmoign in that, for breach of a duty of divine service, the lord could destrain without complaint to the visitor; the particular service being always expressly defined and prescribed. 2 Bl. Comm. 102.

DIVISA, or DEVISA (Law Lat. from Fr. diviser, to divide). In old English law. A division or partition; a division or distribution of goods by will; a will or testament of goods or chattels. Spelman; Cowell; Glanv. lib. 12, c. 20; Id. lib. 7, c. 5. Hence the modern "devise," now confined to mean a will or disposition of real estate by will. See "Devise."

A division or boundary between neighboring or adjoining lands (Law Fr. devise, q. v.), such as a highway, a wall, ditch, or stream, a stake or stone. Bracton, fol. 180b. As to streams, see Fleta, lib. 4, c. 6, § 3.

DIVISIBILIS EST SEMPER DIVISIBILIS. A thing divisible may be forever divided.

DIVISIBLE. That which is susceptible of being divided.

A contract cannot, in general, be divided in such a manner that an action may be brought, or a right accrue, on a part of it. 2 Pa. St. 454. But some contracts are susceptible of division; as when a reversioner sells a part of the reversion to one man, and a part to another, each shall have an action for his share of the rent which may accrue on a contract to pay a particular rent to the reversioner. 3 Whart. (Pa.) 404. See "Apportionment." But when it is to do several things at several times, an action will lie upon every default. 15 Pick. (Mass.) 409. See 1 Me. 316; 6 Mass. 344.

DIVISIM. In old English law. Severally; separately. Bracton, fol. 47.

DIVISION. In English law. A particular and ascertained part of a county. In Lincolnshire, "division" means what "riding" does in Yorkshire.

DIVISION OF OPINION. Disagreement among those called upon to decide a matter.

When, in a company or society, the parties having a right to vote are so divided that there is not a plurality of the whole in favor of any particular proposition, or when the voters are equally divided, it is said there is division of opinion. The term is especially applied to a disagreement among the judges of a court, such that no decision can be rendered upon the matter referred to them.

When the judges of a court are divided into three classes, each holding a different opinion, that class which has the greatest number shall give the judgment. For example, on a habeas corpus, when a court is composed of four judges, and one is for remanding the prisoner, another is for discharging him on his own recognizance, and the two others are for discharging him absolutely, the judgment will be that he be discharged. Bac. Abr. When a division of opinion exists in the United States circuit court, the cause may be certified to the supreme court for decision. Act Cong. April 29, 1802, § 6.

DIVISUM IMPERIUM (Lat.) A divided empire or jurisdiction; a jurisdiction shared between two tribunals, or exercised by them alternately. This classic phrase is frequently applied in the books to the jurisdiction alternately exercised by the courts of common law and admiralty, between high and low water mark, where the sea ebbs and flows; the one having jurisdiction upon the water when it is full sea, and the other upon the land when it is an ebb. Finch, Law, bk. 2, c. 1, p. 78; 5 Coke, 107; 1 Bl. Comm. 110; Molloy de Jur. Mar. 231; 1 Kent, Comm. 366. It is applied, also, to the jurisdiction exercised by courts of common law and equity over the same subject. 4 Steph. Comm. 9.

DIVORCE. The dissolution or partial suspension, by law, of the marriage relation.

The dissolution is termed "divorce from the bond of matrimony," or, in the Latin form of the expression, a vinculo matrimonii; the suspension, divorce from bed and board, a mensa et thoro. The former divorce puts an end to the marriage; the latter leaves it in full force. Bish. Mar. & Div. § 292. The term "divorce" is sometimes also applied to a sentence of nullity, which establishes that a supposed or pretended marriage either never existed at all, or at least was voidable at the election of one or both of the parties.

The more correct modern usage, however, confines the signification of divorce to the dissolution of a valid marriage. What has been known as a divorce a mensa et thoro may more properly be termed a legal separation. So, also, a sentence or decree which renders a marriage void ab initio, and bastardizes the issue, should be distinguished from one which is entirely prospective in its operation; and for that purpose the former may be termed a "sentence of nullity."

DIVORTIUM DICITUR A DIVERTENDO, quia vir divertitur ab uxore. Divorce is called from divertendo, because a man is diverted from his wife. Co. Litt. 235.

DIXIEME (Fr.) Tenth; the tenth part. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 1, art. 9.

——In Old French Law. An income tax payable to the crown. Steph. Lect. 359.

DO (Lat. I give). The ancient and aptest word of feoffment and of gift. 2 Bl. Comm. 310, 316; Co. Litt. 9.

DO, DICO, ADDICO (Lat. I give, I say, I adjudge). Three words used in the Roman law to express the extent of the civil jurisdiction of the praetor. Do denoted that he gave or granted actions, exceptions, and judices; dico, that he pronounced judgment; addico, that he adjudged the controverted property, or the goods of the debtor, etc., to the plaintiff. Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 187; Id. 24, § 35, note b; Calv. Lex.

DO, LEGO (Lat. I give, I bequeath; or, I give and bequeath). The formal words of making a bequest or legacy, in the Roman law. Titio et Seio hominem Stichum do, lego; I give and bequeath to Titius and Seius, my man Stichus. Inst. 2. 20. 8. 30. 31. The expression is literally retained in modern wills. According to Calvin, who quotes Spiegelius, either of these words separately imports as much as both together. Calv. Lex.; Tayl. Civ. Law, 240.

DO UT DES (Lat.) I give that you may give. Dig. 19. 4; Id. 19. 5. 5; 2 Bl. Comm. 444.

DO UT FACIAS (Lat. I give that you may do; I give [you] that you may do or make [for me]). A formula in the civil law, under which those contracts were classed, in which one party gave or agreed to give money, in consideration the other party did or performed certain work. Dig. 19. 5. 5; 2 Bl. Comm. 444. Do tibi codicem, ut facias mihi scribi disgestum, I give you a code, that you may have a digest written (or copied) for me. Bracton, fol. 19.

The particle ut, in this and the foregoing phrase, is considered as denoting or expressing a consideration; so much, that Blackstone has treated them as forms of consideration. 2 Bl. Comm. ubi supra. Strictly, however, ut denotes that the civilians called modus (qualification); quia being the particle employed to denote what they called causa, which is generally translated "consideration." Bracton, fol. 18b. See "Consideration;" "Causa." Britton calls these phrases or formulae, conditions, and repeats them after Bracton; but the passage in the original edition is much corrupted. Britt. c. 36.

DOCK. As a noun, the inclosed space occupied by prisoners in a criminal court; the space between two wharves.

As a verb, to curtail or diminish, as to dock an entail.

DOCK WARRANT. A document issued by a dock company or dock owner in England, stating that certain goods therein mentioned are deliverable to a person therein named, or to his assigns, by indorsement. Dock warrants in form resemble bills of lading (q. v.), but they differ from them in this, that, when goods are at sea, a purchaser who takes a bill of lading has done all that is possible to obtain possession of them, while a purchaser who takes a dock warrant can at any moment lodge it with the dock company, and so take actual or constructive possession of the goods. It therefore seems that the indorsement of a dock warrant does not, at common law, pass the ownership in the goods, or divest the vendor's lien if the goods have not been paid for, but merely operates as a constructive delivery of them as between the indorser and indorsee, until the dock company has "attorned" to the indorsee by agreeing to hold the goods for him. Benj. Sales, 573, 674; 3 C. P. Div. 373, 450. See "Delivery Order." Dock warrants, however, are included in the factors' acts among the "documents of title," the possession of which gives a factor power to confer a good title to the goods on persons dealing with him in good faith. Benj. Sales. 668. See "Factors' Acts."

DOCKAGE. The charge for use of a dock.

DOCKET. A formal record of judicial proceedings; a brief writing; a small piece of paper or parchment having the effect of a larger. Blount. An abstract. Cowell.

DOCKET, STRIKING A. In English bankruptcy practice. The filing of petition and bond to obtain the lord chancellor's fiat, allowing proceedings against an alleged bankrupt. Brown.

DOCTOR AND STUDENT. The title of a work written by St. Germain in the reign of Henry VIII., in which many principles of the common law are discussed in a popular manner. It is in the form of a dialogue between a doctor of divinity and a student in law, and has always been considered a book of merit and authority. 1 Kent, Comm. 504; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 482.

DOCTORS COMMONS. An institution near St. Paul's cathedral, where the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts are held.

DOCUMENTS. The deeds, agreements, title papers, letters, receipts, and other written instruments used to prove a fact.

——In Civil Law. Evidence delivered in the forms established by law, of whatever nature such evidence may be. The term is, however, applied principally to the testimony of witnesses. Savigny, Hist. Rom. Law, § 165.

DODRANS (Lat.) In Roman law. A subdivision of the as, containing nine unciae; the proportion of nine-twelfths, or three-fourths. 2 Bl. Comm. 462, note; Tayl. Civ. Law, 492.

DOE, JOHN. Originally the name of the fictitious plaintiff in the action of ejectment. Now used as a fictitious name to designate any party whose name is unknown.

DOED BANA (Saxon). The actual perpetrator of a homicide.

DOER. In Scotch law. An agent or attorney. 1 Kames, Eq. 325.

DOG-DRAW. In forest law. Drawing after, that is, pursuing, a deer with a dog. One of the circumstances which constituted what was called the manifest deprehension of an offender against venison in a forest; that is, his being caught in the act of committing the offense, or taken with the mainour, as it was otherwise called. Manw. For. Law, pt. 2, c. 8. See "Mainour."

DOGMA. In civil law. This word is used in the first chapter, first section, of the second Novel, and signifies an ordinance of the senate. See, also, Dig. 27. 1. 6.

DOITKIN, or DOIT. A foreign coin of small value, prohibited by St. 3 Hen. V. c. 1, from being introduced into England.

DOLE (Law Lat. dola; Saxon, doel; from doelan, to divide or distribute).

——In Old English Law. A part or portion. Spelman. Dole meadow was one in which several persons had a share. Cowell.

——In Scotch Law. Criminal intent; evil design. Bell, Dict. voc. "Crime."

DOLG (Saxon). A wound. Spelman.

DOLG BOTE. A recompense for a scar or wound. Cowell.

DOLI CAPAX. Capable of mischief; having knowledge of right and wrong. 4 Bl. Comm. 22, 23; 1 Hale, P. C. 26, 27.

DOLI INCAPAX (Lat.) Incapable of distinguishing good from evil. A child under fourteen is, prima facie, incapax doli, but may be shown to be capax doli. 3 Bl. Comm. 23.

DOLO. The Spanish form of dolus.

DOLOSUS VERSATUR IN GENERALIbus. A deceiver deals in generals. 2 Coke, 34; 2 Bulst. 226; Lofft, 782; 1 Rolle, Abr. 157; Wingate, Max. 636; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 264.

DOLUM EX INDICIIS PERSPICUIS PRObari convenit. Fraud should be proved by clear tokens. Code, 2. 21. 6; 1 Story, Cont. (4th Ed.) p. 602.

DOLUS (Lat.) In civil law. A fraudulent address or trick used to deceive some one; a fraud. Dig. 4. 3. 1. Any subtle contrivance by words or acts with a design to circumvent. 2 Kent, Comm. 560; Code, 2. 21.

Dolus differs from culpa in this, that the latter proceeds from an error of the understanding, while to constitute the former there must be a will or intention to do wrong. Wolff. Inst. § 17.

It seems doubtful, however, whether the general use of the word dolus in the civil law is not rather that of very great negligence, than of fraud, as used in the common law.

Such acts or omissions as operate as a deception upon the other party, or violate the just confidence reposed by him, whether there be a deceitful intent (malus animus) or not. Poth. du Depot, notes 23, 27; Story, Bailm. § 20a; 2 Kent, Comm. 506, note.

DOLUS AUCTORIS NON NOCET SUCcessori. The fraud of a predecessor does not prejudice the successor.

DOLUS CIRCUITU NON PURGATOR. Fraud is not purged by circuity. Bac. Max. reg. 1; Noy, Max. 9, 12; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 210.

DOLUS DANS LOCUM CONTRACTUI. Fraud or deceit giving occasion for the contract. This phrase is applied to a false representation, when it is such as to induce the contract. The phrase is commonly used in expressing the rule that a contract is not voidable for misrepresentations unless the representation was dans locum contractui, i. e., unless it induced the misled party to enter into the contract. Therefore, if the person to whom the false representations were made did not rely on it, but made further inquiries, he could not afterwards make use of it to avoid the contract. 6 Clark & F. 444.

DOLUS EST MACHINATIO, CUM ALIUD dissimulat aliud agit. Deceit is an artifice, since it pretends one thing and does another. Lane, 47.

DOLUS ET FRAUS NEMINI PATROCINentur; patrocinari debent. Deceit and fraud shall excuse or benefit no man; they themselves need to be excused. Y. B. 14 Hen. VIII. 8; Story, Eq. Jur. § 395; 3 Coke, 78; 2 Fonbl. Eq. bk. 2, c. 6, § 3.

Dominium non potest esse in pendenti, the right of property cannot be in abeyance. Halk. Max. 39.

DOLUS MALUS (Lat. fraud; deceit with an evil intention). Distinguished from dolus bonus, justifiable or allowable deceit. Calv. Lex.; Broom, Leg. Max. 349; 1 Kaufm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, 165. Misconduct. Magna negligentia culpa est; magna culpa dolus est, great negligence is a fault; a great fault is fraud. 2 Kent, Comm. 560, note.

DOM. PROC. (domus procerum). The house of lords. Wharton.

DOMAIN. Dominion; territory governed; possession; estate; land about the mansion-house of a lord; the right to dispose at our pleasure of what belongs to us.

A distinction has been made between "property" and "domain." The former is said to be that quality which is conceived to be in the thing itself, considered as belonging to such or such person, exclusively of all others. By the latter is understood that right which the owner has of disposing of the thing. Hence, domain and property are said to be correlative terms; the one is the active right to dispose of, the other a passive quality which follows the thing, and places it at the disposition of the owner. 3 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 83. But this distinction is too subtle for practical use. Puffendorff, Law Nat. lib. 4, c. 4, § 2. See 1 Bl. Comm. 105, 106; 1 Bouv. Inst. note 456; Clef des Lois Rom.; Domat, Civ. Law; 1 Hilliard, Real Prop. 24; 2 Hill, Abr. 237.

DOMBOC, or DOMBEC (Saxon). The name of codes of laws among the Saxons. Of these, King Alfred's was the most famous. 1 Bl. Comm. 46; 4 Bl. Comm. 411.

The Domboc of King Alfred is not to be confounded with the Domesday Book of William the Conqueror.

DOME (Saxon). Doom; sentence; judgment; an oath; the homager's oath in the Black Book of Hereford. Blount.

DOME BOOK. A book or code said to have been compiled under the direction of Alfred, for the general use of the whole kingdom of England; containing, as is supposed, the principal maxims of the common law, the penalties for misdemeanors, and the forms of judicial proceedings. It is said to have been extant so late as the reign of Edward IV., but is now lost. 1 Bl. Comm. 64, 65.

This is stated by Blackstone on the authority of the early English historians, but Mr. Hallam considers the authority insufficient. 2 Hallam, Mid. Ages, 402.

DOMESDAY, or DOMESDAY BOOK (Saxon). An ancient record made in the time of William the Conqueror, and now remaining in the English exchequer, consisting of two volumes of unequal size, containing minute and accurate surveys of the lands in England. It has been printed, also. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 49, 50.

A variety of ingenious accounts are given of the origin of this term by the old writers. The commoner opinion seems to be that it was so called from the fullness and completeness of the survey making it a day of judgment for the value, extent, and qualities of every piece of land. See Spelman; Blount; Termes de la Ley.

It was practically a careful census taken and recorded in the exchequer of the kingdom of England.

DOMESMEN (Saxon). An inferior kind of judges; men appointed to doom (judge) in matters in controversy. Cowell. Suitors in a court of a manor in ancient demesne, who are judges there. Blount; Whishaw; Termes de la Ley.

DOMESTIC. A servant residing with a family. 41 Tex. 558.

Pertaining to a domicile or family.

DOMESTIC ADMINISTRATION. See "Administration" (11).

DOMESTIC ATTACHMENT. A species of attachment against resident debtors who absent or conceal themselves, as foreign attachment (q. v.) is against nonresidents. 20 Pa. St. 144; 2 Kent, Comm. 403.

DOMESTIC BILL OF EXCHANGE. A bill of exchange drawn on a person residing in the same state with the drawer; or dated at a place in the state, and drawn on a person living within the state. 25 Miss. 143. It is the residence of the drawer and drawee which must determine whether a bill is domestic or foreign. Id.

DOMESTIC CORPORATIONS. Corporations transacting business in the state by which they are created.

DOMESTICS. Those who reside in the same house with the master they serve. The term does not extend to workmen or laborers employed out of doors. 5 Bin. (Pa.) 167; Merlin, Repert. The act of Congress of April 30, 1790 (section 25), uses the word "domestic" in this sense.

DOMESTICUS. In old European law. A seneschal, steward, or major domo; a judge's assistant; an assessor (q. v.) Spelman.

DOMICELLA. In old English law. A damsel. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 20, § 80.

DOMICELLUS (Law Lat. dim. of dominus). In old European law. A young lord; a title anciently given to the king's natural sons in France, and sometimes to the eldest sons of noblemen there. Spelman; Blount. Spelman says it answered to the Saxon "adeling," "aetheling."

DOMICILE. That place where a man has his true, fixed and permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning. Lieber, Enc. Am.; 10 Mass. 188; 11 La. 175; 5 Metc. (Mass.) 187; 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 505; 9 Ired. (N. C.) 99; 1 Tex. 673; 13 Me. 255; 27 Miss. 704; 1 Bosw. (N. Y.) 673; 74 Ill. 312.

The place in which one's habitation is fixed, without any present intention of removing therefrom. Story, Confl. Laws, § 43.

It is a more extensive term than "residence" or "habitation," not only residence, but intent to remain, being essential to domicile (4 Hun [N. Y.] 487; 4 Humph. [Tenn.] 346), though they have been considered convertible for certain purposes (17 Pick. [Mass.] 291).

Domicile may be either national or domestic. In deciding the question of national domicile, the point to be determined will be in which of two or more distinct nationalities a man has his domicile. In deciding the matter of domestic domicile, the question is in which subdivision of the nation does the person have his domicile. Thus, whether a person is domiciled in England or France would be a question of national domicile, whether in Norfolk or Suffolk county, a question of domestic domicile. The distinction is to be kept in mind, since the rules for determining the two domiciles, though frequently, are not necessarily, the same. See 2 Kent, Comm. 449; Story, Confl. Laws, § 39 et seq.; Westl. Priv. Int. Law, 15; Wheat. Int. Law, 123 et seq.

The Romanists and civilians seem to attach about equal importance to the place of business and of residence as fixing the place of domicile. Story, Confl. Laws, § 42. This may go far towards reconciling the discrepancies of the common law and civil law as to what law is to govern in regard to contracts. But at common law the main question in deciding where a person has his domicile is to decide where he has his home, and where he exercises his political rights.

Legal residence, inhabitancy, and domicile are generally used as synonymous. 1 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 70; 1 Har. (Del.) 383; 1 Spencer (N. J.) 328; 2 Rich. (S. C.) 489; 10 N. H. 452; 3 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 555; 15 Mees. & W. 433; 23 Pick. (Mass.) 170; 5 Metc. (Mass.) 298; 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 505; 7 Gray (Mass.) 299. But much depends on the connection and purpose. 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 43; 5 Pick. (Mass.) 231; 17 Pick. (Mass.) 231; 15 Me. 58.

Commercial domicile is a domicile acquired by maintenance of a commercial establishment in a country, in relation to transactions connected with such establishments. 1 Kent, Comm. 82; 2 Kent, Comm. 11, 12.

DOMICILIATE. To fix or establish a domicile.

DOMIGERIUM. Power over another; also danger. Bracton, lib. 4, tit. 1, c. 10.

DOMINA. A title given to honorable women, who anciently, in their own right of inheritance, held a barony. Cowell.

DOMINANT. That to which a servitude or easement is due, or for the benefit of which it exists. Distinguished from "servient," that from which it is due. See "Easement."

DOMINANT TENEMENT. In civil and Scotch law. A term used in the constitution of servitudes, meaning the tenement or subject in favor of which the servitude is constituted. Bell, Dict.

DOMINATIO. In old English law. Lordship. Mem. in Scacc. H. 22 Edw. I.

DOMINICIDE. The act of killing one's lord or master.

DOMINICUM (Lat. domain; demain; demesne). A lordship; that of which one has the lordship or ownership; that which remains under the lord's immediate charge and control.

In this sense it is equivalent to the Saxon bordlands. Spelman; Blount. In regard to lands for which the lord received services and homage merely, the dominicum was in the tenant.

Property; domain; anything pertaining to a lord. Cowell.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. A church, or any other building consecrated to God. Du Cange.

DOMINICUM ANTIQUUM. In old English law. Ancient demesne. Bracton, fol. 369b.

DOMINIUM (Lat.) Perfect and complete property or ownership in a thing.

Plenum in re dominium,—plena in re potestas. This right is composed of three principal elements, viz., the right to use, the right to enjoy, and the right to dispose of the thing, to the exclusion of every other person. To use a thing, jus utendi tantum, consists in employing it for the purposes for which it is fit, without destroying it, and which employment can therefore be repeated; to enjoy a thing, jus fruendi tantum, consists in receiving the fruits which it yields, whether natural or civil, quidquid ex re nascitur; to dispose of a thing, jus abutendi, is to destroy it, or to transfer it to another. Thus, he who has the use of a horse may ride him, or put him in the plough to cultivate his own soil; but he has no right to hire the horse to another, and receive the civil fruits which he may produce in that way. On the other hand, he who has the enjoyment of a thing is entitled to receive all the profits or revenues which may be derived from it, either from natural or civil fruits. And, lastly, he who has the right of disposing of a thing, jus abutendi, may sell it, or give it away, etc., subject, however, to the rights of the usuary or usufructuary, as the case may be.

These three elements, usus, fructus, abusus, when united in the same person, constitute the dominium; but they may be, and frequently are, separated, so that the right of disposing of a thing may belong to Pri- mus, and the rights of using and enjoying to Secundus, or the right of enjoying alone may belong to Secundus, and the right of using to Tertius. In that case, Primus is always the owner of the thing, but he is the naked owner, inasmuch as for a certain time he is actually deprived of all the principal advantages that can be derived from it. Secundus, if he has the use and enjoyment, jus utendi et fruendi simul, is called the "usufructuary," usus-fructuarius; if he has the enjoyment only, jus fruendi tantum, he is the fructuarius. And Tertius, who has the right of use, jus utendi tantum, is called the usuary,—usuarius. But this dismemberment of the elements of the dominium is essentially temporary. If no shorter period has been fixed for its duration, it terminates with the life of the usuary, fructuary, or usufructuary, for which reason the rights of use and usufruct are called "personal servitudes." Besides the separation of the elements of the dominium among different persons, there may also be a jus in re, or dismemberment, so far as real estates are concerned, in favor of other estates. Thus, a right of way over my land may exist in favor of your house. This right is so completely attached to the house that it can never be separated from it, except by its entire extinction. This class of jura in re is called "predial" or "real" servitudes. To constitute this servitude, there must be two estates belonging to different owners. These estates are viewed in some measure as juridical persons, capable of acquiring rights and incurring obligations. The estate in favor of which the servitude exists is the creditor estate, and the estate by which the servitude is due, the debtor estate. 2 Mariade, 343 et seq.

DOMINIUM DIRECTUM (Lat. legal ownership.

——In the Civil Law. Ownership, as distinguished from enjoyment.

——In the Feudal Law. The right of the lord.

DOMINIUM DIRECTUM ET UTILE (Lat.) Full ownership and possession united in one person.

DOMINIUM EMINENS. Eminent domain. Tayl. Civ. Law, 463.

DOMINIUM NON POTEST ESSE IN PENdenti. Lordship cannot be in suspense, i. e., property cannot remain in abeyance. Halk. Max. 39.

DOMINIUM PLENUM. Full ownership; the union of the dominium directum with the dominium utile. Tayl. Civ. Law, 478.

DOMINIUM UTILE (Lat.) The beneficial ownership; the use of the property.

DOMINO VOLENTE (Lat.) With the owner's consent.

DOMINUS (Lat.) The lord or master; the owner. Ainsworth. The owner or proprietor of a thing, as distinguished from him who uses it merely. Calv. Lex. A master or principal, as distinguished from an agent or attorney. Story, Ag. § 3; Ferriere.

——In Civil Law. A husband; a family. Vicat.

DOMINUS LITIS (Lat.) The master of a suit; the client, as distinguished from an attorney. And yet it is said, although he who has appointed an attorney is properly called dominus litis, the attorney himself, when the cause has been tried, becomes the dominus litis. Vicat.

DOMINUS NAVIS. In the civil law. The owner of a vessel. Dig. 39. 4. 11. 2.

DOMINUS NON MARITABIT PUPILLUM nisi semel. A lord cannot give a ward in marriage but once. Co. Litt. 9.

DOMINUS REX NULLUM HABERE POtest parem, multo minus superiorem. The king cannot have an equal, much less a superior. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 115.

DOMITAE (Lat.) Tame; subdued; not wild.

DOMO REPARANDA. A writ that lay for one against his neighbor, by the anticipated fall of whose house he feared a damage and injury to his own. Reg. Orig. 153; Termes de la Ley.

DOMUS (Lat.) In the civil and old English law. A house or dwelling; a habitation. Inst. 4. 4. 8; Towns. Pl. 183-185.

Held synonymous with "messuage." Cro. Jac. 634.

DOMUS CAPITULARIS. In old records. A chapter house; the chapter house. Dyer, 26b.

DOMUS CONVERSORUM (Law Lat. the house of the converts). An ancient house or institution (Spelman calls it collegium) established by Henry III. for the benefit of such Jews as were converted to the Christian faith. This continued to the reign of Edward III., who, having expelled the Jews from the kingdom, converted the building into a place for keeping the rolls and records of the chancery. Spelman; Cowell, voc. "Rolls." It is now called the "Rolls' Office in Chancery Lane," though in Latin the old name is sometimes retained. Id. voc. "Master of the Rolls."

DOMUS DEI. The house of God; applied to many hospitals and religious houses.

DOMUS PROCERUM. The house of lords; abbreviated into Dom. Proc., or D. P.

DOMUS SUA CUIQUE EST TUTISSImum refugium. Every man's house is his castle. 5 Coke, 91, 92; Dig. 2. 14. 18; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 384; 1 Hale, P. C. 481; Fost. Hom. 320; 8 Q. B. 757; 16 Q. B. 546, 556; 19 How. St. Tr. 1030. See "Arrest."

DOMUS TUTISSIMUM CUIQUE REFUGium atque receptaculum. The habitation of each one is an inviolable asylum for him. Dig. 2. 4. 18.

DONA CLANDESTINA SUNT SEMPER suspiciosa. Clandestine gifts are always suspicious. 3 Coke, 81; Noy, Max. (9th Ed.) 152; 4 Barn. & C. 652; 1 Maule & S. 253; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 264.

DONARI VIDETUR QUOD, NULLI JURE cogente conceditur. That is considered to be given which is granted when no law compels. Dig. 50. 17. 82.

DONATARIUS (Law Lat.) One to whom something is given; a donee.

DONATIO (Lat. a gift). A transfer of the title to property to one who receives it without paying for it. Vicat. The act by which the owner of a thing voluntarily transfers the title and possession of the same from himself to another person, without any consideration.

Its literal translation, gift, has acquired in real law a more limited meaning, being applied to the conveyance of estates tail. 2 Bl. Comm. 316; Litt. § 59; West, Symb. § 254; 4 Cruise, Dig. 51. There are several kinds of donatio,—as donatio simplex et pura, simple and pure gift, without compulsion or consideration; donatio absoluta et larga, an absolute gift; donatio conditionalis, a conditional gift; donatio stricta et coarctura, a restricted gift, as an estate tail.

——Donatio Inter Vivos. A gift between living persons. A contract which takes place by the mutual consent of the giver, who divests himself of the thing given in order to transmit the title of it to the donee gratuitously, and the donee, who accepts and acquires the legal title to it. This donation takes place when the given is not in any immediate apprehension of death, which distinguishes it from a donatio mortis causa. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 712. See, also, Civ. Code La. art. 1453; Inst. 2. 7. 2; Cooper, Inst. notes 474, 475; U. S. Dig. tit. "Gift."

——Donatio Mortis Causa. A gift in prospect of death. A gift made by a person in sickness, who, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers, or causes to be delivered, to another, the possession of any personal goods, to keep as his own in case of the donor's decease. 2 Bl. Comm. 514. See Civ. Code La. art. 1455.

The civil law defines it to be a gift under apprehension of death; as when anything is given upon condition that, if the donor dies, the donee shall possess it absolutely, or return it if the donor should survive, or should repent of having made the gift, or if the donee should die before the donor. 1 Miles (Pa.) 109-117.

It differs from a legacy, inasmuch as it does not require proof in the court of probate (2 Strange, 777. See 1 Bligh [N. S.] 531), and no assent is required from the executor to perfect the donee's title (2 Ves. Jr. 120; 1 Sim. & S. 245). It differs from a gift inter vivos because it is ambulatory and revocable during the donor's life, because it may be made to the wife of the donor, and because it is liable for his debts.

DONATIO NON PRAESUMITUR. A gift is not presumed. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 109.

DONATIO PERFICITUR POSSESSIONE accipientis. A gift is rendered complete by the possession of the receiver. See 1 Bouv. Inst. note 712; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 52; 2 Leigh (Va.) 337; 2 Kent, Comm. 438.

DONATIO PROPTER NUPTIAS (Lat. gift on account of marriage). In Roman law. A gift made by the husband as a security for the marriage portion. The effect of the act of giving such a gift was different according to the relation of the parties at the time of making the gift. Vicat. Called, also, a "mutual gift."

The name was originally applied to a gift made before marriage, and was then called a donatio ante nuptias; but in process of time it was allowed to be made after marriage as well, and was then called a donatio propter nuptias.

DONATION. In ecclesiastical law. A mode of acquiring a benefice by deed of gift alone, without presentation, institution, or induction. 3 Steph. Comm. 81.

DONATIONUM ALIA PERFECTA, ALIA incepta, et non perfecta; ut si donatio lecta fuit et concessa, ac traditio nondum fuerit subsecuta. Some gifts are perfect, others incipient and not perfect; as, if a gift were read and agreed to, but delivery had not then followed. Co. Litt. 56.

DONATIVE ADVOWSON. In ecclesiastical law. A species of advowson, where the benefice is conferred on the clerk by the patron's deed of donation, without presentation, institution, or induction. 2 Bl. Comm. 23; Fermes de la Ley.

DONATOR (Lat. from donare; Law Fr. donour). In civil and old English law. A donor or giver; the party who makes a donatio, or gift. Bracton, fol. 11 et seq.; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 7, § 4.

Donatorius (properly, dondtarius). A donee; a person to whom a gift is made; a purchaser. Bracton, fol. 13 et seq.; Fleta, ubi supra.

DONATOR NUNQUAM DESINIT POSSIdere antequam donatarius incipiat possidere. He that gives never ceases to possess until he that receives begins to possess. Dyer, 281; Bracton, 41b.

DONATORIUS. A donee; a person to whom a gift is made; a purchaser. Bracton, fol. 13 et seq.; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 7, § 4.

DONATORY. The person on whom the king bestows his right to any forfeiture that has fallen to the crown.

DONEE. He to whom a gift is made or a bequest given; one who is invested with a power of appointment. He is sometimes called an "appointee." 4 Kent, Comm. 316; 4 Cruise, Dig. 51.

DONIS, STATUTE DE. The statute of Westminster II. 2, namely, 13 Edw. I. c. 1, called the statute de donis conditionalibus. This statute revives, in some sort, the ancient feudal restraints which were originally laid on alienations. Its effect, by making a limitation in tail inalienable, was to defeat the former rule of construction by which a limitation to one and particular heirs was held to impose a condition which was fulfilled by the birth of such heirs, so that the fee conditional (fee tail) became a fee simple. Such estates were afterwards called "estates tail." See "Estates;" "Tail." 2 Bl. Comm. 110-113.

DONOR (from Law Fr. donour; Lat. donator).

——In Old English Law. He by whom lands were given to another; the party making a donatio (q. v.) See "Donator."

——In Later Law. He who gives lands or tenements to another in tail. Litt. § 57; Termes de la Ley.

——In Modern Law. He who makes a gift. See, also, "Power."

DONUM (Lat.) A gift.

The difference between donum and numus is said to be that donum is more general, while numus is specific. Numus is said to mean donum with a cause for the giving, though not a legal consideration, as on account of marriage, etc. Donum is said to be that which is given from no necessity of law or duty, but from free will, "from the absence of which, if they are not given, no blame arises, but, if they are given, praise is due." Vicat; Calv. Lex.

DOOM, or DOME. In Scotch practice. Judgment; sentence. The judgment of a court, formerly pronounced by the mouth of an officer called a dempster (q. v.), and ending with the words, "And this I give (or pronounce) for doom." The term is still retained; sentences in criminal cases ending with the words, "Which is pronounced for doom." See 2 Brown, 128.

DORMANT. Sleeping; silent; not known; not acting.

——Dormant Execution. One which a creditor delivers to the sheriff, with directions to levy only, and not to sell, until further orders, or until a junior execution is received.

——Dormant Judgment. One upon which no execution is issued until the time limited for issuing execution, as of course, has run out.

——Dormant Partners. A dormant partner is one whose name is not known, or does not appear as partner, but who nevertheless is a silent partner, and partakes of the profits, and thereby becomes a partner, either absolutely, to all intents and purposes, or at all events, in respect to third persons. According to Mr. Justice Story, dormant partners, in strictness of language, mean those who are merely passive in the firm, whether known or unknown, in contradistinction to those who are active and conduct the business of the firm as principals. Story, Partn. § 80.

DORMIUNT ALIQUANDO LEGES, NUNquam moriuntur. The laws sometimes sleep, but never die. Inst. 161.

DORSUM (Lat. the back). In dorso recordi, on the back of the record. 5 Coke, 44b.

DORTURE. A dormitory of a convent; a place to sleep in.

DOS (Lat.)

——In Roman Law. That which is received by or promised to the husband from the wife, or any one else by her influence, for sustaining the burdens of matrimony. There are three classes of dos. Dos profectitia is that which is given by the father or any male relative from his property or by his act. Dos adventitia is that which is given by any other person or from the property of the wife herself. Dos receptitia is where there is a stipulation connected with the gift relating to the death of the wife. Vicat; Calv. Lex.; Du Cange; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 147.

——In English Law. The portion bestowed upon a wife at her marriage by her husband. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 100; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 147; 1 Cruise, Dig. 152.

Dower generally. The portion which a widow has in the estate of her husband after his death. Park, Dower.

This use of the word in the English law, though, as Spelman shows, not strictly correct, has still the authority of Tacitus (de Mor. Germ. 18) for its use. And if the general meaning of marriage portion is given to it, it is strictly as applicable to a gift from the husband to the wife as to one from the wife to the husband. It occurs often in the phrase dos de dote peti non debet, dower should not be sought of dower. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 209.

DOS DE DOTE PETI NON DEBET. Dower ought not to be sought from dower. 4 Coke, 122; Co. Litt. 31; 4 Dane, Abr. 671; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 209.

DOS RATIONABILIS (Lat. a reasonable marriage portion). A reasonable part of her husband's estate, to which every widow is entitled, of lands of which her husband may have endowed her on the day of marriage. Co. Litt. 336. Dower, at common law. 2 Bl. Comm. 234.

DOS RATIONABILIS VEL LEGITIMA est cujuslibet mulieris de quocunque tenemento tertia pars omnium terrarum et tenementorum, quae vir suus tenuit in dominio suo ut de feodo, etc. Reasonable or legitimate dower belongs to every woman of a third part of all the lands and tenements of which her husband was seised in his demesne, as of fee, etc. Co. Litt. 336.

DOT. A French word adopted in Louisiana. The fortune, portion, or dowry which a woman brings to her husband by the marriage. 6 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 460.

DOTAGE. Dotage is that feebleness of the mental faculties which proceeds from old age. It is a diminution or decay of that intellectual power which was once possessed. It is the slow approach of death; of that irrevocable cessation, without hurt or disease, of all the functions which once belonged to the living animal. 1 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 389.

DOTAL PROPERTY. By the civil law in Louisiana, by this term is understood that property which the wife brings to the husband to assist him in bearing the expenses of the marriage establishment. Civ. Code La. art. 2315.

DOTALITIUM. In canon and feudal law. Dower. Spelman, voc. "Doarium;" Calv. Lex.; 2 Bl. Comm. 129. Used as early as A. D. 841.

DOTATION. In French law. The act by which the founder of a hospital, or other charity, endows it with property to fulfill its destination.

DOTE. In Spanish law. The property and effects which a woman brings to her husband for the purpose of aiding him, with the rents and revenues thereof, to support the expenses of the marriage. Las Partidas, 4. 11. 1. "Dos," says Cajas, "est pecunia marito, nuptiarum causa, data vel promissa." The dower of the wife is inalienable, except in certain specified cases, for which see Escriche, Dic. Raz.

DOTE ASSIGNANDO. In English law. A writ which lay in favor of a widow, when it was found by office that the king's tenant was seised of tenements in fee or fee tail at the time of his death, and that he held of the king in chief.

DOTE UNDE NIHIL HABET. Dower unde nihil habet (q. v.)

DOTI LEX FAVET; PROEMIUM PUDORis est, ideo parcatur. The law favors dower; it is the reward of chastity, therefore let it be preserved. Co. Litt. 31; Branch, Princ.

DOTIS ADMINISTRATIO. Admeasurement of dower, where the widow holds more than her share, etc.

DOTISSA. A dowager.

DOUBLE AVAIL OF MARRIAGE. In Scotch law. Double the ordinary or single value of a marriage. Bell, Dict. See "Duplex Valor Maritagii."

DOUBLE BOND. In Scotch law. A bond with a penalty, as distinguished from a single bond. 2 Kames, Eq. 359.

DOUBLE COMPLAINT, or DOUBLE quarrel. A grievance made known by a clerk or other person, to the archbishop of the province, against the ordinary, for delaying or refusing to do justice in some cause ecclesiastical, as to give sentence, institute a clerk, etc. It is termed a "double complaint," because it is most commonly made against both the judge and him at whose suit justice is denied or delayed; the effect whereof is that the archbishop, taking notice of the delay, directs his letters, under his authentical seal, to all clerks of his province, commanding them to admonish the ordinary, within a certain number of days, to do the justice required, or otherwise to appear before him or his official, and there allege the cause of his delay; and to signify to the ordinary that if he neither perform the thing enjoined, nor appear nor show cause against it, he himself, in his court of audience, will forthwith proceed to do the justice that is due. Cowell.

DOUBLE (or TREBLE) COSTS. In England and some of the United States, ordinary costs, and fifty per cent. thereof in addition. 22 Mich. 5; 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 443. In other states, twice the ordinary costs. 16 Pa. St. 254; 34 N. J. Law, 145. Treble costs is either full costs, and seventy-five per cent. additional, or three times the ordinary costs, in different states.

DOUBLE (or TREBLE) DAMAGES. In some cases it is provided by statute that a party may recover double or treble damages. In these cases the jury find such damages as they think proper, and the court enhances them in the judgment. Brooke, Abr. "Damages," pl. 70; 2 Inst. 416; 1 Wils. 126; 1 Mass. 155. The damages are actually doubled or trebled, as the case may be; not assessed, like double or treble costs.

DOUBLE FINE. In old English law. A fine sur done grant et render was called a "double fine," because it comprehended the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., and the fine sur concessit. 2 Bl. Comm. 353.

DOUBLE INSURANCE. Is where divers insurances are made upon the same interest in the same subject against the same risks in favor of the same assured, in proportions exceeding the value. 1 Phil. Ins. §§ 359, 366.

DOUBLE PLEA. The alleging, for one single purpose, two or more distinct grounds of defense, when one of them would be as effectual in law as both or all. See "Duplicity."

DOUBLE POSSIBILITY. A possibility based or dependent on another possibility. Used ordinarily in respect to the creation of contingent trusts and remainders. Thus, a bequest to testator's unborn "child" is valid, resting on a single possibility; while one to his unborn "son" is invalid, the possibility being double.

DOUBLE RENT. Required, by St. 11 Geo. II. c. 19, as a penalty of a tenant holding over after notice to quit. Wharton.

DOUBLE VOUCHER. A voucher which occurs when the person first vouched to warranty comes in and vouches over a third person. See a precedent, 2 Bl. Comm. Appendix V. p. xvii.

The necessity for double voucher arises when the tenant in tail is not the tenant in the writ, but is tenant by warranty; that is, where he is vouched, and comes in and confesses the warranty. Generally speaking, to accomplish this result a previous conveyance is necessary, by the tenant in tail, to a third person, in order to make such third person tenant to a writ of entry. Prest. Conv. 125, 126.

DOUBLE WASTE. When a tenant bound to repair suffers a house to be wasted, and then unlawfully fells timber to repair it, he is said to commit double waste. Co. Litt. 53. See "Waste."

DOUBT. The uncertainty which exists in relation to a fact, a proposition, or other thing; an equipoise of the mind arising from an equality of contrary reasons. Ayliffe, Pand. 121. See "Reasonable Doubt."

DOUN, DON, or DONE (Law Fr.) A gift. The thirty-fourth chapter of Britton is entitled "De Douns."

DOWABLE. Entitled to dower.

DOWAGER. A widow endowed; one who has a jointure.

——In England. A title or addition given to the widows of princes, dukes, earls, and other noblemen, to distinguish them from the wives of the heir, who have a right to bear the title.

DOWAGER QUEEN. The widow of the king. As such she enjoys most of the privileges belonging to her as queen consort. It is not treason to conspire her death or violate her chastity, because the succession to the crown is not thereby endangered. No man, however, can marry her without a special license from the sovereign, on pain of forfeiting his lands or goods. 1 Bl. Comm. 233.

DOWER (Fr. douer, to endow). The provision which the law makes for a widow out of the lands or tenements of her husband, for her support and the nurture of her children. Co. Litt. 30a; 2 Bl. Comm. 130; 4 Kent. Comm. 35; Washb. Real Prop. 146.

The word "dower" has reference to real estate only. 36 Me. 216.

It has three stages: (1) Inchoate, from marriage to the death of the husband; (2) consummate, from the death of the husband to admeasurement; and (3) assigned from the time when it is set off to the widow. Stew. Husb. & Wife, §§ 262-264.

There were five species of dower in England:

(1) Dower by custom, where a widow became entitled to a specified portion of her husband's lands in consequence of some local or particular custom.

(2) Dower ad ostium ecclesiae, where a man of full age, on coming to the church door to be married, endowed his wife of a certain portion of his lands.

(3) Dower ex assensu fratris, which differed from dower ad ostium ecclesiae only in being made out of the lands of the husband's father, and with his consent.

(4) Dower de la plus belle, where the widow, on suing the guardian in chivalry for dower, was required by him to endow herself of the fairest portion of any lands she might hold as guardian in socage, and thus release from dower the lands of her husband held in chivalry. This was abolished along with the military tenures, of which it was a consequence. 2 Bl. Comm. 132, note.

(5) Dower by common law, where the widow was entitled during her life to a third part of all the lands and tenements in fee simple or fee tail of which her husband was seised at any time during the coverture, and of which any issue she might have had might by possibility have been heir.

Since the passage of the dower act in England (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105), all these species of dower, except that by custom and by the common law, have ceased to exist. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 135, note. Dower in the United States, although regulated by statutes differing from each other in many respects, conforms substantially to that at the common law. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 149.

DOWER UNDE NIHIL HABET. A writ which lay for a widow to obtain an assignment of dower.

DOWLE STONES. Stones dividing lands, etc. Cowell.

DOWMENT. In old English law. Endowment; dower.

DOWRESS. A woman entitled to dower. See "Dower."

DOWRY. Formerly applied to mean that which a woman brings to her husband in marriage. This is now called a "portion." This word is sometimes confounded with "dower." See Co. Litt. 31; Civ. Code La. art. 2317; Dig. 23. 3. 76; Code, 5. 12. 20.

DOZEIN (Law Fr. twelve). A person twelve years of age. St. 18 Edw. II.; Barr. Obs. St. 208.

DOZEN PEERS. Twelve peers assembled at the instance of the barons, in the reign of Henry III., to be privy counsellors, or rather conservators of the kingdom. Wharton.

DRACO REGIS. The standard, ensign, or military colors borne in war by the ancient kings of England, having the figure of a dragon painted thereon.

DRACONIAN LAWS. A code of laws prepared by Draco, the celebrated lawgiver of Athens. These laws were exceedingly severe, and the term is now sometimes applied to any laws of unusual harshness.

DRAFT. The common term for a bill of exchange.

DRAGOMAN. An interpreter employed in the east, and particularly at the Turkish court.

Act Cong. Aug. 26, 1842, c. 201, § 8, declares that it shall not be lawful for the president of the United States to allow a dragoman at Constantinople a salary of more than two thousand five hundred dollars.

DRAIN. To conduct water from one place to another, for the purpose of drying the former.

The right of draining water through another man's land. This is an easement or servitude acquired by grant or prescription. See 3 Kent, Comm. 436; 7 Man. & G. 354; Washb. Easem. Index.

DRAW. To drag, on a hurdle, to the place of execution. Anciently no hurdle was allowed, but the criminal was actually dragged along the road to the place of execution. A part of the ancient punishment of traitors was the being thus drawn. 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 92, 377.

DRAWBACK. An allowance made by the government to merchants on the re-exportation of certain imported goods liable to duties, which in some cases consists of the whole, in others of a part, of the duties which had been paid upon the importation. For the various acts of congress which regulate drawbacks, see Brightly, Dig. U. S. Laws.

DRAWEE. A person to whom a bill of exchange is addressed, and who is requested to pay the amount of money therein mentioned. See "Bill of Exchange."

DRAWER. The party who makes a bill of exchange.

DRAWLATCHES. Thieves; robbers. Cowell.

DREIT DREIT. Double right; a union of the right of possession and the right of property. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 199.

DRENCHES, or DRENGES (Law Lat. drengi). A species of tenants mentioned in Domesday Book, whom Spelman supposes to have been military vassals or tenants by knight service. The same author quotes an old manuscript record of the family of Sharburn, in Norfolk, from which it would appear that the name was given to certain tenants in capite, who, at the coming of William the Conqueror, being put out of their estates, were afterwards, upon complaint being made to him, restored to them, on their making it appear that they were owners thereof, and had taken no part against him either by aid or counsel in consilio et auxilio. Spelman. According to Lord Coke, who spells the word dreuchs, they were free tenants of a manor. Co. Litt. 5b.

DRENGAGE. The tenure by which the drenches (q. v.) held their lands. Spelman.

DRIFT. In old English law. A driving. A term applied to cattle.

DRIFTS OF THE FOREST. A view or examination of what cattle are in a forest, chase, etc., that it may be known whether it be surcharged or not, and whose the beasts are, and whether they are commonable. These drifts are made at certain times in the year by the officers of the forest, when all cattle are driven into some pound or place inclosed, for the before-mentioned purposes, and also to discover whether any cattle of strangers be there, which ought not to common. Manw. For. Law, p. 2, c. 15.

DRIFTWAY. A road or way over which cattle are driven. 1 Taunt. 279; Selw. N. P. 1037; Woolr. Ways, 1. The term is in use in Rhode Island. 2 Hilliard, Real Prop. 33.

DRINCLEAN, or DRINKLEAN (Saxon). A contribution of tenants, in the time of the Saxons, towards a potation, or ale, provided to entertain the lord, or his steward. Cowell. See "Cervisarii."

DRIP. The right of drip is an easement by which the water which falls on one house is allowed to fall upon the land of another. Unless the owner has acquired the right by grant or prescription, he has no right so to construct his house as to let the water drip over his neighbor's land. 1 Rolle, Abr. 107. See 3 Kent, Comm. 436; Dig. 43. 23. 4. 6; 11 Adol. & E. 40.

DROFDEN, or DROFDENE. A grove or woody place where cattle are kept. Cowell; Blount.

DROFLAND, DRIFTLAND, or DRYFLAND. A yearly payment made by some to their landlords for driving their cattle through the manor to fairs and markets. Cowell.

DROIT (Fr.)

——In French Law. Law; the whole body of law, written and unwritten.

A right. No law exists without a duty. Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 96; Poth. Dr.

Droit d'accession. That property which is acquired by making a new species out of the material of another. Modus acquirandi quo quis ex aliena materia suo nomine novam speciem faciens bona fide ejus speciei dominium consequitur. It is a rule of the civil law that, if the thing can be reduced to the former matter, it belongs to the owner of the matter, e. g., a statute made of gold. but, if it cannot so be reduced, it belongs to the person who made it, e. g., a statue made of marble. This subject is treated of in the Code Nap. arts. 565, 577; Merlin, Repert. "Accession;" Malleville's Discussion, art. 565. See "Accession."

Droit d'aubaine. A rule by which all the property of a deceased foreigner, whether movable or immovable, was confiscated to the use of the state, to the exclusion of his heirs, whether claiming ab intestato or under a will of the deceased.

The word aubaine signifies hospes loci, peregrinus advena, a stranger. It is derived, according to some, from alibi, elsewhere, natus, born, from which the word albinus is said to be formed. Others, as Cujas, derive the word directly from advena, by which word aubains or strangers are designated in the capitularies of Charlemagne. See Du Cange; Trevoux. See "Aubaine."

Droit de bris. A right, formerly claimed by the lords of the coasts of certain parts of France, to shipwrecks, by which not only the property, but the persons of those who were cast away, were confiscated for the prince who was lord of the coast. Otherwise called droit de bris sur le naufrages. The right prevailed chiefly in

Bretagne, and was solemnly abrogated by Henry III. as duke of Normandy, Aquitaine, and Guienne, in a charter granted A. D. 1226, preserved among the rolls at Bordeaux. Laws of Oleron, art. 26, note; Pet. Adm. Dec. Appendix. See "Bris."

Droit de garde. Right of ward; the guardianship of the estate and person of a noble vassal, to which the king, during his minority, was entitled. Steph. Lect. 250.

Droit de gite. The duty incumbent on a roturier, holding lands within the royal domain, of supplying board and lodging to the king and to his suite while on a royal progress. Steph. Lect. 351.

Droit de greffe. The right of selling various offices connected with the custody of judicial records or notarial acts. Steph. Lect. 354. A privilege of the French kings.

Droit de maitrise. A charge payable to the crown by any one who, after having served his apprenticeship in any commercial guild or brotherhood, sought to become a master workman in it on his own account. Steph. Lect. 354.

Droit de prise. The duty (incumbent on a roturier) of supplying to the king on credit, during a certain period, such articles of domestic consumption as might be required for the royal household. Steph. Lect. 351.

Droit de quint. A relief payable by a noble vassal to the king as his seigneur, on every change in the ownership of his fief. Steph. Lect. 350.

——In English Law. Right. Co. Litt. 158. A person was said to have droit droit, plurimum juris, and plurimum possessionis, when he had the freehold, the fee, and the property in him. Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 406.

Droit Close. The name of an ancient writ directed to the lord of ancient demesne, and which lies for those tenants in ancient demesne who hold their lands and tenements by charter in fee simple, in fee tail, for life, or in dower. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 23.

DROIT DROIT (Law Fr.; Law Lat. jus duplicatum). In old English law. A double right. The right of possession, united with the right of property. 2 Bl. Comm. 199; Co. Litt. 266a; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 476; 4 Kent, Comm. 373. See "Dreit Dreit."

DROIT ECRIT. In French law. The written law. The Roman civil law, or corpus juris civilis. Steph. Lect. 130.

DROIT NE DONE PLUIS QUE SOIT DEmaunde. The law gives no more than is demanded. Coke, 2d Inst. 286.

DROIT NE POET PAS MORIER. Right cannot die. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 100.

DROITS CIVILS. This phrase in French law denotes private rights, the exercise of which is independent of the status (qualite) of citizen. Foreigners enjoy them; and the extent of that enjoyment is determined by the principle of reciprocity. Conversely, foreigners may be sued on contracts made by them in France. Brown.

DROITS OF ADMIRALTY. Rights claimed by the government over the property of an enemy. In England, it has been usual in maritime wars for the government to seize and condemn, as droits of admiralty, the property of an enemy found in her ports at the breaking out of hostilities. 1 C. Rob. Adm. 196; 13 Ves. 71; 1 Edw. Adm. 60; 3 Bos. & P. 191.

DROITURAL. What belongs of right; relating to right; as, real actions are either droitural or possessory,—droitural when the plaintiff seeks to recover the property. Finch, Law, 257.

DROP. In English practice. When the members of a court are equally divided on the argument showing cause against a rule nisi, no order is made, i. e., the rule is neither discharged nor made absolute, and the rule is said to "drop." In practice, there being a right to appeal, it has been usual to make an order in one way, the junior judge withdrawing his judgment.

DROP LETTER. A letter addressed for delivery in the same city or district in which it is posted.

DROVE ROAD. A road for driving cattle. A right of way for carriages does not involve necessarily a right to drive cattle, or an easement of drove road.

DROVE STANCE. In Scotch law. A place adjoining a drove road, for resting and refreshing sheep and cattle on their journey. 7 Bell, App. Cas. 53, 57.

DRU. A thicket of wood in a valley. Domesday Book.

DRUGGIST. One who deals in medicinal substances, vegetable, animal, or mineral, uncompounded.

In America, the term "druggist" is used synonymously with "apothecary," although, strictly speaking, a druggist is one who deals in medicinal substances, vegetable, animal, or mineral, before being compounded, which composition and combination are really the business of the apothecary. The term is here used in its double sense. In England, an apothecary is a subphysician, or privileged practitioner. He is the ordinary medical man, or family medical attendant, in that country.

DRUNKARD. Synonymous with "habitual drunkard" (q. v.) 5 Gray (Mass.) 85.

DRUNKENNESS. In medical jurisprudence. The condition of a man whose mind is affected by the immediate use of intoxicating drinks.

DRY CRAEFT. Witchcraft; magic.

DRY EXCHANGE. A term invented for disguising and covering usury, in which something was pretended to pass on both sides, when in truth nothing passed on one side; whence it was called "dry." St. 3 Hen. VII. c. 5; Wolff. Inst. § 657.

DRY MULTURES. In Scotch law. Corn paid to the owner of a mill, whether the payers grind or not. Wharton.

DRY RENT. Rent seck; a rent reserved without a clause of distress.

DUARCHY. A form of government where two reign jointly.

DUAS UXORES EODEM TEMPORE HABERE NON POTEST. It is not lawful to have two wives at one time. Inst. 1. 10. 6; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 436.

DUBITANS, or DUBITANTE. Doubting. Dobbin, J., dubitans. 1 Show. 364.

DUBITATUR, or DUBITAVIT. It is doubted. A word frequently used in the reports to indicate that a point is considered doubtful. Vaughan, C. J., dubitavit. Freem. 150.

DUCAT. The name of a foreign coin.

The ducat, or sequin, was originally a gold coin of the middle ages, apparently a descendant from the bezant of the Greek-Roman empire. For many centuries it constituted the principal international currency, being intended, or supposed, to be made of pure gold, though subsequently settled at a basis a little below. It is now nearly obsolete in every part of the world. Its average value is about $2.26 of our money. It is said they appeared earliest in Venice, and that they bore the following motto: Sit tibi, Christe, datus, quem tu regis, iste Ducatus,—whence the name ducat.

The silver ducat was formerly a coin of Naples, weighing three hundred and forty-eight grains, eight hundred and forty-two thousandths fine; consequent value, in our money, about eighty-one cents; but it now exists only as a money of account.

DUCES TECUM (Law Lat. you bring with you). In practice. A term applied to certain writs, where a party summoned to appear in court is required to bring with him some piece of evidence, or other things that the court would view. Cowell; Termes de la Ley. See "Subpoena."

DUCES TECUM LICET LANGUIDUS. A writ directing the sheriff to bring a person whom he returned as so sick that he could not be brought without endangering his life. Blount; Cowell. The writ is now obsolete. See "Subpoena."

DUCHY COURT OF LANCASTER. A court of special jurisdiction in England, held before the chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, or his deputy, concerning all matter of equity relating to lands holden of the king in right of the duchy of Lancaster. 3 Bl. Comm. 78; 3 Steph. Comm. 446. The proceedings in this court are the same as on the equity side in the courts of exchequer and chancery. Id.

DUCKING STOOL. See "Castigatory."

DUCROIRE. Guaranty; equivalent to del credere (q. v.)

DUE. Just and proper. A due presentment and demand of payment must be made. See 4 Rawle (Pa.) 307; 3 Leigh (Va.) 389; 3 Cranch (U. S.) 300.

What ought to be paid; what may be demanded; payable. 7 N. Y. 476.

It differs from "owing" in this, that sometimes what is owing is not due. A note payable thirty days after date is owing immediately after it is delivered to the payee, but it is not due until the thirty days have elapsed; but it has been held synonymous with "owing." 31 Mich. 219.

It may mean either "owing" or "payable," according to the context. 2 Ch. Div. 101.

DUE BILL. An acknowledgment of a debt in writing is so called. This instrument differs from a promissory note in many particulars. It is not payable to order, nor is it assignable by mere indorsement. See "Promissory Note."

DUE PROCESS OF LAW. Law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice. 3 Story, Const. 264, 661; 18 How. (U. S.) 272; 13 N. Y. 378.

It is the equivalent to "law of the land," as used in Magna Charta. Co. Inst. 50; 18 How. (U. S.) 272; 11 Mich. 129.

"Whatever difficulty may be experienced in giving to these terms a definition which will embrace every permissible exercise of power affecting private rights, and exclude such as is forbidden, there can be no doubt of their meaning as applied to judicial proceedings. They then mean a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our system of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights." 96 U. S. 733.

"Such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." Cooley, Const. Lim. § 356.

Due process of law is not any course of procedure that may at any time be established by the legislature (34 Ala. 216; 43 N. J. Law, 203), yet it is not a denial of due process of law for the legislature to make changes in the common law, or in modes of procedure (50 Miss. 468; 70 N. Y. 228; 160 U. S. 389).

Due process of law embraces only that which is fundamental, and to it is necessary an orderly legal proceeding, whereof the party affected shall have notice, and an opportunity to appear and be heard. 169 U. S. 366; 96 U. S. 97.

DUELLING. The fighting of two persons one against the other, at an appointed time and place, upon a precedent quarrel. It differs from an affray in this, that the latter occurs on a sudden quarrel, while the former is always the result of design.

DUELLUM. Trial by battle; judicial combat. Spelman.

DUKE. The title given to those who are in the highest rank of nobility in England.

DULOCRACY. A government where servants and slaves have so much license and privilege that they domineer. Wharton.

DULY. In legal parlance, according to law. 5 Hun (N. Y.) 542, 543; 23 Barb. (N. Y.) 304; 3 Edw. Ch. 239; 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 531, 543; 15 Minn. 479, 484. It does not relate to form merely, but includes form and substance both. 114 N. Y. 518, 527.

DUM (Lat. while). A word of limitation in old conveyances. Co. Litt. 235a; 10 Coke, 41b.

DUM BENE SE GESSERIT (Law Lat.) While he conducted himself well; during good behavior. 2 Bl. Comm. 252. The implied condition on which a feud or fee was originally given. Id. See "Quamdiu se Bene Gesserit."

DUM FERVET OPUS. While the work glows; in the heat of action. 1 Kent, Comm. 120.

DUM FUIT IN PRISONA (Law Lat.) In English law. A writ which lay for a man who had aliened lands under duress by imprisonment, to restore to him his proper estates. Coke, 2d Inst. 482.

DUM FUIT INFRA AETATEM (Lat.) The name of a writ which lies when an infant has made a feoffment in fee of his lands or for life, or a gift in tail.

It may be sued out by him after he comes of full age, and not before; but in the meantime he may enter, and his entry remits him to his ancestor's rights. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 192; Co. Litt. 247, 337.

DUM NON FUIT COMPOS MENTIS (Lat.) The name of a writ which the heirs of a person who was non compos mentis, and who aliened his lands, might have sued out to restore him to his rights.

DUM RECENS FUIT MALEFICIUM. While the offense was fresh. A term employed in the old law of appeal of rape. Bracton, fol. 147.

DUM SOLA (Lat. while single or unmarried). A phrase applied to single women, to denote that something has been done, or may be done, while the woman is or was unmarried. Thus, when a judgment is rendered against a woman dum sola, and afterwards she marries, the scire facias to revive the judgment must be against both husband and wife.

DUMB BIDDING. In sales at auction, when the amount which the owner of the thing sold is willing to take for the article is written, and placed by the owner under a candlestick, or other thing, and it is agreed that no bidding shall avail unless equal to that, this is called dumb bidding. Bab. Auct. 44.

DUMMADO (Lat. provided that; so that). A word of limitation in old conveyancing. 10 Coke, 41b; Co. Litt. 235a. One of the apt words of reserving a rent. Co. Litt. 47a. Dummodo solverit talem redditum, provided he shall pay such a rent. Id. 235a.

DUNGEON. A cell under ground; a place in a prison built under ground, dark, or but indifferently lighted. In the prisons of the United States there are few or no dungeons.

DUNIO. A double; a kind of base coin less than a farthing.

DUNNAGE. Pieces of wood or other material placed against the sides and bottom of the hold of a vessel, to preserve the cargo from the effect of leakage, according to its nature and quality. Abb. Shipp. 227.

DUO NON POSSUNT IN SOLIDO UNAM rem possidere. Two cannot possess one thing each in entirety. Co. Litt. 368; 1 Prest. Abstr. 318; 2 Prest. Abstr. 86, 326; 2 Dods. Adm. 157; 2 Carth. 76; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 415.

DUO SUNT INSTRUMENTA AD OMNES res aut confirmandas aut impugnandas,—ratio et aucoritas. There are two instruments for confirming or impugning everything,—reason and authority. 8 Coke, 16.

DUODECEMVIRALE JUDICIUM. The trial by twelve men, or by jury. Applied to juries de medietate linguae. Molloy, de Jur. Mar. 448.

DUODECIMA MANUS (Lat. twelve hands). The oaths of twelve men, including himself, by whom the defendant was allowed to make his law. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 343.

DUODENA. In old records. A jury of twelve men. Cowell.

Generally, a dozen. Duodena panis, a dozen of bread. Towns. Pl. 170.

DUODENA MANU. Twelve witnesses to purge a criminal of an offense.

DUORUM IN SOLIDUM DOMINIUM VEL possessio esse non potest. Ownership or possession in entirety cannot be in two of the same thing. Dig. 13. 6. 5. 15; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 245, § 236; Bracton, 28b.

DUPLEX QUERELA (Lat.) In ecclesiastical law. A complaint in the nature of an appeal from the ordinary to his next immediate superior for delaying or refusing to do justice in some ecclesiastical cause. 3 Bl. Comm. 247; Cowell; Jacob.

DUPLEX VALOR MARITAGII (Lat. double the value of a marriage). Guardians in chivalry had the privilege of proposing a marriage for their infant wards, provided it were done without disparagement; and if the wards married without the guardian's consent, they were liable to forfeit double the value of the marriage. Co. Litt. 82b; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 70.

DUPLICATE (Lat. duplex, double). The double of anything. A document which is essentially the same as some other instrument. 7 Man. & G. 93.

A duplicate writing has but one effect. Each duplicate is complete evidence of the intention of the parties. When a duplicate is destroyed, for example, in the case of a will, it is presumed both are intended to be destroyed; but this presumption possesses greater or less force, owing to circumstances. When only one of the duplicates is in the possession of the testator, the destruction of that is a strong presumption of an intent to revoke both; but if he possessed both, and destroys but one, it is weaker; when he alters one, and afterwards destroys it, retaining the other entire, it has been held that the intention was to revoke both. 1 P. Wms. 346; 13 Ves. 310. But that seems to be doubted. 3 Hagg. Ecc. 548.

A duplicate differs from a mere copy in having all the validity of an original.

——In English Law. The certificate of discharge given to an insolvent debtor who takes the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors.

DUPLICATE WILL. A term used in England, where a testator executes two copies of his will, one to keep himself, and the other to be deposited with another person. Upon application for probate of a duplicate will, both copies must be deposited in the registry of the court of probate.

DUPLICATIO (Lat. from duplicare, to double, or follow as the second in order).

——In the Civil Law. The defendant's answer to the plaintiff's replication; corresponding to the rejoinder of the common law. Inst. 4. 14. 1; Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 14, § 1284. The fourth pleading in the series. 3 Bl. Comm. 310. Translated duplication. Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 5, No. 7.

——In Scotch Practice. Duply (q. v.) Bracton and Fleta call this pleading triplicatio. Bracton, fols. 57b, 400b, 428b; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 36, § 10.

DUPLICATIONEM POSSIBILITATIS lex non patitur. The law does not allow a duplication of possibility. 1 Rolle, Abr. 321.

DUPLICATUM JUS (Lat. a twofold or double right). Words which signify the same as dreit dreit, or droit droit, and which are applied to a writ of right, patent, and such other writs of right as are of the same nature, and do, as it were, flow from it as the writ of right. Booth, Real Actions, 87.

DUPLICITY (Lat. duplex, twofold; double). The union of more than one cause of action in one court in a writ, or more than one defense in one place, or more than a single breach in a replication. 1 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 381.

DUPLY. In Scotch law. The defendant's answer to the plaintiff's replication. The same as duplicatio. Macl. Prac. 127.

To rejoin. "It is duplyed by the panel." 3 How. St. Tr. 471.

DURANTE ABSENTIA. See "Administration."

DURANTE BENE PLACITO (Lat. during good pleasure). The ancient tenure of English judges was durante bene placito. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 267, 342.

DURANTE MINORE AETATE (Lat. during the minority). During his minority an infant can enter into no contracts, except those for his benefit. If he should be appointed an executor, administration of the estate will be granted, durante minore aetate, to another person. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1555.

DURANTE VIDUITATE (Lat.) During widowhood.

DURESS. Personal restraint, or fear of personal injury or imprisonment. 2 Metc. (Ky.) 445.

Deprivation of one of his freedom of will and act by the unlawful acts of another.

Duress exists where one is induced by another's unlawful act to make a contract or perform some act under circumstances which prevent his exercising free will. 45 Mich. 569.

——Duress of Imprisonment. That which exists where a man actually loses his liberty. If a man be illegally deprived of his liberty until he sign and seal a bond, or the like, he may allege this duress, and avoid the bond. 2 Bay (S. C.) 211; 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 201; 10 Pet. (U. S.) 137. But if a man be legally imprisoned, and, either to procure his discharge, or on any other fair account, seal a bond or a deed, this is not by duress of imprisonment, and he is not at liberty to avoid it. Coke, 2d Inst. 482; 3 Caines (N. Y.) 168; 6 Mass. 511; 1 Lev. 69; 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 350; 17 Me. 338. Where the proceedings at law are a mere pretext, the instrument may be avoided. 1 Bl. Comm. 136.

——Duress per Minas. That which is either for fear of loss of life, or else for fear of mayhem or loss of limb, must be upon a sufficient reason. 1 Bl. Comm. 131. In this case, a man may avoid his own act. Lord Coke enumerates four instances in which a man may avoid his own act by reason of menaces,—for fear of loss of life; of member; of mayhem; of imprisonment. Coke, 2d Inst. 483; 2 Rolle, Abr. 124; Bac. Abr. "Duress," "Murder" (A); 2 Strange, 856; Fost. Crim. Law, 322; 2 Ld. Raym. 1578; Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 114.

——Duress of Goods. Restraint of goods under circumstances of peculiar hardship, which will avoid a contract. 2 Bay (S. C.) 211; 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 201; 10 Pet. (U. S.) 137. But see 2 Metc. (Ky.) 445; 2 Gall. (U. S.) 337.

DURESSOR. One who subjects another to duress; one who compels another to do a thing, as by menace. Bac. Max. 90, reg. 22.

DURSLEGI, or DURSLEY. In old English law. Blows without wounding or bloodshed; dry blows or beating. Spelman.

DUSTY FOOT. See "Court of Piepoudre."

DUTCH AUCTION. An auction at which the auctioneer fixes a price for the articles offered, which is gradually lowered until accepted. See 18 Hun (N. Y.) 475.

DUUMVIRI (from duo, two, and viri, men). A general appellation among the ancient Romans, given to any magistrates elected in pairs to fill any office, or perform any function. Brande.

Duumviri municipales were two annual magistrates in the towns and colonies, having judicial powers. Calv. Lex.

Duumviri navales were officers appointed to man, equip, and refit the navy. Id.

DUX (Lat.) From ducere, to lead.

——In the Roman Law. A leader or military commander; the commander of an army. Dig. 3. 2. 2. pr.

——In Later Law. A military governor of a province. See Code, 1. 27. 2. A military officer having charge of the borders or frontiers of the empire, called dux limitis (duces limitum). Code, 1. 49. 1. pr.; Id. 1. 46. 4; Id. 3. 26. 7. At this period, the word began to be used as a title of honor or dignity.

——In Feudal and Old European Law. Duke; a title of honor or order of nobility. 1 Bl. Comm. 397; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law. 236. One who was invested by the prince with a dukedom or ducal fief (ducatus). Feud. lib. 2, tit. 10. The highest order of capitanei regis or crown vassals. Id. lib. 1, tit. 1, pr. The origin and history of this title are elaborately treated by Spelman, who observes that it was originally an official title, afterwards honorary, and finally feudal and hereditary. Dux is used in Bracton as descriptive of the first order of subjects in the kingdom. Sub eis (regibus) duces, comites, barones, etc., under them, dukes, earls, barons, etc. Bracton, fol. 5b.

DWELL. To have a domicile. 5 Pick. (Mass.) 379. As to one having no domicile, it signifies the place where he temporarily resides. L. R. 1 Exch. 133.

DWELLING HOUSE. A building inhabited by man; a house usually occupied by the person there residing, and his family; the apartment, building, or cluster of buildings in which a man with his family resides. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 165.

The importance of an exact signification for this word is often felt in criminal cases; and yet it is very difficult to frame an exact definition which will apply to all cases. It is said to be equivalent to "mansion house." 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 199; 4 Strob. (S. C.) 372; 13 Bost. Law Rep. 157; 7 Man. & G. 122. See 14 Mees. & W. 181; 4 C. B. 105; 4 Call (Va.) 109.

It must be a permanent structure (1 Hale, P. C. 557; 1 Russ. Crimes [Greaves Ed.] 798), it must be complete (20 Conn. 245), and it must be inhabited at the time (2 East, P. C. 496; 2 Leach, C. C. 1018, note; 33 Me. 30; 10 Cush. [Mass.] 479; 64 Mass. 478; 52 N. C. 167). It is sufficient if a part of the structure only be used for an abode. Russ. & R. 185; 2 Taunt. 339; 1 Moody, C. C. 248; 11 Metc. (Mass.) 295; 9 Tex. 42; 2 Bos. & P. 508; 27 Ala. (N. S.) 31.

Rooms in a tenement house are a dwelling. 80 N. Y. 327.

A jail has been held a dwelling house. 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 115; 4 Call (Va.) 109.

It includes buildings within the curtilage. 16 Mich. 142; 2 N. C. 118.

DYING DECLARATIONS. Declarations made by one at the point of death, or believing himself to be. They are admissible in evidence only when made by the victim of a homicide (56 N. Y. 103; 35 Ohio St. 78) as to facts relating to the homicide to which the dying person could have testified (30 Mich. 431; 124 Mo. 397), and under a full conviction of impending death (126 Ill. 81; 48 Mich. 474). They are admissible only in a prosecution for the killing of the declarant. 49 Iowa, 238.

DYING WITHOUT ISSUE. Not having issue living at the death of the decedent. 5 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 514. In England this is the signification, by St. 7 Wm. IV., and St. 1 Vict. c. 26, § 29. See 2 Washb. Real Prop. 362 et seq.

DYSNOMY. Bad legislation; the enactment of bad laws.

DYVOUR. In Scotch law. A bankrupt.

DYVOUR'S HABIT. In Scotch law. A habit which debtors who are set free on a cessio bonorum are obliged to wear, unless in the summons and process of cessio it be libelled, sustained, and proved that the bankruptcy proceeds from misfortune. And bankrupts are condemned to submit to the habit, even where no suspicion of fraud lies against them, if they have been dealers in an illicit trade. Ersk. Princ. 4. 3. 13.

E

E. In Latin phrases. A preposition meaning "from" or "out of." It is used only before a consonant; "ex" being used with the same significance before a vowel.

E CONVERSO (Lat.) On the other hand; on the contrary.

EA (Saxon). The water or river; also the mouth of a river on the shore between high and low water mark.

EA EST ACCIPIENDA INTERPRETATIO, quae vitio caret. That interpretation is to be received which is free from fault. Bac. Max. reg. 3, p. 47.

EA INTENTIONE (Law Lat.) With that intent. Held not to make a condition, but a confidence and trust. Dyer, 138b.

EA QUAE COMMENDANDI CAUSA IN venditionibus dicuntur si palam appareant venditorem non obligant. Those things which, by way of commendation, are stated at sales, if they are openly apparent, do not bind the seller. Dig. 18. 43. m.

EA QUAE DARI IMPOSSIBILIA SUNT, vel quae in rerum natura non sunt, pro non adjectis habentur. Those things which cannot be given, or which are not in existence, are held as not expressed. Dig. 50. 17. 135.

EA QUAE IN CURIA NOSTRA RITE acta sunt debitae executioni demandari debent. Those things which are properly transacted in our court ought to be committed to a due execution. Co. Litt. 289.

EA QUAE RARO ACCIDUNT, NON TEmere in agendis negotiis computantur. Those things which rarely happen are not to be taken into account in the transaction of business, without sufficient reason. Dig. 50. 17. 64.

EADEM CAUSA DIVERSIS RATIONIBUS coram judicibus ecclesiasticis et secularibus ventilatur. The same cause is argued upon different principles before ecclesiastical and secular judges. 2 Inst. 622.

EADEM EST RATIO, EADEM EST LEX. The same reason, the same law. 7 Pick. (Mass.) 493.

EADEM MENS PRAESUMITUR REGIS quae est juris et quae esse debet, proesertim in dubiis. The mind of the sovereign is presumed to be coincident with that of the law, and with that which ought to be, especially in ambiguous matters. Hob. 154; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 53.

EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of ten dollars.

EALDER, or EALDING. In old Saxon law. An elder or chief.

EALDERMAN (Saxon). A Saxon title of honor. It was a mark of honor very widely applicable, the ealdermen being of various ranks. It is the same as alderman (q. v.)

EALDOR BISCOP. A chief bishop or archbishop.

EALDORBURG (Saxon). The chief city.

EALEHUS. An ale house.

EALHORDA. The privilege of assizing and selling beer.

EAR WITNESS. One who attests to things he has heard himself.

EARL. In English law. A title of nobility next below a marquis, and above a viscount. Earls were anciently called comites, because they were wont comitari regem, to wait upon the king for counsel and advice. They were also called "shiremen," because each earl had the civil government of a shire. After the Norman conquest they were called "counts," whence the shires obtained the names of counties. They have now nothing to do with the government of counties, which has entirely devolved on the sheriff, the earl's deputy, or vice comes.

EARL MARSHAL. An officer who formerly was of great repute in England. He held the court of chivalry alone as a court of honor, and, in connection with the lord high constable, as a court having criminal jurisdiction. 3 Bl. Comm. 68; 4 Bl. Comm. 467. The duties of the office now are restricted to the settlement of matters of form merely. It would appear, from similarity of duties, and from the derivation of the title, to be a relic of the ancient office of alderman of all England. See "Alderman."

EARLDOM. The dignity or jurisdiction of an earl. The dignity only remains now, as the jurisdiction has been given over to the sheriff. 1 Bl. Comm. 339.

EARLES PENNY. Earnest money.

EARMARK. A mark put upon a thing for the purpose of distinction. Money in a bag tied and labelled is said to have an earmark. 3 Maule & S. 575.

EARNEST. The payment of a part of the price of goods sold, or the delivery of part of such goods, for the purpose of binding the contract.

EARNINGS. That which is gained or merited by labor, service, or performance. 47 Wis. 113. It is a term of larger import than "wages." 102 Mass. 235. See "Gross Earnings."

EASEMENT. A right in the owner of one parcel of land, by reason of such ownership, to use the land of another for a special purpose not inconsistent with a general property in the owner. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 25.

A privilege, without profit, which the owner of one adjacent tenement hath of another, existing in respect of their several tenements, by which that owner against whose tenement the privilege exists is obliged to suffer or not to do something on or in regard to his own land for the advantage of him in whose land the privilege exists. Termes de la Ley; Bell, Dict. (Ed. 1838) "Easements," "Servitude;" 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 298; 3 Barn. & C. 339; 5 Barn. & C. 221; 3 Bing. 118; 2 McCord (S. C.) 451; 3 McCord (S. C.) 131, 194; 14 Mass. 49; 3 Pick. (Mass.) 408; 47 Md. 301.

In the civil law, the land against which the privilege exists is called the "servient tenement;" its proprietor, the "servient owner;" he in whose favor it exists, the "dominant owner;" his land, the "dominant tenement." And, as these rights are usually not personal, and do not change with the persons who may own the respective estates, it is very common to personify the estates as themselves owning or enjoying the easements. 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 72; 3 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 254; 16 Pick. (Mass.) 522.

Easements have these essential qualities. There must be two tenements owned by several proprietors,—the dominant, to which the privilege is attached; the servient, upon which it is imposed. White & T. Lead. Cas. 108; 17 Mass. 443. Easements, strictly considered, exist only in favor of, and are imposed only on, corporeal property. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 25. They confer no right to any profits arising from the servient tenement. 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 72; 4 Pick. (Mass.) 145; 5 Adol. & E. 758; 30 Eng. Law & Eq. 189; 3 Nev. & P. 257. They are incorporeal. By the common law, they may be temporary; by the civil law, the cause must be perpetual. They impose no duty on the servient owner, except not to change his tenement to the prejudice or destruction of the privilege. Gale, Easem. (3d Ed.) 1-18; Washb. Easem. Index.

Easements are either (1) positive or (2) negative, the former authorizing the commission of acts on the servient estate, and the latter merely forbidding the servient owner from doing some act to the detriment of the dominant owner, as to build to the obstruction of his light.

They are also (3) appurtenant, or (4) in gross, the former running with the land, and the latter attached to a person.

(5) Quasi easements. "There are rights mentioned in the books as quasi easements. (1) Where there has been an easement proper, with a dominant and servient tenement, and the ownership of such tenements has been unified. (2) Where the owner of land has constructed a way or drain over one portion of it for the benefit of another portion, and there has never been a separate ownership of a dominant and servient tenement. This class is again subdivided into those which are called 'continuous,' as a drain or sewer, which are used continuously without the intervention of man, and those which are called 'noncontinuous,' as a right of way, which can only be used by the intervention of man, repeated at intervals when user is desired." Goddard, Easem. 84; 68 N. Y. 66.

Easements are as various as the exigencies of domestic convenience, or the purposes to which buildings and land may be applied.

The following attach to land as incidents or appurtenances, viz.: The right of pasture on other land; of fishing in other waters; of taking game on other land; of way over other land; of taking wood, minerals, or other produce of the soil from other land; of receiving air, light, or heat from or over other land; of receiving or discharging water over, or having support to buildings from, other land (3 El., Bl. & El. 655); of going on other land to clear a mill stream, or repair its banks, or draw water from a spring there, or to do some other act not involving ownership; of carrying on an offensive trade (2 Bing. N. C. 134; 5 Metc. [Mass.] 8); of burying in a church, or a particular vault (Washb. Easem.; Civ. Code N. Y. pp. 149, 150; 8 H. L. Cas. 362; 3 Barn. & A. 735; 11 Q. B. 666).

An easement is distinguished from a license in that it carries an interest, and from a profit a prendre (q. v.) in that it is a privilege without profit.

EAST GREENWICH. The name of a royal manor in the county of Kent, England. Mentioned in royal grants or patents, as descriptive of the tenure of free socage. "To be holden of us, our heirs and successors, as of our manor of East Greenwich, in free and common socage."

EASTER OFFERINGS, or EASTER dues. In English law. Small sums of money paid to the parochial clergy by the parishioners at Easter as a compensation for personal tithes, or the tithe for personal labor. 2 & 3 Edw. IV. c. 13; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62, § 9.

EASTER TERM. In English practice. One of the four terms of the superior courts in England, formerly called the movable term, but now fixed, beginning on the 15th April, and ending on the 8th of May, in every year. St. 11 Geo. IV.; 1 Wm. IV. c. 70; 3 Chit. Gen. Prac. 91.

EASTERLING. A coin struck by Richard II., which is supposed to have given rise to the name of "sterling," as applied to English money. Wharton.

EAT INDE SINE DIE. Words used on an acquittal, or when a prisoner is to be discharged, "that he may go without day;" that is, that he be dismissed. Dane, Abr. Index.

EAVESDROPPERS. In criminal law. Such persons as wait under walls or windows or the eaves of a house, to listen to discourses, and thereupon to frame mischievous tales. 4 Bl. Comm. 167.

EBBA. In old English law. Ebb (of the tide.) Ebba et fluctus, ebb and flow of tide; ebb and flood. Bracton, fols. 255, 338.

ECCHYMOSIS. In medical jurisprudence. Blackness. It is an extravasation of blood by rupture of capillary vessels, and hence it follows contusion; but it may exist, as in cases of scurvy and other morbid conditions, without the latter. Ryan, Med. Jur. 172.

ECCLESIA (Lat. an assembly). A Christian assembly; a church; a place of religious worship. Spelman.

ECCLESIA ECCLESIAE DECIMAS SOLvere non debet. It is not the duty of the church to pay tithes to the church. Cro. Eliz. 479.

ECCLESIA EST DOMUS MANSIONALIS Omnipotentis Dei. The church is the mansion house of the Omnipotent God. 2 Inst. 164.

ECCLESIA EST INFRA AETATEM ET in custodia domini regis, qui tenetur jura et haereditates ejusdem manu tenere et defendere. The church is under age, and in the custody of the king, who is bound to uphold and defend its rights and inheritances. 11 Coke, 49.

ECCLESIA FUNGITUR VICE MINORIS; meliorem conditionem suam facere potest, deteriorem nequaquam. The church enjoys the privilege of a minor; it can make its own condition better, but not worse. Co. Litt. 341.

ECCLESIA MAGIS FAVENDUM EST quam personae. The church is more to be favored than an individual. Godb. 172.

ECCLESIA NON MORITUR. The church does not die. 2 Inst. 3.

ECCLESIASTIC. A clergyman; one destined to the divine ministry; as, a bishop, a priest, a deacon. Domat, Civ. Law, liv. prel. tit. 2, § 2, note 14.

ECCLESIASTICAL. Pertaining to the church as distinguished from secular or civil.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS. Commissioners established by statute, in England, principally for the purpose of preparing schemes for the improvement of the ecclesiastical system, especially as to the equalization of the revenues and duties of the various dioceses, and to provide for the cure of souls in parishes where assistance was required. Several of such schemes have been given effect to by orders in council. By later acts, a fund has been vested in the commissioners to enable them to make provision for the cure of souls in populous districts, and provision is accordingly made for the creation of ecclesiastical districts and parishes, and the appointment of ministers therein. Phillim. Ecc. Law, 2090; 2 Steph. Comm. 748; St. 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77; St. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94; St. 29 & 30 Vict. c. 111, etc. See "Parish."

ECCLESIASTICAL CORPORATIONS. Such corporations as are composed of persons who take a lively interest in the advancement of religion, and who are associated and incorporated for that purpose. Angell & A. Corp. § 36.

Corporations whose members are spiritual persons are distinguished from lay corporations. 1 Bl. Comm. 470. They are generally called "religious corporations" in the United States. 2 Kent, Comm. 274; Angell & A. Corp. § 37.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS. In English ecclesiastical law. The generic name for certain courts in England, having cognizance mainly of spiritual matters. Also called "Courts Christian."

The jurisdiction which they formerly exercised in testamentary and matrimonial causes has been taken away. St. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, § 3, c. 85, § 2; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95. See 3 Bl. Comm. 67.

They consist of the archdeacon's court, the consistory courts, the court of arches, the court of peculiars, the prerogative courts of the two archbishops, the faculty court, and, on appeal, the privy council.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW. The law of the church. The existence in England of a separate order of ecclesiastical courts, and a separate system of law by them administered, may be traced back to the time of William the Conqueror, who separated the civil and the ecclesiastical jurisdictions, and forbade tribunals of either class from assuming cognizance of cases pertaining to the other. The elements of the English ecclesiastical law are the canon law, the civil law, the common law of England, and the statutes of the realm. The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical tribunals extended to matters concerning the order of clergy and their discipline, and also to such affairs of the laity as "concern the health of the soul," and under this latter theory it grasped also cases of marriage and divorce, and testamentary causes. But in very recent times (1830-1858), these latter subjects have been taken from these courts, and they are now substantially confined to administering the judicial authority and discipline incident to a national ecclesiastical establishment. See, also, "Canon Law."

ECDICUS (Graeco-Lat.) The attorney, proctor, or advocate of a corporation. Episcoporum ecdici. bishops' proctors; church lawyers. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 65.

ECHANTILLON. In French law. One of the two parts or pieces of a wooden tally. That in possession of the debtor is properly called the "tally;" the other "echantillon." Poth. Obl. pt. 4, c. 1, art. 2, § 8.

ECUMENICAL. General.

EDDERBRECHE. In Saxon law. The offense of hedge breaking.

EDESTIA. Buildings.

EDICT (Lat. edictum). A law ordained by the sovereign, by which he forbids or commands something. It extends either to the whole country, or only to some particular provinces.

Edicts are somewhat similar to public proclamations. Their difference consists in this, that the former have authority and form of law in themselves, whereas the latter are, at most, declarations of a law before enacted.

Among the Romans, this word sometimes signified a citation to appear before a judge. The edicts of the emperors, also called constitutiones principium, were new laws which they made of their own motion, either to decide cases which they had foreseen, or to abolish or change some ancient laws. They were different from "rescripts" or "decrees," which were answers given in deciding questions brought before them. These edicts contributed to the formation of the Gregorian, Hermogenian, Theodosian, and Justinian Codes. See Dig. 1. 4. 1. 1; Inst. 1. 2. 7; Code, 1. 1; Nov. 139.

EDICTS OF JUSTINIAN. Thirteen constitutions or laws of this prince, found in most editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis, after the Novels. Being confined to matters of police in the provinces of the empire, they are of little use.

EDICTUM (Lat.) In the Roman law. An edict; a mandate, or ordinance; an ordinance, or law, enacted by the emperor without the senate, belonging to the class of constitutiones principis. Inst. 1. 2. 6. An edict was a mere voluntary constitution of the emperor, differing from a rescript, in not being returned in the way of answer, and from a decree, in not being given in judgment, and from both, in not being founded upon solicitation. Tayl. Civ. Law, 233.

A general order published by the praetor, on entering upon his office, containing the system of rules by which he would administer justice during the year of his office. Dig. 1. 2. 2. 10; Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 35; Tayl. Civ. Law, 214; Calv. Lex.

EDICTUM PERPETUUM (Lat.) The title of a compilation of all the edicts. The collection is in fifty books, and was made by Salvius Julianus, a jurist acting by command of Emperor Adrian.

Parts of this collection are cited in the Digest.

EDICTUM THEODORICI. This is the first collection of law that was made after the downfall of the Roman power in Italy. It was promulgated by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, at Rome in A. D. 500. It consists of 154 chapters, in which we recognize parts taken from the Code and Novellae of Theodosius, from the Codices Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, and the Sententiae of Paulus. The edict was doubtless drawn up by Roman writers, but the original sources are more disfigured and altered than in any other compilation. This collection of law was intended to apply both to the Goths and the Romans, so far as its provisions went; but, when it made no alteration in the Gothic law, that law was still to be in force. Savigny, Hist. Rom. Law; Wharton.

EDITUS, or AEDITUS (Law Lat.) In old English law. Put forth; published or promulgated; passed as a law. Reg. Jud. 22. Contra formam statuti—editi et provisi; against the form of the statute—made and provided. Rast. Entr. 598, 599.

Brought forth or born, as a child. Bracton, fol. 278.

EFFECTS. Property, or worldly substance. As thus used, it denotes property in a more extensive sense than goods. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 284. It includes all kinds of personalty (9 West. Rep. 403), unless limited by context (13 Ves. 39). Whether or not it includes realty depends on the context. In 89 N. C. 447, it was held to include realty. Contra, 15 Mees. & W. 450.

EFFECTUS SEQUITUR CAUSAM. The effect follows the cause. Wingate, Max. 226.

EFFIGY. The figure or representation of a person.

To make the effigy of a person with an intent to make him the object of ridicule is a libel (q. v.) Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 73, § 2; 14 East, 227; 2 Chit. Crim. Law, 866.

In France an execution by effigy or in effigy is adopted in the case of a criminal who has fled from justice. By the public exposure or exhibition of a picture or representation of him on a scaffold, on which his name and the decree condemning him are written, he is deemed to undergo the punishment to which he has been sentenced. Since the adoption of the Code Civil, the practice has been to affix the names, qualities, or addition, and the residence, of the condemned person, together with an extract from the sentence of condemnation, to a post set upright in the ground, instead of exhibiting a portrait of him on the scaffold.

EFFLUX. Running of time; expiration by lapse of time.

EFFLUXION OF TIME. When this phrase is used in leases, conveyances, and other like deeds, or in agreements expressed in simple writing, it indicates the conclusion or expiration of an agreed term of years specified in the deed or writing; such conclusion or expiration arising in the natural course of events, in contradistinction to the determination of the term by the acts of the parties, or by some unexpected or unusual incident or other sudden event. Brown.

EFFORCIALITER (Law Lat.) Forcibly.

EFFRACTION. A breach made by the use of force.

EFFRACTOR. One who breaks through; one who commits a burglary.

EFFRACTORES. In old English and civil law. Burglars or prison breakers.

EFFUSIO SANGUINIS (Law Lat.) In old English law. The shedding of blood; the mulct, fine, wite, or penalty imposed for the shedding of blood. Cowell; Tomlin. See "Bloodnit."

EFTERS. In Saxon law. Ways, walks, or hedges. Blount.

EGALITY. Owelty (q. v.) Co. Litt. 169a.

EGO, TALIS. I, such a one. Used in old forms to indicate where the name and description of a party should be inserted.

EGREDIENS ET EXEUNS (Law Lat.) In old pleading. Going forth and issuing out of land. Towns. Pl. 17.

EI INCUMBIT PROBATIO QUI DICIT, non qui negat. The burden of the proof lies upon him who affirms, not he who denies. Dig. 22. 3. 2; Tait, Ev. 1; 1 Phil. Ev. 194; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 74; 3 La. 83; 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 408; 4 Bouv. Inst. note 4411.

EI NIHIL TURPE, CUI NIHIL SATIS. Nothing is base to whom nothing is sufficient. 4 Inst. 53.

EIA, or EY. An island. So called, according to Spelman, from a supposed resemblance to an egg or eye.

EIGNE. A corruption of the French word aine. Eldest or first-born.

It is frequently used in our old law books. Bastard eigne signifies an elder bastard when spoken of two children, one of whom was born before the marriage of his parents, and the other after. The latter is called mulier puisne. Litt. § 399.

EIK. In Scotch law. An addition; as, eik to a reversion, eik to a confirmation. Bell, Dict.

EINECIA. Eldership; the right or privilege of the first born.

EINETIUS, EINSNE, or EIGN. In English law. The oldest; the first-born. Spelman.

EIRE, or EYRE. In English law. A journey.

Justices in eyre were itinerant judges, who were sent once in seven years with a general commission into divers counties, to hear and determine such causes as were called "pleas of the crown." See "Justices in Eyre."

EIRENARCHA. A name formerly given to a justice of the peace. Bac. Works, IV. 316. In the Digests, the word is written "irenarcha."

EISDEM MODIS DISSOLVITUR OBLIGATIO quae nascitur ex contractu, vel quasi, quibus contrahitur. An obligation which arises from contract, or quasi contract, is dissolved in the same ways in which it is contracted. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60, § 19.

EISNETIA, or EINETIA (Lat.) The share of the oldest son; the portion acquired by primogeniture. Termes de la Ley; Co. Litt. 166b; Cowell.

EJECTA. A woman ravished or deflowered, or cast forth from the virtuous. Blount.

EJECTIONE CUSTODIAE (Lat.) A writ which lay for a guardian to recover the land or person of his ward, or both, where he had been deprived of the possession of them. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 139 (L); Co. Litt. 199.

EJECTIONE FIRMAE (Lat. ejectment from a farm). This writ lay where lands or tenements were let for a term of years, and afterwards the lessor, reversioner, remainderman, or a stranger ejected or ousted the lessee of his term. The plaintiff, if he prevailed, recovered the term with damages. This writ is the original foundation of the action of ejectment. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 199; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 220 (F), (G); Gibson, Eject. 3; Stearns, Real Actions, 53, 400.

EJECTMENT (Lat. e, out of, jacere, to throw, cast; ejicere, to cast out, to eject). In practice. A form of action by which possessory titles to corporeal hereditaments may be tried, and possession obtained.

A form of action which lies to regain the possession of real property, with damages for the unlawful detention.

In its origin, this action was an action of trespass which lay for a tenant for years, to recover damages against a person who had ousted him of his possession without right. To the judgment for damages, the courts soon added a judgment for possession, upon which the plaintiff became entitled to a writ of possession. As the disadvantages of real actions as a means of recovering lands for the benefit of the real owner from the possession of one who held them without title became a serious obstacle to their use, this form of action was taken advantage of by Rolle, C. J., to accomplish the same result.

In the original action, the plaintiff had been obliged to prove a lease from the person shown to have title, an entry under the lease, and an ouster by some third person. The modified action as sanctioned by Rolle was brought by a fictitious person as lessee against another fictitious person (the casual ejector) alleged to have committed the ouster. Service was made upon the tenant in possession, with a notice annexed from the casual ejector to appeal and defend. If the tenant failed to do this, judgment was given by default, and the claimant put in possession. If he did appear, he was allowed to defend only by entering into the consent rule, by which he confessed the fictitious lease, entry, and ouster to have been made, leaving only the title in question. The tenant, by a subsequent statute, was obliged, under heavy penalties, to give notice to his lessor of the pendency of the action.

The action has been superseded in England by a form prescribed by the common law procedure act (1852, §§ 170-220), and has been materially modified in many of the states of the United States, though still retaining the name; but is retained in its original form in others, and in the United States courts for those states in which it existed when the circuit courts were organized. In some of the United States it has never been in use. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 198-207; 1 Washb. Real Prop. (4th Ed.) 433.

EJECTUM. That which is thrown up by the sea. 1 Pet. Adm. (U. S.) 43.

EJECTUS. In old English law. A pimp or whoremonger.

EJERCITORIA. In Spanish law. The action which lies against the owner of a vessel for debts contracted by the master, or contracts entered into by him, for the purpose of repairing, rigging, and victualling the same.

EJIDOS (Spanish). Commons. 15 Cal. 554.

EJURARE. In feudal law. To abjure, renounce, or disclaim by oath.

EJUS EST INTERPRETARI CUJUS EST condere. It is his to interpret whose it is to enact. Tayl. Civ. Law, 96.

EJUS EST NOLLE, QUI POTEST VELLE. He who can will [exercise volition] has a right to refuse to will [to withhold consent]. Dig. 50. 7. 3.

EJUS EST NON NOLLE QUI POTEST velle. He may consent tacitly who may consent expressly. Dig. 50. 17. 3.

EJUS EST PERICULUM CUJUS EST DOminium aut commodum. He has the risk who has the right of property or advantage.

EJUS NULLA CULPA EST CUI PARERE necesse sit. No guilt attaches to him who is compelled to obey. Dig. 50. 17. 169.

EJUSDEM GENERIS (Lat.) Of the same kind.

In the construction of laws, wills, and other instruments, when certain things are enumerated, and then a phrase is used which might be construed to include other things, it is generally confined to things ejusdem generis. Thus, "clerical or other defects" includes only formal defects (40 Barb. [N. Y.] 574), and a statute providing for relief to women whose husbands fail to support them "from drunkenness, profligacy, or any other cause," means only causes of similar nature, and does not include physical incapacity. 20 Wis. 682.

ELABORARE (Law Lat.) In old European law. To gain, acquire, or purchase, as by labor and industry. Elaboratus, property acquired by labor. Spelman.

ELDER BRETHREN. See "Trinity Masters."

ELDER TITLE. That of two titles coming simultaneously into conflict which is of earlier date.

ELECTA UNA VIA, NON DATUR RECursus ad alteram. When there is concurrence of means, he who has chosen one cannot have recourse to another. 10 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 170.

ELECTIO EST INTIMA [INTERNA], LIbera, et spontanea separatio unius rei ab alia, sine compulsione, consistens in animo et voluntate. Election is an internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, without compulsion, consisting in intention and will. Dyer, 281.

ELECTIO SEMEL FACTA, ET PLACITum testatum, non patitur regressum. Election once made, and plea witnessed, suffers not a recall. Co. Litt. 146.

ELECTION. Choice; selection. The selection of one man from among more, to discharge certain duties in a state, corporation, or society.

The obligation imposed upon a party to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights or claims, in cases where there is clear intention of the person from whom he derives one that he should not enjoy both.

——Of Officers. The choice of officers of a public or private body by the votes of the members, or a class thereof. It differs from "appointment," which implies the conferring of official station by one or more persons having power to represent the body in that regard. 25 Md. 215.

——Of Rights. The right or duty of one who, by contract or donation, is entitled to two or more rights in the alternative, to select that which he will accept as a substitute for the others. One form of this, sometimes known as "equitable election," arises when an instrument gives a right coupled with a burden, the donee of the right having an election whether to accept the same cum onere, but being compelled to accept thus, if at all.

——Of Remedies. The choice between two or more coexisting and inconsistent remedies for the same wrong. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1078.

——Between Criminal Charges. The choice by a public prosecutor upon which of several offenses charged in a single indictment he will go to the jury.

ELECTION AUDITORS. In English law. Officers annually appointed, to whom was committed the duty of taking and publishing the account of all expenses incurred at parliamentary elections. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, §§ 18, 26-28. But these sections have been repealed by 26 Vict. c. 29, which throws the duty of preparing the accounts on the declared agent of the candidate, and the duty of publishing an abstract of it on the returning officer. Wharton.

ELECTION JUDGES. In English law. Judges of the high court, selected in pursuance of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, § 11, and Judicature Act 1873, § 38, for the trial of election petitions.

ELECTION PETITIONS. Petitions for inquiry into the validity of elections of members of parliament, when it is alleged that the return of a member is invalid for bribery, or any other reason. These petitions are heard by a judge of one of the common-law divisions of the high court. Parl. El. Act 1868; Judicature Act 1873, § 38.

ELECTIONES FIANT RITE ET LIBERE sine interruptione aliqua. Elections should be made in due form, and freely, without any interruption. 2 Inst. 169.

ELECTIVE. Pertaining to elections, as the elective franchise.

Dependent on election, as an elective office.

ELECTOR. One who has the right to make choice of public officers; one who has a right to vote. See 10 Minn. 107; 53 Wis. 45.

ELECTORS OF PRESIDENT. Persons elected by the people, whose sole duty is to elect a president and vice president of the United States. Const. art. 2, § 1; Const. amend. art. 2.

ELEEMOSYNA REGIS (or ARATRI, or carucarum). A penny which King Ethelred ordered to be paid for every plow in England towards the support of the poor.

ELEEMOSYNAE. Possessions of the church. Blount.

ELEEMOSYNARIA. The place in a religious house where the common alms were deposited, and thence by the almoner distributed to the poor.

——In Old English. The aumerie, aumbry, or ambry; words still used in common speech in the north of England to denote a pantry or cupboard. Cowell.

The office of almoner. Cowell.

ELEEMOSYNARIUS (Lat.) An almoner. There was formerly a lord almoner to the kings of England, whose duties are described in Fleta, lib. 2, c. 23. A chief officer who received the eleemosynary rents and gifts, and in due method distributed them to pious and charitable uses. Cowell.

ELEEMOSYNARY CORPORATIONS. Such private corporations as are instituted for purposes of charity, their object being the perpetual distribution of the bounty of the founder of them to such persons as he directed. Of this kind are hospitals for the relief of the impotent, indigent, sick, and deaf or dumb. Angell & A. Corp. § 39; 1 Kyd, Corp, 26; 4 Conn. 272; 3 Bland, Ch. (Md.) 407; 1 Ld. Raym. 5; 2 Term R. 346. The distinction between ecclesiastical and eleemosynary corporations is well illustrated in the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 681. See, also, Angell & A. Corp. § 39; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 471.

ELEGANTER (Lat.) In the civil law. Accurately; with discrimination. 3 Story (U. S.) 611, 636.

ELEGIT (Lat. eligere, to choose). A writ of execution directed to the sheriff, commanding him to make delivery of a moiety of the party's land and all his goods, beasts of the plough only excepted. The sheriff, on receipt of the writ, holds an inquest to ascertain the value of the lands and goods he has seized, and then they are delivered to the plaintiff, who retains them until the whole debt and damages have been paid and satisfied. During that term he is called "tenant by elegit." Co. Litt. 289. See Powell, Mortg. Index; Watson, Sheriffs, 206; 1 C. B. (N. S.) 568.

The name was given because the plaintiff has his choice to accept either this writ or a fi. fa.

By statute, in England, the sheriff is now to deliver the whole estate instead of the half. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 418, note. The writ is still in use in the United States to some extent, and with somewhat different modifications in the various states adopting it. 4 Kent, Comm. 431, 436; 10 Grat. (Va.) 580; 1 Hilliard, Abr. 555, 556.

ELEMENTS. "Damage by the elements" has been held synonymous with "damage by act of God." "The elements are the means by which God acts." 35 Cal. 416.

ELIMINATION. Banishment; expulsion.

ELINGUATION. The punishment of cutting out the tongue.

ELISORS. In practice. Two persons appointed by the court to return a jury, when the sheriff and the coroner have been challenged as incompetent. In this case, the elisors return the writ of venire directed to them, with a panel of the jurors' names, and their return is final, no challenge being allowed to their array. 3 Bl. Comm. 355; 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 32; 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 296.

ELOGIUM (Lat.) In civil law. A will or testament.

ELOIGN, or ELOIGNE. To remove to a distance. See "Elongata."

ELONGATA. In practice. The return made by the sheriff to a writ of replevin, when the goods have been removed to places unknown to him. See, for the form of this return, Watson, Sheriffs, Append. c. 18, § 3, p. 454; 3 Bl. Comm. 148.

On this return, the plaintiff is entitled to a capias in withernam. See "Withernam;" Watson, Sheriffs, 300, 301. The word eloigne is sometimes used as synonymous with elongata.

ELONGATUS. A return to a writ de homine replegiando, that the man was out of the sheriff's jurisdiction.

ELONGAVIT. In England, where, in a proceeding by foreign attachment, the plaintiff has obtained judgment of appraisement, but by reason of some act of the garnishee the goods cannot be appraised (as where he has removed them from the city, or has sold them, etc.), the serjeant-at-mace returns that the garnishee has eloigned them, i. e., removed them out of the jurisdiction, and on this return (called an "elongavit") judgment is given for the plaintiff that an inquiry be made of the goods eloigned. This inquiry is set down for trial, and the assessment is made by a jury after the manner of ordinary issues. Brant. For. Att. 124. The proceedings on the inquiry are also sometimes called the "elongavit." ELOPEMENT. The departure of a married woman from her husband, and dwelling with an adulterer. Cowell; Blount; Tomlin.

ELUVIONES. Spring tides.

EMANCIPATION. An act by which a person who was once in the power of another is rendered free.

This is of importance mainly in relation to the emancipation of minors from the parental control. See 3 Term R. 355; 6 Term R. 247; 8 Term R. 479; 3 East, 276; 10 East, 88; 11 Vt. 258, 477. See Cooper, Just. Inst. 441, 480; 2 Dall. (Pa.) 57, 58; Civ. Code La. bk. 1, tit. 8, c. 3; Ferriere, Dict. de Jur.; 15 Mass. 272; 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 184.

EMBARGO. A proclamation, or order of state, usually issued in time of war or threatened hostilities, prohibiting the departure of ships or goods from some or all the ports of such state, until further order. 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 148. It is in its nature and policy a temporary measure. 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 308. It is sometimes on the citizens of the power ordering it; sometimes on a foreign power as a means of coercing a settlement of difficulties that have not yet culminated in war, or of preparation for impending war. The former is called "civil," the latter "hostile," embargo.

EMBASSAGE, or EMBASSY. The message or commission given by a sovereign or state to a minister, called an "ambassador," empowered to treat or communicate with another sovereign or state; also the establishment of an ambassador.

EMBEZZLEMENT. The wrongful and fraudulent appropriation of property to his own use by one to whom it has been entrusted by or for the owner.

A breach of trust is the essence of the offense. To constitute embezzlement, the person appropriating the property must hold a relation of trust towards the owner, by virtue of which he had possession of such property. 31 Cal. 108; 68 Iowa, 593; 110 Mo. 209.

The appropriation must be with fraudulent intent, and by this embezzlement is distinguished from mere tortious conversion. 82 Ill. 425; 78 Ga. 340; 62 Mich. 276; 50 N. J. Law, 475.

The offense is a purely statutory one, and by many of the statutes is denominated "larceny," but it is commonly known as "embezzlement," and is distinct from larceny at common law, one of the essentials of which was a wrongful taking from the possession of the owner.

EMBLEMENTS. Crops. 65 Cal. 458. The growing crops of those vegetable productions of the soil which are not spontaneous, but require an outlay of cost and labor in one part of the year, the recompense for which is to arise in the shape of a crop in another part of the same year. The produce of grass, trees, and the like is not included. 76 Ind. 531.

EMBLERS DE GENTZ (Law Fr.) A stealing from the people. The phrase occurs in the old rolls of parliament: "Whereas divers murders, emblers de gentz, and robberies are committed," etc. Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. III. note 62.

EMBRACEOR. In criminal law. He who, when a matter is on trial between party and party, comes to the bar with one of the parties, and, having received some reward so to do, speaks in the case, or privily labors the jury, or stands there to survey or overlook them, thereby to put them in fear and doubt of the matter. But persons learned in the law may speak in a case for their clients. Co. Litt. 369; Termes de la Ley.

EMBRACERY. In criminal law. An attempt to corrupt or influence a jury, or any way incline them to be more favorable to one side than to the other, by money, promises, threats, or persuasions, whether the juror on whom such attempt is made give any verdict or not, or whether the verdict be true or false. Hawk. P. C. 259; Bac. Abr. "Juries" (M 3); Co. Litt. 157b, 369a; Hob. 294; Dyer, 84a, pl. 19; Noy, 102; 1 Strange, 643; 11 Mod. 111, 118; Comyn, Dig. 601; 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 503.

EMBRING (or EMBER) DAYS. In ecclesiastical law. Those days which the ancient fathers called "quatuor tempora jejunii" are of great antiquity in the church. They are observed on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday next after Quadragesima Sunday, or the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsuntide, Holyrood Day, in September, and St. Lucy's Day, about the middle of December. Britt. c. 53. Our almanacs call the weeks in which they fall the "Ember Weeks," and they are now chiefly noticed on account of the ordination of priests and deacons; because the canon appoints the Sundays next after the Ember weeks for the solemn times of ordination, though the bishops, if they please, may ordain on any Sunday or holiday. Enc. Lond.

EMENDA (Lat.) Amends; that which is given in reparation or satisfaction for a trespass committed, or, among the Saxons, a compensation for a crime. Spelman.

EMENDALS. In English law. This ancient word is said to be used in the accounts of the inner temple, where so much in emendals at the foot of an account signifies so much in bank, in stock, for the supply of emergencies. Cunningham.

EMENDARE (Law Lat.) In Saxon law. To make amends or satisfaction for any crime or trespass committed; emendam solvere, to pay a fine; to be fined. Spelman. Emendare se, to redeem, or ransom one's life, by payment of a weregild.

To repair. Reg. Orig. 44b.

EMENDATIO (Lat.)

——In Old English Law. Amendment, or correction; the power of amending and correcting abuses, according to certain rules and measures. Cowell.

——In Saxon Law. A pecuniary satisfaction for an injury; the same as emenda (q. v.) Spelman.

EMENDATIO PANIS ET CEREVISIAE. The power of supervising and correcting the weights and measures of bread and ale. Cowell.

EMERGE (Lat.) To arise; to come to light.

EMIGRANT. One who quits his country for any lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, and who takes his family and property, if he has any, with him. Vattel, bk. 1, c. 19, § 224. See "Emigration."

EMIGRATION. The act of removing from one place to another.

It is sometimes used in the same sense as "expatriation," but there is some difference in the signification. Expatriation is the act of abandoning one's country; while emigration is, perhaps not strictly, applied to the act of removing from one part of the country to another. See 2 Kent, Comm. 36.

EMINENT DOMAIN. The power to take private property for public use, whether exercised by the sovereign directly, or by one to whom the sovereign power has been delegated for quasi public purposes.

The superior right of property subsisting in a sovereignty, by which private property may in certain cases be taken or its use controlled for the public benefit, without regard to the wishes of the owner.

The highest and most exact idea of property remaining in the government, or in the aggregate body of the people in their sovereign capacity, giving a right to resume the possession of the property in the manner directed by the constitution and the laws of the state whenever the public good requires it. 3 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 73.

The term was originated by Grotius (De Jure Belli, lib. 3, c. 20, VII.)

EMISSION. In medical jurisprudence. The act by which any matter whatever is thrown from the body; thus, it is usual to say, emission of urine, emission of semen, etc.

EMIT. To put out; to send forth.

The tenth section of the first article of the constitution contains various prohibitions, among which is the following: "No state shall emit bills of credit." To emit bills of credit is to issue paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes, as money, which paper is redeemable at a future day. 4 Pet. (U. S.) 410, 432; 11 Pet. (U. S.) 257; Story, Const. § 1358.

EMMENAGOGUES. In medical jurisprudence. The name of a class of medicines which are believed to have the power of favoring the discharge of the menses. They are sometimes used for the criminal purpose of producing abortion (q. v.) 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 316; Dungl. Med. Dict.; Parr, Med. Dict.; 3 Paris & F. Med. Jur. 88.

EMOLUMENT. Any pecuniary advantage, profit, or gain arising from the possession of an office. It imports more than "salary" or "fees," and includes any perquisite, advantage, profit, or gain arising from the possession of an office. 105 Pa. St. 303.

EMOTIONAL INSANITY. The species of mental aberration produced by a violent excitement of the emotions or passions, though the reasoning faculties may remain unimpaired.

EMPALEMENT. In ancient law. A mode of inflicting punishment by thrusting a sharp pole up the fundament. Enc. Lond.

EMPANNEL. See "Impannel."

EMPARLANCE. See "Imparlance."

EMPARNOURS (Law Fr.) Undertakers of suits. Kelham.

EMPEROR. This word is synonymous with the Latin imperator. They are both derived from the verb imperare. Literally, it signifies "he who commands."

Under the Roman republic, the title "emperor" was the generic name given to the commanders-in-chief in the armies. But even then the application of the word was restrained to the successful commander, who was declared emperor by the acclamations of the army, and was afterwards honored with the title by a decree of the senate.

It is now used to designate some sovereign prince who bears this title. Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 23.

EMPHYTEOSIS. In civil law. The name of a contract by which the owner of an uncultivated piece of land granted it to another, either in perpetuity, or for a long time, on condition that he should improve it by building, planting, or cultivating it, and should pay for it an annual rent, with a right to the grantee to alienate it, or transmit it by descent to his heirs, and under a condition that the grantor should never reenter as long as the rent should be paid to him by the grantee or his assigns. Inst. 3. 25. 3; 18 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 144.

EMPHYTEUTA. The grantee under a contract of emphyteusis or emphyteosis. Vicat; Calv. Lex.; 1 Hallam, Mid. Ages, c. 2, p. 1.

EMPHYTEUTICUS. In the civil law. Founded on, growing out of, or having the character of, an emphyteusis; held under an emphyteusis. 3 Bl. Comm. 232; Calv. Lex.

EMPLAZAMIENTO. In Spanish law. The citation given to a person by order of the judge, and ordering him to appear before his tribunal on a given day and hour.

EMPLEAD. See "Implead."

EMPLOYE. One who is employed. The term is general, but is rarely applied either to common laborers or to the higher officers of a corporation. 66 Wis. 481; 109 N. Y. 631.

EMPLOYMENT. A business or vocation. 16 Ala. 411. The service of another. 72 Me. 455.

EMPRESTIDO. In Spanish law. A loan; something lent to the borrower at his request. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 18, lib. 70.

EMPTIO, or EMPTOR (Lat. emere, to buy). Emptio, a buying; emptor, a buyer; emptio et venditio, buying and selling.

——In Roman Law. The name of a contract of sale. Du Cange; Vicat.

EMPTIO BONORUM. In the Roman law. The assignment of the estate and effects of an insolvent debtor, whether during his life or after his death, to a trustee for his creditors. Justinian deprived it of all its cumbrous formalities, but retained its effect, which is simply or very nearly that of an assignment upon bankruptcy in English law.

EMPTIO ET VENDITIO (Lat. buying and selling). In Roman law. The contract of sale. Sometimes it was compounded,—emptio-venditio.

EMPTOR (Lat.) Buyer.

EMPTOR EMIT QUAM MINIMO POTEST, venditor vendit quam maximo potest. The buyer buys for as little as possible; the vendor sells for as much as possible. 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 252, 256, 486.

EN AUTRE DROIT (Fr.) In the right of another.

EN BANKE (Law Fr.) In the bench. 1 And. 51.

EN DEMEURE (Fr.) In default. Used in Louisiana. 3 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 574.

EN ESCHANGE IL COVIENT QUE LES estates soient egales. In an exchange it is necessary that the estates be equal. Co. Litt. 50; 2 Hilliard, Real Prop. 298.

EN GROS (Fr.) In gross; by wholesale. Britt. c. 21.

EN JUICIO (Spanish). Judicially; in a court of law; in a suit at law. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 8, c. 1.

EN MORT MEYNE (Law Fr.) In a dead hand; in mortmain. Britt. c. 43.

EN OWEL MAIN (Law Fr.) In equal hand. The word "owel" occurs also in the phrase "owelty of partition." See 1 Washb. Real Prop. 427.

EN VENTRE SA MERE (Fr.) In its mother's womb. For certain purposes, as of inheritance, etc., a child en ventre sa mere is to be considered as in being.

EN VIE (Law Fr.) In life; alive. Britt. c. 50.

ENABLING POWERS. A term used in equity. When the donor of a power, who is the owner of the estate, confers upon persons not seised of the fee the right of creating interests to take effect out of it, which could not be done by the donee of the power unless by such authority, this is called an "enabling power." 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1628; 2 Bl. Comm. 319; Co. Litt. 44a; 3 Steph. Comm. 139.

ENABLING STATUTE. The act of 32 Henry VIII. c. 28, by which tenants in tail, husbands seised in right of their wives, were empowered to make leases for their lives or for twenty-one years, which they could not do before. 2 Bl. Comm. 319.

Applied generally to special acts conferring powers not previously possessed.

ENACT. To establish by law; to perform or effect; to decree. The usual formula in making laws is, "Be it enacted."

ENAJENACION. In Spanish law. The act by which one person transfers to another a property, either gratuitously, as in the case of a donation, or by an owner's title, as in the case of a sale or an exchange.

ENBREVER (Law Fr.) To write down in short; to abbreviate, or, in old language, imbreviate; to put into a schedule. Britt. c. 1.

ENCAUSTUM. See "Incaustum."

ENCEINTE (Fr.) Pregnant (q. v.)

ENCHESON, ENCHESSON, ENCHASON, enchison, or acheson (Law Fr.) Cause; reason; occasion. Par quel encheson il se neya, for what reason he drowned himself. Britt. c. 1. Par encheson de matrimoyne, in consideration of marriage. Id. c. 34. Sans reasonable encheson, without reasonable cause. St. Westminster I. c. 6.

ENCLOSURE. An artificial fence around one's estate. See "Close."

ENCOMIENDA. A charge or mandate conferring certain important privileges on the four military orders of Spain, to wit, those of Santiago, Calatrava, Alcantara, and Montesa. In the legislation of the Indias, it signified the concession of a certain number of Indians for the purpose of instructing them in the Christian religion, and defending their persons and property.

ENCROACHMENT. An unlawful extension of one's right upon the lands of another.

An alteration by the owner of an easement of the dominant tenement, so as to impose an additional burden on the servient tenement. Gale, Easm. 615.

ENDENZIE, or ENDENIZEN. To make free; to enfranchise.

ENDORSE. See "Indorse."

ENDOWMENT (Law Fr. and Eng.) The assignment or bestowment of dower to or upon a woman. 2 Bl. Comm. 135.

The providing for the officiating ministers of a church, by setting apart a certain portion of lands, etc., for their maintenance, etc. 2 Bl. Comm. 21; 1 Bl. Comm. 387; 3 Steph. Comm. 111. It has no reference to building or providing a site. 35 Eng. Law & Eq. 433.

The provision itself, so made (dos ecclesiae). Comyn, Dig. "Dismes" (B).

ENDOWMENT POLICY. In insurance; a policy of life insurance payable to the insured during his lifetime, if he arrive at a certain age.

ENEMY. A nation which is at war with another; a citizen or a subject of such a nation; any of the subjects or citizens of a state in amity with the United States, who have commenced, or have made preparations for commencing, hostilities against the United States, and also the citizens or subjects of a state in amity with the United States, who are in the service of a state at war with them. See Salk. 635; Bac. Abr. "Treason" (G).

"An enemy is he with whom a nation is at war." Vattel, 387. "It does not embrace rebels in insurrection against their own government. An enemy is always the subject of a foreign power, who owes no allegiance to our government." 4 Sawy. (U. S.) 457.

By the term "enemy" is also understood a person who is desirous of doing injury to another. The Latins had two terms to signify these two classes of persons: The first, or the public enemy, they called hostis, and the latter, or the private enemy, inimicus.

ENFEOFF. To make a gift of any corporeal hereditaments to another. See "Feoffment."

ENFRANCHISE. To make free; to incorporate a man in a society or body politic. Cunningham.

ENFRANCHISEMENT. Giving freedom to a person; admitting a person to the freedom of a city. A denizen of England, or a citizen of London, is said to be enfranchised. So, too, a villein is enfranchised when he obtains his freedom from his lord. Termes de la Ley; 11 Coke, 91; Jacob.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF COPYHOLD. The change of the tenure by which lands are held from copyhold to freehold, as by a conveyance to the copyholder, or by a release of the seignorial rights. 1 Watk. Copyholds, 362; 1 Steph. Comm. 208; 2 Steph. Comm. 51.

ENGAGEMENT. In French law. A contract; the obligations arising from a quasi contract.

The terms "obligation" and "engagement" are said to be synonymous (17 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 1), but the Code seems specially to apply the term "engagement" to those obligations which the law imposes on a man without the intervention of any contract, either on the part of the obligor or the obligee. Article 1370.

ENGLESHIRE, or ANGLESCHERIA. A law was made by Canute, for the preservation of his Danes, that, when a man was killed, the hundred or town should be liable to be amerced, unless it could be proved that the person killed was an Englishman. This proof was called engleshire. It consisted, generally, of the testimony of two males on the part of the father of him who had been killed, and two females on the part of his mother. 1 Hale, P. C. 447; 4 Bl. Comm. 195; Spelman.

ENGLISH INFORMATION. In English law. A proceeding in the court of exchequer in matters of revenue. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104.

ENGROSS (Fr. gros). To copy the rude draught of an instrument in a fair, large hand; to write out, in a large, fair hand, on parchment. The term is applied to statutes, which, after being read and acted on a sufficient number of times, are ordered to be engrossed. Anciently, also, used of the process of making the indenture of a fine. 5 Coke, 39b.

——In Criminal Law. To buy up such large quantities of an article as to obtain a monopoly of it for the purpose of selling at an unreasonable price. The tendency of modern English law is very decidedly to restrict the application of the law against engrossing, and it is very doubtful if it applies at all except to obtaining a monopoly of provisions. 1 East, 143. Merely buying for the purpose of selling again is not necessarily engrossing. 14 East, 406; 15 East, 511. See 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 159, note, for the law upon this subject.

ENGROSSER. One who engrosses or writes on parchment in a large, fair hand; one who purchases large quantities of any commodity in order to have the command of the market, and to sell them again at high prices.

ENGROSSING. The offense committed by an engrosser; writing on parchment in a large, fair hand. See "Engross."

ENITIA PARS (Law Lat.) The part of the eldest. Co. Litt. 166; Bac. Abr. "Coparceners" (C).

When partition is voluntarily made among coparceners in England, the eldest has the first choice, or primer election (q. v.), and the part which she takes is called enitia pars. This right is purely personal, and descends. It is also said that even her assignee shall enjoy it; but this has been doubted. The word enitia is said to be derived from the old French eisne, the eldest. Bac. Abr. "Coparceners (C); Keilw. 1a, 49a; 2 And. 21; Cro. Eliz. 18.

ENJOIN. To command; to require; as, private individuals are not only permitted, but enjoined, by law, to arrest an offender when present at the time a felony is committed, or a dangerous wound given, on pain of fine and imprisonment if the wrongdoer escape through their negligence. 1 Hale, P. C. 587; 1 East, P. C. 298, 304; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 12, § 13; Ryan & M. 93.

To command or order a defendant in equity to do or not to do a particular thing by writ of injunction. See "Injunction."

ENLARGE. To extend; as, to enlarge a rule to plead is to extend the time during which a defendant may plead. To enlarge means, also, to set at liberty; as, the prisoner was enlarged on giving bail.

ENLARGER L'ESTATE. A species of release which inures by way of enlarging an estate, and consists of a conveyance of the ulterior interest to the particular tenant; as if there be tenant for life or years, remainder to another in fee, and he in remainder releases all his right to the particular tenant and his heirs, this gives him the estate in fee. 1 Steph. Comm. 518.

ENLARGING. Extending, or making more comprehensive; as, an enlarging statute, which is one extending the common law.

ENLARGING STATUTE. See "Statute."

ENLISTMENT. The act of making a contract to serve the government in a subordinate capacity, either in the army or navy. The contract so made is also called an "enlistment." See, as to the power of infants to enlist, 4 Bin. (Pa.) 487; 5 Bin. (Pa.) 423; 6 Bin. (Pa.) 255; 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 87; 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 93.

ENORMIA (Lat.) Wrongs. It occurs in the old Latin forms of pleading, where, after a specific allegation of the wrongs done by the defendant, the plaintiff alleges generally that the defendant did alia enormia (other wrongs), to the damage, etc. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 278; 1 Chit. Pl. 397. See "Alia Enormia."

ENPLEET. An old form of "implead."

ENQUETE. In canon law. An examination of witnesses in the presence of a judge authorized to sit for this purpose, taken in writing, to be used as evidence in the trial of a cause. The day of hearing must be specified in a notice to the opposite party. 9 Low. (U. S.) 392. It may be opened, in some cases, before the trial. 10 Low. (U. S.) 19.

ENROLL. To register; to enter on the rolls of chancery, or other courts; to make a record.

ENROLLMENT. In English law. The registering or entering on the rolls of chancery, king's bench, common pleas, or exchequer, or by the clerk of the peace in the records of the quarter sessions, of any lawful act, as, a recognizance, a deed of bargain and sale, and the like. Jacob.

ENS LEGIS (Law Lat.) A legal entity; an artificial person created by law as a corporation.

ENSCHEDULE. To insert in a list, account, or writing.

ENSEAL. To seal.

ENSERVER (Law Fr.) To make subject to a service or servitude. Britt. c. 54.

ENTAIL. A fee abridged or limited to the issue, or certain classes of issue, instead of descending to all the heirs. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 66; Cowell; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 112, note.

To restrict the inheritance of lands to a particular class of issue. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 66; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 113. See "Estates;" "Tail."

ENTAILED MONEY. That which is given to be used or invested in acquiring an "estate tail." 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, §§ 70-72.

ENTENCION. In old English law. The plaintiff's declaration.

ENTENDMENT. The old form of intendment (q. v.), derived directly from the French, and used by Cowell to denote the true meaning or signification of a word or sentence; that is, the understanding or construction of law.

ENTER. To go upon lands for the purpose of taking possession; to take possession. In a strict use of terms, "entry" and "taking possession" would seem to be distinct parts of the same act; but, practically, "entry" is now merged in "taking possession." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 10, 32; Stearns, Real Actions, 2.

To cause to be put down upon the record. An attorney is said to enter his appearance, or the party himself may enter an appearance. 74 Ind. 59.

To enter judgment is to formally enroll it or repose the evidence of it in the record or permanent memorial of the acts of the court.

ENTERCEUR (Law Fr.) A party challenging (claiming) goods; he who has placed them in the hands of a third person. Kelham.

ENTIRE CONTRACT. See "Contract."

ENTIRE TENANCY. A sole possession by one. Wharton.

ENTIRETY. This word denotes the whole, in contradistinction to moiety, which denotes the half part. A husband and wife, when jointly seised of land, are seised by entireties, and not pur mie, as joint tenants are. Jacob; 2 Kent, Comm. 132; 4 Kent, Comm. 362; 3 Pa. St. 350, 367.

ENTITLE. In its usual sense, to entitle is to give a right or title; therefore a person is said to be entitled to property when he has a right to it. L. R. 20 Eq. 534.

——In Ecclesiastical Law. To entitle is to give a title or ordination as a minister. Gibs. Code, 141, note.

——In Practice. To prefix to a document the title of the cause to which it relates.

ENTREBAT (Law Fr.) An intruder or interloper. Britt. c. 114.

ENTREGA. In Spanish law. Delivery.

ENTREPOT. A warehouse; a magazine where goods are deposited which are to be again removed.

ENTRY. The act of setting down the particulars of a sale, or other transaction, in a merchant's or tradesman's account books. Such entries are, in general, prima facie evidence of the sale and delivery, and of work done; but unless the entry be the original one, it is not evidence.

The submitting to the inspection of officers appointed by law, who have the collection of the customs, goods imported into the United States, together with a statement or description of such goods, and the original invoices of the same, for the purpose of estimating the duties to be paid thereon.

Act March 2, 1799, § 36 (1 Story, U. S. Laws, 606), and Act March 1, 1823 (3 Story, U. S. Laws, 1881), regulate the manner of making entries of goods.

——In Criminal Law. The act of entering a dwelling house, or other building, in order to commit a crime. See "Burglary."

——Upon Real Estate. The act of going upon the lands of another, or lands claimed as one's own, with intent to take possession. 1 Ala. 674.

ENTRY AD COMMUNEM LEGEM. In English law. A writ which lay in favor of the reversioner, when the tenant for term of life, tenant for term of another's life, tenant by the curtesy, or tenant in dower, had aliened and died. Tomlins.

ENTRY AD TERMINUM QUI PRAETERIIT. The writ of entry ad terminum qui praeteriit lies where a man leases land to another for a term of years, and the tenant holds over his term. And if lands be leased to a man for the term of another's life, and he for whose life the lands are leased dies, and the lessee holds over, then the lessor shall have this writ. Termes de la Ley.

ENTRY FOR MARRIAGE IN SPEECH. A writ of entry causa matrimonii praeloquuti lies where lands or tenements are given to a man upon condition that he shall take the donor to be his wife within a certain time, and he does not espouse her within the said term, or espouses another woman, or makes himself priest. Termes de la Ley.

ENTRY IN CASU CONSIMILI. A writ of entry in casu consimili lies where a tenant for life or by the curtesy aliens in fee. Termes de la Ley.

ENTRY IN THE CASE PROVIDED. A writ of entry in casu proviso lies if a tenant in dower alien in fee, or for life, or for another's life. Termes de la Ley.

ENTRY ON THE ROLL. In former times, the parties to an action, personally or by their counsel, used to appear in open court, and make their mutual statements viva voce, instead of, as at the present day, delivering their mutual pleadings, until they arrived at the issue or precise point in dispute between them. During the progress of this oral statement, a minute of the various proceedings was made on parchment by an officer of the court appointed for that purpose. The parchment then became the record; in other words, the official history of the suit. Long after the practice of oral pleading had fallen into disuse, it continued necessary to enter the proceedings in like manner upon the parchment roll, and this was called "entry on the roll," or making up the "issue roll." But by a rule of H. T. 4 Wm. IV., the practice of making up the issue roll was abolished, and it was only necessary to make up the issue in the form prescribed for the purpose by a rule of H. T. 1853, and to deliver the same to the court and to the opposite party. The issue which was delivered to the court was called the "nisi prius record;" and that was regarded as the official history of the suit, in like manner as the issue roll formerly was. Under the present practice, the issue roll or nisi prius record consists of the papers delivered to the court, to facilitate the trial of the action, these papers consisting of the pleadings simply, with the notice of trial. Brown.

ENTRY WITHOUT ASSENT OF THE chapter. A writ of entry sine assensu capituli lies where an abbot, prior, or such as has covent or common seal, aliens lands of the church without the assent of the chapter, and then dies. Termes de la Ley.

ENTRY, WRIT OF. In old practice. A real action brought to recover the possession of lands from one who wrongfully withholds possession thereof.

In general, the writ of entry is the universal remedy to recovery possession when wrongfully withheld from the owner. 3 Bl. Comm. 183.

Such writs were said to be in the quibus, where the suit was brought against the party who committed the wrong; in the per, where the tenant against whom the action was brought was either heir or grantee of the original wrongdoer; in the per and cui, where there had been two descents, two alienations, or a descent and an alienation; in the post, where the wrong was removed beyond the degrees mentioned.

The above designations are derived from significant Latin words in the respective forms adapted to the cases given.

The writ was of many varieties, also, according to the character of the title of the claimant and the circumstances of the deprivation of possession. Booth enumerates and discusses twelve of these, of which some are sur disseisin, sur intrusion, ad communem legem, ad terminum qui preterit, cui in vita, cui ante divortium, etc. Either of these might, of course, be brought in any of the four degrees, as the circumstances of the case required. The use of writs of entry has been long since abolished in England; but they are still in use in a modified form in some of the United States, as the common means of recovering possession of realty against a wrongful occupant. 2 Pick. (Mass.) 473; 7 Pick. (Mass.) 36; 10 Pick. (Mass.) 359; 5 N. H. 450; 6 N. H. 555. See Stearns, Real Actions; Booth, Real Actions; Reg. Brev. 229; Rast. Entr. 279b; Co. Litt. 238b.

Though the action was formerly a possessory one, it seems that title may be now tried therein. 141 Mass. 93.

ENUMERATIO INFIRMAT REGULAM IN casibus non enumeratis. Enumeration dis-affirms the rule in cases not enumerated. Bac. Aph. 17.

ENUMERATIO UNIUS EST EXCLUSIO alterius. Specification of one thing is an exclusion of the rest. 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 106, 113.

ENURE. To take or have effect; to serve to the use, benefit, or advantage of a person. The word is often written "inure." A release to the tenant for life enures to him in reversion; that is, it has the same effect for him as for the tenant for life. A discharge of the principal enures to the benefit of the surety.

ENVOY. In international law. A minister of the second rank, on whom his sovereign or government has conferred a degree of dignity and respectability which, without being on a level with an ambassador, immediately follows, and, among ministers, yields the pre-eminence to him alone.

Envoys are either ordinary or extraordinary. By custom, the latter is held in greater consideration. Vattel, liv. 4, c. 6, § 72.

EO INSTANTE (Lat.) At that instant.

EO INTUITU (Lat.) With that view or intent. Hale, Anal. § 2.

EO LOCI (Lat.) In civil law. In that place (eo loco); there. Dig. 5. 1. 19. 2.

In that state or condition. Calv. Lex.

EO NOMINE (Lat.) Under or by that name.

EODEM LIGAMINE QUO LIGATUM EST dissolvitur. A bond is released by the same formalities with which it is contracted. Co. Litt. 212b; Broom, Leg. Max. 891.

EODEM MODO QUO QUID CONSTITUItur, eodem modo destruitur. In the same way in which anything is constituted, in that way is it destroyed. 6 Coke, 53.

EODEM MODO QUO ORITUR, EODEM modo dissolvitur. It is discharged in the same way in which it arises. Bacon, Abr. "Release;" Cro. Eliz. 697; 2 Wm. Saund. 48, note 1; 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 28, 30; 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 294, 298.

EOTH (Saxon). Oath.

EORLE (Saxon). An earl. Blount; 1 Bl. Comm. 398.

EPIMENIA. Expenses or gifts. Blount.

EPIQUEYA. In Spanish law. The benignant and prudent interpretation of the law according to the circumstances of the time, place, and person. This word is derived from the Greek, and is synonymous with the word "equity." See Murillo, notes 67, 68.

EPISCOPACY. In ecclesiastical law. A form of government by diocesan bishops; the office or condition of a bishop.

EPISCOPALIA (Law Lat.) In ecclesiastical law. Synodals, or payments due the bishop.

EPISCOPUS (Law Lat.) In civil law. A superintendent; an inspector. Those in each municipality who had the charge and oversight of the bread and other provisions which served the citizens for their daily food, were so called. Vicat; Du Cange.

A bishop. These bishops, or episcopi, were held to be the successors of the apostles, and have various titles at different times in history, and according to their different duties. It was applied generally to those who had authority, or were of peculiar sanctity. After the fall of the Roman empire, they came to have very considerable judicial powers. Du Cange; Vicat; Calv. Lex.

EPISCOPUS ALTERIUS MANDATO quam regis non tenetur obtemperare. A bishop need not obey any mandate save the king's. Co. Litt. 134.

EPISCOPUS PUERORUM. It was an old custom that, upon certain feasts, some lay person should plait his hair, and put on the garments of a bishop, and in them pretend to exercise episcopal jurisdiction, and do several ludicrous actions, for which reason he was called "bishop of the boys;" and this custom obtained in England long after several constitutions were made to abolish it. Blount. Such an officer is mentioned in the statutes of some of the cathedrals of the old foundation in England. Wharton.

EPISTOLA. A letter or epistle. Calv. Lex. An instrument in writing for the conveyance of lands, or the assurance of contracts. Spelman.

EPISTOLAE (Lat.) In civil law. Rescripts; opinions given by the emperors in cases submitted to them for decision.

Answers of the emperors to petitions.

The answers of counsellors (juris consulta), as Ulpian and others, to questions of law proposed to them, were also called epistolae.

Opinions written out. The term originally signified the same as literae. Vicat.

EPOCH, or EPOCHA. The time at which a computation is begun; the time whence dates are numbered. Enc. Lond.

EQUALITY. Likeness in possessing the same rights, and being liable to the same duties. See 1 Toullier, Dr. Civ. notes 170, 193.

EQUES. A knight. Used chiefly in heraldry; miles, being the technical legal term. 4 Inst. 5.

EQUILOCUS. An equal. It is mentioned in Simeon Dunelm, A. D. 882. Jacob.

EQUITABLE ASSETS. Such assets as are chargeable with the payment of debts or legacies in equity, and which do not fall under the description of "legal assets."

Those portions of the property which, by the ordinary rules of law, are exempt from debts, but which the testator has voluntarily charged as assets, or which, being nonexistent at law, have been created in equity. Adams, Eq. 254 et seq.

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT. An assignment giving to the assignee a right enforceable only in equity. The term is now commonly applied to constructive assignments, though such are now generally enforceable at law. In this sense it is "such an appropriation of the subject-matter as to confer a complete and present right on the person intended to be provided for, even where the circumstances do not admit of its present exercise." 14 Wall. (U. S.) 69.

An order on a particular fund (120 U. S. 511; 78 Iowa, 426; 3 Me. 436), or an order by a creditor to pay the debt to a third person (7 Cal. 258; 18 Mass. 461; 18 Mont. 335), are examples of such assignments.

EQUITABLE CONSTRUCTION. A liberal construction, designed to reach the equities of the particular case.

EQUITABLE CONVERSION. See "Conversion."

EQUITABLE DEFENSE. A defense available only in equity, e. g., duress in defense to a contract. In all states where codification prevails, the distinction between legal and equitable defenses is abolished.

EQUITABLE ELECTION. See "Election."

EQUITABLE ESTATE. A right or interest in land, which, not having the properties of a legal estate, but being merely a right of which courts of equity will take notice, requires the aid of such court to make it available.

These estates consist of uses, trusts, and powers (q. v.) See 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1884. They possess, in some respects, the qualities of legal estates at modern law. 1 Pet. (U. S.) 508; 13 Pick. (Mass.) 154; 5 Watts (Pa.) 113; 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 508; 2 Vern. 536; 1 Brown, 499; Williams, Real Prop. 134-136; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 501; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 130, 161.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE. A lien upon real estate of such a character that it is recognized in equity as a security for the payment of money, and is treated as a mortgage.

A transaction to which equity attaches the character of a mortgage, without regard to the intention of the parties. For example, a deposit of title deeds as security (Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; 5 Wheat. [U. S.] 277), or the giving of an absolute deed as security (96 U. S. 332; 113 Mass. 149; 46 N. Y. 605).

A mortgage upon a purely equitable interest in lands.

EQUITABLE WASTE. Such acts to the detriment of the remainder or reversion as are within the legal rights of the tenant, but are not such as a prudent man would do in respect to his own property, though not necessarily done with evil motive. Equity will restrain such depredation, though no action at law would lie. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 915; 29 L. J. Ch. 598; 25 N. H. 361.

EQUITAS SEQUITUR LEGEM. Equity follows the law. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 4; 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 277, 282.

EQUITATURA. In old English law. Needful equipments for riding or traveling.

EQUITY. A branch of remedial justice by and through which relief is afforded to suitors in the courts of equity.

In the broad sense in which this term is sometimes used, it signifies natural justice.

In a more limited application, it denotes equal justice between contending parties. This is its moral signification, in reference to the rights of parties having conflicting claims; but applied to courts and their jurisdiction and proceedings, it has a more restrained and limited signification.

One division of courts is into courts of law and courts of equity; and equity, in this relation and application, is a branch of remedial justice by and through which relief is afforded to suitors in the courts of equity.

The difference between the remedial justice of the courts of common law and that of the courts of equity is marked and material. That administered by the courts of law is limited by the principles of the common law (which are to a great extent positive and inflexible), and especially by the nature and character of the process and pleadings, and of the judgments which those courts can render; because the pleadings cannot fully present all the matters in controversy, nor can the judgments be adapted to the special exigencies which may exist in particular cases. It is not uncommon, also, for cases to fail in those courts, from the fact that too few or too many persons have been joined as parties, or because the pleadings have not been framed with sufficient technical precision.

The remedial process of the courts of equity, on the other hand, admits, and, generally, requires, that all persons having an interest shall be made parties, and makes a large allowance for amendments by summoning and discharging parties after the commencement of the suit. The pleadings are usually framed so as to present to the consideration of the court the whole case, with its possible legal rights, and all its equities,—that is, all the grounds upon which the suitor is or is not entitled to relief upon the principles of equity. And its final remedial process may be so varied as to meet the requirements of these equities, in cases where the jurisdiction of the courts of equity exists, by "commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong." In other words, its final process is varied so as to enable the courts to do that equitable justice between the parties which the case demands, either by commanding what is to be done, or prohibiting what is threatened to be done.

The principles upon which, and the modes and forms by and through which, justice is administered in the United States, are derived to a great extent from those which were in existence in England at the time of the settlement of this country, and it is therefore important to a correct understanding of the nature and character of our own jurisprudence, not only to trace it back to its introduction here on the early settlement of the colonies, but also to trace the English jurisprudence from its earliest inception as the administrattion of law founded on principles, down to that period. It is in this way that we are enabled to explain many things in our own practice which would otherwise be entirely obscure. This is particularly true of the principles which regulate the jurisdiction and practice of the courts of equity, and of the principles of equity as they are now applied and administered in the courts of law which at the present day have equitable jurisdiction conferred upon them by statutes passed for that purpose. And for the purpose of a competent understanding of the course of decisions in the courts of equity in England, it is necessary to refer to the origin of the equitable jurisdiction there, and to trace its history, inquiring upon what principles it was originally founded, and how it has been enlarged and sustained.

The study of equity jurisprudence, therefore, comprises an inquiry into the origin and history of the courts of equity; the distinctive principles upon which jurisdiction in equity is founded; the nature, character, and extent of the jurisdiction itself; its peculiar remedies; the rules and maxims which regulate its administration; its remedial process and proceedings, and modes of defense; and its rules of evidence and practice.

——Origin and History. The courts of equity may be said to have their origin as far back as the aula or curia regis, the great court in which the king administered justice in person, assisted by his counsellors. Of the officers of this court, the chancellor was one of great trust and confidence, next to the king himself, but his duties do not distinctly appear at the present day. On the dissolution of that court, he exercised separate duties.

On the introduction of seals, he had the keeping of the king's seal, which he affixed to charters and deeds; and he had some authority in relation to the king's grants,—perhaps annulling those which were alleged to have been procured by misrepresentation, or to have been issued unadvisedly.

As writs came into use, it was made his duty to frame and issue them from his court, which as early as the reign of Henry II. was known as the "chancery." And it is said that he exercised at this period a sort of equitable jurisdiction by which he mitigated the rigor of the common law,—to what extent it is impossible to determine. He is spoken of as one who "annuls unjust laws, and executes the rightful commands of the pious prince, and puts an end to what is injurious to the people or to morals," which would form a very ample jurisdiction; but it seems probable that this was according to the authority or direction of the king, given from time to time in relation to particular cases. He was a principal member of the king's council, after the Conquest, in which, among other things, all applications for the special exercise of the prerogative in regard to matters of judicial cognizance were discussed and decided upon. In connection with the council, he exercised a separate authority in cases in which the council directed the suitors to proceed in chancery. The court of chancery is said to have sprung from this council; but it may be said that it had its origin in the prerogative of the king, by which he undertook to administer justice, on petitions to himself, without regard to the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, which he did through orders to his chancellor. The great council, or parliament, also sent matters relating to the king's grants, etc., to the chancery; and it seems that the chancellor, although an ecclesiastic, was the principal actor as regards the judicial business which the select or king's council, as well as the great council, had to advise upon or transact. In the reign of Edward I., the power and authority of the chancellor were extended by the statute of Westminster II.

In the time of Edward III., proceedings in chancery were commenced by petition or bill, the adverse party was summoned, the parties were examined, and chancery appears as a distinct court for giving relief in cases which required extraordinary remedies, the king having, "by a writ, referred all such matters as were of grace to be dispatched by the chancellor or by the keeper of the privy seal."

It may be considered as fully established, as a separate and permanent jurisdiction, from the 17th of Richard II.

In the time of Edward IV., the chancery had come to be regarded as one of the four principal courts of the kingdom. From this time, its jurisdiction and the progress of its jurisdiction become of more importance to us.

It is the tendency of any system of legal principles, when reduced to a practical application, to fail of effecting such justice between party and party as the special circumstances of a case may require, by reason of the minuteness and inflexibility of its rules, and the inability of the judges to adapt its remedies to the necessities of the controversy under consideration. This was the case with the Roman law, and, to remedy this, edicts were issued from time to time, which enabled the consuls and praetors to correct "the scrupulosity and mischievous subtlety of the law," and from these edicts a code of equitable jurisprudence was compiled.

So the principles and rules of the common law, as they were reduced to practice, became in their application the means of injustice in cases where special equitable circumstances existed, of which the judge could not take cognizance because of the precise nature of its titles and rights, the inflexible character of its principles, and the technicality of its pleadings and practice. And, in a manner somewhat analogous to the Roman mode of modification, in order to remedy such hardships, the prerogative of the king, or the authority of the great council, was exercised in ancient times to procure a more equitable measure of justice in the particular case, which was accomplished through the court of chancery.

This was followed by the "invention" of the writ of subpoena, by means of which the chancery assumed, upon a complaint made directly to that court, to require the attendance of the adverse party, to answer to such matters as should be objected against him. Notwithstanding the complaints of the commons, from time to time, that the course of proceeding in chancery "was not according to the course of the common law, but the practice of the holy church," the king sustained the authority of the chancellor, the right to issue the writ was recognized and regulated by statute, and other statutes were passed conferring jurisdiction where it had not been taken before. In this way, without any compilation of a code, a system of equitable jurisprudence was established in the court of chancery, enlarging from time to time; the decisions of the court furnishing an exposition of its principles, and of their application. It is said that the jurisdiction was greatly enlarged under the administration of Cardinal Wolsey, in the time of Henry VIII. A controversy took place between Chancellor Ellesmere and Lord Coke, C. J., of the king's bench, in the time of James I., respecting the right of the chancellor to interfere with the judgments of the courts of law. The king sustained the chancellor, and from that time the jurisdiction then claimed has been maintained.

It is from the study of these decisions, and the commentaries upon them, that we are enabled to determine, with a greater or less degree of certainty, the time when and the grounds upon which jurisdiction was granted or was taken in particular classes of cases, and the principles upon which it was administered. And it is occasionally of importance to attend to this; because we shall see that, chancery having once obtained jurisdiction, that jurisdiction continues until expressly taken away, notwithstanding the intervention of such changes as, if they had been made earlier, would have rendered the exercise of jurisdiction by that court incompatible with the principles upon which it is founded.

A brief sketch of some of the principal points in the origin and history of the court of chancery may serve to show that much of its jurisdiction exists independent of any statute, and is founded upon an assumption of a power to do equity, having its first inception in the prerogative of the king, and his commands to do justice in individual cases, extending itself, through the action of the chancellor, to the issue of a writ of summons to appear in his court without any special authority for that purpose, and, upon the return of the subpoena, to the reception of a complaint, to a requirement upon the party summoned to make answer to that complaint, and then to a hearing and decree, or judgment, upon the merits of the matters in controversy, according to the rules of equity and good conscience.

It appears as a noticeable fact that the jurisdiction of the chancery proceeded originally from, and was sustained by, successive kings of England against the repeated remonstrances of the commons, who were for adhering to the common law; though not, perhaps, approving of all its rigors, as equity had been to some extent acknowledged as a rule of decision in the common-law courts.

This opposition of the commons may have been owing in part to the fact that the chancellor was in those days usually an ecclesiastic, and to the existing antipathy among the masses of the people to almost everything Roman.

The master of the rolls, who for a long period was a judicial officer of the court of chancery, second only to the chancellor, was originally a clerk or keeper of the rolls or records, but seems to have acquired his judicial authority from being at times directed by the king to take cognizance of and determine matters submitted to him.

——Distinctive Principles. It is quite apparent that some principles other than those of the common law must regulate the exercise of such a jurisdiction. That law could not mitigate its rigor upon its own principles. And as, down to the time of Edward III., and, with few exceptions, to the 21st of Henry VIII., the chancellors were ecclesiastics, much more familiar with the principles of the Roman law than with those of the common law, it was but a matter of course that there should be a larger adoption of the principles of that law, and the study of it is of some importance in this connection. Still, that law cannot be said to be of authority, even in equity proceedings. The commons were jealous of its introduction. "In the reign of Richard II., the barons protested that they would never suffer the kingdom to be governed by the Roman law, and the judges prohibited it from being any longer cited in the common-law tribunals."

This opposition of the barons and of the common-law judges furnished very sufficient reasons why the chancellors should not profess to adopt that law as the rule of decision. In addition to this, it was not fitted, in many respects, to the state of things existing in England; and so the chancellors were of necessity compelled to act upon equitable principles as expounded by themselves. In later times, the common-law judges in that country have resorted to the Roman law for principles of decision to a much greater extent than they have given credit to it.

Since the time of Henry VIII., the chancery bench has been occupied by some of the ablest lawyers which England has produced, and they have given to the proceedings and practice in equity definite rules and forms, which leave little to the personal discretion of the chancellor in determining what equity and good conscience require. The discretion of the chancellor is a judicial discretion, to be exercised according to the principles and practice of the court.

The avowed principle upon which the jurisdiction was at first exercised was the administration of justice according to honesty, equity, and conscience, which last, it is said, was unknown to the common law as a principle of decision.

In the 15th of Richard II., two petitions, addressed to the king and the lords of parliament, were sent to the chancery to be heard, with the direction, "Let there be done, by the authority of parliament, that which right and reason and good faith and good conscience demand in the case."

These may be said to be the general principles upon which equity is administered at the present day.

The distinctive principles of the courts of equity are shown, also, by the classes of cases in which they exercise jurisdiction and give relief; allowing it to be sought and administered through process and proceedings of less formality and technicality than are required in proceedings at law. This, however, has its limitations, some of its rules of pleading in defense being quite technical. And it is another peculiar feature that the relief is administered by a decree or process adapted to the exigencies of the particular case.

——Jurisdiction. It is difficult to reduce a jurisdiction so extensive, and of such diverse component parts, to a rigid and precise classification; but an approach to it may be made. The general nature of the jurisdiction has already been indicated. It exists—

First, for the purpose of compelling a discovery from the defendant, respecting the truth of the matters alleged against him, by an appeal to his conscience to speak the truth. The discovery is enforced by requiring an answer to the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint, in order that the plaintiff may use the matters disclosed in the answer as admissions of the defendant, and thus evidence for the plaintiff, either in connection with and in aid of other evidence offered by the plaintiff, or to supply the want of other evidence on his part; or it may be to avoid the expense to which the plaintiff must be put in procuring other evidence to sustain his case.

When the plaintiff's complaint, otherwise called a "bill," prays for relief in the same suit, the statements of the defendant in his answer are considered by the court in forming a judgment upon the whole case.

To a certain extent, the statements of the defendant in answer to the bill are evidence for himself also.

The discovery which may be required is not only of facts within the knowledge of the defendant, but may also be of deeds and other writings in his possession.

The right to discovery is not, however, an unlimited one; as, for instance, the defendant is not bound to make a discovery which would subject him to punishment, nor, ordinarily, to discover the title upon which he relies in his defense; nor is the plaintiff entitled to require the production of all papers which he may desire to look into. The limits of the right deserve careful consideration. The discovery, when had, may be the foundation of equitable relief in the same suit, in which case it may be connected with all the classes of cases in which relief is sought; or it may be for the purpose of being used in some other court, in which case the jurisdiction is designated as an "assistant jurisdiction."

Second, where the courts of law do not, or did not, recognize any right, and therefore could give no remedy, but where the courts of equity recognize equitable rights, and, of course, give equitable relief. This has been denominated the "exclusive jurisdiction." In this class are trusts, charities, forfeited and imperfect mortgages, penalties and forfeitures, imperfect consideration.

Uses and trusts have been supposed to have had their origin in the restrictions laid by parliament upon conveyances in mortmain,—that is, to the church for charitable, or rather for ecclesiastical, purposes.

It may well be that the doctrine of equitable titles and estates, unknown to the common law, but which could be enforced in chancery, had its origin in conveyances to individuals for the use of the church in order to avoid the operation of these restrictions; the conscience of the feoffee being bound to permit the church to have the use according to the design and intent of the feoffment. But conveyances in trust for the use of the church were not by any means the only cases in which it was desirable to convey the legal title to one for the use of another. In many instances, such a conveyance offered a convenient mode of making provision for those who, from any circumstances, were unable to manage property advantageously for themselves, or to whom it was not desirable to give the control of it; and the propriety in all such cases of some protection to the beneficiary is quite apparent. The court of chancery, by recognizing that he had an interest of an equitable character which could be protected and enforced against the holder of the legal title, exercised a jurisdiction to give relief in cases which the courts of common law could not reach consistently with their principles and modes of procedure.

Mortgages, which were originally estates conveyed upon condition, redeemable if the condition was performed at the day, but absolute on nonperformance, the right to redeem being thereby forfeited, owe their origin to the court of chancery, which, acting at first, perhaps, in some case where the nonperformance was by mistake or accident, soon recognized an equitable right of redemption after the day, as a general rule, in order to relieve against the forfeiture. This became known as an "equity of redemption,"—a designation in use at the present day, although there has long been a legal right of redemption in such cases.

Relief against penalties and forfeitures also was formerly obtained only through the aid of the court of chancery.

In most of the cases which fall under this head, courts of law now exercise a concurrent jurisdiction.

Third, where the courts of equity administer equitable relief for the infraction of legal rights, in cases in which the courts of law, recognizing the right, give a remedy according to their principles, modes, and forms, but the remedy is deemed by equity inadequate to the requirements of the case. This is sometimes called the "concurrent jurisdiction." This class embraces fraud, mistake, accident, administration, legacies, contribution, and cases where justice and conscience require the cancellation or reformation of instruments, or the rescission or the specific performance of contracts.

The courts of law relieve against fraud, mistake, and accident where a remedy can be had according to their modes and forms; but there are many cases in which the legal remedy is inadequate for the purposes of justice.

The modes of investigation, and the peculiar remedies of the courts of equity, are often of the greatest importance in this class of cases.

Transfers to defeat or delay creditors, and purchasers with notice of an outstanding title, come under the head of fraud.

It has been said that there is a less amount of evidence required to prove fraud, in equity, than there is at law, but the soundness of that position may well be doubted.

The court does not relieve in all cases of accident and mistake.

In many cases, the circumstances are such as to require the cancellation or reformation of written instruments, or the specific performance of contracts, instead of damages for the breach of them.

Fourth, where the court of equity administers a remedy because the relations of the parties are such that there are impediments to a legal remedy. Partnership furnishes a marked instance. Joint tenancy and marshaling of assets may be included.

From the nature of a partnership, there are impediments to suits at law between the several partners and the partnership in relation to matters involved in the partnership; and impediments of a somewhat similar character exist in other cases.

Fifth, where the forms of proceeding in the courts of law are not deemed adequate to the due investigation of the particulars and details of the case. This class includes account, partition, dower, ascertainment of boundaries.

Sixth, where, from a relation of trust and confidence, or from consanguinity, the parties do not stand on equal ground in their dealings with each other; as, the relations of parent and child, guardian and ward, attorney and client, principal and agent, executor and administrator, legatees and distributees, trustee and cestui que trust, etc.

Seventh, where the court grant relief from considerations of public policy, because of the mischief which would result if the court did not interfere. Marriage brokage agreements, contracts in restraint of trade, buying and selling public offices, agreements founded on corrupt considerations, usury, gaming, and contracts with expectant heirs, are of this class.

Cases of this and the preceding class are sometimes considered under the head of "constructive fraud."

Eighth, where a party, from incapacity to take care of his rights, is under the special care of the court of equity, as infants, idiots, and lunatics.

This is a branch of jurisdiction of very ancient date, and of a special character, said to be founded in the prerogative of the king.

In this country the court does not, in general, assume the guardianship, but exercises an extensive jurisdiction over guardians, and may hold a stranger interfering with the property of an infant accountable as if he were guardian.

Ninth, where the court recognizes an obligation on the part of a husband to make provision for the support of his wife, or to make a settlement upon her, out of the property which comes to her by inheritance, or otherwise.

This jurisdiction is not founded upon either trust or fraud, but is derived originally from the maxim that he who asks equity should do equity.

Tenth, where the equitable relief appropriate to the case consists in restraining the commission or continuance of some act of the defendant, administered by means of a writ of injunction.

Eleventh, the court aids in the procuration or preservation of evidence of the rights of a party, to be used, if necessary, in some subsequent proceeding, the court administering no final relief.

——Peculiar Remedies, and the Manner of Administering Them. Under this head are, specific performance of contracts; re-execution, reformation, rescission, and cancellation of contracts or instruments; restraint by injunction; bills quia timet; bills of peace; protection of a party liable at law, but who has no interest, by bill of interpleader; election between two inconsistent legal rights; conversion; priorities; tacking; marshaling of securities; application of purchase money.

In recent periods, the principles of the court of chancery have in many instances been acted on and recognized by the courts of law (as, for instance, in relation to mortgages, contribution, etc.) so far as the rules of the courts of law admitted of their introduction.

In some states, the entire jurisdiction has, by statute, been conferred upon the courts of law, who exercise it as a separate and distinct branch of their authority, upon the principles and according to the modes and forms previously adopted in chancery.

In a few, the jurisdictions of the courts of law and of equity have been amalgamated, and an entire system has been substituted, administered more according to the principles and modes and forms of equity than the principles and forms of the common law.

——Rules and Maxims. In the administration of the jurisdiction, there are certain rules and maxims which are of special significance.

First, equity having once had jurisdiction of a subject matter because there is no remedy at law, or because the remedy is inadequate, does not lose the jurisdiction merely because the courts of law afterwards give the same or a similar relief.

Second, equity follows the law. This is true as a general maxim. Equity follows the law, except in relation to those matters which give a title to equitable relief because the rules of law would operate to sanction fraud or injustice in the particular case.

Third, when there is equal equity, the law must prevail. The ground upon which the suitor comes into the court of equity is that he is entitled to relief there. But if his adversary has an equally equitable case, the complainant has no title to relief.

Fourth, equality is equity. Applied to cases of contribution, apportionment of moneys due among those liable or benefited by the payment, abatement of claims on account of deficiency of the means of payment, etc.

Fifth, he who seeks equity must do equity. A party cannot claim the interposition of the court for relief unless he will do what it is equitable should be done by him as a condition precedent to that relief.

Sixth, equity considers that as done which ought to have been done. A maxim of much more limited application than might at first be supposed from the broad terms in which it is expressed. In favor of parties who would have had a benefit from something contracted to be done, and who have an equitable right to have the case considered as if it had been done, equity applies this maxim. Illustration: When there is an agreement for a sale of land, and the vendor dies, the land may be treated as money, and the proceeds of the sale, when completed, go to the distributees of personal estate, instead of to the heir. If the vendee dies before the completion of the purchase, the purchase money may be treated as land for the benefit of the heir.

——Remedial Process and Defense. A suit in equity is ordinarily instituted by a complaint or petition, called a "bill;" and the defendant is served with a writ of summons, requiring him to appear and answer, called a "subpœna."

The forms of proceedings in equity are such as to bring the rights of all persons interested before the court; and, as a general rule, all persons interested should be made parties to the bill, either as plaintiffs or defendants.

There may be amendments of the bill; or a supplemental bill, which is sometimes necessary when the case is beyond the stage for amendment.

In case the suit fails by the death of the party, there is a bill of revivor, and, after the cause is disposed of, there may be a bill of review.

The defense is made by demurrer, plea, or answer. If the defendant has no interest, he may disclaim. Discovery may be obtained from the plaintiff, and further matter may be introduced, by means of a cross bill, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, in order that it may be considered at the same time.

If the plaintiff elects, he may file a replication to the defendant's answer.

The final process is directed by the decree, which, being a special judgment, can provide relief according to the nature of the case. This is sometimes by a perpetual injunction.

There may be a bill to execute or to impeach a decree.

——Evidence and Practice. The rules of evidence, except as to the effect of the answer and the taking of the testimony, are, in general, similar to the rules of evidence in cases at law; but to this there are exceptions.

The answer, if made on oath, is evidence for the defendant, so far as it is responsive to the calls of the bill for discovery, and as such it prevails, unless it is overcome by something more than what is equivalent to the testimony of one witness. If without oath, it is a mere pleading, and the allegations stand for proof.

If the answer is incomplete or improper, the plaintiff may except to it, and it must be so amended as to be made sufficient and proper.

The case may be heard on the bill and answer, if the plaintiff so elects, and sets the case down for a hearing in that mode.

If the plaintiff desires to controvert any of the statements in the answer, he files a replication by which he denies the truth of the allegations in the answer, and testimony is taken.

The testimony, according to the former practice in chancery, is taken upon interrogatories filed in the clerk's office, and propounded by the examiner, without the presence of the parties; but this practice has been very extensively modified.

If any of the testimony is improper, there is a motion to suppress it.

The case may be referred to a master to state the accounts between the parties, or to make such other report as the case may require; and there may be an examination of the parties in the master's office. Exceptions may be taken to his report.

The hearing of the case is before the equity judge, who may make interlocutory orders or decrees, and who pronounces the final decree or judgment. There may be a rehearing, if sufficient cause is shown.

At the present day, in England and in several of the United States, the proceedings are very much simplified.

EQUITY EVIDENCE. See "Evidence."

EQUITY OF A STATUTE. Where a class of cases is not within the words of a statute, but it is patent that it would have been included had it been within the mind of the legislature, it is included by construction, because it is said to be "within the equity of the statute."

EQUITY OF REDEMPTION. A right which the mortgagor of an estate has of redeeming it after it has been forfeited at law by the nonpayment, at the time appointed, of the money secured by the mortgage to be paid, by paying the amount of the debt, interest, and costs.

The phrase "equity of redemption" is indiscriminately, though often incorrectly, applied to the right of the mortgagor to regain his estate, both before and after breach of condition. In North Carolina, by statute, the former is called a "legal right of redemption," and the latter the "equity of redemption," thereby keeping a just distinction between these estates. 1 Rev. St. N. C. 266; 4 McCord (S. C.) 340. The interest is recognized at law for many purposes. As a subsisting estate, although the mortgagor, in order to enforce his right, is obliged to resort to an equitable proceeding, administered generally in courts of equity, but in some states by courts of law (11 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 223), or in some states may pay the debt, and have an action at law (18 Johns. [N. Y.] 7, 110; 1 Halst. [N. J.] 466; 2 Har. & McH. [Md.] 9).

EQUITY TO A SETTLEMENT. The right of a wife, in an action by her husband to reduce to his possession an equitable estate falling to her, to have the court inquire into the circumstances of the marriage, the marriage settlement, and the relation of the parties, and require part of the estate in controversy to be settled on her. Haynes, Eq. 114; White & T. Lead. Cas. 381.

EQUIVALENT. Of the same value. Sometimes a condition must be literally accomplished in forma specifica; but some may be fulfilled by an equivalent, per aequipolens, when such appears to be the intention of the parties. Rolle, Abr. 451; 1 Bouv. Inst. note 760.

——In Patent Law. As applied to machines, a device which performs the same result as another, in substantially the same way. 58 Fed. 281. As applied to the chemical action of floods, it means "equally good." 7 Wall. (U. S.) 330.

EQUIVOCAL. Having a double sense.

In the construction of contracts, it is a general rule that, when an expression may be taken in two senses, that shall be preferred which gives it effect. See "Construction;" "Interpretation;" Dig. 22. 1. 4. 45. 1; Id. 80. 50. 17. 67.

EQUULEUS (Lat.) A kind of rack for extorting confessions. Enc. Lond.

ERASTIANS. The followers of Erastus. The sect obtained much influence in England, particularly among common lawyers in the time of Selden. They held that offenses against religion and morality should be punished by the civil power, and not by the censures of the church, or by excommunication. Wharton.

ERASURE. The obliteration of a writing, or part thereof. It will render it void or not under the same circumstances as an interlineation. See 5 Pet. (U. S.) 560; 11 Coke, 88; 4 Cruise, Dig. 368; 13 Viner, Abr. 41; Fitzg. 207; 5 Bing. 183; 3 Car. & P. 55; 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 555; 11 Conn. 531; 5 Mart. (La.) 190; 2 La. 291; 3 La. 56; 4 La. 270.

ERCISCUNDUS (Lat. erciscere). For dividing. Familiae erciscundae actio, an action for dividing a way, goods, or any matter of inheritance. Vicat; Calv. Lex.

EREGIMUS (Lat. we have erected). A word proper to be used in the creation of a new office by the sovereign. Bac. Abr. "Offices" (E).

ERGO (Lat.) Therefore.

ERGOLABI. In civil law. Undertakers of work; contractors. Code, 4. 59.

ERIACH. In the Brehon law. A pecuniary satisfaction or recompense, corresponding in some degree with the weregild of the Saxon law, which a party guilty of murder was condemned to pay to the wife or child or friends of the deceased. 4 Bl. Comm. 313. The same, probably, with enach, in old Scotch law. Skene de Verb. Sign. voc. "Enach."

EROSION. The gradual eating away of the soil by the operation of currents or tides. 100 N. Y. 433. It is distinguished from submergence (q. v.), and opposed to alluvion (q. v.)

EROTIC MANIA. In, medical jurisprudence. A name given to a morbid activity of the sexual propensity. It is a disease or morbid affection of the mind, which fills it with a crowd of voluptuous images, and hurries its victim to acts of the grossest licentiousness, in the absence of any lesion of the intellectual powers. See "Mania."

Distinct from "nymphomania" (q. v.)

ERRANT (Lat. errare, to wander). Wandering. Justices in eyre were formerly said to be errant (itinerant). Cowell.

ERRATICUM (Law Lat.) In old law. A waif or stray. Cowell.

ERRONICE (Lat.) Erroneously; through mistake. Yelv. 83.

ERROR. See "Mistake."

ERROR FUCATUS NUDA VERITATE IN multis est probabilior, et saepenumero rationibus vincit veritatem error. Error artfully colored is in many things more probable than naked truth, and frequently error conquers truth and argumentation. 2 Coke, 73.

ERROR JURIS NOCET. Error of law is injurious. See 4 Bouv. Inst. note 3828; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 139, note.

ERROR NOMINIS NUNQUAM NOCET, SI de identitate rei constat. Mistake in the name never injures, if there is no doubt as to the identity of the thing. 1 Duer, Ins. 171.

ERROR QUI NON RESISTITUR, APPROBATUR. An error not resisted is approved. Doctor & Stud. c. 70.

ERROR SCRIBENTIS NOCERE NON debit. An error made by a clerk ought not to injure; a clerical error may be corrected. 1 Jenk. Cent. Cas. 324.

ERROR, WRIT OF. See "Writ of Error."

ERRORES AD SUA PRINCIPIA REFerre, est refellere. To refer errors to their origin is to refute them. 3 Inst. 15.

ERRORS EXCEPTED. A phrase appended to an account stated, in order to excuse slight mistakes or oversights. Often written "E. & O. E.," meaning errors and omissions excepted.

ERTHMIOTUM. In old English law. A meeting of the neighborhood to compromise differences among themselves; a court held on the boundary of two lands.

ERUBESCIT LEX FILIOS CASTIGARE parentes. The law blushes when children correct their parents. 8 Coke, 116.

ESBRANCATURA. Cutting off branches or boughs in forests, etc. Hov. Ann. 784.

ESCALDARE. To scald. It is said that to scald hogs was one of the ancient tenures in serjeanty.

ESCAMBIO. In old English law. A writ granting power to an English merchant to draw a bill of exchange on another who is in a foreign country. Reg. Orig. 194.

ESCAMBIUM. Exchange (q. v.)

ESCAPE. The deliverance of a person, who is lawfully imprisoned, out of prison, before such a person is entitled to such deliverance by law. 5 Mass. 310.

When one who is arrested gains his liberty before he is delivered in due course of law. 107 N. C. 858.

Departure of a prisoner from custody before he is discharged by due process of law.

Escape takes place without force; prison breach, with violence; rescue, through the intervention of third parties.

——Actual Escapes. Those which take place when the prisoner in fact gets out of prison, and unlawfully regains his liberty.

——Constructive Escapes. These take place when the prisoner obtains more liberty than the law allows, although he still remains in confinement. Bac. Abr. "Escape" (B); Plowd. 17; 5 Mass. 310; 2 Mason (U. S.) 486. This distinction obtains only as to arrest in civil actions.

——Negligent Escape. This takes place when the prisoner goes at large, unlawfully, either because the building or prison in which he is confined is too weak to hold him, or because the keeper, by carelessness, lets him go out of prison.

——Voluntary Escape. This takes place when the prisoner has given to him voluntarily any liberty not authorized by law. 5 Mass. 310; 2 N. Chip. (Vt.) 11; 25 N. H. 458.

ESCAPE WARRANT. A warrant issued in England against a person who, being charged in custody in the king's bench or Fleet prison, in execution or mesne process, escapes and goes at large. Jacob.

ESCAPIO QUIETUS. Delivered from that punishment which, by the laws of the forest, lay upon those whose beasts were found upon forbidden land. Jacob.

ESCAPIUM (Law Lat.) An escape. Reg. Orig. 312.

That which comes by chance or accident. Cowell.

ESCEPPA. A measure of corn. Cowell.

ESCHAETAE VULGO DICUNTUR QUAE decidentibus iis quae de rege tenent, cum non existit ratione sanguinis haeres, ad fiscum relabuntur. Those things are commonly called "escheats" which revert to the exchequer from a failure of issue in those who hold of the king, when there does not exist any heir by consanguinity. Co. Litt. 13.

ESCHEAT (Fr. escheoir, to happen).

——Under the Feudal System. An obstruction of the course of descent, and a consequent determination of the tenure by some unforeseen contingency, in which case the land naturally reverts back to the original grantor or lord of the fee. 2 Bl. Comm. 244.

Escheat grows out of the doctrine of tenure, which is the foundation of the feudal system, whereby a man was not an owner of land, but only of a demesne estate therein, based on allegiance to a superior lord.

Escheat is to be distinguished from "forfeiture." Forfeiture of land for crime was part of the Saxon system, and was not a consequence of any lordship paramount. It was not superseded by the introduction of the Norman tenures from which escheat resulted. "Escheat therefore operates in subordination to this more ancient and superior law of forfeiture." 2 Bl. Comm. 251.

The principal grounds of escheat were death intestate, without heirs, alienage, illegitimacy, and attainder. 2 Bl. Comm. 246; 4 Kent, Comm. 424. Only the first two are generally in force in the United States, the third being generally abolished by statute, and the fourth by Const. U. S. art. 1, § 9, subd. 3. See 9 Mass. 363.

——In Modern Law. The reversion of land to the state by reason of failure of heirs or of the owner's incapacity to hold.

ESCHEAT, WRIT OF. A writ which anciently lay for a lord, to recover possession of lands that had escheated to him. Reg.

Orig. 164b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 143; Termes de la Ley; 2 Bl. Comm. 245; 3 Bl. Comm. 194. Now abolished. 1 Steph. Comm. 401, note.

ESCHEATOR. The name of an officer whose duties are generally to ascertain what escheats have taken place, and to prosecute the claim of the sovereign for the purpose of recovering the escheated property. 10 Viner, Abr. 158; Co. Litt. 13b; Tomlins; Termes de la Ley. His office was to be retained but one year, and no one person could hold the office more than once in three years. Termes de la Ley.

ESCHECCUM. A jury or inquisition. Matt. Par.

ESCHIPARE. To build or equip. Du Cange.

ESCRIBANO. In Spanish law. The public officer who is lawfully authorized to reduce to writing and verify by his signature all judicial acts and proceedings, as well as all acts and contracts entered into between private individuals.

ESCRITURA. In Spanish law. A written instrument. Every deed that is made by the hand of a public escribano, or notary of a corporation or council (concejo), or sealed with the seal of the king or other authorized persons. White, New Recop. bk. 3, tit. 7, c. 5.

ESCROW. The delivery of a deed or other instrument (31 Ill. 538), actually executed and ready for delivery (42 Wis. 440), to a stranger to the instrument (13 Ohio St. 254), to be by him delivered to the person for whose benefit it is made, on the performance of a condition, or the happening of a contingency (90 Ala. 294), or to be redelivered to the depositor on failure thereof (24 Neb. 86).

ESCROWL. In old English law. An escrow; a scroll. "And deliver the deed to a stranger, as an escrowl." Perk. c. 1, § 9; Id. c. 2, §§ 137, 138.

ESCUAGE. In old English law. Service of the shield. Tenants who hold their land by escuage hold by knight's service. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 272; Litt. § 95, 86b.

ESKIPPAMENTUM. Tackle or furniture; outfit. Certain towns in England were bound to furnish certain ships at their own expense, and with double skippage or tackle. The modern word "outfit" would seem to render the passage quite as satisfactorily, though the conjecture of Cowell has the advantage of antiquity.

ESKIPPER, or ESKIPPARE. To ship. Kelham; Rast. Entr. 409.

ESKIPPESON. Shippage, or passage by sea. Spelled, also, "skippeson." Cowell.

ESLISORS. See "Elisors."

ESNE. In old law. A hireling of servile condition.

ESNECY. Eldership. In the English law, this word signifies the right which the eldest coparcener of lands has to choose one of the parts of the estate after it has been divided.

ESPERA. The period fixed by a competent judge within which a party is to do certain acts, as, e. g., to effect certain payments, present documents, etc.; and more especially the privilege granted by law to debtors, allowing them certain time for the payment of their indebtedness.

ESPERONS. Spurs. 7 Coke, 13.

ESPLEES. The products which the land or ground yields; as, the hay of the meadows, the herbage of the pasture, corn or other produce of the arable, rents and services. Termes de la Ley. See 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 275; Dane, Abr. Index.

ESPOUSALS. A mutual promise between a man and a woman to marry each other at some other time. It differs from a marriage, because then the contract is completed. Wood, Inst. 57.

ESPURIO (Spanish). A spurious child; one begotten on a woman who has promiscuous intercourse with many men. White, New Recop. bk. 1, tit. 5, c. 2, § 1.

ESQUIRE. A title applied by courtesy to officers of almost every description, to members of the bar, and others. No one is entitled to it by law, and therefore it confers no distinction in law.

In England, it is a title next above that of a gentleman, and below that of a knight. Camden reckons up four kinds of esquires particularly regarded by the heralds: The eldest sons of knights, and their eldest sons in perpetual succession; the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and their eldest sons in like perpetual succession; esquires created by the king's letters patent, or other investiture, and their eldest sons; esquires by virtue of their office, as justices of the peace, and others who bear any office of trust under the crown.

ESSARTER (Law Fr.) To cut down woods; to clear land of trees and underwood; properly to thin woods by cutting trees, etc., at intervals. Spelman. Commonly written "assart" (q. v.)

ESSARTUM. Assarted or cleared woodland.

ESSENCE OF THE CONTRACT. A stipulation is said to be "of the essence of the contract" when a strict compliance with its terms is essential to due performance.

ESSENDI QUIETAM DE THEOLONIA (Lat. of being quit of toll). A writ which lay anciently for the citizens or burgesses of a town which was entitled to exemption from toll, in case toll was demanded of them. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 226 (I).

ESSOIN, or ESSOIGN. In old English law. An excuse for not appearing in court at the return of the process; presentation of such excuse. Spelman; 1 Sellon, Prac. 4; Comyn, Dig. "Exoine" (B 1). Essoin is not now allowed at all in personal actions. 2 Term R. 16; 16 East, 7 (a); 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 278, note.

ESSOIN DAY. Formerly, the first day in the term was essoin day; now practically abolished. Dowl. 448; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 278, note.

ESSOIN DE MALO VILLAE. When the defendant is in court the first day, but gone without pleading, and being afterwards surprised by sickness, etc., cannot attend, he may send two essoiners, who openly protest in court that he is detained by sickness in such a village, that he cannot come pro lucrari and pro perdere; and this will be admitted, for it lieth on the plaintiff to prove whether the essoin is true or not. Jacob.

ESSOIN ROLL. The roll containing the essoins and the day of adjournment. Roscoe, Real Actions, 162 et seq.

ESSOINIATOR, or ESSOINEOUR. An essoiner. One who was sent to present an excuse for another. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 116, 118.

EST ALIQUID QUOD NON OPERTET, etiam si licet; quicquid vero non licet certe non oportet. There are some things which are not proper, though lawful; but certainly those things are not proper which are not lawful. Hob. 159.

EST ASCAVOIR (Lat.) It is to be understood or known; "it is to wit." Litt. §§ 9, 45, 46, 57, 59. A very common expression in Littleton, especially at the commencement of a section; and, according to Lord Coke, "it ever teacheth us some rule of law, or general or sure leading point." Co. Litt. 16. It seems to be derived from the sciendum est (q. v.) of the civil law.

EST AUTEM JUS PUBLICUM ET PRIvatum, quod ex naturalibus praeceptis aut gentium, aut civilibus est collectum; et quod in jure scripto jus appellatur, id in lege Angliae rectum esse dicitur. Public and private law is that which is collected from natural precepts, on the one hand of nations, on the other of citizens; and that which in the civil law is called jus, that in the law of England is said to be right. Co. Litt. 558.

EST AUTEM VIS LEGEM SIMULANS. Violence may also put on the mask of law.

EST BONI JUDICIS AMPLIARE JURISdictionem. It is the part of a good judge to extend the jurisdiction. Gilb. 14.

EST IPSORUM LEGISLATORUM TANquam viva vox; rebus et non verbis legem imponimus. The utterance of legislators themselves is like the living voice; we impose law upon things, not upon words. 10 Coke, 101.

EST QUIDDAM PERFECTIUS IN REBUS licitis. There is something more perfect in things allowed. Hob. 159.

ESTABLISH. This word occurs frequently in the constitution of the United States, and it is there used in different meanings: (1) To settle firmly, to fix unalterably; as, to establish justice, which is the avowed object of the constitution. (2) To make or form; as, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies,—which evidently does not mean that these laws shall be unalterably established as justice. (3) To found, to create, to regulate; as, congress shall have power to establish post roads and post offices. (4) To found, recognize, confirm, or admit; as, congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion. (5) To create, to ratify, or confirm; as, "We, the people, etc., do ordain and establish this constitution." 1 Story, Const. § 454.

ESTABLISHMENT, or ESTABLISSEment. An ordinance or statute. Especially used of those ordinances or statutes passed in the reign of Edw. I. 2 Inst. 156; Britt. c. 21.

Establissement is also used to denote the settlement of dower by the husband upon his wife. Britt. c. 102.

ESTABLISHMENT OF DOWER. The assurance of dower made by the husband, or his friends, before or at the time of the marriage. Britt. cc. 102, 103.

ESTADAL. In Spanish law. In Spanish America this was a measure of land of sixteen square varas, or yards. 2 White, New Recop. 139.

ESTADIA. In Spanish law. The time for which the party who has chartered a vessel, or is bound to receive the cargo, has to pay demurrage on account of his delay in the execution of the contract. Called, also, sobrestadia.

ESTATE BY ELEGIT. See "Elegit."

ESTATE BY STATUTE MERCHANT. An estate whereby the creditor, under the custom of London, retained the possession of all his debtor's lands until his debts were paid. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 515. See "Statute Merchant."

ESTATE IN VADIO. An estate in pledge.

ESTATE TAIL, QUASI. When a tenant for life grants his estate to a man and his heirs, as these words, though apt and proper to create an estate tail, cannot do so, because the grantor, being only tenant for life, cannot grant in perpetuum, therefore they are said to create an estate tail quasi, or improper. Brown.

ESTATE UPON CONDITION. See "Condition."

ESTATES. The quantum and duration of proprietary rights in lands, tenements, and hereditaments; the theory of the common law being that the tenant or owner is entitled to an estate in the land rather than to the land itself. This doctrine of estates was not found in the Roman law, or the systems derived therefrom, and apparently owes its place in our law to the prevalence in England of the feudal system of tenures, by which the tenant was regarded as having interest short of absolute ownership, the landlord having a possibility of a reversion to him by the termination of the tenant's interest. Tiffany, Real Prop. § 17.

The various estates, classified with reference to their quantum or duration, may be tabulated as follows:

I. Freehold estates.
  A. Estates of inheritance.
    (1) Fee simple.
    (2) Fee tail.
  B. Estates not of inheritance (life estates).
    (1) Conventional life estates.
      (a) Estates for life of the tenant.
      (b) Estates pur autre vie.
    (2) Legal life estates.
      (a) Tenancy in tail after possibility of issue extinct.
      (b) Dower.
      (c) Curtesy.
      (d) Estate during coverture.

II. Estates less than freehold (leasehold estates, chattels real).
  A. Estates for years.
  B. Tenancy at will.
  C. Tenancy from year to year.
  D. Tenancy by sufferance.

Estates classified according as they give rights of present or future enjoyment are:

I. Present estates.
II. Future estates.
  A. Reversions.
  B. Remainders.
  C. Contingent uses.
  D. Springing uses.
  E. Shifting uses.
  F. Executory devises.

Classified according as they are owned by one or more persons, and according to the nature of the rights of several owners, they are:

I. Estates in severalty.
II. Joint estates.
  A. Joint tenancy.
  B. Tenancy in common.
  C. Tenancy in coparcenary.
  D. Tenancy in entirety.

——Freehold. An estate of freehold is one which is to endure for an uncertain period, which must, or at least may, last during the life of some person.

——Estate of Inheritance. An estate of inheritance is any estate which may descend to heirs. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 51. All freehold estates are estates of inheritance except estates for life. Crabb, Real Prop. § 945.

——Estates in Fee Simple. An estate in fee simple is that which a man has where lands are given to him and to his heirs absolutely, without any end or limit put to his estate. 2 Bl. Comm. 106; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 51.

The word "simple" does not add any significance, but is used to mark fully the distinction between an unqualified fee and any class of conditional estates.

——Estate in Fee Tail. An estate in fee tail or estate tail is an estate of inheritance which, if left to itself, will, after the death of the first owner, descend to his lawful issue as long as his posterity endures in a regular order of descent from one to another, and will terminate on the failure of such posterity. It derives its existence from the statute de donis (q. v.)

——Estate for Life. An estate for life is a freehold interest which cannot extend beyond the life or lives of some particular person or persons, but which may possibly endure for the period of such life or lives. The estate is generally for the tenant's own life, but made for the life of another person or persons, in which case it is called an estate pur autre vie.

——Tenancy in Tail after Possibility of Issue Extinct. Tenancy in tail after possibility of issue extinct is where, upon the death of the appointed wife of a donee in special tail, or of one of two donees in special tail without issue living, the donee or survivor of the two donees takes for his life, possibility of issue being extinct.

——Dower. An estate in dower is an estate which a widow has for her life in some portion of the lands and tenements of which her husband was seised at any time during coverture, and which her issue might have inherited if she had had any. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 149; 2 Bl. Comm. 129; 4 Kent, Comm. 41. See "Dower."

——Curtesy. An estate by curtesy is that estate to which a husband is entitled upon the death of his wife in the lands or tenements of which she was seised in fee in possession during their coverture, provided they have had lawful issue born alive, and possibly capable of inheriting her estate. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 128; Co. Litt. 30a; 2 Bl. Comm. 126. See "Curtesy."

——Estate during Coverture. An estate during coverture is that right or interest which a husband or wife has during coverture in the lands and tenements of his or her spouse.

——Estate for Years. An estate for years is an interest in lands by virtue of a contract for the possession of them for a definite and limited period of time. 2 Bl. Comm. 140. See "Tenancy."

——Tenancy at Will. An estate at will is an estate in lands which the tenant has, by entry made thereon under a demise, to hold during the joint wills of the parties to the same. 2 Bl. Comm. 145. See "Tenancy."

——Tenancy from Year to Year. A tenancy from year to year is an interest in lands for a term of one year certain, continuing for successive years, unless due notice be given to determine it at the end of the first or any subsequent year. See "Tenancy."

——Tenancy by Sufferance. An estate at sufferance is the interest of a tenant who has come rightfully into the possession of lands by permission of the owner, and continues to occupy the same after the period for which he is entitled to hold by such permission. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 392. See "Tenancy."

——Estate in Possession. An estate in possession is an estate where the tenant is in actual possession of the premises, or in receipt of the rents and other advances arising therefrom. 2 Bl. Comm. 163.

——Estate in Expectancy. An estate in expectancy is one giving a present or vested contingent right of future enjoyment. See "Expectancy."

——Reversion. An estate in reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him. 2 Bl. Comm. 175. See "Reversion."

——Remainders. An estate in remainder is an estate limited to take effect in possession or in enjoyment, or in both, subject to a term of years or contingent interest to intervene, which intermediate interest is created by the same instrument out of the same subject of property. 2 Fearne, Cont. Rem. § 159. See "Remainder."

——Springing, Shifting, and Contingent Uses. See "Uses."

——Executory Devises. See "Devise."

——Estate in Severalty. An estate in severalty is one held by a person in his own right, without any other person being joined or connected with him in point of interest during his estate. 2 Bl. Comm. 179.

——Joint Estate. A joint estate is one in which two or more persons are joined in interest.

——Joint Tenancy. An estate of joint tenancy is that which subsists where several persons have any subject of property jointly between them in equal shares by purchase. 1 Bl. Comm. 180; Williams, Real Prop. 112. There must be unity of time, title, interest, and possession. See "Joint Tenants."

——Tenancy in Common. An estate in common one held in joint possession by two or more persons at the same time by several and distinct titles. This estate has the single unity of possession. 2 Bl. Comm. 191; 4 Kent, Comm. 366. See "Tenants in Common."

——Estate in Coparcenary. An estate which several persons hold as one heir, whether male or female. This estate has unity of time, title, and possession, but the interests of the coparceners may be unequal. 2 Bl. Comm. 188; 4 Kent, Comm. 366.

——Tenancy in Entirety. The estate arising on a conveyance to a man and his wife jointly. They are seised, not of moieties, but of entireties. 16 Mass. 480; 14 N. Y. 430.

ESTATES OF THE REALM. The lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons of Great Britain. 1 Bl. Comm. 153. Sometimes called the "three estates."

ESTER IN JUDGMENT. To appear before a tribunal either as plaintiff or defendant.

ESTOPPEL. The preclusion of a person from asserting a fact by previous conduct, inconsistent therewith, on his own part, or the part of those under whom he claims, or by a solemn establishment, which he cannot be allowed to call in question.

A preclusion, in law, which prevents a man from alleging or denying a fact, in consequence of his own previous act, allegation, or denial of a contrary tenor. Steph. Pl. 239.

"Estoppe cometh of the French word estoupe, from whence the English word 'stopped,' and it is called an 'estoppel' or 'conclusion' because a man's own act or acceptance stoppeth his mouth to allege or plead the truth." Co. Litt. 352a.

Estoppel is either by record, by deed, or by facts in pais.

(1) Estoppel by record is the preclusion of one to deny that which either appears by the roll of a legislature, or has been adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction. See "Former Adjudication."

(2) Estoppel by deed is the preclusion of one to deny that which he has asserted by an agreement or conveyance under seal. See 7 Conn. 214; 13 Pick. (Mass.) 670; 62 Ill. 344; 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 492.

(3) Estoppel by facts in pais, commonly called "estoppel in pais," is the preclusion of one to deny that which, by his conduct, he may have induced another to believe and act on to his prejudice. 129 Ill. 657; 60 Minn. 531; 22 N. J. Law, 619; 46 Ohio St. 255.

In the early common law, estoppel in pais was practically unrecognized (27 Conn. 282), the present doctrine being of equitable creation.

ESTOVERIA SUNT ARDENDI, ARUNDI, construendi, et claudendi. Estovers are for burning, ploughing, building, and inclosing. 13 Coke, 68.

ESTOVERIIS HABENDIS. A writ which anciently lay for a wife, judicially separated from her husband, to recover her alimony or estovers.

ESTOVERS (estouviers, necessaries; from estóffer, to furnish). The right or privilege which a tenant has to furnish himself with so much wood from the demised premises as may be sufficient or necessary for his fuel, fences, and other agricultural operations. 2 Bl. Comm. 35; Woodf. Landl. & Ten. 232; 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 639.

ESTRAY. An animal of value, not wild, found wandering from its owner; cattle whose owner is unknown. 2 Kent, Comm. 359.

It is essential (1) that the animal should be by its nature tame or reclaimable (1 Bl. Comm. 298); (2) that it should be an animal upon which the law sets a value (Id.); (3) that it should not only be away from the owner, but running at large (36 N. J. Law, 235). The manner in which the animal escaped from the owner has been said to be immaterial. 70 Iowa, 509. But see 63 Ill. 88.

ESTREAT. A true copy or note of some original writing or record, and especially of fines and amercements imposed by a court, extracted from the record, and certified to a proper officer or officers, authorized and required to collect them. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 57, 76. A forfeited recognizance taken out from among the other records for the purpose of being sent up to the exchequer, that the parties might be sued thereon, was said to be estreated. 4 Bl. Comm. 253.

ESTRECIATUS. Straightened, as applied to roads. Cowell.

ESTREPE. To strip; to commit waste.

ESTREPEMENT. A common-law writ for the prevention of waste.

The writ lay at common law to prevent a party in possession from committing waste on an estate the title to which was disputed, after judgment obtained in any real action, and before possession was delivered by the sheriff. But, as waste might be committed in some cases pending the suit, the statute of Gloucester gave another writ of estrepement pendente placito, commanding the sheriff firmly to inhibit the tenant "ne faciat vastum vel strepementum pendente placito dicto indiscusso." By virtue of either of these writs, the sheriff may resist those who commit waste, or offer to do so; and he might use sufficient force for the purpose. 3 Bl. Comm. 225, 226.

This writ is sometimes directed to the sheriff and the party in possession of the lands, in order to make him amenable to the court as for a contempt in case of his disobedience to the injunction of the writ. At common law, the process proper to bring the tenant into court is a venire facias, and thereon an attachment. Upon the defendant's coming in, the plaintiff declares against him. The defendant usually pleads "that he has done no waste contrary to the prohibition of the writ." The issue on this plea is tried by a jury, and, in case they find against the defendant, they assess damages which the plaintiff recovers. But, as this verdict convicts the defendant of a contempt, the court proceed against him for that cause as in other cases. 2 Inst. 329; Rast. Entr. 317; Moore, 100; 1 Bos. & P. 121; 2 Lilly, Reg.; 5 Coke, 119; Reg. Brev. 76, 77.

In Pennsylvania, by legislative enactment, the remedy by estrepement is extended for the benefit of any owner of lands leased for years or at will, at any time during the continuance or after the expiration of such demise, and due notice given to the tenant to leave the same, agreeably to law; or for any purchaser at sheriff or coroner's sale of lands, etc., after he has been declared the highest bidder by the sheriff or coroner; or for any mortgagee or judgment creditor, after the lands bound by such judgment or mortgage shall have been condemned by inquisition, or which may be subject to be sold by a writ of venditioni exponas or levari facias. See 10 Viner, Abr. 497; Woodf. Landl. & Ten. 447; Archb. Civ. Pl. 17; 7 Comyn, Dig. 659.

ET (Lat.) And.

ET ADJOURNATUR (or ADJORNATUR) (Law Lat. and it is adjourned). A phrase used in the old reports, where the argument of a cause was adjourned to another day, or where a second argument was had. Y. B. T. 3 Edw. III. 37; 1 Keb. 692, 754, 773; Keilw. 65; Hardr. 68; Cro. Eliz. 180; T. Raym. 55. See "Adjournatur."

ET AL. Abbreviation of et alius, or alium, and another. Et als., abbreviation of et alios, and others.

Abbreviations used in entitling causes where there are two or more parties.

ET ALII E CONTRA (Lat. and others on the other side). A phrase constantly used in the Year Books, in describing a joinder in issue. Y. B. P. 1 Edw. II. Prist; et alii e contra, et sic ad patriam, ready; and others, e contra, and so to the country. Y. B. T. 3 Edw. III. 4.

ET DE CEO SE METTENT EN LE PAYS (Law Fr.) And of this they put themselves upon the country. Fet. Assaver, § 64.

ET DE HOC PONIT SE SUPER PATRIAM (Lat. and of this he puts himself upon the country). The Latin form of concluding a traverse. See 3 Bl. Comm. 313.

ET EI LEGITUR IN HAEC VERBA (Law Lat. and it is read to him in these words). Words formerly used in entering the prayer of oyer on record.

ET HABEAS IBI TUNC HOC BREVE (Law Lat. and have you then there this writ). A clause in old writs, expressive of the command to return to them. Reg. Jud. 1; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 64, § 19; Towns. Pl. 166. Literally translated in the modern forms.

ET HABUIT (Lat. and he had it). A common phrase in the Year Books, expressive of the allowance of an application or demand by a party. Parn. demanda la view. Et habuit, etc. Y. B. M. 6 Edw. III. 49.

ET HOC PARATUS EST VERIFICARE (Lat. and this he is prepared to verify). The Latin form of concluding a plea in confession and avoidance; that is, where the defendant has confessed all that the plaintiff has set forth, and has pleaded new matter in avoidance. 1 Salk. 2.

ET HOC PETIT QUOD INQUIRATUR per patriam (Lat. and this he prays may be inquired into by his country). The conclusion of a plea tendering an issue to the country. 1 Salk. 3.

ET INDE PETIT JUDICIUM (Lat. and thereupon [or thereof] he prays judgment). A clause at the end of pleadings, praying the judgment of the court in favor of the party pleading. It occurs as early as the time of Bracton, and is literally translated in the modern forms. Bracton, fol. 57b; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 217.

ET INDE PRODUCIT SECTAM (Lat. and thereupon he brings suit). The Latin conclusion of a declaration, except against attorneys and other officers of the court. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 295.

ET MODO AD HUNC DIEM (Lat. and now at this day). The Latin form of the commencement of the record on appearance of the parties.

ET NON (Lat. and not). These words are sometimes employed in pleading to convey a pointed denial. They have the same effect as "without this," absque hoc.

ET SEQ. (Lat. et sequentia, and following). Ordinarily used with a reference to the first of several consecutive pages or chapters desired to be cited, as "page 246 et seq."

ET SIC (Law Lat. and so). The commencement of a formula, as, et sic nil debet, et sic non est factum, formerly used as a special conclusion to a plea in bar, in order to render it positive, and to avoid the fault of argumentativeness. Archb. Civ. Pl. 224; Mansel, Demurrer, 75.

ET SIC AD JUDICIUM. And so to judgment. Y. B. T. 1 Edw. II. 10.

ET SIC AD PATRIAM (Law Lat. and so to the country). A common phrase in the Year Books, in recording an issue to the country. Il ne dona pas, prist, etc., et alii e contra; et sic ad patriam. Y. B. M. 3 Edw. III. 29.

ET SIC FECIT (Lat.) And he did so. Y. B. P. 9 Hen. VI. 17.

ET SIC PENDET (Lat. and so it hangs). A term used in the old reports to signify that a point was left undetermined. T. Raym. 168. Et sic pendet placitum, and so the plea hangs. Y. B. T. 1 Edw. II. 8.

ET SIC ULTERIUS (Lat.) And so on; and so further; and so forth. Fleta, lib. 2, c 50, § 27.

ET UX (Lat.) Abbreviation for et uxor,—"and wife."

ETCAETERA (Lat. and others; and other things). The abbreviation etc. was formerly much used in pleading to avoid the inconveniences attendant upon making full and half defense. See "Defense." It is not generally to be used in solemn instruments. See 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 427.

ENGLETERRE. England.

EUM QUI NOCENTEM INFAMAT, NON est aequum et bonum ob eam rem condemnari; delicta enim nocentium nota esse oportet et expedit. It is not just and proper that he who speaks ill of a bad man should be condemned on that account; for it is fitting and expedient that the crimes of bad men should be known. Dig. 47. 10. 17; 1 Bl. Comm. 125.

EUNDO MORANDO ET REDEUNDO (Lat.) This Latin phrase signifies going, remaining, and returning. It is employed in cases where a person, either as a party, a witness, or one acting in some other capacity, as an elector, is privileged from arrest, in order to give him the freedom necessary to the performance of his respective obligations, to signify that he is protected from arrest eundo morando et redeundo. See 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3380.

EUNOMY. Equal laws and a well-adjusted constitution of government.

EUNUCH. A male whose organs of generation have been so far removed or disorganized that he is rendered incapable of reproducing his species. Domat, Civ. Law, liv. prel. tit. 2, § 1, note 10.

EUS LEGIS. A legal entity; a creature of law. Applied to corporations.

EVASIO (Lat.) In old practice. Escape; an escape from prison or custody. Reg. Orig. 312; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 26, § 4.

EVASION (Lat. evadere, to avoid). A subtle device to set aside the truth or escape the punishment of the law; as, if a man should tempt another to strike him first, in order that he might have an opportunity of returning the blow with impunity. He is, nevertheless, punishable, because he becomes himself the aggressor in such a case. It is not a technical term. Hawk. P. C. c. 31, §§ 24, 25; Bac. Abr. "Fraud" (A).

EVENTUS EST QUI EX CAUSA SEQUItur; et dicitur eventus quia ex causis evenit. An event is that which follows from the cause, and is called an "event" because it eventuates from causes. 9 Coke, 81.

EVENTUS VARIOS RES NOVA SEMPER habet. A new matter always produces various events. Co. Litt. 379.

EVICTION. Depriving a person of the possession of his lands or tenements. Technically, the dispossession must be by judgment of law; if otherwise, it is an ouster (32 Iowa, 71), but in modern usage it is commonly applied to dispossession in any manner (44 N. Y. 382; 39 Cal. 360; 98 N. C. 239).

Eviction may be total or partial.

(1) Total eviction takes place when the possessor is wholly deprived of his rights in the premises.

(2) Partial eviction takes place when the possessor is deprived of only a portion of them; as, if a third person comes in and ejects him from the possession of half his land, or establishes a right to some easement over it, by a title which is prior to that under which he holds.

It may be actual or constructive.

(3) Actual eviction is where one is, either by force or by process of law, actually put out of possession.

(4) Constructive eviction is such acts of wrongful interference as seriously impair the enjoyment of the premises. 132 Mass. 367; 20 N. Y. 281.

Thus, the erection by the landlord, on the demised premises, of a permanent structure, which rendered two rooms in the demised house unfit for use, is a constructive eviction. 106 Mass. 201.

EVIDENCE. That which tends to prove or disprove any matter in question, or to influence the belief respecting it. Belief is produced by the consideration of something presented to the mind. The matter thus presented, in whatever shape it may come, and through whatever material organ it is derived, is evidence. Prof. Parker, Lectures on Medical Jurisprudence, in Dartmouth College, N. H.

The word "evidence," in legal acceptation, includes all the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved. 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 1, § 1.

That which is legally submitted to a jury, to enable them to decide upon the questions in dispute, or issues, as pointed out by the pleadings, and distinguished from all comment and argument, is termed "evidence." 1 Starkie, Ev. pt. 1, § 3.

"Any matter of fact the effect, tendency, or design of which is to produce in the mind a persuasion affirmative or disaffirmative of the existence of some other matter of fact." Best, Ev. § 11.

"Evidence" is to be distinguished from "proof." Evidence is not proof, but the medium of proof. Proof is the effect or result of evidence. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 1. "Proof is the perfection of evidence. Without evidence there can be no proof, though there may be evidence which does not amount to proof." Wills, Circ. Ev. 2.

It is also to be distinguished from "testimony," which excludes documentary evidence. Testimony embraces only the declaration of witnesses made under oath. "Testimony is but one of the several instruments of evidence, and cannot be considered the equivalent thereof, for evidence embraces not only testimony, but private writings and public documents." Thomp. Trials, § 2784; 3 Wyo. 388; 7 Ind. 94; 76 Hun (N. Y.) 427.

Evidence may be classified with reference to its instruments, its nature, its legal character, its effect, its object.

(1) The instruments of evidence, in the legal acceptation of the term, are:

(a) Judicial notice or recognition, being notice taken by the court, without the introduction of proof by the parties of matters, such as the territorial extent of their jurisdiction, local divisions of their own countries, seats of courts, etc. If the judge needs information on subjects, he will seek it from such sources as he deems authentic. See 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 2.

(b) Documentary evidence, including public records. The registers of official transactions made by officers appointed for the purpose; as, the public statutes, the judgments and proceedings of courts, etc. Judicial writings, such as inquisitions, depositions, etc. Public documents having a semi-official character, as, the statute books published under the authority of the government, documents printed by the authority of congress, etc. Private writings, as, deeds, contracts, wills.

(c) Parol evidence, being the testimony of witnesses.

(d) Real evidence, being that which is addressed to the senses of the court without the intervention of testimony, as by the production in court of an object.

(2) In its nature, evidence is direct or indirect.

(a) Direct evidence is that means of proof which tends to show the existence of a fact in question, without the intervention of the proof of any other fact.

It is that evidence which, if believed, establishes the truth of a fact in issue, and does not arise from any presumption. Evidence is direct and positive when the very facts in dispute are communicated by those who have the actual knowledge of them by means of their senses. 1 Phil. Ev. 116; 1 Starkie, Ev. 19; Burrill, Circ. Ev. 4; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13.

(b) Indirect evidence is that which is applied to the principal fact indirectly by the proof of circumstances from which the principal fact is inferred. Indirect evidence is commonly known as "circumstantial evidence." See "Circumstantial Evidence."

Evidence has also been divided into real or demonstrative evidence, and moral evidence, the latter including all evidence which is not demonstrative. Brad. Ev. § 15; Gamb. Moral Ev. 121.

(3) With regard to its legal character, evidence is either primary or secondary.

(a) Primary, sometimes called "best," evidence is that which most certainly exhibits the true state of facts to which it relates. The rule is one of quality of evidence, not of quantity (17 Md. 67), and is not based on mere credibility, but on the degree of proximity of the proof to the principal fact to be proved. See "Best Evidence."

(b) Secondary evidence is any evidence suggesting in its nature that there is more direct evidence of the same fact. Hearsay evidence is a type of secondary evidence. See "Hearsay Evidence."

(4) As to its effect, evidence is either prima facie or conclusive.

(a) Prima facie evidence is that evidence which is sufficient proof respecting the matter in question until it is contradicted, but which may be contradicted or controlled.

Satisfactory evidence is that which produces the degree of certainty required in the case in hand. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 6; 70 Mo. 248.

(b) Conclusive evidence is that which establishes the fact, and is not subject to contradiction.

(5) As to its object, evidence is either substantive evidence, or evidence to credibility.

(a) Substantive evidence is that addressed directly to the point in controversy.

(b) Evidence to credibility is that which neither proves nor disproves the principal fact, but merely impeaches or sustains witnesses by whom the principal fact has been proved or disproved.

Among the kinds of substantive evidence are "cumulative evidence," which is further evidence of the same kind to the same point, and "corroborative evidence," which is further evidence of a different kind to the same point. Underh. Ev. § 2.

EVIDENCE, CIRCUMSTANTIAL. See "Circumstantial Evidence."

EVIDENCE, CONCLUSIVE. See "Conclusive Evidence."

EVIDENCE, DIRECT. See "Evidence."

EVIDENCE, EXTRINSIC. External evidence, or that which is not contained in the body of a writing.

EVIDENCE OF DEBT. A written instrument given as an acknowledgment of an indebtedness, or as security therefor, and showing on its face the existence of the debt.

EVIDENCE OF TITLE. A deed or other document establishing the title to property, especially real estate; quibus jus praediorum firmatur. Spelman.

EVIDENTIARY. Having the quality of evidence; constituting evidence; evidencing. A term introduced by Bentham, and, from its convenience, adopted by other writers. Burrill. Circ. Ev. 3, and note.

EVOCATION. In French law. The act by which a judge is deprived of the cognizance of a suit over which he had jurisdiction, for the purpose of conferring on other judges the power of deciding it. It is like the process by writ of certiorari.

EWAGE. A toll paid for water passage. Cowell. The same as aquagium.

EWBRICE. Adultery; spouse breach; marriage breach. Cowell; Tomlin.

EX ASSENSU PATRIS (Lat.) By or with the father's consent. Litt. § 40; 2 Bl. Comm. 133. See Cro. Jac. 415, 587.

EX ASSENSU SUO (Law Lat. with his assent). Formal words in judgments for damages by default. Comb. 220.

EX BONIS (Lat. of the goods or property). A term of the civil law; distinguished from in bonis, as being descriptive of or applicable to property not in actual possession. Calv. Lex.

EX CAUSA (Law Lat.) By title.

EX CERTA SCIENTIA (Lat. of certain or sure knowledge). Formal words anciently used in letters patent, implying that the king had full knowledge and understanding of the matter. 1 Coke, 40b.

EX COLORE. Under color of.

EX COMITATE (Lat.) Out of comity or courtesy; by courtesy. 2 Kent, Comm. 457.

EX COMMODATO (Lat. from or out of loan). A term applied in the old law of England to a right of action arising out of a loan (commodatum). Glanv. lib. 10, c. 13; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 166.

EX COMPARATIONE SCRIPTORUM (Law Lat.) By a comparison of writings or handwritings; a term in the law of evidence. Best, Pres. 218.

EX CONCESSIS (Lat.) From things or premises granted.

EX CONSULTO (Lat.) With deliberation.

EX CONTINENTI (Lat.) Immediately; without any interval or delay; incontinently. A term of the civil law. Calv. Lex.

EX CONTRACTU. See "Action."

EX CURIA. Out of court.

EX DEBITO JUSTITIAE (Lat.) As a debt of justice; as a matter of legal right. 3 Bl. Comm. 48.

EX DEFECTU SANGUINIS (Law Lat.) From failure of blood; for want of issue. Hale, Anal. § 29.

EX DELICTO. See "Action."

EX DEMISSIONE (Law Lat.) From, or on the demise. Usually abbreviated ex dem.

EX DIRECTO (Law Lat.) Directly; immediately. Story, Bills, § 199.

EX DIUTURNITATE TEMPORIS, OMNIA praesumuntur solemniter esse acta. From length of time, all things are presumed to have been done in due form. Co. Litt. 6; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 20; Best, Ev. § 43.

EX DOLO MALO (Lat.) Out of fraud or deceit. When a cause of action arises from fraud or deceit, it cannot be supported, ex dolo malo non oritur actio.

EX DOLO MALO NON ORITUR ACTIO. A right of action cannot arise out of fraud. Broom, Leg. Max. 349; Cowp. 343; 2 C. B. 501, 512, 515; 5 Scott, N. R. 558; 10 Mass. 276.

EX DONATIONIBUS AUTEM FEODA militaria vel magnum serjeantium non continentibus oritur nobis quoddam nomen generale, quod est socagium. From grants not containing military fees or grand serjeanty, a kind of general name is used by us, which is "socage." Co. Litt. 86.

EX EMPTO (Lat. out of purchase; founded on purchase). A term of the civil law, adopted by Bracton. Inst. 4. 6. 28; Bracton, fol. 102.

EX FACIE (Law Lat.) On the face. 2 Steph. Comm. 158.

EX FACTO (Lat.) From, by, or in consequence of an act or thing done. Bracton, fol. 172. Applied generally to an act done in violation of law or right. A title is said to originate ex facto when it commences in an unlawful act. Id. Bracton uses it in the same sense with de facto (q. v.) Id.

EX FACTO JUS ORITUR. The law arises out of the fact. 2 Inst. 479; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 329; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 99.

EX FICTIONE JURIS. Out of or by fiction of law. Bracton, fol. 53.

EX FREQUENTI DELICTO AUGETUR poena. Punishment increases with increasing crime. 2 Inst. 479.

EX GRATIA (Lat. of favor; of grace). Words used formerly at the beginning of royal grants, to indicate that they were not made in consequence of any claim of legal right.

EX GRAVI QUERELA (Law Lat. from or on the grievous complaint). In old English practice. The name of a writ (so called from its initial words) which lay for a person to whom any lands or tenements in fee were devised by will, within any city, town, or borough wherein lands were devisable by custom, and the heir of the devisor entered and detained them from him. Reg. Orig. 244b; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 198 (L) et seq.; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 49. Abolished by St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, § 36.

EX HYPOTHESI. Upon the hypothesis.

EX INDUSTRIA (Lat.) Intentionally; from fixed purpose.

EX INTEGRO. Anew; afresh. Bracton, fol. 293.

EX JUSTA CAUSA (Lat.) From a just or lawful cause; by a just or legal title.

EX LEGE. By law; by operation of law.

EX LEGIBUS (Lat. according to the laws). A phrase of the civil law, which means according to the intent or spirit of the law, as well as according to the words or letter. Dig. 50. 16. 6. See Calv. Lex.

EX LICENTIA REGIS (Law Lat.) By the king's license. 1 Bl. Comm. 168, note.

EX LOCATO (Lat. from or out of lease or letting). A term of the civil law, applied to actions or rights of action arising out of the contract of locatum. Inst. 4. 6. 28. Adopted at an early period in the law of England. Bracton, fol. 102; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 168.

EX MALEFICIO (Lat.) On account of misconduct; by virtue of or out of an illegal act. Used in the civil law generally, and sometimes in the common law. Browne, St. Frauds, 110, note; Broom, Leg. Max. 351.

EX MALEFICIO NON ORITUR CONtractus. A contract cannot arise out of an act radically wrong and illegal. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 660; 1 Term R. 734; 3 Term R. 422; 1 H. Bl. 324; 5 El. & Bl. 999, 1015.

EX MALIS MORIBUS BONAE LEGES natae sunt. Good laws arise from evil manners. 2 Inst. 161.

EX MERO MOTU (Lat.) Mere motion of a party's own free will. Generally applied to action by a court of its own motion. Sua motu and sua sponte are used as synonyms.

EX MORA (Lat.) From the delay; from the default.

EX MORE (Lat.) According to custom.

EX MULTITUDINE SIGNORUM, COLLIGitur identitas vera. From the great number of signs, true identity is ascertained. Bac. Max. reg. 25; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 569.

EX MUTUO (Lat. from or out of loan). In the old law of England, a debt was said to arise ex mutuo when one lent another anything which consisted in number, weight, or measure. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 159; Bracton, fol. 99.

EX NECESSITATE (Lat.) Of necessity. 3 Rep. Ch. 123.

EX NECESSITATE LEGIS (Lat.) From the necessity of law.

EX NECESSITATE REI (Lat. from the necessity of the thing). Many acts may be done ex necessitate rei which would not be justifiable without it; and sometimes property is protected ex necessitate rei which, under other circumstances, would not be so.

EX NIHILO NIHIL FIT. From nothing nothing comes. 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 178, 221; 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 257, 301.

EX NUDO PACTO NON ORITUR ACTIO. No action arises on a contract without a consideration. Noy, Max. 24; 3 Burrows, 1670; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 445; Chit. Cont. (10th Am. Ed.) 25; 1 Story, Cont. § 525. See "Nudum Pactum."

EX OFFICIO (Lat. by virtue of his office). Many powers are granted and exercised by public officers which are not expressly delegated, or an office may be an incident to another, and filled by the incumbent thereof. Thus, the mayor may be ex officio a member of the city board of control. A judge, for example, may be ex officio a conservator of the peace and a justice of the peace.

EX OFFICIO INFORMATIONS. Proceedings filed in the English queen's bench division by the attorney general, at the direct and proper instance of the crown, in cases of such enormous misdemeanors as peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger the government, or to molest or affront the sovereign in discharging the royal functions. The information is tried by a jury of the county where the offense arose, and for that purpose, unless the case be of such importance as to be tried at bar, it is sent down by writ of nisi prius into that county, and tried either by a common or special jury, like a civil action. 4 Steph. Comm. (7th Ed.) 374; Wharton.

EX OFFICIO OATH (Lat.) An oath taken by offending priests. Abolished by 13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 12.

EX PACTO ILLICITO NON ORITUR ACTio. From an illicit contract no action arises. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 666; 7 Clark & F. 729.

EX PARTE (Lat. of the one part.) Many things may be done ex parte, when the opposite party has had notice. An affidavit or deposition is said to be taken ex parte when only one of the parties attends to taking the same.

Many proceedings commenced by an ex parte application, as for writ of habeas corpus, are so entitled, as Ex parte Hartman, 9 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 124.

EX PARTE MATERNA (Lat.) On the mother's side.

EX PARTE PATERNA (Lat.) On the father's side.

EX PARTE TALIS (Law Lat.) In old English practice. The name of a writ which lay for a bailiff or receiver, who, having auditors assigned to hear his account, could not obtain of them reasonable allowance, but was cast into prison by them. Cowell; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 129 (F).

EX PAUCIS DICTIS INTENDERE PLURIma possis. You can imply many things from few expressions. Litt. § 384.

EX POST FACTO (Lat. after the act). An estate granted may be made good or avoided by matter ex post facto, when an election is given to the party to accept or not to accept. 1 Coke, 146.

EX POST FACTO LAW. A statute which would render an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. 6 Cranch (U. S.) 138; 1 Kent, Comm. 408. A law made to punish acts committed before the existence of such law, and which had not been declared crimes by preceding laws. Dec. Rights Mass. pt. 1, § 24; Dec. Rights Md. art. 15.

"One which, in its operation, makes that criminal or penal which was not so at the time the action was performed, or which increases the punishment, or, in short, which, in relation to the offense or its consequences, alters the situation of the party to his disadvantage." 2 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 366.

Laws under the following circumstances are to be considered ex post facto laws, within Const. art. 1, § 10: (1) Every law that makes an act done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action. (2) Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed. (3) Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed, though it would be otherwise of a law mitigating the punishment. 3 Story, Const. 212. (4) Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender, though it might be otherwise of a law merely modifying the remedy or mode of procedure. 3 Dall. (U. S.) 386; 16 Ga. 102. (5) A fifth class has been suggested to cover some exceptional cases, viz., laws that, in relation to the offense or its consequences, alter the situation of the party to his disadvantage. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 528. As, for example, where, after a crime was committed, the law was so changed that a conviction of a lower degree was no longer a bar, on a new trial being granted, to a conviction of a higher degree. 107 U. S. 221.

A law mitigating the punishment of previously committed crimes is not ex post facto, within the meaning of the constitution. 12 Allen (Mass.) 421. Nor is a statute which regulates only mode of procedure. 110 U. S. 574; 137 U. S. 483.

There is a distinction between ex post facto laws and retrospective laws. Every ex post facto law must necessarily be retrospective, but every retrospective law is not an ex post facto law; the former only are prohibited.

It is fully settled that the term ex post facto, as used in the constitution, is to be taken in a limited sense as referring to criminal or penal statutes alone, and that the policy, the reason, and the humanity of the prohibition against passing ex post facto laws do not extend to civil cases, to cases that merely affect the private property of citizens. Some of the most necessary acts of legislation are, on the contrary, founded upon the principle that private rights must yield to public exigencies. 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 89; 17 How. (U. S.) 463; 6 Cranch (U. S.) 87; 8 Pet. (U. S.) 88; 11 Pet. (U. S.) 421. See 1 Cranch (U. S.) 109; 9 Cranch (U. S.) 374; 1 Gall. (U. S.) 105; 2 Pet. (U. S.) 380, 523, 627; 3 Story, Const. 212; Serg. Const. Law, 356; 2 Pick. (Mass.) 172; 11 Pick. (Mass.) 28; 9 Mass. 363; 2 Root (Conn.) 350; 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 133; 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 563; 3 N. H. 475; 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 488; 6 Bin. (Pa.) 271; 2 Pet. (U. S.) 681. See "Retrospective Law."

EX PRAECOGITATA MALICIA (Law Lat.) Of malice aforethought. Reg. Orig. 102.

EX PROCEDENTIBUS ET CONSEquentibus optima fit interpretatio. The best interpretation is made from things preceding and following, i. e., the context. 1 Rolle, Abr. 375.

EX PROPRIO MOTU (Lat.) Of his own accord.

EX PROPRIO VIGORE (Lat.) By its own force. 2 Kent, Comm. 457.

EX PROVISIONE HOMINIS (Law Lat.) By the provision of man; by the limitation of the party, as distinguished from the disposition of the law. 11 Coke, 80b.

EX PROVISIONE MARITI (Lat.) From the provision of the husband.

EX QUASI CONTRACTU (Lat.) From quasi contract. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 60.

EX RELATIONE (Lat. at the information of; by the relation). A bill in equity, for example, may in many cases be brought for an injunction to restrain a public nuisance ex relatione (by information of) the parties immediately interested in or affected by the nuisance. 18 Ves. 217; 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 382; 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 439; 13 How. (U. S.) 518; 12 Pet. (U. S.) 91.

EX RIGORE JURIS (Law Lat.) According to the rigor or strictness of law; in strictness of law. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 10, § 3.

EX SCRIPTIS OLIM VISIS (Law Lat. from writings formerly seen). A term used as descriptive of that kind of proof of handwriting where the witness has seen letters or documents professing to be the handwriting of a party, and has afterwards had correspondence or communication with such party, so as to induce a reasonable presumption that the letters or documents were actually his handwriting. 5 Adol. & E. 703, 730; Best, Pres. 219.

EX STATUTO (Law Lat.) According to the statute. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 11, § 1.

EX STIPULATU ACTIO (Lat.) In the civil law. An action of stipulation. An action given to recover marriage portions. Inst. 4. 6. 29.

EX TEMPORE (Lat.) From the time; without premeditation.

EX TESTAMENTO (Lat.) From, by, or under a will. Inst. 2. 9. 7; Code, 6. 30. 19.

EX TOTA MATERIA EMERGAT RESOlutio. The construction or explanation should arise out of the whole subject matter. Wingate, Max. 238.

EX TURPI CAUSA NON ORITUR ACTIO. No action arises out of an immoral consideration. Selw. N. P. 63; 2 Pet. (U. S.) 539.

EX UNA PARTE (Lat.) Of one part or side; on one side.

EX UNO DISCES OMNES. From one thing you can discern all.

EX UTRISQUE PARENTIBUS CONJUNCti (Lat.) Related on the side of both parents; of the whole blood. Hale, Hist. Com. Law, c. 11.

EX VI TERMINI (Lat.) By force of the term.

EX VISCERIBUS (Lat. from the bowels). From the vital part; the very essence of the thing. 10 Coke, 24b; 2 Metc. (Mass.) 213. Ex visceribus verborum, from the mere words, and nothing else. 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 494; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 980.

EX VISITATIONE DEI (Lat. by or from the visitation of God). This phrase is frequently employed in inquisitions by the coroner, where it signifies that the death of the deceased was a natural one.

EX VISU SCRIPTIONIS (Lat. from sight of the writing; from having seen a person write). A term employed to describe one of the modes of proof of handwriting. Best. Pres. 218.

EX VOLUNTATE. Voluntarily.

EXACTION. A willful wrong done by an officer, or by one who, under color of his office, takes more fee or pay for his services than the law allows.

Between "extortion" and "exaction" there is this difference, that in the former case the officer extorts more than his due, when something is due to him; in the latter, he exacts what is not his due, when there is nothing due to him. Co. Litt. 368.

EXACTOR. In old English and civil law. A collector. Exactor regis, collector for the king. A collector of taxes or revenue. Vicat; Spelman. The term "exaction" early came to mean the wrong done by an officer, or one pretending to have authority, in demanding or taking any reward or fee for that matter, cause, or thing which the law allows not. Termes de la Ley.

EXACTOR REGIS. The king's exactor, who collected the taxes and other moneys due to the treasury. In the counties, this office was performed by the sheriff; in the seaports and cities by the publicans. Spelman.

EXALTARE (Law Lat.) In old English law. To raise or elevate. Exaltare stagnum, to raise a pool. Reg. Orig. 199; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 184 (O). To raise the water in a pond by damming, so as to overflow another's land. Bracton, fol. 232; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 1, § 19.

EXAMEN (Law Lat.) A trial. Examen computi, the balance of an account. Towns. Pl. 223.

EXAMINATION. Interrogation; investigation. The interrogation of a person who is desirous of performing some act or claiming some privilege under the law, to ascertain if all the requirements of law have been complied with, conducted before an officer having authority for that purpose.

The interrogation of a party before a competent officer concerning some fact involved in a judicial proceeding.

——In Practice. The interrogation of a witness at the trial, or on the taking of his deposition.

——In Criminal Law. The investigation by an authorized magistrate of the grounds of accusation against a person arrested for crime, with a view of securing his appearance for trial before the proper court, should the evidence be sufficient to warrant it.

EXAMINED COPY. A phrase applied to designate a paper which is a copy of a record, public book, or register, and which has been compared with the original. 1 Campb. 469.

EXAMINERS. Persons appointed by law to examine into any matter of fact, to determine the advisability of action by public authorities pursuant to law. Thus, in many states there are examiners in law and medical examiners, to determine the qualifications of applicants for license to practice those professions; examiners of banks, charged with inspection to determine the solvency of banking institutions, etc.

EXAMINERS IN CHANCERY. Officers who examine, upon oath, witnesses produced on either side, upon such interrogatories as the parties to any suit exhibit for that purpose. Cowell.

The examiner is to administer an oath to the party, and then repeat the interrogatories, one at a time, writing down the answer himself. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1062. Anciently, the examiner was one of the judges of the court; hence an examination before the examiner is said to be an examination in court. 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1053.

EXANNUAL ROLL. A roll containing the illeviable fines and desperate debts, which was read yearly to the sheriff, in the ancient way of delivering the sheriff's accounts, to see what might be gotten. Hale, Sheriffs, 67; Cowell.

EXCAMB. In Scotch law. To exchange. Excambion, exchange. The words are evidently derived from the Latin excambium. Bell. Dict. See "Exchange."

EXCAMBIATOR. An exchanger of lands; a broker. Obsolete.

EXCAMBIUM (Lat.) In English law. Exchange; a recompense. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 442.

EXCEPTANT. An exceptor; a party entering an exception to any proceeding.

EXCEPTIO.

——In Roman Law. An exception. In a general sense, a judicial allegation opposed by a defendant to the plaintiff's action. Calv. Lex., citing Hotoman.

A stop or stay to an action opposed by the defendant. Cowell; Halifax, Anal. bk. 3, c. 5.

Answering to the "defense" or "plea" of the common law.

In a stricter sense, an equitable "exception" to the general rule of law; the exclusion of an action that lay in strict law, on grounds of equity. Heinec. Elem. Jur. Civ. lib. 4, tit. 13, § 1277. A kind of limitation of an action, by which it was shown that the action, though otherwise just, did not lie in the particular case. Calv. Lex. A species of defense allowed in cases where, though the action as brought by the plaintiff was in itself just, yet it was unjust as against the particular party sued. Inst. 4. 13. pr.

A mode of defense to an action, consisting of facts which, though they do not ipso jure destroy the right of action, served to protect the defendant on equitable grounds. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 207, § 204; Id. p. 209, § 206, and note.

——In Modern Civil Law. Any objection of a defendant by which he alleges a new fact in order to defend himself against the action, as distinguished from a simple denial. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 207, § 204.

Answering to the plea of confession and avoidance in the common law.

——In the Early Common Law. The first pleading in an action on the part of the defendant; an answer. Bracton, fol. 399b.

——In the Canon Law. The second pleading in an action. Corv. Jus. Canon. lib. iii. tit. 32.

——In Old Practice. An exception taken at the trial. Fleta, lib. 6, c. 55, § 8.

——In Old Conveyancing. An exception in a deed or other instrument. 9 Coke, 53.

EXCEPTIO DILATORIA (Lat.) In the civil law. A dilatory exception; called, also, "temporalis" (temporary); one which defeated the action for a time (quae ad tempus nocet), and created delay (et temporis dilationem tribuit); such as an agreement not to sue within a certain time, as five years. Inst. 4. 13. 10. See Dig. 44. 1. 3.

EXCEPTIO DOLI MALI (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception or plea of fraud. Inst. 4. 13. 1. 9; Dig. 44. 4; Bracton, fol. 100b.

EXCEPTIO EJUS REI CUJUS PETITUR dissolutio nulla est. A plea of that matter the dissolution of which is the object of the action is of no effect. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 37.

EXCEPTIO FALSI OMNIUM ULTIMA. A false plea is the basest of all things.

EXCEPTIO FIRMAT REGULAM IN CASIbus non exceptis. The exception affirms the rule in cases not excepted. Bac. Aph. 17.

EXCEPTIO FIRMAT REGULAM IN CONtrarium. The exception affirms the rule to be the other way. Bac. Aph. 17.

EXCEPTIO IN FACTUM (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception on the fact; an exception or plea founded on the peculiar circumstances of the case. Inst. 4. 13. 1; Calv. Lex.

EXCEPTIO JURISJURANDI (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception of oath; an exception or plea that the matter had been sworn to. Inst. 4. 13. 4. This kind of exception was allowed where a debtor, at the instance of his creditor (creditore deferente), had sworn that nothing was due the latter, and had notwithstanding been sued by him. Id.

EXCEPTIO METUS (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception or plea of fear or compulsion. Inst. 4. 13. 1. 9; Bracton, fol. 100b. Answering to the modern plea of duress.

EXCEPTIO NULLA EST VERSUS ACtionem quae exceptionem perimit. There can be no plea against an action which entirely destroys the plea. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 106.

EXCEPTIO PACTI CONVENTI (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception of compact; an exception or plea that the plaintiff had agreed not to sue. Inst. 4. 13. 3.

EXCEPTIO PECUNIAE NON NUMERAtae (Lat.) An exception or plea of money not paid; a defense which might be set up by a party who was sued on a promise to repay money which he had never received. Inst. 4. 13. 2.

EXCEPTIO PEREMPTORIA (Lat.)

——In Civil Law. A peremptory exception; called also "perpetua" (perpetual); one which forever destroyed the subject matter or ground of the action (quae semper rem de qua agitur perimit); such as the exceptio doli mali, the exceptio metus, etc. Inst. 4. 13. 9. See Dig. 44. 1. 3.

——In Common Law. A peremptory plea; a plea in bar. Bracton, fols. 240, 399b.

EXCEPTIO PROBAT REGULAM DE REbus non exceptis. An exception proves the rule concerning things not excepted. 11 Coke, 41.

EXCEPTIO QUAE FIRMAT LEGEM, EXponit legem. An exception which confirms the law expounds the law. 2 Bulst. 189.

EXCEPTIO QUOQUE REGULAM DECLArat. The exception also declares the rule. Bac. Aph. 17.

EXCEPTIO REI JUDICATAE (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception or plea of matter adjudged; a plea that the subject matter of the action had been determined in a previous action. Inst. 4. 13. 5; Dig. 44. 2.

This term is adopted by Bracton, and is constantly used in modern law to denote a defense founded upon a previous adjudication of the same matter. Bracton, fols. 100b, 177; 2 Kent, Comm. 120. A plea of a former recovery or judgment.

EXCEPTIO REI VENDITAE ET TRADItae. An exception or plea that the article claimed in an action was sold or delivered to the defendant. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 315.

EXCEPTIO SEMPER ULTIMA PONENda est. An exception is always to be put last. 9 Coke, 53.

EXCEPTIO TEMPORIS (Lat.) In the civil law. An exception or plea analogous to that of the statute of limitations in our law; viz., that the time prescribed by law for bringing such actions has expired. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 213. Answering to the modern plea of the statute of limitations.

EXCEPTION (Lat. excipere; ex, out of, capere, to take).

——In Contracts. A clause in a deed by which the lessor excepts something out of that which he granted before by the deed.

The exclusion of something from the effect or operation of the deed or contract which would otherwise be included.

An exception differs from a reservation,—the former being always of part of the thing granted, the latter of a thing not in esse, but newly created or reserved; the exception is of the whole of the part excepted; the reservation may be of a right or interest in the particular part affected by the reservation. See 5 R. I. 419; 41 Me. 177; 42 Me. 9; 42 Minn. 401; 142 N. Y. 561; 131 Ill. 490. An exception differs, also, from an explanation, which, by the use of a videlicet, proviso, etc., is allowed only to explain doubtful clauses precedent, or to separate and distribute generals into particulars. 3 Pick. (Mass.) 272. It differs also from a proviso, in that an exception is absolute, while a proviso is conditional. 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 522.

To make a valid exception, these things must concur: First, the exception must be by apt words, as, "saving and excepting," etc. See 30 Vt. 242; 5 R. I. 419; 41 Me. 177. Second, it must be of part of the thing previously described, and not of some other thing. Third, it must be of part of the thing only, and not of all, the greater part, or the effect of the thing granted. 11 Md. 339; 23 Vt. 395; 10 Mo. 426. An exception, therefore, in a lease which extends to the whole thing demised is void. Fourth, it must be of such thing as is severable from the demised premises, and not of an inseparable incident. 33 Pa. St. 251. Fifth, it must be of such a thing as he that excepts may have, and which properly belongs to him. Sixth, it must be of a particular thing out of a general, and not of a particular thing out of a particular, thing. Seventh, it must be particularly described and set forth. A lease of a tract of land except one acre would be void, because that acre was not particularly described. Woodf. Landl. & Ten. 10; Co. Litt. 47a; 12 Me. 337; Wright (Ohio) 711;

3 Johns. (N. Y.) 375; 5 N. Y. 33; 8 Conn. 369; 6 Pick. (Mass.) 499; 6 N. H. 421; 4 Strobh. (S. C.) 208; 2 Tayl. (N. C.) 173. Exceptions against common right and general rules are construed as strictly as possible. 1 Bart. Conv. 68; 5 Jones (N. C.) 63.

——In Equity Practice. The allegation of a party, in writing, that some pleading or proceeding in a cause is insufficient.

——In Civil Law. A plea. Merlin, Repert.

Declinatory exceptions are such dilatory exceptions as merely decline the jurisdiction of the judge before whom the action is brought. Code Proc. La. 334.

Dilatory exceptions are such as do not tend to defeat the action, but only to retard its progress.

Peremptory exceptions are those which tend to the dismissal of the action.

——In Practice. The word "exceptions" has been given divers meanings in different jurisdictions. The most common is an objection formerly taken to a ruling made at the trial.

"Exception" is sometimes used for "bill of exceptions."

In Texas, an exception is a demurrer to a pleading; the term as so used being probably a relic of the civil law. See 85 Tex. 575.

EXCEPTION TO BAIL. An objection to the special bail put in by the defendant to an action at law made by the plaintiff, on grounds of the insufficiency of the bail. 1 Tidd, Prac. 255.

EXCEPTIS EXCIPIENDIS (Lat.) With all necessary exceptions.

EXCEPTOR. In old English law. A party who entered an exception or plea.

EXCERPTA, or EXCERPTS. Extracts.

EXCESS. In pleading. A replication to the plea molliter manus imposuit, that defendant used more force than was necessary.

EXCESSIVUM IN JURE REPROBATUR; excessus in re qualibet jure reprobatur communi. Excess in law is reprehended; excess in anything is reprehended at common law. Co. Litt. 44.

EXETER (or EXON) DOMESDAY. The name given to a record preserved among the muniments and charters belonging to the dean and chapter of Exeter cathedral, which contains a description of the western parts of the kingdom, comprising the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall. The Exeter Domesday was published, with several other surveys, nearly contemporary, by order of the commissioners of the public records, under the direction of Sir Henry Ellis, in a volume supplementary to the Great Domesday, folio, London, 1816. Wharton.

EXCHANGE.

——In Commercial Law. A negotiation by which one person transfers to another funds which he has in a certain place, either at a price agreed upon, or which is fixed by commercial usage.

This transfer is made by means of an instrument which represents such funds, and is well known by the name of a "bill of exchange." The price above the par value of the funds so transferred is called the "premium" of exchange, and if under that value the difference is called the "discount;" either being called the "rate" of exchange.

The rate of exchange, the difference in value of the same amount of money in different places, is sometimes known as "exchange."

——Of Property. An exchange of chattels is a transfer thereof for other chattels. This is commonly called "barter." Exchange of real estate is a mutual grant of equal interests in land, the one in consideration of the other. 2 Bl. Comm. 323; Litt. 62; Shep. Touch. 289; Watk. Conv. It is said that exchange in the United States does not differ from bargain and sale. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2055.

——At Common Law. Five circumstances are necessary to an exchange: That the estates given be equal; that the word excambium, or exchange, be used, which cannot be supplied by any other word, or described by circumlocution; that there be an execution by entry or claim in the life of the parties; that, if it be of things which lie in grant, it be by deed; that, if the lands lie in several counties, or if the thing lie in grant, though they be in one county, it be by deed indented. In practice this mode of conveyancing is nearly obsolete.

See Cruise, Dig. tit. 32; Comyn, Dig.; Co. Litt. 51; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 159; Hardin (Ky.) 593; 1 N. H. 65; 3 Har. & J. (Md.) 361; 3 Wils. 489; Watk. Conv. bk. 2, c. 5; 3 Wood. Conv. 243.

EXCHANGE, BILL OF. See "Bill of Exchange."

EXCHEQUER (Law Lat. scaccarium; Norman Fr. cschequier). In English law. A department of the government which has the management of the collection of the king's revenue.

The name is said to be derived from the chequered cloth which covered the table on which some of the king's accounts were made up, and the amounts indicated by counters.

It consists of two divisions, one for the receipt of revenue, the other for administering justice. 4 Inst. 103-116; 3 Bl. Comm. 44, 45. See "Court of Exchequer;" "Court of Exchequer Chamber."

EXCHEQUER BILLS. Bills of credit issued by authority of parliament.

They constitute the medium of transaction of business between the bank of England and the government. The exchequer bills contain a guarantee from government which secures the holders against loss by fluctuation. Wharton.

EXCHEQUER, COURT OF. See "Court of Exchequer."

EXCISE. An inland imposition, paid sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity, sometimes on the manufacturer, sometimes upon the retail sale. 1 Bl. Comm. 318; Story, Const. § 950; 7 Wall. (U. S.) 445.

EXCLUSA, or EXCLUSAGIUM. In old English law. A sluice to carry off water; the payment to the lord for the benefit of such a sluice. Cowell; Reg. Orig. 96.

A place in a stream made narrow for the purpose of fishing. Spelman.

EXCLUSIVE (Lat. ex, out, claudere, to shut). Shutting out; debarring from participation. Shut out; not included.

An exclusive right or privilege, as a copyright or patent, is one which may be exercised and enjoyed only by the person authorized, while all others are forbidden to interfere.

A special grant of power is not exclusive merely because no one else happens to possess it, so long as there is nothing to prevent its granting to another. "An act does not grant an exclusive privilege or franchise unless it shuts out or excludes others from enjoying a similar privilege or franchise." 98 N. Y. 139.

EXCOMMENGEMENT (Lat.) Excommunication. Britt. c. 49.

EXCOMMUNICATION. In ecclesiastical law. An ecclesiastical sentence pronounced by a spiritual judge against a Christian man, by which he is excluded from the body of the church, and disabled to bring any action or sue any person in the common-law courts. Bac. Abr.; Co. Litt. 133, 134.

In early times it was the most frequent and most severe method of executing ecclesiastical censure, although proper to be used, said Justinian (Nov. 123), only upon grave occasions. The effect of it was to remove the excommunicated person not only from the sacred rites, but from the society of men. In a certain sense it interdicted the use of fire and water, like the punishment spoken of by Caesar (lib. 6, de Belli Gall.) as inflicted by the Druids. Innocent IV. called it the nerve of ecclesiastical discipline. On repentance, the excommunicated person was absolved and received again to communion. These are said to be the powers of binding and loosing,—the keys of the kingdom of heaven. This kind of punishment seems to have been adopted from the Roman usage of interdicting the use of fire and water. Fr. Duaren de Sacris Eccles. Ministeriis, lib. 1, c. 3. See Ridley, Civ. & Ecc. Law, 245, 246, 249.

EXCOMMUNICATO CAPIENDO (Lat. for taking an excommunicated person). In ecclesiastical law. A writ issuing out of chancery, founded on a bishop's certificate that the defendant had been excommunicated, returnable to the king's bench. 4 Bl. Comm. 415; Bac. Abr. "Excommunication" (E). See St. 3 Edw. I. c. 15; 9 Edw. II. c. 12; 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 13; 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4; 5 Eliz. c. 23; 1 Hen. V. c. 5; Cro. Eliz. 224, 680; Cro. Car. 421; Cro. Jac. 567; 1 Vent. 146; 1 Salk. 293-295.

EXCOMMUNICATO INTERDICTUR OMnis actus legitimus, ita quod agere non potest, nec aliquem convenire, licet ipse ab aliis possit conveniri. Every legal act is forbidden an excommunicated person, so that he cannot act, nor sue any person, but he may be sued by others. Co. Litt. 133.

EXCULPATION, LETTERS OF. In Scotch law. A warrant granted at the suit of a prisoner for citing witnesses in his own defense.

EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE. Homicide committed under circumstances which constitute, not a justification, but merely an excuse.

It is of two sorts:

(1) Per infortunium, or by misadventure, where a person unfortunately kills another in doing a lawful act, without any intent to hurt, and without criminal negligence.

(2) Se defendo, or in self-defense, upon a sudden affray, where a person, after becoming engaged in a sudden affray, kills his antagonist to save himself from reasonably apparent danger of death or great bodily harm. 4 Bl. Comm. 182.

The latter sort was distinguished from justifiable homicide in self-defense by the fact that the perpetrator was deemed in some fault in being engaged in an affray. This distinction is now generally abolished.

Excusable homicide was anciently punished by forfeiture of goods (4 Bl. Comm. 182), but is not now punished. See "Justifiable Homicide."

EXCUSAT AUT EXTENUAT DELICTUM in capitalibus, quod non operatur idem in civilibus. That excuses or extenuates a wrong in capital causes which does not have effect in civil suits. Bac. Max. reg. 7; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 291.

EXCUSATIO (Lat.) In civil law. Excuse; a cause for exemption from a duty, such as absence, insufficient age, etc. Vicat, and references there given.

EXCUSATOR (Lat.)

——In English Law. An excuser.

——In Old German Law. A defendant; he who utterly denies the plaintiff's claim. Du Cange.

EXCUSATOR QUIS QUOD CLAMEUM non opposuerit, ut si toto tempore litigii fuit ultra mare quacunque occasione. He is excused who does not bring his claim, if, during the whole period in which it ought to have been brought, he has been beyond sea for any reason. Co. Litt. 260.

EXCUSE. In a broad sense, a reason alleged for the doing or not doing a thing.

In a stricter sense, it does not include justification, but implies that, though the act complained of was improperly done, facts by way of mitigation relieve the doer from legal liability. In this sense, an excuse is facts mitigating the act, or depriving it of legal culpability. Compare, for example, "Excusable Homicide" and "Justifiable Homicide."

EXCUSS. To seize and detain by law.

EXCUSSIO (Lat.) In civil law. Exhausting the principal debtor before proceeding against the surety. Discussion is used in the same sense in Scotch law. Vicat, "Excusionis Beneficium."

EXECUTE. To complete; to make; to perform; to do; to follow out.

The term is frequently used in law; as, to execute a deed, which means to make a deed, including, especially, signing, sealing, and delivery. To execute a contract is to perform the contract. To execute a use is to merge or unite the equitable estate of the cestui que use in the legal estate, under the statute of uses. To execute a writ is to do the act commanded in the writ. To execute a criminal is to put him to death according to law, in pursuance of his sentence.

EXECUTED. Done; completed; effectuated; performed; fully disclosed; vested; giving present right of enjoyment. The term is used of a variety of subjects.

EXECUTED CONSIDERATION. See "Consideration."

EXECUTED CONTRACT. See "Contract."

EXECUTED ESTATE. An estate whereby a present interest passes to and resides in the tenant, not dependent upon any subsequent circumstances or contingency. They are more commonly called "estates in possession." 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 162.

An estate where there is vested in the grantee a present and immediate right of present or future enjoyment. An estate which confers a present right of present enjoyment.

When the right of enjoyment in possession is to arise at a future period, only the estate is executed; that is, it is merely vested in point of interest. Where the right of immediate enjoyment is annexed to the estate, then, only, is the estate vested in possession. 1 Prest. Est. 62; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 392.

"Executed" is synonymous with "vested." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 11.

EXECUTED FINE. The fine sur cognizance de droit, come ceo que il ad de son done; or a fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee, as that which he has of the gift of the cognizor. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

EXECUTED REMAINDER. One giving a present interest, though the enjoyment may be future. Fearne, Cont. Rem. 31; 2 Bl. Comm. 168. See "Remainder."

EXECUTED TRUST. A trust of which the scheme has in the outset been completely declared. Adams, Eq. 151. One in which the devise or trust is directly and wholly declared by the testator or settler, so as to attach on the lands immediately under the deed or will itself. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 385; 1 Jac. & W. 570.

EXECUTED USE. A use with which the possession and legal title have been united by statute. 1 Steph. Comm. 339; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 335, note; 7 Term R. 342; 12 Ves. 89; 4 Mod. 380; Comb. 312.

EXECUTED WRIT. A writ the command in which has been obeyed by the person to whom it was directed.

EXECUTIO (Lat.) The doing or following up of a thing; the doing a thing completely or thoroughly; management or administration.

——In Old Practice. Execution; the final process in an action.

EXECUTIO BONORUM (Lat.) In old English law. Management or administration of goods. Ad ecclesiam et ad amicos pertinebit executio bonorum, the execution of the goods shall belong to the church and to the friends of the deceased. Bracton, fol. 60b.

EXECUTIO EST EXECUTIO JURIS SECUNDUM JUDICIUM. An execution is the execution of the law according to the judgment. 3 Inst. 212.

EXECUTIO EST FINIS ET FRUCTUS LEGIS. An execution is the end and the fruit of the law. Co. Litt. 289.

EXECUTIO JURIS NON HABET INJURIAM. The execution of law does no injury. 2 Rolle, Abr. 301.

EXECUTION. The accomplishment of a thing; the completion of an act or instrument; the fulfillment of an undertaking. Thus, a contract is executed when the act to be done is performed; a deed is executed when it is signed, sealed, and delivered.

——In Criminal Law. Putting a convict to death, agreeably to law, in pursuance of his sentence. This is to be performed by the sheriff or his deputy. See 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 403.

——In Practice. Putting the sentence of the law in force. 3 Bl. Comm. 412. The act of carrying into effect the final judgment or decree of a court.

The writ which directs and authorizes the officer to carry into effect such judgment.

Final execution is one which authorizes the money due on a judgment to be made out of the property of the defendant.

Execution quousque is such as tends to an end, but is not absolutely final; as, for example, a capias ad satisfaciendum, by virtue of which the body of the defendant is taken, to the intent that the plaintiff shall be satisfied his debt, etc., the imprisonment not being absolute, but until he shall satisfy the same. 6 Coke, 87. See "Facias."

EXECUTION PAREE. In French law. A right founded on an act passed before a notary, by which the creditor may immediately, without citation or summons, seize and cause to be sold the property of his debtor, out of the proceeds of which to receive his payment. It imports a confession of judgment, and is not unlike a warrant of attorney. Code Proc. La. art. 732; 6 Toullier, note 208; 7 Toullier, Dr. Civ. 99.

EXECUTIONER. The name given to him who puts criminals to death, according to their sentence; a hangman.

In the United States, executions are so rare that there are no executioners by profession. It is the duty of the sheriff or marshal to perform this office, or to procure a deputy to do it for him.

EXECUTIVE. That power in the government which causes the laws to be executed and obeyed.

The officer in whom the executive power is vested.

The constitution of the United States directs that "the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America." Article 2, § 1. See Story, Const. bk. 3, c. 36.

EXECUTOR. One to whom another man commits by his last will the execution of that will and testament. 2 Bl. Comm. 503.

A person to whom a testator by his will commits the execution, or putting in force, of that instrument and its codicils. Fonbl. Rights & Wrongs, 307.

Lord Hardwicke, in 3 Atk. 301, says: "The proper term in the civil law, as to goods, is haeres testamentarius; and 'executor' is a barbarous term, unknown to that law." And again: "What we call 'executor and residuary legatee' is, in the civil law, 'universal heir.'" Id. 300.

The word "executor," taken in its broadest sense, has three acceptations: (1) Executor a lege constitutus, he is the ordinary of the diocese. (2) Executor ab episcopo constitutus, or executor dativus, and that is he who is called an administrator to an intestate. (3) Executor a testator constitutus, or executor testamentarius, and that is he who is usually meant when the term "executor" is used. 1 Wms. Ex'rs, 185.

——General Executor. One who is appointed to administer the whole estate, without any limit of time or place or of the subject matter.

——Special Executor. One who is appointed or constituted to administer either a part of the estate, or the whole for a limited time, or only in a particular place.

——Instituted Executor. One who is appointed by the testator without any condition, and who has the first right of acting when there are substituted executors.

——Substituted Executor. A person appointed executor if another person who has been appointed refuses to act.

An example will show the difference between an instituted and a substituted executor. Suppose a man makes his son his executor, but, if he will not act, he appoints his brother, and, if neither will act, his cousin. Here the son is the instituted executor in the first degree, the brother is said to be substituted in the second degree, the cousin in the third degree, and so on. See Swinb. Wills, pt. 4, § 19, pl. 1.

——Rightful Executor. One lawfully appointed by the testator, by his will. Deriving his authority from the will, he may do most acts before he obtains letters testamentary; but he must be possessed of them before he can declare in an action brought by him as such. 1 P. Wms. 768; Wms. Ex'rs, 173.

——Executor de Son Tort. One who, without lawful authority, undertakes to act as executor of a person deceased.

——Executor to the Tenor. A person who is not directly appointed by the will an executor, but who is charged with the duties which appertain to one; as, "I appoint A. B. to discharge all lawful demands against my will." 3 Phillim. Ecc. Law, 116; 1 Ecc. 374; Swinb. Wills, 247; Wentw. Ex'rs, pt. 4, § 4, p. 230.

EXECUTOR LUCRATUS (Lat.) An executor who has assets of his testator, who in his lifetime made himself liable by a wrongful interference with the property of another. 6 Jur. (N. S.) 543.

EXECUTORY. Executive; pertaining to the execution of official duty. Cent. Dict.

To be executed in the future; of such a nature as to take effect on a future contingency.

EXECUTORY CONSIDERATION. See "Consideration."

EXECUTORY CONTRACT. See "Contract."

EXECUTORY DEVISE. A limitation by will of a future estate in lands or chattels. 38 Pa. St. 294.

A devise of an estate to take effect upon some contingency subsequent to the testator's death.

As to chattels, it is more properly called an "executory bequest."

It differs from a remainder, in that it needs no particular estate to support it. See 6 Wall. (U. S.) 475.

EXECUTORY ESTATES. Interests which depend for their enjoyment upon some subsequent event or contingency. Such estate may be an executory devise, or an executory remainder, which is the same as a contingent remainder, because no present interest passes.

EXECUTORY FINES. These are the fines sur cognizance de droit tantum; sur concessit; and sur done, grant et render. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

EXECUTORY INTERESTS. Include all future estates and interests in land or personalty, other than reversions and remainders. Rapalje & L.

EXECUTORY LIMITATION. Any limitation of a future estate, whether it be made by deed, or by way of executory devise (q. v.)

EXECUTORY PROCESS (Lat. via executoria). In Louisiana. A process which can be resorted to in two cases, namely: (1) When the right of the creditor arises from an act importing confession of judgment, and which contains a privilege or mortgage in his favor. (2) When the creditor demands the execution of a judgment which has been rendered by a tribunal different from that within whose jurisdiction the execution is sought. Code Prac. art. 732.

EXECUTORY TRUSTS. A trust is called "executory" when some further act is requisite to be done by the author of the trust or his trustees to give it its full effect. See "Trust."

EXECUTORY USES. Springing uses which confer a legal title answering to an executory devise. See "Use."

EXECUTRESS. A female executor. Hardr. 165, 473. See "Executrix."

EXECUTRIX. A woman who has been appointed by will to execute such will or testament. See "Executor."

EXECUTRY. In Scotch law. The movable estate of a person dying, which goes to his nearest of kin. So called, as falling under the distribution of an executor. Bell, Dict.

EXEGENCE, or EXIGENCY. Probably a corruption of exigents. Demand; need; want. Thus, exigency of a writ, the command of the writ; exigency of a bond, that which the bond requires.

EXEMPLARY DAMAGES. See "Damages."

EXEMPLI GRATIA. For example. Abbreviated "ex. gr.," or "e. g."

EXEMPLIFICATION. A perfect copy of a record or office book lawfully kept, so far as relates to the matter in question. 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3107. See, generally, 1 Starkie, Ev. 151; 1 Phil. Ev. 307; 7 Cranch (U. S.) 481; 9 Cranch (U. S.) 122; 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 234; 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 469; 2 Yeates (Pa.) 532; 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 359; 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 238.

A certified copy of a record or recorded instrument.

EXEMPLUM (Lat.) In civil law. A copy; a written authorized copy. Used also in the modern sense of "example:" Ad exemplum constituti singulares non trahi, exceptional things must not be taken for examples. Calv. Lex.; Vicat; Co. Litt. 24a.

EXEMPTION. Immunity; freedom from any charge, duty, burden, or liability. Generally used for exemption from process, which is a right given by law to a debtor to retain certain property free from execution, attachment, or other process.

The property exempt from execution.

EXEMPTS. Persons who are not bound by law, but excused from the performance of duties imposed upon others.

EXENNIUM, or EXHENIUM. A gift; a New Year's gift. Cowell.

EXEQUATUR (Lat.)

——In French Law. A Latin word which was, in the ancient practice, placed at the bottom of a judgment emanating from another tribunal, and was a permission and authority to the officer to execute it within the jurisdiction of the judge who put it below the judgment.

We have something of the same kind in our practice. When a warrant for the arrest of a criminal is issued by a justice of the peace of one county, and he flies into another, a justice of the latter county may indorse the warrant, and then the ministerial officer may execute it in such county. This is called "backing" a warrant.

——In International Law. A declaration made by the executive of a government near to which a consul has been nominated and appointed, after such nomination and appointment has been notified, addressed to the people, in which is recited the appointment of the foreign state, and that the executive, having approved of the consul as such, commands all the citizens to receive, countenance, and, as there may be occasion, favorably assist the consul in the exercise of his place, giving and allowing him all the privileges, immunities, and advantages thereto belonging. 3 Chit. Com. Law, 56; 3 Maule & S. 290; 5 Pardessus, note 1445.

EXERCITALIS (Lat.) A soldier; a vassal. Spelman.

EXERCITOR MARIS (Lat.) In civil law. One who fits out and equips a vessel, whether he be the absolute or qualified owner, or even a mere agent. Emerig. Mar. Loans, c. 1, § 1. We call him exercitor to whom all the returns come. Dig. 14. 1. 1. 15; Id. 14. 1. 7; 3 Kent, Comm. 161; Molloy de Jur. Mar. 243.

The managing owner, or ship's husband. These are the terms in use in English and American laws, to denote the same as exercitor maris. See "Managing Owner of Ship;" "Ship's Husband."

EXERCITOR NAVIS. The temporary owner or charterer of a ship.

EXERCITORIA ACTIO. See "Actio."

EXERCITORIAL POWER. The trust given to a ship master.

EXERCITUAL. A heriot paid only in arms, horses, or military accoutrements.

EXERCITUS.

——In Old European Law. An army; an armed force; a collection of thirty-five men and upwards. Laws Inae, apud Spelman.

A gathering of forty-two armed men. Laws Boior. tit. 3, c. 8.

A meeting of four men. Laws Longobard, lib. 1, tit. 17, c. 1. Spelman.

——In Roman Law. See Grotius de Jure Belli, lib. 2, c. 16, § 3.

EXFESTUCARE (Lat.) To abdicate; to resign by passing over a staff. Du Cange. To deprive oneself of the possession of lands, honors, or dignities, which was formerly accomplished by the delivery of a staff or rod. Said to be the origin of the custom of "surrender" as practised in England formerly in courts baron. Spelman. See, also, Vicat; Calv. Lex.

EXFREDIARE. In old English. To break the peace; to commit open violence. Cowell.

EXHAEREDATIO (Lat.) A disinheriting; the act by which a forced heir is deprived of his legitimate or legal portion; a disherison. Occurring in the phrase, in Latin pleadings, ad exhaeredationem, to the disherison, in case of abatement.

EXHAERES (Lat.) In civil law. One disinherited. Vicat; Du Cange.

EXHEREDATE. In Scotch law. To disinherit; to exclude from inheriting. 1 Kames, Eq. 247.

EXHIBERE (Lat.) To present a thing corporeally, so that it may be handled. Vicat. To appear personally to conduct the defense of an action at law.

EXHIBIT. As a verb, to produce a thing publicly, so that it may be taken possession of and seized. Dig. 10. 4. 2.

To file of record. Thus, it is the practice in England in personal actions, when an officer or prisoner of the king's bench is defendant, to proceed against such defendant in the court in which he is an officer, by exhibiting, that is, filing, a bill against him. Steph. Pl. 52, note (l); 2 Sellon, Prac. 74.

To administer; to cause a thing to be taken by a patient. Chit. Med. Jur. 9.

As a noun, a supplemental paper referred to in the principal instrument, identified in some particular manner, as by a capital letter, and generally attached to the principal instrument. 1 Strange, 674; 2 P. Wms. 410; Gresl. Eq. Ev. 98.

A paper referred to in and filed with the bill, answer, or petition in a suit in equity.

EXHIBITANT. A complainant in articles of the peace. 12 Adol. & E. 599.

EXHIBITIO BILLAE (Law Lat.) In old practice. A phrase formerly used in pleading, and generally equivalent to "the commencement of the suit;" the suit (where the proceedings were by bill) being anciently commenced by the exhibition of such a bill to the court.

EXHIBITION. In Scotch law. An action for compelling the production of writings. See "Discovery."

EXIGENCY OF A BOND. That upon which it is conditioned.

EXIGENDARY. In English law. An officer who makes out exigents.

EXIGENT, EXIGI FACIAS. In practice. A writ issued in the course of proceedings to outlawry, deriving its name and application from the mandatory words found therein, signifying, "that you cause to be exacted or required;" and it is that proceeding in an outlawry which, with the writ of proclamation, issued at the same time, immediately precedes the writ of capias utlagatum. 2 Va. Cas. 244.

EXIGENTER. An officer who made out exigents and proclamations. Cowell. The office is now abolished. Holthouse.

EXIGI FACIAS (Law Lat.) Another name of the writ of exigent; being the two emphatic words of that writ. Reg. Jud. 2.

EXIGIBLE. Demandable; that which may be exacted.

EXILE. Banishment; a person banished.

EXILIUM (Lat.) In old English law. Exile; setting free or wrongly ejecting bondtenants. Waste is called exilium when bondmen (servi) are set free or driven wrongfully from their tenements. Co. Litt. 536. Destruction; waste. Du Cange. Any species of waste which drove away the inhabitants into exile, or had a tendency to do so. Bac. Abr. "Waste" (A); 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng Law, 386.

EXILIUM EST PATRIAE PRIVATIO, NATALIS SOLI MUTATIO, LEGUM NATIVARUM AMISSIO. Exile is a privation of country, a change of natal soil, a loss of native laws. 7 Coke, 20.

EXISTIMATIO (Lat.) The reputation of a Roman citizen; the decision of arbiters. Vicat; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 123.

EXIT (Lat.) It issues. Used in old records to indicate the granting of an application for a writ.

EXIT WOUND. The wound made in coming out by a weapon which has passed through the body, or any part of it. 2 Beck, Med. Jur. 119.

EXITUS (Lat.) An export duty; issue, child or offspring; rent or profits of land.

——In Pleading. The issue or the end, termination or conclusion, of the pleadings. So called because an issue brings the pleadings to a close. 3 Bl. Comm. 314.

EXLEGALITAS. In old English law. Outlawry. Laws Edw. Conf. c. 38; Spelman.

EXLEGARE. To outlaw.

EXLEGATUS, or EXLEX. An outlaw.

EXOINE. In French law. An act or instrument in writing which contains the reasons why a party in a civil suit, or a person accused, who has been summoned, agreeably to the requisitions of a decree, does not appear. Poth. Proc. Cr. § 3, art. 3.

EXONERATION.

(1) The taking off a burden or duty; the shifting of a burden from one person or one piece of property to another. Thus, it is a general rule in the distribution of an intestate's estate that the debts which he himself contracted, and for which he mortgaged his land as security, shall be paid out of the personal estate, in exoneration of the real.

(2) The right of one secondarily liable, who has paid the debt, to recourse in equity against the principal for reimbursement. Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 467, § 1416.

EXONERATUR (Lat.) In practice. A short note entered on a bail piece, that the bail is exonerated or discharged in consequence of having fulfilled the condition of his obligation, made by order of the court or of a judge upon a proper cause being shown. See "Recognizance."

EXPATRIATION. The voluntary act of abandoning one's country, and becoming the citizen or subject of another.

At common law, it is probable that a citizen of the United States had no right to expatriate himself. 2 Dall. (U. S.) 1; 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283. But see 2 Paine (U. S.) 652. But Act Cong. July 27, 1868, declares that expatriation is a natural and inherent right. The effectiveness of this statute has been doubted. 56 Fed. 556.

Expatriation can only be accomplished by a removal from the country, and the acquirement of a domicile elsewhere. 56 Fed. 556; 8 Cranch (U. S.) 253; 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283.

EXPECTANCY. Contingency as to possession. See "Estates."

EXPECTANT. Contingent as to enjoyment. See "Estates."

EXPECTANT HEIR. An expectant heir, in the language of equity, is a person who, having a reversionary right or hope of succession to property, but little or no property immediately available, is exposed to the temptation of selling or mortgaging his right or expectation on unreasonable terms (e. g., for much below its value, or at a usurious rate of interest), and is therefore considered as entitled to the protection of the court against the enforcement of such "catching bargains," as they are called.

EXPECTATION OF LIFE. In the doctrine of life annuities, it is the share or number of years of life which a person of a given age may, upon an equality of chance, expect to enjoy. Wharton.

EXPEDIMENT. The whole of a person's goods and chattels, bag and baggage.

EXPEDIT REPUBLICAE NE SUA RE quis male utatur. It is for the interest of the state that a man should not use his own property improperly. Inst. 1. 8. 2; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 328.

EXPEDIT REIPUBLICAE UT SIT FINIS litium. It is for the advantage of the state that there be an end of suits; it is for the public good that actions be brought to a close. Co. Litt. 303b.

EXPEDITATE. In forest law. To cut out the ball of a dog's fore feet, for the preservation of the royal game. Manw. For. Law, c. 16.

To cut the foot or root of a tree, so as to cause it to fall. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 41, § 32.

EXPEDITATION. A cutting off the claws or ball of the fore feet of mastiffs, to prevent their running after deer. Cart. de For. c. 17; Spelman; Cowell; 2 Bl. Comm. 393, 417.

EXPEDITIO. An expedition; an irregular kind of army. Spelman.

EXPEDITIO BREVIS (Lat.) In old practice. The service of a writ. Towns. Pl. 43.

EXPENDITORS. Paymasters; those who expend or disburse certain taxes; especially the sworn officer who supervised the repairs of the banks of the canals in Romney Marsh. Cowell.

EXPENSAE LITIS (Lat.) Expenses of the suit; the costs, which are generally allowed to the successful party.

EXPERIENTIA PER VARIOS ACTUS legem facit. Magistra rerum experientia. Experience by various acts makes laws. Experience is the mistress of things. Co. Litt. 60; Branch. Princ.

EXPERTS (from Lat. experti, skilled by experience). Persons selected by the court or parties in a cause, on account of their knowledge or skill, to examine, estimate, and ascertain things, and make a report of their opinions. Merlin, Repert. Witnesses who are admitted to testify from a peculiar knowledge of some art or science, a knowledge of which is requisite or of value in settling the point at issue.

One who has made a subject a matter of study, practice, and observation, and has particular special knowledge on the subject. 41 N. H. 546.

Persons professionally acquainted with the science or practice in question. Strickl. Ev. 408. Persons conversant with the subject matter on questions of science, skill, trade, and others of like kind. Best, Ev. § 346.

A person skilled either by study (15 S. C. 408) or experience (12 Hun [N. Y.] 276) in respect to some matter on which a course of special study or experience is necessary to the formation of an opinion (Rog. Exp. Test. § 7), and who is accordingly admitted to testify to his opinion in relation thereto.

EXPILARE (Lat.) In the civil law. To spoil; to rob or plunder. Applied to inheritances. Dig. 47. 19; Code, 9. 32.

EXPILATION. In civil law. The crime of abstracting the goods of a succession.

This is said not to be a theft, because the property no longer belongs to the deceased, nor to the heir before he has taken possession. In the common law, the grant of letters testamentary, or letters of administration, relates back to the time of the death of the testator or intestate, so that the property of the estate is vested in the executor or administrator from that period.

EXPILATOR (Lat.) In the civil law. A robber; a spoiler or plunderer. Expilatores sunt atrociores fures. Dig. 47. 18. 1. 1.

EXPIRATION. Cessation; end; as, the expiration of a lease, of a contract or statute. It ordinarily implies termination by the running of an express limitation as to time, but has been used to signify termination in any manner. Plowd. 198a.

EXPIRY OF THE LEGAL. In Scotch law. The expiration of the term within which the subject of an adjudication may be redeemed on payment of the debt adjudged for. Bell, Dict.; 3 Jur. Styles (3d Ed.) 1107.

EXPLEES. The profits of an estate. See "Esplees."

EXPLETIA, or EXPLECIA (Lat. from explere, to complete or make perfect). Esplees or profit of land. Bracton, fols. 40, 44b.

EXPLICATIO (Lat.) In civil law. The fourth pleading. Equivalent to the surrejoinder of the common law. Calv. Lex.

EXPORTATION. The act of sending goods out of the country. It ordinarily implies a sending for commercial purposes. 5 Harr. (Del.) 501.

EXPOSE. A French word, sometimes applied to a written document containing the reasons or motives for doing a thing. The word occurs in diplomacy.

To place in an unprotected situation.

To exhibit. "Exposure for sale" implies an exhibition in a public place, not a private sale. 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 429.

EXPOSITIO (Lat.) Explanation; exposition; interpretation.

EXPOSITIO, QUAE EX VISCERIBUS causae nascitur, est aptissima et fortissima in lege. That exposition which springs from the vitals of a cause is the fittest and most powerful in law. 10 Coke, 24.

EXPOSITION DE PART. In French law. The abandonment of a child, unable to take care of itself, either in a public or private place.

If the child thus exposed should be killed in consequence of such exposure, as, if it should be devoured by animals, the person so exposing it would be guilty of murder. Rosc. Cr. Ev. 591.

EXPOSURE OF PERSON. See "Indecency."

EXPRESS. Stated or declared, as opposed to implied. That which is made known, and not left to implication.

EXPRESS ABROGATION. A direct repeal in terms by a subsequent law referring to that which is abrogated.

EXPRESS ASSUMPSIT. A direct undertaking. See "Assumpsit."

EXPRESS COLOR. See "Color."

EXPRESS CONSIDERATION. See "Consideration."

EXPRESS CONTRACT. See "Contract."

EXPRESS MALICE. Actual malice or malice in fact, existing when one actually contemplates the injury or wrong which he inflicts. 1 Clark & Marshall, Crimes, p. 144. See "Malice."

EXPRESS TRUST. See "Trust."

EXPRESS WARRANTY. See "Warranty."

EXPRESSA NOCENT; NON EXPRESSA non nocent. Things expressed may be prejudicial; things not expressed are not. Calv. Lex.; Dig. 50. 17. 19. 5.

EXPRESSA NON PROSUNT QUAE NON expressa proderunt. Things expressed may be prejudicial, which, not expressed, will profit. 4 Coke, 73.

EXPRESSIO EORUM QUAE TACITE INsunt nihil operatur. The expression of those things which are tacitly implied operates nothing. 2 Pars. Cont. 28; 4 Coke, 73; 5 Coke, 11; Hob. 170; 3 Atk. 138; 11 Mees. & W. 569; 7 Exch. 28.

EXPRESSIO UNIUS EST EXCLUSIO ALterius. The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. Co. Litt. 210; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 596; 2 Pars. Cont. 28; 3 Bing. N. C. 85; 8 Scott, N. R. 1013, 1917; 5 Term R. 21; 6 Term R. 320; 12 Mees. & W. 761; 15 Mees. & W. 110; 16 Mees. & W. 244; 2 Curt. (U. S.) 365; 6 Mass. 84; 11 Cush. (Mass.) 328.

EXPRESSUM FACIT CESSARE TACItum. That which is expressed puts an end to (renders ineffective) that which is implied. Smith, Cont. (2d Ed.) 390; 5 Bing. N. C. 185; 6 Barn. & C. 609; 2 Cromp. & M. 459; 2 El. & Bl. 856; 7 Mass. 106; 24 Me. 374; 6 N. H. 481; 1 Doug. (Mich.) 330; 4 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 185.

EXPRESSUM SERVITIUM REGAT VEL declaret tacitum. Let service expressed rule, or declare what is silent.

EXPROMISSIO (Lat.) In civil law. The species of novation by which a creditor accepts a new debtor, who becomes bound instead of the old, the latter being released. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 802. See "Novation."

EXPROMISSOR. In civil law. The person who alone becomes bound for the debt of another, whether the latter were obligated or not. He differs from a surety, who is bound together with his principal. Dig. 12. 4. 4; Id. 16. 1. 13; Id. 24. 3. 64. 4; Id. 38. 1. 37. 8.

EXPROMITTERE (Lat.) In civil law. To undertake for another, with the view of becoming liable in his place. Calv. Lex.

EXPROPRIATION. Compulsorily depriving a person of a right of property belonging to him in return for a compensation. The term has been introduced from its use in foreign countries to denote a compulsory purchase of land, etc., for the purposes of a railway, canal, or the like. "Expropriation pour cause d'utilite publique." Id.; 1 App. Cas. 384.

EXPULSION (Lat. expellere, to drive out). The act of depriving a member of a body politic or corporate, or of a society, of his right of membership therein, by the vote of such body or society, for some violation of his duties as such, or for some offense which renders him unworthy of longer remaining a member of the same.

It is sometimes loosely used in the sense of "eject."

The term is ordinarily applied only to voluntary associations and public bodies, "disfranchisement" (q. v.) being the appropriate term for expulsion of a member of a corporation.

EXPURGATION. The act of purging or cleansing.

EXPURGATOR. One who corrects by expurging.

EXQUAESTOR. In Roman law. One who had filled the office of quaestor. A title given to Tribonian. Inst. proem. § 3. Used only in the ablative case (exquaestore).

EXROGARE (Lat. ex, from, and rogare, to pass a law). In Roman law. To take something from an old law by a new law. Tayl. Civ. Law, 155. The same as derogare. See "Abrogation."

EXTENDI FACIAS (Lat. you cause to be extended). In English practice. The name of a writ of execution, derived from its two emphatic words; more commonly called an "extent." 2 Tidd, Prac. 1043; 4 Steph. Comm. 43.

EXTENSION. An enlargement, ordinarily, to time to do any act. This term is applied among merchants to signify an agreement made between a debtor and his creditors, by which the latter, in order to enable the former, embarrassed in his circumstances, to retrieve his standing, agree to wait for a definite length of time, after their several claims become due and payable, before they will demand payment.

Among the French, a similar agreement is known by the name of attermoiement. Merlin Repert. mot "Attermoiement."

EXTENSORES (Law Lat.) In old English law. Extenders or appraisers; the name of certain officers appointed to appraise and divide or apportion lands. It was their duty to make a survey, schedule, or inventory of the lands, to lay them out under certain heads, and then to ascertain the value of each, as preparatory to the division or partition. Bracton, fols. 72b, 75; Britt. c. 71; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 9, § 5; Barr. Obs. St. 103, note.

EXTENT. A writ, issuing from the exchequer, by which the body, goods, and lands of the debtor may all be taken at once to satisfy the judgment.

It is so called because the sheriff is to cause the lands to be appraised at their full extended value before he delivers them to the plaintiff. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 131. The writ originally lay to enforce judgments in case of recognizances or debts acknowledged on statutes merchant or staple (see St. 13 Edw. I. "de Mercatoribus;" 27 Edw. III. c. 9), and, by 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, was extended to debts due the crown. The term is sometimes used in the various states of the United States to denote writs which give the creditor possession of the debtor's lands for a limited time till the debt be paid. 16 Mass. 186.

——Extent in Aid. An extent issued at the suit or instance of a crown debtor against a person indebted to himself. This writ was much abused, owing to some peculiar privileges possessed by crown debtors, and its use was regulated by St. 57 Geo. III. c. 117. See 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 419.

——Extent in Chief. An extent issued to take a debtor's lands into the possession of the crown. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 86, § 8.

EXTENTA MANERII (Law Lat.) The title of a statute passed 4 Edw. I. st. 1; being a sort of direction for making a survey or terrier of a manor, and all its appendages. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 140. Mr. Barrington observes that it is most certainly no act of parliament, in any sense of the word, but is merely a set of instructions to the king's extender, with regard to what he shall inquire into, and upon what heads and particulars he is to make his report. Barr. Obs. St. 103.

EXTENUATING CIRCUMSTANCES. Facts palliating or mitigating a crime. Sometimes applied to torts for which exemplary damages may be recovered.

EXTENUATION. That which renders a crime or tort less heinous than it would be without it. It is opposed to "aggravation."

EXTERRITORIALITY (Fr.) This term (exterritorialite) is used by French jurists to signify the immunity of certain persons, who, although in the state, are not amenable to its laws. Foreign sovereigns, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, and ministers from a foreign power are of this class. Foelix, Droit Int. Prive, liv. 2, tit. 2, c. 2, § 4. See "Ambassador;" "Conflict of Laws;" "Minister;" "Privilege."

EXTERUS (Lat.) A foreigner or alien; one born abroad. The opposite of civis. Bac. Works, IV. 345.

EXTERUS NON HABET TERRAS. An alien holds no lands. Tray. Lat. Max. 203.

EXTINCT (Lat. extinguere, to destroy or put out). Extinguished. A rent is said to be extinguished when it is destroyed and put out. Co. Litt. 147b. See "Extinguishment."

EXTINCTO SUBJECTO, TOLLITUR ADjunctum. When the substance is gone, the adjuncts disappear. 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 438, 492.

EXTINGUISHMENT. The destruction of a right or contract; the act by which a contract is made void; the annihilation of a collateral thing or subject in the subject itself out of which it is derived. Prest. Merg. 9. For the distinction between an extinguishment and passing a right, see 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 325, note.

An extinguishment may be by matter of fact and by matter of law. It is by matter of fact either express, as when one receives satisfaction and full payment of a debt, and the creditor releases the debtor (11 Johns. [N. Y.] 513), or implied, as when a person hath a yearly rent out of lands, and becomes owner, either by descent or purchase, of the estate subject to the payment of the rent, and the latter is extinguished (3 Stew. [Ala.] 60); but the person must have as high an estate in the land as in the rent, or the rent will not be extinct (Co. Litt. 147b).

There are numerous cases where the claim is extinguished by operation of law. For example, where two persons are jointly but not severally liable for a simple contract debt, a judgment obtained against one is at common law an extinguishment of the claim on the other debtor. 1 Pet. C. C. (U. S.) 301; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 213.

See, generally, Bouv. Inst. Index; Co. Litt. 147b; 1 Rolle, Abr. 933; 7 Viner, Abr. 367; 11 Viner, Abr. 461; 18 Viner, Abr. 493-515; 3 Nels. Abr. 818; Bac. Abr.; 5 Whart. (Pa.) 541; 2 Root (Conn.) 492; 3 Conn. 62; 6 Conn. 373; 1 Ohio, 187; 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 513; 1 Halst. (N. J.) 190; 4 N. H. 251; 31 Pa. St. 475.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF A DEBT. Destruction of a debt. This may be by the creditor's accepting a higher security. Plowd. 84; 1 Salk. 304; 1 Md. 492; 5 Md. 389; 24 Ala. (N. S.) 439. A judgment recovered extinguishes the original debt. 13 Mass. 148; 1 Pick. (Mass.) 118; Hill & D. (N. Y.) 392. A debt evidenced by a note may be extinguished by a surrender of the note. 10 Cush. (Mass.) 169; 29 Pa. St. 50; 3 Ind. 337. As to the effect of payment in extinguishing a debt, see "Payment." See, generally, 35 N. H. 421; 29 Vt. 488; 6 Fla. 25; 20 Ga. 403; 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 128.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF COMMON. Loss of the right to have common. This may happen from various causes,—by the owner of the common right becoming owner of the fee; by severance from the land; by release; by approvement. 2 Hilliard, Real Prop. 75; 2 Steph. Comm. 41; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. § 341 et seq.; Co. Litt. 280; Burton, Real Prop. 437; 1 Bac. Abr. 628; Cro. Eliz. 594.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF COPYHOLD. This takes place by a union of the copyhold and freehold estates in the same person; also by any act of the tenant showing an intention not to hold any longer of his lord. Hutt. 81; Cro. Eliz. 21; Williams, Real Prop. 287 et seq.; Watk. Copyholds, Index.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF RENT. A destruction of the rent by a union of the title to the lands and the rent in the same person. Termes de la Ley; Cowell; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 325, note.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF WAYS. Destruction of a right of way, effected usually by a purchase of the close over which it lies by the owner of the right of way. 2 Washb. Real Prop. Index.

EXTIRPATION. In English law. A species of destruction or waste, analogous to estrepement. See "Estrepement."

EXTIRPATIONE. A judicial writ, either before or after judgment, that lay against a person who, when a verdict was found against him for land, etc., maliciously overthrew any house, or extirpated any trees upon it. Reg. Jud. 13, 56.

EXTOCARE (Lat.) in old records. To grub woodland, and reduce it to arable or meadow; "to stock up," as it is rendered in Cowell. 5 Mon. Angl. 71.

EXTORSIVELY. A technical word used in indictments for extortion.

When a person is charged with extorsively taking, the very import of the word shows that he is not acquiring possession of his own. 4 Cox, C. C. 387. In North Carolina the crime may be charged without using this word. 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 406.

EXTORTIO EST CRIMEN QUANDO QUIS colore officii extorquet quod non est debitum, vel supra debitum, vel ante tempus quod est debitum. Extortion is a crime when, by color of office, any person extorts that which is not due, or more than is due, or before the time when it is due. 10 Coke, 102.

EXTORTION. The unlawful taking by any officer, by color of his office, of any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due, or before it is due. 4 Bl. Comm. 141; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 68, § 1; 1 Russ. Crimes, *144; 7 Pick. (Mass.) 279; 3 Ind. 93; 107 N. C. 921.

In a large sense, the term includes any injury under color of right; but it is generally and constantly used in the more limited technical sense above given; while "oppression" is used to signify injuries other than the extortion of things of value committed under color of office.

EXTRA (Lat. without; out of; beyond). Its opposite is in or intra. Calv. Lex.

EXTRA FEODUM (Lat.) Out of his fee; out of the seigniory, or not holden of him that claims it. Co. Litt. 1b; Reg. Orig. 97b.

EXTRA JUS (Lat.) Beyond the law; more than the law requires. In jure, vel extra jus. Bracton, fol. 169b.

EXTRA LEGEM. Out of the law; out of the protection of the law. Co. Litt. 130.

Outlaws (utlagati) are said to be extra legem positi, put out of the law. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 28, § 14.

EXTRA LEGEM POSITUS EST CIVILITER MORTUUS. One out of the pale of the law [an outlaw] is civilly dead. Co. Litt. 130.

EXTRA PRAESENTIAM MARITI (Lat.) Out of the presence of her husband.

EXTRA QUATUOR MARI (Lat. beyond four seas). Out of the realm. 1 Bl. Comm. 157.

EXTRA REGNUM (Lat.) Out of the realm. 7 Coke, 16a; 2 Kent, Comm. 42, note.

EXTRA TERRITORIUM. Outside territory (of a state or county). 2 Kent, Comm. 407.

EXTRA TERRITORIUM JUS DICENTI NON PARETUR IMPUNE. One who exercises jurisdiction out of his territory cannot be obeyed with impunity. 10 Coke, 77; Dig. 2. 1. 20; Story, Confl. Laws, § 539.

EXTRA VIAM. Out of the way. When, in an action of trespass, the defendant pleads a right of way, the defendant may reply extra viam, that the trespass was committed beyond the way, or make a new assignment. 16 East, 343, 349.

EXTRA VIRES. Beyond powers. See "Ultra Vires."

EXTRACT. A part of a writing. In general, an extract is not evidence, because the whole of the writing may explain the part extracted, so as to give it a different sense; but sometimes extracts from public books are evidence, as extracts from the registers of births, marriages, and burials, kept according to law, when the whole of the matter has been extracted which relates to the cause or matter in issue.

EXTRACTA CURIAE. The issues or profits of holding a court, arising from the customary dues, fees, and amercements. Cowell.

EXTRADITION (Lat. ex, from, traditio, handing over). The surrender by one sovereign state to another, on its demand, of persons charged with the commission of crime within its jurisdiction, that they may be dealt with according to its laws.

——International Extradition. The surrender of persons charged with crime by one foreign state to another, on its demand, pursuant to treaty stipulations between them.

——Interstate Extradition. The surrender of persons by one federal state to another, on its demand, pursuant to their federal constitution and laws. Persons subject to extradition, see "Fugitive from Justice."

EXTRADOTAL PROPERTY. In Louisiana this term is used to designate that property which forms no part of the dowry of a woman, and which is also called "paraphernal property." Civ. Code La. art. 2315.

EXTRAHURA. In old English law. An estray. Spelman.

EXTRAJUDICIAL. That which does not belong to the judge or his jurisdiction, notwithstanding which he takes cognizance of it. Extrajudicial judgments and acts are absolutely void. See "Coram non Judice;" Merlin, Repert. "Exces de Pouvoir."

EXTRAJUDICIUM. Extrajudicial; out of the proper cause. Judgments rendered or acts done by a court which has no jurisdiction of the subject, or where it has no jurisdiction, are said to be "extrajudicial."

EXTRANEUS.

——In Old English Law. One foreign born; a foreigner. 7 Rep. 16.

——In Roman Law. An heir not born in the family of the testator; those of a foreign state. The same as alienus. Vicat; Du Cange.

EXTRANEUS EST SUBDITUS QUI EXTRA TERRAM, I. E., POTESTATEM REGIS NATUS EST. A foreigner is a subject who is born out of the territory, i. e., government of the king. 7 Coke, 16.

EXTRAORDINARY CARE. The utmost possible diligence. It is that required of common carriers of passengers, and in a few other relations, and has been defined to be the doing of all that is possible to human sagacity and foresight under the circumstances. 85 Me. 34; 68 Mo. 340.

EXTRAORDINARY REMEDIES. The writs of mandamus, habeas corpus, quo warranto, and other special writs, not ancillary to an ordinary action, are sometimes so called.

EXTRAPAROCHIAL (Lat.) Out of a parish; not within the bounds or limits of any parish. 1 Bl. Comm. 113, 284.

EXTRATERRITORIALITY. That quality of laws which makes them operate beyond the territory of the power enacting them, upon certain persons or certain rights. See Wheaton, Int. Law (6th Ed.) 121 et seq.

EXTRAVAGANTES. In canon law. The name given to the constitutions of the popes posterior to the Clementines.

They are thus called, quasi vagantes extra corpus juris, to express that they were out of the canonical law, which at first contained only the decrees of Gratian. Afterwards the Decretals of Gregory IX., the Sexte of Boniface VIII., the Clementines, and at last the Extravagantes, were added to it. There are the Extravagantes of John XXII. and the common Extravagantes. The first contain twenty epistles, decretals, or constitutions of that pope, divided under fifteen titles, without any subdivision into books. The others are epistles, decretals, or constitutions of the popes who occupied the holy see either before or after John XXII. They are divided into books, like the decretals.

EXTREMIS (Lat.) When a person is sick beyond the hope of recovery, and near death, he is said to be in extremis.

A will made in this condition, if made without undue influence, by a person of sound mind, is valid. As to the effect of declarations of persons in extremis, see "Dying Declarations;" "Declaration."

EXTREMIS PROBATIS, PRAESUMUNtur media. Extremes being proved, intermediate things are presumed. Tray. Lat. Max. 207.

EXTUMAE (Law Lat.) In old records. Reliques. Cowell.

EXUERE PATRIAM (Lat.) To throw off or renounce one's country or native allegiance; to expatriate one's self. Phillim. Dom. 18.

EXULARE (Lat.) In old English law. To exile or banish. Nullus liber homo, exuletur, nisi, etc., no freeman shall be exiled, unless, etc. Magna Charta, c. 29; 2 Inst. 47.

EY. A watery place; water. Co. Litt. 6.

EYE-WITNESS. One who saw the act or fact to which he testifies. When an eye-witness testifies, and is a man of intelligence and integrity, much reliance must be placed on his testimony, for he has the means of making known the truth.

EYOTT. A small island arising in a river. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 2, s. b; Bracton, lib. 2, c. 2. See "Island."

EYRE. See "Eire."

EYRER. To go about. See "Eire."

F

F. The sixth letter of the alphabet. A fighter or maker of frays, if he had no ears, was to be branded in the cheek with this letter. Cowell. Those who had been guilty of falsity were to be so marked. 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 392.

F. O. B. Free on board. A mercantile term used in contracts of sale where the seller agrees to put the goods on board cars at a specified place, but freight is paid by the buyer.

FABRIC LANDS. In English law. Lands given for the repair, rebuilding, or maintenance of cathedrals or other churches.

It was the custom, says Cowell, for almost every one to give by will more or less to the fabric of the cathedral or parish church where he lived. These lands so given were called "fabric lands," because given ad fabricam ecclesiae reparandam, for repairing the fabric of the church. Called by the Saxons "timber lands." Cowell; Spelman.

FABRICA. In old English law. The making or coining of money. Mem. in Scacc. H. 12 Edw. I.

FABRICARE (Lat.) To make. Used of an unlawful making, as counterfeiting coin (1 Salk. 342), and also of a lawful coining.

FABULA. In old European law. A contract or formal agreement; but particularly used in the Lombardic and Visigothic laws to denote a marriage contract or a will. Spelman.

FAC SIMILE PROBATE. In England, where the construction of a will may be affected by the appearance of the original paper, the court will order the probate to pass in fac simile, as it may possibly help to show the meaning of the testator. 1 Williams, Ex'rs (7th Ed.) 331, 386, 566.

FACE. The face of an instrument is that which it shows without extrinsic explanation.

FACERE (Lat.) In civil law. To do; to make. A word of very comprehensive signification. Dig. 50. 16. 218. See Calv. Lex. "Brissonius." An important word formerly in the language of writs and contracts, and the general language of the law.

Facere defaltam, to make default. Bracton, fols. 238, 334b, 360b, 363.

Facere duellum, to make the duel; to engage in the combat, or make or do battle, as the phrase still is. Bracton, fol. 141b.

Facere finem, to make or pay a fine. Id. fol. 154.

Facere legem, to make one's law. Id. fols. 156b, 334b, 335b, 410.

Facere sacramentum, to make oath. Id. fols. 50b, 185b. See "Make."

FACIAS (Lat. facere, to make, to do). That you cause. Occurring in the phrases scire facias, that you cause to know, and fieri facias, that you cause to be made, etc. Used also in the phrases do ut facias, I give that you may do, and facio ut facias, I do that you may do, two of the four divisions of considerations made by Blackstone (2 Comm. 444).

FACIENDO (Law Lat. from facere; Law Fr. fesaunt). Doing, making, or paying; one of the apt words of reserving a rent, used in ancient deeds. Co. Litt. 47a. Applied usually to those services which consisted of acts done (factiones). Faciendo inde talia servitia, doing therefor such services. Bracton, fol. 35b; Fleta, lib. 3, c. 14, § 17.

FACIES (Lat.) The face, outward appearance or color of a thing; the inspection or view of a thing. Prima facies, the first face or appearance. Prima facie, on the first view or color,—at first blush, as the modern phrase is. Bracton, fols. 29, 280. See "Color."

FACILE. In Scotch law. Easily persuaded; easily imposed upon. Bell, Dict.

FACILITY. In Scotch law. Pliancy of disposition. Bell, Dict.

FACINUS QUOS INQUINAT AEQUAT. Guilt makes equal those whom it stains.

FACIO UT DES (Lat. I do that you may give). A species of contract which occurs when a man agrees to perform anything for a price either specifically mentioned, or left to the determination of the law to set a value on it; as when a servant hires himself to his master for certain wages, or an agreed sum of money. 2 Bl. Comm. 445.

FACIO UT FACIAS (Lat. I do that you may do). A species of contract in the civil law which occurs when I agree with a man to do his work for him if he will do mine for me; or if two persons agree to marry together, or to do any other positive acts on both sides; or it may be to forbear on one side in consideration of something done on the other. 2 Bl. Comm. 444.

FACT (Lat. factum). An action; a thing done; a circumstance.

"Fact" is much used in modern times in distinction from "law." Thus, in every case to be tried there are facts to be shown to exist to which the law is to be applied. If law is, as it is said to be, a rule of action, the fact is the action shown to have been done, and which should have been done in accordance with the rule. Fact, in this sense, means a thing done or existing.

Material facts are those which are essential to the right of action or defense.

Immaterial facts are those which are not essential to the right of action or defense.

Material facts must be shown to exist; immaterial facts need not. The existence of facts is generally determined by the jury; but there are many facts of which a court takes cognizance. See "Judge;" "Jury;" "Cognizance." As to pleading material facts, see Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 28. And see 3 Bouv. Inst. note 3150.

FACTA. In old English law. Deeds. Facta armorum, deeds or feats of arms; that is, jousts or tournaments. Cowell.

Facts. Facta et casus, facts and cases. Bracton, fol. 1b.

FACTA SUNT POTENTIORA VERBIS. Facts are more powerful than words.

FACTA TENENT MULTA QUAE FIERI prohibentur. Deeds contain many things which are prohibited to be done. 12 Coke, 124.

FACTIO TESTAMENTI (Lat.) In civil law. The power of making a will, including right and capacity. Also the power of receiving under a will. Vicat.

FACTO. In fact; by an act; by the act or fact. Ipso facto, by the act itself; by the mere effect of a fact, without anything superadded, or any proceeding upon it to give it effect. 3 Kent, Comm. 55, 58.

FACTOR. An agent employed to sell goods or merchandise consigned or delivered to him, by or for his principal, for a compensation, commonly called "factorage" or "commission." Paley, Ag. 13; 1 Livermore, Ag. 68; Story, Ag. § 33; Comyn, Dig. "Merchant" (B); Malynes, Lex. Merc. 81; Beawes, Lex. Merc. 44; 3 Chit. Com. Law, 193; 2 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 622, note (d); 1 Bell, Comm. 385, §§ 408, 409; 2 Barn. & Ald. 143.

A domestic factor is one who resides in the same country with his principal.

A foreign factor is one who resides in a different country from his principal. 1 Term R. 112; 4 Maule & S. 576.

A "factor" differs from a "broker" in that he is intrusted with the possession and management of the goods to be sold, while a broker has only an agency to sell, or possession of documents. Story, Ag. § 33.

——In Maritime Law. A factor was anciently an agent who accompanied the ship, the cargo being consigned for sale, and he being empowered to purchase a return cargo out of the proceeds. Such an agent is usually called a "supercargo." Beawes, Lex Merc. 44, 47.

FACTORS' ACTS. A name given to certain English statutes, of which 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, is the latest, validating pledges by factors to bona fide pledgees.

FACTORAGE. The wages or allowances paid to a factor for his services. It is more usual to call this "commissions." 1 Bouv. Inst. note 1013; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1288.

FACTORIZING PROCESS. A process for attaching effects of the debtor in the hands of a third party. It is substantially the same process known as the garnishee process, trustee process, process by foreign attachment. Drake, Attachm. § 451.

FACTORY. In Scotch law. A contract which partakes of a mandate and locatio ad operandum, and which is in the English and American law books discussed under the title of "Principal and Agent." 1 Bell, Comm. 259.

FACTUM. A man's own act and deed; a culpable or criminal act; an act not founded in law; a deed; a written instrument under seal. Called, also, charta. Spelman; 2 Bl. Comm. 295.

The difference between factum and charta originally would seem to have been that factum denoted the thing done, and charta the evidence thereof. Co. Litt. 9b. When a man denies by his plea that he made a deed on which he is sued, he pleads non est factum, he did not make it.

In wills, factum seems to retain an active signification, and to denote a making. See 11 How. (U. S.) 358.

A fact. Factum probandum, the fact to be proved. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13.

A portion of land granted to a farmer; otherwise called a hide, bovata, etc. Spelman.

——In French Law. A memoir which contains, concisely set down, the fact on which a contest has happened, the means on which a party founds his pretensions, with the refutation of the means of the adverse party. See Vicat.

FACTUM A JUDICE QUOD AD EJUS OFficium nŏn spectat, non ratum est. An act of a judge which does not pertain to his office is of no force. 10 Coke, 76; Dig. 50. 17. 170; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 89.

FACTUM CUIQUE SUUM, NON ADVERsario, nocere debet. A man's actions should injure himself, not his adversary. Dig. 50. 17. 155.

FACTUM INFECTUM FIERI NEQUIT. What is done cannot be undone. 1 Kames, Eq. 96, 259.

FACTUM NEGANTIS NULLA PROBATIO. No proof is incumbent on him who denies a fact.

FACTUM NON DICITUR QUOD NON perseverat. That is not said to be done which does not last. 5 Coke, 96; Shep. Touch. (Prest. Ed.) 391.

FACTUM PROBANDUM. The fact to be proved.

FACTUM PROBANS. An evidentiary fact.

FACTUM UNIUS ALTERI NOCERE NON debet. The deed of one should not hurt another. Co. Litt. 152.

FACULTAS PROBATIONUM NON EST angustanda. The right of offering proof is not to be narrowed. 4 Inst. 279.

FACULTIES OF HUSBAND. His ability by earnings, or out of accumulated resources, to pay alimony which may be awarded to a wife suing for divorce. It should be alleged as a foundation for an allowance of alimony or support. Not in common use.

FACULTY.

——In Canon Law. A license; an authority. For example, the ordinary, having the disposal of all seats in the nave of a church, may grant this power, which, when it is delegated, is called a "faculty," to another.

Faculties are of two kinds: First, when the grant is to a man and his heirs in gross; second, when it is to a person and his heirs as appurtenant to a house which he holds in the parish. 1 Term R. 429, 432; 12 Coke, 106.

——In Scotch Law. Ability or power. The term "faculty" is more properly applied to a power founded on the consent of the party from whom it springs, and not founded on property. Kames, Eq. 504.

——In American Colleges. The faculty is the body of instructors.

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES. The college or society of advocates in Scotland.

FADERFIUM. A marriage gift coming from the father or brother of the bride.

FAEDER FEOH. The portion brought by a wife to her husband, and which reverted to a widow, in case the heir of her deceased husband refused his consent to her second marriage; i. e., it reverted to her family in case she returned to them. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FAESTING MEN. Approved men who were strong armed. Subsequently the word seems to have been used in the sense of "rich," and hence it probably passed into its later and common meaning of pledges or bondsmen, which, by Saxon custom, were bound to answer for each other's good behavior. Cowell; Du Cange.

FAGGOT. A badge worn in popish times by persons who had recanted and abjured what was then adjudged to be heresy, as an emblem of what they had merited. Cowell.

FAGGOT VOTES. A faggot vote is where a man is formally possessed of a right to vote for members of parliament, without possessing the substance which the vote should represent; as if he is enabled to buy a property, and at the same moment mortgage it to its full value for the mere sake of the vote. Such a vote is called a "faggot vote." Wharton.

FAIDA. In Saxon law. Great and open hostility which arose on account of some murder committed. The term was applied only to that deadly enmity in deference to which, among the Germans and other northern nations, if murder was committed, punishment might be demanded from any one of kin to the murderer by any one of the kin of the murdered man. Du Cange; Spelman.

FALLITE (Fr.) Bankruptcy; failure; the condition of a merchant who ceases to pay his debts. 3 Masse, Dr. Comm. 171; Guyot, Rep. Univ.

FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION. Failure of a party to a contract, whether by fault or necessity, to perform that which he has obligated himself to do.

To constitute failure of consideration, there must be failure to perform that which was promised; subsequent depreciation of the thing promised (86 N. C. 498), though due to inherent defects (78 Ill. 578), not being a legal failure of consideration.

It is a phase of want of consideration, the contract being invalid for absence of consideration after the consideration has failed. But in another sense, want of consideration implies that there never was a consideration, while failure of consideration implies the existence of mutual promises at the making of the contract, and the subsequent breach of one party.

Failure of consideration differs from nonperformance or breach only as to the point of view; the same acts constituting a failure of consideration in respect to the effect to release the other party from his obligation, and a breach in respect to the effect to render the nonperforming party liable in damages.

FAILURE OF ISSUE. A want of issue to take an estate limited over by an executory devise.

Failure of issue is definite or indefinite. When the precise time for the failure of issue is fixed by the will, as in the case of a devise to Peter, but, if he dies without issue living at the time of his death, then to another, this is a failure of issue definite. An indefinite failure of issue is the very converse or opposite of this, and it signifies a general failure of issue, whenever it may happen, without fixing any time, or a certain or definite period, within which it must happen. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1849. See "Dying Without Issue."

FAILURE OF RECORD. The neglect to produce the record after having pleaded it. When a defendant pleads a matter, and offers to prove it by the record, and then pleads nul tiel record, a day is given to the defendant to bring in the record. If he fails to do so, he is said to fail, and, there being a failure of record, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. Termes de la Ley. See the form of entering it, 1 Wm. Saund. 92, note 3.

FAINT (or FEIGNED) ACTION. In old English practice. An action was so called where the party bringing it had no title to recover, although the words of the writ were true. A false action was properly where the words of the writ were false. Litt. § 689; Co. Litt. 361.

FAINT PLEADER. A false, fraudulent, or collusory manner of pleading, to the deception of a third person.

FAIR. A public mart or place of buying and selling. 1 Bl. Comm. 274. A greater species of market, recurring at more distant intervals.

A fair is usually attended by a greater concourse of people than a market, for the amusement of whom various exhibitions are gotten up. McCulloch; Wharton.

A solemn or greater sort of market, granted to any town by privilege, for the more speedy and commodious provision of such things as the subject needeth, or the utterance of such things as we abound in above our own uses and occasions. Cowell; Cunningham. A privileged market.

A fair is a franchise which is obtained by a grant from the crown. 2 Inst. 220; 3 Mod. 123; 3 Lev. 222; 1 Ld. Raym. 341; 2 Saund. 172; 1 Rolle, Abr. 106; Tomlins; Cunningham.

In the United States, fairs, in the ancient sense, are almost unknown. They are recognized in Alabama (Aik. Dig. 409, note), and in North Carolina, where they are regulated by statute (1 Rev. St. N. C. 282).

FAIR-PLAY MEN. A local irregular tribunal which existed in Pennsylvania about the year 1769.

About the year 1769 there was a tract of country in Pennsylvania situate between Lycoming creek and Pine creek, in which the proprietaries prohibited the making of surveys, as it was doubtful whether it had or had not been ceded by the Indians. Although settlements were forbidden, yet adventurers settled themselves there. Being without the pale of ordinary authorities, the inhabitants annually elected a tribunal, in rotation, of three of their number, whom they denominated "fair-play men," who had authority to decide all disputes as to boundaries. Their decisions were final, and enforced by the whole community en masse. Their decisions are said to have been just and equitable. 2 Smith, Pa. Laws, 195; Sergeant, Land Laws Pa. 77.

FAIR PLEADER. The name of a writ given by the statute of Marlebridge, 52 Hen. III. c. 11. See "Beaupleader."

FAIT. Anything done; a deed lawfully executed. Comyn, Dig. Femme de fait, a wife de facto.

FAIT ENROLLE. A deed enrolled, as a bargain and sale of freeholds. 1 Keb. 568.

FAITOURS. Idle persons; idle livers; vagabonds. Termes de la Ley; Cowell; Blount; Cunningham.

FALCARE (Lat.) To cut or mow down. Falcare prata, to cut or mow down grass in meadows hayed (laid in for hay) was a customary service for the lord by his inferior tenants. Kennett.

Falcator, the tenant performing the service.

Falcatura, a day's mowing; falcatura una, once mowing the grass.

Falcatio, a mowing.

Falcata, that which was mowed. Kennett; Cowell; Jacob.

FALCIDIA. In Spanish law. The fourth portion of an inheritance, which legally belongs to the heir, and for the protection of which he has the right to reduce the legacies to three fourth parts of the succession, in order to protect his interest.

FALCIDIAN LAW. In Roman law. A statute or law restricting the right of disposing of property by will, enacted by the people during the reign of Augustus, on the proposition of Falcidius, who was a tribune, in the year of Rome 714.

Its principal provision gave power to fathers of families to bequeath three-fourths of their property, but deprived them of the power to give away the other fourth, which was to descend to the heir. Inst. 2. 22. This fourth was termed the "Falcidian portion."

A similar principle has been adopted in Louisiana, where donations inter vivos or mortis causa cannot exceed two-thirds of the property of the disposer, if he leaves at his decease a legitimate child; one-half, if he leaves two children; and one-third, if he leaves three or a greater number. Civ. Code, art. 1480.

A similar principle prevailed in England in earlier times, and it was not until after the Restoration that the power of a father to dispose of all his property by will became fully established. 2 Bl. Comm. 11. As to the early history of testamentry law, see Maine, Anc. Law.

At the present day, by the common law, the power of the father to give all his property is unqualified. He may bequeath it to his children equally, to one in preference to another, or to a stranger in exclusion of all, except that his widow has a right of dower in his real property. In some of the states, the statutes authorizing bequests and devises to charitable corporations limit the amount which a testator may give, to a certain fraction of his estate.

FALCIDIAN PORTION. That portion of a testator's estate which, by the Falcidian law, was required to be left to the heir, amounting to at least one-fourth. Civ. Code La. art. 1608; 1 White, New Recop. 106.

FALDA (Spanish). The slope or skirt of a hill. 2 Wall. (U. S.) 673.

——In Old English Law. A sheep fold; the liberty of faldage, or setting up in a field a movable pen for sheep.

FALDAE CURSUS. A sheep walk. 2 Vent. 139.

FALDAGE. The privilege which anciently several lords reserved to themselves of setting up folds for sheep in any fields within their manors, the better to manure them, and this not only with their own, but their tenants', sheep. Called, variously, secta faldare, fold-course, free-fold, faldagii. Cunningham; Cowell; Spelman.

FALDATA. In old English law. A flock or fold of sheep. Cowell.

FALDFEY. A compensation paid by some customary tenants that they might have liberty to fold their own sheep on their own land. Cunningham; Cowell; Blount.

FALDISDORY. The bishop's seat or throne within the chancel.

FALDSOCA (Saxon). The liberty or privilege of foldage.

FALDSTOOL, or FOLDSTOOL. A place at the south side of the altar at which the sovereign kneels at his coronation.

FALDWORTH. A person of age that he may be reckoned of some decennary. Du Fresne.

FALERAE. In old English law. The tackle and furniture of a cart or wain. Blount.

FALESIA. In old English law. A hill, or down by the seaside. Co. Litt. 5b; Domesday Book.

FALK LAND. See "Folcland."

FALL. In Scotch law. To lose. To fall from a right is to lose or forfeit it. 1 Kames, Eq. 228.

FALL OF LAND. In English law. A quantity of land six ells square, superficial measure.

FALLO. In Spanish law. The final decree or judgment given in a lawsuit.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO (Lat.) In the civil law. False designation; erroneous description of a person or thing in a written instrument. Inst. 2. 20. 30.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO NON NOCET. A false description does not vitiate. 6 Term R. 676. See 2 Story (U. S.) 291; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 301; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 562; 2 Pars. Cont. 62, note, 69, note, 72, note, 76, note; 4 C. B. 328; 11 C. B. 208; 14 C. B. 133.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIONE LEGATUM non perimi. A legacy is not destroyed by an incorrect description. 3 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 144, 149.

FALSA MONETA. In civil law. False or counterfeit money. Code, 9. 24.

FALSA ORTHOGRAPHIA, SIVE FALSA grammatica, non vitiat concessionem. False spelling or false grammar does not vitiate a grant. 9 Coke, 48; Shep. Touch. 55.

FALSARE. To counterfeit. Bracton, fol. 276b.

FALSARIUS, or FOLSONARIUS. A counterfeiter. Towns. Pl. 260; Hov. Frauds, 424.

FALSE ACTION. See "Feigned Action."

FALSE CHARACTER. Personating the master or mistress of a servant, or any representative of such master or mistress, and giving a false character to the servant, is an offense punishable in England with a fine of £20. St. 32 Geo. III. c. 56.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT. Any unlawful restraint of a man's liberty, whether in a place made use of for imprisonment generally, or in one used only on the particular occasion, or by words and an array of force, without bolts or bars, in any locality whatever. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 669; 8 N. H. 550; 9 N. H. 491; 7 Humph. (Tenn.) 43; 12 Ark. 43; 7 Q. B. 742; 5 Vt. 588; 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 46; 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 117; 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 345.

The characteristic of false imprisonment is the unlawfulness of the detention. If the person is detained under valid process, though it be erroneously or maliciously issued, it is not false imprisonment. 58 Wis. 276; 17 Kan. 436.

FALSE JUDGMENT (Law Lat. falsum judicium; breve de falso judicio). In English law. A writ which lies to the courts at Westminster to reverse the judgment of some inferior court not of record. 3 Bl. Comm. 34, 406; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 18; Finch, Law, bk. 4, c. 47.

FALSE LATIN. In old practice. Ungrammatical Latin. Before the statute directing law proceedings to be in English, if a Latin word was significant, though not true or good Latin, yet an indictment, declaration, or fine should not be impeached or quashed on account of it, as where the word proefato was used for proefatoe, and the like. But if the word was not Latin, nor allowed by the law as vocabulum artis (a word or term of art), but was insensible there, if it were in a material point, as if murdredum was used for murdrum, in an indictment, or burgariter for burglariter, it made the whole vicious and insufficient. 5 Coke, 121b. See 4 Mod. 159; 5 Mod. 281; 11 Mod. 399.

FALSE NEWS. Spreading false news, whereby discord may grow between the sovereign of England and his people, or the great men of the realm, or which may produce other mischiefs, still seems to be a misdemeanor, under St. 3 Edw. I. c. 34. Steph. Dig. Crim. Law, § 95.

FALSE PERSONATION. See "Personation."

FALSE PRETENSES. In criminal law. False representations and statements, made with a fraudulent design to obtain "money, goods, wares, and merchandise," with intent to cheat. 2 Bouv. Inst. note 2308.

Such a fraudulent representation of a past or existing fact by one who knows it not to be true as is adapted to induce the person to whom it is made to part with something of value. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 415.

The offense is distinguished from "larceny" by the intent with which the injured person parts with his property. In larceny, the property is taken against the owner's will, while by false pretenses he is induced to voluntarily part with it. 77 N. Y. 114.

At common law it was not criminal to obtain property by false representation without false weights, measures, or tokens, but this is generally changed by statute. To constitute the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses:

(1) There must be an actual representation.

(2) The representation must be of a fact, not a prediction of future events, a promise, an expression of opinion, or mere dealer's talk.

(3) The pretense must be false at the time the property is obtained.

(4) It must be reasonably calculated to deceive, when considered with reference to the capacity of the person to whom it is made.

(5) It must be made (a) with knowledge that it is false; (b) with intent to defraud; (c) with intent to deprive the owner of his property.

(6) It must deceive the party to whom it is made; that is, it must be relied on.

(7) Negligence of the person defrauded is no defense.

(8) The property must be actually obtained.

(9) The person to whom the pretense was made must be defrauded.

(10) The thing obtained must be within the terms of the statutes. 2 Clark & Marshall, Crimes, 818.

FALSE RETURN. A return made by the sheriff, or other ministerial officer, to a writ, in which is stated a fact contrary to the truth, and injurious to one of the parties, or some one having an interest in it.

FALSE SWEARING. In English law. A misdemeanor consisting of making a willfully false oath, but not in a judicial proceeding, by which circumstance it is distinguished from perjury.

FALSE TOKEN. A false document or sign of the existence of a fact,—in general used for the purpose of fraud. See 2 Starkie, Ev. 563.

It must be something real and visible. 58 Ga. 409.

FALSEDAD. In Spanish law. Falsity; an alteration of the truth. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 26, lib. 1.

Deception; fraud. Id. pt. 3, tit. 32, lib. 21.

FALSEHOOD. Any untrue assertion or proposition; a willful act or declaration contrary to the truth.

It does not always and necessarily imply a lie or willful untruth, but is generally used in the second sense here given. It is committed either by the willful act of the party, or by dissimulation, or by words. It is willful, for example, when the owner of a thing sells it twice, by different contracts, to different individuals, unknown to them; for in this the seller must willfully declare the thing is his own when he knows that it is not so. It is committed by dissimulation when a creditor, having an understanding with his former debtor, sells the land of the latter although he has been paid the debt which was due to him. Falsehood by word is committed when a witness swears to what he knows not to be true. See Rosc. Crim. Ev. 362.

FALSI CRIMEN. Fraudulent subornation or concealment, with design to darken or hide the truth, and make things appear otherwise than they are. It is committed (1) by words, as when a witness swears falsely; (2) by writing, as when a person antedates a contract; (3) by deed, as selling by false weights and measures. Wharton. See "Crimen Falsi."

FALSIFY.

——In Chancery Practice. To prove that an item in an account before the court as complete, which is inserted to the debit of the person falsifying, should have been omitted.

When a bill to open an account has been filed, the plaintiff is sometimes allowed to surcharge and falsify such account; and if anything has been inserted that is a wrong charge, he is at liberty to show it, and that is a falsification. 2 Ves. Jr. 565; 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 237. See "Surcharge."

——In Criminal Law. To alter or make false. The alteration or making false a record is punishable at common law by statute in the states, and, if of records of the United States courts, by act of congress of April 30, 1790. 1 Story, U. S. Laws, 86.

A fraudulent falsification of accounts is generally criminal. 140 Mass. 279; 18 Hun (N. Y.) 393.

——In Practice. To prove a thing to be false. Co. Litt. 104b.

FALSING. In Scotch law. Making or proving false. Bell, Dict.

FALSING OF DOOMS. In Scotch law. Prostesting against a sentence, and taking an appeal to a higher tribunal. Bell, Dict.

An action to set aside a decree. Skene de Verb. Sign.

FALSO RETORNO BREVIUM (Law Lat.) In old English law. The name of a writ which might have been sued out against a sheriff for falsely returning writs. Cunningham.

FALSONARIUS. A forger; a counterfeiter. See "Falsarius." Hov. Frauds, 424.

FALSUM (Lat.) In civil law. A fraudulent imitation, perversion, or suppression of truth, such as an imitation of another's handwriting, or an instrument or writing belonging to him; a cutting out of a part of a writing.

FALSUS IN UNO, FALSUS IN OMNIBUS. False in one thing, false in everything. 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 356; 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 338; 3 Wis. 645; 2 Jones (N. C.) 257.

FAMA, FIDES, ET OCULUS NON PATIuntur ludum. Fame, plighted faith, and eyesight do not endure deceit. 3 Bulst. 226.

FAMA, QUAE SUSPICIONEM INDUCIT, oriri debet apud bonos et graves, non quidem malevolos et maledicos, sed providas et fide dignas personas, non semel sed saepius, quia clamor minuit et defamatio manifestat. Report, which induces suspicion, ought to arise from good and grave men; not, indeed, from malevolent and malicious men, but from cautious and credible persons; not only once, but frequently; for clamor diminishes, and defamation manifests. 2 Inst. 52.

FAMACIDE. A slanderer.

FAMILIA (Lat.)

——In Roman Law. A family.

This word had four different acceptations in the Roman law. In the first and most restricted sense it designated the pater-familias,—his wife, his children, and other descendants subject to his paternal power. In the second and more enlarged sense it comprehended all the agnates,—that is to say, all the different families who would all be subject to the paternal authority of a common chief if he were still living. Here it has the same meaning as agnatio. In a third acceptation it comprises the slaves and those who are in mancipio of the chief, although considered only as things, and without any tie of relationship. And, lastly, it signifies the whole fortune or patrimony of the chief. See "Pater-Familias;" 1 Ortolan, 28.

——In Old English Law. A household; all the servants belonging to one master. Du Cange; Cowell. A sufficient quantity of land to maintain one family. The same quantity of land is called sometimes mansa (a manse), familia, carucata. Du Cange; Cunningham; Cowell; Creasy, Church Hist.

FAMILIAE EMPTOR. In Roman law. An intermediate person who purchased the aggregate inheritance when sold per aes et libram, in the process of making a will under the Twelve Tables. This purchaser was merely a man of straw, transmitting the inheritance to the haeres proper. Brown.

FAMILIAE ERCISCUNDAE (Lat.) In civil law. An action which lay for any of the coheirs for the division of what fell to them by inheritance. Stair, Inst. lib. 1, tit. 7, § 15.

FAMILIARES REGIS. Persons of the king's household. The ancient title of the "six clerks" of chancery in England. Crabb, Com. Law, 184; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 249, 251. Familier de la chauncery. Kelham.

FAMILY. Father, mother, and children. All the individuals who live under the authority of another, including the servants of the family. All the relations who descend from a common ancestor, or who spring from a common root. Code La. art. 3522, No. 16; 9 Ves. 323.

As used in homestead and exemption laws, it generally includes all persons resident under a roof whom the head of the family is under legal or moral duty to support. Thomp. Homest. & Ex. § 44.

In other connections it has been given a wider significance, having been held to include servants, but not boarders (53 Ill. 263), or even permanent boarders, but not visitors (13 Mass. 520).

In the construction of wills, the word "family," when applied to personal property, is synonymous with "kindred," or "relations," meaning next of kin, as applied to personalty (9 Ves. 323), and heirs at law, as applied to realty (17 Ves. 255). It may nevertheless by confined to particular relations by the context of the will, or may be enlarged by it, so that the expression may in some cases mean children, or next of kin, and in others may even include relations by marriage. 1 Rop. Leg. 115; 1 Hov. Supp. to Ves. 365, notes 6, 7; 2 Ves. Jr. 110; 4 Ves. 708; 5 Ves. 156; 17 Ves. 255; 3 East, 172; 5 Maule & S. 126. See "Legatee;" Dig. 50. 16. 195. 2.

FAMILY ARRANGEMENTS. An agreement made between a father and his son, or children, or between brothers, to dispose of property in a different manner to that which would otherwise take place.

In these cases, frequently, the mere relation of the parties will give effect to bargains otherwise without adequate consideration. 1 Chit. Prac. 67; 1 Turn. & R. 13.

FAMILY BIBLE. A Bible containing a record of the births, marriages, and deaths of the members of a family.

FAMILY MEETINGS, or FAMILY COUNCILS. In Louisiana. Meetings of at least five relations, or, in default of relations of minors or other persons on whose interest they are called upon to deliberate, then of the friends of such minors or other persons.

The appointment of the members of the family meeting is made by the judge. The relations or friends must be selected from among those domiciliated in the parish in which the meeting is held. The relations are selected according to their proximity, beginning with the nearest. The relation is preferred to the connection in the same degree; and among relations of the same degree the eldest is preferred. The under tutor must also be present. 6 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 455.

The family meeting is held before a justice of the peace, or notary public, appointed by the judge for the purpose. It is called for a fixed day and hour, by citations delivered at least three days before the day appointed for that purpose.

The members of the family meeting, before commencing their deliberations, take an oath before the officer before whom the meeting is held, to give their advice according to the best of their knowledge touching the interests of the person respecting whom they are called upon to deliberate. The officer before whom the family meeting is held must make a particular proces verbal of the deliberations, cause the members of the family meeting to sign it, if they know how to sign, and must sign it himself, and deliver a copy to the parties that they may have it homologated. Civ. Code La. arts. 305-311; Civ. Code, bk. 1, tit. 10, c. 2, § 4. See 31 La. Ann. 31; 14 La. Ann. 251; 10 La. 328.

FAMOSUS LIBELLUS (Lat.) Among the civilians, these words signified that species of injuria which corresponds nearly to libel or slander.

FANATICS. In old English law. Persons pretending to be inspired, and being a general name for Quakers, Anabaptists, and all other sectaries, and factious dissenters from the Church of England. St. 13 Car. II. c. 6; Jacob.

FANEGA. In Spanish law. A measure of land, which is not the same in every province. Dicc. de la Acad.; 2 White, Coll. 49. In Spanish America, the fanega consisted of six thousand four hundred square varas, or yards. 2 White, Coll. 138.

FARANDMAN. In Scotch law. A merchant stranger (peregrinus mercator). Skene de Verb. Sign. Spelman gives the word faramannus, from the law of the Burgundians (tit. 54, § 2), and derives it from Saxon faran, or foeran, to travel.

FARDEL. The fourth part of a yardland. Spelman. According to others, the eighth part. Noy, Compl. Lawy. 57; Cowell. See Cunningham.

FARDELLA. In old English law. A bundle or pack; a fardel. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 22, § 10.

FARDING DEAL. In old English law. The fourth part of an acre of land. Cowell. But Spelman considers it the same as fardel (q. v.)

FARE. A voyage or passage; the money paid for a voyage or passage. The latter is the modern signification. 1 Bouv. Inst. note 1036.

FARINAGIUM. A mill. L. Salic. tit. 32, § 3; Spelman.

FARLEU, or FARLEY. Money paid by tenants in lieu of a heriot. It was often applied to the best chattel, as distinguished from heriot, the best beast. Cowell.

FARLINGARII. Whoremongers and adulterers.

FARM.

——In Old English Law. A certain amount of provision reserved as the rent of a messuage. Spelman.

Rent generally which is reserved on a lease. When it was to be paid in money, it was called blanche firme. Spelman; 2 Bl. Comm. 42.

A term; a lease of lands; a leasehold interest. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 17; 1 Reeve. Hist. Eng. Law, 301, note; 6 Term R. 532; 2 Chit. Pl. 879, note (e). The land itself, let to farm or rent. 2 Bl. Comm. 368.

It is usually the chief messuage in a village or town whereto belongs great demesne of all sort. Cowell; Cunningham; Termes de la Ley.

A large tract or portion of land taken by a lease under a yearly rent payable by the tenant. Tomlins.

From this latter sense is derived its common modern signification of a large tract used for cultivation or other purposes, as raising stock, whether hired or owned by the occupant, including a messuage with outbuildings, gardens, orchard, yard, etc. Plowd. 195; Touch. 93.

——In Modern Law. A tract of land used wholly or in part for agricultural purposes. 18 Pick. (Mass.) 553; 2 Bin. (Pa.) 238; 47 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 446.

FARM LET. Technical words in a lease creating a term for wears. Co. Litt. 45b; 2 Mod. 250; 1 Washb. Real Prop. Index, "Lease."

FARM OUT. To rent for a certain term. The collection of the revenue among the Romans was farmed out.

FARMER. The lessee of a farm. It is said that every lessee for life or years, although it be but of a small house and land, is called "farmer." This word implies no mystery, except it be that of husbandman. Cunningham; Cowell; 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 318.

In common parlance, and as a term of description in a deed, "farmer" means one who cultivates a farm, whether he owns it or not. There may also be a farmer of the revenue, or of other personal property, as well as lands. Plowd. 195; Cunningham.

FARRAGO LIBELLI (Lat.) An ill-composed book containing a collection of miscellaneous subjects not properly associated nor scientifically arranged. Wharton.

FARRIER. One who takes upon himself the public employment of shoeing horses.

Like an innkeeper, a common carrier, and other persons who assume a public employment, a farrier is bound to serve the public as far as his employment goes, and an action lies against him for refusing, when a horse is brought to him at a reasonable time for such purpose, if he refuses (Oliph. Horses, 131), and he is liable for the unskillfulness of himself or servant in performing such work (1 Bl. Comm. 431), but not for the malicious act of the servant in purposely driving a nail into the foot of the horse with the intention of laming him (2 Salk. 440).

FARTHING. An English coin; the fourth part of a penny.

FARVAND. Standing by itself, this word signifies "passage by sea or water." In charter parties, it means voyage or passage by water. 18 C. B. 880.

FARYNDON INN. The ancient appellation of Serjeants' Inn. See "Inns of Court."

FAS (Lat.) Right; justice; the divine law. 3 Bl. Comm. 2; Calv. Lex.

FASIUS. A faggot of wood.

FAST BILL OF EXCEPTIONS. In Georgia, a bill of exceptions authorized in certain cases, in which the time for taking each step is much shorter than that prescribed in other cases, and a speedy review of the cases is made possible. See 66 Ga. 353.

FAST ESTATE. Real property; a term sometimes used in wills. 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 185; 9 N. Y. 502.

FASTERMANNES. Securities; bondsmen. Spelman.

FASTI. In Roman law. Lawful. Dies fasti, lawful days; days on which justice could lawfully be administered by the praetor. See "Dies Fasti."

FATETUR FACINUS QUI JUDICIUM fugit. He who flees judgment confesses his guilt. 3 Inst. 14; 5 Coke, 109b. But see Best, Pres. § 248.

FATHER. He by whom a child is begotten.

FATHOM. A measure of length, equal to six feet.

The word is probably derived from the Teutonic word "fad," which signifies the thread or yarn drawn out in spinning to the length of the arm, before it is run upon the spindle. Webster; Minsheu.

FATUA MULIER. A whore. Du Fresne.

FATUITAS. In old English law. Idiocy. Reg. Orig. 266.

FATUM (Lat.) Fate; a superhuman power; an event or cause of loss, beyond human foresight or means of prevention.

FATUOUS PERSON. One entirely destitute of reason; is qui omnino desipit. Ersk. Inst. bk. 1, tit. 7, § 48.

FATUUS. An idiot or fool. Bracton, fol. 420b.

Foolish; absurd; indiscreet; or ill considered. Fatuum judicium, a foolish judgment or verdict. Bracton, fol. 289. Applied to the verdict of a jury which, though false, was not criminally so, or did not amount to perjury. Id.

FATUUS, APUD JURISCONSULTOS nostros, accipitur pro non compos mentis; et fatuus dicitur, qui omnino desipit. Fatuous, among our jurisconsults, is understood for a man not of right mind; and he is called "fatuus" who is altogether foolish. 4 Coke, 128.

FATUUS PRAESUMITUR QUI IN PROprio nomine errat. A man is presumed to be simple who makes a mistake in his own name. Code, 6. 24. 14; 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 148. 161.

FAUBOURG. A district or part of a town adjoining the principal city; as a faubourg of New Orleans. 18 La. 286.

FAUCES TERRAE (Lat. jaws of the land). Projecting headlands or promontories, including arms of the sea. Such arms of the sea are said to be inclosed within the fauces terrae, in contradistinction to the open sea. 1 Kent, Comm. 367. Where these fauces approach so near that a man standing on one shore can discern what another man is doing on the other shore, the water inclosed is infra corpus comitatum, within the body of the county. Andr. 231; 4 Inst. 140; 2 East, P. C. 804; 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 106; 5 Mason (U. S.) 290; 1 Story (U. S.) 259.

FAULT. An improper act or omission, which arises from ignorance, carelessness, or negligence. The act or omission must not have been meditated, and must have caused some injury to another. Lec. Elm. § 783. See "Dolus;" "Negligence;" 1 Miles (Pa.) 40.

Gross fault or neglect consists in not observing that care towards others which a man the least attentive usually takes of his own affairs. Such fault may, in some cases, afford a presumption of fraud, and in very gross cases it approaches so near as to be almost undistinguishable from it, especially when the facts seem hardly consistent with an honest intention. But there may be a gross fault without fraud. 2 Strange, 1099; Story, Bailm. §§ 18-22; Toullier, Dr. Civ. lib. 3, tit. 3, § 231.

Ordinary faults consist in the omission of that care which mankind generally pay to their own concerns; that is, the want of ordinary diligence.

A slight fault consists in the want of that care which very attentive persons take of their own affairs. This fault assimilates itself to, and in some cases is scarcely distinguishable from, mere accident or want of foresight.

This division has been adopted by common lawyers from the civil law. Although the civilians generally agree in this division, yet they are not without a difference of opinion. See Pothier, Observation generale sur le precedent Traite, et sur les suivants, printed at the end of his Traite des Obligations, where he cites Accurse, Alciat, Cujas, Duaren, D'Avezan, Vinnius, and Heineccius in support of this division. On the other side the reader is referred to Thomasius, tom. 2, Dissertationem, page 1006; Le Brun, cited by Jones, Bailm. 27; and Toullier, Dr. Civ. liv. 3, tit. 3, § 231.

——In Maritime Law. "Fault" is the technical term for negligence, particularly that contributing to a collision of vessels.

——In the Law of Sale. Defects, of any kind. 29 N. H. 343; 12 Ired. (N. C.) 49.

FAUTOR. In Spanish law. Accomplice; the person who aids or assists another in the commission of a crime.

FAUX. In French law. A falsification or fraudulent alteration or suppression of a thing by words, by writings, or by acts without either. Biret, Vocab.

Toullier says (tom. 9, note 188): "Faux may be understood in three ways: In its most extended sense, it is the alteration of truth, with or without intention; it is nearly synonymous with lying; in a less extended sense, it is the alteration of truth, accompanied with fraud, mutatio veritatis cum dolo facta; and lastly, in a narrow, or rather the legal, sense of the word, when it is a question to know if the faux be a crime, it is the fraudulent alteration of the truth in those cases ascertained and punished by the law." See "Crimen Falsi."

FAVOR. Bias; partiality; lenity; prejudice.

The grand jury are sworn to inquire into all offenses which have been committed, and into all violations of law, without fear, favor, or affection. See "Grand Jury." When a juror is influenced by bias or prejudice, so that there is not sufficient ground for a principal challenge, he may nevertheless be challenged for favor. See "Challenge:" Bac. Abr. "Juries" (E); Dig. 50. 17. 156. 4; 7 Pet. (U. S.) 160.

FAVORABILIA IN LEGE SUNT FISCUS, dos, vita, libertas. The treasury, dower, life, and liberty are things favored in law. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 94.

FAVORABILIORES REI POTIUS QUAM actores habentur. Defendants are rather to be favored than plaintiffs. Dig. 50. 17. 125. See 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 195, 196; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 639.

FAVORABILIORES SUNT EXECUTIONES aliis processibus quibuscunque. Executions are preferred to all other processes whatever. Co. Litt. 287.

FAVORES AMPLIANDI SUNT; ODIA RESTRINGENDA. Favorable inclinations are to be enlarged; animosities restrained. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 186.

FEAL. Faithful. Britt. fol. 1.

FEAL AND DIVOT. A right in Scotland, similar to the right of turbary in England, for fuel, etc. Wharton.

FEALTY. That fidelity which every man who holds lands of another owes to him of whom he holds.

Under the feudal system, every owner of lands held them of some superior lord, from whom or from whose ancestors the tenant had received them. By this connection the lord became bound to protect the tenant in the enjoyment of the land granted to him; and, on the other hand, the tenant was bound to be faithful to his lord, and to defend him against all his enemies. This obligation was called fidelitas, or fealty. 1 Bl. Comm. 263; 2 Bl. Comm. 86; Co. Litt. 67b; 2 Bouv. Inst, note 1566.

This fealty was of two sorts,—that which is general, and is due from every subject to his prince; the other special, and required of such only as in respect of their fee are tied by this oath to their landlords. 1 Bl. Comm. 367; Cowell.

The oath or obligation of fealty was one of the essential requisites of the feudal relation. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 45, 86; Litt. §§ 117, 131; Wright, Ten. 35; Termes de la Ley; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 19. Fealty was due alike from freeholders and tenants for years as an incident to their estates, to be paid to the reversioner. Co. Litt. 67b. Tenants at will did not have fealty. 2 Flintoff, Real Prop. 222; Burton, Real Prop. 395, note; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 371.

It has now fallen into disuse, and is no longer exacted. 3 Kent, Comm. 510; Wright, Ten. 35, 55; Cowell.

FEAR. In criminal law. Dread; consciousness of approaching danger.

To constitute rape, the fear must be of death or great bodily harm. 39 Fla. 155; 45 Conn. 263; 139 Ind. 531.

Fear is an element of several crimes, and the nature and extent thereof varies with the crime. Thus, to constitute robbery, where the taking was by putting in fear, the fear may be of injury to the person (2 East, P. C. 712), of injury to property (2 East, P. C. 731), or of injury to character or reputation (12 Ga. 319). See "Putting in Fear."

FEASANCE. A doing; the doing of an act. A making; the making of an indenture, release, or obligation. Litt. § 371; Dyer, (Fr. Ed.) 56b. The making of a statute. Keilw. 1b.

FEASANT. Doing or making.

FEASOR (Lat.) Doer; maker. Feasors del estatute, makers of the statute. Dyer, 3b.

FEASTS. Certain established periods in the Christian church. Formerly the days of the feasts of saints were used to indicate the dates of instruments and memorable events. 8 Toullier, Dr. Civ. note 81. These are yet used in England. There they have Easter term, Hilary term, etc.

FECIAL LAW. The law relating to declarations of war and treaties of peace among the Romans. So called from the feciales (q. v.), who were charged with its execution. 1 Kent, Comm. 6. See "Jus Feciale."

FECIALES. Amongst the ancient Romans, that order of priests who discharged the duties of ambassadors. Subsequently their duties appear to have related more particularly to the declaring war and peace. Calv. Lex.

FEDERAL. A term commonly used to express a league or compact between two or more states.

In the United States, the central government of the Union is federal. The constitution was adopted "to form a more perfect union" among the states, for the purpose of self-protection, and for the promotion of their mutual happiness.

FEE. A reward or wages given to one for the execution of his office, or for professional services, as those of a counsellor or physician. Cowell.

Fees differ from costs in this, that the former are, as above mentioned, a recompense to the officer for his services; and the latter, an indemnification to the party for money laid out and expended in his suit. 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 248; 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 262. See 4 Bin. (Pa.) 267.

That which is held of some superior on condition of rendering him services.

A fee is defined by Spelman (Feuds, c. 1) as the right which the tenant or vassal has to the use of lands, while the absolute property remained in a superior. But this early and strict meaning of the word speedily passed into its modern signification of an estate of inheritance. 2 Bl. Comm. 106; Cowell; Termes de la Ley; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 51; Co. Litt. 1b; 1 Prest. Est. 420; 3 Kent, Comm. 514. The term may be used of other property as well as lands. Old Nat. Brev. 41.

The term is generally used to denote as well the land itself so held as the estate in the land, which seems to be its stricter meaning. Wright, Ten. 19, 49; Cowell. The word "fee" is explained to signify that the land or other subject of property belongs to its owner, and is transmissible, in the case of an individual, to those whom the law appoints to succeed him, under the appellation of "heirs;" and, in the case of corporate bodies, to those who are to take on themselves the corporate function, and, from the manner in which the body is to be continued, are denominated "successors." 1 Co. Litt. 271b; Wright, Ten. 147, 150; 2 Bl. Comm. 104, 106; Bouv. Inst. Index. Sometimes used for "fee simple."

The compass or circuit of a manor or lordship. Cowell.

——Fee Simple. An estate belonging to a man and his heirs absolutely. An estate of inheritance. Co. Litt. 1b; 2 Bl. Comm. 106. The word "simple" adds no meaning to the word "fee," standing by itself. But it excludes all qualification or restriction as to the persons who may inherit it as heirs, thus distinguishing it from a fee tail, as well as from an estate which, though inheritable, is subject to conditions or collateral determination. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 51; Wright, Ten. 146; 1 Prest. Est. 420; Litt. § 1.

It is the largest possible estate which a man can have, being an absolute estate in perpetuity. It is where lands are given to a man and to his heirs absolutely, without any end or limitation put to the estate. Plowd. 557; Atk. Conv. 183; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 106.

——Fee Tail. One limited to particular classes of heirs. An inheritable estate which can descend to certain classes of heirs only. It is necessary that they should be heirs "of the body" of the ancestor. It corresponds with the feudum talliatum of the feudal law. The estate itself is said to have been derived from the Roman system of restricting estates. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 21; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 66; 2 Bl. Comm. 112, note. See, also, 2 Inst. 333; White & T. Lead. Cas. 607; 4 Kent, Comm. 14 et seq.

——Determinable Fee. One which is liable to be determined, but which may continue forever. 1 Plowd. 557; Shep. Touch. 97; 2 Bl. Comm. 109; Cro. Jac. 593; 10 Viner, Abr. 133; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 187; 3 Atk. 74; Ambl. 204; 9 Mod. 28. See "Determinable Fee."

——Qualified Fee. An interest given to a man and certain of his heirs at the time of its limitation. Litt. § 254; Co. Litt. 27a, 220; 1 Prest. Est. 449. See "Qualified Fee."

——Conditional Fee. This includes one that is either to commence or determine on some condition. 10 Coke, 95b; Prest. Est. 476; Fearne, Cont. Rem. 9. See "Condition."

FEE EXPECTANT. An estate where lands are given to a man and his wife, and the heirs of their bodies.

FEE FARM. Land held of another in fee; that is, in perpetuity by the tenant and his heirs at a yearly rent, without fealty, homage, or other services than such as are specially comprised in the feoffment. Cowell. Fealty, however, was incident to a holding in fee farm, according to some authors. Spelman; Termes de la Ley.

Land held at a perpetual rent. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 43.

FEE-FARM RENT. The rent reserved on granting a fee farm. It might be one-fourth the value of the land, according to Cowell; one-third, according to other authors. Spelman; Termes de la Ley.

FEGANGI (from Saxon feh, money or goods, and gange, to go). In old European law. A thief caught in the act of going off with the thing stolen. LL. Longobard, lib. 1, tit. 25, 1, 2; Spelman.

FEHMGERICHTE. An irregular tribunal which existed and flourished in Westphalia during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

From the close of the fourteenth century its importance rapidly diminished, and it was finally suppressed by Jerome Bonaparte in 1811.

FEIGNED ACTION. In practice. An action brought on a pretended right, when the plaintiff has no true cause of action, for some illegal purpose. In a feigned action, the words of the writ are true. It differs from "false action," in which case the words of the writ are false. Co. Litt. 361, § 689.

FEIGNED ISSUE. In practice. An issue brought by consent of the parties, or by the direction of a court of equity, or of such courts as possess equitable powers, to determine before a jury some disputed matter of fact which the court has not the power or is unwilling to decide. 3 Bl. Comm. 452; Bouv. Inst. Index.

FELAGUS (Lat.) One bound for another by oath; a sworn brother. Du Cange. A friend bound in the decennary for the good behavior of another. One who took the place of the deceased. Thus, if a person was murdered, the recompense due from the murderer went to the father or mother of the deceased; if he had none, to the lord; if he had none, to his felagus, or sworn brother. Cunningham; Cowell; Du Cange.

FELE. See "Feal."

FELIX QUI POTUIT RERUM COGNOSCERE CAUSAS. Happy is he who has been able to understand the causes of things. Co. Litt. 231.

FELLOW HEIR. A coheir; a partner of the same inheritance.

FELLOW SERVANTS. Certain servants of a common master, for injuries to one of whom by the negligence of another the master was not liable if he had exercised due care in the selection of the servants, and the providing of safe appliances.

The doctrine is an exception to the rule of respondeat superior, and rests upon the reason that coservants are better able to guard against each other's negligence than the master is to protect them. The earliest English case is found in 3 Mees. & W. 1. Earliest American cases are found in 1 McMull. (S. C.) 385, and 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49.

The question of who are fellow servants has given rise to a diversity of rules in different jurisdictions, making a general definition impossible.

FELO DE SE (Lat.) In criminal law. A felon of himself; a self-murderer. See "Suicide."

FELON. One convicted and sentenced for a felony (q. v.)

FELONIA (Lat.) Felony; the act or offense by which a vassal forfeited his fee. Spelman; Calv. Lex. Per feloniam, with a criminal intention. Co. Litt. 391.

Felonice was formerly used also in the sense of "feloniously." Cunningham.

FELONIA, EX VI TERMINI, SIGNIFICAT quodlibet capitale crimen felleo animo perpetratum. Felony, by force of the term, signifies some capital crime perpetrated with a malignant mind. Co. Litt. 391.

FELONIA IMPLICATUR IN QUOLIBET proditione. Felony is implied in every treason. 3 Inst. 15.

FELONIOUS HOMICIDE. The killing of a human creature, of any age or sex, without justification or excuse. It may include killing one's self, as well as any other person. 4 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 188. See "Homicide."

FELONIOUSLY. In pleading. This is a technical word which must be introduced into every indictment for a felony, charging the offense to have been committed feloniously. No other word nor any circumlocution will supply its place. Comyn, Dig. "Indictment" (G 6); Bac. Abr. "Indictment" (G 1); 2 Hale, P. C. 172, 184; Hawk. P. C. bk. 2. c. 25, § 55; Cro. Car. 37; Williams, Just. "Indictment" (4); Cro. Eliz. 193; 5 Coke, 121; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 242; 1 Bennett & H. Lead. Crim. Cas. 154.

FELONY.

——At Common Law. An offense which occasions a total forfeiture of either lands or goods, or both, to which capital or other punishment may be superadded, according to the degree of guilt. 4 Bl. Comm. 94, 95; 1 Russ. Crimes, 42; 1 Chit. Prac. 14; Co. Litt. 391; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 37; 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 153, 159.

The common-law felonies were murder, manslaughter, rape, sodomy, robbery, larceny, arson, burglary, and perhaps mayhem. 1 Clark & Marshall, Crimes, 12; 2 Bish. New Crim. Law, § 1008.

——In American Law. The word has no clearly defined meaning, but includes offenses of a considerable gravity. 1 Park. Cr. R. (N. Y.) 39; 4 Ohio St. 542.

In the absence of a statute defining felonies, it is generally held that no statutory crime is a felony unless it is so declared by the statute creating it. 66 Fed. 290; 7 Mass. 245. In other jurisdictions it is enacted that all offenses punishable by death or by confinement in the penitentiary are felonies. See 99 N. Y. 210; 35 Wis. 308; 10 Mich. 169; 89 Va. 570; 48 Me. 218.

FEME, or FEMME. A woman.

FEME COVERT. A married woman.

FEME SOLE. An unmarried woman; includes widows and divorced women.

FEME SOLE TRADER. In English law. A married woman, who, by the custom of London, trades on her own account, independently of her husband; so called because, with respect to her trading, she is the same as a feme sole. Jacob; Cro. Car. 68.

The term is applied also to women deserted by their husbands, who do business as femes sole. 1 Pet. (U. S.) 105.

FEMICIDE. The killing of a woman. Wharton.

FEMININE. Of or belonging to females. When the feminine is used, it is generally confined to females; as, if a man bequeathed all his mares to his son, his horses would not pass. See 3 Brev. (N. C.) 9.

FENATIO, or FEONATIO. In forest law. The fawning of deer; the fawning season. Spelman.

FENCE. A structure or erection between two contiguous estates, so as to divide them, or on the same estate, so as to divide one part from another.

——In Scotch Law. To hedge in or protect by certain forms. To fence a court, to open in due form. Pitc. Crim. Law, pt. 1, p. 75.

FENCE MONTH. A month in which it is forbidden to hunt in the forest. It begins fifteen days before midsummer, and ends fifteen days after. Manw. For. Laws, c. 23. There were also fence months for fish. Called, also, "defence month," because the deer are then defended from "scare or harm." Cowell; Spelman; Cunningham.

FENERATION. Usury; the gain of interest; the practice of increasing money by lending.

FENGELD (Saxon). A tribute exacted for repelling enemies. Spelman.

FEOD. Said to be compounded of the two Saxon words feoh (stipend) and odh (property); by others, to be composed of feoh (stipend) and hod (condition). 2 Bl. Comm. 45: Spelman. See "Fee."

FEODAL. Belonging to a fee or feud; feudal. More commonly used by the old writers than "feudal."

FEODAL ACTIONS. Real actions. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 117.

FEODALITY. Fealty.

FEODARY. An officer in the court of wards, appointed by the master of that court, by virtue of St. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 46, to be present with the escheator at the finding offices, and to give in evidence for the king as to value and tenure. He was also to survey and receive rents of the ward lands, and assign dower to the king's widows. The office was abolished by St. 12 Car. II. c. 24; Kennett; Cowell.

FEODATORY, or FEUDATORY. The tenant who held his estate by feudal service. Termes de la Ley.

FEODI FIRMA (Law Lat.) Fee farm (q. v.)

FEODI FIRMARIUS. The lessee of a fee farm.

FEODUM. The form in use by the old English law writers instead of feudum, and having the same meaning. Feudum is used generally by the more modern writers and by the feudal law writers. Litt. § 1; Spelman. There were various classes of feoda.

Feodum militaris or militare, a knight's fee; feodum improprium, an improper or derivative feud; feodum proprium, a pure or proper fee; feodum simplex, a fee simple; feodum talliatum, a fee tail. 2 Bl. Comm. 58, 62; Litt. §§ 1, 13; Spelman.

FEODUM ANTIQUUM. An inherited feud, as distinguished from feodum novum, a feud acquired by the tenant.

FEODUM EST QUOD QUIS TENET EX quacunque causa, sive sit tenementum sive redditus. A fee is that which any one holds from whatever cause, whether tenement or rent. Co. Litt. 1.

FEODUM NOBILE. A fief for which the tenant did guard and owed homage. Spelman.

FEODUM NOVUM. See "Feodum Antiquum."

FEODUM SIMPLEX QUIA FEODUM idem est quod haereditas, et simplex idem est quod legitimum vel purum; et sic feodum simplex idem est quod haereditas legitima vel haereditas pura. A fee simple, so called because fee is the same as inheritance, and simple is the same as lawful or pure; and thus fee simple is the same as a lawful inheritance, or pure inheritance. Litt. § 1.

FEODUM TALLIATUM, i. e., HAEREDITAS in quandam certitudinem limitata. Fee tail, i. e., an inheritance limited in a definite descent. Litt. § 13.

FEOFFAMENTUM. A feoffment. 2 Bl. Comm. 310.

FEOFFARE. To bestow a fee. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 91.

FEOFFATOR. In old English law. A feoffer; one who gives or bestows a fee; one who makes a feoffment. Bracton, fols. 12b, 81.

FEOFFEE. He to whom a fee is conveyed. Litt. § 1; 2 Bl. Comm. 20.

FEOFFEE TO USES. A person to whom land was conveyed for the use of a third party. One holding the same position with reference to a use that a trustee does to a trust. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 333. He answers to the haeres fiduciarius of the Roman law.

FEOFFMENT. A gift of any corporeal hereditaments to another. It operates by transmutation of possession, and it is essential to its completion that the seisin be passed. Watk. Conv. 183.

The conveyance of a corporeal hereditament either by investiture or by livery of seisin. 1 Sullivan, Lect. 143; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 33.

The instrument or deed by which such hereditament is conveyed.

This was one of the earliest modes of conveyance used in the common law. It signified originally the grant of a fee or feud; but it came in time to signify the grant of a free inheritance in fee, respect being had rather to the perpetuity of the estate granted than to the feudal tenure. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 90. The feoffment was likewise accompanied by livery of seisin. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 33. The conveyance by feoffment with livery of seisin has become infrequent, if not obsolete, in England, and in this country has not been used in practice. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 4, § 3; Shep. Touch. c. 9; 2 Bl. Comm. 20; Co. Litt. 9; 4 Kent, Comm. 467; Comyn, Dig.; 12 Viner, Abr. 167; Bac. Abr.; Dane, Abr. c. 104; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 33; 8 Cranch (U. S.) 229.

FEOFFOR. He who makes a feoffment. 2 Bl. Comm. 20; Litt. § 1.

FEOH (Saxon). A reward; wages; a fee. The word was in common use in these senses. Spelman, Feuds.

FEORME, or FEARME (Saxon; Law Lat. firma). Food, provisions. Spelman, voc. "Firma." An entertainment or feast. Id.

Herod gegeafwode mycle feorme, Herod made a great feast. Sax. Evang. St. Marc. vi. 21.

Rent paid in provisions. Spelman, ubi supra; Cowell, voc. "Ferme;" 2 Bl. Comm. 318.

A manor. Spelman, ubi supra. Hence, the Law Latin firma, and English ferm, farm (q. v.)

FERAE BESTIAE. Wild beasts.

FERAE NATURAE (Lat. of a wild nature; untamed). A term used to designate animals not usually tamed, or not regarded as reclaimed, so as to become the subjects of property. 2 Bl. Comm. 390.

FERDFARE. A summons to serve in the army.

FERIA (Lat.) In old English law. A week day; a holiday; a day on which process may not be served; a fair; a ferry. Du Cange; Spelman; Cowell; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 17.

FERIAE (Lat.) In civil law. Holidays. Numerous festivals were called by this name in the early Roman empire. In the later Roman empire the single days occurring at intervals of a week apart, commencing with the seventh day of the ecclesiastical year, were so called. Du Cange.

FERIAL DAYS. Originally and properly, days free from labor and pleading. In St. 27 Hen. VI. c. 5, working days. Cowell.

FERITA. A wound.

FERME (Saxon). A farm; a rent; a lease; a house or land, or both, taken by indenture or lease. Plowd. 195; Vicat; Cowell. See "Farm."

FERMER, or FERMOR. A lessee; a farmer; one who holds a term, whether of lands or an incorporeal right, such as customs or revenue.

FERMORY. A place in monasteries where the poor were fed. Spelman.

FERRI (Lat.) In the civil law. To be borne (on the person). Distinguished from portari, to be carried (on an animal). Dig. 50. 16. 235.

FERRIAGE. The toll or price paid for the transportation of persons and property across a ferry.

FERRY. A liberty to have a boat upon a river for the transportation of men, horses, and carriages, with their contents, for a reasonable toll. 42 Me. 9; 3 Zab. (N. J.) 206; Woolr. Ways, 217. The term is also used to designate the place where such liberty is exercised. 4 Mart. (La.; N. S.) 426; 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 311.

FERRYMAN. One employed in taking persons across a river or other stream, in boats or other contrivances, at a ferry. 3 Ala. 160; 8 Dana (Ky.) 158.

FESTINATIO JUSTITIAE EST NOVERCA infortunii. The hurrying of justice is the stepmother of misfortune. Hob. 97.

FESTING MAN. A bondsman; a surety; a pledge; a frank pledge. It was one privilege of monasteries that they should be free from festing men, which Cowell explains to mean not to be bound for any man's forthcoming who should transgress the law. Cowell.

FESTING PENNY. Earnest given to servants when hired or retained. The same as "arles penny." Cowell.

FESTINUM REMEDIUM (Lat. a speedy remedy). A term applied to those cases where the remedy for the redress of an injury is given without any unnecessary delay. Bac. Abr. "Assise" (A). The action of dower is festinum remedium, and so is that of assise.

FETTERS. A sort of iron put on the leg of a malefactor or a person accused of crime.

FEU. In Scotch law. A holding or tenure where the vassal in place of military service makes his return in grain or money. Distinguished from "wardholding," which is the military tenure of the country. Bell, Dict.; Ersk. Inst. lib. 2, tit. 3, § 7.

FEU ANNUALS. In Scotch law. The reddendo, or annual return from the vassal to a superior in a feu holding. Wharton.

FEU ET LIEU (Fr.) In old French and Canadian law. Hearth and home. A term importing actual settlement upon land by a tenant.

FEU HOLDING. A holding by tenure of rendering grain or money in place of military service. Bell, Dict.

FEUAR. In Scotch law. The tenant of a feu; a feu vassal. Bell, Dict.

FEUD. Land held of a superior on condition of rendering him services. 2 Bl. Comm. 106.

A hereditary right to use lands, rendering services therefor to the lord, while the property in the land itself remains in the lord. Spelman, Feuds, c. 1.

The same as feod, fief, and fee. 1 Sullivan, Lect. 128; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 34; Dalr. Feud. Prop. 99; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 18.

In Scotland and the north of England, a combination of all the kin to revenge the death of any of the blood upon the slayer and all his race. Termes de la Ley; Whishaw.

FEUDA. Fees.

FEUDAL ACTIONS. Real actions. 3 Bl. Comm. 117.

FEUDAL LAW, or FEODAL LAW. A system of tenures of real property which prevailed in the countries of western Europe during the middle ages, arising from the peculiar political condition of those countries, and radically affecting the law of personal rights and of movable property.

Although the feudal system has never obtained in this country, and is long since extinct throughout the greater part of Europe, some understanding of the theory of the system is essential to an accurate knowledge of the English constitution, and of the doctrines of the common law in respect to real property. The feudal tenure was a right to lands on the condition of performing services and rendering allegiance to a superior lord. It had its origin in the military immigrations of the Northmen, who overran the falling Roman empire. Many writers have sought to trace the beginning of the system in earlier periods, and resemblances more or less distinct have been found in the tenures prevailing in the Roman republic and empire, in Turkey, in Hindostan, in ancient Tuscany, as well as in the system of Celtic clanship. 1 Hallam, Mid. Ages; Stuart, Soc. in Europe; Robertson, Hist. Charles V.; Pink. Diss.; Montesq. Esp. des Lois, liv. 30, c. 2; Meyer, des Inst. Judiciaires, tom. 1, p. 4.

But the origin of the feudal system is so obvious in the circumstances under which it arose that perhaps there is no other connection between it and these earlier systems than that all are the outgrowth of political conditions somewhat similar. It has been said that the system is nothing more than the natural fruit of conquest; but the fact that the conquest was by immigrants, and that the conquerors made the acquired country their permanent abode, is an important element in the case, and in so far as other conquests have fallen short of this, the military tenures resulting have fallen short of the feudal system. The military chieftains of the northern nations allotted the lands of the countries they occupied among themselves and their followers, with a view at once to strengthen their own power and ascendency, and to provide for their followers.

Some lands were allotted to individuals as their own proper estates, and these were termed "allodial;" but, for the most part, those lands which were not retained by the chieftain he assigned to his comites, or knights, to be held by his permission, in return for which they assured him of their allegiance, and undertook for him military service.

It resulted that there was a general dismemberment of the political power into many petty nations and petty sovereignties. The violence and disorders of the times rendered it necessary both for the strong to seek followers, and for the weak to seek a protecting allegiance; and this operated on the one hand to lead the vassals to divide again among their immediate retainers the lands which they had received from the paramount lord, upon similar terms, and by this subinfeudation the number of fiefs was largely increased; and the same circumstances operated on the other hand to absorb the allodial estates by inducing allodial proprietors to surrender their lands to some neighboring chieftain, and receive them again from him under feudal tenure. Every one who held lands upon a feudal tenure was bound, when called upon by his benefactor or immediate lord, to defend him, and such lord was, in turn, subordinate to his superior, and bound to defend him, and so on upwards to the paramount lord or king, who in theory of the law was the ultimate owner of all the lands of the realm. The services which the vassals were bound to render to their lords were chiefly military; but many other benefits were required, such as the power of the lord or the good will of the tenant would sanction.

This system came to its height upon the continent in the empire of Charlemagne and his successors. It was completely established in England in the time of William the Norman and William Rufus, his son; and the system thus established may be said to be the foundation of the English law of real property, and the position of the landed aristocracy, and of the civil constitution of the realm. And when we reflect that in the middle ages real property had a relative importance far beyond that of movable property, it is not surprising that the system should have left its traces for a long time upon the law of personal relations and personal property. The feudal tenures were originally temporary, at the will of the lord, or from year to year; afterwards they came more commonly to be held for the life of the vassal; and gradually they acquired an inheritable quality, the lord recognizing the heir of the vassal as the vassal's successor in his service.

The chief incidents of the tenure by military service were:

(1) Aids. A pecuniary tribute required by the lord in an emergency, e. g., a ransom for his person if taken prisoner, or money to make his son a knight, or to marry his daughter.

(2) Relief. The consideration which the lord demanded upon the death of a vassal for allowing the vassal's heir to succeed to the possession; and connected with this may be mentioned primer seisin, which was the compensation that the lord demanded for having entered upon the land, and protected the possession until the heir appeared to claim it.

(3) Fines upon alienation. A consideration exacted by the lord for giving his consent that the vassal should transfer the estate to another, who should stand in his place in respect to the services owed.

(4) Escheat. Where, on the death of the vassal, there was no heir, the land reverted to the lord; also, where the vassal was guilty of treason; for the guilt of the vassal was deemed to taint the blood, and the lord would no longer recognize him or his heirs.

(5) Wardship and marriage. Where the heir was a minor, the lord, as a condition of permitting the estate to descend to one who could not render military service, assumed the guardianship of the heir, and, as such, exercised custody both of his person and of the property, without accounting for the profits, until the heir, if a male, was twenty-one and could undertake the military services, or, if a female, until she was of a marriageable age, when, on her marriage, her husband might render the services. The lord claimed, in virtue of his guardianship, to make a suitable match for his ward, and if wards refused to comply they were mulcted in damages.

Feudal tenures were abolished in England by St. 12 Car. II. c. 24; but the principles of the system still remain at the foundation of the English and American law of real property. Although in many of the states of the United States all lands are held to be allodial, it is the theory of the law that the ultimate right of property is in the state; and in most of the states escheat is regulated by statute. "The principles of the feudal system are so interwoven with every part of our jurisprudence," says Tilghman, C. J., "that to attempt to eradicate them would be to destroy the whole." 3 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 447; 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 333. "Though our property is allodial," says Gibson, C. J., "yet feudal tenures may be said to exist among us in their consequences and the qualities which they originally imparted to estates; as, for instance, in precluding every limitation founded on an abeyance of the fee." 3 Watts (Pa.) 71; 1 Whart. (Pa.) 337; 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 188: 13 Pa. St. 35.

Many of these incidents are rapidly disappearing, however, by legislative changes of the law.

The principles of the feudal law will be found in Litt. Ten.; Wright, Ten.; 2 Bl. Comm. c. 5; Dalr. Feud. Prop.; Sullivan, Lect.; Book of Fiefs; Spelman, Feuds; Cruise, Dig.; Le Grand Coutumier; the Salic Laws; the Capitularies; Les Establissements de St. Louis; Assise de Jerusalem; Poth. des Fiefs; Merlin, Repert.; Dalloz, Dict.; Guizot, Hist. de France, Essai 5.

The principal original collection of the feudal law of continental Europe is a digest of the twelfth century,—feudorum consuetudines,—which is the foundation of many of the subsequent compilations. The American student will perhaps find no more convenient source of information than 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 43, and Greenl. Cruise, Dig. Introd.

FEUDAL TENURES. The tenures of land under the feudal system.

FEUDALISM. The feudal system.

FEUDALIZE. To reduce to a feudal tenure; to conform to feudalism. Webster.

FEUDARY. A feud; a feudal tenant.

FEUDATORY. See "Feodatory."

FEUDBOTE. A recompense for engaging in a feud, and the damages consequent, it having been the custom in ancient times for all the kindred to engage in their kinsman's quarrel. Jacob.

FEUDE, or DEADLY FEUDE. A German word, signifying implacable hatred, not to be satisfied but with the death of the enemy. Such was that among the people in Scotland and in the northern parts of England, which was a combination of all the kindred to revenge the death of any of the blood upon the slayer and all his race. Termes de la Ley.

FEUDIST. A writer on feuds, as Cujacius, Spelman, etc.

FEUDO. In Spanish law. Feud or fee. White, New Recop. bk. 2, tit. 2, c. 2.

FEUDUM. A feud, fief, or fee. A right of using and enjoying forever the lands of another, which the lord grants on condition that the tenant shall render fealty, military duty, and other services. Spelman. It is not properly the land, but a right in the land. This form of the word is used by the feudal writers. The earlier English writers generally prefer the form feodum, but the meaning is the same.

FEUDUM ANTIQUUM. A fee descended from the tenant's ancestors. 2 Bl. Comm. 212. One which had been possessed by the relations of the tenant for four generations. Spelman.

FEUDUM APERTUM. A fee which the lord might enter upon and resume either through failure of issue of the tenant, or any crime or legal cause on his part. Spelman; 2 Bl. Comm. 245.

FEUDUM FRANCUM. A free feud. One which was noble and free from talliage and other subsidies to which the plebeia feuda (vulgar feuds) were subject. Spelman.

FEUDUM HAUBERTICUM. A fee held on the military service of appearing fully armed at the ban and arriere ban. Spelman.

FEUDUM IMPROPRIUM. A derivative fee.

FEUDUM INDIVIDUUM. A fee which could descend to the eldest son alone. 2 Bl. Comm. 215.

FEUDUM LIGIUM. A liege fee. One where the tenant owed fealty to his lord against all other persons. Spelman; 1 Bl. Comm. 367.

FEUDUM MATERNUM. A fee descending from the mother's side. 2 Bl. Comm. 212.

FEUDUM NOBILE. A fee for which the tenant did guard and owed fealty and homage. Spelman.

FEUDUM NOVUM. One which began with the person of the feudatory, and did not come to him by descent.

FEUDUM NOVUM UT ANTIQUUM. A new fee held with the qualities and incidents of an ancient one. 2 Bl. Comm. 212.

FEUDUM PATERNUM. A fee which the paternal ancestors had held for four generations. Calv. Lex.; Spelman. One descendible to heirs on the paternal side only. 2 Bl. Comm. 223. One which might be held by males only. Du Cange.

FEUDUM PROPRIUM. A genuine original feud or fee, of a military nature, in the hands of a military person. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 57.

FEUDUM TALLIATUM. A restricted fee; one limited to descend to certain classes of heirs. 2 Bl. Comm. 112, note; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 66; Spelman. See, generally, Le Grand Coutumier; Spelman, Feuds; Du Cange; Calv. Lex.; Dalr. Feud. Prop.; Poth. des Fiefs; Merlin, Repert. "Feodalite."

FI. FA. An abbreviation for fieri facias (q. v.)

FIANCER (Law Fr.) To pledge one's faith. Kelham.

FIANZA (Spanish). Surety; the contract by which one person engages to pay the debt or fulfill the obligations of another if the latter should fail to do so.

FIAR. In Scotch law. One whose property is charged with a life rent.

FIAR PRICES. The value of grain in the different counties of Scotland, fixed yearly by the respective sheriffs, in the month of February, with the assistance of juries. These regulate the prices of grain stipulated to be sold at the fiar prices, or when no price has been stipulated. Ersk. Inst. 1. 4. 6; Wharton.

FIAT. An order of a judge or of an officer whose authority, to be signified by his signature, is necessary to authenticate the particular acts. A short order or warrant of the judge, commanding that something shall be done. See 1 Tidd, Prac. 100, 108.

FIAT IN BANKRUPTCY. An order of the lord chancellor that a commission of bankruptcy shall issue. 1 Deac. Bankr. 106.

Fiats were abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 116.

FIAT JUSTITIA. Let justice be done. Words formerly written by the king at the top of a petition for a warrant to bring a writ of error in parliament, signifying his assent. Jacob; Dyer, 375; Staund. Prerog. 22.

FIAT JUSTITIA RUAT COELUM. Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall. Branch, Princ. 161.

FIAT PROUT FIERI CONSUERIT; NIL temere novandum. Let it be done as formerly; let no innovation be made rashly. Jenk. Cent. Cas. 116; Branch, Princ.

FICTIO CEDIT VERITATI. FICTIO JURIS non est, ubi veritas. Fiction yields to truth. Where truth is, fiction of law does not exist.

FICTIO EST CONTRA VERITATEM, SED pro veritate habetur. Fiction is against the truth, but it is to be esteemed truth.

FICTIO LEGIS INIQUE OPERATUR ALIENI damnum vel injuriam. Fiction of law is wrongful if it works loss or injury to any one. 2 Coke, 35; 3 Coke, 36; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 122.

FICTIO LEGIS NEMINEM LAEDIT. A fiction of law injures no one. 2 Rolle, Abr. 502; 3 Bl. Comm. 43; 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 348.

FICTION. The legal assumption that something which is or may be false is true.

It differs from a presumption in that a fiction is an assumption as true of something admittedly false; while a presumption is an attempt to arrive at the truth by inference.

FICTITIOUS ACTION. A suit brought on pretense of a controversy, when no such controversy in truth exists. Such actions have usually been brought on a pretended wager, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a point of law. Courts of justice were constituted for the purpose of deciding really existing questions of right between parties; and they are not bound to answer impertinent questions which persons think proper to ask them in the form of an action on a wager. 12 East, 248. Such an attempt has been held to be a contempt of court; and Lord Hardwicke in such a case committed the parties and their attorneys. Lee temp. Hardw. 237. See, also, Comb. 425; 1 Coke, 83; 6 Cranch (U. S.) 147, 148. See, also, "Feigned Action."

FICTITIOUS PARTY. Where a suit is brought in the name of one who is not in being, or of one who is ignorant of the suit, and has not authorized it, it is said to be brought in the name of a fictitious plaintiff. To bring such a suit is deemed a contempt of court. 4 Bl. Comm. 133.

FICTITIOUS PAYEE. When a contract, such as negotiable paper, is drawn in favor of a fictitious person, and has been indorsed in such name, it is deemed payable to bearer as against all parties who are privy to the transaction, and a holder in good faith may recover on it against them. 2 H. Bl. 178, 288; 3 Term R. 174, 182, 481; 1 Camp. 130; 19 Ves. 311. And see 10 Barn. & C. 468; 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 38; 2 Duer (N. Y.) 121.

FIDE JUBERE. In the civil law. To order a thing upon one's faith; to pledge one's self; to become surety for another. Fide jubes? Fide jubeo: Do you pledge yourself? I do pledge myself. Inst. 3. 16. 1. One of the forms of stipulation. Dig. 46. 1. 8. pr.; Inst. 3. 21. 7.

FIDE JUSSIO. An act by which any one binds himself as an additional security for another. This giving security does not destroy the liability of the principal, but adds to the security of the surety. Vicat; Halifax, Anal. bk. 2, c. 16, note 10.

FIDE JUSSOR. In civil law. One who becomes security for the debt of another, promising to pay it in case the principal does not do so.

He differs from a co-obligor in this, that the latter is equally bound to a debtor with his principal, while the former is not liable till the principal has failed to fulfill his engagement. Dig. 12. 4. 4; Id. 16. 1. 13; Id. 24. 3. 64; Id. 38. 1. 37; Id. 50. 17. 110; Id. 6. 14. 20; Hall, Prac. 33; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 300; Clerke, Prax. tits. 63-65.

The obligation of the fide jussor was an accessory contract; for, if the principal obligation was not previously contracted, his engagement then took the name of "mandate." Lec. Elm. § 872; Code Nap. 2012.

FIDE PROMISSOR. See "Fide Jussor."

FIDEI COMMISSARIUS (Law Lat.) In civil law. One who has a beneficial interest in an estate which, for a time, is committed to the faith or trust of another. This term has nearly the same meaning as cestui que trust has in the common law. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 295; Story, Eq. Jur. § 966; Bouv. Inst. Index.

Fidei commissary and fide commissary, anglicized forms of this term, have been proposed to take the place of the phrase cestui que trust, but do not seem to have met with any favor.

According to Du Cange, the term was sometimes used to denote the executor of a will.

FIDEI COMMISSUM (Law Lat.) In civil law. A trust. A devise was made to some person (haeres fiduciarius), and a request annexed that he should give the property to some one who was incapable of taking directly under the will. Inst. 2. 23. 1; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 295; 15 How. (U. S.) 357. A gift which a man makes to another through the agency of a third person, who is requested to perform the will of the giver.

The rights of the beneficiary were merely rights in curtesy, to be obtained by entreaty or request. Under Augustus, however, a system was commenced, which was completed by Justinian, for enforcing such trusts. The trustee or executor was called haeres fiduciarius, and sometimes fide jussor. The beneficial heir was called haeres fidei commissarius.

The uses of the common law are said to have been borrowed from the Roman fidei commissa. 1 Greenl. Cruise, 295; Bac. Read. Uses, 19; 1 Madd. 446; Story, Eq. Jur. § 966. The fidei commissa are supposed to have been the origin of the common-law system of entails. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 21; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 60. This has been doubted by others. See 1 Bouv. Inst. note 1708.

FIDELIS. Faithful; trustworthy.

FIDELITAS. Fealty; fidelity.

FIDELITAS. DE NULLO TENEMENTO, quod tenetur ad terminum fit homagii; fit tamen inde fidelitatis sacramentum. Fealty. For no tenement which is held for a term is there the oath of homage, but there is the oath of fealty. Co. Litt. 67b.

FIDEM MENTIRI. When a tenant does not keep that fealty which he has sworn to the lord. Leg. Hen. I. c. 53.

FIDES EST OBLIGATIO CONSCIENTIAE alicujus ad intentionem alterius. A trust is an obligation of conscience of one to the will of another.

FIDES SERVANDA. Good faith must be observed. 1 Metc. (Mass.) 551; 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 323, 330; 23 Barb. (N. Y.) 521, 524.

FIDES SERVANDA EST; SIMPLICITAS juris gentium praevaleat. Good faith is to be preserved; the simplicity of the law of nations should prevail. Story, Bills, § 15.

FIDUCIA (Lat.) In civil law. A contract by which we sell a thing to some one—that is, transmit to him the property of the thing, with the solemn forms of emancipation—on condition that he will sell it back to us. This species of contract took place in the emancipation of children, in testaments, and in pledges. Poth. ad Pand.

FIDUCIARIUS TUTOR. In Roman law. The elder brother of an emancipated pupillus, whose father had died leaving him still under fourteen years of age.

FIDUCIARY. This term is borrowed from the civil law. The Roman laws called a fiduciary heir the person who was instituted heir, and who was charged to deliver the succession to a person designated by the testament. Merlin, Repert. But Poth. ad Pand. vol. 22, says that fiduciarius haeres properly signifies the person to whom a testator has sold his inheritance under the condition that he should sell it to another. Fiduciary may be defined "in trust," "in confidence."

A generic term embracing all persons acting in a fiduciary capacity.

FIDUCIARY CONTRACT. An agreement by which a person delivers a thing to another on the condition that he will restore it to him. The following formula was employed: Ut inter bonos agere oportet, ne propter te fidemque tuam frauda. Cicero de Offic. lib. 3, c. 13; Lec. Dr. Civ. §§ 237, 238. See 2 How. (U. S.) 202, 208; 6 Watts & S. (Pa.) 18; 7 Watts (Pa.) 415.

FIEF. A fee, feod, or feud.

FIEF D'HAUBERK. A fee held on the military tenure of appearing fully armed on the ban and arriere-ban. Feudum hauberticum. Spelman; Calv. Lex.; Du Cange. A knight's fee. 2 Bl. Comm. 62.

FIEF TENANT. The holder of a fief or fee.

FIEL. In Spanish law. An officer who keeps possession of a thing deposited under authority of law. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 9, lib. 1.

FIELD REEVE. An officer elected, in England, by the owners of a regulated pasture, to keep in order the fences, ditches, etc., on the land, to regulate the times during which animals are to be admitted to the pasture, and generally to maintain and manage the pasture, subject to the instructions of the owners. General Inclosure Act 1845, § 118.

FIELDAD. In Spanish law. Sequestration. This is allowed in six cases by the Spanish law where the title to property is in dispute. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 3, lib. 1.

FIERDING COURTS. Ancient Gothic courts "in the lowest instance." So called because four were instituted within every superior district or hundred. Their jurisdiction was limited within forty shillings, or three marks. 3 Steph. Comm. 393; 3 Bl. Comm. 34; Stiernh. de Jur. Goth. lib. 1, c. 2.

FIERI FACIAS (Lat. that you cause to be made). In practice. A writ directing the sheriff to cause to be made of the goods and chattels of the judgment debtor the sum or debt recovered.

It receives its name from the Latin words in the writ, used when legal proceedings were conducted in Latin (quod fieri facias de bonis et catallis, that you cause to be made of the goods and chattels). It is the form of execution in common use where the judgment debtor has personal property.

FIERI FACIAS DE BONIS TESTATORIS. The writ issued on an ordinary judgment against an executor when sued for a debt due by his testator. If the sheriff returns to this writ nulla bona, and a devastavit (q. v.), the plaintiff may sue out a fieri facias de bonis propriis, under which the goods of the executor himself are seized. 1 Wm. Saund. 246; Smith, Action (11th Ed.) 368.

FIERI FECI (Law Lat.) In practice. The return which the sheriff or other proper officer makes to certain writs, signifying, "I have caused to be made."

When the officer has made this return, a rule may be obtained upon him after the return day, to pay the money into court, and, if he withholds payment, an action of debt may be had on the return, or assumpsit for money had and received may be sustained against him. 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 183.

FIERI NON DEBET, SED FACTUM VAlet. It ought not to be done, but done, it is valid. 5 Coke, 39; 1 Strange, 526; 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 84. 92; 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 11, 376.

FIFTEENTHS. A temporary aid, consisting of a fifteenth part of the personal property in every township, borough, and city in the kingdom. The valuation of the kingdom was fixed, and a record made in the exchequer of the amount (twenty-nine thousand pounds). This valuation was not increased as the property in the kingdom increased in value; whence the name came, in time, to be a great misnomer. 2 Inst. 77; 4 Inst. 34; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 309; Cowell.

FIGHTNITE, or FIGHTWITE (Saxon). A mulct or fine for making a quarrel to the disturbance of the peace. Called also by Cowell forisfactura pugnae. The amount was one hundred and twenty shillings. Cowell.

FILACER. An officer of the common pleas, whose duty it was to file the writs on which he made process. There were fourteen of them, and it was their duty to make out all original process. Cowell; Blount. The office is now abolished.

FILARE. In old English practice. To file. Towns. Pl. 67.

FILE. A thread, string, or wire upon which writs and other exhibits in courts and offices are fastened or filed for the more safe keeping and ready turning to the same. Spelman; Cowell; Tomlins. Papers put together and tied in bundles. A paper is said also to be filed when it is delivered to the proper officer, and by him received to be kept on file. 13 Viner, Abr. 211; 1 Litt. 113; 1 Hawk. P. C. 7, 207.

FILEINJAID (Brit.) A name given to villeins in the laws of Hoel Dda. Barr. Obs. St. 302.

FILIATE. To declare whose child a bastard is. 2 W. Bl. 1017.

FILIATIO NON POTEST PROBARI. Filiation cannot be proved. Co. Litt. 126a. But see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101.

FILIATION. In civil law. The descent of son or daughter, with regard to his or her father, mother, and their ancestors.

Nature always points out the mother by evident signs, and, whether married or not, she is always certain,—mater semper certa est, etiamsi vulgo conceperit. There is not the same certainty with regard to the father, and the relation may not know, or may feign ignorance as to the paternity. The law has therefore established a legal presumption to serve as a foundation for paternity and filiation.

When the mother is or has been married, her husband is presumed to be the father of the children born during the coverture, or within a competent time afterwards, whether they were conceived during the coverture or not,—pater is est quem nuptiae demonstrant.

——In the Common Law. The establishment of the paternity of a bastard.

FILICETUM. In old English law. A ferny or bracky ground; a place where fern grows. Co. Litt. 4b; Shep. Touch. 95.

FILIOLUS. In old records. A godson. Spelman.

FILIUS (Lat.) A son; a child.

As distinguished from heir, filius is a term of nature, haeres a term of law. 1 Powell, Dev. 311. In the civil law the term was used to denote a child generally. Calv. Lex.; Vicat. Its use in the phrase nullius filius would seem to indicate a use in the sense of legitimate son, a bastard being the legitimate son of nobody; though the word is usually rendered a son, whether legitimate or illegitimate. Vicat.

Filium cum definimus qui ex viro et uxore ejus nascitur, we define him to be a son who is born of a man and his wife. Dig. 1. 6. 6. Praesumitur quis esse filius eo quod nascitur ex uxore, one is presumed to be another's child because he is born of his wife. Bracton, fols. 6, 88. An alien may have a son, but no alien can have an heir. Id. See "Haeres."

A distinction was sometimes made, in the civil law, between filii and liberi; the latter word including grandchildren (nepotes), the former not. Inst. 1. 14. 5. But according to Paulus and Julianus, they were of equally extensive import. Dig. 50. 16. 84; Id. 50. 16. 201.

FILIUS EST NOMEN NATURAE, SED haeres nomen juris. Son is a name of nature, but heir a name of law. 1 Sid. 193; 1 Powell, Dev. 311.

FILIUS FAMILIAS (Lat.) A son who is under the control and power of his father. Story, Confl. Laws, § 61; Vicat.

FILIUS IN UTERO MATRIS EST PARS viscerum matris. A son in the mother's womb is part of the mother's vitals. 7 Coke, 8.

FILIUS MULIERATUS (Lat.) The first legitimate son born to a woman who has had a bastard son by her husband before her marriage. Called, also, mulier, and mulier puisne. 2 Bl. Comm. 248.

FILIUS NULLIUS (Lat. son of nobody). A bastard. Called, also, filius populi, son of the people. 1 Bl. Comm. 459; 6 Coke, 65a.

FILIUS POPULI (Lat.) A son of the people; a bastard.

FILUM (Lat.; Law Fr. fil, file, q. v.) In old practice. A thread, string, or wire used for passing through and connecting papers together; a file. Otherwise called filacium (Fr. filacer, q. v.) Spelman, voc. "Filacium."

A thread or line passing through a stream or road. See "Filum Aquae;" "Filum Viae." The English word "thread" has in ordinary speech this sense of running through; as in the expression "thread of a discourse or argument;" "to thread one's way," etc.

A line or mark, as the edge or border of a thing. Filum forestae, the edge of the forest. Manw. For. Laws, 371; 1 Crabb, Real Prop. 485. "To the very last filum of the plaintiff's lands." 5 Taunt. 133, arg. "Up to the extreme filum of the plaintiff's property." Id. 134, arg.

FILUM AQUAE (Lat. a thread of water). This may mean either the middle line or the outer line. Altum filum denotes high-water mark. Blount. Filum is, however, used almost universally in connection with aquae to denote the middle line of the stream. Medium filum is sometimes used with no additional meaning. See 4 Pick. (Mass.) 468; 24 Pick. (Mass.) 344; 3 Caines (N. Y.) 319; 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 579; 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 423; 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 404; 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 91; 4 Hill (N. Y.) 369; 4 Mason (U. S.) 397; 2 N. H. 369; 1 Halst. (N. J.) 1; 2 Conn. 481; 3 Rand. (Va.) 33; 8 Me. 253; 1 Ired. (N. C.) 535; Angell, Watercourses, § 11; 3 Dane, Abr. 4; Jacob; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 445. See "Ad Medium Filum Aquae."

FILUM FORESTAE (Lat.) The border of the forest. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 419; 4 Inst. 303; Manw. For. Law, "Purlieu."

FILUM VIAE (Lat.) The middle line of the way. 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 98.

FIN. An end, or limit; a limitation, or period of limitation.

Fin de non recevoir, a legal bar to the maintenance of a claim. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, tit. 12; Poth. Obl. p. 3, c. 8, art. 1.

FIN DE NON RECEVOIR. In French law. An exception or plea founded on law, which, without entering into the merits of the action, shows that the plaintiff has no right to bring it, either because the time during which it ought to have been brought has elapsed, which is called "prescription," or that there has been a compromise, accord and satisfaction, or any other cause which has destroyed the right of action which once subsisted. Poth. Proc. Civ. pt. 1, c. 2, § 2, art. 2; Story, Confl. Laws, § 580.

FINAL. In practice. As applied to hearings, orders, decisions, etc., that which terminates the action, as distinguished from "interlocutory."

——Final Decree. A decree which finally disposes of the whole question, so that nothing further is left for the court to adjudicate upon. See 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. (Perkins Ed.) 1199, note.

A decree which terminates all litigation on the same right. 1 Kent, Comm. 316.

A decree which disposes ultimately of the suit. Adams, Eq. 375. After such decree has been pronounced, the cause is at an end, and no further hearing can be had. Id. 388.

A decree which puts an end to the proceedings of the parties in that court. 44 Ala. 478; 95 N. C. 271.

A decree which so fixes the rights of the parties that it can be carried into effect without further inquiry thereon.

——Final Judgment. A judgment which puts an end to the action by declaring that the plaintiff has either entitled himself, or has not, to recover the remedy he sues for. 3 Bl. Comm. 398. A judgment which determines a particular cause, and terminates all litigation on the same right. 1 Kent, Comm. 316. A judgment which cannot be appealed from, but is perfectly conclusive as to the matter adjudicated upon. 24 Pick. (Mass.) 300; 2 Pet. (U. S.) 294; 6 How. (U. S.) 201, 209.

A determination of the rights of the parties to the particular suit, though not of all their rights with reference to the subject matter of the suit, is final. 1 Cal. 134.

To constitute a final judgment, the case must be finally disposed of as to all parties. 52 U. S. 22; 11 Or. 72; 1 Mo. App. 365.

——Final Process. Writs of execution; process issued for the execution of a final judgment. So called to distinguish them from "mesne process," which includes all process issuing before judgment rendered.

——Final Sentence. That pronounced on the conclusion of the case, as distinguished from the interlocutory sentences rendered during its progress.

FINALIS CONCORDIA (Lat.) A decisive agreement; a fine; a final agreement.

A final agreement entered by the parties by permission of court in a suit actually brought for lands. Subsequently the bringing suit, entry of agreement, etc., became merely formal, but its entry upon record gave a firm title to the plaintiff. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 70; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 143; 2 Flintoff, Real Prop. 673; White & T. Lead. Cas. 689.

Finis est amicabilis compositio et finalis concordia ex consensu et concordia domini regis vel justiciarum, a fine is an amicable settlement and decisive agreement by consent and agreement of our lord the king or his justices. Glanv. lib. 8, c. 1.

Talis concordia finalis dicitur eo quod finem imposuit negotio, adeo ut neutra pars litigantium ab eo de cetero poterit recidere, such concord is called final because it puts an end to the business, so that neither of the litigants can afterwards recede from it. Glanv. lib. 9, c. 3; Cunningham.

FINANCES. The public revenue or resources of a government or state; the income or means of an individual or corporation. It is somewhat like the fiscus of the Romans. The word is generally used in the plural.

Money resources generally. The state of the finances of an individual or corporation, being his condition in a monetary point of view. The cash he has on hand, and that which he expects to receive, as compared with the engagements he has made to pay.

FINANCIER, or FINANCIAN. One who manages the finances or public revenue; persons skilled in matters appertaining to the judicious management of money affairs.

FINDER. One who lawfully comes to the possession of another's personal property, which was then lost.

FINDING. The result of the deliberations of a jury or a court. 1 Day (Conn.) 238; 2 Day (Conn.) 12.

The "findings of fact" of a judge, on which his decision is based.

FINE. In conveyancing. An amicable composition or agreement of a suit, either actual or fictitious, by leave of the court, by which the lands in question become, or are acknowledged to be, the right of one of the parties. Co. Litt. 120; 2 Bl. Comm. 349; Bac. Abr. "Fines and Recoveries."

A fine is so called because it puts an end not only to the suit thus commenced, but also to all other suits and controversies concerning the same matter. Such concords, says Doddridge (Eng. Lawy. 84, 85), have been in use in the civil law, and are called transactions, whereof they say thus: Transactiones sunt de eis quae in controversia sunt, a lite futura aut pendente ad certam compositionem reducuntur, dando aliquid vel accipiendo. Or, shorter, thus: Transactio est de re dubia et lite ancipite ne dum ad finem ducta, non gratuita pactio. It is commonly defined an assurance by matter of record, and is founded upon a supposed previously existing right, and upon a writ requiring the party to perform his covenant; although a fine may be levied upon any writ by which lands may be demanded, charged, or bound. It has also been defined an acknowledgment on record of a previous gift or feoffment, and prima facie carries a fee, although it may be limited to an estate for life or in fee tail. Prest. Conv. 200, 202, 268, 269; 2 Bl. Comm. 348, 349.

——In Criminal Law. Pecuniary punishment imposed by a lawful tribunal upon a person convicted of crime or misdemeanor. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 940; 4 Steph. Comm. 444. See "Amercement."

——In Feudal Law. Money exacted by the superior lord upon any change in the tenure, as upon alienation, endowment, etc. 2 Bl. Comm. 71, 135.

FINE AND RECOVERY ACT. St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74. This act abolished fines and recoveries. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 364, note; 1 Steph. Comm. 514.

FINE ANNULLANDO LEVATO DE TENemento quod fuit de antiquo dominico. An abolished writ for disannulling a fine levied of lands in ancient demesne, to the prejudice of the lord. Reg. Orig. 15.

FINE FOR ALIENATION. A sum of money which a tenant by knight's service, or a tenant in capite by socage tenure, paid to his lord for permission to alienate his right in the estate he held to another, and by that means to substitute a new tenant for himself. 2 Bl. Comm. 71, 89. These fines are now abolished. In France, a similar demand from the tenant, made by the lord when the former alienated his estate, was called lods et vente. This imposition was abolished, with nearly every other feudal right, by the French Revolution.

FINE FOR ENDOWMENT. An old English law, grounded on the feudal exactions that a woman could not be endowed without a fine paid to the lord of the tenement. Abolished by Henry I., and afterwards by Magna Charta (chapter 7). 2 Bl. Comm. 135.

FINE FORCE. An absolute necessity or inevitable constraint. Old Nat. Brev. 78; Plowd. 94; 6 Coke, 11; Cowell.

FINE SUR COGNIZANCE DE DROIT come ceo que il ad de son done. A fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee as that which he hath of the gift of the cognizor. By this the deforciant acknowledges in court a former feoffment or gift in possession to have been made by him to the plaintiff. 2 Bl. Comm. 352; Cunningham; Shep. Touch. c. 2; Comyn, Dig. "Fine."

FINE SUR COGNIZANCE DE DROIT tantum. A fine upon acknowledgment of the right merely. Generally used to pass a reversionary interest which is in the cognizor. 2 Bl. Comm. 351; Jacob; Comyn, Dig.

FINE SUR CONCESSIT. A fine granted where the cognizor, in order to make an end of disputes, though he acknowledges no precedent right, yet grants to the cognizee an estate de novo, usually for life or years, by way of a supposed composition. 2 Bl. Comm. 353; Shep. Touch. c. 2.

FINE SUR DONE GRANT ET RENDER. A double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, and the fine sur concessit. It may be used to convey particular limitations of estates, and to persons who are strangers or not named in the writ of covenant; whereas the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., conveys nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance, or at least freehold. Salk. 340. In this last species of fines, the cognizee, after the right is acknowledged to be in him, grants back again, or renders to the cognizor, or perhaps to a stranger, some other estate in the premises. 2 Bl. Comm. 353; Viner, Abr. "Fine;" Comyn, Dig. "Fine;" 1 Washb. Real Prop. 33.

FINEM FACERE (Lat.) To make or pay a fine. Bracton, 106; Skene de Verb. Sign.

FINES LE ROY. In old English law. A sum of money which any one is to pay the king for any contempt or offense; which fine any one that commits any trespass, or is convict that he falsely denies his own deed, or did anything in contempt of the law, shall pay to the king. Termes de la Ley; Cunningham.

FINIRE. In old English law. To fine, or pay a fine. Rog. Hov., cited in Cowell. To end or finish a matter.

FINIS EST AMICABILIS COMPOSITIO et finalis concordia ex consensu et concordia domini regis vel justicarium. A fine is an amicable settlement and decisive agreement by consent and agreement of our lord, the king, or his justices. Glanv. lib. 8, c. 1.

FINIS FINEM LITIBUS IMPONIT. A fine puts an end to litigation. 3 Inst. 78.

FINIS REI ATTENDENDUS EST. The end of a thing is to be attended to. 3 Inst. 51.

FINIS UNIUS DIEI EST PRINCIPIUM alterius. The end of one day is the beginning of another. 2 Bulst. 305.

FINITIO. In old records. An ending or finishing; death, as the end of life (quia vita finitur morte). Cowell; Holthouse.

FINIUM REGUNDORUM ACTIO. In civil law. An action for regulating boundaries. 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 271.

FINORS. Refiners of gold and silver.

FIRDFARE (Saxon). See "Firdnite."

FIRDIRINGA (Saxon). A preparation to go into the army. Leg. Hen. 1.

FIRDNITE, or FIRDWITE (Saxon). A mulct or penalty imposed on military tenants for their default in not appearing in arms, or coming to an expedition; a penalty imposed for murder committed in the army. Cowell.

FIRDSOCNE (Saxon). Exemption from military service. Spelman.

FIRE AND SWORD. Letters of fire and sword were the ancient means for dispossessing a tenant who retained possession contrary to the order of the judge and diligence of the law. They were directed to the sheriff, and ordered him to call the assistance of the county to dispossess the tenant. Bell, Dict.; Ersk. Inst. lib. 4, tit. 3, § 17.

FIRE INSURANCE. A contract of insurance by which the insurer agrees to indemnify the insured for injury by fire to goods named in the contract. See "Insurance."

FIRE ORDEAL. See "Ordeal."

FIRE POLICY. A policy of fire insurance. See "Fire Insurance."

FIREBARE. A beacon or high tower by the seaside, wherein are continual lights, either to direct sailors in the night, or to give warning of the approach of an enemy. Cowell.

FIREBOTE. An allowance of wood or estoves to maintain competent firing for the tenant. A sufficient allowance of wood to burn in a house. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 99. Tenant for life or years is entitled to it. 2 Bl. Comm. 35. Cutting more than is needed for present use is waste. 3 Dane, Abr. 238; 8 Pick. (Mass.) 312-315; Cro. Eliz. 593; 7 Bing. 640. The rules in England and in this country are different in relation to the kind of trees which the tenant may cut. 11 Metc. (Mass.) 504; 7 Pick. (Mass.) 152; 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 227; 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 9; 2 Zab. (N. J.) 521; 2 Ohio St. 180; 13 Pa. St. 438; 3 Leon. 16.

FIRKIN. A measure of capacity, equal to nine gallons. The word "firkin" is also used to designate a weight, used for butter and cheese, of fifty-six pounds avoirdupois.

FIRLOT. A Scotch measure of capacity, containing two gallons and a pint. Spelman.

FIRM. The persons composing a partnership, taken collectively.

The name or title under which the members of a partnership transact business.

The word is used as synonymous with "partnership." The words "house," "concern," and "company" are also used in the same sense. This name is, in point of law, conventional, and applicable only to the persons who, on each particular occasion when the name is used, are members of the firm. A firm is usually described, in legal proceedings, as certain persons trading or carrying on business under and using the name, style, and firm of, etc. See 9 Q. B. 361; 9 Mees. & W. 347; 1 Chit. Bailm. 49.

FIRMA (Law Lat.) A farm or rent reserved on letting lands, anciently frequently reserved in provisions. Spelman; Cunningham.

A banquet; supper; provisions for the table. Du Cange.

A tribute or custom paid towards entertaining the king for one night. Domesday Book; Cowell.

A rent reserved to be paid in money, called then alba firma, white rents, money rents. Spelman.

A lease; a letting. Ad firmam tradidi. I have farm let. Spelman.

A messuage with the house, garden, or lands, etc., connected therewith. Co. Litt. 5a; Shep. Touch. 93. See "Farm."

FIRMA FEODI (Law Lat.) Fee farm. See "Feodi Firma."

FIRMAN. A passport granted by the great mogul to captains of foreign vessels to trade within the territories over which he has jurisdiction; a permit.

FIRMARATIO. The right of a tenant to his lands and tenements. Cowell.

FIRMARIUM. In old records. A place in monasteries, and elsewhere, where the poor were received and supplied with food. Spelman. Hence the word "infirmary."

FIRMARIUS (Law Lat.) A fermor; a lessee of a term. Firmarii comprehend all such as hold by lease for life or lives or for year, by deed or without deed. 2 Inst. 144, 145; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 107; 8 Pick. (Mass.) 312-315; 7 Adol. & E. 637.

FIRMATIO. In forest law. Doe season. Cowell.

FIRME. In old records. A farm.

FIRMIOR ET POTENTIOR EST OPERATIO legis quam dispositio hominis. The operation of law is firmer and more powerful than the will of man. Co. Litt. 102.

FIRMITAS. In old English law. An assurance of some privilege, by deed or charter.

FIRMURA. In old English law. Liberty to scour and repair a mill dam, and carry away the soil, etc. Blount.

FIRST CLASS MISDEMEANANT. In English law, one convicted of misdemeanor who is designated by the judge to be treated with special favor. Such designation is in the discretion of the judge. 28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, § 67.

FIRST FRUITS. The first year's whole profits of the spiritual preferments. There were three valuations (valor beneficium) at different times, according to which these first fruits were estimated, made in 1253, 1288, and 1318. A final valuation was made by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 3.

They now form a perpetual fund, called "Queen Anne's Bounty," the income of which is used for the augmentation of poor livings. 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 284, and notes; 2 Burn. Ecc. Law, 260.

FIRST IMPRESSION. First examination; first presentation to a court for examination or decision. A cause which presents a new question for the first time, and for which, consequently, there is no precedent, is said to be a case of the first impression.

FIRST PURCHASER. In the English law of descent, the first purchaser was he who first acquired an estate in a family which still owns it. A purchase of this kind signifies any mode of acquiring an estate, except by descent. 2 Bl. Comm. 220.

FISC. In civil law. The treasury of a prince; the public treasury. 1 Low. (U. S.) 361.

Hence, to confiscate a thing is to appropriate it to the fisc. Paillet, Dr. Pub. 21, note, says that fiscus, in the Roman law, signified the treasure of the prince, and aerarium the treasure of the state. But this distinction was not observed in France.

FISCAL. Belonging to the fisc, or public treasury.

FISCAL JUDGE (Law Lat. judex fiscalis). An officer named in the laws of the barbarous nations of Europe; the same with the grafio, graf, greve, or greeve. Spelman, voc. "Grafio." Called fiscla, because charged with the collection of public moneys, either directly, or by the imposition of fines. Id. In the Ripaurian law, he is said to be the same with the comes or count. L. Ripaur. tit. 35; Montesq. Esp. des Lois, liv. 30, c. 18.

FISCUS.

——In Roman Law. The treasury of the prince or emperor, as distinguished from "aerarium," which was the treasury of the state. Spelman; Plin. Pand. 36; Tacit. vi. 2; Calv. Lex.

The treasury or property of the state, as distinguished from the private property of the sovereign. Dig. 49. 14; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, 149, § 144.

——In English Law. The king's treasury, as the repository of forfeited property. Bracton, fol. 150.

The treasury of a noble, or of any private person. Spelman.

The use of the word in the sense of a treasury is derived from its primary meaning, a wicker basket or hamper in which money was kept by the Romans. Burrill.

FISH. An animal which inhabits the water, breathes by means of gills, swims by the aid of fins, and is oviparous.

Fishes in rivers and in the sea are considered as animals ferae naturae; consequently, no one has any property in them until they have been captured, and, like other wild animals, if, having been taken, they escape and regain their liberty, the captor loses his property in them.

FISH ROYAL. A whale, porpoise, or sturgeon thrown ashore on the coast of England belonged to the king as a branch of his prerogative. Hence these fish are termed "royal fish." Hale, de Jur. Mar. pt. 1, c. 7; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 290; Plowd. 305; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 3.

FISHERY. A place prepared for catching fish with nets or hooks. This is commonly applied to the place of drawing a seine or net. 1 Whart. (Pa.) 131, 132.

A right or liberty of taking fish: a species of incorporeal hereditament, anciently termed "piscary," of which there are several kinds. 2 Bl. Comm. 34, 39; 3 Kent, Comm. 409-418; Angell, Watercourses, § 61 et seq.; Angell, Tide Waters, p. 124, c. 5.

A common of fishery is not an exclusive right, but one enjoyed in common with certain other persons. 3 Kent, Comm. 329.

A free fishery is said to be a franchise in the hands of a subject, existing by grant or prescription, distinct from an ownership in the soil. It is an exclusive right, and applies to a public navigable river, without any right in the soil. 3 Kent, Comm. 329.

A several fishery is one by which the party claiming it has the right of fishing, independently of all others, so that no person can have a coextensive right with him in the object claimed; but a partial and independent right in another, or a limited liberty, does not derogate from the right of the owner. 5 Burrows, 2814.

A distinction has been made between a common fishery (commune piscarium), which may mean for all mankind, as in the sea, and a common of fishery (communium piscariae), which is a right, in common with certain other persons, in a particular stream. 8 Taunt. 183. Mr. Angell seems to think that "common of fishery" and "free fishery" are convertible terms. Angell, Watercourses, c. 6, §§ 3, 4.

Mr. Woolrych says that sometimes a free fishery is confounded with a several, sometimes it is said to be synonymous with common, and again it is treated as distinct from either. Woolr. Waters, 97.

A several fishery, as its name imports, is an exclusive property. This, however, is not to be understood as depriving the territorial owner of his right to a several fishery when he grants to another person permission to fish; for he would continue to be the several proprietor, although he should suffer a stranger to hold a coextensive right with himself. Woolr. Waters, 96.

These distinctions in relation to several, free, and common of fishery are not strongly marked, and the lines are sometimes scarcely perceptible. "Instead of going into the black-letter books to learn what was a fishery, and a free fishery, and a several fishery," says Huston, J., "I am disposed to regard our own acts, even though differing from old feudal law." 1 Whart. (Pa.) 132.

FISHGARTH. A dam or wear in a river for taking fish. Cowell.

FISK. In Scotch law. The revenue of the crown. Generally used of the personal estate of a rebel, which has been forfeited to the crown. Bell, Dict.

FISTUCA, or FESTUCA (Lat.) The rod which was transferred, in one of the ancient methods of feoffment, to denote a transfer of the property in land. Called, otherwise, baculum, virga, fustis. Spelman.

FISTULA. In the civil law. A pipe for conveying water. Dig. 8. 2. 18.

FIVE-MILE ACT. An act of parliament, passed in 1665, against nonconformists, whereby ministers of that body were prohibited from coming within five miles of any corporate town or place where they had preached or lectured. Brown.

FIXING BAIL. In practice. Rendering absolute the liability of special bail.

The bail are fixed upon the issue of a ca. sa. (capias ad satisfaciendum) against the defendant (2 Nott & McC. [S. C.] 569; 16 Johns. [N. Y.] 117; 3 Har. [N. J.] 9; 11 Tex. 15), and a return of non est thereto by the sheriff (4 Day [Conn.] 1; 2 Bailey [S. C.] 492; 3 Rich. [S. C.] 145; 1 Vt. 276; 7 Leigh [Va.] 371), made on the return day (2 Metc. [Mass.] 590; 1 Rich. [S. C.] 421), unless the defendant be surrendered within the time allowed ex gratia by the practice of the court (3 Conn. 316; 9 Serg. & R. [Pa.] 24; 2 Johns. [N. Y.] 101; 9 Johns. [N. Y.] 84; 1 Dev. [N. C.] 91; 11 Gill & J. [Md.] 92; 2 Hill [N. Y.] 216; 8 Cal. 552; 17 Ga. 88).

In New Hampshire (1 N. H. 472) and Massachusetts (2 Mass. 485) bail are not fixed till judgment on a sci. fa. is obtained against them, except by the death of the defendant after a return of non est to an execution against him.

The death of the defendant after a return of non est by the sheriff prevents a surrender and fixes the bail inevitably. 5 Bin. (Pa.) 332; 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 407; 3 McCord (S. C.) 49; 4 Pick. (Mass.) 120; 4 N. H. 29; 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 604. See 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 224; 1 Ohio, 35; 2 Ga. 331.

In Georgia and North Carolina, bail are not fixed till judgment is obtained against them. 3 Dev. (N. C.) 155; 2 Ga. 331.

FIXTURES. The word "fixtures" is used with three distinct meanings:

(1) Chattels affixed to the realty, without regard to the right to remove them.

(2) An article which was a chattel, but which, by being permanently annexed to the soil, becomes a part of the realty, and cannot be removed without the consent of the owner of the freehold. 40 N. Y. 287.

(3) Personal chattels affixed to real estate, which may be severed and removed by the party who has affixed them, or by his personal representative, against the will of the owner of the freehold. 8 Iowa, 544; Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 544, note 1.

FLACO. A place covered with standing water.

FLAG. A symbol of nationality carried by soldiers, ships, etc., and used in many places where such a symbol is necessary or proper.

For the law upon the subject of nationality of a cargo as determined by the flag, see 5 East, 398; 9 East, 283; 3 Bos. & P. 201; 1 C. Rob. Adm. 1; 5 C. Rob. Adm. 16; 1 Dods. Adm. 81, 131; 9 Cranch (U. S.) 388; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 114, 118, note, 129.

FLAG, DUTY OF THE. Saluting the British flag, by striking the flag, and lowering the topsails of a vessel, exacted as a tribute to the sovereignty of England over the British seas.

FLAGELLAT. Whipped; scourged. An entry on old Scotch records. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 7.

FLAGRANS. Burning; raging; in actual perpetration. Flagrans bellum, a war actually going on. Flagrans crimen, a crime in the act of perpetration, or just perpetrated.

FLAGRANS CRIMEN. In Roman law. A term denoting that a crime is being or has just been committed. For example, when a crime has just been committed, and the corpus delictum is publicly exposed, or if a mob take place, or if a house be feloniously burned, these are severally flagrans crimen.

The term used in France is flagrant delit. The Code of Criminal Instruction gives the following concise definition of it (article 41): "Le delit qui se commet actuellement ou qui vient de se commettre, est un flagrant delit."

FLAGRANT NECESSITY. A case of urgency rendering lawful an otherwise illegal act, as an assault to remove a man from impending danger.

FLAGRANTE BELLO. During an actual state of war.

FLAGRANTI DELICTO (Lat.) In the very act of committing the crime. 4 Bl. Comm. 307.

FLAVIANUM JUS (Lat.) A treatise on civil law, which takes its name from its author, Cneius Flavius. It contains forms of actions. Vicat.

FLECTA. A feathered or fleet arrow. Cowell.

FLEDWITE. A discharge or freedom from amercements where one having been an outlawed fugitive cometh to the place of our lord of his own accord. Termes de la Ley.

The liberty to hold court and take up the amercements for beating and striking. Cowell.

The fine set on a fugitive as the price of obtaining the king's freedom. Spelman.

FLEE FROM JUSTICE. See "Fugitive from Justice."

FLEE TO THE WALL. A figurative expression used in the criminal law to express the duty of one assailed by violence to retreat as far as he safely may before making violent resistance. It probably originated from the language of Blackstone, who says: "The party assaulted must flee as far as he conveniently can, either by reason of some wall, ditch, or other impediment, or as far as the fierceness of the assault will permit him." 4 Bl. Comm. 185.

FLEET. A place of running water where the tide or float comes up.

A prison in London, so called from a river or ditch which was formerly there, on the side of which it stood.

FLEM. In Saxon and old English law. A fugitive bondman or villein. Spelman.

The privilege of having the goods and fines of fugitives. Id.

FLEMENE FRIT, FLEMENES FRINTHE, or flymena frynthe. The reception or relief of a fugitive or outlaw. Jacob.

FLEMESWITE. The possession of the goods of fugitives. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 147.

FLET. House; home. Cowell.

FLETA. The title of an ancient law book, supposed to have been written by a judge while confined in the Fleet prison.

It is written in Latin, and is divided into six books. The author lived in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III. See liber 2, c. 66, § Item quod nullus; liber 1, c. 20, § Qui coeperunt; 10 Coke, pref. Edward II. was crowned A. D. 1306. Edward III. was crowned 1326, and reigned till A. D. 1377. During this period the English law was greatly improved, and the lawyers and judges were very learned. Hale, Hist. Com. Law, 173. Blackstone (4 Comm. 427) says of this work "that it was for the most part law until the alteration of tenures took place." The same remark he applies to Britton and Hingham.

FLICHWITE. In Saxon law. A fine on account of brawls and quarrels. Spelman.

FLIGHT. In criminal law. The evading the course of justice by a man's voluntarily withdrawing himself. 4 Bl. Comm. 387. See "Fugitive from Justice."

FLOAT. A certificate authorizing the party possessing it to enter a certain amount of land. 20 How. (U. S.) 504. See 2 Washb. Real Prop.

FLOATABLE. A stream capable of floating logs, etc., is said to be floatable. 2 Mich. 519.

FLOATING DEBT. Those claims against a municipality for the payment of which there is no money in the corporate treasury specifically designated, nor any taxation or other means to pay particularly provided. 71 N. Y. 371-374.

FLODEMARK. High-tide mark. Blount. The mark which the sea at flowing water and highest tide makes upon the shore. And. 189; Cunningham.

FLORENTINE PANDECTS. A copy of the Pandects discovered accidentally about the year 1137, at Amalphi, a town in Italy, near Salerno. From Amalphi, the copy found its way to Pisa, and, Pisa having submitted to the Florentines in 1406, the copy was removed in great triumph to Florence. By direction of the magistrates of the town, it was immediately bound in a superb manner, and deposited in a costly chest. Formerly, these Pandects were shown only by torch light, in the presence of two magistrates, and two Cistercian monks, with their heads uncovered. They have been successively collated by Politian, Bolognini, and Antonius Augustinus. An exact copy of them was published in 1553 by Franciscus Taurellus. For its accuracy and beauty, this edition ranks high among the ornaments of the press. Brenchman, who collated the manuscript about 1710, refers it to the sixth century. Butler, Hor. Jur. 90, 91.

FLORIN. A coin, originally made at Florence. Called, also, "gulder."

FLOTAGES. Things which float by accident on the sea or great rivers. Blount.
The commissions of water bailiffs. Cunningham.

FLOTSAM, or FLOTSAN. A name for the goods which float upon the sea when cast overboard for the safety of the ship, or when a ship is sunk. Distinguished from "jetsam" and "ligan." Bracton, lib. 2, c. 5; 5 Coke, 106; Comyn, Dig. "Wreck" (A); Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty" (B); 1 Bl. Comm. 292.

FLOUD MARKE. Flodemark (q. v.)

FLUMEN (Law Lat.) In civil law. The name of a servitude which consists in the right of turning the rain water, gathered in a spout, on another's land. Ersk. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 9, note 9; Vicat. See "Stillicidium."

FLUMINA ET PORTUS PUBLICA SUNT; ideoque jus piscandi omnibus commune est. Rivers and ports are public; therefore the right of fishing there is common to all. Dav. Ir. K. B. 55; Branch, Princ.

FLUVIUS (Lat.) In old English law. A river. Fluvii regales, royal streams. Public rivers for public passage (Fr. haut stremes le roy). So called, not in reference to the propriety of the river, but to the public use; all things of public safety and convenience being, in a special manner, under the king's care, supervision, and protection. Hale, de Jur. Mar. par. 1, c. 2.
Flood or flood tide. Fleta. lib. 6, c. 8, § 2.

FLUXUS. In old English law. Flow. Per fluxum et refluxum maris, by the flow and reflow of the sea. Dal. pl. 10.

FLYMA (Saxon). A fugitive or outlaw. Spelman.

FLYMAN FRYMTH. In old English law. The offense of harboring a fugitive, the penalty attached to which was one of the rights of the crown. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FOCAGE. House bote; fire bote. Cowell.

FOCALE (Law Lat.) In old English law. Firewood; the right of taking wood for the fire; fire bote. Cunningham.

FODERUM (Law Lat.) Food for horses or other cattle. Cowell.
——In Feudal Law. Fodder and supplies provided as a part of the king's prerogative for use in his wars or other expeditions. Cowell.

FODINA. A mine. Co. Litt. 6a.

FOEDUS (Lat.) A league; a compact.

FOEMINA VIRO CO-OPERTA. A feme covert.

FOEMINAE AB OMNIBUS OFFICIIS Civilibus vel publicis remotae sunt. Women are excluded from all civil and public charges or offices. Dig. 50. 17. 2; 1 Exch. 645; 6 Mees. & W. 216.

FOEMINAE NON SUNT CAPACES DE publicis officiis. Women are not admissible to public offices (Jenk. Cent. Cas. 237); but a woman may be elected to the office of sexton (7 Mod. 263; Strange, 1114), or governor of a workhouse, and act by deputy (2 Ld. Raym. 1014), or an overseer (2 Term R. 395). See "Women."

FOENERATION. The act of putting out money at interest.

FOENUS NAUTICUS (Lat.) The name given to marine interest. The amount of such interest is not limited by law, because the lender runs so great a risk of losing his principal. Ersk. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 4, note 76. See "Marine Interest."

FOETICIDE. In medical jurisprudence. The act of criminal abortion. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 288; Guy, Med. Jur. 133.

FOETURA (Law Lat.) In civil law. The produce of animals, and the fruit of other property, which are acquired to the owner of such animals and property by virtue of his right. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law. c. 14. p. 81

FOETUS (Lat.) In medical jurisprudence. An unborn child; an infant in ventre sa mere.

FOGAGIUM. In old English law. Fogage or fog; a kind of rank grass of late growth, and not eaten in summer. Spelman; Cowell. Distinguished from "hay."

FOI. In French feudal law. Faith; fealty. Guyot, Inst. Feud. c. 2.

FOINESUN. In old English law. The fawning or fawning time of deer. Spelman.

FOIRFAULT. In old Scotch law. To forfeit. 1 How. St. Tr. 927.

FOIRTHOCHT. In old Scotch law. Forethought; premeditated. 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 90.

FOITERERS. Vagrants.

FOLC LAND (Saxon). Land of the people Spelman. Said by Blackstone to be land held by no assurance in writing, but to have been distributed amongst the common people at the pleasure of the lord, and resumable at his discretion. 2 Bl. Comm. 90; Cowell.
It was probably, however, land which belonged to the community, and which, being parcelled out for a term to people of all conditions, reverted again to the commons at the expiration of the term. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 8; Wharton.

FOLC MOTE; FOLK MOTE, or FOLC GEmote (Saxon, from folc, people, and mote, or gemote, meeting). In Saxon law. A meeting of the people; a general assembly of the people, to consider and order matters of the commonwealth. Somner; Spelman, voc. "Gemotum." Any popular or public meeting of all the folk or people of a place or district. Brande. See "Gemot."

The term was used to denote a court or judicial tribunal among the Saxons, which possessed substantially the powers afterwards exercised by the county courts and sheriff's tourn. These powers embraced the settlement of small claims, taking the oath of allegiance, preserving the laws, and making the necessary arrangements for the preservation of safety, peace, and the public weal. It appears that complaints were to be made before the folk gemote held in London annually, of any mismanagement by the mayor and aldermen of that city. It was called, also, a "burg gemote" when held in a burgh, and "shire gemote" when held for a county. See Manw. For. Laws; Spelman; De Brady; Cunningham.

A county court; an assembly of the people or freeholders of a county (conventus comitatus). Otherwise called the "shire mote." Spelman.

A city court; an assembly of the inhabitants of a city or borough (conventus civitatis sea burgi). Otherwise called the "burg mote." Spelman. The folc mote or city court of London is mentioned in ancient records. Id.; Crabb, Hist. Eng. Law, 141. The term seems to have been generally applied to all courts that were adapted to the convenience of the people within any district. Id. 26. See Cowell.

FOLC RIGHT. The common right of all the people. 1 Bl. Comm. 65, 67.

FOLD-COURSE. In English law. Land used as a sheep walk.

Land to which the sole right of folding the cattle of others is appurtenant. Sometimes it means merely such right of folding. The right of folding on another's land, which is called "common foldage." Co. Litt. 6a, note 1; W. Jones, 375; Cro. Car. 432; 2 Vent. 139.

FOLDAGE. A privilege possessed in some places by the lord of a manor, which consists in the right of having his tenant's sheep to feed on his fields, so as to manure the land.

The name of "foldage" is also given in parts of Norfolk to the customary fee paid to the lord for exemption at certain times from this duty. Elton, Commons, 45, 46.

FOLGARII. Menial servants; followers. Bracton.

FOLGERE. In old English law. A freeman, who has no house or dwelling of his own, but is the follower or retainer of another (heorthfoest), for whom he performs certain predial services. Anc. Inst. Eng.

FOLGOTH. Official dignity.

FOLIO. A leaf. The references to the writings of the older law authors are usually made by citing the folio, as it was the ancient custom to number the folio instead of the page, as is done in modern books.

A certain number of words specified by statute as a folio. Wharton. Originating, undoubtedly, in some estimate of the number of words which a folio ought to contain.

FONSADERA. In Spanish law. Any tribute or loan granted to the king for the purpose of enabling him to defray the expenses of a war.

FONTANA. A fountain or spring. Bracton, fol. 233.

FOOT. A measure of length, containing one-third of a yard, or twelve inches. Figuratively, it signifies the conclusion, the end; as, the foot of the fine, the foot of the account.

FOOT OF THE FINE. The fifth part of the conclusion of a fine. It includes the whole matter, reciting the names of the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied. 2 Bl. Comm. 351.

FOOTGELD. An amercement for not cutting out the ball or cutting off the claws of a dog's feet (expeditating him). To be quit of footgeld is to have the privilege of keeping dogs in the forest unlawed without punishment or control. Manw. For. Laws, pt. 1, p. 86; Cromp. Jur. 197; Termes de la Ley; Cunningham.

FOR. In French law. A tribunal. Le for interieur, the interior forum; the tribunal of conscience. Poth. Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, § 1, art. 3, § 4.

FOR A TURN. See "Gambling Contract."

FOR THAT, or FOR THAT WHEREAS. Words used in introduction in a declaration. "For that whereas" introduces recitals, "For that," positive allegations. Hammond, N. P. 9.

FORANEUS. One from without; a foreigner; a stranger. Calv. Lex.

FORATHE. One who can take oath for another who is accused of one of the lesser crimes. Manw. For. Laws, p. 3; Cowell.

FORBALCA. In old records. A forebalk; a balk (that is, an unplowed piece of land) lying forward or next the highway. Cowell.

FORBANER. To deprive forever; to shut out. 9 Rich. II. c. 2; 6 Hen. VI. c. 4; Cowell.

FORBARRER (Law Fr.) To bar out; to prevent or preclude; to estop. Cowell.

FORBATUDUS. In old English law. The aggressor slain in combat. Jacob.

FORBEARANCE. A delay in enforcing rights; the act by which a creditor waits for the payment of a debt due him by the debtor after it has become due. It is sufficient consideration to support assumpsit.

FORCE. Restraining power; validity; binding effect.

A law may be said to be in force when it is not repealed, or, more loosely, when it can be carried into practical effect. An agreement is in force when the parties to it may be compelled to act, or are acting, under its terms and stipulations.

Strength applied; active power; power put in motion.

Actual force is where strength is actually applied, or the means of applying it are at hand.

The display of power to injure sufficient to put in bodily fear is force. 5 Blatchf. (U. S.) 18; 2 Whart. Crim. Law, 1698.

Implied force is that which is implied by law from the commission of an unlawful act. Every trespass quare clausum fregit is committed with implied force. 1 Salk. 641; Co. Litt. 57b, 161b, 162a; 1 Saund. 81, 140, note 4; 5 Term R. 361; 8 Term R. 78, 358; Bac. Abr. "Trespass;" 3 Wils. 18; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 890; 6 East, 387; 5 Bos. & P. 365, 454.

Mere nonfeasance cannot be considered as force, generally. 2 Saund. 47; Co. Litt. 161; Bouv. Inst. Index.

FORCE AND ARMS. A phrase used in declarations of trespass and in indictments, but now necessary in declarations, to denote that the act complained of was done with violence. 2 Chit. Pl. 846, 850.

FORCED HEIRS. In Louisiana. Those persons whom the testator or donor cannot deprive of the portion of his estate reserved for them by law, except in cases where he has a just cause to disinherit them. Civ. Code La. art. 1482. As to the portion of the estate they are entitled to, see "Legitim." As to the causes for which forced heirs may be deprived of this right, see "Disinherison."

FORCED SALE. A sale under process of law, and against the consent of the owner. It does not embrace a sale under a power in a mortgage. 15 Fla. 336.

FORCHEAPUM. Pre-emption. Blount.

FORCIBLE ENTRY OR DETAINER. A forcible entry or detainer consists in violently taking or keeping possession of lands or tenements, by means of threats, force, or arms, and without authority of law. Comyn, Dig.; Gabbett, Crim. Law; 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 198; 4 Cush. (Mass.) 141.

Though generally referred to in the conjunctive, forcible entry and forcible detainer are distinct acts. 31 Cal. 122.

To authorize either a criminal prosecution or an action of forcible entry and detainer at common law, both entry and detainer must be forcible (93 Ind. 211); but a forcible entry will relate back to the entry, if that was unlawful, though peaceable; otherwise, if the entry was lawful (45 Cal. 597).

——In Modern Usage. The possessory action of forcible entry and detainer has been extended by statute to certain cases of constructive force, as where a tenant holds over after his term.

FORDA. In old records. A ford or shallow, made by damming or penning up the water. Cowell.

FORDAL (Saxon). A butt or headband; a piece.

FORDANNO. In old European law. He who first assaulted another. Spelman.

FORDIKA. In old records. Grass or herbage growing on the edge or bank of dykes or ditches. Cowell.

FORE (Saxon). Before. (Fr.) Out. Kelham.

FORECLOSURE. To shut out; to bar. Used of the process of destroying an equity of redemption. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 589; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1204; Coote, Mortg. 511; 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 382.

A proceeding in chancery by which the mortgagor's right of redemption of the mortgaged premises is barred or closed forever.

In the more comprehensive sense which modern usage requires, any proceeding by which mortgaged property is applied to the payment of the mortgage debt, and the equity of the mortgagor therein barred.

As so defined, foreclosure is divided into:

(1) Strict foreclosure, being foreclosure by a proceeding in chancery, by which the equity of redemption is barred within a certain time, and the title of the mortgagee becomes absolute.

(2) By entry, by the act of the mortgagee taking possession either by his own peaceable act, or under writ of entry.

(3) By sale, being by an action for the judicial sale of the mortgaged property, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the mortgage debt. Sometimes called "foreclosure by action."

(4) By advertisement, being a sale under a power of sale in the mortgage, notice thereof being given by advertisement. Sometimes called "foreclosure under power of sale."

The two first-named varieties are practically unused in the United States, though they exist in a few states.

FOREFAULT. In Scotch law. To forfeit; to lose.

FOREGIFT. A premium for a lease.

FOREGOERS. Royal purveyors. 26 Edw. III. c. 5.

FOREHAND RENT. In English law. A species of rent which is a premium given by the tenant at the time of taking the lease, as on the renewal of leases by ecclesiastical corporations, which is considered in the nature of an improved rent. 1 Term R. 486; 3 Term R. 461; 3 Atk. 473; Crabb, Real Prop. § 155.

FOREIGN. That which belongs to another country; that which is strange. 1 Pet. (U. S.) 343.

Every nation is foreign to all the rest; and the several states of the American Union are foreign to each other with respect to their municipal laws. 2 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 282; 4 Conn. 517; 6 Conn. 480; 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 411; 1 Dall. (Pa.) 458, 463; 6 Bin. (Pa.) 321; 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 203; 2 Hill (S. C.) 319; 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 303; 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 585; 5 Leigh (Va.) 471; 3 Pick. (Mass.) 293. And in respect to the distinction between foreign and inland bills of exchange. 112 U. S. 696; 41 Me. 302; 102 Mass. 141; 49 N. Y. 269.

But the reciprocal relations between the national government and the several states composing the United States are not considered as foreign, but domestic. 5 Pet. (U. S.) 398; 6 Pet. (U. S.) 317; 9 Pet. (U. S.) 607; 4 Cranch (U. S.) 384; 4 Gill & J. (Md.) 1, 63.

——Foreign Administrator. An administrator appointed in a state other than that in which the decedent resided. Lee, Admn.

——Foreign Answer. An answer not triable in the county where it is made. St. 15 Hen. VI. c. 5; Blount.

——Foreign Apposer. An officer in the exchequer who examines the sheriff's estreats, comparing them with the records, and apposeth (interrogates) the sheriff what he says to each particular sum therein. 4 Inst. 107; Blount; Cowell, "Foreigne." The word is written "opposer," "opposeth," by Lord Coke; and this signification corresponds very well to the meaning given by Blount, of examiner (interrogator) of the sheriff's accounts.

——Foreign Assignment. An assignment made in a foreign country, or in another state. 2 Kent, Comm. 405 et seq.

——Foreign Attachment. A process by virtue of which the property of an absent debtor is seized for the purpose of compelling an appearance, and, in default of that, to pay the claim of the plaintiff. See "Attachment."

——Foreign Bill of Exchange. A bill of exchange drawn in one state or country, and payable in another. N. Y. Neg. Inst. Law, § 213.

——Foreign Coins. Coins issued by the authority of a foreign government.

There were several acts of congress passed which rendered certain foreign gold and silver coins a legal tender in payment of debts upon certain prescribed conditions as to fineness and weight. In making a report in 1854 on this subject, the late director of the mint, Mr. Snowdon, suggested that there was no propriety or necessity for legalizing the circulation of the coins of other countries, and that in no other nation, except in the case of some colonies, was this mixture of currencies admitted by law, either on the score of courtesy or convenience; and he recommended that if the laws which legalize foreign coins should be repealed, it would be proper to require an annual assay report upon the weight and fineness of such foreign coins as frequently reach our shores, with a view to settle and determine their marketable value. Ex. Doc. No. 68, 33d Cong., 1st Sess. This suggestion was subsequently repeated, and finally led to the passage of the act of February 21, 1857 (11 U. S. Stat. at Large, 163), the third section of which is as follows: "That all former acts authorizing the currency of foreign gold or silver coins, and declaring the same a legal tender in payment for debts, are repealed; but it shall be the duty of the director of the mint to cause assays to be made from time to time of such foreign coins as may be known to our commerce, to determine their average weight, fineness, and value, and to embrace in his annual report a statement of the results thereof."

——Foreign Commerce. Commerce or trade between the United States and foreign countries.

——Foreign Corporation. A corporation created by or under the laws of another state, government, or country. 2 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 375, § 15.

——Foreign County. Another county. It may be in the same kingdom, it will still be foreign. See Blount, "Foreign."

——Foreign Creditor. One who resides in a different state or country from the debtor.

——Foreign Divorce. A divorce granted in a state or country other than that in which one of the parties is domiciled.

A divorce granted in a state or country other than that in which its validity is called in question.

——Foreign Domicile. A domicile gained in a foreign country.

——Foreign Enlistment Act. St. 59 Geo. III. c. 69, for preventing British citizens from enlisting as sailors or soldiers in the service of a foreign power. Wharton; 4 Steph. Comm. 226.

——Foreign Exchange. Exchange between foreign states or countries.

——Foreign Judgment. The judgment of merchant shipping act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), § 2, any ship employed in trading, going between some place or places in the United Kingdom and some place or places situate beyond the following limits, that is to say: The coasts of the United Kingdom, the islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Sark, Alderney, and Man, and the continent of Europe, between the river Elbe and Brest, inclusive. Home-trade ship includes every ship employed in trading and going between places within the last-mentioned limits. Rapalje & L.

——Foreign Judgment. The judgment of a foreign tribunal.

The various states of the United States are in this respect considered as foreign to each other. In Louisiana it has been decided that a judgment rendered by a Spanish tribunal under the former government of that state is not a foreign judgment. 4 Mart. (La.) 301, 310.

——Foreign Jury. A jury obtained from a county other than that in which issue was joined.

——Foreign Laws. The laws of a foreign country.

——Foreign Matter. Matter which must be tried in another county. Blount. Matter done or to be tried in another county. Cowell.

——Foreign Plea. See "Plea."

——Foreign Port. A port or place which is wholly without the United States. 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 375; 2 Gall. (U. S.) 4, 7; 1 Brock. (U. S.) 235. A port without the jurisdiction of the court. 1 Dods. Adm. 201; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 1; 1 W. Rob. Adm. 29; 6 Exch. 886; 1 Blatchf. & H. (U. S.) 66, 71. Practically, the definition has become, for most purposes of maritime law, a port at such distance as to make communication with the owners of the ship very inconvenient or almost impossible. See 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 512, note.

——Foreign Service. In feudal law. That whereby a mesne lord held of another, without the compass of his own fee, or that which the tenant performed either to his own lord or to the lord paramount out of the fee. Kitch. Cts. 299. Foreign service seems also to be used for knight's service, or escuage uncertain. Jacob.

——Foreign Vessel. A vessel owned by residents in, or sailing under the flag of, a foreign nation.

——Foreign Voyage. A voyage whose termination is within a foreign country. 3 Kent, Comm. 177, note. The length of the voyage has no effect in determining its character, but only the place of destination. 1 Story (U. S.) 1; 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 342; 2 Bost. Law Rep. 146; 2 Wall. C. C. (U. S.) 264; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 31.

FOREIGNER. One who is not a citizen. Cowell.

——In the Old English Law. It seems to have been used of every one not an inhabitant of a city, at least with reference to that city. 1 H. Bl. 213. See, also, Cowell, "Foreigne."

——In the United States. Any one who was born in some other country than the United States, and who owes allegiance to some foreign state or country. 1 Pet. (U. S.) 343, 349. An alien. See "Alien;" "Citizen."

FOREIN. An old form of "foreign" (q. v.) Blount.

FOREJUDGE. To deprive a man of the thing in question by sentence of court.

Among foreign writers, says Blount, forejudge is to banish, to expel. In this latter sense, the word is also used in English law of an attorney who has been expelled from court for misconduct. Cowell; Cunningham.

FOREJUDGER. In English practice. A judgment by which a man is deprived or put out of a thing; a judgment of expulsion or banishment. See "Forejudge."

FOREMAN. The presiding member of a grand or petit jury.

FORENSIC. Belonging to courts of justice.

FORENSIC MEDICINE. Medical jurisprudence. "That science which teaches the application of every branch of medical knowledge to the purposes of the law; hence its limits are, on the one hand, the requirements of the law, and, on the other, the whole range of medicine. Anatomy, physiology, medicine, surgery, chemistry, physics, and botany lend their aid as necessity arises; and in some cases all these branches of science are required to enable a court of law to arrive at a proper conclusion on a contested question affecting life or property." Tayl. Med. Jur. 1.

FORENSIS. Forensic; belonging to court. Forensis homo, a man engaged in causes. A pleader; an advocate. Vicat; Calv. Lex.

FORESAID. Used in Scotch law as "aforesaid" is in English, and sometimes, in a plural form, "foresaids." 2 How. St. Tr. 715. "Foresaidis" occurs in old Scotch records. "The Loirdis assesouris forsaidis." 1 Pitc. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 107.

FORESCHOKE. Forsaken; Cowell.

FORESHORE. That part of the land adjacent to the sea which is alternately covered and left dry by the ordinary flow of the tides, i. e., by the medium line between the greatest and least range of tide,—spring tides and neap tides. In England it forms part of the adjoining county.

FOREST. A certain territory of wooded ground and fruitful pastures, privileged for wild beasts and fowls of forest, chase, and warren, to rest and abide in the safe protection of the prince for his princely delight and pleasure, having a peculiar court and officers. Manw. For. Laws, c. 1, No. 1; Termes de la Ley; 1 Bl. Comm. 289.

A royal hunting ground which lost its peculiar character with the extinction of its courts, or when the franchise passed into the hands of a subject. Spelman; Cowell: Manw. For. Laws, c. 1; 2 Bl. Comm. 83.

FOREST COURTS. In English law. Courts instituted for the government of the king's forests in different parts of the kingdom, and for the punishment of all injuries done to the king's deer or venison, to the vert or greensward, and to the covert in which the deer were lodged. They comprised the courts of attachments, of regard, of swein mote, and of justice seat; but since the revolution of 1688, these courts, it is said, have gone into absolute desuetude. 3 Steph. Comm. 439-441; 3 Bl. Comm. 71-74. But see 8 Q. B. 981.

FORESTAGIUM. A tribute payable to the king's foresters. Cowell.

FORESTALL. To intercept or obstruct a passenger on the king's highway. Cowell; Blount. To beset the way of a tenant so as to prevent his coming on the premises. 3 Bl. Comm. 170. To intercept a deer on his way to the forest before he can regain it. Cowell.

To commit the crime of forestalling the market.

FORESTALLER. One who commits the offense of forestalling. Used, also, to denote the crime itself, namely, the obstruction of the highway, or hindering a tenant from coming to his land. 3 Bl. Comm. 170.

FORESTALLING. Obstructing the way; intercepting a person on the highway.

FORESTALLING THE MARKET. Buying victuals on their way to the market before they reach it, with the intent to sell again at a higher price. Cowell; Blount; 4 Bl. Comm. 158. Every device or practice, by act, conspiracy, words, or news, to enhance the price of victuals or other provisions. 3 Inst. 196; Bac. Abr.; 1 Russ. Crimes, 169; 4 Bl. Comm. 158; Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 80, § 1. See 13 Viner, Abr. 430; 1 East, 132; 14 East, 406; 15 East, 511; 3 Maule & S. 67; Dane, Abr. Index.

FORESTARIUS. A forester; an officer who takes care of the woods and forests. De forestario apponendo, a writ which lay to appoint a forester to prevent further commission of waste when a tenant in dower had committed waste. Bracton, 316; Du Cange.

FORESTER. A sworn officer of the forest, appointed by the king's letters patent to walk the forest, watching both the vert and the venison, attaching and presenting all trespassers against them within their own bailiwick or walk. These letters patent were generally granted during good behavior; but sometimes they held the office in fee. Blount; Cowell.

FORETHOUGHT FELONY. In Scotch law. Murder committed in consequence of a previous design. Ersk. bk. 4, tit. 4, c. 50; Bell, Dict.

FORFANG. A taking beforehand; a taking provisions from any one in fairs or markets before the king's purveyors are served with necessaries for his majesty. Blount; Cowell.

FORFEIT. To lose as the penalty of some misdeed or negligence. The word includes not merely the idea of losing, but also of having the property transferred to another without the consent of the owner and wrongdoer.

This is the essential meaning of the word, whether it be that an offender is to forfeit a sum of money, or an estate is to be forfeited to a former owner for a breach of condition, or to the king for some crime. Cowell says that forfeiture is general and confiscation a particular forfeiture to the king's exchequer. The modern distinction, however, seems to refer rather to a difference between forfeiture as relating to acts of the owner, and confiscation as relating to acts of the government. 1 Story (U. S.) 134; 13 Pet. (U. S.) 157; 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 293. Confiscation is more generally used of an appropriation of an enemy's property; forfeiture, of the taking possession of property to which the owner, who may be a citizen, has lost title through violation of law. See 1 Kent, Comm. 67; 1 Story (U. S.) 134.

FORFEITURE. A punishment annexed by law to some illegal act or negligence in the owner of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he loses all his interest therein, and they become vested in the party injured as a recompense for the wrong which he alone, or the public together with himself, hath sustained. 2 Bl. Comm. 267. A sum of money to be paid by way of penalty for a crime. 21 Ala. (N. S.) 672; 10 Grat. (Va.) 700. See "Confiscate."

Forfeiture by alienation. By the English law, estates less than a fee may be forfeited to the party entitled to the residuary interest by a breach of duty in the owner of the particular estate. 2 Bl. Comm. 274.

In this country, such forfeitures are almost unknown, and the more just principle prevails that the conveyance by the tenant operates only on the interest which he possessed, and does not affect the remainderman or reversioner. 4 Kent, Comm. 81, 82, 424; 3 Dall. (Pa.) 486; 5 Ohio, 30; 1 Pick. (Mass.) 318; 1 Rice (S. C.) 459; 2 Rawle (Pa.) 168; 1 Wash. (Va.) 381; 11 Conn. 553; 22 N. H. 500; 21 Me. 372. See, also, Stearns, Real Actions, 11; 4 Kent, Comm. 84; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 121, note; Williams, Real Prop. 25; 5 Dane, Abr. 6-8; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 92, 197.

Forfeiture for crimes. Under the constitution and laws of the United States (Const. art. 3, § 3; Act April 30, 1790, § 24 [1 Story, U. S. Laws, 88]), forfeiture for crimes is nearly abolished, and when it occurs, the state recovers only the title which the owner had. 4 Mason (U. S.) 174. See, also, Dalr. Feud. Prop. c. 4, pp. 145-154; Fost. Crim. Law, 95; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 92.

Forfeiture by nonperformance of conditions. An estate may be forfeited by a breach or nonperformance of a condition annexed to the estate, either expressed in the deed at its original creation, or implied by law, from a principle of natural reason. 2 Bl. Comm. 281; Litt. § 361; 1 Prest. Est. 478; White & T. Lead. Cas. 794, 795; 5 Pick. (Mass.) 528; 2 N. H. 120; 5 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 375; 32 Me. 394; 18 Conn. 535; 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 190. Such forfeiture may be waived by acts of the person entitled to take advantage of the breach. 1 Conn. 79; 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 126; Walk. Am. Law, 299; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 454.

Forfeiture by waste. Waste is a cause of forfeiture. 2 Bl. Comm. 283; 2 Inst. 299; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 118.

See, generally, 2 Bl. Comm. c. 18; 4 Bl. Comm. 382; Bouv. Inst. Index; 2 Kent, Comm. 318; 4 Kent, Comm. 422; 10 Viner, Abr. 371, 394; 13 Viner, Abr. 436; Bac. Abr. "Forfeiture;" Comyn, Dig.; Dane, Abr.; 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 252; Considerations on the Law of Forfeiture for High Treason (London Ed. 1746); 1 Washb. Real Prop. 91, 92, 118, 197.

FORFEITURE OF A BOND. A failure to perform the condition on which the obligee was to be excused from the penalty in the bond. Courts of equity and of law in modern practice will relieve from the forfeiture of a bond; and, upon proper cause shown, criminal courts will, in general, relieve from the forfeiture of a recognizance to appear. See 3 Yeates (Pa.) 93; 2 Wash. C. C. (U. S.) 442; 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 104, 200; 1 Ill. 257.

FORFEITURE OF MARRIAGE. A penalty incurred by a ward in chivalry when he or she married contrary to the wishes of his or her guardian in chivalry. 2 Bl. Comm. 70.

FORFEITURES ABOLITION ACT. Another name for the English act of 1870, abolishing forfeitures on conviction of felony.

FORGAVEL. A small rent reserved in money; a quit rent.

FORGERY. The false making, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability. 2 Bish. New Crim. Law, § 533.

Bishop (2 New Crim. Law, § 533) has collected seven definitions of forgery, and justly remarks that the books abound in definitions. Coke says the term is "taken metaphorically from the smith, who beateth upon his anvil, and forgeth what fashion and shape he will." 3 Inst. 169.

The elements are (1) a false making (46 N. H. 266; 28 Minn. 52), but this may consist of a material alteration (64 Wis. 432) (2) of an instrument apparently capable of defrauding (20 Iowa, 541, 118 Mass. 685) (3) with intent to defraud (51 Vt. 105, 15 Mass. 526).

FORHERDA. In old records. A herdland, headland, or foreland. Cowell.

FORINSECUM MANERIUM. That part of a manor which lies without the town, and is not included within the liberties of it. Par. Ant. 351.

FORINSECUM SERVITIUM (Lat.) The payment of extraordinary aid. Kennett.

FORINSIC (Lat. forinsecus). Outward; on the outside; without; foreign; belonging to another manor. Silio forinsecus, the outward ridge or furrow. Servitium forinsecum, the payment of aid, scutage, and other extraordinary military services. Forinsecum manerium, the manor, or that part of it which lies outside the bars or town, and is not included within the liberties of it. Cowell; Blount; Cunningham; Jacob, "Foreign Service;" 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 273.

FORIS. Abroad; out of doors; on the outside of a place; without; extrinsic.

FORISBANITUS, or FORBANNITUS. Banished; outlawed. Spelman.

FORIS DISPUTATIONES. In civil law. Arguments in court; disputations or arguments before a court. 1 Kent, Comm. 530; Vicat, "Disputatio."

FORISFACERE (Lat.) To forfeit; to lose on account of crime. It may be applied not only to estates, but to a variety of other things, in precisely the popular sense of the word "forfeit." Spelman; Du Cange.

To confiscate. Du Cange; Spelman.

To commit an offense; to do a wrong; to do something beyond or outside of (foris) what is right (extra rationem). Du Cange. To do a thing against or without law. Co. Litt. 59a.

To disclaim. Du Cange.

FORISFACTUM (Lat.) Forfeited. Bona forisfacta, forfeited goods. 1 Bl. Comm. 299. A crime. Du Cange; Spelman.

FORISFACTURA (Lat.) A crime or offense through which property is forfeited. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 32.

A fine or punishment in money.

Forfeiture; the loss of property or life in consequence of crime. Spelman.

Forisfactura plena. A forfeiture of all a man's property; things which were forfeited. Du Cange; Spelman.

FORISFACTUS (Lat.) A criminal. One who has forfeited his life by commission of a capital offense. Spelman; Leg. Rep. c. 77; Du Cange. Si quispiam forisfactus poposcerit regis misericordiam, etc., if any criminal shall have asked pardon of the king, etc. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 18.

Forisfactus servus. A slave who has been a free man, but has forfeited his freedom by crime. Leg. Athelstan, c. 3; Du Cange.

FORISFAMILIATED, or FORISFAMILIatus. In old English law. Portioned off. A son was forisfamiliated when he had a portion of his father's estate assigned to him during his father's life, in lieu of his share of the inheritance, when it was done at his request, and he assented to the assignment. The word etymologically denotes put out of the family, emancipated.

One who is no longer an heir of the parent. Du Cange; Spelman; Cowell. Similar in some degree to the modern practice of advancement.

FORISJUDICATIO (Lat.) In old English law. Forejudger; a forejudgment; a judgment of court whereby a man is put out of possession of a thing. Co. Litt. 100b; Cunningham.

FORISJUDICATUS (Lat.) Forejudged; sent from court; banished; deprived of a thing by judgment of court. Bracton, 250b; Co. Litt. 100b; Du Cange.

FORISJURARE (Lat.) To forswear; to abjure; to abandon.

Forisjurare parentilam. To remove one's self from parental authority. The person who did this lost his rights as heir. Du Cange; Leg. Hen. I. c. 88.

Provinciam forisjurare. To forswear the country. Spelman; Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 6.

FORJUDGE. See "Forejudge."

FORJURER (Law Fr.) In old English law. To forswear; to abjure. Forjurer royalme, to abjure the realm. Britt. cc. 1, 16.

FORLER LAND. Land in the diocese of Hereford, which had a peculiar custom attached to it, but which has been long since disused, although the name is retained. Butl. Surv. 56.

FORM. In practice. The model of an instrument or legal proceeding, containing the substance and the principal terms, to be used in accordance with the laws.

The legal order or method of legal proceedings or construction of legal instruments.

FORMS OF ACTION. The various classes of personal actions at common law, as assumpsit, trespass, case, detinue, trover, etc. (q. v.) The forms of action are now abolished in England by the judicature acts of 1873 and 1875, and in most of the United States.

FORMA DAT ESSE. Form gives being. Lord Henley, C., 2 Eden, 99.

FORMA LEGALIS FORMA ESSENTIALis. Legal form is essential form. 10 Coke, 100; 9 C. B. 493; 2 Hopk. 319.

FORMA NON OBSERVATA, INFERTUR adnullatio actus. When form is not observed, a nullity of the act is inferred. 12 Coke, 7.

FORMA PAUPERIS. See "In Forma Pauperis."

FORMALITIES. In England, robes worn by the magistrates of a city or corporation, etc., on solemn occasions. Enc. Lond.

FORMALITY. The conditions which must be observed in making contracts, and the words which the law gives to be used in order to render them valid. It also signifies the conditions which the law requires to make regular proceedings.

FORMATA. Canonical letters.

FORMATA BREVIA. Formed writs; writs of form. See "Brevia Formata."

FORMED ACTION. An action for which a form of words is provided, which must be exactly followed. 10 Mod. 140.

FORMEDON. An ancient writ provided by St. Westminster II. (13 Edw. I.) c. 1, for him who hath right to lands or tenements by virtue of a gift in tail. Stearns, Real Actions, 322.

It is a writ in the nature of a writ of right, and is the highest remedy which a tenant in tail can have. Co. Litt. 316.

This writ lay for those interested in an estate tail who were liable to be defeated of their right by a discontinuance of the estate tail, who were not entitled to a writ of right absolute, since none but those who claimed in fee simple were entitled to this. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 255. It is called "formedon" because the plaintiff in it claimed per formam doni.

The writ was abolished in England by St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

——Formedon in the Descender. A writ of formedon which lies where a gift is made in tail, and the tenant in tail aliens the lands, or is disseised of them and dies, for the heir in tail to recover them, against the actual tenant of the freehold. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 211; Litt. § 595.

If the demandant claims the inheritance as an estate tail which ought to come to him by descent from some ancestor to whom it was first given, his remedy is by a writ of formedon in the descender. Stearns, Real Actions, 322.

It must have been brought within twenty years from the death of the ancestor who was disseised. 21 Jac. I. c. 16; 3 Brod. & B. 217; 6 East, 83; 4 Term R. 300; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 193, note.

——Formedon in the Remainder. A writ of formedon which lies where lands are given to one for life or in tail, with remainder to another in fee or in tail, and he who hath the particular estate dies without issue, and a stranger intrudes upon him in remainder, and keeps him out of possession. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 211; Stearns, Real Actions, 323; Litt. § 597; 3 Bl. Comm. 293.

——Formedon in the Reverter. A writ of formedon which lies where there is a gift in tail, and afterwards, by the death of the donee or his heirs without issue of his body, the reversion falls in upon the donor, his heirs or assigns.

In this case, the demandant must suggest the gift, his own right as derived from the donor, and the failure of heirs of the donee. 3 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 293; Stearns, Real Actions, 323; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 212; Litt. § 597.

FORMER ADJUDICATION. A previous determination of the matter in litigation by a competent court between the same parties. To constitute a former adjudication which will bar subsequent litigation, it is essential

(1) That the judgment be final and upon the merits. 115 Ill. 29; 103 Mass. 280; 78 Mich. 234; 74 N. Y. 449; 82 N. Y. 55; 94 U. S. 351. Thus, a mere nonsuit (48 Me. 353) or dismissal because the action is premature (35 N. Y. 279) is not a bar to a subsequent action.

(2) The court must have had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter (93 U. S. 277; 132 Ill. 213), but it may be a foreign court (26 N. Y. 146).

(3) The same issues must have been involved (25 N. Y. 613), but the issues include every point which is either expressly in issue, or which must have been decided to support the judgment (24 Wis. 124. See

2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 663, and note); and the adjudication is conclusive not only as to what was actually litigated, but as to all that might have been litigated under the pleadings and issues made (70 Ill. 385; 102 N. Y. 452).

(4) As respects adjudications in personam, the adjudication must have been between the same parties or their privies (24 How. [U. S.] 241), and in the same capacity (58 N. Y. 463), but their position as plaintiff and defendant need not be the same if they be adversary parties (86 N. Y. 390; 61 Iowa, 290).

Privies of a party are bound to the same extent as the party himself. See "Privy." 69 Ill. 457; 68 Iowa, 145.

Lessor and lessee (46 Mo. 444), bailor and bailee (12 N. Y. 343), assignor and assignee (17 Mass. 365), mortgagor and mortgagee (105 N. Y. 39), ancestor and heir (61 Ala. 472), are ordinarily privies, but husband and wife (110 N. Y. 394), or guardian and ward (27 Pa. St. 226), are not.

A judgment in rem is conclusive as to the property in question and the title thereto without issues or parties. 23 Wall. (U. S.) 463.

FORMER RECOVERY. A recovery in a former action. See "Former Adjudication."

FORMIDO PERICULI (Lat.) Fear of danger. 1 Kent, Comm. 23; Huber de Jur. Civ. lib. 3, c. 7, § 4.

FORMULA. In common-law practice, a set form of words used in judicial proceedings.

——In Civil Law. An action. Calv. Lex.

FORMULAE. In Roman law. When the legis actiones were proved to be inconvenient, a mode of procedure called "per formulas" (i. e., by means of formulae) was gradually introduced, and eventually the legis actiones were abolished by the Lex Aebutia, B. C. 164, excepting in a very few exceptional matters. The formulae were four in number, namely: (1) The Demonstratio, wherein the plaintiff stated, i. e., showed, the facts out of which his claim arose; (2) the Intentio, where he made his claim against the defendant; (3) the Adjudicatio, wherein the judex was directed to assign or adjudicate the property, or any portion or portions thereof, according to the rights of the parties; and (4) the Condemnatio, in which the judex was authorized and directed to condemn or to acquit according as the facts were or were not proved. These formulae were obtained from the magistrate (in jure), and were thereafter proceeded with before the judex (in judicio). Brown.

FORMULARIES. A collection of the forms of proceedings among the Franks and other early European nations. Co. Litt. Butler's note 77.

FORNAGIUM. The fee taken by a lord of his tenant, who was bound to bake in the lord's common oven (in furno domini), or for a commission to use his own.

FORNICATION. In criminal law. Unlawful carnal knowledge by an unmarried person of another, whether the latter be married or unmarried.

Fornication is distinguished from "adultery" by the fact that the guilty person is not married. Four cases of unlawful intercourse may arise: Where both parties are married; where the man only is married; where the woman only is married; where neither is married. In the first case, such intercourse must be adultery; in the second case the crime is fornication only on the part of the woman, but adultery on the part of the man; in the third case it is adultery in the woman, and fornication (by statute, in some states, adultery) in the man; in the last case it is fornication only in both parties.

In some states it is indictable by statute. 6 Vt. 311; 2 Tayl. (N. C.) 165; 2 Grat. (Va.) 555.

FORNO. In Spanish law. An oven. Las Partidas, pt. 3, tit. 32, lib. 18.

FORO. In Spanish law. The place where tribunals hear and determine causes,—exercendarum litium locus. This word, according to Varro, is derived from ferendo, and is so called because all lawsuits have reference to things that are vendible, which presupposes the administration of justice to take place in the markets.

FOROS. In Spanish law. Emphyteutic rents. Schmidt, Civ. Law, 309.

FORPRISE. An exception; reservation; excepted; reserved. Anciently, a term of frequent use in leases and conveyances. Cowell; Blount.

In another sense, the word is taken for any exaction. Cunningham.

FORSPEAKER. An attorney or advocate; one who speaks for another. Blount.

FORSTAL. An intercepting or stopping in the highway. See "Forestall."

FORSTELLARIUS EST PAUPERUM DEpressor, et totius communitatis et patriae publicus inimicus. A forestaller is an oppressor of the poor, and a public enemy to the whole community and the country. 3 Inst. 196.

FORSWEAR. In criminal law. To swear to a falsehood.

This word has not the same meaning as "perjury." It does not, ex vi termini, signify a false swearing before an officer or court having authority to administer an oath, on an issue. A man may be forsworn by making a false oath before an incompetent tribunal, as well as before a lawful court. Hence, to say that a man is forsworn will or will not be slander, as the circumstances show that the oath was or was not taken before a lawful authority. Heard, Libel & S. §§ 16, 34; Cro. Car. 378; Lutw. 292; 1 Rolle, Abr. 39, pl. 7; Bac. Abr. "Slander" (B 3); Cro. Eliz. 609; 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 505; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 10; 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 48, 80; 12 Mass. 496; 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 116.

FORTHCOMING. In Scotch law. The action by which an arrestment (attachment) of goods is made available to the creditor or holder.

The arrestee and common debtor are called up before the judge, to hear sentence given ordering the debt to be paid or the arrested goods to be given up to the creditor arresting. Bell, Dict.

FORTHCOMING BOND. A bond given for the security of the sheriff, conditioned to produce the property levied on when required. 2 Wash. (Va.) 189; 11 Grat. (Va.) 522.

FORTHWITH. As soon as, by reasonable exertion, confined to the object, it may be accomplished. This is the import of the term. It varies, of course, with every particular case. 4 Tyrwh. 837; Style, Pr. Reg. 452, 453.

In a rule of court it has been construed to mean twenty-four hours. 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 328. But no such construction has been given to the term when used in a statute. "Without delay" is a reasonable meaning in a statute. 39 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 392, affirming 11 Abb. Prac. (N. Y.) 473; 20 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 222.

FORTIA (Lat.) A word of art, signifying the furnishing a weapon of force to do the fact, and by force whereof the fact was committed, and he that furnished it was not present when the act was done. 2 Inst. 182.

The general meaning of the word is an unlawful force. Spelman; Du Cange.

FORTIA FRISCA. Fresh force (q. v.)

FORTILITY. A fortified place; a castle; a bulwark. Cowell.

FORTIOR (Lat.) Stronger. A term applied, in the law of evidence, to that species of presumption, arising from facts shown in evidence, which is strong enough to shift the burden of proof to the opposite party. Burrill, Circ. Ev. 64, 66.

FORTIOR EST CUSTODIA LEGIS QUAM hominis. The custody of the law is stronger than that of man. 2 Rolle, 325.

FORTIOR ET POTENTIOR EST DISPOSITIO legis quam hominis. The disposition of the law is stronger and more powerful than that of man. Co. Litt. 234; Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 622; 10 Q. B. 944; 18 Q. B. 87; 10 C. B. 561; 3 H. L. Cas. 507; 13 Mees. & W. 285, 306; 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 401.

FORTIORI. See "A Fortiori."

FORTIS. Strong. Fortis et sana, strong and sound; staunch and strong; as a vessel. Towns. Pl. 227.

FORTLETT. A place or port of some strength; a little fort. Old Nat. Brev. 45.

FORTUIT. Accidental.

FORTUITOUS COLLISION. An accidental collision.

FORTUITOUS EVENT. In civil law. That which happens by a cause which cannot be resisted. Code La. art. 2522, No. 7.

That which neither of the parties has occasioned or could prevent. Lois des Bat. pt. 2, c. 2. An unforeseen event which cannot be prevented. Dict. de Jur. "Cas Fortuit."

There is a difference between a fortuitous event, or inevitable accident, and irresistible force. By the former, commonly called the "act of God," is meant any accident produced by physical causes which are irresistible; such as a loss by lightning or storms, by the perils of the seas, by inundations and earthquakes, or by sudden death or illness. By the latter is meant such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable. Of this nature are losses occasioned by the inroads of a hostile army, or by public enemies. Story, Bailm. § 25; Lois des Bat. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1.

Fortuitous events are fortunate or unfortunate. The accident of finding a treasure is a fortuitous event of the first class. Lois des Bat. pt. 2, c. 2, § 2.

Involuntary obligations may arise in consequence of fortuitous events. For example, when, to save a vessel from shipwreck, it is necessary to throw goods overboard, the loss must be borne in common. There arises, in this case, between the owners of the vessel and of the goods remaining on board, an obligation to bear proportionably the loss which has been sustained. Lois des Bat. pt. 2, c. 2, § 2.

See, in general, Dig. 50. 17. 23; Id. 16. 3. 1; Id. 19. 2. 11; Id. 44. 7. 1; Id. 18. 6. 10; Id. 13. 6. 18; Id. 26. 7. 50.

FORTUNAM FACIUNT JUDICEM. They make fortune the judge. Co. Litt. 167. Spoken of the process of making partition among coparceners by drawing lots for the several purparts.

FORUM.

——At Common Law. A place; a place of jurisdiction; the place where a remedy is sought; jurisdiction; a court of justice.

Forum conscientiae. The conscience.

Forum contentiosum. A court. 3 Bl. Comm. 211.

Forum contractus. The courts of the place of making a contract. 2 Kent, Comm. 463.

Forum domesticum. A domestic court. 1 W. Bl. 82.

Forum domicilii. The court of the place of domicile. 2 Kent, Comm. 463.

Forum ecclesiasticum. An ecclesiastical court.

Forum rei gestae. The court of the place of transaction. 2 Kent, Comm. 463.

Forum rei sitae. The court of the place where the thing is situated.

Forum seculare. A secular court.

Forum ligeantiae rei. The court or jurisdiction of the county to which defendant owes allegiance.

Forum regium. The king's court. St. Westminster II. c. 43.

Forum rei, or Rei sitae (Law Lat.) The forum or court of the thing (res, rei); the court of the place where a thing claimed is; the tribunal where the property is. Story, Confl. Laws, § 325k. The place where a thing in controversy is situated, considered as a place of jurisdiction and remedy. 2 Kent, Comm. 463.

——In Roman Law. The paved open space in cities, particularly in Rome, where were held the solemn business assemblies of the people, the markets, the exchange (whence cedere foro, to retire from 'change, equivalent to "to become bankrupt"), and where the magistrates sat to transact the business of their office. It came afterwards to mean any place where causes were tried, locus exercendarum litium. Isidor. lib. 18, Orig. A court of justice.

The obligation and the right of a person to have his case decided by a particular court.

It is often synonymous with that signification of judicium which corresponds to our word "court" (q. v.) in the sense of jurisdiction; e. g., foro interdicere (l. 1, § 13, D. 1. 12; C. 9, § 4; D. 48. 19); fori praescriptio (l. 7, pr. D. 2, 8; l. 1, C. 3, 24); forum rei accusator sequitur (l. 5, pr. C. 3, 13). In this sense, the forum of a person means both the obligation and the right of that person to have his cause decided by a particular court. 5 Gluck, Pand. 237. What court should have cognizance of the cause depends, in general, upon the person of the defendant, or upon the person of some one connected with the defendant.

By modern writers upon the Roman law, jurisdiction dependent on the person of the defendant is distinguished as (1) that of common right, forum commune, and (2) that of special privilege, forum privilegiatum.

(1) Forum commune. The jurisdiction of common right was either general, forum generale, or special, forum speciale.

(a) Forum generale. General jurisdiction was of two kinds, the forum originis, which was that of the birthplace of the party, and the forum domicilii, that of his domicile. The forum originis was either commune or proprium. The former was that legal status which all free-born subjects of the empire, wherever residing, had at Rome when they were found there, and had not the jus revocandi domum (i. e., the right of one absent from his domicile of transferring to the forum domicilii a suit instituted against him in the place of his temporary sojourn). L. 2, §§ 3, 4, 5, D. 5, 1; l. 28, § 4, D. 4, 6; 3 Gluck, Pand. 188. The forum originis proprium, or forum originis speciale, was the court of that place of which at the time of the party's birth his father was a citizen, though that might possibly be neither his own birthplace, nor the actual domicile of his father.

Forum domicilii. The place of the domicile exercised the greatest influence over the rights of the party. As to what constitutes domicile, see "Domicile." In general, one was subject to the laws and courts of his domicile alone, unless specially privileged. L. 29, D. 50, 1.

(b) Forum speciale. Particular jurisdiction. These were very numerous. The more important are: Forum continentiae causarum. Sometimes two or more actions or disputed questions are so connected that they cannot advantageously be tried separately, although in strictness they belong to different jurisdictions. In such cases the modern civil law permits them to be determined in a single court, although such court would be incompetent in regard to a portion of them taken singly. Forum contractus, the court having cognizance of the action on a contract.

Forum delicti, forum deprehensionis. The jurisdiction of the person of a criminal, and may be the court of the place where the offense was committed, or that of the place where the criminal was arrested.

Forum arresti. A jurisdiction unknown to the Roman law, but of frequent occurrence in the modern civil law. It is that over persons or things detained by a judicial order, and corresponds in some degree to the "attachment" of our practice.

Forum gestae administrationis. The jurisdiction over the accounts and administration of guardians, agents, and all persons appointed to manage the affairs of third parties. The court which appointed such administrator, or wherein the cause was pending in which such appointment was made, or within whose territorial limits the business of the administration was transacted, had exclusive jurisdiction over all suits arising out of his acts, or brought for the purpose of compelling him to account, or brought by him to recover compensation for his outlays. L. 1, C. 3, 21; 6 Gluck, Pand. § 521.

(2) Forum privilegiatum. Privileged jurisdictions. In general, the privileged jurisdiction of a person held the same rank as the forum domicilii, and, like that, did not supplant the particular jurisdictions above named save in certain exceptional cases. The privilege was general in its nature, and applied to all cases not specially excepted, but it only arose when the person possessing it was sued by another; for he could not assert it when he was the plaintiff, the rule being, actor sequitur forum rei, the plaintiff must resort to the jurisdiction of the defendant. It was in general limited to personal actions; all real actions brought against the defendant in the character of possessor of the thing in dispute followed the forum speciale. The privilege embraced the wife of the privileged person and his children so long as they were under his potestas. And, lastly, when a forum privilegiatum purely personal conflicted with the forum speciale, the former must yield. 6 Gluck, Pand. 339-341.

Privileged persons were:

(a) Personae miserabiles, who were persons under the special protection of the law on account of some incapacity of age, sex, mind, or condition. These were entitled, whether as plaintiffs or defendants, to carry their causes directly before the emperor, and, passing over the inferior courts, to demand a hearing before his supreme tribunal, whenever they had valid grounds for doubting the impartiality or fearing the procrastination of the inferior courts, or for dreading the influence of a powerful adversary. 6 Gluck, Pand. § 522.

(b) Clerici, the clergy. The privilege of clerical persons to be impleaded only in the episcopal courts commenced under the Christian emperors.

(c) Academici. In the modern civil law, the officers and students of the universities are privileged to be sued before the university courts. This species of privilege was unknown to the Roman law. See 6 Gluck, Pand. § 524.

(d) Milites. Soldiers had special military courts as well in civil as criminal cases.

There are many classes of persons who are privileged in respect to jurisdiction under the modern civil law who were not so privileged by the Roman law. Such are officers of the court of the sovereign, including ministers of state and councillors, ambassadors, noblemen, etc. These do not require extended notice.

Jurisdiction ex persona alterius. A person might be entitled to be sued in a particular court on grounds depending upon the person of another. Such were (1) the wife, who, if the marriage had been legally contracted, acquired the forum of her husband (l. 65, D. 5, 1; l. ult. D. 50, 1; l. 19, D. 2, 1), and retained it until her second marriage (l. 22, § 1, D. 50, 1), or change of domicile. Section 93, Voet. Com. ad Pand. D. 5, 1. (2) Servants, who possessed the jurisdiction of their master as regarded the forum domicilii, and also the forum privilegiatum, so far at least as the privilege was that of the class to which such master belonged, and was not purely personal. Gluck, Pand. § 510b. (3) The haeres, who in many cases retained the jurisdiction of his testator. When sued in the character of heir in respect to causes of action upon which suit had been commenced before the testator's death, he must submit to the forum which had acquired cognizance of the suit. Ll. 30, 34, D. 5, 1.

FORWARDING MERCHANT. A person who receives and forwards goods, taking upon himself the expenses of transportation, for which he receives a compensation from the owners, but who has no concern in the vessels or wagons by which they are transported, and no interest in the freight.

Such a one is not deemed a common carrier, but a mere warehouseman or agent. 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 232; 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 497. He is required to use only ordinary diligence in sending the property by responsible persons. 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 593. See Story, Bailm.

FOSSA (Lat.) In English law. A ditch full of water, where formerly women who had committed a felony were drowned; the grave. Cowell.

FOSSAGIUM. The duty levied on the inhabitants for repairing the moat or ditch around a fortified town.

FOSSATORIUM OPERATIO (Lat.) The service of laboring done by the inhabitants and adjoining tenants, for repair and maintenance of the ditches round a city or town. A contribution in lieu of such work, called fossagium, was sometimes paid. Kennett; Cowell.

FOSSATUM (Law Lat. from fossa, q. v.) In old English law. A dyke; a bank of earth thrown up out of a ditch. Glanv. lib. 13, c. 34; Bracton, fol. 115; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 24, § 8; St. Westminster II. c. 46.

A ditch or trench. The same with fossa. Spelman; Reg. Orig. 92b, 198b, 199.

A moat or fosse around an encampment or fortified place. Spelman.

A canal or cut from a river. Cowell; Cart. 20 Hen. III.

A place fenced with a ditch. Cowell.

FOSSE WAY, or FOSSE. One of the four ancient Roman ways through England. Spelman, voc. "Ikenild Street."

FOSSELLUM. A small ditch. Cowell.

FOSTERLAND. Land given, assigned, or allotted to the finding of food or victuals for any person or persons; as in monasteries for the monks, etc. Cowell; Blount.

FOSTERLEAN. The remuneration fixed for the rearing of a foster child; also the jointure of a wife. Jacob.

FOUNDATION. The establishment of a charity; that upon which a charity is founded, and by which it is supported.

This word, in the English law, is taken in two senses,—fundatio incipiens, and fundatio perficiens. As to its political capacity, an act of incorporation is metaphorically called its foundation; but as to its dotation, the first gift of revenues is called the foundation. 10 Coke, 23a.

FOUNDER. One who endows an institution; one who makes a gift of revenues to a corporation. 10 Coke, 33; 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 481.

In England, the king is said to be the founder of all civil corporations; and where there is an act of incorporation, he is called the "general founder," and he who endows is called the "perficient founder." 1 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 481.

FOUNDEROSUS. Out of repair. Cro. Car. 366.

FOUNDLING. A new-born child abandoned by its parents, who are unknown. The settlement of such a child is in the place where found.

FOUR CORNERS. A metaphorical expression indicating the whole face or contents of an instrument, taken as an entirety.

FOUR SEAS. The seas surrounding England. These were divided into the western, including the Scotch and Irish; the northern, or North Sea; the eastern, being the German Ocean; the southern, being the British Channel. Selden, Mare Clausum, lib. 2, c. 1.

"Within the four seas" means within the jurisdiction of England. 4 Coke, 125; 2 Inst. 253. See "Beyond Sea."

FOURCHER (Fr. to fork). In English law. A method of delaying an action formerly practised by defendants.

When an action was brought against two, who, being jointly concerned, were not bound to answer till both appeared, and they agreed not to appear both in one day, the appearance of one excused the other's default, who had a day given him to appear with the other. The defaulter, on the day appointed, appeared; but the first then made default. In this manner they forked each other, and practised this for delay. See 2 Inst. 250; Booth, Real Actions, 16.

FOURCHING. The act of delaying legal proceedings. Termes de la Ley.

FOWLS OF WARREN. Such fowls as are preserved under the game laws in warrens. According to Manwood, these are partridges and pheasants. According to Lord Coke, they are either campestres, as partridges, rails, and quails, sylvestres, as woodcocks and pheasants, or aquatiles, as mallards and herons. Co. Litt. 233.

FOX'S ACT. St. 52 Geo. III. c. 60, which secured to juries, upon the trial of indictments or informations for libel, the right of pronouncing a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter in issue, and no longer bound them to find a verdict of guilty on proof of the publication of the paper charged to be a libel, and of the sense ascribed to it in the indictment.

FOY (Law Fr.) Faith; fidelity. Britt. 29; Oath. Britt. 70.

FRACTIO (Lat. from frangere, to break). A breaking; a breach. Fractio fedei, a breach of promise or of trust. 1 Rep. Ch. Append. 8.

FRACTION OF A DAY. A portion of a day; the dividing a day. Generally, the law does not allow the fraction of a day. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 141.

The day may be divided, however, to show which of two acts was actually done first. 3 Burrows, 1434; 4 Kent, Comm. 95, note; 11 H. L. Cas. 411.

FRACTIONEM DIEI NON RECIPET LEX. The law does not regard a fraction of a day. Lofft. 572. But see "Day."

FRACTITIUM. Arable land. Mon. Angl.

FRACTURA NAVIUM. Wreck of shipping at sea.

FRAIS DE JUSTICE. Costs incurred incidentally to the action. See 1 Tropl. Dr. Civ. 122, 135, note; 4 Low. (U. S.) 77.

FRANC. A French coin, of the value of about eighteen cents.

FRANC ALEU. In French law. An absolutely free inheritance; allodial lands. Generally, however, the word denotes an inheritance free from seignorial rights, though held subject to the sovereign. Dumoulin, "Cout. de Par." § 1; Guyot, Rep. Univ.; 3 Kent, Comm. 498, note; 8 Low. (U. S.) 95.

FRANCHILANUS. A freeman. Blount.

FRANCHISE. A special privilege conferred by government on individuals, and which does not belong to the citizens of the country generally by common right. Angell & A. Corp. § 4.

A particular privilege conferred by grant from government, and vested in individuals. 3 Kent, Comm. 458.

A branch of the king's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject. Finch, Law, lib. 2, c. 14; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 37.

In a popular sense, the word seems to be synonymous with "right" or "privilege;" as, the elective franchise. And it is commonly applied to those powers exercised by virtue of a grant of privilege.

"To be a corporation is a franchise. The various powers conferred on corporations are franchises. The execution of a policy of insurance by an insurance company, and the issuance of a bank note by an incorporated bank, are franchises." 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 387.

"The term [franchise] must be always considered in connection with the corporation or property to which it is supposed to appertain." 93 U. S. 223.

FRANCIGENA. A designation formerly given to aliens in England.

FRANCUS. Free; a freeman; a Frank. Spelman.

——Francus Bancus. Free bench (q. v.)

——Francus Homo. A free man.

——Francus Plegius. In old English law. A frank pledge, or free pledge. Spelman.

——Francus Tenens. In old English law. A frank or free tenant; a freeholder.

FRANK. In old English law. Free.

FRANK BANK. In old English law. Free bench. Litt. § 166; Co. Litt. 110b. See under "Francus."

FRANK CHASE. Free chase. The liberty or franchise of having a chase.

FRANK FEE. Lands not held in ancient demesne. Called "lands pleadable at common law." Reg. Orig. 12, 14; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 161; Termes de la Ley.

That which a man holds to himself and his heirs, and not by such service as is required in ancient demesne, according to the custom of the manor. The opposite of copyhold. Cowell. A fine had in the king's court might convert demesne lands into frank fee. 2 Bl. Comm. 368.

FRANK FERME. Lands or tenements where the nature of the fee is changed by feoffment from knight's service to yearly service, and whence no homage but such as is contained in the feoffment may be demanded. Britt. c. 66, n. 3; Cowell; 2 Bl. Comm. 80.

FRANK FOLD. In old English law. Free fold; a privilege for the lord to have all the sheep of his tenants and the inhabitants within his seigniory, in his fold, in his demesnes, to manure his land. Keilw. 198; Y. B. H. 1 Edw. III. 4.

FRANK LAW (Law Fr. fraunche ley; Law Lat. libera lex, lex terrae). In old English law. The liberty of being sworn in courts, as a juror or witness; one of the ancient privileges of a freeman, or free and lawful man (liber et legalis homo). Otherwise called the law of the land (lex terrae), or simply law (lex). The nature of this privilege may be understood from Bracton's description of the consequences of losing it, among which the principal one was that the parties incurred perpetual infamy, so that they were never afterwards to be admitted to oath, because they were not deemed to be oathworthy (that is, not worthy of making oath), nor allowed to give testimony. Perpetuam infamiam incurrant, et legem terrae amittant, et ita quod nunquam postea ad sacramentum admittantur, quia de coetero non erunt othesworth, nec ad testimonium recipientur. Bracton, fol. 292b. This was one of the punishments of jurors who had been convicted of perjury. Id.

This term has been very generally defined "the privilege of the law's protection," and "the benefit of the free and common law of the land." Holthouse; Wharton. But that it had a more particular and determinate meaning is clear both from the testimony of the ancient writers, and from the peculiar signification of the word "law," which, from a very early period, denoted an oath, or the taking or making of an oath; as in the common expressions "wager of law," and "making law." A lawful man (legalis homo) was one who was competent to be sworn as a juror or witness; and the word "lawful" is used in this sense in jury process to this day. 3 Bl. Comm. 340, 341, 352.

FRANK MARRIAGE. A species of estate tail where the donee had married one of kin (as daughter or cousin) to the donor, and held the estate subject to the implied condition that the estate was to descend to the issue of such marriage. On birth of issue, as in other cases of estate tail before the statute De Donis, the birth of issue was regarded as a condition performed, and the estate thereupon became alienable by the donee. 1 Cruise, Dig. 71; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 67.

The estate is said to be in frank marriage because given in consideration of marriage, and free from services for three generations of descendants. Blount; Cowell. See, also, 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 115; 1 Steph. Comm. 232.

FRANK PLEDGE. A pledge or surety for freemen. Termes de la Ley.

The bond or pledge which the inhabitants of a tithing entered into for each one of their number that he should be forthcoming to answer every violation of law. Each boy, on reaching the age of fourteen, was obliged to find some such pledge, or be committed to prison. Blount; Cowell.

FRANK TENANT. A freeholder. Litt. § 91.

FRANK TENEMENT. In English law. A free tenement, freeholding, or freehold. 2 Bl. Comm. 61, 62, 104; 1 Steph. Comm. 217; Bracton, fol. 207. Used to denote both the tenure and the estate.

FRANKALMOIGNE. A species of ancient tenure, still extant in England, whereby a religious corporation, aggregate or sole, holds its lands of the donor, in consideration of the religious services it performs.

In the United States, religious corporations hold land by the same tenure with which all other corporations and individuals hold; and the only approach to a tenancy in frankalmoigne may be found in the exemption from taxation which is enjoyed by churches in common with charitable and scientific institutions.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE. The privilege of sending certain matter through the public mails without payment therefor.

It is enjoyed by various officers of the federal government, theoretically for the public good. See Brightly, Dig. U. S. Laws.

FRANKLEYN, FRANCLING, or FRANKlin. A freeman; a freeholder; a gentleman. Blount; Cowell.

FRASSETUM (Law Lat.) In old English law. A wood, or ground that is woody. Co. Litt. 4b; Shep. Touch. 95. Blount considers it a corruption of fraxinetum, a wood where ashes grow.

FRATER (Lat.) Brother.

——Frater Consanguineus. A brother born from the same father, though the mother may be different.

——Frater Nutricius. A bastard brother.

——Frater Uternius. A brother who has the same mother, but not the same father.

Blount; Vicat; 2 Bl. Comm. 232. See "Brother."

FRATER FRATRI UTERINO NON SUCcedet in haereditate paterna. A brother shall not succeed an uterine brother in the paternal inheritance. Fort. de Laud. Leg. Ang. by Amos, p. 15; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. This maxim is now superseded in England by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, § 9. Broom, Leg. Max. (3d London Ed.) 471; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 232.

FRATERNAL INSURANCE. A form of mutual life, and perhaps, also, health and accident, insurance. Its distinguishing characteristics seem to be (a) that it is written on members of a fraternal or beneficial society only, and (b) that the organization itself is the insurer. The premiums are usually paid by way of assessment or monthly dues, rather than by annual premium, and may or may not involve the creation of a reserve fund.

FRATERNIA. A fraternity or brotherhood.

FRATRIAGE. A younger brother's inheritance.

FRATRICIDE. The killing of a brother or sister.

One who has killed his brother or sister.

FRAUD. The unlawful obtaining of another's property by design, but without criminal intent, and with the assent of the owner obtained by artifice or misrepresentation.

Any cunning deception or artifice used to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another. Story, Eq. Jur. § 186.

Fraud is sometimes used as a term synonymous with "covin," "collusion," and "deceit," but improperly so. Covin is a secret contrivance between two or more persons to defraud and prejudice another of his rights. Collusion is an agreement between two or more persons to defraud another under the forms of law, or to accomplish an illegal purpose. Deceit is a fraudulent contrivance by words or acts to deceive a third person, who, relying thereupon, without carelessness or neglect of his own, sustains damage thereby. Co. Litt. 357b; Bac. Abr.

Actual or positive fraud includes cases of the intentional and successful employment of any cunning, deception, or artifice, used to circumvent, cheat, or deceive another. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 186.

Legal or constructive fraud includes such contracts or acts as, though not originating in any actual evil design or contrivance to perpetrate a fraud, yet by their tendency to deceive or mislead others, or to violate private or public confidence, are prohibited by law. Thus, for instance, contracts against some general public policy or fixed artificial policy of the law; cases arising from some peculiar confidential or fiduciary relation between the parties, where advantage is taken of that relation by the person in whom the trust or confidence is reposed, or by third persons; agreements and other acts of parties which operate virtually to delay, defraud, and deceive creditors; purchases of property, with full notice of the legal or equitable title of other persons to the same property (the purchaser becoming, by construction, particeps criminis with the fraudulent grantor); and voluntary conveyances of real estate, as affecting the title of subsequent purchasers. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 7.

——In the Civil Law. According to the civilians, positive fraud consists in doing one's self, or causing another to do, such things as induce the opposite party into error, or retain him there. The intention to deceive, which is the characteristic of fraud, is here present; the definition of "constructive fraud" being the same as at common law. Fraud was also divided into that which has induced the contract, dolus dans causum contractui, and incidental or accidental fraud. The former is that which has been the cause or determining motive of the contract, that without which the party defrauded would not have contracted, when the artifices practised by one of the parties have been such that it is evident that without them the other would not have contracted. Incidental or accidental fraud is that by which a person, otherwise determined to contract, is deceived on some accessories or incidents of the contract,—for example, as to the quality of the object of the contract, or its price,—so that he has made a bad bargain. Accidental fraud does not, according to the civilians, avoid the contract, but simply subjects the party to damages. It is otherwise where the fraud has been the determining cause of the contract, qui causam dedit contractui. In that case, the contract is void. Toullier, Dr. Civ. liv. 3, tit. 3, c. 2, note, § 5, note 86 et seq. See, also, 1 Mall. Anal. de la Disc. du Code Civ. pp. 15, 16; Bouv. Inst. Index.

——In Equity. It is sometimes inaccurately said that such and such transactions amount to fraud in equity, though not in law; according to the popular notion that the law allows or overlooks certain kinds of fraud which the more conscientious rules of equity condemn and punish. But, properly speaking, fraud in all its shapes is as odious in law as in equity. The difference is that, as the law courts are constituted, and as it has been found in centuries of experience that it is convenient they should be constituted, they cannot deal with fraud otherwise than to punish it by the infliction of damages. All those manifold varieties of fraud against which specific relief, of a preventive or remedial sort, is required for the purposes of substantial justice, are the subjects of equity and not of law jurisdiction.

The following classification of frauds as a head of equity jurisdiction is given by Lord Hardwicke (2 Ves. Jr. 155): (1) Fraud, or dolus malus, may be actual, arising from facts and circumstances of imposition. (2) It may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make, on the one hand, and no honest or fair man would accept, on the other. (3) It may be inferred from the circumstances and condition of the parties; for it is as much against conscience to take advantage of a man's weakness or necessity as of his ignorance. (4) It may be collected from the nature and circumstances of the transaction, as being an imposition on third persons.

——In Criminal Law. Without the express provision of any statute, all deceitful practices in defrauding or endeavoring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty, are condemned by the common law, and punishable according to the heinousness of the offense. Co. Litt. 3b; Dyer, 295; Hawk. P. C. c. 71.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF. The name commonly given to St. 29 Car. II. c. 3, entitled, "An Act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries;" and to statutes of the various states patterned thereon, and substantially to the same effect.

These statutes differ in detail, but generally provide that no action shall be brought on certain classes of contract unless some memorandum thereof be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE. A conveyance, the object, tendency, or effect of which is to defraud another, or the intent of which is to avoid some duty or debt due by or incumbent on the party making it. 2 Kent, Comm. 440; 4 Kent, Comm. 462.

There must be: (a) A creditor to be defrauded; but subsequent creditors are entitled to impeach a conveyance for fraud. 118 Mass. 527. (b) A conveyance by the debtor; but the form of the conveyance is immaterial. 89 Ind. 117. (c) Of property of value, out of which the creditor could have made a portion of his claim. 46 Mich. 243; 52 Vt. 45; 67 Me. 183. (d) With intent to hinder, delay, or defraud (88 N. Y. 669); but the fraud may arise from the nature and necessary result of the transaction, without regard to the actual intention of the parties (108 Ill. 502).

——Statute of Fraudulent Conveyances. Fraudulent conveyances received early attention; and the statutes of 13 Eliz. c. 5, and 27 Eliz. c. 4, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 18, declared all conveyances made with intent to defraud creditors, etc., to be void. This statute, on which all subsequent legislation has been patterned, defined a fraudulent conveyance as "a conveyance, the object, tendency, or effect of which is to avoid some duty or debt due by or incumbent upon the party making the conveyance." By a liberal construction, it has become the settled English law that a voluntary conveyance shall be deemed fraudulent against a subsequent purchaser, even with notice. 9 East, 59; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 296; Roberts, Fraud. Conv. 2, 3.

Voluntary conveyances are not so construed in the United States, however, where the subsequent purchaser has notice, especially if there be a good consideration. 2 Gray (Mass.) 447.

These statutes have been generally adopted in the United States as the foundation of all the state statutes upon this subject. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 353; 4 Kent, Comm. 462, 463.

FRAUDULENT PREFERENCES. See "Preferences."

FRAUNC, FRAUNCHE, or FRAUNKE. See "Frank."

FRAUNCHISE. A franchise.

FRAUS (Lat. fraud). More commonly called, in the civil law, "dolus" and "dolus malus" (q. v.) A distinction, however, was sometimes made between "fraus" and "dolus;" the former being held to be of the most extensive import. Calv. Lex.

FRAUS EST CELARE FRAUDEM. It is a fraud to conceal a fraud. 1 Vern. 270.

FRAUS EST ODIOSA, ET NON PRAESUMENDA. Fraud is odious, and not to be presumed. Cro. Car. 550.

FRAUS ET DOLUS NEMINI PATROCINARI DEBENT. Fraud and deceit should excuse no man. 3 Coke, 78.

FRAUS ET JUS NUNQUAM COHABITANT. Fraud and justice never dwell together. Wingate, Max. 680.

FRAUS LATET IN GENERALIBUS. Fraud lies hid in general expressions.

FRAUS LEGIS. (Lat.) In civil law. Fraud of law; fraud upon law. See "In Fraudem Legis."

FRAUS MERETUR FRAUDEM. Fraud deserves fraud. Plowd. 110; Branch, Princ. This is very poor law.

FRAXINETUM. In old English law. A wood of ashes; a place where ashes grow. Co. Litt. 4b; Shep. Touch. 95.

FRAY. See "Affray."

FRECTUM. In old English law. Freight. Blount.

FREDNITE. A liberty to hold courts and take up the fines for beating and wounding. Cowell; Cunningham.

To be free from fines.

FREDSTOLE, or FRIDSTOLE. Sanctuaries; seats of peace.

FREDUM. A fine paid for obtaining pardon when the peace had been broken. Spelman; Blount. A sum paid the magistrate for protection against the right of revenge. 1 Robertson, Hist. Charles V., Append. note xxiii.

FREE. Not bound to servitude; at liberty to act as one pleases. This word is put in opposition to slave. Const. U. S. art. 1, § 2. Used in distinction from being bound as an apprentice.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are born free; and in this sense the term is usually supposed to mean all mankind, though this seems to be doubted in 19 How. (U. S.) 393.

Certain; as, free services. These were also more honorable.

Confined to the person possessing, instead of being held in common; as, free fishery.

FREE ALMS. Tenure by indefinite spiritual services; frankalmoigne (q. v.)

FREE BENCH. Copyhold lands which the wife has for dower after the decease of her husband. Kitch. Cts. 102; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 6, c. 13, No. 2; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 150; Plowd. 411.

Dower in copyhold lands. 2 Bl. Comm. 129. The quantity varies in different sections of England. Co. Litt. 110b. Incontinency was a cause of forfeiture, except on the performance of a ridiculous ceremony. Cowell; Blount.

FREE BORD. An allowance of land outside the fence, which may be claimed by the owner. An allowance, in some places, two and a half feet wide outside the boundary or inclosure. Blount; Cowell.

FREE-BOROUGH MEN. Such great men as did not engage, like the frank-pledge men, for their decennier. Jacob.

FREE CHAPEL. A chapel founded by the king, and exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinary. It may be one founded or endowed by a private person under a grant from the king. Cowell; Termes de la Ley.

FREE COURSE. Having the wind from a favorable quarter. To prevent collision of vessels, it is the duty of the vessel having the wind free to give way to a vessel beating up to windward and tacking. 3 Hagg. Adm. 215. At sea, such vessel meeting another close hauled must give way, if necessary to prevent the danger of collision. 3 Car. & P. 528. See 9 Car. & P. 528; 2 W. Rob. Adm. 225; 2 Dods. Adm. 87.

FREE FISHERY. A franchise which gives an exclusive right of fishing in a public navigable river, without any ownership on the soil. 3 Kent, Comm. 329; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 39; 1 Salk. 637; Woolr. Waters, 97. Free fishery is the same as common of fishery. Co. Litt. Hargrave's notes, 122; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 39; 7 Pick. (Mass.) 79; Angell, Watercourses, c. 6, §§ 3, 4. See "Fishery."

FREE ON BOARD. Abbreviated f. o. b. In the law of sales, a sale free on board is one in which the seller agrees to put the goods on board cars or ship at a particular place, at his own expense.

FREE SERVICES. Such as it was not unbecoming the character of a soldier or freeman to perform; as, to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. 2 Bl. Comm. 62; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 25.

FREE SHIPS. Neutral ships. "Free ships make free goods" is a phrase often used in treaties to denote that the goods on board neutral ships shall be free from confiscation, even though belonging to an enemy. Wheat. Int. Law, 507 et seq.; 1 Kent, Comm. 126. See 3 Phillim. Int. Law (3d Ed.) 238 et seq., for a full discussion of the subject.

FREE SOCAGE. Tenure in free socage is a tenure by certain and honorable services which yet are not military. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 52; Dalr. Feud. Prop. c. 2, § 1; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 25. Called, also, "free and common socage." See "Socage."

FREE SOCMEN. In old English law. Tenants in free socage. Glanv. lib. 3, c. 7; 2 Bl. Comm. 79.

FREE (or FRANK) TENURE. Freehold tenure. The opposite of the ancient villeinage or modern copyhold. 2 Bl. Comm. 89, 90.

FREE WARREN. A franchise for the preserving and custody of beasts and fowls of warren. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 39, 417; Co. Litt. 233. This franchise gave the grantee sole right of killing, so far as his warren extended, on condition of excluding other persons. 2 Sharswood, Bl. Comm. 39.

FREEDMAN. In Roman law. A person who had been released from a state of servitude. See "Libertine."

FREEHOLD. See "Estates."

FREEHOLD IN LAW. A freehold which has descended to a man, upon which he may enter at pleasure, but which he has not entered on. Termes de la Ley.

FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETIES. Societies in England designed for the purpose of enabling mechanics, artisans, and other working men to purchase, at the least possible price, a piece of freehold land of a sufficient yearly value to entitle the owner to the elective franchise for the county in which the land is situated. Wharton.

FREEHOLDER. The owner of a freehold estate. Such a man must have been anciently a freeman; and the gift to any man by his lord of an estate to him and his heirs made the tenant a freeman, if he had not been so before. See 1 Washb. Real Prop. 29, 45, et seq.

FREEMAN. One who is not a slave; one born free, or made so.

——In Old English Law. A freeholder, as distinguished from a villein.

An inhabitant of a city. St. 1 Hen. VI. c. 11; 3 Steph. Comm. 196, 197; Cunningham.

FREEMAN'S ROLL. A list of persons admitted as burgesses or freemen for the purposes of the rights reserved by the municipal corporation act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76). Distinguished from the burgess roll. 3 Steph. Comm. 197. The term was used, in early colonial history, of some of the American colonies.

FREIGHT. The amount due a carrier for the transportation of goods or live stock. Angell, Carr. § 391. Sometimes applied in a loose sense to the goods carried.

——In Maritime Law. The sum agreed on for the hire of a ship, entirely or in part, for the carriage of goods from one port to another. 13 East, 300. All rewards or compensation paid for the use of ships. 1 Pet. Adm. 206; 2 Boul. P. Dr. Com. tit. 8, § 1; 2 Bos. & P. 321; 4 Dall. (Pa.) 459; 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 346; 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 335; 3 Pardessus, note 705.

FREIGHTER. He to whom a ship or vessel has been hired, and who loads her under his contract; he who loads a general ship. 3 Kent, Comm. 173; 3 Pardessus, note 704.

FRENCHMAN. In early times, in English law, this term was applied to every stranger or "outlandish" man. Bracton, lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 15.

FRENDLESS MAN, or FRENDLESMAN (Saxon). The ancient name of an outlaw (utlaughe) in England. So called, according to Bracton, because he forfeited his friends (quod forisfacit amicos); all persons being forbidden to give him food or shelter, or to have any communication with him. Bracton, fol. 128b.

FRENDNITE, or FRENDWITE. A fine exacted from him who harbored an outlawed friend. Cowell; Cunningham. A quittance for forfang (exemption from the penalty of taking provisions before the king's purveyors had taken enough for the king's necessities). Cowell.

FRENETICUS. In old English law. A madman, or person in a frenzy. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 36.

FREOBORGH. A free surety or free pledge. Spelman. See "Frank Pledge."

FREQUENT. To visit often; to resort to often or habitually. Webster, quoted in 109 Ind. 176.

FREQUENTIA ACTUS MULTUM OPE-ratur. The frequency of an act effects much. 4 Coke, 78; Wingate, Max. 192.

FRESCA. In old records. Fresh water, or rain and land flood. Cowell.

FRESH DISSEISIN. Such disseisin as a man may seek to defeat of himself, and by his own power, without the help of the king or judges. There was no limit set to the time within which this might be done. It is set in one case at a disseisin committed within fifteen days. Bracton, lib. 4, c. 5. In another case it was held a fresh disseisin when committed within a year. Britt. cc. 43, 44; Cowell.

FRESH FINE. A fine levied within a year. St. Westminster II. (13 Edw. I.) c. 45; Cowell.

FRESH FORCE. Force done within forty days. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 7; Old Nat. Brev. 4. The heir or reversioner in a case of disseisin by fresh force was allowed a remedy in chancery by bill before the mayor. Cowell.

FRESH PURSUIT. An immediate pursuit of an escaping criminal. The phrase does not imply instant pursuit, but pursuit without unreasonable delay. See 27 Cal. 574; 70 Miss. 253.

FRESH SUIT (Law Lat. recens insecutio). In English law. Immediate or speedy pursuit or prosecution. The pursuit of an offender or felon as a thief immediately or as soon as possible after the robbery, including the prosecution of such pursuit until the apprehension and conviction of the offender. The object of this was to enable the party to recover his goods, which otherwise would belong to the king. Britt. c. 15.

The early and speedy prosecution of a suit. St. Gloc. c. 9.

FRET (Fr.) In French marine law. Freight. Ord. Mar. liv. 3, tit. 3.

FRETER (Fr.) In French marine law. To freight a ship; to let it. Emerig. Ins. c. 11, § 3.

FRETEUR (Fr.) In French marine law. Freighter; the owner of a ship, who lets it to the merchant. Emerig. Ins. c. 11, § 3.

FRETTUM. In old English law. Freight money. Cowell.

FRETUM. A strait.

Fretum Britannicum, the strait between Dover and Calais. Otherwise called Fretum Gallicum. Cowell.

FRIARS. An order of religious persons of whom there were four principal branches, from whom the rest descend, viz.: (1) Franciscans, or Grey Friars; (2) Augustines; (3) Dominicans, or Black Friars; (4) Carmelites, or White Friars. Wharton.

FRIBUSCULUM. In civil law. A slight dissension between husband and wife, which produced a momentary separation, without any intention to dissolve the marriage, in which it differed from a divorce. Poth. Pand. lib. 50, § 106; Vicat. This amounted to a separation in our law. See "Separation."

FRIDBORG, or FRITHBORG. Frank pledge. Cowell. Security for the peace. Spelman.

FRIDHBURGUS (Saxon). A kind of frank pledge, whereby the principal men were bound for themselves and servants. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47. Cowell says it is the same as frank pledge.

FRIEND OF THE COURT. See "Amicus Curiae."

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES. In England. Mutual benefit societies, supported by subscription of the members, the benefits being of various kinds,—the periodical division of assets, sick or funeral benefits, relief of widows and orphans, etc.

Regulated by "Friendly Society Act" of 1875.

FRIENDLY SUIT. A suit brought by a creditor in chancery against an executor or administrator, being really a suit by the executor or administrator, in the name of a creditor, against himself, in order to compel the creditors to take an equal distribution of the assets. 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 1915.

Also any suit instituted by agreement between the parties to obtain the opinion of the court upon some doubtful question in which they are interested, such as actions for construction of wills, partition suits, etc.

FRIGIDITY. Impotence.

FRILINGI. Persons of free descent, or freemen born; the middle class of persons among the Saxons. Spelman.

FRISCUS (Law Lat.; from Fr. fresche). In old English law. Recent or new. Frisca fortia, fresh force. Force recently committed. vis nupera et recenter illata. Spelman; Reg. Orig. 108a.

Fresh, as distinguished from salt. Maricus friscus, fresh marsh. Spelman. Aqua frisca, fresh water. Reg. Orig. 97.

Uncultivated, as ground. Terra jacens frisca et ad warect', land lying fresh and fallow. Towns. Pl. 69.

FRITHBORG. Frank pledge. Cowell?

FRITHBOTE. A satisfaction or fine for a breach of the peace.

FRITHBREACH. The breaking of the peace. Cowell.

FRITHGAR. The year of jubilee, or of meeting for peace and friendship. Jacob.

FRITHGILDA. Guildhall; a company or fraternity for the maintenance of peace and security; also a fine for breach of the peace. Jacob.

FRITHMAN. A member of a company or fraternity. Blount.

FRITHSOCUE. Surety of defense; jurisdiction of the peace; the franchise of preserving the peace. Cowell; Spelman.

FRITHSPLOT. A spot or plot of land, encircling some stone, tree, or well, considered sacred, and therefore affording sanctuary to criminals. Wharton.

FRIVOLOUS. See "Pleading."

FRODMORTEL, or FREOMORTEL. An immunity for committing manslaughter. Mon. Angl. tit. 1, p. 173.

FRUCTUARIUS (Lat.) One entitled to the use of profits, fruits, and yearly increase of a thing; a lessee; a fermor. Bracton, 241; Vicat.

Sometimes, as applied to a slave, he of whom any one has the usufruct. Vicat.

FRUCTUS (Lat.) The right of using the increase or fruits; equivalent to usufruct.

That which results or springs from a thing; as, rents, interest, freight from a ship, etc.

All the natural return, increase, or additions which is added by nature or by the skill of man, including all the organic products of things. Vicat; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 154.

They were divided according to their nature into:

——Fructus Civiles. Civil fruits. All revenues and recompenses which, though not fruits, properly speaking, are recognized as such by the law. 1 Kauffm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 154; Calv. Lex.; Vicat.

——Fructus Naturales. Those products which are produced by the powers of nature alone; as, wool, metals, milk. 1 Kauffm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 154; Calv. Lex.

——Fructus Industriales. Those products which are obtained by the labor and cultivation of the occupant; as, corn. 1 Kauffm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 154, note. Emblements are such in the common law. 2 Steph. Comm. 258; Vicat.

According to their situation with respect to their source they were divided into:

——Fructus Pendentes. The fruits united with the thing which produces them. These form a part of the principal thing. 1 Kauffm. Mackeld. Civ. Law, § 154.

——Fructus Separati. Separate fruits; the fruits of a thing when they are separated from it. Dig. 7. 4. 13; 1 Mackeld. Civ. Law, p. 156, § 154.

FRUCTUS AUGEAT HAEREDITATEM. Fruits enhance an inheritance.

FRUCTUS PENDENTES PARS FUNDI videntur. Hanging fruits make part of the land. Dig. 6. 1. 44; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1578. See "Larceny."

FRUCTUS PERCEPTOS VILLAE NON esse constat. Gathered fruits do not make a part of the farm. Dig. 19. 1. 17. 1; 2 Bouv. Inst. note 1578.

FRUGES (Lat.) Anything produced from vines, underwood, chalk pits, stone quarries. Dig. 50. 16. 77.

Grains and leguminous vegetables. In a more restricted sense, any esculent growing in pods. Vicat; Calv. Lex.

FRUIT. The produce of a tree or plant which contains the seed, or is used for food.
